During this three months' stay in Greece (Acts xx. 3), the Apostle wrote his wonderful epistle to the Romans, with which his first series of inspired epistles closes. Towards the end of this epistle, we read:

> "Whensoever I take my journey into Spain, I will come to you: . . . . . but now I go unto Jerusalem to minister unto the saints. For it hath pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia to make a certain contribution for the poor saints which are at Jerusalem" (Rom. xv. 24-26).

In verses 30 and 31 of this same chapter of Romans, Paul manifests his apprehension concerning "them that do not believe in Judæa". This apprehension was only too well founded, for he was just on the point of embarking for Cenchrea, the Corinthian sea-port, when a Jewish plot to waylay him was discovered. Lewin's remark here is worth recording, even though Alford feels it to be inconsistent with what is said in Acts xx. 4.

> "Paul eluded his adversaries by a change of route. He determined, instead of crossing the sea direct, to go round by Macedonia (The reader would be well advised to consult the map here). The better to evade a watchful foe, Paul and his friends divided themselves into two companies, and it was arranged that Timothy, Sopater of Berea, Aristarchus, Secundus, Gaius of Derbe, Tychicus and Trophimus should sail to Troas, > the common resting-place, and there await the apostle's arrival, and that Paul himself, and Luke and Titus with Jason should make a forced march by land up to and through Macedonia and rejoin the others at Troas."

Speaking of these same events, Farrar writes:

> "Of the seven converts who accompanied St. Paul, Sosipater son of Pyrrhus, a Berean, Aristarchus & Secundus of Thessalonica, Gaius of Derbe, Timothy of Lystra, Tychicus & Trophimus of Ephesus, and Luke—all except the latter (i.e. Luke) left him apparently at Philippi, and went on to Troas to await him there."

Farrar's view seems more in accord with all the facts that we possess, but the matter is not important enough to debate. Whatever the truth may be, some arrived at Troas and "tarried for us" (says Luke)—"and we sailed away from Philippi after the days of unleavened bread, and came unto them to Troas in five days" (Acts xx. 6). We have no information as to whether the Apostle actually observed the feast of unleavened bread or not. Probably, being in Philippi, he did not, although in another community, if the influence of Jewish upbringing had been strong, he would have had no scruples in doing so.

The journey from Troas to Neapolis had only taken two days on a former occasion (Acts xvi. 11). It would seem, therefore, that the wind must have been contrary in this case, as we read that it took five days to make the return journey. It has been supposed that from Neapolis, or at least from Troas, to Patara, Paul chartered a vessel, for it not only waited for him at Assos, but sailed by Ephesus, and waited for the elders at Miletus.

The famous letter written by Pliny the younger from Bithynia to the Emperor Trajan some 50 years after Paul's visit to Troas, provides an interesting sidelight on Luke's inspired record. Concerning the early Christians, Pliny writes:

> "They were wont to meet together on a stated day before it was light, and sing among themselves alternatively a hymn to Christ as God, and bind themselves by an oath not to commit any wickedness, but on the contrary, not to be guilty of theft, or robbery, or adultery, never to falsify their word, nor to deny a pledge committed to them: and when these things were ended it was their custom to separate, and then to come together again to a meal which they ate in common without any disorder."

With these words we may compare the record of Acts xx. 7:

> "And upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached unto them, ready to depart on the morrow; and continued his speech until midnight."

Much has been written regarding the true translation of the phrase "The first day of the week". The original reads En de te mia ton sabbaton, and has sometimes been translated "The first of the sabbaths". The Companion Bible has the following note on this point:

> "FIRST, etc.=first day of the Sabbaths, i.e. the first day for reckoning their seven sabbaths to Pentecost. It depended upon the harvest (Deut. xvi. 9) and was always from the morrow after the weekly sabbath when the wave-sheaf was presented (Lev. xxiii. 15).

In John xx. 1 this was the fourth day after the crucifixion—'The Lord's Passover' Cp. Ap. 156. This was by Divine ordering. But in A.D.57 it was twelve days after the week of unleavened bread, and therefore more than a fortnight later than in A.D.29."

The reader may feel that there is a weak point in this argument, for there is no evidence given for the "twelve days" that this view necessitates. Those who regard "the first day of the week" as referring to Sunday, draw attention to the fact that if we assume this day to be the Sabbath, then, as this day begins at sunset, by traveling at day-break Paul would have been traveling on the Sabbath. This would not have been likely in view of the Jews' bitter opposition to his teaching, and the Apostle's conciliatory attitude at Jerusalem a few weeks later (Acts xxi. 21-24). It is also a point worth considering that if we translate Sabbaton and Sabbata as "Sabbath" and "Sabbath day", then there is no word for "week" in the New Testament, which seems rather unlikely.

If we were not called under the dispensation of the Mystery, we should feel obliged to devote considerable space and time to this subject, but as the question of the observance of any particular day, be it a Sabbath, or the first day of the week, belongs only to those of other callings, we feel that we can safely leave the matter without further investigation. The same remark applies to the expression that meets us in Acts xx. 7: "to break bread." We have already realized on other and fundamental grounds, that the observance of a New Covenant memorial feast has no place in the dispensation of the Mystery, and we are therefore not personally concerned with the question as to whether these believers at Troas met to keep the Lord's supper, or whether, as in Acts xxvii. 33-35, the words simply indicate an ordinary meal. We have already written fairly fully on this debatable subject, and we trust, therefore, that we shall not be discharged with seeking to evade the issue, if we say no more about it here.

The Apostle's speech referred to in verse 7 (Acts xx.) lasted until midnight, and we read that a "certain young man named Eutychus . . . . . fell down from the third loft, and was taken up dead". The fact that even such a speaker as the Apostle could have at least one member of his congregation overcome with sleep sounds a very human note. The wording of verse 9 reads like the record of an eye-witness. First, the young man sinks into drowsiness ("being fallen into a deep sleep") and then, having been overpowered ("entirely relaxed by sleep"), he falls from the third loft where he had been sitting, and is "taken up dead". The word translated "dead" is nekros, which is used 18 times in the Acts and in every other instance without ambiguity. The Apostle immediately descends to where the young man lies. He does not first reassure the mourning company that the young man's "life is in him", but at once embraces him, as Elijah and Elisha had done before him (I Kings xvii. 21 and II Kings iv. 34). After "breaking bread" and continuing his discourse until day break, the Apostle departs.

The structure here brings into correspondence the division of his company and the waiting of some of them for Paul at Troas, and the division of his company and the waiting of them all for Paul at Assos.

"And we went before to ship and sailed unto Assos, there intending to take in Paul: for so had he appointed, minding himself to go afoot" (Acts xx. 13).

The distance between Troas and Assos is between 20 and 30 miles, and travelers have spoken of difficulty in finding the road. In Paul's day, however, there was a good Roman road (see the Antonne Itinerary), and it was doubtless along this road that the Apostle traveled.

Some commentators "wonder why" the Apostle took this course, but we believe that any who have been engaged for any length of time in public ministry, especially if it has involved meeting fresh people and dealing with fresh problems, will readily understand the Apostle's imperative need for a few hours entirely free, even from the company of those he loved so well.

Meeting the ship at Assos, the Apostle continues his journey via Mitylene, Chios, Samos and Trogyllium to Miletus. In the two verses that describe this journey (Acts xx. 14, 15) we find the characteristic variety of expression that denotes that the record is a personal one. We read that they "came" to Mitylene; they "came opposite" Chios; they "touched at" Samos; they "remained" for a while at Trogyllium; and at length "came" to Miletus. The Apostle had deliberately "sailed by" Ephesus, in order to save time, "for he hasted, if it were possible for him, to be at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost".

With this remark, the section before us reaches its conclusion, and once again we must bring our study to a close. There is an intensity about these steps leading to Jerusalem, and we begin to sense that a crisis is at hand—a crisis which prepared the way for the introduction of a new dispensation, and which is therefore of intense interest to all who realize their association with the dispensation of the Mystery.

#41. The Third Missionary Journey (xix. 21 - xxi. 39). The Prison Ministry Foreshadowed (xx. 17 - 38). Elders and Overseers.

pp. 164 - 169

An examination of a modern map will show that considerable changes have taken place on the coast at Miletus since the days of the apostles. What in those days were islands off the coast are now gentle elevations on dry land, while the river Meander near which Miletus stood, has brought down so much soil in its circuitous course that the whole aspect of the place has completely changed. Miletus is placed by the sea in Ptolemy's geography, and is stated to have had four havens, one of which could hold a fleet.

In xx. 16 we read the "Paul had determined to sail by Ephesus, because he would not spent the time in Asia". For some unrecorded reason, however, the ship was delayed and Paul seizes the opportunity to send to the Church at Ephesus asking the elders to meet him at Miletus. Ephesus is some 40 miles away, so that the journey was a possible one for any who were sufficiently zealous to make it. And so we find the little band at Miletus, eagerly listening to the last message they would receive from the Apostle, until the time came for him to write his wonderful epistle to the Ephesians.

As we have a great deal of ground to cover, let us first avail ourselves of the help afforded by the structure.

Acts xx. 17-38.

G | 17-18. CALL TO THE ELDERS.
They come.
H1 | 18-21. TEACHING. Apostello, anaggello. |

H3 | 33-35. PRACTICING. |
a | I have not coveted.
b | I have showed.
G | 36-38. LEAVE-TAKING TO THE ELDERS.
They accompany him.

It will be observed that the subject-matter falls into three main groups. The section labeled H1, H2 and H3 are in the nature of a personal defence, linking together, as the Apostle so often did, his teaching and his manner of life. The sections labeled "I" are concerned with the Apostle's ministry of grace, with its hint of prison, and his commending of his hearers to the grace of God.

Before tracing the Apostle's teaching through this section, let us first become acquainted with what was involved in the office of an "elder", for we shall meet this title in the pastoral epistles, and there has been a good deal of controversy as to its exact significance.

The word translated "elder" is the Greek presbuteros, which occurs in its Anglicized form in I Tim. iv. 14 as the word "presbytery". The base of the word is proeisbenai, "to be far advanced in", probaino being translated both "to go on" (Matt. iv. 21), and "of great age" (Luke ii. 36). Persons of mature years were considered worthy of offices of trust, and so we have the words presbeia, "embassage" (Luke xiv. 32), and presbeuo, "I am an ambassador" (Eph. vi. 20). The idea of age associated with the holding of office is familiar in our present-day words "*ald*erman" and "*sen*ator".

In the O.T. the "elders" of Egypt are referred to (Gen. l. 7: LXX presbuteros), and the "elders" of Israel (Exod. iii. 16), and the title occurs many times in the Gospels. The word is often disguised in our language under the title "priest", for our Saxon forefathers spoke of the "elder" as a preoster or preste. The sacerdotal associations linked with the word "priest" in its modern usage should not be applied to presbuteros. The English word "priest" should be reserved for the Greek hiereus, a title which, so far as the Church is concerned, belongs only to the Lord Himself.

In the pastoral epistles, and in the epistles written by James, Peter and John, we again meet with this office of "elder", and find the word applied to women as well as to men (I Tim. v. 2; Titus ii. 3). Its heavenly counterpart is also referred to twelve times in the Book of the Revelation. Moreover we read that there were elders in the church at Jerusalem (Acts xv. 2) and that the Apostle ordained elders in every church in Galatia (Acts xiv. 23).

In Acts xx., we find the elders of Ephesus addressed by another title:

> "Take heed, therefore, unto yourselves and to all the flock over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers" (Acts xx. 28).

The word "overseers" here is the translation of the Greek episkopos, which is a compound of epi, "upon" or "over", and skopeo, from skeptomai, "to look". Apart from this occurrence in Acts xx. 28, the four other occurrences of episkopos are translated "bishop". The related word episkeptomai is translated ten times "visit", and once "look out". The first of these references (Matt. xxv. 36: "Sick and ye visited Me") give some idea of the unofficious and kindly meaning of the word.

Episkopeo is translated "looking diligently" in Heb. xii. 15, and "taking the oversight" in I Pet. v. 2; while episkope is translated "visitation" in Luke xix. 44 and I Pet. ii. 12, "bishoprick" in Acts i. 20, and "office of a bishop" in I Tim. iii. 1.

The tendency of the Saxon to soften some of the harsher sounds of the Greek is seen in the transition from the original episkop to "bishop", and from the Greek kuriake (retained in the Scotch "kirk") to the Saxon "church". When applied to Christ Himself, the office of Bishop is linked with that of Shepherd:

> "For ye were as sheep going astray; but are now returned unto the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls" (I Pet. ii. 25).

In chapter v. of the same epistle we find the figure of "feeding the flock" associated with "elders" and Christ Himself as "the Chief Shepherd". Paul uses the same figure in Acts xx., where he speaks of the "elders" being made "bishops" (or "overseers") over "the flock" (Acts xx. 28).

It is a striking tribute to Dean Alford's honesty to read in his Greek N.T. the following frank statement concerning the A.V. translation "overseers" in this passage. Irenaeus is quoted as teaching (1) that "bishops" and "elders" were two distinct titles, and (2) that neighbouring churches were brought in so that there might not seem to be episkopoi in one church only.

> "That neither of these was the case", the Dean comments, "is clearly shown by the plain words of this verse: he sent to Ephesus, and summoned the elders of the church. So early did interested and disingenuous interpretations begin to cloud the light which Scripture might have thrown on ecclesiastical questions. The A.V. has hardly dealt fairly in this case with the sacred text, in rendering episkopos (ver. 28) 'overseers': whereas it ought to have been 'bishops', that the fact of elders and bishops having been originally and apostolically synonymous might be apparent to the ordinary English reader, which now it is not" (Alford in loco).

If we turn to the pastoral epistles we shall received abundant confirmation of the fact that the words "presbyter" and "bishop" are synonymous.

> "For this cause I left thee in Crete . . . . . and ordain elders (presbyters) in every city . . . . . if any be blameless, the husband of one wife, having faithful children not accused of riot and unruly. For a bishop (episkopos) must be blameless, as the steward of God; not self-willed, not soon angry, not given to wine, no striker, not given to filthy lucre: but a lover of good men, just, holy, temperate" (Titus i. 5-8).

It is quite clear here that the Apostle uses the two titles presbuteros and episkopos of one and the same office. This can also be confirmed by comparing the passage quoted above (Titus i. 5-8) with I Tim. iii. 1-7:

> "If a man desire the office of a bishop . . . . . he must be blameless, the husband of one wife . . . . . apt to teach; not given to wine, no striker, not guilty of filthy lucre . . . . . one that ruleth his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity" (I Tim. iii. 1-4).

The next two verses provide further light upon the "office of a bishop":

> "For if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?" (I Tim. iii. 5).

The word "rule" here must be carefully interpreted if we are not to fall into the very error to which the Apostle refers in Acts xx.:

> "Of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them" (Acts xx. 30).

There is nothing so likely to produce an overbearing prelacy as a misconception of the kind of "rule" a "bishop" was called upon to exercise. Peter refers to the evil consequences of attempting to be "lords over God's heritage", and John puts his finger on the same temptation when he speaks of Diotrephes, "who loveth to have the pre-eminence" (III John 9).

We are reminded by such passages as these of the following words, which will no doubt be familiar to some of our readers:

> "But man, proud man,
> Dress'd in a little brief authority,
> Most ignorant of what he's most assured,
> + + + +
> Plays such fantastic tricks before high heaven
> As make the angels weep."

The figures of a shepherd, who lays down his life for the sheep, and of a father in his own household, should have been sufficient to prevent any misunderstanding of the word "rule". The word itself (in I Tim. iii. 4 and 5) is proistemi, which means "to preside", and then "to stand before" so as to defend and maintain (compare Titus iii. 8, 14). The figure of a father presiding over and maintaining his own house, is then transferred to the bishop "taking care" of God's house, the church. The only other occurrences of epimeleomai, "to take care" are found in the parable of the Good Samaritan (Luke x. 34, 35).

In Eph. iv. the Apostle speaks of the order of ministry given by the ascended Christ as follows:

> "And He gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers" (Eph. iv. 11).

We have already seen that a bishop must be "apt to teach" (I Tim. iii. 2), and that the office of a bishop is interchangeable with that of an "elder" and a "shepherd". The word "pastor" in Eph. iv. 11 is poimen, which is translated "shepherd" in John x. 14, and is linked with episkopos in I Pet. ii. 25. The office of "elder" or "bishop" is therefore included in the gifts of Eph. iv. 11 under the double title of "pastors and teachers".

The introduction of bishops and deacons in Phil. i. 1 is in line with the teaching of this particular epistle which stresses service rather than salvation. Their presence in this epistle also provides an interesting parallel with the epistles to Timothy and Titus as shown in the skeleton structure below:

The seven epistles of Paul, after Acts xxviii.

A | EPHESIANS. | The Mystery.
B | PHILIPPIANS. |
a | Bishops and Deacons.
b | The Prize.
C | PHILEMON. Truth in Practice.
A | COLOSSIANS. | The Mystery.
B | I & II TIMOTHY and TITUS. |
a | Bishops and Deacons.
b | The Crown.

On closer examination we find that even the rule of bishops and deacons had failed by the time II Timothy was written, and that ruin rather than rule seems to be the keynote of the Church's external order from this time onwards. It is not in any sense a ground for boasting that we can see no rule of bishops and deacons to-day. If we are obliged to walk an individual path, let us not boast, but rather remember the position from which the Church, in its manifest aspect, has fallen. Nevertheless, we can rightly rejoice—that, though all should fail, "He faileth not"—and in these closing days, with apostacy on the horizon, we can but cling more closely to the One Who is more to us than bishop, elder or pastor could ever be.

#42. The Third Missionary Journey (xix. 21 - xxi. 39). The Prison Ministry Foreshadowed (xx. 17 - 38). Paul surveys his "Acts" ministry (xx. 18 – 21).

pp. 200 - 208

If the reader will refresh his memory, by turning to the previous article of this series (page 164) he will see that the opening member of the structure, with its reference to "Elders", occupied all the available space. We must now turn our attention from ministry in general and the particular office denominated Elder to Bishop to the ministry of the apostle Paul, and that phase of it that was drawing to a close, covered in the structure by H1 | xx. 18-21, and H3 | xx. 33-35, where the Apostle surveys his preaching and his practice up to that time. Even though the reader were unacquainted with the passage his first perusal of verses 18-27 would suffice to convince him that Paul is reaching the close of one ministry, and looking on to the opening of another, and that this second ministry is so closely connected with imprisonment, that the Apostle entertains no hope of seeing these Ephesian believers again.

Before we follow his argument, it will be profitable to observe how much there is in common between the phraseology of this recorded speech and that of the epistles written by the same apostle.

ACTS.—"After what manner I have been with you" (Acts xx. 18).
EPISTLE.—"Ye know what manner of men we were among you for your sake" (I Thess. i. 5).

ACTS.—"Serving the Lord" (Acts xx. 19).

With the exception of the statement of our Lord Himself, "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon", douleuo is used exclusively by the Apostle for service unto the Lord. There are six occurrences in his epistles which, together with Acts xx. 19, make seven in all.

EPISTLE.—"Fervent in spirit, serving the Lord" (Rom. xii. 11 and see also Rom. xiv. 18; xvi. 18; Eph. vi. 7; Col. iii. 24; and I Thess. i. 9).

ACTS.—"Serving the Lord with humility of mind" (Acts xx. 19).
EPISTLE.—"In lowliness of mind let each esteem other" (Phil. ii. 3).

Paul is responsible for six out of the total seven occurrences of tapeinophrosune, "humility of mind".

ACTS.—"With many tears and temptations" (Acts xx. 19).
EPISTLE.—"My temptation which was in my flesh" (Gal. iv. 14).

ACTS.—"How I kept back nothing that was profitable" (Acts xx. 20).
EPISTLE.—"But if any man draw back" (Heb. x. 38).

ACTS.—"How I kept back nothing that was profitable" (Acts xx. 20).
EPISTLE.—"All things are not expedient" (I Cor. vi. 12).

There are sixteen occurrences of sumphero "expedient" or "profitable" in the N.T.: eight occur in the Gospels and Acts xix. 19, and the other eight exclusively in Paul's epistles.

ACTS.—"The Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city" (Acts xx. 24).
EPISTLE.—"The Spirit beareth witness with our spirit" (Rom. viii. 16).

ACTS.—"That I may finish my course" (Acts xx. 24).
EPISTLE.—"I have finished my course" (II Tim. iv. 7).

These are the only occurrences of dromos, "course" except that in Acts xiii. 25, where, again, Paul is speaking. The use of the verb teleioo, "to perfect", in the sense of finishing a race, is characteristic of the Apostle's language, especially in Phil. iii. and the Epistle to the Hebrews.

ACTS.—"Over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you (tithemi) overseers" (Acts xx. 28).
EPISTLE.—"Whereunto I am appointed (tithemi) a preacher" (II Tim. i. 11).

ACTS.—"Not sparing the flock" (Acts xx. 29).
EPISTLE.—"If God spared not the natural branches" (Rom. xi. 21).

There are seven occurrences of pheidomai, "to spare", in Paul's epistles. Elsewhere it is found only in Acts xx. 29 or II Pet. ii. 4, 5).

ACTS.—"Therefore watch and remember" (Acts xx. 31).
EPISTLE.—"For ye remember brethren our labour" (I Thess. ii. 9).

Mnemoneuo.—This is a word very characteristic of the apostle Paul. He uses it again in Acts xx. 35, seven times in the Church Epistles and three times in Hebrews.

ACTS.—"Therefore . . . . . remember . . . . . night and day" (Acts xx. 31).
EPISTLE.—"With labour and travail night and day" (II Thess. iii. 8).

The association of night and day as an indication of continuance is a characteristic expression of Paul. He uses the combination seven times (Acts xxvi. 7; I Thess. ii. 9; iii. 10; II Thess. iii. 8; I Tim. v. 5; II Tim. i. 3). The other epistles do not use the expression.

ACTS.—"I ceased not to warn to every one" (Acts xx. 31).
EPISTLE.—"Warning every man, and teaching every man" (Col. i. 28).

This word noutheteo, "to warn", occurs in seven passages, all of them in Paul's epistles. It occurs nowhere else except in Acts xx. 31, where it is Paul who is speaking.

ACTS.—"An inheritance among all them are sanctified" (Acts xx. 32).
EPISTLE.—"The inheritance of the saints in light" (Col. i. 12).

ACTS.—"I have coveted no man's silver, or gold, or apparel" (Acts xx. 33).
EPISTLE.—"Neither . . . . . used we . . . . . a cloke of covetousness" (I Thess. ii. 5).
This is a characteristic attitude of the apostle Paul.

ACTS.—"These hands have ministered unto my necessities" (Acts xx. 34).
EPISTLE.—"We labour, working with our own hands" (I Cor. iv. 12).

ACTS.—"These hands have ministered unto my necessities" (Acts xx. 34).
EPISTLE.—"Distributing to the necessity of saints" (Rom. xii. 13).

ACTS.—"These hands"; "These bonds" (Acts xx. 34; xxvi. 29).
"How that so labouring ye ought to support the weak" (Acts xx. 35).
EPISTLE.—"We both labour and suffer reproach" (I Tim. iv. 10).
Kopiao, "to labour" is a word much used by the Apostle. He employs it fourteen times in his epistles. None of the other apostles use the word except John (Rev. ii. 3).

Here, within the compass of eighteen verses, we have eighteen instances of the usage of words peculiarly Pauline. Could there be more convincing proof that Luke is a faithful eye-witness, and a trustworthy historian?

We now return to the opening of the Apostle's message to the elders of Ephesus.

> "Ye know from the first day that I came into Asia, after what manner I have been with you at all seasons, serving the Lord with all humility of mind" (Acts xx. 18, 19).

While we might have expected that the Apostle would have put foremost the preaching of Christ or doctrinal purity, we observe that he speaks first of his own personal integrity. To this aspect of the subject he returns in verses 33-35. His reason for reminding his hearers of his unselfishness and lowliness may have been that as he was about to leave them and enter another phase of ministry, he would have them realize that he was not following this course out of self-seeking. Indeed, he said later, "I count not my life dear unto myself", and he would inculcate in these believers the self-same spirit, making them willing, though sorrowful, that the Lord's service should deprive them of his presence. From beginning to end of his ministry the Apostle was able, with a good conscience, to bring together his "doctrine" and his "manner of life".

After this reminder, the Apostle passed on to the outer circumstances in which he had triumphed by grace.

> "And with many tears and temptations, which befell me by the lying in wait of the Jews" (Acts xx. 19).

The western mind regards weeping as a sign of weakness, but Paul was eastern in this respect, and once more in this address he appeals to his tears saying:

> "Therefore watch, and remember, that by the space of three years I ceased not to warn every one night and day with tears" (Acts xx. 31).

When the Apostle felt obliged to write the stern letter he did to the Corinthians, he said:

> "For out of much affliction and anguish of heart I wrote unto you, with many tears; not that ye should be grieved, but that ye might know the love which I have more abundantly unto you" (II Cor. ii. 4).

There could be no doubt, suggested the Apostle, of his unselfishness and the intensity of his concern for all who came under his ministry. From the commencement of that ministry the Jews had been his enemy, had stirred up opposition, and had laid wait for him, plotting against his life. This is recorded in Acts ix. 23, and Acts xxiii. 12 gives the account of a further plot. Again, in Acts xiii., xiv., xvii., xviii., xix. and xx., we read of Jews following the Apostle from one city to another stirring up opposition, but there is no record of his meeting with such antagonism in Asia itself. The Apostle appeals to what was common knowledge among his hearers, though not recorded in detail by Luke. In the same way, Paul speaks of scourgings, beatings, shipwrecks, prisons, and many perils when writing to the Corinthians (II Cor. xi. 23-28), but we should have remained in ignorance of these many sufferings had not the Apostle become "a fool" in boasting.

> "I kept back nothing that was profitable unto you" (Acts xx. 20).

Hupostello, "to keep back", is a word used for the reefing of a sail (Pind. I. 2. 60), and the Apostle uses it as a man of keen perception, possessed of a ready use and appreciation of language, as an intimate study of his writings reveals. He had possibly heard the word in use during his voyages, and, with the ministry of the word ever in mind, he seized upon its applicability to his own attitude in the case in point. He has not "lowered sail", but with every stitch of canvas set he had fulfilled his ministry of the Word and Gospel. He did not however make the unqualified claim that he had "kept back nothing", but added the words, "that was profitable for you". He had but recently written the Epistle to the Corinthians, where he plainly says that he had, of purpose, "kept back" certain doctrines because of the immaturity of the Corinthian saints (I Cor. ii., iii.). But nothing was kept back because of fear, or policy, or self-seeking. Our English word "profitable" is not full enough to convey the Apostle's meaning here. The word he used was sumphero, which is often translated "expedient", but even this word has taken upon itself a somewhat sinister meaning. The Greek word occurs twice in the Acts, the first occurrence being Acts xix. 19, where it is translated "brought together".

> "Many of them also which used curious arts brought their books together, and burned them before all men" (Acts xix. 19).

In Acts xix. 19 the word is used transitively, but in all other passages it is intransitive. While therefore we cannot translate "I kept back nothing that would bring you together", we must not import into either the word "profit" or "expedient" some of their modern meanings. The Apostle lets a little light into the nature and method of his teaching.

> "I have showed you, and taught you publicly, and from house to house" (Acts xx. 20).

"Showed."—This word must not be confused with an entirely different word that is translated "showed" in verse 35. Here, the original is anaggello (pronounced anangello) and means "to declare", as in verse 27, where the Apostle uses the word a second time.

The word suggests that the messenger had "brought back" word, as in Acts xiv. 27, where the Apostle "rehearsed" all that God had done. It also means an unreserved declaration, as the occurrence in Acts xix. 18 reveals.

> "They confessed and showed their deeds" (Acts xix. 18).

The reader will observe that in Acts xix. 18-20, it is recorded of the Ephesians that they "brought together" their books, and confessed and "showed" their deeds and that the Apostle, apparently impressed with this genuine repentance, ever quick to search his own heart, and ever ready to assimilate and use current words and occurrences, is found using the same word of himself on the next possible occasion.

"And have taught" (didasko, Acts xx. 20).—Teaching holds a far more important place than some believers are prepared to admit. Our Saviour's public ministry combined preaching with teaching (Matt. iv. 23), and His commission to the Apostles, given in the last chapter of Matthew, is "Teaching them to observe" (Matt. xxviii. 20). The Acts of the Apostles is a continuation of all the Jesus began to do and to teach (Acts i. 1), and the last verse of the Acts brings together "preaching" and "teaching" (Acts xxviii. 31). It was from among certain "prophets and teachers" that the Holy Ghost separated preachers for the evangelizing of Galatia (Acts xiii. 1). From this word comes didaskalia, "doctrine", which, apart from Matt. xv. 9 and Mark vii. 7, is a word exclusive to Paul's writings, where it occurs nineteen times. Didache, another word translated "doctrine", is more evenly distributed. Didache is teaching in process, but didaskalia is the substance of the teaching, or, as we express it, doctrine itself.

Teachers, didaskaloi, were included in the gifts of Eph. iv. 11, and the Apostle stressed the fact that he was not only an apostle, or a preacher, but a teacher of the Gentiles (I Tim. ii. 7; II Tim. i. 11), and the apostacy of the last days is associated more with "doctrines" (I Tim. iv. 1; II Tim. iv. 3), and "teachers" (II Tim. iv. 3) than with preachers. This teaching the Apostle had conducted both "publicly" and "from house to house".

Demosios, "publicly", is found only in the Acts of the Apostles, where it occurs four times:

> "The common prison" (Acts v. 18);
> "Beaten openly" (Acts xvi. 37);
> "Convincing the Jews, publicly" (Acts xviii. 28, and Acts xx. 20).

In like manner demos, "the people", occurs four times, and is found only in the Acts.

The Apostle's ministry was not conducted in a corner. Like his Master he could say:

> "I spake openly to the world: I ever taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort; and in secret have I said nothing" (John xviii. 20).

Unlike the Lord, however, his ministry was not confined to public speaking. He trained and taught the believer in things pertaining to faith, life and godliness, and so the Apostle says, "publicly and from house to house". Saul the persecutor was thorough:

> "As for Saul he made havoc of the church, entering into every house, and haling men and women committed them to prison" (Acts viii. 3).

and the same zeal that he manifested as a zealot for the religion of his fathers now characterized him as a champion of the cross. In the Apostle's days the church was often accommodated in the house of a believer (Rom. xvi. 5; Col. iv. 15; Philemon 2). Aquila and Priscilla knew the value of this homely ministry (Acts xviii. 26), and alas, the propagandists of the last few days will be aware of it too (II Tim. iii. 6), and will find a ready ear in those who "wander from house to house" (I Tim. v. 13).

Having defined his ministry as "serving the Lord", and its true presentation as "with all humility of mind"; its accompaniments of "tears, temptations and lying in wait of the Jews"; its unreserved exposition, "I kept back nothing"; its wisdom and consideration, "that was profitable" not for his own profit but "unto you", and having further particularized this ministry as one of both "public" and "private' teaching, the Apostle proceeds to summarize its substance.

> "Testifying (diamarturomai) both to the Jews and also to the Greeks, repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ" (Acts xx. 21).

His ministry was a testimony. In verse 24 we shall meet the word again, "to testify the gospel of the grace of God". Diamarturomai.—Dia, "through" is emphatic, and akin to our "thorough". It should never be forgotten that the Greek word for "witness" (martur) is the word translated "martyr" in Rev. ii. 13 and xvii. 6, and that our word "martyr" is but the Greek word "witness" in English letters. Paul's testimony was always at the risk of life and limb, and while it is not necessary for a true witness to be martyred, yet He Who reads the thoughts and intents of the heart, knows whether we hold His truth so dear that Smithfield itself could not turn us back. We boast not. We realize only too keenly our frailty, but we pray that such may be the character of our "testimony" in His sight.

Paul's testimony was to both "Jew and Greek". Were we unprepared by this reference, we would probably slip into the error of thinking that "Jew and Gentile" is the common phrase in the N.T., whereas it is not so. It is true, that the A.V. reads in I Cor. x. 32:

> "Neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, nor to the Church of God."

and this has been made the foundation of a special attempt at "right division", but the fact remains that Hellen (Greek) and not Ethnos (Gentile) is used here. Again, in Rom. i. 16 we read "To the Jew first, and also to the Greek", but in Rom. ii. 9, 10 the identical phrase is translated, "to the Jew, first and also the Gentile", but this is without warrant. The same correction is needed in John vii. 35, Rom. iii. 9 and I Cor. xii. 13.

"Jews" are coupled with or contrasted with "Greeks" in no less than twenty-one passages of the Acts and Epistles, and while the Jew and the Gentile do occur together, it is with nothing like the same frequency, and cannot compare with the reiterated "Jew and Greek" of Paul's epistles. To attempt an explanation of this peculiarity is beyond our present scope. That it is of purpose we most surely believe, and the series of articles that have appeared in these pages dealing with Greek wisdom will give direction to the enquiring mind. In the Jew, God manifested the bankruptcy of human righteousness; in the Greek the utter failure of human wisdom. To both Paul preached and taught the same need, viz.:

> "Repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ" (Acts xx. 21).

"Repentance" is metanoia, and means "a change of mind", or "an after mind". Repentance presupposes that one has entertained false ideas, consequently we find repentance urged upon Israel concerning their false ideas as to the King and Kingdom. The Corinthians had entertained false ideas concerning the scope of their liberty in Christ, and had to be shown that liberty was not license (I Cor. viii. 9, 10). The man caught in the snare of the Devil was delivered upon repentance or, as it is expanded, by acknowledgment of the truth (II Tim. ii. 25). Paul urged repentance upon philosophic Athens (Acts xvii. 30), no longer restricting this need to the people of Israel, and in another summary of his earlier ministry he said:

> "I was not disobedient to the heavenly vision, but showed first unto them of Damascus, and at Jerusalem, and throughout all the coasts of Judaea and then to the Gentiles, that they should repent and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance" (Acts xxvi. 19, 20).

So the Thessalonians:

> "Turned to God from idols, to serve the living and true God" (I Thess. i. 9).

Repentance, however, cannot be separated, except mentally, from the positive act of faith. He who "turns from idols" without "turning to the living God" may be but "empty, swept and garnished". Repentance and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ go together.

At this point we must bring our exposition to a close for it is too late in the article to consider the implication of such words as "faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ". The interested believer, however, knows the prime importance of the words, and it is with them that Paul brings the survey of his "Acts" ministry to an end. His next words denote a change, "And now", but this too we leave for consideration in another article.

The Eternal God is thy Refuge.

(Being a series of studies designed to encourage the believer in times of stress).

#2. "God is our Refuge and Strength" (Psa. xlvi. 1).
pp. 29, 30

After having considered the testimony of Moses, which provides the title for this series, we turn almost instinctively to the Psalms. There have, of course, been great doctrinal and dispensational changes since their immortal phrases were sung and penned, but human experience and need, and Divine mercy and provision remain unchanged. Let us turn, then, to Psalm xlvi.

> "God is our Refuge and Strength, a very present help in trouble" (Psa. xlvi. 1).
> "The Lord of hosts is with us: The God of Jacob is our refuge" (Psa. xlvi. 7, 11).

The land and people of Israel were not strangers to war, and this Psalm probably refers to the siege under Sennacherib. It does not celebrate "a victorious campaign, but a successful defence" (Companion Bible).

> "In the whole of Israel's history, there is only one event, of which we can here think, the destruction of Sennacherib's army before the gates of Jerusalem, Isa. xxxvii. 36 . . . after the exodus from Egypt, there was no occasion more appropriate than this for bringing vividly out the leading idea in this Psalm" (Hengstenberg).

The blessed refrain "God . . . . . is with us" is but an echo of the Immanuel ("God with us") that we find in Isa. viii. 10; and just as Hezekiah prayed that through the deliverance of Jerusalem the kingdoms of the earth "may know that Thou alone art the Lord" (Isa. xxxvii. 20), so in this Psalm we read:

> "Know that I am God. I will be exalted among the heathen, I will be exalted in the earth" (Psa. xlvi. 10).

We note first of all in this psalm that the exultant reference to God as Refuge comes three times—in verse 1, verse 7, and in the last verse, 11. Further, it should be noted that the reference to the earth being "removed" and the waters "roaring" in verses 2 and 3, corresponds with the "rage" of the heathen and the "moving" of the kingdoms in verse 6, where the same two words are found in the original. The "Selah" between verses 3 and 4 draws attention to the contrast between the roaring waters without, and the gentle flow within of the river that supplied, as from a secret source, the needs of Zion.

Coming back to the thought of the Refuge in this Psalm, we note next that the Psalmist has been inspired to use two words to describe this refuge, and neither of them being the same as that found in Deut. xxxiii. 27. The word used in verse 1: "God is our refuge", carries with it the idea of something one can "trust", as will be seen by its usage in Psalm xci. 4, "Under His wings shalt thou trust". It is probably derived from a word which means "to make haste" or "flee" (Psa. xl. 13), and suggests that such a refuge is one to which one would flee for safety (compare Heb. vi. 18). The second word is found in Psalm xlvi. 7 & 11 and means a "high tower". The idea of safety is evidently associated with this, for we read in Prov. xviii. 10:

"The name of the Lord is a strong tower, the righteous runneth into it and is safe."

To sum up, then, we may say that God Himself is set before us as our Refuge, in a threefold light. He is a "dwelling"—prepared beforehand by God Who anticipates all eventualities (Deut. xxxiii. 27). He is also a "trustworthy" refuge (Psa. xlvi. 1), and a high and exalted place of safety (Psa. xlvi. 7, 11). This, dear reader, is a word in season for us all. "The Eternal God is our refuge."

#3. "A very present help in trouble" (Psa. xlvi. 1).
pp. 52 - 54

Most readers could provide examples from their own personal experience of the attitude so often adopted by people of "letting things slide". While no danger seems imminent these people give the superficial appearance of an enviable sangfroid, but in many cases these are the very people who show the greatest evidence of fear when the crisis breaks. One can find many examples to-day which illustrate the parable of the wise and foolish virgins. And so we come to another blessed aspect of the teaching of Scripture concerning our "refuge".

"God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble" (Psa. xlvi. 1).

However fully the Government may have provided for the people, all such provision is rendered useless if it is not available when wanted. Steel shelters, guaranteed to withstand concussion, to protect from flying splinters, and to resist falling masonry, are so much mockery in a day of calamity, if they have never been erected. Respirators, proved by test to provide adequate protection against poison gas, are so much lumber if they are not at hand when wanted. And so we read the God is not only our Refuge, but He is "a very present Help in trouble" (Psa. xlvi. 1). There is no actual reference here to the "presence" of God, although, of course, it is implied. This majestic A.V. translation was not altered in the R.V. advisedly, but the reader should know that the words translated "A very present help" are literally "A much found help". This same word, when used of the wicked in Psalm xxxvii. 36, is translated "could not be found".

Let us consider next one or two passages of Scripture that will strengthen our faith in this "very present" aspect of God's provision.

"He that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep" (Psa. cxxi. 4).

Every human life, without exception, is an alternation of waking and sleeping, and there is bound to come a time when sleep will rob even the most vigilant and conscientious guard of all power to carry out his duty. There is, however, more than this in Psalm cxxi. 4. It is not merely for the sake of the poetry of the passage that the Psalmist uses the two expressions "slumber" and "sleep". The two words have not quite the same meaning. "To sleep" (Heb. yashen) means "to fall asleep" involuntarily, as when a deep sleep fell upon Adam (Gen. ii. 21), or when man "sleeps the sleep of death" (Psa. xiii. 3). "To slumber" (Heb. num), on the other hand, refers more to "drowsiness", something that might be shaken off and overcome. In Proverbs we read that "drowsiness shall clothe a man with rags" (Prov. xxiii. 21), and Nahum's charge against the rulers of Nineveh is expressed in the words: "Thy shepherds slumber." Of false shepherds of Israel, we read in Isaiah:

> "His watchmen are blind; they are all ignorant, they are all dumb dogs, they cannot bark; sleeping, lying down, loving to slumber" (Isa. lvi. 10).

The Lord neither "slumbers" through lack of interest, nor "sleeps" because of frailty. He is indeed a very present help in trouble.

> "The eyes of the Lord are in every place, beholding the evil and the good" (Prov. xv. 3).

However watchful and wakeful a human sentinel may be, his eyes cannot possibly be "in every place'. No such limitations, however, are to be found in the Lord as our great Refuge. He will ever be "a very present help in trouble", for He is "ever present". "Whither shall I flee from Thy presence?" asked the Psalmist, and we know the answer. "Whether he ascend to heaven, or descend to hell, there will He still be found."

Moreover, the most watchful and vigilant of human guards is baffled by the fall of darkness, but this is not so with the Lord, for we read in Psalm cxxxix.:

> "The darkness and the light are both alike to Thee" (Psa. cxxxix. 12).

Here, then, is ground for assurance, quiet confidence and peace. Our Refuge is God Himself, and that being so, it must necessarily partake of His glorious attributes. He is eternal, He is almighty, He is ever-present, and we therefore have His encompassing protection by night and by day, in darkness and in light, unceasing, unwearied, and unfailing.

#4. "The God of Jacob is our refuge" (Psa. xlvi. 7, 11). pp. 61, 62

We have learned from the Scriptures that:

(1) "The eternal God is our refuge";
(2) "God is our refuge and strength", and we now add
(3) "The God of Jacob is our refuge."

The God of Israel and the God of Jacob are, of course, the same Person, but the two titles present two different aspects of truth. Jacob was frail, erring and sinful, the man who lied and deceived. Israel, on the other hand, was a princely title. And yet, though the name Jacob is associated with weakness and need, it is "the God of Jacob", and not "the God of Israel", Who is the Refuge of Psalm. xlvi. This title—"The God of Jacob"—is very much like the N.T. "God of all grace", for it was grace indeed that chose and forgave and blessed Jacob.

This leads us to another truth. We read once or twice the title "The God of Abraham, Isaac and Israel", but the usual title is "The God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob". This is God's great covenant name. The church, of course is not blessed under the terms of this covenant, but rather in accordance with His purpose and grace, that chose every member in Christ "before the foundation of the world". Nevertheless it is certainly true that if "Jacob" could find his refuge in God, so may those who, though "aliens" and "strangers", are made nigh by the blood of Christ.

The fact that underlies the title we are considering is well expressed in Psalm cxxxv. 4:

> "The Lord hath chosen Jacob unto Himself, and Israel for His peculiar treasure" (Psalm cxxxv. 4).

The opening verses of Psalm xx. are also relevant:

> "The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble: The name of the God of Jacob defend thee; send thee help from the sanctuary, and strengthen thee out of Zion" (Psa. xx. 1, 2).

The title "The God of Jacob" must not be taught of, however, as purely defensive in character, for in Psalm lxxvi. we read:

> "At Thy rebuke, O God of Jacob, both the chariot and horse are cast into a dead sleep" (Psa. lxxvi. 6).

Returning to Psalm xlvi. we note that in verses 7 and 11 there is a twofold title given to the Lord:

> "The Lord of Hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge."

He Who is the God of grace, is also the Supreme Ruler of all the hosts of heaven and earth, and it is this God Who is our refuge and Who is "with us".

> "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee" (Isa. xliii. 2).
> "I will be with him in trouble" (Psa. xci. 15).
> "He will be with thee; He will not fail thee, nor forsake thee" (Deut. xxxi. 8).

This emphasis upon the nearness of the Lord which we have already seen in verse 1 ("A very present help in trouble"), and in verses 7 and 11 ("The Lord of Hosts is with us") is found again in verse 5:

> "God is in the midst of her; she shall not be moved: God shall help her, and that right early."

"With us" . . . . . "In the midst" . . . . . "Very present".

"The Eternal God is thy Refuge."

#5. "Only" and "at all times" (Psa. lxii.).
pp. 77 - 79

Having seen something of Psalm xlvi., we pass on now to other passages, so that the reader may be able to see how all-embracive is our divinely provided Refuge and Defence.

In Psalm lxii. 7 and 8 we read:

> "In God is my salvation and my glory: the rock of my strength, and my refuge, is in God. Trust in Him at all times ye people, pour out your heart before Him: God is a refuge for us" (Psa. lxii. 7, 8).

Six times over in this Psalm does the particle ak occur—translated "truly" in verse 1, "surely" in verse 9, and "only" in verses 2, 4, 5, and 6. We have already learned that "God is our Refuge", and we now learn that He only is our Refuge.

Using Young's literal translation, we find the following occurrences of the word in Psalm lxii.:

Verse 1 . . . . . ONLY.—Toward God is my soul silent,
From Him is my salvation.

Verse 2 . . . . . ONLY.—He is my rock and my salvation,
My Tower, I am not much moved.

Verse 5 . . . . . ONLY.—For God, be silent, O my soul,
For from Him is my hope.

Verse 6 . . . . . ONLY.—He is my rock and my salvation,
My tower, I am not moved.

In contrast to the Rock and the High Tower provided by God, man is likened, in verse 3, to a "bowing wall, and a tottering fence". And in verse 9 we read:

> "ONLY.—Vanity are the low, a lie the high."

This is followed, in verse 10, by the words:

> "Trust not in oppression . . . . . set not your heart upon wealth when it increaseth."

We find, too, a progression in confidence as the Psalm proceeds, for in verse 2 we read:

> "He only is my rock and my salvation; He is my defence; I shall not be greatly moved."

In verse 6, however, his confidence has grown. He has compared the "bowing wall and tottering fence", and the vain attempt of his enemy to cast him down; and he can now say:

> "He only is my rock, and my salvation; He is my defence; I shall not be moved" (verse 6).

Here we have true boasting, namely, boasting in the Lord, for he who says "I shall not be moved" without full trust in the Lord may be self-deceived. With true humility the Psalmist says at first: "I shall not be greatly moved", suggesting a consciousness of human frailty as well as a confidence in Divine power.

Another passage of a similar kind is found in Psalm xlvi.:

> "God is in the midst of her, she shall not be moved" (Psa. xlvi. 5).

In another Psalm, David attributes this blessing to mercy:

> "For the king trusteth in the Lord, and through the mercy of the Most High he shall not be moved" (Psa. xxi. 7).

The same word in the original is render "to slip" and "to slide":

> "Hold up my goings in Thy paths, that my footsteps slip not" (Psa. xvii. 5).
> "Their foot shall slide in due time" (Deut. xxxii. 35).

Coming back to Psalm lxii., we find in the second reference to God as the Refuge of His people, that He is not only a Refuge and Defence from enemies without, but also a Refuge from anxiety within:

> "Trust in Him at all times, ye people, pour your heart before Him: God is a refuge for us" (Psa. lxii. 8).

Or, as the writer of the hymn puts it:

"How oft in the conflict, when pressed by the foe,
I have fled to my Refuge and breathed out my woe;
How often when trials like sea billows roll,
Have I hidden in Thee, O Thou Rock of my soul."

And so we find that God is indeed our Refuge, whether from the upheavals of nature (Psa. xlvi. 2, 3), or from conflict among nations (Psa. lxii. 4), or from the fears and troubles of our own hearts (Psa. lxii. 8).

"Trust in Him AT ALL TIMES."
"HE ONLY is my Rock and my Salvation."

"Only"—and "at all times". What an all-embracive exclusiveness!

"The Eternal God is thy Refuge."

#6. Experimental entry into eternal truth (Psa. xc. and xci.).
pp. 109 - 111

When we think of God as our refuge for His people, we instinctively, as we have already said, turn to Psalm xlvi. There is, however, another psalm that is almost equally relevant, and that is Psalm xci.

It would be beside the point in this series to consider at any length the historical setting of the passages that speak of God as our refuge, but we cannot refrain from drawing attention to the following points.

The Psalms are divided into five books, each book ending with the phrase, "Amen and Amen". Psalm xc. commences the fourth book, which corresponds with Numbers, the book of the wilderness. This psalm, which has been called "The funeral hymn of the world", is entitled: "A Prayer of Moses, the man of God", and deals with the sojourn of Israel during the forty years' wandering in the wilderness. The following psalm (xci.) refers to the children that Israel said had been brought out of Egypt to die in the wilderness. The covering text for the two related psalms might well be such a passage as Numb. xiv. 27-34:

"How long shall I bear with this evil congregation? . . . . . as ye have spoken in mine ears, so will I do to you. Your carcasses shall fall in the wilderness . . . . . from twenty years old and upward. Doubtless ye shall not come into the land . . . . . ye shall bear your iniquities even forty years, and ye shall know My breach of promise."

The reader should compare this passage with the following verses in Psalm xc.:

"Return" (verse 13).
"We are consumed in Thine anger" (verse 7).
"The days of our years are threescore years and ten" (verse 10).

In regard to Numb. xiv. 31-33, viz.:

> "But your little ones, which ye said should be a prey, them will I bring in, and they shall know the land which ye have despised . . . . . Your children shall wander in the wilderness forty years . . . . . until your carcasses be wasted in the wilderness."

the following should be compared:

> "Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night, nor for the arrow that flieth by day: nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness: nor for the destruction that wasteth at noon-day. A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee" (Psa. xci.).

The first of these psalms opens with the glorious words:

> "Lord, Thou has been our dwelling-place in all generations. Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever Thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, Thou art God" (Psa. xc. 1, 2).

This is a great, unalterable doctrinal fact. It extends beyond the possibilities of human experience, for it goes back to the beginning of creation, and concerns the very Being of God. Doctrine is essential, for without it we cannot build or grow, but it is one thing to subscribe to the "doctrine" of Psalm xc.—the children who fell in the wilderness probably believed its truth—and quite another to enter into the truth experimentally. It is this kind of difference that we find when we compare the opening of Psalm xc. with Psalm xci. The latter does not take us back to a time before the creation, but deals with the immediate present:

> "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty. I will say of the Lord, He is my refuge and my fortress, my God; in Him will I trust" (Psa. xci. 1, 2).

"Dwell", "abide", "say", "my", "trust". This is clearly experimental truth.

The same note is again evident in verses 9 and 10.

> "Because thou hast made the Lord, Which is my refuge, Even the Most High, thy habitation; There shall no evil befall thee, Neither shall any plague come nigh thy tent" (Psa. xci. 9,10).

The change of person may be accounted for if we regard Moses as addressing Joshua in the first place, and through him all who "wholly follow" the Lord (Deut. i. 36).

Here then is the Refuge provided for all who "trust", for all who "abide", for all who "dwell". Such are "covered with His feathers", and protected by His stretched-out "wings".

The words "abide under the shadow of the Almighty" may be compared with Gen. xix. 8, with its allusion to the inviolable character of Eastern hospitality: "Therefore came they under the shadow of my roof."

We also find that this dwelling-place is described as "the secret place of the Most High". This aspect of the subject we must leave for the moment, but we shall hope to return to it in our next meditation. Meanwhile, let us rejoice in this Refuge, to which we may flee, a "dwelling-place" and a "shadow" where we may abide.

#7. "When others helpers fail, and comforts flee, Help of the helpless, Lord, abide with me."

pp. 143, 144

Among the experiences that left their mark upon the soul of David, was that which he endured in connection with the cave of Adullam. In Psalm cxlii., which is the last of eight Psalms that have reference to this experience, David, in spite of his anointing and his faith, is shown to have been sometimes brought so low that despair entered his heart.

> "And David said in his heart, I shall now perish one day by the hand of Saul" (I Sam. xxvii. 1).

He had been hunted as a partridge in the mountains, and he knew what it was to be overwhelmed. Looking back upon these times, David said

> "When my spirit was overwhelmed within me, then Thou knewest my path" (Psa. cxlii. 3).

Possibly, at the time, David entertained doubts as to the Lord's watchful care, but looking back afterwards he gladly acknowledges that in his darkest moments (for the word "overwhelmed" literally means "was darkened"), the Lord knew his path.

"Refuge failed me", said David as he remembered his isolation and loneliness.

> "I looked on my right hand, and beheld, but there was no man that would know me: Refuge failed me; no man cared for my soul" (Psa. cxlii. 4).

"No man . . . . . refuge failed . . . . . no man cared."—The word "refuge" David uses here to indicate his plight, is the Hebrew manos, "somewhere to flee to", "escape" (Job xi. 20); "way to flee" (Jer. xxv. 35); "flight" (Amos ii. 14). There is a peculiar element of bitterness in the choice of this word manos, for the verb of which it is a derivative is used in many passages which speak of "fleeing" to one of the Cities of Refuge (Numb. xxxv. 11, 25; Deut. iv. 42, etc.). But David was cut off from all earthly provision for He had not even a City of Refuge to which he could flee, and added to this, "no man cared"! In such circumstances there is nothing left but God, and, blessed be His name, David wrote this Psalm to tell us that He "knew", He "cared", He provided a "refuge".

> "I cried unto Thee, O Lord; I said, Thou art my refuge and my portion in the land of the living" (Psa. cxlii. 5).

Here David used another word for "refuge"—the one already found in Psalms xci. 2 and xlvi. 1. Not only did the Lord provide a refuge when all help failed, but David adds that the Lord was his portion in the land of the living. Cheleq, "portion", has reference to "dividing spoil", or "dividing an inheritance". David used the word when he said

> "As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff; they shall part alike" (I Sam. xxx. 24).

He had also heard the words of the men of Belial who had cried:

> "We have no part in David" (II Sam. xx. 1).
> "What portion have we in David?" (I Kings xii. 16).

No man "knew"; no man "cared"; refuge had perished, but God remained, and while God abides, He is the refuge of His people, and not only so, but He is their portion, He takes the place of the victor's spoil, and He supplies the place of the lost inheritance. David could, then, boast in his sorest need and direct distress, that he was "more than conqueror" through the Lord. Let us beware of the "refuge of lies" (Isa. xxviii. 15); let us not be cast down when we look to the right hand and find "no man"; let us cast all our care upon Him "for He careth for us". "The Eternal God is thy Refuge."

#8. The "secret place" and the "shadow".
pp. 145, 146

> "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the most High > shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty" (Psa. xci. 1).

It is evident that we have here in this first verse the echo of thought which is so characteristic of Hebrew poetry. Let us seek a fuller understanding of these wonderful words.

There is a much greater difference between the Hebrew words for "dwell" and "abide" than our English version would indicate. The word "dwelling" implies a settled place of habitation, as, for instance, in Psalm xxiii.: "I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever." Isaiah, also, uses the word as he looks forward to the future reign of peace: "They shall build houses and inhabit them" (Isa. lxv. 21). "To abide", on the other hand, means "to lodge for a night" (Gen. xxxii. 21) or "to tarry a night" (Judges xix. 10). The transitoriness of the word is evident in Psalm xxx. 5 where we read that "weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning". The believer dwells, as in a permanent habitation, "in the secret place of the most High"; he lodges as though tarrying for a night "under the shadow of the Almighty". The first word speaks of the believer's eternal security, the second of the protection afforded day by day as he journeys homeward through the wilderness.

"The secret place."—Jonathan advices David in I Sam. xix. to "abide in a secret place" because of Saul's anger (I Sam. xix. 2), while Job speaks of Behemoth as lying "in the covert of the reeds and fens" (Job xl. 21). Isaiah, also uses the word when he speaks of Moab as "a covert . . . . . from the face of the spoiler" (Isa. xvi. 4), while in chapter xxxii. he speaks of another "covert", infinitely greater than Moab:

> "Behold a king shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgment. And a man shall be as a hiding place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest" (Isa. xxxii. 1, 2).

When the Lord came forth to deliver David when he was fleeing from the hand of Saul, we read that "He made darkness His secret place" (Psa. xviii. 11). And again, in Psalm xxvii.:

> "In the time of trouble He shall hide me in His pavilion; in the secret of His tabernacle shall He hide me" (Psa. xxvii. 5).

Again, in Psalm cxxxix. we read:

> "My substance was not hid from Thee, when I was made in secret and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth. Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being imperfect; and in Thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them" (Psa. cxxxix. 15, 16).

The "secret place" here is somewhat analogous with the believer's position in the Church of "the Mystery", as "chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world".

For every member of the One Body there is food for reflection in Psalm xci. 1. We too can go back, as did Moses, to the Lord our dwelling-place, "before the mountains were brought forth, or ever Thou hadst formed the earth and the world". We can rest in the unalterable truth of our election before the foundation of the world, and we can also know what it is day by day to tarry, as it were, "under the shadow of the Almighty". Not only is He our eternal home, but His presence is also our "lodging-place" throughout life's pilgrimage.

"The shadow of the Almighty."—How unsubstantial a thing is a shadow, and yet the very shadow of the Almighty provides full protection for the weary pilgrim. The following are four ways in which this figure of a protecting shadow is used:

(1) The shadow of the outstretched wings—"Hide me under the shadow of Thy wings" (Psa. xvii. 8).
(2) The shadow of a cloud from the heat (Isa. xxv. 4, 5).
(3) The shadow of a great rock in a weary land (Isa. xxxii. 2).
(4) The shadow of the Lord's hand (Isa. li. 16).

Those of us who know our calling and election, and something of the "secret place of the Most High", need nothing more during life's pilgrimage, than the shadow of His hand, to preserve us until traveling days are done.

"The Eternal God is thy Refuge."

#9. "The name of the God of Jacob defend thee" (Psa. xx. 1).
pp. 189, 190

The word "defence" is one that has been much in use in recent times, and assurances have been given from time to time as to the adequacy, the readiness, and the quality of the nation's defences. So too, in Scripture, we find that not only is God the Refuge of His people, but He is also their Defence.

In Psalm vii. 10, where we read: "My defence is of God", the Psalmist uses the word magen, "a shield", but in most passages in the Psalms the word is misgab, "a high place". It is to this that the Psalmist refers when he says: "The name of the God of Jacob defend thee" (Psa. xx. 1). The verb here, which supplies us with the noun misgab, is sagab, and this must be included in our study if we are to appreciate the nature of the "defence" that we may find in the Lord.

The primary meaning of sagab is "to lift up", then "to be exalted", "to be placed on high", "to be lofty". In Psalm cxlviii. 13 we read: "His name is excellent" (or more literally, "His name is most high") while in Isa. ii. 11 sagab is used of the Lord, Who shall "alone be exalted in that day". Other occurrences are in Psalms cxxxix. & lxix. and, more familiarly, in Psalm xci.:

> "It is high, I cannot attain to it" (Psa. cxxxix. 6).
> "O God, set me up on high" (Psa. lxix. 29).
> "I will set him on high because He hath known My Name" (Psa.xci. 14).

The word misgab, which actually appears in the A.V. of Jer. xlviii. 1, is used by David in II Sam. xxii., when he says of the Lord:

> "The Lord is my rock: in Him will I trust: He is my shield, and the horn of my salvation, my high tower and my refuge, my Saviour" (II Sam. xxii. 3).

It was this word, translated "refuge", that came before us in Psalm xlvi. 7 and 11.

Out of his experience "in the cave", David write the Psalm we considered in our last article. Out of another experience belonging to the same period he wrote Psalm lix., the superscription of which reads, referring to I Sam. xix. 11: "When Saul sent and they watched the house to kill him." The Psalm opens with the words:

"Deliver me from mine enemies, O my God, defend me from them that rise up against me" (Psa. lix. 1).

The Psalm is divided into two parts by the references to God as David's defence. If, instead of the somewhat ambiguous rendering: "Because of His strength will I wait on thee" (verse 9), we read "O my strength" as in verse 17; the two verses can then be read together:

"O my Strength, I will wait upon Thee, for God is my defence."
"O my Strength, unto Thee will I sing, for God is my defence, and the God of my mercy."

Note the advance in verse 17 over verse 9. In verse 9 David says, "I will wait", but at the close he says, "I will sing" (verse 17). Further, whilst in verse 10 he says: "The God of my mercy shall prevent me", in verse 17 he adds to the words, "for God is my defence", the words "and my mercy".

God was not only David's "Strength" but his "Mercy". He (David) was "set on high", i.e. lifted above the conspiracy of his foes.

Well may we sing:

"O Redeemer, what a Friend Thou art to me, O what a Refuge I have found in Thee."

Or, in perhaps better known words:

"All my trust on Thee is stayed,
All my help from Thee I bring.
Cover my defenceless head
With the shadow of Thy wing."

"The Eternal God is thy Refuge."

#18. "What I believe."
pp. 5 - 7

A popular London daily newspaper some time ago published a series of articles, entitled "What I Believe". The usual endeavour was made to get a "representative" set of opinions, and the writers included an agnostic, a Jesuit, a poet, a playwright, and a professor. Apart from two of the articles, or at most three, the views expressed would have been better headed: "What I do not believe." Anyone in trouble or despair, reading the series, would be justified in echoing Job's words: "Miserable comforters are ye all."

One article, however, was particularly striking by reason of the fact that it so completely missed the mark, and so completely justified the opening chapters of Genesis. The article concerned was written by a Professor of Industrial Relations, whose intense humanity and wise counsel have made him both loved and respected by a large number of wireless listeners, and by the many readers of his articles and letters of advice.

This is the way in which he opens his article:

> "Do I believe in God? I don't know. If I could only grasp the question—but I can't. Ask your Sealyham if he believes in Time-Space. He'll bark or growl because he'll know you're making those noises humans make. But it won't mean anything, because the question was beyond his ken."

At first sight one might be pardoned for saying that there is some truth in the Professor's simile. God is infinite, God is spirit, God is invisible. Who are we, that we should talk of knowing Him or believing in Him? There is, however, a fundamental fallacy here that we do well to recognize. It is obvious that the Sealyham would not have the remotest conception of Time-Space, and any appearance of intelligence in this connection would be misleading. Let us set the argument out in syllogistic form. The reader will probably perceive that we need more than one syllogism to make a perfect presentation of the argument, but for our present purpose, this will suffice.

> A Sealyham cannot understand Time-Space. God is even more difficult to understand. Therefore man cannot understand God.

Even the untrained mind will perceive the weak point here, but let us pass on to the sequel. The assumption is that man is no more capable of understanding the idea of God than a dog is capable of understanding the idea of Time-Space. But is this so? The Book of Genesis goes out of its way to draw attention to the creation of man, marking him off from all other creatures, and emphasizing one feature in particular that renders the Professor's argument valueless. If Genesis be true, man was made in the "image and likeness" of his Creator. While recognizing the immense gulf that separates the Creator from His creatures, we must also remember that God has instituted a relationship between man and Himself of such a character that God and man may use similar terms. They can meet on common ground, and can understand a common language. While it is true that the human terms in which God has been pleased to reveal His nature and attributes must always be understood as symbols, and not ultimate realities, yet the testimony of Genesis and the faculties of man alike assure us that the comparison instituted by the Professor is not a true one. The reader will find other articles in this series dealing more specifically with the meaning of Gen. i. 26, and also with the general question of the testimony of language. This is simply a short article in the form of a supplementary note, using the Professor's argument as a means of drawing attention to the true relationship between man and God.

Luke iii. 38 tells us that Adam was a son of God, and we should expect a son, however lowly, to be capable of a fellowship and understanding in relation to his father, that would be on a much higher plane than any relationship that could exist between the most intelligent dog and the thought processes of his master. Man, created in the image of his Maker, has been endowed with a faculty which at least appreciates "His eternal power and deity" and renders ignorance "without excuse" (Rom. i. 19, 20). The advent of sin and death has impaired these faculties and seriously impaired the "image", but both faculties and image remain the distinctive characteristics of man. Added to this, of course, we have the gospel message, that in the fullness of time God was manifested in the flesh, and seen and heard by men, to whom it was revealed that, having seen Him, they had seen the Father. Both the nature of man by creation, and the coming of Christ in grace, make the parallel between the Sealyham and man untrue and misleading.

"That which may be known of God" has been manifested to man in terms that he can understand, and that are based on the very nature and purpose of his creation. The Book of Genesis, so easily tossed aside by the modern mind, contains in germ the answer to the problems of all mankind. What a tragedy first of all to brush the lamp aside, and then to speak of groping in the dark as wisdom!

#19. An enquiry into the character of the "dominion" given to Adam (Gen. i. 26-28).

pp. 48 - 51

In our last article we considered the meaning of the name "Adam" and its connection with the "likeness" of God, after which he was created. The reader is asked to carry forward the results obtained to this article, as we continue with our present study.

How far, and in what direction, was Adam intended to shadow forth God Himself? How far was he, as a creature, able to represent Deity? What limits can be set? The reader will no doubt be acquainted with the two extreme answers to these questions. There are some who will not allow the image and likeness to be anything more than physical, while there are others who would deduce from this passage the inherent immortality of the soul. The truth lies mid-way between the two extremes.

> "And God said, LET US make man in OUR image, after OUR likeness; and LET THEM have dominion" (Gen. i. 26).

In our last article we saw that the name "Adam" was similar to the Hebrew word for "likeness". This "likeness" was expressed in the "dominion" which was originally conferred upon man. When sin entered into the world, however, resulting in a curse upon the earth, his dominion over the lower creatures was impaired. When Noah, whom we can regard as a sort of second Adam, steps out of the ark into a new world, the word "dominion" is no longer used and "the fear of you and the dread of you" takes its place (Gen. ix. 2). Man, however, is still looked upon as being "in the image of God" (Gen. ix. 6), and "in the likeness of God" (James iii. 9).

The dominion that was given to Adam was:

> "over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth" (Gen. i. 26).

This dominion was a "shadow" of the greater dominion that was to be exercised by Christ, the true Image of God. David, in Psalm viii., sees something of this, and the apostle Paul in the N.T. completes the story.

> "When I consider Thy heavens, the work of Thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which Thou hast ordained; What is man that Thou art mindful of him, and the son of man that Thou visitest him? For Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honour. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of Thy hands; Thou hast put all things under his feet. All sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field; the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas" (Psa. viii. 3-8).

If we turn to the Epistle to the Hebrews, we shall see that Adam foreshadowed Christ. The Creator of Gen. i. 26 is addressed in Psalm viii., and the Psalmist says that "the heavens are the work of Thy fingers". Unless we are willing to quibble over the difference between "fingers" and "hands", it is clear that Christ is the Creator in Whose image and likeness Adam was created, for in Heb. i. we read:

> "And Thou Lord in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth: and the heavens are the works of Thine hands" (Heb. i. 10).

From Heb. i. we proceed to Heb. ii., where we have Psalm viii. quoted, with the comment:

> "For in that He put all in subjection under Him, He left nothing that is not put under Him" (Heb. ii. 8).

This shows that we have passed from the type, whose dominion was over sheep and oxen, to the antitype, Whose dominion is over all. The Apostle continues:

> "But now we see not yet all things put under Him: but we see Jesus, Who was made a little lower than the angels, for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour; that He by the grace of God should taste death for every man" (Heb. ii. 8, 9).

This dominion, of which Adam's "likeness" was but a faint shadow, is further expanded in Eph. i., where we reach the zenith of the revelation of "the mystery of Christ". In this epistle we are concerned with that section of the "all things" that is associated with the exalted sphere where Christ sitteth "far above all heavens" (Eph. iv. 10). And so we read, in Chapter i.:

> "He raised Him from the dead, and set Him at His own right hand in the heavenly places, far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this age, but also in that which is to come; and hath put all things under His feet, and gave Him to be head over all things to the church, which is His body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 20-23).

With this rapid glance at the relationship between this "dominion" and "mystery", let us turn back now to I Cor. xv., to see one further application of the passage:

> "Then cometh the end, when He shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when He shall have put down all rule and all authority and power: for He must reign, till He hath put all enemies under His feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For He hath put all things under His feet. But when He saith, All things are put under Him, it is manifest that He is excepted, which did put all things under Him. And when all things shall be subdued unto Him, then shall the Son also Himself be subject unto Him that put all things under Him, that God may be all in all" (I Cor. xv. 24-28).

This goal of the ages is the fulfillment of the pledge shadowed forth in the creation of Adam.

We must now return to Gen. i. 26, in order to investigate what is actually implied by the word "dominion". There are various possible alternatives that are not used in this passage. The word used here is not baal, "to have dominion as lord and proprietor" (Isa. xxvi. 13), or mashal, "to reign as a governor, or a superior" (Judges xiv. 4), or shalat, "to rule" (Psa. cxix. 133), but radah, "to tread down, to subdue". The following are three passages in which this particular word occurs:

> "They that hate you shall reign over you" (Lev. xxvi. 17).
> "With force and cruelty have ye ruled" (Ezek. xxxiv. 4).
> "Rule thou in the midst of thine enemies" (Psa. cx. 2).

These references indicate something of the nature of this particular type of dominion, and particularly the passage from Psalm cx., which is Messianic and speaks of the Day of the Lord. The Psalm goes on to speak of the Lord "striking through kings", "filling places with dead bodies" and "wounding the heads over many countries"(Psa. cx. 5, 6). This conception of dominion is carried over into verse 28 of Gen. i., where we read:

> "Replenish the earth and subdue it."

The word "subdue" is a translation of the Hebrew cabash, and its significance may be gathered from the fact that its substantival form means a "footstool" (II Chron. ix. 18). In Neh. v. 5 it is rendered "to bring into bondage"; and it is the word used by the King when he exclaims of Haman, "Will he force the Queen?" (Est. vii. 8). The word is also used of the conquest of Canaan under Joshua (Josh. xviii. 1), a subjugation whose rigour there is no need to quote chapter and verse to prove.

The LXX translates the word "subdue" by kata kurieuo, meaning "to rule imperiously", "to lord it over", "to get the mastery". Its occurrences in the N.T. will give further light on its meaning:

> "Ye know that the princes of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them" (Matt. xx. 25; Mark x. 42).
> "The man in whom the evil spirit was, leaped on them, and overcame them, and prevailed against them" (Acts xix. 16).
> "Neither as being lords over God's heritage" (I Pet. v. 3).

The creation of Adam, his very name, and the dominion given to him, all foreshadowed the subduing of all enemies beneath the feet of the Lord Jesus Christ. An enemy is most certainly in view in Gen. i. 26-28, and in Chapter iii. he is revealed—"that old serpent, called the Devil and Satan" (Rev. xii. 9).

#20. The essential difference between a mechanical and a moral creature. Genesis i. and ii.

pp. 138 - 143

The reader will have already observed that in Gen. i., where creation is the theme, the name under which the Creator reveals Himself is that of Elohim ("God"), while in chapter ii., where we enter into the realm of human activity, the name changes to Jehovah Elohim ("the Lord God"). It is not our purpose at the moment to enlarge upon either of these Divine titles. We are simply recording the fact that the change coincides with the transition from creation in general, to that of the responsible creature. It has been said that all creatures lower than man are "held", but that man himself is "held accountable".

The Divine government of Gen. i. 3-25 is set forth as absolute:

> "He spake and it was done, He commanded and it stood fast" (Psa. xxxiii. 9).

The original Hebrew of Gen. i. 3 is impressive in its extreme simplicity:

> "And God said, Light be; and light was."

Even this rendering does not impress the eye as would a reading of the original, which is made more striking by the similarity of the two forms of the Hebrew verb "to be".

At the close of the record of the second day's work we read, "And it was so" (Gen. i. 7), and this phrase is repeated in verses 9, 11, 15, 24 and 30. Again, in verses 4, 10, 12, 18, 21 and 25, we have the repeated phrase: "And it was good." The appearance of light, the appearing of the dry land, the gathering of the waters, the growth of grass, herb and tree, the rule of the sun and moon, the creation of the monsters of the sea, the fowl of the heavens, the beasts, cattle, and creeping things, are all said to be "good". Light is certainly "good", but light is physical, not moral. It is impossible for the mind to conceive of the idea that light could have refused to come into being when God spoke. It would be equally impossible to think of promising a reward to the sun for ruling the day, or of punishing the moon for causing an eclipse. In the realm of creation we are in a sphere of mechanical movement, where everything is determined, where there can be no option, no alternative, no choice. When, however, we pass from this realm of creation to the realm of human activity, we leave the sphere of mechanical determinism, and enter the sphere of moral agency, accountability and contingency. When God formed man of the dust of the ground, man had no knowledge of his own creation, and therefore had no responsibility for the form in which he was fashioned, or for the mind and will with which he was endowed. The moment he stood upright, however, as a living soul, made in the image and after the likeness of his God, he entered into a relationship with his Creator, in which obedience or disobedience were equally possible, and in which disobedience involved a penalty. At this point we step out of the sphere of Mechanics into the sphere of Morals, where contingency is possible. It would have been impossible without altering the nature of man, for such words as "It was so", to have followed the command concerning the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. Looking at man as a creature, God could and did pronounce him to be "good" (Gen. i. 31), but, with reference to the prohibition concerning the tree of knowledge, and man's own moral nature, it was impossible for him to be pronounced "good" apart from trial and proof. Moral good cannot be ready-made; it must be acquired. The possibility of evil was incipient in the creation of a moral being.

There were three ways in which evil could have been prevented:

(1) God could have created a being who was incapable of sinning. Had He done so, the creature thus formed could never have risen above the level of a brute beast. His actions would have been governed by the promptings of instinct, and would have had no moral value.

(2) God could have created a being capable of sinning, and yet have kept him from all possible internal and external temptation. Had man been thus formed and hedged about, he would have remained innocent, but would never have been upright. He would have been innocent as an animal is innocent, but could never have been upright as a man is upright.

(3) God could have created man, and allowed temptation, and yet have prevented him yielding to it. If this had been done, the very act would have destroyed the moral nature that had been formed. Enforced goodness, coerced love, compulsory worship are contradictions. Goodness, love and worship are emptied of their essential meaning the moment the principle of compulsion enters. God can create innocent beings, but in the very nature of things, the creation of a virtuous character or a ready-made righteousness is impossible. A virtuous character cannot be bestowed by Divine fiat.

We must therefore expect, in the very nature of things, to find contingency in the second chapter of Genesis.

> "And the Lord God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat; but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die" (Gen. ii. 16, 17).

The twofold usage of the word "determine" is an interesting example of the difference between what is mechanical and what is moral.

(1) "I am determined to face the wind."
(2) "Dust is determined to go with the wind."

In the first case a resolution is made after due consideration, a definite choice arrived at after pondering alternatives. In the second case there is no choice, and there can never have been an alternative.

It is obviously foolish to speak of a "will", apart from the person that wills, and it is equally absurd to talk of "evil", as though it existed somewhere in the universe as a thing in itself. Moral evil cannot be "created", or come into existence, apart from moral beings who actually do what is wrong. When we discuss the existence of evil apart from the actions of those who act wrongly, we are inventing difficulties which have no real existence. The problem of evil is the problem of personality. If a moral person, who is held accountable for his actions, transgresses a prohibition and thereby comes under a penalty, it is utterly wrong to charge the One Who lays down the prohibition and inflicts the penalty, with the creation of the evil thus punished. If such a state could be conceived, anything would be possible, and the whole groundwork of truth would dissolve. Under such conditions nothing would or could matter. To speak of predetermined sin would be a contradiction, for sin is the transgression of a law, and a predetermined act is itself of the very essence of law. Obedience and disobedience in this case would be quite irrelevant.

In the story of the garden of Eden, we must not imagine some insidious trap, definitely placed there so that man should fall into it. We must realize, rather, that man, as a moral creature, had to be tested. In the law we read:

> "If ye will not be reformed by Me by these things, but will walk contrary unto Me: then I will also walk contrary unto you and will punish you yet seven times for your sins" (Lev. xxvi. 23, 24).

These words would mean less than nothing if it had already been predetermined that Israel would in fact "walk contrary". Indeed, if it had been decreed that Israel should act in this way, then their so-called "contrary" actions would actually be in agreement with the Divine intention and sin would become an impossibility. "To be forewarned is to be forearmed", and the very knowledge of what in the natural course of things will inevitably happen becomes by the interposition of moral agency a means of falsifying such apparent predetermination.

It is possible that an objection may have formed itself in the minds of some of our readers in connection with the statement made above that evil cannot be "created". In Isa. xlv. 7 we read:

> "I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace, and create evil: I, the Lord, do all these things" (Isa. xlv. 7).

The word translated "evil" here is the Hebrew ra. So far as its usage is concerned, there are about an equal number of passages where the word means "moral evil" or "sin", and where the word means "evil" in the sense of a "calamity" or "judgment". Merely to quote Isa. xlv. 7 is, therefore, inconclusive. The only way to settle whether the word "evil" is used here in a moral or in a penal sense is by considering the context. We have met quite a number of people who misquote the passage as though it read: "I make good, and create evil", instead of "I make peace, and create evil". Evil that is in contrast with peace is not necessarily moral evil or sin at all. It may be righteously inflicted because of transgression, as in Amos iii.:

> "Shall there be evil in a city, and the Lord hath not done it?" (Amos iii. 6).

The context deals with the principle of cause and effect. A bird cannot fall into a snare if there is no gin set; the trumpet cannot be blown in a city, without the people running together. And so, if there be "evil" in a city, then there must have been some just cause, for the Lord punished sin and reward righteousness.

We must remember, in Gen. ii., that it is not "good and evil" but the "knowledge of good and evil" that is prohibited. Such knowledge is in itself desirable in the right persons, for we find in Heb. v. 14 that the ability to discern both good and evil is a mark of the "perfect" or "full grown". Adam, however, was a babe so far as experience was concerned, and to acquire an adult's knowledge with a baby's experience meant failure. When the Tempter said, "Your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as God, knowing good and evil", his statement was true, even thou his intention was to deceive, for in Gen. iii. 22 we read:

> "And the Lord God said, Behold, the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil."

Man was made "for a little than the angels", though destined to be "above" them. To attempt to penetrate into the realm of spirit before the right time, is witchcraft and spiritism, and to attempt to grasp universal knowledge while still a babe is equally disastrous. Man will one day "know even as he is known", but he must be willing to wait God's time.

The same thing is true with regard to the kingdoms of the world. It is the revealed purpose of God that, when the seventh angel sounds, "the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ" (Rev. xi. 15). On the other hand, for the Lord to have yielded to the temptation of the Evil One, to grasp this sovereignty before the appointed time, would have been the same in principle as the act which brought about the downfall of Adam. Where man failed, in a garden of plenty, the Lord triumphed in a wilderness of want (Matt. iv. 8, 9).

A knowledge of good and evil really comprises the whole realm of knowledge. He who knows all good and all evil, knows all things. This was evidently understood in O.T. times, as the language of the woman of Tekoah indicates:

> "As an angel of God, so is my Lord the King to discern good and evil" (II Sam. xiv. 17).
> "My Lord is wise, according to the wisdom of an angel of God, to know all things that are in the earth" (II Sam. xiv. 20).

Comparing the two passages, we see that "good and bad" and "all things on the earth" are synonymous.

There is a tendency with most of us to read the words of Gen. ii. as though they were "The knowledge of good and evil", or even "The knowledge of evil". We must remember, however, that the tree represented both good and evil. "Good" out of place, and before its time, can be definitely harmful. Marriage, for example, is "honourable in all", but that which is most blessed within the limitation of marriage, is itself a sin if entered into apart from those Divinely appointed limits. Again we observe that "good" and "evil" are not things in themselves, but terms which refer to the actions of particular people.

We will conclude by giving, in the form of a table, a list of some of the characteristics that distinguish the sphere of mechanical determinism from that of moral accountability.

Creation (Mechanical).	Creation (Moral).
Title: God.	Title: Lord God.
Pronouncement: "It was so."	Pronouncement: "Thou shalt not."
Created things "good".	Moral creatures tested.
Created things "held".	Moral creatures "held responsible".
No option.	Freedom of choice.
Things or animals.	Persons.
Sin not possible.	Sin possible.
Faith and love impossible.	Faith and love possible.
No fellowship.	Fellowship.
"Let there be light."	"Let Us make man."

#21. "Things Visible and Invisible."
pp. 157 - 164

According to Gen. i. 1, creation is divided into two sections—"the heaven" and "the earth". In the record of the refashioning of the submerged earth for man, however, the heaven of Gen. i. 1 is no longer in view, but rather a specially appointed "firmament" (Hebrew: raqia, "thinness" or "expansion") which is "called heaven". In this are placed the sun and the moon, and it is in the open firmament or expanse of this heaven that the fowls of the air are created to fly. From Gen. i. to the end of the O.T. attention is directed in "creation" to man and the earth, until eventually we reach again the heights of Gen. i., in the creation of a new heaven and a new earth at the time of the end. When we come to the N.T., however, after the great Sacrifice has been offered, we realize that creation is subdivided in another way. The distinction between heaven and earth is maintained, but we further become aware of the fact that there is a creation which lies beyond our ken, not merely because of physical distance, but because this newly revealed creation belongs to another realm of being altogether. We learn from Col. i. 16 that the Lord created all things in heaven and in earth, "visible and invisible". It is this "invisible" creation that we are seeking to understand a little about in the present article.

The first thing we must face is the essential limitation expressed in the very word "invisible". What do we know about an invisible creation? The adjective itself is a negative one. We know nothing positively; all we can say is that it is not visible. Moreover, this is not by any means the only negative definition that we encounter. We learn from Scripture that God is *in*finite, *im*mortal, and *in*corruptible. Such terms as these make us realize the greatness of God, but they do not reveal any positive qualities. "Infinite" means "not finite" or "not having bounds"; "immortal" means "not subject to death", but these definitions still leave the nature of God unexplained and unrevealed. In theology and philosophy, too, we meet other negatives—the *ab*solute, the *un*conditioned, the *in*comprehensible—words that make us realize again the limitations of our present state. It is true that there are also positive revelations awaiting us—we know Him as Creator, Redeemer, Father, we "see" Him in the person of His Son, and we behold the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ—but we are also told in the same Gospel that records the words "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father" that "No man hath seen God at any time". Quite apart from the question of his sin, man needs a Mediator. Christ is the Image of the invisible God, quite apart from His work as Redeemer. Man himself belongs to the visible creation, but He is conscious that he is surrounded by an invisible one.

What exactly do we mean by a "visible creation"? To answer this question we must enquire a little more deeply into the problem of sight.

Keeping to the physical realm, and avoiding the figurative use of the verb "to see" in the sense of mental perception, it becomes clear that, after all, the marvel of vision is essentially superficial. Sight depends upon the combination of several factors:

(1) First of all, there must be light. The nature of light we are not concerned with at the moment. We simply note that it is essential to sight.

(2) Secondly, there must be an organ of vision, the eye. The light rays enter the lens of the eye and are registered on the nerve-ends that form the retina. The impulses there received are transmitted by the optic nerve to the brain, and thus, by some means still unknown to man, these impulses are interpreted into colour, form and tone. There is no effort in sight, and no exercise of the will. If the eye is open and there is no defect, it is not possible to avoid receiving the impression.

(3) What we "see" is the combined effect of a multitude of rays of light that are reflected from the surface of the object concerned. If an object be completely transparent, we see nothing of it. If it be translucent, we see a variety of shadows. Moreover, not only is it true that we see only the external service of the visible universe, but it is also clear that what we do see is inevitably incomplete. For example, no one has ever seen a cube; all one can see at any given time is three of its six sides. No one has ever seen a table; if the observer sees the top, he cannot at the same time see the underside. If he sees the long side, he cannot see both ends at the same time. He can never see more than one half of each of the four legs at a time. Moreover, if he looks at the polished surface, he cannot see the annular rings, while the nature of the timber itself is quite beyond his ken. We are reminded of the skit: "What is mind? no matter. What is matter? never mind", for although it be a piece of nonsense, it is wise nonsense, inasmuch as it exposes the inability we all feel to get beneath the surface to the hidden substance. Further, no two people can "see" the same object at the same time, for the rays of light that enter one's own eye, cannot be the same as the rays that enter another eye. Only by analogy and the evidence that creation is rational, do we take it for granted that we all see alike.

One of the limitations that is inseparable from a "visible" creation is a faulty or restricted judgment. Truth cannot be seen or stated absolutely; it can only be relative, and in the nature of a compromise. Perhaps an illustration will make this point clearer. Every reader knows that, if he were to walk every step of the way along the track from King's Cross to Edinburgh, and if he were to measure the width of the railway lines at every step, the distance between them would always be the same. On the other hand, he also knows that, if he gives a truthful account of what he actually sees while walking along the line, he will say that he actually sees the lines drawing nearer and nearer together until they appear to meet on the horizon. Moreover, if he draws what he knows to be true, everyone will condemn his drawing as being untrue to appearance, while if a railway were constructed as it appears, no engine could ever run on it. We are continually adjusting what we see and what we know, and such adjustments constitute much of the experience of life. We could, of course, easily multiply examples of this. We all know that the rim of a cup is a circle, and yet a cup seen in the ordinary way shows that circular rim in the form an ellipse. Which is right? It all depends upon what we mean by "right"—right in appearance, or right in actuality. By the very constitution of creation of which man forms a part, absolute truth is beyond his powers of expression and beyond his power of attainment.

The difference in character between the two creations—the visible and the invisible—is clearly expressed in the well-known words of I Sam. xvi.:

> "Man looketh upon the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart" (I Sam. xvi. 7).

It is evident here that what constitutes the "looking" that is occupied with outward appearance, and what constitutes the "looking" that is concerned with the thoughts and intents of the heart, belong to two different creations, the one the visible and the phenomenal, the other the invisible and the real.

When we turn from this visible world, and try to think of a world where "to see" does not mean the effect of an image formed by rays of light reflected from an illuminated surface, but rather to pierce to the very innermost recesses of things, "dividing asunder soul and spirit", we begin to realize that, wonderful as this world is, wonderful as is the sense of sight, it is as nothing, or at best a shadow, when compared with the glories of the creation that is invisible to man. We say "invisible to man" advisedly, for we must not think, because we cannot see without light and the eye, that the same limitation applies to the spirit world.

The present creation is largely one of external manifestation. We can, if we choose, let it rest at that, and sink to the level of the animal world. If, however, we are exercised, we may learn from it something of the invisible world, and particularly something about the One Who created it.

> "For the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead" (Rom. i. 20).

"The invisible things of Him."—The words used here (ta aorata) are in the plural and include His "invisible attributes", two of which are immediately named—"even His eternal power and divinity". Before we examine these attributes, we must note first the medium through which they are "manifested" and by which they are "perceived".

The phrase "From the creation of the world" gives a date line (the word "from" here is apo, "since"; not ek, "by" or "by means of") while "the things that are made" provide a medium of manifestation. In verse 19, the limited nature of this manifestation is indicated by the words "that which may be known of God". This is objective knowledge, and becomes subjective by being "manifest in them", and this, not by unaided reason or observation, but because "God hath showed it unto them". Creation, therefore, is intended to reveal "that which is knowable of God". There is no ground for teaching that the observation of creation alone would ever lead a sinner to the Saviour, or that through the study of Botany, Geology, or Astronomy, the earnest student could ever arrive at the truth of John iii. 16. It is not "all which may be known of God" that is revealable by creation or manifested in man, but rather all that comes within the range concerned.

The "invisible things" mentioned here are (i.) His eternal power, and (ii.) His divinity. The word translated "eternal" is aidios, and occurs only once more in the N.T.—namely in Jude 6, where it is found in the phrase "everlasting chains". While from a purely etymological point of view, aidios might be regarded as linked up with the verb idein "to see", and so be translated "His unseen power and divinity", the usage—which has destroyed many an etymological theory—is against this derivation. The word is found in Homer, Thucydides, Plato and other classical writers, and means "everlasting". The Lexicons derive the word from aei, "always", as in Acts vii. 51 and II Cor. vi. 10. Creation, therefore, makes manifest the "lasting, abiding power" of the Creator and "His divinity".

The reader will observe that we do not follow the A.V. here in its use of the word "Godhead". If different words are used by the inspired Scriptures, it will obviously not be "rightly dividing the Word of truth" if we translate the various words concerned by the one term "Godhead". We may not be able to fully to comprehend all that these fine distinctions imply, but we can at least save ourselves from increased confusion by noting the differences. The words concerned are as follows:

(1) To Theion.—"The Godhead is (not) like unto gold" (Acts xvii. 29).
(2) Theiotes.—"His eternal power and Godhead" (Rom. i. 20).
(3) Theotes.—"In Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily" (Col. ii. 9).

To preserve the distinction here, to theion and theiotes should be rendered "divinity" and "divine", while theotes should be rendered "deity". Nature can reveal the one, but Christ alone can make manifest the other.

It will be seen, therefore, from this brief review, that Creation makes some of the invisible attributes of God perceptible to man. The way in which these "invisible things" are "clearly seen" is explained in the phrase which immediately follows—"Being understood (noeo) by the things that are made". This "understanding" may be defined as "the mental correlative of perception by the senses"—in other words, what "sight" is in the world of sense, "understanding" is in the world of thought. This enables us to "perceive", without being able to "grasp", the idea that, in the invisible world, complete understanding takes the place of mere superficial vision. The proverb "Beauty is only skin deep" might well be applied to the whole realm of human knowledge. It is alas, only too possible to "see" without "understanding" (Matt. xiii. 14).

In II Cor. iv. the Apostle makes the following statement on the relative worth of the visible and invisible worlds:

> "While we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal" (II Cor. iv. 18).

The word "temporal" originally meant "lasting only for a time, passing, temporary". It has now, however, come to mean "pertaining to the sphere of human life; terrestrial as opposed to heavenly; secular as opposed to sacred". The Greek word in II Cor. iv. is proskairos, "for a season" (as in Matt. xiii. 21 and Heb. xi. 25), and has the sense of the original meaning of "temporal", i.e., "transient" or "temporary". This is the character of the "visible creation". It is here for a time, and is destined to pass away. The "unseen" things on the other hand, are "eternal" or "age-abiding" (aionios) and endure until the purpose of the ages is reached. The chapter division between II Cor. iv. and v. should not prevent the reader from realizing that the Apostle is illustrating his meaning by referring to this present body as a tent soon to be taken down, in contrast with the resurrection body which is aionion in the heavens. When that day dawns, we who now "see by means of a mirror, enigmatically", will then see face to face, and our partial knowledge will be exchanged for a knowledge that belongs to the invisible world, for the resurrection body will be both "spiritual" and "heavenly" (I Cor. xv. 40, 44).

In connection with the invisible world, the Apostle gives a word of warning in Col. ii., which, when we fully understand it, will probably illuminate the problem of the temptation in the garden of Eden:

> "Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility and worshipping of angels, intruding into those things which he hath not seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind, and not holding the Head . . . increasing with the increase of God" (Col. ii. 18, 19).

Into the obvious difficulties of this passage we do not at the moment propose to enter* (* - A fuller examination of this passage will be found in the series "Studies in Colossians", Volume XXIV, page 203). We simply draw attention to the one feature that has a definite connection with our present theme. "Intruding" means to put one's foot into another man's territory. To attempt to attain unto "things not seen" is, like the sin of the garden of Eden, turning that which will be "good" in its own appointed time into "evil", because entered before the change takes place, and in the wrong spirit. However "good" anything may be, if it be attained by "intrusion" and as a result of the "vain puffing up of the fleshly mind", it cannot be anything but "evil". The "increase of God" provides for the change from childhood to full grown adulthood, and the perfect state is yet to be. We must not leave this subject without referring to the relation between the invisible creation and "faith", "hope", and "love".

The relation between faith and the invisible creation is referred to in Heb. xi.:

> "Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen" (Heb. xi. 1).
> "He endured as seeing Him Who is invisible" (Heb. xi. 27).

The relation between the invisible creation and hope and love are referred to in Rom. viii. and I Pet. i.:

> "Hope that is seen is not hope; for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for?" (Rom. viii. 24).
> "Whom having not seen, ye love" (I Pet. i. 8).

The nature of God Himself lies beyond human ken:

> "The King eternal, immortal, invisible" (I Tim. i. 17).
> "Whom no man hath seen, nor can see" (I Tim. vi. 16).

The invisible God, however, has been made manifest to man in the person of Christ, as "the Image of the invisible God" (Col. i. 15).

> "No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, Which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him" (John i. 18).

In the context of both of these passages we shall discover that creation is prominent. The visible creation manifests "what is knowable" of the unseen attributes of God, while Christ, as the Image, makes manifest the higher spiritual qualities of redeeming love. We may not be able to explain why God considered it wise to make Himself manifest among lower orders of being, but we can rejoice in the realization that He has done so. Moreover, it is not only to man that God has revealed Himself. We read of "angels" and "principalities" learning by the Church the manifold wisdom of God, while in I Tim. iii. 16 we read that God was "manifest in the flesh", "justified in the Spirit", and "seen of angels".

The whole of the visible creation is one vast collection of types and symbols of eternal verities. Creation contains the wolf as well as the lamb, the serpent as well as the dove, just as in the invisible world we have their counterparts, good and evil. The "heavenly things" are the "true", while the earthly things, "made with hands", are but shadows and types (Heb. ix.). The heavenly realities belong to the invisible and eternal creation, whereas the earthly visible things are destined to pass away when the great probation is over.

#22. The "dust of the ground" and the "living soul". (Gen. ii. 7 and i. 29).

pp. 191 - 195

Having dealt briefly with the question of moral accountability and its bearing upon "sin" and other related themes, we come next to a brief consideration of the constitution of man, with particular reference to the body. At his original creation man was given a body, made of the "dust of the ground", and even in the resurrection state a body will still be a necessity. We are rather apt to speak slightingly of the body because of its association with sin, but we should always remember that in itself it is a wonderful part of God's creation.

We are fully aware that the prime purpose of The Berean Expositor is the exposition of the Word, and that many related subjects of interest in themselves must therefore necessarily be excluded. In this series, however, we are purposely allowing ourselves a little latitude, so that subjects relating to the Scriptures that would ordinarily have to be passed by, may be given some consideration. We propose, therefore, in this article, to seek to learn a little of what is implied by the words of Gen. ii. 7: "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground."

The word translated "dust" here may also be rendered "ashes" (as of an animal that has been burnt: Num. xix. 17), "powder" (into which the vessels and the altars of Baal were stamped: II Kings xxiii. 4, 6, 12), "rubbish" (that had accumulated on the broken walls of Jerusalem: Neh. iv. 2), and "earth" (out of which iron can be taken: Job xxviii. 2). "The highest part of the dust of the world" in Prov. viii. 26 refers to the soil, without which neither vegetable nor animal life would be possible.

We often speak of the "ground", but how many of us associate the word with the verb "to grind"? The "ground" has literally been ground by the action of flood, fire, and frost, and so made into a comparatively fine powder. From this "dust of the ground" the body of man was made, and to this at death his body returns. Let us now examine the composition of this wonderful frame, and see how far the "dust of the earth" enters into it.

The composition of the body of a man weighing a little over 150 lbs. would be as follows:

> Oxygen 90 lbs., Carbon 36 lbs., Hydrogen 14 lbs., Nitrogen 3 lbs. 8 ozs., Calcium 3 lbs. 12 ozs., Phosphorus 1 lb. 14 ozs., Chlorine 4 ozs., Sulphur 3½ ozs., Potassium 3 ozs., Sodium 2½ ozs., Flourine 2 ozs., Magnesium 1½ ozs., Silicon ¼ oz., Iron 1/6 oz.

These are the main constituents of the human body, but there are other elements also present in small quantities. In addition to the 150 lbs. detailed above, we have a "trace" of the following:

> Lead, Cerium, Argon, Manganese, Zinc, Vanadium, Beryllium, Aluminum, Lithium, Chromium, Helium, Iodine, Cobalt, Boron, Neon, Arsenic, Bromine, Rubidium, Scandium, Nickel, Lanthanum, Strontium, Titanium, Copper, Neodymium, Molybdenum, Silver and Tin.

It is interesting to note that such gases as Argon, Neon, and Helium, which we normally associate with electric lamps, electric signs and airships, form part of the human body, while such unfamiliar elements as Beryllium (which enters into the composition of the emerald) and Molybdenum (which is employed as an alloy for tool steel), as well as the more familiar Aluminum, Zinc and Tin, all have their place. What a wonderful Alchemist "Evolution" must have been to have got all these elements together, of such bewildering variety, and in such "disproportionate proportions" (90 lbs. of Oxygen to 1/6 oz. of Iron). After all "creation" is simpler and more reasonable.

Before we say anything about the part that these various elements play in the human mechanism, let us note one other interesting feature. If Gen. i. 2 is true, then it is also true that the surface of the earth has been impregnated with sea water. Now the composition of sea salt is as follows:

Sodium chloride ("Common Salt") . . .	27.00
Magnesium chloride . . .	3.80
Magnesium sulphate . . .	1.65
Gypsum (Calcium sulphate) . . .	1.25
Potassium sulphate . . .	0.86
Calcium carbonate . . .	0.12
Magnesium bromide . . .	0.07 per 1000 parts.

In addition there are traces of many other elements in sea water, the total number being approximately 40 out of the 90 elements that are known to exist.

We come back now to the elements of the body and their functions. "Lime" or Calcium, as we all know, is used in the composition of bone, and "iron" is essential for healthy blood. The following is a list of some of the other metals, showing their relation to the various parts of the body:

The pancreas.—Nickel, Cobalt and Lead.
The subrenal capsules (connected with the kidneys).—Tin.
The liver and kidneys.—Zinc.
The thyroid, heart, spleen and kidneys.—Silver.
The lungs, kidneys, heart and pancreas.—Aluminum.
The lungs, liver and heart.—Copper.
All organs, especially the thyroid and spleen.—Chromium.
All organs, especially the brain, spleen and thyroid.—Tin.
All organs except the heart.—Zinc.

Note.—It is interesting also to learn that silver is essentially feminine, while aluminum is related to that which is essentially masculine.

The reader may well wonder what all these metals have to do in the economy of the human body. The answer is that their action is mainly "catalytic"—a "catalyst" being a substance in the presence of which a chemical action proceeds, which would otherwise go very slowly or cease altogether. For example, without the presence of copper in the lungs, the interaction between iron and oxygen falls below the rate that is essential to life, whereas if the lungs have their proper supply of copper, the rate of reaction is kept up to a healthy standard. The intelligence of man has made use of this valuable property of catalytic action for a variety of industrial processes—and yet there are many who would deny any evidence of Divine intelligence in creation.

Not only is the human body composed of these wonderful elements and salts, but the food provided for man (as indicated in Gen. i. 29) is rich in these elements and salts in their most assimilable form.

"And God said, Behold, I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed, to you it shall be for meat" (Gen. i. 29).

The following table gives some of the elements present in seeds, roots, and fruits:

STEMS, LEAVES AND FRUITS.—Potassium, sodium, iron, sulphur.
SEEDS AND ROOTS.—Potassium, phosphorus, magnesium
SEEDS THEMSELVES.
The outer part.—Calcium, sodium, magnesium, sulphur, fluorine and silicon.
The inner part.—Potassium and phosphorus.

It is interesting to note that there is a similarity between the constitution of the human body and that of seeds. The muscular tissues, like the inner part of the seed, employ potassium and phosphorus, while the blood and skin correspond in composition with the outer part of the seed.

Perhaps the reader would appreciate a few further words on the essential work that some of these elements perform.

POTASSIUM, which figures so largely in the composition of seeds, is the mineral basis of all muscular tissues, and is essential in the formation of proteins. It can be truthfully said: "No life without potassium."

SODIUM.—This is one of the principal constituents of blood and lymph. Without sodium, lime and magnesium, salts are liable to form injurious deposits in the body.

CALCIUM AND MAGNESIUM.—Magnesium assists in the assimilation of phosphorus, while magnesium, calcium and iron form the albumen of the blood. One percent of magnesium enables the lime taken into the body to harden in the formation of the bones.

MANGANESE.—It has been discovered that animals deprived of manganese lack the maternal instincts.

ZINC is associated with the action of vitamins.

NICKEL is associated with the insulin of the pancreas.

If it be true that there is "no life without Potassium", it is equally true that there is "no thought without Phosphorus". The elements Fluorine and Iodine are also important: Fluorine plays an important part in the composition of the iris of the eye, while Iodine in the thyroid gland is essential to growth and development.

The following is a summary of the various functions governed by these constituents of soil, seed and herb:

CALCIUM is a counter to acid, and is the executive element.
SULPHUR purifies, and is the maid of all work.
POTASSIUM stimulates the liver, and is the balancer.
PHOSPHORUS aids the growth of nerve and brain, and is the thought-medium.
IRON is the vehicle of oxygen, and is the master chemical.
IODINE eliminates toxins, and is the gland regulator.
MANGANESE improves resistance, and is the chemical of poise.
SILICA gives gloss to the hair, and sparkle to the eyes, and is the optimist.
FLUORINE protects against infection, and is the youth preserver.
CHLORINE keeps the body supple, and is the laundryman.
SODIUM prevents acidosis, and is the alkaliniser.
MAGNESIUM is alkaline and sleep-promoting, and is the refresher.

When flesh was added as part of man's food after the Flood, no alteration was made in the essential composition of human diet, for all animals that normally provide human food feed upon the green herb. Even in the case of flesh-eating animals, they themselves prey upon animals that eat herbs, so that we may truly say, in the most literal sense of the words, "All flesh is grass".

Let us read again with intelligent faith, with increasing wonder, with glorious certainty, the primitive record of man's creation and sustenance, and realize that only a "science falsely so-called" could withhold the fullest recognition of its inspiration, authority and comprehensiveness.

We trust that the reader has been interested in these brief notes on an intricate subject, and that they have served to throw further light on the inspired record of Gen. i. and ii.

Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth. (Second Series).

#8. The nations of Israel never "lost".

Spiritual testimony to the fact that "the Jews" are a people composed of the twelve tribes of Israel (Kings and Chronicles).

pp. 13 - 20

In the present series we have so far gone through the history of the Kingdom of Israel in very broad outline, and have explained our reasons for adopting this method. Our next subject must be a study of the Prophets, but before we turn to this great theme, we feel that we should devote one more article to the record of the Kings, and consider briefly the claims of those who believe that the ten tribes were "lost", and that they are now to be "found" again under another name. We are not allowing ourselves to be drawn into a controversy, and we do not intend filling our pages with criticism. It is a legitimate part of our business, however, to search the Scriptures and to register our findings, and if these findings contradict the theories held by others we have no option but to reject such theories as unscriptural.

We preface our study by asking the question, Does Scripture say that the house of Israel is "lost"? We can at once answer this question with a decided negative. The next question to be asked is, Do the Scriptures tell us where the house of Israel is to be found?—and to this the answer is that they do. In the following pages we give chapter and verse for both these answers.

The division of the nation into "Israel" and "Judah" was consequent upon the idolatrous affinities contracted by Solomon. After revealing the names, nationality and number of his wives, and the fact that Solomon "went after Ashtoreth, the goddess of the Zidonians", the record continues:

> "And the Lord was angry with Solomon, because his heart was turned from the Lord God of Israel . . . . . wherefore the Lord said unto Solomon . . . . . I will surely rend the kingdom from thee and give it to thy servant . . . . . I will rend it out of the hand of thy son . . . . . I will give one tribe to thy son for David My servant's sake, and for Jerusalem's sake which I have chosen" (I Kings xi. 9-13).

The actual rending of the kingdom is related in I Kings xii. When Rehoboam, Solomon's son, ascended the throne of all Israel, Jeroboam, who had fled to Egypt from the presence of Solomon, returned and headed a gathering to protest against the heavy yoke of taxation that had been imposed by Solomon. Instead of granting some measure of relief, Rehoboam listened to the younger men and not only refused to grant relief but threatened to intensify the burden.

> "So when all Israel saw that the King hearkened not unto them, the people answered the King, saying, What portion have we in David? neither have we inheritance in the son of Jesse: to your tents, O Israel: now see to thine own house, David. So Israel departed unto their tents" (I Kings xii. 16).

We must next consider the testimony of Scripture with regard to the fate of this divided kingdom, and particularly what is said of the ten-tribed Kingdom of Israel. Before passing on to this, however, we would draw attention to the statement made in the next verse, namely, I Kings xii. 17:

> "But as for the children of ISRAEL, which dwelt in the cities of JUDAH, Rehoboam reigned over THEM."

It is therefore a Scriptural fact that there was a remnant of Israel associated with the House of David. With the flight of years, this remnant, left behind with Rehoboam, would multiply, and so ensure the presence of representatives of all twelve tribes, even though but "one tribe", intact and undivided, had sided with Rehoboam.

Again, further on in the same chapter, we read:

> "Speak unto Rehoboam the son of Solomon, King of Judah, and unto all the house of JUDAH and BENJAMIN, and to the REMNANT of the people" (I Kings xii. 23).

Even after this, when Jeroboam had been made King over the ten tribes, he felt uneasy about the attraction that the Temple services at Jerusalem would still exert over all the tribes of Israel.

> "And Jeroboam said in his heart, Now shall the kingdom return to the house of David: if this people go up to sacrifice in the house of the Lord at Jerusalem, then shall the heart of this people turn again unto their lord, even unto Rehoboam King of Judah, and they shall kill me, and go again to Rehoboam King of Judah" (I Kings xii. 26, 27).

To counteract this great attraction, Jeroboam deliberately introduced idolatry into his kingdom:

> "The King . . . . . made two calves of gold, and said unto them, It is too much for you to go up to Jerusalem: behold thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt" (I Kings xii. 28).

This sinful action stemmed the tide, and saved the kingdom as a whole from drifting back to Judah, but we must not assume that it prevented hundreds of those who were faithful to God from leaving Samaria and returning to Judah to join the little remnant of Israel that remained. The Scriptures definitely confirm that this was so.

In the First Book of Chronicles we have the genealogies of those who returned from the Babylonian captivity, and we find therein this entry:

> "And in Jerusalem dwelt of the children of Judah, and of the children of Benjamin, and of the children of EPHRAIM, and MANASSEH" (I Chron. ix. 3).

This passage at once raises an interesting point in connection with the so-called "lost tribes". If there were representatives of Ephraim and Manasseh among the returning captives of Judah, these two tribes obviously could not have been lost. If only one man and his wife in each tribe had returned, they would have been sufficient to continue the line. It is most important in view of the ideas contained in the "British-Israel" theory, that we should remember that the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh at least need not be looked for outside the limits of the people we now call "Jews". These tribes were evidently never "lost".

Moreover, we must also take into account the evidence of II Chron. xv.:

> "And he gathered all Judah and Benjamin, and the sojourners with them out of Ephraim and Manasseh, and out of Simeon: for they fell to him out of Israel in abundance, when they saw that the Lord his God was with him" (II Chron. xv. 9).

Here we not only get four tribes mentioned by name, but we are also assured that "out of Israel" there fell to Asa men "in abundance". Is it possible, then, that these tribes can be lost?

In the next chapter, we read that Baasah, king of Israel, came up against Judah and built Ramah, "to the intent that he might let none go out or come in to Asa, king of Judah" (II Chron. xvi. 1). This action by the king of Israel shows how seriously he regarded the continuous loss of his people to the kingdom of Judah. We also find, in chapter xix., the king of Judah going through the people "from Beersheba to Ephraim", and "bringing them back to the Lord God of their fathers" (II Chron. xix. 4).

Again, we read in chapter xxiii., in connection with Jehoiada, the high priest:

> "And they went about in Judah, and gathered the Levites out of all the cities of Judah, and the chief of the fathers of Israel, and they came to Jerusalem" (II Chron. xxiii. 2).

And again, in Chapter xxx.:

> "And Hezekiah sent to all Israel and Judah, and wrote letters also to Ephraim and Manasseh, that they should come to the house of the Lord at Jerusalem, to keep the Passover unto the Lord God of Israel" (II Chron. xxx. 1).
> "So they established a decree to make proclamation throughout ALL ISRAEL from Beersheba even to Dan" (II Chron. xxx. 5).
>
> "Divers of Asher and Manasseh out of Zebulun humbled themselves and came to Jerusalem" (II Chron. xxx. 11).
> "A multitude of people, even many of Ephraim, and Manasseh, Isaachar and Zebulun, had not cleansed themselves" (II Chron. xxx. 18).

We do not suggest that this great number of the house of Israel severed all connection there and then with the ten-tribed kingdom, for we are told that these Israelites returned to their possessions and cities (II Chron. xxxi. 1). Their hearts were certainly with their inheritance and tribal obligations that needed re-adjusting before they could follow their hearts and take their place with the people of Judah.

We have now discovered that representatives of nine tribes were gathered under the aegis of the King of Judah—Judah, Benjamin, Ephraim, Manasseh, Simeon, Asher, Zebulun, Isaachar, and Levi. The more we read, the more difficult it becomes to believe that the ten tribes were ever lost.

Following the chronology given in the Companion Bible, we find that the ten-tribed kingdom was established under Jeroboam in B.C.800 and carried away into captivity by Shalmanezer in B.C.611. This would give a period of 269 years from its inception to its disruption. If, alternatively, we adopt Ussher's chronology the period will be reduced to 254 years. We have already seen that, before this captivity, the tribes of Israel "in abundance" went back and joined with Judah, and it therefore follows that, when the ten-tribed kingdom was taken into captivity, representatives of all Israel must have remained in the land as part of Judah.

In the days of Josiah (B.C.531—that is 80 years after the captivity of Israel by the Assyrians) we read:

> "And when they came to Hilkiah the high priest, they delivered the money that was brought into the house of God, which the Levites that kept the doors had gathered of the hand of Manasseh and Ephraim and of ALL THE REMNANT of Israel, and all Judah and Benjamin" (II Chron. xxxiv. 9).

Here we reach absolute, positive proof, that the ten tribes were never lost. Even though those deported by the Assyrian kings never returned, this does not affect the argument, for the "remnant of Israel" was quite sufficient to perpetuate the seed, and preserve the continuity of the people. The kingdom of Judah went into captivity under Nebuchadnezzar in B.C.496, which would be 115 years after the end of "Israel" under Shalmanezer. This captivity, however, was limited to 70 years, and at the end of this period the people returned to Jerusalem and the land. Towards the close of this captivity, a recorded prayer of Daniel mentions "Judah" and "all Israel", including those that were "near" and those "afar off".

This captive people are called not only "Jews" but "Israel". Ezra, in his second chapter, gives a list of those who came back to Jerusalem at the end of the seventy years' captivity, and he heads the list with the words: "The number of the men of the people of Israel" (Ezra ii. 2). We are given the names of a few who "could not shew their father's house, and their seed, whether they were of Israel" (Ezra ii. 59-63), and we therefore infer that all the others in the list were able to establish their claim to be members of one or other of the tribes of Israel. At the end of the list we read of that "all Israel" dwelt in their cities; and we read of "Israel" in Ezra vii. 10, 13; ix. 1; and x. 1, 5. The kingdom of Judah was taken captive by the same line of kings as had taken captive the ten-tribed kingdom, and any one of the ten tribes was as free to go back as were the members of the tribe of Judah. This we find they did (see Ezra vii. 7).

When the returned captives assembled before the rebuilt temple on the third day of the month Adar, in the sixth year of the reign of Darius, "twelve he-goats" were offered "for all Israel", "according to the number of the tribes of Israel" (Ezra vi. 15-17). From this time onwards the title "Jew" became a generic one, and was used without discrimination of any member of the nation of Israel. It is a fallacy to imagine that it is unscriptural to use the word "Jew" of an Israelite after the return from the captivity. Paul himself says, "I am a man which am a Jew" (Acts xxii. 3), and yet he also calls himself an "Israelite" (Rom. x. 1). Peter also calls himself a "Jew" (Acts x. 28), in spite of the fact that he was a Galilean (Acts ii. 7). The "Jews" who were assembled on the day of Pentecost were addressed by Peter as "Ye men of Israel", and "All the house of Israel" (Acts ii. 22, 36), while in Acts iv. we read that "all the people of Israel" were guilty of the death of Christ, not merely Judah (Acts iv. 10, 27). To take further examples from the Acts, can we believe that Gamaliel made a mistake in speaking to the "Jews" as "Ye men of Israel" (Acts v. 35), or that Peter was confusing things that differ when he told Cornelius that "the word" was sent "unto the children of Israel", "in the land of the Jews" (Acts x. 36, 39)? When Paul stood up in the synagogue in Acts xiii., he spoke to the assembly as "men of Israel and ye that fear God", while, according to the record further on in the chapter, those that heard him speak were "Jews" (Acts xiii. 16, 42). The tribes of Israel were certainly not lost when Paul stood before Agrippa and said:

> "Unto which promise our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come"(Acts xxvi. 7).

The word "instantly" could only be used here of actual service; it could not have been used if any of the twelve tribes had been lost.

James also addresses his epistle: "To the twelve tribes which are scattered abroad" (James i. 1). Could this letter have been so inscribed if the bulk of the ten tribes had by this time lost their identity?

The suggestion that God would preserve the ten-tribed kingdom after their captivity and bless them centuries later in the guise of Gentiles is quite unscriptural. According to Scripture, the Lord said that He would "destroy the sinful kingdom from off the face of the earth", but would not utterly destroy the "house of Jacob". The remaining members of the twelve tribes, that had not been deported by the Assyrians, were to be "sifted among all nations as corn is sifted in a sieve" (Amos ix. 8, 9), until the time came for their ultimate restoration—for we read that "all Israel shall be saved". The northern kingdom, however, was to be destroyed, and not preserved. There was a sufficient number of every tribe left in the kingdom of Judah to ensure the continuity of the whole house of Israel, and, though scattered for a time among the nations, the twelve tribes are to be preserved until the end. Such is the testimony of Scripture. We have not covered a tithe of the whole ground, but what we have seen of what has been revealed in the Word concerning the fate of the house of Israel allows no room for doubt.

Into the supposed etymological and geographical "identification" of these so-called lost tribes we do not propose to enter. The moment a person who has been falsely reported as "lost" is discovered, all "identification" at once becomes valueless. To those who believe in the inspiration of the Holy Writ, nothing more need be said. We have demonstrated by citations from the Scriptures themselves that the tribes of Israel were never "lost", but that many of Israel returned "in abundance" to Judah after the separation.

In conclusion we should like to add one more quotation—this time from Isaiah:

> "The Lord of Hosts shall be for a sanctuary; but for a stone of stumbling and for a rock of offence to both the houses of Israel" (Isa. viii. 13, 14).

This passage looks forward to the cross and discountenances the idea that only "the Jews" were responsible for the crucifixion of Christ. In the Acts Peter speaks of the Lord as "the Stone which was set at nought of you builders" (Acts iv. 8-11), and in his epistles quotes Isa. viii. 13, 14 (I Pet. ii. 8). It is obvious from this passage that Christ became a "stone of stumbling" and a "rock of offence" to both houses of Israel, and not merely to the house of Judah.

We are not discussing here the various matters that arise out of this subject, as we are confining our studies to one point only. We know from Scripture that all the blessings of Israel are related to the land promises to Abraham; that Israel will be gathered from the lands into which they have been scattered; that Israel will be Lo-ammi for many days, but will return to the Lord and to David their King in the latter days; the Israel shall dwell alone and not be numbered among the peoples. These and many other items of revealed truth we pass over as not essential to our main quest. Having "searched the Scriptures" we intend by grace to abide by our findings. At some future time, under another heading, we hope to show that the tribe of Dan will be antichristian in the last days—a serious fact that should deter any believer from becoming associated with a movement that in any measure prepares the way for such a goal.

ISAIAH.
#1. The Sevenfold Prophecy of Isaiah.
pp. 41 - 44

So far in this series we have followed the order of books as given in the A.V. If we continue to follow this order our next study, after the books of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles, will be the Book of Ezra, which opens with the words: "Now in the first year of Cyrus, King of Persia." This is evidently a continuation of the story given in II Chronicles, for it will be found that the first two verses of Ezra are a repetition of II Chron. xxxvi. 22, 23. We must remind ourselves, however, that during the reign of some of the early kings, certain prophets were raised up, who spoke both of the immediate perils that beset the failing people, and also of their only hope of restoration and peace, centred in the long-promised Messiah. It would seem advisable, therefore, to depart from the canonical order of the A.V. and consider next the testimony of those prophets whose ministry falls within the period covered by the books of Kings and Chronicles. We shall then be better equipped for the study of the restoration under Ezra and Nehemiah, and the prophecies of Haggai, Zechariah and others that are associated with the return from captivity. We propose, therefore, to ignore the order of the books as set out in the English Bible, and adhere instead to the chronological order. No special study is needed for this, as we merely have to follow the order given in the Hebrew Bible—which is as follows:

The Structure of the Prophets, according to the Hebrew Canon.

A | JOSHUA. | "The Lord of all the earth."
Failure to possess the land (xviii. 3).
The Canaanite still in possession (xv. 63).
B | JUDGES. | Failure. Thirteen judges.
Israel forsaking and returning to God.
"No king" (xxi. 25).
C | SAMUEL. | Saul (type of Antichrist).
David (type of Christ).
Israel want to be "like the nations".
D | KINGS. | Decline and failure under kings.
Removal from the land.
D | ISAIAH. | Israel's only hope, final blessing, and restoration.
Messiah—God's King.
C | JEREMIAH. | Nebuchadnezzar (type of Antichrist).
David's "Righteous Branch"; "raised up"; the Deliverer.
Israel sent into captivity among the nations.
B | EZEKIEL. | The glory of God forsaking and returning to the land and people.
Jehovah Shammah. The Lord is there.
A | MINOR PROPHETS. | "The Lord of all the earth."
Joshua, the High Priest.
Restoration of Israel to the.
"No more Canaanite in the house of the Lord of Hosts (Zech. xiv. 21).

We can see from this arrangement of the Prophets that, with the end of the Book of Kings, Israel has reached the depths, the glory has departed, and man, even under the immediate protection of God, has proved a failure. With the prophet Isaiah we start a new movement. Uzziah the King may fail so desperately as to be smitten with incurable leprosy, but Isaiah tells us that in the very year that Uzziah died, he saw the Lord enthroned in the temple (Isa. vi.).

The nation of Israel was called to be the Lord's "servant-nation" (Isa. xli. 8), but it is the Messiah, Who, in the time of Israel's failure, is spoken of in the words of Isa. xliii. 1: "Behold My Servant." Israel is destined to be the Lord's "witness-nation" (Isa. xliii. 10), but it is the greater than David Who is given as a witness in Isa. lv. 4. And so we have summed up Isaiah's prophecy in the words of the central member of the structure:

"ISRAEL'S ONLY HOPE, FINAL BLESSING AND RESTORATION.
MESSIAH'S—GOD'S KING."

The prophecy of Isaiah leads up to the same glorious conclusion as that of Paul's epistle to the Colossians—"Christ is all."

Before we can hope to appreciate the teaching of a book of this length (it has 66 chapters), it is incumbent upon us to discover its structure. This is not an easy task, and yet our experience over the last twenty-five years and more compels us to attempt it, for we have so often in the past been richly rewarded for the hours that the investigation has entailed. Some readers may perhaps be inclined to ask, "Why not accept the structure already set out in the Companion Bible?" Our reply is that, valuable as these structures undoubtedly are, we are under a self-imposed obligation to live up to the title of this magazine, and "search and see" for ourselves. In the course of our studies we have obtained, over a period of years, a few helpful books on various parts of the O.T. and among them one or two commentaries on Isaiah. One of these was responsible for starting us off on the present investigation, and although the author, the Rev. T. R. Birks, does not carry his own suggestions to their conclusion, the hint that he throws out with regard to the structure of Isaiah was enough to provide the incentive and direction. The final result we present to the reader below. A detailed analysis of the sixty-six chapters of the book would obviously not be practicable at this stage, and we must therefore ask the reader to be satisfied with the following outline, which can be filled in as the details are given in subsequent articles.

The Sevenfold Prophecy of Isaiah.

A | PRE-ASSYRIAN INVASION (i.-xxxv.).
- a | i.-xii. THE REMNANT SHALL RETURN. |
  - (1) i. Zion like a lodge (Melunah).
  - (2) ii. - iv. 6. Zion's future glory.
  - (3) v. Zion, the Lord's vineyard.
  - (4) vi. The Tenth. It shall return.
  - (5) vii. - ix. 7. Virgin's Son. Immanuel.
  - (6) ix. 8 - x. 34. Remnant shall return.
  - (7) xi.-xii. The root and offspring of David.
- b | xiii.-xxvii. BURDENS AND BLESSINGS. |
  - (1) xiii. - xiv. 23. Babylon and Jerusalem.
  - (2) xiv. 24 - xviii. Philistia, Moab, Damascus.
  - (3) xix., xx. Egypt.
  - (4) xxi. Desert. Dumah. Arabia.
  - (5) xxii. Valley of Vision.
  - (6) xxiii. Tyre.
  - (7) xxiv.-xxvii. The earth like a cottage (Melunah).
- c | xxviii.-xxxv. WOES AND GLORIES. |
  - (1) xxviii. Ephraim. Instruction.
  - (2) xxix. Ariel. Redemption.
  - (3) xxx. Egypt. Grace.
  - (4) xxxi., xxxii. Apostates. Righteous King.
  - (5) xxiii. Assyria. King in His Beauty.
  - (6) xxxiv. Idumea. Recompenses.
  - (7) xxxv. 1-10. Wilderness. Glory and Excellency.

B | ASSYRIAN INVASION AND DELIVERANCE (xxxvi.-xxxix.).

A | POST-ASSYRIAN INVASION (xl.-lxvi.).

a | xl.-xlviii. COMFORT AND CONTROVERSY. |

(1) xl. 1-11. Good tidings to Zion.
(2) xl. 12 - xlii. 17. My Servant (Israel and Messiah).
(3) xlii. 18 - xlv. 15. My Witnesses (Israel).
(4) xlv. 16-25. God and none else.
(5) xlvi. Israel My Glory.
(6) xlvii. Babylon said, I am and none else.
(7) xlviii. His servant Jacob, redeemed.

b | xlix.-lx. LIGHT AND PEACE. |

(1) xlix. 1-12. A light to lighten the Gentiles.
(2) xlix. 13 - lii. 12. Sold for nought. Redeemed without money.
(3) lii. 13 - lvi. 8. The Lamb of God.
(4) lvi. 9 - lviii. 1. Peace. No Peace.
(5) lviii. 2-14. Ceremonialism.
(6) lix. Redeemer shall come to Zion.
(7) lx. Gentiles shall come to thy light.

c | lxi.-lxvi. ACCEPTABLE YEAR AND DAY OF VENGEANCE. |

(1) lxi. Priests of the Lord.
(2) lxii. A city not forsaken.
(3) lxiii. 1-6. The day of vengeance.
(4) lxiii. 7-14. The days of old.
(5) lxiii. 15 - lxiv. Our Father.
(6) lxv. 1-16. Recompense.
(7) lxv. 17 - lxvi. New heavens and new earth.

The focal point in this sevenfold analysis is the Assyrian invasion under Sennacherib and the deliverance of Jerusalem in the days of Hezekiah. Three great sections lead up to this point, and three follow, each section being sevenfold in composition. Each one of these 42 subsections is complete in itself, as also is the central section, Isa. xxxvi.-xxxix.

It is obvious that we shall have to do a certain amount of selecting in dealing with these great prophecies of Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, but we feel sure the reader will agree that the first of these has a very strong claim for the fullest possible hearing. The task would be sufficiently difficult even if we have unlimited space and leisure, and it becomes even more so when we have to select and condense. We remember, however, the words of Isa. xl.: "All flesh is grass . . . . . but the Word of our God shall stand for ever", and we take courage as we remember that His commands are His enablings.

ISAIAH.
#2. The unity of Isaiah demonstrated.
pp. 86 - 90

We believe we can safely assume that none of our readers will wish for a lengthy disquisition on the so-called "assured results of the Higher Criticism", nor will they feel that the space at our disposal has been used to profit by filling it with "arguments" for and against the modernist theory of two or more "Isaiahs". When we can turn to no less than ten passages in the N.T. that quote Isaiah by name as the author of the so-called "former" portion (i.-xxxix.), and eleven passages in the N.T. that just as emphatically quote him by name as the author of the so-called "latter" portion (xl.-lxvi.), and when we also discover that six different speakers are responsible for these statements—namely, the Lord Himself, Matthew, Luke, John, John the Baptist, and Paul—then, for the believer, the matter is at an end. These twenty-one reference to Isaiah by name are not, of course, the total number of references to his prophecy. Isaiah is quoted 85 times in the N.T., from 61 separate passages (some are repeated by more than one writer), and there are only seven books out of the twenty-seven that form the N.T. canon that are without a reference to his prophecy. Twenty-three of these citations are from Isa. i.-xxxix., and thirty-eight from Isa. xl.-lxvi. The unity of authorship is further demonstrated by the occurrence of certain words in both portions, which, according to the so-called critics, are to be found in one portion only. A selection of these will be found in the Companion Bible (Appendix No.79), but a much more exhaustive list is given in the commentary, referred to in our first article, by T. R. Birks.

Turning from the question of the authorship of the prophecy to matters far more helpful, it is important at the outset that we should bear in mind the two great sections of the book—namely, Chapters i.—xxxv. and Chapters xl.-lxvi.

The Relation of Isa. XXXV., to the Latter Portion of the Prophecy.

The former portion of Isaiah ends with chapter xxxv., but this closing chapter is so woven into the fabric of the latter portion that neither can be looked upon as complete without the other.

Isaiah XXXV.	Isaiah XL.-LXVI.
1. "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose. It shall blossom abundantly, and rejoice even with joy and singing; the glory of Lebanon shall be given unto it, the excellency of Carmel and Sharon, they shall see the glory of the Lord and the excellency of our God" (1, 2).	"The glory of Lebanon" (lx. 13). "Sharon" (lxv. 10). "They shall come and see My glory" (lxvi. 18 "He hath no form nor comeliness"—hadar, the same word as "excellency" (liii. 2).

2. "Strengthen ye the weak hands, and confirm the feeble knees. Say to them of a fearful heart, Be strong, fear not" (3, 4).	"They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run, and not be weary; they shall walk, and not faint" (xl. 31). "The young men shall utterly fall" (xl. 30). "That they should not stumble" (lxiii. 13)—the same word as "feeble" in xxxv. 3. "I will strengthen thee" (xli. 10)—the same word as "confirm" in xxxv. 3.
3. "Behold, your God will come with vengeance, even God with a recompense; He will come and save you" (4).	"He put on garments of vengeance" (lix. 7). "The day of vengeance of our God" (lxi. 2). "The day of vengeance is in Mine heart" (lxiii. 4). "Recompense to His enemies; to the islands He will repay recompense" (lix. 18). "The Lord that rendereth recompense to His enemies" (lxvi. 6).
4. "Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped" (5).	"To open the blind eyes" (xlii. 7). "I will bring the blind by a way that they know not" (xlii. 16). "Hear, ye deaf; and look, ye blind" (xlii. 18). See also xliii. 8.
5. "For in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert" (6).	"I will open rivers in high places, and fountains in the midst of the valleys: I will make the wilderness a pool of water, and the dry land springs of water" (xli. 18). "I give waters in the wilderness and rivers in the desert" (xliii. 20). See also xliv. 3-5 and xlviii. 21.
6. "And a highway shall be there, and a way; and it shall be called the way of holiness" (8).	"I will bring . . . . . by a way . . . . . in paths" (xli. 16). "I will even make a way in the wilderness" (xliii. 19). "I will make all My mountains a way, and My highways shall be exalted" (xlix. 1).
7. "And the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads; they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away" (10).	"Therefore the redeemed of the Lord shall return, and come with singing unto Zion; and everlasting joy shall be upon their head: they shall obtain gladness and joy, and sorrow and mourning shall flee away" (li. 11).

It will be seen that the climax which is reached in chapter xxxv. is expanded and amplified in the chapters of the prophecy that constitute the second part.

Let us now take another line of thought. Running through the former part of the prophecy is a sevenfold prediction concerning the "forsaking" of the land and city. In the second part we find a sevenfold reversal of these judgments.

The Predicted Judgment (The former half).

(1) "A great forsaking in the midst of the land" (Isa. vi. 12).
(2) "The land forsaken of both her kings" (Isa. vii. 16).
(3) "The cities of Aroer are forsaken" (Isa. xvii. 2).
(4) "In that day shall his strong cities be as a forsaken bough . . . . ." (Isa. xvii. 9).
(5) "Which they left because of the children of Israel" (Isa. xvii. 9).
(6) "The habitation forsaken and left like a wilderness" (Isa. xxvii. 10).
(7) "The multitude of the city shall be left" (Isa. xxxii. 14).

The Predicted Blessing (The latter half).

(1) "I, the God of Israel, will not forsake them" (Isa. xli. 17).
(2) "These things will I do unto them, and will not forsake them" (Isa. xlii. 16).
(3) "The Lord hath called thee as a woman forsaken" (Isa. lix. 6).
(4) "For a small moment have I forsaken thee, but with great mercies will I gather thee" (Isa. liv. 7).
(5) "Thou hast been forsaken . . . . . I will make thee . . . . . a joy" (Isa. lx. 15).
(6) "Thou shalt no more be termed Forsaken" (Isa. lxii. 4).
(7) "Thou shalt be called, Sought out, a city not forsaken" (Isa. lxii. 12).

The structure, which is set out on page 43, shows that the former prophecy is divided into three great groups, the first group ending with x. 33 - xii., the second with xxiv.-xxvii., and the third with chapter xxxv. These three closing portions of the three groups contain a special prophetic message, which finds an echo in the latter part of the prophecy. Taking the earlier chapters first, we have the following:

(1) "The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid . . . . . the lion shall eat straw like the ox . . . . . they shall not hurt nor destroy in all My holy mountain" (Isa. xi. 6-9).
(2) "The Lord God shall wipe away tears from off all faces" (Isa. xxv. 8).
(3) "Everlasting joy upon their heads; they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away" (Isa. xxxv. 10).

These early promises are found, inverse order, in the latter portion of the prophecy:

(3) "Everlasting joy shall be upon their heads: they shall obtain gladness and joy; and sorrow and mourning shall flee away" (Isa. li. 11).
(1) "The voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying" (Isa. lxv. 19).
(1) "The wolf and the lamb shall feed together, and the lion shall eat straw like the bullock: and dust shall be the serpent's meat. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all My holy mountain, saith the Lord" (Isa. lxv. 25).

The forsaking of Israel was consequent upon Israel's own forsaking of their covenant with God; their restoration will be based upon a New Covenant of grace. The word "covenant" occurs twelve times in Isaiah, and its distribution is in complete harmony with the trend of the prophecy.

The first and last occurrences are in chapter xxiv. and chapter lxi.:

"They have broken the everlasting covenant" (Isa. xxiv. 5).
"I will make an everlasting covenant with them" (Isa. lxi. 8).

The full list of occurrences is as follows:

"Covenant" in Isaiah.

First part of Isaiah.—Desolation (i.-xxxv.).	/	A	xxiv. 5. Covenant broken.
	/	B	xxviii. 15. Covenant made with death.
	\	B	xxviii. 18. Covenant with death annulled.
	\	A	xxiv. 5. Covenant broken.

Historic Interlude (xxxvi.-xxxix.)

Second part of Isaiah.—Desolation (xl.-lxvi.).	/	A	xlii. 6; xlix. 8. Messiah given as a covenant.
	/	B	liv. 10. Covenant of My peace.
	/	C	lv. 3. I will make an everlasting covenant.
	\	A	lvi. 4, 6. Take hold of My covenant.
	\	B	lix. 21. This is My covenant.
	\	C	lxi. 8. I will make an everlasting covenant

We have already observed that the Assyrian invasion casts its shadow over the prophecy and occupies the central historic interlude. The connection between this invasion and the covenant is made clear in II Kings xviii.:

"And the King of Assyria did carry away Israel unto Assyria . . . . . because they obeyed not the voice of the Lord their God, but transgressed His covenant" (11, 12).

We have sought to demonstrate something of the oneness of this great prophecy of Isaiah, and in so doing have been led to see a little of the way in which its glorious theme is unfolded. With this one article on the subject of the unity of the book we must be satisfied. In our subsequent studies we shall be exploring the book itself, and we look forward to many hours of joy and refreshment as we consider together this evangelist among the prophets.

ISAIAH.
#3. Rebellion, ruin, and restoration (i.-v.).
pp. 130 - 137

In order to cover the ground fairly rapidly and in such a way that the salient points may be perceived, we propose to devote three articles to the section covering Isa. i.-xii., and to apportion the subject-matter as follows:

(1) Isa. i.-v. (2) Isa. vi. (3) Isa. vii.-xii.

We therefore turn our attention in the present article to the first five chapters of this prophecy, and endeavour to obtain a comprehensive view of its teaching. We note first, in chapter i., that, on account of her ingratitude and rebellion, Israel is described as "the daughter of Zion, left as a booth in a vineyard". In chapter v., the "vineyard of the Lord of Hosts" is said to be Israel, and because of the utter failure of this vineyard to bring forth fruit, the Lord says, "I will lay it waste". In chapter i. we read, "I have brought up children"; in chapter v. the Lord says: "What could have been done more to my vineyard?" In chapter i. we read, "Who hath required this at your hand to tread (ramas) my courts?" and in chapter v., "It shall be trodden down (mirmas, the substantive form of ramas). Again, in chapter i. we read, "Israel doth not know, My people doth not consider", while in chapter v. we have the parallel charge:

> "They regard not . . . . . neither consider . . . . . My people are gone away into captivity, because they have no knowledge."

Going on to chapters ii. and iv., we have a marked parallel between ii. 1-5 and iv. 2-6. The first passage speaks of "the last days" (ii. 2) and the second of "that day" (iv. 2) when Zion shall be restored and glorified, and the nations shall be taught at Jerusalem. Chapters ii. 6-22 and iii. 16 - iv. 1 deal with the exposure of sinful pride and the fact that it will be brought low in the day of the Lord, while iii. 1-15 brings before us the ruin of Jerusalem. If we are not to load our pages unduly, we must refrain from attempting too close an analysis of these five chapters, and we therefore submit the following to the discriminating reader, believing that those who wish to go more into detail will be granted sufficient light and wisdom for the task.

Outline Analysis of Isaiah i.-v.

A | i. REBELLION. |
b | Israel did not know, they did not consider.
c | I have nourished and brought up children.
d | The land desolate; devoured.
e | Treading the courts (ramas).
f | The tow and the spark.
B | ii. 1-5. RESTORATION. |
g | The last days.
h | The house of the Lord established.
i | The nations shall not learn war.
j | Light of the Lord.
C | ii. 6 - iv. 1. RUIN. |
k | ii. 6-22. Pride brought low.
Mean men. Great men.
l | iii. 1-15. Jerusalem is ruined.
k | iii. 16 - iv. 1. Pride brought low.
Daughter of Zion. Seven women.
B | iv. 2-6. RESTORATION. |
g | In that day.
h | The branch of the Lord beautiful.
i | "Escaped" and "left". Glory shall be a defence.
j | Shadow and refuge.
A | v. REJECTION. |
a | The house of Israel like a vineyard.
b | They regard not, neither consider.
c | What could I have done more?
d | Vineyard laid waste; eaten up.
e | It shall be trodden down (ramas).
f | The fire and the stubble.

The above is given as an "outline analysis" rather than as a literary structure, for one very obvious reason, namely, that a literary structure of five such chapters as these would be too vast for the limits of our pages. We need not, however, forego the value of the evident correspondence of theme simply because we cannot set out each chapter fully, and we have therefore disregarded the actual order of the passages in chapters i. and v., and have merely indicated a few of the outstanding parallels.

We see from the structure that the main theme of these five chapters may be summarized in words which might well stand as representing the burden of all prophecy—viz., Rebellion, Rejection, Ruin and ultimate Restoration. Even here, in this opening charge against the ingratitude and rebellion of Israel, grace cannot be altogether silent, and so two very small, but very precious anticipations of future glory (ii. 1-5 and iv. 2-6) find a place.

We must now seek to understand more fully the causes of the serious condition in which Israel is found, the remedy provided, and the ultimate restoration that is in view.

Isaiah i. The Indictment.

The first verse of this chapter belongs, not to the opening section, but to the whole book. We learn from this verse that Isaiah's prophecies (or "visions") concern "Judah and Jerusalem", and that they were seen in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah. It is probable that this opening chapter describes the condition of the land and people at a time subsequent to the reign of Uzziah, for we know that Judah was not subjected to a foreign invasion until the days of Ahaz. The whole of the former portion of Isaiah seems to be overshadowed by the Assyrian invasion under Sennacherib, and it seems likely that Isaiah has described the state of the land and people during this time, and placed it in the forefront of the whole book, because of its special significance. The invasion under Sennacherib, and the miraculous deliverance from his threatenings, are a forecast of the last great world power that shall bring about the day of Jacob's trouble, and the final overthrow of the oppressor.

When dealing with the Book of Deuteronomy, we drew attention to the way in which the Song of Jehovah's Name (Deut. xxxii.) seems to be the quarry to which most subsequent prophets have gone for their material. Among the parallels noted were twelve instances from Isaiah. We will not repeat what we have already written (see Volume XXIV, page 82), but it may helpful if we mention again the four parallels with Isa. i.:

"Hear, O heavens" (Deut. xxxii. 1; Isa. i. 2).
"Nourished children" (Deut. xxxii. 6; Isa. i. 2).
"Corrupters" (Deut. xxxii. 5; Isa. i. 4).
"Sodom" (Deut. xxxii. 32; Isa. i. 10).

The Song of Deut. xxxii. proceeds by a series of stages from the perfect work of the Lord, down through Israel's failure, and so on to final restoration. In the same way Isaiah traces the downward path of the chosen people, until grace eventually intervenes.

As we have five sections to review within the confines of a few pages, we must necessarily pass by much that would be profitable. We shall endeavour, however, to give prominence to those points which mark the way, so that the reader may be guided in his own private reading.

The indictment of the people is that they were ungrateful children. In other places we read of Israel breaking their covenant with the Lord, and disobeying the precepts of the law. Here, however, we read:

> "I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against Me."

We get a glimpse here of the heart of God as Father, and his feelings towards his children.

In verse 4 the people are spoken of as "corrupters"; in verse 5 their punishment is spoken of in terms of "stripes" (i. 5); and in verse 7 their land and cities are said to be "left desolate" (i. 7). At the heart of this ingratitude and rebellion lies the fact expressed in verse 3: "Israel doth not know, My people doth not consider" (i. 3). The word "consider" we shall meet again in Isa. vi. 9, 10 as "understand", and we therefore postpone comment until this chapter is reached.

We also note in this chapter that the people who are so corrupt as to be likened to Sodom and Gomorrha (i. 9, 10) are nevertheless deeply "religious". Sacrifices, oblations, incense, were all enjoined by the law, but the Lord says of them here:

> "To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto Me? Who hath required this at your hand, to tread (or trample) My courts?"

When religious observances have become a refuge from conscience, oblations become "vain", incense an "abomination", and solemn assemblies "iniquity".

It is in this context that we find the first passage in Isaiah that is quoted in the N.T.:

> "Except the Lord of Hosts had left unto us a very small remnant, we should have been as Sodom, and we should have been like unto Gomorrha" (Isa. i. 9).

This passage forms an integral part of the dispensational argument of Rom. ix., and the reader is referred to the articles on Romans in The Berean Expositor for fuller notes on this important passage. A remnant by grace, saved at the time of trouble, was in its turn a pledge that all Israel shall be saved in God's day of grace.

We reach a climax in chapter i. at verse 18:

> "Come now, and let us reason together."

The Companion Bible, together with several other commentaries, draws attention to the fact that this passage speaks of putting an end to all reasoning rather than inviting it. The Hebrew word yakash, which is translated here "reason together", means primarily "to demonstrate what is right and true", and in some of its forms can mean "to reprove" (Isa. xi. 4). The form of the verb in Isa. i. 18 is equivalent to our passive, and suggests reproof rather than continued reasoning. The Hebrew yakash gives us the word for "the daysman", whom Job so longed for (Job ix. 33), and we can certainly see thought of the Mediator behind Isa. i. 18:

> "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow: though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool."

The idea involved in the simile "as scarlet" is better seen when the Hebrew is consulted. The word sheni, meaning "two", or "double", in the course of time came to mean "double-dyed", by virtue of the fact that it was the custom to dip a garment twice when dyeing it purple (See Horace and Pliny). The second word "crimson" refers to a colour made from the Cochineal insect, our English word being derived from the Arabic

Al-Kermez, through the French cramoisi. The feminine form of the word occurs in Isa. xli. 14 where it is translated "worm". Both the colours mentioned by the prophet are deeply bitten into the material, and yet, to pass from the figure to the actuality, such is the grace of God that these double-dyed sinners may actually become "as white as snow".

After further reference to the nature of Israel's sin (under such figures as those of a harlot and a murderer) we read in verses 25-27 of the purifying of the people—the words used are very reminiscent of Malachi's figure of the purification of silver in Mal. iii. 3—and of the glorious restoration that awaits them.

> "And I will restore thy judges as at the first, and thy counselors as at the beginning; afterward thou shalt be called, The city of righteousness, the faithful city. Zion shall be redeemed with judgment, and her converts with righteousness" (Isa. i. 26, 27).

The closing verses speak of the destruction of the "transgressor and sinner, together" and the consuming of those that forsake the Lord.

> "And the strong shall be as tow, and the maker of it as a spark, and they shall both burn together, and none shall quench them" (Isa. i. 31).

These awful words concerning the fire that is not quenched find a solemn echo in the last verse of the prophecy, where we read:

> "And they shall go forth, and look upon the carcasses of the men that have transgressed against Me: for their worm (the same word as "crimson" in Isa. i. 18) shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched (the same word as in Isa. i. 31); and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh" (Isa. lxvi. 24).

Isaiah ii. 2-5.

This precious glimpse of the days of restoration and blessing is fully expanded in the second part of the prophecy (xl.-lxvi.) and therefore, as our space is limited, we will be content with the following outline.

A | 2. The true exaltation (Heb. nasa). "The Lord's house."
B | 3. | a | Many people.
b | Come ye, let us go . . . to the . . . God of Jacob.
c | We will walk in His paths.
C | 3. | d | Out of Zion.
e | Shall go forth the law.
e | And the word of the Lord.
d | From Jerusalem.
A | 4. False exaltation (Heb. nasa). "Not lift up sword."
B | 5. | a | House of Jacob.
b | Come ye, let us walk.
c | In the light of the Lord.

Here, in these few sentences, we have compressed the glorious future that awaits the nations of the earth when Israel shall at last enter into their inheritance and become a kingdom of priests. Not until the nations cease to "learn" war, will peace be more than an illusion.

Before we come to the sequel to this prophecy of restoration and peace (Isa. iv. 2-6), we must first consider the intervening passage—Isa. ii. 6 - iv. 1—which deals with the cause of Israel's failure to enter into their inheritance and to become a channel of blessing to the surrounding nations. The structure shows a threefold division of this passage (see page 131) but the theme is one—sinful pride ending in ruin. What a contrast between the Jerusalem of Isaiah's vision (ii. 1-5), and the Jerusalem he actually knew. Instead of true worship, we see a land full of idols, and instead of the law of the Lord shining forth from Jerusalem—

> "They are replenished from the east, and are soothsayers like the Philistines, and they join hands with the children of strangers" (Isa. ii. 6).

The following is the structure of Isa. ii. 6-22:

Isaiah ii. 6-22.

A | 6. People forsaken of the Lord.
B | 7-9. Idols. Silver and gold. The land full. Men abased.
C | 10. Enter into rock . . . . . Glory of His majesty.
D | 11. Lofty humbled.
E | 11. The Lord alone exalted.
F | 12-16. The day of the Lord.
D | 17. Lofty humbled.
E | 17. The Lord alone exalted.
C | 19. Go into rocks . . . . . Glory of His majesty.
B | 20. Idols. Silver and gold. Cast to moles and bats.
A | 22. Cease ye from man.

The last sentence here: "Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils; for wherein is he to be accounted of?" is parallel with the opening section of the second part of Isaiah, where we read that "all flesh is grass". The "Word of the Lord" is what endures, and He is able to accomplish His purposes without the aid of man. If only we could take to heart the testimony of Isa. ii. 22, we should realize the futility of all human schemes to bring about the Kingdom of God on earth. The Lord has forsaken His people . . . . . "Cease ye from man".

Chapter iii. gives another terrible picture of Jerusalem as it was, in contrast to what it will be:

> "I will give children to be their princes, and babes shall rule over them" (iii. 4).
> "As for My people, children are their oppressors, and women rule over them" (iii. 12).

The word "ruin" in verses 6 and 8 means "stumbling and falling", and occurs also in Isa. v. 27, xxxv. 3, and xl. 30. The recurrence of the idea of "rule" here (verses 4, 6, 7, and 12), shows that we have in this second view of Israel's failure, failure in its political aspect, just as in ii. 6-22, we had their failure in the matter of worship and true religion. To complete the picture of Israel's degradation we have their moral failure set forth in Isa. iii. 15 - iv. 1. Here the daughters of Zion come before us with their wanton eyes and mincing steps, chains, bracelets, veils, rings, jewels and perfumes. In the case of the men, their idolatry is expressed in terms of treasures, chariots, high towers, fenced walls, and ships of Tarshish (ii. 7, 15, 16); in the case of the women, it is expressed in terms of self-adornment and its immoral accompaniments (iii. 16-23). What a relief to turn from this to Isa. iv. 2-6, where we have another view of the Jerusalem that is to be, when the Lord "shall have washed away the filth of the daughters of Zion" and, "over all the glory shall be a marriage-canopy" (A.V. "defence": verse 5).

Isaiah rounds off this great section of his prophecy with the parable of the vineyard, which, in spite of all the care lavished upon it, brings forth only wild grapes. Following this parable we have a sixfold denunciation (verses 8, 11, 18, 20, 21, and 22), and the chapter concludes with the threat of invasion—a threat which was fulfilled when the Assyrians entered the land.

With such an abundance of material there is always the possibility of creating confusion by elaborate explanations. On the other hand, if any thread of teaching can be discerned in a particular section of such a prophecy as this, it should certainly be seized upon with gratitude. One such thread seems to be provided by the eight references to Zion, and with these we must close.

Zion in Isaiah i.-v.

A | i. 8. Forsaken. The Remnant (i. 9).
B | i. 27. Redeemed with judgment.
C | ii. 3. Law goes forth to nations.
D | iii. 16. Haughty and vain.
D | iii. 17. Smitten with scab.
C | iv. 3. Holy; those that are left in Zion.
B | iv. 4. Washed . . . . . spirit of judgment.
A | iv. 5. Defence. The Escaped (iv. 2).

ISAIAH.
#4. The Prophetic Vision and Commission (vi.).
pp. 169 - 176

While we do not suggest that one chapter of this mighty prophecy may be of greater importance than another, because to do so would merely be comparison according to our view of what is important, we can assert that Isa. vi. contains material demanding profound attention. The chapter marks a spiritual crisis in the prophet's own life; it throws light upon the purpose of the ages; it contains a passage that is quoted by the Lord at the time of his rejection by Israel in the Land (Matt. xiii.), and by Paul at Rome of Israel in the dispersion (Acts xxviii.). Moreover it concludes with a pledge of Israel's restoration couched in terms that demand careful analysis.

First we will examine the chapter to discover its place in the ministry of the prophet. Are we to understand that after he had uttered the prophecies of chapters i.-v., he saw the vision of Isa. vi. and confessed his uncleanness? That is the considered opinion of some. We learn from the opening verse of chapter i. that Isaiah's prophetic ministry was exercised in the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah. The total period of the last of these three reigns is sixty-one years, so that it is extremely improbable that Isaiah prophesied during many years of the first of the three. There are scriptural reasons for believing that this sixth chapter of Isaiah discloses the call and commission of the prophet, and that that call was received in the last years of Uzziah's reign.

If we compare the account of this call with the features that are recorded in connection with the call and commission of Jeremiah and of Ezekiel, we shall find confirmation of the opinion that Isa. vi. is the initiatory vision of the prophet's commission. Let us see this:

> JEREMIAH'S COMMISSION.—The touched lips. "Then the Lord put forth His hand and touched my mouth. And the Lord said unto me, Behold I have put My words in thy mouth" (Jer. i. 9).
>
> EZEKIEL'S COMMISSION.—The Cherubim. "The word of the Lord came expressly unto Ezekiel the priest, the son of Buzi, in the land of the Chaldeans by the river Chebar . . . . . the likeness of four living creatures . . . . . every one had . . . . . four wings" (Ezek. i. 3-6).
> ISAIAH'S COMMISSION.—The touched lips and the Seraphim (Isa. vi. 1-7).

It is probable that the vision of Isa. vi. was not made public during the lifetime of Isaiah; it was initially for his personal satisfaction and was not made known until the whole of Isaiah's prophecies were written. In the same way we do not read in Acts ix. what the Lord said to Paul himself on that occasion, but only what the Lord said to Ananias about Paul, the actual words uttered by the Lord to Paul himself not being made known until Paul was imprisoned (Acts xxvi. 16).

Before we proceed to the examination of this most important section of Isaiah's prophecy it will be well for us to get a measure of its structure, so that we may be guided in our study in the direction of the inspired intention. No existing structure appears to give the true place to the two references to the eretz (earth, land), nor the threefold response of Isaiah, "Then said I". Accordingly, we approach the chapter afresh, and present to the reader what we believe comprehends the essential features in their structural relationship.

Isaiah vi.

A | 1. Uzziah. Type of Israel, Failure.
B | 2, 3. The thrice Holy Lord.
C | 3, 4. Eretz (earth). Fullness of it, the glory of the Lord.
D1 | 5-8. |
a | Then said i. CONFESSION; Unclean.
b | And He said. CLEANSING; Eyes, lips, hearing.
D2 | 8-10. |
a | Then said i. CONSECRATION; Send me.
b | And He said. COMMISSION; Hear, eyes, heart.
D3 | 11. |
a | Then said i. COMMISERATION; Lord, how long?
b | And He answered. COMMINATION; Until wasted, desolate.
C | 12. Eretz (land). Forsaking in midst of it.
A | 13. Sacred Tithe. Type of Remnant. Return.
B | 13. The holy seed.

In Volume XXIX, page 208 we have given the whole history of the Kings of Israel and Judah as they are associated with the House of God, and it will be seen that the central member of the whole outline is occupied with the reigns of Uzziah and his son Jotham. The history of the Kingdom reaches its lowest level at the presumption and leprosy of King Uzziah who, in his presumption and in his doom himself foreshadowed the future Antichrist. This gives point to the opening words of the vision:

> "In the year that King Uzziah died I saw also the Lord sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up, and His train filled the temple" (Isa. vi. 1).

Here we have a solemn contrast drawn between Uzziah, the King, stricken with leprosy because of his own sin, and the Lord, the King, Who was treated as a leper by the very people for whom He came to die (Isa. liii. 3), and Who will accomplish all that is implied in the office of King and Priest.

John xii. leaves us in no doubt that the "King" seen by Isaiah in this vision was Christ, for after quoting Isa. vi. 9, 10, the Evangelist adds:

> "These things said Esaias when he saw His glory, and spake of Him" (John xii. 41).

In Isa. vi. 2 the holy beings that stand above the throne are called Seraphim, which has led many to believe that a different order of celestial being from the Cherubim is indicated. But that this is by no means a necessary deduction, we will seek to show.

Primarily, the word seraph means "To burn", and anything that burns may be a seraph, even if it be a city (Isa. i. 7), or an idol (Isa. xliv. 16). Consequently, if it suited the purpose of Isa. vi. to call the Cherubim by a distinctive feature, that of itself would not prove a distinction of being. The description given in the book of Revelation of the four "zoa" or "living ones" (wrongly translated "beasts"), shows the Cherubim of Ezekiel to be identical with the Seraphim of Isaiah.

> "And the first living one was like a lion, and the second living one like a calf, and the third living one had a face as a man, and the fourth living one was like a flying eagle. And the four living ones had each of them six wings about him; and they were full of eyes within: and they rest not day and night, saying, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come" (Rev. iv. 7, 8).

This is of prime importance, for the witness of the Cherubim, which commences, so far as man is concerned, at Gen. iii. continues throughout the Scriptures until its prophetic pledge is realized in the Revelation. Man's dominion being forfeited in Gen. iii., the Cherubim are placed at the east of the garden as a pledge that the dominion shall be restored. The fact that the next reference to Cherubim is in connection with the Mercy Seat is an added revelation indicating the process whereby this restoration shall be accomplished, and the fact that the prayer of Hezekiah, which occurs in the very centre and climax of Isaiah, is addressed to The Lord of Hosts, God of Israel, that dwellest between the Cherubim (Isa. xxxvii. 16) gives point to the theme of restoration, and intensifies the interest which Isaiah, and we with him, must have in the presence of the Seraphim at the beginning of his prophetic ministry.

The Seraphim are described as having six wings, yet only two were used for flying, the remaining four being used in the recognition of the holiness of the One they served. While not introduced to teach positive doctrine concerning the Godhead, their threefold ascription of holiness, together with the change of number in the person of the pronoun in verse 8, "Whom shall I send, and who will go for Us?" cannot but be observed.

Before leaving the passage dealing with the Seraphim, it may help us to observe the way in which the Hebrew word is used in Isaiah.

Seraph in Isaiah.

A | i. 7. Country desolate. Cities burned. Not consider (3).
B | vi. 2, 6. Temple. Seraphim. Live coal. No understanding (9).
C | ix. 5. War. Burning.
Child born, Prince of Peace (6).
C | xliv. 16, 19. Idols. Burn in fire.
He that formed thee from the womb (24-28).
B | xlvii. 14. Babylon. Fire shall burn them. Not lay to heart (7).
A | lxiv. 10, 11. Jerusalem desolate. House burned. None call on Name (7).

This burning judgment, echoed in Isa. iv. 4, where the cleansing of Jerusalem is in view, gives point to Isaiah's selection in his opening vision of the name of "Seraphim". The very last words of his prophecy end in the same strain: "Neither shall their fire be quenched" (Isa. lvi. 24).

The cry of the Seraphim, "Holy, holy, holy", is associated with a prophetic statement; "The whole earth is full of His glory" (Isa. vi. 6). Let us read once more the parallel passage in Revelation:

> "And the four living creatures had each of them six wings about him; and they were full of eyes within: and they rest not day and night, saying, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come . . . . . Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honour and power: for thou hast created all things, and for Thy pleasure they are and were created" (Rev. iv. 8-11).

In Isaiah the Hebrew word eretz is translated "earth", "land" and "country" and it is consequently necessary to examine the context before drawing conclusions. There are seven undoubted references to "the whole earth" in Isaiah which will illuminate the prophecy of the Seraphim. Let us observe both the references and their correspondence.

"The Whole Earth" In Isaiah.

A | vi. 3. The whole earth is full of His glory. A great forsaking (12).
B | xii. 5. Excellent things (Heb. Geuth).
Water. Salvation (3).
C | xiv. 7. Rest (blessing). The grave for king of Babylon (9, 11)
D | xiv. 26. The purpose upon the whole earth. Assyrian broken (24, 25).
C | xxv. 8. Rest (judgment, 10). Death swallowed up in victory (8).
B | xxviii. 22. Crown of Pride [Heb. Geuth (1, 3)].
Waters (17). Consumption (22).
A | liv. 5. Husband, Redeemer, God of the whole earth. Forsaken for a moment (7).

The purpose of the ages, set forth in prophetic type by the Cherubim, and foreshadowed by the utterance of the Seraphim, is expressed in this sevenfold reference to the whole earth. The reader is urged to examine the context of each reference and to see the way in which all opposition is broken down; death swallowed up in victory, pride overthrown, and the Lord alone exalted in that day, and how, just as the Assyrian invasion occupies the centre of the whole prophecy, so the Assyrian occupies the centre of this sevenfold reference.

We observe that the A.V. gives in the margin of Isa. vi. 3, the note: "Heb. His glory is the fullness of the whole earth", while Rotherham translates the passage: "The fulness of the whole earth is His glory." Isaiah observed that the train of the Lord's garment filled the temple (Isa. vi. 1), and that the house was filled with smoke (Isa. vi. 4).

The first occurrence of this phrase in Isa.vi. 3 is found in Numb. xiv. where Israel so signally failed to follow the Lord and triumph over the Canaanites.

> "But as truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord" (Numb. xiv. 21).

This initial promise strikes the key note. The glory of the Lord and the fulness of the whole earth are connected with the overthrow of satanic opposition and the full faith of His people. This is seen in the seven occurrences of the expression "the whole earth" already reviewed.

At the close of that prayer which looks forward to the kingdom of Christ on earth, David said:

> "Blessed be the Lord God, the God of Israel, Who only doeth wondrous things. And blessed be His glorious name for ever: and let the whole earth be filled with His glory: Amen and Amen" (Psa. lxxii. 18, 19).

Again, the triumphant twenty-fourth Psalm, which speaks of the entry of the King of glory and the lifting up of the age-abiding doors, opens with the statement: "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof" (Psa. xxiv. 1).

The subject is carried to its completion in the N.T. where the fulness is seen expressed and realized in Christ. It would take us too far afield to examine these N.T. references now, but the reader is directed to the article dealing with the Pleroma in Volume XIII, pages 165-170.

In contrast therefore with the failing King Uzziah, Isaiah sees the pledge of final fulness in the Christ of God. There is a comparison also between Isaiah himself, the nation and Uzziah, for he too confesses uncleanness.

> "I SAW ALSO THE LORD."—In the year that King Uzziah died.
> "ALSO I HEARD THE VOICE OF THE LORD."—After Isaiah had confessed uncleanness.

This "seeing" and "hearing" is in direct contrast to the failure of Israel which is manifested in verse 10.

> "Then said I, Woe is me!" (Isa. vi. 5).

The effect of the vision of the Lord upon the beholder has ever been the same. Job, the "perfect" man, said that if he could but stand before the Lord he would maintain his integrity, but when at last his wish was gratified, he said:

> "I have heard of Thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eyes seeth Thee. Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes" (Job xlii. 5, 6).

Daniel's comeliness turned to corruption in the presence of an angel (Dan. x. 8); Peter besought the Lord to depart from him because he was a sinful man (Luke v. 8); and John, the disciple whom Jesus loved, fell at His feet as one dead, when he beheld His glory (Rev. i. 17).

This attitude and confession of Isaiah is but a blessed anticipation of the attitude and confession of Israel when at last they shall look upon Him Whom they pierced.

> "We are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags; and we all do fade as a leaf; and our iniquities, like the wind, have taken us away" (Isa. lxiv. 6).

Isaiah, in the course of his commission, stood up before men and pronounced woe to them because of their sins. Twenty times does he pronounce this woe, but before he uttered one note of denunciation upon others, he bowed in the presence of the Lord and confessed:

> "Woe is me! for I am undone; because I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips: for mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of Hosts" (Isa. vi. 5).

Here is the true spirit of ministry. "Considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted" (Gal. vi. 1), is a N.T. equivalent.

Moreover, Isaiah did not first speak of the unclean people among whom he dwelt; he spoke first of himself. This, too, finds parallels in such passages as Dan. ix.: "We have sinned, etc,"; and Neh. i.: "We have dealt very corruptly, etc."

There are times when we must preach wrath and speak of condemnation, but in doing so let us remember that we are ourselves but brands plucked from the burning. A preacher once told a friend that he was going to preach "hell" to a certain congregation. "I hope you will preach tenderly" was the rejoinder. This is the attitude expressed in the reply of Isaiah after his commission of judgment, "Lord, how long?" (Isa. vi. 11). This attitude of mind and heart must have pleased the Lord that sent him.

The threefold "Then said I" of the commission of Isaiah speaks for itself. The structure shows that they include his confession and his cleansing, his consecration and his commission, as well as his commiseration with his people, and the message of commination that he had to pronounce. His confession was specific, "Unclean lips". His cleansing was equally specific, "This hath touched thy lips", and Isaiah then heard the voice of the Lord saying:

> "Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?" (Isa. vi. 8).

Let us pause. God had the sovereign right to command the service of any of His creatures. He could have sent an unclean or an unwilling Isaiah to do His service; He could, we say, if might be the only criterion. But God is holy, and He therefore uses clean vessels. He could have ordered Isaiah to take up his commission, He could, we say, if omnipotence were His only attribute, but He had made man after His Own image, and therefore instead of commanding Isaiah, he says in Isaiah's hearing: "Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?" And Isaiah's service becomes willing service.

> "Then said I, Here am I; send me."

Yet again, notice Isaiah's reply. He, on his side, might have said, "Here am I, I am going", but he did not. Instead, as a child of redeeming grace, he begins to reflect the image of His Lord, and says with a beautiful blend of willingness and submission, "Here am I, send me."

Here we must pause. In our next article we must deal with the nature of his message, and with the pledge of verse 13.

ISAIAH.
#5. The Remnant shall return (vi.).
pp. 195 - 200

We take up our study of Isa. vi. at the commission received by Isaiah, as recorded in verses 9 and 10:

> "And He said, Go and tell this people, Hear ye indeed, but understand not; and see ye indeed, but perceive not. Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and shut their eyes; lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and convert, and be healed" (Isa. vi. 9, 10).

Here we have the intensely solemn message entrusted to the prophet. Even though we allow for the figure of speech—the expression "Make the heart of this people fat" signifying "declare that it will be so"—the prophet must still have felt the great solemnity of his charge.

This passage in Isa. vi. is quoted in the N.T. seven times and on three different occasions:

(1) Matt. xiii. 14; Mark iv. 12; Luke viii. 10. King and kingdom rejected.
(2) John xii. 40. The King and the kingdom. Hossanah. Yet rejection.
(3) Acts xxviii. 25-27. Israel as a nation rejected.

We read in verse 9, "Go and tell this people". No longer does the Lord say "My people", for the passage prophesies that Israel were to become "Lo-ammi"—"Not My people". In the opening chapter of Isaiah, Israel are referred to as "My people", who "do not consider", "a people laden with iniquity", and "ye people of Gomorrha" (Isa. i. 3, 4, 10). In the opening chapter of the restoration section, on the other hand (Isa. xl.-lxvi.) the very first verse reads: "Comfort ye, comfort ye, My people" (Isa. xl. 1), while in the closing references to Israel as His people, the Lord says that they are a people that have sought Him, that they are a joy, that His joy is in them, and that their days shall be "as the days of a tree" (Isa. lxv. 10, 18, 19, 22).

Let us now consider a little more closely the words used in Isa. vi. 9 and 10:

> "Understand not"; "perceive not"; "make the heart of this people fat"; "make their ears heavy"; "shut their eyes"; "convert"; "be healed".

The word "understand" is the Hebrew bin, which is rendered "consider" in Isa. i. 3: "My people doth not consider." The word "perceive" is the Hebrew yada, which occurs in the same verse (Isa. i. 3) in the sentence: "The ox knoweth her owner . . . . . but Israel doth not know." The Hebrew word translated "to make fat" is shamon, and is connected with the word shemen, "ointment" (Isa. i. 6). It occurs but five times in the O.T. and always in a bad sense—rather in the same way as we speak of the fatty degeneration of the heart. The five occurrences are as follows:

> "Jeshurun waxed fat, and kicked: thou art waxen fat, thou art grown thick, thou art covered with fatness; then he forsook God" (Deut. xxxii. 15).
> "Make the heart of this people fat" (Isa. vi. 10).
> "They are waxen fat . . . . . they overpass the deeds of the wicked" (Jer. v. 28).
> "They became fat . . . . . nevertheless they were disobedient" (Neh. ix. 25, 26).

If the judicial fattening of the heart is connected with the same word that gives us "ointment", and the anointing of the Messiah, "the making heavy" of Israel's ears seems to be associated with their failure to recognize and further the Lord's glory, for the word that gives us "glory" in Isa. vi. 3 (kabod) also gives us "heavy" (kabed). The underlying link between the words is the conception of "weight". Riches were conceived of in the terms of weight as in Gen. xiii. 2, and Paul, who had been a "Hebrew of the Hebrews", uses the same idea when he speaks of the "weight of glory".

The expression "shut their eyes" in Isa. vi. is rendered, in Young's literal translation: "And its eyes declare dazzled." In its various forms, the verb shaa is translated "delight" (Psa. cxix. 16, 47, 70; xciv. 19) and "cry ye out and cry" (Margin: Take your pleasure and riot: Isa. xxix. 9). Once again it seems that, as Israel did not "delight" or "take their pleasure" in the glorious purposes of the Lord, the very glory dazzled their eyes, just as the glory of the risen Lord resulted in the Apostle's three days of blindness on the road to Damascus.

The word "convert" is the translation of the Hebrew shub, which appears again in verse 13 with special emphasis. The same word (shub) occurs several times in Isa. i.:

> "And I will turn My hand upon thee, and purely purge away they dross . . . . . and I will restore thy judges as at the first . . . . . Zion shall be redeemed with judgment, and her converts with righteousness" (Isa. i. 25, 26, 27).

The word "heal" in Isa. vi. is the Hebrew rapha which occurs in Isaiah seven times, as follows:

The word "heal" in Isaiah.

A | No hope in themselves |
vi. 10. The judgment upon the people.
A | The blessing of the people. Only hope in Messiah. |
a | xix. 22. EGYPT. Smite and heal. Intreated and heal.
b | xxx. 26. Heal the stroke of their wound.
b | liii. 5. With His stripes we are healed.
a | lvii. 18, 19. ISRAEL. I will heal, restore.

The reader will see from the brief notes we have given above that these verses in Isa. vi. contain, in a condensed form, much that illustrates the progress of the Lord's purposes in relation to Israel. Peter evidently refers to this usage of "healing" when he explains the typical character of the healing of the lame man:

> "Neither is there THE HEALING (A.V. salvation) in any other" (Acts iv. 12).

We must now pass on to the prophet's answer to this great commission.

> "Then said I, Lord, how long?" (Isa. vi. 11).

The prophet does not draw back or refuse to utter the solemn words of judgment committed to him, but he manifests the true spirit of service when he asks "How long?" It was fitting that the man who was to utter woe after woe against his own people should first of all be brought to say of himself "Woe is me"; and so here, even though he perceived the judgment to be just, the prophet must have pleased the Lord by his evident pity. The Lord's answer is twofold—first, the desolation of judgment; and then, the pledge of restoration:

> "And He answered, Until the cities be wasted without inhabitant, and the houses without man, and the land be utterly desolate, and the Lord have removed men far away, and there be a great forsaking in the midst of the land. But yet in it shall be a tenth, and it shall return, and shall be eaten: as a teil tree, and as an oak, whose substance is in them when they cast their leaves: so the holy seed shall be the substance thereof" (Isa. vi. 11, 12, 13).

Here is no small disturbance among the people, but a laying waste and depopulation that was to reduce the land to "utter desolation".

The removing "far away" of verse 12 was but the sequel to Israel's moral and spiritual separation from the Lord:

> "Forasmuch as this people draw near Me with their mouth, and with their lips do honour Me, but have removed their heart far from Me" (Isa. xxix. 13).

In contrast to this, when at last Israel are restored and their forsaking is for ever past (Isa. liv. 7), then we read:

> "In righteousness shalt thou be established; thou shalt be far from oppression" (Isa. liv. 14).

The verses we are considering in Isa. vi. foreshadow not only the Assyrian and the Babylonian captivities, but also the great dispersion that followed the overthrow of Jerusalem in A.D.70, for at the end of the Acts Isa. vi. 10 is quoted for the last time.

The Lord's words in verses 11 and 12 indicate a long and severe judgment, but the chapter ends with a note of hope. If we turn back to Isa. i., we learn there that Israel was saved from utter destruction, "as Sodom and Gomorrha", because of a "remnant" (Isa. i. 9). Similarly in Rom. ix.-xi., we find that the Apostle uses the same argument—the remnant saved in Rom. ix. 27 were a firstfruits, pledging the salvation of all Israel in the future (Rom. xi. 16, 26). So here, it is this same idea of a firstfruits that we find in the last verse of Isa. vi.

We must now pay careful attention to the wording of this last verse. We observe first of all that the words "their leaves" are in italics, and therefore added by the translators. The word "cast", which precedes the italics, refers to the felling of a tree rather than to the falling of leaves. Moreover there is no "substance" in leaves that can in any sense be regarded as a pledge of restoration, especially when we learn that the Hebrew word for "substance" is usually translated "pillar". This latter word suits the idea of the stem of a tree, and this is undoubtedly the intention of the passage.

Some translators have looked upon the words "shall return" in verse 13 as giving the idea of repetition, as though to imply the thought of repeated destruction. This, however, ignores the way in which the Hebrew word shub is used by the prophet. We have already seen its use in Isa. i. 27—"her converts", and it is also found in Isa. vi. itself: "And return, or convert, and be healed" (Isa. vi. 10). The prophetic name given to Isaiah's firstborn, Shear-jashub, or "The remnant shall return" as Isa. x. 21 renders it, also indicates that the words "shall return" must be given their primitive meaning.

If the words: "But yet in it shall be a tenth" are put into parenthesis, we can then read straight on from the end of verse 12 to the second clause of verse 13:

> "And the land be utterly desolate (but yet in it shall be a tenth) And it shall return, and shall be eaten . . . . ."

Even though this returning remnant should again be "eaten", it is likened to the teil and the oak tree, that in falling, have substance in them, so that, even though cut down to the ground, they will again send forth new shoots and in time produce a new tree. The tenth or tithe is the Lord's portion, a beautiful title for the remnant according to the election of grace.

So ends the vision of Isaiah. It begins with utter failure, as does the prophecy itself, but, after desolation and forsaking have done their work, it at last reaches restoration and blessing. The vision that Isaiah saw in the year that King Uzziah died is, therefore, practically an epitome of his life's ministry.

The Gospel of JOHN.

#7. The Word was "with" God (i. 1).

pp. 1 - 5

We have already noticed that the truth contained in the opening sentence of this Gospel is beyond anything of which we can have direct experience. "In the beginning was the Word" is a statement simply expressed, and easy to believe, but it speaks of a condition of being entirely removed from our own experience. And what is true of the opening sentence of John i. is also true of each successive link in the chain of revelation that covers the first five verses. All is clear to faith so long as we do not seek to go beyond our limitations, but as soon as we endeavour to measure infinity with the yard-stick of the finite we must inevitably flounder in confusion.

The next link in the chain that is presented to us, is the statement:

> "And the Word was with God" (John i. 1)

The Greek language is rich in particles, and in the N.T. there are no less than 14 different Greek prepositions that are translated "with". If John had been conversant by personal experience with the subject of his opening verse, he would have been obliged to exercise the most scrupulous care in determining which of the fourteen prepositions would express just the precise shade of meaning that suited the case; but when we realize that even the beloved disciple, who had leaned on the Lord's bosom at the last supper, had no possible personal and experimental acquaintance with the conditions that obtained "in the beginning", we can readily see that nothing but the superintending inspiration of God could have infallibly selected that one preposition out of the fourteen available, which would express the complete truth.

In what sense, then, was the Logos "with" God? Let us take first the preposition meta. This is the word used by Nicodemus in John iii.:

> "We know that Thou art a teacher come from God: for no man could do these miracles except God be with him" (John iii. 2).

God was "with" the Lord Jesus Christ in the sense of meta, but that is not the meaning of John i. 1, for John does not use this word. Meta does not imply so close and intimate a fellowship as some other prepositions which we are to examine. Its root meaning is "after", as in the word "Metaphysics", the treatise written by Aristotle "after" the one on Physics. It denotes association, however, for one thing could not come after another unless it were joined in some sort of sequence.

Let us take next the preposition sun. Was the Logos "with" God in the sense that sun would indicate? Sun (syn, sym) indicates a closer association than is implied by meta, and is used largely by the Apostle Paul in speaking of the fellowship that exists between the members of the One Body and Christ, the Head. It only occurs three times in John's Gospel (John xii. 2, xviii. 1, & xxi. 3) and is not used again in John's epistles or the Apocalypse. Since sun is not used in John i. 1, we conclude that the Word is not there represented as being merely "in fellowship" with God.

Another possible preposition could have been para. Was the Logos "with" God in the sense that para would indicate? This word means "beside" as in "parallel", and is used by John in xvi. 27, "I came out from the Father"—i.e. "from beside the Father". Para can therefore be used, just as meta can, to indicate certain relationships between the Father and the Son, but neither meta nor para is used in John i. 1.

We will not go on to deal with the remaining possible prepositions, but come at once to the positive teaching of the passage. The word actually used by John is the preposition pros. The Logos, as revealed in John i. 1, was not simply "with God" in the sense of being co-existent, einai meta ("He that was with thee beyond Jordan": John iii. 26); or united by things held in common, einai sun ("This man was also with Him": Luke xxii. 56); or in connection with the local relations, einai para ("The glory which I had with Thee before the world was": John xvii. 5); but in a sense different from any of these, that could only be expressed by the preposition pros.

At this point, let us turn for a moment to Heb. iv., where the same word pros is used.

It would seem presumptuous for any one person, unless most fully qualified to speak, to suggest that all existing translations of Heb. iv. 13 have missed the mark; and yet, as we shall see, there is much to be said for a more literal rendering. The Authorized and Revised Versions read "With Whom we have to do", while alternative renderings given in other translations are either "To Whom we must give an account", or "About Whom is our discourse". The original in Heb. iv. 13 is Pros hon hemin ho logos, or, translating literally: "With Whom for us the Word." We may compare this with John i. 1: Kai ho logos en pros ton theon, "And the Word was with the God". There is so much in common between John i. 1-5 and Heb. i., which we must consider later, that we are compelled to ask why Heb. iv. 13 should not be accepted literally:

> "For the word of God is quick and powerful . . . . . all things are naked and opened in the eyes of Him, with Whom for us is the Word."

The argument in Hebrews concerning Christ is much the same as that of John. Heb. iv. 14-16 follows the reference to the Word that was "with" God (pros) by an encouraging statement concerning the sympathy of Him, Who has now passed through the heavens to the place where He was before. However, we must leave this very intricate point, and turn to the wider consideration of the distinctive meaning of the preposition pros.

It has been pointed out by others that pros is used very much with the verbs lego, laleo, etc., meaning "to speak". One very common translation of pros is "to"—as for example, "He brought him to Jesus" (John i. 42). It is also sometimes translated "toward" as in Eph. ii. 7. "Unto" is also a very common translation, as in John i. 29, and occasionally we meet with "for", as in the sentence: "If ye have any word of exhortation for the people, say on" (Acts xiii. 15).

A very suggestive rendering is found in John xiii. 28: "Now no man at the table knew for what intent He spake this unto Him." Observe also the usage of pros in the following passages:

> "The Pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself" (Luke xviii. 11).
> "They reasoned with themselves" (Luke xx. 5).
> "We have peace with God" (Rom. v. 1).
> "What communion hath light with darkness?" (II Cor. vi. 14).

Now we could easily "prove" that pros in Luke xx. 5 implies at least two separate persons—"They reasoned with themselves"; but can we discover two people in Luke xviii. 11: "He prayed with himself"? Until we can, let us not be deceived by the show of wisdom that would argue about two separate individuals in John i. 1, because the passage reads "The Word was with God." Man faces a mystery when he faces his own nature. How much more, then, when he is confronted with a revelation that touches upon the nature of God!

We may perhaps catch a glimpse of the meaning of John i. 1 by looking at the last reference in the list above. As II Cor. vi. indicates, there can be no possible communion between light and darkness. We know that God is light, and that the Word was both light and life—and so the Word was "with" God.

We can no more introduce separate personalities into John i. 1 than we can into Luke xviii. 11 or Rom. vii. 15-25. Moreover, we trust that no one will object to the argument that uses the nature of man as a guide to the nature of God, for the Scriptures themselves endorse this viewpoint. Man was made in the image and likeness of his Creator, and in the realm of grace the "new man" is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him (Col. iii. 10). Even with regard to the natural man, Paul could write:

> "For what man knoweth the things of man, save the spirit of man which is in him? Even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God" (I Cor. ii. 11).

Man is a triune being, and is still a mystery to himself. He is but a faint adumbration of the ideal Being, God Himself, and it is surely unbecoming for him to attempt to "explain" the nature of the Divine Essence, when he himself has to confess that he cannot set forth, without the aid of metaphysics, what he discerns regarding even his own personality. We can at least appreciate something of the intention behind the choice of "pros" in John i. 1, when we remember how we use the same idea among ourselves, without any suggestion of physical proximity. It is our joy occasionally to receive a letter from a reader whose face we have never seen, perhaps from the ends of the earth, and we certainly have no "problem" of interpretation when he writes concerning our witness for the rightly divided Word, that though separated from us by several thousand miles, he is nevertheless "with" us in our witness.

#8. The Word was God (i. 1).
pp. 44 - 48

We now come to the third statement in John i. 1:

> "And the Word was God—Kai Theos en ho logos."

We have already seen that man, in his effort to find some explanation of the universe, and some sort of mediator between things seen and unseen, got as far as giving that mediating something the name of the Logos, though without realizing that the Logos was a Person. We now come to the word Theos, the Greek equivalent for "God".

The following quotation from Dr. Bullinger's Greek Lexicon will give some idea of the word's derivation:

> "Theos, God.—A name reclaimed from the heathen, and used in the N.T. for the true God. Various derivations, ancient and modern, have been proposed, but it is nearly certain that its origin is from the East and comes from the Sanscrit root, DIU-S (pronounced dyus), which means (1) masc.: fire, the sun, (2) fem.: a ray of light, day (Hence Lat. Dies (fem. day), (3) neut.: the sky, heaven."

The translation of the Hebrew Scriptures known as the Septuagint, adopted the word Theos as the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew Elohim but, with a few exceptions, the singular Theos is used to translate the plural Elohim.

> "The Talmudists themselves were so persuaded of a plurality expressed in the word Elohim as to teach that the LXX interpreters did purposely change the notion . . . . . lest Ptolemy Philadelphus should conclude that the Jews had a belief in polytheism" (Allix).

The N.T. follows the same procedure, and retains the singular Theos for the plural Elohim. Both the LXX and the N.T. frequently use Theos for Jehovah, as for example in Matt. iv. 4, which cites Deut. viii. 3.

It should be noted that all the best texts omit the word Theos in Mark xii. 32. Instead of "There is but one God", the passage should read:

> "There is but ONE (Jehovah, namely, which is the word used in Deut. vi. 4 but for which the Greek language supplied no equivalent term), and there is none other but He" (Parkhurst).

We are thankful that we live in a day when revelation is complete, and we can see the full truth as presented by the books of both Covenants. If we were shut up exclusively to the Greek N.T. we might frame an argument as to the nature of the Godhead that would stress the singular use of Theos. On the other hand, if we had only the Hebrew O.T. we might stress unduly the plural use of Elohim. With both testaments before us we have the complete truth, and this alone brings harmony.

Before we attempt to consider the nature of God, however, let us think for a moment of one or two statements concerning ourselves as they would be regarded by a being of another order.

> "They two shall be one flesh. This is a great mystery" (Eph. v. 31, 32).
> "God created man in His Own Image, in the Image of God created He him; male and female create He them" (Gen. i. 26, 27).
> "And called their name Adam, ... and Adam lived an hundred and thirty years, and begat a son . . . . ." (Gen. v. 1-3).

We can well imagine beings of another order, when faced with these statements, dividing up into opposing camps, and framing theologies and creeds, which would simply demonstrate their lack of true knowledge. We shall make no such attempts in our studies here. Humanly devised terms may be useful when they relate to matters within our cognizance, but they are almost sure to be misleading and the cause of bitterness and controversy, when used of things outside our ken.

We are told by John that "the Word was God". If John himself had any difficulties or problems with regard to this statement, he has not told us of them. No explanation is offered. We are expected to believe the revelation given, because the One Who speaks is true, and we are also expected to examine His words to discover all the meaning in them of which they are capable. We do not hesitate, therefore, to enquire:

(1) Why the order of the words is the reverse of the usual one and
(2) Why the word Theos is without the article.

(1) The order of the words.—In the second sentence the original is as follows:

> Ho logos en pros ton Theon ("The Word was toward the God").

In the third sentence, however, the order of the words is reversed:

> Kai Theos en ho logos ("And God was the Word").

This change of order is an example of the figure called in Greek Hyperbaton ("To step over") and in English "Transposition".

> "Special attention is desired for some particular word. Placed in its ordinary and usual position, it may not be noticed. But, put out of its usual and placed at the beginning, instead of at the end of a sentence, it is impossible for the reader not to be arrested by it" (Dr. Bullinger's Figures of Speech).

The particular word brought into prominence in this case is Theos. The figure therefore emphasizes the fact that the One Who is revealed under the title Ho Logos is Himself truly and essentially "God".

With a few exceptions, we may tell which is the subject or the predicate of a sentence by the presence or absence of the article. In all three clauses here it is "The Word" that is the subject:

> "THE WORD."—He it is Who was in the beginning.
> "THE WORD."—He it is Who was with God.
> "THE WORD."—He it is Who was God.

Parallel with this last form of expression is that found in John iv. 24: Pneuma ho Theos. Literally, this would be "Spirit the God", but if we render it so that the English reader will get the same effect as the original would give to a Greek, we should have: "God is (as to His essence) SPIRIT" (not, "a spirit"). So in John i. 1: "The Word was (as to His essence) GOD" (not "a god").

(2) The absence of the article.—There are some who would translate John i. 1: "The Word was a God", because Theos is without the article. The following references, however, all of which occur in the prologue of John's Gospel, will be enough to show the incorrectness of such a translation.

> "There was a man sent from a God" (verse 6).
> "Power to become children of a God" (verse 12).
> "Which were born of a God" (verse 13).
> "No man hath seen a God at any time" (verse 18).

The last reference, from verse 18, corresponds with that of verse 1, as is seen by the structure:

> "The Word was God" (as to His substance or essence).
> "No man hath seen God" (as to His substance or essence).

A similar usage of the article, or rather of its absence, is found in verse 14: "The Word was made flesh." It would be manifestly absurd to translate this "The Word was made a flesh".

The word Theos is used of God in the Scriptures in three different ways:

(1) Essentially, as in John iv. 24: "God is Spirit."
(2) Personally, as of the Father: "God the Father" (Gal. i. 1).
Personally, as of the Son: "Unto the Son, He saith . . . . . O God" (Heb. i. 8).
Personally, as of the Spirit: "The Holy Ghost . . . . . God" (Acts v. 3, 5).
(3) Manifestly, as of the Word: "The Word was God" (John i. 1).

In the narrative section of the Gospel John seizes many opportunities to bring into prominence the controversy concerning the Deity of Christ. These passages will come before us in their order, as we follow the exposition of the Gospel, but there are three that most readers will call to mind, that seem to carry the theme forward from argument and hostility to adoration and worship:

(1) "Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill Him, because He not only had broken the sabbath, but said also that God was His Father, making Himself equal with God" (John v. 18).

(2) "I and My Father are one. Then the Jews took up stones to stone Him . . . . . Thou, being a man, makest Thyself God" (John x. 30-33).
(3) "Thomas answered and said unto Him, my Lord and my God" (John xx. 28).

We have already seen that it is the object of this Gospel to expand and prove the truth revealed in the prologue (John i. 1-18), and we shall hope to deal in detail with the passages quoted above as we come to them in the course of our exposition.

#9. "The Life was the Light of Men" (i. 4).
pp. 116 - 122

Our studies up till now have been occupied with the prologue in general (John i. 1-18), and in particular with its opening verse. The majestic simplicity of this opening verse seems to call for worship rather than further scrutiny, and we therefore proceed with our study, without attempting to explain that which lies outside our sphere. Whatever may be the name under which He is revealed, God must always be made known to us relatively. We must always remember that the words used are symbols and not the realities themselves. The great object of the Scriptures is not to make us theologians (though the day is coming when we shall "know even as we are known"), but to teach us our own need and God's provision for it, in view of the future day of glory. We believe the statements of John i. 1 without reserve, but this does not mean that we have comprehended the mystery of the Godhead. If John had been inspired to devote several chapters to the exposition of this opening verse, we should have been delighted to follow in his steps, but he has not done so. He leads us from the height of uncreated glory in verse 1 to the "glory as of the only begotten of the Father" in verse 14, and then he travels back again to the closing verse of the prologue, where the introduction of the title "Father" seems to supply the missing feature that we were perhaps unconsciously waiting for as we read the statement of John i. 1.

After the opening reference to the Person of the Creator, John moves on in verse 3 to His work: "All things were made by Him." Then, by a beautiful transition, the writer suggests that what "life" is to the physical creation, "light" must be in the new creation; and so we reach the central point of the prologue (verses 10-13), where some "received Him not", and some "received Him". The narrative then commences its return ascent, placing the new creation of verse 17 over against the material creation of verse 3, and so back to the starting-point, the declaring of God by Him Whom in the beginning was the Word, and Who, since the incarnation, has been made known as "the Son". We shall look in vain in the subsequent story as it is developed in this Gospel, for any further explanation of the title "The Word", and we shall learn nothing further concerning the physical creation of "all things". Instead, we shall be led step by step, from one sign to another, to the great objective of the Gospel, that we might believe that "Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing we might have life through His name". We are led, in effect, from the contemplation of Him, in Whom our physical life is found, to Him in Whom alone we may find that life which is age-abiding.

With these preliminary remarks, we must now take up our study at John i. 2, remembering amidst all the wealth of detail that thin red line of redeeming love, that not only binds the opening and closing verses of the prologue together (John i. 1 and 18), but runs through the whole Gospel, revealing that He Who made all things is "Love", and that in the fulness of time He gave His all on our behalf.

Had verse 3 been a direct continuation from verse 1, we might have been uncertain as to whether the phrase: "All things were made by Him" referred to Theos, "God" or Logos, "the Word". Verse 2, however, makes it clear that the reference is to "the Word".

A literal translation of John i. 3 would read: "All things through Him became, and apart from Him became not one thing that has become." We may not approve of this as a piece of English, but it has the merit of forcing the reader to perceive, in the insistent use of the verb ginomai, the intended contrast between the Creator, and all things that He has created. Ginomai in verse 3 means "to become", as in Acts xii. 18—"What was become of Peter". The word is also often used in the sense of "to make" as in John i. 3; and "to come to pass", "to happen", "to be born" (Gal. iv. 4). Ginomai is essentially a word that denotes origin, and such words as "generations", "beget", "parent", are derived from it. In contrast with ginomai, we have the verb eimi, "to be", which meets us in John i. 1 and 2. The reader will perhaps appreciate the contrast better if we turn to John viii. 58:

> "Verily, verily, I say unto you, before Abraham came into being (ginomai), I am (ego eimi)."

The Jews fully understood what such words portended. Such a claim they regarded as "blasphemy" (John x. 31-33), and we read that they took up stones to stone Him (John viii. 59).

There must always be a fundamental distinction between the One Who can say "I am" (John viii. 58), the One Who was "in the beginning", and all who have come into being (ginomai) as finite creatures. Further on in our study of this prologue, we shall discover that, after the Word was made flesh, the word ginomai is used of Him. This, however, we must leave to be dealt with later in the present series.

We saw, in our introductory articles, that each Gospel has its own point of view, and it is interesting to notice that John is the only one of the four evangelists to put forward the claim represented by John i. 3. Paul also has his own particular point of view, and it is enlightening to compare the way in which he refers to the same truth. Where John says "All things were made by Him", Paul writes—in Colossians—"All things were created by Him". John leaves the expression "all things" without further expansion, but Paul, whose theme is Christ as the Head of the Church, and the glory of the dispensation of the Mystery, expands the thought of the creation of all things, and speaks of "things that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible".

Moreover, in harmony with his theme in Colossians—the sphere of blessing belonging to the Mystery—he continues: "Whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers; all things were created by Him, and for Him" (Col. i. 16).

Where John speaks of Christ as "the Word", Paul speaks of Him as "the Image of the invisible God". Moreover the reader will notice that, while John defers the title "The Only-begotten of the Father" until the Word is "made flesh", Paul goes back to the beginning and speaks of Him then as "the Firstborn of every creature".

In his epistle to the Hebrews, the Apostle refers to the Lord and creation in yet another set of terms. He speaks of Christ as "The express image of His person"—or "The external and manifest character of His unseen substance" (Heb. i. 3)—and also refers to the earth, whose foundation He had laid, and the heaven, which His hands had made. The Apostle speaks of these things as being transient and destined to vanish away, so as to enforce the necessary lesson that Christ "remaineth", a lesson which was much needed by the Hebrews, as they saw all that they had regarded as most vital (the law, the priesthood, the sacrifices, the temple) vanish away. Every book of the Bible resolves itself at last into some fresh aspect of the Person and Work of Christ.

The observant reader will have noticed that when Augustine quotes John i. 1-4 in his Confessions (an extract from which we cited in the third article of this series), he divides verses 3 and 4 in a way which differs a little from that found in the A.V. Instead of the A.V. rendering:

> "All things were made by Him, and without Him was not anything made that was made. In Him was life, etc.," he reads:

> "All things were made by Him, and without Him was nothing made: that which was made by Him is life."

This rendering is placed in the R.V. margin. Rotherham, on the other hand, adopts this reading, and puts the A.V. punctuation in the margin, while Alford cites John's usage and gives grammatical reasons for retaining the A.V. rendering. Webster and Wilkinson comment as follows:

> "Many of the ancient commentators place the period at hen (one), thus reading, ho gegonen en hauto zoe en—'Whatever hath come into being derives its origin and existence from Him'."

Whatever punctuation we may at length accept, the meaning of the Apostle remains unchanged. Just as Paul could say that "in Him we live, and move, and have our being", so John reveals, that in Him, Who was the Word, and Who at the incarnation was made known as the Only-begotten of the Father, was life. And then, transferring his thought from the physical realm to the spiritual, he translates "life" into terms of "light" and says "The life was the light of men".

Just as God divided the light from the darkness in Gen. i., so we read in John i.:

"And the light shineth in darkness; and the darkness comprehended it not" (John i. 5).

The word "comprehend" here is a translation of katalambano, from kata, an intensive, and lambano, "to take". In the middle voice, it is rightly translated "comprehend", as in Eph. iii. 18; but where it occurs in the active or passive, its meaning is "to grasp", "to seize", "to overtake". So in John viii. 3, 4: "Taken in adultery", or in John xii. 35: "Lest the darkness come upon you." And, in I Thess. v. 4: "But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief."

Some read John i. 5 as though the thought were that the darkness did not "overpower" or "hold down" the light. The primary meaning "to grasp", however, seems to be the most fitting here: "The darkness did not grasp it." Physical darkness is dispersed immediately the light shines, but spiritual and mental darkness is more like a dense fog, that remains obscure and dark even though the light of the sun be actually shining. That this is the writer's meaning seems clear from verse 11: "He came to His own, but His own received (paralambano) Him not."

The sudden transition to the ministry of John the Baptist in verse 6, shows that John is not concerned with the question of the physical realm of life and light, but is using the analogy of creation to enforce the truth of spiritual things. That this is so is confirmed by the structure of the passage (John i. 1-18), which was set out in Volume XXIX, page 174.

C | i. 3. All things were made by Him (Egeneto dia).
C | i. 17. Grace and truth came by Jesus Christ (Egeneto dia).

Christ is the Originator in both realms. He is the Spring and Source, both of physical life and light, and of spiritual grace and truth.

While we have this outline before us, let us notice further that verse 4: "In Him was life; and the life was the light of men", is balanced by verse 16: "Out of His fulness have all we received." The later verse is really an expansion of the spiritual principle of the earlier one.

When the prologue is concluded, John returns once more to the witness of John the Baptist and this time deals with it in detail (verses 19-36), focusing our attention on the great purpose for which he came—namely, that the Messiah should be made manifest to Israel (John i. 31).

In the prologue itself, instead of referring to the Lamb of God, or the Messiah of Israel, John keeps to the Logos theme and speaks of "life" and "light". He tells us in verse 7 that John the Baptist was sent "to bear witness of that Light, that all men through him (i.e. John the Baptist's witness) might believe". The same scrupulous care that differentiated between the Word Who "was", and all creation that "became", is evident again in verse 8, where our attention is drawn to the fact that John "was not that Light". Later on in this Gospel we read of John the Baptist that "he was a burning and a shining light" (John v. 35), but the word "light" here is not phos, "light itself", but luchnos, "a lamp". The distinction is similar to that found in Gen. i., where "light" in verse 3 is or, while the word for "lights" in verse 14 (referring to the Sun and Moon) is maor, "a light-holder".

Another very beautiful illustration of the character of John's service is found in verse 23 (John i.). Christ Himself is described as "the Word"; John on the other hand, describes himself as "a voice" (verse 23). What greater service can one render than that which is expressed in this verse? To be a voice to make the Word known, a lamp through which His light may shine, a finger raised to point out the Lamb of God. Such a ministry would lead those who came under its influence to leave the testifier and follow the One testified to. As we read in John iii. 30: "He must increase, but I must decrease."

In verse 8: "He was sent to bear witness of that light", the preposition peri ("concerning") is used. The reader will call to mind many words in our own language that begin with these four letters—for example, "perimeter" meaning "circumference"; "period", a cycle of time; and "periphrasis", a roundabout form of speech. The idea in John i. 8 is that Christ was the centre around which John's ministry revolved. His witness was "concerning" Him.

There has been much dispute over the Apostle's meaning in verse 9.

> "That was the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world."

The crux of the problem is the verb "cometh". Does this refer to "every man" or to "the true light"? J. N. Darby's translation and note are worth quoting as a contribution here:

> "The true light was that which, coming into the world, lightens every man."
> "Or, 'is light to every man'. Not 'enlightens' but 'sheds its light upon'. Not, I judge, 'every man coming', in spite of the ancients. 'Comer into the world' is a Rabbinical expression for 'man', but this refers to the incarnation as ver. 10 shews. The Fathers' view of it was Platonism which John refutes in every point. The introduction of anthropon makes the citing the Rabbinical expression as an argument for the interpretation 'every one coming into the world' a mistake: for the Rabbis use 'Comers into the word' as equivalent to 'men'."

The Lord's own testimony, as given in John xiii. 46, seems conclusive here:

> "I am come a light into the world, that whosoever believeth on Me should not abide in darkness."

Or, in John iii. 19:

> "And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather light, because their deeds were evil."

A man may be in the light, and yet be unenlightened. Darkness can fail to grasp the light, even though it be shining as brightly as the sun. A glance at the structure confirms this meaning, for the word erchomenon, "cometh" is balanced by eskenosen, "dwelt", both words referring to the incarnation, the coming into the world of "the Word made flesh".

We now reach the central member of the prologue, the great dividing of the ways. This we shall hope to deal with in our next article.

#10. Revelation, and its reception or rejection (i. 10-13).
pp. 147 - 152

We have now descended by a series of six steps, from the "beginning", down through the fact of creation, and the vital function of light, to the witness of John the Baptist in connection with the true light that "came into the world". The seventh step (see the structure of the prologue, Volume XXIX, page 174) leads us to the great issue of "reception" or "rejection".

If "revelation" is to prove effective it must be "received"; otherwise it is stultified. The very object for which the Lord came into the world would be rendered void by unbelief. If it were true that not one believer had ever existed or would exist, then the whole scheme of revelation and redemption would have come to an abrupt end. Blessed be God, this has never been the case, and His purpose therefore goes on. It is good for us, however, to visualize the negative side for a moment, if only that we may appreciate more fully the place that faith occupies in the Divine plan. Just as there can be no selling if there be no buyer, no music if there be no listener, no colour if there be no retina, so there can be no revelation if there be no reception. God could have spoken, of course, but the only result would have been a series of echoes down the corridors of time.

Turning back to the structure of the passage, we find that the verses before us occupy a central position and are concerned with the question of receiving and rejecting.

G | i. 10, 11. RECEIVED NOT (Paraelabon).
G | i. 12, 13. RECEIVED (Elabon).

The reader should note carefully the difference between verses 10 and 11. In the earlier verse we read: "He was in the world, and the world was made by Him, and the world knew Him not." This does not refer to the birth at Bethlehem, but to the fact that the Creator, though "in the world" in His providence and made manifest by the works of His hands to every seeing eye, was nevertheless unknown—"The world knew Him not." A similar thought is expressed by the Apostle in Acts xiv.

> "The living God, Which made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all things are therein . . . . . He left not Himself without witness, in that He did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness" (Acts xiv. 15-17).

Yet, in spite of all this outpouring of underserved "goodness", the world knew Him not.

The revelation of God in creation is again referred to in Rom. i.:

> "For the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead, so that they are without excuse. When they knew God . . . . . they did not like to retain God in their knowledge" (Rom. i. 20, 21, 28).

To come back to John i.—the Apostle, in verse 11, leaves creation (verse 10)—what the Word "was" and "made" and goes on to the incarnation—what the Word "became": "He came unto His own, and His own received Him not" (John i. 11).

> "In the world He WAS"—En to kosmo en.
> "Unto His own He CAME"—Eis ta idia elthe.

The expression "His own" comes twice in verse 11 and is repeated in the A.V. without alteration. There is, however, a difference in the original that is intended and should be noted. The first occurrence—"He came unto His own" is ta idia (neuter) while the second occurrence—"His own received Him not" is hoi idioi (masculine). The same Greek word is used in John xix. 27 and in Acts xxi. 6, and Moulton gives a number of references to the use of this term in the Papyri. The latter also illustrates the use of the masculine hoi idioi for "one's relations".

When Christ was born at Bethlehem "He came to His own", for the land was peculiarly His: "The land shall not be sold for ever, for the land is Mine" (Lev. xxv. 23). When Christ came to Jerusalem, He again "came unto His own", for this city is spoken of by Daniel as "Thy city", "The city which is called by Thy Name" (Dan. ix. 16, 18). When Christ came to Israel, also, "He came unto His own", for of the people of Israel we read: "The Lord Thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto Himself" (Deut. vii. 6).

The word "receive" in verse 11 is parelabon, and, following the reference to His coming to His own, implies an offer which they would not "accept". Dr. Weymouth translates the word "gave Him no welcome". In verse 12 the word "receive" is simply elabon, which is parallel with "believe" at the end of the same verse.

If the Lord's "own people" who "received Him not" are Israel, who, then, are those who did receive Him? If we reply that those who received Him were "some of Israel", it would seem that the statement of verse 11 is too sweeping. There was certainly a remnant of believers throughout the Acts that were of Israel, but at Acts xxviii. it became manifest that "His own" people as a whole would not receive Him. The other Gospels lead the reader step by step to the crisis of the Lord's rejection. John, on the other hand, places it in his prologue, and the whole Gospel is written with the previous knowledge that Israel had failed. John speaks of "the world", and of "other sheep" that must be sought, and his witness is related to the revelation that had already been made in Paul's epistles.

We read in John i. 12 that to those who did receive Him, the Lord gave "power to become the sons of God". The words "power" and "sons" here need a little revision. The word translated "power" is exousia, from exesti, "lawful". For example, in John v.: "It is not lawful for thee to carry thy bed" (John v. 10). A little further on in the same chapter we meet with exousia: "And hath given Him authority to execute judgment also, because He is the Son of Man" (John v. 27). The word is in constant use—for example, "one under authority" (Matt. vii. 29), "By what authority?" (Matt. xxi. 23). It is often translated "power", as in the phrase "principalities and powers" (Eph. i. 21), and "prince of the power of the air" (Eph. ii. 2). The last occurrence in the N.T. is in Rev. xxii. 14: "That they may have right to the tree of life." It is not a question of "power" in John i. 12, but of "right" or "authority". When Israel as a nation was set aside, the Lord gave to all believers, irrespective of nationality, the "right" or "authority" to become "children of God".

The word for "sons" also needs revision. There are two possible words which may be translated "son"—huios and teknos. Huios occurs in John i. 18: "The only begotten Son", and with thesia forms the word translated "adoption"—"to be given the standing and dignity of the heir". The word used in John i. 12, is not huios but teknos. In his epistles John uses huios twenty-four times, but never in connection with the believer. The familiar words of I John iii.: "That we should be called the sons of God . . . . . Now are we the sons of God", are not a correct translation. In both cases the word used is teknos, "a child". On the other hand, the familiar title "The children of Israel" should read: "The sons of Israel." Sonship (or "adoption") belongs on earth to Israel (Rom. ix. 1-4). When Israel failed (Acts xxviii.), the Lord did not give those to whom John ministered Israel's sonship, but rather the right to be called "the children of God".

John uses the word teknon in chapter xi. of his Gospel, where the Lord speaks of "the children of God that were scattered abroad" (xi. 52). It is clear in this passage that those called "children" were outside the nation of Israel, for we read: "And not for that nation only, but that He should gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad". Those who receive this wonderful privilege are described in John i. as those that have "believed on His name" (John i. 12). The thought of the "name" in Scripture is a most important one. The "name of the Lord" symbolizes His nature. When the infant Christ was born, He received two names:

(1) "Thou shalt call His name JESUS; for He shall save His people from their sins."
(2) "They shall call His name EMMANUEL, which being interpreted, is 'God with us'." (Matt. i. 21, 23).

It will be observed that both names have a definite meaning, and the interpretation is given.

From the way in which John uses the "name" in John xx. 31 it would appear to sum up the Lord's whole Messianic character:

"But these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing, ye might have life through His name."

In the great prayer of John xvii., there is a fourfold emphasis on the Father's name.

A | 6. Thy name manifested to those given out of the world.
B | 11. Keep through Thine own name those given.
I am no more in the world.
B | 12. Kept in Thy name.
While with them in the world.
A | 25, 26. Thy name declared. The world hath not known Thee.

To appreciate fully the significance of the "name" we must know something of the conditions and customs in O.T. times. When law and order were not sustained by the same legal machinery as at present, a man in trouble "called on the name" of his kinsman. And so we find (in the Psalm of the name) the "name" of the Lord as something in which the believer can take refuge:

"The name of the God of Jacob defend thee" (xx. 1).
"In the name of our God will we set up our banners" (xx. 5).
"Some trust in chariots and some in horses; but we will remember the name of the Lord our God" (xx. 7).

Applying all this to John i., we may say that those who "received Him" and "believed on His name", accepted Him in all the fulness of what His name represented—both as the Word (His name "in the beginning"), and as "Jesus Christ", His name when "the Word was made flesh".

The word translated "on" in the expression "believe on His name" here, is eis and literally means "unto". This word usually indicates the believing of a person; the fuller word epi ("upon") denotes trust, which is a step in advance of John i. 12.

In verse 13 we read:

"Which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God" (John i. 13).

It is interesting to enquire whether this verse completes the statement of verse 12, or introduces the glorious doctrine of verse 14. As the A.V. rendering stands, the words "were born", being plural, must necessarily refer to those that believe, whose new birth is entirely dissociated from "bloods"—that is to say "ancestry"—and from the "will of the flesh", and the "will of man". Griesbach, however, has called attention to a different reading. Instead of Hoi . . . . . egennethesan, he reads Hos . . . . . egennethe, "Who was not begotten of blood . . . . . but of God". This reading would mean that verse 13 refers to Christ.

The Companion Bible has the following note in connection with this verse:

"But antecedent to any ancient MSS, Irenaeus (A.D.178), Tertullian (A.D.208), Augustus (A.D.395) and other Fathers read 'Who was begotten' (Sing. not pl.), the hos, 'Who' agreeing with autou ('His name'. Gr. onoma autou, 'name of Him'). Verse 14 goes on to speak of the incarnation of Him Who was not begotten by human generation. The Latin Codex Veronensis (before Jerome's Vulgate) reads 'Qui . . . . . natus est'. Tertullian ascribes the reading of the Received Text to the artifice of the Valentinian Gnostics of the second and third centuries. See encyl. Brit. Eleventh (Camb.) edn. vol. 27, pp. 852-7."

It is evident from the above note, that Dr. Bullinger (who personally prepared the notes up to John x. before his death) believed "Who was begotten" to be the true reading. It is too late now for any one to express more than an opinion on this point. It would seem, however, that every word in verse 13 would apply more appropriately to Christ as "made flesh" than to "believers", for it would hardly seem necessary to say that a believer was not "born of the will of the flesh". In any case, no doctrinal truth is modified in the slightest degree, whichever reading we adopt. All we can say is that the proximity of the incarnation in verse 14, and the way in which verse 13 leads up to it, is an argument in favour of the reading found by Griesbach and adopted in The Companion Bible.

#11. The Word made flesh (i. 14). "The glory of the Only Begotten of the Father." pp. 177 - 181

The structure of the prologue to John's Gospel is rather like the letter V. It begins with a steady descent, from verse 1, until the lowest point is reached at verse 14; and the, from this point onwards there is a steady rise until the Son of God is "back where He was before". In our present study we have reached verse 14, where we have the marvelous words:

"And the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us, (and we beheld His glory, the glory was of the only begotten of the Father) full of grace and truth" (John i. 14).

It will be noticed that John makes no reference to the various features in connection with the actual birth of Christ, that are dwelt upon by Matthew and Luke. He does not even mention Mary, the mother of Christ, until the Lord is about to start His public ministry; and although Mary is mentioned ten times in the Gospel nothing is said of the virgin birth or of the fulfillment of prophecy at Bethlehem, except in a discussion among the Jews, who only knew that Christ had come from Galilee. It would seem that John purposely refrains from pointing out the fulfillment of O.T. Scripture—a very definite feature of Matthew's Gospel which was written particularly for those who knew the O.T.—and instead, brings before us one piece of evidence after another until we are forced by its sheer weight to say, with Thomas, "My Lord and my God". Thomas was not convinced by an appeal to O.T. Scripture that Jesus was the Christ, or that He was risen again. He was convinced by the testimony of his own senses.

> "Reach hither thy finger, and behold My hands; and reach hither thy hand and thrust it into My side: and be not faithless but believing" (John xx. 27).

In Nathaniel's case, too, the evidence was personal rather than scriptural. He was convinced that the Lord was the Son of God and the King of Israel, not by the fulfillment of O.T. prophecy, but by evidence of a purely personal character—"Because I said unto thee, I saw thee under the fig tree" (John i. 50). So here, in the prologue, John says nothing about the prophecy of Isa. vii. 14 that we find stressed in Matthew, and nothing about the revelation made by Gabriel to Mary that we find in Luke. He simply makes a statement of fact: "The Word was made flesh", and follows it by a personal testimony, "We beheld His glory". As we proceed in our study of the Gospel we trust that we too will be able to behold His glory, and gladly acknowledge that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God.

The occurrences of the word "flesh" in relation to Christ in the Synoptic Gospels are very few indeed. If the words of Matt. xxvi. 41 and Mark xiv. 38: "The flesh is weak" may be taken to be the Lord's words with reference to Himself and His physical weakness in the garden of Gethsemane, they constitute the only reference to His "flesh" found in those two Gospels, while Luke has only one reference, in xxiv. 29, where the risen Christ says: "A spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see Me have." Over against these three references in the Synoptic Gospels (or one reference only if those cited from Matthew and Mark are of doubtful application), we have seven references in John's Gospel, and three in his Epistles. The seven in the Gospel are iv. 14; and vi. 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56. The expansion of John i. 14 in vi. 51, where the Lord says: "The bread that I will give is My flesh, which I will give for the life of the world" shows the essential purpose of the incarnation. We have the same thought in Heb. x. 5: "Sacrifice and offering Thou wouldest not, but a body hast Thou prepared Me."

The three references in the epistles are I John iv. 2, 3 and II John 7. These references are in contexts of great solemnity.

> "Hereby know ye the spirit of God: every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God: and every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God" (I John iv. 2, 3).
> "For many deceivers are entered into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. This is a deceiver and an antichrist" (II John 7).

John uses two different tenses of the verb "to come" in these two epistles. In the earlier passage he is speaking of the historic fact, and so the verb is eleluthota, the perfect participle, meaning "has come". In II John 7, on the other hand, it is not in effect a question of time, and the present participle, erchomenon, is used. In the first passage it is a question of the historicity of the incarnation; in the second it is its possibility.

In the very early Church it was not so much the Deity of Christ that was the subject of attack, but rather His humanity. To-day the pendulum has swung over to the other extreme, and the "Humanists" have insisted so much on the essential humanity of Christ, that they have to obscure or even deny His equal Deity. Neither the Deity nor the humanity of Jesus Christ can be understood separately. They must be considered together. This essential unity is referred to in I John v. 8, the last clause of which should be rendered, "and the three are unto the one", viz., unto that unity which obtained between the humanity and Deity of the Son of God. It is also made very clear in Paul's epistles. In Rom. i. 3, for example, we read that the Lord was "made of the seed of David according to the flesh", while in Rom. viii. 3 the Apostle safeguards His sinlessness by saying that He came in "the likeness of sinful flesh". In the same epistle we find the strongest terms used in connection with His Deity:

> "Of Whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came, Who is over all God blessed unto the ages" (Rom. ix. 5).

Both in Ephesians and in Colossians we meet with references to "His flesh", and "the body of His flesh", while in Heb. ii. 14 we find that He Who is "God" and "Creator" in Heb. i. 8, 10 becomes a partaker of "flesh and blood".

Returning to John's Gospel, we find that there are six references to soma, "body", each referring to the Lord's physical body (John ii. 21; xix. 31, 38, 40; xx. 12). In John i. 1 where we read that "the Word was God" the verb is eimi, "to be", but in John i. 14: "The Word was made flesh", it is ginomai, "to become". The two verbs come together in John viii. 58, where the Lord says of Himself: "Before Abraham came into being (ginomai), I, I am (eimi)." In John i. 1 and 14 we have two modes of existence, but however much the mode may change, the Person remains. He was just as much the Word after His birth at Bethlehem as He was "in the beginning".

"and dwelt among us."—The word "dwelt" here is eskenosen from skene, a "tent", or "tabernacle". The word is allied to the Hebrew shaken, "to dwell as in a tabernacle", and gives us the expression—often used without recognition of its true meaning—"The Shekinah glory". Not only does the Apostle intend by the use of this word to indicate the transient character of this life, in which the Lord for thirty-three years shared (see II Cor. v. 1), but he is also referring to the tabernacle in the wilderness as a type of Christ. When we come to the second chapter of John, we shall find the Lord speaking also of the Temple as a figure of His body. Here it is the tabernacle. All that the tabernacle typified, with its mercy-seat, ark, light, shewbread, altar of incense, laver, brazen altar, and veil, was at length seen in reality in the "Word made flesh". The words "grace and truth" in verse 17 really signify "true grace" i.e. that which was real and antitypical, in contrast with the shadows of the law. This, however, we must deal with more fully when we come to the verses concerned.

The A.V. places in parenthesis the words:

> "And we beheld His glory, the glory as of the Only Begotten of the Father."

In the original, the reader is at once struck by the sudden vagueness of the words here, which read literally:

> "Glory as of an only begotten from a father."

The reader will find this noted in the R.V. margin, and in such revised translations as those of Rotherham, Darby, and Cunningham. The Apostle's intention seems to be:

> "We beheld His glory, a glory such as one would associate with one who was an only begotten of a father."

The word "father", while ultimately referring to God Himself, is used here in a general sense. The glory that was beheld by the wondering disciples was not the "glory" which the Saviour "had" with the Father "before the world was" (John xvii. 5), for that glory, which is yet to be unveiled and manifested (John xvii. 24), was, while the Saviour lived here and bore the likeness of sinful flesh, tempered and veiled. The "glory" referred to by the Apostle here in John i. 14 is rather the kind of glory that is compatible with the status of being an only begotten one of a father. He Who is Himself God, and Who had made the world, humbles Himself, and speaks of Himself as "The Sent One". He acknowledges that "My Father is greater than I", and that as "the Son" He has received power and authority from the Father. None of these acknowledgments, of course, in any way touch His Deity; they merely speak of the humble place that He was pleased to take when He was "made flesh".

We have no wish to take any part in the controversy concerning the Lord's Sonship that is wrecking one evangelical witness. The very terms used in this controversy are themselves unscriptural. Nowhere does Scripture say: "In the beginning was the Son." Only when the Word was made flesh, does His sonship appear. Such phrases, therefore, as the "Eternal Generations of the Son" we cannot regard as being scripturally sound.

The words "The only begotten", wherever they are used apart from Christ, always refer to a son or a daughter who has been begotten by a father. The words are used of Isaac (Heb. xi. 17), of the only son of the widow of Nain (Luke vii. 12), of the only daughter of Jairus (Luke viii. 42), and of the man whose only child was possessed of an evil spirit (Luke ix. 48). There is nothing unusual about the word monogenes. If we remove the word for "only" we have genes, which is intimately related to the words translated "begetting" (Matt. i. 2), "born" (Matt. i. 16), and "generation" (Matt. i. 1). If the "generation", the "birth", the "begetting" of Jesus Christ are thus attested by Scripture, who are we to put our hands to save the Ark of His Deity, by robbing Him of the glory of His perfect manhood and sonship?

We have said little about the virgin birth, for we are following the line of teaching given by John, but, lest any should misconstrue our silence, we affirm in passing our unwavering faith in the testimony of those Scriptures that insist upon the supernatural conception of the Son of God, His virgin birth and His untainted manhood.

A day is coming, when the Son shall be subject unto Him that subjected all things under Him, "that God may be all in all". We have no right here to read "that the Father may be all in all" for we must remember John's statement that "The Word was God".

The glorious manhood of Him Who came to be the Mediator and the Sacrifice for sin is vital to our hope and our peace. Let us beware lest, by using unscriptural language when speaking of “the Son”, we should be found denying that “Jesus Christ has come in the flesh”.

#4. The offering of Isaac.
Genesis xxii.
pp. 91, 92

We may consider this chapter from two different points of view:

(1) As a record of the testing of Abraham's faith.

(2) As typical of the work of Christ.

Let us consider each of these aspects in turn.

Abraham had been declared by the Lord to be righteous as far back as Gen. xv. 6, and Paul uses this passage in Rom. iv. as an argument for justification by faith. The apostle James, however, after alluding to the blessedness of enduring temptation or testing (i. 12), speaks of Abraham as being justified by works, when he had offered his son upon the altar (ii. 21-23), and says that the scripture was fulfilled, which spoke of his justification by faith in Gen. xv. 6. So with us all—in the lawcourt of the Lord—those who believe into Christ are legally and for ever justified and cannot possibly come into condemnation, but, having received this new life, they must demonstrate it by love and good works, apart from which they will fail of the enjoyment of peace with God, and also fail with regard to future reward. Abraham's obedience, or practical righteousness, fulfilled or manifested his imputed righteousness which he had by faith.

We must notice next the character of Abraham's testing and the nature of his obedience. His dearest possession, the one in whom all the promises of God to him were centred, was demanded from him without explanation. Heb. xi. 17-19 shows that Abraham's faith was in resurrection—the key to the Christian's victory. His obedience, also, was marked. He rose up early (verse 3) and started off unhesitatingly. Abraham was a man of keen susceptibilities and affection, but he possessed the love and faith which overcomes all, and puts God first. The result of this testing is seen in verses 16-18. So, in our own time, the believer who is willing to deny himself, and take up his cross and follow the Lord, will by no means lose his reward.

We now come to the second aspect of the passage—its typical teaching in relation to the work of Christ. The language used concerning Isaac in verse 2 sets forth very clearly the Lord as the only begotten and well-beloved Son of God; and the place—a mountain in the land of Moriah—at once calls to mind the spot where, years afterwards, David offered a sacrifice and purchased the site for the temple (II Chron. iii. 1). It also reminds us of the "hill called Calvary", where the Lord of glory died in the place of guilty sinners.

In verse 5 the phrase "I and the lad" is suggestive of the truth that that awful transaction on Calvary was between the Lord Jesus and His Father alone. In verse 7 we have “My Father” and “My Son”. True affection and tender complacency mark these words; even when He was charged with the guilt of His people, and smitten by the sword of Jehovah, the Lord Jesus was as much His Father’s delight as when He was with Him in glory before the world began.

Verse 8 was fulfilled when the Lamb of God was offered as a willing Sacrifice more than nineteen hundred years ago. What wonderful lessons we may learn here! The father offering up his only begotten and beloved son, and, at the same time, a foreshadowing of Israel, the Abraham of the nations, as the people who would be responsible for this awful deed.

In verses 11-13, the angel of the Lord intervenes and points out the “ram caught in a thicket”—another type of the Lord Himself as the One offered instead of Isaac. Every member of Israel’s race exists only on the basis of this great substitution, just as every sinner lives only because of the “instead” of Gal. iii. 20.

This chapter ends with the birth of Rebekah, Isaac’s destined bride (verse 23). The spiritual birthplace of the Bride of the Lamb is the death of Christ, just as Eve was taken from Adam during a deep sleep.

May we all seek to exhibit Abraham’s faith and obedience, and realize more fully the depths of grace manifested in the offering of Christ.

#5. Isaiah’s transforming Vision (Isa. vi.).
pp. 122 - 124

The historical setting of this vision is full of teaching. In II Chron. xxvi. 16-21 we get the sad story of King Uzziah—the story of a presumptuous man who dared to unite the offices of King and Priest. The uniting of these two offices will be the culminating sin of the Antichrist (II Thess. ii. 4), for the true Priest-King is the Messiah Himself (Psa. cx. 4). In the same year that King Uzziah died, Isaiah saw his vision of the One Who was rightly Priest and King, the Lord Jesus Himself (John xii. 41).

Verse 2.—The Seraphim are fully conscious of the holiness of Him Who sits on the throne. Their six wings are not used for flying in His service. Only two are needed for this, the remaining four being used to acknowledge the Holiness of the Lord: “With twain he covered his face, and with twain he covered his feet.” Prayer and worship precede true service.

Verse 3.—The message of Heaven is the Holiness of the Lord. To understand this, is to penetrate the mystery of the Great White Throne, the Lake of Fire, the Work of Calvary, and the Nature of Sin.

Verse 5.—As the believer nearer to the Lord, so will he feel more intensely his own depravity and the sin of others. Salvation does not in any way improve or eradicate the old nature.

Verse 6.—Those who speak of the Holiness of God, who use their wings in reverence and worship, are ready to apply the atonement for the cleansing of sin. The live coal speaks of a sacrifice consumed, and because of the sacrifice there is cleansing.

Verse 7.—The believer's sins are still called "iniquity" and "sin". There is no sanctification apart from the altar. The Spirit of God works along the line of Redemption.

Verse 8: ""Also I heard."—Unforgiven, unconfessed sin prevents hearing. Isaiah was about to be sent to those who neither saw nor heard (verse 10). He himself, by contrast, had both seen (verse 5) and heard (verse 8). Note also in this verse the Divine hint of the plurality of the Godhead: "Whom shall I send, and who will go for Us?"

Verse 9: "Go, and tell this people."—Isaiah had confessed that he was a "man of unclean lips", but the live coal had touched them and they are now to be used in the Lord's service.

Isaiah uses the expression: "Then said I" three times:

(1) "Then said I, woe is me."
(2) "Then said I, Here am I: send me."
(3) "Then said I, Lord, how long?"

We have here (1) a recognition of failure (2) a willingness for service, after cleansing and sanctification, and (3) a tender concern for the blinded, sinful, and doomed people.

In verses 12 and 13 the words: "But ye in it shall be a tenth" should be placed in brackets, the passage reading straight on from "land" to "and it shall return". In these verses we have the majority of Israel perishing, but Jehovah's portion—the tenth—brought safely through, and finally filling the face of the earth.

Dear fellow-believer, the Holiest of All is accessible to all the redeemed, by virtue of the blood of Christ. Draw near with a true heart, seek to keep a clear conscience, definitely confess your sins, and seek to hear the will of the Lord from above the Mercy Seat. If unsaved, have you ever thought of the holiness of God? His eyes cannot look upon sin. His holiness and wrath are alike a devouring fire to all that is sinful. By nature, we are all unclean, but the soul that seeks pardon through the precious blood is washed whiter than snow.

#14. The Charge of Majestas. Christ before Pilate.

The animosity of the Jewish rulers against the Lord is manifest quite early in the gospel narrative, but the fact that they were members of a subject nation, with Roman soldiers always on guard, prevented them from accomplishing the Saviour's destruction early in His public ministry. Even when the Sanhedrin had decided that the Lord must be apprehended, they were in some perplexity as to how to accomplish his arrest without causing a tumult or bringing down upon them the Roman soldiery. The way, however, was opened for them by the betrayal of Judas, and through his instrumentality they accomplished their fell designs.

According to Roman law there were three preliminary proceedings before trial was possible, namely arrest, warrant, and commitment. The authority for the Saviour's arrest was the Sanhedrin, the supreme Council of the Jews. The words of Matt. xxvi. 3: "Then assembled together the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders of the people, unto the palace of the high priest, who was called Caiaphas, and consulted that they might take Jesus by subtility, and kill Him" show that a full meeting of the Sanhedrin was behind the order for arrest. Rome recognized this body, which had full powers within its own province. That the Sanhedrin were fully conscious of their rights is evident from the fact that they applied to the Roman Procurator Pontius Pilate for a band of soldiers to assist in the arrest.

> "Judas then, having received a band of men (spiera here means a cohort of soldiers, as in Matt. xxvii. 27) and officers from the chief priests and Pharisees, cometh thither with lanterns and torches and weapons" (John xviii. 3).

This cohort was under the command of a "captain" (chiliarchos), which means that there were more than a hundred men; otherwise they would have been under a centurion. The Sanhedrin were evidently taking no risks. In addition to the Roman soldiers there were also the "officers from the chief priests and scribes", called by John apparitors. Luke, with his usual accuracy and Roman view-point, calls these leaders stratigoi tou hieron, "officers of the temple" (Luke xxii. 4, 52). They have already appeared in John xvii. 32, 45, and appear again in Acts v. 22-26. This civil guard formed the Temple "police force', but it was inadequate to deal with an uproar of the people. It was the usual custom for a full military force to be available at the Passover, on account of the tumults that often arose with such throngs of fanatical people gathered in one place. The force concerned in this case was indeed a formidable one for the arrest of one unarmed Man, but the officers of the temple had heard Him speak and had seen exhibitions of His authority and power, and they were not to be fully trusted by the Sanhedrin at this critical hour. There was a momentary exhibition of the Lord's majesty in the garden of Gethsemane, when the guard were sent backward to the ground, but after this evidence that He was a voluntary prisoner—a fact which is important in connection with the doctrinal aspect of the Lord's death, and one which is too often forgotten—He yielded Himself to the custody of the cohort and the officers, who bound Him and led Him away to Annas. This procedure was in accordance with the law. The accused had to be brought at once before a magistrate, and provided with safe lodging until the opportunity for trial presented itself. Meanwhile he had to be examined, and if there were not sufficient grounds for his detention, he was discharged. If, on the other hand, there seemed to be adequate evidence against him, he was committed for trial.

Much of the Jewish side of the Lord's trial was illegal according to their own laws. According to the Mishna, the examination of witnesses by night was illegal, and capital trials could only be conducted during the day. If the accused was acquitted, sentence had to be pronounced on the same day, but if he was condemned, the sentence had to be postponed to a second day. Hence capital trials could not take place on the day before a Sabbath or a Feast Day. The action of the judges in seeking witnesses was also wrong, and no witness for the defence was brought forward, as there should have been. Finally, it was illegal to condemn an accused person upon his own confession.

> "A process begun, continued, and apparently finished in the course of one night, commencing with witnesses against the accused who were sought by the judges, but whose evidences was not sustained even by them; continuing by interrogations which Hebrew law does not sanction; and ending with a demand for confession which its doctrines expressly forbid . . . . . such a process had neither the form nor the fairness of a judicial trial" (A. T. Innes. "The trial of Jesus Christ").

As Judæa was at this time a Roman Province, the Sanhedrin had lost the right to pass sentence of death. Such a sentence was ultra vires—

> "It is not lawful for us to put any man to death" (John xviii. 31).

In general, the Roman rulers were wise, and, provided that a people were quiet, and paid tribute, and remained loyal, a large margin of liberty and self-government was allowed. Judæa, however, by reason of the stubborn adherence of the Jews to the worship of God and their opposition to all forms of idolatry, had to be governed with a tight rein, and the Sanhedrin's power was therefore considerably reduced.

Seeing, then, that the council of the Jews were powerless to carry out their wishes, it was necessary that they should obtain the Roman Governor's approval. There were two courses open to him. He could either give his approval without enquiry, which was what the Jews wanted; or he could open the case again, and hold a re-cognito. At first Pilate seemed quite willing to endorse without enquiry, saying:

> "Take Him yourselves, and judge Him according to your law" (John xviii. 31).

This, however, did not suit the Jews, for they desired His death. The charge, therefore, was changed from that of blasphemy, with which Pilate had nothing to do, to treason, which immediately placed him under an obligation, as the Emperor's representative, to re-open the trial.

Majestas was an offence against the state—corresponding to "high treason" or "Lese-majesty" in English law—and was punishable either by interdiction from fire or water, or by death. Under Tiberius, the Emperor living at the time of the crucifixion, the law had become a means of oppression.

> "The most trifling act of disrespect to the Emperor or even to his statue, even the sale of his statue, or melting it down, would bring a man whenever it was so desired, under the penal clauses of these statutes."*

With this fact in mind, one can well understand that when the Jews cried:

> "If thou let this Man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend; everyone that maketh himself a king, speaketh against Cæsar" (John xix. 12).

Pilate would hesitate. At an early hour in the morning, the Chief Priests and the Council clamoured for an audience with the Procurator (John xviii. 28), and the Saviour was again bound and delivered to Pilate.

We now come to the Arraignment. Pilate asks the formal question, "What accusation bring ye against this man?" (John xviii. 29). The Jews at first evade the question by answering:

> "If He were not an evil doer, we should not have delivered Him up to thee" (John xviii. 30).

This however, is too vague for a Roman judge to deal with, and like Gallio, Pilate dismisses the case with the words, "Take ye Him and judge Him according to your law". But this did not suit the Sanhedrin, and a formal charge that would compel Pilate's serious attention is therefore made.

> "They began to accuse Him, saying, We found this fellow:
> (1) Perverting the nation:
> (2) Forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar:
> (3) Saying that He Himself is Christ, a King" (Luke xxiii. 2).

[NOTE: * - All quotations in this article and most technical points, unless otherwise indicated, are from the works of Septimus Buss.]

The first charge—that of "perverting the nation"—was too vague. Was it "perversion" from the Jewish point of view, or from the Roman? And if the Roman, what act could be cited that had actually been witnessed? The second charge, if it could have been substantiated, would have been sufficient to have ensured condemnation, but it was wholly false. The Lord had never refused to pay tribute, and had, that very week, told his questioners to "render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's" (Matt. xxii. 21). The third charge, however, was indeed serious, and Pilate instinctively fixes on this as of vital importance.

We now reach the stage called Interrogatio, or the Examination of the Accused. Pilate had placed the Accused and the accusers face to face, as the Roman law required, and he now opens the examination by asking a question which is found word for word in each of the four Gospels: "Art Thou the King of the Jews?" To this the Lord answers, "Thou sayest". On the surface this appears to be a confession, equivalent to our "pleading guilty". A reference to John's Gospel, however, reveals that before our Saviour acknowledged the charge, he asked Pilate the question: "Sayest thou this of thyself, or did others tell it of Me?" (John xviii. 34). In other words, the Lord enquires as to the sense in which the word "King" was used. Is this your own question as a Roman Procurator, the representative of the Emperor? Or is it a question prompted by Jewish priests? If you are saying it of yourself, and are asking whether I claim to be a king in the Roman sense, so as to be guilty of high treason against Cæsar, I answer "No". If, on the other hand, the Jewish priests have told it thee concerning Me, and you are asking whether I am a king in the Jewish sense . . . . . then I "plead guilty", for I am "King of the Jews" in that sense. I claim to be the Prophet, ho Erchomenos, the Son of God, the King of the Jews.

We now reach the Defence, which falls under two heads:

(1) The Confession.

(2) The Avoidance.

The Lord confessed that He was a king, and to that end He had been born. But His avoidance was that His kingdom was not of this world and was not supported by armed men. Upon hearing the Lord's defence, Pilate returns to the Praetorium and announces his decision:

> "I find in Him no fault at all" (John xviii. 38).

So far as Roman law is concerned the Lord is now acquitted; the trial is over, and He is free. What happens subsequently is the result of the play of human passion on human conscience, and because of Pilate's fears, the Saviour is handed over to death. Pilate seizes upon the word "Galilee" to rid himself of further responsibility and sends the Saviour to Herod. The offer and refusal of Barsabbas, the washing of the hands, the scourging, the cruel mockery of the soldiers, all these things lay outside the law. Pilate's fear for his own misdeeds and his dread of coming under the suspicion of Tiberius, in combination with the envy and malice of the Jew, were instrumental in nailing the Son of God to the cross. It is not within our province at the moment to speak of the Cross of Christ in its doctrinal sense, and we must therefore leave this solemn yet wonderful theme at this point.

#15. The Law of Adoption.
pp. 62 - 65

The apostle Paul makes several references to "adoption" in his epistles, and it is impossible to understand these fully without some knowledge of the special meaning that attached to this term. To appreciate the full significance of the Apostle's figures in Gal. iii. and iv. they must be viewed in the light of the law of adoption—and more particularly, the Greek law of adoption. At the same time it must be remembered that Paul also uses the term in Romans, so that we must also bear in mind the Roman law on the subject.

There is no "law of adoption" in England. Anyone is free to adopt whom he will, but the act is a purely private matter. In Roman law, however, adoption was a very real undertaking.

> "The adopted son became a member of the family, just as if he had been born of the blood of the adopter; and he was invested with all the privileges of a filius familias. As a matter of fact it was by this means that the succession amongst the Cæsars was continued. It never descended from father to son. What with poison, divorce, luxury and profligacy, the surviving members of a family were few, the descent suffered constant interruption, and whole families disappeared . . . . . In no case amongst the Cæsars did the throne pass from father to son . . . . . Augustus was the great nephew of Julius Cæsar, and was adopted from the Octavian into the Julian gens. Tiberius was no relation at all to his predecessor: he was merely the son of Augustus' wife, Livia, by Tiberius Claudius Nero. Here we have the introduction of another family—the Claudii . . . . . Nero was the great nephew of his predecessor Claudius, who had adopted him in the year A.D. 50" (Septimus Buss).

Adoption was of two kinds: adoption proper, and adrogation.

Adoption proper.—It must be remembered that the father in Roman law had absolute control over his family, possessing the same rights over his children as over his slaves. By this patria potestas the son was deprived of the right to own property, and the father could inflict any punishment he thought fit, even to the extent of the death penalty. He could also sell his son into bondage. According to the law of the xii. Tables, however, a father forfeited his potestas if he sold his son three times. For this reason, in the case of adoption, a legal ceremony took place in which the father went through the process of selling his son three times, and the son passed over completely to the potestas of the adopter. In later times the cumbersome ceremony was substituted by a simple declaration before the Prætor or Governor.

Adrogation.—When the person to be adopted was his own master, he was adopted by the form called adrogation (from the word for "ask", since in this case the adopter, the adopted, and the people were "asked", rogatur). The law demanded that the adopter should be at least eighteen years older than the adopted: for says Justinian:

> "Adoption imitates nature, and it seems unnatural that a son should be older than his father" (Justinian).
>
> "Adoption was called in law a capitas diminutio, which so far annihilated the pre-existing personality who underwent it, that during many centuries it operated as an extinction of debts" (W. E. Ball).

The effect of adoption was fourfold:

(i.) A CHANGE OF FAMILY.—The adopted person was transferred from one gens to another.

(ii.) A CHANGE OF NAME.—The adopted person acquired a new name; for he assumed the name of his adopter, and modifies his own by the termination -ianus. Thus, when Caius Octavius of the Octavian gens was adopted by Julius Cæsar, he became Caius Julius Cæsar Octavianus.

(iii.) A CHANGE OF HOME, and (iv.) NEW RESPONSIBILITITES AND PRIVILEGES.—While the adopted person suffered many "losses", these were more than counterbalanced by his "gains", for he received a new capacity to inherit. In the case of the adopter dying intestate, the adopted son acquired the right of succession.

Paul alludes to the patria potestas, the absolute power of the father in the family, in Gal. iv., where he speaks of "the child differing nothing from a slave" and goes on to say "Thou art no longer a slave, but a son" (Gal. iv. 7). Paul also alludes to tutelage in Gal. iii. and iv., where we have such phrases as "kept in ward", "tutor to bring us to Christ", "under guardians and stewards", and "children held in bondage" (Gal. iii. 23 - iv. 1).

So far as the ceremony was concerned, the difference between the transferring of a son into slavery, and his becoming a member of the family was very slight. In the one case the adopter said: "I claim this man as my slave"; in the other, "I claim this man as my son". The form was almost the same; it was the spirit that differed.

If the adopter died and the adopted son claimed the inheritance, the latter had to testify to the fact that he was the adopter heir. Furthermore—

> "the law require corroborative evidence. One of the seven witnesses is called. 'I was present', he says 'at the ceremony. It was I who held the scales and struck them with the ingot of brass. It was an adoption. I heard the words of the vindication, and I say this person was claimed by the deceased, not as a slave but as a son'." (W. E. Ball).

Bearing all these facts in mind, can we not feel something of the thrill with which the Roman Christian would read the words of Rom. viii.?

> "Ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God, and if children, then heirs" (Rom. viii. 15-17).

It is not so much the Holy Spirit addressing Himself here to the human spirit in confirmation, but rather the joint witness of the Holy Spirit and the spirit of the believer to the same blessed fact.

Closely associated with the law of adoption was that of the Roman will. The Prætorian will was put into writing, and fastened with the seals of seven witnesses (cf. Rev. v. and vi.). There is probably a reference to this type of will in Eph. i. 13, 14:

> "In Whom also after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of His glory" (Eph. i. 13, 14).

W. E. Ball translates the latter part of the passage: "Until the ransoming accomplished by the act of taking possession (of the inheritance)."

> "When a slave was appointed heir, although expressly emancipated by the will which gave Him the inheritance, his freedom commenced not upon the making of the will, nor even immediately upon the death of the testator, but from the moment when he took certain legal steps, which were described as 'entering upon the inheritance'. This is 'the ransoming accomplished by act of taking possession'. In the last words of the passage—'to the praise of His glory', there is an allusion to a well-know Roman custom. The emancipated slaves who attended the funeral of their emancipator were the praise of his glory. Testamentary emancipation was so fashionable a form of posthumous ostentation, the desire to be followed to the grave by a crowd of freedmen wearing the 'cap of liberty' was so strong, that very shortly before the time when St. Paul wrote, the legislature had expressly limited the number of slaves that an owner might manumit by will" (W. E. Ball).

In all these things there is necessarily more than one aspect to be remembered. The bearing of the O.T. teaching of the Kinsman-Redeemer and of the Hebrew law must never be forgotten, but for the moment we are limiting ourselves to the laws in force during the period covered by the Acts. Many passages like Rom. viii. and Gal. iii. & iv. are given a much fuller meaning when we are able to understand the allusions to customs and procedure that were everywhere in vogue at the time they were written.

#16. Custodia Militaris. Paul's apprehension at Jerusalem. pp. 105 - 108

The second half of the Acts devotes a great deal of space to an account of Paul's apprehension and subsequent trials, culminating in his imprisonment for two years at Rome. When the Apostle arrived at Jerusalem with the contribution for the poor saints there, he was obliged to meet the charge made against him, that he taught all the Jews that were among the Gentiles to forsake Moses. In order to refute this charge publicly, he associates himself with some men who had taken upon themselves the Nazarite vow. While thus engaged, he is recognized by some Jews from Asia, who raise the cry that he has defiled the Holy Place by taking Trophimus into the sacred enclosure. The Romans had given power to the Jews to inflict the death penalty for this act of sacrilege, and the marble slab warning any intruder of the consequences of such an act may still be seen in the British Museum. The last word in the Greek—Thanaton, "death"—can easily be deciphered.

The following extract from Josephus' "War of the Jews" will show how serious was the Apostle's position.

> "Now Titus was deeply affected with this state of things, and reproached John and his party, and said to them, Have not you, vile creatures that you are, by our permission, put up this partition wall before your sanctuary? Have not ye been allowed to put up the pillars thereto belonging, at due distances, and on it engraved in Greek, and in your own letters, this prohibition, that no foreigner should go beyond that wall? Have we not given you leave to kill such as go beyond it, though he was a Roman?" (Josephus B. J. vi. ii. 4).

Riots over this type of difficulty were a constant source of anxiety to the Roman Governor. Under Cumanus, who preceded Felix, there had been a riot which had resulted in the death of a thousand Jews. And so we read in Acts xxi.:

> "All the city was moved, and the people ran together. And they took Paul and drew him out of the Temple" (Acts xxi. 30).

The tumult had by this time attracted the attention of the authorities, and the Temple guard immediately closed the great gate that secured the inner shrine from profanation. They then closed the other three gates, or, as Acts xxi. 30 puts it: "And forthwith the doors were shut."

Paul was now outside the sacred enclosure, and the mob was therefore free to shed his blood without further defiling the Temple. From their stations on the roof of the cloisters, however, the Roman guard had seen what was going on, and tidings were conveyed to the Captain "that all Jerusalem was in an uproar". The Captain evidently did not under-estimate the violence of the people, for we read that he "took soldiers and centurions"—which means that several hundred soldiers were employed—and ran down the steps connecting the castle with the court. And "when they saw the Chief Captain and the soldiers, they left beating of Paul".

Paul is now immediately bound with "two chains"—that is, he is handcuffed to two soldiers, one on either side of him—and the Captain seeks to discover the cause of the tumult, asking him "who he was, and what he had done". As the uproar continues, however, the Captain orders him to be removed to the castle. Fearing that they may lose their prey, the mob now rush for the stairs, and their violence is so great that the soldiers are obliged to "carry" the Apostle. Paul is now under arrest without warrant.

According to Septimus Buss there were three kinds of custody under Roman law.

(1) Custodia Publica, when the prisoner was committed to gaol, as in the case of Paul and Silas at Philippi.
(2) Custodia Libera, when the accused was placed under surveillance either in his own house, or in the house of a magistrate, who became responsible (sponsor) for his production in court on the day of trial, and gave a legal promise (vadimonium) for that purpose.
(3) Custodia Militaris, when the accused was given in charge to a guard of soldiers.

Lysias, the Captain, is surprised when Paul addresses him in good Greek, for he evidently thought he had captured an Egyptian who had led over 4000 assassins into the wilderness. A second riot threatens to follow the Apostle's speech from the stairs, and so the prisoner is taken into the castle, and examined.

Lysias now commands that Paul shall be scourged as a means of extracting a confession from him, but while he is being bound and "bent forward" (proeteinan), he quietly says to the Centurion:

> "Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman, and uncondemned?" (Acts xxii. 25).

To apply the flagellum horribile at the very outset was in itself illegal: and much more so in the case of a Roman citizen. And so we read:

> "When the centurion heard that, he went and told the chief captain saying, Take heed what thou doest, for this man is a Roman" (Acts xxii. 26).

Lysias had first of all mistaken Paul for an Egyptian, and now, learning that he claimed to be a Roman citizen, he hurries back to make sure.

> "Tell me he said, Art thou a Roman? He said I am. And the chief captain answered, With a great sum obtained I this freedom. And Paul said, But I was born free. And straightway they departed from him which should have examined him: and the chief captain also was afraid, after he knew that he was a Roman, and because he had bound him" (Acts xxii. 27-29).

Lysias could not retain the prisoner in custody without some charge being laid against him, and so we read:

> "He loosed him from his bands, and commanded the chief priests and all their council to appear, and brought Paul down and set him before them" (Acts xxii. 30).

At this meeting, the difference of opinion between the Sadducees and the Pharisees is so strong, that Paul once again has to be rescued from their violence by the Roman soldiers.

When Lysias hears of the conspiracy against the Apostle's life, he determines to send him "safe to Felix". Accordingly he calls out two hundred soldiers, seventy horsemen, and two hundred spearman, and bids them be ready by nine o'clock at night for the start to Cæsarea. The number of soldiers decided upon to escort one man a distance of sixty miles, is eloquent testimony to the turbulent character of the people.

The letter which Lysias sends to Felix follows the usual form, but skillfully covers up his error. It implies that Paul was rescued from the Jews after Lysias had learned that he was a Roman.

At this point we must stop for the moment. Before we can go further, we must acquaint ourselves with some of the outstanding features of Roman citizenship, and this we shall hope to do in a subsequent article.

The Epistle to the Romans.

#79. Romans xiv. 1 - xv. 7.
The Lordship of Christ, and its bearing on the attitude of the "strong" and the "weak".
pp. 7 - 13

One of the evils associated with the judging of one another in the matter of "meats" and "days", is that we are liable to overstep our legitimate bounds and usurp the place of the Lord. The Apostle has twice as much to say about this question of meats and days as he has already written (See Rom. xiv. 2-5 and xiv. 13-22, and the structure of the whole passage in Volume XXIX, page 110), but for the moment the argument is held up, while he forces upon the consciences of both "strong" and "weak", i.e. of those who are free to eat all things, and those who are so weak that they eat nothing but herbs—the fact of the Lordship of Christ. This section is marked D1 | xiv. 6-12 in the larger structure, and we must now see it in detail in order to appreciate the bearing of its message upon theme of the chapter.

Romans xiv. 6-12.

D1 | xiv. 6-12. The Lordship of Christ. "It is written."
C1 | c | To the Lord—he regardeth it.
d | To the Lord—he regardeth it not.
c | To the Lord—he eateth it.
d | To the Lord—he eateth it not.
D1 | FOR NONE OF US LIVETH OR DIETH TO HIMSELF.
C2 | c | To the Lord—we live.
d | To the Lord—we die.
c | The Lord's—we are.
d | The Lord—both of dead and living.
D2 | FOR WE SHALL ALL STAND BEFORE THE JUDGMENT SEAT OF CHRIST.
C3 | c | Saith the Lord, To Me.
d | Every knee shall bow.
c | To God.
d | Every tongue shall confess.
D3 | SO THEN EVERY ONE SHALL GIVE AN ACCOUNT OF HIMSELF TO GOD.

The value of thus seeking the structural analysis of the passage is at once shown by the way in which it forces upon our attention the fact of the Lordship of Christ. Now this is a matter of supreme importance. It is a matter of indifference to God as to whether I eat this or that, or as to whether I observe this day or that, or none at all, but it can never be a matter of indifference to Him as to my relationship with His Son as Lord.

It is often the case that a word of doctrinal, dispensational or practical importance, is emphasized by the number or disposition of its occurrences. We are not, therefore, surprised to find that the word kurieuo, "to have dominion", occurs seven times in the N.T. and not only so, but the occurrences fall into the following most obvious arrangement:

Kurieuo*, "To have dominion".

A | Luke xxii. 25. The kings of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them.
B | a | Rom. vi. 9. Christ being raised from the dead, dieth no more. Death hath no more dominion over Him.
b | Rom. vi. 14. Sin shall not have dominion over you. Grace.
b | Rom. vii. 1. Law has dominion over a man as long as he lives. Law.
a | Rom. xiv. 9. Christ died and rose that He might have dominion over both the dead and the living.
A | II Cor. i. 24. The apostles of the church do not exercise dominion over the faith.
B | I Tim. vi. 15. Christ, Lord of those have dominion, Who only hath immortality (ref. to death and resurrection).

Here is a further example of the perfection of the Word, an exhibition of the superintending inspiration of God, governing the use of the individual words. Should the reader prefer to follow the chronological order of the books, members A and A would go together, and B & B, so reducing the alternation to one set.

It will be seen from the above that the true exercise of dominion is intimately associated with death and life. The kings of the earth exercise dominion, but it is not true dominion for it is not wielded in virtue of a risen life. The Apostle himself would not exercise dominion over the faith of others, for, as he had already written to the Corinthians:

> "Was Paul crucified for you? Or were ye baptized into the name of Paul?" (I Cor. i. 13).

No, instead of claiming the exercise of "lordship", the Apostle could write:

> "We preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the LORD, and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake" (II Cor. iv. 5).

This he follows by a reference to the "judgment seat" similar to that found in Rom. xiv.:

> "For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad" (II Cor. v. 10).

The "judgment seat", in principle at least, is not absent even in the Prison Epistles, for we read:

> "Whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord, and not unto men; knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance: for ye serve the Lord Christ. But he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons" (Col. iii. 23-25).

> "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the LORD, the righteous JUDGE, shall give me in that day" (II Tim. iv. 7, 8).

Here the Apostle does not hesitate to bring in the title of "Judge", and yet we know full well that he rejoiced in the wonderful teaching of Rom. viii. 1. This naturally brings us to the enquiry, What is the nature of this "judgment seat"? The word so translated is bema, which has twelve occurrences in the N.T., of which nine refer to the "judgment seat" in connection with Pilate, Herod, Gallio, Festus and Cæsar.

There is one occurrence of bema, in Acts vii., which needs perhaps a word of explanation.

> "And He gave none inheritance in it, not so much as to set his foot on" (Acts vii. 5).

The words "set . . . . . on" are the translation of bema here, the word being taken by Stephen from Deut. ii. 5, where it occurs in the LXX. The reader who is not acquainted with the growth of language may fail to see how such a word can be so translated. An illustration from our own language may help. We all know that a "cathedral" is the principal church in a diocese, but we may not all know that cathedra means "a chair". A cathedral is so called because the Bishop's "throne" or "chair" is there, and when he speaks "ex cathedra", he is speaking not as an individual expressing his private opinions, but as the Bishop. Here, then, is a word that in some contexts could mean simply a chair, but which in course of time has come to indicate a cathedral church. So bema, a word derived from baino, "to tread", became in course of time limited to one particular standing place, and the only other occurrence of the word in the O.T. uses it in this sense:

> "And Ezra the scribe stood upon a wooden stage" (Neh. viii. 4).

Here it is equivalent to our "pulpit", while by the time the word is used in the N.T. it has become a "judgment seat".

It should be noted that the word bema was used with a certain amount of latitude. It could mean the judgment seat of Pilate or Cæsar, or alternatively, the raised stand erected for the purpose of adjudicating at the Greek sports. The latter meaning occurs in Acts xii. 21:

> "And upon a set day Herod, arrayed in royal apparel, sat upon his throne, and made an oration unto them."

We learn from Josephus and others that Herod attended some sports that were in progress at Cæsarea. He was not trying a case, but, as we read, "he made an oration to the people".

In the two occurrences of bema that refer to the Lord, the word is used in this latter sense. There is "no condemnation" for the believer. His trial has already been made, sentence has been pronounced, and, in the person of Another, endured.

In II Cor. v. 10 we have "the judgment seat of Christ", while in Rom. xiv. 10 the R.V. reads "the judgment seat of God", and this reading has the support of the critical texts. There is, of course, no discrepancy here. The very fact that in one passage the reference is to "Christ" and in the other to "God" only emphasizes the Deity of Christ, for we read:

> "The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son" (John v. 22).

It is the Son Who shall sit upon the throne of His glory to judge the nations of the earth (Matt. xxv. 31, 32). It is the Son Who shall come in the glory of the Father with His angels, to reward every man according to his works (Matt. xvi. 27). And it is the Son Who shall sit on the throne of His glory, in the regeneration (Matt. xix. 28).

With regard to the question of judging, the Apostle in I Corinthians refuses either to allow others to judge his motives or to attempt to justify himself:

> "Yea, I judge not mine own self. For I know nothing against myself, yet am I not hereby justified, but He that judgeth me is the Lord. Wherefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, Who will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and make manifest the counsels of the hearts; and then shall each man have his praise from God" (I Cor. iv. 3-5).

The Apostle is referring here to that test of true service that he had enlarged upon in I Cor. iii. 11-15, where he distinguishes between the foundation and the super-structure. A believer whose life's work is burnt up shall nevertheless "himself be saved", even though he "suffer loss" (I Cor. iii. 15).

Coming now to Rom. xiv., we observe that the reference to the judgment seat is associated with a quotation from the O.T.:

> "For it is written, As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to Me, and every tongue confess to God" (Rom. xiv. 11).

This is a quotation from Isa. xlv., and if we turn to the passage we shall observe in the context the following important fact. The One Who thus speaks, declares in verses 21 and 22:

> "I am God, and there is none else" (Isa. xlv. 21).
> "A just God and a Saviour; there is none beside Me" (Isa. xlv. 22).

It is this God, beside Whom there is "none else", Who has sworn that unto Himself every knee shall bow. The Apostle not only knew the passage from Isa. xlv. which he actually quotes, but he also knew its context. In face of this, he uses the names "Christ" (II Cor. v. 10) and "God" (Rom. xiv. 11), which would be inexplicable unless he believed in the Deity of Christ. If the Lord Jesus Christ be "God manifest in the flesh", then either title is His. The first (Christ) refers to Him as the Man Who was the anointed Prophet, Priest and King, while the second speaks of His essential nature, for He was more than man. He came in the flesh, but He left the glory to do so.

We remember, moreover, that the Apostle quotes Isa. xlv. 23 in Philippians:

> "Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God: but made Himself of no reputation, and took upon Him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: and being found in fashion as a man He humbled Himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted Him, and given Him the Name which is above every name, that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth, and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. ii. 6-11).

It is not without significance that Philippians speaks of "the prize", while II Timothy (which refers to "the righteous Judge") speaks of "the crown".

Returning to Rom. xiv., we read:

> "For to this end Christ died and lived again, that He might be Lord of both the dead and the living" (Rom. xiv. 9 R.V.).

The Revised Text omits the words "and rose", but resurrection is necessarily implied in the words "died and lived again", and in that capacity He is Lord of those who are dead and who are living. He Who is Lord of life and death is the only One Who has the right to judge the motives of those for whom He died, and who by grace are reckoned to have died and risen again with Him.

It is to the Lordship of the risen Christ that the Apostle seeks to point the leaders of faction, the men of party spirit, the judges, and those who tend to despise the brethren. While the believer to-day may not be in danger of judging or despising so far as "meats" are concerned, there are many who adopt the attitude here condemned regarding the observance of the so-called "Lord's Day". Those of us who are free from the tradition concerning the observance of either the Sabbath or the First Day of the Week, should remember that we are called upon to respect the consciences of those who, though "weak", "regard the day unto the Lord". It is not the first part of this sentence that matters, it is the second part: "Unto the Lord." This we shall find the Apostle turns into a spiritual principle in the next section (Rom. xiv. 13-22, particularly verse 14).

However, we must let the Apostle speak for himself, and not introduce any doctrine into the present section other than that which inspiration has indicted, namely, the Lordship of Christ.

We should receive one another as Christ received us. We should act towards one another in view of the fact that Christ is our Lord, ours and theirs, both dead and living. And we must remember that, while every phase of the purpose of the ages necessitates the death and resurrection of Christ, the Apostle draws particular attention here to the fact that it was "to this end Christ both died and lived again, that He might be the LORD both of the dead and living".

#80. Romans xiv. 1 - xv. 7.
Principles that should guide us in cases of conscience.
pp. 54 - 59

Having emphasized the Lordship of Christ with respect to all believers, whether they be strong or weak, the Apostle passes on to the conclusion of the matter (Rom. xiv. 13 - xv. 7). He counsels the believer to "judge" himself rather than others, so that no stumbling-block should be put in the way of his brethren. In other words he is to "walk according to love", or as the A.V. puts it, "walk . . . . . charitably" (Rom. xiv. 15). The tendency to censoriousness and self-pleasing in these things is destructive:

> "Destroy not him with thy meat, for whom Christ died" (Rom. xiv. 15).

We should ever follow after those things that make for peace and which build up, and not attempt to hold to our "rights" and "liberties" if by so doing we exalt them above Christian love. For while the believer may be "free" to eat this or drink that, it is "good" to refrain and to limit one's liberty rather than be the occasion of stumbling to a weaker brother.

Such, however, is not a complete statement of the Apostle's exhortation. He introduces in verses 14, 16, 20, 22 and 23 the principle that, when once grasped, will be an all-sufficient guide for us in any similar case of conscience.

To perceive these verses in their true relationship we must have recourse to the structure of the section.

Romans xiv. 13-22.

C2 | xiv. 13-22. MEATS, ETC., AND THE ESTIMATE OF FAITH.
a4 | a | Judge no more.
b | Judge this rather.
a | No stumbling-block.
b | Nor occasion to fall.
b4 | NOTHING UNCLEAN OF ITSELF.
BUT TO HIM THAT ESTEEMETH IT.
a5 | a | Brother grieved with thy meat.
b | Walk not in love.
a | Destroy not with thy meat.
b | One for whom Christ died.
b5 | LET NOT YOUR GOOD BE EVIL SPOKEN OF.
a6 | a | Kingdom of God.
b | Not meat and drink.
b | But righteousness, joy, peace in the holy spirit.
a | Acceptable . . . . . approved.
b6 | LET US FOLLOW PEACE AND EDIFYING.
a7 | a | For meat destroy not.
b | Work of God.
b7 | ALL THINGS PURE. EVIL TO HIM THAT OFFENDS.
a8 | a | Good, neither to eat flesh . . . . . or anything.
b | To cause stumbling, offence, or make weak.
b8 | HAVE FAITH THYSELF BEFORE GOD.
HAPPY IS HE THAT CONDEMNETH NOT HIMSELF THAT WHICH HE ALLOWETH

The Apostle's principles here are so important, and so often lost sight of, that at the risk of seeming repetition we propose to take the sections labeled b4 to b8 and put them together by themselves:

The Principles of Romans xiv. 13-22.

A | b4. Nothing is unclean of itself. It becomes unclean to the one that so esteems it.
B | b5. Let not your good be evil spoken of.
B | b6. Let us follow after the things that make for peace, and which edify.
A | b7. All things are pure, but it is evil for that man who eateth with offence.
B | b8. Happy is he who condemns not himself in those things which he allows.

The first of these references is introduced by the words:

> "I know and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus."

There must be some good reason for introducing the name of the Lord here. It cannot simply mean that Paul was speaking by inspiration for that would be equally true of any verse in the epistle. The reader may remember that in Acts xx. the Apostle uses the same title:

> "Remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how He said, It is more blessed to give than to receive" (Acts xx. 35).

This statement in the Acts appears to refer to one of the unrecorded utterances of the Lord, of which Luke would necessarily know many (Luke i. 1-3). In Rom. xiv. 14, however, the Apostle may well refer to Mark vii. 18, 19:

> "Are ye so without understanding also? Do ye not perceive, that whatsoever thing from without entereth into the man, it cannot defile him, because it entereth not into his heart . . . . . (this He said) making ALL MEATS CLEAN" (Mark vii. 18, 19, R.V.).

Nothing is unclean "of itself". The distinction made in Leviticus between "clean" and "unclean" meats was mainly ceremonial—although it was no doubt true also in a material sense that in giving Israel the ruminating animals such as the ox and the sheep, the Lord was providing them with the best kind of food.

Parallel with this assertion, but approaching the truth from another angle, is the statement in Titus:

> "Unto the pure, all things are pure" (Titus i. 15).

We hope that it is unnecessary to prove that the words "all things" here must be governed by the scope of the passage in which they are found. That which is inherently unclean is no more pure under grace than it was under law. The context speaks of "vain talkers and deceivers, specially of the circumcision" and "Jewish fables and commandments of men" (Titus i. 10, 14).

This first principle of Rom. xiv. 14 is well illustrated in the first epistle to the Corinthians, where the Apostle had to meet problems similar to those discussed in Rom. xiv.

> "All things are lawful unto me, but all things are not expedient: all things are lawful for me, but I will not be brought under the power of any. Meats for the belly and the belly for meats; but God shall destroy both it and them" (I Cor. vi. 12, 13).

It will be seen that there are two reason put forward here, why free moral creatures, washed, sanctified and justified (I Cor. vi. 11) should not use their liberty to the full.

The first reason is that it may not be "expedient" to do so. The word "expedient" is sumphero in the original, and is literally translated in Acts xix. 19, "to bring together". It is in some ways an unfortunate word to introduce into Scripture, for its primitive meaning has been overshadowed by a more modern and less pleasant one. "Expediency" has come to mean a consideration of what is "politic", as distinct from what is "just":

> "Matters of mere expediency, that affect neither honour, morality, nor religion" (Chatham).
>
> "Following his duty, instead of consulting expediency" (Jane Austen).
> "Too fond of the right to pursue the expedient" (Goldsmith).

It need hardly be said that this is not at all the Apostle's meaning. On the contrary, we must repudiate the least approach to subtlety in dealing with Christian things, and must seek to be open, and transparent in all our dealings. Why not then retain the literal rendering of sumphero and read, "All things do not bring together"? This is in harmony with Rom. xiv., where the believer is exhorted to seek to "edify", instead of "destroying".

Chapter viii. of this same epistle to the Corinthians might be taken as a running commentary on the principles of Rom. xiv. As a variant to the A.V., we give Weymouth's translation:

> "As to eating things which have been sacrificed to idols, we are fully aware that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is no God but One. For if so-called gods do exist, either in heaven or on earth—and in fact there are many such gods and many such lords—yet we have but one God, the Father, Who is the source of all things and for Whose service we exist, and but one Jesus Christ, through Whom we and all things exist. But all believers do not recognize these facts. Some, from force of habit in relation to the idol, even now eat idol sacrifices as such, and their consciences, being but weak, are polluted. It is true that a particular kind of food will not bring us into God's presence; we are neither inferior to others if we abstain from it, nor superior to them if we eat it. But take care lest this liberty of yours should prove a hindrance to the progress of weak believers. For if any one were to see you, who know the real truth of this matter, reclining at table in an idol's temple, would not his conscience (supposing him to be a weak believer) be emboldened to eat the food which has been sacrificed to the idol? Why, your knowledge becomes the ruin of the weak believer—your brother for whom Christ died. Moreover when you thus sin against the brethren and wound their weak consciences, you are, in reality, sinning against Christ. Therefore, if what I eat causes my brother to fall, never again to the end of my days will I touch any kind of animal food, for fear I should cause my brother to fall" (Rom. viii. Weymouth).

The Apostle also puts forward a second reason why the believer may be called upon to limit his freedom. This second reason is expressed in the words: "I will not be brought under the power of any." The word translated "bring under the power of" is exousiazo, while the word "awful" is exestin. The latter gives us exousia, "authority" (as for example, Matt. viii. 9). Exousiazo is also found in Luke xxii. 25, where it is translated "exercise authority". By using these words together, the Apostle seems to emphasize the foolishness of boasting of one's authority over a thing, when the thing really exercises authority over oneself. Have we not sometimes heard the remark, "This is a bad habit; it is too strong for me"? Those who have to make such a confession have passed the boundary line beyond which an innocuous thing becomes harmful.

The Apostle returns to this argument again in I Cor. x. 23-33, and points out that the conscience is a far more important matter than the exercise of mere privilege. The statement: "Let no man seek his own" anticipates Rom. xv. 1, while the words, "If I by grace be a partaker, why am I evil spoken of, for that for which I gave thanks?" anticipate Rom. xiv. 16.

While a thing may be "lawful" and "clean" in itself, there are two conditions that will render it "unclean" or "unlawful":

(1) If the person thus exercising his liberty "esteems such an act or thing unclean."
(2) If the act causes offence. The "good", if "evil spoken of", or if it "causes offence" (Rom. xiv. 16, 20), becomes "inexpedient" or "destructive".

Here we have the attitude of the believer himself, and also the effect of his action upon others, and it is important to notice that both these things can have evil consequences.

The last statement of principle in this section is that of Rom. xiv. 22, which runs on into the separate member B2 | xiv. 23 (which is in correspondence with B1 | xiv. 1; see the structure Volume XXIX, page 110).

> "As for you and your faith, keep your faith to yourself in the presence of God. The man is to be congratulated who does not pronounce judgment on himself in what his actions sanction. But he who has misgivings and yet eats meat is condemned already, because his conduct is not based on faith; for all conduct not based on faith is sinful" (Rom. xiv. 22, 23. Weymouth).

We must beware of falling into the error of applying this last statement, "Whatsoever is not of faith is sin", to matters that are not in the context. Some readers may be acquainted with Augustine's "Omnis Infidelium vita, atum est", but this certainly takes the Apostle's words beyond their legitimate inference. The whole life of "infidels" is nowhere in view in Rom. xiv., while a study of Rom. ii. will reveal that God has His own gracious way of dealing with the "infidel" who has heard neither "law" nor "gospel". In Rom. xiv. 23, "faith" means "the moral conviction of the rectitude of a mode of action" (Chrys., De Wette, Meyer, etc.).

The Apostle now proceeds once more to bring to bear upon the conscience the relationship of all this to Christ. He has already done this, when he suspended his argument to speak of the Lordship of Christ (D1 | xiv. 6-12), and he now confirms his argument by referring to the Lord's humility (D2 | xv. 1-5).

Romans xv. 1-5.

D2 | xv. 1-5. THE HUMILITY OF CHRIST. IT IS WRITTEN.
c4 | c | The strong should bear infirmities of the weak.
d | Not please self.
c | Please neighbour for good and edifying.
d | Christ pleased not Himself.
d4 | REPROACHES FELL ON ME.
c5 | c | Things written before for our learning.
d | Patience, Comfort, Hope, Scriptures and God.

The believer has before him the example of Christ, the teaching of the Scriptures, and the revealed character of God to encourage him in the exercise of the Christian spirit inculcated in Rom. xiv. The "strong" of Rom. xiv. 2 are exhorted to bear the infirmities of the "weak", and in denying what would otherwise be legitimate liberties, they will really be exercising the Christian privilege of "not pleasing ourselves". There may be many objections put forward to this "invasion of sacred rights of the individual", but every murmur must be silenced in the presence of Him Who "pleased not Himself", even though the Lord from heaven. This is what Philippians describes as the "mind that was in Christ Jesus" (Phil. ii. 4-11).

"In service which Thy love appoints,
There are no bonds for me;
For my secret heart is taught the truth
Which makes Thy children free;
And a life of self-renouncing love
Is a life of liberty."

pp. 79 - 86

Having dealt with the problem of the reception of believers, irrespective of their "strength" or "weakness", the Apostle now proceeds to another question that still agitated the Church, namely, the position of the Gentile believer. For us to-day this question does not arise. In the light of the Mystery, with its glorious equality, and the complete obliteration of the distinction between Jew and Gentile, the whole problem disappears, and even for those who have no direct knowledge of this truth, the light of it has penetrated sufficiently on this question, even among the differing sects. Indeed, to-day we should find things reversed in some denominations and have to ask: "Is He the God of the Gentiles only?" for there are some whose interpretation of Scripture seems to leave no room for the Jew at all.

The epistle to the Romans is the most fundamental of all Paul's writings, and its doctrines remain true even when the dispensation changes. And yet, with all its leveling doctrine of "no difference" where sin and salvation are concerned (Rom. iii. 22; x. 12), it is surprising what pre-eminence is still given to the people of Israel. We give below some of the passages in which this pre-eminence is stressed.

The Pre-eminence of the Jew in Romans.

(1) The gospel was promised before, in the writings of Israel's prophets (Rom. i. 2).
(2) The Lord Jesus Christ was, according to the flesh, made of the seed of David (Rom. i. 3).
(3) The gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first . . . . . (Rom. i. 16).
(4) The recognition of patient continuance in well doing is for all men, but nevertheless, to the Jew first (Rom. ii. 10).
(5) The Jew boasted that he rested in the law, made his boast in God, knew God's will, approved the things "that are more excellent, being instructed out of the law", was confident that he was a guide to the blind, and a light to those in darkness, an instructor of the foolish, a teacher of babes, having a form of knowledge and of the truth in the law. Here we have ten points of superiority over the Gentile (Rom. ii. 17-20).
(6) There was much advantage and profit in being a Jew, chiefly, because unto them had been committed the oracles of God (Rom. iii. 1, 2).

(7) There was no doubt that God was God of the Jews (Rom. iii. 29).
(8) To the Israelites pertained the adoption, glory, covenants, giving of the law, service of God, promises, fathers, and, as concerning the flesh, Christ, Who is over all, God blessed for ever" (Rom. ix. 4, 5).
(9) "Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated" (Rom. ix. 13).
(10) Israel is likened to the olive; the believing Gentile to a wild olive (Rom. xi. 17-24).
(11) All Israel shall be saved, for though, as concerning the gospel, they are enemies, yet, touching the election they are beloved for the fathers' sakes (Rom. xi. 26-28).

These eleven passages, all from one epistle, and containing, as they do, over twenty-five points of distinction, provide overwhelming evidence as to the place occupied by Israel during the period covered by the Acts.

All this, of course, the Apostle has in mind as he approaches this next section of the epistle. He grants that the earthly ministry of the Lord Jesus was exclusively to Israel, but argues that the Gentile was always in view, because of Israel's peculiar calling. He then turns to his own special calling as a minister of Jesus Christ among the Gentiles, and proceeds to plead for the recognition of these Gentiles by the Jewish section of the Church. The extraordinary fact emerges, that those whose offering up was acceptable to God (Rom. xv. 16), were not acceptable to man (Rom. xv. 30, 31). Such is religious human nature!

This note of "acceptance" punctuates the structure of the whole section, and as it is important that this should be seen, we set out the complete structure below.

xv. 8 - xvi. 23.

A1 | xv. 8-15. THE MINISTRY OF CIRCUMCISION DOES NOT EXCLUDE GENTILES.
a1 | 8-9. Acceptance. |
a | Diakonos. Jesus Christ a minister of the circumcision.
b | For the truth of God.
c | To confirm promises made unto the fathers.
d | And that the Gentiles might glorify God for His mercy.
b1 | 9-12. As it is written. Scripture speaks of fellowship. |
Confess among Gentiles.
Rejoice with His people, ye Gentiles.
Praise the Lord, all ye Gentiles.
To reign over the Gentiles.
In Him shall the Gentiles hope.
c1 | 13. NOW THE GOD OF HOPE.—No division here.
d1 | 13-15. Evidences of Gentile blessing. |
Fill you with all joy and peace.
Full of goodness.
Filled with knowledge.

A2 | xv. 16-33. THE MINISTRY OF PAUL. GENTILES ACCEPTABLE TO GOD.
a2 | 16-18. Acceptance. |
a | Paul a minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles.

b | For the gospel of God.
c | The offering of the Gentiles.
d | Might be acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Spirit.
d2 | 17-20. Evidences of Paul's preaching. |
Fully preached.
Jerusalem and Illyricum.
b2 | 21. As it is written. Scripture speaks of Gentile inclusion. |
To whom not spoken. \
They shall see. \ Gentiles.
Those who had not heard. /
They shall hear. /
d3 | 22-29. Paul's further plans. |
Fulness of the blessing of the Gospel.
Rome and Spain.

A PARTY SPIRIT RENDERED THEM UNACCEPTABLE TO MAN.

a3 | 30-32. Acceptance. |
c | Strive together with me in prayer.
b | That I may be delivered.
a | Diaknia. Ministry for Jerusalem.
d | May be accepted of the saints.
c2 | 33. NOW THE GOD OF PEACE.—No division here.

A3 | xvi. 1-23. THE MINISTRY OF MANY.
CIRCUMCISION AND UNCIRCUMCISION.
SATAN AND SELF.

a4 | 1-16. Acceptance. |
a | Diakonos. Phoebe a minister of Cenchrea.
b | Priscilla and Aquila. All churches of Gentiles give thanks.
c | Salutation to and from Circumcision and Uncircumcision.
d | Holy kiss. Churches of Christ.
b3 | 17-19. Teaching ye learned. |
Divisions and offences. Mark them.
Self services. Avoid them.
Your obedience is come abroad.
c3 | 20. NOW THE GOD OF PEACE.—No division here.
d4 | 20. Grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.
a5 | 21-23. Acceptance. |
Salutations from different ones of the Circumcision and Uncircumsion.
The whole Church.

Let us now go into this structure a little more fully. We observe first of all that it divides into three large sections A1, A2, A3. In each of these the theme is ministry.

(1) The ministry of the circumcision must not be so construed as to ignore the Gentile, for (a) the call of Abraham had in view the blessing of the Gentile through Israel, and (b) the O.T. Scriptures are by no means silent on this point (Rom. xv. 8-15).

(2) The ministry of the apostle Paul was a ministry of Jesus Christ, even though Christ Himself was no longer on earth; and further, it was of such a character as to render the offering up of the Gentiles acceptable, for they were sanctified by the Holy Ghost (Rom. xv. 16-33).

(3) The ministry of many belonging both to the circumcision and to the uncircumcision, and their mutual service and salutation are further evidence of the acceptance of the Gentile (Rom. xv. 1-23).

In the process of this argument, God is given the titles of "The God of Hope" and "the God of Peace", both of which make for unity.

In those sections which refer to the Gentile, the Apostle uses the words "fill", "full", and "fulness" several times (d1 | 13-15, d2 | 17-20, d3 | 22-29).

The word "acceptance", or its equivalent teaching, occurs five times, as follows:

a1 | xv. 8-9. The Gentiles might glorify God for His mercy.
a2 | xv. 16-18. The offering of the Gentiles might be acceptable.
a3 | xv. 30-32. That the Gentile service Jerusalem may be accepted of the saints.
a4 | xvi. 1-16. Salutation. The holy kiss. Circumcision and uncircumcision.
a5 | xvi. 21-23. The whole church. Circumcision and uncircumsion.

With this analysis before us, let us now return to the opening argument, beginning at verses 8 and 9:

"Now I say that Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers: and that the Gentiles might glorify God for His mercy" (Rom. xv. 8, 9).

It is quite characteristic of the Apostle to use the phrase "I say", when he wishes to emphasize a particular point. Here in Romans we find this expression six times, while the phrase "I speak after the manner of men" or "I speak as a man" occurs twice. Three times the expression introduces the pre-eminence of the Jew (ix. 1, xi. 1, xv. 8), and twice it is used to stress the place of the Gentile (xi. 11, xi. 13). The Received Text in Rom. xv. 8 reads lego de, "But I say". The Revised Text, however, gives lego gar, "For I say"—which links up the passage with the argument concerning the reception of the believer in Christ.

The Apostle's statement here is twofold:

(1) The ministry of Jesus Christ was to the Circumcision.
(2) It also has the Gentile in mind.

In Israel's case, it is the truth of God and the promises made to the fathers that are in view, while in the case of the Gentiles, it is simply His mercy that is mentioned.

The recognition of what is implied in Rom. xv. 8 is fundamental to dispensational truth, for it reveals the true dispensational character of the earthly ministry of Christ, and the true dispensational place of the Gospels. This is contrary to orthodox tradition, but is in entire harmony with revealed truth. As an example of this confirming evidence, let us consider Matthew's testimony to the fact that the Lord Jesus Christ came (a) for the truth of God, (b) to confirm the promises made to the fathers, and (c) that His ministry was limited to the circumcision.

The gospel starts with the genealogy of the Lord, and establishes that He was the true Seed of Abraham and David, both of whom were "fathers" of Israel. The title "patriarch" is used of both Abraham and David (Heb. vii. 4, Acts ii. 29), and Mary, in her song in Luke i., speaks of the Lord remembering His mercy to Israel—"as He spake to our fathers, to Abraham and his seed for ever" (Luke i. 55). The angel Gabriel also, when announcing the birth of Christ, says:

> "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David. And He shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of His Kingdom there shall be no end" (Luke i. 32, 33).

The reader should observe that in all this there is not the slightest reference to the calling out of a "church"; it is simply a question of the confirmation of the "promises made unto the fathers".

Returning to Matt. i. we learn that the birth of Christ fulfilled the promise made in Isa. vii. 14, just as Luke i. 32, 33 fulfils the promise made in Isa. ix. 6, 7. When the wise men came to Jerusalem seeking the infant Christ, they did not ask where the "Head of the Church" should be born, but "Where is He that is born King of the Jews?" (Matt. ii. 2).

Moreover, when the Scribes referred to the prophet Micah, they quoted the promise not only that Christ should be born in Bethlehem, but that He should rule the people of Israel (Matt. ii. 6). So closely was Christ identified with Israel, that the passage in Hosea: "When Israel was a child then I loved him, and called My son out of Egypt" (Hos. xi. 1) is said to have been fulfilled when the Lord was taken by His parents down to Egypt after the massacre of the infants by Herod. Moreover John the Baptist, the forerunner, comes in fulfillment of the promise made in Isa. xl., which is part of that section of the book that has to do with the restoration of Israel. Furthermore, the prayer which the Lord taught the disciples was a prayer concerning the Kingdom, and forgiveness of trespasses was "as we forgive" others (Matt. vi. 12, 14). We may also note that Matt. viii. declares that the miracles that the Lord worked were in fulfillment of the promise made in Isa. liii., where we read: "Himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses" (Matt. viii. 17).

In Matt. x. we have the calling of "the twelve" and their commission:

> "Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not; but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. x. 5, 6).

Such a statement, coming as it does in chapter x., must surely make it clear that the Sermon on the Mount, that occupies chapters v.-vii., is "kingdom truth" and not "church truth".

This limitation of the Saviour's earthly ministry is evident once more in Matt. xv., where He says to the woman of Canaan: "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. xv. 24).

If the presence of the statement in chapter x. quoted above precludes the idea of the church in chapters v.-vii., it is equally clear that the similar statement in chapter xv. must also exclude the church from the parables of Matt. xiii., and a study of their teaching abundantly confirms this. The parable of the unforgiving servant, for example, while in line with "the Lord's prayer" (Matt. vi. 12, 14), is entirely different from the teaching concerning the forgiveness of sins to be found in Paul's epistles to the church. The Lord's advice to the one who enquired what good thing he should do that he might have eternal life, is perfectly in harmony with the dispensation of the law and the kingdom, but it is not in harmony with the dispensation of grace. Evangelically-minded believers who insist that Matthew's gospel is for the church, would hesitate to take these words of inspired truth as their gospel for to-day, and their hesitation only confirms the truth for which the Apostle contends in Rom. xv. 8.

The expression "the truth of God"—in Rom. xv. 8—also occurs in Rom. iii. 7 and is balanced, in that chapter, by "the faith of God" (Rom. iii. 3). Both expressions refer to the faithfulness of God in keeping His covenant promises. The earthly ministry of Christ was "on account of" (huper) the faithfulness of God, and was moreover a "confirmation" of promises. Such a confirmation of promises already made is obviously very different from the introduction of something new, as in the constitution of the church.

The promises made to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, the twelve patriarchs, and David, find their confirmation in Christ. For this He was born, and for this He died. Not until Israel had rejected Him was it made known that His cross was the instrument of a greater salvation than that entertained by the prophets or included in the promises. Israel, and Israel alone, were the "children of the prophets, and of the covenant made with the fathers" (Acts iii. 25), and it was to Israel that the Lord was "first" sent (Acts iii. 26).

The second part of Paul's statement in Rom. xv. 8, 9 is "that the Gentiles might glorify God for His mercy". Here instead of "truth", "confirmation", "promises", "fathers", stands the simply word "mercy". The Gentiles had no "fathers", no "covenants" and no "promises"; all these belonged exclusively to Israel (Rom. ix. 4, 5).

The same word huper is used here in connection with the "mercy of God", as is used in the previous verse in connection with the "truth of God".

The truth of the inclusion of the Gentiles in the mercy of God is confirmed by repeated quotations from the O.T. Scriptures. It should be noted that no quotations are considered necessary to "prove" that the Jews was "first". To-day, however, the reverse would be true. Quotation after quotation is necessary to reinstate the Jew in his true place in the early part of the N.T., and we find that many who are not only believers, but students as well, seem able to interpret the Acts as though chapter xxviii. 20 were non-existent. It is not for us to judge these things; we can only seek to remain faithful to what God has revealed.

The passages cited by the Apostle in Rom. xv. 9-12 are too important in their dispensational bearing to be relegated to the close of an article, and we must therefore leave them for our next study.

#82. Romans xv. 8 - xvi. 23.
The Hope of the Church during the Acts--Millennial (xv. 10-15).
pp. 111 - 116

We concluded our last article with the assertion that not only did the Saviour come as a minister of the circumcision "to confirm the promises made unto the fathers", but that He also included the Gentiles in His work of mercy even though the manifestation of that mercy was deferred until Israel had been found wanting. The Apostle finds it necessary to supplement this statement with regard to the Gentiles by three quotations from the O.T.—one from the Law, one from the Prophets, and one from the Psalms.

The first passage quoted is Psalm xviii. 49, The quotation in Rom. xv. 9 agrees word for word with the LXX, but it omits the word Kurie, "Lord", which is the equivalent of the Hebrew "Jehovah". It may be that the Apostle omitted the sacred name out of deference to the extreme regard that the orthodox Jew had for the tetragammaton (the "word of four letters", as it was often called). In any case, the Apostle's purpose is adequately served by the quotation, whatever may be the reason for the omission of the Divine title.

The second reference is to Deut. xxxii. 43. The citation agrees word for word with the LXX, but does not agree strictly with the Hebrew as we have it to-day. Alford says that in several passages where the Gentiles are spoken of prophetically, the Hebrew text has apparently been tampered with by the Jews, and refers the reader to Kitto's Journal of Sacred Literature for January 1852. There is no word for "with" in the Hebrew of Deut. xxxii. 43, and the margin recognizes this by putting as an alternative "Praise His people, ye nations". Turpie, whose excellent work on quotations from the O.T. in the New, has been referred to before in these pages, gives very sound reasons for believing that the text is untouched, and that the word "with", though not expressed, is implied. The words "His people" cannot be in apposition with the "nations" for the former title undoubtedly designated the Hebrews, while the latter referred to the nations in general. A copula is obviously not intended, since this would give precedence to the Gentile: "O His nations and people." If, on the other hand, the copula were translated by "even" it would merely be expletive: "O ye Gentiles—even (i.e. possible equivalent to) His people"—which would certainly not be a possible rendering. If the preposition eth had been used here, it might have cause some ambiguity, as it not only represents the preposition "with" but is also a sign of the accusative—which would give us the rendering found in the margin. The passage is dramatic, and in tense moments words are often omitted. "O nations, rejoice ye" (and then, as it were, His people are pointed to) "see His people".

The third quotation is from Psalm cxvii. 1 and in this case there is very little difference between the LXX, the Hebrew original, and the Apostle's own words. Psalm cxvii. has the distinction of being the shortest of all the psalms, and was possibly used as a doxology for other psalms.

The Apostle does not intend to make a close scrutiny of these passages. The bare fact that the O.T. writers included the Gentiles at all is sufficient for his purpose, even though the primary meanings of the passages cited may not always fully coincide with the Apostle's application. This is entirely in harmony with the usual Rabbinical method of argument. A good example of this is found in Rom. x. 5-10, where the appeal to Deut. xxx. 9, 12, 13 and 14 sounds almost fantastic to Gentile ears.

The Apostle's fourth quotation, however, is treated more fully and is commended upon a passage that has a most important bearing:

> "And again, Esaias saith, There shall be a root of Jesse, and He that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles: in Him shall the Gentiles trust" (Rom. xv. 12).

The Apostle again quotes here from the LXX, which differs somewhat from the Hebrew, which is as follows:

> "And in that day there shall be a root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people; to it shall the Gentiles seek" (Isa. xi. 10).

While there are considerable verbal differences in the two renderings, the sense is much the same, the differences resulting largely from the turning of the figurative into the literal. The Hebrew word for "ensign", nes, occurs in the title Jehovah-Nissi—"The Lord, my Banner" (Exod. xvii. 15), and is also translated "pole", "sign", "banner", "ensign", and "standard". The fact that the "Root of Jesse" was to stand up as an "ensign", signified that He was to be the Leader, Whose tent would be the rallying-point for the people. Hence He could be called: "The One Who stands up to rule the peoples." The changing of the word "seek" to "trust" is again but another way of looking at the same idea. However difficult it may appear to us now to justify this translation, it apparently held no difficulties for the Apostle, or for those whom he was addressing.

We return now to Rom. xv. to notice the lesson that the Apostle deduces from this passage in Isa. xi. Before we can fully appreciate his argument, however, we must notice one or two facts that are not immediately obvious.

First of all, the word "trust" in Rom. xv. 12 is elpizo, while the word "hope" in verse 13 is elpis. It is obviously misleading to translate the verb in verse 12 "trust" and the corresponding noun in verse 13 "hope", and yet this is what we find in the A.V. Both words, the noun and the verb, occur together in Rom. viii. 24 and are correctly translated "hope". Similarly, no one would translate Titus ii. 13: "Looking for that blessed trust", or Acts xxviii. 20: "The trust of Israel." We must therefore revise the translation of Rom. xv. 12 and read: "On (epi) Him shall the Gentiles hope."

The next thing to notice is that the Apostle does not speak of "the God of hope", but of "the God of the hope". Remembering that the article "the" often carries with it the idea which would be expressed by the English "that", we may translate as follows:

> "On Him shall the Gentiles hope. Now the God of that hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in that hope, in holy spirit power."

This passage is of great importance because of its bearing upon the hope entertained by the Church during the Acts. If the believing Gentiles in the Church at Rome were to be filled with all joy and peace in believing, and if they were to abound in this hope, then obviously the hope expressed in Isa. xi. must have been the legitimate hope of the Church. Now the hope of Isa. xi. is definitely Millennial, and will be fulfilled after the Lord has "slain the wicked with the breath of His lips" (Isa. xi. 4). Moreover it is associated with the time described in verse 6 when > "the wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together: and a little child shall lead them" (Isa. xi. 6).

Such conditions will not be brought to pass on the earth until the hope of Israel is realized and, as we read in verse 9:

> "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all My holy mountain" (Isa. xi. 9).

It is "in that day" that the hope of the Church at Rome will be realized.

Romans is not only the most fundamental of Paul's epistles, but it is also the last epistle to be written before Israel were set aside at Acts xxviii. In the early chapters of the Acts, before Paul's conversion, we find the hope of Israel uppermost in the minds of the other apostles (Acts i. 6, iii. 19, 26), and this hope remained right through the Acts (until the last few verses of the last chapter). Even after the epistle to the Romans had been written, we find the Apostle declaring before Agrippa that he still entertained "the hope of the promise made unto the fathers" (Acts xxvi. 6, 7); and even when he reached Rome, he could still say without reserve: "For the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain" (Acts xxviii. 20).

Though justified by faith, the believing Gentile in Romans was dispensationally but a wild olive graft into the stock of Israel. He had no hope apart from Israel, and not until Israel were set aside at Acts xxviii. was any hope other than "the hope of Israel" possible. It is quite unscriptural to attempt to link up the Church of the Mystery with the hope of I Thess. iv. No amount of argument can alter the plain statement of Rom. xv. 12 & 13 and all that this implies. The interested reader should refer to the charts given in Volume XXV (pages 8 and 65), testing them thoroughly by the rightly divided Word of Truth.

There is one further point that needs attention. In verse 13 we read: "That ye may abound in hope"—en dunamei pneumatos hagion. Many of our readers will be acquainted with Dr. Bullinger's work entitled "S or s, or The Giver and His gifts" and with Appendix 101 in The Companion Bible, which deals wit the same point. In the particular case of Rom. xv. 13 the article is absent, indicating that it is the gift referred to, and not the Giver. The passage does not read To pneuma, to hagion ("The Spirit, the Holy One") but pneuma hagion ("holy spirit").

Acts ii. 4 is a good example of this twofold usage:

> "They were all filled with pneuma hagion (the gift) and began to speak with other tongues as to Pneuma (the Giver) gave them utterance."

To return to Rom. xv.—the Apostles prays in verse 13 that the God of hope would "fill" these believers with all joy and peace in believing, and in the next verse goes on to express his assurance that they had been "filled" with all knowledge. In this connection we must remember that "the word of knowledge" is one of the gifts of the Spirit mentioned in I Cor. xii., and that the next chapter speaks of this as destined to "vanish away" (I Cor. xiii. 8).

The Apostle concludes this section of Rom. xv. with the words:

> "Nevertheless, brethren, I have written the more boldly unto you in some sort, as putting you in mind, because of the grace that is given me of God" (Rom. xv. 15).

The Apostle felt, perhaps, that he had been unduly insistent upon the place that the Gentiles occupied in the mercy of God, and so he seeks to soften any apparent austerity by these concluding words. We quote below Weymouth's free rendering of verses 14 and 15, which is worth recording because it seems to express the spirit in which the Apostle links his earlier emphasis upon Gentile acceptance with the immediately following elaboration of his own personal ministry as the Apostle of the Gentiles.

> "But as to you brethren, I am convinced—yes, I, Paul am convinced—that, even apart from my teaching, you are already full of goodness of heart, and enriched with complete Christian knowledge, and are competent to instruct one another. But I write to you the more boldly—Partly reminding you of what you already know—because of the authority graciously entrusted to me by God, that I should be a minister of Christ Jesus among the Gentiles . . . . ."

This introduces us to the central theme of this section—the ministry of Paul and Gentile acceptance (A2 | xv. 16-33). We shall hope to consider this in our next article.

This is a complete list of all the changes in connection with the title "Christ Jesus" that have been made from the A.V. to the R.V. The title occurs many more times, but in these cases it is unchanged in the R.V. and so can easily be found. It will be observed that the references to "Christ Jesus" in Hebrews and Peter go out, which means that all the remaining references belong to the ministry of the apostle Paul. The title seems to stress a new aspect of Christ's position and glory, pointing away to the seated One at the right hand of God, rather than to the One Who walked the earth and came only to Israel. In all this, of course, it is always the same Person; only the title is changed. The title "Son of Man", for example, has no place in the epistles, but this does not, of course, mean that we deny the Lord's place there, or that we in any way touch His perfect humanity. So, in the case of the title "Christ Jesus", it is again the same Person, but we do well to note that this particular title belongs exclusively to the ministry of the apostle Paul.

A simplified analysis of Rom. xv. 16-33 may be helpful at this point. The fuller structure will be found on page 81.

Romans xv. 16-33.

a2 | 16-18. Paul a minister. Gentile's acceptance.
d2 | 19-20. Fully preached.
b2 | 21. Scriptures asserting Gentile blessing.
d3 | 22-29. Fulness of blessing.
a3 | 30-32. Ministry at Jerusalem. May it be accepted.
c2 | 33. The God of Peace.

The uneven appearance of the structure is partly due to the fact that certain members in it correspond with similar members in other parts of the section which are not here shown.

It will be observed that where ministry is mentioned elsewhere in this section of Romans, the word is diakonos (Rom. xv. 8 and xvi. 1), or diakoneo (Rom. xv. 25), or diakonia (Rom. xv. 31). In Rom. xv. 16 and 27, however, the word "minister" is leitourgos or leitourgeo ("public service") while in Rom. xv. 16 the word "ministering" is hierougeo ("priestly ministry"). The choice of word in verses 16 and 27 lies very near the crux of the passage. Paul's ministry was in some measure a priestly act, and therefore the offering of the Gentiles was sanctified. The Gentiles being sanctified, they could in their turn perform a kind of "Levitical" service for their Hebrew brethren. This, however, was offensive to the prejudices of the believing Jews, as the sequel at Jerusalem makes very clear.

We must now go a little more closely into the meaning and usage of the two important words for ministry mentioned above. The word heirougeo is a combination of ergon, "a work" and hieron, "sacred". It occurs nowhere else in the N.T., classical writers use it with reference to "offering sacrifices". The Apostle's intention in using the word in Rom. xv. is to indicate that, through the gospel, Gentile service can be spoken of as a sanctified sacrifice quite as truly as that of a Hebrew believer.

The second word, leitourgeo, is used of public ministry (Rom. xiii. 6), ministry in the Church or among the saints (Phil. iil. 30 & Acts xiii. 2), and the ministry of the priests (Heb. x. 11).

In Rom. xv. 16 the Apostle is expanding an aspect of truth that had already been expressed in Rom. xii. In the first verse of this chapter, we read:

> "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service" (Rom. xiii. 1).

The Apostle also uses similar terms in connection with the service of the Hebrew believers in Heb. xiii.:

> "We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle . . . . . By Him therefore let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is the fruit of our lips, giving thanks to His name. But to do good and communicate forget not, for with such sacrifices God is well pleased" (Heb. xiii. 10, 15, 16).

Later on, the Apostle was to write to the Philippians concerning his own service: "Yea, and if I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy and rejoice with you all" (Phil. ii. 17). And again, in II Tim. iv.: "I am now about to be offered" (II Tim. iv. 6).

Sacrifice lies very near the heart of all true service, and the Apostle often uses this figure. So, in Eph. v., in connection with the believer's walk, we read:

> "Walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us, and given Himself for us an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling saviour" (Eph. v. 2).

The same figure is used by the Apostle when he expressed his appreciation of the fellowship of the Philippians in connection with his needs as a minister:

> "I have all and abound, I am full, having received of Epaphroditus a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God" (Phil. iv. 18).

The Gentiles who had believed the gospel through the ministry of Paul and had found in Christ a Sacrifice all-sufficient for their needs before God, were now, equally with the Hebrew believers, able to render acceptable service. The outward seal of this acceptance was that they were "sanctified by the Holy Ghost". Here again it is necessary to draw attention to the fact that the words translated "The Holy Ghost" are pneuma hagion, signifying the gift of holy spirit, and not the Giver Himself. The gift of "holy spirit" to the Gentile believer was a sign convincing enough to break down all prejudice. We see this very clearly in the story of Cornelius. Peter was very diffident about going to Cornelius at all and explained that it was an unlawful thing for him to do. However, he begins to rehearse before Cornelius the work and witness of the Lord Jesus "in the land of the Jews", and before he gets very far, the Lord intervenes and, to the astonishment of the believing Jews, the gift of "holy spirit" is given to these believing Gentiles. Whereupon Peter exclaims, expressing both his previous prejudice and his new conviction:

> "Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized, which have received the holy ghost as well as we?" (Acts x. 47).

In order to do justice to the Apostle's further statements about his own ministry, we must consider the remainder of this section, namely, verses 17-33. There are so many features of importance, however, in this that it does not seem wise to attempt to crowd them into a few closing paragraphs. We must therefore let this article dealing with the acceptance of the offering of the Gentiles suffice for the present, and devote our next article to a consideration of the close of this section and the doubt expressed by the Apostle that the offering which was quite acceptable to God, might not be so acceptable to His redeemed people.

#84. Romans xv. 8 - xvi. 23.
Gentiles, acceptable to God, not acceptable to their fellows (xv. 17-33).
pp. 182 - 187

The Apostle supplements his statement that his ministry was like that of a priest, so far as the Gentiles were concerned (Rom. xv. 16), by further evidences both from his own ministry (Rom. xv. 17) and from the Scriptures (Rom. xv. 21) and then outlines his plans, which had in view a visit to Rome and Spain (Rom. xv. 22-24), which, however, were to be preceded by a special journey to Jerusalem for the purpose of taking the gift of the Gentile churches to the poor saints at Jerusalem (Rom. xv. 25-33).

While it humbled him, as he realized his own unworthiness, the gift of grace that made the apostle Paul such a devoted minister of Christ to the Gentiles, gave him good ground for "boasting in Christ Jesus in things pertaining to God". Paul "magnified" his office (Rom. xi. 13).

In verse 15 the Apostle uses the word, tolmeroteron, "boldly" and in verse 18 tolmao, "dare". He will venture to speak of what his office is and what, by grace, he has accomplished, but not of anything that Christ had not wrought through him.

To bring about the obedience of the Gentiles, word, deeds, signs and wonders had been pressed into service. There may be an intentional parallel between the "word" and the "power of the spirit of God", and the "work" and "the mighty signs and wonders".

In an earlier epistle he had brought forward this same ground of boasting:

> "I am become a fool in glorying (boasting); ye have compelled me: for I ought to have been commended of you: for in nothing am I behind the very chiefest of the apostles, though I be nothing. Truly the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, in signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds" (II Cor. xii. 11, 12).

Further, the Apostle draws attention to the ground he had covered:

> "so that" (i.e. to speak simply of his own labours) "from Jerusalem in a circle as far as Illyricum I have fully preached the gospel of Christ" (Rom. xv. 19).

Illyricum is the land lying along the Adriatic Sea opposite the east coast of Italy, and which adjoins Macedonia on its northwest boundary. It marks the furthermost bounds of the Apostle's journeys up to the time of writing the epistle to the Romans. A glance at the map will show that, taking Jerusalem as a centre, the missionary journeys of the Apostle were prosecuted in ever widening circles. First, the missionary journey to Cyprus and the Province of Galatia (Antioch and Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra and Derbe), see maps Volume XVII, page 35. Next, the journey to Troas, whence Macedonia, Thessalonica, Athens and Corinth were visited. Then, after another visit to Jerusalem, the Apostle went to Ephesus, where he spent three years. In our day, when travel is rendered easy and rapid, we can really only imagine the perils and weariness these journeyings involved. Look, for instance, at the admission of the Apostle in Corinthians when speaking of the ministry from Jerusalem and round about to Illyricum. He says:

> "thrice I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day I have been in the deep; in journeyings often . . . . . in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren; in weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness" (II Cor. xi. 25-27).

The word translated "fully preached" in Rom. xv. 19 is pleroo. It will be seen that there is no word here for "preach", and the same word pleroo has already been used in verses 13 and 14, where it is translated "fill" in the phrases "fill you with all joy" and "filled with all knowledge". In viii. 4 it is translated "fulfilled" as it is also in xiii. 8. It is used in Col. i. 25 of the mystery which "completes the word of God" and in Col. iv. 17 where the Apostle exhorts Archippus to fulfil his ministry. Inasmuch as the gospel necessitated a preacher (Rom. x. 14, 15) the Apostle could not have "fulfilled" or "completed" it apart from preaching it wherever he went, but the word seems further to imply that the purpose for which the gospel had been given, the sphere in which it should be proclaimed, and the period during which it should be preached, had all been completed. He could contemplate a wider circle, including Rome and Spain, and yet feel that no charge could be laid against him as to the faithful fulfillment of his office so far as the regions previously specified were concerned.

This "fulfilling" of the gospel of Christ, would include the epistles that supplemented his apostolic labours. Did the Apostle learn of the Judaistic attack upon the Galatians? he immediately sent them a letter. Did he learn of the needs of Thessalonica? he wrote them an epistle, and upon hearing that they had been troubled regarding the question of the second coming of the Lord, he wrote a second epistle. So also when tidings were brought to him of the state of affairs at Corinth; he wrote two letters touching all their points of dispute and division. He also wrote a word of exhortation to the Hebrews, wherein he so clearly set forth the fact and the consequences of the one sacrifice of Christ. And now, before he sets forth for Rome, he writes to the Church there this wonderful epistle. He had indeed "fulfilled" the gospel and its claims. Having claimed this high standard of fulfillment, the Apostle draws the saints' attention to another aspect of his service.

> "Yea, so have I striven to preach the gospel, not where Christ was named, lest I should build upon another man's foundation" (Rom. xv. 20).

The word "striven" is the translation of an exceedingly interesting Greek word, philotimeomai, which literally means "to love the honour". While it is not strictly true so to render the word its content should nevertheless be kept in mind. Like many words, it had moved away from its primitive meaning, and had come to mean "to be ambitious", "to study", "to labour" (I Thess. iv. 11; II Cor. v. 9). It would be impossible for the Apostle to use a word compounded with phileo, "to love" and time, "honour" without remembering that time also stood for a public and honourable office (Heb. v. 4), and a reward for a service (I Tim. v. 17).

As an apostle, he said, I have been ambitious to press on into the regions beyond, and to avoid building upon another man's foundation, and, as an apostle, he was right to do this. But are we to understand from this passage that we, too, who follow the Apostle, are to be actuated by same principle? We think not. In our case we awake to the claims of service, surrounded by the fruition of centuries of christian honour, and if all those in christian service felt it incumbent upon them to avoid building upon another man's foundation, they must needs soon go out of the world. Paul was a "master builder" and laid the foundation (I Cor. iii. 10) but so far from thinking that his successors would also be called upon to do such work, the opposite is the fact, for in the passage referred to he immediately adds "and another buildeth thereon".

Paul's work was unique. The foundation of all subsequent ministry has been laid, and we all are, if we are in the will of God, building upon that initial foundation, laid during so much stress and strain by the Apostle of the Gentiles.

There are other cases where statements of the Apostle must not be taken as of universal application, as for example the oft-quoted lamentably misunderstood, statement,

> "I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ and Him crucified" (I Cor. ii. 2).

Returning to Rom. xv., a very precious characteristic of the Apostle is seen where he indicates, by the Scripture which follows his boast, how much he sought to regulate his conduct by the teaching of the Word of God:

> "But as it is written, To whom he was not spoken of, they shall see: and they that have not heard shall understand" (Rom. xv. 21).

The LXX suggests the idea: "Men to whom no tidings have been sent concerning Him shall we see", and Paul saw in this enough of the mind of the Lord to justify his action.

It may be an open question whether it be possible or even desirable to probe into the human reasons that prompted the writings of the various epistles, but it looks very much as though the Apostle began this mighty epistle merely to prepare the Roman church for his long-deferred visit. This is his theme in chapter i., immediately after the opening salutation of verses 1-7 and the commendation of verses 8 and 9:

> "Making request if by any means now at length I might have a prosperous journey by the will of God to come unto you" (Rom. i. 10), but by easy stages and the most natural transition he passes on from his desire to his indebtedness, and then from his obligation to his theme, and, once started on the gospel and its glorious provision of righteousness, the succeeding chapters flow on until he comes, full circle, at the close, to the reiterated expression of his desire to visit the saints at Rome.

> "But now having no more place in these parts, and having a great desire these many years to come unto you; whensoever I take my journey into Spain, I will come to you" (Rom. xv. 23, 24).

The word "place", which is a translation of topos, primarily means a portion of space occupied by some object, a geographical area, but it is used figuratively in such phrases "give place to the devil". So here in Rom. xv. 23 it is not the meaning of the Apostle, as Weymouth has it, "As there is no more occupied ground in this part of the world", but rather as the word is used in such expressions as "a place of repentance" (Heb. xii. 17) or "license to answer" (Acts xxv. 16). The meaning of the Apostle in Rom. xv. is that his work in the parts mentioned was done; he had "fulfilled" his mission, as he had earlier said, and he was now free to travel further afield in the cause of Christ. But, much as he wished to fulfil his desire to "see Rome" (Acts xix. 21) he had one more visit to make to Jerusalem (Acts xix. 21), of which he now apprises the Roman saints: "But now I go unto Jerusalem to minister unto the saints" (Rom. xv. 25).

Ever since the time when the Apostles at Jerusalem had asked Paul to "remember the poor" he had desired with a great intensity that the Gentile churches should make a definite contribution to the church at Jerusalem. Two chapters in II Corinthians contain words on the subject that seem to burn. In these eighth and ninth chapters the Apostle speaks of the contribution of the Gentile churches for the poor saints of Jerusalem. We wish space could be afforded to print the whole passage, for the partial quotation of such a gracious outpouring is too great a mutilation, but we trust the reader's interest will compel a perusal of II Cor. viii. and ix. for only so will the statement of the Apostle in Rom. xv. 25-33 be appreciated:

> "For it hath pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia to make a certain contribution for the poor saints which are at Jerusalem. It hath pleased them verily: and their debtors they are. For if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things, their duty is also to minister unto them in carnal things" (Rom. xv. 26, 27).

The close of the chapter makes it clear, that, while the Apostle fervently desired this manifestation of fellowship and had laboured hard to bring it to pass, he nevertheless had grave misgivings regarding its reception by the rulers of the church at Jerusalem. He accordingly asks that prayer be made > "That I may be delivered from them that do not believe in Judæa; and that my service which I have for Jerusalem may be accepted of the saints" (Rom. xv. 31).

"May be accepted": Here, once more, we reach the key thought of this section. The Apostle had shown by a variety of ways that there could be no doubt of the Gentiles' acceptance with God, but, Religion, how cruel it can be! God may condescend to accept, but poor, puffed-up, religious flesh, may reject, and the Acts of the Apostles records the justification there was for the Apostle's fears.

In Acts xxi. 15-21 we see the Apostle arriving at Jerusalem with the gift of the churches, but there is not a single word recorded about this love-gift of the Gentile churches. Whether the church accepted, rejected, tolerated or ignored it we are left to surmise. What is written is that it involved the Apostle in defending himself so that he was found in the temple accused of sacrilege, and taken prisoner.

He had written to the Roman church:

> "When therefore I have performed this, and have sealed to them this fruit, I will come by you into Spain, and I am sure that when I come unto you, I shall come in the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ" (Rom. xv. 28, 29).

But whether the Apostle ever reached Spain is a moot point. Some think there is sufficient testimony for the belief after his liberation at the close of the Acts, he did. Others are equally convinced that he never reached Spain. However that may be, in one thing he was not disappointed. He did go to Rome in the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ, for though he went a prisoner and not as he expected, a free man, in that Roman prison such fulness of blessing was made known as to eclipse all that had gone before.

The Apostle ends this section with a reference to the God of Peace. The structure throws three similar references into correspondence.

C1	xv. 13.	THE GOD OF HOPE.
C2	xv. 33.	THE GOD OF PEACE.
C3	xvi. 20.	THE GOD OF PEACE.

A common hope bound Jew and Gentile believers together, for the presence of the God of Peace demanded actual acceptance. Whatever failure might result from human weakness, the Apostle could and did rest in that perfect accomplishment that existed already in "Christ". He desired and prayed and worked for its manifestation, but did not despair when over and over again the "creature" failed. As we shall presently read, this same God of Peace shall shortly bruise Satan under the feet of the saints and then, if not before, acceptance and unity will be perfect and complete.

Some Titles of Scripture.

#1. Wheat.
p. 60

> "The prophet that hath a dream, let him tell a dream; and he that hath My word, let him speak My word faithfully. What is the chaff to the wheat? Saith the Lord" (Jer. xxiii. 28).

If in days when "dreams" were sometimes divinely chosen as a vehicle of inspiration, such language could be used by Jeremiah, how much more should we resolutely set aside all such self-evolved teaching. A glance at the context of Jer. xxiii. 28 is sadly illuminating. The Lord had said: "Hearken not unto the words of the prophets that prophesy unto you." Why?

(1) "They make you vain" (Jer. xxiii. 16).
(2) "They speak a vision of their own heart, and not out of the mouth of the Lord" (Jer. xxiii. 16).
(3) "They use their tongues, and say, HE saith" (Jer. xxiii. 31).
(4) "They cause My people to err by their lies, and by their lightness" (Jer. xxiii. 32).
(5) "I sent them not, nor commanded them saith the Lord" (Jer. xxiii. 32).

Here in "the chaff", by contrast, we may discern the nature and character of "the wheat". May we exercise this spiritual discernment in a day of lies and lightness, of dreams that make men vain, of tongues—while protesting that what is uttered is the Word of God—that speak a vision of man's own heart.

#2. The Lamp and the Light.
p. 76

The Psalmist joyously confessed:

> "Thy Word is a lamp unto my feet And a light unto my path" (Psa. cxix. 105).

Parallel with this passage is the acknowledgment of the writer of the Proverbs:

> "The commandment is a lamp; and the law is light: and reproofs of instruction are the way of life" (Prov. vi. 23).

In both passages the way is in view, and the Scriptures are likened to a lantern held low, near the feet, in order that the pitfalls which awaited the traveler on an eastern road might be avoided.

The extension in Proverbs regarding "reproofs" and "instruction" indicate how the Word of God, and especially its commandments, may and should be used.

#3. The Sword of the Spirit.
p. 105

The whole armour of God is comprised of six pieces, beginning with the girdle of truth, and ending with the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God. It is the believer's only weapon.

> "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal" (II Cor. x. 4).

Our Saviour has shown us the temper of this blade, and how effective is its use in spiritual conflict. Three times was He tempted of the Devil, and three times did he meet the Adversary with the sword of the Spirit, saying: "It is written", and "It is written again".

When at last the day of revelation breaks, He will come bearing the name "The Word of God", and "out of His mouth" will go "a sharp sword" (Rev. xix. 13, 15), so that in the hour of His triumph as in the hour of His humiliation that sword of the Spirit is seen as His trusted weapon. Where He avoided other means and other weapons, how can we hope to succeed if we attempt to substitute any means of victory other than this wondrous word of God?

#4. The Word of the Lord.
p. 124

The Acts of the Apostles uses the expression "The Word of God" twelve times, and "the Word of the Lord" seven times. We have recorded some of the twelve references elsewhere. Let us here note the seven occurrences of "the Word of the Lord".

> "And when they had testified and preached the word of the Lord" (Acts viii. 25).
> "And when the Gentiles heard this, they were glad, and glorified the word of the Lord" (Acts xiii. 48).
> "And the word of the Lord was published throughout all the region" (Acts xiii. 49).
> "Paul and Barnabas continued in Antioch, teaching and preaching the word of the Lord" (Acts xv. 35).
> "Let us go again and visit our brethren in every city where we have preached the word of the Lord, and see how they do" (Acts xv. 36).
> "And they spake unto him (the Philippian jailor) the word of the Lord" (Acts xvi. 32).
> "All they which dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus, both Jews and Greeks" (Acts xix. 10).

The last reference is explicit: it says "the word of the Lord Jesus". Are we to understand the other six references in the same way? That is one question the reader may ponder. Another is, what is the difference between the expressions "The Word of God" and "the Word of the Lord", or is there no essential difference intended? If not, why is the phrase altered (see Acts xix. 10 and 20).

#4. A Correction.
p. 156

This series of short notes was written rapidly and with little thought of critical readings. We are therefore glad to acknowledge the watchful care of a fellow "Berean", who, referring to the article on page 124 of Volume XXX, points out that the text reads "The Word of the Lord" in Acts xix. 20, instead of "The Word of God". This alteration gives the more significant number of occurrences, viz., fourteen of "The Word of God" and eight of "The Word of the Lord". In the interests of accuracy, readers should make a note of the necessary correction.

#5. The Entrance.
p. 188

When the English reader sees the words: "The entrance of Thy words giveth light" (Psa. cxix. 130), it is pardonable if he understands the passage to refer to the entering of the Word of God into the heart of the believer. The word "entrance", however, means a door, and the translation "entry" would be preferable to "entrance" if ambiguity is to be avoided.

Where we have the translation "entering in" in the A.V. it is usually accompanied by such words as "the door" or "the gate". While it is perfectly true that only as the Word enters into our own hearts do we receive light, let us not lose the important lesson given here, that the Word is itself the doorway by which we may enter into light, also.

#6. The Reasonable Account.
p. 188

We have already seen that Logos, "The Word", is associated with "reason" and "account", and it may be helpful to retranslate some statements, in order to appreciate the impression that this revision makes.

> "The preaching (logos) of the Cross" (I Cor. i. 18) is the reason for, and account of, the cross.
>
> "The word (logos) of reconciliation" (II Cor. vi. 19) will be a reasonable explanation of man's need through sin, and God's provision by grace.
> "The word (logos) of truth" (Eph. i. 13) will be that reasonable account of God's Will and Way which, when believed, becomes "the gospel of your salvation" (Eph. i. 13).

Merely to introduce the word "cross" many times into a gospel address is neither an evidence of evangelical earnestness nor a guarantee that such preaching will prove to be the power of God unto salvation. There is a "reason why" intimately attached to the Cross, to Reconciliation, to Truth, the answer to which question is implicit in the "Word".

#7. The Word of God.
p. 208

This title of the Scriptures, which is of constant occurrence in the Acts of the Apostles, is an enlightening testimony to the character of the Apostle's preaching in the power of the Spirit.

> "They spake the word of God" (Acts iv. 31).
> "That they should leave the word of God" (Acts vi. 2).
> "The word of God increased" (Acts vi. 7).
> "They received the word of God" (Acts viii. 14).
> "They preached the word of God" (Acts xiii. 5).
> "They desire to hear the word of God" (Acts xiii. 7).
> "They came . . . . . to hear the word of God" (Acts xiii. 44).
> "The Jews had knowledge that the word of God was preached" (Acts xvii. 13).
> "So mightily grew the word of God" (Acts xix. 20).

It is evident that the apostolic conception of the gospel found no room for questioning or setting aside the Word of God.

"The Both"; "The Twain"; "The Joint Body";
Who are they, and what do these words imply?

#3. Showing that the teaching of Ephesians and Colossians is related to the symbolic teaching of Gen. i. and ii.
pp. 26 - 29

As we read the two epistles of the Mystery, Ephesians and Colossians, we find ourselves impelled to turn back to the two opening chapters of the Book of Genesis. It is impossible, for instance, to understand the implications of the expression "before the foundation of the world" (Eph. i. 4) apart from Gen. i. 1 and 2. We have shown, in other articles, that the word katabole should be translated "overthrow" and that the two Hebrew words tohu and bohu in Gen. i. 2 ("without form and void") are applicable to the period to which the Apostle refers. The interested reader will find a fairly full exposition of the subject in Volumes IV, VI, X, XI, XII, XIII, XVI and XVIII, and should consult the Index of Volumes I-XX under the headings "Subject", "Scripture reference", and "Hebrew and Greek words explained". For the moment we merely state, without advancing proof, that Eph. i. 4 is a definite link, binding the revelation of the Mystery with Gen. i. We are not, of course, suggesting that the Mystery was made known in Gen. i.; all we affirm is that one must be acquainted with Genesis if the distinctive calling of the Mystery is to be appreciated.

In Eph. i. 22 we have the expression "all things under His feet" in connection with Christ and His relationship to the Church which is His body. This expression is quoted from Psalm viii., which itself looks back to Adam in his capacity as a shadow of Christ.

The fact of creation is an integral part of Paul's exposition of the Mystery.

> "We are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 10).

This is the first of the seven occurrences in Ephesians and Colossians of the verb ktizo, "to create". Let us acquaint ourselves with the remaining references:

> "For to make (created) in Himself of the twain one new man" (Eph. ii. 15).
> "The mystery . . . . . hid in God, Who created all things by Jesus Christ" (Eph. iii. 9).
> "The new man, which after God is created in righteousness" (Eph. iv. 24).
> "By Him all things were created, that are in heaven and that are in earth, visible and invisible . . . . . all things were created by Him and for Him" (Col. i. 16).
> "The new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him" (Col. iii. 10).

It is evident that creation lies behind the truth of the Mystery, and there is a pointed reference to Gen. i. 26—"Let Us make man in Our image", both in the title of Christ given in Col. i. 16 and in the renewal of the new man in iii. 10.

The verse that immediately follows Gen. i. 26 reads as follows:

> "So God created man in His Own image, in the image of God created He HIM; male and female He THEM" (Gen. i. 27).

This important fact is mentioned again in the genealogy of Gen. v.:

> "This is the book of the generations of Adam. In the day that God created man, in the likeness of God made He HIM, male and female created He THEM; and blessed them, and called THEIR name Adam, in the day when they were created" (Gen. v. 1, 2).

The conjectures of those who consider that man was originally hermaphrodite in constitution are quite uncalled for, for the inspired Scriptures definitely affirm:

> "Adam was first formed, then Eve" (I Tim. ii. 13).
> "The man is not of the woman, but the woman of the man. Neither was the man created for the woman; but the woman for the man" (I Cor. xi. 8, 9).

Adam was permitted to feel his need before the woman was made and presented to him:

> "For Adam there was not found a help meet for him" (Gen. ii. 20).
> "I will make a help meet for him" (Gen. ii. 18).

The actual process of the formation of the woman is described as follows:

> "And the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam and he slept; and He took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof; and the rib which the Lord God had taken from man, made he a woman, and brought her unto the man" (Gen. ii. 21, 22).

Sleep is a recognized symbol of death, both in the Old Testament and in the New. In Psalm xiii. we read: "Lighten mine eyes, lest I sleep the sleep of death" (Psa. xiii. 3), and in the only reference to "sleep" in Ephesians (v. 14) it is again used as a symbol of death.

The Hebrew word translated "rib" in this passage is never so translated again in the A.V. although the word (tsela) occurs 42 times. It is mostly translated "side" (19 times) and "side chamber" (9 times). There are ten occurrences in Ezekiel, of which nine are rendered "side chamber", and one "one over another" (literally, "side chamber over side chamber"). It would appear that from Adam was taken a "side chamber" or "cell", the process of procreation being miraculously carried through without human intervention, just as, in the Gospels, we have the miraculous turning of water into wine.

When the woman was presented to Adam he exclaimed:

> "This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh" (Gen. ii. 23), and to this Moses adds the inspired comment:

> "Therefore shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh" (Gen. ii. 24).

It is this passage that the Apostle quotes in Eph. v. 31, adding the comment: "This is a great mystery: but I speak concerning Christ and the church" (Eph. v. 32). The husband is exhorted here to consider his wife as his own body and his own flesh. The Apostle refers to this union of husband and wife as a great mystery, but adds that he is concerned with that of which this union was a symbol—"Christ and His church".

The Apostle uses the word duo, "two" or "twain", only twice in the Epistle to the Ephesians:

> "To make in Himself of the twain one new man" (Eph. ii. 15).
> "They two shall be one flesh" (Eph. v. 31).

It is difficult to believe that there is no intentional connection between these two passages.

The statements we have quoted from Genesis are all associated with Paradise, before the entry of the Serpent and before the fall. The Mystery likewise is not associated with the rest of Adam's story, except for the fact that members of the Body, in common with all men, were by nature children of wrath even as others.

To sum up, then, we have found that the Apostle has most definitely associated the Mystery with the first two chapters of Genesis and that he has actually quoted the reference to "the twain being one flesh" in a practical context, where the literal union of husband and wife is linked with the mystery of Christ and His church. The way in which these things bear upon the question before us must be considered in our next article.

#4. "The Joint Body" in the light of Eph. ii. 15, iv. 13, v. 31, and Gen. i. 27 & ii. 24.

pp. 66 - 69

In our exposition of the Epistle to the Ephesians, we drew attention to the fact that the word translated "man" in Eph. iv. 13 is the same as that translated "husband" in Eph. v. 22, 23, 24, 25 and 33. As the word aner is translated "husband" as many as fifty times, it would seem that we are right in saying that the Church, which is His body, is to be the perfect "husband". Now the word "husband" is a relative term, and is meaningless without the related word "wife". The word aner must refer to a man who is either actually married, or is capable of marriage. When, however, the Apostle speaks of the "new man", he does not use aner but anthropos, a word which is much wider in its scope, and includes men, women and children. This is the word that is found in Eph. ii. 15 and v. 24, and is implied in Col. iii. 10 (see Col. iii. 9, where it is used in the expression "the old man"). It is clear, therefore, that the word anthropos, while including the aner of Eph. iv. 13, could also include any other company of believers, such as the Bride, without intruding into the peculiar blessings that attach to the Church of the Mystery. And when we turn to Eph. ii., where the expression "the new man" is used, we find that this "new man" is composed of "the both", or "the twain".

In the LXX the word "man" in Gen. i. 26, 27 is anthropos, including both "male and female". This usage is parallel with that of Eph. ii. where the anthropos, or "new man" is composed of "the both" or "the twain", and in contrast with that of Gen. ii. 23, where the LXX uses the restricted word aner: "She was taken out of man." The man Adam himself was aner, while the man in whom there could be both male and female was anthropos, and we observe that these distinctions are maintained by the Apostle in writing to the Ephesians.

We must now ask the reader to exercise a little patience while we endeavour to draw attention to the usage of other terms.

The A.V. rendering: "To make in Himself of twain one new man" (Eph. ii. 15), needs amending in one or two points. The words "to make" should read "to create", the article should be read before the word "twain", and the preposition eis should appear before the words "one new man".

The word eis means "unto", and in many places where it is used it suggests a goal towards which something moves. The following occurrences taken from Ephesians itself will show that this is so:

> "Until the redemption of the purchased possession" (Eph. i. 14).
> "That ye may know what is the hope" (Eph. i. 18).
> "With all the fulness of God" (Eph. iii. 19).
> "Throughout all ages, world without end" (Eph. iii. 21).
> "Until we all come in the unity of the faith . . . . . unto a perfect man" (Eph. iv. 13).
> "Sealed unto the day of redemption" (Eph. iv. 30).

It can readily be seen that something future is introduced by the word eis in each of the instances cited above. The day of redemption, in the first passage, is obviously future, and the knowledge as to what was the hope, in the second, was contingent upon acknowledgment and therefore also future.

The "unity of the faith" and the "perfect man" were also future with respect to the gifts given by the ascended Christ. And so, when we read in Eph. ii. 15: "To create in Himself of the twain unto one new man", the "one new man" is not necessarily to be regarded as being already in existence, but rather as the goal towards which this creative act was directed. The recognition of this untranslated preposition becomes even more important when we discover that there is another untranslated eis in Eph. v. 31, to which The Companion Bible draws attention. Translated literally, Eph. v. 31 reads: "And they shall be, the two, unto one flesh."

"Unto one new man"—"unto one flesh". The "new man" is the goal of this act of creating, and the "one flesh" is the goal of this act of being joined together.

Those who are represented as "the both" and "the twain" are further spoken of as those that were "far off" and those that were "nigh". We know that the "far off" ones in this passage are the Gentiles, for verse 13 definitely says so:

> "But now in Christ Jesus, ye who sometimes were afar off are made nigh by the blood of His cross."

We also know that this gracious work is being accomplished "now". Those that were "nigh", therefore, must be the other company which, together with the Gentiles, constitute "the both" and "the twain".

Let us now turn our attention for the moment to that most important yet difficult passage, Eph. iii. 6—and particularly to the central member, "The same body". Most readers know that this is an inadequate translation of the word sussomos. The R.V. has endeavoured to meet the difficulty by the rendering "fellow-members", but this is a private interpretation, and not a translation, for the Greek word soma must always mean a "body" and not a "member". The translators of both Versions evidently found it difficult to express the meaning of the word they had before them. Sun (the first part of sussomos) is found in combination with more than eighty different words, but is never translated "the same" except in Eph. iii. 6. We have nothing in our language to express sussomos except the words "joint body", but what a "joint body" can be we have no conception or experience. We could understand a body being made up of fellow-members, but that is not the revelation of Eph. iii. 6. May it not be that this peculiar word was adopted by the Apostle to enshrine the oneness that will be brought about when "the both" become "one new man"? That is the suggestion before us, and it seems to be supported by the references in Eph. ii. and v. to Gen. i. and ii.

Returning to Eph. ii., with this peculiar unity in mind, let us seek to reach a conclusion. The reconciliation and oneness of these two companies has been potentially accomplished "by the cross", and is already entered "in one spirit". If the analogy of Gen. ii. be legitimate, this complete oneness will be enjoyed in reality after the "deep sleep" that intervenes before the resurrection, and then, in the glory of the Lord, both John xvii. and Col. iii. will find their fulfillment.

> "And the glory which Thou gavest Me, I have given them: that they may be one, even as we are one. I in them, and Thou in Me, that they may be perfected into one . . . . . that they may behold My glory, which Thou hast given Me: for Thou lovest Me before the overthrow of the world."

The perfect Man (or "husband") and the perfect Bride will, while retaining the distinctive peculiarities of their respective callings, become in the future "one new man", even as Adam was, in the beginning, the covering name for both male and female. The full reconciliation which is found only in Ephesians and Colossians (apokatalasso, not katalasso) goes back beyond the choice of Israel and the "giving up" of the nations, before the alienation of man in the fall, to the primal enmity that brought about the overthrow of the world, as depicted in Gen. i. 2. Just as God's answer to this overthrow was the creation of Adam, with its mystery of the twain being nevertheless “one flesh”, so, in the glorious fulfillment of the type, the creation of “the both” as “one new man” will bring the purpose of the ages to completion, and God will be “all in all”.

We do not pretend to have exhausted this great theme. The notes given in these articles are intended simply as an apologetic, while the subject is still fresh in mind and heart. We must return to the subject in subsequent issues when more mature thought has been given to its many details, and when a fuller research has been made into the message of the Epistles. Before this can be undertaken with any hope of further in the Gospel according to John, and these will necessarily take some time to complete.

May the Lord give light and grace, and may we be thankful for every illumination that He grants upon the present constitution of the Mystery, and the future glory of its inheritance.

Things that be of God.

#9. The gift of God.

p. 20

There are nineteen occurrences of the word doron, "gift", in the N.T. Twelve occur in the Gospels, and without exception these references speak of the presentation of gifts or offerings by man to God. Five occurrences are found in Hebrews, where in four cases the word is used of the "gifts and sacrifices" offered to God by the priest, and once of the offering made by Abel. Rev. xi. 10 uses the word for gifts sent from one person to another. Thus eighteen out of the total number of nineteen references use the word as of a gift offered by man, either to God or to his fellow-men. The one glorious exception is that of Eph. ii. 8: "It is the gift of God." Here in the dispensation of the Mystery, it is God Who comes out to sinful man with His gift, and not man who brings the gift to God. Let us treasure this evidence of the rich grace that characterizes the dispensation under which we have been called.

The Volume of the Book.

#34. An Examination of Evidences. The R.V. Readings of Mark xvi. 9-20 and Luke ii. 14.

pp. 37 - 40

Let us now examine one or two passages in the R.V. where serious alterations have been made in the actual Greek Text, and discover, if we can, what is the evidence, both for and against the alternative readings.

The Last Twelve Verses of Mark xvi.

Westcott and Hort place these verses in brackets, and in the Revised Version there is a wide space between verse 8 and 9, with the following note in the margin:

> "The two oldest Greek manuscripts and some other authorities omit from verse 9 to the end. Some other authorities have a different ending to the Gospel."

The ordinary reader would naturally assume from this that the evidence in favour of the omission is so strong that it is doubtful whether these verses should be used in any argument or as a basis for teaching. Yet the facts of the case produce a very different effect upon the mind, and one wonders what ulterior motives could have prompted the marginal note and the brackets introduced by Westcott and Hort.

The Vaticanus and Sinaiticus omit the verses concerned, and a few late MSS exhibit a wretched alternative. Eusebius also says that these verses were often omitted. On the other hand, over against this testimony, we have the following consentient voice of antiquity:

> 2ND CENTURY.—The Old Latin and the Syriac Versions. Papias, Justyn Martyr, Irenaeus and Tertullian.

Before, therefore, the Vatican or the Sinaitic MSS were written, there existed this ancient evidence to the fact that Mark xvi. 9-20 formed a part of the Received Text.

> 3RD CENTURY.—The Coptic and the Sahidic Versions. Hippolytus, Vincentius and the seventh council of Carthage, the Acta Pilati, and the Apostolical Constitutions.

Here, then, is abundant evidence that these verses were accepted as genuine before ever the Vatican Manuscript saw the light.

The Vaticanus is considered to belong to the fourth century, and it will be interesting to see next what evidence this century has to offer.

4TH CENTURY.—Cureton's Syriac and the Gothic Versions. The Syriac Table of Canons. Eusebius, Macariuus Magnes, Aphraates, Didymus, the Syriac "Acts of the Apostles", Epiphahgius, Leontius, Ephraem, Ambrose, Chrysostom, Jerome and Augustine.

Even after the Vatican and Sinaitic MSS were written, the testimony to Mark xvi. 9-20 still continues.

5TH CENTURY.—The Armenian Version. Codices A and C. Leo, Nestorius, Cyril of Alexandria, Victor of Antioch, Patricius, Marius Mercator.

6Th and 7TH CENTURY.—Codex D. The Gregorian and Æthiopic Versions, Hesychius, Gregentius, Prosper, John Abp. of Thessalonica and Modestus, Bishop of Jerusalem.

Writing to Bishop Ellicott with regard to the last twelve verses of Mark xvi., Dean Burgon says:

"Permit me to declare that I hold your disallowance of S. Mark xvi. 9-20 to be the gravest and most damaging of all the many mistakes which you and your friends have committed. 'The textual facts' say you, 'have been placed before the reader, because the Truth itself demanded it'. This, with Canon Cook, I entirely deny. It is because the textual facts have NOT been placed before the reader that I am offended."

In his "unanswered and unanswerable" work on Mark xvi., Dean Burgon had already written:

"The consentient witness of the manuscripts is even extraordinary. With the exception of the two uncial manuscripts just named, there is not one codex in existence, uncial or cursive (and we are acquainted with at least eighteen other uncials and about six hundred cursives of this gospel) which leaves out the last twelve verses of S. Mark. The omission of these twelve verses, I repeat, in itself destroys our confidence in Codex B (Vaticanus) and Codex Sinaiticus."

Speaking of the R.V. marginal note, he comments:

"But now, for the use of whom has this piece of information been volunteered? Not for the learned certainly, it being familiarly known to all, that codices B and Aleph alone of manuscripts (to their own effectual condemnation) omit these 12 verses. They also know that these 12 verses have been made the subject of a separate treatise extending to upwards of 300 pages—which treatise has now been before the world for a full decade of years, and for the best of reasons has never yet been answered."

We trust that sufficient has been said to enable the reader to form his own conclusions about Mark xvi. 9-20, and we now pass on to Luke ii. 14.

The Revisers' Reading of Luke ii. 14.

The R.V. of Luke ii. 14 reads as follows:

"On earth peace among men in whom He is well pleased."

A marginal note adds: "Gr. Men of good pleasure", the proposed Greek text being en anthropois eudokias. Scrivener, himself one of the Revisers, speaks of this text and translation as one that "can be arrived at, only through some process which would make any phrase bear almost any meaning the translator might like to put upon it". Every known copy of the Gospels, excepting only the Sinaiticus, Alexandrian, Vaticanus and Bezae, contains the words as found in the Received Text of the A.V. Even the Sinaiticus and the Bezae were corrected in ancient times and brought into conformity with the Received Text; and the Alexandrian on another page perpetuates what is known as the "Morning Hymn", in which the Received Text is preserved. It will be seen, therefore, that even these MSS cannot be ranged against the A.V. The A.V. reading is found in the two Syriac Versions, and in the Coptic, while the Armenian, Georgian, Æthiopic, Slavonic and Arabian versions all testify to the truth of the A.V. The Latin copies and the Gothic versions alone agree with the R.V. reading.

> "It therefore comes to this: We are invited to make our selection between every other copy of the Gospels, every known Lectionary, and (not least of all) the ascertained ecclesiastical usage of the Eastern Church from the beginning, on the one hand; and the testimony of four codices, without a history or a character, which concour in upholding a patent mistake, on the other" (Dean Burgon).

Added to this, we have twenty-nine "Fathers", ranging from the 2nd century to the 8th, as well as eighteen names whose actual identity and date are open to question.

> "It will be perceived that 18 ancient authorities have been added to the list, every whit as competent to witness what was the text of Luke ii. 14 at the time when A, B, Aleph and D were written, as Basil or Athanasius, Epiphanius or Chrysostom themselves."

Moreover, the wide-spread character of the testimony is all in its favour. The "Fathers" who testify to the Received Text lived in Gaul, Constantinople, Asia Minor, Antioch, Syria, Palestine, Alexandria, Cyprus and Crete.

> "If the articulate voices of so many illustrious Bishops, coming back to us in this way from every part of ancient Christendom and all delivering the same unfaltering message—if this be not allowed as decisive on a point of the kind just now before us, pray let us have it explained to us, what amount of evidence will men accept as final . . . The history of the reading advocated by the Revisionists is briefly this. It emerges into notice in the 2nd Century; and in the 5th disappears from sight entirely" (Dean Burgon).

In order to leave no loophole, "to leave no dark corner standing for the ghost of a respectable doubt hereafter to hide in", Dean Burgon has patiently compared various readings of the context of Luke ii. 14 as given in the five MSS which have had such an influence over the R.V. We will not weary the reader with an exhibition of this labour of love. The Dean discovered within these 15 verses (Luke ii. 1-15) no less than 56 different "readings" and 70 differences from the cursive MSS. 19 words are omitted, 4 added, 17 substituted, 10 altered, and 24 transposed. With such evidence before us, we can heartily sympathize with the Dean when he says:

> "And now—for the last time we ask the question—With what show of reason can the unintelligible eudokias (of Aleph A B D) be upheld as genuine, in defiance of the whole body of Manuscripts, uncial and cursive, the great bulk of the Versions, and the mighty array (upwards of fifty) of Fathers exhibited above?"

All this may sound at first hearing very unsettling, but it is only so with regard to the attempts of the Revisionists—and Drs. Westcott and Hort in particular—to uphold the readings of one or two MSS in spite of overwhelming evidence to the integrity of the text of the A.V. We would still urge the reader to use the R.V. as an aid, but he should be extremely careful not to build any doctrine upon its many and serious alterations of the Greek Text, without the most thorough investigation.

#35. The R.V. and its treatment of two important passages. "God manifest in the flesh" (I Tim. iii. 16). "Who is over all, God blessed for ever" (Rom. ix. 5).

pp. 93 - 97

It is not our intention to pursue the question of textual criticism, and its bearing upon the Greek Text of the Revised Version, to any great length. We are, however, deeply concerned with regard to the integrity of the Word of God, and it is in order that the reader may be alive to the issues in this connection, that we have said so much already, and say a little more here.

One of the most serious alterations made by the Revisers is that found in I Tim. iii. 16.

The A.V. reads:

"Great is the mystery of godliness; God was manifest in the flesh."

The R.V. reads:

"Great is the mystery of godliness, He Who was manifested in the flesh."

According to the conditions under which the Revisers worked, none but "plain and clear errors" were to be allowed to justify any alteration in the text, and any such alteration was only to be permitted upon "decidedly preponderating evidence". It is not easy, without the use of Greek type, to show the English reader how the two words "God" and "Who" can come to be mistaken for one another. In the manuscripts the names and titles of God are always abbreviated—rather as though we used the letters "Gd" to represent "God". Now the Greek word for "God" is THEOS, while the Greek word for "Who" is OS. The Greek letter for "Th" is a capital "O", having a horizontal stroke through the centre. If, therefore, the central stroke is removed, the word then reads "Who", instead of "God". To indicate that any particular word was abbreviated, the scribe placed a very thin line over it, but, with the lapse of centuries, these thin lines have disappeared in many places owing to the fading of the ink.

To deal adequately with the evidence for I Tim. iii. 16, we must first say something about the Alexandrian Manuscript. This manuscript is now in the British Museum, but it has been so much handled that the passage in question can no longer be read with sufficient clearness to settle the point. Bishop Ellicott is supposed to have satisfied himself that the bar that turns "O" into "Th" in the word for "God" is really a bar from the letter epsilon which stands on the back page. But, as Dean Burgon rightly insists, unless we start with the major premiss that "Theta cannot exist on one side of a page, if epsilon stands immediately behind it on the other side", this proves nothing with certainty. Moreover, Tregelles, Scrivener and others also held the same leaf up to the light, and discovered that the sagitta of the epsilon on fol. 145*b* does not cover much more than a third of the area of the Theta on fol. 145*a*, and further, that it cuts the circle too high.

We quote below an extract, in connection with this passage, from the writings of Dean Burgon:

> "How is it, my Lord Bishop, that you do not perceive that the way to ascertain the reading of Codex A and I Tim. iii. 16 is (1) To investigate, not what is found at the back of the leaf, but what is written on the front of it? and (2) Not so much to enquire what can be deciphered of the original writing by the aid of a powerful lens now, as to ascertain what was apparent to the eye of competent observers when the codex was first brought into this country, viz. 250 years ago? That Patrick Young, the first custodian and collator of the Codex (1628-1652) read Theos, is certain. Young communicated the 'various readings' of A to Abp. Ussher: and the latter, prior to 1653, communicated them to Hammond, who clearly knew nothing of OS. It is plain that Theos was the reading seen by Huish—when he sent his collation (made, according to Bentley, with great exactness) to Brian Walton, who published the fifth volume of his Polyglott in 1657. Bp. Pearson, who was very curious in such matters, says, 'We find not OS in any copy'—a sufficient proof of how he read the place in 1659. Bp. Fell, who published an edition of the N.T. in 1675 certainly considered Theos the reading of Cod. A. Mill, who was at work on the text of the N.T. from 1677 to 1707, expressly declares that he saw the remains of Theos in this place. Bentley, who had himself collated the MS with utmost accuracy, knew nothing of any other reading. Emphatic testimony on the subject is borne by Wotton in 1718: 'There can be no doubt' (he says) 'that this MS always exhibited Theos'. Of this, any one may easily convince himself who will be at the pains to examine the place with attention. Two years earlier (we have it on the testimony of Mr. John Creyk of S. John's Coll., Cambridge) 'the old line in the letter Th was plainly to be seen'. It was much about the same time also (viz. about 1716) that Wetstein acknowledged to the Rev. John Kippax,--'who took it down in writing from his own mouth, that though the middle stroke of the Theta has been evidently retouched, yet the fine stroke which was originally in the body of the Theta is discoverable at each end of the fuller stroke of the corrector'.
>
> And Berriman himself (who delivered a course of Lectures on the true reading of I Tim. iii. 16 in 1737-8) attests emphatically that he had seen it also.
> 'If therefore', (he adds) 'at any time hereafter the old line should become altogether undiscoverable, there will never be just cause to doubt but that the genuine and original reading of the MS was Theos: and that the new strokes, added to the top and in the middle by the corrector were not designed to counter and falsify (indeed they were clumsily drawn in common black ink) but to preserve and perpetuate the true reading, which was in danger of being lost by the decay of time'.

> The sum of the matter is this—That it is too late by 150 years to contend on the negative side of the question. Prebendiary Scrivener assures us that in Feb. 7, 1861 he actually discerned, still lingering, a faint trace of the diameter of the Theta which Berriman in 1741 had seen so plainly. 'I have examined Codex A at least twenty times within as many years' (wrote Scrivener in 1874) 'and seeing (as every one must) with my own eyes, I have always felt convinced that it reads Theos'."

In addition to the testimony adduced by Dean Burgon we may add that of the more recent photographs of the passage, in which the camera replaces not only the missing bar in Theta, but also in several letters on either side, notably in the word eusebeian, "godliness".

Without going further into the evidence for Theos (which nevertheless is open for all interested students to examine, and is set out in full detail in Dean Burgon's reply to Bishop Ellicott), we will be content to quote the Dean's summary.

With regard to the reading adopted by the R.V., he writes:

> "This is not found in more than two copies of St. Paul's epistles, is not certainly supported by a single version, and is not clearly advocated by a single Father.
>
> Behold then the provision which the Author of Scripture has made for the effectual conservation in its integrity of this portion of His written Word! Upwards of eighteen hundred years have run their course since the Holy Ghost by His servant Paul, rehearsed the 'mystery of Godliness', declaring this to be the foundation fact, namely, that 'God was manifest in the flesh'. And lo, out of two hundred and fifty-four copies of St. Paul's epistles, no less than two hundred and fifty-two are discovered to have preserved that expression. Such consent amounts to unanimity, and unanimity in this subject matter, is conclusive.
> The copies of which we speak were produced in every part of ancient Christendom, being derived in every instance from copies older than themselves . . . . . they have since found their way, without design or contrivance, into the libraries of every country of Europe, where, for hundreds of years they have been jealously guarded . . . . . For what conceivable reason can this multitude of witnesses be supposed to have entered into a united conspiracy to deceive mankind?"

The A.V. Greek text represents the reading of 289 Manuscripts, 3 Versions, and upwards of 20 Greek fathers. With such overwhelming evidence before us, the reader will understand why, in The Berean Expositor, we have consistently ignored the depraved text adopted by the R.V. and have always quoted the A.V. rendering: "God manifest in the flesh."

We must now pass on to another emendation, which, like that of I Tim. iii. 16, is definitely opposed to the doctrine of the Deity of Christ.

In the R.V. of Rom. ix. 5 we find the following marginal note:

> "Some modern interpreters place a full stop after flesh, and translate, He Who is God over all be (is) blessed for ever: or, He Who is over all is God, blessed for ever. Others punctuate, flesh, who is over all. God be (is) blessed for ever."

To quote Dean Burgon again:

> "A grander or more unequivocal testimony to our Lord's eternal Godhead is nowhere to be found in Scripture. Now this is a matter—let it be clearly observed—which (as Dr. Hort is aware) belongs to Interpretation, and not to Textual Criticism. What business has it then in these pages at all? Is it then the function of Divines appointed to revise the Authorized Version, to give information to the 90 millions of English-speaking Christians scattered throughout the world as to the unfaithfulness of 'some modern Interpreters'? We have hitherto supposed that it was 'Ancient authorities' exclusively (whether 'a few' or 'some' or 'many') to which we are invited to submit our judgment. How does it come to pass that the Socinian gloss on this grand text (Rom. ix. 5) has been brought into such extraordinary prominence? Did our Revisionists consider that their marginal note would travel to earth's remotest verge—give universal currency to the view of 'some modern Interpreters', and in the end 'tell it out, among the heathen' also? We refer to Manuscripts, Versions, Fathers: and what do we find?
>
> (1) It is demonstrable that the oldest codices, besides the whole body of Cursives, know nothing about the method of 'some modern Interpreters'.
>
> (2) There is absolutely not a shadow, nor a tittle of evidence, in any of the ancient versions to warrant what they do.
> (3) How, then, about the old Fathers? We find that the expression 'Who is over all (things), God blessed for ever' is expressly acknowledged to refer to our Saviour by the following 60 illustrious names."

Here follow the names of 60 "Fathers", together with the number of times each has cited Rom. ix. 5 as referring to the Saviour.

The Dean continues:

> "Against such an overwhelming torrent of Patristic testimony, it will not surely be pretended that the Socinian interpretation, to which our Revisionists give such prominence, can stand. But why was it introduced at all? . . . . . Indifferent scholarship, and mistaken views of Textual Criticism, are at least venial matters. But a Socinian gloss gratuitously thrust into the margin of every Englishman's N.T. admits of no excuse—is not to be tolerated on any terms.

Sufficient has now been said to suggest that the reader should treat the R.V. with care. We are not blind to its excellencies, and in earlier articles we have endeavoured to do them justice. On the other hand, we are also not blind to its extremely dangerous tendencies, which attack both the living Word and the written Word (I Tim. iii. 16; II Tim. iii. 16 R.V.). We have quoted very fully from the writings of Dean Burgon, and we hope that those who need further evidence will be encouraged to give his witness a careful hearing. His book "The Revision Revised", published by John Murray, can be obtained second-hand at prices ranging from about five to ten shillings, according to condition.

Let no one misunderstand our attitude with regard to this question of the Authorized and Revised Versions. Because we reject, in certain cases, the text substituted by the Revisers, this does not imply either a blind following of the A.V., or any lack of appreciation of the undoubted merits of the R.V. We have endeavoured to put before the reader the main issues, and we must there leave the matter. May each of us manifest more fully that true Berean spirit, that searches to see “whether these things are so”.

TO ALL OF LIKE PRECIOUS FAITH,

The completion of another year of testimony in the midst of conflict, brings to mind Wycliffe's translation of Gen. xxxix. 2, "The Lord was with Joseph, and he was a luckie fellow".

We look back over the years that have passed, during which two "World Wars" have raged, yet with all the changes in life, outlook, work and opportunity, the Scripture has proved true, which says:--

> "He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee . . . . . Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever" (Heb. xiii. 5, 8).

It was upon this glorious note that the Apostle Paul finished his testimony:--

> "All men forsook me . . . . . notwithstanding the Lord stood with me: that by me the preaching might be fully known, and that all the Gentiles might hear: and I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion" (II Tim. iv. 16, 17).

Without assuming that there is anything comparable in our testimony with that of the Apostle, we have confidence that in so far as The Berean Expositor is in line with the will of the Lord, so we may expect that these precious promises will be once more fulfilled in our experience.

Yours in the bond of peace,

The Acts of the Apostles.

#43. The Third Missionary Journey (xix. 21 - xxi. 39). The Prison Ministry Foreshadowed (xx. 17 - 38). "Pure from the blood of all men" (xx. 22 - 27). pp. 26 - 32

From verse 18 to verse 21 of Acts xx. we have followed the Apostle's description of the nature and substance of the ministry that he commenced in Acts ix., and that was now drawing to its close. At verse 22 we are conscious of a change:

> "And now, behold, I go bound in the spirit unto Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there; save that the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, saying that bonds and afflictions abide me" (Acts xx. 22, 23).

"I go bound in the spirit."—The fact that in the next verse the Apostle speaks of "The Holy Ghost" suggests that the earlier phrase should be interpreted in the sense that the Apostle, though still outwardly a free man, was nevertheless already "in the spirit" entering into, by anticipation, the bonds and afflictions that awaited him. His missionary journeys were always under the leading or constraint of the Spirit, either directly in relation to the immediate Person of the Holy Ghost, or by the answer of his own spirit to the leading of the Lord. He had been "separated" by the Holy Ghost (Acts xiii. 2), and had been "sent forth by the Holy Ghost" (Acts xiii. 4). Sometimes, also, he had been forbidden of the Holy Ghost (Acts xvi. 6, 7). Furthermore we read in Acts xviii. 5 that Paul's spirit was stirred within him, and in Acts xix. 21 that he "purposed" in the spirit the journey that was now leading him to Jerusalem and Rome. So here, having arrived at Miletus, we find that he was already the prisoner of the Lord "in spirit". He was definitely bound for Jerusalem. On occasions in the past he had planned to visit some particular church or country but had been "let", as he told the Romans. Now, however, Jerusalem is most definitely his goal. As in the case of his Lord, there came a time when he had to set his face stedfastly towards Jerusalem, even though well-meaning disciples should urge to the contrary.

The ostensible reason for this particular journey was the delivery of the collection made among the Gentiles for the poor saints at Jerusalem. Paul's journeys to Jerusalem mark definite stages in his career. In Acts ix. 2 we read that Paul planned to bring those "of this way . . . . . bound unto Jerusalem", while after his conversion we read of his assaying to join with the disciples at Jerusalem and needing the mediation of Barnabas to break down the barrier of fear and suspicion that would have kept him out. It was at Jerusalem, also, that the decisive battle was fought for Gentile exemption from the bondage of the law (Acts xv.), and it was at some such conference as this that he was asked to "remember the poor" (Gal. ii. 10). The fulfillment of this exhortation, in the shape of an offering collected in the churches, he was about to lay at the apostle's feet in Jerusalem. While this was the ostensible object of his visit, however, the Apostle began to realize that the Lord had another purpose in view. What this purpose was he did not, at the time, fully know, except that it was connected with his ministry and would probably cost him his liberty. His attitude, however, is one of heroic acceptance:

> "But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry, which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God" (Acts xx. 24).

The Received Text here reads: "That I may finish my course with joy", but the Revised Text omits the last two words (meta charis), and there does not appear to be sufficient evidence for their retention. The Apostle might well have wished that the end of his career would be "with joy", but he was far more concerned that he should "finish", whether with joy or otherwise. Another point to note about this verse is that it provides us with a case in which the Greek logos, so often translated "word", claims its fuller meaning, "account". Also, in the phrase: "so that I might finish my course", the word os is not, strictly speaking, "so that" but rather "as". The rendering given by Alford seems to recognize these various features:

> "I hold my life of no account, nor is it so precious to me, as the finishing of my course."

This figure of a "course" or "race" is one that is characteristic of the Apostle, and he was able, at the close, to say: "I have finished my course." The word translated "course" (dromos) is borrowed from the Greek sports, and, in a verbal form, is found in I Cor. ix. 24 and Heb. xii. 1: "They which run in a race, run all . . . . . so run that ye may obtain", and "Let us run with patience the race that is set before us".

In his desire to "finish" his course the Apostle manifests once more of his conformity to his Lord, Who said near the beginning of His ministry: "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent Me, and to finish His work" (John iv. 34), and at the close: "I have finished the work which Thou gavest Me to do" (John xvii. 4). It is encouraging to remind ourselves that not all the injustice represented by Rome, could prevent either the Lord or His servant from finishing their course.

In II Tim. iv. 7, the finishing of the course is associated with keeping the faith. In Acts xx. 24, it is associated with "The ministry, which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God".

The servants of the church at Ephesus are called "presbyters" and "bishops", but the Apostle refers to his service as douleuo, "the service of a bond slave". The word he uses for his "ministry" is diakonia, which gives us the word "deacon". The Apostle uses this same word when he says: "I magnify my office" (Rom. xi. 13), and when he describes the offering he was taking to Jerusalem as "my service" (Rom. xv. 31). Moreover, the magistrate is spoken of in Romans as a "minister of God" (Rom. xiii. 4), and Christ Himself as a "minister of the circumcision" (Rom. xv. 8). The same word (diakonos) is used of Phoebe, who is called "a servant".

The same word is also used by Paul, when he claims that he had been made "a minister" in connection with the ministry of the Mystery (Eph. iii. 7 and Col. i. 23). This ministry Paul says he "received", and, in after years, he wrote to Timothy:

> "I thank Christ Jesus our Lord, Who hath enabled me, for that He counted me faithful, putting me into the ministry; who was before a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious" (I Tim. i. 12, 13).

The ministry which the Apostle received is defined in a variety of ways. In Acts ix., the Apostle was told that he was a chosen vessel to bear the name of the Lord Jesus before Gentiles and Kings, and before the children of Israel. In Acts xxvi. 16-18, we have a very full statement concerning his ministry, which we shall have to consider when we reach this chapter. Here, in chapter xx., however, it is defined very simply as a "testimony of the gospel of the grace of God". A man may be a wonderful speaker, and by the power of his oratory may be able to move his audience to tears or laughter. A man who "testifies", on the other hand, may sound in the ears of those accustomed to oratory "contemptible", and yet his words may carry conviction, and move his audience, not merely to tears but to repentance and faith. A "witness", however, can scarcely hope for a hearing if his manner of life does not agree with his doctrine. In the N.T. preacher and teacher alike are given the title "witness". John the Baptist was sent to "bear witness" of the Light (John i. 7), and in Acts i. 8 we read that the apostles were appointed at Jerusalem as "witnesses", the resurrection being specially stressed as the object of their witness (Acts i. 22). The whole of Paul's ministry is summed up by the Lord himself as a "witness", for in Acts xxiii. we read:

> "Be of good cheer, Paul; for as thou hast testified of Me in Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at Rome" (Acts xxiii. 11).

The Apostle himself sums up his ministry in similar terms when speaking before Agrippa:

> "Having therefore obtained help of God, I continue unto this day, witnessing both to small and great, saying none other things than those which the Prophets and Moses did say should come"(Acts xxvi. 22).

It was because Paul was a witness that he served with humility, for he could take no personal credit for his message. As a witness (or martyr), he was not deflected from the path of faithfulness by either tears or temptations. As a witness, he kept back nothing that was profitable. As a witness he "testified" to both Jews and Greeks. Even though at Jerusalem bonds and afflictions awaited him, these things could not hinder his witness, though they might completely prevent other forms of service.

Resuming the description of his ministry, the Apostle continues, in verse 25:

> "And now, behold, I know that ye all, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God, shall see my face no more. Wherefore I take you to record this day, that I am pure from the blood of all men" (Acts xx. 25, 26).

We must defer consideration of the phrase "the kingdom of God" until we reach the end of the Acts. It is obvious, however, from the passage quoted above, taken in conjunction with verses 19-21, that the preaching of "the kingdom of God" included "repentance" and "faith".

With the words "ye all shall see my face no more", the Apostle reaches the particular part of his address that was personal both to himself and to the Ephesian Church. This is evident in verse 38 where we read: "Sorrowing most of all for the words which he spake, that they should see his face no more." Because of certain obscure references in the Epistles to Timothy, it has been assumed by some that Paul did in fact see the Ephesian Church again. In I Tim. i. 3 we read: "As I besought thee to abide still in Ephesus, when I went into Macedonia." These words have been construed into meaning that Paul himself had been in Ephesus. The passage is an example of an "interrupted structure" in a sentence, a feature that finds many illustrations in the Apostle's vivid writing. As examples that are fairly obvious to the English reader we may quote Gal. ii. 4 and ii. 6. The words kathos paraklesa ("As I besought") are without an apodosis.* (* - The apodosis is the concluding clause of a sentence, usually conditional, e.g., "If thine enemy hunger, feed him".). The thought seems to be: "As I besought thee then, so I beseech thee now." Paul does not say that he "left Titus" at Crete. There is no evidence that Paul visited Ephesus again. The passage is explained sufficiently if we understand that on some particular occasion, when sailing by Asia, Paul made this request to Timothy.

Again, in I Tim. iii. 14, the Apostle writes: "These things write I unto thee, hoping to come unto thee shortly."

Inasmuch as Paul sailed by Ephesus, and arranged to meet the elders of that church at Miletus on one occasion, there is every probability that he would make the same arrangement when he wished to see Timothy. Moreover, it is suggestive that, whereas the Apostle, writing from prison, expresses a confident hope that he would revisit the Philippian Church (Phil. i. 25; ii. 24), and in the epistle to Philemon he asks him to prepare him a lodging (Philemon 22), there is no such suggestion in the epistle to the Ephesians, or in regard to the neighbouring church at Colosse, though he writes in Col. ii. 1: "For them at Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh." We have no need, therefore, to defend the Apostle in any way. We believe that his words were true to fact, and that the Ephesian Church saw his face no more.

It is clear from Scripture that the Apostle realized, as perhaps few have done since, the solemn responsibility that attached to his position as minister. In Acts xviii. 6 we read:

> "And when the Jews opposed themselves and blasphemed, he shook his raiment, and said unto them, Your blood be on your own heads: I am clean: from henceforth I will go unto the Gentiles."

The Apostle, whose knowledge of the O.T. is apparent from his writings, had evidently pondered the solemn words of Ezekiel and had taken them to heart. In chapter xxxiii. we read:

> "If when he seeth the sword come upon the land, he blow the trumpet, and warn the people; then whosoever heareth the sound of the trumpet, and taketh not warning; if the sword come, and take him away, his blood shall be upon his own head . . . . . But if the watchman see the sword come, and blow not the trumpet . . . . . if the sword come, and take any person from among them, he is taken away in his iniquity; but his blood will I require at the watchman's hand" (Ezek. xxxiii. 1-6).

In Acts xx. 26 the Apostle declares: "I am pure from the blood of all men", and the ground of his confidence is expressed in the following verse:

> "For I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God" (Acts xx. 27).

There are some who clutch at this statement in their endeavour to moderate the teaching of Scripture concerning the Mystery, pointing to this passage as a proof that "all the counsel of God" had been made known, as though this expression covered truth which at the time of utterance had not been revealed. Those who take this view seem to forget that Paul makes another equally important statement concerning his ministry in Acts xxvi. 22:

> "Saying none other things than those which the Prophet and Moses did say should come."

The "whole counsel of God", at the time of Acts xx., was limited to the testimony of the Law and Prophets. If there was still further truth to be revealed, truth unknown to the O.T. scriptures, and not yet revealed to the Apostle, no one could possible blame Paul for not making it known, and he could obviously have no responsibility in the matter.

We must conclude our survey of this important speech in our next article.

#44. The Third Missionary Journey (xix. 21 - xxi. 39). The Prison Ministry Foreshadowed (xx. 17 - 38). Final counsel, example and commendation (xx. 28 - 38). pp. 45 - 51

In his examination of the teaching of the apostle Paul, the student of the Scriptures will have recognized that it is rare to find either believer or fellow servant exhorted to follow a particular course, without, either in the near or remote context, the Apostle himself being found practicing the precepts he preached. The elders of Ephesus had witnessed this balanced exhibition of "doctrine and manner of life" (Acts xx. 17-27), with its challenge concerning Paul's faithfulness as well as his tenderness and courage, so that the Apostle had no hesitation in introducing his correspondingly searching exhortation with the word "therefore".

It is comparatively easy to warn a company concerning the evil character of those who are without, or of those who differ from them, but this the Apostle did not do. He bade them take heed unto themselves, and said further in verse 30: "Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them."

Evidently it was a customary thing for Paul, when addressing those who held any office of responsibility in the church, to use the word prosecho, "take heed", for it is found only twice outside the pastoral epistles. To Timothy and to Titus he wrote:

> "Neither give heed to fables" (I Tim. i. 4).
> "Not giving heed to Jewish fables" (Titus i. 14).

and revealed that the apostacy of the last days would result from "giving heed to seducing spirits" (I Tim. iv. 1). As a counter to this, the same section of I Timothy emphasizes the importance of giving heed "to the reading" (I Tim. iv. 13). In the Gospels, this same word is translated a number of times "beware", as in the exhortations "beware of false prophets", "beware of the leaven of the Pharisees". The hand of Luke in the writing of Acts, or, conversely, the influence of Paul on the writing of Luke is indicated by the expression prosechete heautois, "take heed unto yourselves", for it occurs only in Luke's writings (Luke xvii. 3; xxi. 34; Acts v. 35; and xx. 28).*

> [NOTE: * - We must defer full consideration of this subject until the closing article of the series, when we hope fully to demonstrate that such an influence is not a matter of conjecture but to fact.]

The overseers of the church were "bishops", episkopoi, and we have seen that such were practically synonymous with "pastors" or "shepherds" (see Volume XXX, page 164-169). The church is therefore appropriately referred to here as a "flock". The Greek words for "feed" and "flock" are from the same root. The word for "flock" is poimne and occurs five times in the N.T. In five other places, however, the diminutive poimnion is used:

> "Fear not little flock" (Luke xii. 32).
> "All the flock . . . . . not sparing the flock" (Acts xx. 28, 29).
> "Feed the flock . . . . . ensamples to the flock" (I Pet. v. 2, 3).

The word "shepherd" is poimen (Luke ii. 8), and the word translated "feed" is poimaino. While the idea of "feeding" is prominent in this word, and Davison deduced it from Homeric word pou, "flock" and mao, "to care", the following passages will show that the thought of the exercise of "the rod and the staff" is not absent from the word.

> "Out of thee shall come a Governor that shall rule My people Israel" (Matt. ii. 6).
> "He shall rule them with a rod of iron" (Rev. ii. 27).
> "Who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron" (Rev. xii. 5).
> "He shall rule them with a rod of iron" (Rev. xix. 15).

These passages are quotations from O.T. Scriptures, those in the Revelation quoting Psalm ii., while that in Matthew quotes Micah v. Where the A.V. of the N.T. reads "rule" the A.V. of Psalm ii. 9 has "break", raa, which is a word indicating severe chastisement upon evil, and in the Hiphil* is translated "to bring evil", "to afflict" and "to punish" (Jer. xxv. 29; xxxi. 28; Zech. viii. 14). On the other hand the Hithpolel is translated "must show himself friendly" (Prov. xviii. 24), so that the affliction, though it seem evil, is for good. The word translated "ruler" in Micah v. 2 is the Hebrew mashal, which not only means to rule, to govern, or to have dominion, but "to speak or to use, parables or proverbs" (Ezek. xvii. 2; xxiv. 3) and so suggests the ruling of a people by wisdom and warning. It may be that Peter knew this double meaning, and the association of rule or dominion with the idea of a shepherd, and to save the overseers from a false assumption of power, he said:

> "Feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind; neither as being lords over God's heritage, but being ensamples to the flock" (I Pet. v. 2, 3).

> [NOTE: * - These terms and others used in concordances, etc., are indications concerning the "voice", "mood" and "tense" of Hebrew verbs. While the reader need not burden himself with these terms, he should on the other hand avoid acceptance of dogmatic assertions based merely upon a list of words. For instance, the comparison of Hiphel (causative) with say the Niphal (or middle voice) would lead to erroneous deductions.]

With these facts in mind, we can the better appreciate the meaning of the Apostle in his exhortation to the elders of Ephesus. The R.V. has the marginal note against the words "church of God": "Many ancient authorities read, the Lord."

From one angle, it makes very little difference to us whether the Apostle called the church, "the church of God" or "the church of the Lord", but it is of importance to us to see to it that we do not allow the displacement of one single word of inspired Scripture and especially in a passage that has to do with the Person of the Saviour. If the word kuriou, "Lord", had occurred in the original it is difficult to understand why anyone should alter it to read Theou, "God", for the statement, "which He hath purchased by His Own blood". In the early church there were also many who held Arian and Socinian views who would have exposed the alteration in one of their writings or controversies. If Theou, "God", was the original word, Alford says:

> "But one reason can be given why it should have been altered to Kuriou, and that one was sure to be operated. It would stand as a bulwark against Arianism*, an assertion which no skill could evade, which must therefore be modified. If Theou stood in the text originally, it was sure to be altered to Kuriou."

> [NOTE: * - Named after Arius, of the ivth century, who taught that the Son was created by the Father.]

Further, there is no other instance in the writings of Paul, where he speaks of the "church of the Lord", whereas the title the "church of God" is frequently used. We have already demonstrated that Paul's speech recorded in Acts xx. abounds in Pauline expressions, and this fact has some weight with us now. It is unsettling for the English reader to be told in the margin of the R.V. about "many ancient authorities". It might mean much or little, but inasmuch as the Revisers themselves failed to find sufficient evidence to make an alteration, the marginal note seems to us a disturbing intrusion. We would also mention for what it is worth that the finding of the "Numeric Version" favours the A.V. in its translation of the title.

Believing, then, that the original text read "church of God", we meet a very extraordinary statement.

> "The church of God, which He (i.e. God) hath purchased with His (i.e. God) own blood."

This has not been allowed to pass unmodified. There is no manuscript evidence for adding the word hiou, "son", after Tou idiou, "His own", but Dr. Hort was an adept, to use his own language, "in the art of conjectural emendation". Speaking of this mischievous practice, Dean Burgon commenting on Acts xx. 28, says:

> "We charitably presume that it is in order to make amends for having conjecturally thrust out To pascha (the Passover) from S. John vi. 4, that Dr. Hort is for conjecturally thrusting into Acts xx. 28, Hiou (after Tou idiou), an imagination to which he devotes a column and a half, but for which he is not able to produce a particle of evidence. It would result in our reading, 'to feed the Church of God, which He purchased'—(not 'with His Own blood', but)—'with the blood of His OWN SON": which has evidently been suggested by nothing so much as by the supposed necessity of getting rid of a text which unequivocally asserts that CHRIST is GOD."

The unusual expression haima Theou (blood of God) met with in Ignatius, who wrote to the Ephesians, and its equivalent in the Latin of Tertullian Sanguine Dei (blood of God) seem to demand Acts xx. 28, as its warrant. The word "purchase", peripoieomai, was to be used in writing to this same assembly (see Eph. i. 14) where peripoiesis is used for "the purchased possession". Such a church, purchased at such a price, demanded the utmost care on the part of its overseers, and the very strangeness of the Apostle's wording but strengthens his appeal. Wolves were to take advantage of the Apostle's absence, and enter in, and "out from" their own selves, self-seeking and ambitious men would rend the church.

Paul had experienced the power of "perverse things", for we meet with the word diastrepho in Acts xiii., where Elymas seeks "to turn away" the deputy from the faith, and where Paul charges him with "perverting" the right ways of the Lord. He uses the word also in Phil. ii. 15, where he speaks of a "perverse" nation.

For the space of three years the Apostle had not ceased to warn every one night and day with tears, but that witness now drew to its close. What could he do more? However faithful a testimony may be, it is marked with mortality, and by the transient nature of all flesh. But if Paul must cease, God abides, and so the Apostle points them away to the one and only source of all grace and ground of all hope, God and His Word.

> "And now, brethren, I commend you to God and to the word of His grace, which is able to build you up and to give you an inheritance among all them which are sanctified" (Acts xx. 32).

Paul's influence upon Luke is evident in the record of Acts xiv. 3, where we read:

> "Long time therefore abode they speaking boldly in the Lord, which gave testimony unto the Word of His grace, and granted signs and wonders to be done by their hands."

We have already drawn attention to the similarity of language in Acts xx. 32 with passages in Ephesians and Colossians.

Without clearer revelation it is impossible for us to decide whether the Apostle, with the new ministry in front of him with its impending change, spoke prophetically, commending these believers to "that word of His grace which . . . . . build . . . . . inheritance", but which had not yet been made known.

As Peter, it will be remembered, exhorted those who were in charge of the flock not to serve for filthy lucre but rather to be ensamples, so Paul repudiates any idea that he had been prompted by covetousness, and asserts that he was an example, saying:

> "Yea, ye yourselves know that these hands have ministered unto my necessities, and to them that were with me. I have showed you all things, how that so labouring, ye ought to support the weak, and to remember the word of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive" (Acts xx. 34, 35).

How truly the Apostle could say: "I have showed you." With an available choice of five different compounds of the word and with dieknumi itself making a sixth, the word he used for "show" was hupodeiknumi. Let us endeavour to understand the reason for his choice. He could have used deiknumi, "to show", which would have been a perfect parallel with the example of the Lord, Who, when He had spoken the word of peace "showed them" His hands and His side (John xx. 20). Paul, too, could supplement his saying in the same way, though not in the same blessed degree. Anadeiknumi, "to show up by raising aloft, hence to indicate", would hardly fit his purpose, for the word is used to indicate the choice of someone to fill an office (Acts i. 24). Apodeiknumi means "to point away from other things", with the object of focusing upon one, and so "to prove" (Acts xxv. 7), but that was not quite the suitable word. Epideiknumi means "to show up, as a specimen", "to exhibit". This the Apostle might have used, for Luke xxiv. 40 uses it of Christ showing His hands and His feet.

But Paul passes all these by, and selects the word hupodeiknumi, "to show under", to give a glimpse, to suggest, as it were, without making too much "show" in the process. Truth demanded that the Apostle should remind the Ephesians of the consistency that had always existed between his doctrine and his practice, but in giving that needful reminder a beautiful humility constrained him to seek out a word that would not be too "showy". Such is the wonder of the inspired Scriptures, their every word and part of speech yielding a full measure of teaching. The Apostle refers in the latter part of verse 39 to a saying of the Lord that is not recorded in any of the four Gospels. This is not surprising, for Luke, under the influence of Paul, in the preface to the Gospel that bears his name, makes it very evident that there were many attempts to retain the words which the Lord spoke, and John goes so far as to say that he supposed that the world itself could not contain the books that would have to be written were everything the Saviour had taught recorded. In connection with the exhortation to "support the weak" we must remember that it is only after centuries of Christian teaching, the world has become conscious that the weak have some claim for protection, and that this doctrine would have been rejected by the ordinary Roman citizen of the Apostle's day.

To revert to the narrative, the Apostle then knelt down and prayed with the little company of elders. They wept sore, falling on Paul's neck and kissing him, for he who roused undying enmity inspired also undying friendship, for they "sorrowed most" because of his words, "that they should see his face no more". "And they accompanied him to the ship."

Paul would have been the last to have rebuked these sorrowing saints. He ever blended "natural affection" with the more austere graces of his calling. He knew what it was to desire to see the face of his son Timothy once more before his death (II Tim. i. 4), and he had already written to the Thessalonians that he had "endeavoured" the more abundantly to see their face with great desire (I Thess. ii. 17), and again, in the next chapter, he wrote "Night and day praying exceedingly that we might see your face" (I Thess. iii. 10).

The full bearing of this chapter upon Paul's prison ministry will be better realized when we read chapter xxviii., and can view it shorn of the wealth of detail that has nevertheless made our study of it so precious. Like the Apostle himself, we have to "drag" ("gotten from", xxi. 1) ourselves away, for time and space have gone and we must draw to a close.

#45. The Third Missionary Journey (xix. 21 - xxi. 39). From Tyre to Jerusalem (xxi. 1 - 17).

> "And it came to pass, that after we were gotten from them, and had launched, we came with a straight course unto Coos, and the day following unto Rhodes, and from thence unto Patara. And finding a ship sailing over unto Phenicia, and went aboard, and set forth" (Acts xxi. 1, 2).

We have now reached the last stages of the fateful journey to Jerusalem. The believers seem to have clung to the Apostle up to the very point of the launching of the ship, for the words, "were gotten from them", translate apospao, a word actually used in Acts xx. 30 by the Apostle when speaking of those who would "draw away" disciples after them. "Tearing himself from them" is the translation suggested by Farrar. The wind was favourable, and they ran with a straight course to Coos. Rhodes is famous for the vast colossus which bestrode the harbour. At the time of the Apostle's visit, only the two legs remained on their pedestals, the huge body of a man in bronze which formed the upper portion of the statue having been previously hurled down by earthquake. This figure, like the Temple of Diana, was one of the seven wonders of the world, and we can well imagine that the Apostle, with recent memories of Ephesus, and the decline in the number of its idolatrous worshippers, would look upon this fallen colossus as another Dagon. We do not know the reason which caused the Apostle to disembark at Patara. It may be that Paul desire a more direct journey than by the coastal route. This is suggested by the expression, "finding a ship sailing out to Phenicia", where diaperon is used. The fact that this word is chosen to describe a journey across a lake (Matt. ix. 1) reveals the intention of Luke here in Acts xxi. 2. If the reader will take a map of Paul's journeys and join Patara on the sea coast of Asia Minor with Tyre on the coast of Palestine, the line so drawn will pass Cyprus, which will be "on the left hand" (Acts xxi. 3). Upon arrival at Tyre, the Apostle "sought out" some disciples, and tarried there seven days. Aneurischo means not merely "to find" but "to find out".

There was now no cause for anxiety as to reaching Jerusalem in time for Pentecost, since the providential discovery of the ship at Patara, and the favourable journey which they had made, left him with a fortnight to spare. There was no reason why the Apostle should proceed immediately to Jerusalem, for he knew only too well that every day he remained in Jerusalem would increase the possibility to passionate opposition and enmity arising. Had Paul the slightest uncertainty regarding his mission to Jerusalem, or had he been desirous of finding a "reason" for altering his place, he, like the tested souls of whom he wrote of Heb. xi., "might have had opportunity to return". During the seven days which he spent at Tyre, some of the disciples there, speaking through the Spirit, intimated that he should not go up to Jerusalem. This has been interpreted by some to indicate that when Paul thereafter proceeded to Jerusalem, he did it in disobedience to the Spirit's warning; we will deal with this point when we reach verse 11.

At the end of the seven days the little band moved on to their goal, and the disciples who earlier had heard the warning "not to go up", now "brought" the Apostle and his companions on their way. The Greek word propempo translated here "brought us on our way", is translated "accompanied" in Acts xx. 38. "And being brought on their way by the church" in Acts xv. 3; see also Rom. xv. 24, I Cor. xvi. 6, Titus iii. 13, and III John 6. This appears to indicate that maturer consideration had revealed the will of the Lord, and that the words spoken by the Spirit in Acts xxi. 4 were in the nature of a test and a warning—not a prohibition.

From Tyre, the last stage of the voyage was made, and the little band landed at Ptolemais, now known as Acre. The Apostle, having saluted the brethren, stayed one day. The journey to Cæsarea, a distance of some 40 miles, was probably accomplished overland. Here the Apostle waited until the eve of the feast, and found delightful and encouraging fellowship in the house of Philip the evangelist, one of the seven (Acts vi. 1-5) who was intimately linked with the fortunes of Paul, through Stephen the first Christian martyr. Philip was a Hellenist (Acts vi. 1-5), and had manifested the same spirit which moved the Apostle to the Gentiles, in that he carried the gospel to the hated Samaritans and preached it to the despised Ethiopian. What heart-searching conversation these two servants of the Lord must have had. The persecution that arose about the stoning of Stephen influenced the career of Philip, but it also was associated with the conversion, the conviction and the commission of Saul of Tarsus.

Had the writer of this article been treated with more human kindness and sympathy in his early years, he might still have been found in the ranks of the strictly orthodox, using possibly his talents to combat the teaching of the mystery; as it happened the Lord overruled painful circumstances to close many doors of so-called "opportunity", and to lead in everything but actual fetters and chains to a "prison ministry". With what joy, nevertheless, do we look back on those overrulings, and so must Philip the Evangelist and Paul the Apostle have humbly yet victoriously praised God for "sovereign grace o'er sin abounding".

Philip had four unmarried daughters, and these believing women possessed the gift of prophecy. We are not told that they uttered any specific prophecy during Paul's stay at the house, but we do read of the coming of another prophet, and what he said:

> "And as we tarried there many days, there came down from Judæa a certain prophet named Agabus. And when he was come unto us, he took Paul's girdle, and bound his own hands and feet, and said, Thus saith the Holy Ghost, So shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man that owneth this girdle, and shall deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles. And when we heard these things, both we, and they of that place, besought him not to go up to Jerusalem" (Acts xxi. 10-12).

We meet with this prophet Agabus earlier in the narrative of the Acts, for in Acts xi. 28 he is found foretelling a famine in the Roman world, which came to pass in the days of Claudius. Agabus adopted the manner of some Old Testament prophets; and enforced his spoken prophecy with dumb show. Zedekiah made horns of iron to visualize his prophecy (I Kings xxii. 11), and Isaiah walked "naked and barefoot" as a sign to the people (Isa. xx. 2).

Until now, Paul knew that bonds and afflictions awaited him, and this had been the testimony of the Holy Ghost in every city (Acts xx. 23), but now at Cæsarea, for the first time, definite particulars are given. "Jews at Jerusalem" would bring about the binding of the Apostle, and he would be delivered "into the hands of the Gentiles". Upon hearing this, both the writer of the Acts—the other companion of Paul, and the believers assembled at Cæsarea, besought him "not to go to Jerusalem". In Acts xxi. 4, no particulars are given, but they are in verses 11 and 12, and in the latter case we are sure that the urgent request "not to go up to Jerusalem" immediately followed the hearing of the prophecy.

In many particulars the apostle Paul followed the footsteps of His Lord, Who when the time came set His face as a flint to go up to Jerusalem, Matt. xx. 17, 18; Mark x. 32; and Luke xix. 28. We know, too, how Peter rebuked the Lord, when he first heard of His prospective death at Jerusalem (Matt. xvi. 21, 22), to whom the Lord had to say:

> "Get thee behind me, Satan, thou art an offence unto Me; for thou savourest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men" (Matt. xvi. 23).

This word "savourest" might be considered by a literalist too free a translation of phroneo, yet with the marginal note of Isa. xi. 3 in mind the translation of Matt. xvi. 23 is seen to be almost an inspiration:

"And shall make Him of quick understanding", margin "Scent, or, smell".

Paul, too, was given a keen scent with regard to things of God, for while fellow-believers might judge after the sight of their eyes, or argue from expediency, he had but one purpose to accomplish, and that was to go to Jerusalem, leaving the rest with His Lord. That Paul was right is made evident by the sequel:

> "Then Paul answered, What mean ye to weep and to break mine heart? for I am ready not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus. And when he would not be persuaded, we ceased, saying The will of the Lord be done" (Acts xxi. 13, 14).

What a light these few words throw upon the character of the Apostle and the strength of the temptation that beset him: "Mean ye to break my heart?" Not "cross my will" or "thwart my desire". What else could his companions say than: "The will of the Lord be done?" This incident having passed, the little party proceeded to Jerusalem. The introduction of so prosaic a fact as "we took up our carriages" (verse 15)—or in modern English: "we packed our bags", is of importance, for it shows that Paul acted with deliberate calmness, showing no symptoms of fanatical enthusiasm.

The city of Jerusalem was always crowded at the time of the feasts, and so, like the Saviour, Paul was not entertained by any of the high officials of the Church at Jerusalem, but Mnason of Cyprus, an old disciple, gave him a lodging. Mnason, with one or two other believers from Cæsarea, appears to have accompanied the Apostle, and as he was aware of the adverse prophecy, it was all the more praiseworthy that he gave such a dangerous guest hospitality. As the result his name is read, where the New Testament has penetrated, while the memory of men who commanded obeisance at the time have been forgotten. It is possible that the words archaio mathete may mean "an original disciple", i.e., one who had been brought into the light of the gospel at the visit of Paul and Barnabas to Cyprus on their first missionary journey; or it may refer to the day of Pentecost, as the word arche indicates in Acts xi. 15. With Mnason the Apostle rested upon his arrival in Jerusalem, and gathered strength for the approaching conflict. It was the Apostle's Bethany:

> "And when we were come to Jerusalem, the brethren received us gladly" (Acts xxi. 17).

This was the fifth and last recorded visit of the Apostle to Jerusalem since his conversion.

The structure of the section before us is simple:

Acts xxi. 1-17.

J | 1-3. From Miletus to Tyre.
K | 4. Prophecy. "Not go up to Jerusalem."
L | 5, 6. Departure. Accompanied.
J | 7-9 Tyre to Cæsarea.
K | 10-14. Prophecy. "Not go up to Jerusalem."
L | 15-17. Departure. Accompanied.

How intimate is the record of these days:

> "Both the state of the weather and the direction of the wind are known. We can point to the place on the map where the vessel anchored for the night, and trace across the chart the track that was followed, when the moon was full. Yet more than this. We are made fully aware of the state of the apostle's mind, and of the burdened feeling under which this journey was accomplished" (Conybeare and Howson).

All is now ready, Pentecost has come, Paul is at Jerusalem, the city teems with fanatics and enemies, but a purpose that goes back before the overthrow of the world is about to emerge, and grace beyond dreams is to be made known through this same Paul, as the prisoner of Jesus Christ for us Gentiles.

We therefore prayerfully anticipate our study of the remainder of this section of the Acts, which must occupy our attention in another article. May our sense of gratitude to the earthen vessel, and our appreciation of his loyalty amid temptation and sufferings for "His body's sake which is the church", be none the less, because, in these days so far distant from the throbbing events recorded, we are able to lift serene eyes to the unseen hand that guided and upheld the Apostle, that we through his ministry might learn of heavenly places in Christ Jesus.

#46. The Third Missionary Journey (xix. 21 - xxi. 39). The reception of the Apostle at Jerusalem (xxi. 18 - 21). pp. 113 - 117

We left the Apostle in the care of the old disciple Mnason, with whom he spent the last peaceful night that he was to know for, perhaps, the rest of his tumultuous life.

> "And the day following Paul went in with us unto James, and all the elders were present" (Acts xxi. 18).

Before examining this new section in detail, let us see the structure.

Acts xxi. 18-26.

M | 18. Went in. Paul and his companions.
N | 19. Gentiles. What God had wrought.
O | 20. Many thousands zealous of the law.
P | 21, 22. Informed. False statement.
P | 23, 24. Informed. Prove that they are nothing.
O | 24. Thou, thyself, keepest the law.
N | 25. Gentiles. What the Elders and Apostles had written.
M | 26. Entered in. Paul and the man who had a vow.

"James and all the elders were present" (Acts xxi. 18).

There is something about this statement that calls up the words of Gal. ii. 6: "These who seemed to be somewhat."

> "It must have been with an almost painful shyness—that 'timid provincial neophytes' like Timothy and Trophimus (the latter especially, an uncircumcised Gentile, whom his teacher had encouraged to regard himself as entirely emancipated from the Jewish law)—found themselves in the awful presence of James, the Lord's brother—James, the stern, white-robed, mysterious prophet, and the conclave of his but half-conciliated Judaic presbyters" (Farrar).

The apostle Paul, however, who had witnessed Peter to the face, and had yielded by subjection no, not for an hour, went forward without hesitation to meet this council and "saluted them". He then "declared particularly", that is, gave a fairly detailed account, of "what things God had wrought among the Gentiles by his ministry". Paul had been absent about four years (Acts xviii. 21); he referred to "the space of three years" as the duration of his ministry in Asia, and he would have much to tell concerning Ephesus, Philippi, Galatia and elsewhere. We cannot tell whether Paul alluded to the antagonism, not only of the unbelieving Jews, but of the believing Jews, which had attempted to wreck his work at Corinth and Galatia, but in either case the freedom and grace enjoyed by the Gentile churches would have been made very manifest by his report, and the disclosure would act like breath on glowing tinder. Ever since James, Cephas and John had asked Paul to "remember the poor" (Gal. ii. 10), it had been his intense desire that he should be able to bring an offering from the Gentile churches to Jerusalem as evidence of their recognition of indebtedness and a manifest token of their fellowship and goodwill. In pursuit of his desire he had arranged that each church should select their own representative and personally deliver the love gift of the churches to the leaders at Jerusalem.

That Paul entertained very serious doubts concerning his reception at Jerusalem, is made clear in his epistle to the Romans. The full structure of Rom. xv. 8 - xvi. 23 will be found in Volume XXX, page 81. From it we lift those members that reveal the fears entertained by the Apostle in connection with this visit to Jerusalem.

> And that the Gentiles might glorify God for His mercy (Rom. xv. 9).
> Might be acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost (Rom. xv. 16).
> May be accepted of the Saints (Rom. xv. 31).

The offering up of the Gentiles to God, was acceptable, for they were sanctified by the Holy Ghost. But of the offering sent by the Gentiles to Jerusalem, Paul can only earnestly express the hope, may it be accepted by those who are saints, not by nature, but by grace. O the tragedy of the sectarian spirit! No doubts were entertained as to the acceptableness of the poor Gentile converts by a holy God, but grave doubts were entertained as to whether those self-same converts would be acceptable to certain other sinners saved by grace! Paul's fears seem to have been only too well founded. The offerings had been in his charge throughout the journey. Had they been lost, stolen or left behind, Luke would have recorded the fact.

> "One by one he would call forward the beloved delegates, that they might with their own hands, lay at the feet of James, the sums of money which his Gentile Churches had contributed out of their deep poverty, and which in many and many a coin bore witness to weeks of generous self-denial. There lay all this money, a striking proof of the faithfulness with which Paul, at any rate, had carried out his share of the old compact at Jerusalem . . . . . and on this occasion, if ever, we might surely have looked for a little effusive sympathy, a little expansive warmth, on the part of the community which had received so tangible a proof of the Apostle's kindness. Yet we are not told about a word of thanks, and we see but too plainly that Paul's hardly disguised misgiving as to the manner in which his gift would be accepted, was confirmed" (Farrar).

We are certainly told that when the Elders at Jerusalem heard Paul's report, "they glorified the Lord", but this was immediately followed by words that must have well nigh quenched any glow of anticipation those first words of the Elders had kindled:

> "And they said unto him, Thou seest brother, how many thousands of the Jews there are which believe; and they are all zealous of the law. And they are informed of thee . . . . ."

Let us pause at this word "informed". The structure brings it into prominence, for it is repeated in verse 24. "Studiously indoctrinated" or "sedulously informed" have been suggested as conveying the veiled threat that, with all the charity in the world, one feels to have been behind the words. Zeal can alas be the outcome, not only of love and faith, but of envy. Zelotes would remind the Apostle that once, as a Pharisee, he had been "zealous" for the tradition of his fathers (Gal. i. 14), and what a bitter sectarian it had made him. The verb zeloo, while it is used in a noble sense in the New Testament, is mostly used for the cruel emotion of "envy". The two occasions where it comes in the Acts are:

> "The patriarchs, moved with envy, sold Joseph" (Acts vii. 9).
> "But the Jews which believed not, moved with envy" (Acts xvii. 5).

Zelos, too, though it stand for a "zeal of God", may also stand for zeal "not according to knowledge" (Rom. x. 2). So then, the introduction of such words as "zealous of the law" and "they are informed of thee" would stifle any uprising of joy at the brief doxology that had first been uttered.

> "They are informed of thee that thou teachest all the Jews which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, saying that they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs" (Acts xxi. 21).

How near, and yet how far from, the truth, false charges arising from sectarian zeal can be! For instance, the Christian public have been "informed" or "studiously indoctrinated" that The Berean Expositor takes away all Scriptures from the church, except four short epistles, and that as an inference from our teaching concerning the Lord's Supper, we have very little regard for the doctrine of the atonement. We also understand that we are said to deny the Second Coming of the Lord. Further, like misstatements are made, which become weapons and stumbling-stones to the unwary. We may not expect to find much in the theology of Kipling that we could endorse, but we can enter very really into the words:

"If you can bear to hear the truth you've spoken
Twisted by knaves to make a trap for fools;
Or watch the things you gave your life to, broken,
And stoop and build 'em up with worn-out tools."

Had Paul known these lines, we think he would have felt that they were almost a part of his biography.

Did Paul, at this time, remember Stephen, with whose death he was so intimately associated? Did he remember how the truth Stephen had stood for had been "twisted"?

> "Then they suborned men, which said, We have heard him speak blasphemous words against Moses, and against God . . . . . This man ceaseth not to speak blasphemous words against this holy place, and the law; for we have heard him say, that this Jesus of Nazareth shall destroy this place, and shall change the customs which Moses delivered us" (Acts vi. 11, 13, 14).

Most certainly the Apostle had not taught the believing Jew to "forsake Moses". He had taught him to see that his hope of righteousness by his own attempts to keep the law was vain, but he had spoken not a word about the circumcision of the children of the believing Jews, and had actually circumcised Timothy. What he had resisted was the attempt to force the yoke of the law upon believing Gentiles and to compel them to be circumcised, but such distinctions would be brushed aside by a partisan. Seven times do we read of "customs" in the Acts (vi. 14; xv. 1; xvi. 21; xxi. 21; xxv. 16; xxvi. 3, and xxviii. 17), and any teaching that touched the sacred "rites" of either Jew or Roman was sure to arouse intense antagonism. The word translated "forsake" in the phrase "forsake Moses" has an ugly sound in the original. It is apostasia, a word that occurs but once more in the New Testament where it is used for the awful "falling away" that is associated with the days of the Man of Sin (II Thess. ii. 3). Apostasion moreover is translated "divorcement", and this would also be uppermost in the mind of a Jew.

Here, then, was the state of affairs at Jerusalem, and the Apostle, however he might endeavour to conciliate such opposition, would know that out of this condition would arise the circumstances which prophets had foretold in every city through which he had passed on his journey to Jerusalem. Paul knew what it was to fear, he knew what is was to pray for boldness, and he required all the grace and strength that his faith could muster as he listened to this accusation and foresaw its consequences. We watch him going to the temple at the request of the rulers, as a lamb to the slaughter. He was, however, to hear "the night following" the encouraging words:

> "Be of good cheer Paul' for as thou hast testified of Me in Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at Rome" (Acts xxiii. 11).

We have however anticipated our subject a little, and must return to follow the steps of the Apostle as recorded in the section we are examining. This we will do in our next article.

#47. The Third Missionary Journey (xix. 21 - xxi. 39). The Apprehension of the Apostle in the Temple (xxi. 27 - 34).
pp. 149 - 154

When we examine Paul's epistles, we find they contain two contemporaneous lines of teaching, which, if taken as two parts of a whole, make an intelligible presentation of truth, but if segregated, could easily become the tenets of two opposing factions.

One of the objects of the Apostle's ministry was the conciliation of the church at Jerusalem without yielding any of the peculiar truth that constituted both the glory of his message among the Gentiles, and its offensiveness to those that believed, but who were still zealous of the law.

In his then recently written epistles to the Corinthians and the Romans, this conciliatory spirit is especially manifest, not only "to the Jew", but "to the Greek" and "to the Church of God" (I Cor. x. 32). He had not only urged respect for the conscience of one who failed to shake off his earlier feelings regarding idols (I Cor. x. 27-29), but had counseled the same charitable attitude to the believing, yet ceremonial, Jew (Rom. xiv.). He had expressed his attitude in the well-known words:

> "Though I be free from all men, yet have I made myself servant unto all, that I might gain the more. And unto the Jews I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews: to them that are under the law as under the law, that I might gain them that are under the law. To them that are without the law, as without the law (being not with the law to God, but under the law to Christ), that I might gain them that are without the law. To the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak; I am made all things to all men, that I might by all means save some" (I Cor. ix. 19-21).

This represented one side of the apostolic character and attitude. But there was another aspect of his teaching necessary to complete the whole, and that was his unsparing opposition of all attempts on the part of Judaizers to bring his converts under bondage. He had called these Judaizers "false brethren", "deceitful workers" and even "dogs". He had declared that those who had gone back to "the weak and beggarly elements" of the law were comparable with those who returned to the rites and ceremonies of heathen gods; he had spoken of the "curse" and the "wrath" that must be associated with the law, and had even declared that any believer who submitted to circumcision would fall from grace, and that Christ would profit such an one, nothing.

Unless, therefore, we see Paul and his doctrine as a whole, we shall not be able to understand what is recorded of him in Acts xxi.

> "A modern writer has said that he (Paul) could not do this without untruth; and that to suppose the author of the epistles to the Romans and Galatians standing seven days, oil cakes in hand, in the temple vestibule, and submitting himself to all the manifestations with which Rabbinic pettiness had multiplied the Mosaic ceremonials which accompanied the completion of the Nazarite vow—to suppose that in the midst of the unbelieving Priests and Levites, he should have patiently tolerated all the ritual nullities > of the temple service of that period, and so have brought the business to its tedious conclusion in the elaborate manner above described, is just as credible as that Luther in his old age should have performed a pilgrimage to Emsieden with peas in his shoes, and that Calvin on his death bed should have vowed a gold-embroidered gown to the Holy Mother of God" (Farrar, ref. to Hausruth).

But in view of the Apostle's avowed willingness to be made "all things to all men" already expressed in the quotation from I Cor. ix., we can see that for Christ's sake he would have endured, with pity and with prayer, the tedious ceremonial attached to the liberation of a Nazarite vow, could he thus disarm those who misunderstood and attacked his testimony of the grace of God to the Gentiles. We must remember, moreover, that the Temple still stood at Jerusalem, that Israel, as Israel, were still a people before God, that, until the apostle reached Rome, the hope of Israel was not deferred, and that while the law as a means of salvation had been set aside by the sacrifice of Christ, yet the Jew, during the period of the Acts did not cease to be a Jew by becoming a Christian. He still worshipped the God of his fathers, and continued to do so until the dispensation changed.

Paul had never taught the Jew to "forsake Moses" in the sense that his adversaries alleged; neither had he said that they ought not to circumcise their children, but much of his teaching could easily be so misrepresented as to convince the zealot of the law that he was a most dangerous heretic.

> "What is it therefore? The multitude must needs come together, for they will hear that thou art come. Do therefore this that we say to thee: We have four men which have a vow on them; them take and purify thyself with them, and be at charges with them, that they may shave their heads; and all may know that those things, whereof they were informed concerning thee, are nothing; but that thou thyself walkest orderly, and keepest the law" (Acts xxi. 22-24).

Let us acquaint ourselves with the meaning of this proposition. The word agnizo, "purify thyself with them", is the word used in the LXX for nazar in Numb. vi. 3. We have already seen that Paul had "polled his head in Cenchrea: for he had a vow" (Acts xviii. 18), but he still needed to complete that vow, for the word keiramenos, "to poll the head", is not the same as xuresontai "shave the head" of Acts xxi. 24. The former word, used in Acts xviii. 18, is never used by the LXX of the final Nazarite shaving of the head at the expiration of a vow. The fact that a vow had been taken in Cenchrea which demanded fulfillment at Jerusalem, seemed to the leaders at Jerusalem a heaven-sent opportunity which they immediately seized. Let the whole thing be done as publicly as possible, and let Paul undertake the cost attaching to the ceremonial purification of these four men, as others had done before him; "be at charges with them". It was the custom for a wealthy Jew to assist his poorer brethren in this way. Lewin says: "There was not a more charitable act in the estimate of the Jews, or one more calculated to acquire popularity, than to assist the poor Nazarite by supplying the necessary funds." Josephus records the return of Agrippa from Rome, and how he "offered all the sacrifices that belonged to him, and omitted nothing which the law required; on which account he ordered that many of the Nazarites should have their heads shorn" (Ant. xix. 6, 1).

What a wonderful exhibition this action of grace on Paul's part! A mere doctrinaire would have repudiated the humiliating conditions suggested by the leaders at Jerusalem. He would also feel resentment at the very casual acceptance of the gift to gather which he had spent so much time and prayer. He could easily have hidden behind the evident fact that he had stood for complete emancipation from all such dead ceremonial works. But Paul knew better. He believed and taught that true grace was Christ-like, and this overcame all objections, leading him meekly to submit where he might have waged war against "those who seemed to be somewhat".

"And when the seven days were almost ended" (Acts xxi. 27).—In Acts xxiv. 18 the apostle said that they who arrested him found him "purified in the temple, neither with multitude nor with tumult". In the law seven days is a usual period for purification (Exod. xxix. 37; Lev. xiv. 8; Numb. xii. 14), and in the law concerning the Nazarite provision is made for anyone contracting ceremonial impurity, which enjoins upon him the necessity of waiting for seven days till offerings be made and restoration effected. So also at the close of the vow, it seems that to make doubly sure the priests demanded a lapse of seven days before release could be given. Towards the close of this period

> "The Jews which were of Asia, when they saw him in the temple, stirred up all the people and laid hands on him, crying out, Men of Israel, help: This is the man that teacheth all men everywhere, against the people, and the law, and this place: and further brought Greeks also into the temple and hath polluted this holy place (For they had seen before with him in the city Trophimus an Ephesian, whom they supposed that Paul had brought into the temple)" (Acts xxi. 27-29).

To understand why the people could be so easily inflamed some acquaintance will be necessary with the conditions that obtained at the time of Paul's visit. The populace had but recently been infuriated by Claudius under whose orders the golden robes of the High Priest had been locked away in the tower of Antonia. Such an exhibition of fury resulted that the presence of the Prefect of Syria with a large force was required to keep the peace. Claudius yielded to pressure, and the obnoxious order was cancelled. Josephus, moreover, tells us that during the Procuratorship of Cumanus a Roman soldier had expressed his contempt for the Jewish ceremonies, by a gesture of the most insulting indecency, thereby again plunging the Jews into turmoil. The Procurator was cursed and the soldiers were stoned. This brought upon the Jews such punishment that the number trapped and cut down by the sword is variously stated at ten and twenty thousand. Again, a Roman soldier roused the Jews by the burning of a copy of the Scriptures in public, and so insistent was the Jewish opposition that, this time, Cumanus thought it best to sacrifice a common soldier to gain time and keep the peace. Cumanus was finally banished, and at the time of Paul's visit, Felix was Procurator of Judæa. Felix was guilty of several outrages and, moreover, only seven weeks before Paul's arrival at Jerusalem, an Egyptian, posing as a Messiah, had raised 30,000 followers, who expected the walls of Jerusalem to fall down flat at his approach. Four thousand of his poor dupes actually accompanied him to the Mount of Olives, where Felix killed four hundred and took a number of prisoners.

It will, therefore, be perceived that abundant material existed for another outburst, and the arrival of some Jews from Asia provided the spark. "Men of Israel, help!" From one to another passed the words "The people!" "The Law!" "The Holy Place!" "Here is the hated renegade!" Having seen Paul walking in the streets with the Gentile Trophimus, these fanatical Jews jumped to the conclusion that Paul had taken him into the Temple.

> "To defile the Temple was what every enemy of the Jews tried to do. Antiochus, Heliodorus, Pompey, had profaned it, and very recently the Samaritans had been charged with deliberately polluting it by scattering dead men's bones over the precincts. Instantly the rumour flew from lip to lip that this was Saul, of whom they had heard—Paul the mesith—Paul, one of the Galilean Minim—one of the believers in "the Hung"—Paul, the renegade Rabbi, who taught and wrote that Gentiles were as good as Jews—the man that blasphemed the Thorah—the man whom the synagogues had scourged in vain—the man who went from place to place getting into trouble with the Romans; and that he had been caught taking with him into the Temple a Gentile dog, an uncircumcised ger. The punishment for that crime was death—death by the full permission of the Romans themselves; death even against a Roman who should dare to set foot beyond the chel" (Farrar).

The Talmudic writers themselves have said that the cause of the destruction of the second Temple was "groundless hatred" (Joma, f 9.2).

Had not the sanctity of the Temple disallowed the shedding of blood within its precincts, Paul would have been killed on the spot. To avoid profanation therefore the Jews dragged him down the steps into the outer court, through the "Beautiful Gate", which the Temple police shut behind the surging throng. This momentary delay was providential. A Roman soldier was always stationed at the western cloister during festivals, and he gave immediate warning of the tumult. Lysias, the Chief Captain, then appeared with centurions and soldiers, and the Jews, now faced by disciplined soldiers, "left beating Paul" and, as the first hand of a Roman soldier was laid upon the prostrate Paul, he became "the prisoner of Jesus Christ", prophetic warnings of what awaited him at Jerusalem were verified, and the first steps that were to eventuate both in Roman imprisonment and wondrous revelation were taken.

At this point we will pause and set out the structure of the section before us.

Acts xxi. 27-40.

M | 27. Jews of Asia.
N | 27. Stirred up the people.
O | 28. Charge. He brought Greeks.
P | 29. Supposition. Paul and Trophimus.
Q | 30, 31. Paul. Drawn out . . . . . about to be killed.
R | 32. Chief Captain and soldiers.
Q | 32. Paul. They left beating him.
R | 33-36. Chief Captain. Borne of the soldiers.
O | 37. Question. Canst thou speak Greek?
P | 38. Supposition. Art thou that Egyptian?
M | 39. Jew of Tarsus.
N | 40. A great silence.

The Chief Captain having secured the Apostle, binding him by two chains, demanded "who the man might be, and what he had done?" receiving however but a confused and contradictory reply. Probably afraid that they were to be cheated of their prey, the mob cried out "Away with him!" (Aire auton), using the identical words of the yelling crowds who demanded the crucifixion of Christ, as recorded in Luke xxiii. 18. The Chief Captain had ordered Paul to be taken to the barracks, but the surging mob carried the fettered apostle off his feet, and he was only saved from being torn limb from limb by the presence of the soldiery. In the midst of all this tumult, one man remained calm—the poor battered prisoner.

"May I speak a word to you?" said a voice speaking in Greek. Lysias had evidently assumed that he had at last laid hands on the false Messiah already mentioned and who had eluded pursuit since Passover, but he knew that this Egyptian impostor could not speak Greek like that which he now heard. "I am a man which am a Jew of Tarsus, a city in Cilicia, a citizen of no mean city, and I beseech thee, suffer me to speak unto the people" (Acts xxi. 39). The request was strange, and in all probability would have been refused, had not some dignity and authority made themselves manifest beneath the battered appearance of the prisoner. To gain attention and command respect the Apostle had given at length the fact of his citizenship of Tarsus, adding, as further weight, the comment as to the importance of the city. Moreover, the Romans, if brutal, were also brave, and the fact that a prisoner, and a Jew, just snatched from a violent death, should request leave to turn and face his persecutors would impress them in his favour.

Lysias apparently ordering one of Paul's hands to be unchained, the prisoner, standing on the stairs, with arm uplifted, made signs that he wished to speak. His voice fell upon their ears with quieting effect, for the "Hebrew tongue", in which Paul spoke (Te Hebraidi dialekto) was the Syro-Chaldaic, the language of the native population of Palestine. Had the Apostle spoken in Greek the majority would have misunderstood him, but hearing what, to them, would be "the holy tongue", a stillness fell upon them all.

Here we must stay. The address which the Apostle gave, and its sequel, constitutes the opening of the last great section of the Acts, which closes in Rome, with the imprisoned Apostle "teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him". With this closing section of the Acts is bound up that ministry with which, through electing grace, all our hopes are associated.

The Bearing of the Context on Well-Known Passages.

#1. "My times are in Thy hand."
pp. 146, 147

Many a believer during periods of trial has breathed the words of the Psalmist, "My times are in Thy hand" (Psa. xxxi. 15), and we are sure that the slightest movement towards a more implicit trust in the Lord will always received His encouragement. Yet, like many other oft-quoted passages of Scripture, there is a qualifying context, and our knowledge of this will make the committal all the more real and wonderful.

We observe first that the words "My times are in Thy hand" refer to the external circumstances of life rather than to the more fundamental inner realities. We have a very clear expansion of what these "times" involve in the first eight verses of Eccles. iii.:

> "A time to be born, and a time to die . . . . . A time for war, and a time for peace" (Eccles. iii. 1-8).

Here, in a series of fourteen pairs of opposite facts, we have a summing-up of our "times". These "times", says the Psalmist to the Lord, "are in Thy hand"—all my outgoings and incomings, all the movements of daily life. If we know anything of the Word, however, we shall also realize that it is impossible for any man to commit his whole life to the Lord unless his heart and soul go with it. If we look back to verse 5 of the same Psalm we shall find that this thought has already been expressed:

> "Into Thine hand I commit my SPIRIT; Thou hast redeemed me" (Psa. xxxi. 5).

Here we have the inner aspect of the matter. Before we can truly say "My times (that is, the externals of life) are in Thy hand" we must also be able to say: "Into Thine hand I commit my spirit."

If the reader will refer to verse 15 he will see that the phrase "My times are in Thy hand" is followed by a reference to deliverance "from the hand of his enemies". Following the reference to the "spirit" in verse 5, on the other hand, we have the words: "Thou hast redeemed me." The two references, to the "hand" of the Lord, and the "hand" of the enemy, are suggestive, and further study reveals the following arrangement:

A | Psa. xxxi. 5. "Thine hand." Spirit committed.
B | 8. "The hand of the enemy." Not shut up.
A | 15. "Thy hand." Times.
B | 15. "The hand of enemies." Deliver me.

Let us by all means, and with all our heart, say unto the Lord, "My times are in Thy hand", but let us also commit our spirit to Him too.

EPHPHATHA, or Be Opened.

#1. The Opened Ear: "To Learn."
pp. 111, 112

A common expression, belonging to no one aspect of service is that of an "opening" being found for a person who has sought employment. The word is used in several suggestive ways in connection with the greatest of all service, the service of the Lord. It may be a word in season to some of our readers if we give the usage of this expression a consideration. In what order shall we deal with the many "openings" that are discovered, is the first question that presents itself. Of what use is an "open" door, if our mouth is closed? Or what use is an "open" mouth, if we have nothing to say? Consequently, before we think of the openings for service that await the believer, we must pay attention to the messenger himself. Our first study therefore is associated with

THE OPENED EAR.

A twofold charge is brought against the "Hebrews" in chapter v.—they were "dull of hearing" and they "ought to have been teachers". This suggests that the opened ear is a very important factor in the equipment of a teacher. The Apostle makes it very plain, when speaking of the gospel which he preached, that he was but passing on a message that he himself had received:—"For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received" (I Cor. xv. 3), and whatever way the Lord chose to reveal the truth to His servant, the figure of the opened ear is suggestive.

The greatest of all Servants, wonderful to say, is the Lord Himself, and it is in the prophetic record written by Isaiah long before His first advent, that we find our perfect illustration.

> "The Lord God hath given Me the tongue of the learned, that I should know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary: He wakeneth morning by morning, He wakeneth Mine ear to hear as the learned. The Lord God hath opened Mine ear, and I was not rebellious, neither turned away back" (Isa. l. 4, 5).

What a full passage is this. First of all we observe that the "tongue" is intimately associated with the "ear". It is a physical truth that many are dumb simply because they are deaf. The Lord once had a man brought before Him who was deaf and who had an impediment in his speech.

> "He put His fingers into his ears, and He spit, and touched his tongue: and looking up to heaven He sighed, and said unto him, Ephphatha, that is, Be opened. Straightway his ears were opened, and the string of his tongue loosed, and he spake plain" (Mark vii. 33-35).

In this miracle we may see a picture of the believer, who because he has not "the hearing ear" has an impediment also in his speech. The Lord said Ephphatha, "Be opened”; He had no need to utter the words “be loosed”, for with the opening of the ear, the tongue was loosed, and he “spake plain”.

The expression “the tongue of the learned” is a trifle misleading. “Learned” conjures up before the mind great scholarship, venerable age, and all the accompaniments of “learning”. The word before us would be better translated “learner” or “disciple”, one who is a willing follower, rather than one who has attained great scholarship. This gift conveys to the possessor that priceless ability “to know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary”. When we remember the grace of the Lord, His patience and longsuffering, and withal His pity and His love, and when we compare that with our own sharpness, our own lack of tact, our abruptness, we may perhaps be led to acknowledge how much we need the opened ear so that we may have a tongue that shall speak in season.

> “Lord speak to me, that I may speak,

is a prayer that we may all pray with profit, and with assurance of blessing when the answer is given.

The ear, in Isa. l., is said to be both “wakened” and “opened”. The wakening is “morning by morning”, and is suggestive of continual communion with the Lord. The idea conveyed by the word “open” is clearly perceived when we remember that it gives us the word “key” in Isa. xxii. 22. The added clause, “and I was not rebellious”, is really an expansion of the idea already presented by the wakened and opened ear. To hear, and especially to hearken, in the Scriptures often meant to obey.

> “To obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams” (I Sam. xv. 22).
> “They refused to hearken, and pulled away the shoulder” (Zech. vii. 11).

Here then is one of the foremost “openings” in Christian service, the opening of the ear, so that the message to be given may be received, and from the close association of hearkening with obeying, there may be some correspondence between doctrine and practice on the part of those who seek to serve their God.

#2. The Opened Book: "To Equip."
pp. 144 - 146

In our first article we considered the question of the opened ear, and realized that the Scriptures teach that apart from the opened ear, we shall not learn the truth, and consequently shall not be equipped for service. The opened ear, however, is but one side of the truth; there must be another, namely, something for the ear to hear. However eager we may be to learn, or however ready to hear, there must be some one who speaks, there must be something to be taught. Now the figure of the opened ear demands the corresponding figure of the voice. Yet, the majority of those who have been equipped for service, have been equipped and prepared by the written Word, and would hesitate seriously before they yielded submission to any spoken voice.

It is evident that the words, "Who hath ears to hear, let him hear" have a wider application than to those who actually were within the sound of the voice of the Lord. "He that heareth My word, and believeth on Him that sent Me, hath everlasting life" (John v. 24) is most certainly not to be limited to the hearing of a voice. There is, however, no need to pursue the matter, for all will agree that the figure of the ear is not to be limited to the physical act of hearing, but stand for ready reception through whatever channel it be mediated. To-day we are guided neither by vision, dreams, voices nor angels. We are guided by the written Word, and as we read its pages and obey its teaching we are "hearing" in the truest sense. Consequently our next item in this series of "openings" must be. "The Opened Book."

Those of our readers who are at all acquainted with the writings of the late Dr. E. W. Bullinger will remember that a favourite expression of his, when involved in any argument concerning the faith, was one borrowed from Neh. viii. 5, "Open the Book". Over and over again when debate has run high we have seen strong feeling quieten and sweet reasonableness follow the opening of the Book. Another passage of Scripture of constant use in Dr. Bullinger's writings is that of Rom. x. 17:

> "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God."

There are several ways in which we may think of the Scriptures as an open book. First, it is an open book because it has been freely given to all the people of God. We rejoice that the reading of the Bible is the exclusive privilege of no class or person. Secondly, it is an open book because it speaks frankly. There are depths and heights in its teaching that baffle the holiest and the wisest. There are mysteries and parables, prophecies and visions, that leave the mind impressed with the fact that its author is none less than "The only wise God", yet granting all this, how plainly, how simply, how openly it speaks of sin, of salvation, of the Saviour, of life, of death, of judgment.

While quite a number of features like the two given could be brought forward to underline the fact that the book is indeed an open book, there is nevertheless another aspect of the Scriptures wherein these self-same scriptures need to be opened. Our thoughts travel immediately to that closing chapter of Luke's Gospel, where the disciples were led to exclaim:

> "Did not our hearts burn within us, while He talked with us by the way, and while He opened to us the Scriptures" (Luke xxiv. 32).

If we enquire as to the way in which the Lord opened the Scriptures with such enriching consequences, we have not far to seek. In verse 27 we shall find His method.

> "And beginning at Moses and all the prophets, He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself" (Luke xxiv. 27).

The subject is of such importance that we find it repeated in verse 44:

> "These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the psalms concerning Me" (Luke xxiv. 44).

We find other Spirit-led servants of the Lord following these steps. Philip found the Ethiopian eunuch reading a part of Isa. liii., and the eunuch asked the question: "I pray thee, of whom speaketh the prophet this? of himself, or of some other man?" (Acts viii. 34). Philip began at the same scripture and preached unto him Jesus.

Paul, on more than one occasion is found "opening the book" in this same way.

> "And Paul, as his manner was, went in unto them, and three sabbath days reasoned with them out of the scriptures, opening and alleging that Christ must needs have suffered, and risen again from the dead; and that this Jesus Whom I preach unto you, is Christ" (Acts xvii. 2, 3).

It is not our object to write at length upon these themes, but rather to stimulate the interest of the reader, in the hope that the riches of the book may be sought and found individually.

We might perhaps draw attention to the fact that an opened book is seen at the time of the end. When the time comes for the Lord to take the Kingdom and reign, He alone is found worthy to "open the book" (Rev. v.), and when the millennial Kingdom has run its course, and the great white throne is set, even then the destiny of man is still involved in the opening of books.

> "The books were opened: and another book was opened which is the book of life" (Rev. xx. 12).

Returning to our theme. The opened ear is first of all necessary so that we may learn, but the opened book is likewise necessary if the truth is to be made known to us. The equipment of the child of God for service that the Word of God accomplishes is so complete, that the word "perfect" used in II Tim. iii. 17 is one used in connection with a dockyard, having reference to the fitting out of a ship. We need therefore:

(1) The opened ear.—To learn.
(2) The opened book.—To equip.

pp. 183, 184

We have seen that the opened ear, and the opened Book constitute an important part of the equipment of the believer for service, but we have not yet given attention to all that needs to be "opened", if that equipment is to be complete. There is the added need of an "opened understanding".

> "And Ezra opened the book . . . . . and caused them to understand the reading" (Neh. viii. 5-8).

The physical opening of the Book was followed by its "opening" in a fuller sense, and it will help us if we observe what Ezra and the assembled company did upon the great occasion recorded in Neh. viii.

> "When he opened it, all the people stood up" (Neh. viii. 5).

To rise when the Book was opened was an act of reverence. On another occasion even Eglon, king of Moab, though his heart may have been far from God, "arose out of his seat" when Ehud announced, "I have a message of God unto thee" (Judges iii. 20).

> "And Ezra blessed the Lord, the great God, and all the people answered, Amen, Amen, with lifting up their hands: and they bowed their heads, and worshipped the Lord, with their faces to the ground" (Neh. viii. 6).

The opening of the Book was the signal for the worship of its Author. We reverence the Word of God, because we reverence the God of the Word.

> "So they read in the book in the law of God distinctly" (Neh. viii. 8).

If the trumpet give an uncertain sound, said the Apostle Paul, who shall prepare himself for battle? Writing later to his son Timothy the Apostle said, "Till I come, give attendance to reading" (I Tim. iv. 13). To the Ethiopian eunuch Philip said, "Understands thou what thou readest?" (Acts viii. 30).

In the R.V. margin the word "distinctly" in Neh. viii. 8 is translated "with an interpretation". The word thus translated is parash and means to unfold, spread out or extend, and has the same meaning as our word "exposition". A person who merely recognizes the different letters of a word does not "understand". A person who is able merely to spell out the Hebrew letters P, A, R, A, S, H, does not "understand". Understanding has to do with meaning, and unless we arrive at the meaning of a passage or word of Scripture, it will remain a dead letter to us. It is therefore a distinct ministry to "spread out" the meaning of God's Word. It may take the form of analysis or it may take the form adopted by Philip when he "preached Jesus", but, in every case, to understand involves getting beneath the surface to essentials, or, as Neh. viii. 8 adds, "they gave the sense and caused them to understand the reading".

On page 145 we have referred to Luke xxiv. for the "opening" of the Scriptures, and to that passage we must again refer for the added "opening of the understanding".

> "Then opened He their understanding that they might understand the Scriptures. And He said, Thus it is written and thus is behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead" (Luke xxiv. 45, 46).

The Lord was evidently concerned that His words should be understood. On more than one occasion He said to His disciples,

> "Have ye understood all these things?" (Matt. xiii. 51).
> "Perceive ye not yet, neither understand?" (Mark viii. 17).
> "How is it that ye do not understand?" (Mark viii. 21).
> "Love Him with all the heart, and with all the understanding" (Mark xii. 33).

The Apostle Paul followed his Lord in this particular, saying, "I will pray with the understanding" (I Cor. xiv. 15); "I had rather speak five words with my understanding" (I Cor. xiv. 19).

We may well conclude this brief article with the Apostle's words to Timothy, "The Lord give thee understanding in all things" (II Tim. ii. 7).

To sum up, therefore, as far as we have gone, we need:--

(1) The opened EAR.—To Learn.
(2) The opened BOOK.—To Equip.
(3) The opened UNDERSTANDING.—To Perceive.

EPHESIA.

#1. Was "Ephesians" a circular letter?
pp. 106 - 108

To every believer, who has by grace become a member of the Body of Christ, and who has appreciated the distinctive character of the present dispensation of the mystery, the epistle to the Ephesians must ever be held in high esteem. We have, in early volumes of The Berean Expositor, attempted an exposition of this epistle, which occupies the greater part of the Volume entitled "The Testimony of the Lord's Prisoner". We return to its pages, again and again in the course of our ministry, and now, in the present series we approach the epistle from yet another angle. In the course of exposition, much that needs explanation is crowded out, much has to be omitted because of the fact that all readers have not attained the same degree of advancement. We therefore commence a new series, and entitle it Ephesia, which we hope indicates the character of these studies. We are here concerned with the material out of which the epistle is built. We want to provide the reader with information, points of grammar, number of occurrences, and various details that cannot be introduced in the ordinary way.

To the Ephesians.—The Revised Version retains the words "at Ephesus" in chap. i. 1, but includes in the margin the note: "Some very ancient authorities omit at Ephesus."

We learn from Col. iv. 16 that Paul had written a letter to the Laodiceans, and Marcion believed it to be the same as the epistle to the Ephesians. It has been suggested that Colossians was a similar letter to be sent round the other churches (Col. iv. 16), but it must be remembered that this epistle contains the words: "To the saints and faithful brethren in Christ which are at Colosse" (Col. i. 2), and that the authority for this designation has never been questioned. Ephesians consequently could have been a circular letter, and yet retain the "at Ephesus".

There is a passage in Basil (A.D.350) which shows that the words "at Ephesus" were omitted from the epistle as he read it, for he says that Paul spoke of the saints "who exist" (Tois ousin) and his comment is:

> "Truly united by knowledge of the Existing One (to onti) denominating them in a singular manner (idiazontos), as existing (ontas)."

Origen (A..D230) had observed earlier:

> "We found this expression 'to the saints that exist', used only in the case of the Ephesians."

Jerome, speaks of Origen's explanation (he goes back to Exod. iii. 14):

> "as too subtle, and he affirms that other Expositors are of the opinion that the true reading here is not 'to those who are', but 'to those who are holy and faithful at Ephesus'."

Wordsworth says:

> "Origen, who, as far as we know, was the first person who made the remark above cited, recognizes the epistle as addressed to the Ephesians even when he is making the remark, and comments upon it as such."

Regarding the reference to Marcion, Tertullian tells us that Marcion, the heretic, desired to alter the title of the epistle so as to read "To the Laodiceans". This, however, implies that the words "at Ephesus" were in use, otherwise they could not be "altered". Tertullian adds:--"According to the verity of the church, we have this epistle address to the Ephesians, and not to the Laodiceans".

The words "at Ephesus" are not found in the text of the Vatican Manuscript, but they have been added in the margin by a later hand. The same is the case with the Sinaiticus, and the words have been erased from one cursive manuscript.

Over against this entirely negative evidence we must place the following:

> "(1) No copies now in existence have any other name than that of Ephesus; and all the extant manuscripts, including the Vatican Manuscript, which have any title prefixed to the Epistle, exhibit the words 'To the Ephesians'.
> (2) That all the extant manuscripts, except those just mentioned, have the words 'at Ephesus' in verse 1.
> (3) That the ancient church universally received this epistle as addressed to the Ephesians" (Wordsworth).

Lardner wrote:

> "That this epistle was sent to the Church at Ephesus, we are assured by the testimony of all catholic Christians of all past ages. This we can now say with confidence, having examined the principal Christian writers of the first ages, to the beginning of the twelfth century; in all which space of time, there appears not one who had any doubt of it."

Ignatius, in a letter to the Ephesians, says:

> "Ye are the companions in the mystery of the gospel of Paul the sanctified . . . . . who throughout all his epistle, makes mention of you in Christ."

This epistle of Ignatius was written in the 10th of Trajan, according to Bishop Pearson, and if so, there are only forty-five years between the writing of Paul and Ignatius.

When we read in Eph. vi. 21, 22, that the Apostle intended sending Tychicus to make known all things to them concerning himself, one wonders to whom Tychicus would have gone, had the letter been unaddressed.

The truth of the matter seems to be that the epistle was originally addressed to Ephesus, but that copies of it were circulated among the churches, and that in some few of these copies a space had been left so that the name might be filled in. The matter is of no importance from one point of view, but of great importance if the omission of the words "at Ephesus" leads to the fantastic interpretation, "The saints which are".

#2. Saul, who is also called Paul (Eph. i. 1).
pp. 140, 141

Ephesians is the Epistle of the glorified Christ. In it He is seen raised, ascended, seated. All things are under His feet. He is Head; He is Lord. Yet the words with which the glorious revelation opens refer not to God, nor to Christ, but to the earthen vessel through whom the truth of the mystery was made known. Evidently it is not a matter of indifference who writes the Epistle, and the claims put forward by the Apostle in Eph. iii. make it imperative that we should know something of the instrument through whom such a revelation was made.

Paul (Paulos).—The Epistles contain thirty occurrences of the name Paul, one being found in II Pet. iii. 15. It occurs more often in I Corinthians than in any other epistle, largely because of the faction that said "I am of Paul". When he first appears on the page of Scripture, Paul's name is Saul, and it is a matter of speculation as to whether,

(1) Saul was his Hebrew name, and Paul his Gentile name from the first. This view was held by Origen.
(2) He took the name Paul, when he began to preach. This was the opinion of Augustine.
(3) Like Peter, he received a new title at his ordination at Antioch. This was the teaching of Chrysostom.
(4) He received the name of Paul only when the Proconsul of the same name was converted. This was the conclusion reached by Bede.
(5) The title was meant to commemorate that victory. This was taught by Jerome.

A change of name upon entry into a new phase of life or ministry was familiar both to Jew and Gentile. Abram is changed to Abraham, Simon is changed to Peter, Roman Generals often assumed as a title the name of the country of their triumphs; thus Scipio took the name Africanus, and whether or not Saul possessed the Gentile name Paul from the first, the fact remains that Scripture does not use the name until Sergius Paulus, the proconsul at Paphos, is converted. There for the first time we read, "Saul, who also is called Paul" (Acts xiii. 9).

The adoption of a Gentile name was a common practice among the Jews. In the N.T. we have such Greek names as Philip and Alexander, and such Roman names as Crispus, Justus and Niger. Double names, too, were frequently used. We remember Belteshazzar-Daniel, Esther-Hadasa, and in the N.T. times, Herod-Agrippa and Simon-Peter.

For us, however, the most important point is, not whether Saul was also called Paul from birth, but that there is intentional association of the Apostle with his Roman convert of Paphos (significantly converted while the Jew was blinded), which links him, originally a Hebrew of the Hebrews and a Pharisee of the Pharisees, with the Gentile, to whose salvation and glory he had been dedicated by the God of all grace.

#3. APOSTOLOS, The Sent One (Eph. i. 1).
pp. 179, 180

In this opening sentence of Ephesians Paul refers to himself as an apostle (apostolos). The word is derived from the verb apostello, "I send", as in Rom. x. 15: "How shall they preach except they be sent?" The title is used of "the twelve" (Matt. x. 2), and after the defection of Judas, the number was made up again by the inclusion of Matthias (Acts i. 26). Paul dissociates himself from "the twelve", as may be seen from I Cor. xv. 7-9. He was an apostle of new order. "The twelve" were obviously not given when the Lord "ascended on high" (Eph. iv. 9, 10; Matt. x. 2), whereas the apostle of whom Paul was the first, are said to have been given from heaven (Eph. iv. 11).

The two epistles that contain the most emphatic statements by Paul himself as to his full right to the title of "apostle" are Galatians and II Corinthians. The former opens as follows:

> "Paul, an apostle not of men, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ, and God the Father, Who raised Him from the dead' (Gal. i. 1).

After this, the two opening chapters are largely taken up with proving the independence of Paul's apostleship, gospel and authority.

In II Corinthians, the question of Paul's apostleship occupies a large part of chapters xi. and xii.

> "For I reckon that I am not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles" (II Cor. xi. 5, R.V.).
> "In nothing was I behind the very chiefest apostles, though I am nothing. Truly the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, in signs and wonders and mighty deeds" (II Cor. xii. 11, 12).

The word apostolos is not much used in classical Greek. It is found in Herodotus as "an envoy", and later it is used of the commander of a naval force. The fact that the word was almost unused in classical Greek made it the more suitable for the new order of envoys sent out by the Lord.

The word was known among the Jews, for Oecumenius says: "It is even yet a custom among the Jews to call those who carry about circular letters from their rulers, by the name of apostles." The word is also used in John xiii. 16: "The servant is not greater than his lord, neither he who is sent (apostolos) greater than he who sent him."

The word is used once in II Corinthians in its simple etymological sense. "They are the messengers of the churches" (II Cor. viii. 23), and once in Philippians, "Your messenger" (Phil. ii. 25).

The following is a synopsis of M'Lean's statement as to the essential features characteristic of an apostle:

(1) An apostle must have seen the Lord (John xv. 27). Paul is no exception—"Last of all He was seen of me also" (I Cor. xv. 8); "Am I not an apostle? Have not I seen the Lord?" (I Cor. ix. 1).
The "seeing of the Just One" was essential (Acts xxii. 14, 15).

(2) An apostle must have been immediately called and chosen for the office by Christ Himself (Luke vi. 13; Gal. i. 1).

(3) Infallible inspiration was also essentially necessary to that office (John xvi. 13; Gal. i. 11, 12; I Thess. ii. 13).

(4) The apostolic commission was attested by "signs" (Heb. ii. 4; II Cor. xii. 12).

(5) The apostles were not local ministers, but had "the care of all the churches" (II Cor. xi. 28), and power to settle all controversies (Acts xvi. 4), and to exercise discipline (I Cor. v. 3-6; II Cor. x. 8; xiii. 10).

If these things be true, it is obvious that the apostles could have had no "successors". Their qualifications were supernatural and unique.

Such then was the office of Paul the Apostle, an earthen vessel indeed, but filled with heavenly treasure.

The Eternal God is thy Refuge.

(Being a series of studies designed to encourage the believer in times of stress).

#10. "We will make mention of the name of the Lord our God" (Psa. xx. 7).

pp. 13, 14

When dealing with the great promise that the Lord will be the "defence" of His people, we quoted more than one passage in which this "defence" and "refuge" was associated with His "Name". The Companion Bible draws attention to three occurrences of the "Name" in Psalm xx., and refers to them as follows:

"The DEFENDING Name" (verse 1).
"The DISPLAYED Name" (verse 5).
"The DELIVERING Name" (verse 7).

These references to the "Name" become more significant if viewed in the light of the custom associated with the Kinsman-Redeemer. A man in trouble called upon the "name" of his kinsman, and ranged himself under his banner for protection. It is this that the Psalmist is thinking of in these references. He first prays in verse 1:

> "The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble; the name of the God of Jacob defend thee."

Then, in verse 5, he says:

> "We will rejoice in Thy salvation, and in the name of our God we will set up our banners."
> "His banner over me", said the Shulamite, "was love" (Song of Sol. ii. 4).

So here, "His banner over me", the Psalmist might have said, "is my protection".

And, in verse 7, David contrasts the vain help of man with the gracious deliverance of the Lord:

> "Some trust in chariots, and some in horses: but we will remember the name of the Lord our God."

The word zakar, "remember", is also translated "to make mention", as in Gen. xl. 14: "Make mention of me unto Pharaoh." The same word occurs in Isa. xii.:

> "In that day shall ye say, Praise the Lord, call upon His NAME, declare His doings among the people, make mention that His NAME is exalted" (Isa. xii. 4).

In Psalm ix., in connection with the Lord as a Refuge, we read:

"The Lord also will be a refuge for the oppressed, a refuge in times of trouble. And they that know Thy Name will put their trust in Thee: For Thou, Lord, hast not forsaken them that seek Thee" (Psa. ix. 9, 10).

Again, at the close of the Psalm that opens with the words: "If it had not been the Lord Who was on our side . . . . ." David says: "Our help is in the Name of the Lord, Who made heaven and earth" (Psa. cxxiv.).

Let us then remember that "Name which is above every name", and rejoice to know that

The Eternal God is thy Refuge.

#11. "Fear not. I am thy Shield" (Gen. xv. 1).
pp. 63, 64

We have considered the several references in the Scriptures to God being a Refuge and a Defence, and we have learned that there is a secret place of the Most High in which we dwell, and a shadow under which we may "tarry for a night". Associated with this "secret place" is also a Shield, as for example:

"Thou art My hiding place (sether, 'secret place') and my shield: I hope in Thy Word" (Psa. cxix. 114).

To Abram, after the battle with the kings was over, God said: "Fear not Abraham; I am thy shield" (Gen. xv. 1). To Israel, the prophet Moses said, in his last blessing: "Happy art thou O Israel; who is like unto thee, O people saved by the Lord, the shield of thy help" (Deut. xxxiii. 29). David confessed:

"He is my shield" (II Sam. xxii. 8).

"As for God, His way is perfect: the word of the Lord is tried: He is a buckler (shield) to all them that trust in Him" (II Sam. xxii. 31).

"Thou hast also given me the shield of thy salvation and thy gentleness hath made me great" (II Sam. xxii. 36).

In days when trouble increased, when many rose up against David, when many said that there was no help for him in God, when he was suffering the agony of Absalom's treachery, he could still say: "But Thou, O Lord, art a shield for me: my glory, and the lifter up of mine head" (Psa. iii. 3). Again, on another occasion, when David felt that if the Lord should be silent to him he would "become like them that go down into the pit", he said: "Blessed be the Lord, because He hath heard the voice of my supplications. The Lord is my strength and my shield: my heart trusteth in Him, and I am helped" (Psa. xxviii. 6, 7). The longing soul, separated from the fellowship and worship of God's people and God's house, cried: "Behold, O God our shield . . . . . the Lord God is a sun and shield: the Lord will give grace and glory" (Psa. lxxxiv. 9, 11).

Here is a cluster of precious passages. Each is illuminative of one or more of the many phases of grace. "Shield and exceeding great reward"; "Shield and hiding place"; A shield provided by One whose ways are perfect, whose "condescension" (gentleness) indeed makes great, Who is salvation and Strength as well as Shield, Who protects when men oppose, deny or betray, and who gives both grace and glory.

David's heart trusted, and the Psalmist added "I hope in Thy Word" (Psa. cxix. 114).

The days in which we live differ in some ways from O.T. times, but they are comparable to those of Habakkuk, when there was no evident intervention, when there was often no apparent answer to prayer, when "the just" indeed must "live by his faith" (Hab. i. 1-4; ii. 1-4). Even so, we still have His "Word", our hearts can still "trust" in Him, and we rejoice, as no other people on earth can, in His "condescension" which has indeed made us "great", for such a text is written large across the epistle to the Ephesians.

> "O Israel, trust in the Lord: He is their help and their shield" (Psa. cxv. 9).
> "O house of Aaron, trust in the Lord: He is their help and their shield" (Psa. cxv. 10).
> "Ye that fear the Lord, trust in the Lord: He is their help and their shield" (Psa. cxv. 11).
> "Above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked" (Eph. vi. 16).

"The Eternal God is thy Refuge."

#12. "The hidden ones" (Psa. lxxxiii. 3).
pp. 93, 94

"They have . . . . . consulted against Thy hidden ones" (Psa. lxxxiii. 3).

"Your life is hid with Christ in God" (Col. iii. 3).

It is clear from these two passages that the title "hidden ones" is appropriate both for Israel and for the Church. To some the idea of "hiding" may suggest cowardice, but just as it is foolhardy to expose oneself to the danger of high explosives unless the demands of humanity justify the risk, so, when facing spiritual wickedness, it is wise and right to remember that the shield, the helmet, and the breastplate are as much a part of the commanded and provided panoply of God as is the Sword of the Spirit. The reader will also remember that in Heb. xi. there are two cases in which "faith" is identified with the act of "hiding"—the hiding of the infant Moses, and the hiding of the spies (Heb. xi. 23, 31; Ex. ii. 2; Josh. ii. 4).

"Hiding" does not necessarily indicate fear. In Psa. xxvii. David says:

> "The Lord is my light and my salvation: WHOM SHALL I FEAR?
> The Lord is the strength of my life: OF WHOM SHALL I BE AFRAID?" (Psa. xxvii. 1).

And yet, in the fifth verse of this same Psalm, he says:

> "In the time of trouble He shall hide me in His pavilion; In the secret of His tabernacle shall He hide me" (Psa. xxvii. 5).

In Psalm xxxi., which is in some respects parallel with Psalm xxvii., we find David in great trouble. Nets have been spread for him, he was a reproach among his neighbours, and forgotten like a dead man out of mind. Slander and fear and adverse counsel were on every side. In such a predicament he says, in verse 5: "Into Thine hand I commit my spirit; Thou hast redeemed me, O Lord God of truth." And in verse 15: "My times are in Thy hand." Rejoicing in the goodness of the Lord which he had "laid up" (the same word as "hide") for them that fear Him, the Psalmist passes on from the thought of the "hidden" goodness, to that of the "hidden" ones, and so he concludes:

> "Thou shalt hide them in the secret of Thy presence from the pride of man: thou shalt keep them secretly ("hide") in a pavilion from the strife of tongues" (Psa. xxxi. 19, 20).

Perhaps some may object that, while David with his great faith and experience could take such a stand, such cannot be expected of the general run of believers. As an answer, the reader should notice verse 22 in which the Psalmist cries: "I said in my haste, I am cut off from Thine eyes." Yet the Lord heard him and preserved him.

In Psalm cxliii. we read "Deliver me, O Lord, from mine enemies; I flee unto Thee to hide me" (Psa. cxliii. 9). The Margin here reads: "Heb. hide me with Thee", while Dr. W. Kay renders the passage:

> "To Thee have I confided (my all)"—with the footnote: Lit. Unto Thee have I hidden, i.e., with Thee have I deposited my cause; secretly and silently, suppressing all angry feeling against man."

Keble's rendering is similar: "I have hid all with Thee", while Young's literal translation reads: "Near Thee I am covered." It is outside our present scope and purpose to enter into questions of translation. The reader will, however, be able to see something of the implications here even though a full understanding of the passage must await fuller examination.

We have already discussed the question of "fear" in relation to "hiding". There is one further passage which might well be included under this heading, in Prov. xxii. 3, "A prudent man foreseeth evil, and hideth himself". This same word, "hide", is also found in other passages, as follows:

> "Hide me under the shadow of Thy wings" (Psa. xvii. 8).
> "In the secret of His tabernacle shall He hide me" (Psa. xxvii. 5).
> "Hide me from the secret counsel of the wicked" (Psa. lxiv. 2).
> "Seek ye the Lord, all ye meek of the earth . . . . . it may be ye shall be hid in the day of the Lord's anger" (Zeph. ii. 3).

To those who know the secret place of the Most High, whose life is "hid" with Christ in God, whose blessings are associated with a "Mystery" that had been "hid" since the ages, the words of Isa. xxvi. quoted below may well prove to have a message, without, of course, in any sense robbing the passage of its literal fulfillment:

> "Come, My people, enter thou into thy chambers, and shut thy doors about thee: hide thyself as it were for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast" (Isa. xxvi. 20).

"Rock of Ages cleft for me,

Let me hide myself in Thee."

"The Eternal God is thy Refuge."

#23. The intimate association between the senses and the processes of thought. Gen. ii. 7.

pp. 14 - 19

If one desires to appear "intellectual", or to impress others with one's "spirituality", there is sometimes a temptation to decry the body. This, however, has no scriptural warrant. The Apostle may bemoan the fact that in his flesh dwelt no good thing, and that he was conscious of a law of sin working in his members, but "the flesh" and "the law of sin" must not be confused with the body itself and its functions. The same epistle (Romans) enjoins the believer to "yield" his members to the service of the Lord, and to "present" his body as a living sacrifice.

In the last article we occupied all our space in endeavouring to give some idea of what is implied in the record of man's creation from the dust of the ground. In the present article, we propose to look, not at the body itself, but at the body as an organ apart from which the processes of thought would never receive impetus to commence, and if started, would have no material with which to work. The body plays a far more important part in the development of the mind and in the functioning of the will than at first sight appears.

We distinguish mind from matter by its qualities. Matter may be measured, frozen, attracted by gravity, etc., while mind cannot. Nevertheless, though mind and matter are quite distinct, mind needs matter for the materials of its thought processes, and it needs the organized material of the body to set these processes going. Whatever properties and powers the mind may possess, they remain inert until set in motion, as it were, by the sensations experienced by the body through the medium of the senses. Let us, then, seek to understand a little about this ladder, which, while resting upon the solid basis of sensation, rises up until its top is in the clouds. We shall not, or course, attempt in an article of this length to follow the whole process and progress of thought. If we can see something of the first few steps, and establish the connection that must exist between the body with its senses and the thought processes and the will, we shall have accomplished all that is necessary for our present purpose.

The senses are five in number—touch, taste, smell, hearing and sight. The sense of taste is limited to the papillae on the surface of the tongue, and it is, of course, necessary that actual contact should be made with the object tasted. The sense of smell, is confined to the olfactory nerves which have their termination in the nostrils. While the necessity for contact is not so obvious here as in the case of taste, yet contact there must be, for if any substance which has a definite odour be sealed up in a glass case the sense of smell is unaffected. The sense of hearing is dependent upon a pair of organs so placed that the vibrations of the air shall not only register upon the drum and be conveyed by a marvelous mechanism to the brain, but a sense also of direction is included, so that the head is turned until not only is the sound heard, but the direction from which it comes is gauged. The sense of sight is dependent upon another pair of organs which register the presence of light and its degree of intensity. Light is independent of the atmosphere, for we can see an object in a glass jar, from which all air has been extracted. The sense of touch has no special organ, the nerves that convey this sensation to the brain being distributed all over the surface of the body, with the exception of the hair, the nails, the enamel of the teeth, and the outer skin known as the cuticle.

It is through the sensations associated with these five senses that the inner man becomes acquainted with the facts of creation, and provided with the material upon which thought can be exercised. By the time we have begun to think much about the processes of thought, and the exercise of discernment and judgment, we have traveled so far from our earlier experiences that we are apt to forget the important place that these lowly organs of sense have had in the development of our mental faculties. To make this point clearer, let us go back in imagination to the days of our infancy.

In a very short time a baby begins to learn, either by painful or pleasant experience, that his fingers belong to himself, while the edge of his cot, the cup from which he feeds, and the person who looks after him are external to himself. He has learned, without being conscious of it, the first great lesson, the differentiation that the philosopher refers to as "The Self, and the Not Self". Beginning with this distinction, discernment springs more and more into operation, and by easy stages the infant mind begins to compare, to ponder, to discern differences, to arrive at judgments.

One of the basic subdivisions that the mind makes between the sensations is that of pleasure and pain. One sound will soothe, another irritate; one touch will cause intense pain, another give great pleasure, and with this realization comes the natural desire to seek that which causes pleasure, and avoid that which causes pain. Moral reasons may operate at a later stage to cause the individual to seek pain and avoid pleasure, but not at the beginning.

We have, therefore, a link between the sensations of pleasure and pain, and the emotions of desire and aversion. From these two emotions spring hope and fear. After a pleasant sensation has been experienced several times a pleasant expectation is set up, while the repetition of a painful sensation would produce the emotion of fear. Now suppose a series of sensations that had ended formerly in pleasure should fail on one occasion to give this pleasure, then a new emotion, a feeling of disappointment or sorrow, would come to birth. Conversely, if a series of sensations that had usually ended in pain should fail to produce this effect, the new emotion produced would be that of joy or surprise. There is no need to pursue this idea further, through the whole gamut of human emotions. We trust that the link between emotion and sensation is sufficiently clear.

Not only are the emotions directly associated with the sensations, but the higher intellectual powers are also dependent in the first instance on these same fundamental aids. Memory, actuated by the law of suggestion, is the power of the mind to recall or revive sensations. If the varying sensations that affect the mind left behind no more trace than does our reflection upon a mirror, memory would be an impossibility—and without memory we could not build. We should be for ever handling bricks and stones, with neither design to guide us nor desire to achieve. Take, for example, the case of a child hearing a bell. This by itself will not mean very much unless there is something else associated with it. If, however, whenever this bell rings, the child is fed, or taken from his crib, then in time, by the aid of memory, he will begin to associate the two together. He may, of course, go further and draw the erroneous conclusion that the ringing of the bell and the appearance of the food are cause and effect. Such a mistake would be quite understandable in the case of a child, who is not yet able to rise to the higher processes of thought and argument. The basis, however, for such reasoning is being laid. The child begins to expect that after the bell will come the bottle, so that without his knowing it, these sensations are giving rise to some appreciation of the principle that "the mind expects like consequents to follow like antecedents" (Carlyle). The mind of the child that can distinguish between pleasure and pain, that can desire the one and fear the other, that can distinguish these differences, and remember them, such a mind already has the fundamentals of all reasoning.

Mere sensation, however, could never of itself convey to the mind the reality of the external world. Sensations might come and go without any realization of the cause. We must ask, therefore, how it is that the mind is able to acquire its knowledge of external objects. The child who, from occupation with its own fingers, discovers by the sense of touch, and the emotions of pleasure and pain, that there is a world external to itself, proceeds to investigate that world. Some things feel soft, others hard; some are hot, while others are cold. Moreover, by using his eyes in conjunction with his hands, he discovers that objects have form and colour, and that they are near and far. In the endeavour to reach some object which is present to sight and yet remote from touch, he moves towards it, and so begins to crawl, and finally walk. This recognition of an outside world we call "perception", and with the coming of this perception comes also the consciousness of that which is within, namely personal identity. The consciousness of prolonged identity, the knowledge that I am the same person as I was in all my former history, is founded upon the consciousness that my body as an organism is the same as that which I possessed in the past. My sense of personal identity depends on memory, and memory is largely the recalling of sensations previously received.

We come next to the question of the will, and we can well imagine that some of our readers will make a mental protest, and say that there can be no real connection between "the body" and "the will". Let us look into the matter more closely.

> "By the will, we understand the powers of the mind to choose or refuse" (Carlyle).

While we recognize that the will is the power of the mind to choose, we must remember that it is not a mere preference, or desire which we cannot gratify. It is a power of immediate effective choice. Let us explain. We lay before the reader the following statement and attempt to justify it.

> "Although there may be desire where there is no power, there cannot be will."

We know that the sensations of pleasure and pain are entirely beyond the power of the will, and none can love or hate at its bidding. The mind, however, if it possesses a body, with organs of sense and muscular powers, has something which it can control. The eye can be opened and closed at will. The tongue can speak or refrain at will. The muscles, to the extent of their powers, obey the command of the will with precision and without hesitation. My hand can just as readily write words of blasphemy on this sheet of paper, as it is now writing words that attempt to help towards the truth. This is the true dominion of the mind. It can move its own members, and, by moving itself, it can move others. It cannot, however, "will" the movement of other objects in the same way as it can "will" the movements of its own body:

> "If the most despotic monarch were deprived of all power of voluntary movement, he would also be deprived of all exercise of the will. He might still fervently desire to have some object effected, but he could no longer, even in a figurative sense, will it . . . . . he can make no sign, and he would soon cease to repeat his impotent attempts to exercise will" (Carlyle).

Behind the exercise of will is desire. The will has no power of itself for any mental operation. One cannot by the exercise of the will compel oneself either to believe or to reject evidence. The motive that moves the will is desire.

We must not attempt within our limited compass to pursue these interesting themes further. All that we have endeavour to do is to show the intimate association that exists between the processes of thought (the higher processes we have not touched upon here) and the bodily sensations. For the sake of clearness we set out again below the steps we have covered, leaving the reader to continue the ascent into the higher realms of thought.

Through the medium of the five senses we become aware of the existence of an external world, and of our own personality. Our earliest and most fundamental impressions are those of pleasure and pain, and we are so constituted that we desire that which pleases, and fear and avoid that which causes pain. From these experiences arise hope, disappointment, joy, sorrow, surprise, etc. None of these emotions depends upon the will. The power of the will is the mind's power to accept or reject, to do or not to do. We cannot by an act of will create a sensation, or turn pain into pleasure. Memory, too—which is fundamentally the memory of things experienced through the senses—plays an important part, for only by the aid of the memory can we attempt to compare, contrast and classify. All this leads up to perception, or the cognition of the material world through sensation. There is, therefore, a real connection between the body formed out of the dust of the earth, and that something more that makes man a living soul. While man shares with the beasts of the field the possession of a body of flesh and blood, he is at the same time the only creature who was created in the image of God, and who possesses rationality and a capacity for worship. Of all these things, however, we must speak at length in subsequent articles.

ISAIAH.
#6. Children of Sign and Wonder (vii. 1 - x. 34).
pp. 19 - 26

We have now passed in review four out of the seven sections of the first great divisions of Isaiah's prophecy (Isa. i.-xii.), and we must next consider the remaining sections: 5, 6, and 7—Isa. vii.-xii.). Just as we found the first three sections linked together as a structural whole, so we shall find the last three also closely associated by corresponding parts. For the structure of Isa. i.-v., the reader is referred to Volume XXX, page 131. Our present quest is the analysis of chapters vii.-xii. The subject-matter here falls into three sections:

(1) THE VIRGIN'S SON. IMMANUEL (Isa. vii. 1 - ix. 7).
(2) THE REMNANT SHALL RETURN (Isa. ix. 8 - x. 34).
(3) THE ROOT AND OFFSPRING OF DAVID (Isa. xi.-xii.).

For our present purpose, we must pass by a great deal of detail, but we believe the accompanying structures will be of service in drawing attention to the outstanding features of each section.

In the first of these sections (Isa. vii. 1 - ix. 7) we are struck by the recurrence of the children who are said to be given for "signs", and the importance of the typical meaning of their names.

SHEAR-JASHUB.—"The remnant shall return" (Isa. vii. 3).
IMMANUEL.—"God with us" (Isa. vii. 14).
MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ.—"Haste, spoil, speed, prey" (Isa. viii. 1-4).

In addition we have the words of the prophet concerning himself and his children:

> "Behold, I and the children whom the Lord hath given me are for signs and for wonders in Israel from the Lord of Hosts which dwelleth in mount Zion" (Isa. viii. 18).

And then finally, in chapter ix., we have the glorious prophecy that sums up all these signs:

> "For unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given; and the government shall be upon His shoulder: and His name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace" (Isa. ix. 6).

Intertwined with these wonderful signs, we have references to the political atmosphere of the times, driving the people through unbelief into confederacies, and so bringing upon them the invasion of the Assyrian, which forms the centre of the book (Isa. xxxvi. - xxxix.).

Isaiah vii. 1 - ix. 7. Immanuel.

A1 | vii. 1-9. |
a | 1, 2. Confederacy. Syria with Ephraim.
b | 3. SHEAR-JASHUB. The sign.

c | ix. 1-5. Deliverance from oppressor.
b | ix. 6, 7. CHILD. SON. Fulfilling all signs.

Isaiah's prophetic method is to take the actual facts of current history and with these facts as a basis, to look down the centuries to the more complete fulfillment both of the woes, and of the blessings. The reference to the war against Jerusalem by the Kings of Syria and Israel with which Isa. vii. opens, is a reference to a fact of history, recorded in II Kings xv. 37 - xvi. 5. No comment which we could make could take the place of this inspired record, and we therefore quote what is written in the Book of Kings so that the background of Isa. vii.-xii. may be appreciated:

> "In those days the Lord began to send against Judah, Rezin the king of Syria, and Pekah the son of Remaliah. And Jotham slept with his fathers, and was buried with his fathers in the city of David his father: and Ahaz his son reigned in his stead. In the seventeenth year of Pekah the son of Remaliah, Ahaz the son of Jotham, king of Judah, began to reign. Twenty years old was Ahaz when he began to reign, and reigned sixteen years in Jerusalem, and did not that which was right in the sight of the Lord his God, like David his father. But he walked in the way of the kings of Israel, yea, and made his son to pass through the fire, according to the abominations of the heathen, whom the Lord cast out from before the children of Israel. And he sacrificed and burnt incense in the high places, and on the hills, and under every green tree. Then Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, son of Remaliah, king of Israel, came up to Jerusalem to war: and they besieged Ahaz, but could not overcome him" (II Kings xv. 37 - xvi. 5).

The real menace of this attack is found in the words of Isa. vii. 6: "Let us . . . . . set a king in the midst." Immediately following this we read: "Thus saith the Lord God, It shall not stand, neither shall it come to pass" (Isa. vii. 7). "Within threescore and five years" Ephraim was to be "broken" (Isa. vii. 8).

No outside foe could hurt the house of Judah: the real enemy was in their own hearts: "If ye will not believe, surely ye shall not be established" (Isa. vii. 9).

The Companion Bible calls attention to the figure of paronomasia that is used here. The rhyming of the Hebrew words may perhaps be illustrated by some such translation as: "No confiding . . . . . no abiding."

It is in connection with this threat of invasion by Syria and Israel that the first of the "sign" children is introduced.

> "Go forth now to meet Ahaz, thou, and Shear-Jashub thy son, at the end of the conduit of the upper pool in the highway of the fuller's field" (Isa. vii. 3).

Shear-Jashub, as we have seen, means "The remnant shall return" and is so translated in Isa. x. 21. The name therefore contained the assurance that, even though the people were to be reduced by siege or invasion, God would remember His covenant with the house of David.

It would appear from Isa. vii. 10 that the Lord was testing the nature and sincerity of the faith of Ahaz, when He said:

> "Ask thee a sign of the Lord thy God; ask it either in the depth, or in the height above" (Isa. vii. 11).

Ahaz had no excuse for refusing, except that he had already made up his mind to appeal to Assyria:

> "So Ahaz sent messengers to Tiglath-pileser, King of Assyria, saying, I am thy servant and thy son: come up, and save me out of the hand of the King of Syria, and out of the hand of the King of Israel, which rise up against me" (II Kings xvi. 7).

The refusal of Ahaz has the appearance of humility ("Neither will I tempt the Lord") but it was, in fact, a cloak for his apostacy.

We come now to the first great prophetic type of the Lord Jesus Christ.

> "Therefore the Lord Himself shall give you a sign; Behold, a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel" (Isa. vii. 14).

This sign had a twofold fulfillment—the first, in the lifetime of Ahaz himself, and the second, at the birth of Christ. The word for "virgin" here needs a word of explanation. The word used by Isaiah is ha-almah, which means a "damsel", but not necessarily a "virgin" in the fullest sense of the word. The word used in Matt. i. 23, on the other hand, is parthenos, and means a "virgin" in the strictest sense.

The political bearing of the name Immanuel ("God with us") is found in Isa. viii. 10:

> "Take counsel together, and it shall come to nought: speak the word, and it shall not stand: FOR GOD IS WITH US."

The "sign" of Isa. vii. 14 was indeed "in the depth" and "in the height", as verse 11 puts it, for what could be deeper than the Saviour's condescension when He laid aside

His glory to take upon Himself the form and fashion of a man, and become the virgin's son?

The bearing of this verse upon the great subject of the deity of Christ is too vast a theme to be touched upon in a paragraph, but the reader will find the subject dealt with in our published writings, to which reference should be made for fuller exposition. The curious reference to "butter and honey" constitute part of an infant's diet. Some translators render the connective "that" in verse 15 as "before" or "up to the time of". It would seem, however, that the A.V. is probably correct here.

> "The received version is the most simple and agrees best with the real scope . . . . . this child, unlike other infants, from the first dawn of reason, will know to refuse evil and to choose the good. The phrase, like the fact, is unique, and never used in Scripture of any other child. Three wonders would meet in Him Whose name is "Wonderful"—a miraculous birth, a Divine nature, and sinless choice of the good alone" (Birks Commentary on Isaiah).

The remaining verses of Isa. vii. (18-25) are at first sight rather difficult. They must be understood as indicating the change over a country when, owing to the depopulation consequent upon invasion, agriculture ceases, and the normal crops give place to jungle, and patches of scant pasturage. The necessity for arming with bows and arrows in a land which once produced crops and supported flocks and herds is indicative of the degeneration that had occurred. The desolation thus produced fulfilled the prophecy of Isa. vi. and extended to the very days of the Messiah. Before, however, we reach these times, we have a further reference to the days of Ahaz.

Isaiah is told by the Lord to take a great roll, or better, a great tablet, and write on it with the carving tool of man, "For Maher-shalal-hash-baz". The warning indicated by the meaning this strange name is clear: "Hasting to spoil, he speeds to the prey." This prophecy was attested by Uriah the priest and Zechariah the son of Jeberechiah, and within twenty-one months (i.e. nine months before his birth, and twelve months after) Damascus had fallen, in the third year of Ahaz. This period (II Kings xvi. 9) has been called "The Gordian Knot of Chronology". We cannot, however, go into this question in the present article.

The further threat of invasion (see structure) is followed once more by a reference to the children who were given as signs:

> "Behold, I and the children whom the Lord hath given me are for signs" (Isa. viii. 18).

A deeper and even more serious "confederacy" is now indicated. It was a sad departure for the children of Israel to seek an alliance with Syria, and for Judah to seek the help of Assyria, but the prophet now visualizes an apostacy that is in league with hell itself. The conflict of the ages is brought before us in the choice of refuge to which Israel descended in time of danger.

> "And when they shall say unto you, Seek unto them that have familiar spirits, and unto wizards that peep and that mutter: should not a people seek unto their God? on behalf of > the living should they seek unto the dead? To the law and to the testimony: if they speak not according to this word, there shall be no morning unto them" (Isa. viii. 19, 20).

Light, however, dawns "in Galilee of the nations", and in Isa. ix. 2 we read, "Upon them hath the light shined"—a promise that was fulfilled in Matt. iv. 14-16.

In Isa. ix. 3, Dr. Ginsburg suggests that one of the Hebrew word has been wrongly divided, and that, instead of being lo, "not", it should form part of the preceding word and read haggilo. The translation would then be:

> "Thou hast multiplied the exultation, Thou hast increased the joy; They joy before Thee according to the joy in harvest, As men exult as they divide the spoil."

Deliverance instead of invasion is now the theme. The rejoicing is associated with "spoil" and with the thought of the "harvest", and so refers to the last days of prophetic vision.

In verse 5, Young's literal translation reads as follows:

> "For every battle of a warrior is with rushing, and raiment rolled in blood, and it hath been for burning—fuel for fire" (Isa. ix. 5).

Here we have, not only the overthrow of Sennacherib, but an anticipation of the day ushered in by the Prince of Peace, as spoken of by the Psalmist:

> "Come, behold the works of the Lord, what desolations He hath made in the earth. He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth; He breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder: He burneth the chariot in the fire" (Psa. xlvi. 8, 9).

Then, in verses 6 and 7, comes the glorious prophecy of the true Immanuel, the One Who gathers up into Himself all the signs and prophecies that have gone before:

> "For unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given: and the government shall be upon His shoulder: and His name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The Everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. Of the increase of His government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon His kingdom to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even for ever. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this" (Isa. ix. 6, 7).

In Isa. x. 21 we read:

> "The remnant shall return, even the remnant of Jacob, unto the MIGHTY GOD."

This is balanced in verse 20 by the statement:

> "The remnant of Israel . . . . . shall stay upon the Lord, the Holy One of Israel, in truth."

Who is this "mighty God", the "Holy One of Israel"? He is Immanuel ("God with us"), the virgin's Son, the Child Whose name is "wonderful". There are those who would attempt to anatomize the glorious Person of the Son, but there is no justification in Scripture for such a course. The N.T. affirms that "Great is the mystery of godliness, God was manifest in the flesh". So here in Isa. ix. How the "Child" or the "Son" can be at the same time "the mighty God" the prophet makes no attempt to explain. He does, however, preface the glorious title with the word "wonderful", and worship rather than analysis would seem to be our true attitude.

We must beware of confusion when we read the title "The everlasting Father". The word translated "everlasting" is the Hebrew ad, and the LXX translates the passage: Pater tou mellontos aionios, "Father of the age about to be". These words describe the Lord's office. The "age about to be", the age that was beyond the purview of the O.T. prophet, was entirely in His care. The words of Luke i. 32, 33 are relevant here:

> "And the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David, and He shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of His kingdom there shall be no end."

The next section (Isa. ix. 8 - x. 34), is devoted to the Assyrian invasion, a dark cloud lightened by the promise, "The remnant shall return". We will leave the examination of this section to the reader, and pass on, in our next article, to chapters xi. and xii.

ISAIAH.
#7. The Rest that shall be Glory (xi. and xii.).
pp. 51 - 56

We now come to the closing sub-section of Isaiah's great opening prophecy (Isa. i.-xii) which is found in chapters xi. and xii. In the earlier section (vii. 1 - ix. 7) the theme was the Virgin's Son, Immanuel, and the Child Whose name is Wonderful. In chapters xi. and xii. the subject is this same glorious person, with a further explanation of His government, and its association with the house of David. The section naturally falls into two parts:

(1) ISAIAH XI. THE ASSURANCE OF DELIVERANCE.
THE BRANCH AND ROOT OF JESSE.

(2) ISAIAH XII. THE SONG OF SALVATION.
THE LORD JEHOVAH.

It will be seen that the structural outline of chapter xi., which is given below, revolves around the two titles of the Deliverer—"The Branch" and "The Root", the intervening and following verses revealing the character and extent of His dominion.

Isaiah xi.

A | 1. THE BRANCH OF JESSE.
B | 2-5. | a | 2, 3. Spirit. Ruach.
b | 4. Judge the poor and meek.
a | 5. Breath. Ruach.
b | 5. Slay the wicked.
C | 6-8. | c | 6. Animal creation; loses enmity.
d | 6. Little child shall lead them.
c | 7. Animal creation; changes in constitution.
d | 8. Sucking child and weaned child fearless.
D | 9. | e | They shall not hurt nor destroy.
f | The Sea.
A | 10. THE ROOT OF JESSE.
B | 10-12. | a | 10. Ensign. Nes.
b | 11. Recover the remnant.
a | 12. Ensign. Nes.
b | 12. Gather the dispersed.
C | 13, 14. | c | 13. Enmity of Ephraim and Judah removed.
d | 14. Submission of former enemies.
D | 15, 16. | e | 15. The Lord shall utterly destroy.
f | 15, 16. The Sea.

The opening words of Isa. xi. seem to be set in contrast with the closing words of chapter x., in which the Assyrian is likened to a "bough" that is "lopped with terror", the "thickets of the forest" that are "cut down with iron", and "Lebanon" that "shall fall by a mighty one". The word "rod" in Isa. xi. 1 ("the rod out of the stem of Jesse") does not seem a very suitable translation in view of the fact that the same word is used of the Assyrian in Isa. x. 5 and 15. The two Hebrew originals are entirely different. In chapter x. it is matteh, while in chapter xi. it is choter, meaning a "twig" or "shoot". No etymologist would, of course, teach that choter has any real connection with chittah, the Hebrew word for "wheat"; nevertheless the resemblance is marked in the original and is suggestive. The word geza, meaning "stem" or "stock", which is used of Jesse, the father of David (Isa. xi. 1), is an apt word, as a reference to Job xiv. will show:

> "For there is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again, and that the tender branch thereof will not cease. Though the root (sheresh, the same word as in Isa. xi. 1) thereof wax old in the earth, and the stock (geza, the same word as 'stem' in Isa. xi. 1) die in the ground; yet through the scent of water it will bud, and bring forth boughs like a plant" (Job xiv. 7-9).

Coming back to Isa. xi., we find next the enduement of the Messiah set forth, and the spirit of the Lord is said to "rest" upon Him. The word "rest" is nuach, while "spirit" is ruach. The paronomasia here is intentional. Perhaps, also, there is a reference back to Isa. vii. 2 where "is confederate" is the translation of this same word nuach, the people being represented as "resting" on a false hope.

This spiritual enduement of the Messiah is sevenfold:

	(2) WISDOM.
	(3) UNDERSTANDING.
(1) THE SPIRIT	(4) COUNSEL.
OF THE	(5) MIGHT.
LORD.	(6) KNOWLEDGE.
	(7) FEAR.

In verse 3 we learn that this spiritual equipment is to make the coming Ruler "of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord". The Margin tells us that the word translated "quick understanding" is the Hebrew for "scent" or "smell". Actually it is the verbal form of ruach, meaning "spirit" (Isa. xi. 2) or "breath" (Isa. xi. 4). It is translated "to smell" eight times in the A.V., together with three further occurrences in the marginal notes. "He shall be of quick scent in the fear of the Lord" is a vivid figure, and indicates very strikingly the acuteness of the Messiah's recognition of the Father's will.

As one reads of the manner in which the Messiah will "judge the poor" and "reprove with equity for the meek of the earth" one is reminded of David's great kingdom Psalm, where over and over again he speaks of the judgment of the poor and needy. It is interesting also to note that it is in this Psalm and in no other that David speaks of himself as "the Son of Jesse" (Psa. lxxii. 20).

> "And He shall smite the earth with the rod of His mouth, and with the breath of His lips shall He slay the wicked" (Isa. xi. 4).

Some codices of the Hebrew Bible read here ariz, meaning "oppressor", instead of erez, "earth". This reading is confirmed by a parallel reference in the N.T. and by comparison with Isa. x.:

> "O My people that dwellest in Zion, be not afraid of the Assyrian: he shall smite thee with a rod, and shall lift up his staff against thee, after the manner of Egypt" (Isa. x. 24).

The N.T. parallel is found in II Thess. ii., where the antitype of the Assyrian is himself smitten in the day of the Lord's coming:

> "And then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of His mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of His coming" (II Thess. ii. 8).

The references in Isa. xi. 6 to the wolf and the lamb, the leopard and the kid, look forward to this same blessed day when the enmity brought in by sin shall be removed, and the groan of creation shall be hushed. Some have raised scientific objections to the literal interpretation of the following verse (Isa. xi. 7) on the grounds that the lion is a carnivorous animal, and therefore fashioned and constituted, both in tooth and maw, so as to be able to live on flesh. We do not deny this. If it were natural for a lion to eat straw like an ox, there would be no point in the prophecy. He Who can change the hearts of men and turn them from darkness to light, can as surely change the nature of the animal world so that all types of evil shall pass away.

> "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all My holy mountain; for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea" (Isa. xi. 9).

These words are repeated in Isa. lxv. 25, and the context of this second reference helps our understanding of the first. It should be observed that the promise in the first place is not universal, but is limited to "all My holy mountain". So, in Isa. lxv., the new creation is limited at first to Jerusalem (Isa. lxv. 17, 18), and the nations that go up to Jerusalem to learn of the law of the Lord (Isa. ii. 3-5) see with their own eyes what full surrender to the Lord's will means and to what it leads.

The words: "The earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea" (Isa. xi. 9) are liable to be misunderstood. "The waters" here are those living waters that shall flow out from Jerusalem, "half of them to the former or eastern sea (that is 'the Dead Sea'), and half of them toward the hinder sea" (Zech. xiv. 8). These living waters are described at length in Ezek. xlvii., and the reference to Engedi (Ezek. xlvii. 10) shows that the Dead Sea is intended. Wherever this water comes it brings "healing", and so, as we look back to Isa. vi. 10, we realize that at last Israel shall perceive and understand, and be healed indeed. What a beautiful figure of blessing this verse reveals:

> "The earth shall be full of life-giving knowledge of the Lord, as the living water shall flow down and completely cover the Dead Sea."

The Branch and Root of Jesse is to be, in that day, "an ensign of the people" and "an ensign of the nations" (Isa. xi. 10, 12). Out of the twenty occurrences of nes, the Hebrew word translated "ensign", ten are found in Isaiah. The first is in Isa. v. 26:

> "And He will lift up an ensign to the nations from far, and will hiss unto them . . . . . whose arrows are sharp" (Isa. v. 26, 28).

Here we have a "banner" or "ensign" lifted up for judgment. In Isa. xi., on the other hand, it is lifted up for blessing. The next reference, in Isa. xiii. 2, is again a message of judgment, this time judgment upon Babylon.

Passing over several intervening references, we come to Isa. xlix.:

> "Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I will lift up Mine hand to the Gentiles, and set up My standard to the people; and they shall bring thy sons in their arms, and thy daughters shall be carried upon their shoulders" (Isa. xlix. 22).

The last reference is in Isa. lxii., where Israel's blessed restoration is in full view:

> "Go through, go through the gates; prepare ye the way of the people; cast up, cast up the highway; gather out the stones, lift up a standard for the people . . . . . thy salvation cometh . . . . . A city not forsaken" (Isa. lxii. 10-12).

The "Gentiles", as well as "the outcasts of Israel", are all, in that day, to be gathered to this Ensign. It is to this that the Apostle refers in Rom. xv. 12, where the hope of the church during the Acts is seen to be the realization of the prophecy of Isa. xi.

Ephraim in Isa. xi. 13 stands for the whole ten tribes of Israel, but we must not forget that Ephraim itself was also engaged in strife within the kingdom of Israel as well.

> "Syria is confederate with Ephraim" (Isa. vii. 2).
> "The head of Ephraim is Samaria" (Isa. vii. 9).
> "The drunkards of Ephraim shall be trodden under feet" (Isa. xxviii. 3).

The reunion of the tribes is set forth in symbol in Ezek. xxxvii., and Ephraim is there used to represent the whole ten tribes (verse 16).

The tongue of the Egyptian sea that is to be utterly destroyed (Isa. xi. 15) refers to "that arm of the gulf of Suez which was parted in the Exodus" (Birks). This is to disappear when the movements that are to shake the earth take place. The "river" is the river Euphrates—the word used for the Nile is Yeor (Isa. vii. 18); Nahar refers to the Euphrates (Gen. xv. 18). In that day men shall go over dryshod into the land of promise, even as Israel did "in the day that he came up out of the land of Egypt" (Isa. xi. 16).

We now come to the concluding section—Isa. xii., a chapter that might well be entitled "The Song of Salvation". Anger is turned away and Israel is comforted. God is their salvation, and the Lord Jehovah their strength and song. The passage ends on the exultant note:

> "Cry out and shout, thou inhabitant of Zion: for great is the Holy One of Israel in the midst of thee" (Isa. xii. 6).

with which we may compare the concluding words of Ezekiel:

> "And the name of the city from that day shall be, The Lord is there" (Ezek. xlviii. 35).

So concludes the first glorious section of this wonderful prophecy. We have much land to be possessed before we can call Isaiah our own, but we trust the reader's interest has been quickened, and that his hope and faith will be encouraged as we go on to learn more of the wonderful ways of God.

ISAIAH.

#8. Burdens and Blessings (xiii. - xxvii.).

With Particular Reference to The Burden of Babylon (xiii., xiv.).

pp. 81 - 86

The second large section of Isaiah's prophecy extends from chapter xiii. to xxvii. and is largely occupied with "burdens" concerning the nations that come into touch with Israel and their relation to the glorious kingdom that is to be set up at the advent of the King. The nations that are the subject of this series of prophecies are Babylon, Palestine, Moab, Damascus, the land beyond the rivers of Ethiopia, Egypt, The Desert of the Sea, Dumah, Arabia, The Valley of Vision (possibly Jerusalem) and finally Tyre.

It is not our intention to examine in detail these fifteen chapters, with their intricate references to history past and future, but to concentrate attention upon the "Burden of Babylon", for with the fall of Babylon the conflict ceases and the kingdoms of this world will become the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ.

The structure of Isa. xiii. 1 - xiv. 30 is as follows:--

ISAIAH xiii. - xiv. 30. BABYLON AND PHLISTIA.

A1 | xiii. 1-5. Babylon. Destroy the whole land.
B1 | xiii. 6-18. | a | 6. The Day of the Lord. Destruction.
b | 7, 8. Faint, melt, pangs, sorrows.
a | 9-14. The Day of the Lord. Destroy.
b | 15-18. Dashed, vanished, no pity, not spare.
C1 | xiii. 19. Babylon, as Sodom and Gomorrah.
D1 | xiii. 20-22. Owls shall be there, satyrs, dragons.
A2 | xiv. 1-3. Israel. Set in their land.
B2 | xiv. 4-20. | a | 4-8. The oppressor ceased.
b | 9-11. Pomp brought down to the grave.
a | 12-15. Subduer of nations cut down.
b | 16-20. Cast out of thy grave.
C2 | xix. 21, 22. Babylon, name cut off.
D2 | xiv. 23. Possession for the bittern.
A3 | xiv. 24, 25. Assyrian. Broken in My land.
B3 | xiv. 25. Yoke and burden removed.
C3 | xiv. 26, 27. The purpose.
D3 | xiv. 28-30. Serpents, cockatrice, fiery flying serpent.

Before Immanuel, the root of Jesse, is lifted up as an ensign for the blessing of the peoples, another ensign is lifted up to bring the peoples with their armies "to destroy the whole land" (Isa. xiii. 2-5).

The "sanctified ones" of verse 3 need not refer to saints, but to any set apart for a particular work. The immediate reference may have been to the Medes and Persians that conquered Babylon, but the fact that the prophecy immediately runs on to the day of the Lord, shows that the full significance of this passage is future. "The sanctified" and the "mighty ones" may refer to the angelic powers that will be marshaled against Babylon at the time of the end.

> "The Day of the Lord is at hand" (Isa. xiii. 6).

The term "The day of the Lord" occurs first of all in chapter ii. 12 when the Lord alone shall be exalted (verses 11 and 17). There are twenty such occurrences, sixteen of them simply reading Yom Jehovah, "Day of Jehovah", and four Yom l'Jehovah, "Day for Jehovah". In the New Testament is occurs four times, making a total of twenty-four, all divided in fours or multiples of four. At some time or another we ought to set out these references, and so we will make sure that the reader is acquainted with them and their contexts by setting them out here and now.

"The Day of the Lord."

(1) YOM JEHOVAH.—A DAY OF THE LORD.

> "Howl ye; for the day of the Lord is at hand; it shall come as a destruction from the Almighty" (Isa. xiii. 6).
>
> "Behold, the day of the Lord cometh, cruel both with wrath and fierce anger . . . . . stars . . . . . sun . . . . . moon . . . . . shake the heavens, and the earth shall remove" (Isa. xiii. 9-13).
>
> "Ye have not gone up into the gaps, neither made up the hedge for the house of Israel to stand in the battle in the day of the Lord" (Ezek. xiii. 5).
>
> "Alas for the day! for the day of the Lord is at hand, and as a destruction from the Almighty it shall come" (Joel i. 15).
>
> "For the day of the Lord cometh, for it is nigh at hand. A day of darkness" (Joel ii. 1, 2).
>
> "For the day of the Lord is great and very terrible; and who can abide it?" (Joel ii. 11).
>
> "The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come" (Joel ii. 31).
>
> "For the day of the Lord is near in the valley of decision. The sun and the moon shall be darkened, and the stars shall withdraw their shining . . . . . heavens and the earth shall shake" (Joel iii. 14-16).
>
> "Woe unto you that desire the day of the Lord! to what end is it for you? the day of the Lord is darkness and not light. As if a man did flee from a lion . . . . . bear . . . . . serpent . . . . . Shall not the day of the Lord be darkness and not light" (Amos v. 18-20).
>
> "For the day of the Lord is near upon all the heathen: as thou hast done, it shall be done unto thee; thy reward shall return upon thine own head" (Obadiah 15).
>
> "Hold thy peace at the presence of the Lord God: for the day of the Lord is at hand: for the Lord hath prepared a sacrifice, He hath bid His guests" (Zeph. i. 7).
>
> "The great day of the Lord is near, it is near, and hasteth greatly, even the voice of the day of the Lord: the mighty man shall cry there bitterly" (Zeph. i. 14).
>
> "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord" (mal. iv. 5).

(2) YOM L'JEHOVAH.—A DAY FOR, OR KNOWN TO, THE LORD.

"For the day of the Lord of Hosts shall be upon every one that is proud . . . . . the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day" (Isa. ii. 12-17).

"For the day is near, even the day of the Lord is near, a cloudy day: it shall be the time of the heathen" (Ezek. xxx. 3).

"Behold, the day of the Lord cometh, and thy spoil shall be divided in the midst of thee" (Zech. xiv. 1).

"It shall be one day which shall be known to the Lord, not day, nor night" (Zech. xiv. 7).

(3) HE HEMERO KURIOU.—THE DAY OF (THE) LORD.

"For yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night" (I Thess. v. 2).

"That ye be not soon shaken in mind . . . . . as that the day of the Lord is at hand" (II Thess. ii. 2, R.V.).

"But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night: in the which the heavens shall pass away . . . . ." (II Pet. iii. 10).

(4) HE KURIAKE HEMERA.—THE LORD'S DAY.

"I was in the spirit in the Lord's day" (Rev. i. 10).

To appreciate fully the meaning of that prophetic period entitled "The day of the Lord", every one of these references must be duly considered together with their context, and when the whole is brought to bear upon the last prophecy concerning it, namely, the book of the Revelation, it will be seen that both the first occurrence (Isa. xiii. 6), and the last (Rev. i. 10), focus attention upon the character and the fall of Babylon. A very small remnant prevented the overthrow of Israel being like that of Sodom and Gomorrah (Isa. i. 9), but no remnant is found in Babylon.

"And Babylon, the glory of the kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah" (Isa. xiii. 19).

The plea of Abraham, that if only ten righteous were found in Sodom, it would be spared (Gen. xviii. 32) comes to mind, and also the "tenth" of Isa. vi. 13 which, as the remnant, saved Israel from utter destruction.

Before the "proverb" is taken up against the King of Babylon (Isa. xiv. 4), a small section is devoted to the restoration of Israel (Isa. xiv. 1-3). In the space of these three verses is compressed a great amount of prophetic truth.

"The Lord will have mercy on Jacob."—In this simple statement we have the germ of Hosea i. and ii., where a child is named Lo-ruhamah—"not having obtained mercy", which sign is finally cancelled in Hosea ii. 23: "I will have mercy upon her that had not obtained mercy." The dispensational section of Romans, namely, chapters ix.-xi. bases its teaching, concerning the remnant and the nations, upon this theme of "mercy" (Rom. ix. 15, 16, 18; xi. 30, 31, 32).

"And will yet choose Israel."—The opening chapters of the prophet Zechariah expound this promise.

> "Cry, yet, saying, Thus saith the Lord of hosts; My cities through prosperity shall yet be spread abroad; and the Lord shall yet comfort Zion, and shall yet choose Jerusalem" (Zech. i. 17).
>
> "And the Lord shall inherit Judah His portion in the holy land, and shall choose Jerusalem again" (Zech. ii. 12).
> "The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan; even the Lord that hath chosen Jerusalem rebuke thee: is not this a brand plucked out of the fire?" (Zech. iii. 2).

So we may supplement every clause. Israel are to be set in their own land; this makes void all propositions to settle Israel in any land other than that given to Abraham. Strangers are to join with them in that day, yea, they shall even bring them to their place, and the house of Israel, so long the outcast among the nations, shall "possess them in the land of the Lord for servants". Those who had been held captive by others shall in that day "rule over their oppressors". In that day the Lord shall give Israel "rest". The glimpse of the glorious future which Isaiah gives in these three verses, is comparable with the lifting of the veil in Isa. ii. 2-5 and iv. 2-6. It is as though the glorious purpose toward which the Lord moves cannot be entirely hidden even in a day of ruin and judgment.

From verse 4 to 23 of Isa. xiv. we have a "proverb" or a "parable" against the King of Babylon, but we must observe that it is not Isaiah himself who "takes up this parable", but the restored Israel of verses 1-3. This is made evident by the initial word "that" of verse 4:

> "And it shall come to pass in the day that the Lord shall give thee rest from thy sorrow, and from thy fear, and from the hard bondage wherein thou wast made to serve, that thou shalt take up this proverb against the king of Babylon, and say, How hath the oppressor ceased!" (Isa. xiv. 3, 4).

This is comparable with the connection between Isa. xi. and xii. where we have the song which Israel will sing in that day. Like the lamentation which is taken up against the king of Tyre in Ezek. xxviii., we shall find in this parable a double reference. There will be a reference to the fall of the actual king of Babylon, who will also be a foreshadowing of the great oppressor and usurper, Satan himself:

> "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning! how art thou cut down to the ground, which didst weaken the nations! For thou hast said in thine heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God: I will sit also upon the mount of the congregation, in the sides of the north: I will ascend above the heights of the clouds; I will be like the most High" (Isa. xiv. 12-14).

The expression, "the sides of the north", is not so much explanation as revelation. Satan knew where God held His court, for Job i. 6, 7 tells us of his access. The word "sides" means "recesses" or "remote regions". Seeing that Satan had aspired to a throne above the stars of God, the remote recesses of the north must refer to that region of the sky which is associated with the Pole Star. In solemn contrast with this blasphemous thought is the doom that is expressed in the very next verse: "Yet thou shalt be brought down to Sheol, to the sides (remote recesses) of the pit" (Isa. xiv. 15). "How art thou fallen", indeed, "O Lucifer, son of the morning!" The solemn "never more" of Isa. xiv. 20 finds an echo in Ezek. xxviii. 19, "never shalt thou be any more"; also in the doom of Babylon itself, where in Rev. xviii. 21-23 the words "no more at all" ring out like a knell.

Into the "burdens" of Palestine, Moab, Damascus, etc., that occupy the remainder of this section, we do not propose to enter. These scriptures are inspired and profitable, but our particular quest is to discover from all scripture the "Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth". The remaining sections of Isaiah are such abundant material, we must pass on, and in our next article examine the third great section, namely, Isa. xxviii. - xxxv., "Woes and Glories".

ISAIAH.
#9. Woes and Glories (xxviii. - xxxv.).
Ephraim (xxviii.).
pp. 117 - 121

Woe: the crown of pride and the covenant with death.
Glory: the crown of glory and the sure foundation.

We have now examined, with what care our time and space have permitted, the first two sections of the prophecy of Isaiah:

(1) THE REMNANT SHALL RETURN (i. - xii.).
(2) BURDENS AND BLESSINGS (xiii. - xxvii.).

We now come to the third great section:

(3) WOES AND GLORIES (xxviii. - xxxv.).

In this section Israel is prominent, and the nations are represented mainly by the great oppressor Assyria. As we read the opening chapter (xxviii.) our first impression is a somewhat confused one. We read of a crown of pride, strong drink, overflowing waters, precept upon precept, stammering lips, a covenant with death and hell, a bed too short, the ploughing of land, and the cultivation of corn. What can it all mean? What connecting thread links these dissimilar themes into coherence?

If we forget for the moment the wealth of imagery, and take once more the larger view, we are immediately reminded that the pivot of the whole prophecy of Isaiah is the Assyrian invasion, which occupies the central section (Isa. xxxvi. - xxxix.). This section opens with a plain fact of history:

> "Now it came to pass in the fourteenth year of King Hezekiah that Sennacherib, King of Assyria, came up against all the defenced cities of Judah, and took them" (Isa. xxxvi. 1).

We also read that Rabshakeh, the Assyrian envoy, suggested that Hezekiah should "make an agreement" with the king of Assyria (Isa. xxxvi. 16). Now Isaiah's prophecy, while it refers to the kingdom of Israel (Ephraim, Samaria, etc.) is specifically stated to be "concerning Judah and Jerusalem" (Isa. i. 1), and consequently it may very well be that the flowery language of Isa. xxviii. may represent certain specific facts of history expressed in prophetic form.

Ephraim (Isa. xxviii. 1) refers to the kingdom which had its seat in Samaria. In II Kings xviii. we read concerning Samaria:

> "In the fourth year of King Hezekiah (i.e., ten years before the invasion of Sennacherib, see above) . . . . . the king of Assyria came up against Samaria and besieged it, and at the end of three years they took it" (II Kings xviii. 9, 10).

This again is a plain fact of history, the only moral being the added statement of verse 12:

> "Because they obeyed not the voice of the Lord their God, but transgressed His covenant, and all that Moses the servant of the Lord commanded, and would not hear them nor do them."

This comment underlies the prophecy of Isa. xxviii.:

> "Yet they would not hear" (Isa. xxviii. 12).
> "We have made a covenant with death, and with hell are we at agreement" (Isa. xxviii. 15).

Beneath the imagery of Isa. xxviii. 1-4 we find presented the physical glory of the land of Samaria, the moral corruption of its people, and the advent of the king of Assyria.

> "It would be difficult to find in all Palestine, a situation of equal strength, fertility and beauty combined" (Dr. Robinson).

Twice the prophet refers to the "glorious beauty" and the "fat valley" of Ephraim, but he also speaks of their crown of pride becoming a fading flower. Under the figure of the hasty or early summer fruit, he represents the taking of Samaria by the hand of the Assyrian (Isa. xxviii. 4). Drunkenness, wine, strong drink, bring their corresponding dullness, pride, recklessness and judgment. The people are said to have been "swallowed up of wine" (Isa. xxviii. 7), and in verse 4 we read that they shall be "swallowed up" (Isa. xxviii. 4 margin) by the avenging Assyrian. The reader will doubtless remember the gracious use of this strange figure in Isa. xxv. 7, 8, where "the vail" and "death" are swallowed up in victory.

The prophet uses the figure of a "crown" four times. Twice he speaks of the "crown of pride" (Isa. xxviii. 1, 3) and twice of the "crown of glory" (Isa. xxviii. 5 and lxii. 3). Reference to a "crown of glory" in a setting of judgment is characteristic of Isaiah

(ii. 1-4; iv. 2-6), where we frequently have glimpses of coming glory interposed between chapters of denunciation and woe.

We must now present the structure of this chapter, a structure that has cost us much time and thought. The material is so rich and the theme so interwoven with imagery, that we must be content to give the barest outline, leaving the interested reader to fill in the detail.

Isaiah xxviii. Ephraim: Woes and Glories.

A | CROWNS (1-8). |
a | Crown of pride. Drunkards of Ephraim.
b | Overflowing flood.
a | Crown of pride. Drunkards of Ephraim.
b | Trodden under foot.
a1 | Crown of glory. Wine and strong drink.
B | TEACHING (9-13). |
d | Whom shall He teach?
e | Precept upon precept.
f | Stammering lips in judgment.
d | To whom He said.
e | Precept upon precept.
f | Snared as a judgment.
A | COVENANTS (14-19). |
a | Death and hell.
b | Overflowing, refuge of lies.
c | Line and plummet.
b | Overflowing, refuge of lies.
a | Death and hell.
b1 | Overflowing, trodden down.
B | TEACHING (20-29). |
d | Parable of the short bed.
e | Strange work, strange act.
f | The Lord of Hosts.
d | Parable of corn cultivation.
f | The Lord of Hosts.
e | Wonderful, excellent.

Leaving for the moment the section that foretells the destruction of Samaria, let us look at the section that reveals the cause of this great judgment. We are already prepared by the comment in II Kings xviii. 12 to find that the root cause is disobedience to the word of the Lord.

How are we to understand the references in Isa. xxviii. 9-13 to teaching? Are we to take the repeated statement “precept upon precept” as indicative of the approved method of instruction? or are these the words of “scornful men” and “mockers” (Isa. xxviii. 14, 22)? Bishop Lowth’s comment seems to supply the best interpretation that we know, and we give it in his own words:

"What, say they, doth he treat us as mere infants just weaned? Doth he teach us like little children, perpetually inculcating the same elementary lessons, the mere rudiments of knowledge; precept after precept, line after line? imitating at the same time, and ridiculing in verse 10, the concise prophetical manner. God by His prophet retorts upon them with great severity their own contemptuous mockery. Yes, saith He, it shall be, in fact, as you say: ye shall be taught by a strange tongue, and a stammering lip, in a strange country; ye shall be carried into captivity by a people whose language is unintelligible to you, and which ye shall be forced to learn like children" (Bishop Lowth).

"We must conceive the abrupt, intentionally short, reiterated and almost childish words of verse 10 as spoken in mimicry, with a mocking motion of the head, and in childish, stammering, taunting tone" (Ewald).

The Hebrew reads:

ZAV LAZAV, ZAV, LAZAV
KAV LA KAV, KAV LA KAV
ZE ER SHAM, ZE ER SHAM.

Or, as the Companion Bible puts it: "Law upon law, *Saw upon saw."

(NOTE: * - "Saw", allied with "saga", a sententious saying, "a wise saw".).

The word "stammering" here does not refer to a defect in the power of speech, as "stuttering", but rather to the scorn with which the Jew looked upon the "jabbering" of other tongues. Laag is translated "scorn", "derision", "mock"; and the Margin of Isa. xxxiii. 19 gives the rendering "ridiculous".

It would take us too far afield to speak here of the spiritual gifts which were poured out upon the church during the Acts, but the fact that Paul cites this very passage in I Cor. xiv. 21, shows that the Gentiles received these gifts "to provoke Israel to jealousy". This view we have always maintained in our exposition of the gifts in the church and will be found in the articles concerned. The only point we make here is that the thought of mockery and derision is incipient in the reference, and that judgment is imminent, both in Isa. xxxiii. and in I Cor. xii. - xiv.

Israel had refused the "rest and refreshing" which the Lord had offered:

"To whom He said, This is the rest wherewith ye may cause the weary to rest; and this is the refreshing: yet they would not hear" (Isa. xxviii. 12).

"How often", said the Saviour, "would I have gathered your children . . . . . and ye would not" (Matt. xxiii. 37).

The same charge is repeated in Isa. xxx. where, instead of the covenant with death and hell, we find the people "trusting in the shadow of Egypt":

"That strengthen themselves in the strength of Pharaoh, and to trust in the shadow of Egypt! . . . . . For the Egyptians shall help in vain, and to no purpose: therefore have I cried concerning this, Their strength is to sit still . . . . . In returning and rest shall ye be saved; in quietness and confidence shall be your strength: and ye would not" (Isa. xxx. 2, 7, 15).

God's people had made for themselves, "a refuge of lies" (Isa. xxviii. 15), but it would be of no avail.

In contrast with the false security that Israel had achieved by entering into an agreement with heathen nations, we read in Isa. xxviii. 16:

> "Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation; he that believeth shall not make haste."

This passage is quoted by Paul in Rom. ix. 33 when dealing with the parallel failure of Israel and the advent of the Messiah.

When Cromwell was encamped at Musselburgh in 1650, he sent a letter to the opposing party, in which the following passage occurs:

> "I beseech you in the bowels of Christ, think it possible you may be mistaken . . . . . There may be, as well, a carnal confidence upon misunderstood and misapplied precepts, which may be called spiritual drunkenness. There may be a *covenant made with death and hell . . . . . I pray you read the twenty-eighth of Isaiah from the fifth to the fifteenth verse."
>
> (NOTE: * - A pointed reference which the Covenanters would be quick to see.).

It is interesting to find that this chapter in Isaiah has played its part in our own national history; whether rightly or wrongly we do not here attempt to decide.

The remainder of the chapter is taken up with the parable of the bed too short for the sleeper, an allegory referring to the false security that any alliance with Sennacherib would achieve, and the parable of the husbandman, who does not plough for ever but follows the ploughing with sowing. There is a definite purpose in the process of ploughing, harrowing, threshing and grinding. Judgment with its accompanying misery is God's "strange act" (Isa. xxviii. 21), but He permits the judgment to fall, so that He may at length restore and bless.

> "Is corn crushed (i.e. reduced to powder)? Nay, He will not for ever be threshing it, nor break it . . . . . This also cometh from the Lord of hosts (i.e. the same may be expected of Him in His treatment of His people), Which is wonderful in counsel, and excellent in working" (Isa. xxviii. 28, 29).
> "For, lo, I will command, and I will sift the house of Israel among all nations, like as corn is sifted in a sieve, yet shall not the least grain fall upon the earth" (Amos ix. 9).

We have now considered briefly the alternation of woes and blessings so far as Samaria is concerned. In the next chapter the prophet's attention is directed to Jerusalem, and this we must consider in our next article.

ISAIAH.
#10. Woes and Glories (xxviii. - xxxv.).
Jerusalem, and its trust in Egypt (xxix. - xxxi.).
pp. 155 - 159

In the preceding chapter Isaiah has spoken of the sin and the punishment of Samaria. He now turns to the rulers and people of Jerusalem and Judah and denounces in them the self-same spirit that brought about the downfall of Samaria, the self-same instrument being used for their abasement, namely, the king of Assyria, though this time it was Sennacherib in the place of Shalmaneser. Chapters xxix., xxx. and xxxi are devoted to Judah's woes (because of their alliance with Egypt, and because of their blindness to the Word), and Judah's future glories, for which the Lord waits to be gracious. There are six references to Egypt in these three sections.

Because of its introductory nature, chapter xxix., with its twofold woe, must first of all be considered. It explains the reasons that led both to lack of trust in the Lord and putting trust in Egypt, which, however, is not named in it.

> "Woe to Ariel, to Ariel, the city where David dwelt! add ye year to year; let them kill sacrifices. Yet I will distress Ariel, and there shall be heaviness and sorrow: and it shall be unto Me as Ariel" (Isa. xxix. 1, 2).

With such cryptic terms Isaiah opens his mouth against Judah. What does he mean?

The name Ariel has two distinct meanings dependent upon whether the word ari is taken to mean "a lion", as it does in II Sam. xxiii. 20, or "an altar", as it does in Ezek. xliii. 15, 16. The reader unacquainted with the Hebrew may appreciate a word of explanation concerning this ambiguity.

Ari, if derived from arah, "to pluck or to tear", denotes a "lion", but if ari be derived from arah (from charah), "to burn", it denotes a "hearth" or "altar". There is, however, the possibility that the word in Ezek. xliii. 15, 16 is Har-el, "the Mount of God", for this is the spelling of the first occurrence of "altar" in these verses. However, the matter is too involved for more than a note here, and the array of names, including such scholars as Vitringa and Gesenius on the one hand and Grotius and Delitzsch on the other, is such that we must perforce accept the difficulty and do the best we can. As the name is repeated by Isaiah, it must be recognized that there is always the possibility that he played upon the double meaning of the word. If so, his message would read: "Woe to the lion of God, To the altar-place of God." The words: "Add ye year to year; let them kill the sacrifices", are spoken ironically and have the sense: "Go on, year after year, let the feasts go round." But the Lord had already repudiated such sacrifices and feasts:

> "To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto Me? . . . . . Bring no more vain oblations, incense is an abomination unto Me; the new moons and sabbaths, the calling of assemblies, I cannot away with" (Isa. i. 11-13).

As faith declines, ceremonial increases: "Should I weep in the fifth month, separating myself as I have done these so many years?" asked the ritualist in the days of Zechariah. But what did it matter how, when and what they did, for, said the Lord: "When ye fasted and mourned in the fifth and seventh month, even those seventy years, did ye at all fast, unto Me, even to Me?" (Zech. vii. 3-5). And so, "Woe to Ariel", the altar-hearth of God!

Verses 5-8 graphically portray the coming of Sennacherib, his dream of conquest and his utter defeat. The Assyrians might be likened, for their multitude, to small dust, yet they should become like chaff that passes away suddenly (Isa. xxix. 5). Those nations that fight against Zion shall be as a dream, or night vision, when "he awaketh", a figure that very aptly describes the difference between Sennacherib's boast and his expectation, and what he actually received at the hand of the Lord.

From verse 9 it is evident that the people did not understand Isaiah's prophecies. They were like those who heard Ezekiel, who said:

> "Ah, Lord God! they say of me, Doth he not speak parables?" (Ezek. xx. 49).
> "They are drunken; but not with wine; they stagger, but not with strong drink. For the Lord hath poured out upon you the spirit of deep sleep" (Isa. xxix. 9, 10).

Here was judicial blindness, the book had become "sealed" (verse 11), the reason and the consequences being given in verses 13, 14:

> "Wherefore the Lord said, Forasmuch as this people draw near Me with their mouth, and with their lips do honour Me, but have removed their heart from Me, and their fear of Me is taught by the precepts of men, therefore, behold, I will proceed to do a marvelous work among this people, even a marvelous work and a wonder; for the wisdom of their wise men shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid" (Isa. xxix. 13, 14).

Such is the "Woe".

The future "Glory" is found in verses 18-24. "In that day", as in Isa. xxix. 18, "the deaf shall hear the words of the book", "the blind shall see", and they "that erred in spirit shall come to understanding", and "they that murmured shall learn doctrine".

Chapter xxx. opens with a specific charge against these "rebellious children": "They set out to go down into Egypt; and they have not asked at My mouth" (Isa. xxx. 2). To Egypt! once "an iron furnace" to this people and now, as Rabshakeh even taunted Israel, "a broken reed" (II Kings xviii. 21). Judah thought "to strengthen themselves in the strength of Pharaoh, and to trust in the shadow of Egypt", but this could only end in their "shame" and "confusion" (Isa. xxx. 2, 3): "For the Egyptians shall help in vain, and to no purpose, therefore have I cried concerning this, Their strength is to sit still" (Isa. xxx. 7).

In the mistaken idea that it is an exhortation to trust the Lord, the words, "Their strength is to sit still", have been often misapplied. The word "strength" here is Rahab, a name given to Egypt (Psa. lxxxvii. 4). "I have named her, Rahab, sitting still." That is poor help in time of need; "a bruised reed" indeed. In contrast with the false and fickle "stillness" is the true exhortation of verse 15: "In returning and rest shall ye be saved; in quietness and in confidence shall be your strength" (Isa. xxx. 15). Then comes the dreadful refusal, "And ye would not", followed by their reaping and sowing:

> "But ye said, No; for we will flee upon horses; therefore shall ye flee; and, We will ride upon the swift; therefore shall they that pursue you be swift" (Isa. xxx. 16).

Thus is pronounced yet another "woe" against this people. But the "Glory" follows immediately.

> "And therefore will the Lord wait, that He may be gracious unto you, and therefore will He be exalted, that He may have mercy upon you: for the Lord is a God of judgment: blessed are all they that wait for Him" (Isa. xxx. 18).

"Therefore will the Lord wait . . . . . blessed are all they that wait." "Though it tarry, wait", said the Lord to Habakkuk—and to us all. Go not down to Egypt—wait. Put no trust in ungodly alliances—wait. This is not the wisdom of the world: "For since the beginning of the world men have not heard, nor perceived by the ear, neither hath the eye seen, O God, beside Thee, what He hath prepared for him that waiteth for Him" (Isa. lxvi. 4).

From the context of Isa. xxx. 18, we are once more "in that day", for verses 21-26 reveal millennial conditions, and verses 27-33, with its "Tophet" and "breath of the Lord like a stream of brimstone", pointedly refer to the events of Rev. xix. 20.

From the vision of the future, Isaiah once more returns to the unholy alliance with Egypt, saying:

> "Woe to them that go down to Egypt for help; and stay on horses, and trust in chariots, because they are many; and in horsemen, because they are strong, but they look not unto the Holy One of Israel, neither seek the Lord" (Isa. xxxi. 1).

The vanity of this trust in Egypt is further enlarged upon in verse 3: "Now the Egyptians are men and not God; and their horses are flesh and not spirit."

With this prophecy of failure, the series of woes end, and the remainder of the chapter reveals "the glories" that shall come "in that day". First, the Lord reveals that "He will come down to fight for Mount Zion, and for the hills thereof" (Isa. xxxi. 4). From the figure of an undaunted lion when a crowd of shepherds come against it, the prophet turns to the figure of a bird protecting its young: "As birds flying, so will the Lord of Hosts defend Jerusalem; defending also He will deliver it; and passing over He will preserve it" (Isa. xxxi. 5). The word translated "birds" (Heb. Tsippor) refers to birds of the smaller kind, as the translation "sparrow" indicates (Psa. cii. 7). The word "flying" is in the feminine and may indicate the "mother bird", even as the word translated "flying" contains the thought of "hovering". But the most interesting word here is the one which is translated "passing over", for it is pasach, which is first found in Exod. xii. 13 in the words, "I will pass over you". The fact that the word can be translated "halt" and "leap" in I Kings xviii. 21 and 26, and "lame" in II Sam. iv. 4, together with the figure, in Isa. xxxi. 5, of the outstretched, protecting, wing, shows that in the great Passover itself, the thought is that the Lord stayed to preserve against the destroying angel rather than that he "passed over" and left them.

The final section begins with a call to repentance, which is characteristic of all God's dealings in grace with Israel: "Turn ye unto Him from Whom the children of Israel have so deeply revolted" (Isa. xxxi. 6). Similarly, Moses and the Prophets emphasize the necessity for "turning""

> "If thou turn" (Deut. iv. 30);
> "Turn thou unto Me" (Jer. iii. 7);
> "Repent and turn" (Ezek. xiv. 6; xviii. 30);
> "That we might turn" (Dan. ix. 13);
> "Take with you words and turn to the Lord" (Hos. xiv. 2);
> "Turn ye unto Me . . . . . and I will turn unto you" (Zech. i. 3);
> "Rend your heart . . . . . and turn unto the Lord' (Joel ii. 12);

"Repent" cried John the Baptist, followed by the Lord Himself and, later, by the apostles.

This "turning to God" will be "from idols" (I Thess. i. 9, 10), for "in that day every man shall cast away his idols" (Isa. xxxi. 7). Just as Isa. xxx. ended with Tophet, so chapter xxx. ends with the destruction of the Assyrian and with Jerusalem described as the Lord's "fire" and "furnace". Vitringa comments on verse 9 as follows:

> "The Assyrian king shall be struck with so great a panic at the slaughter of his army, that in his flight he shall pass by his strongholds on the borders of his empire, not daring to trust himself to them."

ISAIAH.
#11. Woes and Glories (xxviii. - xxxv.).
Glories when the King reigns.
Woe to the vile and the careless (xxxii.).
pp. 185 - 190

Isaiah, after his alternation of "woe and glory", pauses at chapter xxxii., while he envisages that glorious reign which, at intervals, has shed light, in prospect, upon the dark picture of his people's sin. Twice, already, the prophet has followed the mention of the Assyrian by a glorious reference to Christ.

A | The greaves and war cloaks of the warrior become fuel for burning.
B | "Unto us a child is born, etc." (Isa. ix. 5, 6).
A | The thickets of the Assyrian forest are cut down.
B | "There shall come forth a rod . . . . . of Jesse" (Isa. x. 34 - xi. 1).

He does so again in the opening of the section now before us.

A | The Assyrian has fled in fear.
B | "Behold, a king shall reign in righteousness" (Isa. xxxi. 9 - xxxii. 1).

The structure of the chapter may be set out as follows:--

Isaiah xxxii.

A | 1, 2. RIGHTEOUSNESS. | Hiding Place. Covert. Shadow.
B | 3-11. CHARACTER. | Eyes, ears, heart, stammerer.
Vile, liberal, churl.
Careless women.
C | 12-14. LAMENTATION. Land a desolation.
D | 15, 16. Until . . . . . Then.
A | 17, 18. RIGHTEOUSNESS. | Peace. Quietness.
Assurance. Peaceable habitation.
Sure dwellings. Quiet resting places.
C | 20. BLESSING. Land cultivated.

Years before Isaiah uttered his prophecy of the King, David had expressed his longing for such a reign of righteousness, peace and prosperity. This is recorded in Psalm lxxii., wherein "the prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended". When the great antitypical Assyrian shall be destroyed, the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ, and the reign of righteousness and peace will begin.

We are already aware that this King is Immanuel, "God with us" (Isa. vii. 14), and that He is the Child born, the Son given, and at the same time the mighty God (Isa. ix. 6, 7), also that this mighty One is to reign upon the throne of David. We realize therefore that the prophet uses the words "A man" in chapter xxxii. with intention.

> "A man shall be as an hiding place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest; as rivers of water in a dry place, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land" (Isa. xxxii. 2).

"A hiding place."—The first occurrences of chaba, the verb that gives us "hiding place", are in Gen. iii. 8 and 10, where our first parents hide themselves for shame because of their sin. This word "hiding place" indicates peculiar distinction, because it is the only occurrence of the word in the O.T. Men may make a refuge of lies, they may invent a covering for themselves, but all will be swept away and be of no avail. This King, this Man, is the one and only true Hiding Place since Adam's futile attempt. He shall be a "covert", Heb. sathar. The word includes an element of secrecy, and sethar, the substantive, is many time translated "secret" and "secretly":

> "In the time of trouble He shall hide me in His pavilion, in the secret of His tabernacle shall He hide me" (Ps. xxvii. 5).
> "Surely in the floods of great waters they shall not come nigh unto him. Thou art my hiding place; Thou shalt preserve me from trouble; Thou shalt encompass me about with songs of deliverance" (Psa. xxxii. 6, 7).
> "Thou hast been a shelter for me . . . . . I will trust in the covert of Thy wings" (Psa. lxi. 3, 4).

Isaiah has used the word twice before in chapter xvi. 4 where he speaks of "a covert" from the face of the spoiler, and in xxviii. 17, where the "refuge of lies" is referred to and it is said that "the waters shall overflow the hiding place".

Moreover, a two-fold provision that would be fully appreciated by those who dwelt in a thirsty land is found in this "man".

> "As rivers of water in a dry place, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary (or thirsty) land" (Isa. xxxii. 2).

The figure of a shadow is one that is used very freely in the Old Testament.

> "Hide me under the shadow of Thy wings" (Psa. xvii. 8).
> "How excellent is Thy loving kindness, O God! therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of Thy wings" (Psa. xxxvi. 7).

Isaiah himself contrasts the "shadow" provided by the Lord (Isa. iv. 6; xxv. 4), with the "refuge of lies" to which Israel turned when they put their trust "in the shadow of Egypt" (Isa. xxxii. 2, 3).

The "weary" land, is a land where weariness arises out of drought and thirst. In Psalm lxiii. 1 and cxliii. 6 it is translated "a thirsty land" and in Prov. xxv. 25 it is used of a "thirsty" soul.

These are lovely and blessed forecasts of the reign of Christ. In Isa. xxxii. 17 and 18, as the structure reveals, these blessings are again to the fore, and we draw attention to two important reciprocal principles underlying them.

(1) In both Isa. xxxii. 1, 2, and in the sequel verses 17 and 18, peace is the effect and work of righteousness, and
(2) Then the abstract terms "righteousness, quietness and assurance" are realized in the concrete enjoyment of "peaceable habitation, sure dwellings and quiet resting places".

Quite apart from the importance of understanding the teaching of Isaiah, the true and scriptural meaning of "peace" and its essential relationship to "righteousness", lies at the very foundation of our faith and is practically the key which unlocks the doctrine of the Epistle to the Romans.

Shalom, "peace", is derived from shallam, which has the meaning of "completeness". This completeness colours the varied ways in which shallam is used in the O.T. For example,

> "The days of thy mourning shall be ended" (Isa. lx. 20).
> "Thus all the work . . . . . was finished" (II Chron. v. 1).

It is especially important to perceive this "completing" in such usage as,

"He shall surely pay ox for ox" (Exod. xxi. 36).
"He should make full restitution" (Exod. xxii. 3).

So also in the translations "reward", "recompense", "requite", "repay", "make amends" and "restore"; what is uppermost is the idea of making a complete return as a righteous basis of peace.

Shalem, the adjective, is mostly translated "perfect", which enforces the idea resident in the root word. "Peace" therefore is not merely the cessation of hostilities, it is the result of perfect or complete satisfaction. It is therefore obvious that in their dealings with one another the world can never appropriately use the word "peace" in its full meaning. At the best there will be but a poor compromise. Again we say nations at war may cease fighting, but unless the root cause of the hostility has been completely and righteously dealt with, the ensuing "peace" will be but a patched-up interval of comparative calm between periods of open hostility. The Epistle to the Romans connects "peace" with "righteousness". "Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God" (Rom. v. 1). And Hebrews speaks of the "peaceable fruit of righteousness" (Heb. xii. 11). So also Isaiah.

"The work of righteousness shall be peace; and the effect of righteousness, quietness and assurance for ever" (Isa. xxxii. 17).

The difference between "work" (maaseh) and "effect" (abobah) is the difference between a thing done, or made, and service rendered. So righteousness makes peace as an accomplished fact, for its result is tranquility.

We have been in correspondence with a believer, who, while positively expressing his belief in Christ and consciousness of the sealing of the Holy Spirit until the day of redemption, is nevertheless seeking assurance and confirmation. He has come as far as Isa. xxxii. 17, but has not stepped out into verse 18 where those who are justified and at peace "dwell in a peaceable habitation, sure dwellings, and quiet resting places". Perhaps the difference between the experiences of verses 17 and 18 is the difference between "faith" and "trust", a difference that eludes us when we seek to be logical, but which is nevertheless obvious as we become acquainted with the vagaries of the human heart. The difference is well illustrated by a story about Blondin, the tight-rope walker. This acrobat asked a spectator of his feats whether he believed that he could carry him across the tight-rope on his back. The man replied in the affirmative. "Will you then let me do it?" continued Blondin. "No", replied the man, thus evincing that while he "believed", he did not "trust".

Returning to the earlier verses of Isa. xxxii., we observe that in the structure we have grouped verses 3-11 under the heading, "Character". It had been the prophet's grief that Israel's "eyes", "ears" and "heart" were blind, dull and hard, and that this had brought about their inability to understand, and consequently their failure (Isa. vi. 9, 10). Under the reign of the righteous King, eyes shall see, ears shall hearken, hearts shall understand, and instead of being addressed in judgment by men of stammering lips (Isa. xxviii. 11); those of once stammering lips shall speak plainly. Let us not miss the prophet's intention here. Every faculty mentioned is seen to have reached perfection. Eyes "shall not be dim", or "be dazzled". Ears shall not only "hear" but shall "hearken", meaning an obedient hearing in place of that "hearing" which "heard" but did not understand. Hearts, once hard and hasty, shall "understand knowledge", and stammering lips shall speak "elegantly" (margin).

In contrast with this blessed growth under the reign of peace, is placed the character of the vile and the churl, who shall then be seen in their true colours. The words "The vile person will speak villainy" make one think of the pronouncement of Rev. xxii. 11. "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still." The solemn possibilities as to the nature of sin and the limits of repentance, that Isa. xxxii. 6 and Rev. xxii. 11 indicate, are great.

"Thorns and briers", emblems of the primeval curse, come up upon the land where villainy and carelessness go hand in hand, and Isaiah adds that the > "palaces shall be forsaken; the multitudes of the city shall be left; the forts and towers shall be for dens for ever . . . . . until the spirit be poured upon us from on high" (Isa. xxxii. 13-15).

"For ever . . . . . until."—The association of these two expressions is impossible if the orthodox interpretation of "for ever" be the truth, for every exponent of the eternity of punishment stresses its everlasting and unchanging character. Olam, the Hebrew word translated "ever", is derived from alam, to hide or to conceal, therefore something secret (Psalm xc. 8); (II Kings iv. 27), and olam refers to a period of time, the beginning, end, or character of which, is "hidden" from the observer. It is used of time past (Gen. vi. 4); or time future, and in many occurrences it is evident that such future time is limited (Deut. xv. 17). The word "until" is the translation of the Hebrew cd, as it occurs in the phrase "for ever"; consequently we could translate the passage "The . . . . . towers shall be for dens until the age . . . . . until the spirit be poured", which gives good sense and does no violence to word or grammar. If the judgment here described is to be eternal, then there can be no subsequent "until". But there is a subsequent "until", and we are therefore compelled to conclude, either

> (1) The orthodox translation "for ever" is an error and should be abandoned, or
> (2) Isaiah made a mistake, and there will not be, because there cannot be, any subsequent blessing, because the eternal nature of punishment precludes the idea.

Most of our friends who hold the orthodox view, are happily neither consistent nor logical. They appear to be able to believe both the eternity of punishment, and the inspiration of Isaiah. Perhaps it is a case of where ignorance is bliss it is folly to be wise, but such blissful ignorance is hardly the qualification that one looks for in critic or teacher.

This blessed restoration, when "the wilderness shall be a fruitful field", is the result of Israel's true Pentecost. To this blessed day the prophet Joel devotes practically the whole of his prophecy. Just as Isaiah speaks of the wilderness being turned into a fruitful field, when the spirit shall be poured out from on high, so Joel uses another great figure of restoration.

> "That which the palmerworm hath left hath the locust eaten; and that which the locust hath left hath the cankerworm eaten; and that which the cankerworm hath left hath the caterpillar eaten" (Joel i. 4).

Then comes the call,

> "Rend your hearts, and not your garments" (Joel ii. 13).
> "And I will restore to you the years that the locust hath eaten, the cankerworm, and the caterpillar, and the palmerworm" (Joel ii. 25).
> "And it shall come to pass afterward, that I will pour out of My Spirit upon all flesh" (Joel ii. 28).

Isaiah, as Joel, looks to the fulfillment of Pentecost for the realization of his vision of restoration. This evidently was in the minds of the apostles when they enquired as to the restoration of the kingdom of Israel (Acts i. 6), just as it was also the basis of Peter's call to repentance, with the assurance that if there was a true response the times of refreshing and restitution would follow (Acts iii. 19-21).

We should exceed the scope of our present studies were we here to enter into the question of the true meaning of Pentecost, but the question has been studied in the series "The Acts of the Apostles" in Volume XXV.

The Gospel of JOHN.

#12. Fullness and true grace, in contrast with type and shadow (i. 15 - 17).

pp. 57 - 62

Once again the Apostle reverts to the testimony of John the Baptist. His first witness, as recorded in this Gospel, is to Christ, "the true Light", with the object that "all men through Him might believe" (John i. 6-8).

John the Apostle and John the Baptist have but one testimony, the Baptist's witness becoming imperceptibly interwoven with the testimony of the Apostle, neither breaking its thread nor spoiling its harmony.

> "John bare witness of Him, and cried, saying, This was He of Whom I spake, He that cometh after me is preferred before me; for He was before me" (John i. 15).

The Baptist is but confirming the marvelous testimony of the Apostle given in John i. 1 and 14. Christ as "the Word" was before John. Christ as "the Word made flesh" was after him. This testimony of the Baptist is expanded in John iii. 27 and 31 and will be given fuller consideration when that passage is reached. It is inserted to supplement the Apostle's statement here, so that in the mouth of two witnesses every word may be established. Accordingly we proceed to verses 16-18.

In verse 14 the Apostle had spoken of Christ as "full of grace and truth". He now refers to that "fullness" (John i. 16) as the source and that "grace and truth" (John i. 17) which believers have received. In verse 14, the Apostle had spoken for the first time of Christ as "the only begotten of the Father". He now carries the title back, in verse 18, to counterbalance, in time, what the Word was "in the beginning". Verses 16-18, therefore, are an expansion and exposition both of what accrues to man and what pertains to God from the incarnation.

> "And of His fullness have all we received, and grace for grace" (John i. 16).

We cannot hope to understand this passage merely by concentrating upon the meaning of the word "fullness", but must ascertain what is associated with that fullness and in what manner the statement carries forward the Apostle's theme. This will necessitate consideration of the expression "grace for grace", and inasmuch as the fullness of the Lord is first of all associated with "grace and truth" and that "grace and truth" is placed over against the law given to Moses in verse 17, it will be necessary to include and consider these references before we can appreciate in any measure the intention in verse 16. We observe therefore a marked contrast indicated between "the law" that was given by "Moses" and the "grace and truth" that "came by Jesus Christ".

Here, together with verse 18, we have two contrasted lines of teaching,

Moses.	Jesus Christ.
Law.	Grace and Truth.
Given by (edothe).	Came into being by (egeneto).
God.	Father.
Not seen.	Declared.
Back parts (Exod. xxxiii. 23).	Bosom.
Servants (Heb. iii. 5, 6).	Son.

For the moment our attention is directed to the expression "grace and truth". Now, whatever that term may mean, it is obvious that it belongs to one, and to one only, of these two categories. It does belong to that headed by "Jesus Christ"; it does not belong to that headed by Moses. Is it however true that there was no "grace" in the law?

> "How came Israel to have it and not the Babylonians, Egyptians, Philistines, Assyrians, etc.? Yes, it was all grace: as God asks and tells them so earnestly and so often, in Deut. iv. 32-40 and other places. And was there no 'truth' in the law? Yes, surely every word was truth. But in John i. 17 the contrast is between one thing that was given by Moses, and a different thing that came by Jesus Christ"
> (Dr. Bullinger's "Figures of Speech").

The use of the figure of speech called Hendiadys, Hen-dia-dys, the "one by means of two" figure, is the explanation of the apparent difficulty. The two words "grace and truth" really represent but one thing and are employed solely to emphasize the word "truth". The one thing intended is the term "true grace", with emphasis on the word "true". We have now contrasted with one another "law" and "true grace". But we must discover what "true" grace is. There can be no such thing as "false" grace, and the words "true grace" here must therefore stand in contrast with some other conception. To elucidate the point let us consider the usage of the word alethinos, "true".

> "That was the true light" (John was not that light) (John i. 9).
> "True worshippers shall worship the Father, in spirit and in truth" (In contrast to the worship either in Samaria or Jerusalem) (John iv. 23).
>
> "My Father giveth you the true bread" (In contrast with the type given by Moses) (John vi. 32).
>
> "I am the true Vine" (of which the O.T. references were types) (John xv. 1).

It will be seen that John has frequently used this word with the meaning "anti-typical, or real". There is one reference which actually places the word "true" over against "type" and it is Heb. ix. 24:

> For Christ is not entered into the holy places, made with hands, which are the figures (anti-types) of the true, but into heaven itself."

We can now return to John i. 17 and bring the expressions "law" and "grace and truth" under a common denominator, for both may be called "grace", but in the law the grace was "typical", and the offerings "shadows", while in the gospel grace was "real", and the work of Christ the fulfillment of the shadows and types of the law.

We have already indicated the difference between the law that was "given" by Moses, and real grace that "came" by Jesus Christ. In the structures of the prologue (see Volume XXIX, page 174) this is found in correspondence with the statement in verse 3 that "all things were made by Him". Here, Christ is seen as Creator in both realms.

We can now go back to John i. 16, and understand the expression "grace for grace". The word translated "for" is anti, which means "over against"; "grace over against grace" means, in the light of verse 17, "the grace of gospel realities in place of the grace of types and shadows". This "real grace", we learn, is "out of His fullness".

> "For of His fullness have all we received, and (or even) grace over against grace, for the law by Moses was given, but true grace came into being by Jesus Christ" (John i. 16, 17).

The "fullness" which is the source of this rich supply is that which we have already noted in verse 14, and arises only from the fact that "the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us". We have already noted in our studies in the epistle to the Colossians, that the "fullness", pleroma, links the testimony of John to that of Paul and, that apart from the one passage in John i. 16, the word pleroma is used, in reference to Christ, exclusively by Paul. In Volume XXIII, page 171, we gave an analysis of the distribution of the word, but as the subject is of such important we do not hesitate to repeat the outline here for the benefit of new readers.

The Fullness.

A | John i. 1-18. | HIS TITLE.—In the beginning. The Word.
HIS OFFICE.—Maker of all things.
His title in the flesh. The only begotten Son.
God declared to be invisible.
B | Gal. iv. 1-10. | The elements of the world.
Ye observe days, months, times and years.
Made of a woman. Made under the law.
Sonship (Adoption).
C | Ephesians. Christ and His Church |
a | i. 10. Goal. Head up things in heaven and earth.
b | i. 23. Foreshadowing Head. Fullness of Him.
a | iii. 19. Goal. Filled unto all the fullness of God.
b | iv. 13. Measure. Fullness of Christ.
A | Col. i. 12-22. | HIS TITLE.—Before all things. The Image.
HIS OFFICE.—Creator of all things.
His title in the two spheres.
Firstborn of all creation. Firstborn from the dead.
God declared to be invisible.
B | Col. ii. 9-23. | The rudiments of the world.
Holydays, new moons and sabbaths.
Bodily. Completeness.

The expression in Gal. iv. 4, "the fullness of the time" refers to the glorious complement, the generation which should bring in the glorious readjustment by the birth, death and resurrection of the One Who was then born.

> "We beheld His glory . . . . . full of grace and truth . . . . . and of His fullness have all we received, even the grace of the gospel for the grace of type and shadow (the pleroma)" (John i. 14-16).

The reader will observe that there, where "the fullness of the time" is mentioned, we have the repudiation of the elements of the world, "days, months, times and years", as religious observances, and there also we have the parallel with John i. 14, the Word made flesh, for we read that in the fullness of the time, God sent forth His Son, made of a woman.

If we further pursue our investigation we shall observe the same features in the corresponding section, Col. ii. 9-23. When John wrote his Gospel, all ceremonial observance was finished. The epistle to the Hebrews had been sent to those who were involved in the transition; the epistle to the Colossians had demonstrated once and for all the completeness of the believer in Christ, and even John, though he ministered a message of "life" to the "world" and had no commission to speak of the mystery and its blessings, could not and would not put upon the "other sheep" the bondage of ceremonial, now removed by grace. This is made clear in John iv. 20-24, but we must leave consideration of its message until we reach that chapter.

In all testimony, especially where change, opposition, and contention are involved, there is danger of leaving a wrong impression by over or under stating the truth or by omitting some feature, so well known and so fully believed, as to appear to be in no need of vindication. We want, therefore, to avoid the slightest appearance of evil, and evil it would be if but one reader suspected that we belittled the inspiration and moral glory of the law given by Moses. We will therefore quote the thirteen references in the Gospel of John to Moses, and thus complete the presentation of the truth.

Moses in John's Gospel.

> "For the law was given by Moses, but true grace came by Jesus Christ" (i. 17).
>
> "We have found Him, of Whom Moses in the law, and the prophets did write" (i. 45).
>
> "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up" (iii. 14).
>
> "There is one that accuseth you, even Moses, in whom ye trust. For had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed Me: for he wrote of Me" (v. 45, 46).
>
> "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Moses gave you not that bread from heaven; but My Father giveth you the True Bread from heaven" (vi. 32).
>
> "Did not Moses give you the law, and yet none of you keepeth the law? Why do ye go about to kill Me?" (vii. 19).
>
> "Moses therefore gave unto you circumcision; (not because it was of Moses, but of the fathers) and ye, on the sabbath day, circumcise a man. If a man on the sabbath day, receive circumcision, that the law of Moses should not be broken (or without breaking the law of Moses); are ye angry at Me because I have made a man every whit whole on the sabbath day?" (vii. 22, 23).

> "Moses in the law commanded us that she should be stoned; but what sayest Thou?" (viii. 5).
> "Then they reviled Him, and said, Thou art his disciple, but we are Moses' disciples. We know that God spake unto Moses; as for this fellow, we know not from whence he is" (ix. 28, 29).

Let the reader trace the story of these references. First we have the distinction "law" and "grace", and then the finding of the Messiah, the Subject of prophecy. The very gospel message of John iii. 16 finds its foreshadowing in the act of Moses, even as the True Bread was typified by the Manna. So far, the references, with one exception, have been an expansion of John i. 17. The exception was the warning of John v. 45, 46.

The remaining references indicate the growing opposition of the blind disciples of Moses which culminates in chapter ix. At the close of this chapter we find much that makes us think of John i. 5. The darkness comprehended it not, or did not grasp, the Light.

> "And Jesus said, For judgment I am come into this world, that they which see not might see: and that they which see may made be made blind. And some of the Pharisees which were with Him heard these words, and said unto Him, Are we blind also? Jesus said unto them, If ye were blind, ye should have no sin: but now ye say, We see: therefore your sin remaineth" (John ix. 39-41).

In this chapter He Who was the Word made flesh is called by His enemies "a sinner", "a fellow", a "man not of God", but by the man born blind He is first of all called: "a man that is called Jesus", then "a Prophet" and, at last "The Son of God" and "Lord".

Moses therefore is given his rightful place in John's Gospel. Like John the Baptist, he was but a voice, a lamp, a lifted finger. It is Christ Who is the Word, the Light, and the Lamb of God.

We have now stepped through this most wonderful prologue, with the exception of verse 18, to which we must devote a separate article. We shall then be ready to listen to the testimony given by John of those things which, if believed, give "life", and by "abiding" in them lead to a fellowship and a glory not found in the message to the circumcision.

#13. The Invisible and the Only Begotten. The Summary of the Prologue (i. 18).
pp. 86 - 90

We have now arrived at the stupendous conclusion to this great prologue: From the revelation of "The Word" in the beginning, we have descended to creation, to manifestation and to incarnation. The Word was made flesh. Then we commence the ascent to "the glory that He had before", but the coming of the Word in the flesh was for the purpose of redemption.

> "No man hath seen God at any time, the only begotten Son, Which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him" (John i. 18).

The "Word" of verse 1 becomes here "the only begotten Son", while "God" becomes "the Father". When we speak of the Holy Spirit, we do not mentally conjure up some particular shape or form, but when believers speak of the "Father" they are apt to forget the words of John iv.:

> "The true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth: for the Father seeketh such to worship Him. God is spirit and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth" (John iv. 23, 24).

There can be no mistaking the meaning of this passage. "The Father" is placed in correspondence with "God", Who is spirit. Again, in John v. we read:

> "And the Father Himself, Which hath sent Me, hath borne witness of me. Ye have neither heard His voice at any time, nor seen His shape" (John v. 37).

And again in John vi.: "Not that any man hath seen the Father, save He which is of God, He hath seen the Father" (John vi. 46). Similarly, in I Tim. i. 17 God is declared to be "The King eternal, incorruptible, invisible", while in chapter vi. of the same epistle we read: "Who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto, Whom no man hath seen or can see" (I Tim. vi. 16). Such is the consistent testimony of Scripture. It is of the very essence of material things that they can be either seen, or heard, or felt. The world of matter is intimately linked with the bodily senses, but it is of the very essence of spirit that the human eye, and ear, and hand cannot apprehend it: "Handle me and see, for spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see Me have" (Luke xxiv. 39). While the reader will readily acquiesce in all that has been advanced from the Scriptures, there will probably be, nevertheless, in the back of the mind, a number of Old Testament passages that seem at first sight to contradict this testimony. For example, in Gen. xxxv. we read:

> "God appeared unto Jacob . . . . . and God went up from him, in the place where He talked with him . . . . . I am God Almighty . . . . . and Jacob called the name of the place where God spake with him, Bethel" (Gen. xxxv. 9-15).

Here, Jacob obviously had very personal dealings with "The Lord God Almighty". Moreover, on an earlier occasion, in Gen. xxxii., where Jacob had traveled from Bethel to Jabbok, we read:

> "There wrestled a Man with him until the breaking of the day . . . . . And Jacob called the name of the place Peniel: for I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved" (Gen. xxxii. 24, 30).

Again, in Exodus, we read:

> "Then went up Moses, and Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel; and they saw the God of Israel . . . . . they beheld God, and did eat and drink" (Exod. xxiv. 9-11).
> "The Lord spake unto Moses face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend" (Exod. xxxiii. 11).

We have already dealt with the place that the incarnation holds in the Divine scheme, and have drawn attention to the fact that John i. 14 does not say, "The Word became man", but that "The Word became flesh". The New Testament declares that Jesus Christ was a "man", but it does not say that He became such at the incarnation. Phil. ii. declares that He was found in fashion as a man, and Rom. viii. that He was made in the likeness of sinful flesh, but Gen. xxxii. had already indicated that the God of Jacob was a "man" long before the lowly birth at Bethlehem. All this we have already considered when dealing with John i. 14, but it is so important that we repeat some of our conclusions here. The invisible God expressed Himself before time began. He Who created the world and all things, first of all humbled Himself by taking visible shape. He became the Image of the invisible God, the Firstborn of every creature, the Beginning of the creation of God. He, the visible God, was the One after Whose image and likeness Adam was created, and He it was Who walked in Eden in the cool of the day. He, the visible God, was the God of Israel seen by Moses and the Seventy. And so, when John i. 18 declares that "no man hath seen God at any time", and the Old Testament declares that certain men did see God, there is no contradiction. John i. 18 refers to God Who is Spirit, whereas the Old Testament speaks of the One Who, for the purposes of creation and mediation, became the Image of the invisible God, and in the fullness of time, for the putting away of sin, became flesh, and the Only Begotten of the Father.

The second clause of John i. 18 reads in the Authorized Version as follows: "The only begotten Son, Which is in the bosom of the Father." The Revised Version margin reads: "Many very ancient authorities read God only begotten." This reading is found in the Codex Sinaiticus, the Codex Vaticanus, the Codex Ephraemi, and the Codex Regius. It is also found in 33 of the cursive manuscripts, the Peshito versions, the Memphitic and Aetheopian, and a host of the Fathers. Arius, though opposed to the doctrine of the deity of Christ, upheld this reading, and it was incorporated in the creed of Antioch. Lachmann, Tregelles, & Westcott and Hort also accept it as the true version. The words "only begotten Son" are the words we should expect, and it hardly seems possible that so strange a reading as "God only begotten" should have been inserted in place of the more usual "The only begotten Son". In this marvelous prologue we have some wonderful revelations of movements in the Godhead, all directed towards manifestation and realization—"The Word", "The Light", "The Glory", "The Fullness", "The Word was God", "The Word was made flesh", and now "God only begotten". He "was" in the beginning; he "tabernacled" among us; He "is" in the bosom of the Father. This last statement uses the words ho on: "The One Who is." These words speak of the Lord's ascension, as in John iii.:

> "No man hath ascended up into heaven, but He that came down from heaven, even the Son of man Which is (ho on) in heaven" (John iii. 13).

The Saviour, as the Son of man, has gone back "where He was before" (John vi. 62), and it is as the "Only Begotten" Who is in the bosom of "The Father" that John i. 18 now speaks of Him. Before the incarnation, before the Word was made flesh, the Lord is not spoken of as "the Only Begotten", neither is He called "The Son of man". He has gone back now to the glory, but He has gone back with the evidences of redemption accomplished, and so can reveal the invisible God as Father.

There is only one other reference to the word "bosom" in John's Gospel, and that is in xiii. 23: "Now there was leaning on Jesus' bosom one of His disciples whom Jesus loved." The word indicates not only a place of warm affection, but also a place in which confidences are received, as we see from Peter's suggestion that John should ask the Lord in confidence as to who was the betrayer. In John xiii. 23 we have the word en ("in the bosom"); in verse 25 it is epi ("on the breast"); while in John i. 18 it is eis ("unto"). The latter indicates something more intimate and resembles the word "with" (pros) in John i. 1.

We find this same emphasis upon the new relationship of the ascended Lord in Heb. i. 3-5. In verse 3 He is spoken of as "The brightness of His glory" and "The express image of His person" (titles comparable with "The Word" of John i. 1). He is also credited in Heb. i. 10 with the work of creation just as in John i. 3. The parallel is again evident in Heb. ii. 14, which is comparable with John i. 14, and in Heb. i. 3-5, parallel with John i. 18, we read:

> "When He had by Himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high: being made so much better than the angels, as He hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they. For unto which of the angels said He at any time, Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee?"

The Lord returns as "The only Begotten Son", having "obtained" a more excellent name than angels. To say such a thing of the Lord as "God" would be absurd. No one needs to be told that He who is "God" (John i. 1; Heb. i. 8) has a more excellent name than angels. In what sense, then, could "The Word" Who "was God" "obtain" this name? The answer is that He who was so high, stooped to man's estate and was made a little lower than the angels for our sake and for our redemption. As the Man Who had thus triumphed He could be spoken of as having "obtained" by inheritance a more excellent name, this name being "The Only Begotten Son of God".

As "The Word", the Lord's office was to make known the will and the glory of the invisible God. Sin, however, had come into the world; and so the Word "was made flesh". He became "the Light of the world" and the believer was able to see the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. He told His disciples that "he that hath seen Me hath seen the Father", and so the Apostle, looking up to the right hand of the Father, could say: "He hath declared Him."

The word "declare" here is exegeomai (giving our word "exegesis"), and means literally "to lead out". The word occurs six times in the New Testament, including the passage in Luke xxiv.:

> "And they told what things were done in the way, and how He was known of them in the breaking of bread" (Luke xxiv. 35).

The other occurrences are in Acts x. 8; xv. 12 & 14; and xxi. 19.

It is not surprising, seeing that in this prologue John has taken up the language of philosophy, to find that this word "declare" was a technical term much used in connection with speaking by oracle, and interpreting things regarded as being Divine. Christ is the true Interpreter of God to man. He came from heaven, not to demonstrate His own Deity, but to show us what the invisible God was like. Those who have rightly "seen" Christ, have "seen" the Father. We know what the love of God is, because we have seen it manifested in Christ. We know His patience, His peace, His power, His mind, His will—we know Him, for the "Only Begotten Son" has given Him a complete exposition. He is our Interpreter, our Mediator, our Daysman. He has "shown" us the Father "and it sufficeth us".

The prologue has now accomplished its purpose. The Gospel itself now await us, and from first to last we shall discover that in it the Son of God is manifesting, revealing, interpreting the Father to His children. It must now be our delightful task to endeavour to open up these treasures and exhibit them for the blessing and comfort of the believer, and to the glory of the Lord.

#14. The Witnesses.
The Witness of John the Baptist (i. 19 - 34).
pp. 122 - 128

"I saw, and bare record that this is the Son of God" (John i. 34).

It will be observed that the structure of this Gospel, which has already been indicated in Volume XXIX, pp. 126, 127, that the whole book apart from the prologue, is covered by the word "Witnesses". Omitting all details, the structure is as follows:

B | a | i. 19-34. The Witness of John the Baptist.
b | i. 35-51. Simon, son of Jona: "Follow Me."
C | ii. 1 - xxi. 14. The Witness of the Eight Signs.
B | b | xxi. 15-23. Simon Peter, Son of Jonas: "Follow Me."
a | xxi. 24, 25. The Witness of John the Apostle.

Even in the prologue itself, the witness of John the Baptist is introduced twice, and in such a way as to form a definite part of the structure:

E | i. 6-8. JOHN. Witness (marturian).
E | i. 15. JOHN. Witness (marturia).

Of all the writers in the New Testament John is the one who uses the idea of "bearing witness" most frequently. From the start to finish his Gospel is based upon testimony borne. This fact is confirmed by the following figures giving the occurrences of Martureo.—In the Synoptic Gospels (Matthew, Mark, and Luke) 3 occurrences.

In John's Gospel 33 occurrences, and in his other writings 14 occurrences.
Marturia.—In the Synoptic Gospels 4 occurrences.
In John's Gospel 14 occurrences, and in his other writings 16 occurrences.

This tabulation demonstrates very clearly the supreme place that John gives to the question of "testimony". In addition, another fact emerges. The Synoptic Gospels use these two words seven times, and John himself seventy-seven times. The numbers indicate completeness and perfection. For the purposes with which the Gospels were written, their respective witnesses were complete. John's purpose seems to have demanded much more in the way of witness than was the case with Matthew, Mark and Luke. Those addressed by the Synoptic writers would have had a fuller acquaintance with the prophecies of the O.T. than would those for whom John wrote, and the genealogies given by Matthew and Luke would in themselves have gone a long way towards providing convincing evidence. John, writing to the world, depends more on the records borne by John the Baptist and himself and others, than on the appeal to O.T. prophecy. There are only eight or nine references to the fulfillment of prophecy in John's Gospel, as against the forty-seven references to martureo and marturia.

An examination of the fourteen references to marturia in John's Gospel divides the witness into three groups—the opening testimony of John the Baptist, the closing testimony of John the Apostle, and the threefold testimony of the Lord Himself:

Marturia ("Witness") in John's Gospel.

A | i. 7; i. 19. The two-fold witness of John the Baptist.
B | The threefold witness of the Lord Jesus Christ. |
a1 | iii. 11. Not receive.
b1 | iii. 32. No man received. Man.
c1 | iii. 33. He that received. True.
a2 | v. 31. Not true?
c2 | v. 32. My witness is true. True.
b2 | v. 34. I receive not witness from man. Man.
d | v. 36. Greater than John. The works.
a3 | viii. 13. Not true.
c3 | viii. 14. My record is true. True.
b3 | viii. 17. Testimony of two men. Man.
A | xix. 35; xix. 24. The twofold witness of John the Apostle.

It is very clear from the above analysis of John's fourteen references that this "record" or "witness" plays a great part in his presentation of the truth.

We must now turn our attention to the opening testimony in the structure—namely, that given by John the Baptist. This testimony, which is given in fairly full detail, settles a number of vital points with regards to the One Whose Person and Work fill the Gospel with their glory, and Who is set forth as "The Way, the Truth, and the Life". John the Baptist's testimony settled the following crucial facts:

(1) Jesus Christ was the long promised and expected Lord, Whose word of restoration and comfort opens the second portion of Isaiah's prophecy (Isa. xl., John i. 23).
(2) Jesus Christ was the Lamb of God, the great Antitype of all the sacrificial lambs offered under the dispensation of type and shadow (John i. 29, 36).
(3) Jesus Christ was the Messiah, "Which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost" (John i. 31-33).
(4) Jesus Christ was the Son of God (John i. 34).

Upon closer examination we find that John the Baptist's witness is twofold. The first part is his answer to the Sanhedrin, the most powerful ruling body among the Jews; the second part is given unasked, and represents his own spontaneous conviction upon seeing the evidence promised to him in connection with the baptizing of the Saviour. The structure is as follows:

The Witness of the John the Baptist (John i. 19 - 34).

A | 19-28. The record of John, when asked by Jews. |
a1 | 19. Question.—"Who art thou?"
b1 | 20-21. Answer.—Not the Christ, Elijah or that Prophet.
a2 | 22. Question.—"Who art thou?"
b2 | 23. Answer.—I am a Voice.
a3 | 24, 25. Question.—"Why baptizest thou?"
b3 | 26, 27. Answer.—He it is.
A | 29-34. The record of John when he saw the sign the next day. |
c | 29, 30. Behold the Lamb of God.
d | 31. I knew Him not.
e | 31. John's baptism.
f | 31. Water.
c | 32. I saw the Spirit.
d | 33. I knew Him not.
e | 33. Christ's baptism.
f | 33. The Holy Ghost.
c1 | 34. The Son of God.

We must now acquaint ourselves a little more fully with the facts brought out by this witness, and their bearing upon the purpose of John's Gospel.

Unless the reader has already made a study of the testimony of John the Baptist, it is very unlikely, if he were asked how many times he is mentioned by name in the Gospels and the Acts, that his answer would be anywhere near the correct number. John the Baptist is actually mentioned no less than 90 times in the N.T., whereas John, the writer of the Gospel, is mentioned only 35 times by name, including the references in the Revelation.

Luke, in the first chapter of his Gospel, gives the detailed story of John the Baptist's birth, and in chapter iii. he speaks of his unworthiness when compared with the One Who was to follow:

> "And as the people were in expectation, and all men mused in their hearts of John, whether he were the Christ or not; John answered them, saying unto them all, I indeed baptize you with water: but One mightier than I cometh, the latchet of Whose shoes I am not worthy to unloose: He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire" (Luke iii. 15, 16).

The Lord's own testimony to His forerunner we find in Matt. xi.:

> "A prophet? Yea, I say unto you, and more than a prophet. For this is he of whom it is written, Behold, I send My messenger before Thy face, which shall prepare Thy way before Thee. Verily I say unto you, Among them that are born of women there hath not arisen a greater than John the Baptist" (Matt. xi. 9-11).

The events immediately associated with the birth of John the Baptist obviously indicated the arrival of some one of no small importance, and it is not surprising that those who heard of them said, “What manner of child shall this be?” We must also remember the testimony of the Acts to the fact that the ministry of John the Baptist had had an effect outside the land of Palestine, for we find that Apollos of Alexandria, and the twelve disciples at Ephesus had come under its influence (Acts xviii. 25; xix. 1-4), the greater must be the King he represents. If the forerunner therefore be so great, how great must He be, Whose shoe-latchet John felt Himself not worthy to unloose!

John opens his testimony in verse 19 by recording the questions put to John the Baptist and his answers to them. The priests and Levites sent from Jerusalem simply asked the question, “Who art thou?” They did not actually say, “Art thou the Christ?” but, knowing that this question was uppermost in men’s minds (see Luke iii. 15), John anticipates the enquiry by confessing—“denying not, but confessing”—“I am not the Christ”. Let us pause a moment here. John says that those who asked the question were “Jews”. Matthew refers to his own people as “Jews” only once (Matt. xxviii. 15), his other four references being the statements of others. Mark speaks of the Jews only once out of six occurrences, when he describes, apparently for the sake of the Gentile reader, the Jewish custom of washing (Mark vii. 3). And Luke, who has the Gentile reader in mind, has only two references out of a total of five (Luke vii. 3; xxiii. 51). John, on the other hand, uses the word “Jew” 68 times, an indication that by the time he wrote his Gospel, his own people had ceased to be a nation, and could only be referred to by the name commonly used among the Gentiles. In contrast with John’s 68 references to the “Jews” we must place his four references to “Israel” (John i. 31, 49; iii. 10; xii. 13), and Matthew’s twelve references. These are significant numbers, especially as we view them in the light of Israel’s position before and after Acts xxviii.

The Sanhedrin were well within their province when they sent to ask John the Baptist who he was, for they were responsible for the religious life of the people. Seeing that John so emphatically denied that he was the Christ, his questioners ask, “Art thou Elias?” There is an insistent testimony in the Rabbinical writings to the expectation that Elijah would appear just before the advent of the Messiah, an expectation justified by the prophecy of Malachi (Mal. iv. 5). John answers this second enquiry with the words, “I am not”. The deputation then puts one more question, “Art thou that prophet?” This is a reference to the promise fulfilled in Christ Himself. John answers with the one word, “No”. A mere negative, however, would not be a satisfactory answer to take back to the Sanhedrin, and the Jews therefore put their question in another form: “Who art thou? that we may give an answer to them that sent us. What sayest thou of thyself?” To many, alas, such a question would open the door to pride, but John remains true. He begins by saying, “I am a voice”—not even “I am the voice” for there is no article—and then he goes on to explain that he is the forerunner promised by Isaiah, and that the One Whose coming he announced was none other than the Lord.

This, however, raised further problems in the minds of the Jews. The teaching of the Rabbis was that the world would be restored at the coming of the Messiah, and Kimchi speaks of the Rabbinical tradition that Elijah would so purify the people at his coming that even the illegitimate child would be restored to the congregation. If then

John the Baptist, with his baptism and his new order of things, was neither the Messiah, nor Elijah, nor "that prophet", by what authority did he baptize? We learn from the account that those who asked the question were "of the Pharisees", a sect which was most scrupulous regarding ceremonial. Hitherto baptism had been employed when Gentile proselytes were admitted into the commonwealth of Israel, but now John is baptizing Jews as well, and they naturally ask for an explanation. John is only too ready to give the answer. He tells them that his baptism is but an introductory ceremony. Someone infinitely superior to himself was already among them, for Whose advent it was John's office to prepare.

Following this catechism of John, comes his own spontaneous testimony in verses 29-34. Here we come at once to the heart of the Gospel. At one step we leave the arguments of the Pharisees and their scruples concerning baptism, for the clear and evangelical testimony of verse 29:

> "Behold the Lamb of God Which taketh away the sin of the world" (John i. 29).

Here, in one brief, clear-cut sentence is crystallized the supreme purpose of the prologue. It was for this purpose that the Word was made flesh.

> "In the body of His flesh through death, to present you holy and unblameable and unreproveable in His sight" (Col. i. 22).
> "That through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, even the devil, and deliver . . . . ." (Heb. ii. 14, 15).

This same purpose, expressed in varied language, is the testimony of prophet, evangelist and apostle alike.

Throughout the sacrificial system of the law of Moses, the offering of a lamb is of constant recurrence. No Jew could forget that at the beginning of every year (Ex. xii. 1) there was the offering of the Passover lamb, and at the beginning and end of each day the sacrifice of a lamb upon the altar. There would be one passage, however, that would be uppermost in their minds when they heard the cry, "Behold the Lamb of God"—the well-known passage in Isa. liii.:

> "He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter" (verse 7).
> "He shall bear their iniquities" (verse 11).
> "He bare the sin of many" (verse 12).

It was John's testimony that he was the forerunner of the Lord of Isa. xl., and the Lamb of Isa. liii.

The phrase, "That taketh away the sin of the world" is not recorded by the other evangelists. Matthew, for example, says, "He shall save His people from their sins". John, however, rejoices to put on record this early testimony. It also is interesting to note, in passing, that the next occurrence of the word, kosmos, "world", is in John iii. 16.

The title "The Lamb" (Amnos) used by John in i. 29 is not found in the other three Gospels. A similar word Arnion ("little lamb") is used in the Revelation, where it occurs as a title of Christ no less than 28 times (4*7). It is never used in the epistles of Paul.

John now reverts to the purpose of his baptizing, and explains that it was appointed, among other things, as a means of identifying the Messiah. Comparing the recorded in Matt. iii. with that of John i. we gather that John had a personal knowledge of the Lord and knew about His birth and His exemplary life. What he did not know, however, until the sign was given was that "Jesus is the Christ". That sign he saw, and so John the Baptist becomes the first of a long line of witnesses, leading up to the closing testimony of chapter xx.: "Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God" (John xx. 31).

The significance of the words, "The Spirit descending and remaining on Him", is explained more fully in John iii. 34. As Alford says:

> "We receive Him only as we can, only as far as our receptivity extends by measure; but He, into the very fullness and infinite capacity of His Divine Being."

We must now pass on to the second testimony preserved by John, this time a collective witness, given by Andrew, Simon, Philip and Nathaniel. This testimony, however, must be considered as a whole in our next article.

#15. The Witnesses.
The Witness of John, Andrew, Philip and Nathaniel (i. 35-51).
pp. 169 - 175

> "We have found Him—Messiah, Song of God, King of Israel."

We have, in John i. 19-51 a testimony given on four consecutive days.

1st day.—The testimony of John to those sent to him from the Sanhedrin.—The Lord, the Coming One, Who was preferred before him (John i. 19-28).
2nd day.—The testimony of John to all who attended.—His baptizing at Bethabara. The Lamb of God. The Son of God. He who baptizeth with holy spirit (John i. 29-34).
3rd day.—The testimony of John and Andrew.—The Lamb of God. The Messiah (John i. 35-42).
4th day.—The testimony of Philip and Nathaniel.—Him of Whom Moses wrote. The Son of God, the Son of man. The King of Israel (John i. 43-51).

We have considered the testimony of John the Baptist on the first and second days: we have now to hear the testimony given by others on the two following days. First let us discover the structure, so that the salient features may be made manifest.

The Testimony of John, Andrew, Philip and Nathaniel (John i. 35-51).

A | 35. The next day. John and the two disciples. They followed Him.
B1 | 36-39. JOHN'S TESTIMONY. |
a | 36. The Lamb of God.
b | 38. Rabbi.
c | 39. Come and see.
B2 | 40-42. ANDREW'S TESTIMONY. |
d | 41. Findeth Simon.
e | 41. We have found the Messiah.
A | 43. The next day. Jesus and Philip. Follow Me.
B2 | 43-46. PHILIP'S TESTIMONY. |
d | 45. Findeth Nathaniel.
e | 45. We have found Him.
B1 | 46-51. NATHANIEL'S TESTIMONY. |
c | 46. Come and see.
b | 49. Rabbi.
a | 49-51. Son of God. Son of Man. King of Israel.

The keen speaker or preacher, desirous of giving out the best that the Lord has given him, is often sensitive about repeating himself. We speak feelingly on this matter for we have several times hesitated to go over the ground already traversed, yet, for the sake of some new-comer, we have risked incurring the censure of mere repetition, only to find afterwards that the help directed towards the one was welcome to not a few. Paul has given his testimony to this same thing in Phil. iii. 1, and John the Baptist exemplifies it in the following passage:--

> "The next day after John stood, and two of his disciples, and looking upon Jesus as He walked, he saith, Behold the Lamb of God. And the two disciples heard him speak, and they followed Jesus" (John i. 35-37).

We do not know whether or not these two disciples had been present the previous day, but if they had the repetition of the testimony seems to have been blessed to them, and if they had not they now had the opportunity of heeding it. John knew that he must decrease, and the movement of his two disciples was for him the beginning of the end. But what a glorious end, to preach away one's disciples so that they become followers of Christ. It seems that our Saviour, seeing them following Him, encouraged them by the enquiry, "What seek ye?" It is salutary that we should be met with this question at the beginning of our discipleship. What are we seeking? What is our quest? What are our motives? Their reply was simple, almost naïve, "Rabbi, where dwellest Thou?" It will be observed that the Apostle here feels called upon parenthetically to interpret for his reader the title of "Rabbi". This, of itself, indicates the writer's anticipation of his Gospel having a Gentile audience, and a Gentile audience far removed from Jewish influence. Any synagogue-goer would know the meaning of "Rabbi" and even those Gentiles to whom Paul spoke in the synagogue at Antioch would have no need of John's interpretation. When, however, we observe that in this Gospel interpretation of Hebrew or Aramaic terms is customary, it becomes evident that the audience John envisaged could not have been Jews. Not only is "Rabbi" interpreted, but so also is "Cephas" (i. 42); "Messias" (i. 41); "Siloam" (ix. 7) and "Rabboni" (xx. 16).

Possibly the question "Where dwellest Thou?" covered deeper feelings, but, whatever their degree, the Lord is not One who quenches smoking flax, and He replied by the invitation, "Come and see". No description is given of the humble abode of the Son of God, but one cannot refrain from thinking of the wonder of those few hours spent beneath that roof with such a teacher. From that abode these two disciples went forth with the conviction that they had found the Messiah. "One of the two which heard John speak, and followed him, was Andrew, Simon Peter's brother" (John i. 40). Who was the other, unnamed, disciple? John never names himself in this Gospel: in the ordinary way he would almost certainly have given the names of both disciples. So also we read later in the epistle:--

> "And Simon Peter followed Jesus, and so did another disciple; that disciple was known unto the high priest" (John xviii. 15).
> "When Jesus therefore saw His mother, and the disciple standing by whom He loved, He saith unto His mother, Woman behold thy son. Then saith He to the disciple, Behold thy mother. And from that hour that disciple took her unto his own home" (John xix. 26, 27).

Again, in John xx. 2, 3, 4, 8 and xxi. 7, 20, 23, 24, we have references to "that disciple". The last reference, however, leaves no room for doubt: "This is the disciple which testifieth of these things, and wrote these things" (John xxi. 24).

The statement in verse 41, "He first findeth his own brother Simon", seems to demand the sequel, "and John then found his own brother James". However, it is to Andrew's testimony that attention must now be given.

> "We have found the Messiah, which is being interpreted the Christ" (John i. 41).

The express object of John's Gospel is that we may believe that "Jesus is the Christ the Son of God, and that believing we might have life through His name" (John xx. 31). Andrew's testimony, therefore, is timely, and if we need to be informed on the point, we may learn from the parenthesis that "the Christ" is the Greek interpretation of the Hebrew "Messiah". We may then discover that the "Messiah" is "the Anointed", Mashiach (Psa. ii. 2), and that this anointing applies to the Prophet (I Kings xix. 16), the Priest (Exod. xxix. 7), and the King (II Sam. ii. 4). The choice of every theme in John's Gospel, the production of every witness, and the omission of much that is found in other Gospels is made with the view of demonstrating this glorious fact. Andrew's testimony therefore is directly to the point. Jesus Christ is the Messiah, the Son of God. The Lord confirms the faith of the disciples in His Messiahship, by the re-naming of Simon. The name Cephas means "a stone", and re-naming proved to be prophetic (Matt. xvi. 18).

We must now turn to Philip's testimony. We do not know how Philip became acquainted with the Lord; whether he also had heard John the Baptist; or whether his was a personal call, but we are informed that Philip was of the same city as Andrew and Peter, a circumstance of itself likely to form a bond between them. However that may be, the Lord would go into Galilee, and He wanted disciples, and Philip was called. Before leaving for Galilee, Philip emulates Andrew's example, and finds Nathaniel, saying:

> "We have found Him of Whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the Son of Joseph" (John i. 45).

Instead of using the title of "the Messiah" Philip refers to the fulfillment of Old Testament prophecy that pointed Him out. It is unjustifiable to magnify the added words, "the son of Joseph" into a text from which to discuss the validity of the virgin birth. The Gospel of Matthew, which clearly sets Joseph gives the genealogy of the Saviour through "Joseph, the husband of Mary", and Luke who gives very explicit information about the virgin birth of Christ, says in Luke iii. 23: "And Jesus Himself began to be about thirty years of age, being as was supposed, the son of Joseph." Mary, herself, who certainly knew the facts concerning the birth of Christ, did not hesitate to say to Him, "Thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing" (Luke ii. 48). Philip's remark therefore cannot rightly be made into a theological term. He said what all said, "the son of Joseph", for such He was "in law".

The testimony of Nathaniel gathers up what has been distributed among the witnesses, and brings the opening set of testimony to a climax. Like Thomas, Nathaniel was not easily convinced. He seized on the reference to "Nazareth", saying, "Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?" (John i. 46). This was the attitude of mind which prompted the rejoinder of the officers of the chief priest: "Search and look, for out of Galilee ariseth no prophet" (John vii. 52). The fact that John records the opinion of Nathaniel regarding Nazareth, and the opinion of the leaders of the Jews regarding Galilee [and we must remember that Christ was called, "The prophet of Nazareth of Galilee" (Matt. xxi. 11)], suggests that he was here meeting an objection.

Some who knew the prophecy concerning Bethlehem may not have known how it could be reconciled with the reference to Nazareth. Here it is faced, though not explained. Possibly the emphasis on Bethlehem fits the kingdom purpose of Matthew, and the emphasis on "Galilee of the nations" and despised Nazareth, fits the world-wide purpose of John's Gospel. Apparently Philip did not debate the matter with Nathaniel, but used the argument that had proved irresistible with Andrew and John, "Come and see". As Nathaniel approached the Lord, the Saviour said: "Behold an Israelite indeed in whom is no guile" (John i. 47). Had there been a trace of guile in Nathaniel's character he would have affected a little modesty and disclaimed such an unqualified description of his character as flattering, but, genuinely guileless, he accepts the description as true, nevertheless asks in astonishment how the Lord could thus know his character. The answer revealed that he stood before a Prophet: "Before that Philip called thee, when thou wast under the fig tree, I saw thee" (John i. 48).

It was not unusual for some such place of seclusion to be sought for prayer, and the fact that the Lord had knowledge not only of Nathaniel's character, but of his private devotions, brought him to his great confession: "Rabbi, Thou art the Son of God; Thou art the King of Israel" (John i. 49).

There is something in Nathaniel's sudden conversion that reminds one of Thomas, and the very reply of the Lord to Nathaniel has something reminiscent in it of the scene in that room when the disciples were assembled described in John xx. 26-29.

> "Because I said unto thee, I saw thee under the fig-tree believest thou? Thou shalt see greater things than these. And He said, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Hereafter ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man" (John i. 50, 51).

"Verily" is the translation of the word Amen, a word brought over from the Hebrew into the Greek. John is the only one that records these double Amens of the Lord, of which there are no less than twenty-five occurrences, and we feel that we cannot omit presenting to the reader the complete list so that, should time permit, he may be able to weigh them over in the balance of the sanctuary.

The Double Verities (Amens) of John's Gospel.

Verily, verily, I say unto you. Open heaven. Angels ascending and descending (i. 51).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. Without new birth, cannot see kingdom (iii. 3).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. Unless born of water and spirit, no entrance (iii. 5).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. We speak that we do know (iii. 11).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. The Son can do nothing of Himself (v. 19).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. He that heareth . . . . . hath . . . . . life (v. 24).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. The dead shall hear . . . . . and live (v. 25).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. Ye seek Me . . . . . because ye did eat . . . . . (vi. 26).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. Moses gave you not that bread from heaven (vi. 32).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. He that believeth on Me hath everlasting life (vi. 47).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. Except ye eat . . . . . drink . . . . . no life (vi. 53).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. Whosoever commits sin is its servant (viii. 34).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. If keep My saying, never see death (viii. 51).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. Before Abraham was, I am (viii. 58).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. Thieves climb up some other way (x. 1).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. I am the door of the sheep (x. 7).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. Except wheat . . . . . die . . . . . abideth alone (xii. 24).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. Servant is not greater than his lord (xiii. 16).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. He that receiveth whom I send, receiveth Me (xiii. 20).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. One of you shall betray Me (xiii. 21).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. The cock shall not crow, before denial (xiii. 38).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. The believer shall do greater works (xiv. 12).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. Ye shall weep . . . . . but it will turn to joy (xvi. 20).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. Whatever you ask in My Name, The Father will give (xvi. 23).
Verily, verily, I say unto you. When young . . . . . guidest self . . . . . when old another guide thee (xxi. 18).

Unless one can bring to the task unlimited time and patience, and has available unlimited space, analysis of this formidable list is doomed to failure. That these sentences, so solemnly introduced, are of the greatest weight, we have no doubt, and we shall better appreciate their contribution to the great testimony of the whole, if we note their place and association as the story of this Gospel unfolds. We therefore keep the list before us for future reference. There is no reason, of course, why the reader should not make his own analysis. He will soon discover that these statements of our Lord have to do with life and death, the kingdom and service, or the Lord's Own relationship with the Father and the believer. For example, he may observe that the fourteenth reference is the great "I am" passage (viii. 58). So far as the present series is concerned, however, we have enough in hand to cope with the first of these double Amens, the study of which will more than occupy our available space.

When attempting to show the way in which John refers to Christ as the Word, and the Word made flesh, we said, speaking of the philosophical use of logos and the failure of human wisdom,

> "As we realize the immensity of the gulf that yawned between the far-off Platonist God, and the things of time and sense, we may perhaps better understand why the Lord used the figure of Jacob's ladder as representing Himself in John i. 51" (Vol. xix., p.98).

At the top, as it were, of Nathaniel's opening confession stands "The Son of God". At the bottom stands the Lord's own assumption, "The Son of man". Jacob, before he became "an Israelite indeed" (for he had manifested considerable guile), was vouchsafed the vision of Bethel.

> "He dreamed, and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top reached to heaven; and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it. And behold the Lord stood above it" (Gen. xxviii. 12, 13).

The Rabbis have allowed their fancy full rein in connection with Jacob's ladder, and while it would be waste of space to five quotations from their speculations, their prevalence would make the Lord's allusion to Jacob's ladder quite reasonable in Nathaniel's ears. The bringing of heaven and earth together, the placing of the Son of God at the one extreme and the Son of man at the other, is perhaps the most important feature of the imagery.

With the testimony of Nathaniel the opening witness to the person and work of Christ comes to a close. We now approach the great central portion of the Gospel, chapters ii. 1 - xxi. 14, and the witness we shall there hear will be not only that of men, but of miracle; not only the testimony of fallible flesh and blood, but of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. To this great theme we must now address ourselves, and we hope that in doing so many hours of delightful fellowship will be ours in tracing the testimony of the eight signs up to their evangelical conclusion, "Life in His name" (John xx. 31).

“In all their affliction, He was afflicted.”

#1. pp. 190 - 192

If the God we worship be the God of the theologian and the philosophers, a Being Who is absolute and unconditioned, then much could be advanced to prove that suffering or feeling of any sort cannot be a divine experience. This subject, under the title “Is God passible?” (capable of feeling or suffering), has caused much heartburning in theological centres. If the God we worship finds the express image of His Person in His beloved Son, if the God we love be “The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ”, if the God of grace calls Himself “The God of Jacob”, then no proof is needed to persuade His believing children that He does sympathize, feel, and indeed share, the groan of a creation subjected to vanity. Any attempt adequately to deal with so vast a theme would demand that the whole of the Scriptures be laid under tribute. Such an enquiry is quite beyond the intention of these short articles. Our immediate object is to minister to those who are suffering in mind, body or estate, and we feel that the aspect of truth we here wish to present is one well calculated to reach this end.

When brought face to face with suffering, especially on the scale that now confronts the world, a very great number of believers are beset with questions. They fear to attribute any feeling to the great I AM, yet find it difficult to believe that He can be any way “moved” by human distress. Unless “love” in the Godhead is something not only greater but essentially different from any and every exhibition of human love, then the great truth that “God is love”, contains a full answer to the problem, and it seems to us that all doubts in the matter must therefore vanish as mist before the sun. This, however, is too sweeping a manner in which to deal with sensitive consciences. We must accordingly descend to details; we must present our proofs; we must show our reasons; above all, we must endeavour to show the teaching of the Scriptures on this great subject.

The text which we have chosen for our title, expresses the point we wish to make in this series, viz., “In all their affliction, He was afflicted” (Isa. lxiii. 9). To break off at this point and raise the question of correct readings, Hebrew MSS and similar subjects may appear to be an uncalled for academic intrusion. But as there will always be the possibility of an objector raising the matter, we must in this introductory article consider the validity of our text.

The R.V. of Isa. lxiii. 9 reads, as a marginal alternative:

"Another reading is, In all their adversity, He was no Adversary."

The Companion Bible has the following note:

"Hebrew text reads: 'In all their adversity (He was) no adversary'. But some codices, with two early printed editions, read as text of A.V."

Bird's translation and note are:

"In all their affliction, His was the conflict."
"Note.—The received version, based on the keri (that which is "read", as an alternative to that which was "written" kethib), seems here in substance the best, and yields a most emphatic sense."

This passage looks at the problem of affliction, not so much from the human as from the divine standpoint. No problem is raised by the words "all their affliction", for man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upward. No, the wonder of the text is in the remainder of the passage, namely, that in it all, He, too, was afflicted. Isaiah is referring to Israel's early history, and his words bring to mind a passage in Exodus. While it is not a verbal parallel, because a different Hebrew word is used, yet to limit the description of human sorrow to the dimension of one word would not be true criticism but prejudice.

"And the Lord said, I have surely seen the affliction of my people which are in Egypt, and have heard their cry by reason of their taskmasters; for I know their sorrows" (Exod. iii. 7).

This "knowledge" (Heb. yada) is most intimate in its character (Gen. iv. 1); it is the result of experience (Exod. vi. 7; vii. 5); and its personal and experimental nature is most blessedly set forth in the work of the Saviour. He was "A man of sorrows, and acquainted (Heb. yada) with grief" (Isa. liii. 3).

"By His knowledge (Heb. daath, substantive of yada) shall My righteous Servant justify many, for he shall bear their iniquities' (Isa. liii. 11).

When Jehovah said "I know their sorrows", He expressed a knowledge deeper than that of mere observation. It was the knowledge of personal acquaintance. Isaiah makes the Saviour's "knowledge" synonymous with "bearing iniquity".

To the words of our text, Isaiah adds: "And the Angel of His Presence saved them." This "Angel of the Presence" speaks precious things of fellowship, of a God near at hand and not afar off, of One Who, though the Almighty Creator, was yet One Who could "grieve" over the waywardness and misery of His creatures.

Let us take comfort from the thought, that if our hearts are distressed at the folly and the wickedness that surround us, we see but a fraction of the sorrow of a groaning creation that is "known", experimentally known in its entirety, by the Lord of Glory. We hope to return to this theme again and again, until the wonder and the blessedness of it irradiates our tears with, as it were, its rainbow hues.

The Legacy of Peace

#1. The Meaning of Shalom.
pp. 42 - 44

The inner portion of the Gospel according to John (chapters xiii. - xviii.) has always been exceedingly precious to all Christians, quite irrespective of their dispensational position. In these chapters we have our Lord's last words to His disciples before He went forth to betrayal and death; and among them what we may describe as His "legacy of peace":

> "Peace I leave with you, My peace I give unto you" (John xiv. 27).

Bloomfield states that both the words used here—"leave" (aphiemi) and "give" (didomi)—are "usually conjoined in the wording of a will". This, therefore, we may regard as our Lord's bequest to His disciples before He left this world to go to the Father. The subject of peace is always a "word in season", and without it no other blessing can be enjoyed.

There is not much agreement among lexicographers and etymologists as to the derivation of the Greek word eirene, but this is unimportant as we have already learned that the true significance of any doctrinal term is best discovered from the Hebrew Scriptures, for the meaning of most doctrinal terms was fixed centuries before the N.T. was written. We therefore turn to the O.T. to learn what we can of this legacy of peace bequeathed by the Lord to His own.

Shalom, the Hebrew word "peace", is derived from shalam, "to make whole, complete, perfect". There is a depth of meaning in the Hebrew word that is not expressed in the English translation. The modern meaning of the word "peace" is largely concerned with "tranquility" or "quietness", without paying much attention to whether or not the grounds of this tranquility are sound and just. Consequently much that passes for "peace" is unworthy of the name, and vanishes when most needed, because it has no solid basis. To gain some idea of the Scriptural meaning of the word, let us look at the way shalam is used, so that we may be able to appreciate more fully the Lord's legacy of love.

In Exod. xxi. and xxii., we have a number of judgments which Moses sets before the people in connection with the settling of disputes. In chapter xxi. we have the case of a man who opens a pit, and fails to cover it, and so causes the loss of an ox or an ass. The judgment is that "the owner of the pit shall make it good (shalam)" (Exod. xxi. 34). Another case is that of an ox, hurt so badly by another man's ox that it dies. If it was known that the ox was dangerous and the owner had neglected to keep it in, the judgment is that "he shall surely pay (shalam) ox for ox" (Exod. xxi. 36). So also in Exod. xxii. 1, "He shall restore"; xxii. 3, "He shall make full restitution"; and, further on in the chapter: "restore", "pay", "make good" (Exod. xxii. 4, 5, 6, 7, 9, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15).

The basic meaning of "peace" is unmistakable. Peace is impossible without "making amends". "The work of righteousness shall be peace." This matter is so vital that we trust the reader will not begrudge the time spent in making this essential feature even clearer. Let us consider one or two other passages.

In Lev. v. 16 we read: "He shall make amends for the harm that he hath done." Here again the word is shalam. We also find it translated "requite" in Judges i. 7, "finish" in I Kings ix. 25, "recompense" in Isa. lxv. 6, and "perfect" in Isa. xlii. 19. As an adjective shalem is translated "full" (Gen. xv. 16), "whole" (Deut. xxvii. 6), and "just" (Prov. xi. 1).

Turning back to John xvi., we find that the Saviour adds to His bequest the words: "Not as the world giveth, give I unto you" (John xvi. 27). It was the custom of the world to include the word "peace" in its salutations. Heathen kings used this form of salutation, as we find in Ezra and Daniel (Ezra iv. 17; v. 7; Dan. iv. 1; vi. 25), but it was not in their power to establish true peace either among men, or with God. True peace is the result of satisfactory settlement, and when used in connection with God and man necessitates the sacrificial work of Christ. This we must look into later, but before closing the present article, which is mainly concerned with the true meaning of "peace", let us see what words are used to indicate its opposite, so that we may obtain as full a view of the word as possible.

In the first place, "peace" is naturally contrasted with "war":

> "I am for peace; but when I speak, they are for war" (Psa. cxx. 7).
> "I came not to send peace, but a sword" (Matt. x. 34).

It is also contrasted with evil, and compared with good:

> "Depart from evil and do good: seek peace and pursue it" (Psa. xxxiv. 14).
> "Thoughts of peace, and not of evil" (Jer. xxix. 11).

"Peace" is also placed in contrast with "anxiety":

> "Be anxious for nothing . . . . . and the peace of God . . . . . shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus" (Phil. iv. 6, 7).

Moreover, "peace" enables the believer to endure without being offended (Matt. xi. 2-6):

> "Great peace have they which love Thy law, and nothing shall offend them" (Psa. cxix. 165).

In our next article we must consider more definitely the grounds of our peace. We know enough already, however, to be able to praise God for a peace that is something more than quietness, resulting from a finished work, and a settlement that satisfies all the demands of righteousness.

#2. The enmity that necessitates peace.
pp. 72 - 76

Wherever there is found the necessity for peace, there must also be some phase of enmity. We have learned something of the basic meaning of "peace" by examining the Hebrew word shalom. Let us now add to our understanding and appreciation of this wonderful legacy, by considering some of the references to enmity that are to be found in Scripture.

The Hebrew word for "enemy" is oyeb, which becomes ebah, "enmity", and gives the name Job, "hated". The story of Job is the story of peace triumphing over enmity, a peace that "restores" and "makes amends" as the sequel so plainly shows. The Greek words for "enemy", echthros, and "enmity", echthra are of uncertain derivation. The root word is probably a compound of echo, "to have", and thrano, "to shatter, bruise, enfeeble". It will be seen how fully the word shalom answers all the awful implications of its opposite, whether expressed by the Hebrew ebah, by the story of Job, or by the thought of destruction that appears to be resident in the Greek word.

It will be necessary to have some check upon our search for references to "enmity", "enemies", "war", "sword", "strife" and the like, for these would be too numerous to deal with, without some selection. Let us look, therefore, at "enmity" as it comes into relation with "peace", and especially as it comes into touch with the "God of peace".

> "The God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly" (Rom. xvi. 20).

Without the illumination already received, the idea of associating the God of peace with "bruising" would sound incongruous. We have learned, however, that peace does not mean simply quietness; it means settlement, completeness, perfectness, and the God of peace will most surely wage war with all that is contrary to His glorious goal.

The enmity of Rom. xvi. 20 reminds us of the "enmity" that we find in Gen. iii. 15:

> "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel."

The essential meaning of "peace" prepares us for the revelation of Scripture, that in the procuring of peace there must be a "bruising":

> "He was bruised for our iniquities, the chastisement of our peace was upon Him" (Isa. liii. 5).

The Lord could not, however, be holden of death, and so Isa. liii. continues:

> "When Thou shalt make His soul an offering for sin, He shall see His seed, He shall prolong His days and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in His hand" (Isa. liii. 10).

This leads us to the second reference to the "God of peace":

> "Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect" (Heb. xiii. 20, 21).

Not only must the "God of peace" meet the enmity of the Serpent; He must also overcome death and the grave (for death is an "enemy": I Cor. xv. 26). The "God of peace" must carry the work of its blessed conclusion and "make perfect in every good work to do His will" those who, by reason of the alienation and enmity of sin, knew not the way of peace nor the paths of righteousness. Nothing short of resurrection glory, with its complete satisfaction, can satisfy the God of peace, and so, to the testimony of Rom. xvi. and Heb. xiii. must be added that of I Thess. v.:

> "The God of peace Himself sanctify you wholly; and may your spirit and soul and body be preserved entire, without blame, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Thess. v. 23 R.V.).

We have quoted the R.V. here because of its translation "be preserved entire". The A.V., however, by its double use of "wholly" and "whole" keeps closer to the actual wording. The first word "wholly" is a translation of holoteles, from holos, "all" and teleo, "to complete". What a wonderful expansion of the word shalom, with its underlying thought of perfectness and completion. The second word, translated "whole" in the A.V. and "entire" in the R.V. is holokleros, from holos, "all", and kleros, a "part" or "share". This word is used by Josephus to describe the "perfectness" of the sacrificial victim and in Acts iii. 16 with reference to the lame man's "perfect soundness". It is also used in James i. 4 of that spiritual integrity that "wants nothing".

In I Thess. v. 23, the order of the words is important—"spirit, and soul and body". This order was inverted at the fall of man. The spirit lusted after wisdom, the soul lusted after that which was pleasant to the eyes, the body sought satisfaction. The yielding to the temptation placed the spirit in a position subordinate to the soul, and the soul to the body. The law of sin is "in the members", and still wars against the law of the mind. Man is not viewed as complete and entire until spirit, soul and body shall have attended the full perfectness of resurrection standing in Christ. Such a doctrine is, of course, a complete denial of spiritism, which discounts the body and has no room for a physical resurrection, and is also a rebuke to those who set aside the soul as something undesirable and evil. The soul is as necessary as the body, though both may be instruments of evil if allowed to usurp the place of the spirit. The Lord Himself spoke of loving "the Lord thy God . . . . . with all thy soul", and it would be a foolish criticism of the Creator's wisdom to set aside one third of the perfect man. It is true that the exercises of the soul in such things as poetry and music are not "spiritual", neither is the eating of one's breakfast; yet both are normal and both can be done to the glory of the Lord. I Thess. v. 23 reveals the God of peace triumphantly undoing the evil and discord introduced into the constitution of man by the enmity of Eden. The title is a fitting one, when once the true meaning and goal of "peace" is perceived.

There is a further reference to this title of the Lord in Phil. iv.

> "Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise; think on these thing. Those things which ye have both learned and received and heard and seen in me, do, and the God of peace shall be with you" (Phil. iv. 8, 9).

The clause "if there be any virtue" is misleading. The passage should be translated "whatever virtue there is" (See Rom. xiii. 9 and I Cor. iii. 14: "Whatsoever other commandment there be", and "Whosoever's work shall remain"). Also, the word "think" in this passage is logizomai, which is rendered "count" in Phil. iii. 13 and "reckon", "count", and "impute" in Rom. iv. 3-6. Do not let evil and unlovely things occupy your attention, the Apostle seems to say, but rather let that which is virtuous count with you—and if such a general injunction is difficult to grasp, remember my own conduct as an example. Wherever it was possible, the Apostle bestowed praise (See, for example, his introduction to I Corinthians). Wherever he could, he exercised that power of love "that believeth all things". He was not quick to mark offence, he did not possess an eagle eye for faults, and he inculcated the grace that "esteemeth others better than self". Fellowship with the God of peace will result from such an attitude of mind, and is precious beyond words.

It should be kept in mind that this passage in Phil. iv. is the working out of the exhortation and example of Phil. ii. 4-11, where the "mind that was in Christ Jesus" is the opposite of that mind which was in the Serpent in Gen. iii. The One Who thought it not a thing to be grasped at to be on equality with God, but humbled himself, is contrasted with the one who aspired to be like God, who tempted man with the same temptation, and now seeks to exalt himself to his final undoing.

Another phase of enmity that is countered by the presence of the God of peace is found in Rom. xv. 33: "Now the God of peace be with you all. Amen." To appreciate the teaching of this section we must read from verse 8, and to assist the reader in the understanding of its essential features we give below an abbreviated structure:

Romans xv. 8 - 33.
The Acceptableness of the Gentiles.

A | 8, 9. Christ, a minister of the circumcision.
Gentiles might glorify God.
B | 13, 14. THE GOD OF HOPE.
A | 15-32. Paul, a minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles.
Offering of the Gentiles.
(a) acceptable to God (16).
(b) acceptable to Jewish believers (31).
B | 33. THE GOD OF PEACE.

Through the grace of God, the Gentiles were now "acceptable to God, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost" (Rom. xv. 16), but the Apostle is in great doubt as to the attitude of the leaders of the church at Jerusalem. He asks for prayer, that "the service which he had for Jerusalem may be accepted of the saints". Only when their full acceptance in the Lord was mutually recognized would the "enmity" that so evidently existed as a middle-wall between Jewish and Gentile believers be removed. How fitting, then, that the God of peace should form the closing theme. The true sequence of Rom. xv. is given in Eph. ii. 11-19, where this enmity and division between Jew and Gentile is likened to the middle-wall of partition, which has been destroyed and taken away, "the both" being made one, so making peace. It hardly seems right to speak of so great a theme with such brevity, but it must be remembered that our space is limited and our object here is not so much to give detailed exposition as to show the various phases of "enmity" that have given place and shall give place to this many-faceted "peace".

We must refer to one more passage before we conclude this article—in Col. i. The enmity and alienation here are obvious, and once again are clearly associated with "peace".

> "And having made peace by the blood of His cross, by Him to reconcile all things unto Himself . . . . . and you that were sometime alienated and enemies in your mind by wicked works, yet now hath He reconciled" (Col. i. 20, 21).

We have made no mention of the relation between "peace" and "enemies" in Rom. v. 1-11, nor to the enmity of the carnal mind which is placed in contrast with "life and peace" in Rom. viii. If we have demonstrated something of the nature of the "enmity" and thereby indicated something of the character and fullness of "peace", we have accomplished our immediate purpose.

Perhaps a summary will be useful, as there has been a considerable amount of detail to be kept in mind.

(1) The God of peace will deal with the enmity introduced in Gen. iii.
(2) The God of peace has dealt with the enmity of sin and death, both in the person of the Lord, and in all His redeemed children.
(3) The God of peace will accomplish perfect restoration, when man is raised "entire", spirit and soul and body.
(4) The Lord, as the God of peace, in association with the God of hope, is concerned with the breaking down of all enmity among the redeemed themselves, likening such enmity to a middle-wall of partition, the canceling of which is linked with the "both" being made "one", so making "peace".
(5) Those who have fellowship with the God of peace, must have "the mind that was in Christ Jesus", a direct repudiation of the mind of the usurper who aspired to be "as God".

To all who have been reconciled by the death of Christ, and who "seek peace and ensue it", comes the blessing of II Thess. iii. 16, and what more can we ask till traveling days are done?

> "Now the Lord of peace Himself give you peace always by all means, The Lord be with you all."

#3. "Peace, and at such a time."
In the world---tribulation; in Me---peace.
pp. 103 - 106

In the Book of Ezra there are several letters by various people, and it is in these letters that we meet the somewhat curious expression that we have used in the title of the present article—"at such a time".

> "And at such a time" (Ezra iv. 10, 11).
> "Peace and at such a time" (Ezra iv. 17).
> "Unto Ezra . . . . . perfect peace, and at such a time" (Ezra vii. 12).

The Chaldee participle which is translated "at such a time" is possibly used much in the same way as a business letter refers to the date when it is written. It is almost impossible to say what was the origin of the expression. The translators of the LXX version ignore it, while the R.V. renders it in each case: "and so forth." We are, however, very remotely concerned with the expression itself, and have simply adopted it because of its suggestiveness in English. "Peace, and at such a time"!

We may be pardoned, we trust, for taking this phrase out of its context in order to provide the believer with words that express so fully the wonder of the gift of peace. We have peace now—"at such a time"—with enmity, strife and perplexity all around, and a presage of possible disaster in the hearts of the stoutest. We shall have peace then—"at such a time"—when the day of judgment opens, and sinners shall be judged by Him Who sits on the throne. We shall have peace then—"at such a time"—when He shall make all things new. Peace in the glory, peace in view of judgment, peace in the midst of strife—"Peace, and at such a time". Let us look at these blessed facts a little more closely.

PEACE. AND AT SUCH A TIME—NOW, IN THIS WORLD.

> "Peace I leave with you, My peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid" (John xiv. 27).
>
> "These things I have spoken unto you, that in Me ye might have peace. In the world ye shall have tribulation; but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world" (John xvi. 33).

The whole context of these words of cheer is one of fear and trouble on the one hand, and comfort and peace on the other. Nothing can make up for a full reading of the chapters concerned, but the following abbreviated structure of John xiv. may be suggestive:

John xiv. 1 - 31.

A | 1. LET NOT YOUR HEART BE TROUBLED.—Ye believe.
B | 2-7. | I would have told you.
I go. I come again.
C | 8-14. The manifestation of the Father.
D | 15-20. | The other Comforter. Truth.
The world cannot receive.
C | 21-24. The manifestation of the Lord.
D | 25-27. | The other Comforter. Peace.
Not as the world giveth.
A | 27-28. LET NOT YOUR HEART BE TROUBLED.—Ye heard.
B | 28-31. | I go. I come again.
Now I have told you.

It is evident that the Lord is here ministering comfort to His own, who are to be left behind in the world. He tells them that if He goes away He will come again, and that during His absence the Holy Spirit will act as another Comforter. It is with this promise that His gift and legacy of peace is closely associated.

The source of the disciples' anxiety is most evidently the opposition of the world, which looms largely in these chapters. After referring to the world in a negative way in John xiv. 17, 19, 22 and 27, the record continues in verse 30: "The prince of this world cometh and hath nothing in Me." After a blessed interlude, referring once more to the believer's intimate nearness to the Lord, chapter xv. takes up the subject of the "world" again, and this time speaks of its hatred:

> "If the world hate you, ye know that it hated Me before it hated you . . . . . I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you . . . . . he that hateth Me, hateth My Father also . . . . . They hated Me without a cause" (John xv. 18, 19, 23, 25).

Summing up the opposition of the world on the one hand, and the comfort and strength ready for the believer's every time of need, on the other, the Saviour says, in verse 33:

> "These things I have spoken unto you, that in Me ye might have peace. In the world ye shall have tribulation, but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world" (John xvi. 33).

"In the world" and "in Me"—these two phrases represent the two spheres of the present life.

The victory is already ours, and the peace that follows victory is also ours. The prince of this world has been judged, and we are more than conquerors through Him that loved us. Truly we, and all of like precious faith, can say, "Peace—and at such a time!"

Let us now go back again to xiv. 27 and observe the threefold description of this peace that comforts and conquers.

(1) Peace I leave with you:
(2) My peace I give unto you:
(3) Not as the world giveth, give I unto you.

It was customary in New Testament times at meeting or at parting, to wish one's friends "peace", and we find that the Apostles often included it in the salutations and concluding words of their epistles. There are only three epistles, out of the twenty-one in the New Testament, where this form of salutation does not occur at the beginning. Our Lord also uses the same greeting, but with deeper and fuller significance. He follows the greeting of "peace" which He "leaves" with them as His legacy, by giving it another and greater commendation—He calls it "My peace". In this section of the gospel the Lord speaks of other things that were His. In John xiv. 11 and xvi. 13 we read of "My joy"; in xv. 9 "My love"; in xvii. 24 "My glory"; and in xiv. 15 "My commandments". It was the special work of the Comforter to "receive of Mine, and to show it unto you" (John xvi. 14). Who can hope to fathom the depths of peace enjoyed by the Son of God, even while suffering and persecution were His daily lot? A glimpse, perhaps, is given in Matt. xi., when His rejection begins to become manifest, and He looks up to the Father and says: "Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in Thy sight" (Matt. xi. 26).

Just as the Lord was at perfect peace, though hated by the world around Him, so the believer, being in the will of God ("My commandments"), may know the steady assurance of the Divine approval ("My peace"), and exult in the consciousness of this living union ("My joy"), and all this in spite of external conditions, which, if unmatched by grace, would inspire fear and overwhelm with tribulation and hatred.

In our first article we looked at some of the contrastive words that are used with peace. One of these was the word "offend":

> "Great peace have they which love Thy law, and nothing shall offend them" (Psa. cxix. 165).

This blessedness, the blessedness of an unoffended spirit, is found in the peace that the Lord gives, for in John xvi. we read:

> "These things have I spoken unto you, that ye should not be offended. They shall put you out of the synagogues: yea, the time cometh, that whosoever killeth you will think that he doeth God service" (John xvi. 1, 2).

If the world hate and persecute, the believer who is taught of God "marvels not" (I John iii. 13), but it does tend to shake one's confidence and disturb one's peace, when fellow-believers follow the same methods, and apparently feel that they "do God service" thereby. It is a strength to realize that the Saviour Himself walked that path, and that when He said, "My peace I give unto you", it was a peace which He Himself enjoyed when surrounded by a hostile world. While He was with the disciples He could shield them Himself; now that He is at the right hand of God, he helps them through the ministry of the "other Comforter".

Then further, the Lord says: "Not as the world giveth, give I unto you." We live in a day when we hear on every hand the words "peace, peace" when there is no peace. However earnest the men of the world may be, however much the nations may reach agreement, true peace is beyond their grasp, and is not in their power to give. The world cannot make a settlement for its sin, and apart from that, peace is impossible. But what the world could not and cannot do, the Lord Himself has accomplished, and it is for this reason that He can give in a way that is "not as the world giveth".

> "Jesus stood in the midst, and saith unto them, Peace be unto you. And when He had so said, He showed unto them His hands and His side" (John xx. 19, 20).

It will perhaps be wise for us to pause here for the time being. These few articles do not by any means exhaust even the references to peace in the New Testament, quite apart from dealing with the many aspects that peace presents. We may perhaps return to the subject later, but rather than hold back what might be "a word in season" we pass on the message contained in these three articles to our readers, hoping that the comfort and strength which this peace can supply may be theirs abundantly.

The Mystery Manifested.

#1. Musterion: a secret that necessitates manifestation.
pp. 65 - 67

The burden of our ministry for the past thirty years has been an echo, however faint, of the words of the Lord's prisoner: "to make all men see what is the dispensation of the mystery" (Eph. iii. 9, R.V.). The very fullness of the subject itself demands repeated examination and restatement, while the passage of time and the addition of new readers, make it imperative that this central feature of our testimony shall be kept to the fore. Knowing the joy of meeting afresh "things old" and being sure that patient and prayerful study will always result in the discovery of "things new" in this rich mine of truth, those of our readers who are acquainted with the teaching of the Scriptures concerning the dispensation of the mystery will be among the first to welcome such a series.

Our first enquiry will be into the meaning and relation of the two words "mystery" and "manifest".

"Mystery" is the Anglicized form of the Greek musterion, and consequently is rather a transliteration than a translation. It has been in our language so long that in the course of centuries it has developed meanings and connections of its own. If therefore we would understand the scriptural usage and meaning of the word we must go behind all these derived meanings. For example, musterion is derived from muo, to close, to shut, e.g., the lips, the eyes, and so preserve a secret. In the days of the Apostles and for long before the Christian era, the mysteries, ta musteria, referred to secret politics and religious doctrines, with their "initiations", and spoke of those who had advanced in knowledge and those who were "perfect"; they were accompanied by obscene rites and are among the things that it is not meet should be named among us. These were Satanic travesties, for as surely as there is in the Word "the mystery of godliness" so surely do we learn that there is also "the mystery of iniquity". It is not for us to probe the depths of Satan, but to confine our investigations to higher and purer lines of enquiry.

We will first turn our attention to the occurrences of the word musterion in biblical Greek, i.e., Greek translation of the O.T. and Greek apocryphal writings before Christ.

It is only in the book of Daniel that the LXX uses the word. There it occurs several times, being translated in the A.V. by "secret". Other translators of the O.T. into Greek, namely, Theodotion and Symmachus, use the word but four times.

> "Hast thou known the secret of God" (Job xv. 8).
> "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him" (Psalm. xxv. 14).
> "A talebearer revealeth secrets" (Prov. xx. 19).
> "My leanness" Margin. "Heb. "My secret" (Isa. xxiv. 16).

These occurrences confirm the LXX translation of the word in Daniel, and indicate the primary idea of a mystery, or secret, but not necessarily anything mysterious in the modern sense of the word.

The word is of frequent use in the Apocrypha. Ecclesiasticus uses it of the secrets of private life in such statements as "Whoso discovereth secrets loseth his credit" (xxvii. 16). Wisdom uses it in connection with heathen sacrifices and rites: "They slew their children in sacrifices, or used secret ceremonies." But the most frequent use of musterion is in relation to secrets of state, such as the plans and purposes of a king: "It is good to keep close the secret of a king" (Tobit xii. 7). Here we have a statement that approximates to the words of Matt. xiii., "The mysteries of the Kingdom of Heaven", for the marginal note in the English translation of Tobit says, "The secrets of the Kingdom" as in the Hebrew.

In Judith we read that there was a rumour in the house of the King of Assyria that he would "avenge himself on all the earth". He called together all his officers and nobles "and communicated with them his secret counsel (to musterion tes boules, ii. 1, 2). This passage is helpful in appreciating the expression in Eph. i. 9, "the mystery of His will" (to musterion tou thelematos), where however the purpose is not one of vengeance on all the earth, but of a dispensation of grace beyond dreams. The precision of this statement of Eph. i. 9 will be better appreciated when it is examined in its context. At the moment we are confining our attention to the usage of the word itself.

In II Maccabees the word is used of the betrayal of the secret plans of the Jews to their enemy, who because of their persecutions resorted to stratagems.

> "Rhodocus, who was in the Jews' host, disclosed the secrets to the enemies" (xiii. 21).

Before the N.T. was written therefore, the word "mystery" had a definite meaning among the readers of the Greek O.T. and Apocrypha. That meaning was "a secret", generally "a secret purpose", and at times "a secret purpose because of an enemy". This meaning must be kept in mind when we find the word in the Gospels, the Epistles, or the Apocalypse. Now the essence of a secret is that it is known only to one person, and therefore unknowable to any other by any process of reasoning. It must therefore ever remain a secret unless revealed by the possessor of the secret.

This leads us to the other word in our title "The Mystery Manifested". Before the Apostle could make manifest the secret counsel of the Most High, it must be made known to him, by revelation. The O.T. Scriptures do not contain "the secret", for Eph. iii. 9 tells us that it was "hid in God", while Col. i. 26 says that the mystery was "hid from ages and generations". Not only do the O.T. Scriptures not contain this "secret", but it is not found in the Gospels, nor even in the early epistles of Paul. The passages in Eph. iii. and Col. i. already quoted assure us that this mystery was "revealed" to Paul only when he had become the "prisoner of Jesus Christ", and through him it was "made manifest" to His saints. It follows therefore that the mystery and its manifestation will constitute the essence of Paul's prison ministry, and consequently we hope in this series to be of help to all who seek to know "what is the dispensation of the mystery".

#2. A group of epistles that manifest the mystery.
pp. 97 - 99

The reader who is looking for help in the understanding of the mystery is directed to a series of articles entitled "The Mystery. Its meaning, message and ministry", which appeared in Volume XVIII. We do not propose retraversing the ground there covered, although naturally some of the features of that series will come before us for further consideration. In the present series the subject is the manifestation of the mystery, rather than the mystery itself, and it is assumed that the reader is already acquainted with:--

(1) The twofold character of the Acts (see Vol. XVIII, p. 33).
(2) Paul's twofold ministry, especially his prison ministry (Vol. XVIII, p. 49).
(3) Acts xxviii. as the dispensational boundary (Vol. XVIII, p. 72).

The prison epistles themselves are the one great means of manifesting the mystery to us to-day. We are independent of the opinions and interpretations of men, for in these prison epistles we find all that has been revealed on the subject and, consequently, just so far as we comprehend their teaching, so far, and no further, shall we comprehend the mystery itself.

We must not assume that all readers are sure which of Paul's epistles may be denominated "prison epistles". For their sakes, therefore, we give below the names of these epistles, together with the internal evidence they contain that they are of prison origin.

There are five epistles written from prison after the setting aside of Israel, and we have but to read them to discover the fact for ourselves.

EPHESIANS IS A PRISON EPISTLE.
"For this cause I, Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles" (iii. 1).
"I, therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you" (iv. 1).
"The mystery of the gospel, for which I am an ambassador in bonds" (vi. 19, 20).

PHILIPPIANS IS A PRISON EPISTLE.
"Both in my bonds, and in the defence and confirmation of the gospel" (i. 7).
"My bonds in Christ are manifest in all the palace" (i. 13).
"Many of the brethren . . . . . waxing confident by my bonds" (i. 14).
"Supposing to add affliction to my bonds" (i. 16).
"All the saints salute you, chiefly they that are of Cæsar's household" (iv. 22).

COLOSSIANS IS A PRISON EPISTLE.
"The mystery of Christ, for which I am also in bonds" (iv. 3).
"Aristarchus my fellow-prisoner saluteth you" (iv. 10).
"Remember my bonds" (iv. 18).

II TIMOTHY IS A PRISON EPISTLE.

"Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me His prisoner" (i. 8).
"Wherein I suffer trouble . . . . . even unto bonds" (ii. 9).
"At my first answer no man stood with me" (iv. 16).

PHILEMON IS A PRISON EPISTLE.

"Paul . . . . . a prisoner of Jesus Christ" (1).
"Now also a prisoner of Jesus Christ" (9).
"Onesimus, whom I have begotten in my bonds" (10).
"He might have ministered unto me in the bonds of the gospel" (13).
"There saluteth thee Epaphras, my fellow-prisoner in Christ Jesus" (23).

The epistle of Philemon is of a somewhat private nature. Philemon was host to the church at Colosse, and the epistle throws some light on the character of home life at that period. It is a lovely letter, full of christian grace, but for the purpose of this series, which is the seeking out of the special truth committed to Paul the Lord's prisoner, it will not be included in the present exposition. We shall find all that we require in the four remaining epistles, and indeed far more than we can cover in the space at our disposal.

These four epistles have been placed by different editors in every possible order. For ourselves we feel that there is insufficient evidence upon which to decide the sequence, but—and this is far more important to us—they have a most definite interrelation that it is of the utmost importance to observe; for a true realization of the scope of each epistle as a whole is essential to correct interpretation of the passages that make up its parts.

These four prison epistles present the truth for the present dispensation in its twofold form:--

(1) STANDING.—Accepted in the Beloved. Complete in Him. Ephesians and Colossians.
(2) STATE.—A prize and a crown in view. Philippians and II Timothy.

They are therefore not all devoted to doctrine and privilege, but, equally, to practice and walk. The correspondence observable between the two groups is of such importance that we included a summary of the parallels in structure form on page 92 of the June number, in order to make the survey as complete as possible.

Here, then, in these four epistles, is the medium used by God for the manifestation of the mystery. Their testimony is unique in that it is found nowhere else in Scripture. As the foregoing presentation shows, their testimony is complete. That testimony is inspired, for it was given by revelation, and contains truth that, apart from enlightenment, was inaccessible to the mind even of the most pious. In these epistles we shall find ten references to the word "mystery", six being found in Ephesians and four in Colossians. When Paul was released from prison at Rome, and before he wrote II Timothy, he used his freedom, not so much for further teaching, but in preparing those who should succeed him in the work of the ministry, and in endeavouring to bring about some order in the churches already established. The outcome of this ministry was the writing of the first epistle to Timothy and the epistle to Titus. There are some who believe that these epistles were written during the Acts period. The interested reader is referred to Volume XIV, page 79, and Volume XV, pages 14, 30 and 59, for notes on the point.

In the first epistle to Timothy, we have two more references to a "mystery", bringing the total number of references up to twelve. The following list gives the occurrences, together with an indication of the particular aspect of mystery in view in each reference.

The six references in Ephesians.

"The mystery of His will" (i. 9).
"The mystery" (iii. 3).
"The mystery of Christ" (iii. 4).
"The dispensation of the mystery" (iii. 9, R.V.)
"The great mystery" (v. 32).
"The mystery of the gospel" (vi. 19).

The six references in Colossians.

"The mystery" (i. 26).
"The mystery among the Gentiles" (i. 27).
"The mystery of God" (ii. 2).
"The mystery of Christ" (iv. 3).

The six references in I Timothy.

"The mystery of the faith" (iii. 9).
"The mystery of godliness" (iii. 16).

We must now give our attention to these references and their contexts so that we may learn how these mysteries, and their various aspects, have been manifested for our learning.

#3. The Mystery of His Will. The Manifestation.

pp. 133 - 135

The first mystery to be maintained in Ephesians is "the mystery of His will". We have seen in the opening article of this series that these words suggest some secret purpose hidden by God Himself because of the opposition of an enemy.

Most of our readers know that Eph. i. 3-14 may be regarded as the threefold charter of the Church of the One Body. It is divided into three parts by the phrases "to the praise of the glory of His grace" or "to the praise of His glory" (Eph. i. 6, 12, 14) as follows:

(1) THE WILL OF THE FATHER (Eph. i. 3-6).
(2) THE WORK OF THE SON (Eph. i. 7-12).
(3) THE WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT (Eph. i. 13, 14).

It will be seen that while the "will" of the Father is the theme of the opening section, it is "the secret purpose of His will" that we find in the second section, which is concerned with redemption. In the revelation of the purpose that is "according to the good pleasure of His will", we find no mention of sin or death (Eph. i. 3-6). In this first section we find "blessing", "choice", "predestination", and "acceptance", but no suggestion that in this choice and predestination sin would find a place. The blessings are all "spiritual"; the choice is "in Christ"; the predestination is that we should be "holy and without blame before Him"; the acceptance is "in the Beloved". The accomplishment of this purpose did not involve sin and death, which form no part of the "good pleasure of His will". The second section, however, brings before us "the mystery of His will", which is "according to His good pleasure which He hath purposed in Himself", and concludes with another reference to that predestination which is "according to the purpose of Him Who is energizing the all things (ta panta) according to the counsel of His Own will" (Eph. i. 11). In this second section sin is prominent, and redemption is revealed as the one and only way of escape from it.

What is the Lord's intention in discriminating here between "His will" and "the secret of His will"? This is so important that the reader must allow us to restate what has already been brought forward for the sake of new readers.

Nothing can be plainer in Scripture than that it was the will of God that Israel should be a kingdom of priests. Moreover, nothing can be plainer than that when Israel sinned they failed of their high destiny. Sin is transgression, disobedience, a missing of the mark. If, therefore, it had been God's will that Israel should fail, their failure would have been in obedience to His will, and could not have been called sin. Their actions under these conditions could not have been regarded as blameworthy or meriting punishment. When Israel "came short of the glory of God", the wisdom of God was made manifest by the fact that, although Israel had failed, God had not failed. In such a prophecy as that of Daniel, we get a glimpse of the "secret of His will", which provided against the contingency of Israel's fall.

All through the Acts of the Apostles, the Lord's attitude to Israel was that expressed in Rom. x. 21:

> "To Israel He saith, All day long have I stretched forth my hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people."

If God had definitely "willed" the non-repentance of Israel. His stretched-out hands would but have mocked their fated blindness, and their predestined refusal could not have been called by a God of truth, disobedience or gainsaying. Rom. ix. and x. do not leave us without light upon the reason for Israel's failure:--

> "Because they sought it (i.e. righteousness) not by faith, but as it were by the works of law. For they stumbled at that stumbling stone . . . . . for they, being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God . . . . . Have they not heard? Yes, verily . . . . . did not Israel know?"

It is quite impossible to read Rom. x. and still believe that Israel's failure arose from any decree on the part of God. It arose from their own ignorance and unbelief. The question of the sovereignty of God, the freedom of a moral agent, the place of contingency in a world where moral agents work, the meaning and bearing of "foreknowledge" with regard to "election" are all involved in this consideration of the "secret of His will". These deep and far-reaching themes require, however, very careful handling, and we cannot hope to include their consideration in the present series.

Returning to the case in point—Israel were not driven by any necessity to refuse the Saviour, or to spurn the Lord's stretched-out hands. By so doing they were not accomplishing His will. At the same time we must not leave out of our reckoning the fact of "the mystery, or secret purpose of His will", which came into operation when Israel passed into their present blind and "lo-ammi" condition. The present dispensation of the Mystery, made known to and through the apostle Paul as the prisoner of the Lord, had never been the subject of O.T. prophecy or of N.T. teaching up to the time of its revelation at the close of Acts xxviii.

We come back now to Eph. i. 3-14, and observe that no one was under any necessity to sin, by reason of any will or purpose of God. When man did sin, however, as in the case of Adam in the garden, God revealed to his wondering faith that He had provided a Redeemer. The redemption of the fallen heirs of glory, and the heading up of all things (ta panta, "the all things") in heaven and earth in Christ was the secret purpose of His will. He knew that no creature would be able to stand, He knew that the Serpent would assuredly attack and deceive, and so, instead of allowing irrevocable ruin to overtake His plans, He, the only wise God, chose not to reveal all His will at once. And so, taking the wise in his own craftiness, He carries His purpose on.

To sum up, we may say that the manifestation of the mystery of His will means redemption by the blood of Christ, in the days of His flesh, and the reconciliation of "the all things" under His headship in the glorious future.

#4. The Mystery, manifested through a special ministry.
pp. 176 - 178

The second reference to the mystery in Ephesians is found in Eph. iii. 3, "How that by revelation He made known unto me the mystery".

Before we go a step further, let us realize the fact that in this chapter Paul speaks of two related, yet distinct, mysteries. The one he calls "the mystery", the other "the mystery of Christ". The one given to him by revelation and was made known through him to all others who ever received it, but the mystery of Christ was not the exclusive knowledge of any one of God's servants. It had been known, in part, by the sons of men in earlier days, and was shared by Paul, in a superlative degree, with other apostles and prophets, but it was not to be confused with the mystery itself. Accordingly we keep these two subjects separate in this series, although, when we have concluded our examination of Eph. iii. 1-13, the final revelation of the mystery of Christ as known by Paul will be seen as essential to the revelation of the mystery proper.

If the mystery was a secret hidden by God, there are at least two things necessary before that secret can be known and believed. It must be "revealed", and it must be "manifested". These two aspects of the subject we find by comparing what the Apostle wrote in Eph. iii., with what he wrote in Col. i.

> "If ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to you-ward: How that by revelation He made known unto me the mystery" (Eph. iii. 2, 3).
> "Whereof I am made a minister, according to the dispensation of God which is given to me for you, to fulfil the word of God; even the mystery which hath been hid from ages and from generations, but now is made manifest to His saints" (Col. i. 25, 26).

"By revelation He made known to me"; "Now is made manifest to His saints". The mystery has been revealed to no one, but Paul, the chosen vessel. Through his subsequent ministry it has been manifested to the saints. In this series our subject is "The Mystery Manifested" and it is evident from what we have seen in Eph. iii. and Col. i. that "The mystery" was manifested through a special ministry, that of Paul. However, this statement left without comment would be misleading, for Paul's ministry commenced with his testimony at Damascus (Acts ix. 19, 20). Paul himself was never under any illusion regarding the character of his ministry, for, from the very commencement, it was made known to him that the Lord, Who had appeared unto him at the first, would appear unto him again, giving him a further commission. This Paul stated in Acts xxvi. 16. He did not know in Acts ix. that this subsequent ministry was to be intimately associated with "bonds and afflictions", although it was stated at the time that he was a chosen vessel not only to bear the name of the Lord, but also to suffer for His name's sake. Prison begins to be associated with this new ministry in Acts xx. 22, 23 and xxi. 10-14, and it is as the prisoner of Jesus Christ that Paul received and made known the mystery. This is stated in Eph. iii. and Col. i. The R.V. of Eph. iii. 1 reads, "The prisoner of Christ Jesus", where the A.V. reads "Jesus Christ". The change is suggestive, for with the exception of Acts iii. 20, where the R.V. reads, "The Christ . . . . . even Jesus", this title is exclusive to the ministry of Paul, the references in I Pet. v. 10 and 14 reading "Christ" in the R.V. The difference between the two titles is this,

> Jesus Christ.—In the Gospels it means, Jesus the Messiah. In the Epistles it means Jesus Who humbled Himself, but is now exalted and glorified as Christ.
> Christ Jesus.—This is the converse of Jesus Christ, and denotes the new exalted One, Who once humbled Himself (Comp. Bible, Appendix 98, xi., xii.).

The mystery is essentially connected with the exalted Christ. It is that phase of the mystery of Christ that is the distinctive note of Eph. i. 21-23. Paul was not only the prisoner of Christ Jesus, but for you Gentiles. We must remember both statements, for both are important. Up to the close of the Acts, Paul could say, "For the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain" (Acts xxviii. 20), whereas in Eph. vi. 20 he calls himself "an ambassador in a chain" (R.V. margin), and now, no longer for the hope of Israel, but for the grace of God to the Gentiles. The mystery, therefore, is manifested through the ministry of Paul, the prisoner of Christ Jesus.

This ministry was not a call to work that lasted but for a while and then was changed or laid aside. It was the Apostle's charge until he had finished his course and sealed his testimony with his blood. Consequently he follows up his statement concerning his prison ministry with, "If ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God, which is given me to you-ward" (Eph. iii. 2). As we have seen in other studies, the word "dispensation" refers not to a period of time, as does the word "age", but rather to a "stewardship"; some part of God's great purpose; some trust for which the Apostle was responsible. He calls it the dispensation of the grace of God, to you-ward, which is parallel with the opening words of Eph. iii.

The third statement which concludes the argument opened by the Apostle is, "how that by revelation He made known unto me the mystery". The mystery, therefore, has been manifested, through the Apostle Paul, as the prisoner of Christ Jesus, to whom the dispensation of the grace of God to the Gentiles had been given, and to whom the mystery was made known by revelation. The use of the word "revelation" in the Scriptures precludes all idea of attainment by search, by study, or by intuition. None could have discovered this secret. God alone could make it known. This is revelation in its simplest and truest meaning.

In verses 7, 8, and 9, the Apostle enlarges upon this ministry through which the mystery has been manifested, and there is in the passage a delightful blending of conscious unworthiness and confident assurance:

> "Whereof I was made a minister, according to the gift of the grace of God given unto me by the effectual working of His power. Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles, the unsearchable riches of Christ, and to enlighten all as to what is the dispensation (R.V.) of that secret which hath been hidden from the ages in that God Who created all things" (Eph. iii. 7-9).

The manifestation of the mystery is not confined to Gentiles, for the Apostle goes on to tell of a vast unseen company to whom, also, this marvelous secret is being unfolded:

> "To the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known by the church the manifold wisdom of God" (Eph. iii. 10).

The mystery has much to do both with "heavenly places" and with "principalities and powers" (Eph. i. 3, 20, 21), and it is therefore reasonable that these mighty beings, with whom the church of the One Body is blessed, and over whom Christ is Head (Col. i. 10), should have the mystery manifested to them, so that they too may take their place in the purpose of the ages intelligently and thankfully. Whereas the church learned the mystery through the ministry of Paul, the principalities and powers learn it through the church. The mystery, moreover, is called in this place, "the manifold wisdom of God", and "wisdom", or the title "the only wise God" is used in connection with the dispensational dealings of God with man. Here therefore we have another aspect of the subject under consideration.

The mystery has been manifested to the church through the ministry of Paul the prisoner of Christ Jesus, and by the church it has been made known to principalities and powers who, together with this church, own Jesus Christ as Head.

Occasional Meditations.

#6. Psalm li.
pp. 11, 12

The heading of this Psalm gives a true introduction to its "feeling": "A Psalm of David" (the name, David, means "the Beloved One") "when Nathan the prophet" (whose name means "a Gift") "came unto him". In type, we have here a beloved child of God, convicted of sin by the Given One, Christ, and the spirit and gift of repentance. His only plea is for mercy. Mercy speaks of pure grace and this alone is the sinner's plea (see Luke xviii. 13).

There is a wonderful suggestion of the twofold nature of sin in the words "blot out" and "wash me" in verses 1 and 2 of the Psalm. Sin is in God's book and needs blotting out: it is criminal. Sin is also in the sinner and needs cleansing: It is filth and corruption. In verse 3 the nature of true repentance is seen; sin looms large, and hysterical emotion finds little room. Verse 4 makes clear that sin, though against our neighbour, is nevertheless against God. It is, in His sight, therefore, abominable. Verse 5 shows that original guilt not only does not excuse but heightens the hopeless condition of a sinner, or a saint, in himself, for though outward sin be diminished yet the root is there, and is seen and felt by the spiritual eye. In verse 7 the word "purge" may be rendered "make a sin offering". The hyssop suggests the Passover and the broken bones of verse 8 speak plainly of David's realization of his own unfitness to be, or to make, the offering (see Exod. xii. 46, Psa. xxxiv. 19, 20). This explains the sixteenth verse of the Psalm. The Lord did desire sacrifice for He had commanded it, yet He did not desire it from man, but from Christ, as Heb. x. 1-10 shows. Verses 9-12 witness to the fact that although a saved sinner can never finally be lost, yet any practice of sin prevents access into the presence of God, deprives the offender of the enjoyment of fellowship, and leaves him in doubt of the future. Verse 13 agrees with the clear teaching of the N.T. that effective instruction cannot take place until one has oneself been put right with regard to sin. The Lord has not promised to use an unclean vessel, even though that vessel be made of gold or silver.

So far as the Old Covenant is concerned, David here prays an impossible prayer. There was no sacrifice for the sin of murder! Would then David seek to move God to excuse his sin? No, for he says that if the Lord delivers him he will sing of His righteousness, which necessitates the legal removal of the penalty. David had faith, as had all who were saved before Christ, to see beyond the offering of bulls and goats to the One Who was to come, the Lamb of God Himself. The saved sinner does not sing aloud of his own righteousness, for, as verse 15 shows, his mouth is shut, as in the case of the man in the parable, who had not on a wedding garment. Let us learn the result of this great deliverance; it is praise. The sacrifices of verse 17 are accepted because of the sacrifice of Christ. Verses 18 and 19 speak literally of Jerusalem and of literal sacrifices for they look on to the time of the millennial reign of Christ.

We have in this Psalm: (1) David's own confession; (2) The confession of the saved remnant of Israel when back in their land; when they look upon Him Whom they pierced, for they too have been guilty, like David, of murder and adultery; and (3) The confession of a believer, for Matt. v., vi. and vii. show that murder and adultery can be of the heart.

Let us, realizing our sins against the Lord, and the wondrous efficacy of the blood of Christ, seek forgiveness and cleansing that we may serve God acceptably.

To the unsaved we would say that in this Psalm, a murderer speaks, a murderer is forgiven, and a murderer praises. Whether or not your sins appear as awful as this sin, they are not too great for God to forgive. But they are enough, if unforgiven, to condemn you for ever.

#7. The Passover.---Exodus xii. 1-20 and 29-33.
pp. 95, 96

Divine inspiration has sealed the blessed promise that to every saved sinner Christ is the Passover Sacrifice, and the argument in I Cor. v. 8 is that those who are saved are to seek to be free from the leaven of sin and worldliness. Egypt is a picture of the world, and the Lord's people, though locally in it, are spiritually redeemed out of it, see Gal. i. 4. In Exod. xii. 2 we have an important but often forgotten truth, which is that redemption brings the redeemed into a new sphere—it is the beginning of months. Regeneration and resurrection life are vitally linked with redemption.

In verses 3-5 divine progress in personal appreciation is indicated; a lamb; the lamb; your lamb. The lamb is to be without blemish. Such is the constant claim of the Lord, and sinners are thereby cut from all hope in self.

The whole assembly . . . . . shall kill it (verse 6). Israel here are viewed as one company, the many houses being but miniatures of the nation. So also the many lambs are here looked at as the One Antitype.

It.—In actuality, but one Passover Lamb has God ever appointed and accepted, a Lamb without blemish or spot and of His Own providing, none other than the Lord Jesus Christ.

The original rendering of the last three words of verse 6, "between the two evenings", is suggestive. It not only means between the time called by the Hebrew reckoning between the first and second evenings, but also may mean between the evening of one day and before the evening of the next. This ambiguity is designed, for by its means Christ could partake of the Passover with His disciples one day, the next be offered as the true Passover Lamb, and yet be offered on the actual 14th Nisan, as here.

The blood outside meant safety within, and, sheltered by the blood, their food was provided by the self-same lamb whose blood protected from wrath.

Unleavened bread (a type of the absence of sin, and of the righteousness of Christ), was to be eaten with the Passover. Individually and collectively the people of God are to put away sin; they are to regard, or see, it not, else they dishonour the blood of atonement. In the first Lord's Supper, and every scriptural Lord's Supper since, there has been shown forth the unleavened life and death of Christ, by the partaking of the unleavened wine, and unleavened bread, and by the seeking to detect or judge sin as soon as it appeared.

Thus (verse 11).—That is as pilgrims who were about to quit Egypt and press on to the promised land.

The blood . . . . . to you . . . . . I see (verse 13).—What should we be? Where should we be, eternally, apart from the precious blood of Christ? The word "passover" signifies to halt, hover over (see I Kings xvii. 21; Isa. xxxi. 5; Deut. xxxii. 11). Where the Lord sees the blood He spreads His protecting wing. No house would have been safe had a "good resolution", a "good character", or even a piece of unleavened bread, been substituted for the blood.

Not a house (verse 30).—Take this to its furthest extreme, including the houses of Israel, and it would still be true, for although atonement saved the firstborn of Israel, yet atonement was by death, and, in Egypt, the difference that night was a lamb or a man.

The next thing is the leaving of Egypt. Unleavened bread and the Exodus from Egypt alike teach the needed lesson that salvation must lead to separation:

> "Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump? Purge out therefore the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump, according as ye are unleavened. For even Christ our Passover hath been sacrificed on behalf of us; therefore, let us keep the feast, not with the old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness; but in unleaven of sincerity and truth. I wrote unto you . . . . . not to mingle with fornicators . . . . . for ye owe it to come out of the world. But now I have written to you not to mingle, if any one being named a brother be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolator, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner, with such an one, neither to eat" (I Cor. v. 6-11).

Christian! the blood of the Passover Lamb teaches all this: if it does not fit with your experience there is need for repentance.

Unsaved reader! God keeps His Word. Pharaoh long rejected God, but His judgments are certain of fulfillment, and the penalty of sin must fall—either on you or on the Passover Lamb.

#8. The Ark of the Tabernacle (Exod. xxv. 10-22).
pp. 147, 148

Israel, delivered from Egypt by the blood of the Passover, separated by the waters of the Red Sea, and alone with God in the desert, are to be taught the nature of God's holiness, man's sin, and God's salvation. Already they have failed, the tables of stone having been broken. The ark therefore is made, wherein the law, unbroken, may be placed. The Lord does not come a second time to Israel with the law, for one sin places a man irrevocably outside the possibility of probation or the making of his own righteousness. Inasmuch as redemption from Egypt had to be by blood, so approach to God, and acceptance with Him had to be by blood also.

The first article of furniture to be made for the Tabernacle was the ark, which was formed of wood and gold—a picture of the humanity and deity of Christ. In it was placed the Tables of Stone (16), and it is noteworthy that when Christ came into the world He said "Thy law is within my heart" (Ps. xl. 8; Heb. x. 5-9). The law demanded perfect obedience, and if this claim was disregarded salvation could not be effected without setting aside the law of God which was perfect, holy, just and good. Hence the ark and the law within comes first.

Upon this ark, typical of the spotless life and perfect obedience of the Lord Jesus, upon this ark, with its unbroken tables of the law, is placed the mercy seat (17). This mercy seat was sprinkled with blood, and there God met with Moses and Aaron on behalf of His people. Herein is set forth the one great work of Christ in life and death, viz., the making of a mercy seat (or "propitiation", as the word is rendered in the New Testament) for the sins of His people,—where the penitent sinner could go and cry "God be merciful (i.e. be propitious) to me the sinner". But further wonders arise out of this. Not only are sinners saved, justified and blessed here, but already they are united to the risen Saviour, and will be finally glorified with Him. No marvel that John was led to cry "Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God".

Two cherubim were made (18, 19), made out of the mercy seat, as chapter xxxvii. 7, 8 more clearly shows.

As the cherubim looked toward the mercy seat, they looked to one another (20), and as Christians look to Him Who is dwelling above the blood sprinkled mercy seat, unity will be promoted. The divisions of to-day are but proofs that the person and work of Christ are disregarded.

"There I will meet thee, and I will commune with thee" (22). Fellowship with the Lord and with His people is found in the holiest of all, because of the blood of the atonement, and by virtue of the divine unity made by grace between the Saviour and His people. Oh that we may know this communion more. Numb. vii. 89 should be pondered and prayed over:

> "And When Moses was gone into the tabernacle of the congregation to speak with Him, then he heard the voice of One speaking unto him from off the mercy seat that was upon the ark of the testimony, from between the two cherubims: and He spake unto him."

Grace is such that those far off have been and still will be made nigh through that precious blood. The mercy seat, Christ Jesus, is God's only appointed way of salvation from sin, and approach to Him, for > "Without shedding of blood, there does not become a sending away of sin" Heb. ix. 22).

#17. "Civis Romanus sum."
Paul and Roman Citizenship.
pp. 33 - 35

The Jew regarded the world as made up of "the circumcision" and "the uncircumcision"—his own favoured nation, and the rest of the world as "Gentile dogs". The Greek, on the other hand, divided the world up into "Greeks" and 'Barbarians" (Rom. i. 14), while the Roman viewed it as being composed of Freemen and Slaves. A "Freeman" in the Roman sense might either be Civis (A Roman citizen), or Peregrinus (a foreigner, though free). A "Freeman" could either be born free or could become free.

In contrast with the position of the "Freeman" the slave was devoid of all rights of liberty, citizenship and position in a family. Nullum habet caput. Up to A.D.61, a slave could be ordered to fight in the arena with gladiators or wild beasts, and until the time of Claudius, his master could punish him with death at will. There was one well-known case of Vedius Pollio, in the reign of Augustus, who cast his slave into the ponds to feed his lampreys. The only penalty Pollio suffered was the loss of his fish ponds.

A slave who committed murder was punished with great severity, and we read that 400 slaves were executed to avenge the murder of Pedanius Secundus. Torture by whip or fetters was also inflicted for the slightest offences, and most of the large Roman houses contained an ergastulum, or private prison, where the slaves worked in chains.

A slave could become free by the process of "manumission". The actual form of this enactment has come down to us from Delphi and reads as follows:

> Date. Apollo, the Pythian bought from Sositus of Amphia, for freedom, a female slave, whose name is Nicaea, by race a Roman, with a price of three and a half minae of silver. Former seller according to law: Eumnastus of Amphissa. The price he hath received. The purchase, however, Nicaea hath committed unto Apollo, for freedom.

The reader will not fail to see the parallel here with the Apostle's words, "Bought with a price", and the literal rendering of Gal. v. 1: "For freedom did Christ set us free."

In numerous records of manumission the enfranchised person is said to be allowed henceforth to "do the things that he will"—an obvious parallel with Gal. v. 17. Moreover, many manumission orders contain the clause that the freed person shall never "be made a slave again"—a phrase which finds an echo in such passages as Gal. v. 1 and I Cor. vii. 23.

The "Freeman" (liber) might be born free (ingenuus), or he might be made free (libertinus). In the first case (ingenuus) he could either be a citizen (civis) or a latinus—i.e. one occupying a position intermediate between that of the true-born Roman (civis) and the peregrinus (or foreigner).

The privileges of the full citizen were as follows:

POLITICAL RIGHTS.

(1) The right of voting in the comitia (Jus Suffragii).
(2) Eligibility for all public offices and magistrates (Jus Honorum).
(3) The Jus Provocationis, or right of appeal.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

(i.) Conubium, the power to contract a legal marriage, with power of life and death over the family.
(ii.) Commercium, the right to acquire, hold or transfer property, and to make contracts.

The Apostle himself was a full Roman citizen (ingenuus, or "free born"), for his father had been a citizen before him. We do not know how Paul's father had acquired this coveted privilege, but it was so ordered, in the wisdom of God, in order that His messenger to the Roman world should be fully equipped. He was a Tarsian, "a citizen of no mean city"; he was also a Roman, a Jew, and a Pharisee.

"How often", says Cicero, "has this exclamation Civis Romanus sum ("I am a Roman citizen") brought aid and safety even among barbarians in the remotest parts of the earth" (Cic. Verr. v. 57). The reader will remember how scared the Philippians were when they discovered that Paul and Silas were Roman citizens (Acts xvi. 37-39). They had probably heard of the punishment in A.D.44 of the inhabitants of Rhodes, whom Claudius had deprived of their freedom for putting a Roman citizen to death.

We shall hope to deal later with the Roman's right of appeal to Cæsar when we resume the subject of the Apostle's trial. Meanwhile let us rejoice in our own heavenly "citizenship", beside which the highest Roman privileges fade into insignificance.

#18. Paul before Felix.
pp. 67 - 71

The letter that accompanied Paul when he went to Felix was as follows:

> "Claudius Lysias, unto the most excellent governor Felix, greeting. This man was seized of the Jews, and was about to be slain, when I came upon them with the soldiers and rescued him, having learned that he was a Roman. And, desiring to know the cause wherefore they accused him, I brought him down unto their council; whom I found to be accused about questions of their law, but to have nothing laid to his charge worthy of death or bonds. And when it was shown to me that there would be a plot against this man, I sent him forth to thee, forthwith, charging his accusers also to speak against him before thee" (Acts xxiii. 26-30).

In view of the fact that Lysias Claudius had purchased his freedom "with a great sum" (Acts xxii. 28), his double name suggests that he was originally a Greek (Lysias) and that he had been set free by one of the house of Claudius, whose name he had assumed when he entered upon his Roman citizenship. The letter would naturally be written in Latin. Luke gives the Greek translation of it and tells us that it was "after this type" (Acts xxiii. 25). A letter of this kind, accompanying the accused, was known as the elogium, and it was customary to give it careful attention at the beginning of the case.

It was incumbent upon a Roman judge to try a prisoner, who had been sent with an elogium, if possible, within three days. In this case, however, Felix had to sent to Jerusalem and demand the presence of Paul's accusers, and this delayed his trial till the fifth day. Being a Roman citizen, Paul received a fuller hearing and greater consideration than did his Lord when He stood before Pilate.

Felix follows the normal order of procedure and, having received the elogium, enters upon the interrogatio, which resolves itself into settling the question of the province to which Paul belonged. When Felix understand that Paul is from Cilicia, he says:

> "I will hear thee, when thine accusers are also come. And he commanded him to be kept in Herod's judgment hall" (Acts xxiii. 34, 35).

From the descriptions we have of trial carried out in Rome, we can reconstruct with a fair measure of probable accuracy the general arrangement of the court. Felix himself would be seated proudly on his sella curulis—a chair, usually inlaid with ivory, and shaped rather like a camp-stool with curved legs, and would be surrounded by the clerks and lectors—the latter being officers who attended upon the Roman magistrate, and carried before him the bundle of rods and the axe that symbolized his authority. Before Felix would stand Paul the accused, and the high Priest Annas and other members of the Sanhedrin.

Pleading before a Roman like Felix was no light task, and as the Jews ardently desired to make sure of their victim, they hired the services of an orator named Tertullus. Paul, however, elected to defend himself.

Tertullus was evidently a practiced speaker, and "Luke has faithfully preserved an outline of his voluble plausibility" (Farrar). He opens his speech with a flattering allusion to Felix's administration. If we had had nothing but the language of Tertullus to guide us, we should have imagined that Felix was held in the highest admiration by the Jews. In verses 2 and 3 we read:

> "Seeing that by thee we enjoy great quietness, and that very worthy deeds are done unto this nation by thy providence, we accept it always, and in all places, most noble Felix, with all thankfulness" (Acts xxiv. 2, 3).

As a matter of fact, however, we know that Felix was particularly detested by the Jews. It is true that he had put down one form of brigandage, but he had actually encouraged and profited by another.

Luke tells us in verse 1 that Tertullus "informed against Paul", and this, of course, was the work that he was employed to do. The opening of the case was known as the nominis or criminis delatio, the information formally laid before the quaesitor. It would have been contrary to human nature if Felix, the man who had been born a slave, had not felt highly pleased at being reminded of his "providence", a word used of emperors and frequently inscribed on their coins.

Tertullus now proceeds to the indictment, or accusatio, which he subdivides into three parts:

(1) Paul was a public pest, and lived by exciting factions among the Jews all over the world. He was, in short, a public enemy.
(2) He was a ringleader of a sect called the "Nazarenes".
(3) He had attempted to profane the Temple.

According to Tertullus, therefore, the Apostle was guilty of three offences—treason, heresy, and sacrilege. Treason was a most deadly offence against Roman law; heresy was an offence against the Jewish law; and sacrilege was an offence against both.

Tertullus speaks of Paul as "a pestilent fellow". The original here is loinios, a "plague". Certain it is that, wherever Paul went, "his appearance seemed the signal for dissension, from the day when he escaped over the wall at Damascus, to the day of his apprehension in the Temple. He had been driven out of Antioch, stoned at Lystra, imprisoned at Philippi, accused of treason at Thessalonica, expelled from the synagogue at Corinth, haled before the proconsul Gallio. The cause of a serious riot at Ephesus; and the moment he arrived at Jerusalem, the disturbances had broken out afresh" (Septimus Buss). Tertullus was evidently instructed to avoid the name "Christian" for this would have been too much like agreeing that "Jesus" was the "Christ". He therefore speaks of "the sect of the Nazarenes".

Judaism was a religio licita, recognized by the state, and Tertullus suggests that Lysias had been responsible for a violent and unwarrantable interference with the course of justice. Had he not "with great violence taken Paul out of their hands", there would have been no need to trouble the noble Felix with the matter at all.

At the close of the speech for the prosecution, we read that the "Jews also assented, saying these things were so" (Acts xxiv. 9). Felix then "beckons" to Paul to speak for himself. The word used suggests that Felix was already impatient, being convinced, as Lysias had informed him, that this was some Jewish squabble about Mosaic minutiae.

Tertullus had complimented Felix to the verge of falsehood. Paul, in beginning his defence, adheres to the truth:

> "Forasmuch as I know that thou hast been of many years a judge unto this nation, I do the more cheerfully answer for myself."

Felix had been governor for six years, and was fully acquainted with the people and their habits.

Answer to the first charge.—There had been no time for stirring up sedition or tumult at Jerusalem, as, even then at the time of the trial, it was only twelve days since he had come for the Feast of Pentecost, and during that brief period he had neither disputed in the Temple nor stirred up the crowd. The twelve days were occupied as follows:

1. Arrival in Jerusalem (Acts xxi. 17).
2. Interview with James "the day following".
3. Commencement of the Nazarite vow "the next day".
4, 5, 6. The observance of the vow.
7. Apprehension in the Temple when the four men had completed their vow (Acts xxi. 27).
8. The hearing before the Sanhedrin "on the morrow" (Acts xxii. 30).
9. Departure from Jerusalem on the next day.
10. Arrival at Caesarea.
12. "After five days" (Acts xxiv. 1). Paul is accused before Felix. He had had only twelve clear days in which anything could have been done, and of these he could give a complete account.

Answer to the second charge.—Paul was not a heretic. He still worshipped the God of his fathers, although in a different way from that which would be acceptable to Israel. He also entertained, in common with Israel, the hope of resurrection. In rebutting the charge of heresy by saying that he still "worshiped the God of his fathers", the Apostle makes a most successful appeal to Roman law, for this allowed full freedom of worship in the provinces.

Answer to the third charge.—Paul's presence in the Temple was for worship, not for profanation. His accusers had found him in the Temple, a quiet and legally purified worshipper. King Agrippa, as Felix would know, had himself been purified by similar rites.

Speaking of the "Jews from Asia" (verse 18), Paul objects that they "ought to have been here before thee". The Apostle was certainly within his rights in demanding the presence of witnesses.

It becomes clear as the account proceeds that Felix is convinced of Paul's innocence, and the case therefore breaks down. The differences that existed between Paul and his Jewish accusers were of no importance in the eyes of the Roman law, as the doctrine of the Nazarenes had not yet been proscribed as a religio illicita. Felix had a "more accurate knowledge of that way" (Acts xxiv. 22) than either the Jews or Tertullus had supposed, and the trial is postponed on the ground that Lysias, a most important witness, was not present.

Felix's wife at this time was a Jewess, Drusilla, and it is possible also that he may have known Cornelius, a centurion of the Italian cohort. All this, no doubt, helped to mitigate the severity of the Apostle's remand.

Felix would have laid himself open to severe punishment if he had taken a bribe—the lex Julia de repetundis (B.C.59) forbade any magistrate to receive money or articles of value, the penalty being deportation or exile—but these penalties were often evaded, and we read the Felix kept Paul bound for two years, hoping that "money should have been given him". At the end of this period Felix is replaced by Porcius Festus, and, "willing to show the Jews a pleasure", he leaves Paul still a prisoner.

Here for the moment we must stop. The concluding part of the trial we shall hope to deal with in our next article.

#19. Paul before Festus and Agrippa.
The appeal to Cæsar.
pp. 100 - 102

The two years during which Paul had remained in bonds at Cæsarea did not see any abatement in the Jews' feelings of hatred towards him. Upon the arrival of Festus, the new governor, the Jews, knowing that a new governor was likely to do things that would put him in the good graces of the people, informed him that Paul was till unpunished, and suggested that he should be sent to Jerusalem—"laying wait in the way to kill him" (Acts xxv.3). Festus, however, apparently saw through their scheme and said:

> "Let them which among you are able, go down with me and accuse this man, if there by any wickedness in him" (Acts xxv. 5).

The High Priest had asked as a "favour" the handing over of Paul to the Jews. The governor answered that they would get Roman justice instead, and so Paul's life was saved.

When Festus returned to Cæsarea Paul's trial was re-opened. This time no Tertullus was hired, no attempt was made at a formal charge, and there was no bringing of witnesses. The Jews "which came down from Jerusalem stood round about and laid many and grievous complaints against Paul which they could not prove". Paul, answering for himself, refutes once more the charges made against him, retaining in his answer the threefold form of the original accusation:

> "Neither against the law of the Jews, neither against the Temple, nor yet against Cæsar, have I offended anything at all" (Acts xxv. 8).

Festus, desiring to find some way out of the difficulty, suggests to Paul that, as it appears to be a matter of Jewish law, perhaps he would be willing to go back to Jerusalem and be tried by the Sanhedrin, in which case he (Festus) would see to it that he had fair treatment. Paul had now experienced two years' imprisonment. All his burning zeal for the spread of the gospel had been pent up within the narrow space allotted to him at Cæsarea. Moreover, the Lord had appeared to him again, and had revealed to him the new message associated with his bondage. As a Roman citizen he had one special privilege, that he had not so far used. He had only to pronounce the word Appello, "I appeal", and his trial under provincial governors would come to an end. Replying, therefore, to the suggestion that he should stand before the Sanhedrin, Paul startled the whole court by saying:

> "I stand at Cæsar's judgment-seat where I ought to be judged . . . . . I appealed unto Cæsar" (Acts xxiv. 10, 11).

Festus was not at all pleased with this change of affairs. To have an appeal from his judgment within a few days of his entering the country would not look well, and his reply suggests his annoyance: "Hast thou appealed unto Cæsar? Unto Cæsar thou shalt go" (verse 12). The words suggest that Festus added mentally, "And you little know what an appeal to Cæsar just now will mean".

Paul, however, had not acted on the spur of the moment. For two years he had waited and prayed, and he now knew that the time for his journey to Rome had come. As the Apostle's appeal to Cæsar occupies an important place in the history of the Acts, a few notes on the subject should be helpful.

In republican days the right of appeal had been to the Populus or Comitia. This was secured by the Valerian law (B.C.508), which conferred upon every citizen the right to appeal to the Comitia Centuriata from a sentence of death or scourging by a Magistrate. This privilege has been compared with the Habeas Corpus Act of our own country. Another form of appeal was the Appellatio ad Tribunos. The Tribunes were appointed in B.C.494 to protect the plebeians against the possible abuse of his authority by a Consul. In order to afford this protection the doors of the Tribune stood open day and night.

Under the Empire regime the Emperor himself became Tribune for life. In this capacity he could veto the ruling of any Magistrate, and, as the representative of the people, could hear their appeals. In the Apostle's case he did not, of course, make an appeal against the judgment of the court, for no sentence had been passed; he merely demanded that his case should be transferred from the provincial court to that of Rome itself. He had already been tried four times, and detained for two years, so that no one could deny the rightness of his plea.

About this time Agrippa II and his sister Berenice came to Cæsarea to pay their respects to the new Procurator. Agrippa's royal title depended solely upon the will of the Emperor, and it was therefore good policy to pay respects to his new representative. Agrippa II was not only King, but was also the guardian of the sacred robes of the High Priest, and had the right to nominate the successor to the High Priesthood. Festus seized upon Agrippa's presence as a means of getting a little more information about Paul, for, he said:

> "It seemeth to me unreasonable to send a prisoner, and not withal to signify the crimes against him" (Acts xxv. 27).

And Agrippa, as we learn from Acts xxvi. 3, was "an expert". Festus makes it clear that, so far as he can understand, Paul had committed no offence against Roman law:

> "Against whom, when the accusers stood up, they brought none accusations of such things as I supposed; but had certain questions against him of their own superstition, and of one Jesus, Which was dead, Whom Paul affirmed to be alive" (Acts xxv. 18, 19).

Agrippa agrees to hear the man for himself, and the hearing is arranged for the following day. This was not, of course, a new trial. Agrippa had no judicial authority, and the authority of Festus had become inoperative on account of Paul's appeal. The hearing was arranged partly to humour the royal visitors, and partly to discover something tangible in the way of evidence.

Commenting on the "great pomp" of Agrippa's entry into the court, Farrar writes:

> "He would doubtless appear in his scarlet paludamentum, with his full attendance of lectors and body guard, who would stand at arms behind the gilded chairs which had been placed for himself and his distinguished visitors. We are expressly told that Agrippa and Berenice went in state to the Prætorium, she, doubtless, blazing with all her jewels, and he in his purple robes and both with the golden circlets around their foreheads . . . . . Did Agrippa think of his great grandfather Herod, and the massacre of the innocents? of his great uncle Antipas, and the murder of John the Baptist? of his father Agrippa I, and the execution of James the Elder? . . . . . Did he realize how closely, but unwittingly, the faith in that "one, Jesus", had been linked with the destinies of his house? . . . . . as he glanced with cold curiosity on the poor, worn, shackled prisoner—pale with sickness and long imprisonment—who was led in at his command."

We pass over the narrative of Acts xxvi., as this belongs to the exposition of the Acts rather than to the present series, which is concerned with Roman laws and customs. Paul was under no obligation to speak before Agrippa, but he gladly seized the opportunity of witnessing for his Lord. As a result of the hearing it was decided that Paul had done nothing worthy of death or bonds, and might have been set at liberty had he not appealed unto Cæsar. Festus could now write up his relatio, and we can well believe that the letter sent by the hand of Julian made an acquittal practically certain, for even Nero at that time would hardly have condemned a Roman citizen whom Felix and Lysias, Festus and Agrippa all deemed innocent of any capital crime.

#20. The Voyage from Caesarea to Rome (Acts xxvii., xxviii.).
pp. 135 - 139

We must soon consider the Apostle's trial before Nero, but before we come to this we must say something about the intervening journey from Jerusalem to Rome. The student is strongly advised to have a map open for reference, so that the various incidents in the voyage may be more fully appreciated.

> "And when it was determined that we should sail into Italy, they delivered Paul and certain other prisoners unto one named Julius, a centurion of Augustus' band. And entering a ship of Adramyttium, we launched, meaning to sail by the coasts of Asia, one Aristarchus a Macedonian of Thessalonica being with us" (Acts xxvii. 1, 2).

It seems a natural reading of this passage to suppose that Aristarchus purposed accompanying Paul as far as his native city, where Paul would be taken on to Dyrrhachium. As will be seen from the map, Dyrrhachium in Illyricum is divided from Brundusium in Italy by the Adriatic very much as Calais is divided from Dover by the English Channel. This was the route traversed by Ignatius, who refers to his Roman guards as his "ten leopards", and says of the journey that "he fought with wild beasts all the way".

We read in verse 3 that at Sidon Julius gave leave to Paul "to go unto his friends and refresh himself". This indicates that Julius was a kindly man, and wherever he is mentioned throughout the story, Luke associates him with some pleasant incident. There were many things to make the journey unpleasant in the extreme. The fact that the Roman soldiers were responsible with their own lives for the security of their prisoners led to the painful custom of never leaving them unchained to one or other of the guards. The close confinement of the ship and the enforced company of the soldiers would all add to the other unpleasantness of the journey. The words used in Acts xxvii. 3 imply that Julius allowed Paul to visit his friends in Sidon "to be cared for". His two years' detention may have weakened his health, and the permit would enable him to obtain certain necessary comforts for the voyage.

Two writers who have given exhaustive study to this voyage are James Smith, who published his "Voyage and Shipwreck" in 1848, and Admiral Sir Charles Penrose, whose manuscripts was used by Conybeare and Howson. The standard work on the ships of the ancients is that by James Smith. We learn from this that the Greeks and the Romans were ignorant of the use of the compass. They used instead instruments that resembled the modern quadrant and sextant, but were unassisted by nautical charts. Thus when "neither sun nor stars appeared" and danger threatened, the sailors would hesitate to put to sea.

With regard to the structure of the ships, James Smith writes:

> "As both ends were alike, if we suppose a full-built merchant ship of the present day cut in two, and the stern half replaced by one exactly the same as that of the bow, we shall have a pretty accurate notion of what these ships were."

The steering was accomplished by two paddle rudders, one on each quarter. Hence Acts xxvii. 40 puts the word in the plural, a piece of accuracy lost in the A.V. but restored in the R.V. The rudders were connected by a pole, and worked together in one operation. The sails were arranged with extreme simplicity, an arrangement very different from the wonderful combination achieved in the East Indiaman or modern frigate. Ships in the Apostle's time had one large centre mast, and one large sail fastened to an enormous yard. Topsails and a second mast were only used as accessories. With all the stress concentrated upon one part of the ship, there was naturally a strong tendency for it to spring a leak, and we have the testimony of ancient writers to the vast proportion of losses at sea that resulted from this weakness. To counteract the great strain imposed upon the timbers by the one central mast, the ship carried with it hupozomata or "undergirders". These were ropes which were passed right round the hull to prevent the planks from starting. Excavations made at the Piraeus supply a remarkable confirmation of the truth of the Acts in this particular, as a complete account is given of everything with which the Athenian ships were supplied. Ships that sailed the Adriatic carried several "undergirdings".

The ship with which we are concerned in Acts xxvii. had 276 souls aboard (Acts xxvii. 37), and the Castor and Pollux conveyed them, in addition to her own crew, from Malta to Puteoli (Acts xxviii. 11). Josephus tells us that, on board the ship that was wrecked as he was journeying to Rome, there were 600. Such information as this has led competent authorities to estimate the displacement of many ancient merchant ships as 500 tons or more.

The statement in Acts xxvii. 15 that the ship "could not look at the wind" suggests that these vessels could not sail so near the wind as a modern sailing ship. Pliny, however, says it was possible to sail on contrary tacks, ventis in contrarium navigatur.

That ships could show a fair rate of sail is evident from Cato's address to the Senate urging the third Punic war. "This fruit", he said, showing that a fresh fig, "was gathered fresh at Carthage three days ago". From information supplied by Diodorus, Strabo, Ptolemy and other ancient writers, we can safely conclude that, with a fair wind, a sailing vessel such as that which carried the Apostle could easily do seven knots an hour. This is in complete harmony with the record of Acts xxvii. and xxviii.

Paul's intention to visit Spain after his visit to Rome was quite practicable, for wool was constantly being brought from Cadiz to the harbour of Ostia. Egypt, with its port Alexandria, was a medium of transport for the luxuries of the East which poured into Rome, as well as its own manufactures of linen, paper and glass. Above all, Egypt was the granary of the Roman world, and it is therefore not surprising that there were many "ships of Alexandria" sailing to Italy. There were no "passenger ship" in those days.

Even Roman Emperors had to travel as Paul did. We read in Josephus that Vespasian, when he left Titus at the siege of Jerusalem, "went on board a merchant ship and sailed from Alexandria to Rhodes" (Josephus B. J. vii. ii. 1), and when the Jewish war ended, Titus followed his father, and touched at the same points (Rhegium and Puteoli) as are mentioned in Acts xxviii. 13.

Let us next notice a few outstanding features in this memorable journey.

There are no less than thirteen different expressions for "sailing" in the narrative, a fact that lends great reality to the record. In Acts xxvii. 4 we read that they "sailed under Cyprus". This would mean sailing "under the lee" of the island, i.e., the North-east and North. We also read that they "sailed through the sea which is over against Cilicia and Pamphylia". By standing to the North the vessel would fall in with the current that travels West along the coast of Asia Minor.

At Lysia they found a wheat ship which had also been driven North and was about to sail for Italy. The weather was unfavourable from the first. Although Cnidus is only 130 miles distant from Lysia, they were "many days" sailing "slowly" (verse 7). Since the wind did not allow the vessel either to pass North of Crete, or to continue a direct course, they made for Cape Salmone, in order to sail under the lee of the island. The wind becoming more violent there was nothing for it but to put in at Fair Havens and await a change. Luke tells us that "the fast was now already past" (verse 9), which means that it would have been about the end of September, a period regarded as dangerous for ships by both Greek and Roman writers. The Jewish season for navigation was now over, but the Gentiles did not regard the sea as closed until November 11th. Paul ventured to give his advice, but the centurion naturally preferred to take the opinion of the master of the ship.

A soft wind then sprang up from the South and, gladly weighing anchor, the vessel was steered for Phenice. The expression "if by any means" (verse 12) and the fact that Phenice was not in fact attained provides an interesting Scriptural comment on Phil. iii. 11. This passage makes good sense if we keep the "prize" in view, but is disastrous if we think of the "out-resurrection" as the blessed "hope". This soft wind was, however, but the song of a siren, for suddenly a typhoon seized the vessel, whirling her round (see Greek word), and making it impossible for the helmsmen to keep the course (verse 15). Not a moment was available for the lowering of the mainsail, and nothing could be done but let the ship scud madly before the gale. After a fearful run of twenty-three miles, they neared the island of Clauda, and taking advantage of the temporary lull, they with some difficulty hoisted the boat aboard. The next precaution was to "undergird" the ship, for the strain on the timbers in such a gale would have been tremendous, and a leak had already developed. Furthermore, the wind was driving them straight to the dreaded bay of the Great Syrtis, "the Goodwin Sands of the Mediterranean".

The expression "strake sail and so were driven" (verse 17) indicates that the vessel lay to, the great yard being lowered, the storm-sail (called the artemo) set, and the vessel allowed to drift broadside-on to leeward, at the mercy of wind and wave. The crew were evidently in considerable fear of the ship foundering, for on the third day the great manyard was heaved overboard. Then came gloom, terror and despair:--

> "And when neither sun nor stars in many days appeared, and no small tempest lay on us, all hope that we should be saved was then taken away" (verse 20).

Paul had evidently refrained from blaming the Master or the Centurion for not taking his advice originally, but in verse 21, "after long abstinence", he gives his advice once more.

After fourteen days drifting on the Adria, the sound of breakers told the listening crew that land was near. The lead was then dropped and gave a reading of twenty fathoms. Again the lead was dropped, giving this time fifteen fathoms. Here, then, was the end. They were drifting on to a coast of some sort and must inevitable be wrecked. To drop the anchor from the bows might have swung the ship against a reef. Four anchors were therefore dropped "out of the stern", through the hawse holes in which the great paddle-rudders moved, and then all "yearned for the day". The fact that the anchors held all night, a result that none of the crew could have been sure of, is supported by evidence contained in the book, "English Sailing Directions", which says that the ground in St. Paul's Bay is so good that "while the cables hold, there is no danger, as the anchors will never start".

From this point to the arrival of the Apostle at Rome, nothing more of great interest is added by the narrative. After three months, another wheat ship took the crew and prisoners on board and eventually landed them to Puteoli.

We are now ready to follow the Apostle along the Appian Way and to consider further points of importance in connection with his imprisonment, his trials and his martyrdom.

#21. Paul's Trial before Nero.

pp. 193 - 197

In this article we take up our story with the arrival of the "Castor and Pollux" at Puteoli. We may safely infer from the writings of Seneca that a large crowd would be assembled at the quay to welcome the arrival of the grain ship. Seneca tells us that, upon entering the bay, all vessels were obliged to strike their topsail (supparum), except the Alexandrian corn ships, which consequently were easily recognized and welcomed accordingly.

The trade with Alexandria would naturally lead to a settlement of Jews at Puteoli, and in these early days, where the Jews were, we should expect to find a few Christians. For some time the believers in Rome had expected a visit from the Apostle, but they would have had no news of his voyage and shipwreck. They would therefore have met the corn-ship only on the chance that Paul might be one of the passengers. Julius was able to allow the Apostle a respite of seven days which he spent with the Christians at Puteoli. They evidently took the opportunity of sending a messenger to the Christians of Rome, who responded by sending representatives to meet the Apostle at the Appii-Forum and the Three Taverns. The Appian way, along which the Apostle was conducted, was the oldest of the Roman roads, and called, in comparison with all others, "The Queen of Roads". Eight hundred years after its construction Procopius described it in terms of astonishment. He speaks of the stones that formed it as "so fitted to each other, that they seem to be thus formed by nature, rather than cemented by art".

A few miles beyond Terracina (a map is still desirable in following the route, Puteoli, Capua, Terracina) the traveler had the choice of traveling along the canal made by Augustus for draining the marshes, or along the road itself. Not knowing which of the routes the centurion would take, the representatives from Rome came out as far as the Appii-Forum, and there waited. Horace, in his Satire, has described the place as full of low tavern-keepers, bargees and hucksters. Here these few Christians from Rome welcomed the Apostle, in spite of his chains. Ten miles further on, at Tres Tabernae, a place mentioned by Cicero, a second group of believers welcomed him, "whom when Paul saw, he thanked God, and took courage" (Acts xxviii. 15). Not many miles further on, Paul would have caught the first view of Rome, a city that he had often planned to visit but never saw until he looked upon it as a prisoner handcuffed to a soldier.

Passing under the Porta Capena, which was perpetually dripping, because of the aqueduct that passed over it, and through which victor and vanquished, prince and beggar, Greek, Roman, Jew and Christian must pass, Paul was conducted to the barracks of the Prætorian cohorts, and handed over to Burrhus, the Prætorian Prefect, one of the best men that ruled under Nero. We learn from Josephus that when Agrippa was cast into prison under the suspicion of Tiberius, that it was from this Prefect that his friends obtained the privilege that the soldier who guarded him should be a humane person and not a brute. It is therefore probable that the words, "but Paul was suffered to dwell by himself with a soldier that kept him" (Acts xxviii. 16), indicate a similar extension of human kindness on the part of the bluff but good-natured soldier, Burrhus, who perceived that Paul was no criminal but the victim of Jewish spite. These circumstances and the good report of Julius, acting on a man of the character of Burrhus, obtained for Paul that kind of military custody known as observatio. Different opinions have been expressed as to the "lodging", xenia (verse 23) or "his own hired house", idion misthoma (verse 30), but it seems a natural inference to draw from the two expressions used that, upon his arrival, the Apostle was glad to avail himself of the hospitality of his Christian friends, whereas when it became evident that his trial was to await the caprice of Nero, and might lengthen out the period of waiting for months, or even, as it turned out, for two years, the Apostle, using the financial help sent to him by the church at Philippi (Phil. iv.), hired an apartment in which he was able to receive visitors and where he dictated, with a Roman soldier ever beside him, the blessed epistles Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians and Philemon. We can but hope that through these circumstances many a rough soldier passed from death unto life and became a member of the body of Christ. For more reasons than one it was most important that Paul should consult with the leaders of the Jews. This he was able to do after three days. The dispensational importance of Acts xxviii. is worthy of all the space we can spare, and is dealt with in the series on the "Acts of the Apostles". But our concern at the moment is the Roman element in the trial, and to this we now address ourselves.

The Roman courts required the personal presence of the prosecutor. The crown was not the prosecutor, as in English law. We learn from Josephus that at about this same time two embassies set out from Jerusalem for Rome; one, to impeach Felix for his conduct while Governor (we remember how, upon his recall, he sought to placate the Jews by leaving Paul bound, Acts xxiv. 27), the other, to intercede with Nero on the subject of Agrippa's palace, which overlooked the temple. As the High Priest himself was included in this latter embassy, he may also have been entrusted with the prosecution of Paul.

"The law's delays" are no modern evil. Josephus tells us of three Jews who had languished in prison for three years without a hearing, and who were finally released upon his appeal to Poppæa. It was Nero's custom to consider separately each charge against a prisoner (Suet. Nero, 15), and in the case of Paul we have seen that there were three counts against him. A further source of delay was that proceedings would be adjourned from time to time to suit the Emperor's convenience. Eusebius, in his "Ecclesiastical History", is the only authority that we have for the opinion that Paul was tried on the occasion of this first imprisonment, for the Acts does not record the trial. Eusebius says:

> "After defending himself successfully, it is currently reported that the apostle again went forth to preach the gospel, and afterwards came to Rome a second time."

The Apostle's statement in Phil. i. 12-14, 25; and ii. 23, 24 suggests that a trial is nearing its end, and that the result is a foregone certainty. Tiberius and Claudius followed the ancient custom of hearing causes in the Forum, but Nero sat for this purpose in his palace. Standing before the tribunal, the Apostle's bonds would become manifest in the whole Prætorium (Phil. i. 13). The preliminaries of the trial had already taken place under Felix and Festus, the prisoner being therefore already in a state of accusation. The termination of the proceedings was announced by a crier proclaiming "Dixerunt" (they have spoken). The jury then voted by depositing in an urn wax tablets bearing the letter A, for Absolvo, C, Condemno, or N.L., Non liquet, A new trial.

The question of the interval between the first imprisonment and the second arrest has already been considered in some detail on pages 159-164, which the reader should consult.

At his second arrest Paul did not receive the humane treatment that characterized the first. He now suffered as an "evil doer". His place of detention is no longer the house of a friend or his own hired house, but a dungeon, so damp and cold that he asks Timothy to bring with him when he comes his cloke that had been left behind at Troas.

The trial fell into two parts, for he speaks of his "first defence" (II Tim. iv. 16). Evidently he had been remanded: the presiding judge having pronounced the word Amplius, an adjournment had taken place, and the Apostle seized the opportunity to write his last letter to his beloved son Timothy. Hatred of the Christians now ruled men's minds, and a charge of treason, from which there would be no hope of acquittal, would be laid against the Apostle.

Somewhere outside the city walls, along the Via Ostiensis, where now stands the church of San Paolo fouri le mura, the Apostle was led forth from his dungeon to execution. In the days of the Republic this would have been effected by the lictor's axe, but under Nero, it was accomplished by the sword. It is not for us to follow the traditions of men as to what became of Paul's body after his death. He had finished his course, he had kept the faith, he was assured that there awaited him "at that day" a crown. We can rejoice that what seemed most like defeat, was victory. He was "more than conqueror" through Christ Who loved him.

While there are other features that are of interest, we feel that enough has been said for the object in view, and that we have proved the value of knowing something of contemporary history as we study the Acts and Epistles. With the good fight ending with Paul's martyrdom we therefore bring this series of studies to a close.

Where actual quotations have been made, the author's name is given, but in a subject of this character which can be prepared only by consulting authorities, indebtedness to the writings of others for much of the information cannot be formally acknowledged. A list of the works chiefly consulted in the acquisition of most of the historic material used is, however, appended, and the interested reader who is inclined to pursue the subject further will find that this will afford good ground from which to make deeper research than can be attempted here, where we are but writing a series of brief articles.

#85. Romans xv. 8 - xvi. 23.
Salutation, Warning and Benediction (xvi. 1 - 24).
pp. 1 - 11

We now take up the third and last subdivision (xv. 8 - xvi. 23) of this section dealing with Gentile acceptance. As a sort of tail-piece, we find in chapter xvi. a mingling of the ministries belonging to men and women, and to the circumcision and the uncircumcision. Divisions are categorically condemned, and self-servers are to be shunned. The holy kiss is to be given without consideration of nationality, and the whole passage is coloured by the prophetic forecast in which Satan, the cause of all fleshly religion and carnal divisions, is bruised "under your feet" by the God of Peace.

Beginning at the first verse of the chapter, we read:

> "I commend unto you Phebe our sister, which is a servant of the church which is at Cenchrea: that ye receive her in the Lord, as becometh saints, and that ye assist her in whatsoever business she hath need of you; for she hath been a succourer of many, and of myself also" (Rom. xvi. 1, 2).

The Apostle's "commendation" of Phebe was no empty conventionality. His own use of the word in other passages makes it clear that it must have implied sterling worth in the person commended.

> "Not walking in craftiness, nor handling the Word of God deceitfully; but by manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God" (II Cor. iv. 2).
>
> "In all things commending ourselves as the ministers of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distress" (II Cor. vi. 4).
> (See also II Cor. vii. 11, x. 18 and xii. 11).

Phebe was a deaconess. Pliny, in his letter to Trajan in which he asks the Emperor whether he is to punish people simply for being Christians, says that, scarcely crediting the account he had received of the innocence of these Christians, he had put two deaconesses (ex duabus ancillis quae ministrae dicebantur) to the torture, but had discovered nothing beyond (as it appeared to him) perverted and immoderate superstition. In the East, the ministry of deaconesses would be even more of a necessity than in the modern West, for women did not then mix with men as they do here to-day. In the Apostle's instructions to Timothy, it will be remembered that he told him to treat "the elder women as mothers; the younger as sisters, with all purity" (I Tim. v. 2).

Something of the character of the ministry that was open to women can be seen in such passages as the following in I Tim. v.:

> "Well reported of for good works; if she have brought up children, if she have lodged strangers, if she have washed the saints' feet, if she have relieved the afflicted" (I Tim. v. 10).

While it was not permissible for a woman to teach in cases where such teaching would carry with it the usurpation of authority over a man (I Tim. ii. 12), women were by no means restricted to domestic duties. In his epistle to Titus, the Apostle writes:

> "The aged women . . . . . teachers of good things . . . . . teach the young women" (Titus ii. 3, 4).

Moreover, the fact that no man could be a bishop or a deacon who was not the husband of one wife, whose children were not well behaved, and whose home was not fit to show hospitality (I Tim. iii.), reveals how much fellowship was expected in the execution of these offices between husband and wife.

Tradition has it that Phebe was entrusted with this precious letter to the Romans. If this is correct, it was indeed a valuable and exacting service, as any who are acquainted with the hazards of travel in those days will appreciate. The Roman church is exhorted to receive Phebe in the Lord in a manner worthy of saints, and also to assist her in any business in which she may have need.

Phebe is also described as being "a succourer of many". The word here is prostatis which is equivalent to the Latin patronus, "a defender of meaner persons" (Plutarch). Athenian writers also use the word of such as took care of strangers (harpocration). To this title the Apostle adds the phrase "and of myself also". We have no knowledge of the actual incidents here, but although we do not know anything of the particular dangers or difficulties out of which Phebe's "patronage" extricated Paul, the Lord has recorded the fact, and we with the Apostle can feel truly grateful. There are some who consider that the Apostle was rather stern with regard to women, but such are superficial readers of his writings. He who, as a Pharisee, had thanked God that he had "not been born a woman", is the one who, in his epistle to the Galatians, writes:

> "There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus" (Gal. iii. 28).

In Phil. iv. the Apostle specially remembers "the women" that laboured with him in the gospel (Phil. iv. 3). It is a narrow view of ministry that limits it to the platform and public speaking. Anyone who has done much traveling and speaking cannot fail to have been impressed with the fact that, unless others fulfilled their own ministries in other ways, the public speaking would become almost an impossibility. We can be sure that Phebe would feel that there could be no greater honour than to find her name inscribed in the Epistle to the Romans as one who had succoured Paul in the hour of need.

From verse 3 to verse 23 (Chapter xvi.), the Apostle is occupied in sending greetings to various members of the Church, beginning with the Jewish believers. So great is the intimacy between the Apostle and Priscilla and Aquila, that he calls her by the diminutive "Prisca", even as he does when standing in the shadow of death in II Tim. iv. 19.

Perhaps the fact that the Apostle was to lay down his life for Christ's sake, together with the fact that Priscilla and Aquila had laid down their own necks for his sake, may provide the reason why this more intimate name came to the surface in these two passages. Every reader of these lines should feel indebted to these two faithful believers, for in verse 4 we read:

> "Unto whom not only I give thanks, but also all the churches of the Gentiles" (Rom. xvi. 4).

The salutation to the "church that is in their house" seems to indicate that this hospitable couple had dedicated their home to the Lord, and this is confirmed in Acts xviii. where we read that both Paul and Apollos profited by their welcome, when they had been forced out of Rome and abode for the time at Corinth (Acts xviii. 1, 2, 26). Moreover, when they lived for a while in Ephesus we again find that there was a church in their house (I Cor. xvi. 19).

From verse 5 onwards a number of believers are mentioned of whom nothing more is known. The Apostle's regard for the good name of a sister in Christ is illustrated by the reserve with which he uses endearing titles. Speaking of a brother in the Lord he says "my beloved" (verse 9), but when giving the same title to a sister he says "the beloved Persis" (verse 12). We get a very homely touch in the following verse where the Apostle writes: "Salute Rufus, chosen in the Lord, and his mother and mine." No details are added, but one can well imagine the lonely Apostle, without wife, sister or mother, travel-worn and weary, finding a Bethel in the home of Rufus and his mother.

Andronicus and Junia are said to be not only "kinsmen", but also "of note among the apostles". There is no difficulty about this phrase, if we remember that the "apostles" were not limited to the "twelve". Barnabas (Acts xiv. 4, 14), Sylvanus and Timothy (I Thess. i. 1, ii. 6), Apollos (I Cor. iv. 6-9), and Epaphroditus (Phil. ii. 25) all appear to have held this office, besides others who are not named (II Cor. viii. 23).

It is of great interest to learn that quite recently an Italian market-gardener laid bare a little cemetery, with a number of head stones bearing the names Urbanus, Stachys, Tryphena, Amplias, Philologus, Julius and Hermas. Every one of these appears in Rom. xvi., and there can be no doubt that these were the very people mentioned by the Apostle. Lightfoot, in his note on the reference to the "saints in Cæsar's household" in Philippians, has shown that many of these names were well known at the Roman court. Amplias and Urbanus are mentioned several times. Stachys is rare, but there is a record of a man of this name who held office at about the time when Paul wrote. Apelles (verse 10) was a name belonging to the Imperial household. Aristobulus, mentioned in the same verse, was the grandson of Herod the Great, and slaves belonging to him would be designated Aristobuliani, or as Paul puts it, hoi ek ton Aristoboulon (Rom. xvi. 10). Herodian, a fellow-countryman of the Apostle, is mentioned immediately after this household of Herod's grandson.

The name Narcissus was a fairly common one, but the close proximity of the household of Narcissus to that of Aristobulus (verses 10 and 11) makes it probable that the Apostle is referring to a powerful freedman Narcissus, whose wealth was proverbial and who had an immense influence with Claudius. Narcissus was put to death by Agrippina shortly after the accession of Nero, about three or four years before the epistle to the Romans was written.

Tryphena and Tryphosa were probably sisters, and both names occur in the inscriptions. Both names are derived from truphe, "luxury", and there may be an intended contrast here in the Apostle's use of the word "labour" to describe their service.

Having sent greetings to so many, the Apostle now says: "Salute one another with a holy kiss" (Rom. xvi. 16). Paul sends the same exhortation to two other churches (I Cor. xvi. 20; I Thess. v. 26), and Peter also speaks of "a kiss of charity". The defining of the kiss each time may be because of the false charges that were made against the believers. The sexes did not intermingle in the Church as they do to-day, and the idea of a brother kissing a sister in Christ in the Church is not in mind. The Rabbis did not permit more than three kinds of kiss: the kiss of reverence, the kiss of reception, and the kiss of dismissal. This form of salutation is not in vogue in the West, and any local custom that expresses Christian love may rightly take its place.

Before the Apostle sends greetings from those who were with him (Rom. xvi. 21-23), he pauses to give a serious word of warning to the Church at Rome. The fact that this warning comes almost at the end of the epistle instead of in the opening chapter as in Galatians and I Corinthians, possibly indicates that the evil had not in this case grown to any extent, but that the Apostle realized that it was there, and that a word of warning was needed. Wherever the Apostle and the truth committed to him penetrated, there, sooner or later, would the Judaizers and their evil teaching follow. In the record of the Acts, we find that the Apostle had scarcely returned from the great evangelistic work recorded in Acts xiii. and xiv., before it became necessary to go to Jerusalem in order to counteract the evil that was being wrought by "certain men which came down from Judæa" (Acts xv. 1). Those who seek to follow in the Apostle's footsteps are also conscious that there is the same sequence to-day, and, while we do not fill our pages with warnings and exposures, there are times when silence would mean an unfaithful discharge of our stewardship.

The false teachers whom the Apostle had in mind when he wrote to the Roman church are characterized in a twofold way:

(1) They caused divisions and offences.
(2) These divisions and offences were contrary to the doctrine that the saints had learned.

There are two words that are translated "division" in the Epistles. The first of these is schisma, "a rent", as in I Cor. i. 10, and, literally, in Matt. ix. 16. Where this word is used it indicates a serious division within the Church. The second word is the one used here in Romans: dichostasia, meaning a "dissension", a symptom of the disease which, if unchecked, will end in schism. The word is used only three times by the Apostle—in Rom. xvi. 17, I Cor. iii. 3 and Gal. v. 20. The context of each reference indicates that this dissension arises not so much from ignorance of the truth but rather from self-seeking and the flesh.

"Ye are yet carnal: for whereas there is among you envying, and strife, and divisions, are ye not carnal and walk as men?" (I Cor. iii. 3).

"Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these; adultery . . . . . seditions" (Gal. v. 19, 20).

"For they that are such serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly" (Rom. xvi. 18).

Whenever there is a crime committed, and the culprit is not known, one of the first things that the Criminal Investigation Officer asks is, Who will benefit by this crime? and many a time this has opened the way to the detection of the criminal. The same thing often appears to be true, sadly enough, in the perpetration of error, and we find the Apostle associating false teaching with emulation and envy, with "filthy lucre", and with service that he calls "serving their own belly". To stand resolutely for the truth, without compromise, is not a "paying proposition" as the world uses the term.

The "offences" that the Apostle associates with the "dissensions" caused by these false teachers may be best understood by referring back to the earlier occurrence of the word skandalon in Rom. xiv. 13. Dissensions and stumbling-blocks were both contrary to the teaching that the Apostle had been giving in Rom. xii.-xv., where he enjoins unity, acceptance, reception, and a willingness to forego legitimate liberties for the sake of others. Nevertheless, following the usual method of Biblical instructions, the Apostle does not rest satisfied with the declaration of positive truths, but supplements them by a negative warning. In our own teaching we should do well if we followed the Apostle's example here more consistently.

Another feature of importance is suggested by the word para in Rom. xvi. 17, where it is translated "contrary". The same word, in a similar context, occurs in Gal. i. 8: "Though an angel from heaven preach any other gospel to you para that which we have preached to you." Like all prepositions, the word para must be translated in a variety of ways according to the case it governs and the demands of the context, but the underlying and basic idea is "beside", as in the word "parallel". Where there is a frank denial of truth, we are not deceived, but where the evil doctrine "comes up alongside" the danger is serious. Often we may have to appear unkind and uncharitable in the eyes of those we serve when we denounce some doctrine that is in many points very like the truth for which we stand. In Rom. i. 25, in connection with the introduction of idolatry, this same word is used. Had the worship of idols been introduced at the beginning as something opposed to the worship of the living God, it would probably have made little progress. It came in, however, as something "beside".

"They worshipped and served the creature para (alongside) the Creator."

The initial sin of the garden of Eden is also characterized by the same word. The word "offence" (Rom. v. 15, 16, 18, 20) is paraptoma, "to fall aside"; "transgression" (Rom. v. 14) is parabasis, "to step aside"; while "disobedience" (Rom. v. 19) is parakoe, "to hear aside". There is no frontal attack either in the record of Gen. iii. or in Rom. v. It is all "beside".

The Apostle calls upon the Roman saints to "mark" and "avoid" those referred to in verse 17. To do anything else would be to act upon our own responsibility and so invite disaster. The avoidance of all such teachers is enjoined with increasing emphasis in the Apostle's closing ministry. Such words as "avoid", "flee", and "shun" are characteristic of the epistles to Timothy. It is a false charity that would plead for fellowship in a case like this. The Lord Himself knows what is best.

Several points are brought before the reader's notice in connection with these teachers. In the first place their teaching is deceptive (Rom. xvi. 18). This feature recurs in other passages:

> "For such are false apostles, deceitful workers . . . . . Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light" (II Cor. xi. 13, 14).
>
> "Perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth, supposing that gain is godliness: from such withdraw yourself" (I Tim. vi. 5).
>
> "There are many unruly and vain talkers and deceivers, specially they of the circumcision: whose mouths must be stopped, who subvert whole houses, teaching things which they ought not, for filthy lucre's sake" (Titus i. 10, 11).

The ground upon which these teachers worked is described as "the hearts of the simple" (Rom. xvi. 18). The word "simple" here is akakos, from a, "not" and kakos, "evil" and is used in Heb. vii. 26 to describe the character of the Lord Himself. In the LXX it corresponds to two Hebrew words:

(a) The Hebrew word tam, "perfect" (Job viii. 20).
(b) The Hebrew word pethi, "simple" (Prov. i. 4).

It is in the second of these senses that the Apostle uses the word here.

In Prov. xiv. 15 we read:

> "The simple believeth every word, but the prudent looketh well to his going."

How well we know these "simple" ones. They have only to be met with "good words" and "fair speeches" to be entrapped. The two expressions—"good words" and "fair speeches"—relate to the matter and the form of what was said. These false teachers said admirable things, and they expressed themselves well. Eulogias generally means "blessing", and is the word that gives us the English "eulogy". Here is evidently indicates "fine phraseology".

The Apostle follows this warning by a reference to the obedience manifested by the Roman church. Inasmuch as this is introduced by the word gar ("for"), it must be regarded as part of the Apostle's warning. He does not so much intend here to praise their obedience as to say, in effect: Don't let your commendable obedience prevent you from exercising care before you accept any doctrine preached to you, however well it may be presented, and however acceptable it may appear. That this was in the Apostle's mind seems evident from what follows:

> "I am glad, therefore, on account of you (in this matter of obedience) but yet I would have you wise unto that which is good, and simple concerning evil" (Rom. xvi. 19).

Here the word "simple" is akeraios and means literally "unmixed".

As Eph. ii. 2, 3 reveals, those who fulfil the desires of the flesh and of the mind, are themselves the tools of the "Prince of the power of the air". So here, the Apostle turns from the false teachers to the prime mover in all deception, Satan himself. He has already spoken of the fall of man in Rom. v., and now he looks forward to the fulfillment of the primeval promise: "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head"—

> "But the God of Peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly" (Rom. xvi. 20).

It is a remarkable fact that the prophecy of Gen. iii. 15 is never specifically referred to by any N.T. writer as being fulfilled by Christ at the cross. This is at first sight very strange; and yet there must be a reason why no reference is made to it. The reason seems to be that the "Seed" of the woman, while referring primarily to Christ Himself, must also include all the true seed of promise. Hence the early promise of victory will not be truly fulfilled until the time of the end, when all the redeemed shall stand with the Redeemer Himself, triumphant because of His victory.

It is clear from verse 20 that, when Paul wrote the epistle to the Romans, he could speak of the fulfillment of the promise of Gen. iii. 15 as taking place "shortly". The same word is found in Rev. i. 1 and xxii. 6, showing that, at the time of writing, the setting aside of Israel at Acts xxviii. and the intervention of the dispensation of the Mystery were not known. The hope entertained was, as we have seen, the fulfillment of Isaiah's promise in connection with the time when the lion and the kid should lie down together. This synchronizes with the time when the disturber of the peace of Eden shall be put under the feet of the true Seed. It is important to keep in mind that right up to the last chapter of Romans, no hint is found of "the Mystery" revealed in Ephesians. We make no comment here on Rom. xvi. 25-27, but we should like to assure the reader that this passage has not been forgotten.

After the benediction with which the Apostle usually concludes his epistles, he adds a salutation from eight fellow-workers. The second in the list, Lucius, is probably Lucius of Cyrene, who was a teacher at Antioch (Acts xiii. 1). Jason, who immediately follows, may be the same as the Jason mentioned in Acts xvii. 5, while Sosipater may have come from Berea (Acts xx. 4). All this, however, is uncertain and not of essential importance.

The introduction of the name of the amanuensis, Tertius, is particularly interesting. His name suggests that he was a slave, and we know that slaves were trained to write in a kind of shorthand, many specimens of which exist to-day. The fact that Tertius is included among the believers here, while the names of the actual writers do not occur in the other epistles, suggests possibly that the latter were employed in their capacity as writers but were not believers in Christ. We can only hope that the glorious doctrine they transcribed may have subsequently led them to the Christ about Whom they wrote.

The salutation: "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all", or something equivalent, should be looked for as the Apostle's sign-manual in every epistle. When the Church at Thessalonica had been deceived by "an epistle as from" Paul, the Apostle draws attention to the fact that they could always rely upon the authenticity of an epistle from himself, inasmuch as the Lord would not permit any other writer to use this particular phrase in closing an epistle. This, of course, necessitates inspiration: otherwise there would be nothing to prevent either Peter, innocently, or a deceiver, with intent, from using identically the same phrase.

> "The salutation of Paul with mine own hand, which is the token in every epistle: so I write. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen" (II Thess. iii. 17, 18).

The reader will find at the end of every one of Paul's epistles this reference to "grace with you". It is said by many that Paul did not sign the epistle to the Hebrews. This is certainly true so far as the actual name is concerned, but the authorship is not difficult to determine if we read the benediction with which the epistle closes.

We have already exceeded the space that this article should occupy and we will therefore defer until next time any further remarks regarding the close of this great epistle to the Romans.

#86. Romans xvi. 25 - 27.
The mystery that had been silenced.
pp. 35 - 42

We now come to the closing section of the epistle to the Romans, a section that it is of the utmost importance to understand, and about which a great deal of discussion has arisen.

The genuineness of the doxology has been disputed (1) on the ground that its position is unsuitable either at the end of chapter xiv. 23, where it stands in 190 manuscripts, or at the close of chapter xvi.; (2) on the ground of its "unpauline" lack of simplicity. The doxology is unusually elaborate for Paul's epistles, but there is of course no rule governing such a matter, and the nature of the subject in the case in point fully accounts for any complexity in its composition. The doxology is found

(1) After xvi. 24, in MSS B, C, D, E, Aleph, Syr., Copt., Alth., Vulg., Lat., Fathers.
(2) After xiv. 23 by L, most cursive MSS Chrys., Theod., etc.
(3) Both after xiv 23 and xvi. 23 by A5, 17, 109 Lat.
(4) Nowhere D, F, G, Marcion.*

[NOTE: * - For explanation of these symbols see Scrivener or Burgon and Berean Expositor Volume XXI, page 169. They are not important enough to us here to justify time and space in their elucidation.]

When we consider the structure of the epistle as a whole we shall see two things:

(1) It can stand nowhere else but where it comes in the A.V.
(2) If it were omitted, the epistle would remain for ever imperfect.

To appreciate the latter of these two statements it is essential that we see the structure of the epistle as a whole, and as this must be given somewhere in this last article of the series, it will be fitting that it appear now.

The Structure of the Epistle to the Romans as a whole.

A	i. 1-17. Gospel. Promised afore. For obedience of faith among all nations.
B	i. 18 - iii. 20. Jews equally with Gentiles guilty before God.	In the outer portions
C	iii. 21-31. The Glory of God. Come short of.	of Romans we read of sins, law of Sinai,
D	iv. 1-25. His own body now dead.	Abraham, Israel,
E	v. 1-11. Reconciliation. Doctrinal.	Jew and Gentile.
The Mystery of Romans xvi. 25-27.	F | v. 12-21. Condemnation in Adam. G | vi., vii. Question. Repudiation. Answer. F | viii. No condemnation in Christ.	In the inner portions of Romans, we have sin, law of sin, Adam, and Man, but no references to Abraham, Jew and Gentile.
E	ix.-xi. Reconciliation. Dispensational.	The outer portion,
D	xii., xiii. Present your bodies a living sacrifice.	Rom. xi. - xvi. 24, the same feature as
C	xiv. - xv. 7. The Glory of God. Received, to.	Rom. i. - v. 11, but from a dispensational
B	xv. 8 - xvi. 23. Gentiles equally with Jews acceptable before God.	and practical point of view.
A	xvi. 24-27. Mystery silenced afore. For obedience of faith unto all nations.

From this structure it will at once be seen that Rom. xvi. 25-27 is essential to complete the epistle. The reader who has followed the exposition from the outset in Volume XVI, will be able to fill in the details of every section, so completing the structural analysis of this most wonderful epistle. We must however show the relationship of A | i. 1-17 and A | xvi. 25-27, as that is the subject now before us.

The Outer Section. (Rom. i. 1-17). The Gospel of God.	The Inner Section. (Rom. xvi. 25-27). My Gospel.
Concerning His Son Jesus Christ.	The preaching of Jesus Christ.
Promised afore.	Kept silence in age times, now manifested.
Prophets in the holy Scriptures.	Prophetic writings.
Unto obedience of faith among all nations.	For obedience of faith to all nations.
Grace from God our Father.	Praise to the aionian God, and to the only wise God.
To the end ye may be established.	To Him Who is able to establish you.
The power of God unto salvation.	To Him Who is of power.
Righteousness revealed . . . as it is written.	Revelation of mystery . . . scriptures, the prophets.

It is evident that there is an intended contrast between these two passages. From the days of Abraham onward the gospel was no secret.

> "The Scripture foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham" (Gal. iii. 8).
>
> "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day: and he saw it, and was glad" (John viii. 56).

Here however in Rom. xvi. 25-27 is a mystery, and that mystery something that had been silenced. It cannot therefore possibly be the same thing as the gospel preached in Rom. i.

It is not stated, however, in Rom. i. 1, 2, or in any of the passages that link the gospel with the O.T. Scriptures, that the gospel was fully made known before the coming of Christ. Take for example Rom. i. 17:

> "For therein (i.e. the gospel of Christ, i. 16) is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith, according as it had been written (in Hab. ii. 4) 'The just shall live by faith'."

Without the fuller light of the gospel of Christ, it would not be evident from the passage in Habakkuk that the power of the gospel of Christ resided in the provision of a righteousness by faith. This will be evident if we quote the passage:

> "For the vision is yet for an appointed time, but at the end it shall speak, and not lie; though it tarry, wait for it, because it will surely come, it will not tarry. Behold, his soul which is lifted up is not upright in him, but the just shall live by his faith" (Hab. ii. 3-4).

But this provision is now "revealed" and in the hands of an inspired apostle can be confirmed by such passages as Hab. ii. 4, although the teaching does not lie on the surface. Again, having quoted many passages from the O.T. Scriptures, the Apostle says:

> "But now" (in contrast to the period "then") "the righteousness of God, apart from law, has been manifested" (perfect tense) "being borne witness to" (present tense) "by the law and the prophets, even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ" (Rom. iii. 21, 22).

Here the "manifestation" takes place before the "witness" can be borne by O.T. prophets. So in Rom. xvi. 26, we read of something that had been kept in silence, but which was then made manifest.

Let us set out this doxology so that we may the better consider it in detail.

Romans xvi. 24-27.

A | 24. | a | Grace be with you. Amen.
b | To Him Who is able to establish.
B1 | Kata. 25. Gospel proclaimed. According to my gospel.
B2 | Kata. 25, 26. Mystery manifested. According to revelation of mystery.
B3 | Kata. 26. Make known. According to commandment.
A | 27. | b | To God only wise.
a | Glory unto the ages. Amen.

We observe that the section begins with "grace" and ends with "glory", both the statements contained in it being sealed with an Amen. The words "to be able" are a translation of dunamai which literally means "to be of power". This is balanced by the only "wise" God, the two statements revealing "the power of God and the wisdom of God" working together.

Salvation is not in view here in the same sense as in Rom. i. 16. The Apostle now desires that those who are saved shall be established. He had desired this at the beginning of the epistle (Rom. i. 11) where however the establishing was connected with "some spiritual gift". Here in Rom. xvi. the establishing is associated with what the Apostle calls "My gospel". This expression "My gospel" is used three times by Paul, and if we consider the context of each reference we shall be impressed with the magnitude of its sphere.

The first occurrence is in Rom. ii. 16. Here the Apostle is speaking of the Gentile world, unevangelized and unenlightened by the law: a world left to the voice of conscience and the witness of creation. To argue from Rom. ii. that anyone who patiently continues in well-doing will be saved, whether he believes the gospel or not, is to handle the word of God deceitfully. Obviously, where no gospel message has ever penetrated, it cannot be believed (Rom. x. 14), yet it is wrong to infer that Rom. ii. teaches salvation by works. The truth is that salvation for any is neither by works nor by faith, but by the finished work of Christ. The man who hears the gospel and believes is saved, but that salvation is a secret unknown to anyone, and unconfirmed to himself, apart from those good works that manifest the reality of the faith. The point of the passage is that while the unevangelized heathen cannot believe a message he has never heard, yet if he manifests by his works that he would have believed had he been given the opportunity, God reveals that this will be fully recognized "in that day".

> "For when the Gentiles which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these having not the law are a law unto themselves, which show the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the meanwhile accusing or else excusing one another, in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ according to my gospel" (Rom. ii. 14-16).

The second occurrence of "My gospel" is in Rom. xvi. 25 and the third in II Tim. ii. 8.

"Remember that Jesus Christ of the seed of David was raised from the dead according to my gospel."

These three occurrences have reference to the unevangelized heathen, to the revelation of a mystery hitherto kept in silence, and to the position of the Lord Jesus Christ in the dispensation of the mystery. Three concentric circles, each narrower than the preceding one, yet each vitally associated with the peculiar ministry of Paul.

It is, then, evident that what Paul calls "My gospel" is a distinctive message, not to be confused with the good news proclaimed by others. Associated with this gospel is the preaching of Jesus Christ "according to the revelation of a secret which hath been silenced in aionian times, but is now made manifest, and through prophetic writings."

The reader will be conscious that there is something missing in the above rendering. He naturally feels that the phrase "and through prophetic writings" should be followed by "as well as . . . . ." In other words the particle te is often followed by kai, so that there appears to be an ellipsis here. Elsewhere te is passed over in our Version, but to be accurate it should always be translated. Look at the difference the recognition of the particle makes in I Cor. i. 30:

"But of Him, are ye in Christ Jesus, Who of God is made unto us wisdom, as well as righteousness, and sanctification and redemption."

Consequently we read Rom. xvi. 26 as follows:

"But now made manifest both through prophetic writings as well as" (by the Apostle's preaching) "according to the commandment of the aionian God."

Every commentator speaks of the grammatical "gaps" that appear in this great doxology, as though the Apostle's thoughts were too great to find expression.

"According to the revelation of a secret."—It is entirely unnecessary to assume that this is the secret, or mystery, revealed in Eph. iii. The dispensational section of Romans had a secret the making known of which illuminated the problem resulting from Israel's failure (Rom. xi. 25), and this is the theme of another doxology, namely that which closes Rom. xi. at verses 33-36.

When examining Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39, we have seen that it constitutes a unique section of the teaching of the epistle. It goes back to a period before there was a Jew, and before Abraham, to Adam. No one can read Gen. iii. without being conscious that there is much unexplained. Solomon writing in Eccles. iii. says, "To everything there is a season, and a time to every purpose under heaven", and in enumerating them he says, "A time to keep silence, and a time to speak" (Eccles. iii. 1, 7). The word translated in the A.V. "kept secret" is sigao, translated elsewhere in the N.T. "keep silence" and "hold one's peace".

Much important truth latent in Gen. i.-xi. was "hushed" until the "time to speak" had arrived, when Paul was inspired to write the epistle to the Romans. The study of Gen. i.-xi. in the light of Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39 is therefore of the utmost importance to the believer who would realize the peculiar character of his calling. From Gen. xii. until the end of the Acts one nation holds the pre-eminent place and that part of the O.T. which deals with Israel knows no salvation apart from the chosen race, or the covenants made with Abraham.

If Israel should finally fail and fall, the prophets had nothing to tell us of how God would cope with the resulting problem. It is, accordingly, the purpose of the central section of Romans to reveal the relationship of man, as such (i.e., as neither Jew nor Gentile) to Adam and to Christ, irrespective both of promises made to the fathers, and the failure or success of the chosen people. But this is not the theme of the O.T. prophecy in general. The period covered by the Scriptures from Gen. xii. to Matt. i. is as long as that covered by Gen. i. 3 to xi. In that small space of eleven chapters is written all that can be known of the first 2000 years of this present creation. What is written is pregnant with truth, but it must await its appointed time, and just as the gospel itself revealed teaching hidden in O.T. Scriptures (as we have already seen in Hab. ii. 3, 4, etc.) so these early chapters of Genesis hold much basic teaching throwing light on the position of the believer who is saved and justified without reference to the law of Moses. Volumes have been written to associate the obedience of Christ with the law of Moses, whereas this law was but transient, it was "added because of transgressions", it was "found fault with" and passed away (Heb. viii. 7).

This secret has been hushed in aionian times. We read of some part of God's purpose as being related to a period "before aionian times" (Titus i. 2; II Tim. i. 9), and in I Corinthians we read of "the wisdom of God in a mystery" which has been "hidden" and which God "foreordained before the ages" (I Cor. ii. 7). The mystery of the prison epistles was "hidden from the ages, and from the generations" (Col. i. 26). These hidden subjects had "their own seasons" of manifestation, which manifestations were through the medium of "preaching" and "according to" a "commandment" (Titus i. 3).

The mystery of Rom. xvi. is not said to be related to a period "before age times" but silenced in age times. This secret is the theme of the central section of Romans, and its subject is Adam, not Abraham, man, not Israel or Gentile, the law of sin, not the law of Sinai, the dominion of sin and death, not the domination of Canaanites or Babel.

What are the "prophetic writings" that Paul refers to? The words translated in the A.V. "the scriptures of the prophets" are not exactly the same as those used in Rom. i. 2. In Rom. i. 2 the original reads: Dia ton propheton auton en graphais hagiais, where, Rom. xvi. 26 reads: Dia te graphion prophetikon. The suggestion is made by some that not only a difference of expression is intended here, but a real difference and that the reference in Rom. i. 2, is to O.T. prophets, whereas that in Rom. xvi. is to N.T. prophets. It may be so, but the reader should be aware that nothing in the language used constitutes a proof of this. Prophetikos is to prophetes, what pneumatikos is to pneuma, simply the adjectival form. As the only other occurrence of the word will show, every one of the O.T. prophecies are "prophetic writings" (II Pet. i. 21).

It was when the Apostle received commandment to make this early truth known that the prophetic writings that had for generations held their secret began to speak.

The fact that what was made known both in Rom. i. and xvi. was "for the obedience of faith to all nations", establishes the unity of purpose that links the whole of Rom. i. - xvi. 27 together as an indivisible whole. There is no need to adopt the suggestion of Lightfoot that the doxology was added some years after.

The ascription of praise is to the only wise God. Wisdom is associated with the unfolding purpose of the ages (Rom. xi. 33; I Cor. ii. 7; Eph. i. 8, 9; iii. 10). On this high note, the epistle ends.

What a book this is! What a glorious revelation of grace! What terrible depths of sin and failure! What a basis upon which to build, when the time should come, that new revelation of transcendant love, the epistle to the Ephesians! Brethren, hold fast to the doctrine of Romans for it is fundamental. Leave the dispensational points, such as "to the Jew first", for they have a time limit, but the glorious scheme of justification by faith underlies the whole of God's subsequent dealings with men, and the departure from the teaching of this book is one of the sure signs of the fast approaching apostacy. We shall, we trust, study other precious portions of the Word together, but never again shall we strike such bed rock truth as we have discovered in this epistle that closes the written testimony of the Acts period.

The Self-Drawn Portrait of the Apostle Paul.

#1. The Portrait as a Whole.
pp. 109, 110

Most students of Scripture have at some time or other used Conybeare and Howson's "Life and Epistles of St. Paul". In the introduction to Vol. I there occurs one of the longest sentences to be met with in ordinary literature—a sentence containing more than 500 words.

The introduction opens as follows:

> "The purpose of this work is to give a living picture of St. Paul himself, and of the circumstances by which he was surrounded."

Later on in the Introduction we read:

> "We must listen to his words, if we would learn to know him . . . . . In his case it is not too much to say that his letters are himself—a portrait painted by his own hand, of which every feature may be 'known and read of all men'."

Every reader of The Berean Expositor will feel that the better we know the apostle Paul, the better we shall know his Lord, for he is given as an example for us to follow. We propose, therefore, in a series of short and simple studies, to take the long sentence already mentioned and use its separate clauses, point by point, as a means of appreciating the many-sided character of the earthen vessel, to whom, under God, we owe so much.

As many of our readers may not possess a copy of Conybeare and Howson, we give below the sentence that will supply us with our clues, and then in subsequent studies we will take feature by feature, so that we may obtain a full-length portrait. Such a study will not lead to any foolish adulation of the man. We shall realize that he was indeed of like infirmity with ourselves; but we shall also see what grace can do—perhaps be the more inclined to look away from ourselves and our limitations, and give a larger place to the glory and grace that made Paul what he was, and can make us more than those who know us would believe possible.

> "Here we see that fearless independence with which he 'withstood Peter to the face';—that impetuosity which breaks out in his apostrophe to the 'foolish Galatians';—that earnest indignation which bids his converts 'beware of dogs, beware of the concision', and pours itself forth in the emphatic 'God forbid', which meets every Antinomian suggestion;—that fervid patriotism which makes him 'wish that he were himself accursed from Christ for his brethren, his kinsmen according to the flesh, who are Israelites';—that generosity which looked for no other reward than 'to preach the Glad Tidings of Christ without charge', and made him feel that he would rather 'die than that any man should make this glorying void';—that dread of officious interference which led him to shrink from 'building on another man's foundation';—that delicacy which shows itself in his appeal to Philemon, whom he might have commanded, 'yet for love's sake rather beseeching him, being such an one as Paul the aged, and now also a prisoner of Jesus Christ', and which is even more striking in some of his farewell greetings, as (for instance) when he bids the Romans salute Rufus, and 'his mother, who is also mine';—that scrupulous fear of evil appearance which 'would not eat any man's bread for nought, but wrought with labour and travail night and day, that he might not be chargeable to any of them';—that refined courtesy which cannot bring itself to blame till it has first praised, and which makes him deem it needful almost to apologize for the freedom of giving advice to those who were not personally known to him;—that self-denying love which 'will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest he make his brother to offend';—that impatience of exclusive formalism with which he overwhelms the Judaizers of Galatia, joined with a forbearance so gentle for the innocent weakness of scrupulous consciences;—that grief for the sins of others, which moved him to tears when he spoke of the enemies of the cross of Christ, 'of whom I tell you even weeping';—that noble freedom from jealousy with which he speaks of those who, out of rivalry to himself, preach Christ even of envy and strife, supposing to add affliction to his bonds: 'What then? notwithstanding, every way, whether in pretence or in truth, Christ is preached; and I therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice';—that tender friendship which watches over the health of Timothy, even with a mother's care;—that intense sympathy in the joys and sorrows of his converts, which could say, even to the rebellious Corinthians, 'ye are in our hearts, to die and live with you';—that longing desire for the intercourse of affection, and that sense of loneliness when it was withheld, which perhaps is the most touching feature of all, because it approaches most nearly to a weakness, 'When I had come to Troas to preach the Glad Tidings of Christ, and a door was opened to me in the Lord, I had no rest in my spirit, because I found not Titus my brother; but I parted from them, and came from thence into Macedonia'. And 'when I was come into Macedonia, my flesh had no rest, but I was troubled on every side; without were fightings, within were fears. But God, Who comforts them that are cast down, comforted me by the coming of Titus'. 'Do thy utmost to come to me speedily; for Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world, and is departed to Thessalonica; Crescens to Galatia, Titus to Dalmatia; only Luke is with me'."

#2. His Independence.
pp. 141 - 143

"Here we see that fearless independence with which he 'withstood Peter to the face'." (Conybeare and Howson).

The first feature sketched in by Conybeare and Howson is the Apostle's independence, the particular passage quoted being Gal. ii. Like many other things, the quality of independence can be a very fine or a very ugly feature. The kind of independence that sets aside the fear of man, and originates in a consciousness of the sovereignty of God and the sacredness of one's call and commission, is something to be desired and preserved. The kind of independence, on the other hand, that has its roots in pride, self-sufficiency, and lack of Christian charity, can only be deplored. In the Apostle's case we find the true kind of independence that is tempered and softened by graciousness and humility. Peter himself could not but admire the spirit that withstood him to the face before all, and at the same time would not speak against him behind his back or listen to the voice of slander.

Evidence for the Apostle's independence is to be found at the very threshold of his written ministry, in the epistle to the Galatians. The first chapter opens with the challenging statement:

> "Paul, an apostle (not of men, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ, and God the Father, Who raised Him from the dead);" (Gal. i. 1).

Later in the same chapter the challenge is carried over from Paul's apostleship to his gospel:

> "I certify you brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me is not after man, for I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ" (Gal. i. 11, 12).

The Apostle then passes on from his message to speak, in similar terms, of the commission he received:

> "When it pleased God . . . . . to reveal His Son in me . . . . . I conferred not with flesh and blood, neither went I up to Jerusalem, to them which were apostles before me, but I went into Arabia" (Gal. i. 15-17).

It will be readily seen that the whole of the first chapter of Galatians is written round these three items which speak of the Apostle's independence. We observe, however, that there is no pride here. Paul's apostleship is from God, and all that he is, all that he has to say, and all the authority he possesses are of the Lord and by His grace. If he sets aside man, he also acknowledges that the gospel was his by the revelation of Jesus Christ. If he speaks of "conferring not with flesh and blood", we know that it was because it was God Who had separated him, God Who had called him, and it was with God alone, in "Arabia", that he would spend those opening hours of new life and lofty vision.

So important does the Lord deem this question of the Apostle's independence that the subject is pursued into the second chapter of the epistle. There is the spirit of true independence in almost every line here. In the first verse we read:

> "Fourteen years after I went up again to Jerusalem" (Gal. ii. 1).

Who but an independent minister could stay away from the normal seat of authority for fourteen years without loss or condemnation?

The words: "I went up by revelation" in verse 2 set aside any idea of a command coming either from Jerusalem or Galatia. Moreover, in the first verse we read that the Apostle took Titus with him, although Titus was a Greek.

In the second verse we read:

> "I communicated unto them that gospel which I preach among the Gentiles" (Gal. ii. 2).

Every line rings with the note of independence. In verse 5 we read that the Apostle "gave place by subjection, no, not for an hour", while in verse 6 the pillars of the Church are referred to as those who "seemed to be somewhat". For the Apostle, standing as he does in the conscious presence of the God Who accepteth no man's person, intimidation is impossible, and man-pleasing forgotten. And so, when the need arises to preserve the truth of the gospel, he does not hesitate to withstand Peter to the face.

Paul's independence is seen on various other occasions in Scripture, the particular manifestation varying with the particular circumstances. How touching, for example, is the alternation, in Phil. iv., of gratitude for the Philippians' fellowship, with the independence that loathes even the appearance of "desiring a gift".

> "I rejoiced . . . . . that your care of me hath flourished again" (Phil. iv. 10).

Here it is gratitude that speaks. The Apostle, however, is extremely sensitive, and prison bars have not broken his God-given independence. So he immediately follows this remark with the words: "Not that I speak in respect of want" (Phil. iv. 11), and explains how, whether abased or abounding, he is strong for all things through Christ. His courtesy and gentleness now come to the fore. Will this boasting in Christ perhaps sound ungrateful in the ears of the Church? He immediately rectifies any impression of this kind by saying:

> "Notwithstanding ye have done well, that ye did communicate with my affliction" (Phil. iv. 14).

This leads his grateful memory to record that "in the beginning of the gospel" the Philippian Church stood alone in this blessed communication of "giving and receiving"; and then, in verse 17, we have once more the note of independence:

> "Not because I desire a gift; but I desire fruit that may abound to your account" (Phil. iv. 17).

Who would not count it an honour to be permitted to help such a man? He has all, he abounds, he is full—not because of a foolish independence, but because the gifts sent by the Philippians were like "an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God". Nevertheless, with all his humble gratefulness, independence has the last word, as he exultingly concludes:

> "BUT MY GOD shall supply all YOUR need, according to His riches in glory by Christ Jesus" (Phil. iv. 19).

The Apostle's independence is again in evidence in his first epistle to the Corinthians:

> "But with me it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you or of man's judgment; yea, I judge not mine own self. For in myself, I am conscious of nothing (wrong): yet am I not hereby justified: but He that judgeth me is the Lord" (I Cor. iv. 3, 4).

To tabulate all the references in Paul's epistles that speak, either directly or indirectly, of his independence, would turn this one article into a series, and would tend to magnify this one feature beyond its true proportion. Paul was very much more than merely independent, and we shall only truly appreciate his independence when we see it in association with the other qualities that go to make up his spiritual character. The Apostle has been given to the Church as an example. With all humility, with true gratitude for all fellowship, and with every acknowledgment of our own frailty and unworthiness, let us, at the same time, reach out after that independence of spirit that should mark the Lord's "free men".

#3. His Impetuosity.
pp. 180 - 183

> "Here we see . . . . . that impetuosity which breaks out in his apostrophe to the 'foolish Galatians'." (Conybeare and Howson).

The reader may at first look askance at the subject to be considered in this article. Impetuosity is a trait not usually put forward for emulation, especially in spiritual things. It must, however, be remembered that we are endeavouring to reconstruct the Apostle's self-drawn portrait. It is recorded that in reply to the artist's suggestion that a facial blemish should be omitted from his portrait, Oliver Cromwell said that he wanted his portrait painted "wart and all". It is far too easy to slip into the idea that the saints of the Bible were not as other men. On the contrary, they were only too conscious that in themselves they were but earthen vessels. It may be that if Paul's impetuosity appears at times to outrun discretion; on the other hand the sluggishness and indifference of others bear a great deal of responsibility.

The case in point in this article is the attitude of the Apostle as expressed in the Epistle to the Galatians when he heard of their defection from the truth. Speaking after the manner of men, we should never have seen the Epistle to the Galatians, had Paul not been so moved that, without ceremony and without pause, he wrote out of a burning heart this interesting, personal, Epistle.

> "I marvel that ye are so soon removed . . . . . though an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel . . . . . let him be accursed . . . . . Do I now persuade men?" (Gal. i. 6-10).
> "I would they were even cut off which trouble you" (Gal. v. 12).

Can we imagine Paul quietly allowing the judaizers from Jerusalem to come down to Galatia and put shackles and fetters upon those who had been set free by his own ministry, and not be roused? "Who is weak, and I am not weak? Who is offended, and I burn not?" (II Cor. xi. 29), said the Apostle. And if the word translated "offended" means "made to stumble", is it not a thing to be thankful for, that Paul could burn at the action of these legalisers? In this same chapter of Corinthians we sense that he himself felt that he had been too impetuous in speaking of his sufferings as compared with the other apostles.

> "Ye suffer fools gladly . . . . . ye suffer, if a man bring you into bondage, if a man devour you, if a man take of you, if a man exalt himself, if a man smite you on the face" (II Cor. xi. 19, 20).

These are burning, impetuous words, but who would wish them unwritten and unpublished? Can a man be white-hot for the truth and no one be singed? However, we see the same characteristic coming out that we saw in Phil. iv. (see pages 141-143), where, after a long list of unprecedented hardships for Christ's sake, he suddenly swings away from all this talk about himself and says that if he must needs glory he will glory of the things which concern his infirmities, and proceeds to speak of one of the most humiliating of his experiences, his ignominious exit from Damascus.

> "Through a window in a basket was I let down by the wall, and escaped his hands. It is not expedient for me doubtless to glory" (II Cor. xi. 33, xii. 1).

Yet, who would have a different Paul? That there was ample room for growth in grace, he, of all men, knew best, but would we exchange the burning zeal of the apostle of grace, for the cold reasoning of the doctrinaire? His churches were his children; his doctrine more than life; he "gladly spent himself"; and if this impetuosity sometimes overran discretion—be it so! The Apostle himself has drawn a distinction between "the righteous man" and "the good man" (Rom. v. 7), using the terms after the manner of men. Who can imagine Paul "faultily faultless, icily regular, splendidly null", as Tennyson expresses it. Before his conversion he described himself as being "an exceeding zealot" (Gal. i. 14), and Luke speaks of him in those days as "breathing out threatenings and slaughter" (Acts ix. 1).

Salvation does not rob a man of his individuality, but enables him with the self-same members that once served sin, now to serve the Lord. Paul would have ceased to be the same individual had he not burned with zeal in whatever cause he undertook. We are not in the slightest sense attempting to justify the Apostle in all his ways; we are endeavouring to look at his self-drawn portrait, the portrait of a man of flesh and blood like ourselves, a man who, like ourselves, knew what internal conflict was; a man who is beloved, not by reason of some ideal qualities, but for what he was by the grace of God.

What a marked contrast there was between the Apostle and his Lord when they stood before their judges. He, the Lamb of God, opened not his mouth, but Paul flashed out: "God shall smite thee, thou whited wall!" only to follow it immediately by the repentant words, "I wist not brethren, that he was the high priest" (Acts xxiii. 2-5). Can we not hear that impetuous spirit when he said:

> "None of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy" (Acts xx. 24).
>
> "I am ready not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus" (Acts xxi. 13).

No wonder we read, that when they heard this, the disciples ceased, saying, “The will of the Lord be done”.

With such an example, who would not be encouraged to endure? See how, had the disciples not restrained him, Paul would have entered into the theatre at Ephesus, where the populace were crying out for about two hours, “Great is Diana of the Ephesians!” (Acts xix. 30). While, therefore, we can easily see that there was great impetuosity in Paul’s character that needed the curb, after all, how much better is this fire and force than the lethargy of so many who profess to follow his steps.

We are not told in the Scriptures to follow Paul’s example blindly. Where he followed his Lord, he becomes an example for us to follow; where he was sometimes carried away by an excess of zeal, he becomes a corrective, but in most cases our lamps burn so feebly, and are so easily dowsed, that we have to confess that a little of the spirit of this ardent Apostle would make for clearer and fuller testimony on the part of us all.

The SECOND EPISTLE to TIMOTHY.

#1. The place of the epistle in the outworking of the truth. pp. 90 - 92

The dispensation of the mystery, and its bearing upon life, hope and walk, has been the central theme of this magazine since its inception. Our sole appeal is to the Scriptures "rightly divided", and consequently, while believing all Scripture to be given by inspiration of God, we perceive that all Scripture does not speak of the church which is the body of Christ. On the contrary, the bulk of it, in both Old and New Testaments, speaks of Israel. But at Acts xxviii. we perceive a dispensational crisis and Israel pass into their present lo-ammi condition (lo-ammi means: "Not my people", Hosea i. 9). With Israel's rejection a new dispensation necessarily follows, and we find Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for the Gentiles, entrusted with the revelation of the mystery. We are not left to infer this mystery and new dispensation from what we see in the Acts, but receive a specific revelation of its truth in the "prison" epistles. There we find all that we can know in this life of the distinctive character of this new and wonderful calling. The prison epistles are easily identified. Each one plainly speaks (e.g., the references quoted below) of prison or bonds in association with the Apostle's ministry among the Gentiles. They are Ephesians (iii. 1; iv. 1; vi. 20); Philippians (i. 7, 13, 14, 16; iv. 22); Colossians (iv. 3, 18); II Timothy (i. 8; iv. 16), and Philemon (9, 10).

For the doctrinal foundation of our faith, such as justification or forgiveness of sins, we turn to the earlier writings of the Apostle Paul, e.g., the epistle to the Romans. While in such epistles we find foundational truth that remains unchanged by the setting aside of Israel, we shall also find in them, and right through the period of the Acts, a very different dispensational setting from that of the prison epistles. In the earlier writings the Jew is first, and the New Covenant is in view. We stand upon the promises to Abraham and to the fathers, while the Gentile believer is reminded that he is a wild olive graft into the tree of Israel. But with the passing of Israel, the olive tree position must pass too, and we find that a new constitution is made known. Equal membership of the body of Christ and a new sphere, heavenly places, is revealed. A new promise is beneath our feet, a promise that antedates the overthrow of the world and age times. The epistle to the Ephesians reveals this new membership, sphere and promise, and its teaching is expanded, together with vital corrections of error, in the epistle to the Colossians. Philippians presents a further phase of truth. In every dispensation there has been something free and unconditional, followed by something in the nature of reward or prize. Abraham received the land of promise as an unconditional gift; he could not forfeit it, for its enjoyment did not rest upon an act of faithfulness or endurance. But over and above this unconditional gift the Lord revealed to Abraham the heavenly city and the heavenly country, and we learn of this for the first time in Hebrews. Because of this heavenly city, Abraham endured, and all they who "overcome" and belong to the same calling also have the heavenly Jerusalem in view. So, too, the epistle to the Philippians occupies much the same place in relation to Ephesians as the epistle to the Hebrews does to the hope of Israel. While Ephesians reveals "what is the hope of His calling",

Philippians speaks of the "prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus". The setting of Philippians is likened to that of a race course, the terms used suggesting conflict, endurance and reward. Just as Colossians supplements Ephesians, so II Timothy supplements Philippians, the great thought in II Timothy being endurance with a crown in view. Philemon is an epistle that teaches both doctrinal and practical truth, but it does not specifically contribute to our knowledge so far as the distinctive revelation of the mystery is concerned. Consequently it is usual with us to refer to "The Four Prison Epistles", and the place occupied by II Timothy is best realized by placing these four epistles together as follows:

The Prison Epistles.
Structure showing their Distinctive Doctrine and their Interrelation.

A	EPHESIANS. Seated together.	+The dispensation (iii. 2 and 9 R.V.); +Mystery (iii. 3). +The Church which is His Body (i. 22, 23). +The fullness (i. 23; iv. 10); +Christ the Head (i. 22). +Principality and Power (i. 21).
B	PHILIPPIANS. The Prize.	Try the things that differ (i. 21). Strive (i. 27); Press towards the mark (iii. 14). Prize (iii. 14); Depart (i. 23); Offered (ii. 17).
A	COLOSSIANS. Complete in Him.	+Dispensation (i. 25); +Mystery (i. 26). +The Church which is His Body (i. 24). +Fullness (i. 19); +Christ the Head (ii. 19). +Principalities and Power (i. 16; ii. 10).
B	II TIMOTHY. The Crown.	Rightly dividing the word (ii. 15). Strive (ii. 5); Course finished (iv. 7). Crown (iv. 8); Depart (iv. 6); Offered (iv. 6).

(NOTE: + - None of these key expressions occur in Philippians or II Timothy.
* - Only occurrences in Paul's epistles.]

The reader will not fail to see the perfect balance of these four epistles, and that the two pairs are related to one another as is standing and state. II Timothy differs from all the others in one important particular. The opening verse of Philippians shows a church well-organized and governed by bishops and deacons, but in II Timothy we find a different atmosphere. Instead of rule we have ruin. Instead of a church governed by bishops we have insistence upon individual witness. Consequently while we value the earlier epistles of the mystery for the revelation they bring, we value II Timothy rather for a message which fits the sad, apostate, days in which our lot is cast. By itself II Timothy would present an enigma, but as supplementing the earlier epistles and adjusting some of their practical teaching to meet the change in outward things, it is most valuable.

We trust that our readers will be enabled to enter into the teaching of this epistle and thus find the help and guidance so much needed in these difficult times.

#2. The epistle as a whole, with brief notes upon the discovery of the structure.
pp. 128 - 131

We have seen the place that II Timothy occupies in the revelation of the mystery, its relation to the other prison epistles and that its key thought is a crown. Before the teaching of the epistle in detail can be appreciated it is necessary to obtain a view of it as a whole. When the outstanding items in its development have been noted it will be possible to discern the structure, which, in its turn, will throw into prominence those features which are designedly important and thus subdivide the subject-matter into organic sections instead of the arbitrary and limiting division of chapter and verse.

In conformity with the writer's practice, the epistle opens and closes with salutations and personal references. The introductory note extends from verse 1 to verse 7, while the salutation follows the Amen of iv. 18. The subject-matter of the epistle proper is therefore contained between i. 8 and iv. 18. We read through the first chapter, and are struck with the two notes there sounded; a sad note because Paul and his message seem largely to be forsaken; a jubilant note because, even though all in Asia leave him (i. 15) he was not ashamed, for he knew Whom he had believed. The apostle also reaffirms his threefold office: "Whereunto I am appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles" (i. 11). We note that the word "preacher" is actually "herald" (Gk. kerux).

With these few scattered thoughts in mind, we glance at the close of the epistle. This seems to commence somewhere about iv. 9, where the Apostle leaves the subject of his martyrdom and crown, for more immediate matters. We only read one verse before we find again the same sad theme as in chapter i.: Paul and his message forsaken:

> "Demas hath forsaken me" (iv. 10). We remember that two are named in chapter i. as samples of those who turned away from Paul; "of whom are Phygellus and Hermogenes" (i. 15).

So, too, we discover a recurrence of the same jubilant note as is struck in chapter i.: "Notwithstanding the Lord stood with me" (iv. 17), and that the word "preaching" in verse 17 is kerugma, "heralding". We also notice, that just as the Apostle says concerning Alexander, who did him much evil, "The Lord reward him according to his works" (iv. 14), so in chapter i. he says, concerning Onesiphorus, "The Lord grant him that he may find mercy of the Lord in that day" (i. 18). From these facts it is very evident that i. 8-18 balances iv. 9-18.

Let us now turn our attention to the remainder of the epistle. Chapter ii. opens with a strong insistence upon the distinctive teaching of the Apostle: "The things that thou hast heard of me . . . . . the same commit . . . . ." (ii. 2). Our minds go instinctively to the parallel in the third chapter: "Thou hast fully followed my doctrine . . . . . afflictions, which cane to me at Antioch" (iii. 10, 11). Moreover, we perceive that the outstanding teaching of chapter ii. has to do with suffering and reigning: a good soldier and a crown. In chapters iii. and iv. we have the same emphasis. In both passages we have the word kakopatheo, suffer evil, (ii. 3, 9; iv. 5). In both the "crown" (ii. 5; iv. 8) and on both either a "good" (kalos) soldier, or a "good" (kalos) fight (ii. 3; iv. 7). There is enough here to make us suspect another set of correspondencies. This leaves the second half of chapter ii., and the opening half of chapter iii. to complete the epistle. We note in ii. 15 the word "approved" (dokimos), which is found in negative form in iii. 8, "reprobate" (adokimos). This is encouraging as it forms the first link between these remaining passages. We further note that Hymenaeus and Philetus err concerning the truth, while Jannes and Jambres are given as examples of those who resisted the truth (ii. 17, 18; iii. 8). The rather alarming statement: "They will increase unto more ungodliness" (ii. 16) is tempered by the words "They shall proceed no further (iii. 9).

Again, there is an evident contrast between those captives of the devil who obtain deliverance by "repentance to the acknowledging of the truth" (ii. 25), and those who are "ever learning and never able to come to an acknowledgment of the truth" (iii. 7). Moreover, we see a parallel thought in the injunction of ii. 16, to "shun", with the injunction of iii. 5, "From such turn away". With the material now before us, it is difficult to go far wrong in arriving at the structure of the epistle, which we here set out.

The Structure of II Timothy as a whole.

SEE NEXT PAGE.

As indicated in the sub-heading of this article, the reader has now been shown something of the manner of arriving at the structure of a given passage. This has been done in response to the request of readers who have asked: "How do you arrive at the structure of any given passage?" In order to follow the lead given it is of course necessary to become well acquainted with the book or epistle concerned, so that the memory is stored with its contents and thus able to seize upon corresponding features. On no account must headings be used to obtain the structure. Such a course may sidetrack the seeker and result merely in the production of a pretty structure, not the ascertainment of the truth. We build upon the words of inspiration as instanced in the foregoing structure: kerux, dokimos, kalos, kakopatheo. Here we are on solid rock, and though he fight against our theories the greatest antagonist must acknowledge the facts we have marshalled. In a sense, the seeking of a structure is the practical putting into effect of the command "rightly to divide the Word of Truth". In result it places truth in compartments and facilitates discernment of the development of the argument.

We have now seen II Timothy in its relation to the other prison epistles, as well as the relation of its separate parts to one another and to the epistle as a whole. We are now ready to commence the study of details with the assurance that such preparatory study always brings. While no assurance can alter our utter dependence upon the Lord, the Author of the book, we have learned that the most complete dependence goes hand in hand with the utmost diligence, a statement with which every reader of this article will most heartily agree.

#3. A Short Survey of the Period.
pp. 159 - 166

It is evident from the statements made at the end of the Acts that the "two whole years" during which the Apostle stayed in his own hired house brought his imprisonment to an end. When these two years had expired, Paul must either have been put to death or set at liberty. In two of the epistles written during these two years at Rome, the Apostle appears to be confident that he will obtain his release, although quite prepared to magnify the Lord whether "by life and by death" (Phil. i. 26, ii. 24). Moreover, if we compare the record of his imprisonment during these two years with the circumstances indicated in II Timothy, we shall find evidence to justify the belief that the Apostle was eventually liberated, and then, after an interval in which he sought to confirm the churches in the truth, was again apprehended and executed. In Philippians and Philemon the Apostle anticipates release, but in II Timothy this is by no means the case, and in chapter iv. the Apostle declares: "The time for my departure is at hand" (II Tim. iv. 6-8).

In the former imprisonment Timothy was with the Apostle (Col. i. 1; Phil. i. 1). In the second imprisonment, however, Timothy is obviously absent, and the Apostle writes to urge him to use all diligence and come before winter. In the first imprisonment Demas is with Paul (Col. iv. 14; Philemon 24), but in II Timothy we read that "Demas hath forsaken me" (II Tim. iv. 10). During his first imprisonment we find Mark in attendance upon the Apostle (Col. iv. 10; Philemon 24); in the second imprisonment, however, Timothy is asked to bring Mark with him (II Tim. iv. 11). Before the Apostle's apprehension Trophimus had accompanied him to Jerusalem (Acts xx. 4; xxi. 29); in II Timothy, on the other hand, the Apostle says that he has left Trophimus, at Miletum sick (II Tim. iv. 20). During the Apostle's first imprisonment, his friends visited him, and brought him gifts, and were themselves encouraged to preach the gospel (Acts xxviii. 30, 31; Phil. i. 13-15; iv. 18), but during the second imprisonment he was forsaken, and we read that at his defence "no man stood with him" (II Tim. iv. 16). In II Tim. i. Paul speaks very feelingly of the persistence shown by Onesiphorus in seeking him out very diligently and finding him (II Tim. i. 17)—which is in strong contrast with the conditions of Acts xxviii. 30 where a very free intercourse is suggested. The earlier imprisonment was comparatively mild—Rome was still the impartial ruler, but in the second imprisonment there is severity and Paul suffers "as an evil doer" (II Tim. ii. 9).

Agrippa's statement in Acts xxvi.: "This man doeth nothing worthy of death or of bonds . . . . . This man might have been set at liberty, if he had not appealed to Cæsar" (Acts xxvi. 31, 32) would have been weighty evidence under the conditions obtaining during the earlier period, and it was only Nero himself that kept the Apostle waiting so long for a decision. No such evidence, however, was of any avail when II Timothy was written. The burning of Rome, and the persecution of the Christians, had already changed the whole aspect of things, and Paul now belonged to a hated sect.

When Paul writes to Titus he says in chapter i.: "For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou shouldst set in order the things that are wanting, and ordain elders in every city, as I had appointed thee" (Titus i. 5). There is only one recorded visit to Crete in the Acts, namely in Acts xxvii. 7-13. While it is not altogether impossible for Paul, even as a prisoner, to have founded a church there, yet if one reads the passage in Acts xxvii., with its anxieties about navigation, it seems difficult to believe that those in charge of Paul and the other prisoners would have allowed him enough liberty to have engaged in evangelizing any part of the island. If this be so—and our knowledge of Roman disciple makes it very probable—then the epistle to Titus clearly demands that there should be an interval between the end of the Acts and the second imprisonment.

Further evidence on this point is provided by a passage in I Tim. i. 3: "As I besought thee to abide still at Ephesus, when I went into Macedonia." There is no possibility of fitting this into the record of the Acts. Paul was in Ephesus twice (Acts xviii. 19; xix. 1), but he did not leave Timothy at Ephesus on either of these occasions, and in the latter case he sent him to Macedonia (Acts xix. 22).

Again, in II Tim. iv. 20, Erastus is said to have remained at Corinth, and the tenor of the passage suggests that Paul left Erastus behind, just as he had left Trophimus at Miletum. Now there was no possibility of touching Corinth on the Apostle's first journey to Rome, but on the second journey, going by the land route (which we gather from the testimony of Ignatius was the route the Apostle actually traversed), it would be natural to speak of leaving Erastus behind at Corinth and Trophimus at Miletum (see the map of Paul's journeys). In verse 13 of the same chapter, the Apostle's reference to the cloak left at Troas (II Tim. iv. 13) does not seem a very natural one if we are to imagine an interval of five years; it would seem rather to refer to a visit subsequent to the history of the Acts, and so after the two years' imprisonment.

Whether or not Paul accomplished the desired visit to Spain, we do not know. Clemens Romanus, a contemporary of Paul, on his first epistle to the Corinthians, writes:

> "Paul also obtained the prize of endurance, having seven times borne chains, having been exiled, and having been stoned. After he had preached the gospel both in the East and in the West, he won the noble renown of his faith, having taught righteousness to the whole world, and having come to the limit of the West and borne witness before rulers."

Some have interpreted the phrase "the limit of the West" (To terma tes duseos) as referring to Spain, and there is also an inscription found in Spain which reads as follows:

> NERONI CL. KAIS. AYG. PONT. MAX. OB. PROVINC.
> LATRONIBUS ET HIS QYI NOVAM HVM SYPERSTITION INCYLCAB.
> PVRGATUM.

Here it is implied that in the year A.D.65 or 66, i.e., a little after Paul's release at the end of the Acts, the Christian community was of some size, and suffered in the general persecution under Nero. As Lewin pertinently asks: "If Paul did not preach in Spain, who did?" and the more one ponders the question, in the light of the times and the dangers to be faced, the more difficult the question becomes. There is also a passage in a fragment of the Canon Muratorianus, generally reckoned to date from A.D.170, which reads as follows:

> "Luke to the most excellent Theophilus comprises all those things which were enacted under his presence; so that manifestly declares the martyrdom of Peter and departure of Paul when setting out from the city for Spain, to be matters removed from him."

Eusebius (A.D.296-340) affirms that Paul was released after two years' imprisonment at Rome, that he subsequently preached the Gospel, and that he was later taken as a prisoner to Rome the second time and there suffered martyrdom.

On the evidence available, it seems that we may safely say that Paul was set free in A.D.63 after two years at Rome. On the 19th July A.D. 64 the great fire broke out at Rome, and widespread Christian persecution commenced within a few weeks. Between the Apostle's release in A.D.63 and the outbreak of persecution under Nero in A.D.64 the Apostle would have had time to visit the churches before he was called upon to lay down his life for the Lord he loved.

We see from Titus iii. 12 that Paul intended spending the winter at Nicopolis. When the winter was over, he evidently traversed the district of Dalmatia, for we learn from II Tim. iv. 10 that Titus had gone there. The Apostle lands once more at Troas where he stays for a while with Carpus, but by this time the persecution had spread from Rome into the provinces, and at Troas, where the Apostle had seen the vision of the man of Macedonia, the great messenger to the Gentiles is again apprehended. That Paul was apprehended somewhere in this vicinity is clear from the testimony of Ignatius, a martyr of the first century. Ignatius was taken prisoner in Antioch of Syria, and traveled to Rome via Ephesus. Writing to Ephesus, he says:

> "Ye are the thoroughfare (parodos) of those that are slain for God's sake, the co-religionists of Paul the holy, the martyr, the blessed, in whose footsteps may it be my lot to be found."

Though Paul was probably arrested at Troas, and had been obliged to abandon his cloak and books there, the Proconsul's residence was at Ephesus, and he would naturally appear there for the preliminary trial. It looks as though Alexander the coppersmith who had antagonized Paul some years earlier (Acts xix. 33), and who seems to have been among those who bore witness against at Rome (II Tim. iv. 14) seized the opportunity at Ephesus to wipe out old scores, by accusing the Apostle. By an edict issued by Nero, Christianity had now become a crime. The Proconsul at the time was a man of exemplary character, named Soranus, who himself was put to death for his virtues by Nero in A.D.66 (see Tac. Ann. xvi. 23). Some even think that he was a convert to the faith. Paul was a Roman citizen, and as such could appeal from the tribunal to a Proconsul. Soranus may himself have felt rather like Pliny on a similar occasion in Bithynia, and have remitted the case to the Emperor. However this may be, Paul eventually stands once more for trial before the Emperor, and from the expression, "I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion" (II Tim. iv. 17) it would appear that, upon one of the counts against him, he was absolved. The jurors in the trial would have been provided with tablets, one marked A for Absolvo, another C for condemno and a third

N.L. (non liquet) for adjournment. It was during this period of remand, while awaiting the issue of the remainder of his trial, that the Apostle wrote this second epistle to Timothy—an epistle written in view of martyrdom, and yet triumphant in view of a finished course. It was often the case that a prisoner would be acquitted on some minor count, only to be condemned upon some other indictment. It was during this time that the Apostle, the prisoner of Jesus Christ and "such an one as Paul the aged", suffered from the cold and wanted his cloak. He longed with an intense longing for one more look at his son Timothy's face; he wrote his last instructions for the church on earth, and bequeathed to every member of the one body his blessed example.

As we read through this sacred epistle, and remember the solemn atmosphere in which it was conceived and written, may each of us catch something of its spirit, and be numbered among those of whom it can be said that they "love His appearing" (II Tim. iv. 8).

As every reader will not have easy access to the writings of the ancients, we append one or two extracts from contemporary Latin writers which throw light upon the conditions obtaining during the Apostle's last days.

Tacitus was a celebrated Roman historian, born about A.D.56. Maunder says of him that "no name stands higher for historical reputation". The following extract will give some idea of the outbreak of persecution under Nero, consequent upon the great fire at Rome.

> "To put an end therefore to this report (that he had fired the city) he (Nero) laid the guilt, and inflicted the most cruel punishments upon a set of people who were held in abhorrence for their crimes, and vulgarly called Christians. The founder of that name was Christ, Who suffered death in the reign of Tiberius, under his Procurator Pontius Pilate. This pernicious superstition, thus checked for a while, broke out again and spread, not only over Judæa, where the evil originated, but through Rome also, whither everything bad upon earth finds its way and is practiced. Some who confessed their sect were first seized, and afterwards, by their information, a vast multitude were apprehended, who were convicted, not so much of the crime of burning Rome, as of hatred to mankind. Their sufferings at their execution were aggravated by insult and mockery, for some were disguised in the skins of wild beasts, and worried to death by dogs, some were crucified, and others were wrapped in pitched shirts, and set on fire when the day closed, that they might serve as lights to illuminate the night. Nero lent his own garden for these exhibitions, and exhibited at the same time a mock Circensian (pertaining to the circus) entertainment, being a spectator of the whole in the dress of a charioteer, sometimes mingling with the crowd on foot, and sometimes viewing the spectacle from his car. This conduct made the sufferers pitied, and though they were criminals and deserving the severest punishments, yet they were considered as sacrificed, not so much out of regard to the public good, as to gratify the cruelty of one man" (Tac. Ann. xv. 44).

The court favourite at this time was Tigellinus, who was also Prefect of the Praetorium. Juvenal writes of him:

> "Paint Tigellinus, and your fate will be,
> To burn with brimstone at the martyr's tree,
> While, as the flames consume the living brand,

A crimson rill runs trickling o'er the sand."
(Juv. Sat. 1, v. 155).

Juvenal was born about the beginning of the reign of Claudius and died A.D.128. Maunder says of him that "as the bold and unflinching castigator of vice he stands without rival". Martial, the epigrammatist, who died A.D.104, was at Rome at the time of the persecution of the Christians, and write the following:

"When Mutins dared upon command,
To thrust into the fire his hand,
With shouts the people rent the skies,
To laud the noble sacrifice.
The silly herd! Far braver he,
Who, standing at the martyr's tree,
Can yet defy the rabble's cries,
And say 'I make no sacrifice'."
(Martial Lib. x Ep. 25).

We give below a few notes on the date and place of Paul's death.

Clemens Romanus, the contemporary of Paul, speaks first of Peter's death and then of Paul's, and also alludes to the martyrdom of a multitude of others who died for their faith after the greatest torments. The date indicated here is A.D.66.

Dionysius, Bishop of Corinth (A.D.170), speaking of Peter and Paul, says: "The one as well as the other, having taught as far as Italy, suffered martyrdom at about the same time." Caius the Presbyter (A.D.210) records that Peter and Paul were martyrs at Rome and that their tombs still existed. Tertullian (A.D.190-214) mentions that Paul suffered at Rome, but gives no date. Origen (A.D.210-253) says that Paul died at Rome in the time of Nero. Eusebius (A.D.308-340) places the martyrdom of Paul as A.D.67, in the thirteenth year of Nero. Clinton, however, has shown that the years of Nero's reign are postponed by one year, which brings the Apostle's martyrdom to A.D.66. The Auctor Martyric Pauli, written about A.D.396, gives the date of Paul's death as the 29th June A.D.66. The writer is very circumstantial on this point, and his testimony is important. Sulpitus Severus, who wrote in A.D.400, associates Paul's martyrdom with the year in which the Jewish war broke out (April 19th, A.D.66). Lewin gives the following summary:

"When Paul was set at liberty in the spring of A.D.63, he would fulfil his long-cherished intention of visiting Spain (Rom. xv. 24, 28). But as the Eastern churches, from his long absence, would call loudly for his return, he would spend not more than six months in Spain, and then on the return of Timothy, who had been sent to Philippi, would sail with him to Judæa (Heb. xiii. 23). Paul and Timothy, therefore would start from Judæa in the autumn of A.D.63, and would reach Jerusalem just before winter. Then he would naturally go down to Antioch and there pass the winter of A.D.63-64. In the spring of A.D.64 he visited Ephesus, and leaving Timothy there, passed over himself with Titus to Crete (Titus i. 5), but he did not stay there, but stationing Titus in Crete, and passing to Ephesus, where Timothy was still to remain, sailed to Macedonia (I Tim. i. 3) and fulfilled his promise of visiting Philippi (Phil. ii. 24), and thence, no doubt, went down to Corinth, and then to Nicopolis, where Titus was to join him during the winter of A.D.64-65 (Titus iii. 12). In the spring of A.D.65 he must have passed through Troas (II Tim. iv. 13), and have proceeded thence, probably as a prisoner, to Ephesus, where he was imprisoned (II Tim. i. 18), and was thence forwarded by way to Miletum (II Tim. iv. 20), and Corinth (II Tim. iv. 20) to Rome, and was consequently late in the year at Rome. The winter was the long vacation of the law; and he was therefore brought to trial and was acquitted on the first count (II Tim. iv. 17) in the spring of A.D.66 when the further hearing was adjourned. The first trial would not in the ordinary course come off immediately on his arrival at Rome. The second trial might very well, therefore, take place in May or June A.D.66, and if so, the martyrdom itself may, as stated by tradition, have occurred on the 29th of June A.D.66."

While we agree substantially with this summary, the following points should be noted by way of emendation:

(1) Paul did not write the epistle until after his first defence and acquittal on the first count (II Tim. iv. 16, 17).
(2) After this deliverance, before winter he wrote urging Timothy to endeavour to arrive (II Tim. iv. 21) and to bring the cloak left at Troas (II Tim. iv. 13).
(3) With the Romans, winter began on November 9th. As a letter would take about 6 weeks to reach Timothy, and another 6 weeks would be occupied by Timothy's journey, the Apostle probably arrived in Rome in August A.D.65, instead of "late in the year.

With this small adjustment, the rest is straightforward, and will, we trust, help the reader to follow more clearly the chronology and geography of these critical years. The account should be read in conjunction with a good map of the Apostle's journeys.

#4. Salutation and Remembrance (i. 1 - 7).
pp. 197 - 204

Of the fourteen epistles written by Paul, nine open with a salutation that includes a reference to his apostleship, while five do not. These latter epistles are I and II Thess., Philippians, Philemon and Hebrews. In two of the epistles the title of apostle is joined with that of servant, thus: "Paul a servant of Jesus Christ, called to be an apostle, separated unto the gospel of God" (Rom. i. 1). This opening of the epistle to the Romans also prepares the mind for its contents and the treatment of the theme of the epistle itself. The other epistle is Titus: "Paul a servant of God and an apostle of Jesus Christ" (Titus i. 1).

In Philippians, alone of all his epistles, the Apostle uses the word "servant" without association with apostleship. Moreover, this epistle is addressed not only to the church but to the bishops and deacons, so that we are prepared to find that service, rather than position in the body, is its main theme.

When we reach the epistles to Timothy and Titus, we observe in each features similar to those in the other. This we should expect if both were written at about the same period. Let us notice how these three epistles open.

> "Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the commandment of God our Saviour, and Lord Jesus Christ, which is our hope; unto Timothy, my own son in the faith: Grace, mercy, and peace, from God our Father and Jesus Christ our Lord" (I Tim. i. 1, 2).
>
> "Paul, a servant of God, and an apostle of Jesus Christ, according to the faith of God's elect, and the acknowledging of God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began, but hath in due times manifested His word through preaching, which is committed unto me according to the commandment of God our Saviour; to Titus mine own son after the common faith: Grace, mercy and peace, from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ our Saviour" (Titus i. 1-4).
> Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, according to the promise of life which is in Christ Jesus, to Timothy, my dearly beloved son: Grace, mercy and peace, from God the Father and Christ Jesus our Lord" (II Tim. i. 1, 2).

Clearly what is uppermost in the Apostle's mind is "life". The hope of eternal life which God promised. According to the promise of life. The Lord Jesus Christ which is our hope. Can we not see, that with imprisonment and death so near to him, "the blessed hope" would more and more become a precious reality? The title "God our Saviour", or "Jesus Christ our Saviour", is characteristic of these latter epistles. One other noteworthy feature is the Apostle's introduction of the word "mercy" into his salutations. In this he probably had in view the responsibilities of the ministry that he is passing on to Timothy and Titus.

Paul was an Apostle by the will of God. This he asserts in the opening of five of his epistles, viz., I and II Corinthians, Ephesians, Colossians and II Timothy. The consciousness of this will supported the Apostle in his hours of stress, and when all external evidences were against him, he could fall back upon the fact that he had not sought the Lord, but that the Lord had sought and found him, and all that he was and all that he had accomplished was by the grace of God.

Timothy, in a very special sense, was the Apostle's son in the faith and like father and son they served and suffered together. While they had much in common there were decided differences in their characters. Timothy seems to have been of a very retiring nature, a little inclined to err on the side of asceticism, conscious of his youth, and made continual calls upon the Apostle's care, counsel and help. There was another particular in which they differed and that was in relation to their upbringing. This will be seen more clearly if we first of all set out the structure of the opening section of the epistle, which we now do.

II Timothy i. 1-7. Salutation and Remembrance.

A | 1, 2. SALUTATION.
a | 1. Paul an apostle.
b | 1. Will of God. Promise of life.
a | 2. Timothy. Beloved son.
b | 2. Grace, mercy and peace.
A | 3-7. REMEMBRANCE.

e | 3. Remembrance.
4. Remembrance.
5. Remembrance.

c | 5. Thy grandmother and mother.
e | 6. 7. Remembrance.

It will be observed that Paul places his reference to his "forefathers" in correspondence with that to Timothy's "grandmother and mother", and his own "pure conscience" with the "unfeigned faith that was in Timothy, Lois and Eunice". What is the significance of this? Is it conformity or contrast? We learn that Timothy's mother and grandmother were Christians, for the same faith that dwelt in Timothy at the time of Paul's writing to him had dwelt also in his mother and his grandmother. Could Paul say the same of his progenitors? He could not. Were they not Israelites, Hebrews, Pharisees? Did not Paul's parents send him to the school of Gamaliel? Was he not trained after the "straitest sect" of his religion? What therefore does Paul intend by this reference to his forefathers and to Timothy's parents? Among other things in this hour of their trial he would remind Timothy of any and every advantage and encouragement that would stand him in good stead; of the careful training in the Scriptures he had received from infancy (II Tim. iii. 15); of the example that had been before him all the intervening years since he first received the call to follow the Apostle (Acts xvi.; II Tim. iii. 10, 11); and of the gift that was in him (II Tim. i. 6); even as he had reminded him of the prophecies that went before the bestowal of that gift (I Tim. iv. 14).

But he would not only remind Timothy of all these things, he would also help him if possible by contrast. The word which the A.V. translated "forefathers" is progonoi and is used but once only in the N.T., namely in I Tim. v. 4. To the intelligent and submissive student this fact is enough to settle the Apostle's meaning in the second passage. Timothy could have no idea that Paul spoke of "ancestors" where he exhorts: "Let them learn first to show piety at home and to requite their parents" (I Tim. v. 4), and there is no necessity to depart from the same meaning in II Tim. i. 3. How could Paul say that he served God from his parents, or even from his forefathers, with a pure conscience? On the contrary, his conversion made the most severe and decisive rupture with his upbringing and former manner of life. In I Tim. i. 13 he recounts that he had been a blasphemer, a persecutor and injurious, acting in ignorance and unbelief. In Gal. i. 13, 14, he says:

> "For ye have heard of my conversation in time past in the Jews' religion, how that beyond measure I persecuted the church of God, and wasted it, and profited in the Jews' religion above many my equals in mine own nation, being more exceedingly zealous of the traditions of my fathers."

Did Paul continue in this "Jews' religion"? Was he still an exceeding zealot for the "traditions of his fathers"? We know he was not. Phil. iii. 1-9 provides a most complete refutation of such an idea. Before Agrippa the Apostle, in answering for himself the charges laid against him, said:

> "My manner of life from my youth, which was at the first among mine own nation at Jerusalem, know all the Jews, which knew me from the beginning, if they would testify, that after the straitest sect of our religion I lived a Pharisee" (Acts xxvi. 4, 5).

A little earlier, before Felix, he had said,

> "But this I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and in the prophets" (Acts xxiv. 14).

Lastly, in Acts xxiii. 1, Paul opened his defence with the words:

> "Men and brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before God until this day."

It is evident that Paul's point of view was not that of the Pharisee or the traditionalist of his nation. He had most certainly left the religion of his parents, but his contention was that he had not left the God of his fathers; that he still believed all that the law and prophets taught, and that though it was now in a way that his contemporaries called "heresy" it was "so" that he worshipped the God of his fathers.

We must look more closely therefore at II Tim. i. 3, for, on the surface, this fact does not there appear. We note that the Apostle uses the word apo, "from", when he says "from my forefathers". This preposition, which is usually translated "from", carries with it the idea of (a) source or (b) severance, that is, either "from" or "away from". In II Tim. i. 1 we have the word in composition, "apostle", meaning one sent from another and combining the idea of "source" with "severance", the apostolic commission having been derived entirely from the Lord, though exercised during the period of the Lord's absence from the earth. In the second verse apo is used in the benediction "Grace, mercy and peace from God the Father". Here "source" is most evidently the meaning of the preposition.

We find apo in combination in II Tim. i. 15, where severance is uppermost; "All in Asia be turned away from me." So also in ii. 19 and 21, "depart from" and "purge from". In iii. 15 the expression "from a child" uses the idea of "distance", as transferred to time, as we would say "ever since you were a child". In iv. 4 and 18, we have once more the idea of severance uppermost: "They shall turn away their ears from the truth"; "The Lord shall deliver me from every evil work."

It is therefore clear from the usage of the word that while "from" may sometimes refer to source, yet its primary meaning is severance, "away from". We, accordingly, understand the Apostle to say, that although he now worshipped and served God away from his parents and all their traditions, and even though such worship was called by his own people "heresy", he nevertheless had a pure conscience in so doing.

It is possible that Timothy had sometimes bemoaned the fact, that whereas Paul knew the exact spot of earth where he passed from death unto life, he, Timothy, could never remember the time when he did not believe the gospel of grace. If this were so, the Apostle would seek to rob these so-called "experiences" of their usurpation. We remember reading, some years ago, a booklet by Ada Habershon entitled "How a river ought to flow". It was written to break down this very idea that one person's experience is either superior to, or is to be envied above, another's. In this booklet the rivers were supposed to have convened a meeting in order to settle once and for ever the question, "How ought a river to flow?" The first speaker was the Nile, who maintained that no river could be said to be fulfilling its obligation unless it deposited annually a good thick layer of mud on the country along its banks. At this the river Thames rose to object, saying that whenever he had done such a thing there had arisen great protest from the inhabitants of the adjacent land. The Rhine then arose with the air of an aristocrat and put it to the meeting that no river was worthy of the name that did not arise in a glacier. Eventually the meeting came to the conclusion that each river must flow as the great Creator planned, and no river could set up itself as being necessarily ideal or better in its characteristics than another.

The editor of this magazine had no such upbringing as that of Timothy. His early days were lived in ignorance of either God or His Word. In his mind's eye he can still see the exact spot in the Strand, London, where he passed from death unto life. In all this he can most surely see the hand of the Lord, for while he lost all the gracious influences of a Christian home from childhood, and experienced something of the rough ways of the world, yet he was spared the bondage of traditional orthodoxy, and was therefore perhaps more ready than many to "search and see" when the appointed time arrived. Whichever way a believer has come, he may depend upon it that it is one that can be of great service to him in his after life and work. Said Paul, I had to be wrenched away from all my past, but you, Timothy, had no such drastic treatment. You have just grown up in the truth, and, in the same way, as I have a pure conscience in these matters, so you have an unfeigned faith. Let us pray that both conscience and faith may be kept pure and unfeigned, for the time is at hand, Timothy, when I, Paul, will have to pass through the severest of tests, and you, Timothy, will be called upon to follow in the footsteps of a despised and hated servant of the Lord.

Then comes the human touch that so characterizes the Apostle's writings (see the series "The self-drawn portrait of the Apostle Paul"). He assures Timothy of his unceasing "remembrance". He "remembers" his faith. He puts him in "remembrance" of the gift he had received. He was greatly desirous of seeing Timothy once more before the end, and twice urges him to be diligent in his endeavour to reach Rome before he lays down his life for Christ's sake. He remembers Timothy's tears, evidently at their last parting, and he would rather take with him a remembrance that was "joyous".

Timothy had been saved and equipped during the transitional period of the Acts, and was one of the special ministers given by the ascended Lord to the Church "for the re-adjusting of the saints" (Eph. iv. 11, 12). This gift Timothy must now stir up and use, for the Apostle's work was done, but Timothy was to do the work of an evangelist, and make full proof of his ministry. The words "stir up" bring before us the figure of a low-burning fire which once more bursts into flame after the ashes have been raked and air admitted.

The concluding words of the opening passage of this Epistle to Timothy are solemn in their implication.

> "For God hath not given unto us the spirit of fear; but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind" (II Tim. i. 7).

God has given us neither the spirit of doulias nor deilias, neither "bondage" (Rom. viii. 15) nor "fear" (II Tim. i. 7). The word deilias means more than timidity; it has the sense of cowardice. In Rev. xxi. 8, the word is used in a dreadful context, and indicates an apostate. It is easy for us to-day to sit in judgment on Timothy, but acquaintance with the terrors of the times, of which a brief note is given on pages 159-166, will turn censure into prayer lest we should be found wanting in far easier circumstances. It does not call for great courage for us to affirm our belief in the deity of the Lord Jesus Christ, but under Nero's laws of "impiety", so to believe and teach meant death. The Apostle himself asked for prayer on his own behalf that he might open his mouth "boldly" as he "ought", and Timothy would understand that the note of severity that comes with the use of this word "fear" was uttered by one whose very love caused him the deeper anxiety for his son in the faith. We desire the best for our children, but over and above all things our constant prayer is for their unanswering loyalty to the Lord. So, too, he who, for Christ's sake, had neither wife, nor child, nor home, knew something of a father's heart, in being made all things to all men. God's gift to Timothy is referred to by the Apostle both negatively and positively. Negatively, it is not a spirit of fear. Positively, it is a spirit of power, of love, and of soundness of mind. The power, as Paul has taught in Ephesians, is that power which is associated with the risen Christ (Eph. i. 19, 20; iii. 7; iii. 20). "Soundness of mind" is the translation of sophronismos, derived from sozo, "to save", and phren, "the mind", in the sense of "the bent". God, said Paul, has given us a new "bent" which is the outcome of salvation.

Sophronizo is translated in Titus ii. 4 "teach . . . . . to be sober", the object being to counteract the dreadful slackness of morals that covered the earth with its darkness, and to influence the minds of the young women to the Christian love of home, husband and family. The word does not means to "teach" as one does doctrine.

Sophroneo means a sound, sane, mind as opposed to distraction (Mark v. 15). It is evident that the Apostle had the demoniac in mind, for in II Tim. iii. 1 he uses the same word to denote the "perilous" times that Matthew uses to describe the poor maniacs who were so “fierce” (Matt. viii. 28). The times that are upon us, said the Apostle, are “fierce”, “perilous”, the effect of the “doctrine of demons” (I Tim. iv. 1) just as surely as was manifest in the demon-possessed men who came into contact with the Lord. He uses the same word, sophroneo (“be sober”), in II Cor. v. 13 in contrast with “beside ourselves”. The times were such that only the grace of God in abundant measure could prevent the believer from being “beside himself” as he contemplated the fate that Rome reserved for those who believed the truth.

Sophonos occurs in Titus ii. 12, where it is translated “soberly”; the state of mind of one who looks for that blessed hope and the appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ. Sophron, “sober”, was one of the qualifications for the office of a bishop (I Tim. iii. 2; Titus i. 8), and Timothy could not be “an example to the believers” (I Tim. iv. 12) without it.

Throughout all the stress and strain of life and witness, in face of all the deadly perils that threatened and drew ever nearer, the blessed fact of salvation (so, the root word) acted as a steadying, reassuring consciousness. It enable Paul to stand unashamed even though forsaken, and Paul greatly desired that his own son and successor in the faith and the ministry should have this holy boldness, this power, this love, this sanity, that flowed from a consciousness of sins forgiven, of a Saviour in glory, of a blessed hope.

Waiting on the Lord

#1. "Blessed", "good" and "unashamed".

p. 32

> "Wait on the Lord: be of good courage, and He shall strengthen thine heart: wait, I say, on the Lord" (Psa. xxvii. 14).

One of the characteristics of fallen human nature is its impatience, its over-haste, its inability to wait. Perhaps the loss of immortality, and the consciousness of the brevity of life and the enormous amount of work that lies ahead, may account for this trait. Moreover, impatience is not a fault that is limited to the ungodly; it is also a common failing among the redeemed.

Scripture often calls upon the believer to "wait", and there are nineteen different words thus translated in the Old and New Testaments. We hope to touch upon some of them in these short articles, and trust that our brief studies may be blessed of God and used by Him to provide help and encouragement.

"Blessing" is promised in Isa. xxx. 18 to him that waits for the Lord, while in Isa. xl. 31 we read that "they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength". We also read in Isa. xlix. 23: "They shall not be ashamed that wait for Me", and in Lam. iii. 25: "The Lord is good unto them that wait for Him, to the soul that seeketh Him."

We close this brief paragraph with the wonderful words of Lam. iii. 26:

> "It is good that a man should both hope and quietly wait for the salvation of the Lord."

As opportunity occurs, we hope to use some such small space as this paragraph occupies, in showing the many-sidedness of this blessed grace of "waiting".

#2. The waiting upon God that is silent, restful and uncomplaining.
pp. 131, 132

The passage to which we would draw the reader's attention in the present article is found in Psalm lxii. 1:

> "Truly my soul waiteth upon God."

Dumiyyah, the word translated "wait" here, conveys the idea of silence. In the fifth verse of the same Psalm we read:

> "My soul, wait thou only upon Him."

Here again the word (damam) is, literally, "to be silent".

The Psalmist uses this same word in other places, but it is often rendered differently in the A.V. For example, in the well-known words of Psalm xxxvii. 7: "Rest in the Lord and wait patiently for Him", the word for "rest" is again damam, "be silent", as in Psalm lxii. The word is also used in Lam. iii. 26, where it is translated "quietly wait".

In Job iv. 16 we read: "There was silence and I heard a voice."

Perhaps we hear so little and receive such scant answers to our prayers, because, in the Lord's presence, we are not sufficiently silent.

This "silence", or "quiet waiting", may imply something more, for in Lam. iii. 27-33, immediately following the verse quoted above, we read:

> "It is good for a man to bear the yoke in his youth. He sitteth alone and keepeth silence (damam) because he hath borne it upon him. He putteth his mouth in the dust; if so there may be hope. He giveth his cheek to him that smiteth him; he is filled full with reproach. For the Lord will not cast off for ever; but though He cause grief, yet will He have compassion according to the multitude of His mercies. For He does not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men" (Lam. iii. 27-33).

Here the man of God is silent. He is full of "reproach", certainly, but his mouth is not full of reproaches as he enters into the Divine Presence.

In Psalm lxxxiii. we read: "Keep not Thou silence, O God, hold not Thy peace, and be not still" (Psa. lxxxiii. 1).

Let us be ourselves more silent, that He may speak. Let us be silent in patient expectancy. Let us be silent in our resting in the Lord, so that we may be able to say: "Truly my soul is silent to God."

War in Heaven (An Analogy).

#1. The Field Surveyed.
pp. 167, 168

In this opening article we must explain the general scope of the series, and the object we have in view.

Behind all the enmity that belongs to the world of human history, lies the greater and deeper enmity that exists in the spiritual world. In these studies we shall attempt to survey this conflict of the ages, and seek to discover the respective goals that the conflicting parties have in view. By examining Israel's history we shall obtain many sidelights on our subject, and we shall discover in the demands made upon the loyal citizens of an earthly kingdom, something analogous to the demands made by the Captain of our salvation. On the negative side, we shall learn a good deal about the character of the great Enemy by studying the careers of such men as Pharaoh, Abimelech, Saul, Nebuchadnezzar and Sennacherib. We shall also receive help by considering the events associated with the Exodus from Egypt, the Jordan, Jericho, the conquest under Joshua, and the overcoming record of Caleb. Furthermore, we shall perceive the relation which the three great callings bear to this conflict of the ages, and particularly that of the dispensation of the Mystery.

It will also be necessary to examine "the weapons of our warfare", both defensive and offensive, and we must also learn with whom we should and should not fight. Moreover, the nature of the final victory must be included in our survey, as well as an understanding of the essential nature of scriptural peace. There will also be many pointed lessons to be learnt from the conditions, limitations and demands imposed upon the world by reason of the present conflict, as compared with the corresponding conditions, limitations and demands that concern "the good soldier of Jesus Christ".

If we can accomplish this purpose, we shall feel that in some degree, however small, we have "redeemed the time" and turned the present distress to our spiritual advantage. We have adopted the words of Rev. xii. 7 as the title of the series, because we feel that this "war in heaven", in which Michael and his angels fought against the Devil and his angels, was reflected in the conflict that raged upon the earth.

In the Book of Kings, when the servant of the man of God saw the host of chariots and horses that encompassed the city, he cried: "Alas, my master! how shall we do?" (II Kings vi. 15). The young man saw nothing beyond the encompassing host of Syrians, but his master, Elisha, saw the heavenly host as well, and he replies: "Fear not: For they that be with us are more than they that are with them" (II Kings vi. 16). Whether this statement would have been received by the young man, without proof or argument we do not know. We read, however, that Elisha "prayed", saying, "Lord, I pray thee, open his eyes that he may see", and as a result: "He saw: and behold the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha" (II Kings vi. 17).

There is an analogy, we believe, between earthly and heavenly warfare, and if the Lord will open our eyes to see, we too shall be able to perceive this most instructive parallel. Before, however, we can appreciate this analogy and draw useful lessons from the conditions imposed upon us by the present conflict, it will be necessary to become acquainted with the teaching of Scripture regarding the spiritual warfare that is going on continuously, whether the conditions at the time are those of "peace" or "war". This, then, must be our first concern. After we have surveyed the conflict of the ages, and perceived something of its character, we can then make our comparisons profitably. For the moment, the analogy must wait while we acquaint ourselves with the teaching of Scripture. It is clear from Scripture that man was not the originator of the enmity and strife that have invaded his domain, and our first quest must be to discover who are the chief antagonists in that vast conflict in which he is involved.

Let these opening word, then, suffice as an introduction to this great theme, and as an indication of the line of study we shall hope to pursue. We sincerely trust that, as a result of becoming more intimately acquainted with the nature, conditions, and end of this great spiritual conflict, the reader will be the better fitted "to stand in the evil day", and will be comforted and helped during the days of darkness that have descended upon the warring nations.

#2. "The Enemy."
pp. 204 - 206

We meet references to an "enemy" in one form or another in thirty out of the thirty-nine books of the English Old Testament, and in thirteen of the twenty-seven books of the New Testament. If we were to widen the scope to include all references to enmity, strife, contentions, war, battle, arms and armour, we should have to include a still larger proportion of the books of both Testament.

There is one enemy however who stands out above all others, and who antedates them all: "The enemy . . . . . is the devil" (Matt. xiii. 39). He is called: "That old (or ancient) serpent, called the Devil, and Satan" (Rev. xii. 9 and xx. 2). The "Devil" of the New Testament is the "Satan" of the Old Testament, and both are titles of one who is known as "The ancient Serpent". Now the "serpent" is the one that beguiled Eve in the garden of Eden (II Cor. xi. 3), and consequently must have come into the present creation, and have originally belonged to the earlier creation, which, we shall discover, had passed away before the advent of that creation which had been pronounced "very good".

We learn from the testimony of the Lord Himself, that the devil was "a murderer" from the beginning and that he "abode not in the truth" (John viii. 44). "He is a liar and the father of it" (John viii. 44). Deceit, wiles, craftiness, the subtlety of the serpent, combined with the ferocity of a roaring lion, and the deceptive semblance of an angel of light, go to make up his fell equipment for the dreadful strife.

Satan is represented as a great dignitary, so much so that even Michael durst not bring against him "a railing accusation" (Jude 9). He is called "The prince of this world", "the prince of the power of the air", and "The god of this age". Beneath his control are his "angels" (Rev. xii. 7), and he is represented as having fallen from heaven, dragging with him "a third part of the stars" (Rev. xii. 4), which in the book of the Revelation, represent "angels" (Rev. i. 20).

At the time of our Lord's advent, the kingdoms of this world and the glory of them were under the sway of Satan (Luke iv. 6, 7); and the offer to transfer this sovereignty to the Saviour for one act of "worship" reveals the heart of the dread antagonism which runs throughout the scriptural record. Together with other "sons of God", Satan had access to the throne of God and exercised a terrible and extensive power over man and his affairs, as the record of Job reveals.

As it is unthinkable that God, Who cannot look upon iniquity, and Whose very essence is holiness, could have created the murderer and liar that we know Satan had become "from the beginning", some explanation must be sought of the existence and presence of such a being acting as the tempter in the garden of Eden. The naming of that garden places in our hands the key, for the prophet Ezekiel reveals a being who was "perfect" from the day in which he was created, yet in whom, at length, "iniquity" had been found. This being is described as having been "full of wisdom and perfect in beauty", and, what is to the point for our present quest, he had "been in Eden the garden of God" (Ezek. xxviii. 11-15). No other created being beside Adam and Eve and the serpent is recorded as having "been in Eden, the garden of God". This "servant", or nachash, as the Hebrew word is, means "The shining one", and the description of Ezek. xxviii. 13 fully bears this out. Moreover, in structural correspondence and directly related to the work of the serpent in Gen. iii., are placed the "Cherubim", and a glance at Ezek. xxviii. 16 will show that this title once belonged to Satan, for in Ezek. xxviii. 16 he is addressed as the "covering cherub".

In II Pet. iii. 5 and 6 it is intimated that before the present Adamic world, which was "created and made" in six days, with special reference to mankind, there had been another "world", which had passed away. This is indicated in Gen. i. 2 where we meet with chaos and darkness over the earth. To this period the Apostle refers in Eph. i. 4, when he speaks of "the foundation" of the world, and the world katabole and its cognates, mean an "overthrow".

Man therefore has never known what it is to live in a world really at peace. A state of war already existed, before Adam was created, and this head of a new race was immediately the subject of attack, temptation and deceit, and overthrown. When we look at a little child, born in a world already at war, we are but looking at a faint picture of all mankind. War goes on around him, intrudes into his home, his heart and his whole being. Sin and death already were holding sway over the earth, before he commenced his brief career. The unsaved man is often the unconscious tool of the great adversary, and, should he step for a moment outside of his position “in Christ”, the believer, too, is liable to attack. But “we are not ignorant of his devices”, wrote the Apostle, and if these articles open the eyes of any to the nature of both the enemy himself, and of the conflict in which we are engaged, we shall not have laboured in vain.

DEAR FRIENDS IN CHRIST,

It is three years since we wrote a Foreword to a completed Volume: three years of war, destruction and anxiety, yet three years of wonderful preservation, guidance and provision. A passage of Scripture that comes vividly to mind in this connection is that of Acts xxvi. 22:

> "Having therefore obtained help of God, I continue unto this day, witnessing . . . . ."

Although the "help" was "of God", Paul acknowledged that it had been mediated through many willing hands and hearts. The word "help" in this passage is a military term and means an auxiliary or reserve ready to hand when needed.

Without this "help of God" The Berean Expositor would never have weathered the storm, and our thanks go out, under God, to the willing and ready "help" extended to us in our hour of need. Without this "help of God" the Chapel of the Opened Book would never have been found, nor would the removal from the country to stricken London have been attempted, or have been possible.

In 1941 we wrote:

> ". . . . . we have confidence that in so far as The Berean Expositor is in line with the will of the Lord, so we may expect that these precious promises will be once more fulfilled in our experience."

This confidence has been honoured beyond our expectation. We asked for bare continuance, and He has led us through fire and water and has brought us out "into a wealthy place" (Psa. lxvi. 12).

We commend the witness to the prayers and the fellowship of all who value the Word and its "right division", and who realize what a door of opportunity may be opening to us all with the coming year.

Yours for Christ and His Word,

Our Witness.
pp. 97 - 99

> "While valuing the fellowship of like-minded believers, THE BEREAN EXPOSITOR will continue untrammeled. It is the organ of no society, it is the property of no sect, it is the exponent of no creed. It is a searcher of Scripture."

THE BEREAN EXPOSITOR was first published in February, 1909, and five years later, namely in 1914, also in June, 1927, the words quoted above were included in the Foreword to the reprints of Volume I. It is evident as we read these words, that whilst fellowship is valued, and perhaps greatly needed, for no consideration would that fellowship be purchased at the price of faithfulness. Neither THE BEREAN EXPOSITOR nor the Editor could be deflected from the set purpose which called the Witness into being. To-day in 1943, The Berean Expository Witness is still untrammeled, its principal exponent calls no man Master, no Council decides what shall be expounded and what shall not. To what "Society" does THE BEREAN EXPOSITOR belong to-day? Of what "Sect" is it the mouthpiece? What "Creed" finds it an exponent?

In 1921, after many set-backs resulting from the "Great War", a modest notice appeared in the March number (Volume XI, page 48).

> "Good-Friday, 25th March.—A meeting conducted by the Editor will (D.V.) be held at 7p.m. in the Small Class-room at ECCLESTON HALL, near Victoria Station, London. Those attending should knock at the far door in Eccleston Place."

As an outcome of this meeting, the regular Witness in London was recommenced, although we no longer had to "knock at the far door" to gain admittance. Following the growth of the Witness and consequent opposition, it became necessary in 1922 (Volume XII, page 45) to publish a short article entitled: "The Fear of Forming a Sect", to meet some unfounded rumours that were spoiling this opportunity to obey the Lord and His Word. This article opened as follows:

> "Some of the Lord's people who feel the need of fellowship with other fellow-members have expressed hesitation to put their desires into operation, fearing that by so doing they would be forming 'another Sect'. It is well to retain a tender conscience over all our actions, but at the same time we must not allow an unscriptural fancy to prevent us fulfilling what may be a scriptural desire."
>
> "Hairesis = sect, is derived from haireomai = to chose (Phil. i. 22; II Thess ii. 13; Heb. xi. 25). The scriptural idea of a sect is 'self-choice', and is a work of the flesh (Gal. v. 20; I Cor. xi. 19 heresies). A company of believers seeking to manifest their union with one another and with the risen Lord cannot be guilty of forming 'another sect' by so doing. Should unscriptural practices, leaders, or ideas be allowed, these departures would merit the undesired title, and it is these 'self-choosings' we must shun."

The meetings thus criticized continued, and their number grew, yet in 1924 we were as far as ever from forming a "Sect", for the Foreword written for Volume XIV will be found this reassertion of freedom:

"We are happy to say concerning The Berean Expositor exactly the same as we said ten years ago, viz., that it is:--

The organ of NO SOCIETY,
The property of NO SECT,
The exponent of NO CREED."

The fear express in 1921/1922 had not materialized even though the opportunities increased.

In 1927 a new note was struck, for the Foreword of that year says:

"Now that the long period of pioneering has in measure passed," and although this might have caused in some that recurring fear, no word reached us, and the change as it took place made no difference in the basic attitude of the Witness, the change being only of method and opportunity.

In the notice pages of that year we not only find meetings arranged in many parts of the country, but an indication of the Editor's visit to Canada to make known the truth entrusted. This involved organization both at home and abroad, funds had to be handled and accounted for, but still that "Sect" failed to materialize, neither did the Editor become "involved" or "fettered". Further, in the same year "Agents", who out of love for the truth stocked our literature and supplied local orders in Canada, U.S.A. and Australia, made their appearance on the notice pages, and still we remained "untrammeled". After Volume XIX, notices appeared on the cover of the issues, and ceased to be included in the bound volumes, but the witness spread, and visits were made to France and to Holland in the interest of the truth, and articles and pamphlets were translated into French and Spanish, but still no adverse change in the testimony.

For a period following the outbreak of War in 1939 itinerant witness was suspended, and only by the most valiant efforts of a few friends was THE BEREAN EXPOSITOR itself saved from eclipse. No "Sect" came to its rescue, no Society stirred a finger; it was saved through the grace of God and the fellowship of those who loved the truth.

At last it was borne in upon the minds of a few that the time had come to again pick up the threads, and prepare for the "peace" it is hoped will soon dawn. Just as in 1927 we struck a new note, so we strike one again in 1943. Just as, however, that new note in 1927 saw no change in our basis or our freedom, so this new note leaves us exactly in the same position. To quote from the Circular Letter dated March, 1943, in regard to the new work planned:

" . . . . . in short, the consolidation and extension of the work attempted during the last 30 years or so."

The only difference contemplated is one of procedure. In the past the Editor has traveled miles, preaching and teaching in halls and meeting-places hired or owned by friends on the spot; he now proposes to conserve energy and—apart from occasional visits to other Centres—preach and teach the same truths in a hall in London to be provided by the fellowship of friends having the Witness at heart. By report it is evident that the Editor has a teaching ministry, and the greater proportion of those who attend these meetings are those who are teaching others or preachers of the Word themselves. We shall but "consolidate and extend" this teaching ministry if we can assemble faithful men who shall be able to teach others also and entrust to them those wonderful doctrines that we ourselves have received. For those who cannot attend personally, a Correspondence Course is in preparation, but whether the teaching be given orally at a hall of our own or through the post, there can be no possibility of "forming a Sect".

In the present day a "Sect" is a company of Christians who are formed into a church, a society, or an assembly, the membership of which is conditional upon the acceptance of some doctrine or practice that must necessarily exclude some acknowledged believers from fellowship.

Every reader of THE BEREAN EXPOSITOR knows that never has he or she been invited to "join" anything; that there is nothing to join, no membership, no creed, no conditions. When any or all of these marks are discernible in our pages, plans or appeals, then it will be time to sound the alarm. Until these symptoms appear, and keeping in mind the history of the past 30 years, is it not a call for praise, that after so long a witness, instead of those most intimately concerned speaking of "retiring", they are preparing to serve more strenuously than ever, prompted by the desire to "finish" their course, and to pass on the trust while time and strength permit?

Does this not appeal to you? If you cannot actively encourage such a work, we ask, for the truth's sake, that you will not (maybe unwittingly) hinder it.

The Pearl of Parables.

#1. The Parable of the Father (Luke xv. 11-32).

p. 205

The parable of the Prodigal Son has been called the pearl of parables. While it may be unwise to attempt comparisons between passages in Holy Writ, there is, nevertheless, in this parable, great appeal to the heart and much to move the feelings as one follows the progress of the prodigal both upon his disastrous outward journey, and during his return to love and restoration.

It is not by accident that this parable is recorded by Luke, for it is consonant with his practice of choosing always the evangelical aspect of his subject. Where Matthew's narrative is of the birth at Bethlehem of the "King", Luke delights to tell the good tidings of the birth of a "Saviour". Matthew of course pursues his definite purpose, for he proclaims the King and the kingdom, but Luke, the right-hand man of the apostle Paul, has a different object in view. It is he alone who traces the genealogy of Christ to God through Adam and, again, it is he alone who records the parable of "The Good Samaritan", a parable that could have no place in the Gospel of the Publican who went down to his house "justified" rather than the Pharisee; a blessed anticipation of the doctrine of Romans and of the confession of Phil. iii. 1-9.

Perhaps the affection in which this parable has ever been held is because it is the parable of the FATHER, a word that is used twelve times in the narrative. It was the mission of Christ to reveal the Father:

> "No man hath seen God at any time, the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him" (John i. 18).

He declared Him in His life, for the Son of God is the "express image of His Person". His declaration to the enquiring disciples was: "He that hath seen Me, hath seen the Father"; He declared Him in His gospel, in His discourses and in His parables, and here, in the parable of the Prodigal Son, we may learn something of the nature and character of Him to Whom we cry, "Abba, Father".

TRUST.

#1. A Sevenfold Aspect.
pp. 221, 222

The body of truth that constitutes the ground of our calling is called "The Faith", and the one condition for the obtaining of salvation, justification or life is "faith", and in a world where all was perfect and ideal "faith" and "trust" would be but two sides of one state or attitude. In the everyday outworking of truth, however, honesty compels us to admit that a person may be a believer and be saved by grace, yet at the same time not always and completely trusting the Lord. As an illustration, Abraham "believed" in the Lord and his faith was counted for righteousness—yet in spite of this we find him in Gen. xx. 1-18 resorting to the same deceitful measures that he had previously employed regarding Sarah and the Egyptians (Gen. xii. 10-20). "Trust", therefore, is not always commensurate with "faith", although, as we have said, most certainly it should be.

In moments of great peril, or after long testing and trial, the believer sometimes echoes the words of David, "I shall now perish one day by the hand of Saul" (I Sam. xxviii. 1), yet both David and the believer today would, at the same time and with the same breath, maintain the inspiration of God's Word and His utter and eternal faithfulness. At the time of writing this series of short articles peril is on every hand, and it is with a view to strengthen faith, in its intimate and personal sense of committal or "trust", that these words are written.

In the absence of specific scriptural definition of "trust", there is no surer way of arriving at an understanding of the term than an examination of the different words translated by it and of the way in which these are used. There are seven words used in the O.T. Scriptures which have been translated "trust", and observance of their peculiar meanings will form the basis of this first article of the series.

The Seven Words translated "Trust" in the O.T.

We should hardly think of going to the record of Israel's unbelief and murmuring in Numb. xi. to discover the first meaning of "trust", but in it mention is made of the "melons" which they ate in Egypt, and in the original the name of this fruit is "The Clinger", by reason of its manner of growth, and it is this word that provides the most important of the seven that are translated "trust": "They that know Thy name will put their trust in (or cling to) Thee" (Psa. ix. 10). About ninety of the occurrences of the word in the O.T. are translations of this word.

The second word is more obvious; it is "shelter" or "refuge", as in the passage: "Thou hast been a shelter for me" (Psa. lxi. 3), or, "God is our refuge and strength"

(Psa. xlvi. 1). This provides the word translated "trust" in over thirty occurrences, as, for example, "He is a buckler to all them that trust in Him" (II Sam. xxii. 31). "Trust" therefore may "cling", in conscious weakness, or "shelter", in time of stress.

Of the three examples that follow each occurs but once and is translated "trust", but they supply important aspects of meaning that are necessary to the complete conception of "trust".

The idea of "staying" oneself upon someone underlies the word used by Elihu, when he said to Job: "Judgment is before Him: therefore trust thou in Him" (Job xxxv. 14).

In that dread experience recorded in Psa. xxii., the Psalm of the Cross, the word translated "trust" means "To roll on", and is used in Gen. xxix. 3, where it speaks of rolling a stone from the mouth of a well. This is the word chosen as a taunt by the wicked when they said, "He trusted on the Lord that He would deliver him" (Psa. xxii. 8).

The next example is taken from the Aramaic, or Chaldee, language, and is found in Nebuchadnezzar's frank utterance after the deliverance of the three from the furnace. The word used by that great king primarily means "To rely on", and is found in Dan. iii. 28, where he is recorded as saying of God, "Who hath sent his angel and delivered His servants that trusted in Him".

Two more words remain to complete the set.

The word "Amen" is known to every believer, and is the Hebrew word for "truth" and "faithfulness". It occurs five times in the form of "trust", but refers always to a misplaced trust or a trust withheld: "Behold He put no trust in His servants" (Job iv. 18).

And, lastly, the seventh word occurs in that moving utterance of Job when he said, "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him", and introduces into the idea of trusting the thought of "waiting" and "hoping".

Here then is a sevenfold presentation of the idea embodied in the words "To trust". It means To cling, To find shelter, To stay upon, To roll upon, To rely on, To put faith in, and To wait with hope.

Without further exposition, here, in this sevenfold concept of "Trust", is a message for the tired and tested believer in these days. Here is a trust that has as many aspects as there are days of the week. Here is a trust for all times and all occasions, and we therefore commend to the reader's prayerful meditation this initial study.

A Tribute to Philip Dive.
p. 240

At a critical moment in the history of our Witness, our colleague Mr. Philip Dive undertook the somewhat onerous duties connected with the publications forming an integral part of our work, and since July, 1939—years marked by enemy action and governmental restrictions—he has maintained contact with our readers, not only in the execution of orders, but in a ministry of correspondence peculiarly his own.

He now passes on these duties to Mr. L. F. Green, B.Sc., A.R.I.C., whose kindly interest in 1942 enabled the recommencement of the London Witness in the buildings of the Centenary Memorial Sunday School, Kennington.

In the name of all readers we pay a tribute of great appreciation of Mr. Dive's devoted services, and extend a warm welcome to our new Honorary Publications Secretary, knowing that nothing would please him better than to be "snowed under" with your orders for 1945. The Berean Expositor is your Magazine; it lives only by fellowship, which both our retiring and incoming Secretaries manifest in so large a measure, and which should provoke us all to emulation.

We are thankful that our friend Mr. Dive is still assisting the work as a Trustee and member of Council of the Central Movement.

The Acts of the Apostles.

#48. From Jerusalem to Rome (xxii. 1 - xxviii. 22).
The section as a whole, and Paul's opening speech (xxii. 1 - 22).
pp. 1 - 5

With this speech, made by Paul to the assembled throng in the Temple area, we commence the great section of the Acts which leads from Jerusalem to Rome; to the rejection of Israel and the suspension of their hope; to the prison ministry of the Apostle and to the revelation of the Mystery. While, therefore, the whole record of the Acts—being Scripture, and dealing as it does with the opening years of Christian testimony—must be of the greatest importance to all believers, this closing portion is of particular interest to all those who, by grace, realize the change of dispensation with which this imprisonment of Paul is associated.

Before we examine the Apostle's speech, we must obtain a view of the section as a whole (Acts xxii. - xxviii.). We discover that it preserves the record of several of Paul's speeches, not only to the Jews at Jerusalem, as in the opening section, but also to the Jews at Rome, in the closing section, and in between these two we have recorded the utterances before the two Roman Governors, Felix and Festus, and also the defence before King Agrippa.

The structure reveals the organic oneness of this great section. We observe two recurring items,

(1) A pointed reference to hope (Acts xxiii. 6; xxiv. 15; xxvi. 6, 7; xxviii. 20).
(2) A testimony to the Apostle's innocence (Acts xxiii. 29; xxv. 11, 25; xxvi. 31; xxviii. 18).

Moreover, in every case where the Apostle is permitted to plead he refers not only to his doctrine but to his manner of life. Before proceeding further we must set out the structure of this whole section in order that these items may be given their rightful place.

We now return to the Apostle's testimony before the Jews, as recorded in Acts xxii. and xxiii.

We read in Acts xxi. 40 and in xxii. 2 that Paul spoke "in the Hebrew tongue". This word Hebrais occurs but three times in the New Testament (Acts xxi. 40; xxii. 2; and xxvi. 14). Twice it is used of Paul, and once it describes the language used by the Lord at the conversion of Paul.

The history of the Hebrew language may roughly be divided into two parts, the first covering the whole period of its use up to the Babylonian exile, and the second, the period commencing from the exile and continuing through to the present time. Since the Babylonian captivity, the "Hebrew" of the Old Testament had given place to a modified form. This "Hebrew" was > "The language spoken by the Jews in Palestine in the time of Christ. It might more accurately have been called Syro Chaldee, being a mixture of the Aramaean of Daniel and Ezra with the Ancient Hebrew" (Dr. A. Young).

When the Jews heard Paul address them in the Hebrew tongue, they kept the more silence. It was not only a concession to their extreme national and religious pride, but an intimation that the speaker was not a stranger to the sacred tongue. The Lord, when He spoke from heaven to the stricken persecutor, made the same concession.

The question has been raised as to whether Luke understood Hebrew. It cannot be settled from the record of this speech, for Paul could have given Luke a translation afterwards, or Luke could have been inspired by God to give it without intermediate assistance. On the other hand, the presence of a number of Hebraisms make it possible that Paul did not translate the speech for Luke, but that Luke gave his own translation, revealing himself by the presence of Hebrew forms of speech instead of ordinary Greek. Dean Alford's conclusion is:

> "Now we do find, (1) that the speech is full of Hebraisms, (2) that while it contains several expressions occurring nowhere but in the writings of Luke, not one is found in it peculiar to Paul, or even strikingly in his manner. Our inference then is that Luke himself has rendered this speech from having heard it delivered; and, consequently, that he was acquainted with Hebrew."

The matter is not of sufficient importance to pursue further. There is this to be said, however; all other writers of the Scriptures were Hebrews. Luke has been considered the exception, partly by reason of his Gentile name, and partly from tradition, but while there is insufficient evidence to settle the point there is every probability that "Luke the beloved physician" will not prove to be an exception to the rule.

The Apostle's purpose in this speech is expressed by himself in his opening words: "Men, brethren and fathers, hear ye my defence" (Acts xxii. 1). The Greek word translated "defence" has passed into our own language in the word "apology". In the course of time the word has departed from its original meaning, and to-day an "apology" may be "A frank acknowledgment, by way of reparation, of offence given", or "A defensive argument, often, specifically, the argumentative defence of Christianity". The Apostle however conciliatory his manner in the choice of argument, or even of the language in which he addressed the enraged gathering near the Temple, was certainly not apologetic in the modern sense. Sturdy defence need not be rude, and firm conviction of the rightness of one's position is not made more evident by stubbornness or lack of courtesy. In his short speech, spontaneously uttered in circumstances of great pressure, the Apostle gives us a model both of courtesy and concession, coupled with unflinching faithfulness and courage.

Men who had but immediately beforehand charged him with abominable conduct, accompanying their false charge with a ruthless and savage attack which had led Paul into the extremely unpleasant, and possibly dangerous, position of being a prisoner in the hands of the Roman guard, were addressed by the Apostle as he opened his defence with the courteous and respectful words, "Men, brethren and fathers". Further, to gain their confidence, he spoke of his early training at the feet of Gamaliel, and of his zeal, manifested alas in persecuting "this way" unto the death. Animated with the same motive, he turned from speaking in Greek to the Roman Captain (Acts xxi. 37) to the use of Hebrew when addressing the members of his own nation. They had accused him of polluting the sanctuary. He therefore not only tells them his place of birth and his training in Jerusalem, but adds that he was: "taught according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers, and was zealous toward God, as ye all are this day". He might have said, "and was blindly fanatical, as ye all are this day", but he did not. Again, when he introduces the name of Ananias, he omits what is recorded in Acts ix. as to Ananias being "a disciple", and refers to him as "devout man according to the law, having a good report of all the Jews which dwelt there" (Acts xxii. 12). Moreover, as further evidence of his correct attitude toward the Temple, and he told them of an occasion when, praying in the Temple, and being in a trance, the Lord appeared to him. But his appeal was in vain; it found no response, for it was made in the face of the most adamant of all human antagonism, viz., religious bias. As soon as the Apostle reached the point in his narrative where the Lord bade him: "Depart: for I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles" (Acts xxii. 21), the pent up fury of the fanatical throng burst forth, for

> "They gave him audience unto this word, and then lifted up their voices, and said, Away with such a fellow from the earth: for it is not fit that he should live" (Acts xxii. 23).

Paul had led up to the critical statement of verse 21 with consummate skill and yearning sympathy. He knew, he implied, just how they felt against himself at that moment, for had not he himself been zealous persecutor? They called for his blood, as he, too, had consented to the death of Stephen and others. His choice of words in the reference to "the perfect manner of the law of the fathers" would be recognized as a claim on his part to have studied with patience and devotedness the intricacies of traditional lore, affirming that it was nothing less than a divine interposition that had changed the whole current of his life at the beginning, and again, in a later period, while praying in the Temple. He revealed that even there he had resisted the command to leave Jerusalem.

We bring the opening study of this section of the Acts to a close with a presentation of the structure of the speech and its effect, for, if this is perceived, it will be comparatively easy to follow the divine argument contained in the twenty-three verses concerned.

Acts xxii. 1 - 23.

A | 1. Opening words: "Men, brethren and fathers."
B | 2. Effect when they heard "Hebrew". Kept more silence.
C | 3-5. Persecution. Prison. Death.
D | 6-16. VISION on the way to Damascus. |
a | And it came to pass (egeneto).
b | Come nigh unto Damascus.
c | A light and a voice.
d | Thou shalt be his witness (martur).
D | 17, 18. VISION in the Temple. |
a | And it came to pass (egeneto).
b | Come again to Jerusalem.
c | I saw Him . . . . . saying.
d | They will not receive thy testimony (marturia).
C | 19, 20. Persecution. Prison. Death.
A | 21. Closing words: "Unto the Gentiles."
B | 22, 23. Effect when they heard "Gentiles". Lifted up voices.

The parallelisms and contrasts of the speech are evident. The silence that was secured by Paul's use of the Hebrew language is in direct contrast with the uproar that followed the pronouncement of the hated word "Gentile". The double reference to Paul's early zeal and persecuting spirit is of importance in his endeavour to prove that he had not easily departed from the religion of his fathers, while the central position of the two visions, with their emphasis upon "Witness" and "Testimony", reveal the nature of Israel's blindness, and the nature of the Apostle's early ministry.

Like the Twelve, Paul was a witness of what he had "seen and heard". He was about to make known that he was also set apart as a witness of something more (Acts xxvi. 16), but this we will consider in its own place.

"Far hence unto the Gentiles" (Acts xxii. 21) is the first occurrence of ethnos in this section, and in the statement that "the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles" (Acts xxviii. 28) occurs the last reference of ethnos in the Acts.

Paul is still, in Acts xxii. in Jerusalem, but already, in spirit, he sees the fulfillment of the Temple vision in Rome.

#49. From Jerusalem to Rome (xxii. 1 - xxviii. 22). Paul's defence before the Council (xxiii. 1 - 35). pp. 33 - 36

The Apostle's testimony from the castle stairs ended in tumult. At the hated word "Gentiles", "They lifted up their voices and said: Away with such a fellow from the earth: for it is not fit that he should live" (Acts xxii. 22, cf. xxi. 36). This same word aire ("away") had been uttered once before by the mob when they clamoured for another Prisoner—the Lord Himself (Luke xxiii. 18; John xix. 15). The Apostle is here following closely in the footsteps of his Master.

Paul's speech having been made in Hebrew, the chief captain is at a loss to know the meaning of this fresh outbreak, and so we read: "The chief captain commanded him to be brought into the castle, and bade that he should be examined by scourging: that he might know wherefore they cried so against him" (Acts xxii. 24). The Apostle had already been submitted on previous occasions to the cruel and degrading punishment of being beaten with Roman rods, and of being scourged in Jewish synagogues: "Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one. Thrice was I beaten with rods" (II Cor. xi. 24, 25). And now it seemed that he would have to endure the horrible flagellum, or "whip", a form of torture which in Roman hands sometimes ended fatally.

In Acts xxii. 25 we read: "And while they were binding him down with the thongs." Some expositors, including Conybeare and Howson, and Lewin, consider that the "thongs" refer to the "lash" of the whip, but others, among them Alford, Wordsworth and Farrar, interpret the word in the sense of "something that binds". The word himas occurs elsewhere in Mark i. 7, Luke iii. 16 and John i. 27, where it refers to the "latchet" of a shoe. The prefix pro in the verb proteino, "to bind", refers to "the position of the prisoner, which was bent forward and tied with a sort of gear made of leather to an inclined post" (Alford).

Three times already Paul, a Roman citizen, had suffered the illegality of being beaten, without revealing his station and claiming exemption. True martyrdom, however, is never separated in Scripture from the thought of "witness". The same Greek word martur is translated both "martyr" and "witness", as for example:

> "Thou shalt be His witness" (Acts xxii. 15).
> "The blood of Thy martyr" (Acts xxii. 20).
> "The faithful witness" (Rev. i. 5).
> "My faithful martyr" (Rev. ii. 13).

Suffering apart from service, suffering endured for its own sake, and without an object in view, is not martyrdom in the Scriptural sense. While the Apostle felt that there was still hope for Israel, he endured in silence, but he had now entered the closing phase of his ministry, and Israel's days were numbered. To suffer the ignominy of examination by torture would now serve no useful end. It would benefit no one, and it would not uphold any vital truth. In the circumstances, it would have been a piece of unreasonable stoicism, and Paul therefore says to the centurion that stood by: "Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman, and uncondemned?" (Acts xxii. 25). The Apostle's undaunted courage had been fully manifested during the time that had elapsed since the Romans had intervened, and the centurion recognized that this was no mere evasion or a dishonest attempt to gain time. Moreover, he knew that to claim Roman citizenship falsely was often punishable by death (Suet. Claud. 25).

To bind a Roman, and to scourge him uncondemned, broke two laws, the Lex Valeria and the Lex Porcia, and there was also an edict of Augustus prohibiting the application of torture generally. Describing this same period under the heading "Festus succeeds Felix", Josephus writes, in his "Wars of the Jews":

> "Florus ventured then to do what no one had done before, that is to have men of the equestrian order whipped, and nailed to the cross before his tribunal, who, although they were by birth Jews, yet were they of Roman dignity notwithstanding" (Jos. Wars. ii. 14, 9).

The fear that possessed the chief captain "because he had bound" Paul, does not refer to the fact he had taken Paul into custody, but rather to the illegal binding preparatory to scourging. What was called "militaris custodia", by virtue of which a Roman citizen awaiting trial could be chained by his right hand to the left hand of his guard, was provided for by Roman law. The fact that Paul was consigned to a centurion afterwards indicates that he was put into this type of military custody.

The effect of Paul's words upon the centurion was immediate and pronounced. As a great Roman writer has said: "How often has this exclamation, I am a Roman citizen (Civie Romanus Sum), brought aid and safety among barbarians in the remotest parts of the earth" (Civ. Verr. v. 57).

The centurion at once hastens to the chief captain's quarters, saying: "Take heed what thou doest; for this man is a Roman." The captain himself then comes back to this astonishing Jewish prisoner—whom he had once suspected of being an Egyptian fanatic (Acts xxi. 38), and who spoke "Greek" and "Hebrew" with equal facility (Acts xxi. 37, 40)—and asks: "Tell me, art thou a Roman?" (Acts xxii. 27). Lysias himself had the praenomen "Claudius" (Acts xxiii. 26), indicating that he had obtained his freedom during the reign of Claudius, and, looking at the Apostle, and seeing nothing to indicate either wealth or position, he says: "I know how much it cost me to get this citizenship". Farrar's note here is as follows: "Verse 28, Ego oida poso, D. Though unsupported by evidence, the colloquialism sounds very genuine." Alford's note reads: "For pollo, oida poso D (remarkable and possibly original, pollo being a gloss; but if so, the genuine reading has been now overborne by the intruder)."

Dr. Cassius tells us that the civitas of Rome was, in the early part of the reign of Claudius, sold at a high rate, and it is to this that Lysias evidently refers. The Apostle's quiet rejoinder is given in verse 28: "But I was free born." We have no information concerning the Apostle's parents apart from the scanty references that occur in his own writings. The mere fact of being a citizen of Tarsus would not have conferred this privilege, for while Tarsus was an urbs libra, or "free city", it was not a colonia, or "colony". Besides, he had already revealed to the captain that he was a Tarsian (Acts xxi. 39). For some reason unknown to us, Paul's father or one of his more remote ancestors must have obtained the right of Roman citizenship.

The Apostle's claim is too great to be resisted, and he is immediately released. The soldiers who were to have tortured him, withdraw, and we read that "the chief captain also was afraid . . . . . because he had bound him".

Still anxious to obtain information upon which he can frame an accusation, Lysias next arranges for the Apostle to appear before the Sanhedrin: "On the morrow, because he would have known the certainty whereof he was accused of the Jews, he loosed him from his bands, and commanded the chief priests and all their council to appear, and brought Paul down, and set him before them" (Acts xxii. 30). Before considering the Apostle's defence before this council, let us first see how the section (Acts xxii. - xxiii.) is constructed.

Acts xxii. and xxiii. PAUL BEFORE THE JEWS.

A1 | xxii. 1, 2. OPENING WORDS. He spake in Hebrew.
Men, brethren and fathers.
B1 | xxii. 2-30. DEFENCE AND CONSEQUENCES. |
a | Silence.
b | Conciliatory address.
c | Tumult.
d | Paul taken to castle.
e | Paul a Roman.
f | Jewish council.
A2 | xxiii. 1. OPENING WORDS.
Men and brethren.
B2 | xxiii. 2-24. DEFENCE AND CONSEQUENCES. |
a | Smite on mouth.
b | Dividing address.
c | Dissension.
d | Paul taken to castle.
e | Paul and Rome.
f | Jewish conspiracy.
A3 | xxiii. 25-30. OPENING WORDS. He wrote a letter.
The most excellent governor Felix.
B3 | xxiii. 31-35. DEFENCE RESERVED.

Here we see the oneness of the Apostle's two-fold defence. The first section is given in an atmosphere of tense feeling, the second before the highest Jewish authority. Paul had already claimed Roman citizenship; he now claims equality with his Jewish hearers. On the stairs, before the excited mob, he had cried, "Men, brethren and fathers". Now, before the Sanhedrin, "earnestly beholding the council" with a steady glance that betrayed neither severity nor fear, he begins, "Men and brethren". The Sanhedrin was a judicial body of seventy-two, made up of twenty-four chief priests, twenty-four elders, and twenty-four scribes and doctors. The council originally met in an apartment of the inner Temple, but as it was impossible for a Gentile to enter the sacred enclosure, and as the Romans had granted the Sanhedrin the power of inflicting the death penalty in connection with any Gentile passing into this sacred enclosure and so were obliged to have a representative there, it now met in a room just outside the Temple precincts.

Ananias, the high priest, was one of the worst of his kind. The Talmud speaks of him as rapacious, gluttonous and greedy; defrauding the lower priests of their tithes, while sending his minions with bludgeons to collect his own tithes from the threshing floors.

> "Few pitied him when he was dragged out of his hiding place in a sewer to perish miserably by the daggers of the Sicarrii, whom, in the days of his posterity, he had not scrupled to sanction and employ" (Farrar, quoting Gratz and Josephus).

Several things, no doubt, combined to annoy this unprincipled man—Paul's omission of the title "fathers", claiming his right as a Sanhedrist and a Rabbi, his unflinching look, and his emphasis upon a "good conscience before God". The High Priest's command that the Apostle should be smitten on the mouth was a violation of both decency and privilege, and would have been peculiarly offensive to a Jew. "He that strikes the cheek of an Israelite strikes, as it were, the cheek of the Shekinah, for it is said, He that strikes a man strikes the Holy One" (Sanhedr).

Once again the Apostle stands where his Lord had stood before him (Matt. xxvii. 30), but it cannot be said of Paul that, "as a sheep before his shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth". It is very difficult for anyone to-day to judge whether Paul was right or wrong when he replied, "God shall smite thee, thou withed wall". His words may have been prophetic, for Ananias died, as we have seen, an ignominious death at the hands of assassins. However, whether this be so or not, the Apostle immediately apologizes, saying, "I wist not, brethren, that he was the High Priest", and supplements his acknowledgment by quoting Scripture against himself: "For it is written, Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people" (Acts xxiii. 5). Did Paul's words "I wist not" mean that, through defective vision, he had not recognized the High Priest? Or did they mean that, knowing the character of Ananias, and that he had attained his office through bribery, and had ruled as a tyrant, he refused to recognize such a man as a true holder of the office. Calvin and others have suggested that Paul spoke ironically, but none of these explanations seems to square with the Apostle's retraction, and it would seem that Paul frankly acknowledged that he had committed an offence, even though the pressure under which it had been committed had been almost unbearable. Those who criticize the Apostle's swift resentment should remember and follow his equally swift acknowledgment.

Just as earlier Paul had been seen that suffering at the hands of the Roman captain would accomplish no good end, so now he perceives that further conciliation in his attitude towards the Sanhedrin would be fruitless. He therefore throws into their midst the apple of discord, and so divides his judges into the two opposing factions of Pharisees and Sadducees. He eventually has to be saved from being "pulled in pieces" by the advent of the Roman guard. The Apostle was evidently not altogether happy about this expedient as we see from his acknowledgment before Felix:

> "Let these same here say, if they have found any evil-doing in me, while I stood before the council, except it be for this one voice, that I cried, standing among them. Touching the resurrection of the dead I am called in question by you this day" (Acts xxiv. 20, 21).

When we consider the extreme danger in which the Apostle often stood, and the violence, confusion, and uncertainty in which he lived, the wonder is, not that he occasionally manifested that he was indeed a man of like passions with ourselves, but that he endured so nobly, and followed the Lord so closely. We love the earthen vessel, but, like Paul himself, we look for perfection in One only, our Saviour and Lord.

If Paul's words spoken before Felix seem to point in one direction, the Lord's words, as recorded in Acts xxiii. 11, seem to point in the other: "Be of good cheer, Paul; for as thou hast testified of Me in Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at Rome." We therefore leave the question of how far Paul was right or wrong in his attitude to the council, and would seek rather to "consider our own selves, lest we also be tempted".

In verse 16, against the general background of tension and strife, a gentler note is introduced. "Paul's sister's son" discovers a conspiracy against the Apostle, and comes forward to warn the chief captain—a homely touch that the lonely captive would fully appreciate. This further plot apparently helped Lysias to make up his mind, and he summons two centurions, commanding them to make ready a bodyguard of horse soldiers, to conduct Paul safely to Felix. The letter that accompanied the prisoner was ingeniously worded so that any charges that might be preferred against the writer for his illegal handling of a Roman citizen would be obviated. These, and other points, we shall hope to consider in subsequent articles.

#50. From Jerusalem to Rome (xxii. 1 - xxviii. 22). Paul before Felix and Festus (xxiv. and xxv.). pp. 69 - 75

According to Roman law, it was necessary that a prisoner who had been sent with an elogium should, wherever possible, be tried within three days. In this case, however, Felix had to communicate with Jerusalem, and command the presence of the High Priest and elders—which would occupy at least two days—and it is therefore not surprising that the case against Paul was not heard until "after five days" (Acts xxiv. 1). The priests and elders, not being eloquent in Latin, procured the services of an orator named Tertullus. Conybeare and Howson cite at length the Latin passage in Valerius Maximus from which it is inferred that all pleadings, even in Greek provinces, were conducted before Roman magistrates in Latin. Lewin, however, draws attention to the introduction of Greek, in spite of this law, even at Rome itself.

Roman law permitted the accuser and the accused to plead in person, and we find Paul using this right. Frequently, however, advocati (Gk. rhetores, as in Acts xxiv. 1) were employed—generally young lawyers who served in this way in the provinces, in order to obtain experience.

In Acts xxiv. Tertullus follows the usual custom, and opens his address with a captatio benevolentiæ:

> "Seeing that by thee we enjoy great quietness, and that very worthy deeds are done unto this nation by thy providence: we accept it always, and in all places, most noble Felix, with all thankfulness" (Acts xxiv. 2, 3).

The use of the word "providence" here is an indication of the Latin persuasion of the speaker. A coin of Commodus is known, bearing the inscription Provid. Aug., and Providentia Cæsaris is a common phrase on coins of the emperors. With regard to the implications of verses 2 and 3, it is certainly true that Felix had suppressed bandits in the country, and had only recently rid the land of a false Messiah, an Egyptian. His real character, however, cannot be gathered from these opening compliments. Tacitus wrote of him:

> "In the practice of all kinds of lust and cruelty he exercised the power of a king with the tempter of a slave" (Hist. v. 9).
>
> "We may trace the libidinem in his persuading Drusilla to leave her husband and to live with him; the saevitiam, in his procuring the assassination of the high priest Jonathan, who had given him good but distasteful advice; the servile ingenium in that 'he trembled' under castigation, but was not corrected" (W. G. Humphry).

After the opening panegyric Tertullus passes on to the accusation. This he divides up under three heads:

(1) The accused was a public pest, a mover of sedition among all the Jews throughout the Empire.
(2) He was a ringleader of a sect of the Nazarenes.
(3) He had attempted to profane the Temple.

This threefold accusation implied that Paul had offended against both Roman and Jewish law. The first offence amounted to majestas, or treason against the Emperor, while the third in itself was punishable by death.

The word for "a pestilent fellow" is loimos, "a plague". What a name to give this bearer of life and light to a stricken and dying world! The word for "sedition" is stasis, which occurs in connection with the charge laid against Barabbas (Mark xv. 7), and is also used for the "uproar" in Ephesus (Acts xix. 40). Tertullus was careful not to refer to Paul as a leader of the "Christians", for the title "Christ", being equivalent of "the Messiah", might have involved the Jews themselves.

Considerable differences of opinion exist among textual critics as to whether the second half of verse 7 and the first half of verse 8 should be included in the text or not. In the A.V. the passage reads:

> "Whom we took, and would have judged according to our law, but the chief captain Lysias came upon us, and with great violence took him away out of our hands, commanding his accusers to come unto thee: by examining of whom thyself mayest take knowledge of all these things, whereof we accuse him" (Acts xxiv. 6-8).

If we omit the suspected passage, then the words "of whom" refer to Paul. If, on the other hand, the A.V. be retained, they would refer to Lysias. Felix certainly adjourned the case, saying: "When Lysias the chief captain shall come down, I will know the uttermost of your matter" (verse 22), but whether or not this was an act of evasion it is impossible to say. Certainly Lysias never came, and Felix never heard the conclusion of the trial. In any case no doctrinal point is affected by the uncertainty in verses 7 and 8, and we therefore propose to follow the A.V.

Before, however, we consider Paul's defence before Felix, we must get a general view of the whole of the section.

It will be seen that Paul's trial before the two Roman Governors falls into three sections, marked by the recurrence of "Time", "Charge", "Defence" and "Judgment". With regard to the fourth heading, it will be observed that in the first section it is not the judgment-seat of either the Roman Emperor or the Roman Governor that is in view, but rather the "judgment to come", at the prospect of which even Felix trembled. The judgment of God and the judgment of man are in striking contrast. Felix hoped for money from Paul, and to cover his own evil tracks upon his recall to Rome, he left him a prisoner, wishing "to show the Jews a pleasure". Festus also, for higher and purer motives, was willing to make concessions to the Jews, and have Paul tried at Jerusalem; a point that is repeated in the third account, as the structure shows (Acts xxv. 17-22).

Paul before Felix and Festus (Acts xxiv. 1 - xxv. 22).

A1 | xxiv. 1. TIME.—After five days.
B1 | xxiv. 1-9. CHARGE.—Tertullus informed against Paul (emphanizo).
C1 | xxiv. 10-21. DEFENCE.—I cheerfully answer for myself.
D1 | xxiv. 22-27. JUDGMENT.—Felix. |
a | Judgment to come.
b | Willing to show the Jews a pleasure.

A2 | xxv. 1. TIME.—After three days.
B2 | xxv. 2-7. CHARGE.—The High Priest informed against Paul (emphanizo).
C2 | xxv. 8. DEFENCE.—He answered for himself.
D2 | xxv. 9-12. JUDGMENT.—Festus. |
b | Willing to do the Jews a pleasure.
a | I stand at Cæsar's judgment seat.

A3 | xxv. 13. TIME.—After certain days.
B3 | xxv. 14, 15. CHARGE.—The chief priests informed against Paul (emphanizo).
C3 | xxv. 16. DEFENCE.—License to answer for himself.
D3 | xxv. 17-22. JUDGMENT.—Festus. |
a | I sat on the judgment seat.
b | Would Paul go to Jerusalem?

We come now to the trial before Felix, and Paul's defence. There is no flattering opening in this case, but the Apostle does make an initial statement that would probably help to secure a sympathetic hearing: "Forasmuch as I know that thou hast been of many years a judge unto this nation, I do the more cheerfully answer for myself" (Acts xxiv. 10). From Josephus we learn that Felix had held this office for a period of six years, and was not recalled until A.D.60. He had also, according to Tacitus, held rule jointly with Cumanus prior to A.D.52. Whatever his character, Felix was bound to have been acquainted with the land and the people, and this all that Paul claims.

The first point made by the Apostle is given in verse 11: "Because it is in thy power to ascertain that only twelve days have passed since I went up to Jerusalem to worship." The twelve days are made up as follows:

1st Day.—Arrival in Jerusalem (xxi. 15-17).
2nd Day.—Interview with James, etc. (xxi. 18).
3rd Day.—Purification in the Temple (xxi. 26).
7th Day.—The seven days nearly completed. Paul arrested (xxi. 30).
8th Day.—Before the Sanhedrin (xxii. 30).
9th Day.—Conspiracy Revealed (xxiii. 12).
10th Day.—Arrival at Caesarea (xxiii. 33).
11th and 12th Day.—In custody (xxiii. 35).
13th Day.—Trial before Felix (xxiv. 1).

Felix knew the date of Pentecost, and could confirm that Paul had actually arrived for this feast. A complete account of all his movements for the whole time under review was obtainable. The further points in his defence were:

(1) POSITIVE.—He came to worship in the Temple.
(2) NEGATIVE.—No evidence was produced by Tertullus to show that he had been found disputing with any man, or raising up the people, either in the synagogue or in the city.

He had been charged with being the ringleader of a sect called the Nazarenes. This he willingly admitted, but it was no crime against Roman law to believe "all things which are written in the law and the prophets". His accusers might call it "heresy", but Paul claimed that it was the worship of the God of his fathers.

The phrase "the God of my fathers" was the usual term to denote the tutelary god of a particular nation, and as such a legal object of worship under Roman law. The terms "heresy" and "sect" are not used in an ecclesiastical sense in Paul's defence. His very accusers belonged to two different sects—the Pharisees and the Sadducees—and Paul is simply claiming for this new sect of Nazarenes the toleration normally allowed by Roman law and enjoyed by his accusers.

In verse 15 the Apostle emphasizes the hope of resurrection which he held in common with the sect of the Pharisees, and in the following verse declares that he exercised himself to have always a conscience void of offence toward God and man. When the proper occasion presented itself, Paul was very ready to preach to Felix (Acts xxiv. 25), but this opportunity had not yet arrived. He concludes his defence by asking why the Jews from Asia, who were supposed to have seen him polluting the Temple, were not present at the trial to bear their witness against him. The only evil doing, the Apostle claims, that the council could bring against him was the split that his declaration concerning the resurrection had caused in their ranks.

The ring of truth that was so evident in the Apostle's defence, his ready admission of "heresy", the harmony of his statements with the letter written by Lysias, the failure to produce witnesses, and the manifest religious animosity of his accusers, convinced Felix that Paul was innocent. He had a "more accurate knowledge of that way" than his hearers had credited, and he defers the trial, saying: "When Lysias comes down I will decide finally between you (diagnosomai)." Paul is now given into the charge of a centurion, who is instructed to afford as much relaxation and liberty as the case allowed, permitting his friends to visit him and minister to his needs. There was already a company of believers at Cæsarea, including Philip the Evangelist. Josephus, speaking of the custody of Agrippa when he was a prisoner, uses the word aneseos, "remission" or "relaxation", in connection with the centurion who was friendly to him upon receiving news of the death of the Emperor Tiberius.

There are some who would criticize the Apostle for not preaching the gospel to these Roman officials, just as they would criticize his method of speaking to the philosophers at Athens. There are several facts, however, that should be carefully weighed before we attempt to criticize:

(1) The council at Athens had in earlier days the power of life and death, and even if this power was later reduced, Paul's liberty was in danger.
(2) The Sanhedrin still retained the power of life and death.
(3) The administration of provincial Roman justice was very much influenced by the character of the judges, and the pressure that could be brought to bear upon them by influential natives.
(4) It is the duty of a man accused before the law to indicate his innocence before he asserts his rights, and this was the line of conduct that Paul pursued.
(5) It is quite false to charge the Apostle with either reticence or cowardice. An examination of his apologies in Acts xvii., xxiii., xxiv. and xxv. will show how Christ and His gospel were either actually introduced, or would have been introduced but for the cutting short of his defence by his opponents.

Moreover, chapter xxiv. shows how faithfully the Apostle seized the opportunity which Felix presented, of preaching the gospel even while a prisoner.

> "And after certain days when Felix came with his wife Drusilla, which was a Jewess, he sent for Paul and heard him concerning the faith in Christ" (Acts xxiv. 24).

The word paraginomai ("came") may indicate that Felix had been away and had now returned. His wife, Drusilla, was the daughter of Herod Agrippa I, whose end is described in Acts xii. 19-23, and the sister of Herod Agrippa II, mentioned in Acts xxv. and xxvi. Drusilla was originally married to Azizus, the king of Emesa, but this marriage was soon dissolved, as recorded by Josephus:

> "While Felix was procurator of Judaea, he saw this Drusilla, and fell in love with her; for she did indeed exceed all other women in beauty. And he sent her a person whose name was Simon, one of his friends: a Jew he was, and by birth a Cypriot, and one who pretended to be a magician; and endeavoured to persuade her to forsake her present husband, and marry him: and promised, that if she would not refuse him, he would make her a happy woman. Accordingly she acted ill, and because she was desirous to avoid her sister Berenice's envy, for she was very ill-treated by her on account of her beauty, was prevailed upon to transgress the laws of her forefathers, and to marry Felix; and when she had had a son by him, he named him Agrippa. But after what manner that young man, with his wife, perished at the conflagration of the mountain Vesuvius, in the days of Titus Cæsar, shall be related hereafter" (Ant. of Jews, xx. 7, 1).

Wordsworth comments here:

> "St. Paul was tried on a charge of breaking the Law at the instance of the Jews, before a ruler who had set those laws at defiance, and who yet is flattered by them" (3-9).

From Drusilla Felix had probably heard of the Messianic hope of Israel, and of the new "heresy" that claimed that Jesus was the Christ. And so we read that Felix "sent for Paul, and heard him concerning the faith in Christ". The expression here: Tes eis Christon pisteos ("The unto Christ faith") is a striking one. According to the revised texts the name "Jesus" should also be added.

We have no means of knowing the length of time occupied by the Apostle, or the line of approach he adopted. He may have appealed to the O.T. Scriptures for the benefit of Drusilla, or he may have approached his subject along the lines of Acts xvii. The veil, however, is lifted for a moment in verse 25, and we read that "as he reasoned of righteousness, temperance and judgment to come, Felix trembled" (Acts xxiv. 25).

The word dialogismos ("reasoning") is used in an evil sense in the N.T. and is forbidden by the Apostle himself in several places (Rom. i. 21; xiv. 1; I Cor. iii. 20; Phil. ii. 14; I Tim. ii. 8). We must be careful, however, not to jump to false conclusions. "Reasonings", dialogismoi (plural), are repudiated by the Apostle in five passages in his epistles, but "reasoning" (dialegomai) is actually used of him ten times in the Acts and is twice translated "preaching" (Acts xx. 7, 9). The last occurrence of dialegomai in the Acts is this reference in chapter xxiv., where Paul "reasons of righteousness, continence, and judgment to come".

The man who listened to this "preaching" of the "faith unto Christ Jesus" was a Roman libertine, and the woman a profligate Jewish princess. Farrar says of Felix:

> "He had been a slave, in the vilest of all positions, and the vilest of all epochs, in the vilest of all cities . . . . . Ample and indisputable testimony, Jewish and pagan, sacred and secular, reveals to us what he had been."

It was to this man that the Apostle spoke of a judgment-seat, where there is no respect of persons, and where the Judge Himself knows the thoughts and intents of the heart. In verse 25 we read that "Felix trembled", but the "convenient season" never materialized, and the evil past held him in its grip. He "communed" with the Apostle on several occasions after this, but, finally, upon his recall to Rome, he violated the law in the endeavour to placate the Jews, and left Paul bound.

#51. From Jerusalem to Rome (xxii. 1 - xxviii. 22).
Paul before Festus and Agrippa (xxv. and xxvi.).
pp. 99 - 105

We concluded our last article at the point where Felix, "willing to shew the Jews a pleasure, left Paul bound" (Acts xxiv. 27), and we must now take up the narrative again at the beginning of chapter xxv.

Festus, who appears in the last verse of chap. xxiv. and the first verse of chap. xxv., provides us with one of the few certain dates in the chronology of the Acts. As Festus died in A.D.61, and Felix was recalled in A.D.60, there can be no doubt as to the dating of this new chapter.

The narrative of Acts xxv. speaks of Festus in a more favourable light than was the case with Felix. Festus certainly attempted to administer "even-handed" justice, and Josephus says of him: "Festus succeeded Felix as procurator, and made it his business to correct those that made disturbances in the country" (D. J. ii. 14. 1).

Three days after his arrival at Cæsarea Festus went up to Jerusalem, and one of his first interviews would undoubtedly have been with the High Priest. By this time Ananias had been superseded by Ishmael, the son of Fabei (see Josephus Ant. xx. 8, 8), but, although there had been a change in the person of the High Priest, it is evident that there had been no change in the attitude of the Jews themselves towards the prisoner at Cæsarea. The High Priest desires of Festus a "favour", intending that, if the request were granted, Paul should be waylaid and killed before he could reach Jerusalem. However, Festus maintains the Romans standard of justice and replies:

> "It is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die, before that he which is accused have the accusers face to face, and have licence to answer for himself concerning the crime laid against him" (Acts xxv. 16).

As Lewin comments: "The answer of Festus was such as became an imperial Prefect, and worthy of being written in letters of gold."

Festus did, however, attempt one concession, and asked Paul whether he would be willing to go up to Jerusalem to be tried by the Sanhedrin, under his protection (Acts xxv. 9). However, the Apostle knew that he was to witness at Rome, and, cutting short any further bargainngs with justice, he pronounces the irrevocable words "Cæsarem appello".

> "I stand before Cæsar's tribunal, and there ought my trial to be. To the Jews I have done no wrong as thou knowest full well. If I am guilty, and have done anything worthy of death, I refuse not to die; but if the things whereof these men accuse me are nought, no man can give me up to them. I APPEAL UNTO CÆSAR" (Acts xxv. 10, 11 Conybeare & Howson).

It could not have been very pleasant for a newly-arrived governor to have his first public trial end in this way, but against such an appeal there was no argument. Accordingly, Festus holds a brief consultation with his Assessors and, finding that Paul's appeal is valid, replies: "Hast thou appealed unto Cæsar? Unto Cæsar shalt thou go." The wording here seems to convey the unspoken thought—"And you little realize what this appeal will mean."

While the case was taken, by the Apostle's appeal, out of the hands of Festus, he was still under obligation to remit to the supreme tribunal the apostoli, or report upon its previous progress. He was, moreover, in some perplexity, for the testimony of the Jews had been irregular, a mere accumulation of many and grievous complaints, which they could not prove. As he says in verse 27: "It seemeth to me unreasonable to send a prisoner, and not withal to signify the crimes laid against him" (Acts xxv. 27). In these circumstances, the advent of King Agrippa seemed providential. On the death of his uncle, Agrippa had been made king of Chalcis. Claudius had also given him the tetrarchy of Batanæa, and to this Nero had added part of Galilee and Peræa. Bernice was Agrippa's sister, and had been the wife of his uncle, the king of Chalcis. Her relationship with her brother was the subject of suspicion (Juv. vi. 156), and she subsequently became the wife of Polemon, King of Cilicia, and the mistress of Titus. Drusilla, as we have already noted, was her younger sister.

The Herodians owed much to Roman patronage, and King Agrippa lost no time in paying a visit to the new Roman Governor. Seizing the opportunity that this visit presented, Festus remarks to his guest:

> "There is a certain man left in bonds by Felix; about whom, when I was at Jerusalem, the chief priests and the elders of the Jews informed me, desiring to have judgment against him" (Acts xxv. 14, 15).

Festus then recapitulates the facts of the case, and Agrippa intervenes with the words: "I would also hear the man myself." We must remember that Paul was now outside the jurisdiction of Festus, and that Agrippa also had no authority in the matter. It was simply an excellent opportunity for getting the opinion of one who was intimately acquainted with the points at issue, so that Festus might be able to frame some reasonable account of the charges laid against the prisoner.

The reader may appreciate, at this point, a reminder of the general disposition of the subject-matter in this section of the book.

A1	|	xxii., xxiii.	To Jews at Jerusalem.
A2	|	xxiv. - xxv. 22.	To Felix and Festus.
A3	|	xxv. 23 - xxviii. 15.	To Agrippa.
A4	|	xxviii. 16-22.	To Jews at Rome.

This, of course, is only the barest skeleton. The full structure is set out on page 2 of current volume.

There were two periods in this part of the Apostle's career, during which he was a prisoner for two years. The first was at Cæsarea, where he was held a prisoner, with opportunity to see his friends, for two years (Acts xxiv. 27). After this he was again held in custody by Festus while he formulated a charge that could be sent with him, and then was sent on a journey to Rome, where once again he was a prisoner for another period of two years, receiving all that cared to visit him.

Paul's defence before Agrippa is the fullest of which we have any record. He was no longer on trial, and he availed himself of this splendid opportunity to give a complete testimony.

A | 31, 32. Agrippa gives his opinion.

We will not go over the ground already covered by the Apostle in his former defences, but deal rather with those items that he brings into prominence in this particular speech before Agrippa.

Paul could, of course, have refused to speak before Agrippa, or, on the other hand, he might have abused the opportunity by seeking to flatter him. In fact he did neither; his one object was to serve the Lord. The Apostle does not begin with any personal compliments with respect to Agrippa's character, but he does acknowledge that he was "an expert in all customs and questions which are among the Jews"—a statement that was an undoubted fact.

Of Agrippa's father, Josephus writes:

> "He also came to Jerusalem and offered all the sacrifices that belonged to him, and omitted nothing that the law required; on which account he ordered that many of the Nazarites should have their heads shorn. And for the golden chain which had been given him by Caius, of equal weight with that iron chain wherewith his royal hands had been bound, he hung it up within the limits of the temple, over the treasury that it might be a memorial" (Ant. xix., vi. 1).

The fact that Paul had been apprehended in the Temple, while associating himself with those who had taken the Nazarite vow, and the fact that he now wore the Roman chain, would no doubt make some appeal to Herod's son.

The Apostle begins by going over the ground already covered by Acts ix. and xxii.—his early life, his persecuting zeal and the vision on the road to Damascus. At verse 16, however, he breaks new ground. Truth hitherto unrecorded is now revealed, and as this new revelation is of vital importance to all who rejoice in the dispensation of the Mystery, verse 16-18 must be given our closest attention. Let us note first that it is here for the first time that we are told what the Lord Himself said to the Apostle on the road to Damascus. It may, perhaps, be objected that this statement is not true, and that in Acts ix. we can read for ourselves what the Lord said. To make sure about this point, let us turn to Acts ix.:

> Verses 1 and 2 record the journey to Damascus.
> Verses 3 and 4 record the vision and the voice.
> Verse 5 reveals that it is the Lord Who speaks.
> Verse 6 tells Paul to go into the city and wait for instructions.
> Verses 15 and 16 record what the Lord said to Ananias about Paul, but that is all.

It is clear therefore, that what the Lord actually said to Paul is not recorded in Acts ix., and it will be found that this is also true of Acts xxii. Chapter xxii. records the words of Ananias (verses 13-15), and we also learn that Paul was to be a witness of all that he had seen and heard, but it is to Acts xxvi. that we must turn to learn for the first time what the Lord actually said to Paul at his conversion and commission.

Two of the new features contained in this record are found in the words "Both", "I will appear unto thee", and "Now I send thee" in verses 16 and 17, and in the summary of doctrine contained in verse 18:

> "To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among them which are sanctified, by faith that is in Me."

The close association between these words and the doctrine of the epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians will be obvious.

In contrast with this new commission, recorded here for the first time, is the old commission to which the Apostle returns in verses 20-23. In these verses he preaches "repentance", and proclaims "none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come"—which obviously could not refer to the mystery hid in God.

We have already seen from Acts xx. 24 that Paul had received some commission from the Lord that was intimately associated with "bonds", and now, having appealed to Cæsar, the Apostle is at liberty to reveal the fact that from the beginning he had known that his commission was two-fold:

(1) Witnessing to Israel and the Gentiles the things which he had seen and heard, while
(2) Awaiting a future appearing of the Lord, when the terms of the new ministry associated with prison would be made known to him.

At last the fresh appearing had taken place, and the terms of the new commission given. Verse 18 anticipates, in a condensed form, the doctrine that is more fully expressed in Ephesians and Colossians (see Eph. i. 7, 13, 14, 18, and Col. i. 12, 13).

The word "both" necessitates a two-fold witness. Just as a believing and intelligent reading of John xvi. 12-14 compels us to seek for a subsequent revelation after the Spirit of Truth had come, so equally a believing and intelligent reading of Acts xxvi. 16-18 compels us to seek for that subsequent revelation of truth that was given after Paul had become the prisoner of the Lord for the Gentiles. This revelation is found in those epistles that bear the stamp of prison, namely: Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians and II Timothy. These epistles contain the revelation of the Mystery, and give dispensational grounds for the Gentiles' right to the blessings summarized in Acts xxvi. 18.

In verse 24, Paul's defence is interrupted by Festus crying with a loud voice: "Paul, thou art beside thyself: much learning hath made thee mad." It is rather strange that, for entirely different reasons, Paul is twice interrupted upon reaching the word "Gentiles". The fanatical Jews hear him up to this point, and then cry "Away with him". Festus also hears him up to the same point, and concludes that a Jew who imagines that he can possibly have a mission and a message to the Gentiles must be mad. It is sad to think that there are many Christians who, by their opposition to the Apostle's claim and their attitude towards those who would make these claim known, take practically the same position as that taken by Festus when he said of the Apostle, "Much learning doth make thee mad". Paul, however, understands the attitude of Festus, and answers him courteously. He had listened with growing wonder to a tale of visions, revelations, persecutions, prophecies, the assertion that sins could be forgiven, and that the darkness not only of the Jew but also of the Gentile could be dispersed. It was no wonder that his Roman upbringing would not allow him to accept such statements at all readily.

Having replied to Festus, the Apostle turns again to Agrippa. King Agrippa had a knowledge of Moses and the prophets, and he also knew the facts of the past few years. As Paul says in verse 26, "This thing was not done in a corner". And so, in verse 27, the Apostle asks: "King Agrippa, believest thou the prophets? I know that thou believest." How are we to understand Agrippa's reply? On this point, Farrar writes:

> "Not old in years, but accustomed from his boyhood to an atmosphere of cynicism and unbelief, he could only smile with the good-natured contempt of a man of the world at the enthusiastic earnestness which could even for a moment fancy that he would be converted to the heresy of the Nazarenes with their crucified Messiah . . . . . 'You are trying to persuade me offhand to be a Christian', he said with a half-suppressed smile."

Lewin, on the other hand, writes:

> "Agrippa was deeply moved, and the confession fell unbidden from his lips 'Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian'."

Another interpretation is this:

> "En oligo, as the expression is used by the apostle himself in another place (Eph. iii. 3) may mean, 'in short' . . . . . 'In short, you are persuading me, the most zealous of Moses' followers, to be a Christian'. But this interpretation is not consistent with Paul's reply, 'I would to God that both almost (en oligo) and altogether (en pollo) . . . . ."—(Lewin).

Conybeare and Howson give the following note:

> "En oligo cannot mean 'almost', which would be par oligon. It might mean either 'in a few words' (Eph. iii. 3), or 'in a small measure' or 'in a small time' . . . . . We might render the passage thus: 'Thou thinkest to make me a Christian with a little persuasion'. We should observe that peitheis, 'persuade' is in the present tense, and that the title 'Christian' was one of contempt—see I Pet. iv. 16."

The note in the Companion Bible is as follows: "To put it briefly, thou art persuading me to become a Christian."

We feel reluctant to part with the thought enshrined in the words "almost persuaded", but truth is greater than sentiment. Pilate before the Saviour asked "What is truth?", but there is no reason to believe that he was really seeking the light. Felix, too, enquired of Paul concerning faith in Christ, and actually trembled as he heard, but there is no evidence that there was the slightest movement towards repentance. And so it seems, alas, to have been with Agrippa.

In spite of this, however, the Apostle replies with his whole soul:

> "I would to God that not only thou, but also all that hear me this day, were both almost and altogether such as I am, except these bonds."

Agrippa's verdict was that nothing worthy of death or of bonds could be laid to Paul's charge, and that if he had not appealed to Cæsar, he might have been given his freedom. How Festus framed his letter we do not know, but it is certain that there could have been no specific charge against the Apostle according to Roman law.

#52. From Jerusalem to Rome (xxii. 1 - xxviii. 22).
From Caesarea to Melita (xxvii.).
pp. 129 - 134

The record of the voyage, shipwreck and arrival at Rome which occupies so much space in the closing section of the Acts is perhaps the most wonderful record of travel that has been preserved from ancient times. Since 1856, no writer on the subject can ignore the volume entitled: "On the Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, with Dissertations" by James Smith. All writers of note, such as Conybeare and Howson, Lewin, Alford, and Farrar, who have had the xxviith chapter of the Acts before them, have given unstinted praise to this writer. In addition, Conybeare and Howson had the help of Admiral Sir Charles Penrose, whose notes on the narrative make Luke's record, owing to the exactness of his nautical references and the breadth of his knowledge, little short of a miracle were the record but the figment of his imagination.

Independent research is commendable, and originality, where it is unaffected, is charming, but any attempt on our part to write on Acts xxvii. without reference to these technical treaties would be folly. Moreover, while it is impracticable to smother our pages with quotation marks, it would be a waste of good material to attempt avoidance of the use of the language of those who have made the subject their own. Like all writers since 1856 we are indebted to James Smith, and with this introduction and recognition let us open the book at Acts xxvii. and learn its lessons.

Paul was not the only prisoner who was to be delivered to Rome, and Julius, a centurion of the Augustin cohort, whose duty it was to see his charges safely to Rome in the shortest time, finding a trading vessel of Adramyttium about to sail by the coast of Asia, embarked with his men and prisoners and the eventful voyage commenced. Few Biblical maps show Adramyttium, but the reader would do well to acquaint himself with this as with every detail of this momentous voyage. This sea-port is on the coast of Mysia, opposite Mitylene, not far from Pergamos and Troas. It will be seen that such a port would well serve the centurion's purpose. Paul was courteously treated and, at the end of the first day's sail, permitted to land at Sidon "to go unto his friends and refresh himself". The wind that had enabled them to cover this 67 miles, now changed, and they "sailed under Cyprus, because the winds were contrary". To a landsman, "sailing under Cyprus" suggests the south side of the island. The truer translation is "under the lee", and, in the case in point, this was the north side, for the record continues: "And when we had sailed over the sea of Cilicia and Pamphylia, we came to Myra, a city of Lysia." One glance at the map will confirm this rendering and fix the route.

Myra, is practically due north of Alexandria in Egypt, and with the prevailing wind, it was not strange that a grain ship from Alexandria should be found so far off the straight course to Rome. Seizing the opportunity thus presented, the centurion transferred his living freight, and the ship started on its journey to Rome.

> "And when we had sailed slowly many days, and scarce were come over against Cnidus, the wind not suffering us, we sailed under Crete, over against Salome" (Acts xxvii. 7).

Let us be sure that we know the geography of this verse. Cnidus is the last point of land that would afford protection from the prevailing wind, and will be found on the extreme corner of Asia Minor, before the coast turns north. Seeing that the ship could neither enter Cnidus, nor hold on its way along the north shore of Crete, the course was changed, so that she passed round Salome, to the lee of the island. "Hardly passing it" shows that the winds were still contrary, and the navigator was therefore forced to begin to think of finding a harbour commodious enough to winter in. Fair Havens was reached, and for some time the ship waited for a change in the weather.

It was now nearly the end of September and the close of the sailing season. After "the fast", which was the Day of Atonement, "sailing was dangerous". The Greeks dated the opening of the sailing weather as "after Dionysia". We must not misjudge these ancient navigators. They had neither chart nor compass, but steered by the stars, consequently in that part of the year, when for lengthy periods "neither sun nor stars might appear", the seamen naturally hesitated to try the open sea. Discussions evidently took place as to whether they should winter where they were, or take the next favourable chance of sailing along the coast another thirty-four miles, and wintering in Phenice (xxvii. 12). Prisoner though he was, the Apostle was permitted a voice in these proceedings, and said:

> "Sirs, I perceive that this voyage will be with hurt and much damage, not only of the lading and the ship, but also for our lives" (xxvii. 10).

However, the centurion and the owner of the vessel were of the opposite opinion. Fair Havens had little to offer as a winter resort, whereas Phenice (the modern Lutro), but a few hours' sail away, was the only real harbour in Crete, safe in all weathers, and much used by Alexandrian corn-ships.

At this point we pause to draw attention to the phrase, "If by any means they might attain to" (xxvii. 12). The language here is unambiguous, and the facts of the case prove that the element of doubt rightly adheres in these words. When, during the next year or more, the Apostle, who had passed through this terrible experience, came to write the Epistle to the Philippians, he uses the same expression saying, "If by any means I might attain unto the out-resurrection from among the dead" (Phil. iii. 11). To remove from these words the same element of uncertainty that must be allowed them in Acts xxvii., has the appearance of handling the word of God deceitfully. If in Phil. iii. 11 Paul meant only that resurrection which is the common hope of the church, uncertainty of attainment would have been foreign to the subject, but if he was speaking of a prize which will be awarded at "that day" by the Lord in His capacity of "the righteous Judge", then the element of uncertainty is rightly an integral part of the passage, for a prize to be won, and that could not be lost, is a contradiction in terms. If the prize of Philippians be kept distinct from the common calling, or the blessed hope of the church, truth will be seen both in Ephesians and Philippians, but if we confound Hope and Prize, a greater shipwreck than was Paul's experience awaits us.

But to resume.

> "And when the south wind blew softly, supposing that they had obtained their purpose, loosing thence they sailed close by Crete" (xxvii. 13).

From Fair Havens to Cape Matala was but four of five miles, so that with a gentle southerly wind the cape would be weathered, and the thirty-five miles from that point easily covered. It is possible that fair weather sails were set, and we know from verse 16 that a boat was in tow, so with hearts lightened and a good prospect before them the ship once more set sail.

How often in life does not that "south wind blow softly", over-riding the severer counsels of grace and truth. Alas! the gentle breathing of the south wind in the sails and cordage was but a siren song, for scarcely had they passed the cape than a typhoon burst upon them. The word tuphonikos describes the circular whirling of the clouds caused by the meeting of the S. and the E.N.E. winds. Both Pardy's "Sailing Directory" and Smith's "Voyage and Shipwreck", say that this is exactly what might have been expected. The ancient name for this wind is "The Euroclydon", and the modern name is "The Levanter". This awful wind "seized" the ship in its grasp so that the helmsman could not "look at the wind". The suddenness of the storm allowed no time to furl the mainsail, a circumstance which left them no alternative but to scud before the gale.

The island of Clauda lies twenty miles S.W. of Cape Matala, and the fact that the wind drove the vessel towards that island, made the sailors fear lest it should drive them into Syrtis, the quicksands which are off the African coast at this point. Though temporarily protected by the shelter of the island of Clauda, they had "much work to come by the boat", which, however, was eventually hauled aboard, when more serious operations were demanded.

> "They used helps, undergirding the ship; and, fearing lest they should fall into the quicksands, strake sail, and so were driven" (xxvii. 17).

Note the use of "we" and "they". Luke lent a hand in hauling in the boat, but the operation called "undergirding" was no work for a landsman to attempt.

The ships of the ancients possessed one large mast and one large sail, with the addition of a few topsails and a small auxiliary mast. It will readily be seen that with such a mast and sail bearing the full force of the wind, a tremendous strain would be thrown upon the ship. Virgil, who describes the loss of ships by various means, says, "all with fastenings loosened". Consequently, a ship "thoroughly furnished" carried tackle called "Undergirders", which consisted of strong ropes for passing around the hull of the ship to prevent the starting of its timbers. In more recent times this method was called "Frapping", which Falconer's Marine Dictionary thus describes:

> "To frap a ship is to pass four or five turns of a large cable-laid rope round the hull or frame of a ship."

For the moment the immediate dangers were averted. The boat had been saved, and the ship undergirt. But a great danger still threatened the ship.

What precisely is meant by the words "strake sail"? The literal translation is "they lowered the gear", but this is indeterminate. To have scudded before the gale with bare poles would have driven the ship on to the quicksands: to have anchored was impossible, and the only other course open was that known as "lying to". This was accomplished by bringing the prow of the vessel round as near to the wind as possible; that is, just enough of the huge mainsail would be left to steady the ship, and, having made all the preparation that circumstances permitted, the ship was left to drift broadside on, at the mercy of wind and wave. All night long the gale continued, and it became necessary to "lighten the ship". Conybeare and Howson draw attention to the change of tense in verses 18 and 19. "They began to lighten the ship", or "kept lightening", whereas on the third day both sailors and passengers united in throwing out all the spare gear into the sea. The ship had now been reduced to a leaky and dismantled hulk,

> "and when neither sun nor stars in many days appeared, and no small tempest lay on us, all hope that we should be saved was then taken away" (xxvii. 20).

Imagination falters as it tries to picture the physical and mental state of these 300 helpless souls. No fire could be lighted; no cooking done; no relief afforded from the soaking spray; no prospect existed but that of an awful death in a foundering vessel. In all this the Apostle and his companions took their share. It is certain that Paul, who in other circumstances had said "these hands have ministered unto my necessities", would have lent a willing hand in all the work necessitated by the dreadful storm. It has been said that one of the hardest things to do is to refrain from saying "I told you so", and Paul, before venturing once again to advise his fellow men, had fellowship in prayer with God. In the result, however, Paul, in order to gain the confidence of his hearers, does allude to his advice which had been rejected. Nevertheless he was able to assure them that, although the ship would become a wreck, no life would be lost. The whole ship's company, therefore, owed their safety to the fact that this one Jewish prisoner, by the will of God, must reach Rome.

> "Fear not, Paul", (said the angel of God) "thou must stand before Cæsar: and, lo, God hath given thee all who sail with thee" (xxvii. 24).

Paul added that he believed God, and that they would be cast upon a certain island.

The rate at which a vessel, which is laid-to, drifts, varies according to the build of the ship and the intensity of the gale. In the circumstances of Acts xxvii., both James Smith and Admiral Penrose agree that "a mile and a half in the hour, or thirty-six miles in twenty-four hours, may be taken as a fair average". After further technicalities the same authorities conclude that the angle of drift would be thirteen points with the direction of the wind. If the wind therefore was E.N.E., the course of the drift would be W. by N., "and such is nearly the bearing of the North Coast of Malta from the south side of Clauda". There is no need to make a sinuous line to indicate the track of this doomed vessel; the course would not deviate far from a straight line. "Adria" (xxvii. 27) was the name given to the part of the Mediterranean between Greece, Italy and Africa, and Josephus uses this same name "Adria" when he was shipwrecked and landed at Puteoli.

At the close of the fourteenth night, the sailors deemed that they drew near to land. Taking soundings they found "twenty fathoms", and after an interval "fifteen fathoms" were reported.

> "Then, fearing lest we should have fallen upon rocks, they cast four anchors out of the stern and wished for the day" (xxvii. 29).

It is usual for a vessel to anchor from the prow, but there would have been a danger of the ship swinging round and being smashed on the rocks. It is said that "Lord Nelson, reading this chapter just before the battle of Copenhagen, ordered our vessels to be anchored by the stern". There was also the ulterior object in view, which was to run the ship ashore as soon as daylight enabled them to select a suitable spot. Modern Greek vessels may still be seen anchoring by the stern in the Golden Horn. There is a painting on the walls of Herculaneum which represents "a ship so strictly contemporaneous with that of St. Paul, that there is nothing impossible in the supposition that the artist had taken his subject from the very ship, on loosing from the pier at Puteoli".

Thirteen days had elapsed since the ship started to drift. According to the computation given a little earlier, the ship must, therefore, have covered about 468 miles. Now the distance between Clauda and Malta is less than 480 miles, and there is every reason therefore to believe that the island now known as Malta is the one intended in Acts xxviii. 1, there called Melita.

An attempt of the shipmen to escape was frustrated by the prompt act of the soldiers in cutting the ropes holding the boat, Paul having said, "Except these abide in the ship, ye cannot be saved". Exhorting all to take food, adding, "not a hair shall fall from the head of any of you", Paul thanked God in the presence of them all; and when he had "broken bread" he began to eat. It seems incredible that any writer, possessed of the ability to write a commentary on the whole of the Scriptures, should be so possessed of the value of the "sacraments" as to suggest "that this act may have been connected with a celebration of the Holy Eucharist".

Even those who retain the ordinance of the Lord's Supper, must exclaim here, "Save me from my friends!"

> "And when it was day, they knew not the land; but they discovered a certain creek with a shore, into which they were minded, if it were possible, to thrust the ship. And when they had taken up the anchors, they committed themselves unto the sea, and loosed the rudder bands, and hoised up the mainsail to the wind, and made for the shore. And falling into a place where two seas met, they ran the ship aground" (xxvii. 40, 41).

The harbour of Valetta was seven miles away and the place where the ship struck was Ras el Koura, which is an iron-bound coast, but the mariners saw that at one extremity the cliffs sank down into a flat beach. To make a tack athwart the wind with a disabled ship was a manoeuvre by no means easy, but it was worth attempting. The anchors were cut away, the ropes falling into the sea (not, as the A.V., "committed themselves unto the sea"), and the paddle rudders which had been lashed out of the way of the anchors were loosed, and they made for the shore. Again the influence of the Apostle was exerted and the lives of the prisoners spared, and at length the whole company, on spars and pieces of wreckage, escaped safely through (diasothenai) to land.

Before closing this article, we present the remainder of the evidence gathered by Conybeare and Howson for the belief that the island called "Melita" is the modern "Malta".

(1) The presence of breakers, yet without striking the land.
(2) The direction and distance of the drifting vessel (already indicated).
(3) The soundings, 20 fathoms, then 15 fathoms.
(4) The presence, on a rocky coast, of a sandy beach.
(5) The opening, "a place between two seas".
(6) The fact that the anchors held all night.

Every one of these items find substantiation in the features of the eastern boundary of what to-day is called St. Paul's Bay, Malta. Even as to the character of the anchorage, the comment on St. Paul's Bay in "The English Sailing Directions" is, "While the cables hold, there is no danger, as the anchors will never start.

Here for the moment we must leave our study. Should the reader desire to pursue further the geographical and nautical arguments that demonstrate the accuracy of Luke's narrative, here but touched upon, he is referred to the authorities cited in the opening paragraph.

#53. From Jerusalem to Rome (xxii. 1 - xxviii. 22).
From Melita to Rome (xxviii. 1 - 22).
pp. 169 - 175

Before leaving the twenty-seventh chapter of the Acts, we draw attention to the spiritual element that alternates with the narrative of the voyage. The journey from Caesarea to Rome occupies chapter xxvii. to xxviii. 16, and divides into two sections.

A1 | xxvii. 1-44. CAESAREA TO MELITA.
A2 | xxviii. 1-22. MELITA TO ROME.

The sub-division of xxvii. 1 - 44 is as follows:

A | 1. Centurion, Paul and Prisoners.
B | 2-5. The Coasting Ship. Sidon to Myra.
B | 6-41. The Grain Ship. Myra to Malta.
A | 42-44. Centurion, Paul and Prisoners.

xxvii. 6 - 41 extended.

B | a1 | 6-8. Myra to Fair Havens.
b1 | 9, 10. Paul. Warning. Damage to ship and life.
a2 | 11-20. Fair Havens to Clauda.
b2 | 21-26. Paul. Exhortation. No loss of life, but of ship.
a3 | 27-29. Clauda to strange land.
b3 | 30, 31. Paul. Warning. Abide ship. Saved.
a4 | 32. The boat cut adrift.
b4 | 33-38. Paul. Good cheer. Not an hair fall.
a4 | 39-41. The ship broken up.

The above outline impresses the mind with the fact that, full as this narrative may be of nautical terms and geographical references, there is a spiritual theme running through it, the links of which are the four statements made by Paul. The prominent place which is given to the shipwreck seems to justify the view that it has a spiritual and typical object lesson. Between Paul, Jerusalem, and his past ministry, rolled the wide sea. The ship in which he traveled was broken to pieces, yet the outstanding testimony is that Paul was divinely assured that he must be brought before Caesar, and, apparently as a consequence, that all in the ship were to be given him.

Returning to the narrative at the opening of Acts xxviii., we find that upon reaching land the shipwrecked passengers found that it was the island of Melita or, as it is now called, Malta. The idea that the Adriatic island of Meleda is intended is founded upon a series of mistakes, first as to the true locality of "Adria", then as to the Roman usage of the word "barbarian", and lastly a misunderstanding as to the presence of "vipers" in the island. The contention has now been abandoned by most commentators. While the inhabitants of Malta were "barbarians" in the N.T. sense of the word, in the modern sense they were far from bring "barbaric". That is to say, they were of Phoenician origin, with a mingling of Greek settlers, but because they could speak neither Latin nor Greek, they were called Barbarians. Luke gratefully records the "no little kindness" which these islanders showed the suffering, shipwrecked company, "for they kindled a fire, and received us, every one, because of the present rain and because of the cold".

As here instanced, there are no mock heroics in Luke's story of Paul's life and ministry. Paul is evidently included with the rest of the voyagers in feeling the numbing cold and the fatigue of their experiences. But if there be no mock heroics, the fact stands out in the narrative, that in times of emergency the man of faith is often the most practical. Perhaps Paul had learned the secret which is beautifully expressed in these lines of a modern hymn,

> "A heart at leisure from itself,
> To soothe and sympathise."

At any rate we read that it was Paul who gathered a bundle of sticks to help on the fire kindled by the hospitable islanders. Incidentally the word phruganon, "sticks", is defined by Theophrastus as "furze roots", which disposes of an objection which has been raised that "timber" would not have been available at St. Paul's Bay. This kindly activity caused an incident which is of extreme importance in its bearing upon the dispensational position of the Acts of the Apostles. Awakened by the heat, a viper fastened on Paul's hand. We may well regard this as a malignant attack of the Evil One upon the servant of the Lord, but there is another angle from which it must be considered. That the bite of a viper was fatal was testified by the remarks and attitude of the inhabitants:

> "They said among themselves, No doubt this man is a murderer, whom, though he hath escaped the sea, yet vengeance suffereth not to live . . . . . they looked when he should have swollen or fallen down dead suddenly" (Acts xxviii. 4-6).

The word "vengeance" is dike, the equivalent of the Latin "justitia", an abstract personification, like "nemesis". The words "swollen, or fallen down dead suddenly", give a clear indication of the normal consequences of an attack such as Paul had sustained, and in his escape we have therefore a miracle of the highest rank, and that wrought at the close of the period covered by the Acts of the Apostles. Observe also the effect of a miracle upon a people untaught by Scripture. At first they assumed that Paul must be a murderer, but, on observing his exemption from the normal consequences of his wound, they changed their mind and concluded that he must be a god. Similarly, when a miracle was wrought in the presence of other untaught heathen, we find them saying, "The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men" (Acts xxviii. 11).

From this we learn the important lesson that although miracles, when performed before a people enlightened by the Scriptures, constituted a confirmation of truth and evidence that was calculated to bring about repentance and faith (Matt. xi. 1-6, 20; Heb. ii. 3, 4), their performance in the presence of untaught people might but deepen their idolatry and superstition.

At the end of Mark's Gospel we read these words:--

> "These signs shall follow them that believe; In My name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay their hands on the sick and they shall recover. So then after the Lord had spoken unto them, He was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God. And they went forth and preached everywhere, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with signs following. Amen" (Mark xvi. 17-20).

The fact that a viper, of all noxious creatures, should figure in these closing miracles of the Acts is of itself suggestive. Gen. iii. introduces the Serpent, with his enmity, and Rev. xx. sees his doom. When Moses received the call to leadership, he was given power over a serpent. Thus, also, at the close of the kingdom testimony, Paul picks up the creature which is the symbol of Satan and throws it into the fire, himself remaining unhurt. The "falling down suddenly" which the islanders expected is a symptom of snake bite confirmed by the ancient writer Lucian, and Shakespeare, with his embracive knowledge, says of Charmian, in Antony and Cleopatra, "Trembling she stood, and on the sudden dropped" (Ant. and Cleop. v. 2).

Those of our readers who hold that the last twelve verses of Mark xvi. do not form a part of inspired Scripture will probably feel that this passage should not be employed; but were we to respect every one's particular textual objection, it would be necessary to set aside a considerable number of important passages. The reader who has any doubt concerning Mark xvi. should consult Appendix 168 of the Companion Bible: the evidence of the Manuscript Versions and "The Fathers" there tabulated should be enough to convince any that the verses in question should be retained as found in the A.V. Mark ends on the note, "the Lord working with them, confirming the word with signs following". The Acts opens with a reference to "all that Jesus began both to do and to teach", and implies that the Acts is a continuation of this "doing" and "teaching", so that we are prepared to find the promise of Mark xvi. fulfilled throughout the record. If this be so, the dispensation that was ushered in at Pentecost remained unchanged. Healing, as well as immunity, was promised in Mark xvi., and both are found in Acts xxviii.

Luke's accuracy is again attested, by archaeological proof that has been forthcoming, that the title of Publius used, in the narrative, of "the chief man of the island" was one actually in use at the time. An ancient inscription found at Civita Vecchia uses the title Protos Melitaion, even as Luke uses protos for the title of Publius.

The Anglo Saxon reading of the Greek word dysentery in the words describing the illness of the father of Publius, viz., "a fever and of a bloody flux", robs the miracle of something of its power. The hand of Luke the Physician is evident in the narrative. Where other writers use kausomai and its derivatives, he had already used the medical term therme for "heat" in verse 3. He now observes that the dysentery from which the father of Publius suffered was "in an aggravated form", being accompanied by fever. The healing miracles of scripture are of an evident nature. Always, the person healed was conscious not merely of a strange undiagnosed pain, but was either blind, lame, deaf, or leprous; sometimes he was dead. To-day it is exceedingly difficult to get first-hand evidence of specific healing diagnosed disease, but, as the Apostle said of the testimony generally, in N.T. times "these things were not done in a corner". The miracle then was an undoubted one. Seeing it, others who had diseases, also came, and they, too, were healed. Thus three months went by before the Apostle left the island, a period giving full opportunity for the cures to be tested.

Coupled with the persistence of these prominent miracles is the fact that "the hope of Israel" was still entertained by the Apostle (Acts xxviii. 20). These two factors of kingdom witness steadily lead the reader to the conclusion that until this point in the narrative the dispensation had not changed, and the Mystery had not been revealed. This, however, comes before us in full strength in the last section of the Acts, namely at chapter xxviii. 23-31.

We must now resume the narrative of the Apostle's journey to Rome. The three months' sojourn in Malta end with the opening of the seas for safe navigation in February, a date confirmed by both Pliny and Vegetius. The centurion found another grain ship, which had wintered in the island, and on this he embarked with his company. This ship was named after the mythical twin sons of Zeus and Leda, and the twin-stars in the constellation Gemini were regarded as the patron deities of sailors. We can readily believe that the name of this ship had been recorded because of the suggestion it conveys that the heathen world was about to be brought into subjection to the gospel by the ministry of the poor Jewish prisoner. The writings of Paul and Luke give evidence that they would not be above remarking upon the appositeness of such a feature. Perhaps having said so much we must say more.

The constellation Gemini, "The Twins", preserves the ancient Hebrew name thaummim, which means "united", a word which occurs in the original of Exod. xxvi. 24, "coupled together". The old Coptic name of the constellation Pi-Mani conveys the same idea, "United as in brotherhood". The Apostle, who was being borne by this vessel on his journey to Rome, carried in his message the most marvelous "coupling together" of those previously divided, that even the Scriptures contained, and, knowing this, we cannot imagine either Luke or Paul to have been so dull-witted as not to perceive the appositeness of the sign, without, of course, endorsing its Pagan associations.

The distance from Malta to Syracuse is less than one hundred miles. Upon arrival, the Apostle and his fellows were permitted to land, and they tarried there for three days: "And from thence we fetched a compass." The Greek word perierchomai occurs in Acts xix. 13, where it is translated "vagabond", and means "To come or go around". Here, Lewin remarks:--

> "As the wind was westerly, and they were under the shelter of the high mountains range of Etna on their left, they were obliged to stand out to sea in order to fill their sails, and so came to Rhegium by a circuitous sweep, or as it has been translated, 'they fetched a compass'."

James Smith's view, that the word perierchomai means simply "beating", in the nautical sense, is probably more correct. At Rhegium, "The Twins" would have been forced upon the Apostle's notice once more, for Castor and Pollux were the patron divinities of the city. Here they tarried but a day. We learn from Josephus that the Emperor Caligula had projected a port here for the protection of Alexandrian corn ships, but had died without bringing it to completion. Mr. Smith computed that these vessels would travel at the rate of seven knots, and this well agrees with the distance covered according to Luke.

The south wind which sprang up after the one day's waiting was the most favourable for their purpose, and setting their course due north, the next day the vessel arrived at Puteoli, a distance of about 182 miles. Fifteen miles from Rhegium the vessel would pass between the famous Scylla and Charybdis, and, once more, we can imagine the Apostle and his companions gratefully remembering the snares and pitfalls through which, by grace, they had been safely guided. Puteoli stood in the bay of Naples, and was the great port of the Roman capital. In the Apostle's day Vesuvius was a lovely mountain, whose westward slopes were covered with vines (Mart. iv. 44), and no one could have suspected the near approach of the time when the admiral of the fleet would be lost in its fiery eruption, as though the judgment of another Sodom and Gomorrah were about to fall.

The advent of a grain ship made no uncommon stir among the populace of Puteoli. From a letter written by Seneca we learn that upon rounding into the bay all other ships were obliged to strike their top-sail, but the Alexandrian corn-ships were permitted to enter it with all sail set, and thus were instantly recognized. He speaks of the crowds that gathered to welcome these ships, and we can thus picture the scene that met the eye of the Apostle as he drew near to land.

Once again the Roman Centurion treated the Apostle courteously, and permitted him to spend a week with certain Christian brethren who met him there. This interval gave time for news of the Apostle's arrival to reach Rome before him, and so for a company of brethren to be in time to meet him on the Appian Way. From Puteoli to Rome was distance of about a hundred and forty-one miles. The Appian Way, along which the Centurion and his prisoners traveled to Rome, was described as Appia--Regina viarum, "The Queen of Roads", and was the most crowded approach to the metropolis. Should the reader desire fuller knowledge of this most ancient road, he should consult Gell's Topography of Rome and its vicinity, the quotation from it in Lewin's work on the Acts, or the description of the Apostle's journey in Conybeare and Howson. Space will not permit of this interesting aside here, and so, with the marvelous brevity of the scriptural narrative, we pass over all descriptive matter, and rejoice with the Apostle that:-- > "When the brethren heard of us, they came to meet us as far as Appii forum, and The three taverns; whom when Paul saw he thanked God and took courage" (Acts xxviii. 15).

How many pages have been, and could be written, to describe the city to which the Apostle drew near! Yet not one word is given by Luke. All he says is, "And when he came to Rome, the centurion delivered the prisoners to the captain of the guard". Just that, and no more. Here was the answer to the Apostle's earnest wish, expressed in the words, "I must see Rome". Here was the fulfillment of the Lord's promise; a promise that had sustained him alike amid the fury of the fanatical Jews and the fury of the storm. He had entered Damascus blind, and he entered Rome bound, but in both blindness and bondage, the Lord was with him, and the word of the Lord was glorified.

The character of Burrus, who was an honest, bluff, solider, was such that we might expect that the high opinion which the centurion held of the Apostle, together with the character of the charge against him, would allow him to treat his prisoner with humanity. This indulgence is indicated by the words: "But Paul was suffered to dwell by himself with a soldier that kept him." After the lapse of three days the Apostle called the chief of the Jews together, the outcome of the interview being that a day was appointed in which the peculiar tenets of the sect of which Paul was the reputed ringleader could be discussed.

As in our next article we shall want all available space to deal with the great dispensational landmark of Acts xxviii. 23-31, we will set out here the structure of the section that ends with verse 22 of chapter xxviii. although we have been unable to review its contents.

#54. From Jerusalem to Rome (xxii. 1 - xxviii. 22).
Paul's relation with Israel during the whole period of the Acts attested (xxviii. 17 - 22).
pp. 208 - 212

It will be remembered that when writing the epistle to the Romans, the Apostle expressed his great longing to meet them (Rom. i. 10-12), telling them that when he did come he would come in the fullness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ (Rom. xv. 29). It is of great importance therefore to notice, that when at last the opportunity is presented, those whom the Apostle first actually saw, by his own request, were the "chief of the Jews" (Acts xxviii. 17). The Apostle's primary object in so doing is on the surface. He knew by bitter experience what an influence the Jew, in his fanatical obstinacy and religious pride, had even over temperate and just Roman rulers, and the character of the Emperor before whose tribunal he was to appear to weight the scales of justice. The Apostle did not cover this very human purpose under a cloak of false piety, but manfully told these Jewish leaders his object:--

> "Men and brethren, though I have committed nothing against the people, or customs of our fathers, yet was I delivered prisoner from Jerusalem into the hands of the Romans, who when they had examined me, would have let me go, because there was no cause of > death in me. But when the Jews spake against it, I was constrained to appeal unto Caesar; not that I had ought to accuse my nation of" (Acts xxviii. 17-19).

Let us observe the following features:

Paul still addressed the chief of the Jews as "Men and brethren", a title which, as he explains in Rom. ix., belonged to Israel according to the flesh. The great change wherein "the twain" were created "one new man" had not yet been announced, and Israel as a nation still stood before God. From Acts xiii. 15 it is clear that this form of address was not necessarily a Christian one, for it was used by the ruler of the synagogue. When Paul used it for the first time in the Acts, he added, by way of explanation, "children of the stock of Abraham" (Acts xiii. 26); the added words, "and whosoever among you feareth God", is not an expansion, but addressed to a secondary company. So, in Acts xiii. 38, "Men and brethren" is the mode of address to those who in verse 41 were to be called "despisers" and, as verse 42 makes clear, were "Jews" as distinct from "Gentiles". We find Peter and James using the same form of address at the council at Jerusalem, where none but Hebrew Christians were present. We meet the expression no more until Paul addresses the Jews in Acts xxii. 1, xxiii. 1, and for the last time in xxviii. 17. To those who have learned to love and appreciate the hidden beauties of the Scriptures, it is no surprise to discover that this form of address occurs in the Acts just twelve times, twelve being most evidently the number of Israel.

The Apostles declared that he had committed nothing against "the people" or the customs of the fathers. Who, in Paul's estimate were "the people"? There is but one answer; Israel. In the same verse where we found the ruler of the synagogue using the title "Men and brethren" we find the first occurrence in the Pauline section of the Acts of the term "the people". When the appellation is first used by Paul he expands it, as he did the other title. He says, "The God of this people of Israel", and, with the exception of two references, namely Acts xv. 14 and xviii. 10, every one of the remaining occurrences, twelve in number, refers exclusively to Israel. In Acts xxviii. the references are pointed:

> "Nothing against this people" (Acts xxviii. 17).
> "Go unto this people" (Acts xxviii. 26).
> "For the heart of this people" (Acts xxviii. 27).

What of "the customs"? Ethos, "customs", occurs in the Acts seven times. In Acts xvi. 21 and xxv. 16 it is the "custom" or "manner" of the Romans that is intended, but in the remaining passages it is used of the peculiar customs of Israel.

It is of great interest to realize that the first occurrence of ethos in the Acts is found in the charge which brought about the stoning of Stephen, to which Paul had consented.

> That this Jesus of Nazareth shall destroy this place, and shall change the customs which Moses delivered us" (Acts vi. 14).

The Apostle makes it clear in more passages than one, that those dreadful, persecuting, days of his earlier life never left his memory, and it would be with humbled heart that he now defended himself against the very charge that had been laid against the man to whose death he had consented years before. That the ethos of the fathers was not to be confined to superficial customs is made clear from its use in Acts xv. 1, where "circumcision after the manner of Moses" is in view. Paul's present imprisonment had been brought about because he had sought to rebut the charge made against him that he > "Taught the Jews which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, saying that they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs" (Acts xxi. 21).

and Paul acted as he did, so that all might know that, as the elders said to him, "those things, whereof they were informed concerning thee, are nothing, but that thou thyself walkest orderly and keepest the law" (Acts xxi. 24). These most explicit statements reduce the issue to two heads. Either Paul did walk orderly and kept the law, or he did not. If he did, then the truth of the Mystery could not have been made known during the period of the Acts. If he did not, then his statements are false and we are of all men the most miserable.

"The fathers." To whom do these words refer? Again, and for the third time, we return to the synagogue at Antioch and hear the Apostle speak.

> "We declare unto you glad tidings, how that the promise which was made unto the fathers God hath fulfilled" (Acts xiii. 32, 33).

His own written testimony in the epistle to the Romans is conclusive, "My brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh; who are Israelites . . . . . whose are the fathers" (Rom. ix. 3, 5). In Acts xxviii., immediately before he said "this people", the Apostle exclaims, "Well spake the Holy Ghost by Esaias the prophet unto our fathers" (Acts xviii. 25). Further on in his statement to the chief of the Jews the Apostle used another expression, "My nation" (Acts xxviii. 19). The word translated "nation" is ethnos, and is frequently rendered "Gentiles", when found in the plural, as it is in Acts xxviii. 28. Paul mostly used the word to designate the Gentiles, but when he said:

> "I came to bring alms to my nation" (Acts xxiv. 17).
> "My own nation at Jerusalem" (Acts xxvi. 4).

it is evident that he speaks of Israel, "the nation", as distinct from the rest of the "nations". At Acts xxviii. 19, Israel was still Paul's nation.

Up to this point, however, what has been brought forward is negative in character: e.g., Paul had committed nothing against this people or its customs. But lest his testimony should be misconstrued he recapitulates, introducing a positive note.

> "For this cause therefore have I called for you, to see you, and to speak with you, because that for the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain" (Acts xxviii. 20).

In his defence before Agrippa, who was expert in all "customs" of the Jews and who therefore would be able to appreciate the Apostle's definite avowal, he said:

> "And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers: unto which our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come" (Acts xxvi. 6, 7).

This was none other than the promise which formed the burden of the Apostle's question in Acts i.

> "When they therefore were come together, they asked of Him, saying, Lord, wilt Thou at this time restore again the kingdom of Israel?" (Acts i. 6).

It was to this Peter referred when he said that the times of restitution of all things, which God by the mouth of all his holy prophets had spoken, would commence upon the repentance of Israel (Acts iii. 19-26). Moreover, the Apostle could have shown these Jews his own written statement in the letter he had sent to the church at Rome touching their hope, that it was the hope of Israel.

> "There shall be a root of Jesse; and He that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles; in Him shall the Gentiles hope (elpizo), now the God of that hope (elpis) fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost" (Rom. xv. 12, 13).

Once we admit that these are the words of truth and soberness, we must also admit that the hope of the church up till the writing of the epistle to the Romans was the hope of the Kingdom, for what other meaning can attach to the words "reign over the Gentiles"? It is, moreover, the hope of Israel, for if not, why introduce the title "The root of Jesse"? and why say "reign over" the Gentiles? If any one should object to this translation of archo, let him turn to Mark x. 42. Moreover, this hope was associated with the power of the Holy Ghost.

It is therefore impossible to dissociate the hope of the early church from the hope of Israel, without impugning the veracity of the apostle Paul, or denying the inspiration of Rom. xv.

From the first chapter of the Acts one hope is before the church right on to the moment when Israel were set aside. But then, for the very sufficient reason that a new calling had been revealed, it became necessary to pray that the church might perceive "what is the hope of His calling".

"This sect" (Acts xxviii. 22).

There are three sects mentioned in the Acts:

(i.) The sect of the SADDUCEES (Acts v. 17).
(ii.) The sect of the PHARISEES (Acts xv. 5).
(iii.) The sect of the NAZARENES (Acts xxiv. 5).

The Apostle refers to this sect of the Nazarenes, saying:

> "But this I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy (airesis, "sect") so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and the prophets" (Acts xxiv. 14).

The Sadducees worshipped the God of their fathers after the way that men called "a sect", but they did not believe all that was written in the law and the prophets, for they particularly denied the hope of resurrection. The Pharisees, too, worshipped the God of their fathers after the way that men called "a sect", believing, at least professedly, all that was written, and definitely including the hope of resurrection in their creed, yet they overloaded the written word with an accumulation of tradition so great that it was made of none effect.

The Christian Church began, as a movement of the Spirit of God, within the ranks of the Jews: it grew up as a minority that still worshipped in synagogue: it was augmented by believing Gentiles, who were blessed under the New Covenant, and were accounted children of Abraham and heirs according to the promise (Gal. iii. 29), but the Church was never divorced from Israel, its hope, its promises or its covenants, until Israel itself became "lo-ammi" at Acts xxviii. 25.

It is because of the extreme importance of this chapter dispensationally, that it has figured so prominently in our ministry throughout the thirty years in which we have sought to fulfil the sacred trust committed to us.

To return to the momentous meeting at Rome, the chief of the Jews concluded the first interview by saying: "We desire to hear of thee what thou thinkest", and accordingly a day was appointed.

What the Apostle "thought", the way he presented his argument, the crisis that was reached in that "lodging" in Rome, must be the subject of our next paper.

EPHESIA.

#4. Christos Iesous, "Christ Jesus", The Exalted (Eph. i. 1).

A Concordance to text of the R.V.
pp. 15, 16

"Paul" has been declared "an apostle", but obviously no one can be an apostle, "a sent one", without a "sender", and so we come to the Lord Who sent him. The A.V. reads, "Paul an Apostle of Jesus Christ"; the R.V reads, "Paul an Apostle of Christ Jesus". The order of words in a title is always important, but especially so when that title is the Lord's. Let us therefore examine the R.V. and see what light it throws upon the point. The first occurrence of the title is found in the R.V. of Acts iii. 20, and Alford's translation of it is suggestive: "Him Who was predestined your Messiah, namely, Jesus." We meet the title in Acts xix. 4, but the R.V. there reads simply "Jesus". In Acts xxiv. 24, however, where the A.V. reads "Christ", the R.V. reads "Christ Jesus". These are the only occurrences in the Acts and it will be seen that, whether we retain Acts xix. 4 or not, the only one to use the title is either Paul himself, or Felix in addressing Paul.

"Christ Jesus" is found in both versions in Rom. iii. 24; viii. 1, 2; xv. 5 and xvi. 3. There are six other occasions where the R.V. reads "Christ Jesus" instead of "Jesus Christ", "Christ", or "Jesus Christ our Lord", namely, Romans vi. 3, 11; viii. 11, 34; xv. 16, 17.

In I Corinthians the title Christ Jesus occurs in i. 2, 30; iv. 15; xvi. 24; and, according to the R.V., in i.4, in place of the title "Jesus Christ". In II Corinthians the title occurs but once, and that only in the R.V. of i. 1. Galatians contains, according to the A.V., five references, but the R.V. omits vi. 15. The remainder are ii. 4; iii. 26, 28 and iv. 14. The R.V. adds ii. 16; iii. 14; v. 6, 24.

Ephesians, according to the A.V., has six occurrences: i. 1; ii. 6, 7, 10, 13; iii. 21. To these the R.V. adds i. 1 (the passage before us); ii. 20; iii. 1, 6. Philippians, according to the R.V., has eleven references: i. 1 (twice), 8, 26; ii. 5; iii. 3, 12, 14; iv. 7, 19, 21. Colossians has but three for the R.V. alters i. 28 to "Christ" and adds to i. 4; i. 1; iv. 12.

I Thessalonians has but two: ii. 14; v. 18. I Timothy has eight occurrences: i. 4, 15; ii. 5; iii. 13; vi. 13; to which the R.V. adds i. 1 (twice); iv. 6; v. 21. II Timothy has eleven occurrences: i. 2, 9, 13; ii. 1, 10; iii. 12, 15, to which the R.V. adds i. 1, 10; ii. 3; iv. 1. Titus has but one reference, R.V. i. 4. Philemon: In verse 6, where the A.V. reads "Christ Jesus" the R.V. reads "Christ". Verses 1 and 9 are added by the R.V. and both versions read "Christ Jesus" in verse 23. Hebrews has but one reference in the A.V., that of iii. 1. This, however, is changed in R.V. to "Jesus". There remains but two other references, namely I Pet. v. 10, 14, both of which are altered in the R.V. to read "Christ".

From this analysis two facts emerge that are of importance to us all.

(1) No other writer than Paul uses the title.
(2) The title does not occur in the Epistle to the Hebrews.

The title does not occur in II Thessalonians, but as this is a corrective of I Thess., where the title is found, and as both epistles can be considered a pair, this leaves Hebrews as the only one of Paul's epistles where, apparently, the title has no place. As to the distinctive meaning of this title, The Companion Bible (App. 98, xi. and xii.) says:

> "Jesus Christ.—In the combination of these two names, the former is emphatic by its position, the second being subsidiary and explanatory. In the Gospels it means 'Jesus the Messiah'. In the Epistles it means, Jesus Who humbled Himself but is now exalted and glorified as Christ. Care should be taken to note the various readings.
> Christ Jesus.—This is the converse of 'Jesus Christ' (xi.) and denotes the now exalted One, Who once humbled Himself."

In one or two cases the title "Christ Jesus" is found joined with another: "Our hope" (I Tim. i. 1); "The Man" (I Tim. ii. 5); "Our Saviour" (II Tim. i. 10; Titus i. 4). This leaves one reference by Peter, Acts iii. 20, and, if we include the words of Felix, we have seventy occurrences of the simple title "Christ Jesus" in the rest of the N.T., every reference being intimately associated with Paul as the Apostle of the Gentiles.

The distribution of the title according to the two great divisions of Paul's epistles, are the first seven (Rom., Gal., Heb., I & II Thess., and I & II Cor.), twenty-six occurrences. The second seven (Eph., Phil., Col., I & II Tim., Titus and Philemon), forty-three occurrences. There are seventy-two chapters in the first set of epistles with their twenty-six occurrences and there are twenty-eight chapters in the second set of epistles with their forty-three occurrences. This works out in the proportion of (33:153) thirty-three to one-hundred and fifty-three, revealing that the mystery, with Christ as the ascended and seated Lord, is essentially related to Him in His capacity as "Christ Jesus". These facts would have been out of place in an exposition of the Epistle, but under the title "Ephesia" can be given a place.

We would acknowledge our indebtedness to Miss Ada Habershon's Concordance to the Names and Titles of the Lord of glory, which was published by James Nisbet in 1910.

(see: Romans30, pages 152 – 156).

#5. The Preposition DIA (Eph. i. 1).

With a note on the meaning of the terms "preposition" and "genitive case".
pp. 29, 30

Paul was "an apostle of Christ Jesus". This office was not of his own seeking or appointing; it was not received at the hands of men, but "by the will of God". The word translated "by" here is dia, a preposition that governs the accusative and genitive cases. We propose in the present article to consider briefly the meaning of these terms, with particular reference to Eph. i. 1.

What is a preposition? A preposition is a part of speech, usually a particle, placed before a noun or its equivalent, and forming a qualifying or an adverbial phrase. Nearly all the prepositions convey either the idea of motion going on, or rest as a result of motion finished. Thus ek ("out") may be likened to the motion of an arrow just leaving the bow; dia ("through") to the flight of the arrow through the air; eis ("unto") to the direction of the arrow towards its goal; and en ("in") to the arrival of the arrow at the mark. Every preposition can be indicated in terms of either motion or rest.

What is a case? In grammar a "case" is a form, indicated by a terminal change in the word, which is used to express relationship. English has almost ceased to be an inflectional or declined language. We now have only one case of this kind in common use, namely the "apostrophe s", which we use to indicate the possessive (as in the phrase "John's book"). In Greek there are four cases:

(1) THE NOMINATIVE.—This stands for the subject of the sentence.
(2) THE GENITIVE.—This answers to the English possessive, but is wider in its scope, denoting origin. "Of" is a characteristic translation.
(3) THE DATIVE.—The word is derived from the Latin "to give", and its meaning can perhaps be understood from the usage in English "Give me the book", which of course means "Give to me the book". "To", "at", and "in" are characteristic translations.
(4) THE ACCUSATIVE.—This is the object of the sentence.

These items will be more fully explained as instances are met with in the course of this series. We trust that sufficient has been said for the moment.

Dia is a preposition that governs the accusative and genitive cases. In Eph. i. 1 the preposition governs the genitive, and we will therefore devote our attention to this aspect only. From the special meaning "through", it is an easy transition to the conception of an instrument through which anything is accomplished, as in John's epistle: "I would not with ink and pen write" (II John 12). From material instruments the meaning passes to the non-material, and so is associated with "power", "faith", "will", etc. There are fifteen occurrences of dia followed by the genitive in Ephesians, and its meaning will perhaps be made clearer if we use this opportunity to quote the passages concerned:

"By the will of God" (i. 1);
"By Jesus Christ" (i. 5; iii. 9);
"Through His blood" (i. 7);
"Through faith" (ii. 8);
"By the cross" (ii. 16);
"Through Him" (ii. 18);
"By the gospel" (iii. 6);
"By the church" (iii. 10);
"By the faith" (iii. 12);
"By His Spirit" (iii. 16);
"By faith" (iii. 17);
"Through all" (iv. 6);
"By that" (iv. 16);
"With all prayer" (vi. 18).

The present series is not intended to take the place of exposition, but rather to provide an opportunity of noting and explaining much that otherwise has to be taken for granted. We shall therefore limit each article to the consideration of one particular point.

#6. Thelematos, "Will" (Eph. i. 1).
pp. 36, 37

Paul, the Apostle of Christ Jesus, became so "through" the instrumentality of the "will of God". In translation, to give smooth reading, the English demands the insertion of the article "the", but in passing we note that in the original the article is omitted and read dia thelematos Theou. Until one meets us in the course of this series, we defer comment on the article, and devote our attention to the word translated "will". In the nominative case this word is written thelema, but in the genitive it changes to thelematos. Its derivation is from the verb thelo, to will or to wish, and the ending ma, indicates that the verb has been changed to a "thing". For example, phileo is the verb "I love", "a kiss" is philema "a love things".

Thelema, "will", occurs seven times in Ephesians: "By the will of God" (i. 1); "The good pleasure of His will" (i. 5); "The mystery of His will" (i. 9); "The counsel of His Own will" (i. 11); "Fulfilling the desires of the flesh and the mind" (ii. 3); "What the will of the Lord is" (v. 17); "doing the will of God from the heart" (vi. 6). It will be observed that one of these occurrences (ii. 3) deals with man, and is translated in the A.V. "desires".

> "Thelema", says Cremer, is "an Hellenistic word foreign to profane Greek. It stands for the Hebrew words chaphets (Prov. xxi. 1); and ratson (Psa. xl. 8), and therefore does not denote will as demand but as an expression of inclination or pleasure toward that which is liked, that which pleases and creates joy. When it denotes God's will, it signifies His gracious disposition toward something, Mal. i. 10; Jer. ix. 24; Isa. lxii. 4; Psa. xxx. 7; and it is also used to designate what God does of His own good pleasure, Psa. ciii. 7 . . . . . so that it does not signify a command, but the expression of His good > pleasure. The N.T. usage differs in the LXX in this, that as a rule it stands for the will of God . . . . . nowhere is it a name for the commands of God as such . . . . . it designates what occurs, or what should be done by others, as the object of God's good pleasure, be it carrying out the divine purpose or the accomplishment of what He would have."

The Lord was graciously disposed toward Paul, in spite of the fact that he was before "a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious" (I Tim. i. 13). It is "the good pleasure of His will" that the Apostle speaks of as the spring and origin of His choice, predestination and adoption of the members of the Church. Redemption itself is called "the mystery of His will", and God is spoken of as working all things "after the counsel of His will". These are the references in Ephesians that speak of the will of God in connection with the great plan of salvation, grace and glory. The last two references in Ephesians (v. 17 and vi. 6) have to do with Christian practice and living.

The first occurrence of thelema in the N.T. is in Matt. vi. 10, "Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven", and the last in Rev. iv. 11, "Thou hast created all things, and for Thy pleasure they are and were created".

We shall have opportunity presently to compare the two words thelema "will" and boule "counsel" (Eph. i. 11). All that we will do at the moment is to make an extract from Dr. Bullinger's Lexicon:--

> Thelo.—"Used in cases where the wisdom and justice, etc., are not apparent, but where the will is arbitrary or absolute."
>
> Boulomai.—"To have a wish, intention or purpose, formed after mature deliberation."

#7. Theos, "God", with a note on the irrelevance of etymology in this case.

pp. 49, 50

Paul was an Apostle "by the will of God" (Eph. i. 1). We will examine the word Theou, translated "of God". The student will observe that in the original there is no separate word for "of", but that it is indicated by throwing the word Theos, "God", into the Genitive case, Theou. Words ending in os, such as Theos, Logos, etc., take ou in the singular to form the possessive or genitive case. When it is known that the Greeks pronounce ou as though it were written ov, the likeness to the English sign "of" will enable us to remember the genitive more easily.

Theos.—What a small word to represent so great a Subject! On the other hand, mere multiplication of syllables would bring the concept, God, no nearer. The first thing we must note and keep steadily before us is, that whatever the derivation of the word, it was not coined by the inspired writers of the Scriptures, but reclaimed from the heathen. The true and living GOD is known by exactly the same name as idols of wood and stone, or the gods of ancient mythology. The second is, that nowhere throughout the N.T. is there the slightest attempt to build any doctrine upon the etymology of the word. On the contrary, in view of the fact that the word had for centuries been in common use to indicate "gods many", it will be seen that any doctrine built upon the mere meaning of the word is almost sure to be false. Call Him by whatever name we will, the N.T. ever points to Christ, the Logos, as the One and Only Interpreter of the being and nature of God.

Two main lines of argument are put forward by those who seek the derivation of Theos:

(1) That it comes from the Sanscrit root, DIU-S, which means fire, the sun, a ray of light, the sky, and heaven. From this root is traceable the name Jupiter (Dies-Piter or Diu Piter), i.e., Heaven-father. From DIV (Heaven) may be traced the English Divine (abbreviated from Dr. Bullinger's Lexicon).

(2) That is comes from the Greek verb Tithemi, "to place", Theos being "The Placer". This derivation must be treated with extreme reserve, otherwise we shall be found following in the footsteps of the heathen.

A Stoic writer, Phurnutus, who lived in the reign of Nero, wrote a "Philosophical Explanation of the Heathen Worship and Ceremonies", in which he plainly refers them all to the different parts of material nature; as for instance, to the heavens, air, ether, sun, moon, stars, etc. This philosopher, in his chapter "Peri Ouranon", concerning heaven, says, "It is possible that theoi, the gods, were so called from thesis, 'position' or 'placing'; for the ancients took those for gods whom they found to move in a certain regular and constant manner, thinking them the causes of the changes of the air, and of the conservation of the universe; these then are the gods (theoi) which are the disposers (theteres), and formers of all things" (Parkhurst).

Thus it will be seen that the derivation of Theos leads us back into the darkness of idolatry, and, interesting as the history of the word may be, it will but tend to lead us to transgress the explicit command of God. The Orphic hymns prove that the demons of ancient worship were the intelligencies residing in created nature, especially the heavens, and the first and second commandments of the Law of Moses seem definitely to be attacked in such hymns as:--

"The demons, who in heaven reside, in air.
In water, or in earth or underneath
the earth . . . . ."

Theos is employed by the LXX translation, to translate the Hebrew Elohim, "God", but the plural, Theoi, is never used to translate the plural, Elohim, for this would but have ministered to the prevailing idolatry. The name Theos is used of the Father (John xiii. 3); of the Son (John i. 1); and of the Holy Ghost (Acts v. 3,4). It is used of heathen gods or idols (Acts xiv. 11), of magistrates (John x. 34, 35); and of Satan (II Cor. iv. 4). The word is translated "God" 1,326 times in the A.V., and "god" 12 times, besides "godly", "exceedingly", etc. In all this mass of material there is not a single passage which takes the word Theos and develops from its derivation a doctrine or a definition. To us, it matters not whether Theos be derived from the Sanscrit or from the Greek Tithemi, for they are alike false, because they originate in and lead to darkness.

"God" is explained by such additional titles as "The Living God", "The True God", "The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ", "The God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob", "The Most High God", "The Incorruptible God", and "The Almighty God".

Quite irrespective of the meaning of the word Theos, the nature of God is given in a threefold revelation: "God is Spirit", "God is Light", "God is Love". He is further denominated "The God of Glory", "The God of Patience", "The God of Hope", "The God of Peace" and "The God of all Grace". It is, moreover, insisted that God is "no respecter of persons". For all that it still remains true, that > "No man hath seen God (Theos) at any time; the only-begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him" (John i. 18).

#8. The Greek article (Eph. i. 1).
pp. 145, 146

The Apostle addresses this epistle to "the saints" (tois hagiois). The English translation demands the insertion of the article before the "will of God", but in the original it appears for the first time in the phrase "to the saints". The reader will note that both words (tois and hagiois) end with similar letter. The ending ois may indicate either the plural or the dative. However, we have already touched upon the meaning of the dative on page 29 (April, 1942) of this Volume, and we must now turn our attention to the definite article "the".

We are met at the outset with a great variety of opinions among grammarians. There are some, like Bishop Middleton, who maintain that the article is always used in compliance with the strictest rules, while there are others who declare that the use of the article is guided by no rule at all. Originally the article was a demonstrative pronoun "that", and we should remember that there is still a remnant of this meaning in most of its occurrences. The phrase "Bring the book", for example, can never refer to the bringing of any book, but rather to some particular book ("that book") which has been indicated by position, colour, subject, etc.

In English the definite article remains unchanged whatever the noun, but this is not so in the Greek. Many readers will be acquainted with the three forms of the French article le, la, les (Mas. Sing., Fem. Sing., and Plural). Similarly in Greek we have ho, he, to (Mas., Fem., and Neuter), the form of the article changing with the noun before which it stands. Ho logos, for example (Mas. Sing. Nom.) becomes tou logou when in the Genitive. The sign of the dative is oi ("iota subscript"), and this becomes ois in the plural, as in Eph. i. 1. The corresponding dative plural of the definite article, whether masculine or neuter, is tois.

At first the student usually feels that all this involves a great amount of unnecessary learning, but as the language becomes more familiar and the nice distinctions which these inflexions permit are appreciated, the suitability of the Greek tongue as a medium of revelation becomes apparent.

It is manifestly impossible for us in the present article to embark upon a systematic examination of the use of the Greek article—Bishop Middleton's well-known treatise runs into nearly 500 pages—and we must therefore be content with the following points, which indicate in broad outline the way in which the article is used in the N.T.:--

(1) DEFINITE: The, that, this. "This saying", "This persuasion", "This letter" (John vii. 40; Gal. v. 8; Col. iv. 16).
(2) EMPHATIC: He parthenos, "THE virgin" (Matt. i. 23). Ho huios, ho agepetos, "My Son (even) THE beloved" (Matt. iii. 17).
(3) EXPLANATIVE: "The adoption, that is to say, the redemption of our body" (Rom. viii. 23).
(4) PREVIOUS MENTION: Thus "the angel" (Matt. i. 24) is the one mentioned earlier in the narrative.
(5) ASSUMED EXISTENCE: Thus is Gal. i. 7, "There be some that trouble you": Hoi tarassontes, "the troublers".
(6) ATTRIBUTE or QUALITY: Hoi adikoi, "the unjust". This obviously refers to the whole class, "all who are unjust".

We shall find various examples of the usage of the Greek article as we proceed with this series. What has been said here merely prepares the way, and indicates the wide ground covered.

#9. Hagios, "Saint" (Eph. i. 1).
pp. 176, 177

"THE SAINTS."—These were the addresses of this Epistle, and, in #8 of this series, we took the opportunity presented by the first occurrence of the article to make a few remarks upon it.

The Greek word translated "saint" is hagios, and no other word is so translated in the A.V. Different views are entertained as to the etymology of the word. One, which is suspect and considered fanciful, is that it is composed of a, negative and ge, "the earth", but most lexicographers are of the opinion that it is allied to hagos, "purity", from hazo, "to venerate". The Greek however would most certainly never have conceived of a sanctity that was "not of the earth"—to learn that truth we are obliged to turn to the Scriptures. Where Pagan Greek words have been adopted by the Holy Spirit, they must be looked upon as "new creatures", so far as their pedigree is concerned, and it is from their synonyms, associates and contexts that we must discover the meaning which inspiration attaches to them. We are on more definite ground when we know that the LXX uses hagios to translate the Hebrew word qadosh, and we must allow the etymology and usage of the Hebrews word to colour the Greek hagios.

The word hagios occurs in Ephesians fifteen times, and is translated either "saint" or "holy".

Hagios, translated "saint".

"To the saints which are at Ephesus" (Eph. i. 1).
"I heard of your . . . . . love unto all the saints" (i. 15).
"The glory of His inheritance in the saints" (i. 18).
"Fellow citizens with the saints" (ii. 19).
"Who am less than the least of all saints" (iii. 8).
"May be able to comprehend with all saints" (iii. 18).
"For the perfecting of the saints" (iv. 12).
"Let it not be . . . . . named . . . . . as becometh saints" (v. 3).
"Watching . . . . . with supplication . . . . . for all saints" (vi. 18).

Hagios, translated "holy".

"That ye should be holy and without blame" (Eph. i. 4).
"Ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of promise" (i. 13).
"Groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord" (ii. 21).
"As it is now revealed unto His holy apostles and prophets" (iii. 5).
"Grieve not the holy Spirit of God" (iv. 30).
"That it should be holy and without blemish" (v. 27).

It will be seen that "the saints" (i. 1) are such by their calling (i. 4), and that this calling is realized through the finished work of Christ on their behalf (v. 27), and while, in the first instance, their sainthood derives from what God has done rather than what they are in themselves, there is, subsequently, such a thing as a manner of life that "becometh" saints (v. 3), and that love for, and prayer on behalf of, the saints, for one another, is comely. Some of the passages referred to, for example Eph. i. 18, will come under review again, when a more searching examination can be made as to a possible new translation.

The only derivative of hagios found in Ephesians is hagiazo, "to sanctify" (Eph. v. 26). There the word is associated with "cleansing", "washing" and "presenting" without spot or wrinkle, and illuminates the intention of the Spirit in the use of the word "saint" in addressing this epistle. The other derivatives are:--

Hagiasmos, "sanctification" (I Cor. i. 30);
Hagion, used in the plural, "sanctuary" (Heb. viii. 2);
Hagiotes, "holiness", abstract quality (Heb. xii. 10);
Hagiosune, "holiness", the condition (II Cor. vii. 1);

EPHPHATHA, or "Be Opened".

#4. The Unveiled Eye: "To See without Distortion." pp. 17, 18

In view of the importance of the opened understanding, both for ourselves and for those to whom we minister, it is not surprising that the subject is brought before us under a further figure, that of the opened eye. The Psalmist prayed,

> "Open Thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of Thy law" (Psa. cxix. 18).

The word translated "open" is the Hebrew galah and means "to remove". It is found in the expressions

> "The glory is departed from Israel" (I Sam. iv. 22).
> "The Lord had told Samuel" (margin, revealed) (I Sam. ix. 15).
> "And shew it thee" (margin, uncover thine ear) (I Sam. xx. 12).
> "The Lord revealed Himself to Samuel" (I Sam. iii. 21).

It is used three times of Balaam.

> "Then the Lord opened the eyes of Balaam, and he saw the angel of the Lord standing in the way" (Numb. xxii. 31).
> "Which saw the vision of the Almighty, falling into a trance, but having his eyes open" (Numb. xxiv. 4 and 16).

By the use of the word "but" here the A.V. creates the wrong impression that Balaam had fallen into a trance and was therefore oblivious to sound and sight, while at the same time staring vacantly with his eyes. We note, however, that the R.V. substitutes "and" for "but" which considerably alters the meaning while Rotherham translates the passage: "Who the sight of the Almighty receiveth in vision, who falleth down but hath unveiled eyes." That doubtless is its true purport. Balaam had "unveiled eyes" and saw the future blessedness of Israel, saying:

> "I shall see Him, but not now; I shall behold Him, but not nigh: there shall come a Star out of Jacob, and a Sceptre shall rise out of Israel . . . . ." (Numb. xxiv. 17).

In verses 3 and 15 Balaam calls himself "the man whose eyes are open", which the margin alters to "who had his eyes shut, but now opened", as though he referred to the ecstatic vision given him. Bishop Newton, in his "Dissertations on the Prophecies", however, seems to strike the right note when he says:

> "It plainly alludes to Balaam's not seeing the angel of the Lord at the same time as the ass saw him" (Vol. 1, p. 129).

We may therefore conclude that the prayer of the Psalmist in Psalm cxix. is for the removal of whatever may have become a veil, hiding from the eye of faith the wonders of God's law. If it was important not to miss the transient glory of the law, how much more important not to miss the transcendent glory of grace. Consequently, before the Apostle can proceed to speak of the high glories of the church seated together in Christ, at the right hand of God, he pauses to pray for them,

> "That the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you the spirit of wisdom and revelation for the acknowledgment of Him, the eyes of your understanding (or heart) being enlightened, that ye may know, etc." (Eph. i. 17, 18).

The Apostle does not pray here that the eyes of the saints "may be" enlightened, but assumes that they "have been" enlightened; so essential is this to all progress.

This series of articles takes its title from the words of the Lord when He opened the ears of a deaf mute. Mark viii., however, records the healing of a blind man, giving minute details of the performance of the act.

> "He took the blind man by the hand and led him out of the town: and when He had spit on his eyes, and put His hands upon him, He asked him if he saw ought. And he looked up, and said, I see men as trees, walking. After that He put His hands again upon his eyes, and made him look up: and he was restored, and saw every man clearly" (Mark viii. 23-25).

It is hardly possible to avoid comparing this account with the record of the healing of the deaf mute in Mark vii. 31-35. There we have a twofold operation before the man "spake plain"; first his ears were opened, and then "the string of his tongue was loosed". So also in Mark viii. we have a twofold action. In the first the man was asked if he could see ought, to which he replied that he saw men as trees walking. In the second the Lord "made him look up and he was restored and saw every man clearly". Instead of "He made him look up", some texts read "The man looked steadily", which is a suggestive alteration. "Clearly" is telaugos, meaning "distinctly", as one sees a distant object with good sight. (The word tele enters into our words telescope, television, etc.).

Let us meditate upon these elements of truth, for they are contributions to the teaching of the Scripture as a whole. They teach that spiritual sight is a gift of grace, and that, whether in the case of the Ephesians or of the blind man, the eye first opened to see the initial light of salvation, may yet need further strengthening by further grace in order to see "clearly". The man who can only see men as trees walking is to be congratulated in that he has sight, however defective, but it would be an incalculable loss for him to rest content with that vision, or if he were to be encouraged to believe that it was normal, still more that, with such a prime defect, he should set himself up as a leader of others.

The subject deserves an exposition of II Cor. iii. and iv., where the theme is the veil, which is made by the enemy out of undispensational use of the Scriptures, the law, that had been abolished, being used to blind the minds of those who believe not. This cannot be dealt with in a paragraph, but the reader would find the article in Vol. XXIII, p. 190, a useful supplement to the present one; also the chart illustrating II Cor. iii. and iv. that appears in Volume XXV, page 137.

We can, however, even with this briefest of considerations, realize the need to pray: "Unveil my eyes that they may behold wonderful things." We need therefore:--

(1) The Opened EAR.—"To Learn."
(2) The Opened BOOK.—"To Equip."
(3) The Opened UNDERSTANDING.—"To Perceive."
(4) The Opened EYE.—"To See, without distortion."

#5. The Opened Mouth for Praise and Testimony.
pp. 50 - 52

The opened ear, to learn, the opened eye, to see, the opened book, to equip, are not for personal edification merely, but lead to witness and service.

The prayer and penitence of David led him first of all to seek cleansing and restoration, but he also realized that his own shortcomings and sins were typical of the failure of others, with the result that the joy of salvation restored to himself quickened in his heart the desire to tell others. Thus he says:

> "Restore unto me the joy of Thy salvation; And uphold me with Thy free spirit. Then will I teach transgressors Thy ways; And sinners shall be converted unto Thee. Deliver me from bloodguiltiness, O God, Thou God of my salvation: and my tongue shall sing aloud of Thy righteousness. O Lord, open Thou my lips: and my mouth shall show forth Thy praise" (Psa. li. 12-15).

The opened mouth of the redeemed or restored sinner sings not of its own righteousness, but a new song inspired by escape from the miry clay and being set upon a rock, "even praise unto our God" (Psa. xl. 3).

But, once again, although the heart pours out its praise and thanksgiving to God alone for His grace and love, the new song that He "puts" into our mouth, is a song not only of praise, but of testimony, as though the greatest praise we can offer to God for His great salvation is to find another voice to sing in concert. "Many shall see it, and fear, and shall trust in the Lord" (Psa. xl. 3). So in Col. iii. 16, the word of Christ that richly indwells the believer not only calls forth psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, sung with grace unto the Lord, but at the same time teaches and admonishes.

When Paul reminded Timothy that the Lord had not given us a spirit of "cowardice" and exhorted him not to be "ashamed" of the testimony of the Lord nor of Paul His prisoner (II Tim. i. 7, 8), he did not speak of that of which he himself was ignorant. He has left it on record that when he visited the Corinthians and went contrary to their wishes, because of his stewardship, it cost him something, for he confesses he was with them in "fear and trembling" (I Cor. ii. 1-3; iv. 1). So also when he had received the revelation of the mystery. He knew only too well that it was not without reason that the Lord had associated "bonds and afflictions" with that ministry (Acts xx. 23), and while our hearts swell within us as we read his noble words, "But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy" (Acts xx. 24), we are glad to know, as he himself confessed, that he was a man of like passions with ourselves (Acts xiv. 15) and that he was what he was only by the grace of God (I Cor. xv. 10). Consequently, when we find this great apostle writing to the Church that owed so much to his undaunted service, we are humbled yet encouraged at his words:

> "Praying . . . . . for me, that utterance may be given unto me, that I may open my mouth boldly, to make known the mystery of the gospel, for which I am an ambassador in bonds: that therein I may speak boldly, as I ought to speak" (Eph. vi. 18-20).

We now come to another kind of "opening of the mouth" that is necessary, "Open my mouth wide, and I will fill it" (Psa. lxxxi. 10). The Psalm reminds Israel of the waters of Meribah (verse 7), and concludes with regretful exclamation "Oh that my people had hearkened unto me and walked in my ways!" Then would He have fed them with the finest of wheat and with honey out of the rock (verses 13-16). The intervening verses show that the food mentioned is a symbol of the Word of God. We cannot feed others unless we ourselves are fed. We can only deliver to others that which we have first of all received (I Cor. xv. 3).

As in Jer. i. 9, there are many references to the inspiration of the Prophets that do not apply to-day because, having complete revelation of God, we are not now in need of individual inspiration but can "fill our mouths" with the self-same words of inspired truth that opens the ear of the learner and enables him to speak a word that shall be in season (Isa. l. 4).

We need to remember moreover that "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh" (Matt. xii. 34). There needs to be a treasure in the heart before good things can be spoken by the mouth, otherwise words will be without profit or power, like the tinkling cymbal rather than the clear clarion call. We must therefore continue this series in order to embrace the teaching of the Scripture as to the "Opened heart".

Meanwhile, we summarize once more. For effectual service we need:

(1) The Opened EAR,
(2) The Opened BOOK,
(3) The Opened UNDERSTANDING,
(4) The Opened EYE, and
(5) The Opened MOUTH.

#6. The Opened Heart, the Most Important of All.
pp. 81, 82

We saw at the close of our last article (page 52) that the opened mouth was valueless apart from abundant treasure stored up in the opened heart. Let us now look more carefully into this matter.

The expression "opened heart" is used only once in the Scriptures, where it is found in the story of Lydia (Acts xvi. 14). In response to a vision the Apostle had left the shores of Asia Minor and for the first time had set foot in Europe. To present-day readers this is an epoch-making event, but there were then no evidences of it that would appeal to sense. Indeed, the Apostle's reception at Philippi was as poor as could well be. There was no synagogue in the city, the Jewish population was small and their practice was to worship by the riverside where "prayer was wont to be made" (Acts xvi. 13). To this spot Paul and his companions resorted and spoke to the women there, and the Lord opened the heart of one of them, named Lydia, so that she attended to the things of which Paul spoke. An opened heart is necessary if the word of God be not only heard, but given attention. When Paul admonished Timothy "to give attendance to the reading", he added, "give thyself wholly to them", as though he would say, "This is a matter of heart more than anything else".

Lydia's "opened heart" soon led to an open house, for she said: "If ye have judged me to be faithful to the Lord, come into my house, and abide there. And she constrained us" (Acts xvi. 15). A hardened heart does not attend to the word of God: "And he hardened Pharaoh's heart, that he hearkened not" (Exod. vii. 13).

In Psalm cxix. the Psalmist refers many times to the necessity for "seeking" (2, 10), "observing" (34), "entreating" (58), "keeping" (69), and "crying" (145), with the whole heart, in connection with the Lord and His Word.

The word used of Lydia in Acts xvi. is not anoigo, "to open up", but dianoigo, "to open up thoroughly". This is the word used by the Lord in Mark vii. 34, when He said Ephphatha, "Be opened!" It is the words used of the disciples in Luke xxiv. 13 when "their eyes were opened" and they recognized the Lord. It is the word used in the same chapter for the opening of the Scriptures and of the understanding.

The heart thus opened is characteristic of the Bereans, who received the word with all readiness of mind (Acts xvii. 11). The heart thus opened is, in the language of Paul, "enlarged" (II Cor. vi. 11), for indeed he declared to the Corinthians in the third verse of the next chapter, "Ye are in our hearts to die and live with you". The opened heart is one into which the love of God has poured like an overwhelming flood (Rom. v. 5), and will manifest, in tender-heartedness, something of that love to others (Eph. iv. 32).

In short, what has been brought before us in the preceding article, of this series is nullified and rendered fruitless apart from this, the last of all. An opened ear, if it send no echo into a heart touched by graces will never enable any to "learn" in the school of God. The opened book, precious heritage though it be, has no spiritual value unless received with an open heart. The open book can only "equip" those who receive the Word, not only in the letter, but in the spirit; not merely through the senses, but in the heart. The opened understanding is but a synonym for an opened heart, the Hebrew leb, usually translated "heart", being translated "understanding" some twenty times in the O.T. We have already referred to the alternative reading of Eph. i. 18, where "heart" is read for "understanding", and we refer to it again to say that the eye that is opened here, as everywhere, is the eye of the heart. We might have explored further avenues of thought and dealt with "open doors" for service, and other "openings" that find their place in the Word. These, however, do not fall within the scope of our title quite so truly as those we have examined.

And so, briefly, we bring this little study to a close, trusting that its perusal may have led to clearer appreciation of the ways of the Lord with His people.

Fruits of Fundamental Studies.

#24. The Scriptures an Entity: to be accepted or rejected as a whole.

pp. 30 - 32

If a pound note be exchanged for twenty shillings, such exchange does not in any way detract from the full value of the pound. This is referred to the category of Quantity. There are however "entities" as well as "quantities" and "entity" differs from "quantity" in that it can only exist as a whole, subdivision being, in the nature of the case, impossible. For instance, while a father may divide his substance among his children without loss or detriment, he cannot thus divide and distribute himself. However much he may long to be with John while he is staying with James, the fact that he is an entity makes that longing impossible of fulfillment. Close and earnest acquaintance with the Scriptures convinces the believer that they are an entity: they must be taken as a whole, or not at all

In the course of our dealings with our fellows, we meet with many who, while rejecting the Scriptures as the inspired Word of God, make the assertion, that in this aspect or in that, they believe and accept them. One endorses the moral code of the Bible, while viewing both the record of the creation of man and his redemption with skepticism. Another revels in the poetic and literary excellence of the Bible, yet accounts the bulk of its subject-matter as so much myth and folk lore. A third would place "Jesus" upon the highest pedestal that a "man" can occupy, but denies His deity. Yet another has room only for what he calls "the eleventh commandment", that of love, while another accepts the teaching of the sermon on the mount, but rejects the teaching of Paul as to redemption and justification. Again, to another, prophecy, as such, is simply impossible, and to another the idea of a miracle is unscientific and absurd.

Let us test the assertion that the Scriptures are an entity, to be taken as a whole or rejected. First let us consider the difficulty confronting the person. That moral code revolves around the foci of truth and righteousness. Everything is tested by the plumb line of unbiased righteousness, and truth is the essential foundation of all its ethical teaching.

The beginnings of this code coincide with the history of the man Moses. The Scriptures give particulars of the birth of Moses, the four generations that intervene between Abraham and his birth; they record the fact that he was of the line of Levi, and tell how he was taken into the care of the Egyptian princess, together with numerous statements of such particular character as to leave no doubt in the mind of the reader that Moses did actually live in Egypt, that he did lead Israel out, as God appointed, that he did ascend Mount Sinai and there received that law, which for ever after was associated with his name. Not only so, but subsequent books of the Old Testament are equally committed to the same teaching. Joshua succeeds Moses, and the people feared Joshua "as they feared Moses all the days of his life" (Josh. iv. 14). Again, Joshua makes specific reference to the book which Moses had written (Josh. xxiii. 6), and it is impossible to read the record of Joshua's division of the land of Canaan without being convinced that Scripture intends the reader to believe that Moses was an actual, historic, figure. Equally emphatic are the books of Judges, Samuel and Kings. We read that King Hoshea broke in pieces "the brazen serpent that Moses had made" (II Kings xviii. 4), a testimony to the belief in the historic reality of the man Moses. The revival under Ezra and Nehemiah, the references in the Psalms, the testimony of such prophets as Isaiah, Jeremiah, Daniel, Micah and Malachi, complete the chain that commits the whole of the Old Testament to the teaching that Moses actually lived and did the things recorded of him.

The new Testament is no less emphatic on the subject. The integrity of the four Gospels are intimately connected with the real, historic, personality of Moses. "Had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed Me, for he wrote of Me. But if ye believed not his writings, how shall ye believe My words?" (John v. 46, 47). This one statement of the Saviour refutes the validity of the claim to a right to believe a part of the Scriptures, while at the same time rejecting the Scriptural statements showing that Moses was an actual person, living and acting as the records say he lived and acted. We can add to these testimonies the further references to Moses by the risen Christ in Luke xxiv. 27, and the references by the Apostle Paul in his epistles, which latter but add confirmation to the explicit testimony of our Lord.

The very gospel of salvation is inextricably bound up with the historic reality of Moses, for John iii. 16 arises out of John iii. 14, which reads: "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up." Not only does John iii. 16 hang upon the historic reality of Moses, but all the great types of redemption and atonement, which constitute the saving and sanctifying elements of the gospel, originate in the ceremonial law given by Moses to Israel.

Again, not only did Christ keep the Passover, but He himself fulfilled its glorious, typical, teaching, so that it could be written: "Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us." In the original the very "exodus" from Egypt provides a name for that "decease" which He accomplished at Jerusalem (Luke ix. 31), and the offerings enumerated in Leviticus are wonderful foreshadowings of that One Sacrifice for sins for ever, which becomes the propitiation by which our guilt is removed, our reconciliation is accomplished, access is enjoyed, and peace entered (Lev. i.-v.).

It is therefore practically impossible to say that one admits the high moral code of the Bible, yet rejects the historic statements concerning the men and women that live and act on that code. The moral code that demands inflexible, unswerving, truth, can hardly be furthered by fabrications of fact so colossal as they must be if Moses be not a real historical character. Similarly, for such a one, it would be impossible to believe "the simple gospel", for John iii. 16 stands or falls with the veracity of the Book of Numbers.

The same is true of another attitude adopted by some who explain away the prophetic element; yet if Christ could say of Moses, "He wrote of Me", or "All things must be fulfilled, which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the Psalms concerning Me", the question is reduced to the simple issue of, either accepting "prophecy" and "Christ", or rejecting both together. For anyone to pondered the passages in the New Testament that use the formula: "that it might be fulfilled" is to make acceptance of Christ with denial of prophecy utterly incompatible. Moreover, not only did Moses prophesy, but he was himself a great prophetic type.

> "For Moses truly said unto the fathers, A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me; Him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever He shall say unto you. And it shall come to pass that every soul, which will not hear that Prophet, shall be destroyed from among the people" (Acts iii. 22, 23).

There are moreover some who call themselves "Christian Evolutionists". They have endorsed that pseudo-science of speculative theory called "Evolution", yet desire to retain a hold upon the Christian faith. This attitude is pitiable, for the Scriptures from beginning to end make the most uncompromising assertion that the universe was "created" and that everything thus created was "after its kind". Gen. i. and ii., instead of being an isolated passage that can be skipped, is a passage that holds sway throughout the inspired record. It is embedded in the ten commandments, it is interwoven in the prophecy of restoration (Isaiah), it is found, without modification or abatement, in the Gospels, Acts, Epistles, and the Revelation. The evolutionist who imagines that he can hold to his "science" and to the faith deceives no one but himself.

To the man to whom Adam is a myth, I Cor. xv., Rom. v. and Heb. ii. lose their triumph and their comfort. Moreover, the genealogy of the Saviour as given by Luke takes us back step by step through the Old Testament history until it concludes with the last links: "Which was the son of Enos, which was the son of Seth, which was the son of Adam, which was the son of God" (Luke iii. 38), and it is impossible for anyone to put his finger upon a preceding link in the chain and say, "Here history ends, and myth begins".

All this taken together not only proves that the Bible is an Entity, to be taken whole, or not at all, but it further proves that Christ and the Scriptures form an Entity, to be taken together as one great undivided testimony, or not to be taken at all.

Let us be clear on this vital matter for ourselves, and then clear in our testimony to others, "For if the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself for battle?" (I Cor. xiv. 8).

#25. A Quest for Ultimate Value.
pp. 188 - 193

In the record of creation in Gen. i. there are seven occasions when the pronouncements is made that "it was good".

> The light (Gen. i. 4) and subsequently the dividing of the earth and sea (Gen. i. 10); the bringing forth of grass, herb and tree (Gen. i. 12); the rule and ministry of the sun, moon and stars (Gen. i. 18); the creation of all living creatures of the waters, and all the fowl of the air (Gen. i. 21); the creation of beast, cattle and creeping thing (Gen. i. 25).

Philosophy is concerned with three great quests: the quest as to the ultimate nature of reality, the quest as to the validity, nature and limitations of knowledge, and the quest for the ultimate nature and significance of value. This third philosophical quest is called Axiology, from the Greek word axios. Philosophy has arrived at the conclusion that in the realm of Ethics or Morals "The Good" is the ultimate value; that in the realm of Aesthetics "The Beautiful" is the ultimate value, and that in the realm of the Mind or Reason, "The True" is the ultimate value. Nevertheless, although these ideas have held sway since before the days of Plato, there has been in the minds of most thinkers a feeling that there should be something which would bind together these values and eliminate the disturbing relative elements the presence of which prevents many from accepting them as ultimate values.

While we do not wish to discuss philosophical terms in these pages, we must take this matter a little further in order to make clear our after-study. In the first place it is manifestly incorrect to speak of ultimate values. There can be but one all-comprehensive ultimate value, one that can contain "The Good", "The Beautiful" and "The True", while excluding everything of a conditional nature that comes in these several categories.

The value, "The Good", is, after all, a relative form. In Gen. iii. the woman saw that the prohibited tree was "good" for food, yet at the same time it was an evil for the woman to partake it. She saw that it was "pleasant" to the eyes, which is comparable with the aesthetic value, "The Beautiful", nevertheless, the word so translated appears in that dreadful place Kibrothhattaavah, "The graves of lust" (Numb. xi. 34), showing that "beauty" or that which is "pleasant" may be a relative term. Moreover, the forbidden tree was one "to be desired to make one wise", which is comparable with the philosopher's third value, "The True". It appears therefore that "The Good", "The Beautiful" and "The True" still leave room for something that is impartial. When we read that the weather is "good" for air-raids, what is intended? If it be "good" for the raiders, it will certainly be "bad" for those who are raided, from which it follows that the self-same thing will be "good" or "bad" relatively to circumstance.

Again, there can be no inflexible standard of Beauty. What would be the ideal in the eyes of an African chief, would fail to satisfy the aesthetic taste of a Greek in the days of Phidias. To one person a Symphony is a delight, to another a meaningless sound. Even "Truth" can be relative. A person may say, with truth, that upon taking his seat in the Flying Scotsman at King's Cross Station he did not "move" until he arrived at Edinburgh. This would be relatively true so far as this passenger's relation to the actual compartment was concerned, but it could not be absolutely true; he could never have reached Edinburgh, had he not "moved" at all. Truth may be dispensational, true for one time, but not true for another, as for example the practice of Circumcision, or the observance of the Sabbath. While therefore Platonic philosophy may be grouped under the three headings "The Good", "The Beautiful" and "The True", the enlightened mind demands something deeper, something that will not change with circumstances.

When we turn to the second Epistle of Peter and read what is there said about the New Creation that is yet to come, we find the term for which we seek: "New heavens and new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness" (II Pet. iii. 13). Here we have the one supreme, absolute, value which alone meets all requirement, "The Right". If "Good" is to be good both for myself and my neighbour it must at the same time be "Right". If upon approaching a town like Naples from the sea we are overwhelmed with its beauty but, upon walking its streets and living in its houses, we are oppressed with its sordidness and its shame, we are conscious that true Beauty must be "within" as well as "without", or, in other words, that it must be "Right". Now God has lifted the idea of "Right" to the level that we seek; something uninfluenced by persons and circumstances; something indeed as absolute as a plumb-line or a pair of balances.

We speak of "Fundamental Truth" and, until we are compelled to define our terms, we have little or no uncertainty in our minds as to what is intended, but if the question be pressed upon us, we discover that there is more than one claimant to the title. Undoubtedly, for the believer, the Lord Jesus Christ and His finished work, is the One Foundation upon which he builds (I Cor. iii. 11), but it will be noted at once that the statement is qualified, it is "for the believer". If we ask how in the first place one becomes a "believer" we shall at length arrive at the answer that places the veracity of the Scriptures at or nearer the foundation of all truth. But the Scriptures were not always in the world, for two thousand years intervened between Adam and Abraham, and, further, these Scriptures have not, even yet, penetrated into every corner of the earth. From the teaching of the Scriptures we discover that, apart from revelation, there has always been the evidence of "Creation" (Rom. i. 19-21) and "Conscience" (Rom. ii. 12-16), and this evidence is of sufficient strength to make those who come under the power of it "without excuse" (Rom. i. 20; ii. 1, 15). It therefore appears necessary that there must be some universal standard whereby the witness of Creation, Conscience, and Scripture shall be judged, and that standard seems to be set forth in the word "Right". Every word, thought or deed is either "Right" or "Wrong". The universe testifies to the fact that unless a thing be "Right" it is an intrusion; that it is a cause of misery and suffering. Because things are not "Right" the creation still groans under a curse.

Returning to the Scriptures (for we are already believers, and need not wait in the antechamber of Creation nor the portal of Conscience), we discover that "Right" and "Wrong" are indeed the essential categories under which all acts, from those of God Himself down to the humblest of His creatures, must be ranged. The handwriting on the wall that brought consternation into the heart of the king of Babylon expresses the fundamental truth; "Thou art weighed in the balances, and found wanting" (Dan. v. 27). This brings us to the illuminating fact that the Scriptures have used the figure of the "balances" and the "plumb-line" to illustrate the impersonal and incorruptible character of "Right". We may not all agree as to what we mean when we speak of the force of Gravity, but whether our views be those of Newton or those of Einstein, the acceptance of the evidence of a pair of scales or of the plumb-line remains unchallenged. The force that secures the right ration of our daily food, is the same as that which enables the builder to erect our dwellings correctly, and one of the special features of both actions is, that like the judgment of God, it is "without respect of persons".

The close relationship between the "balance" and the "plumb-line" is found in the word used by Isaiah when he said: "Judgment also will I lay to the line, and righteousness to the plummet" (Isa. xxviii. 17). Here the "plummet" is mishqeleth, the feminine form of mishqal, "a weight" used in balances, as we read in Ezekiel, "Take thee balances to weigh". The reader will doubtless have perceived that these words mishqeleth and mishqal are both related to shekel, which, though "money", was "weighed". "And Abraham weighed to Ephron the silver . . . . . four hundred shekels of silver current money with the merchant" (Gen. xxiii. 16). The weighing of the money ensured that it was "right" in amount.

We find this symbolic use of the plumb-line in the seventh chapter of the prophecy of Amos:

> "Behold the Lord stood upon a wall made by a plumbline, with a plumbline in His hand . . . . . Behold I will set a plumbline in the midst of my people Israel: I will not again pass by them any more" (Amos vii. 7, 8).

Here the word translated "plumbline" is the Hebrew anak, a word that means something "leaden", not only because of its weight but because it is uninfluenced by magnetic attraction and therefore a suitable figure of even-handed justice.

The prophet Zechariah also speaks of the use of a plummet saying: "They shall see the plummet in the hands of Zerubbabel" (Zech. iv. 10). Here the word "plummet" is the translation of two Hebrew words, namely, eben bedil, stone, tin, The use of the word "stone" brings in the idea of "weight", for eben is the word used in Zech. v. 8 where he speaks of "the weight of lead".

The intentional use of this great force everywhere around us as a symbol of inflexible right is not only seen in the use of the plumb-line, but in the use of the balances.

> "Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, in meteyard, in weight, or in measure. Just balances, just weights, a just ephah, and a just hin shall ye have" (Lev. xix. 35, 36).
>
> "Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, a great and a small . . . . . thou shalt have a perfect and just weight . . . . ." (Deut. xxv. 13, 15).
>
> "A false balance is abomination to the Lord; but a just weight is His delight" (Prov. xi. 1).
>
> "A just weight and balance are the Lord's; all the weights of the bag are His work" (Prov. xvi. 11).

> "Divers weights and divers measures, both of them are alike abomination to the Lord" (Prov. xx. 10).
>
> "Divers weights are an abomination unto the Lord and a false balance is not good" (Prov. xx. 23).

When Job would express his desire for even-handed, unbiased, justice, he found the symbol of the balances ready to hand:--

> "If I have walked with vanity, or if my foot hath hasted to deceit; let me be weighed in an even balance, that God may know mine integrity" (Job xxxi. 5, 6).

Over against this desire of Job should be placed the humbling words of Prov. xvi.:--

> "All the ways of a man are clean in his own eyes; but the Lord weigheth the spirits" (Prov. xvi. 2).

Hannah, the mother of Samuel, recognized this figure of justice:--

> "Talk no more exceedingly proudly; let not arrogancy come out of your mouth; for the Lord is a God of knowledge, and by Him actions are weighed" (I Sam. ii. 3).

Even in English the word "ponder" retains the primitive idea of weighing, and is used in such words as "pound", "imponderable" and "ponderous". When therefore we read in Prov. xxi. 2 and xxiv. 12 that the Lord "pondereth" the hearts, we are not surprised to learn that the word "ponder" is the Hebrew takan, translated in Prov. xvi. 2, "weigh".

Anticipating our findings, in order to press home the purpose of these studies, we say that the words written on the plaster of the palace wall in the days of Belshazzar, have been written by the same finger upon the hearts of all men. All, when weighed in the divine balance, tested by the divine plummet, will be found wanting. But this is not all, for, if it were, what incentive should we have to pursue our study? The revelation of our own utter need but leads us to the Saviour, Who, in His fullness, meets this and every other requirement of heaven's high tribunal.

> "For He hath made Him to be sin for us, Who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him" (II Cor. v. 21).

Let us be thankful that there has been revealed this all-covering and final value. When we attain to that creation where "righteousness" dwelleth, the Good, the Beautiful, and the True will have been raised above their present relative and conditional characters, and find their synthesis in "The Right". Let us be thankful, too, that the great plan of man's salvation has been so conceived and so accomplished by God as "that He might be just and the justifier" of the believer. Salvation indeed does set forth the Goodness, the Beauty and the Truth of the divine nature, but over, above and including all is Righteousness. James speaks of a "crown of life"; Peter speaks of a "crown of glory", but Paul entertained the hope of receiving at the hands of his Lord "a crown of righteousness".

The whole conflict of the ages has been the conflict of “Right” against “Wrong”. Let us be thankful that “Might” is not “Right”. By all means let us acknowledge the omnipotence of God, but let us praise Him that “Right” not “Might” is the sceptre of His kingdom (Heb. i. 8). While therefore “The Good” and the pleasant can be found in the early chapters of Genesis, we perhaps the better realize the reason why “The Right” is deferred until we enter the realm of Redemption (Gen. vii.), or of Faith (Gen. xv. 6) and that it is found in its true place only in that New Creation where God shall be all in all.

Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth. (Second Series).

ISAIAH.
#12. Woes and Glories (xxviii. - xxxv.). "Without form and void" (xxxiii., xxxiv.).
pp. 18 - 22

We draw near to the closing pæan of Isa xxxv., but before the millennial glories of that chapter are reached, the shadow of the Assyrian invasion is once more cast across the prophecy and made to subserve the divine purpose.

In his commentary upon Isaiah the Rev. Alfred Jenour makes the useful suggestion that chapter xxxiii. is a song of triumph in which the Prophet is answered by a chorus of the people. While he does not appear to have perceived the underlying structure of the chapter, and we cannot therefore follow his suggested subdivisions, the principle seems to be true.

Woe is uttered against the Spoiler (Isa. xxxiii. 1), the chorus of praise replying,

> "O Lord, be gracious unto us; we have waited for Thee; be Thou their arm (one MS reads 'our') every morning, our salvation also in the time of trouble" (Isa. xxxiii. 2).

The Prophet resumes and speaks of the coming of the Assyrian under the familiar figure of a plague of caterpillars and locusts. This again is answered by the chorus of praise:

> "The Lord is exalted; for He dwelleth on high: he hath filled Zion with judgment and righteousness" (Isa. xxxiii. 5).

Next is depicted the breaking of the treaty of Sennacherib and its effects upon the Land and once more there is a responsive chorus of praise:

> "Now will I rise, saith the Lord . . . . . as thorns cut up shall they be burned in the fire" (Isa. xxxiii. 10-12).

The Prophet now turns to his own people. Not only will God be a consuming fire to burn up the chaff and stubble that represented the Assyrians (Isa. xxxiii. 11, 12), but to His Own people, the "sinners of Zion", this fact causes fear, for they cry, "Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire?" (Isa. xxxiii. 14), and the reply insists upon practical righteousness, and that such as practice it need have no fear. Of such it is said, "He shall dwell on high . . . . . his waters shall be sure" (Isa. xxxiii. 16).

The Prophet lifts up his eyes, and in contrast with the stricken king of Assyrian, or even the trustful king of Judah, he speaks of "the King in His beauty" as the glorious goal of prophetic vision, “and the land of far stretching distances” in contrast with the cramping limitation of a siege.

Once more the Prophet turns back to the stricken foe:

> “Thine heart shall reflect upon the terror (that threatened, and you shall ask in wonder) Where is he that counted? Where is the weigher of tribute? Where is he that counted the towers?” (Isa. xxxiii. 18).

Sennacherib and his host will have gone, and instead of looking upon a people of fierce countenance and ridiculous language, the people are exhorted to > “Look upon Zion, the city of our solemnities; thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down; not one of the stakes thereof shall ever be removed, neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken” (Isa. xxxiii. 20).

This prophecy takes us beyond the type, Sennacherib, and his destruction, to the anti-type, the antichristian Beast and his overthrow at the time of the end. It looks on to the day when Israel shall say,

> “The Lord is our Judge, the Lord is our Lawgiver, the Lord is our King (Israel’s triune Lord). He will save us” (Isa. xxxiii. 22).

Two millennial blessings conclude the chapter. The inhabitants of the Land in that day shall not say, “I am sick”, and the people that dwell in the Land “shall be forgiven their iniquity”, for the New Covenant will at length be put into effect. Other nations may depend upon their galleys and their ships, but the defence of Israel, as demonstrated by the overthrow of Sennacherib, is the Lord. Isa. xxxiv., which follows, takes us into “the day of the Lord’s vengeance, and the year of recompenses for the controversy of Zion” (Isa. xxxiv. 8). The language is apocalyptic and looks to the great and dreadful day of the Lord. While Idumea is the place named, the great Edomite at the time of the end is intended, for this judgment is world-wide. Nations are called upon to hear, the peoples of the earth and all therein, and the world and all things that come forth of it.

The special objects of the Lord’s indignation and fury are the “nations and all their armies”. This looks to the great gathering against Jerusalem, > “When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh . . . . . For these be the days of vengeance . . . . . until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars” (Luke xxi. 20-25).

>
> “And I saw the beast, and the Kings of the earth, and their armies, gathered together to make war” (Rev. xix. 19).

Zechariah speaks of the gathering of all nations against Jerusalem to battle, and the descent of the Lord with an accompanying earthquake (Zech. xiv. 1-5). The dreadful slaughter that ensues is suggested by the words of verse 16 where it speaks of “every one that is left of all the nations that came against Jerusalem”. This is literal Armageddon

(Rev. xvi. 16). The terrible conflict upon earth will be echoed by confusion in the heavens.

> "And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll: and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth off from a vine, and as a falling fig from the fig tree" (Isa. xxxiv. 4).

The unprecedented nature of such an event precludes repetition and it therefore follows that the parallel passages in Matt. xxiv., II Peter and Rev. vi. must refer to the same prophetic period.

> "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken; and then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven" (Matt. xxiv. 29, 30).
>
> "But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up" (II Pet. iii. 10).
>
> "And I beheld when he had opened the sixth seal, and, lo, there was a great earthquake; and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood; and the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind. And the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together; and every mountain and island were moved out of their places . . . . . for the great day of His wrath is come" (Rev. vi. 12-17).

Isa. xxxiv. is a revelation of the day of the Lord, a day of the sword of vengeance and of indignation.

The word "vengeance" (Heb. naqam) occurs six times in Isaiah. The occurrences are:

A | xxxiv. 8. Idumea and Bozrah.
  B | xxxv. 4. Millennial. Weak, feeble and fearful comforted.
    C | xlvii. 3. Vengeance upon Babylon.
    C | lix. 17. Redemption to Zion.
  B | lxi. 2. Brokenhearted, captives and mourners comforted.
A | lxiii. 4. Edom and Bozrah.

It is evident that this "day of vengeance" in prophecy is one. We find Jeremiah using the term with much the same emphasis and precision but introducing the expression "the vengeance of His Temple". Associated with the word "vengeance" is the word "recompense". "The year of recompenses for the controversy of Zion" is the extension of Isa. xxxiv. 8. "Even God with a recompense" is the amplification of Isa. xxxv. 4. "The Lord God of recompense shall surely requite", comments Jeremiah at the overthrow of Babylon (Jer. li. 56).

The whole prophecy of Isaiah could be threaded upon the name of Zion. Zion is seen in its desolation, sin and uncleanness (Isa. i. 8; iii. 16; iv. 4), but it is also seen glorified, reigned over by the Lord, and saved (Isa. iv. 5; xxiv. 23; lxii. 11). The language with which the Prophet was inspired to describe the day of judgment in

Isa. xxxiv. 11 is of extreme importance because of the illumination which it throws upon other extremely important passages:

> "But the cormorant and the bittern shall possess it; the owl also and the raven shall dwell in it; and He shall stretch out upon it the line of confusion, and the stones of emptiness" (Isa. xxxiv. 11).

The unclean birds that possess the land of Edom are an accepted symbol of judgment and desolation and do not call for extended comment. The line and the stone refer to measurement and weight:

> "I will stretch over Jerusalem the line of Samaria and the plummet of the house of Ahab" (II Kings xxi. 13).

This passage not only uses these words as symbols of judgment, as in Isa. xxxiv. 11, but, by substituting "plummet" for "stone", enables us to decide what is intended by the stone in Isa. xxxiv. In Zech. iv. 10 the word "plummet" is actually "a stone of tin", as the margin shows.

As a symbol of perfectly unbiased judgment, a judgment that, by its very nature, must be free from all partiality, the plumbline is among the most suggestive.

> "Amos, what seest thou? And I said, A plumbline. Then said the Lord, Behold, I will set a plumbline in the midst of My people Israel: I will not again pass them by any more. And the high places of Isaac shall be desolate, and the sanctuaries of Israel shall be laid waste" (Amos vii. 8, 9).

In Isa. xxviii. we have the same figure,

> "Judgment also will I lay to the line and righteousness to the plummet; and the hail shall sweep away the refuge of lies, and the waters shall overflow the hiding place" (Isa. xxviii. 17).

II Kings xxi. 13, Amos vii. and Isa. xxviii. also use this symbol of the searching inquisition of Israel, but Isa. xxxiv. reveals that at the time of the end the same scrutiny is to be turned upon the Edomite. The chief importance however of this passage is not in the easily recognized symbols of line and stone, but in the words translated "confusion" and "emptiness". In the original they are tohu and bohu, and occur together on the opening page of the O.T.:

> "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. And the earth was without form and void (tohu and bohu) and darkness was upon the face of the deep" (Gen. i. 1, 2).

From these verses it is clear that the primal creation had passed under the judgment of "line and plummet" because of some failure (the pride and fall of Satan, as we believe), and had become involved in ruin. From Isa. xlv. 18 we learn that the Lord did not create the earth tohu, "in vain", and we also find that the word tohu is placed in contrast with the word "inhabited". In Isa. xxxiv. 10, 12 we read "none shall pass through it", "none shall be there", while in Jer. iv., where the words "without form and void" again appear, the context speaks of earthquake, darkness, no man, and desolation. Upon re-examination of Isa. xxxiv. 11 another truth appears. We place Gen. i. 2, with its chaotic condition, at the junction between "the world that then was" and "the heavens and the earth which are now" and the later parallel, confusion and desolation, which includes the passing of the existing heavens, at the junction between the close of the present system, and the beginning of the new heavens and new earth of Rev. xxi. 1. In other words, the earth, with its firmament, which was "called heaven", is bounded at either end by the words tohu and bohu. Moreover, the heaven that is to depart as a scroll, is not the heaven of heavens, the place of the throne of God, but is the limited "firmament", "called heaven", which was made on the second day of the reconstruction of Gen. i. 6.

It is somewhat unfortunate that we have such a word as firmament in Gen. i. It comes into our English Bible from the Latin. The Latin is an attempt to translate the stereoma of the LXX, which in its turn, is an attempt to translate the Hebrew raqia, which the margin of Gen. i. 6 gives as "expansion". Now raqia by no means indicates something "firm" or "hard", but rather something "spread out", and while it can refer to "beaten gold" (Exod. xxxix. 3) it does not so much to the hardness of the metal as its extreme thinness. It is used of "spreading forth" the earth. Moreover, to confirm the idea that raqia in Gen.6 means an expansion, the Hebrew word natah, "to stretch out" as a tent (Gen. xxxiii. 19), is used by Isaiah alone five times in connection with the heavens. The passages are as follows:

> "That stretcheth out the heavens as a curtain, and spreadeth them out as a tent to dwell in" (Isa. xl. 22).
> "He that created the heavens, and stretched them out" (Isa. xlii. 5).
> "That stretcheth forth the heavens alone" (Isa. xliv. 24).
> "I, even My hands, have stretched out the heavens" (Isa. xlv. 12).
> "The Lord thy Maker, that hath stretched forth the heavens" (Isa. li. 3).

To these can be added Job ix. 8; Psalm civ. 2 and Zech. xii. 1.

It is this stretched out heaven, the "firmament" of Gen. i. 6, which is to be dissolved and rolled up at the time of the end. We repeat, it does not include those heavenly places "far above all heavens" where Christ sits, and where the Church of the One Body finds its sphere of blessing. Therefore while these things remain Scriptural facts, criticism of our emphasis upon the "super-heavens" must leave us unmoved.

Reference is made at the close of Isa. xxxiv. to "the line", this time associating it with "the lot" and so with dividing, as an inheritance. A very simple outline of Isa. xxxiv. which takes note of this twofold use of the line is as follows:--

Isaiah xxxiv.

A | 1-8. VENGEANCE. |
a | Indignation of the Lord.
b | Heavens dissolved.
c | Idumea.
a | Sword of the Lord.
b | In heaven—sword.
c | Idumea.
A | 9-17. DESOLATION. |
d | Cormorant, bittern, owl and raven.
e | Line and stone.
d | Dragons, wild beasts, owls and vultures.
e | Line and lot.

Thus, by a series of steps, some sad and some glorious, we reach the close of this section with chapter xxxv., a chapter which is in itself an epitome of the glorious restoration which is the prophetic burden of the whole of Isaiah's prophecy.

ISAIAH.
#13. Woes and Glories (xxviii. - xxxv.).
"The ransomed of the Lord shall return" (xxxv.).
pp. 52 - 57

We now reach one of the most glorious chapters in the first part of Isaiah's prophecy, a chapter which brings the first section of the book to a glorious conclusion, and anticipates by word and phrase the restoration which is the chief theme of the remainder.

We have already indicated some of the references in Isa. xxxv., that find their echo in chapters xl. to lxvi. One very clear example is found in Isa. xxxv. 10, which is repeated in Isa. li. 11.

Isa. xxxv. opens with the words: "The wilderness and solitary place shall be glad for them." We have already learned from Isa. xlv. 18 that the Lord did not create the earth tohu ("waste"), but formed it to be inhabited. We are not surprised, therefore, to find that the first passage in Isaiah in which the word "wilderness" occurs reads:

> "Is this the man that made the earth to tremble, that did shake kingdoms; that made the world as a wilderness?" (Isa. xiv. 16, 17).

The Assyrian is addressed here, but as in Ezek. xxviii., a greater foe is in view. A little earlier in Isa. xiv. we read:

> "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning! . . . . . for thou hast said in thine heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God . . . . . I will be like the Most High" (Isa. xiv. 12-14).

Here we have Gen. i. 2 on a smaller scale, for in Israel has been enacted in miniature the drama of the ages.

The "solitary place" is actually a place that is "dry" and so "barren" (as in Joel ii. 20). Tsiyyah is translated "dry land" in Isa. xli. 18, and "dry ground" in Isa. liii. 2. This wilderness and dry place shall we read, "be glad for them". We find it exceedingly difficult to agree with the commentaries that see in the words "for them" a reference to the noisome creatures of Isa. xxxiv. 14-16. These are to "possess it for ever" and "from generation to generation shall they dwell therein" (Isa. xxxiv. 17)—which makes it impossible for the same district to "blossom as the rose". The land of Idumea is to be so visited that its "streams shall be turned into pitch, and the dust into brimstone . . . . . it shall lie waste; none shall pass through it for ever and ever" (Isa. xxxiv. 9, 10)—which makes it all the more difficult to reconcile with the description of Isa. xxxv. 1, 2, 6 and 7.

The R.V. omits the words "for them" entirely, while the LXX reads: "Be glad, thou thirsty desert: let the wilderness exult, and flower as the lily." Dr. Young's literal version reads: "They joy from the wilderness and dry place", while Govett renders it: "Thou thirsty wilderness rejoice! Thou desert be glad, and blossom as the lily!"

It will be obvious to the student that any attempt to read a special meaning into the language of the A.V. is uncalled for. Moreover, in addition to this negative argument, there is a positive one of much greater force. From the days of Moses, the words "to rejoice over" in connection with Israel have conveyed the hope of prophecy:

> "As the Lord rejoiced over you to do you good" (Deut. xxviii. 63).
> "The Lord will again rejoice over thee for good, as He rejoiced over thy fathers" (Deut. xxx. 9).

We also find the phrase in Isa. lxii. 5 and lxv. 19; and in Zeph. iii. 17. Isa. xxxv. 1 undoubtedly refers to the rejoicing of the land of Israel on account of the deliverance and restoration that had then come to pass.

The change from barrenness to blessing is expressed by the frequently used figure of "blossoming". In Job xiv. 9 we read, with regard to a tree whose root had grown old: "Yet through the scent of water it will bud, and bring forth boughs like a plant." This passage occurs in a context of resurrection, and its application to Isa. xxxv. is a pointed one. In chapter xxvii. 6 Isaiah had already prophesied concerning Israel: "He shall cause them that come of Jacob to take root: Israel shall blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit."

There are so many diverse opinions as to the precise flower indicated by the "rose" that it hardly seems worth while discussing it in any detail. The lily, the meadow saffron, and the narcissus have all been suggested as possibilities. The word occurs only once elsewhere, in the Song of Solomon, where the Shulamite, comparing herself with the daughters of Sion, modestly confesses: "I am the rose of Sharon, and the lily of the valleys" (S. of S. ii. 1). To which the shepherd lover replies: "As the lily among thorns, so is my love among the daughters." This context seems to favour the simple saffron or lily rather than the rose. In any case, we can rejoice in this wonderful blossoming even though we remain uncertain as to what flower is actually intended by the long Hebrew word chabatstseleth.

The allusion to Lebanon, Carmel and Sharon in verse 2 is a glance back to the terrible desolation left by the Assyrian invader:

> "The earth mourneth and languisheth; Lebanon is ashamed and hewn down: Sharon is like a wilderness: and Bashan and Carmel shake off their fruits" (Isa. xxxiii. 9).

There is a further connection between these two chapters (xxxiii. & xxxv.) in verse 8. The statement in chapter xxxiii. 8: "The highways lie waste, the wayfaring man ceaseth", is surely referred to in Isa. xxxv. 8, even though the words translated "wayfaring men" in the two passages are not exactly the same.

Before we go further with our examination of the chapter, let us obtain what help we can from its structure:

Isaiah xxxv.
The Glory of the Lord.

a | Flee—sorrow and sighing. /

In the first two verses of the chapter we find the "glory of Lebanon" and the "excellency of Carmel" balanced by the "glory of the Lord" and the "excellency of our God". This teaches the important lesson that, at the restoration, the glory and excellency that will be manifested and enjoyed, will be but the reflection of the glory and excellency of the Lord Who has brought His purposes to their glorious goal.

Of all the O.T. books, apart from the Psalms, the prophecy of Isaiah is pre-eminently the book of "glory". In the very day of Israel's failure the Seraphim utter their comprehensive cry: "The fullness of all the earth is His glory" (Isa. vi. 3 lit.).

In chapter xi. 10, we read: "His rest shall be glorious (or glory)", and in chap. lx. 1: "Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee."

A reference in this sixtieth chapter to "the glory of Lebanon" (verse 13) further illuminates the character of these glories that shall be revealed: they are devoted to the beautifying of the place of the Lord's sanctuary—or, as verse 13 puts it: "I will make the place of My feet glorious."

This whole section of Isaiah, that begins with the "glorious beauty" that had become as "a fading flower" (Isa. xxviii. 1), closes with the fulfillment in Isa. xxxv. of the promise of chapter xxviii.:

> "In that day shall the Lord of hosts be for a crown of glory, and for a diadem of beauty, unto the residue of His people" (Isa. xxviii. 5).

The word translated "excellency" in Isa. xxxv. 2 is the Hebrew word hadar, and this word occurs seven times:

> "The glory of His majesty" (Isa. ii. 10, 19, 21).
> "Their glory and their multitude" (Isa. v. 14).
> "The excellency of Carmel and Sharon" (Isa. xxxv. 2).
> "The excellency of our God" (Isa. xxxv. 2).
> "He hath no form nor comeliness" (Isa. liii. 2).

The first three of these occurrences refer to the day of the Lord and of judgment, while the central references deals with Israel's loss of honour when the people went into captivity (Isa. v. 13, 14). The remaining occurrences are connected with the Lord's glory and the day of restoration (Isa. xxxv.), and with that wonderful self-denial that led the Lord of glory to become as a root of a "dry ground", having no form nor "comeliness", the same word as "excellency".

When the day of Israel's glory dawns, it will be true of her, as of every one of the redeemed, that her beauty will be "perfect through My comeliness (excellency, Heb. hadar), which I had put upon thee" (Ezek. xvi. 14).

When we bear in mind Isa. xxxv. 5 and 6, we can readily understand why miracles of healing performed upon the blind, the deaf, the dumb and the lame, are called "the powers of the age to come" (Heb. vi. 5), and how "healing" can by synonymous with "salvation", as it is in the typical miracle of Acts iv. 12. Israel's failure was largely associated with their eyes and their ears (Isa. vi. 10), and these at last shall be "opened" and "unstopped".

"The parched ground" of Isa. xxxv. 7 is translated "glowing sand" by the R.V., with the word "mirage" in the margin. The cruel and delusive mirage is a fit symbol for the glory of the world that passes away, but its fatal attraction shall at length cease, and "the mirage shall become a pool".

"The habitation of dragons" and the "court" (margin) of Isa. xxxv. 7 are obviously an allusion to the passage in Isa. xxxiv. 13 that speaks of a "habitation of dragons, and a court for owls". The difference between the two passages is that in one case the thorns and nettles of the context speak of judgment, whereas the "reeds and rushes" of Isa. xxxv. 7 speak of luscious grass and plentiful water.

The first half of Isa. xxxv. is dominated by the figure of the restored wilderness, the second half by the figure of a highway. In this second half we have the words a "highway", a "way", "the way of holiness", "pass over", "wayfaring man", "walk", "return", and eventually the glorious conclusion, when the ransomed of the Lord shall come to Zion. The Hebrew word for "highway" is maslul. This masculine form of the word occurs only in Isa. xxxv. 8, every other occurrence being in the feminine (mesillah). We can advance no reason for this change in gender, except that it serves to throw the highway of Isa. xxxv. 8 into prominence. The word is derived from salal, "to cast up". A "highway" is a raised, cast up, way, specially built in order that the traveler can return. It is also called "a way" (derek), or "trodden path", so that we may understand that this way is to be used. It is a "common" way for all the redeemed, but it must also be remembered that it is "a way of holiness", and none but the redeemed can tread this way that leads to Zion. No unclean person or thing shall pass over it.

Apart from Isa. xxxv. 8 there is no other occurrence of the word "unclean" in the first half of Isaiah except that of Isa. vi. 5. Just as the Seraphim anticipate the glory of the Lord, so they symbolize the removal of Israel's uncleanness; in fact the glory of Isa. xxxv. is largely the fulfillment of the promises and the reversal of the evils found in chapter vi.

There is an element of ambiguity in the A.V. of Isa. xxxv. 8, which is intensified by the marginal alternative: "The unclean shall not pass over it; but it shall be for those (margin—'for he shall be with them')." Dr. Young's literal translation, which makes good sense, is as follows: "And He Himself is by them, Whoso is going in the way—even fools err not." The presence of the Lord is certainly a feature of the day of glory, and Dr. Young's rendering would seem to be preferable to those already quoted. Once the people of Israel went astray like sheep (Isa. liii. 6), but now all this has passed away in the glory of restoration, and "even fools err not".

And so we come to the blessed conclusion of verses 9 and 10, a conclusion that anticipates Rev. xxi. 1-4, just as the New Jerusalem anticipates the New Creation (Isa. lxv. 17-20):

> "The redeemed shall walk there: and the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away" (Isa. xxxv. 9 and 10).

ISAIAH.
#14. The relation of History, Archæology and Prophecy (xxxvi. - xxxix.).
pp. 113 - 116

We have now reviewed the three great sections of the opening prophecy of Isaiah:

(1) THE REMNANT SHALL RETURN (i. - xi.).
(2) BURDENS AND BLESSINGS (xiii. - xxvii.).
(3) WOES AND GLORIES (xxviii. - xxxv.).

In chapters xl.-lxvi. there await us three more, and between these two great groups of prophecy is interposed a piece of history, the Assyrian invasion. At first it may seem strange that a piece of history which can be read in II Kings xviii.-xx. should apparently be recapitulated in the heart of a great Messianic prophecy, but an acquaintance with the unfolding of the purpose of the ages will correct this impression and enable us to perceive that what is past history may nevertheless have also a prophetic import. This principle we find very clearly indicated in the book of Daniel.

In Volume XXXI, page 35, we have given the structure of the book of Daniel, as a whole, showing the relation of the historic section to the prophetic.

While many of the references to the Assyrian in Isaiah may refer to Sennacherib, it is evident that some, at least, look beyond this king to the world's last Destroyer, "The Man of Sin". We learn from Daniel that this world Destroyer shall set his tabernacle "between the seas" (i.e., between the Dead Sea, the Sea of Galilee and the Mediterranean Sea), "in the glorious holy mountain", "yet", adds Daniel, "he shall come to his end, and none shall help him" (Dan. xi. 45). So, when we read in Isa. xiv. 25, "I will break the Assyrian in My land, and upon My mountains tread him under foot", we are reading of the prophetic future, of which the destruction of the host of Sennacherib was an historic type. Moreover, Isa. xiv. 26 continues: "This is the purpose that is purposed upon the whole earth; and this is the hand that is stretched out upon all nations."

From an examination of Isa. xxxvi. we gather that Rabshakeh's weapon is his tongue. Daniel reveals that the Man of Sin will have "A mouth speaking great things" (Dan. vii. 8).

"Because of the voice of the great words which the Horn spake, I beheld even till the Beast was slain" (Dan. vii. 11).
"And he shall speak great words against the Most High" (Dan. vii. 25).
"He shall speak marvelous things against the God of gods" (Dan. xi. 36).

John also informs us similarly:

"There was given unto him a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies" (Rev. xiii. 5).

Paul reveals that this Beast should exalt himself above all that is called God or worshipped, and Rabshakeh asks:

"Hath any of the gods of the nations delivered his land out of the hand of the King of Assyria?" (Isa. xxxvi. 18).

Further, we learn that Sennacherib's projected attack upon Jerusalem was diverted by a rumour:

"He heard say concerning Tirhakah king of Ethiopia, He is come forth to make war with thee" (Isa. xxxvii. 9).

So also of the last Assyrian it is written:

"But tidings out of the east and out of the north shall trouble him, and he shall go forth in great fury to destroy" (Dan. xi. 44).

The destruction of the Assyrian host by night, by the Angel of the Lord, foreshadowed the day when the Lord shall consume with the spirit of His mouth, and destroy with the brightness of His coming,

"Even him, whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power and signs and lying wonders" (II Thess. ii. 9).

The reader will see how a knowledge of the times of Sennacherib illuminates much that belongs both to past Biblical history, and to future prophecy. We therefore devote the remainder of our available space to a resumé of the testimony of antiquity to the life and times of this great type of the Man of Sin.

The archæological resurrection of Nineveh and its kings reads like a romance, but as we cannot here traverse the fascinating history, we must be content to establish the historic accuracy of the Scripture references to Sennacherib. In the mind of students the name of Layard will always be associated with the recovery of the palace and records of Sennacherib. Layard turned his attention to the mounds of Kuyunjik, which were opposite Mosul. Here were unearthed the famous winged, human-headed bulls, with which visitors to the British Museum are familiar. A palace, paneled with sculptures slabs, was also excavated. This building had evidently been destroyed by fire, but, while many of the slabs had been reduced almost to lime, a sufficient number of them were found to be in a state of preservation good enough to bring Sennacherib and his times vividly before the mind.

One bas-relief, of great importance to us at the moment, represents Sennacherib, not in Assyria, but at Lachish, where the Scripture tells us Sennacherib was at the time referred to in Isa. xxxvii. 8 and II Kings xviii. 17. This important slab can be seen in the Assyrian Saloon of the British Museum. The King is represented as seated on a throne, outside the city, in a setting of vines and fig trees. Officers and prisoners stand or kneel before him.

No such exact description can be penned of, say, Alfred the Great, or even of William the Conqueror, but Sennacherib is made to live before our eyes. His name, as it appears on his own monuments, agrees with the Hebrew spelling, Sin-akhi-erib. Sennacherib's third campaign after ascending the throne was against "the land of Hatti", which included Judaea. Sidon, Tyre, and Cyprus, "which is in the middle of the sea", are mentioned. After a lengthy enumeration of towns subdued by him, whose rulers, as Sennacherib records, "kissed his feet", we come to a mention of Zedekiah: "And Zedekiah (Sidga), king of the city of Askelon (Isgalluna), who was not submissive to my yoke . . . . . I removed . . . . ."

After seeing how Sennacherib then swept along the sea coast, overthrowing the strongholds of the Philistines, we come to the first reference to Hezekiah:

> "The prefects, the princes, and the people of Ekron, who had thrown Padi their king, who was faithful to the agreement and oath of the land of Assur, into fetters of iron, and given him to Hezekia (Haziqiau) of the land of the Jews (Yaudaa) . . . . . I caused Padi, their king, to come forth from the midst of Jerusalem (Urusalimmu) . . . . . as for Hezekiah of the land of the Jews, who had not submitted to my yoke, forty-six strong cities, fortresses and small towns which were around them, which were innumerable, with overthrowing by battering rams, and advance of towers, infantry attack, breaching, cutting and earthworks I besieged and captured . . . . . as for him, like a cage-bird I shut him up within Jerusalem, the city of his dominion . . . . . with thirty talents of gold, eight hundred talents of silver . . . . . caused to be brought after me to the midst of Nineveh . . . . ." (Dr. Pinches' translation).

Be it noticed, Sennacherib says nothing of capturing the city, or of entering it, yet the Scriptures, silent regarding a regular siege, say that, "The king of Assyria sent Tartan and Rabsaris and Rab-shakeh from Lachish to King Hezekiah with a great host against Jerusalem" (II Kings xviii. 17). Why, after receiving the tribute from Hezekiah, did Sennacherib suddenly turn on him in an endeavour to blot out the kingdom of Judah, as his father Sargon had blotted out the ten tribes? While the Scriptures do not give a formal answer to the question, their historical account of the times contain the explanation:

> "Hezekiah . . . . . strengthened himself, and built up all the wall that was broken, and raised it up to the towers, and another wall without, and repaired Millo in the city of David, and made darts and shields in abundance" (II Chron. xxxii. 2-5).

This act of Hezekiah's looked like preparation for a fresh rebellion, and Sennacherib himself tells us that this was the cause of his assault on Jerusalem: "Siege towns I constructed, for he had given command to renew the bulwarks of the great gate of his city."

From the Assyrian inscription we learn that the amount of the tribute sent was 30 talents of gold and 800 talents of silver, but while in the scriptural record we also read of 30 talents of gold, the amount of silver is stated to have been only 300 talents. Learned commentators have exhibited a good deal of misplaced ingenuity in their attempts to deal with this apparent discrepancy, yet it turns out that both records are correct. Mr. Basil T. A. Evetts, formerly of the Assyrian Department of the British Museum, says:

> "The amount of the tribute in the two accounts . . . . . the Palestinian talent of silver was exactly eight-thirds of the Babylonian: the talent of gold, on the other hand, was the same in both countries."

We learn from II Kings xviii. 17 that

> "The king of Assyria sent Tartan and Rabsaris and Rabshakeh from Lachish to King Hezekiah with a great host against Jerusalem."

These titles can be identified in the inscription of the monuments, and the O.T. record is seen to be true in every minute particular. There is no difficulty in the title "Tartan", which is easily identified as the Turtanu of the inscriptions, the meaning of which is "Commander-in-Chief". The titles Rabsaris and Rabshakeh, however, have been the subject of conjecture and criticism. Jewish commentators regarded the words as being Hebrew, translating them, "Chief of the Eunuchs" and "Chief Cup-bearer", but these speculations have been entirely discredited, for Rab-shakeh has now been discovered to be an old Sumerian word, found in the Assyrian inscriptions as Rab-sa-rish, "Chief of the Captains". It is found in an inscription of Tiglath-pileser II, as the title of a trusted statesman whom that monarch sent to Tyre on a mission similar to that indicated in II Kings xviii.: "My officer, the Rabsak, I dispatched to Tyre."

We have seen that the old Sumerian Rab-sa-rish appears in Assyrian as Rabshak, and some reader may have jumped to the conclusion that here we have also the Rabsaris of II Kings xviii. 17. This has not escaped the eye of the critics, but such jumping to conclusions has once again proved to be wrong; the facts showing the Scriptures to be right. Dr. Winkler and his followers were not slow in attributing to the Scriptures "a blunder", whereas the blunder was their own, for the Rabsaris which they said was not on the monuments was there all the time. A brick in the British Museum gives an Aramaean translation of an Assyrian inscription, and reads: "In the eponymy of the Rabsaris, Nabusarusar." As this date is the last year of Sennacherib's reign, there is every probability that we have the name of the official who stood before the walls of Jerusalem with Rabshakeh. Dr. Pinches has since discovered that Rab-sa-rasu is "Chief of the Heads".

ISAIAH.
#15. Sennacherib's Threat and his Destruction (xxxvi. - xxxvii.).
pp. 154 - 158

Having seen how fully the scriptural record of Sennacherib's invasion is subserved by archaeology, we now turn to the more important side of attempting to discover the teaching that is embedded in that record. One of the first things we must do is to endeavour to get an idea of the passage as a whole. We note that the Companion Bible sorts the subject-matter out under the sub-heading of three "kings", xxxvi.1 - xxxvii. 13	THE KING OF ASSYRIA.

xxxviii. 1	THE KING OF TERRORS.
xxxix. 1	THE KING OF BABYLON.

If "kings" are to form the nucleus of this structure, then some are omitted, for the "kings" of Judah, of Egypt, of Ethiopia, of Hamath, and of Arphad, are also named in the passage. We have therefore omissions from the structure, and also the intrusion of the name "The King of Terrors". While it is true that Hezekiah was "sick unto death", the title "The King of Terrors" is not found here but in Job xviii. 14, and found, too, in the argument of Bildad the Shuhite, whose reasoning concerning Job and Job's "wickedness" was fallacious. We feel obliged to omit this title, therefore, which leaves the structure of our passage still unascertained, for we have made it a rule never to import into a passage words that belong elsewhere. In doing so we nevertheless gladly record that we have nothing but admiration for the colossal pioneer work exhibited in The Companion Bible. Indeed, we but follow the spirit that actuated its author. It is, however, beyond the limits of our space, the purpose of these studies, and the usefulness of these articles to the reader, to provide a structure that will account for every detail. While our aim is the truth, our ability may never permit us to display all that there is of the truth, and we are therefore limited to making selections. Here again, under God, the human element is present. Who is to select? Who will guarantee the accuracy of the selection? With great diffidence, therefore, we submit the following very simply outline, believing that upon these selected recurring words the whole story of Isa. xxxvi.-xxxix. may be based.

We observe in the opening of the narrative that while Sennacherib is mentioned, it is Rabshakeh who is prominent, "The king of Assyria sent Rabshakeh" (Isa. xxxvi. 2). Moreover, we observe that in the sequel, where Hezekiah fails, it is connected with another embassy. "The king of Babylon sent letters and a present" (Isa. xxxix. 1). In these two passages the word used in the original is the same, namely shalach. It occurs eight times in this section and punctuates the record as follows:--

Isaiah xxxvi. - xxxix.
Shalach: Hebrew word, "To send".

A | a | xxxvi. 2. Embassy from king of Assyria.
b | xxxvi. 17. "Until I come to take you away to a land like your own."
B | c | xxxvii. 2. To Isaiah from Hezekiah.
d | xxxvii. 4. Reproach the living God.
C | xxxvii. 9. Messenger sent from Sennacherib, suggesting trust in God to be vain.
B | d | xxxvii. 17. Reproach the living God.
c | xxxvii. 21. To Isaiah from Hezekiah.
A | a | xxxix. 1. Embassy from king of Babylon.
b | xxxix. 6, 7. "Thy sons shall they take away."

The opening embassy, with its threats and its plausible suggestion of "an agreement by a present" (Isa. xxxvi. 16), failed. The closing embassy, with its letter and present, succeeded. The idea that Hezekiah should tamely submit to allow himself and his people to be "taken away" is treated with righteous scorn: "Answer him not" (xxxvi. 21). Yet, when the messengers come from the king of Babylon with letters and a present, and without sword or spear, Hezekiah succumbs, and the very thing unsuccessfully threatened by the Assyrian is accomplished by the Babylonian, "Thy sons . . . . . shall they take away" (Isa. xxxix. 6, 7).

However meager therefore this outline may appear, the great lesson is enforced; a lesson pertinent for all times and peoples. Today, we too may successfully resist spiritual attack only to succumb to spiritual flattery. We too have our spiritual adversaries, the Assyrian, Babylon and Rabshakeh, and need protection from "the wiles of the Devil".

Let us now make ourselves acquainted with some of the material that is linked together by this outline.

Rabshakeh's Speech.

First, Rabshakeh touches a weak spot in Judah's defence: "What confidence is this wherein thou trusteth?" (Isa. xxxvi. 4). Isaiah himself had pronounced a "woe" on those that "strengthen themselves in the strength of Pharaoh, and trust in the shadow of Egypt" (Isa. xxx. 2). Rabshakeh knew, of course, that the king of Judah had turned to Egypt for help, and his scoffing words must have cut deeply: "Lo, thou trustest in the staff of this broken reed, on Egypt" (Isa. xxxvi. 6). But he had heard also of the reform which Hezekiah had accomplished, and sought therefore to make capital of the fears of the half-hearted, saying, "But if thou say to me, We trust in the Lord our God; is it not He Whose high places and altars Hezekiah hath taken away?"

With all his worldly wisdom Rabshakeh here manifested himself to be utterly ignorant of the true situation. Hezekiah had entered into the spiritual nature of the worship of God, whereas, to Rabshakeh, the God of Hezekiah was but one of many gods, all of which had failed their respective worshippers:

> "Hath any of the gods of the nations delivered his land out of the hand of the king of Assyria? Where are the gods of Hamath and Arphad?" (Isa. xxxvi. 18, 19).

To all this, the king's instruction was "Answer him not".

We turn from the spectacle of Rabshakeh strutting before the walls of Jerusalem, already confident that the city would fall an easy prey to Hezekiah within its walls, "shut up like a bird in a cage", distressed by the reproach leveled at the name of the living God. Hezekiah makes much of the fact that Rabshakeh had blasphemed God, and little of his own distress and that of his people. In other words, he "sought first the kingdom of God". The Lord sent a message through Isaiah the prophet, saying:

> "Thus shall ye say unto your master, Thus saith the Lord, Be not afraid of the words that thou hast heard, wherewith the servants of the king of Assyria have blasphemed ME. Behold I will send a blast upon him, and he shall hear a rumour, and return to his own land; and I will cause him to fall by the sword in his own land" (Isa. xxxvii. 6, 7).

From this it would appear that Rabshakeh received some inkling of Isaiah's encouraging prophecy, for the remainder of Isa. xxxvii. is taken up with the fact that the rumour caused Sennacherib uneasiness, that he suddenly returned without delivering a blow at Jerusalem, and was ultimately put to death in his own land. Rabshakeh makes an immediate move to counteract the effect of this fulfillment of Isaiah's words. He heard that Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia, threatened war, and immediately sent further messengers to Hezekiah, saying:

> "Let not thy God in Whom thou trustest deceive thee, saying Jerusalem shall not be given into the hand of the king of Assyria" (Isa. xxxvii. 10).

Once more, Hezekiah's reply was to turn to the Lord, and in his prayer he makes it manifest, that to himself, at least, the God of Judah was no mere tribal deity.

> "O Lord of Hosts, God of Israel, That dwellest between the Cherubim, Thou are the God, even Thou alone, of all the kingdoms of the earth: Thou hast made heaven and earth . . . . . Now therefore, O Lord our God, save us from his hand, that all kingdoms of the earth may know that Thou are the Lord, even Thou only" (Isa. xxxvii. 14-20).

To this noble and unselfish prayer the Lord sent the encouraging answer of Isa. xxxvii. 22-35. Addressing the Assyrian, the Lord said:--

> "Because thy rage against Me, and thy tumult, is come up into Mine ears, therefore will I put My hook in thy nose, and My bridle in thy lips, and I will turn thee back by the way which thou camest" (Isa. xxxvii. 29).

A sign is then given to confirm the faith of the people. Invasion goes hand in hand with devastation, the ordinary procedure of agriculture being entirely upset, yet for two years there should be sufficient food provided by that which "groweth of itself" and which "springeth of the same". In the third year sowing and reaping could once more be undertaken.

Reverting to the threatened siege of Jerusalem the prophet continues:--

"He shall not come into this city, nor shoot an arrow there, nor come before it with shields, nor cast a back against it . . . . . For I will defend (Heb. shield*) this city to save it for Mine Own sake, and for My servant David's sake" (Isa. xxxvii. 33-35).

[NOTE: * - See the series "The Eternal God is thy Refuge".]

How "the angel of the Lord" smote the camp of the Assyrian, and what, or who, actually constituted the "messenger" thus indicated, we do not know. Some say a plague was spread among the camp by hosts of mice (deriving some support for the idea from an Egyptian inscription), but this is mere speculation. "He maketh His angels spirits, and His ministers a flame of fire." All things subserve His purposes. An east wind brought Israel a supply of food in the wilderness (Psa. lxxviii. 26) even as the Lord used a strong east wind to open a way for them through the Red Sea (Exod. xiv. 21). Miracles are no less miraculous because, in the execution of them, natural agents are used.

"Then the angel of the Lord went forth and smote in the camp of the Assyrians a hundred and fourscore and five thousand: and when they arose early in the morning, behold, they were all dead corpses" (Isa. xxxvii. 36).

So was Hezekiah delivered, and, as history and prophecy are intimately blended together in this book, so we see here a forecast of the day when the last great Blasphemer and Oppressor shall be "broken without hand". There can be little in common between "Byron" and "Berean", yet few can read unmoved the poet's description of the destruction of Sennacherib.

"The Assyrian came down like the wolf on the fold,
And his cohorts were gleaming in purple and gold:
And the sheen of their spears was like stars on the sea,
When the blue wave rolls nightly on deep Galilee.
Like the leaves of the forest when Summer is green,
That host with their banners at sunset were seen:
Like the leaves of the forest when Autumn hath blown,
That host on the morrow lay withered and strown,
For the Angel of Death spread his wings on the blast,
And breathed on the face of the foe as he pass'd.
* * * * *
And the might of the Gentile, unsmote by the sword, Hath melted like snow in the glance of the Lord!"
--(Lord Byron).

ISAIAH.
#16. Hezekiah's testing under favour and flattery (xxxviii. - xxxix.).
pp. 193 - 198

Judged by their own annals and the illustrations left to us, there could be nothing much more to be dreaded than an attack by the Assyrians, yet, as chapters xxxviii. and xxxix. succeed chapters xxxvi. and xxxvii., we become conscious that there are spiritual forces of which these earthly and visible foes are but shadows.

Hezekiah, having been delivered from the threatenings of Sennacherib, faces the threat of death by sickness, and, being spared, is laid open to the insidious approach of Babylon by flattery, only to succumb.

> "In those days was Hezekiah sick unto death. And Isaiah the prophet the son of Amoz came unto him, and said unto him, Thus saith the Lord, Set thine house in order: for thou shalt die, and not live" (Isa. xxxviii. 1).

Some have found a difficulty in the fact that Isaiah's prediction that Hezekiah should die was not fulfilled. But we must learn to distinguish between prophecy uttered as a prediction of future events, and prophecy uttered as a warning and addressed to an individual, or a people, on some particular occasion. Of the latter, Jonah's utterance against Nineveh was an example: "Yet forty days and Nineveh shall be overthrown." Yet, on repentance, Nineveh was spared.

Jeremiah makes an explicit statement regarding the principle that underlies the apparent discrepancy.

> "At what instant I shall speak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom, to pluck up, and to pull down, and to destroy it. If that nation, against whom I have pronounced, turn from their evil, I will repent of the evil that I thought to do unto them" (Jer. xviii. 7, 8).

From this it is clear that the words of Isaiah, though apparently unconditional, were not so, and that the deciding factor would be Hezekiah's response and attitude.

It is just here that the special purpose of the books of the Chronicles can be discerned. In both the record of Isa. xxxviii. and the parallel passage in II Kings xix. and xx., there is no word dropped as to the state of Hezekiah's heart before the Lord. If we had only the external history we might be at a loss to explain several things. For example, we learn from II Kings xviii. 15, 16 that

> "Hezekiah gave him all the silver that was found in the house of the Lord, and in the treasures of the king's house. At that time did Hezekiah cut off the gold from the doors of the temple of the Lord, and from the pillars which Hezekiah king of Judah had overlaid, and gave it to the king of Assyria."

Both the Temple and the king's treasure were therefore depleted, yet when the emissaries of the king of Babylon arrived with congratulations at Hezekiah's recovery:

> "He showed them the house of his precious things, the silver, and the gold, and the spices, and the precious ointment, and all the house of his armour, and all that was found in his treasures; there was nothing in his house, nor in all his dominion, that Hezekiah showed them not" (Isa. xxxix. 2).

Where did this wealth come from? The answer is supplied from II Chronicles:

> "Thus the Lord saved Hezekiah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem from the hand of Sennacherib . . . . . And many brought gifts unto the Lord to Jerusalem, and presents to Hezekiah, king of Judah, so that he was magnified in the sight of all nations from henceforth. In those days Hezekiah was sick to the death, and prayed unto the Lord: and He spake unto him, and He gave him a sign. BUT Hezekiah rendered not again according to the benefit done unto him, FOR HIS HEART WAS LIFTED UP: therefore there was wrath upon him, and upon Judah and Jerusalem. Notwithstanding Hezekiah humbled himself for the pride of his heart, both he and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, so that the wrath of the Lord came not upon them in the days of Hezekiah. And Hezekiah had exceeding much riches and honour; and he made himself treasures for silver, and for gold, and for precious stones, and for spices, and for shields, and for all manner of pleasant jewels . . . . . And Hezekiah prospered in all his works. HOWBEIT in the business of the ambassadors of the princes of Babylon, who sent unto him to enquire of the wonder that was done in the land, GOD LEFT HIM, to try him, that he might know all that was in his heart" (II Chron. xxxii. 22-31).

Here is the Divine comment; humbling in its illumination, not only of the recesses of the heart of Hezekiah, but of our own.

Hezekiah was, at this time, without a son, so that there was no heir to the throne of David. This would intensify his grief on receiving Isaiah's communication that he should "die and not live". It is therefore with purpose, that in the message of hope and restoration sent to the sick king, the Lord is called "The God of David thy father". Hezekiah was granted another fifteen years of life, and as his son Manasseh was twelve years old at his father's death, he must have been born three years after the sign and promise had been given to Hezekiah. The sign was:

> "Behold, I will bring again the shadow of the degrees, which is gone down in the sundial of Ahaz, ten degrees backward" (Isa. xxxviii. 8).

In the record of II Kings we find that the original sign promised by the Lord was that the shadow should move forward, but Hezekiah, conscious of the growing shadow over his own life, and the relentlessness of the forward moving shadow, cried,

> "It is a light thing for the shadow to go down ten degrees: nay, but let the shadow return backward ten degrees" (II Kings xx. 10).

As is natural, various explanations of this miracle have been suggested, as that the earth may have been made to reverse its revolution; or the sun have been move in the firmament. But such solutions are contrary both to common sense and the teaching of the Scriptures. The Babylonians were noted for their astronomical observations and calculations and, had such a mighty thing happened, Babylon and the whole world would have been aware of the miracle of the ten degrees. We are distinctly told, however, that the embassy from Babylon referred to the sign of the sundial as, "The wonder that was done in the land" (II Chron. xxxii. 31). How the Lord made the shadow go back we do not know, but that He did so, without upsetting the solar system, we are perfectly sure.

At the conclusion of Isa. xxxviii. we read:

> "The Lord was ready to save me: therefore we will sing my songs to the stringed instruments all the days of our life in the house of the Lord" (Isa. xxxviii. 20).

More than 250 years ago Dr. John Lightfoot suggested that there might be a reference, here to those Psalms which are called "The Songs of the Degrees", but it was left for Dr. J. W. Thirtle, in our own day, to bring this truth to light. "The Songs of Degrees" are fifteen in number, corresponding with the fifteen years of life granted to Hezekiah. They are Psalms cxx.-cxxxiv. Hezekiah's name does not occur in them, and four are said to have been written by David and one by Solomon. From this it would appear that Hezekiah wrote some and adopted others that fitted his case, calling the whole group of fifteen "My songs".

The Companion Bible devotes an appendix (No.67) to these Songs of the Degrees, and we here acknowledge our indebtedness to that great work. We tabulate therefrom eleven out of the fifteen items:

(i.) RAB-SHAKEH'S BLASPHEMOUS TONGUE.—Referred to in Psa. cxx. 2, 3 and cxxiii. 3, 4.
(ii.) SENNACHERIB'S REPROACHES.—Practically quoted Psa. cxxix. 5-7.
(iii.) SENNACHERIB'S SHAME.—Referred to in Psa. cxxix. 4, 5.
(iv.) HEZEKIAH'S EARNEST PRAYER.—Finds more than an echo in Psa. cxx. 1; cxxiii. 1-3 and cxxx. 1, 2.
(v.) GOD, "THE MAKER OF HEAVEN AND EARTH".—See Psa. cxxi. 1, 2; cxxiv. 8 and cxxxiv. 3.
(vii) JEHOVAH'S PROMISED HELP.—Psa. cxxi. 2-8; cxxiv. 1-3, 6; cxxv. 2.
(viii) "FOR MY SERVANT DAVID'S SAKE."—Psa. cxxxii. 1-10 and cxxvii. 3-5.
(x) HEZEKIAH'S TRUST IN JEHOVAH.—Psa. cxxi. 2; cxxv. 1-3; cxxxv. 5-8.
(xi) HEZEKIAH LIKE A BIRD IN A CAGE.—Psa. cxxiv. 7; Hezekiah re-lived David's experience.
(xiii) HEZEKIAH'S ZEAL FOR "THE HOUSE OF JEHOVAH".—cf. II Chron. xxix. 3 with Psa. cxxii. 1, 9.
(xv) THE PASSOVER FOR "ALL ISRAEL".—Read Psa. cxxxiii. in the light of II Chron. xxx. 12.

Among the public benefactions recorded of Hezekiah must be noted that which is mentioned in II Chron. xxxii. 30:

> "This same Hezekiah also stopped the upper watercourse of Gihon, and brought it straight down to the west side of the city of David."

A more extended reference to this act is found in II Chron. xxxii. 1-4, which associates the work with the threatened siege of Jerusalem by Sennacherib.

Wellhausen, the "Father of Higher Criticism", ridiculed the attempt to construe these notices as authentic history, but the excavator's spade has dug the grave for his criticism. Referring to this work of Hezekiah, we have several interesting items which can best be described in the archaeologist's own words on the work which was done on the East side of the city. W. F. Birch says:--

> "Sir Charles Warren discovered one entrance to three staircases, a little north of the well, one of them leading to a semi-natural cistern in the rock, where a natural cleft was also visible . . . . . at the bottom of the wall a hole or duct was left six and three-eighths by four inches, and on the northern side a stone plug to fit, and twelve inches long, was found in it. Why? Here is THE VERY PLUG Hezekiah put in when Sennacherib invaded Judah."

When the 1,800 feet long aqueduct from the cistern was brought down the Kidron, the brook was stopped and buried forty or fifty feet out of sight, beyond the hearing or discovery of the Assyrians. By a providential accident, an inscription in ancient Hebrew was found in the wall of rock about nineteen feet from the place where the subterranean conduit opens out of the Pool of Siloam. The inscription is as follows:--

Translation of the Siloam Inscription.

Line 1.—(Behold) the excavation. Now this is the history of the breaking through. While the workmen were still lifting up

Line 2.—the pickaxe, each toward his neighbour, and while three cubits still remained to (cut through, each heard) the voice of the other calling

Line 3.—to his neighbour, for there was an excess (or cleft) in the rock on the right . . . . . And on the day of the Line 4.—breaking through, the excavators struck, each to meet the other, pickaxe against pickaxe; and there flowed

Line 5.—the waters from the spring to the pool over (a space of) one thousand and two hundred cubits. And . . . . .

Line 6.—of a cubit was the height of the rock above the heads of the excavators.

Such was one of Hezekiah's works of which he might naturally have felt proud. Man is a mixture. Even the N.T. saint is the possessor of two natures, and the record of Hezekiah's is a warning to us all. II Chron. xxxii. 32 speaks of Hezekiah's "goodness", and the same chapter speaks of his pride and his ingratitude (verses 25, 26). There is no contradiction here: all who have experienced the grace of God will know how true this is to life. The redeeming feature, the synthetizing element, which brings concord and makes "pride of heart" and "goodness" possible in the same person is found in verse 26: "Notwithstanding, Hezekiah humbled himself for the pride of his heart." In this he followed the footsteps of his father David, a man who sinned grievously, yet who was nevertheless "A man after God's Own heart".

With these notes we must bring to a close the study of this intensely interesting history, and look forward to our further studies together in the glorious prophecies which open with the words, "Comfort ye, comfort ye, My people".

ISAIAH.
#17. An introductory study of Isa. xl. - lxvi., with a note on the prophetic import of the opening message of "Comfort".
pp. 222 - 227

We have now reached the great prophetic portion of Isaiah's prophecy which speaks "to the heart" of Jerusalem and looks forward to the day when "the kingdom" shall be "restored again to Israel" (Acts i. 6). The reader may welcome a reminder of the structure of this prophecy, and accordingly once again we set out the seven great heads, omitting detail. The full structure is given on page 43 of Volume XXX.

A | PRE-ASSYRIAN INVASION (i.-xxxv.).
a | i.-xii. THE REMNANT SHALL RETURN.
b | xiii.-xxvii. BURDENS AND BLESSINGS.
c | xxviii.-xxxv. WOES AND GLORIES.
B | ASSYRIAN INVASION AND DELIVERANCE (xxxvi.-xxxix.).
A | POST-ASSYRIAN INVASION (xl.-lxvi.).
a | xl.-xlviii. COMFORT AND CONTROVERSY.
b | xlix.-lx. LIGHT AND PEACE.
c | lxi.-lxvi. ACCEPTABLE YEAR AND DAY OF VENGEANCE.

At this point we are concerned with the last great member:--

A* | Isa. xl. - lxvi.

It will be seen that the sub-titles are not only "Comfort", "Light", and "Acceptable Year"; (that would be but half the truth, and false to fact), but that "Comfort" is not divorced from "Controversy", "Light" is associated with "Peace", and "The Acceptable Year of the Lord" cannot be fully appreciated or understood if separated from the concomitant "Day of Vengeance of our God". Throughout this prophecy, as throughout the Bible, or throughout any and every single one of its books, sin is in the background, and the unfolding of the Divine plan of the ages shows that plan to be occupied with the righteous removal of sin. This characteristic unites every book of Scripture, and every phase of the Divine purpose.

The prophet does not speak "comfortably" to Jerusalem in words of sentiment or mere pacification, but distinctly associates that part of his message with the results of redeeming love when he says, "Her iniquity is pardoned, for she hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins" (Isa. xl. 2). This close association we shall discover throughout the chapters that await us, so we leave the examination of such terms until we meet them in the progress of exposition, when we can acquaint ourselves more intimately with the subject-matter as it comes before us. The section which occupies Isa. xl.-xlviii., which we have entitled "Comfort and Controversy", is, like every other section of Isaiah, sevenfold.

A | a | Isaiah xl. - xlviii.
Comfort and Controversy.

a	xl.-xlviii.	COMFORT AND CONTROVERSY.
	(1)	xl. 1-11.	Good tidings to Zion.
	(2)	xl. 12 - xlii. 17.	My Servant (Israel and Messiah).
	(3)	xlii. 18 - xlv. 15.	My Witnesses (Israel).
	(4)	xlv. 16-25.	God and none else.
	(5)	xlvi.	Israel My Glory.
	(6)	xlvii.	Babylon said, "I am and none else".
	(7)	xlviii.	His servant Jacob, redeemed.

Our subject, therefore, for the present study is Isa. xl. 1-11, "Good tidings to Zion".

Before we can proceed to the structural analysis of these verses there is one item that must be settled. In verse 9 we read:--

> "O Zion, that bringest good tidings, get thee up into the high mountain; O Jerusalem that bringest good tidings, lift up thy voice with strength; lift it up, be not afraid; say unto the cities of Judah, Behold your God!" (Isa. xl. 9, A.V.).
>
> "O thou that tellest good tidings to Zion, get thee up into the high mountain; O thou that tellest good tidings to Jerusalem, lift up thy voice with strength: lift it up, be not afraid: say unto the cities of Judah, Behold your God!" (Isa. xl. 9, R.V.).

As an alternative, the A.V. places in the margin, the rendering subsequently adopted by the R.V., while contrariwise the R.V. places in the margin the translation found in the A.V. It is evident, therefore, that the passage is one of considerable ambiguity, and where so many authorities differ it would be temerity on our part to assume anything like finality in coming to a judgment.

Among those who favour the A.V. rendering are Aquila, Theodoret, Symmachus, Calvin, Vitringa, Ewald, Umbreit, Drechsler, and Stier. Among those who favour the R.V. rendering may be enumerated the LXX, Chaldean, Vulgate, Grotius, Lowth, Gesenius, Hitzig, Maurer, Knobel, Henderson and the Companion Bible. The balance, if anything, is in favour of the R.V. But the reader may find counterbalancing arguments from Young's Literal Translation or Rotherham's Version, and this balance and counterbalance of opinion might be pursued indefinitely, leaving us still in a state of indecision. There is, however, one appeal that we can make, and that is to an obviously parallel passage where none of the great Versions allow of the existence of ambiguity. Such a passage is Isa. lxii. 10, 11:--

> "Go through, go through the gates; prepare ye the way of the people; cast up, cast up the highway; gather out the stones; lift up a standard for the people. Behold, the Lord hath proclaimed unto the end of the world, Say ye to the daughter of Zion, Behold, thy Salvation cometh; behold, His reward is with Him, and His work before Him" (Isa. lxii. 10, 11).

We observe the parallels:--

> "Prepare ye the way of the Lord."
> "Prepare ye the way of the people."
>
> "Make straight . . . . . a highway for our God."
> "Cast up the highway."
>
> "The crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain."
> "Gather out the stones."
>
> "Lift up thy voice with strength, lift it up."
> "Lift up a standard for the people."
>
> "Say unto the cities of Judah, Behold your God . . . . . will come."
> "Say ye to the daughter of Zion, Behold, thy Salvation cometh."
>
> "His reward is with Him, and His work before Him."
> "His reward is with Him, and His work before Him."

In the near context of Isa. lxii. is a parallel with Isa. xl. 2:--

> "She hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins" (Isa. xl. 2).
> "For your shame ye shall have double . . . . . therefore in their land they shall possess the double" (Isa.lxi. 7).

There is much in these parallels to lead us to conclude that the passage we are considering, namely Isa. xl. 9, 10, is a proclamation of good tidings "to Zion", as the R.V. indicates, rather than one made "by Zion", as the A.V. gives it, and so far as we are concerned, this parallel passage decides the matter for us.

We now turn our attention to the structure of the passage as a whole.

Isaiah xl. 1-11.

A | 1, 2. Message of comfort to Jerusalem. Pardon.
B | 3-5. The VOICE. The Forerunner.
"A highway for our God."
The mouth of the Lord hath spoken.
B | 6-8. The VOICE. The Prophet.
"The Word of our God."
The word of our God shall stand for ever.
A | 9-11. Good tidings to Zion. Protection.

"Comfort ye, comfort ye My people, saith your God" (Isa. xl. 1).

It is with such words that the glorious prophecy of restoration opens. The first chapter saw Israel in a condition in which neither bandage nor ointment were of use. Nothing but desolation and distress awaited this disobedient and gainsaying people. When the "Voice" is first heard (Isa. vi. 8) it is to commission the prophet to utter such words of desolation that he could only wailingly cry, "Lord, how long?" Yet, the reader will remember, that, with all its woe, the chapter does not conclude without a prophecy of "return" and "revival". And now, with the opening of Isa. xl., that blessed day of restoration dominates the prophetic vision. We shall at times descend into the valley of human frailty, rebellion and sin; we shall never be allowed to forget that restoration is by grace and not by law or works, but the true light has at length broken through the clouds, and nothing can dim its lustre, or, for long, keep back the prophet's pæen of triumph.

While no better English word than "Comfort" can be found appropriately to translate the Hebrew word nacham, with which this prophecy opens, the word contains more than can be known by a superficial acquaintance with it. When we consider that nacham, here translated "comfort", is elsewhere 41 times translated "repent", it is evident that the original has a fuller meaning than is generally understood by the English word "comfort".

The first occurrences of the word in Scripture are suggestive. They are found in Gen. v. and vi., in reference to the flood, and there we meet with the two conceptions "comfort" and "repent". The parents of Noah so named their son because, said they, "This same shall comfort us" (Gen. v. 29). That Noah did not afford his parents individual and personal exemption "from the toil of their hands because of the ground that the Lord hath cursed" is evident, for Noah did not accomplish the purport of his name until he was 600 years old. No, the "comfort" was theirs by prophetic anticipation. In the account in Gen. vi., when the flood was about to come on the earth, the self-same word occurs, this time translated "repent": "It repented the Lord that He had made man" (Gen. vi. 6). The word has its basis in the idea of the intaking of the breath, and is used as a symbol of grief, pity, vengeance or comfort, according to circumstances.

> "I will ease Me of Mine adversaries" (Isa. i. 24).
> "Thy brother Esau . . . . . doth comfort himself purposing to kill thee" (Gen. xxvii. 42).

While nacham occurs but three times in the first part of Isaiah, it occurs fourteen times in the second. These latter occurrences are near the very heart of this great prophecy of restoration, and we must see them together.

The 13 occurrences of "Nacham", (*) that pertain to the restoration of Israel, in Isa. xl. - lxvi.

A | xl. 1. | Comfort ye, comfort ye My people.
The Lord God will come.
All flesh shall see salvation.
All flesh is as grass.

B | xlix. 13. | Sing . . . . . the Lord hath comforted His people.
In an acceptable time have I heard thee.
Say to prisoners go forth.

C | li. 3. | The Lord shall comfort Zion.
Look unto Abraham.
He will make the wilderness like Eden.

D | li. 11, 12. "Sing." "Joy."

E | lii. 19. "By whom shall I comfort thee?"

D | lii. 9. "Joy." "Sing."

C | liv. 11. | O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest and not comforted.
The waters of Noah shall no more go over the earth.

B | lxi. 2. | Preach good tidings . . . . . comfort all that mourn.

Even a superficial observer can hardly fail to see that these occurrences are joined together as links in a chain, and the earnest student who uses these notes in the right spirit, and is dissatisfied with a casual survey, will see the great desirability of a scrutiny of the passages and their contexts in order that the import of the opening cry of Isa. xl. 1 may be gathered up at something like its true worth.

What this "comfort" implies, how far it is possible of attainment, what place human agency has in it, and many other features, must await our next article. Meanwhile let us rejoice that there is room for such a word in the purpose of the ages, and that even though the Church of the Body of Christ be far removed in sphere from the kingdom of Israel, yet are they all one in their need of forgiveness and in being met in wondrous grace.

The intent reader will find a field of interest in the study of the rather obscure prophecy of Nahum. As may be surmised, Nahum is nacham, "comfort". The prophet deals with Nineveh (see Isa. xxxvii. 37), quotes Isaiah (Nahum i. 15), asks "Whence shall I seek comforters for thee?" (Nahum iii. 7), and shows by the figure that uses "wounds" and "bruises" (Nahum iii. 19), that Assyria was like Israel (Isa. i. 6) except that God remembered His covenant and redeemed Israel, whereas no such "comfort" is ministered to Nineveh. However, the matter is somewhat obstruse, and its explication would occupy more space than is at our disposal.

The Gospel of JOHN.

#16. The Marriage at Cana (ii. 1 - 12).

The First of the Eight Signs

pp. 6 - 12

Having given our attention to the successive witnesses that are brought forward by John in substantiation of the great truth unfolded in the prologue (i. 1-18), we arrive at the body of the Gospel, extending from chapter ii. 1 to chapter xxi. 14, and with the opening of chapter ii. we come to the first of the eight signs that are so distinctive a characteristic of the Gospel. We have already given the outline structure of this great section in Volume XXIX, page 127, and have shown how these eight signs form as it were the backbone of the book.

We must now acquaint ourselves with another remarkable feature, which has been dealt with very fully in Appendix 176 of the Companion Bible. As it takes at least two pages of type to set out in full the inter-relationship of these eight signs, we shall adopt the briefer method of setting out the grouping in skeleton only, and then, as our studies proceed, lift out each pair of signs and show their balance in extenso.

THE EIGHT SIGNS OF JOHN'S GOSPEL.

A | ii. 1-12. THE MARRIAGE IN CANA.
The third day. No wine. Glory manifested.
B | iv. 43-52. THE NOBLEMAN'S SON.
After two days. At the point of death.
C | v. 1-17. THE IMPOTENT MAN.
Pool Bethesda. 38 years. Sabbath. Sin.
D | vi. 1-14. FEEDING OF THE FIVE THOUSAND.
The only sign (with D) recorded in the other Gospels.
D | vi. 15-21. WALKING ON THE SEA.
The only sign (with D) recorded in the other Gospels.
C | ix. 1-41. THE MAN BORN BLIND.
Pool. From birth. Sabbath. Sin.
B | xi. 1-46. THE SISTERS' BROTHER.
Two days. Lazarus is dead.
A | xxi. 1-14. THE DRAUGHT OF FISHES.
The third time. No meat. Lord manifested.

We now lift out the first and eighth signs, in order to show their complete parallelism.

A | ii. 1-11. THE MARRIAGE IN CANA.
a | i. 49-51. THE BACKGROUND.—Nathaniel's diffidence, then full confession.
b | ii. 1. THE PLACE.—Galilee.
c | 1. TIME.—The third day.
d | 2. INVITATION.—Jesus called, and His disciples.
e | 3. FAILURE CONFESSED.—They have no wine.
f | 6. NUMBERS.—Six waterpots. Two or three firkins.
g | 7. COMMAND.—Fill the waterpots with water.
h | 7. OBEDIENCE.—They filled them.
i | 7. WATERPOTS FILLED.—Up to the brim.
j | 8. THE SERVANTS.—The servants bare (enenkan).
k | 11. RESULT.—Glory manifested (ephanerose).

A | xxi. 1-14. THE DRAUGHT OF FISHES.
a | xx. 24-29. THE BACKGROUND.—Thomas' unbelief, then full confession.
b | xxi. 1. THE PLACE.—Galilee.
c | 14. TIME.—The third time.
d | 12. INVITATION.—Come and dine.
e | 3, 5. FAILURE CONFESSED.—Nothing. No meat.
f | 8. NUMBERS.—200 cubits; 153 fishes.
g | 6. COMMAND.—Cast net into water.
h | 6. OBEDIENCE.—They cast therefore.
i | 8, 11. NETS FILLED.—So many.
j | 10. THE DISCIPLES.—Bring the fish (enenkate).
k | 14. RESULT.—Manifested (ephanerothe).

But as we discover that this detailed parallelism extends to the whole of the eight signs, it becomes evident that, not accident or coincidence accounts for the phenomenon, but purpose and design. John assures that he had a wealth of material to select from, and if, out of hundreds of miracles performed, he selects but eight, we may well believe that these form such a chain of evidence, that they set forth "the glory of the only begotten of the Father, full of true grace", so fully that no further evidence could be demanded, or has been given. With these eight signs and the recurring "witness" of this Gospel, the evidence is complete, and since that moment heaven has been silent.

In the record of the opening sign at Cana the first assertion is one referring to time: "And the third day there was a marriage." We have already seen that John i. 19-51 gives the witness of four consecutive days: 1st day (19-28); 2nd day (29-34); 3rd day (35-42); 4th day (43-51); 7th day (i.e., third day after last event, ii. 1). It was on the seventh day of the creation week that the Lord rested and the day was sanctified. On the seventh thousand year-day of earth's great week, the sabbath-keeping for the children of God shall come (Heb. iv. 9, sabbatismos), and "The Marriage of the Lamb". On the first day of his testimony John pointed out the Lord as "The Lamb of God"; no other writer uses the title

Dr. Lightfoot gives a long list of laws and regulations regarding marriage, as found in the Talmud and Rabbinical writings, but it is only the last of these that has any bearing upon John ii.: "The nuptial festival was continued for the whole seven days: which we also see of old (Judges xix. 12)." We have earlier evidence than the book of Judges, for we find Laban saying to Jacob at the marriage of Leah, and also at his request for Rachel, "Fulfil her week".

As seem to have been the case at Cana, it will easily be understood that at a festivity extending over a period of seven days, the supply of wine might prematurely run out.

> "And when they wanted wine, the mother of Jesus saith unto Him, They have no wine" (ii. 3).

The way in which Mary speaks and acts in this passage makes it fairly clear that she was a relative of the household, and the fact that she told the Lord of the lack of wine indicates that she was in expectation of some action on His part to remedy the fault, for she knew of the baptism of John, the descent of the Spirit as a dove, and the attestation of the Baptist and others. To our ears, the Saviour's reply sounds rather abrupt, but we must remember that the use of the word "woman" was a respectful form of address, as can be seen from xix. 26 and xx. 13, 15. We must also understand that these words were spoken exclusively for Mary's ear, and that we have nothing to indicate the accompany tone, inflection or look that so modify the spoken word. On more than one occasion the Lord had to check the intrusion of even His own mother, into that sphere which lay outside all earthly relationships. At the age of twelve, when Mary, having found Him in the Temple, said, "Behold thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing", the Lord gently told them that these home ties were to be broken and that He must soon be about His Father's business (Luke ii. 48, 49). Similarly, on another occasion, when "His brethren and His mother" sought Him, He answered "Who is my mother or my brethren?" (Mark iii. 31-35). Again, the expression, "What have I to do with thee?" may not have sounded so harsh in Mary's ear as in our's, for it seems to have been in Hebraism, and therefore not to be taken by us too literally. It was used in II Sam. xvi. 10 and xix. 22 by David, and in I Kings xvii. 18, by the widow of Elijah. It was also used by the demons who were cast out by the Lord (Matt. viii. 29; Mark i. 24; Luke iv. 34). The words were however decisive enough, and indicated that the Lord had now embarked upon that ministry wherein the Father's will alone was supreme and which inflexibly led on to the death of the cross. The words "Mine hour is not yet come" seem to suggest that the cross was in mind, even at the marriage at Cana. Some have said that, in the present case, no such solemn association must be read into the words, but the way in which this saying recurs in this Gospel compels us to see in this occurrence, even at a festive marriage scene, the shadow of the cross. Here are the eight occurrences of this or similar expressions:

> "Mine hour is not yet come."—Answer to mother's suggestion (John ii. 4).
> "My time is not yet come."—Answer to brethren's suggestion (vii. 6).
> "My time is not yet full come."—Reason for secrecy at feast (vii. 8).
> "His hour not yet come."—Hence, no man laid hands on Him (vii. 30).
> "His hour was not yet come."—Hence, no man laid hands on Him (viii. 20).
> "The hour is come."—Greeks seek Him. Death mentioned (xii. 23).

> "Jesus knew that His hour was come."—His departure from the world spoken of (xiii. 1).
> "Father - the hour is come."—The work finished (John xvii. 1).

To this list might be added John xii. 27 and xvi. 25 or 32.

Whatever view we may take, it is clear from her caution to the servants, which immediately follows, that Mary did not feel altogether set aside: "Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it."

Before proceeding it is necessary to notice the material with which the Lord worked.

> "And there were set there six water pots of stone, after the manner of the purifying of the Jews, containing two or three firkins apiece."

Authorities differ as to the exact amount of water a firkin represents. The LXX uses the word to translate the Hebrew measure of a "Bath" (II Chron. iv. 5). Josephus in his Antiquities says, "Now a bath is able to contain 72 sextaries" (Ant. viii. 2, 9). As a sextarie was a little under an English pint, a firkin was probably about eight or nine gallons. The Companion Bible gives for "Bath", "About six English gallons", and for "Firkin", "About nine gallons". If we take the highest figures, that is six water pots at three firkins, and each firkin reckoned as nine gallons, we have a total of one hundred and sixty-two gallons; if we take the lowest figures, six water pots at two firkins and each firkin reckoned as six gallons, we have the total seventy-two gallons, which gives us a mean of one hundred and seventeen gallons. This amount of water may seem excessive, but we have checked our findings with other commentators and find that there is general agreement. Alford makes the amount one hundred and twenty-six gallons; a figure endorsed by Bloomfield. Theodoret, born at Antioch A.D.386, says, "Follow in these things Josephus, who well understood the measures of the nation".

It was the ceremonial necessities of the Jews that brought into requisition such large quantities of water. For instance, we learn from a rabbinical writer, that > "They allot a fourth part of a log (a log is two-thirds of a pint) for the washing of one person's hands, it may be of two; half a log for three or four; and a whole log for five or ten, to a hundred; with the provision, said Rabbi Jose, that the last that washeth, hath no less than a fourth of a log to himself" (Jadaim Ca. i. pat. 1).

It will thus be seen that so large a quantity of water as has been considered would not be at all out of place for a festival lasting seven days, and at which a number of guests were present.

The question that now arises is "Why was so enormous a quantity of wine provided at the end of the feast?" To this question all sorts of answers have been given. Unbelievers and critics have caviled at it or made unseemly fun of it. Devout commentators have sought to justify the superfluity by various conjectures. Before we attempt a solution let us first make sure from Scripture that the Lord made such a quantity. The general belief is that the whole six water pots were converted into wine. This however we hope to show is not the case. Our attention was drawn to this, many years ago, by a writer whose name we have forgotten, or we would have given him his due, but, seeing that in "that day" sower and reaper shall stand together, all is well.

The water pots were first of all filled to the brim with water. This water must have been drawn from a well, and the fact that the servants passed and repassed from the well to the water pots would suffice to show that there had been no tampering with the water beforehand. When the last drop of water was emptied into the water pots, the Lord said "Draw out now", and the reader, in spite of the statement that the water pots were for purification, jumps to the conclusion that He meant the servants to "draw out of the water pots". This however, we believe, is not so, and here is the reason for our belief.

The word translated "draw out" is antleo. Antleo is derived from antlos, "the hold of a ship where bilge water settles", and so came to stand for "the bilge water" itself. Antlema is "a bucket", and antleo meant in the classics "to bale" out a ship. In the LXX version of the Old Testament it is confined to the one idea of drawing water from a well.

> "Moses stood up and helped them, and drew water for them and watered their flock" (Exod. ii. 17).
>
> "An Egyptian . . . . . drew water for us, and watered our sheep" (Exod. ii. 19).
>
> "Lo, I stand by the well of water, and the daughters of them that inhabit the city come forth to draw water . . . . . she ran to
>
> "Therefore with joy, shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation" (Isa. xii. 3).

The only other occurrence in the LXX is Prov. ix. 12, where the word is used in a highly figurative sense "to bear" evil, a use of that word that demands a deeper acquaintance with manners and customs than we possess. We have recorded the passage for the sake of completeness, but it makes no contribution to the point at issue.

We now come to the use of antleo in the New Testament and find that there are four occurrences, John ii. 8, 9; iv. 7 and 15; and one occurrence of antlema, "a bucket", "something to draw with" (John iv. 11). The references in John iv. are, confessedly, to drawing water out of a very deep well, and the references in the LXX of the Old Testament all speak to the same effect.

With this information we return to the marriage at Cana and understand what the Lord did. After the servants had filled the water pots to the brim, in full view of the guests, He said, in effect, "Go now once more to the well, and draw out again, but, this time, take it to the governor of the feast". Having tasted it the governor expressed astonishment at its excellent quality, and that his testimony was entirely unbiased is clear from the words, and "knew not whence it was". We are told however that the servants which drew (antleo, drew out of a well, with an antlema, a bucket) knew.

The method adopted by our Lord was such that everyone must have admitted the genuineness of the miracle. In John's Gospel we are dealing with "testimony", hence this very evident miracle is brought forward.

> "This beginning of miracles did Jesus in Cana of Galilee and manifested forth His glory; and His disciples believed on Him" (John ii. 11).

John had already said that he had beheld “His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of real grace” and in this miracle that glory was “manifested”.

The homely associations of marriage and the turning of water into wine, form a striking contrast with the severe character of John the Baptist who came “neither eating nor drinking”. Ceremonial water gives place to wine, the Law of Moses to true grace, and out of this fullness all we have received. Not only did the Lord “manifest” His glory, but the great aim of the Gospel was attained also, “His disciples believed on Him” (John ii. 11).

Matthew uses the word dunamis, “wonderful works” (vii. 22), “mighty works” (xi. 20, 21, 23; xiii. 54, 58; xiv. 2), a word used also by Mark and Luke to describe the Lord’s miracles. This word is not used by John, but, in its stead he uses semeion, which is translated in his Gospel by “miracle” thirteen times, and “sign” four times. The Synoptic Gospels use semeion about as many times as they use dunamis. John’s purpose is not to point out mighty power, but to provide evidence. Just as the miracles wrought by Paul were “signs” of his apostleship (II Cor. xii. 12), so were these miracles selected as signs of “the Apostle” (Heb. iii. 1), the great “Sent One*”, the Son of God.

The fact that this miracle was the “beginning” of miracles nullifies the validity of the fantastic traditions that have come down from early days of the miracles wrought by the child Jesus, just as the setting aside of Mary in the fourth verse of the chapter is the death blow of Mariolatry. When he has “beheld His glory”, man needs not the intercession of saints, angels or the Virgin.

> [NOTE: * - The word “Sent” is found in eighteen out of the twenty-one chapters of John’s Gospel, and is vital to its teaching. This we shall see later.]

#17. The Testimony in Jerusalem, Judaea and Samaria (ii. 13-iv. 42).
Jerusalem. The Temple cleansed (ii. 13 - 23).
pp. 37 - 41

We now come to the first of the six links in the chain that binds together the eight signs. The interrelation of these links with the signs themselves and the six links as a whole have been set out in Volume XXIX, page 127. In each of these links there is an emphasis on works and faith, except in the second case, where, although work is performed, it is not specifically mentioned.

The passage before us is John ii. 13 - iv. 42, and we find that this is balanced by John xi 47 - xx. 31:

A | ii. 13 - iv.42. Jerusalem, Judaea, Samaria.
"My meat is . . . . . to finish His work."
A | xi. 47 - xx. 31. Ephraim, Bethany, Jerusalem.
"I have finished the work."

Each of the geographical subdivisions in the first of these sections leads up to a great Messianic witness, and continues the testimony already given in John i. 19-51.

JERUSALEM. John ii. 13 - iii. 21.
"The Son of Man." "The only begotten Son of God" (iii. 13, 18).
JUDAEA. John iii. 22 - iv. 2.
"I am not the Christ." "The Son" (iii. 28, 35, 36).
SAMARIA. John iv. 3-42.
"I am He." "The Christ, the Saviour of the world" (iv. 26, 42).

The wealth of material here is overwhelming, and, unless we exercise care, we may easily miss the main theme. In Jerusalem we have the cleansing of the Temple, the prophetic reference to the Lord's resurrection, the solemn words to Nicodemus, and the gospel illustrated by the brazen serpent. After this we have the controversy about purifying and the report that the Lord was attracting all men to Himself. This gives John the Baptist a further opportunity of witnessing for Christ. The Lord then enters Samaria, and we have the conversation with the woman at the well—a conversation that is full of teaching, as is the subsequent witness to Christ by the people of Samaria. The ninety verses that comprise this section are replete with truth, doctrinal, dispensational and devotional. With such a wealth of subject-matter, we are only too conscious of our limitations, both of space and ability, and we must therefore concentrate upon the salient points only. These we shall discover from an examination of the structure, which is given below:--

THE TESTIMONY IN JERUSALEM, JUDAEA AND SAMARIA.
(John ii. 13 - iv. 42).

THE TESTIMONY IN JERUSALEM.
"The Son of Man." "The only begotten Son of God."

k | Light. Come.
l | Deeds manifest.

Such, then, is the analysis of the testimony given in Jerusalem. (The testimony in Judaea and Samaria we must leave for consideration later.)

The section opens with a reference to the Passover, just as earlier John the Baptist had spoken of the Lord as "The Lamb of God". As a type of redemption the Passover teaches the absolute necessity of the shedding of blood, but as a "feast" it also stresses the personal response of the participator, expressed, according to the law, by the removal of all leaven from the house. This symbolic purging out of the leaven is fulfilled in the Lord's cleansing of the Temple. In connection with this there are two facts that should be noticed:

(1) This purging of the Temple was the Saviour's first public act at Jerusalem.
(2) The cleansing of the Temple as recorded by Matthew, Mark and Luke, came after His public entry into Jerusalem riding upon the ass, and was His last public act in Jerusalem before his apprehension and crucifixion, which took place, as did the first cleansing of the Temple, just before the Passover.

In John, from under the fig tree the "Israelite indeed in whom there was no guile" comes forth to acknowledge the Saviour as "The King of Israel" (John i. 49). In Matthew, after the cleansing of the Temple in Matt. xxi. we have the Hosannahs of the children, but the fig tree withers away (Matt. xxi. 19, 20), and the house is left desolate (Matt. xxiii. 38) until the second coming of the Lord takes place.

We do not believe that any of our readers will need detailed proof that the cleansing described in John ii. and that recorded by Matthew are entirely distinct occurrences. As is explained in Volume XXIX, pp. 206-212, the whole of the history of Israel, from the time of David up to the return from the Babylonian captivity is vitally linked with the attitude of king and people to the House of God. Mere ceremonial is of no value, but true worship lies at the foundation of all truth. This same principle can be seen in operation even before the overthrow of the world, for we are told that Satan, whose fall is set forth under the figure of the King of Tyre in Ezek. xxviii., was originally associated with holy things. He later became profane, and introduced "merchandise" (Ezek. xxviii. 16). Worship is the basic principle underlying the ten commandments, and the Satanic conflict of the ages has worship as its goal (Rev. xiii. 4: compare also Matt. iv. 9). It will also be remembered that in the section of John that we are now considering the passage occurs that speaks of worshipping the Father in spirit and in truth (John iv. 24).

In John i. 23 John the Baptist declares that he had been sent before the Lord as a forerunner (John i. 23) and that this was in fulfillment of the prophecy of Isaiah. It will be remembered that those sent by the Sanhedrin had enquired John as to whether he was "Elijah" (John i. 21) and John had replied that he was not. At the same time Matt. xvii. 10-13 shows that there was a definite relationship between John the Baptist and Elijah, and at John's birth the angel declared that he should go before the Lord "in the spirit and power of Elijah" (Luke i. 17).

The Jew who knew the O.T. prophecies would not be slow in associating the Lord's sudden appearance in the Temple with the prophecy of Malachi: "Behold I will send My messenger and he shall prepare the way before Me: and the Lord, Whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to His temple . . . . . He is like a refiner's fire . . . . . He shall purify the sons of Levi . . . . . Behold I will send Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord" (Mal. iii. 1-3; iv. 5). We see therefore, that the sudden appearance of the Lord, scourge in hand, was a public witness to His Messianic office.

Coming back to the actual record of John ii. 13-23; we read: "And the Jews' Passover was at hand, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem, and found in the Temple those that sold oxen and sheep and doves, and the changers of money sitting" (John ii. 13, 14). While these particular verses speak of those that sold the various animals being found in the Temple, verse 15 clearly shows that the animals themselves were there. It also seems fairly clear from other records that the animals were actually brought into the court. The Talmud, for example, records the zeal of Baba Ben Bota, who, finding the court empty, sent and fetched three thousand sheep and brought into the court of the Temple. It was also necessary that every Jew should pay his half shekel. Maimonides speaks of its being "an affirmative precept of the law, that every Israelite should pay, yearly, half a shekel". A proclamation was made on the first day of the month Adar, in order that the people should get ready. On the fifteenth day, collectors sat in every street; and the twenty-fifth day they began to sit in the Temple—"and then forced men to pay; and if they refused, they distrained".

The Saviour's indignation was not roused by either the selling of the oxen or the changing of the money, for both operations were necessary, but rather by the greed that actuated the dealers, and the profits exacted by the money-changers. Taking up a few "rush-ropes" (schoinion, from schoinos "a rush") that had been used for tying the cattle, the Lord drives the sheep and oxen out of the Temple, pours out the changers' money, and overthrows the tables, saying unto them that sold doves, "Take these things hence: make not My Father's house an house of merchandise" (John ii. 16). At the beginning of His public ministry, the Lord calls the Temple "My Father's house", and refers to their "merchandise"; at the close, He speaks of the Temple as having been made a "den of thieves" and calls it "your house" that is "left unto you desolate".

In John ii. 18 the Jews ask the Lord for a sign to justify His action in the Temple. Just as on another occasion He gave them "the sign of the prophet Jonah", so here He speaks of the Temple as a symbol of His resurrection. The Jews, however, misunderstand the Lord's answer and say: "Forty-and-six years was this temple in building, and wilt Thou rear it up in three days?" Josephus tells us in his Antiquities that the Temple was begun by Herod the Great in the eighteenth year of his reign. He also states that Herod lived thirty-seven years from that time and that in his thirty-fifth year Christ was born. If the Lord was 30 years old at the time of the cleansing of the Temple, then we have a period of 48 years, which if reckoned exclusively (i.e., not counting the opening or closing years which were incomplete) would become a period of 46 years, as the Jews are reported to have said. The Temple was not actually completed until A.D.64 under Herod Agrippa II, so that the Jews must have been referring to the part of it that had been finished up to that time. The disciples remembered the Lord's prophecy after His resurrection, and the Jews remembered it against Him, when they sought some evidence upon which to put Him to death. "He spake of the temple of His body" (John ii. 21). We have already drawn the reader's attention to the fact that when the Word was made flesh, He "tabernacled" among us, and that this is connected with "the glory of the Only Begotten of the Father" and the "real grace" that was found in Him. So here, Herod's temple, though a magnificent structure and lavishly decorated, is contrasted with the living temple of the Lord's body. In the Jerusalem Talmud we read:

"In the second temple there wanted the fire from heaven, the Ark with the Propitiatory and the Cherubim, the Urim and Thummim, the Shechinah or tabernacling glory, the Holy Ghost, and the anointing oil."

"Things are not asked or enquired after now (by Urim and Thummim) by the high priest, because he does not speak by the Holy Ghost, nor does any divine afflatus breathe on him."

What the Temple of Zerubbabel, and of Herod lacked, was found in its fullness and reality in the Lord Jesus. The fire from heaven, which spoke of the acceptance of the offering, found its fulfillment when heaven was opened and the voice was heard saying: "This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased." The Ark, Propitiatory, and Cherubim are all included in the fact that Christ was "The Lamb of God". The Urim and Thummim are found in Him too, and in the Holy Spirit of Whom He said: "He shall lead you into all truth." We have already explained that the Shechinah glory is referred to in John i. 14, and we also read that the Holy Ghost was not given to Him by measure. Finally, in connection with the anointing oil, we have the advent of the Messiah Himself, the Christ, the Anointed One.

Here we must stop for the time being. In our next article we shall hope to deal with the story of Nicodemus.

#18. The Testimony in Jerusalem, Judaea and Samaria (ii. 13-iv. 42).
Jerusalem. The New Birth (ii. 24 - iii. 12).
pp. 82 - 90

We have heard the first (A1) of the threefold testimony given in Jerusalem, and for the sake of clearness we here repeat the headings.

The Testimony in Jerusalem (John ii. 13 - iii. 21).

A1 | THE TEMPLE (ii. 13-23). The cleansing. The prophetic sign.
A2 | NEW BIRTH (ii. 24 - iii. 12). The Kingdom of God.
A3 | AIONIAN LIFE (iii. 13-21). Condemned or saved.

We now take up the second witness (A2) given in Jerusalem, this time "by night". The structure is simple, and has been set out on page 38. This section commences in the closing verses of chapter ii., where the words "He knew what was in man" (John ii. 25) are followed by "There was a man of the Pharisees, named Nicodemus", and we do not read far before we realize how truly "He knew" what was in that man's heart. Nicodemus is referred to by John on three different occasions.

(1) When men came by night, as recorded in John iii.
(2) When he interposed at a meeting of the Pharisees, saying, "Doth our law judge any man, before it hear him, and know what he doeth?" (John viii. 51).
(3) After the death of Christ, when Nicodemus brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about a hundred-pound weight (John xix. 39).

Nicodemus may have had more than one office and title, but he has passed into the Scriptures and will be known for all time as the Pharisee that "came to Jesus by night" (John iii. 2; vii. 50; xix. 39). We have had the clear, unselfish, testimony of John the Baptist, the bold announcement of Andrew, and the conviction of Nathaniel, but what good purpose is served by the halting admission of this man who came by night? There are at least two great purposes served.

(1) Nicodemus was a Pharisee, a Ruler, a man of some degree of learning. The testimony of such a man would be valuable addition to that of fishermen.
(2) An enunciation of the doctrine of the new birth which lies near the root of the doctrine of aionion life; no birth, no life. This, of itself, was of extreme value and demanded early recognition.

As to Nicodemus himself little is known. A Nicodemus is mentioned by the Talmudists as a man of great wealth, and he is reported to have become a "follower of Jesus", but his man flourished at the time of the destruction of the temple at Jerusalem. It is not, of course, impossible, that Nicodemus lived till that event, but the words of John iii. 4, "when he is old", might have been a passing reference to himself. The matter cannot be settled and is of small importance. We do know however that he was a Pharisee, so that it will be of interest to note the part played by the Pharisees in John's record.

We learn from John iii. 25 that a dispute arose between the followers of John the Baptist and the Jews about purifying, and from the account it appears that an attempt was made to create jealousy, for these Jews went to John the Baptist and, referring to Christ, said, "Behold, the same baptizeth, and all men come to Him". When the Lord knew that the Pharisees were using these circumstances for evil purposes He left Judaea (John iv. 1-3). We meet with no further reference to the Pharisees until we are well through the seventh chapter, where we approach the feast of tabernacles and the urgency of the Lord's brethren upon Him to go up to the feast openly. The Jews sought Him at the feast also, and "some said, He is a good man; others said, Nay; but He deceiveth the people" (John vii. 12). Into this divided company, about half-way through the feast, the Lord came, and as a result of His boldness some of the people began to ask, "Do the rulers know indeed that this is the very Christ?" Others, taking an opposite view, sought to lay hands upon Him. When the Pharisees heard that many of the people believed on Him, they sent officers to take Him (John vii. 32), but the power of His testimony was such that these men were rendered powerless. Upon making their report the Pharisees asked, "Are ye also deceived? Have any of the rulers or of the Pharisees believed on Him?" (John vii. 45-48). It was here that Nicodemus made his ineffectual interposition (John vii. 50-52). Failing to take the Lord by force, the Pharisees resort to guile, and we have the incident of the woman taken in adultery with the striking account of the conviction and discomfiture of the accusers (John viii. 3, 9), and for the first time we get the grave charge of blasphemy brought against the Lord by the Pharisees (John viii. 13). Then follows the miracle of the man born blind, his attempted intimidation by the Pharisees (John ix. 13, 15, 16) and their question, "Are we blind also?" (John ix. 40).

The raising of Lazarus is reported to the Pharisees, and they make the confession "This man doeth many miracles. If we let Him thus alone, all men will believe on Him, and the Romans shall come and take away both our place and nation" (John xi. 46-48). Here is valuable testimony indeed, for the very enemies of the Lord admit the fact of the miracles, yet they are more concerned about the possible loss of prestige, "their place and nation", than for the truth or Kingdom of God. Again, for the last time, the Pharisees is allowed to speak. We read:--

> "The Pharisees therefore said among themselves, Perceive ye how ye prevail nothing? behold, the world is gone after Him" (John xii. 19).

With the end of chapter xii. we reach the end of the Lord's public ministry. From chapter xiii. He ministers to His own with the full consciousness that His hour was come (John xiii. 1). At the end of this outer section we meet a few more Nicodemus-like Rulers:

> "Nevertheless among the chief rulers also many believed on Him; but because of the Pharisees they did not confess Him, lest they should be put out of the synagogue: for they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God" (John xii. 42, 43).

The reluctant testimony of a non-adherent is of great weight as evidence. This must be borne in mind as we attempt to assess the value of the recorded visit of Nicodemus, "a ruler of the Jews".

Though he may have spoken only for himself, it seems probable that Nicodemus, when he said "We know", intended the Lord to understand that the Rulers and Pharisees shared his conviction that this new ministry, attested as it was by undoubted miracles, proved that its Minister was a "Teacher come from God", in spite of His despised Galilean connection and the fact that He was a Nazarene. The word "Teacher", didaskalos, is the same as the word "Master", an appellation to which men of Nicodemus' rank were entitled (John iii. 10), and yet this highly-placed official of the Sanhedrin approached an unknown, and apparently unlearned, young Visitor from Galilee by addressing Him as "Rabbi". This was in the nature of an intended concession. How many have since succumbed to similar approaches only "that day" will reveal. But we have already been informed that our Lord "knew what was in man", and His "answer" agreed with this divine knowledge, for instead of touching upon anything that Nicodemus had "said", it answered the inmost need of his heart. It must have come as a shock to the pride and beliefs of Nicodemus to have his overtures apparently ignored, and a plain statement made to him of his need of new birth. John the Baptist warned the Pharisees, saying, "Think not to say, we have Abraham for our father", and in John viii. we have a continued argument along the same lines. (John viii. 33, 37, 39, 40, 52, 56, 57, 58).

Nicodemus knew and acknowledged that a proselyte became "new-born", for "if any one become a proselyte, he is like a child new-born (Feramoth)." Maimonides taught that the Gentile proselyte was so really like a child new-born, that it became lawful for him to marry his own mother or the sister of his mother, and it was only forbidden upon other grounds. This at least will show that the idea could not have been entirely new to Nicodemus. What was new, and what was hard to hear, was, that he, a Ruler of the Jews, a Teacher in Israel, a Pharisee, an undoubted son of Abraham, needed this same new birth.

The words translated "born again" are gennethe anothen. Now the verb gennao is used for either the begetting by a father, or the giving birth by a mother. This word that is used is translated in Matt. i. 1-20 "begat" 39 times, "born" once, and "conceived" once. The word anothen occurs in John's Gospel as follows:--

> "Except a man be born again" (iii. 3).
> "Ye must be born again" (iii. 7).
> "He that cometh from above" (iii. 31).
> "Except it were given thee from above' (xix. 12).
> "Woven from the top" (xix. 23).

Elsewhere it is rendered "From the top" (Matt. xxvii. 51; Mark xv. 38), "From the very first", "From the beginning" (Luke i. 3; Acts xxvi. 5), "From above" (Jas. i. 17; iii. 15, 17), and "Again" (Gal. iv. 9). Ano from which anothen is formed, is never translated "Again" but, "The brim", "Up", "High" and "Above".

The perplexed answer of Nicodemus, and his reference to natural motherhood, makes it evident that he took our Lord's words in a wrong sense. In effect, what the Saviour said to Nicodemus was that in spite of all his learning, his dignity and his racial connection with Abraham, he needed to be "begotten from above".

What this begetting from above implied is made known in the Lord's second statement. Here He replaces the word anothen, "from above", by "water and spirit". There is great need for care and unbiased judgment here. In the reference to "water" and "spirit", the Churchman, the Ritualist, and the Baptist, will find justification for baptism as a church ordinance. Those who have the light of dispensational truth, who know full well that there was no "church" in formation during the opening weeks of Christ's public testimony, and who have realized that for the church of the mystery there is but "one baptism", which cannot be that of water; these have looked upon the expression "water and spirit" as a figure of speech, and read "spiritual water", i.e., "not water but spirit". We feel however that Nicodemus would not so understand our Lord's words. The visit of Nicodemus is divided from the witness of John the Baptist by only one chapter and by a few days. John and his baptism come before us once more before this chapter is finished (John iii. 23). John had testified: "I baptize with water . . . . . the same is He which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost" (John i. 26-33).

Among those who went to John's baptism were "Pharisees", who received the warning, "Think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham . . . . . I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance, but He that cometh after me is mightier than I, Whose shoes I am not worthy to bear; He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire" (Matt. iii. 7, 9, 11).

We do not know whether Nicodemus had himself attended John's baptism, but some of the Pharisees had been baptized, and later many of the Rulers became secret believers, but Nicodemus is warned by the Lord of the futility of trusting to anything accomplished on, in, or by, the flesh, even though it be an ordinance of divine origin. Therefore before the evangelical note of aionion life is sounded, divine and spiritual begetting is shown to be absolutely necessary ("Ye must") for admittance into the Kingdom of God.

The utter repudiation of the flesh in John iii. 6, is somewhat veiled by the A.V. translation, a fault not rectified by the R.V. A literal rendering of the verse is:-- > "That which hath been begotten out of the flesh, is flesh; and that which hath been begotten out of the Spirit, is spirit."

The perfect tense gives the thought "That which has been and remains", like Pilate's "What I have written, I have written", an emphatic statement which carries home its message even to those unacquainted with the niceties of grammar.

The word "flesh" has three shades of meaning in John's gospel.

(1) The sinless humanity of the Son of God (John i. 14, etc.).
(2) Mankind, "Power over all flesh" (John xvii. 2).
(3) The flesh as representing fallen human nature and opposed to spirit.

The reference, "Which were born not of the will of the flesh" (John i. 13) may be referred to either (2) or (3), or both.

> "It is the spirit that quickeneth: the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life" (John vi. 63).
> "Ye judge after the flesh" (John viii. 15).

These two references have in view fallen, erring, man. The flesh in Nicodemus was identical with the flesh of the common and despised fellaheen. The attitude of mind that characterized the Pharisees and the Rulers of the time is expressed in John vii. 48, 49:

> "Have any of the rulers or of the Pharisees believed on Him? But this people who knoweth not the law are cursed."

It was the same attitude of mind that led the Jews to marvel and to say: "How knoweth this man letters, having never learned?" (John vii. 15). But all the lore and learning of the law must be put aside as unprofitable, the pride of the Pharisee must be humbled, and the Apostle Paul's testimony that there is "no difference", either in the matter of sin or of salvation, must be accepted.

Much of what the Lord taught him should have been known by Nicodemus. He was a teacher of Israel, if not "the teacher of Israel", as the presence of the article may indicate, but the Lord says he was "ignorant of these things", yet he might have gathered the necessity of the spiritual begetting from Ezek. xi. 19, 20.

> "And I will give them one heart, and I will put a new spirit within you; and I will take away the stony heart out of their flesh and will give them a heart of flesh: that they may walk in My statutes, and keep Mine ordinances, and do them: and they shall be My people, and I will be their God."

Without this new spirit, no man of Israel should "see" or "enter" the kingdom of God.

The Lord follows this statement concerning the flesh and the spirit with the words:--

> "Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be begotten from above. The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh or whither it goeth: so is every one that is begotten of the Spirit" (John iii. 7, 8).

This is the only occasion in the N.T. where the words to pneuma are translated "the wind". The word in John vi. 18 is anemos and this is so translated 31 times. The word "listeth" is thelo, "to will", and is found in John v. 21, "Quickeneth whom He will". This word occurs 23 times in John's Gospel, except in iii. 8 (see John i. 23; iii. 29; v. 25, 28, 37; x. 3, 4, 5, 16, 27; xi. 43; xii. 28, 30; xviii. 37). The verse therefore should be translated thus:--

> "The Spirit breatheth where He willeth, and thou hearest His voice, but thou knowest not whence He cometh or whither He goeth; thus is everyone that hath been begotten of the Spirit."

To one who, like Nicodemus, was familiar with O.T. prophecies, the connection between John iii. 6 & 8, and Ezek. xi. 19 (quoted above) and Ezek. xxxvii. 9, "Prophecy unto the wind . . . . . breathe upon these slain that they may live", and Ezek. xxxvii. 12-14, "I will open your graves . . . . . and ye shall live", would be obvious, and to us who read John's Gospel and remember the remote context of John v. 21-29, with the parallels, "quicken whom He will", "all that are in their graves shall hear His voice", further associations will be suggested.

Nicodemus, however, apparently still held by the traditions of his sect and still holding to the advantages of being a physical descendant of Abraham, could only reply, "How can these things be?" The Lord, perhaps with sorrow at the thickness of the veil that still blinded his eyes, said: "Art thou the teacher of Israel, and knowest not these things?" Dr. Lightfoot tells us that there were four sorts of teachers. The teacher of children, public teachers in the synagogues, those who had their "midrashoth", or divinity schools, like the school of Hillel and Shammai or Gamaliel, and The Sanhedrin, the great school of the nation. Of this company of the great doctors and teachers of the Sanhedrin, Nicodemus was one.

> "Their divinity, that they taught and learned, was generally to this tenor:--to build upon their birth privilege from Abraham, to rest in the law, to rely upon their own works, to care for no faith but historical, to patter over prayers as efficacious . . . . . How was it imaginable, that ever the doctrine of the new birth should be dreamed of among them, who looked for salvation upon such principles and terms as these" (Dr. Lightfoot, Volume v. page 44).

The doctrine of the new birth is not a new revelation, it belongs to the O.T., and the Lord implied as much when He said to Nicodemus: "If I have told you earthly things, and ye believed not, how shall ye believe, if I tell you heavenly things?" (John iii. 12). Any reference to "heavenly" things should quicken the reader's interest, for such things may belong to his own calling and sphere. It will not be out of place, therefore, if we take a slightly wider survey than the reference of John might at first seem to warrant. But, first, may we speak a word about the use of the concordance?

The reader knows, but he may need reminding, that a concordance is a human invention, and should therefore be treated as such. A concordance deals simply with the occurrences of words, and it is entirely outside its scope to deal with the meaning of words. Further, while it is a good servant, it is a bad master. Let us show what we means. We turn to any concordance and open at the word ge. We note that the occurrences occupy several columns of print. We are assured that we have before us every occurrence of the word ge. So far, so good. But what do we "know" about this word? We notice that the first occurrence in the N.T. reads, "The ge of Judah" (Matt. ii. 6), and we might (if we did not already know better) think that ge was something particularly connected with the Jews. The next reference is more extended but not fundamentally different, "The ge of Israel" (Matt. ii. 20). We cannot here go through the 241 occurrences, so we omit a few lines and at Matt. v. 5 read, "Till heaven and ge pass" while at Matt. xiii. 5 we read, of seed, that it "had no deepness of ge". We pass over the Gospels and our eye lights on I Cor. xv. 47, "The first man is of the ge". We glance at Hebrews, where we find that "In the beginning the Lord laid the foundations of the ge" (Heb. i. 10), and that this "ge drinketh in the rain" (Heb. vi. 7), that if the Lord "were on ge He would not be a Priest" (Heb. viii. 4), and that Israel were led "out of the ge of Egypt" (Heb. viii. 9).

The reader, however, is not misled by this assortment. He knows that the one word ge denotes the earth as distinct from heaven, the ground into which seed may be sown, or any particular land, whether of Judah, Egypt or elsewhere. But the reader should remember that he does not get this from the concordance. A spirit being, wishing to convince other spirit beings, who had no personal acquaintance with the earth, that these various meanings of the one word were fantastic and untrue, might impress some of his hearers by a formidable concordance of passages. To us it would prove nothing, but to them it might prove an end of all argument.

Now let us reverse the point of view and ask, What do we know of "heaven" by acquaintance with it? Is it all one undivided space? Is there a top and bottom to it? Can it be measured by miles? Is it three-dimensional space? Is there anything outside or over heaven? If so, can anything that is over the heavens also be spoken of as in heaven? How can we answer? If at this point another, equally ignorant by acquaintance with the heavens, should produce a concordance of occurrences of the word "heaven", the long list of words might impress the fearful, but it would no more "prove" anything about "heaven" than the list of the occurrences of the word ge proved that "land" and "ground" and "earth" were all one and the same in meaning and intention.

Let us now come from the known to the less known, and the unknown. Let us turn from ge, "earth", to ouranos, "heaven". The concordance presents us with a list of 283 occurrences. Let us proceed as we did with ge:

> "The kingdom of ouranos (plural) is at hand" (Matt. iii. 2).
> "Behold the fowls of the ouranos (sing.)" (Matt. vi. 26).
> "The ouranos (sing.) is red and lowring" (Matt. xvi. 3).
> "The stars shall fall from ouranos (sing.)" (Matt. xxiv. 29).
> "The ouranos (sing.) gave rain" (James v. 12).
> "Descending out of ouranos (sing.) from God" (Rev. xxi. 1).

Here we find that "stars" and "fowls" and "rain" and the "New Jerusalem" all belong to ouranos, in the singular, but that the kingdom which the Lord came to establish upon earth was the kingdom of ouranos, in the plural.

We read in Eph. iv. 10 that the Lord ascended "far above all ouranos" (plural), and that we have a Master in ouranos (plural) (Eph. vi. 9). It is easy to pour ridicule upon the attempt to distinguish things that differ, and, as we know less of the heavens than we do of the earth, the attempt is sometimes sadly successful. But "Bereans" are not daunted by columns of words, they "search and see" whether the things taught about those words "are so": they use the concordance as a servant, but do not let it become their master. Furthermore, what arguments could be invented as to the basic distinction that must be observed between the heavens (plural) or heaven (singular)! Yet Matt. iii. 16 says "heavens" (plural) and John i. 32 says "heaven" (singular). John iii. 13 says, concerning the ascension, "The Son of man which is in heaven" (singular), whereas Heb. viii. 1 says He is in the heavens (plural) and Eph. vi. 10 that He ascended far above all heavens (plural).

Now, just as, from one point of view, a Jew living at Jerusalem could be described as living in (en) the ge (in the land), he could also be described as living upon (epi) the ge (on the surface of the earth) without involving a contradiction. So also, and in a greater number of ways, can the heavens be spoken of without confusion or contradiction.

We now turn from this polemic to more constructive reading. In Matt. vi. 10 we must remember that our Lord said, "Thy will be done ON (epi) earth as it is IN (en) heaven". Again, speaking of the selfsame kingdom, He said, "All authority has been given to me IN (en) heaven and UPON (epi) earth" (Matt. xxviii. 18). Epigeios, "earthly things" occurs seven times in the N.T. In I Cor. xv. 40 it is translated "terrestrial" and refers to the resurrection body of those whose inheritance will be "on the earth". In II Cor. v. 1 the reference is to the present body, before resurrection. Phil. ii. 10 contrasts things on earth with things in the heaven (epouranios), and things subterranean (kata), and in Phil. iii. 19 the exhortation is to avoid the example of those who "mind earthly things". James uses the word to contrast heavenly wisdom which cometh from anothen (James iii. 15).

In Volume XXVII, page 126, we have suggested, in chart form, the relationship that exists between the teaching of John and Paul's prison ministry, and that while John goes to the "world", Paul addresses the "saints" who already have "faith in our Lord Jesus".

Thus John gives an outside testimony, whose goal is "life", while Paul gives an inside testimony, whose goal is membership of the Body of Christ.

The language of our Lord to Nicodemus warrants our going into the world with John iii. 16, and assuring those who believe that there are "heavenly things" to be entered by the same exercise of faith. The "pastors" included in the gifts of Eph. iv. have legitimate work to do among "the other sheep", of whom John speaks, without confusing the dispensation of the mystery with the witness of John. We commend to every reader the fuller exercise of the Berean spirit—Search and see.

#19. The Testimony in Jerusalem, Judaea and Samaria (ii. 13-iv. 42). Jerusalem. "The Son of Man which is in heaven" (iii. 13). pp. 116 - 120

If the reader is at all acquainted with Biblical commentaries, he will know what a variety of explanations have been offered of the problem raised by the words of John iii. 13: "The Son of Man Which is in heaven." In the first place it is important to recognize that grammar and logic are only relevant when kept within their own true domain. It is true in the realm of the flesh that a person cannot be in two different places at one and the same time, but is it necessarily true in the realm of the spirit? It is also true of all that pertains to man and his sphere that that which never had a beginning in the past, does not exist in the present, but is this true of God? Did God have a beginning? And, if not, must we all become atheists?

The grammar of speech is one example of applied logic. No one who was man, and only man, could say with either truth or sense, "Before Abraham was, I am". And yet these were the words uttered by the Lord in John viii. 58. To take another example from the same Gospel, the Lord, in John xvi. 13, uses ekeinos, masculine, to go with pneuma, neuter, because the need to emphasize personality of the Spirit was more important than conformity to the ordinary rules of language. Similarly, in the passage before us—John iii. 13—we have a statement that transcends the bounds of human logic. No mere man here upon earth could refer to himself as being at the same time "in heaven".

We have weighed over most of the evidence that has been brought forward, both for and against the suggestion that Christ Himself is the speaker in verses 13-21, and are inclined to agree with the view that the record of the Saviour's conversation with Nicodemus ends at verse 12, and that the speaker in verse 13 is John the Evangelist. This, however, is no basis for argument or foundation for doctrine. We must simply regard these words as divinely inspired words of eternal life, whether uttered by Christ Himself on earth, or by His servant John, inspired by His Spirit after His ascension.

The first part of verse 13 reads as follows:

> "And no man hath ascended up to heaven, but He that came down from heaven."

References, either direct or indirect, to the fact that the Lord "came down" from heaven and "went back" to heaven are encountered frequently in this Gospel. In the sixth chapter, for example, there are seven references to this "coming down" from heaven, and one to the ascending back again:

Katabaino, "to come down", in John vi.

"For the bread of God is He Which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world" (33).

"For I am come down from heaven, not to do Mine own will, but the will of Him That sent Me" (38).

"The Jews then murmured at Him, because He said, I am the bread which came down from heaven. And they said, Is not this Jesus, the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know? How is it then that He saith, I came down from heaven" (41, 42).

"This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof and not die. I am the living bread which came down from heaven" (50, 51).

"This is that bread which came down from heaven: not as your fathers did eat manna, and are dead: he that eateth of this bread shall live for ever" (58).

Anabaino, "to ascend", in John vi.

"What and if ye shall see the Son of man ascend up where He was before?" (62).

In John iii. the immediate context of verse 13 speaks of the lifting up of the serpent in the wilderness by Moses, and its typical association with the gift of life. In John vi., where the ascension is again referred to, we have a further reference to Moses in the wilderness, but this time in connection with the manna. In the next two chapters of John (vii. and viii.) we have several further allusions to this "coming down" and "going back":

"Then said Jesus unto them, Yet a little while am I with you, and then I go unto Him that sent Me" (John vii. 33).

"Ye cannot tell whence I come and whither I go" (John viii. 14).

"I go My way, and ye shall seek Me, and shall die in your sins. Whither I go, ye cannot come . . . . . And He said unto them, Ye are from beneath; I am from above: ye are of this world; I am not of this world" (John viii. 21, 23).

With the end of chapter xii. the first part of John's Gospel reaches its close. The new section, beginning with chapter xiii., deals with the more intimate and personal instruction which the Lord gave to "His own" before He was taken from them. We find, however, the same testimony to the ascension in chapters xiii. and xiv. as we have already found in chapters vii. and viii.:

"Jesus, knowing that the Father had given all things into His hands, and that He was come from God and went to God . . . . ." (John xiii. 3).

"Little children, yet a little while I am with you. Ye shall seek Me: and as I said unto the Jews, Whither I go, ye cannot come: so now I say to you . . . . . Simon Peter said unto Him, Lord, whither goest Thou? Jesus answered him, Whither I go, thou canst not follow Me now, but thou shalt follow Me afterwards" (John xiii. 33, 36).

"I go to prepare a place for you . . . . . and whither I go ye know, and the way ye know" (John xiv. 2, 4).

"I go away and come again unto you . . . . . I go unto the Father" (John xiv. 28).

Two similar references to the ascension are found in chapter xvi.:

> "And now I go My way to Him that sent Me: and none of you asketh Me, Whither goest Thou?" (John xvi. 5).
> "A little while, and ye shall not see Me, because I go to the Father" (John xvi. 16).

In the next chapter (John xvii.), where the finishing of the work which He had come to do is prominent, the Lord's return to "where He was before" is again referred to:

> "And now I am no more in the world, but these are in the world, and I come to Thee" (John xvii. 11).
> "And now I come to Thee" (John xvii. 13).

In chapter xx., on the glorious resurrection morning, this message of the ascension is the one that the Lord chooses as His first greeting to His grieving disciples:

> "Jesus saith unto her, Touch Me not; for I am not yet ascended to My Father; but go to My brethren, and say unto them, I ascend unto My Father, and your Father; and to My God, and your God" (John xx. 17).

We are not attempting to deal with these passages at the moment, or to consider their contexts. We are merely tabulating them to show how intimately this fact of the ascent and descent of Christ is interwoven into the theme of John's Gospel.

Coming back to John iii., we find the structure of verses 13 and 14 to be as follows:

i	iii. 13.	The Son of Man. Ascended.
j	13.	He came down from heaven.
i	14.	The Son of Man. Lifted up.

Verses 14 and 15 read as follows:

> "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have eternal life" (John iii. 14, 15).

In chapter v. the Lord says of Moses:

> "There is one that accuseth you, even Moses, in whom ye trust. For had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed Me: for he wrote of Me. But if ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe My words?" (John v. 45-47).

It is reported that a Modernist Bishop, visiting a public school, was asked by the Headmaster what he should do about the teaching of John iii. 16.

> "I take it", said the Headmaster, "that you desire me to teach the truth of John iii. 16".
> "Yes, yes", replied the Bishop. "By all means."
> "Yet", said the Headmaster, "I am also teaching these boys Logic".
> "Well", replied the Bishop, "What of that?"

> "If I teach these boys Logic, together with John iii. 16", said the Headmaster, "and yet teach them at the same time that Moses never existed, or at any rate never lifted up a serpent in the wilderness, will they not see, and quite rightly, that the 'as' and 'so' of John iii. 14 link Moses, the serpent, the wilderness, and the gospel of John iii. 16 so vitally together that to reject the one is to reject the other?"

It is useless to say that it does not matter whether the O.T. is fact or fiction, so long as we preach "the simple gospel", for there is no such thing as "the simple gospel" if Moses, Abraham, Adam, Noah and the other O.T. characters are only mythical. The grace of Christ is contrasted with the law of Moses. The fulfillment by Christ is set over against the promises made to Abraham. And the life given by Christ is presented as the glorious substitute for the life forfeited by Adam.

When we consider the superhuman nature of the One Who speaks in this Gospel, in relation to the same Speaker's testimony to Moses and the records of the Pentateuch is recognized, no doubt can possibly be entertained as to the integrity of the O.T. records by any who believe "the Son of Man, Which is in heaven". The living Word and the written Word must stand or fall together.

#20. The Testimony in Jerusalem, Judaea and Samaria (ii. 13-iv. 42).
Jerusalem. Aionian Life (iii. 13 - 21).
pp. 159 - 164

We have now arrived at the section of the Gospel which contains one of the most well-known and best loved passages of Holy Writ, namely, John iii. 16.

As, by undue emphasis, tradition often distorts truth, so sectarian bias has the tendency of pushing one aspect of truth to the fore to the concealment or minimizing of another. While this and much more could be said as a warning against the acceptance of traditional views, on trust, it is also true that where any doctrine has received well-nigh universal acceptance; where any particular aspect of truth has been hailed with joy and preached with fervour by men representative of almost every important schism in the Church, and where it has been instrumental in leading souls out of death into life; we do well to hesitate long and meditate deeply before setting aside such unity of testimony.

John iii. 16 is such a text. It stands so arrestingly supreme in comprehensive scope, simply grandeur and clear issues, as to demand the most careful and prayerful consideration.

Upon examination it is evident that what is said in verses 14 and 15 is expanded in verse 16:

A1 | 14. "AS" (the first element in the simile demanding the sequel "So").
B1 | 14. "MOSES lifted up the serpent in the wilderness."
A2 | 14. "SO" (the second element in the simile).
B2 | 14. THE SON OF MAN, lifted up.
C1 | 15. HINA, "the object", that | a | whosoever
b | believeth
c | not perish
d | eternal life.
D | 16. "FOR" (connecting link between type and fulfillment).
A3 | 16. "SO" (the extension of the simile to the sequel).
B3 | 16. THE ONLY BEGOTTEN SON given.
C2 | 16. HINA, "the object", that | a | whosoever
b | believeth
c | not perish
d | everlasting life.

Verse 16 is connected with the preceding verses by the sign of correlation, "for", the Greek gar. This Greek word is a contraction of ge, "verily", and ara, "therefore", "further". The two parts of speech, in reverse order and in uncontrasted form, are of frequent occurrence in the N.T., arage being translated "wherefore", "then", "what manner", "truly", etc.

In verse 19 gar is rendered "because", and this is a good rendering of the causal conjunction. Verse 16 therefore arises logically out of verses 14 and 15. O.T. type, as set forth in the Law of Moses, demands, as a logical sequence, N.T. reality as set forth in the gospel of Christ. The serpent lifted up was no fetish, but a prophetic anticipation of Him Who, though knowing no sin, "was made sin", for us. The fact that Moses "lifted up" the serpent in the wilderness must be taken as a definite foreshadowing of the cross. That this is not merely a pious wish, advanced to the position of proof, the following facts bear witness. Hupsoo, the word translated "to lift up", occurs twenty times in the N.T. Fourteen of these are translated "to exalt", and the one occurrence in James iv. 10 should be so translated. This leaves five, all of which are found in John's Gospel and are translated "to lift up": they have no reference to the "exaltation" of the Lord.

The Five Occurrences of hupsoo in John.

"As Moses lifted up the serpent" (iii. 14).
"Even so must the Son of Man be lifted up" (iii. 14).
"When ye have lifted up the Son of Man" (viii. 28).
"If I be lifted up from the earth" (xii. 32).
"The Son of Man must be lifted up" (xii. 34).

In order that there should be no doubt as to the significance of this term, John adds the explanation in xii. 33: "This He said, signifying what death He should die." All this and more is implied in the use of the word "for".

The next word that demands attention is the adverb houto, "so": "For God so loved the world." At first we are inclined to see in the word a suggestion of the greatness of that love, but houto is an adverb of manner, and the following different translations will reveal the meaning which must be attached to the word of John iii. 16.

> "Now the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise" (Matt. i. 18).
> "After this manner therefore pray ye" (Matt. vi. 9).
> "Likewise shall also the Son of Man" (Matt. xvii. 12).

The phrase "even so" in Paul's epistles, as for example in Rom. v. 18, 21; vi. 4, 19; xi. 5, 31, also shows its meaning, as does the descriptive "thus" in the passage: "Being wearied with His journey, He sat thus on the well" (John iv. 6). If we ask what "thus" indicates here, we must reply, "in a manner that expressed weariness", for that is the verb, without which the adverb is meaningless.

"For", the casual conjunction, links, not merely by addition, but by logical sequence, the O.T. type with the Gospel fulfillment. "So", the adverb of manner in the phrase "God so loved", modifies the verb "loved" by showing the manner of that love, as though John had said "loved like this", loved "in this manner", loved "on this wise", loved "thus". If we ask, "Loved like what?" we are driven back for answer to the O.T. type and its N.T. fulfillment.

In verse 14 we have the "even so" already used.

> "As Moses lifted . . . . . EVEN SO must the Son of Man be lifted up."

God's love was "on this wise"; a love essentially associated with the offering of His Son, and not to be confounded with His providence, which sends His rain upon the just and the unjust, or His tender mercy, which is over all His works.

The order of the books in the N.T. is artificial, and no doctrine must be built upon it, but, taking the four Gospels as a unit, we are certain that John's Gospel was written last. Now here is a wonderful fact. Any believer who was in possession only of Matthew or Mark or Luke, would never have read the statement that "God loved" anybody. It is a startling thing to discover, that while we may learn from either Matthew, Mark or Luke of our obligation to "love the Lord our God" or "to love our neighbour", or from Matthew and Luke that we should "love our enemies", yet we could read twenty-three passages, containing agapao, "to love", and never read that "God loved" either Israel, the Church or the world. The first reference to the love of God in the four Gospels is John iii. 16. In the past we have, perhaps, used this precious statement too freely, and by so doing have given credence to doctrines that are not of God.

We gather that however much a man may have experienced the kindness and mercy of God, he can never know the love of God apart from the gift of His beloved Son. But as this aspect of truth may seem somewhat strange, let us consider another illustration of this conservative view of the love of God. Is there no love of God manifested in the gospel of Christ which is "the power of God unto salvation"? Most surely there is, but Rom. i. 16, 17, where this statement occurs, breathes not a word about it. Is there no love in the provision of a righteousness as a free gift to guilty sinners? Was there no love at work in passing over the sins that are past? Can we read that faith is counted for righteousness and forget that love found the way? While we know that love is the source of all these things, yet for all that, in the foundation epistle of Romans we find not one reference to the love of God until we read chapter v. 5. Then, of a truth, the love of God breaks through all constraint and is "shed abroad", but it was held back until it could be written, "Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ".

The love of God is a limitless ocean, yet there is but one entrance to it, the offering of Christ. The very Gospel that addresses "the world", nevertheless contains the closest restriction in this respect, that "No man cometh unto the Father but by Me". In an earlier dispensation we read that God "loved the people" (Deut. xxxiii. 3), meaning Israel (Deut. vii. 7, 8); later, of the Church we read that nothing can separate the believer from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. But here, in John iii. 16, for the first time we read that God loved the world.

The intimate association of the love of God with the sacrifice of His Son is implied in the word "so" of John iii. 16, and receives substantiation from other Scriptures. In the first Epistle of John we read:

> "Hereby perceive we the love of God, because He laid down His life for us" (iii. 16).
> "In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent His only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through Him" (iv. 9).
> "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us, and sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins" (iv. 10).

Notice the two words "perceive" and "manifest" in these references. In John iii. 16 we are not dealing with God's timeless love, a term we use for lack of a better, but with the manifestation of that love which took place in time. This love is associated with one historic event, the coming into the world of Him Who was the only begotten Son of God, the Word made flesh. This event is not "timeless" but historic, for it took place when "the fullness of time" was come (Gal. iv. 4). The fact that we date all our documents from that period is an admission that the time element enters into the things of God. For this reason we emphatically refuse the translation that has been offered that "God "loves" the world, and "gives" His Only begotten Son. For the English reader it is not possible to read that God "gives" His Son, without dulling the edge of truth. It is the insistent testimony of Scripture that Christ was given "once", that He was "once" offered, and there is no more offering for sin; He dies no more. Therefore to circulate a translation of John iii. 16 which states that God "loves" and "gives" is misleading and dangerous, and unwittingly gives substance to a vague idea of the doctrine of second chances and kindred errors.

In itself God's love may be timeless, but its manifestation was once and at a particular juncture. To this, and to this only, John iii. 16 refers.

It is of the very nature of love to give. This we have already seen in the argument of the passages cited above from the first Epistle of John. There are others that come readily to mind, as,

> "The Son of God Who loved me and gave Himself for me" (Gal. ii. 20).
> "Christ loved the church, and gave Himself for it" (Eph. v. 25).

Here, in John iii. 16, it is the "world" that was the object of the love of God. As we have already learned, this word kosmos, "world", is one of the great key words of John's Gospel. Aristotle defined the kosmos as:

> "A system composed of the heaven and the earth, and of beings contained in them; otherwise, the order and beautiful arrangement of the universe."

Diakosmesis is the word used by Aristotle for "beautiful arrangement". Pliny, the Latin writer, says:--

> "What the Greeks called kosmos, we from its perfect and complete elegance, denominate mundus."

In the N.T. "the world" is a term more often used to denote that part of the universe that we call "the earth", as when it speaks of Christ coming into the world. Dr. Bullinger's note in his Lexicon reads:--

> "Thus, kosmos denotes the order of the world, the ordered universe, the ordered entirety of God's creation, but considered separate from God. Then, the abode of humanity, or that order of things in which humanity moves, or of which man is the centre; then, mankind as it manifests itself in and through such an order; then, the order of things, which in consequence of and since the Fall, is alienated from God, as manifested in and through the human race."

It is evident that "the world" of John iii. 16 is the last of these, for its denizens are saved from "perishing" and from "condemnation" only by this interposition of Christ on their behalf.

There is much more to consider before we have traversed the doctrine of John iii. 16, but this we must leave for the moment, hoping to pursue the study in the next article of the series.

#21. The Testimony in Jerusalem, Judaea and Samaria (ii. 13-iv. 42).
Jerusalem. Aionian Life (iii. 13 - 21).
pp. 198 - 203

In our last article on John iii. 16 we considered the bearing of the casual conjunction "For", the meaning of the adverb "So", and the very exclusive character of God's love, which, even though directed to the "world", was nevertheless mediated only through the sacrifice of His beloved Son, His "Gift". We now continue our study of this wonderful verse, and our first consideration is the specific title here given to Christ, "His only begotten Son".

Many and rich are the titles that belong to the Saviour. Some belong to the period prior to His birth at Bethlehem, such as "The Word" and "The Image", and some to the post-natal period. Among others are the three which follow:--

"JESUS" (Matt. i. 21).
"EMMANUEL" (Matt. i. 23).
"SON OF MAN" (Matt. viii. 20).

To which period shall we ascribe the title, "His only begotten Son"? Had there been no theological controversy in connection with the person of the Lord, reasonable men would never have tried to believe the unintelligible phrase, "The eternal generations of the Son", for to do so either the word "eternal" or the word "generations" must lose its meaning and be changed. Readers of this magazine know that we believe the doctrine of the Deity of Christ. But while this has been our testimony from the beginning, and is held as firmly as ever to-day, we have no warrant for spoiling the teaching of the Scripture regarding the glorious person of the Lord merely because we want to emphasize His Deity. The Scripture is equally emphatic upon the doctrines of His sinless humanity, and of His coming in flesh, and ever, and essentially, associated with His coming in flesh is the dominating purpose of His sacrificial death, which necessitated the possession of a human body. This is so vital both to all truth and to the testimony of John iii. 16 that we must prove each statement.

> "Forasmuch as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise took part of the same, that through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the devil, and deliver them who through fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage" (Heb. ii. 14, 15).
>
> "Wherefore when He cometh into the world, He saith, Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but a body hast Thou prepared Me . . . . . we are sanctified by the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all" (Heb. x. 5, 10).

The testimony of Hebrews is clear. One passage speaks of flesh and blood, and another of a body, but in both the object is an offering. In the epistle to the Colossians we read:

> "In the body of His flesh through death, to present you holy, and unblameable, and unreproveable in His sight" (Col. i. 22).

Here again the incarnation has sacrifice in view. Let us see one more passage.

> "For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending His Own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin condemned sin in the flesh . . . . ." (Rom. viii. 3, 4).

Here once again, the coming of Christ in the flesh, was in order that He might bear the condemnation which our sinful flesh had merited through the breaking of the law.

We believe that when the Saviour is called "The only begotten Son of God", the Spirit of God has in mind this blessed condescension of the Son when He stooped to take upon Him the nature of man. Now if we turn to the prologue of John's Gospel we shall find that this is what the Apostle taught.

> "In the beginning was the Word" (John i. 1).

John does not say "In the beginning was the Son"; that is what many creeds confess, and many believers assume to be true, but as our faith stands, not in the wisdom of men but in the testimony of inspired Scripture, we must, perforce, reject such an intrusion.

> "The Word was made flesh" (John i.14).

Here is a mighty change: here, if anywhere, we ought to read of the only begotten Son. Let us see.

> "And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth" (John i. 14).

When He, the Word, became flesh, His titles were Emmanuel, "God with us", "The only begotten of the Father", "The Son of God" and "The Son of Man". Surely, if we have no creed to support, or system to uphold, John's clear testimony in i. 14 should be authoritative and final.

What is the Scriptural meaning of gennao, "To beget"? If the word is used of a father, it should be translated "to beget", and if of a mother, "To be born, or give birth". In Matt. i. 1-16 we have a genealogy from Abraham to Joseph where there is no possibility of missing the meaning of gennao. "Abraham begat Issac . . . . . Jacob begat Joseph." In this same, sixteenth, verse the word gennao is used of the mother, "Of Whom was born Jesus".

The words "only begotten" represent one word in the Greek, monogenes. Is it possible that by the addition of the word monos "only", the normal, rational, meaning of gennao should be so changed as to lose all its former meaning? To such a question we can give no answer, but we can show that no such alchemy is practiced by the inspired writers.

> "The only son of his mother" (monogenes, Luke vii. 12).
> "For he had an only daughter" (monogenes, Luke viii. 42).
> "For he is my only child" (monogenes, Luke ix. 38).

> "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac; and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten son" (monogenes, Heb. xi. 17).

Here are four occurrences of the word, and its meaning is plain. There are five others, and these refer to the Lord Jesus Christ.

In the epistle to the Romans the gift of Christ is compared with the offering up by Abraham of his only son. "He that spared not His Own son" (Rom. viii. 32), where the Greek words, "spared not", are the same as those which are used in the LXX of Gen. xxii. 16. The Lord Jesus Christ, the Word, become flesh, Emmanuel, God manifest in the flesh. He it is Who is the only begotten Son of God, and He it is Who is the only Mediator, Offering and Saviour of man.

Dr. Bullinger, whose orthodoxy on this doctrine is beyond question, says of the word monogenes in his Lexicon: "The relation of Christ to the Father." In that simple statement the whole matter is compressed.

(1) It is a matter of "relation". It is not dealing with God as Absolute and Unconditioned, for that is not a subject dwelt upon in Scripture.
(2) It has to do with "Christ". Now "Christ" is the title given to "Jesus", and means "The Anointed". This title has no reference to a period before creation or before the miraculous birth at Bethlehem.
(3) It has to do with "The Father". Wherever we see the title "The Son of God", "God" refers to the Father" and both "Father" and "Son" are relative terms.

"For God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son." Here is the Divine half of John iii. 16. What follows touches human need and human response.

> "That whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

First, let us consider human need. It is summed up in the world "perish". The Greek word which is so translated is apollumi, and occurs 92 times in the N.T. It occurs in the LXX nearly 300 times, and in order completely to understand its meaning, these passages should be examined and the equivalent Hebrew words investigated. We shall however find all that we require for our present purpose in the N.T.

An objection has been raised by some advocates of the doctrine known as Eternal Conscious Suffering, that it is unscientific and strictly untrue to teach that anything can be "destroyed", as, for instance, a piece of burning word. It is pointed out that certain parts of the wood go off into gases which are combined with oxygen in the process of combustion; other components go off as smoke and vapour, leaving a residue of mineral ash, and the Chemist's scales would show that not a particle of the wood had really been destroyed, but that all of it still existed though in other forms. In spite of the apparently dispassionate and scientific tone of this objection it is fundamentally and experimentally false, for it is not the question of the indestructibility of "matter" that is involved, but the destruction of the piece of "wood" as "wood". No one who swept up the ashes and presented a few glass jars of gases, could say with truth, "There is your piece of wood": the falsity and foolishness of the statement would be apparent. So when we teach that the unsaved sinner will suffer "destruction" or will "perish", we are speaking of him as a person, not a collection of organic minerals, and it is in this sense that the word is used in the Scriptures.

It is further objected that "the soul" cannot be destroyed, and that therefore the unsaved sinner will continue in a miserable state of existence in eternal fire. We have no need to plunge into an examination of the meaning or attributes of the soul, for one plain statement of Scripture will sufficiently answer this objection.

> "Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul, but rather fear Him which is able to destroy both soul and body in Gehenna"(Matt. x. 28).

Here the word "destroy" is apollumi, the same word which is used in John iii. 16. If we bow before the authority of the inspired Word, strictly speaking, there is therefore nothing more to be said. We can however supplement and illustrate a little before passing to the alternative, "Eternal life". Here are some of the ways in which apollumi is used in Matthew.

> "Herod will seek the young child to destroy Him" (Matt. ii. 13).

Had Herod accomplished his fell purpose, would the advocate of the doctrine we are refuting have found any consolation in the theory of the indestructibility of matter? or that the same word translated "destroy" can also be used of a "lost sheep"?

> "If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee; for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into Gehenna" (Matt. v. 29).

Would anyone, could anyone, attempt to console a person who had lost his eyes by urging the argument that nothing can really be destroyed?

Need we go on? The word is used of drowning (Matt. viii. 25); of leather bottles splitting (Matt. ix. 17), of sheep being lost (Matt. x. 6); of loss of life, soul or reward (Matt. x. 38, 42), and of the destruction of a person by death (Matt. xxi. 41; xxii. 7; xxvi. 52; xxvii. 20). What is true of the testimony of usage in Matthew, is true of the other Gospels, and the rest of the N.T. Nearly every word in either Greek or English has secondary meanings, but it betrays poverty of argument, and a prepossession, to fasten upon the secondary meaning when some doctrinal teaching is at stake.

It is noteworthy that when the apostle Paul refers to the incident, in the book of Numbers, where Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, he too uses the word apollumi:

> "Neither let us tempt Christ as some of them also tempted, and were destroyed of serpents" (I Cor. x. 9).

So also, he uses the word in I Cor. xv. 18 of all who have fallen asleep in Christ, "if so be that the dead rise not". Jude also in referring to the book of Numbers, when he speaks of the rebellion of Korah and his company, uses this same Greek word (Jude 11).

At the close of John iii. the great and solemn alternatives of John iii. 16 are brought forward. This time, however, the wording is changed. Instead of reading "shall not perish but have everlasting life", we read

> "He that believeth on the Son, hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son, shall not see life: but the wrath of God abideth on him" (John iii. 36).

This abiding of the wrath of God is consonant with the parallel statement of verse 18, "He that believeth not is condemned already".

In blessed contrast with the fate of the unbeliever, the Saviour places "Everlasting life", and as this is as important, if not more important, to us than the fate from which, by grace, we have been delivered, let us reserve the consideration of this gift of God for the ampler space of a separate article.

#22. The Testimony in Jerusalem, Judaea and Samaria (ii. 13-iv. 42).
Jerusalem. Aionian Life (iii. 13 - 21).
pp. 227 - 230

We turn from the dread result of sin, "perishing", to the blessed gift of "everlasting life", to those who believe in the only-begotten Son of God. The goal of the Gospel according to John is "life", life from the dead; life unqualified by dispensational distinctions.

> "But these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through His name" (John xx. 31).

Here is the simple issue of this record, "Life through His name". This question of "life" runs through the Gospel of John from chapter i. to chapter xx., and it is helpful to observe the way in which "life" alternates with "eternal life". As there are thirty-six references involved we will not set them out in detail, but the following presentation may be of service to those who will but "search and see".

A | LIFE (i. 4).
B | ETERNAL LIFE (iii. 15, 16, 36).
A | LIFE (iii. 36).
B | ETERNAL LIFE (iv. 14, 36; v. 24).
A | LIFE (v. 24, 26, 39).
B | ETERNAL LIFE (v. 39).
A | LIFE (v. 40).
B | ETERNAL LIFE (vi. 27).
A | LIFE (vi. 33, 35).
B | ETERNAL LIFE (vi. 40, 47).
A | LIFE (vi. 48, 51, 53).
B | ETERNAL LIFE (vi. 54).
A | LIFE (vi. 63).
B | ETERNAL LIFE (vi. 68).
A | LIFE (viii. 12; x. 10).
B | ETERNAL LIFE (x. 28).
A | LIFE (xi. 25).
B | ETERNAL LIFE (xii. 25, 50).
A | LIFE (xiv. 6).
B | ETERNAL LIFE (xvii. 2).
A | LIFE (xx. 31).

Are we to draw a distinction between these two sets of statements? Are we to say "Life" is one thing and "Eternal life" is another? Apart from the inspired Word none can answer, and none to whom the foregoing list is a list and nothing more is qualified to express even an opinion. For example, upon examination we find that when Christ said, "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life" (John vi. 63); Peter replied, "Lord to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life" (John vi. 68). Are we to see some subtle distinction here? Or does the word "life" cover all its subdivisions? In the same chapter the Lord said, "The bread of God is He which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world" (John vi. 33). Was there any intentional difference when He said, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that believeth on Me, hath everlasting life, I am that bread of life" (John vi. 47, 48)? Or, once again, when we read verses 53 and 54, "Ye have no life in you . . . . . hath eternal life", is there an intentional distinction?

In the third chapter we have "eternal life" in the presentation of the gospel (John iii. 15, 16, 36), but in the summary and conclusion we read, "Shall not see life". It is evident that "life" in John's Gospel includes "eternal life", and this life is not to be confused with the life lived by fallen man, for John never once uses it in that way. He does, however, say:--

"In Him was life" (John i. 4).
"Passed from death unto life" (John v. 24).
"The resurrection of life" (John v. 29).
"Life . . . . . more abundantly" (John x. 10).
"The resurrection and the life" (John xi. 28).

The life from the dead which was "in Him" and is given to those who believe; who have passed from death unto life and who shall not come into condemnation; evidently is synonymous with, if not greater than, and so inclusive of, "eternal life", which is the great gift of John iii. 16. The word translated "eternal" and "everlasting" is aionios and occurs in John's Gospel seventeen times. The word aionios, "eternal", is derived from aion, a word which is variously translated "world", "age", "ever". In this Gospel aion is six times translated "ever" in the phrase "For ever", "never" (literally "Not for ever") six times, and "world" once.

We must examine these translations of the same word, for, at least, on the surface they seem too divergent to be true. Let us take the negative form "never". This is the phrase eis ton aiona, with the negative, and has been the occasion of some very foolish attempts at literality. Thus, "They shall never perish" (John x. 28) becomes "They shall not perish unto the age", which leaves the impression on the mind that at the end of the age they will perish, which of course is entirely contrary to the thought. "Thou shalt never wash my feet" (John xiii. 8) becomes "Thou shalt not wash my feet unto the age", an absurdity requiring no repudiation. When the Scriptures intend a statement to carry over from one age to another, it has ample means of making this clear, as in such a passage as "Neither in this world, neither in the world to come" (Matt. xii. 32). In most cases "never" is the idiomatic use of "not ever" or "not for the age", which is parallel with the etymology and usage of "never" in the English tongue. There is no need to import "age" meanings into such idiomatic and popular usages.

In connection with the renderings "ever" and "world", there is much more to be said. First of all, however, let us remember that in the best of us a little genuine modesty will never be amiss. For instance whenever we feel tempted to sweep aside renderings that are found not only in the A.V., but retained in the R.V., we should remember that, however remote it may seem, there is the possibility that these men did actually possess a modicum of common-sense, as well as scholarship! It would be so much nearer the true spirit that should animate us, if, first of all, we endeavoured to discover why the translators used the words "ever" and "world", while literalists demand "age" in every case. The truth is that many who are moved to adopt the attitude of critics would, if an answer were demanded of them, have to confess that they did not know the etymology of the English word "world", and possibly would also have to plead ignorance as to the source and affinities of "ever" and "eternal". Let us get this matter settled first.

It may surprise many of our readers to learn that under the heading "world", The Oxford Dictionary devotes sixty-two closely printed lines in a column, dealing with "Human experience, a period of this" (world), before coming to the second great heading: "The earth or a region of it; the universe or a part of it." Moreover, the English word "world", through Germanic sources, is derived from wer = man, and ald = age, "The age of man", consequently, if language never developed, if meanings never changed by common usage, and if all men were etymologists, then the affinity between the Greek aion and the English "world" would be obvious and need no explanation.

There is, in common usage, no evident connection between such English words as "eternal" and "everlasting", on the one hand, and "age" and "world" on the other, yet, once again, the differences are superficial, being the result of the passage of time, for, at base, they are one. "Age", derived from the Latin aevum, "eternal", comes from aeuiternus, "lasting for an age". "Everlasting" comes from the Anglo-Saxon aefre, which is related to the Gothic aiw, which, in its turn, links on to the Greek aion. The Revisers have retained most of the passages where the A.V. used "world" for aion, but have placed in the margin the note "age", so that the English reader need not confuse this word with kosmos.

However, we must still face the fact that present usage now makes "eternal" and "everlasting" unfit translations for a word which means "an age", "The period of human experience", therefore some modification is called for. If, however, in John iii. 16 we substitute "age-enduring life" for "eternal", or "everlasting", life, we create another problem as important to resolve as that included by the A.V.

Upon reading the translation: "Should not perish, but have age-enduring life" the mind can hardly help thinking along the line suggested by the latter clause and, thus started, arriving at the possible conclusion that at the end of this age, however long it may endure, life will cease! At this point, the reader may appreciate the analysis of the terms "life" and "Eternal life" found in John's Gospel and set out on page 227.

An examination of these references proves that "life", without limits, is the gift of God to those who believe in His Son, Jesus Christ. Within this all embracive "life" there will be that special experience called "age-enduring" life, which will be enjoyed by those whose resurrection precedes the end of the ages, but which cannot therefore be enjoyed by those whose resurrection is most certainly unto "life", but life entered into only when the ages have run their course.

There are various ways in which "eternal life" is used in the N.T. Sometimes it is bestowed as a reward, either under law or under grace (Matt. xix. 16; Rom. vi. 22); sometimes as an equivalent to entering into the kingdom on earth (as for example Matt. xxv. 46); sometimes, as in John iii. 16, or Rom. vi. 23, it is considered as a gift in grace. These have been tabulated and examined in a series entitled "Eternal Life", which may be found in Volumes VI, VII & VIII, and should be referred to by the interested student.

We conclude therefore that life, not only when time shall be no more, but life abundant and rich in its association with the concluding phases of the Divine purpose, is the blessing for all who believe the testimony of John iii. 16.

"In all their affliction, He was afflicted."

#2. pp. 22 - 24

The only way to "prove" that God actually enters into the suffering of humanity and does not remain aloof and unmoved, is to examine the Scriptures and discover how far such feelings are attributed to God and how far these statements are to be accepted at their face value.

A God afar off, dwelling in isolated majesty, unmoved by the waywardness and folly of man, allowing His "laws" to work quite regardless of consequences, could hardly be said to "grieve" or to "wish that He had never made man". Such language, if once admitted, with all the margin allowable for the use of "figures of speech", must shatter for ever the barrier that human wisdom has erected between God and His creatures.

No reader who has spent many years in walking through this vale of tears needs any human commentary upon the meaning of "grief", and will probably find counterparts in his own experience to the "grief" of Joseph's brethren, when their brother made himself known to them (Gen. xlv. 5), or of Jonathan's "grief" for David at the treatment meted out to him by Saul (I Sam. xx. 34). Yet there are some who would attempt to modify the force of the passage where "grief" is attributable to God Himself.

"How oft did they provoke . . . . . and grieve Him", asked the Psalmist (lxxviii. 40) when dealing with the history of Israel in the wilderness. "They rebelled, and vexed (same word as "grieve") His Holy Spirit", said Isaiah (Isa. lxiii. 10) of the same period.

A poignant passage is that which records God's attribute toward the wickedness of man in the days of Noah.

> "And God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually. And it repented the Lord that He had made man on the earth, and it grieved Him at His heart" (Gen. vi. 5, 6).

We must be prepared to find the force of this passage blunted by the contention that this is "figurative language". Let us face this objection. We may ask, Why are figures of speech used at all? Is it not because ordinary speech is not full enough to express all that is intended? If I say, "That man is a lion", do I say more, or less, than I say "That man is bold"? Surely I say more. We fully grant that God, Who is Spirit, does not "grieve" as man. Likewise that to speak of "His heart" is a figure of speech, but so also is it a figure of speech in the preceding verse, which speaks of the heart of man. In the case of man "the thoughts of his heart" cannot refer to the muscular organ that circulates the blood; it can only mean the inner man. So also when the heart of God is spoken of we lose nothing when we admit it as a figure of speech. What it amounts to is, that just as 'grief" and "repentance" have a definite place in the experience of man, so there are spiritual equivalents in the experience of God. If this be denied the question is urgent, For what purpose is Gen. vi. 5, 6 written? Who has made this tremendous mistake? and what becomes of the inspiration of Scripture? Nor is this all. Gen. vi. is but one of many passages which unequivocally predicate "repentance" of the Lord. Let us examine the usage of this word, to see whether "repentance" is really its true meaning.

Job said "I abhor myself and repent in dust and ashes" (Job xlii. 6). Is there anyone who would wish to modify this trenchant passage? "The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent", wrote the Psalmist (Psa. cx. 4) in relation to the Melchisedec priesthood of Christ. Again, can there be two minds as to its meaning? What then shall we say of the following passages?

> "Turn from Thy fierce wrath, and repent of this evil against Thy people" (Exod. xxxii. 12).
> "And the Lord repented of the evil which He thought to do unto His people" (Exod. xxxii. 14).
> "The Lord raised them up judges . . . . . for it repented the Lord because of their groanings" (Judges ii. 18).
> "It repenteth Me that I have set up Saul to be king: for he is turned back from following Me" (I Sam. xv. 11).
> "The Lord repented that He had made Saul king over Israel" (I Sam. xv. 35).
> "And when the angel stretched out his hand upon Jerusalem to destroy it, the Lord repented him of the evil" (II Sam. xxiv. 16).
> "Return, O Lord, how long? and let it repent Thee concerning Thy servants" (Psa. xc. 13).
> "Nevertheless He regarded their affliction when He heard their cry: and He remembered for them His covenant, and repented according to the multitude of His mercies" (Psa. cvi. 44, 45).

The reader will find nearly a score more passages in Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Joel, Amos, Jonah, Zechariah and elsewhere. In each case the "repentance" is contingent. Saul's disobedience, Israel's groaning, or the prospect of the destruction of Jerusalem, are definitely put forward as reasons for the change of mind and plan.

We are morally certain that many of our readers have been waiting for us to consider the "proof text" that God does not repent. Here are the words divorced from their context:

> "The Strength of Israel will not lie nor repent; for He is not a man that he should repent" (I Sam. xv. 29).

Their misuse constitutes one of the most glaring examples that we know of falsifying the intention of Scripture.

The intended effect upon the mind by the use of this disconnected "proof text" is that God never did and never can repent, and that all contrary passages, such as those already quoted, must somehow be modified in view of this oracular statement. The exact opposite of the inaccurate construction thus put upon Samuel's words is the inspired intention. What Samuel told Saul was, that nothing he did, or promised to do, would cause God to change His mind as to repenting that He had made him king. If we hold the truth we shall welcome the context of any passage. Here it is:

> "Saul said unto Samuel, I have sinned . . . . . turned again with me . . . . . Samuel said . . . . . I will not return with thee: for thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, and the Lord hath rejected thee from being king over Israel . . . . . The Lord . . . . . hath given it to a neighbour of thine, that is better than thou. And also the Strength of Israel will not lie nor repent for He is not a man, that He should repent" (I Sam. xv. 24-29).

Lest we should think that God did "repent of His repentance" Samuel reiterates in verse 35 what he had said in verse 11.

The reader who has been expecting words of comfort in times of trouble may find much cause for disappointment in the reading of this article, but if he ponders the truth that has been established, irrespective of the particular words "grieve" or "repent", he will be convinced that God can and does feel grief; that He can and does change His mind when wickedness or pity or any sufficient reason is forthcoming, and if this be once established, the heart will be free from the thrall imposed upon it by the doctrine of fixed decrees, wherein God is no more free than is an arithmetician free in the use of the multiplication table. The heart will thus be free to rejoice in the teaching of Scripture, that God enters into the burden and the misery of His creatures, and that the suffering of the believer is in reality a share, small though it be, of the great burden borne by the heart of God.

#3. pp. 57 - 59

In our last article we were concerned mainly with establishing the fact that God can feel grieved, that He can and does change His plans, and that He is not aloof from the sorrow and misery of man, made in His Own image. We must now proceed to examine other passages that bear upon this most important truth.

> "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? How shall I deliver thee, Israel? How shall I make thee as Admah? How shall I set thee as Zeboim? Mine heart is turn within Me, My repentings are kindled together. I will not execute the fierceness of Mine anger, I will not return to destroy Ephraim, for I am God, and not man; the Holy One in the midst of thee: and I will not enter into the city" (Hos. xi. 8, 9) [a reference to Sodom and Gomorrah, as Admah and Zeboim (Gen. xiv. 8) prove].

What a blessed passage, and what a light it throws upon the character of God! Some may say that, as "He is God and not man", therefore He will remain adamant in His purpose and inflexible in His decrees; but the Scriptures say "He is God and not man", and so "will not return to destroy Ephraim" but will allow "mercy to rejoice against judgment".

The great revelation of the fatherhood of God was not possible until Christ the Son was born. As John declares, when the Word became flesh we beheld His glory, the glory as of the Only Begotten of the Father. Nevertheless, while this is blessedly true, there are glimpses to be seen of the fatherhood of God in the O.T. though they are veiled and obscure.

> "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him" (Psa. ciii. 13).
> "A son honoureth his father . . . if then I be a father, where is mine honour?" (Mal. i. 6).
> "Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth: for the Lord hath spoken. I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against Me. The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib, but Israel doth not know, My people doth not consider" (Isa. i. 2, 3).

Is there no spirit of yearning and grieving here, the same spirit as is faintly echoed in the experience of many earthly fathers, the same kind of feeling as is expressed by our own myriad-minded poet when he says: "Sharper than a serpent's tooth, is an ungrateful child"?

Moreover, unless the title "Father" is to be regarded as empty and unreal (and who is there that would dare to challenge the fullness of this blessed revelation?), then to admit fatherliness into the Divine Nature is simply to admit the truth of what has been revealed. A true father loves, provides for, protects and trains his children, and rejoices in them. A true father cannot remain aloof from the experiences of his family. He must be a sharer in all their joys and sorrows. A true father does not limit his fellowship to high and noble things, but enters with delightful intimacy into his small daughter's concern for her broken doll, his son's school problems, his daughter's love affair, and all the various interests of his married children's homes. Surely all this, and more, must be true of God Himself.

There is a well-known passage in the Book of Genesis that not only foreshadows the offering of Christ as the Lamb of God, but also speaks of the part played in that offering by the One "Who spared not His Own Son". As we read this passage—in Gen. xxii.—we can appreciate something of what this offering meant to the Father. Did not Abraham suffer as a father, when God told him to take Isaac—"thine only son, whom thou lovest" (Gen. xxii. 2)? Did he not suffer as a father, when he "took the wood of the burnt offering, and laid it upon Isaac his son" (Gen. xxii. 6), and when "he took the fire in his hand, and a knife; and they went both of them together" (Gen. xxii. 6)? Can any words describe the anguish that lay behind the simple record of verse 7:

> "Isaac . . . . . said, My father: and he said, Here am I, my son. And he said, Behold the fire and the wood; but where is the lamb for a burnt offering?" (Gen. xxii. 7).

The apostle Paul evidently appreciated this, for he uses the same word in Rom. viii. that the LXX uses in Gen. xxii. 16:

"Thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son" (Gen. xxii. 16).
"He that spared not His Own Son" (Rom. viii. 32).

Can there be any doubt that God is intimately concerned with the sufferings of creation, and of man generally, and of His church? Let the comfort of this fact penetrate into the very fibre of our being. We do not suffer alone. God Himself calls us into fellowship with Him.

With regard to the great problem of pain and suffering, we must not magnify the almighty power of God above all His other attributes. The fact that He chose to create man in His Own image implies that He chose to do something that inevitably contained all the potentialities of suffering, even to the extreme limit of the cross. It is for us to see all things in the light of the purpose of the ages, and the constitution of man as created in the image of God.

"In all their affliction, He was afflicted."

#4. pp. 90 - 92

It is our purpose, in this series of short articles, to lead the believer into a deeper understanding of the character of God, in relation not so much to His isolated and unapproachable majesty as the Lord God Almighty, but rather His tender mercy and sympathetic understanding as "The Father", to Whom, in one spirit, we have access. Theology, listening too much to the demands of Philosophy, has tended to place God upon a pedestal, far removed from the passions and sorrows of the world. Such a conception is very far from the truth. We hope that the sheer weight of evidence brought forward in the article on pages 57-59 has broken down this prejudice to some extent, as we have seen God "grieving" over the sinfulness of man, being "vexed" by the folly of His people, and "repenting" over and over again because of the utter failure of His human instruments. This aspect of inspired truth we must pursue still further, until prejudice gives way completely to joyous acceptance, and we discover a God Who is not remote or far away, but intimate and near.

In the present article, we desire to draw attention to two passages from the Book of Job. We are well aware of the possibility of mistaking the personal opinions of Job, expressed under the terrible pressure of affliction, for inspired utterances. On the other hand, we must remember that this book of human suffering and experience is part of the Scriptures and has been written for our learning. In time of trouble, an apostle thought well to draw his readers' attention to "the patience of Job", while God Himself has grouped together Job, Noah, and Daniel as men of surpassing integrity (Ezek. xiv. 14, 20). While making every allowance for Job's frailty, and the possibility that he might have erred in judgment, most readers would agree that there are few, if any, who would to-day be worthy to sit at his feet. Let us at least weigh his words as we would the words of our most respected and valued friend.

In chapter x. Job is baffled by the experiences through which he is passing, and is beset by the growing fear that he has misunderstood the nature and character of God. Barnes, whose commentary on Job is considered his best work, writes with regard to Job x.:

> "Is it good unto Thee that Thou shouldest oppress? The sense is, that it could not be with God a matter of personal gratification to inflict pain wantonly. There must be a reason why He did it . . . . . The state of his mind appears to have been that he is a sincere friend of God, and He is unwilling to believe that God can wantonly inflict pain."

In verse 8 we read: "Thine hands have made me." The Margin reads "Took pains about me", while Gesenius says that the primary idea is that of cutting, either in word or stone, and hence cutting or carving with a view to the forming of an image. It would, however, be quite misleading to compel the word to conform to its ancestry and early history. Words are used to-day with a meaning far removed from their etymology. The finest literature would become nonsense if every word were given its primitive meaning. Usage is far more important than etymology, and it is to this that we appeal. The reader may have no facilities for the investigation of dead Hebrew roots, but he can survey the language of Scripture, and from the testimony of the word's usage discover its true meaning.

The verb "to make" in Job x. 8 is the Hebrew atsab. It occurs in a variety of forms and, if we include derived substantives, is found in the O.T. 55 times. It is translated "grieve" 10 times as we have already seen in the preceding article. The substantives, in Genesis, refer to the "sorrow" of child-bearing (Gen. iii. 16), and of human toil (Gen. iii. 17; v. 29). In Psalm cxxvii. 2 we read of the "bread of sorrows", and in Isa. lviii. 3, where the translation "labours" occurs, the Margin suggests "griefs" or "things wherein ye grieve others".

Judging by its usage in Scripture, we fail to see any justification for the exceptional treatment of atsab in Job x. 8. Exactly the same form of the verb is used in Isa. lxiii. 10, where we read: "They rebelled and vexed His holy Spirit." It would obviously be impossible to translate this passage in the same way as in the A.V. of Job x. 8, and yet the two passages are practically identical.

Leaving this passage, for the moment, we pass on now to another passage in the same book. Job is still pondering the same problem, but the light of resurrection and hope now illuminates some of the obscurity. In Job xiv. 14 the question is asked: "If a man die, shall he live again?" In the same verse the answer is given:

> "All my appointed time will I wait, till my change come. Thou shalt call, and I will answer Thee; Thou wilt have a desire to the work of Thine hands" (Job xiv. 14, 15).

The word translated "to have desire" here is kasaph, which gives the word for "silver" and means "to be pale" with longing and desire. The Psalmist says: "My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord" (Psa. lxxxiv. 2). In the same way, says Job, does the Lord "long for" the day to come, when in resurrection glory, Job and all like him shall at length stand in beauty, to sorrow no more for ever.

When God fashioned Job's body He knew that His servant's life would constitute a challenge to Satan, and that at length his body, so wonderfully made, would be afflicted with such loathsome sores that Job—His servant Job—would be glad to take a potsherd to scrape himself. Did God have no feelings of sorrow as He saw all this in prospect? He did. He "grieved" as He made this earthen vessel. Nevertheless, we know something, too, of the other end of the story. From his birth into the world of sorrow, Job leads us to a new birth into a world of joy. If God "grieved" at the fashioning of Job's body when he was born into this world, He is depicted as "turning pale" with extreme longing as He awaits the day of Job's new birth into resurrection glory, when "the work of His hands" shall at length attain its goal.

Here, then, is a God to Whom we may stretch out our hands, and feel a grasp almost akin to our own. Here is the "God of all flesh", Who knows, Who is not untouched, Who shares the suffering brought about by sin, even as He plans to share the joy brought about by grace.

"In all their affliction, He was afflicted."

#5. pp. 105, 106

In our last article we were pondering the experiences of Job, and came to the conclusion that God is by no means indifferent to the "sorrow" and "toil" that came into the world when Adam sinned. We also found that the words "grieve" in Gen. vi. 6, "made" in Job x. 8, "vex" in Isa. lxiii. 10, "sorrow" in Gen. iii. 16, 17, and "toil" in Gen. v. 29 were all basically the same in the original.

As we think more about this problem of suffering and sorrow, our minds instinctively turn to Gen. iii. to see whether there is any indication there of the same thought as we have found in Job. An unaided reading of Gen. iii. may in itself fail to produce sufficient evidence, but we must remember that we have "all Scripture" available, and we therefore turn to what our own Apostle has written on the matter in Rom. viii.

As he looks upon the "sufferings of this present time" he says that they are not worthy to be compared with "the glory that shall be revealed in us" (Rom. viii. 18). That in itself is a comfort. Even if there were nothing further to be said on the problem of present suffering, "glory" awaits us, and the prospect brings relief.

The Apostle, however, continues in verse 19:

> "For the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God" (Rom. viii. 19).

And in verses 20 and 21:

> "For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of Him Who hath subjected the same in hope. Because the creature itself shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God" (Rom. viii. 20, 21).

The Emphatic Diaglott version reads as follows:

> "For the creation was made subject to frailty (not voluntarily, but by Him Who placed it under;) in hope that even the creation itself will be emancipated from the slavery of corruption into the freedom of the glory of the children of God" (Rom. viii. 20, 21).

When he faced the charge of transgressing the Lord's commandment, Adam had no basis for "hope". He had sinned, and he expected death as a penalty. The Lord, however, spoke of "a seed", and even though it was decreed that sorrow would accompany the activities of both the man and the woman, the bearing of children and the sweating for bread were something quite different from the expected penalty. Moreover, the cherubim at the door of the Garden symbolized not only man's lost dominion, but also God's pledge of ultimate restoration.

Amid the groan of creation, and the sufferings that come in the wake of sin, there is a real hope, a hope founded upon the finished work of the promised "Seed". God created man in His Own image, and He was grieved, intensely grieved, at his fall. He bore the burden from the time of Adam to the birth of the Saviour at Bethlehem, and He in turn bore it until His own sacrifice removed it for ever.

"Hope" is not only associated with man, but also with God Himself. In the Epistle to the Romans He is called "the God of patience", "the God of hope", and "the God of peace" (Rom. xv. 5, 13; xvi. 20). At God's right hand the Saviour is "expecting" (Heb. x. 13), and His believing people can share together with Him that intense desire and longing that we found revealed in Job xiv. May the light of this blessed expectation illuminate the darkness of present grief, until that day comes when we shall actually experience the joy "that cometh in the morning".

"In all their affliction, He was afflicted."

The Mystery Manifested.

#5. The Mystery of Christ.
A superlative manifestation.
pp. 12 - 14

In our last article we recognized that there were two mysteries discussed by the Apostle in Eph. iii., one dealing with the peculiar calling of the present dispensation called "the mystery", and the other called "the mystery of Christ". It is to the second of these two, and its manifestation that we must now turn.

The Apostle introduces the subject parenthetically, as will be clear from an examination of Eph. iii. 3-5.

> "As I wrote afore in few words, whereby, when ye read, ye may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ" (Eph. iii. 3, 4).

What is the purpose of this reference? To what does the Apostle refer when he says "as I wrote afore"? And how does the introduction of this second mystery help the main line of his argument? The main thread of the Apostle's argument is that to him, as the prisoner of Christ Jesus, a dispensation had been given, and the revelation of the mystery, around which that dispensation revolved. To support this claim the Apostle seems to pause in order to demonstrate the quality of his knowledge in another mystery, namely, the mystery of Christ. As there was no other epistle to the Ephesians, or to any other church, to which the Apostle could appeal, he must have been referring to something already written in the opening chapters of Ephesians. In chapter i., in connection with "the mystery of His will", the Apostle shows that God had in view a dispensation in which He would "gather together again under one Head the all things (ta panta) in the Christ, the things in the heavens, and the things on the earth in Him" (Eph. i. 10). This glorious aspect of the mystery of Christ is further expanded in the same chapter, in verses 21-23, where He is seen as the exalted One, far above all, in the heavenly places, with all things (panta) under His feet, and Head over all things (panta) to the church, which is His body, the fullness of Him that filleth the all things (ta panta) in all (panta). It is to these verses that the Apostle appeals, in order that the reader may understand his knowledge of the mystery of Christ.

It would seem that Paul's argument is somewhat as follows:

> "In making this claim, namely, that as the prisoner of Christ Jesus I have received a dispensation from God, accompanied by the revelation of the mystery, I know that I have made a very great claim, and that it is reasonable that you should demand some credentials from me. My difficulty is caused by the unique character of this ministry. I cannot compare myself with any other of the apostles, for their ministry and mine differ too much to make that comparison possible or of any value. The only thing I can do is to speak of that which other apostles and prophets, both past and present, share together with myself, namely, a knowledge of an associated mystery—'the mystery of Christ'. If I can show you there, where comparison is possible, my knowledge of this mystery > exceeds all that has gone before, you may be more easily satisfied that, with regard to the accompanying mystery, where comparison is ruled out, my exclusive claim is a just one."

The first occurrence of the words, "All things under His feet", which are a part of the O.T. revelation of the mystery of Christ, is found in Psalm viii. As we have before observed, a secret generally supposes an enemy, and the enemy here is in verse 2. The glory of the Lord is also seen to be "above the heavens" (viii. 1). The words used in the LXX here are huperano ton ouranon, which are similar to those of Eph. iv. 10 ("far above all heavens"), but not quite so full. The added fullness that marks the Apostle's statements is even more clearly seen in verse 6 where the Psalmist writes: "Thou hast put all things under His feet" (Psa. viii. 6). So says the Apostle also, but what a difference in the meaning! The Psalmist goes on to explain what he understands by "all things" in the following verse:

> "All sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field, the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the sea" (Psa. viii. 7, 8).

The "yea" which follows the words "all sheep and oxen" suggests the Psalmist's sense of wonder as he enumerates the widening circle of this dominion. But what are sheep and oxen when compared with principalities and powers, thrones and dominions, and every name that is named? Surely it is clear that the Apostle, while he shares with David the knowledge that Christ shall one day have "all things" under His feet, has demonstrated how immeasurably vaster and higher is his knowledge of this part of the mystery of Christ.

Whether it was possible, when Paul wrote his epistle to the Ephesians, for the Ephesians themselves to refer to what he had also written in I Cor. xv. 25-28 or Heb. ii. 5-9, we cannot say. Most probably it would not have been possible, and we can well allow his claim to rest upon the one passage in Eph. i. Most certainly, in this particular case, all would have to concede that Paul's knowledge of the mystery of Christ went far beyond anything found elsewhere in Scripture. If then, argues the Apostle, where you can test my knowledge, you find my claim to be substantiated, it is reasonable to accept my further claim to that exclusive revelation which is associated with the highest phase of the mystery of Christ.

It is clear that God would not reveal to Paul the high glory of the Lord Jesus without some well-defined object. The very fact that Paul had received the added revelation of the mystery of Christ was in itself an argument that something like the dispensation of the mystery was to follow.

It is certainly true that the mystery itself is manifested exclusively in the Apostle's prison ministry, but it is equally true that the mystery of Christ is manifested in that ministry also in a superlative degree.

#6. Mystery, Marriage and Manifestation.
pp. 24, 25

We do not meet with any further mention of the word "mystery" in Ephesians until nearly the close of the fifth chapter, when we are well into the great practical outworking of truth, and the high and heavenly calling is shown to have relationship with every phase of human life.

Instead of the high spirituality of this calling finding its expression in celibate lives, in the quiet of the cloister, in aesthetic neglect of the body, we find the Apostle speaking in the highest terms of the relationship of husband and wife, likening the mutual love and submission of the one to the other to the love of Christ for the Church and the submission of the Church to the Lord. Instead of saying "So ought men to turn away from such mundane things as the love of wife and home", the Apostle says: "So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies" (Eph. v. 28). Pursuing his argument, he quotes the words of Moses recorded in Genesis in reference to the marriage of Adam and Eve. "For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall be joined unto his wife, and they shall be one flesh" (Eph. v. 31).

It is evident that the revelation of the mystery made no alteration in the revealed will of God regarding the importance of marriage, and it certainly sets aside the ordinances of the law of Moses, which were permitted because of the hardness of men's hearts, but, as the Saviour Himself said, "From the beginning it was not so", and He supplements the quotation from Gen. ii. 24 with the words:

> "Wherefore they are no more twain, but one flesh. What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder" (Matt. xix. 6).

Viewing marriage in such a light, the Apostle says, "This is a great mystery", and then turns to the relationship of Christ and the Church, saying "But" (a disjunctive, showing that the great mystery that he has in view is not the mystery of marriage, but the blessed union which such foreshadows), "I am speaking concerning Christ and the Church". However, lest any should think that by thus turning from the lesser unity to the greater, the Apostle in any sense undervalued marriage, he safeguards his meaning by coming back to the original theme, saying:

> "Nevertheless let every one of you in particular so love his wife even as himself; and to the wife (I speak) with the object that she may reverence her husband" (Eph. v. 33).

It must be abundantly clear that, in the matter of the manifestation of the mystery in the practical sphere, the Apostle has placed signal honour upon the married state. We know some children of God, who, out of a mistaken idea of sanctity and an undispensational view of I Cor. vii., have urged that the superior spiritual standard is the celibate life. In I Cor. vii. the Apostle gave his advice "for the present distress" (verse 26). This not only dealt with the question of marriage, but with those that weep, and those that rejoice, and with those that possessed, and with those that use this world (verses 29-31). "The time is short" wrote the Apostle, for, at any moment, the repentance of Israel might then have ushered in the day of the Lord. But that period has passed. The "any-moment" theory of the second coming is not true to-day, and the attempt made by some to prevent believers from marrying is therefore mistaken, and will finally be found to be in line with the propaganda of the last days, which includes "forbidding to marry" (I Tim. iv. 3).

With the Epistle to the Ephesians before us, and a heart-belief that its doctrines are inspired, we cannot pass over this matter as of small account: we cannot, without protest, allow any to teach otherwise, without betraying our stewardship. Wherever circumstances permit, it is as much an act of faith and obedience for a man and woman who rejoice in the revelation of the mystery to marry as it is for both to endeavour to keep the unity of the spirit. It is impossible to read the words of Eph. v. 22-27 without seeing that marriage provides a wonderful opportunity for manifesting both to the Church, to the world, and to the principalities and powers that are learning by the Church, something of the fullness of meaning that is intended when the Church is called "the body of Christ", and that His great self-sacrificing love, together with the Church's willing submission to His headship, is robbed of a means of manifestation when, other circumstances permitting, man or woman neglects or refuses to enter into this closest of all bonds. There are homes where this unity is not evident. Many a husband loves himself rather than his wife: wives fail to recognize that it is a privilege, as members of the one body, to reverence their husbands, as the Church reverences the Head. All this is sadly true, and even where there is unselfish love or genuine submission, it must necessarily be marked with the imperfections that will ever characterize all service here below. But admitting all this and more, the truth still stands that in the union of man and wife we have a God-given means of manifesting the Mystery.

#7. The Unfettered Word of a Chained Ambassador.
pp. 41 - 43

We now have before us the last occurrence of the word "mystery" in Ephesians which is in the Apostle's request for prayer on his behalf. It comes as a surprise to some to realize that the only specific mention of the mystery in the practical section of Ephesians is in the fifth chapter, where the relationship of husband and wife is in view. The "mystery" will be "manifested" far more truly by our "manner of life" than by our church activities, and it is of especial importance to remember this in a day when home life is the subject of attack, and when organized church work presents little evidence of life and power. In the first chapter of Ephesians the Apostle had prayed for the believers. Now, in the last chapter, he asks them to pray for him. In his prayer, he had asked that there might be given unto them the spirit of wisdom and revelation. In their prayer for himself, he desires that they should ask that there might be given to him utterance. In the prayer for them, he prayed that they might know; in this prayer for himself he asked that he might make known. The very interplay of thought and balance of words impress us with the teaching that if there be a speaker, there must be hearers; if some are to get to know, someone must make known, the manifestation of the mystery necessitating both the speaker and the hearers before its message can become effective.

Let us hear what the Apostle requested for himself: "Praying . . . . . for all saints; and for me, that utterance may be given unto me, that I may open my mouth boldly, to make known the mystery of the gospel, for which I am an ambassador in bonds: that therein I may speak boldly, as I ought to speak" (Eph. vi. 18-20). The humility revealed in the words "and for me" is refreshing. The evident fact that the Apostle knew what it was to be conscious of fear; to realize the price he must pay for speaking on such a theme, should encourage us. He confesses to some such consciousness of weakness when he asks for prayer that he may "open his mouth boldly" and "that he may speak boldly". It is good to realize that Paul himself was indeed "an earthen vessel" that the glory of his consistent witness might be the Lord's. The first thing for which he asked that prayer should be made was "utterance", the word so translated being logos. In I Cor. i. 5 the same word is used in referring to a supernatural gift; "ye are enriched in Him, in all utterance" (logos). We can hardly believe that the Apostle needed the prayers of the Lord's people that he might receive a supernatural gift. During the period when tongues were enjoyed by the church, the Apostle declared that he spoke with tongues more than they all, and, even then, he could add: "Yet in the church I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue" (I Cor. xiv. 19). While these miraculous gifts ceased after the setting aside of Israel at Acts xxviii., we have at least one instance where a gift received before the dispensation changed was not withdrawn. We refer to the exhortation given to Timothy "to stir up the gift of God which is in thee by the putting on of my (Paul's) hands" (II Tim. i. 6).

The usage of logos in the prison epistles, however, lends no support to the idea that by "utterance" the Apostle meant anything supernatural. We find logos in Ephesians as follows:--

> "The word of truth, the gospel of your salvation" (Eph. i. 13).
> "Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth" (Eph. iv. 29).
> "Let no man deceive you with vain words" (Eph. v. 6).
> "Pray . . . . . for me that utterance may be given unto me" (Eph. vi. 19).

The distribution of the words comes to our help here, and helps us to see that each time logos is used in its ordinary meaning.

A | The word of truth . . . . . The gospel.
B | Let no corrupt words.
B | Let no . . . . . vain words.
A | The word . . . . . the mystery of the gospel.

If we turn to the parallel passages in Col. iv. we shall find this usage of the word confirmed.

"That God would open unto us a door of utterance" (logos) (Col. iv. 3).
"Let your speech (logos) be always with grace" (Col. iv. 6).

It is clear that the Apostle's prayer for utterance in Eph. vi. 19 may be the legitimate prayer of every member of the body.

The next word in Paul's prayer that calls for attention is the twice-uttered adjective "boldly": "That I may open my mouth boldly (parrhesia) to make known the mystery of the gospel, for which I am an ambassador in bonds: that therein I may speak boldly (parrhesiazomai), as I ought to speak" (Eph. vi. 19, 20). This word parrhesia is one that should be dear to all who have been set free from the bondage of sin, the fear of man, and the shadows of the law. It is a member of the large family of rheo, to flow. It suggests frankness and freedom, hence a candour that amounts to boldness. Let us look at a few of its occurrences so that we may catch something of its spirit:

"And He spake that saying openly" (Mark viii. 32).
"But lo, He speaketh boldly, and they say nothing unto Him" (John vii. 26).
"Then said Jesus unto them plainly, Lazarus is dead" (John xi. 14).
"I spake openly to the world . . . . . in secret have I said nothing" (John xviii. 20).

Openness was a blessed characteristic of the Lord during his ministry on earth and we shall find it reflected in those who knew and loved Him, when they, in turn, were sent forth to speak in His name.

"Men and brethren, let me freely speak unto you of the patriarch David" (Acts ii. 29).
"And now, Lord, behold their threatenings: and grant unto Thy servants, that with all boldness they may speak Thy word" (Acts iv. 29).

Paul "preached boldly at Damascus in the name of Jesus" (Acts ix. 27). The same is recorded of his ministry elsewhere (Acts xiii. 46; xiv. 3; xix. 8; xxvi. 26), and it marks the closing testimony of the Acts: "Preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him" (Acts xxviii. 31).

This frankness, fearlessness and openness, characterizes, too, our access to the Father by the faith of Jesus Christ our Lord (Eph. iii. 12). It is this that gives us our greatest encouragement in face of the opposition of man. If we, sinful as we know ourselves to be by nature, have, by grace, "boldness" there, in the presence of the Lord, are we to hang our heads and shuffle our feet in the presence even of the greatest mortal on earth? We shall be courteous, for the Scriptures teach us so to be. We shall give every man his due, and esteem other believers better than ourselves, but when it is a matter of speaking freely and frankly concerning that most blessed of all revelations, "the mystery of the gospel", may be ever pray the prayer of the Apostle in Eph. vi.

The fact that the Apostle makes so light of his imprisonment must not be misunderstood. For the love of the Lord He was willing, not only to be imprisoned, but to die, yet that does not indicate indifference to suffering. Such a champion of liberty as he is revealed to be in Galatians could scarcely be conceived as enduring imprisonment meekly, were it not for grace sufficient; thus the prayer for boldness in Eph. vi. is largely called forth by the intimidating effect of bonds even upon the most courageous. So he wrote: "For which I am an ambassador in a chain (or I conduct an embassy in a chain), that therein (i.e., that in that state of bondage with all its irksomeness and temptation to purchase a little ease) I may speak boldly, as I ought to speak" (Eph. 6:20).

The parallel passage in Col. iv. 4 uses the word which is the key to this series of studies, "That I may make it manifest, as I ought to speak".

In the practical section therefore we have two ways in which the mystery may be manifested by the people of God: (i) By their domestic relationships and life in the home; (ii) By a fearless avowal of the truth, in spite of all circumstances.

We make no boast in self, for all we have and are is by grace, but not much imagination is needed to realize that freedom to speak all that we have seen of the truth of the mystery has not been without its cost and its temptations, and if twenty-five years of ministry have left us with few illusions, yet, while we are in this body, we too would value the prayers of all concerned that in this witness to the mystery we may make it manifest, as we ought to speak.

#8. A Ministry of Suffering.
pp. 59 - 62

In one sense, the reference to this manifestation of the mystery (Col. i. 23-26) was dealt with when speaking of its close parallel, Eph. iii. On the other hand, who can read these wondrous words without realizing that the human mind can never fathom their depths. Therefore, although the ground has, in some measure, already been covered, we remember that God Himself has seen fit to leave on record for our learning this parallel passage, and we are sure that recognition of the wisdom that arranged the repetition will bring with it fuller light and enjoyment.

The reference to the Apostle's "chain" at the close of the last article finds an echo in this opening reference to his ministry:--

> "Whereof I Paul am made a minister; who now rejoice in my sufferings for you, and fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for His body's sake, which is the church: whereof I am made a minister, according to the dispensation of God which is given to me for you, to fulfil the word of God; even the mystery which hath been hid from ages and from generations, but now is made manifest to His saints" (Col. i. 23-26).

In all this wealth of language two words seem to cry out for recognition, namely, the "filling up" of the afflictions of Christ by Paul and the "fulfilling" of the Word of God by the mystery.

The first word, antanapleroo, claims our attention in the first place because of its curious construction. It is a double compound, being prefixed by both anti, "instead of", and ana, "up".

Anapleroo occurs six times in the N.T. and is translated "fill up", "fulfil", "occupy" and "supply". Antanapleroo occurs but once, in Col. i. 24. Anti is a preposition meaning "instead of" and then "against", and in composition it means either (1) Contrariety, as anthistemi = To oppose; (2) Reciprocity, as antiloidoreo = "To revile in return"; (3) Correspondency, as antilutron = A ransom; and (4) In the place of, as anthupatos = Proconsul. By the use of this word the Apostle most evidently intended something more than "to fill up", for that is expressed in the simplest verb, anapleroo. The anti here retains its meaning of correspondency and a little investigation will illuminate the Apostle's meaning.

Paul never forgot what manner of person he had been before his conversion. A year before his martyrdom we find him writing to Timothy with vivid recollections of the dreadful days that preceded his conversion.

> "Who was before a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious: but I obtained mercy, because I did it ignorantly in unbelief" (I Tim. i. 13).

Read the two passages together.

> "Putting me into the ministry, who was before a blasphemer" (I Tim. i. 12, 13).
> "I am made a minister, who now rejoice in my sufferings for you" (Col. i. 23, 24).

One can well understand that Paul would realize something of the correspondency between his earliest persecution and his subsequent suffering. When he was met by the Lord on the road to Damascus he was astonished to hear from heaven the words, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou ME?" and it is easy to see that if his persecution of the believer could be taken by the Lord as directed against Himself, then suffering endured later, for the sake of Christ, might be looked upon as something corresponding. At his conversion the Apostle was told that suffering was to be a part of his commission:

> "He is a chosen vessel unto Me, to bear My name before the Gentiles and kings, and the children of Israel: for I will show him how great things he must suffer for My name's sake" (Acts ix. 15, 16).

Some years before the close of the Acts, the sufferings endured by Paul for Christ's sake were of an overwhelming nature. He likened himself and those who stood with him, to the condemned, who entered the arena last, "a spectacle unto the world, and to angels and to men" (I Cor. iv. 9). This statement is followed by a list of sufferings any one of which would mark a man as a martyr, but, taken together, they compel us to confess that here indeed are "great things" suffered for the name of Christ. Yet, when we turn to the second epistle written to this same church, we discover that in the early record the Apostle had refrained from making known all he had suffered. In II Cor. iv. 8-12, we have a prelude to the fuller list, which Paul said he felt a fool in mentioning, though compelled to do so by the attack upon his office. There, in II Cor. xi., we read of stripes, prisons, deaths, beatings, stonings, shipwreck and perils beyond compute. As we read this list we might be forgiven if we said, surely this man's measure is now full, but it was not.

In Col. i. 24, he makes it known that there were "sufferings of Christ" that were "left over" which he had yet to endure. His Roman imprisonment was part of this tale of sufferings. The attitude of those who, though preaching Christ, thought to add affliction to his bonds (Phil. i. 16), must have been more galling than any Roman chain, and at the end, his course finished, the fight won, he could say:

> "Whereunto I am appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles. For the which cause I also suffer these things" (II Tim. i. 11, 12).
>
> "My gospel, wherein I suffer trouble as an evil doer, even unto bonds:" (and then comes that flash of spirit, that irrepressible spirit that no amount of bondage or sufferings could crush, saying with a delightful play upon words: "but the Word of God is not bound"). "Therefore I endure all things for the elect's sakes, that they may also obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus with eternal glory" (II Tim. ii. 8-10).
>
> "Thou hast fully known my doctrine, manner of life, purpose, faith, long-suffering, charity, patience, persecutions, afflictions, which came unto me at Antioch, at Iconium, at Lystra; what persecutions I endured" (II Tim. iii. 10, 11).

It is clear that the Apostle's ministry was a ministry of suffering, and the fact that, in the person of His people, he had once persecuted the Lord, enabled him to say: "in my turn", or as a kind of correspondency, I now endure in my flesh the sufferings of Christ, "for His body's sake, which is the church". The other word "to fulfil" in Col. i. 25 means rather "to complete". The word is so translated in Col. ii. 10, "ye are complete in Him", and is the intention in the exhortation to Archippus, that he should "fulfil" or "complete" his ministry (Col. iv. 17). The revelation of the mystery "completes the word of God" and in the ministry of the Apostle it is "made manifest".

Our space has been occupied with but one aspect of the Apostle's ministry, but if it enables us to appreciate more fully than before what underlies the title, "the prisoner of Christ Jesus, for you Gentiles", we shall the more value that ministry, written in tears and sealed with blood, even though our adherence to the "four prison epistles" should bring with it a taste of that cup of which the Apostle drank so deeply.

#9. The Mystery among the Gentiles.
pp. 79, 80

The mystery that was manifested to the saints through the ministry of the Apostle Paul, had been "hid from ages and from generations". This we saw in our last article. The next theme before us is the manifestation of the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles.

> "But is now made manifest to His saints, to whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles; which is Christ among you, the hope of glory" (Col. i. 26, 27).

Being an Israelite by birth, the Apostle of the Gentiles would realize better than would the Gentiles themselves the riches of grace that were the source of the preaching of the mystery among them. Apart from the Epistle to the Romans, it is to the epistles of the mystery that we turn in order to learn about the riches of grace, and riches of glory, yea, the exceeding riches of His grace; and the Apostle connects the manifestation of the mystery with the making known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles.

Left to ourselves, what would be our answer to the question, "What is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles?" We should be wise if we turned at once to what is written. We could say without fear of contradiction, that "redemption through His blood, even the forgiveness of sins" must be included, for that is "according to the riches of His grace, wherein He hath abounded toward us" (Eph. i. 7, 8). We should certainly include the "inheritance in the saints", though we could not speak in detail of what constitutes "the riches of the glory" of this inheritance (Eph. i. 18). Looking forward to "that day" when the inheritance shall be enjoyed, to our amazement we learn that whereas redemption is spoken of as "the riches of His grace", the kindness that He will show to us in the days to come is of such transcendence that the Apostle speaks of it as "the exceeding riches of His grace in His kindness toward us in Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 7).

With all this the Apostle would naturally be in hearty agreement. In Col. i. 27 he focuses attention upon one important aspect of present truth that reveals the ground upon which we may entertain such a hope: "Which is Christ in (among) you, the hope of glory." The margin draws attention to the fact that the words "in you" should be translated "among", as it is in the earlier phrase of the verse, "among the Gentiles". The Apostle is not here speaking of the blessed realization of the indwelling Christ, but of the dispensational change that had followed the setting aside of the children of Israel: "The salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and they will hear it" (Acts xxviii. 28). Up till then, salvation had been "of the Jews" (John iv. 22). The gospel had been intimately associated with the promise made to Abraham (Gal. iii. 8). What the Gentiles had heard through Peter had been, "The Word which God sent unto the children of Israel" (Acts x. 26). Even the gospel preached by Paul in Romans was "to the Jews first"

(Rom. i. 16), and the Gentile believer was warned not to vaunt himself against Israel, seeing that he was but a "wild olive" grafted in among the natural branches (Rom. xi.).

But when we commence the Epistle to the Colossians we are conscious of a great change. The hope that was laid up for these believers and which was made known in the truth of the gospel, had been preached to "all the world" (Col. i. 5, 6), and "to every creature which is under heaven" (Col. i. 23), and it is in immediate association with this last quotation that Paul goes on to speak of his special ministry and the manifestation of the mystery. Consequently we come back to Col. i. 27, and learn that the very fact that Christ is now "among the Gentiles" is proved by the preaching of the gospel to them, irrespective of Israel, the once-appointed channel, now set aside. That, of itself, bespeaks a change of dispensation.

"Christ among you" says the Apostle is "the hope of glory". The hope of Israel, which extended right through to the last chapter of the Acts (Acts xxviii. 20), is not in view here, but something distinct. This hope is the "one hope of your calling", "the hope of His calling", "the hope that is laid up for you in heaven"; it is a hope of "glory", and will be consummated when Christ, Who is our life, shall be made manifest, for then, said the Apostle, "Ye shall also be made manifest with Him, in glory" (Col. iii. 4).

The mystery receives a present manifestation because Christ is among the Gentiles, through the preached word. He is the hope of glory. The mystery receives its final manifestation when the Church of the One Body is manifested with Him in glory. It is good to keep these two passages, Col. i. 27, and iii. 4, together and to remember that in both the present anticipation and the future realization, it is Christ Himself Who is both Manifester and Hope.

#10. The Mystery of God -- Christ.
pp. 177 - 179

Our text in this article has been, and still is, much in dispute. The A.V. reads: "the acknowledgment of the mystery of God, and of the Father, and of Christ" (Col. ii. 2). The R.V. reads: "That they may know the mystery of God, even Christ." Alford reads: "The thorough knowledge of the mystery of God", and rejects all the rest. The Companion Bible agrees with the reading of the R.V. Scrivener says: "We would gladly adopt Tou Theou Christou (the R.V. reading), so powerfully do internal considerations plead in its favour, were it but a little better supported." Hilary, who was born A.D.300, appears to have read the passage as does the R.V.: In agnitionem sacramenti Dei Christi—"To the recognition of the mystery of God, Christ". For what it is worth, the Numeric New Testament, by its own peculiar method of testing, also gives this reading as the true one.

Accepting, then, the R.V. as the more accurate, let us proceed in our study, keeping in mind that the special feature of the series is not only to ascertain what the mystery is, but how it is manifested.

The mystery of Col. ii. 2 is not the mystery of Eph. iii. 3, which speaks of the church, nor of Eph. iii. 4, which speaks of Christ, but it is the mystery of God, the manifestation of which is Christ. Alford draws attention to a most important correction in the translation of Col. ii. 3. The A.V. reads: "In Whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." He says, "The rendering which I have adopted is that of Meyer, and I am persuaded on consideration that it is not only the only logical but the only grammatical one also".

Alford's rendering (given below*[?]*) is supported by the LXX. There are eleven occurrences of apokruphos which is used consistently as an adjective, and never as a verb. For example, in the passage: "He shall have power over the treasures of gold and silver" (Dan. xi. 43) the LXX uses the word apokruphois for "treasures", evidently with the idea that treasures would be hidden by reason of their value.

Again, in Dan. ii. 22 the same word is used of "secret things", and it is interesting to observe that in ii. 19 the word "secret" is the word musterion, or "mystery". In Isa. xlv. 3, "the hidden riches of secret places" is, in the LXX, apokruphous aoratons, "secret, unseen". The context speaks of treasures, using the same word as is so translated in Col. ii. 3. Psalm xxvii. 5 provides a good illustration of the use of the verb and the adjective: "He shall hide me (krupto) in His pavilion; in the secret (apokruphos) of His tabernacle." In II Maccabees i. 23 we have a parallel with Col. ii. 3 which cannot be ignored: "He took the hidden treasures which he found" (Tous thesaurous tous apokruphous). Therefore instead of reading as in the A.V. we must read: "In Whom are all the secret treasures of wisdom and knowledge." These treasures are priceless. They include "all riches of the full assurance of understanding". They involve the "knowledge of the mystery of God" which is manifested only to those who know Christ in the light of the revelation of the mystery. Often men talk of God as though it were a simple matter to comprehend Him. They argue about His person as though He were subject to the same laws and limitations as themselves. To such philosophers and expositors God might well say, as He said to the wicked in Psalm i. 21: "Thou thoughtest that I was altogether such an one as thyself."

Yet God is spirit, and, apart from revelation, what do we know of that realm of being? Even angels, who are spirits, take upon themselves the forms of men before man can perceive them. The Saviour declared, in the days of His early ministry concerning the Father, "Ye have neither heard His voice at any time, nor seen His shape" (John v. 37). God Himself must ever remain a mystery, indeed the greatest of all mysteries, unless He manifest Himself in such a way that His creatures can apprehend and understand. In general, our knowledge of the outside world is derived through the medium of the senses of sight, hearing and touch, supplemented by taste and smell. In that other sphere where the answer to the mystery of God is Christ, we can understand what may be known of God only by the manifestation of it in His Person. The works of His hands reveal "His eternal power and Godhead" so that the nations of the earth are without excuse (Rom. i. 19-23). Yet that is but a step, for in the face of Jesus Christ we see the glory of God. He came to "declare" the invisible God; He came and said, "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father". He was looked upon, and handled, and the conclusion of those thus privileged is written: "My Lord and my God" (John xx. 28), "This is the true God, and eternal life" (I John i. 1, 2; v. 20). Whatever glimpses we may have obtained through other mediums of truth, we must all agree that "In Him are all the secret treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (Col. ii. 3). When one's completeness is found to be in Him, in Whom all the fullness of the Godhead dwells bodily, the folly of turning aside to vain, deceitful, philosophy, or of being shackled by tradition, or loaded with ceremonial ordinances, is apparent.

The mystery of God is Christ. That mystery has been manifested. We thank God that we have seen not only "eternal power and Godhead", but we have seen "The Father, and it sufficeth us".

#11. God was manifested in the Flesh.
pp. 212 - 218

To write a series of articles on the subject of "The Mystery Manifested" and to omit I Tim. iii. 16 would be futile, yet, if the subject is to be dealt with at all, the problem of compressing what it is essential should be said into the available space, is somewhat perplexing. While, as we have said, our problem is partly due to limitations of space, it is also due to the facts that not all our readers will easily follow the subject, and that in dealing with Greek manuscripts we need photographs and the use of Greek type. We have attempted a solution of the last difficulty by giving an illustration (on p.216) of the Greek words used around which the controversy involved in the passage revolves, and trust that the better knowledge (which we hope will have been gained) of so vital a subject will more than compensate the reader for any weariness that the study of evidence may entail.

We propose then an examination of I Tim. iii. 16 under the following headings:--

(i) The evidence of the structure of the Epistle as a whole.
(ii) The meaning of the actual passage itself.
(iii) The evidence that the A.V. gives the correct reading.

There are two passages in the R.V. in which the hand of the Modernist is evident. They are I Tim. iii. 16 and II Tim. iii. 16. In the first there is an attack upon the Deity of Christ, and in the second there is an attack upon the Scriptures of God. We know not when the storm will break, but we are persuaded that the Enemy of Truth has singled out these two truths for special attack, and while time and opportunity remain, we desire, as unto the Lord, to make it plain where we stand on the vital issues involved.

For the moment we concentrate our attention upon I Tim. iii. 16.

The Testimony of the Structure.

It is possible to give so much "proof" that the untrained mind may be bewildered rather than convinced. To avoid this, we first draw attention to the essential feature of the structure of the Epistle.

A | i. 17. The King of the Ages, Incorruptible, INVISIBLE, Honour and glory, to the Ages of the ages.
B | iii. 16. GOD was manifested in the Flesh. SEEN.
A | vi. 16. King of kings. Immortal, UNSEEN,
Honour and might, Age-lasting.

These are the great focal points of the Epistle around which the remainder of the structure is grouped.

Many of our readers will be satisfied with the above; but in a matter of this character, where evidence is essential and where we must allow no advantage to the adversary, we must assume nothing but prove each point. We have therefore no option but to set out the structure of the whole Epistle, although our appeal will be to the outline given above.

I Timothy.

A | i. 1, 2. Salutation.
B | i. 3-20. Hetero didaskaleo, "Teach no other doctrine" (i. 3).
The dispensation of God (i. 4).
Endless genealogies (i. 4).
Committed to trust (i. 11).
Aionian life (i. 16).
The King, incorruptible, invisible (i. 17).
This charge (i. 18).
Shipwreck (i. 19).
C | ii. 1-7. I exhort (ii. 1).
The salvation of all men (ii. 4).
Paul's ministry (ii. 7).
D | ii. 8 - iii. 15-. These things I write (iii. 14).
Men. Women. Adam. Eve (ii. 8 iii. 13).
I hope to come shortly (iii. 14).

Aionian life (vi. 12).
King, immortal, unseen (vi. 15, 16).
I give thee charge (vi. 13).
Drowning (vi. 9).
A | vi. 21. Salutation.

Instead of working out the members B and B we have placed the corresponding subjects in the same order in each section so that the parallel thoughts may be obvious without going minutely into detail. For example, "the shipwreck" of i. 19 and "the drowning" of vi. 9 are an interesting parallel. It will be sufficient for our purpose if the simple outline given above is seen to be in line with the Epistle as a whole and that both these important sections, B and B, are associated with a warning against heterodox teaching. The true doctrine is found in I Tim. iii. 16, section E, while the contrary, the doctrines of demons, is found in the great apostacy of I Tim. iv. 1-7, section E.

We can now confidently say that the structure of the Epistle emphasizes the mystery of godliness, in i. 17 and vi. 15, 16, where God is said to be invisible and unseen, and also points to iii. 16 where it is stated that God has been manifested in the flesh and "seen". Here therefore we might pause and say, When the Word became flesh and dwelt among us, He manifested the invisible God and revealed the Father. In Him the mystery of God and of godliness alike find their exegesis.

The Meaning of I Tim. iii. 16.

We now pass from the testimony of the structure to the text itself. Chapter iii. is largely devoted to the qualifications of bishops and deacons, and the Apostle states that he has so written that Timothy may know how to behave himself in the house of God, which is the church of the living God. A question now arises from the last clause of verse 15. Is the church "the pillar and ground of the truth"? If we use the word "church" in its most spiritual meaning, we shall find no basis in Scripture for such an important doctrine. The case before us, however, is most certainly not "the Church" but "a church", a church wherein there are bishops and deacons; in other words, a local assembly, and surely it is beyond all argument that the truth does not rest upon any such church as its pillar and ground. The reader will observe that in the structure, iii. 15 is divided between D and E, and that the latter part of verse 15 belongs to verse 16. There is no definite article before the word "pillar", and a consistent translation is as follows. Having finished what he had to say about the officers of the church and Timothy's behaviour, he turns to the great subject of the mystery of godliness with the words:

> "A pillar and ground of truth and confessedly great is the mystery of godliness."

Here the teaching is that whatever or whoever the mystery of godliness shall prove to be, it or He, is the pillar and ground of truth. The mystery of godliness is then explained as "God manifest in the flesh" and He, we know, is a sure and tried Foundation.

We now come to the question of the true reading of I Tim. iii. 16. The A.V. reads "God"; the R.V. reads "He Who", and some versions read "Which". As it is not possible for us to depart from our practice, and use Greek type, we have prepared the following explanation to which the reader, unacquainted with the Greek or with the ancient manuscripts, is asked to refer as we proceed.

Anyone who has examined an ancient Greek manuscript will have noticed the large number of abbreviations that are employed. For instance, the Greek word for God, Theos, is always contracted to THS. Now this contraction is only distinguishable from the relative pronoun HOS by two horizontal strokes, which, in manuscripts of early date, it was often the practice to trace so faintly that they can now scarcely be discerned. Of this, any one may be convinced by inspecting the two pages of Codex A which are exposed to view at the British Museum. Need we go in? An archetype copy, in which one or both of these slight strokes had vanished from the contraction THS, gave rise to the reading HOS, "who", of which non-sensical substitute traces survive in only two manuscripts, Aleph and 17; not, for certain, in one single ancient Father, no, not for certain in one single ancient version. So transparent, in fact, is the absurdity of writing to musterion hos ("the mystery who"), that copyists promptly substituted ho ("which"), thus furnishing another illustration of the well-known property which a fabricated reading has of, sooner or later, begetting offspring in its own likeness. Happily, to this second mistake the sole surviving witness is the Codex Claromontanus of the sixth century (D): the only Patristic evidence in its favour being Gelasius of Cyzicus (whose date is A.D.476): and the unknown author of a homily in the appendix to Chrysostom. Over this latter reading, however, we need not linger, seeing that ho, "which", does not find a single patron at the present day.

Theos is the reading of all the uncial copies extant but two, and of all the cursives but one. The universal consent of the Lectionaries proves that Theos has been read in all the assemblies of the faithful since the fourth or fifth century of our era. At what earlier period of her existence is it then supposed that the church availed herself of the privilege to substitute Theos for hos or ho, whether in error or in fraud? Nothing short of a conspiracy, to which every region of the Eastern Church must have been a party, would account for the phenomenon.

We enquire for the testimony of the Fathers; and we discover that, (1) Gregory of Nyssa quoted Theos no less than twenty-two times. That Theos is also recognized by (2) his namesake of Nazianzus in two places; as well as by (3) Didymus of Alexandria; and (4) by pseudo Dionysius of Alexandria. It is also recognized (5) by Diodorus of Tarsus, and (6) Chrysostom quotes I Tim. iii. 16 in conformity with the Received Text at least three times. In addition there are twelve others, bringing the number up to eighteen.

We are indebted to Dean Burgon for these facts and would strongly recommend all who have any doubt as to the true reading to consult the masterly investigation contained in the Dean's book "The Revision Revised".

Some may suppose that whether we read the A.V., "God was manifest", or the R.V., "He Who was manifested", it comes to much the same thing, and question the necessity of the foregoing investigation. To such we would explain that the reasons for our concern are:--

(1) We must resist, on principle, any tampering with the text, irrespective of its immediate effect.

(2) We must be on our guard against anything that would "modernize" the teaching of the Word concerning the Person of the Lord Jesus.

(3) We must remember that, sooner or later, they who adopt hos, will slide into ho. They will feel unsettled until they cut out all reference to "God" and translate the passage "which was manifest". Dean Burgon expressed his thankfulness that there were no patrons for the discredited reading "which". Yet we are sorry to say that this reading is being revived, and will suit the teaching that subordinates the Word from His true place in the Godhead.

The Alexandrian Manuscript.

A great deal of controversy has gathered around the Alexandrian manuscript which is to be seen in the British Museum. Since this came to England 250 years ago the writing has faded considerably and we are not therefore to find our warrant for substituting hos for Theos by what can be seen to-day, but by what competent observers saw at the time of arrival of the manuscript.

"That Patrick Young, the first custodian and collator of the Codex (1628-1652) read Theos is certain. Young communicated the various readings of A to Abp. Ussher; and the latter, prior to 1652, communicated them to Hammond, who clearly knew nothing of hos. It is plain that Theos was the reading seen by Huish, when he sent his collation of the Codex (made according to Bentley, with great exactness) to Brian Walton, who published the fifth volume of his Polygott in 1657. Bp. Pearson who was very curious in such matters, says, 'we find not hos in any copy', a sufficient proof how he read the place in 1659. Bp. Fell, who published an edition of the N.T. in 1675, certainly considered Theos the reading of Codex A. Mill, who was at work on the text of the N.T. from 1677 to 1707, expressly declares that he saw the remains of Theos in this place. Bentley who had himself (1716) collated the MS with the utmost accuracy, knew nothing of any other reading. Emphatic testimony on the subject is borne by Wotton in 1718. 'There can be no doubt (he says) that this MS always exhibited Theos. Of this, anyone may easily convince himself who will be at pains to examine the place with attention'." (Dean Burgon).

"Two years earlier (we have it on the testimony of Mr. John Creyk, of St. John's College, Cambridge) "the old line in the letter theta was plainly to be seen". It was "much about the same time" also (viz. about 1716), that Wetstein acknowledged to the Rev. John Kippax, "who took it down in writing from his own mouth—that though the middle stroke of the theta has been evidently retouched, yet the fine stroke which was originally in the body of the theta is discoverable at each end of the fuller stroke of the corrector". And Berriman himself (who delivered a course of lectures on the true reading of I Tim. iii. 16 in 1737-8), attests emphatically that he had seen it also. 'If therefore' (he adds) 'at any time hereafter the old line should become altogether undiscoverable, there will never be just cause to doubt but that the genuine, and original reading of the MS was THEOS: and that the new strokes, added at the top and in the middle by the corrector were not designed to corrupt or falsify, but to preserve and perpetuate the true reading, which was in danger of being lost by the decay of Time'." (Dean Burgon).

To this testimony must now be added that of modern photography. The camera has not only revealed the faded bar that proves that Theos is the true reading; it has also restored other faded parts of letters about which no controversy has arisen, but which might have become the basis of argument had the words been vital.

After reviewing the testimony of the different cursive copies of the epistles of Paul that are known, Dean Burgon says:--

> "Behold then the provision which the Author of Scripture has made for the effectual conservation in its integrity of this portion of His written Word! Upwards of eighteen hundred years have run their course since the Holy Ghost by His servant, Paul, rehearsed the 'mystery of godliness'; declaring this to be the great foundation fact, namely, that, GOD WAS MANIFESTED IN THE FLESH. And lo, out of two hundred and fifty-four copies of S. Paul's Epistles no less than two hundred fifty-two are discovered to have preserved that expression. Such 'consent' amounts to unanimity; and, unanimity in this subject-matter is conclusive.
>
> The copies of which we speak (you are requested to observe), were produced in every part of ancient christendom, being derived in every instance from copies older than themselves, which again, were transcripts of copies older still. They have since found their way, without design or contrivance, into the libraries of every country of Europe, where, for hundreds of years, they had been jealousy guarded. And, for what conceivable reason can this multitude of witnesses be supposed to have entered into a wicked conspiracy to deceive mankind?"

Such is the testimony of antiquity. This we sum up, for the benefit of those who may not have cared to wade through the evidence.

The reading of I Tim. iii. 16, "God was manifest in the flesh" is witnessed by 289 manuscripts, by 3 versions and by upwards of 20 Greek Fathers. Moreover the text of the R.V. does not make grammatical Greek. The relative pronoun hos should agree with its antecedent. Musterion is neuter. Bloomfield in his Synoptica says "hos ephanerothe is not Greek".

We would conclude this series, with the calculated affirmation of our belief that the original reading of I Tim. iii. 16 is, "GOD was manifest in the flesh" and, like Thomas of old, we bow in this Presence and say "My Lord, and my God" and, like Philip, we say "Show us the Father, and it sufficeth us".

Some of the evidence quoted from Dean Burgon will be found, together with other items of interest, in the series "The Volume of the Book" (Volumes XX - XXV). We feel that the subject is too important merely to refer the reader to that series, and that in collecting the evidence there was no help for it but to cover the ground, even at the risk of slight repetition. But who that love the Lord will begrudge a few pages of print? And who among our readers has an infallible memory?

The detailed examination of the terms used in I Tim. iii. 16 must await a future opportunity.

The Pulpit of the Opened Book.

#1. "A Pulpit with a Purpose" (Neh. viii. 4).

pp. 165 - 168

Just as the epistles of Paul written during the period covered by the Acts, and the record of his public ministry which constitutes the bulk of Acts ix. - xxviii., must be taken together and considered as one work, so the written ministry of The Berean Expositor, and the spoken ministry at "The Chapel of the Opened Book" are one. Naturally the two phases of ministry differ in the method adopted to make known the truth, and each appeals to a different circle of hearers, but, apart from the previously written ministry, the Central Witness would have no existence, even as the doors of the Chapel of the Opened Book would have remained closed, so far as our witness is concerned, were it not for the generous fellowship of many readers who can themselves entertain little or no hope of ever attending its services.

As a means of strengthening the link that binds us all in one unbroken fellowship, we hope to reproduce in these pages some of the ministry already accomplished at the London Centre, and, as an introduction to the series, give the following gist of the address delivered at the inaugural meeting on 30th September, 1943, on "A Pulpit with a Purpose" (Neh. viii. 4).

As one listens to the account of the experiences of Nehemiah and Ezra in their endeavour to fulfil the will of the Lord in the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the restoration of the Temple, and follows the efforts of their successors, one hears an echo of those experiences right down the centuries, for, while manners and customs change, humanity remains the same, and from one generation to another the conflict between truth and error follows much the same course. Those of us who sought to put into effect the will of the Lord as we understood it, met with many experiences parallel with those of Nehemiah and Ezra. There were those who "laughed" and "despised" (Neh. ii. 19), and those who "mocked" and reminded us of our "feebleness" (Neh. iv. 2), and intimidation, if not reiterated "ten times" (Neh. iv. 12), was nevertheless repeated. We are never so susceptible as when the enemy appears conciliatory and invites us to a "conference" (Neh. vi. 2), and we are peculiarly vulnerable to the insidious attack of the "open letter" (Neh. vi. 5), besides having to bear the charge of seeking to exercise lordship over the Lord's heritage (Neh. vi. 6, 7). This is the dark side of the picture, but neither Nehemiah, Ezra nor ourselves would be true to fact and experience if we did not testify to the bright and blessed side of the conflict too.

There were those who recognized that the time had come and said, "Let us rise up and build" (Neh. ii. 18), and there were those, like the nobles of the Tekoites, who, while not falling into line with their brethren, nevertheless "repaired another piece" (Neh. iii. 27) and so helped forward the work in unexpected ways. Then there were those who "gave unto the work" not only in labour and prayer, but in kind (Neh. vii. 70, 71). In either case, both lines, whether of opposition or help, converge, in the book of Nehemiah, in chapter viii., in the "Pulpit erected with a purpose" and the "Opened Book", even as our own experiences of 1943 converged in the opening of "The Chapel of the Opened Book".

> "And Ezra the scribe stood upon a pulpit of wood, which they had made for the purpose . . . . . And Ezra opened the book in the sight of all the people" (Neh. viii. 4, 5).

The purpose of that pulpit was not to magnify Nehemiah the Tirshatha nor Ezra the Scribe. Most certainly it was not erected to enable a priestly cast to establish an ascendancy over the people, for its prime object was expressed in the words, "Ezra opened the book".

Let us consider three aspects of this theme that must be true of the work now inaugurated, as it was true in the days of Israel's return from captivity.

(1) The Opened Book must be read.

> "So they read in the book in the law of God DISTINCTLY, and gave the SENSE, and caused them to UNDERSTAND the reading" (Neh. viii. 8).

To the Ethiopian riding in his chariot, Philip the evangelist put the question, "Understandest thou what thou readest?" (Acts viii. 30). To Timothy Paul wrote, "Till I come give attendance to reading" (I Tim. iv. 13), and even our Saviour, Who spake as never man spake, "stood up for to read" (Luke iv. 16).

It will therefore be the duty of all who minister in the Chapel of the Opened Book to see that the reading of the Word finds a prominent place in its services. But "reading", to be a service and not a soporific, must be clear for "If the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself for battle?" Reading therefore must be "distinct" and this lowly feature of public ministry will not be forgotten in the training of students in the days to come. Distinctness of enunciation, however, covers more than the emission of the sounds of words: it also has a bearing upon the sense of the words read. We have heard Luke xxiv. 25 so read as to make it seem that our Saviour rebuked the disciples for being such fools as to believe all that the prophets have spoken! or Rom. vi. 17 so read as to make the Apostle thank God that the Roman Christians were the servants of sin!

The first lesson then that we learn is, that in the ministry of the Word the Book must be "read", and so read that its message shall be given "distinctly" and its "sense" preserved.

(2) The Opened Book must be "divided".

At the beginning of His ministry our Lord entered the synagogue at Nazareth and stood up for to read, "And when He had opened the book" at Isa. lxi. we find that He read one verse and the one sentence following, and then closed the book, sat down and said, "This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears" (Luke iv. 21). A perusal of Isa. lxi. 1, 2 will show that the Lord put into operation that great principle of interpretation entitled “right division” (II Tim. ii. 15), for He concluded His reading at the words, “To preach the acceptable year of the Lord”. Had He read on to the next line and said, “and the day of vengeance of our God”, He could not have also said, “This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears”, for those two sentences, though divided in our version by but a comma, belong to the two different advents of the Lord, at least 1900 years lying between them.

Therefore the second lesson that we learn is, that not only must the reading be “distinct”, to give the sense, but that it must also be “rightly divided”, otherwise passages that belong to differing dispensations will be confused and the hearers misled.

(3) The Opened Book speaks of Christ.

> “And they said one to another, Did not our hearts burn within us, while He talked with us by the way, and while He opened to us the Scriptures?” (Luke xxiv. 32).

If we enquire what it was that caused this glow within the breasts of the saddened disciples, we discover that it was not eloquence, although we are sure that when He read the Holy Book. He, as none other, read “distinctly” and “gave the sense”; neither was it right division, although He could never confuse the dispensations that He Himself came to fulfil. No, He made His disciples’ hearts burn within them because, > “Beginning at Moses and all the prophets, He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things CONCERNING HIMSELF” (Luke xxiv. 27).

So we, too, in type and shadow, in prophecy and in doctrine, shall see Him, and we shall preach Him, otherwise all our “distinctness” and all our “division” will be dead and fruitless. If, on the other hand, the ministry of the Opened Book follows the lead given by these three examples, we may confidently expect the sequel, “Their eyes were opened” (Luke xxiv. 31); “Then opened He their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures” (Luke xxiv. 45).

It was announced from this “Pulpit with a purpose” at the inaugural meeting, that for the first six months the theme at the Sunday morning service would be the basic doctrine of the inspiration of all Scripture, so that there should be no uncertainty on the part of new-comers as to our attitude to the Word of God. We do not, of course, propose reproducing these thirty addresses on this one great theme, but we believe every reader and every supporter of the Central Witness would appreciate some idea of the way in which this theme has been presented, and we trust that the record may not only indicate the position taken up by the Central Witness, but that it will prove a blessing to those who read the outlines, and possibly provoke further testimony in the hands of those who are already engaged in public ministry. We therefore look forward to meeting the reader again in these pages, there to repeat the testimony given from the “Pulpit of the Opened Book”.

#2. "A Threefold Cord is not quickly broken" (Eccles. iv. 12). pp. 185 - 187

Quite apart from the question of inspiration, we should expect that men like Peter and Paul, when conscious that their days on earth drew to a close, would not trifle with truth, nor waste precious opportunities, but that they would speak plainly of those things that were of lasting importance. If this be expected of fallible men, how much more of the Son of God Himself? If therefore we find that in the final scenes of their lives Peter, Paul and the Lord Himself chose to emphasize the inspiration and integrity of the Scriptures, we shall in that fact, possess a threefold testimony that will not quickly be broken by the fleeting and fickle opinions of fallible critics.

PETER, when he wrote his second epistle, knew that the hour of his death drew near:

> "Knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath showed me" (II Pet. i. 14).

PAUL, when he wrote his second epistle to Timothy, knew that he had reached the end of his earthly life.

> "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand" (II Tim. iv. 6).

CHRIST, when He prayed, as recorded in John xvii., knew that death drew near, for He said:

> "Father, the hour is come" (John xvii. 1).

What is the testimony of these two great witnesses and that supreme Witness, to the truth of the Scriptures?

> PETER.—"No prophecy of the Scripture is of its own unfolding (idias epiluseos), for the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (II Pet. i. 20, 21).

Such is Peter's explicit testimony. He declared that he had not followed "cunningly devised fables" (II Pet. i. 16), and he endorsed as historic facts the flood in the days of Noah, the destruction of the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, the deliverance of Lot, and the record of Balaam and the dumb ass that spoke (II Pet. ii. 5, 6, 7, 15, 16).

To Peter, the words written in the Scriptures are "holy commandments" (II Pet. ii. 21), whether written by prophets of old or apostles of the Lord and Saviour (II Pet. iii. 2). Finally, he does not hesitate in the same epistle to include the epistles of Paul as part of "the other scriptures" (II Pet. iii. 16).

PAUL.—"All scripture is given by inspiration of God" (II Tim. iii. 16).

Such is the testimony of Paul before his martyrdom for Christ's sake. The truth especially entrusted to him as "The Lord's prisoner" (II Tim. i. 8, 11, 12, 13), to be passed on to "faithful men who shall be able to teach others also" (II Tim. ii. 2), and the testimony to the Scriptures as a whole, are all associated with Paul's own appointment and trust (II Tim. iii. 14).

These inspired Scriptures are equally fitted both to make a child "wise unto salvation" and to provide complete equipment for the service of the man of God (II Tim. iii. 15, 17).

In view of that solemn day when the Lord shall judge the quick and the dead at His appearing and kingdom, Paul exhorts Timothy to "Preach the Word" (II Tim. iv. 2), and assumes that this Word is both "Truth" and "Sound doctrine", the preaching of which constitutes the "Work of an evangelist" (II Tim. iv. 3, 4, 5). For his own part testimony to the veracity of the Holy Scriptures formed no small portion of the "faith" which he had so faithfully "kept" (II Tim. iv. 7). Finally, if Paul was mistaken in his attitude to the Scriptures, how can the "Righteous Judge" be expected to approve of such mistaken zeal "in that day"?

CHRIST.—"I have given unto them the words which Thou gavest Me . . . . . I have given them Thy Word . . . . . Thy Word is truth" (John xvii. 8, 14, 17).

The Saviour, in full view of the fact that His hour had come, with emphasis upon the knowledge of the "true God", the finishing of His work, and His investment with the glory which He had before the world was, brings into prominence both "The Words" and "The Word" which He had received and passed on, declaring that this Word was "Truth".

Here then we have a threefold witness that cannot be set aside without destroying the whole Christian fabric. But the endorsement of the Holy Scriptures by Peter, Paul and the Lord is not confined to their last testimonies, for it forms the very warp and woof of their whole witness. In illustration of this, and as a supplement to the threefold testimony to which we have referred, we append the headings of a discourse upon the Saviour's endorsement of Holy Scripture.

(1) THE O.T. CANON . . .	"THE LAW OF MOSES— THE PROPHETS— THE PSALMS."
(2) SPECIFIC AUTHORS . . .	MOSES (John v. 46, 47). DAVID (Matt. xxii. 41-46). ISAIAH (Luke iv. 16-19). JONAH (Matt. xii. 40, 41). DANIEL (Matt. xxiv. 15).

(3) SCRIPTURE IN GENERAL . . .	BEFORE BIRTH (Heb. x. 7). AT BIRTH (Matt. i. 22, 23; ii. 6). IN TEMPTATION (Matt. iv. 4, 7, 10).
(4) BY THE CROSS . . .	THE CRY (Matt. xxvii. 46). PIERCED HANDS AND FEET (John xx. 25). THE LOTS (John xix. 24). THE THIRST (John xix. 28, 29). THE UNBROKEN BONES (John xix. 36). THE PIERCED SIDE (John xix. 37).
(5) IN RESURRECTION . . .	"THUS IT BEHOVED CHRIST" (Luke xxiv. 46).
(6) HIS UNCHANGING ATTITUDE . . .	"ONE JOT OR ONE TITTLE" (Matt. v. 18). "CANNOT BE BROKEN" (John x. 35).
(7) THE MORAL FOR US . . .	"THE SERVANT IS NOT GREATER THAN HIS LORD" (John xiii. 16).

#3. "God hath spoken" (Heb. i. 1).

pp. 205 - 207

In an earlier address of the series, the testimony of creation was considered. We found that in Psalm xix. 1 the word "declare" was the same word that gives us the "scribe", and the "book" (sepher), and that the word "show" is the word that gives us the "interpreter" (Dan. ii. 24). Associated with the heavens, Psalm xix. and Rom. x. use "speech", "knowledge", "language" and "voice". Rom. i. 19, 20; Job xxxvi.-xli. and Isa. xliv. were also reviewed.

From the voice of creation we now pass to the spoken word of the Scriptures, and there discover an insistent testimony to the fact that God hath spoken by the prophets.

MOSES.

"And the Lord spake unto Moses face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend" (Exod. xxxiii. 9-11).

"With him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches, and the similitude of the Lord shall he behold" (Numb. xii. 6-8)

"And there arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face" (Deut. xxiv. 10).

Such is the general testimony concerning the appointment and equipment of Moses. Let us note one specific period in that long ministry which is covered by the last reference cited above.

The Law at Sinai.—"And God spake all these words saying" (Exod. xx. 1). If this initial sentence were false, the truthfulness and validity of the whole of the law that follows would be called in question, and if the law, then the covenants, the promises, and finally Him Who came, not to destroy, but to fulfil, the law and the prophets.

> "For who is there of all flesh that hath heard the voice of the living God speaking out of the midst of fire, as we have, and lived?" (Deut. v. 26).

DAVID.

> "David, the son of Jesse, said . . . . . The Spirit of the Lord spake by me, and His word was in my tongue" (II Sam. xxiii. 1, 2).
>
> "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, which spake with His mouth unto David my father, and hath with His hand fulfilled it" (I Kings viii. 15).

Here is not only assertion, but confirmation. Solomon could add that God's hand had fulfilled what His word had declared.

ISAIAH.

> "Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth; for the Lord hath spoken" (Isa. i. 1).

JEREMIAH.

> "To whom the word of the Lord came . . . . . Say not, I am a child: for thou shalt go to all that I shall send thee, and whatsoever I command thee thou shalt speak . . . . . Behold I have put My words in thy mouth" (Jer. i. 1-9).

This is not only the consistent testimony of the O.T. itself; it is endorsed by the Apostles after the resurrection of the Lord.

PETER.

> "Men and brethren, this scripture must needs have been fulfilled, which the Holy Ghost by the mouth of David spake before concerning Judas, which was guide to them that took Jesus" (Acts i. 16).

THE PROPHETS.

The testimony of Heb. i. 1, "God hath spoken . . . . . by the prophets", but gathers up and endorses the burden of both Old and New Testaments. I Sam. ix. 9 says that "before time" the prophets were called "seers", a word that translates two Hebrew words, chozeh (II Sam. xxiv. 11) "the prophet Gad, David's seer", and roeh (I Sam. ix. 9) "Come, let us go to the seer; for he that is now called a prophet was beforetime called a seer". Both words lay emphasis upon "seeing" and "vision". The word usually translated "prophet" is nabi. The function of a prophet is well illustrated by the relationship instituted by God between Moses and Aaron, when He said,

> "See, I have made thee a god to Pharaoh; and Aaron thy brother shall be thy prophet" (Exod. vii. 1).
>
> "Thou shalt speak unto him, and put words in his mouth: and I will be with thy mouth and with his mouth, and will teach you what ye shall do. And he shall be thy spokesman unto the people and he shall be, even he shall be to thee instead of a mouth, and thou shalt be to him instead of God" (Exod. iv. 15, 16).

Here is an inspired definition of the office of a prophet:--

> "He shall be unto thee instead of a mouth."
> "God hath spoken . . . . . by the prophets."

Let us look at some of the ways in which the divine message was given to the prophets.

(1) By human, articulate, speech (I Sam. iii. 4).
(2) By handwriting (His hand upon me) (I Chron. xxviii. 19).
(3) By dumb show (Ezek. iv. 1-8).
(4) By personal relationships (Hosea i. 2-11; iii. 1-5).
(5) By vision (Acts x. 11).
(6) By dream (Dan. ii.).
(7) By interpretations of dreams (Dan. ii.).

Among the O.T. prophets who are mentioned by name in the N.T. are Isaiah (Luke iv. 17); Jonah (Matt. xvi. 4); Elijah and Elisha (Luke iv. 25, 27); Jeremiah (Matt. ii. 17); Daniel (Matt. xxiv. 15) and Joel (Acts ii. 16). Beside these, the prophets are mentioned in general terms in the Gospels, the Acts and the epistles of Paul, Peter and James.

We have therefore unequivocable testimony as to what the office of a prophet involves, the historic position which the prophets occupy, and the intimate relation instituted by the apostolic writers of the N.T. between the Gospels and the earlier Scriptures.

"God hath spoken by the Prophets."

#4. The Inspired Book.
pp. 230, 231

Many and varied definitions of the term "Inspiration", when used of the Scriptures, have been suggested. The following adapted from that given by Dr. Henderson may be helpful:--

> "Divine inspiration is an extraordinary and supernatural influence exerted by the Holy Spirit on the minds of the sacred writers, in such words and degrees as to lead to, and secure, in documentary forms, the depositions of such historical, doctrinal and prophetic truth as Infinite wisdom deemed requisite for the immediate and future guidance of His people."

Inspiration is found in operation in the Scriptures in two modes:

(1) Immediate, without the use of external means.
(2) Mediate, by the intervention of outside agencies.

Under the first heading we place such passages and statements as II Sam. xxiii. 2, "in me", Matt. x. 20, "in you" and I Pet. i. 11, "in them".

Under the second we place those cases where a variety of means is employed.

(1) Audible and articulate sounds (as recorded in Numb. vii. 89; viii. 1 and xii. 8).
"There fell a voice" (Dan. iv. 31; Matt. iii. 17; xvii. 5; II Pet. i. 17, 18; and John xii. 28, 30).

(2) Appearance accompanying the spoken word.
We have the fire, blackness, tempest and sound of a trumpet at the giving of the law (Heb. xii. 18-21); the vision of the Seraphim in Isa. vi.; the appearing of the Lord to Paul on the road to Damascus (Acts ix. 4; xxii. 9; xxvi. 14); the appearing of angels to Abraham, to David, to Gideon and Mary, and the mediation of angels at the giving of the law at Mt. Sinai (Acts vii. 53; Gal. iii. 19; Heb. ii. 1, 2), and at the birth of Christ at Bethlehem (Luke ii. 9-14).

The inspiration of "words" (I Cor. ii. 13; John xvii. 8), as well as of the Scriptures as a whole, is stressed; indeed the testimony of the Scriptures regarding inspiration is rather to the inspired Book than inspired men, for the instruments used by God may be as holy as Moses and as wise as Daniel, or they may be as crafty as Caiaphas and as greedy as Balaam: as insensible as the hand at Belshazzar's feast, or as intangible as the phenomena at Sinai.

The whole of the O.T. Scriptures are the work of men named "Prophets". Moses was a prophet (Acts vii. 37); David was a prophet (Acts ii. 30); all who "spoke since the world began" were prophets (Luke i. 70). The O.T. Scriptures are therefore the work of prophets.

What of the N.T. writers? Peter was a prophet (II Pet. iii. 2), and Paul was a prophet (Rom. xvi. 24). N.T. prophets are greater than those who were before them (Luke vii. 28). Moreover, the apostle is always placed higher than the prophet (I Cor. xii. 28; Eph. ii. 20; iv. 11), so that if inspiration is associated with prophetic office, much more is it to be associated with the apostolic gift. The apostles spoke "as though God did beseech" by them (II Cor. v. 20). Their words were received, not as the words of men, but as the words of God (I Thess. ii. 13); the new covenant message given through the apostles is in every way "more excellent" than the old covenant message of Moses. These apostles were led into "all truth" by the Holy Ghost (John xvi. 13); and Paul asserts that the revelation of the mystery, made known by himself as the prisoner of the Lord, "completes" the word of God (Col. i. 25). Luke declares that he received perfect understanding "from above" (Luke i. 3), as the words "from the very first" should be translated, and the Book of the Revelation declares itself a prophecy, with solemn warning (Rev. i. 3; xxii. 18, 19).

We may speak of Shakespeare, of Beethoven, or of Michael Angelo as being "inspired", for their thoughts were indeed raised above the common level of mankind, but we search in vain throughout the writings of Shakespeare for such an expression as "Thus saith the Lord".

To repeat, and to conclude, we do not contend so much for the inspiration of the men, who wrote as for the fact that in what they wrote; in the Bible; we possess an inspired Book, and we would ever press upon ourselves and our hearers the fact that:

> "Men doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live" (Deut. viii. 3).

The Self-Drawn Portrait of the Apostle Paul.

#4. Earnest Indignation.
pp. 47 - 48

> "Here we see . . . . . that earnest indignation which bids his converts 'beware of dogs, beware of the concision', and pours itself forth in the emphatic 'God forbid', which meets every antinomian suggestion." (Conybeare and Howson).

The Apostle Paul could use great plainness of speech when the occasion required, and he did not hesitate when the truth was at stake, to speak of the enemies of the faith in the strongest terms. The Dictionary defines "indignation" as "extreme anger caused by a sense of injury or injustice; contemptuous hatred of what is mean or base; the action of counting or treating as unworthy of regard". The word is associated with the Latin indignari, "to regard as unworthy". Conybeare and Howson are careful to speak of the Apostle's "earnest indignation", realizing only too well that, while we are in the flesh, "wrath" and "hatred" can easily spoil our protests against evil. Nor for a moment must we countenance "railing for railing". The Apostle himself bids us to let our "moderation" be known to all men. Nevertheless, if we rule out all passion that has the flesh as its origin, there is still a place for "earnest indignation" in the make-up of the saint, and it certainly found a place in Paul's own character. The Apostle approved this holy intolerance when practiced by the Corinthians in connection with their own evils, although, at the same time, he urged them to exercise forgiveness, and love toward the repentant offender (II Cor. ii. 6-11). "Ye sorrowed after a godly sort, what carefulness it wrought in you, yea, what clearing of yourselves, yea, what indignation!" (II Cor. vii. 11). It is incumbent upon us to repudiate "anything that is unworthy", even though sorrow temper our zeal, and love lead us to help the very one whose errors we so vehemently reject. This double attitude is characteristic of the apostle Paul. It is almost impossible for us, with the two natures that belong to this present life, to "hate" without sin, and yet we read that He who was perfect "hated iniquity" (Heb. i. 9). "Indignation" is certainly right and legitimate if it is not spoilt by what is of the flesh.

We can sense a little of the Apostle's "earnest indignation" in his reply to the questioner of Rom. ix. "Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to Him that formed it, Why hast Thou made me thus?" (Rom. ix. 19, 20). Or again, when replying to the questioner of I Cor. xv. 35, 36: "Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die."

The Apostle's indignation is again apparent in I Thess. ii., where he feelingly refutes some of the charges made against him:

> "For our exhortation was not of deceit, nor of uncleanness, nor in guile; but as we were allowed of God to be put in trust with the gospel, even so we speak; not as pleasing men, but God, Which trieth our hearts. For neither at any time used we flattering words, as ye know, nor a cloke of covetousness; God is witness; nor of men sought we glory, neither of you, nor yet of others, when we might have been burdensome, as the apostles of Christ" (I Thess. ii. 3-6).

There are many occasions in the life of a servant of God when he should allow slanderous statements made against him to pass in silence. Only when the ministry entrusted to this charge is in danger of being compromised, or the glory of the Lord tarnished, is self-vindication justified. During the years that The Berean Expositor has been published, we have naturally had our share of misrepresentation, but, while "earnest indignation" has often been felt, there has seldom been any need for public refutation.

Some believers object to the A.V. translation "God forbid", and point out that the name of God is not used in the original. This is certainly true, and various alternative renderings, such as "Far be it", "Far be the thought", "No, indeed", "May it not come to that", "Certainly not", have been suggested. There is not much to choose between these various suggestions—all express the Apostle's utter repudiation and abhorrence. The R.V., however, retains the translation given in A.V. in most places, and we must confess that, much as we should deprecate using the name of God carelessly, the possible alternatives hardly seem to do justice to the indignation, unhesitating, uncompromising repudiation that the Apostle intended. We give below fourteen occurrences of the expression as used by him.

Me genoito, "God forbid" (A.V.).

"For what if some did not believe? Shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect? God forbid" (Rom. iii. 3, 4).

"If our unrighteousness commend the righteousness of God, what shall we say? Is God unrighteous Who taketh vengeance? (I speak as a man) God forbid" (Rom. iii. 5, 6).

"Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid" (Rom. iii. 31).

"What shall we then say? Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound? God forbid" (Rom. vi. 1, 2).

"What then? Shall we sin, because we are not under the law, but under grace? God forbid" (Rom. vi. 15).

"What shall we say then? Is the law sin? God forbid" (Rom. vii. 7).

"Was then that which is good made death unto me? God forbid" (Rom. vii. 13).

"What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid" (Rom. ix. 14).

"I say then, Hath God cast away His people? God forbid" (Rom. xi. 1).

"I say then, Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid" (Rom. xi. 11).

"Shall I then take the members of Christ, and make them the members of an harlot? God forbid" (I Cor. vi. 15).

"If, while we seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves also are found sinners, is therefore Christ the minister of sin? God forbid" (Gal. ii. 17).

"Is the law then against the promises of God? God forbid" (Gal. iii. 21).

"But God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Gal. vi. 14).

These fourteen repudiations throw a wonderful light upon the spiritual portrait of the Apostle. If the reader will ponder these passage, he will understand a little of our own feelings of "earnest indignation" at some recent attempts to shift human responsibility and make Christ "the minister of sin".

The fourteen references group themselves as follows:

Faith without effect? \
Unrighteous who taketh vengeance? } The dealings of God.
Void by faith? /

Continue in sin? \
Shall we sin? \ The saint's relation
Is the law sin? / to sin and law.
Was good made death? /

Unrighteousness because hate? \
Cast away His people? } The dealings of God.
Stumbled that they fall? /

Members of an harlot? \
Christ the minister of sin? \ The saint's relation Law against promises? / to sin in the flesh,
Cross and the world? / the world, and law.

#5. His Fervid Patriotism.
pp. 179 - 181

"Here we see . . . . . that fervid patriotism which makes him 'wish that he were himself accursed from Christ for his brethren, his kinsmen according to the flesh, who are Israelites." (Conybeare and Howson).

It was Nurse Cavell, whose patriotism was sealed with her life's blood, who was responsible for the famous words: "Patriotism is not enough." If it is untempered and unguided, patriotism may lead to injustice, blindness, narrowness, and many other excesses. For the Christian to-day who confesses himself a pilgrim and a stranger, patriotism needs purging before it can be used with a good conscience. In Paul's case, however, no scruples concerning other-worldliness and the common relationship of all men would arise. Israel were a chosen people, and their law a chosen law. Their city was destined to be the hub of the earth, and their priestly kingdom was designed for the blessing of all nations. On the other hand, it was true that the Jews as a whole had allowed their patriotism to degenerate. They hugged to themselves their descent from Abraham as though it were an exclusive privilege, and forgot the connected fact that they were thus chosen so that all families of the earth through them should be blessed. Not so, however, the Apostle to the Gentiles. In the very heart of his epistle to the Romans and with the blessing of the Gentiles in view, he says that his heart's desire for Israel was "that they might be saved".

In our exposition of Rom. ix. (Volume XXVII, page 157) we have discussed the Apostle's intention when he used the words: "I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ" (Rom. ix. 3). Whatever his meaning may have been—whether he really meant that in the spirit of Christ's great sacrifice he would even be willing to suffer eternal reprobation for Israel's sake, or whether he fully understood and sympathized with Israel's rejection of their Messiah, because he himself had in ignorance blasphemed that same Name—whatever may be the true interpretation, one thing is abundantly evident, and that is his most intense longing for Israel's salvation, and his keen realization of the wonderful privileges that belonged to them (see verses 4 and 5).

At the close of the dispensational section of Romans (xi. 26-36), the Apostle rejoices in that glorious future day when "all Israel shall be saved", and in verse 33 he speaks of the "depths of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God". This is indeed true patriotism—desiring the very best for one's own people.

The word "patriotism" is derived from pater, "father". At one time Saul of Tarsus was an "exceeding zealot" for the traditions of his fathers (Gal. i. 14)—a patriotism that was Pharisaic, blind and bigoted. This, however, he had now cast aside with all his self-centred hopes as an Israelite (Phil. iii. 7, 8), and had found a new patria, "the whole family in heaven and earth" (Eph. iii. 15)—and in particular that section of it whose sphere of blessing is far above principalities and powers. At the same time he realized that his kinsmen according to the flesh would one day, by grace, form a part of the patria that would fill earth as well as heaven with the redeemed of Israel and the nations. The "fervid patriotism" of Gal. i. 14 and Acts ix. 1 had been translated into higher and more spiritual terms, and the Apostle found that he could still desire the best for his kinsmen according to the flesh, while at the same time rejoicing in that ministry which set aside the distinction between "Jew and Greek", and made them "all one in Christ Jesus".

There was no possibility of Paul ever falling into the snare that has entrapped many to-day. Only recently, in the correspondence columns of a Christian journal, one writer has been seeking to prove that the blessings forfeited by Israel have been transferred to the Church. This is a suggestion that the Apostle would have been the first to repudiate as he does, in effect, with his "God forbid" in Rom. xi. 11.

As Gal. iii. 28, 29 was written some year or two before Rom. ix., it is clear that the higher spiritual teaching entrusted to Paul did not in anyway alter the gifts and calling of God concerning Israel. Since Acts xxviii., however, the "Lo-ammi" condition of Israel has altered the face of things considerably, and the insistence upon the "Jew first" as found in Romans and the Acts is no longer dispensational. Nevertheless it remains true that no one who loves the Scripture written by Israel's prophets, evangelists and apostles, no one who is saved by the precious blood of the Messiah of Israel, no one who realizes that that one blessed Name is over the whole patria of God whether on earth or in heaven (Eph. iii. 15), but will feel in some degree that same "patriotism" that is so marked a feature in the Apostle's self-drawn portrait.

#6. Separate Features. Generosity.
pp. 218 - 220

> "Here we see . . . . . that generosity which looked for no other reward than 'to preach the glad tidings of Christ' without charge, and made him feel that he would rather die 'than that any man should make this glorying void'." (Conybeare and Howson).

The word "generous" comes from genus, stock or race, and its first meaning is, "Of noble lineage; high born" and it is so used by Shakespeare, "Most generous Sir", where we would say "High born" or "Noble". The meaning "liberal in giving" is secondary but in modern usage has come to the fore.

In Hamlet Shakespeare makes play upon this connection between genus and generosity. When the king, who has murdered his own brother and married his brother's widow, addresses Hamlet, the murdered king's son, with the words: "But now, my cousin Hamlet, and my son", Shakespeare, playing upon the double meaning of the word "kind", makes Hamlet interject, as an aside, "A little more than kin, and less than kind".

Generosity serves out of love; it is disinterested; it is chivalrous; it scorns the hireling's motive. This quality is well-marked in the portrait of the Apostle. He might have been burdensome as an apostle, yet, he acted rather as a nursing mother (I Thess. ii. 6, 7), a figure which earth's store of language cannot surpass as a type of self-forgetting, free-giving, love. Writing to the Corinthians the Apostle said:--

> "Have I committed an offence in abasing myself that ye might be exalted, because I have preached to you the gospel of God freely? I robbed other churches, taking wages of them, to do you service . . . . . Wherefore? because I love you not? God knoweth" (II Cor. xi. 7-11).

Generosity is not manifested only, or even chiefly, in the sphere of finance. Nothing could be more generous than the Apostle's attitude to the churches, whose divisions, whose failings, and whose cares, were such a burden upon his heart. It is characteristic of the opening of his epistles that he gives thanks for some spiritual quality evident among those addressed, even though he finds it necessary to follow with severe censure, as in I Cor. i. The complete absence of such commendation in Gal. i. is therefore the more striking. The white heat of his concern for the Galatians and his indignation at the inroads of the Judaizers, brooked no delay, not even for courtesy or for generosity. Yet, if generosity is associated with one's genus or kind, surely the kindest thing that Paul could do was, without truce or parley, to smite to the ground, that which threatened the free men of God with the chains and fetters of bondage.

Paul's generosity is again manifested in his word to the Philippians:--

> "If there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, reckon these things" (Phil. iv. 8).

It is the first of that blessed series of statements made about Christian love in I Cor. xiii.: "Love suffereth long, and is kind." Generosity springs out of the very salvation we have received.

> "Be ye kind one to another, tender hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you" (Eph. iv. 32).
> "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ" (Gal. vi. 2).

Chrestotes, "kindness", "gentleness", "goodness", as it is translated, is found only in the writings of Paul. Haplotes, translated "liberality" and "bountifulness", is also found only in Paul's epistles.

The world has a proverb, however, that it will be well to remember: "A man must be just before he is generous." There is a so-called generosity that plays havoc with truth. To this the Apostle was a stranger. He would willingly surrender his own rights. He would gladly abstain from eating this, or drinking that; he would become a Jew that he might win the Jew; he would be as one without law to win the Gentile; he could be made all things to all men, that by all means he might save some (I Cor. ix. 22). But, any who misinterpreted this generous latitude for slackness in stewardship were profoundly surprised when they discovered that, contrary to the opinion they had formed, the pliant flexibility of the Apostle's character was like that of the finest steel, for while he was willing to concede all the non-essentials to a degree that called down on his devoted head the judgment of partisan and pedant, not one atom of the sacred trust that had been committed to him would he yield, no, not for all the "somebodies" and "somewhats" at Jerusalem.

This is true generosity, all else is marred by the presence of indifference, of low ideas of stewardship, or of cowardice. The Apostle's own interpretation of generosity, is "first give yourselves" (II Cor. viii. 5), and this he did, saying, so truly:

> "I will very gladly spend and be spent for you, though the more abundantly I love you, the less I be loved" (II Cor. xii. 15).

Three Spheres of Blessing.

(Being a series of articles in which proof is given from the Scriptures as to the existence, and the distinctive character, of three spheres of blessing; together with an examination of the terms used in Scripture to define these spheres, and an exhaustive analysis of controverted items, with a view to establishing the believer, and lifting these questions, once and for all, above the possibility of legitimate objection).

#1. Far above all.

pp. 75 - 79

The following articles were written several years ago, after an attack had been made upon THE BEREAN EXPOSITOR concerning its teaching on the subject of "The three spheres of blessing". At the time, however, we had so much positive teaching to give and, as always, the space at our disposal was so restricted, that the attack was allowed to pass without comment and, though written, the articles were not printed.

Recently some of our readers will have seen a revival of this attack, in which many of the arguments of the earlier critic are repeated. In the circumstances, continued silence on our part may be misconstrued, and as we have a moral responsibility to do all we can to preserve those who have seen the truth from being spoiled by fallacious arguments, we feel constrained to publish at this later date the previously prepared articles dealing with the subject.

One of the items particularly stressed by the critics is the interpretation of the Greek word huperano, which is rendered "far above" in the A.V. of Eph. i. 21. We draw the reader's attention to the fact that in the articles now published the doctrine of the three spheres is established before the word huperano is considered, and that whatever the accepted interpretation of this word may be, it does not affect the doctrine in question.

With fellow-believers or with fellow-workers we must not strive, but while we have the example of the Apostle Paul before us it becomes impossible to see the truth wrested and misrepresented without accepting the challenge to contend earnestly for the faith.

Writing to the Philippians, the Apostle said: "To write the same things to you, to me indeed is not grievous, but for you it is safe" (Phil. iii. 1), and in another context, he wrote to the Thessalonians: "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good" (I Thess. v. 21).

We have on several occasions expatiated on the exalted sphere of the church of the present dispensation, and to put pen to paper once again in the interest of that high calling is indeed by no means "grievous", the more so as the truth concerning it is repeatedly challenged. In dealing with this subject we shall assume nothing as true until every point has been proved from scripture. We shall "prove all things", and then, against all opposition, endeavour to "hold fast that which is good". This being the intention, progress must necessarily be "slow" to be "sure"; we shall have to cover ground already traversed, and "prove" many a point about which we have ourselves no doubt. But the cause of truth demands our utmost, and the establishment of fellow-members can only be "in the faith". If, therefore, the labour be sometime tedious, the goal is glorious, and so, as we have already quoted, to us who write, such reiteration will not be "grievous", and for those who read we believe it will be "safe".

Not only has the claim that "three" spheres of blessing are revealed in the Scriptures been challenged, but even the employment of the English word "sphere" has been questioned. For anyone whose mother tongue is English, to question the propriety of this usage of "sphere" sounds the reverse of true criticism. It seems to result from either lack of knowledge, or an attempt to utilize a specious argument for the sake of victory rather than for the love of truth. Perhaps we should be justified in dismissing such an objection, but as our endeavour is to prove all things we waive the point, and give the judgment of the Oxford English Dictionary. After defining the primary meaning of a sphere, the Dictionary proceeds to its figurative use, thus:

> "A province or domain in which one's activities or faculties find scope or exercise, or within which they are naturally confined; range or compass of action or study 1606. The whole province, domain or range of some quality or activity 1602."

When, therefore, we use the term "spheres" of blessing we use a word that has the highest sanction, and can well afford to ignore our would-be mentor.

For the sake of the truth we restate our theme thus: "There are three distinct provinces within which the distinctive blessings of the various callings revealed in Scripture are naturally confined." In order to avoid circumlocution we adopt the word "sphere" to express this fact.

As this item has been established beyond the possibility of denial, so we intend to establish every other item, and ask the reader to keep check upon our procedure and its results.

Preparatively, let us settle another point. A phrase or an expression may not be "scripture", yet it may be "scriptural", but, because the distinction between these two terms is not clearly understood, the unwary may be impressed by the statement that a particular expression is not "scriptural".

Now because the term "sphere" does not occur in the Scriptures, is it therefore unscriptural? According to the Oxford Dictionary, the word "scriptural" is anything "based upon, derived from, or depending upon Holy Scripture". Because , therefore, an English word does not appear in Holy Scripture, such word need not be unscriptural; it could only rightly be called unscriptural if the idea contained in the term was not based upon, derived from, or depending upon Holy Scripture. Therefore, to say, regarding the use of the term "sphere": "As it is not an inspired term we have no means of fixing its force"; seems either to manifest ignorance of the English language or to be an effort unduly to influence the unwary. In either case the matter is no loner disputable, for the use of the term "sphere of blessing" has been proved to be both good English and scriptural.

Our next step is to enumerate, in scriptural terms, the actual "spheres of blessing" that are spoken of in the Scriptures, and then to compare and contrast them so that by trying the things that differ we may avoid confusion and keep each calling in its appointed place. Let us begin with our own calling as revealed in the Epistle to the Ephesians.

> "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ" (Eph. i. 3).

At the moment we are not concerned with the kind of blessings here set forth, namely, "all spiritual", but with the "province", "range" or "domain" in which these blessings naturally find their setting, and we have but to record:

(1) The sphere of blessing found in Eph. i. 3 is defined as "in heavenly places".

Again we are not yet concerned as to whether these "heavenly places" are no higher than the firmament in which birds fly; whether they denote the starry heavens; or whether they refer to a position far above all. All that we are immediately concerned with is that a distinct "sphere" is indicated by the words "in heavenly places".

We now turn to another part of the N.T., where we read of another sphere of blessing: "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth" (Matt. v. 5). Once more, we are not concerned with the character of those here referred to, nor with their inheritance, but exclusively with the "sphere" of their inheritance, and we therefore record:

(2) A sphere of blessing is found in Matt. v. 5, which is defined as "the earth".

We assume, but have not yet proved, that "the earth" and "heavenly places" are two distinct spheres. Common sense says that they are distinct, but we leave the proof until later.

Here, then, are two spheres of blessing concerning which there is no controversy. But, in addition to these two, we discover what appears to be an intermediate sphere of blessing, a sphere above "the earth", yet not "in heavenly places". For this we turn to Gal. iii. 14: "That the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ." The question which now arises is, Does this passage refer to a distinct sphere of blessing, or is this blessing of Abraham to be enjoyed in one or other of the two spheres already considered? A complete answer can only be given after careful examination, but for the sake of consciseness, and to bring our first study to a conclusion, we note that in this calling, "there is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female, for ye are all one in Christ Jesus" (Gal. iii. 28).

This unity does not sound like the constitution of a kingdom, which is what is in view in Matt. v. Rather it so resembles the later revelation of Ephesians that some have adopted the expression "All one in Christ Jesus" with the idea that it declares the Unity of the spirit of Eph. iv. Before seeing the proofs, most, if not all, will agree that Gal. iii. 14 does not refer to an inheritance on the "earth". Yet when we read on to Gal. iii. 29, we are prevented from asserting that it belongs to the sphere of the mystery made known in Ephesians, for we find it stated: "and if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise."

So entirely contrary is it to the scriptural teaching concerning the mystery to make it a fulfillment of any promise to Abraham that we must hesitate to place this company, which is Abraham's seed, "in heavenly places". We therefore search further in this epistle, and in the fourth chapter we find the following statement: "But Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all . . . . . now we, brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of promise" (Gal. iv. 26, 28). "Jerusalem which is above", is neither on "the earth" nor "in heavenly places far above all principality", and as this city forms the theme of Heb. xi. 9-16 and xii. 18-23, where the "heavenly country" is contrasted with the "earth", we are obliged to record a third sphere of blessing:

(3) A third sphere of blessing, differing from that of Eph. i. 3 and that of Matt. v. 5 is recorded in the Epistles to the Galatians and the Hebrews, and is associated with the heavenly Jerusalem, a sphere distinct on the one hand from the earth and its kingdom, and on the other hand from the heavenly places which are the sphere of the church of the mystery.

Our further studies must be directed to a fuller explanation of the distinctions that Scripture makes between these three spheres, and an examination of what is intended by such expressions as "in heavenly places", and "far above all", but no doubt can be entertained as to the existence in Scripture of these separate callings and their corresponding spheres.

THE THREE SPHERES OF BLESSING.

(1)	"The Earth" . . .	(Matt. v. 5) . . .	The Kingdom.
(2)	"Jerusalem which is above" . . .	(Gal. iii., iv.) . . .	The Bride.
(3)	"In heavenly places" . . .	(Eph. i. 3) . . .	The Body.

#2. Earth.
pp. 92 - 96

In our opening article (pages 75-79) we established the fact that Scripture speaks of three distinct spheres of blessing but left unexamined the terms used to define them. To this we now address ourselves and begin at the lowest, the one with which we are all familiar, "The earth". In the near context of Matt. v. 5, which speaks of the meek who shall inherit the earth, we learn of a kingdom which is yet to be set up on the earth: "Thy Kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven." (Matt. vi. 10). In that prophecy of His second coming, The Revelation, one of the titles of the Lord is: "The Prince of the Kings of the earth" (Rev. i. 5). The extent of this kingdom is defined in Psalm lxxii.: "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth." And again in Psalm ii. 8: "Ask of Me and I will give Thee the heathen, Thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth, Thy possession." Yet again, the prophet Zechariah says:

> "He shall speak peace unto the heathen: and His dominion shall be from sea even to sea, and from the river even to the ends of the earth" (Zech. ix. 10).

Moreover, in The Revelation we read:

> "The seventh angel sounded: and there were great voices in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of His Christ: and He shall reign for ever and ever" (Rev. xi. 15).

This kingdom on the earth will have an administrative centre:

> "And it shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow unto it. And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us His ways, and we will walk in His paths: for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem" (Isa. ii. 3).

This is supplemented by Zechariah the prophet:

> "And it shall come to pass, that every one that is left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem shall even go up from year to year to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, and to keep the feast of tabernacles. And it shall be that whoso will not come up of all the families of the earth unto Jerusalem to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, even upon them shall be no rain" (Zech. xiv. 16, 17).

It will be seen by the two later references from Isaiah and Zechariah that not only is the city of Jerusalem represented as the capital of the kingdom, but also as the centre of worship, and this is in harmony with the destiny of Israel, when that nation is at length saved, for Israel is to be a kingdom of priests unto God (Rev. i. 6). They will be made so under the New Covenant and the blood of Christ, in fulfillment of the original purpose of God expressed at the foot of Mount Sinai but, by reason of the weakness of the flesh, rendered impossible of accomplishment under the law (Exod. xix. 6).

Inasmuch as the bulk of Scripture is taken up with the history and prophecy of this earthly people and kingdom, no attempt on our part, particularly considering the limitations of our space, can possible do more than indicate the fact of its existence. There is, however, unanimity among most believers regarding this first, or lowest, sphere of blessing, and while we shall have to return to the subject, when certain of its features will be compared with those of other spheres, we now pass on to the consideration of the next sphere, having left nothing unproved or resting upon mere assumption. Therefore we feel that we can safely make this statement:

> The earth will be a sphere of blessing in which there shall be set up a kingdom, over which the Lord shall be King, with Jerusalem the chosen centre, and Israel a Kingdom of Priests. This we will call the First Sphere.

We come now to the second sphere; that which is associated with the heavenly Jerusalem, and it must be recorded a fact of importance, that no hint of such a sphere is to be found in the whole of the Old Testament. Yet when we study the New Testament we learn that its existence was intimately known by Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. For this information we turn to the Epistle to the Hebrews.

In Heb. xi. the Apostle illustrates the statement that "Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen", by the examples of Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Coming to the example of the patriarchs, the Apostle pauses to add:

> "By faith he (Abraham) sojourned in the land of promise as in a strange land, dwelling in tabernacles (tents) with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise. For he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose Builder and Maker is God" (Heb. xi. 9, 10).

After speaking of Sarah's faith, the Apostle reverts to the subject of this city, saying:

> "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. For they that say such things declare plainly that they seek a country. And truly, if they had been mindful of that country from whence they came out, they might have had opportunity to have returned. But now they desire a better country, that is a heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God; for He hath prepared for them a city" (Heb. xi. 9-16).

After a further and fuller expansion of the theme of Heb. xi. 1 the Apostle returns to the subject of the heavenly city in chapter xii., but approaches it from another angle. We reserve comment upon the significance of this new angle until we have established the fact of the revelation of all three spheres, and meantime pass on to verse 22:

> "But ye are come unto Mount Sion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly and church of the firstborn, which are written in heaven" (Heb. xii. 22, 23).

Other references to this sphere of blessing are found in The Revelation:

> "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of My God, and he shall go no more out: and I will write upon him the name of My God, and the name of the city of My God, which is new Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from My God: and I will write upon him My new name' (Rev. iii. 12).

The significance of the fact that this is associated with the overcomer, together with the similar significance of the context of Heb. xii., will be considered when we come to deal with the subject of the spheres themselves: at present we confine ourselves to establishing the fact that the Scriptures speak of such spheres:

> "And I, John, saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband" (Rev. xxi. 2).
> "He carried me away in the spirit to a great and high mountain, and shewed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God" (Rev. xxi. 10).

The testimony of Heb. xi. 16 alone is sufficient proof that this heavenly city is a separate sphere of blessing from that of the earth, and while much must yet be studied if we would appreciate its true significance, we can, without hesitation, affirm that there is full scriptural testimony to the existence of this second sphere of blessing.

Granting that these two spheres of blessing are actual, scriptural, facts, the question that now awaits an answer is: Do they exhaust the teaching of Scripture on the subject? In other words, is there a third sphere of blessing distinct from both the earth and the heavenly city? We believe there is, and proceed at once to state the evidence for this belief.

The Epistle to the Ephesians was written by Paul as "the prisoner of Jesus Christ" (Eph. iii. 1). Israel, as a nation, had been set aside by the quoting of Isa. vi. 10, as recorded in Acts xxviii., and with that setting aside had of necessity gone the hope and the blessings of which they were the appointed channel. While Israel remained as a nation before God, the Gentile believer could be "blessed with faithful Abraham" (Gal. iii. 9); could be associated with Israel under the New Covenant (II Cor. iii. 6); could entertained the hope of Israel (Rom. xv. 12, 13); and "partake of the root and fatness of the olive tree" (Rom. xi. 17); but, with Israel set aside, there arose the necessity of a further revelation from God—if all was not to be plunged into confusion and end in despair. This revelation is claimed by Paul in the Epistle to the Ephesians:

> "If ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given to me to you-ward (Gentiles): How that by revelation He made known unto me the mystery" (Eph. iii. 3).

This mystery has particular reference to the new position assigned to the Gentiles:

> "That the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of His promise in Christ, by the gospel, whereof I was made a minister" (Eph. iii. 6, 7).

Here we have a "dispensation" which was particularly concerned with the Gentiles; a "revelation" that makes known that which was a "mystery", and that, hitherto, this mystery had been "hid in God" (Eph. iii. 9). And not only was it "hid in God", but "from the ages and from the generations, though now made manifest to His saints" (Col. i. 26).

In order that no statement shall be accepted as true that is not proved from the Scriptures, we pause to justify the remark that "the dispensation of the mystery was revealed after the setting aside of Israel". Usually it is enough to produce the missing link in a chain, but, if the play of words may be pardoned, we have a complete chain of evidence, and that none other than the one which fettered the Apostle Paul in his Roman prison.

Until the all-day conference with the leaders of the Jews, which concluded with their dismissal at the quoting of Isa. vi., there was the human possibility of the national repentance of Israel, and the realization of that nation's hope. Consequently, the Apostle rightly says in Acts xxviii. 20: "For the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain." When next he speaks of his bonds as his chain, the dispensation of the mystery had been entrusted to him, and in Eph. iii., iv. & vi., and Col. iv., his chain is most intimately associated with the mystery.

While there is much more to be said concerning the unique character of this new revelation, enough has been adduced to prove beyond dispute that this dispensation of the mystery, revealed after the setting aside of Israel, must be different from both the earthly sphere, and the new Jerusalem, and as we have seen that these latter terms represent two very distinct spheres, we are compelled to subscribe to the doctrine of three spheres of blessing, thus:--

(1)	FIRST SPHERE . . .	The Earth.—Subject of O.T. and part of N.T. Israel dominant.
(2)	SECOND SPHERE . . .	New Jerusalem.—Subject only of part of the N.T. Both Jew and Gentile as seed of Abraham.
(3)	THIRD SPHERE . . .	The Mystery.—Subject of the "prison" epistles only. Gentiles especially.

We do not see how it is possible to deny that there is reference, in the Scriptures, to these three spheres—unless we confuse either the New Jerusalem with the earthly sphere or the mystery with the New Jerusalem. As this is impossible, if we are to keep both our faith and our reason, we believe that every unprejudiced reader must be convinced that there is recorded in the Scriptures three spheres of blessing.

#3. Adoption.
pp. 106 - 112

In the two preceding articles has been demonstrated the fact that the Scriptures make known three distinct spheres of blessing, namely, the earth, the New Jerusalem, and the heavenly places of Eph. i. 3. As yet we have said nothing concerning the controversial question of the correct interpretation of the words translated "heavenly places" and "far above all". Those are adjuncts to the teaching; not the foundation on which the teaching rests. The reader is especially asked to note that we prove the fact of the three spheres of blessing independently of any disputed translation, finding all we need to demonstrate the truth of our position in either the A.V. or the R.V. This, we believe, renders that position invulnerable.

We now approach a secondary means of proof, that does depend somewhat upon the true translation of a Greek word. This may be rejected by some, but that will still leave the main argument of articles #1 and #2 exactly as it was, and unchallenged.

In order to enable the reader to appreciate the line of argument we intend to follow, let us use an illustration. Suppose we were to point out an elderly man and say, "There goes a man who has three firstborn sons"; the reader might at first exclaim, "Impossible!" yet on second thoughts, he might reply, "Yes, I see it is quite possible for the man to have three firstborn sons, for he may have married three times, but he can only have three firstborn sons provided that they are the firstborn of three distinct families". We hope to prove that God has three distinct companies of the redeemed who have the dignity and privilege of being His firstborn, and that these three firstborn sons are given an exalted position in each of the three spheres of the earth, the New Jerusalem, and the Mystery.

The word which supplies this argument is translated in our version "adoption", and our first duty will be to arrive at the scriptural meaning of this term. Except we perceive the meaning of a scriptural term, not only will it be valueless but possibly harmful, that is if we invest it with our own conception of its meaning. Sometimes etymology of a word establishes its meaning; often it needs an understanding of its usage in Scripture, and, sometimes, a knowledge of the way in which the word was used in secular writings contemporary with the Scriptures concerned. This is very true of the word under consideration, namely "adoption". The Greek word is huiothesia, and means, literally, "to place a son". No modern writer has greater firsthand knowledge of this term than Sir William Ramsay, and in order to acquaint ourselves with its usage in Galatia, we will first of all quote from Sir William Ramsay's A Historical Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians:

> "The idea that they who follow the principle of faith are sons of Abraham, whatever family they belong to by nature, would certainly be understood by the Galatians as referring to the legal process called adoption, huiothesia."
>
> "Adoption was a kind of embryo will; the adopted son became the owner of the property, and the property could pass to a person that was naturally outside the family

only through his being adopted. The adoption was a sort of Will-making; and this ancient form of Will was irrevocable and public. The terms 'Son' and 'Heir' are interchangeable."

"An illustration from the ordinary fact of society, as it existed in the Galatian cities, is here stated: 'I speak after the manner of men.' The Will (diatheke) of a human being is irrevocable when once duly executed. But if Paul is speaking about a Will, how can he say, after it is once made, it is irrevocable?"

"Such irrevocability was a characteristic feature of Greek law, according to which an heir outside the family must be adopted into the family; and the adoption was the Will-making. The testator, after adopting his heir, could not subsequently take away from him his share of the inheritance or impose new conditions on his succession. The Roman-Syrian Law Book will illustrate this passage of the Epistle. It actually lays down the principle that a man can never put away an adopted son, and that he cannot put away a real son without good ground. It is remarkable that the adopted son should have a stronger position than the son by birth; yet it is so. The expression in Gal. iii., verse 15, 'When it hath been confirmed' must also be observed. Every Will had to be passed through the Record Office of the city. It was not regarded in the Greek law as a purely private document. It must be deposited in the Record Office."

Here it will be seen that one may be "adopted", or made the heir, without being at the same time a true child, but in the case of the Scriptural usage of adoption there is no idea that the believer is only an "adopted" child, for the testimony of the Word is explicit on the point, making clear that adoption is something added:

"The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are the children of God" (Rom. viii. 16).

The argument of Gal. iv. 1-7 proceeds upon the supposition that there is a difference between a "child" (Gal. iv. 1-2), and one who has received the "adoption" (Gal. iv. 5). "If a son, then an heir of God through Christ" (Gal. iv. 7). That "adoption" is related to "inheritance" we can see by examining Eph. i. There we find the word "predestinate" used twice, once in verse 5, where it is "unto adoption", and again in verse 11, where it refers to "inheritance".

Let us now observe the way in which this important word is used in connection with three different companies of the redeemed.

In Rom. ix. the Apostle enumerates the distinctive and exclusive privileges of Israel "according to the flesh", "Who are Israelites; to whom pertaineth the adoption" (Rom. ix. 4). The structure of the passage relates "adoption" with "promises" and the whole is important enough to claim our attention before passing on. Accordingly we set out the structure.

A | According to the flesh, Brethren.
B | Who are Israelites.
C | To whom pertaineth the ADOPTION.
D | And the glory.
E | And the covenants.
E | And the giving of the law.
D | And the service of God.
C | And the PROMISES.
B | Whose are the fathers.
A | As concerning the flesh, Christ came.

No one who has any understanding at all can interpret "Israel" and "according to the flesh" as of the Church, or of that company where there is "neither Jew nor Greek" (Gal. iii. 28).

When Israel were about be brought out of Egypt, God called the nation His "firstborn" saying, "Israel is My son, even My firstborn" (Exod. iv. 22).

Attached to this position is a citizenship, the city being Jerusalem, which is destined to be the centre of the earth when the Kingdom is set up. This we have already seen in our second article, and we need now do no more than quote the references (Isa. ii. 3; Zech. xiv. 16, 17). One item, however, we did not emphasize, and it must now be given due prominence. It is obvious that if one nation is to be granted pre-eminence, the others must be subservient, and one of the accompaniments of the privilege of adoption, which we find true of each sphere, is the grant of pre-eminence over other companies in the same sphere.

> "The nation and the kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish; yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted" (Isa. lx. 12).
>
> "Strangers shall stand and feed your flocks and the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vinedressers; but ye shall be named the Priests of the Lord: men shall call you the Ministers of our God" (Isa. lxi. 5, 6).

We shall find that the following features are inseparable from adoption as used in the Scriptures.

(1) The appointing of the heir.
(2) The dignity of the first-born.
(3) The close association of a citizenship.
(4) Some special pre-eminence over other companies in the same sphere.

Let us put this to the test by turning to the Scriptures that speak of the second sphere. We have already given proof that Gal. iii. 28, 29 cannot refer to "Israel according to the flesh", and that the company here in view is associated with the New Jerusalem (Gal. iv. 26). Nevertheless, although Rom. ix. categorically declares that to Israel according to the flesh pertaineth "the adoption", this new company, where there is neither Jew nor Greek, and where the "flesh" is excluded, has this privilege also, "That we might receive the adoption of sons" (Gal. iv. 5).

We turn therefore to Heb. xii., which speaks of the second sphere of blessing, for light upon this question of adoption. The first part of Heb. xii. treats of that which is common to all children (verses 5-14), and then passes to that which relates particularly to the firstborn son; in other words, the adoption.

As we are intent on proving every statement before proceeding, we acknowledge that the actual word "adoption" does not occur in Heb. xii. Gal. iii. and iv., however, have made it clear that those who claim "Jerusalem that is above" have the "adoption", and until Euclid's maxim can be disproved that "Things which are equal to the same thing are equal to one another", the logical association of Galatians and Heb. xii. must be acknowledged.

Having made the admission that huiothesia is absent from Heb. xii., we must, with equal justice and regard for truth, assert that the ideas of birthright and firstborn are insisted upon, and that the same argument, namely, the allegorical use of Sinai and Sion, which we find in Gal. iv. 22-31, is introduced in much the same way in Heb. xii. It will help if we observe the structure of the passage.

Hebrews xii. 15 - 25.

A | 15. | a | Looking diligently.
b | Lest any man fall back.
B | 16, 17. The birthright bartered (prototokia).
C | 18-21. Ye are not come. Six "ands". SINAI.
C | 22, 23. But ye are come. Seven "ands". SION.
B | 23, 24. The birthright enjoyed (prototokos).
A | 25. | a | See.
b | Lest ye refuse.

Esau despised his birthright (prototokia). In the heavenly Jerusalem that birthright is to be enjoyed (firstborn, prototokos). Here, therefore, we have the adoption in the second sphere.

We come now to the prerogative of adoption, namely, some form of ascendancy or pre-eminence. We shall not expect to find nations subservient to those who have this exalted position, at least not until the New Jerusalem descends from heaven to earth. In this second sphere we have an innumerable company of angels (Heb. xii. 22), and angels are "ministering spirits" who minister to the "heirs" of salvation. Both Peter and Paul, when speaking of the ascended Christ, speak of "principalities and powers" being subject to Him, but Peter adds "angels", a word entirely out of place in the third sphere of Eph. i. 19-21 and Col. i. & ii. In Heb. iii. 1 those who have position and privilege in the heavenly city are called "partakers of the heavenly calling". This is the second sphere.

But adoption is used once more, and for this third usage we must turn to Eph. i. 5, "Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to Himself". In case any should think that there is a difference between "adoption", "adoption of children" and "adoption of sons" we would draw attention to the fact that the difference is found only in the English version: the Greek word itself is the same in every case.

If we found it impossible to confuse the company who have the adoption in Rom. ix. with those who have in Gal. iii., iv. and Heb. iii. 1 & xii., much more shall we find it impossible to confuse the high and holy calling that goes back before the foundation of the world, and leads up to where Christ sits at the right hand of God, and which was a mystery hid in God until revealed to the apostle Paul as the prisoner of Jesus Christ for us Gentiles, with either of these two spheres. This third sphere of blessing belongs to the dispensation of the Mystery. It has no connection with the promises made to the fathers or with any covenant, old or new.

Once again, we pause. We have been reminded that there is a covenant in the Scriptures that was made before Abraham, namely, the covenant made by God with Noah, but whoever thinks that this covenant was made with an elect people needs to read the Scriptures for himself, where he will find that it belongs to all mankind and so does not come into the argument at all. They who snatch at such irrelevant items must be destitute of sound reasons for their claims, and will only mislead those possessed of but the smallest knowledge of the Scriptures, or who virtually wish to be thus persuaded.

This high calling of the mystery has its citizenship.

> "Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints and of the household of God" (Eph. ii. 19).

The citizenship of Israel is not in view here, neither is the citizenship of the New Jerusalem, for this citizenship belongs to a sphere where Christ sits at the right hand of God. This church is not actually called "The Firstborn", but as it forms the very body of Christ, Who is revealed in Col. i. as both Firstborn of all creation and Firstborn of the dead, it amounts to the same thing. If, by virtue of the adoption, Israel has pre-eminence over the nations, and if those whose sphere is the New Jerusalem have pre-eminence over angels ("know ye not that we", the saints of the second sphere, the church during the Acts period, "shall judge angels"?) (I Cor. vi. 3), then, by the analogy of faith, we shall expect that those who have the adoption and citizenship in the highest sphere of all, will have a corresponding pre-eminence. This indeed is the case for, in His capacity as Head of the Church, which is His body (Eph. i. 23), the ascended Christ is said to be set and the Church is said to be "seated together in the heavenlies in Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 6). In this exalted sphere, neither nation nor angel is mentioned, but only the spiritual rulers of glory. This is adoption indeed!

> "at His Own right hand in the heavenly places, far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named" (Eph. i. 20, 21).

There is only one way in which the argument of this article can be overthrown, and that is by showing that the Scriptures do not use the word "adoption" with intention and with discrimination; or that Rom. ix., Heb. xii. and Eph. i. do not refer to three distinct companies of believers.

This, however, would not only overthrow our argument, it would make all similar argument a waste of time, for, to achieve its end, it would overthrow the doctrine of inspiration itself. For the sake of clearness, let us recapitulate:

There are three spheres of blessing set out in the Scriptures, each sphere being clearly marked off from the other, yet repeating, within its own domain, similar features, such as citizenship, pre-eminence, and adoption. These three spheres have been proved, by more lines of teaching than one, to be,

(1)	The EARTH.—Israel.	Kingdom.
(2)	The NEW JERUSALEM.—Abraham's seed.	Heavenly calling.
(3)	The MYSTERY.—The Church which is His body.	In heavenly places.

In the subsequent articles we must concentrate our attention upon some of the statements used in the Scriptures to define the peculiar sphere of the mystery, consider some objections that have been raised, and give attention to one feature, pertaining to the second sphere, to which allusion has not yet been made.

#4. Earth.
pp. 120 - 122

In the three previous articles we have placed before the reader Scriptural grounds for believing that there are "three spheres of blessing". We must now examine each sphere more closely. In the present article we shall be dealing principally with the important contribution made by the earthly sphere to the true understanding of the words epouranios ("heavenly"), and huperano ("far above"), but before we come to this, we must draw attention to a feature that is common to each of these three spheres, namely, that each one in its own way and degree sets forth the NEW CREATION. This fact has been used, like many other doctrines, to oppose the truth on the basis of the mistaken idea that only one company can be so intimately associated with that glorious future. When Israel enter into their inheritance, they will occupy the promised land, with the subservient nations occupying their respective territories in harmony with the Divine plan foreshadowed in the law:

> "When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when He separated the sons of Adam, He set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel" (Deut. xxxii. 8).

The nations will not only learn the law of the Lord from Jerusalem, but will see before their eyes a marvelous foreshadowing of the New Creation, towards which both law and gospel ultimately point.

> "For behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not remembered, nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create: for behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy" (Isa. lxv. 17, 18).

The student of prophecy will realize at once that to put the New Creation into the Millennial kingdom would be to disregard the injunction of II Tim. ii. 15. A comparison of Isa. lxv. with Rev. xxi. will show that these two passages do not refer to the same period. In Rev. xxi. 4, for example, we read that "there shall be no more death", whereas in Isa. lxv. 20 we learn that "the child shall die an hundred years old". The "new creation" of Israel's glorious kingdom is the final foreshadowing, before the glorious reality.

The typical character of Israel's favoured land is further illustrated by the prophecy: "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all My holy mountain" (Isa. xi. 9). "All the earth" is not referred to until later.

The central and typical character of Israel's land, city and temple is further explained in Isa. ii. 2:

> "And it shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills: and all nations shall flow unto it" (Isa. ii. 2).

We must now examine this passage rather closely. A great deal of vital truth is at stake, and we must not spare either ourselves, or our readers, or our critics. If we appear to be prolix or to be proving the obvious, our defence must be the extreme importance of our theme, and the nature of our opponent's criticism.

While we have no evidence to show that the ancients differentiated between a "mountain" and a "hill" precisely according to our own geographical standards, it is obvious that where the two words are used in the same context, a difference is intended. We read in the passage above that "the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains". Here we have two points that indicate the high glory of Jerusalem and its temple. The house of God is itself a "mountain", and this mountain is said to be established "in the top of the mountains". The LXX here uses the word akron for "top". The same word is rendered "top" in Heb. xi. 21, "tip" in Luke xvi. 24, and "uttermost part" in Mark xiii. 27. We further read that this mountain shall be exalted "above the hills". The word hupsoo, "to exalt", gives us "Most High" and "height", while the compound huperupsoo is used in Phil. ii. 9, where it is translated "highly exalted". The similar word hupseloteros is used in Heb. vii. 26, which speaks of Christ being "made higher than the heavens".

The exaltation of the mountain of the Lord's house is not said to be above the mountains, but "on" (epi) the "top" (or "tip" or "uttermost part") of the mountains. On the other hand, it is said to be exalted "above" (huperano) "the hills" (ton bounon). Is there no "distance" implied in this comparison? Referring to the use of huperano in Heb. ix. 5, our critics maintain that it shows that the meaning is "up over", but as closely joined as the lid is to a box. The highest peak of the Himalaya Mountains reaches the immense altitude of 29,140 feet, while a hill is any eminence up to 1,000 feet. Surely then the exaltation of the mountain of the Lord's house huperano ton bounon cannot be likened to the position of a lid in relation to a box, nor can we accept the view that huperano denotes position, but never distance.

The first occurrence of huperano is in Gen. vii. 20. The context here is exceedingly illuminating, for in verse 17 and 19 we have the phrase epi tes ges, "upon the earth", while in verse 18 we have apo tes ges, "off the earth".

> "And the flood was upon the earth, forty days and forty nights, and the water abounded greatly and bore up the ark, and it was lifted (hupsothe) from off the earth . . . . . and the water prevailed exceedingly upon the earth, and covered all the high mountains which were under heaven. Fifteen cubits upwards (huperano) was the water raised, and it covered all the high mountains" (Gen. vii. 17-20, Septuagint).

Will any one have the temerity to say that huperano knows nothing of distance, when this very word is linked with a measurement of 15 cubits in a book which has influenced the phraseology of the N.T. on almost every page? Moreover, while the flood was necessarily upon the earth, i.e., actually in contact with the earth, it should be noted that the same Greek words in the same narrative are also used to indicate how far these waters prevailed over the earth, and that this reference is explained in the next sentence by the word huperano. If epi with the word "earth" can be used, as it is here, to indicate not only close contact with the surface of the earth, but also 15 cubits above the top of the highest mountain, and if this meaning is expressed by the word huperano, what can we say of the "criticism" that denounces this same interpretation when the same words epi and huperano are used of heaven?

Whatever our own opinions may be, there is enough evidence here in these two passages—Isa. ii. 2 and Gen. vii. 17-20—to liberate any who may have been led captive by error. We are now, therefore, free to proceed to the investigation of the sphere of the Mystery, described by the words en tois epouraniois, "in the heavenly places". This we propose to do in a future article. Meanwhile let us remember that God's "nobility" bow the knee to no human authority—they search and see "whether these things are so". May we then be numbered among the faithful and the free.

#5. Heavenly.
pp. 135 - 138

We have demonstrated from Scripture that the redeemed, while they are all saved by the one great sacrifice of Christ, comprise different groups or callings, and that these various callings have distinctive provinces for their enjoyment, which we have called "spheres" of blessing. The use of this term has been justified, and proof has been given that there are in fact three "spheres of blessing". These "spheres" we have discovered to be "the earth", "the heavenly Jerusalem", and "the heavenly places" of Eph. i. 3. We have also learnt that the earth is the sphere belonging to Israel, who constitute the Kingdom. The teaching of Scripture in relation to the heavenly Jerusalem and the "heavenly places" of Eph. i. 3 we have yet to examine.

One further, and independent, proof of the reality of these three spheres is provided by the teaching of the epistles concerning the "adoption". This has also been considered in a previous article.

The main line of attack that our teaching has had to withstand has been concerned with our interpretation of the words translated "far above all" and "heavenly places". The reader should note, however, that we have demonstrated the presence of three distinct spheres of blessing in the scriptures, quite apart from these disputed terms. In our last article we considered, a little more in detail, the characteristics of that sphere of blessing which belongs to Israel and the earth. We must now turn our attention to the next sphere, the one associated with the heavenly Jerusalem.

The two epistles that speak of the heavenly Jerusalem are Galatians and Hebrews, and we must now acquaint ourselves with their teaching. Dr. J. W. Thirtle, in two articles (from which we quote) contributed to The Christian of 27th April and 4th May, 1916, presented a good case for his contention that the epistle to the Galatians was a "covering letter", and that the epistle to the Hebrews was an "enclosure", written, in the first case, for the Hebrews in the Churches of Galatia.

> "What in reality, do we find? Just this—two epistles, or writings, in close succession, in a professedly Pauline section of the New Testament, are merely separated or divided off, the one from the other, by the words pros Hebraious 'to Hebrews'."
>
> "Both epistles quote Hab. ii. 4, 'The just shall live by faith' (Gal. iii. 11; Heb. x. 38), both develop the 'allegory' of Sinai and Sion (Gal. iv. 24-31; Heb. xii. 18-24), both deal with 'perfection' (Gal. iii. 3, Hebrews throughout), both speak of Jerusalem which is above, both speak of the Mediator."

Another very cogent argument which supports this connection is the fact that, although circumcision is at the very heart of the Jewish problem, yet the Apostle never speaks of it in the epistle to the Hebrews. This would be difficult to explain or to understand if Hebrews stood alone, but if "Galatians" and "Hebrews" go together, then circumcision would have been effectively dealt with in the "covering letter", leaving the way clear in Hebrews for the exhortation that it gives to go on to perfection.

The first definite indication of the "sphere of blessing" that is in view in the epistle to the Hebrews is found in chapter iii. 1, where those to whom the Apostle wrote are called: "Holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling." This is the first of six occurrences of epouranios in Hebrews, which we give below:

> "Wherefore, holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling, consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus" (Heb. iii. 1).
>
> "For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost . . . . . to renew them again unto repentance" (Heb. vi. 4-6).
>
> "Who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle: for, See, saith He, that thou make all things according to the pattern shewed thee in the mount" (Heb. viii. 5).
>
> "It was therefore necessary that the pattern of things in the heavens should be purified with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these" (Heb. ix. 23).
>
> "But now they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God: for He hath prepared for them a city" (Heb. xi. 16).
>
> "But ye are come unto mount Sion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem" (Heb. xii. 22).

We must now examine these passages, so that our conception of what is "heavenly" shall be moulded, not by our own views, but by what is actually written.

In the first passage, we read that these Hebrews were "partakers of the heavenly calling", but whether or not this means that they were going to enjoy their inheritance in the heavenly places "where Christ sitteth", is not here stated. In the first place, however, let us note that there is the most positive testimony that the position occupied by Christ in Hebrews, is identical with that of Ephesians. In Ephesians, Christ is said to have ascended "far above all heavens" (Eph. iv. 10), while in Hebrews He is said to have "passed through the heavens" (dierchomai, Heb. iv. 14), and to have been "made higher than the heavens" (hupseloteros, Heb. vii. 26). What is never taught in Hebrews, however, is that any of the redeemed could entertain the hope of being there, "where Christ sitteth". The teaching is all in the other direction. We are reminded, for instance, that when the High Priest entered the most holy place (a type of heaven itself) he entered "alone" (Heb. ix. 7). These Hebrews had certainly "tasted the heavenly gift", but they did not ascend to heaven to do so—they tasted this heavenly gift while here on earth. It is therefore folly to point to the fact that the word epouranios occurs both in Hebrews and in Ephesians, and to deduce from this that there is nothing distinctive about the Ephesian sphere. In Hebrews it is Christ, and Christ alone, Who sits in the heavenly place. In Ephesians, the essence of the Mystery is that an elect company of the redeemed sit there with Him. It is this fact that makes this new sphere of blessing unique, a fact which an indiscriminate list of the occurrences of epouranios can neither establish nor overthrow.

While Hebrews speaks of a "heavenly calling" and a "heavenly gift", we are not left in doubt as to "where" this calling is to be enjoyed. The sphere of blessing connected with the "heavenly calling" is the "heavenly country" or "heavenly Jerusalem" which filled the vision of Abraham, and for which those who walked by faith in the O.T. days suffered the loss of all things.

> "Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen . . . . . These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth . . . . . Wherefore God . . . . . hath prepared for them a city" (Heb. xi. 1, 13, 16).

This calling differs from the one that is associated with Mount Sinai. Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were all "before the law" (see Gal. iii. 17, 18), and the inclusion of Abel, Noah and Enoch shows that it is not essentially connected with the Abrahamic covenant. Moreover the inclusion of Rahab, after the law, reveals that it is of wider scope than the covenant of Sinai, and the presence of such names as Gideon, Barak, Samson, Jephtha, David and Samuel (Heb. xi. 32) shows that after the law of Moses had been given, there were still those who reached out for this higher and heavenly sphere.

In contrast with Sinai and its terrors, we have Sion with its blessings.

> "Ye are come unto Sion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly, and to a church of firstborn ones, which are written in heaven, and to God the judge of all, and to the spirits of perfected righteous ones, and to Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling that speaketh better things than Abel" (Heb. xii. 22-24).

The reader will notice a slight departure from the A.V. here. The "general assembly" should be linked, not with the "church of the firstborn", but with the "innumerable company". The church of the firstborn is made up of "the spirits of perfected righteous ones" (Heb. xii. 23)—or "the spirits of righteous ones having been perfected". This "perfecting" is the key to Hebrews, and is the basis of its exhortation. Either those to whom the Apostle wrote would leave the things that were connected with the beginning and go on unto perfection (Heb. vi. 1) or, failing to endure, would draw back unto "loss" and "waste" (Heb. x. 32-39). The word "perdition" is translated "destruction" in Phil. iii. 19, and is put in contrast there, as in Hebrews, with "attaining" and a "better resurrection" (Phil. iii. 11; Heb. xi. 35). The primary meaning of the word is seen in Matt. xxvi. 8, where it is translated "waste".

We would mention here in passing, the important principle that what constitutes the initial calling of one company (e.g. the Galatian converts) may also be the added "prize" of another company (e.g. Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, who had already received the "land" and the "nation" in their initial calling). A further example of the same principle is provided by the fact that "eternal life", which is a "gift" in Romans, is spoken of as an "award" in Matt. xxv. We will not however, pursue this matter further, as it is not essential to our present purpose.

It is clear from Heb. xi. and xii. that the sphere of blessing there in view is that of the city which will at the last come down from God out of heaven. This reference takes us to the Book of the Revelation, where we discover two things. First, that those whose blessings are found in the New Jerusalem are spoken of as the "Bride"—a company that differs from the divorced wife, who will be restored at the end; and secondly, that this company are "overcomers" who have a "crown" (Rev. iii. 11, 12)—a further parallel with the overcomers of Phil. iii., who attain the "prize".

We discover, therefore, that the second sphere of blessing is in the nature of reward. It is the "heavenly" phase of the kingdom. Abraham could not have forfeited the land of promise, for it was his as an unconditional gift; but in addition to this, he received the "heavenly country", which was associated with his "perfecting". This "perfecting" of his faith is the theme of the Epistle of James, which regards the offering of Isaac as the "fulfilling" of the initial act of faith whereby Abraham was justified (James ii. 23). James also has much to say, in the first chapter, about patient endurance and its perfecting work in view of the crown (James i. 3, 4, 12). The heavenly country and city are not for "righteous ones" simply, but for "perfected righteous ones", just as the "prize of the high calling in Christ Jesus" and "the out-resurrection" of Phil. iii. are for those who go on unto perfection.

If the heavenly country, for which Abraham gave up so much, differs from the land of promise in which he lived as a pilgrim, then we must obviously recognize this heavenly calling as a separate sphere. Moreover, it is clear that one of the chief characteristics of this sphere is that it represents a reward for faithful obedience, as distinct from the land of promise which was quite unconditional. We have not attempted, in this series, to differentiate between the covenant made with Abraham regarding the land, and the covenant made at Sinai. As both operate on the earth, they are both included in the one sphere.

It now remains to examine the claim that the sphere of the Mystery is neither in the land, nor in the heavenly city, and to this and its associated studies we must turn in our next article.

#6. Heavenly Places.
pp. 147 - 153

We have established by positive proof that the Scriptures speak of three distinct companies of believers, and that these three companies, constituting the Kingdom, the Bride and the Body, have three distinct spheres in which the blessings appropriate to each are to be enjoyed. We have given some attention to the information contained in the Scriptures concerning two of these spheres, and we conclude this series by an examination of the statements made in Ephesians concerning the peculiar sphere in which the Church of the Mystery is to enjoy its blessings. It is not the unique character of Paul's ministry as the prisoner of Christ Jesus that we are to examine, but the unique sphere of blessing to which that ministry points.

The distinctive place, "where", and the time, "when", the Church of the Mystery shall enjoy its blessings, and was chosen in Christ by the Father, are given in Eph. i. 3, 4. We are not now concerned with the true translation of the words, "before the foundation of the world" in verse 4, but with the latter clause of verse 3:

> "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ" (Eph. i. 3).

As the phrase en tois epouraniois is exclusive to Ephesians, and as every other occurrence of epouranios has reference to the character of the "heavenly" thing concerned, but not the place "where" it will be enjoyed, a mere list of the occurrences of epouranios would have only the appearance of argument while lacking validity.

"In heavenly places" is the translation of the Greek words en tois epouraniois. We have seen that the word epouranios occurs six times in the Epistle to the Hebrews, but there it speaks of a heavenly calling, a heavenly gift, heavenly realities, and a heavenly country or city. There can be no comparison between a "heavenly gift" that was enjoyed on earth with "the heavenly places" of Eph. i. 3: the one refers to character, the other to a sphere. The occurrences of epouranios in Ephesians must be segregated, for they form a group by themselves. The phrase en tois epouraniois occurs only in Ephesians and nowhere else in the N.T.

The second occurrence of the phrase is found in Eph. i. 20, 21, where we learn that this sphere is "where Christ sitteth" at the right hand of God. Whether we continue the use of the phrase "far above all heavens", or whether we exchange it for a more limited rendering, nothing is more certain than that there can be no conceivably higher position in the whole universe than the right hand of God. Such is the height of this exaltation of Christ that the passage continues:--

> "Far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come" (Eph. i. 21).

Quite apart from the words “far above”, there can be no denial of the fact that there is here indicated a sphere without compare in the whole range of Scripture.

To conclude the first part of our examination, we turn to Eph. ii. 6 where we have a categorical statement that there, where Christ sits, is the sphere of blessing for every member of the Church which is His body.

In these three passages (Eph. i. 3, 20, 21 and ii. 6) we have indubitable evidence of a sphere of blessing that differs entirely from anything that had hitherto been revealed.

But our task will not have been completed if we fail to take note of the attempts that have been made to discredit the teaching of the three spheres by concentrating attention upon the A.V. rendering of huperano. The words translated “far above all” in Eph. i. 20 and iv. 10 are adjuncts of the teaching we have already proved by other means, and no alteration or re-translation can make the slightest difference to the three-fold distinctions we have already seen. As the word in question only occurs three times in the N.T. it is a matter of importance to ascertain whether it occurs in the Septuagint, and if so, in what connection. A writer who has gone out of his way to denounce the teaching of The Berean Expositor says:--

> “As the adverb huperano, OVER-UP, appears so seldom in the later Greek Scriptures, we have given all of the occurrences in the Septuagint also.”

But when we consult the Septuagint, we discover that our critic omits the first occurrence, and upon examination we further find that this first occurrence is antagonistic to this contention that huperano means position, but never distance. The omitted reference is Gen. vii. 20: “Fifteen cubits upward did the water prevail, and the mountains were covered.”

If the subject before us was the comparative value of the various manuscripts which we have to consult in seeking the original text of the Scriptures, it would be right and proper to assess the respective merits of the Vatican, the Sinaiticus, the Alexandrian, and other MSS, and at the close of the investigation we should be within our rights if we were to express a preference for one manuscript above another. But if we are investigating the usage of a particular word, and we profess to have given “all of the occurrences”, then the omission of one reference, especially one that militates against our own conclusions, is serious. This first reference to huperano in the Septuagint most emphatically uses the word to express distance in cubits, whereas our self-appointed mentor grows almost hysterical in his denunciation of our retention of the A.V. rendering, “far above”, calling it, among other things, a blot on the A.V. translation, and adding that “so long as it remains it is impossible for the English reader to get the truth”. These words would have sounded rather empty if Gen. vii. 20 had been cited, and our critic’s dictum that huperano denotes “position, never distance” looks absurd in the presence of these 15 cubits!

We have more to bring forward from Gen. vii. 20 in a moment, but it will be better appreciated after we have allowed our critic a little more space.

The third and last occurrence of huperano in the N.T. is found in Heb. ix. 5, which reads: "And over it the cherubim of glory shadowing the mercy seat." The critic's comment is:-- > "In the ark of the covenant we have the best possible illustration of the force of this word. Surely the Cherubim were not 'far above' the ark."

He further suggests that probably the lower parts of the Cherubim were "below" the crown of the ark, and gets so enamoured of this idea that he even goes so far as to say: "Huperano, in this case, may denote near rather than far", but we recall that he has already prefaced his investigation by saying:

> "As few of us are sufficiently adept in either Greek or English to pass judgment upon such grammatical and idiomatic problems, we will base nothing on expert evidence."

so that we need not be greatly concerned. The Scriptures themselves are the only and final appeal.

The Apostle is not concerned, in Heb. ix. 5, with the fact that the Cherubim and the mercy seat were made out of one piece of metal. His statement is confined to one feature, and one feature only, namely, that the Cherubim "overshadowed" (kataskiazo) the mercy seat, and in so doing he is referring to Exod. xxv. 18-20, where we read:--

> "And the Cherubim shall stretch forth their wings on high, covering the mercy seat with their wings."

Here, we have inspired usage of words, and need not be adepts either in Hebrew, Greek or English to understand the meaning of the Hebrew word here translated "on high". Maal is translated in the LXX by huperano, and so provides an infallible authority for the usage and meaning of the word. Maal occurs in such passages as "In heaven above" (Exod. xx. 4); "From his shoulders and upward" (I Sam. ix. 2); "The clouds above" (Prov. viii. 28). Whoever used the word huperano in Gen. vii. 20 and elsewhere, had no hesitation in using it for a measurable distance, whether for the height of the water above the mountains, or the height of the wings of the overshadowing Cherubim. Doubtless he would have been surprised to have learned that huperano contained no idea of "distance", and that in the reference to the Cherubim, it might mean near rather than far. However good our intention may be, we are all liable to go to such lengths when seeking support for any particular line of teaching. Although we have written on the subject again and again, our critic has never understood that when we speak of a position "far above all heavens", we have no idea that when Christ ascended up far above all heavens He was "outside the heavens". What we have maintained is that "the heavens" that are in view since the six days' creation are the only heavens associated with the redeemed until the revelation of the mystery, and that no redeemed child of God has any prospect of association with the heaven of Gen. i. 1 except the church of the mystery chosen in Christ before the period referred to in Gen. i. 2. As many of our readers may not have access to our early writings, and as it is essential that this matter should be clarified, we repeat what has been in print for over twenty years, so that all may see, if they will but take the trouble, that so far as we are concerned, we have nothing in common with any teaching that puts the church of the one body outside the realm of Gen. i. 1. In 1917 (Volume VII, page 8) we wrote:--

> "In the original of the New Testament, two words are employed, both translated 'heavenly' (ouranios and epouranios). The added word epi signifies upon or over, and refers to the heavens that are above the firmament, and beyond the limitations of the present creation (compare Gen. i. with Psalms cxlviii. 4, I Kings viii. 27, and Heb. vii. 26).

As two words are used, both translated "heavenly", we are justified in attempting to discriminate, and as epi is added to ouranios, and huperano supplies the idea, we adopted the Latin equivalent of huper, and added super—coining the word "super-heavens" for the special usage found in Eph. i. 3, 20 and ii. 6.

On page 45 of the same Volume we have the following:--

> "On many occasions the Scriptures speak of God 'stretching out the heavens'. Psa. civ. 2, 'Who stretched out the heavens like a curtain'; also Isa. xl. 22; xlii. 5; xlv. 12; li. 13; Jer. x. 12; li. 15; Zech. xii. 1 . . . . . When we grasp the significance of the firmament, and the purpose that is carried out within its expanse, we may then see the perfect fitness of the statements of Ephesians, where in the words 'the heavenly places' (epouranios, a word which literally means 'upon the heavens'), we are taken beyond the firmament . . . . . Ephesians always speaks of the blessings of the one body as being in the epouranios, the sphere above the heavens. Peter, however, does not pierce the firmament, the inheritance he speaks of is reserved 'in the heavens', not in the sphere above the heavens."

In such translations as "super-heavens", "far above all heavens", "made higher than the heavens", it is evident that a sphere beyond the limitations of the heavens of Gen. i. 8 is intended. That this was and is our meaning let the following quotation from Volume XI (1921), page 76, bear witness:

> "THE NEW HEAVENS AND THE NEW EARTH.—To this period belong the blessings of the mystery. The only calling or revelation that has pierced the present temporary heaven and touched that which can be spoken of as eternal is that dispensation of the grace of God which has blessed us with all spiritual blessings in the super-heavenlies far above all. This shows the unique character of the church of the one body. It is connected both by time and place with that which begins before the present heavens were made and goes on when the present heavens shall be no more.
>
> The church of the mystery is the only link during this age between the time before sin entered and the time when sin shall be no more. All other purposes are 'under the heavens'. This one alone places those who are blessed under its terms 'above the heavens'. If these things are so, it would be very surprising if the doctrine and practice of this peculiar people were not different from all others."

In our pamphlet entitled "Far above all" occurs the following:--

> "Of no other company of believers is it said that their sphere of blessing is 'IN the super-heavenlies'. The special sphere of blessing which belongs alone to the Church of the One Body is mentioned five times in this epistle, and a study of these > occurrences will supply us with valuable information. First of all, we translate the word 'super-heavenlies' in recognition of the presence of the particle epi with which the word begins. It is not simply ouranios, which is the usual word, but ep-ouranios. Secondly, information supplied by the five references demands some such translation. Passing, therefore, to the second reference, we find, in i. 20, 21 that this sphere of blessing is:

>
> (a) At the Father's right hand.
> (b) Far above all principality and power.
>
> That this tremendous height is the destined sphere of the Church of the Mystery ii. 6 declares. There the believer is associated with the risen Christ, 'made to sit together in the super-heavenlies in Christ Jesus'. Christ the Head and the Church His Body are blessed together THERE."
>
> "The next two references, iii. 10 and vi. 12, show the super-heavenlies as the abode of principalities, powers and rulers. Be it noted that angels are not mentioned. Angels are heaven's messengers. The Church of the One Body is blessed even above heaven's nobility. Dominions and thrones are beneath it in its super-heavenly sphere . . . . . While epouranios is used outside Ephesians, no other company of believers is blessed IN these exalted regions as their sphere. The blessings of the Church of the One Body are not only 'heavenly' but 'up in heaven'."

Having established from the Scriptures, quite independently of the occurrences or the meaning of either epouranios or huperano, the fact that there are three distinct companies of believers who are destined to inherit blessings in three distinct spheres, we can dismiss the question as to how "far" this exalted sphere is above all others; the answer to the question makes no difference to the fact that the Scriptures speak of three different spheres. For the sake of clarity we summarize our findings.

There are blessings that are to be enjoyed on earth. Those who will occupy the central position in this sphere are Israel, and this calling is expressed in the terms of a Kingdom. Gentile nations, while blessed in this same sphere, will be subservient, for to Israel, and Israel alone, is the Kingdom, and to Israel on the earth pertains that adoption. Israel is the firstborn among the nations.

There are other blessings that are to be enjoyed in the heavenly country and the heavenly city. These are the blessings of Abraham, and the calling is that of "The Bride" (a calling that must be kept distinct from that of the restoration of Israel, "The wife"). Gentiles, as well as Israel, go to form this company called "The Bride", where there is neither Jew nor Greek, but where both alike are reckoned as Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise. Instead of nations being subservient to this company of the redeemed, it is angels who are associated with them in a subordinate position. To this company, in this sphere, pertains this particular adoption; they are the church of the firstborn whose names are written in heaven.

There are, however, blessings that are neither those of Israel as a Kingdom, nor of the heavenly calling of the Bride, and these are enjoyed in heavenly places, where Christ sits, far above all principality and power, and far above all heavens. They who enjoy them constitute neither a Kingdom nor the Bride, but are the Body of Christ and a perfect Man. While individuals of Israel who believe are not precluded, this calling is mainly Gentiles, for it operates during the period of Israel's blindness. This company also has a citizenship, but it is one which has nothing to do with the New Jerusalem: not nations nor angels are subservient to it, but principalities and powers. To this company pertains the adoption associated with this sphere, and Christ, as the Firstborn from the dead, is its Head, each believer of the company forming a member of the Church which is His body.

As this highest of all callings is the subject of a secret that goes back before the overthrow of the world (Gen. i. 2), so it goes up beyond the "firmament that was called heaven" which spans the ages, and finds its sphere in the super-heavens; those heavens of Gen. i. 1 which remain unmoved by the ebb and flow of time, sin, death, or dispensation change.

If any item in this summary can be challenged, then let us patiently re-examine the Scriptures. If it cannot, then no contention about the question of huperano can influence the matter one way or another.

We apologize to all readers who needed no repeated arguments to convince them of the glorious fact of their super-heavenly calling, and who have themselves realized the shallowness of the criticism that has been leveled against it. For any who may mistake bombast for argument and superficial wordlists for proof, we are profoundly concerned, and if we have but induced any such to halt and to act as true "Bereans" we shall not have used our space and time in vain.

The SECOND EPISTLE to TIMOTHY.

#5. A Threefold Exhortation. Be not Ashamed (i. 8 - 18).
pp. 26, 27

The opening section of the epistle (II Tim. i. 8-18) deals mainly with the sad fact that Paul and his message had been forsaken. This, however, is introduced rather as a background than for its own sake. In spite of this rejection, says Paul in effect to Timothy, do not be ashamed of the testimony—I myself am not ashamed, even though I suffer these things, and think too of Onesiphorus, who was not ashamed of my chain.

The section is divided up by the recurrence of the word "ashamed":

(1) "Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me his prisoner" (II Tim. i. 8).
(2) "I am appointed a preacher . . . . . For the which cause I suffer these things; nevertheless I am not ashamed" (II Tim. i. 12).
(3) "The Lord give mercy unto the house of Onesiphorus, for he oft refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain" (II Tim. i. 16).

The subject of the section is "Paul and his message forsaken", and it is interesting to notice that in the structure (Volume XXXI, p. 130) i. 8-18 balances iv. 9-18. Did Phygellus and Hermogenes turn away because they were "ashamed"? Did Demas forsake the Apostle out of "shame"? If so, and it looks very much like it, what a word for us all!

Closely linked with this subject of the Apostle's peculiar ministry is the principle of "right division":

> "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth" (II Tim. ii. 15).

Closely associated with this principle and in the same chapter is the great theme of the epistle—"suffering and reigning". While the actual word "ashamed" is not used in II Tim. ii. 1-13, we find there its synonym, "deny", "If we suffer, we shall also reign with Him: if we deny Him, he will also deny us" (II Tim. ii. 12). That "denying" Him is equivalent to "being ashamed of" Him, the following parallel passages will make clear:

> "For whosoever shall be ashamed of Me and of My words, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed; when He shall come in His own glory, and in His Father's, and of the holy angels" (Luke ix. 26).
>
> "He that denieth Me before men shall be denied before the angels of God" (Luke xii. 9).

The preceding verse in Luke xii. places "confessing" over against "denying". In I Timothy we find the exhortation to "confess", while in II Timothy we have the warning not to "deny" or "be ashamed".

> "I give thee charge in the sight of God, Who quickeneth all things, and before Christ Jesus, Who before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good confession, that thou keep this commandment without spot . . . . . O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust" (I Tim. vi. 13, 14, 20).

Closely linked with the thought of not being ashamed in II Tim. i. is the "testimony of our Lord, and of Paul His prisoner" (II Tim. i. 8). This is called "My deposit" (A.V. "that which I have committed") in II Tim. i. 12, and "That good thing which was committed unto thee" in II Tim. i. 14. This same trust is also in view in II Tim. ii. 2, where the Apostle writes:

> "The things that thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also."

We must remember that II Timothy contains a message for ourselves at the present time, and, as in Philippians, set before us "examples" both of those to whom the prize will be awarded, and of those who will be "denied" (II Tim. ii. 12). No one can rightly entertain the remotest hope of "reigning with the Lord" or of receiving a "crown", who is ashamed of the special "deposit of truth" associated with the Lord's prisoner.

Before going further we must attempt to discover the structure of the passage. We have already seen that the three references to "being ashamed" seem to divide the section up into three parts. We therefore note this fact as follows:

> Not ashamed of the testimony.—Paul the Prisoner (II Tim. i. 8).
> Not ashamed though suffering.—Paul the Prisoner (II Tim. i. 12).
> Not ashamed of my chain.—Paul the Prisoner (II Tim. i. 16).

We next observe that in the first division the Apostle speaks particularly of the gospel:

> "Be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel . . . . . brought life and immortality to light through the gospel" (II Tim. i. 8-10).

In the second section, the subject is "that good deposit" (II Tim. i. 12, 14), service is prominent; "He oft refreshed me"; "He ministered unto me" (II Tim. i. 16-18). We therefore note these facts as follows:

> The subject of verses 8-12 is the Gospel.
> The subject of verses 12-14 is the "good deposit".
> The subject of verses 15-18 is service.

These three subjects, each associated with being unashamed, are connected by the Apostle with two time periods. The Gospel is connected with a period "before the world began" (II Tim. i. 9), while the "good deposit" (II Tim. i. 12) and the recognition of the service of Onesiphorus (II Tim. i. 16-18) are both connected with "that day".

We now have sufficient material to enable us to arrive at the structure:

II Timothy i. 8 - 18. Paul and his message forsaken.

B1 | 8-12. Timothy—Not ashamed of testimony of prisoner.
SUBJECT.—The Gospel.
TIME.—Before age-times.
f1 | 8. The Prisoner. Jointly suffer evil.
g1 | 8. The Gospel.
h1 | 9. Before age-times.
h1 | 10. Now manifested. Life illuminated.
g1 | 10. The Gospel.
f1 | 11, 12. The Preacher. I suffer these things.

B2 | 12-14. Paul—Not ashamed of suffering as prisoner.
SUBJECT.—The good deposit.
TIME.—That day.
f2 | 12. He is able to guard.
g2 | 12. The deposit.
h2 | 13. Have a form of sound words, heard of me.
f2 | 14. Do thou guard.
g2 | 14. The good deposit.

B3 | 15-18. Onesiphorus—Not ashamed of chain of prisoner.
SUBJECT.—Service.
TIME.—That day.
f3 | 15. Thou knowest.
g3 | 15. In Asia. All turned away from me.
h3 | 16. The Lord give mercy.
g3 | 17. In Rome, He sought and found me.
h3 | 18. The Lord grant mercy.
g3 | 18. In Ephesus, He ministered unto me.
f3 | 18. Thou knowest very well.

It is evident from this outline that the subject-matter before us is of supreme importance. Issues that are beyond our ability to estimate hang upon our due appreciation of this gospel, and this “good deposit”. In our next article we shall hope to consider the first sub-division of the passage (i. 8-12). Meanwhile, let us ponder the solemnity of the theme: and especially let us pray for grace that we may never be found ashamed of the testimony of the Lord, nor of Paul his prisoner.

#6. Power for those who partake of gospel afflictions (i. 8).
pp. 43 - 46

We now turn our attention to the first subdivision of section B1 | II Tim. i. 8-12 which has the "Gospel" for its subject, and "before the age-times" as its time period. We will repeat the structure of this section so that we can have it before us during the study.

f1 | 8. The Prisoner. Jointly suffer evil.
g1 | 8. The Gospel.
h1 | 9. Before age-times. Grace given
h1 | 10. Now manifested. Life illuminated.
g1 | 10. The Gospel.
f1 | 11, 12. The Preacher. I suffer these things.

> "Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me His prisoner: but be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel, according to the power of God: Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began, but is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour, Jesus Christ, Who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel; whereunto I am appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles. For the which cause I also suffer these things" (II Tim. i. 8-12).

Throughout the Epistle the reader will find an insistence upon the special ministry of the apostle Paul.

> "Through the gospel: whereunto I am appointed a preacher . . . . . of the Gentiles" (II Tim. i. 10, 11).
> "Hold fast the form of sound words which thou hast heard of me" (II Tim. i. 13).
> "All they which are in Asia be turned away from me" (II Tim. i. 15).
> "The things which thou hast heard of me . . . . . the same commit thou to faithful men" (II Tim. ii. 2).
> "Remember that Jesus Christ was raised from the dead according to my gospel, wherein I suffer trouble, as an evil doer" (II Tim. ii. 8, 9).
> "Thou hast fully known my doctrine" (II Tim. iii. 10).
> "That by me the preaching might be fully known, and that all the Gentiles might hear" (II Tim. iv. 17).

Before any of these sentences was written, however, the Apostle had penned II Tim. i. 8, "Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of the Lord nor of me His prisoner". In all the consciousness of his peculiar ministry, and with all the emphasis noticeable on "me" and "my", we nevertheless realize that the Apostle is magnifying not himself but his office. What he had to give others he had received of the Lord by revelation. In such circumstances false modesty would have been as harmful to his work as spiritual pride. With a good conscience, without conceit, without in the least forgetting that he was but an earthen vessel, the Apostle could couple the name of the Lord he served with his own.

It is shallow criticism unworthy of refutation that calls a believer a "Paulite" because he seeks to honour this testimony of the ascended Christ. That testimony was not given to all the apostles or to some of the apostles. It was given to one, Paul the apostle, and now the "prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles". Any withdrawal therefore from fear, or a sense of shame, now that Paul was standing his trial for the truth's sake, would be tantamount to being ashamed of the testimony of the Lord. And, although uttered in the period of the presentation of the Kingdom, in principle, the solemn words of our Lord in Luke ix. 26 were still true: "For whosoever shall be ashamed of Me and My words, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, when He shall come."

While the phase of the second coming may change from that of the Parousia (used in the Gospels, early Epistles, James and Peter) to that of the Epiphaneia (translated "appearing" and used in the prison epistles) the believer's attitude to the Lord and His word is influenced by the way in which that glorious coming holds his affection and constitutes his hope. If shame is to be suffered by those who have denied the Lord, a crown awaits those who have "loved His appearing" (II Tim. iv. 8). Demas, who forsook the Apostle, is said to have "loved" this present world (II Tim. iv. 10), and the interrelation of these passages must not be missed.

In II Tim. i. 8 the Apostle addresses Timothy on the subject of shame or otherwise, negatively and positively:

> NEGATIVELY.—Be not thou ashamed of the testimony.
> POSITIVELY.—Be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel.

An essential part of the testimony delivered to the Apostle was the gospel. Over and over again a misguided, though perhaps earnest, believer will say "We don't want Paul's doctrine; all we want is the simple gospel". Yet, if we take the words euaggellion, "gospel", and euaggelizomai, "preach the gospel", what do we find? The four Gospels and the first half of the Acts (Acts i.-xii.) contain twelve references to the "gospel", and nineteen references to "preach the gospel", whereas Paul's epistles and Acts xiii.-xxviii. contain sixty-one references to the "gospel" and thirty-two references to "preaching the gospel". To this we might add the word "Evangelist" (Acts xxi. 8; Eph. iv. 11; II Tim. iv. 5). If we take the other word, kerugma, "preaching as a herald", kerux, "preacher as a herald", and kerusso, to "preach as a herald", we find kerugma occurs but twice in the Gospels and early Acts and six times in Paul's epistles and Acts xiii.-xxviii. Kerux occurs only in I Tim. ii. 7 and II Tim. i. 11. (The only other reference is II Pet. ii. 5), and kerusso occurs thirty-five times in the Gospels and early Acts, and twenty-four times in Acts xiii.-xxviii. and Paul's epistles.

If the number of occurrences of a word has any bearing upon the place that the subject occupies in the mind of a writer, then the fact that these words, relating to the gospel, occur nearly twice as many times in the writings of Paul as in the rest of the N.T. put together, must surely give the lie to that report that a study of Paul's epistles slackens interest in the gospel and its preaching. Here, in his last letter, and in view of his death for the truth's sake, the Apostle couples the gospel with that special testimony of the Lord that was associated with himself as the Lord's prisoner. In this last testimony he is not only concerned with the Gospel itself, but also with its continued proclamation. He who urges Timothy to "preach the word", and places such stress upon "doctrine" (II Tim. iv. 2), calls upon him, almost with his dying breath, to "do the work of an evangelist" (II Tim. iv. 5) and rejoices, not merely because of the spell of freedom his acquittal from the first charge laid against him had brought, but in the opportunity it afforded to "preach", so "that all the Gentiles might hear" (II Tim. iv. 17).

In addition to the generally accepted qualifications of a preacher of the gospel, the work of an evangelist in the perilous times in which Timothy was called upon to take up the ministry, made great demands upon courage and endurance, and called for willingness to suffer imprisonment and death itself. Paul did not lose sight of the fact that they who attempt to teach others should be apt in the work (II Tim. ii. 2), and that they would have little hope of true success if they neglected the grand equipment of the Word (II Tim. iii. 17). He knew all this yet, in his opening exhortation, what he stresses is the necessity of willingness to suffer as a first qualification, "Be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel" (II Tim. i. 8). When writing to the Philippians concerning this same characteristic, the Apostle said: "Inasmuch as both in my bonds, and in the defence and confirmation of the gospel, ye all are partakers of my grace" (Phil. i. 7). Here the word "partaker" is the word that means "fellowship", as it is translated in Phil. i. 5. In II Tim. i. 8, the Apostle does not use the word meaning fellowship, but a compound of sun, "together with", and kakopatheo, "to suffer evil".

Preachers of the gospel were under a ban for Roman law now looked upon them as "evil doers" (II Tim. ii. 9), and it was impossible therefore in such circumstances to contemplate, unmoved, the call to preach the gospel.

In the last chapter the Apostle once more links together the preaching of the gospel with the word kakopatheo, "suffer evil", for, while he sought to encourage Timothy in every possible way, faithfulness as well as kindness did not veil from him the perils of this calling. To encourage Timothy, and all who are called to follow his steps, the Apostle elaborates this matter of suffering evil in chapter ii., where it occurs in the third and ninth verses, in both of which the immediate context speaks of a crown or of reigning with the Lord. This is the one grand inducement which the Apostle would hold out to Timothy, and which had so long been before his own eyes. In Phil. iii. he was running with the prize in view, in II Tim. iv. he knew that he had finished the course, and that a crown awaited him, and he knew that what had helped him would help Timothy and others; consequently he chooses his words with precision.

But before Timothy reached the second chapter, to learn of the possibility or "reigning", or the fourth chapter and learn of the certainty of the "crown", the Apostle reminds him of the one thing needful, apart from which neither crown nor prize could of itself prove strong enough to ensure perseverance to the end, "Be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel according to the power of God" (II Tim. i. 8). Dunamis, "power", occurs three times in II Timothy:

> "God hath not given us the spirit of fear but of power" (II Tim. i. 7).
> "Be partaker . . . . . according to the power of God" (II Tim. i. 8).

"Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof" (II Tim. iii. 5).

Dunatos, "powerful", occurs once, "I am persuaded that He is able" (II Tim. i. 12).

Endunamoo, "to empower", occurs twice, "Thou therefore be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus" (II Tim. ii. 1); "The Lord stood with me and strengthened me" (II Tim. iv. 17).

The power which is introduced into these different parts of the epistle, had received a very full exposition in the ministry of the apostle Paul. Timothy would be fully acquainted with the teaching of Eph. i. 19; iii. 7; and iii. 20. He would know that the Apostle himself placed the knowledge of the power of His resurrection before the experience of fellowship with His sufferings or conformity to His death. Timothy would not look within, to the gift that was within him, he would not look around, not even to Paul himself, his father in the faith, but to that place above where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God, the Source of all spiritual power for His believing children. The use of dunatos in II Tim. i. 12, would be a confirmation of Timothy's faith. Paul was persuaded that the Lord was powerful enough to keep that which had been entrusted, and the Apostle's own experience of this mighty power, to which he refers in II Tim. iv. 17, would be further confirmation.

If the ministry of the gospel entailed suffering, it was also guaranteed unlimited power, for this is the power that overcomes death and the grace. Therefore both Timothy, and we ourselves, may receive abounding encouragement to endure and maintain our witness, in spite of all that man may say, threaten, or do, and moreover, in spite of our own conscious weakness, error and waywardness. If the gospel be the power of God unto salvation, it certainly brings with it the mighty power of God for subsequent service.

#7. Before the "age times", and now (i. 9, 10).
pp. 65 - 69

In verses 9 and 10 of II Tim. i. we read:

> "According to the power of God, Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began."

How much there is in these few words if we can only take them to heart.

Am I fearful? Then let me remember that He has saved me. Before my wondering eyes passes the story of love so vast and deep that fear departs, and in the salvation that encompasses past, present and future (II Cor. i. 10) I am strong.

Do I hesitate? Then let me remember that He has called me, and that His commands are His enablings. Will He call me to an act of service and leave me to my own devices? Surely not. The very consciousness that we are called of God puts courage into our hearts and nerves us for the conflict.

Am I intimidated by the awful character of the enemy with whom we have to contend? Then let me remember that I have been called with an holy calling. The conflict is a conflict between light and darkness, between Satan and the Lord. If we know anything of the moral condition of the world at the time that Paul wrote of this "holy calling", it will be clear that here are two conflicting camps, one standing for truth and all that it connotes, the other for the lie and its terrible accompaniments. A conflict such as this demands our utmost, and even this is vain and valueless apart from the grace of God. So the Apostle reminds us that this holy calling is "not according to our works". This, however, does not in the least suggest that good works in their scriptural place are not acceptable. They are the fruit, but they cannot find a place as the source or means of our salvation or calling.

Before going further, let us confirm, from this same epistle, the importance of good works when given their rightful place. In II Tim. ii. 15, the injunction rightly to divide the word of truth is addressed to one who is described as a "workman". In II Tim. ii. 21 the servant of the Lord is likened to a clean vessel, meet for the Master's use, and "prepared unto every good work". In II Tim. iii. 16 and 17, the Word of God is to be studied and read, so that by it the man of God may be thoroughly equipped for every "good work". Moreover, in the last chapter, Timothy is exhorted to take up, not the profession, or office, or calling of an evangelist, but rather the "work" of an evangelist.

If ever there was a worker, Paul was one, and yet, more than any other writer of the N.T., he emphasizes again and again the grace of God.

> "By the grace of God I am what I am; and His grace which was bestowed upon me was not in vain; but I laboured more abundantly than they all: yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me" (I Cor. xv. 10).

Returning now to II Tim. i. 9, let us examine a little more closely the end of the verse: "According to His own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before age times." The Apostle looks back to a period before the ages began, and looks forward to "that day" when Onesiphorus would find mercy of the Lord (II Tim. i. 18), and he himself would receive the crown of righteousness (II Tim. iv. 8). It was in view of "that day" that the Apostle could stand unashamed by the circumstances of his own immediate time (II Tim. i. 12). In contrast with "the present age" (literally, "the age that is now") he puts "that day", and is sustained in all his trials by "the salvation which is in Christ Jesus with aionion glory" (II Tim. ii. 10).

The A.V. translation of II Tim. i. 9: "before the world began", while conveying a sense of great distance back in time, hides from the reader the Apostle's reference to the ages. The same A.V. translation of the same phrase occurs in Titus i. 2: "In hope of eternal life, which God, That cannot lie, promised before the world began." If we insert two of the actual Greek words here, it will be obvious that some alteration in the translation is required: "In hope of aionion life, which God, That cannot lie, promised before chronon aionion." The word "eternal" has very little connection with a "world" that "began", and yet in the same verse the same word is rendered in these two very different ways. Also there is no word in the original that means "began". Chronos means "time", and in this case the noun is in the plural. J. N. D. translates both occurrences "before the ages of time", while Weymouth renders them "before the commencement of the ages". At least there is a recognition here of the word aion, "age", but we feel that aionion should be kept as an adjective, and chronon as a noun in the plural. The phrase "before age times" would seem to fulfil all essential requirements and it is also understandable English.

II Timothy is one of the four great epistles that reveal the truth of the Mystery. In the epistle to the Ephesians, which was written before II Timothy, the Apostle speaks of time period that was directly connected with the election of the Church: "According as He hath chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy" (Eph. i. 4). This statement obviously cannot contradict the later passage in II Tim. i. 9: "An holy calling . . . . . before age times."

We have already discussed the translation and bearing of Eph. i. 4 in a number of articles in Volumes IV. 25, 48, 73 (IV/V. 19, 39, 61); XIV. 62; XVI. 173; XVIII. 147; and have also considered the word translated "foundation", katabole, IV. 28 (IV/V. 22); XII. 122; XIII. 125; XVIII. 16. Without going over the ground again, we merely state here that the results of our investigations into the etymology and usage of katabole, both in the N.T. and in the LXX, led us to reject the translation "foundation", and to adopt instead the word "overthrow". Further study led us to see in Gen. i. 2 the actual "overthrow of the world", and so to realize that the church of the Mystery was chosen in Christ before Gen. i. 2. II Tim. i. 9 supplements this revelation by speaking of the same church as being called according to that purpose and grace which was given to it in Christ "before age times". We are therefore able to say that the "ages" began after Gen. i. 2, and hence are coincident with the present creation.

Scripture also indicates that the ages will cease. The same two Hebrew words as are used in Gen. i. 2 also appear in Isa. xxxiv. 11, where "without form and void" becomes "confusion and emptiness". In the same chapter we have a passage that indicates the dreadful judgment that will come at the end of the day of the Lord:

> "And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll" (Isa. xxxiv. 4).

This even ushers in the day of God, as we learn from II Pet. iii. 12:

> "Looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God, by reason of which (not 'wherein') the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat? Nevertheless we, according to His promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness" (II Pet. iii. 12, 13).

It looks, therefore, as though the "ages" begin and end with the present creation, while the Mystery goes back before the ages for its inception, and anticipates the new creation in its present character and calling.

In contrast with the period denominated "before the age times" is the "now" of the succeeding verse in II Timothy, and the "due times" in Titus.

> "Before the age times, but is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, Who hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel; whereunto I am appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles; for the which cause I also suffer these things" (II Tim. i. 9-12).
>
> "Before the age times, but hath in due times manifested His word through preaching, which is committed unto me according to the commandment of God our Saviour" (Titus i. 2, 3).

If, as we have seen, the phrase "before the age times" is characteristic of the Mystery, the evident parallelism of the two passages makes it impossible to place the epistle to Titus anywhere except after Acts xxviii.

The Apostle uses a very unusual word in connection with the birth and earthly ministry of Christ—he speaks of it as an "appearing" or "manifestation". This word epiphaneia usually refers to the Saviour's future "manifestation", as in II Tim. iv. 1, 8; Titus ii. 13; I Tim. vi. 14; and II Thess. ii. 8. The verbal form phaneroo is also found in Col. iii. 4. Before going further it will perhaps be helpful if we see all these passages together:

> "The Lord Jesus Christ, Who shall judge the quick and the dead at His appearing (epiphaneia) and His kingdom" (II Tim. iv. 1).
>
> "A crown of righteousness, which the Lord . . . . . shall give me at that day: and not to me only, but unto all them also that have loved His appearing (epiphaneia)" (II Tim. iv. 8).
>
> "Looking for that blessed hope, and the appearing (epiphaneia) of the glory of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ" (Titus ii. 13).
>
> "That Wicked . . . . . whom the Lord shall consume . . . . . with the brightness (epiphaneia) of His coming (parousia)" (II Thess. ii. 8).
>
> "Keep this commandment . . . . . until the appearing (epiphaneia) of our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Tim. vi. 14).
>
> "When Christ, Who is our life, shall appear (phaneroo), then shall ye also appear (phaneroo) with Him in glory" (Col. iii. 4).

The particular aspect of the Second Coming referred to in II Thess. ii. is that of the parousia, a term used throughout the Scriptures covered by the hope of Israel. All the other passages quoted above refer to the hope of the church. As, however, we must go into this question thoroughly when dealing with II Tim. iv. 1 and 8, we will not say anything more for the moment.

II Timothy, Titus, and I Timothy all use the word "appearing" in connection with both the first and the second advents. We have already mentioned the dual reference of II Tim. i. 9 and iv. 8, and we must now add Titus iii. 4, and I Tim. iii. 16:

> "But after that the kindness and love of God our Saviour toward man appeared (epiphaino), not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us" (Titus iii. 4, 5).
> "A pillar and ground of truth, and confessedly great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest (phaneroo) in the flesh" (I Tim. iii. 16).

When we look at II Tim. i. 10 again we perceive that there are two words in this verse that mean "manifest": "But is now made manifest (phaneroo) by the appearing (epiphaneia)." The Apostle's intention is evidently to show that the grace that was ours by promise and purpose "before the age times", and consequently sealed up in the "secret" that was "before the overthrow of the world", was made manifest by the coming of Christ in the likeness of sinful flesh. Titus brings these two aspects together in chapter ii.:

> "For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared (epiphaino) . . . . . that we should live . . . . . looking for that blessed hope, and the appearing (epiphaneia)" (Titus ii. 11, 13).

Moreover, as the reader may have observed, just as Paul speaks of a "sound mind" (sophronismos) in the context of II Tim. i. 9, 10, so in Titus ii. 12 he speaks of "living soberly" (sophronos). The internal evidence that I Timothy, II Timothy, and Titus all belong to the same group and period is too strong to be set aside.

The appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, both at His first and at His second advent, is a subject so vital to our hope and peace that we cannot possible deal with it hurriedly at the close of an article. That wonderful theme must be given due consideration in our next article, so for the moment we must stop. What wealth there is in this short epistle, and what a privilege to be free to enter into its teaching in the day of departure that it so forcefully predicts.

#8. Light on Life and Immortality (i. 10 - 12).
pp. 122 - 128

The Apostle introduces the promise of life into his salutation in each of the three pastoral epistles—I Timothy, II Timothy and Titus (I Tim. i. 1, 2; II Tim. i. 1, 2; Titus i. 1-4). There is much in common between this last passage, Titus i. 1-4, and II Tim. i. 9-11. Both speak of life, and of promise or purpose, and both refer to the period before the "age times". Both speak of "now" or "due times", both speak of this message as being committed to Paul, and both speak of "the Saviour".

We must now take up our study again from the point where we were obliged to leave it—namely, at the mention of the Saviour's first "appearing":

> "Who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel" (II Tim. i. 10).

There are two little particles here (men and de), often left untranslated in the A.V., that must not be passed by without comment. Men is defined as a "conjunction implying affirmation or concession", while de is "generally placed in opposition to it in an adversative sentence". The two words occur, for example, in II Tim. iv. 4:

> "And they will indeed turn away their ears from the truth, yet unto fables they will be turned aside."

The particles are also used several times by Peter in his first epistle:

> "Who verily was foreordained before the foundation of the world, but was manifested in these last times for you" (I Pet. i. 20).
> "Disallowed indeed of men, but chosen of God and precious" (I Pet. ii. 4).
> "Being put to death indeed in the flesh, but quickened by the spirit" (I Pet. iii. 18).
> "That indeed they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit" (I Pet. iv. 6).

The English expression, "On the one hand . . . . . on the other hand", would often be a suitable translation of these two words men and de. In II Tim. i. 10, for example, the Saviour came, on the one hand to abolish death, but on the other hand to bring life and immortality to light. Let us ponder these two sides of His gracious work.

First—He hath abolished death. The word katargeo, "to abolish", reminds us of the reference to "not according to our works" in II Tim. i. 9, for the word is a compound made up of kata, an intensive preposition, and argos, "idle", "not working"=from a, "not" and ergon, "work". The word katargeo enters so intimately into the Apostle's teaching that we must spare no pains to possess ourselves of its meaning.

The true significance of the word cannot be settled merely by its dictionary meaning. We must also examine its usage. We note first that no other writings, outside Paul's epistles, contains the word, except the Gospel according to Luke. As Luke is specially associated with Paul and his ministry, we may say, therefore, that the word is exclusively Pauline in its usage.

The Usage of Katargeo in the N.T. (A.V. renderings).

"Cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground?" (Luke xiii. 7).
"Shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect?" (Rom. iii. 3).
"Do we then make void the law through faith?" (Rom. iii. 31).
"The promise made of none effect" (Rom. iv. 14).
"That the body of sin might be destroyed" (Rom. vi. 6).
"She is loosed from the law of her husband" (Rom. vii. 2).
"Now we are delivered from the law" (Rom. vii. 6).
"To bring to nought the things that are" (I Cor. i. 28).
"The wisdom . . . . . of the princes of this world, that come to nought" (I Cor. ii. 6).
"God shall destroy both it and them" (I Cor. vi. 13).
"Whether there be prophecies, they shall fail" (I Cor. xiii. 8).
"Whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away" (I Cor. xiii. 8).
"That which is in part shall be done away" (I Cor. xiii. 10).
"When I became a man I put away childish things" (I Cor. xiii. 11).

"When He shall have put down all rule" (I Cor. xv. 24).
"The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death" (I Cor. xv. 26).
"Which glory was to be done away" (II Cor. iii. 7).
"If that which is done away was glorious" (II Cor. iii. 11).
"Could not . . . . . look to the end of that which is abolished" (II Cor. iii. 13).
"Which vail is done away in Christ" (II Cor. iii. 14).
"That it should make the promise of none effect" (Gal. iii. 17).
"Christ has become of no effect unto you" (Gal. v. 4).
"Then is the offence of the cross ceased' (Gal. v. 11).
"Having abolished in His flesh the enmity" (Eph. ii. 15).
"Shall destroy with the brightness of His coming" (II Thess. ii. 8).
"Who hath abolished death" (II Tim. i. 10).
"That through death He might destroy him that had the power of death" (Heb. ii. 14).

The exact opposite of this word katargeo is katergazomai, which occurs 24 times. Of these 24 Paul is responsible for 21. If forms, therefore, a fitting comparison with katargeo in its scope and distribution. We will not ask the reader to go through the 24 occurrences at the moment, though this must certainly be done if the true sense of this important word is to be obtained. For the moment, we simply note that the A.V. translates the word as follows: "Be wrought" (1); "cause" (1); "do" (6)—not "4" as in Young's Analytical Concordance Index-Lexicon—; "perform" (1); "work" (14); "work out" (1).

As ergazomai means "to work", katergazomai would mean "to work thoroughly", or, as we would say, "to work out". This is the meaning that we recognize in II Cor. iv. 17:

> "Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh out for us a far more exceeding eternal weight of glory."

This also is the meaning which the structure of Ephesians forces us to give to Eph. vi. 13: "Having worked out all", the corresponding passage speaking of the mighty power which is "worked in".

If *katergazomai means "to work out", the negative *katargeo, must mean "not to work out", or, in our way of putting it, "to fail", "to cease", "to be prevented from working out", or in other words, "to render inoperative". The Devil has not yet been "destroyed", but he has been rendered inoperative so far as the exercise of his erstwhile power of death is concerned (Heb. ii. 14). It is still, alas, possible for the child of God to sin, but sin's dominion has been broken, and the body of sin rendered inoperative, so that henceforth we need not be enslaved to sin.

[NOTE: * - The different endings eo and omai are simply indications of a change from active to passive.]

So, in II Tim. i. 10, we learn that by His work on the cross, Christ has rendered death inoperative. This, however, is only the negative side; there is also the positive side—He "hath shed light on life and immortality".

We have seen that the word katargeo is used in connection with death in I Cor. xv. 26: "The last enemy that shall be destroyed, is death." It must be remembered, however, that I Cor. xv. is entirely devoted to the question of resurrection, and, in particular, resurrection from the death brought in by Adam (I Cor. xv. 21, 22). It would hardly seem necessary to insist upon this most evident fact, were it not true that no part of Scripture is exempt from the effects of bias. When one wants a text to prove that there will be a resurrection from the lake of fire, the temptation to use I Cor. xv. 26 is very difficult to resist. And yet the lake of fire and the second death are quite foreign to the theme of the chapter.

The structure of this chapter places the two sets of references to Adam in correspondence, and with them the two-fold reference to the abolition of death. There can be no doubt about the fact of Adamic death in both these sections:

I Corinthians xv. 12 - 58.

A | 12. The fact of resurrection. "How?"
B | 13-33. Adam and Christ. Death destroyed. "When."
C | 34. Exhortation. "Awake."
A | 35. The manner of resurrection. "How?" "With what?"
B | 36-57. The first and last Adam. Death swallowed. "When."
C | 58. Exhortation. "Be stedfast."

When two sections such as B and B are in correspondence, it is usual to find the theme of the first member expanded and further explained in the second, after the intervening subject has been dealt with. The following five subjects in the first section B | xv. 13-33 are expanded in the second section B | xv. 36-57:

(1) THE DIFFERENCES IN THE "ORDER" OF THE RESURRECTION.—"Every man in his own order. Christ the firstfruits, afterward they that are Christ's at His coming. Then cometh the end" (I Cor. xv. 23, 24).
(2) THE RELATION OF ADAM TO MANKIND AND DEATH.—"For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For, as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive" (I Cor. xv. 21, 22).
(3) THE RELATION OF CHRIST TO MANKIND AND TO DEATH AND RESURRECTION.—"But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the firstfruits of them that slept . . . . . by man came also the resurrection of the dead . . . . . in Christ shall all be made alive" (I Cor. xv. 20-22).
(4) THE FACT OF THE DESTRUCTION OF DEATH AND ITS MEANING.—"The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death" (I Cor. xv. 26).
(5) THE TIME PERIODS.—"Then cometh the end, when He shall deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when He shall have put down all rule and all authority and power" (I Cor. xv. 24).

These five subjects receive amplification in B | xv. 36.57:

(1) THE DIFFERENCES IN THE "ORDER" OF RESURRECTION AMPLIFIED.—"There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for star differeth from star in glory, so also is the resurrection of the dead" (I Cor. xv. 41, 42; also 42-44).
(2) THE RELATION OF ADAM TO MANKIND AND DEATH IS AMPLIFIED.—"And so it is written, the first Adam was made a living soul, the last Adam was made a life-giving Spirit. Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural, and afterward that which is spiritual. The first man is of the earth, earthy; the second man is the Lord from heaven" (I Cor. xv. 46, 47).

(3) THE RELATION OF CHRIST TO MANKIND, AND TO DEATH AND RESURRECTION IS AMPLIFIED.—"The last Adam is a life-giving Spirit . . . . . the second man is the Lord from heaven . . . . . we shall also bear the image of the heavenly" (I Cor. xv. 45-49).

(4) THE FACT OF THE DESTRUCTION OF DEATH AND ITS MEANING ARE AMPLIFIED.—"So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God, that giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Cor. xv. 54-57).

(5) THE TIME PERIODS RECEIVE AMPLIFICATION.—"When . . . . . then shall be brought to pass . . . . ." (I Cor. xv. 54).

This reference is found in Isa. xxv. 6-8, and is Millennial in character. The events described take place before the Great White Throne is set up.

If the parallels set out above have any true significance, it is clear that the "destruction" of death in verse 24 is equivalent to the "swallowing up" of death in victory at the blessed resurrection of the saints. Christ Himself was the "firstfruits" of them that sleep. He has "abolished" death so far as He Himself is concerned by His resurrection on the third day, and He has rendered it inoperative now, by extracting its sting, and robbing sin of its strength. When in that future day the believer awakes in resurrection glory, the abolition of death will be complete.

The finest commentator on the Apostle's writings is usually the Apostle himself, and we have sought as far as possible to let him speak for himself. Applying this principle to the verse under consideration, we note that there are two words translated "immortality" in the A.V. The first of these, used in II Tim. i. 10, is aphtharsia, "incorruption". This occurs 8 times, all the references being in Paul's epistles. Aphthartos, the adjective, occurs 7 times, 4 of the occurrences being found in Paul's epistles and 3 in I Peter.

The second word for "immortality" is athanasia, which occurs 3 times, all the references being in Paul's epistles. The word athanasia is made up of a, the negative, and thanatos, "death", so indicating a state exempt from death. The three references are given below:

"This mortal must put on immortality" (I Cor. xv. 53).
"This mortal shall have put on immortality" (I Cor. xv. 54).
"Who only hath immortality" (I Tim. vi. 16).

The eight occurrences of aphtharsia, "incorruption", are given, below. The word is made up of a, the negative, and phtharsis from phtheiro "to corrupt".

"Seek for glory and honour and incorruption, eternal life" (Rom. ii. 7).
"It is raised in incorruption" (I Cor. xv. 42).
"Neither doth corruption inherit incorruption" (I Cor. xv. 50).
"This corruptible must put on incorruption" (I Cor. xv. 53).
"So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption" (I Cor. xv. 54).

"Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ with incorruption" (Eph. vi. 24).
"Shed light on life and incorruption" (II Tim. i. 10).
"In doctrine showing uncorruptness" (Titus ii. 7).

The four occurrences of aphthartos in Paul's epistles are as follows:

"Changed the glory of the incorruptible God" (Rom. i. 23).
"Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown, but we an incorruptible" (I Cor. ix. 25).
"The dead shall be raised incorruptible' (I Cor. xv. 52).
"Now unto the King eternal, incorruptible, invisible" (I Tim. i. 17).

We observe that in I Timothy both words are used. In chapter i. 17 we have the word "incorruptible" and in chapter vi. 16 the word "immortal"; while in both passages we have the statement that God is invisible. Between these two passages we have the wonderful statement that "God was manifest in the flesh" (I Tim. iii. 16). He Who is invisible has shown Himself to man. He is and ever must be incorruptible. And so we read:

"He Whom God raised again, saw no corruption" (Acts xiii. 37).

He ever lives, to die no more. Death hath no more dominion over Him, and He will one day show Who is that blessed and only Potentate, King of kings and Lord of lords, Who only hath immortality.

The resurrection figures prominently in Paul's testimony before his various judges. In Acts xxiii., before the High Priest, he says:

"I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee; of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question" (Acts xxiii. 6).

Before Felix, he says:

"I . . . . . have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust" (Acts xxiv. 15).
"Touching the resurrection of the dead I am called in question by you this day" (Acts xxiv. 21).

Before Agrippa, Paul's testimony is the same:

"Certain questions against him of their own superstition, and of one Jesus, which was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive" (Acts xxv. 19).
"And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers: Unto which promise our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come. For which hope's sake, King Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews. Why should it be a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead?" (Acts xxvi. 6-8).

In chapter xvii. we again find the thought of resurrection emphasized:

"Because he preached unto them Jesus, and the resurrection" (Acts xvii. 18).

It was in connection with this truth, enshrined in the gospel committed to him, that Paul was appointed a "preacher", and an "apostle", and a "teacher of the Gentiles" (II Tim. i. 11). This same threefold ministry is referred to in I Tim. ii. 7, and the reader should note the interesting parallel between this passage and Titus i. 1-4. Both passages speak of "due time", and the Apostle's solemn words in I Tim. ii. 7: "I speak the truth in Christ, I lie not" are echoed by the words "truth", and "cannot lie" in Titus i. 1-4.

We have now dealt with II Tim. i. 8-12—, and we must next pass on to verses 12-14. In both of these sections the thought of not being ashamed is prominent. As we realize the issues of life and death involved, and begin to apprehend the love that gave and planned, shame will surely give place to a desire to serve, and, if need be, to suffer any loss rather than deny the Lord, Whose sacrifice and resurrection on our behalf have opened the door to life and glory.

The second section (II Tim. i. 12-14), which passes from the gospel committed to Paul to "that good deposit" of truth in which is enshrined the Mystery, we must take up in our next article.

#9. The Good Deposit (i. 12 - 14).
pp. 139 - 143

Like the first subdivision of this section, verses 12-14 of II Tim. i. speak of being "unashamed" of a message, "the good deposit", and of a particular time, "that day". As some time has elapsed since we set out the passage as a whole we here repeat its structure.

B2 | 12-14. Paul—Not ashamed of suffering as prisoner.
SUBJECT.—The Good Deposit.
TIME.—That Day.
f2 | 12. He is able to guard.
g2 | 12. The Deposit.
h2 | 13. Have a form of sound words heard of me.
f2 | 14. Do thou guard.
g2 | 14. The Good Deposit.

As we have introduced a new translation into the structure, we will deal with that first. The words of the A.V., "that which I have entrusted unto Him" (II Tim. i. 12), are, in the original, Ten paratheken mou, and those of verse 14, "That good thing which was committed unto thee", are Ten kalen paratheken. It will be seen that, with the exception of the two words mou, "of me", and kalen, "good", the same words are used in both passages. The R.V. margin informs us that the Greek means "my deposit". If we turn to I Tim. vi. 20, we shall find the same word used there, "O Timothy, keep that which has been committed to thy trust", Ten paratheken.

In II Tim. ii. 2, where we read: "The things which thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men who shall be able to teach others also", the verb paratithemi is used. Moreover, in I Tim. i. 18, the Apostle uses the same verb where he says: "This charge I commit unto thee, son Timothy, according to the prophecies which went before on thee, that thou by them mightest war a good warfare, holding faith and a good conscience" (I Tim. i. 18, 19).

It is evident that the Apostle has some specific body of truth in view when he uses this word paratheke. This is not only obvious by the way in which he uses it, but in the way in which he hedges it round. He closely associates it with what he calls "things heard of me", and even the gospel itself is that gospel of which Paul was made the herald, and which, in II Tim. ii. 8, he dominates "my gospel". We shall therefore be well advised to go on with our search, so that we may have the full advantage of all the Apostle has to say of this "good deposit".

First of all, in the verse quoted above from I Tim. i., we find that what had committed to Timothy was a "charge". Now the word translated "charge" is paraggeleia. Dr. Young sees in the composition of the word the meaning of "private, or extra, message" which, if it could be supported by evidence of usage, would admirably fit in with the idea implied by paratheke, but, so far as we have discovered, there is no warrant for this opinion. The verbal form paraggello, "to charge", occurs several times in these pastoral epistles, and it will be a contribution to the subject before us if we make ourselves acquainted with its occurrences and contexts.

> "That thou mightest charge some that they teach no other doctrine" (I Tim. i. 3).

This is an important feature in I Timothy, for the question of the teaching of "other doctrine" comes up again in I Tim. vi. 3, where the A.V. translates the words "teach otherwise". It will be remembered that in II Timothy prominence is given to the thought that Paul and his doctrine had been forsaken. Here, the first step toward that end is seen in the substitution of some other doctrine. It was a part of the charge laid upon Timothy to resist this innovation. The Apostle told Timothy that as the times grew worse, the day would come when some would not endure sound doctrine, and exhorted him to "preach the word" and "do the work of an evangelist" (II Tim. iv. 2-5), and while he uses neither paraggeleia nor paraggello the Apostle still introduces this exhortation with a "charge" (II Tim. iv. 1).

Returning to the first Epistle we find the next reference.

> "Now the end of the charge (A.V. 'commandment') is love out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and faith unfeigned" (I Tim. i. 5).

Surely it is clear that the repetition of the words "pure", "conscience" and "unfeigned faith", in the opening charge of the second Epistle binds the two epistles together as dealing with a common subject. For clearness and completeness we will repeat the reference already given from the first Epistle.

"This charge I commit unto thee, son Timothy, according to the prophecies that went before on thee, that thou by them mightest war a good warfare" (I Tim. i. 18, 19).

Here "good warfare" is kalen strateian. Is it accident or design that links together the "committing" of II Tim. ii. 2, with the good soldier (kalos stratiotes) of II Tim. ii. 3?

"Godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise (same word as 'charge') of the life that now is, and of that which is to come" (I Tim. iv. 8).

Here we have a reference to the "promise of life" which the Apostle introduces into II Tim. i. 1.

"I give thee charge in the sight of God, Who quickeneth all things, and before Christ Jesus, Who before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good confession; that thou keep this commandment, with spot, unrebukeable, until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Tim. vi. 13, 14).

What Paul enjoined on his son Timothy, he did himself. In view of that same "appearing" he finished his course, and knew that he would be "preserved" unto that heavenly kingdom (II Tim. iv. 8, 18).

The reader will have noticed that the word paraggeleia contains the same root that gives us the word euaggelion, "gospel". There are four references to this gospel in the pastoral epistles.

"According to the gospel of the glory of the blessed God, which was committed to my trust" (I Tim. i. 11).

While the actual words translated "committed to my trust" are not the same as those examined above, the sentiment is similar, for this gospel was "entrusted".

"Hath shed light on life and incorruptibility through the gospel, whereunto I am appointed a preacher" (II Tim. i. 8, 10).

"Remember Jesus Christ, raised out from dead ones, of the seed of David, according to my gospel, wherein I suffer trouble as an evil doer, even unto bonds" (II Tim. ii. 8, 9).

We note the insistence upon the words "my gospel", and remember that the word "preacher" in II Tim. i. 11 is kerux, a "herald". Kerusso, "to preach", kerugma, "the preaching", as well as kerux, "the preacher", occur several times in these pastoral epistles.

"A pillar and ground of truth, and confessedly great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory" (I Tim. iii. 15, 16).

"God our Saviour; Who will have all men to be saved, and come unto the knowledge of the truth . . . . . Who gave Himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time, whereunto I am ordained a preacher, and an apostle (I speak the truth in Christ, and lie not), a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and verity" (I Tim. ii. 3-7).

The Apostle does not limit prayer to any class. Most unlikely ones may be subjects of grace; "Kings" are mentioned, and any knowledge of the kind of persons Kings were when Paul wrote these words makes his language startling.

That all men do not come to a knowledge of the truth is stated in II Tim. iii. 7, but while such are likened to Jannes and Jambres they are not under a decree of reprobation, but they "resist" the truth, which implies the possession on their part of intelligence, therefore responsibility rests upon them.

> "The gospel whereunto I am appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles. For which cause I also suffer these things" (II Tim. i. 11, 12).
>
> "Notwithstanding the Lord stood with me and strengthened me; that by me the preaching (kerugma) might be fully known, and that all the Gentiles might hear" (II Tim. iv. 17).
>
> "On hope of aionion life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the age-times, but hath in due times manifested His word, through preaching (kerugma), which is committed unto me, according to the commandment of God our Saviour" (Titus i. 2, 3).

It is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the good deposit was that revelation of the mystery committed first of all to Paul, as the prisoner, and, by him, re-committed to Timothy and to faithful teachers down the age.

Closely associated with this good deposit, which Timothy is enjoined to guard, is the parallel exhortation:

> "Hold fast the form of sound words, which thou hast heard of me, in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus" (II Tim. i. 13).

The word "hold fast" is simply "have". The word "form" is hupotuposin, and occurs in but one other passage.

> "Howbeit for this cause I obtained mercy, that in me, as a first one, Jesus Christ might shew forth all longsuffering, for a pattern to them which hereafter believe on Him to life everlasting" (I Tim. i. 16).

The word translated "form" and "pattern" is in use as the name of a figure of Rhetoric. One of the Latin names for this figure is Adumbratio, "a shadowing out, or a sketching out, in words". Paul's life and doctrine, the manner of his conversion, and the message he was raised up to give, form the preliminary sketch that all must follow who seek to bear their testimony to the truth of the mystery.

There is the possibility that the expression, "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am first" (I Tim. i. 15) really means that he, Paul, was the first one to be saved by "Christ Jesus". We know that the Lord met him on the road to Damascus, and that Paul asked, "Who art thou, Lord?" The reply was, "I am Jesus", and while it is true that "Jesus Christ" and "Christ Jesus" are both names of the one glorious Person, the reversal of names in the title has important significance.

From the text of the R.V. we discover that Paul is the only N.T. writer who uses the title "Christ Jesus". According to the R.V. Acts xxiv. 24 should read "Christ Jesus", as also Rom. vi. 3, 11, 23; viii. 11, 34; xv. 16, 17; I Cor. i. 4; II Cor. i. 1; Gal. ii. 16 (2nd ref); iii. 14; v. 6, 24; Eph. i. 1; ii. 20; iii. 1, 6; Phil. i. 1 (twice), 8, 26; Col. iv. 12; I Tim. i. 1, 2 (three times); iv. 6; v. 21; II Tim. i. 1, 10; ii. 3; iv. 1; Titus i. 4; and Philemon 9.

On the other hand, in the R.V. Heb. iii. 1 reads "Jesus", while I Pet. v. 10 and 14 both read "Christ". According to the Revised Text, the Apostle has used the title "Christ Jesus" with greater frequency than the A.V. shows, but only in the epistles to the church or to Timothy, Titus and Philemon; never in the Epistle to the Hebrews.

The revelation of the mystery is impossible apart from the ascended Christ, and He is accordingly set forth in Paul's ministry as "Christ Jesus". The number of occurrences of this title in Paul's ministry is 80, the number that stands for resurrection, lordship, the octave, a fresh start, newness. This number includes the one reference in the Acts, namely, xxiv. 24. Paul did not hesitate to speak to the Roman ruler concerning the faith that is in "Christ Jesus". Sometimes the preaching of what is miscalled "the simple gospel" is a betrayal, and often is neither "simple" nor "good news".

Coming back therefore to II Tim. i. 12-14 we see that the Apostle so believed the truth entrusted to him that neither prison, suffering, nor desertion could make him ashamed, for he had implicit confidence that the Lord Who had entrusted him with so sacred a deposit of truth was well able to guard it until that day. To help Timothy in this sacred stewardship, Paul tells him to have ever before him, as an adumbration, or sketch, the sound words that he had heard of him among many witnesses (II Tim. ii. 2), and which Timothy had believed and towards which he had shown such love. "Guard", said the Apostle, "that good deposit by the holy ghost which dwelleth in us".

Pneuma hagion ("holy spirit") without the article (the) usually refers to one of the "gifts of the Spirit" and, in this case, to that gift which was in Timothy by the laying on of the Apostle's hands (II Tim. i. 6), and which he had exhorted him to stir up and use.

To-day we have no gift like that possessed by Timothy, yet we have something which Timothy did not posses, the complete Scriptures, and to-day He Who knows the frailty of the earthen vessel will stand by every one of like mind with Timothy as He stood by Paul at the beginning. May we be mindful of the "pattern" and "guard the good deposit".

#10. A Ministry of Refreshing (i. 15 - 18).
pp. 232 - 234

There now remains to be considered the third reference to being ashamed which completes the study of II Tim. i. 8-18:

B3 | 15-18. Onesiphorus—Not ashamed of chain of prisoner.
SUBJECT.—Service.
TIME.—That day.
f3 | 15. Thou knowest.
g3 | 15. In Asia. All turned away from me.
h3 | 16. The Lord give mercy.
g3 | 17. In Rome, He sought and found me.
h3 | 18. The Lord grant mercy.
g3 | 18. In Ephesus, He ministered unto me.
f3 | 18. Thou knowest very well.

The lowly yet faithful ministry of Onesiphorus may have been introduced here for Timothy's encouragement in his stand for the truth that was now the object of such animosity and opposition.

"This thou knowest" (II Tim. i. 15).
"Thou knowest very well" (II Tim. i. 18).

In reminding Timothy of the service of Onesiphorus, two words which we must notice are used by the Apostle, eideo and ginosko.

When Paul would speak of the defection of those in Asia, he was telling Timothy something of which he had but heard, not of which he had full and personal knowledge, for eideo, means "to perceive" and that the subject of the knowledge has come within the observer's sphere. But the ministry of Onesiphorus at Ephesus was something more intimately known and understood by Timothy, seeing that he was present at Ephesus at the time concerned, and had been there for some time prior to Paul's second apprehension (I Tim. i. 3).

The occurrences of eideo in II Timothy are:-- "Greatly desiring to see thee" (i. 4).

"This thou knowest" (i. 15).
"I know Whom I have believed" (i. 12).
"Knowing that they do gender strifes" (ii. 23).
"Knowing of whom thou hast learned them" (iii. 14).
"Thou hast known the holy scriptures" (iii. 15).

The occurrences of ginosko in II Timothy are:--

"Thou knowest very well" (i. 18).
"The Lord knoweth them that are His" (ii. 19).
"This know also" (iii. 1).

"Very well" is the comparative, and means "This thou knowest better (than I can tell you)".

While the expression "all they which are in Asia" could indicate a universal apostacy in the area concerned, such is not the fact, for at least Timothy, Onesiphorus, Aquila and Priscilla stood firm (II Tim. iv. 19). He appears therefore to refer here to his "first defence" when all men forsook him (II Tim. iv. 16). Doubtless there would have come with Paul, from different centres, witnesses whose testimony to the law-abiding character of the Apostle's ministry would have been valuable, but the attitude of Nero and the Roman government to Christianity was so terrifying that, when the moment arrived, Paul was left in the lurch so far as human aid was concerned. We do not know why particular mention is made of Phygellus and Hermogenes, but it is possible that they were special witnesses, and their defection would therefore be keenly felt by the Apostle. Or they may have been leaders of a party that was antagonistic to the apostle's teaching.

From the references made by the Apostle to persons and places associated with his second imprisonment, we gather that the Jews of Asia were among his most bitter enemies. Evidently Paul had stood in need of the ministry of Onesiphorus, and the reference to his being unashamed of Paul's chain comes before the reference to his diligent search in Rome, and may indicate the service Onesiphorus rendered while Paul awaited the preliminaries of his trial at Ephesus. Demetrius the silversmith (Acts xix. 24) and Alexander the coppersmith (II Tim. iv. 14) had become enemies of Paul. The attempt on his life and liberty at Ephesus having failed, renewed attacks were made by "the Jews which were of Asia" while Paul was at Jerusalem (Acts xxi. 27-29). Their enmity was increased by the subsequent release of the Apostle, and intensified by the references made to them in the Epistles to the Colossians, to Timothy and to Titus, of which they would not fail to learn. The apprehension of the Apostle at Troas and his arrival before the pro-consul at Ephesus would have been the signal for a renewal of hostility. When Polycarp was martyred in Smyrna, another city of Asia, it is expressly recorded that the Jews were specially eager for his death, "as their custom is" (Polycarp c. 13). Again, Peter's epistles addressed to the believing Jews in Asia, Pontus and the surrounding districts reveal the breaking out in these parts of an intensely fiery trial of Christians.

Into this atmosphere of strife and hatred came the refreshing ministry of Onesiphorus: "He oft refreshed me." Anapsucho is a unique word. It is written of no other servant of the Lord in the N.T. We find the word used in Exod. viii. 15 for a "respite", and the substantive occurs in Acts iii. 20 in the phrase "the times of refreshing".

In the midst of all the evidences of mortal fear, hate and failure, one man is permitted to bring in, with his humble ministry, a foretaste of the day when creation's groan shall be hushed, when "He shall come down like showers upon the parched fields from which the grass has been cut" (Psa. lxxii. 6). It was a ministry like a breath of fresh, pure, air, entering into the room of a fever-stricken sufferer. Neither learning nor great talent is required to perform this service, but it demands unbounded and unselfish love. Could

Timothy listen to this record of loving service unmoved? Would he not provoked to emulation—he, the son of the Apostle in the faith? Later in this epistle Paul urges Timothy to use "diligence" in coming to him at Rome. Is it for this reason that he notes the further ministry of Onesiphorus?

> "But when he was in Rome, he sought me out very diligently, and found me" (II Tim. i. 17).

It appears that had Onesiphorus been ashamed of Paul's chain, or faint-hearted in his search, he might readily have found plenty of excuses for failing to find that Apostle. A great change had come since Acts xxviii. 30, 31. There, Paul had his own hired house, and received all that came in unto him . . . . . no man forbidding him. But now! What could the Apostle do to requite this service? Of himself, nothing. His earthly course was well-nigh run. But there was a crown for all who loved the Lord's appearing, and the attitude of Onesiphorus proved that he possessed this love that will not fail of remembrance in "that day". So the Apostle and this humble fellow-servant will enter their reward together.

> "O Timothy! be there with me, too; O my son! my son! remember that no man is crowned except he strive lawfully. Endure affliction; do the work of an evangelist; make full proof of thy ministry."

Thus, the Apostle seems to have written and chosen his subjects, forgetting his own sorrows in his overwhelming love for his beloved son.

Did Timothy use all diligence? and did he arrive in Rome before winter? Did he stand firm? and did he overcome all his evident timidity? None now can answer. But there will be a day when Paul and Onesiphorus, Timothy and Demas, the writer of this article and his readers, shall stand in the presence of the Lord Who loves us and gave Himself for us. Shall it be said of any of us that we have been ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, or of Paul his prisoner? May the Lord forbid! and rather set His seal upon the study of this epistle to confirm and strengthen us all in this good fight.

Some Titles of Scripture.

#8. The Word of God.
p. 112

In Volume XXX, page 208, we noted nine occurrences of the phrase "The Word of God" in the Acts. There are fourteen passages in the epistles that employ this term (Rom. ix. 6; I Cor. xiv. 36; II Cor. ii. 17; iv. 2; Col. i. 25; I Thess. ii. 13; I Tim. iv. 5; II Tim. ii. 9; Titus ii. 5; Heb. iv. 12; xiii. 7; I Pet. i. 23; II Pet. iii. 5; I John ii. 14).

There are one or two illuminating contrasts used in these passages.

(1) "THE WORD OF GOD IS NOT BOUND" (II Tim. ii. 9).—The joyous and irrepressible spirit of the man who was bound is here wonderfully evident.
(2) "NOT AS THE WORD OF MEN" (I Thess. ii. 13).—Praise that its reception from God by the Thessalonians worked effectually in their conduct.
(3) "NOT OF CORRUPTIBLE SEED" (I Pet. i. 23).—The context proceeds to contrast the withering grass and falling flower of the flesh and its glory, with the word of the Lord which endureth for ever.

"What is the chaff to the wheat? saith the Lord."

#9. The Word of Truth.
p. 143

Five times do the epistles use the title "The Word of Truth" (II Cor. vi. 7; Eph. i. 13; Col. i. 5; II Tim. ii. 15; James i. 18).

The apostle Paul included "the word of truth" among those things that approved him as a minister of God; he uses it as a synonym for the gospel of the salvation of the Ephesians believers. The word of the truth of the gospel included the hope which was laid up in heaven for the Colossian believers. In his last epistle, Paul gives us that most important principle, "rightly dividing the word of truth", and James uses the word of truth in connection with the believer's begetting, as Peter uses the word of God (I Pet. i. 23).

#10. The Scripture.
p. 240

While graphe, the Greek word translated "Scripture" means anything "written", being derived from grapho "to write", yet it is a remarkable fact worthy of attention, that while graphe occurs 51 times in the N.T. it is never translated by any other term than "Scripture". These are "The Writings" par excellence and stand in a class by themselves. Similarly, the expression, "It is written" is used exclusively to refer to what is written in the Holy Scriptures, and not what is written generally.

These "Scriptures" are denominated "holy" (hagios) in Rom. i. 2, and "holy" (ta heira, priestly, sacred) in II Tim. iii. 15. Here, however, another word is introduced. The word translated "Scripture" in II Tim. iii. 15 being not graphe but gramma, referring to the "letters" themselves rather than the resulting "Scripture". Gramma occurs in Gal. vi. 11, II Cor. iii. 6, John v. 47, vii. 15 and elsewhere.

In usage graphe "implies a reference to the authoritative character of the Scriptures as a whole", whereas gramma "describes them (the Scriptures) as the object of study" (DR. E. W. BULLINGER).

Tools for the Unashamed Workman.

#1. The History of the Concordance.
pp. 234 - 237

The "unashamed workman", in the title of this series, is, of course, a reference to II Tim. ii. 15, and the "tools" are, therefore, those belonging to the study rather than to the workshop. In the series entitled "The Volume of the Book" (Volumes XX to XXV) we sought to give some idea of the composition and growth of the inspired Volume. In the series "With all thy getting, get understanding" (Volumes XXII to XXVII) we sought to give a word of guidance on the use of argument. In the present series we deal rather with those aids to understanding and research that God in His providence has supplied for our use—beginning with that most useful of "tools", the Concordance.

We do not know who it was that devised the first Concordance to the Scriptures, but the first of which we have authentic record was that published by Anthony of Padua (A.D.1195-1231). His work was entitled Concordiantiæ Morales, and was founded upon the Vulgate. Cardinal Hugo, who died about 1262, followed Anthony, and compiled a Concordance to the Scriptures, in which he employed the labours of no less than 500 of his brethren. The reader has probably never seen a single sheet of this work, and possibly has never even heard the name of the compiler. Nevertheless from this man's work have sprung the many and improved Concordances that have since seen the light. Conrad of Halberstadt in A.D.1290, and John of Segovia in the following century improved upon Hugo's Latin Concordance, while in A.D.1438 Rabbi Mordecai Nathan commenced his Hebrew Concordance—a work which involved ten years of strenuous labour for himself and his assistants. This Hebrew Concordance was printed in Venice, Basle and Rome, and in 1556 was translated into Latin by Reuchlin. In A.D.1621 Calasio, a Franciscan friar, corrected many errors in Rabbi Nathan's work, and remedied certain other deficiencies. He entitled his work, which was in four folio volumes, Concordantiæ Sacr. Bibl. Hebr. Et Latin. Another Hebrew Concordance, based upon Rabbi Nathan's, but of greater accuracy and more satisfactorily arranged, was prepared by John Buxtorf, and published in Basle by his son in 1632. Leaving out several further modifications of this work published on the Continent, we come next to 1754, when John Taylor, D.D., published in London his Hebrew Concordance, adapted to the English Bible, disposed after the manner of Buxtorf. Another important name in this connection is that of Dr. Julius Furst, of Leipzig, who improved upon Buxtorf's concordance, using Vanderhoogt's corrected text, and incorporating Rabbinical significations, explanations in Latin, references to the LXX and other helpful features. This Concordance is a work of very great value.

Of Concordances to the LXX (the Greek translation of the Old Testament) two ancient, and one modern, must be mentioned. In 1602 Conrad Kircher of Augsburg, published his Greek Concordance of the Old Testament, containing Hebrew words in their alphabetical order. In 1718, a minister of Groningen, Abraham Trommius by name, published in his 84th year his Greek Concordance to the LXX. In this work the Greek words are placed in alphabetical order, and the equivalent Hebrew references to the Greek Versions of Aquila, Symmachus and Theodotion are also given* (* - For these and allied matters the reader is referred to the series entitled: "The Volume of the Book".). The words of the Apocrypha are also listed, and two Indexes are included, one Hebrew and one Chaldee. The volumes are bulky, and the print is not easy to read, but they are immensely useful, and we regard this work by Trommius as one of the finest "tools" we possess. The reader will see it occasionally offered for sale by second-hand book-sellers, generally from thirty shillings upwards. It is worth a small library of books to the workman who will use it.

The Concordance to the Septuagint, compiled by Hatch and Redpath and published in six volumes, in 1892-6, with a supplement on Proper Names in 1900, is the most recent work on the subject.

Of Concordances to the Greek N.T., the earliest of which we have record was that published in Basle in 1546 entitled Xysti Betuleu Concordiantiae Graecae Novi Testamenti.

The Greek N.T. was first divided into verses by Robert Stephens. He purposed making a Greek Concordance, but had only commenced the work, when he died in 1589. The Concordance was at length published by his son Henry Stephens in 1594, but there were many inaccuracies in it. In 1638 Erasmus Schmidt's Concordance to the Greek N.T. was published by his heirs. Erasmus Schmidt himself died before his work could be published—he rests from his labours and awaits his reward. The work was re-issued in 1717 at Geneva, and again by the University of Glasgow, in 1819. In 1842 Carl Bruder issued a complete edition of it and in 1868 another, slightly modified, was published by Otto Schmoller. A worn and battered Concordance of pocket size is never absent from the desk of the present writer. It is an abridged edition of Erasmus Schmidt's Concordance made by William Grinfield in 1830, and published by Bagster. This is most useful "tool", and one that no student can easily do without.

Two Concordances published during the last hundred years must next be mentioned. The Englishman's Greek Concordance to the New Testament gives alphabetically every word in the Greek N.T., together with the passages in which the word occurs in the English Translation. An index at the end of the volume enables any one who has the slightest acquaintance with Greek to use the Concordance with ease. In 1877 Dr. E. W. Bullinger published his Critical Lexicon and Concordance to the English and Greek New Testament, together with an index of Greek words and several appendices. This Concordance shows at a glance the Greek word, with its literal meaning, corresponding to every English word in the text or margin of the New Testament. The author acknowledges his indebtedness to the Englishman's Greek Concordance, and to the Critical Greek and English Concordance by Hudson, Boston, 1871-5. The work is characterized by the lucidity and thoroughness that are rightly associated with the name of Dr. Bullinger.

Reverting to Concordances that deal with the Hebrew, we must now refer to The Englishman's Hebrew and Chaldee Concordance of the Old Testament (1843). To read the introduction to this work is to be humbled. The prodigious labour involved, and the pains that were taken to ensure completeness and accuracy, can only be appreciated by patiently reading the Editor's explanation. Upon revising the second sheet of the Concordance it alone was found to contain 300 citations not found in the works of Rabbi Nathan, Buxtorf, Marius, Trom, or Kircher. Furthermore it became necessary that a census should be made of the words of the Bible. For example, there are seven words in the Hebrew of Gen. i. 1, and seven separate labels were therefore prepared—and so on throughout the O.T. The work is an invaluable help to those who otherwise, through ignorance of the Hebrew, would never have access to the deepest treasures of the Scriptures.

Other Concordances of interest are The Bible Student's Concordance by Aaron Pick (1845), which places every word found in the O.T. in alphabetical order, followed by all the Hebrew words and their occurrences, together with pronunciation; and The English Hebrew and Chaldee Lexicon and Concordance of the English Translation, by Dr. W. Wilson (1846).

Of those Concordances that are concerned only with the English Version, that of Alexander Cruden comes easily first. He published it in 1737, and the three editions produced during his lifetime indicate something of the way in which it was received. It should be borne in mind, however, that while this Concordance enables the reader to find his way about the A.V., it is liable in the hands of the unwary to lead to some false deductions. When it is realized that some English words may represent half a dozen Greek ones, and vice versa, it will be readily understood that any doctrine built upon a list of words found in Cruden's Concordance, is a doctrine built upon very insecure foundations. The difficulty is overcome in the Concordances produced by Dr. Strong and Dr. Young. Strong's Exhaustive Concordance to the Bible, and Young's Analytical Concordance to the Bible enable the English reader to avoid false connections based upon the English translation. Strong has a system of numbers, to which all words may be referred, while Young divides up the English words under their corresponding Hebrew or Greek equivalents. Of the two, we prefer the latter.

Another useful, but perhaps not so well-known, Concordance is that produced by Dr. Eadie in 1855. This deals with the Scriptures topically. For examples of these various methods we must ask the reader to wait for the next paper.

There are also other Concordances of varying merit, such as Hazard's Concordance to the American Standard Bible (1922), Moulton and Sedon's Concordance to the Greek Testament (1897), and Walker's Concordance (1894). We have said enough, however, we trust, to make it impossible for us in future to use our various Concordances without a feeling of thankfulness for all the unselfish and unrequited work undertaken by those responsible for their production. We enter to-day into the fruits of their labours, and we shall surely share with them whatever of reward or recognition may be ours by grace when every unashamed workman shall have laid aside his tools to stand in the Master’s presence.

Waiting on the Lord

#3. The waiting upon God that respectfully waits "for" Him. p. 144

We saw in Volume XXXI, page 131, that there is a silent waiting upon God, a being silent in His Presence, and a patient waiting in quiet expectancy.

We now turn our attention to a further aspect of waiting which is expressed in Isa. xxx. 18:--

> "Therefore will the Lord wait, that He may be gracious . . . . . blessed are all they that wait for Him."

Here the waiting is on both sides. The Lord waits, and His people wait. This follows well upon the waiting in silence already considered, for we read:--

> "Now Elihu had waited till Job had spoken, because they were elder than he" (Job xxxii. 4).

It was because he discovered that neither Job nor his friends had uttered all that was true that Elihu was at length constrained to speak. But the reasons that kept Elihu "waiting" are only fully justified when we enter into the presence of God. Elihu said:--

> "I am young, and ye are very old: wherefore I was afraid, and durst not show you mine opinion. I said, Days should speak, and multitude of years should teach wisdom" (Job xxxii. 6, 7).

This consciousness, deepened as it must be when we enter, not the presence of our elders, but the presence of "The Ancient of Days", "The Only Wise God", is well expressed by the attitude of "waiting".

We wait in silence, we wait expectantly. We wait, for the One in Whose presence we tarry is great and wise, just and holy. We do well therefore to hear the injunction of the book of Ecclesiastes:--

> "Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of God, and be more ready to hear, than to give the sacrifice of fools: for they consider not that they do evil. De not rash with thy mouth, and let not thine heart be hasty to utter anything before God: for God is in heaven, and thou upon earth: therefore let thy words be few" (Eccles. v. 1, 2).

#4. The waiting upon God that waits confidently.
p. 184

We have already seen something of the silent waiting upon God (Volume XXXI, page 131), and the respectful waiting (Volume XXXII, page 144), and before we pass on to other aspects of the subject, there are one or two other passages to be considered, in which the same word is used as that which occupied our attention in the last article.

In Psalm cvi., after describing the passage of the Red Sea and the destruction of the Egyptians, the Psalmist continues:

> "Then believed they His words; they sang His praise. They soon forgat His works, they waited not for His counsel: but lusted . . . . . They envied . . . . . They made a calf . . . . . They forgat God their Saviour" (Psa. cvi. 12-21).

The Margin draws attention to the Hebrew of verse 13, and reads: "They made haste, they forgot." Waiting for the Lord keeps memory bright, and it is good for the redeemed to experience and practice it.

Another salutary lesson is found in Isa. viii. It is a day of declension, and departure from the living God. The testimony is "bound up", the law is "sealed", and "the Lord hideth his face from the house of Jacob". Under conditions such as these, the prophet says:

> "I will wait upon the Lord, that hideth His face from the house of Jacob, and I will look for Him" (Isa. viii. 17).

Again, in Habakkuk, in another day of darkness and despair, the prophet learns the lesson of waiting:

> "The vision is yet for an appointed time, but at the end it shall speak, and not lie: though it tarry, wait for it; because it will surely come, and not tarry . . . . . the just shall live by his faith" (Hab. ii. 3, 4).

The Lord's silence must not be misconstrued. It is not indifference, it is not inertia. He awaits His Own appointed time, and the believer, if he would be in harmony with the Lord, will confidently wait too.

We read in Dan. xii., in connection with the prophetic visions: "Blessed is he that waiteth" (Dan. xii. 12), and in Isa. lxiv. The "patience of hope" reaches its fulfillment in the words of verse 1:

> "For since the beginning of the world men have not heard, nor perceived by the ear, neither hath the eye seen, O God, beside Thee, what He hath prepared for him that waiteth for Him" (Isa. lxiv. 4).

#5. The waiting upon God that waits in hope.
p. 204

We turn now to a word which means not only "to wait", but "to wait with hope" (Hebrew yachal).

Job's use of this word in Job xxix. is particularly illuminating:

"Unto me men gave ear, and waited, and kept silence at my counsel. After my words they spake not again; and my speech dropped upon them. And they waited for me as for the rain" (Job xxix. 21-23).

The Psalmist, also uses this word over and over again, as for example in Psalm cxix.: "I have hoped in Thy Word" (Psa. cxix. 74).

In Job xiv. this "waiting with hope" is associated with resurrection:

> "If a man die, shall he live again? All the days of my appointed time will I wait till my change come" (Job xiv. 14).

In certain constructions of the verb, yachal means "to tarry", but even then the thought of hope is still present.

In Gen. viii. 12 we read:

> "And he stayed yet other seven days: and sent forth the dove: which returned not again unto him any more."

In verse 10 of the same chapter we read:

> "And he stayed yet other seven days; and again he sent forth the dove out of the ark."

What a great deal is missed by not reading the original. The same word "stayed" comes in the A.V. of both verses, and yet there is all the difference in the world between the tormenting anxiety of one verse and the confident hope of the other. In Gen. viii. 10 the word means "to twist, to turn, as in a whirlwind, or to writhe as in pain, to tremble, probably from the leaping and palpitation of the heart", whereas in viii. 12 the word means "to wait in hope".

Coming back to Job again, we find the same confidence begotten of hope in chapter xiii.: "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him" (Job xiii. 15). And in Psalm xxxiii. we read:

> "Behold, the eye of the Lord is upon them that fear Him, upon them that hope in His mercy: to deliver their soul from death, and to keep them alive in famine. Our soul waiteth for the Lord ('to wait confidently', as in #4 (page 184) of this series): He is our help and our shield. For our heart shall rejoice in Him, because we have trusted in His holy name. Let Thy mercy, O Lord, be upon us, according as we hope in Thee" (Psalm xxxiii. 18-22).

#6. The waiting upon God that is waiting on Him in service.
p. 220

We turn for a while from waiting on the Lord in prayer, or from waiting for the Lord in hope, to waiting on the Lord in service.

> "They waited on their office according to their order" (I Chron. vi. 32).
> "The priests waited on their offices" (II Chron. vii. 6).
> "Judah rejoiced for the priests and for the Levites that waited" (Neh. xii. 44).

In the Hebrew this word "wait" is amad, "To stand", and, followed by different prepositions, it is used of service rendered to a king.

> "And Joseph was thirty years old when he stood before Pharaoh king of Egypt" (Gen. xli. 46).
> "Happy are thy men, happy are these thy servants, which stand continually before thee, and that hear thy wisdom" (I Kings x. 8).
> "And the king appointed them a daily provision of the king's meat, and of the wine which he drank: so nourishing them three years, that at the end thereof they might stand before the King" (Dan. i. 5).

The words of the Queen of Sheba concerning the felicity of those that stood before Solomon, take on a deeper meaning when applied to those who stand before the Lord. The careful provision and preparation of Daniel and his friends, in order that at the end of the time they might be able to stand acceptably before earthly majesty, should help us to realize somewhat the blessed acceptance that must be ours which makes us meet not only for glory, but for acceptable service here below.

Prophets as well as priests are said to stand before the Lord.

> "Elijah the Tishbite . . . . . said . . . . . As the Lord God of Israel liveth, before Whom I stand" (I Kings xvii. 1).

This word translated "wait" and "stand" has in its meaning the elements of the thought of firmness and endurance:

> "The counsel of the Lord standeth for ever" (Psa. xxxiii. 11).

We are exhorted by the Apostle "To stand", "To hold fast", "To run with patience", "To finish". "Moses said unto them, stand still" (Numb. ix. 8).

War in Heaven (An Analogy).

#3. The Objects before the enemy: "Dominion" and "Worship".

pp. 28, 29

We have seen from the teaching of Scripture that the great enemy, the prime antagonist, in the conflict of the ages, is Satan. We need not be disciples of Hegel to reach the conclusion that contraries are a very real part of any given thing. Though he stand all day in the market place, no man can be a "seller" unless another becomes a "buyer". To eliminate the idea of "husband" and to think only of the idea of "wife" is to attempt an impossibility. The two ideas must always be present in order that either of them can be conceived of as existing. So, also, it is impossible for Satan to be an enemy, or an antagonist, without the existence of some other opposing being or power. When we read "There was war in heaven" we find that Michael and his angels are ranged against the Devil and his angels. At the actual revelation of the Lord Jesus Christ, we see > "Heaven opened, and behold a white horse; and He that sat upon him was called Faithful and True, and in righteousness He doth judge and make war" (Rev. xix. 11).

The Psalmist also saw this apocalypse in anticipation, for he said:--

> "Gird thy sword upon thy thigh, O Most Mighty, with Thy glory and Thy majesty. And in Thy majesty ride prosperously because of truth and meekness and righteousness; and Thy right hand shall teach Thee terrible things. Thine arrows are sharp in the heart of the king's enemies; whereby the people fall under Thee. Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever" (Psa. xiv. 3-6).

Likewise the prophet Zechariah spoke of the same great advent:--

> "Behold, thy King cometh unto thee . . . . . and He (LXX) will cut off the chariot from Ephraim and the horse from Jerusalem . . . . . and His dominion shall be from sea even to sea, and from the river even to the ends of the earth" (Zech. ix. 9, 10).
>
> "Then shall the Lord go forth and fight against those nations, as when he fought in the day of battle. And His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives" (Zech. xiv. 3, 4).

We will not multiply references. The reader can find allusions to battle and war, in association with God himself, throughout the Scriptures. The great title "The Lord of Hosts" is in itself a reference to warfare.

There is a second reason for quoting the passages cited above, for, besides teaching us that the Lord Himself is engaged in this great fight, they indicate something of its object. In later verses of the chapter in Revelation from which we have already quoted occur the words,

> "Out of His mouth goeth a sharp sword . . . . . and He hath on His vesture and on His thigh a name written KING OF KINGS, AND LORD OF LORDS" (Rev. XIX. 15, 16).

The passage quoted above from Psa. xlv. includes the address to The Son, "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever" (Psa. xlv. 6). Likewise Zech. ix. 10 declares "His dominion shall be from sea to sea". The first thing said after the creation of Adam in the image and likeness of God is, "And let them have dominion" (Gen. i. 26). This is expanded in Psalm viii.:

> "Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of Thy hands: thou hast put all things under his feet" (Psa. viii. 6).

The words, "all things under his feet", find their real fulfillment only in Christ.

In Heb. ii. 8, 9 we discover that the first great step to this glorious end was taken at the cross, where He Who was destined to universal dominion, is seen, for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour. In Eph. i. 22, 23, as Head of the Church during the dispensation of the mystery, we find that the position of having "all things under His feet" is associated with His glorious ascension and session at the right hand of God.

Finally, when the goal is in sight, we find the expression "all things under his feet" associated with the destruction of death, the last enemy, when, at last, God shall be "all in all" (I Cor. xv. 24-28).

Satan, as prince of this world, has, and seeks to retain, dominion over the earth as the god of this age, but he further desires to extend that dominion to the hearts of men, and in such a manner as to have their worship. He would not only sit upon a throne; he would sit upon the throne of God. All idolatry can be traced back to that climax of attempted usurpation when our Lord was personally tempted in the wilderness by Satan, who dared to offer Him the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them if He would but "fall down and worship" him. This failed, as it could not but do, but in the book of the Revelation, though it be short-lived, we see at last Satan's end achieved, for it is stated "And they worshipped the dragon" (Rev. xiii. 4).

From these scriptures we may gather some idea of the cause and purpose behind the conflict of the ages, and consequently realize that in that conflict there can be no neutral ground. Either we are "for" the Lord or "against" Him.

#4. Types of the Usurpation.
pp. 62 - 64

When we read the blessed words, "The Lord God omnipotent reigneth" we know that they refer to Christ; He Who was born at Bethlehem, Who lived as man, and Who died and rose again. When Satan is said to be worshipped in Rev. xiii. 4, his agent, the Beast, who was slain and who had been raised again, is, according to verse 12, worshipped too. Throughout the unfolding of the ages there have been men who were outstanding types and foreshadowings of this final "Man of Sin and Son of Perdition". The Pharaoh of the Oppression and of the Exodus is one such character. He "knew not" Joseph (Exod. i. 8), and he "knew not" the Lord (Exod. v. 2). When the Lord visited Pharaoh with judgment, He at the same time executed judgment "against all the gods of Egypt". Egypt not only was an oppressor of Israel, but became a snare, and, in more than one sense usurped the place of God. It snared Abraham and involved him in deceit and loss (Gen. xii.). After the Exodus the people of Israel turned back in heart to the land of bondage; they thought of the "leeks, the onions and the garlick", and said one to another: "Let us make a captain, and let us return into Egypt" (Numb. xiv. 4).

In later days their children trusted in Egypt. Isaiah cried, > "Woe to the rebellious children . . . . . that walk to go down into Egypt, and have not asked counsel at My mouth; to strengthen themselves in the strength of Pharaoh, and to trust in the shadow of Egypt" (Isa. xxx. 1, 2).

>
> "Woe to them that go down to Egypt for help . . . . . the Egyptians are men, and not God: and their horses flesh, and not spirit" (Isa. xxxi. 1, 3).

It will be seen that Egypt is presented in the two very different guises of Oppressor and Refuge. These represent not a change of heart or purpose on the part of the enemy, but only of tactics, leaving unchanged the strategy or main purpose of the conflict.

When Israel were redeemed from Egypt and settled in their land, they were still the object of Satan's attack, and, in the book of Judges, we find this exemplified by another instance of his methods. To anyone acquainted with the significance of number in Scripture, the fact that there were twelve judges of divine appointment and one, making the total thirteen, who usurped this authority over Israel, will suggest a type of evil. The parable which Jotham uttered as a warning to Israel sheds light upon Abimelech's action. In the parable

> "the trees went forth on a time to anoint a king over them; and they said unto the olive tree, Reign thou over us . . . . . they said to the fig tree, Come thou, and reign over us . . . . . then . . . . . to the vine, Come thou, and reign over us . . . . . Then said all the trees unto the bramble, (or thistle, see margin) Come thou, and reign us. And the bramble said unto the trees, If in truth ye anoint me king over you, then come and put your trust in my shadow; and if not, let fire come out of the bramble, and devour the cedars of Lebanon" (Judges ix. 8-16).

Under the figure of the Olive, the Fig and the Vine, Israel's religious privileges, national privileges and spiritual privileges are relinquished in favour of the apostate nation under Antichrist, which will bring destruction in its train.

In the two cases of Pharaoh and Abimelech, the means used differ, but the end is the same.

Saul, the first king of Israel, provides another lesson on the same subject. Israel said to Samuel: "Make us a king to judge us like all the nations" (I Sam. viii. 5). The heart of the matter is revealed in the reply which the Lord made to Samuel's prayer:

> "Hearken unto the voice of the people in all that they say unto thee, for they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected Me, that I should not reign over them" (I Sam. viii. 7).

The reader can supplement this brief analysis by his own study, and will also find the matter extended and developed in the series entitled "FUNDAMENTALS OF DISPENSATIONAL TRUTH". He will find that the additional details thus accumulated will but intensify the impression left by the opening words on the subject, "They have rejected Me, that I should not reign over them".

The reader will already have noted the words referring to Egypt, that though they were "men" and not "God" yet Israel went down to them for help, and "trusted in the shadow of Egypt". So with Abimelech, he made the test of Israel's allegiance just this one thing, "If in truth ye have anointed me king over you, then come and put your trust in my shadow".

When the time came for Israel's kingdom to pass away and the Gentile to be elevated to the throne, we see in Nebuchadnezzar, a further foreshadowing of Satan's final bid for universal dominion. After his accession to the throne, we read that he set up an image in the plain of Dura and sent out a proclamation, bidding all men gather together to its dedication. The essence of Satan's attack through Gentile dominion will be found in the word "dedicate". Nebuchadnezzar dreamed a dream in which the whole of the Gentile dominion had been set forth under the figure of an image, commencing with a head of gold, degenerating through silver, brass, and iron to potter's clay, and which was finally destroyed at the setting up of the kingdom of the Lord. This is recorded in Dan. ii. In Dan. iii., we find this king setting up an image made entirely of gold, and calling upon all men to attend its dedication, which involved the "falling down and worshipping" of the image under penalty of destruction in a fiery furnace. Here is the dedication in the worship of "The State" forced upon the world, a worship which takes the place of the worship of God. It was rejected by the faithful three, as it must ever be by such, until the Lord Himself reigns in righteousness.

In connection with what we have already seen, it is not without significance that in Dan. iv. Nebuchadnezzar's dominion is likened to that of a tree, which, among other things, provided for the beasts of the field, "shadow", so bringing Nebuchadnezzar into line with Pharaoh and Abimelech in their assumption of the divine prerogative.

In all these characters there is one thing that is constant. The working upon the mind of man to "choose" (as he blindly imagines) his own ruler, which ruler actually usurps the place that God alone should occupy. This will be fully demonstrated when the Beast, the False Prophet and the Antichrist bring Satanic rebellion to its dreadful end.

#5. The typical character of the Canaanite.
pp. 181 - 183

While nothing short of a survey of the whole Bible would be necessary to set out full details of the conflict of the ages, we believe that were it undertaken the essential features already adduced would remain unchanged, though they might be more clearly seen in the light of the fuller study. As however we cannot contemplate so exhaustive a study in this series, we pass to others aspects of the subject, and in this article would look rather to the ultimate triumph of truth than dwell longer upon the temporary triumph of evil. For this purpose, we may find much help in the record of Israel's crossing of the Jordan, the fall of Jericho, the partition of the Land of Promise, and the added reward given to Caleb, the overcomer. Before we picture the situation at the brink of Jordan, it will be necessary to go back in history to discover something of the origin and purpose of the Canaanite inhabitants of the Land of Promise against whom Joshua's offensive was directed.

Who were the Canaanites? How did they get to Palestine? and what is their spiritual significance? The Canaanites were a people descended from Canaan, the son of Ham, who was a son of Noah. It will be remembered that upon awakening from sleep induced by drinking the wine he had made, Noah, with prophetic insight, pronounced a curse upon Canaan, the offspring of Ham. In Scripture therefore Canaan stands as one who is already at enmity and subjected to a curse.

The "Land of Canaan" is the name of the land known to us as Palestine, and the Land of Promise, and it is significant in connection with the analogy of terrestrial warfare which we are using, to mark how and when the land of Canaan, and the Canaanites themselves, first appear on the page of Scripture. Abram had received the call of God to go forth into a land that God would show him, and Gen. xi. 31 records the beginning of Abram's response.

> "And they went forth with them from Ur of the Chaldees, to go unto the land of Canaan; and they came to Haran, and dwelt there" (Gen. xi. 31).

The journey commenced, it is true, but it came to a standstill too soon, for having reached Haran, they dwelt there. But after the death of Abram's father, Terah, Abram responded to the divine call:

> "And Abram took Sarai his wife . . . . . and they went forth into the land of Canaan; and into the land of Canaan they came" (Gen. xii. 5).

This second step is followed by a third. Abram passed through a portion of the land of Moreh, but instead of taking possession of the Land of Promise and settling in it, we find him a "tent dweller" possessing no more than a burial place, for which he paid current money to the owner. This third step is partly explained by the next reference to the Canaanite in Gen. xii. 6, "And the Canaanite was then in the land". The note in the Companion Bible on this passage is as follows:

> "It is evident that from Terah's and Abraham's call, Satan knew the line by which 'the seed of the woman' (iii. 15) was coming into the world. In chap. vi. he aimed at the whole human race. Now he aims at Abraham and his land. Here is the second explanation of the words 'after that' in vi. 4. He pre-occupies the territory ready to dispute the advance. The Canaanite 'was there'—'being already there' (xiii. 7). The progeny of the later attempt to corrupt the race had to be destroyed by the sword of Israel, as those 'in the days of Noah' had been by the flood. This attempt to corrupt the 'seed' is evident in Gen. iii., Gen. vi., and in the two attacks made upon Sarah as recorded in Gen. xiii. 11-20 and Gen. xx."

That these Canaanites were not of pure Adamic stock is evident from the description given of them. We read of a race of giants called Anakim, Rephaim, Nephilim, etc., and we must expect that right down the ages Satan's "men" will be supernaturally endowed.

Returning to the record of Gen. xi. and xii., we are conscious that the halt called at Haran and the statement, that by the time Abram did enter the land the Canaanite was already there, are intentionally linked together. We shall find that these Canaanites are indeed indicated as usurpers that must be evicted, and that the interval during which this usurpation was effected is linked with a moral purpose. The interval which enabled Satan to forestall Abram's entry into the land is attributable to human frailty, but when we read Gen. xv. we become conscious of another aspect of this circumstance.

Abraham is told by God that his seed, which are destined to inherit the land of Canaan, shall, nevertheless, for a time, "be strangers in a land that is not theirs"; that a period of four hundred years shall elapse before they return, with great substance, and the inner reason given for this strange interval is, "In the fourth generation they shall come hither again, for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full" (Gen. xv. 16). Israel's failure to possess the land of promise therefore is closely linked with deeper measures of the divine plan. Satan and the Canaanite are "permitted". They shall yet be judged, when the time is ripe, but meanwhile the true heir of promise waits in patience for the ultimate triumph of faith.

When the moment came for Israel to enter into the possession of their inheritance, the Canaanite blocked the way, and so became the object of Israel's attack. We cannot deal with Joshua, Jordan and Jericho here, but will pick up the subject of the relationship of the Canaanite with Joshua's entry into the land and its conquest, as a sequel to Abraham's entry and deprivation, in the next article of this series. Let us however anticipate the ultimate end of the struggle by quoting one passage from the prophets.

"In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses, HOLINESS UNTO THE LORD; and the pots in the Lord's house shall be like the bowls before the altar. Yea, every pot in Jerusalem and Judah shall be holiness unto the Lord of hosts: and all they that sacrifice shall come and take them and seethe therein; and in that day there shall be NO MORE CANAANITE in the house of the Lord of hosts" (Zech. xiv. 20, 21).

#6. The Conquest of Canaan.
pp. 237 - 239

In our last article we devoted most of our space to consideration of the typical character of the Canaanite, and saw that in the Canaanite we have an example of Satan's method of attempting to forestall the purposes of God, and supplant the true heirs of promise.

It will, however, be observed that, as always, the aggressor is first in the field and, for a time, apparently successful, but it is of the very essence of final victory that it shall be based upon truth and righteousness, and often therefore it is correspondingly slow, because no unrighteous advantage may be taken. A further reason for the long delay is a principle suggested in the words of Gen. xv. 16, "The iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full". But, at last, under the leadership of Joshua the time for Israel's entry into his inheritance drew nigh, and in the approach to the land, and in some of the statements made in the record of the conquest of Palestine, we may see certain foreshadowings of the greater conflict of the ages.

There are explicit commands given by God to Joshua that forbade Israel from attacking or attempting to seize the inheritance of Esau, Moab and Ammon: "Meddle not with them" (Deut. ii. 1-5, 8-12, 18-21). We discover that Esau, Moab and Ammon found "giants" in possession of their territory, and "succeeded them", "as Israel did unto the land of his possessions" (Deut. ii. 12).

Access to Israel's inheritance was barred by the Amorites, and the command went forth, "Behold, I have given into thine hand Sihon the Amorite, king of Heshbon, and his land: begin to possess it, and contend with him in battle" (Deut. ii. 24).

When the reader discovers that the words "meddle" of Deut. ii. 5 and "contend" of Deut. ii. 29 are the same in the original, he will therein perceive that there is a principle at work differentiating Esau, Moab and Ammon from the Canaanites. This information will prove serviceable when we come to examine the question as to who are the foes against whom the believer is authorized to contend in the spiritual conflict.

The crossing of the Jordan, the presence and power associated with the Ark and much of the precious typical teaching contained in Josh. iii.-v. cannot be touched on here, but the reader should make a point of re-reading the articles in Volume XXV which deal with this great episode. The actual taking of Jericho, however, must be given a place in this series, and we draw particular attention to one outstanding feature of the siege. We refer to the strange encircling of the city for seven days, culminating, on the last day, in the collapse of the walls, following the sevenfold encompassment of the city on that day.

The trumpets used on this occasion were not the silver trumpets specified in Numb. x. 1, 9, but ram's horn trumpets and "trumpets of Jubilee". The word "Jubilee" is a translation of the Hebrew word Yobel. Its first occurrence is in Exod. xix. 13 and the last in Josh. vi. 4-13. The remaining occurrences are all found in Leviticus and Numbers.

> "And thou shalt number seven sabbaths of years unto thee, seven times seven years; and the space of the seven sabbaths of years shall be forty and nine years. Then shalt thou cause the trumpet of the jubilee to sound on the tenth day of the seventh month . . . . . ye shall proclaim liberty . . . . . ye shall return every man unto his possessions . . . . ." (Lev. xxv. 8-19).

The sounding of the trumpet upon the seventh day of the encircling of Jericho is prophetic:

> "In the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God should be finished, as He hath declared to his servants the prophets" (Rev. x. 7).
>
> "And the seventh angel sounded: and there were great voices in heaven, saying, The kingdom of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of His Christ, and He shall reign for ever and ever . . . . . the nations were angry, and Thy wrath is come . . . . . there was seen in His temple the Ark of His testament" (Rev. xi. 15-19).

While the collapse of Jericho's walls at the very entry of Israel into the land was prophetic of the end, that initial triumph of faith is followed by a slow-moving story in which many lessons are learned by the way. Among them we may instance three that bear upon our theme.

(1) Taking the land (Josh. x. 23).
(2) Possessing the land (Josh. xiii.).
(3) The reward of the inheritance (Josh. xiv., xv.).

These three stages need to be carefully distinguished. First, there is a great difference between "taking" the land, and "possessing" it.

> "So Joshua took the whole land, according to all that the Lord said unto Moses; and Joshua gave it for an inheritance unto Israel according to their divisions by their tribes" (Josh. xi. 23).
>
> "Now Joshua was old and stricken in years; and the Lord said unto him, Thou art old and stricken in years, and there remainest yet very much land to be possessed" (Josh. xiii. 1).

The land was "divided" (Josh. xiii. 7) before it was "possessed", and we can find doctrinal parallels in the New Testament. For example, we read in Rom. vi. 6 that "the old man" was crucified with Christ, yet, just as God said he would drive out the enemy before Israel "not . . . . . in one year" but "by little and little" (Ex. xxiii. 27-30), so, even though the old man was crucified at the cross, and even though the believer is never exhorted to attempt what Christ alone has already accomplished on the cross, yet he is enjoined to put off the old man with his deeds, and to repudiate his former conversation (Eph. iv. 22; Col. iii. 9).

In concluding this article we would refer to the distinct line of truth devoted to the matter of reward for faithful service, in which connection the overcomer and going on unto perfection are spoken of and the running of a race and winning a prize. Col. i. 12 speaks of "the inheritance" in terms of a free, unmerited, gift, but Col. iii. 29 speaks of "the reward of the inheritance" in connexion with faithful service. This feature is found in the record of the conquest of Canaan, not at Jericho or in the taking of the land, but in connection with Caleb whose added portion was called Hebron "because he wholly followed the Lord God of Israel" (Josh. xiv. 6-15).

DEAR FELLOW-BELIEVERS,

When we penned the Foreword to the preceding Volume, the enemy was at our gates, and that Volume bears evidence on many a page of the battle that was fought for its very existence.

We write the present introduction, thank God, with the weight of War removed, but we must still record, to the glory of the God of all grace, that such have been the problems which have beset the publication of The Berean Expositor since the cessation of hostilities, that nothing less than the "help of God" (which we acknowledged in November, 1944), would have enabled us to write these words on the completion of Volume XXXIII in November, 1946.

We are encouraged to know that in many lands those of like precious faith have helped us with their prayers and their fellowship, and that our very continuance is an indication that our Witness is approved of God, and desired by many of His people.

With renewed confidence we therefore subscribe ourselves,

Yours for the truth, rightly-divided,

Epistle to Philippians.
pp. 105 - 108

An examination of passages that have been adduced as evidence that the Epistle belongs to the period before Acts xxviii. and not to the dispensation of the mystery.

More than one reader has submitted a series of objections to the inclusion of Philippians as an epistle of the mystery, contending that the passages which they advance refer rather to a period before Acts xxviii. than after that dispensational boundary. The matter is of importance to us all, and for the truth's sake we should know what these objections are and what answers the Scriptures provide.

(1) "Being confident of this very thing, that He which hath begun a good work in you will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ" (Phil. i. 6).

The suggestion made is that, instead of translating with the A.V., "will perform", the thought is that something commenced by the Lord was now about to be discontinued because of the imminence of the dispensation of the mystery.

"Being confident" is the translation of peitho, which occurs three times in this opening chapter, subdividing the structure into three sections. In verses 12-18 this "confidence" is associated with "the furtherance", not the "discontinuance", of the gospel and, in verses 22-26, not with Paul's departure and "discontinuance", but with Paul's "abiding in the flesh" and the "furtherance" of the Philippians' joy and faith. If, therefore, it is to this furtherance of what had already been begun by the Apostle that the opening remark refers, why, so far as God's work was concerned, instead of "furthering", was He about to discontinue it? However, while this creates an atmosphere, it is not proof. The word translated "perform" may mean "discontinue", and if it does, that is the end of all argument. Accordingly we examine the original for this word and find that it is the Greek epiteleo.

Writing to the Corinthians, the Apostle manifested his great concern that the offering for the poor saints at Jerusalem should be completed:

> "Insomuch that we desired Titus, that as he had begun, so he would also finish in you the same grace also" (II Cor. viii. 6).
>
> "Now therefore perform the doing of it; that as there was a readiness to will, so there may be a performance also out of that which ye have" (II Cor. viii. 11).

Here we have three occurrences of epiteleo, placed in contrast with "begun" and a readiness "to will". It would make nonsense of this chapter to teach that Paul intended the Corinthians to understand that the collection for the saints was to be discontinued or postponed until some future and remote date. As II Cor. ix. 1-5 makes abundantly clear, the argument is all the other way.

This, however, is not the only occurrence of epiteleo in II Corinthians.

> "Having therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God" (II Cor. vii. 1).

Did the Apostle conclude the exhortation commenced in II Cor. vi. 14, by saying "Discontinue holiness", "Postpone all practical sanctification until a future date"? To ask the question is to expose its folly.

Paul uses the word epiteleo once more in relation with the verb "to begin":

> "Are ye so foolish? having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh?" (Gal. iii. 3).

We believe we can confidently leave the question of the correct translation of Phil. i. 6, to the sane judgment of any believer who can weigh evidence, and who believes that all scripture is inspired.

(2) The next objection is that the apostle wrote Philippians in evident expectation of the nearness of the "second coming", and the passage cited for this is Phil. i. 22-25.

The only word in this passage that can be assumed to refer to the Lord's second coming is in verse 23 where the Apostle uses the word "to depart". This word is analuo, the origin of the English word "analysis". It occurs in the noun form, analusis, in II Tim. iv. 6, where the Apostle said "the time for my departure is at hand". This of itself is convincing enough, but it is fortified by the use of another word, spendomai, "to be offered", which also occurs only in Philippians and II Timothy. In Philippians Paul said he would "desire" to depart, and he was willing "to be offered" (Phil. ii. 17). In II Timothy he says the time for his departure was at hand, and that he was about to be offered. The fact that out of all his epistles these two words are used by Paul only in these passages is a fact that cannot be ignored in the attempt to translate his meaning into English: the one thing that is certain is that Paul was referring to his own death, "analysis", and not the "return" of the Lord.

The only other occurrence of analuo is in Luke xii. 36, where it means "to break up" the party, the word erchomai being the word rightly translated "come" and having reference to the second coming. If the opposition say that this is but a "private interpretation", we reply by quoting Rotherham's version, whose author, as far as we know, would not have agreed with the Berean Expositor on many points.

> "Once he may break up out of the marriage feast, that when He cometh, etc."

In the N.T. analuo does not refer to the coming of the Lord. The use therefore of Phil. i. 22-25, as an objection to the inclusion of Philippians as an epistle of the present dispensation is groundless.

(3) The words of Phil. ii. 15 are quoted as containing a phrase that links this epistle with the period before Acts xxviii., the word "nation" being correctly rendered "generation".

> "Sons of God, without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation."

Two fallacies are at the base of this objection. One is that the coming in of the dispensation of the mystery had an effect upon the character of the outside world, and the other, that an epistle of the mystery can make no reference to "generations". If these are not the intentions of the objector, in what do the objections consist? The Saviour called the generation in which He lived and witnessed both "wicked" and "perverse" (Matt. xii. 45; xvii. 17), but they were no less so during the Acts, under the ministry of Peter, nor did they change for the better after Acts xxviii. That the epistles of the mystery do make specific reference to generations, let the following testify:

> "Which in other ages was not made known" (Eph. iii. 5).
> "Throughout all ages, world without end" (Eph. iii. 21).
> "Hid from the ages and from generations" (Col. i. 26).

In these references the A.V. has rendered genea, "ages", twice. In Col. i. 26, they to whom the epistle was addressed were compelled to distinguish between ages and generations. In Eph. iii. 21, the A.V. departs very considerably from the original, which literally should read: "Unto all the generations of the age of the ages."

The epistles of the mystery therefore have of necessity to refer to (i) Generations past; (ii) The generation present; and (iii) The generations to come. Under what rule of interpretation can past and future generations be referred to without contradicting the truth of the mystery, while a reference to the character of the present generation can do so? If reference to the wickedness and perversity of the generations among which the members of the One Body were obliged to live be an objection, then Eph. ii. 1-3; iv. 17-19, 25-31; v. 3-7, 12, 14 and 16 are enough to remove the Ephesian epistle from the present dispensation.

(4) Another objection is based upon Phil. iii. 3, where Paul said: "We are the circumcision".

It is well to remind ourselves that any argument that proves too much defeats itself, for by the same reasoning the epistle to the Colossians must also be rejected. There we read:

"In whom also ye are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands, in putting off the body (of the sins) of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ" (Col. ii. 11).

If Colossians, when it explains spiritual circumcision to be "the putting off of the body of flesh", is to be retained, why should Philippians be rejected when it also explains spiritual circumcision by "having no confidence in the flesh"? The objection is evidently the offspring of bias and cannot be maintained.

(5) The last objection is the fact that Paul refers in Phil. iv. 3, to "the Book of Life".

In the book of the Revelation we read of the Book of Life of the Lamb slain since the foundation of the world. This demands careful examination and our own translation associates the words "since the foundation of the world" with the writing of the book, but for the moment we must leave that question. It would be adding to Scripture to suggest that the Book mentioned in Phil. iv. 3, is the "Lamb's Book of Life", or that it was not written before the foundation of the world, or that there is not a Book of Life for each sphere of blessing. Dispensational changes do not deal with such basic things as sin, death, life, redemption, etc. These retain their original meaning, whether found in Gospels, Acts or Epistles. We should be thankful that the Apostle has indicated that the names of the members of the One Body are in the Book of Life, just as surely as are those of the true seed of Israel.

Having, then, examined these objections we feel that something much stronger and more incisive than the objections we have been considering will have to be advanced before Philippians can be removed from its place among the latest epistles written by Paul, the Lord's prisoner. With its insistence upon service and reward, this epistle is a balance to Ephesians, with its delineation of high privileges.

We may add that the element of reward is not absent from Colossians (Col. ii. 18; iii. 22-25) and that Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians contain a threefold emphasis on axios, "worthy" (Eph. iv. 1; Phil. i. 27 and Col. i. 10), all of which support the retention of Philippians among the epistles of the mystery.

Will Evil Re-enter the Universe?
pp. 129 - 131

This article is written in reply to the question put by a reader: "What guarantee have we that evil will not once again enter into the universe with resultant conditions like those described in Gen. i. 2?" Our answer falls into two parts:--

(1) A condition such as that indicated in Gen. i. 2 is to recur before the ages end, but
(2) A recurrence after the ages have run their course will be impossible.

We must now substantiate these statements, show where they differ and why.

In the first case, the reason for a repetition of chaos lies in the fact that man still has a hand in the direction of events, whereas in the second, God shall be all in all. In each case the answer to the question "Why?" is "Christ". In the first He is not fully accepted, but in the second He is paramount. The former catastrophe results from the attempt of the creature to stand alone, and the removal of such a possibility results from all, at last, coming under the redeeming aegis.

Both Isaiah and Peter speak of a period at the end of this age that will resemble the chaotic conditions of Gen. i. 2. The words "without form and void" (Heb. tohu va bohu) are repeated in Isa. xxxiv.: "And He shall stretch out upon it the line of confusion (tohu), and the stones of emptiness (bohu)" (Isa. xxxiv. 11).

Closely associated with this prophecy are utterances that compel us to see that they are identical with those recorded by Peter in his second epistle.

> "And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll; and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth off from the vine, and as a falling fig from the fig tree" (Isa. xxxiv. 4).

With this prophetic utterance, compare the following words of Peter:-

> "But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up. Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved . . . . ." (II Pet. iii. 10, 11).

It is therefore a certainty that before the end of this age is reached, conditions similar to that of Gen. i. 2 will be repeated, and apparently for similar reasons.

This, however, is but one part of our answer. There is a better and more blessed one. Peter himself follows this picture of chaos come again, with the hope, "Nevertheless we, according to His promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness" (II Pet. iii. 13). The guarantee that never again after the realization of this hope shall evil enter God's universe and bring about a state similar to that of Gen. i. 2 is found in the promises, the purpose, and the power of God, which find their moral ground and guarantee in the redemptive work of the Son of God.

The Promises.—First, we can add to the promise recorded by Peter such passages as,

> "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth . . . . . and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things are passed away" (Rev. xxi. 1-4).

This promise is supplemented by an act of creation: "And He that sat upon the throne said, Behold, I make all things new" which, in turn, is followed by the injunction, "Write: for these things are true and faithful" (Rev. xxi. 5). Unless, therefore, we are prepared to admit that God may be unfaithful to His promises; that the "former things" will not pass away; that the blessed "no more" of Rev. xxi. 4 is but an exaggeration or a pious hope; then we have a guarantee that is beyond doubt that evil will not again rear its head.

The Purpose.—We can supplement the certainty that comes from the promises of God by the statement He has made concerning His purposes. Let us put into the scale the following weighty words concerning the purposes of God.

> "Surely as I have thought, so shall it come to pass" (Isa. xiv. 24).
> "The Lord of hosts hath purposed, and who shall disannul it?" (Isa. xiv. 27).
> "Every purpose of the Lord shall be performed" (Jer. li. 29).
> "The purpose of Him Who worketh all things after the counsel of His own will" (Eph. i. 11).

Not only have we these strong statements to rest upon, but the goal toward which this purpose moves also guarantees against future defection:

> "Whom He did foreknow, He also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of His Son" (Rom. viii. 29).

When this image of the heavenly is attained; when all the redeemed are with Christ and like Him, evil will be impossible:

> "When all things shall be subdued unto Him, then shall the Son also Himself subject unto Him that put all things under Him, that God may be all in all" (I Cor. xv. 28).

Here again is strong guarantee—all in the heavenly image; all in Christ; all in perfect agreement, and God all in all.

Left to himself man brings chaos back to the earth. Man placed in Christ; redeemed by His precious blood; made partaker of the Divine nature; the subject of infinite love; guarded by infinite power; vitally and eternally joined with the risen Christ; shall enter a new realm "wherein dwelleth righteousness".

These are some of the reasons that may be adduced from the Scriptures to give the required guarantee, but they can be strengthened and supplemented by acquaintance with the Scriptural teaching concerning the origin of sin; the end both of the devil, sin and death; the teaching concerning redemption; the essential meaning of the word “new”; the character of God; the extent and nature of His promises, and the declared purpose of the ages.

The original failures recorded in Scripture are not on the part of God but on that of His creatures, while left to themselves. In the world to come, no creature will again ever be left to himself: all will be in Christ; all will be redeemed; all will, at length, be satisfied. It is written of Christ that “He shall see of the travail of His soul and shall be satisfied”. In that, we can safely and confidently rest and find the guarantee sought for in the question put to us.

Psychology tells us that in any undertaking there are two essentials to success: the ability to do, and the wisdom to carry out the project. Of a being possessed of infinite wisdom and unlimited power it could safely be predicated that whatever was undertaken would succeed. Christ is “The Wisdom of God and the Power of God”, and Christ crucified, risen, ascended and reigning is the fullest guarantee that heaven can give that never again shall evil enter into the universe of God.

“Because I live, ye shall live also.”—These words also contain a principle that can be extended endlessly. Because sin and death have no more dominion over Him, they can have no more dominion over us. His throne is for ever, and of His kingdom there shall be no end. As in the personal salvation and hopes of the individual, so in the great purpose of the ages, the key, the foundation, the assurance is Christ.

Anglo-Israelism.
p. 188

Memory is a fickle thing. If by any chance some, so-called, forecast of events made by any of our self-styled modern prophets should approximate to fulfillment, there is a buzz of interest, but how many similar "prophecies", which were stillborn, are forgotten! In reading through Volume XVIII of the Berean Expositor we came across two small items under the heading "Signs of the Times", and read them with renewed interest. We believe the reader of the present volume would be well advised to keep them in mind as specimens of Anglo-Israelism and Pyramid "prophecies".

(1) ANGLO-ISRAELISM, AND THE THRONE OF DAVID.

> "We are coming to the day, says this organ of Pentecostalism, 'Showers of Blessing', No. 46, when we will find the nations of the earth bowing at the feet of our king, for the throne whereon he sits is the throne of the Lord.
>
> Do we realize that the eyes of the people are being opened by divine power to see in the young Prince of Wales, not only man, but an office and setting of God? In this way the Scripture is now being fulfilled in this son of David—'I, If I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me'."

Our comment in 1928 was: "This is either God's blessed truth, or the 'devil's lie'." In 1946 it needs little insight to see which such utterings must be.

(2) PROPHECY OF DISASTER IN WHICH RUSSIA WILL BE WIPED OUT.

> "The next great world war will start on May 28th, 1928, and will continue until September 16th, 1936."

This "prophecy" was made by Mr. Basil Stewart at the Annual Meeting of the British Israelites, Londonderry House, Park Lane, London. He not only uttered this lying prophecy, but he tied it to that other source of deception, the so-called symbolism of the Great Pyramid, saying: "This date is foretold in exactly the same as was August 4th, 1914." The reader should keep in mind that "August 4th, 1914" was discovered after the event!

These utterances should be considered in the light of Deut. xviii. 21, 22, and the system that originates them shunned:

> "And if thou say in thine heart, How shall we know the word which the Lord hath spoken? When a prophet speaketh in the name of the Lord, if the thing follow not, nor come to pass, that is the thing which the Lord hath not spoken, but the prophet hath spoken it presumptuously: thou shalt not be afraid of him" (Deut. xviii. 21, 22).

Doctrine and Practice, Inseparable.
pp. 207, 208

Truth is so vast and its implications so great, that the mind is compelled to analyze, dissect and separate in order to attain to some semblance of understanding, but both teacher and taught should ever remember that truth so dissected is dead: we are but conducting a post-mortem examination. Consequently we differentiate between faith and works, and can consider each separately, yet in strict truth "faith if it hath not works is dead, being alone" (James ii. 17), and so are works without faith. Again, we differentiate most markedly between imputed righteousness and practical righteousness, yet if imputed righteousness never manifests itself in practical righteousness, the original reckoning is vain, being unfruitful.

For the purposes of clearer understanding we speak of Doctrine and Practice, and point out that whereas Eph. i.-iii. contains seven sections devoted to doctrinal truth, Eph. iv.-vi. contains seven corresponding sections devoted to practical truth, but if we imagine it to be possible to receive, believe and enjoy the revelation of the doctrinal section while ignoring the practical teaching of the corresponding section, we are in grievous error. The doctrine cannot be divorced from its divinely described goal, namely, "that we should be holy and without blame". So also the revelation contained in Eph. i. 15-23 presupposes the enlightenment of the eyes: "the eyes of your understanding having been enlightened" (i. 18, perfect, passive participle). The fact that salvation is by grace, through faith, and not of works is not to be separated from the equally emphasized fact that it is nevertheless "unto good works" (Eph. ii. 8-10). The doctrine of Eph. i.-iii. and the practice of Eph. iv.-vi. make one undivided whole, and any attempt to explain the one without the other is vain and must end in confusion. In John's Gospel the Saviour has given one or two words that point in this direction.

> "If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine" (John vii. 17).

"Will do" is the simple future, but this is not what the original says. The R.V. is correct and reads: "If any man willeth to do His will", showing that the "will" of the person is involved. The same care is called for in translating John v. 40, where the A.V. reads, "Ye will not come to Me", which is given a force nearer to that of the original if made to read, "Ye are not willing to come to Me". Other examples of the truth "WILL TO DO" precedes knowledge of doctrine can easily be found.

> "If ye continue in My word, then are ye My disciples indeed" (John viii. 31).

This word "continue" is the translation of meno, a key word of John's Gospel, mostly translated "abide" (see viii. 35). So John xv. 9 says "continue ye in My love", but John xv. 10 says, "Ye shall abide in My love". While a different word is used in John viii. 44, there appears to be a reference to the danger of the negative side of this truth, for it says of the devil that he "abode not in the truth".

First then we have “the will to do”, followed by the taking up of a permanent abode, making the word of the Lord our dwelling-place, our atmosphere, our environment: “Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free” (John viii. 32). Here the knowledge of truth which flows out of this abiding, leads to liberty, and makes free. While the truth is necessarily expressed in language, a knowledge of grammar is essential to its interpretation, yet nothing is said of grammar, of the laws of interpretation, of literary ability: what is stressed is consistent, corresponding practice.

This is one of the primary lessons which all must learn and practice, if they would understand doctrine aright.

TO OLD AND NEW READERS.

p. 228

May we, with becoming humility, invite the reader to consider the testimony supplied by the Index to Volume XXXIII, which is incorporated with the present issue. There will be found valuable expository articles, such as those on “The Acts”, “John’s Gospel”, and “II Timothy”; Dispensational truth both in its positive presentation, as in “Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth” and “Time and Place”, and in those articles which “contend earnestly for the faith once delivered” the reader will see that the witness for which The Berean Expositor was raided up is still living and vigorous. Devotional and Practical articles also find their place, as such Series as “Worship”, “The Pearl of Parables”, and “Trust” will reveal. The earnest student who seeks the equipment provided by the Word is also catered for, the articles entitled “Ephesia” and “Thoroughly Furnished” being of peculiar interest to all engaged in ministry.

We make no comparison with other publications, but we do earnestly commend The Berean Expositor to every believer who would obey the injunction of II Tim. ii. 15, and who would emulate the Bereans (Acts xvii. 11).

The Acts of the Apostles.

#55. The Dispensational Landmark (xxviii. 23 - 31).
"The Kingdom of God . . . . . concerning Jesus" (xxviii. 23).
pp. 1 - 5

It is common knowledge that the Acts and the Gospel according to Luke come from the same writer, and that the last chapter of Luke's Gospel is briefly summarized in the opening verses of Acts i., before the new story commences. Consequently, we must remember that the words of Acts i. 3, "Speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God", are Luke's own summary of several verses found in Luke xxiv., where, with fuller detail, he had given the character and subject-matter of that wonderful teaching. As we draw near to the closing testimony of the Acts, it will help us if we refresh our memory as to the nature of this teaching of the Lord. Where Acts i. 3 summarizes without detail, Luke xxiv. 27 and 44 are more explicit:

> "And beginning at Moses and all the prophets, He expounded unto them in all the scriptures the things concerning Himself."
> "All things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms concerning Me."

We now see that Acts i. 1-15 and Acts xxviii. 23-31 present this comparison. In both there is given a careful exposition of the O.T. scriptures, and the leaders of Israel in Rome are given the same testimony as the disciples received in the land of Palestine. Alas! the results of the testimony were not comparable but, in many points, there is correspondence between Luke xxiv. and Acts xxviii. Let us acquaint ourselves with this important fact.

(1) THE THEME in both passages is "concerning Jesus".

The Greek word peri occurs in Luke xxiv. 4, 14, 19, 27 and 44; and in Acts xxviii. 23 and 31.

> "As they were much perplexed thereabouts."
> "And they talked together of all these things which had happened."
> "And He said, What things? And they said, Concerning Jesus of Nazareth."
> "He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself."
> "All things must be fulfilled which were written . . . . . concerning Me."
> "Persuading them concerning Jesus."
> "Teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ."

(We shall have to deal later with the titles of the Lord here used, but for the moment we will continue the comparison of Luke xxiv. with Acts xxviii.).

(2) THIS THEME relates to "Hope".

> "We trusted (elpizo) that it had been He which should have redeemed Israel" (Luke xxiv. 21).
> "For the hope (elpis) of Israel, I am bound with this chain" (Acts xxviii. 20).

(3) THE BASIS of this teaching and hope was the O.T. Scriptures.

"All that the prophets have spoken" (Luke xxiv. 25).
"And beginning at Moses and all the prophets" (Luke xxiv. 27).
"In the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the Psalms" (Luke xxiv. 45).
"Both the law of Moses and the Prophets" (Acts xxviii. 23).

(4) THE METHOD was that of exposition.

"He expounded unto them in all the scriptures" (Luke xxiv. 27).
"He opened to us the scriptures" (Luke xxiv. 32).
"He expounded and testified" (Acts xxviii. 23).

(5) THE OBJECT was persuasion with a view to belief and understanding.

"O fools and slow of heart to believe" (Luke xxiv. 25).
"Did not our heart burn within us" (Luke xxiv. 32).
"Then opened he their understanding" (Luke xxiv. 45).
"Persuading them concerning Jesus" (Acts xxviii. 23).
"Hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand" (Acts xxviii. 26).

To these close parallels there are added others, more incidental, yet nevertheless having some weight, such as the "lodging" and the "hired house" of the Apostle (Acts xxviii. 23 and 30), and the invitation to abide with the disciples, as it was toward evening (Luke xxiv. 29). Again, the word "slow" in the phrase "slow of heart to believe" (Luke xxiv. 25) is bradus, while the word "dull" in the phrase "dull of hearing" (Acts xxviii. 27) is bareos, both words being derived from baros, "a weight". The eyes of the two who walked to Emmaus "were opened" (Luke xxiv. 31), but of the eyes of the Jews in Rome it is written, "their eyes have they closed" (Acts xxviii. 27). The rebuke "O fools" follows the words, "they saw not" (Luke xxiv. 24), and this same word "to see" and "to perceive" occurs in Acts xxviii. 26 and 27. The fact that there occurs in both passages, "the evening", "the third day" or "after three days", might also be noted. Also that while the name "Moses" has three or four different spellings in the N.T., in Luke xxiv. and Acts xxviii. the spelling is the same. These, however, are but incidental, the five items first noted being sufficient for our purpose.

We have established two important points.

(1) In the preceding article (Volume XXXII, pp. 208-212), from the Apostle's own testimony, the close relationship which his witness, even among the Gentiles, had with the hope of Israel.
(2) A link between the testimony of the Lord Himself "in the land" with that of the Apostle "in Rome".

What we have not discovered is any statement or allusion to a distinct, high, and heavenly calling for the believing Gentile, independently of Israel, the promises made unto the fathers, or the covenants. We are on the very verge of this revelation, but until the crisis is actually reached and Israel set aside "the mystery" was "hid in God".

Let us now return to Acts xxviii. and give the record of this interesting and critical day our closest attention.

The Chief of the Jews appointed a day and the Apostle occupied the time "from morning till evening" "expounding and testifying the kingdom of God, persuading them concerning Jesus, both out of the law of Moses and out of the Prophets", and we can well believe that that all-day exposition would have made the heart of any believer to "burn within" him, even as in the case of the disciples when they listened to the Lord on the way of Emmaus. It may not be given to us to expound the Scriptures as did the Apostle, but we can and do point out that which the Lord has shown us, and pray that it may find a lodging in the heart of many a true "Berean".

Paul "expounded" and "testified". What do these two words mean and what do they teach us?

The word translated "expound" is ektithemi, literally, "to put out". The first occurrence of the word is in Acts vii. 21, where it speaks of Moses when he was "cast out". In English, "to expound" is rarely used in this primitive sense, although Butler in 1678 wrote, "First, he expounded both his pockets", and an Exposition is the name that has been given to an Exhibition, as in 1868. While what we usually intend by "expound" or "exposition", is the art of setting forth an argument, a commentary or a detailed explanation, we should remember that in both the Greek and English words, the primitive meaning is never quite lost sight of.

There are only two other occurrences of ektithemi in the N.T. and they all come in the Acts.

> "Peter rehearsed the matter from the beginning, and expounded it by order unto them" (Acts xi. 4).

Here the expansion of the act is illuminative. The rehearsal was "from the beginning", while the exposition was "by order", a word used geographically in Acts xviii. 23, and so giving a good idea of what exposition involves.

> "Aquila and Priscilla . . . . . expounded unto him the way of God more perfectly" (Acts xviii. 26).

Again, the word akribos, "perfectly", reveals another aspect of the faculty of exposition, in which not only is item added to item, in order, as did Peter, but there is advance from the lower to the higher, as was the case with Apollos under this fruitful type of teaching. This was one part of the Apostle's method of teaching. There was another, which supplemented it and made the exposition live. He "testified" (diamarturomai). This is the ordinary word "to bear witness", marturomai, with dia added, as though to indicate "a thorough witness", dia meaning "through", and in composition not always so translated, but giving added emphasis.

The Lord had appeared to Paul in a vision and had said:

"As thou hast testified of me in Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at Rome" (Acts xxiii. 11).

Here, in the next occurrence of the word, we find the fulfillment of the promise. "Witness" differs from "exposition". It is conceivable that an unbeliever might be able to expose the teaching of the O.T. Scriptures concerning their prophetic utterances and the fulfillment of the same. With certain reservations, he may even be able to compare the "more perfect" way of the gospel with that of the law, but it would be an academic effort and lifeless; he would not be able to add his personal testimony. Paul not only gave a masterly analysis of the O.T. in that characteristic manner of his, "confounding the Jews . . . . . proving that this is the very Christ" (Acts ix. 22), but he would go over his life from his youth, speak of his conversion, his commission, and of the grace that had been granted him. He would speak of "The Son of God Who loved me, and gave Himself for me".

This exposition and testimony was twofold. It was "the kingdom of God", and it was concerning Jesus". Whatever we may think is the meaning of the phrase "the kingdom of God", we must remember that:

(1) It was found in the law of Moses and the Prophets.
(2) It was something most intimately connected with the hope of Israel.
(3) It was also closely associated with the teaching of the O.T. Scriptures concerning Jesus.

Before we proceed two or three observations are necessary. Where Matthew uses the term, "The kingdom of heaven" (as for example in Matt. iii. 2; iv. 17), Mark uses "the kingdom of God" (Mark i. 14, 15). In Mark i. 15, the kingdom of God is said to be "at hand" and "the time" is said to be fulfilled.

Turning to the Acts of the Apostles we find that the Lord's teaching in the days after His resurrection is summarized as, "Speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God" (Acts i. 3), and as a direct outcome of this teaching (as indicated by the word "therefore" in verse 6), the Apostles seize the first opportunity to ask whether the restoration of the kingdom again to Israel would take place "at that time".

Paul had before "disputed and persuaded" concerning the kingdom of God, notably in the synagogue of Ephesus (Acts xix. 8), and summed up his ministry during the Acts as "preaching the kingdom of God", in other words, "testifying both to the Jews and also to the Greeks, repentance towards God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ" and as a declaration to them of "all the counsel of God" (Acts xx. 21, 25, 27).

It is apparent, therefore, that if the Apostle could honestly say that his teaching was "none other than Moses and the prophets did say should come" (Acts xxvi. 22), we must so interpret his use of the term, the kingdom of God, as to include the restoration again of the earthly kingdom which constituted part of the hope of Israel. The term, however, is much wider than anything found in the Gospels, the Acts, or the early Epistles. We find it used after Israel were set aside, and when Luke would describe Paul's prison ministry he wrote, "Preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him" (Acts xxviii. 31). The revelation of the mystery therefore must be included in the kingdom of God, and Col. iv. 11 does not hesitate to use the term to define the goal of Paul and his fellow-workers. It would appear, therefore, that we must understand the kingdom of God to refer to that all-embracive sovereignty which includes all spheres of blessing, all callings and all inheritances, and that dispensational truth, seeking to observe the sub-divisions in that all-embracive kingdom, speaks of the Church, of Israel, and of the Bride, as the case may be. The direct object of Paul's exposition and testimony was the kingdom of God; the direct object of his persuasion was concerning Jesus. In the next verse the word translated "persuade", peitho, is rendered "believe". It is the word used by Agrippa and by those who charged the Apostle with having "persuaded and turned away much people" at Ephesus. The way in which the word is used of the centurion in Acts xxvii. 11, "The centurion believed the master and the owner of the ship, more than those things which were spoken by Paul", is rather a foreshadowing of the attitude of Paul's own people, the Jews, in Rome, for it is recorded of them that "some believed the things which were spoken and some believed not".

One further item of truth must detain us at verse 23. Paul persuaded them concerning "Jesus". When the Apostle refers to the Saviour in his Epistles, it is his general practice to give Him His title, "Jesus Christ", "Christ Jesus", "Jesus Christ the Lord", etc., but, on occasion, he uses simply the name "Jesus". This he does in Hebrews eight times, and in Thessalonians and II Corinthians, where the name occurs eight times, the subject concerned being associated with the resurrection. Romans and I Corinthians contain one occurrence each, and in the seven Epistles written after Acts xxviii., Paul uses the name "Jesus" but twice. When we compare Acts xxviii. 23 with verse 31 we are struck by two things.

(1) To the Jews, before their rejection, Paul used the name "Jesus".
(2) After their rejection the name is changed. While the kingdom of God is retained, the teaching is concerning "the Lord Jesus Christ".

This change is not accidental.

There is another feature that demands attention, and which arises from an examination of verses 23 and 31, but this must await the next opportunity of meeting together in these pages.

#56. The Dispensational Landmark (xxviii. 23 - 31). Paul's use of the O.T., and the structure of the section. pp. 21 - 24

We closed our last article with an intimation to the effect that besides the selection by the inspired writer of the name "Jesus", there was another point of nomenclature worth considering in Acts xxviii. 23, as compared with verse 31.

When Paul bore his testimony to the chief of the Jews, the basis of his exposition was the law of Moses and the Prophets. But after Israel were set aside, his testimony is no longer called "expounding" but "preaching" and "teaching", and the Scriptures are unnamed. Now a false argument might be deduced from this absence of reference to the then existing Scriptures, but an examination of Paul's subsequent ministry shows that he still retained a whole-hearted belief and love for the Word of God. In fact, in his last epistle we find the clearest testimony to the inspiration of "all Scripture" (II Tim. iii. 14-17), yet, even so, there still remains to be weighed the fact of the absence of any reference to the Scriptures in the last verse of the Acts, which is set in such pointed contrast with the twenty-third verse.

If we turn the page and look at the first epistle that follows, that to the Romans, we observe that the gospel of God is that "which He promised afore by His prophets in the holy scriptures" (Rom. i. 2), and that the very doctrine of justification by faith is "as it is written, The just shall live by faith" (Rom. i. 17). Indeed "What saith the scripture?" (Rom. iv. 3) might well be taken as epitomizing Paul's attitude in these early epistles. Altogether Paul uses the word graphe, "scripture", fourteen times. Seven of the occurrences are in Romans, two in I Corinthians and three in Galatians, leaving only two in the epistles written after the setting aside of Israel, namely, I Tim. v. 18 and II Tim. iii. 16. Upon examination we discover that neither of these two latter has anything to do with the teaching of the mystery, for I Tm. V. 18 deals with the recognition of service, a matter of practice that is quite inter-dispensational, and II Tim. iii. 16 is the Apostle's testimony to "All Scripture" which precludes references to any particular doctrine.

The phrase "It is written" is used by Paul some forty times in his early epistles, but is entirely absent from the epistle written after Acts xxviii. 25. Let us then examine Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians and see the manner in which the O.T. Scriptures are used, or referred to, in them.

We read the whole of the first chapter of Ephesians down to the twenty-second verse before we come to a reference, viz., "And hath put all things under His feet" (Psa. viii. 6), but if the reader will compare "what" are here said to be put under his feet, with what are said to be under His feet in Eph. i. 21-23, he will agree that the Apostle owed nothing to the O.T. for what he writes in Eph. i. 21-23. We read on through chapter ii., through chapter iii., through chapter iv. to verse 8 before we meet with the next quotation.

Again, if the reader will turn to the quoted Psa. lxviii. he will see that while the ascension of Christ is there revealed, not the remotest indication is given as to what were the "gifts" that He gave to men. For that information we are indebted to the Apostle, and he received it by revelation and observation, not by reading Psa. lxviii.

We therefore continue our quest for one solitary quotation of the O.T. Scriptures by the Apostle in making known the truth of the mystery. In Eph. v. 30 we read, "For we are members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones". The Revisers omit the words "of His flesh and of His bones" and so do the Companion Bible and the Numeric New Testament. The passage therefore is too debatable to be admitted. The next verse is a direct quotation from Gen. ii. 24, but the words following, "But I speak concerning Christ and the church" (Eph. v. 32) bring back the subject from the general relationship of man and wife to the particular relationship of Christ and His church, which, though illustrated by the quotation is not thereby revealed.

In chapter vi. we meet the first direct quotation from O.T. Scriptures upon which a doctrine or a precept is made to depend.

> "Honour thy father and mother; . . . . . that it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long on the earth" (Eph. vi. 2, 3).

This is addressed, not to members of the Body, but to "children" who are exhorted to obey their parents in the Lord "for this is right"—not because they were fellow-members of the Body.

The apparent quotation of Zech. viii. 16 in Eph. iv. 25, "Speak every man truth with his neighbour", is explained by the fact that Paul's whole phraseology was tinctured with O.T. language, but even if this be included as a direct quotation nothing can be made of Zech. viii. that constitutes any doctrine connected with the subject-matter, except by general analogy.

Philippians contains not a single quotation from the Old Testament. There is an allusion to Isa. xlv. 23 in Phil. ii. 11, and it refers to the Person of the Lord, not to the mystery. Colossians uses no reference, and II Timothy but one, namely Numb. xvi. 5 and 26, in chapter ii. 19. As we have seen, I Timothy uses the law concerning the muzzling of the ox, to which we have already alluded (I Tim. v. 18); but there is no other quotation. This leaves only Titus and Philemon neither of which makes reference to the O.T.

Here then we have seven epistles, and they contain not more than eight quotations from the O.T., possibly but seven, and of this number, not one can be said to teach or reveal any doctrine peculiar to the testimony of Paul the prisoner of the Lord.

We come back therefore to Acts xxviii. 23 and 31 and perceive that the emphasis upon the Law and the Prophets in verse 23 and the pointed omission of any reference to the Scriptures in verse 31 entirely harmonizes with the two dispensations that find their "landmark" in Acts xxviii. 25-28.

Before we go further it may be will to exhibit the structure of this section, which is as follows:

Acts xxviii. 23-31.

The Dispensational Landmark.

A | a | 23. Chief of the Jews come to Paul's lodging. The day.
b | 23. Paul "expounded" the Kingdom of God.
c | 23. Persuading concerning Jesus.
d | 23. Out of the law and prophets.
e | 23. From morning till evening.
B | f | 24, 25. They agreed not among themselves.
g | 24, 25. They departed.
C | h | 25. The word of the Holy Ghost.
i | 26. GO unto this people.
j | 26. Hear . . . . . not understand.
D | xxviii. 27. / k1 | l1 | Hearts waxed gross.
/ m | Ears dull.
/ n | Eyes closed.
Isa. / k2 | n | Eyes see.
vi. 10 \ m | Ears heard.
\ l1 | Hearts understand.
\ k3 | l2 | Be converted.
\ k4 | l3 | I should heal them.
C | h | 28. The salvation of God.
i | 28. SENT unto the Gentiles.
j | 28. They will hear it.
B | g | 29. The Jews departed.
f | 29. Great reasoning among themselves.
A | a | 30. All come to Paul's hired house. The two years.
b | 31. Paul "preaches" the Kingdom of God.
c | 31. "Teaches" concerning Lord Jesus Christ.
d | 31. With all confidence. No reference to O.T.
e | 31. Unhindered.

We draw attention to the way in which this last section of the Acts is a unity, and to the fact that if we detach its last two verses, not only is the perfect correspondence of the structure ruined, but, more seriously still, the intentional contrast between what took place among the Jews in Paul's lodging on one day, and what took place in Paul's hired house during two years, together with the double reference to the Jews "departure" and their "agreeing not" and "reasoning among themselves", are lost.

Then we have the word of the "Holy Ghost" balanced by the salvation of "God", the one associated with the verb "Go", the other with the verb "Send"; the one connected with "this people", i.e., the Jews, the other with "The Gentiles". The effect of the one was that though the Jew "heard" he did not understand; the effect of the other that the salvation of God was "heard" and that believingly. And so the structure leads us step by step to the crisis, the quotation of Isa. vi. 10, the Dispensational Landmark of the N.T.

Our next investigation must be the peculiar place that Isa. vi. 10 occupies in the development of the purpose of the ages, and its association with "Mystery" and "Gentile".

#57. The Dispensational Landmark (xxviii. 23 - 31). The critical importance of Isa. vi. 9, 10 demonstrated. pp. 57 - 61

We have seen that the hope of Israel, with its accompanying evidential miracles, continued throughout the Acts to the last chapter, and that Paul associated himself and the Gentile believers entrusted to his care with that hope and kingdom. What we must keep in mind, however, is that the kingdom of Israel had two phases, one earthly, the other heavenly, and that it is with the heavenly phase that Paul associates the believing Gentile, as Gal. iii. 28, 29; iv. 26; Heb. iii. 1 and xii. 22 reveal. That this heavenly phase is, nevertheless, closely linked with the earthly portion of the kingdom Rom. xv. 12, 13 makes clear. We are not now attempting proof of these statements, but simply indicating to the reader that we are fully alive to the fact that the churches under Paul's care were not expecting to participate in the restored kingdom of Israel, even though their own heavenly hope could not materialize until Israel was restored. For this reason the Apostle used the wider, all-comprehensive, term "The kingdom of God", which we have seen from Acts i. 3 and 6 could be used to indicate the kingdom of Israel only, yet is wide enough to include not only the heavenly phase of this kingdom (Acts xxviii. 23), but the mystery itself, when the hope of the lower aspects of the kingdom went into abeyance (Acts xxviii. 31). Again, we remind ourselves and our readers that these fragmentary references cannot be considered as proof, but as our immediate concern is the general teaching of this part of the Acts we pass on to consider the peculiar place which Isa. vi. 9, 10 occupies in the dispensational teaching of the N.T.

The first quotation of this passage in the N.T. is in Matt. xiii., and an examination of the context and what leads up to its quotation by our Lord will throw light upon its use by Paul in this great climax of the Acts. The Gospel according to Matthew is purposely limited in its scope. In face of the unambiguous words of Christ in Matt. x. no one who believes the inspiration of Scripture can deny this:

> "Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not; but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. x. 5, 6).

This limitation was reaffirmed in Matt. xv. where the Lord said in the hearing of the Syro-phoenician woman:

> "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. xv. 24).

That a woman of Samaria was nevertheless saved and that this woman of Canaan was nevertheless blessed, does not alter the fact that neither the apostles nor the Lord were, at that time, "sent" to any other than Israel. This restriction is endorsed by the apostle Paul in Rom. xv. 8.

The Lord's public ministry was heralded by a great succession of miracles which were witnessed throughout the land from Galilee, Decapolis, Jerusalem and Judaea to beyond Jordan. The Divine purpose of these miracles is indicated in the lament of Matt. xi. 20: "Then began He to upbraid the cities wherein most of His mighty works were done, because they repented not." It is obvious that the repentance of the people was the prime object before the Lord in these miracles, and in this they failed. In Matt. xii. the shadow of rejection deepens: One "greater than the temple", "greater than Jonah", "greater than Solomon" was in their midst and they knew Him not (Matt. xii. 6, 41, 42). Here we see the growing rejection of Christ as Prophet (Jonah), Priest (Temple) and King (Solomon). Then comes parable, mystery, and the quotation of Isa. vi. 9, 10 in Matt. xiii. 14, 15.

The disciples were struck with the new form of teaching which the Lord adopted. Until then "He taught as one having authority, and not as the scribes" but now His symbolic language was contrasted with His former plainness of speech by both apostles and people. He had used the symbol of a Shepherd, and the people said: "If Thou be the Christ, tell us plainly" (John x. 24). He had said to the grieving disciples, "Our friend Lazarus sleepeth", but upon their evident misunderstanding of his words He "said unto them plainly, Lazarus is dead"* (John xi. 11, 14), and in John xvi. 29, the disciples say: "Now speakest Thou plainly, and speakest no proverb."

(* - This has a bearing upon the absence of the figure "sleep", for death, in the epistles of the mystery.).

The word translated "proverb" here is translated "parable" in John x. 6, where the people first ask for plainness of speech. Upon hearing the parable of the Sower, the Apostles asked the Lord the question: "Why speakest Thou unto them in parables?" (Matt. xiii. 10). The Lord's answer (partly postponed until verse 35, when Matthew adds his own inspired comment) introduces for the first time in the N.T. the words (1) Mystery, (2) The foundation of the world, and of (3) Isa. vi. 9, 10. In answer to the question, the Lord replied:

> "Because it is given unto you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given . . . . . Therefore speak I to them in parables . . . . . and in them is fulfilled the prophecy of Esaias, which saith, By hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand, etc." (Matt. xiii. 11, 13, 14).

and in verses 34 and 35 the added explanation is given:--

> "All these things spake Jesus unto the multitude in parables; and without a parable spake He not unto them: That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying, I will open my mouth in parables; I will utter things which have been kept secret from the foundation of the world" (Matt. xiii. 34, 35).

The parables were spoken "unto them" (xiii. 10, 11, 13, 34), "in them" (xiii. 14), "this people" (xiii. 15), and to him that "hath not" (xiii. 12), referring to the multitude in contrast with the disciples, who are referred to in the passages which say, "It is given unto you to know" (xiii. 11), "whosoever hath" (xiii. 12); "blessed are your eyes . . . . . ears" (xiii. 16). The disciples are even compared favourably with "prophets and righteous men" (xiii. 17).

The "mysteries" of the kingdom of heaven were not revealed until it became evident that Israel were going to reject their King, and that the manifest, open, course of the kingdom would be suspended while a secret aspect, hitherto unknown, would operate. The "secret" phase of the kingdom of the heavens has its effect upon Gentile dominion which was also running its course. By the time our Lord came to Bethlehem, the prophetic period of 490 years (Dan. ix.) was well-nigh exhausted. The fourth kingdom was ruling the habitable earth and would have easily produced the Monster with which Gentile rule will close (Rev. xiii.), if Israel had accepted their King. Tiberius, Caligula and Nero had all the making of the Beast, and Herod (Acts xii.) exhibited characteristics that could easily have become the Antichrist. The Lord had definitely said, "The time is fulfilled" (Mark i. 15), and Peter declared that if Israel would but repent the times of refreshing and restitution would begin which had been the theme of all the holy prophets since the world began (Acts iii. 19-26). It is impossible to think that had Israel repented, God would have failed to respond. Israel did not repent, however, and the kingdom, in all its phases, including Nebuchadnezzar's line and successors, entered on its "mystery" phase.

A parallel difficulty may be found in the case of John the Baptist, but the difficulty also provides a principle which can be applied to the matter before us. Was John the Baptist Elijah? No (John i. 21). Yes (Matt. xi. 14, and xvii. 12). It would be as easy to create a faction concerning this problem as to create controversy over the question whether Rome was or was not the Fourth Beast. The presence of the word "if" in our Lord's answer in Matt. xi. 14 provides the answer to the question concerning the mystery of the kingdom, and the Fourth Beast. Was Rome the Fourth Beast? Yes, for the time was fulfilled. Yes, "if" Israel had repented. Will there be another Beast at the time of the end, after the gap in prophetic times which "our eyes have seen" but which was hidden till the time of the Lord's rejection? Yes, for the kingdom has entered into its mystery phase and Babylon, at the end, is called "Mystery, Babylon" (Rev. xvii. 5), and when, at the sounding of the seventh trumpet the kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ, the "mystery" of God shall be finished (Rev. x. 7; xi. 15).

The reader will have noticed where the statement comes which introduces the problem about Elijah. It is in Matt. xi. 15, at the moment when the rejection of the Lord becomes evident. It takes its place as a part of the mystery of the kingdom with which Matt. xi., xii. and xiii. are connected.

Associated with these mysteries of the kingdom of heaven is the time period, "The foundation of the world". The full expression, "From the foundation of the world", occurs seven times in the N.T. and is associated with the following items of truth.

Matt. xiii. 35.	The secret, associated with the parables of Matt. xiii.
Matt. xxv. 34.	The kingdom, prepared for those of the nations who were kind to the Lord's brethren, even though not consciously acting as unto Him.
Luke xi. 50.	The blood of the prophets, shed for the truth's sake, commences with that of Abel, and so the expression, "From the foundation of the world", goes back at least to the days of Adam.
Heb. iv. 3.	Speaks of the institution of the Sabbath and its fulfillment, and the finishing of the work of God in connection with this period.
Heb. ix. 26.	An argument is used in which this period is introduced in order to show the folly of the reasoning in question in the passage.
Rev. xiii. 8.	The book of life of the Lamb slain which had been written from the foundation of the world.
Rev. xvii. 8.	Names not written in this book of life.

The first time in Matthew that the Gentiles are mentioned with approbation (see Matt. iv. 15; vi. 32; x. 5, 18), is in Matt. xii., that is upon the Lord's rejection.

> "Then the Pharisees went out, and held a counsel against Him, how they might destroy Him . . . . . should not make Him known: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying . . . . . He shall show judgment to the Gentiles . . . . . and in His name shall the Gentiles trust" (Matt. xii. 14-21).

In the immediate context of the first quotation of Isa. vi. 9, 10 in the N.T. we have, therefore, the following suggestive features:

(1) The rejection of Christ as Israel's Messiah and King.
(2) The introduction of the "if" into the problem of John the Baptist.
(3) The first occurrence of the word "mystery".
(4) The first occurrence of the phrase "From the foundation of the world".
(5) The first reference to the Gentile as an object of blessing. (In Matt. x. the word was "Go not unto the Gentiles").

The reader who has already entered into the blessedness of the dispensation of the mystery made known through Paul, the Lord's prisoner, will need no lengthy exposition of the close parallel that exists between Matt. xiii. and Acts xxviii. At the latter:

(1) Israel, who reject the Lord, are rejected.
(2) "The mystery" is made manifest for the first time in those epistles written by Paul from prison.
(3) Those thus blessed are "Gentiles", particularly (Eph. iii. 1-13).
(4) And they were chosen in Christ "before the foundation of the world".

The two passages are parallel, but they deal with vastly different parts of the great kingdom of God: the one with the mystery phase of the kingdom of the heavens, the other with the dispensation of the mystery, which has its sphere "far above all" where Christ sits at the right hand of God. Just as Christ turned from the multitude and began to speak of secrets to His disciples, secrets which had been kept since the foundation of the world, so Paul, the servants of Christ, no longer free and therefore unable to speak openly to the multitude, made known to the saints secrets that were hid in God from before the foundation of the world.

We therefore appreciate the aptness with which Isa. vi. 9, 10 was quoted by the Apostle at this great moment of Israel's rejection.

We do not believe that the reader who has pondered these things will need any argument by us to justify our sub-heading:

"The Dispensational Landmark."

Israel, as in Matt. xiii., did not hear. The Gentiles, who, up till then, had been kept outside ("Go not", "Aliens", "Strangers"), now become the object of grace.

At the moment when the Apostle could utter the words, "The salvation of God is sent to the Gentiles", then, the dispensation of the mystery began, and, then, Israel became lo-ammi, "Not My people".

When this day of matchless grace shall close, with every member of the Body safely brought into living relation with the exalted Head, then the thread of prophetic truth shall once more be taken up by God. Israel will look upon Him Whom they pierced, the Day of the Lord will set in, the purpose of the kingdom, including that of Gentile dominion, will finish its course, all Israel shall be saved, and the two aspects of the kingdom be realized, on the earth, and in the heavenly city.

There are further items of truth in Acts xxviii. that must be dealt with before we have covered the ground of its teaching: these we reserve for the next, and concluding, article of this series.

#58. The Dispensational Landmark (xxviii. 23 - 31).
The quotation of Crisis (Isa. vi. 9, 10).
pp. 100 - 105

In the preceding article we spent the whole of our time examining the close correspondence that exists between Matt. xiii. and Acts xxviii., and established the fact that in both cases "mystery" follows "rejection", although in the one the mystery was that of the kingdom, and in the other it was the mystery of the present dispensation. We were, however, unable to consider the passage itself, quoted from Isa. vi. Because of its importance, this we must now do.

> "And when they agreed not among themselves, they departed, after that Paul had spoken one word" (Acts xxviii. 25).

This "one word" constituted Israel's solemn dismissal, for the word translated "they departed" is in the passive and should be translated "They were dismissed". Apoluo, which is the word used in the original, not only means "to send away" in a general sense, but in a good sense, "to release", as in Heb. xiii. 23, and, in a bad sense, "to divorce" a wife, as in Matt. i. 19; v. 31, 32, the first four occurrences of the verb. It is this figure that must be kept in mind when considering Israel's rejection in Acts xxviii. for, throughout their history, Israel's relationship with the Lord has been construed in terms of marriage.

"They agreed not."—The word thus translated is asumphonos, which is derived from sumphoneo, the origin of our "symphony". It is used once in connection with the marriage relationship (I Cor. vii. 5) where husband and wife "agree" to temporary separation for the Lord's sake. The separation of Israel from their Lord, however, was not by consent, but because there was no "concord" that could make the relationship possible, although there will be when the repentance of Israel is brought about by grace.

This "divorce" of Israel, which had cast its shadow even over the Gospels, and is anticipated in the first miracle of Acts xiii., is now pronounced, and the word used to seal the dreadful dismissal is that quoted from Isa. vi.

The place that chapter vi. occupies in the prophecy of Isaiah, its structure and other important details, will be found in Volume XXX, pp. 169-176; 195-200, in the series entitled "Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth". But we draw attention here to the testimony of the closing verses, viz., the answer to the cry of the prophet, "Lord, how long?" which speaks of cities wasted and land forsaken, with but a remnant that shall return and which shall constitute the holy seed. We cannot now stay to expound these verses, but must concentrate upon the passage quoted. To the Apostle, this prophecy was the word spoken by the Holy Ghost: "Well spake the Holy Ghost by Esaias unto your fathers" (Acts xxviii. 25).

An early testimony against Israel in the Acts accuses them of "resisting the Holy Ghost" even as their fathers did (Acts vii. 51). This resistance was accompanied by an uncircumcised condition of "heart and ears", and is linked with the word spoken by angels, namely the giving of the law.

The reader will perceive that Stephen's initial testimony is brought to its full conclusion by the man who, in his ignorance and misdirected zeal, was found "consenting unto his death". In both passages the Holy Ghost is associated with the Word of God. "Heart and ears" are involved, and just as Stephen says "your fathers", not "our fathers", so the revised text (also L. T. Tr. A.) of Acts xxviii. 25 reads "your" fathers. Here is a far-off echo of that pronouncement, "Your house is left unto you desolate" (Matt. xxiii. 38).

When the Apostle would impress his Hebrew hearers with the solemnity of their position, he wrote, "Wherefore as the Holy Ghost saith" (Heb. iii. 7), not merely, "Wherefore as it is found in Psa. xcv.". It is a misconception that limits the doctrine of the Holy Ghost either to supernatural gifts or to the N.T. It is true that the Holy Ghost was manifested at and after Pentecost as never before and that His office of Paraklete was new, but there are many references to the Spirit of God in the O.T. that indicate the Person just as surely as the N.T., and the fact that Paul, when speaking to unsaved Jews, could attribute the authorship of the prophecy of Isaiah to the Holy Ghost, teaches the same lesson:

> "Go unto this people, and say, Hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and not perceive" (Acts xxviii. 26).

Earlier in the Acts than the witness of Stephen, already alluded to, comes the testimony of Peter:

> "Moses truly said unto the fathers, A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me; Him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever He shall say unto you. And it shall come to pass, that every soul, which will not hear that prophet, shall be destroy from among the people" (Acts iii. 22, 23).

Israel had "heard" the words of the Lord, but not in the spiritual sense, and the record of Paul's conversion in the Acts supplies a good illustration of the double meaning of both seeing and hearing:

> "And the men which journeyed with him stood speechless, hearing a voice, but seeing no man" (Acts ix. 7).
> "And they that were with me saw indeed the light, and were afraid; but they heard not the voice of Him That spake to me" (Acts xxii. 9).

Here men who heard, "heard not", and who saw, "saw not". They heard a "sound", phone, and they saw a "light", phos, but they saw "no man" and they heard no intelligible words, but, like the multitude in John xii. 29, for all they knew, it might have been thunder.

Israel "heard", but they did not "understand'; they "saw" but they did not "perceive", and the seat of the trouble was not in the eye or the ear, but in the heart:

> "For the heart of this people is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes have they closed" (Acts xxviii. 27).

Pachunomai, "waxed gross", occurs in the N.T. only in Matt. xiii. 15. The word is used as early as the prophetic song of Moses, when he described the very symptoms and disease from which Israel ultimately suffered. He spoke of the way in which the Lord had found Israel in a waste and howling wilderness and how He had kept him as the apple of His eye.

> "But Jeshurun waxed fat, and kicked: thou art waxen fat, thou art grown thick, thou art covered with fatness; then he forsook God which made him, and lightly esteemed the Rock of his salvation" (Deut. xxxii. 15).

Derived from pachunomai is pachne, "frost", and pachnoo, "to freeze", and pachos, "thick", a condition that described Israel at this time. To describe a specially dull-witted fellow, we use the modern expression, "He has a skin as thick as an elephant"; thus we can realize that such a "thick skinned" animal is a "pachyderm", and that the modern figure and the ancient ascription are therefore akin.

The heart having "waxed gross" the ear became "dull". Bareos, the word translated "dull", is derived from barus, a weight or burden, and when used metaphorically indicates the hardening of the heart (Exod. viii. 15, 32; ix. 7, 34; x. 1). Being used of Pharaoh in Exodus it provided a dreadful object lesson for Israel as they heard the word of the Holy Ghost. Isaiah uses the word in a good sense when he speaks of one who "stoppeth his ears from hearing of blood" (Isa. xxxiii. 15). He uses it also in the statement, "Behold, the Lord's hand is not shortened, that it cannot save; neither His ear heavy, that it cannot hear" (Isa. lix. 1). Had Israel heard with understanding and seen with perception they would have been "converted" and "healed". Where Paul, quoting Isaiah, said "hear" and "see", Peter said, "Repent ye therefore, and be converted" (Acts iii. 19), and if the reader will consult the articles dealing with the healing of the lame man and its prophetic import (Acts iii. and iv., Volume XXVI, pp. 78-81) he will see that this repentance and conversion is spoken of as "the healing" (Acts iv. 12), as the word translated "salvation" actually means. When we remember the many miracles of "healing" wrought by the Lord to bring Israel to repentance (see Matt. xi.) the close association of these different elements of witness and Israel's failure to understand and perceive becomes the more tragic.

The repentance, the conversion, the healing of Israel, was the threefold goal of the ministry both of our Lord during His earthly life and of the apostles after His ascension. That goal has never been completely set aside. Temporarily, Israel are not God's people, but at last "All Israel shall be saved"; they shall look upon Him Whom they pierced and mourn for Him, and at this repentance their conversion will become a fact, and the time of restitution will have come. But that day is "not yet". A new dispensation has taken the place of that which obtained through the Acts which, it is important to remember, covered the period of the early epistles of Paul, and that new dispensation is ushered in by the epoch-making words: "The salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and they will hear it" (Acts xxviii. 28).

Since the days of Abraham there is no record of any Gentile being "saved" independently of Israel. We say advisedly "There is no record". We do not limit the Holy One of Israel, but we are rightly and necessarily limited by the written word. The apostle in Gal. i. 9 made a staggering statement. Having made it he still seemed to fear that it would not be taken literally, so he repeated it: "As we said before, so say I now again." We have just made the statement, "Since the days of Abraham there is no record of any Gentile being saved independently of Israel" and lest the reader should miss the challenge to orthodoxy that such a statement makes, we ask for one reference from the O.T. or the N.T. to disprove it. If it cannot be disproved, then we must perforce acknowledge the great change indicated in Acts xxviii. 28.

In Acts xiii., at the commencement of his separate ministry, the Apostle introduced the great doctrine of justification by faith, without works of law, with the words, "Be it known unto you therefore" (Acts xiii. 38). At the commencement of his new and separate ministry (that of the mystery) he introduced the key thought once again with the self-same words, "Be it known unto you therefore" (Acts xxviii. 28). In Acts xiii., moreover, we have a warning, "Beware therefore, lest that come upon you which is spoken of in the prophets" (Acts xiii. 40). In Acts xxviii. 23-27 that warning is fulfilled.

On the ground that Paul had earlier announced that he was turning away from the Jews to the Gentiles, there are some who refuse to admit that Acts xxviii. 28 marks a dispensational crisis. Before Acts xxviii. 28 can be proved to be THE CRISIS, the passages which record this turning to the Gentiles must therefore be considered. After Paul had spoken in the synagogue at Antioch, the Gentiles who were attached desired that they might hear the message the following Sabbath. This however provoked the envy of the Jews, and they spoke against the testimony of Paul and Barnabas, who then boldly said, > "It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you: but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles" (Acts xiii. 46).

But this was merely a local action, as is proved by continuing our reading until we come to the words, "And it came to pass in Iconium, that they went both together into the synagogue of the Jews" (Acts xiv. 1). Again, the Jews assaulted the apostles and, again, they turned to the Gentiles, for in Lystra his hearers were idolators. Here also the nature of their action was as local as at Antioch. When the Apostle returned to Antioch in Syria, he did not report the setting aside of the Jew and the introduction of a new dispensation for the Gentile, but "rehearsed all that God had done with them, and how He had opened the door of faith unto the Gentiles" (Acts xiv. 27). This is the inspired interpretation of Acts xiii. and xiv.

A perusal of Acts xv. will clearly show the relative ascendancy in the church at that time of the Jew over the Gentile, and in Acts xvi., while neither synagogue nor Jew is mentioned, the fact that Paul and his companion joined the women gathered together on the sabdath day for prayer is proof enough that those women were Jewess. In Acts xvii. "Paul, as his manner was", went into the synagogue. How could Luke say that, if Paul had turned to the Gentile? Even at Athens, it is the Jews in the synagogue who are mentioned before the philosophers (Acts xvii. 17, 18), and upon his arrival at Corinth, Paul went at once to the Jewish quarter and found a certain Jew, and once again we read: "He reasoned in the synagogue every sabbath, and persuaded the Jews and the Greek" (Acts xviii. 4). But here, too, the Jews resented the teaching of the Apostle, calling forth his condemnation in the words, "Your blood be on your own heads; I am clean: from henceforth I will go unto the Gentiles" (Acts xviii. 6).

It may not have particular significance, or it may be typical, that the next verse tells us that he entered into a house which was "hard by the synagogue" and that Crispus the chief ruler of the synagogue believed on the Lord, and from I Cor. i. 1, we gather his successor, Sosthenes (xviii. 17) also. But the objector may say that Paul's words in xviii. 6 are final "from henceforth". Yet we have only to read on to verse 19 to find him once again in the synagogue and reasoning with the Jews.

After his visit to Jerusalem we once more find the Apostle speaking boldly in the synagogue, occupying the space of three months in this public ministry (Acts xix. 8). Again his testimony was followed by opposition, and for two years he conducted his ministry among the disciples in the school of one Tyrannus (verse 9), where both Jews and Greeks heard the word of the Lord Jesus.

Still the opposition of the Jews persisted, for it is found again in Acts xx. 3; and, in verse 22, the Apostle's testimony as a free man draws to an end. His own summary of it says nothing of any turning from the Jews to the Gentiles, but, on the contrary, his own words are, "Testifying both to the Jews, and also to the Greeks".

No valid opposition can be discovered in the record of the Acts to the position we have reached, namely, that at Acts xxviii. 28 a door was opened to the Gentiles that had never been opened before and that there the dispensation of the mystery was given to the imprisoned apostle; there the high glories of heavenly places were, for the first time, revealed. Acts xxviii. 28 is the dispensational landmark.

#59. The Dispensational Landmark (xxviii. 23 - 31).
The Testimony of the Lord's Prisoner (xxviii. 30, 31).
pp. 134 - 139

> "And Paul dwelt two whole years in his own hired house, and received all that came in unto him; preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no forbidding him" (Acts xxviii. 30, 31).

With these words the narrative of the Acts ends. "The hired house" is in correspondence with "lodging" of verse 23, but the words used differ, xenia, from xenos, a stranger or foreigner, and indicating "a lodging", being used in verse 23, but misthoma, "a hired house", derived from misthos, "hire" or "reward", being used in verse 30.

Not accused of any definite transgression against Roman law, Paul was permitted to hire a house, but he was never without the Roman soldier to whom he was chained wrist to wrist. While, as was the case in his second imprisonment (II Tim. ii. 9) he was not treated as a "malefactor", his words, "remember my bonds" (Col. iv. 18), reveal how keenly were felt the conditions under which these "two whole years" were passed. Nevertheless the Apostle was free to receive all that came to him and fulfilled his obligation "to enlighten all as to what is the dispensation of the mystery".

In order to appreciate the ministry of this hired house, let us travel back in thought to the days of the Apostle and wend our way to the house of a believer in one of the towns or cities—say Ephesus—and there assemble with the church. Upon entering the little assembly we are conscious of a strange atmosphere. Gloom, or perhaps perplexity, takes the place of joy and certainty. Where, before, "one had a psalm, another a doctrine, another a tongue, a revelation, or an interpretation", now there is silence. Miraculous gifts seem to have ceased, the gift of healing appears to have been withdrawn, and yet, no new-found grace or privilege appears to have taken their place. Turning to one of the brethren, we ask what might be the cause of this brooding silence, and the following is intended to give a fairly accurate idea of the resultant conversation and happy sequel.

Alpha.—No, we have no uncertainty regarding our salvation, brother; we are still in the blessed state of justification by faith. No condemnation and no separation is ours, thank God, by indefeasible grace, but what troubles us is that a change has come over our assembly. With as bright a faith as yesterday, brethren now find themselves unable to produce the "signs following". Where even a "handkerchief" sent from the Apostle would at one time effect a cure, we are bewildered to discover that some have even been advised "to take a little wine" to help alleviate bodily weakness.

Beta.—There are strange rumours traveling round the churches. Some say that Paul at Rome has announced a dispensational crisis, and that Israel as a people have been set aside, and their hope suspended.

Gramma.—But, brethren, even though Israel be set aside, and even though we rightly sorrow at such a tragic happening, why should that plunge us into gloom for ourselves? We were not saved by Israel, but by Israel's Lord.

Alpha.—True, brother, Christ and Christ alone is our rock foundation; upon Him, and upon Him alone, we rest for our salvation. That is not our problem. It is this. We learned from the Apostle to discriminate between "doctrine" and "dispensation", between that salvation which is "in Christ" and the dispensational position and privilege which was "with faithful Abraham". While we were told we were justified by faith and had peace and access, yet we were also reminded that we were nevertheless "wild olives" grafted into the Olive Tree of Israel. While that Olive Tree stood our dispensation position was known and accepted. But the disquieting news that we have received of Israel's rejection, together with the cessation of many evidential signs and miracles, seem to indicate that we can no longer be joined to Israel, nor partakers of the fatness of the Olive Tree. Our problem is not, Are we still saved? but, Who or what are we? Are we a distinct company? If so, what is our basis? We possess the Scriptures, and have searched Moses and the Prophets, and we rejoiced to perceive, that although Israel may fail and be temporarily set aside, a blessed day of restoration is sure, because God will keep His covenant with Abraham. But, though we have searched diligently, we can find no word to tell us what God would do, should Israel not repent, or what position the Gentile believer would occupy if Israel and its hope be set aside. Therefore unless there be granted to Paul or to some of us a new revelation, we can have no intelligent conception of either our calling or our hope.

Beta.—Brethren, if any lack wisdom, let him ask of God; we can at least pray, we still have access there, and surely it will be well-pleasing to the Lord that we enquire of Him for light in our present darkness.

We will not transcribe the prayer that followed, but will give the sequel. As Daniel experienced, so did this little assembly. "While I was speaking in prayer", said Daniel, the angel came, and while this little company confessed their ignorance and desired illumination, an "angel", or a "messenger", arrived with a blessed and full answer of peace. Into the little assembly entered a travel-stained man. His steps were weary, but his heart was light. He was the harbinger of tidings the equal of which mortal ears had never heard.

Angelos (The Messenger) speaks: Brethren, lift up your heads! Listen to the tidings I bring! Grace has indeed super-abounded, blessings beyond our dreams have been revealed as ours! The apostle Paul has indeed pronounced the doom of Israel, and, with their setting aside, the hope and promises belonging to them must go as well. You must be prepared to lose that you may gain. You must be emptied that you may be filled. Brethren, never again will the Apostle speak to you of Abraham; never again will he minister the New Covenant; never again will his hands bring healing to the sick or life to the dead. These things you must be prepared to forego, but I will not dwell upon the negative side—let me advance to my real message. God has revealed to Paul that he is now "The prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles"; that to him in that new capacity

God has granted a new dispensation! This dispensation is concerned with a secret, a secret not discoverable in the Scriptures, because it has been "hid in God" since the ages. Now, since the setting aside of Israel, God has made manifest this secret purpose, and I bring you the glad message, that God chose, before the overthrow of the world, Gentile believers to be associated with Christ, as members of His body, and to be seated with Him where He now sits at the right hand of God, blessed with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places!

But beloved, I will not stand between you and the real message I bring; here is an epistle sent by the Apostle to the assemblies, and to be read and interchanged with the epistle to Laodicea, which I also am entrusted to deliver.

At this, Angelos produced a letter, the letter which we now call "The Epistle to the Ephesians", which gives us the basis of the teaching that Paul dispensed in his own house throughout the two years of his imprisonment.

Five epistles bear the mark of prison: Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, Philemon, and II Timothy. When, however, we think of the new revelation and its conveyance to ourselves in the N.T., we speak of the "Four Prison Epistles".

In verse 23 of Acts xxviii. neither "preaching" nor "teaching" is mentioned, but "exposition", "testimony" and "persuasion"; in verse 31, however, we have "preaching" and "teaching".

A number of words are translated "preach" but the two chief are euaggelizo and kerusso. So far as Acts is concerned, euaggelizo occurs sixteen times, and kerusso eight, but, looking at the N.T. as a whole, the two words occur almost an equal number of times, so that we must be careful before drawing inferences. The word used in Acts xxviii. 31 is kerusso, which is allied with kerux, a herald, a word not used in the early epistles of Paul, but which is found in I Tim. ii. 7 and II Tim. i. 11, where the Apostle solemnly asseverates that he was "appointed a preacher (kerux), and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles". This is therefore a reason why the "preaching" of Acts xxviii. 31 should be a "heralding" rather than an "evangelizing", and this harmonizes with the making known of the new phase of the kingdom of God that included, for the first time, the dispensation of the mystery.

Didasko, "teaching", is one of five Greek words so translated. The other words are: Kataggello, "to teach", but only so translated once (Acts xvi. 21). This need not detain us here, for it so obviously means "to announce tidings", as to need no proof. Katecheo, "to instruct", Matheteuo, "to disciple", and Paideuo, "to chasten" or "train", as a child", while having their place, would be out of place in Acts xxviii. 31.

Didasko, the word used, is associated with didache and didaskalia, "doctrine", and is used to denote the new revelation of grace which constitutes the mystery. Specific teaching was necessary on many important subjects. When the Apostle wrote to Timothy: "Thou hast fully known my doctrine" (II Tim. iii. 10), he presupposes that some definite teaching had been given. The word didaskalos is used in I Tim. ii. 7 and II Tim. i. 11, passages already referred to in connection with kerux. Paul heralded the kingdom of God, and taught those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ.

The nature of his witness in verse 23 necessitated a stress upon the name "Jesus", and, equally, the nature of the witness of verse 31 necessitated a stress upon the full title, "The Lord Jesus Christ". The peculiar revelation of the epistles of the mystery demand emphasis upon the ascension and the seating of Christ at the right hand of God, in the heavenly places, and consequently the full title of the Saviour is given. Moreover it should never be forgotten that if we know and teach the distinctive association which Christ holds with any part of the purpose of the ages, we know and teach the most important part. For example, it would be unintelligible had Paul stressed membership of the BODY before stressing the HEADSIP of Christ; he must of necessity "teach" the things that concern the Lord Jesus Christ first. How could any saved Gentile contemplate a seat in the highest heavens, until and unless he had received instruction concerning the ascension and seating of the Lord.

The word "concerning" should not be passed over without comment. Peri, the word so translated, means, in composition, "round about", and it is a splendid conception of teaching, preaching and witness, when Christ is seen to be at the centre, and that all teaching and preaching revolves around Him. This at least was gloriously true of the Apostle's teaching, for it is not possible to imagine a Pauline epistle without a central and glorious Christ.

The closing words of the Acts are suggestive, "With all confidence, unforbidden".

Parrhesia is variously translated "openly", "freely", "plainly", as well as "confidence", but there is never absent from the word the thought of freedom of speech; rhesis means "a speaking". The words of the A.V., "No man forbidding him", represents one word in the original—Akolutos. While this is the only occurrence of the word in the N.T., the positive form of the verb, koluo, "to forbid" or "to hinder", occurs many times. Paul had been "forbidden" of the Holy Ghost to preach the word in Asia (Acts xvi. 6); and admitted to the Roman saints that he had been "let" in his endeavours to visit them (Rom. i. 13). He had been "forbidden" by the Jews to speak to the Gentiles (I Thess. ii. 16). Now, Satan hindered no longer (I Thess. ii. 18), for, although we can well believe that the enemy of all truth had moved the opposition that had eventually led to the curtailment of the bodily liberty of the Apostle, upon the revelation itself, he had not, blessed be God, been able to put bonds. Prison did not hinder the Apostle in his ministry. The Jews had "forbidden" him to speak to the Gentiles, but their enmity had but placed him in a sphere where their hatred was inoperative. He could preach and teach with gyves on his wrist but with liberty in his heart. Once he had been forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the word in Asia, but the Holy Ghost forbade no longer, for he was in the very centre of God's purpose: it was a Gentile dispensation and therefore neither Antioch nor Jerusalem was so fitting a centre as Rome.

Commentators have advanced many ingenious reasons for the “unfinished” character of the Acts. We, however, can well believe that it accomplished the Divine purpose for which it was undertaken, and that it was not the intention of the writer to go beyond the arrival at Rome. How Paul fared before Nero; how many times he was heard; whether Poppæa had any influence over Nero at the time, and the thousand and one points to which the imagination and enquiring mind seek an answer, these are apparently no concern of the inspired historian and consequently should be no concern of ours. Let us be glad of that concluding phrase, “With all confidence, unforbidden, unhindered”, and rejoice that during that confident and unhindered period of his bondage, the Apostle was moved to pen those immortal epistles, Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians.

It is with great joy, yet with reluctance, that we bring this series to a close. We are confident that whoever approaches the Acts of the Apostles with a clear eye for its dispensational teaching will realize the importance of Acts xxviii. in the development of the purpose of the ages. For the testimony of Luke, the beloved physician and faithful minister with the Apostle to the Gentiles, every believer should give thanks, for, without the Acts of the Apostles, we should have little or no historic background for the ministry of the ascended Christ.

All my springs are in Thee.
(Psa. lxxxvii. 7).

#1. The primary significance of the passage considered.
pp. 209 - 211

The words that form the title of this series of articles occur at the close of a very remarkable Psalm; remarkable in that it insists upon Israel's peculiar earthly mission among the nations, to whom they will extend the privilege of citizenship of Israel, a sentiment far removed from the narrower exclusiveness of Jewish interpretation. Two lines of teaching regarding Israel's place in the earth are found in the scriptures, but they must be conceived of as parallels, not divergent or antagonistic. One emphasizes Israel's unique position among the nations of the earth; the other that the Divine purpose is the blessing of all nations through Israel. Speaking of the exclusiveness that marked the false interpretation of the divine will for Israel, Perowne says:

> "It was pervaded by a jealous exclusiveness which was remarkable even among the nations of antiquity, and which derived its force and sanction from the precepts of its religion. The Jews were constantly reminded that they were a separate people, distinct, and intended to be distinct, from all others . . . . . The Jewish church was not a missionary church. So far as the Jews looked upon the world around them, it was with feelings of antipathy, and with the hope, which was never quenched in the midst of the most terrible reverses, that finally they, as the chosen race, should subdue their enemies far and wide, and that, by the grace of Heaven. one sitting on David's throne would be king of the world."

While, alas, this is only too true, there are abundant evidences in the Prophets that the wider purpose of Israel's call was understood, and never allowed to sink out of sight. The initial promise made to Abraham combines both aspects of the truth. God promised that He would make of him a great nation; that He would bless him and make his name great. But He also promised that he should be a blessing; that in him all families of the earth should be blessed (Gen. xii. 1-3).

The prophet Isaiah not only saw that in a future day "the mountain of the Lord's house would be established in the top of the mountains", but that "all nations should flow unto it". The nations will voluntarily go up to the house of the God of Jacob, for there the nations will be taught the ways of the Lord, and Zion shall become the centre from which shall radiate the word of the Lord (Isa. ii. 2, 3). In the glorious day that is coming "there shall be a root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people; to it shall the Gentiles seek" (Isa. xi. 10).

Some of these nations are specified, and the fact that such old enemies as Egypt and Assyria are included in this great brotherhood of nations is an evidence of grace indeed:

> "In that day shall Israel be third with Egypt and with Assyria, even a blessing in the midst of the land: whom the Lord of hosts shall bless, saying, Blessed be Egypt My people, and Assyria the work of My hands, and Israel Mine inheritance" (Isa. xix. 24,25).

The growing fear of war, the increasing terror of modern weapons, the shrinkage of space by reason of wireless and air transport, the sudden worthlessness of frontiers as defences, are driving the nations of the earth to seek some means of bringing about international unity. This will ultimately lead to the rise of Babylon, and the advent of the last and greatest of the world's dictators. But what the nations vainly seek to establish by policy and through fear, God intends to bring about by grace. Rome attempted some such uniting of the nations when it extended to them the rights of citizenship of that Empire; Greek philosophy groped amid the shadows after universal citizenship, and by its system of proselytizing even Judaism made some attempt to attain this end.

In Psalm lxxxvi., which immediately precedes the one under review, Davie foresees the conversion of the nations, saying:

> "All nations whom Thou hast made, shall come and worship before Thee, O Lord; and shall glorify Thy name" (Psa. lxxxvi. 9).

Coming to the Psalm from which the title of these articles is taken, and which has started this line of thought, we observe the following features. The opening superscription, "A Psalm or Song for the sons of Korah", is balanced by the closing subscription, "A Song or Psalm for the sons of Korah, to the chief Musician upon Mahalath Leannoth". The key to these Psalm titles was discovered by Dr. J. W. Thirtle while examining two independent Psalms, namely the one in Isa. xxxviii. 9-20, and that in Hab. iii. In each of these the relationship of Title and Subscription is clear. The complete Psalm is as follows:

(1) The super-scription or title proper.
(2) The body of the Psalm itself.
(3) The sub-scription.

This subject forms the material of Appendices 64 and 65 of The Companion Bible, in which great work all the Psalms are set out in conformity with this pattern.

The words Mahalath Leannoth, therefore, instead of being part of Psalm lxxxviii., form the sub-scription of Psalm lxxxvii. Mahalath means "The great dancing", for this is how Aquila translates the word in his revision of the Septuagint. Leannoth means "shouting", or "great shouting".

> "We have only to read the Psalm in the light of I Sam. vi. 14, 15 to see the obvious connection with David's bringing the Ark to Zion. In verse 2 of the Psalm there is a distinct allusion to the other places where the Ark had found a temporary dwelling. Shiloh (I Sam. i. 3; ii. 14; iii. 21; Psa. lxxviii. 60); Bethshemesh (I Sam. vi. 13); Kirjath-jearim (I Sam. vii. 1); Gibeah (II Sam. vi. 3, 4); the house of Obededom (II Sam. vi. 10-12). But none of these was the dwelling place Jehovah had chosen. Hence, Zion is celebrated as 'the Mount Zion which He loved' (Companion Bible, Appendix 65 x.)."

The association of the removal of the Ark with "dancing" is established by II Sam. vi. 14.

Many commentators see in Psalm lxxxvii. a reference to the days of Hezekiah, when it was said of him "that he was magnified in the sight of all nations from henceforth" (II Chron. xxxii. 23). Yet again, it has been assigned to the fulfillment of the promise that the Lord would return unto Zion, and dwell in the midst of Jerusalem (Zech. viii. 3), when the temple was once again built and when Zerubbabel was installed as prince of the house of Judah. There is no reason to limit the Psalm to any one particular period of rejoicing, so long as the rejoicing is definitely associated with the choice of Zion.

Where the A.V. reads, "I will make mention of Rahab and Babylon to them that know Me", the R.V. reads "I will make mention of Rahab and Babylon as among them that know Me". This is in keeping with the prophecy of Isaiah: "And the Lord shall be known to Egypt, and the Egyptians shall know the Lord in that day" (Isa. xix. 21). Egypt, Babylon, Philistia, Tyre and Ethiopia are addressed by the Lord as entering into the glorious privilege of citizenship, "This man was born there". The glorious things that are spoken of Zion, the city of God, include this all-embracive blessing of the nations. It will be the highest dignity that any can attain, to be able to say, "I was born there".

The "bringing forth of children" is a figure of frequent use in the prophets, and as it is physically impossible for all the nations specified to be born in Zion, its meaning must be extended to cover the privilege of inclusion by citizenship:

> "Shall a nation be born at once? for as soon as Zion travailed, she brought forth her children . . . . . I will extend peace to her like a river, and the glory of the Gentiles like a flowing stream" (Isa. lxvi. 8-12).

The time of this travail is immediately before the second coming of the Lord, "The bringing of sorrows" (Matt. xxiv. 8). These "sorrows" are not unto death, but pregnant with life, for the word odin is translated "travail" in I Thess. v. 3, and means "birth pains", even as the verb odino is translated in Gal. iv. 19 "To travail in birth". The prophetic day to which this looks is called in Matt. xix. 28, "The regeneration", the time of rebirth for Israel and the nations. It is to this blessed fact that thought is directed in Psalm lxxxvii. Primarily therefore the exultant cry, "All my springs are in Thee", refers to Zion, the mother of all the nations, together with Israel, who shall enter in to the kingdom of that day.

Having seen this, we are at liberty to extend the passage to cover the greater and more glorious truth that the believer to-day, as at all times, can look up to the Lord and exclaim, "All my springs are in THEE". It is this aspect of truth that we hope to develop in the subsequent articles of this series.

The Dispensational Keystone.

#1. An examination of objections to the teaching that Acts xxviii. is a dispensational boundary of the first importance.

pp. 153 - 159

No reader of The Berean Expositor needs reminding that the keystone of the truth for which it stands is the last chapter of the Acts of the Apostles. With this contention the first number of the publication opened, and all the light that has subsequently been received on the great dispensational teaching of the New Testament has radiated from this epoch-making chapter of the Acts.

In perfect symmetry on either side of this keystone, are ranged the fourteen epistles of Paul, and across the arch can be written the three statements, "The Jew Prominent", which is true of the early ministry of the Apostle, "The Jew Absent", which is most obviously true of his later ministry, and "The Jew Dismissed", which is the truth of Acts xxviii. itself. These features we have visualized in the following diagram, which also indicates further features of the two ministries associated with the two sets of epistles.

- - - I l l u s t r a t i o n - - -
(BE-XXXIII.153).

The primary reason for reopening this question is the necessity which has arisen to deal with an objection that has been made by a reader and fellow-student of the Word. The dispensational importance of Acts xxviii. has been challenged, and the statement has been made, that the dismissal of the Jew in Acts xxviii. is "local" and neither "national nor final".

By a "local" dismissal we understand such a turning from the Jew as is recorded in Acts xiii. 44-48, for in the opening verse of the next chapter we find the same apostle again entering a synagogue, with the result that "a great multitude both of the Jews and also of the Greeks believed" (Acts xiv. 1). Acts xiii. and xiv. have a dispensational importance in that they,

(1) Prefigure the national blindness which has since settled upon all Israel (Acts xiii. 11).
(2) The related salvation of the Gentile (Acts xiii. 12).
(3) The warning of impending judgment (Acts xiii. 40, 41).
(4) The close association of "Paul" with the Gentiles (Acts xiii. 9).
(5) The opening of the door of faith to the Gentiles (Acts xiv. 27).
(6) The recognition that the Jew was "first" (Acts xiii. 46).

In Acts xxviii. the prefigured blindness fell (Acts xxviii. 25-27). Consequently, for the first time, the salvation of God was sent to the Gentile without the mediation of the Jew. Here in this chapter the hope of Israel comes to a temporary end; here the impending judgment falls, and from this time, the Jew passes from the scene; his covenants, promises, and hope are suspended, a mystery is made known, and a newly-created "New Man" takes the foremost place.

The history and fortunes of the people of Israel are very closely associated with their city and temple. This can be seen by reference to the structure set out in Volume XXIX, page 208, where every reference to "The house of God" in the O.T. is recorded, together with a most perfect structure of Israel's spiritual history, drawn from the books of Chronicles.

In A.D.70 Jerusalem was destroyed and the temple razed to the ground. Titus ordered his soldiers to dig up the foundations of the temple and the city, and Terentius Rufus, who was left in command, actually ploughed up the site of the temple, thus unwittingly fulfilling the prophecies of Micah and of the Saviour:

> "Therefore shall Zion for your sake be plowed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps" (Micah iii. 12).
>
> "Your house is left unto you desolate" (Matt. xxiii. 38).
> "There shall not be left here one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down" (Matt. xxiv. 2).

It can, we trust, be assumed without further evidence that the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple in A.D.70 (forty years after the crucifixion) was not merely a "local" incident, but that it was "national" and "final".

The date of Acts xxviii. is given in the notes of the A.V. as A.D.63. The chronology of the Acts is discussed and exhibited in our work entitled "The Apostle of the Reconciliation", pages 13-20, and is too complicated a theme to be reconsidered here. The question as to the date of Acts xxviii., however, does not arise; we merely indicate that it is very near to the national calamity that has made Israel lo-ammi, "not My people", for the past nineteen centuries.

The "dismissal" of Israel pronounced with such solemnity in Acts xxviii., and the dismissal of Israel pronounced with equal gravity in Matt. xiii., xxiii., xxiv. are related to one another as de jure is to de facto. Often a period intervenes between the sentence as pronounced and the sentence as executed. Moreover, there are occasions when an appeal or an extension of leniency may interpose, which, to the uninstructed, may appear to nullify the original sentence. So in the case in point we hope to show from the Scriptures that the following are the facts:

(1) The "dismissal" of Israel was the putting into effect the long threatened "divorcement" of that people.
(2) The dismissal de jure took place during the Saviour's public ministry.
(3) A stay of execution was granted, and a second appeal made at Pentecost.

(4) The dismissal, however, became de facto at Acts xxviii. where the Jew of the dispersion is seen to manifest the same unbelief and unrepentance as was manifested by the Jew in the land.

(5) That the immediate consequence of Israel's failure, both in Matt. xi.-xiii., and in Acts xxviii., was to give prominence to the Gentile, to introduce a "mystery" and fulfil Isa. vi. 9, 10.

(6) That the dismissal of Israel received its seal at the destruction of the Temple in A.D.70, and

(7) That the prison ministry of the apostle Paul was a ministry intended to bridge the gulf between the dispensation that closed with Israel's rejection and opened with the dispensation of the mystery.

If we can justify these seven assertions from Scripture, we can settle at once the question as to whether the dismissal of the Jew in Acts xxviii. was "local" or "national".

(1) The "dismissal" of Israel was the "divorcement" of that people.—It is common knowledge with students of prophecy that the figure of divorce is used of Israel's lo-ammi condition, even as the receiving back of an erring wife is the figure used of Israel's restoration to divine favour (Isa. i. 1; Jer. iii. 1-8; Ezek. xvi.; Isa. lxii.). The word translated "dismissed" (departed) in Acts xxviii. 15 is apoluo, which, while meaning to release, or to let go generally, is used specifically for "divorcement" fifteen times in the N.T.

> "He was minded to put her away privately" (Matt. i. 19).
> "Whosoever shall put away his wife" (Matt. v. 31, 32).
> "Shall marry her that is divorced" (Matt. v. 32).

These are the first four occurrences of apoluo in the N.T. In view of this common usage of the word the significance of its choice for use in the passage in question is unmistakable.

(2) The dismissal de jure took place during the Lord's public ministry.—The rejection of Israel hinged upon Israel's rejection of Christ: "Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers" (Matt. xxiii. 32).

The righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of Abel to the blood of Zacharias son of Barachias, "shall come upon this generation", said the Lord (Matt. xxiii. 34-36).

> "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not. Behold, your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you, Ye shall not see Me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord" (Matt. xxiii. 37-39).

"Fill ye up"; "This generation"; "Ye would not"; "Your house"; "Not henceforth".

No prophetic utterance in Scripture could be more explicit. The temple is no longer "My Father's house"; it had become "Your house". It was left "desolate", a word used of Judas Iscariot (Acts i. 20), and in another form of Babylon (Rev. xviii. 19), and of the abomination of desolation (Matt. xxiv. 15). Luke records that the Saviour said, "When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh", and that "the times of the Gentiles" were commensurate with the treading down of Jerusalem (Luke xxi. 20-24).

Israel is never considered as under divine favour at the same time as "the days of vengeance" are upon them (Luke xxi. 22), and these days are associated with the destruction of Jerusalem and with the destruction of the temple (Matt. xxiv. 1, 2).

(3) At Pentecost a stay of execution was granted, and a second appeal made.—The prayer from the cross, "Father, forgive them", was heard. The Apostles were bidden to tarry at Jerusalem until endued with power from on high, and then to preach once again to this same people. The answer of the Lord to the Apostles' question, "Lord, wilt Thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" (Acts i. 6) showed that He knew that the extended period of mercy would not bring about Israel's repentance, and with the stoning of Stephen and the call and commission of Paul, preparation began to be made for a new dispensation, on new conditions, that would be consequent upon Israel's rejection, and which would demand a further revelation and a different ministry.

(4) The dismissal de facto.—The sentence pronounced in Matt. xxiii., and postponed during the years covered by the Acts during which the Lord said, "All day long I have stretched forth My hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people" (Rom. x. 21), became de facto after the Apostle had held his all day conference with the leaders of the Jews in Rome. The period of leniency covered by the Acts, simply revealed that these Jews of the dispersion manifested the same hardness of heart that had characterized the Jews in Palestine.

> ". . . . . the Jews, who both killed the Lord Jesus, and their prophets, and have persecuted us; and they please not God, and are contrary to all men: forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles that they might be saved, to fill up their sins always: for the wrath is come upon them to the uttermost" (I Thess. ii. 14-16).

Why does Luke end the record of the Acts with the words "No man forbidding him"? Because the Jew had now been removed from the scene and, under the persecution against them that was about to commence, their hindrance of the evangelization of the Gentiles would no longer be possible.

(5) The immediate consequence of Israel's failure, both in Matt. xi.-xiii. and in Acts xxviii. was to give prominence to the Gentile, introduce a "mystery" and fulfil Isa. vi. 9, 10.—The miracles wrought by Christ should have led Israel to repentance (Matt. xi. 20-24), but instead, though greater than prophet, priest and king (Matt. xii. 6, 41, 42), the Lord stood rejected by them. In Matt. xii., for the first time in that Gospel, the Gentile comes into prominence and favour, introduced by a quotation from Isa. xlii. 1-4. In Matt. xiii. (even as in parallel circumstances—in Acts xiii.—the Apostle quoted the same passage) the kingdom of heaven enters what can be called its "mystery" phase (Matt. xiii. 11). This mystery is associated with a period called "from the foundation of the world" (Matt. xiii. 35). Many prophets and righteous men had desired to see these things, but had not (Matt. xiii. 17), and in Israel, at that time and in these circumstances, was fulfilled the saying of Isa. vi. 9, 10 (Matt. xiii. 13-15).

Reference to the fulfillment of prophecy in Matthew's Gospel is usually introduced by the phrase, "That it might be fulfilled", using the Greek word pleroo. This is so in Matt. xiii. 35, but in verse 14 of the same chapter, where Christ said, "In them is fulfilled the prophecy of Isaiah", He departs from this custom and uses the intenser form anapleroo, the only occurrence of the word in the four Gospels. It is this word that is used by Paul in the passage which we have already quoted, namely, "To fill up their sins alway" (I Thess. ii. 16).

No word could more definitely indicate that this prophecy was at that time completely, nationally, and finally fulfilled. When we come to Acts xxviii. 1-9, again we find miracles that included the taking up of serpents and the laying on of the hands on the sick, as in Mark xvi. 18, the turning to the Gentile (Acts xxviii. 28), a ministry of the mystery (Eph. iii. 13; Col. i. 23-27), which mystery went back to a period known as "before the foundation of the world" (Eph. i. 4), a subject which in other ages had not been made known as it had now been revealed (Eph. iii. 5), and all this confirmed by the selfsame quotation from Isa. vi. 9, 10.

There are two points concerning the quotation that must be considered, and their importance recognized.

(a) The quotation made both by our Lord and by Paul in Matt. xiii. and in Acts xxviii., differs in certain, but the same, respects, from the LXX version, i.e., Paul repeats word for word the quotation as it is found in Matt. xiii. Paul was indeed repeating, verbally, the doom pronounced by the Lord before His crucifixion on this same generation.

(b) The use of the word anapleroo, in Matt. xiii. indicated that, then and there, the terrible condition prophesied by Isaiah had come to pass. In repeating this passage Paul does not say that it was "fulfilled", but only, "Well spake the Holy Ghost by Esaias the prophet unto our fathers", and it is noteworthy that in John xii., where Isa. vi. 9, 10 is once more quoted, the word "fulfilled" is again omitted, the blindness exhibited by Israel being the result of a foretold blindness already finding its fulfillment in them: "Therefore they could not believe, because Esaias said again, He hath blinded their eyes", etc. (John xii. 39, 40). Isa. vi. 9, 10, while repeated in Acts xxviii., was really fulfilled in Matt. xiii.

(6) The dismissal of Israel received its seal at the destruction of the Temple in A.D.70.—The desolation, both of the temple and the city, had been foretold by Christ, and in it was summed up Israel's rejection. Within a few years of the last chapter of the Acts this judgment fell, and the days of Israel's opportunity and hope closed until the future awakening comes, when "All Israel shall be saved".

(7) The prison ministry of the apostle Paul bridges the gulf between the dispensation closing with Israel's rejection and the opening with the dispensation of the mystery.—The "prison ministry" of the Apostle, which covers the "two whole years" of Acts xxviii. 30, 31, is contained in those epistles where he is found to be "The prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles", namely, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, Philemon and II Timothy. The ministry there in exercise was given "for the perfecting" (the re-adjusting [katartismos], see Matt. iv. 21, "mending"; Gal. vi. 1, "restore") "of the saint", until all should arrive at the unity of the faith, the perfect man, the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ (Eph. iv. 12, 13), words utterly foreign to any promise made before Acts xxviii.

If these things (Nos.1-7 above) are so (and chapter and verse have been given for each point discussed), then we must reach the conclusion that the dismissal of the Jew at Acts xxviii. is national and final, that the present dispensation intervenes as a foreknown parenthesis in the purpose of the ages; that Israel and Israel's hope are in abeyance; that a calling, constitution and sphere related to a "mystery" is here made known for the first time; that neither the covenants nor the promises nor the miracles belonging to Israel are functioning to-day, and that they are superseded by an entirely new set of conditions opened to the far-off Gentiles; a salvation and a calling of such amazing grace that it would be unbelievable were it not written in these epistles of Paul the prisoner, given by inspiration of God.

If Acts xxviii. is the dispensational boundary, if it is national and final, then we have no need to go into all the side issues that have been or can be raised. But if Acts xxviii. be, after all, "local"; if the hope of Israel extended beyond this chapter; if the ploughing of the site of the Temple be not the judgment threatened in Matt. xxiii. and xxiv.; if the olive tree of Israel still stands; if Gentiles believers are still grafted in as wild olive branches; then all that has been brought out of the epistles of the mystery in these pages becomes an empty dream; we are found false witnesses of God; our preaching is vain; the words "far above all" and "seated together" are emptied of significance; the mystery, instead of being a secret hid in God, has been known as far back as the call of Abraham; the "one new man" instead of being so "created" (ktizo) (Eph. ii. 15), is but an evolution from the conditions of the Acts; the unique reference to a period "before the foundation of the world" has no special significance; the equally unique phrase, "in heavenly places", is nothing more than a reference to Israel's "heavenly calling"; the unique equality indicated by the word sussoma, "the same body", or a "joint body"—the outcome of that gospel whereof Paul was made a minister—means nothing more than we could have learned by reading Gal. iii. 28, 29; the three distinct "adoptions" (Rom. ix. 1-5; Gal. iv. 5 and Rom. viii. 23 and Eph. i. 4, 5) are merged and spoiled, and there is nothing left for us but to repent, to confess to colossal failure, and to stand discredited.

From time to time we have in these pages acknowledged the pioneer's liability to mistake and have retraced our steps; and this we will do again, should truth so demand, but the theme, "Acts xxviii. the Dispensational Boundary", which opened our ministry in The Berean Expositor in 1909; has been before the reader for these thirty-seven years; has been examined and re-examined, and challenged but never refuted. We have again re-considered its claims, and return to our ministry with strengthened conviction that in this matter we have the truth of God. This being so, questions as to the relationship of Ephesians with Hebrews and similar arguments, do not arise. They can only be admitted by those who do not perceive Acts xxviii. as the great boundary for this dispensation.

We are exceedingly sorry to forfeit the fellowship or regard of any believer in Christ, but we must not allow these things "to move us" but, with or without such fellowship, we must pursue the course before us, remain true to the good deposit entrusted, and leave the final arbitrament to the Lord in "that day".

#2. An examination of the suggestion that the epistle to the Hebrews contains what has been called "Ephesian truth".

pp. 173 - 177

In the course of correspondence with one reader of this magazine, he put forward the following parallels between Hebrews and Ephesians, with the appended comment.

Hebrews.	Ephesians.
vi. 17. Heirs.	iii. 6. Joint Heirs.
xiii. 3. Body.	iii. 6. Joint Body.
iii. 1. Partakers.	iii. 6. Joint Partakers.

> "The mystery then appeared to me in quite a new understanding. Acts xxviii. would not then necessarily mean a new sphere of blessing in locality, but in jointness with Israel. After all Heb. iii. 1 'heavenly calling' is I understand the same word as is used in Eph. i. 3. In going through Hebrews these points seemed to stand out. Heb. iii. 1 'The calling'; iv. 14 'passed through (R.V.) the heavens'; ix. 12 'entered into the holy place'; x. 12 'sat down on the right hand of God'. It was just like reading Ephesians to me, but one thing more was wanted, and x. 19 seemed to seal the whole question, 'boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus'. I felt at once, This is Ephesian truth."

It must first be remembered that much turns on what we mean by "Ephesian truth". For instance, the glorious fact that Christ ascended and sat down at the right hand of God, is not "Ephesian truth". It is a fact, but a fact which would remain had the mystery never been made known. Boldness of access into the holiest by the blood of Jesus is not "Ephesian truth", but a truth foreshadowed in type and symbol by the Holy Ghost, until the times of reformation, and is consequent upon the finished work and one sacrifice of Christ, not upon any revelation of the mystery. By "Ephesian truth", if we mean anything, we must mean some peculiar revelation of truth found in Ephesians and nowhere else.

Now, upon reading through Hebrews, our brother was struck by certain expressions in it similar to others in Ephesians, and says, "I felt at once, This is Ephesian truth". Let us give this matter our attention, for the hope of our calling is involved.

Heb. vi. 17 is said to be "Ephesian truth". Let us see if this can be substantiated.

> "For when God made promise to Abraham, because He could swear by no greater, he sware by Himself, saying, Surely blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee, and so, after he had patiently endured, he obtained the promise" (Heb. vi. 13-15).

These are the words that introduce the first similarity named, the "heirs" of Heb. vi. 17. The reference in Heb. vi. is to Gen. xxii., where, after Abraham had manifested the reality of his faith in the offering of Isaac, the Lord intervened saying, "By Myself have I sworn". The Apostle did not quote the whole of Gen. xxii. 16-18 for he was writing to Hebrews, who were thoroughly familiar with the context of the passage and the inheritance that was in view. To-day, however, it seems that it is necessary to quote the remainder of the passage. It is as follows:

> "I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore; and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies. And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed" (Gen. xxii. 16-18).

Now "Ephesian truth" is directly connected with an election that took place "before the foundation of the world", and with the revelation of a "mystery" which had been hid in God and not made known until the defection of Israel at Acts xxviii. These things being so, the attempt to link the "heirs" of Heb. vi. 17 with those of Eph. iii. 6 is a palpable error.

Let us take the next similarity, "The Body" (Heb. xiii. 3).

> "Remember them that are in bonds, as bound with them; and them which suffer adversity, as being yourselves also in the body."

The way in which this verse is written is reminiscent of the correspondence and expansion so characteristic of Hebrew poetry. It can be set out thus:--

A | Those that are in bonds.
B | As bound with them.
A | Those which suffer adversity.
B | As being yourselves in the body.

That there is no reference here to "the church which is His body" is evident from the Syriac version which renders the passage, "As men who are clothed with the flesh". Dr. Weymouth's translation is, "For yourselves are still in the body". Paul uses the phrase, "in the body", to indicate the present life in the flesh, in II Chron. iv. 10; v. 10 and xii. 2, and we might just as well see "Ephesian truth" in these references to "the body" as in Heb. xiii. 3, "which", as Euclid would say, "is absurd".

The third similarity is Heb. iii. 1, where the word "partakers" is linked with Eph. iii. 6. If there is one thing that is distinctive of Ephesian truth, it is the overwhelming grace that makes the calling there revealed absolutely sure; completely removed from "ifs" and "buts". The word "partakers" in Eph. iii. 6 is specifically related to "His promise in Christ by the gospel, whereof I (Paul) was made a minister", whereas the partaking of Heb. iii. is placed in a context that takes us back to the wilderness experiences of Israel, where it is definitely recorded that God was grieved with most of those who wandered the forty years in the wilderness. It is in this connection that the word "partaker" applies as we can see by the contingent statement, "For we are made partakers of Christ, if we hold the beginning of our confidence stedfast unto the end" (Heb. iii. 14). Is that "Ephesian truth"?

Again, this same people are reminded that this failure to "go on unto perfection", typified in the wilderness, is a truth for them to consider; the words are:

> "For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tested of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, if they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance" (Heb. vi. 4-6).

Is that "Ephesian truth"?

It is abundantly evident that the mere occurrence of similar words in any two epistles does not necessarily make those two epistles teach the same calling, hope, or sphere of blessing. Let us therefore leave this very unsatisfactory method of arriving at truth, and let us compare the two epistles to discover where they are at one and where they diverge.

The epistle to the Hebrews opens with a reference to "The fathers" to whom God had spoken by the prophets (Heb. i. 1). These selfsame "fathers' "tempted" God in the wilderness (Heb. iii. 9). Is this "Ephesian truth"? It must not be objected that only selected portions of Hebrews are "Ephesian truth"; the whole comprises all its parts. We read of these "fathers" in Rom. ix. 5 where they are exclusive to "Israel according to the flesh". No such reference is found in Ephesians; there "the fathers" are entirely out of place.

In Heb. i. there is great insistence upon "angels". Do angels figure in Ephesian truth? They are found in I Corinthians and in II Thessalonians, where they are in entire harmony with the dispensational place of these epistles, but they are never mentioned in Ephesians. There, we read of "principalities and powers" being beneath the feet of Christ, but Peter, who was a minister of the circumcision, includes "angels" when he speaks of "principalities and powers" being beneath the Lord's feet. This links Hebrews with the circumcision, but severs it from Ephesians. Angels are intimately associated with Israel, their hope, and their calling, consequently they have a prominent place in Hebrews. They are closely connected with the inheritance of this epistle, where, associated with the heavenly Jerusalem, we have an "innumerable company of angels" (Heb. xii. 22). Clearly this is not Ephesian truth.

Again, when the Apostle would stress the fact that the Saviour became man, he said, "For verily He took not on Him the nature of angels; but He took on Him the seed of Abraham" (Heb. ii. 16). Inasmuch as Abraham is never mentioned in Ephesians, and that it is to the Gentiles, as such, as aliens, that "Ephesian truth" is addressed, this limitation to the seed of Abraham in the epistle to the Hebrews cannot but indicate that that epistle does not contain or comprehend the distinctive calling of Ephesians: it would rather exclude the far-off Gentiles.

The zenith of Hebrews is in chapter x., where, in direct contrast with every other priest, Christ is said to have "sat down" (Heb. x. 12), but He sat down ALONE, and it is here, where Hebrews ends, that Ephesian truth begins, for in Eph. ii. the astounding revelation is made that the Gentile believer, under the terms of this new dispensation, is not only "raised up together, but made to sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 6). THIS is Ephesian truth, a truth entirely foreign to the epistle to the Hebrews.

A great deal that it will not bear has been made of the word translated "the same body" in Eph. iii. 6. This passage is not the only one in Ephesians that uses the prefix "sun", translated in that verse "fellow" heirs, and "same" body. Fourteen such combinations occur in that epistle, and it is impossible to attain to a true rendering of the three found in chapter iii. 6 if we ignore the remaining occurrences and their bearing upon the meaning intended by the Apostle.

Here are the passages, each one being consonant with the word that is sometimes translated "joint body" and which our correspondent would make to mean "joint body together with the members of the heavenly calling".

Eph. ii. 5 . . .	Suzoopoieo,	"quickened together" ("jointly quickened").
Eph. ii. 6 . . .	Sunegeiro,	"raised together" ("jointly raised").
Eph. ii. 6 . . .	Sugkathizo,	"sit together" ("jointly seated").
Eph. ii. 19 . . .	Sumpolites,	"fellow citizens" ("joint citizens").
Eph. ii. 21 . . .	Sunarmologeomai,	"fitly framed together" ("jointly framed").
Eph. iv. 16 . . .	- same -	"fitly joined together" ("jointly framed").
Eph. ii. 22 . . .	Sunoikodomeomai,	"builded together" ("jointly builded").
Eph. iii. 6 . . .	Sugkleronomos,	"fellow heirs" ("joint heirs").
Eph. iii. 6 . . .	Sussoma,	"the same body" ("joint body").
Eph. iii. 6 . . .	Summetochos,	"partakers" ("joint partakers").
Eph. iii. 18 . . .	Sun katalambano,	"comprehend with" ("jointly comprehend").
Eph. iv. 3 . . .	Sundesmos,	"the bond" ("joint bond").
Eph. iv. 16 . . .	Sumbibazo,	"compacted" ("jointly knit").
Eph. v. 11 . . .	Sugkoinoneo,	"fellowship" ("joint holding").

In the brackets we have retained the word "joint" or "jointly", but we do not intend this as a serious interpretation. While it makes good sense in some passages, in others it is cumbersome. The great objection to using the term "a joint body" is that it tends to create in the mind the necessity of the presence of some other company of believers, in this case, for example, the heavenly calling of Heb. iii. 1, with which the members of the Body of Christ can be "joined". Seeing, however, that the emphasis on the prefix sun, "together", in the words listed from Ephesians, is not so much a union with some outside body, as a deep seated equality within, such an interpretation is an error. The words "fitly joined together" of Eph. iv. 16 can refer only to members within, not to any relationship without.

If there are very few actual parallels between Hebrews and Ephesians, the reverse is true when we compare Hebrews with Philippians. They are too numerous to set out here, and a review of them would occupy a whole article, but a selection will suffice.

The Parallels between and Philippians.

(1) The same key words. "Perfection" or "Perdition" (Heb. vi. 1; x. 39; Phil. iii. 12-19).
(2) The same figure. "The Race", "The Prize" (Heb. xii. 1; Phil. iii. 14).
(3) The "better", or the "out" resurrection (Heb. xi. 35; Phil. iii. 11).
(4) Cross related to crown—example (Heb. xii. 1, 2; Phil. ii. 5, 9).
(5) Not certainty, but contingency—IF (Heb. iii. 14; iv. 1; Phil. iii. 11).
(6) The danger, "one morsel of meat" (Heb. xii. 16; Phil. iii. 19).
(7) City and citizenship (Heb. xi. 10; xii. 22; Phil. iii. 20).

Here are seven parallels selected from dozens of others. Now a parallel truth is not an identical truth. The parallels between Hebrews and Philippians reveal that in both callings God works along similar lines, but this parallel working does not make the race, the prize, and the city identical, otherwise they could not be spoken of as being parallel. Hebrews is to Romans as Philippians is to Ephesians. Romans is basic and concerned with standing in grace. Its great text is "The JUST shall live by faith" (Rom. i. 17). Hebrews assumes the standing in grace, and urges the believer to endure, to run, to hold fast, to work out, to show, "the things that accompany salvation" and emphasizes "reward". Its great text is "The just shall LIVE by faith" (Heb. x. 38).

Again, there are parallels between Hebrews, Philippians and the sermon on the mount which can be worked out. This however does not make Hebrews or the sermon on the mount identical with the revelation of the later epistles. The sermon on the mount is to the gospel of the kingdom what Hebrews is to the heavenly calling, and what Philippians is to the calling that is "Far above all". There is a "city" in each sphere (Matt. v. 35; Heb. xi. 10; Eph. ii. 19), but this fact no more reduces the heavenly Jerusalem to the level of the earthly, than it reduces the citizenship of Ephesians and Philippians to the level of the New Jerusalem.

It has been suggested that Eph. ii. contains more spiritual teaching than Eph. i. 3-14, and in this very suggestion is revealed the false system of exegesis we are here combating. True, there may be a fascination in delving into the possible meaning of the "twain" and the "both", but it is unforgivable so to interpret them as virtually to deny the basic teaching of Eph. i. 3-14. This passage we have called, we believe rightly, The Charter of the Church. It reveals a choice made before the foundation of the world. This is unique, and colours every subsequent expression found in Ephesians. It reveals a sphere of blessing "far above all where Christ sits in heavenly places", which again is unique and colours all subsequent statements. It reveals an adoption that must differ both from Israel's, which is according to the flesh, and from the other adoption, which is linked with Abraham and the heavenly Jerusalem.

We are thankful for anything that sends us back to the Word to re-examine the foundations upon which we build. We are thankful to state that our re-examination in the present case has but the more confirmed that the dispensation, fellowship, sphere, and constitution of the Ephesian company is unique, is in no way related to the heavenly calling of Hebrews, and that Hebrews itself is more concerned with urging the believer to "go on unto perfection" than with the calling and standing of the believer in grace.

Faith must stand the test; doctrines must be proof against attack; we are enjoined to "prove all things", and to "hold fast that which is good". This we believe we have done, and in its results we rejoice.

EPHESIA.

#10. To the saints which are at Ephesus. Tois ousin: The participle.

pp. 6, 7

We have already discussed the MSS evidence for the retention of the words en Epheso, "in Ephesus", which occur in Eph. i. 1, and found every reason for believing that this epistle was actually addressed to the saints at Ephesus, even though subsequently it may have been used as a circular letter in making known the new revelation of the mystery.

Few commentators follow the "puerile conceit", as Middleton calls it, of Basil, who attempted to make some profound sense of translating Eph. i. 1, "To the saints that are". Basil accumulated instances where the true God is called ho on, "He Who is", and then fixed upon this passage in Eph. i. 1 to prove that the true Christians are called hoi ontes, "Those who are", in opposition to the heathen Ta me onta, "The things that are not" (I Cor. i. 28).

We leave this matter and turn our attention to the words Tois ousin, "To those who are". "Are" is a part of the verb "to be", and as we write for those who desire help all along the line, we venture to make sure that even this English term is understood. Words in the Greek are usually classified under eight heads, called "parts of speech". These eight heads are: Article, Noun, Pronoun, Verb, Participle, Adverb, Conjunction, and Preposition. For the moment we are concerned only with one of these parts of speech, the participle. We must, however, include the verb in our study if we are to understand the participle. The name "verb" indicates the importance of this part of speech, for it means "THE WORD", and no true sentence can be made without it.

> "A verb is a word which signifies to do, to suffer, or to be." Hence "There are three kinds of verbs, active, passive and neuter".
>
> "A verb neuter expresses being, or a state or condition of being; when the agent and the object acted upon coincide, and the event is properly neither action nor passion, but rather something between both; as I am, I sleep, I walk." (Bp. Lowth).

The verb "to be" is therefore a neuter verb. Now we do not say "I be" or "You be", but "I am" and "You are", and the "pattern" to which any particular verb conforms is called its paradigm. Now the paradigm of the verb "to be" is as follows:--

Indicative Present.
1st Per. Sing.	I am.	1st Per. Plur.	We are.
2nd Per. Sing.	Thou art.	2nd Per. Plur.	You are.
3rd Per. Sing.	He is.	3rd Per. Plur.	They are.

The paradigm of the Greek verb eimi, "to be", is as follows:--

Indicative Present.
Singular.		Plural.
Eimi.	I am.	Esmen.	We are.
Ei.	Thou art.	Este.	Ye are.
Esti.	He (she or it) is.	Eisi (n).	They are.

Now while all this is intensely interesting and of great importance to the point at issue, we have not arrived at the actual word used in Eph. i. 1. Ousin is a participle, derived from eimi, "to be". What then is a "participle"? As the name implies, a participle is so called because it partakes at once of the nature of a noun and of a verb. It is really a particular kind of adjective derived immediately from a verb, expressing both an attribute or property of a person or thing, and a time to which it relates.

Ousin is the present participle of eimi, and means "being". It is plural and agrees with Tois hagiois, "To the saints", and so is in the dative case. Tois ousin, therefore, is "To the being", but this needs to be re-cast to make English, and so we may say, "To the ones being", or better still, "To those which are (at Ephesus, etc.)".

To those unacquainted with the foundation of language all this may look formidable, but grammatical interpretation is the very backbone of truth, and no pains must therefore be spared if we value the testimony of Holy Scripture.

#11. "At Ephesus." Notes on the preposition en. pp. 24, 25

On the last occasion we occupied the available space in arriving at the meaning of the participle ousin, "being". This must be read with en Epheso, "at Ephesus".

We must now consider the preposition en. The reader will remember that the meaning of the name "preposition" and some features common to prepositions, were discussed in Volume XXXII, pp. 29 and 30. We come immediately, therefore, to en. This preposition corresponds with the English "in" but is not quite so restricted in its use, being translated "among", "at", "by" and "with".

Every preposition is associated with the idea of place, and where the dative case is used, as with en, something fixed or stationary is intended, and en denotes the space within, in, upon, at, or near, which anything is.

En is used of place . . .	"In their synagogue" (Matt. ix. 35). "On my throne" (Rev. iii. 21). "At the right hand" (Rom. viii. 34).
En is used time . . .	"In the days of" (Matt. ii. 1). "Upon (or during) the Sabbath" (Matt. xii. 2). "At the last trump" (I Cor. xv. 52).

En is used of number . . .	"Among the princes of Juda" (Matt. ii. 6).
En is used of agency . . .	"By His blood" (Rom. v. 9). "With thy mouth" (Rom. x. 9). "For their much speaking" (Matt. vi. 7).

En may also indicate the business in which one is employed (Rom. i. 9), the society to which one belongs, or matters in which one has a share (Matt. xxiii. 30) and the state or condition of the mind (Eph. iv. 15).

The epistle therefore was written to the saints; to those who were in or at Ephesus.

The preposition en occurs some 120 times in Ephesians. We cannot refer to all these here, but we will give an example of each of the different ways in which it is translated in these occurrences.

AT.—"At Ephesus" (i. 1).
IN.—"In Christ Jesus" (i. 1).
WITH.—"With all spiritual blessings" (i. 3).
WhereIN.—"Where*in* He hath made us accepted" (i. 6).
AMONG.—"Among whom also we all had our conversation" (ii. 3).
THROUGH.—"In His kindness toward us through Christ Jesus" (ii. 7).
BY.—"Made nigh by the blood of Christ" (ii. 13).
ThereBY.—"Having slain the enmity there*by*" (ii. 16).
OF.—"The prisoner of the Lord' (iv. 1).
WhereBY.—"Where*by* ye are sealed" (iv. 30).
FOR . . . . . SAKE.—"Even as God For Christ's sake" (iv. 32).
WhereWITH.—"Where*with* ye shall be able" (vi. 16).
ALWAYS.—"Praying always (lit. in every season)" (vi. 18) and "THAT I MAY OPEN (lit. in the opening of)
MY MOUTH BOLDLY (in boldness)" (vi. 19).

The reader may meet with some who will assure him that they are not blessed with all spiritual blessings but in them; that Paul was not the prisoner of Christ Jesus, but in Him, etc., etc. If so he will now possibly be the better fitted to treat such intrusion at its true worth. If anyone apprises us what this or that word is in the original; that it is this or that preposition, he renders us a service, but if, with irritating literality, he attempts to reduce all such counters of living thought to a dead level, his service becomes a disservice.

#12. The conjunction Kai, "And" (Eph. i. 1).
p. 37

The addressees of this epistle are given a double title, "The saints which are at Ephesus, and the faithful in Christ Jesus". This double title is joined together by the conjunction "and" which is Greek is kai.

Conjunctions come under the heading of "Particles", a term that includes a number of minor parts of speech, and, as their name implies, they are connectives. The most general translation is "and", but there are occasions when the exact shade of meaning demands some other English equivalent, "also" and "even". Kai unites things that are strictly co-ordinate, things that can be "added", having something in common.

> ALSO.—"Yea I beseech thee also" (Phil. iv. 3, R.V.).

In Matt. v. 39 it would be almost impossible to translate kai other than "also", "turn to him the other also", yet the original reads kai ten allen.

> EVEN.—"Children of wrath, even as others" (Eph. ii. 3).

Occasionally the translation and also seems called for:

> AND ALSO.—"And will also raise us up" (I Cor. vi. 14).

Other renderings found in the A.V. are:

> MOREOVER.—"Moreover ye see and hear" (Acts xix. 26).
> THOUGH.—"Though He bear long with them" (Luke xviii. 7).

No good purpose would be served by occupying precious space with examples of such renderings as "withal", "likewise", "both", "very", "the same", etc., etc.

We might take note of one or two peculiarities in the use of kai given by Winer.

> Kai before interrogatives, as in Mark x. 26. Kai dunatai sothenai, "Who then can be saved?", which is better than the literal "And who can be saved?" Rom. viii. 24: Ti kai elpizo, "Why doth he yet hope for?", which is better than the literal "What and hoping?" Kai never occurs as strictly an adversative. Where two circumstances, one encouraging and the other favourable, are stated as jointly detaining the Apostle in Ephesus (I Cor. xvi. 9), he uses kai as the simple copula. Kai is used epexegetically, that is, in elucidation of something immediately preceding, by the addition of a word or words: "Of His fullness have we all received, and grace for grace' (John i. 16). In the expression Theos kai Pater, the meaning is simply and "God, Who is at the same time Father", not "God, namely the Father".

As we meet this conjunction in our progress through "Ephesia" we shall become acquainted with its usage and the shades of meaning that it conveys. In every usage, however different they may appear superficially, there is always present the primitive sense of addition.

ISAIAH.
#18. Comfort and Controversy.
Isa. xl. 1-11: With special reference to the true interpretation of the words translated, "Her iniquity is pardoned".
pp. 25 - 28

If we enquire what is the particular "comfort" that the prophet would minister to Jerusalem, we may find help by considering his own expansion given in Isa. xl. 2.

> "Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her, that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned, for she hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins."

Here, to "speak comfortably" is literally "to speak to the heart"; it is the language of love.

> "And his soul clave unto Dinah the daughter of Jacob, and he loved the damsel; and he spake to the heart of the damsel" (Gen. xxxiv. 3, margin).

It was the language of Joseph, the great foreshadower of Christ, the Saviour, Preserver and Restorer of His people, when he said to his brethren in Egypt,

> "Now therefore fear ye not: I will nourish you and your little ones. And he comforted them and spake to their hearts" (Gen. l. 21, margin).

It is the language of God Himself when the day of Israel's restoration (Gen. l. 21) and bethrotal (Gen. xxxiv. 3) is in view.

> "Therefore, behold, I will allure her, and bring her unto the wilderness, and speak to her heart (margin) . . . . . I will betroth . . . . . I will sow . . . . . I will say to them which were not my people, Thou art My people, and they shall say, Thou art my God" (Hosea ii. 14-23).

The comfort of the people of Israel as intended by the prophet in Isa. xl., touches, in the first place, two things.

(1) The end of her warfare.
(2) The pardon of her iniquity.

This twofold annunciation is followed by a prophecy concerning the One Who, alone, could terminate all conflict or pardon iniquity. "The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord." Then, facing the utter inability of human nature to accomplish such an end—for all flesh is grass—the prophet is assured that this glorious consummation shall be attained, “for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it”. The prophetic utterance is then rounded off by a vision of the coming of the Lord, and His twofold character of Ruler and Shepherd, uniting in His Person and work of the office of Kinsman-Redeemer and the Avenger of Blood.

The first expansion given by the prophet of what is intended by the ministry of “comfort”, with which this great section opens, is found in the words, “Her warfare is accomplished”. The reader will note that for “warfare” the margin reads “appointed time”. The Hebrew word translated “warfare” is familiar to the English reader in the Divine title, “The Lord of Sabaoth” (Rom. ix. 29), which is taken from the Hebrew Tsabaoth, “Hosts”. Tsaba occurs in the O.T. 485 times, of which 394 occurrences are translated “host”, 42 translated “war” or “warfare”, 29 translated “army”, and 6 translated “battle”. The glad tidings that at length shall be proclaimed in Jerusalem is that her “warfare” is “accomplished”. This will be incomparably good news, for Israel’s history is deluged in blood and soaked in tears. War, both on the physical and spiritual plane, has been theirs, and is even threatened at the close of the Millennium (Rev. xx. 8, 9). The prophet Daniel was staggered by a vision that revealed “warfare great” (Dan. x. 1) for the word translated “appointed time” is tsaba. Peace however shall come; Israel’s warfare shall one day cease; it shall be “accomplished”. This word “accomplished” is a translation of male, “To fill”, and is of frequent occurrence in the Scriptures. Isaiah uses the word in a very forceful manner when he speaks of hands being “full of blood” (i. 15); loins “filled with pain” (xxi. 3); lips “full of indignation” (xxx. 27); but in Isa. xl. 2 he uses the word in a slightly different sense, indicating that Israel’s experience of war will at length be “filled”. It will indeed have been a full measure, for the prophet’s own comment is that Israel has received of the Lord’s hand “double” for all her sins.

The prophet Ezekiel, referring to the punishment of Israel at the hands of the King of Babylon says, “Let the sword be doubled” (Ezek. xxi. 14). The prophet Jeremiah says, “First I will recompense their iniquity and their sin double” (Jer. xvi. 18); and again, “Bring upon them the day of evil, and destroy them with double destruction” (Jer. xvii. 18). In all probability there is a literal fulfillment of the law in all this, for failure to keep faith was punished by restoring the amount involved “double” (Exod. xxii. 4, 7, 9). This same principle is seen at work at the judgment of Babylon:

> “Reward her even as she rewarded you, and double unto her double according to her works; in the cup which she hath filled fill to her double” (Rev. xviii. 6).

This however would be no word of “comfort” to Jerusalem, but there is another side to the matter. The same Isaiah, when he looks forward to “the acceptable year of the Lord” and the day of Israel’s restoration, says:--

> “For your shame ye shall have double; and for confusion they shall rejoice in their portion: therefore in their land they shall possess the double: everlasting joy shall be unto them” (Isa. lxvi. 7).

and the prophet Zechariah says:--

> "Turn you to the stronghold, ye prisoners of hope: even to-day do I declare that I will render double unto thee" (Zech. ix. 12).

In these references we have however been dealing with two different Hebrew words and two different ideas. The word used in Isa. xl. means "full", thorough", "complete", whereas the word used in Isa. lxi. 7 refers rather to the double portion that belongs to the firstborn (Deut. xxi. 17).

The prophet therefore comforts Israel by announcing that her warfare is accomplished, that she has received double, or full measure, for her sins, and that now she is to receive the firstborn's portion—"possess double", and that "everlasting joy" shall be with them.

> "Therefore shalt thou serve thine enemies which the Lord shall send against thee, in hunger, and in thirst, and in nakedness, and in want of all things; and he shall put a yoke upon thy neck, until he have destroyed thee . . . . . and the Lord will make thy plagues wonderful . . . . . the Lord will rejoice over you to destroy you, and to bring you to nought; and ye shall be plucked from off the land . . . . . the Lord shall scatter thee among all people, from the one end of the earth even unto the other . . . . . And among these nations shalt thou find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest: but the Lord shall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind: And thy life shall hang in doubt before thee; and thou shalt fear day and night, and shall have none assurance of thy life: In the morning thou shalt say, Would God it were even! and at even thou shalt say, Would God it were morning!" (Deut. xxviii. 48-67).

The inquisition, the ghetto, the gabardine, the pogrom, the concentration camp—all are included in the dreadful curse that was pronounced upon disobedient and gainsaying Israel.

The reader may wonder why we have not elaborated the evangelical doctrine of the forgiveness of sins, seeing that the very words "her iniquity is pardoned" await us, and seem to be the prophet's own added explanation. Israel are to be pardoned, yea, they are to be justified, their iniquity being laid upon Him Who bare our sins and carried our sorrows, but, wondrous as the theme of redeeming love may be, faithfulness prevents us from introducing the subject here. We are sensitive of the reader's surprise and possible displeasure, and for the truth's sake, not for our own, we depart from our rule, and quote an authority.

Dr. Robert Young in his literal translation, reads, "that accepted hath been her punishment", where the A.V. reads, "her iniquity is pardoned". This translation will be found in the margin of the R.V. and merits examination. To the evangelical mind, there is something extremely objectional in this new translation, and if intruded into the New Testament it would indeed be intolerable, but we must not forget that, however full of evangelical grace this most glorious of prophecies may be, it was originally uttered, "concerning Judah and Jerusalem" (Isa. i. 1), and doctrines that are foreign to the gospel of the grace of God may be in perfect harmony in the dealings of God with Israel. If Israel knew the law of Moses they also knew the conditions that were attached to its cessation and their restoration to favour. The passage that illuminates Isa. xl. 2 is found in Lev. xxvi.

> "If they shall confess their iniquity, and the iniquity of their fathers, with their trespass which they trespassed against Me, and that also they have walked contrary unto Me; and that I also have walked contrary unto them, and have brought them into the land of their enemies; if then their uncircumcised hearts be humbled, and they then ACCEPT of the PUNISHMENT of their iniquity; then will I remember my covenant" (Lev. xxvi. 40-42).

Here the word "accept" is the Hebrew ratsah, and the word "punishment" is the Hebrew avon, which two words appear respectively as "pardon" and "iniquity". This same word ratsah supplies us with "the acceptable year of the Lord" (Isa. xl. 2), and the acceptance of the offerer because of the vicarious sacrifice (Lev. i. 4), which facts have their place in the final and complete acceptance, in grace, of this disobedient and gainsaying people.

We have not yet arrived at Isa. liii., and must therefore expound Isa. xl. 2 by principles of truth, and not by feelings and wishes. If the reader will read the prayer of Nehemiah (Neh. i.), and of Daniel (Dan. ix.), he will perceive that these two men of God knew and understood the principles of God's dealing with His ancient people that are implied in the translation of Isa. xl. 2 offered in this article. Moreover, the reader may be glad to see another example of the dual meaning that attaches to such words as "iniquity", "acceptance", "punishment" and "pardon", by referring to Gen. iv. 3, "And Cain said unto the Lord, My punishment is greater than I can bear", and consulting the margin, which reads: "Or, Mine iniquity is greater than that it may be forgiven." We do not propose, however, to enter into the question of Gen. iv. and its interpretation, but merely draw the reader's attention to the fact that these dual meanings are recognized by all Hebrew scholars. We can at least learn one lesson from this feature, namely, that, in the eyes of the Lord, "iniquity" and "punishment" are but two sides of one subject, even as are "pardon" and "acceptance".

ISAIAH.
#19. The Forerunner (xl. 3-5).
The relation of John the Baptist with Elijah considered.
pp. 38 - 42

Is there any evident connection between verses 2 and 3 of Isa. xl.? The new section (verse 3) commences with the words, "The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness". Whose is this "voice", and what connection is there between his message and that already written in verses 1 and 2? To answer the question we must look back to these verses and note their content. The passage that supplies the link is that which we found it necessary to retranslate "That accepted hath been her punishment", and the word translated "comfort", which we discovered was many times translated "repent".

At first glance we may not see the principle embedded in this evangelical prophecy and consequently miss the point. God made it abundantly clear to Israel that His attitude to them would be a reflection of their attitude to Him. He is a "God of recompenses"

(Jer. li. 56). "The days of recompense are come" said Hosea (ix. 7), and, reviewing the history of Israel, the apostle Paul spoke of "a stumbling block, and a recompense" (Rom. xi. 9). Under the free grace of the gospel such "recompense" would be entirely unscriptural and undispensational, but we remember that even in Matt. v.-vii. there is such a principle as "Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors" (Matt. vi. 12), and, lest we should feel inclined to tone this down, the Lord, in verses 14 and 15, makes the matter unmistakably clear, fortifying it later with the parable of the unforgiving servant (Matt. xviii. 23-35). So we read:--

> "With the merciful Thou wilt shew Thyself merciful; with an upright man Thou wilt shew Thyself upright; with the pure Thou wilt shew Thyself pure; and with the froward Thou wilt show Thyself froward" (Psa. xviii. 25, 26).

According to verse 24, this is "recompense". We shall find that preceding the passage in Lev. xxvi., where "acceptance of punishment" is found (a passage that bears intimately upon Isa. xl. 2, as was found in our last article), there is the same principle at work:

> ". . . . . If ye walk contrary unto Me . . . . . I bring . . . . . I will send . . . . . I chastise . . . . . If they shall confess . . . . . that also they have walked contrary unto Me, and that I also have walked contrary unto them . . . . ." (Lev. xxvi. 14-46).

So, too, in Joel ii. we again have repentance of a mutual character:

> "Turn ye even to Me with all your heart . . . . . turn unto the Lord . . . . . repenteth in Him of the evil. Who knoweth if He will return and repent" (Joel ii. 12-14).

So in Isa. xl. when the prophet passes on the Lord's word, "Comfort ye", he uses the Hebrew word nacham, which is also rendered "repent", and John the Baptist, who partly fulfilled the prophecy of Isa. xl. 3-5, had as the key-word of his ministry to Israel, "Repent". If therefore these things are discerned, a very palpable link between Isa. xl. 2 and 3 will be seen to exist.

When Isa. xl. 3-5 is read and associated with John the Baptist two things stand out for consideration. One is that while he did fulfil much that is written here, it could never be said that "all flesh" saw the glory of the Lord. Let us consider the way in which this passage is introduced into the Gospels.

> "In those days came John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness of Judæa, and saying, Repent ye: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt. iii. 1, 2).

The statement is followed by the assertion:--

> "For this is he that was spoken of by the prophet Esaias, saying, The voice of one crying in the wilderness" (Matt. iii. 3).

With this quotation and its application to John the Baptist, Mark opens his Gospel (Mark i. 1-3). Luke also speaks in the same strain (Luke iii. 1-6). John, in his Gospel, lays great stress upon the witness of John the Baptist but, instead of affirming, as do the other Evangelists, that John's ministry was according to the prophecy of Isaiah, he allows the Baptist to speak for himself:--

> "He said, I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord, as said the prophet Esaias" (John i. 23).

Nevertheless, every reader of the N.T. knows that John only partly fulfilled this prophecy of Isaiah. It is important that we should know not only what the Scriptures teach on any given subject, but in what part of the Scriptures the teaching is found, and this is true of the teaching concerning John the Baptist.

In Matt. iii. there is no hesitancy, no proviso: John's ministry might easily have fulfilled the prophecy of Isa. xl., but we find that, so far from this being the case, John is thrown into prison, and himself began to hesitate at the turn of events (Matt. xi.). After the Baptist had been cast into prison, the Lord opened His public ministry, and endorsed the announcement of His forerunner:

> "From that time Jesus began to preach, and to say, Repent: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt. iv. 17).

but following His rejection (Matt. xi.-xiii.) a dividing line is reached, and the Lord makes a new revelation:

> "From that time forth began Jesus to shew unto His disciples, how that He must go into Jerusalem, and suffer . . . . . be killed . . . . . raised again the third day" (Matt. xvi. 21).

and the next reference to John the Baptist has a different aspect, introducing somewhat of mystery, where before all was straight-forward. The disciples asked the Lord:

> "Why then say the scribes that Elijah must first come? And Jesus answered and said unto them, Elias truly shall first come, and restore all things" (Matt. xvii. 10, 11).

The Scribes were right. Elijah indeed cometh, but John was already dead. Elijah indeed cometh first, and shall restore all things. This, John the Baptist never did. All flesh did not, then, see the glory of the Lord.

Three statements relative to John the Baptist and Elijah are given in the N.T. Taken separately they appear to contradict one another; taken together they manifest a uniting principle.

(1) John said he was not Elijah, but "the voice" of Isa. xl.

> "Art thou Elijah? And he saith, I am not" (John i. 21).

(2) The Saviour said that John was Elijah.

> "This is Elijah, which was for to come" (Matt. xi. 14).
> "Elijah is come already, and they knew him not . . . . . the disciples understood that He spake unto them of John the Baptist" (Matt. xvii. 12, 13).

The Lord's statement in Matt. xi. 14 however is not so simple as our quotation makes it appear. He introduced His statement with an "If". "If ye will receive it" (namely, John's testimony and the presence of their King) then, most surely, Elijah had come. But Israel did not receive, and so Elijah had not come, nevertheless John had foreshadowed and anticipated the ministry of that great prophet, which is foretold in Malachi.

(3) Just before the birth of John the Baptist, an angel spoke to Zacharias, his father, and said:

> "And many of the children of Israel shall he turn to the Lord their God. And he shall go before Him in the spirit and power of Elijah" (Luke i. 16, 17).

It could never be said of Elijah himself, that he went before the Lord in "the spirit" and "power" of Elijah, for that would make no sense.

Taking all that is written, we understand that while John was not Elijah, he anticipated Elijah's coming, much as the first advent of Christ anticipated His second coming in glory. Both John and the Lord preached repentance in view of the kingdom, but both were rejected and the promised kingdom is still future.

When we return to Isa. xl. 3-5 and ask of whom does the prophet speak, we have to reply: He speaks of John the Baptist, in an anticipatory sense, but, primarily and fully, of Elijah who shall come before the second advent of Christ, as Malachi has said:

> "Behold, I will send unto you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord" (Mal. iv. 5).

Elijah's ministry will be preparatory; "prepare", "make straight", "valley . . . . . exalted", "hill . . . . . low", "crooked . . . . . straight", "rough places plain". While all the references here have to do with the actual, physical, preparation of roadways for the advent of a great personage (a preparation rendered very necessary because of the bad state of the roads, made worse by the custom of throwing out stones and rubbish on the highway), they but shadow forth a spiritual preparation. When John the Baptist went before the Lord to "prepare the way of the Lord", he did so in fulfillment of the prophecy uttered before his birth:

> "He shall go before Him in the spirit and power of Elijah, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just, to make ready a people prepared for the Lord" (Luke i. 17).

Again, the Lord said: "Elijah verily cometh first, and restoreth all things" (Mark ix. 12). We are not surprised therefore to find that the word translated "prepare" in Isa. xl. 3, although it occurs over 132 times in the O.T., is only so translated 6 times. Its primary meaning is "To turn the face towards anything", panah "to prepare" being cognate with panim, "face". In Mal. iii. 1 both words, panah and panim, are used. "He shall prepare (panah) the way before Me (panim)." The following passage, quoted from The Land and the Book by Dr. W. M. Thomson, will enable the reader to appreciate the symbolism of the language of Isa. xl. 3, 4.

> "Isaiah says, 'Prepare the way of the Lord: cast up, cast up the highway; gather out the stones' (Isa. lxii. 10); and not only do modern ways prove the need of such preparation, but modern customs show how, when and why it is done. When Ibrahim Pasha proposed to visit certain places on Lebanon, the emeers and the sheiks sent forth a general proclamation, somewhat in the style of Isaiah's exhortation, to all the inhabitants, to assemble along the proposed route, and prepare the way before him. The same was done in 1846, on a grand scale when the present * sultan visited Brusa. The stones were gathered out, crooked places straightened, and rough ones made level and smooth . . . . . the exhortation to gather out the stones is peculiarly appropriate. These farmers do the exact reverse—gather up the stones from their fields, and cast them into the highway: and it is this barbarous custom which in many places renders the paths so uncomfortable and even dangerous." (* Published in 1888.)

The two-fold use of the word "way" needs no lengthy dissertation. The "highway", mesillah, is from the verb Salal, "To cast up", as in Isa. lvii. 14 and lxii. 10. The "highway" is used figuratively in such passages as Psa. lxxxiv. 5 and Prov. xvi. 17. Among the prophetic preparations for Israel's restoration is this "highway". Isaiah says: "There shall be an highway for the remnant of His people" (Isa. xi. 16). Jeremiah says: "Set thine heart toward the highway" (Jer. xxxi. 21).

Again, the highway is to be made "straight, and the crooked made straight", and this too has a moral significance. The Psalmist prayed: "Make Thy way straight before my face" (Psa. v. 8). This word, which is translated "to make straight", yashar, gives us the adjectives "right", "just", and "upright". When Elihu would speak of sin, he used the figure of the road, saying, "If any say, I have sinned, and perverted that which was right" (Job xxxiii. 27), where he uses the same word as is translated "crooked" in Lam. iii. 9, "He hath made my paths crooked", and the same word as is translated "make straight" in Isa. xl.

The reader however can sense the twofold nature of this figure: "Walk", "way", "path", "crooked", "straight", etc., retain their twofold meaning today.

This spiritual "preparation" for the coming of the Lord, a preparation that includes "the heart" and "the people", may be seen in Peter's exhortation, "In holy conversation and godliness, looking for and hastening the coming of the day of God" (II Pet. iii. 12).

Let us be glad and rejoice that at last all hindrances, all obstacles, all stumbling blocks; all that prevents the coming of the King shall be removed.

> "And the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together" (Isa. xl. 5).

ISAIAH.

#20. The Frailty of Flesh, and the Power of the Word (xl. 6-9).

pp. 84 - 87

The reader may remember that the structure of Isa. xl. 1-11 is as follows:--

A | 1, 2. Message of comfort to Jerusalem. Pardon.
B | 3-5. The VOICE. The Forerunner.
"The mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."
B | 6-8. The VOICE. The Prophet.
"The word of our God shall stand for ever."
A | 9-11. Good tidings to Zion. Protection.

We have heard, by prophetic anticipation, "The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness". Now we hear another voice, and unless we are careful we shall be somewhat confused by the inter-change of speakers. "The voice said, Cry." The voice is the voice of the Lord, addressing the prophet and urging him to take up the glad message of Isa. xl. 1, 2: "Cry unto her, that her warfare is accomplished." But the prophet can hardly believe his ears, for the gladness and graciousness of the message. He looked at the people: a people of whom he had said, in the opening vision of his prophecy, "Ah sinful nation, a people laden with iniquity; a seed of evil-doers, children that are corrupters" (Isa. i. 4), and his heart failed him. Can restoration be anything more than a dream, a vision, a hope; but a hope doomed to perpetual disappointment?

"The voice said, Cry", and Isaiah replied, "What shall I cry?" (or What is the use of crying?) for "all flesh is grass", destined to wither away.

Back comes the word of the Lord, which, to make clear the meaning, we take the liberty of expanding a little:

> Yes, Isaiah, the grass withereth, the flower fadeth; but you have been looking in the wrong direction. Israel's restoration will not be accomplished by the arm of flesh, or by the wisdom of the world. No leagues or covenants or movements will ever plant Israel back into the land of promise; that is the glorious prerogative of the Lord Himself. He that scattered Israel, shall gather him; He will watch over His word to perform it. Isaiah, for the moment, you have forgotten one thing:
>
> "The mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."
> "The word of our God shall stand for ever."

In this "green and pleasant land" of England there is nothing so ubiquitous and persistent as "grass". It grows everywhere, enduring the cold of winter and the heat of summer, but, in Bible lands, grass is a fitting symbol of that which is transitory. When He would speak of something that was passing, our Saviour referred to the grass of the field "which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven" (Matt. vi. 30).

Peter quotes Isa. xl. 6 and places the symbol of frailty between references to the incorruptible seed of the Word of God and that enduring Word of the Lord, which, by the gospel, was preached by the apostles (I Pet. i. 23-25).

When he would speak of the fleeting character of riches, James also uses the same figure, saying, "So also shall the rich man fade away in his ways" (James i. 10, 11).

Allusions in the Psalms also indicate this same tendency of the grass to wither and fade; "For they shall soon be cut down like the grass, and wither as the green herb" (Psa. xxxvii. 2). Again the figure is used in that magnificent Psalm of Moses, where he calls upon men to number their days, and describes them as spending their years as a tale that is told:

> "They are like grass which groweth up. In the morning it flourisheth, and groweth up; in the evening it is cut down, and withereth" (Psa. xc. 5, 6).

In another Psalm we are told that,

> "He knoweth our frame; He remembereth that we are dust. As for man, his days are as grass; as the flower of the field, so he flourisheth. For the wind passeth over it, and it is gone; and the place thereof shall know it no more, BUT THE MERCY OF THE LORD IS FROM EVERLASTING TO EVERLASTING" (Psa. ciii. 14-17).

If, despite the frailty of the flesh emphasized in his prophecy, Isaiah had no cause to doubt but that the Lord would fulfil His promise, he is nevertheless inspired later in the same prophecy to enforce the lesson, saying, concerning the return of the redeemed to Zion:

> "I, even I, am He That comforteth you: who art thou, that thou shouldest be afraid of a man that shall die, and the son of man which shall be made as grass" (Isa. li. 12).

Consequently we may learn from Isa. xl. and Isa. li. that the frailty of man will neither accomplish nor frustrate the purpose of God.

"The voice said, Cry", and we now see that the basis of the blessed proclamation to be cried and the hope of its glorious fulfillment are found in the words: "The mouth of the Lord had spoken it."

"Word of God, hath He then spoken,
And shall He not make it good?
Never can His word be broken Ever faithful it has stood."*

(* - From our book "Hymns of Praise".)

Having heard the voice of the forerunner and the voice which called upon the Prophet to cry and declare the good news of Isaiah's restoration, the theme returns to those words which were spoken to Jerusalem:

> "O thou that tellest good tidings to Zion, get thee up into the high mountain; O thou that tellest good tidings to Jerusalem, lift up thy voice with strength; lift it up, be not afraid; say unto the cities of Judah, Behold your God!" (Isa. xl. 9).

In Volume XXXII, page 224, we have already discussed the question of the translation of this passage, and in the light of Isa. lii. 7 feel obliged to adopt the marginal alternative.

The Hebrew word which is translated "good tidings" is basar and the Hebrew word which is translated "flesh" is also basar, and, extraordinary as it may at first appear, both "good tidings" and "flesh" come from the same root. It may be useful to the student unacquainted with the language if we show how these apparently unrelated ideas can possibly grow from a common root.

Basar.—According to Gesenius, the primary sense is that of "beauty", and since the face is made more beautiful by joy, so, by an easy transition, that which makes one joyful is called by the same name. The word however quite naturally took another direction. Beauty, says the proverb, is "skin deep", and basar came to mean the exterior skin, then the flesh which the skin covered, and so, at length, by following two figurative pathways, the one word came to stand for "flesh", which was likened to fading grass and "the gospel", which endures for ever. Any student of English will be able to provide parallel examples of this diversity growing from a common stock. The LXX translated this word, "to bring", (or to tell), "good tidings", by the Greek euaggelizo, which in English became "evangelize" and gives us the "evangel" or "gospel".

What was the "gospel" that brought comfort to Zion? It was one of few words but of vast import, "Behold your God". This is expanded in the verses that follow, but all that these verses can say, and much more, is implicit in these three words. Let us examine this all-embracive evangel.

"BEHOLD!"—This is an interjection, and such particles of language are illusive words, difficult to trace to their origin, but it appears that hen, "behold", is derived from the verb henah "to be ready" (Deut. i. 41), which in turn means "to be present". The particle "behold" or "lo" generally indicates the presence of any one or thing, and the evangel of Isa. xl. opens with the exhortation to behold, and gives the assurance that the Lord is present.

One has only to call to mind the condition of the people that resulted in, and from, the loss of the presence of God, to become conscious that Isaiah's "Behold!" indicates the end of separation and suffering and the beginning of nearness and blessing.

"YOUR."—While God is God, quite independent of all human or angelic recognition, Isaiah's evangel is not so much the fact that "God is" as that "God is yours".

A part of the covenant of circumcision made with Abraham is expressed in the words, "I will be a God unto thee . . . . . I will be their God" (Gen. xvii. 7, 8). The title "The God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob", carries with it the very essence of the covenant relationship. When the time came for Israel to be delivered from Egypt, Moses was sent to tell the people that God had remembered His covenant, and that He was about to redeem and deliver them, saying: "I will take you . . . . . I will be to you a God" (Exod. vi. 7).

Coming to Isaiah's prophecy itself we have abundant testimony to the importance of this possessive pronoun:

> "Should not a people seek unto their God" (Isa. viii. 19).
> "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for Him" (Isa. xxv. 9).
> "O Lord our God; (other) lords beside Thee have had dominion over us" (Isa. xxvi. 13).
> "Say to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong, fear not; behold, your God will come with vengeance, even God with a recompense; He will come and save you" (Isa. xxxv. 4).

We will not multiply references; the subject is one that can be explored by all.

We cannot conclude this part of our study without referring to the parallel in Isa. lii. 7:

> "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace; that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation; that saith unto Zion, Thy God reigneth!"

"Behold your God!" "Thy God reigneth!"

But there is the other side to the matter that must not be forgotten. The fact that Isaiah could say to Israel, "Behold your God" suggests what is found to be so in fact, that God can say of Israel, "My people".

So, in the Exodus, God is said to see the affliction of His people, to demand of Pharaoh the release of His people, and Hosea condenses into one brief verse the great day of restoration, saying:

> "I will sow her unto Me in the earth; and I will have mercy upon her that had not obtained mercy; and I will say to them which were not My people, THOU ART MY PEOPLE; and they shall say, THOU ART MY GOD" (Hosea ii. 23).

We could, of course, have found the whole matter expressed for us in the opening words of Isa. xl.: "Comfort ye, comfort ye MY people, saith YOUR God". Verses 10 and 11, with which this first section of Isa. xl. closes, are but an expansion of this blessed evangel of restored fellowship and relationship. It is expressed there in a number of propositions, not set out formally, but nevertheless there. These may be visualized as follows:

(1) This God who is "your God" is "The Lord God".
(2) This God "will come".
(3) This God will come with a strong hand (or against the strong).
(4) He is accompanied by both "reward" and "work".
(5) He is likened to a Shepherd, feeding, gathering, carrying and gently leading.

Owing to the exigencies of space we must be content either to give scant attention to these blessed features, or to devote another article to their consideration. We trust that no reader is of two minds over this matter, and that all will gladly concur with the course taken of giving this great subject a respectful hearing. Accordingly, fuller comment is reserved until the necessary space can be devoted to these verses, which we hope will be in the next article of the series.

ISAIAH.

#21. The Second Advent. Its Rule and its Reward (xl. 10, 11).

pp. 117 - 121

The reader will remember that we found in Isa. xl. 10 and 11, an expansion of the comfort and good tidings of verse 9 implied in the words, "Behold your God!"

The first thing we observe is that "Your God" is now expressed as "The Lord God". The Hebrew title here is Adonai Jehovah. Adonai is one of three related titles, which the Companion Bible distinguishes as follows:

> Adon is the Lord as Overlord or Ruler.
> Adonim is the Lord as Owner.
> Adonai is the Lord as Blesser.
> Adon is the Lord as Ruler in the earth.
> Adonai is the Lord in His relation to the earth; and as carrying out His purposes of blessing in the earth. With this limitation it is almost equivalent to Jehovah. Indeed, it was from an early date so used, by associating the vowel points of the word Jehovah with Adon, thus converting Adon into Adonai. (Appendix 4, viii.).

The first occurrence of Adonai in the Scriptures is extremely suggestive. It is found in the response of Abraham to the Lord's assurance.

> "Fear not, Abram: I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward. And Abram said, Lord GOD, what wilt thou give me, seeing I go childless?" (Gen. xv. 1, 2).

When therefore the Prophet expanded the title "Behold your God!" by the added words "Behold, the Lord God will come", he was but following a legitimate train of thought. "The Lord God" was indeed the God of Israel, for He was the God of Abraham, to whom promises had been made that could not be broken, and it is the glory of Isaiah's prophecy to shed a beam of heavenly light across the dark interval of man's failure, rebellion and doom.

Isaiah's vision of the coming of the Lord God is twofold. He comes to rule with strength, and He comes to lead, as a Shepherd. At His first coming John the Baptist pointed Him out as the Lamb of God, but, even then, he saw that, associated with this lamb-like character, was another characteristic, that of inflexible righteousness, for, while John records The Baptist's words, "Behold the Lamb of God" (John i. 29), Matthew records his declaration: "Whose fan is in His hand, and He will thoroughly purge His floor, and gather His wheat into the garner; but He will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire" (Matt. iii. 12). Peter moreover designates the Lord as a Shepherd when he speaks of His second coming, saying: "Feed the flock of God which is among you . . . . . and when the Chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory" (I Pet. v. 2-4).

The coming of Christ as the Redeemer, the mediation of Christ between His two advents, and the second coming of Christ to rule and reign, are all associated with the one title of Shepherd, and may be set out as follows:--

"THE GOOD SHEPHERD" (John x. 11). The First Advent. THE CROSS.
"THE GREAT SHEPHERD" (Heb. xiii. 20). The Present Session. THE CROOK.
"THE CHIEF SHEPHERD" (I Pet. v. 4). The Second Advent. THE CROWN.

In prophetic vision Jacob saw "The Shepherd" (Gen. xlix. 24); Israel's God is addressed by the title "O Shepherd of Israel" (Psa. lxxx. 1); David, the type of his Greater Son, was Israel's beloved Shepherd King, and Ezekiel prophesies of a reunited Israel by saying, "They all shall have one Shepherd" (Ezek. xxxvii. 24).

Let us consider a little more carefully the actual wording of this prophecy which sums up the "comfort" of God's people, Israel:

> "Behold, the Lord God will come with a strong hand, and His arm shall rule for Him: behold, His reward is with Him, and his work before Him. He shall feed His flock like a Shepherd: He shall gather the lambs with His arm, and carry them in His bosom, and shall gently lead those that are with young" (Isa. xl. 10, 11).

When we speak of the "Second Coming" we may feel obliged at one time to emphasize the teaching of the opening chapter of the Acts and say "This same Jesus", or at another we may quote the Lord's own words and say, "The Son of man shall come in the glory of His Father" (Matt. xvi. 27), but we must never, never, forget that "This same Jesus", this "Son of man", is "Lord", yea, Israel's "God" (Isa. xl. 10), and that "the blessed hope" of the church of the mystery looks for the glory of "Our great God and Saviour, Jesus Christ" (Titus ii. 11-13). He comes with strength, He comes to rule, He comes to reward.

The metaphors of strength are varied; the one that supplies us with the "strong hand" of Isa. xl. is derived from the figure of "binding", and so by an easy transition to that of the exercise of strength which "repairs" and "recovers" (Psa. cxlvii. 13; Ezra i. 6; Judges ix. 24; Isa. xxxv. 3). The word chazaq is used more than thirty times in Neh. iii. to describe the "repairing" of the wall of Jerusalem. In the Prophet's mind this "strong hand", with which the Lord will come, is primarily associated with the "restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets", and guarantees the glorious oneness of this true and blessed unity among the peoples of the earth.

He Whose strength repairs, recovers and unites, is also the great Ruler, "His arm shall rule for Him". The "arm" of the Lord is an ever-recurring figure in the O.T.

The Hebrew word zeroa is derived from the verb zarah, "to scatter", and is associated, by sound, with zara, "to sow", as may be seen in the play on the word "Jezreel" in Hosea, where first it means "to scatter" (Hosea i. 4) and secondly "to sow" (Hosea ii. 23), fulfilling the twofold prophecy, "He that scattered Israel will gather him . . . . . I will sow . . . . ." (Jer. xxxi. 10 and 27). Moreover, He that gathers "scattered" Israel, gathers and keeps "as a Shepherd doth His flock" (Jer. xxxi. 10). No Hebrew could see the word "Arm" and forget its association with "scattering" in judgment and "sowing" in blessing and restitution.

Israel's deliverance from Egyptian bondage is particularly connected with the "stretched out arm of the Lord" (Exod. vi. 6; Deut. iv. 34; v. 15). To this the Psalmist returns again and again.

> "Thou hast with Thine arm redeemed Thy people" (Psa. lxxvii. 15).
>
> "O sing unto the Lord a new song; for He hath done marvelous things: His right hand, and His holy arm, hath gotten Him the victory" (Psa. xcviii. 1).
>
> "He brought out Israel from among them . . . . . with a strong hand, and with a stretched out arm" (Psa. cxxxvi. 11, 12).

Coming to Isaiah's prophecy itself, we find several important references. Looking back to the overthrow of Egypt, Isaiah cries:

> "Awake, awake, put on Thy strength, O arm of the Lord; awake, as in the ancient days . . . . . therefore the redeemed of the Lord shall return . . . . . I, even I, am He that comforteth you: who art thou, that thou shouldest be afraid . . . . . of the son of man which shall be made as grass" (Isa. li. 9-12).

The reader will need no elaboration of this prophecy in order to perceive its connection with Isa. xl. When Israel shall be in their extremity and "no man" appears as their saviour, then, says the prophet:

> "Therefore His arm brought salvation" (Isa. lix. 16; lxiii. 5).
>
> "The Lord hath made bare His holy arm in the eyes of all the nations, and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God" (Isa. lii. 10).

This, however, is in designed contrast with Isa. liii. which, referring to the Lord's first advent, asks: "Who hath believed our report? and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?" (Isa. liii. 1).

The prophet's words bring vividly to light the blessed fact that "The Arm of the Lord" is a title of Christ. He is both the Wisdom of God and the Power of God, a twofold pledge indeed that the purpose of the ages shall reach its goal.

When, in the passage which we are studying, the prophet speaks of the Arm of the Lord he does not refer to "salvation" but "rule". This word "rule" is the translation of the Hebrew mashal, "to make like", and gives us the word "similitude" and "proverb". Gesenius says:

> "Learned men have made many attempts to reconcile the significations of making like and ruling . . . . . however, I have no doubt, but that from the signification making like, is derived that of judging, forming an opinion, to think, to suppose, to think fit."

In the O.T. the symbol of righteousness is the plummet and the balance, and mashal, with its root idea of equality, is a splendid conception out of which grew the flower and fruit of righteous rule and equity. "In righteousness shall He judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth" (Isa. xi. 4). But at the coming of the Lord there is not only "rule", there is "recompense": "Behold, His reward is with Him, and His work before Him" (Isa. xl. 10).

The opinion of commentators as to the "reward" here is divided, some maintaining that it is Christ's own recompense, and others that it relates to His recognition of the acceptable service of His children. Possibly there is no need to attempt a decision, for "He shall see of the travail of His soul, and shall be satisfied". He endured for "the joy that was set before Him". His glorious exaltation in that day is in direct sequence to His humiliation and death and, inasmuch as the redeemed of all ranks and callings are to share His glory, so the faithful servants of all ranks and callings may "enter into the joy of their Lord" and, in His crowning day also find their own. "With Me in My throne", "Reign with Him" are words that do not permit of a separation between the triumph of the Leader and the awards of His followers. This passage, Isa. xl. 10, was very evidently in the mind of the Apostle when he wrote, "Behold, I come quickly; and My reward is with Me, to render to every one as His work shall be" (Rev. xxii. 12). By a recognized figure of speech the word translated "work" in Isa. xl. 10 is often rendered "reward" (Psa. cix. 20; Isa. xlix. 4, Margin); "recompense" (Isa. xl. 10, lxii. 11, margin); and "hire" (Ezek. xxix. 20, margin).

As we have already seen, the section ends on a tender note. The Lord God is the Lord of Hosts, His arm is an arm of shattering might and, in the opening of the next section, the mind is staggered at the description of His omnipotence. "The hollow of His hand" measures the waters, His "span" metes out the heavens. Yet this selfsame, mighty, arm "gathers the lambs" that He might carry them in His bosom. Israel have wandered alone and in misery for centuries, they knew not their Shepherd's voice. One day, and that soon, they shall acknowledge Him, and, with that acknowledgment, their sorrows shall be turned into joy, the wilderness shall blossom as the rose, and peace shall flow like a river.

"Comfort ye, comfort ye My people, saith your God" (Isa. xl. 1).

ISAIAH.
#22. Isaiah xl. 12 - xlii. 17.
The Structure of the section and introductory notes.
pp. 178, 179

The reader may remember that the three great divisions of Isa. xl.-lxvi. are:

a | xl.-xlviii. COMFORT AND CONTROVERSY.
b | xlix.-lx. LIGHT AND PEACE.
c | lxi.-lxvi. THE ACCEPTABLE YEAR.

We have seen that Israel's comfort is intimately associated with the "Good tidings" that were preached to Zion. These good tidings are in view throughout this second great portion of Isaiah, whose prophecy is occupied with the provision made in Christ, the promise that restoration shall come to pass, and the ultimate performance of the word of the Lord. Further, inasmuch as this blessed restoration deals, not simply with the land and its desolation, but with the people and their sin, we must not expect the unfolding of the purpose to go forward with the directness that characterizes the response of the mechanical universe (See also Volume XXX, page 138).

It is not without interest that we discover that the word basar, "To bring good tidings", occurs seven times in Isaiah, all in the second half of the prophecy. The passages are, Isa. xl. 9; xli. 27; lii. 7 and lxi. 1, where the A.V. translates "to bring" or "to preach good tidings", and Isa. lx. 6, where the response to this blessed message is found in the words, "They shall show forth the praises of the Lord", an aspect of "preaching" that is often forgotten.

In the attempt to comprehend its significance as expressed in its structure, the section before us, like most of the passages already examined, taxes the powers of the mind to the utmost. We can however perceive that the challenging reference to the utter failure of the flesh, under the figure of "grass that withers", so prominent in Isa. xl. 1-11, meets us afresh in this second section, where the challenge is addressed by the Creator to the dumb idols and graven images in which Israel had so often put their trust.

Intermingled with this theme is that of service; "Israel, thou art My servant", "Behold My Servant". This relationship, coupled with the fact that "No man can serve two masters", is, in itself, a protest and a provision against the folly of idolatry, for "bowing down" to graven images is associated with "serving them" (Exod. xx. 5). Contrast with this the glory of such blessed service as is seen in the opening of Isa. xlii., where the Messiah Himself is spoken of as "My Servant".

Before we can deal with the teaching of this section, either as a whole or in its parts, it will be necessary to discover the underlying structure, so that we may concentrate our attention upon those features which carry forward the burden of the prophecy. By the very nature of the subject, the following structure is presented in its barest outlines; to follow out the subdivisions in one presentation would, because of their complexity, defeat our object. With this necessary reservation in mind, we believe that the outline will not only be of interest, but of service, as we endeavour to follow the mind of the Lord in the outworking of His gracious purposes.

Isaiah xl. 12 - xlii. 17.

A | xl. 2 - xli. 7. The incomparable nature of the Creator, and the consequent folly of idolatry.
A | xli. 8 - xlii. 17. The two "Servants", Israel and Messiah, and the consequent folly of idolatry.

This folly of idolatry is demonstrated, first by the utter inability of molten images either to act or foretell, and secondly in the contemplation of the true nature of service.

The two parts of Isa. xl. 2 - xli. 7 can now be considered separately, and the structure of the first part is as follows:

Isaiah xl. 2 - xli. 7.
The Incomparable nature of the Creator,

A | xl. 12-14. "WHO?" The Creator's might and wisdom. |
THINGS VISIBLE: Measured, meted, comprehended, weighed.
THINGS INVISIBLE: Directed, counseled, taught, shewed.
B | xl. 15-17. "THE ISLES". The comparative insignificance of the world. |
The nations—a drop in a bucket and less than nothing.
C | xl. 18 - xli. 1. The utter folly of idolatry, and the incomparable nature of God. |
a | To whom will ye liken God?
b | The graven image.
c | Have ye not known . . . . . heard?
d | Inhabitants as grasshoppers.
a | To whom will ye liken Me?
b | Creation.
c | Hast thou not known . . . . . heard?
d | Power to the faint.
A | xli. 2-4. "WHO?" Jehovah's might and wisdom. |
THINGS VISIBLE: Raised, called, ruled.
THINGS INVISIBLE: "I am He": "First and Last".
B | xli. 5. "THE ISLES". |
Fear and false trust.
C | xli. 6, 7. The utter folly of idolatry. |
The carpenter and goldsmith.
Ready for soldiering.
Fastened with nails.

In this article we do not purpose giving the structure of the second part of this section, namely, xli.8 - xlii. 17. To do so would defeat our object, which is to provide helps to the understanding of the Word. The reader should go over the outline, point by point, in order that he may make it his own.

In our next article we hope to consider some of the outstanding lines of teaching found in this passage and gather up their comfort and inspiration. Meanwhile there is no need for any of us to wait before entering into the truth of the blessed message of the closing verses of Isa. xl., for at the present time we all stand much in need of the promise, "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength".

ISAIAH.
#23. Isaiah xl. 12 - xlii. 17.
The Folly and Tragedy of Idolatry.
pp. 191 - 194

Unless the reader's memory is above the average, we suggest that it would be a help to keep by him for reference the structure of the passage before us, which will be found in Volume XXX, page 43.

A feature that calls for attention and which most strikes the mind when this chapter of Isaiah is read, is the apparently abrupt transition from the tender Shepherd of verse 11 to the omnipotent Creator of verse 12. But such a transition is by no means unique, as Isa. i. shows:

> "I clothe the heavens with blackness, and I make sackcloth their covering. The Lord God hath given Me the tongue of the learned . . . . . I gave My back to the smiters" (Isa. i. 3-6).

We have but to call to mind the testimony of John's Gospel to perceive that there is a doctrinal basis for this apparent meeting of extremes. In the chapter which tells us that Christ is "The Lamb of God" we read, "All things were made by Him", or, if we turn to the tenth chapter, where Christ is revealed as "The good Shepherd", we shall also find the claim, "I and My Father as One".

If the hand of the gentle Shepherd that guides His sheep and carries His lambs is the hand in whose hollow the waters of the deep can be contained, then, even though all flesh is but grass, the purpose of God in Israel's restoration must be attained. Further, the restoration of Israel is spoken of in terms of a "new creation" (Isa. lxv. 17, 18). He Whose power and wisdom called the visible creation into being in the past is fully able to bring about a new creation in the future.

The utter distrust of "all flesh" that is uppermost in the mind of the Prophet in the opening section is again brought forward in this new section, as an argument against Israel's great failure to trust God alone. From the days when the Lord said, "Thou shalt have no other gods before Me", Israel showed a terrible tendency to idolatry, or its equivalent, a trust in Egypt, or a trust in something visible and tangible.

Isaiah does not refer to the attributes of the Creator in the form of a statement, but in the guise of a question; "Who . . . . . who . . . . . with whom?" and then leads on to the great challenge "To whom, then, will ye liken God?"

Before we consider these references to idolatry, let us observe the way in which the subject-matter is distributed. Isaiah divides his references to the greatness of God into three.

(1) POWER.—"Who hath measured . . . meted . . . comprehended . . . weighed?"
(2) WISDOM.—Who hath directed . . . taught . . . counseled . . . shewed?"
(3) COMPARISON.—The Nations. |
A drop in a bucket.
The small dust of the balance.
Nothing; less than nothing; a vanity.
The Earth. |
The isles taken up as a very little thing.
Lebanon not sufficient to burn.
The beasts not sufficient for an offering.

We have already seen that in the mind of Isaiah the "Shepherd" and the "Creator" were one.

With this section of Isaiah, we may profitably couple the words of Agur, the son of Jakeh:

> "Who hath ascended up into heaven, or descended? Who hath gathered the wind in His fists? Who hath bound the waters in a garment? Who hath established all the ends of the earth? What is His name, and WHAT HIS SON'S NAME, if thou canst tell?" (Prov. xxx. 4).

This passage speaks of Christ, and John's Gospel and Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians provide the answer to the question raised:

> "No man hath ascended up to heaven, but He that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven" (John iii. 13).
> "Now He that ascended, what is it but that He also descended first into the lower parts of the earth? He that descended is the same also the ascended up far above all heavens, that He might fill all things" (Eph. iv. 9, 10).

When Isaiah saw the Lord high and lifted up, He saw the glory of the Lord Jesus (Isa. vi.; John xii. 41). When Isaiah set forth the Shepherd-Creator, He also spoke of the incomparable power of the self-same Saviour. From incomparable power, he passes to equally incomparable wisdom, and again speaks of Christ:

> "For whom hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct Him? But we have the mind of Christ" (I Cor. ii. 16).

"Christ is the power of God, and the wisdom of God" (I Cor. i. 24). These are two essentials to success: wisdom to know how to do a thing, and power to carry it out. That the purpose of the ages is assured is clear, for with such power and with such wisdom as is set forth in Isa. xl. failure is impossible.

Twice the prophet sounds out the challenging question, "To whom then will ye liken God? or what likeness will ye compare with Him?" He challenges man, who alone of all creatures was made "in the likeness of God" (Gen. v. 1), as though He would say that in resorting to image worship, man not only degraded the name of God, but himself.

In this matter God has revealed Himself as being exceedingly jealous. Five times over do the Scriptures declare that the Lord our God is "a jealous God" (Exod. xx. 5; xxxiv. 14; Deut. iv. 24; v. 9; vi. 15). In every case the context deals with the worship of graven images or the making of the likeness of anything in heaven or earth, that could take the place of God Himself in the heart.

When Israel dethroned the Lord, they dethroned themselves.

> "They have moved Me to jealousy with that which is not God; they have provoked Me to anger with their vanities; and I will move them to jealousy with those which are not a people; I will provoke them to anger with a foolish nation" (Deut. xxxii. 21).

Image worship not only degrades the name of God and the name of Israel, but aims a direct blow at the unique position of man in the purpose of creation, and what is of still greater moment, thrusts at the prerogative of Christ Himself "Who is the IMAGE of the invisible God".

It will be a help if we can visualize the argument of the passage in Isa. xl. which deals with this question of the likeness of God:

A | 18. FIRST QUESTION. "To whom will ye liken God?"
B | 19, 20. FIRST ANSWER (Negative). The utter futility of idolatry.
C | 21. SECOND QUESTION.
"Have ye not known? Have ye not heard?"
D | 22-24. SECOND ANSWER. The majesty of the Creator.
A | 25. FIRST QUESTION REPEATED. "To whom will ye liken God?"
B | 26, 27. FIRST ANSWER (Positive). Omnipotence of the Creator.
C | 28. SECOND QUESTION REPEATED.
"Hast thou not known? Hast thou not heard?"
D | 28-31. SECOND ANSWER. The gracious power of the Creator.

There is something of an anti-climax in the sudden insertion of B (Isa. xl. 19, 20), the First Answer. We have heard of Him in the hollow of Whose hand the waters may be measured, and Whose span meted out the heavens. Before this mighty One the nations, for all their number and prowess in arms or civilization, are as a drop of a bucket. Lebanon itself with its great cedars would not suffice to burn, nor the beasts thereof suffice for a burnt offering. Into this ascending scale, which carries the mind on and up until the contemplation of "the greatness of His might" causes the understanding to reel; into this panegyric of Deity, the prophet, without preparation, suddenly inserts the bald statement concerning the fashioning of a graven image.

> "The workman melteth a graven image, and the goldsmith spreadeth it over with gold, and casteth silver chains. He that is so impoverished that he hath no oblation chooseth a tree that will not rot; he seeketh unto him a cunning workman to prepare a graven image, that shall not be moved."

In like manner this rhetorical figure of "Anti-climax" is found in the chapter that follows.

> "And every one said to his brother, Be of good courage. So the carpenter encouraged the goldsmith, and he that smootheth with the hammer him that smote the anvil, saying, It is ready for the sodering: and he fastened it with nails, that it should not be moved" (Isa. xli. 6, 7).

Surrounded with so many evidences of the Creator's power and wisdom, it seems almost impossible to believe that the human mind should descend so low. It seems almost equally impossible that man, made in the image of God, should even think of so debasing himself as to fabricate a graven image to serve as the object of his worship. Listen to the pitiful irony of the prophet:

> "Silver chains . . . . . that shall not be moved!"
> "Fastened with nails, that it should not be moved!"
> "It is ready for the sodering!"

But idolatry is something more than the foolish worship of images held together with "soder" and fastened with "nails" and "chains". Its root lies deeper, for at bottom it is a false faith. This is seen in Isa. xli. 6, 7:

> "Be of good courage. so the carpenter encouraged . . . . . he fastened it with nails."

Used in a context like this the words "Be of good courage" indicate the root cause of idolatry. They are words used by God Himself, and which demand implicit trust in Himself.

> "For I the Lord thy God will hold thy right hand, saying unto thee, Fear not: I will help thee" (Isa. xli. 13).

Here the words "will hold" are a translation of the same Hebrew verb that is translated "Be of good courage", "encouraged" and "fastened", in Isa. xli. 6, 7. It is the word used in the great epitome of prophetic truth, Isa. xxxv., where the Lord says:

> "Say to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong, fear not: behold, your God will come . . . . ." (Isa. xxxv. 4).

In the passage we are considering (Isa. xl. 12 - xlii. 17) the vanity of image worship is mot merely contrasted with the power and might of the Creator as seen in His works, but also with the help that He alone can give to His believing people. It is tragic to read, "So the carpenter encouraged", only a few verses after those magnificent lines:

> "Hast thou not known? hast thou not heard, that the everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth, fainteth not, neither is weary? there is no searching of His understanding. He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might He increaseth strength. Even the youths shall faint and be weary, and the young men shall utterly fall: but they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run, and not be weary; and they shall walk, and not faint" (Isa. xl. 28-31).

"To whom then will ye liken God?"

The Gospel of JOHN.

#23. The Testimony in Jerusalem, Judaea and Samaria (ii. 13-iv. 42).
Jerusalem. Aionian Life (iii. 13 - 21).
pp. 28 - 31

John iii. 16, which has been before us for a while, is flanked on either side by explanatory passages, thus:

A1 | 14, 15. | a | The serpent in the wilderness lifted up.
b | Whosoever believeth in Him, shall not perish,
but have eternal life.
A2 | 16. | a | The only begotten Son of God given.
b | Whosoever believeth in Him shall not perish,
but have eternal life.
A3 | 17, 18. | a | God sent not His Son into the world to condemn.
b | But that the world through Him might be saved.
He that believeth—saved. He that believeth not--condemned.

Instead of dwelling longer on John iii. 16, let us follow the guidance of the inspired evangelist and consider the way in which he amplifies and expands the theme of that wonderful verse.

Where John iii. 16 says that God "gave", iii. 17 says "sent".
Where John iii. 16 says "only begotten Son", iii. 17 says "His Son".
Where John iii. 16 says "perish", iii. 17 says "condemned".
Where John iii. 16 says "have eternal life", iii. 17 says "be saved".

Let us consider these alternative words and so gain the further light which they throw upon the message of John iii. 16.

(1) "SENT" (Apostello).—It is not in John iii. 17 that we find the first occurrence of this word in this Gospel, but it is the first which refers to Christ. In the first occurrence it is used of John the Baptist, "There was a man sent from God, whose name was John" (John i. 6), and the first use of the word in the N.T., in connection with the Lord, is found in Matt. x. 5, "These twelve Jesus sent forth", which is but the meaning of verse 2 of the same chapter; "The names of the twelve apostles are these", for, as the reader can easily see, the word apostle is simply the Greek word derived from apostello. In Heb. iii. 1 the believer is exhorted to, "Consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession". This is comparable with the double title of Heb. xii., where we are again exhorted to "consider Him" (Heb. xii. 3), Who is the Author and Finisher of faith (Heb. xii. 2). The Gospel of John not only stresses the fact that, as the "Sent One", the Lord Jesus was the great Apostle, but leads us to the One Who could say, "I have finished the work . . . . . now come I to Thee" (John xvii. 4, 13), and Who, when the work was done, sent the message to His disciples, "I ascend unto My Father, and your Father; and to My God, and your God" (John xx. 17).

John's Gospel presents us with the Apostle ("Sent") and High Priest ("I ascend"), the Author ("Grace and truth came into being by Jesus Christ") and the Finisher ("I have finished the work"). The actual word "apostle" does not appear in the A.V. of the Gospel, but apostolos is found in the original.

> "The servant is not greater than his Lord; neither he that is sent (the apostle) greater than He that sent him" (John xiii. 16).

Here, moreover, is a strange thing. One would expect that in "He that sent him" the kindred verb would be apostello, simply and easily rounding off the subject, but it is pempo, which occurs 33 times in John, while apostello occurs 28 times. Apostello means "to send away", "dispatch", "dismiss", and pempo, while including these meanings, adds the idea of "accompaniment" and "escort".

In John xx. 21 there is therefore a gracious reason for the change of verb:

> "As My Father hath sent Me (apostello, sent Me as on a mission, with some element of 'dispatch' and 'dismissal', or at least 'distance', adhering to the word), even so send I you (pempo, but this time, 'escorted', 'accompanied', for He had said 'I will not leave you comfortless')."

Eternal, or aionion life, is bound up with this "Sent One" for it is written not only at the opening (John iii. 16, 17), but also at the close of the Gospel.

> "And this is life eternal (aionion), that they might know Thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, Whom thou hast sent" (apostello) (John xvii. 3).

We might also note that whereas apostello occurs seven times in the great prayer of John xvii., pempo is never used. When God so loved the world and "gave" His only begotten Son, He "sent" Him to execute a commission; He came as the great "Apostle", even as He returned as the great High Priest.

(2) "HIS SON."—In this Gospel the Lord is referred to as the "Son", with the following additions to the title:--

> "The only begotten Son" (John i. 18; iii. 16).
> "The Son of God" (John i. 34, 49).
> "The Son of Joseph" (John i. 45).
> "The Son of man" (John i. 51; iii. 13, 14).
> "The Son of the living God" (John vi. 69).

The references given are not complete, as some of the titles recur with frequency, but by far the greatest number are to "the Son", without additional title, as: "The Father loveth the Son" (John iii. 35); "He that believeth on the Son" (John iii. 36). This title occurs fifteen times in the Gospel.

Whichever title is used, it is the same glorious Person, and the same most blessed relationship both as regards the Father that sent Him, and the children, who were partakers of flesh and blood, among whom He came. The simple title, "the Son" seems to be used on purpose to focus the heart's attention on this one mediatorial relationship, "The Word Who became flesh", Who, in the body of His flesh, through death, made a sacrifice for sin, and thus became the Saviour of all who trust in Him.

(3) INSTEAD OF "PERISH", VERSE 17 USES "CONDEMNED", AND, INSTEAD OF "ETERNAL LIFE", VERSE 17 USES THE WORD "SAVED".—The Greek word which is translated "condemn" is krino, and occurs nineteen times in the Gospel. Out of the number of occurrences however it is only translated "condemn" thrice, namely in John iii. 17, 18. In the majority of passages it is translated "judge", and the primary meaning of the word is "to separate", "distinguish", "discern". Of itself, krino does not imply condemnation, for it is used in Matt. xix. 28 in the clause "judging the twelve tribes of Israel", and its primitive meaning is discerned in the rendering found in Rom. xiv. 5 where it is translated "esteemeth".

Such however is the nature and extent of sin that it is enough to know that an unsaved man will stand before the Lord as his Judge, and that such judgment must issue in condemnation,

> "This is the judgment, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil" (John iii. 19).

The way in which John speaks of light in this passage is very like Paul's use of the same figure in Eph. v. 11-14. John says that light "reproves" and "makes manifest" "deeds" (John iii. 20, 21), and Paul says:

> "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works (ergon same word as 'deeds') of darkness, but rather reprove them . . . . . all things that are reproved are made manifest by the light, for whatsoever doth make manifest is light" (Eph. v. 11-13).

Here, at the conclusion of the testimony at Jerusalem, the charge uttered in the prologue is found true.

> "The light shineth (phaino, root of the word translated 'manifest') in darkness; and the darkness comprehended it not" (John i. 5).

To receive the gift of eternal life, according to this extension of the subject, is to be "saved". Salvation includes both life and deliverance from condemnation, the subjects of which will not perish, but, as another passage has it, have "passed from death unto life" (John v. 24).

We must next turn our attention to the testimony in Judæa and Samaria that followed this witness in Jerusalem. Meanwhile, all who are redeemed, whatever their calling, sphere and destiny, can rejoice as they contemplate the love, the gift, and the deliverance revealed in John iii. 16.

#24. The Testimony in Jerusalem, Judaea and Samaria (ii. 13-iv. 42).

JUDAEA.

The Bride and the Bridegroom (iii. 22 - iv. 2).

With special reference to the dispensational position of John's Gospel.

pp. 61 - 65

This section is a short one bounded at either end with a reference to the entry of the Lord into Judaea, and His leaving it for Galilee (John iii. 22 and iv. 3). The teaching of the intervening verses is distributed under references to baptism, either the baptism of the Lord (John iii. 22; iv. 1, 2), the baptism of John (John iii. 23, 24), or controversy arising out of these ordinances (John iii. 25, 36; iv. 1).

In the course of the testimony of John the Baptist, and in illustration of his declaration "He must increase, but I must decrease" (John iii. 30) he uses the figures of the Bride, the Bridegroom and the Friend of the Bridegroom.

> "He that hath the bride is the bridegroom: but the friend of the bridegroom, which standeth and heareth him, rejoiceth greatly because of the bridegroom's voice: this is my joy therefore is fulfilled" (John iii. 29).

While numphe, "bride", occurs in Matthew and Luke, where it is translated "daughter-in-law", John is the only N.T. writer who uses the word of that company of believers known as "The Bride": he does so once in the Gospel (John iii. 29), and three times in the Revelation (Rev. xxi. 2, 9; xxii. 17).

The title "the friend of the bridegroom" refers to the Shoshebin, a word very common in Hebrew writings and comments, and the office is well illustrated by the "best man" of the modern wedding.

In the Gospel, no attempt is made to elaborate the doctrine of the "Bride", but in the Apocalypse John devotes considerable space to it and supplies a wealth of detail in his description of that company, whose sphere is the heavenly, or new, Jerusalem.

Turning for a moment to the book of the Revelation, we observe that the marriage of the Lamb and the fall of Babylon are announced: that the association of these two events is by no means accidental or slight, the following features will reveal.

The Harlot. Rev. xvii., xviii.	The Bride. Rev. xix., xxi., xxii.
"And there came one of the seven angels which had the seven vials, and talked with me saying unto me, Come hither; I will show unto thee the judgment of the great whore that sitteth upon many waters" (Rev. xvii. 1).	"And there came unto me one of the seven angels which had the seven vials full of the seven last plagues, and talked with me, saying, Come hither; I will show unto thee the bride, the Lamb's wife" (Rev. xxi. 9).

"So he carried me away in the spirit into the wilderness: and I saw a woman sit upon a scarlet coloured beast, full of the names of blasphemy . . . . . And the woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet colour, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls . . . . . And upon her forehead was a name written, Mystery, Babylon the Great, the Mother of harlots and abominations of the earth" (Rev. xvii. 3-5).	"And he carried me away in the spirit to a great and high mountain, and showed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God, having the glory of God: and her light was like unto a stone most precious, even like a jasper stone, clear as crystal . . . . . and names written thereon, which are the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel . . . . . and the foundations of the wall of the city were garnished with all manner of precious stones . . . . . every several gate was of one pearl: and the street of the city was pure gold, as it were transparent glass" (Rev. xxi. 10-21).
"And the woman which thou sawest is that great city, which reigneth over the kings of the earth" (Rev. xvii. 18).	"And I John saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband" (Rev. xxi. 2).

The reader will note the many ways in which these two companies are brought into contrast by the record of these chapters in Revelation. Leaving that subject to the reader's own research, we proceed to note one or two distinctive items in the descriptions of the bride, or those associated with her, to which reference will again be made after setting out the argument for the peculiar constitution of that company called "The Bride".

(1) The Bride, is the Lamb's wife (Rev. xxi. 9).
(2) Every several gate was of one pearl (Rev. xxi. 21).
(3) He that overcometh shall inherit these things (Rev. xxi. 7 margin).
(4) They which are written in the Lamb's book of life (Rev. xxi. 27).

While "the bride" is most intimately associated with Israel, (Rev. xxi. 12), for the following scriptural reasons it must not be confused with Israel as a nation.

Those purposes of God which by way of distinction we refer to as "kingdom" purposes, relate not only to the earth, but also to a heavenly sphere. This is made clear by considering the teaching of Scripture concerning Abraham.

Gen. xii.-xv. reveals that to Abraham and to his seed was granted, unconditionally, the earthly sphere of blessing. To Abraham, however, was opened up the further possibility of rising higher and of becoming a partaker of the heavenly calling. This is shown in Heb. iii. 1; xi. 8-10, 13-16; xii. 22. During the early days of the N.T. Gentile believers were associated with Israel's hope under the New Covenant (II Cor. iii.; Rom. xv. 12, 13). As Gal. iv. 26 shows, however, they were not partakers of the earthly, but of the heavenly, sphere of the kingdom.

Israel, as a nation, became "the wife", when they entered into covenant relationship at Sinai.

> "The covenant that I made with their fathers in the day that I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt; which My covenant they brake, although I was an husband unto them, saith the Lord" (Jer. xxxi. 32).

By the great love and mercy of the Lord, Israel, though thus "put away", shall yet be brought back again.

> "They say, If a man put away his wife, and she go from him, and become another man's, shall he return unto her again? shall not that land be greatly polluted? But thou hast played the harlot with many lovers; yet return again to Me, saith the Lord" (Jer. iii. 1).
>
> "Surely as a wife treacherously departed from her husband, so have ye dealt treacherously with Me, O house of Israel, saith the Lord . . . . . Return, ye backsliding children, and I will heal your backslidings" (Jer. iii. 20-22).

This blessed restoration is the theme of Isaiah's prophecies:

> "Thou shalt no more be termed Forsaken; neither shall thy land any more be termed Desolate: but thou shalt be called Hephzibah, and thy land Beulah: for the Lord delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married" (Isa. lxii. 4).

The restoration of a divorced woman and the betrothal and marriage of "the chaste virgin" which Paul speaks of in II Cor. xi. 2, and which John speaks of as the "Bride", must not be confused. Israel, as a nation, are the restored wife, but a remnant out of Israel, together with some believing Gentiles, constitute the new company, "the bride, the Lamb's wife". During the Acts, Gentile believers were, equally with Jewish believers, Abraham's seed and heirs, and to this company belongs Jerusalem which is above (Gal. iii. 29; iv. 26).

The distinction between these two companies is suggested in the two parables of Matt. xiii. 44-46. The treasure hid in a field, which, after discovery, was hidden again, represents the nation of Israel, God's peculiar treasure.

> "For thou art an holy people unto the Lord thy God, and the Lord hath chosen thee to be a peculiar people (segullah) unto Himself" (Deut. xiv. 2).
> "For the Lord hath chosen Jacob unto Himself, and Israel for His peculiar treasure (segullah)" (Psa. cxxxv. 4).

While "all Israel" was a treasure, the Lord noted with special approbation those "of Israel" who walked by faith, and these, such as Abraham, were granted the heavenly prospect, associated with the heavenly city, and are represented in the parable as the "one pearl". The reader will remember that "one pearl" is noted in the description of the gates of the New Jerusalem. While the pearl is a part of the Lord's treasure, it is signally different from other treasures in that it is organic, being produced by suffering and so typical of that remnant, according to the election of grace, that walked by faith, while the bulk of their fellows fell into idolatry and unbelief.

"All Israel" shall be saved (Rom. xi. 26); the erring wife shall be restored; but the marriage of the Lamb refers not to this restoration but to the new company that inherits the heavenly sphere of the kingdom. It is to this marriage of the Lamb that the parable of Matt. xxii. looks forward, where particular emphasis is put upon the invitation which was sent out to the "guests". Not by any stretch of imagination can "guests" at a marriage be made to refer to "the bride", and they must therefore represent a yet further and separate company who are neither restored Israel nor the elect remnant.

As the "Lamb" the Lord Jesus is "the King's Son", and for Him a marriage has been made. The king's servants went out and called those who had been bidden, but they would not come. A second invitation, corresponding with the renewal of the gospel in Acts ii. where "all things were ready", was made, but this was met by excuses and abuse; "they made light of it". The result of this hardness of heart was that these were destroyed and their city burned up (Matt. xxii. 7). This is plain allusion to the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D.70, and the words "ye would not" of Matt. xxiii. 37 and the destruction of the temple (Matt. xxiv. 2) confirm the interpretation.

After A.D.70 the hope of Israel and the New Covenant were suspended. Necessarily, with the suspension of that hope and that New Covenant, went the restoration of Israel as the wife, and the calling of the remnant as the bride, but one feature was perpetuated, namely, the calling of those who should be guests at the marriage. These were gathered out from the highways, "bad and good: and the wedding was furnished with guests" (Matt. xxii. 9, 10). Those who "had been bidden" (Matt. xxii. 3) and to whom a second invitation had been sent (Matt. xxii. 4) were Israel. Those who subsequently took the place forfeited by Israel are referred to by John: "He came unto His own, and His own received Him not, but as many as received Him . . . . ." (John i. 11, 12). These are "the other sheep" not acknowledged by Israel (John x. 16).

John's Gospel differs from the synoptic Gospels in many ways, and prominent among these is the dispensational position of those who believe its message. Such do not form part of the kingdom of Israel, neither do they constitute the Bride of the Lamb, but they do fit into Matt. xxii. 9, 10, and those who to-day respond to the gospel of John iii. 16 and order their lives according to the teaching of that gospel constitute that distinctive and blessed company who shall be the guests at the marriage of the Lamb, an honour high indeed for such as were gathered from highways and byways, both bad and good.

In harmony with this intention, the first miracle recorded as a sign in John's Gospel is that of a marriage, where the "friend of the bridegroom" is introduced (John ii. 9) and where the Lord and His disciples were there as "guests".

John's Gospel is unique. It differs from Matthew in that it is not concerned with the kingdom, but rather with one phase of that purpose of the ages by which God fills the interval occasioned by Israel's failure. Both the prison ministry of Paul and the Gospel according to John are written in view of the crisis of Acts xxviii. In John's prologue the presentation of Christ as the Word is very close to the presentation of Christ as the Image of the invisible God in Paul's prison ministry, but the callings are distinct and differ essentially. In John's Gospel the believer is numbered among those of the Gentiles called after A.D.70 to be guests of the marriage feast, whereas in Paul's prison ministry the Gentile believer called after Acts xxviii. 28 becomes a member of the body of Christ. In both Acts xxviii. and in the climax chapter of John xii., the crisis is indicated by the quotation of Isa. vi. 9, 10 (John xii. 40, 41; Acts xxviii. 26, 27). In John xii. 20, 21 it is “Greeks” that seek the Lord; in Acts xxviii. 28 it is “Gentiles” that are the object of grace.

The correspondencies and the contrasts that form a valuable indication to the dispensational position of John’s Gospel may be seen in graphic form in the chart published in Volume XXVII, pages 126, 127, and now obtainable as a leaflet—see list of publications—which should be consulted by the interested reader.

#25. The Testimony in Jerusalem, Judaea and Samaria (ii. 13-iv. 42). SAMARIA. The bearing of this “must needs go” upon the dispensational position of John’s Gospel (iv. 3 - 42). pp. 96 - 100

The Lord’s ministry, as recorded by John, and the command which the Lord gave concerning the ministry of the twelve after Pentecost, follow the same course—Jerusalem, Judæa, Samaria—and the section now before us deals with the Lord’s testimony in Samaria.

In order that the place of Samaria and the Samaritans in John’s Gospel may be appreciated, we give a brief account of this place and people, which will also throw light upon one or two statements in John iv.

At the disruption of the kingdom on the death of Solomon, the Ten Tribes, usually referred to as Israel, made their capital city, Samaria, which was built on a hill by Omri, King of Israel, in the portion of Ephraim, 42 miles north of Jerusalem:

> “And he bought the hill Samaria of Shemer for two talents of silver, and built on the hill, and called the name of the city which he built, after the name of Shemer, owner of the hill, Samaria” (I Kings xvi. 24).

In II Kings xvii. 5, 6 we read that the King of Assyria went up to Samaria, and besieged it three years and that in the ninth year of Hoshea the King of Assyria took Samaria and carried Israel away captive. In the place of the deported Israelites the King of Assyria brought men from Babylon and other parts of his dominion “and placed them in the cities of Samaria” (II Kings xvii. 24). The people thus established were subjected to a devastation by wild beasts, because they feared not the Lord. A petition was made to the King of Assyria saying, “The nations which thou hast removed, and placed in the cities of Samaria, know not the manner of the God of the land: therefore He hath sent lions among them” (II Kings xvii. 26). The king replied: “Carry thither one of the priests whom ye brought from thence; and let them go and dwell there, and let him teach them the manner of the God of the land” (II Kings xvii. 27). This was done but, alas, the result of the attempted palliation is thus recorded: “They feared the Lord, and served their own gods” (II Kings xvii. 33).

After the return of the Jews from Babylon the Samaritans wished to join them in the rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem, saying: "Let us build with you: for we seek your God, as ye do; and we do sacrifice unto Him since the days of Esar-haddon King of Assur, which brought us up hither" (Ezra iv. 2). The offer was refused, and the repudiation continued even in the N.T. times, for we read "The Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans." The Samaritans possess to this day a most ancient copy of the Pentateuch, written in characters resembling the Siloam Inscription and the Moabite Stone, characters earlier than those known as "Hebrew" to-day.

Maimonedes admits that the Samaritans rigidly practiced the law, and Dr. Wait in his "Repertorium Theologicum" has shown that the Samaritans had a clear notion of the coming of the Messiah. We shall presently revert to these items, but for the moment turn our attention to the passage in John that records the Saviour's dealings with the woman of Samaria. The section before us (John iv. 3-42) divides into three parts:

A1 | 3-7. The COMING OF THE LORD TO SAMARIA. "To draw water."
A2 | 7-27. The WOAN OF SAMARIA. "Messiah cometh."
A3 | 28-42. The PEOPLE OF SAMARIA. "This is indeed the Christ."

The section A2 dealing with the Woman of Samaria falls naturally into seven parts, for the twenty-one verses of John iv. that relate to her consist mainly of the dialogue between her and the Lord.

John iv. 7 - 27.

A | a | 7. THE LORD. Give Me to drink.
b | 8. THE DISCIPLES. Gone away to buy meat.
B | c | 9. THE WOMAN. How? Jews and Samaritans.
d | 10. THE LORD. If thou knewest the Gift of God.
c | 11, 12. THE WOMAN. From whence? Well is deep.
d | 13, 14. THE LORD. A well . . . . . everlasting life.
c | 15. THE WOMAN. Sir, give me this water.
d | 16. THE LORD. Go, call thy husband.
c | 17. THE WOMAN. I have no husband.
d | 17, 18. THE LORD. Thou hast well said.
c | 19, 20. THE WOMAN. Sir, I perceive Thou art a prophet.
d | 21-24. THE LORD. The worship of the Father.
c | 25. THE WOMAN. I know that Messiah cometh.
A | a | 26. THE LORD. I that speak unto thee am He.
b | 27. THE DISCIPLES. Return.

When the Lord sent out His twelve apostles to preach the gospel of the Kingdom, He said:

> "Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not: but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. x. 5, 6).

In the passage in John which we are considering, however, we learn that our Lord Himself entered a city of the Samaritans and that many were saved, a firstfruits of those "other sheep" (John x. 16) for whose blessing this Gospel was written. "Go not" (Matt. x.) and "Must needs go" (John iv. 4) mark the two dispensational aspects of these two Gospels. Matthew's purpose would not have been served by revealing this ministry of the Lord, for he set forth the Saviour as the seed of David and of Abraham, Israel's King. John had another purpose in view. This same Christ, Who was Israel's King and Messiah, came to give life where death abounded, but He had limited His earthly ministry to Israel, because of the peculiar place they occupied in the purpose of the ages, yet that one life, death and resurrection is the basis of all callings, all salvation, all hope. Thus Paul revealed facts concerning that one sacrifice which, though surely accomplished, were as surely unknown at the time, even as John also revealed, by his inspired selection of the earthly ministry of Christ, a wider purpose of God than could be gathered from Matthew's narrative.

We must remember that dispensational changes take place when the time for their announcement arrives, not when the work upon which they rest was accomplished. Whether recorded by Matthew or by John, by Peter or by Paul, it is the same Christ and the same cross; the same resurrection and the same ascension, but the doctrines that are related to that one work of Christ vary considerably, and are made known only in their appointed seasons.

John the Baptist not only said "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand", but "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world". The former utterance was made known by Matthew, who did not include the latter, whereas John ignores the former and include the latter. It is therefore suggestive of the non-Jewish trend of the Gospel of John that he is inspired to record the ministry of the Lord in Samaria. Moreover, it is in entire accord with the confessed purpose of John in writing this record, which was:

> "That ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through His name" (John xx. 31).

This Woman of Samaria is led on to believe that Jesus is the Christ, and many of her own townspeople believed with her. Just as Nicodemus stumbled at the announcement of the new birth, saying, "How?" (John iii. 4) so, at first, the woman took the reference to "living water" physically, saying: "Sir, Thou hast nothing to draw with, and the well is deep: from whence then hast Thou that living water?"

The testimony given to Nicodemus is prefaced by the words, "And needed not that any should testify of man: for He knew what was in man" (John ii. 25). It was this same, intimate, knowledge that convicted the woman of Samaria. When she admitted that she had no husband, the Lord revealed that He knew all about it, and that she had previously had five husbands; consequently, upon her return to the city, she said:--

> "Come, see a man, which told me all things that ever I did: is not this the Christ?" (John iv. 29).

> "And many of the Samaritans of that city believed on Him for the saying of the woman, which testified, He told me all that ever I did . . . . . And many more believed because of His own word; and said unto the woman, Now we believe, not because of thy saying: for we have heard Him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world" (John iv. 39-42).

We have already drawn attention to the fact that, where Matthew will refer to the fulfillment of a prophecy, John adduces the evidence of individual testimony. We have seen this in the case of Nathaniel, who was convinced that Jesus was the Son of God and the King of Israel by the omniscient knowledge which the Lord manifested. It was by similar evidence that the Woman of Samaria and her fellow-townsfolk were convinced. The man born blind and Thomas himself are further examples. Evidently the appeal is not to the Jew and his sacred Scriptures, but to the world at large. The introduction of such a controversial matter as the disputed place of worship, "Jerusalem or this mountain", may have been the natural attempt of the woman to turn the conversation into less personal and intimate channels. On the other hand every Jew and every Samaritan must have felt that the matter was one of the first importance. The woman, realizing by the Lord's intimate knowledge of her life that he must be a prophet (John iv. 19) seemed to feel that this was an opportunity too good to be missed, and said:

> "Our fathers worshipped in this mountain; and ye say, that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship" (John iv. 20).

In selecting his incidents as a means of teaching the special line of doctrine inculcated in his Gospel, John seems to have been guided by two features,

(1) Evidence, upon which faith can rest (as in the cases of Nathaniel, the woman of Samaria, or Thomas), that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God.
(2) Special aspects of truth (such as the New Birth), which the recounted incidents bring to light.

Here, in the story of the Samaritan woman, while supplying the evidence, "A man which told me all things that ever I did", and most pointedly, evidence as to "eternal life" being "the gift of God", he also brings into prominence the question of the true nature of worship.

Speaking after the manner of men, it is in the Lord's dealings with Nicodemus, the teacher in Israel, that one would have expected a discourse on the nature of worship, and a lesson on the need of new birth to the poor sinful Samaritan woman; but it is not so.

This question of spiritual worship is too important to be dealt with at the close of an article and we must therefore devote our next study to the testimony of John iv. 20-24. We close the present article with the following observation:--

When the apostle spoke to the Jews, he quoted the law and the prophets. It was sufficient evidence of truth to show that such and such an event fulfilled the prophets. This is the line of argument adopted by Matthew, although some of his "proofs" need careful examination if those unaccustomed to Hebrew methods of handling the Scriptures are to be convinced of their relevancy, as for example the "fulfillment" of the prophecy of Hosea in Matt. ii. 15, or of Jeremiah in Matt. ii. 18. When John wrote his Gospel it was not the Jew, with his Scriptures, that was before his mind, but "the world", a world that knew not the Hebrew Scriptures. He opens his Gospel with a philosophic presentation of the Christ as "The Logos made flesh" (John i. 14), and while Philip told Nathaniel that they had found Him of Whom Moses and the Prophets wrote, the guileless Israelite is not convinced by an array of prophetic fulfillments, but by personal conviction brought about by the Lord's absolute knowledge of his being and actions (John i. 50).

In chapter ii. the testimony of the Scripture and the force of its fulfillment does not operate in the minds of the apostles until after the resurrection:

> "When therefore He was risen from the dead, His disciples remembered that He had said this unto them; and they (then) believed the scripture, and the word which Jesus had said" (John ii. 22).

The general trend of the teaching of the Gospel is to prove by evidence, that "Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God", and then, because Christ is believed, the Scriptures which He endorsed would of necessity also be believed (John v. 46, 47). This is not of course a hard and fast rule; there are occasions when John does draw attention to the fulfillment of O.T. prophecy, but it remains true that the main basis of the Gospel is accredited testimony.

In his prison ministry, Paul does not quote O.T. Scripture in support of the mystery, because, being a mystery hid in God, it formed no part of O.T. revelation. In his Gospel, John does not appeal to O.T. Scripture to prove that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, because those to whom he addressed his message were not likely either to be in possession of the O.T. Scriptures or to be believers in them. His line of teaching is rather faith in Christ as the Giver of Life first, then the recognition that this Christ is the Messiah of O.T. prophecy, and consequently the acceptance of those O.T. Scriptures which spoke of Him.

Of the writers of the N.T. John alone uses the title "Messiah". A superficial reading has led some to affirm that this is "proof" that John had the Jew in mind, but the reverse is the fact. Most evidently he had an untaught Gentile in view, for what Jew needed the following explanation?

> "Which is, being interpreted, the Christ" (John i. 41).
> "I know that Messiah cometh, which is called Christ" (John iv. 25).

The more we examine the Gospel, the stronger the conviction grows that John did not write "kingdom" truth, did not write to the circumcision, but to the world. One "argument" against this view is that John was an apostle of the circumcision (Gal. ii. 7, 9), but if that would prevent John, in his old age, after the circumcision had been set aside, from writing a message to the world, it would also prevent Paul from writing the epistle to the Hebrews, which we do not believe or teach. Moreover, apart from John's Gospel, there is no ministry that fulfils the call of the guests after A.D.70, but, with it, every phase of God's gracious purpose in each sphere of blessing is provided for, for which we give Him thanks.

#26. The Testimony in Jerusalem, Judaea and Samaria (ii. 13-iv. 42).

SAMARIA.

"The hour cometh." Dispensational changes, true worship, and the purpose of John's Gospel illuminated (iv. 3 - 42).

pp. 139 - 143

As the subject is of such importance to all believers, we postponed until the present article examination of the Lord's teaching in John iv. concerning the nature of worship.

The commencement of the argument is upon a low plane; it deals with the conflicting claims of Mount Gerizim in Samaria, and Jerusalem in Judæa, but in the hand of the Lord the matter is soon raised to a higher realm and, by the addition of the words "and now is", is made applicable to the period that followed the destruction of the temple in A.D.70.

The argument falls into two parts: (1) the woman's question, and (2) The Lord's answer.

> "Our fathers worship in this mountain; and ye say, that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship" (John ii. 20).

The words "the place where" reveal the heart of the question; it was a matter of "in" this mountain or "in" Jerusalem.

From the point of view of Phil. iii. 3, any localizing of the worship of God, or holding one "place" as more sacred than another, seems childish, but we must not wrongly divide the word of truth. In the older dispensation it was a matter of extreme importance to be sure of the "place" of acceptable worship.

> "Unto the place which the Lord your God shall choose out of all your tribes to put His Name there, even unto His habitation shall ye seek, and thither thou shalt come" (Deut. xii. 5).

In Deut. xxvii. 4, the Samaritan Pentateuch reads "Gerizim", where the Hebrew reads "Ebal", and it is this falsification of the original that was at the bottom of most of the controversy between the Samaritans and the Jews in the matter of worship.

In Neh. xiii. 28 we read that the grandson of the high priest Eliashib was banished by Nehemiah because he was the son-in-law of Sanballat, and Josephus tells us that this man fled to Samaria, where his father-in-law made him high priest of the temple which he had built at Gerizim. There was also a revolt of other Jews who had married strange wives, consequently there would be a strong temptation to justify themselves by altering the place of the words Ebal and Gerizim in the Law. Added to this was the strain of idolatry that had been brought by the men transferred from Babylon by the king of Assyria and the resulting mixture would justify the abhorrence of the Jew and the language of the Lord when He said, "ye worship ye know not what". The Lord was about to reveal to the Samaritan woman that change of dispensation which would set aside Jerusalem itself as the "place" of worship, but, before doing so, He makes it clear that "salvation was of the Jews" and that worship at Jerusalem was of Divine appointment.

The Lord's answer to the woman's question occupies verses 21-24 of Chapter iv., and the structure is as follows:--

A | John iv. 21.—DISPENSATIONAL CHANGE.—The hour cometh.
B | 21.—WORSHIP OF THE FATHER.—
Neither in this mountain. Nor in Jerusalem.
C | 22.—SALVATION IS OF THE JEWS.—
Ye worship ye know not what. We worship we know what.
A | 23.—DISPENSATIONAL CHANGE.—The hour cometh and now is.
B | 23.—WORSHIP OF THE FATHER.—
True worshippers, worship in spirit and truth.
C | 24.—GOD IS SPIRIT.—
Worship must be in spirit and truth.

Let us examine this very important pronouncement on the nature of worship. First of all we observe that the Lord indicated that a time was coming when there would be no further need to debate whether Gerizim or Jerusalem was the "place" where men "ought" to worship.

"The hour cometh."—In verse 23, this reference to the dispensational change is repeated, but with the added comment "and now is". What are we to understand by these words? In John v. 25 and 28 we have the same expansion, only in this passage the order is reversed.

> "The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God" (John v. 25).
>
> "The hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear His voice" (John v. 28).

From verses 21, 22, 28 and 29 it is clear that actual physical resurrection is in view, and from verse 24 that a spiritual application of "life from the dead" is in view. Here the "hearing" is equivalent to "believing". The "word" is equivalent to His "voice"; "coming out of the grave" is equivalent to "passing from death unto life". So in John iv. "The hour cometh". Even the "place" chosen by God, and the "ordinances" enjoined in the law, were, after all, "carnal ordinances, imposed until the time of reformation" (Heb. ix. 10); and while, in the matter which the woman raised, the Samaritans were in error—"Ye worship ye know not what; we know,"—and so far as prophetic truth was concerned, the coming of Messiah and the hope attached—"Salvation is of the Jews,"—was its purport yet, just as, later, Paul was to sweep aside both circumcision and uncircumcision as superseded by the new creation (Gal. vi. 15), so now the Lord set aside both Jerusalem and Gerizim, and that not only as a future effect of the change that was coming, but, by the added words, "and now is", as a then present effect, so that while still continuing to worship in the temple, the true worshipper could, even then, anticipate the day that was fully coming later, when they that worship God will worship Him in spirit and in truth. The Lord does not say "God will then be spirit", but that "God is Spirit". God's essence remains unchanged by His successive dispensational dealings with men. The imposition of carnal ordinances upon Israel was not because God had changed, but because of man's inability to rise to spiritual heights.

"God is Spirit."—It is a serious mistake to read "God is a spirit", for that would only be true if God were one of the angelic order of beings. This sublime statement refers, not to His Personality, but His essence. He is Spirit. It follows therefore that, to be acceptable, worship, at its zenith, must be spiritual. "The true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth."

> What is the meaning of "true" worshippers?
> What is the meaning of "in spirit and in truth"?
> Why does the Lord introduce the "Father" here?

The word translated "true" in John iv. 23 is alethinos.

> "The endings inos and einos denote that the quality, as a fundamental idea, exists in abundance" (Kruger).
>
> "Accordingly, alethinos is related to alethes (true) as form to contents or substance; alethos denotes the reality of a thing; alethinos defines the relation of the conception to the thing to which it corresponds—genuine" (Cremer).

When the Saviour said, "Moses gave you not that bread from heaven; but My Father giveth you the true bread from heaven" (John vi. 32). He did not deny that manna fell in the wilderness; He affirmed, that He was the reality of which the manna was a type.

When Paul contrasted the earthly tabernacle with the "true" (Heb. viii. 2; ix. 24) he did not impugn the integrity of the O.T., but asserted that the tabernacle built by Moses was not the real holiest of all, which was nothing less than heaven itself. The "true" worshipper therefore was one who had risen above the mediation of type and symbol—Jerusalem and Gerizim—and drew near with a "true" heart. The word "truth" in the phrase "in spirit and in truth" is aletheia. This too sometimes has the same meaning as alethinos.

"Grace and truth" came by Jesus Christ in contrast with the "law" that was given by Moses (John i. 17). Yet the law was as true as the gospel, and he who rejects Moses rejects Christ (John v. 46, 47). The meaning of this passage is,

> "The law which had a shadow of good things to come was given by Moses, but true, real, antitypical grace came by Jesus Christ."

In the phrase "in spirit and in truth" the second "in" should be omitted. The preposition before the noun "in spirit" turns it into an adverb, as though it read

"spiritually". The complete phrase, "in spirit and truth", is cast in the form of a figure of speech called "hendiadys", the "one-by-means-of-two" figure, for just as in the expression "grace and truth" considered above, one thing, not two, is intended, so here.

> "God is spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him spiritually—yes in a truly spiritual manner, genuinely, without the intervention of types and shadows."

It is not without a bearing upon the subject that we read in II Kings xvii. 26 that the Samaritans were troubled about the "manner" of the god of the land, as we saw when dealing with the inception of this people. The method adopted by the King of Assyria led to a worship of "they knew not what", but the teaching given by the Lord leads to worship that is acceptable.

Moreover, we observed that the Lord introduced the name of "Father". Though "God is spirit" and His worship must be spiritual, it is evident that sinful man can never approached such a God with such a worship. Consequently the Saviour speaks first of the "Father", and the "fatherhood" of God is intimately associated with the "sonship" of Christ. Consequently, immediately following the statement concerning true spiritual worship, the woman speaks of the coming of Messiah, and the Lord makes the blessed revelation: "I that speak unto thee am He."

This is the Lord's seventh statement (see structure of John iv. 7-27 on page 97), and is the climax of this section. Both by the series of signs which he selected and in the intervening sections that link these signs together, John, again and again, leads up to the one supreme fact that "Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God".

When setting out the structure (Volume XXII, page 6) of the great section which includes the eight signs (John ii. - xxi. 14) we drew attention to the way in which "work", ergon, and "believe", pisteuo, were a characteristic of each of the intervening passages that linked the eight signs together.

In John ii. 13 - iv. 42, the section we have now considered, the Lord introduced this subject of His "work" when His disciples returned to find Him in conversation with the Samaritan.

> "In the mean while His disciples prayed Him, saying, Master, eat. But He said unto them, I have meat to eat that ye know not of. Therefore said the disciples one to another, Hath any man brought Him ought to eat? Jesus saith unto them, My meat is to do the will of Him that sent Me, and to finish His work" (John iv. 31-34).

To this and accompanying works, the Lord makes constant appeal throughout the Gospel, and the eight signs are so many "works" intended to lead to faith in Himself. While this is the only occasion in this section where "work" is associated with the Lord, as all know, there are a number of references to "believing". The word pisteuo, "believing", is used fifteen times in this connection. The significance of the fact that the Lord abode "two days" at Sychar (John iv. 40) becomes more evident when we consider the next sign (John iv. 43-54), but for the moment let us not miss the significance of the closing words of this section.

> "And many more believed because of His own word; and said unto the woman, Now we believe, not because of thy saying: for we have heard Him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world" (John iv. 41, 42).

Here is the object of John's Gospel realized. That men should be attracted to the Lord by the evidence of His works (in this case His supernatural knowledge), and by personal contact become convinced that He is the Christ, the Saviour of the world.

There is a marked parallel in the experience of this woman and that of the man born blind.

SHE said of Christ at the beginning . . . "A Jew" (John iv. 9).
HE said of Christ at the beginning . . . "A man that is called Jesus" (John ix. 11).

SHE said, after the Lord had spoken . . . "That thou art a prophet" (John iv. 19).
HE said, after questioning . . . "He is a prophet" (John ix. 17).

SHE finally received the revelation . . . "I am He" (John iv. 26).
HE finally received the revelation . . . "It is He that talketh with thee" (John ix. 37).

This parallel is indicative of John's method. Sinful and blind though they be, He would lead men and women first to consider Him, the Man that is called Jesus; then to realize that His title of "The Word" indicates that He is "The Prophet" and finally to acknowledge Him as the Christ, the Son of God, so finding life and light in believing in His name.

#27. The Second Sign: (iv. 43 - 54).
The Nobleman's Son. Belief of the Word Spoken.
pp. 180, 181

We are assured by John that the Lord did "many signs" which are not written in this Gospel, but that he made a selection of eight of them with a definite object. This we must keep in mind as we approach the second sign recorded by John.

Writing to the Corinthians, the apostle Paul said, "The Jews require a sign" (I Cor. i. 22).

The first occurrence of the word "sign" is found in Matt. xii. 38, where the Scribes and Pharisees said, "Master, we would see a sign from Thee".

In John's Gospel, on the occasion of his cleansing of the temple, the Saviour is challenged with the inquiry, "What sign showest Thou unto us, seeing Thou doest these things?" (John ii. 18). Right in the heart of the second sign come the words, "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe" (John iv. 48). After the confession of Thomas, the Lord said, "Thomas, because thou hast seen Me, thou hast believed: blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed" (John xx. 29).

Now it is noteworthy that no sign was wrought in Samaria, yet the woman and many of the townspeople believed. It is this fact that gives point to the words that introduce the second sign: "Jesus testified, that a prophet hath no honour in His own country" (John iv. 44). The Samaritans had believed His Word; the Galileans "received Him, having seen all the things that He did at Jerusalem at the feast: for they also went to the feast" (John iv. 45). This refers to the statement made in ii. 23:

> "Now when He was in Jerusalem at the Passover, in the feast day, many believed in His name, when they saw the miracles (Gk. 'signs') which He did."

Note must be taken of these features in the analysis of John iv. 46-54 which is as follows:

The Second Sign (John iv. 46 - 54).

A | 46, 47. | a | Cana of Galilee. Where water was made wine.
b | Jesus was come out of Judæa into Galilee.
B | 47-49. The Plea and The Expostulation. |
c | Come down, at point of death.
d | Except ye see signs and wonders.
c | Come down ere my child die.
B | 50-53. The Answer and The Effect. |
e1 | THY SON LIVETH.
f1 | The man believed.
e2 | THY SON LIVETH.
f2 | The man inquired.
e3 | THY SON LIVETH.
f3 | The man and his whole house believed.
A | 54. | a | This is the second miracle.
b | When He was come out of Judæa into Galilee.

"Now after two days."—It will be remembered that these eight signs are arranged in the form of a simple introversion, the second corresponding with the seventh.

In both of these corresponding signs there is mention of "Two days" (John iv. 43, and xi. 6). In both the word "sick" (asthenei) is used (John iv. 46; xi. 2). In both "death" occurs (John iv. 47; xi. 14). In both there is reference to His rejection. In John iv. 44 "no honour"; in xi. 8 a reminder that in Judæa the Jews had sought to stone Him. The prophet Hosea, speaking of Israel's long period of rejection, when they will be "Lo-ammi", "Not my people", says,

> "After two days will He revive us: in the third day He will raise us up, and we shall live in His sight" (Hosea vi. 2).

Possibly there is an allusion here to this prophetic period, and the fact that in these two signs, and in these only death and resurrection, or death and revival, are found, help to confirm the thought that the link is intended.

Moreover, the two signs have a lesson to teach by their points of difference.

The nobleman's son was "at the point of death", and the prayer was, "Come down ere my child die", whereas Lazarus had been dead four days before the miracle was wrought. Like Paul in I Thess. iv., John speaks of two companies of the redeemed:

(1) Those who are living at the second coming, who will be changed.
(2) Those who have died, who will be raised, as well as changed.

The two companies form the subject of the Lord's revelation in John xi.:

> "I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live, and whosoever liveth (Gk. 'is alive') and believeth in Me shall never die" (John xi. 25, 26).

Attempt has been made to identify this sign of the healing of the Nobleman's son, with that of the healing of the Centurion's servant of Matt. viii. 5-13, but, as the Companion Bible note reads,

> "The two miracles differ as to time, place, person, pleading, plea, disease, the Lord's answer, and the man's faith, as may be easily seen by comparing the two as to these details."

Commenting upon the difference, Chrysostom says that "the weak faith of the nobleman is strengthened, while the humility of the centurion is honoured".

When the returning nobleman was met by his servants, and heard their glad cry, "Thy son liveth", his interest was quickened. He inquired of them the hour when he began to amend, and upon learning that is was "Yesterday at the seventh hour the fever left him" (John iv. 52), he was struck by the fact that it was at that self-same hour that the words of Christ were uttered, and this most evident witness to the saving power of the Saviour's word not only intensified the nobleman's faith, but led to the saving of his whole house.

Here therefore is the second sign which John selected out of many to lead to the conviction that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of God, and so to the bestowal of life through His name.

#28. The Third Sign: (v. 1 - 15).
The Impotent Man.
The beginning of conflict; the Sabbath controversy.
pp. 216 - 221

The record of this sign commences with a reference to a feast of the Jews at Jerusalem. Commentators, ancient and modern, have suggested almost every Jewish feast as the one concerned. Irenæus understood it to refer to the second Passover of our Lord's ministry. The third would therefore be the one mentioned in John vi. 4, and the fourth in John xi. 55. This is the view of Luther and Lightfoot. Chrysostom thought that it would be the feast of Pentecost, Kepler that it was the feast of Purim; and others the feast of Tabernacles, and the feast of Dedication. The omission of the article before the word heorte, "feast", makes it unlikely that it was the Passover, and the fact that the feast of the Dedication was "winter" (John x. 22) makes it very unlikely, seeing that a multitude of sick folk were waiting to plunge into the water.

Where John wishes the reader to know what particular feast is in mind, he says so. Thus John ii. 13 connects the money-changers and the sheep with the observance of the feast of the Passover. In John vii. 2 the feast of Tabernacles is specified and, once again, the utterance of the Lord "in the last day, that great day of the feast" (John vii. 37) demands the knowledge that it was the feast of Tabernacles, to make it intelligible.

We can therefore rest assured that no lesson is to be drawn from any particular feast (John v.), except, perhaps, the fact that the reference to this feast as simply "a feast of the Jews" indicates the hollowness and barrenness of much that then pertained to the Jew's religion.

The occasion of this third sign was that a pool of water near the sheep market or sheep gate, known in the Aramaic tongue as Bethesda, and having five porches, was endowed, at periods, with healing powers, which rightly or wrongly were attributed to the interposition of an angel who troubled the waters.

It is suggestive that the corresponding sign—that of the healing of the blind man at the pool of Siloam recorded in chapter ix.—deals with a pool, the name of which is interpreted for the reader and, moreover, the healing took place on a sabbath day, as does the parallel healing to John v.

Bethesda means, "The house of mercy", and, like Siloam, which we are told means "Sent", is intentionally introduced by the writer. This word kolumbethra, which means "swimming pool", occurs five times in the N.T., and in no other passage than John ix., the corresponding sixth sign. Why is attention drawn to the fact that the pool was surrounded by "five porches"? If there were gates or steps they are not mentioned, but only the porches, which we must therefore consider have special significance. Is it possible that John saw in the five porches a reference to the Pentateuch, the five books of the law, which suggested the failure of the law to save? "for the law was given by Moses, but true grace came by Jesus Christ". Moses is most certainly introduced into these two signs (John v. 45, 46; ix. 28, 29), as also the fact that the Saviour was Lord even of the sabbath day, for both signs were wrought on a sabbath.

The sick who waited for the troubling of the water were "impotent" folk, and blind, halt, and withered. It is the "impotent" (astheneo) man that is singled out for blessing. Astheneia, the word translated "infirmity" in John v. 5, indicates both physical infirmity and infirmity of the flesh (Rom. vi. 19), as well as the infirmity of the law, because of the flesh (Rom. viii. 2). Asthenes is used of obsolete law, where it is referred to as the "weak" and beggarly elements (Gal. iv. 9). Moreover, the man had been impotent for thirty-eight years, the period that covered the wandering of the children of Israel.

"Waiting."—From this word in verse 3 to the end of verse 4, the passage is omitted in many critical texts, though retained in the Syriac, but there is no justification for the omission, neither is there any reason to attempt to "explain" the reference to angelic ministry. If, as has been suggested, John merely introduced a popular but mistaken superstition here, what is to prevent the application of the suggestion to other recorded instances of angelic ministry in the N.T.? It is also unnecessary to attempt an "explanation" on natural lines. The pool might, or might not, have been an intermittent spring; it might, or might not, have been connected with the upper springs of the water of Gihon. The truth is that no one knows the site of the pool. The identification of the sheep gate with St. Stephen's gate is inaccurate, for Robinson says no well existed in that quarter until the time of Agrippa. Against the "natural" interpretation of the troubling of the water, we must place the testimony of the record:

(1) Only one sufferer could be healed.
(2) The first who stepped down was healed.
(3) The action of the curative power was instantaneous.
(4) The cure was not confined to any specific disease.

If the pool had consisted of some sort of medicinal water, its powers would not be exhausted in the cure of the one sufferer, nor would it necessarily matter in what order the sufferers stepped into the water. Moreover medicinal waters do not cure instantaneously, nor every kind of disease or infirmity.

Before proceeding further we must discover the structure of the third sign.

The Third Sign (John v. 1 - 15).

A1 | 1-4. GENERAL EXPECTATION. "Made whole." |
a1 | A feast of the Jews.
b1 | Jerusalem: Jesus went up.
b1 | Jerusalem: A pool.
a1 | Hebrew tongue: Five Porches.
a2 | Impotent folk.
b2 | Waiting for troubling of water.
b2 | Angel at times troubled the water.
a2 | First to step in: Healed.
A2 | 5-7. PARTICULAR CASE. "Made whole." |
c1 | A certain man was there.
d1 | Impotent 38 years.
c1 | Jesus saw him lie.
d1 | Long time in that case.
e | Question: "Wilt thou be made whole?"
e | Answer: "Sir, I have no man."
c2 | When water is troubled.
d2 | To put me in.
c2 | While I am coming.
d2 | Another steppeth before me.
A3 | 8-11. THE SIGN ITSELF. "Made whole." |
f | Take up thy bed and walk.
g | The man was made whole.
h | Took up his bed and walked.
i | On same day was the sabbath.
i | It is the sabbath day.
h | Not lawful to carry thy bed.
g | He that made me whole.
f | Take up thy bed and walk.
A4 | 12-15. THE SEQUEL. "Made whole." |
j | They asked him.
k | What man is that.
l | Take up thy bed and walk.
m | Jesus had conveyed Himself away.
Jesus finds him in the temple.
m | Behold thou art made whole.
Go and sin no more.
j | He told the Jews.
k | That it was Jesus.
l | Which had made him whole.

Among the items of extreme interest that yet await examination in this third sign is the question of verse six, "Wilt thou be made whole?"

Thelo, "I will", occurs four times in this section and its expansion, which occupies chapter v.:

> "Wilt thou be made whole?" (v. 6).
> "The Son quickeneth whom He will" (v. 21).
> "Ye were willing for a season to rejoice in His light" (v. 35).
> "Ye will not come to Me, that ye might have life" (v. 40).

The faith of God's elect, the faith as taught in the Scriptures, must embrace all that has been written on the subject. To follow one's own leanings, and pick and choose texts and passages, is the surest way to produce another heresy (for the word heretic in the Greek, means, literally, "a chooser"), but it does not lead to the wholesome doctrine that is taught in the Scriptures. In John v. the Calvinist would be attracted to the pronouncement, "The Son quickeneth whom He will". The Arminian to the words, "Wilt thou be made whole?" The Berean should be attracted by both passages, and his creed must embrace both. Those who deny freedom of will to man, seldom, if ever, quote or expound the pathetic words of Matt. xxiii. 37, "How often would I . . . . . and ye would not" where the word translated "would" is thelo.

Predestination does not stand alone; in Rom. viii. 29 it is stated to be according to foreknowledge. Election does not stand alone, but is according to the foreknowledge of God the Father (I Pet. i. 2). For daring to believe and to teach these scriptural facts when writing the series on Romans, both we, and many of our readers in this country and abroad, were submitted to a series of anonymous letters wherein the writer, shielded by his anonymity, did not refrain from abusive language. It is in the doctrinal links that bind into a whole the eight signs of John, that this inter-relation of will, evidence, conviction, faith, choice, election, being drawn, being given the will, meet us. Among the last words of the N.T. canon are these: "Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely" (Rev. xxii. 17), and they contain the last occurrence in the N.T. of thelo. As these various aspects of a great truth appear, will be the right time and place to deal with them.

On occasion of the first sign, the turning of the water into wine, no opposition was manifested, "His disciples believed on Him" (John ii. 11). After the second sign, not only did the nobleman believe, but his whole house (John iv. 53), and again there is no indication of opposition. But on the occasion of the third sign opposition is manifested.

A characteristic of John's Gospel that can be summed up in a few words, is this:

REVELATION
|
RECEPTION - REJECTION.

From the prologue, where, after the revelation is given, we read of some one who received Him not and of others who did receive Him, this twofold attitude is apparent throughout the Gospel.

In self-justification, however, opposition needs a reason, or an excuse. In this third sign the excuse was to hand. The man had been healed and had carried his bed on the sabbath day.

> "And immediately the man was made whole, and took up his bed, and walked: and on the same day was the sabbath" (John v. 9).

There are thirteen occurrences of the word "sabbath" in John's Gospel, nine being found in chapters v.-ix. and the remainder in those chapters which deal with the crucifixion and the resurrection (John xix., xx.). It is evident that John has placed the third and the sixth sign in correspondence, for, among many other parallel features, these are the two which were wrought on the sabbath day.

> "And it was the sabbath day when Jesus made clay, and opened his eyes" (John ix. 14).

The way in which John adds this comment in v. 9 and ix. 14, makes us mentally supply the ellipsis, "How shocking!"

These passages that deal with the sabbath group themselves sufficiently to enable us to perceive the underlying intention behind them.

Sabbaton in John v. - ix.

A | v. 9. The same day was the SABBATH.
B | v. 10, 16, 18. The SABBATH broken. "Sought to slay Him."
C | vii. 22, 23. Moses and the SABBATH. "The principle involved.
A | ix. 14. It was the SABBATH day.
B | ix. 16. He keepeth not the SABBATH day.

If there are thirteen references to the sabbath in John's Gospel, there are also thirteen to Moses. If those to the sabbath are distributed under the grouping nine and four, (nine as above, and four at the close of the Gospel), so is the name Moses, distributed under a grouping of nine and four. Four times John spells the name Mouses, and nine times Moses. The latter spelling is more in line with the Hebrew, whereas the former is derived from the Egyptian.

> "Hereupon it was that Thermathis imposed this name Mouses upon him, from what had happened, when he was put into the river; for the Egyptians call water by the name Mo, and such as are saved out of it by the same Uses" (Josephus Ant. ii. ix. 6).

There is no discovered assignable reason why one spelling or the other should have been used by the writers of the N.T., and we will not waste time in empty speculation.

The conflict in John is due to the misunderstanding of the law as interpreted by the legalists and ritualists of the day, and the gracious interpretation put upon it by the Lord. Thus, Moses lifted up the serpent, a blessed anticipation of John iii. 16. Moses gave the Manna, a blessed type of the True Bread that came down from heaven (John vi.). To avoid breaking the law of Moses, circumcision was performed even on the sabbath day (John vi. 22, 23), and healing a man, and the carrying of his bed by the healed man, were in full harmony with the gracious intention of the sabbath.

Space will not here permit of an examination of this vexed question of the sabbath, but when we have reached John ix. we must devote a complete article to it. For the moment let it suffice that we perceive that the attitude of our Lord to the traditional sabbath day observance awoke the first murderous opposition recorded by John.

The fourfold division of the structure of this sign, (given on page 218) throws into prominence the words "be made whole". This word hugies, "whole", that gives us "hygiene", occurs seven times in John's Gospel, viz., John v. 4, 6, 9, 11, 15; vii. 23. It will be observed that every reference has to do with this third sign. John v. 14 associates the impotent man's condition with sin; "Sin no more, lest a worse thing come upon thee".

The first sign made up a deficiency, and ministered to a people's joy. The second ministered life, "Thy son liveth", and is the thrice-repeated key to the structure. The third sign ministered health, and by the fact that it was given on the sabbath indicated that a greater than Moses had come. Each sign reflects some one phase of our Lord's many-sided fullness, and each contributed its quota of evidence to the fact that this was indeed the Christ, the Son of God, and that life results from faith in His name.

The Pearl of Parables.

#1. The Parable of the Father (Luke xv. 11-32).

Volume XXXII, p. 205

The parable of the Prodigal Son has been called the pearl of parables. While it may be unwise to attempt comparisons between passages in Holy Writ, there is, nevertheless, in this parable, great appeal to the heart and much to move the feelings as one follows the progress of the prodigal both upon his disastrous outward journey, and during his return to love and restoration.

It is not by accident that this parable is recorded by Luke, for it is consonant with his practice of choosing always the evangelical aspect of his subject. Where Matthew's narrative is of the birth at Bethlehem of the "King", Luke delights to tell the good tidings of the birth of a "Saviour". Matthew of course pursues his definite purpose, for he proclaims the King and the kingdom, but Luke, the right-hand man of the apostle Paul, has a different object in view. It is he alone who traces the genealogy of Christ to God through Adam and, again, it is he alone who records the parable of "The Good Samaritan", a parable that could have no place in the Gospel of the Publican who went down to his house "justified" rather than the Pharisee; a blessed anticipation of the doctrine of Romans and of the confession of Phil. iii. 1-9.

Perhaps the affection in which this parable has ever been held is because it is the parable of the FATHER, a word that is used twelve times in the narrative. It was the mission of Christ to reveal the Father:

> "No man hath seen God at any time, the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him" (John i. 18).

He declared Him in His life, for the Son of God is the "express image of His Person". His declaration to the enquiring disciples was: "He that hath seen Me, hath seen the Father"; He declared Him in His gospel, in His discourses and in His parables, and here, in the parable of the Prodigal Son, we may learn something of the nature and character of Him to Whom we cry, "Abba, Father".

#2. The Two Sons (Luke xv. 11).
pp. 7, 8

"A certain man had two sons" (Luke xv. 11). With similar words, a parable is introduced in Matt. xxi. There, the two sons are called upon by their father to work in his vineyard, and the point of the parable is the nature of their response. The first said, "I will not, but afterward, he repented and went"; the second said, "I go sir: and went not". Not a word of censure is given to the first son's initial refusal to go to the work, attention on the contrary, being focused upon the fact that ultimately he repented and went. So also in the parable of the prodigal son. The father utters no word of censure upon the ingratitude or stupidity of his erring son, but rejoices in his return and welcomes him home with open arms.

A superficial judgment would say that this is putting a premium upon sin. It is the elder brother who recalls his younger brother's sins and asserts his own rectitude:

> "Lo, these many years do I serve thee, neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment: and yet thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends. But as soon as this thy son was come, which hath devoured thy living with harlots, thou hast killed for him the fatted calf" (Luke xv. 29, 30).

Those "many years of service", that constant observance of the father's commandments, find an echo in Phil. iii. where the Apostle says, "Touching the righteousness of the law—blameless". But instead of holding fast to this, he now counts it but dung, as compared with the finding of his all in Christ.

At the close of the parable of the lost sheep with which Luke xv. opens, we read:--

> "I say unto you, that likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than ninety and nine just persons, which need no repentance" (Luke xv. 7).

Here again it would be easy to slip into the error of thinking that true righteousness is discounted and that a premium is put upon sin. That, however, is not the case. It is the kind of righteousness of the law and of the flesh; a righteousness that never acknowledges its abject need of grace and of the Saviour's love. The theme is presented once more in Luke, in the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican. The Pharisee was most certainly "not as other men are", otherwise he could not have belonged to "the straitest sect of the Jews' religion"; he was not an extortioner, unjust, nor an adulterer, all of which can be taken at its full value. He was most certainly not "as this Publican". Yet we know the conclusion. We know the Lord's solemn verdict.

> "I tell you, this man went down to his house justified rather than the other: for everyone that exalteth himself shall be abased; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalteth" (Luke xviii. 14).

The exaltation of self-righteousness is so odious in the sight of God that it cannot be tolerated. The humble penitence of "the sinner" or of the "prodigal son" is the only spirit that finds acceptance before the throne of God.

If it were possible for human nature to produce perfect righteousness it would be a lovely thing and would far outweigh even the grace of penitence. But perfection is seen only in the person of Christ. All men have sinned, and even their acts of "righteousness" often make them hard, cold, and self-exalted. Even the Apostle makes a distinction in Rom. v. between a "just man" and a "good man", a distinction still, alas, possible, while human nature is as it is.

#3. "Give me . . . . . Make me" (Luke xv. 12, 19).
pp. 31, 32

A recent broadcast talk called attention to the two petitions of the parable of the prodigal son, the first, "Give me", the second "Make me". These embody a thought that goes to the very heart of the parable. Let us ponder it.

The younger son, said, "Father give me the portion of goods that falleth to me. And he divided unto them his living". The younger son did not ask for more than his share. He was not envious of his elder brother, with possibly a "double portion"; he simply asked for his own. Most certainly the Father did no evil in granting the request. In the beginning God made man a free moral agent. As such, if he chose to say "Give me" that which is my own, he was free to do so. What Adam did with his freedom of choice and his ability to say "I will not", like the son in the other parable is, alas, not only past history, but a present factor in life.

The parable employs a peculiar word for "goods". It is ousia, part of the verb "to be", and occurs in but one more passage in the N.T., namely in the next verse of the parable, where it is translated "substance". Ousia, while it means "goods", most certainly leads the mind to think of "being" or "essence". Its very choice makes us realize that typically the prodigal son is "man" who squanders not "things" merely, but "himself".

Acceding to the request the Father divided to his sons "his living", and while the elder said that his brother had devoured his "living", the narrative says he wasted his "substance" (ousia). Man, his life, his means, and his mode of living, were given to him, and the Father waits, waits for the next request, "Make me" (Luke xv. 19). Here was repentance; here was humility; here was the lesson of the ages learned; here was something which, for all his cold self-righteousness, the elder brother could not apprehend.

"We are his workmanship" (poiema, "making") said the Apostle to the Ephesians, where salvation by grace; salvation not of works; salvation that leads to "all lowliness of mind", is the parallel experience.

"GIVE ME."—Here we have a picture of man assuming responsibility, attempting to shape his own destiny and making utter failure of the effort.

"MAKE ME."—Here is repentance or "a change of mind" indeed. Man at last turns to God, in Whom alone can he hope to find the full realization of the purpose of his own creation.

#4. "He wasted his substance with riotous living" (Luke xv. 13). pp. 42, 43

The Lord, to Whom all things belong, abhors waste. He Who fed 5,000 by miraculously multiplying a few loaves and fishes, and Who could, and did, feed them again in a similar manner, nevertheless commanded that the fragments be gathered up that nothing be wasted.

Sin is not only a crime, a transgression, an offence, it is a dismal waste. In the Hebrew Scriptures the meaning of the basic word for "sin" is not disobedience, or transgression, or villainy, but "to miss", as an archer misses his mark. Man has sadly failed. He has missed the purpose of his being; he has "wasted" his essence, his being, his substance. In usage the word asotos, "riotous", indicates profligacy and excess, but etymologically it means one who is outside the pale of salvation, a being the negative and sozo, "to save".

Man, like the prodigal, has taken himself into a far country, beyond the preserving and restraining power of grace, and his end is beggary.

If, ignoring chapter divisions, we pass straight on into Luke xvi., we shall read of another Waster. This time it is a "steward", not a "son", and this time it is the Master's goods that are wasted, not his own.

The figure of the elder brother is now changed to that of a steward. The self-righteous among the Jews had condemned their fallen brethren because they had wasted their substance in riotous living. But the Lord suddenly charges them with much more dishonourable act of wasting that which was not theirs but which had been entrusted to them. The Apostle Paul does the same thing in Rom. ii. He knew his Jewish readers would have agreed that the Gentiles were "without excuse" (Rom. i. 20), but they must have been astonished as he brought against them the charge:--

> "Therefore thou art inexcusable, O man, whosoever thou art that judgest: for wherein thou judgest another, thou condemnest thyself; for thou that judgest doest the same things" (Rom. ii. 1).

The prodigal wasted his own substance, but the self-righteous Pharisees, who looked upon themselves as leaders and guides, had through unfaithfulness and self-seeking wasted the goods entrusted to them.

When one reflects on the possibilities that lay in man as first created in the image of God, and then turns and considers him to-day, surely he has indeed gone into a far country and there wasted his substance.

#5. "He came to himself" (Luke xv. 13-16).
pp. 65 - 67

By a series of descending steps, this parable brings the prodigal at last "to himself", and with the discovery of all that these words imply, the change commencing with the blessed words "I will arise" begins. He had taken his journey into a "far country", he had wasted his substance in "riotous" living, and when he had "spent all" a mighty famine reduced him to destitution—he began to be "in want". Here we have distance, dissipation, destitution. But this is not all. To this list must be added degradation, for the prodigal descended so low as to feed "swine".

"The far country."—When the Scriptures would speak of Gentiles, of sinners, or of Israel in disgrace, it speaks of them as being "far off". In contrast, the position of the elder son is marked, "Son thou art ever with me". The younger son well represented the condition of the "publicans and sinners" the presence of whom was the immediate cause of the utterance of the three parables of Luke xv. as verses 1 and 2 indicate.

"He spent all."—"Wherefore do you spend money for that which is not bread?" asked the prophet (Isa. lv. 2). This reveals one aspect of the prodigal's failure. The woman who "had spent all that she had, and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse" (Mark v. 26) reveals another aspect of utter failure, for salvation cannot be bought, it is the gift of God. Whether we spend all as the prodigal and come to want, or whether we spend all like the sick woman and yet grow worse, it is evident that all such spending is vain.

The prodigal hastened his end by spending his portion in "riotous living". The word translated "riotous" is asotos, a compound of a, a negative, and a derivative of so, "save". From this root come the words soteria, "salvation", and such compounds as sophron, "sober" or a "saved" mind, in other words "sane". The prodigal, like many another, thought he would see "life", but what he really saw was a glimpse of corruption and death. He had not only wasted his substance, but he had spent it all on that which was "without salvation", in other words, he was bankrupt. It is no accident that Luke uses here the same word as Paul in Romans, for the word translated "want" and "come short" is the same (Rom. iii. 23).

And now external circumstances combine against him, adding degradation to destitution; he descends lower, for he "joined himself" to a citizen of this far off country, and what this implies can be discerned when we know that Luke employs the same word here as he does in Acts x. 28, where Peter refers to the fact that it was unlawful for a man that is a Jew to "keep company" with one of another nation. The depths of degradation however are reached when he was put to feed "swine" and would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat. Destitute and degraded he now realizes that he is in a desperate case, for in addition to all this misery come the added words, "no man gave unto him".

The doctrinal lesson is of course that no man could be of any use to such as he, for "no man can by any means redeem his brother". When however the prodigal "came to himself" this failure of both self and man proved to be the foreseen opportunity for grace, "and He saw that there was no man, and wondered that there was no intercessor; therefore His arm brought salvation unto Him" (Isa. lix. 16). Coming to himself the prodigal discovered that he was indeed, "wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked" (Rev. iii. 17). The home he had left, the blessings he had so lightly esteemed, now appear in their true light. He thinks longingly of the comforts that even the hired servants of his father are enjoying, while he was perishing, and so repentance begins. While repentance is usually accompanied by sorrow and remorse, the word thus translated here does not mean sorrow, but rather "to think again". The word is matanoia, meta meaning "after" and noia being derived from nous "the mind". That "repentance" is to be understood at this point a comparison with the other parables of the chapter will reveal.

The Parables of Luke xv.

A1 | 3-6. The parable of the "lost sheep".
B1 | 7. "One sinner that repenteth".
A2 | 8, 9. The parable of the "lost coin".
B2 | 10. "One sinner that repenteth".
A3 | 11-32. The parable of the "lost son".
B3 | 17, 18. "He came to himself", "I will arise".

With repentance the prodigal turns his back on destitution and degradation, he turns his face to home, to a father's love, to rejoicing and restoration. Even so must Israel emulate this prodigal before the restitution so long foretold can be enjoyed.

#6. "No more worthy" (Luke xv. 17-19).
p. 92

When the prodigal son started on his journey with his wallet well lined with money, the world seemed a splendid place and he himself felt a fine fellow. But when, after the grim experience in independence, he "came to himself", a reversal in his estimate of values had taken place. The far country no longer seemed so enchanting, and even the servants in the father's house were now seen in an enviable light.

> "When he came to himself, he said, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger. I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son: make me as one of thy hired servants" (Luke xv. 17-19).

"I perish."—The prodigal had reached the point where he would agree with the Scriptures concerning the fate of the man outside Christ. John iii. 16 makes it clear that whosoever does not believe in the Lord shall "perish". This word has already occurred in the two preceding parables of this chapter, the "lost" sheep of verse 6 and the "lost" piece of money of verse 9, and it recurs in verses 24 and 32, where the father speaks of his son who was "lost, and is found".

"I have sinned."—It is one thing to agree that "all have sinned"; it is another to "come to oneself" and be led to confess as an individual "I have sinned". Moreover, the prodigal began to realize the "sinfulness of sin"; that he had "sinned against heaven" as well as in the sight of his father.

"I am no more worthy."—These words were bitter in the utterance, but sweet in the ears of the angels of heaven who have joy over one sinner that repenteth more than over many elder brothers who remain in their unruffled, unexplored, self-righteousness.

"I will arise and go to my Father."—Here is repentance (matanoia) "A change of mind", both regarding self and regarding "the Father". Of his own will he had left the Father, of his own will he returned. The word "arise" is anistemi, which in its next occurrence (Luke xvi. 31) is used of the rising from the dead. Although still in the far country, still sad and sore and disillusioned, the beginning of the new life that will be spent in the presence of the Father—with robe, ring, and joy—has already begun. We are nearer to immortality when we say, "I perish", than when we say (as the rich fool in the same Gospel), "Take thine ease, eat, drink and be merry" (Luke xii. 19).

#7. The Father's Compassion (Luke xv. 20).
pp. 127, 128

If the Son of God came to reveal the Father, and if this parable is a part of that revelation, what a light it throws upon the Father's heart!

"And when he was yet a great way off."—The seeking sinner need but make the slightest movement toward God, to find God going out to him. Had the Father chosen to stand upon his dignity and say, "My son took it upon himself to leave home; let him come back; let him knock at the door; let him taste a little salutary discipline; let him wait my pleasure", he would but have acted as many a human father has acted to such a son. But here it was the Father that "ran", not the returning prodigal. Because of remorse and shame, it was the son's footsteps that lagged; the Father's steps were quickened by love. Even when he was a great way off "his Father saw him". Is it too much to say that the Father had been watching daily in the hope of that precious sight?

"He had compassion", or, as the words literally, "His bowels yearned" over him.— Not one word of reproof or rebuke. No censure, no condemnation, but unutterable love and inexpressible joy over the returning prodigal.

By the witness of the self-same Scriptures we know that a sacrifice was needed to justify the forgiveness of the sinner. That cannot be introduced into this parable, but it is given its place in perfect fullness in the parable of the Pharisee and the publican, where it can be introduced without incongruity. The Father needs no sacrifice to make Him love this erring son; rather it is His love that provides the sacrifice.

"He kissed him."—This is reconciliation and acceptance. As the poor prodigal retraced his steps he had been repeating to himself the confession, "I will say unto him". Even as his father kissed him the words are heard, but he was not allowed to complete his confession. Before he could reach the words, "Make me as one of thy hired servants", the father broke in upon him and said,

> "Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet; and bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it; and let us eat, and be merry."

If such be the reception of one seen "afar off", what excuse will a man have in that day who remains unsaved, unaccepted, unforgiven? He is not compelled to crawl abjectly to the throne of God, as well he might; he has but to turn his heart toward the Father to find the Father Himself seeking him.

#8. The Prodigal's acceptance (Luke xv. 22).
p. 168

What a welcome awaited the returning prodigal! What an exhibition of "grace abounding"!

> "Bring forth the best robe and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand; and shoes on his feet" (verse 22).

The Father commands, the servants obey. The robe, ring and shoes are both provided and "put on" the son, without that son saying a word, or raising a finger. Like the believer to-day, he stood "accepted in the Beloved".

We have not far to seek to discover the purport of the "robe". "All our righteousness", said the prophet, "are as filthy rags", a picture of the tattered and travel-stained clothing of the returning prodigal, which, in their turn, depicted his own conscious unworthiness. The same prophet, speaking of Israel's restoration, said, "He hath covered me with the robe of righteousness".

In the New Testament, "To put on" is used of the "Armour of light", of "Incorruption", and "Immortality", of "The new man", and of "Christ".

The prodigal is clothed with a righteousness not his own.

> "When I stand before the throne,
> Dressed in beauty not my own,
> When I see Thee as Thou art,
> Love Thee with unsinning heart.
> Then Lord shall I fully know,
> Not till then, how much I owe."

It is noteworthy that the word used to denote the "best" robe, is the Greek word protos, "first". It was the "chief in rank", it was parallel with the "adoption" that is the glory of our own blessed calling.

"The ring" was a symbol of distinction (James ii. 2). "The shoes" were an indication that he was a free man, for according to Alford, slaves often went barefoot.

How this unreserved acceptance and full and free reinstatement foreshadows something of our position by wondrous grace!

> "In the body of His flesh through death, to present you holy and unblameable and unreproveable in His sight" (Col. i. 22).

#9. The Real Lost Son (Luke xv. 25-30).
pp. 185, 186

Stier has well said that the elder brother is really the lost son. He is Pharisaical in his self-righteousness; he is entirely lacking in either filial or brotherly affection; he has neither charity nor humility. We cannot imagine him saying, "I am no more worthy to be called thy son".

We read that when he was told the reason for the feast that was in progress, "he was angry and would not go in". In brutal and coarse language he repelled his father's entreaty, saying, "Lo these many years do I serve thee" (No reference is made to the home life and its love and comforts, the stress being put on serving, douleuo, which comes from the root "to bind", "to be in bondage and serve as a slave"), neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment (Another Pharisee once wrote, "Touching the righteousness of the law—blameless" and, after all, not to transgress a commandment, is but negative obedience. In all this there appears to have been a complete absence of obedience to the second great commandment, the commandment of love), "and yet thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends" (Here, the elder brother speaks of a "kid", something very much less in value than the "fatted calf" slain for the prodigal, and thus expresses his estimate of the father's love and care all his life). "But as soon as thy son was come" (Not "this, my brother"—here the Pharisee betrays himself), "which hath devoured thy living with harlots" (Is this just? The prodigal asked and received no more than that portion of goods that fell to him. He wasted it in riotous living, but inasmuch as the elder brother was confessedly ignorant of the facts of his younger brother's life, the adverse additions which he made were clear evidence of his own uncharitable heart).

From some angles it may be dangerous to attempt to distinguish between one sin and another. Yet the Scriptures speak of a sin which is not unto death, and a sin which is unto death (I John v. 16), and the epistle to the Hebrews says that willful sin after we have received the full knowledge of the truth has no more sacrifice provided for it (Heb. x. 26).

The "sin" of the prodigal was a crime against himself more than against his fellow-men. He "wasted his substance", but he is not charged with lying, thieving or murder. For all his boast, the elder brother was deeper in guilt, for uncharitableness, spitefulness, malice and blind self-righteousness are blacker and deeper-dyed than anything attributed to the repentant prodigal.

Yet, how blessed to hear the prodigal's confession, "I have sinned against heaven". He never thought to minimize his guilt. He never dreamed of comparing himself favourably with his brother. We find the two attributes of mind forcibly brought out in the parable of the Pharisee and the publican. Later we may turn to that parable for another series of short talks together. Meanwhile let us thank God for this parable of prodigal love, and the loveliness of true repentance, remembering its setting; that it was when “drew near unto him all the publicans and sinners for to hear him” that this “Pearl of Parables” was drawn forth from the Saviour’s heart.

The Pulpit of the Opened Book.

#5. Inspiration and the Holy Ghost.
pp. 8 - 10

In the Greek, the term "inspiration of God" used by Paul in II Tim. iii. 16 is theopneustos, and it is evident that there is a vital connection between "inspiration" and the Spirit (pneuma). On occasion, therefore, we are prepared to find that a specific statement is made in the Scriptures ascribing the authorship of the Book to the Holy Spirit. Let us note these passages.

(1) PSALM XCV. 7.—This passage is quoted in Heb. iii., but instead of settling the vexed question as to whether Moses, who wrote Psa. xc., should be recognized as the author of the anonymous Psalms that follow, Paul says, "Wherefore, as the Holy Ghost saith, To day if ye will hear His voice" (Heb. iii. 7). This statement is too explicit to be passed over in silence. Everything associated with the integrity of Scripture is involved in it. The critics have assured us that Moses never led the children of Israel through the wilderness; that the story written in the book of Numbers is not factual history; Moses never lifted up a serpent in the wilderness, etc., etc., yet Paul declares that the Psalm which says, "Forty years long was I grieved with this generation . . . . . I sware in My wrath, that they should not enter into My rest", was the language of "The Holy Ghost". Here there can be no compromise, no middle ground; we must be either for or against. Either Paul's words are sober truth and the critics blasphemers, or his words are hysterical nonsense and the critics our deliverers. For our part we believe the Apostle's declaration that the Psalm quoted was the language of the Holy Ghost.

(2) THE TABERNACLE.—Heb. ix. is devoted to the typical tabernacle of the wilderness, and the anti-typical fulfillment of its ordinances, sacrifices and types in the heavenly priesthood of Christ and the true tabernacle, which God pitched and not man, namely, "heaven itself". Once again the issues are clearly defined. Paul does not speak vaguely of the tabernacle; he describes its two great portions, he specifies the sacred furniture, both within the veil and in the holy place, and in Heb. viii. 5, says of the earthly priesthood of Israel:

> "Who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle: for, See, saith He, that thou make all things according to the pattern showed thee in the mount" (Heb. viii. 5).

Having committed himself to the belief that Moses did actually erect the tabernacle and that the record in Exodus is true, he further commits himself to the utter extreme of saying in Heb. ix. concerning this tabernacle and its services:--

> "The Holy Ghost this signifying, that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing" (Heb. ix. 8).

Again the issues are evident. Either Paul speaks the truth, or he does not. If he does, then Moses actually did erect the tabernacle in the wilderness, and the critics are found to be liars.

(3) THE NEW COVENANT.—Paul brings to a climax the doctrinal teaching of his epistle to the Hebrews in chapter x., where he reaches the subject of the offering made for sin by the sacrifice of Jesus Christ, "once for all". He follows this in verse 15 with the words, "Whereof the Holy Ghost also is a witness to us", and proceeds to quote from Jer. xxxi.

Here therefore, in the short range of one epistle, the Holy Ghost is attested as the Author of Psa. xcv. He is said to have "signified" certain lines of truth in the tabernacle and its ministry, and to bear witness to the truth of the New Covenant given by God in Jeremiah.

In the first chapter of the Acts we have another instance. Peter stood up and said:

> "Men and brethren, this scripture must needs have been fulfilled, which the Holy Ghost by the mouth of David spake before concerning Judas, which was guide to them that took Jesus" (Acts i. 16).

Here a Psalm of David is the passage in question, where, writing out of his own bitter experience, he said, "Yea, mine own familiar friend, in whom I trusted, which did eat of my bread, hath lifted up his heel against me" (Psa. xli. 9), but the Holy Ghost, Who inspired the record, looked down the centuries to a greater betrayal than that of Ahithophel. If, moreover, Ahithophel subsequently "hanged himself", as did Judas, we should not be surprised, so full, so complete, is the inspiration of Scripture (II Sam. xvii. 23).

Like guardians at the two extremities of the Acts stand the references to the Holy Ghost. Peter's statement in Acts i. 16, to which we have just referred, and Paul's in Acts xxviii. 25, where it is recorded:

> "And when they agreed not among themselves, they departed, after that Paul had spoken one word, Well spake the Holy Ghost by Esaias the prophet unto our fathers" (Acts xxviii. 25).

and Paul goes on to quote, in full, Isa. vi. 9 and 10.

Again, writing to the Corinthians, the Apostle said:--

> "Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth" (I Cor. ii. 13).

We can have a book evidently inspired by "man's wisdom", or we can have a book the "words" of which are taught by the "Holy Ghost", and it is the testimony of the Chapel of the Opened Book that the Scriptures are the Word of God, "true from the beginning".

The association thus established between the Holy Ghost and the Scriptures makes useful an examination of John xiv.-xvi. This we do not here enlarge upon, but, in lieu, give the headings that formed the basis of one of the addresses given during the series.

The Holy Ghost, as the Spirit of truth, guided the Apostles into "all truth" (John xvi. 13); He recalled to their memory whatsoever the Saviour had taught them (John xiv. 26); He made clear the meaning of sayings not previously understood (John xiv. 26); He endowed the Apostles with a vision of the future (John xvi. 13); He led the Apostles on in the recognition of the glory of the Person of the Redeemer (John xvi. 14); and He confirmed the witness given by the Apostles (John xv. 26); He enabled them to bear their testimony (John xv. 26, 27); He is named, three times over, "the Spirit of truth" (John xiv. 17; xv. 26; xvi. 13); A power unseen by the world (John xiv. 17) and Who would abide with them for ever (John xiv. 16).

In symbol, this overshadowing, inspiring, power of the Holy Ghost was given to the Apostles when the Saviour "breathed" on them, as recounted in John xx. 21, 22; and His full advocacy could be relied upon in the hour of trial (Matt. x. 19, 20). Moreover, this mighty, gracious, indwelling, illuminating power, is called "The promise of the Father" (Luke xxiv. 49) without which the apostolic testimony at Jerusalem could neither have begin nor succeeded.

#6. The Preservation of the Inspired Documents.
pp. 32 - 35

In Psalm xii. there are two statements that we must notice about the words of the Lord. The first assures us of their "purity", the second of their "preservation" (Psa. xii. 6, 7). And so it is that next to the miracle of their production, must stand the marvel of their preservation. When we come to consider that the Bible we read today is substantially the self-same Book that was read nearly two thousand years ago, and when we further call to mind the persecuting opposition and antagonism of both Church and State to the Book and its readers, the Providence that has preserved it intact to this day is beyond question one of history's greatest miracles. The history and preservation of the O.T. falls into four periods:

(1)	From Moses to Ezra . . .	Approximate	1000 to 500B.C.
(2)	From Ezra to fall of Jerusalem . . .		to A.D.70.
(3)	The Talmud Period . . .		to A.D.500.
(4)	The Period of the Massorets . . .		to A.D.1000.

To follow in these pages the story of the preservation of the text throughout this length of time would involve too many explanations and illustrations to permit of its being undertaken, especially so far as the Talmudic and Massoretic periods are concerned. There is, however, enough in the Book itself from the days of Moses to the days of Ezra to show the care that was taken to preserve the Scriptures that were entrusted to the people of Israel. To see how this operated during the great period from Moses to Ezra, justifies the expectation that He Who watched over His Word, and provided for its preservation at the beginning, did so because He purposed that it should remain intact until the end.

When Moses had reached the age of one hundred and twenty years, and knew that he would not pass over Jordan with Israel, he appointed Joshua as his successor, and then made arrangements for the safeguarding of the five books of the law, written by himself at the command of the Lord.

> "And Moses wrote this law, and delivered it unto the priests the sons of Levi, which bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord, and unto all the elders of Israel" (Deut. xxxi. 9).

The priests were instructed that at the end of every seven years, when all Israel gathered before God, "this law" should be read "before all Israel in their hearing" (Deut. xxxi. 11). Here were the two initial enactments that went far to preserve the sacred writings. First, they were entrusted to the priests, and secondly they were publicly read every seven years. We learn moreover that the book was deposited in Israel's most sacred depository, the Ark.

> "And it came to pass, when Moses had made an end of writing the words of this law in a book, until they were finished, that Moses commanded the Levites, which bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord, saying, Take this book of the law, and put it in the side of the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God" (Deut. xxxi. 24-26).

Earlier in Deuteronomy a further safeguard is recorded, in that it was incumbent upon any king that should reign over Israel, to carry out the following injunction:

> "And it shall be, when he sitteth upon the throne of his kingdom, that he shall write him a copy of this law in a book out of that which is before the priests the Levites; and it shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the days of his live" (Deut. xvii. 18, 19).

Turning now to the book of Joshua, we follow Israel across the Jordan and to the overthrow of Jericho. After the victory at Ai we read the Joshua built an altar, and there he wrote a copy of the law of Moses in the presence of the children of Israel, and afterward he read all the words of the law, the blessings and the cursings, "there was not a word of all that Moses commanded, which Joshua read not before all the congregation of Israel" (Joshua viii. 30-35).

Here, then, is the record that the command given by Moses was carried out by his successor.

At the close of the book of Joshua, we come to the first recorded addition to the five books of Moses.

> "And Joshua wrote these words in the book of the law of God and took a great stone and set it up . . . . . by the sanctuary of the Lord. And Joshua said . . . . . this stone shall be a witness" (Joshua xxiv. 26, 27).

Here Joshua probably added the account of Moses' death, which closes the book of Deuteronomy.

The next reference is found in the first book of Samuel, after Saul had been chosen king.

> "Then Samuel told the people the manner of the kingdom, and wrote it (literally 'continued the writing') in the book, and laid it up before the Lord" (I Sam. x. 25).

Coming to the days of David, we have abundant testimony in the Psalms that the law of the Lord was believed and honoured by this man who was after God's own heart, and, accordingly, in I Kings ii. 1-4, we find him impressing their value upon his son and successor, Solomon.

In the reign of Jehoshaphat, the king sent the Levites "and they taught in Judah, and had the book of the law of the Lord with them" (II Chron. xvii. 8, 9).

After the dark days of Athaliah, Joash was made king, and we read "Then they brought out the king's son, and put upon him the crown, and gave him the testimony, and made him king" (II Chron. xxiii. 11). Not the crown only, but both "crown" and "testimony" were necessary to "make him king". So the story proceeds to tell how Amaziah spared the children of his father's murderers according to what was "written in the law in the book of Moses' (II Chron. xxv. 4).

Hezekiah kept the Passover in the second month, as it was written, which reveals that Numb. ix. 6-14 was in his possession.

Josiah is the next link in the royal chain, and in his reign we learn that Hilkiah the high priest "found the book of the law in the house of the Lord" (II Kings xxii. 8).

After the carrying away into captivity, we find Daniel referring to that which had been "written in the law of Moses the servant of God" (Dan. ix. 11), and Nehemiah in his prayer concerning the desolation of Jerusalem refers to the statutes and judgments He gave by Moses (Neh. i. 7-9). When the people returned under Nehemiah and Ezra, and the walls of the city had been repaired, a most solemn assembly met in the street that was before the watergate, while Ezra "read in the book in the law of God distinctly" (Neh. viii. 1-8).

There is a suggestion in II Chron. xxix. 30, that the Psalms had by this time taken their place in the sacred canon, for the singers praised the Lord "with the words of David, and of Asaph the seer". In Neh. x. we have the names of those who formed "the great Synagogue", which lasted from Nehemiah to Simon the Just, a period of 110 years. Among other things, its main purpose was "to collect and preserve the canonical scriptures". Its work being accomplished it became known as the Sanhedrin and continued into N.T. times. According to the Talmud, Neh. viii. 8 means, "They read in the book of the law" (i.e. the Hebrew text of the Pentateuch), "distinctly", which would involve translating and interpreting it in the Chaldee paraphrase. "Gave the sense" is more correctly translated "divided the sentences", the first attempt to break the books up into chapters and verses. "Caused them to understand the reading", i.e., gave the traditional pronunciation of the words, which were then without the vowel points.

This brings us to the close of the O.T. After the solemn gathering recorded in Neh. viii. there were but three more books to be written before the prophetic gift ceased in Israel: These were the prophecies of Haggai, Zephaniah and Malachi. The date of the last-named is about 370B.C., and so about 30 years after the restoration under Ezra. Malachi is called by the Rabbis, "The Seal of the Prophets", and from his day the Jew has given his life rather than add to or take away one book or portion of the sacred scriptures entrusted to him.

Owing to the nature of the meetings addressed, we cannot enter into highly technical arguments, as, for example, the witness of the Samaritan Pentateuch, or the extreme value of the Septuagint translation. Such studies belong to the class-room rather than the pulpit, and are incorporated in the Correspondence Courses of Study now in preparation. We trust, however, that enough has been advanced to show the provision made by the Lord for the sacred custody of His Holy Word, and it is a fact to be remembered, that while Israel have been charged with breaking practically every commandment of their law, never has the charge been made against them of tampering with the sacred Scriptures entrusted to them. "Moses", in whom they "trusted", might indeed condemn them (John v. 46) and the Messiah, of Whom Moses wrote, might be rejected by them; they may have overlaid the law with their traditions and so have smothered its teaching, but with a zeal that bordered upon fanaticism, this same people preserved intact the O.T. scriptures and passed them on to the N.T. church.

It will doubtless be realized that during the first six months in which the main theme of our London witness has been the inspiration of the Scriptures, we have looked at many aspects of this doctrine which it has not been possible to touch upon in these six short papers. Nevertheless we believe our readers and supporters will have been pleased or encouraged to share with us a little of the matter of the oral ministry thus given.

#7. "Foundation Day", 26th May, 1945.
A summary of two addresses given by the Principal.
pp. 73 - 75

"Something new" will always catch the ear, but a good preacher can invest the most orthodox of subjects with all the interest of the heterodox if he knows his business. This standard we shall most certainly aim at when we have the joy and privilege of training others to take their place among the ranks of those who have been found "apt to teach" (II Tim. ii. 2, 24); it is fitting, therefore, that the speaker to-day should live up to this searching test. With four such themes as the basic tenets of the Berean Forward Movement to be dealt with in two short meetings, there will be little or no room for anything more than a statement of the truths involved; nevertheless, even though most, if not all, assembled on this occasion believe and know quite intimately these precious doctrines, they must be re-stated this day as though they were being propounded for the first time, or defended against opposition.

Without subscribing to any existing creed, it is very evident to all who know The Berean Expositor and those concerned with its production, that we have most definite views concerning the doctrines contained in the Scriptures, and these doctrines have been maintained, by the grace of God, since The Berean Expositor was first published in 1909, and it is hoped that they will continue to be maintained until faith is exchanged for sight.

On a number of occasions Paul makes it manifest that he had a great aversion to labouring "in vain", and enjoined upon Timothy to have "a form of sound words" which he had heard of the Apostle. When, therefore, the Berean Forward Movement was instituted it became necessary to state and include in a Deed of Trust the basic doctrines of such Movement, so that the work inaugurated should continue, and the labour already expended should be fruitful.

The simplest basis was sought, and it was felt that this must include statements concerning The Word and The Lord. Consequently the Inspiration of all Scripture, and the Deity of Christ were set down as fundamental. It was then realized that the great work of Christ must be included, and so His One Sacrifice for sin was added. These it was felt would prove sufficient, and not impose shackles upon those who follow. It was however realized that there were many Protestant and other Societies that would endorse these three doctrines, but who would not subscribe to the central feature of our Witness, namely, the subject of Dispensational Truth; therefore it was considered essential that the Principle of "Right Division" should be included.

Our doctrinal basis therefore is fourfold:--

(1) Full inspiration of the Scriptures.
(2) Right division of the Scriptures.
(3) The Deity of the Lord Jesus Christ.
(4) All sufficiency of His one Sacrifice.

These basic tenets were included in the Deed of Trust, but as is well known, Deeds of Trust do no implement themselves. Unless Trustees are faithful, and unless the company of believers constituting the Movement are made aware of them, it is possible for such tenets, in the course of time, to become a dead letter. They may be "safe" in the Black box in which they are kept, but they may also be "dead and buried" therein.

With this in mind it was deemed desirable that:

(a) From time to time the foregoing basic doctrines be brought prominently before those constituting the Movement, at what is to be known as "Foundation Day" Meetings, to be held on the last Saturday in May each year. These to take the place of the old Annual Meetings.
(b) Whoever should speak at these Meetings, their subject must be one or more of the four basic doctrines or their interrelationship.
(c) At the first of these gatherings it was considered fitting that the Principal should be the sole speaker, and deal with all four basic doctrines, two in the afternoon, and two in the evening.

For the afternoon, the Inspiration and Right Division of Scripture was the theme, and in the evening The Deity of Christ and His One Sacrifice were dealt with.

It was pointed out that the Inspiration and Right Division of the Scripture were really inseparable. Both are maintained in one epistle, namely in II Tim. iii. 16 and II Tim. ii. 15, and all Scripture cannot be accepted as true unless Right Division is applied. This will be demonstrated presently. First, however, let us present the case for the Inspiration of Scripture.

Three passages provide all that we need at the moment, II Tim. iii. 16; II Pet. i. 19-21; and John xvii. 8, 14, 17. They are as follows:

"All Scripture is given by inspiration of God" (II Tim. iii. 16).
"Knowing this first, that no prophecy of the scripture is of any private interpretation (or, of its own unfolding); for the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man: but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (II Pet. i. 19-21).
"I have given unto them the words which Thou gavest Me" (John xvii. 8).
"I have given them Thy word" (John xvii. 14).
"Thy word is truth" (John xvii. 17).

It is noteworthy that both Paul and Peter wrote the above words in view of imminent martyrdom, even as John xvii. is uttered in view of the approaching death on the cross. This adds to the solemnity of the utterances, and the obligation under which such passages place all believers.

"Right Division" is a basic principle of interpretation. The meaning of the term is best understood by consulting Prov. iii. 6, where the Septuagint reads "He shall rightly divide thy paths". Full acceptance of inspiration is jeopardized where right division is not observed. For example, Exod. xii. 14, 15 declares that "that soul shall be cut off from Israel" who fails to observe the law concerning unleavened bread, and the commandment to keep the Sabbath day holy, which was enforced even by the death penalty (Numb. xv. 32-36), cannot be correctly understood in the light of such passages as Rom. xiv. 5, 6, or Col. ii. 16 unless the distinction between dispensations is observed.

Our Lord's recognition of the principle of right division is clearly seen in Luke iv. 16-21, where He stopped short in the quotation of Isa. lxi. 1, 2 because of the two time periods found in that passage. The two commands "Go not" of Matt. x. 5 and "Go ye" of Matt. xxviii. 19 only makes sense if right division is observed. Mark xvi. 17 declares that "these signs shall (not may) follow them that believe", and apart from right division it is difficult to see how believers to-day can have any assurance of their salvation. The scientific student as he observes the strata of the earth, the composition of the chalk cliffs, the coal deposits, the fossils embedded in the rocks, is stumbled by the teaching that creation took place in six days some six thousand years ago; indeed, Hugh Miller was driven to suicide by conflicting loyalties, yet the observation of right division allows the Scriptures to be implicitly believed and accepted.

Other matters like the use of the Lord's prayer, the special word translated "daily" in that prayer, and the specific meaning of the "temptation" for which deliverance is sought, are discoverable when Kingdom is distinguished from Church and the prayer seen in the light of the book of the Revelation.

In the evening the subjects were The Deity of Christ and the meaning of the Atonement.

Deity of Christ, and the meaning of the Atonement.
pp. 75 - 78

Before attempting to speak on these momentous themes, a word or two concerning "God" is called for. What do we know of "God" as He is in Himself? The answer must be "Nothing". Every title He has assumed has been for our sakes. Every manifestation has been a condescension, every name a limitation. God absolutely and unconditioned is unknown and unknowable by finite beings. When we read "God is spirit" we have a statement of fact which we can believe, but what do we know of life that is pure spirit? What are its modes? How can a "Person" be everywhere at once? What can we know of that order of being that is invisible, inaudible, intangible, infinite? If God reveals Himself under the title "I AM"—just what do we understand? Is there not the tendency on our part to reply, "I am what"? The name Jehovah which is adopted by God as His name for the age, is used repeatedly of Christ in the New Testament. He, too, at times claims the title "I AM", as for example in John viii. 58, 59, and answers to the unspoken cry of our nature when confronted with the title, by filling it out in such claims as "I AM the bread of life", "I AM the light of the world", etc. In other words, Christ is God stepping down from the unconditioned into the realm of manifestation.

The Universe falls into two categories: (1) The Creator; (2) The Creature. Christ must be one or the other. Scripture affirms that Christ is the Creator (John i.; Col. i.; Heb. i.). The Universe falls into two categories: (1) All that is God; (2) All that is not

God. Christ must be one or the other. Scripture affirms that He is God (John i.; Heb. i.; Rom. ix.). In Chapters i. and vi. of the first epistle to Timothy, God is said to be "invisible", and that the mystery of godliness is that "God manifest in the flesh" (I Tim. iii. 16).

It is taught in Matt. xi. 27 that the Father is knowable, for it is the office of the Son to reveal Him, but the Son is inscrutable, "No man knoweth the Son, but the Father", and the words "and He to whomsoever the Father will reveal Him" do not follow. Even Matt. xvi. 16, 17 does not reveal the nature of the Son.

The Old Testament is intensely monotheistic, not only in affirming that God is One, but by such repeated statements as characterize such a passage as Isa. xlv.

> "I am the Lord, and there is none else, there is no God beside Me" (verse 5).
> "For thus saith the Lord that created heavens. God Himself . . . . . I am the Lord; and there is none else" (verse 18).
> "There is no God else beside me; a just God and a Saviour: there is none beside Me" (verse 21).
> "Look unto Me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth: for I am God, and there is none else" (verse 22).

To any one that believes the Scriptures to be the inspired Word of God the above statements must be taken implicitly, without alteration or reserve—and they must be taken together with all that the context teaches. The near context says:

> "I have sworn by Myself, the word is gone out of My mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, That unto Me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear" (Isa. xlv. 23).

If there is anything that is plain in this passage it is this, that to the One God, the Creator, the Saviour, to Him Who is God alone, with none beside Him, "every knee shall bow". Paul as a Jew and as a Pharisee knew this, and held it tenaciously. As an Apostle he knew it and taught it, writing in Romans:

> "For it is written, As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to Me, and every tongue shall confess to God" (Rom. xiv. 11).

Does he throw this blessed revelation to the winds then when he wrote to the Philippians, or does he recognize in "Jesus", God manifest in the flesh?

> "That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. ii. 10, 11).

The Father is God, but so also must the Son be to justify this application of such a passage as that of Isa. xlv. The confusion of the titles "Father" and "Son" with the Being of the Absolute and Unconditioned God is the fruitful source of all the objections made to the Deity of Christ. Humanly devised creeds have taken the place of Scripture statements, transcendental philosophy mistaken for Scripture truth, to the confusion of the believer and the mutilation of truth.

Just as we saw that the inspiration of Scripture is linked with the principle of right division, so we see that the Deity of Christ is linked with His sacrifice for sin. The three passages which we have already referred to in answer to the question "Does Scripture give the title 'God' or 'Creator' to Christ?" indicate the link that there is between His Person and His Sacrificial Work.

John i. -	"God" . . .	"Made all things" . . . "Made flesh . . . the Lamb of God."
Heb. i. -	"God" . . .	"Earth and heavens . . . Thine hands" . . . "Flesh and blood" (Heb. ii. 14, 15).
Col. i. -	"Image of Invisible God" . . .	Created all things" . . . "The body of His flesh through death".

Confining ourselves for the present to one great aspect of the Sacrifice for sin we look at the Atonement. The word so translated in the O.T. is the Hebrew kopher, and its primitive meaning is "to cover". Such words as "A cloud", "A hand", "A spoon", "A cave", anything over-arching or hollow, are translations of this word or its derivatives. It means also "a village", obviously a covering or a "roof over one's head", and survives in the N.T. name *Caper*naum, "the village of Naum". While atonement means to "cover", it does not mean "to cover up", for it is written, "He that covereth his sins shall not prosper" (Prov. xxviii. 13) even though Psalm xxxii. 1 speaks of the blessedness of the man whose sins are "covered". The fact that the law permitted the penalty to be commuted (Exod. xxi. 30, xxx. 12, Numb. xxxv. 31, 32) prepared the way for the glorious commutation of the cross.

Among the essentials for a scriptural atonement we must instance two particularly:

(1) The shedding of blood. Lev. xvii. 11; Heb. ix. 22.
(2) The Offering must be "perfect". Lev. xxii. 19, 20.

This essential place of the shedding of blood is carried over into New Testament doctrine. It is the basis of Justification (Rom. iii. 23-26); Sanctification (Heb. ix. 13, 14); Forgiveness (Col. i. 14); Presentation (Col. i. 22); and Cleansing (I John i. 7, 9).

The passage of Scripture which was read at the meeting brings the Deity of Christ and His Sacrifice close together:

> "Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, Who gave Himself for us, that He might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto Himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works" (Titus ii. 13, 14).

From earliest days, Preachers, Teachers and Students have exercised themselves in the endeavour to frame some definition of the Atonement that will give it its Scriptural place in the Divine purpose. With great diffidence the following was submitted to the Meeting as a beginning, with the hope that at subsequent Meetings the various features could be taken up individually and the definition clarified thereby:

> The atonement is an expedient introduced into the Divine moral government, devised by infinite wisdom, to satisfy both the righteousness and the love of God in the forgiveness and salvation of the sinner who believes the gospel.
>
> This atonement consists of the Substitionary Sacrifice of Christ, bearing our sins in His Own body on the tree, and through the shedding of His precious blood a ransom has been found, satisfaction made, reconciliation accomplished, justification, sanctification, forgiveness, life and peace for ever assured.
>
> The atonement thus made provides a ground upon which a holy God can meet a sinner in grace and mercy, without in the slightest degree compromising the throne of His holiness, or doing dishonour to His holy law.
>
> It is of the very essence of this atonement that its benefits should be freely bestowed and freely received, without merit or legal works on the part of the sinner thus saved. It is by grace through faith alone.

At future "Foundation Day" Meetings, every one of these terms used in the attempted definition could be examined. What is Substitution? Sacrifice? Satisfaction? What is meant by the "necessity" of the atonement? What is meant by "A ground upon which a holy God can meet a sinner in grace and mercy"? What is meant by "An expedient introduced into the Divine moral government"? and so with every feature both of this, and of the other three basic doctrines of the Trust.

In conclusion we print a comment upon the first Foundation Day Meetings received from a friend who was present:

> "On Saturday, 26th May, the first Foundation Day Meetings of the Chapel of the Opened Book were held, and proved to be of an auspicious character.
>
> In reviewing the circumstances leading up to the establishment of this witness, the individual details are prosaic enough, but their cumulative effect reveals a sure guidance of the hand of God which is very heartening in a day when 'there is no open vision'. Their ultimate effect may even prove historical.
>
> It is the more remarkable that it was the outcome, not of a single mind or purpose, but born of a latent desire on the part of many widely scattered people who, seeking for the truth, found it, and finding it desired to spread it to an ever widening circle of seekers, so that in a day when counsel is darkened and confusion tends to bewilder the minds of men, a beacon has been lit by which to steer in the aftermath of the storm that is past and the storms already appearing."

#8. A synopsis of a year's testimony.
pp. 131 - 134

After the initial testimony, covering the first six months' witness at the Chapel of the Opened Book, summarized in the preceding articles of this series, our next step was to seek some acquaintance with the teaching of the Scriptures concerning the GOD Who gave them, and MAN to whom they were given.

We traversed much the same ground as has been covered under the headings "This God is our God" (Volumes XXII-XXV), and "Fruits of Fundamental Studies" (Volume XXVII and onward), the early articles on Genesis in "Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth" and "What is Man?" (Volume XIX). We do not therefore propose repeating the substance of these addresses here, as, although they were presented in very different form from the articles referred to, and many points given but passing attention were elaborated with fuller detail in the pulpit; in the main, the conclusions were very similar.

The addresses upon the Being and Attributes of God were prefaced by a reminder from Job xi. 7 where we read: "Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?" We realized that no title of God, or all His titles put together, could fully reveal to man the nature and being of God, Who is Spirit, Who is Infinite, Who is Absolute and Unconditioned. We realized that God must stoop down out of the Absolute and Unconditioned, into the realm of the Relative and the Manifest, where He comes into touch with limited and conditioned man. We did recognize with much joy that, great as are the titles and names assumed by God in making Himself known under the Old Covenant, the goal of the ages, as well as the crowning glory of all His titles and manifestations, is to be sought for in the New Covenant name of "Father".

As our studies proceeded it became obvious that if we were to appreciate in any sense of reality the nature and being of God, we should have to follow this series of addresses with another, which sought a scriptural answer to the question, "What is man?" We found that man was made, "for a little", lower than the angels; that his very name "Adam" suggests his prime purpose in the scheme of the ages, allied as it is to the word translated "likeness" in the verse where "Adam" is first mentioned in the original (Gen. i. 26), and we found much to encourage us as we realized that the first Adam, who was of the earth, earthy, was a "shadow", a "figure", of Him that was to come.

The nature of the soul and the unscriptural dogma "The immortality of the soul" were naturally included in this series, but, as time went on, the demand grew more insistent for some Divinely appointed bridge, some living link, that could span the gap between the Creator and His creatures; between Man, the sinner, and a God, too pure to look upon iniquity. Consequently the third section of the new series of addresses dealt with the need for, and the provision of, "The One Mediator between God and men, the Man Christ Jesus".

The opening addresses of this new series dealt with the three-fold promise of a "Seed".

(1) The SEED of the woman who should bruise the serpent's head.
(2) The SEED of Abraham, limiting the channel of this promise to Israel, and revealing both the place that Israel must play in the outworking of the purpose of mercy, and also revealing the evangel that was "preached before unto Abraham".
(3) The SEED of David, with its emphasis upon crown and throne, and also in the light of New Testament references to the foreknown sufferings and resurrection that would precede His accession and reign.

This threefold promise finds a threefold fulfillment in the opening of the New Testament.

(1) "Time" was fulfilled.—The testimony of prophecy was examined, the historical references of Luke ii. 1, 2; iii. 1, 2 scrutinized, the fact of Gal. iv. 4 realized, and the testimony of Mark i. 15 noted.
(2) "Place" was fulfilled.—Both the birth-place of Bethlehem and the upbringing at Nazareth fulfilled the prophets.
(3) "Person" was fulfilled.—Matthew and Luke give us two genealogies. One going back through Solomon to David and Abraham, the other going back through Nathan to David, Abraham and Adam. Matthew's was seen to be the direct genealogy of Joseph the husband of Mary, Luke's the line of Mary herself, her husband being the son-in-law, or legal son of his wife's father. The appearance in both genealogies of Salathiel and Zorobabel (Matt. i. 12 and Luke iii. 27), suggesting a marriage between the Solomonic and Nathanic lines, was noted.

This threefold cord of evidence is supplemented by,

(4) The authority of His word as the "Sent One".—He spoke with authority and not as the Scribes, and eight times in John's Gospel He declared that the doctrine and the words He spoke were not His but the Father's that sent Him.
(5) This authority is supplemented by the working of miracles, which were not only wonders and mighty works, but signs. The Lord appealed to these miracles, saying "believe Me for the very works' sake" (John x. 38).
(6) Yet in spite of the fact that the fullness of time had come, and that Time, Place and Person all adhered; in spite of words of authority and miracles without precedent, the shadow of rejection is seen in Matt. xi., and becomes more pronounced as "parable" and "mystery" are introduced in Matt. xiii.
(7) This led us to the great prophecy of the second coming, Matt. xxiv., the very fact of there being a "second time" speaking of original rejection, as in the typical cases of Joseph and Moses (Acts vii. 13 and 35).

The crucifixion of the Saviour was viewed from the twofold aspects of Acts ii. 23: (1) "Delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God", and (2) "Taken by wicked hands, crucified and slain". "The last word" (Prov. xvi. 1-4, literal rendering) however is always with the Lord, and His last word is seen in operation when He raised the Lord from the dead.

In the Gospels the historic facts of the crucifixion and of the resurrection are given, but it is reserved for the succeeding speeches of the Acts and the doctrine of the epistles to show their true significance.

At the close of the Gospels we meet with the Commissions, the Lord appointing His representatives, and giving them their orders, before His departure. These commissions are found in each Gospel.

> (1) "All power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you, and lo, I am with you always, even till the consummation of the age" (Matt. xxviii. 18-20).

This commission belongs especially to the kingdom, and is addressed to all nations. The words "gospel" and "preach" are not employed. However, with the setting aside of Israel at Acts xxviii. this proclamation awaits the time of the end, and the presence of the Lord is assured to those who make the proclamation "all the days until the sunteleia of the age".

> (2) "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned. And these signs shall follow them that believe . . . . . they went forth, and preached every where, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with signs following" (Mark xvi. 15-20).

This commission we are assured was fulfilled. The miraculous signs did follow. They persist throughout the Acts of the Apostles to the last chapter, being found in full operation in the churches of Corinth and Rome, while reference to them is found in Galatians, and Hebrews.

> (3) "Repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. And ye are witnesses of these things. And, behold, I send the promise of My Father upon you; but tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem, until ye be endued with power from on high" (Luke xxiv. 47-49).

This commission is repeated in Acts i., and is partly fulfilled in the Acts of the Apostles. It is Pentecostal in character and scope.

> (4) "When the Comforter is come, Whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, He shall testify of Me. And ye also shall bear witness, because ye have been with Me from the beginning" (John xv. 26, 27).

Matthias fulfilled the condition here specified, and was numbered with the Apostles (Acts i. 22-26). Pentecost fulfilled the promise of the Comforter, but John's Gospel has a place in the purpose of grace that occupies the period from the destruction of Israel's city to the second coming, during which the highways and byways are searched, and the wedding of the King's son furnished with guests.

One other commission awaits investigation, that given to Paul, the Apostle of the Gentiles, but he was not called until, once again, rejection cast its shadow over the scene and the failure of Israel to repent, even after the second invitation, was evident.

The future ministry of The Chapel of the Opened Book will be largely occupied with considering the distinctions that must be observed between the various commissions, but will give particular attention to the commission and calling of the apostle Paul because of the close relationship between the present dispensation and that last of all the commissions, and the only one given by the ascended Christ, after all His earthly ministry had been fulfilled.

#9. "Go ye and learn what that meaneth, I will have mercy and not sacrifice" (Matt. ix. 13).

pp. 149 - 153

Is there a danger in stressing the believer's full acceptance in the sacrifice of Christ? Is there a danger in emphasizing that salvation is "not of works"? There is, if truth be not presented in all its fullness. We must, however, refrain from putting out our hand to stay the ark of God. We must not minimize by one iota either the completeness of redemption or the believer's inability to provide the least contribution towards his acceptance. Moreover, if we see a believer taking an advantage of grace in that he assumes that one's "manner of life" is of no importance, we must yet be watchful that, in stressing his responsibility, we neither reintroduce the fetters that redemption has for ever broken, nor preach the once-offered Sacrifice with any reservations.

It is evident from the objection raised in Rom. vi. 1 that the Apostle had so preached "grace without works" as to make it possible for the objection to be laid, "Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound?" but we do not find in that chapter any attempt on the part of the Apostle to minimize the completeness of the offering of Christ. First, he meets the objection with a vigorous, "God forbid!" and then proceeds to show that every one that has accepted Christ as Sacrifice and Saviour, does so not only as if Christ had accomplished an objective work done on his behalf, but as if it is a work with which he must be identified, his language being, "How shall I that am dead to sin, live any longer therein?" (Rom. vi. 2). In the subsequent argument of the chapter, it is clearly stated that "His servants ye are to whom ye obey", and that those who have been made "free from sin", instead of receiving license to spend their blood-bought liberty in the pleasing of self, are free so that they may become "the servants of righteousness". It is therefore untrue to assume that he who preaches the basic doctrine of the One Sacrifice for sin is not alive to the moral issues that must arise therefrom.

Our thoughts have been directed to this aspect of truth by having to deal with the problems relative to the Mosaic law of Sacrifice and Offering which certain passages in the Psalms and the Prophets create. It is easy to lift out and regard as sweeping statements such words as "Sacrifice and offering Thou wouldst not", or "Incense is an abomination" and so conclude that the whole system of sacrifice was thereby set aside, and that nothing more was demanded of any man than that he "walk humbly" with His

God. But such an attitude of mind is, to say the least, illogical, for it not only sets aside the Mosaic law of Sacrifice, but also the bulk of the teaching of the N.T., completely emptying Paul's epistles of any meaning.

No one acquainted with the teaching of the Lord in the Gospels, or of Paul, Peter and John in their Epistles, could hesitate to admit that the Sacrifice of Christ was held to be fundamental to salvation, and that this One Offering did most truly endorse and fulfil all that had been foreshadowed in the ritual sacrifices of the Old Covenant. In view of the reiterated statement that Christ came to fulfil the Law and the Prophets, it is not possible to believe that those self-same prophets did indeed set aside the supreme purpose for which "a body" had been "prepared" for Him.

This being so, it is highly probable that those who see any divergence between the Law and the Prophets in this matter of sacrifice for sin, have not only misunderstood the meaning of the prophet, but have equally misunderstood the law of sacrifice itself. If it be conceived that a sinner under the law could, as it were, obtain an indulgence for any sin and get off scot free by hiding behind a mere ceremonial, then Luther's burning indignation against the notorious licences of Tetzel should have been directed to the more fatal licence inculcated by Moses! Such a conclusion carries with it its own refutation, but though writer and reader be at one over the matter, the subject is of such importance that an examination of the passages found in the Psalms and in the Prophets that appear to militate against the law of sacrifice seems desirable, and to this we now apply ourselves.

When David was convicted of sin and realized that no sacrifice provided by the law could give him peace, he exclaimed:

> "Thou desirest not sacrifice; else would I give it. Thou delightest not in burnt offering. The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit: a broken and a contrite heart, O God, Thou wilt not despise" (Psa. li. 16, 17).

Nevertheless, so far removed from David's thoughts was it that the Mosaic sacrifices were rendered null and void, that he goes on to say that when Israel are restored; when the walls of Jerusalem are rebuilt; "Then shalt Thou be pleased with the sacrifices of righteousness, with burnt offering and whole burnt offering; then shall they offer bullocks upon Thine altar" (Psa. li. 18, 19).

Again, a superficial reading of Psa. xl. 6, "Sacrifice and offering Thou didst not desire", might lead to the supposition that the law of sacrifice was set aside, but a reading of the context, and particularly the remote context of Heb. x., reveals that, instead of setting aside the law of sacrifice, this passage but demands its fuller and higher recognition. Commenting on this passage, Perowne says:

"We may perhaps paraphrase verses 5-8 as follows: My heart is full to overflowing with the thought of Thy goodness. How can I express, how can I acknowledge it? Once I should have thought sacrifices and offerings a proper and sufficient acknowledgment. Now, I feel how inadequate these are; for Thou hast taught me the truth; my deaf unwilling ears didst Thou open, that I might understand that a willing heart was the best offering that I could render. Then, being taught of Thee, I said, Lo, I come, presenting myself before Thee, not with a dead and formal service, but with myself as a living sacrifice."

The tenth chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews establishes two great truths regarding the doctrine of sacrifice.

(1) That the sacrifices offered under the law, together with its promises, were "shadows" of good things to come: and
(2) That these "shadows" find their substance and fulfillment, not in the repentance of the sinner, but in "the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all" (Heb. x. 10).

Yet once more, Psa. l. 8 has been similarly misconstrued:

> "I will not reprove thee for thy sacrifices or thy burnt offerings, to have been continually before Me."

In these words God was not repudiating the Mosaic system but, as Perowne comments:

> "The reason for this act of judgment is given first negatively. It is not because the people neglected the externals of the law, or had forgotten to offer the sacrifices appointed by the law. They had brought them; but they had brought them as if the act were everything, and as if the meaning of the act, and the spirit in which it was done, were nothing. But God demands no service for its own sake (the cattle upon a thousand hills were His), but as an expression of an obedient will. A thankful heart is more than all burnt offerings."

It is in the light of such passages that we must read:

> "To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto Me? . . . . . I am full of the burnt offerings of rams . . . . . Bring no more vain oblations; incense is an abomination unto Me" (Isa. i. 11-13).

These words were spoken to a people who could be likened to Sodom and Gomorrha, whose prayers were rejected because the hands that were spread out to God were "full of blood". Such were enjoined to wash and make themselves clean; to put away the evil of their doings; to cease to do evil; to learn to do well. If the sacrificial system had been devised to make "the mere ceremonial act an easy means of blotting out the moral offence, iniquity would have been established by the law. The moral sense of the nation would have been enfeebled" (Patrick Fairbairn, D.D.).

Similarly, we must read another such passage in Jeremiah:

> "I spake not unto your fathers, nor commanded them in the day that I brought them out of the land of Egypt, concerning burnt offerings or sacrifices" (Jer. vii. 22).

A superficial reading of such a passage creates a contradiction; it sets the Prophets over against the Law. But, while it is true that when the Lord brought Israel out of Egypt nothing was indeed said of burnt offering and sacrifice, the system was introduced later when Israel made it clear by their worship of the golden calf that they would never attain to righteousness by the keeping of the law of Sinai.

Earlier in Jer. vii. we have the ominous repetition "The temple of the Lord, The temple of the Lord, The temple of the Lord" (Jer. vii. 4), reiteration that savours more of the idolatrous repetition of the worshippers of Diana at Ephesus than of worship of the true God. In this connection it is noteworthy that the structure of Acts xix. 21 - xxi. 39, given in Volume XXX, page 98, places the "uproar" at the temple of Diana in correspondence with the "tumult" at the temple of Jerusalem, reducing the temple at Jerusalem to the level of that of Ephesus, and showing the force of the Lord's words when He said "Your" house is left unto you desolate.

It was to those who used mere ceremonial as a screen for iniquity that the prophets so spoke. It is in the light of such moral necessity that we must interpret the words of Hosea: "I desired mercy, and not sacrifice; and the knowledge of God more than burnt offerings" (Hosea vi. 6).

On two occasions the Saviour used these words to correct a ceremonial and mechanical use of the law of sacrifice:

> "But go ye and learn what that meaneth, I will have mercy, and not sacrifice: for I am come not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance" (Matt. ix. 13).
>
> "But if ye had known what this meaneth, I will have mercy, and not sacrifice, ye would not have condemned the guiltless" (Matt. xii. 7).

It is only by the context that we can gather what this text "means". It is in contrast with the narrow self-righteousness that would rather elevate and enlarge the law that prohibited certain occasions of fellowship with Gentiles, than see a poor outcast gathered into the fold of salvation. It was quoted in direct opposition to that narrow scrupulosity that condemned the disciples for plucking ears of corn on the Sabbath and elevated the unfeeling tradition of the Elders above the spirit of mercy resident in the law.

We, too, must learn what this twice-quoted passage from Hosea "meaneth". We must not read it, "I will have mercy, and not sacrifice", as though sacrifice was repudiated. The words kai ou, "and not", denote a "comparative negative", as for example, "Rend your hearts, and not your garments", or as the parallelism of Prov. viii. 10 makes clear: "Receive my instruction, and not silver; and knowledge rather than choice gold", for the Lord did not say that the Pharisees should not tithe "mint and anise and cumin"; these He said should not be left undone, but to omit the weightier matters of the law, such as "judgment, mercy, and faith" was to empty the law of its true "meaning" (Matt. xxiii. 23).

With such correctives ministered by the Psalmist, the Prophets and the Saviour, we can and should realize that the Mosaic sacrificial system was a divinely given, typical foreshadowing of the one great Sacrifice offered by the Lord, which indeed was no mere ceremonial, but involved the identification of the believer both with his Substitute's death to sin, and in newness of life to God. The sacrifices of the law never touched the conscience; they were but shadows, but on the other hand they gave no premium to sin, and were only truly offered when the offerer was conscious of his guilt and felt a need both of a Deliverer and the moral necessity of repentance; a repentance that not only turned from the sin committed, but turn the heart toward the God Who had been so grievously offended.

A fitting conclusion would be a prayerful reading of Psalm li. in its entirety, observing the Psalmist's consciousness of sin, his inability to provide any sacrifice that could meet his dire need, the desire for cleansing within, the desire for restoration and usefulness, and the complete endorsement, after all has been said, of the very sacrificial system which at first appears to be refuted and obsolete.

The Self-Drawn Portrait of the Apostle Paul.

#7. Separate Features: Dread of Officious Interference. pp. 11, 12

> "Here we see . . . . . that dread of officious interference which led him to shrink from 'building on another man's foundation', that delicacy which shows itself in his appeal to Philemon, whom he might have commanded, 'yet for love's sake rather beseeching him, being such an one as Paul the aged, and now also a prisoner of Jesus Christ', and which is even more striking in some of his farewell greetings, as for instance when he bids the Romans 'Salute Rufus, and his mother, who is also mine'." (Conybeare and Howson).

Paul's dread of officious interference is but the other side of the delicacy of his nature, and just as in the features of the face, it is scarcely possible to describe but one, and not both, eyes, so we have found it difficult to speak of one side of the Apostle's nature without the other.

Shakespeare speaks of:

> "Man, proud man,
> Drest in a little, brief, authority,
> Most ignorant of what he's most assured."

and more or less most of us have suffered at the hands of officialdom. Who among us thinks kindly of "red-tape", or who could associate such a term with the Apostle Paul? The generosity which marked him we considered in our last article. It enable him to be made all things to all men, and rendered him alike intolerant of officiousness, red-tape and the narrow rut of smaller minds.

He was an apostle, not one whit behind the chiefest of the apostles, yet, so far was he removed from the "official" in his high office, that he laboured with his hands, and refused Corinthian gold. The Apostle "magnified his office" without magnifying himself. His sensitiveness and delicacy, and his lack of official interference comes out very prominently when he is dealing with the financial affairs of the churches. Writing to the Corinthians concerning the much-desired collection for the poor saints at Jerusalem, the Apostle said:

> "I speak not by commandment, but by occasion of the forwardness of others, and to prove the sincerity of your love" (II Cor. viii. 8).

A perfectly free hand was given to the Corinthian church in choosing those who should go with the Apostle to Jerusalem:

> "And when I come, whomsoever ye shall approve by your letters, them will I send to bring your liberality unto Jerusalem. And if it be meet that I go also, they shall go with me" (I Cor. xvi. 3, 4).

Here we see the Apostle practicing what he preached, "providing things honest in the sight of all men" (Rom. xii. 17).

> "Provide for honest things, not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men" (II Cor. viii. 21).

Oftentimes a curious mentality is displayed by believers in connection with Christian financial matters. Some very much resent giving a receipt, others refuse an audit, but what to such appears most officious, would to the Apostle appear to be nothing but what is decent, and so it seems to us.

The Apostle not only refrained from officiousness in financial affairs, but even in matters of faith and practice, where one might have expected the full exercise of authority, even there we discern the true inward greatness of this man of God.

> "Not that we have dominion over your faith, but are helpers of your joy" (II Cor. i. 24).
> "Who then is Paul and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed, even as the Lord gave to every man" (I Cor. iii. 5).

The salutations of Paul at the close of his epistles reveal much as to the Apostle's character. He forgets none: He mentions all by name. He gives wherever possible some characteristic epithet; where he cannot praise he says nothing. Greetings are sent to Priscilla and Aquila, with a warm recollection of their love for him that puts the whole church in their debt (Rom. xvi. 3, 4). Epænetus is called "well beloved" and is "firstfruits of Achaia in Christ" (Rom. xvi. 5). So, too, "Greet Mary, who bestowed much labour on us".

The Apostle is always more reserved in his references to sisters in Christ. No endearing term is used in this letter when he greets this sister in the Lord. This does not indicate that she was not as "well beloved" as Epænetus, but in the case of sisters the Apostle does not use such terms publicly. So we go down the list in this closing chapter. Persis is a woman's name, and the Apostle has circumvented the difficulty by saying, "Salute the beloved Persis", not "my beloved", so rendering the epithet less personal.

In Col. iv. the Apostle mentions a number of those who had helped him in the ministry. Tychicus, Onesimus, Aristarchus are named, with many an endearing remark. Special consideration is given to Marcus, sister's son to Barnabas (Col. iv. 10), as though the Apostle would remove the memory of the dissension that arose over him in the early days of his ministry. Jesus, Justus, Epaphras and Luke (Col. iv. 11-14) all receive some commendation. This only makes the words, "and Demas", stand out the more from the rest. It is evident that Paul's delicacy of feeling, his sensitiveness to the slights made upon him by others, would, had it been possible, have prevented any omission of favourable remark in the case of Demas. Clearly the defection of Demas, which he sorrowfully records as a fact in II Tim. iv. 10, already manifested itself to the Apostle's discerning eye. He could say nothing good of Demas, but he would say nothing ill—all he could say, and did say, was, "and Demas". In this he followed the Lord, who endured the presence of Judas without ever hinting to the rest of the disciples a word as to his true character.

Fervid patriotism, hot indignation, fearless independence, delicate sensitiveness, these are some of the elements that went to make up the personality of the Apostle to the Gentiles.

#8. Separate Features: Fear of evil appearance.
pp. 43 - 45

> "Here we see . . . . . that scrupulous fear of evil appearance which 'would not eat any man's bread for nought, but wrought with labour and travail night and day, that he might not be chargeable to any of them'." (Conybeare and Howson).

There were three orders in the Sanhedrin. The Priests, the Elders and the Scribes. Paul was of the tribe of Benjamin, and therefore could not have been a priest, and as he was a young man neither could he have been an elder. Most evidently he was a scribe, for he knew the scriptures, at least in the letter. By his own confession he was also a Pharisee.

The very expression "Scribes and Pharisees" calls up all that is petty and mean. Dean Farrar thus comments on the words, "He lived a Pharisee":--

> "We know well the kind of life which lies behind that expression. We know the minute and intense scrupulosity of Sabbath Observance wasting itself in all those abhoth and toldoth—those primary and derivative rules and prohibitions, and inferences from rules and prohibitions, and combinations of inferences from rules and prohibitions, and cases of casuistry and conscience arising out of the infinite possible variety of circumstances to which those combinations might apply."

As a Pharisee Paul had therefore known the minutiæ of thought and action involved in this system. But Paul, the Apostle, exulted in the liberty wherewith Christ had set him free, and, apart from grace abounding, such a swing of the pendulum might have led to licence and disregard for appearances. While this was not the case, the fact that Paul was under no bondage and that he would not tolerate the placing of fetters on the believer is evident from all his epistles. He who was once the scrupulous Pharisee, writes:

> "One believeth that he may eat all things: another, who is weak, eateth herbs . . . . . One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind" (Rom. xiv. 2-5).

A man not so fully actuated by grace would have flaunted this new-found freedom in the face of his fellows. He would have sought to show his liberty by outraging convention; he would have imagined effrontery to be synonymous with principle, and that to ride roughshod over the scruples of others was evidence of superior strength. Such behaviour however does not result from a knowledge of the truth. The man who reminds the whole household that he is Master is usually far from being so. The man most easy to be entreated is usually the strong man. The man who can bear with the scruples and foibles of others is usually one who himself is so far above such scruples that he can afford to stoop without fear of the charge of compromise. A good example of this is found in Acts xv., xvi. From Gal. ii. 3, as well as from Acts xv., we realize that the key to the conflict was the circumcision of the Gentile believer. Paul fought, and from his fight on this very point, came away from Jerusalem in triumph. In Acts xvi., the very next chapter, we read that he circumcised Timothy. This act might have been the evidence of compromise in a smaller man, who would have been afraid of being misunderstood and would have entrenched himself in apparent consistency. But Paul's attitude is neither that of base compromise nor unbending, blind, external, consistency: it was the attitude of a man concerned not with petty triumphs but with eternal truth. Whether resistance to the imposition of circumcision in Acts xv. be demand for the truth's sake, or yielding to it be demanded for the same truth's sake, as recorded in Acts xvi., Paul had grace enough to put truth before apparent consistency, and for truth's sake was prepared to appear to throw away the hard-won victory of the preceding chapter.

This apostle, in all his strength, neither censures nor ridicules the weaker brother. He protects him; he even allows the "other man's conscience" (I Cor. x. 26-29) to be the deciding factor. Paul's scrupulous fear of evil appearance, therefore, was not the result of the fear of man, nor of slavish adherence to mere appearance, but of willingness, for love's sake, to give up and to yield; to be constricted where he might have been at large, so that the name of Christ should not be blasphemed; so that the weak brother should not be stumbled; so that all things might be done to the glory of God.

How splendid it is to say, "I refuse to be turned aside from the faith before me; I do all to the glory of God". How much more difficult, yet how much more Christ-like it is, still to press on to the one mark, "the glory of God", and at the same time to be able to respect the scruples of the weak, and endure without irritation the bigotry of the narrow minded. Yet nothing less than this is before us, as it was before the Apostle.

> "Whether therefore ye eat, or drink" (and one must remember the arguments of chapters viii.-x. on this vexed question) "or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God, give none offence, neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, nor to the church of God: even as I please all men in all things, not seeking mine own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be saved" (I Cor. x. 31-33).

The many references to the Apostle's refusal to receive support during his ministry, because circumstances suggested that it would be misinterpreted, are doubtless known to the reader. If not, they should all be discovered and read, for the sake of the illumination they throw on this particular feature of the Apostle's portrait, without which some of his actions would be inexplicable. May we all rise above the petty scruples that are prompted by fear, yet, for love's sake, observe many from which we could be free were we willing to disregard the weaker believer.

#9. Separate Features: Refined Courtesy.
pp. 67 - 69

> "Here we see . . . . . that refined courtesy which cannot bring itself to blame till it has first praised, and which makes him deem it needful almost to apologize for the freedom of giving advice to those who were not personally known to him." (Conybeare and Howson).

We have all met the man who boasts that he is "John Blunt", but we have usually found that he has a "sharp" tongue. To "call a spade a spade" might appear to be the essence of frankness. It may however be the essence of grace to remember that "pity" enters into the attitude of the heavenly Father to His children; a remembrance of natural frailty and a desire so to administer needful correction that it shall contribute to the upbuilding rather than the overthrowing of the believer.

One of the first reasons why we should never speak with untempered censure is that, in the very nature of the case, we can never know all the facts or all the circumstances. Perhaps the proverbs, "To know all is to forgive all", errs too much on the side of leniency, but if we would serve our brethren a recognition of the principle involved must ever be ours. Again, what is so cheap as "advice". On every hand there are those who will tell one what one "ought to do", but in most cases, such unsought and freely-offered advice is of little value. Advice that is real and helpful must usually be sought, and must often be paid for. Now the Apostle, as the representative of Christ, might appear to be exempt from these limitations. Surely where censure is merited, Paul can give it without mitigation or preface! Surely, we might say that where Paul had the right to command, he would not apologize for advising! So we lesser folk might reason, but not so those most taught by grace. God Himself respects the image after which man was created. Sinful though man is, yet, so far as circumstances permit, he is a free moral agent. In the gospel of His grace, God Himself wooes, pleads, invites. He Who is Lord of all says, "Behold, I stand at the door, and knock: if any man open . . . . ." and His ministers are more like Him when they "minister and are not ministered unto".

Chapter after chapter in the first epistle to the Corinthians is devoted to rebuke and censure, for the Corinthians were divided, were partisan, were carnal, were immoral, were enslaved by unholy bonds, or boasting in unholy freedom, yet in spite of all this, the Apostle opens his epistle with the words, "I thank my God always on your behalf, for the grace of God which is given you by Jesus Christ" (I Cor. i. 4). This is followed by a long series of rebukes. Again, in I Cor. xi. 2, we read, "Now I praise you, brethren", but in verse 17 he follows on by saying, "Now in this that I declare unto you I praise you not". And again, in verse 22, "What shall I say to you? Shall I praise you in this? I praise you not".

In the same epistle the Apostle's advice is sought on the question of marriage. Instead of laying down a law, he spends a long time in looking at the matter from various angles, leaning to abstention from marriage "for the present necessity" (or distress) (I Cor. vii. 26), because of the then possibility of the Lord's return. He prefaces his remarks with the words, "I speak this by permission, and not of commandment" (verse 6). And again, midway through his advice, he says, "now concerning virgins I have no commandment of the Lord, yet I give my judgment, as one that has obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful" (verse 25), and finally at the close he says, "But she is happier if she so abide, after my judgment: and I think also that I have the spirit of God" (verse 40).

By these concessions a lesser man than Paul would have so weakened his authority as to render his advice valueless. Paul's magnanimity, however, was such that what he lost by right of command he more than gained by sympathy and affection. Where the Corinthians might have rebelled against hard and fast rules, they were persuaded that the Apostle had no designs upon them but sought their highest good.

After such a mighty revelation of truth as is contained in Rom. i.-xi., it is almost disconcerting to find the Apostle beseeching us to present our bodies as living sacrifices (Rom. xii. 1). Or, again, in Eph. iv., instead of demanding a worthy walk, the prisoner of the Lord beseeches us to walk worthy. How clear a portrait we have of Paul in this respect when we read the letter he wrote to Philemon.

> "Wherefore, though I might be much bold in Christ to enjoin thee that which is convenient, yet for love's sake I rather beseech thee, being such an one as Paul the aged, and now also a prisoner of Jesus Christ . . . . . But without thy mind would I do nothing . . . . . albeit I do not say to thee how thou owest unto me even thine own self besides. Yea, brother, let me have joy of thee in the Lord . . . . . I wrote unto thee, knowing that thou wilt also do more than I say" (Philemon 8, 9, 14, 19, 20, 21).

It looks as though the Apostle of the grace of God was a gracious person: that he who had received so much love and forbearance, showed love and forbearance: that in dealing with others, he who had known the burden of the law, avoided using terms of law, even when he had the right to command or to instruct. How few, O Paul, are thy successors!

#10. Separate Features: Self-denying Love.
pp. 109, 110

> "Here we see . . . . . that self-denying love which 'will eat no flesh while the world standeth lest he make his brother to offend'." (Conybeare and Howson).

When, as dispensations change, gifts and graces pass away, Faith, Hope and Love remain. When the ages have reached their goal, faith and hope will find their fullest expression in love, which abides. Love is an all-pervading essence, too great, too manifold, too diverse, for the mind of man to grasp on this side of resurrection. In the Scriptures love is spoken of in terms of its outgoings rather than of its essence. One phase will be seen as faith, another as joy, yet another as righteousness. A man may have love for the Lord, for His Word, for His people, but, during this life, it may still be crippled, half fledged or baffled. The self-denying element of Christian love is that which is here brought before us. Paul expressed this quality in a remarkable way. He refrained from enjoying the highest liberties and fullest rights that the gospel of grace had brought him.

To you and to me, the question of whether we shall or shall not eat this or that is of little consequence. Years of bondage, ages of tradition, veneration of one's elders, regard for the sanctity of Moses and his law, respect for the interpreters of that law, a fear of the damnation that followed the overstepping of its prohibitions (as expressed, for example, in the eating of certain prohibited foods), have never held us in check. To yield a point to the foolish scruples of a weak saints is easy. We do so with a good-humoured smile, and the matter is ended. Not so with Paul. As a Hebrew, as an Israelite, as a Pharisee, as a zealot for tradition, the question of clean and unclean meats was a vital one. It touched his nation's peculiar sanctity. It involved his place in the covenant of the God of his fathers. Nothing but a miracle could have delivered Saul, the Hebrew, from the slavery of such scruples, and nothing but a miracle could have turned him into Paul the Champion of Liberty. Again and again, in Galatians, in Corinthians, in Colossians, Paul strikes the note of freedom. The observance of days; the question of meat offered to idols; the question as to whether such meat had been killed according to the rules of the Rabbis; from all such legal observances Paul stood gloriously free. And yet—and yet—he who was free; he who fought, as no one since has fought, for the perpetuation of that freedom to the Gentiles; he, the one whose boast it was that all things were now lawful, it is he that willingly circumscribes his blood-bought liberties. It is he who does not enter into all the opening avenues of freedom. He remembers that he had been set free by self-denying love, the love of Christ.

> "Let us not therefore judge one another any more: but judge this rather, that no man put a stumblingblock or an occasion to fall in his brother's way. I know, and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus, that there is nothing unclean of itself: but to him that esteemeth any thing to be unclean, to him it is unclean. But if thy brother be grieved with thy meat, now walkest thou not according to love. Destroy not him with thy meat, for whom Christ died . . . . . it is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor any thing whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak" (Rom. xiv. 13-15, 21).

Again in I Corinthians the Apostle writes:--

> "All things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient: all things are lawful for me, but all things edify not. Let no man seek his own, but every man another's wealth. Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, that eat, asking no question for conscience sake, for the earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof . . . . . but if any man say unto you, This is offered in sacrifice unto idols, eat not for his sake that shewed it, and for conscience sake: for the earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof. Conscience, I say, not thine own, but of the other . . . . . not seeking mine own profit" (I Cor. x. 23-33).

How strange that the apostle of freedom should be the one to plead for self-imposed restrictions! He who knew that all things were lawful, voluntarily refrained from exercising his privileges. Yet it is not strange to those who have glimpsed the lodestar that ever drew the Apostle on. "The love of Christ constraineth me", he said, and if love, then it must at times "deny itself" to justify itself. For love not only gives, but gives itself. It not only gives, but "spares not".

Here, then, is another feature in the portrait of the man sent by the Lord to the Gentiles.

#11. Separate Features: Impatience of formalism, joined with forbearance.
pp. 159 - 161

> "Here we see . . . . . that impatience of exclusive formalism with which he overwhelms the Judaizers of Galatia, joined with a forbearance so gentle for the innocent weakness of scrupulous conscience." (Conybeare and Howson).

Impatience usually spells disaster, is a sign of weakness, and is scarcely Christian in its connections. Throughout his epistles the Apostle practices and preaches patience, yet it is no contradiction to speak of his impatience, as is done in the above quotation.

Can we not speak of the "impatience" of the God of all long-suffering, when He says in Isa. i. concerning Judah's "exclusive formalism":

> "Bring no more vain oblations; incense is an abomination unto Me; the new moons and sabbaths, the calling of assemblies, I cannot away with; it is iniquity, even the solemn meeting. Your new moons and your appointed feasts My soul hateth; they are a trouble unto Me; I am weary to bear them" (Isa. i. 13, 14).

This divine impatience is evident throughout the epistle to the Galatians. In the eyes of the Apostle, so intolerable are the inroads of the Judaizers that he is moved to indite the epistle in a manner altogether unusual for him. He omits to praise the Galatians for anything; he omits to thank God for them in any particular. So impatient is he to get at the root of the trouble, so intolerable does it appear that there should have been preached "another gospel", that he scarcely stops to say, Amen (verse 5) before plunging into the heart of the controversy.

> "I marvel that ye are so soon removed from him that called you into the grace of Christ unto another gospel" (Gal. i. 6).

For so doing, even an angel from heaven would merit his anathema. In his impatience with the exclusive formalism that would impose its empty ritual upon the Lord's freemen Peter is withstood to the face and apostles are called "somewhats".

> "O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you" (Gal. iii. 1) he cries.
> "Are ye so foolish? having begun in the spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh?" (Gal. iii. 3).
> "After that ye have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage?" (Gal. iv. 9).
> "Behold, I Paul say unto you, that if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing" (Gal. v. 2).
> "I would they were even cut off which trouble you" (Gal. v. 12).

Here is impatience that is to be envied.

> "Such", says Farrar, "was the epistle to the Galatians; nor can we without some knowledge of what Judaism then was, and what it was daily becoming, form any adequate conception of the daring courage, the splendid originality—let us rather say the inspired and inspiring faith—which enabled the apostle thus to throw off the yoke of immemorial traditions, and to defy the hatred of those among whom he had been trained as a Hebrew and a Pharisee."

Side by side with this burning impatience is seen that gentles forbearance with which it is joined, and which saves it from harshness and selfishness.

> "Brethren, I beseech you, be as I am, for I am as ye are: ye have not injured me at all. Ye know that through infirmity of the flesh I preached the gospel unto you at the first. And my temptation which was in my flesh ye despised not, nor rejected; but received me as an angel of God, even as Christ Jesus . . . . . Am I therefore become your enemy, because I tell you the truth?" (Gal. iv. 12-16).

The Apostle calls the Galatians his "little children", and speaks of travailing in birth again until Christ be formed in them (Gal. iv. 19).

After another attack upon legalism (Gal. iv. 21 - v. 26) he again addresses them as brethren, and again reveals the other side of his character.

> "Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted. Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ" (Gal. vi. 1, 2).

This alternation of the severe with the tender continues to the end of the epistle. The Apostle takes the pen from the amanuensis and with his own hand restates his charge against those who "desire to make a fair show in the flesh" yet, while so utterly repudiating circumcision, he writes:

> "For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature. And as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God" (Gal. vi. 15, 16).

We can be sure that Paul's fight was for "the truth of the gospel". He was not a fault-finder; rather would he exercise that toleration which turns a blind eye upon matters of small account. When the blow fell, one realized that it was merited; the subject was serious; that fundamentals were at stake. He cared for no party; "neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision"; he travailed again in birth for the forming of Christ; he stood upon the same level as the outcast Gentile—"Be as I am, for I am as ye are"—that is, dead to the law, and alive unto God through Christ (Gal. ii. 19).

Who could be angry at impatience which exhibited such patent selflessness? Whether in gentleness, forbearance, or impatience this man sought only the believer's highest and best.

#12. Separate Features: Tender Grief.
pp. 199, 200

> "Here we see . . . . . that grief for the sins of others, which moved him to tears when he spoke of the enemies of the cross of Christ, 'of whom I tell you even weeping'." (Conybeare and Howson).

The man who could stand as Paul stood before the Council at Jerusalem (Acts xv.; Gal. ii.) must have had the heart of a lion. In the man who could endure for Christ's sake that list of troubles about which Paul so reluctantly speaks in II Cor. xi., there was enough material to have made a dozen heroes. The man who spoke as Paul spoke at Mars' Hill; who was willing to preach the gospel at Rome; who, in spite of rejection and betrayal, stood unashamed at the end of his course; who could say, "None of these things move me"; that man, by the grace that was given him, was as firm as a rock and as true as steel. But while opposition and misrepresentation left him undismayed and unmoved, the many failings and follies of his family in the faith often brought tears to his eyes.

The fact that the Apostle drew near to the close of the early ministry that he had received and was about to enter into the ministry which was associated with bonds and afflictions (Acts xx. 23), by no means indicated that "tears" would be a new experience and learned only in prison, for, in summarizing the ministry that had occupied Acts ix.-xx., the Apostle could say:

> "Serving the Lord with all humility of mind, and with many tears, and temptations, which befell me by the lying in wait of the Jews" (Acts xx. 19).

While Paul could remain unmoved at the prospect of prison, or even death, for Christ's sake, he was exceedingly moved by the tears of the saints who sought to dissuade him from his purpose. It is recorded:

> "Then Paul answered, What mean ye to weep and to break mine heart? for I am ready not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus" (Acts xxi. 13).

Paul also remembered the tears shed by others. He writes to Timothy:

> "Greatly desiring to see thee, being mindful of thy tears, that I may be filled with joy" (II Tim. i. 4).

In his counsel to the church at Rome he wrote:

> "Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep" (Rom. xii. 15).

although, some time earlier, in a different context, he had said:

> "The time is short: it remaineth that both they that have wives be as though they had none; and they that weep, as though they wept not" (I Cor. vii. 29, 30).

While weeping was far more common in Eastern lands than in our own, and not considered a sign of weakness, to be hidden or repressed, there is nothing in the Apostle's mind or manifested in his character which is indicative of weak or maudlin sentimentality. He would have been as severe a critic of the lachrymose preacher as any to-day, but he could not refrain from tears, nor did he attempt to hide the fact, when he wrote to the Philippians warning them of the evil example of those who were minding "earthly things". If not repudiated, such conduct would do for the Philippians what the mixed multitude did for Israel—cause them to lose the prize.

It is enough to make one weep to-day to see how many different ways the evil one has of cheating the believer of his reward, and perhaps the one most used, is the denial, falsely put forward as in the interests of grace, that there is a prize to be won or a reward to be lost, and that in spite of Phil. iii. 14 and Col. ii. 18; iii. 24.

We feel sure that the Apostle shed more tears over others than he ever shed for himself. Trials and troubles that come from the world are not unexpected; it is the "lying in wait of the Jews", his own countrymen; the attacks of ignorant brethren; the slanders created by envy and spite, where love and appreciation should have been found; these, and the sins of the Lord's people, were the cause of the Apostle's weeping. In all this he followed the steps of his Lord. The chapter in John's Gospel that contains one of the mightiest of Christ's self-revelations also contains the most human of all:

> "I am the resurrection, and the life" (John xi. 25).
> "Jesus wept" (John xi. 35).

And so the tears of Paul blend with his lion-like courage, and help us to understand the grip that such a man had upon hearts that were attuned to the same grace that saved, moved, kept, and empowered himself.

#13. Separate Features: Freedom from jealousy.
pp. 225, 226

> "Here we see . . . . . that noble freedom from jealousy with which he speaks of those who, out of rivalry to himself, preach Christ, even of envy and strife, supposing to add affliction to his bonds, What then? Notwithstanding, every way, Christ is preached; and I therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice" (Conybeare and Howson).

The cause of jealousy is the safeguarding of that which belongs to self. It is with perfect right that God can be jealous that the love and faithfulness of His people shall not be delivered from His Own glorious Person, but mortal man can seldom be moved to jealousy without sin. What was it that enabled the apostle to rise above this besetting sin? The answer is that he had within him something that had taken the place of self. In another part of the same chapter from which Conybeare and Howson quote in the above extract, he says:

> "Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether it be by life, or by death. For to me to live is Christ" (Phil. i. 20, 21).

Christ had taken the place of self, so that Paul was enabled to look away from the cruel envy that could even preach Christ with the object of adding affliction to his bonds, to the simple and single fact that Christ was preached. There he could rest. He would go not a step further. Whether out of love or out of envy, one feature was common—Christ was preached, and therein, said Paul, he would rejoice. In such circumstances it was impossible to add afflictions to his bonds. No man can be hurt by an external thing of this character: it is only as he "feels" the attack, the envious word, the cruel look, that it can hurt. In physical things it is not easy to avoid feeling a blow, for one function of the sense of touch is to give protection. But, in spiritual things, the heart can be so taken up with the things of Christ as to be almost insensible to such evil intentions of the enemy. This is indeed a "noble freedom". If, at the apparent triumph of his rivals, Paul had been moved by jealousy, all his boasted freedom, all the liberty of which he was the champion, would have been nothing worth. As it was, the stone walls of a Roman prison or the presence of a Roman guard in his own hired house, could not make the Lord's free man a slave, but evil thoughts entertained within his breast, self-enthroned, instead of Christ, that would have made Paul a bondslave, even though he walked at liberty among the free of the earth.

> "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city" (Prov. xvi. 32).

While the Apostle manifested such disinterestedness when the matter concerned himself, when the Lord's people were the subject of attack or deception, he could be moved to great depths of feeling:

> "Would to God ye could bear with me a little in my folly, and indeed bear with me. For I am jealous over you with a godly jealousy: for I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present a chaste virgin to Christ" (II Cor. xi. 1, 2).

Throughout the O.T. the relationship of Israel with the Lord is as a wife to a husband. Idolatry is regarded as adultery, and over and over again God speaks of His jealousy because of Israel's unfaithfulness. Here, during the Acts period, the company which bride is associated with the heavenly city, and those who followed in the steps of the faith of Abraham, whether Jews or Gentiles, would share with Abraham that bridal city. It was with a jealous eye that the Apostle looked upon the preachers of "another" gospel. Such were doing the self-same work as the Serpent in Eden. These deceitful workers transformed themselves in order to have the appearance of the apostles of Christ, while in reality they were the agents of Satan who transformed himself into an angel of light.

Paul's godly jealousy, noting the fact that the deception was associated with false apostleship, led him on to be "a fool in his boasting". He opens the chapter with a reference to his folly (II Cor. xi. 1). He supposes that he was not a whit behind the chiefest of the apostles (II Cor. xi. 5). Over and over again in this passage he calls himself a fool and his boasting foolish (xi. 16, 17, 21, 23; xii. 11). What the Apostle would not have revealed, even under the severest pressure, he does reveal out of godly jealousy for the name of the Lord. He will boast of his sufferings, of his shipwreck, of his stripes, though repeatedly interjecting that in doing so he was acting as a fool, but the spring of his action was jealousy for the Lord; mere personal jealousy was not found in him. Not only is this manifest in Phil. i., but, in his association with such as Apollos, no word gives the remotest suggestion that Paul was jealous of the eloquence or the acceptance of Apollos at Corinth. Who then is Paul? said he, Who is Apollos? but ministers by whom ye believed. The glory, even as the grace, was the Lord's.

Where the believer can say, "For me to live is Christ", there can be, and there will be, a complete absence of personal jealousy, and, side by side with this absence, there will be a real godly jealousy for the truth and the saints entrusted to one's care. Where selfish jealousy rules, godly jealousy will wane; where love of pre-eminence is found, there also will be a casting out of the saint, and slackness concerning the Lord's honour.

Once more, to borrow an expression, what "a myriad minded man" the apostle Paul was, and what an honour it is to be associated in any way with the truth for which he lived and died.

"Tempted in all points like as we are"
(Heb. iv. 15)

(This article and the three that follow are based upon one of the afternoon expositions given at the Chapel of the Opened Book.)

#1. pp. 78 - 81

"For we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin" (Heb. iv. 15).

How are we to interpret the words "in all points"? How are we to understand the sequel "yet without sin"? How does this passage influence our understanding concerning the sinlessness of the Man Christ Jesus?

There have been those who have argued that the presence of the words "in all points", implies the inclusion of every temptation which besets mankind, and, in consequence, have been driven by the irresistible force of logic to affirm that He must therefore have had a "fallen nature", even though He actually "did no sin". The seriousness of the subject will be felt by all. To most of our readers, the teaching that the Saviour had a "fallen" nature would come as a shock. Moreover, the believer himself is involved, for he cannot be unmoved by the consequences of the examination of the words "tempted in all points like as we are".

In order therefore to discover the scope of the argument that contains these pregnant words, we propose an examination of the epistle to the Hebrews and, following that, an examination of other passages where the words "tempt" and "temptation" are used, so that, if possible, we may arrive at a scriptural understanding both of the range of temptation indicated in Heb. iv. 15 and the meaning, origin and different forms of temptation, as indicated by the usage of the word in Hebrews and in other parts of the New Testament.

The scope of any passage of Scripture is indicated by its literary structure, and most of our readers already possess the structure of the epistle to the Hebrews, which is set out in full in Volume XX, page 128. For our present purpose we will lift out two corresponding members only, because in them are found every occurrence of the words "tempt" and "temptation" found in the epistle.

B	Heb. iii.-vi. ON TO PERFECTION.	Let us come boldly. Example of unbelief.
	"The Profession" (Homologia) (iii. 1; iv. 14).	Perfect v. babes. No renewal unto repentance. Senses exercised. Crucify afresh the Son.
	* * * * *
B	x. 19 - xii. 25. BACK TO PERDITION.	Let us draw near. Example of faith.
	"The Profession" (Homologia/eo) (x. 23; xi. 13).	Sons v. firstborn. No place for repentance. Discipline exercised. Trod under foot the Son.

There can be no question but that these two sections very closely correspond with one another, and if they contain all the occurrences of "tempt" and "temptation" that are to be found in the epistle to the Hebrews, then those temptations must be intimately related to the ideas of "perfection" and perdition"; with "going on", or with "drawing back". When we come to consider the smaller portion of Hebrews that contains the passage under review, we discover that its historic background is the story of Israel's failure in the wilderness; a failure to "go on unto perfection", with which the words "tempt" and "temptation" are closely interwoven.

Hebrews ii. 17 - iv. 16.

A	ii. 17 - iii. 1. Tempted. Succour. Profession.
B	iii. 2 - iv. 11	"IF" The TEMPTATION.
		"IF" They TEMPTED ME.
A	iv. 12-16. Tempted. Help. Profession.

It will be seen that Heb. iv. 15 is an integral part of this larger context, and no interpretation is therefore valid that ignores or contravenes the general direction of the teaching of the larger context. A "profession" is in view; something to "hold fast"; something involving trial and self-denial; something that may be lost. Further, with the structure before us, it is impossible to isolate Heb. iv. 15; we must keep in mind the temptation mentioned in chapter iii.

"Your fathers tempted ME" (Heb. iii. 9), said God. Now whatever questionable views we may entertain concerning the temptations to which our Lord was subjected in the days of His flesh, no such thoughts are possible when we consider the words "Your fathers tempted ME". It is not only repugnant to common sense, but contrary to positive Scripture, that God can, by any possibility, be "tempted" to, or by, evil. "God cannot be tempted with evil" is the categorical statement of Holy Writ (James i. 13); consequently we are immediately faced with a fact concerning "temptation" that must influence our views of Heb. ii. 18 and iv. 15.

If we have continued the quotation of Heb. iii. 9 we should have read, "When your fathers tempted Me, proved Me, and saw My works forty years". "Proved" is dokimazo,

"To test, try, as a metal". This meaning is borne out by the passages in Heb. xi., "By faith Abraham, when he was TRIED (peirazo, "tempted"), offered up Isaac" (xi. 17). Shall we say that God tempted Abraham to sin when he made the great demand concerning Isaac? God forbid! because Scripture positively declares that God never tempts man to sin (James i. 13) and also because a reading of Gen. xxii. reveals that this "temptation" was a "testing" of Abraham's faith, "Now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son from Me" (Gen. xxii. 12).

The contexts of the references to temptation in Heb. ii. and iv. introduce such words as "succour", "sympathy" ("cannot be touched with"), "infirmities", but we can scarcely speak of "sympathy" and "infirmities" when we speak of "sin" as it appears in Scripture.

The word translated "succour" (Heb. ii. 18) and "help" (Heb. iv. 16) occurs once more in Heb. xiii. 6, "So that we may boldly say, The Lord is my Helper". This is associated, not with "sin" or "forgiveness", but with the promise that the believer would never be forsaken and in connection with "what man shall do" unto us, not what we might inadvertently do ourselves.

Another word which occurs in Hebrews must be included in our examination and that is the word peira. This occurs twice in Hebrews:

> "By faith they passed through the Read Sea as by dry land, which the Egyptians assaying (making the attempt) to do, were drowned" (Heb. xi. 29).
> "Others had trial of cruel mockings and scourgings" (Heb. xi. 36).

In neither passage can the idea of "tempting" be discovered. In the first passage "attempt" gives good English and incidentally reveals that, in our own mother-tongue, the word "tempt" means a "trial" or "ATtempt". The other reference (Heb. xi. 37) is but a variant of the word translated "tempted", and needs no comment.

To complete the tale of occurrences of peirazo in Hebrews, one more reference must be included. In Heb. v. 13 we find the negative, apeiros, where it is translated "unskillful", which accords with the classical rendering "untried" and "inexperienced" and with the LXX usage.

> "Surely they shall not see the land which I sware to their fathers; but their children which are with Me here, as many as know not good or evil, every inexperienced (apeiros) youth, to them will I give the land" (Numb. xiv. 23).

The reader will recognize the influence of this LXX rendering in Heb. v. 13, 14, where the unskillful "babe" is contrasted with the "perfect", who discerns "good and evil".

As they stand, the words, "yet without sin", in Heb. iv. 15, suggest to the English reader, "yet without sin*ning*", as if our Lord was actually tempted to steal, to murder, to commit adultery, but resisted. We only allow ourselves to write this in order to bring this doctrine and its consequences into the light, for there is no necessity so to translate or interpret the words choris hamartias. In his Lexicon choris is rendered by Dr. Bullinger

"apart; asunder". It comes from chorizo, "to put asunder", "to separate", as in Matt. xix. 6 and Rom. viii. 39. In Hebrews itself we read, concerning the Saviour, that He was "holy, harmless, undefiled, separate (chorizo) from sinners" (Heb. vii. 26).

Dr. John Owen quotes the Syriac Version of Heb. iv. 15 as reading "sin being excepted". J. N. Darby and Rotherham read "apart from sin".

The positive witness of the epistle to the Hebrews as a whole, and of this expression in particular, is that the temptation referred to in the words "tempted in all points" refers to the testings and trials of the pilgrim on his journey through the wilderness of this world, as he presses on to perfection; it does not refer to, or include, those temptations to sin which are only possible to those who have within them the effects of the fall.

This feature, however, we must consider in our next article. For the present let us rejoice that there is no trial that the believer can experience in relation to his "profession" as a pilgrim and stranger, that His Lord does not fully know, with which He does not fully sympathize, and for which there is not ample provision.

#2. pp. 110 - 113

Our examination of the usage of the words "tempt" and "temptation" in the epistle to the Hebrews left us with no doubt but that the Apostle had in mind the temptations that beset "pilgrims and strangers" in maintaining their "confession" or "profession", and that the words "Tempted in all points like as we are" are limited to that aspect of truth. It would be neither fair nor sound exegesis to suppose that there is no other aspect of this subject in the Scriptures. In order, therefore, to present the teaching of the Word as completely as possible, let us consider further aspects of this theme.

As we have commenced with an epistle addressed to the Hebrews, let us continue with the epistles of The Dispersion, namely, that of James and those of Peter, and see whether these introduce a different line of teaching from that of the epistle to the Hebrews.

"My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptation" (James i. 2).

It would be strange indeed if the believer who fell into all manner of temptations to do evil, should count it "all joy", but it is clear that temptation of this kind is far from the mind of James, for he immediately goes on to say "knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience" (James i. 3); and, like the epistle to the Hebrews, associates this tempting, or trying, with "perfection"—"Let patience have here perfect work" (Jas. i. 4).

After speaking of a double-minded man, who is unstable in all his ways, and of the danger of pride, he uses a figure that takes our minds back to the Gospels; "For the sun is no sooner risen with a burning heat, but it withereth" (James i. 11), a passage that recalls the parable of Luke viii. 13: "They on the rock are they, which, when they hear, receive the word with joy; and these have no root, which for a while believe, and in time of temptation fall away." The withering of the burning heat of the sun (Matt. xiii. 6; Mark iv. 5, 6), is likened to "affliction or persecution for the word's sake" (Mark iv. 17). This being the case, we are prepared to find, and do find, a reference to temptation similar to that found in Hebrews:

> "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation; for when he is tried (or having become approved, dokimos), he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love Him" (James i. 12).

The introduction of the words "approved" and "crown" brings the passage into line with the epistle to the Hebrews, which also urges the believer to endure and to run with patience the race set before him, and which more than once speaks of reward for such conduct.

James now turns to the aspect of temptation that arises from, and leads to, sin.

> "Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God; for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth He any man" (James i. 13).

If these words be taken literally, we are immediately faced with a problem, for we get the two contrary statements, "Neither tempteth He any man" (James i. 13), and "God did tempt Abraham" (Gen. xxii. 1). But this is the case only if the words be taken literally, for the reader of the Scriptures will probably be aware that throughout the Old and New Testaments there appears a figure of speech called Ellipsis, or "Omission", and that in many passages the sense is found by supplying by repetition a word that has already gone before. If in James i. 13 we repeat the governing clause, "with evil", all will be clear. "Let no man say when he is tempted (to do evil things), I am tempted of God; for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth He any man (with evil)". This, however, is negative; the positive follows, "But every man is tempted (to do evil things) when he is drawn away of his own lust and enticed" (James i. 14).

That these two aspects of temptation are in mind in the epistle of James is evident, for he could not teach, "My brethren, count it all joy when ye shall fall into divers temptations, and are led away by your own lust, and enticed, bringing forth sin and ending in death" (James i. 2, 14, 15), yet such must be the implication of James i. 2 if there be no difference between that testing which comes from God, and is associated with going on unto perfection, and those temptations that spring from our own depravity.

Returning to the positive teaching of James i. 14 let us note its bearing upon the text, "He was tempted in all points like as we are". It is one thing for a congregation to stand and say, "We are all miserable offenders", and quite another for one member to stand and publicly confess that he is a "thief". In the same way it is one thing to quote the passage from Heb. iv., which says that Christ was tempted in all points like as we are, and quite another to be specific and say that Christ was actually tempted to steal. What is it that causes the presence of an unprotected pound note to be a temptation to a man? Is it an outside temptation or is it something within? It is difficult, without a feeling of irreverence, for us to bring our Lord into this controversy: let us therefore take a step down and cite two fellow-beings as examples. First, the "chief of sinners", Paul, the Apostle. Is it conceivable that, had Paul entered a synagogue and found the place unattended, the presence of a piece of money lying uncollected would be the slightest temptation to him? Our answer must be "No". The second example, dear reader, is yourself. Were you to come into the Chapel of the Opened Book and discover that the offering had not been taken charge of by the Treasurer, would that be a temptation to you to steal? You rightly repudiate the thought. Why? Because the grace of God and the gift of the new nature make temptation of that kind virtually impossible.

So we return to the Lord Himself. As He had no corrupt and depraved nature, He could never be "led away" by lust and enticed and, that being the case, no amount of emphasis upon the words "in all points" can ever teach the evil and destructive doctrine we have been considering. The very presence of temptation to sin pre-supposes evil already within. He, the Saviour, could mingle with publicans and sinners and remain undefiled. Contrary to all law, He could touch a leper and remain immune. We might as well consider that a sunbeam gathers contamination by shining on a rubbish heap as that, even in the presence of the most gilded opportunity, Christ could be tempted to sin.

It is possible that the reader's mind may have turned back to Gen. iii. and questioned how far all that we have said would apply there. For the moment, our answer is that the words "tempt", "temptation" and "tempter" are never once used of the Fall of Man, in either the Old Testament or New and, therefore, believing in the inspiration of all Scripture, we must abide by this fact and exclude the passage from our present considerations.

Turning to the other Circumcision epistles we find that Peter alone uses the word peirasmos, translated "temptation", and that three times.

> "Wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations" (I Pet. i. 6).

Let us note: these tempted believers are, at the same time, "greatly rejoicing" in salvation; the temptations are "for a season" and "if need be", and as a result they are "in heaviness", or as the word is elsewhere translated, "grieved" (Eph. iv. 30); "sorrowful" (II Cor. vi. 10). It sounds a contradiction to say that a believer who thus rejoiced, and who was thus grieved, could at the same time be yielding to, or tempted to, actual sin. But we have no need to interpose on our conjectures, for Peter himself goes on to expand and explain his meaning. "That the trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and honour and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 7). Here, "That" is "In order that"; "trial" is to dokimion, "the proof after testing", and the result of the trial, "praise and honour and glory" at the appearing of the Lord. It is utterly impossible to import temptation to sin into I Pet. i. 6. It is the trial of faith that is in view. If it were needed, the fullest confirmation of this interpretation is contained in I Pet. iv. 12.

> "Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you: but rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings: that, when His glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy. If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye . . . . . let none of you suffer as a murderer, or as a thief . . . . ." (I Pet. iv. 12-15).

This passage is so eloquent in the distinction which it makes between temptation as a test and temptation to sin that we add no word of our own, except to say that the "trial" here, which is called "fiery" and is a partaking of Christ's "sufferings" (not at all being led away by evil things), is the translation of the Greek word peirasmos.

The only other reference is that of II Pet. ii. 9,

> "The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly our of temptations."

The context of this statement speaks of the deliverance of "just Lot", who escaped the overthrow of the cities of Sodom and Gomorrha, which overthrow was an ensample of the fate that awaits the ungodly.

It is clear by this examination that the epistles of the circumcision use the word "temptation" consistently, and always in the sense of trial; not in the sense of enticement to sin.

Before we can come to a scriptural conclusion, we shall have to consider the teaching of the apostle Paul in his other epistles, the Acts, the Gospels and the Book of The Revelation. What we have already seen, however, is truth, and must ever be in mind when we stress the words of Heb. iv. 15, "tempted in all points like as we are".

#3. pp. 161 - 164

So far, our studies in the epistles to the Hebrews and by James and Peter reveal the fact that the character of "temptation" as there found is the testing and proving of the believer on his way to perfection, not temptation to sin, whether by Satan or self.

We now turn to the remaining epistles of Paul to see how far this presentation of the truth obtains there, and what other phases are brought forward. Adopting what we believe to be the chronological order of the epistles, we commence with Galatians. There are two references, one concerning Paul himself and the other spiritual believers.

> "And my temptation (peirasmos) which was in my flesh ye despised not, nor rejected" (Gal. iv. 14).

In verse 13 the Apostle speaks of the "infirmity of the flesh" in connection with his preaching. A literal rendering of the verse suggests that the Apostle had preached the gospel while he was passing "through a period of sickness or infirmity", and that in spite of the fact that this "temptation" or "trial" (apparently ophthalmia, verse 15) had rendered him despicable and loathsome in appearance, the Galatians had received him as "an angel of God, even as Christ Jesus". It is beyond belief that, had this "temptation" in the flesh had any connection with sin, the Galatian Christians would have so received him.

We pass on to the second and only other occurrence in the epistle:

> "Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted" (Gal. vi. 1).

Ignoring the chapter division and reading this first verse as a continuation of the subject of the previous chapter, we shall find that "meekness" is a "fruit of the spirit", and the "spiritual" brethren of Gal. vi. 1 are exhorted to restore a fallen brother in the "spirit of meekness". What this spirit involves is made evident by the words, "considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted". It is evident that the "temptation" against which these brethren are here warned is one of pride and confidence, as they contrast themselves with the erring brother; not a test of faith, but a temptation to spiritual pride, which is sin. This, then, is the first passage we have met that uses the word in this sense. But is it the teaching of Scripture that our Saviour ever needed this warning against spiritual pride? Surely the words, "God forbid!" arise in most minds at such a thought.

We must next examine I Thessalonians. Paul was solicitous for the believers left at Thessalonica, and had sent Timothy to comfort them concerning the faith, his object being "that no man should be moved by these afflictions", for he had himself warned them that "we are appointed thereunto", and that "we should suffer tribulation". It is in this context that we meet the only occurrences of peirazo.

> "For this cause, when I could no longer forbear, I sent to know your faith, lest by some means the tempter have tempted you, and our labour be in vain" (I Thess. iii. 5).

There is no thought here of temptation to commit sin (to steal, to lie, to commit adultery); it is a temptation relating to The Faith.

Macknight expands the passage as follows:

> "For this reason also, no longer bearing my anxiety on your account, I sent Timothy to know your faith, fearing lest, by the calumnies propagated concerning me, as having no real affection for you, the devil may have tempted you to think me an impostor, who, in preaching to you, had my own interest only in view, and so my labours in converting you have become fruitless."

This idea, together with the reference to being "moved by afflictions" and the inevitableness of tribulation, show that it was the fear of their yielding under great external pressure, not to internal lust and desire, that had aroused the Apostle's concern.

The next occurrences are found in the epistles to the Corinthians. They are five in number and we will cite them together.

> "Defraud ye not one the other, except it be with consent for a time, that ye may give yourselves to fasting and prayer; and come together again, that Satan tempt you not for your inconsistency" (I Cor. vii. 5).
>
> "Neither let us tempt Christ, as some of them also tempted, and were destroyed of serpents" (I Cor. x. 9).
>
> "There hath no temptation taken you but such as is common to man: but God is faithful, Who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it" (I Cor. x. 13).
>
> "Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith" (II Cor. xiii. 5).

It is not our immediate purpose to give a detailed exposition of every use of these passages. What we are primarily concerned with is the question that arises from the statement that Christ was tempted in all points like as we are. So far as I Cor. vii. 5 is concerned, no point arises. The passages cited in I Cor. x. deal with the provocation in the wilderness already examined in connection with Heb. iii. and iv. In I Cor. x. 9 the word "tempt", in the opening phrase, "Neither let us tempt Christ", is ekpeirazo, "To try out", and is used in the N.T. always in a bad sense (only other occurrences Matt. iv. 7; Luke iv. 12, x. 25). By no method of interpretation can the call of the Apostle to the Corinthians in II Cor. xiii. 5 "to examine" themselves be made to refer to what we commonly understand by "temptation", so we pass on to the remaining occurrence in Paul's epistles, which is I Tim. vi. 9.

> "They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lists, which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is a root of all evil: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows."

Timothy is urged to "flee these things", and reminded that he had "professed a good profession", and also of "Christ Jesus, Who before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good confession".

While Timothy would be strengthened as he kept before him the constant and unswerving integrity of the Saviour, there is not a word that would suggest that he would find comfort in the thought that even his Lord, at times, was tempted by riches and the love of money! Truly, the Saviour was "pierced through with many sorrows", but these were for sins "laid on Him", not for any "love" of hurtful things within Him.

The word translated "to pierce through" is the Greek peripeiro, used by Josephus in his record of the Wars of the Jews in the sentence, "They were pierced through on all sides with Roman darts". Here it will be seen that the "temptation" of verse 9 becomes the "probe" of verse 10, and sheds further light upon the primary meaning of all the words translated "tempt".

Temptations to sin arise from within. Money, the external thing, is useful and innocuous; the "love" of it is resident, not in the money itself, but in the heart. In themselves riches are useful and of value, but he who "wills to be rich" falls into a temptation and snare—it is the "will", not the riches; the "love", not the money, that constitutes the snare.

It is contrary to the teaching of Scripture to affirm that when a Christian falls into such temptations he can count on the "sympathy" of the Saviour. In such circumstances he needs, not sympathy and succour, but forgiveness and restoration. To expect sympathy after being ensnared by hurtful lusts is to hold a very low estimate of the enormity of sin or of the attitude of the Saviour towards it. In the temptations that assail the believer in his journey through the wilderness that intervenes between initial conversion and the attainment of "perfection", he will always receive sympathetic help, for it was temptation of this character that the Saviour shared and endured.

We now have the Gospels, the Acts, and the Revelation to examine, and then every occurrence of "temptation" will have been surveyed. In the light of all that we have learned on the subject it will then be our responsibility to entertain sound conceptions of this most important subject; important because it affects both the doctrine of the Saviour's unfallen and sinless humanity, and the nature of the temptations that come from God.

#4. pp. 201 - 204

We have examined the teaching of all the Epistles on the subject of temptation, and to complete the survey there now remain the Gospels, the Acts and the Revelation. For our present purpose there will be no point in giving separate consideration to the three accounts of the temptation of Christ in the wilderness, or of the three records of "The Lord's prayer". The Gospel according to Matthew will provide a full account, and we need only to consider in the other Gospels any statement regarding temptation that may be peculiar to any one of those Gospels.

Taking the occurrences in order of their appearance, we come first to the temptation of the Saviour as recorded in Matthew:

> "Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil . . . and when the tempter came to Him, he said, If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread. But He answered and said, It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God" (Matt. iv. 4).

The heavens had just opened and the voice had been heard saying, "This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased", and the first temptation is based upon the declaration.

Every experience through which the Saviour passed was for our sakes, for He needed not the testing, the suffering, the agony or the cross, for anything of, or for, Himself alone.

Adam had failed in a garden of plenty; Christ prevailed in a wilderness of want. Moreover, the Lord was in special relationship with Israel. This ancient people had been tested in the wilderness in connection with "bread", and had succumbed. They had murmured about the provision made for them; they had expressed their doubt as to whether God could provide "flesh to eat" (Numb. xi. 4); they "tempted" God; they failed.

The quotation with which our Lord had withstood the tempter was a passage from Deut. viii.:

> "And thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee these forty years (the Saviour had fasted 'forty days') in the wilderness (LXX eremos, as in Matt. iv. 1), to humble thee, and to prove (LXX peirazo, 'tempt', 'try') thee, to know what was in thine heart . . . . . He suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna . . . . . that He might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live" (Deut. viii. 2, 3).

As on a later occasion, so here, the Saviour could say: "The prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in Me" (John xiv. 30). The trials of Israel in the wilderness were to reveal what was in their heart; the temptation of the Son of God showed that there was no desire in His heart that ran counter to the will of Him that sent Him. He was indeed the beloved Son, in Whom the Father was well pleased.

As indicated in the preceding article, the rejoinder to the second temptation emphasizes the word ekpeirazo, "to try out" (Matt. iv. 7), pages 164-168. The Son of God could neither be tempted by the devil, nor would He tempt the One that sent Him.

This brief comment on so weighty a theme is obviously too meager to be regarded as an attempt to explain the full significance of this initial trial of our Lord, but we cannot attempt more here. At the moment all that we are doing is reviewing the occurrences of the words "tempt" and "temptation", and endeavouring to discover their significance.

The next reference is found in the Sermon on the Mount, in the prayer which the Lord taught His disciples: "And lead us not into temptation" (Matt. vi. 13). What does this petition mean? The words are uttered over and over again by those who use "the Lord's prayer" in public and private, yet it is not uncharitable to affirm that very few could give an intelligent reason for the prayer.

In this same prayer is another petition, which, on the surface, seems simple enough. "Give us this day our daily bread" (Matt. vi. 11). Yet scholars have written reams of explanations of the prayer, for it is a strange fact that the word translated "daily"—"the torment of theologians and grammarians"—is a word unknown elsewhere in the Scriptures. It is epiousios. For some reason yet to be sought the Saviour was under the necessity of coining a word to express His meaning, consequently, such a simply, every-day, idea as "daily" cannot be the translation of this strange word. The word is most evidently composed of the preposition epi, "upon", and eimi. Now eimi is usually to be understood as representing the verb "to be", but it has a secondary meaning, "to go or to come". It means here, in epiousios, "to come upon", and is a most obvious allusion to the Manna which came upon Israel in the wilderness.

What is there in this prayer that demands such strange petitions as these two, the one regarding "bread that cometh down", and the other regarding "temptation"? We answer, if the prayer is related, not to the church but to the setting up of the kingdom, a solution of the problem may be found, for it involves consideration of the state of affairs that will usher in the Day of the Lord which precedes the setting up of the kingdom.

In the book of the Revelation the church at Philadelphia is given this promise:

> "Because thou hast kept the word of My patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation (peirasmos), which shall come upon all the world, to try (peirazo) them that dwell upon the earth" (Rev. iii. 10).

Those therefore who wait for the setting up of the kingdom upon earth; who live in that day of fierce trial; could, with this promise before them, appropriately pray, "Lead us not into temptation". During this same period, some of the people of Israel are to be nourished by God in the wilderness "for a time, and times, and half a time" (a cryptic reference to the three and half years of the tribulation mentioned elsewhere in the Revelation) "from the face of the serpent" (Rev. xii. 14). In that period and in those circumstances this company could pray with meaning, "Give us this day the bread that cometh down upon us".

Further exposition of these themes is not called for in this series; it is sufficient if we have "placed" the occurrence of temptation as it is found in Matt. vi. 11. Certainly it does not mean "temptation to sin".

While we read at the end of the threefold temptation in the wilderness that "the devil leaveth Him" (Matt. iv. 11), we gather from His words in Luke xxii. 28 that His whole life on earth could be considered as one long "temptation", "Ye are they which have continued with Me in My temptations". There can be no doubt as to the character of these, for "reward" is immediately connected with this "continuance": "And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as My Father hath appointed unto Me" (Luke xxii. 29). There are, scattered throughout the Gospels, a number of passages which speak of men approaching the Lord and "tempting" Him, as did the Pharisees and the Sadducees, who, "tempting, desired Him that He would show them a sign from heaven" (Matt. xvi. 1). With this passage can be read Matt. xix. 3; xxii. 18 and 35, and the parallels in the other Gospels.

There remain the references to temptation that relate to the agony in the garden:

> "Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation; the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak" (Matt. xxvi. 41).

"Weakness" there may be, and temptation is strong, but that presents a different aspect from "temptation" by, and to, evil.

Three more occurrences complete the references in the N.T. "Thou hast tried them which say they are apostles, and are not, and hast found them liars" (Rev. ii. 2). "Temptation" cannot be substituted here. "The devil shall cast some of you into prison that ye may be tried" (Rev. ii. 10). The sequel, "faithful unto death" and the "crown of life", provides sufficient evidence to establish the meaning of this reference. Rev. iii. 10 we have already considered when dealing with the hour of temptation which is coming upon the world "to try" the earth-dwellers.

The word peira, which lies at the root of the words translated "tempt", "temptation", "try" and "prove", means a point, or an edge, or, as we would call it, a "probe". It is a well-known phenomenon in language for "b" and "v" to be interchangeable, consequently we are not surprised to learn that the verb "to prove" comes from probare, "to test as to its goodness", which in turn comes from the word probus, "good". So we find such words as "probable", "probation", "probity", all coming from the same root, and having the basic meaning of "testing for goodness".

The word "probe" means either an instrument, or the act of searching, exploring and trying. In the great majority of the passages where "tempt" and "temptation" occur in the N.T., the meaning is just this "probing to discover whether goodness is present", and only in a few passages can the popular idea of "tempting to commit sin by solicitations and an appeal to evil desires within" be discovered.

We return therefore to the original verse that caused this examination, and rejoice to know that in all the "probing" and "testing" that must be undergone on the way to glory, we have both the sympathy and the succour of Him Who was tempted in all points like his brethren, "sin excepted". Where temptation issues in sin, not sympathy, succour and infirmity, but forgiveness and restoration are needed, and forthcoming, but in such experiences the Son of God can have had no part. He needed not forgiveness, he was never deflected, he needed not to be restored.

In conclusion we would draw the reader's attention to the equivalent words used in the O.T. First, those in the A.V.

(1) Nasah . . . To Try, Prove; Example Gen. xxii. 1
(2) Massah . . . A Trying; Ex. Psalm xcv. 8.
(3) Bachan . . . To Try, Test; Ex. Mal. iii. 15.

In addition to these, peira (Gk.) and derivatives translate various Hebrew words, which are not translated "tempt" or "temptation in the A.V. These we give to make the evidence complete.

(4) Inyan . . . Travail, Business. Eccles. v. 3.
(5) Gadad . . . A Troop. Gen. xlix. 19.
(6) Tseba . . . Host, "Appointed time". Job vii. 1.
(7) Lahah . . . A Madman. Prov. xxvi. 18.

Tromm lists a few various readings, none of which make any difference to the results already obtained. They are too complicated to set out here, and indeed the reader who is so far advanced as to be able to follow any such attempt would already be independent of our help, these articles not being written for such.

May we count it all joy that we are counted worthy of being tested, and flee all solicitations to the "old man" within us. Realizing that the one form of temptation but "probes to discover the good" that has been implanted by the new nature, we can recognize that the other but seeks to accomplish our downfall by stimulating the desires of the old nature. In the former the Saviour has shared; from the latter the Saviour was separated, but for them He suffered on the tree.

Let us prove all things; let us search and see; let us hold fast the form of sound words.

Throughly Furnished (II Tim. iii. 17).

(Being introductory lectures given at the Christian Workers' Training Class).

#1. An examination of the words "Throughly furnished".

pp. 211 - 216

The goal of all Christian training is expressed by the words of the Apostle to Timothy, "That the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works" (II Tim. iii. 17). Light upon the meaning of these words will be provided by the context, but before seeking this, let us endeavour to understand, as fully as we can, the words "Throughly furnished".

Modern English has dropped the word "throughly" and uses in its place the word "thoroughly", but the conception "through" is not lost, as may be seen in the word "thorough-fare". The furnishing provided by the Scriptures goes right through; it commences with the "child" (II Tim. iii. 15), it remains with the "man of God" (II Tim. iii. 17), it is "thorough". It is interesting to note the different translations of exartizo, "throughly furnished", that have been made since the A.V. Rotherham translates the word "well prepared"; J. N. D. renders it "fully fitted"; Weymouth, "perfectly equipped"; Cunnington, "completely fitted out"; and Young's Literal Translation, "completed". The Greek verb exartizo occurs but once more in the N.T., namely in Acts xxi. 5, where it refers to the "completion" or "accomplishing" of a period of time. Josephus uses the word in his "Antiquities" (Book iii. 2. 2), where he employs it in connection with military equipment, saying that his people, in the days of Moses, were "in mighty disorder, and in want of all necessaries", and yet were to make war with men who were "thoroughly well prepared for it". It is evident that to be "throughly furnished" includes both matter and method, "all necessaries", and is the very opposite of "mighty disorder". Evidently, a parrot-like quotation of mere Scripture texts would not satisfy the desire of the Apostle, for there seems to be indicated here the completeness provided by "all Scripture" (II Tim. iii. 16), "all necessaries", and "right division" (II Tim. ii. 15), the antithesis of "mighty disorder".

Exartizo is a compound of ek, "out of", and artizo, "to make fit". In composition ek often loses its primitive significance, "out of", and takes on the meaning of excess or superiority, even as it does in such English compounds as "out-do", "out-bid", "out-vie", "out-rival", etc., and is as near to the English "out-fit" as one language can be to another. Furnished right through, fitted right out, such is the equipment aimed at, and possible to those who follow the teaching of the Apostle here. The idea of "fitting", "mending", and "adjusting" can be seen in katartizo, "mending their nets" (Matt. iv. 21); and katartismos, "perfecting", or "adjusting", the saints to the requirements of the new dispensation (Eph. iv. 12). The root word aro does not occur in the Greek N.T., but Liddell and Scott say of it, that it is "one of the most prolific of Greek roots", from which is derived words meaning "to join", "to fit", "to fashion", "to arrange", and "to harmonize". Every one of these significations is implied in the words "throughly furnished", which gives a fuller idea than may at first have been formed of what this goal of Christian training involves.

Before a Christian worker can make progress in his training he must have some sense of vocation; he must feel that, in his degree, the words of the great Apostle are also true of himself, "Necessity is laid upon me; yea, woe is me, if I preach not the gospel!" (I Cor. ix. 16). This sense of vocation however will not be confined to the mind of the teacher alone; there will be evidences of his call sufficient to cause the concurrence of Christian brethren. These two elements can be seen together in the record of Paul's great commission, as found in Acts xiii. Paul turns Timothy's attention back to this great moment in his life, when he directed him to his "doctrine, manner of life", and to those experiences through which he passed "at Antioch, at Iconium, at Lystra" (II Tim. iii. 10, 11; Acts xiii., xiv.).

Paul was "separated" by the Holy Ghost in a way that is not to be expected in the present dispensation. "The Holy Ghost said, Separate Me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them" (Acts xiii. 2). This command was obeyed by the brethren gathered at the church at Antioch, for they "laid their hands on them" and sent them on their way. There will therefore not only be the preacher's own personal conviction, but it will be accompanied by some evidences of fitness for the great undertaking. Ordinarily, if he feels a call to be a teacher, he will be "apt to teach".

This "separation" by the Holy Ghost in Acts xiii. is the climax rather than the beginning, of the Divine choice. All unknown to Paul, yet most certainly guiding each step in his career, the hand of the Lord had been outstretched: the city of his birth, his racial prejudices, his Roman citizenship, his schooling at the feet of Gamaliel, were all subsequent to the fact that Paul had been "separated" as a preacher from before his very birth (Gal. i. 15, 16). Another reference to his call and separation is made in Rom. i. 1 where he wrote, "Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ, called to be an apostle, separated unto the gospel of God". Unless there is some parallel with this consciousness of a Divine call, the discipline and rigour of Christian training will generally prove too severe, but, where the call is real, no pains will be too great to enable the believer to stand approved unto God, a workman who needs not to be ashamed of the execution of his task.

If we pass from the "separation" of Paul in Acts xiii. to the actual ministry that follows, it will be observed that, when speaking to the people of Israel, he bases all his doctrine and exhortation upon the Scriptures. The exodus from Egypt, the period under the Judges, the reigns of Saul and of David are traversed in the opening of his address. Here was a mind stored with the facts of God's word, ready to be marshaled and applied as the Lord gave opportunity. But we should miss the essential point if we concluded that we must always and in all circumstances introduce large portions of Scripture into our public address, for we have only to turn to Acts xvii. to discover that, to a people who knew nothing of the exodus, of Judges, of Saul, or of David, Paul omitted all reference to the Scriptures, met them on their own ground and led them step by step to the same goal that was before him in Acts xiii. That goal was Christ.

To the Jew he became a Jew, and led up through Biblical history to David, and from David to Christ, "Of this man's seed hath God according to his promise raised unto Israel a SAVIOUR, JESUS" (Acts xiii. 23).

To the Greek he became a Greek, and by reference to their "superstition", their "unknown God", the testimony of their philosophers and poets, led on, equally with his address to the Jews, to the inevitable Christ:

> "He hath appointed a day, in the which He will judge the world in righteousness by that man Whom He hath ordained; whereof He hath given assurance unto all men, in that He hath raised Him from the dead" (Acts xvii. 31).

Paul's conception of the gospel was the preaching of "Christ" (Rom. i. 1-4; I Cor. i. 23; Gal. i. 16; Phil. i. 18). That his equipment for the work had already been going on before his conversion is made evident by the fact, that he only needed the saving revelation on the road to Damascus, to vitalize all he had previously acquired, for we read that, after only a few days' respite, "straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues, that He is the Son of God" (Acts ix. 20), "and confounded the Jews . . . . . proving that this is the very Christ" (Acts ix. 22), the church in Judæa learning with wonder, "that he which persecuted them in times past now preacheth that faith which once he destroyed" (Gal. i. 23).

As a survey of all his references to them will show, Paul's acquaintance with the O.T. Scriptures was very wide and very thorough. Furthermore, he spoke both "Greek" and "Hebrew" (Acts xxi. 37-40), which enabled him to quote sometimes the Greek Septuagint, and sometimes the O.T. as it is in the original, a great asset in his equipment. This must not be misrepresented as indicating that no one can exercise the vocation of preacher or teacher to-day without a knowledge of Hebrew and Greek, but it does indicate the extreme value of all such aids as the Concordance and Lexicon to enable the man of God to verify his references and so build upon a sound foundation.
