At the threshold of our study, we have to face the fact that the Scriptures do not set out to prove the existence of God. This fact is assumed in the opening verse of Genesis, and in every mention of God to the last chapter of Revelation. Human logic and the human mind are inadequate to deal with this problem, and if we attempt it within the limits of human philosophy, we may soon find ourselves driven to atheism. Within the limits of our own experience, and the universal experience that underlies all human knowledge and thought, it is true that that which never had a beginning cannot now exist. But if we attempt to apply this kind of reasoning to the question of the existence of God, where will it lead us?

Again, it is only too true in our experience, that no person can be in two or more distinct places at the same time—yet this is manifestly untrue of God.

The metaphysician must ever feel that the God he seeks is infinitely beyond him. All human knowledge is inadequate. God is invisible to our physical senses; He cannot be pictured or imagined. And our knowledge of Him must be indirect. Even Scripture, or the manifestation of God in Christ, involves a translation of the ineffable into the lower terms of the human.

"The world by wisdom knew not God" (I Cor. i. 21). The works of creation testify of their Maker, but their testimony is limited. "That which may be known of God is manifest" (Rom. i. 19), but that which may be known of God by the works of His hands is small when compared with the revelation of His Word. Instead, therefore, of attempting the impossible, "he that cometh to God must believe that He is" (Heb. xi. 6). "That He is" lies outside the scope of revelation to discuss or prove. "What He is" is its theme, but it is what He is as related to creation and to man, not what He is absolutely in His Own Person—that we do not know, neither can we understand.

Let us take an example of the condescension everywhere visible in the self-revelation of God to man. Moses, speaking of his mission to the children of Israel, asks the question:--

> "When I . . . . . say . . . . . the God of your fathers hath sent me unto you; and they shall say to me, What is His name? What shall I say unto them? And God said unto Moses, I AM THAT I AM . . . . . say . . . . . I AM hath sent me" (Exod. iii. 13, 14).

The idea of a perpetual present, a condition in which there is neither past nor future, may not be the meaning that should be attached to these words—this will be discussed later in the series but, whatever the true translation may be, the words convey ideas that are as much beyond the grasp of the greatest of philosophers as they were beyond the grasp of the lowest Egyptian bondmen. Consequently the Lord adds to His answer to Moses, saying:--

> "Thou shalt say unto the children of Israel, The Lord God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, hath sent me unto you: THIS is My name for the age; and this is My memorial unto all generations" (Exod. iii. 15).

Here the absolute "I AM" condescends to human limitations, and reveals Himself as "The Lord God", associated with a people—"your fathers", and with a time—"for the age" and "unto all generations". This revelation of God comes within our limited apprehension, but we must remember that it is relative, and not absolute.

In the N.T. we meet with a similar thought: "Before Abraham was I AM" (John viii. 58). This statement is not grammatical; it has no parallel in human experience, and no justification in human logic. It is a glimpse of truth beyond our ken. And, as in Exod. iii. the absolute "I AM" limits Himself to the terms of time and place, so in John's Gospel, the absolute "I AM" of John viii. 58 is expressed, "for us men and for our salvation", in such relative terms as "I am the Door", "I am the Light" and "I am the Way". Christ, the Image of the invisible God, makes God known in these wonderful ways, and it will be our delight to study, in this series, the revelation of God, as made known through the written and the living Word.

It must never be forgotten that God Himself is entirely removed from the realm of time—to Him not only is a thousand years but as a day, but a day is as a thousand years. It is absolutely impossible for the human mind to operate in a realm where there is neither time nor space, and we thankfully recognize every title of God from Genesis to Revelation as a Self-limitation bringing God Himself into relationship with His creatures. When the Lord Jesus took upon Himself flesh and blood, it was but another step in that condescension of God that has made us great (Psa. xviii. 35).

"This God is our God."

#2. "God is Spirit" (John iv. 24).

pp. 194 - 198

In the previous paper we did little more than face the immensity of our quest, and its relation to our limited powers of comprehension, and the fundamental revelation that God "is" (Heb. xi. 6). We now proceed to learn what He is. Perhaps no humanly-framed definition has ever surpassed the words of the Westminster Confession:--

> Q. What is God?
> A. God is Spirit, infinite, eternal, and unchangeable, in His being, wisdom, power, holiness, goodness and truth.

The answer has the merit of a true definition in that it states what God is—"a Spirit"—before proceeding to describe His attributes—that He is "infinite, eternal, unchangeable". This is the sequence which we must always observe. If, for example, we begin with the statement that God is almighty, we provide no adequate definition, for it immediately raises further questions: Is He an almighty force or is He is personal God? Is He human or super-human? Such questions are answered by the opening words of the definition—"God is a Spirit". With this knowledge as a basis, the attributes of God become intelligible.

We do not propose to follow the Westminster Confession further, but to follow the doctrine of the apostle John, who has stated in at least three places what God is:--

As to Essence.	God is SPIRIT (John iv. 24).
As to Manifestation.	God is LIGHT (I John i. 5).
	God is LOVE (I John iv. 8).

The revelation given in John iv. tells us that "God is Spirit", but, inasmuch as there are both good and evil spirits, we need the expansion which the epistle provides. The statement that "God is Spirit" differs from the other statement by the absence of the verb "to be" and by the order of the words: Pneuma ho Theos, literally—"Spirit the God". This is an example of one of the commonest figures of speech—or the placing of a word out of its usual order in a sentence for the sake of emphasis. The name for this figure is hyperbaton; hyper, meaning "over" and baton, from banein—"to step". Modern English is almost devoid of inflections, and while this makes the learning of the language less formidable, it also makes it imperative that words in a sentence be kept in their true order. In a language as rich in inflections and case endings as the Greek, the subject of a sentence can be moved from one end to the other without risk of ambiguity. For the sake of any to whom these things may be unfamiliar, we give a few examples of this figure:--

> Rom. v. 8. "But God commendeth His love toward us."
> Order in original: "But commends His love to us God."
> I Tim. iii. 16. "Great is the mystery of godliness."
> Order in original: "Great is, of godliness, the mystery."
> John i. 1. "And the Word was God."
> Order in original: "And God was the Word."

In each case the transposed word receives added emphasis by the use of the figure. To express this emphasis in English, we may translate: "God is Spirit." It is not our intention in these articles to speak of the Trinity in the Godhead. We have dealt elsewhere with the subject of the deity of Christ, and we take the present opportunity of declaring our belief in the personal character of the Holy Spirit. What we are seeking here, however, is the teaching of Scripture concerning God, whether known to us as Father, Son or Holy Spirit.

We find in the Scriptures that the revelation of God as Spirit applies to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit Himself. John iv. 24 speaks of the Father. The word pneuma is used of Christ in I Cor. vi. 17, xv. 45 & II Cor. iii. 17, 18. And the same word is used for the Holy Spirit. Both angels and demons are spoken of as spirits (Acts viii. 29, Heb. i. 7, 14 and Mark vii. 25). The new nature also is spirit (John iii. 6 and Rom. viii. 4, 9) and the resurrection body is spiritual (I Cor. xv. 44). The word pneuma expresses invisible characteristics and feelings (See Matt. xxvi. 41). Scripture insists upon the distinction between spirit and flesh, as of two separate kingdoms.

In the gospel that reveals to us that God is Spirit (John iv. 24), we find stressed the thought of invisibility, which is an important characteristic of the spiritual:--

> "Ye have neither heard His voice at any time, nor seen His shape" (John v. 37).
> "Not that any man hath seen the Father, save He which is of God; he hath seen the Father" (John vi. 46).
> "No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son (or as the Critical Texts read—'God only begotten') which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him" (John i. 18).

The same truth is revealed in many Scriptures:--

> "The invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen" (Rom. i. 20).
> "Who is the Image of the invisible God" (Col. i. 15).
> "The King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God" (I Tim. i. 17).
> "Who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto: Whom no man hath seen, nor can see" (I Tim. vi. 16).

The distinction between spirit and flesh is maintained in Scripture, whether the word "spirit" is used of God Himself or of others:--

> "The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak" (Matt. xxvi. 41).
> "A spirit hath not flesh and bones" (Luke xxiv. 39).
> "That which hath been begotten of the Spirit, is spirit, and that which hath been begotten of the flesh is flesh" (John iii. 6).
> "It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing" (John vi. 63).
> "Who walk not after the flesh but after the spirit" (Rom. viii. 4).
> "Their horses are flesh, and not spirit" (Isa. xxxi. 3).

The passages we have given are sufficient for our present purpose; the reader will discover many more. The revelation of John iv. 24 renders it imperative that in our conception of God we should rigorously exclude all the limitations of size, shape, time and space, which are essential to the world of flesh and blood. We cannot discover God by searching or reasoning, because we have no knowledge of the conditions of spirit life upon which to base our arguments. We depend entirely upon revelation. What God has told us of Himself, we may know; what He has left unrecorded is entirely beyond us, and the attempt to supplement divine revelation by human philosophy will be disastrous.

As we have already pointed out, it cannot be denied that no one person can be in two distinct places at the same time. This is universally true in the realm of flesh and blood, but it clearly becomes untrue when carried over into the realm of the spirit, for Scripture makes it plain that God is omnipresent. We should be careful, therefore, not to reason in the things of God with the limited logic of human experience. The tendency to do this, however, is almost universal among theologians:--

> "If God be a God of love, then . . . . ."
> "If God be almighty, then . . . . ."

But in every case where the bounds of revelation are overstepped, and the light of philosophy substituted for the lamp of revealed truth, the argument leads its followers into mischievous error.

Perhaps, before concluding, something should be said concerning the many passages of Scripture that ascribe to God the organs and the feelings of a man. To the invisible God are ascribed hands, arms, eyes, ears, nostrils, mouth and feet. To God, Who is not a man that He should repent, is ascribed a whole range of human feelings—repentance, sorrow, joy, jealousy, zeal and pity. We read of His instituting enquiries as though He would learn, of remembering, of forgetting, of being reminded, of laughing, and of hissing. Many things connected with place are attributed to God—Scripture speaks of Him as sitting on a throne and dwelling in a sanctuary. Circumstances associated with time, with battle, with building, with inheriting, with writing and with raiment, are all attributed to God. Not only so, but God is represented by irrational creatures—the lion, the lamb and the dove; roaring and bellowing also are attributed to Him, and wings and feathers. The reader will remember many further instances, from which it becomes clear that we are dealing here with the figure of speech known as anthropopathy, anthropomorphism, or condescension. If God be Spirit, then unless He condescends to be interpreted to man in human terms, He will for ever remain unrevealed and unknown.

An illustration may perhaps be drawn from the well-known properties of "wireless" waves. Through every room in every house in the kingdom, wireless waves are beating, yet the occupants are entirely oblivious of their presence, and unmoved by their message. The human ear responds to the sound waves of the air, but needs the mediation of the wireless receiving-set to translate the etherial waves, of which it is quite unconscious, into the lower earthly waves which it can detect. In everyday language, we may say that we have a lecturer speaking "over the wireless", but in reality we have only heard wireless waves interpreted into sound waves. In the same way, the Bible speaks of God's face, voice and hands, but these terms are only the interpretation of unseen spiritual equivalents that have no counterpart in human experience. Apart from this condescending interpretation the spiritual realities behind the interpretation would remain for ever unknown. What the written Word has done by figures of speech, the Lord Jesus has done in Person. He Himself is the Word. He, as the Word, became flesh, and revealed the invisible Father, and, as He sat weary upon the well, knew more fully than we can appreciate the gulf that exists between God, Who is Spirit, and His creatures, who are flesh and blood. The Lord Who spoke to Philip revealed the only way whereby God, Who is Spirit, can ever be known:--

> "Philip saith unto Him, Lord, show us the Father and it sufficeth us. Jesus saith unto him, Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known Me, Philip? He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father: and how sayest thou then, Show us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in Me?" (John xiv. 8-10).

"God is Spirit." "This God is our God."

#3. Light and love (I John i. 5 and iv. 8).
pp. 227 - 231

If God, Who is Spirit, is to be known to men, it becomes a necessity that He shall reveal Himself in terms that come within the limits of their understanding. This is not only true of man by nature, but is equally true of the believer, who, though "spiritual", has a capacity which is finite, whereas God is infinite. We move, therefore, from Heb. xi. 6 with its statement, "God is", and from John iv. 24 with its definition, "God is Spirit", to a twofold manifestation revealed in the first epistle of John: God is light and God is love. The relation between these passages and that of John iv. 24 may be demonstrated thus:--

God is SPIRIT (John iv. 24). { / LIGHT (I John i. 5). and \ LOVE (I John iv. 8).

We believe that we are right in saying of John iv. 24 that it is a definition, whereas I John i. 5 and iv. 8 are not definitions, but manifestations. God is not "light" in the same sense that He is "Spirit". We understand the former to mean that God is like light, and that light as we know it represents God, Who is beyond our ken.

The verb "to be" ("is", "am", "are") is often used in metaphor. For example, "The field is the world" means, "The field represents the world". "The seven stars are the angels of the seven churches" obviously means that the seven stars represents the seven angels. So, in the wonderful words of John x. 9, "I am the door", or of John vi. 35, "I am the bread of life", and in many other passages we recognize the presence of this figure of speech.

All that true science ascertains about light speaks of God; it is a symbol of Himself impresses one with the vital power of light. We are only just beginning to realize the creative energy of light, and the reason why it must of necessity stand first in the record of Gen. i. So with the great fountain of light, the sun, how many and varied are the ways in which the sun sets forth in natural symbols the invisible God.

All that the study of the Scriptures reveals concerning the use of the word and symbol "light" in the inspired record contributes to our understanding of what God is. And this is also true of "love". These are the two main words concerned in the manifesting to men of the real character of that God, Who is Spirit, infinite and eternal. If we turn to the first epistle of John, we shall find that the words "light" and "love" are used in connection with God's relationship with the believer:--

> "This then is the message which we have heard of Him, and declare unto you, that God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all. If we say that we have fellowship with Him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth: but if we walk in the light, as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin" (I John i. 5-7).

The Scriptures constantly insist upon the incompatibility of light and darkness, and as this thought is prominent in the important revelation concerning God Himself which we have quoted above, no pains should be spared to make this distinction clear:--

> "God is light."—The positive statement.
> "And in Him is no darkness at all."—The negative statement.

We will arrange the testimony of Scripture under these two heads, so that it may be clearly seen:--

Light.	Darkness.
"The Father of lights,	with Whom is no variableness neither shadow of turning" (James i. 17).
"Called . . . . . into His marvelous light	out of darkness" (I Pet. ii. 9).
"Ye are all the children of the light.	We are not of the night nor of darkness" (I Thess. v. 5).
"The inheritance of the saints in light . . .	Delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of His dear Son" (Col. i. 12, 13).
"Now are ye light in the Lord.	Ye were sometimes darkness" (Eph. v. 8).
"What communion hath light	with darkness?
And what concord hath Christ	with Belial?" (II Cor. vi. 14, 15).
"God, Who commanded the light to shine	out of darkness" (II Cor. iv. 6).
"Let us put on the armour of light.	Let us cast off the works of darkness" (Rom. xiii. 12).
"Light is come into the world	Man loved darkness rather than light because their deeds were evil" (John iii. 19).
"The light shineth	in darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not" (John i. 5).

It is evident from these citations that a clear distinction between light and darkness is maintained in the New Testament. Peter, James, John and Paul are unanimous.

We have but to open the book of Genesis to find this distinction apparent upon the very threshold of truth:--

> "And God divided the light from the darkness" (Gen. i. 4).

Where darkness is attributed to God, as it is sometimes in the O.T., it is either in the nature of a judgment from His hand, or a description of the veiled character of the O.T. revelation of Himself before the coming of Christ. One or two Scriptures are, however, likely to present difficulties if wrested from their context. For instance, Psa. cxxxix. 12 may be brought forward:--

> "The darkness and the light are both alike to thee."

If, however, the context is consulted, it will be seen that this passage has nothing to do with the statement that God is light, and that in Him is no darkness at all. The God Who knew David's downsitting and uprising, and understood his very thoughts afar off, could not be baffled by the shade of night. This is the teaching of the passage, and it in nowise conflicts with the citations previously given:--

> "If I say, Surely the darkness shall cover me: even the night shall be light about me, > Yea, the darkness hideth not from Thee" (Psa. cxxxix. 2, 11, 12).

Another passage, which is sometimes distorted, is Isa. xlv. 7:--

> "I form the light, and create darkness:
> I make peace, and create evil."

"Evil" is a word that includes the ideas both of moral evil and of evil in the sense of judgment or calamity. If moral evil or sin were intended here, the antithesis would be "good". But in the passage the antithesis is clearly "peace": it does not read, "I make good, and create evil", but "I make peace, and create evil". Just as in Gen. i. 2 the darkness that came upon the earth was a calamity inflicted by God in judgment, so is it here, and in the parallel passage of Amos iii. 6.

Let us be thankful that "God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all". Scripture teaches that light and darkness are incompatible, so that we cannot walk with God and have fellowship with darkness at the same time. The authority of darkness, and the unfruitful works of darkness pertain to the kingdom of Satan, and are "not of God". Let us not put out our hand to stay the ark of God. He is Sovereign, and will overcome when He is Judge not by the weight of sheer omnipotence, but by the greater weight of perfect holiness.

"God is light"; yes, but if that were all, not one of us would see salvation. But He is also revealed as "love", and this discovers a way whereby sin may be righteously dealt with, "light" may remain unclouded, and yet the sinner be reconciled, forgiven and accepted. The revelation that "God is love" is immediately brought to bear upon the relative side of truth. It is not stated merely as an abstraction; we are taken at once to love in action:--

> "God is love. In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent His only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through Him. Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us, and sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins . . . . . No man hath seen God at any time . . . . . If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God Whom he hath not seen?" (I John iv. 7-21).

Just as we know light only by its manifestations, so we know love only by that in which "was manifested the love of God". The fact that God is both "light" and "love" accounts for the plan of redemption. Light working by itself would have meant condemnation to us all (John iii. 19, 20), but love devised a way whereby the holiness and righteousness of God should be upheld, and yet the sinner be justified and accepted. The very nature of God demands the cross as the only solution; light necessitates judgment, but love provides the ransom.

With these two broad channels of manifestation in some measure understood, we shall be able to trace more clearly the attributes of God revealed in the Scriptures. Before doing so, however, we must see how this double manifestation was anticipated in the Old Testament names of God, and how the completion is reached in the Person of Christ as God manifest in the flesh.

Light and Love—"This God is our God."

#13. The Septuagint.
The age of the Alexandrian Version.
pp. 33 - 37

In our earlier articles which dealt with the transmission of the sacred text of the Old Testament, we drew attention to the fact that, owing to the practice which obtained among the Jews of destroying their Hebrew scrolls as soon as they began to show signs of wear, the most ancient Hebrew scroll known dates from a time not much earlier than the days of William the Conqueror. This fact may seem, at first, to introduce an element of uncertainty into the text, and we therefore hasten to quote the words of J. Paterson Smyth, LL.B., B.D. (Primate Hebrew Prizeman, etc.):--

> "In all the Hebrew Manuscripts that have ever been examined, the text is almost word for word the same."

Apart, however, from this agreement of text, for which we must thank God Who has watched over His Word, we have a version that goes back to the second or third century B.C., and therefore comes with all the dignity of age and with the tests of time, as a witness to the text of the Hebrew scrolls as they existed in that early period. This version is commonly called the Septuagint (or the LXX)—a title that strictly belongs to the translation of the Pentateuch only, but which has in common parlance been extended to include the Greek translation of the whole Old Testament. This version has important features that commend it to every lover of the truth:--

1. It is the most valuable witness that we possess as to the canon and actual material of the Hebrew Scriptures.
2. It is quoted by the Lord and by His apostles as the Scriptures, and is actually quoted more frequently than the Hebrew Scriptures themselves. This we must see for ourselves later.
3. Almost every word used in the N.T. in doctrine or practice, is found in the Septuagint also. Consequently the latter provides a check upon any extravagant exegesis, which would be foreign to the plain and settled theological meaning which the word considered has possessed for many years.

The reader of The Berean Expositor will have noticed that whenever any uncertainty has been felt concerning existing interpretation, the Editor has generally applied the principle of consulting the Septuagint.

A glance at the comprehensive indices to Volumes I-XX will show (under heading No. vi.) a list of 112 references to the LXX and to its particular bearing upon the meaning of N.T. terminology. We do not pretend to write this series for advanced scholars, but we believe that the average reader of the Word will realize enough of the importance of this ancient version, to welcome some sidelights upon its origin, composition and usage. Accordingly, we hope to devote a series of articles to an examination of the Septuagint.

As may be supposed, with a volume of such remote antiquity, a considerable amount of legend has become intermingled with historic fact regarding its origin. Until the time of Alexander the Great, the people of Israel had very little intercourse with the western world, but after his conquests the word diaspora (the "dispersion" of James i. 1 and I Pet. i. 1) became a "technical Greek term for Jewish communities in foreign lands, whether planted there by forcible deportation, or by their own free agency".*

Whether or not the statement of Josephus concerning the meeting of Alexander and the High Priest be true, it is known that Alexander's policy was favourable to the Jews. And, although he built the city in Egypt that bears his name with the intention that it should be essentially Greek, he nevertheless included in his plans a section for Jewish colonists, and, moreover, gave them the rights of full citizenship.

The following edict, recorded by Josephus (Ant. xix. v. 2) establishes this fact beyond dispute:--

> "Tiberius Claudius Caesar Augustus Germanicus, High Priest, and Tribune of the people ordains thus:
> > "Since I am assured that the Jews of Alexandria, called Alexandrians, have been joint-inhabitants in the earlier times with the Alexandrians, and have obtained from their Kings equal privileges with them, as is evident by the public records that are in their possession, and the edicts themselves: and after that Alexandria had been subjected to our empire by Augustus, their rights and privileges have been preserved by those presidents . . . . . not forced to transgress the ancients rules of their own country's religion . . . . . I will, therefore, that the nation of the Jews be not deprived of their rights and privileges on account of the madness of Caius, but that those rights and privileges, which they formerly enjoyed, be preserved to them, and that they may continue in their own customs."

Not only did synagogues spring up in Alexandria, but the Jews were permitted "to convert a disused Egyptian temple at Leontopolis into a replica of the temple at Jerusalem".

However loyal such Jewish colonists may have been to Jerusalem and the service of the Lord, the very nature of the case would make it necessary that they should speak Greek, the ordinary language of their city. In Palestine, since the Babylonian captivity, Hebrew had given place to Aramaic as the language of common intercourse, and it soon became imperative that the "dispersion" should have the ancient Scriptures translated into the Greek tongue. It is evident, however, that the Greek spoken in Egypt by Jewish settlers would not be "classical"—in fact the Greek spoken by those who were not Jews was itself already a mixture, incorporating words and modes from Macedonia and Asia Minor. Added to these deviations from classical Greek would be the idiom and the colouring of the Hebrew Scriptures still remembered, though imperfectly. This is, in fact, the kind of Greek in which the Septuagint was written. Our space is too limited to give the letter of Aristeas, or the statements of Aristobolus, Philo and Josephus—accounts in which the marvelous is mingled with matters of fact, and in which romance is based upon historical foundations. We can only summarize the principal facts here, but this summary will be sufficient for the general reader:--

[NOTE * - Where a sentence is quoted in this series, without further acknowledgement, it is to be understood that the writings of the late Henry Barclay Swete, D.D. are referred to.]

1. The translation of the law was made in the time of Philadelphus.
2. It was undertaken at the desire of the King and for the royal library.
3. The translators and the Hebrew rolls which they used were brought from Jerusalem.
4. Their translation, when completed, was welcomed both by Jews and Greeks.

Philadelphus accumulated books, and built a second library to receive the overflow from the library which was already established at the palace. He was catholic in outlook, welcoming a Buddhist mission from the Ganges, and patronizing other literary efforts outside the circle of the Egyptian religion. There is, moreover, evidence that the book of Genesis was translated into Greek early in his reign, for it is quoted by Demetrius in his treatise Peri ton en te Ioudaia Basileia (Demetrius is assigned to the reign of the fourth Ptolemy).

There is some reason to suspect the statement that the LXX was the official royal version, for it contains many words that indicate the common people; but that it was produced by a people strongly under the influence of Egypt is manifest by the choice of words having Egyptian origin. To quote the words of Prof. Mahaffy:--

> "In the vocabulary of the papyri (recently discovered in the sands of Egypt) we find a closer likeness to the Greek of the LXX than to any other book I could name."

The evidence of the papyri concerning the language both of the LXX and of the N.T. is a subject demanding a series to itself, and this we hope to give later.

We mentioned earlier that, while the title Septuagint is used to-day of the whole Greek version, it strictly belongs to the five books of Moses only. This fact was pointed out by Jerome, who had considerable intercourse with Jewish Rabbis. About a hundred years after the commencement of the Septuagint version of the Law of Moses, the writer of the prologue to the Apocryphal book, Sirach, alludes to a translation that included not only the Law, but the Prophets and the Hagiographa:--

> "For the same things uttered in Hebrew, when translated into another tongue, have not the same force in them: and not only the present work, but the Law itself and the Prophets, and the rest of the books, have no small difference, when they are spoken in their own language. For in the eight and thirtieth year coming into Egypt, when Euergetes was King, etc., etc."

This quotation is sufficient to establish the fact that by the thirty-eighth year of Euergetes, the Alexandrian Jews had, in addition to the LXX translation of the Law, a translation of the Prophets also, and "the rest of the books". We assume, as the writer was a Palestinian Jew, that he referred to the complete canon of the Old Testament, known to us now as "The Law, the Prophets and the Psalms".

References to the Greek Chronicles and to the Greek Book of Psalms are found in the Book of the Maccabees; Aristeas (not the writer whom we have already mentioned) quotes the book of Job according to the LXX; and the Greek Book of Esther has a footnote stating that it was brought into Egypt in the fourth year of "Ptolemy and Cleopatra". Added to this evidence we have the fact that the LXX is quoted very frequently in the N.T.—so that it is conclusively proved that it was already an authorized version before the beginning of the Christian era.

Enough has been said in an article which does not attempt to be technical, to prove the venerable antiquity and authority of this version of the O.T. Scriptures. We must pursue the subject further in our next paper.

#14. The Septuagint. The Versions of Aquila, Theodotion and Symmachus.

pp. 72 - 74

In our previous article we traced the growth of the Septuagint up to the Christian era, and saw that it was intended primarily for the Alexandrian Jews. Soon, however, it began to assume a position of the highest authority, and was reverenced almost as much as the inspired original. Philo, a Jew and a native of Egypt, used the LXX in his allegorical expositions of the Law; and Bochart, Bauer and others have shown that Josephus also, a Palestinian Jew, used it extensively. This version, as the quotations from it shew, was in constant use in Palestine during the Lord's life on earth, and the "Fathers" of the Church, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Athanasius and Basil, had no Old Testament other than the LXX version.

Until the commencement of the first century after the birth of Christ, the Jewish synagogue recognized the authority of the LXX, but, when the Christians began to quote it in favour of Christian doctrine, there came about a revulsion of feeling and the version was decried. To discredit it effectively, the Jews instituted a fast on the eighth of Thebet (December) to execrate the memory of its inception, and this was followed by the expunging of several passages from the version in a further attempt to vitiate its witness.

From this time the Rabbis banned the LXX as the "Christian's Bible", and compared the "accursed day when the seventy elders wrote the Law in Greek for the King" with the day "when Israel made for itself the golden calf". Circumstances, however, were such that a Greek version of the Scriptures was absolutely necessary for the Jews, most of whom knew no Hebrew. The problem was solved by a certain Aquila of Pontus, a Gentile employed at Jerusalem during the reign of Hadrian (A.D.117-138). While at Jerusalem, he was "converted" under the ministry of the Christians who had returned from Pella. Being reprimanded, however, for retaining the pagan teaching of astrology, and refusing to abandon it, he was excommunicated, and in anger joined himself to the Jews, became circumcised, and developed into a zealous defender of Rabbinical teaching. He became the pupil of Rabbi Akiba, and, after learning Hebrew, turned his attention to the production of a new Greek version that could be used by Hellenistic Jews. His version was acclaimed by the Jews, his teachers in their congratulations using the words of Psa. xlv. 2—"Thou art fairer than the children of men."

While it was perhaps natural that the Christians should view the work of Aquila with distrust, those who were acquainted with the Hebrew recognized in Aquila's version a very faithful adherence to the original. He was "a slave to the letter", and consequently his version is often not only bad but unintelligible Greek. Origen and Jerome both testify to Aquila's scrupulous fidelity to the Hebrew original.

It is difficult to illustrate the lengths to which Aquila went in his endeavour to give an accurate version, without resorting to a number of grammatical examples. We mention a few of these here.

He uses the Greek preposition sun (together with) to represent the Hebrew eth, as a sign of the accusative. Also, he never translates the Hebrew name Jehovah into the Greek Kurios, as do the LXX and the N.T., but always uses the ancient Hebrew characters for the sacred name. Further, he attempts to translate particles that "defy translation" and, where a Hebrew word has a complex meaning, he often gives two Greek words to represent it. While all this makes the version extremely difficult to read from the Hellenistic point of view, the reader will see that, as Dr. Taylor has said, his "high standard of exactitude and rigid consistency give his translation, with all its imperfections, unique worth for the critic".

About the same time as that of Aquila, another Greek version of the Scriptures appeared, the work of a certain Theodotion, who, according to Jerome, was an Ebionite. His attitude to the Alexandrian version would not be the same as that of Aquila. The character of his version is such that it holds a middle place between the servile closeness of Aquila, and the freedom of Symmachus, a translator whom we have yet to consider. Instead of producing an entirely independent translation, as did Aquila, Theodotion seems to have undertaken a revision of the existing Septuagint; wherever he attempts, however, an independent translation of the Hebrew he betrays lack of knowledge. Nevertheless his translation of Daniel was so superior to that of the LXX version, that it took its place in the Christian Churches, and figures in our present-day copies.

Symmachus, whose name has been mentioned above, is said to have been an Ebionite like Theodotion. His exact date is a matter of conjecture, although we know that his version was known to Origen in A.D.228. Jerome says of Symmachus that he endeavoured to express the sense of the Hebrew rather than give a verbal rendering, as did Aquila. We have, therefore, in these three important versions:--

(1) A translation characterized by its verbal accuracy.
(2) A translation which, largely, was a revision of the Alexandrian.
(3) A translation which aimed at giving the sense of the Hebrew in Greek dress.

These three versions, together with the Alexandrian LXX, all dating from many centuries earlier than any known Hebrew manuscript, are of priceless value both in their bearing upon disputed readings, and in their illumination of the meaning and usage of N.T. words, especially of doctrinal terms.

For all these guides and helps granted by God, or overruled by His providence, let us be thankful and, where we can, let us not omit to use them for the opening up of His own inspired truth.

#15. The Septuagint.
The Hexapla of Origen.
With a note of the versions of Hesychius and Lucian.
pp. 113 - 115

In the two preceding articles we have sought to indicate the keen interest that was taken both by Jew and Christian in the Greek translation of the O.T. Scriptures. The use of these versions in synagogue, church and home would naturally lead to a multiplication of copies, and also, as naturally, to a multiplication of copyists' errors. These errors were partly through the inability of some scribes to distinguish between the actual text and the marginal notes that were added. The same century that saw the versions of Aquila, Theodotion and Symmachus come to light, saw also the fruit of the work of the man whose unremitting labours still stand as his abiding monument. We speak of Origen.

When Origen was seventeen years of age his father suffered martyrdom for the faith, and at eighteen Origen is found at the head of the catechetical school of Alexandria. Desiring a thorough acquaintance with the O.T. Scriptures, he applied himself to the study of Hebrew. Those of us who have any acquaintance with the study of languages know something of their demands upon time and thought, but when we realize that for about fourteen years Origen's studies were carried on under the cloud of persecution, we cannot but be thankful for the grace of God that sustained him in his great work. In the course of his studies he was continually faced with the problem of dealing with conflicting versions and alternative readings. It was obviously impossible for him to produce a new translation, but what he did undertake was the collation of the Greek text then in use with the original Hebrew, and with the other Greek translations that had been put forward. This colossal task occupied twenty-eight years of his life. His method was somewhat on the following lines.

Having collected his manuscripts, he arranged a series of columns, in the first of which he placed the Hebrew, and in the second he transliterated the Hebrews into corresponding Greek letters. Then, side by side with this, he placed the translation of Aquila, as being nearer to the Hebrew original than the versions of Symmachus, the LXX and Theodotion. The illustration below will give some idea of what Origen's great work looked like, but it must not be taken as anything more than an illustration.

(BE-XXII.114).

In addition to the above, three anonymous versions were also collated and three more columns added, and a minor edition known as the Tetrapla, in which the first two columns were omitted, was also compiled.

The transliteration of the Hebrew words serves to show how the Hebrew was pronounced in Origen's day, as well as to reveal the actual text then in use. Origen found that he must invent some system of notation that would account for the omissions, additions and inversions discovered in the LXX as compared with the standard Hebrew text. His system was as follows:--

(1) Where a passage occurred in the LXX which was not found in the Hebrew, he marked it with an obelus following a metobelus, a sign something like a mallet.
(2) Where a passage found in the Hebrew was wanting in the LXX and supplied by himself from the other Greek versions, he used an asterisk (*) following a metobelus and initial letter of Aquila, Theodotion or Symmachus added.
(3) The obelus and the asterisk were used together when the order of the Greek was at fault.

There are other signs and combinations of signs used by Origen, the meaning of which is somewhat obscure.

The tremendous size of this work is hardly conceivable to-day. It was at least five times the bulk of the Vatican MS, and occupied some 6,500 pages, all written by hand. The Hexapla as a whole being too formidable to be copied, it occurred to Pamphilus and his friend Eusebius to issue separately the fifth column, the revised LXX version. This version was in circulation during the 4th century. It appears that someone named Antonimus compared the copy with the original, while the corrections were begun by Pamphilus, when in prison, and completed, after his martyrdom, by Eusebius. While this work was undertaken in all good faith, the result of their labours was "to create a recension of the LXX which was a mischievous mixture of the Alexandrian version with the versions of Aquila and Theodotion". In the course of time, the symbols used by Origen were either misplaced, omitted, or otherwise so changed, that by the time of Jerome it was no longer possible to distinguish between the work of the translators and the correction of Origen. The copies made by Pamphilus and Eusebius were mainly for the use of readers in Palestine.

At the same time that they were prosecuting their labours, an Egyptians Bishop, name Hesychius, began a correction of the common Egyptians text. Hesychius, like Pamphilus, turned his prison into a study, and used the days of captivity to the glory of God.

While this work was being prosecuted in Egypt, one further version was made at Antioch. This was the work of the martyr Lucian, who had as co-worker a Hebrew scholar named Dorotheus. Lucian's version is known as the koiné, the "common" version. He suffered martyrdom under Maximin in A.D.311 or 312. Dr. Hort, speaking of the N.T. section of this work, says:--

> "The qualities which the authors of the Syrian text seem to have most desired to impress on it are lucidity and completeness . . . . . both in matter and in diction the Syrian text is conspicuously a full text."

As time went on, these labours of many Christian scholars, while they had their distinctive spheres of influence, gradually merged, so that to-day what is called "The Septuagint" has a substratum of the original Alexandrian version with a fusion of the attempts of Aquila, Theodotion, Symmachus, Hesychius, Lucian and the labours of Origen.

We cannot contemplate the work of these men, many of whom sealed their testimony with their blood, without feeling somewhat ashamed of ourselves and of our generation for the lack of interest, ignorance, and apathy exhibited towards the sacred oracles. We trust that every reader of this series will feel impelled to a personal study of the Word afresh, using all these helps that have come down to us from the past, and which were produced in an atmosphere not far removed from that with which we lovingly associate the great prison ministry of the apostle Paul.

#16. The Septuagint.---The manuscripts.
pp. 155 - 159

We have traced the story of the LXX down to the labours of Origen and the editions of Eusebius of Caesarea, Lucian of Antioch, and Hesychius of Egypt. After the appearance of these editions it seems that the LXX underwent no further serious revision, and so far as these articles are concerned, we have no need to trace its history further.

We must now look at the Greek version as it has reached us to-day, considering the form in which it is represented, and the question as to how far we may reasonably expect to get back to the original version.

Perhaps at this point we should make it quite clear that all the translating, re-translating, editing and comparing that we are considering has nothing to do with the text of the inspired originals of the O.T. However faulty the present Greek version may be, the Hebrew has providentially been shielded from interference. Origen did not alter a word of the Hebrew which was before him; he altered the LXX to correspond with it. This note may perhaps reassure any who, through not distinguishing between the Hebrew originals and the Alexandrian translation, may have felt somewhat disturbed.

The edition of the LXX published by Holmes and Parsons in 1850, 1860 & 1869, and, under the editorship of Dr. Nestle, in 1880 & 1887, gives a complete list of the MSS which were used in making the edition. The nature of these articles precludes anything like elaboration of this list, which contains altogether 311 codices. Twenty-two of these written in uncials, while the rest are in cursive hands.

It may be of help to some of our readers if before proceeding further we give the meaning of several terms that are continually used in the studying of the ancient manuscripts:--

UNCIAL.—The word means “an inch long”, and is used to indicate those manuscripts that are written mainly in capital letters. Uncials generally indicate a great age than cursives.

CURSIVE.—The word means “flowing” or “current”. It is used of handwriting that is in a flowing or continuous style, as distinct from the uncial type.

CODEX.—The word means a “manuscripts volume”. Its plural form is “codices”.

VERSION.—The word means a “translation”.

EDITOR.—In this subject, the title “Editor” is used to indicate the various men who have from time to time collated the different manuscripts. Such names as Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tregelles are familiar.

COLLATE.—To “collate” means to “compare critically”

REDACTEUR.—One that collates and arranges. His results are referred to as “The Redaction of . . . . .”

LACUNA.—The word means a “pit” or “hollow”. In manuscripts it indicates a gap in the writing either through age, tears, holes or missing pages.

PALIMPSEST.—A parchment that has been written upon twice, the first writing having been partially washed out or erased.

RECENSION.—A critical review of a text. A text established by critical revision.

APPARATUS CRITICUS.—This expression includes all the documents containing the text considered, with perhaps a list of such documents, the whole forming the material for the use of the critic in arriving at the original text under review.

CATENA.—This is a commentary compiled from early writers.

PALEOGRAPHY.—The study of the handwriting of ancient documents.

Uncial manuscripts are indicated by capital letters, and cursives, so far as the LXX is concerned, by numbers. The following notes will give some idea of a few of the most important manuscripts:--

“A.” CODEX ALEXANDRINUS (British Museum, London). Covers bear the arms of Charles I. Presented to James I by Cyril Lucan, Patriarch of Alexandria and of Constantinople. While it is usually reckoned to date from the first half of the seventh century, it must be remembered that “the dating of early Greek uncials on vellum is still very doubtful for want of materials to judge from, and it is possible that the tradition mentioned above (that it was written by Thecla shortly after the council of Nicea, A.D.325) is truer than is generally supposed” (F. G. Kenyon, M.A.). It originally contained the whole Bible, but it has now several lacunae. It consists of four volumes, the first three containing the O.T. in 639 leaves. “The text has been corrected throughout by several different hands, the first being nearly, or quite, contemporary with the original scribe” (F. G. Kenyon).

"B." CODEX VATICANUS (Vatican Library). This manuscripts is considered to be the most ancient and most valuable of all. Dean Burgon and others are of a contrary opinion, but this will be discussed later. It was written in the fourth century and is nearly complete. There are 617 pages devoted to the O.T., but the first 31 leaves are lost, the book beginning at Gen. xlvi. 28. There are also other lacunae.

"ALEPH." CODEX SINAITICUS (Leipzig and Leningrad). The story of the romantic discovery of this manuscript we have told in an earlier article. We must be content here with more prosaic details. The manuscript was written in the fourth century. The parts of the O.T. and Apocrypha now in existence are Gen. xxiii., xxiv.; Numb. v., vi., vii.; I Chron. ix. 27 - xix. 17; II Esdras (i.e. Ezra) ix. 9 to the end; Neh.; Esther; Tobit; Judith; I Macc., IV Macc.; Isaiah; Jeremiah; Lam. i. 1 - ii. 20; Joel; Obadiah; Jonah; Nahum to Malachi; Psalms; Proverbs; Eccles.; Song of Sol.; Wisdom; Ecclesiasticus and Job. Four different hands are discernible in the writing, and Tischendorf tabulated the work of five different correctors.

"C." CODEX EPHRAEMI (National Library, Paris). The folio consists of 209 leaves, of which 64 contain portions of the O.T. It contains parts of Job, Proverbs, Eccles., Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus and Song of Sol. It dates from the fifth century.

"The copy of the Greek Bible of which these fragments have survived unfortunately fell, during the middle ages, into the hands of a scribe in want of writing material . . . . . this once noble MS was written in single columns from 40 to 46 lines in length."

"N." CODEX BASILIANO-VATICANUS (Vatican Library).

"V." CODEX VENETUS (St. Mark's Library, Venice). These two much-mutilated volumes are now considered as part of one whole. The Venice MS contains 164 leaves, the Vatican 132.

"D." CODEX COTTONIANUS (British Museum, London). "One of the most lamentable sights in the Manuscript Department of the British Museum is that of the charred remains of many manuscripts of the greatest value which were burned in the fire among Sir R. Cotton's books in 1731" (F. G. Kenyon).

"The existing remains at the British Museum, though collected with scrupulous care, consist only of 150 mutilated fragments."

We have, however, the means of ascertaining the text of this codex, as it was collated by Patrick Young, by Ussher, by Gale, and by Crusuis and Grabe. Grabe's collation is preserved in the Bodleian Library, Oxford, and was published by Dr. Owen.

"E." CODEX BODLEIANUS (Bodleian Library, Oxford). This manuscript dates from the eighth to the tenth century. It is of the book of Genesis only, and there are a few lacunae owing to mutilation of the manuscript.

"F." CODEX AMBROSIANUS (Ambrosia Library, Milan). Written in the fifth century on the finest and whitest of vellum. It contains punctuation marks, accent and breathings—a feature which makes it unique among ancient uncials. It contains parts of the O.T. from Genesis to Joshua, and fragments of Isaiah and Malachi. "Its evidence is valuable, and where A and B differ it generally agrees with A" (F. G. Kenyon).

The above are given as specimens of the material which the Editor of the text of the Greek Bible has to use. We have neither time nor space for further details, and for our present purpose we do not need more information on this subject.

Passing from the ancient manuscripts that are at our disposal, we will conclude this survey by referring to some of the outstanding printed editions of more recent times.

The first printed edition of the LXX was produced in Spain under the direction of Cardinal Ximenes from 1502 to 1517. It is known as the Complutensian Polyglott, and presents the O.T. in three columns:--

(1) The Hebrew text with the Targum of Onkelos.
(2) The Latin Vulgate.
(3) The Septuagint, with an interlinear Latin Version.

Eight months after the printing of the Polyglott, Andreas Asolanus issued a complete Greek Bible, now known as the Aldine edition. And in 1587 there was published at Rome, under Sixtus V, the third great edition of the Greek O.T. known as the Sixtine. This is based mainly upon the Codex Vaticanus B, although it has been estimated that it differs from Codex B in over 4,000 places. The Preface shows that the publishers had resolved to give as pure a text as could be found.

In the eighteenth century, an edition based upon the Codex Alexandrinus was published by J. E. Grabe. Like the Sixtine, it is mainly based upon one important Codex.

These four great editions of the Septuagint, however, did no more than supply the text either of a single manuscript or of a related group. In 1788 Robert Holmes began his colossal work, in which "the Roman Text (i.e., that of Sixtus) is reprinted without variation, but in the critical notes are given the various readings of no less than 325 manuscripts" (F. G. Kenyon). Holmes died in 1805 and was succeeded in 1807 by James Parsons:--

> "The work is an almost unequalled monument of industry and learning, and will perhaps never be superseded as a storehouse of materials; but it left abundant room for investigations conducted on other lines and among other materials, which were not accessible to Homes and his associates" (F. G. Kenyon).

Tischendorf issued a text of the Septuagint in 1850—a revised Sixtine edition. Field edited the rest of the Hexapla in 1875. Paul de Lagarde commenced an edition of the Greek O.T., and a beginning was made by the appearance of the first half of the text of the Lucianic recension in 1883. He died, however, in 1891 with the work unfinished.

In 1883 the Syndics of the Cambridge University Press issued a notice that they had undertaken "an edition of the Septuagint and Apocrypha with an ample apparatus criticus intended to provide material for a critical determination of the text". The plan originated with Dr. Scrivener, but was actually undertaken by Dr. Swete. This edition represents the latest testimony to the state of the text, but even with this valuable work in our possession much remains to be done. The editions of Eusebius, Lucian and Hesychius need to be disengaged so that it may be possible to see what the LXX was like at the end of the third century. Then we need to go further back still to the text which the translators had before them, and finally to discover what light the original text of the LXX can throw upon the Hebrew text from which it was translated.

We trust that this attempt to place before the reader something of the task that has been shouldered by men of God, to provide, as far as possible, means to arrive at the actual inspired text, will stimulate us all to more earnest effort to search the sacred pages, knowing that therein we have the truth.

#17. The Septuagint.--- Classification of O.T. quotations in the New. pp. 189 - 192

One of the most interesting and perhaps, to us, the most vital reason for the study of the LXX, is the way in which it is quoted in the N.T., and the way its doctrinal vocabulary must influence the interpretation of N.T. teaching. Before we can appreciate the extent of the influence of the LXX it will be necessary to supply the reader with a list of quotations found in the N.T., so that they can be examined to see whether they agree or disagree with the LXX version or the Massoretic Hebrew, or are independent translations. We shall be helped, moreover, if we distinguish between

(1) Direct quotations which are introduced by the words: "That it might be fulfilled"; "It is written", and the like, or where the context makes it evident that a quotation is intended, and
(2) Allusions to the O.T. which can hardly be classified as definite quotations.

Men of God have at different times laboured in this field, and the result of their labours is found in different forms. "The New Testament Quotations" by Henry Gough are an example of thorough-going work. His system is to give the original Hebrew, the LXX version and the Greek of the Received text of the N.T., together with the A.V. in English. In his preface Gough says:--

> "Large as this collection is, it must not for a moment be supposed that it comprehends all the verbal similarities to the Old Testament, and especially to the Septuagint version of it, which the New Testament contains. In truth (quoting Grinfield) 'the version of the LXX is not to be regarded merely as the first most important of all versions of the O.T., whether ancient or modern, but as constituting a great historical fact or epoch in the plan of the Christian dispensation'. The whole New Testament is founded upon it: most, if not all, of the doctrinal terms of the gospel are derived from it: and had not such a translation been published and received a proper time before our Saviour's advent, the composition of the New Testament in Greek would, humanly speaking, have been impossible."

Thomas Hartwell Horne, B.D., in his valuable "Introduction to the critical study and knowledge of the Holy Scriptures" has devoted a large section of Volume II to the analysis of Old Testament quotations in the New. His classification is as follows:--

i. Quotations exactly agreeing with the Hebrew.
ii. Those nearly agreeing with the Hebrew.
iii. Quotations agreeing with the Hebrew in sense, but not in words.
iv. Such as give the general sense.
v. Quotations which are taken from several passages of Scripture.
vi. Quotations differing from the Hebrew, but agreeing with the Septuagint.
vii. Quotations in which there is reason to suspect a different reading in the Hebrew, or that the apostles understood the words in a sense different from that expressed in our Lexicons.
viii. Passages where the Hebrew seems corrupted.
ix. Passages which are not properly citations, but mere references or allusions.

Examples from each of these headings we hope to give later.

E. W. Grinfield, M.A., in alluding to Hartwell Horne's classification of quotations given above, remarks:--

> "It is necessary to observe, however, that in the first list of 'Quotations exactly agreeing with the Hebrew', all agree verbatim with the LXX except 6 (there are about 70 quotations in this list); and that in his second table of 'Quotations nearly agreeing with the Hebrew', many exactly agree with the LXX, and all very nearly; whilst in his third list, 'Quotations agreeing with the Hebrew in sense, but not in words', many exactly agree with the LXX, and the rest very nearly. In his seventh list of 'Quotations in which there is reason to suspect a different reading, etc.', some agree exactly, and all very nearly, with the LXX."

It will be seen that a great many more quotations of the LXX must be credited to that version than Hartwell Horne's list would at first lead one to suppose.

This question of the quotation of the O.T. by the New, and the classification of such quotations, has exercised the minds and thoughts of many, but we have not met a more thorough and careful work on the subject than that of David McCalman Turpie, M.A., which is entitled: "The Old Testament in the New", which was published by Williams and Norton in 1868. Quoting from his preface:--

> "It will be found that there can be no more than five great classes, to one or the other of which all the quotations will be referable. These five classes are the following:--
> Class A would contain those which agree with the Original Hebrew Text, when the latter has been correctly rendered in the Septuagint.
> Class B would contain those which agree with the Original Hebrew Text, when the latter has not been correctly rendered in the Septuagint.
> Class C would contain those which differ from the Original Hebrew Text, when the latter has been correctly rendered in the Septuagint.
> Class D would contain those which differ from the Original Hebrew Text, but agree with the Septuagint, which of course would vary from its original.

Class E would contain those which differ from both the Hebrew and the Septuagint, which also would be themselves at variance, the latter not correctly rendering the former."

Some of these findings will, of necessity, need modification as fuller investigation brings us nearer to the true text of the Septuagint, but his classification remains as a guide to all who may follow up the good work. For greater clearness, these five classes were further subdivided as follows:--

Class A was divided into two parts: As., containing those passages wherein the same arrangement of words is followed in the New Testament and the Septuagint. Hence the added letter "s" for "same". Ad., wherein the word occur in a slightly different order. Hence the added letter "d" for "different". Under As. Turpie lists 47 (2 queried texts). Under Ads. he lists 4 occurrences.

Class B is subdivided as Bs. where the Septuagint has been partly followed, and Bd. where this is not the case. Bs. has 6 references, and Bd. 4. The reader may at first feel that all this subdivision is unnecessary, but the moment one has the responsibility of coming to a decision concerning the important matter of either a true reading or a consistent translation, it is of the highest importance that every feature should be most carefully "rightly divided". Should any reader feel somewhat alarmed by the mass of detail, let him be the more thankful for those men of God who have given so many hours to this most wearying of labours, for the benefit of the church at large. We will not pursue the subdivision given by Turpie beyond Class C, lest we overtax the reader's patience; the setting out of this Class will be sufficient guide for the actual analysis of the quotations that we hope to give, at least in sample, in a future article.

Class C is subjected to a more elaborate subdivision than A or B. First we have three large divisions—Ci., Cii. And Ciii.:--

Ci. indicates differences in words.
Cii. indicates differences in clauses.
Ciii. indicates differences in both words and clauses.

Now the first of these (differences in words) may be the result of either:--

A difference in the rendering, indicated by Ci. r;
A difference by omission, indicated by Ci. o;
A difference by addition, indicated by Ci. a;

and inasmuch as some references are combinations of these differences, Turpie patiently tabulated them under Ci. ro; Ci. ra; Ci. oa; and Ci. rao.

The second of these (Cii. "Differences in clauses") were tabulated in respect to the position, as either (1) introductory, (2) intermediate or (3) final. Accordingly we find Cii.ro; Cii.ra; Cii.2.o, and even such a designation as Cii.I.o.2.o.3a, which, set out in actual definition, indicates a passage which differs from the original Hebrew text, even though the Hebrew has been correctly translated in the Septuagint, the differences having to do with the omission of the introductory and intermediate clauses, and an addition to the final clause.

Class Ciii. has but two subdivisions, namely, Ciii.a2a and Ciii.o.a.

Further than this we will not take the reader, but will endeavour to illustrate this analytical process in our next article.

#18. The Septuagint.--- Some examples of classification quotations. pp. 231 - 237

In our last article we indicated some of the ways in which the quotation of the O.T. in the New had been classified. In the present we supplement that note by a series of examples. The classification we follow is that of Turpie, partly explained in the preceding article.

Class A.s.

In this class the quotation agrees with the Hebrew, when the latter has been correctly translated by the Septuagint, and where the same arrangement of words is followed in the N.T. as is found in the LXX. Matt. xxi. 16 quotes Psa. viii. 3. The N.T. and the LXX appear to give a slightly different rendering. N.T. and LXX read: "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise." The O.T. Hebrew reads: "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast thou ordained strength." This at first sight seems to give a different reading, but an examination of the two Hebrew words reveals that the verb means to set, place or lay the foundation of anything (see Isa. xxviii. 16), and as the laying of a foundation is preparatory to the raising of a building, it is generalized into prepare, which is the meaning of the Greek word katartizo.

The Hebrew noun indicates might or power (Job xii. 16), then splendour or majesty (Hab. iii. 4), then by an easy transition, or more technically by the figure of speech known as the metonymy of the subject, this splendour calls forth the corresponding praise. This is a good example of the fullness that is resident in the Hebrew, and a check upon too hasty an assumption that we know all that any one particular passage is intended to teach by a first or second reading.

Class A.d.

In this class the quotation agrees with the Hebrew, when the latter is correctly translated by the LXX, but where the arrangement of the words occur in a slightly different order. Acts xxiii. 5 quotes Exod. xxii. 28. N.T. and LXX read: "Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people." The O.T. Hebrew reads: "Nor curse the ruler of thy people." The slight difference between the N.T. and the LXX is in the order of the words: "speak evil", which in the LXX is "evil speak".

Class B.

In this class the quotation agrees with the Hebrew, when it has not been correctly rendered in the Septuagint. B.s. indicates that the Septuagint may have been partly followed, and B.d. where it has not been followed at all.

Class B.s.

Luke xxii. 37 quotes Isa. liii. 12:--

> "And He was numbered with (meta) the transgressors" (N.T.).
> "And He was numbered among (en) the transgressors" (LXX).
> "And He was numbered with (eth) the transgressors" (Heb.).

The N.T. "with" is a closer rendering of the Hebrew eth than the LXX "among", and meta agrees more with the idea that the Lord was not actually a transgressor than does the LXX en, "among".

Class B.d.

Matt. ii. 15 quotes Hos. xi. 1, and the three passages exhibit the following differences:--

> "Out of Egypt have I called (ekalesa) my son" (ton huion mou) (N.T.).
> "And (kai) out of Egypt did I call (metakalesa) his children" (ta tekna autou) (LXX).
> "And (vav) called my son out of Egypt" (Heb.).

The Heb. text is not only supported by the N.T. quotations, but it is confirmed by the versions of Aquila (ton huion mou), and of Theodotion and Symmachus (huios mou).

Class C.

This class has thirteen sub-divisions, but to save space we will not repeat all that has been said of them here: the reader should consult the preceding article for particulars.

Ci.r.—I Pet. ii. 24 quotes Isa. liii. 5:--

> "By Whose stripes ye were healed" (N.T.).
> "By His stripes we were healed" (LXX).
> "And by His stripe (there is) healing for us" (Heb.).

Ci.o.—Rom. x. 5 quotes Lev. xviii. 5:--

> "That the man which doeth these things shall live in them" (N.T.).
> "Which if a man do, he shall live in them" (LXX and Heb.).

Ci.r.o.—Luke xix. 46 quotes Isa. lvi. 7:--

"My house is the house of prayer" (N.T.).
"For My house shall be called a house of prayer for all nations" (ethnesin) (LXX).
"For my house shall be called a house of prayer for all people" (amim) (Heb.).

Ci.a.—John xiii. 18 quotes Psa. xli. 9 (LXX), Psa. xli. 10 (Heb.):--

"He that eateth bread with me hath lifted up his heel against me" (N.T.).
"He that eateth my loaves magnified his heel against me" (LXX).
"He that did eat my bread magnified his heel against me" (Heb.).

Ci.r.a.—John vi. 31 quotes Psa. lxxvii. 24 (LXX), Psa. lxxviii. 24 (Heb.):--

"He gave them bread from heaven to eat" (N.T.).
"And He gave them bread of heaven" (LXX).
"And He gave them the corn of heaven" (Heb.).

Ci.o.a.—Rom. xi. 3 quotes I Kings xix. 14 (LXX), I Kings xix. 14 (Heb.):--

"Lord, they have killed Thy prophets, and digged down Thine altars: and I am left alone, and they seek my life" (N.T.).

"And they have thrown down Thy altars, and slain Thy prophets with the sword, and I am left very lonely, and they seek my life to take it away" (LXX).

"They have thrown down Thy altars, and slain Thy prophets with the sword, and I, even I only, am left, and they seek my life to take it away" (Heb.).

Ci.r.a.o.—I Cor. xv. 25 quotes Psa. cix. 1 (LXX), Psa. cx. 1 (Heb.):--

"Till he hath put all enemies under his feet" (N.T.).
"Until I put thine enemies the stool of thy feet" (LXX).
"Until I put thine enemies thy footstool" (Heb.).

Cii.r.o.—Heb. xii. 20 quotes Exod. xix. 12, 13:--

"And if so much as a beast touch the mountain, it shall be stoned, or thrust through with a dart" (N.T.).

"Everyone that toucheth the mountain shall surely die . . . . . for it shall be stoned with stones, or thrust through with a dart; whether it be beast, or whether it be man, it shall not live" (LXX).

"Whosoever toucheth the mount shall be surely put to death . . . . . but he shall surely be stoned, or shot through; whether it be beast or man, it shall not live" (Heb.).

Cii.r.a.—II Cor. vi. 17 quotes Isa. lii. 11, 12:--

"Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you" (N.T.).

"Come out from thence, and touch not the unclean thing; come ye out from the midst of her; for the Lord shall go first before you" (LXX).

"Go ye out from thence, touch not the unclean thing; go ye out from the midst of her; for the Lord shall go before you" (Heb.).

Cii.2.o.—Rom. vii. 7 quotes Exod. xx. 17:--

> "Thou shalt not covet" (N.T.).
> "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife," etc. (LXX).
> "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house," etc. (Heb.).

Cii.I.o.2.o.3a—Matt. xxii. 24 quotes Deut. xxv. 5:--

> "If a man die, having no children, his brother shall marry his wife, and raise up seed unto his brother" (N.T.).
> "And if brethren dwell together, and one of them should die, and should not have seed, the wife of the dead shall not marry without, to a man not related; her husband's brother shall . . . . . take her to himself for wife, and dwell with her" (LXX).
> "If brethren dwell together, and one of them die, and have no child, the wife of the dead shall not marry without unto a stranger; her husband's (or next kinsman) shall . . . . . take her to himself for wife, and perform the duty of a husband's brother to her" (Heb.).

Ciii.a.2a.—Acts ii. 17-21 quotes Joel ii. 28-32.

We refrain from giving the three quotations owing to their length, and our limited space. The reader is asked to make the comparison under this heading for himself. He will observe "afterward" and "after these things" becoming, in the N.T., "in the last days" and several changes may be noticed.

Ciii.o.a—Acts xiii. 22 quotes Psa. lxxxviii. 21 and I Kings xiii. 14 (LXX), Psa. lxxxix. 21 and I Sam. xiii. 14 (Heb.):--

> "I have found David, the son of Jesse, a man after mine own heart, which shall fulfil all my will" (N.T.).
> "I have found David my servant. The Lord will seek for Himself a man after His own heart" (LXX).
> "I have found David my servant. The Lord hath sought him a man after His own heart" (Heb.).

At this point we must fain say with the apostle in Heb. xi. 32: "And what shall I more say? for the time would fail me" to give examples of the remaining classes. We conclude, however, with an extract from an article in the Quarterly journal of Prophecy of October, 1849. (see table/chart on next page).

The study of the Greek of the New Testament, and the influence that the language of the LXX has had upon its phraseology and the fixing of its great doctrinal terms lies outside the scope of this series, which deals with the more general history of "The volume of the Book". Under another heading, we hope to give this important aspect of truth a careful study, but a great deal of time will be necessary in the preparation of such a series. In this present series, we shall pursue the course already indicated, namely, that of following up the various phenomena connected with the transmission of the Sacred Text, and all matters of general interest pertaining to it.

"With all thy getting, get understanding" (Prov. iv. 7).

#1. What constitutes a valid argument?
pp. 37 - 40

It is a blessed fact that salvation does not depend upon reasoning and disputation, and that one need be neither a philosopher nor a logician to perceive the purpose of the ages. Perhaps no writer of Scripture so emphasizes the utter failure of the natural mind to understand the truth as Paul, yet, advocate as he was for the supremacy of faith, and opponent as he was of "doubtful disputations" and of 'vain deceitful philosophy", no writer is so argumentative, and no writer appeals so much to the mind quickened to appreciate true reasoning.

> "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God" (Rom. x. 17).

Yet, to borrow the argument of verse 14:--

> "How shall they hear, who do not understand, and how can faith come, if the truth presented be not realized?"

To the Ethiopian, Philip said:--

> "Understandest thou what thou readest?" (Acts viii. 30).

To the Pharisees, the Lord said:--

> "Why do ye not understand My speech? even because ye cannot hear My word? (John viii. 43).

Solomon said:--

> "Knowledge is easy unto him that hath understanding" (Prov. xiv. 6).

While mere reasoning may be a mark of infidelity, faith is never unreasonable, nor does it discredit reason. In one of the most spiritual passages in Romans the apostle speaks of "reasonable" (logikos) service (Rom. xii. 1). We read of Paul "reasoning" (dialegomai), "opening" (dianoigo), and "alleging" (paratithemi) out of the Scriptures concerning Christ, and his epistles abound with such signs of argument as the frequent use of the words "for", "wherefore", "for this cause", and the like. While no soul will ever miss salvation because of inability to appreciate a syllogism, the teacher of truth may nevertheless sometimes err and lead his hearers astray if he has no true understanding of what constitutes valid argument.

There is indeed room for a book that will do for Logic in the Scriptures, what Dr. Bullinger's "Figures of Speech used in the Bible" did for figurative language in the Scriptures. To attempt such a work is beyond our present powers, but though these notes be somewhat fragmentary and the range limited, they may be of service in quickening the reader's interest in this important matter.

Ability correctly to answer the question, What constitutes a valid argument? will confer a double blessing, viz., it will provide us with the means whereby we shall be able to appreciate more clearly the divine arguments of the Scriptures, and it will enable us to appraise the truth and detect the errors and fallacies in the arguments presented in the teaching of others.

Upon the ground of the all-sufficiency of faith, some object to the attempt to analyze the processes of correct thinking, while others refuse an analysis of logical processes upon the ground that common sense is sufficient. Archbishop Whately says:--

> "The generality have a strong predilection in favour of common sense, except in those points in which they, respectively, possess the knowledge of a system of rules: but in these points they deride anyone who trusts unaided common sense. A sailor, e.g., will perhaps despise the 'pretensions' of medical men, and prefer treating a disease by 'common sense'; but he would ridicule the proposal of navigating a ship by common sense, without regard to the maxims of nautical art."

Logic is the name given to the science of reasoning. It displays the principles on which argument is conducted, and tabulates certain rules which are derived from these principles, so that we shall be guided into the truth, and guarded from error.

The objection to logic as being unserviceable in the discovery of truth may hold good in the realm of natural science, but it is not valid in the realm of scriptural revelation. In that realm we do not set out to discover truth by processes of reasoning, but, on the contrary, believe that in the Scriptures we already posses a complete revelation, and that we can and should use every legitimate means to arrive at the right understanding of that revelation, and to test all that professes to be an exposition of its teaching.

Another superficial objection to logic is that in the hands of the unscrupulous the very processes of true reasoning can apparently be made to lead to false conclusions. But this is no fault of logic: in such a case, clearly, error has crept into one or both of the premises, and the process is no more an objection to the true place of logic than the fact that certain calculations based on the assumption that nineteen, and not twenty, shillings made a pound, had produced a false answer, would be an objection to arithmetic. Changing the figure, we must first of all secure a correct translation, then, granted that our terms are unambiguous, and our premises true, the conclusion is as inevitable as is the conclusion of an arithmetical sum.

Neither in the Scriptures, nor in conversation, are arguments always stated at full length, but it is safe to say that every valid argument may be expressed in that form known since the days of Aristotle as the syllogism. The term "argument" is used popularly in a somewhat wider sense than is intended in logic, but strictly speaking every argument consists of two parts, viz., that which is proved, and the means whereby it is proved. That which is proved is called the “conclusion”, and the means whereby it is so proved the “premises”. Here is a simple example of a syllogism:--

All tyrants deserve death . . . . . Caesar was a tyrant . . . . . Therefore he deserved death.

We are not at the moment concerned with the morals of the matter before us, but with the process of reasoning and its inevitable conclusions. There is no possible way of avoiding the conclusion, “Therefore he deserved death”, except by questioning and disproving some feature of the premises. Either it is not true that all tyrants deserve death, or it is true. Either it is true that Caesar was a tyrant, or it is not true. But if these premises be conceded, then the conclusion is valid and unassailable.

One great value of the syllogism is the way in which it forces revision of the premises or steps that lead to an erroneous conclusion. For example, there is nothing apparently wrong with the following process of reasoning, yet the conclusion is so obviously untrue that it compels a search for error in the premises that might otherwise have escaped us:--

White is a colour . . . . . Black is a colour . . . . . Therefore black is white.

When we realized that much that passes for scriptural doctrine will not stand the test of the syllogism, we may look more kindly upon its application, and allow some place for an explanation of its use.

Without allowing the subject to occupy undue space, we hope from time to time to give a few notes upon the importance of correct reasoning and valid argument. This we hope will prove to be of service in the elucidation of the truth of the Scriptures, and at the same time provide some means of testing the doctrines propounded by teachers and writers in these days of seducing spirits and doctrines of demons.

[NOTE.—As this series of articles is somewhat outside the bounds of actual exposition and teaching, and deals with the raw material, and the processes, rather than with the finished article, and as we wish our pages to be helpful to all our readers, we have prepared six articles only under this heading, and shall be guided as to their continuance by the correspondence we receive. If you desire their continuance, please say so on a postcard addressed to the Editor.]

#2. Names: their place and importance.
pp. 74 - 78

If man be created in the image of God, and if man be placed over the work of His hands, we should expect that he would possess a nature above that of the brute creation: in other words, that he would be a rational being. This we know to be the case: whereas animals act merely under the power of instinct, man acts under the influence of reason. The first recorded act of man is found in Gen. ii. 19:--

> "And whatsoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof."

Those who deny the inspiration of Scripture, and look upon Genesis as a collection of myths and legends, have to account for the scientific accuracy of its most incidental details. What is it that we find in the forefront of any text book on logic? The necessity of names:--

> "If we attempt to . . . . . analyze . . . . . the import of propositions we find forced upon us, as a subject of previous consideration, the import of name" (J.S.M.*).

Thus Adam is exhibited in Gen. ii. acting as a rational being, giving names to all the lower creation that passed before him as a necessary first step to fuller and clearer understanding.

Hobbes, in his Computation of Logic, says:--

> "A name is a word taken at pleasure to serve for a mark which may raise in our mind a thought like to some thought we had before, and which being pronounced to others, may be to them a sign of what thought the speaker had before in his mind."

This is the simplest definition of a name. Names may stand for more than this; in Scripture, for instance, names are often prophetic, but in the simplest analysis names are marks, and it is of the utmost importance that when two or more people converse, they should agree that certain marks or names stand for certain ideas or things, otherwise confusion must follow. And here the accuracy of the history of Babel is seen. As soon as certain groups of men began to call ideas and things by names different from those employed by other groups, confusion followed, and "they left off to build".

When God would mark a crisis in the life of the Patriarch, he changed his name from Abram to Abraham.

> [NOTE * - In this series the initials J.S.M. stand for John Stuart Mill, and all paragraphs in quotation marks without name or initial must be understood as quotations from this author's book, entitled A System of Logic.]

Names must be distinguished the one from the other according to their significations, of which there are the following classifications:--

(1) GENARAL and SINGULAR names.
(2) CONCRETE and ABSTRACT names.
(3) CONNOTATIVE and NON-CONNOTATIVE names.
(4) POSITIVE and NEGATIVE names.
(5) RELATIVE and ABSOLUTE names.
(6) UNIVOCAL and EQUIVOCAL names.

> "All names are names of something, real or imaginary; but all things have not names appropriated to them individually."

While persons, remarkable places and events have their distinguishing or singular names, there is a multitude of common objects or ideas to which we give a general name. For example, "book" is a general name; but if I wish to designate a particular book I must either put together several names, as "This book", or "This red book", etc., or use a singular name as "The Bible", "The Berean Expositor", etc.

> "A general name is familiarly defined, a name which is capable of being truly affirmed, in the same sense, of each of an indefinite number of things. An individual or singular name is a name which is only capable of being truly affirmed, in the same sense, of one thing."

"In the same sense."—How needful it is before we attempt to teach the truth of God's Word that we discover the "sense" of its words, names or ideas, and then adhere closely to it. What havoc has been caused by a failure to define beforehand, and to adhere afterwards, to such terms as "divine", "sin", "faith", "all", etc.

The second division of names is into those which are concrete and those which are abstract:--

> "A concrete name is a name that stands for a thing: an abstract name is a name which stands for an attribute of a thing."

Thus "Scripture" is concrete, while "holy", being an attribute, is abstract. We will not spend time over this obvious division of names, particularly as the next one demands more care and attention, viz., connotative and non-connotative names:--

> "The word 'connote' comes from notare, 'to mark'; connotare 'to mark along with; to mark one thing with or in addition to another'."
> "A connotative term is one which denotes a subject and implies an attribute. Thus John, or London, or England, are names which signify a subject only. Whiteness, length, virtue, signify an attribute only. None of these names, therefore, is connotative. But, white, long, virtuous, are connotative, for they denote a subject and imply an attribute."

Concrete and general names are connotative. Take for instance the word "man". It may denote the Editor of this magazine, the reader, or a number of individuals that form a definite class:--

> "It is applied to them because they possess, and to signify that they possess, certain attributes. These seem to be corporeity, animal life, rationality, and a certain external form which for distinction we call the human. Every existing thing which possessed all these attributes, would be called a man."

There is a great deal more to be learned regarding this division of names that perhaps will be better appreciated when we can apply ourselves to the Scriptures, and as we are not attempting to teach logic, we pass on to the remaining subdivision.

The fourth division of names is into those which are positive and those which are negative. It must be remembered that some names which are positive in form are negative in reality, and vice versa. The word "unpleasant" is negative in form, but positive in meaning, for it signifies positive painfulness. The word "idle" is positive in form, but negative in meaning. We must be careful to distinguish negative names from positive names. True negatives are expressed by the word "not". A privative name supposes the one-time possession of an attribute now lost. For example, the word "blind" is not a negative of "seeing", for it suggests that, by reason of his class, the sufferer whom the word describes did have, or should have, the faculty of sight.

Relative and absolute names are the next division. Such names as "father" and "son" are relative, not absolute. Much of the evil teaching that denies the deity of Christ is due to failure to realize that the titles "Father" and "Son" are relative. As a father a man is only as old as his eldest child, although as a man he may be thirty years older. This is true wherever applied, if true at all, and God Himself could not bear the name of "Father" until He had a Son. Men continually attempt to disprove the deity of Christ by emphasizing the subordinate relations of Son to Father, but such reasoning is false:--

> "A name is relative, when, being the name of one thing, is signification cannot be explained but by mentioning another."

God is self-existent, and, in His essence and absoluteness, independent of creation or time. It will be discovered that all we know of God is relative, and our reasoning must, accordingly, be governed by this limitation. As in the case of the titles "Father" and "Son", so "Jehovah", "Elohim", "Shaddai" are all relative, and do not comprehend absolute deity, of which we know nothing.

The last division of names is that of univocal and equivocal:--

> "A name is univocal, or applied univocally, with respect to all things of which it can be predicated in the same sense; it is equivocal, or applied equivocally, as respects those things of which it is predicated in different senses."
> "File", meaning a steel instrument, and 'file', meaning a line of soldiers, have no more title to be considered one word, because written alike, than 'grease' and 'Greece' have, because pronounced alike. They are one sound, appropriated to form two different words."

Some of our readers will be aware that while the fact of the existence of "two seeds" is maintained as a scriptural doctrine, it is fatal to the doctrine of universal reconciliation, whatever differences there may be as to what constitutes these "seeds". It is, therefore, clear that the advocates of universal reconciliation must offer some explanation to account for the "Giants", the "Rephaim", and other like beings mentioned in Scripture.

This has now been done, and the process comes under the heading of equivocal names. Because the Hebrew word Rephaim contains the same root letters as the Hebrew word for "Healer", a whole nation, together with its pedigree, is blotted out. According to this teaching the "Giants" cease to exist, they are but "healers". If the reader will imagine some person of foreign extraction endeavouring to reason about the name "Ham", and thereby disposing of a whole section of the human race because that same "word" has, in spelling, an equivocal affinity with "bacon", he will be able to appreciate this treatment of the subject at its true value!

Sometimes a word is used metaphorically, "as when we speak of a brilliant light, and a brilliant achievement":--

> "One of the commonest forms of fallacious reasoning arising from ambiguity is that of arguing from a metaphorical expression as if it were literal."

One of the most awful examples of this false reasoning is, of course, the use made by the Church of Rome of the Saviour's words, "This is My body": the metaphor is taken as being a literal statement.

We trust enough has been said to cause the reader to exercise care in the use of doctrinal terms, and those who have the time and inclination would be well repaid if they collected lists of terms from the Scriptures for each of the divisions suggested in this article.

#3. The constitution of an assertion.
pp. 116, 117

In our last article we sought to show the importance that attaches to the correct naming of objects and ideas; and we now extend our study to consider the nature of an assertion:--

> "Logic is the theory of proof, but proof supposes something proveable, which must be a proposition or assertion; since nothing but a proposition can be an object of belief, or therefore of proof. A proposition is discourse which affirms or denies something of some other thing. This is one step: there must, it seems, be two things concerned in every act of belief."

The reader may perhaps appreciate this statement better after considering an example. Suppose, for instance, we have the word "scripture" or "sin" or "sacrifice". The word, standing alone, does not assert or deny anything; but if I say, "Scripture is true" or "Scripture is false" or even "Scripture exists", I have made a proposition which is capable of proof, faith or rejection.

> "There must, it seems, be two things concerned in every act of belief. But what are these things? They can be no other than those signified by the two names, which being joined together by a copula (is or are) constitute the proposition. If, therefore, we knew what all names signify, we should know everything which, in the existing state of human knowledge, is capable either of being made a subject of affirmation or denial."

To the student of Scripture these are weighty words. We have a revelation from God, and we entertain no doubts concerning the truth and accuracy of every part of its teaching. What an incentive, then, to study that Word and to arrive at a scriptural definition of every item of truth which it contains. Then, with no errors in our premises, our understanding of the truth of God would be clear and convincing.

A name is something concerning which something can be predicated, for example: "stone is heavy"; "snow is white." A moment's thought, however, will bring to mind many "names" that are not, like "stone", or "snow", concrete, so that some "right division" of the large family of names will be of value.

Aristotle divided all existing things into "categories"—a word which is used many times in the N.T. in the sense of "accusation":--

> "Where are thine accusers (kategoros)?" (John viii. 10).
> "What accusation (kategoria) bring ye?" (John xviii. 29).
> "There is one that accuseth (kategoreo) you?" (John v. 45).

Every "name", then, can be "accused" of something. When we say, "The man walked" or "The man is tall", we, in logic, "accuse" that man of a certain action, just as, in another sense, we accuse him when we say, "The man is a murderer". Aristotle's Categories or Classes of Being, into which the subjects of a proposition may be divided, are: Substance, Quantity, Quality, Relation, Space, Time, Situation, Having, or Manner of, Being, Action, Passion.

These divisions have been modified from time to time. Kant arranged them as follows:--

QUANTITY including unity, plurality, and totality.
QUALITY including reality, affirmation or negation, and limitation.
RELATION including substance and accident, cause and effect, active and passive.
MODALITY including possibility, existence, necessity and contingency.

Another very common subdivision of names or "predicables" is fivefold: Differentia, Property, Accident, Genus and Species. We do not propose to go minutely into the details of these divisions; they will be more carefully examined later. We are only concerned here with the classification of names, because of their connection with the construction of propositions, which is the subject of our next study.

#4. The import of propositions.
pp. 149 - 151

Having seen that correct names are at the very root of all right thinking, we now proceed to consider the question of propositions. A proposition is "a sentence indicative"—something asserted, affirmed or denied. It will be seen that it differs from a question or a command, and that all that is necessary for its formation is a predicate and a subject.

The relation between the predicate and subject is indicated in several ways. It is sometimes indicated by inflection, as when we say, "Fire burns", but more generally, by the words "is" or "is not"—a use of the verb "to be" which must not be confused with that conveying the idea of "existence":--

> "A proposition being a portion of discourse in which something is affirmed or denied of some other thing, the first division of propositions is into affirmative and negative."

For example, "God is Spirit" is an affirmative proposition; while "God is not man" is a negative one.

Propositions, considered merely as sentences, are divided into two classes—categorical and hypothetical. The categorical class simply asserts that the predicate does, or does not, apply to the subject, e.g.:--

> "The world had an intelligent Maker."
> "Man is not capable of raising himself unassisted from the savage to the civilized state."

The hypothetical class makes an assertion under a condition, or with an alternative, for instance:--

> "If the world is not the work of chance, it must have had an intelligent maker."
> "Either mankind are capable of rising into civilization unassisted, or the first beginnings of civilization must have come from above." (Archbishop Whately).

Another method of classifying propositions is the following:--

> UNIVERSAL.—"All men are mortal."
> PARTICULAR.—"Some men are mortal."
> INDEFINITE.—"Man is mortal."
> SINGULAR.—"Julius Caesar is mortal."

The signs of a universal proposition are the words "all", "no" and "every". The word "some" indicates the particular, and a proper name indicates the singular. The absence of these signs characterizes the indefinite proposition:--

> "What is the immediate object of belief in a proposition? What is the matter of fact signified by it? What is it to which, when I assert the proposition, I give my assent, and call upon others to give theirs?
> One of the clearest and most consecutive thinkers whom this country or the world has produced, I mean Hobbes, has given the following answer to this question. In every proposition (says he) what is signified is the belief of the speaker that the predicate is a name of the same thing of which the subject is a name; and if it really is so, the proposition is true. Thus the proposition, All men are living beings (he would say) is true, because living being is the name of everything of which man is a name. All men are six feet high, is not true, because six feet high is not a name of everything of which man is a name."

Propositions, however, are not always set out as formally as logic requires. Usually they take the form of "propositions considered as sentences", as indicated at the top of this page. These are compound: the first one cited includes a series of assertions and inferences from the presence of the "world" of design and its association with intelligence. Consequently Hobbes' rule will only apply when all sentences are reduced to their simplest forms, as indicated in the four classifications that follow.

Another way of expressing it, is that a proposition consists in referring something to a class. Thus, "Man is mortal", according to this view of it, asserts that the class, "man", is included in the class "mortal". Matters of fact fall under five heads, and every proposition makes an assertion or denial corresponding to one of these five divisions: Existence, Co-existence, Sequence, Causation and Resemblance:--

> "This fivefold division is an exhaustive classification of matters of fact: of all things that can be believed, or tendered for belief: of all questions that can be propounded, and all answers that can be returned to them."
> "An attribute, therefore, is necessarily either an existence, a co-existence, a causation, a sequence or a resemblance."

It is not our intention to occupy much space, at one time, in the consideration of these side-lights on the truth, and we will, therefore, reserve for our next article the examination of what are termed the "five predicables".

#5. Classification.
pp. 193, 194

We have already seen the close association between propositions and names, and we now call attention to the classification of these names:--

> "As soon as we employ a name to connote attributes, the things, be they more or fewer, which happen to possess those attributes, are constituted ipso facto a class."

The reader will recognize the term "Dispensational Truth" as a familiar example of this:--

> "This portion of the theory of general language is the subject of what is termed the doctrine of the Predicables: a set of distinctions handed down from Aristotle. The predicables are a fivefold division of general names, not grounded as usual on a difference in their meaning, that is, in the attribute which they connote, but on a difference in the kind of class which they denote. We may predicate of a thing five different varieties of class name:--
> A genus of the thing, a species, a differentia, a proprium, and an accident."

The above are relative terms, for what may on one occasion be a genus may on another be a species. For example, the word "animal" is a genus with respect to the words "man" or "John", but a species with respect to the class of substance or of being. In logic, the terms genus and species are used in a more restricted sense than that in which they have been used and popularized in natural science:--

> "It was requisite that genus and species should be of the essence of the subject. Animal was of the essence of man; biped was not. And in every classification they (the logicians) considered some one class as the lowest species. Man, for instance, was a lowest species. Any further divisions into which the class might be capable of being broken down, as man into white, black, and red man, or into priest and layman, they did not admit to be species."

Every predicable expresses either:--

(1) The whole essence of its subject, called in logic the species.
(2) Part of its essence called the genus, and difference, or
(3) Something joined to its essence, called the property and accident.

Species and genus correspond to the question "What?"—e.g., "What is Caesar?" Answer: "A man"; "What is a man?" Answer: "An animal." The same term may belong to any of the five divisions given above according to its usage. For example, the term "red" is a genus in relation to "pink" and "scarlet", but a differentia when combined in the phrase, “a red rose”. It is a property when used of the blood, but an accident when used of a roof.

Further, there are different modes of classification according to circumstances:--

> “Thus it suits a farmer’s purpose to class his cattle with his ploughs, carts, and other possessions under the name ‘stock’. The naturalist, suitably to his purpose, classes them all as ‘quadrupeds’, which term would include wolves, deer, etc., which to the farmer would be a most improper classification. The commissary, again, would class them with corn, cheese, fish, etc., as ‘provisions’; that which is most essential in one view, being subordinate in another” (Archbishop Whately).

It will readily be seen that a great deal of controversy could have been avoided if those who participated had classified their terms clearly. This leads us to the question of definitions, with which we will deal in our next article.

Words in Season.

#14. pp. 159, 160

> "Yet in the church I had rather speak five words with my understanding, so as to instruct others, than ten thousand words in an (unknown) tongue" (I Cor. xiv. 18).

The exercise of the ministry of teaching draws upon all the gifts and graces of the Spirit. Not only must there be in the first instance an "aptness" (II Tim. ii. 2), but such graces as "patience", "gentleness", and "meekness" must be continually manifested in face of opposition (ii. 24, 25). Moreover, not only must the doctrine be true, but there should be a close relationship manifested between the doctrine and the manner of life (iii. 10). All these requirements were abundantly fulfilled by the apostle Paul.

Apart from these more personal and spiritual accompaniments, we have some very practical exhortations for the teacher in the epistles and example of Paul. One of these we have placed at the heading of this article. Before any preaching or teaching can be of service to him that hears, it must be understood. The apostle placed five words spoken with understanding, so that others could receive instruction, against the thousand words in a tongue unintelligible to the hearer, though they be spoken under the influence of the Spirit.

"With all thy getting, get understanding" says the Scripture in Prov. iv. 7. While, however, the words of the wise urge us to get understanding, they also utter balancing warnings against a spirit of fleshly independence that forgets the spiritual side of the matter, such as,

> "Trust in the Lord with all thine heart; and lean not unto thine own understanding" (Prov. iii. 5).

Coming to the practical side of our subject, we turn to the example of Nehemiah. There is a passage in Nehemiah that should be pondered by every teacher and preacher—pondered and prayed over until it becomes a reflection of the teacher's own practice:--

> "So they read in the book of the law of God DISTINCTLY, and gave the SENSE, and caused them to UNDERSTAND the reading" (Neh. viii. 8).

The word "distinctly" is used on two occasions in the law, and in both passages there is manifested the necessity for clear cut and incisive statement:--

> "And they put him in ward that the mind of the Lord might be SHEWED to them" (Lev. xxiv. 12).
> "And they put him in ward, because it was not DECLARED what should be done to him" (Numb. xv. 34).

In both these passages Moses is seen to be uncertain how to act until a special command was given by the Lord. This emphasizes the idea of the reading of the law distinctly, giving it point and precision. The usage of the word in Prov. xxiii. 32 will help to emphasize this lesson for the teacher:--

> "It biteth like a serpent, and STINGETH like an adder."

There must be some "sting", some distinct "point", about teaching if it is to be effective.

#14. (Concluded). pp. 179, 180

> "Yet in the church I had rather speak five words with my understanding, so as to instruct others, than ten thousand words in an (unknown) tongue" (I Cor. xiv. 18).

In Neh. viii. 8 the Talmud understands the word "distinctly" to mean "gave a distinct reading", i.e., that they gave a Chaldee paraphrase as well as reading the Hebrew original. In any case the meaning of the subject was made clear.

While dealing with this feature it may not be amiss to remark that there is another sense of the word in which the reading should be "distinct". Speakers should remember that unless words are finished off, listeners at a little distance will miss many of them. Their words will sound "woolly" and have no "sting". Let the reader who is interested read aloud the following sentence: "He sang his song with the greatest tenderness." Probably the untrained speaker will fail to read correctly. "His song" will become "Hisong", "with the" will become "withe", and greatest tenderness" will be lost in "greatestenderness". It is a duty, both to the hearer and to the Lord Who sends us, that no one should fail to "hear distinctly" through slipshod reading or speaking on our part.

The next item of importance in Neh. viii. 8 is: "They gave the sense." This word is variously translated "discretion", "knowledge", "policy", "prudence", "understanding", "wisdom", "wise", and has the idea of discernment, of careful weighing of things that differ. No teacher should stand up before men, and attempt to use a passage of Scripture as a basis for either doctrine or exhortation, who has not been at some pains to ascertain the viewpoint of the passage. The A.V. contains all that is necessary for the enlightenment of the seeking sinner and for the guidance of the believer who does not undertake instruction, but the responsibility that attaches to teaching others and of influencing their belief and practice should compel all who handle the Word of God to see to it that they have ascertained the "sense", and this must involve some kind of comparative study of the words actually used by God and not only those found in translations.

It is possible that in the passage in Neh. viii. 8, "gave the sense" has reference to giving particular heed to the division of the passage into sentences. Those acquainted with the elaborate Massoretic system of pointing will realize how far this has been carried in our present Hebrew text. Even in reading the English version it is essential that we "give the sense" intended by the translators. For instance, the words of Rom. vi. 17 can be made to mean the exact opposite of the true sense, unless stress is rightly placed: "But God be thanked, that ye were the servants of sin." So also Luke xxiv. 25: "O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken", can be misread as though the Lord called His disciples fools for believing all that the prophets had spoken.

The sense of Heb. vi. 1 is most certainly not found in the A.V., for what sane person would believe that the apostle actually taught the believer to "leave the first principles of the doctrine of Christ?" The truth of the passage is found in the margin in verse 12.

If these two exercises are prayerfully attempted, namely:--

(1) Read and speak "distinctly", giving "point" to the message, both by clear enunciation, and clear appreciation of the meaning; and
(2) Giving the sense, both by correct punctuation and emphasis, and also by ascertaining the actual meaning of the words by their usage in other passages, then, the third point of the passage in Nehemiah will be secured.

"They caused them to understand the reading."—Without understanding, the hearer cannot receive edification (I Cor. xiv. 17). Without understanding, the reading of the Word may degenerate into a mere fetish. Read distinctly, give the sense, and so use tools appropriate to a workman who desires to produce work of which he need not be ashamed—work to the glory of God and to the blessing of His people.

#15. pp. 217 - 219

"As a wise master-builder, I have laid the foundations" (I Cor. iii. 10).

We have seen the necessity in teaching that there should be "distinctness" and "sense". We would now direct attention to another feature.

The wise architect lays a foundation; the unwise hurries on with the super-structure only to see his work collapse. There can be no doubt as to the great foundation for all true doctrine and practice:--

"For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ" (I Cor. iii. 11).

Following the example of Paul, the teacher and the preacher will see to it that Christ in His Person and work is ever foremost. The gospel of God is concerning His Son (Rom. i. 1-4), and to "preach Christ" one has to distinguish between the gospel of the kingdom, the gospel of the grace of God, the gospel of peace, and the gospel of glory. The wise master-builder will give prominence to the work of Christ. He will display the wonders of redemption, of reconciliation, of the Passover and of propitiation. The epistles to the Romans and to the Hebrews will early have a place in his expository teaching.

Vitally connected with the great foundation of Christ is the doctrine of the inspiration and authority of the Scriptures which makes us wise unto salvation through faith in Christ. It is impossible to preach Christ faithfully and fully without accepting, as He did, the whole of the O.T. Scriptures as the Word of God that cannot be broken, speaking from first to last of Himself.

While, however, the laying of a foundation is of first importance, we must take account of a further scripture if we wish to understand the whole truth of the matter before us:--

> "Not laying again the foundation" (Heb. vi. 1).

While "fundamental truth" is a prime necessity, it is only of value if we build upon it. This may perhaps be better appreciated if we give a simple illustration.

A man wishing to have a house built would feel very fortunate in securing a builder who stressed the importance of "having a good foundation". We may suppose that at some little time from the commencement of the work the prospective owner would visit the site. Perhaps he would be a little disappointed at not seeing any walls standing, but would chide himself for over-anxiety and agree that "a good foundation was worth while". But, if weeks lengthened into months, and nothing more were done than the laying of this most excellent foundation, he would rightly consider that a foundation, however, good and solid, was a waste of good material unless a building was erected upon it.

So far as the individual is concerned, this is also true of "fundamental truth". The foundation has been laid so that a building may go up. We need both I Cor. iii. and Heb. vi. to give us the complete truth. The wise master-builder lays a foundation, but he does not proceed to lay it again.

No one is fit to be a teacher who has not gone further than the elements, though the elements are, of course, necessary:--

> "For when for the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one teach you AGAIN what are the elements of the beginning of the oracles of God" (Heb. vi. 1).

Teaching should be constructive, and the twofold figure of growth and building should be constantly before the mind—"rooted" as a tree, and "grounded" as a building. Unless a tree grows and produces fruit it "cumbereth the ground". Unless the great foundation be used for a building that shall stand the test of fire, it has been wasted.

Be distinct in your teaching; remember the word "sting" and let your teaching be with point.

Give the sense so that the word spoken shall minister to the edifying of the hearer.

See to it that the great foundation be well laid, but remember also to lead your hearers on "unto perfection", "not laying again the foundation."

#16. "I have fed you with milk, and not with meat" (I Cor. iii. 2).

pp. 226, 227

While it is necessary to heed the words: "not laying again the foundation", the principle involved in the passage quoted at the head of this article is also of great importance. The spirit manifested in John xvi. 12 must ever be with the teacher:--

> "I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now."

The full passage of I Cor. iii. 2 is very similar:--

> "I have fed you with milk, and not with meat: for hitherto ye were not able to bear it, neither yet now are ye able."

It was because of this that the apostle said that he:-- > "Determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ, and Him crucified . . . . . howbeit we speak wisdom among them that are perfect" (I Cor. ii. 2, 6).

When the Corinthians objected to the withholding of the more advanced truth, the apostle replied:--

> "Let a man so account of us, as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God" (I Cor. iv. 1).

A steward must be faithful, and if in the faithful exercise of his commission as a dispenser of the truth some should attempt to judge him adversely, such judgment will be considered "a very small thing" as compared with the judgment of the Lord (I Cor. iv. 3, 4).

To continue the use of "milk" unduly, however, is a sign of retrogression (Heb. v. 12, 13): those who seek to go on unto perfection need something more. Peter says:--

> "As newborn babes, desire the sincere milk of the word, that ye may GROW thereby" (I Pet. ii. 2).

Here we see that milk is quite right for “newborn babes”, being taken with the object that growth may result. It is either a species of false humility, or a very sad confession of failure, for a child of God of some years’ standing to say: “I am but a babe.”

Therefore while all ministry must adjust itself to the capacity of the hearer, there should ever be that onward and upward urge that builds upon the foundation, grows by the milk of the word, and leads on to the perfect man.

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS of the ONE BODY,

We are reminded, this day, of the words of Moses to Israel: "Thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee" (Deut. viii. 2). Israel were reminded not only of provision, but of proving; not only of manna and miracle, but of hunger and humbling.

We, too, look back over the year and over the years. What a testimony they yield of utter faithfulness, of longsuffering, of grace beyond expression on the part of the Lord.

We have continual evidence that were the Lord not our Shield, our testimony would have been silenced long ago. We boast only in Him. We are glad to know that as the Lord "stood by" the apostle, so will He stand by the feeblest attempt to maintain that "good deposit" (II Tim. i. 12-14) until in His mercy "all the Gentiles" shall have heard.

In this spirit and in this assurance we thankfully close another year's testimony, and look forward to the coming year with chastened yet unflinching confidence.

Yours in the unity to the Spirit,

CHARLES H. WELCH

Some of us stay at the Cross,
Some of us wait at the Tomb,
Quickened, raised, seated together with Christ,
Yet lingering still in its gloom.
Some of us bide at the Passover Feast
With Ascension all unknown--
The triumphs of grace in the heavenly place
That our Lord has made our own.

If the Christ Who died had stopped at the Cross
His work had been incomplete,
If the Christ Who was buried had stayed in the Tomb
He had only known defeat.
But the way of the Cross never stops at the Cross
And the way of the Tomb leads on
To victorious grace in the heavenly place
Where the risen Lord has gone.

Biblical blessings.

#1. "The blessing of the Lord, it maketh rich, and He addeth no sorrow with it" (Prov. x. 22).

pp. 197 - 199

Pursuing our intention of including, in the articles appearing in this periodical, ministry of a more simple character, as a set-off to the somewhat harder reading that the nature of our witness often necessitates, we draw attention to a series of "Biblical blessings" found in the Scriptures, believing that the contemplation of such cannot but be an encouragement to us all.

At the outset we are met with the fact that the Scriptures, as translated into English, present to the reader two words, "happy" and "blessed", as the translation of ashere in the Hebrew, and makarios in the Greek. The two conceptions in the words "happy" and "blessed" need to be kept apart. To be strictly applicable to the believer, "happy", in its English constituents, contains too much the idea of that which falls out by "hap". It would, however, introduce the very feature we wish to avoid in these particular articles, were we to conduct the reader along the paths of enquiry that lead to a true differentiation of ashere and barak in the Hebrew, and eulogeo-etos and makarios-izo in the Greek. For the present, then, let it suffice that makarios was used by the Ancients for the "Immortals", and indicates a bliss that does not draw from external sources, whereas eulogeo, "to eulogise", means to be well spoken of by others, and therefore has more reference to external sources.

Leaving these refinements for a more fitting occasion, we turn our attention to the word ashere, translated both "blessed" and "happy". One or two marginal references found in the A.V. will give us an idea of the general, underlying, meaning of ashere, "blessed":--

> "They which lead thee" (margin 'call thee blessed') (Isa. iii. 12).
> "The leaders of this people" (margin 'they called them blessed') (Isa. ix. 16).
> "They that are led of them" (margin 'called blessed') (Isa. ix. 16).

Here we discover that an element of uncertainty existed in the minds of the translators, owing to the fact that, in the Hebrew, "blessing" is derived from the idea of "going forward". If we examine the word ashere that gives us "blessed", we discover that it means:--

(1) TO PROCEED, GO FORWARD.
"Forsake the foolish and live, and GO in the way of understanding" (Prov. ix. 6).

(2) STEPS.
"None of his STEPS shall slide" (Psa. xxxvii. 31).

(3) THE RELATIVE PRONOUN "WHO".
The relative pronoun enables a sentence to "proceed" easily.

"The salvation of the Lord which He will show you" (Exod. xiv. 13).

"The Egyptians whom ye have seen to-day" (Exod. xiv. 13).

Both "which" and "whom" are translations of ashere. If the reader will attempt to re-write these sentences and avoid using "which" or "whom" he will appreciate the Hebrew use of the word that "goes forward".

There is close affinity between ashere and yashar, "straight", and the root idea of "blessedness", as expressed by the Hebrew word ashere, appears to be: "Prosperity as the necessary accompaniment of uprightness." The reader will probably turn to Psa. i. 1 as a pointed illustration of this meaning. This we must consider later: for the moment we are concerned with the statement of Prov. x. 22 as to "the blessing of the Lord".

This blessing of the Lord, we learn, "maketh rich". We must now introduce the reader to another feature, not evident in the translation, but very evident in the original. We have seen that the word "blessed" is ashere: we now learn that the words "maketh rich" translate ashar. The vowels with which the two words commence are not the same, though expressed in English by the letter "a". This play upon words is a feature far more common than many think, and, as the following examples show, impresses the mind with the truth conveyed:--

"And the earth became tohu and bohu" (without form and void) (Gen. i. 2).

"The gods that have not made (avadu) the heavens and the earth, even they shall perish" (yevadu) (Jer. x. 11).

Blessing and enrichment are evidently to be thought of together.

What a plenitude of riches constitutes the blessings of the Lord as unfolded in the N.T.! There we read of riches of goodness, riches of glory, riches of wisdom and riches of grace (Rom. ii. 4; ix. 23; xi. 33; Eph. i. 7; ii. 7; iii. 16). And, even so, we have not named the blessing of the Lord as a whole, for there are two sides of His benediction. Positively, the blessing of the Lord maketh rich. Negatively, He addeth no sorrow with it. The Scriptures abound with references to the fact that "riches" and "sorrow" often keep company:--

"They that will to be rich fall into temptation, and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is a root of all evil; which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through many sorrows" (I Tim. vi. 9, 10).

"Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not highminded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, Who giveth us richly all things to enjoy" (I Tim. vi. 17).

"He went away sorrowful, for he had great possessions" (Matt. xix. 22).

Here, then, we pause and contemplate the source, nature and the essential distinctiveness of Biblical blessings:--

(1) THE SOURCE.—"The blessing of the Lord."
(2) THE NATURE.—"Blessing" has to do with progress and uprightness.
(3) THE ESSENTIAL DISTINCTIVENESS.—(a) It maketh rich, and
(b) adds no sorrow.

It shall be our blessedness together to consider, in subsequent articles, some of these distinctive Biblical blessings. May the Lord make us rich in so doing.

#2. The blessing that accompanies confession (Psa. xxxii. 1-5).
pp. 231 - 234

Let us commence our review of some biblical blessings at the book of the Psalms, and divide up our subject according to the five-fold division of that book. The sign that marks off these divisions is a double Amen, which we find at the end of Psa. xli.; lxxii; lxxxix. and *cvi. ( only one here). Book I therefore comprises Psa. i.-xli., and in it we have four distinct biblical blessings: blessings that are from the Lord, that make rich, and that add no sorrow:--

The blessedness of CONSISTENCY (Psa. i. 1).
The blessedness of CONFIDENCE (Psa. ii. 12; xxxiv. 8; and xl. 4).
The blessedness of CONFESSION (Psa. xxxii. 1-5).
The blessedness of CONSIDERATION (Psa. xli. 1).

Instead of starting at Psa. i., let us commence at Psa. xxxii., where all must begin, with a blessing that must be known and enjoyed before any manifestation of life and grace is possible:--

> "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered. Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity, and in whose spirit there is no guile" (Psa. xxxii. 1, 2).

The Psalm is divided into four portions by the word Selah. Among the purposes which Selah fulfils is the useful one of calling upon the reader to pause, think of what has been said, and compare with what immediately follows. Without burdening the reader of these simple lines with an elaborate structure of the Psalms, we feel that the arrangement of its parts, as indicated by the recurring Selah, is too important to pass over:--

1-4	Blessedness. Contrasted with grief.
	Selah. Think of this. Now consider what follows.
5	Acknowledgment and Confession.
	Selah. See the progress, how Confession leads to Praise.
6, 7	Prayer and Song.
	Selah. Then shall I teach transgressors Thy ways, said David.
8-11	Subsequent Instruction.

The Psalmist speaks of "transgression", "sin", and "iniquity", and he may well have had Exod. xxxiv. 7 in mind. There (in Exod. xxxiv.) the Lord reveals His glory, His goodness and His grace.

We have given reasons in Volume XXI, page 24, of The Berean Expositor, for rejecting the translation: "Thou wilt by no means clear the guilty", and for rendering the passage: "Thou wilt clear him who is not clear." In Volume XVI, pages 183-191, we have traced the various shades of meaning contained in the words "sin", "transgression", and "iniquity". It is not our purpose to go into the meanings of these separate terms, or to give proofs, all that it is necessary to say here is that the essential meaning of "sin" is missing the mark; of "transgression", rebellion; and of "iniquity", perverseness. No wonder David exclaims at the blessedness of the man who is forgiven such rebellion, whose utter moral failure is covered, and to whom the Lord no longer reckons, or imputes, such inherent and radical perversity.

It is natural to express this aspect first. If we speak as we find, both in ourselves and others, our awakening concern is our sin, its nature, and particularly its liability to dreadful punishment. As we grow in grace our realization of the exceeding sinfulness of sin increases, and our heartfelt appreciation of the grace, the love, and withal the righteousness displayed in our forgiveness, causes us to repeat, with perhaps fuller meaning than before, "Blessed is the man whose transgression is forgiven . . . . . covered . . . . . not imputed". For the word "forgive" means "to lift up and take away" and finds its full meaning in the words of the Baptist, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world" (John i. 29).

It would be pardonable if the English reader who understands the meaning of the O.T. word "atonement" were to conclude that the covering of sin referred to in this opening verse of Psa. xxxii. was a translation of the Hebrew word kaphar. Such, however, is not the case: the actual word that is used is kasah. This word means "to conceal" (Gen. xxxvii. 26), "to cover", as nakedness (Exod. xxviii. 42), and "to vail" (Gen. xxiv. 65). When God conceals, covers, or vails sin, it is done righteously. He never touches sin—except in wrath—apart from the sacrifice that atones and puts it away.

The reason why the Psalmist is so exultant, and uses this word, is discovered in verse 5, where it occurs once more: "I have acknowledged my sin unto Thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid" (kasah).

In Prov. x. 12 we read: "love covereth all sins", and love is seen at this gracious work in Psa. xxxii. 1. Again, in Prov. xvii. 9 we read: "He that covereth a transgression seeketh love", and we who have received mercy at the hand of the Lord should indeed ever be merciful. On the other hand, Prov. xxviii. 13 says:--

> "He that covereth his sins shall not prosper; but whoso confesseth and forsaketh them shall have mercy."

David had "covered" his sin, and had endured agony and grief as a result:--

> "When I kept silence, my bones waxed old through my roaring all the day long" (Psa. xxxii. 3).

"Roaring" and "silence", at first sight, seem incompatible; but they are to be considered as on two different planes. All David's "roaring" was unheard by reason of the non-confession of his sin. David was guilty of murder and adultery, and in the language of another king equally guilty of a similar double crime, we may catch a faint echo of that troubled silence that dried up his moisture as the drought of summer:--

"Pray can I not,
Though inclination be as sharp as will:
My stronger guilt defeats my strong intent;
And, like a man to double business bound,
I stand and pause where I shall first begin,
And both neglect . . . . .

May one be pardoned and retain the offence?
In the corrupted currents of the world
Offence's gilded hand may shove by justice,
And oft'tis seen the wicked prize itself
Buys out the law; but 'tis not so above" (Shakespeare).

The whole Psalm turns upon that word "acknowledged" of verse 5, and David's blessed experience was, that when he ceased "hiding", guiltily, his sin, God could then "hide" it righteously and in grace. It is not possible to "be pardoned and retain the offence". Prov. xxviii. 13, already quoted, says not only "confess" but "forsake".

Here then is a biblical blessing that lies at the very forefront of all spiritual experience. Without this, all other blessings are but names, and can never be experienced, but with this initial blessing, come crowding around the accepted believer many marvelous outpourings of love and mercy. These we wish to investigate and enjoy, and we trust that our study together may be profitable indeed, leading us by many avenues and roads back to the opening text of the series:--

"The blessing of the Lord, it maketh rich, and He addeth no sorrow with it" (Prov. x. 22).

#17. Wherein the meaning of "comfort" (parakaleo) and "knit together" (sumbibazo) is considered (ii. 2).

pp. 13 - 17

The intense conflict that the apostle had for the saints is explained in two ways. First he says he taught and warned every man that he might present every man perfect in Christ Jesus. Secondly, he says that the great conflict he had was:--

> "That their hearts may be comforted, they being knit together in love, and unto all riches of full assurance of understanding, that they may know the mystery of God, even Christ, in Whom are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden" (Col. ii. 2, 3, R.V.)

The R.V. marginal note here says: "The ancient authorities vary much in the text of this passage." The reading they have adopted has the sanction of that most important Manuscript, the Vatican, and that is the reading we believe to be the true one.

We advance, by a progressive series, to the heart of the great secret of God, which is Christ. The first step in this progress toward "perfection" is a "comforted heart". The word "comfort" has lost a great deal of its original meaning, for even in the English word the idea of strengthening or fortifying can be seen "com-fort", which is derived from the Latin cum = "together", and fort-is = "strong". The Greek word translated "comfort" is parakaleo, from para = "beside" and kaleo = "to call". The idea of consolation or of comfort is not resident in the word itself, but from being one of the many reasons why we may "call someone beside" us, it has grown until it dominates all the rest. Dr. E. W. Bullinger in his Greek Concordance says of this word:--

> "To call to one, call near, call for; every kind of speaking to, which is meant to produce a particular effect, e.g., exhortation, encouragement, comfort", etc.

In II Tim. iv. 2 we have the word "comfort" rendered "exhort":--

> "Preach the word: be instant in season, out of season: reprove, rebuke, exhort with all longsuffering and doctrine."

We find the word used together and somewhat synonymous with "testify" in Acts ii. 40:--

> "Testify and exhort, saying, Save yourselves from this untoward generation."

There are eight occurrences of the word parakaleo in I Thessalonians, and one occurrence of paraklesis. Coming together in such close proximity these should yield come consistent rendering that will illumine the meaning of Col. ii. 2. Let us note the passages:-- Parakaleo in I Thessalonians.

"How we exhorted and comforted and charged every one of you, as a father doth his children" (ii. 11).
"And sent Timotheus to establish and to comfort you concerning your faith" (iii. 2).
"We were comforted over you in all our affliction and distress by your faith" (iii. 7).
"We beseech you, brethren, and exhort you by the Lord Jesus" (iv. 1).
"But we beseech you, brethren, that ye increase more and more" (iv. 10).
"Wherefore comfort one another with these words" (iv. 18).
"Wherefore comfort yourselves together, and edify one another" (v. 11).
"We exhort you, brethren, warn them that are unruly, comfort the feeble minded" (v. 14).

Paraklesis in I Thessalonians.

"For our exhortation was not of deceit nor of uncleanness, nor in guile" (ii. 3).

It is manifestly impossible to use the word "comfort" in every one of these passages, but in one of them the true word in the sense of soothing or consoling actually occurs (v. 14). What we apparently want is a word that shall combine the idea of exhortation and comfort—not exactly consolation, and not exactly warning. This word we find in Deut. iii. 28:--

"But charge Joshua, and encourage him, and strengthen him."

In the Septuagint the words are reversed, viz., "strengthen and encourage", and the second word is the translation of parakaleo. It will be seen that these ancient translators knew that underlying the idea of comfort in sorrow was the "fortifying" of the spirit, expressed fully and yet quite idiomatically in the English word "encourage".

If the reader will examine the eight references from I Thessalonians given above, or any other of its many occurrences, and substitute the word "encourage" for the renderings, "exhort", "beseech", "comfort", etc., he will find in it the word that fully fits every case.

The first step towards being presented perfect in Christ Jesus, therefore, is for the heart to be encouraged, even as Joshua was encouraged, to stand firm upon all the word and will of God for us. This will be the result of the double ministry of "warning and teaching" mentioned in Col. i. 28.

Flowing from this encouragement of heart is the condition described as "Being knit together in love". At first there may not appear to be a most intimate connection between parakaleo ("comfort", "exhort", "encourage") and sumbibazo ("knit together"), but let us see. This word sumbibazo is found in Eph. iv. 16 and Col. ii. 19:--

"From Whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth . . . . . maketh increase of the body" (Eph. iv. 16).
"From whom all the body by joints and bands having nourishment ministered, and knit together, increaseth with the increase of God" (Col. ii. 19).

With these two references to the effect of the "joints and bands" upon the whole body, we might leave the matter as being fairly obvious to all readers. This word sumbibazo, however, occurs in three other places in the N.T., and in ten places in the Septuagint, but never in the sense used in Eph. iv. 16 and Col. ii. 19. The fact is too important to ignore, and consequently we give the reader the whole of the references before proceeding:--

Sumbibazo in Septuagint.

"I will . . . . . teach thee what thou shalt say" (Exod. iv. 12).
"I will teach you what ye shall do" (Exod. iv. 15).
"I do make them know the statutes of God" (Exod. xviii. 16).
"That ye may teach the children of Israel" (Lev. x. 11).
"Teach them thy sons, and thy son's sons" (Deut. iv. 9).
"Teach us what we shall do" (Judges xiii. 8).
"I will instruct thee and teach thee" (Psa. xxxii. 8; LXX Psa. xxxi. 8).
"Who being His counselor hath taught Him?" (Isa. xl. 13).
"With whom took He counsel, and who instructed Him?" (Isa. xl. 14).
"I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding" (Dan. ix. 22).

Sumbibazo in N.T.

"Proving that this is the very Christ" (Acts ix. 22).
"Assuredly gathering that the Lord had called us" (Acts xvi. 10).
"Who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct Him?" (I Cor. ii. 16).
"The whole body . . . . . compacted" (Eph. iv. 16).
"The body . . . . . knit together" (Col. ii. 19).
"Being knit together in love" (Col. ii. 2).

It will be seen that apart from the references in Ephesians and Colossians, the usage is uniform and consistent, whether in Old Testament or New.

Sumbibazo is derived from sum = "together with" and baino = "to go, to walk, to step". Unless the reader has had some experimental acquaintance with the subject, it may appear difficult to reconcile such, apparently, different ideas as "to teach" and "to be compacted together". To help such we mention one or two other instances in our own language.

The word "articulate" means (1) "to enunciate, or to utter clearly", and (2) "formed with joints". We can, therefore, say: "the man who had difficulty in articulating his shoulder joint, articulated his words very clearly." Again, the average reader, if he saw the word "colon", would immediately think of the sign (:) used in punctuation. A medical student, however, would probably think of the large intestine. How does it come about that a punctuation mark and a part of the intestine bear the same name? The answer is that the Greek word kolon means "a limb", and the punctuation sign (:) marks off a large limb of a sentence, while the name given to the largest portion of the intestine is for the same reason, it is a large "limb". Both of these examples have the merit of using a word in two senses, the one to do with speech, the other to do with the human body—and so illumine the usage of sumbibazo which also deals with speech and with physiology.

The common meaning that united such opposite ideas in "articulate" and "colon" will unite the apparent incongruity in the translations of sumbibazo. The "teaching", "proving" and "assuredly gathering" are the outcome of making the subject-matter of instruction "walk together" with the explanation. For example, in Acts xvi. 10 the apostle "put two and two together", and realized that the vision of the man of Macedonia indicated the will of the Lord for their entry into Europe. Again, in Acts ix. 22 Paul evidently made the known facts of the birth, life, death and resurrection of Christ "to walk together" with the prophecies of the O.T. Scriptures, thus "proving that this is the very Christ".

We now return to Col. ii. 2. "Being knit together in love" must be explained by all the facts. To limit ourselves to Eph. iv. 16 or to Col. ii. 19 is to miss the interpretation for ourselves. We are "members" of a body, and "members" one of another. We do minister "nourishment", and are thus "joints of supply". But what do we minister as nourishment? The literal body is nourished by the blood stream, and makes increase by the various secretions of wonderful glands, but these need re-translating into spiritual equivalents. What is the "life-blood" that nourishes the church, and that is ministered by fellow-members? Surely it is the "truth of God" and as we say this all the references to "teaching" and "proving", etc., immediately come into line.

If we will look again at Eph. iv. 16 and Col. ii. 19 we shall find that "the faith", "the knowledge", "the truth", "the understanding", "the ignorance" (Eph. iv. 13-21); "the commandments and doctrines of men" and "a show of wisdom" (Col. ii. 22, 23) are in the context, and explain the ministry of the members of the body. So, in Col. ii. 2, the words "being knit together in love" are followed by:--

> "All the riches of the full assurance of the understanding, in order to a full knowledge of the mystery of God—Christ. In Whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (Col. ii. 2, 3).

The subject is so vital to our spiritual growth, and there is so much to be considered before we can conclude this section, that it will be in our best interests to devote another article to the passage we have just quoted but not explained. We, therefore, hope to conclude Col. ii. 2 and 3 in our next article.

#18. Hid treasure (ii. 2, 3).

We found in our last article that the expression "knit together" of Col. ii. 2 includes the idea of teaching and instructing as well as "compacting together", and that just as nourishment is ministered to the physical body through the "joints and bands" working harmoniously together in conjunction with the head, so spiritual nourishment, that is the truth, is ministered by one member to another as each "holds the Head" and realizes that "in Him are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge".

We shall "encourage" (parakaleo = "to comfort") the heart best when point away to the Head, even Christ, Who now sitteth on the right hand of God. We shall minister that which makes for the increase of God in the church when we "teach" and "preach" Christ. We shall minister both to our own "full assurance" and to that of others when we realize that the very mystery of God is summed up in the single title "Christ": we shall be proof against all vain philosophy of men if we ever acknowledge that in Christ are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.

We sometimes read that a certain Preacher ministers to a "wealthy congregation". That is the blessed position of the writer of these words. His congregation, made up mostly of scattered members of the church which is the body of Christ, is wealthy beyond dreams. Of no other church is such wealth spoken. Does the apostle speak of its redemption? then it is according to the riches of His grace (Eph. i. 7). Does he speak of the glorious inheritance awaiting us? then he speaks of the riches of its glory (Eph. i. 18). Does he speak of the yet future ages? then he speaks of the exceeding riches of grace and kindness yet to be shown unto us (Eph. ii. 7). The very mystery that is his theme is defined as "the unsearchable riches of Christ" (Eph. iii. 8), and the answer to his prayer is according to the riches of the glory (Eph. iii. 16). So in Colossians there are riches beyond the dreams of avarice and beyond the touch of corruption:--

The riches of the glory of this mystery \
The riches of the full assurance . . . . . mystery } are all in CHRIST
The treasures of wisdom and knowledge / (Col. i. 27; ii. 2, 3).

The item of wealth immediately before us is "The riches of the full assurance of understanding". Ignorance is costly; uncertainty is sometimes fatal. The apostle who could say, "I know Whom I have believed", could not be shamed or cowed though all men forsook him. The word plerophoria, which is translated "full assurance", occurs in the New Testament as follows:--

"For our gospel came not unto you in word only, but in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance" ((I Thess. i. 5).

"We desire that every one of you do shew the same diligence to the full assurance of hope unto the end" (Heb. vi. 11).

"Let us draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith" (Heb. x. 22).

"All the riches of the full assurance of understanding" (Col. ii. 2).

The verbal form gives us the translations: "most surely believed" (Luke i. 1); "fully persuaded" (Rom. iv. 21, xiv. 5); "make full proof" (II Tim. iv. 5); "fully known" (II Tim. iv. 17). There is an element of completion about the word, together with the feeling of enabling power, for phoria comes from phero = "to carry", which is directly connected with the purpose of the apostle in his desire to present every man "perfect", or carried along completely to the end.

This full assurance of understanding is "with a view to a full knowledge or acknowledgment (epignosis) of the mystery of God". This full knowledge or acknowledgment of the mystery of God is summed up in one word—"Christ". The A.V. here reads: "The mystery of God, and of the Father, and of Christ." The R.V. reads: "The mystery of God, even Christ." The Manuscripts show a great variety of readings, almost every possible combination and arrangement of the words being found. Textual criticism is not every man's work, for it is easy to rush in where, possibly, angels would fear to tread. We believe the general reader would be little wiser if we occupied pages filled with references to Manuscripts and quotations of the "Fathers". It may be sufficient to justify the acceptance of the R.V. reading if we say that Greisbach, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tregelles, Alford and Wordsworth (men who have edited the Greek text at different times during a period of two hundred years) point to this as the true reading, and the weight of that most important Manuscript, Vatican B, is in its favour. In the series under the heading "The Volume of the Book" we shall be able to deal with this question of the various "texts"; to attempt more here would but cumber the mind, and stay the teaching that it is our object to give.

Proceeding, therefore, we observe that from the opening of this section in Col. i. 28 until this point is reached in Col. ii. 2, there has been a definite movement in one direction, a teaching leading to one person, a revelation of a fullness discernible nowhere else but in Christ:--

> "The riches of the glory of the mystery among the Gentiles is CHRIST" (Col. i. 27).
> "The riches of the full assurance of understanding to the acknowledgment of the mystery of God is CHRIST" (Col. ii. 2).

The touchstone of all doctrine, whether it be expressed as "philosophy", whether it has the sanction of "tradition", or comes with all the force of the accepted "rudiments of the world", is CHRIST (Col. ii. 8). Christ is revealed as our very life itself (Col. iii. 4), and eventually as our "All and in all" (Col. iii. 11).

It is the simplest yet the most profound lesson of the ages. "The mystery of God" is the all embracive secret within which all other mysteries find their sphere, and which are solved in the Person of Christ. "That I may know Him" is the climax of all prayer. "I know Whom I have believed" is the basis of all assurance. "To know the love of Christ" is to possess a knowledge far beyond our greatest faculties. "The excellency of the knowledge of Christ" makes all lesser attainments so much offal, and the very unity of the faith unto which we all press is, above all, "the knowledge of the Son of God". Paul's gospel was Christ (I Cor. i. 23; II Cor. iv. 5; Gal. i. 16; Rom. i. 1, 3, 16; Phil. i. 18).

Paul's doctrine was Christ (Eph. iv. 20). His life here in the flesh (Gal. ii. 20), the goal of this life (Phil. i. 21), and the life of resurrection glory (Col. iii. 4) was Christ:--

"Yea thro' life, death, thro' sorrow and thro' sinning
He shall suffice me, for He hath sufficed:
Christ is the end, for Christ was the beginning,
Christ the beginning, for the end is Christ."

No language of ours can express anything approaching the fullness that the heart realized to be resident in these words of Col. ii. 2. Nothing less than a life-long exposition of these epistles could hope to touch the fringe of so mighty a theme. We will, therefore, continue our study of the many facets of this one truth that irradiate with His glory the sacred page:--

"In Whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (Col. ii. 3).

The English word "treasure" comes from the Greek word thesauros. The Lexicons suggest that it is made up of the phrase, thesis eis aurion = "laying up for the morrow". More than one Hebrew word has the idea of something hidden or concealed in its composition. The word otsar of Deut. xxviii. 12 means "a thing laid up", and is possibly the original from which the Greek thesauros was derived. Matmon, of Job iii. 21, is from taman = "to hide or secrete", as in Gen. xxxv. 4. It seems to be the essence of a treasure that it should be stored, concealed or hid:--

"Is this not laid up in store with Me, and sealed up among My treasures?" (Deut. xxxii. 34).
"The Lord shall open unto thee His good treasure" (Deut. xxviii. 12).
"What have they seen? There is nothing among my treasures that I have not showed them" (II Kings xx. 15).
"Dig for it more than for hid treasures" (Job iii. 21).
"If thou seekest her as silver, and searchest for her as for hid treasure" (Prov. ii. 4).
"Treasures hid in the sand" (Deut. xxxiii. 19).
"The kingdom of heaven is like unto treasure hid in a field; the which when a man hath found, he hideth" (Matt. xiii. 44).
"We have this reassure in earthen vessels" (II Cor. iv. 7).

God's secret and God's treasure seem to meet in Christ:--

"In Whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (Col. ii. 3).

It is not accurate to deduce from this statement that the treasures of God hidden in Christ are exhausted in wisdom and knowledge, for we have already seen that all the riches of grace and glory are also to be found in Him. The apostle particularly selects wisdom and knowledge, because of the teaching of a vain and deceitful wisdom ("philosophy" and "show of wisdom", Col. ii. 8, 23), and the "opposition of knowledge (science) falsely so called" (I Tim. vi. 20), the incipient Gnosticism that is found in the great warning of Col. ii. 4-23. Including the compound philosophia, the word "wisdom" (sophia) is found in Colossians seven times, and appears in such an order as to compel attention:--

"Sophia" in Colossians.

A | i. 9. Wisdom and walk (Godward).
B | i. 28. Warning and teaching.
C | ii. 3. The treasure of wisdom.
D | ii. 8. Vain deceitful philosophy.
C | ii. 23. The show of wisdom.
B | iii. 16. Teaching and warning.
A | iv. 5. Wisdom and walk (Manward).

With this full assurance, understanding, knowledge and treasure available, why should we turn aside to empty cisterns that can hold no water? We conclude with the following lines of Cowper (known to many as the writer of the Olney Hymns) whose Bi-centenary falls in this year of grace:--

"But reason still, unless divinely taught,
Whate'er she learns, learns nothing as she ought;
The lamp of revelation only shows,
What human wisdom cannot but oppose,
That man in nature's richest mantle clad,
And graced with all philosophy can add.
Though fair without, and luminous within,
Is still the progeny and heir of sin.
Thus taught, down falls the plumage of his pride,
He feels his need of an unerring guide,
And knows that falling he shall rise no more,
Unless the power that bade him stand, restore.
This is indeed philosophy; this known,
Makes wisdom, worthy of the name, his own;
And without this, whatever he discuss,
Whether the space between the stars and us,
Whether he measure earth, compute the sea,
Weigh sunbeams, carve a fly, or spit a flea,
The solemn trifler with his boasted skill
Toils much, and is a solemn trifler still;
Blind was he born, and his misguided eyes Grown blind in trifling studies, blind he dies."

#19. BEWARE.
An important parenthesis examined (ii. 5-7).
pp. 82 - 87

We now approach the distinctive feature of the epistle to the Colossians. While it shares with Ephesians the glory of making known "what is the dispensation of the mystery" and traverses much of the same ground, we have observed that the apostle condenses the truth into a smaller compass, as though anxious to get to his main point. Already the warning note has been sounded in the first chapter:--

> "Whom we preach, WARNING every man, and teaching every man . . . . . that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus" (Col. i. 28).

The twofold reference to "presentation" (Col. i. 22 and 28) makes it clear that the apostle entertains no doubts as to the believer's standing in Christ. His conflict and prayer have to do with their "perfecting". Satan does not employ useless energy in attacking the believer's life, for that life is hid with Christ in God. Only in the realm of growth and reward is there any element of contingency, and it is along this line that the Satanic attack must be expected. Hence, in Col. ii. 18 the apostle sums up his warning in the words:--

> "Let no man beguile you of your REWARD."

The attack upon the believer comes along the line of "humility", "worship", "abstinence", "observance" and "neglect". Throughout the passage (Col. ii. 4-23) there is not one allusion to vice or immorality. The Colossian saints would have been proof against any attempt upon the part of the Evil One to have led them into gross sin. The wiles of the Devil are skillfully adapted to their end. The apostle reveals that in the latter times the apostacy that is introduced by demonic doctrines will come under this same guise of sanctity. Instead of the gross immorality that soiled the fair name of the Corinthians, we have the other extreme:--

> "Forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth" (I Tim. iv. 1-4).

From a religious point of view, respect for holy days and sabbaths makes a fair show. The worshipping of angels, the observance of prohibitory commands and the neglect of the body, make a "show of humility". Yet all is vain and false. Anything, however sanctified it may seem outwardly, that leads away from Christ and His fullness is not of God, but from beneath.

The apostle warned, but he also taught:-- > "Warning every man and TEACHING every man in all wisdom" (Col. i. 28).

The words of Col. ii. 4, "This I say", refer back to the revelation of the mystery with its insistence upon the fullness of Christ. The words, "lest any man beguile you", lead on to the warnings of the remainder of the chapter. The juxtaposition of warning and teaching and the contrast between all that deceives and Christ Himself are indicated by the following analysis:--

A1 | i. 26, 27. HID. Riches of the glory of the mystery—CHRIST.
B1 | i. 28 - ii. 1. WARNING.
A2 | ii. 2, 3. HID. Riches of full assurance of mystery—CHRIST.
B2 | ii. 4 - iii. 3. WARNING.
A3 | iii. 4. HID. Life manifest in glory—CHRIST.

Here, as the apostle insists in Col. iii. 11, Christ is all and in all. He brings all teaching to the touchstone of Christ—"not after Christ" (Col. ii. 8)); "not holding the Head" (Col. ii. 19). He exposes the foolishness of ceremonials; they are but shadows and the body is of Christ (Col. ii. 16, 17). He disposes of all attempts to put the believer into the bondage of negative commands (Col. ii. 21) by reaffirming the doctrine of his identification with Christ in His death (Col. ii. 20).

Having seen the general drift of the passage, our next concern must be to seek the literary structure, so that we may be guided in our exposition by the arrangement of the truth.

Here we find that the subject-matter is divided in five sections, each section being devoted into one aspect of the error against which the apostle gives his warning and followed by a corrective. When we look at the first of these sections (verses 4-8) we see that the apostle has introduced a parenthesis—a point of style so that we may at the same time indicate one or two niceties of expression that are obscured in the A.V.:--

> "This I say, in order that no one may be reasoning you aside with plausible speech—
> (For though indeed I am absent in the flesh, yet I am with you in the spirit, rejoicing and beholding your order and the solid firmness of your Christward faith. As therefore ye have received Christ Jesus the Lord, walk in Him, having been rooted and being built up in Him, and being established in the faith, even as ye were taught, abounding in it with thanksgiving)—
> Beware lest any one shall be making a prey of you, through vain deceitful philosophy, according to the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not according to Christ: for in Him dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily, and ye are filled full in Him" (Col. ii. 4-10).

One of the reasons for this parenthesis is the desire of the apostle to encourage as well as to warn. It is his continual practice to refer first to some occasion of thankfulness to God before he finds fault or exhorts to fuller and higher things (See, for example, Rom. i. 8; I Cor. i. 4; Eph. i. 16; Phil. i. 3). So it is that before the warning comes, he interposes a note of joy—"joying and beholding your order"—and before the parenthesis is finished he speaks of the Colossians "abounding . . . . . with thanksgiving". When advising parents on the question of the upbringing of their children, the apostle was concerned that the children should not be discouraged (Col. iii. 21). He is here seen as the father of his believing children encouraging them along the path of faith. Moreover, a thankful spirit is of itself a wholesome corrective against unsound doctrine, and should be encouraged by all the means at our disposal. Observe how the apostle united thanksgiving with prayer (Phil. i. 3; iv. 6; Col. i. 3; I Thess. i. 2, etc.); with practice (Rom. xiv. 6; Heb. xiii. 15; Col. iii. 15; Eph. v. 4; I Tim. iv. 3, 4); and with doctrine (Rom. i. 21; Col. i. 12).

Two things brought joy to the apostle in the midst of his conflict for them: their "order" and the "solid firmness of their Christward faith". There was nothing of the martinet about the apostle, yet he appreciated and rejoiced in their order. The word taxis ("order") implies submission to divine appointments. To a church divided by schism, undermined by immoral conduct, and swayed by spectacular gifts, the apostle uses this word in admonition (I Cor. xiv. 40). It also occurs seven times in Hebrews in the phrase: "after the order of Melchisedec." In a practical connection, hupotasso is used in Eph. v. 21, 22 where the husband and wife accept their divinely-appointed order. The apostle is not thinking of some dead mechanical order that stultifies individuality and makes a mockery of equal membership in Christ, but of his main theme, "Holding Christ the Head".

While there are some things in I Cor. xi. that do not belong to the dispensation of the mystery, those of verse 3 are true of every dispensation since the time of Adam:--

> "But I would have you know that the head of every man is Christ; that the head of the woman is the man; and the head of Christ is God" (I Cor. xi. 3).

To live in the spirit of such a revelation is not bondage but glorious fullness:--

> "Therefore let no man glory in men. For all things are yours; whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present or things to come; all are yours, and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's" (I Cor. iii. 21-23).

Freedom from the domination of man, his doctrines, his traditions and his religion is not a state of spiritual lawlessness, but a state in which one Head alone is recognized—Christ. Freedom from false and harmful travesties of sanctification is not to be found in carelessness of life and walk, but in the recognition that all our acceptance is in Christ. Freedom from the handwriting of ordinances that were against us, and freedom from the bondage of types and shadows is to be found only in the realization of the fullness of Christ. So, the apostle rejoiced in their "order".

He rejoiced, moreover, in the stedfastness of their faith in Christ. We have re-translated the passage, "The solid firmness of your Christward faith", in order to give fuller expression to the apostle's meaning. The word translated "stedfastness" is stereoma, used by the LXX in Gen. i. 6 for "firmament". The word gains in significance when we remember that apostereo means "to defraud" (as in Mark x. 19) and occurs in I Tim. vi. 5:--

> "Perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, and destitute (apostereo) of the truth."

This seems to suggest (apo means "away from") that the deception against which the apostle warns would entice the believer away from the solid basis of Christ and His fullness.

The close association of doctrine and practice is seen in the apostle's exhortation:--

> "As ye have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in Him" (Col. ii. 6).

The repetition of the article here, ton Christon, ton Kurion, conveys the idea that the Colossians had received Christ as their Lord. Well, says the apostle, walk in Him as your Lord too. It is a complete summary of the apostle's teaching, which is expanded and enforced in the subsequent verses.

The reader will probably have noticed the slight change in the participles of verse 7: "having been rooted", "being built up" and "being established". "Having been rooted", corresponds to the receiving of Christ Jesus as Lord; "being built up" corresponds to the walking in Him. True practice follows from true doctrine; it is the fruit upon the tree whose root is planted in grace.

Finally, the apostle draws attention to what the Colossians had been taught as a corrective to the doctrines and traditions of men: "As you have been taught" (Col. ii. 7). The word "teach" is didasko, which gives the word "doctrine" (didaskalia), as found in

Eph. iv. 14, Col. ii. 22, I Tim. i. 10, etc. We have already noticed that the apostle combined "teaching" with "warning" (Col. i. 28); the same two words come together again in Col. iii. 16: "Teaching and admonishing one another." In contrast with the baseless traditions of men, the apostle urges the brethren at Thessalonica to "stand fast and hold fast the traditions" which they "had been taught" (II Thess. ii. 15).

Although the three verses we have been considering in this paper (Col. ii. 5-7) are a parenthesis and hold up the main sequence of the apostle's argument, they are fraught with meaning, and will repay all the attention we can give to them. Their burden is that the solid basis of our faith is in Christ, received and held as Head and Lord. Let all our practice flow from that blessed doctrine, and the wiles of the Devil shall leave us unharmed. Our standing is in Christ. Let our state but manifest this and we need not fear. Bring all to this touchstone, and life, service, walk and worship will be acceptable. More than this we cannot attain to in this life; less than this means a falling short of the "perfection" of which the apostle speaks (Col. i. 28).

#20. BEWARE.
Philosophy and its two supporters, tradition and the rudiments of the world (ii. 4-8).
pp. 123 - 129

Having considered the parenthesis of Col. ii. 5-7, we can now take up the teaching of Col. ii. 4-23 which constitutes the great distinctive note of the epistle. It is a solemn warning uttered in all faithfulness, with the object that every man may be presented "perfect in Christ Jesus". Three words must first claim our attention: "beguile" (paralogizomai); "enticing words" (pithanologia), and "spoil" (sulagogeo).

The story of man is interwoven with deception. From Gen. iii., where the Serpent beguiled Eve, until the last act of the Deceiver, recorded in the Book of the Revelation, deceit has taken its dread toll. No dispensation has been free from its attack; and no protection against it has been provided apart from the revelation of truth, the Word of God. So long as we hold fast to all that is written, so long as we obey the injunction rightly to divide the Word of truth, so long as we refuse to go one step beyond what is revealed, we are safe and at peace. To do otherwise is to mistake darkness for light, to heed the voice of the Serpent rather than the voice of God, to sow the seeds of error and reap the harvest of shame.

Deception is many-sided. We can be deceived, as in Eph. v. 6, with "vain words". Here the word "to deceive" (apatao) means "to seduce" or "lead astray", and occurs in another form in Col. ii. 8. We can also be deceived by wandering, or being caused to wander, from the path of truth, as in Eph. iv. 14, where the word used is plane, from which comes our word "planet", a wandering star.

Again, we can be deceived by false reasoning, by falsely-drawn conclusions, by permitting others to do our thinking for us. This is the meaning of the word "beguile", which we are considering (Col. ii. 4). It is the translation of paralogizomai, "to reason aside", and occurs again in Jas. i. 22. The context of the latter passage with its distinction between darkness and light is worthy of careful study. This "reasoning aside" is but a repetition of the initial deception in the garden of Eden. Our first parents failed because they did not stand fast to the actual words of God. "Yea, hath God said?" should be enough to make us flee. To palter with the Devil over the Word of God is to invite disaster. To commence a discussion along the lines of the Serpent's first question—"Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden?"—is to be led astray into the paths of death.

While faith is never unreasonable, there are many things known to faith that are beyond the powers of our reasoning, simply because they deal with facts and experiences beyond the present limits of man. It is here that philosophy steps in and attempts to fill the breach, and it is here also that the child of God must lay hold upon revealed truth and refuse to move. We are no match for Satan when it comes to philosophy, but we are more than a match for him while we keep to: "It is written."

We can now perhaps the better appreciate the apostle's words: "But this I say, lest any man beguile you", especially when we remember that he has already declared that the very treasury of wisdom and knowledge is Christ Himself. Who would turn aside to the cisterns of Plato, or of any modern speculator, when the fountain-head of all wisdom is already theirs?

"Enticing words" (pithanologia).—The false reasoning against which the apostle warned the saints was accomplished by the use of "enticing words". He himself has told us how he resolutely set such persuasive methods aside. "And my speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom" (I Cor. ii. 4). Rather was it in the all-prevailing wisdom of the cross, foolish as it appeared in the eyes of the wise of this world, and impossible as it appeared to the philosopher. As in I Corinthians so in Colossians, the apostle has but one ground of appeal whether to sinner or saint—Christ, His death, His burial, His resurrection.

To every reader we should say, Look to the arguments whereby men seek to persuade you. (The series entitled, "With all thy getting, get understanding", will, we trust, be of help in this regard). Strip them of their gorgeous dress, re-write them in the language of cold matter of fact. If you are persuaded, be persuaded by fact and not by feeling.

"To spoil" (sulagogeo).—This word means "to carry off as plunder" and is derived from sulao, which means, in Homer's Iliad, "to strip the vanquished of their armour". We have earlier remarked that Satan is not wasting his efforts in attempting to rob us of our life, for that is safe, being hid with Christ in God. He is, however, using all his efforts to rob us of our reward (Col. ii. 18), to spoil our service, to ruin our fellowship and to shackle us with bonds and fears. In these things it is all too true that we may "give place to the Devil". The reward or crown held out to the believer is associated with a conflict, a fight of faith, so that the fact that the word "spoil" means "to rob one of his armour" is most suggestive. Has Satan never attempted to rob you of your sword, fellow-soldier? Has he never attempted to deprive you of your shield? Only as we stand in the whole armour of God are we proof against the fiery darts of the wicked. Only as we stand and stand completely, trustingly and assuredly "in Christ" for all things, are we not only "saved" but "safe". This is the apostle's burden in this chapter—so to minister the fullness of Christ that the vain words of men shall fall unheeded.

Having considered the threefold attack of the enemy—"false reasoning", "enticing" and "spoiling"—we now turn our attention to the means that he employs. Again we find that the menace is threefold: "philosophy", "tradition" and "rudiments".

The expression, "philosophy and vain deceit", is an instance of the use of the figure Hendiadys ("two for one"), and conveys the meaning, "A vain, deceitful philosophy", with an emphasis upon the words "vain" and "deceitful". Kenos, the word translated "vain", means "empty", and should be read in conjunction with verses 9 and 10, where true "fullness" is found.

What is philosophy? It is the search by unaided minds for wisdom, an attempt, without supernatural revelation, to get to the bottom of things. The word "philosophy" was invented by Socrates in the fifth century B.C. He intended a distinction between himself and the sophoi, the wise men. He called himself a philosopher, not because he had attained wisdom or knowledge, but because he sought it. Philosophy to him meant a criticism of all the assumptions of science, in order that, as a result of this criticism, one might be able to comprehend the whole. Alas, the task was too great for human wisdom. "The world by wisdom knew not God" (I Cor. i. 21). However skillfully the philosopher may have reasoned, he was bound to fail. His premises were defective and his conclusions could not but be erroneous. He is an example of one who has been beguiled, or "reasoned aside", with enticing words of man's wisdom.

The nations had received a knowledge of God sufficient to render idolatry "inexcusable":--

> "When they knew God, they glorified Him not as God, neither were thankful: but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools" (Rom. i. 21, 22).

It would be a mistake to limit the apostle's term "philosophy" to the Greek and the Roman systems. Paul was a Hebrew and a Pharisee, and knew well that the word was also applied to the various sects of Israel:--

> "The Jews had for a great while those sects of philosophy peculiar to themselves; the sect of the Essenes, and the sect of the Sadducees, and the third set of opinions was that of those called the Pharisees" (Josephus, Antiquities, Bk. xviii. 1, 2)

It would serve no good purpose to quote all that Josephus has written concerning these "philosophies". Of the Pharisees he says:--

> "They live meanly, and despise delicacies in diet; and they follow the conduct of reason."
> "When they determine that all things are done by fate, they do not take away the freedom from men of acting as they think fit."

Of the Sadducees, Josephus writes:--

> "Nor do they regard the observation of anything besides what the law enjoins them; for they think it an instance of virtue to dispute with those teachers of philosophy whom they frequent."

Of the Essenes he writes:--

> "All things are best ascribed to God. They teach the immortality of souls . . . . . they do not offer sacrifices . . . . . yet in their course of life better than that of other men . . . . . they neither marry wives, nor are desirous to keep servants."

There is much food for thought in Josephus' analysis of these Jewish philosophies. The following of "reason", the idea of "fate", the "despising of delicacies in diet", the avoidance of "marriage", the view that disputation is a virtue, the avoidance of sacrifice—all speak volumes. Here was a people who had received the oracles of God, a revelation from on high, and this is where their reasonings and philosophies had led them. They were all blind leaders of the blind.

The mixture of Jewish and Greek philosophy which emerged after the apostle's day is known as "Gnosticism"; it is here seen in its early stages.

The Scriptures are able to make wise unto salvation, and to give a knowledge of the will of God. Philosophy is a poor and harmful substitute.

Philosophy has two supports: the tradition of men, and the rudiments of the world. These mischievous teachers would attempt to support their philosophy by appealing to the tradition of men, and especially to that of the Elders. This would lend colour to their speculations and help to make them less unattractive to those who still regarded the Scriptures as sacred and true.

Tradition has usually been unscriptural largely because it has added to the Word of truth. Christ accused the leaders of the Jews of transgressing the commandment of God, and making it of none effect by their tradition (Matt. xv. 2-6).

The apostle Paul knew the bondage of tradition—so did also Peter (see Gal. i. 14 and I Pet. i. 18). And to this day, it has a stifling grip upon many a child of God. Many a belief, hoary with age, has become attached to the pure Word of God and been accepted as truth. Philosophy's appeal to tradition is often quite enough; the hearer is overwhelmed with great names and great words, accepts the enticing words of man's wisdom for valid argument, and succumbs.

Another support upon which philosophy relies is man's inbred veneration for ceremonial, custom and observance—in other words for Religion. This the apostle speaks of as "the rudiments of the world". The word "rudiments" or "elements" is a translation of stoicheion, meaning a "first step". It is associated with childhood and immaturity:--

> "For when for the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles (elements) of the oracles of God; and are become such as have need of milk, and not of strong meat . . . . . strong meat belongeth to them that are of full age" (perfect) (Heb. v. 12-14).

Seeing that the apostle ardently desired to present every man perfect, we can well understand his abhorrence at the intrusion of the "rudiments" or "elements". In Gal. iv. he speaks of the dispensation of law as a system of bondage to "weak and beggarly elements", consisting of the observance of days, and months, times and years—very much like the new moons and sabbaths of Col. ii. 16. "Are ye so foolish?" he writes to the Galatians, "having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect in the flesh?" (Gal. iii. 3). All our associations with the elements of the world were cancelled once and for all by the redemption of Christ (Gal. iv. 3-5) and our death with Him (Col. ii. 20).

The wisdom of this vain, deceitful philosophy is in strong contrast with the wisdom of God, expressed in the cross of Christ (I Cor. i. 17). It is "foolishness with God" (I Cor. iii. 19); it is "fleshly" (II Cor. i. 12); and it is "devilish" (James iii. 15-17).

In Colossians, the apostle has in view the exalting of the "shadows" above the substance. Such an attitude is entirely foreign to the glorious fullness of the revelation of the mystery; it hinders the growth and perfecting of the saints; and it is dishonouring to the Lord as Head.

This vain, deceitful philosophy was "according to" tradition, and "according to" rudiments, but it was not according to Christ. This is the touchstone of all truth, doctrinally, practically and dispensationally. We need not waste this minutes over any book which does not accord with this supreme test. What place has Christ in the scheme? How far is He indispensable? Is He the First and the Last? Or is the believer asked to supplement His finished work? These are the vital questions. Be not deceived. Sanctification is not furthered by the flesh or by the elements of the world. It is not strengthened by observing days, feasts or fasts. It is not made purer by neglecting the body, and it can be choked and spoiled by a false humility. It can only grow in the soil of grace and in the sunlight of full acceptance in the Beloved.

We have dealt, to some extent, with the deception. We must consider in our next article the corrective of verses 9 and 10.

#21. BEWARE.
That philosophy which is not after Christ, contrasted with all the fullness that dwells in Him (ii. 8, 9).
pp. 168 - 174

The structure of Col. ii. 4-23 set out on page 84 shows five features which are in some degree notes of warning, and also five features giving prominence to the person, work and fullness of Christ, which are in some degree correctives of the error expressed. The five correctives taken together are related to one another as are the five items of warning. Let us see this clearly before dealing with the first corrective of verses 8-10.

The correctives (Col. ii. 4-23).

A | 8-10. Not after Christ. Filled full in Him.
B | 10-12. Christ the Head. Dead and buried.
C | 17. Shadows in contrast with body.
B | 19, 20. Christ the Head. Ye died with Christ.
A | 23. Not any honour. Filling the flesh.

The corrective that immediately concerns us is the first. This, we observe, is expressed both negatively and positively; we shall expect to find in it not only positive truth but also further light upon that vain, deceitful philosophy which is supported by the tradition of men and the rudiments of the world:--

NEGATIVELY.—Not according to Christ.
POSITIVELY.—The fullness of the Godhead bodily.
Ye are filled to the full in Him.
He is Head of all principality and power.

The words, "Not after Christ", which we render, "Not according to Christ", indicate the one and final test of all doctrine and practice. Whatever does not "accord" with Christ is not truth. To this we may readily assent; but a difficulty may arise when we begin to put it into practice, for "Christ" means so much. It is therefore incumbent upon the apostle to select, out of the fullness of his subject, those outstanding features, which, being settled, establish the whole doctrine of the Lord. Let us observe how the apostle uses the title "Christ" in leading up to and developing this important central section of the epistle:--

(1) Christ.

"To whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles; which is CHRIST among you, the hope of the glory" (Col. i. 27).

(1) Warning.

"Whom we preach, warning every man, and teaching every man in all wisdom; that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus" (Col. i. 28).

(2) Christ.

"The full assurance of understanding, to the acknowledgment of the mystery of God . . . . . CHRIST, in Whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (Col. ii. 2, 3).

(2) Warning.

"And this I say, lest any man should beguile you with enticing words" (Col. ii. 4).

(3) Warning.

"Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world" (Col. ii. 8).

(3) Christ.

"And not after CHRIST, for in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily" (Col. ii. 8, 9).

(4) Warning.

"Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holyday, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days, which are a shadow of things to come" (Col. ii. 16, 17).

(4) Christ.

"But the body is of CHRIST" (Col. ii. 17).

(5) Christ.

"If ye then be risen with CHRIST, seek those things which are above, where CHRIST sitteth on the right hand of God" (Col. iii. 1).

(5) Warning.

"Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth" (Col. iii. 2).

(6) Christ.

"Your life is hid with CHRIST in God. When CHRIST, Who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with Him in glory" (Col. iii. 3, 4).

(6) Warning.

"Mortify, therefore, your members which are upon the earth" (Col. iii. 5).

(7) Warning.

"Lie not one to another, seeing that ye have put off the old man with his deeds" (Col. iii. 9).

(7) Christ.

"And have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him; where . . . . . CHRIST is all and in all" (Col. iii. 10, 11).

Every epistle has its own peculiar theme, its own special purpose and its own antagonist; and no one epistle provides a complete presentation of Christ, except in so far as is necessary for the case in hand. The problems that had to be met in the Colossian church were not the same as those in the Corinthian or Galatian churches. Upon examination, the false teaching at Corinth and at Galatia is also seen to be "not after Christ", but it is from a different point of view from that set forth in Colossians. For example, in I Corinthians the apostle stresses the cross of Christ as opposed to false wisdom, while in Galatians he glories in the cross as opposed to false and fleshly works of self-righteousness. It would require a treatise to set forth the apostle's exemplifications of the principle of Col. ii. 8. We have devoted as much space to this negative side of the matter as we can spare and we must leave its further study to the reader. Let us now turn to the positive side and observe the way in which the apostle presents Christ.

He does not speak of His cross, His death or His resurrection. He does not take us back to the glory before the world was nor to the day when every knee shall bow. He presents to us Christ, now, as He is, an all-sufficient Saviour, Guide and Friend:--

> "For in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily" (Col. ii. 9).

The fullness of Christ and its bearing upon the purpose of the ages is a theme which, with the one exception of John i. 16, is the exclusive ministry of the apostle Paul. In the writings of Paul, the word "fullness", used of Christ, occurs once in Galatians, four times in Ephesians, and twice in Colossians; a total of seven times.

There can scarcely be conceived a deeper subject or one that demands more care, prayer and attention. We must discriminate between the fullness of God and the fullness of the Godhead; between the fullness of Christ and the fullness of Him that filleth all in all. We must observe parallels and associations, and every phrase that has been recorded. The importance of the theme must be our complete apology for any weariness which the reader may feel; it has more than compensated for any weariness experienced by the writer.

A | John i. 1-18. | HIS TITLE.—In the beginning. The Word.

Bodily. Completeness.

It will be observed that the references to the fullness in Ephesians are in a class by themselves. Those in John, Galatians and Colossians stress the Godward aspect of the fullness; those in Ephesians the receiving of the fullness by the church, especially the church which is the body of Christ:--

> "The main theme of the Colossians is the Person of Christ; that of the Ephesians is the life of Christ manifested in the living energy of His church. In the former, Christ is the 'Plenitude', the synthesis and totality of every attribute of God; in the latter, the ideal > church as the body of Christ is the Plenitude, the recipient of all the fullness of Him Who filleth all things with all" (Farrar).

We will here confine our attention to those references that occur outside the Ephesians.

In an earlier series we have drawn attention to the similarity between the opening verses of John's Gospel and those written by Paul in Col. i. 16-22. John, at the beginning of his ministry, was an apostle of the circumcision, but he lived to see Israel as a nation set aside; and, just as Paul was permitted to write at least one epistle to the Hebrews, though he himself was a minister to the uncircumcision, so John was not set aside when Israel passed into blindness, but was used by the Lord to give the Gospel that bears his name to the "world". While John i. 1-18 in some degree approximates to the full blaze of Col. i. 16-22, it is not quite so full or so high. Colossians is at the centre of the mystery; John at the circumference of the world. The same ascended Christ sheds His light in John's Gospel and in Colossians, but the latter is written in its fullest blaze. We will not occupy time and space in tabulating the many points common to John i. 1-18 and Col. i. 16-22; the hints already given in the structure of references to the Fullness will be enough to establish the connection.

While we do not propose to compare, in detail, the passages from Galatians and Colossians which are placed in correspondence in the structure already referred to, it will be clear that they both deal with attacks upon the truth of the apostle's ministry. The first passage in Galatians is a refutation of the attack made upon the basic doctrine of Paul's gospel—"justification by faith without works." The apostle sets aside observances and circumcision as being contrary to the grace of his gospel. In the Colossian passage the attack is upon the believer's completeness in Christ, and the intimate relationship between the Head and the members—a denial of the fact that when He died, they died; that, when He was buried, they were buried; and that when He arose, they arose. This heresy, already at work in the Colossian church, emerged some years later as Gnosticism. Its germs were already in the church long before it made its appearance in history, and a brief acquaintance with some of its peculiar doctrines will perhaps enable the reader to follow the apostle's argument in Col. ii. more intelligently:--

> "In the moral and practical discussion of the Epistle we see the true substitute for that extravagant and inflating asceticism which had its origin partly in will worship, ostentatious humility, and trust in works, and partly in mistaken conceptions as to the inherency of evil in the body of man. St. Paul points out to them that the deliverance from sin was to be found, not in dead rules and ascetic rigours, which have a fatal tendency to weaken the will, while they fix the imagination so intensely on the very sins against which they are intended as a remedy, as too often to lend to those very sins a more fatal fascination—but in that death to sin which is necessarily involved in the life hid with Christ in God. From that new life—that resurrection from the death of sin—obedience to the moral laws of God, and faithfulness in common relations of life, result, not as difficult and meritorious acts, but as the natural energies of a living impulse in the heart which beats no longer with its own life but with the life of Christ" (Farrar).

The Cerinthians, a sect that arose soon after apostolic times, believed that the world was created by angels, and also enforced circumcision and other Levitical observances. Cerinthus commenced preaching in Asia, where the church of Colosse stood. Simon Magus, who lived in the apostle's own day, taught that it was necessary to learn the names of the invisible principalities and powers, and to offer sacrifice to the Father by their means. Moreover, these schools of thought held wrong doctrines concerning Christ as Man, and placed Him "lower than the angels". Josephus tells us that the Essenes were careful to preserve the names of angels. The Jewish philosophy, in the Cabala, contains a great deal of mystic lore concerning the orders of angels; and the Greek philosophy of Platonism, used by Philo in his system of theology, views the angels as mediators between God and man. We have also the historic document of the Canons of the Laodicene Council (A.D.320 circa) in which it is decreed that Christians may not "invoke the names of angels . . . . . for they desert our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God" (Canon 35); that "ecclesiastical persons may not use incantations or make phylacteries" (Canon 36); that Christians may not receive presents from Jews on their feast days, or feast with them (Canon 37); and that "Christians must not Judaize, and rest on the Sabbath" (Canon 29).

> "The Gnostics in general were wont to talk much of the pleroma or fullness; in which, they meant, a fictitious plenitude of æons was supposed to subsist, and into which spiritual men should hereafter be received" (Dr. Waterland).

> "There seems to have been a combination of Greek theosophy, and Jewish ritualism and asceticism in the system here denounced by S. Paul, which was substantially the same with Alexandrian Judaism, as expounded in the writings of Philo. Its promoters at Colosse were probably Jews who, desirous of retaining essential Judaism, Mosaic and patristic (or traditional) as an element of Christianity, and of securing its ascendancy as such, allied themselves with the other great party which had a previous system to maintain, that of the Grecian sophists or speculatists, by adopting their language, and representing the ascetic and ritualistic principle as the highest philosophy" (Webster and Wilkinson).

We seldom quote at length from the writings of others in this magazine, but we feel that in the realm of historical research it is simpler to quote the testimony of authorities than to attempt a summary ourselves. We have devoted the space necessary, believing that the dark background of error will but emphasize the glory and the grace that shines in the face of Jesus Christ, in Whom all the fullness of the Godhead dwells bodily. This positive study we hope to take up without further preliminaries in our next article.

> [NOTE.—In order to complete our study of Col. ii. and to appreciate with some measure of fullness the doctrine intended by the contrast of "Philosophy" with "Fullness", we hope to follow this series on Colossians with another dealing with the findings and failures of human wisdom as contrasted with Him in Whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.]

#22. BEWARE.
"All the fullness of the Godhead bodily" (ii. 9, 10).
pp. 210 - 216

Having seen in the preceding article something of the usage of the word "fullness", and something of that mystical system condemned by the apostle as being "not after Christ", we proceed to an appreciation of that glorious contrast to all such vain deceit, the fullness of Christ Himself:--

> "For in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily. And ye are complete in Him, Which is the Head of all principality and power" (Col. ii. 9, 10).

Christ is here seen as the Mediator between God and men, for in Him dwells the fullness (pleroma) of the Godhead, and we are filled full (pepleromenoi) in Him. And because of this, stress is laid upon the word "bodily". God Who is spirit, invisible and unapproachable, and man who is finite and fleshly, need a Daysman between them. No man in the ordinary sense of the word could qualify for this high office, no angel, or principality or power. The position could only be met by the mystery of godliness—"God was manifest in the flesh."

One of the important subjects related to the conception of the "the fullness" is concerned with the Lord's title as "Head", mentioned here in Col. ii. We learn from the epistle to the Ephesians that "in the dispensation of the fullness of seasons there will be "gathered together under one Head (anakephalaiomai), all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth" (Eph. i. 10). The word which we have translated "gathered together under one Head" supplies us with the substantive Kephale, "Head", in the next passage:--

> "And hath put all things under His feet, and gave Him to be Head over all things to the church, which is His body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 22, 23).

Again, in Eph. iv. 13-15, we have the association of the fullness with the Headship of Christ:--

> "The measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ . . . . . grow up into Him . . . . ., which is the Head, even Christ."

Coming to Colossians, we find Headship and fullness together again in the two passages where the word pleroma occurs:--

> "And He is the Head of the body the Church . . . . . for it pleased the Father that in Him should all fullness dwell" (Col. i. 18, 19).
> "For in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily. And ye are filled full in Him, which is the Head of all principality and power" (Col. ii. 9, 10).

We have set forth in these passages the illuminating fact that, without Christ as Head, the fullness, whatever subsequent study may show it to be, would be impossible.

In Volume XIII, pages 165-170, the relation between the "fullness" and the purpose of the ages is discussed in some detail. Without repeating what is said there, we would summarize our findings briefly as follows (See also The Testimony of the Lord's prisoner, pages 51-53):--

The word "fullness" (pleroma), in its first occurrence is placed over against the word "rent" (schisma) (Matt. ix. 16). The "rent" refers back to Gen. i. 2, and is the "overthrow of the world" mentioned in Eph. i. 4. Before the present creation was called into being, a fall, in which angels were involved, had taken place, and it is because heaven as well as earth is affected, that the purpose of the ages includes a church which is destined for heavenly places, as well as saved companies for other and lower spheres.

The church of the mystery was chosen in Christ before Gen. i. 2, but in the wisdom of God, angels and principalities, and Adam himself were all allowed individual trial—a trial which in every case ended in failure. There can be no final and irrevocable certainty in the universe until all, not merely all men, but all principalities and powers, all angels and ministering spirits, all things in heaven and on earth, are gathered under the Headship of Christ. Colossians reveals Christ as the Head both of the "church" (i. 18), and of "all principality and power" (ii. 10), and hence explains the necessity for and the character of the reconciliation of Col. i. 20. Ephesians reveals Christ as the Head of the church which is His body, in which the enmity perpetuated through the Acts period as a middle-wall is broken down, and "the both", Jew and Gentile, are created one new man, so making peace. This reconciliation is spoken of as "in one body" (Eph. ii. 16).

In the history of the nation of Israel, also, there is a "rent", but when the fullness of Israel shall come in, the divided nation shall at last be secure:--

> "Then shall the children of Judah and the children of Israel be gathered together, and appoint themselves one Head, and they shall come up out of the land" (Hos. i. 11).

In I Cor. xi. Christ is said to be the Head of all men in the divine order, and this is more fully expounded in I Cor. xv., where the Lord from heaven is revealed as the last Adam, and the second Man.

When the purpose of the ages is attained, and the results of the "rent" of Gen. i. 2 have passed away, with all the "former things" (including the "deep"—see Rev. xxi. 1), then all things will be "in Christ". He will be Head over all things to all, as He is now Head over all things to the church; God will then be all in all, and the fullness will be fully attained. It is one of the special glories of the mystery, that the church now is a foreshadowing of the fullness then; its very title is "The fullness of Him that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 23).

Should the reader wish to read a more detailed explanation of this great theme, he is asked to consult the comprehensive index of the volumes under such headings as Pleroma in the Greek Index, Tohu and Bohu in the Hebrew Index, and Fullness, Ages, Dispensation, Human Destiny and Satan, etc., in the Subject Index.

Two words are translated "Godhead" in the A.V.; and it is necessary to differentiate between them if the truth of each is to be clearly seen. The two words are Theiotes and Theotes; the first should be translated Divinity, the second Deity. Dr. Wette expresses the distinction in his German translation, rendering Theiotes by Gottlichkeit and Theotes by Gottheit:--

> "For the invisible things of Him since the creation of the world are clearly seen, being perceived through the things that are made, even His everlasting power and DIVINITY" (Rom. i. 20, R.V.).
> "For in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the GODHEAD bodily" (Col. ii. 9, R.V.).

In both cases there is the manifestation of the invisible. In Romans "the invisible things" of the Creator are shown in His works, but in Col. i. 15 and ii. 9 the invisible God Himself dwells fully and bodily in the Lord Jesus Christ.

It is essential that we should grasp the truth contained in the word "bodily" (somatikos). While it is a truth, in which we rejoice, that the church is the body of Christ, this must not cause us to forget or ignore the fact of His own literal body. In Col. i. 22 we have the expression, "In the body of His flesh"; which shows that the epistles of the mystery use this word soma both literally and figuratively. It is the spirit of Antichrist that denies that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh (I John iv. 3), or that He is coming in the flesh (II John 7). This in itself is a proof that the truth denied is of the first importance. If Christ came not in the flesh, we have no Kinsman-Redeemer (Heb. ii. 14, 15). If the Word was not made flesh and dwelt among us, we yet await the glory of the Only Begotten of the Father (John i. 14). If Christ was not of the seed of David according to the flesh, there could be no gospel of God concerning His Son (Rom. i. 1-3), neither could we tell Israel that their Messiah has already come (Rom. ix. 5). In His flesh, stricken for sin on the cross, He abolished the middle-wall of partition between believers (Eph. ii. 15) and the veil between the believer and his Lord (Heb. x. 20). The very mystery of godliness is that "God was manifest in the flesh" (I Tim. iii. 16). When we add to these statements many others—the Lord bearing our sins in His own body (I Pet. ii. 24), the offering of the body of Jesus Christ (Heb. x. 10), His being found in fashion as a man (Phil. ii. 8)—we see that the literal meaning of the word "bodily" (Col. ii. 9) cannot be denied without disastrous consequences to the faith.

There are several parallel references in the Gospel of John to the mystery and purpose of this manifestation of the Godhead in the flesh, that may help us further in our understanding:-- > "And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us . . . . . No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, Which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him" (John i. 14-18).

The title of Christ here as "The Word" is somewhat similar to that of Col. i. 15, "The Image"; both titles have reference to "the invisible God" Whom "no man hath seen at any time". Yet, in spite of the glories that necessarily attached to the Lord both as the Word and as the Image, His becoming flesh evidently involved something more. "The Word was made flesh . . . . . and we beheld His glory."

Is the Lord concerned as to whether we shall behold His glory or not? It seems that He is. So in John xvii.:--

> "And now, O Father, glorify Thou Me with Thine Own self, with the glory which I had with Thee before the world was" (verse 5).
> "And all Mine are Thine, and Thine are Mine; and I am glorified in them" (verse 10).
>
> "And the glory which Thou gavest Me I have given them, that they may be one, even as we are one" (verse 22).
> "Father, I will that they also, whom Thou hast given Me, be with Me where I am; that they may behold My glory . . . . . for Thou lovedst Me before the overthrow of the world" (verse 24).

These verses contain a double reference to that period spoken of as "before the world was" and "before the overthrow of the world". Before the world was, and before it was overthrown (Gen. i. 2) He Whose titles were the Word and the Image possessed glory. He became flesh, He dwelt among us, and out of His fullness we have received; and, as a result, the glory which He had before the world was, He has given to His people. The Lord does not part with His glory; it is shared—"that they may be one". And then, in view of the uniting under one Head of all the redeemed of all dispensations: "I will that they . . . . . be with Me . . . . . that they may behold My glory."

Returning to John i., we observe that one of the chief reasons given there for this coming in the flesh is that God the Father may be "declared' ("explained" or "given an exegesis"). So the Lord could say:--

> "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known Me, Philip? He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father: and how sayest thou then, Show us the Father?" (John xiv. 9).

The invisible things of God may be learned from His works of creation (Rom. i. 19, 20), but the invisible things of the Father are learned only in His Son. The transient glory of the law was reflected in the face of Moses (II Cor. iii. 7), but "God Who commanded the light to shine out of darkness" (a reference to the overthrow of the world in Gen. i. 2 and so a link with the references already cited) "hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (II Cor. iv. 6).

The word "dwelt" in John i. 14 is, literally, "tabernacled". This should be compared with John ii. 18-22, where the body of the Lord in resurrection is likened, not to a tabernacle, but to a temple. The earthly manifestation of the Godhead in the flesh with its accompaniments of sorrow and death was but for a time; He "tabernacled" among us. The indwelling of all the fullness of the Godhead in Him as the risen Head of all things is likened to a temple fitly framed together (Eph. ii. 19), and to a body fitly joined together

(Eph. iv. 16). And it is this church, as body and temple, that bears the title: "The fullness of Him that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 23).

We have, therefore, two important references to "the fullness" in Colossians. The first of these is concerned with the purpose of the ages, and the redeemed of all dispensations, of which the church which is His body stands first:--

> "And He is the Head of the body, the church; Who is the Beginning, the Firstborn from the dead; that in all things He might have the pre-eminence" (Col. i. 18).

He is the Beginning, "The Beginning of the creation of God", as Rev. iii. 14 shows. He is the Firstborn from the dead, and Head of a new creation in which His pre-eminence shall never again be challenged:--

> "For it pleased the Father that in Him should all fullness dwell" (Col. i. 19).

"All the fullness" is the goal of the ages, purposed by God to blot out the consequences of the entrance of sin into the universe. It is, therefore, linked with the "blood of His cross" and "the body of His flesh through death" (Col. i. 20, 22). The riches of the glory of the mystery is Christ, and in Him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. This leads to the second reference to the fullness, not this time concerned with the redeemed of all ages, but with the mystery of godliness—"God was manifest in the flesh". He has now been made known as He never could have been made known otherwise. And so the apostle's argument follows. Philosophy is vanity; the tradition of men and the rudiments of the word, bondage. We have all things in Christ:--

> "Ye are complete (filled full) in Him, which is the Head of all principality and power" (Col. ii. 10).

In Col. i. He is the Head of the body, the church (Col. i. 18); in Col. ii. He is the Head of all principality and power (Col. ii. 10). We may, in a later article, be able to consider these principalities and powers in their relation to the purpose of the ages, but this will be better appreciated when we arrive at Col. ii. 15.

The practical word for us is that, with the fullness of Christ on our behalf, and because of our completeness in Him, we should be proof against all attempts on the part of the enemy to come between us and our glorious Head. The means employed by the Wicked One and the correctives supplied by grace are to be more fully examined in subsequent papers. Meanwhile, let not the problematic character of some of our studies cloud for one moment the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. Let us magnify the Lord and hold the Head, allowing no usurper; and we shall not only be to the praise of His glory, but we shall enter into some of the "riches of the full assurance of understanding to the acknowledging of the mystery of God—Christ; in Whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge".

Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth.

#86. Numbers xvi. and xvii.
The Lord knoweth . . . . . depart from iniquity (II Tim. ii. 19).
pp. 24 - 28

It will be remembered that the section of Numbers that has just been before us, viz., xi.-xiv., revealed many points of analogy both with Philippians and Hebrews. There is one other epistle that comes into line with Philippians, namely, II Timothy, and we shall find that the next section of Numbers which we are to study (xvi. and xvii.) is used in II Timothy in a significant context.

Numb. xvi. and xvii. is in the first place an attack upon the distinctive office of the priest, in the second place it provides a corrective against an argument often used in opposing the distinctive character of the church, the body, and of the distinctive company in that church who shall attain unto the prize of the high calling. This is anticipating somewhat, so we will deal with the actual passage.

Numb. xvi. and xvii. must be looked upon as a whole. There are two rebellions, one by the princes led by Korah, and the other by the people, both having reference to the distinctive calling of the priest. The two chapters may be visualized as follows:--

Numbers. xvi. and xvii.
"The Lord will show who are His."

A | xvi. 1-3. | a | Rebellion of Korah.
b | Gathered together against Moses and Aaron.
c | Wherefore then lift ye up yourselves above the congregation of the Lord.
B | xvi. 4. Moses fell on his face.
C | xvi. 5-9. To Korah.—Take you censers—ends in death.
D | xvi. 10-18. | d | Seek ye the priesthood also?
e | Take every man his censer . . . . . the tabernacle.
E | xvi. 19-40. | f | Death and consuming for rebellion.
g | Censers a memorial "against own souls".
A | xvi. 41-44. | a | Rebellion of all the congregation.
b | Gathered against Moses and Aaron.
c | Ye have killed the people of the Lord.
B | xvi. 45. Moses and Aaron fell upon their faces.
C | xvi. 46. To Aaron.—Take a censer—make atonement.
D | xvii. 1-9. | e | Take every one a rod . . . . . the tabernacle.
d | "I will choose" (the priesthood).
E | xvii. 10-13. | g | Aaron's rod a token "against the rebels".
f | Death and consuming feared.

What was the basis of Korah's rebellion? Let him speak for himself:--

> "Ye take too much upon you, seeing all the congregation are holy, every one of them, and the Lord is among them: wherefore then lift ye up yourselves above the congregation of the Lord?" (Numb. xvi. 3).

At the close of chapter xv. is the command of the Lord that all the children of Israel should wear a fringe and a riband of blue, a remainder to them to keep all the commandments of the Lord, to seek not the desires of their own hearts, and to be holy unto the Lord.

Korah's argument was that, seeing that all the congregation was holy, there should be no such distinctions among them as was evident in the high positions held by Moses and Aaron; that Moses and Aaron had lifted themselves up above their fellows—all of whom were part of the same congregation of the Lord.

Moses' first response is to prostrate himself before the Lord. He saw the seriousness of this rebellion, and wisely sought the face of God before attempting to justify himself before man. His opening words dispose of the insinuation of Korah, that Moses and Aaron had lifted themselves up above the congregation. If there had been any "lifting up" it was by the sovereign disposal of the Lord Himself:--

> "Even to-morrow the Lord will shew who are His, and who is holy (set apart): and will cause him to come near unto Him: even him whom He hath chosen will he cause to come near unto Him. This do: Take your censers, Korah, and all his company; and put fire therein; and put incense in them before the Lord to-morrow: and it shall be that the man whom the Lord doth choose, he shall be holy; ye take too much upon you, ye sons of Levi" (Numb. xvi. 5-7).

Moses now draws the attention of Korah to the illogical nature of his objection. Korah himself was a Levite, and God had separated the Levites from the congregation of Israel. They had been brought near to do the service of the tabernacle of the Lord:--

> "He hath brought thee (Korah) near to Him; and all thy brethren, the sons of Levi, with thee: and seek ye the priesthood also?" (Numb. xvi. 10).

All Israel might have justly murmured against Korah, as Korah murmured against Aaron.

Moses sought to remonstrate with the sons of Reuben, but they would not hear, but cast the aspersion upon Moses, that he wished to make himself altogether a prince over them. Then comes the dreadful ordeal. "Depart, I pray you, from the tents of these wicked men" (Numb. xvi. 26). We know the tragic end. Korah and his men went down alive into the opened earth and were swallowed up, and the 250 men who had offered incense were consumed with fire.

Here is a "new thing" or as the Hebrew reads: "but if the Lord create a creation." The first earthquake is associated with usurpation of the priest's office. Uzziah also is connected both with an earthquake and with usurpation of the priest's office, and Antichrist will be likewise associated with both.

While we may be keenly interested in the typical teaching of this passage as it illuminates the days of antichristian rebellion that are still future, it will be more profitable to observe the bearing of this tragic end upon ourselves. One might object, and say that such things can have no possible bearing upon the church. Let us see. Two utterances of Moses stand out prominently in chapter xvi.:--

> "The Lord will show who are His" (verse 5).
> "Depart, I pray you, from the tents of these wicked men" (verse 26).

These words re-appear in II Tim. ii.:--

> "Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth then that are His, and, Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity" (II Tim. ii. 19).

In what way does II Tim. ii. resembles Numb. xvi.? Let us remember Korah's objection to the possibility of some being called to glory higher than others, though all members of the same congregation, and then let us see the way in which the apostle deals with that same spirit:--

> "But in a great house (parallel with the whole congregation) there are not only vessels of gold and of silver (like the offices of Moses, Aaron, and the Levites), but also of wood and of earth; and some to honour, and some to no honour. If a man therefore purge himself from these, he shall be a vessel unto honour, sanctified, and meet for the Master's use, and prepared unto every good work" (II Tim. ii. 20, 21).

Some object to the distinctive glory of the church of the mystery by appealing to the fact that all the Lord's people, of whatever calling and company, are redeemed by the same precious blood, and belong to the same Christ. This is no valid objection. The Lord could choose and has chosen some of the redeemed to "inherit the earth", some to walk the streets of the New Jerusalem, and some to enter their inheritance in the heavenly holiest of all. The same answer that Moses gave to Korah must be given here. It is a matter of the Lord's sovereign choice. Limiting ourselves to the one company, the church which is His body, some express themselves in almost angry terms when any suggestion is made to the teaching of Philippians, with its out-resurrection and prize, or to II Timothy with its contest and crown, endurance and reign. These possible distinctions in the one church in the heavenlies are no more objectionable than the evident distinction between the comely and uncomely members of the one human body, or the distinctions that obtained in Israel. To any who would seek further argument, we would commend the chapter in Dispensational Truth entitled: "An election within an election."

Returning to Numb. xvi. and xvii. we observe that the censers of the men who rebelled were beaten out into sheets for a covering of the altar, and to act as a memorial of their rebellion, while the rod that budded was placed in the holiest of all before the testimony, as a token against the rebels:--

"And thou shalt quite take away their murmurings from Me, that they die not" (Numb. xvii. 10).

We are brought back therefore to the initial seed of this awful crop of death—murmuring. Murmuring about God's sovereign disposal of glory, dignity or honour reveals a failure to appreciate that the smallest and lowliest blessing we receive is all of grace. Korah should have remembered the signal mercy that had led him out of Egypt, and have been thankful that his bones were not bleaching with those of the Egyptians on the shore of the Red Sea. No wonder Philippians, the epistle of the prize winner, is the epistle of rejoicing, the epistle of contentment, the epistle that warns against murmuring. Some, we fear, may resent this message: may it be a means of help to those who having heard the higher call are seeking grace to run with patience.

#87. The start from Kadesh (Numb. xx. - xxv.).
pp. 66 - 71

Once again we have, interposed between chapters of history, further laws pertaining to the priests and the people, full of matter and abundantly repaying careful study. It is not our purpose, however, to investigate every detail of these books, time alone being against us, so we pass over chapters xviii. & xix. and take up the theme again in chapter xx., where another series of incidents is recorded, some of which are used in the N.T. and all of which are full of needed lessons for those who, having been redeemed by the precious blood, are pressing on like Caleb and Joshua to the inheritance ahead. It is not of our choosing that these historic incidents should necessitate so much insistence upon the Philippians aspect of truth, and we shall not shirk it because some may not readily appreciate the lessons taught. We need all the counsel of God, and a faithful ministry does not keep back anything that is profitable.

The section before us occupies six chapters, and for the first approach, the structure found in The Companion Bible is of service in placing the distinct grouping of events before the eye. The following analysis brings into prominence the features that represents the lesson element, the features therefore that we mostly desire:--

Numb. xx. - xxv.

A | xx. 1. Miriam dies.
B | xx. 2 - xxi. 3. |
a | NO WATER.
b | "Would God we have died with our brethren."
The Rock and the water.
Moses forfeits entry into land.
c | Water of Meribah.
Water refused by Edom twice.
Aaron forfeits entry into land.
d | Arad the Canaanite—Open fighting.
B | xxi. 4 - xxv. 13. |
a | NO BREAD.
b | "Wherefore have ye brought us to die in the wilderness."
The Serpent and life.
Israel set forward.
c | Brooks of Arnon.
Way refused twice by Sihon and Og,
Israel set forward.
d | Balak and Balaam—Betrayal.
A | xxv. 14-18. Midianitish woman slain.

Here is the old trouble, viz., no water and no bread. While both Moses and Aaron forfeit entry into the land, the structure balances this with the two passages which say (even after failure in one instance) that "the children of Israel set forward" (See xx. 12, 13, 24 for Moses and Aaron; and xxi. 10 & xxii. 1 for Israel). Earlier we see how the Lord defended the high honour of Moses against the murmurs of Aaron and Miriam, and how he defended Aaron against the gainsaying of Korah. Nevertheless high honour brings high responsibility. To him that has had much given, of him will more be required. The five talent man must produce five more talents to be level with the two talent man who produced two. We are therefore still in an atmosphere of service, contest, endurance, pressing on, reward or loss.

Wasted years.

Chapter xx. opens with the words: "Then came the children of Israel, even the whole congregation, into the desert of Zin in the first month", and unless we are already prepared, we should naturally assume this to be within a brief interval of the last recorded movement. As a matter of fact an interval of some 37½ years must be recognized as intervening between Numb. xiv. and Numb. xx.:--

> "Your children shall wander in the wilderness forty years . . . . . and ye shall know My breach of promise" (Numb. xiv. 33, 34).

This should warn us to be prepared to find the interval, but the definite date of Aaron's death leaves no doubt. Chapter xxxiii. enumerates the itinerary of Israel from the time they went forth out of Egypt until they pitched by Jordan in the plains of Moab, and it is there we read:--

> "And Aaron the priest went up into the Mount Hor at the commandment of the Lord, and died there, in the fortieth year after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt, in the first day of the fifth month" (Numb. xxxiii. 38).

Miriam dies without entering the promised land; Aaron dies without entering; and so does Moses, although the death of Moses is deferred until later. The men that were twenty years old and upward who had seen the mighty work of the Lord, and who had nevertheless refused to go up at the leading of the Lord, were now all dead.

The children that they had said were to be a prey in the wilderness had been miraculously preserved, and were now about to go into the land. The fact that these repeat the sin of their fathers removes all idea that they were essentially different from their parents; their entry is still of the grace of God. Moses called them rebels, and so they were; nevertheless, in that, and in his angry striking of the rock, Moses failed. The comment of Psa. cvi. 32, 33 should be remembered:--

> "They angered him also at the waters of strife, so that it went ill with Moses for their sakes: because they provoked his spirit, so that he spake unadvisedly with his lips."

Let none think that we comment on Moses' lapse in any self-righteous spirit. Who amongst us would have endured one year, let alone forty years, of this people's manners and ways?

There is perhaps a closer link between minister and people than at first appears. Paul said to the Thessalonians:--

> "For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at His coming? For ye are our glory and joy . . . . . when Timothy . . . . . brought us good tidings of your faith . . . . . we were comforted . . . . . for now we live if ye stand fast in the Lord" (I Thess. ii. 19 - iii. 8).

To the like intent we read I John ii. 28 and II John 8:--

> "And now, little children, abide in Him; that, when He shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before Him at His coming."
> "Look to yourselves, that we lose not those things which we have wrought, but that we receive a full reward."*

There is, moreover, another reason for the death of Moses and Aaron before entry into the land of promise. Both stood for a failing law and failing priesthood. Law was to be dead and buried before Joshua (whose name is the same as Jesus) should rise and lead the people over Jordan. God had forgiven many sins of Moses and Aaron, and could have forgiven many more. It pleased Him, however, to prevent the representative of the law from crossing the Jordan, and we do well to learn both the personal lesson for ourselves, and the doctrinal lesson for the church.

[NOTE * - Some texts read "ye", but we do not feel that there is sufficient evidence to warrant the alteration. If "ye" had been originally written, who would want to alter it to the more difficult "we"?]

Types of Christ.

The rock and the brazen serpent are evident types of Christ. In the earliest history of Israel, the smiting of the rock had been by divine command:--

> "Behold, I will stand before thee there upon the rock of Horeb; and thou shalt smite the rock, and there shall come water out of it, that the people may drink" (Exod. xvii. 6).

When once more water was to be brought out of the rock at the end of the forty years' pilgrimage, no command was given to strike it again. The sacrifice of Christ is never to be repeated. There shall be in the day of Israel's return a fountain opened for sin and uncleanness, and they shall look upon Him Whom they pierced, but they shall never pierce Him again. The striking of the rock in the second place is an O.T. parallel of the awful words of Heb. vi. 6: "They crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh."

The second great type of this section is the brazen serpent. Again the people murmur (xxi. 5), and use very similar expressions to those recorded in xx. 3-5, yet in chapter xx. no punishment follows, while in chapter xxi. the murmuring is immediately followed by the judgment of the fiery serpents. It will be remembered that earlier still the people had murmured, and had been visited with dire judgment. Is there anything in the passage to account for this? There is one thing common to the two passages recording that punishment is absent, and that is a slighting reference to the manna:--

> "But now our soul is dried away: there is nothing at all, beside this manna, before our eyes" (Numb. xi. 6).
> "Our soul loatheth this light bread" (Numb. xxi. 5).

What expressions are here, when speaking of the gift of God—the corn of heaven, angels' food.

The chapter in John which speaks so much of the manna, and of Christ as the true bread that came down from heaven, shows the spiritual equivalent of this loathing of the manna, and the "dried up" soul:--

> "This is a hard (dried up) saying" (said many of His disciples), "who can hear it . . . . . the words I speak unto you they are spirit and they are life" (John vi. 60-63).

Murmuring is evil enough, but when it takes the form of loathing the gift of God and the type of Christ, judgment falls.

When Israel sinned and broke the law at the foot of Sinai the Lord's reply was, in effect, "Make an ark". Here, the only remedy is: "Make a fiery serpent and set it upon a pole." Here is a most precious anticipation of those statements in the epistles that reveal that the curse of the law can only be removed by one dying under a curse (Gal. iii. 13), or that reconciliation can only be accomplished by imputing sin to the One Who knew no sin:--

> "For He hath made Him to be sin for us, Who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him" (II Cor. v. 19-21).

Numb. xxi. 8 is the O.T. equivalent of John iii. 16:--

> "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have eternal life" (John iii. 14, 15).

By the time Hezekiah came to the throne, the brazen serpent, preserved by Israel and carried by them into the land, had become an idolatrous image:--

> "He removed the high places, and brake the images, and cut down the groves, and brake in pieces the brazen serpent that Moses had made: for unto those days the children of Israel did burn incense to it; and he called it Nehushtan—a brass thing" (II Kings xviii. 4).

The symbol of Israel's redemption had degenerated to the level of the obscene Asherah, and idolatrous images. If Satan cannot blot out a truth by denial, he will ruin it by fleshly prominence. Where the symbol of the cross is most prominent to-day, the reality of its teaching is lost. The apostate church abounds in crucifixes, images and incense, but where is the glorious doctrine of the cross of Christ? How can we tolerate the wearing of crosses as ornaments, when we remember of the dreadful truth for which it stands? What a sad thing for people of any time, when the grandest symbol of their faith has to be destroyed as "a thing of brass" in order to save them from idolatry.

The apostles, writing to different companies of the church, warn of idolatry, and we are not so removed from all spheres of temptation but that the warning should be remembered by ourselves also.

We will next consider the remaining items indicated in the structure which deal with the opposition of Edom, Arad, Sihon, Og and Moab.

#88. Numbers xx. - xxv.
The twofold opposition encountered by Israel and its relation to Eph. vi. 12.
pp. 108 - 112

Israel, as they press on from Kadesh, meet with opposition in various forms. The Edomites, who were related by blood, refuse passage through their territory and even the purchase of drinking water. The Moabites, who were also related to Israel through Lot their father, sought to curse Israel, and succeeded in entrapping them in evil practices. Arad the Canaanite, Sihon King of Heshbon and Og King of Bashan, in no way related to Israel but rather the seed of the Serpent, oppose, too, in different ways. A careful consideration of these contests will throw light upon the conflict of the Church to-day, and especially upon the meaning of the apostle in Eph. vi. where the armour of God is specified and the contestants indicated. "We wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers" (Eph. vi. 12). Edom and Moab represent "flesh and blood"; Arad, Sihon and Og the "principalities and powers". Two distinct lines of action are indicated to deal with these two types of opposition.

Edom, of course, is Esau the brother of Jacob, and so the message sent to the King of Edom opens with the words: "Thus saith thy brother Israel" (Numb. xx. 14). The request was for permission to pass through the country, and the request was accompanied by a promise that neither fields, nor vineyards, nor wells of water should be touched, but that the King's highway should be kept "until we have passed thy borders". This modest request was refused. The children of Israel sent again saying:--

> "We will go by the high way: and if I and my cattle drink of thy water, then will I pay for it: I will only, without doing anything else, go through on my feet" (Numb. xx. 19).

Edom again replied, "Thou shalt not go through", but Deut. ii. 28, 29 suggests that the request to purchase food and drink was granted. Neither Edom nor Moab, however, would allow Israel to pass through their territory. Jephtha's summary of the time shews this clearly:--

> "Then Israel sent messengers unto the King of Edom, saying, Let me, I pray thee, pass through thy land, but the King of Edom would not hearken thereto. And in like manner they sent unto the King of Moab: but he would not consent; and Israel abode in Kadesh" (Judg. xi. 17).

Deut. xxiii. 3, 4 shows that Moab refused what Edom granted:--

> "They met you not with bread and with water in the way, when ye came forth out of Egypt: and because they hired against thee Balaam the Son of Beor of Pethor of Mesopotamia, to curse thee."

The Companion Bible note to Deut. ii. 28 suggests that Moab sold too, but the very clear-cut distinction made between Moab and Edom in Deut. xxiii. 3, 4 and 7 is rather opposed to this suggestion. However, be that as it may, Edom and Moab both refused permission for Israel to pass through their territory.

What did the Lord say? Did He command, "Arise, O Israel, manifest by conquest that you are the redeemed of the Lord"? No; Israel's attitude was to be the reverse of this. All that is written in Numb. xx. 21 is: "Wherefore Israel turned away from him." Deut. ii., however, makes very clear what Israel's attitude was to be:--

> "Ye are to pass through the coast of your brethren, the children of Esau, which dwell in Seir; and they shall be afraid of you: take ye good heed unto yourselves therefore. Meddle not with them; for I will not give you of their land, no, not so much as a foot breadth" (Deut. ii. 4, 5).

Much the same is said of the Moabites: "Distress not the Moabites neither contend with them in battle" (ii. 9). Here is no uncertain sound, and the spiritual analogy is not difficult to perceive:--

> "We wrestle not with flesh and blood" (Eph. vi. 12).
> "Ye took joyfully the spoiling of your goods" (Heb. x. 34).
> "They confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth" (Heb. xi. 13).
> "No man that warreth entangleth himself in the affairs of his livelihood" (II Tim. ii. 4).
> "Let your moderation be known to all men" (Phil. iv. 5).
> "I have learned in whatsoever state I am, to be content" (or independent) (Phil. iv. 11).

Passages like these bear out the analogy. We are not citizens here. This world is partitioned out to others; brothers indeed in the flesh but, alas, not in the line of promise. We leave them their inheritance, we do not meddle with them, we shall not possess one foot of their territory, and we are forbidden to enter into conflict. "From such turn away" is the apostle's echo of the words, "Israel turned away from him". If the rebuff of the world hurts our pride, we must remember that we should have no pride left to be hurt. The redeemed of the Lord should have no "rights" in the world. Their citizenship is not here; they are at best pilgrims seeking a pathway home.

When we come to the consideration of the Canaanite opponents, we are on entirely different ground. The first is King Arad the Canaanite. We read:--

> "And when King Arad the Canaanite, which dwelt in the south, heard tell that Israel came by way of the spies; then he fought against Israel, and took some of them prisoners" (Numb. xxi. 1).

The spies had originally entered the land by this route (see Numb. xiii. 17), and this early act of unbelief (as we have seen the sending of the spies to be) not only brought disaster upon those who lived at the time, but upon their children forty years afterwards.

The Canaanites are delivered into the hand of Israel and are utterly destroyed.

A request is next sent to Sihon, King of the Amorites, couched in terms almost identical with those used for Edom. The request is refused, Sihon comes out and fights against Israel; and Israel smites him with the edge of the sword, and takes possession of his territory. What Israel took from Sihon had originally belonged to Moab (Numb. xxi. 26), who had become idolatrous, as we see from Numb. xxi. 28, 29: "The lords (baalim) of the high places of Arnon . . . . . O people of Chemosh" (Chemosh being an idol, II Kings xxiii. 13).

This was a legitimate conquest on this side of Jordan before the land of promise was reached; and the Church to-day, while not forgetting the restrictions associated with Moab and Edom, can win back territory which was lost to Satan and his hosts, which once belonged to the outer circle of God's people.

Og, King of Bashan, also went out against Israel, and he, too, was overcome and destroyed. This king was the last of the Rephaim; his bedstead (or tomb) was nine cubits long, "after the cubit of a man".

The destruction of Sihon and Og is commemorated in a psalm of praise, which specially emphasizes the mercy of God.

> "To Him which smote great kings:
> For His mercy endureth for ever:
> And slew famous kings:
> For His mercy endureth for ever:
> Sihon, King of the Amorites:
> For His mercy endureth for ever:
> And Og, King of Bashan:
> For His mercy endureth for ever" (Psa. cxxxvi. 17-20).

This seed of the giants, the Rephaim, were the tares sown by the Wicked One; it was mercy utterly to destroy them. And so, when the day arrives for the Church to ascend into the heavenly inheritance, the principalities and powers, the world holders of this darkness and the "spiritual wickednesses" that have, under the authority of Satan, for so long barred the way, shall in like manner be destroyed. Already by the cross they have been "spoiled" and "triumphed over" (Col. ii. 15). For the present time our orders are to "stand", to "stand against" and to "withstand".

If it was vital that Israel should follow out implicitly the instructions given them in their passage from the wilderness to the promised land, it is surely equally important that we also should neither exceed nor fall short of the instructions given for our own guidance. The teaching that some hold regarding "warfare" to-day, is as though Israel, long before the arrival at Kadesh, marched forward indiscriminately with sword in hand, simply because they knew that over the Jordan lay their inheritance and that even then they were really "more than conquerors".

We have touched, in passing, upon each of the opposing forces met by Israel, but so much is involved in the action of Balak and Balaam that this must be reserved for separate study in a subsequent paper.

#89. Numbers xxii. - xxv.
Balaam and Baal-Poer.
pp. 147 - 153

Throughout the unfolding of the purpose of the ages—whether the whole sweep of that purpose, as visualized from Gen. i. to Rev. xxii., whether man himself, from Paradise lost to Paradise regained, whether Israel, or the Church, or even the individual life of the believer throughout all times and under all dispensations—Scripture apprizes us of a series of Satanic attacks, carried out along lines parallel with that purpose, including, prominently, an attack upon the exclusive worship of God, and a seduction from the path of moral purity. These attacks are not confined to the beginning of any new dispensation, but are repeated, with undiminished force, at their close. Rebellion began in heaven and war will again take place in heaven, Michael and his angels fighting against the Dragon and his angels. That old Serpent, which is the Devil and Satan, who deceived our first parents when placed in the garden of Eden, will deceive the nations once again, just before the garden is restored at the last.

Coming closer to our subject, Israel had been delivered out of Egypt but five months when we find them ensnared in the matter of the golden calf and its immoral "play", for they made themselves naked (Exod. xxxii. 1-6, 25). This terrible breaking of the covenant of Sinai was visited by a judgment executed by the sons of Levi. And now, as we are about to read the account of the closing attack upon Israel, just as they are to cross the Jordan, we find again, in the matter of Baal-Peor, the same idolatry and immorality, followed by vengeance executed by the javelin of Phinehas.

The book of the Revelation reveals a similar attack at the time of the end, "that woman Jezebel" teaching the same double evil in the church in Thyatira (Rev. ii. 20). Before the dreadful fall of Israel in the matter of Baal-Peor, much is recorded concerning Balaam himself, and considerable space is devoted to his unwilling inspiration and utterance of the prophetic parables.

Three battles are recorded: against Irad the Canaanite, Sihon, king of the Amorites, and Og, king of Bashan, but these sanguinary fights are disposed of in a few verses. The record of the final attack under Balaam, however, occupies more than one hundred verses. Moreover, the N.T. refers to Balaam three times, and makes allusion to two points in the story recorded in Numbers:--

> "Which have forsaken the right way, and are gone astray, following the way of Balaam, the son of Bosor, who loved the wages of unrighteousness, but was rebuked for his iniquity; the dumb ass speaking with man's voice forbad the madness of the prophet" (II Pet. ii. 15, 16).
> "Woe unto them! for they have gone in the way of Cain, and ran greedily after the error of Balaam for reward, and perished in the gainsaying of Korah" (Jude 11).

> "But I have a few things against thee, because thou hast there them that hold the doctrine of Balaam, who taught Balak to cast a stumblingblock before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed to idols, and to commit fornication. So hast thou also them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes, which thing I hate" (Rev. ii. 14, 15).

A reference is made to this period in I Cor. x. 8:--

> "Neither let us commit fornication, as some of them committed, and fell in one day three and twenty thousand."

Two references are made to Baal-Peor outside the books of Moses:--

> "They joined themselves also unto Baal-Peor, and ate the sacrifices of the dead" (Psa. cvi. 28).
> "They went to Baal-Peor and separated (nazar, as Numb. vi. 7) themselves unto that shame; and their abominations were according as they loved" (Hos. ix. 10).

As a detailed examination of the whole of the narrative is beyond our limits, these references will enable us to appreciate the features that require consideration.

Just as Balaam comes upon the scene at the very end of Israel's period of wandering, and just before they cross over into the promised land, so these N.T. Scriptures which refer to Balaam, are Scriptures that deal with the last days, viz., II Peter, Jude and Revelation.

II Peter is occupied with prophecy, both false and true, revolving around the second coming of the Lord. Chapter ii. is taken up with the question of false prophets, and the ungodly of ancient times. The angels that sinned, the old world in the days of Noah, and the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, are examples cited of the ungodliness yet to come. Even a passing acquaintance with the Scriptures that deal with these three subjects will indicate the awful uncleanness associated with them, and this is immediately taken up by the apostle (ii. 10-14), and is followed by the reference to Balaam.

Jude follows very closely the same lines as II Pet. ii. He, too, introduces three ancient examples of ungodliness: Israel, the angels, and Sodom & Gomorrah, and, again, terrible uncleanness is indicated (Jude 7, 8). These three classes are balanced in the epistle by three evil individuals: Cain, Balaam & Korah, and throw light upon the character of the last days.

The book of the Revelation also speaks of the last days, and again we read of Balaam. This time a special doctrine is associated with his name, and also with Nicolaitanes. Now, inasmuch as both Balaam and Nicolaitan have the same meaning, namely, the overcoming of the people, we see that Satan will once more introduce his unclean doctrines at the time of the end to ensnare the people of God. Balaam's doctrine was taught at Pergamos—"where Satan's throne is." Balaam stands before us as the great typical false prophet: he sins against light and knowledge and is overcome of greed: He was in league with the forces of evil, as may be seen by the references to enchantments (Numb. xxiii. 23; xxiv. 1 and falling into a trance, xxiv. 4). Four times does Balaam utter in parable form the words that God put into his mouth. Balak takes Balaam to view Israel from three different heights, but no loophole can be found for the curse to fall upon them.

Balaam's four parables represent four aspects of the perfect standing of every true child of God. Under the first covenant Israel had undertaken to inherit the position of a kingdom of Priests by their obedience, saying: "All that the Lord hath spoke we will do" (Exod. xix. 3-8), and as a part of their preparation for the confirmation of this covenant Moses was to: "sanctify them to-day and to-morrow and let them wash their clothes and be ready against the third day" (Exod. xix. 10, 11). Alas, we know too well that Israel utterly failed, and the Lord, in grace, set aside that covenant and introduced another, a better covenant, established by better promises, resting upon an infinitely better Sacrifice, and in the hand of a better Mediator.

When Israel do, eventually, enter into their blessed inheritance, it will not be by their own obedience, neither will they be able to "wash their clothes and be ready against the third day". The book of the Revelation gives the new and better state:--

> "Unto Him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in His own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and His Father" (Rev. i. 5, 6).
> "These are they which have come out of greater tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the lamb" (Rev. vii. 14).
> "Thou hast redeemed to God by thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation, and hast made them unto our God kings and priests: and they shall reign over the earth" (Rev. v. 9, 10).

The first of Balaam's parables emphasizes the believer's separation unto God:--

> "Lo, the people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations" (Numb. xxiii. 9).

This is the basic truth concerning Israel. The second parable emphasizes the perfect acceptance of every child of God:--

> "He hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, neither hath He seen perverseness in Israel" (Numb. xxiii. 21).

Yet on both sides of this parable of Balaam we have the record of Israel's terrible failure. The apparent contradiction is, however, removed when we remember that Balaam speaks of their standing, whereas Moses speaks of their state.

The two parables that follow emphasize the glory and the victory of the people "in the latter days" (Numb. xxiv. 14). "His kingdom shall be exalted" (Numb. xxiv. 7), and Balaam plainly prophecies that this exaltation is associated with the Messiah:--

> "There shall come a Star out of Jacob, and a Sceptre shall rise out of Israel. Out of Jacob shall come He that shall have dominion" (Numb. xxiv. 17, 19).

Before ending the prophetic utterances, Balaam speaks of the end of the Amalekites, the Kenites and the Assyrians. Ships shall come from the coast of Shittim, and afflict both the Assyrian and the Hebrew, and then he also (that sent the ships) shall perish for ever. Daniel, in xi. 30 of his book, speaks of these "ships of Chittim", and makes it clear that they come against the Beast of the Apocalypse.

Here, then, we have a false prophet, who sets out, at the bidding of a king, to curse Israel, uttering such truths as demand nothing less than the inspiration of God as their origin. Balaam realized his helplessness in the matter, saying to Balak:--

> "Have I now any power at all to say anything? The word that God putteth in my mouth, that shall I speak" (Numb. xxii. 38).
> "Must I not take heed to speak that which the Lord hath put in my mouth?" (Numb. xxiii. 12).
>
> "If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the commandment of the Lord, to do either good or bad of mine own mind: but what the Lord saith, that will I speak" (Numb. xxiv. 13).
> "And Balaam lifted up his eyes, and he saw Israel abiding in his tents according to their tribes; and the spirit of God came upon him" (Numb. xxiv. 2).

It is therefore apparent that Balaam's utterances had no relation to his own heart, or his own moral character. He, himself, was wicked, unrepentant, and in league with Satanic powers, yet God could so come upon him that he was powerless to resist being made a mouthpiece of the Almighty. If wicked Balaam and wicked Caiaphas can utter prophetic truth by the mighty constraint of the Spirit of God, how much more may we believe that "holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (II Pet. i. 21)?

It is sad to leave this high standpoint of the blessed standing of the elect of God, for the narrative of their terrible state which follows in Numb. xxv. Balaam's intended curses were rendered impossible, but Balaam's subtle doctrine ensnared the people of God:--

> "And Israel abode in Shittim, and the people began to commit whoredom with the daughters of Moab. And they called the people unto the sacrifices of their gods: and the people did eat, and bowed down to their gods, and Israel joined himself unto Baal-Peor" (Numb. xxv. 1-3).

No censer of incense stays the judgment that now falls. The javelin of Phinehas "made an atonement for the children of Israel", and his reward is remembered in the words of Israel's last prophet (Mal. ii. 4, 5). The words that follow deal with abuses in connection with marriage, and the intention of the Lord in marriage—"That He might seek a seed of God" (Elohim) (Mal. ii. 15). They reveal the diabolical character of Balaam's doctrine. Its connection with Cain, the fallen angels and the cities of the plain in II Peter and Jude, further emphasizes the Satanic plot at Baal-Peor, at the moment of entry into the land, to sow his own tares, "the seed of the wicked one".

It is surely something more than an accident that the passage already quoted from Hos. ix. 10 should use the word nazar ("separate"), which is found in Numb. vi. 3, where we have the law of the Nazarite. What a contrast. Israel should have been "separated" as a nation unto the Lord: instead, they corrupted themselves, and "separated themselves unto that shame, and their abominations were according as they loved". This passage from Hosea makes us think of the charge against the church of Ephesus, "Thou hast left thy first love", although, be it said, they hated the deeds of the Nicolaitanes. Hate, however, is not so strong as love, and with the loss of the first love, hatred of the Nicolaitan doctrine waned, so that by the time we reach Pergamos, the Nicolaitan doctrine has a hold, and is coupled with the doctrine of Balaam, and answered by the seduction of Jezebel. And now Levi with his sword and Phinehas with his javelin give place to the Lord Himself, out of whose mouth goeth a sharp two-edged sword.

The last act of Moses was the execution of vengeance, a faint anticipation of the "Day of vengeance of our God":--

> "And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Avenge the children of Israel of the Midianites: afterwards shalt thou be gathered unto thy people" (Numb. xxxi. 2).

Each tribe of Israel sent 1,000 armed men to execute this vengeance of the Lord against Midian, for all Israel had been guilty, and had actually lost double this number, 24,000 having died, as Numb. xxv.9 declares. In this connection we earlier quoted I Cor. x. 8. As some may have a difficulty because that passage says 23,000, it should be noted that I Cor. x. 8 specifies how many died in one day, for some had been hanged, and some slain earlier (Numb. xxv. 4, 5). Phinehas, whose javelin executed the first stroke of vengeance on a daughter of Midian, led the army on this dreadful mission. This was no conquest of territory, it was not the claiming of an inheritance; it was a priestly blotting out of a sinful alliance. In this battle Balaam meets his end, unrepentant to the last. Not a single man of Israel was lost in this battle, and a thank offering was brought to make an atonement for their souls before the Lord, amounting to 16,750 shekels of gold. This was brought into the tabernacle of the congregation, "for a memorial for the children of Israel before the Lord" (Numb. xxxi. 54). This, in some measure, counters the other memorial for the children of Israel, made of the rebels' censers (Numb. xvi. 40).

Surely we are justified in seeing in these 12,000 overcomers a foreshadowing of that great company, the 144,000 who overcome, who were not defiled with women, and who stand out in contrast with the awful doctrine of Balaam and Jezebel.

Israel now prepare to enter the land of promise, and the remaining chapters of Numbers are occupied with the numbering of the people, with laws adjusted to suit the changed circumstances, and with the special provision of the cities of refuge. These we hope to consider in our next article, which brings the survey of Numbers to a conclusion.

#90. Concluding features (Numb. xxvi. - xxxvi.).
pp. 186 - 190

We have now considered the teaching of the Book of Numbers up to the end of chapter xxv. From this point to the end of the Book, we have eleven more chapters. Had our intention in this series been a study of each book as it stands, we should have dealt next with the structures and analysis of the remaining chapters. This work had been partly done, but upon weighing the matter over, and considering the teaching of these remaining chapters in the light of the title, "Fundamentals of dispensational truth", we have decided to replace this detailed study by the briefest of summaries. Su much of the ground is retraced in these chapters, the new matter being largely connected with the re-adjustment of the people in view of the entry into the land, and the summary will be sufficient to lead on to the study of the fifth book of Moses, that of Deuteronomy.

Numb. xxvi. is occupied with the numbering of the people. This is the third census. The three occasions on which a census was taken are as follows:--

(1) Before the building of the tabernacle (Exod. xxx. 11; xxxviii. 25). This provided silver for the work of the tabernacle.
(2) At the opening of the Book of Numbers, in the wilderness of Sinai (Numb. i.).
(3) The third numbering is recorded here in Numb. xxvi. The record is followed by this solemn comment:--

> "These are they that were numbered by Moses and Eleazar the priest, who numbered the children of Israel in the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho. But among these was not a man whom Moses and Aaron the priest numbered, when they numbered the children of Israel in the wilderness of Sinai. For the Lord had said of them, They shall surely die in the wilderness. And there was not left a man of them save Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua, the son of Nun" (Numb. xxvi. 63-65).

Even Moses is not spared. He, too, must suffer loss, because of his failure to sanctify the Lord at Meribah:--

> "And the Lord said unto Moses, Get thee up into this mount Abarim, and see the land which I have given unto the children of Israel. And when thou hast seen it, thou also shalt be gathered unto thy people, as Aaron thy brother was gathered. For ye rebelled against My commandment in the desert of Zin, in the strife of the congregation, to sanctify Me at the water before their eyes" (Numb. xxvii. 12-14).

With these solemn words we may compare the witness of the apostle Paul:--

> "Lest by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be disqualified . . . . . All our fathers were under the cloud . . . . . all . . . . . all . . . . . all . . . . . all, but with many of them God was not well pleased . . . . . Let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall" (I Cor. ix. 24 - x. 12).
>
> "Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief . . . . . So we see that they could not enter in because of unbelief. Let us therefore fear, lest, a promise being left us . . . . . any of you should seem to come short of it" (Heb. iii. 7 - iv. 1).
> "This one thing I do, forgetting . . . . . reaching forth . . . . . I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" (Phil. iii. 13, 14).

As we read these words, who among us would have the temerity to say that we are sure that that crown and prize are ours? We do not, of course, mean to cast the slightest doubt upon the absolutely perfect and inalienable position that every believer occupies in grace. The passage in view is not dealing with position in grace, but with service, running a race, fighting a good fight, finishing a course. There is as much difference between these two things as between the rock foundation once laid, and the subsequent erection built upon it that shall be tried by fire (I Cor. iii.). When we are dealing with Israel in the Book of Numbers, we must remember that they are a redeemed people. Redemption had delivered them from the bondage of Egypt, and the Red Sea flowed between them. Moses himself was a saved man; yet he "suffered loss". The reader would be helped in his study if he were to read Psalm xc. and xci., noticing that Psalm xc. speaks of those whose carcasses fell in the wilderness, while Psalm xci. speaks of those who, being under twenty years of age, were preserved for those forty years, and led into the land under Joshua.

A beautiful spirit is manifested in the reply of Moses in Numb. xxvii. to the sentence of death. He makes no complaint, he offers no excuses; he bows before the Lord, but asks that a successor shall be appointed.

Numb. xxvii. deals with the request of the daughters of Zelophedad, and the Lord's answer. The latter, together with the further enactment given in the last chapter of Numbers, has to do with the law of the kinsman-redeemer, an important principle which underlies the beautiful account in the book of Ruth and the teaching of Scripture in connection with the Redeemer Himself (See the series on "Redemption", Volume XII, page 109). Chapters xxviii. and xxix. restate the law regarding various offerings and feasts. This was necessary for the guidance of the people about to enter the land, but does not demand a detailed study here.

Chapter xxx. is devoted to the question of vows: their fulfillment and their cancellation. A special place is given to the woman in the matter. Her vow can be rendered void either by her father, if she be unmarried, or by her husband, if she be married. The words, "He shall bear her iniquity" (xxx. 15) give us a faint picture of the relationship between Christ and His people. Moreover, the passage throws light upon the true status of women. It is introduced by the words: "This is the thing which the Lord hath commanded." A word here may perhaps be in season when the tendency of the times, even among the Lord's people, is to throw over the restraints of Scripture in the interests of a false "liberty" and "equality". The treatment of the daughters of Zelophedad, taken together with this chapter, would help to give a balanced judgment.

In chapter xxxi. Moses is commanded to avenge the children of Israel upon the Midianites. This is the last command laid upon Moses: "afterward shalt thou be gathered unto thy people." Midian is defeated. Balaam is slain. The spoils of war are purified with fire and the water of separation. A great difference is made between the levy imposed upon those who actually went out to the battle, and the remainder of the congregation who stayed at home.

The prey taken was of three kinds: persons (verses 12, 18, 35), beasts (32-34) and money & goods (22 and 50). These were divided among the congregation and the army. In this we have an anticipation of David's ruling concerning "his part . . . . . that tarrieth by the stuff" (I Sam. xxx. 24). On the other hand there is due recognition of the active part played by the soldier, whose levy was "one soul of five hundred" whilst that of the congregation was "one portion of fifty" (Numb. xxxi. 27-30). At the close of this levy, a census was taken of the warriors, which revealed the fact that there "lacked not one" of them. Moved with gratitude, they bring an oblation, to make an atonement for their souls.

Chapter xxxii. is mainly concerned with the request of Reuben and Gad, that their inheritance should be allotted to them in the land of Gilead because "the place was a place for cattle". They requested that they should not be brought "over Jordan" (xxxii. 1-5). Their request was granted, upon condition that they sent their quota to war, until Israel had entered into their own possessions. There is an important lesson here, which we shall probably consider in our study of the Book of Joshua and its typical teaching. We may anticipate, however, without going into detail:--

(1) It was the possession of cattle, not the glory of the Lord, or the following of His will, that influenced Reuben and Gad.

(2) It was an attempt to reverse God's order—which was the conquest of Canaan first, and then the spreading out to occupy the land "from sea to sea".

(3) The gaining of their request meant that many never returned to wife and children or inheritance. And when Israel began to be taken into captivity, they were among the first to go.

It is "natural" to shirk the crossing of Jordan, but it is foreign to the teaching of Scripture.

Chapter xxxiii. is occupied with a record of the journeys of Israel. The word "journeys" in verse one is, in the Hebrew, "pullings up", and has reference to the tent pegs. The whole is a record of pilgrimage, and a remainder of the way in which the Lord had led the people, suffering their ways, providing food and raiment, and eventually leading them into the land of promise.

Chapter xxxiv. fixes the bounds of the inheritance.

Chapter xxxv. provides for the tribe of Levi forty-eight cities, of which six are reserved as cities of refuge for the man-slayer (verses 1-6). Three of these cities were in the land of Canaan, and three on the other side of Jordan (verse 14). The avenger of blood is the kinsman-redeemer; and this chapter, together with those that deal with the problem of the daughters of Zelophedad, provided a twofold aspect of the work of the Redeemer, corresponding to the two words, "destroy" and "deliver" in Heb. ii. 14, 15.

From another angle, the avenger of blood may be regarded as symbolizing the law, from whom the man-slayer was not freed until the death of the High Priest.

Chapter xxxvi. brings this book to a close with the added statement already considered regarding the case of the inheritance passing to the daughter of a family. Marriage within the tribe is the only restriction; freedom of choice is allowed within these limits. This may well be taken as an illustration of the vexed question of the freedom of choice among moral agents. Man must of necessity be free; otherwise he ceases to be either moral or responsible. His freedom, however, is not absolute but relative; for God's will shall with certainty be accomplished. Freedom of choice is not permitted to spoil the inheritance or ourselves or of others, for this inheritance has much to do with the great purpose of the ages. We ask the reader to observe that we use the words, "freedom of choice" and not "freedom of will'. Who among us can say "I will" and not feel how much he is bound by circumstances?

With this survey we conclude our study of the book of pilgrimage; and look forward with interest to the restatement which is contained in the book of Deuteronomy.

Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth. (Second Series).

Deuteronomy.
#1. Structure of the Book.
pp. 234 - 238

We have now reached the fifth book of Moses, called in our version Deuteronomy. The name given by the Hebrews is usually taken from the opening sentence: Elleh debarim, "These be the words". The title Deuteronomy was taken by our translators from the Vulgate Deuteronomium, which in turn was taken from the Septuagint, where, in Deut. xvii. 18, the words, "A copy of this law" (Hebrew: Mishneh Hat-Torah) are translated by Deuteronomium, meaning, "A repetition of the law". This title indicates very clearly the general purpose of the book, which is devoted mainly to a rehearsal of the law upon the threshold of the land of promise. Of all the suggested outlines and subdivisions that we have examined, none seems to keep so close to the actual subject-matter as that given in The Companion Bible.

The literary structure given in The Companion Bible is as follows:--

A | i. 1-5. Introduction.
B | C | i. 6 - xxxii. 47. The Tribes. Their administration.
D | xxxii. 48-52. Moses. His death announced.
B | C | xxxiii. 1-29. The Tribes. Their blessing.
D | xxxiv. 1-7. Moses. His death accomplished.
A | xxxiv. 8-12. Conclusion.

This outline has the advantage of placing all the spoken words of Moses together in one member (B | C | i. 6 - xxxii. 47) with the exception of the blessing pronounced upon the nation in xxxiii. 1-29, which stands alone. As these articles have in mind readers who may not be able to weigh over the "pros and cons" of those structures which deal with a wide range of subject-matter, we devote this opening article to an expansion and verification of the outline given in The Companion Bible for the second member in the scheme above (C | i. 6 - xxxii. 47).

Analysis of the addresses of Moses to Israel (From The Companion Bible):

C | E | G | i. 6 - iii. 29. Possession East of Jordan. Retrospective.
H | a | iv. 1 - v. 33. Injunctions in Horeb. Retrospective.
b | vi. 1 - xi. 25. Injunctions on entry. Prospective.
J | c | xi. 26-28. Blessings and curses.
d | xi. 29-32. Gerizim and Ebal.
F | xii. 1 - xxvii. 10. Laws IN the Land.
E | J | d | xxvii. 11-26. Gerizim and Ebal.
c | xxviii. 1-68. Blessings and curses.
H | a | xxix. 1-17. Injunctions plus Horeb. Retrospective.
b | xxix. 18 - xxx. 20. Injunctions re Dispersion. Prospective.
G | xxxi. 1-8. Possession West of Jordan. Prospective.
F | xxxi. 9 - xxxii. 47. Laws and Song: IN and OUT of the Land.

The opening member is retrospective and deals with possession East of Jordan; the balancing member is prospective and deals with possession West of Jordan. These members we shall now consider more in detail, so that the reader may see for himself that these things are so.

The first member is retrospective, for Moses turns the attention of his hearers back to that day thirty-eight years earlier, when God had commanded the nation to go up and possess the land. He reminds them of the sending of the spies and the awful result. Chapters ii. and iii. speak of Israel's journeys through the lands "this side of Jordan", lands held by Og, king of Bashan, and Sihon, king of the Amorites. Chapter iii. refers to the inheritance of Reuben, Gad and the half tribe of Manasseh, also on "this side of Jordan". This is sufficient, we trust, to establish the headline of the structure; and we now turn to the corresponding section, xxxi. 1-8.

This section is a short one occupying but eight verses. It opens with the fact that Moses was one hundred and twenty years old, that he was no longer as active as hitherto, and that he was forbidden by the Lord to go over Jordan. But though Moses the leader had failed, Jehovah the Lord had not: "The Lord thy God, He will go over before thee . . . . . and Joshua, he shall go over before thee" (xxxi. 3). The opening section dealt with Og and Sihon and so, in this balancing section, we find: "And the Lord shall do unto them, as He did to Sihon and to Og" (xxxi. 4). Words of encouragement addressed to Joshua are then given; these are repeated in Joshua i., emphasizing that the point of view is now prospective, looking forward to the crossing of Jordan and the entering of the land.

We now examine the next pair of members, iv. 1 - v. 33 and xxix. 1-17. Both are said to be retrospective, and associated with Horeb. The second differs from the first in that it is said to be "plus Horeb". This we must test. Israel are reminded of what took place at Baal-peor (iv. 3), of what happened to Moses (iv. 21) and of the manifestation at Sinai and in Egypt (iv. 33, 34). The association with Horeb is found in iv. 15 and v. 2. The parallel passage (xxix. 1-17) is both retrospective and additional to the covenant terms of Horeb. Moses opens with the retrospective words, "Ye have seen" (xxix. 2-4); and this is resumed in verses 16 and 17: "For ye know . . . . . Ye have seen." The words of xxix. 1: "These are the words of the covenant . . . . . beside the covenant which He made with them in Horeb" speak of an important fact that must be taken into consideration whenever the "covenant" is mentioned. For the moment, however, we have to test the structure given on page 235. We turn, therefore, to the next pair of members, vi. 1 - xi. 25 and xxix. 18 - xxx. 20:--

Injunctions on entry. Prospective.
Injunctions re dispersion. Prospective.

Chapter vi. opens with the words:--

> "Now these are the commandments, the statutes and the judgments which the Lord your God commanded to teach you, that ye might do them in the land whither ye go to possess it . . . . . thou and thy son, and thy son's son" (vi. 1, 2).

Chapter vii. 1 continues in the same strain: "When the Lord thy God shall bring thee into the land." And so with viii. 1, ix. 1 and xi. 10, 11; the whole passage, however (xxix. 18 - xxx. 20), has to do with the possibility of the people being deprived of the land and scattered:--

> "The anger of the Lord was kindled against the land . . . . . and the Lord rooted them out . . . . . and cast them into another land" (xxix. 27, 28).
> "If any of thine be driven out unto the outmost parts of heaven" (xxx. 4).

The central members of the structure are concerned with blessings and curses, Gerizim and Ebal, and the laws in the land.

Chapter xi. 26-28 deals with a blessing and a curse:--

> "Behold I set before you this day a blessing and a curse" (xi. 26).

Chapter xxviii. 1-68 balances this section, verses 3-14 detailing a series of blessings, and verses 15-68 a series of curses. Chapter xxvii. 11-26 is taken up with the pronouncement of blessings and curses by specified tribes on either Gerizim or Ebal.

This leaves us with xii. 1 - xxvii. 10 and xxxi. 9 - xxxii. 47:--

Laws IN the land.
Laws and songs IN and OUT of the land.

Chapter xii. opens with the words:--

> "These are the statutes and judgments, which ye shall observe to do in the land, which the Lord God of thy fathers giveth thee to possess it, all the days that ye live upon the earth."

These statutes and judgments deal with idolatrous places, images, clean and unclean foods, false prophets, sabbatical years, passover and other feasts, the administration of justice, the desire for a king, the Levites, war, agriculture, property, marriage, women, men, offerings and tithes.

Chapter xxxi. 9 speaks of Moses writing "this law" and xxxi. 19 continues with a command to write "this song". The song gives a prophetic picture of Israel's history from their original call and election to the establishing at last of the kingdom.

We trust that sufficient has been said to justify the structure given in The Companion Bible, and with this survey we must conclude. In subsequent articles we hope to single out a few essential features for consideration, but the bulk of the book we shall have to pass over unnoticed. The book is long and, to some extent, a repetition, and our studies in this series are not intended to give a detailed exposition of every chapter, but rather to draw attention to features that are fundamental to the working out of the purpose of the ages as exhibited during the varied dispensations.

Great and precious promises.

#1. An incentive to holiness.

pp. 21 - 24

When we were dealing with various aspects of sanctification in an earlier series, we had occasion to refer to II Cor. vii. 1, our special point at the time being the "perfecting" of holiness that is there enjoined. It is evident that in pursuing one line of doctrine many other helpful and interesting parts of the truth must necessarily be passed by without comment. We now therefore return to this same verse, to commence another series of short articles, this time meditating rather upon the place that "promises" occupy in our growth in grace:--

> "Having therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God" (II Cor. vii. 1).

The exhortation to "perfect holiness" does not stand alone; behind it is a priceless possession:--

> "Having . . . . . let us."

These words set before the reader God's order of presentation, an order which recurs in other parts of Scripture, and particularly in Heb. iv. and x.:--

> "Seeing then that WE HAVE a great High Priest, that is passed through the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, LET US hold fast our profession" (Heb. iv. 14).
> "For WE HAVE . . . . . an High Priest . . . . . Who was tempted like as we are . . . . . LET US therefore come boldly to the throne of grace" (Heb. iv. 15, 16).
>
> "HAVING therefore, brethren, boldness . . . . . and HAVING an High Priest over the house of God; LET US draw near with a true heart . . . . . LET US hold fast the profession of our hope . . . . . LET US consider one another" (Heb. x. 19-24).

Such is the only true basis and sequence of exhortation; to reverse the order would be spiritually fatal.

We propose, therefore, to consider the promises that form the basis of this true exhortation, and we commence with the passage already referred to, II Cor. vii. 1.

The promises referred to here are those quoted in II Cor. vi. 16-18:--

> "For ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them, and I will be their God, and they shall be My people. Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing: and I will receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be My sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty."

This is a composite quotation from several O.T. Scriptures. The passages cited are Lev. xxvi. 12; Ezek. xxxvii. 26, 27; Isa. lii. 11, and II Sam. vii. 14. There is also an allusion to Isa. xliii. 6. At first sight, these citations may seem to be quoted at random without much reference to context, but an examination of the passages as they stand in II Cor. vi. will shew an underlying unity and purpose, which we should, of course, expect in any part of the Word of God.

The O.T. quotations in II Cor. vi. 16-18.

A | 16. YE ARE—The temple of the living God.
B | 16. I WILL—Dwell, Walk, Be their God.
C | THEY SHALL BE—My people.
A | 17. BE YE—separate. Touch not.
B | 17, 18. I WILL—Receive. Be a Father.
C | 18. YE SHALL BE—My sons and daughter.

When we have seen this arrangement of subject-matter, we cannot possibly entertain the idea of mere haphazard quotation. Rather, we find that in this orderly presentation of truth, we have set forth the very teaching to which we have already alluded, represented by the words, "Having . . . . . let us". Here, however, the basis and incentive is not what we have, but deeper still—what we are: "Ye are the temple of the living God."

"Ye are."—In the first epistle to the Corinthians the truth that the believer is the temple of God had already been made known:--

> "What? Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own? For ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body and in your spirit, which are God's" (I Cor. vi. 19, 20).

Here are the same argument, the same basis, and the same approach, as are found in II Cor. vi. 16 - vii. 1. Here the believer, being the temple of God, is urged to glorify God in body and in spirit, while in II Cor. vi. 16 - vii. 1, on the same basis, there is to be the cleansing of the flesh and spirit from all filthiness—an illuminating comment upon what glorifying God in body and in spirit entails.

"I will."—Before God could dwell in the midst of Israel a sanctuary had to be made, so that the holiness of the Lord might be uncompromised by His condescension:--

> "Let them make me a sanctuary; that I may dwell among them" (Exod. xxv. 8).

This is a promise, the fullness and blessedness of which we do not yet realize. If God shall, in any sense, dwell and walk with His people, then the promise becomes a firm basis upon which the exhortation can rest: "Having therefore . . . . . let us cleanse ourselves." There is, moreover, a prophetic anticipation of that glorious day when in the new heavens and earth shall resound the voice, saying:--

> "Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them, and they shall be His people, and God Himself shall be with them, and be their God" (Rev. xxi. 3).

It is natural and right to read straight on the comforting words, "and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes", but we should not forget that the context is very like that of II Cor. vi. 16 - vii. 1:--

> "I will be his God, and he shall be My son. But the fearful and the unbelieving, and the abominable and murderers and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone: which is the second death . . . . . there shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth" (Rev. xxi. 7, 8, 27).

"They shall be."—Not until the fulfillment of the two preceding clauses, can it be said, "They shall be My people". The people of God are something more than a chosen nation. They are His people because they are bought with a price, and have been cleanse and sanctified.

To enforce the lesson, the apostle goes over the ground again, and approaches his subject from another angle.

"Be ye."—This clause looks back to the previous statement: "Ye are the temple of the living God." If this is so, says the apostle, we must remember that there can be nothing in common between the temple of God and idols. So he continues:--

> "Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing" (II Cor. vi. 17).

Here we have a threefold exhibition of the fact that we are the temple of God. We are to "come out", to "be separate" and to "touch not the unclean thing".

To each one of us these words have their own special appeal and application; it is not for us in an article like this to attempt more than draw attention to facts. The real application must be the work of the Holy Spirit interpreting to heart and conscience what these things involve. We may at least see that any compromising connection that we may have, even in the realm of service, comes under this scrutiny.

"I will."—In the first set of quotations, the Lord's "I will" included the thoughts of "dwelling", "walking" and "being their God". Another aspect is presented in this second "I will":--

> "I will receive you, and will be a Father unto you" (II Cor. vi. 18).

If it is true that we are received by God, and if He is also our Father, what precious promises we have upon which to lean and from which to work.

"Ye shall be."—When the Lord said, "I will be their God", the sequel was that "they shall be My people". When He says, "I will be a Father unto you", then the sequel must be: "And ye shall be My sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty."

With this double set of promises as basis and incentive, the apostle proceeds to the application:--

> "Having therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God" (II Cor. vii. 1).

#2. Promises and the divine nature (II Pet. i. 4).
pp. 61 - 63

Having considered the reference in II Cor. vii. which links this series with the earlier one dealing with holiness, it will be of service before we go further to turn our attention to the passage which contains the words chosen for the title of the present series:--

> "Simon Peter, a servant and an apostle of Jesus Christ, to them that have obtained like precious faith with us, by the righteousness of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ. Grace to you and peace be multiplied by the knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord. Seeing that His divine power hath granted unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness, through the knowledge of Him that called us by His own glory and virtue, through which He hath given to us the most great and precious promises, that by means of these ye may become partakers of the divine nature, having escaped from the corruption which is in the world by lust" (II Pet. i. 1-4).

The mere reading of this extract from Peter's second epistle is sufficient to associate it with the teaching of II Cor. vi. 16 - vii. 1, where the exhortation to "cleanse ourselves from all filthiness" is based upon the possession of certain promises.

Although Peter speaks of "great and precious promises", one promise, in the working out of the epistle, is dominant—that of the Lord's second coming.

The first and last references to the promises in II Peter contain the word epaggelma (II Pet. i. 4 and iii. 13; the only occurrences of this form). The remainder contain the words epaggelia and epaggelomai (II Pet. ii. 19, iii. 4 and 9). Let us consider the two former passages, in which epaggelma occurs:--

> "Most great and precious promises, that by these ye may become partakers of the divine nature; having escaped from the corruption that is in the world by lust" (II Pet. i. 4).

With this opening statement should be compared the following passage from the third chapter, with which should be read the preceding two verses:--

> "Nevertheless we, according to His promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. Wherefore, beloved, seeing that ye look for such things, be diligent that ye may be found of Him in peace, without spot, and blameless" (II Pet. iii. 13, 14).
> "Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness, looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God?" (II Pet. iii. 11, 12).

We observe that both in i. 4 and in iii. 13 the promise is intimately connected with sanctification, and the connection becomes even more apparent as we take a wider survey. For example, the first chapter continues:--

> "And beside this, giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue; and to virtue knowledge; and to knowledge temperance; and to temperance patience; and to patience godliness; and to godliness brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness love" (II Pet. i. 5-7).

Here we have an account of the "manner of persons we ought to be":--

> "For if these things be in you and abound, they shall make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ" (II Pet. i. 8).

We hear the echo of this in II Pet. iii. 18:--

> "But grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

These comparisons make in abundantly clear that the great and precious promise of the Lord's coming is an incentive to sanctification, a teaching which we may discover in other passages such as I John iii. 3. The great and precious promise that is specially developed in II Pet. i. is the promise of the Lord's return, sealed to the heart of Peter by the vision on the Mount of Transfiguration, and by the "more sure word of prophecy".

This sure word of prophecy may be contrasted with the promise in chapter ii. made by "false prophets", by the following of which the way of truth is evil spoken of:--

> "While they promise them liberty, they themselves are the servants of corruption . . . . . for if after they have escaped the pollutions of the world through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, they are again entangled therein, and overcome, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning" (II Pet. ii. 19, 20).

The statement here seems, on the surface, to be much the same as that of II Pet. i. 4:--

> "Having escaped the corruption that is in the world" (II Pet. i. 4).
> "After they have escaped the pollutions of the world" (II Pet. ii. 20).

We note, however, that in the first instance we have the word "corruption" (phthora), and in the second the word "pollution" (miasma). The first word means the corruption of death and the grave, and demands as its answer nothing less than resurrection life and power; the second conveys the idea of defilement or stain, which may be washed off without altering the nature of the subject. That this is sound exegesis one more reference to the passages will prove. In II Pet. i. 4, those who are in view have been made, by the most great and precious promises there spoken of, partakers of the divine nature. On the other hand, those who were influenced by the promise of liberty made by the false teachers, never knew this radical change, for they are likened to dogs returning to their own vomit, and to sows that were washed returning to their mire (II Pet. ii. 22). Dogs and sows can never set forth the divine nature; a sow may be washed, but it remains a sow by nature still.

The contrast between the dog and the sow returning to their uncleanness and the position of the true believer is seen by comparing II Pet. ii. 22 with I Pet. ii. 25:--

> "For ye were as sheep going astray, but are now returned unto the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls" (I Pet. ii. 25).

The true seed—those for whom Christ died—are spoken of as having gone astray from Him, and as returning to Him, whereas the others return not to Him, but to their own uncleanness.

The challenge of the scoffer, "Where is the promise of His coming?" (II Pet. iii. 4) and the reply of the apostle, "The Lord is not slack concerning His promise" (II Pet. iii. 9), complete the references in the epistle to this most great and precious promise.

Peter's words to the dispersion apply, of course, in their primary interpretation to that "royal priesthood and holy nation", but we trust that the elemental lessons that are also here may not be lost to those who know other great and precious promises that have been made peculiarly to them.

#3. "By grace, to the end the promise might be sure" (Rom. iv. 16).

pp. 101 - 103

We have looked at the way in which promises are used in Scripture, and have seen what an incentive they are to practical sanctification (II Cor. vi. 16 - vii. 1). We have also seen that they are effective largely because they bring to the believer that divine nature, apart from which, though promised liberty, we should be as unchanged intrinsically as the "sow that is washed".

It will be of service to us at this point to endeavour to discover wherein lies the great strength of the promises of God. Apart from the epistle to the Hebrews, which contains more references to the promises than any other book in Scripture, the epistles that are most concerned with this theme are those to the Romans and the Galatians. In these epistles the word "promise" in one form or another occurs twenty times, and almost every reference is associated directly or indirectly, with Abraham.

Great stress is laid by the apostle, both in Romans and in Galatians, upon the fact that the promise made to Abraham was addressed to faith, and that the law can have no place in the promises except to make them void. Let us hear the inspired argument, first from Rom. iv. and then from Gal. iii.:--

> "For the promise that he should be the heir of the world, was not to Abraham, or to his seed, through the law, but through the righteousness of faith. For if they which are of the law be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect . . . . . Therefore it is of faith, that it might be by grace; to the end the promise might be sure to all the seed" (Rom. iv. 13-16).

The word "it" in verse 16 refers, not to the promise but to the inheritance. It is "out of faith" (ek) "with the object that" (hina) it might be "according to" or "in harmony with grace" (kata), "to the end (eis) that the promise might be sure".

As it is not our intention in this series to go into detailed exposition, but rather to minister the "comfort of the Scriptures" in a simple fashion, we turn to the passage parallel to Rom. iv. that is found in Gal. iii.:--

> "Brethren, I speak after the manner of men; Though it be but a man's covenant, yet if it be confirmed, no man disannulleth, or addeth thereto. Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many: but as of One, And to thy seed, which is Christ. And this I say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect. For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise; but God gave it to Abraham by promise. Wherefore then serveth the law? It was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made; and it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator. Now a mediator is not a mediator of one, but God is one" (Gal. iii. 15-20).

The exposition of this passage demands a very high standard both of critical and exegetical ability and of spiritual appreciation. Such gifts are not, however, demanded of us at the moment. The general trend of the apostle's teaching is sufficiently clear to enable us to comprehend the thought expressed in Rom. iv. 16:--

> "Therefore it is of faith, that it might be by grace, to the end the promise might be sure to all the seed."

The argument, borrowed from the affairs of men, is that if a man's covenant or will is inviolable when once it is confirmed, then it is most certainly true that the covenant made by God cannot be nullified by the coming in of the law of Sinai some four hundred and thirty years after. The conditional covenant of Sinai has no reference to the unconditional covenant of promise made to Abraham.

The argument is rounded off by the enigmatic statement of verse 20: "Now a mediator is not a mediator of one, but God is one." Alford's note to this verse is of interest:--

"The explanation of this verse, so obscure from its brevity, are so numerous (Winer counted 250; Jowett mentions 430) that they require a bibliography of their own."

This is certainly not the place to attempt an exposition of such a verse, but a few notes concerning it will clear the way for a fuller study:--

(1) The reference to the mediator is not to Christ; the whole context compels us to regard it as a reference to Moses and the law of Sinai.
(2) The expression "God is one" must not be taken as a revelation of the great doctrine of the unity of the Godhead. Such a doctrine has no place in the argument, and its inclusion here would only cumber the mind with extraneous ideas.

The apostle's argument both in Rom. iv. and Gal. iii. is that the promise is by faith and grace, and that, whereas the law is conditional, this is unconditional. It is clear that, where there are conditions, there will be two contracting parties, and two contracting parties necessitate a mediator. In the case of the covenant promised to Abraham, however, in order that there should be no semblance of condition or obligation on the part of Abraham, God put him to sleep (Gen. xv. 9-17). This is the meaning of the phrase, "But God is one"; there was only one party in the covenant with Abraham—God Himself. The promise, therefore, is sure; it comes by way of faith and grace, and so can be used, as it is, by God to encourage His people in their upward way. The promise and the inheritance are sure, for in the realm of grace the crippling yoke of legal obligation is unknown.

May the ministry of this wonderful aspect of the great and precious promises encourage the children of God. "Having therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us . . . . ."

#4. "Ye are all one in Christ Jesus" (Gal. iii. 28).
pp. 141 - 143

The truth of the remark made in the preceding article of this series as to the difficulties of the passage then under consideration—Gal. iii. 15-20—was probably obvious to the reader. The character of these short articles precludes our usual method of approach to such deep mines of doctrine, and consequently many points of importance must be passed by in silence.

When quoting Gal. iii. we purposely made no comment on verse 16:--

"Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ."

The argument of the apostle is that the word "seed" must not be considered as plural, but as singular: "Not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ." It has been hastily said that the Hebrew word for "seed" has no plural, but this is not true, for in I Sam. viii. 15 and Dan. i. 12 we have instances of the word taking the plural ending. It might be thought that the apostle is alluding here to an O.T. passage in which the literal and numerous descendants of Abraham are not in view, but it would be disastrous to base our belief on mere vague thought. Is there such a passage? And if not, what is the answer to the difficulty raised by the apostle's deliberate statement?

The possible references are limited to those which contain the promise made to Abraham, and consequently occur in Genesis, chapters xii. to xxv.:--

> "Unto thy seed will I give this land" (Gen. xii. 7).
> "The land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever" (Gen. xiii. 15).
> "Unto thy seed have I given this land" (Gen. xv. 18).
> "I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land" (Gen. xvii. 8).

Of the above references (Gen. xiii. 15 and xvii. 8), two contain the exact words of the apostle, "And to thy seed". Upon examining the contexts of these passages, however, we are faced with the fact that the literal and numerous seed of Abraham are in view. Immediately after the verse considered in Gen. xiii. we have:--

> "And I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth, so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered" (Gen. xiii. 16).

Plurality is not only to be inferred here; it is most pointedly emphasized. Yet this appears to be one of the passages which the apostle had in mind. We find the same contextual significance in the other reference (Gen. xvii. 8):--

> "I will multiply thee exceedingly . . . . . thou shalt be a father of many nations . . . . . thy seed after thee in their generations . . . . . I will be their God" (Gen. xvii. 2-8).

Here we have plurality reiterated: "multiply", "many", "their generations", "their God". We need not, however go as far back as the book of Genesis. In the chapter of Galatians where our passage occurs, and as a continuation of the argument of which verse 16 is a part, we have a recognition of the fact that the "seed" is plural:--

> "And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. iii. 29).

Before examining this verse further, we would refer back to Rom. iv. to establish one point. The apostle asks how righteousness was reckoned to Abraham. Was it in circumcision or in uncircumcision? The answer is, In uncircumcision.

> "That he might be the father of all them that believe though they be not circumcised . . . . . it is of faith that it might be by grace: to the end the promise might be sure to ALL THE SEED, not to that only which is of the law, but that also which is of the faith of Abraham, who is the father of us all" (Rom. iv. 10-16).

It is abundantly clear from this passage that Gentile believers of the dispensation that covers the period of the Acts, as well as Jewish believers, together constitute "the seed of Abraham", who is father of all, whether Jew or Gentile. We can now go back to Gal. iii. and give a fuller quotation from the close of the chapter:--

> "For as MANY of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female, for YE ARE ALL ONE IN CHRIST JESUS. And if ye be Christ's, then ye are Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. iii. 27-29).

The "one" of Gal. iii. 16 is explained by the "one" of Gal. iii. 28. Abraham's seed in Gal. iii. 16 is Christ; all who believed, as Abraham did, were baptized into Christ, they put on Christ, and became "all one" in Christ Jesus. So that Gal. iii. 16, far from denying the thought of the many, has a most valuable lesson to teach. The many are not seen as so many separate individuals. Whether by birth they were Jews or Greeks is of no importance. Whether bond or free, whether male or female, they were heirs according to the promise because in Christ they were all one.

Let us observe, too, that when the apostle wishes to indicate the individual Person, he uses the full title "Christ Jesus"; while when he wishes to indicate the company which forms the Christ, in the mystical sense, he uses the title "Christ" by itself. We have, therefore, an added reason for rejoicing in the promises of God, for although they are made to each of us personally, yet are they so made as to exclude any participation in them apart from the Lord Jesus Christ, and our union with Him.

The words "Ye are all one in Christ Jesus" taken from Gal. iii. 28 are often quoted as though they applied to the church which is His Body. This, however, is not the theme of Galatians, and such an interpretation is contradicted by the apostle's own conclusion: "Then are ye Abraham's seed." The church of the mystery is not Abraham's seed; but the truth to be learnt from Gal. iii. concerning the enjoyment of the promises of God is a truth applicable to all dispensations and spheres. The apostle was perfectly right when he said, "And not to seeds, as of many", for the promises were never made to individuals independently of Christ, and they can never be enjoyed except by those who are "all one in Christ Jesus".

One further argument to show that individual Israelites, apart from those "in Christ", are not contemplated as the seed, is found in Gal. iii. 19:--

> "It was added . . . . . till the seed should come to whom the promise was made."

The actual number of the "seed" of Abraham at the giving of the law must have exceeded a million, yet, according to Gal. iii. 19, the seed to whom the promise was made had not then come. Let us rejoice to know that by shutting us up to Christ, the promise is made sure to all the seed. Which of us that has any knowledge of Christ would have it otherwise?

#5. "In Him is the Yea, and through Him the Amen" (II Cor. i. 20).

pp. 181 - 183

In our last article we learnt the valuable lesson that the promise made to Abraham's seed did not contemplate individuals as such, but regarded them collectively as "all one in Christ Jesus". "If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed" is the apostle's insistent assertion.

It will not be a waste of time if we pursue this subject further and learn that not only the promise to Abraham, but all the promises found in the Scriptures are to be enjoyed only in and through Christ. A passage that makes this very clear is II Cor. i. 20:--

> "For all the promises of God in Him are Yea, and in Him Amen unto the glory of God by us."

To appreciate this statement some acquaintance with the context is necessary, and although it is not our intention in this series to go into detail or to attempt a systematic exposition of the passages before us, the context of II Cor. i. 20 is so involved that it will be a saving of time if we can see the structure of the section even though it be shorn of all detail. Elsewhere (see The Apostle of the Reconciliation, page 183) we have given the structure of II Corinthians as a whole, from which we find as one complete member II Cor. i. 13 - ii. 13. As this member contains the verse under consideration we will give its structure in the simplest outline:--

II Cor. i. 13 - ii. 13.

A1 | i. 13-16. I was minded to come to you that ye might have a second benefit.
B1 | i. 17-22. Yea and Amen.
A1 | i. 23. To spare you I came not as yet unto Corinth.
A2 | ii. 1. But I determined this with myself that I would not come again to you in heaviness.
B2 | ii. 2-11. Punishment and forgiveness.
A2 | ii. 12, 13. I came to Troas . . . . . I went from thence to Macedonia.

It will be seen that both statement concerning the promises of God, and also the reason advanced in "B2" arise out of the projected journey of Paul to Macedonia and his promised visit to Corinth. Without discussing the readings of the different Greek texts, it is necessary to point out the distinction between two related words used here, boulomai and bouleuomai. The former conveys the idea of a wish, the latter more of a determined purpose:--

> "And in this confidence I was desirous (not 'determined' but the imperfect, 'I was wishing') before to come unto you, in order that a second benefit (grace, or joy) ye might have, and by your means to pass unto Macedonia, and again from Macedonia to come unto you, and by you be sent forward unto Judæa. When I therefore was thus desirous, did I show fickleness?" (II Cor. i. 15-17).

The apostle expresses his wishes in this passage, but we must not assume that he was ruled by them. His wishes were ruled by his will, even as his will, as he is yet to show, was always subservient to the will and purpose of God.

To show how unfounded was any possible charge of fickleness, the apostle states categorically his reason for not visiting Corinth as he had wished to do:--

> "Moreover, I call God for a witness upon my soul that to spare you I came not as yet to Corinth . . . . . but I determined this with myself that I would not come again to you in heaviness" (II Cor. i. 23, ii. 1).

Resuming our reading at verse 17, we find a change. Leaving his desires which, though expressed, were nevertheless subservient to his sense of right and wrong, he comes to the deeper matter of his purposes and plans:--

> "Or the things that I purpose (i.e., 'resolve', bouleuomai as distinguished from boulomai, 'I desire'), do I purpose them according to the flesh (i.e., with carnal willfulness) in order that with me the yea should be yea and the nay should be nay?"

Or, to give a rather free paraphrase of the apostle's words:--

> "Do I of my own fleshly will decide whether I shall or shall not do a thing? Or whether my plans and purposes shall or shall not be altered? This cannot be, for who can use such terms but God only? Not only do I submit my own wishes to my own purposes, but I also submit those same purposes to the revealed will of God."

Thus, as Wordsworth says, the apostle disposes of two objections:-- > "the first, charging him with capricious fickleness in his wishes; the second, imputing to him arbitrary imperiousness of will."

The apostle, by a natural transition, turns from his actions and criticism of them, to related doctrine and the possible criticism of that:--

> "But as God is faithful, our word toward you is not yea and nay, for the Son of God, Jesus Christ, Who was preached among you by us, even by me, and Sylvannus and Timothy, became not yea and nay, but Yea in Him hath it become. For how many soever be the promises of God, in Him is the Yea, wherefore also through Him is the Amen, unto the glory of God through us" (II Cor. i. 18-20).

Thus is most striking contrast with the inability of the best of his servants either to desire or to determine anything that shall be an unalterable Yea or Nay, stand the promises of God. Those promises, as we saw when dealing with Gal. iii. 16 in the previous article, are all in Christ. In Him is the great affirmative "Yea" and through Him the great confirmative "Amen":--

"We bless Thee, O Thou great Amen,
Jehovah's pledge to sinful men,
Confirming all His Word.
Doubtful no promises remain
For all are Yea, and all Amen,
In Thee, the faithful Lord."

#6. The holy promissory Spirit (Eph. i. 13, 14).
pp. 226 - 228

Before concluding this series of articles, we must devote some space to the use of the word "promise" in the epistles particularly concerned with the truth of the mystery.

Apart from the statement concerning the law of God and "the first commandment with promise", we have but three references in the epistle to the Ephesians:--

"Ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of promise" (i. 13).
"Strangers from the covenants of promise" (ii. 12).
"Partakers of His promise in Christ by the gospel" (iii. 6).

Throughout the five preceding papers of this series we have been dealing with promises that were Abrahamic in character, and it will be fitting if we first of all face the fact revealed in this epistle, that as Gentiles in the flesh we were both "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise". There are three very serious objections to the translation: "Guests of the covenants of promise", for—

(1) The apostle is not speaking about what Gentiles were by faith or in spirit, but what they were "in the flesh".
(2) Before he speaks of either the commonwealth or the covenant, he says that such Gentile were "without Christ", and
(3) He follows these statements by saying, moreover, that they had "no hope" and were "without God" or "Godless" in the world.

There is no allusion to the standing of believing Gentiles either before the Lord came or after, for the sphere "in the flesh" and "in the world" precludes the idea, as do also their hopeless, Christless, Godless, state. So far as the covenants of promise were concerned the Gentile was a "stranger".

It was the blessed privilege of the apostle in Eph. ii. to reveal the creation of the new man:--

"For to create (not make) in Himself, of the twain, one new man" (Eph. ii. 15).

The fact that a new creation is brought in here, precludes the idea that the Gentile, who was once a stranger to the covenants of promise, is now brought into relationship with these self-same covenants—that would deny the essential meaning of "create" and "new". The Gentile is taught to realize the utter undone condition of his natural state, in order that he may the better realize the transcendent glory that has made him nearer than any member of the commonwealth of Israel could ever be. With this as a background we turn to Eph. iii. 6, where the revelation of the mystery is the theme.

The essential feature of the relationship here revealed is that of absolute equality. This is expressed in verse 6 by a threefold use of the preposition sun, "together with". Quite a number of Greek words are translated "with" in our versions, and it is necessary to differentiate them:--

Meta indicates "proximity", like a row of houses.
Para means "beside", as two *para*llel lines or as in the construction of a *para*ble.
Pros really means "towards", and indicates a unity of intention as when one says, "I am with you in that undertaking".
Sun means "union", "fellowship" and "oneness", more intimate than is indicated by any other Greek preposition.

In order to express the vital oneness that is inherent in the preposition sun, we will give it here the somewhat expanded rendering: "in vital oneness together."

Casting their shadow over the Gentile in Eph. ii. 11, 12 are the two dark expressions, "in the flesh" and "in the world", while illuminating with their glory the blessings of the mystery are the two expressions of Eph. iii. 5, 6, "in Spirit" and "in Christ":--

"IN SPIRIT
The Gentiles are to be Heirs in vital oneness together and a Body in vital oneness together, and Partakers in vital oneness together
Of the promise
IN CHRIST" (Eph. iii. 5, 6).

The item that is most intimately associated with the promise is the third, and that promise is not only "in Christ" but "through the gospel" of which Paul was made a minister.

Coming now to the first occurrence of the promise in Ephesians we read:--

> "In whom ye also upon hearing the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation: in whom also upon believing, ye were sealed with that holy promissory Spirit, which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of His glory" (Eph. i. 13, 14).

Here, the "word of truth", "the gospel", "hearing" and "believing" are most prominent. We translate "that holy promissory Spirit" because of the words that follow, "which is the earnest" pledge, or, as the O.T. translates it, "surety". It is not so much that the Spirit was promised, or that the Spirit promises anything, but rather that the Spirit is the pledge and the earnest.

The reader who has followed this series will no doubt be thinking of II Cor. i. 20:--

> "For howsoever many be the promises of God, in Him is the Yea: Wherefore also through Him is the Amen, unto the glory of God by us. Now He which stablisheth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God, Who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts" (II Cor. i. 20-22).

Here, as in Eph. i. 13, 14, we have the promise, the seal and the earnest associated with the Spirit, and with a oneness on the part of the recipients of grace. Turning to Gal. iii. we observe that there, where the promise is, is the reference to the Spirit also:--

> "That the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ; that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith" (Gal. iii. 14).

What encouragement there is in these words for the Lord's children. Not only have they promises that are "sure to all the seed", being by faith and by grace, but further, these promises are all and only "in Christ", and can be enjoyed only as we are "all one in Christ Jesus". These promises, howsoever many and varied they may be, are all confirmed and assured in Christ, and to us, in addition, is given the earnest and the seal, until the day when promises shall be enjoyed no longer in prospect but in reality.

"Helpers of your joy."

#10. On seeking the Lord.
pp. 28 - 31

Among the many and varied exhortations that we find in the Scriptures addressed to the believer, and influencing his joy and peace, is the exhortation to seek the Lord, His face and His way. Before we look at some of these exhortations, it seems fitting that we should recognize in the Lord Himself the greatest Seeker of all. We should most certainly never seek the Lord unless He had already sought us. This may be proved by a comparison of two passages. In Acts xvii. the apostle tells the Athenian some simple facts that pertain to all men, quite apart from grace or revelation:--

> "God that made the world . . . . . hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation, that they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after Him, and find Him, though He be not far from every one of us" (Acts xvii. 24-27).

What light this throws upon such everyday matters as History—"the times appointed", and Geography—"the bounds of their habitation", to which might be added "rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons" (Acts xiv. 17), that constituted God's own witness among the heathen. Nevertheless it is written:--

> "There is none that seeketh after God" (Rom. iii. 11).

If, therefore, man is ever going to seek the Lord, the Lord must first of all seek man, for this ingratitude, blindness and indifference is the result of sin, and needs salvation.

Among the many and beautiful figures that the Lord has used to reveal His love, His grace, His condescension and His patience toward His erring children, that of the Seeker stands out as one particularly gracious, especially when we consider Who it is that seeks and who are those sought. Let us hear the Lord Himself as He utters this word of pity and of grace:--

> "For the Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost" (Luke xix. 10).

First of all we note the Seeker. He is "The Son of man". It is not our intention to enter into a lengthy disquisition upon this blessed title: that would take us too far afield for our immediate purpose. Enough that the title was not given by men to Christ. It was used by Himself. Its first occurrence in Matt. viii. 20 suggests something of its intention. That the Son of man had not where to lay His head suggests a very real association of the Lord Jesus with man in his present state. He Who was the Son of man is called in the self-same Gospel: "The Son of God", and in Matt. i. 23: "they shall call His name Emmanuel, which being interpreted is, God with us." The Seeker was none other than "God manifest in the flesh", and revealed the heart of the Father as no other manifestation could have done.

If we think of the Seeker as a Shepherd, as we may (Luke xv. 4), what a wealth of revelation does this one figure supply of the character of the God of all grace! What did this Seeker come to do? He came to seek and to save that which was lost. Look at that epitome of the Divine plan of redemption. "Seek . . . . . save . . . . . lost." The word "lost" signifies two things. One may be lost, like a lost coin, a lost sheep, or a lost child: such need "finding". One many be lost as a lost soul, a lost sinner: such need "saving". That both conceptions are intended in the word "lost" is evident, for the Seeker did not only come to seek the lost, but to save the lost as well.

This coming "to seek and to save" necessitated the Lord of glory laying aside all that belonged to His exalted position in the higher heavens, taking upon Him flesh and blood, and being made in the likeness of men and in the form of a slave. In prosecuting this search for the lost, He not only traveled all the way from glory to Bethlehem's manger, but to Calvary's cross, and Joseph's tomb; and He Who sought found, He Who sought saved. The passage in Luke xix. that supplies us with the text before us, speaks of Zacchæus, who was so far "lost" as to have become "chief among the publicans"—an odious position in the eyes of Israel—a man who gathered taxes for a Pagan oppressor. When the great Seeker found Zacchæus, He said:--

> "This day is salvation come to this house, forasmuch as he also is a son of Abraham" (Luke xix. 9).

This restored son of Abraham immediately manifested the fact of his salvation by his new attitude:--

> "And Zacchæus stood, and said unto the Lord; Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor; and if I have taken anything by false accusation, I restore him fourfold" (Luke xix. 8).

It must not be assumed that Zacchæus implied that this was his normal attitude, but that it was to be his new attitude. He uses the present tense, as The Companion Bible comments, "I give, i.e., now propose to give. Referring to a present vow, not to a past habit". Again, the next statement, "If I have taken any thing be false accusation", does not mean that the case was purely hypothetical: it assumes the fact. Zacchæus had done what most tax-gatherers had done, and what the baneful system of government almost compelled them to do to make a living out of their profession. This custom is referred to by John the Baptist in Luke iii. 13 when he advised the publicans, who came for baptism unto repentance, to "exact no more than that which is appointed you". The word that Zacchæus used for "taking by false accusation" is sukophanteo, which is our English "sycophant", a word of odious meaning. The Son of man saved this "sinner" (Luke xix. 7) from the degradation into which sin had led him, and restored him to his rightful position as a "son of Abraham".

Here then is a picture of that great work accomplished by the Lord for fallen man. To seek them, He left heaven's glory; to save them, He became the Son of man, and in saving them He not only saved them from the consequences of their guilt, but he saved them from its shame. He restored them there and then to some approximation of what the real and final deliverance will accomplish.

Let us extract all the comfort that this precious passage has for ourselves. When we are cast down by circumstances, or tripped up by ourselves, when we feel forsaken, or when things appear black and antagonistic, let us just stop in the midst of it all and say, "for this cause", because of all these and many other terrible reasons, "for this cause" did the Lord of glory become the Son of man, become the Seeker and the Saviour and the Restorer. If at any time we feel "lost", quite apart from the matter of eternal salvation and security, depend upon it, there in that "lost" portion of our affairs or our estate, there the Seeker is near, and there the lost may be saved.

While we must ever give pre-eminent place to the one great initial act of seeking and saving that took place at the Cross, let us not miss the blessing that lies in the fact that the Lord is still the great Seeker. He seeks us still; His attitude is that of an intercessor; He Who died for us, still for us lives. When we remember how long and how untiringly He has sought us, what an inducement for us to seek the Lord and His grace.

#11. On seeking the Lord.
pp. 98 - 100

One of the consequences of being sought and found and saved is that the saved in their turn begin themselves to seek the Lord. The words of the angels to the women at the sepulchre are words that we do well to ponder, to pray over, and to preach to others:--

> "Why seek ye the living among the dead?" (Luke xxiv. 5).

As we read the story of the crucifixion and burial of the Saviour, we are conscious of much devotion and love, but it was love heavy with grief, and choked with despair. Joseph of Arimathæa braves the judgment of his fellows, and begs the body of Jesus, laying it in his own new tomb. The women also who came from Galilee, "beheld the sepulchre and how His body was laid", and returned to prepare spices and ointments. Nicodemus had stepped out into the open and brought an hundred pound weight of myrrh and aloes. The two who walked and talked on the way to Emmaus were "sad"; they even went so far as to mention "the third day" without believing the promise of resurrection. Even when the risen Saviour stood in their midst, the disciples were "frightened", "troubled", and "believed not for joy". And the testimony of Mary Magdalene and the other women who were with her "seemed like idle tales" to the apostles themselves.

These things should help us to perceive that naturally no man will believe the resurrection of the Lord. There will always be a tendency to "seek the living among the dead".

Apart from the writers of the four Gospels, recording the historic fact of the crucifixion of the Saviour, no writer in the N.T. is to be compared with the apostle Paul as a preacher of the cross. Yet no writer is so emphatic in pointing onwards to the resurrection, declaring that without that resurrection the gospel is vain and faith is void. We need to remember the angels' words, and, while gratefully recognizing that the cross is the beginning of our salvation and the ground of our peace, to check the tendency that we shall discover in ourselves and in others to remain at the cross. While the devotion of Joseph, of Nicodemus and of the women is beautiful indeed, how much more beautiful it would have been if one of the Lord's disciples had really believed Him, and so had found no cause for so blind and misdirected a love. In three days the spices and the linen were valueless. "He is not here, but is risen." "Why seek ye the living among the dead?"

We cannot believe that any regular reader of The Berean Expositor could for one moment regard "spiritualism" in any other light than that of a Satanic travesty of truth, but it may be of service to view the subject from the standpoint of the angels' words. Grief stricken men and women, knowing not the Scriptures nor the power of God, seeking comfort and assurance both for themselves and others, have been tempted to seek the living among the dead. The words of Isa. viii. 19, 20, together with the angels' words at the empty tomb, should be known and considered by all:--

> "And when they shall say unto you. Seek unto them that have familiar spirits, and unto wizards that peep, and that mutter: Should not a people seek unto their God? for the living should they seek unto the dead? To the law and to the testimony; of they speak not according to this word, surely there is no morning for them."

How many, too, have sought the living Christ among dead forms and ceremonies and ordinances which have been imposed upon man and never lead higher than the attainments of unsatisfied flesh. He is not here, but is risen and, as fellow-helpers of your joy, we would point away from all these things to where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God.

The symbol of our nation's grief and honour for those who died in battle is known as the Cenotaph, a word which means "an empty tomb", for no soldier lies buried beneath it. It is inscribed, "To our glorious dead". The believer, too, has a Cenotaph—"an empty tomb" indeed, and one that needs not the inscription, "To our glorious dead", for He Who was dead is alive for evermore, and death has no more dominion over Him.

Let us then, while we glory in the cross, remember also that we seek not the living among the dead, and that He Who died for us, now lives for us, and bids us seek those things which are above.

Ministering to the saints.
By J. E. Mills.

"Thanks be unto God for His unspeakable gift" (II Cor. ix. 15).

pp. 3 - 12

With these beautiful words of thanksgiving Paul concludes that section of II Corinthians which exhorts the brethren to give bountifully to the needs of the saints. The love of God to man cannot be known apart from the gift of the Lord Jesus Christ as man's Saviour: in that supreme gift we see God's love exemplified:-- > "For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him, should not perish, but have everlasting life" (John iii. 16).

We trust that the reader has believed on the Lord Jesus Christ, and has thereby appropriated to himself that finished work of salvation. If so, then he can join with Paul and say: "The Son of God, Who loved me, and gave Himself for me" (Gal. ii. 20).

It is the realization of this gift that should call forth a practical response from the believer. Under the law Israel was required to give a tenth of all their increase to that which constituted the service of God in those days: but the knowledge that the Lord Jesus Christ has come and given Himself for us, changes the whole tenor of the ministry of giving. No longer should this be done because it is required, but rather because Christ gave. If we view our position in the Lord Jesus aright, we see that through His work we cease to be our own and become His:--

> "For ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's" (I Cor. vi. 20).

Every doctrinal fact has its practical equivalent. The attitude of the Macedonian believers can well be taken as an example of what the practical outcome of being bought with such a price should be:--

> "Praying us with much intreaty that we would receive the gift, and take upon us the fellowship of the ministering of the saints. And this they did, not as we hoped, but first gave their own selves to the Lord, and unto us by the will of God" (II Cor. viii. 4, 5).

This puts the matter of giving in the right order, ourselves first, and then, because of all this, all that is ours is to be considered as a trust from the Lord.

Many are the promises made to those who take part in this happy ministry. In the broadest outline this is the principle of Christian giving as set forth in the New Testament.

In Paul's testimony during the period covered by the Acts of the Apostles, the ministering to the needs of the saints had a very definite place and character. To trace carefully the record of these gifts reveals the close connection between the witness of Paul during the Acts and those epistles written contemporary with that witness, and incidentally throws light upon the special circumstance that gave rise to those gifts.

Paul's epistles to the churches of Galatia was written to warn the Gentiles concerning those who had gone among them seeking to bring under the bondage of Jewish rites and ceremonies (Gal. i. 6, 7; iii. 1-3; iv. 9-11; v. 1-12; vi. 12). In exposing the error of this misapplied teaching, Paul was led to recount the manner in which he had received that gospel which he preached among the Gentiles, and to declare its independence of any Jewish authority. Paul himself was an apostle appointed by God (i. 1); his conversion was the result of the direct dealing of God (i. 16). After his conversion, he said:--

> "I conferred not with flesh and blood: neither went I up to Jerusalem to them which were apostles before me; but I went into Arabia" (Gal. i. 16, 17).

When at last Paul went to Jerusalem three years later it was only a visit of an unofficial character. To emphasize the importance of the fact Paul makes a bold interjection:--

> "Now the things that I write unto you, behold, before God, I lie not" (Gal. i. 20).

The gospel which was preached of Paul was not after man:--

> "For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ" (Gal. i. 12).

This gospel Paul proclaimed in entire independence. But evidently the church at Jerusalem had shown some hesitance in recognizing his testimony, and because of this he paid a special visit to Jerusalem:--

> "Then fourteen years after I went up again to Jerusalem with Barnabas, and took Titus with me also. And I went up by revelation, and communicated unto them that gospel which I preached among the Gentiles, but privately to them which were of reputation" (Gal. ii. 1, 2).

What was the result of this conference? Titus, because he was a Greek, was not compelled to be circumcised; the Judaizers were allowed no place; Paul was given right hand of fellowship by the true pillars of the church; not only in one matter could they make a suggestion:--

> "Only they would that we should remember the poor" (Gal. ii. 10).

The sole burden that the church of Jerusalem could lay on the backs of the believing Gentiles—"Remember the poor!" This Paul "was forward to do", and thus the ministry to the saints became a special aspect of Paul's testimony among the Gentiles. The poor as we shall see were the needy saints at Jerusalem.

The precise place of this visit to Jerusalem in the record of the Acts is a debatable point into which we do not seek to enter here: we note simply the following five visits:--

First visit (Acts ix. 25-29).—This corresponds with that of Gal. i.

Second visit (Acts xi. 29, 30; xii. 25).—The first of an official character, the purpose being to take a gift from the church at Antioch to the brethren in Judæa. This is the first that could correspond with that of Gal. ii.

Third visit (Acts xv. 1-32).—A close comparison of this account with Gal. ii. makes it difficult to feel that they are one and the same; here the exhortation to the Gentile churches is: "That ye abstain from meats offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication; from which if ye keep yourselves, ye shall do well" (Acts xv. 29—based on Gen. ix. 1-7). At the visit of Gal. ii. the only exhortation was: "Remember the poor."

Fourth visit (Acts xviii. 21).—The last that could correspond with Gal. ii. In the previous two visits Paul had been the messenger sent from the churches. In this it was rather against their desire: for some reason it was imperative:--

> "I must by all means keep this feast that cometh in Jerusalem: but I will return again unto you, if God will" (Acts xviii. 21).

This suggests that Paul "went up by revelation" (Gal. ii. 2). Nothing is recorded in Acts of his stay there.

Fifth and last visit (Acts xxi. 15).—With a gift from the Gentiles (Rom. xv. 25-28).

Thus Paul's first and last official visits to Jerusalem were connected with gifts to the Jews.

It becomes evident in considering the circumstances of these visits what an important position and influence the apostles at Jerusalem held, even Paul with his divinely-appointed independence giving due regard to their word.

Assuming that Paul's fourth visit (Acts xviii. 21) was that of Gal. ii.—we do not say it was—we have the very latest occasion on which he could have received the suggestion: "Remember the poor." After this visit Paul went on the last missionary journey of the Acts:--

> "After these things were ended, Paul purposed in spirit, when he had passed through Macedonia and Achaia, to go to Jerusalem, saying, After I have been there, I must also see Rome" (Acts xix. 21).

While still on the outward journey Paul realized that he must return yet again to Jerusalem. Why not go straight to Rome? Why go to Judæa where the Jews were so opposed to him? The answer is in that word: "Remember the poor."

During this last tour we know for certain that Paul wrote I & II Corinthians and Romans. Let us turn to these for further information. In I Cor. Paul gives instructions concerning a collection for the saints:--

> "Now concerning the collection for the saints, as I have given order to the churches of Galatia, even so do ye . . . . . And when I come, whomsoever ye shall approve by your letters, them will I send to bring your liberality unto Jerusalem. And if it be meet that I go also, they shall go with me" (I Cor. xvi. 1-4).

All we know of the order given to the churches of Galatia is that word from the elders of Jerusalem: "Remember the poor." This order is now sent to the Corinthians in view of Paul's coming to them on his way to Jerusalem. "Now I will come unto you, when I shall pass through Macedonia, for I do pass through Macedonia" (I Cor. xvi. 5).

Having passed through Macedonia, Paul writes to Corinth again in prospect of the near approach of his expected visit. What had been Paul's business in Macedonia?

> "Moreover, brethren, we do you to wit of the grace of God bestowed on the churches of Macedonia. How that in a great trial of affliction the abundance of their joy and their deep poverty abounded unto the riches of their liberality: for to their power I bear record, yea, and beyond their power they were willing of themselves; praying us with much intreaty that we would receive the gift, and take upon us the fellowship of the ministering of the saints" (II Cor. viii. 1-4).

Evidently Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians had stirred them up to give generously, so that he could set them as an example to the Macedonia:--

> "For as touching the ministering to the saints, it is superfluous for me to write to you: for I know the forwardness of your mind, for which I boast of you to them of Macedonia, that Achaia was ready a year ago; and your zeal hath provoked very many" (II Cor. ix. 1, 2).

The Macedonians had exceeded Paul's expectations (II Cor. viii. 5). In the event, therefore, of some of the Macedonians coming with him to Corinth he writes again:--

> "Yet have I sent the brethren, lest our boasting of you should be in vain in this behalf; that, as I said, ye may be ready: lest haply if they of Macedonia come with me, and find you unprepared, we (that we say not, ye) should be ashamed at this same confident boasting" (II Cor. ix. 3, 4).

Brethren were sent before to prepare for Paul's coming (II Cor. viii. 6, 17-19; ix. 3-5), which accords with Acts xix. 22.

The only church in Macedonia to which Paul wrote an epistle is that of Thessalonica, which appears to have been most progressive church in that part (I Thee. i. 7, 8; iv. 10). No mention of this collection is made in either epistle, for both were written before Acts xvii. 21, but there is a connection between them and the believers in Judæa:--

> "For ye became followers of the churches of God in Judæa" (I Thess. ii. 14).

The commandments they had received as to how they should walk to please God (I Thess. iv. 1-3) were evidently those suggested by the church at Jerusalem in Acts xv. When Paul went through Macedonia on his last tour it is evident that those of Thessalonica would have been among the many who were so ready to "remember the poor".

Romans was written towards the end of this last tour, and there Paul refers again to this collection:--

> "But now I go up to Jerusalem to minister unto the saints, for it hath pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia (in which was Corinth) to make a certain contribution for the poor saints which are at Jerusalem" (Rom. xv. 25, 26).

The reason for this gift is then given:--

> "It hath pleased them verily, and their debtors they are; for if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things, their duty is also to minister unto them in carnal things" (Rom. xv. 27).

In this same epistle Paul "proved both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin" (Rom. iii. 9). And so concerning salvation he wrote: "Even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe, for there is no difference" (Rom. iii. 22). The Lord Jesus was all in all to them both:--

> "For there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek; for the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon Him" (Rom. x. 12).

But when it comes to the question of their position, there was a very decided difference between the Jew and the Gentile. The word of salvation was: "To the Jew first" (Rom. i. 16), which was observed in the preaching during the Acts (iii. 26; xiii. 46). All the blessings that were before the believers were Jewish blessings: of these the Gentiles were made partakers. Rom. xi. 13-24 explains the position:--

> "And if some of the branches be broken off, and thou, being a wild olive tree, wert grafted in among them, and with them partakest of the root and fatness of the olive tree . . . . ." (verse 17).

The gift of the poor saints at Jerusalem was the result of the recognition of this:--

> "For if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things, their duty is also to minister unto them in carnal things" (Rom. xv. 27).

Galatians, in which the exhortation to "Remember the poor" is given, shows also that "They which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham" (Gal. iii. 9). Gal. vi. 6 may express the same thought as Rom. xv. 27. The gift of the Gentiles to the Jews was therefore something more than the alleviation of the needy:--

> "For the administration of this service not only supplieth the want of the saints, but is abundant also by many thanksgivings unto God; whiles by the experiment of this ministration they glorify God for your professed subjection unto the gospel of Christ, and for your liberal distribution unto them, and unto all men" (II Cor. ix. 12, 13).

This gift was to be the proof to the Jewish believers at Jerusalem of the sincerity of the Gentiles (II Cor. viii. 19, 24).

All this seems very beautiful, and if we only had this information we might rightly imagine that Paul went to Jerusalem with a light heart and quickened step for the joy that the charge of such a gift would give him. What, however, do we find? Paul had no doubt that the offering was of God:--

> "Nevertheless, brethren I have written the more boldly unto you in some sort, as putting you in mind, because of the grace that is given me of God; that I should be the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, ministering the gospel of God, that the offering up of the Gentiles might be acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost" (Rom. xv. 15, 16).

What Paul evidently did doubt was whether the Jews would accept the gift, for he beseeches the Romans to > "Strive together with me in your prayers to God for me, that I may be delivered from them that do not believe in Judæa, and that my service which I have for Jerusalem may be accepted of the saints" (Rom. xv. 30, 31).

This gift proved the sincerity of the Gentiles, but it was at the same time a test to the Jews as to whether they would really accept the Gentiles. Was the gift acceptable? It is not told us, but we do know that it failed to cause them to receive the Gentiles. The fears Paul entertained were confirmed every step he took towards Jerusalem:--

> "Behold, I go bound in spirit unto Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there; save that the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, saying that bonds and afflictions abide me" (Acts xx. 22, 23).

This journey was not an apostolic mistake, but was "The will of the Lord" (Acts xxi. 14).

When at last Paul reached Jerusalem he did not delay, but with the gift of the Gentiles in his hands, and Representatives of the Gentiles accompanying him, we read that on > "The day following Paul went in with us unto James; and all the elders were present. And when he had saluted them, he declared particularly what things God had wrought among the Gentiles by his ministry" (Acts xxi. 18, 19).

When the true ones heard this, they glorified the Lord, but nevertheless reiterated the suggestion they had made as to the Gentiles at the conference of Acts xv. (see Acts xxi. 25)—points of which Paul, during his last journey, had not been led to emphasize (see I Cor. viii.)—then, referring to the thousands of Jews which believed and were all zealous of the law (Acts xxi. 20), they warn Paul of a rumour, and ask him to conform to a rite. The tangible evidence of the sincerity of the Gentiles is unheeded; the thought that the Gentiles were blessed with the Jews seems absent; one rumour—that Paul had taken Greeks into their earthly temple—drove the whole city into an uproar (xxi. 27-32), endangering his very life.

Then standing on the steps of the garrison Paul addressed the Jews in their own tongue, and spoke of his life and conversion up to the day when the Lord said to him:--

> "Depart: for I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles. And they gave him audience unto this word, and then lifted up their voices, and said, Away with such a fellow from the earth . . . . ." (Acts xxii. 21, 22).

This was but the climax of an attitude among the Jews that had obtained during the Acts period:--

> "Forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles that they might be saved, to fill up their sins always: for the wrath is come upon them to the uttermost" (I Thess. ii. 16).

Paul was then taken to Rome where he called for the elders of the Jews (Acts xxviii. 17), and expounded to them concerning Jesus out of Moses and the Prophets, but because they definitely failed to believe he said:--

> "Be it known therefore unto you, that the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and that they will hear it" (Acts xxviii. 28).

The history of the gift of the Gentiles is therefore closely related to the apostacy of the Jews, and it was one of the steps that led to the setting aside of Israel in Acts xxviii. The gift, it will be remembered, was prompted by the fact that the Gentiles had been made partakers of Israel's spiritual blessings (Rom. xv. 27). With the setting aside of Israel there was also the postponement of the hope of Israel, and consequently the hope of the Gentiles blessed with Israel—the very cause of the gift had been removed.

After Acts xxviii. 28 Paul was led to write from his prison five epistles: Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, II Timothy and Philemon. In these the subject of gifts is again met with, but it is no longer influenced by the thought of being blessed through Israel. The Philippians sent a gift to Paul (Phil. iv. 10-18). Paul rejoiced "not because I desire a gift, but I desire fruit that it may abound to your account" (verse 17). There is no question now of whether it would be accepted by any body of men, but Paul writes to assure them that it was "a sacrifice acceptable, well pleasing to God" (verse 18).

In the matter of the gift to the poor saints at Jerusalem, all of the churches to whom Paul wrote before Acts xxviii. had some part or interest—the Galatians, Thessalonians, Corinthians and Romans. What Paul was doing is reflected in the epistles written at the time. After the change of Acts xxviii. he writes to other churches, and in each epistle makes mention of his imprisonments (Eph. iii. 1; iv. 1; vi. 19, 20; Phil. i. 7, 13, 14, 16; Col. iv. 3, 10, 18; II Tim. i. 8; ii. 9; iv. 16).

The interest that the churches of the first group had in Paul's ministration of this gift was because he was their Representative to bear to the Jews the outward token of their appreciation of and gratitude for the grace of God that had enabled them—as outside, far off Gentiles—to become partakers of Israel's spiritual blessings (Rom. xv. 27).

The interest that the churches in the later group had in Paul's imprisonment was because he had been made "the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles" (Eph. iii. 1). Paul was a prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles by reason of the truth that was revealed through him to them:--

> "Whereof I am made a minister, according to the dispensation of God which is given to me for you, to fulfil the word of God; even the mystery which hath been hid from ages and from generations, but now is made manifest to His saints. To whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles; which is Christ among you, the hope of glory" (Col. i. 25-27).

The truth of the mystery was not committed to writing by Paul until after Israel as a whole, for the time being, had been set aside. With the truth of the mystery is connected a new sphere of blessing—"the heavenly places", and another company of believers called "The church which is His body":--

> "And hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 6).
> "The exceeding greatness of His power to usward who believe, according to the working of His mighty power, which He wrought in Christ, when He raised Him from the dead, and set Him at His own right hand in the heavenly places, far above all . . . . . and gave to Him to be the Head over all things to the church, which is His body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 19-23).

In this company the Gentiles do not partake of Israel's spiritual blessings, but Jews and Gentiles without distinction are blessed with all spiritual blessings in the heavenlies:--

> "Now, therefore, ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God" (Eph. ii. 19).

There is only place for One to have any pre-eminence in this company—the Lord Jesus Himself:--

> "Where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free; but Christ is all, and in all" (Col. iii. 11).

In all matters in which there was no difference between Jews and Gentiles during the witness of the Acts, the teaching of the epistles is the same—the fact of the believer having died together with Christ, been buried, and raised together with Him, the walk in newness of life, etc.—but in the things relating to the blessings of the Gentiles there is a very great difference between the earlier and later epistles of Paul. In the earlier epistles the Gentiles were brought into blessing with Israel (the record of this gift to the saints is but one illustration of the fact), the sphere of those blessings being connected with the heavenly Jerusalem (Gal. iv. 26). In the later epistles Jews and Gentiles partake of the "all spiritual blessings" in the heavenlies.

The purpose of this study has been to show this distinction, a distinction that should be considered and prayed over very carefully. In the first great epistle of the mystery (Ephesians) there are two prayers for the saints, prayers that we should pray for ourselves, for they request enlightenment into that truth which God would make known to His saints (Col. i. 26, 27).

If the realization of what it meant to be blessed with Israel called forth from the Gentiles such a liberal gift to those through whom they had been blessed, how much more should the wonder of being blessed with all spiritual blessings in the heavenlies cause us to contribute to the work of the Lord in this day. In this the Philippians are an example, for they sent to the one who had been used of God to reveal the truth of the mystery; to-day we also should support the means used to commit the same truth to faithful men. The need for promoting gospel testimony cannot be over estimated, but there is a real occasion to emphasize the need of seeking to be allowed to make known (by gift or whatever other way we can) the mystery. We say "allowed" advisedly, for we are confident that the highest privilege ever granted man is to speak of these truths which are so vitally associated with the present headship and glory of our Lord Jesus Christ at the right hand of God in the heavenlies.

The consideration of giving has led us to the subject of our blessings; let us then conclude with the benediction with which these blessings are first introduced:--

> "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ" (Eph. i. 3).

The Ministry of Consolation.

#39. "Lift up your hands" (Heb. xii. 12); "Lift up your heads" (Luke xxi. 28).

pp. 19, 20

We have looked at one or two passages of Scripture where there is a real "lift up" for the believer. It is helpful to observe the character of those who receive this spiritual uplift. For example, Psa. cxlvii. 6 says: "The Lord lifteth up the meek: He casteth the wicked down to the ground." The Psalmist moreover says: "Unto Thee, O Lord, do I lift up my soul" (Psa. lxxxvi. 4), and as the soul often stands for the whole person, it will include the lifting up of the hands and eyes in prayer (Psa. xxviii. 2; cxxiii. 1). While, therefore, there are many avenues open for prayerful investigation, we desire in this short article to turn to another aspect of this matter of uplift, and find the word in Heb. xii. 12, 13:--

> "Wherefore lift up the hands which hang down, and the feeble knees; and makes straight paths for your feet."

The fact that this exhortation opens with the word "wherefore", teaches us to look back in the chapter to discover the connection. Heb. xii. opens with an exhortation to lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily besets us, and to run with patience the race set before us, with the great example of the Lord in view. Then follows a lengthy disquisition upon the nature, necessity and aim of chastisement, which reaches its conclusion in verse 11. Verse 12 immediately follows with the exhortation quoted above. We are evidently taken back to the opening of the chapter, and the figure of the race and the runner is resumed. The words "lift up" used here do not mean so much to elevate, as one does the hands, but to "set right" as in Luke xiii. 13 and Acts xv. 16, where the word occurs. The hands, knees, feet and paths all indicate the chief purpose of the exhortation. Heb. xii. 12 is a quotation from the O.T.:--

> "Strengthen ye the weak hands, and confirm the feeble knees" (Isa. xxxv. 3).

The whole chapter of Isa. xxxv. is prophetic of the great millennial day, and the connection of the exhortation with the theme of the chapter is made more evident by reading the verse that follows the one quoted:--

> "Say to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong, fear not; behold, your God will come with vengeance, even God with a recompence; He will come and save you" (Isa. xxxv. 4).

With this exhortation, therefore, to lift up the hands that hang down, we couple that of Luke xxi. 28:--

> "And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh" (Luke xxi. 28).

To all, therefore, who are passing through the shadows, who feel the burden of the day, come the many encouraging words of “uplift” from the Word.

He is the “lifter up” of our head (Psa. iii. 3). His countenance lifted up upon us is the greatest sign of good we have here below (Psa. iv. 6). We should not then lift up our eyes to the hills, but to Him from Whom our help cometh. We should lift up our soul, our eyes, our hands, our feet, and seek grace to run with patience the race set before us. “Lift up the hands which hang down”: “Look up, and lift up your heads.”

The Epistle to the Romans.

#40. Sanctification.---First a sphere. Newness of life (vi. 1-14).

pp. 31 - 38

The true sequel of Rom. v. 12-21 is Rom. viii. where the condemnation brought in by Adam is entirely removed from all who are "in Christ Jesus". The Spirit of God, however, knew the heart of man; and how easily even believers may misread liberty for licence, or abuse the overwhelming grace of God. Already the spirit that necessitates Rom. vi. and vii. has shown itself. For in Rom. iii. 7 we have the beginnings of the idea opened up in Rom. vi., where the thought that "the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto His glory" is echoed by the question: "What shall we say then? Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound?"

It is not a question of shall I ever fall into sin, or shall I never discover hidden uncleanness, but shall I "continue in" sin. Epimeno is used in Rom. xi. 22, 23, where it is used of "continuing in His goodness", and of "abiding still in unbelief". In Rom. vi. 2 the balancing clause to "continuing in" is "living in":--

> "How shall we that are dead to sin, live any longer therein?"

Let us notice for our good that the apostle does not temporize with this question. He does not embark upon a lengthy discourse concerning grace; he does not attempt to mitigate the fullness of superabounding grace; he goes straight to the heart of the matter, revealing it to be a matter of life and death.

Grace is grace because of righteousness—so teaches Rom. v. 21: "Even so might grace reign through righteousness", and the only way that grace could reign through righteousness is for sin to have been dealt with righteously—and we know that the wages of sin is death.

The answer to the question of Rom. vi. 1 is found in vi. 3-14. Verse 2 is not so much an answer as a refusal to admit the validity of the objection that superabounding grace will encourage laxity of morals. The close of verse 14 corresponds with verse 2 in setting the objection aside as incompatible with the "grace wherein we stand". The answer (3-14) is divided into three main sections:--

(1) Identification of the believer in the death, burial and resurrection of Christ (3-10). This we shall discover is subdivided into three features.
(2) Reckoning of the believer that all this is true.
(3) Practical results of this identification and reckoning: "Let not", "Yield not".

This, together with the associated doctrine of Rom. v. 20, 21 which gave rise to the objection, we now set out before the reader.

Romans v. 20 - vi. 14.

A1 | v. 20, 21. STATEMENT.—"Where sin abounded grace did much more abound."
B1 | vi. 1. QUESTION.—"Shall we continue in sin that grace abound?"
C1 | vi. 2. REPUDIATION.—"God forbid. How shall we that are dead to sin live any longer therein?"
D1 | vi. 3-14. ANSWER.—
| A2 | vi. 3-10. | 2-5. | a1 | Know ye not?
b1 | Dead to sin.
6, 7. | c1 | Knowing this.
d1 | Freed from sin.
8-10. | a1 | Knowing that?
b1 | Died to sin.
| B2 | vi. 11. Reckon. | e | Dead to sin.
f | Alive to God.
| A2 | vi. 12-14. | 12. | a2 | Let not sin reign.
b2 | In your mortal body.
12, 13. | c2 | Not obey lust, neither yield to sin.
d2 | Yield to God, instrument of righteousness.
14. | a2 | For sin shall not have dominion.
b2 | Over you.
C1 | REPUDIATION.—"Ye are not under the law but under grace."

There is an insistence throughout this whole passage upon death followed by life, and it is of the utmost importance that we do not miss the teaching of Scripture upon this basic argument. First of all the insistence upon death:--

"How shall we that are dead to sin . . . . ." (vi. 2).
"Baptized into His death" (vi. 3).
"Buried with Him by baptism into death" (vi. 4).
"Christ was raised up from the dead" (vi. 4).
"In the likeness of His death" (vi. 5).
"He that is dead is freed from sin" (vi. 7).
"Now if we be dead with Christ" (vi. 8).
"Christ being raised from the dead, dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over Him" (vi. 9).
"In that He died, He died unto sin once" (vi. 10).
"Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin" (vi. 11).
"As those that are alive from the dead" (vi. 13).

Here, in the space of thirteen verses, are fourteen references to death, independently of the allied words "buried" and "crucified". It would be a mistake to leave the matter here. Far too many have stressed "death" and "the cross" without realizing that power can only begin with us when we receive new life and stand on resurrection ground. Consequently we must go through these verses again to note the recurrence of life and resurrection:--

"Like as Christ was raised up from the dead . . . . . even so we also should walk in newness of life" (vi. 4).

"We shall also be in the likeness of His resurrection" (vi. 5).
"We believe that we shall also live with Him" (vi. 8).
"Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more" (vi. 9).
"In that He liveth, He liveth unto God" (vi. 10).
"Reckon yourselves . . . . . alive unto God" (vi. 11).
"Yield . . . . . unto God as those that are alive from the dead" (vi. 13).

Here are nine references, not including the passages that speak of deliverance from the dominion of death and sin. It is evident that if we miss the meaning of the apostle relative to these two great themes we shall miss his teaching entirely. Therefore we must patiently examine them, and first of all the words with which the objection is repudiated. What is meant by "dead to sin"?

There is a system of teaching that appears to take these words as meaning abstaining from, resisting, mortifying sin, in which there can be degrees of "depth". Hence the expression: "To die more and more unto sin." There is most truly an experimental entering into the death of Christ, but we are persuaded such is not intended here. In Rom. vi. 2, 7, 8 and 9 the verb "to die" is not thnesko, but apothnesko = "to die out, to expire, to become quite dead". Moreover, it is the actual death of Christ that is in view, "His death " (3 and 5), death "with Christ" (8), and it is death "to sin". Here again we need care. It is not death to the power of sin, but death to its guilt that is here intended. Our death to sin is not mentioned here as of our conduct or our character, but of our STATE before God. The R.V. recognizes the aorist tense, and translates the passage, "We who died to sin", in place of the A.V., "We that are dead to sin". Into the vexed question of the true rendering of the Greek aorist we cannot go. On verse 7 Dr. Weymouth gives the following note, which is of weight:--

> "Lit. 'has died' not 'is dead'. The distinction cannot be expressed in Latin or French, but can in English and in Greek. The classical scholar will find an excellent example in Euripedes Alc. 541 'Those who have died (aorist) and are dead (perfect)."

Up to Rom. v. 11 the burden of the epistle has been justification by faith. Rom. v. 12-21 adds its quota of superabounding grace, and when the apostle says in vi. 2: "How shall we who died to sin live any longer therein?" he is not introducing some new aspect of death, but referring to what has already been established. In other words, he replies to the objection by saying, Justification by faith cannot lead to living in sin, for the simple reason that justification is based upon death to sin and guilt. The fact that the apostle uses, in verse 10, the same expression of Christ Himself: "In that He died, He died unto sin once", shows that he had in view death to its guilt. As Calvin says:--

> "The very form of the expression, as applied to Christ, shows that He did not, like us, die to sin for the purpose of ceasing to commit it."

The Lord was never under the power of sin. He took the guilt of sin that belonged to us, and for that He died:--

"He that has died is freed from sin" (vi. 7).

The word translated "is freed" is dedekaiotai, the perfect tense of the verb dikaioo = "to justify". It is most important that this word noted in the margin should be re-instated: "Justified from sin." Rom. iii. 20-30 is the classic passage on "Justification", and there diakaioo is used five times. Rom. v. 9 sums up the matter by saying: "Being now justified by His blood." In vi. 2 the apostle declares that the believer "died to sin". In vi. 7 he reveals the glorious result of that death—he is "justified".

Anticipating a little the result of our studies, we would say that the phrase found in vi. 19, "righteousness unto holiness", aptly epitomizes the intention of these chapters. We are already justified: Shall we continue in sin because grace is free? No, for the very process of our justification involved us in crucifixion, death and burial, so utter and complete that apart from an entirely "new life" we are for ever powerless. This division of our theme is extremely important. Death is related to our justification, and life to our sanctification, and we shall do well not to confuse the issues.

We have passed from verse 2 to verse 7 in our attempt to fix the meaning of "death to sin". We must now retrace our steps and learn how this was accomplished. In verses 3-5 the apostle speaks of death and burial, and turns to the symbol of baptism to enforce his teaching, just as he uses circumcision in Colossians. The baptism of Rom. vi. must include baptism in water, for that was practiced during the Acts period and by the apostle himself (I Cor. i. 16), although it did not occupy the same place in his ministry as it did in the ministry of the Twelve. The use of both circumcision and baptism in Col. ii. shows that there they are used spiritually, the appeal to the external rite being no longer valid:--

> "Or are ye ignorant that all we who were baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into His death?" (Rom. vi. 3).

The R.V. corrects the A.V. and gives the true title of the Lord. The expression, "baptized into Christ Jesus", is similar to that found in I Cor. x.:--

> "For I would not, brethren, have you ignorant, how that all our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea; and were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea" (I Cor. x. 1, 2).

Israel were "baptized into Moses", and therefore into the law and all that the law stood for. The believer was baptized into Christ and all that Christ and grace stood for. The apostle insists that the union with Christ typified and set forth by baptism, set forth the identification of the believer with the Lord in His death: "You were baptized into His death." The two statements must be read together:--

"Baptized into Christ Jesus."
"Baptized into His death."

The one involves the other. They are inseparable. The apostle in Gal. iii. 27 uses this expression in a different context, but it is worth noting:--

> "As many as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ."

The force of "into" here is fully realized in the sequel; such have "put on Christ" and so are "in Him". So real is this death, and so real is this identification, that just as surely as Christ died and was buried, so surely must burial be included as one of the blessings that follow union with the Lord. When once this baptism "into" Christ Jesus is mentioned, there follows the fact that the believer is "in Christ Jesus" (vi. 11, R.V.; viii. 1).

The burial of Christ forms one feature of the apostle's gospel (I Cor. xv. 4); it is the evidence and assurance that the person in view is really dead. No words have the sense of finality about them as these, "Dead and buried". The little gathering of mourners have paid their last tribute. Prayers and willing service have been rendered while the battle for life lasted, but when "dead and buried"! what more is to be done? The next movement must come from God, and that is the apostle's thought here. I Cor. xv. 3, 4 says that "Christ died" and that He was "buried", but it does not stay there; it goes on to say that He was "raised" from the dead:--

> "That like as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life" (vi. 4).

The walk in newness of life is our experimental answer to His resurrection. The full truth is that when He died, we died: when He was buried, we were buried; and being dead and buried our hope both now during the life which we live in the flesh (Gal. ii. 20), and in the future glory in the life to come, is entirely dependent upon Him. If that risen life is also ours, then even now we may "walk". If it is not—being dead and buried—we can do nothing but wait amid a groaning creation for the redemption of the body.

The first note in the chord of sanctification has now been struck. Instead of "living in sin" we who have died to sin may "walk in newness of life". This is more than "a new life", for the abstract word kainoteti conveys the idea of "newness". There are two words in the Greek for "new": kainos (that gives us "newness" in Rom. vi. 4) and neos. Both come together in Col. iii. 10: "And having put on the new man (neos), being renewed (anakainoo):--

> "In other words, we have put on the new, young, rejuvenate man, fresh, vigorous, prime, with all the glorious future stretching out in its limitless possibilities by the grace of God, and have been renewed with a life that standing beside the empty tomb looks back at the past, dead, buried, excluded, finished. Neos turns our faces toward Christ, the last Adam; kainos looks back to the first Adam. The one says 'life has begun', the other 'that life has finished'." (Volume XV, page 138).

As we proceed, we shall see that the dominion of sin and death is manifested by the fact that men are their slaves (servants). These slaves have been set free. Grace reigns where sin once reigned, and they are now free, free to serve another, and so, "Walk in newness of life" finds its sequel in "Serve in newness of spirit" (Rom. vii. 6).

We may safely take these terms as revealing most truly an essential aspect of sanctification. It must be in "newness of life". Anything savouring of death brings defilement, as we may learn from the type of Numb. xix. 16:--

> "And whosoever toucheth one that is slain with a sword in the open fields, or a dead body, or a bone of a man, or a grave, shall be unclean seven days."

So all must be cleansed from "dead works" before any progressive sanctification is possible.

Having reached this great feature of truth, here we must stay. Sanctification demands newness of life—how then can anyone think of "continuing in sin" that grace may abound? We may all take to ourselves the words of the apostle, making them a prayer where we cannot state them as an experience:--

> "I am dead to the law (as Rom. vi., 'dead to sin'). I have been crucified with Christ (as Rom. vi., 'the old man was crucified with Him'), nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God ('newness of life') Who loved me and gave Himself for me" (Gal. ii. 19, 20).

#41. Sanctification.---Second a Condition. Union (vi. 1-14).
pp. 76 - 78

The first item in the doctrine of sanctification which we have established is "newness of life". True, "death to sin" must precede this new life, but death to sin is not sanctification, any more than a good concrete foundation is a dwelling house. Power for sanctification is life, and the study now before us is to discover from the passage as to what that life is, and how its power may be received and its effects:--

> "For if we have been planted together in the likeness of His death, we shall be also in the likeness of His resurrection: knowing this, that our old man is crucified with Him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin. For he that is dead is freed from sin" (Rom. vi. 5-7).

The R.V. alters the reading "planted together" to "become united with", and this is undoubtedly the meaning. "Planted together" would truly describe a field of wheat, but each plant would nevertheless be independent: the word sumphutos used here indicates something more intimate, more akin to "grafting" than "planting". The word is used in the LXX of Amos ix. 13 for "melt", and is employed by Xenophon to describe the "growing together" of man and horse known as the "Centaurs" of ancient myth. The R.V. margin is closest of all to the truth of the passage, and is the rendering of Alford:--

> "If we have become united with the likeness of His death, so shall we be also with His resurrection."

There is a real link between "united" and likeness", the contrasted thought being found in Rom. viii. 3:--

> "For that which was not in the power of the law because it was weak through the flesh, God (did) having sent His own Son in the likeness of the flesh of sin, and on account of sin condemned sin in the flesh."

The Lord had a nature like our sinful nature, but had not Himself a sinful nature. If the apostle had not used the word "likeness", it would have appeared that Christ partook of sinful flesh, which of course He did not. So the believer is united to the Lord in the "likeness" of His death, for that death itself allows of no possible partner. He suffered alone and suffered once for all. He died actually and literally, that we might be reckoned to have died with Him. Moreover, as we shall see in the next verse, "the likeness of His death" is most certainly a reference to the kind of death of an acclaimed victor, but the death of a slave, the death of the accursed, death by crucifixion. All this is included in the original statement of verse, "dead to sin".

It is of the utmost importance that we shall realize the place that union with Christ occupies in this great doctrine of sanctification. Here, in the short compass of four verses, we have such extraordinary expressions as: "baptized into His death"; "buried with Him"; "united with Him"; "crucified with Him"; "Like as Christ"; and "the likeness of His death". Union with Christ is the very essence of sanctification:--

> "For both He that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified are ALL OF ONE . . . . . as the children were partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise took part of the same" (Heb. ii. 11-14).

He was made "in the likeness of men" (Phil. ii. 7).

The ultimate goal of sanctification is expressed in Rom. viii. 29:--

> "For whom He did foreknow He also did predestinate to be conformed to the IMAGE of His Son, that He might be the firstborn among many brethren."

The zenith is conformity to the IMAGE, the commencement is union with the LIKENESS of His death and resurrection life.

We have dwelt upon the likeness of His death, but let us not stay there. Life, not death, is the sphere of sanctification and, to us, that life must be resurrection life; so the apostle does not reach his goal until he completes the argument. "If . . . . . we shall be also in the likeness of His resurrection." Verses 4 and 5 follow the same line:--

> "Buried into His death. That like as Christ was raised—so we should be."
> "United together with the likeness of His death. We shall also in the likeness of His resurrection."

The future "we shall be" must not be taken to refer to the yet future resurrection of the dead, but is the employment of the future for what is called "the ethical necessity", as for example:--

> "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God" (Matt. iv. 10).
> "What shall we do then?" (Luke iii. 10).

Future resurrection is, of course, implied, but the apostle is more concerned with present "walk", and to show that its only hope of success lies in the fact of the risen life already there in Christ at the right hand of God. Much the same course is pursued in Col. iii., where the fact that we have been raised with Christ is brought forward as the incentive to set our mind on things above where Christ is, and so to mortify our members that are upon the earth.

As we shall serve our readers best by dealing with one point at a time, and as the next verse introduces yet a further development in the doctrine of sanctification, we will close this present article here, having established point No. 2, namely, that sanctification, whose sphere is newness of life, is possible only by union with Christ in His death, burial and resurrection.

#42. Sanctification.---Third: a state, freedom (vi. 1-14).

pp. 116 - 120

We have seen in previous studies that sanctification has a sphere—"newness of life", and a condition—"unity with the likeness of His death and resurrection"; we now proceed to the consideration of a third feature, a state—"liberty".

Verse 6, where our study is resumed, ends with the words: "That henceforth we should not serve sin." From this point to the close of the chapter we have many references to "servants" (literally "slaves") who were once under an awful dominion, but are now "free". With chapter vii. comes a change of figure, from that of a slave to that of a married woman under the law, who is set "free" from her marriage and all its obligations by the death of her husband. This is appropriately brought to a conclusion in verse 6 with service "in newness of spirit".

The following passages will help us to see how prominently "freedom" and "servitude" figure in these chapters; in each case one of the verbal forms of eleutheros is used:--

> "Being then made free from sin, ye became the servants of righteousness" (Rom. vi. 18).
> "For when ye were the servants of sin, ye were free from righteousness" (Rom. vi. 20).
> "But now being made free from sin and become servants to God" (Rom. vi. 22).
> "If her husband be dead, she is free from that law" (Rom. vii. 3).
> "For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death" (Rom. viii. 2).

"Because the creature itself also shall be set free from the bondage of corruption into the freedom of the glory of the children of God" (Rom. viii. 21).

We must now look at the various derivations of the word translated "bondage":--

"That henceforth we should not serve sin" (Rom. vi. 6).
"Servants to obey, his servants ye are" (Rom. vi. 16).
"Ye were the servants of sin" (Rom. vi. 17).
"Ye became the servants of righteousness" (Rom. vi. 18).
"Servants to uncleanness . . . . . servants to righteousness unto holiness" (Rom. vi. 19).
"When ye were the servants of sin" (Rom. vi. 20).
"Now . . . . . having become servants to God" (Rom. vi. 22).
"We should serve in newness of spirit" (Rom. vii. 6).
"With the mind I myself serve the law of God" (Rom. vii. 25).
"Ye have not received the spirit of bondage" (Rom. viii. 15).
"Shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption" (Rom. viii. 21).

How is this freedom attained and what is the nature of the bondage from which it liberates? The first part of the question is answered in Rom. vi. 7; the second in vi. 14 and viii. 21:--

"He that is dead is freed from sin" (Rom. vi. 7).

We have already drawn attention to the fact that the word translated "freed from" is literally "justified from". There is, however, no error here; the A.V. translation is gloriously true. But we must see for ourselves. The book of Job contains the thought that in death "the servant is free from his master" (Job iii. 19). And the Talmud has a maxim: "When a man dies, he is freed from the commands." In Rom. vi. we have moved from the doctrine of justification from sin's penalty and guilt (Rom. i.-v.) and have passed on to the consideration of the doctrine of sanctification, and the believer's freedom from sin's dominion and service. Alford's comment on Rom. vi. 7 is worth quoting here:--

"The difficulty of this verse arises from the apostle having in a short and pregnant sentence expressed a whole similitude, joining as he elsewhere does in such cases the subject of the first limb of the comparison with the predicate of the second. Fully expressed, it would stand thus: For, as a man that is dead is acquitted and released from guilt and bondage (among men: no ref. to God's judgment of him); so a man that has died to sin is acquitted from the guilt of sin and released from its bondage."

To make sure that every reader will appreciate this note we set out the passage, with verse 7 in the centre, showing what is the "first limb of the comparison", and what is "the predicate of the second":--

Rom. vi. 2-6. The believer is "dead to sin". \
Rom. / He that is dead /
vi. 7. \ Is freed from sin. \
Rom. vi. 8-14. Let not sin therefore reign that ye should obey it. /

It is clear that freedom from bondage is the main theme here, and that this freedom has some vital connection with death to sin. The question as to the basis of this freedom is answered in verses 6 and 9:--

> "Knowing this, that our old man was crucified with Him, in order that the body of sin might be rendered inoperative, that we should no longer serve sin."
> "Knowing that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over Him."

The subject here is a sacred one; let us tread reverently for this is indeed hallowed ground. The first passage ("knowing this") points us to the cross; the second ("knowing that") to the empty tomb. Together, they form the basis and charter of the believer's freedom.

In Rom. vi. 6 we have the crucifixion of the "old man"; in vii. 6, the "oldness of the letter". In vi. 6, the body of sin is "destroyed" (katargeo); and in vii. 6, we ourselves are "delivered" (katargeo) from the law. In both cases the end is "service":--

> "That henceforth we should not serve sin" (Rom. vi. 6).
> "That we should serve in newness of spirit and not in oldness of the letter" (Rom. vii. 6).

The "newness" of the spirit is in contrast with the "oldness" of the letter; and we must find also something "new" to contrast with what is connected with the "old man". This something "new" is found in verse 4: "newness of life." As we have already remarked (Article #40) the word "newness", standing here beside an empty tomb, looks back at the past which is dead, buried, excluded and finished.

The "old man" is crucified, with an object in view—"that the body of sin should be rendered inoperative". In Rom. vii. 24 we have "the body of this death"; and in Rom. viii. 3 (literally) "the likeness of sin's flesh". We read in Rom. vi.-viii. and elsewhere of "a law of sin which is in my members". This body, "sold under sin", dominated by sin and death, is the seat of human depravity, the source of much of human temptation, and the active instrument in the outworking of evil. In a future day, the children of God shall stand in absolute freedom—"the freedom of the glory" (Rom. viii. 21)—and then they shall have attained to the "redemption of the body". During our life on earth we still have "mortal bodies" in which sin may still reign, though its dominion is broken (Rom. vi. 12). Our only freedom springs from the canceling of sin and the ending of its dominion. We were all slaves to sin and death, "sold under sin" (Rom. vii. 14). The punishment for a slave was crucifixion; and so we read: "Our old man was crucified with Him." This particular word translated "crucified with" is used in one other epistle, that written to the Galatians:--

> "I through the law am dead to law, that I might live unto God. I have been crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I but Christ liveth in me: and the life that I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, Who loved me, and gave Himself for me" (Gal. ii. 19, 20).

"I am dead to law . . . . . I have been crucified with Christ", are the words of the apostle in Gal. ii. "I am dead to sin . . . . . Our old man was crucified with Him", says the same apostle in Rom. vi. And, in Gal. ii.: "That I might live unto God . . . . . I live, yet not I." And then, in Rom. vi., the words of the same apostle: "Reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God in Christ Jesus."

How are we to understand the serious expression: "crucified with Him"? Its only other occurrences in the N.T. are in the Gospels, and there we shall learn this meaning:--

> "The thieves also, which were crucified with Him, cast the same in His teeth" (Matt. xxvii. 44).
> "They that were crucified with Him reviled Him" (Mark xv. 32).
> "Then came the soldiers, and brake the legs of the first, and of the other which was crucified with Him" (John xix. 32).

Reader, as you look at this record, do you realize that these dying thieves are a picture of yourself? Here indeed is the "offence of the cross", the exposure of the utter hopelessness of the flesh—"none good", "none righteous", all condemned to a criminal's death, "the death of the cross".

It will be noticed that Matthew, Mark and John have been quoted in this connection. What has Luke to say? It is Luke who shews the inner meaning of the cross and its three victims:--

> "And when they were come to the place called Calvary, there they crucified Him, and the malefactors, one on the right and the other on the left" (Luke xxiii. 33).

Each of these three crosses bore a condemned and dying man, for the Lord Jesus Himself entered into condemnation "for us". Both of the malefactors were "in the same condemnation" (Luke xxiii. 40), but here their likeness ends. One of them railed upon Christ, but the other rebuked him saying, concerning their own condemnation: "And we indeed justly: for we receive the due reward of our deeds." This dying man bows before the doctrine of Romans, that "all have sinned", and that "the wages of sin is death". But, looking at the central figure, the Son of God, he says:--

> "But this man hath done nothing amiss. And he said unto Jesus, Lord . . . . ."

We are not concerned for the moment as to what else he said. He said "Lord"; and if the dying Man was indeed the "Lord", and if "He has done nothing amiss", then He was the great Sacrifice for sin, so long promised, and at last offered. Here took place the great transfer upon which all our hopes depend. The dying thief ceased to be merely, as an accident of time and place, "crucified with" Christ, and, becoming "united with the likeness of His death", was brought into salvation.

"Crucifixion with Christ" is set forth in Rom. vi. as having a specific object in view: "to render the body of sin inoperative" (katargeo). Katargeo.—There are five other occurrences of this word in Romans (iii. 3, 32; iv. 14; viii. 2, 6) where it is rendered "make without effect", "make void", "loosed from" and "delivered from". In no case can the word "destroy" in its true sense be rightly substituted. The following passages give some further A.V. renderings of the word:--

"To bring to nought" (I Cor. i. 28).
"Come to nought" (I Cor. ii. 6).
"Done away"; "Abolished" (II Cor. iii. 7, 11, 13, 14).
"Make of none effect" (Gal. iii. 17).
"Become of no effect" (Gal. v. 4).
"Then is the offence of the cross ceased" (Gal. v. 11).
"Who hath abolished death" (II Tim. i. 10).
"Destroy him that had the power of death" (Heb. ii. 14).

The word speaks of nullifying a covenant, or a promise. Take for instance, the last two references. Death is not yet "abolished" in an absolute sense; that will only be true when for the first time it can be said, "There shall be no more death" (Rev. xxi. 4). What is true, however, is that death has been nullified by the resurrection of Christ. Believers still die, but the sting of death has been extracted; it is now only to fall asleep in Christ (I Cor. xv. 56). Again, in Heb. ii. 14, Satan has not been destroyed—that is a future event—but his power has been "nullified"'. He can no longer hold in bondage the child of God through fear of death, because Christ has died and risen again. So with the body of sin—it has been annulled, its dominion has been made void, and the believer, though still possessed of a "mortal" body, is now "free"—and free to serve the new Master.

(To be concluded).

#42. Sanctification.---Third: a state, freedom (vi. 1-14). (concluded).

pp. 157, 158

We now proceed to the second passage:--

> "Now if we died with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with Him: knowing that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over Him. For the death which He died unto sin, He died once for all; but the life which He liveth, He liveth unto God" (Rom. vi. 8-10).

Let us observe the phrases, "to sin" and "to God". They are purposely indefinite, so that the teaching of the apostle shall not be missed.

When the Lord "died to sin" He passed into a state in which sin could have no more to do with Him, either in its temptation or in its demand for atonement, or by contract with its odious presence. All this He accomplished and settled "once for all". And, when we read that He now lives "to God", we understand this simple statement to include the glorifying of the Father and the Son, the seating at the right hand of the Father, and the pledge that because "He lives we shall live also". The source and spring of our new life can never fail. It is as eternal as the personal life of the Son of God.

Let us never lose hold of the one dominant fact that in all these relations we are "one", whether it be with Adam in his sin and death, or with Christ in His righteousness and life. In II Cor. iii. 7, 11, 13, 14 we have four times repeated the "nullifying" or "doing away" of the Old Covenant (the word translated "destroyed" in Rom. vi.). This is followed in II Cor. iii. by the thought of "freedom", as in Rom. vi. 6: "Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty" (II Cor. iii. 17). This, then, is the third essential of sanctification.

In conclusion, let us again see the subject as a whole:--

(1) A SPHERE.—Newness of life.
(2) A CONDITION.—Union. Crucified with, dead with, buried with, raised with.
(3) A STATE.—Freedom.

#43. Sanctification. How it is apprehended---"Reckon" (vi. 1-14).
pp. 164 - 168

We have now considered three different phases of sanctification. It is a new sphere of activity: "newness of life". It is possible by virtue of a new condition: "united with Christ." And it can only be enjoyed in a new state: "freedom from dominion."

The next enquiry is, How do these blessings become mine? Mine experimentally and effectively and not only in purpose and in Christ? Speaking without special consideration, we should probably reply that it is "by faith". This is true, but what do we mean by "faith"? In the whole of the inner section of the epistle (Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39), the word "faith" occurs not at all, and "believe" but once: "We believe that we shall also live with Him" (Rom. vi. 8). This is very striking, especially if we compare the absence of "faith" here with its presence in the outer section.

In Rom. i. 1 - v. 11, we have the verb pisteuo, "to believe", 9 times, and in Rom. ix.-xvi., 11 times. Pistis, "faith", occurs 26 times in the earlier, and 12 times in the later section. There is, therefore, a total of 58 occurrences, as compared with one in Rom. vi. 8. A glance at the structure given on page 33 will show that in the three divisions we have the phrases: "Know ye not"; "Knowing this"; and "Knowing that". In an earlier article (Volume XXII, page 224) we drew attention to the two words used for "knowing", ginosko and oida, one indicating a personal acknowledgment, the other a less personal perception, e.g.:-- > "I had not acknowledged (ginosko) sin, but by the law" (Rom. vii. 7).

> "I had not perceived (oida) lust, except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet" (Rom. vii. 7).

It would appear from this that "faith" has advanced and become "knowledge" as Peter says:--

> "Add to your faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge . . . . . For if these things be in you, and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be barren, nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ" (II Pet. i. 5-8).

The reader will observe that the end in view here is "fruit", and will immediately turn back to Rom. vi. and vii. to see that this, too, is the goal before the apostle.

To return, then, to our theme: How is the believer to make these blessings something more than a part of a creed, and so believe them that his knowledge shall be neither barren nor unfruitful? The answer is found in Rom. vi. 11: "Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin; but alive unto God, in Christ Jesus."

As the true meaning of the word "reckon" is vital to our appreciation and appropriation of the work of Christ, no pains must be spared to arrive at as true and complete an understanding of it as possible. Logizomai, "to reckon", comes from leloga, the middle perfect of lego, "to gather or collect" as in I Cor. xvi. 1, 2. Its proper meaning is to reckon arithmetically, and is so used in the LXX version of II Chron. v. 6.

The usage of the word in the N.T. will enable us to get some idea of its general bearing:--

(1) TO REASON OR ARGUE RATIONALLY.
"They reasoned with themselves" (Mark xi. 31).
"When I was a child . . . . . I thought as a child" (I Cor. xiii. 11).

(2) TO INFER, CONCLUDE OR BALANCE AFTER HEARING REASONS.
"Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith" (Rom. iii. 28).
"I reckon that the sufferings of this present time" (Rom. viii. 18).
"Accounting that God was able to raise him up" (Heb. xi. 19).

(3) TO THINK.
"And thinkest thou this, O man?" (Rom. ii. 3).

(4) TO ACCOUNT.
"Let a man so account of us, as of the ministers of Christ" (I Cor. iv. 1).
"Not that we are sufficient of ourselves, to think anything as of ourselves' (II Cor. iii. 5).
"To him that esteemeth anything to be unclean" (Rom. xiv. 14).
"He was reckoned among the transgressors" (Luke xxii. 37).
"We are accounted as sheep for the slaughter" (Rom. viii. 36).

(5) TO IMPUTE.
"Unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works" (Rom. iv. 6).
"Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin" (Rom. iv. 8).
"To whom it shall be imputed, if we believe" (Rom. iv. 24).

(6) TO IMPUTE FOR (logizomai eis).
"Shall not his uncircumcision be counted for circumcision?" (Rom. ii. 26).
"Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness" (Rom. iv. 3).
"His faith is counted for righteousness" (Rom. iv. 5).
"The children of the promise are counted for the seed" (Rom. ix. 8).

While we have not given every occurrence of the word, we believe we have accounted for every phase of its meaning. It will be observed in Rom. iv. that where "sin" and "righteousness" are being dealt with, these are "imputed"; but where faith is being dealt with, it is "imputed for". Faith is not righteousness; it is "reckoned for" righteousness. In Rom. vi. 11 there is no "imputing for"; it is as actual and real as the imputation of sin to a sinner.

When we were considering the usage of the words "crucify with", we observed that it was Luke who recorded the incident of the dying thief, and thus illuminated the doctrine which the words implied. This is as we might expect, if it is true that Luke was raised up to work with Paul. So here, again, it is Luke who gives us the one clear passage that bears most upon our theme. Let us give the passage—Luke xxii. 37 in full:--

> "For I say unto you, that this that is written must yet be accomplished in Me, And He was reckoned among the transgressors: for the things concerning Me have an end." (The verb, "to be accomplished", is teleo; the noun, "end", is telos).

The Lord declared that something that was "written" was to be accomplished. Where is this written prophecy recorded? The reference is to Isa. liii. 12:--

> "He was numbered with the transgressors: and He bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors."

Earlier in this chapter the prophet had said:--

> "He was wounded for our transgressions, He was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon Him; and with His stripes we are healed" (Isa. liii. 5).

The things concerning Him had an "end"—not merely a termination, but a goal, something attained and accomplished. When the Saviour cried with a loud voice, "It is finished", the words meant more than that His sufferings were at last ended; they meant that He had "finished the work" which the Father had given Him to do. In Rom. vi. we stand looking at that finished work. He died for sin, He died to sin; and He rose again, the Victor over death. With Him we also died to sin; with Him we rose again victors over death. We were buried "into His death" and so became "in Christ". And just as surely as He was "reckoned" (or "numbered") among the transgressors, so are we to "reckon also ourselves" to have died unto sin and to be alive unto God in Him.

Let us examine verse 11 still more carefully. It commences with "Likewise", Houto. This is usually translated "so"; other renderings are: "in like manner", "on this fashion", "thus", etc. The words, "indeed . . . . . but" are a translation of "men . . . . .de"; they express the idea conveyed by the English form: "on the one hand . . . . . on the other hand", indicating two sides of a story. Most important of all is the rendering, "in Christ Jesus". Whether the words, "our Lord", should be included or not is not a serious matter; but the translation of en Christou Iseou by "through Jesus Christ" is a double error. Firstly, the title "Christ Jesus" is important, emphasizing that the Lord is the risen and ascended One, Who once walked the earth. Secondly, we are not dealing with the mediatorship of Christ which would be rightly expressed by the preposition "through", but with our oneness expressed by the preposition "in". We died to sin in the likeness of His death, we walk in the likeness of His resurrection; but we live, actually and really, "in Him".

This, then, is the mode of apprehending this most important truth. We "reckon", with a reality as great as that with which Christ was reckoned with the transgressors. Just as surely as He was treated as a transgressor as a result of that reckoning, nothing being abated of all the horror of desertion, crucifixion and death; so, as surely, shall we be treated as justified and free from the dominion of sin, when we, too, reckon ourselves to have died to sin on the one hand, and, on the other, to be alive to God "in Christ Jesus".

The reader is requested to notice the entire absence from this passage of any approximation to the language of a certain school of teaching, which urges its followers to "crucify themselves" and to "die more and more" if they would enter into this blessed state. Instead of exhorting us to crucify ourselves, the next section goes on to urge that we should "yield ourselves unto God as those that are alive from the dead". It is good for us to abide by the Word of God, and He assures us that the "crucifying" was done for us by His blessed Son. The "dying" was in our room and stead. Before anything else of an experimental nature is introduced we are told to "reckon".

The following extract from the writings of Romaine are much to the point here:--

> "True spiritual mortification does not consist in sin not being in thee, nor in it being put upon the cross daily, nor yet in its being kept upon it. There must be something more to establish perfect peace in thy conscience; and that is the testimony of God concerning the body of sin. He has provided for thy perfect deliverance from it in Christ. Everything needful for this purpose was finished by Him upon the cross. He was thy Surety . . . . . the law has no more right to condemn thee, a believer, than it has to condemn Him. Justice is bound to deal with thee as it has with thy risen and ascended Saviour. If thou dost not see thy complete mortification in Him, sin will reign in thee . . . . . If it be not mortified in its power . . . . . This believing view of his absolute mortification in Christ is the true gospel method of mortifying sin in our own persons."

We have considered sanctification in its three aspects, and may now add the scriptural method of apprehending it in its fullness.

Sanctification.

(1) A sphere: newness of life.
(2) A condition: oneness with Christ.
(3) A state: freedom from bondage.
(4) It is apprehended by "reckoning".

#44. Sanctification. Its sphere: "Under grace" (vi. 1-14).
pp. 206 - 210

We now have, for the first time in the epistle, an exhortation:--

> "Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof. Neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin: but yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God. For sin shall not have dominion over you: for ye are not under law, but under grace' (Rom. vi. 12-14).

In these three verses we have three features:--

> The exhortation, negatively: "Let not"; "Yield not."
> The exhortation, positively: "Yield yourselves and your members."
> The assurance, positionally: "Under grace."

Dr. Weymouth's rendering in modern speech is suggestive:--

> "Let not Sin therefore reign as king in your mortal bodies, causing you to be in subjection to their cravings; and no longer lend your faculties as unrighteous weapons (tools or implements) for Sin to use. On the contrary, surrender your very selves to God as living men who have risen from the dead, and surrender your several faculties to God, to be used as weapons (tools or implements) to maintain the right."

When we were studying the epistle to the Hebrews, we observed that it was at the point where doctrinal instruction ended that exhortation began. "Having therefore . . . . . let us . . . . . let us . . . . . let us" (Heb. x. 19-24). And so it is in Rom. vi. as it must ever be.

The word "reign" includes in its scope the word "king", just as "dominion" carries with it the thought of the "Lord". These verses in Rom. vi. refer back to Rom. v. 12-21:--

(1) Death reigned (Rom. v. 14). \ through ADAM.
(2) Sin reigned (Rom. v. 21). /
(3) Grace reigns (Rom. v. 21). \ through THE LORD JESUS CHRIST.
(4) Believers reign (Rom. v. 17). /

The reign of sin and death is over so far as we are concerned. Why is this? Is it because we are not now mortal? That cannot be, for quite apart from experience, the context itself speaks of our "mortal bodies". Is it because sin has ceased to exist within us? This, too, would be quite contrary to our experience, and would deny the whole argument of Rom. vii. The true reason is that "death hath no more dominion over HIM" (Rom. vi. 9). He died for and to sin, and death reigns only through sin. The sting of death is sin. But in Him, all that has passed. We are on resurrection ground, and can no more be bondslaves to sin than Israel could be bondslaves to Pharaoh after the crossing the Red Sea. At the Red Sea, Pharaoh died, his dominion ended, Israel were baptized into Moses, and were at length free to serve the Lord. He had said: "Let My Son go that He may serve Me" (Exod. iv. 23). And in this command lies the essential teaching of Rom. vi. 12-14. Service as bondslaves yields to service as sons, law gives place to grace, Egypt to the wilderness, and brick-making for idolatrous kings to the building of a tabernacle for the King of kings.

We are particularly warned against the "mortal body" and its "lusts". The body is mortal because of sin; we possess such a body because Adam sinned and was expelled from the garden of Eden. It is the medium of the deceitful and corrupting lusts of the "old man" (Eph. iv. 22); and when we put on the new man, we walk in love as children of light.

The apostle, in Rom. vi. 13, speaks of our not yielding our members to sin but to God; and in Eph. iv. he goes on to speak definitely of the newly-yielded "hand" and "mouth" (Eph. iv. 28, 29), which, as representing our words and deeds sum up most of our activities.

John speaks of the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life. A corrective to this is to remember that the body is mortal; if we realize this, it will not minister to any false "pride of life".

Rom. vi. 12 is an outworking of the truth of Rom. vi. 6, where the "old man" is crucified, so that the body of sin (called "the mortal body" in verse 12) might be rendered null and void, "that henceforth we should not serve sin". As Gal. v. 24 says: "They that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with its passion and lusts."

Notice how everything here seems to focus upon service. The walk in "newness of life" of Rom. vi. 4 is expressed in the service in "newness of spirit" of Rom. vii. 6. The crucifixion of the old man, and the nullifying of the body of sin, have in view the canceling of our service to sin (vi. 6). The delivered believer is exhorted to yield himself and his members to God; and his members are called "instruments", shewing that service is still in view. In the next section, too (vi. 15-23), the entire argument revolves around the thought of "service".

The wonderful freedom and deliverance of the believer is further explained in vi. 14 by showing that he is entirely removed from the dominion of law as well as that of sin, and is now under grace:--

> "For sin shall not have dominion over you: for ye are not under law, but under grace."

It should be observed that there is no article before "law". It is not sufficient to be delivered from a ceremonial law, for the mere abolition of rites and ceremonies could not exempt from obedience to moral law. We are now found under a new economy, that of grace. Under the dispensation of grace, however, the moral law will be kept as certainly as if our salvation depended upon it. The dispensation of grace only sets the law aside as a means of salvation; when the law enunciates moral truth, this remains as true under grace as before. The apostle himself has raised this question, in order to correct a false impression that Christian liberty can countenance licence:--

> "For brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another (notice the thought of service again). For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (Gal. v. 13, 14).

This principle is more fully developed in Rom. xiii. 8-10:--

> "Owe no man anything, but to love one another: for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law. For this, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Thou shalt not covet; and if there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. Love worketh no ill to his neighbour: therefore love is the fulfilling of the law."

The truth enunciated in the opening section of chapter vi. (verses 1-14) is expanded and expounded in what follows. Rom. vi. 15 - vii. 6 corrects any false idea that being "under grace" imperils morality. Rom. vii. 7-25 deals with various aspects of law, the written and the unwritten law, the law without and the law within. And Rom. viii. shows that grace itself is by no means lawless:--

> "For the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death" (Rom. viii. 2).

The statement of Rom. viii., however, will be better appreciated when the utter failure both of the law and of the flesh is realized. It is the office of Rom. vii. to impress this upon the believer, so that, while recognizing that the law was rendered utterly ineffective in that it was weak through the flesh, he may realize with joy that God has in grace accomplished all His purpose in the gift of His own Son. "What the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh" sums up Rom. vii., while the whole of Rom. viii. is an exposition of what grace has wrought through Christ.

We have now reached the conclusion of the first part of Rom. vi. and have seen that sanctification has:--

A sphere: "newness of life."
A condition: "oneness with Christ."
A state: "freedom from bondage."
An apprehension: by "reckoning".

And it affords the practical possibility of freedom to serve the Lord, not as a slave but as a son, not under law but under grace.

Seven precious things.

#2. The precious trial of faith (I Pet. i. 6, 7).
pp. 17 - 19

The setting of the first of Peter's precious things is in "heaviness", "temptation" and "trial".

The apostle uses a number of expressions to soften the severity of the "fiery trial" through which the believer is called to pass, among which let us gratefully note the following:--

"For a season" (oligon).—The word literally means: "for a little while." We find it in I Pet. iii. 20 where it is translated "few", and more to our point in I Pet. v. 10 where the apostle says:--

> "But the God of all grace, Who hath called us unto His eternal glory by Christ Jesus, after that ye have suffered a while, make you perfect, stablish, strengthen, settle you."

This throws a comforting light upon the trial of faith: at most, it is but for "a little while", and it leads to perfecting, stablishing and settling.

Another mitigating feature in the trial of faith is expressed by the words: "if need (dei) be." There is a "need be" for every thorn, for every hour of darkness. The "need be" may be in ourselves, our need of discipline, some element of dross that must be purged. There may be a "need be" because of the outworking of the great purpose of God, and if so surely it is an honour to suffer anything that is associated with that mighty plan. There is also a "need be" because of others, for none of us liveth or dieth to himself. Thus we find the word (dei) translated "behove" in Luke xxiv. 46 ("Thus it behoved Christ to suffer"), and "must" in John xii. 34 ("The Son of man must be lifted up"), and "must needs" in Acts xvii. 3 ("Christ must needs have suffered").

The most important note, however, is that sounded in I Pet. i. 7 in the expression, "The trial of faith". As the word itself indicates, and the very explanatory note of Peter proves, the "trial" refers to the testing of a metal, the refining of gold. The words, "though it be tried with fire", may of course refer to the faith, but a fuller sense is given if we read them as referring to the gold. The intention of the apostle is expressed as follows:--

> "That the trial of your faith (being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it (the gold) be tried with fire) might be found unto praise and honour and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 7).

Gold is called by the chemist a "noble metal" by reason of its resistance to the attack of acids. Peter, however, says that it "perishes", yet he adds: "even gold that perishes stands the test of fire; how much more then your faith?"

A further item of interest and importance is that the Greek word translated "honour" in I Pet. i. 7 is the same as that translated "precious" in I Pet. ii. 7. The trial of faith is indeed "precious" if it eventuates in "honour" before the Lord.

The "appearing" of I Pet. i. 7 is really the apocalypse, the unveiling, the revelation, of Jesus Christ. The word suggests that He is now hidden from our sight by a veil, and indeed the apostle goes on immediately to say: "Whom having not seen ye love." The trial of faith synchronizes with the veiling of the Lord. It can but endure for a night, joy coming in the morning of His presence.

The church of the One Body has not the "appearing" or "revelation" of the Lord as its hope, but it surely has its hour of testing now in view of that day when Christ Who is our life shall appear. May some encouragement have been ministered by these words concerning the trial of faith which is much more precious than gold.

#3. "The precious blood of Christ."
p. 60

The second jewel in this series of precious things is nothing less than "The precious blood of Christ" (I Pet. i. 18, 19). Peter, to reveal some of its preciousness, gives us two tests: (1) A contrast, and (2) A comparison.

A gem of the first water is enhanced if it be surrounded with stones of inferior quality, or against a background that is dark and lustreless. Let us look at this contrast:--

> "Forasmuch as ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold" (I pet. i. 18).

Both Peter and Paul were taught by grace to consider both silver and gold as of small value and of little worth, and it might be salutary for us all in this day of fictitious values to read what these servants of God have written and said as to silver and gold. To the lame man at the gate of the temple Peter said, "Silver and gold have I none" (Acts iii. 6), but in the name of Jesus of Nazareth he gave to the lame man more than gold or silver could buy.

"I have coveted no man's silver, or gold" (Acts xx. 33) declared the apostle who gave so freely because of the grace bestowed upon him. To the Athenians he said: "The Godhead is (not) like unto gold or silver" (Acts xvii. 29), and both Peter and Paul strongly discouraged the "wearing of gold" and "putting on of apparel" (I Pet. iii. 3), and the adorning of oneself with "broided hair, or gold, or pearls" (I Tim. ii. 9). Equally with Peter, Paul emphasized the fact that the redeemed are "bought with a price" (I Cor. vi. 20), and both knew the truth of the statement of the Psalmist:--

"They that trust in their wealth, and boast themselves in the multitude of their riches; none of them can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him. For the redemption of their soul is precious, and it ceaseth for ever" (Psa. xlix. 6-8).

#3. (contd.). "The precious blood of Christ." pp. 79, 80

The redemption of their soul is indeed so precious that the multitude of riches could never pay the price. Nothing less than the precious blood of Christ will avail.

Let us now consider the comparison which the apostle makes:--

"But with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot, Who verily was foreordained before the foundation of the world" (I Pet. i. 19, 20).

Gold, said Peter, was something that "perisheth" (I Pet. i. 7); gold and silver, said Peter, are "corruptible things" (I Pet. i. 18), but the precious blood of Christ is as of a lamb "without blemish and without spot". He whose blood alone can redeem, was Himself, "holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners" (Heb. vii. 26). He whose offering for sin accomplished our justification before God, was Himself without sin:--

"For He hath made Him to be sin for us, Who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him" (II Cor. v. 21).

The reference to the "lamb" points back to the passover, and it is a glorious truth, basic to our redemption, that "Christ our passover hath been sacrificed for us" (I Cor. v. 7).

The lamb of God was attested "spotless" by a number of disinterested witnesses. Pilate said: "I find no fault in this man" (Luke xxiii. 4, 14) and "I have found no cause of death in Him" (Luke xxiii. 22). Herod, too, bore witness that "nothing worthy of death is done in Him" (Luke xxiii. 15). The dying thief bore his testimony, saying: "This man hath done nothing amiss" (Luke xxiii. 41). These, however, are negative in character. God's testimony is positive: "This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased" (Matt. iii. 17).

A servant of God, having battled with the elements after speaking at a meeting in the country, found his murmurings turned to praise, when he entered the railway station and saw the text: "Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee" (Matt. ix. 2). All resentful feelings vanished, the discomfort of the storm was forgotten in the contemplation of that great fact.

Do we sometimes feel resentful regarding our circumstances, our health, our most prized schemes, our pilgrim trials? If we have been redeemed with "precious" blood, is it reasonable, or possible, that God can forget to be gracious? Let the preciousness of our redemption minister its blessed comfort to our hearts, knowing that the ransom paid for our redemption has also made us precious in the sight of Him Who paid it:--

> "I gave . . . . . for thy ransom . . . . . Since thou wast precious in My sight, thou hast been honourable, and I have loved thee" (Isa. xliii. 3, 4).

#4. The elect and living stone.
pp. 91 - 93

The precious blood of Christ having accomplished the redemption of His people, opens a door that leads to blessings beyond all that heart can think. In view of the riches that are the fruit of redeeming love, it is difficult to single out one as of more worth than another. We are therefore glad that the selection has been made, and made by the Lord Himself Who knows the value of every one of His blood-bought gifts.

The next precious thing in order of occurrence is the precious foundation stone upon which the redeemed are built. Redemption delivers from death, which is followed by newness of life:--

> "Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the Word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever" (I Pet. i. 23).

These new-born babes grow by feeding upon "the unadulterated milk of the Word" (I Pet. ii. 2).

Having been redeemed, given life and growth, the redeemed reach the stage where their hope, destiny and calling become prominent. In I Pet. i. 3 we read:--

> "According to His abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead."

Therefore the next precious thing we are to consider is "the living Stone" upon Whom these "living stones" can be built:--

> "To Whom coming, as unto a living stone, disallowed indeed of men, but chosen of God, and precious. Ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house . . . . . Behold, I lay in Sion, a chief corner stone, elect, precious; and he that believeth on Him shall not be confounded" (I Pet. ii. 4-6).

The transition from "babes" to "buildings" is not so extraordinary as at first sight it may appear, for these stones are "living", and like the temple of Eph. ii., the house of which they form part is not only "built" but "grows".

Man has "disallowed" this one great foundation, but God has chosen Him and calls Him precious:--

> "He hath no form nor comeliness; and when we shall see Him, there is no beauty that we should desire Him" (Isa. liii. 2).

It is a lesson that must be thoroughly learned and remembered, that what God calls "precious" man has rejected:--

> "For that which is highly esteemed among men is abomination in the sight of God" (Luke xvi. 15).

Two words come together both in I Pet. ii. 4 and 6: "chosen" and "precious". May we not see that the saints also are "precious" in His sight, for in I Pet. i. 2 and ii. 9 the same word "chosen" or "elect" is used of them. He is the living Stone and precious; they are living stones, and are they not precious in Him? He is "elect and precious", and is not the chosen generation precious in Him?

The reference to the elect and precious living Stone of I Pet. ii. 4 receives amplification in verse 6:--

> "Wherefore also it is contained in the scripture, Behold, I lay in Sion, a chief corner stone, elect, precious; and he that believeth on Him shall not be confounded" (I Pet. ii. 6).

The passage quoted is Isa. xxviii. 16, and as there is a slight difference in the wording of the two passages, we will set out that in Isaiah:--

> "Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner stone, a sure foundation: he that believeth shall not make haste."

In our meditation upon the earlier reference to the precious foundation stone, we made reference to Eph. ii. We must do so once more. In both Peter's epistles and in Ephesians, Christ is spoken of as "the chief corner stone". There are lesser stones that form part of the foundation, even as we read: "and are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets" (Eph. ii. 20), but Jesus Christ Himself alone is the "chief corner stone". In Eph. i. 10 Christ is seen as Head not only of the church, but of all things in heaven and in earth, and the same unifying feature is resident in the figure of the corner stone.

The dispensational difference between the church of the One Body and all other callings is not a difference in the foundation, but in the super-structure. The great corner stone beneath the temple binds all together. The figure changes as the verse develops, and "building" changes to "believing":--

> "He that believeth on Him shall not be confounded."

The context of Isa. xxviii. 16 speaks of Israel's covenant with death and refuge in lies. All such, however, are doomed to failure. God has laid but one foundation, and no foundation save that one will stand the storm and the strain of coming judgment. This living stone, this elect chief corner stone is the precious foundation of all our hopes. He shall never be confounded who builds, and believes, on Him.

#5. He is precious.
pp. 133, 134

"Unto you therefore which believe He is precious" (I Pet. ii. 7).

The person of the Lord had been partly hidden behind types and figures. He had been set forth as a Lamb without blemish and without spot. He had been set forth as a Chief Corner Stone laid in Zion. But He is now set forth as the supreme object of faith, and precious to all His believing people. Let us see what Peter has to say about "believing":--

"Whom having not seen, ye love; in Whom, though now ye see Him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory" (I Pet. i. 8).
"Who by Him do believe in God, that raised Him up from the dead, and gave Him glory" (I Pet. i. 21).
"Behold, I lay in Sion a Chief Corner Stone, elect, precious; and he that believeth on Him shall not be confounded" (I Pet. ii. 6).
"Unto you therefore which believe He is precious" (I Pet. ii. 7).

He is the object of love, though as yet unseen. He is the ground of rejoicing and unspeakable joy. He gives fullness of glory and, as the Risen One, He, Himself, has received glory at the Father's right hand. He is God's chosen foundation upon which all our hopes must rest. "Therefore", concludes the scripture, to all who believe He must be "precious".

If we consider the idea of preciousness from the standpoint of rarity and uniqueness, we can find it in the Son of God in fullest measure. Who but He claims our love, though He be yet unseen? Who, indeed, but He Who bare our sins in His own body on the tree. Where, outside of Christ, shall we find unmixed joy and unalloyed glory? The world may contribute "happiness", but real joy, that is independent of what "haps", it cannot give. Who but Christ is the Risen One, and risen, too, on behalf of His people? Who but He can hold out the hope of glory to any? What other foundation has God laid? Scripture answers, "None but Christ". To us who believe, therefore, how precious He must be, for apart from Him, we are, and have, nothing.

B. W. Newton put forward the suggestion that the true meaning of the apostle in this passage is expressed by the translation: "Unto you therefore which believe is the preciousness", for it will be seen that words "He is" are printed in italics in the A.V. This translation will also be found in J. N. Darby's version. All the preciousness that attaches to the Saviour belongs to His people. He is the Lamb of God, without blemish and without spot. They, too, shall be presented holy, unblameable and unreproveable. He is the elect and precious Corner Stone. They, the living stones, built on Him, partake of, and enter into, all His acceptableness in the sight of God. He is precious to the believer. All His preciousness is theirs.

There is no contradiction in these two renderings. The act of faith relinquishes all hope in self, and finds its all in Christ. The more we realize what the preciousness is that is reckoned to us in Him, the more shall we realize that He is precious in Himself. "Lord to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life" (John vi. 68).

#6. "Like precious faith."
pp. 179, 180

Peter's first "precious" thing is associated with faith. With this thought he opens his second epistle:--

> "Simon Peter, a servant and an apostle of Jesus Christ, to them that have obtained like precious faith with us through the righteousness of God and our Saviour Jesus Christ" (II Pet. i. 1).

We have already seen that preciousness may be the result of rarity. Many precious things in the estimation of the world are mainly so because of their scarcity. This is true, for instance, of the first editions of books. A well-printed copy of Shakespeare can be obtained for a few shillings, but a copy of the first edition, not by any means so readable, could not be bought for anything less than thousands of pounds. The apostle, however, speaks of faith as being precious and yet at the same time possessed and shared by all believers—"like precious faith with us." It is evident, therefore, that faith is precious because of its own intrinsic worth and not because it is the unique possession of a few.

Paul does not use the expression, "like precious faith", but the same idea underlies his words to Titus: "The faith of God's elect . . . . . after the common faith" (Titus i. 1 & 4). Here the exclusive and inclusive character of faith is shown. None but the elect possess it, but all the elect share it. It is "precious" because it is "common".

Jude, whose epistle follows Peter's second epistle so closely, speaks of "the common salvation" and "the faith which was once delivered unto the saints". Here again, faith is exclusively the possession of the saints, and is connected with a salvation which is common to all the redeemed.

We must bear in mind, in our present consideration, Peter's early diffidence in having any fellowship with a man of another nation; and how he afterwards bore testimony at Jerusalem that "God gave them the like gift as He did unto us, who believed on the Lord Jesus Christ" (Acts xi. 17). And again, when the matter came forward in Acts xv., he said, concerning the believing Gentiles:-- > "And God, which knoweth the hearts, bare them witness, giving them the Holy Ghost, even as He did unto us; and put no difference between us and them, purifying their hearts by faith . . . . . we believe that through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ we shall be saved, even as they" (Acts xv. 8, 9, 11).

This, then, is the background behind the words: "like precious faith with us."

Faith is the common possession of all the redeemed, because of the utter bankruptcy of man spiritually, and the precious fullness of Christ. So we find Peter declaring that this precious yet common faith is ministered "through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ" (Acts xv. 11). And, in the epistle, it is "through the righteousness of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ" (II Pet. i. 1). That which is mediated through grace must be common to all, for grace resolutely rules out all idea of merit or precedence in the recipients. And that which comes by righteousness is just as surely common to all, for it is written that "there is none righteous, no, not one".

Let us therefore rejoice in this communion in a precious gift. Let us reckon it to be prized above all earth's wealth that we are included among that blessed company who have obtained "like precious faith" with Peter, Paul, Titus and Cornelius.

#7. "Precious promises."
pp. 219, 220

We now arrive at the seventh and the last of Peter's precious things:--

> "According as His divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain to life and godliness, through the knowledge of Him that hath called us to glory and virtue; whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises: that by these ye might be partakers of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust" (II Pet. i. 3, 4).

Two things stand out prominently like stars in this wonderful galaxy of truth: "divine power" and the "divine nature". The divine power gives, the divine nature is shared. The thought of being "partakers" is one of fellowship, of having something in common. If the words were not written in Scripture it might sound presumptuous to speak in this way, but it is a mighty truth of which the members of the church which is His body have some knowledge too. The power that wrought in Christ when He was raised from the dead is "to usward who believe" and brings with it a participation in the life of Christ, Who indeed "is our life" (Col. iii. 4).

Peter declares that this divine power has given "all things that pertain to life and godliness". In I Tim. iv. 8 Paul links together "the life that now is", "that which is to come" and "godliness". In this passage Peter probably refers to a life of godliness here and now, a state in strong contrast with that connected with the ineffective promises of man as described in II Pet. ii. 18-22 (Further notes on these verses will be found in the series entitled: Great and precious promises).

The divine power is set forth in its positive bearing; "life and godliness". The divine nature is set forth in its negative bearing: "having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust." Just as divine power and the divine nature are but two aspects of the life of Christ, so "life" and "godliness" as opposed to "corruption" and "lust" set forth two aspects of the pulsation of this life in the believer. The participation of the believer in this divine nature is indeed a precious gift of God, and we are not surprised, therefore, to discover that those promises that mediate this gift are described as "exceeding great and precious". It is "by these" that it is possible to become partakers of this divine nature. Paul's use of the word "promise" in Eph. iii. is somewhat similar:--

> "That the Gentiles should be joint-heirs, and a joint body, and joint partakers of His promise in Christ by the gospel: whereof I was made a minister" (Eph. iii. 6, 7).

To become one with God, to realize the fulfillment of the gracious words of John xvii.: "I in them, and Thou in Me, that they all may be made perfect in one"; to experience the oneness of the "heavenly calling" of Heb. ii.: "For both He that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified are all of one"; to be able to appropriate the terms of Eph. iv.: "From Whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth"; this is an experience far above and beyond anything earth can give. As in any measure we realize this, we cannot but acknowledge that the faith that unites us to this glorious Lord must indeed be "precious"; that the blood that makes participation in the divine nature possible must be "precious"; and that the great foundation of all our hopes, the Lord Himself and those exceeding great promises that minister so much, must indeed be "precious" also.

"Unto you therefore that believe is the preciousness."

A review, and sign of the times.

Pillar that may be Lot's wife.
p. 80

A problem for all time.
From the "Daily Telegraph" of 12th May, 1932.

"Sodom and Gomorrah were utterly destroyed by a rain of fire and brimstone because of their great wickedness, according to the Biblical story.

Striking confirmation of this is provided by recent archæological excavations on the site of these twin cities by the shores of the Dead Sea, in Palestine, which have been made by Father Mallon, of the Biblical Pontifical Institute of Jerusalem.

The whole four 'Cities of the Plain' have now been identified, and the site is dominated by Mount Nebo, from which Moses viewed the Promised Land.

With the new Biblical chronology necessitated by Prof. John Garstang's recent discovery of the date of the Fall of Jericho, Father Mallon's dating of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, formed from the archæological evidence, agrees exactly with the Biblical narrative.

On the plain below the hill on which these cities stood is a curious rock formation. It is about five feet high, and legend associates it with the story of Lot's wife, who, looking back at the burning cities, was turned into a pillar of salt. This, however, is one of the problems which archæology will never solve."

p. 180

The following appeared in The News Chronicle of June 16th, 1932:--

Beautiful ivory panels, dating from the year B.C.800 and depicting lotus buds and flowers, strange animals and celestial beings from the Egyptian Pantheon, have been discovered at Samaria, the ancient capital of the Kingdom of Israel.

The site of this discovery leaves no doubt that these ivories belonged to the 'House of Ivory' mentioned in the Bible (I Kings xxii. 39), for the inscription carved on one of them bears the name of Hazael, King of Damascus, B.C.850-800.

One panel shows a fight between a bull and a lion, in relief. Others show cherubs and sphinxes. A third represents the personification of eternity.

These discoveries, which are due to the joint work of British and American archæologists, are of the greatest importance in illustrating the civilization of the period.—Reuter.

The passage in the Book of Kings referred to reads:--

> "Now the rest of the acts of Ahab, and all that he did, and the ivory house which he made and all the cities which he built, are they not written in the Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel?"

The Mizpah Gate open again after 2,600 years.

p. 200

The following extract from The News Chronicle of 20th June, 1932, will be of interest to our readers:--

"The Assyrian came down like a wolf on the fold,
And his cohorts were gleaning in purple and gold."—Byron.

After 2,600 years, the great East Gate of ancient Mizpah is open again.

When sudden destruction overtook the city at the hands of Sennacherib in B.C.701, the gate was only partially destroyed, and it was found under the debris of centuries, well preserved.

A gigantic tower of solid rock, forty-four feet square, protected the entrance court on the east side, while soldiers on the city wall could command the approach from the other side.

The long brown stone benches in the sheltered court shimmer in the sun and look as if the contemporaries of Amos, Hosea and Isaiah had left them only yesterday.

Undoubtedly there were times when these prophets stood there and warned the Israelites against the Assyrian peril.

When the Assyrians attacked the fortress in Biblical times, the besieged tore down their walls and houses to form a barricade. But in vain; the enemy must have made a breach in another part of the city wall and entered.—Reuter.

"This God is our God."

#4. Elohim and Jehovah. Titles of relation.
pp. 63 - 66

We have seen that Scripture does not attempt to prove the existence of God, but teaches that they that come to God must believe that "He is".

We take a step forward in our study when we learn from John iv. 24 that "God is Spirit", and from the first epistle of John that this God is both "light" and "love". We now go back to the Hebrew revelation of God to see how all fits together. The two great names of God revealed in the O.T. generally translated "God" and "Lord" are Elohim and Jehovah. The relationship of these titles to the invisible God Who is Spirit, and to the Lord Jesus Christ, God manifest in the flesh, we seek to show in this article, and first of all by means of the following diagrammatic disposition of the subject.

(BE-XXIII.64).

God, Who is Spirit, has two great all-embracive attributes. He is "Light" and He is "Love". These two attributes are associated with the two great names under which God has made Himself known, "Elohim" and "Jehovah". Both the attributes and the names are gathered up once more in the lower realm of the flesh, and are found in Emmanuel, God with us, God manifest in the flesh.

In other articles we have demonstrated that every attribute ascribed to God in the Scriptures is also ascribed to the Lord Jesus Christ, with the one obvious exception, namely, that of invisibility. We do not intend traversing that ground again here, but propose an examination of the two great titles under which the invisible God has made Himself known to man through the Word, Elohim and Jehovah.

The reader will recognize in the word Elohim the plural form "im" occurring in other well-known words as "Cherubim", etc. Although the word is plural, and should naturally take a plural verb, we nevertheless find in a number of occurrences that the verb used is in the singular. This is the case in Gen. i. 1, where "created" (bara) is the third person, masculine singular perfect of the verb "to create". To leave the matter here, however, would be to state but half the truth, and consequently to state a falsehood. Elohim is also followed by verbs in the plural as may be seen in Gen. i. 26:--

> "And Elohim said" (vay-yo-mer), the third person, masculine singular). "Let us make" (na-seh, first person plural).

In this self-same chapter we have, in such a fundamental matter as the nature of God, a most remarkable use of the singular and the plural verb. Quite apart from the fact of inspiration, we should expect that Moses would not use language that was in any way misleading on such a vital subject. He evidently seeks to express the fact that Elohim stands for a unity. This unity, therefore, may be sometimes said to act in the singular number or in the plural, a feature of divine revelation that meets us on the very threshold, and warns us that there is no possible way of understanding the nature of God by human means. We must believe what He says of Himself, and all that He says of Himself, even though (as in the case of the use of both singular and plural verbs, pronouns and adjectives) the matter does not come within our experience nor can be made to conform to our reasoning. The Elohim Who created in such a way that it demanded a singular verb to explain the truth, nevertheless can be said to take counsel at the creation of man:--

> "And Elohim said (singular), Let US (or WE will make [plural]) man in OUR image, according to OUR likeness."

Moreover, while the O.T. teaches that God is One, we have the remarkable passage in Eccles. xii. 1, which reads: "Remember thy Creators" not "Creator".

The idea that God took counsel with angels, or received assistance from any creature is repudiated by Isa. xliv. 24. There is no alternative, therefore, but to bow before the revelation of truth, and confess that the title Elohim is taken by God to reveal to man a Unity, and not a Being of solitary and absolute one-ness.

If the reader will glance at the diagram on page 64 once more, he will see that both the names Elohim and Jehovah are not in the realm of pure Being (that is expressed in the words "God is Spirit"), but are in the realm of manifestation, creation, redemption or relation. All that we know of God is relative, not absolute, and it is a fallacy to attempt to reason back from either the word Elohim or Jehovah into that realm where neither time nor space have any place.

Now, instead of this fact causing the simple believer to shrink back from such a theme, the very fact that God, Whom no man hath seen nor can see, Who recognizes neither the limits of time nor space, Who cannot be found out into perfection by searching, the very fact that He has revealed to us, His creatures, as much as can be grasped, by minds like ours, of His Person and attributes so far as they relate to the ages and their purpose, should fill us with abounding thanksgiving.

With this introduction to these two great titles, let us here conclude, and be prepared in our next article to examine as fully as time and space will permit the meaning that Scripture attaches to them:--

> "Jehovah our Elohim (plural) is Jehovah One" (a unity) (Deut. vi. 4).

"This God is our God."

#5. Elohim and Jehovah.
God in His relation to creation and redemption.
pp. 103 - 108

We now enter upon the important study of the meaning of the title first used of God in the Scriptures—Elohim. There are two avenues of approach to this study. One is to discover, if possible, the root meaning of the Hebrew word; the other to learn from its usage all that we may, so that the mental image we receive shall be as near the truth as possible. The etymology of the word is beset with many difficulties. Some would derive it from a word meaning "strong"; some from a word meaning "to worship". Havernick goes to a Hebrew root now lost.

We feel that with so much diverse opinion, it may be as well to go afresh to the Book. While the supposed root "to worship" is not found in the Scriptures, and while the root for "strong" must be reserved for the title El, which is not to be confounded with Elohim, a root in constant use, and, therefore, one well known to all readers of the original, is alah = "to invoke, to make an oath and to curse". To this day, the words "swearing", "cursing" and "oaths" have a double meaning. They may be the most solemn utterances that can come from holy lips, or they may be the foulest blasphemies. The word Elohim if derived from this root would indicate that God under this title was the maker of an oath.

We are immediately in the presence of One Who has a purpose in creation and the ages, and Who has engaged Himself to carry that purpose through. In this light we read I Pet. i. 19, 20, where Christ is spoken of as the Lamb "foreordained before the foundation (or overthrow) of the world". In this light, too, we read II Tim. i. 9, where we read of a purpose and a choice made in Christ "before the age times". Yet once more, Eph. i. 4 reveals a choice in Christ before "the overthrow of the world", and takes us back to Gen. i. 1, to the very presence of that God Who has sworn by Himself that to Him every knee should one day bow, and every tongue should one day swear or confess.

The title Elohim occurs some 2,700 times in the O.T., its first occurrence linking it with creation. If we now open the Scriptures at Gen. i., and read right on to Gen. ii. 3, the only title of God that is used is Elohim. At Gen. ii. 4, however, we find a change to the title of Jehovah-Elohim = "The Lord God", where the two great names of God are united. Readers will be already acquainted with the fact that the book of Genesis is divided into two sections, viz., i. 1 - ii. 2—The introduction, and ii. 4 - l. 26—The eleven generations. There are only two portions of the book of Genesis in which these two titles of God appear separately:--

i. 1 - ii. 2 uses the name of Elohim only.
x. 1 - xi. 9 uses the name of Jehovah only.

In that portion which deals solely with creation, where man is seen in the image of His Maker, and where sin and death have not yet been manifested, the name of God is Elohim. After the flood and the placing of Noah upon the earth as a sort of "second man", that portion contains no title other than that of Jehovah, and is concerned with the distribution of the nations on the earth, the rebellion of Nimrod and Babel. In this section Jehovah is used seven times.

When we look at the opening generation of the series of generations contained in Gen. ii. 4 - iv. 26, it seems to fall naturally into two parts:--

(1) In the garden of Eden (Gen. ii. 4 - iii. 24).
(2) Outside the garden of Eden (Gen. iv. 1-26).

The distribution of the divine titles is in harmony with the subject-matter:--

Inside the garden.

JEHOVAH-ELOHIM only.—Man innocent and unashamed (Gen. ii. 4 - iii. 1).
ELOHIM only.—In mouth of the Serpent and Eve (Gen. iii. 1-5).
JEHOVAH-ELOHIM only.—Man fallen and ashamed (Gen. iii. 8-24).

Outside the garden.

JEHOVAH only.—The birth of Cain, the offering of Abel and the banishment of Cain (Gen. iv. 1-16).
ELOHIM only.—The birth of Seth (Gen. iv. 25).
JEHOVAH only.—The birth of Enos, and the calling on the name of the Lord (Gen. iv. 26).

Some light is cast upon the two relationships intended by these two great names of God if we observe their use in the following passages:--

> "And they went in male and female of all flesh, as God (Elohim) had commanded, and the Lord (Jehovah) shut him in" (Gen. vii. 16).

> "And it came to pass when the captains of the chariots saw Jehoshaphat, that they said, It is the king of Israel. Therefore they compassed about him to fight: but Jehoshaphat cried out, and the Lord (Jehovah) helped him; and God (Elohim) moved them to depart from him" (II Chron. xviii. 31).

It will be seen that there is a more intimate relationship intended by the name Jehovah than by the name Elohim. One indicates the Creator and His creature, the other the covenant-keeping God. We have already found that the name Elohim indicates God in the capacity of One Who had a purpose, an oath, a promise; this is the name which He assumed in connection with the aspect that creation bears to that purpose.

We now consider the name Jehovah, and find that this title indicates the same God, Who, as Elohim, created heaven and earth, but Who now limits Himself to "the ages", and enters into covenant relationships involving the whole process of redemption and restoration, together with the overthrowing of Satan and his seed. The name Jehovah occurs 7,600 times in the O.T. About 6,800 times it is rendered "LORD" and 800 times "GOD". In Exod. vi. 3; Psa. lxxxiii. 18; Isa. xii. 2 and xxvi. 4, the A.V. uses the English equivalent "Jehovah". The name also occurs in the English title Jehovah-Jireh, Jehovah-Nissi and Jehovah-Shalom.

Should any be disturbed by the theories of Higher Criticism regarding this name, it may be helpful to remind them that the Moabite Stone, which was erected in the days of II Kings iii., has the name Jehovah engraved upon it, the spelling being exactly as we find it in the Hebrew Bible to-day.

The title is a combination in one word of the three periods of existence. It places the future first: Yehi = "He will be", then the present participle hove = "being", and finally the short tense used in the past, hahyah = "he was". This meaning of the word is supported by the Targum of Jonathan, and better still by the book of the Revelation:--

> "Who is, and was, and is coming" (Rev. i. 4, 8).—The hope of His people.
> "Was, and is, and is coming" (Rev. iv. 8).—The hope of creation.
> "Who art, and wast" (Rev. xi. 7).—The future omitted. The kingdom set up.

The R.V., following the critical texts, omits from the last passage the words: "is to come." The promise involved in the covenant name having been at last attained, that part of the title omitted.

In one passage of the book of Genesis, the title Jehovah is explained by the Lord Himself, and to this we must turn. The passage is Gen. xxi. 33, and the context speaks much of covenant and oath. As a result of the oath between Abimelech and Abraham, the name of the place was called Beer-Sheba = "The well of the oath" (Gen. xxi. 31), and it was there that Abraham called upon the name Jehovah El olam = "The God of the age".

The moment we realize that the title Jehovah indicates the great invisible God, Who is Spirit, as "The God of the age", we immediately perceive that this title is in direct opposition to that which belongs to Satan, "The god of this age" (II Cor. iv. 4).

With the record of Eden and the advent of the Serpent, comes the introduction of the title "Jehovah-Elohim", and He Who in fullness of time condescended still more to become Emmanuel = "God with us", definitely came in the flesh and blood "to destroy him that had the power of death, that is the Devil" (Heb. ii. 14), and was manifested to "undo the works of the Devil" (I John iii. 8).

Jehovah is essentially the title of God in redemption:--

> "By My name JEHOVAH was I not known unto them . . . . . I will redeem . . . . . ye shall know" (Exod. vi. 3-7).

While the name Jehovah is used in Genesis by Abram, Isaac and Jacob, they did not know experimentally, as did Israel at the exodus, the great redemption with which the name is associated. The Lord revealed Himself to Moses, as follows, at the time when the great deliverance from Egypt was about to be accomplished:--

> " 'I AM THAT I AM' . . . . . this is My Name for the age. And this is My memorial unto all generations" (Exod. iii. 14, 15).

This is one part of the threefold name Jehovah, and covers the age and all generations to the time when the Lord shall put forth His great power and reign (Rev. xi. 17).

The reader who is acquainted with Newberry's Bible will remember that he translates Exod. iii. 14 by: "I will be that I will be", but adds, "But as the so-called future or long tense expresses not simply the future, but also and especially continuance, the force is: 'I continue to be, and will be, what I continue to be, and will be'." Rotherham translates the passage by: "And God said unto Moses, I will become whatsoever I please", and devotes a chapter in his introduction to the name Jehovah, which is well worth the reader's attention. Regarding his translation of Exod. iii. 14, he says:--

> "The name itself (JEHOVAH) signifies 'He Who becometh', and the formula by which that significance is sustained and which is rendered in the Authorized Version, 'I am that I am', expresses the sense, 'I will become whatsoever I please', or, as more exactly indicating the idiom involved, 'I will become whatsoever I may become'. We amplify the 'may' and more freely suggest the natural latitude which the idiom claims, by saying, 'whatsoever I will, may, or can become'."

The sense of the formula given above is very simply and idiomatically obtained. The formula itself is 'ehyeh, 'asher, 'ehyeh, in which it should be noted that the verb 'ehyeh = "I will become", runs forward into a reduplication of itself: for it is that which constitutes the idiom. We have many such idiomatic formulæ even in English: "I will speak what I will speak", and the like. We have in the Old Testament at least three examples in which the recognition of this simple idiom brings out an excellent sense. I Sam. xxiii. 13 (A.V. and R.V), "And they went whithersoever they could go" (Heb. "way yithhalleku ba'asher yithhallaku"). Freely: "And they wandered wheresoever they could, would or might wander." So in II Sam. xv. 20 and in II Kings viii. 1 the same idiom occurs.

If we remember that the words, "what I please", when used by God indicate the "good pleasure of His will", then Exod. iii. 14 reveals that the name Jehovah stands for God in relation to the ages and His redeemed people, coming necessarily into conflict with Satan, and into contact with sin and death, and guaranteeing the complete success of the purpose of the ages: "I will become whatsoever I purpose"—Jehovah.

"This God is our God."

#6. Further titles of God considered: El, Jah and Adon.

pp. 144 - 147

We have considered, in a simple way, the two great titles of God, Elohim and Jehovah, but there are other titles used in the Scriptures that must be given attention in order that our preliminary survey may be complete. There are four titles which have a similar sound, though derived from different roots. They are El, Eloah, Elyon and Elohim.

El means power. In Psa. l. 1 we read: "The mighty God, even the Lord, hath spoken", which in the Hebrew reads, "El, Elohim Jehovah hath spoken". Here the word "God" is the translation of Elohim, and the word "mighty" is the translation of El. In each of the following passages, the word "mighty", "power", or "strong", is the rendering of the Hebrew El:-- "Give unto the Lord, O ye mighty" (Psa. xxix. 1).

"God standeth in the congregation of the mighty" (Psa. lxxxii. 1).
"The strong among the mighty shall speak" (Ezek. xxxii. 21).
"Because it is in the power of their hand" (Micah ii. 1).

This title El is the one with which many of the divine attributes are associated. It is used in each of the following passages:--

"The almighty God" (Gen. xvii. 1).
"The God of the age" (Gen. xxi. 33).
"A God of truth" (Deut. xxxii. 4).
"The living God" (Josh. iii. 10).

While Elohim is a plural word, El is a singular word, and the thought of the concentration in God, of the divine attributes, conveyed by this title, indicates that though plurality must be understood in the Godhead, yet in essence God is spirit, and in attributes God is one.

Closely allied with the title El is the added title Shaddai. The words El Shaddai occur in combination seven times in the following passages Gen. xvii. 1; xxviii. 3; xxxv. 11; xliii. 14; xlviii. 3; Exod. vi. 3; Ezek. x. 5. In the remaining 41 occurrences it stands alone, and is rendered "The Almighty": of these 31 occur in Job, the remaining 10 being found in Genesis, Numbers, Ruth, Psalms, Isaiah, Ezekiel and Joel. In spite of this consistency of translation, almightiness is not the true idea conveyed by Shaddai; rather is it bountifulness and full sufficiency: an almighty power, certainly, but viewed in the light of its competency to provide.

Eloah appears to be derived from a root meaning "to worship", and presents God as the one, supreme, Object of adoration and worship. Its first occurrence associates the name with worship:--

> "He forsook God which made him . . . . . They sacrifice unto devils, not to God' (Deut. xxxii. 15-17).

The title occurs about 56 times, 41 of which are in Job.

The third of these similar sounding titles is Elyon. It may be helpful to warn the reader against attempting derivations of the Hebrew words by their appearance in English. For instance, the likeness between El and Elyon is superficial, the letter "E" having to stand for both of two very different letters in the Hebrew alphabet. The word is derived from elah or alah, "to ascend". Elyon itself is translated 26 times by the following:--

> "uppermost" (Gen. xl. 7); "upper" (Josh. xvi. 5); "high" (Neh. iii. 25);
> "higher" (Psa. lxxxix. 27); "highest" (Psa. lxxxvii. 5); "on high" (Deut. xxviii. 1).

and 27 times by "most high".

Jah.—This title is considered to be a contraction of Jehovah. Its first occurrence is in Exod. xv. 2:--

> "The Lord (JAH) is my strength and my song, and He is become my salvation" (Exod. xv. 2).
> "Extol Him that rideth upon the heavens by His name JAH" (Psa. lxviii. 4).

The title recurs in verse 18, thereby revealing the glorious fact that it, too, belongs to the Lord Jesus Christ. The total number of occurrences is exactly 49, a number of significance, being seven times seven, thus denoting perfection and completeness.

There remain three titles, variants of the word meaning "Lord" or "Ruler".

Adon.—This word is used both of God and man. Sarah uses it of Abraham (Gen. xviii. 12); and Eleazar uses it of Abraham when he speaks of him as his "Master" (Gen. xxiv. 27). The first occurrence of the title is in Exod. xxiii. 17—"Adon Jehovah." Adonai (literally "My lords") is the plural form, and its first occurrence is found in Gen. xv. 2—"Adonai Jehovah."

We learn, then, that God, Who is spirit, Whom no man hath seen nor can see, has yet manifested Himself, so far as it is possible for the human mind to receive and apprehend, under these titles which we now assemble, and all of which reveal God in some one or more of His condescending Self-limitations; for it must ever be that God Himself is transcendently above every name.

As El, a name in the singular number, we have the idea of Almighty Power, in Whom are to be conceived all the attributes of the Godhead. As El Shaddai, this Omnipotence becomes the All-sufficiency of His people, carrying with it the pledge that He will accomplish all His purpose. As Eloah this almighty and all-bountiful God is in His holy temple, where we gaze upon Him as the supreme Object of all worship and all praise. The title El Elyon emphasizes His exaltation: He is the Most High, with Whom none can compare. Great was the influence upon Abraham of the two revelations of God's character, which His names El Shaddai and El Elyon enshrine (see Gen. xiv. 22 and Gen. xvii. 1).

The almighty One is also made known by the word Elohim, a plural noun that frequently takes a singular verb, warning us that we must not reason from the nature of man to the nature of God. This title associates God with creation, and by its derivation associates that creation with a mighty oath and purpose, and so glances at the rebellion of the anointed cherub before the creation of Adam (Ezek. xxviii.).

Jehovah is the name of God "for the age". In its import it spans all time, being composed of the parts of speech that indicate future, present and past. The Almighty God, Who is the Most High and All-sufficient, has entered into covenant relationships with His people, particularly in the matter of sin and death, and in these characters is closely associated with that sphere of His divine purpose which is covered by redemption. As redemption could only be accomplished by a "Kinsman", the title "Jehovah" belongs to the Lord Jesus, "God manifest in the flesh".

Jah indicates God in the accomplishment of His great purpose—"He is become my salvation"—while the close association of the title in Psa. lxviii. With the ascension of Christ emphasizes the fact that the work is indeed "finished".

This mighty God and covenant-keeping Lord is indeed Master and Owner, ruling in the affairs of men, and yet to be the acknowledged King of kings and Lord of lords.

With the glimmerings of truth that these studies bring, can we not say with truth: "O Lord, our Lord, how excellent is Thy name in all the earth."

As we gather up all these wondrous revelations of the God Who has made Himself known in the Scriptures, is it not an unspeakable mercy for any one of us to be able to say with unfeigned faith: "This God is our God."

#7. The immutability of God. "I change not" (Mal. iii. 6).

pp. 183 - 186

We have now passed in review the names of God, under which He has been pleased to reveal some of His wondrous ways and acts as well as His essential Being. It is our desire to avoid, wherever possible, the language of theology. Instead, therefore, of speaking of the essence and attributes of God, we use the terms "Being", "ways" and "acts", as being less formal and also scriptural. The term "Being" is justified by the title "I am" revealed to Moses, and by the statement of Heb. xi. 6: "He is." The outgoings of this glorious Being, known to us as El, Elohim and Jehovah, are spoken of as His "ways" and His "acts":--

> "He made known His ways unto Moses, His acts unto the children of Israel" (Psa. ciii. 7).

The Companion Bible gives the following note to this passage:-- > "Ways: i.e. the reasons of His acts (esoteric) to Moses. Acts: i.e. the acts (exoteric) visible to the people."

It is essential to a right understanding of our subject that we should not attempt to form a judgment of the character of God solely by His visible acts, for we shall discover that in His dealings with men there is of necessity an element of contingency:--

> "Draw nigh to God, and He will draw nigh to you" (James iv. 8).
> "With the merciful Thou wilt show Thyself merciful: with an upright man Thou wilt show Thyself upright: with the pure Thou wilt show Thyself pure: and with the froward Thou wilt show Thyself froward" (Psa. xviii. 25, 26).

Such are the "acts" of the Lord; but it would be misleading to attempt to construct His essential character from such information.

The thought underlying His "ways" is not so superficial; two opposite "acts" may spring from the same unseen "ways". An illustration will perhaps make this clear. Judged superficially, Paul's two acts regarding circumcision as recorded in Acts xv. 1, 2 with Gal. ii. 3, 14, and in Acts xvi. 1-3 with Gal. v. 3, would lead us to a very wrong conclusion about the character of that faithful servant of Christ. We can only rightly appraise both his actions and his character by learning what were the underlying "ways" that, meeting two different sets of circumstances, led to apparently contradictory lines of action. Our theme at the moment is the immutability of God, and we have only touched upon some of the ways in which He appears to change, so that this other aspect of the subject may not be forgotten or confused with our present line of study.

Underlying almost the whole scheme of revelation is the basic fact that the Lord changes not. If God could change, an element of uncertainty would enter into the whole fabric of the universe. His holiness and righteousness would be tarnished, His promises would become uncertain, and the gospel would lose its power. Christ may die and be raised again, but if God can change, all may be rendered null and void. Before, therefore, we attempt to speak of God's holiness, His righteousness, His power or His love, we must receive the assurance of the Word concerning His unchangeableness.

Were we attempting to write theological essays, we should speak of the necessary immutability of the Divine Essence, and show that we cannot speak of the possibility of change without introducing the idea of imperfection and the possibility of improvement. These matters, however, do not come within the scope of revelation. We cannot understand the Essence and Being of God considered absolutely; we must begin where He begins, in His relation with man, time and place. The words of Mal. iii. 6 are not written to reveal the Divine Essence; they are concerned with God's attitude towards His erring people with respect to His own purposes of grace:--

> "For I am the Lord, I change not: therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed" (Mal. iii. 6).

Parallel with this passage are the words of Rom. xi. 28, 29:--

> "As concerning the gospel, they are enemies for your sakes: but as touching the election, they are beloved for the fathers' sakes. For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance."

In this respect, God contrasts Himself with man:--

> "God is not a man, that He should lie; neither the son of man, that He should repent" (Numb. xxiii. 19).
> "The Strength of Israel will not lie nor repent; for He is not a man that He should repent" (I Sam. xv. 29).

The passage already quoted from Heb. vi. 17 speaks particularly of the "immutability of His counsel". This is seen in the many scriptures that speak of His unchanging word, His unalterable purpose, His "everlasting" love:--

> "The counsel of the Lord standeth for ever (to the age), the thoughts of His heart to all generations" (Psa. xxxiii. 11).

Speaking of the Lord as the Giver of all good gifts, James says:--

> "Do not err, my beloved brethren. Every good gift, and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with Whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning" (James i. 16, 17).

The unchanging Christ is the Rock upon which the whole of the epistle to the Hebrews is built:--

Heb. i. 10-12.—Creation itself will change and pass away, but "Thou remainest . . . . . Thou art the same".

Heb. ii.-xii.—Moses, angels, priests, sacrifices, kingdoms, tabernacles and covenant; all seen to be transient.

Heb. xii. 27 - xiii. 8.—"We receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved." "That those things which cannot be shaken may remain." "Jesus Christ the same."

If immutability be an attribute of Deity, we cannot but glory in the fact that it is here unreservedly accorded to the Lord our Saviour.

> "The Divine immutability, like the cloud which interposed between the Israelites and the Egyptian army, has a dark as well as a light side. It ensures the execution of His threatenings, as well as the performance of His promises; and destroys the hope which the guilty fondly cherish, that He will be all lenity to His frail and erring creatures, and that they will be much more lightly dealt with than the declarations of His own Word would lead us to expect. We oppose to these deceitful and presumptuous speculations the solemn truth that God is unchanging in veracity and purpose, in faithfulness and justice." (J. Dick).

"I change not." "This God is our God."

#8. The holiness of God.
"Thou art of purer eyes than to behold evil" (Hab. i. 13).
pp. 223 - 226

We have learned that God, Who is Spirit, has been manifested to us as light and love, and in the section headed "immutability", that He is light, where there is no variableness or shadow of turning. We now turn to another attribute of God that follows from the fact that He is light:--

> "God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all" (I John i. 5).

The holiness of God is such that there can be no possible countenance given to sin, impurity or iniquity in any form:--

> "Thou art of purer eyes than to behold evil, and canst not look upon iniquity" (Hab. i. 13).

Unregenerate man will, in self-justification, often lay claim to righteousness, good living or morality, but scarcely ever to holiness. Holiness, too, is so remote from earthly experience that the word scarcely enters into the vocabulary of everyday life. Such words as "right" and "wrong", "good" and "bad", "just" and "iniquitous", are the everyday language of commerce, but one would have to travel far to meet the stenographer who had used the word "holy" once in a year's correspondence. Holiness, above all things, belongs to God. It is this attribute that is ascribed with threefold emphasis by the Seraphim and Cherubim, night and day:--

> "And one cried to another and said, Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of hosts: the whole earth is full of His glory" (Isa. vi. 3).
> "And the four living ones had each six wings about him; and they were full of eyes within: and rest not day and night, saying, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come" (Rev. iv. 8).

Neither of angels nor men is it recorded that they ever cry of God, "Righteous, righteous, righteous", or, "Mighty, mighty, mighty". This triune ascription is reserved for the attribute of holiness.

How shall we estimate the nature of holiness? Perhaps if we discover the character of the man that shall "dwell in the holy place" or "stand in the holy place", we shall get some conception of its meaning:--

> "Who shall dwell in Thy holy hill? He that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart" (Psa. xv. 1, 2).

Walk, work and words, in righteousness and truth, manifested externally, and held "in his heart", give some idea of the comprehensive claims of holiness:--

> "Ha that backbiteth not with his tongue, nor doeth evil to his neighbour, nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbour" (Psa. xv. 3).

The three positive are followed by three negative requirements. Holiness requires that there be no slander, no evil deed, no entertainment of evil report:--

> "Who shall stand in His holy place? He that hath clean hands, and a pure heart; Who hath not lifted up his soul unto vanity, nor sworn deceitfully" (Psa. xxiv. 3, 4).

Anything impure, despicable or vile is intolerable to holiness. Holiness is the quintessence of all virtues, and without holiness almighty power might indicate a monster, and the wisdom of God, without holiness, might but indicate the mind of a devil, for there is a power, and there is a wisdom that is from beneath, that is earthly, sensual and devilish. But the moment we couple these attributes with holiness, they are the sublime prerogatives of God alone. Holiness is akin to beauty, for beauty cannot embrace ugliness any more than holiness can abide impurity.

Worship and praise must be offered to the Lord in the "beauty of holiness" (I Chron. xvi. 29; II Chron. xx. 21; Psa. xxix. 2; xcvi. 9). We read of no device on the crown of king David, but the mitre of the high priest was incomplete without the golden plate bearing the inscription, "Holiness unto the Lord" (Exod. xxviii. 36). God's ideal kingdom is a "kingdom of priests", and His ideal nation is "a holy nation" (Exod. xix. 6). Five times over do we read of the sanctifying of the people and the priests, because the Lord they served was holy. Their sanctification was set forth symbolically, and assists us further to understand what is implied in the ascription of holiness unto the Lord:--

> "Ye shall not make yourselves abominable with any creeping thing that creepeth, neither shall ye make yourselves unclean with them, that ye should be defiled thereby.

> For I am the Lord your God: ye shall therefore sanctify yourselves, and ye shall be holy; for I am holy" (Lev. xi. 43, 44).
> "I am the Lord that bringeth you up out of the land of Egypt, to be your God: ye shall therefore be holy, for I am holy" (Lev. xi. 45).
> "Speak unto all the congregation of the children of Israel, and say unto them: Ye shall be holy; for I the Lord your God am holy" (Lev. xix. 2).

Then follow laws regarding obedience to parents, observance of the sabbath, avoidance of idolatry, and great variety of commands dealing with ceremonials and morals, as far removed from one another in subject as seeking after wizards, and using false weights and measures (Lev. xix. 1-37). Lev. xx. 26 is set in a similar context, enjoining holiness and defining it by righteousness and purity of life, worship and walk:--

> "Ye shall therefore put a difference . . . . . ye shall be holy unto Me, for I the Lord am holy, and have severed you from other people, that ye should be Mine" (Lev. xx. 25, 26).

The theme is continued into Lev. xxi., where it deals with defilement by the dead, by the following of heathen customs, and by contracting marriage with any but a pure woman (Lev. xxi. 1-8).

The holiness of God is beyond the possibility of comparison:--

> "There is none holy as the Lord" (I Sam. ii. 2).
> "Who is like unto Thee, O Lord, among the gods? Who is like Thee, glorious in holiness?" (Exod. xv. 11).

God's throne is a throne of holiness (Psa. xlvii. 8). God's dwelling place is "His holy heaven" (Psa. xx. 6). His "habitation", "hill", "place", "mountain" and "city" are holy (Psa. lxviii. 5, iii. 4, xxiv. 3; Isa. lxv. 25; Rev. xi. 2). The "Scriptures", "promises", "covenant" and "law" are holy (Rom. i. 2; Psa. cv. 42; Luke i. 72; Rom. vii. 12).

It is because God is holy that sin could not be put away except by sacrifice. The only time that the Saviour used the title, "Holy Father", was in view of His great sacrifice (John xvii. 11). It is because God is holy that none can enter His presence except by the new and living Way consecrated for us through the veil. It is because God is holy that the shedding of blood is necessarily associated with the forgiveness of sins. When once we grasp the basic fact of the essential holiness of God, the slightest tendency on the part of any doctrine to associate Him with sin in any shape or form—however specious may be the arguments, however, it may appear to magnify His greatness and His almighty power, however it may appear to explain the problem of evil or to justify God with men—must be repudiated as coming from beneath and not from above, where "no darkness at all" is the great shining truth:--

> "For thus saith He that is high and lifted up, inhabiting futurity, and holy is His name: a high and holy place will I inhabit, also with the crushed and lowly in spirit" (Isa. lvii. 5, Rotherham's Version.).

"This God is our God."

The truth that makes free.

#1. "The truth shall make you free" (John viii. 32).
pp. 71 - 76

In the series of articles on "Sanctification" in Volumes XXI and XXII we had occasion to refer to the words of John xvii. 17: "Sanctify them through Thy truth; Thy word is truth." It was not there possible or desirable to depart from the theme in order to deal with the questions concerning the truth that these words raise, but the matter is important enough to merit a separate consideration; and we hope in the present series to consider what it is, where it is found, and what it accomplishes.

There are many who adopt Pilate's attitude, and ask, "What is truth?" without waiting for an answer. Let us examine the context of Pilate's question. The Saviour stands before him, and Pilate asks:--

> "Art Thou the King of the Jews? Jesus answered him, Sayest thou this of thyself, or did others tell it thee of Me? Pilate answered, Am I a Jew? Thine own nation and the chief priests have delivered Thee unto me. What hast Thou done? Jesus answered, My kingdom is not of this world: If My kingdom were of this world then would My servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews; but now is My kingdom not from hence. Pilate therefore said unto Him, Art Thou a King then? (or possibly, 'Thou art a King then'). Jesus answered, Thou sayest that I am a King. To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world that I should bear witness unto the truth. Every one that is of the truth heareth My voice. Pilate said unto Him, What is truth?" (John xviii. 33-38).

Much as we would rejoice to discern even in Pilate the beginnings of grace, we fear that his question was but the expression of a polite indifference characteristic of the philosophy of his generation. His words imply that there is no such actuality as truth and his action suits his words—for he does not wait for an answer. The words of the Lord, however, to those who are of the truth, tell us that truth is real and positive, and that in the Person and work of the Son of God we shall see its fullest manifestation and delineation. He came, as He told Pilate, to bear witness to the truth, and in John xvii. 17 He has left us without doubt that the "truth" and the "Scriptures" are synonymous:--

> "Sanctify them through Thy truth: Thy Word is truth" (John xvii. 17).
> "I have given them Thy Word" (John xvii. 14).
> "I have given unto them the words which Thou gavest Me" (John xvii. 8).

We do not propose to go over the ground already covered in other articles, or to consider at length the doctrine of the inspiration of all scripture; this doctrine is assumed in every article published in The Berean Expositor, and its repudiation would shatter the whole fabric of our testimony. We simply draw attention to the fact that the Lord put forward no philosophy as to "truth", but declared that it was resident in the "Word" and "words" of God and embodied in His own life and witness. This is solid ground in a world of shifting sand. Truth is real; truth comes from God; and truth has been expressed.

Another important principle with reference to the truth is the imperative necessity for its "right division" (II Tim. ii. 15). This, too, is so fundamental to all our witness, and its application so evident in every issue, that we do not propose to deal with the matter here.

Accepting, then, the Scriptures as the vehicle of truth, and their right division as a necessity, we propose in this series to occupy the reader's attention with some of the applications and implications of the truth. We find our opening theme in the words of John viii. 32:--

> "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

It would take us too far afield to set before the reader in any detail the section of John's Gospel of which this verse forms a part. We will give the barest possible indications so that some benefit may be received by the realization of the wider context of the passage.

John vii. 11 - viii. 59 records a series of arguments with the Jewish leaders at the feast of tabernacles. They are divided for us by the Holy Spirit in five different places where we read of the failure of the Lord's enemies to apprehend Him. As these are key-passages we quote them below:--

(1) "Then the Jews sought Him . . . . . no man spoke openly of Him" (John vii. 11-13).
(2) "Then they sought to take Him: but no man laid hands on Him, because His hour was not yet come" (John vii. 30).
(3) "And some of them would have taken Him: but no man laid hands on Him" (John vii. 44).
(4) "And no man laid hands on Him, for His hour was not yet come" (John viii. 20).
(5) "Then took they up stones to cast at Him, but Jesus hid Himself, and went out of the temple, going through the midst of them, and so passed by" (John viii. 59).

The reader will find food for thought and much profit in carefully comparing the teaching of the intervening sections. This, however, is outside the scope of our present enquiry. Our immediate concern is with the section between the citations from John viii. 20 and viii. 59. If at some subsequent time we take up the study of John's Gospel, we shall naturally devote more space to the analysis of these passages, but for our present purpose, the following will suffice:--

John viii. 20-59.

A | 20. No man laid hold on Him.
B | 21-24. | a | I AM from above.
b | Ye shall die in your sins.
C | 25, 26. CHRIST THE TRUTH.
c | I said (laleo).
d | From the beginning.
e | He that sent Me is true.
D | 26-28. | f | I speak (laleo).
g | Do nothing of Myself.
E | 28, 29. | h | I speak (laleo).
i | The Father with Me (meta).
F | 30-37. | j | He spake (laleo).
k | The truth shall make you free.
E | 38, 39. | h | I speak (laleo).
i | With my Father (para).
D | 40, 41. | f | I told (laleo).
g | Ye do the deeds of your Father.
C | 42-50. DEVIL THE LIAR.
c | He speaketh (laleo).
d | From the beginning.
e | He sent Me.
B | 51-58. | b | Never see death.
a | Before Abraham was I AM.
A | 59. They took up stones to stone Him . . . . . He passed by.

It is impossible to survey the structure of this section without realizing that "truth" for the believer can never be a philosophical abstraction. It is intensely real, and intimately associated with the Person and work of the Son of God, even as the "lie" is closely linked with the person and work of the Devil. Truth goes back to the "beginning" of things. It involves the recognition of God as God, a truth which the lie, and all that pertains to it, denies.

In the beginning Satan, at that time the Anointed Cherub, attempted to usurp the throne of Deity. This constituted him a liar, and this character will again be manifested when the son of perdition attempts the same blasphemous act. In II Thess. ii. "the love of the truth" is placed in contrast with "the belief of the lie"; and in Rom. i. the lie is almost synonymous with idolatry:--

> "They . . . . . changed the glory of the uncorruptible God into am image . . . . ." (Rom. i. 23).
> "They changed the truth of God into a lie" (Rom. i. 25).

Referring once more to the structure of John viii. 20-59, we observe that the passage which contains the statement, "The truth shall make you free", occupies a position at the centre of the section, so that it cannot be understood apart from the whole scope of the context. It is impossible to be free, without the knowledge of the truth so vividly set forth in this passage. Satan's bondage will never be relinquished while any error is entertained concerning his character in opposition to God and His truth. Only as we realize the clear-cut distinction between "the authority of darkness" and "the kingdom of His dear Son" can we realize the liberty of the children of God.

In John viii. 32 and 36 "the truth" and "the Son" are placed in correspondence:--

> "The truth shall make you free."
> "If The Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed."

In the passage before us it is three times stated that Christ was the Sent One:--

> "He that sent Me is true, and I speak to the world those things which I have heard of Him" (John viii. 26).
> "He that sent Me is with Me: the Father hath not left Me alone: for I do always those things which please Him" (John viii. 29).
> "If God were your Father, ye would love Me: for I proceeded forth and came from God; neither came I of Myself, but He sent Me" (John viii. 42).

These are three references in the section before us, but in the Gospel itself the fact that Christ was "sent" is stated more than forty times, and associated with that sending are many precious doctrines, all calculated to make the believer free. As examples, we may take two of these:--

> Immunity from condemnation and the gift of eternal life (John iii. 16, 17; v. 24; xvii. 3).
> An assurance that the doctrine enunciated is absolutely true (John vii. 16).

The special freedom that is in view in John viii. is freedom from the bondage of sin:-

> "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Whosoever committeth sin is the slave of sin" (John viii. 34).
> "If ye believe not that I am He, ye shall die in your sins" (John viii. 24).
> "Verily, verily, I say unto you, If a man keep My saying, He shall never see death" (John viii. 51).

This last clause, when repeated by the Jews, becomes "never taste of death". This change is not necessarily a perversion, but shows how the Lord's words were regarded by the Jews. "Seeing death" and "tasting death" differ from "dying in sin". For the believer, the sting of death is removed, and he is delivered from the fear of death that once held so many in bondage (Heb. ii. 15).

While it may be true that the believer's deliverance is entirely the result of the finished work of Christ, and does not depend upon the quality of his faith, or the purity of his creed, yet experimentally he can never enter into this freedom apart from the truth, and the truth must be "known".

> "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free" (John viii. 32).

Such would be "disciples indeed" and "free indeed". All around us are men and women whose sins have been atoned for, who are nevertheless in serious bondage. There is one means whereby they can be set free; they must "know the truth". It may be that many of our readers could be used in this liberating ministry. Here, then, is instruction for us all:--

> "The servant of the Lord must not strive: but be gentle unto all men, apt to teach, patient, in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves: if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the TRUTH; and they may recover themselves out of the SNARE OF THE DEVIL, who are taken captive by him at his will" (II Tim. ii. 24-26).

#2. Deliverance from the snare of the Devil (II Tim. ii. 24-26).
pp. 112 - 115

Our previous article dealt with the statement of the Lord: "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free." We concluded with a quotation from II Tim. ii. 24-26, a passage which we must now consider more carefully.

It is concerned with those who are "approved concerning the truth", even as II Tim. iii. 1-9 is concerned with the corresponding member: "disapproved concerning the faith." The passage is divided into three sections:--

(i.) The workman and the truth (14, 15).
(ii.) Error and the truth (16-23).
(iii.) The servant and the truth (24-26).

Our subject in this article is the third of these sections, as it deals with the practical application at the present day of the words of the Lord: "The truth shall make you free." II Tim. ii. 24-26 not only reveals the liberating power of the truth, but it gives a very clear indication that the character of the one presenting the truth is a consideration not to be lightly set aside. It shews, moreover, the binding power of error, Satan's chief means of enslaving the child of God.

The instruments in the delivery of the Devil's captive are two: the servant of the Lord, and the acknowledging of the truth. The word "servant" is literally "bond-slave". The servant of the Lord was once himself in the snare of sin, but has been set free, bought with a price, and is now owned by a gracious Master. He does not approach the captive as would an angel from glory who had never known sin or bondage, but as one who has himself received mercy. There are several characteristics essential to the success of the servant's mission.

In the first place, he must not strive. A reference to verses 14 and 23 of the same chapter will show the nature of the striving that the servant of the Lord must avoid:--

"Charging them before the Lord, that they strive not about words to no profit, but to the subverting of the hearers."

"Foolish and unlearned questions avoid, knowing that they do gender strifes. And the servant of the Lord must not strive."

The word "unlearned" is the negative form of the word "instructing" in verse 25. There are questions that minister grace to the hearer, but there are also questions that gender strife—such are unlearned, not encouraging growth and understanding. The Scripture is plain concerning such questions, its words are, "avoid" and "must not". The servant of the Lord must be willing to be misunderstood because of silence rather than to achieve a passing reputation for cleverness. We are His servants; we seek His glory, and the liberation of our fellows, and no pains are too great with such a goal in view.

The exhortation not to strive is negative; the apostle goes on to speak of the positive qualities which are necessary. He must be gentle unto all; he must be apt to teach; he must be patient; and he must instruct with meekness those that oppose themselves. Such qualifications are not to be found in the old nature; they are the product of grace.

The word here translated "patient" is anexikakon, from anechomai = "to bear", and kakos = "evil". Anechomai occurs in I Cor. iv. 12: "Being persecuted, we suffer it." It is not our purpose to criticize the teaching or actions of other servants of God, but for the truth's sake we must say that such a word compels us to "avoid" the teaching of those who, in the name of "overcoming", adopt an attitude which is the very reverse of a patient endurance of evil. There is a scriptural "undergoing" as well as a scriptural "overcoming" and, whatever views we entertain, the Scripture here is clear, that if we would be used to liberate others, we must be gentle, we must be meek and we must be ready to suffer evil.

We next observe from the words of the apostle the one great power for setting the captive free: "apt to teach"; "in meekness instructing"; "repentance to the acknowledging of the truth". Those who minister in the sphere of the kingdom, who are among those who must preach the gospel of the kingdom for a witness among all nations, will meet circumstances comparable to those of the Gospels and the Acts. Such will encounter evident demon possession, and must act appropriately. To such we have no word to say, but to those who minister the truth of the dispensation of the mystery, we ask if there is a single reference to demon possession or to the casting out of demons in the whole of Paul's prison ministry. We certainly read of demons in I Tim. iv., but not of demon possession. What is stated there is entirely in harmony with the teaching of II Tim. ii. 24-26:--

"Giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of demons" (I Tim. iv. 1).

Those who "believe and know the truth" (I Tim. iv. 3) are proof against such demonism. No allusion is made to the casting out of demons; it is simply an application of the Lord's words: "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

We have made investigation, and have many times asked the following questions of those who have been associated with the casting out of demons, or with those who have been apparently demon-possessed:--

> Have you ever found one instance of a case of demon-possession unaccompanied by a failure rightly to divide the Word of truth?
> Have you ever found a case of demon-possession where there has been a clear appreciation of the revelation of the mystery?

We have never received an affirmative answer to either of these questions.

While error is entertained Satan has power to bind, but with the advent and acknowledgment of the truth, his captivity ceases. So we search II Tim. ii. 24-26 in vain for instruction concerning the exorcising of evil spirits. What we find is instruction as to how we must apply the one infallible remedy—"the truth". So in verse 25 we read of "repentance to the acknowledging of the truth". Repentance involves "a change of mind" (metanoia) and a change of mind that acknowledges the truth is all that is necessary:--

> "That he may wake up out of the snare of the Devil" (II Tim. ii. 26).

The snare of the Devil is undispensational truth; and there are many children of God ensnared by the wrong application of Scripture. The members of the Galatian church were enslaved and ensnared by those who came down from Jerusalem with "chapter and verse" to prove that unless they were circumcised and kept the law of Moses they were not in covenant relationship with God. This was truth out of place, truth belonging to the dispensation of law, misapplied and so used of the Devil to enslave the Galatians.

Paul, by his noble stand, cast out this demon—"that the truth of the gospel might continue" (Gal. ii.); and we must follow his example.

Satan's abuse of Scripture is seen in II Cor. iii. and iv. II Cor. iii. places together the old and new covenants, and by comparison, the glory of the one is as nothing in the light of the excelling glory of the other. The symbol of the old covenant is the veiled face of Moses (II Cor. iii. 13); the symbol of the new is the unveiled face of Christ (II Cor. iv. 6). The figure of the veil is continued in the words of II Cor. iv. 3, 4, which we translate as follows:--

> "But if our gospel be veiled, it is veiled by those things that are perishing (i.e., the old covenant that is 'done away" and 'abolished'—II Cor. iii. 7, 11, 13), by which the god of this age hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, Who is the image of God, should shine unto them . . . . . For God, Who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (II Cor. iv. 3-6).

Liberty comes with "the light of the knowledge" of the truth for the time. So with ourselves; our most effective method of liberation is to "preach the Word", for the Word of truth and the Spirit of truth agree, and "where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty" (II Cor. iii. 17).

We return now to II Tim. ii. 26: "Taken captive by him at his will." It is beyond our power to decide whether the words "at his will" refer to Satan or to God. The Companion Bible takes the view that they refer to God; commentators are about evenly divided. While we must still seek the truth of the passage, the ultimate interpretation of this clause leaves untouched the practical instruction already considered.

What is clear, and important to us, is the great fact that error enslaves and truth sets free, and that the Devil's chief instrument of bondage to-day is that of undispensational truth. As we grow in grace and knowledge, we step out into fuller freedom; as we entertain error, we become entangled in bondage. Let us once again state the wonderful words of the Lord: "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

#3. "The truth of the gospel" (Gal. ii. 5 and 14).

pp. 153 - 157

In the two preceding articles the close association of the truth with liberty, and of error with bondage is too evident to need further elaboration. However, the importance of the theme is such that it finds a further exposition in the epistle to the Galatians—that epistle of liberty. That Galatians is pre-eminently an epistle of liberty the following references will sufficiently show, and if this is so, we shall readily perceive that other doctrines enumerated in the epistle will necessarily constitute factors in all that goes towards effecting that blessed liberty. Of these doctrines, the truth of the gospel will have a place as we have already seen.

We give below every passage in Galatians in which the words indicative of bondage and liberty appear (doulos, douleia, douleuo, douloo, katadouloo, eleutheria, eleutheros and eleutheroo). While, for the present article, such a list is in the nature of a supplement, the theme is by no means of secondary interest, and should be studied for its own sake.

Bondage and liberty in Galatians.

"If I yet pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ" (i. 10).

"False brethren . . . . . who came in privily to spy out our liberty which we have in Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage" (ii. 4).

"There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus" (iii. 28).

"Now I say that the heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be lord of all" (iv. 1).

"Even so we, when we were children, were in bondage under the elements of the world" (iv. 3).

> "Thou art no more a servant, but a son" (iv. 7).
> "When ye knew not God, ye did service unto them which by nature are no gods" (iv. 8).
> "How turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage?" (iv. 9).
>
> "Abraham had two sons, the one by a bondmaid, the other by a freewoman. But he who was of the bondwoman, was born after the flesh; but he of the freewoman was by promise. Which things are an allegory: for these are the two covenants; the one from mount Sinai which gendereth to bondage, which is Agar. For this Agar is mount Sinai in Arabia, and answereth to Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children. But Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all" (iv. 22-26).
> "What saith the scripture? Cast out the bondwoman and her son: for the son of the bondwoman shall not be heir with the son of the freewoman. So then, brethren, we are not children of the bondwoman, but of the free. Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage" (iv. 30 - v. 1).
> "Brethren, ye have been called unto liberty: only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve (as bondslaves) one another" (v. 13).

Here is a wealth of teaching to which we may have to return, but for the moment we are still considering the relation for the truth of the gospel with liberty. The passages that call for attention are as follows:--

> "To whom we gave place by subjection, no not for an hour; that the truth of the gospel might continue with you" (Gal. ii. 5).
> "When I saw that they walked not uprightly according to the truth of the gospel, I said unto Peter before them all, If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of the Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?" (Gal. ii. 14).

Quite apart from their contexts, the citation of these verses is enough to indicate that here is recorded a conflict for the truth. But in order to understand the nature of that conflict, the one, yet glorious, stand of the apostle, the close association of our liberty with the recognition of his distinctive apostleship and gospel, and the triumph of the truth over error and its bondage, we must see these two passages in their place in the chapter. In other words, we must ascertain the scope of the section, and that we discover most surely by laying bare its literary structure. And here we would say that we feel it to be of service to our readers to draw attention to the fact that the following structure, which is based upon a careful evaluation of all the literary correspondences of the passage, is not found in any other publications than those associated with The Berean Expositor.

Gal. ii. 1-14.

A | 1, 2. | a | Paul goes to Jerusalem; for the faith.
b | Barnabas stands fast.
B | 3-5. | c | Titus not compelled to be circumcised.
d | Paul's stand for THE TRUTH OF THE GOSPEL.
C | 6-10. | e | Seemed to be somewhat.
f | Added nothing to me.
g | Gospel to Circumcision.—PETER.
g | Gospel to Uncircumcision.—PAUL.
e | Seemed to be pillars.
f | Remember the poor.
A | 11-13. | a | Peter comes to Antioch; overthrow faith.
b | Even Barnabas carried away.
B | 14. | d | Peter's walk; against THE TRUTH OF THE GOSPEL.
c | Compelled Gentiles to Judaize.

The opening verses of chapter ii. tell of a visit which the apostle paid to Jerusalem, accompanied by Barnabas and Titus, when he laid before the Church at Jerusalem "that gospel which he preached among the Gentiles", the case being crystallized for us in the account of the treatment of Titus:--

> "But neither Titus, who was with me being a GREEK, was compelled to be circumcised" (Gal. ii. 3).

This is in direct contrast with the subsequent defection of Peter who by his conduct was compelling the Gentiles to Judaize (ii. 14). Paul's stand for the truth thus set forth in Titus' immunity from the law was in contrast with Peter's walk which was not according to the truth of the gospel, but would put the believer under law. The truth of the gospel is the truth that declares every believer in Christ free from the law, whether the ceremonial law, as imparting special sanctity, or the code of works, providing a righteousness before God. It needs an exposition of the epistle to exhibit in any measure of fullness this blessed liberty, and this we hope to give in due time. The background provided by Acts xv. will, however, make manifest something of the nature of that truth of the gospel which makes the believer free.

A door of faith had been opened to the Gentiles through the ministry of the apostle Paul (Acts xiv. 27). Yet many of the saints at Jerusalem, instead of rejoicing in the spread of the truth, seem to have opposed it and sought to load the gospel of grace with obsolete laws and ceremonies:--

> "And certain men, which came down from Judæa, taught the brethren, and said, Except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses, YE CANNOT BE SAVED" (Acts xv. 1).

This cause great searching of heart among the newly-converted Gentiles, and much dissension and disputation among the leaders, with the result that Paul and Barnabas are led to go to Jerusalem to settle the matter, the inner history of the visit being given in Gal. ii.

The truth of the gospel was intimately associated with the absolute freedom of the believer from the law:--

> "I through the law am dead to the law, that I might live unto God" (Gal. ii. 19).
> "He that is dead is freed from sin" (Rom. vi. 7).
> "A man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ" (Gal. ii. 16).
> "If righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain" (Gal. ii. 21).

At that memorable conference at Jerusalem Peter recognized the "truth of the gospel", for he said:--

> "Now therefore why tempt ye God, to put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples, which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear?" (Acts xv. 10).

Yet this same Peter is an example to us all of the warning that the "fear of man bringeth a snare", for > "Before that certain came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles: but when they were come, he withdrew and separated himself, fearing them which were of the circumcision" (Gal. ii. 12).

The apostle realized that the tendency of the Jewish section of the church was toward bondage (Gal. ii. 4), and against this he stood with all the strength that God gave, so that the truth of the gospel, and the freedom that that gospel brings, might continue, unalloyed, right through to the Gentiles. While it is true that the doctrine of Galatians is as true for us to-day as then, dispensational associations have radically changed since the epistle was written. Some, not realizing this, have questioned our consistency in quoting Galatians, but we are not here attempting either to correct their misapprehension or to justify ourselves.

As our present purpose is to present a series of brief studies that revolve around the fact that it is the truth that makes free, we are not pursuing the subject beyond the point necessary to establish that one feature. We cannot, then, do better than finish the article with the apostle's own words—words which couple the liberty found in the gospel with the bondage of any other approach to acceptance with God:--

> "Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage. Behold, I Paul say unto you, that if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing. For I testify again to every man that is circumcised, that he is a debtor to do the whole law. Christ is become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law; ye are fallen by grace" (Gal. v. 1-4).

#4. The veil that keeps in bondage (II Cor. iv. 3, 4).
pp. 190 - 193

We have now made three brief studies of the subject that it is the truth that makes free. We now turn attention to a passage which discloses still further the methods of the god of this age in his attempts to enslave and ensnare the child of God:--

> "Therefore seeing we have this ministry, as we have received mercy, we faint not: but have renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, not walking in craftiness, nor handling the word of God deceitfully: but by manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God" (II Cor. iv. 1, 2).

The stress here is not upon preaching the truth, but upon the manifestation of the truth; something in contrast to the "hidden things of dishonesty" and the veiling of the truth from the eyes. To appreciate fully the apostle's attitude it is necessary to take a wider view than can be obtained by limiting ourselves to verses 1 and 2 of this fourth chapter.

Chapter iii. is largely occupied with a series of comparisons which are intended to show the superiority of the New Covenant over the Old. This can be seen by the following structure taken from The Companion Bible, p. 1731:--

II Corinthians iii. 7-11.

A1 | 7. The OLD COVENANT came with glory, but Israel could not look upon it.
B1 | 8. The NEW COVENANT also comes with glory.
A2 | 9. The OLD COVENANT, which brought condemnation, came with glory.
B2 | 9. The NEW COVENANT, which ministers righteousness, exceeds it in glory.
A3 | 10. The OLD COVENANT had no glory in inflicting death.
B3 | 10. The NEW COVENANT has surpassing glory in giving life.
A4 | 11. The OLD COVENANT, which is annulled, was with glory.
B4 | 11. The NEW COVENANT, which abides, will abide in glory.

When the subject of II Corinthians is before us as a whole, certain adjustments and modifications in the above structure may be necessary. For our present purpose, however, it will be sufficient to state the teaching that was in the apostle's mind when he spoke of the "manifestation" of the truth. Manifesting the truth, or "speaking plainly", is in contrast with "veiling" the truth, as symbolized by the veiling of the face of Moses and the veiling of the heart of Israel.

Had we had no preparation, we should have expected II Cor. iii. 17 to have placed illumination in contrast with the veil, but, instead, the apostle uses the word liberty, for the veil will be seen to be error fabricated out of the truth that belongs to the Old Covenant, and so, now, undispensational, while the removal of the veil is equivalent to that freedom wherewith the truth makes free: "and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty."

Following the quotation with which this article opens, are words that, if we would preserve the truth, need most careful treatment. We first of all quote from the A.V.:--

> "But if our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost: in whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, Who is the image of God, should shine unto them" (II Cor. iv. 3, 4).

It is somewhat difficult to analyze this passage as given by the A.V. That the god of this world blinds the minds of them that believe not, of this we are certain, and that he uses such further to hinder the spread of truth is equally certain; but precisely what is meant by the words: "In whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not"?

The preposition en often has the meaning "by". If the A.V. had translated en "in" in every instance, we should have, in Matt. v. 34, 35: "sware not . . . . . neither in heaven . . . . . nor in earth." To limit ourselves to II Corinthians, we point out that en is used in i. 12, where it is translated, "with fleshly wisdom" and "by the grace of God", and in vi. 4-7 it occurs nineteen times, and is translated eight times "by" instead of "in".

There can be no question that in II Cor. x. 12 en is rightly translated "by"—there is no sense in saying "measuring themselves in themselves". Verse 15 is another example against which there is a marginal note in the A.V. Now we believe en in II Cor. iv. 4 should be translated "by":--

> "By whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not."

We must now look back to verse 3. The word "hid" is the verbal form of the word "veil", which figures so largely in chapter iii. So far as the apostle was concerned, he had used great plainness of speech, and by manifestation of the truth had done the very opposite of emulating Moses. Yet he had to admit that the glorious truth of the gospel did appear to be veiled from some. What caused the veil? Who made it, and with what intent?

In speaking in II Cor. iii. of the fact that the Old Covenant was obsolete and finished, the apostle used strong terms. Not only did he speak of this Covenant as "the letter that killeth", as "the ministration of death", and as "the ministration of condemnation", but he also said that it had no glory when placed beside the excelling glory of the New Covenant, and that it was to be "done away" and "abolished". The word thus rendered is elsewhere used to speak of the "destruction" of the Devil (Heb. ii. 14) and of death (II Tim. i. 10), and of the breaking down of the middle wall of partition (Eph. ii. 15). Our last article of this series closed with the words of Paul in Gal. v. 1-4, where the words, "Christ is become of no effect", translate this same strong term.

With this in mind, we return to II Cor. iv. 3 and once more look at the phrase: "it is hid to them that are lost." If we are correct in opening verse 4 with the words "by whom", it is possible that the words of verse 3 refer to the perishing and abrogated law, rather than to lost sinners, and this is what we understand the apostle to be teaching here.

He says, in effect, that while because of sin, condemnation, and the failure of the flesh, the Old Covenant is associated with veiling the truth, the New Covenant is associated with an "unveiled face", for the believer (II Cor. iii. 11), and "the face of Jesus Christ" (II Cor. iv. 6). Satan, however, the god of this age, is busy fabricating a veil out of the obsolete and abrogated law, so that the believer shall be so occupied with shadows and types, forms and ceremonies, and the attempt to help his salvation by a modicum of law-keeping, that he shall not see "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ", and that he shall not see the "light of the gospel of the glory of Christ", for if "with unveiled face" he once saw that, he would be changed "from glory to glory", that is, from the fading glory of the law to the excelling glory of the New Covenant, even as by the spirit of the Lord, and where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty. We accordingly submit the following translation to the prayerful consideration of the reader:--

> "But if our gospel be veiled, it is veiled by those things which are perishing, by which the god of this age hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest . . . . ."

Members of the body of Christ, who are blessed under the terms of Eph. i. 3-14, have no connection with the New Covenant. But the truth of the underlying principle of this passage is as true for them as for all others. The god of this age is still busy making veils. He uses the Acts of the Apostles, the New Covenant itself, and the dispensational portions of Paul's early epistles, to blind the minds of the believer to the glory that excelleth in the revelation of the mystery. In Eph. i. 15-19 the apostle assumes that "the eyes of the heart are enlightened" before he can go forward and speak of the calling and the riches of glory. We earnestly plead with every reader to see to it that no veil, made out of truth pertaining to earlier dispensations, be allowed to come between the eyes of his heart and the glory that belongs to the ascended Lord, Who has ascended up far above all heavens.

Once again we see it is the truth that makes free. Let us remember the association of the following passages:--

> "Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty" (II Cor. iii. 17).
> "By manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God" (II Cor. iv. 2).

#19. How the O.T. is quoted in the N.T.
pp. 47 - 60

It is evident, from the review we have given of the quotations from the O.T. that are found in the New, that not only will it be profitable to give careful attention to exact parallels, and to departures either from the Hebrew, the LXX or from both, but also that other features associated with the quoting of O.T. Scriptures are likely to be helpful to the interested student.

Rosenmuller has reduced the quotations of the O.T. in the New to the following heads:--

I. When the thing predicted is literally accomplished.
II. When that is done, of which the Scripture has spoken, not in a literal, but in a spiritual sense.
III. When a thing is done, neither in a literal nor in a spiritual sense, according to the fact referred to in the Scriptures; but is similar to that fact. The passages thus cited, may briefly be termed quotations in the way of illustration.
IV. When the sacred writers have made simple allusions to passages in the Old Testament.

Under the first heading come those direct prophecies that relate to the Person, work, life and death of the Lord Jesus. The following table (Nos. 1 to 19) of the principal prophecies, with their accomplishment, in the very words of the New Testament, has been taken from Horne's "Introduction to the Holy Scriptures".

(1) That a Messiah should come.

Prophecy.—Gen. iii. 15. He (the seed of the woman) shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel. Compare Gen. xxii. 18; xii. 3; xxvi. 4; xxviii. 4; and Psa. lxxii. 17. Isa. xl. 5. The glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together. Hag. ii. 7. The desire of all nations shall come.

Fulfilment.—Gal. iv. 4. When the fullness of time was come, God sent forth His Son, made of a woman (4,000 years after the first prophecy was delivered). Rom. xvi. 20. The God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly. I John iii. 8. The Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil (that old serpent, Rev. xii. 9). See also Heb. ii. 14. Luke ii. 10. I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people.

(2) When He should come.

Prophecy.—Gen. xlix. 10. The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a law-giver from between his feet, until Shiloh come.—The Messiah was to come at a time of nearly universal peace, and when there was a general expectation of Him; and while the second temple was standing, seventy weeks (of years, i.e., 490 years) after the rebuilding of Jerusalem. See Hag. ii. 6-9; Dan. ix. 24, 25; Mal. iii. 1.

Fulfilment.—When the Messiah came, the sceptre had departed from Judah; for the Jews, though governed by their own rulers and magistrates, yet were subject to the paramount authority of the Roman emperors; as was evinced by their being subject to the enrolment of Augustus, paying tribute to Cæsar, and not having the power of life and death. Compare Luke ii. 1, 3-5; Matt. xxii. 20, 21; and the parallel passages; and John xviii. 31. When Jesus Christ came into the world, the Roman wars were terminated, the temple of Janus was shut, and peace reigned throughout the Roman empire; and all nations, both Jews and Gentiles, were expecting the coming of some extraordinary person. See Matt. ii. 1-10; Mark xv. 43; Luke ii. 25, 38; and John i. 19-45, for the expectation of the Jews. The two Roman historians, Suetonius and Tacitus, confirm the fulfillment of the prediction, as to the expectation of the Gentiles.

(3) That the Messiah should be God and man together.

Prophecy.—Psa. ii. 7. Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee.—Psa. cx. 1. The Lord said unto my Lord. Isa. ix. 6. The mighty God, the everlasting Father. Mic. v. 2. Whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting.

Fulfilment.—Heb. i. 8. Unto the Son he saith, thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever. Compare Matt. xxii. 42-45; I Cor. xv. 25; Heb. i. 3. Matt. i. 23. They shall call His name Emmanuel, that is, God with us. John i. 1, 14. The Word was with God, and the Word was God. The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us. Rom. ix. 5. Of whom (the fathers) as concerning the flesh Christ came, Who is God over all, blessed for ever. See also Col. ii. 9; I John v. 20.

(4) From whom He was to be descended.

Prophecy.—From the first woman (Gen. iii. 15). From Abraham and his descendants (Gen. xii. 3, xvii. 18); viz., Isaac (Gen. xxvi. 4); Jacob (Gen. xxvii. 14); Judah (Gen. xlix. 10); Jesse (Isa. xi. 1); David (Psa. cxxxii. 11; lxxxix. 4, 27; Isa. ix. 7; Jer. xxiii. 5; xxxiii. 15).

Fulfilment.—Gal. iv. 4. When the fullness of time was come, God sent forth His Son, made of a woman.

Acts iii. 25. The covenant, which God made with out fathers, saying unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all nations of the earth be blessed. (See Matt. i. 1). Heb. vii. 14. It is evident that our Lord sprang out of Judah. Rom. xv. 12. Isaiah saith there shall be a root of Jesse. John vii. 42. Hath not the Scripture said, that Christ cometh of the seed of David? See also Acts ii. 30; xiii. 23; Luke i. 32.

(5) That the Messiah should be born of a virgin.

Prophecy.—Isa. vii. 14. Behold a virgin shall conceive and bring forth a Son. Jer. xxxi. 22. The Lord hath created a new thing on the earth; a woman shall compass a man. (N.B. The ancient Jews applied this prophecy to the Messiah, whence it follows, that the later interpretations to the contrary are only to avoid the truth which we profess; viz., That Jesus was born of a virgin, and therefore is THE CHRIST or Messiah.—Bishop Pearson on the Creed, Art. III, p.171, edit. 1715, folio).

Fulfilment.—Matt. i. 24, 25. Joseph took his wife, and knew her not, till she had brought forth her first-born son. Compare Luke i. 26-35. Matt. i. 22, 23. All this was done, that it might be fulfilled, which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying, Behold a virgin shall be with child and shall bring forth a son.

(6) Where the Messiah was to be born.

Prophecy.—Mic. v. 2. Thou Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah; yet out of thee shall He come forth unto Me that is to be the ruler in Israel.

Fulfilment.—Luke ii. 3-6. All went to be taxed (or enrolled), every one into his own city. And Joseph also went up from Galilee, with Mary his espoused wife, unto Bethlehem; and while they were there she brought forth her first-born son. Compare also Luke ii. 10, 11, 16 and Matt. ii. 1, 4-6, 8, 11; John vii. 42.

(7) That a prophet, in the spirit and power of Elias, or Elijah, should be the Messiah's forerunner, and prepare His way.

Prophecy.—Mal. iii. 1 and iv. 5; Isa. xl. 3; Luke i. 17. Behold, I will send My messenger, and he shall prepare My way before Me.

Fulfilment.—Matt. iii. 1. In those days came John the Baptist preaching in the wilderness of Judæa, saying, Repent ye, the kingdom of heaven is at hand. Matt. xi. 14; Luke vii. 27, 28. This is Elias which was for to come.

(8) That the Messiah was to be a Prophet.

Prophecy.—Deut. xviii. 15, 18. I will raise them up a Prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee.

Fulfilment.—John iv. 19. The woman saith unto Him, Sir, I perceive that Thou art a Prophet. John ix. 17. He is a Prophet. Matt. xxi. 46. They took Him for a Prophet. Mark vi. 15. It is a Prophet, or as one of the Prophets. Luke vii. 16. A great Prophet is risen up among us. John vi. 14. This is of a truth that Prophet, which should come into the world. John vii. 40. Of a truth this is the Prophet. Luke xxiv. 19. Jesus of Nazareth, which was a Prophet, mighty in deed and word before God and all the people. Matt. xxi. 11. This is Jesus the Prophet of Nazareth of Galilee.

(9) That the Messiah should begin to publish the Gospel in Galilee.

Prophecy.—Isa. ix. 1, 2. In Galilee of the nations, the people that walked in darkness have seen a great light.

Fulfilment.—Matt. iv. 12, 17. Now when Jesus heard that John was cast into prison, He departed into Galilee. From that time Jesus began to preach and to say, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.

(10) That the Messiah should confirm His doctrine by great miracles.

Prophecy.—Isa. xxxv. 5, 6. Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped; then shall the lame man leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing. Isa. xlii. 7. To open the blind eyes. Isa. xxxii. 3. The eyes of them that see shall not be dim; and the ears of them that hear, shall hearken. Isa. xxix. 18. The deaf shall hear the words of the book; and the eyes of the blind shall see out of obscurity and darkness.

Fulfilment.—Matt. xi. 4, 5. Jesus . . . . . said, go, and show John those things which ye do hear and see: the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk; the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up. Luke vii. 21. In the same hour, He cured many of their infirmities and plagues, and of evil spirits; and unto many that were blind, He gave sight. Matt. iv. 23, 24. Jesus went about all Galilee . . . . . healing all manner of sickness, and all manner of disease among the people . . . . . They brought unto Him all sick people that were taken with divers diseases and torments, and those which were possessed with devils, and those which were lunatic, and those which had the palsy, and He healed them. Matt. xv. 30, 31. And great multitudes came unto Him, having with them those that were lame, blind, dumb, maimed, and many others; and cast them down at Jesus' feet, and He healed them. Insomuch that the multitude wondered, when they saw the dumb to speak, the maimed to be whole, the lame to walk, and the blind to see. Acts ii. 22. Jesus of Nazareth, a Man approved of God among you by miracles and wonders and signs; which God did by Him in the midst of you, as ye know.

(11) In what manner the Messiah was to make His public entry into Jerusalem.

Prophecy.—Zech. ix. 9. Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Jerusalem, behold thy King cometh unto thee; he is just, and having salvation; lowly, and riding upon an ass, even upon a colt the foal of an ass.

Fulfilment.—Matt. xxi. 7-10. The disciples brought the ass and the colt, and put on them their clothes, and set Him (Jesus) thereon (that is, upon the clothes). And great multitudes spread their garments, &c., &c. Matt. xxi. 4, 5. All this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying, Tell ye the daughter of Sion, Behold, thy king cometh, &c.

(12) That the Messiah should be poor and despised, and be betrayed by one of His Own disciples for thirty pieces of silver (at that time the ordinary price of the vilest slave); with which the potter's field should be purchased.

Prophecy.—Isa. liii. 3. There is no beauty that we should desire Him. He is despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief; and we hid as it were our faces from Him: He was despised, and we esteemed Him not. Psa. xli. 9 and Psa. lv. 12-14. Yea, mine own familiar friend in whom I trusted, who did eat of my bread, hath lift up his heel against me. Zech. xi. 12, 13. So they weighed for my price thirty pieces of silver. And the Lord said unto me, Cast it unto the potter: a goodly price that I was prized at of them. And I took the thirty pieces of silver, and cast them to the potter in the house of the Lord.

Fulfilment.—Luke ix. 58. The Son of man hath not where to lay His head. II Cor. viii. 9. For your sakes He became poor. John xi. 35. JESUS WEPT. Luke xxii. 3, 4. Then Satan entered into Judas, being one of the twelve, and he went his way and communed with the chief priests how he might betray Him unto them. Matt. xxvi. 14. And Judas went unto the chief priests, and said unto them, What will ye give me, and I will deliver Him unto you? and they covenanted with him for thirty pieces of silver. Matt. xxvii. 3-8. Then Judas, who had betrayed Him, brought again the thirty pieces silver, saying, I have sinned in that I have betrayed innocent blood; and he cast down the pieces of silver in the temple, and departed, and went and hanged himself. And the chief priests took the silver, and they said, It is not lawful to put it into the treasury, because it is the price of blood. And they took counsel, and bought with them the potter's field, to bury strangers in.

(13) That the Messiah should suffer pain and death for the sins of the world.

Prophecy.—Psa. xxii. 16, 17. For dogs (that is, the heathens, whom the Jews called dogs), have compassed Me; the assembly of the wicked have enclosed Me; they pierced my hands and my feet. I may tell all my bones; they look and stare upon Me. Isa. l. 6. I gave My back to the smiters and My cheek to them that plucked off the hair. I hid not My face from shame and spitting. Isa. liii. 5, 8. He was wounded for our transgressions; He was bruised for our iniquities; by His stripes we are healed. He was cut off out of the land of the living: for the transgression of My people was He stricken. Isa. liii. 12. And He bare the sin of many.

Fulfilment.—John xix. 1, 2. Then Pilate took Jesus and scourged Him. And the soldiers platted a crown of thorns, and they smote Him with the palms of their hands. Matt. xxvii. 30; Mark xv. 19. And they did spit upon Him and smote Him on the head. Mark xv. 25. And they crucified Him. I Pet. ii. 23, 24. Who, when He was reviled, reviled not again; when He suffered, He threatened not. Who bare our sins in His own body on the tree (the cross).

(14) That the Messiah should be cruelly mocked and derided.

Prophecy.—Psa. xxii. 12, 13, 7, 8. Many bulls have compassed Me; strong bulls of Bashan (that is, the wicked and furious Jews, who like the beasts fattened on the fertile plains of Bashan, "waxed fat and kicked"; became proud and rebellious) have beset Me round. They gaped upon Me with their mouths as a ravening and roaring lion. All they that see Me, laugh Me to scorn; they shoot out the lip, saying, He trusted in God that He would deliver Him; let Him deliver Him, seeing He delighted in Him.

Fulfilment.—Matt. xxvii. 39, 41, 42; Mark xv. 31, 32; Luke xxiii. 35, 36. And they that passed by, reviled Him, wagging their heads. Likewise also the chief priests, and the rulers also with them, derided, and mocking, said among themselves, with the scribes and elders, He saved others, Himself He cannot save; if He be Christ, the chosen of God, let Him now come down from the cross, and save Himself, that we may see, and we will believe Him. He trusted in God, let Him deliver Him now if He will have Him. And the soldiers also mocked Him, saying, If Thou be the King of the Jews, save Thyself.

(15) That vinegar and gall should be offered to the Messiah upon the cross; and His garments should be divided, and lots cast for His vesture.

Prophecy.—Psa. lxix. 21. They gave Me also gall for My meat, and in My thirst they gave Me vinegar to drink. Psa. xxii. 18. They part My garments among them, and cast lots upon My vesture.

Fulfilment.—John xix. 29; Matt. xxvii. 48; Mark xv. 36. And they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it upon hyssop, and put it to His mouth. John xix. 23, 24. And the soldiers, when they had crucified Jesus, took His garments and made four parts, to every soldier a part; and also His coat; now the coat was without seam. They said therefore, Let us not rend it, but cast lots whose it shall be.

(16) That not a bone of the Messiah should be broken, but that His side should be pierced.

Prophecy.—Psa. xxxiv. 20. He keepeth all His bones; not one of them is broken. Zech. xii. 10. And they shall look upon Me whom they have pierced.

Fulfilment.—John xix. 32-34. Then came the soldiers and brake the legs of the first and of the other which was crucified with Him; but when they came to Jesus, and saw that He was dead already, the brake NOT HIS LEGS. But one of the soldiers with a spear pierced His side, and forthwith came there out blood and water.

(17) That the Messiah should die with malefactors, but be buried honourably.

Prophecy.—Isa. liii. 9. And He made His grave with the wicked, and with the rich in His death.

Fulfilment.—Matt. xxvii. 38, 57-60. Then were there two thieves crucified with Him. There came a rich man of Arimathæa named Joseph, and begged the body of Jesus; and he wrapped it in a clean linen cloth and laid it in his own new tomb.

(18) That the Messiah should rise from the dead, and ascend into heaven.

Prophecy.—Psa. xvi. 9, 10. My flesh also shall rest in hope. For Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt Thou suffer Thine holy One to see corruption. Isa. liii. 10. When Thou shalt make His soul an offering for sin, He shall prolong His days. Psa. lxviii. 18. Thou hast ascended up on high; Thou hast led captivity captive; Thou hast received gifts for men, that the Lord God might dwell among them.

Fulfilment.—Acts ii. 31. (David) spake before of the resurrection of Christ, that His soul was not left in hell; neither did his flesh see corruption. See also Acts xiii. 35; Matt. xxviii. 5, 6. The angels said unto the women, He is not here, for He is risen, as He said. See Luke xxiv. 5, 6; I Cor. xv. 4. He rose again the third day, according to the Scriptures. Acts i. 3. He showed Himself alive, after His passion, by many infallible proofs. Mark xvi. 19; Luke xxiv. 51; Acts i. 9. So then, after the Lord had spoken to them, while He was blessing them, and while they beheld, He was parted from them, and carried up into heaven, and sat at the right hand of God. Compare also I Pet. iii. 22; I Tim. iii. 16; Heb. vi. 20.

(19) That the Messiah should send the Holy Spirit, the Comforter.

Prophecy.—Joel ii. 28. I will pour out My Spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and daughters shall prophesy.

Fulfilment.—See all these promises and predictions fulfilled in Acts ii. 1-4; iv. 31; viii. 17; x. 44; xi. 15.

The foregoing examples (Nos. 1 to 19) are direct prophetic fulfillments relative to the coming, sufferings, resurrection and ascension of Christ. To these we might add other lengthy lists dealing with His various offices, such as a Prophet, a Teacher, a Preacher, a Priest, a King, a Shepherd, a Mediator, an Intercessor and a Sacrifice. For the moment, we leave the joyous task to the reader, who is lovingly urged to make a list containing at least one reference for each title.

Under the second heading (II.) where a spiritual rather than literal fulfillment is intended, Horne gives the following list:--

Mal. i. 2, 3.	Rom. ix. 13.

It cannot escape observation, that by far the larger portion of the preceding passages is cited and adapted to the purpose of illustration by the apostle Paul. Dr. John Taylor has some useful remarks, of which the following, Nos. (1) to (4), are an abstract on the various designs with which Paul cited them:--

(1) Sometimes his intention goes no further than using the same strong expressions, as being equally applicable to the point in hand. Thus, in Rom. x. 6-8, he uses the words of Moses (Deut. xxx. 12-14) not to prove anything, nor as if he thought Moses spoke of the same subject; but merely as intimating that the strong and lively expressions, used by Moses concerning the doctrine he taught, were equally applicable to the faith of the Gospel. So, in Rom. x. 18, he quotes Psa. xix. 4, though it is not unlikely that those expressions were used by the ancient Jews in application to the Messiah, as the apostle applies them.

(2) Sometimes the design of the quotation is only to show that the cases are parallel; or that what happened in his times correspond with what happened in former days. See Rom. ii. 24; viii. 36; ix. 27-29; xi. 2-5, 8-10, and xv. 21.

(3) Sometimes the quotation is only intended to explain a doctrinal point. See Rom. i. 17; iv. 7, 8, 18—21; ix. 20, 21; x. 15 and xv. 3.

(4) Sometimes the quotation is designed to prove a doctrinal point. See Rom. iii. 4, 10-18; iv. 3-17; v. 12-14; ix. 7, 9, 12, 13, 15, 17; x. 5, 11, 13; xii. 20; xiv. 11.

Lastly, when a passage of the Old Testament is quoted in the New, in order to prove a point of doctrine, the person or writer applies it, though not always in the precise words of the original, yet constantly according to its genuine sense as it stands there. Examples of such application will be found in Deut. viii. 3 compared with Matt. iv. 4; Deut. vi. 16 compared with Matt. iv. 7; Deut. xxxii. 35 and Prov. xxv. 21, 22 compared with Rom. xii. 19, 20. The expression in Hos. vi. 6, mercy and not sacrifice, is applied to a different purpose in Matt. ix. 13, but to both properly.

And finally, under heading (IV.), where the quotations are in the nature rather of allusions, Horne gives the following list:--

We must leave this matter of the quotations at this point, as the many instances given have occupied considerable space, but we must return to it in our next article in order that one or two important features shall be considered.

#20. How the O.T. quotations are introduced in the N.T. pp. 93 - 96

As we have already seen, the two principal sources from which the quotations in the N.T. are derived, are the Hebrew and the Septuagint versions. The citations from, and the influence of, the Apocrypha, we shall best consider as a separate subject as it is not one that is generally known, and will need fuller explanations than can be given here.

The N.T. writers use a great variety of introductory formulæ in quoting the O.T. Scriptures. It must be understood that, at that period, the Bible was not divided up into chapters and verses, so that reference was usually made merely to the writer, as for example: "Moses said" (Matt. xxii. 24); "Moses wrote" (Luke xx. 28); "Moses describeth" (Rom. x. 5). It was left to the reader to discover the actual passage if he so desired. One or two more specific references are somewhat obscured in the A.V., for example, in Mark xii. 26:--

> "Have ye not read in the book of Moses, how in the bush God spake unto him?"

If we consult the R.V. we read:--

> "Have ye not read in the book of Moses, in the place concerning the bush, how God spake unto him?"

The Rabbis selected some important word found in a passage and used it as a designation, where we should now use chapter and verse. The Mohammedans, in a similar way, distinguished the suras or chapters of the Koran by the formulæ "in Eli", "in Solomon", etc.

In Rom. xi. 2 we have another example:--

> "Wot ye not what the scripture saith of Elias?"

The Greek of this passage is en Elia, "In Elijah", and refers to that portion of the First book of Kings (chapters xvii.-xix.) where Elijah's actions are recorded.

Rashi, the Rabbi, commenting upon Hos. ix. 9 says:--

> "Some are of opinion that this is Gibeah of Benjamin in the concubine, that is in that chapter of Judges, namely, xix., where the matter of the concubine is predominant."

Surenhusis, in his Biblios Katallages (Amsterdam, 1713), has with great labour collected together the various rules found in the Talmud and Rabbinical writings in order to demonstrate and justify all the modes of quotation made from the Old Testament in the New. He shows that, while we in modern times might scarcely feel that a passage should be quoted unless it had a direct association with the subject in hand, the wider range permitted by Rabbinical usage is in accord with that of the N.T. For example, the use of Deut. xxx. 12-14 in Rom. x. 6-8 does not represent a method of quotation which we should naturally use to-day.

While we do not intend to give an exhaustive analysis of the various introductory formulæ found in the N.T., some remarks upon their distribution among the various books may be of service. Matthew uses the formula:--

> "Hina plerothe to rhethen hupo kurion dia tou propheton" (In order that there might be fulfilled the word spoken by the Lord through the prophet).

This is found, unabridged, in Matt. i. 22 & ii. 15 and in the following passages, either simply abridged, or slightly altered and abridged: Matt. ii. 17; iii. 3; iv. 14; viii. 17; xii. 17; xiii. 14, 35; xxi. 4; xxvi. 56; xxvii. 9 and 35. The words, "Now all this was done that . . . . ." which occur in i. 22, xxi. 4 and xxvi. 56 occur nowhere else.

In addition to this type of introduction, Matthew uses gegraptai (It is written) and similar terms. Mark, Luke and John also use gregraptai and similar expressions.

The Acts of the Apostles uses a variety of introductory formulæ in keeping with the fact that it is not the record of any one speaker, no two clauses are exactly alike. The epistle to the Romans uses the formula, kathos gregraptai, "As it is written", more frequently than any other, so that this form of introduction may be considered as characteristic of the book. The dispensational chapters (ix.-xi.) depart from this usual form and use expressions such as, "Isaiah saith", "Moses saith", "In the place where it was said", "It was said" (rheo), etc.

In Paul's epistles the usual formula is, "It is written". A more personal form is used in II Cor. vi. where, instead of "It is written" we have "For He saith", "As God hath said", "Saith the Lord" and "Saith the Lord Almighty" (verses 2, 16, 17, 18). The emphasis upon the fact that God said these words is worthy of attention; the subject of II Cor. vi. is a most solemn and personal one and may account for the change.

Galatians introduces a personal note in a different way, speaking of the scripture as "foreseeing" and "preaching", and "concluding all under sin" (Gal. iii. 8, 22).

Quotations from the O.T. in the Prison Epistles are exceedingly rare; two references in Ephesians are introduced by the words, Dio legei, "Wherefore He saith" (Eph. iv. 8; v. 14).

The introductory formulæ of the epistle to the Hebrews differ considerably from those used in the other epistles. Grapho is never used, but instead legei ("he, or it saith"), marturei ("he, or it, testifies"), eireke ("it has been spoken"), phesi ("saith He"). The manner of citation adopted by the apostle in writing to the Hebrews is very like the style of the Jewish writer Philo, and was evidently chosen by God in addressing this special people. While quotations from the O.T. occur in the first three chapters of Hebrews, no writer is named until after the memorable statement in Heb. iii. 7: "Wherefore, as the Holy Ghost saith." There is a strong emphasis in Hebrews upon the fact that God has spoken: "God has spoken"; "The Holy Ghost saith"; "The word spoken by angels was stedfast . . . . . spoken by the Lord" (the Lord Jesus).

It seems evident that the writers of the N.T. took into account the people to whom they wrote and introduced their quotations accordingly. Take as an example the way in which Matthew, Mark and Luke introduce the reference made by the Lord to Psalm cx.:--

> "He saith unto them, How then doth David in spirit call Him Lord, saying, The Lord said unto my Lord" (Matt. xxii. 43, 44).
> "For David himself said by the Holy Ghost, The Lord said unto my Lord" (Mark xii. 36).
> "And David himself saith in the Book of the Psalms, The Lord said unto my Lord" (Luke xx. 42).

Matthew, writing to Jewish readers, simply refers to David's words "in spirit". Mark, writing to Roman and Gentile hearers, who were nevertheless closely associated with the kingdom message of Matthew's Gospel, makes the inspiration of the words a little more emphatic, but neither Matthew nor Mark feel it necessary to tell their readers where to find these inspired words of David. Luke, however, wrote for Gentile readers, particularly those who came under the ministry of the apostle Paul, and to these he is explicit: "David himself saith in the Book of the Psalms."

The reader will find further evidence of this accommodation to the reader, by comparing Matt. xxii. 24 with Mark xii. 19 and Luke xx. 28; and Matt. iii. 3 with Mark i. 2, 3 and Luke iii. 4. Where Matthew speaks of what "Moses said", Mark and Luke speak of what is "written". The Gospel according to Matthew, the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the Epistle of James indicate by the use of the Jewish mode of introductory quotation, "God said", "It is said", etc., that they have the Hebrew in view, whereas the Epistles written to the Churches generally refer the reader to what is "written". The insistence by the apostle when writing to the Churches upon what is "written" may have had in view the attempts of the Judaizing party to force the so-called oral, or unwritten, law upon the Gentiles.

Not only are the introductory formulæ modified to suit the persons addressed, but they also have some reference to the purpose for which such quotations are made. Where the writer intends a literal fulfillment of prophecy, he will naturally use a different mode of citation from that in which Scripture is being used as a support for some doctrine or exhortation.

These and many other lines of study are open to the student who considers no time ill-spent that makes the message of the Word clearer and more intelligible both to himself and to others. We have, however, to remember our limitations; our space is limited, the patience of our readers is limited, and we must not assume that all will benefit alike from these somewhat exacting studies.

#21. The quotation of the O.T. in the N.T. The problem of Matt. xxvii. 9, 10.

pp. 135 - 140

An analysis of the quotations of the O.T. in the New, demands not only an acquaintance with the originals of the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures, but some understanding of the work of the Massorites. Before, therefore, we go further into this field of study, we propose devoting some space to an explanation of the labours of the Sopherim and Massorites, and their influence upon the received text of the Hebrew Scriptures, but as a concluding article of the present portion of the series dealing with the quotation of the O.T. in the New, we propose a consideration of that most vexed question: What is the true import of Matt. xxvii. 9,10?

We regret to be unable to render adequate acknowledgment to the writer whose findings upon this subject have been of great service. He published his book anonymously, and we can, therefore, only make this scanty recognition and pass on.

There are 55 passages in the N.T. in which the author of an O.T. quotation is named. In all of these places, with the exception of Matt. xxvii. 9, 10, it is generally agreed that the authorship cited in the N.T is that which is found in the Old. The excepted passage, which is the one before us, reads:--

> "Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet, saying, And they took the thirty pieces of silver, the price of Him that was valued, whom they of the children of Israel did value, and gave them for the potter's field, as the Lord appointed me."

Whether the difficulty be handled by friend or foe, there is unanimity in referring this quotation to Zech. xi. 12, 13, and not to Jeremiah. Among the suggested solutions of the difficulty put forward by those who believe God's Word may be mentioned the following:--

> "There are many items that are parallel in Zechariah and in Jeremiah, and consequently Jeremiah may have prophesied the same things as did Zechariah, although they are only recorded in the writings of the latter."

Scrivener says:--

> "However Ieremiou may perplex us, it is unquestionably the true reading. No solution seems so easy as Lightfoot's, who supposes that the book of Jeremiah, being actually arranged by the Jews as first of all the prophets, gave its name to the whole book of writings: an opinion which is somewhat countenanced by chapter xvi. 14: 'Jeremiah or one of the prophets'."

Alford says:--

> "The citation is not from Jeremiah, and is probably quoted from memory and inaccurately."

The argument put forward by many, namely, that Matt. xxvii. says: "which was spoken by the prophet Jeremiah", instead of "which was written", does not hold good, for quite a number of quotations that were manifestly written by the prophet named in the respective passages, are introduced by the same formula. For example, Matt. ii. 17 and iii. 3.

Turning from these endeavours to reconcile the apparent inaccuracy, we turn to Matt. xxvii. 9, 10, and ask, "What is the event, or incident, or transaction, which involved a fulfilling of the ancient prophecy quoted?" The answer is: "The buying of a field":--

> "And they took counsel, and bought with them the potter's field to bury strangers in. Wherefore that field was called, "The field of blood, unto this day" (Matt. xxvii. 7, 8).

Where in the N.T. the treachery of Judas is the subject of O.T. quotation, Psalms xli., lxix. and cix. are cited. Matt. xxvii. 9, 10, however, is concerned rather with what was done with the thirty pieces of silver which Judas cast down into the temple:--

> "They took the thirty pieces of silver . . . . . and gave them for the potter's field."

But neither in verses 12 or 13, nor anywhere in Zech. xi., is a field so much as mentioned. While it is true that Zechariah speaks of thirty pieces of silver, there is no statement that anything, certainly not a field, was purchased with the money.

In the attempt to make the passage in Zechariah correspond with Matt. xxvii., it has been taught that:--

(1) Zechariah spoke contemptuously when he said: "If ye think good, give me my price."
(2) That the thirty pieces of silver was a paltry sum.
(3) That the money was "flung" down in contempt.
(4) That the word "potter" is a correct translation, and means a worker in clay.

Let us deal with the features in order:--

(1) The word "goodly" in Zech. xi. 13 is the translation of eder. The cognate adjective, addip, is variously rendered "lordly", "excellent", "glorious", "noble", "mighty", etc., and there is no instance where it is used ironically. The words "price" and "prized" are translations of yagar. This word is translated "honour" and "precious" elsewhere, without the slightest hint of irony ever being associated with it, and indeed it may be added that irony is not discoverable anywhere in Zechariah's writings. We must therefore dismiss the suggestion of irony and contempt as being the invention of those who wished to justify their explanation of the difficulty found in Matt. xxvii.

(2) The thirty pieces of silver are said to be a paltry sum to offer the prophet. Neh. v. 15 records the fact that > "Former governors were chargeable unto the people and had taken of them bread and wine, beside forty shekels of silver."

Judg. xvii. 10 states that Micah offered the Levite ten shekels of silver a year, a suit of apparel and his victuals. A fourth part of a shekel of silver was considered to be sufficient to offer to the man of God by the servant of Saul (I Sam. ix. 8). These facts and the seriousness of Jeremiah in weighing out the seventeen shekels of silver for the price of the field in Anathoth (Jer. xxxii.), set aside all argument which would regard thirty shekels of silver as a contemptuous and paltry sum.

(3) The suggestion that Zechariah "flung down the silver in contempt" must next be examined. The word "cast", which translates shalak, is used of Moses when he cast the tree into the bitter waters (Exod. xv. 25); of Elijah when he cast his mantle upon Elisha (I Kings xix. 19), and of Elisha when he cast salt into the waters and meal into the pot (II King ii. 21 and iv. 41). In II Chron. xxiv. 10, 11, where it is used of silver in connection with the house of the Lord, it approaches very near to Zechariah's use of the word.

(4) It is assumed that the word translated "potter" in Zech. xi. means necessarily "a worker in clay". This should be easily capable of proof. The word translated "potter" is yatsar. The verb denotes the act of forming or fashioning, but indicates nothing as to the material with which the forming or fashioning is done. Where pottery or working in clay is referred to, it is necessary that the passage say so. It may, for instance, be pointed out that the word is used of a worker in metals. In Isaiah it is "The Smith" working with bellows and furnace that "forms" (yatsar) the weapon (Isa. liv. 16, 17). Again in Isa. xliv. 9-12:--

> "The fashioners of a graven image . . . . . who hath fashioned a god or a molten graven image . . . . . fashioneth it with hammers."

Here it would be ridiculous to introduce the idea of a potter, a worker in clay; yet the same word is used that gives us the word "potter". So in Hab. ii. 18, 19, which the reader should consult. The common noun, pot, unlike its cognate, potter and pottery, is applicable to metallic vessels, as well as earthen ones. So, likewise, the Hebrew participial noun, yatsar, is every whit as applicable to a fashioner of wood or metal as to a fashioner of clay. The statement as to the presence of a "potter" in the house of the Lord has no sanction from the Word of God. What material did the so-called "potter" of Zech. xi. work in? The prophet was commanded to cast the silver he had received to this craftsman, who was in the house of the Lord, and the context demands that this craftsman was none other than a silversmith.

The prominence given to the gold and silver vessels in the Sanctuary, particularly in that part of the book of Ezra that refers to the days of Zechariah, will suffice to account for the presence of a silversmith or goldsmith in the house of the Lord. We need not, however, go even so far afield as Ezra: we have but to turn to Zech. vi. 11 to see the imperative necessity for some such craftsman being in attendance at the temple at that very time:--

> "Take silver and gold and make crowns, and set them upon Joshua the son of Josedech the High Priest" (Zech. vi. 11).

This passage, moreover, is unique: it is the only place where a crown is ever said to be made of silver.

Concluding this section, we observe that the LXX reads: "Cast them into the furnace", in both places where the A.V. has "potter".

We now deal positively with the passage in Matt. xxvii. 9, 10, ignoring all that has been read into Zechariah to justify the reference to that prophet. Let us enquire where there is a reference in Jeremiah to a command of the Lord to buy a field for silver.

> "Thou hast said unto me, O Lord God, Buy thee the field for silver" (money) (Jer. xxxii. 25).
> "Men shall buy fields for silver" (money) (Jer. xxxii. 44).

Need we search further for the prophecy of Jeremiah which was fulfilled when the potter's field was purchased for silver?

We now have to consider the parenthetical clause, viz., verses 9 and 10, of Matt. xxvii. over which most of the trouble has arisen. Let us illustrate what we are about to show is true in Matt. xxvii. by reference to quotations from Scripture elsewhere. Matt. i. 22, 23 quotes Isaiah's prophecy, but no one has any difficulty in consequence of the insertion of the parenthetical and explanatory words: "which being interpreted is, God with us", for they are very evidently added to the quotation by the Evangelist himself. Again, in Matt. xxi. 13 we read: "It is written, My house shall be called the house of prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves." If we prosecute a search we shall discover that two separate passages are here quoted by the Lord: one from Isa. lvi. 7, and the other from Jer. vii. 11. Now supposing Matthew had said here: "As it is written in the prophecy of Isaiah", would anyone refuse to admit the fact that Jeremiah was also quoted? Let us see how the parenthetical words of Matt. xxvii. would be understood if they had been otherwise worded. Supposing, for illustration, that the chief priests had fixed the price of betrayal at thirty pieces of silver because of the law that made that sum the compensation for injury done to a servant, and we had read in Matt. xxvii.:--

> "Then was fulfilled that which was spoken through Jeremiah the prophet, saying, And they took the thirty pieces of silver (the price given in Israel to compensate for injury of a servant), and they gave them for the potter's field, as the Lord appointed me."

Would anyone be found who would teach that the prophet Jeremiah was not quoted, but rather the writer of the book of Exodus? For the sake of clearness let us have two further hypothetical examples:--

> "Then was fulfilled that which was spoken through Jeremiah the prophet, saying, And they took the twenty pieces of silver (the price of him who was sold by his brethren into Egypt); and they gave them for the potter's field, as the Lord appointed me."

> "Then was fulfilled that which was spoken through Jeremiah the prophet, saying, And they took the four hundred shekels of silver (the price paid to Ephron the Hittite for the field of Machpelah as a burial place), and they gave them for the potter's field, as the Lord appointed me."

It is, moreover, evident that the "him" who was priced and valued, and the "me" whom the Lord appointed to buy the field, cannot have been one and the same man. We exhibit the parenthetical reference to Zechariah, together with the quotation from Jeremiah, so that the reader may see what Matthew has done:--

> "Then was fulfilled that which was spoken through Jeremiah the prophet, saying,

And they took the thirty pieces of silver.	They shall buy fields for silver.
(the price of him who was priced, whom they of the children of Israel did price),	(the amount of the price that I was priced at of them), and they gave them for the potter's field,	And fields shall be bought in this land.
As the Lord appointed me.	Thou, O Lord Jehovah, hast said unto me, But to thyself the field for silver."

One further illustration of the way in which Matthew quotes the prophets is found in Matt. xxi. 5. The words: "Tell ye the daughter of Zion", are quoted from Isa. lxii. 11, while those which follow are quoted from Zech. ix. 9. Both here and in Matt. xxvi. 31 Zechariah is quoted without being named, which is in keeping with the silence of Matt. xxvii. in regard to the parenthetical words, "the price of him that was valued, whom they of the children of Israel did value".

Both the passages quoted in Matt. xxvii. have one feature in common, which in some measure links them together. In Jeremiah, concerning the proposal to purchase the field, we read: "And I knew this was the word of the Lord" (Jer. xxxii. 8), and in Zechariah, when the staff was broken, we read: "The poor of the flock who observed me knew that this was the word of the Lord" (Zech. xi. 11).

This is not the place to go into all the teaching that resides in this passage of Matt. xxvii. We have dealt with it as a sample of the way in which the O.T. is quoted in the N.T., and have endeavoured, incidentally, to inculcate that careful regard for all which is "written" that will lead the reader steadily on where others, lacking that absolute confidence in the utter trustworthiness of all Scripture, have missed their way. "Learning" may not always lead to a "knowledge of the truth". A God-given "repentance", or "change of mind", involving a childlike simplicity rather than a scholar's profundity, is needed to arrive at the "knowledge of the truth" (II Tim. iii. 7 and ii. 25).

Here we must conclude this survey of the quotations from the O.T. as found in the N.T., trusting that what, at the first, may have seemed a slight matter has now, in measure, been shown to have the important place that it really occupied.

#22. The Revised Version. "To increase its fidelity without destroying its charm" (Revisers' note).

pp. 194 - 197

Before we allow the Revised Version to speak for itself, we feel bound to give some sort of prefatory note, lest our endeavour to be fair and to give all the credit possible should be misconstrued as unreserved commendation.

Dr. Robert Young wrote:--

> "This Revised Version will disappoint all parties interested in the work, the advanced or sceptical party, who expect to find old doctrines erased, or new ones introduced, the conservative party, who cling to old terms and phrases, as well as the earnest inquiring party who wish to find a reliable standard to test the conflicting statements of commentators and critics."

If a canvass of opinion were taken we believe the result would show that the "Modernist" on the whole favours the R.V., while the "Fundamentalist" favours the A.V. That there are many errors in the A.V., students of all shades of opinion would agree; and that there are corrections of considerable value in the R.V. all would acknowledge; and yet, in spite of all this, there is something about the R.V. repellent and chilling which leaves the reader unsatisfied and suspicious.

After we have set forth the reasons why every student should be acquainted with the R.V. we shall be obliged, in faithfulness, to point out some grievous departures from sound doctrine and some unwarranted interference with the Greek text that prevent us from giving anything like wholehearted commendation to this great work. The human channels also have to be considered; and when we learn that one of the Revisers was a prominent Unitarian, and others self-confessed sacerdotalists, we feel the necessity of using the results of their labours with care and discretion. We therefore make it clear at the outset that, while we draw the reader's attention to the value of the R.V., we most certainly do not advocate its general use. With all its faults, the A.V. is to be preferred for general reading and public ministry. The place for the R.V. is on the desk, one volume of many which the student consults in his examination of the sacred text and its translations. We hope to place the reader in possession of enough material to enable him, dispassionately, to arrive at a sound conclusion.

The revision of the Authorized Version of the New Testament was undertaken in consequence of a resolution passed by both Houses of the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury, and the new version was first published in May, 1881. We propose in this article to give the reader some idea of the task of the Revisers and the rules under which they worked.

The foundation of the A.V. must be sought in the work of William Tyndale; the versions of the English Bible that followed were reproductions or revisions of Tyndale's efforts. Authoritative revision is divided into three stages: the Great Bible of 1539-41, the Bishops' Bible of 1568 & 1572, and the King's Bible of 1611. The last of these came to be known as the Authorized Version. The revision of 1881, though following after a greater lapse of time than that that intervened between the earlier revisions, must not be considered an innovation.

The compilers of the A.V. used the Greek text that was to hand; the manuscripts were of late date and few in number. The main principles governing the production of the A.V. will give a general idea of its character:--

(1) The ordinary Bible read in the Church, commonly called the Bishops' Bible, to be followed, and as little altered as the truth of the original will permit.
(2) When a word has diverse significations, that to be kept which hath been most commonly used by most ancient fathers, being agreeable to the propriety of the place and the analogy of the faith.
(3) No marginal notes at all to be affixed, but only for the explanation of the Hebrew and Greek words which cannot without some circumlocution so briefly and fitly be expressed in the text.

The comment of the Revisers upon the A.V. is worth quoting:--

> "We have had to study this great Version carefully and minutely, line by line; and the longer we have been engaged upon it the more we have learned to admire its simplicity, its dignity, its power, its happy turns of expression, its general accuracy, and the felicities of its rhythm. To render a work that had reached this high standard of excellence still more excellent, to increase its fidelity without destroying its charm, was the task committed to us."

The fundamental rules adopted by the Convocation of Canterbury on the third and fifth days of May, 1870, were as follows:--

(1) That it is desirable that a revision of the Authorized Version of the Holy Scriptures be undertaken.
(2) That the revision be so conducted as to comprise both marginal renderings and such emendations as it may be found necessary to insert in the text of the Authorized Version.
(3) That in the above resolutions we do not contemplate any new translation of the Bible, or any alteration of the language, except where in the judgment of the most competent scholars such change is necessary.
(4) That in such necessary changes, the stile of the language employed in the existing Version be closely followed.
(5) That it is desirable that Convocation should nominate a body of its own members to undertake the work of revision, who shall be at liberty to invite the co-operation of any eminent for scholarship, to whatever nation or religious body they may belong.

The Principles and Rules agreed to by the Committee of Convocation on the twenty-fifth day of May, 1870, were as follows:--

(1) To introduce as few alterations as possible into the Text of the Authorized Version consistently with faithfulness.
(2) To limit, as far as possible, the expression of such alterations to the language of the Authorized and earlier English Versions.
(3) Each Company to go twice over the portion to be revised, once provisionally, the second time finally, and on principles of voting as hereinafter is provided.
(4) That the Text to be adopted be that for which the evidence is decidedly preponderating; and that when the Text so adopted differs from that from which the Authorized Version was made, the alteration be indicated in the margin.
(5) To make or retain no change in the Text on the second final revision by each Company, except two-thirds of those present approve of same, but on the first revision to decide by simple majorities.
(6) In every case of proposed alteration that may have given rise to discussion, to defer the voting thereupon till the next Meeting, whensoever the same shall be required by one-third of those present at the Meeting, such intended vote to be announced in the notice for the next Meeting.
(7) To revise the headings of chapters and pages, paragraphs, italics, and punctuation.
(8) To refer, on the part of each Company, when considered desirable, to Divines, Scholars and Literary Men, whether at home or abroad, for their opinions.

The time devoted to the work was ten years and a half. The first revision occupied about six years, the second about two years and a half. The remaining time was spent in the consideration of the suggestions from America on the Second Revision, and of the many details and reserved questions arising out of the earlier labours.

The reader who would rightly appraise the R.V. should give due consideration to Rule 5. Whatever our own opinion may be regarding any alteration of the A.V., the fact that on the final revision no alteration was permitted “except two-thirds approved of the same”, should at least cause us to give these revisions a respectful consideration.

#23. The Revised Version.
"Our task was revision, not re-translation" (Revisers' note).
pp. 229 - 231

The first consideration before the Revisers was that of the Greek Text. This, to use their own language, "was the necessary foundation of our work":--

> "Textual criticism, as applied to the Greek New Testament, forms a special study of much intricacy and difficulty, and even now leaves room for considerable variety of opinion among competent critics . . . . . In the early part of the work every various reading requiring consideration was discussed and voted upon by the company. After a time the precedents thus established enabled the process to be safely shortened; but it was still at the option of every one to raise a full discussion on any particular reading, and the option was freely used . . . . . Many places still remain where, for the present, it would not be safe to accept one reading to the absolute exclusion of the others. In these cases we have given alternative readings in the margin, wherever they seem to be of sufficient importance or interest to deserve notice" (Reviser's Preface).

Passing from the question of the text to the translation, the Revisers were enjoined "to introduce as few alterations as possible, consistently with faithfulness". Their task, to use their own language, "was revision, not re-translation", and this fact must be given due place in any consideration of the resulting Version. Speaking of the changes that were necessary in spite of this enjoinder, the Revisers say:--

> "In the application however of this principle to the many and intricate details of our work, we have found ourselves constrained by faithfulness to introduce changes which might not at first sight appear to be included under the rule."

The alterations found in the R.V. may be roughly grouped in five principal classes:--

(1) Alterations positively required by change of reading in the Greek Text.
(2) Alterations made where the A.V. appeared either to be incorrect, or to have chosen the less probable of two possible renderings.
(3) Alterations of obscure or ambiguous renderings into such as are clear and express in import.
(4) Alterations of the A.V. in cases where it was inconsistent with itself in the renderings of two or more passages confessedly alike or parallel.
(5) Alterations rendered necessary by consequence, that is, arising out of changes already made, though not in themselves required by the general rule of faithfulness.

The frequent inconsistencies of the A.V. caused the Revisers much embarrassment, where even in the same chapter the same Greek word would be rendered several ways. Their alterations made necessary by consequence they explain as follows:--

> "When a particular word is found to recur with characteristic frequency in any one of the Sacred Writers, it is obviously desirable to adopt for it some uniform rendering. Again, where, as in the case of the first three Evangelists, precisely the same clauses or sentences are found in more than one of the Gospels, it is no less necessary to translate them in every place in the same way. These two principles may be illustrated by reference to a word that perpetually recurs in St. Mark's Gospel, and that may be translated either 'straightway', 'forthwith' or 'immediately'. Let it be supposed that the first rendering is chosen, and that the word, in accordance with the first of the above principles, is in that Gospel uniformly translated 'straightway'. Let it be further supposed that one of the passages of St. Mark in which it is so translated, is found, word for word, in one of the other Gospels, but that there the rendering of the A.V. happens to be 'forthwith' or 'immediately'. That rendering must be changed on the second of the above principles; and yet such a change would not have been made but for this concurrence of two sound principles . . . . . This is but one of many instances of consequential alterations which might at first sight appear unnecessary, but which nevertheless have been deliberately made, and are not at variance with the rule of introducing as few changes in the A.V. as faithfulness would allow."

Two other features are noted by the Revisers in reference to their work. One is the subject of language:--

> "We have never removed any archaisms, whether in structure or in words, except where we were persuaded either that the meaning of the words was not generally understood, or that the nature of the expression led to some misconception of the true sense of the passage."

The other feature is that of the marginal notes:--

> "They represent the results of a large amount of careful and elaborate discussion, and will, perhaps, by their very presence, indicate to some extent the intricacy of many of the questions that have almost daily come before us for decision."

The marginal notes fall into four main groups:--

(1) Differences of reading deemed to be of sufficient importance as to warrant particular notice.
(2) Exact renderings of Greek words, which, for the sake of the English idiom, were not so exactly rendered in the text.
(3) A few notes give some explanation which the original seemed to require.
(4) Alternative renderings in difficult or debatable passages.

It is important to remember that where the text of the R.V. agrees with that of the A.V., at least one third of the Revisers supported the retention, whereas where the R.V. differs from the A.V., the different reading was supported by at least two thirds of the Revisers who were present at the second revision (see page 196).

As a general rule, italic type used in the R.V. to indicate the absence of any words in the original which the sense seemed to require in the translation. The text is arranged in paragraphs, and the Revisers pertinently remark:--

> "The serious obstacles to the right understanding of Holy Scripture, which are interposed by minute subdivisions are often overlooked; but if anyone will consider for a moment the injurious effect that would be produced by breaking up a portion of some standard work into separate verses, he will at once perceive how necessary has been an alteration in this particular."

Regarding punctuation they say:--

> "Our practice has been to maintain what is sometimes called the heavier system of stopping, or in other words, that system which, especially for convenience in reading aloud, suggests pauses as will best ensure a clear and intelligent setting forth of the true meaning of the words. This course has rendered necessary, especially in the Epistles, a larger use of colons and semicolons than is customary in modern English printing."

Finally, attention is drawn to the list of readings and renderings preferred by the American Committee, recorded at their desire. These are printed immediately after the book of the Revelation and should not be omitted by the earnest reader.

Having now given some idea of the work undertaken by the Revision of 1881, we hope, in subsequent articles, to draw the reader's attention to some of the advantages that accrue from a comparison of the Authorized and Revised Versions.

"What manner of persons ought ye to be."

#1. The relation of doctrine and practice.
pp. 1, 2

Human testimony, however honest and however well intentioned, will always carry with it those evidences of frailty that belong to all things mortal. The criticism of the witness of The Berean Expositor over the past years leaves us with no illusion on that matter. There has been, we admit, a preponderance of doctrine. There has been a most careful scrutiny of the meaning and usage of words. But while admitting this, and wishing that our testimony had been more complete, and that more space had been devoted to the practical aspect of the truth, we believe that there is some justification for the methods we have pursued, and for the line of teaching that has been uppermost.

First of all, The Berean Expositor was not inaugurated to fill the role of a magazine for general Christian reading: it commenced with a mission "to make all men see", so far as grace enabled, "what is the dispensation of the mystery". The subject was by no means popular, and for years our testimony was like "a voice crying in the wilderness". The very fact that every item of our teaching would be criticized, quite apart from the positive necessity to "prove all things", made us adopt methods of research that involved the setting out of structures and the concordant study of words, all of which may to many have seemed heavy reading. In the next place, our space was always circumscribed, and when we would have expanded a theme and "pointed the moral", the limit had already been reached.

While the subject of the mystery will never be popular, it has been our joy of late years to see that others, in this land and elsewhere, have joined in the witness. We therefore feel more at liberty to devote some of the attention given in time past to doctrine and dispensation, to the necessary practice without which the knowledge of Christ remains "barren and unfruitful". Moreover, this order is scriptural. Practice can never precede doctrine. Practice is the fruit of doctrine. I must know, before I can do. I cannot walk worthy of a calling that I do not believe or understand. I cannot adorn a doctrine that I do not know or believe.

Those of our readers who have any knowledge of the epistle to the Ephesians, will be already acquainted with the perfect balance of truth presented in that marvelous epistle. Three chapters of doctrine are balanced by three chapters of practice in such a way that practically every item of doctrine finds its corresponding item of practice. This has been graphically set out on page 15 of our book entitled: The Testimony of the Lord's Prisoner, which the interested reader is asked to consult. The word translated "worthy" in Eph. iv. 1 has associations with "the beam of a balance", and to walk worthy of our calling brings to mind the idea of practice balancing doctrine.

This series of articles upon practical themes we have entitled: What manner of persons ought ye to be, from II Pet. iii. 11; and a consultation of the context will show that Peter's exhortation is based upon doctrine:--

> "Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness."

We therefore hope in future, not only to put before our readers the glorious doctrine of the Scriptures, trusting that they themselves will seek the grace to translate all into terms of practice, but also, in this series, to re-inforce this teaching with more definite exposition of the practical issues involved, and a fuller opening up of the ways and means revealed in the Scriptures for the attaining of that coveted condition where doctrine is balanced by practice, where the walk is worthy of the calling, and where the life manifested here sets forth in some measure that life which is hid with Christ in God.

#2. His service is perfect freedom (Chrysostom).
pp. 41, 42

We trust that no reader expects us to launch out into a system of legalism, setting out what he is to do, and where he is to go, as though the epistles of the mystery were addressed to servants instead of sons, and as though Sinai had not given place to the right hand of God. The closing verses of Col. ii. should preserve us for all time from this reprehensible misunderstanding of our position in Christ. There will be, we trust, no approximation to "touch not, taste not, handle not", in this series.

The apostle Peter has asked what manner of persons ought ye to be, and the introduction of that word "ought", so often on the lips of believers when dealing with "another man's servant", is rare in the Word of God. The apostle Paul used the word "ought" (opheilo) but once in the epistles of the mystery when he said: "So ought men to love their wives" (Eph. v. 28), and even this passage is no exception to the rule that practice flows from doctrine, for the exhortation beginning with the word "so" cannot be isolated from the preceding glorious doctrine concerning Christ's love for His church.

The first item that we feel constrained to bring forward is the fact that all service rendered to God, if it is to be acceptable, must be "reasonable service". This is stated by the apostle in Rom. xii. 1:--

> "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service."

We are immediately faced with the necessity of making sure that every term used in this important passage shall be understood and appreciated—but that will be to leave the practical issues for the doctrinal, the very thing we here seek to avoid. We trust, however, that this very persistence on the part of doctrine, meeting us again and again, will help all to realize how impossible it is to contemplate "practice" apart from a knowledge of truth. Avoiding the purely doctrinal issues which will the better come in the direct exposition of the epistle, we might notice that the apostle "beseeches", but does not "command". He would have our practice the grateful response to "the mercies of God", for service rendered in any other spirit may not prove "acceptable unto God".

Not only must true service be rendered "in love" and not "in law", but it must also be "logical" or "reasonable". This implies a fair acquaintance with the teaching of the Scriptures, and a perception on the part of the believer of the direction and goal towards which all doctrine points. This logical or reasonable service goes so far as to include the presentation of our bodies as living sacrifices, an aspect of truth not by any means "reasonable" in the eyes of the unsaved. This warns us that "logic" moves on certain planes. What is logically true of man, as such, is not necessarily true of God: for example, man cannot be in two places at once, whereas the Lord cannot be so limited.

Again, the apostle not only "beseeches", but he says "present" or "yield". Reasonable service of the redeemed cannot be forced, it must be free, and finds its typical expression in those "freewill offerings" which the law allowed, and about which the Psalmist prayed:-- "Accept, I beseech Thee, the freewill offerings of my mouth, O Lord" (Psa. cxix. 108).

#3. Pre-requisites for service.
pp. 81, 82

Pursuing the theme commenced in our earlier article that the service of the believer must be reasonable and free, we turn to the words of Christ, uttered in the day of His rejection: "Take My yoke upon you, and learn of Me" (Matt. xi. 29).

It is desired in this present article to indicate some of the necessary conditions for learning the truth. Mere reading, even of the Scriptures, is by no means sufficient. "Learning" does not necessarily lead to "a knowledge of the truth" as the solemn passage in II Tim. iii. 7 makes plain. If we were asked to prepare a list of the paraphernalia associated with "learning", how many of us would indicate a "yoke"? A yoke suggests service and fellowship. To work yoked with another, necessitates keeping step, walking in the same path, pursuing the same goal, serving the same Master. Here we have another of those inter-relations of doctrine and practice that it is so necessary to remember.

There is, moreover, very pointed mention of the state of heart of those who would engage in this yoked service. The Lord said: "I am meek and lowly in heart." This special attribute of Christ and its intimate connection with "learning" is found in the prophecy of Isaiah:--

> "The Lord God hath given me the tongue of the learned, that I should know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary. He wakeneth morning by morning, He wakeneth mine ear to hear as the learned. The Lord God hath opened mine ear, and I was not rebellious, neither turned away back" (Isa. l. 4, 5).

Another very essential preparation of heart that must precede all true "learning" is repentance. Just as we should not naturally include a "yoke" among the necessary equipment of the learner, so we should most likely enumerate a number of spiritual qualifications before we thought of repentance. The passage that teaches its necessity is II Tim. ii. 25:--

> "In meekness instructing those that oppose themselves; if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledgment of the truth."

Without this repentance, one may be "ever learning and never able to come to a knowledge of the truth" (II Tim. iii. 7). While we desire to keep in mind that we are not dealing with the doctrinal issues of the passages quoted in this series, yet, owing to a very prevalent misconception of the meaning of repentance, we feel it necessary to say that it indicates "a change of mind". Until this change of mind is granted, all argument and exhortation are in vain.

One further item in the learner's equipment is that of affliction and suffering. The Psalmist said:--

> "It is good for me that I have been afflicted, that I might learn Thy statutes" (Psa. cxix. 71).

The apostle Paul learned in this same school, for he said:--

> "I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, to be content. I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound: everywhere and in all things I am instructed both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need. I can do all things through Christ which strengthened me" (Phil. iv. 11-13).

And lastly, of the Lord Himself it is written:--

> "Though He were a Son, yet learned He obedience by the things which He suffered" (Heb. v. 8).

If true service is "reasonable service", and if we must learn the will of the Lord before we can hope to do it, it will be seen that while grace is all-sufficient, yet we should not enter upon this path without some preparation of heart, for the path is not always smooth, neither is it without its trials. We may, however, in it all find rest to our souls in fellowship with the Lord Himself.

#4. Symbols of Service: Ambassador, Apostle, Angel.
pp. 121 - 123

Having seen something of the nature of, and preparation for, scriptural service, we turn our minds to the consideration of what service involves. We might note the different titles of service, such as "walk" or "work", or the different spheres of service suggested in such passages as "preach the Word", "fellow-soldier", "we wrestle", "sow", "reap", etc., or yet again we might note the examples of true acceptable service with which Scripture abounds, and yet once again, we could bring into prominence all who are called "servants", or who are said to have "served". Then it will be necessary to note the spirit that underlies service, and it will not be too far removed from the practical orbit to give attention to the fact that service will be rewarded by the Lord.

The bare summary of possible avenues of approach reveals so much ground to be covered that we shall have to deal with the subject under different heads to avoid confusion. We purpose for the present to bring before the reader's notice a series of symbols of service that we find in the Scriptures. Every reader will not find each symbol of personal help. Service is too wide for generalization, but we trust that each reader will find his own special calling illumined as time proceeds. Moreover, there is always room for the reader to remember in prayer those whose service is so different from his own, and this of itself will enable us patiently to consider service in all its aspects, even though our own particular branch be not immediately in view.

The symbols of service that we will consider in this first review are three, viz., ambassador, apostle and angel. While each word has its own distinctive meaning and cannot be used interchangeably with the other two, they have one or two features in common, which may be of help to us in this series.

Firstly, ambassadors, apostles and angels are sent ones.—To go at one's own charges, or upon one's own responsibility, would disqualify anyone from the use of these titles. Angels are messengers, and as such must be sent on their errand: "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation" (Heb. i. 14).

When we read concerning John the Baptist: "Behold, I send My messenger before Thy face" (Matt. xi. 10), we not only have the word "send", but in the word "messenger" we also have the word "angel", for the Greek word is aggelos.

The very idea of the word "apostle" is that of a sent one, for apostello is translated "to send" scores of times. For example:--

> "How shall they preach except they be sent?" (Rom. x. 15).
> "Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel" (I Cor. i. 17).

The same holds good of the word "ambassador". An ambassador who did not represent a person or power who sent him is a contradiction in terms:--

> "Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us" (II Cor. v. 20).
> "He sendeth an ambassage, and desireth conditions of peace" (Luke xiv. 32).

Secondly, ambassadors, apostles and angels deliver the message given to them.—This most obvious fact is not, alas, so patent when we begin to take stock of our own service or that of others. The apostle said to the Corinthians:--

> "I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received" (I Cor. xv. 3).

The close association of being "sent" and being told what to "say" is exemplified in the commission of Isaiah:-- > "Whom shall I send, and who will go for us? Then said I, Here am I: send me. And He said, Go and tell" (Isa. vi. 8, 9).

Lastly (and this note we hope to strike again and again for our encouragement and for an example) these special features of service are found in all their fullness in the Son of God Himself. Neither Peter nor Paul can claim the title, "The Chief Apostle", for this belongs to the Lord: "Consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus" (Heb. iii. 1). He was pre-eminently the Sent One, and, as such, He delivered the message entrusted to Him:--

> "My doctrines is not Mine, but His that sent Me" (John vii. 16).
> "I have not spoken of Myself; but the Father which sent Me, He gave Me a commandment, what I should say, and what I should speak" (John xii. 49).

If Paul, in his conception of what a true ambassador should be, could say, "as though God did beseech you by us", how much more could this be said of Christ!

> "No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him" (John i. 18).
>
> "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father" (John xiv. 9).

Further, the prophet Malachi refers to Christ under the symbol of an angel, saying:--

> "The Lord Whom ye seek shall suddenly come to his temple, even the messenger (angel) of the covenant" (Mal. iii. 1).

Let us learn from these symbols of true service what is essential in our own, so that, however lowly our ambassage may be, or however limited the sphere of our ministry, we shall at least have the comfort and the encouragement of knowing that we have been "sent", and that He has said, "Go . . . . . tell". Jeremiah knew this double aspect of service, and with the Lord's words to him on the day when he was commissioned, we will end this article:--

> "Thou shalt go to all that I shall SEND thee, and whatsoever I command thee thou shalt SPEAK" (Jer. i. 7).

#5. Symbols of Service: Bondservant, builder and burden-bearer.

pp. 161 - 163

The glorious doctrine of liberty which is characteristic of the ministry of the apostle Paul must ever be ours to maintain against all odds. It is interesting, however, to notice that, while this liberty is sounded out with clarion notes in the epistle to the Galatians, at the close of the epistle the apostle shows that he, the champion of freedom, who stood alone before the Council at Jerusalem against those who would bring the believer into bondage, was at heart the bondslave of Jesus Christ: "I bear in my body the marks (stigmata, brand marks of a slave) of the Lord Jesus" (Gal. vi. 17). Again, in Gal. v. 13: "For, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another." Redemption, which sets us free, binds us for ever to the Lord: "Ye are not your own. For ye are bought with a price" (I Cor. vi. 19, 20).

The reader should remember that in the following passages the word "servant" in the A.V. is the translation of doulos, meaning, literally, "a slave":--

> "Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ" (Rom. i. 1).
> "Ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake" (II Cor. iv. 5).
> "If I pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ" (Gal. i. 10).
> "He took upon Him the form of a servant" (Phil. ii. 7).
> "The servant of the Lord must not strive" (II Tim. ii. 24).

Peter, James and Jude, equally with Paul, rejoice to call themselves "the bondslaves of Jesus Christ" (James i. 1; II Pet. i. 1; Jude 1). In the following passages in the A.V. the word translated "to serve" is, in the original, douleuo, "to serve as a slave":--

> "That we should serve in newness of spirit" (Rom. vii. 6).
> "Fervent in spirit; serving the Lord" (Rom. xii. 11).
> "Use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another" (Gal. v. 13).
> "Ye turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God" (I Thess. i. 9).

The first occurrence of doulos in the N.T. is in Matt. viii. 9, and the words of the centurion give us a good idea of what the service of the Lord's bondmen involves:--

> "For I also am a man under authority, having soldiers under me; and I say to this man, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it."

The words of Mary might well be the motto for all who would serve thus: "Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it."

The second symbol of service that we are to consider is that of the builder. We propose to divide the subject into three sections: the foundation, the building and the materials.

(1) The foundation.—Every building needs a foundation. A house "founded upon a rock" stands; "built upon the sand", it falls (Matt. vii. 25-27). The foundation for all spiritual building must be Christ:--

> "For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ" (I Cor. iii. 11).

All service subsequent to the initial service of the apostle Paul, is related to his work, as the work of the builder is to that of the architect. "As a wise architect ("master builder": Greek, architekton), I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon" (I Cor. iii. 10). No service that we can render can be acceptable unless we build upon the one foundation laid by God's architect, which foundation is Christ Himself.

(2) The building.—Our chief concern is in the building; God Himself has secured the foundation. If we are to serve acceptably, not only must we build upon God's foundation, but we must see that what we build is God's building, for any other erection there is unwarranted:--

> "For we are labourers together with God: ye are God's husbandry, ye are God's building" (I Cor. iii. 9).

How much service is rendered useless by the one fact that what is being built is not "God's building". Each reader who reads these words of God, should review the work he has in hand, and ask himself whether or not his energies are engaged in "God's building". This enquiry must not be limited to social and philanthropic service, for the highest service, even the preaching of His Word, may fail in relation to "God's building", as did that of those who preached Christ "even of envy and strife" (Phil. i. 15).

(3) The materials.—In any building scheme, quite apart from spiritual things, the material used is of great importance—as can be seen by inspecting the architect's specifications for a large building. Supposing that we are building upon the true foundation, and that we are occupied with God's building, all will be in vain if our materials is not according to specification. It is evident from I Cor. iii. that the building material represents the builder's "work" and that it is to be tried by fire:--

> "Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is" (I Cor. iii. 12, 13).

Enough has been said, we trust, under this head, to throw some light upon service viewed as building. We now close with a reference to the third subdivision:--

Burden-bearing.

> "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ" (Gal. vi. 2).
> "We then that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves" (Rom. xv. 1).
> "Support the weak, be patient to all men" (I Thess. v. 14).

The first thought is that of burden-sharing. Gal. vi. 2 does not exhort that the strong should bear the burdens of the weak, but that each should bear the other's burdens. How far do we respond to this? Perhaps our own burdens would be lightened if we thought more of the burdens of others. A person may feel unwell and very sorry for himself, but an accident to another, happening in his presence and demanding immediate help, will usually enable him to forget his own troubles in the endeavour to share others which are greater.

Some burdens are referred to as "infirmities" of the "weak", and, with regard to these, those who are "strong" must remember that their strength is not for selfish ends but for the common good.

Finally, burden-bearing must be accompanied by patience, and must be devoid of self-pleasing; otherwise the service rendered will lose its spiritual value.

Ambassador, Apostle, Angel, Bondservant, Builder, Burden-bearer.—These constitute the Christian's "A B C" of service. When they have been learned, we shall be able to make further advance.

#6. Symbols of Service.
A calling, a cleansing and a committing.
pp. 216 - 218

We have seen that none can truly serve who have not been sent, and that none can truly build unless occupied with God's building. We are now to learn the related truth that no man takes office of himself:--

> "And no man taketh this honour unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron. So also Christ glorified not Himself to be made an High Priest" (Heb. v. 4, 5).

The servant of the Lord says, "Here am I, send me", but never, "Here am I, I'm going".

The first symbol of service, then, is calling, and the apostle, whose office has already been before us as that of a "sent one", is also a symbol of true service in that he is likewise a "called one". "Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ, called to be an apostle" (Rom. i. 1). Strictly speaking the words read, "a called apostle". In Rom. i. 5, Paul speaks of "grace and apostleship", and in Gal. i. 15, again speaking of his office, he says:--

> "But when it pleased God, Who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by His grace."

The call to service is "by grace", for there is no more room for merit here than in our salvation.

The word "calling", in Scripture, denotes occupation, employment, or profession, and is therefore identical in meaning with present-day usage:--

> "Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called" (I Cor. vii. 20).

Let us remember that our service is a calling: that we cannot serve without divine appointment, and that it is far better to serve in a lowly capacity, and please God, than to grieve the Holy Spirit of God by selfchoosing, remembering, together with our opening text, Hebrews v. 4, 5, that "Even Christ pleased not Himself" (Rom. xv. 3).

Let us now give attention to the second symbol of service, namely, cleanliness, that those who are called to serve the Lord are called to be clean:--

> "Be ye clean, that bear the vessels of the Lord" (Isa. liii. 11).

We naturally turn to the great symbolic teaching of the tabernacle for illustration of this important qualification. Lev. xxii. sets forth the necessity for the priests of Israel to be clean:--

> "Say unto them, Whosoever he be of all your seed among your generations, that goeth unto the holy things, which the children of Israel hallow unto the Lord, having his uncleanness upon him, that soul shall be cut off from My presence: I am the Lord" (Lev. xxii. 3).

The whole chapter should be read and the several items re-interpreted in the light of spiritual realities. One passage that puts the same truth in New Testament terms in II Tim. ii. 20, 21:--

> "But in a great house there are not only vessels of gold and of silver, but also of wood and of earth; and some to honour, and some to dishonour. If a man therefore purge himself from these, he shall be a vessel unto honour, sanctified, and meet for the master's use, and prepared unto every good work."

Fellowship among saints is not based upon knowledge, or even upon agreement as to interpretation of Scripture. It is based upon the fact that all are saved by grace, that all are in Christ, and that all are built upon the one foundation. Some, however, would extend this to form a ground for fellowship in ministry. This is quite a different matter. Such must "purge themselves from these".

We are apt to limit the cause of uncleanness of the servants of the Lord to contact with others, but there is at least one aspect where uncleanness arises from the servant himself. In the verse we quote the word "pure" is often translated "clean", and it has that meaning here:--

> "Wherefore I take you to record this day, that I am pure from the blood of all men, for I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God" (Acts xx. 26, 27).

It is evident by the presence of the word "for" that any teacher who does withhold truth from those under his charge is not clean in the sight of God.

The symbol of this phase of service is a watchman, as set forth in Ezek. xxxiii. 1-6, where it is enunciated that if a watchman give not warning and any die by the sword, "His blood will I require at the watchman's hand".

The third symbol of service in this group is committal. Let us note how the apostle speaks of this to Timothy in his two epistles:--

> "The glorious gospel of the blessed God, which was committed to my trust" (I Tim. i. 11).
> "O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust" (I Tim. vi. 20).
> "I know Whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to keep that which was committed unto Him against that day . . . . . That good thing which was committed unto thee keep by the Holy Ghost which dwelleth in us" (II Tim. i. 12-14).
> "The things that thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also" (II Tim. ii. 2).

Something has been committed to our trust. This we must guard as life itself. Nothing, however attractive, however apparently good or useful, can ever warrant the slightest departure from faithful stewardship.

All true service necessitates a call, demands cleanness, and is a glorious committal.

"When the commandment came"

(Being a series of articles based upon the testimony of readers as to the particular passage of Scripture that was used to enlighten them as to the unique character of the Dispensation of the Mystery).

#1. Matthew xiii. and deliverance from tradition.

pp. 201 - 204

In The Berean Expositor for April, 1933, the following note appeared:--

>
> In conversation with several of our readers, we have been interested to learn of the various passages of Scripture that have been used to enlighten and bring about conviction as to the truth of the Dispensation of the Mystery. We believe it would form the basis of a useful series of articles, if we knew what 'commandment came' (Rom. vii. 9) to our readers in this connection.
>
> May we ask all who can, to let us have a note stating simply what passage of Scripture was thus used. We need hardly say that all communications on the subject will be treated in confidence, and in any subsequent use of the information no clue will be given as to the identity of the writer.
> We believe that personal testimony is often of weight where studied argument fails, and we hope that the series contemplated may assist to fill out our witness."

A number of readers have replied, answering our question and giving information concerning the particular passage that was used of God to open their eyes to the truth of the mystery.

While using the information given, we shall respect the anonymity of each writer, and trust that nothing we say in comment will do other than magnify the grace of God, lead some hesitating reader to a reconsideration of the testimony of the Lord's prisoner, and so be instrumental in leading the redeemed of the Lord on to the heights of grace as revealed in this present dispensation.

We select for our opening article the case of one who by the exposition given of Matt. xiii. had prejudice removed, found tradition untrustworthy, was made willing to "search and see", and so was led to full acceptance of the truth.

Matt. xiii. contains not one single word that refers to the church of this present dispensation. It deals with the new phase of kingdom purposes that necessarily followed the non-repentance of Israel (Matt. xi. 20-24) and the rejection of the Lord in His three great offices (Matt. xii. 6, 41, 42). Matt. xiii. gives us "The mysteries of the kingdom of heaven", and it is a distortion of truth to attempt to make that clearly defined kingdom cover either the real or the professing church. Tradition has great hold upon Matt. xiii. Not only does it attempt to fit into it the history of Christendom during the past 1,900 years, but it degrades the gospel of the grace of God by attempting to illustrate its glories by such symbols of evil as “leaven”, or it frustrates the apostle’s insistence upon grace without works, by misusing the parable of the “pearl” as of a seeking sinner, who has to “sell all he has” to purchase a free salvation!

The recognition of these features had their cumulative effect, but the item above all else that broke the shackles of tradition was the fact that expositors actually omitted one parable. Book after book, and quotation after quotation can be read where “The seven Parables of Matt. xiii.” are spoken of with complete assurance.

Some few years before The Berean Expositor was issued a spiritual crisis in the life of the Editor made him declare that from henceforth he would accept no man’s statement—however learned or however good—but would bring every interpretation, translation or structure, whatever it might be, to the touchstone of the Word. The reader will consequently understand why this magazine was called “The Berean Expositor”.

The need having arisen for an exposition of Matt. xiii., the present writer remembers some 27 years ago taking a sheet of paper and writing the heading: “The seven Parables of Matt. xiii.” After commencing an examination of the chapter, it occurred to him that he was allowing to pass unquestioned the number “seven”, and though it appeared foolish, he nevertheless thought it would be good to see for himself. The result was so illuminating, and the blow to traditional teaching palpable, that not only did it prove the commandment that “came” to the one upon whose convictions we are now commencing, but it settled for ever the policy of the Editor as to all subsequent investigations.

Instead of seven parables, Matt. xiii. contains eight. These are arranged in perfect symmetry, and form the only true basis for their exposition. Whoever has once seen this perfect correspondence realizes that no amount of erudition or ability will ever compensate for its omission. As some of our readers may not possess Volume II/III (which, however, is obtainable from the Secretary), we set out afresh the structure of the parables of Matt. xiii., so that all may see for themselves that this disposition of subject-matter and this enumeration of the parables is true:--

The eight parables of Matthew xiii.

[NOTE.—Appendix 145 of The Companion Bible was our contribution at the request of the Editor of that wonderful work.]

It is not our purpose to give an exposition of these parables. We content ourselves here with their place in the testimony. One positive feature that gave added weight to this interpretation of the parables, however, must be included.

We observed that not until the Lord was evidently rejected (Matt. xi., xii.) did the word "mystery" appear upon the pages of Scripture, and that it is coupled with a very solemn quotation from Isa. vi. 10. An examination of the Acts of the Apostles shows that as Israel in the land rejected their Messiah, so did Israel of the dispersion, and therefore Acts xxviii. stands to the wider testimony as Matt. xiii. does to the people of the land. In Acts xxviii. Israel fail, and evidential miracles cease. This failure is anticipated in Matt. xi. 20-24 and xiii. 58. There (Acts xxviii.) as in Matt. xiii., Isa. vi. 10 is solemnly quoted, and immediately after the rejection of Israel which then took place "mystery" again follows, this time, not the mystery of the kingdom of heaven, but the dispensation of the mystery as made known to Paul, the Lord's prisoner.

We gather from this testimony, that one of the greatest hindrances to the full acceptance of the truth is the blinding power of tradition, that confuses kingdom with church, and does not recognize the true place of the gospel of the kingdom in the purpose of the ages. We commend this testimony to all who seek to know "what is the dispensation of the mystery" (Eph. iii. 9, R.V.).

#2. Ephesians i. 1 and the breaking of prejudice.
pp. 221 - 222

In our opening article we gave the testimony of one who was delivered from the bondage of tradition and so made ready to receive the truth.

Those who subscribe to traditional views are often very godly and well-meaning people, and fear that unless drastic action is taken, they will not be able to prevent some of their friends from being "led astray". This is of course commendable in its spirit, even though it confuses light with darkness, but many times, however, this zeal for traditional teaching leads to incorrect statements and misrepresentation. It is necessary to our witness that we stress the importance of giving heed to the four prison epistles—Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians and II Timothy, but we have never forgotten that the letter to Philemon is also a prison epistle, although obviously it does not occupy the fundamental place that these four do.

This omission has been seized upon by a critic, but we have felt it to be too trivial to merit an explanation. Our emphasis upon the four prison epistles was taken up by those who oppose our teaching, and the warning was sounded: "This man will rob you of your Bible, his consists of four epistles only."

This was the line of argument used in an endeavour to persuade the reader whose testimony we now give. Instead, however, of being deterred by the denunciation, this believer felt it was at least scriptural to let the Editor speak for himself, and a meeting was attended despite all warnings. The presence of this reader was unknown to the Editor at the time, and the subject dealt with was the epistle to the Ephesians, one of the four books that supposedly constituted the speaker's "Bible". The particular passage under consideration was Eph. i. 1, and the special feature of that verse was the word "faithful". Almost—as if in answer to the questioning that was going on in the hearer's mind (and who will deny that the Lord does intervene in His own time and way?)—the speaker turned from the peculiar testimony of the four prison epistles and, lifting up his Bible, declared that though it was maintained that in these four epistles alone could be discovered the revelation of the mystery, nevertheless believers in the mystery, as all other saints, needed the whole of the Scriptures from Genesis to Revelation in order that they might understand their own peculiar calling and sphere, and further, that the initial salvation and justification all must possess must be theirs also.

The stress upon the necessity for all Scripture, together with the presentation of the meaning and purpose of the word "faithful", was the commandment that "came". Entrance into the high glories of the mystery was perceived to be by "faith", just as salvation, peace, and any other blessings made known in the Word. Subsequently the warning that such teachers had no room for the rest of the Bible was found to be not only foolish but really a slander, for Eph. i. 4 demanded a close understanding of Gen. i. 2, and Eph. i. 7 demanded for its elucidation every type in the ceremonial law, together with the witness of the four Gospels, the Acts, and all the other Epistles.

It is not for us to argue about the elective purposes of God, but to remember that "faith" is as closely related to our appreciation of the teaching of Ephesians (i. 13, 15; ii. 8; iii. 17; iv. 5, 13; vi. 16) as it is with our justification or acceptance of the gift of life. While we preach and teach "the mystery", it is untrue or suggest that we "make a mystery of it". We seek by exposition, by exhortation, by printed page, and by spoken word to "make all men see what is the dispensation of the mystery" (Eph. iii. 9, R.V.).

We hope this series of simple testimonies will be honoured by the Lord and used to remove prejudices, to illuminate darkness, and bring light and blessing to many of our readers. Not only so, but we trust that our readers will find them of service when seeking to minister these precious doctrines to others. We cannot say which the Lord may use, either "this or that", so we publish, in faith, what has been sent, and leave the choice with Him.

"With all thy getting, get understanding" (Prov. iv. 7).

#6. Definition.

pp. 38 - 40

One of the most fruitful causes of fallacy and false reasoning is lack of definition, or the use of faulty definition. "Gentlemen, define your terms", is a wise saying that bears repetition.

Much of the criticism of the teaching for which The Berean Expositor stands is so much wasted effort because of this very thing. Our critic, either through a disregard of our definitions, or the intrusion of their own into their criticism of our ministry, often beat the air. With us the terms "mystery", "dispensation of the mystery", "The prison ministry of Paul", "Acts xxviii.", "Pentecost", "hope and prize", "new covenant", "kingdom truth", and "dispensational truth", have all received definition, and are used in our writings with, we believe, precision. If this be ignored our critics must not be displeased if their remarks appear to fall upon deaf ears.

A definition signifies the laying down of a boundary, and is used in logic to signify an expression which explains any term in such a manner as to separate it from everything else. It will, therefore, be fitting if the article on Classification is followed by one on Definition. Definitions are nominal, when they establish the meaning of the word, or real when they establish the nature of a thing. A good definition states what are regarded as the "constituent parts of the essence", and must contain "the constituent characteristics of the concept" (a concept being the general notion or idea representative of a whole class of things, as man).

Such a definition must be clearly and grammatically expressed in unambiguous terms, and must be universally true of the defined class. It must, moreover, be reciprocal, as, for example, "A parallelogram is a four sided figure with parallel sides". So, in Eph. i. 22, 23, following the Greek, we read: "and gave Him Head over all things to the church, which is the body of Him." The definition "The church is the body" is in nowise impaired if reversed—"The body is the church".

If the definition be a good one the subject and the predicate must be reversible without prejudice to the sense. Several rules have been laid down for the framing of a definition:-

(1) The definition must be adequate; i.e., neither too extensive nor too narrow for the thing defined; e.g., to define a 'fish' as 'an animal that lives in water', would be too extensive, because many insects, etc., live in water. To define a fish as 'an animal that has an air-bladder', would be too narrow, because many fish are without any."

(2) The definition must be in itself plainer than the thing defined. This rule includes the style in which the definition is framed as well as its truthfulness. Figurative expressions should be avoided, too great brevity may obscure, just as prolixity may confuse. Tautology is a fault to be shunned. Thus to define a parallelogram as 'A four-sided figure whose opposite sides are parallel and equal', would be tautological

> . . . . . the insertion of the words 'and equal' leaves, and indeed leads, a reader to suppose that there may be a four-sided figure whose opposite sides are parallel and not equal. Much is often inferred in this manner which was by no means in the Author's mind; thus, he who says that it is a crime for people to violate the property of a humane landlord who lives among them, may perhaps not imply that it is no crime to violate the property of an absentee landlord, or of one who is not humane; but he leaves an opening for being so understood.

Many attempts at definition fail because they do not name the genus. It is no definition to say, "So and so is a a thing which", etc., or "So and is when", etc. "A thing" and "when" do not state the genus and lead to nowhere. At school most of us learned that "a noun is the name of anything", but this definition fails to give the genus, for it does not make clear that a noun is a word. How should we define the word "rock"? "A rock is anything which forms part of the earth's crust" fails because it does not name the genus. But "A rock is a material substance which forms part of the earth's crust" would be a correct definition.

The first rule of definition is:--

> "A definition should not contain more than the connotation of the term in question" (Venn).

Suppose I were to define a student as "A human being residing in an educational institution, and devoted to the pursuit of knowledge", I should violate this rule. The undue limitation of the class by the quality "residing in an educational institute" makes the definition worthless.

A further rule is:--

> "A definition should not contain less than the full connotation" (Venn).

The following is an example of failure to observe this rule: "A map is a representation of some part of the universe." This definition fails in two respects: it lacks the word pictorial and unnecessarily includes too much, namely, "the universe":--

> "This is perhaps the commonest fault of any, as we are apt to feel satisfied if our definition covers the case we have in our immediate view, and to omit to examine whether it does not also admit something else of which we were not at the moment thinking" (Venn).

"A definition must not contain the name defined", says Jevons, for by subjecting a term to definition we assume that it is not thoroughly understood, and the repetition of the unknown term cannot, therefore, make it known.

The following are examples of definitions faulty in this respect:--

> A noun is the name of anything.
> Life is the sum of vital functions.

The fact "noun" and "name", "life" and "vital" are essentially identical is sufficient to render the definitions valueless:--

> "A definition must not be negative where it can be affirmative" (Jevons).

The importance of all this to the student of Scripture, the teacher and preacher, requires, we trust, no further emphasis. Before any article of our faith can be clearly believed by ourselves, or made known to others, it must be thrown into the form of a proposition that either affirms or denies some attribute of the subject. How can we affirm or deny if we use our terms loosely? What an incentive, therefore, to go to the Scriptures and seek true definitions that shall be neither too wide or too narrow; that shall be reciprocal, grammatical and unambiguous. Surely every reader will feel a desire to be able thus to complete the following affirmations: God is . . . . . Faith is . . . . . Sin is . . . . . Justification is . . . . . Sanctification is . . . . ., etc. To do so is to have taken a great step toward that understanding which Scripture itself places so highly.

#7. Propositions.
pp. 88 - 90

We have now run over the chief elements that go to compose a proposition. Logic, strictly speaking, is occupied with proof, not assertion, but in these articles we are free to consider any and all aspects of the question as to what constitutes a valid argument. Many a time the error does not lie in the mode of reasoning, but in the proposition itself and, therefore, before proceeding to give some idea of the syllogism, and its use in arriving at a "proof", we will bring together in this article one or two somewhat axiomatic notes concerning assertions or propositions.

An assertion has reference to facts contained in a proposition. A proof discriminates between true and false propositions. Assertion, moreover, cannot be separated from the kindred study of the meaning of words, definitions, and the like:--

> "Every proposition asserts that some given subject does or does not possess some attribute, or that some attribute is or is not (either in all, or in some portion, of the subject in which it is met with) conjoined with some other attribute."

Let us now review the four different kinds of propositions. The first form is called the "contrary". Its formula is one of the following. Either "All A is B" or "No A is B". It is obvious that the two propositions cannot both be true, and we therefore would do well to remember the axiom.

Contrary propositions may both be false. They cannot both be true. While the first item, "contrary propositions may be false", is obvious, it is necessary to be on one's guard, for a false reasoning sometimes assumes that while contrary propositions may both be false, one must be true. This, however, is a snare. Simply to deny that "All A is B" does not, of necessity, admit that "No A is B".

Contrary propositions differ in quantity, quality, or both, and the truth or falsity of any proposition depends on the subject-matter of the proposition.

Subject-matter may be (1) Necessary, or (2) Contingent. For example, Whately gives the following illustration:--

> (1) NECESSARY MATTER.— " 'All islands are surrounded by water'. This must be so, because the matter is necessary. To say 'No islands are surrounded by water' or 'Some islands are not surrounded by water' is manifestly false."
> (2) CONTINGENT MATTER.—" 'Some islands are fertile': 'Some are not fertile'. These assertions are both true because the matter is contingent. If we use 'All' or 'No' with contingent matter our propositions will be false. It is necessarily true that all islands are surrounded by water; it is not necessarily true that all islands are fertile, barren, sandy, rocky, etc., etc."

We trust the reader will not lightly set these things aside: to keep these principles well before the mind will save from many snares. We arrive, therefore, at the following:--

> All affirmatives, in necessary matter, are true, and negatives false.
> All universals, in contingent matter, are false, and particulars are true.
> "All" and "No", in contingent matter, render the proposition false. Many erroneous doctrines will be found under this heading.

The second form of proposition is called the "Sub contrary". In this case, both positive and negative may be true: they cannot, however, both be false. We must therefore learn to distinguish these "sub contraries" from the ordinary contraries. The formula for this proposition is "Some A is B". "Some A is not B." It is self-evident that if some A is B then some A is not B. In Col. i. we learn that principalities and powers are among those which have been reconciled by the cross. In Col. ii. we learn that principalities and powers were among those that were spoiled and stript off by the cross. To use "all" in either of these cases will be evidently untrue. We must say:--

> "Some principalities and powers were reconciled to God by the cross, and Some principalities and powers were not reconciled to God by the cross."

If the reader will consult the writings of those who advocate universal reconciliation, he will discover great prominence given to the passage that occurs in Col. i., but great reticence over the passage that occurs in Col. ii.

We now come to what is called the "Contradictories". The formulæ are as follows: "All A is B"; "Some A is not B", and "No A is B"; "Some A is B."

The rule to remember is that of two contradictory propositions, one must be true and the other false. If it is true that "all men are sinners", then it is false to assert that "some men are not sinners". If it be true to assert that "No men are righteous", then it is false to affirm that "Some men are righteous". If, therefore, we discover that the Scriptures in one place say “There is none righteous”, and in another place speak of a man as “righteous”, we are immediately aware that the word is being used in two different senses. Our proposition therefore needs amending, so as to read:--

> No men are righteous by nature.
> Some men are righteous through grace.

The fourth kind of proposition is called the “sub-alternate”. The formulæ for this are: “All A is B”; “Some A is B”, and “No A is B”; “Some A is not B.”

It stands to reason that if “all men are sinners”, then “some men are sinners”. There can be no “exceptions”.

Of two sub-alternate propositions, the truth of the universal (“all”) proves the truth of the particular (“some”), but the truth of the particular (“some”) does not necessarily imply the truth of the universal (“all”). This is a most important reservation, and one that is often forgotten. Because Christ has redeemed some men, it does not necessarily follow that He has redeemed all: that still remains to be proved on other grounds.

In conclusion, let the reader ponder the following statements:--

> “Logic is the entire theory of the ascertainment of reasoned or inferred truth.”
> “Inconceivability is no criterion of impossibility.”

How many put forward as a valid argument such statements as: “It is not conceivable that a God of love should . . . . .” This is not an argument. It has no valid premises, and appeals merely to sentiment, bias or sectarianism. Again, do not be misled by such a statement as the following: “An assertion is either true or false”, for some propositions are called “unmeaning” because they do not use terms in an intelligent sense. What is true is:--

> “A proposition must be either true or false, provided the predicate be one which can be in an intelligent sense an attribute of the subject.”

It is because this is so, that we have devoted so much space and time to the elements that go to make up the proposition, and seeing that we, as students of the Word, find our material in the inspired words of Scripture, what a need there is, before we begin to reason or argue, to be as sure as possible that the terms we use are fit representations of the truth as given by God.

#8. The Syllogism.
pp. 129 - 133

> "There are three operations of the mind which are immediately concerned in Argument; which are called by logical writers: 1st Simple Apprehension; 2nd Judgment; 3rd Discourse or Reasoning" (Whately).

Simple Apprehension refers to that act of the mind which receives a notion of an object. Such apprehension may be Incomplex, as of "a book", or "a shelf", or Complex, as of "a book on a shelf".

Judgment compares together two notions, and pronounces whether they agree or disagree. Judgment either affirms or denies.

Reasoning or Inference proceeds from certain judgments to others founded upon them. If the process of reasoning be from particulars to generals it is called "Induction". If from generals to particulars it is called "Ratiocination".

Modern Science is largely inductive. The scientist observes some phenomenon. He gathers data, examples and parallels, until he arrives at a general principle. Such a general principle becomes one of the so-called "laws of nature". The "laws" may or may not be true. There can of necessity be no finality about the process by which they are obtained, and at any moment some added discovery may upset the whole preceding calculation.

We do not, in our study of Scripture, use the inductive process so much as the deductive. We start with revealed truth, and descend from the general to the particular. The Scripture does not set out to prove the existence of God by induction. It says: "He that cometh unto God must believe that He is" (Heb. xi. 6).

The syllogistic form of argument is one that can be used successfully by the student of Scripture, and we propose to give this form an examination. The Greek word sullogizomai that gives us the word "syllogism" is found in Luke xx. 5, 6:--

> "And they reasoned with themselves, saying, If we shall say, From heaven; He will say, Why then believed ye Him not? But and if we say, Of men; all the people will stone us: for they be persuaded that John was a prophet."

Every argument consists of two parts: that which is proved, and the means whereby it is proved. If the conclusion be stated last, which is the strict logical form, then the means used are called the premises, and the conclusion is introduced by the word "therefore".

Every syllogism has three and only three terms.

The conclusion is called the minor term; the predicate, the major term; and that with which each is separately compared, in order to judge whether each agrees or not, the middle term.

Every syllogism has three, and only three, propositions.

The first proposition is the major premise, in which the major term is compared with the middle term; the second proposition is the minor premise, in which the minor is compared, again with the middle term. And in the third proposition, the minor term is compared with the major. An example will perhaps make the syllogistic form of reasoning clearer:--

Light is contrary to darkness.
Sunshine is light; therefore Sunshine is contrary to darkness.

We have chosen this particular illustration because we desire to point out one or two possible pitfalls in argument:--

The ambiguous middle term.

Light is contrary to darkness.
Feathers are light; therefore Feathers are contrary to darkness.

The inaccuracy arises out of the fact that the word "light" has two meanings; and shows most forcefully the necessity for a definition of terms before an argument is begun.

The undistributed middle term.

White is a colour;
Black is a colour; therefore
Black is white.

Here the use of the word "colour" is misleading.

The illicit process of the major.

All quadrupeds are animals;
A bird is not a quadruped; therefore
It is not an animal.

This is a case of the illicit process of the major term, and the inaccuracy arises from the employment of the whole of the term "animal" in the conclusion, when only a part of it has been employed in the premises. "No term must be distributed in the conclusion which was not distributed in one of the premises."

From negative premises nothing can be inferred.

A fish is not a quadruped.
A bird is not a quadruped.

No further step can be taken.

If one premise be negative, the conclusion must be negative.

There are nineteen forms or figures in which syllogisms may appear, but all valid argument admits of being stated in the first of these figures with its four moods. As we are not writing for students of logic, but simply to help the student of Scripture, we shall not burden the reader with an explanation of these nineteen figures, but will deal only with the first of them.

The first mood is suited to the discovery or proof of the properties of a thing. Its construction is as follows:--

All B is C . . . . . All Scripture is inspired (II Tim. iii. 16).
All A is B . . . . . Paul's epistles are scripture (II Pet. iii. 16).
THEREFORE
All A is C . . . . . Paul epistles are inspired.

The best illustration of this mood is three concentric circles, the largest being "C", the next "B" and the smallest, "A".

The second mood is suited to the discovery or proof of the distinctions that exist between things. Its construction is as follows:--

No B is C . . . . . "The mystery" is not revealed in the O.T.
All A is B . . . . . "Gentiles in heavenly places" is part of "the mystery".
THEREFORE
No A is C . . . . . "Gentiles in heavenly places" is not revealed in the O.T.

Here we must imagine two concentric circles "B" and "A" with one separate circle "C" standing apart.

The third mood is suited to the discovery or proof of instances and exceptions. Its construction is as follows:--

All B is C . . . . . The doctrine of redemption belongs to the whole Bible.
Some A is B . . . Some of the teaching of the mystery is the doctrine of redemption.
THEREFORE
Some A is C . . . Some of the teaching of the mystery will be found in the whole Bible.

It will be seen that this form of argument is adapted to exceptions. As a revelation, the mystery does not form a part of all Scripture, but belongs to the prison ministry of Paul. There is need, however, to distinguish between the doctrinal basis which it shares in common with other callings, and that dispensational super-structure that constitutes its distinctive feature.

The fourth mood is suited to the discovery or proof of the exclusion of different species of a genus. Its construction is as follows:--

No B is C . . . . . No covenants are found in the mystery.
Some A is B . . . . . Some scriptural blessings are new covenant blessings.
THEREFORE
Some A is not C . . . Some scriptural blessings are not found in the mystery.

These four forms constitute the four moods of the first figure of the syllogism, and, as all propositions may be reduced to one or other of these forms, we shall not pursue the matter further. "If an argument can be analyzed into these forms, and you admit its propositions, you are bound in consistency to admit the conclusion" (Minto).

The axiom of the syllogism has been expressed in many ways; perhaps the easiest is the following: "What is said of a whole is, said of every one of its parts." If you admit that a leaf is in a book, and that the same book is in your pocket, you admit that the leaf must be in your pocket also.

We can quite understand that the foregoing pages may prove very unattractive to some of our readers. We can only treat our subject by stating the facts and giving examples; and this we have done with as few technical terms as possible. It would make the matter clearer to the reader if he would himself compose a few examples of each of the four moods here given, if possible visualizing them in diagram form, using concentric, separate and interlocking circles. We now leave the syllogism for other features that we trust will prove of service in the quest of "understanding".

#9. The fallacy.
An example of fallacious reasoning.
pp. 175 - 178

Before embarking upon any classification of fallacies, we would seek to interest the reader and prepare the way by considering one or two examples of fallacious arguments that bear upon the teaching of Scripture and touch upon subjects of great interest to all who in any measure endorse the teaching of The Berean Expositor.

We therefore draw attention to the "unsound mode of arguing, which appears to demand our conviction, and to be decisive of the question in hand, when in fairness it is not", that is found in a pamphlet entitled: Is Conditional Immortality True? (by F. W. Pitt).

The pamphlet opens with an attempt to prejudice the reader against the doctrine of Conditional Immortality, by associating it with Evolution:--

> "It is a remarkable fact that with the advancement of the Darwinian Theory of Evolution the doctrine of annihilation became popular."

No attempt is made to justify this association; it is left to work upon the sensitiveness of the believer. A further appeal to prejudice is the substitution without comment or explanation of the word "annihilation" for "conditional immortality".

The next paragraph reads:--

> "When belief in the fall of man was widely abandoned and a more or less materialistic view of his nature was adopted, a restatement of the doctrine of eternal punishment followed as a matter of course."

Again, this creates a prejudice and would lead the uninstructed to imagine that the doctrine of Conditional Immortality denies the fall of man, an inference which would be completely false.

Again, the author writes:--

> "It would be difficult to find a pamphlet written by opponents of eternal punishment which does not prejudice its argument by the suggestion that it is inconceivable that a loving, heavenly Father will punish His children with endless torment."

We can at least find one pamphlet that makes no such appeal—our own pamphlet entitled: Hell, or Pure from the blood of all men. Moreover, it is not the teaching on either side that a loving, heavenly Father punishes "His children", either by destruction or by eternal torment. He punishes the unsaved.

Further, the author writes:--

> "Without going to the Word of God, even for its terms, Conditionalists have decided that, since the Fall, man has in his nature no element which survives death."

Anyone who is acquainted with the work of Edward White, Canon Constable and J. R. Norrie, to mention only three names, will know that the above statement is not true to the facts.

The appeal to prejudice continues throughout the pamphlet. "A hesitating support"; "Texts are bent to the theory"; "Figures are manipulated". Such expressions as these appear in its pages without reference, proof or support.

Another phase of prejudice is illustrated by further statements on pages 5 and 6. Mr. Pitt writes:--

> "It is impossible to believe the scriptural truth of the Atonement and the doctrine of Conditional Immortality at the same time."

And the reasons given are as follows:--

> "The Conditionalist must be wrong, because if Christ did substitutionally dies for sinners, He was annihilated."

> "When we argue that Christ must have been annihilated, if annihilation is the penalty of sin, the Conditionalist retorts that He must suffer endless torment, if that is what the unsaved is to endure."

Mr. Pitt cannot see the perfect fairness of this retort; the argument that condemns the Conditionalist condemns him also, but prejudice prevents him from realizing it.

Throughout this pamphlet we find illustrations of another type of false argument, which is very common in controversy—the process of putting words and phrases into the mouth of one's opponent and then condemning him. Advocates of Conditional Immortality quote the words, "The wages of sin is death"; Mr. Pitt puts into their mouths the words "annihilation". If death were not followed by resurrection, then death would approximate to annihilation; but the latter term can rightly be used of the second death, for Conditionalists universally acknowledge the teaching of Scripture concerning a resurrection of both just and unjust.

Another weak point in the pamphlet is the way in which "authorities" are introduced. On page 6 we read:--

> "Montgomery says in an exquisite concentration of truth, 'It is not all of life to life; not all of death to die'."

> "The spirit returns to God Who gave it, not to be 'merged in the ocean of eternal energy' as Spencer, a high priest of materialism, says, but to some abode appointed by God."

Strictly speaking, what was said by Montgomery or by Spencer, the high priest of materialism, is irrelevant; we are only concerned with "What saith the Scriptures?"

The following paragraph might almost serve as a classical example of the creation of prejudice in the writer's favour:--

> " 'Absent from the body'—'Present with the Lord'. To make this passage fit their theory, Conditionalists say that 'Present with the Lord' means present with Him after the resurrection. The context, however, is quite clear in its reference to the disembodied state. Taken as it is written, it leaves no doubt that the only reason for its perversion is that it is fatal to the annihilation theory" (page 12).

On page 9, the writer, speaking of this same passage, refers to "the statement that absent from the body is to be present with the Lord". After, therefore, misquoting the passage twice, Mr. Pitt has the temerity to speak of taking it "as it is written". Moreover, he appeals to the context, not by quoting it, but by assuming that it refers to "the disembodied state". It will be found, however, that the context speaks of not desiring to be "unclothed", but "clothed upon", that "mortality might be swallowed up of life". Surely this reference is not to "the disembodied state" (see I Cor. xv. 53, 54). The passage as it is written in II Cor. v. 8 is as follows:--

> "We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body and to be present with the Lord."

How, in face of the context, it "is quite clear in its reference to the disembodied state", we are quite unable to understand.

Another example of prejudice is the following:--

> "Christians who have a firm hold on the blessed hope of the Lord's second advent will scarcely need to be warned that it is impossible to believe both in Conditional Immortality and the Rapture of the Saints."

Mr. Pitt is difficult to follow; he commences with the Second Advent, but diverts immediately to the Rapture of the Saints, a different, though a related subject. That Conditionalism and belief in the Second Advent can go together is evident by the full title of the Mission that stands for Conditionalism in this country:--

> "THE CONDITIONAL IMMORTALITY MISSION---INTERNATIONAL.
> (FOR LIFE AND ADVENT TESTIMONY)."
> "This mission was established to bear testimony by press and platform to (1) the plenary inspiration and integrity of Holy Scripture; (2) the full atonement of our Lord Jesus Christ; (3) life in Christ alone; that is, that life is not inherent in man, or in any part of him, but is the free gift of God, through Jesus Christ, to all believers, and (4) the pre-millennial personal advent of Christ to reign over restored Israel and all nations."

While it is true that believers hold varying views as to what constitutes "a firm hold on the blessed hope of the Lord's second advent", and as to the "Rapture of the Saints", it is clear that Mr. Pitt's statement quoted above is contrary to the facts.

On page 15 comes the final instance of prejudice:--

> "It must suffice in a pamphlet to establish from Scripture the undeniable fact that the spirit of man is conscious after his body has been laid in the grave."

The reader whose critical caliber is such as to have been misled by the discussion of II Cor. v. 8 quoted above, will probably believe that Mr. Pitt's pamphlet is really packed with overwhelming proofs. It contains not one; yet such is the mind of man, that reasoning like this can pass for truth.

We consider this pamphlet an example of what to guard against in controversial literature.

Words in Season.

#17. Simple gospel notes on John iii. 16. (i.) The twofold basis.

pp. 97, 98

Two words will occupy our attention in this article. They are those with which John iii. 16 opens: For God. Taken together they bring before us the twofold authority for the good news called "the gospel".

For.—The first word, "for", takes us back to verse 14, and so to the inspiration and authority of the Old Testament:--

> "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up."

A superficial view of Christianity might lead one to ask whether it really matters what views are held as to the nature and extent of the inspiration of the O.T. Scriptures, provided that the death and resurrection of Christ are faithfully preached. To this we would reply by quoting the Lord's own words in the same Gospel:--

> "Had ye believe Moses, ye would have believed Me: for he wrote of Me. But if ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe My words?" (John v. 46, 47).

Here the matter is challenged by the Lord Himself, and a solemn responsibility rests upon every preacher of the gospel to face its issues. If Moses did not lift up the serpent in the wilderness, if the Book of Numbers is but a "pious fraud" belonging to a priestly caste, if the Saviour was mistaken concerning the Old Testament type, then we have no certainty, for the Lord may also have been mistaken concerning the reality. The cross and its purpose are at stake.

In the same way the gospel cannot be faithfully preached if the story of Jonah be denied, for the words of the Lord in Matt. xii. 39-41 show that a denial of the truth of the record of Jonah imperils the truth of the resurrection, and if the resurrection be touched, we have no gospel to preach (I Cor. xv. 14, 17). Or, again, if the record of the flood and of the days of Noah be repudiated as "myth", what becomes of "the coming of the Son of man" (Matt. xxiv. 37-41)? Or, coming to the gospel as proclaimed by Paul, can the epistle to the Romans remain unshaken if the historical accuracy of Genesis concerning Adam and Abraham be denied?

Our first note, therefore, is that the truth of the gospel and the inspiration of the Scriptures are inseparable:--

> "The word of the Lord endureth for ever. And THIS IS the word which by the gospel is preached unto you" (I Pet. i. 25).

God.—If the Word of God underlies the gospel, the God of the Word is its Author. The gospel is called "The gospel of God" (Rom. i. 1). It is "the power of God unto salvation" (Rom. i. 16). It is concerned with "the salvation of God" (Acts xxviii. 28). Its basis is "the righteousness of God" (Rom. i. 17). It issues in "the peace of God" (Phil. iv. 7), and its character is that of "the gospel of the grace of God" (Acts xx. 24).

No gospel that is authorized by the Scriptures originates from a Source lower than God Himself. The healing power was not in the serpent of brass, or in Moses who erected it, but in God: "Pray unto the Lord that He take away the serpents" (Numb. xxi. 7: See also II Kings xviii. 4). It was God Who prepared the great fish (Jonah i. 17). Jonah prayed to the Lord, and the Lord spake unto the fish and returned Jonah to the land of the living (Jonah ii. 10). Not all the carpenters in the days of Noah could have constructed an ark to withstand the onslaughts of that great deluge. It was the Lord Who shut Noah within the ark (Gen. vii. 16), and it was God Who "made a wind to pass over the earth" so that "the waters assuaged" (viii. 1).

This, then, is the twofold basis of the gospel—the inspired Word, in its type, prophecy, history and doctrine; and God, as the Author and Provider of all things necessary to make that gospel His power unto salvation.

#18. Simple gospel notes on John iii. 16.
(ii.) The manner and mainspring.
pp. 158 - 160

We have looked at the important bearing of the opening words of John iii. 16: "For God." Let us consider now the message contained in the words, "so loved".

So.—In this word is expressed the "manner" of the manifestation of the love of God: "For thus God loved the world." An illustration of this translation of the word is found in John iv. 6:--

> "Jesus, therefore, being wearied with his journey, sat THUS upon the well."

The word can also be translated, "after this manner" or "on this fashion" (See Matt. vi. 9; I Cor. vii. 7; Mark ii. 12).

It is of great importance, both in the preaching of the gospel and in the receiving of it, that we realize the importance of the way in which the love of God was manifested towards a sinful world. This, however, must be deferred while we look for a moment at the great mainspring of the gospel—love.

Three statements stand out in the N.T. concerning the Being of God: "God is spirit" (John iv. 24); "God is light" (I John i. 5); and "God is love" (I John iv. 8 and 16).

These three phases are related, in the same sequence, to worship, to fellowship, and to salvation. The three statements are made by John, one in the Gospel and two in the Epistle. The third, with which we are concerned in the present paper, is repeated twice.

The word "so" draws our attention to the "manner" in which God loved the world. The epistle of John reveals the one great "manifestation" of this love.

As we have seen in an earlier paper, "manifestation" is one of the key-words of this epistle. The Gospel of John commences with the words, "In the beginning", and deals with a time and work before man was created; the Epistle commences with, "That which was from the beginning", and immediately goes on to speak of "the life" that was "manifested" (verse 2). (See also I John iii. 10: "The children of God are manifested, and the children of the devil"; and iii. 2, 5, 8). So when the apostle speaks in chapter iv. of the love of God, he immediately proceeds to its one great demonstration:--

> "IN THIS was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent His only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through Him" (I John iv. 9).
>
> "IN THIS is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us, and sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins" (I John iv. 10).
> "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son" (John iii. 16).

The prime originating cause of salvation is the love of God. If this love is shewn to the undeserving, as it is, it is called "grace". If it contemplates the hopeless misery of man, it is called "mercy". If it saves many from sin and its consequences, it provides "righteousness". Just as Christian love is sub-divided (as in I Cor. xiii.) into its many aspects, so is the love of God. Christian love is greater even than faith and hope; and so God's love, while embracing all its outgoings in the scheme of salvation, is greater than them all:-- > "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends" (John xv. 13).

> "But God commendeth His love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. v. 8).

#19. Simple gospel notes on John iii. 16.
(iii.) Object, measure and gift.
pp. 238 - 240

"He that hath not the Son of God hath not life" (I John v. 12).

We have already seen the twofold basis of the gospel, God and His Word, and have seen something of its mainspring and the "manner" in which God's love in the gospel was manifested. We continue our theme by considering the words: "The world"; "He gave"; "His only begotten Son".

The manner in which the love of God was manifested can be more fully understood as we view its object.

The object---The world.

In the first chapter of the Gospel, we read: "The world was made by Him, and the world knew Him not" (i. 10). John the Baptist spoke of the Saviour as the One Who "taketh away the sin of the world" (i. 29). But, though the world was so loved, we are told in iii. 19 that men loved darkness rather than light:--

> "This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil."

God has set no bounds to His love, the sin of the world has been taken away by the Lamb of God; yet of those who did not believe, the Lord says that they "shall die in their sins" (John viii. 24). The love of God has provided the Saviour, and the salvation is for whosoever "believeth". But what if some do not believe?

When John iii. 16 uses the word "world", other passages speak of "sinners", of the "ungodly", and of "enemies" as the objects of love. Some, however, will die in their sins; some will be ungodly when the Lord comes; some will be enemies when the Millennium is over.

The measure---"God so loved that He gave."

The measure of the love of God is the measure of His unspeakable, indescribable gift (II Cor. ix. 15). This, too, is the measure of the love of Christ:--

> "The Son of God Who LOVED me and GAVE Himself for me" (Gal. ii. 20).
> "Christ LOVED the church and GAVE Himself for it" (Eph. v. 25).

John iii. 16 is alone in stating that God loved the world. The statement is never repeated in Scripture; of the 135 occurrences of agapao, "to love", this is the only place where we read that God loved the world. We read that "the Father loveth the Son"

(John iii. 35), and that Christ said, "He that loveth Me, shall be loved of My Father also" (John xiv. 21), but God's love to the world was manifested once and for all in the gift of His Son. It is vain to look for the love of God apart from Christ. God may still make His sun to shine upon the just and the unjust, He may still defer the long-threatened day of vengeance, He may feed and clothe and sustain in life those who deny Him; but His love is manifested and exhausted in Christ. To be outside of Christ, is to be outside the pale of the love of God.

The Gift.

This bring us to the Gift: "He gave His only begotten Son." Not simply that "He gave His Son", but His "only begotten Son". Isaac is called "the only begotten son" of Abraham (Heb. xi. 17). (It is impossible to miss the meaning of the word "beget" in Matt. i. 1-16). Christ is called "the only begotten Son" for the first time in John i. 14, in immediate connection with the words: "The Word was made flesh."

Antichrist denies that Jesus Christ came in the flesh (I John iv. 2, 3), but the truth of this great fact is vital to our faith. In the flesh Christ could be our Kinsman-Redeemer (Heb. ii. 14, 15). In the flesh He could be a great High Priest (Heb. v. 1), and could offer the one great Sacrifice (Heb. x. 5-10). As Man, He is the one Mediator between God and men (I Tim. ii. 5), and, as Man, shall yet be Judge of quick and dead (John v. 22-27). All this and more is involved in the gift of the only begotten Son. There is no gospel, no salvation, no life, no peace, no hope, apart from God.

The love of God, apart from Christ as the only begotten Son, could never have saved sinful men. God so loved the world that He spared not His only begotten Son, and we can be sure that if salvation could have been provided by any other means, or the love of God have save apart from righteousness, Christ would not have suffered the death of the cross. With John iii. 16 before us, we cannot but believe that it is vain to look to the "uncovenanted love of God" for those who have loved darkness rather than light. Such will die in the presence of the gift of life; they will starve within reach of the true bread of heaven; they will be lost in darkness, though the true light shines:--

> "There remaineth no more sacrifice for sins" (Heb. x. 26).
> "Christ . . . . . dieth no more" (Rom. vi. 9).

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS of the ONE BODY,

With the completion of this volume we also conclude twenty-five years of most blessed fellowship in public testimony to the claims and glorious results of "rightly dividing the Word of truth."

It is an outstanding privilege to be permitted to bear witness to such wonderful grace as is revealed in the dispensation of the mystery, and the demands made upon us have appeared "light" as the unfolding blessing of the years now sped have been realized.

We would include all those whose loving co-operation enables us to issue this monthly testimony, and we pray that this fellowship may deepen as the days go by—a practical exhibition of that Unity of the Spirit that we are called upon to keep.

Yours for Christ and His Church,

CHARLES H. WELCH

WORDS IN SEASON--
Gospel notes on John iii. 16 208

Pentecost and Sinai.

pp. 139, 140

Perhaps the Whitsun season is not yet too far from our thoughts for it to be inappropriate to offer some suggestions upon the meaning of the Feast for the consideration of your readers.

The Rev. H. St. John Thackeray, in his Schweich Lectures, shows that the Synagogue Lessons for the Feast Day were from the Law, Deut. xvi. or Exod. xix.; from the Psalms, Psa. xxix. or lxviii.; from the Prophets, Ezek. i. or Hab. iii.

Of these passages, Deut. xvi. gives the Law setting up the Feast. Exod. xix. records the arrival of the children of Israel at Sinai and the subsequent theophany. This passage was read because, according to the Jewish reckoning, the arrival at Sinai took place on the fiftieth day from the Passover in Egypt. Hab. iii. and Psa. xxix. & lxviii. will all be found to contain reminiscences of Sinai and the Exodus. The same cannot be said of Ezek. i., which seems to have been included on account of resemblances between the theophany there recorded and that on Mount Sinai. Thus, to the Jews Pentecost had the dual significance of a Harvest Festival and the commemoration of the giving of the Law. It will be remembered that Tabernacles also had a dual significance—it is the Feast of in-gathering and also a reminder that Israel dwelt in tents during the Exodus.

Come now to Acts ii. Is it not remarkable that on the day when the minds of pious Jews were turned to such passages as those just referred to, there should come from heaven the sound as of the rushing of a mighty wind and tongues like as a fire? Before meeting with Thackeray's work, the writer had turned to the Old Testament seeking for something that might shed light upon these physical manifestations in Acts ii. It appeared to be found in Ezek. i. and Exod. xix.—the very passages which, upon other grounds, had been chosen by the Rabbis for the Pentecost Synagogue Lessons.

The inference drawn is that in Acts ii. we have the incipient inauguration of the "New Covenant" predicted in Jer. xxxi. It is true that the whole of Jer. xxxi. was not then fulfilled, but the same thing applies to Peter's quotation from Joel ii. If this suggestion be correct, the rushing of the mighty wind, and possibly also the fiery tongues, are intended to remind us of the Old Testament theophanies, and particularly that in Exod. xix.

As regards the Harvest aspect of the Festival, it is interesting to notice that the "saying" predicting the baptism of the Spirit in Matt. iii. occurs between two "sayings" concerning the harvest. Fruit trees in verse 10, and wheat in verse 12. Also, with this in mind, it is interesting to notice that just before the words quoted from Joel ii. we have several Harvest allusions—verse 19: "corn and wine and oil"; verse 22: "for the tree beareth her fruit, the fig tree and the vine do yield their strength"; verse 24: "and the floors shall be full of wheat and the vats shall overflow with wine and oil."

[From a correspondent who, in sending, states that some contend that Exod. xix. 1 is sixty (and not fifty) days from Passover.]

Archæology and Rimmon.
pp. 179, 180

During one of our series of Bibles Lectures given in the Provinces, we were asked whether there was any archæological reference to Rimmon. We do not remember our questioner's name, but we trust this short notice will be seen by him.

Naaman's reference to the house of Rimmon indicates that this god was worshipped in Syria (II Kings v. 18). Among the archæological references to Rimmon is a prayer in use at the time of Assur-bani-pal, where Assur the national god is associated with others such as Ishtar, Nebo Merodach and Rimmon. The lines concerning Rimmon read:--

> "To Rimmon the minister of heaven and earth, the Lord of the wind and the lightning of heaven" (K100 line 12).

Sayce in his Hibbert Lecture 1887 says:--

> "The Kings of Edom seem to have had a predilection for assuming the names of the divinities they worshipped. We have among them Hadad . . . . . titles of the supreme Baal in Syria, whose attributes caused the Assyrians to identify him with their own Rimmon."
>
> "And King Asa sent them to Ben-hadad, the son of Tabrimon" (I Kings xv. 18).

Rimmon, moreover, was mourned for as was Tammuz:--

> "There sat women weeping for Tammuz" (Ezek. viii. 14).

Both names, Hadad and Rimmon, occur together in association with national mourning in Zech. xii. 10, 11: "They shall mourn . . . . . as the mourning of Hadad*rimmon*."

Tablet W. A. I. ii. 49, 30 gives Rimmon an Accadian appellation: Uta-edina-guba = "the everglowing sun of the desert", and further, the name Rimmon is spoken of in Babylonian and Assyrian inscriptions as Ramanu or Ramman. References to Hadad, Tammuz, Adonis and the Descent of Ishtar, together with the above, will open up the way to a fuller knowledge of the subject. However, it is not of sufficient general interest to warrant an extended examination in these pages, but we trust what has been mentioned above will be of service.

p. 200

“With eager knife that oft has sliced
At Gentile gloss or Jewish fable,
Before the crowd you lay the Christ
Upon the lecture table.

From bondage to the old beliefs
You say your rescue must begin;
But I want refuge from my grief
And saving from my sin.

The strong, the easy and the glad
Hang, blandly listening, on thy word;
But I am sick, and I am sad
And I want Thee, O Lord”

(CANON AINGER).

“I have a life in Christ to live,
But ere I live it must I wait
Till learning can clear answer give
Of this or that book’s date?

I have a life in Christ to live,
I have a death in Christ to die;
And must I wait till science gives
All doubts a full reply?

Nay rather, while the sea of doubt
Is raging wildly round about,
Questing of Life, of Death, of Sin;
Let me but creep within Thy fold, O Christ, and at Thy feet
Take up the lowest seat
And hear Thy awful voice repeat
In gentlest accents, heavenly sweet,
Come unto Me and rest,
Believe Me, and be blest”

(PRINCIPAL I. C. SHARPE).

The Acts of the Apostles.

#1. The book as a whole.
pp. 1 - 3

The very focal point of our witness is Acts xxviii., for we believe that in that chapter the dispensation of the mystery began. From time to time there have appeared in The Berean Expositor studies of this great dispensational boundary, and from time to time the place and purpose of Pentecost and allied themes have been touched upon. We have, however, never found opportunity to give the Acts itself systematic examination in these pages, and as we desire to remember the needs of new readers, and knowing that the book of the Acts is the battleground of the whole position that we take up, the time seems ripe for such an exposition.

In many minds one of the uppermost questions relative to the purpose of the book is: Does the Acts introduce something new, or does it confirm something old? This of course embraces the questions that arise out of Acts i. 6 (where the apostles asked the Lord if He would at that time restore the kingdom to Israel) and the place and purpose of Pentecost. The baptism with the Holy Ghost that took place at Pentecost must certainly be tabulated as a new experience, but the question that needs careful answer is: Did that new experience usher in a new dispensation, or did it confirm something old? There is but one true way to deal with this and all other subjects that come into our study, and that is to see their place in relation to the book as a whole. This can only be done after a patient perusal of the whole book, and the comparison of each part with its corresponding member. To express opinions before this has been done is but to express opinions and nothing more. Patiently to plough through the complete book to lay bear its structure is not the work of a few hours merely. This, however, has been done, and although the results may be glanced at in a few minutes, the bearing of the outline thus discovered abides, and rightly influences the interpretation of every section.

Let us, then, go over the book of the Acts together, and make its outline our own. Commencing our reading, we are at once apprised of the fact that another treatise had been written by the same author, which must have some bearing upon the Acts itself. While we cannot make a digression here to study the connection that may exist between the first and second treatises, we are conscious that the opening verses of the first chapter sound very much like a resumé of something already written. Upon examination we discover that Acts i. 1-14 overlaps Luke xxiv. 36-53, details of which we reserve for another article. The recognition of this overlap, however, influences the structure, for, with this fact before us and the truth as our goal, we compelled to tabulate our findings as follows:--

A | i. 1-14. The former treatise. All that Jesus began to do and to teach.

The new record commences with Acts i. 15: "And in those days Peter stood up in the midst of the disciples", and the first act of the apostles is to make their number complete again. This was accomplished by the appointment of Matthias, a much debated subject and one which demands our earnest attention, as there are those who teach that Paul was the true twelfth apostle and that Matthias was mistakenly appointed. This we do not deal with at the moment, except to say that the Scriptures abundantly prove that the appointment of Matthias was entirely in agreement with the will of God.

As we read on through succeeding chapters we cannot help but notice how Peter dominates every section. But chapter xii. finds Peter in prison, and after his release, he appears once more, in Acts xv. Meanwhile a new figure has arisen, introduced first as a fanatical persecutor, but who afterwards become a zealous, though humble, follower of the Lord. Presently, together with Barnabas, he receives a special commission from the Holy Ghost, and finally he becomes the second dominating character of the book. Our structure therefore must exhibit these divisions, and we put them down thus:--

A1 | i. 1-14. The former treatise.
All that JESUS began to do and to teach.
A2 | i. 15 - xxviii. 31. The present treatise.
All that Jesus continued to do and to teach, through the ministries of PETER and PAUL.

We have observed, in passing, that Barnabas and Saul received a special commission from the Holy Ghost in a manner somewhat parallel with the special equipment of the twelve on the day of Pentecost: This we record as follows:--

Equipment of the TWELVE (i. 15 - ii. 13).
Equipment of BARNABAS and SAUL (xiii. 1-3).

Next we observe that the ministry of Peter, like the ministry of Paul, spreads in widening circles, until, at length, both ministries terminate in prison. Without compelling the reader to piece together every item and to weigh over every comparison, we give the complete outline of Acts as follows, trusting that no reader will be satisfied to accept such an important aid to our study at second hand, but that each will make it his own.

The Structure of the Acts of the Apostles.

A1 | i. 1-14. The former treatise.
A2 | i. 15 - xxviii. 31. The present treatise.

The present treatise.

A2 | PETER.
B | i. 15 - ii. 13. JERUSALEM.—Holy Spirit.
Enduement of the twelve.
C | ii. 14 - viii. 1. Ministry of PETER and others to the nation of Israel in Jerusalem and the land.
D | viii. 1 - xi. 30. Ministry of PETER and others in the land.
Peter ministers once to the Gentiles: Cornelius.
E | xii. 1-23. Jerusalem.
Peter's imprisonment.
Close of ministry.

B | xii. 24 - xiii. 3. ANTIOCH.—Holy Spirit.
Enduement of PAUL and BARNABAS.
C | xiii. 4 - xv. 39. Ministry of Paul and others to the dispersed of Israel, independently of Jerusalem and the twelve.
D | xvi. 1 - xix. 20. PAUL'S ministry in association with the twelve.
His seven epistles to the believers.
Paul ministers once to the circumcision: Hebrews.
E | xix. 21 - xxviii. 31. Ephesus to Rome.
Paul's imprisonment.
Close of one ministry and commencement of the prison ministry, and the "dispensation of the mystery".

#2. The Gentile in the Gospel of Luke.
pp. 41 - 46

As the writer of the Acts speaks of a former treatise which he had written, and as the first fourteen verses of the Acts traverse the closing verses of Luke's Gospel, it will be necessary to make some acquaintance with that Gospel, and to examine the portion that is, in measure, repeated in Acts i. 1-14.

It would be too great a digression to attempt an analysis of Luke's Gospel here, but there have been provided for us means whereby its distinctive features can be seen clearly enough to give some idea of the purpose of the writer, and with it some indication of what to expect in the second treatise, the Acts itself. These means consist of the comparison of a series of passages in Luke's Gospel with parallel ones in Matthew's Gospel. The first obvious comparison is the genealogy given by both writers.

(1) The genealogy of Christ (Matt. i. and Luke iii.).—It is evidently sufficient for Matthew's purpose if he proves that the Lord Jesus was heir both of David and of Abraham. Matthew knew as well as we do that Abraham was not the first man, but with the object he had in view, no good purpose would have been served by taking the Lord's genealogy back further than the Patriarch himself. With Abraham commenced the purpose of God that had Israel as a nation in view, and with David commenced the purpose of God that had the kingdom and the throne in view. When we turn to Luke's account, we find that he, too, traces the Lord's genealogy back to David and to Abraham (Luke iii. 31, 34), but the purpose for which he wrote necessitated the prosecution of the genealogy back still further, and consequently it does not end until Luke records: "Which was the son of Adam, which was the son of God" (iii. 38).

Investigation of the further differences observable between the two genealogies would demand a lengthy article, and as we are dealing with Luke's Gospel merely to get its general trend, such an examination would but distract. Keeping in mind, therefore, the first point of departure observable between the two accounts, let us make another comparison.

(2) The birth of Christ (Matt. ii. and Luke ii.).—In Matthew's account the birth of the Saviour is heralded by wise men, and in Luke's account by angels. Matthew makes no reference to the angels and the shepherds; Luke takes no notice of the wise men. Is there a reason? There must be. Can we discover it? We can, if we compare the records:--

> "Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judæa in the days of Herod the King, behold, there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem, saying, where is He that is born King of Jews? for we have seen His star in the east, and are come to worship Him" (Matt. ii. 1, 2).
> "And it came to pass in those days, that there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus, that all the world should be taxed (and this taxing was first made when Cyrenius was > governor of Syria), and all went to be taxed, every one into his own city . . . . . and there were . . . . . shepherd abiding in the field . . . . . and the angel said unto them, Fear not; for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord . . . . . goodwill toward men" (Luke ii. 1-14).

Quite apart from the fact that here are two distinct events, the moment the reader passes from Matthew's account to that of Luke he is conscious of a different atmosphere and point of view. This essential difference may be expressed in the words of the wise men and of the angel:--

> "Where is He that is BORN KING OF THE JEWS?" (Matthew).
> "Unto you this day is BORN in the city of David a SAVIOUR" (Luke).

Everything else, also, in the two narratives is similarly differentiated:--

> "In the days of HEROD THE KING" is the dating of Matthew.
> "A decree from CÆSAR AUGUSTUS" is the dating of Luke.

The first is local, the second is world-wide. The first harmonizes with the way Matthew, in his genealogy, fixes upon Abraham and David, the second with the way Luke, in his, fixes upon Adam. The first insists that the Lord is "King", the second that He is "Saviour". The first speaks of "King of the Jews", the second speaks of "men", without distinction.

In the days when Matthew wrote his Gospel the Jewish element was strong, and he had no need unduly to emphasize the fact that Christ came first of all to Israel. Luke, however, takes the opportunity of recording the testimony of another witness soon after the birth of Christ. This was the testimony of aged Simeon, who was waiting for the consolation of Israel, and therefore had no bias toward the Gentile. Yet when he addressed God as he took the young Child up in his arms, he puts the Gentile first: "A light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of Thy people Israel" (Luke ii. 32).

Let us make another comparison.

(3) The Forerunner (Matt. iii. and Luke iii.):--

> "In those days came John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness of Judæa, and saying, Repent ye: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. For this is He that was spoken of by the prophet Esaias, saying, The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way for the Lord, make His paths straight" (Matt. iii. 1-3).
> "Now in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Cæsar, Pontius Pilate being governor of Judæa and Herod being tetrarch of Galilee, and his brother Philip tetrarch of Ituræa and of the region of Trachonitis, and Lysanias the tetrarch of Abilene, Annas and Caiaphas being the high priests, the word of God came unto John the son of Zacharias in the wilderness. And he came into all the country about Jordan, preaching the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins: As it is written in the book of the words of Esaias the prophet, saying, The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make His paths straight. Every valley shall be filled, and every mountain and hill shall be brought low: and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough ways shall be made smooth: and all flesh shall see the salvation of God" (Luke iii. 1-6).

Compare the casual dating of Matthew's account with the precision of Luke's. See also, once again, how Luke views things from the Gentile standpoint. He does not call Herod a King, but simply a Tetrarch, a subordinate ruler. Then observe what is said of John the Baptist: both records tell us that he preached "repentance", but it is Matthew's account which stresses the "kingdom", and Luke's which stresses "remission of sins". Again, both records quote a passage from Isaiah; Matthew's quotation is brief, Luke's is longer. Why? Surely it is in order to include the words "all flesh", which had no essential bearing upon Matthew's purpose. Once again, it must be obvious that a definite, selective, process is at work governing the writing of these two accounts.

(4) The opening of the Lord's ministry (Matt. iv. and Luke iv.):--

> "Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil . . . . . From that time Jesus began to preach and to say, Repent: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt. iv. 1, 17).
> "And Jesus being full of the Holy Ghost, returned from Jordan, and was led by the Spirit into the wilderness, being forty days tempted of the devil . . . . . He hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor . . . . . Many widows were in Israel in the days of Elias . . . . . but unto none of them was Elias sent, save unto Sarepta, a city of Sidon, unto a woman that was a widow. And many lepers were in Israel in the time of Eliseus the prophet, and none of them was cleansed, saving Naaman the Syrian" (Luke iv. 1, 2, 18, 25-27).

Look at the extraordinary differences here. We have purposely included the references to the temptation, so that it shall be clear that in both quotations the same period is in view, yet Matthew selects the moment when the Lord stressed the "kingdom", while Luke passes that by and selects the words that angered the assembly in the synagogue of Nazareth. Again, Luke is seen using every opportunity to announce the news that the Gentile was to have a place in the kingdom ministry.

While but four items have been compared, the searcher will find numerous others, down to the precision of small phrases and even words. For example, let him compare Matt. xxiv. with Luke xxi., and say why Luke alone gives any record of the "times of the Gentiles" (verse 24). One other most important piece of contributory evidence of the purpose of Luke's Gospel is the parables peculiar to that Gospel. Luke alone speaks of the good Samaritan, at the expense of the Jewish Priest and Levite, who could do nothing. Luke alone gives the pearl of parables, The Prodigal Son, where the prodigal is seen to advantage over against his elder brother. Again, Luke alone gives that anticipation of the epistle to the Romans in the parable of the Pharisee and Publican, introducing, as it does, the doctrine of justification. Once more, Luke alone reveals that Israel were like Unjust Steward, and, finally, it is Luke alone who recounts the parable that speaks of the Lord's absence under the figure of "a certain Nobleman (who) went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom and to return" (Luke xix. 12), thus checking the idea that "the kingdom of God should immediately appear".

We have not felt it necessary to set out these parables in detail. The full force of their bearing upon Luke's purpose can only be felt by those who ponder them prayerfully and carefully.

Let us set out what we have seen:--

Matthew.	Luke.
The Subject.
King and kingdom, with the Jew prominent, is the theme.	Sin and salvation, with the Gentile in view, is the theme.
The Genealogies.
Abraham and David.	Adam.
The witness at the Birth.
Herod the King. Wise men. King of the Jews.	Cæsar Augustus. All the world. Angels, Saviour, men. Simeon, Gentiles.
The Forerunner.
Casual dating. Repent, for kingdom is at hand. Short quotation from Isaiah.	Gentile dating. Repentance for remission of sins. Long quotation from Isaiah in order to include references to "all flesh".
The Lord's opening Ministry.
Repent for the kingdom is at hand.	The emphasis upon the Gentile in the synagogue at Nazareth.
The Second Coming.
The time of the end.	The reference to the intervening "times of the Gentiles".
The distinctive Parables peculiar to Luke.
- - - - -	The Good Samaritan. The Prodigal Son. The Unjust Steward. The Pharisee and the Publican. The Nobleman.

Here is clear evidence that Matthew's Gospel is intended to show that the covenants made with Abraham and David are vested in the Lord Jesus Christ in Whom alone they can be fulfilled. Luke's Gospel, while admitting all that, points out that while Israel were themselves to be blessed, they were to become the destined channel of blessing to the nations, which precluded the idea that only Israel mattered, and revealed the larger purpose of the kingdom of Heaven.

When we remember that Luke, who so emphasized the Gentile aspect, was raised up to accompany the apostle Paul, can we not praise God that Paul had to his hand a record of earthly life, the death, the resurrection and the ascension of the Lord, that went back to Adam, and which would therefore be of great importance in the controversies over the inclusion of the Gentile that we find in the Acts of the Apostles itself? Of the four Gospels, Luke's is the one that particularly belongs to saved Gentiles. Have we possessed our possessions?

#3. Luke xxiv. and Acts i. 1-14.
pp. 89 - 98

We have considered the teaching of "the former treatise" (Acts i. 1), namely, Luke's Gospel, and have found that its general trend is to stress that aspect of the Gospel connected with the Saviour and the Gentile, as compared with Matthew, which stresses the Kingly and Jewish aspect. Luke states that the former treatise is a record of "all that Jesus began both to do and to teach". Are we justified in this deduction? Mark's Gospel ends with the words:--

> "And He said unto them, Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature . . . . . these signs shall follow . . . . . So then after the Lord had spoken unto them, He was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God. And they went forth, and preached everywhere, the Lord working with them and confirming the word with signs following. Amen" (Mark xvi. 15-20).

These words prove that the Acts is a continuation of the narrative of what the Lord had begun to do and to teach in the days of His flesh, and that the miraculous gifts of the Spirit were intended to "confirm" the witness. This may be seen by consulting Heb. ii.:--

> "How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation; which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard, God also bearing them witness, both with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost, according to His own will" (Heb. ii. 3, 4).

To the same effect is the teaching of the epistles to the Corinthians:--

> "Even as the testimony of Christ was confirmed in you: So that ye come behind in no gift; waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Cor. i. 6, 7).
> "Now He which confirmeth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God" (II Cor. i. 21).

The "confirming of us with you" of II Cor. i. shows that the same subject is in view, which we have already seen in Heb. ii.

Returning to the opening chapter of the Acts, we note that the writer speaks of several things that had already been recorded by him in the last chapter of the Gospel of Luke. The only way to realize this is to compare the two passages. This we will do.

A comparison of Luke xxiv. 36-53 with Acts i. 1-14.
L u k e.	A c t s.
Many infallible proofs.

"And as they thus spake, Jesus Himself stood in the midst of them and saith unto them, Peace be unto you. But they were terrified and affrighted and supposed that they had seen a spirit. And He said unto them, Why are ye troubled? and why do thoughts arise in your hearts? Behold My hands and My feet, that it is I Myself; handle Me and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see Me have. And, when He had thus spoken He showed them His hands and His feet. And while they yet believed not for joy, and wondered, He said unto them, Have ye here any meat? And they gave Him a piece of broiled fish and of an honeycomb, and He took it and did eat before them."	". . . . . the apostles whom He had chosen, to whom also He showed Himself alive after His passion by many infallible proofs, being seen of them forty days." (It will be seen that what Luke wrote in fuller detail, Acts summarizes under one head. This is exactly what we do when referring to previous correspondence on any subject).
The Lord's words to His apostles.
"And He said unto them, These are the words which I spake unto you while I was yet with you; that all things must fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning Me. Then opened He their understanding that they might understand the Scripture."	"Speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God." (Notice how these two aspects of truth are brought together in the last verse of Acts, "preaching the KINGDOM OF GOD, and teaching those things which concern the LORD JESUS CHRIST"—an unobtrusive connection such as delighted Paley. Further, the fact of their opened understanding shows their question in Acts i. 6 to be right and fitting, as also i. 16-26).
The commission.
"Repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem and ye are witnesses of these things."	"Ye shall be witnesses unto Me both in Jerusalem and in all Judæa, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth."
The enduements.
"Behold, I send the promise of My Father upon you; but tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem until ye be endued with power from on high."	"Commanded them that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father, which, saith He, ye have heard of Me . . . . . Ye shall be baptized with holy spirit not many days hence . . . . . Ye shall receive power after that holy spirit is come upon you."
The ascension.

"And it came to pass while He blessed them, He was parted from them, and carried up into heaven."	"And when He had spoken these things, while they beheld, He was taken up; and a cloud received Him out of their sight." (Notice how each supplements the other. The Gospel tells us, "He was parted from them", but does not say how; Acts adds the information concerning "the cloud". Acts also adds statements regarding the angels and the second coming of the Lord).
The apostles' return.
"And they worshipped Him and returned to Jerusalem with great joy; and were continually in the temple praising and blessing God."	"And they returned unto Jerusalem from the Mount called Olivet, which is from Jerusalem a sabbath day's journey. And when they were come in, they went up into an upper room . . . . . these all continued with one accord in prayer and supplication."

Each separate item that we see repeated in this introduction is worthy of study, but for our present purpose we must pass over everything else, and concentrate our attention upon the question of the apostles given in Acts i. 6.

The fact that Luke inserts the word "therefore" in this verse, shows that the apostles' question arose out of that marvelous opening up of the O.T. Scriptures mentioned in Luke xxiv. 44 and Acts i. 3:--

> "When they therefore were come together, they asked of Him: saying, Lord, wilt Thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" (Acts i. 6).

It is beyond the powers of any man to attempt what the Lord alone could do, but we are permitted to turn to the same Scriptures that He used and see some of the references to the restoration of Israel and their kingdom, which will enable us to appreciate the force of the apostles' question.

To cover the whole ground we, too, must begin at "Moses", but for the present let us be satisfied with a few references from those prophets who wrote during or after Israel's captivity. To Nebuchadnezzar, Daniel said:--

> "Thou, O king, art a king of kings: for God of heaven hath given thee a kingdom, power, and strength, and glory. And wheresoever the children of men dwell, the beasts of the field, and the fowls of the heaven, hath He given into thine hand, and hath made thee ruler over them all" (Dan. ii. 37, 38).

At the end of Gentile dominion "shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed". Daniel saw in the night visions, and beheld:--

> "One like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought Him near before Him; and there was given Him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations and languages, should serve Him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion which shall not pass away, and His kingdom that which shall not be destroyed."

"The kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High" (Dan. vii. 13, 14, 27).

In Dan. ix. we find the prophet, having read the promise of restoration from the desolations of Jerusalem, earnestly praying for its fulfillment. He is then instructed that within a specified time the whole purpose comprising Israel's restoration shall be accomplished. We do not embark here upon a consideration of Dan. ix., but, later, some more pointed references must be made to the chapter.

Daniel is followed in the A.V. by the Minor Prophets, and these are particularly rich in their testimony concerning Israel's restoration. Hosea takes a wife at the command of God, and the children which are born are given the following symbolic names:--

JEZREEL (Hos. i. 4).—The word has two meanings:--
(1) "May God scatter" (Jer. xxxi. 10, 11).
(2) "May God sow" (Zech. x. 9).
LO-RUHAMAH (Hos. i. 6).—"Not having obtained mercy."
LO-AMMI (Hos. i. 9).—"Not My people."

Yet immediately following these figures of woe come the words of restoration:--

"Yet the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured nor numbered; and it shall come to pass that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not My people, there it shall be said unto them, Ye are the sons of the living God. Then shall the children of Judah and the children of Israel be gathered together, and appoint themselves one head, and they shall come up out of the land; for great shall be the day of Jezreel" (the day of sowing, i.e., the restoration) (Hos. i. 10, 11).

"I will sow her unto Me (Jezreith) in the earth, and I will have mercy (ruhamah) upon her that had not obtained mercy (lo-ruhamah); and I will say to them which were not my people (lo-ammi), Thou art My people (ammi), and they shall say, Thou art my God" (Hos. ii. 23).

Joel, too, is full of the same blessed promise. First we have utter desolation:--

"That which the palmerworm hath left hath the locust eaten; and that which the locust hath left hath the cankerworm eaten; and that which the cankerworm hath left hath the caterpillar eaten" (Joel i. 4).

The Jews refer this to Babylon, Persia, Greece and Rome, and Jeremiah confirms this application:--

"Gather against her the kingdoms of Ararat, Minni, and Ashchenaz; appoint a captain against her, cause the horses to come up, as the rough caterpillars; prepare against her the nations with the kings of the Medes" (Jer. li. 27, 28).

But in Joel ii. 25-28 this utter desolation is reversed:--

> "I WILL RESTORE to you the years that the locust hath eaten, the cankerworm, and the caterpillar, and the palmerworm, My great army which I sent among you . . . . . and it shall come to pass afterward that I will pour out My spirit upon all flesh . . . . ."

Is it any wonder the apostles asked, "Lord, wilt Thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?"

Amos, with all his denunciations, does not finish without the promise of restoration:--

> "And I will bring again the captivity of My people of Israel . . . . . and I will plant them upon their land' (Amos ix. 14, 15).

Micah ii. 12 reads: "I will surely gather the remnant of Israel", and although one more strong denunciation is made against Israel's sin, yet Micah concludes with the pardoning love of God, and says:--

> "He will turn again . . . . . Thou wilt perform the truth to Jacob, and the mercy to Abraham, which Thou hast sworn unto our fathers from the days of old" (Micah vii. 19, 20).

Zephaniah says:--

> "I will make you a name and a praise among all people of the earth, when I turn back your captivity before your eyes, saith the Lord" (Zeph. iii. 20).

Haggai must be read through to catch the spirit of the closing verses.

Zechariah simply burns with the spirit of restoration; so complete will be the redemption of the people, so holy will that kingdom be, that he can say:--

> "In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses, HOLINESS UNTO THE LORD . . . . . yea, every pot in Jerusalem and Judah shall be holiness unto the Lord of Hosts" (Zech. xiv. 20, 21).

Malachi concludes with the promise of the sending of Elijah before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord. Speaking of John the Baptist, the Lord said to His disciples, "If ye will receive (it) this is Elijah which was for to come" (Matt. xi. 14).

Do we still wonder that the apostles, remembering with divinely opened understanding all the Lord's teaching, and all the teaching of the O.T., should say, "Lord, wilt Thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?"

It is impossible here to pursue the theme. He who would know something of the full import and bearing of the matter must search of the whole of the Prophets and Psalms, together with much of the Law. So far as our present study is concerned we must be satisfied to awaken the already interested reader to further enquiry. Those who already know the subject will agree as to the fullness of the Scriptures on the theme.

Let us now pass on from the O.T. to the additional evidence which the words of the Lord Jesus (spoken during His ministry in the hearing of the apostles, and intended for their instruction) constitute.

The Lord's own teaching concerning the restoration of the kingdom to Israel.

The genealogy with which the Gospel according to Matthew opens establishes the fact that Christ is the Son of David and Heir to his throne. The annunciation of Gabriel to Mary is occupied mainly with the kingly aspect of the incarnation:--

> "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest: and the Lord God shall give unto Him the THRONE of His father DAVID: and He shall reign over the house of Jacob for the ages; and of His kingdom there shall be no end" (Luke i. 32, 33).

The prophecy of Zacharias at the birth of John the Baptist, speaks of deliverance from the hand of enemies, and the fulfillment of covenant and oath sworn to Abraham and the fathers (Luke i. 68- 79).

The birthplace, Bethlehem, is chiefly associated with kingship:--

> "Where is He that is born King of the Jews? . . . . . In Bethlehem of Judæa; for thus it is written by the prophet, And thou, Bethlehem, in the land of Juda, art not the least among the princes of Juda, for out of thee shall come a Governor, that shall rule My people Israel" (Matt. ii. 2-6).

The opening words of the Lord's ministry announce the kingdom:--

> "Now after that John was put in prison, Jesus came into Galilee preaching the GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD, and saying (1) The time is fulfilled (hence the kingdom is that of O.T. prophecy), (2) the kingdom of God has come nigh (the King being present); and (3) Repent ye, and believe the good tidings" (the condition) (Mark i. 14, 15).

John the Baptist opened his ministry to Israel with the call to repent (Matt. iii.). The Lord opened His ministry to Israel with the call to repent (Matt. iv. 17). Peter reopened the ministry to Israel with the call to repent (Acts ii. 38, iii. 19).

The miracles which the Lord wrought immediately following His opening words were with the confessed object of bringing Israel to repentance, and thereby instituting the kingdom:--

> "Then began He to upbraid the cities wherein most of His mighty works were done, because they repented not . . . . . Tyre and Sidon would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes" (Matt. xi. 20, 21).

The parables which immediately follow the Lord's rejection introduce the theme of the restoration. Matt. xii. records the rejection of Christ by Israel; Matt. xiii. records the first parables. These parables were uttered because:-- > "Seeing, they see not; and hearing, they hear not, neither do they understand. And in them is fulfilled the prophecy of Isaiah" (Isa. vi. 9, 10; Matt. xiii. 10-15).

The seed that is sown by the sower is "the word of the kingdom"; and although the earlier sowings were marred, yet in God's good time that seed of the kingdom shall fall into good ground, and the harvest shall be abundant.

The Transfiguration testified to the fulfillment of prophecy concerning the kingdom of which both Law and Prophets speak. This is made perfectly clear by Peter's inspired testimony:--

> "We have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of His majesty . . . . . We have also a more sure word of prophecy" (II Pet. i. 16-19).

The promise of the Lord to those who had forsaken all and followed Him is directed to the restoration of the kingdom:--

> "Verily I say unto you, that ye which have followed Me, in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Matt. xix. 28).

The accomplishment of the final great prophecy of Matt. xxiv. and xxv. necessitates the restoration of the kingdom:--

> "When the Son of man shall come in His glory, and all the holy angels with Him, then shall He sit upon the throne of His glory; and before Him shall be gathered all the NATIONS . . . . . Then shall the King says, ... inherit the KINGDOM . . . . ." (Matt. xxv. 31-34).

In the last solemn verses, of trial, suffering, and crucifixion, the KING and the KINGDOM are prominent. The High Priest said:--

> "I adjure Thee by the living God, that Thou tell us whether Thou be the Christ, the Son of God. Jesus saith unto him, Thou hast said; nevertheless I say unto you, Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven" (Matt. xxvi. 63, 64).

The Roman Governor said:--

> "Art Thou the King of the Jews? And Jesus said unto him, Thou sayest" (Matt. xxvii. 11).

The actions and words of the Roman soldiers gave evidence that the Lord's claim to kingship was widely known and steadily maintained:--

> "And when they had plaited a crown of thorns, they put it upon His head, and a reed in His right hand, and they bowed the knee before Him, and mocked Him, saying. Hail, King of the Jews" (Matt. xxvii. 29).

The accusation set over the Lord's head on the cross was: "This is Jesus the King of the Jews" (Matt. xxvii. 37).

The chief priests mocked Him with taunting words:--

> "If He be the King of Israel, let Him now come down from the cross, and we will believe Him" (Matt. xxvii. 42).

The dying malefactor said unto Jesus:--

> "Lord, remember me when Thou comest into Thy KINGDOM" (Luke xxiii. 42).

When the Lord answered the apostle's question it is surely significant that He said no word to reprove them for their slowness of heart: neither did He say that they were fools. All that He did was to take up that part of their question which related to the "time", saying: "It is not for you to know the time or the seasons, which the Father hath put in His own power" (Acts i. 7). Yet in Luke xxiv., before His exposition of Moses and all the Prophets, they had merited these rebukes.

The kingdom shall be restored to Israel, and upon the fulfillment of conditions already laid down, but it was impossible to reveal to the apostles the foreknown failure of Israel to repent, and the consequent postponement of the hope of Israel. That is understandable and true, but it does not in any way invalidate their question as to the restoration of the kingdom. It gives no warrant for substituting the church in the place of Israel.

If, while Israel were still a people, and while prophetic times were still running their course (Dan. ix. 24), the apostles were not permitted to know "times and seasons", how much less, during this period of Israel's blindness—this parenthetical period during which the clock of prophecy has been stopped—how much less warrant is there for attempting to fix dates concerning the end of the age or the coming of the Lord. We have not a list of names of all those who from time to time have turned prophets and announced the date of the second coming, nor do we wish to be cumbered with such sad evidences of error, but the reader should be warned against all such attempts, by whatever method—all are unscriptural and doomed to failure. Captain Crossby announced that in 1925 this dispensation would close, and that the most conspicuous figure in Europe at that date would be Antichrist. We neither saw Antichrist in 1925, nor did the age end seven years later, namely 1932, with Israel restored to their land. Baxter toured the country lecturing upon the forty coming wonders that should be seen during 1896-1908; Not one came to pass. Dimbleby computed by astronomical reckoning that the end would come in 1898. During the year in which we write these words claims have been made to divine illumination, illumination that, if resisted, would mean resistance of the Holy Ghost. These claims were that the teaching of the Scriptures had been made plain, and that about 12th June, 1933, the coming of the Lord, according to I Thess. iv., would be fulfilled. Newspapers ridiculed the prophet in advance: unstable believers were moved to all sorts of extravagancies by it—and nothing happened. Nothing, we say; yet, is it nothing that the Word of God should be thus held up to scorn? Is it nothing that the faith of many has been so rudely shaken? What difference should it make, if we positively knew the date of the Lord's return? He said, "occupy" till I come, and if, did we know the exact date of His appearing, we would give up our business, change our mode of life, alter our address, or make any other change, does not that indicate that we should make these changes now, out of love of His appearing, without knowing the times or the seasons?

But we must return to the examination of Acts i. and take up the teaching of the whole of the book and period in connection with the hope that was then before the believer. This we shall do in our next article.

#4. The question of Acts i. 6. Was it right?
pp. 126 - 129

Were the apostles right when they asked the Lord about the restoration of the kingdom to Israel? Were they actuated by Jewish prejudice? Should they have asked concerning the church instead? An affirmative answer has been given by different students to each of these questions.

But what are the facts? The Lord had spoken to the apostles about the baptism of the Spirit that they should receive "not many days hence" (Acts i. 5), and the next verse records their question which we are considering:--

> "When they therefore were come together, they asked of Him, saying, Lord, wilt Thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" (Acts i. 6).

It is essential to keep in mind that during a period of forty days, the apostles had received instruction as to the O.T. passages that spoke of Christ and His kingdom. Among these the following from Isaiah would make plain the connection between the outpouring of the spirit, and the restoration of Israel:--

> "Until the spirit be poured upon us from on high, and the wilderness be a fruitful field, and the fruitful field be counted for a forest . . . . . My people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation, and is sure dwellings, and in quiet resting places" (Isa. xxxii. 15-18).

A number of like passages would occur to any well-taught reader of the O.T., such as the apostles were, and until the reader is in possession of at least some of these passages, he cannot be competent to judge the matter of the rightness of the question of Acts i. 6. Coupled with this let us remember that He Who opened up the Scriptures during those 40 days, at the same time "opened their understanding". In the face of such a comprehensive statement is it possible to maintain that prejudice and ignorance prompted the question of Acts i. 6?

The O.T. teaching concerning the restoration of the kingdom to Israel.

Isaiah's prophecy divides into two great sections; the first, chapters i.-xxxix., deals mainly with Israel's rejection; the second, chapters xl.-lxvi., deals mainly with Israel's restoration. This second section opens with the words:--

> "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God; speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her that her APPOINTED TIME is accomplished (see margin), that her iniquity is pardoned" (Isa. xl. 1, 2).

The word rendered "warfare" in the A.V. occurs in Dan. x. 1, where it is rendered "the time appointed". This prophecy of restoration makes immediate reference to "the voice of him that crieth in the wilderness". The apostles would know the close connection between John the Baptist and this prophecy, hence their pertinent question in Acts i. 6. Isa. xliii. contains the promise:--

> "I will being thy seed from the east, and gather thee from the west; I will say to the north, Give up, and to the south, Keep not back, bring My sons from far, and My daughters from the ends of the earth" (Isa. xliii. 5, 6).

Jeremiah, too, is a prophet of rejection and restoration. First, the Lord declares that He will:--

> "watch over His word to perform it" (i. 12) (which word, here, was a word of judgment and wrath).

In chapter xxxi. 28 the Lord says:--

> "And it shall come to pass, that like as I have watched over them to pluck up, and to break down, and to throw down, and to destroy, and to afflict; so will I watch over them to build and to plant, saith the Lord."

These words refer to Israel, as a nation, and not to "a church", as verses 35, 36 bear testimony:--

> " . . . . . If those ordinances depart from before Me, saith the Lord, then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a NATION before Me for ever."
>
> "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will perform that good thing which I have promised unto the house of Israel and to the house of Judah . . . . . David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of the house of Israel . . . . . If I have not appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth, then will I cast away the seed of JACOB and DAVID My servant, so that I will not take any of his seed to be rulers over the seed of ABRAHAM, ISAAC and JACOB; for I will cause their captivity to return, and have mercy upon them" (Jer. xxxiii. 14-26).

Small wonder that the apostles said: "Lord, wilt Thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?"

Jeremiah's prophecy concludes with the transference of sovereignty from Israel to Nebuchadnezzar. As to this transference and its outcome, Daniel is one of the chief spokesmen:-- > "In the third year of the reign of Jehoiakim King of Judah, came Nebuchadnezzar King of Babylon unto Jerusalem, and besieged it; and the Lord gave Jehoiakim King of Judah into his hand" (Dan. i. 1, 2).

Nebuchadnezzar was the divinely-appointed head of gold. What Israel's sovereignty covered and what the restoration of that sovereignty will involve is shown by the words of Daniel in describing the extent of the authority which had been transferred to Nebuchadnezzar:--

> "Thou, O king, art a king of kings" (Dan. ii. 37).

When Israel's kingdom is restored, and great David's greater Son is King, His title will be:--

> "King of kings, and Lord of lords, Prince of the kings of the earth" (Rev. xix. 16; i. 5).

That such vast sway and majesty was included in the covenant with David. Psa. lxxxix. 27 testifies:--

> "Also I will make Him My Firstborn, higher than the kings of the earth."

Daniel continued:--

> "For the God of heaven hath given thee a kingdom, power, and strength, and glory" (Dan. ii. 37).

The God of heaven gives this kingdom, and it can as well be called the kingdom of heaven as the kingdom of God. When the Lord taught the disciples to pray, it was for the restoration of the kingdom and its ultimate blessing:--

> "Thy kingdom come . . . . . in earth . . . . . for Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory" (Matt. vi. 10-13).

Compare these words with Daniel's to Nebuchadnezzar when he said "a kingdom, power, and strength, and glory". The words are echoed in the ascription of praise recorded in Rev. iv. 11, v. 12, 13. Nebuchadnezzar's dominion extended beyond mere territory or human subjects.

Before we proceed with our examination of this opening section, it will be well to discover its structure. This is simple, and focuses our attention upon what the Lord did until "He was taken up", at which point both the Gospel according to Luke and the opening section of the Acts terminates. Let us see this:--

Acts i. 1-14. The former treatise.

A1 | B | 1. What the Lord began to do and teach.
C | 2. Until the day.
D | 2. Command to apostles.
E | 2. Taken up.*
B | 3. What the Lord continued to do and to teach.
C | 3. During forty days.
D | 4-9. Command to apostles.
E | 9-14. Taken up.

[* - The order of this section follows that of the Greek and not of the English translation.]

The next matter of great importance to all students of the Acts is the question of the apostles concerning the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, and to this we shall address ourselves in the next article, sufficient preparation having now been made.

#5. The hope of the Acts and Epistles of the Period.
pp. 161 - 164

The question of the apostles in Acts i. 6 regarding the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, engenders other questions, as, What is the hope dominating the Acts of the Apostles? or, Does the hope change at Pentecost, or subsequently? and, most important for us who read, Is the hope of the Acts period the same as the hope of the church as expressed in the epistles of Paul written during the same period? In other words, Can there be one hope in Acts and another, different, hope in the epistles of the same period? The answer to this question is vital to our understanding of the relation of the earlier epistles of Paul to his later epistles of the mystery. If the hope of Israel persists throughout the Acts, and if it embrace all the churches that were called into existence during the Acts, then I Thess. iv. cannot express the hope of the church of the mystery, for that would bring the hope of that church down to the hope of Israel, whether that hope be heavenly or earthly. The matter is of such importance that no apology is needed for thoroughness of investigation.

Let us proceed at once to the end of the Acts to discover whether a hope is there expressed, and if so what hope it is. Undoubtedly, in Acts xxviii. 1-10 we have in full force the signs of Mark xvi. 17, 18. Among these are the taking up of serpents with immunity from danger, and the laying on of hands for the recovery of the sick. As we have said, these signs are found in operation in Acts xxviii. 1-10, where a viper, called a "venomous beast", fastened on the apostle's hand. The experience of the islanders who watched is a plain testimony of the miraculous nature of Paul's escape:--

> "They looked when he should have swollen, or fallen down dead suddenly: but after they had looked a great while, and saw no harm come to him, they changed their minds and said that he was a god" (Acts xxviii. 6).

Subsequently the same apostle healed a man of "a fever and dysentery", and other sufferers in the island of diseases not specified.

The fact that Mark xvi. penetrates so far, reveals an unbroken connection of the Acts with the Gospels. Presently we find the apostle at Rome, and, standing before the chief of the Jews, he said:--

> "For the HOPE OF ISRAEL, I am bound with this chain" (Acts xxviii. 20).

This statement was followed by an all-day exposition, to the chief of the Jews, of Moses and the Prophets concerning the kingdom of God and "Jesus". It is impossible in the face of such testimony to think that up to that date, the hope of Israel had been set aside, cancelled, or changed. Should any be found who would spiritualize this reference to the hope of Israel, it will be sufficient to turn to Acts xxvi. 6, 7 to prove its literality:--

> "And now I stand and am judged (I am bound with this chain) for the HOPE OF THE PROMISE made of God unto our Fathers: unto which promise our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come."

During the course of our exposition we shall show many other references to the hope of Israel, but if we find one, unchanged, hope in chapter i., chapter xxvi., and chapter xxviii., it is difficult to deny that the same hope obtains in chapters ii.-xxv.

Let us now come to the epistles of the period. It matters not whether we agree as to the exact order in which they were written, so long as we distinguish between those epistles of Paul written before his Roman imprisonment, recorded in Acts xxviii., and those written during that imprisonment. During the Acts the apostle wrote seven epistles, six to the churches, and one to the Hebrews. They are associated together thus: Galatians, Hebrews, and Romans are single epistles, and Thessalonians and Corinthians are in pairs.

The truth we here seek to set forth is that the hope of the church during the Acts was millennial in character, and that a millennial hope is the hope of Israel. To teach that the hope of the Acts was one thing and the hope of the churches during the selfsame period was different, cannot be justified either by sound argument or from the epistles themselves. There is but one hope running through both the Acts and the epistles of the period.

Every reader will agree, that of all the epistles written by Paul during this period, the most fundamental is the last, viz., that to the Romans. Again, if any change is to be sought in the teaching of the epistles, we would expect to find it in the last of the series rather than in the first or the second. Most certain it is that the hope of the church to which the epistle to the Romans is addressed would not be more Jewish than the hope entertained by the church addressed in the epistles to the Thessalonians. On all counts then, whatever we find in Romans is conclusive evidence as to the whole period. Turning therefore to Rom. xv. 12 and 13 we read:--

> "And again Esaias saith, There shall be a root of Jesse, and He that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles; in Him shall the Gentiles trust. Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing that ye may abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost."

There are a number of things that we must note in examining the testimony of this passage.

First, the word "trust", being the Greek verb elpizo should be translated "hope" so that the connection with the word "hope" (elpis) in the next verse shall be made clear. This correction has been made in the R.V., yet some so-called literal Versions still veil the truth by variant renderings. The article is used with the word, and a due recognition of the usage of the article here justifies the translation of the Emphatic Diaglott Version, which reads: "And may the God of that hope", specifically referring back to the hope already mentioned in verse 12. This hope was something very personal to the saints addressed, for they were to be "filled with all joy and peace in believing", and were to "abound" in this hope through the power of the Holy Ghost. No words are more explicit in any epistle. Now what was this hope entertained by the church of the Acts? (1) It had to do with a prophecy of Isaiah; (2) It is associated with Christ as a root of Jesse; (3) It is related to His reign over the Gentiles. Any of these three characteristics is enough to indicate that this hope could not be connected with the "one hope" of Eph. i. 18, but all three together make it impossible of application except to a company intimately connected with the hope of Israel.

We "open the book" at the passage quoted in Rom. xv., and there we find ourselves in millennial surroundings:--

> "And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse and a Branch shall grow out of his roots . . . . . the wolf also shall dwell with the lamb . . . . . and a little child shall lead them . . . . . they shall not hurt nor destroy in all My holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea. In that day there shall be a root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people; to it shall the Gentiles seek; and his rest shall be glorious. And it shall come to pass in that day that the Lord shall set His hand again the second time to recover the remnant of His people" (Isa. xi. 1, 2, 9-11).

Words cannot make more plain the fact that this hope of Rom. xv. is intimately associated with the restoration and the hope of Israel. Nor can words more plainly forbid any attempt to make the hope of this church the same as the hope of the church of the mystery. To do so is misleading. To the same effect is the association in Rom. viii. 19-25 of the hope of the church there addressed, with the day when creation's groan shall cease. To the same effect also are the words of Rom. xvi. 20: "And the God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly."

We have already examined the references to the second coming of the Lord in a series of articles in Volume XIX-XXII, where every passage is given consideration, and the conclusion is justified that there is not a reference to the second coming of the Lord, outside the revelation of the mystery, that is not either a fulfillment of some O.T. prophecy, or allied to one by the context. While therefore there is much doctrine in Romans that is fundamental both to the church of the Acts, and to the new company called after Israel were set aside in Acts xxviii., it nevertheless stands to reason that while Israel are set aside their hope would remain in abeyance. Ephesians speaks of "one hope of His calling", and "one hope of your calling", and seeing that each calling has its associated hope, it follows that it is a vital principle of interpretation that different callings with their appropriate hopes be kept separate and distinct from each other.

#6. Further teaching concerning the hope of Israel in Acts i. 6-14.

pp. 221 - 227

In our last article we considered the fact that the hope that runs throughout the Acts, and the hope that the epistles of the same period entertain, is the hope of Israel. It is true that this hope has its heavenly, as well as its earthly sphere, but that is no justification for making that heavenly sphere of Israel's hope the same as the "one hope" of the mystery. Further light upon the hope of this Acts period is found in the verses that follow Acts i. 6, and to the consideration of this testimony we now address ourselves:--

> "And He said unto them, It is not for you to know the times or seasons, which the Father appointed by His own Authority" (Acts i. 7).

One of the most natural things to do, whenever the second coming of Christ is before the mind, is to conjecture whether it is possible to forecast the date of its advent. While this may be natural, it is unscriptural, and consequently wrong. The servant who concluded that the Lord's coming was delayed, began to smite his fellowservant and to drink with the drunken. The salutary attitude in view of the Lord's return is, surely, to carry out his injunction and "occupy" till He comes, remembering that "Blessed is that servant whom his Lord when He cometh shall find so doing" (matt. xxiv. 46).

Every now and again some one will arise who forecasts the date of the Lord's return, and some will always be found who will, as a consequence, dispose of their business, and wait the expected day. It strikes the outside observer as strange that in such circumstances a business should be sold: why should it not be given away? Of what use would the proceeds be in that day? Again, if the nature of one's business is such that, being assured of the nearness of the Lord's return, one would leave it, surely that is sufficient reason for leaving it now, irrespective of "times and seasons". The Lord's own instruction to His servants in view of His coming is not: "Give up your work", but "Carry on", "Occupy".

There are a number of passages that warn the believer against attempting the computation of the date of the second coming:--

> "But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only" (Matt. xxiv. 36).
> "Ye know not what hour your Lord doth come" (Matt. xxiv. 42).
>
> "In such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh" (Matt. xxiv. 44).
>
> "Watch, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh" (Matt. xxv. 13).
> "But of the times and the seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you. For yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night" (I Thess. v. 1, 2).

The fact is that since the setting aside of Israel in Acts xxviii., prophetic times are in abeyance and we are living in a parenthetical period during which the prophetic clock has been stopped.

The basis of all prophetic computation is found in Dan. ix., and it is evident that the present interval of well-nigh 2,000 years has no place in Daniel's 70 weeks. If, then, the computation of times was clearly wrong during the periods of the Gospels and the Acts when the hope of Israel was still before the believer, how much more should it be discountenanced during the present dispensation of the mystery? Instead of being left to speculate about "times and seasons" the apostles were instructed how they were to "occupy", with the hope of Israel's restoration in view:--

> "But ye shall receive power, the Holy Spirit having come upon you; and ye shall be witnesses unto Me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judæa, and in Samaria, and unto the end of the earth" (Acts i. 8).

The expression, the "end of the earth" is of great importance, because by its use the Lord associated with His command a passage from Isaiah which has a bearing upon the apostles' question of Acts i. 6. The passage of Isaiah, to which we refer, is one that is difficult to translate with certainty. We will compare it as it appears in the A.V. and R.V., when the difference will at once be manifest:--

> "And now saith the Lord that formed me from the womb to be His servant, to bring Jacob again to Him, Though Israel be not gathered, yet shall I be glorious in the eyes of the Lord, and my God shall be my strength" (Isa. xlix. 5, A.V.).
> "And now saith the Lord that formed me from the womb to be His servant, to bring Jacob again to Him, and that Israel be gathered unto Him (for I am honourable in the eyes of the Lord, and my God is become my strength)" (Isa. xlix. 5, R.V.).

The difference between the two renderings depends upon whether we read the Hebrew word lo as meaning "to Him", or "not". The Lord, Who knew the end from the beginning, and Who knew that the same Hebrew word could be read as it appears in either the A.V. or the R.V., so caused Isaiah to write that the prophecy sets forth the facts without providing Israel with excuse. It was the Saviour's mission to gather Israel to the Lord, and this gathering shall yet be accomplished. But it was known that Israel would not repent at the Lord's first coming, and that the salvation of the Lord would extend to the Gentiles; consequently, Isa. xlix. 6 continues:--

> "And He said, It is a light thing that Thou shouldest be My Servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel; I will also give Thee for a light to the Gentiles, that Thou mayest be My Salvation unto the end of the earth" (Isa. xlix. 6).

In the structure of the Acts as a whole, we have already shown that Acts xiii. constitutes a parallel with the equipment of the twelve on the day of Pentecost, and accordingly we find Paul traversing much the same ground in his early ministry.

When the Jews refused his testimony at Antioch, the apostle refers to this identical passage in Isaiah, when he says:--

> "Seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles. For so hath the Lord commanded us, saying, I have set thee to be a light of the Gentiles, that thou shouldest be for salvation unto the ends of the earth" (Acts xiii. 46, 47).

There are some who would make this the point where Israel is set aside and the mystery begins, but seeing that the apostle is fulfilling a passage in the prophet Isaiah, such cannot be the case, for the mystery was, at the time of his fulfilling utterance, unknown and unrevealed in any part of Scripture, and was disclosed only by revelation to him as the Lord's prisoner. This ground has been covered in many articles in this magazine, in many booklets, and in the three larger volumes published by us. While it is beside our purpose to go over the ground again here, the matter is nevertheless of supreme importance, and the reader, who is unaware of the unique character of the dispensation of the mystery, is earnestly urged to consider the claims of the apostle in Eph. iii. 1-13 as a matter of prime importance, if studies of such as these in which we are engaged are to be effectively pursued.

The spiritual equipment of the apostles, received at Pentecost and promised in Acts i. 8, had in view the gathering of Israel (a feature that will receive fuller exposition as we proceed to the study of Acts ii. and iii.), and also the gathering of a company from among the Gentiles, during the period in which opportunity of repentance was permitted to Israel. This we shall find is referred to by the apostle Paul in such passages as Rom. xi. 7-24 and I Cor. xiv. 21, where the extension of spiritual gifts to the Gentiles had for its object the provocation of Israel. When, however, Israel refused to be provoked to emulation, and as a nation were set aside in Acts xxviii., a new dispensation, with new characteristics, was introduced, and among the new characteristics is the very evident change in connection with supernatural gifts of the Spirit.

The last recorded utterance of Christ on earth is in Acts i. 7 and 8, where His words give assurance that, whatever the answer may be to their question concerning the time of Israel's restoration, all was well, for all was in the Father's hands. Their part was to witness faithfully, even though "Israel be not gathered". Their enduements included a witness to "the end of the earth". What the Lord did not say to the disciples in so many words is very vividly brought before the mind by the event that immediately followed:--

> "And having said these things, as they beheld, He was taken up, and a cloud received Him out of their sight. And while they looked stedfastly toward heaven as He went up, behold two men stood by them in white apparel: which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven" (Acts i. 9-11).

Further questioning concerning the hope of Israel is thus referred to the second coming. The words "shall so come, in like manner" would make the apostles realize not only that the restoration of the kingdom of Israel would be fulfilled when Dan. vii. was fulfilled:--

> "I saw . . . . . the Son of man come with the clouds of heaven . . . . . and there was given him dominion" (Dan. vii. 13, 14).

but that the angel's statement also had Zech. xiv. 4 in view:--

> "And His feet shall stand in that day upon the mount of Olives which is before Jerusalem on the east" (Zech. xiv. 4).
>
> "Then returned they unto Jerusalem from the mount called Olivet, which is from Jerusalem a sabbath day's journey" (Acts i. 12).

There is a close parallel in Acts iii. with the outstanding teaching of Acts i.

(1) In both, the "restoration" is in view:--

> "Lord, wilt Thou at this time restore again the Kingdom to Israel?" (Acts i. 6).
>
> "The times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the world began" (Acts iii. 21).

(2) In both, there is the possibility that Israel would not be restored immediately:--

> "It is not for you to know the times or the seasons" (Acts i. 7).
>
> "Repent ye therefore, and be converted that your sins may be blotted out" (Acts iii. 19).

(3) In both, the second coming of the Lord is prominent:--

> "This same Jesus . . . . . shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven" (Acts i. 11).
>
> "He shall send Jesus Christ . . . . . Whom the heavens must receive until the times of restitution" (Acts iii. 20, 21).

(4) In both, there is the hint that the Gentile may be blessed as a result of Israel's attitude:--

> "Ye shall be witnesses unto Me, both in Jerusalem . . . . . and unto the ends of the earth" (Acts i. 8).
>
> "Unto you first God, having raised up His Son Jesus, sent Him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities" (Acts iii. 26).

That the Gentile, if not specifically mentioned here, is nevertheless in mind, may be seen by reference to Acts xiii.:--

> "It was necessary that the word of God should FIRST have been spoken unto you, but seeing that ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles . . . . . unto the ends of the earth" (Acts xiii. 46, 47).

The more the opening chapters of the Acts are scrutinized, the less is warrant found for the introduction there of "the church". All is intimately bound up with the hope of Israel's restoration. When we say "all", we mean every item that is brought forward, such as the forty days' exposition of the O.T. Scriptures (Acts i. 3), the association of the baptism of John with Pentecost (Acts i. 4, 5), the extension of the witness to the ends of the earth (Acts i. 8), and the coming of Christ to the Mount of Olives (Acts i. 11, 12). All these have a bearing upon the restoration of Israel: not one can be made to speak of "the church", without dislocation. With the return of the disciples to Jerusalem and their meeting together in prayer with the women, and Mary, and the Lord's brethren, the introduction to the Acts finishes, leaving the way open for the examination of the new story of Acts itself, which commences at i. 15.

In view of its prominence in the opening chapters of the Acts and its close bearing upon many points of doctrine and practice found both in the Acts and in the epistles of the period, it will be of service if we give the matter of Israel's restoration further consideration before commencing the study of the Acts proper, that is Acts i. 15 to the end of the book. The very use of the word "restore" presupposes "loss", "forfeiture", "cessation", or "lapse", and the history of Israel clearly shows that the covenants and promises that were made with them and the fathers were withdrawn, or postponed, because of the faithlessness of the people.

Three great causes of Israel's rejection are indicated in the Word, viz., (1) Idolatry; (2) Rejection of Christ; (3) Antagonism to the preaching of the Gospel. Other, intermediate, causes will be found, but these are the most prominent.

Before Israel entered the land of promise, and before a king sat upon the throne, Moses warned the people of the consequences of departure from the covenant of God:--

> "Even all nations shall say, Wherefore hath the Lord done thus with this land? What meaneth the heat of this great anger? Then men shall say, Because they have forsaken the covenant of the Lord God of their fathers, which He made with them when He brought them forth out of the land of Egypt: For they went and served other gods, and worshipped them, gods whom they knew not, who had not given to them any portion (see margin) . . . and the Lord rooted them out of their land in anger . . ." (Deut. xxix. 24-28).

Before proceeding the whole of Lev. xxvi. should be read. The chapter is full of teaching on the subject of Israel's rejection.

The second great cause of Israel's rejection was their blindness and hardness of heart at the coming of Christ:--

> "And when He was come near, He beheld the city, and wept over it, saying, If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace, but now they are hid from thine eyes" (Luke xix. 41, 42).

> "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not. Behold, your house is left unto you desolate" (Matt. xxiii. 37, 38).

The third cause of the rejection of Israel is seen in their bitter opposition to the spread of the gospel. Such passages as Acts xvii. 1-7 and xxii. 1-22 should be read. Space for the citation of many of these passages cannot be afforded, but we give one of them from the epistle to the Thessalonians:--

> "Ye also have suffered like things of your own countrymen, even as they have of the Jews: who both killed the Lord Jesus, and their own prophets, and have persecuted us; and they please not God, and are contrary to all men, forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles that they might be saved, to fill up their sins always; for the wrath is come upon them to the uttermost" (I Thess. ii. 14-16).

Berean Charts.

#1. Ephesians.
pp. 4 - 6

- - - I l l u s t r a t i o n - - -
(BE-XXIV.4).

The chart represents the epistle to the Ephesians under the figure of a fruit tree, having seven branches on either side, and bearing on each branch three fruits. This visualizes the literary structure of the epistle which has seven sections of doctrine in correspondence with seven sections of practice. The tree is seen to be "rooted and grounded in love", and is culminated by the prayer that leads on to "all the fullness of God".

The balancing of the doctrinal and practical sections is fairly obvious (as an example note ii. 21 and iv. 16—"fitly framed together" and "fitly joined together"). The triple subdivision of each section being not so obvious, we tabulate these in the hope that the chart may prove of service to the reader, not only in his own reading, but also as a help in quickening the interest of others.

Doctrinal Section (Eph. i. 3 - iii. 13).

(1) THE THREEFOLD CHARTER (i. 3-14).
- (a) The Will of the Father.
- (b) The Work of the Son.
- (c) The Witness of the Spirit.

(2) THE THREEFOLD PRAYER (i. 15-19).
- (a) That ye may know what is the hope of His calling.
- (b) That ye may know what is the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints.
- (c) That ye may know what is the exceeding greatness of His power to usward who believe.

(3) THE THREEFOLD FELLOWSHIP (Doctrinal) (i. 19 - ii. 7).
- (a) Quickened together with Christ.
- (b) Raised together.
- (c) Made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus.

(4) THREE WORKS (ii. 8-10).
- (a) Not of works, let any man should boast.
- (b) We are His workmanship.
- (c) Created in Christ Jesus unto good works.

(5) THE THREEFOLD PEACE (ii. 11-19-).
(a) Far off made nigh . . . . . He is our peace.
(b) Of the two a new man created, so making peace.
(c) Reconciliation and access. He came and preached peace to those that were afar off, and to those that were nigh.

(6) THE THREEFOLD FELLOWSHIP (Dispensational) (ii. -19-22).
(a) No more strangers but fellow citizens.
(b) The whole building fitly framed together.
(c) Builded together for an habitation of God.

(7) THE THREEFOLD EQUALITY (Doctrinal and Dispensational) (iii. 1-13).
(a) In spirit the Gentiles are heirs on an equality.
(b) They are members of a body, all on perfect equality.
(c) They are partakers in the promise of Christ by the gospel entrusted to Paul, on an equality.

Practical (Eph. iv. 1 - vi. 20).

(1) A THREEFOLD EXHORTATION (iv. 1-6).
(a) Walk worthy of the calling.
(b) Forbear one another in love.
(c) Endeavour to keep the unity of the Spirit.

(2) A THREEFOLD MEASURE (iv. 7-19).
(a) The measure of the gift of Christ.
(b) The measure of the fullness of Christ.
(c) The measure of every part.

(3) A THREEFOLD APPLICATION OF THE TRUTH "IN JESUS" (iv. 20-32).
(a) Put off the old man, concerning the former conversation.
(b) Put on the new man which is created in righteousness.
(c) Put away the lie, speak every man truth.

(4) A THREEFOLD WALK (v. 1 - vi. 9).
(a) Walk in love. WIVES and HUSBANDS.
(b) Walk as light. CHILDREN and PARENTS.
(c) Walk circumspectly. SERVANTS and MASTERS.

(5) A THREEFOLD STAND (vi. 10-13).
(a) Put on the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil.
(b) Take unto you the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day.
(c) And having "worked out" (see i. 19, "worked in") all, to stand.

(6) A THREEFOLD EQUIPTMENT (vi. 14-18).
(a) GIRDLE of Truth and BREASTPLATE of Righteousness.
(b) SHOES of Peace and SHIELD of Faith.
(c) HELMET of Salvation and SWORD of the Spirit.

(7) A THREEFOLD PRAYER FOR UTTERANCE (vi. 19, 20).
(a) That I may open my mouth boldly.
(b) That therein I may speak boldly.
(c) As I ought to speak.

The Central Prayer (Eph. iii. 14-21).

THE THREEFOLD PRAYER (iii. 14-21).

(a) In order that He would grant you to be strengthened.
(b) In order that ye may be able to comprehend.
(c) In order that ye might be filled unto all the fullness of God.

#2. Philippians.
pp. 61, 62

- - - I l l u s t r a t i o n - - -
(BE-XXIV.61).

There are two words that are of importance in studying Philippians, viz., "Perfection" and "Perdition". The latter word is rendered "destruction" in Phil. iii. 19, "perdition" in Heb. x. 39, and "waste" in Matt. xxvi. 8.

The atmosphere of Philippians is that of the arena; a prize is in view, which is specially associated with "the out resurrection" (Phil. iii. 11). Four examples are given to encourage the believer to stay the course. First that of the Lord Himself (Phil. ii. 5-11), then that of the apostle (Phil. iii. 4-10). In these examples, the death of the cross is indicated as the deepest depth to which it is possible to descend, followed, however, in each case by a most wonderful exaltation and glory. The two examples of Timothy and Epaphroditus indicate the spirit that must characterize all who would run this race, and suggest that where these things are lacking, small hope can be entertained of attaining the prize.

We sought to avoid the actual use of a cross in the diagram, but found it impossible. We trust that no one will be offended by this symbol, for the cross is essential to the crown. The apostle, in I Cor. ix. 24-27, supplies us with a full commentary upon the nature of a prize, and gives examples from Israel's history (as he does also in Heb. iii.) to enforce the fact that all who are redeemed do not necessarily attain the prize.

The festoons that appear in the chart are not for mere ornament, but are intended to suggest that the prize of the high calling is vitally linked with the teaching given under the various headings. It is not a matter of qualifying for salvation or for membership of the one body—that is all of grace, and can neither won nor lost. Philippians is addressed to those who have believed, and urges them to "work out" the salvation which is theirs. They are assured that as they do so, it is God's good pleasure to "work in" all needed grace and strength.

For detail exposition, the reader should consult the articles in Volumes VI to XI on "The Hope and the Prize", or the book, "The Testimony of the Lord's Prisoner".

#3. Colossians.
pp. 121, 122

- - - I l l u s t r a t i o n - - -
(BE-XXIV.121).

This epistle is a companion to the epistle to the Ephesians. It traverses the same ground so far as the revelation of the mystery is concerned, but lays more stress upon the Headship of Christ, and devotes its central member to a solemn note of warning: "Beware" (Col. ii. 8).

This note of warning speaks of three items, namely, philosophy, tradition and rudiments. We have accordingly adopted the triangular danger sign in this chart. Nailed to the post and "blotted out" will be seen those items enumerated in Col. ii. 14-17. While Colossians corresponds mainly with Ephesians, it also indicates the glorious encouragement the reader—like the reader of Philippians—has for pressing on to "perfection". This we have indicated, using the desire of Paul (Col. i. 28), and the prayer of Epaphras (Col. iv. 12) to draw attention to the fact that our experimental "presentation", through heading the warning and teaching of the apostle, is but our realization and standing upon the completeness that is already ours in Christ (Col. i. 22, ii. 10).

There are three hidden things in Colossians, and in the actual chart used at Bible meetings the centre of the triangle contained the word "Hope", and two rectangular panels contained the words "Riches" and "Glory". These panels were then removed, revealing underneath, three hidden things:--

(1) The hidden mystery (Col. i. 26).
(2) The hidden treasure of wisdom and knowledge (Col. ii. 3).
(3) The life hid with Christ until glory (Col. iii. 3, 4).

We have been obliged to resort to the expedient of partly removing these panels—and trust the reader will understand.

The secret of Colossians is that the believer is so complete or "filled full" in Christ, that he has no room for either philosophy, tradition, rudiments, ordinances or observances, but finds that for all things "Christ is all and in all".

#4. II Timothy.
pp. 181 - 183

- - - I l l u s t r a t i o n - - -
(BE-XXIV.181).

This last prison epistle corresponds with Philippians, for it speaks of the athlete (II Tim. ii. 5), the possibility of winning or losing a crown (II Tim. ii. 5, 12; iv. 7, 8), the finishing at a race course (II Tim. iv. 7).

Three "good" things are mentioned by the apostle:--

(1) THE GOOD DEPOSIT (II Tim. i. 14, see I Tim. vi. 20 and II Tim. i. 12, ii. 2).
(2) THE GOOD SOLDIER (II Tim. ii. 3) where endurance rather than fighting qualities are uppermost in the apostle's mind.
(3) THE GOOD FIGHT (II Tim. iv. 7). This too is not a "fight" in a military sense, but rather a "contest", and is translated "race" in Heb. xii. 1.

There are four emphatic statements about the Word in this epistle.

(1) Preach the Word (II Tim. iv. 2).—Here the word "preach" means "to herald"—not to "evangelize", and looks to the character of the times when men will not endure sound doctrine.

(2) The inspiration of the Word (II Tim. iii. 16).—The word scripture (graphe) means something which is written down, not something merely in the mind, or spoken by the mouth. The words "given by inspiration of God", if translated literally, mean "God breathed", and indicated that what is "written" in our Scriptures is what God said, thereby eliminating the interference of the mind and short-comings of the human instrument. As a speaker once summed up the passage: It is a matter of dictation than of composition.

(3) The pattern (form) of sound words (II Tim. i. 13).—The word "form" indicates a pattern from which others may work. The chart shows the planning of a pattern. One square is complete, and shows "the unit of repeat". This unit is turned over and over and covers the whole surface, thereby making a balanced and harmonious pattern. Should anyone venture to place in one square a rose, in another a bird, in another a geometric pattern, we should get variety, but the pattern would vanish.

Paul's life and doctrine have been given to us as "the unit of repeat". Timothy, so far as grace was given him, continued the design. We are not all like Paul or Timothy.

Someone must spend the time to rule up the small squares: someone must draw down the pattern in outline; someone must spend their precious time simply filling in a "background". There is a temptation to go off after something more "original" or spectacular, but commendation is only for those who obey and whose service has been according to plan. When the pattern is complete the ruled up squares will have vanished. Yet the Lord knows all about the quiet "humdrum", and without it the pattern would not hold together nor be true and pleasing.

(4) The right division of the Word (II Tim. ii. 15).—This is fundamental to all study. Right division recognizes the difference between kingdom and church, the mystery and the gospel, also the many sub-divisions that clarify the vision.

Timothy's Bible would have been the Greek Septuagint (he was a Galatian, and his father was a Greek). Consequently the word used by the apostle for "rightly dividing" would have been familiar to Timothy, for it comes in that well known verse, Prov. iii. 6: "In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall rightly divide (direct) thy paths."

The illustration of a sign post at the fork in the road is a scriptural representation of "right division" which can be appreciated by all.

The Bible.

The study of the Bible

(An extract from a book entitled: "The Study of the Bible", published 1862. Author unnamed.)

"Why is it that Christian people read the Bible so differently?"
p. 80

"In searching for an answer we have been led to conclude that the true explanation will be found in that prevailing neglect of the Bible as a whole, which arises from its being always read in mere fragments; in the forgetfulness of the particular purpose for which the Book was given; in confusions regarding its inspiration; in errors relating to the Holy Spirit; in the confounding of revealed facts with human inferences; in bias of one kind or other; in reading either for 'edification' or for kindling of devout feeling, without first ascertaining the meaning of that which is read; in the habit of accommodating Scripture, or of perverting it, by exaggeration, projection, or other misapplication of texts; in allegorizing, under the influence of unbridled fancy; in the abuse of parallel passages and references, in the darkening of the sense which is frequently occasioned by the injudicious division into chapters and verses; in the acceptance of interpretations drawn from Hymns; in the neglect and consequent abuse of unfulfilled prophecy; in inattention to the character of the particular dispensation under which we are living; in errors as to church authority, and the value of tradition; in undue reliance on the professional labours of the clergy; in turning helps into hindrances; and above all, in habitual indifference to the demand Scripture makes on every man for prolonged study, as an essential pre-requisite to the elevation by its means of moral character."

Bible Marking.
p. 180

Bible marking may be good, or it may be very, very bad. The following extract sheds light upon the evils and dangers of overdoing the so-called "railway connections" and other markings in the text or margin, that stultify rather than encourage true study:--

> "Human conceptions, however helpful, should not find a permanent place, even in your own individual copy of the Word of God. The particular line of truth they emphasized may have been the teaching of that particular hour of study. But, every time you turn to a passage, you may expect fresh light and a newly revealed line of thought. If your eye is at once arrested by notes and comments, or even by the underlining of special words, your minds slips into the groove of a past meditation; thus the liberty of fresh light, and the free course of fresh revelation, are checked and impeded. Do not crowd into the sacred sanctuary of the Word, ideas which may most helpfully be garnered in the classroom of your notebook" (The Following of the Star by FLORENCE L. BARCLAY).

Bible reading for the Beginner.
pp. 197 - 200

On several occasions a young believer has approached us with the problem of "How to read the Bible". Upon being told that one usually "Begins at the beginning" he has explained that his difficulty was connected with the bulk or amount that had to be read. Long genealogies, difficult names and places, a mass of matter that made no immediate appeal, were real obstacles. We also realized that the character of the times in which we live makes it difficult to concentrate for any period. The young believer is surrounded by rush and hurry. Short cuts to almost every branch of knowledge is thrust before his face, and therefore his problem must be dealt with sympathetically.

All Scripture is not only inspired, but profitable, but the reader must feel his need, otherwise he will degenerate into a machine, and reading the Word under compulsion is horrible to contemplate. So much reading per day may be wise and profitable, but rules and readings can be a snare. What profit have some received from reading the Bible through six or seven times, except to be able to make that feat their boast? Guarding therefore the liberty of each believer, and making no rules to bind him, we offered him, at his own request, the following scheme, believing that when this is followed the interest will be so quickened that nothing short of the whole Bible will satisfy the awakened understanding. We pass it on for what it is worth to any who may have to meet the same difficult.

GENESIS. This must be read. It is "the book of beginnings". After the book has been read, and before the next book is commenced, the reader would be well advised to read, with the help of a Concordance, what the N.T. says about such typical characters as Adam, Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham and Joseph.

EXODUS. This is the book of redemption. The reader should have an eye for its typical teaching—knowing that the items are divinely selected for our learning. Before commencing the next book, the reader should note all that is written in the N.T. on Israel in Egypt, the Passover, the Tabernacle and the law of Moses.

ISAIAH. We pass over the whole of Israel's eventful history and come to the days of their last Kings, and read of the failure yet ultimate restoration of this people. Every N.T. reference to Isa. liii. should be read before passing to the next book.

MATTHEW. We now come to the fulfillment of the promises made unto the fathers, in the birth, life, death and resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ, Care should be taken to observe the emphasis that Matthew lays upon the fact that Jesus Christ was "King of the Jews", and the parallels in Luke to the genealogy, and birth of Christ, the testimony of the forerunner, and the opening ministry of the Lord should be noted. Where Matthew stresses King and Kingdom, Luke stresses Saviour and Gentile blessing.

JOHN. This Gospel has a message for the world, and the reader should note the many occurrences of the word "world". It is written with a particular object which is stated in John xx. 31.

ACTS. The Acts must be read in order that one may appreciate the grace of God toward Israel, and His wonderful provision in the ministry of Paul for the Gentiles. Parallel statements in the Acts concerning Peter and Paul should be looked for. Ponder the dispensational importance of Acts xxviii.

GALATIANS. Of all the epistles of Paul, this short letter to the Galatians should be read first. In it the absolutely independent ministry of Paul is established, and the great doctrine of justification by faith without legal works is defended and taught.

EPHESIANS. We pass into a different atmosphere when we open this epistle. Israel is gone. The Gentile is no longer spoken of as an heir of Abraham. New Covenant blessings are unknown. Here we have the revelation of a secret, the calling of a new company, the body of Christ, and a new sphere of blessing "in heavenly places".

REVELATIONS. This book brings the testimony of the Word of prophecy to its completion. It balances Genesis. Here we find paradise restored, sin and death banished, and a new heaven and a new earth, after the great and dreadful day of the Lord has accomplished its purpose.

After the reader has made this selective reading, he will be, or should be, so desirous of filling in the gaps occasioned by this selection, that he will feel the bulk and mass no burden, but will gladly and thankfully begin at the beginning, omitting nothing, but patiently and prayerfully follow the unfolding of the purpose of the ages, which it is the chief purpose of the Bible to make known, discovering also on almost every page some feature that illumines the character, the Person or the Work of Him Whose name, too, is: The Word.

In conclusion we give the following extract from the work, The Study of the Bible:--

> "In reading Scripture, we are bound, and that most emphatically,--no less by reverence for its author than by integrity of heart, to ask but one question,--'What does it say?' And if, to get this question answered, it is necessary to ascertain not only what the precise words are, but when and to whom they were spoken,--to observe the connection in which they stand, and to note the circumstances in which they were uttered. We must neither grudge the labour that may be involved, nor imagine that we can evade its necessity by indulging in our own fancies, however ingenious they may be, or by prolonging mere meditation, however spiritual or devout. When the true meaning of a passage is made out, and not till then, shall we be able to apply it with simplicity of purpose, or receive and realize as living words that which has been written or spoken."

Facts and Inferences.

(From "The Study of the Bible.").

p. 220

"The revelation contained in the Scriptures extends only to FACTS: not to the theory of these facts, of their original causes. The most important truths are communicated in a dogmatic, not a theoretic manner. We are taught, on the testimony of Him Who cannot lie, insulated facts, which we cannot connect with those reasons with which they are undoubtedly connected, or the Divine mind. They rest solely on the basis of Divine Authority; and we are left as much in the dark with respect to the mode of their existence, as if they were not revealed" (Robert Hall).

"St. Peter teaches most distinctly that Christ "hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God" (I Pet. iii. 18); that "His Own self bare our sins in His Own body on the tree"; that "by His stripes we are healed" (ii. 24); while St. Paul, with equal distinctness, asserts that Christ "redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us" (Gal. iii. 13); the author of the epistle to the Hebrews, that "without shedding of blood is no remission" (ix. 22); and our Lord Himself, that "the Son of man came to give His life a ransom for many" (Matt. xx. 28).

"They are revealed FACTS on which the doctrine of Atonement rests; and happy is he who, receiving them in the spirit of a little child, believes and lives."

"The INFERENCES ordinarily deduced are various, and commonly relate rather to the philosophy of the Atonement, than the fact of its having been made."

Biblical blessings.

#3. The blessing of confidence (Psa. ii. 12; xxxiv. 8 and xl. 4).

pp. 28 - 30

The first blessing we have considered is the blessing of confession (Psa. xxxii. 1-5). The first logical step for any thus blessed is to trust unreservedly the One Who so graciously and wondrously delivered from the bondage of unforgiven sin. Trust is the logical outcome of faith.

We remember a famous tight-rope walker who seemed as much at home upon a rope as most folks seem upon solid earth, asking a spectator whether he believed that he, the tight-rope walker, could carry him across the rope on his back. "Yes", replied the spectator, "I believe you could". "Will you let me then?" asked Blondin, for such was his name. "No", replied the spectator. In a crude way this suggests to us the difference that we must make between "believing" something as a fact, and "trusting". Most of us "believe" the date "1066 William the Conqueror", but such belief makes no appreciable difference to our lives, our hopes or our destinies. James tells us the demons "believe" that there is one God, His Word and His Work, we trust Him, thereby concluding that He is worthy of our fullest confidence. This "Biblical blessing" finds a place in the first book of the Psalms:--

> "Blessed are all they that put their trust in Him" (Psa. ii. 12).
> "O taste and see that the Lord is good, blessed is the man that trusteth in Him" (Psa. xxxiv. 8).
> "Blessed is that man that maketh the Lord his trust, and respecteth not the proud, nor such as turn aside to lies" (Psa. xl. 4).

Two words are used in these verses for the idea of "trust". In Psa. ii. 12 and xxxiv. 8 the word conveys the idea of a "refuge", such as might be afforded by a "rock", a "shadow", a "shield" or a "wing". In Psa. xl. 4 the word means rather to "hang upon" or "cling". In order to make our "trust" intelligent, let us see one or two illustrations of the use of each word.

Trust as a "refuge":--

> "Where are their gods, their rock in whom they trusted?" (Deut. xxxii. 37).
> "Under whose wings thou art come to trust" (Ruth ii. 12).
> "He is a buckler to all them that trust in Him" (II Sam. xxii. 31).

Trust as "clinging."—As a noun this word means a "melon" which clings by tendrils, and so supports itself (Numb. xi. 5). As a verb it is translated "make me hope" in Psa. xxii. 9, where the figure of a child clinging to its mother is used.

W. Kaye in a note on Psa. ii. 12 says:--

"The object of this trust must be a divine Person ('The Son'). See Jer. xvii. 5-8: which is a paraphrase of Psa. i. 2, 3, and this serves to bind Psalms i. and ii. together."

Let us turn to this passage in Jeremiah:--

"Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord. For he shall be like the heath in the desert, and shall not see when good cometh; but shall inhabit the parched places in the wilderness, in a salt land and not inhabited.

Blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord, and whose hope the Lord is. For he shall be as a tree planted by the waters, and that spreadeth out her roots by the river, and shall not see when heat cometh, but her leaf shall be green; and shall not be careful in the year of drought, neither shall cease from yielding fruit" (Jer. xvii. 5-8).

Psa. ii. is prophetic of the day of the Lord, and will be a word in season when the kings of the earth assemble together against the Lord and against His Anointed.

Psa. xxxiv. 6-8 strikes a personal note:--

"This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles . . . . . O taste and see that the Lord is good: blessed is the man that trusteth in Him."

It is doubly blessed when we not only enjoy the goodness of the Lord ourselves, but can give personal testimony to this blessedness: "This poor man cried"; "O taste and see."

In Psa. xl. we have a most wonderful description of the horrors of sin, its defilement, its terrible power, and the hopeless and helpless condition of all who are under its dominion, followed by the exultant feeling of security, the blessed relief, the exchange of miry clay for solid rock, and the establishing of one's goings. Then the song of praise and the testimony of others:--

"He brought me up also out of an horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock, and established my goings. And He hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God; many shall see it, and fear, and shall trust in the Lord. Blessed is that man that maketh the Lord his trust" (Psa. xl. 2-4).

Here then is the second Biblical blessing of the Psalms, the blessing of trust, the blessing of confidence, the blessing of a mighty refuge, a rock of ages, a shield and buckler; someone to whom the weak may cling and be at peace.

If we know the blessedness of sins forgiven, we may also know the blessedness of perfect trust:--

"The blessing of the Lord, it maketh rich, and He addeth no sorrow with it" (Prov. x. 22).

#4. The blessings of consistency (Psa. i. 1).
pp. 77 - 79

We have called the blessing recounted in Psa. xxxii., the "blessing of confession", and that found in Psa. xxxiv. 8, the "blessing of confidence". We now turn to a third aspect, which we find in the first book of the Psalms—"the blessing of consistency."

"Walk", in the Scriptures, indicates a way of life. To "walk worthy" of one's calling is the ideal set before every believer. We read of "walking after other gods" (Deut. viii. 19), of "walking in His ways" (Deut. xxviii. 9), of "walking uprightly" (Psa. xv. 2). Speaking of Enoch and his righteousness, the Scriptures record: "And Enoch walked with God" (Gen. v. 22). In the N.T. we read of a walk that is in "newness of life", a walk that is "by faith", a walk that is "in the spirit", and a walk that is "in love".

And now we come to the subject of the present article. We open the Psalms, and in the first verse of the first Psalm, the opening sentence of the whole book, we read:--

> "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly."

As an example, from Scripture, of the negative side of this verse we may take Ahaziah, King of Judah:--

> "His mother's name also was Ahtaliah the daughter of Omri. He also walked in the ways of the house of Ahab: for his mother was the counselor to do wickedly. Wherefore he did evil in the sight of the Lord like the house of Ahab: for they were his counselors after the death of his father TO HIS DESTRUCTION. He walked after their counsel . . . . ." (II Chron. xxii. 1-5).

The blessedness of Psa. i. 1, however, is not limited to walk. There is a progression. First there is the walking; then the standing; and finally the sitting. "Walking" has in it the idea of movement, of progression. "Standing" suggests resolution, the taking up of a position. We read of standing "to minister", of standing "in the Lord's counsel", of standing "in grace". And here in Psa. i. 1 it is "standing in the way of sinners". The blessing of the Lord that maketh rich is not for those who either walk or stand in evil ways. Neither is it for those who sit in the seat of the scornful. "Sitting" often indicates some aspect of rule or authority. "Lot sat in the gate of Sodom" (Gen. xix. 1); "Thou satest in the throne judging righteously" (Psa. ix. 4).

Psa. xxvi. has a good deal in common with the opening verse of Psa. i.:-- > "I have walked in mine iniquity" (verse 1).

> "I have walked in Thy truth" (verse 3).
> "My foot standeth in an even place: in the congregations will I bless the Lord" (verse 12).
> "I have not sat with vain persons, neither will I go in with dissemblers" (verse 4).

The teaching of Scripture on the character and end of the scornful is a solemn study. There is but one other reference to the scorner in the Psalms:--

> "The proud have had me greatly in derision: yet have I not declined from Thy law" (Psa. cxix. 51).

The Book of Proverbs, on the other hand, speaks of the scorner no less than eighteen times. The last reference is in chapter xxiv. 9: "The scorner is an abomination to men."

Psa. i. 1 is expressed negatively: "Blessed is the man that walketh not, nor standeth . . . . . nor sitteth." While a negative attitude is not ideal, let us not under-estimate the fact that, although to do good is more blessed, to abstain from evil is blessed also. Those who are timid should be encouraged by this verse. What though your strength is small, and the way you have traversed a negligible quantity? What though you have not yet reached the height of walking worthy of your calling, or of walking worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing? Is it not something to have refrained your foot from evil? To have entered into the blessedness of not walking with evil, is but the prelude to the further and fuller blessedness of walking with God. If we cannot yet look upon our stand for the truth with any sense of approval, let us not miss the blessing that is assured to those who do not stand in the way of sinners. If we have not reached, in our experience, the realization of our position as "seated" in heavenly places—which is blessing raised to its superlative degree—we may still experience the blessedness that attends those who have not sat in the seat of the scornful.

Positive statements immediately follow what we get in Psa. i. 1, but the verse itself is negative. The next verse completes the story with its "delight in the law of the Lord", and meditation therein "day and night" (Psa. i. 2).

We have already seen the blessedness of confession and of confidence. We now see the blessedness of consistency, another of the blessings of the Lord that make rich, and bring no sorrow with them.

#5. The blessing of consideration (Psa. xli. 1).
pp. 117 - 120

We have now to consider the fourth ground of blessing that is mentioned in the first book of the Psalms, and this we find in Psa. xli. 1:--

> "Blessed is he that considereth the poor: the Lord will deliver him in time of trouble."

Psa. xli. is one of the Messianic Psalms. When we say this, let us not be misunderstood. Christ is the sum and substance, the Alpha and the Omega of all Scripture from Genesis to Revelation. Every Psalm, therefore, speaks of Him. Some, however, speak prophetically of Him in a special way, as, for instance, Psa. ii. and Psa. xxii. Among these we must place Psa. xli. Verse 9, as originally written by David, referred to Ahithophel who betrayed him, and as Ahithophel had some connection with Bathsheba there were some grounds, humanly speaking, for his action. The Lord Jesus quotes this verse with reference to His own betrayal by Judas. It is important, however, not only to observe what the Lord quoted, but what He omitted. He quoted the words: "He that eateth bread with Me hath lifted up his heel against Me." But He did not quote: "Mine own familiar friend, in whom I trusted" (John xiii. 18). Judas was a devil, and known as such by the Lord from the beginning (John vi. 70), and as such could never have been the Lord's own familiar friend. Neither could it be said of Christ that He "trusted in" Judas for it is written that "He knew what was in man" (John ii. 25).

We shall find some things in these Messianic Psalms that are true of both the Psalmist and of Christ, but there are others that belong strictly to the Psalmist himself as the fallible type. For example, the words of Psa. xli. 4, "I have sinned against Thee", could never have been spoken by the Saviour. Even though He bore our sins, and was made sin for us, it was ever true that He knew no sin, and that He did no sin.

The English reader of Psa. xli. 1 is most likely to read it as though it inculcated kindness to the poor, almsgiving and charity. While we would not say anything against a simple act of kindness, but would rather urge a more responsive spirit on the part of most of us, the thought of kindness is not the meaning of this passage. The word translated "consider" occurs 72 times in the O.T. and the following are the translations found in the A.V.:--

> "Behave wisely, guide wittingly, be instructed, wise, consider, consider wisely, deal prudently, give skill, have good success, have understanding, instruct, make to understand, make wise, prosper, teach, understand, expert, maschil, prudent, skilful, understanding, wise, wisely, wisdom."

"Blessed is he that . . . . . the poor."—How shall we translate this word? What is its special meaning?

In the first place, the "poor" may refer to the impecunious (Exod. xxx. 15), the weak (Gen. xli. 19), or the sick both in mind and body (II Sam. xiii. 2). The word translated "poor" can be used of the son of a king; we must, therefore, take care not to limit its meaning. The translations of sakal ("consider") already given, preclude the idea of almsgiving or of charity. The emphasis all through its upon wisdom.

There is but one way of arriving at the solution, and that way is too long to be included in an article. We must all, personally, read the history of David, from the rebellion of Absalom and the betrayal of Ahithophel in II Sam. xv., throughout the heart-breaking history of chapters xvi.-xviii., on to the chapters of restoration, xix.-xxi. There we shall read of Zadok and his two sons, and of Hushai, who though loyal to David, and willing to share his exile, went back to Jerusalem and defeated the counsel of Ahithophel, so that Ahithophel, like Judas, "hanged himself" (II Sam. xvii. 23; Matt. xxvii. 5).

Whenever we are faced with a difficulty in the translation of an O.T. passage, it is always a wise thing to see how the translators of the LXX version have rendered it; for it is clear that these Hebrews, 200 years B.C., knew something of their mother tongue. We find that they used the word suniemi, which is translated 24 times "to understand", once "be wise" and once "consider". About half these occurrences are found in the quotations made from Isa. vi. and the explanations that follow. This is very suggestive, for Israel as a nation have not "considered the afflicted" but have refused Him. In Eph. v. 16, 17 the word is associated with evil days as it is in Psa. xli.

We regret that in this article we have been obliged to deal with our subject a little in the manner of the lexicon. It would have been easier to have enlarged upon the blessedness of having compassion on the poor, or of passing on one's blessings in fellowship, but such a treatment would have been a betrayal of the truth, and we shun the slightest approximation to the counsel of Ahithophel. These men "considered wisely the afflicted" and received blessing from the Lord.

How far can this passage be true of ourselves? The Lord Jesus is denied His lawful sovereignty here, and has left us in this scene of His betrayal, and we, too, are called upon to remember Him, His rightful claims and His coming glory. Quite apart from our assured acceptance in the Beloved, we are told that "if we endure, we shall also reign with Him" (II Tim. ii. 12).

The Psalmist in Psa. xli. 1 speaks of deliverance in the day of evil. In like manner, the apostle writing to the Ephesians as overcomers, says:--

> "Wherefore take unto you the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having worked out all, to stand" (Eph. vi. 13).

A comforting thought is expressed in the third verse of the Psalm: "Thou wilt make all his bed in his sickness" (Psa. xli. 3). The margin reads "turn", as in Psa. lxvi. 6: "He turned the sea into dry land." The meaning of the verse is rather as follows:--

"It is no longer a sick bed, for Thou hast healed him of his disease" (Perowne).
"Thou hast changed his bed of sickness into health" (Translation of "Four Friends").

The blessing of the Lord that maketh rich, which is promised to each one who takes his place with the Lord in His rejection, is manifold. He delivers in the day of evil; He preserves and keeps him alive (the word also includes the thought of resurrection); He blesses "upon the earth" (i.e., in spite of the usurper each shall yet stand in his appointed sphere of blessing, heavenly or earthly); He will strengthen him while sick; and finally change his sickness to health. What was physical to David is spiritual to us, but whether then or now, these are Biblical blessings that enrich indeed, and add no sorrow with them.

#6. The blessing that satisfies (Psa. lxv. 3, 4).
pp. 150 - 153

The second book of the Psalms (xlii.-lxxii.) contains only one "blessing", but it is of sufficient fullness to stand alone. The passage is Psa. lxv. 4:--

> "Blessed is the man whom Thou choosest, and causest to approach unto Thee, that he may dwell in Thy courts: we shall be satisfied with the goodness of Thy house, even of Thy holy temple."

It would be inappropriate in a series like this to devote too much time to analysis, and we therefore give only the merest suggestion of the structure of the Psalm in which this blessing is found:--

Psalm lxv.

A | 1. Praise. Silence.
B | 2. All flesh.
C | 3, 4. "Blessed" (ashere); "dwell"; "satisfied with goodness".
B | 5, 6. All ends of the earth.
C | 7-13. "Thou blessest" (barak); "dwell"; "crown with goodness".
A | 13. Shout. Sing.

It will be seen that the blessings of verse 4 are balanced by those of verse 10, although we must remember that two different words are employed. The blessings of verses 3, 4 are associated with spiritual things—"iniquities, transgressions, Thy courts, Thy house"—whereas the blessings of verses 7-13 are the blessings of field and furrow, fatness and flocks.

The Psalms seems to have been written to celebrate the goodness of the Lord in giving a bounteous harvest. Possibly during a drought, vows had been made, and now in a solemn silence these vows are performed. One rendering of verse 1 is: "Praise waits all hushed"; and this solemn hush is in contrast with the "shout" of the concluding verse. The words, "A psalm and song of David" need not necessarily mean that David was the author, but, as The Companion Bible indicates, they may imply a prophetic anticipation of the day of David's greater Son. The reference to the "temple" in verse 4 also points in this direction, for no temple existed until Solomon's day.

Leaving these considerations, however, let us give our attention to the blessings specified in this passage. It is most important that we should not forget that this record of blessings commences at verse 3:--

> "Iniquities prevail against me; as for our transgressions, Thou shalt purge them away."

It may at first seem strange to commence a list of blessings with "prevailing iniquities". But until the believer has come to an end of himself and has realized his complete ruin and hopelessness, fullness of blessing cannot flow out from God into his heart. It is the empty vessel that He fills. The margin indicates that the word "iniquities" should read either "words" or "matters", and the LXX translates it logoi anomon. The Psalmist was overwhelmed by the record of his sin; he felt himself condemned, and ready to cry out with the "wretched man" of Rom. vii. 24. The blessing of Psa. xxxii., the blessedness of covered transgression and of forgiven sin, is here repeated: "As for our transgressions, Thou shalt purge them away." The way is now open for the special blessings of verse 4.

These blessings are connected with (1) Choice, (2) Approach, (3) Dwelling and (4) Satisfaction.

(1) "Blessed is the man whom Thou choosest."—This initial blessing, the blessing of God's choice, rests upon nothing but the sovereignty of God and moves entirely in a realm of grace:--

> "The Lord did not set His love upon you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people; for ye were the fewest of all people: but because the Lord loved you and because He would keep the oath which He had sworn unto your fathers" (Deut. vii. 7, 8).

This initial blessing separates the recipient, in the eyes of Him that chose, from all else:--

> "The Lord hath chosen thee to be a peculiar people unto Himself, above all the nations that are upon the earth" (Deut. xiv. 1, 2).

In Psa. cvi. 5 the Psalmist desires to see and rejoice in:--

i. The Good of Thy chosen.
ii. The Gladness of Thy nation.
iii. The Glory of Thine inheritance.

When we turn to the N.T. we find the same insistence upon the sovereignty of the Chooser, the peculiarity of the chosen and the glory of their inheritance:--

"God hath chosen the weak things of the world" (I Cor. i. 27).
"He hath chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world" (Eph. i. 4).
"The purpose of God according to election . . . . . not of works, but of Him that calleth" (Rom. ix. 11).

(2) "Blessed is the man whom Thou . . . . . causest to approach unto Thee."—Those who were chosen before time began, were chosen in order that, in time, they might draw near to the Lord Who chose them for Himself. Eph. i. 4 speaks of our election; Eph. ii. 18 speaks of our approach:--

"But now, in Christ Jesus, ye who sometimes were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ" (Eph. ii. 13).
"For through Him we both have access by one Spirit unto the Father" (Eph. ii. 18).

It is of the utmost importance that we observe the order here. We are made nigh by the blood, before we draw nigh by the Spirit. Those whom the Lord "caused to approach" in Psa. lxv. were those who knew something of "prevailing iniquity" and of "covered transgressions":--

"For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God" (I Pet. iii. 18).
"Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus . . . . . let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith" (Heb. x. 19-22).

Once again we must draw attention to the order here. We have no full assurance of faith, unless we have boldness by the blood. The blessings of Psa. lxv. 4 must be preceded by the blessing of covered sin in verse 3. So must it ever be with regard to all the blessings that shall be enjoyed in whatever sphere; we must all start as sinners saved by grace.

(3) "Choosest . . . . . causest to approach . . . . . that he may dwell in Thy courts."—Just as true home life is at the centre of all national life, and largely the gauge of its stability and purity, so we find that the conception of home is an integral part in the purpose of grace. Soon after Israel were delivered from Egypt, the Lord planned the tabernacle in order that He, the Holy One, might be able to dwell with His people: "Let them make Me a sanctuary: that I may dwell among them" (Exod. xxv. 8). The Psalmist, when he wrote, "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want" had in mind the goal: "I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever" (Psa. xxiii. 1, 6). All the intervening verses are but steps that lead to home.

When at length the apostle sees the new heaven and the new earth he also hears a voice which says:--

"Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them" (Rev. xxi. 1-3).

Whether we think of the Lord God walking with man in the garden of Eden, the tabernacle in the wilderness, the temple of Solomon, the words of John xiv. concerning the "many mansions", the indwelling of Christ by faith in Eph. iii., the "Shepherd Psalm", or the apocalyptic vision, we see that all Scripture speaks in glowing words of that blessed dwelling-place, the home of those who were chosen and are made nigh.

(4) "We shall be satisfied."—All possible blessing is summed up in the word "satisfied". Satisfaction cannot be found "under the sun" (Eccles. i. 8; iv. 8). It belongs to the life to come:--

> "I will behold Thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness" (Psa. xvii. 15).

#7. The blessing of anticipated victory.
pp. 201 - 203

The third book of the Psalms (lxxiii.-lxxxix.) contains a fourfold blessing, and this fourfold blessing belongs to the second part of this book, namely, Psa. lxxxiv.-lxxxix.:--

> "Blessed are they that dwell in Thy house" (Psa. lxxxiv. 4).
> "Blessed is the man whose strength is in Thee" (Psa. lxxxiv. 5).
> "Blessed is the man that trusteth in Thee" (Psa. lxxxiv. 12).
> "Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound" (Psa. lxxxix. 15).

The first of these Psalms is written for the sons of Korah, and when we remember that the sons of Korah were "Keepers of the thresholds (margin) of the tabernacle" (I Chron. ix. 19), we better appreciate the words:--

> "I had rather be a doorkeeper (Heb., sit at the threshold) in the house of my God, than dwell (Heb., Go round about, have free access) in the tents of wickedness" (Psa. lxxxiv. 10).

The blessing of Psa. lxv. 4 ("chosen", "made nigh", and "dwelling") considered in the last number of this series, and which we found "satisfied", is evidently satisfying the Psalmist here. He has not yet reached the day when he shall awake, satisfied, in the likeness of his Lord, but he lives in blessed anticipation of it, for the Lord he serves will give "grace (now), and glory (then)" (verse 11). Consequently he adds, "Blessed is the man that trusteth in Thee" (verse 12).

The Psalmist, by using the figure of the swallow and the sparrow, helps us to realize the sense of security, warmth and peace that he found in the dwelling-place provided for him:--

> "Yea, the sparrow hath found an house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young, Even Thine altars, O Lord of Hosts, My King, and my God" (Psa. lxxxiv. 3).

George Herbert has sung in much the same strain:--

"Oh let me,--when Thy roof my soul has hid,--
Oh let me roost and nestle there,
Then of a sinner Thou art rid,
And I of hope and fear."

In Psa. cii. we find the pelican, the owl, and the sparrow grouped together, a threefold symbol of loneliness: "I watch, and am as a sparrow alone upon the house top" (7). The way in which the swallow has endeared itself to man by its habit of building its nest under the eaves of his very roof is a commonplace in prose and poetry. The allusions to birds and beasts in the Psalms would make an interesting study in itself.

The writer of this Psalm is most certainly an exile. His soul faints with its longing once more to stand in the courts of the Lord. He envies the sparrow and the swallow which make their nests under its very roof, and calls them blessed indeed who dwell in the house of the Lord. From meditating upon the house of the Lord, the Psalmist turns to the thought of pilgrims making their way through the valley of Baca, the vale of tears, sustained by the strength of the Lord, and upheld by the prospect of arriving at the house of the Lord:--

"Blessed is the man whose strength is in Thee;
In whose heart are the ways of them" (Psa. lxxxiv. 5).

As translated in the A.V. the second line does not make sense. The R.V. reads: "In whose heart are the high ways to Zion." The LXX reads: "In his heart he has purposed to go up the valley of weeping", thereby running two verses together. Davidson's Hebrew Lexicon reads: "They fondly think of the roads leading to Jerusalem."

This blessed hope turns the Valley of Weeping into a place of springs, and of goings from strength to strength, until the pilgrims finally appear before God in Zion. Thus encouraged the writer utters his third blessing:--

"Blessed is the man that trusteth in Thee" (Psa. lxxxiv. 12).

"Trust" here is "confidence". God is his Sun and Shield: the Lord will give both grace and glory: He will not withhold any good thing from them that walk uprightly.

The remaining blessing of this book is but the anticipation of that blessed day when the outcast and the exile shall indeed be gathered home:--

"Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound" (Psa. lxxxix. 15).

What joyful sound? It is nothing less than the Jubile, when all forfeit is recovered, all bondage has ceased. It is nothing less than the sound of the trumpet that means victory. It is an anticipation of the sounding of the seventh trumpet when all the enemies of the Lord shall fall and the kingdom of the Lord be established. The word that is translated "joyful sound" is teruah, which is rendered, "blowing of trumpets" (Lev. xxiii. 24), "trumpet of the Jubile" (Lev. xxv. 9), "Shout", at the fall of Jericho (Josh. vi. 5). In the verses that precede the blessing of Psa. lxxxix. we have great stress laid upon the strength and victory of the Lord. Rahab is broken in pieces, enemies are scattered. As Psa. lxxii. closes the second book of the Psalms with a glorious picture of the reign of Christ, so Psa. lxxxix. closes the third book with a picture of His mighty triumph.

We too in our sphere are strangers, pilgrims, exiles. We too are sustained by hope, and are blessed indeed, because by faith we know that Jubilee sound, and can even now call ourselves “more than conquerors through Him that loved us”.

#23. BEWARE.
The circumcision made without hands (ii. 11).
pp. 15 - 20

The apostle has just written, "Ye are complete in Him", and now proposes a severe test. To the Jew, and also to the Christian Jew, circumcision was essential, as was baptism, its equivalent, to the Christian of the Acts period.

The rite of circumcision is introduced in the Scriptures in connection with Abraham and the birth of Ishmael. The birth of Ishmael was the result of the intrusion of the flesh into the purposes of grace and promise. The following sequence in the history of Abraham will enable the reader to see where and why circumcision was instituted.

(1) God promises to Abraham a seed (Gen. xv.); Abraham believes God, and it is accounted unto him for righteousness. Justification by faith is here experienced and foreshadowed. There is, however, something more than this. While justification is a necessary beginning, it is not by any means the end.

(2) Time passes, and the promised seed does not come. Faith is sorely tried, and at length a scheme is propounded whereby God shall, as it were, be helped out with His purposes. Hagar, the bondwoman, becomes the mother of Ishmael (Gen. xvi.).

(3) While this departure from the path of faith cannot alter justification, it does indicate that Abraham had much further to go before he could be pronounced "perfect". And so in Gen. xvii. we find: "Walk before Me and be thou perfect" (Compare Col. i. 28: "that we may present every man perfect"). Ishmael is repudiated as the seed and the true seed again promised; and it is here, in this connection of parenthood, that circumcision is introduced. To Abraham, only too conscious of the part that the flesh had played in the birth of Ishmael, this strange rite would speak eloquently of its repudiation. While Abraham could be justified without circumcision, he could not be perfected without it. In Phil. iii., before the apostle speaks of "perfection" he speaks of circumcision: "We are the circumcision which . . . . . have no confidence in the flesh" (verse 3).

The analysis of Gen. xv.-xvii., so far as it bears upon our subject, is as follows:--

A1 | Promise of a seed. JUSTIFICATION.
B1 | The flesh intervenes and spoils.
A2 | Promise of a seed repeated. PERFECTION.
B2 | The flesh cut off and set aside.

The desire of the apostle in Col. i. 28 that he might be able to present every man perfect is subsequent to the thought of their complete acceptance, and is followed by a reference to their circumcision in Him:--

(1) "In the body of His flesh through death, to present you holy" (Col. i. 22).
(2) "That we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus" (Col. i. 28).
(3) "In whom also ye are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands, in putting off the body of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ" (Col. ii. 11).

A further survey of the history of Abraham and his association with the covenants of God will illuminate still more the place that circumcision occupies in the divine purpose.

Gen. xii. opens with the initial covenant made by God with Abraham, in which the promise concerning a great nation and a blessing to all families of the earth is made. A specific promise concerning the land and the seed is made in verse 7. This is followed by Abraham's first aberration owing to the famine in the land. After the separation of Abraham and Lot, a further and more detailed covenant concerning the land is given (Gen. xiii. 14-18). Abraham meets Melchisedec, and as a result asserts his independence of all but God alone. God appears to him in a vision, and sets aside the suggestion that Eliezer of Damascus should be his heir. He is told to look at the numberless stars; he believes God's promise concerning the seed, and his faith is counted unto him for righteousness. This is followed by a covenant made while Abraham is in a deep sleep, indicating plainly that Abraham himself made no promises (Gen. xv. 12-21). In Gen. xvi. we have the second departure from the pathway of faith, resulting as we have seen in the birth of Ishmael. Abraham was at this time eighty-six years of age. Another long period of severe testing follows, and thirteen years after, when Abraham is ninety-nine years old, the Lord appears to him and says: "I am Almighty God; walk before Me, and be thou perfect" (Gen. xvii. 1). Then follows the restatement of the covenant, and the change of name. In this passage (Gen. xvii. 1-8) the Lord gathers up all the promises that are found in the five preceding chapters.

Then comes the covenant of circumcision:--

> "This is my covenant, which ye shall keep . . . . . it shall be a token of the covenant betwixt Me and you" (Gen. xvii. 9-14).

Here for the first time is a covenant that Abraham was to "keep", and which was in the nature of a "token". To this the apostle refers in Rom. iv. 11:--

> "He received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had yet being uncircumcised."

Circumcision did not justify Abraham, neither did it merit the promises; it was a seal and a token, and by its very nature a reminder of creature failure and of the need of all-sufficient grace—a thought resident in the title "Almighty God", El Shaddai, or "God all-sufficient".

Two passages in the epistles will give some idea of the spiritual meaning of circumcision:--

> "For circumcision verily profiteth, if thou keep the law: but if thou be a breaker of the law, thy circumcision is made uncircumcision . . . . . for he is not a Jew, which is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision, which is outward in the flesh: but he is a Jew, which is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God" (Rom. ii. 25-29).
> "We are the circumcision, which worship God in the spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh" (Phil. iii. 3).

The worship of God "in spirit" must be set over against what the apostle in Col. ii., calls "will worship" and the observance of mere "shadows". And rejoicing in Christ must be set over against "glorifying in the flesh" (Gal. vi. 13). "No confidence in the flesh" sums up the whole of Col. ii. 8-23.

The circumcision of Col. ii. 11 is first defined as a "circumcision made without hands". The word cheiropoietos, "made with hands", occurs six times in the N.T. (the number of man and imperfection). Acheiropoietos, "not made with hands", occurs three times in the N.T., three being the number that denotes completeness and resurrection. The references in Heb. ix. 11 to the greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, has the added phrase, "that is to say, not of this creation" ("building" in A.V.). That which is made with hands belongs to this creation, but that which is not made with hands belong to the new creation. This was probably in the apostle's mind when contrasting circumcision with the "new creature" in Gal. vi. 15:--

> "For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature."

Circumcision in Col. ii. 11 is further explained as "putting off the body of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ". The A.V. reads, "the body of the sins of the flesh", but there is a preponderance of evidence for the omission of the words "of the sins". Sin is not so much in view as "the flesh". When we reach Col. ii. 13 we shall find both "sins" and "the uncircumcision of the flesh" mentioned together, but at the moment we are concerned with the flesh and the believer.

Sin involves the whole race in condemnation (Rom. v. 12-21). And sins are the fruits of that root within, and cry out for justification (Rom. iii. 21-31). It is the flesh that hinders the believer in his subsequent "going on unto perfection". For this cause the apostle buffeted his body (I Cor. ix. 27) lest he should be disqualified. It is the repudiation of the flesh that is uppermost in Col. ii., and this is set forth by the rite of circumcision.

No one is saved or justified by self-denial and the putting-off of the old man with his deeds, but such putting-off is a "seal" and a "sign" that ministers to the comfort and assurance of the believer. It is here, however, where the tragic mistake can be made, of imagining self-improvement possible or acceptable. Col. ii. 11 does not turn our attention to ourselves; it does not tell us to crucify the flesh; it does not tell us to neglect the body. It points to the work of Christ, just as all Scripture, in the first instance, points the seeking sinner to that same work.

"Putting off the body of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ."—That Christ was literally circumcised, we know by the record of Luke ii. 21, but this is not in mind here. He was also baptized in Jordan; but when that baptism was past, He still looked forward to a baptism which nothing less than the cross could fulfil (Luke xii. 50).

Circumcision was performed on "the eighth day" and so looks forward to resurrection for its fulfillment. Christ died to put away sin for us, and in His resurrection we find our true circumcision or repudiation of the flesh.

To go back once more to the O.T. for further teaching upon the typical place of circumcision, let us turn to the book of Joshua. The people have come out of Egypt, and have wandered for forty years in the wilderness. They cross over Jordan dry-shod, and camp in Gilgal over against Jericho. This brings us to the end of Josh. iv. With the opening of chapter v. comes the command to circumcise the children of Israel, and there the "reproach of Egypt" is rolled away. Not till this is accomplished is Jericho taken and the conquest of the land begun. Gilgal figures in the subsequent history of Israel as a place to which to repair after failure—and a place which precedes success. This typical teaching will be more fully considered in the series entitled, "Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth" in the exposition of the book of Joshua. A great deal of light on Col. ii. 11-13 is also given in Rom. vi. and vii. As these passages are already receiving a careful examination in the series on "Romans" we would ask the reader to acquaint himself with all that has been written in that series.

In conclusion, we would draw the reader's attention to Col. iii. 5 where the apostle puts the mortifying of the members in its right sequence, following the positive teaching of Col. iii. 1-4. Our perfecting will never be accomplished by "neglecting the body"; it can only be found in a more perfect realization of our completeness in the work of Christ. We were crucified in His crucifixion, we died in His death, we were buried in His burial, we were raised in His resurrection—only as we "reckon" these things can we grow in grace; only as we stand firmly on this foundation shall we be proof against the wiles of the devil that would beguile us of our reward. The section before us is too great to deal with in one article; and to avoid unduly lengthening the present one, we will defer further comment upon burial and baptism until our next paper.

#24. BEWARE.
Baptism and burial (ii. 12).
pp. 50 - 55

The rite of circumcision and the ordinance of baptism have something in common. We have given some space to the consideration of the place and purpose of circumcision, so we now devote attention to the allied subject of baptism.

Baptism was not introduced by John the Baptist; it belonged to the ceremonial of the Levitical law:--

> "A figure for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience; which stood only in meats and drinks, and divers BAPTISMS and carnal ordinances, imposed upon them until the time of reformation. But Christ being come an high priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands . . . . ." (Heb. ix. 9-11).

The reader will note, on either side of this reference to Levitical baptisms, the idea of "perfection" and "not made with hands" that reveal something parallel in the teaching of Hebrews with Colossians. We will not make the digression here, but we hope before this series is finished to demonstrate the parallelism of Hebrews with Colossians for the better elucidation of its central theme contained in Col. ii. 4-23. For the time being we must pursue our present line of enquiry.

The other reference to baptism in Hebrews is in a context that is also suggestive of the argument of Colossians:--

> "Therefore leaving the word of the beginning of Christ, let us go on unto perfection; not laying again the foundation . . . . . of the doctrine of BAPTISMS" (Heb. vi. 1, 2).

The context speaks of the ascended Christ as the High Priest after the Order of Melchisedec, of the contrast between babes and full-grown, or as the word "full-age" in Heb. v. 14 actually is, "perfect". In both passages therefore where baptism figures in Hebrews it is set over against "perfection". It hardly seems likely therefore that literal water baptism is intended in Col. ii. 12.

We need not stay to discuss the place and purpose of the baptism of John, which is so evidently part and parcel of his ministry as the forerunner of Christ, that there is no need to prove its dispensational place in the Scriptures.

The baptism that was commanded by Christ, and which we find practiced during the Acts of the Apostles, should, however, be given consideration:--

> "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned. And these signs shall follow them that believe . . . . . demons . . . . . tongues . . . . . serpents . . . . . deadly thing . . . . . sick . . . . ." (Mark xvi. 16-18).

The reader will note that on either side of the words "shall be saved" stand two signs, thus:--

> FIRST SIGN.—The sign of baptism (Mark xvi. 16). "Shall be saved."
> SECOND SIGN.—"The signs following" (Mark xvi. 20).

The baptism of Mark xvi. cannot be introduced into the church ministered to by Paul without havoc being caused therein. Many who hold to water baptism to-day, and who think they hold to Mark xvi., do no such thing, but reverse the order given. Most Baptists believe and teach that when a person believes and is saved he should be baptized. Mark xvi., however, puts baptism before salvation: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved."

Moreover, we have no right to substitute any other word for "shall" in what follows: "These signs shall follow them that believe", for these signs did follow, as Acts xxviii. 1-10 clearly shows. They do not follow now, and if Mark xvi. be truth for the times, we are without scriptural evidence for our salvation.

We find the apostle Paul baptizing during the period covered by his freedom in the Acts (Acts xvi. 15 and 33; xviii. 8), but the inspired language of I Cor. i. 17 reveals a condition and a ministry quite different from that exercised by the twelve. Peter certainly could not say with truth: "Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel."

Whether there is a reference to water baptism in Rom. vi. 3, 4 we will not discuss here; suffice it for us, that when we read the great epistle of the Mystery, we discover but one baptism acknowledged and permitted. If that one baptism of Eph. iv. 5 be water, then the church of the One Body is destitute of the baptism of the Spirit. Instead of being blessed with all spiritual blessings, the chief means of entering into those blessings is absent. This, however, is not the case, for in that seven-fold unity of the Spirit there are found three pairs on either side of the one Lord, and just as one hope is balanced by one faith, so one baptism is balanced by one Spirit. Colossians therefore—which is an epistle of the same dispensation as that of Ephesians—does not speak of baptism in water, but of that baptism of the Spirit whereby the believer is identified and incorporated with Christ:--

> "Buried with Him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with Him through the faith of the operation of God, Who hath raised Him from the dead" (Col. ii. 12).

Alford's remark on the word for "buried" here is:-- > "Buried together, i.e., 'when you were buried', the aorist part, as so often, is contemporary with the preceding verb."

This, therefore, would lead us to read:--

> "In Whom also ye were circumcised . . . . . when ye were buried together with Him in baptism" (Col. ii. 11, 12).

The circumcision was without hands and the baptism was without water, therefore both are spiritual and find their reality only in the work of Christ.

Should one agree, yet plead for the retention of the typical ordinance of baptism, he should read Col. ii. 16, 17, and, moreover, remember that most of the arguments in favour of the perpetuation of water baptism, could equally be used in favour of the literal perpetuation of circumcision: But all shadows are gone so far as the church of the One Body is concerned, being for ever fulfilled and swallowed up in the fullness of Christ.

Let us now turn to Rom. vi. and again read the emancipating words of its opening verses:-- > "Know ye not, that so many of us were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into His death? Therefore we are buried with Him by baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of His death, we shall be also in the likeness of His resurrection" (Rom. vi. 3-5).

We have drawn attention in other articles to the place that faith occupies in this epistle, but faith is absent from this inner section (Rom. vi. 8 is the one reference, but its use is not parallel with the use of faith in the earlier chapters). The statements of Rom. vi. 3-5 are statements of fact, not merely of experience. When Christ died we died with Him, when He was buried we were buried with Him, when He arose from the dead, never again to submit to its dominion, we rose with Him. All this is fact. The believer is "in Christ", and this union is by baptism; not indeed the baptism of water, but that true and effectual baptism of the Spirit, which unites the believer once and for ever to Christ, and identifies him with all that He as Saviour and Head accomplished.

Rom. vi. stresses the fact that we are baptized into the death of Christ, into His burial, and into His resurrection.

Moreover, this chapter is not dealing with our sins, but with sin, the old man, the dominion of sin, and the release of the members of the body from its demands. What has been made ours actually by our being baptized in Christ by the Spirit, is made ours experimentally when we "reckon" what God has reckoned us to be in Christ (Rom. vi. 11). No amount of fasting, or neglect, or self-imposed tasks, or humility, is of any avail. Our ground of triumph and our strength to walk in newness of life is in Christ and His work for us, and our identification with Him. All else leads to bondage.

In the A.V. Col. ii. 12 reads as though the reference to baptism is continued throughout the verse. This is not so however:--

> "In WHOM (en ho) ye were circumcised . . . . . when ye were buried together with Him in baptism. In WHOM (en ho) ye were also raised together."

Burial speaks of the utter end of ourselves; resurrection of a new beginning in Him.

We must now turn our attention to the remainder of the verse:--

> "In Whom ye were also raised together through the faith of the operation of God, Who hath raised Him from the dead" (Col. ii. 12).

Webster's note here is helpful:--

> "Faith has respect to the power of God in the resurrection of Jesus, as having therein effected that on which objectively our salvation depends, and also as effecting that subjectively which is our salvation, viz., our new spiritual life."

In order to establish the connection of this passage with Eph. i. 9 - ii. 1, we must just refer to Col. ii. 13:--

> "And you, being dead in your sins and the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath He quickened together with Him."

These words are evidently a parallel with Eph. ii. 1:--

> "And you hath he quickened who were dead in trespasses and sins."

We leave, for the moment, the question of the true translation of these words, as our present intention is to establish a connection between Eph. i. 19 onwards and Col. ii. 12 onwards.

Ephesians.	Colossians.
"The fullness in Christ" (i. 23).	"The fullness in Christ" (ii. 9, 10).
"Head over all things to the Church. Far above principality and powers" (i. 21, 22).	"Head of all principality and powers" (ii. 10).
"To us-ward who believe, according to the working (energeia) of His mighty power, which He wrought in (energeo) Christ, when He raised Him from the dead" (i. 19, 20).	"The faith of the operation (energeia) of God, Who hath raised Him from the dead" (ii. 12).
"Dead in trespasses and sins" (ii. 1-5).	"Dead in your sins and the uncircumcision of your flesh" (ii. 13).
"Hath quickened us together with Christ" (ii. 5).	"Hath He quickened together with Him" (ii. 13).
"Having abolished in His flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments contained in ordinances" (ii. 15).	"Blotting out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us" (ii. 14).

The above evidences are sufficient to establish the fact that the apostle follows the same line of teaching in Col. ii. 12, 13 as is more fully developed in Eph. i. 19 - ii. 5.

One can imagine the apostle's grief when he learned that those who, by virtue of their union with Christ, were not only raised but seated together far above all principalities and powers, had been so deceived as to become worshippers of angels, to learn that although no middle wall now stood, and the enmity of ordinances had been removed, yet these Colossians saints were reverting to the weak and beggarly elements, were observing days and feasts, and exchanging substance for shadow—all for the attaining of a completeness which was already theirs in Christ.

The opening words of verse 13 are too vital to be dealt with at the close of this article, and although when dealing with Eph. ii. 1 we set out our proofs for the new translation offered there, this was written so long ago that it will be necessary to go over the ground afresh so that new readers shall have the benefit of all the evidence. Meanwhile, we trust that every step we have taken together has broken down trust in all but the Lord Himself and His finished work. We can say with a fullness unknown by Israel: "All my springs are in Thee."

#25. BEWARE.
"Dead to sins" and "Uncircumcision of the flesh" (ii. 13).
pp. 98 - 100

The completeness of the church in Christ, which entirely precludes any attempt at improvement by fleshly means, has been opened up by revealing that all that circumcision stood for in the law has its spiritual equivalent in the death and resurrection of Christ—"the putting off the body of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ." This repudiation of the flesh is further enforced by the fact that the believer is united by spiritual baptism with Christ in His burial, and that, through faith of the inworking of God that raised Christ from the dead, he is risen with Him, with power to walk in newness of life and with the privilege of being able to live unto God.

One of the things that we discovered in Rom. vi. (see series on the Epistle to the Romans) was that liberty is essential to sanctification, life and growth. Sin and sinful tendencies cannot be checked by shackles; if this had been possible, then sanctification and victorious life could have come by the law. The dominion of the flesh cannot be put away by neglecting the body, or by submitting to ordinances, "Touch not, taste not, handle not". It is only possible by that true circumcision in which the old man was crucified and the body of the flesh put off.

We now take up the thread of our study, commencing at verse 13:--

> "And you, being dead in your sins and the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath He quickened together with Him" (Col. ii. 13).

There is an evident parallel here with Eph. ii. 1 and 5. On the other hand, the passage is not by any means a mere repetition. Much that belongs to Eph. ii. 11-22 provides a truer parallel with Col. ii. than that which is found in Eph. ii. 1-10. This, however, needs some explanation to be intelligible. First we must observe that Eph. ii. deals with two distinct though related subjects. For the sake of clearness, we use the words "doctrinal" and "dispensational" to indicate this difference. Eph. ii. 1-10 shows the doctrinal position of the Gentile; Eph. ii. 11-22 shows his dispensational position. In the former, we have "sins"; in the latter, "distance". In the former we have "the desires of the flesh"; in the latter, "uncircumcision in the flesh". This will perhaps be better understood if set out in structure form:--

Ephesians ii. 1-22.

A | 1-3. Once. Walk and conversation. The world and the flesh.
B | 4. But God. Rich in mercy. Great in love.
C | 5-10. Made alive together. \
Raised together. } In relation to sin.
Made to sit together. /
A | 11, 12. Once. Gentiles in flesh. In the flesh and in the world.
B | 13-18. But now. Made nigh. Made one.
C | 19-22. Citizens together. \ In relation to Fitly framed together. } dispensational privileges.
Builded together. /

In the preceding article we observed several points of contact between Eph. i. 19 - ii. 22 and Col. ii. 4-23. We must now notice that, while Ephesians divides its theme up into two sections, to deal with each phase separately, Colossians links the doctrinal and the dispensational together. This, however, is not an exact presentation of the case. Circumcision and uncircumcision in Eph. ii. have no reference to "the body of the flesh" as they have in Colossians; Ephesians simply deals with the two great divisions of humanity, the Jew and the Gentile, in relation to dispensational privileges. The middle wall of partition in Eph. ii. 14, 15 is the barrier that perpetuated the dispensational superiority of the Jewish believer over the Gentile believer even though they were both one in Christ. This is seen in the words, "the Jew first", and in the reference to the olive tree and the wild olive in Rom. xi. In Col. ii. there is also an enmity connected with ordinances, but in this case they do not separate individual members of the church from each other, but the church itself from its Head. And so, while Ephesians limits the reference to being "dead in sins" to the first half of chapter ii., Colossians introduces it in a wider connection.

As the words stand in Eph. ii. 1 and 5, they appear to refer to the death of the race by reason of sin. We believe, however, that, instead of referring to the state of all men by nature, they refer to the state of the church which is His body, by grace. First let us notice that the verb is in the present tense: "You being dead" (ontas). It seems to indicate some consciousness of the unsuitability of the rendering that the A.V. should alter the verb from the present to the past—"dead in sins". When the Lord is recorded as saying, "Ye shall die in your sins" (John viii. 24) the preposition en (meaning "in") is used. When the Jews say to the man whose sight was restored, "Thou wast altogether born in sins", again the preposition en is used. But the preposition en does not occur in Eph. ii. 1 or 5. The words "trespasses" and "sins" are in the dative case; and while this case does express the idea of "rest in", it also expresses the ideas conveyed by the words, "by", "to", "with", etc. Who is to decide, therefore, the true translation of such an important passage as Eph. ii. 1 undoubtedly is? In the absence of the preposition en can we be sure that one of the other shades of meaning is not intended? Fortunately the matter is settled by the occurrence of the same phenomenon in other passages. We therefore present no argument other than the consistent usage of the N.T. Greek, confirmed by the translation of the A.V. itself:--

"We that are dead TO SIN" (Rom. vi. 2).
"He died UNTO SIN" (Rom. vi. 10).
"Dead indeed UNTO SIN" (Rom. vi. 11).
"Dead TO the LAW" (Rom. vii. 4; Gal. ii. 19).
"Dead TO SINS" (I Pet. ii. 24).

Can we substitute the words "in sin" or "in sins" in these passages? Could we translate Rom. vi. 2: "How shall we, that are dead in sin, live any longer therein?" without nullifying the whole argument? How could we introduce the words, in sin, into Rom. vi. 10 without approaching blasphemy, and denying the very basis of all our faith? The Lord died to sin; this is the glory of the teaching of Rom. vi.

(To be concluded).

#25. BEWARE. (Concluded).
"Dead to sins" and "Uncircumcision of the flesh" (ii. 13).
pp. 113, 114

The passage quoted from I Pet. ii. 24 has much in common with Eph. ii. 1, for in this reference the word "sin" is in the plural. We have, therefore, a test passage. The verb in Peter is in the perfect tense and we translate the passage as follows:--

"Who His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree, that we, having died to sins, should live unto righteousness: by Whose stripes ye were healed."

Here it is evident that it is not man's state by nature that is in view, but his state by grace, consequent on the fact that the Lord has borne his sins. And the end in view is that he may live unto God. Resurrection life following upon death to sin is the burning theme of every passage quoted above. And this is also true of Eph. ii. 1 and 5. The manner of life in the past is contrasted with the new life now begun—a new life expressed in the words, "Quickened together with Christ".

With the true translation of Eph. ii. 1 and 5 before us, we now return to Col. ii. 13, where the same construction occurs:--

"And you, being dead to the trespasses and to the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath He quickened, having forgiven you all trespasses" (Col. ii. 13).

Not only has the believer died to sin, but he has died also to sins, and to the uncircumcision of his flesh.

The positive side of this glorious truth is expressed in the words, "You . . . . . hath He quickened". This quickening is associated with the resurrection of Christ, and so teaches us the sphere of all acceptance, service, progress, sanctification, "newness of life" and "life unto God". This is not all, however. In addition to the emancipating fact that those who were buried with Christ and raised with Christ, have died to their sins and to the uncircumcision of their flesh, we have the words, "Having forgiven you all trespasses". The glorious doctrine of the forgiveness of sins is almost too good to be true. We may readily believe that our sins committed before we were saved are forgiven, but somehow we hardly credit the statement that the sins of saints will never come up for judgment. This results from confusing service with its related reward or loss, and sin with its guilt and punishment. It may, of course, be objected that such a conception of grace will lead to carelessness of life among believers. The same charge was made against the apostle's teaching concerning grace in Romans (Rom. vi. 1), but while he repudiated the charge, he did not modify his doctrine.

The revelation of God concerning the forgiveness of sins is so important and so closely bound up with our peace of heart, that we shall not attempt to deal with it hurriedly at the close of the present article. We hope to devote the next article of the series to its consideration.

#26. BEWARE.
The forgiveness of all trespasses (ii. 13).
pp. 130 - 134

The believer's union with Christ in His death, burial and resurrection, by virtue of which he died to his sins and to the uncircumcision of his flesh, is vitally connected with the fact that all his sins are forgiven him. Indeed the forgiveness of sins here, by the tense of the verb used, refers back to the same time and act wherein were accomplished our circumcision in Christ, our burial with Him, our rising with Him, and our quickening with Him.

The forgiveness of sins is a marvelous revelation of love, yet many a child of God can hardly bring himself to believe what is here written, "Having forgiven you all trespasses". We are prone to think that while the sins of our unsaved days are graciously blotted out, some sins into which we fall after salvation will be held against us in that day, robbing us of our reward. There are two evils here. One is the confusing of sins with service; and the second evil is that this confusing of truth makes the child of God a prey to fears and doubts and lays him open to suggestions for self-improvement in the vain hope that sins can thereby be excluded.

It is a part of the apostle's teaching in Col. ii. that, not some sins, but all are forgiven. Should anyone object that such a doctrine will lead to laxity and carelessness, let him observe Rom. v. 20, 21 and vi. 1. Paul did not modify his statement about abounding grace because some might be found who would abuse it. Neither must we.

Forgiveness of sins is presented under two aspects in the N.T., and a comparison of these will enrich our conception of the grace of God manifested toward us. Under the dispensation of the kingdom, forgiveness was conditional and could be revoked. To introduce either of these elements into the dispensation of the mystery would be completely erroneous, but they are clearly seen in Matthew's Gospel:--

> "When ye pray . . . . . Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors" (Matt. vi. 7-12).

It may be objected that these words do not suggest a condition but rather a reason—that we forgive as the Lord has forgiven us. This might have been true if the Lord had not explained His own words otherwise. At the close of the prayer which He taught His disciples, these words are added:--

> "For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you: But if ye forgive NOT men their trespasses, NEITHER will your Father forgive your trespasses" (Matt. vi. 9-15).

We are not, therefore, left to infer the truth. The Lord has stated it, and we are left with no alternative but to believe or reject it.

So important is this truth to the dispensation of the kingdom, that the Lord gives it in parable form. The parable is linked up with Peter's question: "Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? till seven times?" (Matt. xviii. 21). The Lord answers, "Until seventy times seven"; and then gives the parable of the two debtors. Space will not permit our quoting the parable; the reader should turn to Matt. xviii. 21-34 and read it through himself. We draw particular attention to the "moral" that is given by the Lord:--

> "So likewise shall My heavenly Father do also unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother their trespasses" (Matt. xviii. 35).

"So likewise."—What had been taught in the parable is used to enforce this lesson. The debtor had been "forgiven" (verse 27), but seeing that he had not forgiven his brother, the lord who had forgiven him cancels that forgiveness and delivers him to the tormentors "till he should pay all that was due to him. So likewise . . . . ." It is absolutely impossible to bring the doctrine of the parable over into the dispensation of the grace of God, yet by the constant use of the "Lord's prayer" many are attempting to do so every day.

The reason for this great difference regarding the forgiveness of sins is that one "forgiveness" is the pardon of a King, and the other the acquittal of a Judge. It is the prerogative of a King to extend the royal clemency to a prisoner, but this forgiveness does not in any sense mean that the man is justified. There is no question of the law having been satisfied—it is the clemency of the King. A judge, however, cannot forgive in this way; he can only condemn or acquit. On many occasions, a Judge has felt deeply sorry for the prisoner's plight; he would, if he could, let him go free, but pardon is not among his prerogatives. But when the Judge acquits, then the prisoner is free indeed. He is justified, and cannot be called into question concerning his trespasses again.

Summarizing these essential differences, we may say that a King can pardon but cannot justify; and that a Judge can justify but cannot pardon.

It will be seen that the fundamental basis of forgiveness in the ministry of the apostle Paul is that of justification by faith, a doctrine that is not announced in the Gospel according to Matthew:--

> "Even as David also describeth the blessedness of the man, unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works, saying, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin" (Rom. iv. 6-8).

Here it will be seen that the negative, the non-imputation of sin, is consequent on the positive, the imputation of righteousness. This is seen again in II Cor. v. 19-21:--

> "Not imputing their trespasses unto them . . . . . for He hath made Him to be sin for us, Who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him."

It is as impossible for this blessing to be revoked by God, as it is for Christ to undo His sufferings and death. None can lay anything to the charge of God's elect. Christ has died, yea rather is risen again, and is seated at the right hand of God.

Forgiveness is expressed by two different words: aphesis and charizomai. These words must be studied if we are to have a scriptural understanding of this great subject.

Aphesis means a discharge, a setting free (from aphiemi). Where the word is used doctrinally in the N.T. it denotes "the abrogation of the divine legal claims upon man, the remission of the amends due, or of the punishment due for imperfect, sinful conduct—that is the deliverance from suffering the divine judgment" (Cremer).

The fact that in the LXX this word is used of the "setting free" that was ushered in with the Jubilee is of great importance:--

> "Ye shall hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land" (Lev. xxv. 10).

The word that is translated "forgiveness" in Eph. i. 7 is found in Luke iv. 18:--

"To preach deliverance to the captives . . . . . to set at liberty them that are bruised."

And the typical meaning of the year of Jubilee is in view, as the passage continues: "To preach the acceptable year of the Lord" (Luke iv. 19). Both Eph. i. 7 and Col. i. 14 use this word in association with redemption by the blood of Christ. The believer thus forgiven is free, released, set free, dismissed.

Charizomai means "to be kind or gracious to any one". It is one of a beautiful group of words, all of which have their origin in grace. Charis (grace) means "an act of spontaneous favour wherein no mention can be made of obligation" (Cremer). As for example in Eph. ii. 7. Charitoo is the word "accepted" in Eph. i. 6. Charizomai ("to be gracious to"), when used of God, indicates that gracious and unmerited favour that is bestowed upon poor sinners, who though destitute of any power or means of acceptance in themselves are the objects of God's free favour and ineffable love. The word is used not only for the bestowal of grace in general in the gospel, but for that special favour, the forgiveness of sins—the remitting of all just dues, because of the great sacrifice of God's own Son on our behalf. It is this word that is used in Col. ii. 13.

To the believer in Christ, Paul declares this twofold forgiveness:-- Aphesis.

"In Whom we have redemption through His blood, even the forgiveness of sins" (Col. i. 14 and Eph. i. 7).

Charizomai.

"Having forgiven you all trespasses" (Col. ii. 13).
"Forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you" (Eph. iv. 32).

What folly, therefore, to leave the ground of acceptance and grace, for a "religion" consisting of observances, shadows, negations and rudiments, which are but a vain attempt to make oneself "perfected by the flesh" (Gal. iii. 3; iv. 9, 10; v. 2; vi. 15). I have no need to fear the face of God, but rather, in the full assurance of my beloved Lord, I can give thanks for meetness for the inheritance (Col. i. 12). No amount of self-mortification can rid me of a single sin or break a single fetter; but I need no such vain attempts to bring peace. As an enemy I have been reconciled by the blood of His cross, and, being reconciled in the body of His flesh through death, I shall be presented "holy and unblameable and unreproveable in His sight" (Col. i. 21, 22). Shall I dare to presume that any effort of my own can improve upon that presentation? Does not the apostle "warn and teach" that he may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus? (Col. i. 28). Is not the warning note sounded again and again in Col. ii. 4-23 against every attempt to accomplish by any means what has been done once and for ever by Christ?

Just as surely as not one of us can add a cubit to his stature by taking thought; just as none of us can save himself from sin and death, or accomplish the salvation of another, so just as surely we can never make ourselves fit for glory. The apostle continually points back to a finished work, and on to a glorious consummation. "Ye are complete in Him." "Ye are circumcised . . . . . by the circumcision of Christ." "Ye are buried with Him." "Ye are risen with Him." "Ye are dead to your sins and the uncircumcision of your flesh." "He hath quickened you together with Him." "He has forgiven all your trespasses." Why do we not believe God and reckon as He has reckoned? "Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. vi. 11). God does not say, "Wait until you feel this in your experience before you so reckon"; for the feeling may never come in this life. There should, by all means, be a genuine concern for a spiritual walk, and growth in grace; there should be a continual recognition of the awfulness of the flesh and its terrible snare. This, however, is very different from attempting to set ourselves free and to accomplish a sanctification in our own strength, ignoring all the implications of grace. Not only have we been forgiven, but all that was contrary to us has been removed and cancelled, giving added confirmation to our sense of acceptance in the Beloved. This, however, must be considered in our next paper. Let it suffice us here, that we are the recipients of such grace. We have received a forgiveness that is unconditional, and which can never be revoked. We are not called upon to forgive our brethren so that we ourselves may be forgiven—we are called upon to be kind to one another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven us:--

> "Put on therefore, as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, longsuffering, forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrel against any; EVEN AS CHRIST FORGAVE YOU, SO ALSO DO YE" (Col. iii. 12, 13).

#27. BEWARE.
Blotted out, Nailed, Spoiled: The body is of Christ (ii. 14-17).
pp. 164 - 170

Our last study left us with that unspeakable blessing, the forgiveness of sins—"Having forgiven you all trespasses." The passage stand, as it were, half-way in the explanatory matter that reveals its foundation in the person and work of Christ. Looking back over the path we have come, we realize that the emphasis has been upon the person of the Saviour. He is the test of all philosophy and tradition. In Him dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily. In Him, moreover, the believer is complete. He is discovered to be the Head not only of the church, but of all principality and power. In Him also, the body of sin has been put off as in a spiritual circumcision. The union effected by our one baptism has buried us together with Him in His tomb. And with Him, through the same mighty power that raised Him from the dead, we too are raised, having died to our sins, and having been quickened together with Him. Looking forward, the believer has his attention directed to that wondrous work which the Lord accomplished on the cross, there to see the complete canceling of all legalism, the removal of all authority but the Headship of the Lord, and emancipation from all ceremonies and observances—the passing, in fact, from the shadow to the substance in Christ.

Third item of warning with its corrective.

> "Blotting out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to His cross. And having spoiled principalities and powers, He made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in it. Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holyday, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days; which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ" (Col. ii. 14-17).

The words "blotting out" and "nailing" speak plainly of something cancelled. Exaleipho, in its primary meaning, is "to rub off ointment, after anointing". The word then came to mean "to rub off" in any sense. So in Rev. vii. 17 and xxi. 4 it is used of "wiping away" tears; and in Rev. iii. 5 of "blotting out" from a book. When we remember that in the apostle's day it was usual to write brief messages upon a tablet of wax (Luke i. 63), it will be seen how easy it would be to efface completely anything so written. Some readers, moreover, may have seen the originals or photographic copies of what are called "palimpsest" manuscripts, where the original lettering has been sponged down, and a new set of characters has been superimposed. The word is also used for the "blotting out of sins" in Acts iii. 19.

Not only do we read of the blotting out of the handwriting of ordinances, but also that they were completely cancelled by being "nailed" to the cross of Christ. This word has entered into the figurative expressions of our own tongue. To "nail to the counter" or to "nail to the barndoor" are figures of speech which are almost self-explanatory, especially if one has actually seen a transfixed coin or rat. The two expressions, "blotting out" and "nailing" combine to convey the idea of canceling beyond the possibility of revival.

We must next consider what it was that was thus cancelled—"the handwriting of ordinances." It is impossible to ignore in this connection the earlier reference to the hands in verse 11: "the circumcision made without hands." In the N.T. there are six references that contain the words "made with hands", and three that contain the words "not made with hands". As the best explanation of these terms arises out of a consideration of their usage, we will set out the passages in the order in which they occur in the A.V.:--

> "I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and within three days I will build another made without hands" (Mark xiv. 58).
>
> "The Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands" (Acts vii. 48).
>
> "The Lord of heaven and earth dwelleth not in temples made with hands" (Acts xvii. 24).
>
> "We have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens" (II Cor. v. 1).
>
> "Gentiles . . . . . called Uncircumcision by that which is called the Circumcision in the flesh made by hands" (Eph. ii. 11).
>
> "The circumcision made without hands" (Col. ii. 11).
>
> "A greater and more perfect tabernacle not made with hands, that is to say, not of this creation" (Heb. ix. 11).

> "Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself" (Heb. ix. 24).

A survey of these references makes us realize that things "not made with hands" are "not of this creation" and not "figures", but the "true" and the "heavenly". The "handwriting of ordinances" belongs to the realm of type and shadow, and must pass away in the new creation which has already commenced in the church which is the body of Christ. Both Ephesians and Colossians speak of "ordinances" that have been done away. The "ordinances" of Eph. ii. formed a middle wall of partition and divided the Jewish believer from the Gentile believer. These were ceremonial ordinances, and can be understood in the light of Acts xv. 20, observing that in Acts xvi. 4 the word "ordinances" is rendered "decrees".

The ordinances of Col. ii. 14 appear to be somewhat different. It may at first sight seem a small thing whether a man observes a day or not, or whether he eats this or abstains from that. Indeed Rom. xiv. says: "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind" (Rom. xiv. 5). And in I Cor. viii. 8: "Neither, if we eat, are we the better; neither, if we eat not, are we the worse." Nevertheless, we know how seriously the apostle viewed the attitude of the Galatians:--

> "Howbeit then, when ye knew not God, ye did service unto them, which by nature are no gods. But now, after that ye have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage? Ye observe days, and months, and times and years. I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain" (Gal. iv. 8-11).

It was the underlying reason for these observances that called forth the strong denunciation of the apostles:--

> "Christ is become of none effect to you, whosoever of you are justified by law; ye are fallen from grace" (Gal. v. 4).

So with the Colossians; the apostle desired that their wholehearted trust should be in Christ alone, and would allow neither philosophy, nor tradition, nor the rudiments of the world to rob the Lord of His supreme place.

Before, however, he speaks definitely of these observances in Col. ii. 16, the apostle has something more to say regarding the complete emancipation of the redeemed. Not only were all ordinances cancelled at the cross, but by that cross the Lord has triumphed over all possible foes, and over all who might have claimed allegiance. The word "spoiled" in verse 15 is apekduomai, and is cognate with "to put off" in verse 11, which is apekdusis. The word apekdoumai also occurs in Col. iii. 9: "Ye have put off the old man." The R.V. translates verse 15:--

> "And having put off from Himself." And in the margin, "Having put off from Himself His body, He made a show of principalities . . . . ."

The verb "having spoiled" in Col. ii. 15 is in the middle voice, and means literally "to divest oneself of clothing". Commentators have interpreted this passage in a variety of ways:--

> "Divested Himself of His flesh."
> "He divested Himself", as (with reverence be it said) Joseph did when he extricated himself from the grasp of Potiphar's wife.
> "He divested Himself of the principalities and powers which had mediated the law."

At first sight, this diversity of opinion among scholars is discouraging, but remembering the proverb, "In the multitude of counselors there is safety" (Prov. xi. 14), we perceive that the paradox of the cross solves the problem. The cross was, from one angle, the lowest depth of ignominy; yet it proved to be the wisdom and power of God. The cross marked the most complete victory of the powers of darkness; and yet it proved their most complete defeat. The Lord did indeed strip Himself at the cross, but at the same time He stripped His foes. He made His very shame His greatest glory; He turned the malefactor's gibbet into His triumphal car; He "death by dying slew".

We now proceed with our study, bearing in mind the two sides to this marvelous truth.

In Col. ii. 15 we have a series of military metaphors, apekdoumai refers to the stripping of the vanquished foe; and deigmatizo ("to make a show") refers to the "exposure" of the vanquished to the vulgar gaze. Cleopatra's fear of this public exposure upon Cæsar's triumphant entry into Rome is well expressed by Shakespeare:--

Cleopatra. Know you what Cæsar means to do with me?
Dolabella. I am loth to tell you what I would you knew.
Cleopatra. He'll lead me, then, in triumph?
Dolabella. Madam he will, I know it.
Cleopatra. . . . . . Now Iras, what think'st thou?
Thou, an Egyptian puppet, shall be shown
In Rome, as well as I: mechanic slaves,
With greasy aprons, rules, and hammers, shall Uplift us to the view . . . . .
Saucy lectors
Will catch at us like strumpets; and scald rhymers
Ballad us out of tune . . . . .
And I shall see
Some squeaking Cleopatra boy my greatness.

The word "openly" (parrhesia) means "publicly", as may be seen in John vii. 4, xi. 54, etc.

"Triumphing over them."—Thriambaio is from thriambos, a triumph, which originally signified a hymn in honour of Bacchus, sung in solemn procession. Plutarch uses the word in the phrase, "He led Kings in triumph".

It will be noticed that while it is the handwriting of ordinances that was cancelled at the cross, it is principalities and powers that are stripped and led in triumph. What is the connection between these two things?

We have already read in verse 10: "And ye are complete in Him, Which is the Head of all principality and power." Moreover, in chapter i. 16-22, "principalities and powers" are closely associated with the Lord's headship, and with the church's reconciliation and completeness in Him. The epistle to the Ephesians reveals that there are some principalities and powers that are definitely antagonistic to the church, and describes them as the "world-holders of this darkness, spiritual wickednesses" (Eph. vi. 12). And Col. i. 13 speaks of our being delivered from "the authority of darkness".

An examination of Dan. x. will show that these angelic rulers seek at every turn to frustrate the purpose of God, and to keep His children in blindness and bondage. We are assured by the testimony of the epistles that their activities are not limited to the prophetic earth, but that the church and its holy doctrines are also objects of attack. It is a blessed fact, that cannot be kept too clearly before the mind, that we have been delivered from the authority of darkness (Col. i. 13). This, however, does not mean that, while we are in this sphere, we need have no concern about the activities of evil spiritual powers. The wiles of the devil (Eph. vi. 11), and the cunning craftiness whereby men lie in wait to deceive (Eph. iv. 14) must be considered together, for the same word is used in the original of both. The saint is warned, moreover, in Eph. iv. 27 not to give place to the devil.

If we examine the contexts of these passages we shall discover that the one great remedy of Col. ii. is to be found there also. For the wiles of the devil the remedy is to "put on the whole armour of God". For the cunning craftiness of men, the remedy is "the fullness of Christ". Instead of giving place to the devil, the believer is enjoined to "put on the new man" and to "put away the lie"; in other words, to stand in the completeness that is his in Christ (Col. ii. 10). The principalities and powers of Col. i. 16-20 are included in the reconciliation effected by "the blood of His cross"; the principalities and powers of Col. ii. 15 are excluded from reconciliation by the same cross. They are stripped and repudiated.

The Colossian church had yielded to a false system of worship, that included "the worshipping of angels" (Col. ii. 18), just as the heathen, who bowed down to idols, really offered worship to demons (I Cor. x. 19, 20). This false system made much of ceremonial (see Gal. iv.-vi.), including the observance of special days and feasts. These the apostle sweeps aside, even the sabbaths, saying that they are all, like the ordinances that were against us, cancelled by the cross of Christ, and that they are all but "shadows of things to come", as Heb. x. 1 says of the sacrifices of the law. They have no place with the church of this dispensation; it is the body of Christ, and for this church, shadows have no place. "The body (i.e. the substance) is of Christ."

Once more the clarion call of liberty and completeness in Christ has gone forth. May all who own Him as Saviour and Head stand fast in this liberty, rejoicing in His fullness, and resolutely refusing to seek in any other source or in any system of shadows what is theirs in glorious reality in Christ.

#28. BEWARE.
Things that beguile of the Prize (ii. 18).
pp. 203 - 208

The section just studied, namely, Col. ii. 14-17, occupies a central place in the structure of the whole passage, as a reference to Volume XXIII, page 84, will reveal.

The apostle now turns back upon his theme, shedding further light upon those insidious doctrines and practices which, while promising an advance in holiness, really led to pampering the flesh; while affecting modesty, really denied completeness in Christ; while multiplying mediators, really set aside the one Mediator; and while observing days and seasons, really ignored the absolute victory of the cross. The passage before us, Col. ii. 18-21, corresponds with Col. ii. 11, 12.

In Col. ii. 11, 12 we have the repudiation of the "body of the flesh", while in Col. ii. 18-20 we have the "mind of the flesh" vainly puffing up and leading to bondage. In Col. ii. 11, 12 we have the true fulfillment of both circumcision and baptism, whereas in Col. ii. 18-20 we have "humility and worshipping of angels". In both passages we are directed either to the "inworking (operation) of God" or to the "increase of God", and "death with Christ" is the all-sufficient answer.

The passage before us is one of great complexity, and has produced a great number of different translations. Where so many have failed, dare we hope to succeed? We are sure that every word of God has been written for our learning, and that nothing is too hard for Him. May He deign to illumine our studies together, so that we may attain at least to some approximation of that Word whose fullness may remain unfathomed while time lasts:--

> "Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility and worshipping of angels, intruding into those things which he hath not seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind" (Col. ii. 18 A.V.).
> "Let no man rob you of your prize by a voluntary humility and worshipping of the angels, dwelling in the things which he hath seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind" (Col. ii. 18 R.V.).

Both the A.V. and the R.V. have marginal notes. The A.V. says for "beguile"—"judge against you", and for "in a voluntary humility"—"being a voluntary in humility". The R.V. margin reads "of his own mere will, by humility, etc." and for "dwelling" ("intruding", A.V.) reads "taking his stand upon". It would serve no useful purpose to give a multitude of different translations, so we shall proceed to examine in fuller detail the actual words given by inspiration of God.

"Let no man beguile you of your reward."—The word that demands attention here is katabrabeuo. Kata means "against", and brabeuo means to be a judge or umpire, and so to assign the prize in a public game. Brabeuo occurs in Col. iii. 15 where the peace of God is said to "act the umpire (rule) in your hearts"—a precious thought. Brabeion is a prize. It is found in I Cor. ix. 24 and Phil. iii. 14, "The prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus". We are therefore not without guidance as to the subject of this section. It has to do with the prize. Now Colossians, whilst running very parallel with Ephesians, has much in its central section that bears upon Philippians. Philippians is the epistle of the "prize" and the "perfecting", and if we look at Col. i. we shall find under the idea of being "presented" the two aspects of truths set forth by Ephesians and Philippians. We shall distinguish between that which can never be lost, and that which may be lost, and return to Col. ii. with clearer views:--

> The first presentation.
> "In the body of His flesh through death, to present you holy and unblameable and unreproveable in His sight" (Col. i. 22).
> The second presentation.
> "Warning every man, and teaching every man in all wisdom, that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus" (Col. i. 28).

The first presentation rest solely upon the finished work of Christ; the second involves the idea which is found in the word "perfect"—of pressing on to the end. In the first no effort of our own could ever present us "holy"; in the second we stand in need of "warning".

Satan does not waste his energies in attempting to deprive us of our acceptance in the Beloved. "Your life is hid with Christ in God." Scripture nowhere says: "Hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy life", but it does say: "Hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown" (Rev. iii. 11). Satan was permitted to touch everything belonging to Job except his life.

The same is true of all the redeemed. There is a prize to be won, a crown to be gained, but no man is crowned except he strive lawfully. If therefore Satan can turn the saint away from the fullness of Christ, and get him occupied with other means and ways—be they ordinances, days, feasts, meats, drinks, false humility, neglect of the body, unscriptural mediators, or any other thing save "holding the Head"—then the prize is lost, the saint dishonoured, and above all the Saviour robbed, for what is a crown to us, but an added crown to Him?

We now approach the steps that lead to the loss of the prize.

"In a voluntary humility and worshipping of angels."—The word "voluntary" is a translation of thelon, from thelo = "to will". A great number of renderings have been offered. Some see in thelon en an equivalent to the Hebrew of I Sam. xviii. 22, "hath delight in", and so "delighting in humility". Alford suggests, "let no one of purpose", and refers to II Pet. iii. 5. J. N. Darby reads, "doing his own will". In all these differences there does not seem to have been a consideration of the contextual usage of thelo, for in verse 23 (directly flowing out of this passage) we have ethelothreskeia = "will-worship". A very close parallel to Col. ii. is found in Gal. iv. 9-11, where in the expression "ye desire again to be in bondage" we have the words thelete douleuein.

"Will worship" is the antithesis of "well-worship" (for such is the literal rendering of "godliness"), and "will worship" is well expressed in Mark vii. 6-8:--

> "Well hath Isaiah prophesied of you hypocrites, as is written, This people honoureth Me with their lips, but their heart is far from Me. Howbeit in vain do they worship Me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men. For laying aside the commandment of God, ye hold the tradition of men, as the washing of pots and cups: and many other such like things ye do."

The reader will not fail to see here both the "doctrines" and the "tradition" of men that figure in Col. ii., as also the care for mere externals, like the ceremonial washing of pots and cups. All such is vain, and being devised by men can well be called "will-worship". The association of the word "humility" with the "worshipping of angels" may not at first appear very evident—but if we look at verse 19 and note the alternative, we may see more clearly the teaching of the apostle:--

Voluntary humility. / Worship of ANGELS.
\ Not holding the HEAD.

The false humility of the Colossians led them to desire mediators between them and the Lord, and just as the Roman Catholic interposes the Virgin and the Saints, so these believers interposed the angels, thereby unwittingly setting aside the supreme headship of Christ.

To the modern mind angel worship may seem ridiculous, yet even John, the writer of the Apocalypse, conscious of his own unworthiness and of the angel's glory that talked with him, "fell down to worship at the feet of the angel" and was rebuked as a consequence (Rec. xxii. 8, 9). The rapid advance that spiritism is making all over the world shows how deep-seated is this tendency on the part of man, and sheds a further light upon the fact that there are two ways of approach to God, and two only. The true is the way of Abel; the false, under whatever name it may be known, is the way of Cain.

True humility is blessed; a false humility is loathsome. We cannot over emphasize that salvation is all of grace, and that we who have thus been saved are utterly unworthy. This unworthiness however does not alter the blessed fact that we are saved, we are justified, we are accepted, we have boldness of access. To hesitate, to affect a false modesty here, is really to intrude some element of false pride that will not accept the gift of God as a gift and nothing more. This false humility denies our completeness in Him. It denies that He in Whom we find our all is Head also of angels, principalities and powers; it denies that we are members of His body, and that He alone is Head.

A prominent opponent of Paul, though not mentioned by name in the N.T., was Cerinthus, who incited the believers against Peter for baptizing Cornelius, and against Paul for not circumcising Titus. The Cerinthian heresy was an attempt to blend Judaism with Gnosticism, and the student of Galatians and Colossians will realize that in these two epistles the two parts of this deadly error are exposed and attacked.

The Cerinthians affirmed that the world was made by angels, which gives point to the place to which angels are assigned in Heb. i. & ii., and Cerinthus himself professed to have received revelation from angels. Closely allied with the Cerinthian heresy was the teaching of Simon Magus and his school, which taught the necessity of learning the names of invisible principalities and powers, and to offer sacrifices to the Father by their mediation. Tertullian says that "the magic of the Simonian doctrine was angelis servieus". The worship of angels was prevalent in Asia in early times. At the Council of Laodicea (A.D.320) it was decreed, that believers may not:-- > "Leave the church of God, and go away and invoke the names of angels."

> "Christians may not receive presents from Jews on Feast-days, or feast with them."
> "Christians may not Judaize, and rest of the Sabbath" (Canons 36, 38 and 29).

Such were the snares that were set for the unwary at Colosse; no wonder, as a corrective and glorious contrast, Paul preached "Christ", warning every man and teaching every man in all wisdom, for there is no alternative. The apostle charges the false teacher at Colosse with:--

"Intruding into those things which he hath not seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind."—Although the R.V. omits the word "not" here, the margin reads, "Many authorities, some ancient, insert not". The traditional text is widespread, being supported by the "Fathers", and many ancient versions.

The word "intruding" is from embateuon, which means, "putting our foot into another man's land as if it were our own" (see Josh. xix. 49-51), stepping into the unseen world with all the assurance of possession, prying into those things that have been veiled from human sight. Josephus uses the word in Ant. ii. 12, 1, where he says of Mt. Sinai: "The shepherd durst not intrude upon it." Anyone with effrontery enough will find some credulous listeners, and such was unhappily the case at Colosse. They were like the Gnostic teachers spoken of in I Timothy, who gave heed to "fables and endless genealogies . . . . . desiring to be teachers of the law" yet "understanding neither what they say, nor whereof they affirm" (I Tim. i. 4-7).

The corrective to this terrible error is found in verses 19 and 20, which we must consider in a separate article, the subject being too important to introduce here. It will, however, be for our good if that blessed corrective be here stated, even though the examination of its teaching be deferred:--

> "And not holding the Head, from which all the body by joints and bands having nourishment ministered, and knit together, increaseth with the increase of God. Wherefore if ye dead with Christ . . . . ." (Col. ii. 19, 20).

Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth. (Second Series).

Deuteronomy.
#2. Possession East of Jordan.
pp. 30 - 35

The first three chapters of Deuteronomy deal with events just before and just after the forty years in the wilderness. The material is abundant, and our purpose is best served by selecting that which illuminates principles rather than by giving an exposition of the book in detail. The structure of Deut. i.-iii. brings into prominence certain salient features, and we will first of all place that structure before the reader.

Deuteronomy i. - iii.

A | i. 1-3. | a | Moses spake unto all Israel.
b | In wilderness over against Red Sea.
c | Eleven days by way of Mount Seir.
B | i. 4-7. | d | Sihon and Og slain.
e | Ye have dwelt long enough.
f | Turn you, and take your journey.
g | Mount of Amorites, all places nigh, land of Canaanites.
C | i. 8. I have set the land before you . . . . . possess it.
D | i. 9-45. | h1 | We will send men before us. Ye rebelled.
i1 | Lord wroth with Israel.
j1 | Not one of that generation shall go over.
k1 | Save Caleb, son of Jephunneh.
i1 | Lord angry with me.
j1 | Thou shalt not go in thither.
k1 | But Joshua the son of Nun.
h1 | We will go up and fight. Ye rebelled.
E | i. 46. Abode in Kadesh.
A | ii. 1-3. | b | Into the wilderness by way of the Red Sea.
a | As the Lord spake unto me.
c | Compassed Mount Seir many days.
B | ii. 3 - iii. 11. | e | Ye have compassed the Mount long enough.
f | Turn you northward.
g | Edom, Moab, Ammon, etc.
d | Sihon and Og slain.
C | iii. 12-20. God hath given you this land to possess it.
D | iii. 21-28. | h2 | Joshua commanded.
i2 | Lord wroth with me.
j2 | Thou shalt not go over.
k2 | Joshua—he shall go over.
E | iii. 29. Abode in valley over against Beth-peor.

Two things stand out in this structure:--

(1) That God had given Israel the land to possess, which He had sworn to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (i. 8 and iii. 18).
(2) That the people failed to enter in because of unbelief, Joshua and Caleb being the exceptions.

Allied with these facts we have the intimidating presence of the giants, the sons of Anak, the unbelief that suggested the sending of the spies, and the failure even of Moses in the matter of sanctifying the Lord in his high and responsible office. We have dealt with the unbelief that prompted the sending of the spies of Volume XXII, pp. 202-208, and in articles dealing with the Hope and the Prize and the Epistle to the Hebrews. Under other headings we have sought to explain the teaching of Scripture dealing with the failure of Israel to enter into the land of promise, and the typical teaching of that failure in so far as it bears upon the ways of God in all dispensations. We would refer the reader to these articles, and also to I Cor. ix. 24 - x. 13.

Our subject at the moment is the presence of the Canaanites and other enemies that barred the way, when Israel were ready to go up and possess the land. A pronounced difference is made between the attitude that Israel were to adopt toward Esau, Moab and Ammon, and their attitude toward Sihon and Og:--

> "Meddle not with them; for I will not give you of their land, no, not so much as a foot-breadth; because I have given mount Seir unto Esau for a possession" (Deut. ii. 5).
>
> "Distress not the Moabites, neither contend with them in battle: for I will not give thee of their land for a possession; because I have given Ar unto the children of Lot for a possession" (ii. 9).
>
> "And when thou comest over against the children of Ammon, distress them not, nor meddle with them: for I will not give thee of the land of the children of Ammon any possession: because I have given it unto the children of Lot for a possession" (ii. 19).

In contrast with these prohibitions, we read concerning Sihon & Og and their lands:--

> "Behold, I have given into thine hand Sihon the Amorite, King of Heshbon, and his land: begin to possess it, and contend with him in battle" (ii. 24).
>
> "Then we turned, and went up the way to Bashan: and Og, King of Bashan came out against us . . . . . thou shalt do unto him as thou didst unto Sihon King of the Amorites" (iii. 1, 2).

The destruction of Sihon and Og was an utter destruction: "Men, women and children of every city were destroyed; none were left" (ii. 33, 34; iii. 3-6).

The lesson underlying this differentiation is as fundamental to the Church as it was to Israel. Let us seek to understand it.

First, let us observe one difference between these two classes. Esau was the brother of Jacob; Ammon and Moab were both the sons of Lot, the nephew of Abraham. Sihon, on the other hand, was an Amorite (ii. 24), and Og one of the remnant of the "Rephaim"; the former was a Canaanite (Gen. x. 16), the latter one of the evil seed whose origin is indicated in the opening verses of Gen. vi. The first thing, then, to remember is that here are the two seeds—Israel, Esau, Moab and Lot belonging to one line; Sihon, Og, the Canaanite and the Rephaim belonging to the other. In one case God gives possessions and preserves; in the other, He deprives of possessions and destroys.

Before Israel cross over the river Arnon Moses reminds them of a principle already in operation. When God had promised the land to Abraham, he was told, in effect, that his children would not be allowed to enter into possession until the iniquity of the Amorites was full (Gen. xv. 16). Let us observe what Moses said, and its application both to Israel and to ourselves:--

> "The Emims dwelt there in times past, a people great, and many, and tall, as the Anakims; which also were accounted giants (Rephaim)" (Deut. ii. 10, 11).
>
> "The Horims also dwelt in Seir beforetime: but the children of Esau succeeded them, when they had destroyed them from before them, and dwelt in their stead; as Israel did to the land of his possession, which the Lord gave unto them" (Deut. ii. 12).
> "That (i.e., Ammon's inheritance) also was accounted a land of giants (Rephaim); giants dwelt there in old time; and the Ammonites call them Zamzummims. A people great and many, and tall, as the Anakims: but the Lord destroyed them before them; and they succeeded them, and dwelt in their stead" (Deut. ii. 20, 21).

It will be seen that in each case, the original holders of land were the "giants", the progeny of evil. In each case, these were destroyed and their land was inherited "in their stead" by descendants of Abraham, Esau, Moab and Ammon. There are also the added words: "As Israel did unto the land of his possession" (ii. 12).

While, however, all these peoples have this in common, Israel itself is always considered separately and alone. Moab and Edom are but household servants in the day of the true David's triumph: "Moab is my washpot, over Edom will I cast out my shoe" (Psa. cviii. 9). These relative positions indicate that among the one great circle of the true seed, there will be many differences in "glory" and sphere: all receiving a "justification unto life", but not all "reigning in life" (see Rom. v. 12-21). Israel were forbidden to "meddle" with these other nations, linked as they were by ties of blood. The same word is repeated in Deut. ii. 24, where it is translated "contend". The two passages emphasize the absolute distinction made between these two seeds. Israel were forbidden to "contend" with Edom, Moab and Ammon; but commanded to "contend" with Sihon.

We notice also that Israel were to pay for all the meat and drink that they consumed while passing through these territories; and they were reminded of the fact that through all their wanderings in the wilderness they had lacked nothing (Deut. ii. 7). A request for a passage "through thy land" was also sent to Sihon, King of Heshbon:--

> "Let me pass through thy land: I will go along the highway, I will neither turn unto the right hand nor to the left. Thou shalt sell me meat for money, that I may eat; and give me water for money, that I may drink; only I will pass through on my feet . . . . . until I shall pass over Jordan unto the land which the Lord our God giveth us" (Deut. ii. 26-29).

From this it appears that, had Sihon permitted Israel to pass through his territory, and had he supplied them with food and water as requested, Israel would not have destroyed his nation and inherited his land, their true inheritance being strictly beyond Jordan.

Let us now endeavour to express, in terms of church doctrine and dispensational truth, what this means to those whose blessing is defined according to the epistle to the Ephesians.

Israel's inheritance was not enjoyed as soon as it was promised; a period of waiting, of bondage, and of redemption intervened—waiting until the iniquity of the Amorite was full. The inheritance of the church of the mystery was allotted "before the overthrow of the world" (Eph. i. 3, 4) but the members of that church are found in the bondage of sin, needing redemption (Eph. i. 7). Their inheritance is future (Eph. i. 14). The sphere of their inheritance is in "heavenly places" and far above "principalities and powers". This church is related in the flesh with other companies of God's children, just as Israel was related to Edom, Moab and Ammon; but as many of these are associated with this world, fellowship is restricted. Their endeavoured is to live peaceably, not to strive, and to live as those whose primary object is to "pass through" this world, asking for no favours and wanting little more than "meat and drink". Eph. vi. 12 speaks of this church as not "wrestling" with "flesh and blood"; just as Deut. ii. speaks of Israel not "meddling" or "contending" with Esau, Moab or Ammon. Eph. vi. 12 says that the foes of the church are "spiritual wickednesses", which are the "world holders of this darkness". These fallen principalities and powers, whose inheritance in the heavenlies is lost, and in whose realm of glory the church is soon to appear, act as Sihon acted when he would not let Israel "pass by him" (Deut. ii. 30). The result of this is that the church whose real foes are "over the Jordan", and whose real conflict is depicted at the overthrow of Jericho, have to stand against the opposition of these spiritual Amorites, "the world holders of this darkness". The interested reader is urged to re-read the articles entitled "Satan and the Church of the Mystery" (Volume XIX, pp. 129, 167, 179), and "The Threefold Conflict" (Volume XVI, page 138).

We conclude this article with a word or two concerning Og, King of Bashan, and his giant cities. Deut. iii. 4 tells us that Israel took "threescore cities" in the kingdom of Og in Bashan; and The Companion Bible adds a note: "They can all be seen and counted to-day" (See Dr. Porter's Giant Cities of Bashan). As some of our readers may not have access to this book, we feel sure that the following will be of interest:--

> "That sixty wall cities, besides unwalled towns a great many, should be found at such a remote age, far from the sea, with no rivers and little commerce, within a country not larger than an ordinary English county, appeared to me quite inexplicable and mysterious though it appeared it was strictly true. On the spot with my own eyes I had verified it. Lists of more than a hundred revived cities and villages in these mountains alone I had tested and found correct, though not complete. More than thirty of these I had myself either visited or observed. Of the high antiquity of these ruins scarce a doubt can be entertained."

The following summary is from the notes of Jameson and Bickersteth:--

"The rude architecture and simple structure of the houses, the immense blocks of roughly hewn basaltic stone of which they are built, seemingly hard and as durable as iron, the prodigious thickness of the walls, the colossal stone doors, which do not turn on hinges, but on pivots, and some of which are eighteen inches in thickness, the ponderous stone flags of the roofs that are laid on massive walls, all indicate their being reared by the hands and for the habitation of a race of greater strength than ours—a mighty nation of giants.

The very names by which these cities and towns were known in the days of Og, are still applied to them by the Arabs; and every circumstances serves to confirm the proof that in the ancient cities of stone that are found still existing in the Haouran there are beheld the identical cities of the giant Rephaim—the cities of Og."

Deuteronomy.
#3. Deut. xxxii. The song of Jehovah's Name.
pp. 81 - 86

As we have already remarked, much that occupies this fifth book of Moses is a recapitulation of the past, a revision of the law, and an appeal to the people as they are about to enter into their inheritance. In the two preceding articles we have sketched the book as a whole, and considered the opening section with its typical teaching. We now come to the close of the book and consider the great prophetic Song of Moses.

It would have been an attractive line of thought to regard Moses, in this Song, as traversing the history of Israel step by step, and the Song itself as capable of being divided up into sections, each referring to some specific period or dispensation. On examination, however, this view seemed to lack adequate foundation; so that we must approach the Song of Moses afresh, seeking from the Author that guidance, without which all our efforts must fail.

We observe in the opening verses, that the Song is closely related to the publishing of the name of the Lord:--

"Because I will publish the name of the LORD.
Ascribe ye greatness unto our God.
He is the Rock, His work is perfect:
For all His ways are judgment:
A God of truth and without iniquity,
Just and right is He" (Deut. xxxii. 3, 4).

The name "Jehovah" was God's name and memorial "for the age". It is given a N.T. expansion in the Revelation: "He Who was, and is, and is to come." This covenant name spans the age, and carries with it the pledge that the early promise, though temporarily suspended, shall yet be realized. This we can trace in the Song before us, which we have called the Song of Jehovah's Name.

Heaven and earth are called upon to hear this proclamation, the doctrine of which is likened to rain and dew upon the tender herb, and showers upon the grass (Deut. xxxii. 1, 2). This we learn from Psa. lxxii. 6 is a figure setting forth the restoration of Israel at the coming of the Lord:--

> "He shall come down like rain upon the mowings (the grass having been cut and carried away, leaving all parched and apparently dead: as showers that water the earth."

The Psalm that contains these words "consummates the prayers of David" (Psa. lxxii. 20), just as Deut. xxxii. consummates the desire of Moses.

This Song of Moses has been like a quarry out of which succeeding prophets have been led to take stones for the erection of the great temple of truth.

Isaiah's prophecy traverses much the same ground as that covered in the Song. We give the following parallels as examples:--

> "Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth: for the Lord hath spoken" (Isa. i. 2, and Deut. xxxii. 1).
>
> "I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against Me" (Isa. i. 2, and Deut. xxxii. 6, 13, 14, 15).
>
> "Children that are corrupters" (Isa. i. 4, and Deut. xxxii. 5).
>
> "Ye rulers of Sodom . . . . . ye people of Gomorrah" (Isa. i. 10, and Deut. xxxii. 32).
>
> "Wherefore, when I looked that it should bring forth grapes, brought it forth wild grapes? " (Isa. v. 4, and Deut. xxxii. 32).
>
> "Thou, Lord, art our Father, our Redeemer"
>
> "But now, O Lord, Thou art our Father; we are the clay" (Isa. lxiii. 16, lxiv. 8, and Deut. xxxii. 6).
>
> "Blessed be . . . . . Israel Mine inheritance" (Isa. xix. 25, and Deut. xxxii. 9).
>
> "Thou shalt delight thyself in the Lord, and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth" (Isa. lviii. 14, and Deut. xxxii. 13).
>
> "O Jacob, My Servant; and thou, Jeshurun, whom I have chosen" (Isa. xliv. 2, and Deut. xxxii. 15).
>
> "Because thou hast forgotten the God of thy salvation, and hast not been mindful of the Rock of thy strength" (Isa. xvii. 10, and Deut. xxxii. 15, 18).
>
> "The acceptable year of the Lord and the day of vengeance of our God."
>
> "For the day of vengeance is in My heart, and the year of My redeemed is come" (Isa. lxi. 2, lxiii. 4, and Deut. xxxii. 35, 41, 43).

A collection of all the citations from and allusions to this Song of Moses would take us through a great deal of Scripture, and would provide a most trustworthy commentary. We cannot do this in the present article. Some readers, however, may be able to pursue the subject, and so check the exposition that we give here. Taking a broad view of the Song, we see that it shows the downward path that Israel trod, lightly esteeming the Lord their Redeemer, abusing His gifts, being set aside by Him for a time, and then, in the fullness of His mercy, being delivered when their power was gone and their helpers proved to be vain. The whole is an exposition of the name Jehovah. He is a God of truth and at the same time without iniquity; a God of truth in that He keeps all His promises, yet a God Who is just and right, in that He does not pass over sin as of no consequence. The key to this Song seems to be the recurring name "Jehovah". The title comes eight times—a number that suggests resurrection, when Israel shall indeed be a blessed people, and their land a delight. We will, therefore, set out the structure of the Song, using the eight occurrences of "Jehovah" as our guide. The title is denoted in the structure by the word "LORD".

The Song of Moses (Deut. xxxii.).

Being a proclamation of the name Jehovah, the covenant-keeping God of Israel, in His twofold character:--

(1) A God of truth; fulfilling His promises of blessing.
(2) Without iniquity; not excusing His people's sins.

A | 1-4. The name of the LORD proclaimed.
His work perfect. "Work" = Heb. poal;
"perfect" = Heb. tamim (meaning "complete").

B | 5-8. Do ye thus requite the LORD?
"Requite" = Heb. gamal (used of fruit-bearing).
Israel looked upon as unclean ("spot", "corrupters").
Called a "perverse and crooked generation".
The number of Israel mentioned.

C | 9. The LORD the portion of His people, and Jacob the lot of His inheritance.

D | 10-14. The LORD alone led Israel.
No strange god with Him.
Israel did eat of the increase of the fields.
Honey, oil, butter, milk, lambs, rams, wheat and wine.

ISRAEL SET ASIDE.

D | 15-25. The LORD abhorred Israel.
Jeshurun waxed fat, and kicked.
And lightly esteemed the Rock of his salvation.
Strange gods provoke the Lord.

A | 26-28. The LORD hath not done this.
"Done" = Heb. paal (see "A" above).
The scattering of Israel.
"To cease" opposite to "perfect" (in "A" above).

B | 29-33. The LORD shut up His people
"Shut up" refers to the uncleanness of Israel (see "B" above).
Their requital (see "B" above). Grapes of gall.
Their perversity (see "B" above). Sodom and Gomorrah.
Their numbers (see "B" above). How should one chase a thousand?

C | 34-43. The LORD will vindicate His people,
He fulfils the meaning of His name.
He is righteous as well as faithful.
He is the portion of His people; they are the lot of His inheritance.
He will be merciful unto His land and to His people.

A word or two of explanation with regard to some of the features thrown into prominence by this structure, will enable the reader to appreciate the light that it throws on the general trend of the Song.

The words, “a God of truth”, indicate much more than their ordinary English meaning. The Hebrew word is emunah and is translated “faithfulness” 18 times; also as “faith”, “faithful” and “faithfully”. The word occurs just 49 times in the O.T., a significant number indicating perfection or completeness, and especially associated with the Jubilee when all forfeited inheritances were restored. There is a marked contrast here between the faithful Lord and His unfaithful people, for in verse 20 we read: “They are a very froward generation, children in whom is no faith” (emun).

The word “work” in the statement, “His work is perfect”, is the Hebrew poal. Now it is of interest to know that the last occurrence of emunah, “truth”, is in Hab. ii. 4; and the last occurrence of poal, “work”, is in Hab. iii. 2, where a revival is referred to. This word “work” is in structural correspondence with the verb “to work” (Heb. paal) in verse 27. There, the Lord says that He would make the remembrance of them to cease from among men, were He not apprehensive lest their adversaries should become proud, and imagine that by their own prowess they had destroyed Israel. The Lord takes the full responsibility not only of Israel’s blessing, but also of their scattering and punishment. They are His people, even though under judgment; it is His land, even though desolate.

The work of the Lord is declared to be “perfect”. The Hebrew word indicates completeness, something finished; it looks forward , beyond failure and dispersion, to the restoration and blessing with which the Song ends.

A title is given to the Lord in this opening section, which recurs throughout the Song. The references to this title of “the Rock” are as follows:--

> “He is the Rock, His work is perfect” (verse 4).
> “He . . . . . lightly esteemed the Rock of His salvation” (verse 15).
> “Of the Rock that begat thee thou art unmindful” (verse 18).
> “Except their Rock had sold them” (verse 30).
> “Their rock is not as our Rock” (verse 31).
> “Where are their gods, their rock in whom they trusted” (verse 37).

We have here five references to the Lord, and two to false gods; making a total of seven occurrences.

Coming to the next section, we have the question, “Do ye requite the Lord?” And in the structure there is a note to the effect that “requite” is connected with fruit-bearing. The corresponding member speaks of their vine being “the vine of Sodom, and of the fields of Gomorrah”; their grapes of gall; and their wine as the poison of asps. This is the strange requital for all the Lord’s goodness to them, and is the burden of the Song of Isa. v. Gamal, the word “requite”, comes in Isa. xviii. 5, where it speaks of the sour grape “ripening”. It comes also in Numb. xvii. 8 where it speaks of the rod “yielding” almonds.

Israel are looked upon in this second section as unclean: "A perverse and crooked generation hath corrupted itself: to be no sons of His is their blemish" (Deut. xxxii. 5, Companion Bible). (The Septuagint reads: "spotted children").

In the corresponding member, we read: "The LORD shut up His people." This word ("shut up") is used in connection with the cleansing of the leper (see Lev. xiii. 4, 5, 11, etc.). The LXX uses the word, translated "to give up" in Rom. i. 24. And the words of the apostle in Rom. xi. 32 (margin) refer directly to this clause in the Song:--

> "For God hath shut them all up together in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all."

Israel are called a "perverse and crooked generation" in Deut. xxxii. 5-8, and likened to Sodom and Gomorrah in verses 29-33. In their blessing, the bounds of the nations are set in deference to Israel: "According to the number of the children of Israel." And in their dispersion, the reference to numbers appears again:--

> "How is it possible that one of the nations should chase a thousand of Israel, and two put ten thousand to flight, except it be that their Rock had sold them?" (Deut. xxxii. 30).

Neither Pharaoh nor Nebuchadnezzar with all their hosts could have made bondmen of Israel, unless the Lord had "sold them" and "shut them up".

The members C | 9 and C | 34-43 speak for themselves. Israel and their land are the Lord's. However much the nations may be permitted to punish that people and desolate that land, they have at the last to reckon with the Lord; and Israel and their land shall eventually find mercy.

Member D | 10-14 and D | 15-25 have their own story to tell. The first term of the covenant deals with idolatry; and this term was sadly broken by Israel again and again. Prosperity found them out. They waxed fat, but did not gratefully recognize the Lord Who "led" them and Who "fed" them (two words which speak of the Lord as their Shepherd).

D | 15-25, the first member of the second half of the structure, is the first to deal with Israel's punishment. The LORD abhorred them; the LORD shut up His people, and sold them into captivity.

The last verses (34-43) takes us into the Day of the Lord; and are parallel with the Book of the Revelation.

The Song that we have been considering in this article, with its emphasis upon His perfect work, and His faithfulness and righteousness, is yet to be sung once more:--

> "And they sing the Song of Moses, the servant of God, and the Song of the Lamb, saying, Great and marvelous are Thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are Thy ways, Thou King of saints" (Rev. xv. 3).

So is sounded out by two songs the history of this people of Israel; for the Song of Moses would never have eventuated in blessing had it not been true that there was to be added to it, in due time, the Song of the Lamb.

#4. The blessing of Moses (xxxiii. 1-29).
pp. 135 - 139

Following the great Song which is recorded in Deut. xxxii., comes the "blessing wherewith Moses the man of God blessed the children of Israel before his death".

This blessing opens with a reference to Sinai not so much in its terror as in its covenant character, and closes with Israel dwelling in safety alone, saved by the Lord. Between these two extremes, which occupy verses 2-5 and 26-29, the tribes are enumerated and a blessing apportioned to each. Simeon's name does not occur in the A.V. text, but this may be partly explained by the fact that Simeon's inheritance fell "within the inheritance of the children of Judah" (Josh. xix. 1). The Alexandrian manuscript, however, together with the Aldine and Complutensian editions, read:--

> "Let Reuben live and not die; and Simeon's men be few."

Some think that the repetition of the negative in verse 6 is unjustified. But the matter is obscure, and not of sufficiently vital interest to ourselves to warrant a wider search.

Adhering to the text of the A.V. we may summarize the blessing as follows:--

The blessing of Israel by Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 1-29).

A	1-5.			The people loved, King in Jeshurun. "Thy saints are in Thy hand."
B	6-25.	a1	6.	REUBEN.—Life and prosperity.
		a2	7.	JUDAH.—Royal. Warlike.
		a3	8-11.	LEVI.—Priests. Proven.
		a4	12.	BENJAMIN.—Temple area.
		a5	13-17.	JOSEPH.—The bush. Ephraim and Manasseh.
		a6	18, 19.	ZEBULUN.—Commercial. Seas.
		a7	18, 19.	ISAACHAR.—Domestic. Sand.
		a8	20, 21.	GAD.—Enlarge. Chose part for himself.
		a9	22.	DAN.—A lion's whelp. Bashan.
		a10	23.	NAPHTALI.—Fertile land.
		a11	24, 25.	ASHER.—Blessing of children.
A	26-29.			The people loved. None like God of Jeshurun. "Underneath are the everlasting arms."

Just a brief note upon any feature that may be obscure is all we can do in the exposition of this blessing of the tribes.

"He came with ten thousand of His saints" (verse 2).—Two points of interest may be noted here. First, the Hebrew for "ten thousand of His saints" is meribbath kadesh, differing very little from the locality Meribah Kadesh mentioned in xxxii. 51. Secondly, the word "saints" must not be limited to human beings. It includes angels; and we know from Scripture that Israel received the law "at the disposition of angels" (Psa. lxviii. 17; Acts vii. 53; Gal. iii. 19; Heb. ii. 2). The word "saints" occurs again in the prophecy of the second coming found in Zech xiv. 5: "The Lord my God shall come and all the saints with Thee." This is alluded to in I Thess. iii. 13: "At the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all His saints." This passage in I Thess. is sometimes wrongly used to teach the coming of the church "with the Lord", when He descends from heaven.

The giving of the law from Mount Sinai is looked upon in Deut. xxxiii. as a great blessing. In one sense the law was "against" Israel, as against all mankind, by reason of the weakness of the flesh, but taken as a whole, it is spoken of as an inheritance, a signal favour, and something to love and desire above gold:--

> "And they sat down at Thy feet. Every one shall receive of Thy words. Moses commanded us a law, even the inheritance of the congregation of Jacob" (xxxiii. 3, 4).

When the apostle Paul is speaking of the advantage of being a Jew, he emphasizes in the first place the oracles of God:--

> "What advantage then hath the Jew? or what profit is there of circumcision? Much every way: chiefly, because that unto them were committed the oracles of God" (Rom. iii. 1, 2).

"He was King in Jeshurun."—When Israel asked for an earthly king, it was that they should be "like the nations"; and in this demand they virtually rejected the Lord: "They have rejected Me, that I should not reign over them" (I Sam. viii. 5-7). These words find an echo in Luke xix. 14.

Passing on to the blessings of the tribes, let us note the following:--

Reuben.—Reuben had lost his birthright (Gen. xlix. 4), yet he was to have a posterity and a place. Their inheritance was on the East of Jordan (Numb. xxxii. 1-5) and they were often exposed to attack. They dwindled to about the ninth in tribal rank.

Simeon.—Whether we read the passage according to the Alexandrian Manuscript, cited above, or whether we consider Simeon to be included in Judah, we know that they were so reduced by plague as to become the smallest of the tribes (Numb. xxvi. 14). This probably accounts for their inclusion with Judah.

Judah.—From Judah sprang David, the warrior king. Moses prays that Judah may be heard and brought back triumphant unto his people, and that his "hands may be sufficient for him".

Levi.—The conduct of Levi on the occasion of the worship of the golden calf, when he spared neither his own brethren nor children in his zeal for the true worship of God, is here dwelt upon with favour. To this tribe pertained the service of the Lord and the teaching of the people.

Benjamin.—"The beloved of the Lord shall dwell in safety near Him"—that is, the inheritance of Benjamin included the dwelling-place of the Most High. "He shall dwell between His shoulders" refers possibly to the fact that "He" (that is God) would honour the tribe of Benjamin by dwelling upon the mount of Zion.

Joseph.—Joseph included the two tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh. His sign was Taurus, the Bull, as Judah's was the Lion. The words of verse 17 ought to be rendered: "His glory is like that of a first-born bull." "The goodwill of Him that dwell in the bush" refers to Exod. iii. 2 and the purpose of the Lord in Israel's redemption.

Zebulun and Isaachar are put together. They were sons of the same mother, but different in character. Zebulun carried on a trade in purple dye, a commerce that brought them a great revenue. Isaachar's inheritance embraced the fertile plains of Jezreel, Esdraelon and Megiddo; and this tribe settled down to its enjoyment. Among the exports that are associated with Zebulun is that of glass, made from the sand at the mouth of the river Belus.

Gad.—

> "He appointed the first part for himself, because there, in a portion of the law-giver, was he seated; and he came with the heads of the people" (Deut. xxxiii. 20, 21).

These words have been variously translated. The following paraphrase may be of service:--

> "He asked and obtained for himself the first portion of the land which Israel conquered, namely, the territory of Sihon the Amorite, and he was settled there with full possession at the consent of Moses the law-giver. There was a condition attached which Gad fulfilled, by crossing the Jordan and helping his brethren in the other tribes to obtain their own portion of the promised land."

"In a portion of the law-giver, was he seated" is sometimes translated: "the portion of the hidden lawgiver." This is supposed to refer to the fact that somewhere in the territory of Gad was buried in an unknown grave Moses the great law-giver.

Dan.—Dan is first of all compared to a lion's whelp. When he had become full-grown, he leaped from Bashan and secured territory further North, including Laish (Judges xviii. 29).

Naphtali.—"The West." The inheritance of the tribe is clearly defined in Josh. xix. 32-39.

The fact that the Mediterranean Sea was on the West Coast of the land of Canaan led Israel to use the word "Sea" for the direction "West". In this instance, the word so translated refers to the Sea of Galilee.

Asher.—"Let him dip his foot in oil." Asher's inheritance abounded in olive groves. The margin reads, "Under thy shoes shall be iron and brass". The hills of Lebanon abounded in minerals. Iron is still found there, and copper is often spoken of in connection with the Tyrians.

So with an ascription of praise to God—"there is none like unto God of Jeshurun"—and Israel dwelling "in safety alone", and the "land of corn and wine" as the inheritance of a people "saved by the Lord", the blessing of Moses the man of God comes to an end.

The closing chapter of the book records the ascent of the mountain by Moses, and the vision he there received of all the land which the Lord had swore unto Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. There he died, and was buried by the Lord—an honour accorded to Moses alone. In full vigour the representative of the law died, a symbol of the law itself and its lasting hold upon men until it, too, was removed by death. Moses was mourned by Israel for thirty days. The closing words of Deuteronomy seem a fitting epitaph for that unknown grave. Let us repeat them here, as we bid Moses farewell, and prepare to arise and follow Joshua across Jordan into the land of promise:--

> "And there arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face, in all the signs and wonders, which the Lord sent him to do in the land of Egypt to Pharaoh, and to all his servants, and to all his land, and in all that mighty hand, and in all that great terror which Moses shewed in the sight of all Israel" (Deut. xxxiv. 10-12).

JOSHUA.

#1. The end of the law . . . . . Newness of life (i. 1, 2).

pp. 170 - 174

We have now passed in review the five books of Moses, and although we have devoted nearly one hundred articles to the elucidation of their teaching, every reader is well aware that we have but skimmed the surface, leaving the depths still unsounded. However, it is not our purpose in the series to do more than point out the most obvious features, features that throw light upon the dealings of God with man, that illuminate the purpose of the ages, and that by prophecy, type and doctrine reveal the Being and attributes of the Lord God Himself.

And so we approach the sixth book of the Scriptures, the book of Joshua, in order to learn something more concerning the purposes of Him Who worketh all things after the counsel of His own will. The book of Joshua stands first in that section of the Hebrew Bible named "The Prophets", and is very definitely related to the closing books of the same section. The following arrangement, which appeared first in Dispensational Truth, and with somewhat different notes in the first Appendix of The Companion Bible, makes this clear:--

The Structure of the Prophets.

A | JOSHUA. "The Lord of all the earth."
Failure to possess the land (xviii. 3).
The Canaanite still in possession (xv. 63).
B | JUDGES. Failure. Thirteen judges.
Israel forsaking and returning to God. "No King" (xxi. 25).
C | SAMUEL. Saul (type of Antichrist). David (type of Christ).
Israel want to be "like the nations".
D | KINGS. Decline and failure under Kings.
Removal from the land.
D | ISAIAH. Israel's only hope, final blessing, and restoration.
Messiah—God's King.
C | JEREMIAH. Nebuchadnezzar (type of Antichrist).
David's "Righteous Branch".
"Raised up" the Deliverer.
Israel sent into captivity among the nations.
B | EZEKIEL. The glory of God forsaking and returning to the land and people.
Jehovah Shammah. The Lord is there.
A | MINOR PROPHETS. "The Lord of all the earth."
Joshua the High Priest.
Restoration of Israel to the land.
"No more Canaanite in the house of the Lord of hosts" (Zech. xiv. 21).

The most superficial study of these eight books shew an unfolding purpose. At either end stands one named Joshua, the first a Captain, the second a High Priest. The name

Joshua and the name Jesus are the same (see Heb. iv. 8, margin), and we are immediately aware of the foreshadowing of a greater "Captain" (Heb. ii. 10) and a greater "High Priest" (Heb. iv. 15) who is to lead many sons, not only into the land of Canaan, but to "glory".

The covenant made by God with Abraham, and repeated to Isaac and Jacob, is concerned with a "Land" and a "Seed", the Seed including the literal descendants known as Israel, and "Thy seed which is Christ" (Gal. iii. 16). The book of Joshua is particularly concerned with the entry into the land promised to the fathers.

Although the land of promise is spoken of in glowing terms in the Scriptures, we must admit that in its largest extent it is by no means a great country, and if we limit our survey to the extent of Palestine itself, its size is small indeed, being not much greater in area than the Principality of Wales. There must be something above and beyond the territory itself that justifies all that is written around those few square miles.

Considered as a single fact of history, the entry into Canaan is insignificant when compared with other migrations and conquests. Nevertheless this exodus of people and this conquest are accompanied by most wonderful miraculous interventions, not only miracles affecting the immediate surroundings and limited to the earth, but also extending to the sun and the moon (Josh. iii. 14-17; x. 12, 13).

The peopling of the promised land with the chosen race is one of the chief factors in the salvation of the nations of the earth, and it is because this spot of earth is the chosen geographical centre from which light and blessing, rule and law shall flow out to the ends of the earth that it occupies such an important place in the Divine plan. And further, Joshua is pre-eminently a type of the Lord Jesus Christ; and the experiences of Israel as recorded in this book have been "written for our learning". The whole history foreshadows the present experience of the redeemed, and their entry into the inheritance in God's own time. While, therefore, we shall give attention to the actual historic facts that are here recorded, we shall be more concerned with the light they throw upon the purpose of the ages and our association with it. Of course the dispensation of the mystery finds no foreshadowing in O.T. types; it was hid in God until revealed through the apostle Paul. But the walk and warfare of the redeemed in all ages have much in common, and though the paths trodden lead to widely different destinies, they are nevertheless in many respects parallel.

The first lesson, and one that is fundamental for us all, is contained in the first two verses of chapter i.:--

> "Now after the death of Moses the servant of the Lord, it came to pass that the Lord spake unto Joshua the son of Nun, Moses' minister, saying, Moses My servant is dead; now, therefore, arise, go over this Jordan, thou, and all this people, unto the land which I do give to them, even to the children of Israel" (Josh. i. 1, 2).

The word "Now" with which the book opens is in the Hebrew vav, and is but one letter, in the form of a hook. It links the book of Joshua to the preceding books of Moses.

On the other hand, while this suggests a link, there is also a most definite division. Joshua cannot lead Israel into the land of promise until it can be said, "Moses My servant is dead". To those who know the teaching of the epistles to the Romans or the Galatians, the typical teaching of this is obvious. But we must not assume such knowledge on the part of our readers, and the lesson is important enough to warrant careful statement. The following passages set forth in doctrinal language what is set forth in type in Josh. i. 1, 2:--

> "Is the law then against the promises of God? God forbid; for if there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law" (Gal. iii. 21).
> "For the law was our pedagogue (tutor or governor, a household slave who had charge of a child until he had grown to years of discretion, see Gal. iv. 1-3) to bring us unto Christ . . . . . but after that faith is come, we are no longer under a pedagogue" (Gal. iii. 24, 25).
> "For the law made nothing perfect, but the bringing in of a better hope did, by the which we draw nigh unto God" (Heb. vii. 19).

In the death of Moses is typified the death of the law, and death to the law of all who are saved. And so we are not surprised to read the words, "Now therefore arise", and to discover that the Hebrew word kum, translated "arise", is used of resurrection (Isa. xxvi. 19), and in the words of the Saviour, Talitha cumi (Mark v. 41). The LXX uses the word anastas, so frequently employed in the N.T. for "resurrection".

"Moses is dead: now therefore arise."—These two phrases together suggests the repeated doctrine of the epistles of Paul that death to law is with a view to life in Christ; that we are not only reckon ourselves indeed "dead unto sin", but also just as surely "alive unto God" through Jesus Christ our Lord. Newness of life, however, is not the end; it is itself only a means to an end. The command to "arise" is followed by the command to "walk in newness of life", "to serve in newness of spirit".

> "Moses My servant is DEAD; now therefore ARISE, GO OVER this Jordan."

We have already seen the insistence upon the death of Moses before Joshua, the type of Christ, could receive the command to "arise". On a number of occasions Moses made it clear that he could not take the children of Israel over Jordan:--

> "Get thee up into the top of Pisgah . . . . . and behold it with thine eyes; for thou shalt not go over this Jordan. But charge Joshua and encourage him, and strengthen him; for he shall go over before this people, and he shall cause them to inherit the land which thou shalt see" (Deut. iii. 27, 28).
>
> "I must not go over . . . . . ye shall go over" (Deut. iv. 22).

Further emphasis upon resurrection is found in the words of Josh. i. 11:--

> "Within three days ye shall pass over this Jordan, to go in to possess the land."

And when at length Israel did pass over Jordan, it was in many respects a repetition of the earlier experience of the crossing of the Red Sea (Josh. iii. 17). The typical teaching of this repetition will be better appreciated when we have surveyed the intervening chapters. It can, however, be seen to have a distinct bearing upon the typical teaching we have already noticed. The meaning, too, of Jordan will be better understood when we arrive at chapter iii.

There are one or two things still to be seen in Josh. i. 1, 2, and we therefore return to that passage. We have considered the fact that Moses was dead, and the command to arise and to go over, indicating separation as well as newness of life. We have also the added words: "Thou and all this people." In Deut. xxxi. 3 we read:--

> "The Lord thy God, He will go over before thee . . . . . and Joshua, he shall go over before thee, as the Lord hath said."

Joshua represents the Lord, and the people are associated with him. This brings before us those great doctrines that are associated with the words "with Christ". Let the reader prayerfully ponder the significance to himself of these words:--

> "Moses is dead; now therefore arise, go over this Jordan, thou and all this people, unto the land, which I do give to them."

In these words we have foreshadowed the end of the law, and its inability to save or to lead into an inheritance; the new sphere of life and activity opened up by the resurrection of Christ; the repetition of the Red Sea crossing, making the division occasioned by redemption our own experimentally; and the fact that the glory that lies ahead is ours in gift and promise.

May it be ours to follow our true Joshua closely, fully and utterly, so that we shall not only know the bliss of salvation, but also the added joy of His "Well done".

Great and precious promises.

#7. "The hope of the promise made of God" (Acts xxvi. 6).

pp. 21 - 23

We have seen that the promises of God are sure because they come to us by the way of faith and grace, not by the way of law and works. They are sure, also, because, however many they many be, and whether to be enjoyed on earth, in the New Jerusalem or at the right hand of God, they all find their Yea in Christ, and their Amen through Him. The Lord is not slack concerning His promises, and every one shall be fulfilled. Together with the promise we have also the divine nature (according to Peter) or the holy promissory Spirit (according to Paul), a seal and earnest of the inheritance yet to be enjoyed.

There is one thing, however, that we have not yet considered, which is so antagonistic (it is called an enemy), so venomous (it has a sting), and so mighty (he who holds its power is the Devil himself) that it writes "Icahbod" over the fairest schemes and covers all in dust. There is no need for us to elaborate; the enemy is death, and if there be no resurrection of the dead our faith is vain, and every promise doomed to failure. It is our joy to know that the promises of God are essentially linked with the resurrection.

Most of our readers are acquainted with the general disposition of subject-matter in Ephesians; and we have considered quite recently the question of the promise in Eph. i. 13, 14. We can start from this point on our new quest, for although the actual word "resurrection" is not used in the passage, resurrection is nevertheless there. The words "an earnest until the redemption of the purchased possession", indicate a present pledge of a future inheritance. Earlier in the chapter we learn that we have been predestinated unto the adoption, and Rom. viii. speaks of "waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body" (Rom. viii. 23). Here, therefore, is resurrection, both in Eph. i. and in Rom. viii.

Eph. i. 3-14 is threefold, dealing with the Will of the Father, the Work of the Son, and the Witness of the Spirit. This is followed by a threefold prayer, that we may know what is the hope of His calling, the riches of the inheritance, and the exceeding greatness of His power to us-ward who believe. This third part of the prayer corresponds with the third division of Eph. i. 3-14, and the phrase, "the holy promissory Spirit which is the earnest of our inheritance", finds its explanation and amplification in that power which is to us-ward who believe, and which is nothing less than the mighty power which was wrought in Christ when He was raised from the dead.

We believe it would be safe to say that there is no reference throughout the N.T. to the promises of God without some aspect of resurrection in the context. Let us turn, for example, to Paul's defence before Agrippa given in Acts xxvi:--

> "And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers: unto which promise our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come. For which hope's sake, King Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews. Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead?" (Acts xxvi. 6-8).

There is no need for proof here that in the mind of Paul "the hope of the promise made of God" and the resurrection of the dead were inseparable.

Among the fathers who received the promise of God Abraham stands out pre-eminently. Let us turn to the inspired comment upon his faith given in Rom. iv. In verses 13, 14 and 16 the promise to Abraham is specifically mentioned; and at verse 17 the apostle speaks of Abraham's own reaction to the promise of God, and reveals the secret spring of all his faith and hope:--

> "(As it is written, I have made thee a father of many nations,) before Him Whom he believed, even God, Who quickeneth the dead and calleth those things which be not as though they were. Who against hope believed in hope, that he might become the father of many nations, according to that which was spoken, So shall thy seed be. And being not weak in faith, he considered not his own body now dead, when he was about an hundred years old, neither yet the deadness of Sarah's womb: he staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief; but was strong in faith, giving glory to God; And being fully persuaded that, what He had promised, He was able also to perform" (Rom. iv. 17-21).

Comment upon such plain speaking is superfluous. The God that stood behind the promise to a man and woman as good as dead, must be the God of resurrection.

We find the same facts presented in a slightly different form and for a different purpose in Heb. xi.:--

> "Through faith also Sarah herself received strength to conceive seed, and was delivered of a child when she was past age, because she judged Him faithful Who had promised. Therefore sprang there even of one, and him as good as dead, so many as the stars of the sky in multitude, and as the sand which is by the sea-shore innumerable" (Heb. xi. 11, 12).

Here the birth of Isaac is again seen to be nothing short of life from the dead.

Heb. xi. takes us forward to that crisis in Abraham's experience, when he became willing to offer up his son Isaac. Here again we may perceive the strength of his faith in the God of resurrection:--

> "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac: and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten son, of whom it was said, That in Isaac shall thy seed be called: Accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead; from whence also he received him in a figure" (Heb. xi. 17-19).

Associated with the promises of God there is His own power to raise the dead, there is His own Son Who was raised from the dead, and there is His own purpose to raise all His children from the dead. To realize these things will strengthen our faith, still our murmurs, minister to our patience, and enable us to walk worthily:--

> "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth" (Heb. xi. 13).

#8. "According to that which was spoken" (Rom. iv. 18). pp. 75, 76

We have seen much to encourage us regarding the character of the promises of God, and also the character of the God Who has made the promises. How do we know these promises? And what warrant have we to believe them?

Among the passages that have been before us in this series are the following: Rom. iv.; Gal. iii.; II Pet. i. and iii.; II Cor. vii. 1; Eph. i. 13, 14. In each of these passages we shall find an insistence upon the Word of God as the vehicle of the promise and the ground of our faith. Let us consider these passages in the order given above.

In Rom. iv. we do not find that Abraham rested his faith in the Scriptures, for the simple reason that there were no Scriptures at that time. The parallel, however, is clear, for the Scriptures are but the spoken word of God perpetuated for all time, and Abraham believed what God had said:--

> "Who against hope believed in hope, that he might become the father of many nations: according to that which was spoken, So shall thy seed be" (Rom. iv. 18).

Abraham did not vaguely believe in a benevolent Providence, or in a "destiny that shapes our ends". There was no fanaticism in believing so strange a promise. As the simple statement of Gen. xv. 6 records: "He believed in the Lord."

Now it is most essential to us all that we really do recognize that when we believe the testimony of the Scriptures, be they written by Moses or Paul, we are actually "believing in the Lord". Gen. xv. and Rom. iv. together make this plain:--

> "And he believed in the Lord" (Gen. xv. 6).
> "He believed . . . . . according to that which was spoken" (Rom. iv. 17, 18).

Turning next to Gal. iii. we find this same inter-relationship:--

> "He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of One, And to thy seed, which is Christ" (Gal. iii. 16).

Earlier and later in the chapter, we have the following:--

> "And the Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed" (Gal. iii. 8).
>
> "But the Scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe" (Gal. iii. 22).

Here again the Scripture is placed upon the same level as that which "He saith".

Turning now to II Pet. i. and iii. we find the closing verses of chapter i. occupied with the question of the inspiration of Scripture:--

> "We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed in your hearts, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day star arise: knowing this first, that no prophecy of the scripture is of any private interpretation: for the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (II Pet. i. 19-21).

What confirmation of the promises we have in these words.

It may be remembered that when we considered Peter's testimony to the "exceeding great and precious promises" we found them closely associated with the "partaking of the divine nature" (II Pet. i. 4). We must now observe that, closely allied with that "divine nature" is "divine power":--

> "According as His divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness" (II Pet. i. 3).

Without this power, the promise would be of none effect. So, in the same chapter, the apostle, speaking of the coming of the Lord, writes:--

> "We have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of His majesty" (II Pet. i. 16).

Another example of the association of promise and power is II Tim. i. 1-7:--

> "According to the promise of life . . . . . God hath not given us the spirit of fear; but of power . . . . ."

We glory, therefore, not only in the faithfulness of our God to all His promises, but we glory also in His mighty power whereby all those promises shall be accomplished. He Who is the "Power of God" is also the "Wisdom of God". In Christ faithfulness, ability and wisdom meet, to the glory of God the Father and for the consolation of His people.

#9. "He is faithful that promised" (Heb. x. 23).
pp. 108 - 110

The closing words of the preceding article, which dealt with the close connection between the promises and the Word of God, spoke of glorifying God for His faithfulness. The faithfulness of God to His Word of promise is absolutely essential, that we are apt to treat it as we do other essential things, such as the sun in the sky, or the air we breathe. It is not good, however, to take as a matter of course so glorious a fact, and we will therefore devote this short article to that which must underlie both the Word of God and the work of Christ, namely, the faithfulness of the Lord.

A most precious light upon our faith in God is shed by a recognition of this great basic truth. When Rom. iv. 3 speaks of Abraham's faith it says:--

> "For what saith the Scripture? Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness."

When we turn back to the passage that is quoted we find a slightly different wording:--

> "And he believed in the Lord: and He counted it to Him for righteousness" (Gen. xv. 6).

The shallow critic who sees no further than words, may raise a quibble, or consider that such difference nullifies verbal inspiration. To those who love the Word such a difference is worth twenty sermons on faith. When Abraham believed God, he actually believed in the faithfulness of the Lord, which is implied in the words; "He believed in the Lord", and every act of faith on our part must be nothing short of that. If God could be unfaithful at any point or in any thing, our faith would be nothing worth. Faith in God demands as its rock foundation faithfulness on the part of the Lord, and the two statements concerning Abraham illumine the fact. We find it carried forward by the words written concerning Sarah's faith:--

> "Through faith . . . . . she judged Him faithful Who had promised" (Heb. xi. 11).

Not only are we apt to forget how the whole fabric of God's Word and purpose hangs upon His faithfulness to His own promises and to the word of His Son, but we are also likely to forget how much hung upon the faithfulness of the Lord Jesus Christ to the undertaking to which He was pledged in love. So, in Gal. iii. we read:--

> "For if the inheritance be out of (ek) law, it is no more out of (ek) promise . . . . . for if there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been out of (ek) law . . . . . but the scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise out of (ek) the faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe" (Gal. iii. 18-22).

Now if the expression, "the faith of Jesus Christ", means the believer's faith in Jesus Christ, we have in effect this statement:--

"The promise which is out of faith in Jesus Christ is to them that believe in Jesus Christ", which is an unnecessary repetition. Moreover, the expression, "out of the faith of Jesus Christ", is set in contrast with "out of the law" in the preceding verses. Now "out of the law" looks to the law as the source, and "out of the faith of Jesus Christ" looks to that faith as a source, and that faith is none other than His faithfulness unto death.

Rom. iii. 3 and 7 use the word "faith" and "truth" interchangeably:--

"Shall their unbelief make the faith of God of none effect?" (Rom. iii. 3).
"For if the truth of God hath more abounded" (Rom. iii. 7).

This being the case, Peter's attitude to those who said, "Where is the promise of His coming?" is a foregone conclusion. He says of such:--

"For this they are willingly ignorant of, that by the Word of God . . . . ." (II Pet. iii. 5).
"As also in all his epistles . . . . . the other scriptures" (II Pet. iii. 16).

The exhortation of II Cor. vii. 1, it will be remembered, follows a series of promises collected from different parts of O.T. Scripture, all which deal with the question of the purpose and provision of God for dwelling with His people. It does not simply say, "Let us cleanse ourselves", but rather, "Having therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves", and these promises are all part of the written Word of God.

With the revelation of the mystery, quotation of the earlier scriptures almost ceased, for the reason that a new revelation is therein made, based upon a phase of God's purpose not dealt with in the earlier scriptures, but essentially hid in God until the time of its manifestation.

Eph. i. 13, 14 is no exception to the rule that the promises of God are not to be divorced from His Word. In these verses, and used in such a way that it is impossible to separate, is the "hearing" and the "believing" of the Word of truth and the "sealing" and the "earnest" of the "holy promissory spirit".

There are many great and precious promises, and while we must be careful to divide the Word of truth aright, because the promises made to Abraham or to David do not necessarily belong to the Church of the One Body, it still remains true that whatever may be said of the stability and the certainty of such last mentioned promises and the glorious fact that all of them are found in Christ, may be said with equal truth and equal comfort regarding those promises that belong exclusively to the Mystery. In this series we are not attempting to differentiate, so much as to see what is common to all the promises of God, trusting thereby to minister grace to our readers and to glorify God for His faithfulness.

#10. "Fully persuaded that what He had promised, He was able also to perform" (Rom. iv. 21).

pp. 153 - 155

It is an unspeakable blessing to realize the truth of the fact considered in our last article, that "He is faithful that promised". Yet there is something more. While faithfulness to one's purpose is essential to success, yet it may be defeated by lack of power or lack of wisdom. It is therefore necessary for us to see that not only does the Scripture ascribe faithfulness to the Lord as the Promiser, but power also.

In connection with Abraham and the promise made to him, we find references not only to his faith and hope, but to his strength and weakness. And just as we have learned that our faith is but a reflex of His faithfulness, so we shall learn that our strength of patience and faith and hope is but the reflex of His great power to carry out all His word:--

> "And being not weak in faith . . . . . he staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief, but was strong in faith, giving glory to God; and being fully persuaded that, what He had promised, He was able also to perform" (Rom. iv. 19-21).

In Abraham and Sarah we have set forth the complete rest of faith. Sarah judged Him FAITHFUL Who had promised, and Abraham was persuaded that He was ABLE TO PERFORM. What more do we need?

The word "able" is really "of power", and the alliteration of verse 21 may be helpful:--

> "Abraham was fully persuaded, that what God had promised, He was of power to perform."

In Heb. xi., where Sarah accounts God faithful, we shall find that Abraham accounts Him able:--

> "By faith Abraham . . . . . offered up Isaac . . . . . accounting that God was able to raise Him even from the dead" (Heb. xi. 17-19).

In an earlier paper we observed the connection between "the holy spirit of promise" of Eph. i. 13, and the prayer of Eph. i. 19: "That ye may know what is the exceeding greatness of the power." When we made the comparison before, it was to show the close relationship that exists between the promise, the earnest, and the resurrection. We turn now to the same passage to show the close connection between the promise and the power. Yet, after all, the only power that is effective in a world held by the bondage of corruption, is the power of resurrection; so that all these things are intimately connected.

In Rom. i. 1-4 we have another combination. In earlier articles we have seen the association of the promise with the Scriptures and with the Person of Christ, and here, in Rom. i. 1-4, we have all three combined with the thought of resurrection power:--

> "The gospel of God, which He had promised afore by His prophets in the holy scriptures concerning His Son Jesus Christ our Lord . . . . . declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness by the resurrection of the dead."

When we considered the great and precious promise of II Pet. i. 4 we found that its great source of strength was the partaking of the divine nature. We now draw attention to the fact that this same promise is said to be "according to His divine power" (II Pet. i. 3). It should be understood that most of the occurrences of the word "able" in the N.T. are translations of dunamai or dunatos, both derived from the same word translated "power". While the substitution of the word "power" is not recommended as a translation, it is nevertheless suggestive. Let us look at some "promises" that are pledged by this divine ability or power. The restoration of Israel under the figure of the olive tree and its branches is assured by this fact of power, and so with other promises:--

> "For God is of power to graft them in again" (Rom. xi. 23).
>
> "The blind men came to Him: and Jesus saith unto them, Believe ye that I am of power to do this? They said unto Him, Yea, Lord" (Matt. ix. 28).
>
> "Now unto Him who is of power (dunamai) to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power (dunamis) that worketh in us" (Eph. iii. 20).
>
> "That I may know Him and the power (dunamis) of his resurrection . . . . . like unto His glorious body, according to the working whereby He is of power (dunamai) even to subdue all things unto Himself" (Phil. iii. 10-21).
> "Wherefore He is of power also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them" (Heb. vii. 25).

With the latter reference, compare Heb. vii. 16, where we find this power is called "the power of an endless life". Read through the epistle of Jude, get some idea of the corruption that will be manifest in that day, and then appreciate the better the promise:--

> "Now unto Him that is of power to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence of His glory with exceeding joy" (Jude 24).

This paragraph is in structural correspondence with verse 1, where these same believers are called "the preserved in Jesus Christ".

We too can be of Abraham's persuasion, and rest in the fact that "He is able".

#11. "Through faith and patience inherit the promises" (Heb. vi. 12).

pp. 212 - 214

There is a further aspect of this subject of the promises of God which must needs be considered if we are to make our presentation of the matter complete.

We have dwelt at some length in this series upon the promises made by God to Abraham, and have emphasized that these promises were by faith and by grace. When, however, we turn to Heb. xi. we meet with a promise that is never mentioned in the Old Testament—the promise of a city "whose builder and maker is God". The way in which this city is introduced makes it evident that it was something over and above the initial promise of the land, with which the book of Genesis is occupied. It was because of this that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were content to be mere tent-dwellers in the land of promise.

Towards the end of Heb. xi., when the time at the disposal of the apostle "would fail to tell" of all the witnesses to overcoming faith that are found in the Scriptures, he gives a summary of some of their activities:--

> "Who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions" (Heb. xi. 33).

The particular clause that interests us at the moment is that which speaks of "obtaining promises". Tugchano, from which the word "obtain" is derived, is defined by Dr. Bullinger in his Lexicon: "to hit, to strike, to reach a mark or object." In a modified form, it is translated "wrought", the original being variously rendered "work", "labour" and "trade".

We have both Gen. xv. and the apostle's comment in Rom. iv. to testify that the original promise made by God to Abraham was "by faith without works". But we must not forget that James speaks of another part of Abraham's life. Referring, not to the promise of a seed, but to the offering up of Isaac, he says:--

> "Was not Abraham our father justified by works, when he had offered Isaac his son upon the altar? Seest thou how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect?" (James ii. 21, 22).

It is to this period of Abraham's history, and not to the initial phase of Gen. xv., that the apostle alludes in Heb. vi.:--

> "That ye be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises. For when God made promise to Abraham, because He could swear by no greater, He sware by Himself, saying, Surely blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee. And so, after he had patiently endured, he obtained the promise" (Heb. vi. 12-15).

This, then, is the inspired context of the expression "obtained promises". It takes us back to Mount Moriah and Gen. xxii. The Lord's command to Abraham in this chapter was in the nature of a test. In verse 12 we read: "Now I know that thou fearest God" (Gen. xxii. 12). This took place after God had said: "I am the almighty God, walk before Me and be thou perfect" (Gen. xvii. 1).

The fourth reference to "promise" in Ephesians, it will be remembered, is conditional:-- > "Honour thy father and mother; which is the first commandment with promise" (Eph. vi. 12).

Here is law, most definitely; here is reward; and something far removed from grace and faith. While, therefore, we may rightly say that there are promises that are "sure to all the seed" because they are unconditional, by faith, through grace, yet there are also extra promises which having attached to them conditions, and being in the nature of a reward, may, or may not, be "obtained". The two sets of promises fall under the two heads that we find in II Tim. ii. 11-13:--

(1) "If we died with Him, we shall also live with Him."—This, so far as we are concerned, is unconditional and can neither be "obtained" nor forfeited.

(2) "If we endure, we shall also reign with Him."—This is additional and conditional, and is of the nature of those promises which are "obtained" through faith and patience.

In the same way, the apostle points the Hebrew believer back to the wilderness experience of Israel. All had been redeemed, but all did not endure. Those whose carcasses fell in the wilderness were not necessarily unsaved (even Moses and Aaron died before the land was entered); all that was unconditional was theirs, and will be theirs as much as it will be Caleb's or Joshua's, but those promises that are "obtained" through faith and patience were lost:--

> "Let us therefore fear, lest a promise being left us of entering into His rest, any of you should seem to come short of it" (Heb. iv. 1).

We trust that no one will be hindered by confusing those promises which are by grace and unconditional with those that have to be obtained through faith and patience, but rather that many may be stimulated and encouraged on the pilgrim pathway.

In the same category as the promises that may be "obtained" we must place the promise of James i. 12:--

> "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation (as did Abraham; Gen. xxii.); for when he is tried he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love Him."

The mention of the crown here makes this promise parallel with the crown and reigning of II Tim. ii. & iv., and with the prize of I Cor. ix. and Phil. iii.: "So run that ye may obtain."

#12. "The promise of life" (II Tim. i. 1).
pp. 227 - 230

Let us conclude this series of simple studies by noticing the way in which "the promise" is introduced in the pastoral epistles, namely, those to Timothy and Titus:--

> "Bodily exercise profiteth a little, but godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come" (I Tim. iv. 8).
>
> "Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, according to the promise of life which is in Christ Jesus" (II Tim. i. 1).
>
> "In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began" (Titus i. 2).

In these three references we shall find life in three aspects as the subject of promise:--

(1) The life that now is and the life that is to come. The latter includes;
(2) Life which is in Christ Jesus.
(3) Aionion or age-abiding life.

One feature must strike every reader, and that is the prominence that life receives in these references to promise. Granted that one has life, all other blessings may be enjoyed, but apart from the possession of life all else is impossible. It is surely a feature not to be despised, that "the life that now is" is a matter of promise and of godly concern:--

"God is the Saviour of all men."	"The life that now is."
"Specially of those that believe."	"The life that is to come."
	(I Tim. iv. 8-10).

What are we to understand by "bodily exercise"? Paul makes frequent allusions to the athletic games and contests that occupied such an important part in the life of the Greek and Roman world.

Very parallel to the statement that "bodily exercise profiteth for a little"—both as to degree and duration—is the passage dealing with Corinthian athletes in I Cor. ix. 24-26:--

> "Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain. And every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible. I therefore so run, not as uncertainty; so fight I, not as one that beateth the air."

Here, in the apostle's own terms, we have the difference between "bodily exercise" with its temporary and temporal profiting, and "exercise with a view to godliness" which, while having the promise of this life, includes that which is to come.

As a comment upon the words "profit for a little", Bloomfield cites Diogenes Laert, who in speaking of the athletes said:--

> "While going through the exercise or training, they sacrifice much, and are at great private expense, and when conquering, occasion loss to the public."

The apostle also had in view the fact that the Romans set apart a special period daily for "bodily exercise" which made for health and fitness. How much more therefore, he urges, should the believer, with an incorruptible crown in view, exercise himself towards godliness.

In the second reference (II Tim. i. 1) we have the promise of life which is in Christ Jesus. This stands without qualification or condition, except that it is in Christ Jesus. Seeing that II Timothy is a prison epistle, and is one of the epistles through which the One Body is specially instructed, we must see in this promise of life in Christ Jesus the great inclusive grant which embraces "all spiritual blessings" and the "adoption" unto which that church was predestinated.

In Ephesians, the apostle gives the dread alternative when he says that the Gentiles were "alienated from the life of God" (Eph. iv. 18). In Colossians, he speaks of the life which is in Christ Jesus when he says: "Your life is hid with Christ in God" (Col. iii. 3).

The life in Christ Jesus is referred to once again in II Tim. i. 9, 10, where its free unconditional character and true endlessness are set forth:--

> "Who hath saved us and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus, before age-times, but is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, Who hath abolished death and hath brought life and incorruption to light through the gospel."

The third aspect of life in connection with promise is called "eternal life". This, as we probably know, is better translated "age-abiding life". True eternal life is that which is in Christ Jesus and unconditional, being that which is spoken of in II Tim. i. 10 as "life and incorruption", but aionion or age-abiding life is a special aspect of life enjoyed during the ages to come, and associated with blessings and aspects of glory not necessarily the accompaniments of life pure and simple.

Excluding I Tim. vi. 19 where the best Greek texts omits "eternal life" and read "life indeed", we have four references in these epistles to "eternal" or "age-abiding" life, viz.:--

> "For this cause I obtained mercy, that in me first Jesus Christ might show forth all long-suffering, for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe on Him to life age-abiding" (I Tim. i. 6).

"Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on age-abiding life" (I Tim. vi. 12).

"In hope of age-abiding life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before age times" (Titus i. 2).

"Heirs according to the hope of age-abiding life" (Titus iii. 7).

We have already seen in this series that the promises must be divided into two groups, viz., those which are in grace and unconditional, and those which are "inherited" and "obtained". The same division is seen here. There is the promise of life in Christ Jesus. There is the promise of age-abiding life, which is associated with "fighting the good fight of faith" and with "laying hold". Just as the four great prison epistles deal with the two aspects of truth which we may call The Hope, and the Prize, so the references to the promise of life contained in these epistles to Timothy and Titus deal with that which is the unmoveable foundation, and that which is connected with the superstructure.

This must conclude our studies of this nature for the present. We praise God for the great and precious promises of which Christ Himself is the Yea and Amen: we thank Him for the holy promissory Spirit, the earnest of the inheritance, and we are encouraged to persevere by that great cloud of witnesses who "through faith and patience inherited the promises".

"Blessed be the Lord . . . . . there hath not failed one word of all His good promise" (I Kings viii. 56).

The Epistle to the Romans.

#45. Romans vi. 14 - vii. 6.
"Receive not the grace of God in vain" (II Cor. vi. 1).
pp. 9 - 13

We have seen in the opening section of Rom. vi. that sanctification operates within a new sphere—"newness of life", and consequently presupposes justification as an accomplished fact. Justification brings "peace with God" and "access by faith into the grace wherein we stand" (Rom. v. 1, 2). This new sphere necessitates a new condition—"oneness with Christ". It is, moreover, impossible to think of newness of life and union with Christ, and at the same time of a state of bondage, therefore we have seen that there is a new state—"freedom from bondage":--

> "For sin shall not have dominion over you: for ye are not under the law, but under grace" (Rom. vi. 14).

This is the language of heaven. This must be the atmosphere of the new creation, but what is the possible effect upon believers during this present time of imperfect realization while in this mortal body? Alas! we know only too well.

The next section opens with a question that reveals the need of much correction and careful walk while rejoicing in this blessed liberty. The whole trouble seems to resolve itself into the way in which we translate the word "freedom". Shall we translate it "liberty" or "licence"? Liberty in the scriptural sense recognizes the Lord "Whose we are, and Whom we serve". Licence casts away all restraint, denies all responsibility, and acknowledges no lord but self. To the correction of this fatal error the apostle now addresses himself. The subject is so important that we give the structure here:--

Romans v. 20 - vii. 6.

A1 | v. 20, 21. STATEMENT.—"Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound."
  B1 | vi. 1. QUESTION.—"Shall we continue in sin that grace abound?"
    C1 | vi. 2. REPUDIATION.—"God forbid" (me genoito).
      D1 | vi. 3-14. ANSWER.—
        | The dominion of sin and death (vi. 9-14).
        | The body of sin "destroyed" (katargeo) (vi. 6).
        | Newness of life (vi. 4).
A2 | vi. 14. STATEMENT.—"Ye are not under law, but under grace."
  B2 | vi. 15. QUESTION.—"Shall we sin because we are not under law, But under grace?"
    C2 | vi. 15. REPUDIATION.—"God forbid" (me genoito).
      D2 | vi. 16 - vii. 6. ANSWER.—
        | The dominion of law (vii. 1).
        | The law "delivered from" (katargeo) (vii. 2-6).
        | Newness of spirit (vii. 6).

Let us ponder the relation of these two sections. Take the two statements. The first stresses the difference between "sin" and "grace", the second the difference between being under "law" and under "grace". There is evidently a close connection between sin and law. This we know to be the fact, and we are to meet the argument in Rom. vii. 7-12 and 13-25. Observe the two questions. The first says:--

> "Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound" (Rom. vi. 1).

The second says:--

> "Shall we sin, because we are not under law, but under grace?" (Rom. vi. 15).

Two errors are here exposed, the first being that we must not misunderstand the grace of God. It has already been stated that this superabounding grace "reigns through righteousness" (Rom. v. 21), which is a complete refutation of the idea of continuing in sin "that grace may abound". The second error is that freedom from law means freedom to sin. This is countered by the apostle's argument which includes the words: "Being then made free from sin, ye became the bond slaves of righteousness" (Rom. vi. 18).

In the two answers that occupy the bulk of each section, vi. 3-14 and vi. 16 - vii. 6, we have a parallel development of doctrine. In the first the dominion of sin and death is touched upon, whilst in the second it is the dominion of law that is explained. These are brought together in chapter viii. 2 as "the law of sin and death".

Both the body of sin and the law are next associated by the use of the word katargeo in the following passages:--

> "That the body of sin might be destroyed" (Rom. vi. 6).
> "Now we are delivered from the law" (Rom. vii. 6).

These two passages throw light upon each other as we shall see.

Finally, both sections stress "newness". In the first, where the fact of sanctification is the theme, we learn that it operates in a sphere of newness of "life" (vi. 4). In the second, where liberty contrasted with licence is the theme, we have service in "newness of spirit" (vii. 6). All these features are so inter-related, that we trust no reader will begrudge the time spent in making the relationship manifest. It is apparent to all who will but read the statements and questions of this new section, that the erroneous teaching combated by the apostle largely arises out of a misconception of "grace".

Our doctrinal attitude has sometimes been explained by others as being somewhat "Calvinistic". We do not subscribe to any creed or system of theology, but it is evident to most readers that there is much in the attitude of the Reformation to the doctrines of grace that is characteristic of our own. We yield to none in the advocacy of the sovereignty of that grace which has saved us, of its free and unmerited bestowal, of the total incompatibility of a salvation by grace and by works. All this is but expressing the doctrine of Romans itself. Nevertheless, the same scripture that leaves the reader without a doubt as to the free unmerited favour sovereignly bestowed by "grace", also plainly warns the reader of the dangers of abusing that grace. We shall therefore devote the remainder of this article to that phase of doctrine which reveals the pitfalls awaiting one who holds an ill-balanced view of the grace of God. Let us note Jude 3, 4:--

> "Beloved, when I gave all diligence to write unto you of the common salvation, it was needful for me to write unto you, and exhort you, that ye should earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints. For there are certain men crept in unawares, who were before of old ordained to this condemnation, ungodly men, turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and denying the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ."

There is no idea in the words translated "ordained to this condemnation" of a predestination to commit sin. The expression is a legal term meaning: "those cited to trial" by posting up their names. The Scriptures had already indicated that such characters would come, and what their punishment would be. The particular evil was in their "turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness".

The word translated "turning" means "to alter anything from its original purpose", and so to misuse or abuse. These ungodly men were teachers, who taught licence instead of liberty, and instead of using the grace of God to promote and encourage sanctification of life and walk, they opened the door to all manner of excess.

Peter speaks of the same class as does Jude. He calls them "false teachers . . . . . who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them" (II Pet. ii. 1). Describing their teaching further, he says:--

> "For when they speak great swelling words of vanity, they allure through the lusts of the flesh, through much wantonness, those that were clean escaped from them who live in error. While they promise them liberty, they themselves are the bond slaves of corruption: for of whom a man is overcome, of the same is he brought in bondage" (II Pet. ii. 18, 19).

Lest some should object to the intrusion of the teaching of Peter into that of Paul, we would ask such to note the complete harmony of argument of II Pet. ii. 19 with Rom. vi. 16:-- > "Know ye not, that to whom ye yield yourselves bond slaves to obey, his bond slaves ye are to whom ye obey, whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness" (Rom. vi. 16).

We do well to discount much of the "great swelling words" used in speaking of the "grace of God", for such may but "allure" and lead to "wantonness", or—as the word is translated in Jude 4—"lasciviousness". To quote Peter once more:--

> "As free, and not using your liberty for a cloke of maliciousness, but as the bond slaves of God" (I Pet. i. 16).

The Corinthians were exhorted to see to it that they "received not the grace of God in vain" (II Cor. vi. 1). The Colossians are referred to not merely as knowing the grace of God, but of knowing it "in truth" (Col. i. 6). We also read in Titus of:--

> "The grace of God that bringeth salvation . . . . . teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live . . . . . looking for that blessed hope . . . . . zealous of good works" (Titus ii. 11-14).

Such is the true interpretation of the grace of God. While any attempt to be "justified by the law" is intolerable to the conception of grace (Gal. v. 4), so also is the slightest abuse of the freedom that grace implies and brings. It is to set both matters right that Rom. vi. and vii. were written. May we be apt scholars, neither barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of Christ, and while we yield to none in our testimony of the fullness, the freeness, and the sovereignty of the grace of God, we must equally testify that this grace which has saved us teaches us to walk in newness of life, and to serve in newness of spirit.

#46. Romans vi. 16 - vii. 6.
Two illustrations: master and husband.
pp. 63 - 66

In our last article we compared the opening section of Rom. vi. with the second section, vi. 15 - vii. 6, and learned something of their relation one with other. We also considered something of the teaching of Scripture as to the possibility of receiving the grace of God in vain.

Before going further into the teaching of this new section, we must stop in order to discover its scope—what it is all about; and this we do by noting its structure, the disposition of its subject-matter, and the correspondence of its parts.

Romans vi. 16 - vii. 6.

Specially to Gentiles. "I speak humanly." |
A | vi. 16. Know ye not? (oida, "perceive").
B | vi. 16, 17. The Figure. Bond-slave.
C | vi. 18. The Freedom. "Made free from sin."
D | vi. 19-22. The Fruit. "Unto shame"; "unto holiness".
E | vi. 23. Wages v. Gift (Death v. Life).
Specially to Jews. "I speak to them that acknowledge the law." |
A | vii. 1. Know ye not? (agnoeo, "acknowledge").
B | vii. 2, 3. The Figure. A Wife.
C | vii. 3. The Freedom. "Free from the law."
D | vii. 4, 5. The Fruit. "Unto God"; "unto death".
E | vii. 6. Newness of spirit v. Oldness of letter
(i.e., the letter killeth, the spirit giveth life).

All through the epistle to the Romans two classes of believers are in view: the Gentile, who had never been under the law (called "the uncircumcision"), and the Jew who had been under the law (called "the circumcision"). These two companies, although saved by the same great Sacrifice, and by the same faith, through the same grace, nevertheless had their own separate problems. It was no great matter of conscience to the saved Gentile as to whether the food he ate was "clean" or "unclean" in the eyes of the Levitical law, but it was a matter of great concern to the saved Jew, and this matter is dealt with in Rom. xiv.

So with this question of the dominion of sin, death and law. The problems of both Jew and Gentile were much the same when the matter was limited to the dominion of sin and death, and consequently the opening section (Rom. vi. 1-14) which deals with this twofold dominion is not divided into two parts, one for Gentile believers, and one for Jewish believers. The second section, however, deals with the dominion of law. This would not be a special matter of conscience for the Gentile, and could be explained along the lines of the setting free of slaves, a matter to them of everyday occurrence; but to the Jew, though a believer, anything which appeared to set aside the law of God was looked upon with suspicion and considered almost blasphemy. Consequently this second section is divided into two parts. To the Gentile he speaks after the manner of men; to the Jew he speaks to those who acknowledge the law. To the Gentile he uses the figure of master and slave; to the Jew the figure of husband and wife. In both cases he brings the fact of death to bear upon the claims of the master or husband, and to both he reveals the glorious possibilities of life.

To appreciate the apostle's line of teaching here we must acquaint ourselves with the law that governed these two classes—slaves and wives. The law of Moses legislated for the slave and his freedom, but to those addressed in Rom. vi. there is a more particular appeal to the manners and customs of their own day. This matter is so important that we propose breaking off the exposition of the passage here, in order to give a series of quotations on the question of the manumission (the "setting free by a legal process") of slaves, from Deissman's "Light from the Ancient East":--

> "I refer to the metaphor of our redemption by Christ from the slavery of sin, the law, and idols—a metaphor influenced by the customs and technical formulæ of sacred manumissions in antiquity."
>
> "Inscriptions at Delphi have been the principal means of enlightening us concerning the nature and ritual of manumission with a religious object in ancient times."
>
> "Between the Greek usage and the practice of the early Church there stands St. Paul, who made the ancient custom the basis of his profoundest contemplations about Christ. What was this custom? Among the various ways in which the manumission of a slave could take place by ancient law, we find the solemn rite of fictitious purchase of the slave by some divinity. The owner comes with the slave to the temple, sells him there to the god, and receives the purchase money from the temple treasury, the slave having previously paid it there out of his savings. The slave is now the property of the god; not, however, a slave of the temple, but a protégé of the god. Against all the world, especially his former master, he is a completely free man; at the utmost a few pious obligations to his old master are imposed upon him. The rite takes place before witnesses; a record is taken, and often perpetuated on stone."

"Another form, which does not occur elsewhere, but which makes the nature of the rite particularly plain, is furnished by an inscription of 200-199B.C. on the polygonal wall at Delphi: Date. Apollo the Pythian bought from Sosibius of Amphissa, for freedom, a female slave* (The word used is actually Soma, "body" and further illuminates the references to "the body", e.g., Rom. vi. 6) whose name is Nicæa, by race a Roman, with a price of three minæ of silver and a half mina. Former seller according to the law; Eumastus of Amphissa. The price he hath received. The purchase, however, Nicæa hath committed unto Apollo for freedom. Names of witnesses, etc., follow."

It will be seen at once that the apostle has actually used the words of this legal formula in the epistles, in such passages as:--

"Ye were bought with a price" (I Cor. vi. 20; vii. 23).
"For freedom did Christ set us free . . . . . ye were called for freedom" (Gal. v. 1-13).

In numerous records of manumission the nature of the newly-obtained liberty is illustrated by the enfranchised person being expressly allowed henceforth to "do the things that he will". Paul, therefore, is referring to the danger of a relapse into servitude when he points to the possible result of the conflict between flesh and spirit: "That ye may not do the things that ye would" (Gal. v. 17).

Numerous manumissions, again, expressly forbid, sometimes under heavy penalties, that the enfranchised shall ever "be made a slave" again. This throws light on the evil intentions of those "who . . . . . spy out our liberty, which we have in Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage" (Gal. ii. 4). And we understand warnings like this in the letters:--

"For freedom did Christ set us free: stand fast therefore, and be not entangled again in a yoke of bondage" (Gal. v. 1).

And the still more moving exhortation:--

"Ye were bought with a price; become not slaves of men" (I Cor. vii. 23).

When, in numerous documents, the obligation is imposed upon the enfranchised slave to "remain with N.N." (his former master), or, for instance, to abide with Euphronius . . . . . behaving decently", we are reminded of the apostle's words in Corinthians:--

"Let him abide with God" (I Cor. vii. 24).
"That which is decent, and attending on the Lord without distraction" (I Cor. vii. 35).

We trust these references to the actual practice of the times will be of help in illuminating the argument of Rom. vi. We will not attempt any further amplification here, but hope to take up the teaching of Rom. vi. 16-23 without further preface in our next article.

#47. Law and grace (vi. 15-23).
pp. 104 - 108

The subject now before us is so vital that no pains must be spared to see it in as clear a light as possible. Before going further, therefore, with the theme of Rom. vi., let us again step back and survey the whole inner section:--

Romans v. 12 - viii. 39.

A | v. 12-21. The law of sin and death in Adam.
B | vi. 1-14. The relation of justification and sin. Dead to it.
B | vi. 15 - vii. 25. The relation of justification and law. Dead to it.
A | viii. 1-39. The law of the spirit of life in Christ.

The main line of the teaching is found in the first and last sections (A, A); in the first section the law of sin and death, leading up to condemnation, with the glorious interposition by God of the gift of His Son—"because of the weakness of the flesh" and, in the second section, the law of the spirit of life, leading up to: "No condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus." The intervening chapters (vi. and vii.) reveal the utter powerlessness of any act of the old man, either by the law or in the flesh, to accomplish this emancipation. In both cases, the only answer is death: "death to sin" and "dead to the law", or, if the service of sin be persisted in, death as its "end" and its "wages".

In the section of Rom. vi. now before us, we are dealing with the question of the law. In the preceding articles we have shown how the apostle has divided his argument into two parts, speaking after the manner of men to the Gentiles, and after the manner of the law to the Jews. We now consider the first of these two parts, the argument based upon slavery addressed particularly to the Gentile, to whom the obligations of slavery, the character of its service, its fruits and wages, were all matters of everyday knowledge.

We must first see the passage as a whole:--

Romans vi. 15-23.

A | 15. | a | Not under law.
b | But under grace.
B1 | 16-18. Freedom from sin.
c1 | All are either servants to sin or to righteousness.
d1 | The deciding factor. Obedience.
c2 | Ye were the servants of sin.
d2 | Ye obeyed from the heart.
c3 | Being freed from sin.
d3 | Ye became servants unto righteousness.
B2 | 19, 20. Freedom unto righteousness.
e | Just as.
f | Members yielded to uncleanness.
g | Unto iniquity.
e | So.
f | Members yielded to righteousness.
g | Unto holiness.
B3 | 21, 22. Freedom from sin.
h | Fruit—shame.
i | End—death.
j | Freed from sin.
j | Servants unto God.
h | Fruit—holiness.
i | End—life.
A | 23. | a | Wages—death (law).
b | Gift—life (grace).

There is so much teaching in the small compass of these few verses, that unless we follow some definite plan our space will be insufficient. The disposition of the subject-matter in the structure is a safe guide to our investigations, and we will therefore endeavour to open up the apostle's teaching under the several heads indicated above. The whole section is bounded by the distinction between law and grace:--

A | 15. | a | Not under law.
b | But under grace.
A | 23. | a | Wages—death (law).
b | Gift—life (grace).

What is stated by the apostle in verse 15 is brought to a logical conclusion in verse 23 by a reference to the ends of the two systems. In the intervening verses (16-22) the subject is reasoned out with particular reference to the nature of service.

It should be noted that there is no article before the word "law" in the original; it simply reads "Not under law".

Generally speaking, ho nomos ("the law") indicates the law of Moses: while nomos ("law") indicates legalism of any kind. Rom. vi. confines itself to "law" without the article, which, while including the law of Moses, embraces law of any and every kind.

There are some who would limit the reference here to the ceremonial law, but who would imagine that exemption from ceremonials could lead to continuing in sin? The objection shows that the moral law is in view, for freedom from law of this kind may seem at first to open the door of licence. At this point of the argument the apostle is not concerned to hedge his teaching about; he is dealing primarily with the absolute emancipation of the believer from legalism in every form. When we reach the practical section (chapters xiii. and xiv.), we shall find that there he has no hesitation in speaking of the emancipated believer as fulfilling the law (xiii. 8, 9). But here the doctrine he seeks to establish is too crucial to permit of side issues, even though they affect the very foundations of moral living.

The great truth here made known is that the believer is not under law as a covenant of works. There were "believers" even during the legal dispensation, but though "in the law" they were not "of it". It is not the teaching of the apostle that the believer is not under law because the law cannot sanctify—that would merely lead to condemnation, rather than emancipation. The wonderful truth is that we are not under law because Christ died for us, and we have died with Him to the whole of law's dominion. We are under grace.

To be under grace, however, is not to be "lawless". Grace has dealt with our sins, but not at the expense of righteousness. "Grace reigns through righteousness" (Rom. v. 21). Grace has made us nigh, but it is "by the blood of Christ". We are forgiven, but we are also justified, and no part of the law of Moses that is a transcript of the immutable truth of God can be broken simply because the one who breaks it is now "saved". The whole point is that by the death of Christ the law is entirely set aside as a means of justification, of sanctification or of life:--

> "If righteousness came by the law, then Christ is dead in vain" (Gal. ii. 22).
> "If there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law" (Gal. iii. 21).

Just as no one can continue in sin that grace may abound, for being under grace indicates that one has died to sin (Rom. vi. 1, 2), so no one can continue under law when once they have been set free, because in Christ they have died to the law (Gal. ii. 19).

In the opening verse (vi. 15), the two great systems of "law" and "grace" are spoken of. The reader could, no doubt, easily compile a double list of things that come under the two headings. Some of them will be found in the argument of verses 16-22; but the balancing member of the structure (verse 23) gives the most important point of the whole of the apostle's argument—"life" and "death" (see Rom. vi. 2).

As we see from the structure "law" is associated with "wages". The word "wages" indicates that something has been "earned", and this is entirely outside the sphere of grace. To leave the reader without any doubt on this point we will quote the apostle's own definition of grace from this same epistle:--

The word translated "wages" is opsonion, and is derived from opsarion which originally meant anything that is eaten with bread, and then, in particular, fish (Numb. xi. 22; John vi. 9, 11; xxi. 9, 10, 13). We must, however, be careful not to limit ourselves to etymology. Take, for instance, the word "pecuniary". If a commentator in English literature followed the idea of arriving at the truth by etymology alone, we should get some strange results. "Pecuniary" to-day signifies anything relating to or consisting of money. Yet it comes from the Latin pecus, meaning "cattle". While, therefore, it is interesting to know that bartering by means of cattle has left its mark, when bartering itself has practically ceased, it would be quite false to intrude the idea of cattle into the present-day meaning of the word "pecuniary". So with the related words "bank", "finance", and "cash"; these have ceased to have any real connection with "a table", "finish" or "case".

To return to the word "wages". It originally meant food of some kind, and then, because the Roman soldiers received some of their wages in the form of food, it lost its primary meaning and took on the meaning of wages. Josephus uses the word in his Antiquities:--

> "He gave order, that when they paid the soldiers their wages, they should lay down twenty drachmæ for every one of the slaves" (Ant. xii. ii. 3).

Opsonion is also included in the list of words that the recently discovered papyrus of Egypt has illuminated.

The "wages" of sin (sin is personified here, and throughout the argument, as the master) is death. That is the "end" and "fruit" of sin. In contrast with these "wages" is the "grace gift" (charisma) of God (cf. "free gift", Rom. v. 15, 16).

In a sense, the apostle has but developed in the argument of Rom. vi. what is latent in Rom. v. 21:--

> "That as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto aionion life by Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. v. 21).

In the first clause—"That as sin hath reigned unto death"—we get the close association of sin and death that is expressed in the words of Rom. vi., "The wages of sin is death". Also the use of the word "reign" covers the references to "dominion" in the argument of chapter vi.:--

> "Even so might grace reign through righteousness unto aionion life by Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. v. 21).

This second clause shews that grace, though free from law, is allied to righteousness and leads to life.

We must now devote attention to the intervening argument of verses 16-22, and this we reserve for another article.

#48. "Servants to righteousness unto holiness" (vi. 15-23).
pp. 141 - 144

We have considered the opening and closing members of the structure of Rom. vi. 15-23, and now turn our attention to the apostle's argument contained in verses 16-22. This argument is divided into three parts by the word "Freedom".

(1) Freedom from sin (16-18).—Argument as to the nature of service, expressed in the word "obey".

(2) Freedom from righteousness (19, 20).—The double use of this idea of freedom suggests two spheres of service which are here elaborated.

(3) Freedom from sin (21, 22).—This brings us back once more to the opening argument, but concentrates the attention this time on the "end" and "fruit" rather than upon the nature of such service.

We must allow these divisions to guide us in the exposition of the argument. And first, we come to verse 16:-- > "Know ye not, that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey; whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness" (Rom. vi. 16).

Under the heading of "Freedom from sin" we find an emphasis upon "service". Is service incompatible with freedom? Galatians supplies an answer:--

> "Brethren, ye are called unto LIBERTY: Only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love SERVE one another" (Gal. v. 13).

The fact is that man is never without a master; he is never in that sense "free". Just as in the case of the manumission of a slave, there was the exchange of one master for another, so the believer, redeemed from the bondage of sin, is, nevertheless, reminded that he is not his own, but has been "bought with a price". Israel in Egypt "served with rigour", but their deliverance did not exempt them from service; it merely change their master:--

> "Let My people go, that they may serve Me" (Exod. viii. 1).

The apostle brushes aside all arguments that might be put forward to excuse sin in the believer, and goes straight to the point—"His servants ye are to whom ye obey." Service is decided by obedience. It matters not how much one may profess. "Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin" (John viii. 34). Peter, in his second epistle, writes:--

> "While they promise them liberty, they themselves are the servants of corruption; for of whom a man is overcome, of the same is he brought in bondage" (II Pet. ii. 19).

If we follow the marginal rendering of Rom. vi. 17, we find obedience stressed as the evidence of the new life and service:--

> "But God be thanked, that ye were the servants of sin, but ye have obeyed from the heart that mould of doctrine whereunto ye were delivered."

Service is shewn by obedience; and so the apostle thanks God for this evidence that these believers had been redeemed and had known a change of master: "They obeyed from the heart." Strictly speaking there can be no obedience that is not willing and from the heart:--

> "The pretence of love without obedience is hypocrisy, and obedience without love is real slavery."

The obedience that marks the believer is, moreover, an obedience from the heart to "that mould of doctrine whereunto they were delivered". The word tupos, which becomes in English the word type, is translated "ensample", "example", "fashion", "figure", "form", "manner", "pattern" and "print". Josephus, speaking of the Essenes, says that, taking children of tender age, "they would model or mould them (entupousi) according to their own manners" (Wars. ii. 8, 2). The believer has, as it were, been run into a mould, and the original of that mould is not far to seek, for in Rom. viii. 29 it is revealed that every predestinated, called and justified believer is to be "conformed to the image of His Son".

Science uses the expression "conformity to type", and the expression represents scriptural truth. "Sanctification" and "sin" are nothing more than "conformity to type". There are two "types" in the epistle to the Romans, Adam and Christ (Rom. v. 14). Adam stand for sin, and Christ stands for righteousness. Obedience to either as master, and conformity to either as type are parallel terms. In Rom. xii. practical sanctification is expressed by "presenting the body" (the word "present" is the same as that translated "yield" in Rom. vi.), and by not being "conformed to this world". The word in the last expression is not summorphos as in Rom. viii. 29, but suschematizo which suggests the "fashion" rather than the "type".

Obedience, then, lies at the root of practical sanctification. First of all, the apostle impresses us with the fact that it must be "the obedience of faith" (Rom. i. 5). For this the apostle received "grace and apostleship", so that this term rightly understood must represent all that the glorious message of Romans stands for. The association of this obedience with faith and the gospel is seen in Rom. x. 16:--

> "But they have not all obeyed the gospel: for Esaias saith, Lord, who hath believed our report?"

The two great moulds or types are Adam and Christ, and so in Rom. v. 19 we read:--

> "For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous."

Obedience reveals the master and the mould.

In the earlier section of Rom. vi. we read:--

> "Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof" (vi. 12).

Obedience, therefore, is the outward sign of a dominion, its mainspring is desire (lust), and its medium the members of the mortal body. This is true whether we speak of sin or of sanctification. If we are under the dominion of sin, we shall show it; and if we are under the dominion of grace, we shall show it: "His servants ye are to whom ye obey" (Rom. vi. 16).

The word translated "lust" really means "desire". There are "worldly desires" (Titus ii. 12), "ungodly desires" (Jude 18) and "fleshly desires" (I Pet. ii. 11); but there are also commendable desires as in Matt. xiii. 17, Luke xxii. 15, I Tim. iii. 1, Heb. vi. 11, I Pet. i. 12. If it is true that "the flesh lusteth against the spirit", let it not be forgotten that "the spirit lusteth against the flesh, and these are contrary the one to the other" (Gal. v. 17). Without desire, the hand falls limp, the feet grow slack, the pulse is sluggish, and when it can be said that "desire shall fail" (Eccles. xii. 5) the end of life and activity is near. Desire was the active agent in the garden of Eden (Gen. iii. 6), but desire is not necessarily absent from the realm of the spirit and holiness.

Moreover, there is no coercion in either sphere:--

> "Neither YIELD ye your members . . . . . unto sin, but YIELD yourselves unto God . . . . . to whom ye YIELD yourselves servants to obey . . . . . as ye have YIELDED your members servants to uncleanness . . . . . even so now YIELD your members servants to righteousness" (Rom. vi. 13-19).

Man was not forced to disobey God in the beginning, neither is he forced to obey Him now. The introduction of coercion or compulsion into the realm of either sin or sanctification would rob both of their moral character, and the whole scheme of redemption would become unreal and meaningless. In Rom. xii., where this thought of yielding the body to God is again uppermost, the apostle calls it our "reasonable" or "logical" service:--

> "Even now yield your members servants to righteousness unto holiness" (Rom. vi. 19).

The above sentence seems to sum up the main contention of the apostle in this section. The phrase "righteousness unto holiness" seems to link up Rom. i. - v. 11 (whose theme is justification) with Rom. v. 12 - viii. (whose theme is sanctification). It is a wonderful thought that the very members of our mortal body which once were yielded as servants to sin may be as readily and really yielded as servants to righteousness. This is "unto holiness" and is indeed "practical sanctification".

Finally, the Lord has said in more than one connection that "by their fruits ye shall know them". Looking back to the days before salvation, we view our deeds then with nothing but shame, and we learn, moreover, that their end is death. Shame and death belong to Eden and the fall, for we are still dealing with the two types or heads, Adam and Christ. But now, says the apostle, being made free from sin and becoming servants to God, the fruit is unto holiness, and the end, life, life aionion.

Such is a summary of the apostle's argument concerning the dominion of law, as put to the Gentile believer. The Jewish believer, however, had many more problems and scruples, and to meet these, the apostle writes the second section, Rom. vii. 1-6. To this we must devote a separate article.

#49. Death ends the dominion of law (vii. 1-6).
pp. 186 - 189

Although we pass from Rom. vi. to Rom. vii., we do not commence a new subject. The question which the apostle answers is raised in Rom. vi. 15:--

> "What then? shall we sin because we are not under law but under grace."

He divides his answer into two parts, to suit his two classes of hearers. He first deals with the question with respect to all men. Here the case of the Gentile is dealt with, and the figure of the slave is used. The second part of the apostle's answer, which is now before us, is addressed particularly to the Jewish believer, and has reference to the very great and serious objection that every Jew had to giving up the law of Moses, which had been given with such solemnity at Sinai.

> "Brethren", says the apostle in effect, "Your objection would be quite valid if my gospel meant nothing more than a change of opinion or of creed. You would have every right to resist even unto death any attempt to tamper with your allegiance to the holy law of God. I quite agree that the law given at Sinai is in the nature of a marriage covenant in the light of adultery. You are in all this quite right—only you have omitted the vital feature of my gospel that alters the whole state of affairs. I readily admit that the law has dominion over a man as long as he lives, or, to continue the analogy of marriage, that a woman who is married is bound by the law to her husband as long as he lives. Should she leave him during his lifetime and marry another she is rightly called an adulteress. So far we are in agreement. But my gospel is nothing if it is not a message that the believer is dead to sin (and so dead to its dominion) and also dead to law (and so dead to its dominion). You will agree that, should the husband die, the woman is at once loosed from the law of her husband, and should she marry again, her action is perfectly legitimate and honourable. That, brethren, is the real fact of the case.

Every one that believes the gospel of God concerning His Son is reckoned to have died with him, and death breaks all the bonds of law. The new husband, who represents Christ, and the new marriage, which represents union with Him, is on an entirely new plane, that of resurrection—'even to Him Who was raised from the dead'. The issue of that new marriage is entirely new and acceptable to God. Instead of bringing forth 'fruit unto death' as you did while under the law (here in Rom. vii. 5 the apostle establishes a link with the earlier argument of Rom. vi. 21, 22), you now bring forth 'fruit unto God'. This then is the true state of affairs; and the objection that obedience to the gospel involves spiritual adultery is without foundation."

With this paraphrase in mind, let us obtain a view of the section as a whole:--

Romans vii. 1-6.

A | 1. Know ye not, brethren.
B | 2-3. "Loosed (katergetai) from the law of her husband" (2).
a1 | Woman bound by law of her husband.
b1 | So long as he liveth.
b1 | If husband be dead.
a1 | Woman loosed from the law of her husband.
b2 | If husband liveth.
a2 | She shall be called an adulteress.
b2 | If husband be dead.
a2 | She is no adulteress.
A | 4. Wherefore, my brethren.
B | 4-6. "Delivered (katergethemen) from the law" (6).
c | Ye also are dead to the law.
d | Married to Him Who is raised from dead.
e | Fruit unto God.
e | Fruit unto death.
c | Having died to that wherein we were held.
d | Serve in newness in spirit.

The first point that demands attention is the recurrence of the word katargeo, translated "loosed" in vii. 2, "delivered" in vii. 6, and "destroyed" in vi. 6. This word should not be translated "free", a rendering that should be reserved for the verb eleutheroo, which is found in Rom. vii. 3: "She is free from that law." Eleutheroo also occurs in Rom. vi. 18 and 22: "Free from sin."

The lesson here is important, and we earnestly ask the reader's attention. In both chapter vi. and chapter vii., we have katargeo followed by eleutheroo. In Rom. viii. 21-23 we get some light on the connection between these two words:--

> "Because the creature itself also shall be delivered (eleutheroo) from the bondage of corruption . . . . . the redemption of our body."

The point is that freedom presupposes the nullifying of whatever caused the initial bondage. In Rom. vi., before the apostle uses the word free in verses 18-22—"free from sin"—he uses in verse 6 the word which means to "destroy", nullify", render "inoperative". The cross of Christ "rendered sin inoperative"; the bonds were broken, the fetters snapped, the dominion overthrown:--

> "Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with Him, that the body of sin might be rendered inoperative, that henceforth we should not serve sin . . . . . we died . . . . . we shall live . . . . . being made free from sin, ye became servants of righteousness" (Rom. vi. 6-18).

In chapter vii. the cross is not in view, neither does it speak of crucifixion with Him. In the matter of sin and its dominion it is the cross that is prominent; but with regard to the law and its dominion we read, "We are become dead to the law by the body of Christ".

In Rom. viii. it is neither the cross of Christ as in Rom. vi., nor the death of Christ as in Rom. vii., but:-- > "If the spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by His spirit that dwelleth in you . . . . . ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear . . . . . the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the freedom of the glory of the children of God" (Rom. viii. 11-21).

While there is this progress to be noted, we must not, on the other hand, fail to notice that resurrection is prominent in each of the three chapters (vi., vii., viii.). The crucifixion of the old man nullifies the power of the body of sin, but the positive power for the emancipated believer is "newness of life". We are not only to reckon ourselves dead to sin, but also alive unto God (Rom. vi. 11). This double reckoning is vital. We too often meet with those who continually "reckon" themselves dead, but forget to "reckon" themselves also alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord. Resurrection follows the nullifying of the dominion of law in Rom. vii.; the death of the husband is followed by a union with "Him Who is raised from the dead". The new conditions can be expressed in Rom. vi. by the word "newness of life"; and in Rom. vii. by the words "newness of spirit".

We must now turn our attention to Rom. vii. 6, which is the doctrinal sequel to the analogy that has occupied the earlier verses. We give the R.V. of the verse:--

> "But now we have been discharged from the law, having died to that wherein we were holden: so that we serve in newness of spirit, and not in oldness of letter."

The change from the A.V. which reads: "That being dead wherein we were held", is important. The complete fact, however, is only realized if we remember that both versions present the truth. If the law dies to me, I am dead to it. If a woman's husband dies, she, as a wife, dies at the same moment. There is only one way in which the sinner can be discharged and delivered from the law. He cannot escape it by his prayers or his promises. He is utterly unable to keep it. There is but one way of escape. He must die to it. The law ceases to have any jurisdiction the moment a man is dead. But this in itself is cold comfort. To escape from the further dominion of the law by being executed is not "good news". The apostle has something more to say than that:--

> "Wherefore, my brethren, ye also are become dead to the law BY THE BODY OF CHRIST" (Rom. vii. 4).

Herein is the power of the gospel. Sin and law have issued in death, and their dominion has thereby been nullified. The believer has died in the death of Christ. And he can say: "I have been crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live." Because he has been united with the risen life of Christ as well as with His death, he can contemplate with some measure of hope and assurance the possibility of newness of life and service, and fruit unto God:--

> "Nevertheless, I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, Who loved me, and gave Himself for me" (Gal. ii. 20).

We have now considered two out of the four questions propounded by the apostle. The concluding pair occupy the rest of chapter vii., and must be considered separately.

#50. Light on the relation of law and sin (vii. 7-12).
pp. 230 - 235

In the foregoing argument (Rom. vii. 1-6) the apostle has dealt with that aspect of the dominion of the law, and deliverance from it by death, that met the peculiar susceptibilities and problems of those of the circumcision. There is, however, one essential difference between deliverance from the dominion of sin (Rom. vi. 1-14) and deliverance from the dominion of law. Deliverance from sin and death is expressed in the words of Rom. vi.:--

> "That like as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life . . . . . that henceforth we should not serve sin" (Rom. vi. 4-6).

We see here that newness of life and the service of sin are incompatible. Deliverance from the dominion of law just as surely necessitates union with the risen Christ:--

> "Wherefore my brethren, ye also are become dead to the law by the body of Christ . . . . . now, being delivered from the law, having died to that wherein we were held: that we should serve in newness of spirit, and not in oldness of the letter" (Rom. vii. 4-6).

This is, however, a vital difference. So far as sin is concerned, no service of any kind is to be recognized. So far as the law is concerned, it is true that service connected with the letter that killeth is for ever abolished. But since the law, unlike sin, is "holy and just and good", those who are no longer under its condemnation, and who no longer look to it as a means of justification or sanctification, can nevertheless serve in the spirit of that holy law, even though free from its dominion. This we shall se definitely stated in Rom. vii. 4.

We might perhaps be pardoned for thinking that the way is now cleared for the theme of Rom. v. to be continued, and for the triumphant notes of Rom. viii. to sound out. But it is not so. The apostle has been incisive regarding the utter failure of the flesh to find in the law anything but condemnation and death; and he has not hesitated to link the dominion of sin with the dominion of law, and to show that a common deliverance was necessary from both. At this point some further explanation is necessary before the apostle can conscientiously pass on to the triumphs of Rom. viii. There was the possibility that, just as some might misunderstand the fullness of grace and think that it excused sin, so some might think that the holiness of God was compromised, and that the law by its inability to save or sanctify was at fault. This possible mistake the apostle now seeks to rectify, and he does so by continuing the method of hypothetical questioning: "What shall we say then? Is the law sin?" (Rom. vii. 7). He repudiates the idea immediately, and then by a series of arguments leads to the conclusion: "Wherefore the law is holy" (Rom. vii. 12). The explanation which leads up to this conclusion deals particularly with one of the great offices of law in its relation to sin. This particular office of the law has already been emphasized in the sphere of justification: it must now be restated in the sphere of sanctification:--

> "Therefore by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in His sight; for by the law is the knowledge of sin" (Rom. iii. 20).

Further, the provoking effect of the law has already been expressed in Rom. iv. 15: "The law worketh wrath: for where no law is there is no transgression." A glance at the context will show the purpose of this statement. The argument of Rom. iv. is that the promise is by grace, and that the law was not given to implement the promise, but to reveal the utter need of the grace of God, so that the promise should be sure. If we could conceive of a time when there was absolutely no law, then at that time there would have been absolutely no transgression. There has always, however, been some law of God, as Rom. ii. makes clear, and the fuller the law the greater the transgression. The teaching of Rom. vii., however, goes deeper than "transgression"; it uncovers unsuspected and dormant sin. The link between the two aspects of truth—one presented in Rom. iv. 15, and the other in Rom. vii. 7-25—is found in Rom. v. 14:--

> "Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression" (Rom. v. 14).

This passage does not state that "death reigned even over them that had not sinned", for that would be a monstrous injustice. It speaks of a period and of an aspect—the period "from Adam to Moses" before the giving of the law from Sinai; and that character of sin that was not "after the similitude of Adam's transgression". It does not speak of exemption from guilt, but of the degree of guilt. All have sinned; but not all have sinned as Adam did, by transgressing a positive and revealed command. It is the relation of this "law" and the more explicit "command", to "indwelling sin" and manifest transgression" that forms part of the argument of the section now before us. The structure shows that the argument is conducted to its conclusion by a series of five couplets:--

Romans vii. 7-12.

A | 7. QUESTION.—Is the law sin?
B | 7-11. ARGUMENT.—
a | I had not known sin, but by the law.
I had not known lust except . . . . . not covet.
b | Sin, taking occasion by the commandment,
Wrought in me all manner of concupiscence.
c | Without law, sin was dead.
Without law, I was alive.
a | Commandment came, sin revived, and I died.
Commandment ordained to life, found unto death.
b | Sin, taking occasion by the commandment,
Deceived me, and by it slew me.
A | 12. ANSWER: Wherefore the law is holy.

It will be seen that the chief feature of the argument is the statement that "sin took occasion" by the commandment. If this be so, the law could still remain holy, just and good, even though by its abuse it became the instrument of death.

The first phase of the apostle's argument is that the law illuminates the nature of sin:--

> "I had not known (realized, known as such) sin, but by the law; for (to give a concrete example) I should not have perceived lust, except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet" (Rom. vii. 7).

The apostle does not say, "I had not committed any sin", but "Without the law I had not realized sin; nor that specific transgression 'lust', had the law not forbidden coveting". Sin is here the genus, lust the species.

The next step in the argument is to show the way in which sin took occasion by the commandment. The word "occasion" is aphorme, composed of apo, away, and hormao, to set in motion, urge, spur on, rush. It is used to describe a "base of operations" as in war; and also has the meaning "the means of war" as money, men, ships, etc. Sin, then, is here depicted as using the prohibition of the law as a "base of operations" and "a means of war". Just as the human heart can turn the grace of God into lasciviousness, so it can use the very prohibition to stir up intense desire. We have only to read Gen. iii. to see the truth of this demonstrated:--

> "Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden?" (Gen. iii. 1).
> "When the woman saw . . . a tree to be desired . . . she took of the fruit" (Gen. iii. 6).

> "A most striking and melancholy example in point is that prohibition and penalty were not sufficient, even in paradise, to prevent our first parents from ruining themselves and all their posterity" (Moses Stuart).

Sin, that took occasion by the commandment, is said by the apostle to have "wrought" in him all manner of concupiscence. The word "wrought" is katergazomai; and the connection of this part of the argument with that which is developed in Rom. vii. 13-25 is blurred by the fact that the word is not consistently translated in the A.V. We must defer comment upon this connection until we are actually dealing with the closing section, but we give all the references here, so that the reader may realize the far-reaching nature of this "working":--

"But sin, taking occasion by the commandment, worked in me all manner of desire" (Rom. vii. 8).
"Sin, that it might appear sin, working death in me by that which is good" (Rom. vii. 13).
"For what I work, I know not" (Rom. vii. 15).
"It is no longer I that work, but sin that dwelleth in me" (Rom. vii. 17).
"To will is present with me, but to work that which is good I find not" (Rom. vii. 20).
"I no longer work it, but sin that dwelleth in me" (Rom. vii. 20).

We learn from I Cor. xv. 56 that the strength of sin is the law. So the apostle proceeds:--

"For without the law, sin was dead" (Rom. vii. 8).
"For I was alive without the law once" (Rom. vii. 9).

It is evident that these statements are relative. Just as we must read verse 7 relatively, so here. For even had the law never been given from Sinai, the Jews would still have had the law of nature and of conscience (Rom. ii. 14, 15). But they would never have known sin as they did know it, except by the law. The apostle's meaning can be clearly seen by referring back to a parallel passage, Rom. v. 20: "The law entered, that sin might abound." It is the *un*abounding state of sin that is intended by the apostle in Rom. vii. 8, 9.

We now return to the opening argument. The structure places verse 7 in correspondence with verses 9 and 10. What does the apostle mean by the words "When the commandment came?" All his life, as a Pharisee, he had known the law of God. Over and over again he had repeated the ten commandments. We have it from his own pen that, "touching the righteousness which is in the law", he was "blameless" (Phil. iii. 6).

But the commandment "Thou shalt not covet" (or, "Thou shalt dot desire") goes deeper than the external act. In so far as the Pharisee considered only external conformity with the law, he felt fairly satisfied with himself, but when the fact broke in upon his conscience that the law also had to do with "desires" before they had become manifest as "deeds", the spirituality of the law and the carnality of the person became intensely evident. The command at last "came" as never before, "sin revived" and, the apostle says, "I died". All his boasted righteousness was found to be vanity. The commandment which, if obeyed, would have led to life, he now found to be too searching and deep—it led but to death. No man living could ever hope from such a law anything but condemnation. Sin not only deceived him, as it had deceived his first parents, but it slew him, as it had them.

The apostle now reverts to the question, “Is the law sin?” His answer is, No; and his reasoning is as follows.

While it is perfectly true that the believer must die to the law, even as he must die to sin if he is to possess life and liberty and sanctification, it must be most clearly understood that there is no other relation between sin and law, except that through the flesh both tend to death. The apostle had insisted upon the necessity of deliverance from law, not because it was evil, but because it could not produce holiness in man. What it did produce was an intensified knowledge of sin and of inward corruption.

The prohibitions of the law were for the protection and blessing of man, but he needed something more than prohibition and penalty. What the law actually did was to stir up the latent rebellion that lies dormant in every heart. But this, while it for ever sets aside the law as a possible means of life and holiness, in no sense reflects upon the holiness of the law itself:--

> “Wherefore the law is holy, and the commandment (i.e. the one under discussion) holy, and just, and good” (Rom. vii. 12).

Darwinian Theory a “Dream”.

Lesson of the Microscope

p. 20

“The Missing Link problem and the theory of man’s evolution from the ape stage were criticized in a paper read last night to the Victoria Institute, London, by Dr. Albert Fleischmann, Professor of Zoology and Comparative Anatomy in the University of Erlangen (Bavaria).

Darwin, he said, would have abandoned his dream of a single great genealogical tree for all species of animals, if he had lived to see the later advances in animal anatomy.

Darwin’s theory had not been confirmed by the discoveries of anatomical research, yet evolutionists still search for ‘ancestors’ in the graveyards of the past, and arranged fossil fragments—leg bones, teeth or skulls—of various extinct species of horse into the hypothetical series” (The News Chronicle, 23rd May, 1933).

The Chester Beatty Papyri.
pp. 79, 80

Until recently the oldest manuscripts of either the N.T. or the O.T. that were known were those written on vellum—a material that superseded the use of papyrus in the fourth century A.D. There has just come to light, however, a group of Greek manuscripts written upon papyrus, and known as the Chester Beatty Papyri, which are more ancient than any yet discovered. The collection comprises 44 leaves of Genesis and potions of other parts of the Law and the Prophets, the Gospels, Acts, epistles of Paul, and the book of the Revelation. One apocryphal work is included, namely, the book of Enoch. Among other items that can be appreciated by the non-expert is the fact that the four Gospels, together as a unit, and distinguished from the many apocryphal Gospels, are proved to have been already in use, and that the epistle to the Hebrews was included among the epistles of Paul.

The most important question that is raised in connection with a "find" like this is, How does the text of these papyri compare with that in use to-day? It is reassuring to learn that no doctrine of the N.T. is altered in the slightest by any new reading, and the evidence that we have substantially the text of the originals grows with every discovery.

In our articles entitled "The Volume of the Book" we discuss the pre-eminence given by Westcott and Hort to the Vatican MSS, and give evidence that the Revisers were not justified in setting aside the voice of antiquity or for giving unwarranted weight to manuscripts that accorded with the theory of Westcott and Hort. This theory, namely, that the Vaticanus and the Sinaiticus give us what Westcott and Hort called the Neutral text, is by no means substantiated by these earlier manuscripts. This is not the place to discuss the matter of the text, but we do suggest that readers would be wise, when using the R.V., to be on their guard when alterations, additions or subtractions of the Greek text are made or suggested. Sir Frederick Kenyon, G.B.E., K.C.B., says:--

> "All in all, the Chester Beatty papyri make the most important contribution to the textual criticism of the Greek Bible since the discovery of the Codex Sinaiticus, now nearly ninety years ago" (John O' London's Weekly, 16th Sept., 1933).

“SHIP FLIES FLAG OF PALESTINE; FIRST FOR 2,000 YEARS.

SOUTHAMPTON, Thursday.

The trading schooner Emanuel, which arrived at Southampton to-day to discharge a grain cargo, comprises the entire mercantile marine of Palestine.

Every member of her crew is a Jew.

Purchased by her commander, Capt. A. Grevnow, in Denmark, nearly three months ago, the Emanuel will engage in coastwise trade in Palestine.

Capt. Grevnow said to-day: ‘It is the first time for two thousand years that a vessel with an all-Jewish crew and flying the Palestine flag has sailed the seas’.”

#9. The sovereignty of God.
"Be still, and know that I am God" (Psa. xlvi. 10).
pp. 55 - 59

When God said, "Let Us make man in Our image, after Our likeness", He did not add: "and let them be immortal, be holy, be omniscient", but said: "and let them have dominion". It is this special feature that excites the wonder of the Psalmist, when he says:--

> "What is man, that Thou art mindful of him? . . . . . Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of Thy hands" (Psa. viii. 4-6).

There are six Hebrew words that denote "dominion":--

(1) Radah.—To tread down, to domineer.
(2) Mashal.—To rule, reign, govern.
(3) Baal.—To have authority as lord or proprietor.
(4) Yad.—Literally "The hand".
(5) Mishtar.—A magistrate or overseer. The English "Master".
(6) Shalat.—Act as Sultan. Overpower.

Of these, radah and mashal are of most frequent occurrence, and bear most upon our theme. Radah in its primitive sense means "to tread", and is most translated by "rule" and "have dominion". This is the word used in Gen. i. 26. Mashal also means "to rule" and "to have dominion", but with the added sense of "reigning". This is the word used in Psa. viii. 6, thereby linking the two conceptions together. The two examples that follow use the word Mashal:--

> "The Lord hath prepared His throne in the heavens; and His Kingdom ruleth over all" (Psa. ciii. 19).
> "Thine, O Lord, is the greatness, and the power, and the glory, and the victory, and the majesty: for all that is in the heaven and the earth is Thine; Thine is the Kingdom, O Lord, and Thou art exalted as Head above all. Both riches and honour come of Thee, and Thou reignest over all; and in Thy hand is power and might; and in Thine hand it is to make great, and to give strength unto all" (I Chron. xxix. 11, 12).

Let us learn from these two passages something of the sovereignty of God. First we observe that it is used in connection with the preparation of his "throne" where He must be regarded as King. The Scriptures abound with reference to the Lord as King:--

> "The King of glory" (Psa. xxiv. 7).
>
> "A great King over all the earth" (Psa. xlvii. 2, 7).
>
> "The Lord's throne is in heaven" (Psa. xi. 4).
>
> "Thus saith the Lord, The heaven is My throne, and the earth is My footstool: where is the house that ye build unto Me? and where is the place of My rest?" (Isa. lxvi. 1).

The fact that the throne of God is heaven adds to the idea of His sovereignty:--

> "For as the heaven is high above the earth, so great is His mercy toward them that fear Him" (Psa. ciii. 11).
>
> "He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh, the Lord shall have them in derision" (Psa. ii. 4).

Nebuchadnezzar had to be taught a drastic lesson in order that he might learn that "the heavens do rule" (Dan. iv. 26), which is interpreted in the same chapter as:--

> "Till thou know that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever He will" (Dan. iv. 25).
>
> "And at the end of the days I Nebuchadnezzar lifted up mine eyes unto heaven, and mine understanding returned unto me, and I blessed the Most High, and I praised and honoured Him that liveth for ever and ever, Whose dominion is an everlasting dominion, and His kingdom is from generation to generation; and all the inhabitants of the earth are reputed as nothing: and He doeth according to His will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay His hand, or say unto Him, What doest Thou?" (Dan. iv. 34, 35).
>
> "The Lord of Hosts hath sworn, saying, Surely as I have thought, so shall it come to pass: and as I have purposed, so shall it stand" (Isa. xiv. 24).

Here we have sovereignty, His pleasure, His will, His counsel, His purpose, His thoughts, all shall stand, all be accomplished.

The sovereignty of God is seen in the irresistible character of His actions.— Nebuchadnezzar, the autocratic King and head of gold, learned at last to confess that "none can stay His hand". Elihu testified of God that > "When He giveth quietness, who then can make trouble? and when He hideth His face, who then can behold Him?" (Job xxxiv. 29).

And Job at last confessed:--

> "I know that thou canst do everything, and that no thought of Thine can be hindered" (Job xlii. 2).
>
> "Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing? . . . . . He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh . . . . . Yet have I set My King upon My holy hill of Zion" (Psa. ii. 1-6).

The sovereignty of God is seen in His unaccountability to any of His creatures.

> "None can . . . . . say . . . . . What doest Thou?" (Dan. iv. 35).
>
> "Why dost thou strive against Him? for He giveth not account of any of His matters" (Job xxxiii. 13).
>
> "Where the word of a king is, there is power; and who may say unto him, What doest thou?" (Eccles. viii. 4).
>
> "Is it fit to say to a king, Thou art wicked? and to princes, Ye are ungodly? How much less to Him that accepteth not the persons of princes, nor regardeth the rich more than the poor? for they are all the work of His hands" (Job xxxiv. 18, 19).

Coupled with this testimony to the Lord's sovereignty is that contained in Psa. cxv. 3:--

> "But our God is in the heavens: He hath done whatsoever He hath pleased."

Look at the elements of sovereignty that have been brought before us in these passages of Scripture.

The sovereignty of God is seen in the irresistible character of His will:--

> "He hath done whatsoever He hath pleased" (Psa. cxv. 3).
> "He doeth according to His will" (Dan. iv. 35).

These but herald a number of references that declare most emphatically that the purpose of the Lord must be accomplished:--

> "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all My pleasure" (Isa. xlvi. 10).
> "He spoke, and it was done; He commanded, and it stood fast" (Psa. xxxiii. 9).
> "Woe unto him that striveth with his Maker! Let the potsherd strive with the potsherds of the earth. Shall the clay say to Him that fashioned it, What makest Thou? or Thy work, He hath no hands?" (Isa. xlv. 9).
> "What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid. For He saith to Moses, I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion. So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy. For the Scripture saith unto Pharaoh, even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might show My power in thee, and that My name might be declared throughout all the earth. Therefore hath He mercy on Whom He will have mercy, and whom He will He hardeneth. Thou wilt say then unto me, Why doth He yet find fault? For who hath resisted His will?" (Rom. ix. 14-19).

Few commentators can resist the temptation to embark upon some attempt to justify God in the matter of Pharaoh. Appeal is made to the fact that Pharaoh hardened his own heart, or to the idea that Pharaoh is yet to be saved and blessed. If any living man could have thus reasoned, surely it was the apostle Paul himself. He did not put out his hand, however, to stay the ark of God. To all such attempts, whatever they may be, and by whatever spirit they may be prompted, or with whatever doctrine they may be associated, the apostle has but one reply, "Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God?" (Rom. ix. 20). If God is sovereign, He cannot be brought to account by any creature. True, absolute dominion in the hands of any but the Lord God would be terrible to contemplate. But God is holy, righteous, good, true and wise, and it is for us so to believe these revealed facts concerning Himself as gladly to recognize His sovereignty in all things.

In an earlier paper we spoke of the name Elohim as being derived from the making of an oath. The oath sworn by God, that is the goal of the ages, is one that suggests that Satanic sin challenged His sovereignty, a fact that we gather from several passages of Scripture:--

"I have sworn by Myself, the Word is gone out of My mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, That unto Me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear" (Isa. xlv. 23).

"Wherefore God also hath highly exalted Him, and given Him the name which is above every name; that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. ii. 9-11).

The Lord is Sovereign. "This God is our God."

#10. The righteousness of God.
pp. 86 - 89

We have learned that God is sovereign and unaccountable to any for His actions. Unless we were also assured from His Word that He is wise, holy, righteous and kind, such absolute sovereignty would be terrible to contemplate. God, the Sovereign Ruler of all, though unaccountable to any creature, is so right and true in Himself, that it is revealed that there are some things that even He "cannot" do, though the highest archangel would not dare to say, "What doest Thou?" He "cannot lie" (Titus i. 2); He "cannot deny Himself" (II Tim. ii. 13); He "cannot look upon iniquity" (Hab. i. 13). It is impossible for God to be wrong, or to do wrong. "A God of truth, and without iniquity, just and right is He" (Deut. xxxii. 4*). He is "just and right".

Let us consider for a moment this fact and its implications—that God is righteous. We must first get some understanding of the terms used. "Right" in Deut. xxxii. 4 is the rendering of the Hebrew word yashar. This word is part of the name given to Israel in Deut. xxxii. 15, the name meaning, if the termination is a diminutive, "The little righteous people". We have also "the book of Jasher" (Josh. x. 13). This is probably more correctly rendered by the LXX (Complutensian Edition) Tou Bibliou Tou Euthous, "The right or correct book". It is further explained by Josephus as "The writings laid up in the Temple".

The primary meaning of yashar is "straight":--

"I will make the crooked places straight" (Isa. xlv. 2).

"The kine took the straight way . . . . . and turned not aside to the right hand or to the left" (I Sam. vi. 12).

Notice that yashar, "straight", is used in opposition to "crooked" and "turn aside". This is its essential meaning.

[NOTE: * - For the place of this verse in Deut. xxxii. the reader is referred to article #3 in the series "Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth" dealing with this great chapter.]

The word is many times translated “upright”; and from Eccles vii. 29 we learn that this is how God made man, his departure from the straight or upright way being sin. Other passages beside Deut. xxxii. ascribe uprightness to the Lord:--

> “Good and upright is the Lord” (Psa. xxv. 8).
> “To show that the Lord is upright: He is my Rock, and there is no unrighteousness in Him” (Psa. xcii. 15).
> “The way of the just is uprightness: Thou, Most Upright, dost weigh the path of the just” (Isa. xxvi. 7).

The symbol of this “rightness” and “straightness” is the plumb line. The symbol of “righteousness” is the balance and the weight:-- > “Judgment also will I lay to the line, and righteousness to the plummet” (Isa. xxviii. 17).

The word “plummet” is mishgeleth, from shagal “to weigh”, and shekel, a weight. Even the test of the perpendicular is really by “weight”, for the same force that operates in the process of weighing, operates on the plumb line.

The Scripture emphasize this aspect of truth, and help us to see that, primarily, righteousness or justice is something even, equal and balanced:-- > “Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, in meteyard, in weight, or in measure. Just balances, just weights, a just ephah, and a just hin shall ye have” (Lev. xix. 35, 36).

> “Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, a great and a small. Thou shalt not have in thine house divers measure, a great and a small. But thou shalt have a perfect and just weight, a perfect and just measure” (Deut. xxv. 13-15).

Here we have vividly brought before us the underlying meaning of tsadik, “righteousness”. It is something that when weighed in the balance is found accurate, just, correct. When, therefore, the Scriptures declare of God that “just and right is He”, we have the idea of unswerving uprightness, a state in which “crookedness” cannot exist, an idea of perfect equity, even balance, accurate weight. If God be like this, there can be no respect of persons with Him.

We should never forget, in thinking of the doctrine of justification as taught in the epistle to the Romans, that there is as much insistence upon the “justification” of God in His work of salvation, as there is upon the “justification” of the sinner who is saved:--

> “Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in His blood, to declare HIS RIGHTEOUSNESS for the passing over of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God; to declare, I say, at this time HIS RIGHTEOUSNESS; that HE MIGHT BE JUST, and the Justifier of him which believeth in Jesus” (Rom. iii. 25, 26).

To this same truth Isaiah bore testimony centuries before:--

> “There is no God else beside Me; a JUST God and a SAVIOUR” (Isa. xlv. 21).

Whether it be the throne of judgment, or the throne of grace, righteousness must be its basis:--

> "Righteousness and judgment are the establishment of His throne" (Psa. xcii. 2).
> "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever; a sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of Thy kingdom" (Heb. i. 8).
> "He hath appointed a day when He will judge the world in righteousness" (Acts xvii. 31).

When, therefore we think of God, we think of One Who is inflexibly just, uncompromisingly upright, unalterably "balanced". As Creator, as Judge, as Redeemer, He is right and He does right. "A God of truth, and without iniquity, just and right is He."

"This God is our God."

#11. The power of God (Psa. xlviii. 14).
pp. 123 - 126

The first recorded statement of Scripture speaks of power:--

> "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth."

While subsequent passages descant upon the wisdom and the goodness of God manifested in creation, the first note struck is simply that of power. The title of God by which He was known in the earliest days was "God Almighty", a title emphasizing His power. By this name He was known to Abraham (Exod. vi. 3) and to the Patriarchs. The Book of Job speaks of the Almighty 31 times, another testimony to the fact that the thought of power was early impressed upon the mind of man.

When the apostle speaks of the failure of the Gentile world and its rapid degeneration, he says:--

> "For the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made" (Rom. i. 20).

When he explains what these "invisible things" are, he refers to "His eternal power and Godhead" and states that as a result of this universal witness the heathen world was without excuse (Rom. i. 20).

> "God hath spoken once; twice have I heard this; that power belongeth unto God" (Psa. lxii. 11).

The margin draws the reader's attention to the fact that the word "power" here is "strength". This is not unimportant, as it throws light upon the nature of God's power. As used by man of men, power may mean nothing more than authority, and power and authority differ essentially. Many a conqueror has invaded a country simply because of superior strength, not because he had authority for his action; and many a person in whom authority was vested has been powerless to exercise it owing to the rise of rebellious forces. "Power", when used of God, indicates, in the first place, strength. While philosophy may speak of God's power as being absolute and assume that He might have done many things that He has not done, as for example, that He might have prevented the sin of angels, or the fall of man—the Scriptures speak of the power of God correlated with His will, or as it is sometimes called, His "ordinate power".

As an example of the two aspects of power, reference may be made to Matt. xxvi. 53, 54. The Father had "absolute power" to send twelve legions of angels, but, as the Saviour said, "How then shall the Scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be?" This is the "ordinate power" of God, that power which carries out His purposes and good pleasure. There are many unprofitable and dangerous doctrines that owe their origin to the specious question, "Cannot God do this or that?" We do not question the ability of God to do anything, but if we are guided by the Scriptures we shall not raise the question, nor attempt an answer. We shall rather say with the prophet and the apostle:--

> "His counsel shall stand, and He will do all His pleasure" (Isa. xlvi. 10).
> "He worketh all things according to the counsel of His Own will" (Eph. i. 11).
> "The knowledge of God regards a thing as possible, and as it my be done; the wisdom of God regards a thing as fit, and convenient to be done; the will of God resolves that it shall be done. The power of God is the application of His will to effect what it hath resolved . . . . . His will orders, His wisdom guides, and His power effects" (Charnock).

Not only do the works of creation provide an exhibition of the almighty power of God so that the heathen are inexcusable, but the believer also may draw encouragement from the same source:--

> "Ah Lord God! behold, Thou hast made the heaven and the earth by Thy great power and stretched-out arm, and there is nothing too hard for Thee" (Jer. xxxii. 17).

This infinity of power is recognized in Job xxxvii. 23:--

> "Touching the Almighty, we cannot find Him out: He is excellent in power."

Not only is this power infinite; it is also incomparable:--

> "To whom then will ye liken Me, or shall I be equal? saith the Holy One. Lift up your eyes on high, and behold Who hath created these things, that bringeth out their host by number; He calleth them all by names by the greatness of His might, for that He is strong in power; not one faileth" (Isa. xl. 25, 26).

The power of God is infinite, incomparable, directed by wisdom and righteousness; and the passage from Isaiah just quoted proceeds to show that it knows no failure or falling off:--

> "Hast thou not known? hast thou not heard, that the everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth, fainteth not, neither is weary?" (Isa. xl. 28).

Again, the power of God is unique in that it depends upon no instrument. True, in the wonder of His providence and His grace, the Most High stoops to use the humblest of instruments, but this is not of necessity. With man, the possession of power is not sufficient; it is useless without material and without instruments. Again and again, God declares His independence in the exercise of His power:--

> "Thus saith the Lord . . . . . I am the Lord that maketh all things; that stretcheth forth the heavens ALONE; that spreadeth forth the earth BY MYSELF" (Isa. xliv. 24).

Job's self-righteousness is beaten to the dust, as the Lord challenges him in the words of chapter xxxviii.:--

> "Where wast thou, when I laid the foundation of the earth?" (Job xxxviii. 4).

Another noticeable feature in the exercise of God's almighty power is the apparent ease with which everything is accomplished:--

> "He spake and it was done, He commanded and it stood fast" (Psa. xxxiii. 9).

If we examine the Hebrew sentence: "Let there be light and there was light", we shall find that the words: "Let there be light" and "There was light" are identical, apart from the change of tense in the verb "to be". The passage, set out as follows, gives a more exact idea of the original: "And God said, Light be, and light was" (Even here the close parallel of the Hebrew is not quite preserved as the English words "be" and "was" have no similarity in appearance).

What a testimony to the majestic power of God are those recurring words of Gen. i.: "And it was so." Sun, moon, stars, fish, flesh, fowl, all spring to life and being at His word. We might pursue this theme for pages. Without the power of God His providence would be ineffective; without omnipotence the fruitful seasons would lapse, the sea would not keep its bounds, the sun would fail, the stars would fall. The Lord Jesus Christ, as the Image of the invisible God, is the One in Whom all power is focused. "By Him all things consists" (or are held together), and He it is Who "upholds all things by the word of His power" (Col. i. 17; Heb. i. 3).

Power as related to the purpose of redemption is a wonderful theme. It begins with the birth of the Redeemer:--

> "The power of the Highest shall overshadow thee" (Luke i. 35).

It is manifested in the cross of Christ:--

> "Unto us which are saved it is the power of God" (I Cor. i. 18).

At His resurrection, the Lord Jesus was declared to be the Son of God with power, and the gospel of Christ became the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth

(Rom. i. 4, 16). The same power that saves us, keeps us; and we are directed to the right hand of God where Christ sitteth, for the source of all power at the present time (Eph. i. 19; II Cor. xiii. 4; Phil. iii. 10).

When at last the time comes for the Lord to return, His return will be with power:--

> "The Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory" (Matt. xxiv. 30).
>
> "The power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (II Pet. i. 16).
>
> "We give Thee thanks, O Lord God Almighty, which art, and wast; because Thou hast taken to Thee Thy great power, and hast reigned" (Rev. xi. 17).
>
> "And I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings, saying, Alleluia: FOR THE LORD GOD OMNIPOTENT REIGNETH" (Rev. xix. 6).

"This God is our God."

#12. The immensity of God.
pp. 183 - 186

It is of the utmost importance when we study the Scriptures and their teaching concerning the being and attributes of God, that we keep constantly before the mind, that unless God stoops down to our low estate, no explanation or description of Himself is possible. Let us never forget the graciousness of the Lord, Whose immensity baffles human speech to describe and the human mind to conceive, that He has condescended to speak of Himself after the manner of men. To us time and space are fundamental conceptions. Without them we should be dumb, unable to make a single proposition. Yet what has been revealed to us of God, although couched in human terms, makes it very clear that so far as God is concerned, time and space do not exist. In our own days the theory of relativity has revolutionized much that was held as true regarding time and space. While it is true that, so far as we are concerned, time and space must be postulated, we must remember that when dealing with the Absolute, such conceptions do not inhere. It is not our intention here to attempt an outline of philosophy or even to speak of the theory of relativity; we just throw out these reminders, so that the language of Scripture shall not be made misleading through faulty application:--

> "He that planted the ear, shall He not hear? He that formed the eye, shall He not see?" (Psa. xciv. 9).

It is thus that the Lord reasons with us, and the argument is irresistible. Following upon this comes the statement that not only must we believe that the Lord "sees" but also that He is not limited by distance or by the presence of light:--

"The eyes of the Lord are in every place, beholding the evil and the good" (Prov. xv. 3).

"Whither shall I go from Thy spirit? or whither shall I flee from Thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, Thou art there; if I make my bed in hell, behold, Thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea; even there shall Thy hand lead me, and Thy right hand shall hold me. If I say, Surely the darkness shall cover me; even the night shall be light about me. Yea, the darkness hideth not from Thee; but the night shineth as the day; the darkness and the light are both alike to Thee" (Psa. cxxxix. 7-12).

It is not merely that God knows and understands everything. The Lord is omnipresent not merely by His knowledge, but by virtue of the fact that He "fills" heaven and earth:--

"Can any hide himself in secret places that I shall not see him? saith the Lord. Do not I fill heaven and earth? saith the Lord" (Jer. xxiii. 24).

The Companion Bible draws attention to the presence of the Hebrew accent here which emphasizes the word "fill": "Denoting the Divine Presence which no 'place' can *in*clude or *ex*clude." Another note, found in the writings of Charnock, is as follows:--

"As Eternity is the perfection whereby He hath under neither beginning nor end; Immortality is the perfection whereby He hath neither increase nor diminution; so Immensity or Omnipresence is that whereby He hath neither bounds, nor limitations."

Familiar usage has diminished the original meaning of the word "immense". Primarily it signified something so great as to be incapable of measurement:--

"For thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, Whose name is Holy; I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit" (Isa. lvii. 15).

This verse certainly includes the thought of immensity in the modern use of the word. The conception of "inhabiting eternity" is tremendous. But it is not mere size, for the same verse tells us that the Lord dwells with him who is of a contrite and humble spirit.

The same thing is true with regard to time: "One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day" (II Pet. iii. 8). It is of course utterly false to conclude that there is any proportion here. God is not to be conceived as 365,000 times greater than man, for the same verse supplies an argument that would also prove that He was 365,000 times smaller. Who shall say which is the greater exhibition of the almighty power of God, the world revealed by the telescope, or that of the microscope? Is not God as much at home in the appalling expanses of the Milky Way, as He is in the invisible electron? Let us be grateful that, in terms that are understandable, He the Infinite One has told us all that we need to know for our faith and comfort. If the Lord God be omnipresent, we are never out of His sight, out of His mind, beyond His protection, or beyond His care. Sin and all the uprisings of the flesh would die if we constantly remembered that the Lord was near.

This doctrine should also prove a help in worship. Even in the days of Solomon, after the temple had been built according to God's own plan, it was recognized that there could be no localizing of the Deity:--

> "But will God indeed dwell on the earth? Behold, the heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain Thee: how much less this house that I have builded?" (I Kings. viii. 27).

God is not confined to the heavens. A recent critic ridiculed the idea expressed by the words, "Far above all heavens". But even Gen. i. 1 implies three spheres: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." In addition to heaven and earth this verse necessitates a third sphere—that which is associated with God before the heaven and the earth were created. With this third sphere the Mystery and its blessings are concerned, although even here there are limitations beyond our fathoming, for none can compare with God.

He is from everlasting to everlasting; He is the Ancient of days, He is everywhere and always; and so far as we and our experiences are concerned, this is the assurance to us of His abiding presence. "I AM THAT I AM." This God is our God.

"Ultra dispensationalism."
A criticism examined.

#1. The place of Acts xxviii.
pp. 175 - 179

The intelligent reader will not need informing that a magazine which stands for such a provoking course of teaching as does The Berean Expositor must always be under the fire of criticism. How can the charge "ultra dispensationalism" be dealt with? Is any useful purpose served by dealing with the charge that we have no use for the epistle to the Romans? Yet if any criticism sends us back to "The Book" we are thankful. What we are still awaiting, is a scriptural exposure of our attitude to Acts xxviii.

Comparatively recently some notes written in a good spirit have been passed on to us, and as some readers may be desirous of having the points raised dealt with, we will endeavour to do so in a short series of articles, praying that the cause of truth will be furthered thereby. We will refer to the writer who has criticized our position as "B". He writes:--

> "The chief point of difference with Mr. Welch seems to be in his discovery that in Acts 28 we have the founding of a new 'dispensation', though the word is not used there, nor is there, to my mind, any clear indication of this most important fact."

It is often said that Luther discovered the great doctrine of justification by faith, but what is nearer the truth is that Luther gave that doctrine prominence. The need of the time called forth, under God, the man, and the Reformation followed.

We have certainly made Acts xxviii. the keynote of our ministry, seeing in it a dispensational boundary that influences the whole course of the outworking of the revealed purpose of the ages, and bringing into the light that position which had hitherto been hid in God. The Lord, however, Who knows the hearts of all men will not allow many of His servants an exclusive claim to knowledge, lest pride and boasting spoil the testimony. We gratefully acknowledge the pioneer work done by others before us, who in their turn were quickened and directed by other witnesses. In the end, we all shall appear in a twofold capacity, viz., sowers and reapers—sowers of seed garnered from the harvest prepared before by others.

This matter, however, is scarcely a point in the criticism, although in a part, which we do not quote, there is the thought that the exposition of the Scriptures along the lines of The Berean Expositor is somewhat of a presumption, seeing that for nineteen centuries the church as a whole has taught on other lines. There is, however, but one test for all truth—not its antiquity, nor its popularity, but whether it is in harmony with all that God has written. And this we claim for "dispensational truth". We can well imagine that "B" will interject here: "But surely you will give me credit for believing all that God has written too?" Our answer must be qualified. Yes, in all sincerity you believe that you do accept without alteration all that God has written, but unless you divide rightly the Word of truth, you will discover this to be impossible. Let an example suffice.

We believe that in promising, in the Sermon on the Mount, that "The meek shall inherit the earth", that the Lord means what He said. We also believe that Abraham—and those blessed with faithful Abraham—will be blessed in the heavenly Jerusalem. We believe, further, that the church of the mystery will be blessed "in heavenly places far above all".

If "B" believes that the church in the Gospel according to Matthew is not to be distinguished from the church in Ephesians (and he has practically said so, as will appear), then he cannot, even though he would, accept each of these three distinct spheres of blessing as written. We, on our part, would say, that realizing there are three spheres of blessing (i) The earth, (ii) The heavenly Jerusalem, and (iii) heavenly places far above all, we leave each company where God has placed them without confusion and without alteration.

The chief item, however, in the criticism is found in the statement that the word "dispensation" is not used in Acts xxviii., but we certainly believe that there is a "clear indication" that a dispensational change had come, and this from two sources, viz., (1) the last chapter of Acts itself, and (2) from the epistles written during the two years of imprisonment with which Acts closes.

A dispensation is marked by certain characteristics, and if these be set aside, we have negative evidence of a change. If, further, this be supplemented by positive testimony, as we find in Eph. iii. and Col. i., then we have all that can be reasonably asked for.

We open the last chapter of Acts, and observe that the miraculous gifts of Mark xvi. are still in force. We are certain that "B" is no quibbler, and the fact that after Paul in Acts xxviii. 3-6 fulfilled the reference to "taking up serpents", he did not supplement it by drinking something poisonous, will not be used by him to invalidate our claim that Mark xvi. 17-20 was in force. The deadly disease of dysentery was healed by the apostle, and then other diseased persons in the islands were healed in the same way. Here, then, is one feature, characteristic of the Pentecostal dispensation. We believe the "shall follow" of Mark xvi. 17 to be as true as the "shall be saved" of Mark xvi. 16. We have never had "these signs" following, yet we are not perturbed. On the other hand, he who claims the Gospel of Mark as true for himself, has no evidence of salvation unless he has Pentecostal gifts. The modern exhibition of "gifts" and "healing" we do not deal with here. Sufficient, for the moment, to say that never have we heard of a "Healing Campaign" being advertised with the assuring statement that the Healer or Preacher would drink poison or be bitten by a serpent to prove to the world his bona fides.

The next dispensational feature is found in the fact, that while Paul had expressed his longing to see the believers of the church at Rome, there is no record that he visited them; on the contrary, the close of the Acts gives prominence to his calling together the chief of the Jews. "The Jew first", means just what it says—"First in time, and first in all things."

To limit the word "first" to time, and deny any reason or meaning to it, is to allow little credit to the apostle's ability, quite apart from the question of inspiration. We can however best consider this feature later.

A third feature of dispensational importance is the saying of the apostle in Acts xxviii. 20:--

> "For the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain."

The hope of Israel is expressed in Acts i. 6, it is repeated in Acts xxvi. 6, 7, and it is still prominent in Acts xxviii. Can this hope of Israel, the fulfillment of the promises made unto the fathers, the fulfillment of Isa. xi. (see Rom. xv. 12, 13), can that hope be at the same time the hope of the church called under new terms, into a new sphere, and entirely dissociated from the "covenants of promise", "the commonwealth of Israel", the promises to Abraham, Isaac or Jacob?

When the apostle met the chief of the Jews, he expounded and testified the kingdom of God, persuading them concerning Jesus, both out of the law of Moses, and out of the Prophets, from morning till evening, but after the setting aside of Israel, he preached the kingdom of God, but taught those things which concern "the Lord Jesus Christ" (not "Jesus" now), with all confidence, no man forbidding him: no longer "expounding" and no longer drawing from Moses and the Prophets, for the simple reason that the "secret" was never disclosed in Moses or the Prophets, but had been "revealed" to him as the prisoner of Jesus Christ.

Moreover, the quotation of Isa. vi. 9, 10 affected Israel of the dispersion, in the same way as the quotation of the same passage in Matt. xiii. affect Israel in the land. Matt xi. and xii. reveal the rejection of Christ and the failure of Israel to repent, even though they had seen so many miracles. This rejection is followed by "mystery", the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven. In Acts xxviii. Israel again reject their Messiah, and the rejection this time being complete, miraculous gifts cease, the hope of Israel is deferred, and for the first time since the call of Abraham in Gen. xii. the salvation of God is sent to the Gentiles in independence of Israel, a feature unique in the testimony of Scripture, and not appreciated as it should be. We submit that there are abundant signs of a change of dispensation consequent upon Israel entering into their "lo-ammi" state.

For positive testimony we have but to read Eph. iii. 1-3:--

> "For this cause I Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles, if ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to you-ward, How that by revelation He made known unto me the mystery."

And again in Col. i. 24-27:--

> ". . . . . for His body's sake which is the church, whereof I am made a minister, according to the dispensation of God which is given to me for you, to fulfil the word of God: even the mystery which hath been hid from ages and from generations, but now is made manifest to His saints . . . . . Christ among you (sent to the Gentiles) the hope of glory."

Here we must pause. Further items of importance come before us in the next criticism. We believe that no one can ponder the teaching of the Word as written in Acts xxviii., Eph. iii. and Col. i. without realizing that a great and drastic dispensational change took place. We believe that "B" will be most ready to acknowledge that closer acquaintance with Acts xxviii. does give "a clear indication' of a dispensational crisis.

#2. A dispensational "secret". A dispensational hope.
pp. 193 - 197

After a consideration of the question of Acts xxviii. as a dispensational boundary, our brother continues:--

> "One other prima facie difficulty in accepting it is this. St. Luke was the intimate friend and companion of St. Paul: he must have known of this great Dispensational Church. Surely he might have put in a clear warning as he describes the growth of the Church in Acts, that this was not "the Church" of the epistle to the Ephesians. Surely also St. Matthew might have quoted in xvi. 18 that Christ is not referring to the Church according to Paul, but to the Church according to Peter and surely he should have told us whether our Lord's words in xviii. 17 (words that I think have been sadly neglected in our Church life) refer to the Pentecostal or to the Dispensational Church."

"B" has used the word "surely" three times. This, of course, merely expresses opinion, and is entirely outside the realm of valid argument. The above criticism can be reduced to the three following statements:--

(1) Luke must have known of the dispensational change which we see in Acts xxviii., because he was an intimate friend of Paul.
(2) He ought therefore to have warned the Church in the Acts period of its dispensational position.
(3) Matthew also should have told us, when he was writing xvi. 18, whether this Church refers to Paul or to Peter, and whether the words of xviii. 17 refer to a Pentecostal Church or the Church of the mystery.

We must not forget that Luke's confessed object in writing the Acts was to continue the treatise begun in his Gospel, of all that Jesus began to do and teach, by a supplemental account of what the risen Lord did and taught through His apostles. When Paul was commissioned on the road to Damascus, Luke knew that Paul was a chosen vessel to bear the name of the Lord "before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel", and he plainly states it. What he did not know (or if he knew, was not permitted to record) was that at the same time that Paul received this commission, the Lord promises that He would appear to him once more, and give him a second commission. This is made known to us for the first time in Acts xxvi. 16-18, when Paul's evangelizing is at an end, and the prison is his sphere. We must go into the question of Paul's twofold ministry later. But we have seen enough to realize that Luke does indicate the coming change, although he is held back until near the end of the narrative before making it known. The reason for this is obvious; and finds a parallel in the Lord's own attitude. In Acts i. 6 the disciples asked:--

> "Lord, wilt Thou at this time restore again the Kingdom to Israel?"

Had the Lord told them that in spite of Pentecost Israel would still continue in their state of unrepentance until they had filled up the measure of their iniquity and been set aside, such knowledge would have paralyzed their witness, and might have been taken by Israel as an excuse for failure to repent. Had Peter known that Israel would not repent, he could not truthfully have quoted from Joel as he did in Acts ii. 17-21; for there is an interval of 1900 years between verses 18 and 19, but this was not known to Peter at the time. The Lord simply deals with the question of time, and follows with the injunction: "But ye shall receive power . . . . . ye shall be witnesses" (Acts i. 8). Had Luke made known in the early Acts that Israel were to pass into their lo-ammi condition in about forty years, then, humanly speaking, there would have been no "Acts" to record. Paul unhesitatingly links himself with the "hope" of the Church at that time, saying: "We which are alive and remain" (I Thess. iv. 17). There are some who consider that Paul was deceiving the Church here, by saying "we". There are others who think he deceived himself. We are in the happy position of accepting his words as perfectly true, for at the time of writing I Thessalonians no revelation had been given concerning the secret administration.

If what we have said above is true, there is no need to answer the second item of criticism. We pass on therefore to the third.

Here we confess that we are somewhat at a loss to understand the objection. We have always felt that Matthew did make plain that Peter was addressed both in connection with the Church and with reference to the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven (Matt. xvi. 16-19). Matthew could hardly be expected to say anything about Paul who was at that time an unconverted Pharisee. That Peter and Paul had distinctive ministries is made clear in Gal. ii. 6-10.

While we might agree with our brother that the principle of Matt. xviii. 17 could be profitable employed to-day, we cannot see the slightest ground for supposing that our Lord referred to a Church other than the Pentecostal Church. In the first place in both Matt. x. 5 and in xv. 24, Gentiles are most definitely set aside as forming no part of our Lord's ministry up to that time, and this is confirmed by Rom. xv. 8. Secondly, the rejected brother was to be regarded as "a heathen man", or "a Gentile" (see Gal. ii. 14), which is added testimony to the Jewish constitution of this Church spoken of in Matt. xviii. Once again we have "searched to see" and we find nothing in the objections that is valid, or that in any sense modifies our belief that the present dispensation was a "secret", unknown to Luke or Peter, or to Paul himself until he became the prisoner of Jesus Christ. The very silence of all three on the matter is but added proof of the rightness of our position:--

> "What are we to make of that inspired word 'Till He come', written to the Corinthians, a Church of mixed Jews and Greeks till our Lord's second coming: to whom do these words refer?"

We are to make no more or less of the words "Till He come" than the hope revealed in the Acts and epistles of that period will allow. If we discover that the hope before the Church at that period is called "the hope of Israel", and if we further discover that Israel were set aside, and still further, if the new dispensation, that came in consequent upon the setting aside, speaks of the "one hope" of the calling, and uses a new set of terms to speak of it, we shall have to conclude that "Till He come", and any commandment connected with it, is binding until a change of dispensation come in, just as the law of Moses carries statements to the effect that certain ceremonies like Passover, etc., were "statutes for ever". The same reason which our brother would rightly give, namely, a change of dispensation, to exempt himself from any necessity to abide by these commands of the law, is the selfsame reason that we give for our own exemption from anything that belonged to the Pentecostal dispensation.

Two passages of Scripture suffice to indicate the hope that was before the Corinthian Church, and all the Churches of that period. One is in the Acts itself, and one is in the epistle to the Romans. The Acts of the Apostles gives clear testimony that but one hope runs throughout the period covered, namely, "the hope of Israel". The apostles' question in Acts i. 6, arising, let it be noted, out of our Lord's opening up of the O.T. Scriptures, makes that clear at the beginning. Paul's reference in Acts xxvi. 6, 7 to "the hope of the promise made of God unto the fathers" is equally clear, while his statement in Acts xxviii. 20, that he was bound "for the hope of Israel" needs no explanation. This is most certainly the one hope of the Acts.

What of the epistles of the period? We propose taking the testimony of Romans for two reasons:--

(1) It was the last epistle written before Paul's imprisonment, and will give the final aspect of the hope entertained by the then Church.
(2) Romans is considered by all students to be the most basic of all the epistles written during the Acts, and therefore should be given most attentive hearing.

In Rom. xv. 8 we learn that the earthly ministry of the Lord Jesus was limited to "the circumcision", and that He came to "confirm the promises made unto the fathers", while in Rom. xv. 12, 13 the hope is that:-- > "There shall be a root of Jesse, and He that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles; in Him shall the Gentiles hope. Now the God of that hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing."

Our brother will not need proof that "trust" (elpizo) and "hope" (elpis) must both be translated "hope", as we have done, or that the article before elpis marks it out as "that" hope which is in view. The hope then before the Church was associated with the reign of Christ over the Gentiles, the passage quoted being from Isa. xi., where the reference to the lion and the lamb makes it clear that the Millennium is the subject. The hope before the Church during the Acts was the second coming of Christ in connection with the thousand years reign—Israel's great day. This hope is entirely foreign to "the mystery" which looks "far above all" for the realization of its hope. The hope that is expressed in I Thess. iv. must never be read without the consciousness that II Thess. ii., with its reference to the "Man of Sin", was written to correct false ideas about the time of the second coming. If I Thess. iv. be my hope, then II Thess. ii. reveals that it will not be realized until the Day of the Lord. Moreover, the Archangel links I Thess iv. with Daniel's prophecy and with the hope of Israel (Dan. x. and xii.). The words used throughout Acts and its epistles, together with the epistles of Peter and James, are parousia, apokalupto, and apokalupsis. These are not used by Paul when speaking of the blessed hope of the mystery. The one hope of the calling of the dispensation of the mystery has nothing to do with reigning over the Gentiles, or the state of peace in God's holy mountain. It belongs to heavenly places and the right hand of God, and refers to a phase of the Lord's second coming unknown before Acts xxviii.

In answer to the question therefore, "To whom do the words 'Till He come' refer?" we say, that they referred to that Church of Jew and Gentile that had been called into being during the Acts while the longsuffering of God waited on Israel's repentance: that they who thus waited were marked off from the present time by the possession of miraculous gifts, which, together with Israel and its hope, have been set aside until the Church of the one body is complete.

#3. The written testimony to the Mystery, and "Things that differ".

pp. 217 - 220

Continuing the criticism which we have partly examined, "B" passes from the question of the dispensational boundary of Acts xxviii. to the equally important question of the written testimony concerning this new dispensation:--

> "I find another difficulty in the assumption that of the Pauline epistles only four should have validity for us, and that this fact is nowhere mentioned, nor are these epistles in any way distinguished from the others by a special position in the New Testament: indeed they are deceptively placed in the very middle of the other epistles that are not supposed to be applicable to us. Though I find Mr. Welch a little inconsistent, and quoting Romans and Corinthians with great cogency as undoubtedly authoritative."

"B" makes it clear in the above criticism that he is not very well acquainted with what we actually teach. He seems to think that we have confined ourselves to but four epistles, and that it is an act inconsistent with our position to refer, for example, to Romans. The opening paragraph of our studies (which commenced in March 1926 and have now in 1934 reached chapter vii.) runs like this:--

> "Perhaps no one book in the whole of the Scriptures may be considered to have a claim upon all who believe in the Lord Jesus Christ more than the Epistle to the Romans."

Romans is "undoubtedly authoritative" where doctrine is concerned, but where we see a difference between Romans and the epistles of the Mystery is in their dispensational teaching. Both Romans and Ephesians teach the same truths concerning sin, salvation, redemption, life, but they are diametrically opposed when it is a question of the constitution of the Church. This aspect of truth will come before us again, as "B" has raised the question of the meaning of the phrase "the Jew first"; so we pass on to the matter of the four prison epistles. To be exact there are five epistles marked as from "prison", but as Philemon is so personal, we usually leave it out when speaking of the revelation of the Mystery.

The four prison epistles are the only source of instruction on the distinctive character of the Church of the Mystery. No other company was chosen before the foundation of the world. No other company is seated together at the right hand of God. So while we believe all scripture is for us, we do not believe that all scripture is about us. We recognize that in the epistle to the Romans there is that which is permanent, e.g., the doctrine of redemption, and also that which is passing, e.g., the teaching concerning the wild olive graft. We believe that unless the Church of the Mystery had had beneath it the solid rock of Romans, it would have needed a special revelation concerning these basic things. These things are accepted and assumed in Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians, and the time is occupied in making all men see what is the dispensation of the Mystery, with its own peculiar constitution, hope and sphere:--

> "It is claimed that Paul's words in Acts xxviii. 28 are the announcement of the new order. Please compare with them his words in Acts xiii. 46, 47 and Acts xviii. 6 which to me seem absolutely identical. On page 37 of 'Things most surely believed', we read that 'in this new company there is an equality of membership never known before'. Why, it is stated by Peter in Acts xi. 15, etc., xv. 9, And He put no difference between them, the Gentiles, and us."

We have compared Acts xxviii. 28 with Acts xiii. 46, 47, and we find in Acts xxviii., "The salvation of God is sent to the Gentiles", and in Acts xiii., "Lo, we turn to the Gentiles". If our brother's intention is to suggest that both passages teach the same thing, a reference to Acts xiv. 1 will show that the apostles themselves had no such thought. Paul did not set aside the Jew in Acts xiii.; he merely set aside that one synagogue. As far on as Acts xvii. 1, 2 we read that, "as his manner was", he went to the synagogue of the Jews. It is strange that we may even compare scripture with scripture and yet miss the meaning of the comparison.

Acts xiii. and Acts xxviii. answer to one another as type does to antitype or prophecy to fulfillment. In Acts xiii. Paul brings about the blindness of one Jew (verse 11); in Acts xxviii., he pronounces the same doom on the nation. In Acts xiii. one Gentile and his house are saved, as a consequence of the judgment upon the Jew, and both the saved Gentile and the apostle are of the same name, Paulus. In Acts xxviii., consequent upon the judgment of the Jews, the salvation of God is sent to the Gentiles.

In Acts xiii. the apostle says, "Beware lest that come upon you" (verse 40); in Acts xxviii. we see the threatened judgment fall. How could the apostle say that he was bound for the hope of Israel in Acts xxviii., if he had set aside Israel in Acts xiii.?

Acts xviii. 6 is said to be "absolutely identical" with Acts xxviii. 28. The term "absolutely" is not to be taken seriously. We find, however, that the apostle took the earliest opportunity of "entering a synagogue and reasoning with the Jews" (Acts xviii. 19), which shows that he at least had no idea that his words in xviii. 6 were "identical" with those of Acts xxviii. 28. Still further, he was anxious to keep the feast that was due at Jerusalem (xviii. 21), and spoke boldly in the synagogue at Ephesus (Acts xix. 8). Paul had no scruples against associating himself, in the temple at Jerusalem, with men who had a vow, and there is no suggestion that he was wrong in so doing. So that we cannot accept the statement of "identity" in these two passages, much less that of "absolute identity".

Exception is taken to our statement that at Acts xxviii. an equality never known before is introduced; and we are told that this same equality is stated in Acts xi. 15. We must remember that Peter called himself a Jew under law, and did not hesitate to tell Cornelius that but for the vision of the sheet he would have regarded him as common and unclean (Acts x. 28). His words in xi. 15 refer to the fact that the spirit came upon Cornelius as it did at Pentecost upon the Jewish believers. We have never taught that the "equality" of Ephesians had anything to do with Pentecost. And we cannot see how the admission of the Gentile to Pentecostal baptism can be the same thing as equality of membership in a unity then unknown and unrevealed. That no such conception was in the mind of Peter and those with him is evident from Acts xi. 19 where the word was still preached to "Jews only".

Moreover, the question comes up again in Acts xv., the result being that a distinct difference is perpetuated between the Gentiles who believed and the believers of the circumcision (Acts xv. 19-21). This difference constituted a "middle wall of partition" (Eph. ii. 14), the "ordinances" of Eph. ii. 15 being the "decrees" of Acts xvi. 4.

The equality of Eph. ii. is that "the both are created one new man", but one looks in vain for such a creation in Acts xi. or xv. The equality of Eph. iii. 6 is unique. Never before was there a unity which, while containing Jewish and Gentile believers, was a "joint body".

We are afraid that "B" will have to revise his statements, both as to the absolute identity of Acts xviii. 6 with Acts xxviii. 28, and as to the connection between Peter's reference to Pentecostal baptism and Paul's revelation of the newly-created new man. If these things can be called identical, it is vain to attempt to "try the things that differ". Positive teaching, under these conditions, would be impossible, for no weight could be given to any word of Scripture, and the truth would sink under a mass of generalities.

#4. The Jew first. Body and Bride. Paul's twofold ministry.
pp. 235 - 240

Passing from the distinctive epistles of the mystery, and the peculiar features of the new dispensation, we come to the question of the relative place of Jew and Gentile before Acts xxviii.:--

> "Mr. Welch writes, 'In Romans, Paul speaks of the Jew first'. Ah, but let us turn to his words, and perhaps we shall find that he means first in order of having the gospel preached unto them, first in time, not first in superiority. So look up Rom. i. 16; ii. 9, 10; and iii. 9. 'Are we better than they? No, in no wise.' Surely words cannot be plainer; surely, too, such an assumption of racial distinction in the Pentecostal church is not consistent with the attitude of Christ towards the Samaritan woman at Jacob's well and His words in John x. 16 and xvii. 20, 21."

Even if we agree that "first in order" is what the apostle means when, in Rom. i. 16, he says, "To the Jew first", the question as to why this should be stated still requires an answer. If we were to write, "The power of God unto salvation, to the Corinthians first, and also to the Chinese", our readers would naturally want to know why such a statement was written. It certainly would not satisfy them to say, "Well, wasn't that the historical order?" Further, does Rom. ii. 9, 10 mean that the Jew will be judged "first" in time? Are we to understand that in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ (Rom. ii. 16), the Jew will be judged some time before the Gentile? To take another passage, Is there no special significance, beyond that of mere historic sequence, behind Peter's words when he said:--

> "Unto you first God, having raised up His Son Jesus, sent Him to bless you" (Acts iii. 26).

If we read the previous verse, we shall see that there was a definite reason for this priority:--

> "Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all kindreds of the earth be blessed. Unto you first" (Acts iii. 25, 26).

The fact that the Saviour came to the Jew first (Rom. xv. 8), and the fact that the gospel was preached to the Jew first, was because Israel was the appointed channel of blessing to the nations of the earth. A saved Israel is necessary for the functioning of the promise made to Abraham. A saved remnant of Israel enabled the fulfillment of the promise to commence, but with the setting aside of the channel, the blessing of the nations was also postponed and awaits the day of Israel's restoration.

The teaching of Rom. xi. 17-25 shows that Israel were "first" as to position, being the "natural branches". The believing Gentiles were reminded that they were but a wild graft.

With reference to Rom. iii. 9, 10, we remind our readers that we have many times taken this passage to demonstrate the difference between the doctrinal teaching of Romans that remains, and the dispensational teaching that has ceased to be true for the present time:--

> Dispensational teaching.—"What advantage hath the Jew? . . . . . Much every way" (Rom. iii. 1, 2).

This was true then, but is no longer true to-day:--

> Doctrinal teaching.—"Are we better than they? No, in no wise" (Rom. iii. 9).

This was true then, and is still true as ever.

We are next referred to our Lord's attitude to the Samaritan woman. Our Lord said several things on this occasion; and our brother leaves us to guess as to which of these he has in mind. If we are to include John iv. 21, 23 in our consideration, we would remind our brother that the day had not then come when the Father should be worshipped "neither in this mountain nor yet in Jerusalem", and that that time did not come until the book of the Acts was finished and Jerusalem destroyed. Further, the Lord told the woman that "salvation is of the Jews", and that remained true until, with the setting aside of the Jew, the salvation of God was sent to the Gentiles. We see nothing in John iv. that contradicts our teaching, but much that supports it.

The statement concerning "the other sheep" in John x. 16, and that concerning unity in John xvii. 20, 21, while they were uttered by Christ during His earthly ministry, were not made public until after Paul's ministry had ceased (John outlived the rest of the apostles, and the consistent testimony of antiquity is that he wrote his Gospel last of all). The Gospel of John, unlike the Synoptic Gospels, starts with the assumption that Christ has been rejected. It explains the meaning of Jewish observances and Jewish words. It is intended for the world, and is the message for the great outer circle to-day, while Paul's testimony is running its elective course.

Wherever Israel appear in Scripture, recognized as the chosen people of God, they must be first. There can be no equality among believers until "the twain" are created one new man, and that does not occur before Acts xxviii.:--

> "All the scriptural promises and allusions which are supposed to refer to this so-called dispensational church may equally well refer to the whole body of believers in Christ, whether pre- or post- Acts xxviii. Indeed, I find it difficult to accept this division of Christ's body, Christ's bride, into two. Are there two brides? Or is Stephen, the first martyr, not a fellow-member with us in the 'one church' (Rom. xii. 5; I Cor. x. 17; Eph. iv. 4 and v. 30)?"

Our brother's first statement is a very wide one; but we can only assume that he means what he says. Among the "scriptural promises and allusions", then, to which he refers we may include Eph. i. 3, 4. We challenge him to bring forward proofs from Scripture that the phrases, "all spiritual blessings", "in heavenly places" and "before the foundation of the world" apply equally to the church before and after Acts xxviii. We could almost venture the whole argument upon one unique fact, namely, that this church and no other throughout the whole range of Scripture is said to be "seated" in the heavenly places, far above all. Nowhere else is there a "joint-body"; no other company is "far above all principality". What, then, becomes of our brother's sweeping statement? It is incorrect, and, as criticism, it is valueless.

We also repudiate the term "so-called dispensational church"; it is a meaningless phrase. Every church must be "dispensational". It may be the church of the Acts period, or the mystery, or the churches of the Revelation. "So-called" suggests that this is our own term. We hope no one will think that we have been careless enough to use so meaningless an expression.

Our brother, moreover, speaks of the "Body" and the "Bride" as synonymous titles of the one company. But this is not the case. The Bride is clearly associated with the New Jerusalem, with it gates of pearl and the names of the twelve tribes of Israel. The church of the mystery is far above even this sphere of blessing. We read that the standard of the church of the mystery is the "perfect man" (Eph. iv. 13), and our brother will know that aner (the word for "man" here) is never used except of a male. It is translated in Eph. v. several times by the word "husband". And we suppose our brother would not attempt to teach that the perfect "husband" can be the "bride". Eph. v. with its instructions to husbands and wives is not the place in which to seek to establish a doctrine.

We are also referred to Rom. xii. 5 and I Cor. x. 17, but these passages speak of a church where every "member" is a "spiritual gift" (I Cor. xii. 18, 28), whereas spiritual gifts are absent from the dispensation of the mystery.

The reference to Stephen, the first martyr, is an appeal to our sentiments. Why not John the Baptist, or David or Moses? For all were saved by the same Christ, What we teach, is that while salvation is common to all the Lord's people, the spheres of blessing differ. As the church of the one body was a secret, hid in God, when Stephen died, we cannot believe that he was a member of that church. We believe that it can be proved from Scripture that Stephen will be amongst that company designated "the Bride", and as these dispositions of grace are at the sovereign disposal of the Lord, we cannot discuss them. They make no difference to our teaching and are outside our province:--

> "This word 'dispensation' is one that Mr. Welch does not give in the original. And really, it is one that hardly bears the interpretation he would put upon it. For it means really 'stewardship', and in three places out of four (only four in the whole Bible) it is said to have been given to Paul (See I Cor. ix. 17; Col. i. 25; Eph. iii. 2). In the one other place, viz., Eph. i. 10, it is used of God's ordering of the course of history."

Yet the booklet under criticism, viz., "Things most surely believed", itself contains the following passage directly bearing on the point:--

> "The ways of God with men are differentiated into dispensations. This word, used by Paul of the present dispensation of the grace of God to the Gentiles (Eph. iii. 1, 2) means

> 'the administration of a household' or as it is translated in Luke xvi. 2, 'stewardship'. The church at Jerusalem was compelled to recognize the distinctive 'stewardships' or 'dispensations' given to Peter and Paul (Gal. ii. 6-10), and saw that the distinction involved not only 'apostleship' but 'gospel'." (page 11).

It would, surely, be difficult for a reader of the criticism to believe that the booklet criticized contained the passage we have just quoted. We can only add that, as the criticism contains no point wherein it is considered we have erred, we but restate, as above, what we have already taught:--

> "Yet another point. Page 36 of 'Things most surely believed' says of the eventful scene in Acts xxviii.; 'A new dispensation with new terms is ushered in—this dispensation of the grace of God for the Gentiles committed to Paul'. But was this new? Was it not rather God's revelation to Paul from his prior calling on the road to Damascus? Well, let us see what Paul himself says (Acts xxvi. 17 & 18, and again Acts xxii. 21)."

Here we find ourselves echoing our brother's words, "Well, let us see what Paul himself says (Acts xxvi. 17, 18 and Acts xxii. 21)", only we suggest that a commencement be made, not at verse 17, but at verse 16 of Acts xxvi., particularly noticing the word "both", which indicates Paul's two-fold ministry, and the words "in the which I will appear unto thee", which makes clear the fact that when Paul received the commission on the road to Damascus he also received intimation of another commission which would be given when it should please the Lord to reveal it.

In Acts xx. this new commission is associated with "bonds and afflictions". It indicated that Paul's earlier ministry had come to an end, and that the Ephesian believers should see his face no more. He looks forward to "finishing his course" (Acts xx. 24), and, as recorded in II Tim. iv. 7, he does finish that course.

No careful reader of Acts xx. 17-38 could fail to see that Paul is summing up one ministry and looking forward to another, but this new ministry is directly associated with "bonds"; in other words, it is "a prison ministry", with its new revelation and dispensation. Acts xxii. 21, like Acts xx. and Acts xxvi., make known, for the first time what the Lord said to Paul. The words of Acts xxvi. 16-18 were kept secret until Paul was a prisoner. In face of these scriptures, then, our brother's suggestion: "Was it not rather God's revelation to Paul from his first calling on the road to Damascus?" is flatly negatived. It was not the first revelation. Paul himself says so, and the very passages to which our brother refers us entirely overthrow his contention.

We believe that those of our readers who have followed this criticism will feel that if that is all that can be brought forward against our position, those responsible for The Berean Expositor are justified in the general pursuit of their policy of expounding positive truth, for very occasionally only would the devotion of precious space and time to the type of criticism here dealt with be to edification. Every reader should take each of our critic's points, as though they were personal to themselves, and then, as true Bereans, "search and see". We should then have no fears as to the result.

#24. The Revised Version.
The consistent translation of identical words.
pp. 23 - 28

The Translators of 1611 who produced our Authorized Version knew quite well that a literal rendering of the Greek original demanded that one English equivalent should, as far as possible, be used for each important word in the Greek. They adopted, however, a quite different principle, which they have expressed in unmistakable language:--

> "Another thing we think good to admonish thee of, gentle reader, that we have not tied ourselves to an uniformity of phrasing, or to an identity of words, as some peradventure would wish that we had done . . . . . Truly we might not vary from the sense of that which we had translated before . . . . . we were specially careful . . . . . But that we should express the same notion in the same particular word; as, for example, if we translate the Hebrew or Greek word once by purpose, never call it intent; . . . . . if one were joy, never call it gladness, etc., thus to mince the matter, we thought to savour more of curiosity than wisdom."

It is easy to sweep aside these arguments, but there is one incontrovertible fact to be remembered—that no language exists that is capable of providing a word-for-word equivalent for either the Hebrew or the Greek. At the best, the most severely literal rendering is a compromise. What the reader gains in one direction he loses in another. No version in English or in any other tongue can ever take the place of the inspired original. The translator, therefore, must himself make the decision, as before God, as to whether he shall adhere to the letter as much as possible, or whether he shall provide his reader with a version as near to the spirit of the original as his mother-tongue will permit without making the rendering stilted or too scholastic. The Revisers have explained their attitude to the inconsistent renderings of the A.V. as follows:--

> "The frequent inconsistencies in the Authorized Version have caused as much embarrassment from the fact already referred to, namely, that a studied variety of rendering, even in chapter and context, was a kind of principle with our predecessors . . . . . There are, however, numerous passages in the Authorized Version in which, whether regard be had to the recurrence (as in the first three gospels) of identical clauses and sentences, to the repetition of the same word in the same passage, or to the characteristic use of particular words by the same writer, the studied variety, adopted by the Translators of 1611 has produced a degree of inconsistency that cannot be reconciled with the principle of faithfulness. In such cases we have not hesitated to introduce alterations, even though the sense might not seem to the general reader to be materially affected."

With these considerations before us, that will perhaps prevent us from entertaining hard thoughts of those who laboured in the Word years ago, we may turn to the Revised Version and notice where the A.V. has been altered so that the renderings shall be more uniform.

This restoring of uniformity is shown in two ways:--

(1) The rendering of the same Greek word by one English equivalent, as far as the English idiom would permit;
(2) The distinguishing of words which in the A.V. were liable to be confused with other words in the original.

Let us take as an example the recurrence of the word katargeo in I Cor. xiii.:--

A. V.	R. V.
"Whether there be prophecies, they shall fail" (8). "Whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away" (8). "That which is in part shall be done away" (10). "When I became a man, I put away childish things" (11).	"Whether there be prophecies, they shall be done away." "Whether there be knowledge, it shall be done away." "That which is in part shall be done away." "Now that I am become a man, I have put away childish things."

Here it will be seen that the R.V. seeks to give the English reader the insistent connection is so obvious to the reader of the Greek. Moreover, the A.V. makes a false connection, by translating two different words by "fail" in verse 8.

The Revisers seem to have failed in the last reference. The whole argument of I Cor. xiii. 8-13 is to show that the supernatural gifts of the early church were to be considered as pertaining to the "partial" and not to the "perfect"; in other words, gifts belong to the "childhood" of the church and not to its "manhood". This should be allowed its full force, and the same word should be repeated four times. The R.V. has gone some way in this direction, but has just failed of completeness.

Both Mark and Luke record the healing of blind Bartimæus (Mark x. 53 and Luke xviii. 42). The language in the original is the same in both cases, but the A.V. translates Mark's account: "Thy faith hath made thee whole"; and Luke's account: "Thy faith hath saved thee." Now it is easy to condemn, but we are enjoined in Philippians "to take account" of the smallest virtue (Phil. iv. 8, R.V. margin); and on examination we shall find that this lack of verbal agreement has some degree of justification. The fact is that neither of the translations offered is adequate. The original says both things, for the word "to save" includes the conception of "healing". The A.V. informed the reader of this by a marginal note. The Revisers adopted the other plan, of keeping the translation of the two passages identical and supplying the reader with the necessary information in the margin. Of the two the R.V. is the better. This is but one instance out of many where these small but important adjustments have been made.

As a further example of the better course adopted by the Revisers, we may take two other parallel passages in the Gospels:--

"There was darkness over the whole land until the ninth hour" (Mark xv. 33, A.V.).
"There was a darkness over all the earth, until the ninth hour" (Luke xxiii. 44, A.V. margin—"or land").

The R.V. reads “land” in both passages, but in each case gives the marginal note—“or earth”.

Some of the alterations made by the Revisers have been hastily condemned, but it is surely wise to investigate carefully before passing judgment on such a work as this, produced under the conditions we have already described.

At first sight it may seem to be the intrusion of pedantry to alter the words of the A.V.—“There were two thieves crucified with Him”—To “There were two robbers”. A thief acts by stealth, a robber by violence; and Barabbas, says the A.V., was a “robber”. This change re-establishes one connection which would otherwise be lost. The Lord speaks of “a thief and a robber” (John x. 1). And Matt. xxi. 13 gains in force and truth when we read that the rulers of Israel had turned the house of God into a den of “robbers”. This agrees with Jer. vii. 11, and indicates the brazen openness of their extortionate plundering of those who came up to the temple worship. So again, in Luke x. 30, the man going down to Jericho fell among “robbers”, not thieves; and this throws light upon the “perils of robbers” of which Paul speaks (II Cor. xi. 26). The wild state of the times, and the mixed motives of patriotism and private greed, are further illuminated by the statement that Barabbas was connected not only with robbery, but with “insurrection” and “murder”. The dying “robber” may have been one who had thus entertained hopes of re-establishing the Kingdom; he was blessedly enlightened before he died. Again, men do not usually employ an armed force with swords and staves to take a “thief”, though they may to apprehend a “robber”, especially in days when robbery was associated with political motives (Mat.. xxvi. 55).

We wish to express our indebtedness for many examples brought forward in this series, to the careful collation made by Dr. Brooke Foss Westcott, whose labours have much facilitated our study in this direction.

We are often rather shy of repetition in writing, and usually try to find some convenient synonym to avoid repeating the same term. In some cases, however, there is great force in exact repetition, as for example, the following: The A.V. of John iii. 31 reads:--

> “He that is of the earth, is earthly, and speaketh of the earth.”

This not only makes a difference to the sense of the passage, but also suggests a false connection with the word “earthly” in verse 12. As we read the R.V. rendering, we are impressed by its simple majesty:--

> “He that is of the earth, is of the earth, and of the earth he speaketh.”

As another example, we may take the occurrences of the word logizomai in Rom. iv. The word occurs eleven times (verses 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 22, 23, 24) and is translated in the A.V. “counted”, “reckoned” and “imputed”. The Revised Version uses throughout the chapter the one word “reckon”, and so gives the argument its scriptural import and insistence. This is a decided gain to the English reader.

Let the reader now turn to I Cor. xv. 27 and 28 in both Versions. We give the R.V. only, as most readers will have the A.V. available. The repetition of the word “subject” and its variations is too important to sacrifice for mere euphony:--

> “For He put all things in subjection under His feet. But when He saith, all things are put in subjection, it is evident that He is excepted Who did subject all things unto Him. And when all things have been subjected unto Him, then shall the Son also Himself be subjected to Him that did subject all things unto Him, that God may be all in all.”

No real distinction is made in the A.V. between those who are “abolished” and those who are “subjected”. The English reader is apt to see no distinction between the “enemies” that are “put under His feet” (verses 25, A.V.) and those who are also “put under His feet” in verse 27, A.V. The differences are retained in the R.V., and false connections, and, more important still, false deductions are not so likely.

The reader of The Berean Expositor does not need to be reminded of the place that the ministry of Paul occupies in our teaching. But we must avoid any inferences which are not justified by the original. On one occasion we remember hearing a zealous supporter of dispensational truth endeavouring to magnify Paul at the expense of Peter by stressing the A.V. of Gal. ii. 8:--

> “For He that wrought effectually in Peter to the apostleship of the circumcision, the same was mighty in me towards the Gentiles.”

The R.V. restores the balance:--

> “For He that wrought for Peter unto the apostleship of the circumcision, wrought for me also unto the Gentiles.”

With these examples we must rest content. We hope that the reader will be stirred up to make a complete survey of these alterations, for consistency of translation goes a long way towards the realization of the teaching of the Spirit. We must next turn our attention to other aspects of the Revised Version.

#25. The Revised Version.
"Things that differ."
pp. 66 - 69

There are two verbs in constant use throughout the N.T. which the R.V. has distinguished, but which are often confused in the A.V. These two verbs are eimi, "to be", and ginomai, "to become".

For example, in the epistles to the Corinthians:--

> "Ye were bought with a price; become not bondservants of men" (I Cor. vii. 23).
> "If the ministration of death . . . . . came with glory . . . . . how shall not rather the ministration of the spirit be with glory" (II Cor. iii. 7, 8).

Here the change of verb is registered and the essential difference between the two covenants enforced.

Again, in Luke:--

> "Which of these three, thinkest thou, proved (not 'was') neighbour unto him?" (Luke x. 36, R.V.).

The question was not so much what the man was, but how he responded when the time came; and to convey this the Revisers have used the word "proved".

Again, the A.V. of John ix. 39 is harsh and misleading. The Lord did not say that He came "into this world . . . . . that they which see might be made blind", but that they might "become" blind, as a result of their added responsibility.

In John i. 14, instead of the "The word was made flesh", the R.V. reads: "The Word became flesh", a rendering which is more in agreement with the intention of the writer.

Again, in I Cor. xv. 45, the R.V. reads:--

> "The first man Adam became a living soul. The last man Adam became a life-giving Spirit."

In II Cor. v. 21, the contrast in the original between the words, "to be made" and "to become" is obscured in the A.V. The R.V. restores it:--

> "Him who knew no sin He made to be sin on our behalf; that we might become the righteousness of God in Him."

In Rom. vii. 13, the A.V. reads as though there were two verbs used—"made death" and "become exceeding sinful". The R.V. restores the sense of the original, reading "become" in both cases. For some reason, however, the Revisers seem at times to have departed from this consistent rendering, as for example in Matt. v. 45: "That ye may be sons of your Father" (R.V.); The Revisers have rightly substituted "sons" for the A.V. rendering "children", but have failed to make the other necessary change.

The N.T. uses two distinct terms to set forth the believer's filial relationship with the Lord—"children" and "sons". Sonship, which is prominent in the writings of Paul, conveys the ideas of inheritance, privilege and dignity. Childship, which is characteristic of the teaching of John, suggests the thought of tender relationship. Sons may be adopted; children can only be born. The two conceptions are evidently complementary: but they must be realized separately before the full force of the whole idea which they combine to give can be understood. It was, however, felt to be impossible to change the phrase "the children of Israel" to "the sons of Israel". With this exception (and one accidental omission of the mark of reference in Matt. xxi. 28) we believe that the use of the word "child" (and "children") is always marked in the Revised Version; and that with the clearest gain to the peculiar force of the narrative (Mark ii. 5; Matt. ix. 2; Luke xv. 31; xvi. 25; Matt. xxi. 28), and of the address (I Cor. iv. 14; I Tim. i. 2-18; Titus i. 4, etc.), no less than to the exact definition of spiritual relations. On the other hand, the wonderful title "sons of God" holds its true place, according to the exact usage of the original. Where the A.V. reads "sons" in John i. 12, the R.V. correctly reads "children" (so also in I John iii. 1, 2). Conversely, the A.V. incorrectly reads "children" where "sons" is the true rendering (see Luke xx. 34 and Rom. ix. 26 where the R.V. has made the necessary correction). Again the true rendering of Matt. v. 9 is given in the R.V.:--

> "Blessed are the peace-makers for they shall be called the sons of God."

This brings the passage into line with the correction of Matt. v. 45, where "sons" is again the true rendering.

The whole context of Gal. iii. 26 is concerned with adoption, the emancipation of the full-grown "son" from the tutors and governors of his childhood (Gal. iv. 1, 2). The R.V. makes the very necessary alteration:--

> "We are no longer under a tutor. For ye are all sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus" (Gal. iii. 26).

Much of the above is quoted from Dr. Westcott, but it is difficult to indicate the quotations as they are so interwoven with our own remarks. Where possible we use quotation marks in the remainder of this article.

Another example of the usefulness of the R.V. is found in its rendering of Rom. iii. 25. The A.V. speaks of the "remission of sins that are past" with a marginal note: "or passing over." The confusion of the two words aphesis and paresis

> "has led to the complete inversion of St. Paul's meaning. The sins of former times were neither forgiven nor punished: they were simply passed over; and for this reason there was need of the vindication of the righteousness of God, because of the passing over of the sins done aforetime, in the forbearance of God."

Further examples selected from the Student's Concordance to the New Testament (Revised Version, London, 1884), will repay investigation. Some of them we give here.

Instead of "spirit" in Matt. xiv. 26 and Mark vi. 49, the R.V. gives "apparition"; which leaves the word "spirit" as the correct translation of pneuma. Instead of "hidden" in Luke ix. 45 the R.V. gives "concealed"; this is an attempt to recognize the preposition para that is used in combination with the verb "to hide". The translation of hieros by "sacred" in I Cor. ix. 13 and II Tim. iii. 15 is an advantage, as it leaves the word "holy" to translate hagios. The added force of the translation "shudder" in James ii. 19 is suggestive. "Stupor" is found in Rom. xi. 8; "to train" in Titus ii. 4; "without self-control" in II Tim. iii. 3:--

> "There is again a most significant progress in man's opposition to the truth, which is greatly obscured in the Authorized Version. First comes the simple absence of belief (ou pisteuein); this is followed by disbelief (apistein); and at last unbelief issues practically in disobedience (apeithein). Thus we are able to follow a natural moral movement when we read in the record of the appearances of the risen Lord, that the disciples 'disbelieved' the great tidings of Mary Magdalene, and 'believed not' the later statements which came to them (Mark xvi. 11, 13). So also 'disbelief' and not absence of belief is the ground of man's condemnation (Mark xvi. 16; comp. Acts xxviii. 24); and the English reader can enter now more fully than before into the meaning of St. John's words when he reads, He that believeth on the Son hath eternal life; but he that obeyeth not (not believeth not) the son shall not see life. John iii. 26" (Dr. Westcott).

Further examples of this important rectification will be found in Acts xix. 9 ("hardened and disobedient"); Rom. xv. 31; Rom. xi. 30-32; Heb. iii. 18; iv. 6-11 and xi. 31. The alterations in Hebrews are vital. It would take an article to point out the extreme value of the R.V. in this epistle. Perhaps enough for the time will be said if we draw attention to the stress on "obedience" and "obey" in Heb. v. 8, 9.

We trust that these studies will lead many readers who have hitherto neglected the Revised Version, to consult it before coming to conclusions arrived at apart from the original itself.

#26. The Revised Version.
The prepositions.
pp. 114 - 117

It has been said that "prepositions alter prepositions"; and all will agree that issues as diverse as life and death may hang upon the words "in" and "out of".

The Revisers have in many instances given accurate renderings of the various prepositions. Their note with regard to this question is as follows:--

> "Many changes have been introduced in the rendering of the prepositions, especially where ideas of instrumentality or of mediate agency, distinctly marked in the original, had been confused or obscured in the translation. We have, however, borne in mind the comprehensive character of such prepositions as 'of' and 'by', the one in reference to agency and the other in reference to means, especially in the English of the seventeenth century; and have rarely made any change where the true meaning of the original as expressed in the Authorized Version would be apparent to a reader of ordinary intelligence."

Compare the A.V. rendering of Matt. i. 22 with that of the R.V., noting the changed prepositions:--

> "Now all this was done that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying" (A.V.).
>
> "Now all this is come to pass, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the Lord through the prophet, saying" (R.V.).

The nice distinction between apo, "from", and ek, "out of" (indicating the source from which anything flows) is almost impossible in idiomatic English, but an attempt is made in the R.V. of II Cor. iii. 5 to show the difference:--

> "Not that we are sufficient of (apo) ourselves, to account anything as from (ek) ourselves, but our sufficiency is from (ek) God."

In this the more usual renderings of apo by "from" and ek by "of" are reversed, but the contrasted "from ourselves" and "from God" are retained. The A.V. renders both apo and ek by the same preposition "of":--

> "A variation in the use of prepositions often suggests instructive lines of thought . . . . . Here, in I Cor. xii. 8, 9, in the description of the manifestation of the Spirit we read in the Authorized Version, 'To one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit, to another faith by the same Spirit'.
> Thus 'the word of wisdom', 'the word of knowledge' and 'faith' are presented in exactly the same connection with the Spirit, as simply given 'by' Him. But in the original three different prepositions are used to describe the relation of these three gifts to the Spirit, represented exactly in the Revised Version by 'through the Spirit', 'according to the Spirit' and 'in the Spirit'. The English reader is necessarily led to consider > whether this unexpected variation does not throw some light upon the gifts themselves . . . . . He will feel that perhaps 'wisdom' is absolute, unchangeable, belonging to things eternal; that 'knowledge' is progressive and 'grows from more to more'. If this be so, he will understand that, in one case, the Spirit is, as it were, the Speaker of the word in the soul; that in the other case, He is the Guide Who directs and rules and regulates the observation which finds expression through man. And when he has realized this twofold action of the Spirit, He will be prepared to consider that there is yet a third relation in which we may stand to Him. We may be, as it were, lost in Him, enwrapped in His transfiguring influence. Then faith which wields the power of the world to come has its scope. Now even if this particular interpretation be faulty or imperfect, still it will not have been without use that the English reader has been constrained, as the Greek reader, to take account of the manifold action no less than the manifold gifts of the Spirit" (Bishop Westcott).

As Bishop Westcott has himself expressed some doubts as to the interpretation of this passage, we are under no necessity to criticize. Quite apart from the interpretation itself, his words will perhaps quicken the reader's interest in the correct translation of the Greek prepositions.

Another passage dealing with gifts of ministry that is intimately connected with our own calling and dispensation, is Eph. iv. 12. The A.V. rendering is:--

> "For the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ."

The R.V. reads:--

> "For the perfecting of the saints, unto the work of ministering, unto the building up of the body of Christ."

The preposition here are pros (R.V. "for") and eis (R.V. "unto"). Instead of three succeeding items as suggested by the A.V. "For . . . . . for . . . . . for", we have one phrase introduced by "for" branching out into two parallel phrases introduced by the second preposition "unto".

While the R.V. had made many useful alterations in the prepositions, it still remains an almost insoluble problem as to how the various prepositions with their niceties of meaning can be rendered into intelligible English.

Take for example John xvi. 27, 28 and 30. Where the A.V., in verse 27, says "came out from", the R.V. reads "came forth from"; where the A.V., in verse 28, reads "came forth from", the R.V. goes back to "came out from"; while in verse 30, both versions have to use the words "camest forth from" for a different preposition. In verse 27 we have para (beside) and ek (out of), para ton theou exelthou. In verse 28, we have exelthou para. The reader naturally wonders why the A.V. and the R.V. did not use the same expression twice over, and also why the R.V. went to the trouble to reverse the order. When we know that this alteration necessitated a two-thirds majority at the second revision, we cannot contemptuously dismiss it as trifling. But we realize what a confession this is of sheer inability to give the English reader an equivalent for the Greek original. To add to the problem, although verse 30 introduces another preposition, apo theou exelthes, yet both the A.V. and the R.V. translate this preposition as they translate para in verses 27 and 28. None but those who have attempted translation know the problems and the pitfalls that beset the translator's path, and they who are loudest in condemnation of their proposals, are generally (like the street-corner politician) those most unfitted for the work.

The phrase "in Christ" stands for that which is so vital, that its restoration in many passages obscured by the A.V. would alone justify the use of the R.V. Thus in Rom. vi. 23 we read, "The gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord". The R.V. shows that this should read, "in Christ Jesus our Lord". So in Rom. vi. 11, we are alive unto God "in Christ Jesus"; and we are justified not merely "by Christ" but "in Christ" (Gal. ii. 17). The peace of God not only guards our hearts and thoughts "through" but "in Christ Jesus" (Phil. iv. 7). The R.V. of Phil. iv. 13 reads, "I can do all things in Him that strengthened me". And again, in Phil. iv. 19:--

> "My God shall fulfil every need of yours according to His riches in glory in Christ Jesus" (not simply "by Christ Jesus").

These are important examples of the restored force of the original Greek prepositions, and emphasize that "all our springs are in Thee".

In our next article we must consider the problem of the Greek verb and how it has been dealt with by the Revisers.

#27. The Revised Version. The verb and its tenses.

pp. 156 - 158

The English word "verb" is the Latin verbum, meaning a word, because the "verb" is the word in a sentence. Hitherto we have been concerned with questions of vocabulary, and even then we found some words almost impossible of exact translation. When we come to the Greek verb, and especially its tenses, we have something which finds no equivalent in English or in modern languages. Let us take a view of some of the tenses of the Greek verb and see how the R.V. has made alterations for the better.

The imperfect tense is one that is recognized by most scholars. "The idea of purpose, or of beginning, or of repetition" is conveyed by the imperfect, and has been expressed in the R.V. in many places. Note the following:--

> "Their nets were breaking" is a truer rendering of the imperfect than the A.V. "their net brake" (Luke v. 6).
>
> "The boat was now filling" (Mark iv. 37).
>
> "John would have hindered Him" (Matt. iii. 14).
>
> "He continued making signs" (Luke i. 22).

The present tense is often veiled by the A.V. Note the vividness of the following revisions:--

> "All are seeking thee" for "All men seek for thee" (Mark i. 37).
> "The darkness is passing away" (I John ii. 8).
> "Are perishing . . . . . are being saved" (I Cor. i. 18).
> "Is being renewed" (Col. iii. 10).

Note also this tense in these passages of I Thessalonians:--

> "Jesus, which delivereth us from the wrath to come" (I Thess. i. 10).
> "Walk worthy of God, Who calleth you unto His own kingdom and glory" (I Thess. ii. 12).

Take again the great difference—to be seen and remembered—between the command, "Be strong", of II Tim. ii. 1, A.V. and the "Be strengthened" of the R.V. The same idea underlies the change in Rom. iv. 20. Abraham was not only "strong in faith" (A.V.), but "waxed strong in faith" (R.V.). So also the familiar "Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of His might" (Eph. vi. 10) becomes "Be made strong" in the R.V. margin.

The most difficult tense to translate into English is the aorist. Its very name means "indefinite or without bounds". Of this tense the Revisers have given a word in their preface:--

> "We have often ventured to represent the Greek aorist by the English preterite, even where the reader may find some passing difficulty in such a rendering because we have felt convinced that the true meaning of the original has been obscured by the presence of the familiar auxiliary. A remarkable illustration may be found in the seventeenth chapter of St. John's Gospel, where the combination of the aorist and the perfect shews, beyond all reasonable doubt, that different relations of time were intended to be expressed."

It would occupy too much space to set out the A.V. and the R.V. of John xvii., but perhaps one or two verses will suffice to display the difference. For the benefit of any reader to whom the terms perfect and aorist may be foreign, the auxiliary "have", as "I have glorified", is the sign in English of the perfect, while "I glorified" would, in contrast, represent the aorist:--

John xvii. 4-8.
A. V.	R. V.
"I have glorified Thee on the earth: I have finished the work which Thou gavest me to do." "I have manifested thy Name unto the men which Thou gavest me out of the world: Thine they were; and Thou gavest them me; and they have kept Thy word." "Now they have known that all things whatsoever Thou hast given me, are of Thee." "For I have given unto them the words which Thou gavest me, and they have received them, and have known surely that I came out from Thee, and they have believed that Thou didst send me."	"I glorified Thee on the earth, having accomplished the work which Thou hast given me to do." "I manifested Thy name unto the men whom Thou gavest me out of the world: Thine they were, and Thou gavest them to me; and they have kept Thy word." "Now they know that all things whatsoever Thou hast given me are from Thee." "For the words which Thou gavest me I have given unto them, and they have received them, and knew of a truth that I came forth from Thee, and they have believed that Thou didst send me."

The A.V. rendering of II Cor. v. 14 by "We thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead" is misleading. "We thus judge, that one died for all, therefore all died" of the R.V. is the truer translation. The A.V. directs attention to their previous death in sin, the R.V. to their death to sin with Christ. Compare also the following rectifications in the great doctrinal portion of the epistle to the Romans and elsewhere:--

A. V.	R. V.
"For that all have sinned."	"For that all sinned" (Rom. v. 12).
"We that are dead to sin."	"We who died to sin" (Rom. vi. 2).
"We are buried with Him."	"We were buried with Him" (Rom. vi. 4).
"Our old man is crucified with Him."	"Our old man was crucified with Him" (Rom.vi. 6).
"If we be dead with Christ."	"If we died with Christ" (Rom. vi. 8).
"Ye have obeyed."	"Ye became obedient" (Rom. vi. 17).
"As ye have yielded."	"As ye presented" (Rom. vi. 19).
"As many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ."	"As many of you as were baptized into Christ, did put on Christ" (Gal. iii. 27).
"Ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God."	"Ye died, and your life is hid with Christ in God" (Col. iii. 3)
"If ye then be risen with Christ."	"If then ye were raised together with Christ" (Col. iii. 1).

We are not unmindful of the fact that, as the Revisers themselves admit, circumstances were too strong for them, and many anomalies still exist. We are not advocating an unquestioning acceptance of the R.V., but we do believe that many earnest students of the Word (whose knowledge of the original is either scanty or nil) would do well to adopt the practice of comparing the two versions before coming to any decision.

We hope to give one paper more upon the R.V., but feel that in a series of this character we have written sufficient on the subject of the verb and its intricate tenses.

#28. The Revised Version.
The marginal notes, and the American Readings.
pp. 214 - 217

We are apt to look upon the marginal references of the R.V. as of slight importance, but we must remember that unless of two-thirds' majority was obtained for any alteration, the reading of the A.V. was retained. Matter placed in the margin of the R.V., therefore, indicates that it came up for serious consideration, but, failing to command the stipulated majority, could not be placed in the text, though it was of sufficient importance not to be passed undiscussed. It follows that in many instances, more votes must have been cast for the marginal note than for the text itself, as it now stands. The margin must therefore be considered as an integral part of the Revision of 1881.

The first use of the margin is to observe where there is an absence of notes. This may appear a strange remark, but it is nevertheless worthy of consideration.

Take for example the omission of the words, "Who is preferred before me" in John i. 27. The fact that the Revisers here felt themselves under no necessity to give a marginal note shows that the general consent of the Revisers went with this emendation. In verse 28, however, the A.V. "Bethabara" is altered to "Bethany", but, as there was considerable debate over the alteration, the statement is made in the margin that "Many ancient authorities read Beth-abarah, some Beth-arabah".

Or again, look at verse 18 of the same chapter. The text is identical with the A.V., "The only begotten Son", but the margin informs us that "Many very ancient authorities read God only begotten". Thus we know that at least one third of those who voted, if not more, were in favour of retaining the A.V. reading, but that the majority of the English Revisers were in favour of the alteration. To reiterate, many times the marginal note received more votes than did the text as it now appears, but so conservative were the rules, that while the votes of one-third were sufficient to secure the retention of the A.V. reading, the votes of two-thirds were necessary to alter it.

The whole of I John v. 7 is omitted from the R.V. without marginal comment. This indicates unanimity and should not be treated lightly. Verse 37 is omitted from the account of Philip and the Ethiopian eunuch in Acts viii., but the margin says, "Some ancient authorities insert wholly or in part verse 37". The words "and in your spirit, which are God's" are omitted from I Cor. vi. 20 without marginal note: so also are the words "of his flesh, and of his bones" from Eph. v. 30. There is evident unanimity in omitting from Rom. viii. 1 the words, "who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit".

While the omissions may outnumber the additions to the Received Greek Text, it is well to remember and to look out for any additions that have been made by the Revisers. The gracious words "even as ye do walk" of I Thess. iv. 1 are a precious reflection both upon the character of the Thessalonians. The exultant note struck by the addition to I John iii. 1 is also too good to pass unnoticed:--

> "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called children of God; and such we are."

Suggestive thoughts are started in the mind of the English reader by marginal notes such as is given to John i. 14, where it is noticed that the word "dwelt" is in the Greek, "tabernacled". In John viii. a more intensive contrast between Abraham and Christ is seen by observing the marginal note. Instead of "Before Abraham was, I am" the margin suggests "Before Abraham was born, I am".

The R.V. retains in many places the words, "The Holy Ghost", but in the margin of Matt. i. 18 we read, "Or Holy Spirit, and so throughout this book". Again, the word "devils" is retained, but the margin of Matt. vii. 22 and elsewhere reads, "Gr. demons". There is a wonderful progression in Matt. xx. 26 and 27 which is brought out by the margin of the R.V.:-- > "Whosoever would become great among you shall be your minister (margin, servant); and whosoever would be first among you shall be your servant" (margin, bond-servant).

Another light upon Christian ministry is found in the margin of Rom. xvi. 1 where Phoebe is called, "a deaconess of the church that is at Cenchrea".

In a few cases the reader is directed by the marginal note to a parallel passage, where the word may not be rendered the same. For example, the Greek word paraclete is translated "Comforter" in John xiv. 16, 26; xv. 26; xvi. 7 and "Advocate" in I John ii. 1, exactly as in the A.V. But the Revised Version, in each case, has this marginal note:--

> "Or Advocate or Helper. Gr. Paraclete."
> "Or Comforter or Helper. Gr. Paraclete."

While the text of the Revised Version retains the translations "eternal", "everlasting", "world", etc., there are plentiful marginal notes that draw attention to the fact that the Greek word so translated is, strictly speaking, the "age". See Eph. i. 21; ii. 2; iii. 11 and 21; Heb. i. 2; xi. 3 and I Tim. i. 17, where the marginal notes fully endorse the teaching given in The Berean Expositor as to the correct translation of the word aion.

We trust these illustrations will suffice to ensure that the reader of the R.V. will realize that the marginal notes are a real part of the Reviser's contribution, and use them accordingly.

We conclude this survey of the R.V. in this series by a reference to the American Notes, which are to be found at the end of the R.V.

Shortly after work upon the revision of the A.V. was commenced in June 1870 “steps were taken, under a resolution passed by both Houses of Convocation, for inviting the co-operation of American Scholars; and eventually two committees were formed in America, for the purpose of acting with the two English companies on the basis of the Principles and Rules drawn up by the Committee of Convocation. The English Revisers in their preface say: “We gratefully acknowledge their care, vigilance, and accuracy; and we humbly pray that their labours and our own, thus happily united, may be permitted to bear a blessing to both countries, and to all English speaking people throughout the world.”

#28. The Revised Version. (concluded).

p. 240

In this series we have endeavoured to let the Revised Version speak for itself, and its merits have been evident to all who have any ability to judge. We must however not leave the subject without an added word. We do not advocate that any should abandon the A.V. for ordinary reading or for public ministry, and we do not do so ourselves. We do however advocate the consultation of the Revised Version whenever the Word is studied, but there are serious objections to the exclusive use of the R.V. that outweigh its admitted merits.

We hope, in a subsequent series, to give the A.V. an opportunity of demonstrating its value and worth. Moreover, there are one or two passages in the R.V. that raise serious doubts in the mind of the reader. These we shall have to consider when dealing with the special features and merits of the Authorized Version.

"What manner of persons ought ye to be."

#7. Symbols of Service.
Debtors and Disciples.
pp. 13 - 15

The first symbol of service that we consider in this article is that of a debtor:--

> "Now I would not have you ignorant, brethren, that oftentimes I purposed to come unto you (but was let hitherto), that I might have some fruit among you also, even as among other Gentiles. I am debtor both to the Greeks, and to the Barbarians; both to the wise, and to the unwise. So, much as in me is, I am ready to preach the gospel to you that are at Rome also" (Rom. i. 13-15).

Paul's conception of his responsibility is expressed by the symbol of a debtor. It was something he "owed", something that was not a matter of feeling or fancy, but a definite debt to saved and unsaved. In the light of Rom. xiii. 8 we can see moreover that this debt was a debt of love: "Owe no man anything, but to love one another." Paul felt this sense of obligation when he twice asked prayer for himself:--

> "That I may speak boldly, as I ought to speak" (Eph. vi. 20).
> "That I may make it manifest, as I ought to speak" (Col. iv. 4).

All true service is the discharging of a tremendous debt. A debt to preach the gospel of Christ as the power of God unto salvation to everyone that believeth, whether wise or foolish, Jew or Gentile, Roman or Barbarian: And a debt to teach the truth in such terms that neither through fear ("speaks boldly"), nor through lack of clearness and plainness of speech ("make it manifest"), shall any miss the truth. Something of the same feeling of responsibility is expressed by the apostle when he wrote:--

> "For though I preach the gospel, I have nothing to glory of: for necessity is laid upon me; yea, woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel!" (I Cor. ix. 16).

For the apostle to call himself a debtor in connection with the discharge of his ministry indicates a lowliness of heart that we should emulate.

The second symbol of service before us (a disciple) also demands lowliness of heart and meekness of spirit. In Matt. xvi. we find one or two primary conditions that must be fulfilled if one would be a disciple:--

> "Then said Jesus unto His disciples, if any man will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow Me" (Matt. xvi. 24).

"Come after Me . . . . . follow Me."—These two essential conditions are accompanied by others that arise out of the nature of things. To follow Christ through a world of sin and darkness must of necessity arouse hostility and opposition; consequently the Lord adds: "deny himself and take up his cross." Matt. x. has already made it plain that this association with Christ will be attended by painful consequences:--

> "The disciple is not above his master, nor the servant above his lord. It is enough for the disciple that he be as his master, and the servant as his lord. If they have called the master of the house Beelzebub, how much more shall they call them of his household" (Matt. x. 24, 25).

It is evident that discipleship is something more than believing unto salvation, an element of endurance and continuance being implied in the title:--

> "Then said Jesus to those Jews which believed on Him, If ye continue in My word, then are ye My disciples indeed" (John viii. 31).

A continuation of the quotation from Matt. xvi. given above would have brought us to the subject of "reward", this also being associated in several passages with continuance and endurance.

Two more features characteristic of discipleship are given by the Lord:--

> "By this shall all men know that ye are My disciples, if ye have love one to another" (John xiii. 35).

This administers a wholesome corrective to a false deduction from the Lord's earlier words. While a true disciple cannot avoid being called the same hard names as his Master was called, the fact that the world hated a man and called him a devil would not necessarily constitute such a disciple of Christ. Hatred outside must be accompanied by love within: we have then the two sides of the question, and should be safe.

Finally, discipleship is not an empty profession:--

> "Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit: so shall ye be My disciples" (John xv. 8).

Discipleship, therefore, covers practically the whole of Christian service from the God-ward aspect, while the conception of service in terms of a "debtor" covers a great deal of service as seen from the man-ward point of view.

#8. Symbols of Service.
The ear and the eye.
pp. 48 - 50

The reader who has followed this series will by now have realized that we are lifting out from the Word a number of symbols of service, and presenting them alphabetically. We have considered up to the present the following symbols of service:--

AMBASSADORS, APOSTLES and ANGELS.
BONDSERVANTS, BUILDERS and BURDEN-BEARERS.
CALLING, CLEANSING and COMMITTING.
DEBTORS and DISCIPLES.

We do not suggest that every letter of the alphabet will prove of service, but as far as is possible we hope to pursue this course, so that we may in more senses than one learn the "A B C" of service. Should any reader feel that this method savours of levity or is fitted only for children, we would point to the inspired alphabetical Psalms and other passages of an acrostic nature in the Word. Our memories are not so good but they will be all the better for a little help, and an alphabetical arrangement is an aid to memory.

The two symbols of service that are before us to-day are the ear and the eye as used in Scripture with reference to service.

The bored ear.

> "If thou buy an Hebrew servant, six years he shall serve: and in the seventh he shall go out free for nothing . . . . . and if the servant shall plainly say, I love my master, my wife, and my children; I will not go out free; then his master shall bring him to the judges; he shall also bring him to the door, or unto the door post; and his master shall bore his ear through with an aul; and he shall serve him for ever" (Exod. xxi. 2-6).

One cannot read these words without immediately thinking of Psa. xl. 6-8:--

> "Sacrifice and offering Thou didst not desire; mine ears hast Thou opened (margin Heb. digged): . . . . . then said I, Lo, I come: . . . . . I delight to do Thy will, O my God", and of their fulfillment in Heb. x. 5, where the words "mine ear hast Thou digged" are interpreted by: "a body hast Thou prepared me."

As we have discussed these passages elsewhere, we merely present them here as beautiful symbols of service. Let us not miss the spirit of it all as expressed by the words "I love" of the Hebrew servant. His six years' service may have been of necessity, but his seventh and onward could only be entered if he could plainly say: "I love."

The service of love, symbolized by the bored ear, finds much exposition in the N.T., and the reader is urged to acquaint himself with those passages which are written in connection with the words of Gal. v. 13—"By love serve".

The consecrated ear.

> "Take Aaron and his sons . . . . . and sanctify them . . . . . and he brought the other ram, the ram of consecration . . . . . and he slew it; and Moses took of the blood of it, and put it upon the tip of Aaron's right ear" (Lev. viii. 2-23).
> "And the priest that maketh him clean . . . . . shall slay the lamb . . . . . and shall take some of the blood . . . . . and . . . . . put it upon the tip of the right ear . . . . . and the priest shall put of the oil . . . . . upon the tip of the right ear . . . . . upon the place of the blood of the trespass-offering" (Lev. xiv. 11-28).

As a matter of exposition, the above passages present two very different aspects of the truth, but for the present purpose they may be considered together. Whether priests who need consecration for service, or lepers who need cleansing and anointing before service is possible, we perceive the consecration, both by blood and oil, of the servant's ear. These figures are readily resolved into their spiritual realities. The precious blood of Christ, the sanctification of the Spirit, the application of both by the Word—these are essential to service. A bored ear for willing, loving service; an anointed ear for acceptable, consecrated service, and thirdly, an opened ear that one may minister words in season.

The opened ear.

> "The Lord God hath given me the tongue of the learned (learner, a disciple), that I should know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary: he wakeneth morning by morning, He wakeneth mine ear to hear as the learned (learner, a disciple). The Lord God hath opened mine ear, and I was not rebellious, neither turned away back" (Isa. l. 4, 5).

This passage, like Psa. xl., is Messianic, setting forth the true Servant of the Lord. To be able to speak, the servant must hear. To hear, he needs to be awakened, and his ear to be opened. If we covet that most gracious of ministries—"to be able to speak a word in season to him that is weary"—book learning will not avail, the ear must be bored, anointed and awakened, for we can only speak as we hear, if we are not to speak vain words out of our own hearts.

The second symbol of service before us is the eye:--

> "As the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters" (Psa. cxxiii. 2).
>
> "Deal bountifully with Thy servant, that I may live, and keep Thy Word. Open Thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of Thy law" (Psa. cxix. 17, 18).
>
> "Turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity" (Psa. cxix. 37).
>
> "Rivers of waters run down mine eyes, because they keep not Thy law" (Psa. cxix. 136).
> "Mine eyes prevent the night watches, that I might meditate in Thy Word" (Psa. cxix. 148).

What a variety of uses the eye of the servant has. First he watches for the signal of his master that he may render prompt obedience. Then he desires to behold the wondrous things hidden in the Word, and at the same time prays that he may have his eyes turned away from vanity. His eyes, too, shed tears, because men do not keep the Word, and often cut short the hours of sleep that the Word of God may be better understood.

Coming to the N.T., we learn the value of the "single eye" (Matt. vi. 22), the relative importance of the "mote" and the "beam" (Matt. vii. 3-5), a lesson none can learn too well. To the Church of the Laodiceans the Lord speaks of the anointed eye (Rev. iii. 18), which makes us think of the anointed ear.

Service must not be so construed in terms of activity, of business, of doing, that it leaves no time for hearing and for seeing. Service that is not regulated by the anointed ear and the anointed eye remains unblessed.

#9. Symbols of Service.
Fishers, forsakers and followers.
pp. 101 - 103

The first disciples called by the Lord were fishers:--

> "And Jesus, walking by the sea of Galilee, saw two brethren, Simon called Peter, and Andrew his brother, casting a net into the sea: for they were fishers. And he saith unto them, Follow Me, and I will make you fishers of men. And they straightway left their nets, and followed Him. And going on from thence, He saw other two brethren, James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother, in a ship with Zebedee their father, mending their nets: and He called them. And they immediately left the ship and their father and followed Him" (Matt. iv. 18-22).

In this passage we have two of the symbols that we are to consider in this article: the "fisher" and the "follower".

The Lord found these men "by the sea", where one would expect to find men of their calling. He did not look for them in the market-place, or in the field, or in the town. This at least is one good qualification for higher service. These men were diligent in their business, and not wasting time in vain efforts to do some other kind of work. While it is commendable to seek to advance and improve one's position, it is possible for there to be a restlessness and false pride which is very harmful. Those who have any responsibility in the choice of candidates for Christian service would do well to bear this in mind. It is recorded that one of the qualifications of a young man who applied to C. H. Spurgeon for admission into the Pastor's College was that he had made a failure of every job he had undertaken; hence he felt called to the ministry. We can readily understand Spurgeon refusing such an application. In Christian service, most of us find that our own peculiar temperament and manner of approach to things is not suppressed by the Lord when we enter His service. What the Lord said to Moses, he says to us all—"What is that in thine hand?" (Exod. iv. 2). The fiery zeal of Saul the persecutor was not quenched at his conversion, but sanctified and used in the service of his Lord. An art training that at first seemed wasted has enabled the writer to prepare numerous charts for us at meetings; and a knowledge of ornament and design has played some part in the perception of the balance and underlying pattern of the structures of Scripture.

We note next that, whereas Peter and Andrew were "casting a net into the sea", James and John with their father were "mending their nets". These operations represent two necessary and interdependent pieces of work. A net, however well mended, is valueless if it is never cast into the sea, while a net, however, vigorously cast into the sea, is valueless if it is badly broken. The same Lord calls some to be "casters", and some "menders". They are "fishers", not singly, but jointly. Some are called to preach; some to teach. Some are called to gather in; others to build up. The Lord has need of all.

The word translated "mend" in Matt. iv. 21 is used by Paul of the ministry given by the ascended Christ in connection with the dispensation of the mystery:--

> "And He gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints" (Eph. iv. 11, 12).

It is also used of the very valuable ministry detailed in Gal. vi. 1:--

> "Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one, in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted."

Another important thing which must not be ignored is the evident fellowship of all concerned. Andrew working amicably with Peter his brother; James and John together with their father Zebedee. Unity in service is not always easy to attain. There is nearly always some part of the service that is coveted by the fleshly mind, some office that is apparent and will receive public recognition; while there are other essential acts of service that can never be seen or assessed by man. Think of the many who must serve unknown and unrecognized in order that the pen-written article now in progress may be delivered in printed form to the home of the reader. The manuscript is passed on to friends who, as a labour of love, turn the rapidly-written words into clear typewritten characters. The type-script is then reviewed by other friends (who check all references), so that nothing shall pass into print without being checked, to some degree. It is then carefully made ready for the printer, punctuation marks, paragraphs and headings examined and style of type decided. Then there is the printing and proof-reading, the addressing of envelopes, the making up of parcels and the actual posting. And yet in most cases the only person actually thought of by the reader, if thought of at all, is the original writer, whose work would be useless without this co-operation.

Another important point in the passage under consideration is the unquestioning obedience of the four men. "They straightway left their nets." "They immediately left the ship and their father." Their nets represented their trade; their ship, the whole of their business and invested capital; their father, the claims of home and loved ones. It is well to count the cost, and to impress upon enthusiastic volunteers that there is a cost:--

> "He that loveth father or mother more than Me is not worthy of Me: and he that loveth son or daughter more than Me is not worthy of Me. And he that taketh not up his cross, and followeth after Me, is not worthy of Me" (Matt. x. 37, 38).

These four disciples left their all and followed Him. This leads us to the second symbol—that of the "follower". These men were ordinary fishers, putting into practice the age-old lore of their craft, handed down from father to son, and supplemented by experience. But to become "fishers of men", they must first be "followers of Christ". Moses had to leave Egypt and all its learning, and exchange it for the life of a desert shepherd before he was fit to be entrusted with the leading of Israel.

Earlier in this article we suggested, and we believe with truth, that much that belonged to our previous mode of life, our upbringing, temperament, opportunities and training, can be laid upon the altar of service, consecrated to the Lord, and remodeled for His use. We must not, however, forget that there is also much of the old that we must leave behind as we follow Him. We must be prepared to find our knowledge and experience of no value, and must sometimes, contrary to all our instincts, "Launch out into the deep". Let us conclude by recording this incident as a supplement and corrective to that of Matt. iv.:--

> "Now when He had left speaking, He said unto Simon, Launch out into the deep, and let down your nets for a draught. And Simon answering said unto Him, Master, we have toiled all the night, and have taken nothing: nevertheless at Thy word I will let down the net. And when they had this done, they enclosed a great multitude of fishes: and their net brake . . . . . When Simon Peter saw it, he fell down at Jesus' knees, saying, Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord . . . . . And Jesus said unto Simon, Fear not; from henceforth thou shalt catch men. And when they had brought their ships to land, they forsook all, and followed Him" (Luke v. 4-11).

#10. Symbols of Service.
Gatherers and Guides.
pp. 147 - 149

It is a solemn thing to realize that we are all either gatherers or scatterers, even though we may consider our attitude to be one of neutrality. The Lord has declared that there is no mid-way position that is neither for, nor against Him. It is a solemn fact that for any one not to be for Him means that he is against Him:--

> "He that is not with Me is against Me, and he that gathereth not with Me scattereth abroad" (Matt. xii. 30).

Without attempting to soften or mitigate this serious statement which touches us all whether we will or no, we would add to it another of the Lord's utterances, so that we may not wrongly interpret the first statement in any sectarian spirit:--

> "Master, we saw one casting out devils in Thy name; and we forbad him, because he followeth not with us. And Jesus said unto him, Forbid him not; for he that is not against us is for us" (Luke ix. 49, 50).

Although this man was not in manifest fellowship with the disciples (they could say, "He followeth not with us") the Lord revealed that there was a deeper unity than this; and we must ever be on our guard lest a mere party spirit should take the place of loyalty to the Lord and His truth.

The work of the scatterer is the work of the Evil One, and is assisted by the hireling:--

> "He that is an hireling, and not the shepherd, whose own the sheep are not, seeth the wolf coming, and leaveth the sheep, and fleeth: and the wolf catcheth them, and scattereth the sheep" (John x. 12).

The work of the gatherer, therefore, is the work of the shepherd. The figure of a shepherd is used freely in the Scriptures as a symbol of service, and will be considered in its own place. We here deal with the general significance of the gatherer. It was the desire of the Lord that He might gather the children of Jerusalem together as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings (Matt. xxiii. 37). And He is yet to send out His angels and gather together His elect from the four winds of heaven, as men gather in the sheaves into the barn at harvest home (Matt. xxiv. 31; xiii. 30, 39-43). The word is also used for the gathering of grapes (Matt. vii. 16).

Let us take stock of ourselves. How far can we honestly say that we are gatherers? Is it our tendency to bring together, or to scatter? Do we spend our strength in building up or in pulling down? Do we manifest the characteristics of the true shepherd or of the hireling?

The second symbol to be considered in this article is that of the guide. While a guide does not necessarily gather, he certainly leads on to the desired haven. The Jew, because of the special position he occupied in the plan of redemption, was peculiarly fitted to be a guide:--

> "Behold thou art called a Jew, and restest in the law, and makest thy boast in God, and knowest His will, and approvest the things that are more excellent, being instructed out of the law. And art confident that thou thyself art a guide of the blind" (Rom. ii. 17-19).

The Jew had every qualification for being a guide to the blind except one—he was blind himself. Among the reiterated "woes" of Matt. xxiii. the Lord refers to the blindness five times:--

> "Woe unto you, ye blind guides" (16).
> "Ye fools and blind" (17, 19).
> "Ye blind guides, which strain out a gnat and swallow a camel" (24).
> "Thou blind Pharisee" (26).

Upon examination it will be found that on each occasion when the Lord called these men "blind", He referred to ritualism being substituted for reality. To follow such leaders must end in destruction. If a guide mistakes the mirage for the real, must not all who follow him perish? If he feeds his followers upon the husks in mistake for the true wheat, shall they not starve? If he leads them to put their trust in the observance of days, months, weeks, years, sabbath days, meats and drinks (which are but shadows of the true), must they not go astray? "If the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch." So important is keenness of vision for the eastern guide, that no one is permitted by the Arabs to be a guide who cannot discern certain double stars, which to the ordinary town-dweller appear as one. As guides we need to see our path clearly, to discern the leading of the Lord, and to distinguish the shadows from the substance.

The gatherer, we found, was a title that could be borne by a shepherd. So also a shepherd can be a guide:--

> "But made His own people to go forth as sheep, and guided them in the wilderness like a flock" (Psa. lxxviii. 52).

Looking to the Lord for guidance as we seek to guide others, we observe that He "guides the feet into the way of peace" (Luke i. 79).

If we read the cry of the Ethiopian Eunuch, and Philip's response to it, we shall not be in doubt as to the character of the true guide:--

> "Understandest thou what thou readest? And he said, How can I except some man should guide me? . . . . . Then Philip opened his mouth and began at the same scripture and preached unto him Jesus" (Acts viii. 30-35).

This, then, is the essential difference between the blind guides and the true. The blind guides cannot see that all Scripture points to Christ, and so they lose themselves in shadows. The true guide will always "begin at the same Scripture" and preached Jesus.

#11. Symbols of Service. Helpers and Husbandmen. pp. 190 - 193

What is the earliest title of service recorded in the Scriptures? Surely it is the word "help":--

> "And the Lord God said, it is good that man should be alone: I will make him an help meet for him" (Gen. ii. 18).

Helper.

In Eve we have our first symbol of service, "the helper". And in Adam we have the second, for although the word "husbandman" is not actually used of him, we know that this was what, out of sheer necessity, he became after his expulsion from the garden: "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread" (Gen. iii. 19). So, at the very beginning of the Scriptures, we find the "helper" and the "husbandman" linked together.

In I Cor. xii. the apostle enumerates a number of spiritual gifts:--

> "God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues" (I Cor. xii. 28).

The gift of "helps" to the church is seen from this passage to be a comparatively lowly one, but the apostle has already warned us against lightly esteeming the lowly members of the body. Miracles may be more impressive, but in their absence how grateful we should be for a little help. We cannot all have the highest and most important gifts. Shall we do nothing because we cannot be apostles? Shall we fail to teach because we cannot prophesy? Shall we refuse help because we cannot work miracles?

The first gospel ministry of the apostle Paul in Europe is associated with this humble office of "help":--

> "And a vision appeared to Paul in the night. There stood a man of Macedonia, and prayed him, saying, Come over and help us" (Acts xvi. 9).

Paul's interpretation of the cry for "help" is: "assuredly gathering that the Lord had called us for to preach the gospel unto them" (Acts xvi. 10).

Apollos was a "helper" of the saints, for we read: "When he was come he helped them much which had believed through grace." Of what did this "help" consists? We read on to the next verse: "For he mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly, showing by the Scriptures that Jesus was the Christ" (Acts xviii. 27, 28). This brings the "help" of Apollos very much into line with the "guidance" of Philip (Acts viii. 30-35) which we have considered earlier.

Help is not confined, however, to preaching, teaching or doing, for the apostle writes: "Ye also helping together by prayer" (II Cor. i. 11). This is a ministry in which many may share who would otherwise be excluded from service. Furthermore, we must not allow the idea of helping in dire necessity, or under strenuous conditions, to exclude the gentler but no less important service indicated by the apostle in II Cor. i. 24:--

> "Not for that we have dominion over your faith, but are helpers of your joy; for by faith ye stand."

There were perhaps few intimate friends of the apostle Paul who were more dearly love or held in higher esteem than Priscilla and Aquila. Of these the apostle records:--

> "Who have for my life laid down their own necks: unto whom not only I give thanks, but also all the churches of the Gentiles" (Rom. xvi. 4).

Priscilla and Aquila provided hospitality for the apostle and a means of livelihood upon his arrival at Corinth (Acts xviii. 2). And they took Apollos to their home and showed him the way of God more perfectly, thus rendering him a great help to the believers (Acts xviii. 24-28). The depth of affection felt by Paul may be seen in the last salutation he sent to them: "Salute Prisca and Aquila" (II Tim. iv. 19). These stand firm, where others had failed (II Tim. iv. 10, 16), and the apostle indulges at the last in a little display of affection, calling Priscilla by the diminutive Prisca. Of these two believers Paul writes:--

> "Greet Priscilla and Aquila my helpers in Christ Jesus" (Rom. xvi. 3).

Who would not value the title of "helper" after seeing the record of two at least who bore it?

At some future point in this series we must consider the teaching of Scripture regarding the ministry of women. At the moment we simply draw attention to the fact that Eve, the first woman, was given to Adam, and was the first to be called a "help". That was her peculiar office, specially given by God Himself. She was a help "meet" for Adam, and therefore in no sense inferior to him. There is no suggestion in Gen. ii. 18-25 that Adam was created imperfect. The passage teaches us rather that God had no intention of endowing one person with all the gifts, for such independence would be his ruin. The church to-day needs its Priscillas quite as must as its Aquilas. May the sisters in Christ who read these words be encouraged to take their place in God's perfect plan, rejoicing in the privilege of being permitted to have a place in that service for which neither man nor woman is worthy apart from grace.

Husbandman.

The second symbol of service that we are to consider is that of the husbandman. There are at least three features that we may profitably consider under this head, although obviously there is scope in the subject for a much more extensive study. An occupation such as this—with all its associations of seed-time and harvest, ploughing, sowing, reaping, wheat and tares and fowls of the air, and all the interesting and typical operations of farming—would not only fill a long article, but could itself be taken as the subject of a lengthy series of articles. We have restricted ourselves to these three aspects of the subject by reason of the three separate references to service as husbandry that occur in the N.T.

(1) Husbandry calls for the exercise of much patience.

> "Be patient, therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Behold, the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and latter rain. Be ye also patient; stablish your hearts; for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh" (James v. 7, 8).

(2) Husbandry calls for patient labour, if the fruits are to be enjoyed.

> "The husbandman that laboureth must be first partaker of the fruits." Or, according to the margin: "The husbandman labouring first, must be partaker of the fruits" (II Tim. ii. 6).

(3) Husbandry implies a responsibility.—The parable of the wicked husbandmen makes this point clear. Instead of rendering to their Lord the fruits that were His, they conspire against His servants and His Son that they may keep them for themselves (see Matt. xxi. 33-41, Mark xii. 1-9 and Luke xx. 9-16).

There is a reward for faithful service—both James and II Timothy quoted above make this clear—but service for the sake of reward is another matter, and is fatal. This is a thing that should exercise us all, for the flesh is the same all the world over.

Helpers and husbandmen; these two symbols of service include us all, from the lowest to the highest, and both are titles of the Lord Himself (Heb. xiii. 6; John xv. 1; I Cor. iii. 9).

"When the commandment came"

(Being a series of articles based upon the testimony of readers as to the particular passage of Scripture that was used to enlighten them as to the unique character of the Dispensation of the Mystery).

#3. Genesis xv. 16 and its typical teaching.
pp. 7 - 9

One of the results of this enquiry is that it brings to light the fact that conviction as to the unique character of the mystery was not always brought about by "proof texts" on the subject, but often some out-of-the-way passage would be used to seal the truth to the heart. Such is the testimony we now reproduce:--

> "While the right division of the Word and the fixing of the dispensational boundary at the end of the Acts of the Apostles had cleared the way, the passage that flashed a light of understanding was the verse from Gen. xv. 16: 'for the iniquity of the Amorite is not yet full'."

This passage alone would hardly be intelligible without the clarifying work of right division, which our reader places first. According to his testimony the steps that led to conviction were:--

I. The recognition of the principle of "right division".
II. Its application to the question of the starting point of the present dispensation.
III. The illumination of the peculiar nature of this dispensation of the mystery by the strange reference to the Amorites in Gen. xv.

The principle of "right division" underlies all our ministry, both spoken and written, and does not call for special comment here. The importance of Acts xxviii. as a dispensational boundary likewise is ever in view. It colours the interpretation of every passage. The first question that we always ask in regard to any passage is: On which side of Acts xxviii. does it appear? The reference to Gen. xv., however, may not be so obvious. Let us first see the passage in which the Amorite is referred to:--

> "And he said unto Abram, Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not their's, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years; and also that nation, whom they shall serve, will I judge: and afterward shall they come out with great substance. And thou shalt go to thy fathers in peace; thou shalt be buried in a good old age. But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full" (Gen. xv. 13-16).

Here is a strange revelation. God had called Abram and he had responded. The land of promise had been entered and claimed (Gen. xiii. 14-18) and yet, here, in Gen. xv., the Lord speaks of a period of 400 years in which the seed of Abram, instead of entering the land, should be strangers in Egypt and in addition be afflicted there. When the fourth generation had come, however, Israel were to be delivered, and come again to the land of their inheritance, the reason for this strange interval being: "for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full."

The Amorites were a Canaanitish people, and devoted to destruction. They were, moreover, part of that awful seed associated with the Nephilim and the Giants. Og, king of Bashan, was one of their number. They were proverbial for their great stature (Amos ii. 9, 10). When Israel did at last receive command to enter into their inheritance, the dispossession of the Amorite was an essential condition. Deut. ii. 1-25 should be read, and the following features noted. Before the Lord speaks of Israel's inheritance, He draws attention to a peculiar feature that characterized the inheritance of Moab (9-11), Esau (12), and Ammon (19-22). In each case we find that the Canaanite is dispossessed and destroyed as a condition of entering into the inheritance. Take verse 12 as an illustration:--

> "The Horims also dwelt in Seir beforetime, but the children of Esau succeeded (margin, inherited) them, when they had destroyed them from before them, and dwelt in their stead; AS ISRAEL DID unto the land of his possession, which the Lord gave unto them."

"As Israel did" indicate that here we have a principle at work. What did all this mean to the reader whose testimony we are here giving? It meant that he realized that just as the earthly inheritance of Israel was temporarily held by the wrong seed, so heavenly places have been held by "spiritual wickednesses" (Eph. vi. 12). Satan as leader is the one who showed the false seed (called "the tares") in Matt. xiii. 24-30, and these—though destined to be rooted out and destroyed—are permitted to grow until the harvest.

The church of the mystery, though chosen "before the overthrow of the world", must patiently await the time when their spiritual Amorite fills up the measure of his iniquity, just as Israel had to be in bondage in Egypt until the iniquity of the actual Amorite was complete. The church of the mystery will enter its inheritance in heavenly places when the present occupants have been dispossessed and destroyed. This assists us to realize that the present dispensation is linked with a period that antedates the promises that belong to the earth, and is associated with the fall of Satan "before the overthrow of the world". No one would attempt to prove or teach the basic facts of the dispensation of the mystery from such a passage as Gen. xv. 13-16, but, as our reader says, the way having been cleared by right division, and the boundary already seen in Acts xxviii., the typical teaching of this passage might well flash into the mind, bringing a conviction to the individual that may not find a response in the heart of another not so prepared.

It is important to the teaching of the mystery that "heavenly places" are associated with a period "before the overthrow of the world", and with "principalities and powers", some of whom have fallen from this high estate. The Canaanites were usurpers. They were used by Satan to forestall the purpose of the ages. Israel were the true seed and the true heirs, even though they waited long for their inheritance. In like manner, the church was chosen in Christ before the overthrow of the world, but Satan was permitted to make manifest the instability of the creature. The true heirs of heavenly glory must therefore wait until the time appointed for the complete dispossession of the spiritual Amorite, for the day when they shall possess their possessions.

In these articles we are not advancing positive teaching, but giving the testimony of a number of readers. We have no right or authority to decide which testimony shall be deemed good or which shall be deemed indifferent; the very variety will show how the Lord still speaks "in sundry times and in diverse manners" in making all men see what is the dispensation of the mystery (Eph. iii. 9, R.V.).

#4. The testimony of the three spheres.
pp. 39, 40

The testimonies that we have cited hitherto have not taken us to obvious passages like Eph. iii., but have shown how passages that are somewhat removed from the actual revelation of the mystery can be used to illumine the subject. We come, however, in this testimony to one aspect of the subject that is positive in its teaching.

This friend (who is an active worker for Christ) has had a long and varied experience. Interest in the teaching of the epistles was first quickened by the suggestion of a friend that the occurrence and usage therein of prepositions and personal pronouns should be studied. This in its turn led to a more careful reading of the epistles, and at length

> " . . . . . the three hopes, Abraham's land, and city (Heb. xi.), and the hope laid up for you in heaven (Col. i. 5) led to a recognition of the mystery."

Anyone who has approached the revelation of the mystery in this way, will have seen it from the comprehensive standpoint, and will not be easily tripped up by details and seeming contradictions. After Acts xxviii. has been seen as the dispensational boundary, the three spheres of blessing into which the blessed hope is subdivided becomes obvious and most necessary if all Scripture is to be accepted without reserve. The three spheres of blessing are as follows:--

FAR ABOVE ALL PRINCIPALITY.
SUPER-HEAVENS.
THE BODY.
FELLOW-CITIZENS OF THE SAINTS.
(2).
THE HEAVENLY JERUSALEM AND ITS CITIZENSHIP.
THE BRIDE.
ABRAHAM'S SEED: JEW AND GREEK.
(1).
THE EARTH.
ISRAEL THE NATION.

It is most evident that no one person can be blessed in all three spheres, or even in two at one and the same time. One cannot be numbered among "the meek that shall inherit the earth", and at the same time be "seated together in the super-heavens". One cannot be the bride, and, at the same time, a member of the perfect man.

The one word that makes three spheres of blessing necessary to the fulfillment of Scripture is the word "adoption". This word is in some ways equivalent to the idea of the "Firstborn", and if we find three distinct companies to whom pertain the "adoption", three families would appear to be in view.

In the earthly sphere adoption belongs to Israel (Rom. ix. 1-6), with pre-eminence over the surrounding nations.

In the heavenly sphere adoption belongs to the seed of Abraham who inherit the heavenly city. This adoption is found in Gal. iv. together with the reference to "Jerusalem that is above". Parallel with this is Heb. xii., where the "birthright" and "church of the firstborn" are equivalent to the idea of adoption, and where the heavenly Jerusalem is again before us. This calling gives this church pre-eminence over angels.

In the super-heavenly sphere we have adoption (Eph. i. 3-5), and a citizenship of the saints. This calling gives this church pre-eminence over principalities and powers.

When once these three spheres are perceived, all Paul's epistles fall into their two spheres, the epistles of the circumcision are understood, and confusion is avoided.

We commend this testimony to any who may have been bewildered by the amount of detail that confronts the beginner. Leave for the time being the question of the correct interpretation of "before the foundation of the world". Leave the question as to how we must understand "in heavenly places". Leave the matter of Paul's claim in Eph. iii. 1-13, and look at Scripture as a whole, take the three distinct "adoptions" as your guide, and light will dawn. We commend this approach to the subject to all who seek to have the joy of making men see "what is the dispensation of the mystery" (Eph. iii. 9, R.V.).

#5. The testimony of the time appointed.
pp. 46, 47

In the last article the testimony was concerned with the "place where"; in the one before us it is concerned with the "time when", and both are of great importance.

The reader whose testimony is before us was for several years a member of what he calls, "the straitest of any sect", although we do not feel called upon to actually name the company in these pages. During this period a great amount of Bible study went on, not only in the meetings, but particularly in private. In due time a word was dropped concerning the mystical body of Christ, accompanied by the loan of the books How to enjoy the Bible and Dispensational Truth. Thereafter light began to dawn, but was temporarily checked by the perusal of Philip Mauro's The Gospel of the Kingdom. The seed, however, had been sown, and the "commandment came" with the reading of Col. i. 26. The fact that something once hidden by God was now made manifest to His saints, set our reader once more upon the quest, this time to be satisfied, even to the loss of all other fellowship for the Lord's sake. The verse that constitutes his testimony reads:--

> "Even the mystery which had been hid from ages and from generations, but NOW is made manifest to His saints" (Col. i. 26).

"NOW."—This was the arresting word. There is, therefore, some doctrine which appertains to the present time, which suits its requirements, and does not pretend to exhibit the accompaniments of other and different times.

This element of time and fitness is really an integral part in every message of God. Unless we can be assured that the word quoted applies now we remain unmoved. The whole teaching of the epistle to the Romans may be said to turn on the word "now" in chapter iii. 21, for the apostle had so reduced all men to the level of complete unrighteousness, that were no ground of righteousness possible now, no gospel could be preached. Further, the practical nature of union with Christ is enforced by the words of the apostle in Gal. ii. 20 where he says: "the life I now live in the flesh I live by faith of the Son of God." Not only was the future assured, but even the present with all its possibilities of failure could be interpenetrated by this new life and power.

What marvels of grace are resident in the "But now" of Eph. ii. 13. At one time so far off, so hopeless, Godless, Christless, and now, so near, so dear, so completely blessed.

The time "when" a message was received and delivered is an important item in its interpretation. In the Preface to Dispensational Truth we quoted the following words by Miles Coverdale:--

> "It shall greatly helpe ye to understande Scripture if thou mark not only what is spoken, or wrytten, but of whom, and to whom, with what words, at what time, where, to what intent, with what circumstance, considering what goeth before, and what followeth."

This is "right division", and the moment the principle of II Tim. ii. 15 is applied to the ministry of Paul light dawns. The whole truth will not be seen at once, and as our brother experienced there will be some misgivings and some retrogression, but the dawn cannot be hidden long by the clouds of man's making.

We commend this aspect of truth to all our readers, particularly to those who may be teaching others. If only hearers can be made to face the characteristics of the present time, e.g., the absence of Israel, and the cessation of gifts among the negative features, and among the positive features, the new sphere, "heavenly places", and the new constitution, "one new man", we feel sure that many now hesitating will be led on to conviction. Remember the presence of "now" in Col. i. 26 as you seek to enlighten men as to "what is the dispensation of the mystery" (Eph. iii. 9, R.V.).

#6. The testimony of the words "hidden" and "manifest".
pp. 73 - 75

The testimony which was given in #5 of this series spoke of the illuminating conviction brought about by the word "now" in Col. i. 26. And we sought to show, in the article dealing with this, the importance of the time element in our testimony to the mystery. Col. i. 26, however, is not exhausted. The friend whose testimony is now before us writes:--

> "With the help of the chronological order of the scriptures, it appeared that the scriptures previous to Ephesians and Colossians could not contain the revelation of the mystery, when the apostle could write by inspiration and say, "Which hath been hid from ages and from generations, but now is made manifest to His saints" (Col. i. 26).

By the phrase "chronological order" the reader must not understand our brother to mean the precise dating of the epistles. Whether Galatians was the first epistle, as we believe, or, as some believe, nearly the last, is not the point. Whether the dates of the epistles given by various authorities are accepted or rejected, makes no difference to the present witness. Whether I Thessalonians was written in A.D.52 or in A.D.54 is, for our present purpose, of no importance. Whether it was written before or after Acts xxviii. is of supreme importance. It is to this chronology of the epistles, and not to debatable dates, that our friend refers. No man's faith need rest in the wisdom of men, as it would if the exact dating of an epistle were of importance. It is not necessary to read one word outside the pages of the Bible to arrive at a complete understanding of the disposition of the epistles in relation to Acts xxviii.; and that is all that is necessary here.

Having been prepared by this application of "right division", our friend was ready for the illumination that came from the words "hid" and "manifest". If Col. i. 23-27 be true, then the apostle was the first to receive the revelation of the mystery. He was the only one to whom this dispensation was entrusted, and until he received the command to make it known, the mystery lay hidden in the mind of God. It was not hidden in types and symbols in the Old Testament, nor veiled in the parable form in the New. While it rests solidly upon the great basis of justification as taught in Romans, it is a superstructure which was unknown and unexplained to those to whom the gospel was perfectly clear:--

> "The mystery which hath been hid from ages and from generations."

It was not hidden by the rubbish of tradition, but by the will of God. This being so, it is not faith that seeks for the truth of the mystery in O.T. prophecy or type, but perversity. It is not faith to hold fast to the ministry of Christ in the Gospels, and to ignore His risen ministry; just as it was not real faith that prompted the bringing of the spices at His burial, ignoring His testimony that after three days He would rise again.

The significance of Col. i. 26, for our friend, was twofold. To learn that the mystery had been hid from all ages and generations would of itself bring no joy, teach no truth, and set no course; but to learn that what had hitherto been so hidden was now "made manifest" was news indeed. Shall God open His treasures, and man despise His grace? Alas, many seem to ignore the wonders of love that are herein displayed. They say, with the Jew, "The old is better".

This, then, is another testimony to the truth of the mystery. It will be using a passage already blessed to others if these two related features ("hidden" and "manifest") are given due weight by those who would enlighten their fellows as to what is the dispensation of the mystery (Eph. iii. 9, R.V.).

“With all thy getting, get understanding” (Prov. iv. 7).

#11. The fallacy: Fallacies classified.
pp. 35 - 38

Aristotle divided fallacies broadly into two sections: “Verbal” and “Non-verbal”.

Of the first class, which are not much more than verbal quibbles, he names six varieties:--

(1) Ambiguity of words.—This is met by clear definition.

(2) Ambiguity of structure.—Minto gives as an illustration:--

> “What he was beaten with was what I saw him beaten with: what I saw him beaten with was my eye; therefore what he was beaten with was my eye.”

Under this heading would come the misinterpretation of figures of speech, and the taking literally of what is meant figuratively, e.g., “This is My body”.

(3) Illicit conjunction.—Minto gives as an illustration:--

> “Socrates is good. Socrates is a musician. Therefore Socrates is a good musician.”

Here two items are joined together in the conclusion that have no necessary or logical relationship.

(4) Illicit disjunction.

(5) Ambiguity of pronunciation.—We remember the following incident that illustrates this class of fallacy:--

> A little boy attended school for the first time, and was told to sit in a seat quietly until he could be attended to. After a while he began to cry; upon being questioned as to his trouble, he exclaimed, “I was told to wait here for the present, and it has not come.”

This form of fallacy often depends on the confusing of verb and noun, which may both sound alike.

(6) Ambiguity of inflexion.—This is more likely to occur in a language rich in inflexions than in one in which they have been largely eliminated as in modern English.

Turning to Aristotle’s second division, we note the following cases of “non-verbal” fallacy:--

(1) The fallacy of the double question.—The standard example of this is the question: "How long is it since you left off beating your wife?" Many a person who objects that he has not received a "straight answer" to his question, has really fallen into this fallacy. For example, one who is ignorant of the fact that we distinguish between the phase of the hope which is taught in I Thess. iv. and that which is taught in Col. iii. may be surprised that we cannot return a "straight answer" regarding "the rapture" and other related subjects. To require a plain "Yes" or "No" for an answer, may often be an unjust demand.

(2) The fallacy accidentis.—This fallacy consists in obtaining assent to a statement with a qualification, and then proceeding to argue as if no qualification had been made, and vice versa. A common example of this fallacy is the use of the statement that "the letter killeth". This being agreed, the argument proceeds to discountenance all verbal study, use of concordances, study of grammar, etc.—a conclusion which is entirely false.

(3) The fallacy called non-sequitur.—When reviewing the pamphlet on Conditional Immortality in Volume XXIII, page 175, we drew attention to the prejudice introduced in the opening paragraph:--

> "It is a remarkable fact that, with the advancement of the Darwinian theory of evolution, the doctrine of annihilation became popular."

It may be a fact that these two doctrines advanced together, but what is not a fact is that the one grew out of or was caused by the other. The mind of the reader, however, is intentionally led to assume that such is the case. Many other things, some good, some bad, became popular at the same time, but only some of them were related as cause and effect. We must, therefore, be on our guard, lest we allow our minds to be persuaded that because two events are stated in sequence, they are necessarily related as cause and effect.

Shakespeare puts into Hotspur's mouth a sound refutation of this type of fallacy:--

GLENDOWER. "At my nativity,
The front of heaven was full of fiery shapes,
Of burning cressets; and, at my birth,
The frame and huge foundation of the earth
Shaked like a coward."

HOTSPUR. "Why, so it would have done at the same season, if your mother's cat had but kittened, though yourself had never been born" (1 Hen. iv. 3. 1, 13).

Many superstitions, faith in certain remedies, and other common beliefs are examples of this false type of reasoning.

(4) The fallacy called petitio principii (or surreptitious assumption).—The common name for this form of fallacy is "Begging the question". One can easily fall into it, as for example: "If one should attempt to prove the being of God from the authority of Holy Writ" (Whately).

Arguing in a circle is another form of the same fallacy. It assumes what is awaiting proof. For example, to the question, "How do you find the velocity of light?" the reply might be given, "We find that from the distance of the stars". If the questioner continued, "How do you know the distance of the stars?" and the reply was, "We know that from the velocity of light", the whole process would simply be arguing in a circle.

English lends itself particularly to the fallacy of "Begging the question" as it abounds in synonyms derived from several languages. A writer who begins in plain Anglo-Saxon, and proceeds in language derived from Latin, should be watched—for he may be telling you nothing, when he appears most erudite. If, for example, he says that "life is a vital force", he has merely repeated the idea of "life" in two languages.

(5) The fallacy called ignotatio elenchi is simply arguing beside the point, distracting the attention by irrelevant considerations. We quote Minto here:--

> "We should hold the point clearly in our minds, and watch indefatigably for corroborating propositions. But none of us being capable of this, all of us being subject to bewilderment by a rapid whirl of statements, and all of us biased more or less for or against a conclusion, the sophist has facilities for doing two things—taking for granted that he has stated the required premises petitio principii and proving, to perfect demonstration, something which is not the point in dispute, but which we are willing to mistake for it."

John Stuart Mill gives the following classification that may prove useful in further studies:--

Fallacies.

OF SIMPLE INSPECTION		(1) F. A PRIORI.
OF INFERENCE / FROM / EVIDENCE \ DISTINCTLY \ CONCEIVED. /	INDUCTIVE F.	(2) F. of OBSERVATION. (3) F. of GENERALIZATION.
	DEDUCTIVE F.	(4) F. of RATIOCINATION.
		(5) F. of CONFUSION.

The fallacy a priori is the argument from cause to effect. The fallacy of observation is illustrated by the excitement caused when an "Old Moore's prophecy" comes true, and the complete non-observation of the scores of "prophecies" that never approach fulfillment. The fallacy of generalization we have considered under the heading, Non-sequitur ("It does not follow."). The fallacies of ratiocination are examples of faulty logic. The fallacies of confusion we have already dealt with under various other terms.

We shall have to deal with this important phase of our study again, approaching it from other angles.

#12. Some elements of crooked thinking.
pp. 69 - 72

Robert H. Thouless, in his book "Straight and Crooked Thinking", has rendered a great service in the cause of truth by exposing some of the elements of "crooked thinking" that play a considerable part in controversial speaking and writing. In this article we shall follow, fairly closely, the outline he has given at the end of the book, together with many of his own illustrations.

(1) The use of emotionally toned words.—We must be on the look-out for the difference that exists between "objective" and "emotional" meanings: if we do not, we are likely, without our knowing it, to be swayed by prejudice. Thouless gives the well-known example of the declension of the word "firm": I am firm, thou are obstinate, he is pig-headed.

Prof. Charlton has rightly pointed out, however, that emotionally toned words have their proper place, especially in poetry. Take for example the lines of Keats from "The Eve of St. Agnes":--

> "Full on this casement shone the wintry moon,
> And threw warm gules on Madeline's fair breast."

Notice the emotional value of the words "casement", "gules", "Madeline", "fair" and "breast". "Gules" is the name used in heraldry to signify red. "Casement" conjures up an element of romance. Thouless rewrites the lines substituting plain words for emotional ones, that we may appreciate the difference:--

> "Full of this window shone the wintry moon, > Making red marks on Jane's uncoloured chest."

In the exposition of Scripture, we must be on our guard against emotional words, lest the truth suffer in consequence. Let the reader turn to the Gospel according to Matthew or Mark, and read the record of the crucifixion. Then let him imagine what a chapter Dickens would have made of it, and whether it could possibly have been read aloud.

Politics is a fruitful field for the development of emotionally charged words. For instance, "a fluent and forcible speech delivered by one of our party is eloquent; a similar speech by one of the opposite party is *rhodomontade". (*Vain boasting - from the boastful character of Rodomonte, in the Orlande Furioso of Ariosto).

Ruskin's comment upon Whistler's Nocturnes, provides another example:--

> "I have heard and seen much of cockney impudence before now, but never expected to hear a coxcomb ask two hundred guineas for flinging a pot of paint in the public's face."

The emotional tone of the words "cockney", "coxcomb" and "flinging a pot of paint" is very strong; and the passage is utterly unworthy of that master of good English, and champion of a good art, John Ruskin.

Let us not lose the power to speak, write, and think with plain words. All genuine feeling demands adequate expression, but even genuine feeling is neither proof nor evidence. The words "I feel" often introduce serious error:--

> "When we catch ourselves thinking in emotional phraseology, let us form the habit of translating our thoughts into emotionally neutral words."

Look at the following list of words, both having much the same meaning when reduced to cold fact, but likely to have very different effects upon the mind of the ordinary reader unless he be prepared:--

"The spirit of our troops."	"The mentality of the enemy."
"Their unquenchable heroism."	"Their ponderous foolhardiness."
"Summary execution."	"Base assassination."
"Wise severity."	"Atrocity."
"This fluent and forcible speech."	"This rhodomontade of extremists."
"These practical proposals."	"This suggested panacea.'

(2) A sophistical formula.—A fairly common way of avoiding or ignoring a sound refutation of an extreme position is to say that "the exception proves the rule". How often has valuable evidence been disposed of by a solemn quotation of this equivocal formula. Yet, if we thought for a moment about it, we could hardly fail to realize the falsity of the whole argument. If there be an exception, then the rule ceases to be universal. We have been misled in allowing ourselves to be persuaded that the verb "to prove" necessarily means "to prove true". It does not necessarily mean that; and in this case it means "to test", whether the statement under consideration be true or false. If there be an exception, that exception proves the rule to be false.

(3) The power of suggestion.—It is a "psychological fact that if statements are made again and again in a confident manner, without argument or proof, the hearers will tend to believe them, quite independently of their soundness, and of the presence or absence of evidence for their truth".

If any reader doubts the power of "repeated affirmation", let him think of the great business houses who spend thousands of pounds annually in placarding the country with advertisements; or of the practice, in "faith-healing" campaigns, of getting the assembly to sing the same choruses until they are all rocking to and fro and emotionally plastic. We earnestly plead with any who are responsible for meetings resolutely to forbid this unhealthy practice.

Another method of gaining an unfair victory is that of "suggestion by prestige". This may take the form of the use of imposing titles, or reference to one's qualifications or years of study. While we must, as believers, render to all their due, we must resolutely withstand any attempt to overwhelm the argument by mere prestige. Truth is independent of the channel through which it comes. Mere years of study may mean mere years of bias; and even the world has the proverb, "No fool like an old fool".

We do not intend here to give all the examples of "crooked thinking" that Thouless includes in his book; we will only add one or two more, without attempting to comment upon them:--

(4) Making a statement in which "all" is implied, but "some" is true.

(5) Proof by selected instances, and by inconsequent arguments.

(6) The appeal to mere authority.

(7) The use of generally accepted "tabloids" of thought.

(8) Argument by imperfect and by forced analogy.

This is but a selection from a list of thirty-four dishonest or fallacious types of argument. The last, dealing with analogy, is of great importance; and we hope to devote several articles to its consideration.

In closing, we should like to remind the reader of an obvious but important fact. The mere possession of a chart of physical exercises is not of any service to its owner unless he puts them into practice. In the same way, the mere fact that fallacies in argument have been tabulated and illustrated in this magazine will not be of much use to the reader, unless he personally puts this knowledge into practice. The reader should therefore study articles both from the newspaper, and from current literature (including articles in The Berean Expositor), with a view to detecting any of the fallacies which have been enumerated in this series.

#13. The importance of analogy.
pp. 111 - 113

After we have traversed the subject of logic and its place in the search for truth, after we have realized the fact that definitions, propositions, syllogisms, etc., are all important, we nevertheless shrink from the idea of never speaking, writing or reasoning except along the formal lines of pure logic. Such would be impracticable and most wearisome, and as a matter of fact has not and never will be practiced. The guiding principle of life, said Bishop Butler, is "probability". It is not mathematically certain nor absolutely sure that the sun will rise to-morrow, yet who is there that does not act as though it were a certainty? When we start on a railway journey, we do not, and we cannot, stay to enquire whether the signalmen are on duty, the driver experienced, the railway company faithful to its contracts, or that the station to which we travel actually exists. Probability is so allied to human experience as to amount to moral certainty.

When we come to the investigation of spiritual things, there is no other means of imparting knowledge, or of discovering truth, than by probability. The scientist cannot see God through telescope or microscope, but the very existence of a scientist is the surest proof that a greater intelligence than his own exists. In our studies under another heading, we drew attention to the teaching of the Apocrypha, and in the Book of Wisdom we read:--

> "For by the greatness and beauty of things created, the maker of them is judged of proportionably."

Now this word "proportionably" is analogos in the original, and the word analogia is found in Rom. xii. 6 in the phrase: "the proportion of faith." In its primary sense and use, analogy belongs to mathematics, and indicates the equality of ratios, which we usually speak of as proportion, and use the formula; As A : B : : C : D (as A is to B, so C is to D). In mathematics there is no room for "probability". There is no possibility of doubt that: As 3 is to 4, so 6 is to 8 or 9 is to 12.

Again, it is most important to recognize that in "proportion" we are not dealing with "resemblance", but relation. There is no resemblance, says the proverb, between chalk and cheese, nevertheless the proportion remains the same, whether by A B C D we mean cheeses and chalks or chalks and cheeses. The importance of this fact will be demonstrated later, but many an absurdity has passed for valid reasoning that has confused resemblance with relationship even among those believers who have learnt something of the truth concerning the "body of Christ", for some absurd conclusions have been drawn from the title "body" through failure to appreciate this distinctive character of analogy.

Martin F. Tupper in his "Proverbial Philosophy" has one or two lines on analogy that are helpful:--

"The wonderful all-prevalent analogy that testifieth one Creator, The broad arrow of the Great King carved on all the stores of His arsenal."

"The mind and the nature of God are shadowed in all His works,
And none could have guessed His essence, had He not uttered it Himself.

"For we learn upon a hint, we find a clue,
We yield an hundred-fold; but the great sower is analogy."

"Analogy is milk for babes, but abstract truths are strong meat;
Precepts and rules are repulsive to a child, but happy illustration winneth him:
In vain shalt thou preach of industry and prudence, till he learn of the bee and the ant;
Dimly will he think of his soul, till the acorns and the chrysalis have taught him;
He will fear God in the thunder, and worship His loveliness in flowers;
And parables shall charm his heart, while doctrines seem dead mystery;
Faith shall he learn of the husbandman casting good corn into the soil;
And if thou train him to trust thee, he will not withhold his reliance from the Lord."

"Wherefore it is wise and well to guide the mind aright,
So to talk of spirit by analogy with substance;
And analogy is a truer guide, than many teachers tell of,
Similitudes are scattered round to help us, not to hurt us;
Moses, in his every type, and the Greater than Moses, in His parables, Preach, in terms that all may learn, the philosophic lessons of analogy;
And here, in a topic immaterial, the likeness of analogy is just."

These words set analogy very high in the realm of teaching, and one has only to ponder the subject, and to search one's own experience, to find abundant confirmation. Many a discovery has been brought about by analogy. Christopher Columbus discovered America by analogy. Many of his conclusions proved false, but some were true and led to results undreamed of. By analogy, the ball and socket joined in the human skeleton led Stephenson to effect a great improvement in his locomotive engine.

With this introductory word concerning the importance of analogy, we will conclude, taking up the matter with more precision in our next article.

#14. The definition of analogy.
pp. 145 - 147

In our last paper we introduced the subject of analogy, and considered briefly, with a few examples, its importance and prevalence. The limits of the validity of argument by analogy are subjects of long-standing controversy. Varying conclusions have been reached, according to the state of mind of the times, and the approach to the subject, whether philosophical, mathematical or religious. We are chiefly concerned here with the use of analogy in the things of God and His revelation, and we need not, therefore, take up valuable time and space in dealing with the history of the controversy. Whately, speaking of analogy writes:--

> "Two things may be connected together by analogy; though they have in themselves no resemblance, for analogy is the resemblance of ratios or relations. Thus as a sweet taste gratifies the palate, so does a sweet sound gratify the ear, hence the word sweet is applied to both though no flavour can ever resemble a sound in itself."

Even Whately's use of the word "gratify" is an example of the analogous in language, for "gratify" indicates "gratitude", and the giving of thanks. It is used here figuratively, and of course rightly, for it is a false conception of truth and truth-telling to imagine that figurative language is not true. Indeed, the opposite is often the case; a figure of speech is often more true to the inner fact than any amount of "plain unvarnished speech" (to use another figure). However, in spite of the attempt on the part of Whately to limit analogy to relations, it will be found in ordinary use that:--

> "Some identity of nature is always postulated in every analogy, as in the instance just given both 'hearing' and 'tasting' are sensations."

When we turn to the Scriptures, we find that analogy is largely associated with what is called anthropomorphism, that is, the ascription of human passions, actions and attributes to God. The Hebrew name for this figure was Derech Benai Adam, "The way of the sons of men"; the Latin name is Condescensio, indicating the condescension of the infinite God, Who for the enlightenment of His creatures reveals Himself under human symbols and figures. We will not here turn aside from our theme, to deal with the place of figures of speech in general (this may well follow the present series); for the moment we must consider the connection between analogy, anthropomorphism, and revealed truth:--

> "That which may be known of God is manifest in them; for God hath showed it unto them. For the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse" (Rom. i. 19, 20).

This verse shows without question that something may be known of God by analogy; enough at least to make idolatry inexcusable. The question, however, that attracted the close scrutiny of the "Schoolmen" was how far anthropomorphism could be justified in the things of God. Anthropomorphic statements cannot be taken literally; yet they cannot be summarily dismissed. We read in the Scriptures of the face, the eyes, the ears, the hands, the fingers, the nostrils, the heart, and the bowels of God. To accept the statements literally would be manifestly false and unscriptural; and to justify them logically and philosophically is a task that cannot be easily accomplished.

One result of the Schoolmen's study was the emergence of the fact that language must be distinguished by a threefold usage. It can be used (1) univocally, (2) equivocally, and (3) analogically. A word is used univocally when in two or more propositions it conveys precisely the same meaning. It is used equivocally when it is used in entirely different senses. It is used analogically when it is employed because of the connection observable between two relations. For example:--

The Wisdom of God.—This cannot be a univocal use of the word wisdom, because that would mean that God's wisdom was neither more nor less than man's wisdom, which is false. It cannot be equivocal, for in that case it would convey nothing to the mind. If God's wisdom had absolutely nothing in common with man's, human language would be entirely unfit for the purposes of revelation. The expression "the wisdom of God" is employed analogically, for there is something in common between the wisdom of man and the wisdom of God. What is partial, limited and incomplete in man, is perfect and infinite in God.

Some have attacked the validity of analogy through mistaking analogy for metaphor. This distinction we must investigate more fully when we deal specifically with figurative language, but we must touch upon it here for the sake of our theme. Metaphor expresses an imaginary resemblance, but analogy expresses a real resemblance. For example, "All flesh is grass" is a metaphor. There is an imaginary resemblance between "flesh" and "grass" that justifies the figure. "I am the door" is a metaphor. "This is My body" is a metaphor. What deplorable superstition and error have resulted from the regarding of this metaphor as a reality. Neither the bread used by the Lord Himself, nor that which has been used since by His disciples through the ages, has even been anything but bread.

Analogy, however, implies a real resemblance. Power, personality, presence, mean something real, whether spoken literally of man or figuratively of God.

Our next problem, therefore, is to consider how the anthropomorphic terms of Scripture are to be received, and what provision God has made for the true and full use of analogy. This we must take up in our next paper.

One word in conclusion. We have entitled this paper, "The definition of analogy". Strictly speaking, however, analogy is extremely difficult to define. Bishop Butler, whose "Analogy" is well-known, refused to attempt its definition, and proceeded rather to its application. We must not be taken to task for attempting something that greater minds have avoided—we use the word "definition" in a loose sense, and not in a strictly logical one.

#15. Analogy, and the Image of God.
pp. 208 - 211

In our study of the underlying principle of analogy, we have advanced from the severely mathematical conception (set forth by the symbols A : B : C : D) to a consideration of the anthropomorphic language of revelation. It will be necessary, before we go further, to consider the objections to, and the justification of this use of human terms to set forth the divine.

Many readers will be acquainted with the philosopher's charge against "religion", and its use of the human to express the divine:--

> "The lions, if they could have pictured a God, would have pictured him in a fashion like a lion; horses like a horse; the oxen like an ox."

The implication is that man has pictured God as a gigantic man, and consequently thinks of Him in terms that are human raised to a superlative power. There is some truth in this gibe of the philosopher; but it is only half the truth, which as Tennyson puts it, may be "ever the blackest of lies".

We must now turn our attention to the following questions:--

(1) Is man specially constituted to embody in a small degree that which is great in the Lord?
(2) Does the Scripture warrant the use of human terms in explanation of the divine?
(3) What do we mean by personality? Is God a person?

Let us take first the question of personality. What is a person?

> "A person is a self-conscious and self-determining individual, the source from which thought and conduct radiate" (Author unknown).

Kant's definition, although it has been modified and improved, remains the basis of all modern philosophy of personality, and is true. An animal may be conscious, but not self-conscious, and so has no personality. "Persons, as opposed to things, are individual, conscious, intelligent and free." Personality is conscious of its own existence, can reflect upon itself, and can speak of "I". Personality may be expressed in the phrase: "I think, therefore I am." Everything in life and experience is open to question and doubt, except the individual personality of the questioner:--

> "Our being with its faculties, mind and body, is a fact not admitting of question" (Dr. Newman).
>
> "Personality is the only thing that is real, not related or derived" (Prof. Green).
>
> "Perfect personality is in God only; to all finite minds there is allotted but a pale copy thereof" (Lotze).

It comes to this, therefore: that man, being a person, can say "I am". We are immediately reminded that when God revealed Himself to Moses, it was this special emphasis upon personality that was prominent. No attributes such as goodness, righteousness, holiness are introduced; but simply unlimited individuality—"I am":--

> "And God said unto Moses, I AM THAT I AM; and He said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you" (Exod. iii. 14).

Analogy in natural science suggests a personality. The evidence of design suggests a designer, the evidence of a plan suggests an intelligence. And the Scriptures fully endorse this approach to truth:--

> "They say, the Lord shall not see, neither shall the God of Jacob regard it. Understand, ye brutish among the people: and ye fools, when will ye be wise? He that planted the ear, shall He not hear? He that formed the eye, shall He not see?" (Psa. xciv. 7-9).

To fail to perceive the force of this argument is to lack understanding, and to be like a "brute" beast. This analogy is at the bottom of all right reasoning; and, as we have seen from Rom. i. 19, 20, it left the heathen without excuse.

In the moral realm analogy brings us nearer. Everything points to the Person, although it does not actually bring us into living contact with Him. This final living contact demands more than nature or morals can supply.

Not only should we appreciate the place of anthropomorphic teaching concerning God, but we should also realize something of what may be termed the theomorphic in man. The words of Martineau are pertinent in this connection:--

> "There are but three forms under which it is possible to think of the ultimate or immanent principle of the universe. Mind. Life. Matter. Given the first, the universe is intelligently thought out: given the second, it blindly grows: given the third, it mechanically shuffles into equilibrium. We are rational, we are alive, we have weight and extension."
>
> "It is from our microcosm that we have to interpret the macrocosm."
>
> "The severest science is in this sense, just as anthropomorphic as the most ideal theology."

Earlier in this series we drew attention to two facts:--

(1) Reasoning is impossible apart from definition, and definition is impossible without affixing names.
(2) Adam manifested this essential attribute of intelligence by naming all the animals that passes before him (Gen. ii. 20).

If we go back earlier in the record of creation, we learn that man was created in the image of God (Gen. i. 26). The moment we remember this, we realize that analogy between the visible things of man and the invisible things of God rests upon a solid basis.

It is fundamentally true. God has purposely fashioned man in this form; and so he is able to learn by analogy.

A still more wonderful factor enters into the scheme when we remember the method of the divine revelation in Christ. Not only has God in the first place endowed man with a "pale shadow" of His infinite personality, but in the fullness of time, "God was manifest in the flesh":--

> "No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him" (John i. 18).
>
> "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known Me, Philip? he that hath seen Me hath seen the Father" (John xiv. 9).

For the believer, Christ sets forth the true analogy. Man, made in the image of God, sees in Christ, Who is the image of God, the whole person and attributes of the invisible God.

We have already referred to the revelation of God to Moses, under the title "I AM". This title immediately followed by another:--

> "Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, The Lord God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, hath sent me unto you. This is My name for the age, and this is My memorial unto all generations" (Exod. iii. 14, 15).

The One Who is the "I AM" condescends to call Himself "Jehovah", His name for the age. This name enters into the composition of the word "Jesus", and belongs to the Lord Jesus Christ in all its fullness. The Jehovah of the Old Testament is the Jesus of the New. He, too, used the title I AM, when He said: "Before Abraham was I AM." But usually He condescended, and used analogy, revealing Himself by saying, "I am the door"; "I am the true bread"; "I am the good shepherd".

We trust that the reader has been led from Logic to the Logos, and has discovered that in the person of the Son of God we arrive at true understanding, and that apart from Him, all reasoning is incomplete, and becomes at best a great "Perhaps".

We now turn our attention to that special department of "understanding" that revolves around the legitimate place of Figurative Language, and in a series of articles to follow this one, we hope to give some guidance towards the appreciation of this intricate but most profitable study.

Words in Season.

#20. Simple gospel notes on John iii. 16. (iv.) The essential link.

pp. 59, 60

John iii. 16 is divided into two sections: first the Godward, and then the man-ward. This we have already shown in an outline for children in Volume X, page 78, but it may be interesting enough to set out again here. The device is a simple one, but may serve as a useful representation of an important fact:--

GOD.	PERISH.
ONLY BEGOTTEN.	EVERLASTING.
SON.	LIFE.

Here we have the word "gospel" formed by the important features of this verse, and divided into its two sections. The hyphen that joins the two syllables together and makes the complete word, represents faith. The gospel preached must be the gospel believed if it is to be effective.

Whosoever believeth.—While the word "whosoever" suggests, like the word "world" in the same verse, that there are no barriers here of race, colour or dispensation, we must be on our guard lest we build upon the word more than it can in justice bear. Pas ho pisteuon is "Every believing one". The "all" or the "every" is qualified. It is "all without exception", if we keep it within the scriptural limitation of faith. It is "all without distinction", because it is qualified alone by faith and not by creed, colour or caste. The stress, however, must be placed upon the faith rather than upon the all; otherwise we may overstep the boundary of truth.

The Gospel of John is particularly full in its presentation of faith, and it will be helpful for us to notice some of its examples, observing what or whom is believed, and with what results:--

"As many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on His name" (John i. 12).—Here "receiving" is placed in correspondence with "believing" and partly explains the word. "Receiving Him" is parallel with "Believing into His name". The result of this reception is the authority and privilege of becoming children (teknon, not huios) of God.

"And they believed the scripture, and the word that Jesus said" (John ii. 22).—In this passage faith is seen resting on the Scripture, and the word that Christ had said. In this case it was not until after the resurrection of the Lord that they believed, and then because "they remembered"—evidently in fulfillment of the promise of John xiv. 26.

"Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth My word, and believeth on Him that sent Me, hath everlasting life" (John v. 24).—One of the essential features of this faith is the belief that Christ is the Sent One. The passages relating to this theme in John's Gospel are too numerous to quote, and to give only a few would spoil the effect of the cumulative testimony. We hope that none of our readers will rest unacquainted with this important testimony of John's Gospel.

"For had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed Me, for he wrote of Me. But if ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe My words" (John v. 46, 47).—Another essential feature is that the same faith that receives the words of Christ as gospel truth must also receive His testimony to the authority and truth of the writings of Moses.

The whole witness concerning faith in John's Gospel is summed up in the words of xx. 30, 31: "But these are written." Faith is connected with documentary testimony attested by eye-witnesses—"in the presence of His disciples." There is no room here for feelings or fancies.

"That ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God" (John xx. 31).—To believe that Jesus is the Christ is to believe that He is the Messiah of the Scriptures, the Anointed One, and therefore the true Prophet, Priest and King. It is to believe that He was the Sent One, and that He became man, for this involved in the title, "the Son of God".

(To be concluded).

#20. Simple gospel notes on John iii. 16.
(iv.) The essential link. (concluded).
pp. 72, 73

"And that believing ye might have life through His name" (John xx. 31).—This is the great result: life. All gifts and graces, all work and witness, must arise out of this initial gift, for without life all else is impossible.

While pisteuo, the verb "to believe", occurs in John's Gospel some ninety-eight times, the noun pistis, "faith", is never used. While the real lesson that underlies this distribution of the words is not seen upon the surface, it would be wise in teaching from this Gospel to remember the fact, and to speak in harmony with it. The deeper lesson involved may occupy our attention at some other time.

It may be as well at this point to raise the question, Why should faith above all things be made essential? Faith is essential, for without it contact is impossible. Even in everyday affairs, can we enter into any important business of life without faith? Is there no faith in the Post Office and its system when you drop that valuable letter, without witness and without signature of acceptance, into the local pillar-box, to be conveyed perhaps to the ends of the earth? Is there no faith in banks, tradespeople, schoolmasters, servants? If a man is to be saved by grace he must believe. Do not be mystified by the higher teachings of faith. Realize, and, if you are a preacher to others, make your hearers realize that he that cometh to God must believe that He is. This is the irreducible minimum, and, apart from the evil heart of the natural man, is as unconscious as breathing and as unquestioned as eating and drinking.

#21. Simple gospel notes on John iii. 16.
(v.) The alternatives.
pp. 159, 160

"I have set before thee this day life and good, and death and evil" (Deut. xxx. 15).

The gospel of God concerning His Son, whether presented by John or Paul, finds man on the way that leads to death, and plants the believer's feet on the way of life. In John iii. 16 the alternatives are expressed by the words: "Shall not perish, but have everlasting (or age-abiding) life." In John v. 24, the alternatives are "not coming into condemnation", but "passing out of death into life".

If we keep closely to the working of John iii. 16 we shall believe and declare that man by nature will perish unless saved by the work of Christ.

Perish.—There is, surely, no mystery about the meaning of this word. When we read in John vi. 27 of "meat that perisheth", we need no further explanation. If a chemist or physicist undertook to prove that the original elements that composed the meat were not really destroyed, we should still know that the meat as such had perished, whatever we might think of the survival of its constituent elements. When in the same chapter, the Lord said, "Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing perish" (vi. 12), the meaning is perfectly clear. Fragments of bread and fish if left about on the grass would "perish" so far as the question of "food" is concerned. Again, in the same chapter, the Lord uses the word when He says, "Of all which He hath given Me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day" (vi. 39).

It is clear from the reference here that apart from resurrection, even those given to Christ by the Father would be "lost" or would have "perished". So far as their bodies are concerned they have turned to the dust, and God has gathered to Himself the spirit of life; in the language of Scripture, they "are not". This is in entire conformity with the words of I Cor. xv. 17, 18:--

> "If Christ be not raised, your faith is vain: ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished."

Now if Scripture taught that at death the believer went immediately either to glory, or to an intermediate state of some degree of blessedness, though in a disembodied condition, how could the word "perished" be a fitting word to use? Should any object that this is ignoring the teaching of the Lord concerning "hell fire", we refer such to Matt. x. 28:--

> "And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul, but rather fear Him which is able to DESTROY both soul and body in HELL."

"Hell" (or rather, as the word is here, "Gehenna") destroys, and the destruction extends to soul and body. How those who hold to their tradition of a "never-dying soul" can make it agree with the Word of truth we cannot understand.

As the word apollumi (perish) occurs some ninety times or more it is not possible to turn to all the references here. We give, however, the various ways in which the word is translated in the A.V. to help any who may wish to investigate the matter further. The number after the word indicates the number of occurrences of that particular translation:--

Destroy (23); Lose (28); Be destroyed (3); Be lost (3); Be marred (1); Die (1); Perish (38). We read of lost sheep, lost money, lost life, lost reward, a lost son. We read of being destroyed by flood, and by fire and brimstone. We read of perishing by hunger, by storm, by being cut off and cast away. These and other usages focus the light of truth upon John iii. 16, and show the state of man by nature and the doom that lies ahead. The blessed alternative is "age-abiding life", life because Christ Himself lives, because He is the Resurrection and the Life.

These, then, are the alternatives: perishing or having age-abiding life (John iii. 16); death or life (v. 24); the wages of sin, death, or the gift of God, age-abiding life (Rom. vi. 23); alienation from the life of God, or reconciliation (Eph. iv. 18; ii. 16).

The issues are plain and unambiguous:--

> "He that hath the Son hath LIFE; and he that hath not the Son of God hath NOT LIFE" (I John v. 12).

Whoever you may be that read these solemn words, weigh them over before God before you dare to trifle with them.

May these simple notes be a "word in season" to some who are engaged in preaching to others.

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS,

If life's activities can be likened to a "walk" and a "way", most truly the recurring preparation of the Index for another annual volume seems like arriving at another "mile-stone" on the road. Remembering also that the term "rightly dividing" – which is our guide – can be likened to a finger-post at the fork of the road (see LXX version of Prov. iii. 6: "He shall rightly divide thy paths"), the simile is strengthened.

At times the pathway may be a lonely one, and we are not without temptation to choose a better trod road. At times the pathway may be a difficult one, and we are by no means exempt from weakness and a sense of defeat. Though "faint", however, grace has enabled us to "pursue", and the attaining to yet another annual volume of witness is not only a mile-stone, but becomes an Ebenezer, for we can truly say: "Hitherto hath the Lord helped us."

"Therefore having obtained help of God, we continue unto this day."

Yours, because His,

The Acts of the Apostles.

#7. Jerusalem . . . . . Antioch . . . . . Rome.
The geography of the Acts and its witness.
pp. 25 - 29

In the opening article of this series, in which the book of the Acts as a whole was considered, we found that the first fourteen verses formed a preface to the book, in which was gathered up in brief what had been said more fully in the last chapter of Luke, and, therefore, that Acts proper commenced with verse 15. We also discovered that the structure of the book placed Peter and Paul in correspondence, each having his own spiritual equipment (chapters ii. and xiii.), and ministry (iii.-xi. and xiii.-xix.), and both finally suffering imprisonment (xii. and xxviii.). The opening member of the structure was given as:--

A2 | P E T E R.
B | i. 15 - ii. 13. JERUSALEM.—Holy Spirit.
Enduement of the twelve.

The reader would be well advised to consult the complete structure given in Volume XXIV, page 3 before proceeding.

The geography of the Acts is like an index finger pointing out the road which the teaching must inevitably follow. In broadest terms it is Jerusalem, Antioch, Rome; but the intervening movements are important, as showing the manner in which the teaching spread in ever widening circles. Let us make a note of the geography of this important book.

The whole movement is anticipated in i. 8 where we read:--

> "Ye shall be witnesses unto Me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judæa, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth."

There is ambiguity that is evidently intentional in the use of the word translated "earth". That this Greek work, ge, is rightly translated "earth" received confirmation from Acts iv. 24, vii. 49, xiv. 15 and xvii. 26. But that it is also rightly translated "land" is shown by Acts vii. 3, 4, 36; xiii. 19 and xxvii. 44. It is therefore a matter for careful thought that the Lord used a word which might have meant either a worldwide commission, or one embracing only the uttermost parts of the land of Israel, the alternatives depending respectively upon Israel's repentance and entrance into their true ministry among the nations, or their failure, involving the passing on of their work to others. This view is confirmed when we learn that the only other occurrence in the Acts of the phrase "the uttermost parts of the earth is in chapter xiii. The reader who has acquainted himself with the structure of the book as a whole will realize that its occurrence there, at the commencement of the second great ministry of the Acts, is, of itself, suggestive. And the passage gains in suggestiveness when read in its context. Paul had preached in the synagogue of Antioch, following much the same line as that of Peter in Acts ii., but with the distinctiveness peculiar to his ministry, to be noted in due course; the Jews had turned away from his teaching, and he warned them that if they persisted in their gainsaying and unrepentance a judgment would fall upon them which would turn out to the greater blessing of the Gentile:--

> "Beware therefore, lest that come upon you, which is spoken of in the prophets: Behold, ye despisers, and wonder, and perish; for I work a work in your days, a work which ye shall in no wise believe, though a man declare it unto you . . . . . It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you; but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles. For so hath the Lord commanded us, saying, I have set thee to be a light of the Gentiles, that thou shouldest be for salvation unto the ends of the earth" (Acts xiii. 40-47).

Here then is a passage that must be kept in mind as we read Acts i. 8. There the Lord gave one commandment, here He gives another; not because of any changeableness on His part, but because of the failure of the people of Israel.

In Acts i. 12 we have mentioned together, the mount called Olivet, and Jerusalem. We have already seen that the ascension from the mount of Olives is intentionally associated with the second coming, as prophesied in Zech. xiv. 4. Jerusalem now becomes the centre, and all that takes place in Acts chapters ii.-v. takes place there. And although in the opening verse of chapter vi. we hear a new note, "the Grecians", Jerusalem is still the centre as vi. 7 shows:--

> "And the word of God increased; and the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly; and a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith."

The geography of the Acts is so important a matter that we must refrain from speaking of the nationalities involved, and the sects and philosophies represented, until we are able to give the subject something of the attention it deserves.

Samaria comes into notice in Acts viii., and first in connection with the persecution associated with Saul, which follows the same order as given in i. 8:--

> "And at that time there was a great persecution against the church which was at Jerusalem: and they were all scattered abroad throughout the regions of Judæa and Samaria, except the apostles" (Acts viii. 1).

As the Lord had said in i. 8, this scattering resulted in the spread of the witness. Nor have we to trust human inference for this information, for in xi. 19 we read:--

> "Now they that were scattered abroad upon the persecution that arose about Stephen traveled as far as Phenice, and Cyprus, and Antioch, preaching the word to none but Jews only."

We must return however to chapter viii., for there we read of another witness, Philip, who went down to Samaria and preached Christ unto them (viii. 5). Jerusalem however remains the centre, for the apostles which were at Jerusalem sent Peter and John down to them that they might receive the Holy Ghost (viii. 14, 15). With this agrees the account of the Ethiopian eunuch who was brought to a saving knowledge of Christ by Philip's ministry after he had been to Jerusalem to worship (viii. 27). The chapter closes with the statement that Philip preached in all cities, till he came to Cæsarea, a seaport some 70 miles north-west of Jerusalem.

With the opening of chapter ix., Damascus comes into the book. This was a city of Syria. Cæsarea again comes into the record in connection with Cornelius (Acts x.). That Jerusalem maintains its central place in the ministry, however, Acts xi. shows by the necessity that Peter was under to justify, to the leaders of the church there, his visit to Cornelius.

Towards the end of Acts xi. Antioch comes into view, with Barnabas traveling as far as Tarsus to seek Saul (Acts xi. 20, 25). Nevertheless, Jerusalem remains the centre, for:--

> "tidings of these things came unto the ears of the church which was in Jerusalem: and they sent forth Barnabas that he should go as far as Antioch" (Acts xi. 22).

This section of the Acts closes with the return of Barnabas and Saul from Jerusalem (Acts xii. 25). But with the opening of chapter xiii. commences the second part of the Acts, and here the interest centres in Antioch. In this city Saul and Barnabas were commissioned by the Holy Spirit. From Antioch they traveled on their first missionary journey, and to Antioch—not Jerusalem—they returned when the work was done (Acts xiii. 4, xiv. 26). This commission at Antioch was a remarkable foreshadowing of Paul's independent ministry, as we hope to show in its own place: for the present we continue to follow the geographical indication of the book.

Paul's journey took him to Asia Minor via Cyprus. It has been shown by Sir William Ramsay that Antioch in Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, were all cities of the Roman Province of Galatia, although they were not parts of the original kingdom of Galatia, for that kingdom did not extend so far south. Consequently, we no longer have to introduce into the history of the Acts imaginary cities which the apostle might have visited when he founded the Galatian church. Instead of this makeshift we realize that in Acts xiii. and xiv. we have mentioned the actual cities of Galatia to which the epistle to the Galatians was subsequently written. Moreover, this discovery removes the difficulty which otherwise exists of placing the epistle, and gives us every reason to believe that the epistle to the Galatians is the first written by Paul.

The accompanying map shows the position of Galatia as it was in the days of Paul.

(BE-XXV.28).

Details and authorities for the revision of the ancient map will be found in the second of our three larger volumes entitles "The Apostle of the Reconciliation" pp. 73-81.

We must now press forward. Chapter xv. finds the apostle at Jerusalem. The moment had not yet come for his independent ministry, and for some time he works in fellowship with the Twelve, without however relinquishing his independence or the peculiar character of his message (Gal. ii., where Jerusalem and Antioch are the two storm centres, see verses 1, 7-11).

For the sake of any who may be puzzled by the references to Antioch in the text of page 28, and the name Antioch on the map, we would explain that there was one city named Antioch in Syria, and another of the same name in Pisidia.

Toward the close of Acts xv. Paul proposed a second visit to the churches in Asia Minor, though not then realizing that the Lord was leading on to wider fields of witness. Asia and Bithynia being closed to the apostle by the Spirit of God (Acts xvi. 6 and 7), Paul pressed on to the coast town of Troas. There he had a vision which diverted his course to the mainland, and at Philippi he preached the gospel for the first time in Europe, surely an epoch fraught with tremendous issues for us all! From Philippi he traveled to Thessalonica and Berea, and thence on to Athens. When these chapters are before us we shall delight in following out their message, but we cannot here stay to do so. From Corinth the apostle visited Cenchrea, thence on to Ephesus, and so to Jerusalem. The apostle purposed that, after he had once again visited Macedonia and Jerusalem, he must see Rome (Acts xix. 21).

The journey to Jerusalem occupies chapters xix., xx. and xxi., many important incidents occurring on the way. His arrival at Jerusalem ends in his imprisonment at Cæsarea (Acts xxiii. 33-35), and after two years of weary waiting, the apostle is taken by ship to Rome, where he arrives after an eventful voyage, including shipwreck (Acts xxviii.).

While it is easy to overstress this aspect of our study, the geography of the book has its due place, and we trust that our readers are now in possession of the essential movement of the record: Jerusalem – Antioch – Rome.

To endeavour to point out the spiritual significance of these three geographical terms will be part of the work that now lies before us.

#8. The three R's.
Restoration. Reconciliation. Rejection.
pp. 67 - 70

In our last article we traced the story of the Acts to its geography. Before proceeding to the detailed study of its several parts we must look at the three outstanding landmarks: Jerusalem . . . . . Antioch . . . . . Rome, in their association with the corresponding three distinctive phases of the Acts. We have devoted the first six articles of this series to the demonstration of the fact that restoration is the dominating aspect of the opening section. Noticeably associated with that is the insistence in the narrative on the place of importance which the people of Israel still held. The question, "Wilt Thou at this time RESTORE again the kingdom to ISRAEL?" (Acts i. 6) indicates an expectation that is maintained throughout the bulk of the Acts. "Ye men of Israel"; "Let all the house of Israel know"; "Be it known unto all, and unto all the people of Israel"; "To give repentance to Israel"; "Men of Israel", and similar expressions are found throughout the Book, but particularly in the opening section (i. 15 - xii.).

So is it with the title "Jew". "There were dwelling at Jerusalem Jews." "It is unlawful that is a Jew" (said Peter); "The word to none but Jews only" (Acts ii.-xii.).

But with chapter xiii. comes a change. The Jew is still present, and for a period covered by many chapters the apostle maintains the practice of going to the synagogues of the Jews before he speaks to the Gentiles: but no longer can it be said "Jews only"; we now read "Jews and Greeks" (xviii. 4; xix. 10; xx. 21).

While Greeks are Gentiles, the Scripture suggests a difference between the two. Mention is made of "Jews and Greeks" in a manner which suggests that they were united in some way which could not equally be said of all Gentiles. The apostle differentiates between Greeks and Barbarians, just as he does between wise and unwise (Rom. i. 14). In I Cor. i. he associates the Greek with the search for wisdom (I Cor. i. 22), and just as righteousness is exhibited in Israel side by side with human failure, so wisdom is exhibited in the Greeks side by side with human failure, and both find a meeting-place in Christ. Consequently, if the key word of the opening section of Acts be restoration, in association with Jerusalem, the Jew, and the ministry of Peter, so, as surely, the keynote of the next division is reconciliation, associated with Antioch, the Jew and the Greek together, and the ministry of Paul.

The possibility of the salvation of the Gentiles does not seem to have been entertained by the apostles at Jerusalem. This is evidenced by the surprise with which the news of the salvation of Cornelius was received.

> "When they heard these things, they held their peace, and glorified God, saying, Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life" (Acts xi. 18).

Peter, by his own mouth, himself confesses that Gentile salvation was never in his thoughts either at Pentecost or after. To the seeking Cornelius he said:--

> "You know how that it is an unlawful thing for a man that is a Jew to keep company, or to come near to a foreigner, but God hath showed me that I should not call any man common or unclean" (Acts x. 28).

The word "reconciliation", which it has been suggested is the keynote of this new section of Acts is one of intense significance, and is found only in the epistles of Paul. It is never used by Peter, James or John. It signified that the exclusiveness of Israel's position among the nations was passing, and that the far-off Gentiles were being brought back again into favour.

This is not the place to make the large digression necessary for an examination of the subject of reconciliation, but two passages will suffice to suggest its importance in the Acts. The first is Acts xvii. 16-30, where the apostle speaks of the long centuries of Gentile darkness during the period of Israel's ascendancy, but where he also indicates that the time had arrived when the Gentile would come back into favour. Here are his words:--

> "God that made the world, and all things therein, seeing that He is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands . . . . . hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation . . . . . The times of this ignorance God looked over, BUT NOW commendeth all men everywhere to repent" (Acts xvii. 24-30).

The second passage is Rom. xi.:--

> "I say then, Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid: but rather through their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to provoke them to jealousy. Now if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fullness? For I speak to you Gentiles, inasmuch as I am the apostle of the Gentiles, I magnify mine office; if by any means I may provoke to emulation them which are my flesh, and might save some of them. For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead" (Rom. xi. 11-15).

Here it is explicitly stated that salvation came to the Gentile through the fall of Israel. Further, it is taught that the fall of Israel enriched the world, the diminishing of Israel enriched the Gentile, and the casting away of Israel brought about the reconciling of the world. In addition, Paul here claims to be the apostle of the Gentiles, and shows that the Gentile was being enriched at that time to provoke Israel to jealousy. But not until we reach Acts xxviii. do we know for certain that Israel would not repent. There, in the very last chapter, we find Paul sending for the chief of the Jews and telling them that "for the hope of Israel" he was bound with a chain (xxviii. 17, 20). Not until the chief of the Jews there had refused his all-day testimony did Paul pronounce the judgment of which he had warned them in Acts xiii. 40, quoting Isa. vi. 10, and declaring that the salvation of God was sent to the Gentiles (xxviii. 28).

The last few verses of Acts xxviii. are associated with Rome. The keyword is rejection, for Israel now pass off the scene; they become Lo-ammi, and salvation is sent to the Gentile, without reference to the Jew. This brings the book to a close.

We can now visualize the Book of the Acts under three R's thus:--

RESTORATION.	|	Jerusalem.	| Jews only. Peter.
RECONCILIATION.	|	Antioch.	| Jews and Gentiles. Paul and others.
REJECTION.	|	Rome.	| Gentiles only. Paul.

With the preparation afforded by this survey we can take up the opening section, and learn its lessons without its being spoiled by the intrusion of matters that had no place during the period of this first section, but belong to subsequent times and commissions.

#9. The Twelve (i. 15 - ii. 13).
pp. 113 - 117

The first section of the Acts proper, viz., i. 15 - ii. 13, is indicated in the structure given in Volume XXIV, page 3. This section must now be given consideration. The construction of the first verse is unusual. The flow of the narrative is abruptly broken by the insertion of the statement: "the number of the names together were about one hundred and twenty." Why should it have been necessary thus to break into the sentence? The answer must be, because in some way the number of those gathered had special significance, and that the very manner of the introduction of the information is intended to arrest attention. When we put one hundred and twenty into figures, 120, we become conscious of the presence of the factor 12. We also notice that the remainder of chapter one is occupied with the bringing of the number of the apostles, once more, up to twelve, Matthias being added to the eleven" (Acts i. 26), and Peter "standing up with the eleven" (Acts ii. 14). Our attention is also drawn to the enumeration of the countries from which the assembled Jews had come (Acts ii. 9-11).

(1) Parthians, (2) Medes, (3) Elamites, (4) Dwellers in Mesopotamia, (5) in Judæa, (6) in Cappadocia, (7) in Pontus, (8) and Asia, (9) Phrygia, (10) Pamphylia, (11) in Egypt, and (12) parts of Libia about Cyrene.

Here are twelve countries, and those that came from them summed up in the worlds that follow as being "strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes, Cretes and Arabians". The terms "strangers" and "proselytes" show that we are no longer reading a list of countries represented, but a summary of the characteristics of the crowd of persons assembled.

The recurrence of Israel's number, twelve, is not accidental. Accordingly we take note of the recurring feature as follows:--

The number assembled (Acts i. 15)	120
The number of the apostles made up (Acts i. 26) . . .	12
The number of nations represented (Acts ii. 9-11) . . .	12

At first sight, there appears to be little in common with the narrative of the appointment of Matthias and the coming of the spirit on the day of Pentecost; nevertheless a patient study reveals one or two connections. For example, in Acts i. 16 we read: "The Holy Ghost by the mouth of David spake", and in Acts ii. 4: "They were all filled with the Holy Ghost and began to speak with tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance." Here is an evident parallel, the inspiration of the Psalmist in the past being comparable with the enduement of the apostles at Pentecost. Still closer to Acts ii. 4 is the statement of David himself in II Sam. xxiii. 2: "The Spirit of the Lord spake by me, and His Word was in my tongue." It is moreover important to notice the way in which the Psalms are brought forward as proof, or warrant, or as bring fulfilled in the early Acts. For instance:--

Psa. xli. is quoted as of Judas in Acts i. 16.
Psas. lxix and cix. are quoted of Judas in Acts i. 20.
Psa. xvi. is quoted of the resurrection in Acts ii. 25-28.
Psa. cxxxii. is quoted of the true King in Acts ii. 30.

In Acts xiii., where a new section commences, Paul is found following the same plan:--

Psa. lxxxix. is quoted of David himself in Acts xiii. 22.
Psa. cxxxii. is quoted of David's seed in Acts xiii. 23.
Psa. ii. is quoted as of the resurrection in Acts xiii. 33.
Psa. xvi. is quoted as of the resurrection in Acts xiii. 35.

We shall accordingly be wise if we add to the notes already made the two references Acts i. 6 and ii. 4. At first sight there appears to be no connection between the fate of Judas, as recorded in Acts i. 18, 19, and the record of the gathering at Jerusalem in Acts ii. 5, 6. Yet in spite of the dissimilarity of subject, upon comparison two parallels are discovered. The fate of Judas, we learn, was known to "all the dwellers at Jerusalem", the Greek word used being katoikousin (Acts i. 19). The same word is used in Acts ii. 5, "There were dwelling at Jerusalem" (katoikountes). Moreover Peter says that the field that Judas purchased was called Aceldama "in their proper tongue", which in the Greek reads te idia dialekto. Exactly the same words are used by the dwellers at Jerusalem in Acts ii. 6 when they said, "Every man heard them speak in his own language" (te idia dialekto). Further, we note that where i. 15 says that the gathering was "together", and in ii. 1 "in one place", the identical Greek phrase (epi to auto) is used "upon the same thing". We have therefore before us enough material fully to justify the oneness of the section before us. Let us put the pieces together.

Acts i. 15 - ii. 13.

A | i. 15, 16. | a | In those days.
b | The 120.
c | Together (epi to auto).
d | The Holy Ghost (To pneuma To hagion).
e | Spake by mouth of David.
B | i. 17-19. | f | Dwellers at Jerusalem (katoikeo).
g | In their proper tongue (Te idia dialekto auton).
C | i. 20-26. The appointment of Matthias.
The 12 Apostles.
A | ii. 1-4. | a | The day of Pentecost.
b | All (i.e., the 12).
c | In one place (epi to auto).
d | Holy Ghost (pneuma hagion).
e | Began to speak.
B | ii. 5-8. | f | Dwellers at Jerusalem (katoikeo).
g | In his own language (Te idia dialekto auton).
C | ii. 9-13. The representative nations.
The 12 Countries.

While we may give assent to the evidence of our eyes and agree that there is a verbal connection between the passages, it may not be very evident wherein the deeper connection thus indicated consists. Let us therefore look further. It is very evident that the apostle Peter and those who gathered with him realized that the gap in the number of the apostles occasioned by the fall of Judas was a matter for immediate concern. Of all things that it might have been expected would claim consideration and prayer consequent upon the ascension of the Lord, the last to enter our unassisted minds would have been the matter of Judas and his successor. Not so the apostles. They were to tarry at Jerusalem and once more preach the kingdom. Should Israel repent and the kingdom be set up, the Lord would fulfil His promise that the twelve apostles should sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. While, however, the number of the apostles was incomplete it could not be said, “all things are ready” (Matt. xxii. 4), therefore we can appreciate the fact that the apostles were rightly concerned about this matter.

The Jews gathered at Jerusalem to keep the feast were not, so far as is revealed, representative of the complete twelve tribes: all that is said is that they were gathered from the surrounding nations, and an examination reveals that the number of the nations was twelve. That is sufficient for the purpose: the link between Acts i. and ii. is made evident, and the theme of this section, the restoration of Israel is advanced. Whether Israel would repent and the kingdom be set up at that time, none of the apostles knew. It was not for them to know times and seasons. They were witnesses, and fully equipped for their work.

But in spite of the evident fitness of these two sections, there are those who maintain that Matthias was not appointed by God but by man, and that Peter and the rest were prompted by a zeal that was not according to knowledge. The matter is of great importance and must therefore be considered. Let us give heed to the word as we examine the matter. First of all, can we be certain that Peter was right when he said that the Psalms he quoted referred to Judas? We believe we can. But a few days before the Lord Himself had said:--

> "I speak not of you all: I know whom I have chosen; but that the Scripture may be fulfilled, He that eateth bread with me hath lifted up his heel against Me. Now I tell you before it come, that when it is come to pass, ye may believe that I am He" (John xiii. 18, 19).

Here the Lord not only quoted the Psalm as of Judas, but emphasized the point that He was informing them before it came to pass in order that their faith might be strengthened at the accomplishment of the event. Now it had come to pass, and they believed.

In addition to this we have recorded in Luke xxiv. 44-48 the fact that the Lord not only passed in review the O.T. Scriptures, including the Psalms, and dealt with those passages that spoke of Himself, but that He also "opened their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures". When therefore Peter said, "This Scripture must needs have been fulfilled", he was but repeating the lesson of Luke xxiv. 26 and 46, for the self-same words there, "ought" and "behoved", are translated "must needs be" in Acts i. 16.

Even though it may be agreed that Peter's quotation of the Psalm was appropriate, it is possible that some may entertain the suspicion that in selecting but two men the apostles were limiting the Lord. We shall however find upon examination, that there was an important reason for this limitation. Referring once more to our Lord's own instructions, we read:--

> "But when the Comforter is come, Whom I will send unto you from the Father . . . . . He shall bear witness of Me, and ye also shall bear witness of Me, because YE HAVE BEEN WITH ME FROM THE BEGINNING" (John xv. 26, 27).

The apostles were evidently acting with this qualification in mind, for Acts i. 21, 22 reads:--

> "Wherefore of these men which have companied with us ALL THE TIME that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, BEGINNING AT THE BAPTISM OF JOHN, unto the same day that He was taken up from us, must one be ordained to be a witness with us of His resurrection."

It was therefore not a matter of piety, learning, or fitness of character: what was essential was capacity to bear personal testimony.

It is generally taught that the words "that he might go to his own place" (Acts i. 25), mean that Judas had been consigned to hell or perdition, but the passage bears another sense and should read:--

> ". . . . . show whether of these two Thou hast chosen, that he may take part of this ministry and apostleship (from which Judas by transgression fell) that he might go to his own place . . . . . and he was numbered with the eleven."

The fact that the Holy Spirit made no difference between Matthias and the rest of the apostles should silence all objection. That Paul himself speaks of "The twelve" as separate from himself is eloquent testimony to the accuracy of the inclusion of Matthias among the twelve (I Cor. xv. 5). In face of these facts we believe that the appointment of Matthias was in complete harmony with the will of God, and that of necessity, therefore, Paul was an apostle of an entirely distinct and independent order.

We have now cleared the way for a consideration of the true purport of Pentecost, a subject with which we hope to deal in our next article.

#10. Pentecost and Power (ii. 1-13).
pp. 161 - 165

In our last article we found that the company of apostles had been made up to the complete number, twelve, and that there was a purposed connection between this number and the representative gathering of Jews at Jerusalem. All was now ready for the great initiatory work of Pentecost. Something of this thought seems to be in mind in Acts ii. 1 where we read that the day of Pentecost had "fully come". This is a word used only by Luke, and occurs but twice in his Gospel: in the first occurrence it has the ordinary meaning of filling, in that case the filling of a boat with water (Luke viii. 23), and in the second it has the meaning of fulfilling, as of a prophecy (Luke ix. 51). Thus we see that in the choice of this word the writer had in view the thought that everything was ready for the fulfillment of all that Pentecost stands for in the O.T. type. The enduement with power from on high, for which the apostles were instructed to wait, came upon them as cloven tongues of fire:--

> "And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance" (Acts ii. 4).

Here we must pause to observe an important distinction. As the passage stands in the A.V. "The Holy Ghost" and "The Spirit" are indistinguishable from one another. The subject is of importance and must be treated accordingly.

Upon examination of the original we discover that there appears to be a reason why we sometimes read pneuma hagion, "holy spirit", without the article, and sometimes To pneuma to hagion, "The Holy Spirit". The passage before us is a case in point. The first reference to the Holy Ghost is written without the article: it is simply pneuma hagion, "holy spirit", whereas the second reference, "the Spirit", is written with the article and refers to "the Spirit" Himself. In other words "The Spirit" is the Giver, whereas "spirit" is His gift. In Luke xxiv. 49 the Lord bade the disciples wait at Jerusalem until they should be "endued with power from on high". The same writer, Luke, when he summarizes his own words in Acts i. 4, 5, refers to this promise of the Father when he speaks of their being "baptized with pneuma hagion (holy spirit) not many days hence". On the day of Pentecost, the Giver, the Holy Spirit, endued the apostles with power from on high, pneuma hagion, "holy spirit", which consisted of the gifts of the Spirit. It will be very necessary, therefore, to distinguish between the Giver and His gifts. The Holy Spirit Himself is seen in Acts i. 16:--

> "This scripture must needs have been fulfilled which the Holy Spirit (To pneuma to hagion) by the mouth of David, spake before concerning Judas."

One or two references will sufficiently illustrate the difference intended in these two expressions:--

Acts ii. 38:	"The gift of pneuma hagion" (The gift, not the Giver).
Acts iv. 8:	"Then Peter filled with pneuma hagion" (Again the gift).
Acts v. 3:	"Why hath Satan filled thing heart to lie to To pneuma to hagion" (The Holy Spirit personally).

There is however need for caution here, lest it be surmised that it is possible, by rule of thumb, thus to classify all occurrences under the two heads and so settle every reading. It is not so possible, because the article, "the", must sometimes be used by reason of what is "second mention", which is an indication that the reference concerned looks back to a previous one. The application of a rule of thumb method to determine the point at issue would thus be futile. What can safely said is that pneuma hagion without the article is never used of the Holy Spirit Himself, and that, apart from grammatical necessity, the article is not used when the reference is to the gift. Most readers know that Dr. E. W. Bullinger has given an illuminating amount of material in his book "The Giver and His gifts". The contents of this work is given in Appendix 101 of the Companion Bible, and should be consulted by every interested reader.

The power from on high with which the apostles were endued, took the form of "tongues", and was immediately made manifest by the fact that they actually spoke in the peculiar dialects that belonged to the assembled multitude "out of every nation under heaven". This was a "gift of tongues" indeed, and not one of the apostles who received such a gift would have any hesitation regarding his future sphere of witness. It is important also to notice that the power of the word is here given before every other manifestation of power. Behind all the miracles that were subsequently wrought by the apostles was the mighty word. Peter spoke to the lame man words of power when he said: "In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth rise up and walk" (Acts iii. 6).

The close association between the inspiration of David (Acts i. 16) and the inspiration of the apostles (Acts ii. 4) forced into prominence by the structure, is further emphasized by Peter himself when he wrote his second epistle, the "rushing" wind of Acts ii. 2 finding its echo in II Pet. i. 21, where he says:--

> "For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man: but holy men of God spake as they were moved by pneuma hagion" (holy spirit).

Here the word “moved” is the same as is translated “rushing” in Acts ii. 2.

There are many today who feel that the absence of the gift of tongues is a serious handicap to witness, but when the facts are faced we find it is not so. During the period covered by the Acts of the Apostles the church possessed no other Scriptures than the O.T. The New Testament, as we know it, did not exist. Slowly, as years went by, an Epistle here and a “Gospel” there would be written, and when the church finally possessed the prophetic writings now known to us as the New Testament, the need for the gift of tongues and other supernatural endowments ceased. Consequently, today he who faithfully uses the inspired Word of God in its fullness is on the same level of equipment as those of the early church. The fact that physical healing and other phenomena are not now associated with the preaching of the Word is explainable on the ground of the absence of Israel, as a nation, a feature that is of the utmost dispensational importance.

Those who are acquainted with the Jewish mind and Jewish history know that it was the ambition of many Jews who had been born in foreign lands, to spend their last days in Jerusalem. These are described as “dwellers” at Jerusalem. That there were those who had come to keep the feast, other than “dwellers”, is clear from Acts ii. 10, where some are called “strangers of Rome”, and where, in the same verse, the whole company is summed up as “Jews and proselytes”.

At first sight the enumeration of the countries from which the assembled Jews came strikes the reader as somewhat odd, but when we stand with Peter and think of the dispersion of Israel, we shall see definite order and intention. There had been three great dispersions of the Jews and these are indicated in the list of countries given in Acts ii. 9-11.

The first was of the ten tribes into Media and Assyria, and the two tribes to Babylon. At the time of the apostles, the Parthians ruled over a district that extended from the Euphrates to the Jordan and the Oxus to the Persian Gulf. The second took the Jews to Asia Minor, Cappadocia, etc., and as an offshoot of the Assyrian dispersion. The third, or Egyptians dispersion, took place under Ptolemy Lagus. There is also in this list of countries an evident allusion to the prophecy of restoration found in Isa. xi. 11:--

> “It shall come to pass in that day that the Lord shall set His hand again the second time to recover the remnant of His people which shall be left, from Assyria, and from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush, and from Elam, and from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the islands of the sea.”

Fuller details of these dispersions are given in Conybeare and Howson, Vol. I. 20, 22, and in Medes’ Essays. We do not further pursue the matter here, but would remark in passing that Peter seems to have kept in touch with the dispersion during his lifetime. He went to Babylon (I Pet. v. 13). He also wrote his two epistles to the dispersion in Asia Minor, and, if Jerome is to be trusted, he provided for the spiritual needs of the Egyptian dispersion by sending John Mark to them.

Returning to the narrative, we find there was a division of opinion among the hearers. Some were amazed and in doubt, saying to one another, "What is the meaning of this?" In this question there is rather unusual use made of thelo, to wish, or to will, as though they said to one another: "What is the intention of all this?" "What purpose does it express?" We have already demonstrated the fact that the Acts of the Apostles places the ministry of Peter and Paul in correspondence. This correspondence is set forth not merely in large parallel sections, but in actual repetition of words, phrases and actions, and the peculiar usage of thelo, just noticed, is an example of this minute correspondence. The gathered multitude at Jerusalem say, Ti an theloi touto einai. So, also, another assembly, at the great city of wisdom, Athens, say, Ti an theloi tauta einai, "What these things mean?" (Acts xvii. 20). It is possible that the word thelo is used in a similar sense in II Pet. iii. 5 where the phrase: "For this they willingly are ignorant of", may mean that the scoffers missed the true meaning or intention that is to be discovered in the record of creation, where, over and over again, it is implied that there has been an interference with the so-called "laws of nature". Incidentally, this rules out as untenable the objection that the second coming of Christ is "unscientific".

Many who heard the words of Peter on the day of Pentecost would afterwards read his letter to the dispersion and realize the connection between his spoken and written word. Not all however desired to know the purport of the miracle of Pentecost, for "Others, mocking, said, These men are full of new wine". There were mockers also at Athens (Acts xvii. 32), and there will be mockers in the last days (II Pet. iii. 3,4), who will ascribe the mighty acts of God to mere natural causes.

Let us draw a practical lesson from the attitude of these scoffers. If even the Saviour's gracious miracles were attributed by His enemies to power derived from fellowship with Beelzebub, is it not a small thing if His followers, filled with spirit, are alleged to be full of new wine? In our own sphere we can say that there is scarcely an issue of The Berean Expositor which does not call forth derision and criticism—and possibly with good cause. What then? Realizing that the highest and the best have been subjected to brutal misunderstanding, let us not fall into the weakness of turning our mole hills into mountains.

The association in the minds of the witnesses of these happenings, of wine with the filling of the spirit (Eph. v. 18) indicates something of the nature of enthusiasm in the deportment of the subjects of this outpouring, of "being beside oneself" (II Cor. v. 13). Is this a matter for wonder, when mortal man, the earthen vessel (II Cor. iv. 7) is filled with power from on high?

We are now ready for Peter's inspired explanation of the meaning of the day of Pentecost, and may grace be given us to pay heed to what Scriptures teach that we may be delivered and kept from the error of "Pentecostalism", which is a system of teaching utterly at variance with the inspired explanation found in Acts ii. 14-36.

#11. The typical place of Pentecost (ii. 14 - viii. 1).
pp. 211 - 216

With Peter's address (Acts ii. 14) we commence a new section of the Acts, which is shown in the structure on p.3 of Volume XXIV as:--

C | ii. 14 - viii. 1. Ministry of PETER and others to the nation of Israel in Jerusalem and the land.

As one studies the Word of God, and the wonder of its every part opens out before one's apprehension: as all its intricate beauty of design is revealed, the creature stands impotent. Not space, nor time, nor ability, suffices to set forth more than the barest skeleton of the beauteous whole. The Lord alone can make the dry bones of our presentation live. But we must not refrain from doing what we can, because we cannot do what we would, and so, in the following structure, we draw attention to the inter-relation of the parts that compose the section and indicate the movement of its teaching, without following out its ramifications or pointing out a tithe of the correspondence of its design.

C | ii. 14 - viii. 1. The ministry of PETER and others.

A1 | ii. 14-47. PENTECOST EXPLAINED.
Wonders and signs in heaven and earth.
David's testimony.
Christ the King.
All things common.
Possessions sold.
The Lord added to the church.

B1 | iii. 1 - iv. 22. PENTECOST SYMBOLIZED.
The miracle of healing.
The gate called 'Beautiful'.
Moses a type of Christ.
Prison for Peter.
We cannot but speak.
Threatened: Let go.

A2 | iv. 23 - v. 11. PENTECOST REPEATED.
Signs and wonders.
David's testimony.
The kings of the earth rebel.
Place shaken.
Filled with holy spirit.
All things common.
Possessions sold (part of price kept back).
Great fear on the church.

B2 | v. 12-42. PENTECOST WITHSTOOD.
Miracles of healing.
Solomon's Porch.
Prison for Peter.
We ought to obey God rather than man.
Beaten: Let go.

A3 | vi. 1-7. PENTECOST EXTENDED.
The ministry of the deacons; "Full of holy spirit."

B3 | vi. 8 - viii. 1. PENTECOST REJECTED.
Moses a type of Christ.
Stephen stoned.
The introduction of Saul strikes the first note in Israel's rejection.

To attempt a literary structure of these chapters would occupy about one half of the present issue, and is uncalled for, but with the foregoing hints the reader will be able to dig for himself and find more and more treasure.

Let us now return to Peter's explanation of what the happenings on the day of Pentecost really meant. And here we are at a disadvantage. Most of us who know anything at all about Pentecost have received that knowledge through tradition. We were sure that it was a feast of the church; we were convinced that on the day of Pentecost the church was brought into being; we were positive that there were gathered together on that day a multitude of both Jews and Gentiles who, by having all things in common, gave expression to the truth of the One Body and its fellowship. Yet all these fondly held views vanish in the light of actual truth, for Acts ii. knows nothing of a feast of the church: it knows nothing of that unity in which there is neither Greek nor Jew; it gives no countenance to the idea that a single Gentile, other than a proselyte, listened to Peter on that momentous day:--

> "But Peter standing up with the eleven, lifted up his voice and said . . . . ." (Acts ii. 14).

We have drawn attention to the peculiar word used here for "said" (apophtheggomai), which also occurs in Acts ii. 4 in the phrase "as the Spirit gave them utterance". We are to understand by this that Peter's explanation of the meaning of Pentecost was an exercise of that recently conferred power from on high. We have already referred to the fact that nearly every important act and word both of Peter and of Paul is echoed later in the Acts. The word apophtheggomai occurs but once more, namely in Acts xxvi. 25, this time in the record of Paul's defence before Agrippa. Others will be noted as we proceed.

The multitude charged the apostles with being drunk with new or sweet wine. "He is sweetened" was a way of saying that person was drunk. The Rabbins speak of a demon, Cordicus, who possessed those who were drunk with new wine (Gittin Cap 7). "And Rabba saith a man is bound to make himself so mellow (or sweet) on the feast of Purim, that he shall not be able to distinguish between 'Cursed be Haman' and 'Blessed be Mordecai' (Lightfoot 'Hebrew and Talmudical Exercitations')." Peter's remark, "It is but the third hour", has little meaning to us, but it was the teaching of the Rabbins that a man should abstain from eating and drinking on sabbath days and feasts until after morning prayers, the third hour being equivalent to 9a.m. with us. Commenting on this charge against the apostles, Severian says, "Behold their folly, convicted by season itself! How could there be new wine at Pentecost? But calumny is blind". Pentecost was a season of rejoicing:--

> "Seven weeks shalt thou number unto thee: begin to number the seven weeks from such time as thou beginnest to put the sickle to the corn. And thou shalt keep the feast of weeks unto the Lord thy God with a tribute of a freewill offering of thine hand, which thou shalt give unto the Lord thy God, according as the Lord thy God hath blessed thee. And thou shalt rejoice before the Lord thy God, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter, and thy manservant, and thy maidservant, and the Levite that is within thy gates, and the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, that are among you, in the place which the Lord thy God hath chosen to place His name there" (Deut. xvi. 9-11).

The reader may remember that the first epistle to the Corinthians keeps count of several of Israel's feasts:--

> PASSOVER.—"For even Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us" (I Cor. v. 7).
> "The cup of blessing" (I Cor. x. 16).
> UNLEAVENED BREAD.—"Therefore let us keep holyday, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness; but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth" (I Cor. v. 8).
> FIRSTFRUITS.—"Christ is risen from the dead, and becomes the firstfruits of them that slept" (I Cor. xv. 20).
> PENTECOST.—"I will tarry at Ephesus until Pentecost" (I Cor. xvi. 8).

But there is one more reference to the feasts of Israel that is not so obvious. In I Cor. xvi. 2 we read:--

> "Upon the first (day) of the week let every one of you lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come."

It will be observed that there is no word for "day" in the original, although it may be implied by the feminine mia (one). Literally the passage reads, "On the first of sabbaths", as in John xx. 1, with the difference that the latter passage has "the sabbaths" and refers to the first day of the feast of weeks. Reference to Lev. xxiii. 15-17 shows that this first day is the day from which the seven weeks leading to Pentecost was reckoned, the day of the firstfruits and of the Lord's resurrection. On this day—not on every Sunday—the Corinthians were enjoined to lay by "as God hath prospered", just as Israel were told to do—"according as the Lord hath blessed thee".

The passage in the Law that best sets out the feasts of the Lord and the place of Pentecost is Lev. xxiii. The passage is too long for quotation here, but the following outline will help to keep the whole festal year before the reader. While the length of Israel's year was the same as our own, there are only seven months noted in the calendar of their feasts. These feasts are prophetic, and set forth in type and shadow the whole course of Israel's history from the day that they became a nation (Ex. xii. 2) until the great future day of ingathering at the time of the end. The fact that the Lord has used seven months only in which to show this typical unfolding is but further evidence that the number seven is intimately associated with the purpose of the ages. The fact that creation occupied six days, followed by a Sabbath of rest, indicates that at the very beginning, God had this "rest" in view (Heb. iv. 9).

To save space we will, without comment or detail, briefly indicate this close association of seven with Israel's typical history:--

> SEVEN DAYS.—"The seventh day is a sabbath of rest" (Lev. xxiii. 3).
> SEVEN WEEKS.—"Seven sabbaths shall be complete" (Lev. xxiii. 15).
> SEVEN MONTHS.—"In the seventh month" (Lev. xxiii. 24).
> SEVEN YEARS.—"The seventh year shall be a sabbath of rest" (Lev. xxv. 4).
> Seven times seven YEARS.—"It shall be a Jubilee unto you" (Lev. xxv. 8-13).
> Seventy times seven YEARS.—"Seventy weeks are determined" (Dan. ix. 24).

At once we realize that Pentecost cannot be understood if it be taken out of its place in this series of typical periods. To attempt to fit Pentecost into the "church" destroys both the typical character of the feast, and the distinctive character of the "church".

The feasts of the Lord, then, of Lev. xxiii. are as follows:--

A | REDEMPTION BY BLOOD.
a | 5. PASSOVER.
b | 6-8. UNLEAVENED BREAD. Seven days. Egypt.
B | REAPING.
c | 9-14. FIRSTFRUITS.
d | 15-21. PENTECOST.
c | 22. HARVEST.
d | 22-25. TRUMPETS.
A | ATONEMENT BY BLOOD.
a | 27-32. DAY OF ATONEMENT.
b | 34-44. TABERNACLES. Seven days. Egypt.

The Lord knew that Israel would not repent and be gathered the first time, and that the purpose of the ages would reach out to the trumpets of the Apocalypse and the harvest at the end of the age. Nevertheless the feast of Pentecost was an anticipation of harvest, just as firstfruits was, and the gathering of Israel to Jerusalem at this period was an anticipation of that great gathering at the time of the end.

A peculiar feature of Pentecost is that a new meal offering was commanded:--

> "Ye shall bring out of your habitations two wave loaves of two tenth deals; they shall be of fine flour; they shall be baken with leaven; they are the firstfruits unto the Lord" (Lev. xxiii. 17).

It had already been commanded that "no meal offering, which ye shall bring unto the Lord, shall be made with leaven: for ye shall burn no leaven, nor any honey, in any offering of the Lord made by fire" (Lev. ii. 11). The two leavened loaves of Pentecost cannot therefore typify Christ: they are a firstfruits, and typify His people. The reason why two loaves were specified appears to be that the Lord knew that the kingdom would be delivered, and that at the restoration the ten tribes and the two tribes (commonly spoken of Israel and Judah) would come together again as one before Him. Ezek. xxxvii. 15-28 sets this forth under the figure of the two sticks: "I will make them one nation . . . . . they shall be no more two" (Ezek. xxxvii. 22).

The appointment of Matthias to complete the number of the twelve, and the gathering of Jews from twelve of the nations round about, are therefore features that are living and harmonious when Pentecost is seen in the light of God's purpose to gather Israel again and restore the kingdom. But their import is lost when Pentecost is misinterpreted as of the inception of the "church", and indeed, those who most strongly advocate the doctrine that the "church" began at Pentecost have among them those who do not hesitate to call the appointment of Matthias an "apostolic mistake".

What digressions have been necessary before reaching Peter's explanation of Pentecost! Had every reader as much knowledge of the teaching of the O.T. as Peter and the gathered multitudes, we could have gone straight on to his inspired explanation, but, as it is, we should not have appreciated his reference to Joel if we were not in possession of facts which to that assembled multitude were a matter of everyday knowledge. These we have now considered and have therefore done what we could to bring back the atmosphere of the original Pentecost. This accomplished we will proceed in our exposition.

#12. Pentecost explained: "This is that" (ii. 14-40).
pp. 260 - 265

Peter, when he stood up to explain the meaning of Pentecost to the assembled multitude, lifted up his voice and said:--

> "Ye men of Judæa, and all ye that dwell at Jerusalem" (Acts ii. 14).
> "Ye men of Israel . . . . . among you . . . . . in the midst of you" (Acts ii. 22).
> "Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly" (Acts ii. 36).
> "The promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call" (Acts ii. 39).

"Men of Judæa", "the Jews who dwelt at Jerusalem" (Acts ii. 5), "Israel", and then, together, "the whole house of Israel", are those to whom Peter addressed his words. Peter's own recorded act and word given in Acts x. 28, and the attitude of the apostles and brethren that were in Judæa (Acts xi. 18), together with the exclusiveness of Acts xi. 19, are sufficient to prove that the presence of a Gentile at this feast of Israel would have been intolerable, while the attitude of the Jews as recorded in Acts xxi. 26-36 shows what is likely to have happened had Gentiles been present at this feast of Pentecost. The nations of the earth shall, one day, go up to Jerusalem to keep the Feast of Tabernacles as Zech. xiv. 16-19 reveals, but that event awaits the time when the Lord descends and his feet once more touch the Mount of Olives. This feast takes place after He had ascended from the Mount of Olives, and the difference is great and far-reaching.

We have already observed that when Peter opened his mouth to speak he was actually "uttering" as power from on high enabled him; the word "said" of verse 14, being the peculiar word "utterance" of verse 4. Yet, in spite of this practical inspiration, Peter's first words of instruction are a reference to the Scriptures, showing that, much as we may feel the absence of "gifts" to-day, we have equally with Peter the authority of the Scriptures; and we have, too, what he had not, the complete New Testament containing all necessary instruction as to doctrine and practice till the day of glory shall dawn.

There can hardly be found in human language more explicit words than Peter's "This is that". Such specific language makes it imperative that we understand, at least in measure, the teaching of the prophecy of Joel, and found our idea of Pentecost upon his teaching. If, as most will admit, the "church" cannot be imported into Joel, then that alone should, if we still hold it, shake our faith in the tradition that the church began at Pentecost. We trust the reader will honour the Holy Spirit at this point, and, leaving the comments of men, turn to the short prophecy of Joel and read it through. Seven minutes is all the time it will occupy. Upon reading the book through two verses stands out, namely, Joel i. 4 and ii. 25:--

> "That which the palmerworm hath left hath the locust eaten; and that which the locust hath left hath the cankerworm eaten; and that which the cankerworm hath left hath the caterpillar eaten."

"I will restore" are words that find their echo in the question of the apostles: "Wilt Thou restore?" (Acts i. 6), and in the testimony of Peter as to "the times of restitution" (Acts iii. 21). Repentance is premised. "Rend your heart and not your garments and turn unto the Lord your God" (Joel ii. 13), and the resulting blessing is not only likened to the restoration of the land from plague and famine, but to the restoring of Israel's access and acceptable worship under the figure of new wine, and drink offering (Joel i. 13; ii. 14, iii. 18). Prominent also is the "great and terrible day of the Lord", a prophetic period of no uncertain value, the object of much Old Testament prophecy, and certainly having no connection with the "Church". The following outline may help the reader:--

Joel.

A | a | i. 7. New wine cut off.
b | i. 8-13. Israel's harvest spoiled.
B | i. 14 - ii. 14. Israel a desolation.
C | ii. 15-20. The gathering of Israel.
D | ii. 21 - iii. 1. I will restore.
C | iii. 2. The gathering of nations.
D | iii. 2-8. I will plead.
A | b | iii. 9-17. Gentiles harvest.
a | iii. 18. New wine restored.
B | iii. 19-21. Egypt and Edom a desolation.

The whole prophecy deals with the nation, and the nations. It looks to the Day of the Lord, and has no room for, or reference to, a church in which there is neither Greek nor Jew.

Peter's specific reference is to Joel ii. 28-32. Where Joel reads "Afterward" Peter says "in the last days": the words come to the same thing, and Kimchi makes the same observation when dealing with Joel ii. 28. The quotation made by Peter is divided into two parts. The first was actually fulfilled on the day of Pentecost: the second would have followed had Israel repented. They did not repent, and consequently the signs in heaven await the day of the Lord, with which the book of the Revelation is prophetically concerned. What should intervene between the two parts of Joel's prophecy it was no part of Peter's ministry to explain. He confessed later, when writing to the same dispersion, that they would find help regarding this interval in the writings of Paul (II Pet. iii. 15, 16).

We must now indicate the relation of the two parts of Joel's prophecy, quoted by Peter, showing the present interval. This of course was not mentioned by Peter, for the times and the seasons which the Father had put in His own power had not been revealed to him. We, too, only know that a new dispensation fills the gap, because Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ, has made known the fact.

Referring to the structure of Acts ii. 14 - viii. 1 given on pages 211-212, we discover that Peter's explanation of Pentecost occupies Acts ii. 14-47. We now observe that his passage falls into two parts, Acts ii. 14-40 being Peter's address, and Acts ii. 41-47 recording the effect it had upon his hearers. For the moment we must confine ourselves to the address itself. We find that it is a threefold appeal, punctuated by references to Scripture.

We have spent a considerable time in the endeavour rightly to place Pentecost, and feel that there is no call unduly to lengthen our exposition by analyzing the Psalms quoted, profitable as that would be. The Book of the Acts itself is our theme, and its bulk prohibits excursions that will not directly carry forward the theme.

It is essential to the theme that we notice the statement of verse 30:--

> "Therefore being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne."

Although to stay here breaks the statement of the apostle, we pause to draw attention to the permanent fact that Pentecost, instead of speaking of Christ as the Head of the Church, focuses attention upon His right to the throne of David. What possible meaning, other than a literal one, can be given to this passage or to the Psalm that is quoted. If Pentecost sets forth Christ as King in connection with the throne of David, in what way can it be connected with the Church?

Continuing our quotation at verse 33 we read:--

> "Therefore being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Spirit, He hath shed forth this, which ye now see and hear."

"He hath shed forth THIS": "THIS is that."—Peter is still maintaining his theme. He is still explaining Pentecost: it is the evidence that Christ is King and that the kingdom will one day restored. Further proof is given by quoting from Psa. cx. David's son is David's Lord (Matt. xxii. 41-46). The Lord is now there at the right hand of God "from henceforth expecting" (Heb. x. 13). The heaven must receive Him until the times of restitution (Acts iii. 21). The first thing that Peter commanded his awakened hearers to do was to "repent". In this he was continuing the ministry of John the Baptist (Matt. iii. 2) and of the Lord (Matt. iv. 17). As shown above the interval between the two prophecies of Joel is a consequence of Israel non-repentance. Baptism for the remission of sins is not church truth. Not a single passage in any one of Paul's epistles can be found to countenance such teaching. How can we therefore speak of "continuing stedfastly in the apostles' doctrine" when the very first principles of that doctrine are by us set aside?

"Save thyself" is Soson seauton, as in Luke xxiii. 37, but in Acts ii. 40 the Greek reads Sothete, "Be ye saved". The "untoward generation" is but another description given to "that wicked and adulterous generation" to which no sign, but the sign of the prophet Jonah, was to be given. Here that sign is evident. The apostles were witnesses of His resurrection: the signs and wonders were witnesses of His resurrection: Pentecost was a witness that "Jesus of Nazareth, a Man approved of God", "This Jesus", "That same Jesus", This Son, yet Lord, of David, was "Lord and Christ". The day of the Lord was His day. The name of the Lord, upon which they called, was His name, the miracle of the next chapter enforcing that “there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved” (Acts iv. 12).

The second half of this section, ii. 41-47, cannot be adequately dealt with here, and must await a separate article.

We are conscious, that in spite of the rather heavy material introduced, we have passed by in silence many an interesting feature. But what can we do with such wealth of truth? We must be content if we can point out its main import, leaving our readers the delightful task of exploring its many ramifications, reference to which must, alas, be omitted from these papers.

The answer of a good conscience.

#1. A moral principle, not a law.
pp. 139 - 141

Someone has said that "conscience was born in the garden of Eden". Certain it is that the moment that man sinned he became "conscious" of his state, needing no outside condemnation to awaken him as to his condition:--

> "Conscience is that secret voice—that moral principle that urges us to act in conformity with our conviction, and condemns us whenever we are in opposition to it; it is, so to speak, the main-spring of morality" (Dr. Vinet).
>
> "Remember this plain distinction—a mistake which has ruined thousands—that your conscience is not a law" (Sterne).

While our appeal in all things is to the Scriptures and to them alone, the two citations given above are a contribution towards an attempt to define what conscience is, and what it is not.

It is important, in the first place, to realize that conscience is not a law. A Hindoo with a clear conscience could do that which no reader of this magazine would dare to contemplate. A Jesuit could act in a way which would be impossible for one trained in the truth of the gospel. It is not sufficient for any of us that our conscience does not trouble us in certain matters, or that our conscience approves our actions; that of itself does not prove that we are right. Dr. Vinet's statement relates conscience to an inside standard, "a moral principle that urges us to act in conformity with our conviction". For the believer, this "conviction" is that the Word of God is the only rule of faith and practice; and his conscience, being enlightened, will never permit the believer to transgress any portion of Scripture without protest.

It is important that we should appreciate the distinction between the law itself and the monitor that commends or condemns us in relation to that law. If a pair of balances are true, then the index finger will be true also; but if the balance is at fault, then the index finger, though appearing to register equality, will be a false guide. The index finger of a balance does not weigh anything; neither is it the standard of weight. It only registers. If the standard and the balance be true it will be a safe guide, but if they are false it will be a false guide. If the believer misunderstands or is wrongly instructed in the faith, and holds as truth something that is false, his conscience will approve or condemn him in relation to the error just as it would in relation to the truth. First of all we must have a standard, the Word of God; then a conscience void of offence—the index finger upon the balance of righteousness and truth.

We now turn our attention to the meaning of the word translated "conscience". The Greek work translated "conscience" 32 times in the N.T. is suneidesis, a compound of sun, "together with" and eideo, "to know". The following passage show the occurrences and the usage of the verb suneideo:--

> "But a certain man named Ananias, with Sapphira his wife, sold a possession, and kept back part of the price, his wife also being privy to it" (Acts v. 1, 2).
>
> "And when he had considered the thing, he came to the house of Mary" (Acts xii. 12).
>
> "They were ware of it, and fled unto Lystra and Derbe" (Acts xiv. 6).

These three references show the primary meaning of the word. In each case the idea is "to know together", either with someone else (as in Acts v. 1, 2), with oneself (as in Acts xii. 12), or, in a general way (as in Acts xiv. 6). The one occurrence of this verb that we find in the epistles is in the middle perfect, sunoida: "I know nothing by myself: yet am I not hereby justified" (I Cor. iv. 4). The A.V. does not make the intention of the apostle very clear. From the first clause we might gather that the apostle was ignorant and depended upon the teaching of others, but the added words, "Yet am I not hereby justified" would correct such an impression, and help to shew the true meaning of the passage. A careful examination of the context will shew considerable light upon the negative side of our subject—"conscience is not a law":--

> "Let a man so account of us as subordinate ministers (huperetes, literally, an under-rower) and stewards of the mysteries of God. Moreover it is required in stewards that a man be found faithful. But for me it is the very smallest matter, that I should be examined of you, or of man's day, yea, I do not even examine mine own self. For I am conscious of nothing in myself, but I am not justified by this. But He that examines me is the Lord. So then judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, Who shall both bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and shall make manifest the counsels of hearts: and then shall each have his praise from God" (I Cor. iv. 1-5).

The Corinthians prided themselves on their eloquence and their philosophy, and the apostle, knowing this and knowing their spiritual immaturity, determined to know nothing among them save Jesus Christ and Him crucified. This resolve was not made without some inward shrinking on the apostle's part, for he knew that his attitude would offend them. With the perfect he could go forward and enter into the mysteries of God; but he could not deal with such holy themes just to please his hearers (I Cor. ii. 1-6). He was, after all, one under orders, an under-rower, not the Captain; he was a steward, and the first thing required of a steward is faithfulness. Although the apostle knew that his action with regard to what he taught and what he withheld would be censured, he assured the Corinthians that this was a very small matter; but his conscience was not the standard, it was but a monitor. His own conscious innocence would not of itself justify any of his actions; all judgment belonged to the Lord.

We propose in subsequent articles to examine other scriptures dealing with conscience from various points of view. We pray that they may be a means of blessing to us all, leading us to realize the blessedness of having no more conscience of sins, and helping us always to have the answer of a good conscience toward God.

#2. No more conscience of sins (Heb. x. 2).
pp. 185 - 187

Before any "cases of conscience" can be a fit subject for discussion, and before we can study the meaning of a good conscience, or a pure conscience, we must settle, from the Scriptures, the possibility and the basis of the removal of guilt from the conscience. This is a deeper question than that of conduct, for it lies at the root of our standing before God. A guilty conscience makes service, access, or worship impossible. The passage that supplies the title of this article and illuminates the whole question is Heb. x. 2: "The worshippers once purged should have had no more conscience of sins."

The reader can see that this quotation is incomplete, being a part only of an argument that occupies a number of verses. We must look back to the preceding verse:--

> "For the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices which they offered year by year continually make the comers thereunto perfect for ever" (Heb. x. 1).

The word translated "continually" in the A.V. of Heb. x. 1 is repeated in x. 14, where it rightly reads with the word "perfected". It should be so read in x. 1: "perfected for ever." To be perfected for ever is evidently another way of saying "no more conscience of sins", as a reading of the two verses will show. The offerings of the law were shadows and, as Heb. xi. 9 says, "they could not make him that did the service perfect as pertaining to the conscience".

In contrast with these types and shadows that could not thus cleanse the conscience or lift from it the sense of guilt, is the offering of Christ. The argument proceeds:--

> "For if the blood of bulls and goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh: How much more shall the blood of Christ, Who through the eternal Spirit offered Himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God?" (Heb. ix. 13, 14).

Consequently in Heb. x. 2 we read: "The worshippers once purged"; "no more conscience of sins". Conscience therefore in the first instance is a question of the efficacy of the sacrifice trusted in for cleansing. The offerings made under the law, being shadows and types, could not touch the conscience.

While it was not possible for the blood of bulls and goats to take away sins, there has been offered "one sacrifice for sins for ever" so effectual, so wondrously complete, that—in contrast with the many sacrifices offered under the law "which can never take away sins"—the sacrifice of Christ will never be repeated:--

> "Their sins and iniquities will I remember no more. Now where remission of these is, there is no more offering for sin" (Heb. x. 17, 18).

The first great proof that one has no more conscience of sins is “boldness of access” to the Lord.

> “Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way, which He hath consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say, His flesh; and having an High Priest over the house of God; Let us draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience” (Heb. x. 19-22).

The connection of the “heart” and the “conscience” is of chief importance. The expression: “hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience”, is striking and somewhat obscure. The apostle John does not use the word “conscience”, but he refers to the same thing when he says: “Beloved, if our heart condemns us not, then we have confidence toward God” (I John iii. 21). The “true heart” is a heart “sprinkled from an evil conscience”. The expression is taken from such a passage as Lev. xiv. 7 which deals with the cleansing of the leper, and his access to the Lord. The marks therefore of a conscience freed from the sense of guilt may be summed up as follows:--

(1) BOLDNESS of entry into the holiest by the blood of Jesus.—This reveals that the one and only basis for a good conscience is the one all-sufficient offering of Christ, and the cleansing power of His precious blood.

(2) ASSURANCE of faith.—This faith, which rests for its whole salvation on the finished work of Christ, is a constant accompaniment of a conscience clear of guilt before God, and gives the necessary assurance to the believer that he need have no fear when he draws near to the throne of grace.

It will be readily seen that until this matter is settled and settled scripturally, service, worship, study, the quiet rest of faith, peace with God, patience and all the fruits of grace will be seriously imperilled.

We therefore rejoice in the fact that conscience can be cleansed, and the heart relieved of the burden of guilt. The true worshipper has been “once purged” and therefore has “no more conscience of sins”. It is as complete and perfect a work as justification. We cannot be justified afresh; such a thought is a contradiction. We cannot be saved afresh; we are saved by grace through the finished work of Christ. Our consciences no more condemn us in the presence of God for sins committed, because we know that they have been righteously dealt with in the person of His beloved Son, and shall be remembered “no more”. While of us it can be said, “no more” remembrance of sins, it may also be said, “no more conscience of sins”, and until it is possible for God to fail in honouring the work of Christ, the believer can have full assurance of faith and a clear conscience in His holy presence.

#3. A good conscience and dispensational truth.
pp. 233 - 235

The antithesis of an "evil" conscience must be a "good" one, and as this expression is found in the Scriptures, it seems fitting that we should consider it next.

There are six passages which contain the expression "a good conscience":--

> "Men and brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before God until this day" (Acts xxiii. 1).
>
> "Now the end of the commandment is love out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned" (I Tim. i. 5).
>
> "Holding faith, and a good conscience" (I Tim. i. 19).
>
> "Pray for us: for we trust we have a good conscience, in all things willing to live honestly" (Heb. xiii. 18).
>
> "Having a good conscience; that, whereas they speak evil of you, as of evil-doers, they may be ashamed that falsely accuse your good conversation in Christ" (I Pet. iii. 16).
> "The answer of a good conscience toward God" (I Pet. iii. 21).

It will not be possible to deal with these six passages in one article. In order to make the study profitable, therefore, we shall concentrate our thoughts upon one aspect and usage. If we examine these references, we shall find that the expression "a good conscience" is sometimes used to refute the charge that the apostle had turned away from the faith of his fathers, or from one dispensation to another, without just reason. This will appear more clearly as we examine the passages in their contexts.

The setting of the first passage, Acts xxiii. 1, is the apostle's defence before Ananias. The apostle had been severely handled by the Jews, who had accused him of taking Gentiles into the temple, and of polluting the holy place. He had spoken in "the Hebrew tongue" to the multitude, who had heard him in silence until he came to his own commission to the Gentiles, at which point they had shouted, "Away with such a fellow from the earth". Having been rescued by the Roman soldiers, he is brought before the council of the chief priests—and his opening words refer to the fact that he had lived in all good conscience before God "until this day".

As the apostle took the same line of defence before Felix, we shall do well to read his statement in the next chapter before going further:--

> "There are yet but twelve days since I went up to Jerusalem for to worship. And they neither found me in the temple disputing with any man, neither raising up the people, neither in the synagogues, nor in the city. Neither can they prove the things whereof they now accuse me" (Acts xxiv. 11-13).

Having said so much, the apostle proceeds to a definite statement concerning his own personal convictions:--

> "But this I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and in the prophets . . . . . and herein do I exercise myself, to have always a conscience void of offence toward God, and toward men" (Acts xxiv. 14-16).

Another personal testimony of the apostle to the same effect is found in II Tim. i. 3 where he says: "I thank God, Whom I serve from my forefathers with a pure conscience." Here the word "from" is apo, and conveys the thought of "away from"—for the apostle had certainly not continued to worship God in the same way in an unbroken sequence since his boyhood. The change, however, he could contemplate with an easy conscience. "The way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers." "I thank God, Whom I serve away from my forefathers." He had not turned from the traditions of the fathers or from the law of Moses because of the fear of man or from unbelief. He had not become the Apostle of the Mystery by self-appointment or by self-seeking. In all these changes that had involved him in so much misunderstanding he stood with a "good" conscience, a "pure" conscience and a conscience "void of offence" before God.

To this set of passages may be added the apostle's words to Timothy in I Tim. i. 5. In the previous verse (verse 4) the revised text reads, instead of "godly edifying", "a dispensation of God", which brings the passage into line with those just considered. Timothy was to devote himself to the dispensation that had been committed to him, and to realize that the end of the "charge" thus given included "a good conscience".

It cannot be too strongly emphasized that no change of doctrine or practice should be accepted apart from a good conscience in the matter. We must neither allow ourselves to continue in an undispensational attitude when once we have been convinced of the scriptural necessity for a change, nor must we be persuaded to make any change unless we can do so with a good conscience. When once we do see the truth, let us act upon it, for otherwise the remainder of our days will be clouded by the shadow of a bad conscience, a crippling and terrible thing.

Those who have been led to embrace the truth of the mystery will often suffer as the apostle did. They will be called "heretics", but this will not move them if their conscience is clear. While conscience, as we saw in our opening paper, is no standard, it is a valuable monitor, and if we have seen the truth of the mystery, conscience will never let us rest until we have "acknowledged" its separating teaching. Happy is the man who is misjudged by others, yet whose conscience is clear. Happy is the man who is called hard names by all, except by his conscience. Happy are they who, though "heretics" in the opinion of men, are "saints and faithful" in the eyes of the Lord.

Berean Charts.

#5. The Hope of Israel.
pp. 8, 9

- - - I l l u s t r a t i o n - - -
(BE-XXV.8).

This chart is designed to demonstrate the fact that one hope runs throughout the Acts of the Apostles, and that this hope is also that which is before the church ministered to by Paul during the same period.

The epistles of this period are seven. Some there are who do not believe that Hebrews was written by Paul. This is no place for the discussion of such a subject: We must be satisfied with the following suggestion:--

(1) Use of certain phrases such as "under his feet". Compare I Cor. xv. 27, 28 with Heb. ii. 8.
(2) Peter's statement that Paul wrote at least one epistle to the Circumcision (II Pet. iii. 15).
(3) The "sign manual" in accordance with II Thess. iii. 17. This is peculiar to Paul's epistles. The reader should test every epistle for this feature.

The three individual epistles are based upon one theme—"The just shall live by faith." Romans stresses "righteousness", "the just". Galatians insists upon "faith", while Hebrews, looking to "the things that accompany salvation", stresses "shall live". The correspondence of the double epistles is self evident.

As to the oneness of the hope. This is obviously true of the Acts it itself. In i. 6 and in xxviii. 20 there is but one hope, viz., "The hope of Israel".

Upon examination this is found to be the case with regard to the church of the period. Romans, being the last epistle of the series and the most dogmatic, will determine the question once for all. Rom. xv. 12, 13 ("trust" is the same word as "hope") reveals that the hope before the church was connected with Christ as the "root of Jesse", who should "reign over the Gentiles", the reference being to Isa. xi. and the great day of Israel's restoration. Every reference to the hope of the church found in I and II Corinthians, I & II Thessalonians and Galatians is in perfect harmony with this crowning passage.

We therefore place the symbol of hope—the anchor, with its pendant epistles as links in a chain, in such a way that it shall coincide with the whole of the Acts of the Apostles, including its opening and closing references to "the hope of Israel".

"The one hope" of the mystery finds no exposition in these early epistles of Paul. It was essential that "the mystery" itself should be revealed before its hope could be expressed.

#6. Three spheres of blessing---The adoption.
pp. 65 - 67

- - - I l l u s t r a t i o n - - -
(BE-XXV.65).

In this chart the subject of the three spheres of blessing is approached by way of the term "adoption". Sir William Ramsay, in his "Historical Commentary on Galatians", has made it clear that the word "adoption" indicates the appointing of the heir, and is tantamount to the privileges and prerogatives of the scriptural firstborn. If "adoption" is predicated of three distinct companies, then, the Scriptures being true and trustworthy, this threefold adoption demands three spheres just as surely as three firstborn sons are impossible to one father apart from three different wives.

Adoption is the exclusive possession of Israel according to Rom. ix. 4, yet adoption belongs to the seed of Abraham, whether Jew or Greek, according to Gal. iv. 5, and yet again, adoption is the predestined blessing of the church of the mystery according to Eph. i. 3-5.

This threefold adoption demands a threefold sphere. It will be found that there are parallels in the three spheres. First of all as to the spheres themselves.

The earth.—Psa. ii. 8 is all that could be included on the chart, but the reader can find scores of references to prove that there shall be a kingdom on earth.

The heavenly calling is referred to by name in Heb. iii. 1, and by referring to Heb. xi. 9, 10, 14-16 and xii. 22, together with Gal. iv. 26, we discover that this second sphere is the heavenly Jerusalem.

The superheavenlies is the English equivalent for that position where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God, defined as "far above all principality and power", and "far above all heavens" (Eph. i. 3, 20, 21; ii. 6 and iv. 10).

Three features are repeated in each sphere:--

(1) A FIRSTBORN'S POSITION.—Israel among nations (Exod. iv. 22). The Seed of Abraham in the heavenly city (Heb. xii. 23), and the Church of the Mystery as one with Christ (Col. i. 18 and Eph. iv. 13).

(2) A CITIZENSHIP.—Psa. lxxxvii. is given as a specimen of the privilege of the earthly citizenship of Zion. Rev. xxi. 2 speaks of the citizenship of the second sphere, and Eph. ii. 19 & Phil. iii. 20 speak of the citizenship of the third sphere.

In connexion with this third sphere, Eph. ii. 12 reminds us that those who are blessed in this highest of spheres had no part in the commonwealth (citizenship) of Israel.

(3) AN EXALTED POSITION.—In each sphere, the one to whom pertains the adoption has other companies subservient to it.

In the case of the nation of Israel, it is the Gentile nations who are to serve them and go up to Jerusalem three times a year. In the case of the heavenly calling it is angels that are subordinate, while in the third sphere angels are not mentioned, nothing less than principalities and powers are ranged beneath the church which is His body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all.

#7. From glory to glory.
pp. 137 - 139

- - - I l l u s t r a t i o n - - -
(BE-XXV.137).

The theme of II Cor. iii. and iv. is the exceeding glory of the new covenant. In comparison with this covenant, the glory of the old is nullified. The chart suggests—by the two shaded forms—the tables of stone associated with the old covenant, and the fleshy tables of the heart that belong to the new covenant. Both covenants had their respective "glory", but > "Even that which was made glorious had no glory in this respect, by reason of the glory that excelleth. For if that which is done away was glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious" (II Cor. iii. 10, 11).

After considering the balancing members, it becomes very clear that "from glory to glory" (II Cor. iii. 18) can mean nothing else than "from the typical glory of the old covenant, to the antitypical glory of the new covenant". This we have suggested by the arrow at the base of the two covenant forms.

Much of the teaching of this passage is connected with the use of the word "veil". Moses veiled his face so that Israel should not see the end of the glory that was transient. Israel wear a veil, not only over their heads when reading the law (as shown in the illustration), but over their hearts. The teaching of the passage is "veiled" to the ordinary reader by the translation "open face" in II Cor. iii. 18, where it should read "unveiled face", as a direct contrast with the veiled face of Israel. Further, the word "hid" in II Cor. iv. 3 is the word "veiled", and carries the teaching on to its conclusion.

The new translation of II Cor. iv. 3-6 given at the bottom of the chart reveals the awful truth that Satan fabricates a veil for the spiritual eye out of undispensational truth. Four times in II Cor. iii. it is stressed that the old covenant was "done away" (or "abolished"), and out of this, as the epistle to the Galatians reveals, the Evil One made a veil to hide the fullness of grace that is found in the person and work of Christ. Two faces are seen in contrast, the face of Moses, and the face of Jesus Christ.

We append the structure of the passage as a supplement to the chart.

II Cor. ii. 17 - iv. 6.

A | ii. 17. | a | Not corrupt the Word of God.
b | Speak in the sight of God.
B | iii. 1-16. THE FACE OF MOSES.—The passing glory.
C | iii. 17, 18. The unveiled face of the believer.—From glory to glory.
A | iv. 1, 2. | a | Not handle deceitfully the Word of God.
b | Commend in the sight of God.
C | iv. 3, 4. The veiled face of the unbeliever.—Glory hidden.
B | iv. 5, 6. THE FACE OF JESUS CHRIST.—The glory of God.

#8. Where history ceases mystery begins.
pp. 209 - 211

- - - I l l u s t r a t i o n - - -
(BE-XXV.209).

In this chart we endeavour to demonstrate the principle that where HISTORY ceases (so far as Israel is concerned) some element of MYSTERY comes in. It might be the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven; it might be the mysteries of God's purpose in appointing Nebuchadnezzar; it might be the introduction of the present dispensation of the mystery, but the sequence is the same. Daniel is the O.T. Paul. He became the prisoner of the Lord for the Gentiles. In the LXX of the O.T. the Greek word musterion occurs for the first time in the book of Daniel, where it is translated "secret".

In the chart a series of downward steps is indicated by the passages referred to, commencing with the failure of Hezekiah, which introduces the prophecy concerning Babylon. The times of the Gentiles are coincident with the down-treading of Jerusalem, as Luke xxi. 24 will show. As Israel passed off the scene, the Gentile came into prominence.

The second illustration is taken from the first thirteen chapters of Matthew. The Messiah, Who must be the Son of David and Abraham, is revealed as having come in the person of Jesus Christ, Emmanuel, God with us. He also is attested by the witness of divinely equipped forerunner and a voice from heaven. By observing our Lord's words in Matt. xi. 20-24 we understand that one of the objects for which the miracles were wrought was the repentance of Israel. Their non-repentance leads to the threefold rejection of Matt. xii. 6, 41 and 42, where Christ is rejected in His offices of priest, prophet and king. Upon this non-repentance and rejection comes mystery in Matt. xiii. It is suggestive too, that in Matt. xii. 14-21, consequent upon the council of the Pharisees, we find the reference to the blessing of the Gentiles.

The third illustration is the chief purpose of the chart, to prove that the present dispensation of the mystery is consequent upon the rejection of Israel in Acts xxviii. The prophecy of Joel which underlies the teaching of the day of Pentecost is insistent upon repentance (Joel ii. 12-14). The restoration of Israel is set forth in the miracle of the lame man (Acts iii.), and the vision of the sheet that Peter saw (Acts x.) is an indication that Jewish exclusiveness is going.

The twofold ministry of the apostle Paul now comes to light (see Acts xx. 17-24 and Acts xxvi. 16-18), revealing that his second ministry would be accompanied with imprisonment, would be related to a second revelation from the Lord, and would be directed particularly to the Gentiles. The last "signs and wonders" that fulfil the promise of Mark xvi. 17, 18 are recorded (Acts xxviii. 1-10), the last reference to the "hope of Israel" is made (Acts xxviii. 20), the last citation of Isa. vi. 10 is made and Israel become Lo-ammi (not My people, Hos. i. 9), the "salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles", and the dispensation of the mystery is made known.

The way in which Isa. vi. 10 is cited at great crises in Israel's history is worthy of study.

Biblical blessings.

#8. The blessedness of patience continuance.
pp. 38 - 40

The fourth book of the Psalms contains two blessing:--

> "Blessed is the man whom Thou chasteneth, O Lord,
> And teachest him out of Thy law;
> That Thou mayest give him rest from the days of adversity,
> Until the pit be digged for the wicked" (Psa. xciv. 12, 13).
> "Blessed are they that keep judgment,
> And he that doeth righteousness at all times" (Psa. cvi. 3).

This book of the Psalms corresponds to the book of Numbers. Psa. xc. is a Psalm of Moses; and the Rabbinical rule is that all succeeding Psalms, until a new author is named, are from the same pen. Consequently xci. is also a Psalm of Moses; so that all our Lord's quotations in the temptation in the wilderness were from the writings of Moses. The succeeding Psalms, from xcii. to c., must also be ascribed to Moses.

Psa. xc. deals with the wilderness experiences of those who, being twenty years old and upward, perished during the forty years' wandering.

Psa. xci. gives the experience of those under twenty, who were preserved during the forty years and led into the land of promise.

Psa. xcii. is entitled, "A Psalm or Song for the sabbath day".

The theme of this fourth book of the Psalms is that of "rest"—rest lost and found, rest desired, anticipated, celebrated, the rest that remaineth to the people of God. Psa. xciv. 13 speaks of "rest"; Psa. xcv. 11 speaks of "rest". Psa. cvi. rehearses the history of the Exodus and Israel's subsequent departures from the Lord; and so balances Psa. xc.

We are therefore prepared to find the blessings of this set of Psalms characterized by chastening, adversity, and endurance. Turning to Psa. xciv., we note that the blessing which we are to consider is set in a time of trouble.

The Psalm opens with a cry for vengeance, and speaks of God as the Judge of the earth and the Rewarder of the proud. The proud seem to triumph and to say, in effect, "The Lord shall not see". But such a conclusion is "brutish" and lacking in wisdom. He that planted the ear and formed the eye must surely be able to hear and see. He Who chastens the heathen knows full well the vanity of their thoughts.

It is in this setting that the beatitude of chastening is announced: "Blessed is the man whom Thou chastenest, O Lord." Quite a number of scriptures come to mind that speak of chastening. We are warned against "despising the chastening of the Lord" (Job. v. 17; Prov. iii. 1; Heb. xii. 5). We are assured that chastening and love go together (Heb. xii. 6), and that it is indeed a sign of sonship (Deut. viii. 5, Heb. xii. 7). Looking once more at the verse that gives us our theme, we observe that the first and third lines correspond, the first speaking of present chastening, and the third of rest from the days of adversity.

In Heb. xii. there is a "nevertheless afterwards", and in the verse under consideration there is an "until": "Until the pit be digged for the wicked" (Psa. xciv. 13). Abraham's seed had to suffer affliction in Egypt because the iniquity of the Amorite was not yet full. A patient trust in the God of all grace, Who is dealing with iniquity, and training His children for future glory, should enable those of us who are "sons" to realize that it is indeed a blessing to be chastened, disciplined, corrected and warned, while others, left without discipline, tread the road that leads unto death:--

> "When we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world" (I Cor. xi. 32).

The epistle to the Hebrews gives a prominent place to the story of Israel's failure in the wilderness (Heb. iii., iv.), and to the need of chastening (Heb. xii.), and lays great stress upon the grace of "endurance" and of "not drawing back".

And so we find that the second of the two blessings of this book of the Psalms insists upon endurance:--

> "Blessed are they that keep judgment,
> And he that doeth righteousness AT ALL TIMES" (Psa. cvi. 3).

A simplified structure of this Psalm is as follows:--

A | 1-7. HALLELUJAH. Righteousness at all times.
B | 8-12. Nevertheless.
C | 13-43. Sin and Deliverance.
B | 44-462. Nevertheless.
A | 47, 48. HALLELUJAH. From the age to the age.

The structure places the term "at all times" and "from everlasting to everlasting" (from the age to the age) in correspondence. It seems to suggest the believer's association by faith with longsuffering and patience of the Lord. He waits to be gracious. Let us wait also and murmur not. It is comparatively easy to do right sometimes, but the great test is to do right at all times, especially when adversity presses, when trials abound, when the wicked appear to triumph, when the Lord hides Himself so that the ungodly say, "The Lord shall not see". It is then blessed indeed to have received such grace that chastening can be appreciated at its true value. Whether our efforts are attended by outward success or by apparent failure, may we ever seek the blessedness of doing right at all times.

#9. The blessedness of going on unto perfection (Psa. cxix. 1).
pp. 74 - 77

There is need for care in sorting out the passages that speak of blessedness in the closing book of the Psalms, by reason of their dispensational character. For example, it would be quite contrary to the calling of the Church to take to itself the blessedness of Psa. cxxxvii. 8, 9. This Psalm is prophetic of the days of vengeance when Babylon shall suffer at the hand of the Lord. Again, when we read concerning children, in Psa. cxxvii.: "Happy (blessed) is the man that hath his quiver full of them", we must remember that the blessings of Israel included "basket and store", whereas in the dispensation now obtaining, the great apostle knew what it was to be homeless, comfortless, hungry and naked. Psa. cxxvii., moreover, is one of Hezekiah's Psalms, wherein he praises God for the added fifteen years of his life and the promise of a son and heir. The whole question, however, of the Songs of the Degrees is too great a subject for a series such as this, so we must pass on, without attempting further explanation.

The blessings of the fifth book of the Psalms, that are true for all time, are five in number, and are found in Psa. cxii. 1; cxix. 1, 2; cxiv. 15 and cxlvi. 5. These passages naturally divide into two groups:--

(1) The first three speak of blessing in association with the Word.
(2) The second pair speak of blessing in association with God.

Let us take the first set and consider what is there made a subject of blessing:--

> "Blessed is the man that feareth the Lord, that delighteth greatly in His commandments" (Psa. cxii. 1).
>
> "Blessed are the undefiled in the way, who walk in the law of the Lord. Blessed are they that keep His testimonies, and that seek Him with the whole heart" (Psa. cxix. 1, 2).

Psalm cxii. is an alphabetical Psalm, every line beginning with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and in alphabetical order. The following will give the reader some idea of the arrangement, but must not be taken as a literal translation:--

A blessing is on the man that feareth the Lord,
Because he delighteth in his commandments (verse 1).
*__G__reat shall his seed be upon the earth:
Descendants of the upright shall be blessed (verse 2).

[NOTE: * - G is the third letter in the Hebrew and Greek alphabets.]

The subject of fear needs separate consideration. It is sufficient for the moment to draw the reader's attention to the fact that this blessed fear is not to be disassociated from delight: "Blessed is the man that feareth . . . . . that delighteth." This takes us back to Psa. i. where we read: "His delight is in the law of the Lord."

While the Hebrew word chaphets is mostly translated by “delight”, “please”, and similar words, it is once rendered “move”, in the passage concerning Behemoth: “He moveth his tail like a cedar” (Job xl. 17).

It would be easy to follow the example of those who seize upon this passage as an example of slip-shod translation, for, one might say, what connection is there between the word “delight” and the “moving” of a tail? Yet if the question be put in a true spirit of enquiry, an interesting lesson awaits us. The radical idea of chaphets is to bend, and so to incline, to be favourably disposed, to delight in. A passage in Psa. cxix. brings the word “delight” and the word “incline” together:--

> “Make me to go in the path of Thy commandments; for therein do I delight. Incline my heart unto Thy testimonies and not to covetousness” (Psa. cxix. 35, 36).

This then is the first subject of blessedness: a heart and mind that “bend” or “incline” towards the word and will of God.

We must now pass on to the next subject of blessing:-- > “Blessed are the undefiled in the way, who walk in the law of the Lord” (Psa. cxix. 1).

Psa. cxix. is an alphabetical Psalm, but instead of each verse starting with a fresh letter of the alphabet, as in Psa. cxii., we find that it is divided into twenty-two stanzas, each of eight verses, each line in each stanza commencing with one letter of the alphabet (verses 1-8 begin with A; verses 9-16 with B; and so on).

The first stanza is divided into two parts. Verses 1-4 state truth in general; verses 5-8 give the response of the individual. It will be seen that point answers point in the structure: this we set out in a series of four parts.

/ THE WAY.—Blessedness of those who are undefiled (verse 1).
\ MY WAYS.—Prayer that verse 1 may be experienced (verse 5).

/ BLESSEDNESS.—Those who keep and seek with whole heart (2).
\ BLESSEDNESS.—Unashamed as result of having respect unto all commandments (6).

/ RIGHT.—They also do no iniquity (3).
\ RIGHT.—I will praise with uprightness (7).

/ COMMAND.—To keep precepts diligently (4).
\ RESPONSE.—I will keep Thy statutes (8).

Set out in structure form this stanza is as follows:--

A | 1. The way of the Lord. \
B | 2. Blessed. \ General.
C | 3. Upright; no iniquity. /
D | 4. Command. /
A | 5. My Ways. \
B | 6. Unashamed. \ Individual.
C | 7. Upright; righteous judgments. /
D | 8. Response. /

The word “undefiled”, the chief word in Psa. cxix. 1, is a translation of the Hebrew tamim. The root idea of this word is “to finish”, “to perfect”, “to complete”; the derived sense, “undefiled”, comes from its application to the animals used for sacrifice.

The parallel N.T. conception is conveyed by that great word “perfect” (teleios) which comes so prominently in Hebrews and Philippians. It suggests the “finishing” of one’s course, running with patience the race set before us, laying hold of that for which we have been laid hold of by Christ. To appreciate to the full the blessing pronounced in Psa. cxix. 1, we must bear in mind all the associations of the word “perfect”—the history of Noah who was “perfect” regarding his pedigree (Gen. vi. 9); the command of the Lord to Abraham after his justification, “Walk before Me and be thou perfect” (Gen. xvii. 1); the character of the man who shall ascend the hill of the Lord: “He that walketh uprightly” (Psa. xv. 2).

Besides all this, the blessedness of Psa. cxix. 1 extends to the very prize of our calling as set forth in Phil. iii., where the words “perfect” and “perfection” are key-thoughts.

The first clause of the verse (Psa. cxix. 1) is immediately followed by references to the Word of God and the believer’s relation thereto. The undefiled or perfect are “in the way”. They are those who “walk in the law of the Lord”, and who “keep His testimonies”.

The blessings that conclude the series in the Psalms we must leave for another paper.

#10. The blessedness of trust without sight (Psa. cxliv. 15; cxlvi. 5).

pp. 124 - 127

The two remaining beatitudes of the Psalms are those of Psa. cxliv. 15 and cxlvi. 5. Psa. cxliv. demands a careful examination owing to the peculiar change at verse 12. Some commentators have not hesitated to say that verse 12-15 belong to another period and have no real connection with the earlier verses. Such is the opinion of compilers of the Psalms chronologically arranged. The true explanation will be found in The Companion Bible. Verses 12-15 are the boastful words of the "strange children, whose mouth speaketh vanity" (verse 11). These say: "Our sons are plants grown up in their youth", and continue through the whole list, speaking of their daughters, their full garners, their increasing flocks, their labouring oxen, their security and contentment. "Happy", say they, "is that people, that is in such a case". The word "happy" is the word "blessed" which we have had before us throughout this series.

The Psalmist however breaks into this realm of contentment in the concluding sentence of the Psalm by saying: "Nay (or Yea rather), blessed is that people, whose God is the Lord." This is a supreme example of clear sighted faith. On the one hand, all that heart could wish in the shape of peace, prosperity and contentment; on the other, the vision that all is vanity apart from the presence and fellowship of the living God.

The prophet Habakkuk endorses the sentiment of the Psalmist:--

> "Although the fig tree shall not blossom,
> Neither shall fruit be in the vines;
> The labour of the olive shall fail,
> And the fields shall yield no meat;
> The flock shall be cut off from the fold,
> And there shall be no herd in the stalls;
> Yet will I rejoice in the Lord,
> I will joy in the God of my salvation" (Hab. iii. 17, 18).

What do we know of this triumphant "Yet" or of that equally wonderful "Nay" of Psa. cxliv. 15? This point of view is only obtained when, like Asaph, we turn our eyes away from envying those who have more than heart can wish, and enter into the sanctuary of God. What we learn there will enable us to come out again into the world where the ungodly seem to prosper, and to say out of a full heart "Whom have I in heaven but Thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside Thee" (Psa. lxxii. 25).

To us, members of the body of Christ, and blessed with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places, this sanctuary experience should be our normal attitude. In that sanctuary on high is our all, and while we look for traveling mercies and pilgrim provisions, we are enjoined to "set our minds on things above" (Col. iii. 2). When we hear others recounting the advantages of fellowship that compromises the truth, when we hear of success that goes hand in hand with betrayal of fundamentals, let us take a glance at Psa. cxliv., and be enabled to say to all such: "Nay, blessed is that people, whose God is the Lord."

The next and closing beatitude of the Psalms is found in a context that magnifies the Lord in a very full manner. There are but ten verses in the Psalm, and in order to demonstrate the emphatic place occupied in it by the Lord, we will give the entire Psalm, set out according to its structure and emphasis.

Psalm cxlvi.

A | 1, 2. Hallelujah.
Praise the LORD, O my soul.
While I live will I praise the LORD:
I will sing praises unto GOD while I have any being.
B | 3. Put not your trust in princes, nor in the son of man.
C | 3. In whom there is no help.
D | 4. His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth;
In that very day his thoughts perish.
E | 5. BLESSED IS HE THAT HATH THE GOD OF JACOB FOR HIS HELP.
B | 5. Whose hope is in the LORD his GOD.
C | 6-9. WHICH made heaven and earth,
The sea, and all that therein is:
WHICH keepeth truth for ever:
WHICH executeth judgment for the oppressed.
WHICH giveth food to the hungry.
The LORD looseth the prisoners:
The LORD openeth the eyes of the blind:
The LORD raiseth them that are bowed down:
The LORD loveth the righteous:
The LORD preserveth the strangers:
HE relieveth the fatherless and widow:
But the way of the wicked HE turneth upside down.
D | 4. The LORD shall reign for ever, even Thy GOD, O Zion, unto all generations.
A | 10. Hallelujah.
Praise ye the LORD.

In this first of the five "Hallelujah" Psalms that conclude the whole book, we have the Lord Himself as the centre and foundation, the source and the goal of all blessing. Man is set aside, be he prince of the blood, or man of the street. In him there is no help. The reference to his breath: "his breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth" and his mortality call to mind a parallel utterance:--

> "Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils: for wherein is he to be accounted of" (Isa. ii. 22).

In marked contrast with man and his utter inability in the matter of "help" (saving help, salvation) is the Lord, the maker of heaven and earth, the righteous judge of the oppressed, the God of providence and of salvation, the God Who shall reign for ever when the way of the wicked shall have been turned upside down. It is therefore quite in accord with the theme of the Psalm that we find placed in the centre of the structure of the blessedness of having the God of Jacob as our help. The stress upon the name "Jacob" suggests that we are dealing here with the God of all grace, for Jacob represents all that is weak and worthless, yet receiving all that is great and glorious. Not only our "help" but our "hope".

> "Whose hope is in the Lord his God" (Psa. cxlvi. 5).

It is indeed fitting that the climax blessings of the Psalms should be those that set aside all that pertains to the outer world of time and sense (Psa. cxliv. 12-15), and to man in whatever station he may found, and trusts only and completely in the God of all grace. Blessed indeed is a people in such a case.

We have now passed in review the blessings of the Psalms:--

(1) FORGIVENESS OF SINS (xxxii. 1-5).
(2) CONFIDENCE (ii. 12; xxxiv. 8; xl. 4).
(3) CONSISTENCY (i. 1).
(4) CONSIDERATION (xli. 1).
(5) SATISFACTION (lxv. 3, 4).
(6) ANTICIPATED VICTORY (lxxxiv. 4, 5, 12; lxxxix. 15).
(7) PATIENT CONTINUANCE (xciv. 12; cvi. 3).
(8) GOING ON UNTO PERFECTION (cxii. 1; cxix. 1, 2).
(9) TRUST WITHOUT SIGHT (cxliv. 15; cxlvi. 5).

Such is one group of Biblical blessings. We trust that the consideration of them will have been a means of help to many. We hope to pursue this theme in other parts of Scripture as opportunity offers. May the blessing of the Lord that maketh rich be our experimental portion at all times.

#11. Blessing, and its connection with purpose and the obedience of faith.

pp. 175 - 178

Among the outstanding figures of the O.T. that are particularly associated with blessing, we must include Abraham. There are four periods in his life linked with the thought of blessing, a study of which will shed some light on the conditions of Biblical blessing and so, we trust, be a help to us all.

The first occasion in Abraham's life on which we hear of blessing comes after his response to the call to leave country, kindred and father's house. Arising out of a consideration of Gen. xi. and xii., the following features appear to have a bearing upon our theme:--

(1) What was the necessary condition of blessing?

Let us answer in the words of Scripture:--

> "By faith Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went" (Heb. xi. 8).

By comparing Acts vii. 2, 3 with Gen. xii. 1 we discover that Abraham received this call twice; once when he was in Ur of the Chaldees, and once in Haran after the death of his father Terah:--

> "The God of glory appeared unto our father Abraham, when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran, and said unto him, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and come into the land which I shall show thee" (Acts vii. 2, 3).

It appears that when Abraham prepared to move out of Ur of the Chaldees in response to the call of God, Terah his father, Lot his nephew, and Sarai Abraham's wife journeyed together. At first sight it would appear that Abraham did not fully obey the Lord's command, but by comparing Acts vii. with Gen. xii. it will be seen that at the first call, separation from "country and kindred" was commanded, while after the death of Terah it was separation from "country, kindred and father's house":--

> "Now the Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will shew thee" (Gen. xii. 1).

In our next article we shall show that the Lord kept His word and that Abraham did not receive the blessing promised until the conditions were fulfilled. This, however, does not come first. While implicit and absolute obedience is the essential condition for blessing, and while Abraham did not receive the full promise until he had fully obeyed, we can contemplate with thanksgiving the fact that the intention of Abraham's heart was noted by the Lord, just as surely as the halts and the hindrances that for the time prevented complete obedience.

At the end of Gen. xi. we read: "And Terah took Abram his son" (Gen. xi. 31). Perhaps it is impossible for us who live today to realize the authority that a parent had in those patriarchal days over his children, even though they were grown up and married. The Lord, therefore, tempered His command, and did not include "thy father's house" at the beginning. Haran, though 600 miles distant from Ur, was a similar city, and worshipped the same Moon-god. Not until Terah was dead did Abraham cross over Jordan and enter into the land.

We can say without fear of contradiction that the necessary condition of blessing in Abraham's case was obedience of faith. And the same is true of all experimental blessings in relation to all the children of God in all ages.

(2) What underlies the blessing of God?

It is evident from the context that Abraham was not called and blessed on merely personal grounds. The nations of the earth had signally failed. The awful rebellion of the builders of Babel is found in the same chapter as the move of Terah to Haran. That rebellion was overruled by the purpose of God:--

> "Let us make us a name; lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth" (Gen. xi. 4).

When the Lord blessed Abraham, He said, "I will make thy name great . . . . . and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed" (Gen. xii. 2, 3); as though that which had been rebelliously planned by the builders of Babel should be gloriously achieved by the mercy of God. We shall therefore be within the bounds of truth if we say that underlying the blessings of Scripture will be discovered the outworking of the purpose of the ages.

If we turn to Eph. i. 3-14, where that phase of the purpose is introduced which belongs to heavenly places and the mystery, we shall find "blessing" and "purpose" very closely related:--

> "Who hath blessed us . . . . . according as He hath chosen us . . . . . having predestinated us . . . . . according to the good pleasure of His will . . . . . according to His good pleasure which He hath purposed in Himself . . . . . according to the purpose of Him Who worketh all things after the counsel of His Own will."

(3) An essential characteristic of blessing.

This fact, that blessings are not merely personal, but are related to a wider purpose than our own immediate salvation and peace, leads us to the next observation. No blessing is given to man for purely personal and selfish ends. He is blessed that he may be a blessing:--

> "I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great: and thou shalt be a blessing. And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed" (Gen. xii. 2, 3).

Abraham was to be the father of a "great nation" but, unlike the other great nations of history, that nation's greatness was not to be used tyrannically, or for personal gratification. Through that great nation "all families of the earth" were to be blessed. The Lord said, "I will bless thee"; but also added, "and thou shalt be a blessing".

There are several important things yet to be made known to Abraham, and certain further conditions to be fulfilled, before these revelations are possible or fitting, but we have here in this opening of the story three most important features, which it will be profitable for us all to make our own.

(1) Blessings, to be enjoyed and experienced, necessitate the obedience of faith. "By faith . . . . . he obeyed."

(2) Blessings are never to be considered in isolation; they are a part of the outworking of the purpose of God. The nations had failed. God blessed Abraham that he might be the father of a "great nation" through whom blessing might flow.

(3) Blessings are never to be considered as purely personal or to be used selfishly. The reception of blessing constitutes the receiver a channel of blessing to some one else. The failure to see this contributed largely to Israel's fall. They cursed the Gentiles as dogs, instead of realizing that these nations were yet to be saved and blessed.

#12. Separation: an essential to realized blessing.
pp. 257 - 260

One contributory feature in the experience of blessing that we did not emphasize in our last paper is the condition of "separation". We shall find that this thought is prominent in Abraham's next experience.

We observe in our last paper that there were four periods in Abraham's life specially associated with blessing, and found that Heb. xi. spoke most pointedly of the first. It is a confirmation of our investigations that Heb. xi. speaks of the four items in turn. The special feature of "separation" is noted in Heb. xi. 9:--

> "By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tents with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise."

"Sojourning in a tent" seems to mark the next stage, and this is focused in Gen. xii.-xiv. in the word "separate". Although Terah was dead, and Ur of the Chaldees left far behind, Lot still remained with Abraham, and while he did so, complete separation from his "father's house" was not yet attained. When obedience is not voluntary, the Lord sometimes allows His children to pass through painful experience, so that what they have not done freely they shall do after being taught by afflictions:--

> "Abram was very rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold" (Gen. xiii. 2).

Famine had found a weak spot in Abraham's faith (Gen. xii. 10), and now riches and plenty are going to complete the rather bitter lesson that he needed:--

> "Lot also, which went with Abram, had flocks, and herds, and tents. And the land was not able to bear them, that they might dwell together: for their inheritance was great, so that they could not dwell together. And there was strife" (Gen. xiii. 5-7).

Abraham, had he insisted upon his rights, could have reminded Lot that the land belonged to him by the promise of God, and that he, Lot, was an intruder. Abraham, however, does no such thing. He appears to have gained some insight into comparative values, and realizes that to get free from Lot even at a great sacrifice to himself would be worth while. Consequently, although the whole land was Abraham's, he stands aside and allows his nephew first choice. "And Lot chose him all the plain of Jordan." To follow the history of Lot and to mark its lessons is not our present purpose. We leave him where his choice had taken him, and return to Abraham to see what results follow:--

> "And the Lord said unto Abram, AFTER THAT LOT WAS SEPARATED from him, Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward: for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever" (Gen. xiii. 14, 15).

Here at last, and for the first time, the promise of Gen. xii. 1 is fulfilled. In Gen. xii. 1 the Lord had spoken of separation from country, kindred, and father's house, and of a land "that I will show thee". Here, in Gen. xiii., when the last act of separation has taken place—for Lot was a part of his "father's house"—the Lord shows Abraham the land. Not only did he see it, but he also received the command:--

> "Arise, walk through the land in the length of it and in the breadth of it: for I will give it unto thee" (Gen. xiii. 17).

Here, surely, is a lesson for us all. Not until there is separation can there be any real appreciation of the extent of our blessings. We cannot "lift up our eyes" neither can we "arise and walk through the land" while Lot is with us. How many times are we met with the remark, "I do not see it". Sometimes, of course, the inability to see may be due to our faulty presentation, but sometimes we are fairly certain that the one who confesses inability to see the high calling of Ephesians, is hindered by some spiritual Lot. The Church equivalent of Abraham's separation from Lot is found in Eph. i. 17, 18.

The apostle prays not only that the believer may have the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him but, as the margin reads, "for the acknowledgment of Him". This granted, the eyes are opened and the believer knows what is the hope of His calling and the riches of His inheritance. He is shown the land, and he arises and walks through it. Just as Abraham's realization of his inheritance hinged upon separation from Lot, so the realization of our hope and inheritance hinges upon our "acknowledging" the truth as we see it.

The principle of separation is taken one stage further in Gen. xiv., and leads us to Abraham's "second blessing". Lot had become involved in the quarrels of the nations and, when Sodom was taken by the confederate kings, Lot and all his possessions were taken captive also. It is suggestive that when news of this calamity is taken to Abraham, he is called "the Hebrew". The word indicates "one who passes over", and so stands for the principle of separation that is in view here. To Abraham, the separated one, the news is brought; and under God he, with his small company of 318 trained servants, rescues Lot and all his possessions, together with all that had been taken from Sodom. Now comes the crisis towards which the events and experiences of chapters xiii. and xiv. have been leading. In verse 17, the king of Sodom goes out to meet Abraham. In verse 21, recognizing the valour and worth of Abraham's action, he asks that the persons who had been thus delivered should be given back to Sodom, but that all that Abraham had rescued should be his own as a reward. On the surface, nothing could appear more generous, or more reasonable, and that, between the meeting of Abraham with the King of Sodom, and the account of the king's offer, come verses 18-20. This parenthesis is the turning-point of the story. Another king meets Abraham, Melchisedek, king of Salem, priest of the Most High God. He brings forth bread and wine and blesses Abraham, saying:-- > "Blessed be Abram of the Most High God, possessor of heaven and earth: and blessed be the Most High God, Which hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand. And he (Abram) gave him (Melchisedek) tithes of all" (Gen. xiv. 19, 20. See Heb. vii. 1-4).

It was this meeting with Melchisedek and his blessing, that caused Abraham to reply to the king of Sodom as he did:--

> "And Abram said to the king of Sodom, I have lifted up mine hand unto the Lord, the Most High God, the possessor of heaven and earth, that I will not take from a thread even to a shoe-latchet, and that I will not take anything that is thine, lest thou shouldest say, I have made Abram rich. Save only that which the young men have eaten, and the portion of the men which went with me, Aner, Eschol, and Mamre; let them take their portion" (Gen. xiv. 22-24).

Let us observe, not only the faith of Abraham, but also his reasonableness. The young men had eaten food. He has no foolish scruples over that. He has no reason to become extreme in order to show that his faith is real. Again, notice his reasonableness with regard to Aner, Eschol and Mamre. These men had rendered valuable service, and it would have caused them to blaspheme the name of the God of Abraham, had he insisted that what was right for himself, "the Hebrew", the separated one, must also be right for those not in such relationship with the world. We feel sure that believers who attempt to legislate for the world, and how it shall spend its time and opportunities, are more like Lot, who sat in the gate of Sodom and so ineffectively vexed his righteous soul from day to day (II Pet. ii. 7, 8), than Abraham, who, though he himself refused to take the smallest fraction from Sodom, did not impose his faith upon others.

Melchisedek makes us think of the Epistle of the Hebrews. Hebrews leads out thoughts up to the right hand of God where Christ is, as the seated Priest. And this in turn leads us to Ephesians where the church is "seated together" in heavenly places.

The words of Gen. xiv. 20 remind us of Eph. i. 3:--

> "He blessed him . . . . . Blessed be Abram . . . . . Blessed be the Most High God" (Gen. xiv. 20).
> "Blessed be the God and Father . . . . . Who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings" (Eph. i. 3).

Like Abraham, we have met with One Who directs our hearts upward to where all fullness dwells. We can therefore quite easily repudiate the things of the world that would be our legitimate rights, were we not co called and blessed.

We trust that the second element in blessing is now clear to us all. (1) The first element of blessing, as set forth in the experience of Abraham, is "the obedience of faith". (2) The second element of blessing, as set forth in the same history, is the position of "separation".

Dr. E. W. Bullinger and Universal Reconciliation.

Fact or assumption?

pp. 1 - 5

In Volume XXIII, pages 205 and 206, we gave an example of fallacious reasoning on the part of one, Mr. W. Hoste, B.A., who inferred—apparently without knowledge of his writings—that the late Dr. E. W. Bullinger was a Universalist.

A reader in New Zealand has just sent us the following extract from the July, 1934, issue of "Unsearchable Riches", from which it would appear that Mr. A. E. Knoch has, to say the least, made the same unwarranted inference:--

> "DR. BULLINGER AND RECONCILIATION.—We have often been asked to publish Dr. Bullinger's opinion of universal reconciliation. The temptation to do this was strong, for it would tend to break down the prejudice which he himself had created against it. But we were determined that God's truth should not be based on any man's opinion. Besides, he evidently did not wish to take a public stand for universal reconciliation until he had fully mastered the doctrine of the eons."
>
> "The matter came up in this way: I sent an advertisement of Unsearchable Riches to Things to Come, but he wrote back that he could not insert it. As it appeared in the next issue, I wrote him a note of thanks. He replied that he deserved no thanks, as it had been inserted by mistake. He said he had heard that I had something on the 'aiones', and that he would be glad to see what it was. In response I prepared the chart in which every passage containing the word is arranged in chronological order. In his last letter to me, he made the following statement: 'It may help to a better understanding between us if you would kindly explain exactly what you mean by 'universal reconciliation'.' To an English ear here it savours of what is called 'Universalism', in which every one who ever lived will have a second chance. If it refers only to the future and not to the past I have no quarrel with it. But I should like it made clear. And I am sure you can and will do it for me."
> "I remember distinctly the satisfaction that this letter gave me. There could be no doubt whatever that he would accept the truth once he had investigated it, according to his own written statement. But this was not to be, for, soon after, he died. The chart was returned to me long afterward, when the Companion Bible was finished. It is easy to prove, from his published works, that Dr. Bullinger denied 'Universalism'. But it is also true that, at the very last, only his illness and death prevented him from accepting the doctrine of the eons and the universal reconciliation" (A.E.K.).

In also transmitting the following extracts from "Things to Come", the Journal edited by Dr. Bullinger, our reader, writes: "I have no intention of defending Dr. Bullinger. The very best thing to do is to let the lion out, and he will defend himself":--

> "C. H. C.—It is news indeed to hear that we believe in the 'Universal Fatherhood of God', 'Universal restoration, and the purgatorial process'. Such charges must come, not from ignorance, but from malice; and is a clear and open breach of the ninth Commandment."
>
> "To such, I give no answer. To you, you have an emphatic and flat denial of the false charge. No reader of 'Things to Come' would entertain it for a moment. May we ask them to 'nail it to the counter' at every opportunity; though we fear the lie has got too good a start even to be overtaken and crushed: and it is too good a weapon for our opponents, to expect them to abandon very readily'. 'The Day will declare it'." (Vol. XVI, July, 1910, page 84).

"A DISCLAIMER.—Re the advertisement of 'Unsearchable Riches' in our last issue, it was entirely due to a mistake between ourselves and our advertising agent."

"Some of our friends have felt aggrieved; but we hope that both they and others will have fuller confidence in us for the future" (Vol. XVIII, Nov., 1912, page 133).

"QUESTION No.408. 'RECONCILIATION.'—A.S. (Scotland). Does Christ's work include the angels, see Col. i. 20: to reconcile all things to Himself, things on earth and things in heaven?"

"To understand this we must understand the words used. There are two words rendered reconcile."

"(1) Katallasso. It occurs only six times (Rom. v. 10; I Cor. vii. 11; II Cor. v. 18, 19, 20); and means conciliation by changing the relation of one person or thing towards another; whereas diallassomai means that the change is mutual with each of the two parties. This word occurs only once in the New Testament, viz., Matt. v. 24."

"(2) The other word is apokatallasso, and denotes that this change of relationship need not affect both (of two) parties, but that the change on the part of the one is complete and absolute. This word occurs only in Eph. ii. 16; Col. i. 20, 21."

"If the word 'destruction' has any meaning (see Psa. cxlv. 20), how can what is destroyed be conciliated or reconciled? God can be said to have changed His relationship to the world when He has made an end of all evil. This conciliation or change is in Himself, as in Col. i. 21. The cross changes His attitude toward all things. He can now be 'just' in His judgments, and yet 'the justifier' of all who believe Him."

" 'The heavens are not clean in His sight'; but, when Satan is cast out, and the earth purged of all evil, His attitude to 'the things on earth and things in heaven' will be changed, but as to the things themselves that have been destroyed and burned up, how can they be 'reconciled' in any sense of the word?"

"The conciliation is 'unto Himself', and His relation to saved sinners is changed through the death of His Son, so that He can present them holy and unblameable, and unimpeachable in His sight. It is He Who is conciliated by the atonement of Christ, and not ourselves. We are changed from enemies to friends by His grace and power."

"We are convinced that the interpretation of the word 'reconciliation', which connects it with two parties, is a misunderstanding; just as the word 'accept' is almost universally misunderstood and misused. It is God who accepts Christ as the sinners' substitute, as He accepted Abel's lamb (Gen. iv. 4; Heb. xi. 4)."

"He accepted it by consuming it with 'fire from heaven' (Psa. xx. 3) as He accepted all sacrifices (see Lev. ix. 24; vi. 12, 13; I Kings viii. 64; xviii. 38; II Chron. vii. 1, etc.). And yet, to-day, sinners are everywhere exhorted to 'accept Christ' for themselves, instead of being exhorted to believe God that He has accepted Christ as His provided substitute for everyone who believes what He has revealed as to their guilt, and as to their need of a Saviour."

"So with what is spoken of as 'reconciliation'. There is no such thing as regards the sinner. There is conciliation on God's part toward the sinner in virtue of the substitute which He has provided and accepted, but there is an 'everlasting destruction', not some future reconciliation, for those who refuse to believe Him" (Vol. XIX, Jan., 1913, p. 11).

"QUESTION No.414. 'RECONCILIATION'.—D.J. (Middlesex). What is the force of the preposition apo in apokatallasso? Does it, as some say, describe the change in us, from enmity to love?"

"In our answer to Question No.408 in the January Number, we gave all the references where the words katallasso and apokatallasso occur. We add here the occurrences of the noun katallage; Rom. v. 11 (translated atonement); xi. 15; II Cor. v. 18, 19. A consideration of all these passages will show that there is no idea in any one of them of the reconciliation being mutual. In that case, as we pointed out, the word used would have been diallassomai, as in Matt. v. 24, which its only occurrence in the New Testament."

"Mutual reconciliation can only be where each party has wronged the other. What injury has God done to us, that we have to forgive?"

"The enmity in the heart of man against God is due to the fact that man has wronged God, and anyone with a knowledge of human nature will admit that it is the one who has done wrong who seeks to justify his position by blackening the character of him he has wronged. This is one of the awful consequences of man's fall. Because of sin man is under the wrath of God (Rom. i. 18; Eph. ii. 3; Col. iii. 6). By the death of Christ this wrath is appeased, and God can 'be just and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus' (Rom. iii. 26). Those who receive this reconciliation (or atonement) (Rom. v. 11) are removed from (apo) a condition of being under wrath and condemnation (Rom. viii. 1), to one of acceptance and peace with God. The change is one of position or standing, not of character. That comes afterwards."

"And here is the mistake that so many make. They are looking for acceptance because of some change in themselves, instead of believing God, and accepting His statement as to reconciliation (II Cor. v. 18-20). Not until the sinner believes in the love of God, does any love to God spring up in his heart (I John iv. 10, 19), driving out the enmity which is there by nature. Reconciliation is a question of pure grace or favour on God's part, and we are conformed to the image of His Son, by contemplating Him and becoming more and more acquainted with the prefectness of His work. To grow in grace is to grow in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ (II Pet. iii. 18, R.V.)."

"Any other view of 'Reconciliation' (such as universal reconciliation) does away entirely with the Bible word 'destruction', and deprives it of any meaning that can be given to it. There is no place for the two. As 'destruction' is a Bible word, and 'universal reconciliation' is a human formula, the latter must be abandoned" (Vol. XIX, April, 1913, page 46).

"S.S. (Lanarkshire). Of the resurrections in I Cor. xv. 23, 24, the resurrection of Rev. xx. 12, 13, is, as you say, implied in I Cor. xv. 24. When the Son delivers up the kingdom to the Father He will have put down all rule and authority and power. This must be after the judgment of the great white throne, for that deals with some rebellious ones whose doom is to be cast into the lake of fire. This is called the second death, and there is no hint of any resurrection from it. Those who claim that there is should be prepared with some Scripture to that effect. The first death comes to righteous and unrighteous alike, and Scripture is full of testimony to the resurrection from it. The second death comes only to the ungodly, and while it is frequently spoken of as their end (Psa. xxxvii. 38; Prov. xiv. 12; Rom. vi. 21; II Cor. xi. 15; Phil. iii. 19; Heb. vi. 8; I Pet. iv. 17), we are not acquainted with a single passage that speaks of a resurrection from that" (Vol. XIX, May, 1913, page 60).

The foregoing extracts—the last of which it will be noted is dated May 1913—and Dr. Bullinger died but a month later, viz., on 6th June, 1913—speak for themselves, and inasmuch as the teaching concerning "universal reconciliation" does, of necessity, refer "to the past", it is pure assumption (to put it mildly) to state that "only his illness and death prevented him from accepting the doctrine of the eons and the universal reconciliation".

We may say that in reply to a recent enquiry of Dr. Bullinger's niece (Miss E. Dodson), who was in close attendance on him until the date of his death, she writes:--

"I have never heard my uncle say one word in favour of universal reconciliation."

Our own personal contact with the late Doctor enables us to most definitely confirm this.

It will be apparent that the statements made in the above quotation from "Unsearchable Riches" are pure assumption, and they prompt the pertinent question as to whether the one who dares to make them without a real shred of evidence is a safe guide in things eschatological, for with such individuals there is ever the danger that they will (maybe unconsciously) see things through media of their own colouring. "The day will declare it."

Studies in Colossians.

#29. BEWARE.
What it means to hold the Head (ii. 19).
pp. 18 - 23

In our last article we were concerned with the false teaching that obtained among the Colossians, which, if persisted in, would rob them of the prize. We now turn our attention to the corrective administered. It is expressed negatively: "and not holding the Head", but its teaching is positive. It is that we should "hold the Head", and this in contrast with all the incipient spiritism and the intrusion of angelic mediation about which the apostle has already spoken.

If the apostle had had unbelievers in mind, he would not have used the words "not holding". The words imply that he is speaking to believers, but to believers whose grasp of their true calling, and appreciation of the fullness of Christ, is small or weak. He would point them to the Lord Jesus as the Head, and to living contact with Him as all-sufficient for all the members of the one body. Not only does the apostle exhort the Colossians to hold the Head; he speaks, too, of the knitting together of the members. The balance of thought will be more readily seen if the verse is set out as follows:--

Colossians ii. 19.

A | Head; body; joints (Emphasis upon unity).
B | Nourishment ministered.
A | Knit together (Emphasis upon unity).
B | Increase with the increase of God.

In the preceding article we referred to Mark vii. 6-8. It is interesting to note that the word "to hold" in Mark vii. 3, where the reference is to the traditions of the elders, is the same as that used in Col. ii. 19 which, in contrast to all such tradition, speaks of holding Christ as the Head. The word "hold" is krateo; the related word kratos is translated in the A.V. "dominion", "power", "strength", and once, with kata, "mightily". The three occurrences in the prison epistles are Eph. i. 19, vi. 10, and Col. i. 11, where it is rendered "power". "To hold with strength" appears to be the true meaning of the word in all its many ramifications. This may explain the wealth of language involving "power", "might", "strength" used in such passages as Eph. i. 19, iii. 16 and vi. 10 in connection with faith in Christ as the Head and the Fullness, the indwelling of Christ by faith, and the conflict with spiritual wickedness.

The Headship of Christ contains within it most, if not all, that is implied in the purpose of the ages. It is a word, however, not used in the O.T. with such frequency and precision as it is used by Paul in the prison epistles.

When the restoration of Israel takes place:--

"Then shall the children of Judah and the children of Israel be gather together, and appoint themselves one head, and they shall come up out of the land; for great shall be the day of Jezreel" (Hos. i. 11).

"Their King shall pass before them, and the Lord on the head of them" (Mic. ii. 13).

In the N.T. we find five references to Christ as "the Head of the corner" (Matt. xxi. 42; Mark xii. 10; Luke xx. 17; Acts iv. 11, and I Pet. ii. 7), each passage dealing with the purpose of God as it pertains to Israel.

In I Cor. xi. 3, the reference is as wide as mankind: "The head of every man is Christ." This is not limited to the believer; just as it is true that the head of every woman is the man, whether they believe or not. The origin and basis of this headship is found in creation.

The Greek word kephale (translated "head") occurs seven times in the prison epistles, and as this word stands for so much that is important to the believer to-day, we will give each reference and indicate its relationship to the whole:--

The seven occurrences of "Head".

A | Eph. i. 21, 22. Head over all things. Including principality and power.
B | Eph. iv. 15, 16. Head, even Christ. From whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth . . . . . maketh increase of the body.
C | Eph. v. 23. Husband is head, even as Christ is Head of the Church.
C | Col. i. 18. He is the Head of the body, the Church.
A | Col. ii. 10. Head of all principality and power.
B | Col. ii. 19. Head, from which all the body by joints and bands having nourishment ministered, and knit together, increaseth with the increase of God.

While it would be interesting to take each of the above references both separately and in relation to the corresponding member, our immediate concern is with Col. ii. 19. We shall be helped by considering the parallel passage in Eph. iv. Let us observe its context. Eph. iv. 15 comes in the practical section of the epistle, which opens with an exhortation to a walk that is worthy, and the necessity of true humility (the word "lowliness" in Eph. iv. 2 being translated in Acts xx. 19 "humility of mind"). The goal before the believer is his "perfecting", and his standard "the perfect man, the measure of the stature of the fullness of the Christ". He is warned against the "sleight of men and cunning craftiness whereby they lie in wait to deceive". They are to "grow up" and "make increase" in relation to Christ, the Head, and to the members of His body.

The reference in Col. ii. 19 likewise comes in a practical section. It, too, opens with an exhortation concerning walk:--

"As ye have received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in Him" (Col. ii. 6).

This is an exhortation and a principle that really covers all that the apostle has to say in the rest of the chapter regarding true sanctification, Christ's Headship, and the utter repudiation of every attempt of man to dominate the members of His Body.

Col. ii. likewise speaks of humility, but this time a false humility associated with grovelling superstition and vain glory in the flesh. Corresponding to the "perfecting" and the "fullness" of Eph. iv. we have the "completeness" of the believer in Col. ii., the same word underlying both terms. The "truth in Jesus", says the apostle, lies in the fact that the old man has been put off, and the new man put on (Eph. iv. 21-24).

The warning in Col. ii. is clearly parallel with that of Eph. iv. Instead of "the sleight of men" and their deception, we have "vain deceitful philosophy", the "traditions of men", "the rudiments of the word". Where Eph. iv. speaks of the repudiation of the old man with his deeds, Col. ii. speaks of the circumcision made without hands, the putting off of the body of the flesh. Even the blessedness of forgiveness is included in both passages:--

> "Even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you" (Eph. iv. 32).
> "Having forgiven you all trespasses" (Col. ii. 13).

The "cunning craftiness" of Eph. iv. is seen in the "voluntary humility and worshipping of angels" that, if followed, would "beguile of the prize" (Col. ii. 18).

The aspect of the truth that is particularly marked in Ephesians is the unity that must obtain between the members of the body. The aspect of the same truth particularly stressed in Colossians is that these same united members must also be closely united to the Lord as the Head.

With these parallels to help us, let us now turn our attention to the actual statement of Col. ii. 19:--

> "Joints and bands" (Haphe and sundesmos).

The word that gives us "joint" comes from haptomai, "to touch", and is in the near context—Col. ii. 21: "Touch not." Sundesmos, "bond", is found in Eph. iv. 3 and in Col. iii. 14:--

> "Endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace."
> "Put on love, which is the bond of perfectness."

There is a similarity in the description of the body here with that given by Galen, a Greek physician, born A.D.130 at Pergamos, not very far from Ephesus and Colosse. He also speaks of the structure of the body as of a twofold union, stating that the body owes its compactness partly to articulation and partly to the attachments. Aristotle too speaks of haphe, "contact" and sumphusis, "cohesion". Lightfoot's translation of the two words in Col. ii. 19 is "junctures and ligaments". A knowledge of anatomy is not very wide-spread even in this day of universal encyclopædias, but the slightest acquaintance with the construction of the human body not only calls forth praise to the Creator, but affords many lessons of a spiritual nature.

The underlying meaning of haphe is connected with "touching". The language of common speech: "Keep in touch", "out of touch", etc., and the sanction of Scripture (Matt. ix. 20, etc.) would impress upon us the need for the closest unity between every member of the body. We should be as anxious to get rid of all friction spiritually, as we are to avoid rheumatism physically. A "stiff neck" belongs to both worlds, and can be a serious interference in the healthy functioning of the body.

The meaning of sumbibazo, "knit together", was considered in Volume XXIII, page 13, to which the reader is directed for its twofold meaning and its bearing upon the subject here.

"To minister nourishment" is the translation of epichoregeo, and originally referred to the choregos, a person who supplied the refreshments, ornaments, etc., for the chorus or theatrical entertainment. Choros occurs in Luke xv. 25 where it is translated "dancing". Josephus refers to God as the Choregon trophes, "The Supplier of food". The verb occurs in II Cor. ix. 10, and I Pet. iv. 11. Combined with epi, as in Col. ii. 19, we find the word in II Cor. ix. 10 (first word), Gal. iii. 5, and II Pet. i. 11. In Eph. iv. 16, and Phil. i. 19 the substantive epichoregia is translated "supply". The passage in Philippians well illustrates the relationship of member and head:--

> "Through your prayer and the supply of the spirit of Jesus Christ" (Phil. i. 19).

While, therefore, the believer has nothing to do with "meat and drink" and the feasts that belong to the law, he is by no means cut off from their spiritual equivalents, the very word used, as we have seen, being associated originally with entertainment, ornament, and "things richly to enjoy". This would be felt all the more by those who had been led into a false asceticism, "neglecting the body", "forbidding to marry" and "commanding to abstain from meats". Holiness and increase are not forwarded by such practices. All true increase must be "the increase of God", even though it be through "every joint of the supply" and the "edifying of itself in love".

"Increase" is closely linked with "the knowledge of God" in Col. i. 10. In II Cor. ix. 10 the word choregeo and epichoregeo ("minister") occur, and we find the word "increase" as a result. Paul may plant, and Apollos may water, but it is God that giveth the increase (I Cor. iii. 6, 7), a lesson that the Colossians had been slow to learn. We find the same word translated "to grow" in Eph. iv. 15, so making another close parallel between the two passages. It comes again in Eph. ii. 21, where the temple that is "fitly framed together" corresponds with the body that is "fitly joined together" in Eph. iv. 16.

One of the fundamental features of sanctification is "union" (see Volume XXIII, page 76), and we find the same truth in Col. ii. Anything that separates the believer from the Lord, by the interposing of anything whatever, is comparable with the dislocation of the body, and "wholeness", which is one phase of "holiness", is thereby spoiled. To have learned that in Christ is all the treasure of wisdom, and knowledge, and that He Who is made unto us wisdom and righteousness and redemption, has been made unto us sanctification as well, is the lesson we may learn from the trouble of the Colossian Church, a lesson necessary for our peace, our true growth and our sanctification, as it is for the glory of Him Who has been given to be Head over all things to the Church.

#30. BEWARE.
Why are ye subject to ordinances? (ii. 20-23).
pp. 52 - 58

On reaching the closing section of verses 20-23, one further truth is stated in the corrective administered by the apostle, and that is, "Ye died with Christ". While this is of tremendous importance, we shall, having regard to the limitation of space and the fact that much of the doctrinal teaching conveyed by these four words has already been brought out in the exposition of Rom. vi., fell justified in referring the reader to that series of articles for information, and in the present series proceed direct to the conclusion of Col. ii., taking the above statement of doctrine with us.

The closing section of Col. ii. balances the opening one, and as it is some time since we set out this passage in structural form, it may be of use to repeat the outline of the opening and closing portions of Col. ii. 4-23:--

R | a | 4-8. Plausible speech. Philosophy (sophos).
b | 8. Traditions of men.
c | 8. Rudiments of world.
CORRECTIVE. | 8. Not after Christ.
9, 10. Ye are filled full in Him.

* * * * *

R | c | 20-22. Rudiments of world.
b | 22. Teaching of men.
a | 23. Wordy show of wisdom (sophos).
CORRECTIVE. | 23. Not in any honour.
23. Filling the flesh.

Between the believer and all that would impose upon him stands the great fact, that he died with Christ; and that not only to sin, but to the rudiments of the world, to the lordship of men, to the ceremonies and the prohibitions of a carnal religion. From all such the believer is blessedly free.

When writing to the Galatian believers who had been induced to observe days and the like, the apostle associated such observance with their previous service to "them which by nature are no gods", and we must remember that in those days the very elements of the world were deified and worshipped. To-day, however, the pendulum has swung in the opposite direction. The forces of nature, ignorantly worshipped by the ancients, have been so reduced by "science" to be regarded as "nature" and the "laws of nature", as to set aside a personal Creator, or the necessity for Him by Whom all things consist (Col. i. 17), the exchange from idolatry to godlessness being, equally with pagan teaching, an offence in the eyes of the Lord. The association of observances, ceremonials, and the elements of the world with Christianity, made easy the deception of the Colossians and the introduction of angelic mediation and worship a natural consequence. But the believer has died with Christ, and is completely free from the domination of all these things—whether pagan or Mosaic, whether deceitful philosophy or holy law and covenant. From all and everything that would impose upon the flesh, having sanctification in view, he is separated:--

> "Wherefore if ye died with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why as though living in the world are ye subject to ordinances?" (Col. ii. 20).

"Subject to ordinances" is the translation of one word in the original, and has been rendered "ordinance-ridden". Then follow specimen prohibitions as "Touch not; taste not; handle not". The apostle, writing to Timothy and referring to the false teaching of the latter times, shows that the doctrine of demons, far from teaching men to be immoral, would veto even those things that God has sanctioned, thus creating a false ground of holiness, and leading away from Christ by some supposed personal merit:--

> "Forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth" (I Tim. iv. 3).

I Cor. vii. 1 shows that by the injunction "Touch not" the saints at Colosse were being taught to look upon marriage as something to be shunned. "Taste not" advocates abstinence from various food upon the assumption that some were "common and unclean", a subject upon which the apostle very clearly expressed the mind of God in I Corinthians, Romans and I Timothy:-- > "Meat commendeth us not to God. For neither, if we eat, are we the better; neither, if we eat not, are we the worse" (I Cor. viii. 8).

The only real ground for abstinence is the conscience of the weaker brother who may be stumbled by our liberty. Strictly speaking "handle not" means "do not touch, however lightly", and indicates that over scrupulosity which is characteristic of those whose conception of holiness is negative—what one does not, rather than what one is in Christ.

All this prohibitions and the subjects of them, have one thing in common, they belong to that which is perishing. These things are after the commandments and doctrines of men, and as already stated are given with intent to deceive (Col. ii. 8):--

> "Which things have indeed a show of wisdom in will-worship and humility, and neglecting of the body; not in any honour, to the satisfying of the flesh" (Col. ii. 23).

"Which things" is atina in the Greek, and means "which sort of things", i.e., not only the three specified, but all other such-like prohibitions and negations: and each generation has its own. For instance, in our own day sermons have been preached against "Railway Trains", "Chloroform", "Motor Cars", "Wireless" and "Aeroplanes". The spirit of this passage in Col. ii. remains though the outward form change.

"Have indeed a show of wisdom."—The word "show" is the translation of logos. This word has a wide signification, including not only reason, speech, word, discourse, but also "the cause of" (Matt. v. 29, margin); "thing" (Matt. xxi. 24); "intent" (Acts x. 29). Perhaps the rendering "having a reputation for wisdom" conveys the meaning as well as any. Moffatt's translation is suggestive:--

> "These rules are determined by human precepts and tenets; they get the name of 'wisdom' with their self-imposed devotions, with their fasting, with their rigorous discipline of the body, but they are of no value, they simply pamper the flesh."

"In will worship."—This is a compound word, ethelothreskeia, possessing characteristics not uncommon in Greek literature, in which such compounds are generally, though not always, used in a bad sense.

In Col. iii. 12 the apostle uses the word translated "humility" in a good sense. Where humility arises out of contemplation of the wonders of grace, the putting on of the new man, as the elect of God, nothing can be more fitting. But if it cringe, instead of having boldness of access: if it impose upon the flesh works of supererogation, multiplying mediators, observances, and ordinances, then, it is vain and deceptive.

This "show of wisdom" expresses itself in a threefold way: (1) Will worship; (2) Humility, and (3) Neglecting the body.

The reader of these words, like the writer, is under no illusion regarding the need where there is to "buffet the body, and keep it in subjection". We have been taught by revelation and by experience that "in our flesh dwelleth no good thing". But this knowledge, instead of leading us to "neglect the body" in the hope of making progress in sanctification, compels us to recognize, on the one hand, that nothing done by the body, done to the body, or not done by the body, can, of itself, make us, in ourselves, more condemned than we already are, nor, on the other hand, can it make us more acceptable. The ground of our acceptance is in Another and that without qualification.

These bodies of ours which have been the instrument of sin, can now, by grace, become the instruments of righteousness. The epistle to the Romans emphasized this fact in chapter vi. and says, in chapter xii., that the presenting of our bodies a living sacrifice is but our "logical service". If that be so, "neglecting the body" can be only evil. If by neglecting it we hope to derive spiritual merit, what are we better than the ritualist? Does not the Hindoo the same? If in these bodies we hope to serve God, what warrant have we to "neglect" them? Is the emaciated, unkempt, unwashed fakir, or mediæval "saint", more acceptable in the sight of God than the redeemed child of God "clothed and in his right mind"?

Should we be ever tempted to "neglect" the body", as in some way making our acceptance more complete, let us never forget that the word so translated comes in that magnificent passage:--

> "He that spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things" (Rom. viii. 32).

and that in that one great "neglect"—the abandonment of the Beloved to the darkness, the shame, the desertion of the cross—all other "neglecting" of ourselves is for ever swallowed up and lost. All such "neglecting" of our bodies insults such overwhelming grace.

The words "not in any honour" have been variously interpreted. It would serve no useful purpose to canvass them, but so far as we can see, the truth they convey seems to be that rather than "neglect the body" the believer should reckon himself, body and spirit, as belonging to the Lord. In I Cor. xii. 23, 24, the apostle uses the word timê, "honour", of the body, and again in I Thess. iv. 4. The apostle knew what it was to go hungry, to be left naked, to suffer the loss of all things, yet never does he make this a ground of acceptance. He knew also what it was to abound; he knew that God had given us "all things richly to enjoy". The apostle thankfully partook of a good meal when it was provided, but was content to go without when it was withheld: his peace and acceptance depended upon neither state. His spirituality did not depend upon whether he had much or little, whether he was ill or well. A false idea, current among some believers, is that a measure of weakness of body and attacks of the enemy are an indication of sanctity, but this is not so. Weakness of body is often traceable to causes that are not flattering, and we could at times, with advantage, seek the cause of such weakness, and not plume ourselves on our spiritual importance. It is just this evil that the apostle combats in Col. ii. "Christ is all" is true here as it is throughout the realm of grace.

"The satisfying of the flesh" contains a word that brings this section into true structural balance with the opening section, as the structure shows. "Satisfying" is plesmone, from the same root as pleroo, "complete", in verse 10, and pleroma of verse 9. The word plesmone occurs in Exod. xvi. 3 and 8, where it speaks of Israel's satisfaction in Egypt: "did eat bread to the full." But what leanness it brought into their soul! "Fullness", or "satisfaction", drawn from any source other than that indicated in Col. ii. 9, 10 is not of God and can only lead to spiritual leanness.

The lesson of Col. ii. is of such importance to every member of the body of Christ, that we feel sure no one will regret the space devoted to the following paraphrase of the passage. This is not intended as a translation, but is given in the hope that by incorporating some of the more important adjustments and meaning already brought forward in this series, readers may the better appreciate the "warning" and the "teaching" of the apostle, whose ambition was to "present every man perfect in Christ Jesus".

> This I say, that Christ Himself is the Mystery of God and therefore you need no visionary intruding into the secret things of God. Full assurance comes from the recognition of the fullness of Christ, and moreover, in Christ are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. If this be true, you can be proof against the enticing words of those who would otherwise beguile you. Beware lest any man carry you off, as plunder, by vain deceitful philosophy, which is according to the traditions of men, and the rudiments of the world, but which is not according to Christ. You hear from these philosophers much about attaining unto the pleroma by means of ascetic practices, but I tell you that in Christ dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily, and this is vitally connected with the purpose of the ages, and the church of the One Body. Out of His fullness we all may draw, and ye are already complete (or filled to the full) in Him, Who, in His capacity as the incorporation of the fullness, is not only Head over all things to the church, but is Head also of all principality and power.

Coming now to the matter in hand, all this ill-treatment of the body is valueless. Something more terrible than anything that we can ever accomplish was required to annul the body of the flesh, the old man—nothing less, indeed, than the cross of Christ and His triumphant resurrection.

In Whom also ye are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands, in putting off the body of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ (the practical and experimental side of which is developed in iii. 5-14). Christ has put off the body of the flesh; you now, in the strength of your new position in Him, put off the old man with his deeds, having been buried with Him in His baptism of suffering and death on the cross, wherein also ye have been raised with Him, through faith in the working of God Who raised Him from the dead. And you being dead to your trespasses and to the uncircumcision of your flesh, He has made alive together with Him, having forgiven you all trespasses: having blotted out the handwriting of ordinances which was against us, and contrary to us, removing it from the midst, nailing it as a cancelled bond to His cross. Here the true circumcision took place, where He, and we in Him, put off the body, and then and there He made a public show of principalities and powers, leading them in triumph by that very cross which, at first, seemed the symbol of all that was weak and futile.

If this is your assured position "in Christ" and "with Christ" surely you will not allow any man to judge you over such things as meat or drink, feasts or sabbaths, for these are but shadows of good things to come; you have the substance already in Christ. Now all this impinges upon the question of your perfecting. No man can rob you of your membership in the body of Christ, but he may distract you that you will fail in the race and so be cheated of the prized of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

Let the peace of God be the umpire in your hearts, and not the fantastic speculations of these visionaries who, in self-willed defiance of truth, pretend to humility and angel worship, intrude into secret things veiled by God from our eyes, and all the time are failing in the one thing that matters, failing to hold the Head. Seeing you are all members of His body, your only means of growth is by vital contact with the Head and with one another, for just as the body is ministered to by joints and ligaments, nerves and arteries, drawing all, finally, from the head that controls every function in the body, so is it with the mystical body of Christ. Introspection is harmful and is destructive of all true progress in grace.

It is not a matter of argument, however; it is not a matter of philosophy, tradition, or the elements of world; it resolves itself into the simple issue, Did you die with Christ from the rudiments of the world? If so, being dead to these things, why are you submitting yourselves to ordinances such as touch not, taste not, handle not, things which, as they are used, pass away? These things are merely the commands and doctrines of men. The whole thing is the form without the power: a show of wisdom, but really self-imposed systems of worship that cannot prove acceptable. The Father must be worshipped in Spirit and in truth by the true circumcision, who have no confidence in the flesh.

All this harsh treatment of the body and enforced humility is vain. It does not render the honour that the body of the redeemed should have, and, by the fact that it attempts that which Christ alone can accomplish, really ministers to the satisfying of the flesh, in spite of all protestation to the contrary.

We now have to consider the positive aspect of the apostle's teaching, which commences with Col. iii. 1, and shall learn that there is a true "mortifying of the flesh", but that it comes in its true and significant order. This we hope to take up in our next article.

#31. The only true ground for sanctification. "Things above . . . . . where Christ sitteth" (iii. 1-4).

pp. 89 - 94

With the opening sentence of Col. iii. the apostle turns from "warning every man" to "teaching every man", that he may "present every man perfect in Christ Jesus" (Col. i. 28). His warning has taken into account philosophy, tradition and the "elements of the world", and has shown them to be vain. All rites and ceremonies give place to union with the risen Christ and must be relegated to the past; they are but shadows of things to come. Neglect of the body and mere asceticism are but a show of wisdom and humility; sanctification is not found in that direction. Sanctification, as Col. ii. reveals, is intimately associated with the fullness of Christ. This we shall see as we proceed. Glancing back to the passage already alluded to (Col. i. 28), we observe that the apostle does something more than "warn" and "teach", he prefaces both with "preaching": "Whom we preach."

True assurance comes from the acknowledgment that Christ fills out the secret purpose of God (Col. ii. 2). Subsequent "walk" is but the everyday apprehension of what Christ is and can be to all His own:--

"As ye have therefore received Christ Jesus for your Lord, in Him walk" (Col. ii. 6).

In place of philosophy, tradition and the "elements of the world", the apostle places Christ. He meets all their empty claims with the words, "And not after Christ" (Col. ii. 8), stressing His "fullness" as over against the vanity or "emptiness" of all besides. Instead of vainly attempting in the strength of the flesh (religious though that flesh may be, and as unsparing to itself as the most extreme asceticism would demand) the apostle speaks of "putting off the body of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ"

(Col. ii. 11). This is a work of grace accomplished without hands, and therefore beyond the power of man to accomplish. Throughout the epistle the apostle not only warns and teaches, but he preaches "Christ". So in the opening verses of chapter iii., the believer is directed to the risen Christ, and to where Christ sitteth. His life is hid there with Christ, and his hopes are all bound up in Him. Steadily and surely the apostle moves on to the climax of verse 11, where we read "Christ is all, and in all".

Turning from the false teaching which if followed would "spoil" and "beguile" the Lord's people, the apostle deals positively with practical sanctification and godliness. We must not forget that while he most strenuously opposes the false teaching of gnosticism, he as strongly emphasized the necessity of a walk that is "worthy" (Eph. iv. 1; Col. i. 10). He will not be behind the most fanatical ascetic in urging the believer to "mortify" his earthly members; he most definitely teaches that consistent practice "puts off" the old man with his deeds, and puts on the new. He not only speaks in general terms and of broad principles, but he descends to details, speaking frankly of immorality and uncleanness, of quarreling and forgiveness, and of domestic and business relationships. The essential difference between the apostle's teaching and that which he so strongly condemns concerns the ground upon which it rests, the seed from which the fruit springs. Instead of beginning with the exhortation to "mortify", the apostle points away to the risen Christ, saying: "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek . . . . . set . . . . . mortify." He speaks of "things above" before he speaks of "things on the earth" (Col. iii. 1, 2 and 5). He exhorts the believer to apprehend that which by grace is already his position in Christ and from that starting point to advance experimentally. Col. iii. 1 - iv. 6 is the apostle's exhortation in contrast with the system he has exposed and condemned in Col. ii. 4-23. The sub-division of this section is as follows:--

1) The only true ground for all growth in grace is Christ risen and the believer risen with Him (Col. iii. 1-4).
2) The exhortations themselves (Col. iii. 5 - iv. 6).

The exhortations may be divided as follows:--

(a) The putting off of the old man and the putting on of the new—the doctrinal fact (Col. iii. 5-11).
(b) The putting on and the putting off—the practical outcome (Col. iii. 12-17).
(c) The outcome of the above as expressed in social duties. Wives, husbands, etc. (Col. iii. 18 - iv. 1).
(d) The outcome of the above as expressed in prayerful concern for the spread of the truth. "As i ought to speak" (Col. iv. 2-4).
(e) The outcome of the above, as expressed in walk and witness, "How ye ought to answer" (Col. iv. 5, 6).

Let us now give earnest heed to the teaching upon which the whole of the apostle's exhortation rests—Col. iii. 1-4.

The first thing we observe is that it is resurrection that is placed first. Death with Christ is necessarily assumed, but the power for newness of life is found in union with the risen Lord. We are taught in Rom. vi. not only to reckon ourselves dead to sin, but also to reckon ourselves alive unto God. Our subsequent experimental death to sin is as much by reason of the new life we have in Christ as by reason of the fact that we are reckoned to have died with Him. Col. ii. 20 says, "If ye died with Christ". Col. iii. 1 says, "If ye were raised with Christ". And both look back to Col. ii. 12, where burial and resurrection are stated as accomplished facts.

The apostle not only directs our attention to the blessed fact of our union with the risen Christ, but adds:--

> "Seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God" (Col. iii. 1).

He takes us beyond resurrection to ascension, and not to ascension only, but to the seated Christ at God's right hand. What is the apostle's reason for introducing this reference to the seated Christ?

It is the glory of the dispensation of the mystery that every member of the body is not only reckoned to have been crucified with Christ, to have died with Him, to have been buried, quickened and raised with Him, but also to have been "seated together in heavenly places". The apostle would teach us that our strength to live down here is found in our glorious position up there. This he sums up in the two words "seek" and "set". Christ is Head over all things to the Church which is His body, in the capacity of the risen, ascended and seated One. If we would more fully appreciate what is involved and implied in the reference to Christ "seated at the right hand of God", we must turn aside for a while to study that epistle which, while it teaches nothing as to the mystery, is the epistle of the seated Christ. The epistle to the Hebrews, while it knows nothing of a redeemed company "seated together in heavenly places" (for that is the mystery itself), is a glorious exposition of the fact that Christ is the seated One at the right hand of God, and all its doctrine and practice flow from that one source.

Turning to this epistle, we do not read more than three verses before coming upon this principal theme:--

> "When He had by Himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high" (Heb. i. 3).

The burial, the resurrection and the ascension are passed over in silence here, so that the climax shall be reached in one step.

In Heb. iv. 14 this great High Priest is said to have passed "through" the heavens (dierchomai), and in Heb. vii. 26 He is said to have been made "higher than the heavens"; with which should be compared the passage in Eph. iv. 10, where it is written that Christ "ascended up far above all heavens" (huperano).

Summing up what he has said in Heb. i.-vii., the apostle writes in Heb. viii.:--

> "Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum. We have such an High Priest, Who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens; a minister of the sanctuary and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man" (Heb. viii. 1, 2).

This seated Priest in risen life and power was the assurance to all believers not only of their salvation, but of their perfecting. This is the goal of the apostle's ministry in Col. i. 28: "that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus", a fact that we must never lose sight of when estimating the purport of the epistle to the Colossians. Whilst, therefore, we do not use priestly terms when speaking of the mystery, we can say that all that Christ is to His people as great High Priest, He is to His church as Head over all things to them. In contrast with the many priests who could not continue by reason of death, we read:--

> "But this Man, because He continueth ever, hath an intransmissible priesthood. Wherefore He is able to save unto all perfection (panteles) them that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them" (Heb. vii. 24, 25).

This is much the same teaching (though with its own dispensational characteristics) as is found in Col. iii. 1-4. The fact that the word "uttermost" includes the root of the word "perfect" is of great importance in the interpretation of Heb. vii. 24, 25. Salvation in the initial sense is not in view.

In perfect structural correspondence with Heb. vii. 24, 25 comes Heb. x. 11, 12. Here the many priests are contrasted with Christ, not this time because they died and He ever lives, but because their offerings were shadows and His the substance. Again we are exhorted to consider "this Man":--

> "And every priest standeth daily ministering and offering oftentimes the same sacrifices, which can never take away sins. But this Man, after He had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down on the right hand of God" (Heb. x. 11, 12).

The conclusion of the argument is given in verse 14:--

> "For by one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified."

"Perfect into perpetuity", as the intensely strong words might be translated. How foolish, and how wrong, to attempt to improve upon such a position by neglecting the body, by abstaining from meats, by anything that merely seeks to improve the flesh.

One other passage in Hebrews that bears upon Col. iii. is Heb. xii. 1, 2:--

> "Wherefore seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus the Author and Perfecter of faith; Who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God."

We must remember that the attack upon the Colossians was not upon their "life", for that was hid with Christ in God; but upon their "perfecting". The word "spoil" (Col. ii. 8) we found to mean "to strip a vanquished foe of his armour", and the phrase "beguile you of your reward" (Col. ii. 18) contains the word that is translated "prize" in Phil. iii. As in the days of Job, so now, Satan has no power over our "life"; he can only interfere with "those things that accompany salvation". He may cheat the believer of his crown. Consequently Heb. xii. 1, 2 is to the point. He endured, He overcame, He sat down, in connection with the "joy set before Him". You too, because He lives and because He is seated, you too may overcome in connection with the "race set before you".

The epistle to the Hebrews not only throws light upon the teaching of Col. iii. 1: it illuminates Col. iii. 2 also. The believer is exhorted not only to "seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God", but also to "set the mind on things above, not on things on the earth". A very full illustration of the practical power of this is found in Heb. xi.:--

> "By faith he sojourned (paroikeo, dwell as a stranger, I Pet. ii. 11) in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tents with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise. FOR HE LOOKED FOR A CITY which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God . . . . . These all died in faith, not having received the promises . . . . . and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. For they that say such things declare plainly that they SEEK A COUNTRY . . . . . they DESIRE A BETTER COUNTRY, that is an HEAVENLY; wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God: for He hath prepared for them a CITY" (Heb. xi. 9-16).

We commend the parallel teaching of Hebrews to the student of Col. iii. 1, 2; for therein we find inspired comment upon what it means to "seek those things which are above, not on things on the earth".

As a supplemental commentary, the reader might turn to Phil. iii., where the prize, perfecting, minding earthly things, and a citizenship in heaven carry the same teaching forward.

The rest of this ground of apostolic exhortation (Col. iii. 1-4) we must leave for the next article. Meanwhile let us keep steadily before the mind the words "risen", "right hand", "set" and "seek", and with the strength that such doctrines supply, grows up into Christ in all things, which is the only true and lasting sanctification.

#32. Life hidden and manifested (iii. 3, 4).
pp. 144 - 148

In our last article we considered the exhortation of Col. iii. 1, 2. We must now go on to consider further features of great importance, which are presented in the next two verses.

Verses 1 and 2 open with the word "if, the "if" of argument. Verses 3 and 4 open with the word "for". It is obvious that any of whom it can be said, "Ye are risen" must have previously died. The new life presupposes a death to the old life. This death has been before us in Col. ii. "Circumcision", which puts off the body of the flesh, implies death and resurrection. "Burial", too, is the sequel of death, and is immediately followed by the operation of God Who raised Christ and His believing people from the dead. Death with Christ from the rudiments of the world not only means exemption from their dominion, but a new life in a new sphere. The apostle does not elaborate the thought of the death of the believer with Christ in Col. iii. 3. He states it, in order that he may proceed immediately to life—life that is at the moment "hid", but soon to be manifested:--

> "For ye died and your life hath been hid with Christ in God" (Col. iii. 3).

The A.V. translation, "For ye are dead" seems to suggest, to a modern ear, that such are still dead. But the word apethanete refers to what has already taken place: "Ye died"—which leaves room for the newness of life which is the sphere of all spiritual growth and activity.

In our study of Col. iii. 1, 2 we found the Epistle to the Hebrews a useful commentary. In our present study we shall find similar help in Rom. vi. and vii., which provides a commentary upon the words "For ye died". We will not take it for granted that every reader is familiar with these fundamental chapters, and we therefore draw attention to their emphatic statements concerning the doctrine of death with Christ to sin, its sphere and dominion:--

> "How shall we, that died to sin (apethanomen), live any longer therein?" (Rom. vi. 2).
> "For he that dieth (apothanon) is freed (Gk. justified) from sin" (Rom. vi. 7).
> "If we died with Christ (apethanomen), we believe that we shall also live with Him . . . . . for in that He died, He died unto sin once, but in that He liveth, He liveth unto God" (Rom. vi. 8-10).

But there is something further and deeper yet to be seen in these statements. Look at Rom. vi. 10 once more, and observe that the words "He died to sin" are a translation of the dative case. It is utterly impossible that these words could be rendered "He died in sin". Yet, when we come to the A.V. of Eph. ii. 1 and Col. ii. 13, the same dative case is so rendered as applied to the Lord's believing people: "And you hath He quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins."

The words "who were" here are incorrect; ontas is the present participle of the verb "to be", and must be translated "being" (compare the singular word ontas in Eph. ii. 20: "Jesus Christ Himself being the chief corner-stone"). It is the present condition of the members of the church that is in view in Eph. ii. 1, not their past condition. And this at once raises an obvious difficulty. How can we say that the present condition of any member of the church is that he is "dead in sins"? The answer is that the Scripture, rightly translated, does not teach this. The words translated "in trespasses and sins" are in the dative case, exactly as we find it in Rom. vi. 10. The preposition en is not used in either passage. Parallel with Rom. vi. 10 and Eph. ii. 1 is I Pet. ii. 24, where the fact of having died to sins is at once followed by living to righteousness. Eph. ii. 1 therefore declares that the members of the body of Christ are dead to sins, but alive to God. And in verse 5, where the theme is renewed, it is immediately followed by the words: "He hat quickened (made alive) together with Christ."

Colossians traverses the same ground as Ephesians. In Col. ii. the believer is seen complete in Him, that completeness involving true circumcision and true baptism. In other words: "And you, being dead to your trespasses and to the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath He made alive together with Him" (Col. ii. 13). All this wonderful truth is in mind when the apostle says in Col. iii. 3, "For ye died". Some readers may remember that we covered much the same ground when dealing with Col. ii. 13. We believe the teaching to be so important that no apology is necessary for a re-statement. Besides which, new readers must be thought of in these matters of faith. We must now follow the teaching of the apostle further.

"Your life hath been hid with Christ in God."—There seem to be at least two reasons for the use of the expression "hid" in this verse:--

(1) There is the association of the life which the believer has in Christ, with the mystery which also had been hid in God, from the ages and from the generations. That mystery had its own particular time of manifestation (Col. i. 26), closely linked with "the hope of glory" (Col. i. 26, 27). Before the mystery was revealed to and through Paul, no one had any knowledge of its existence. So too, says the apostle, others looking at you have no knowledge of that equally hidden life which is nevertheless yours. The very fact that Christ was now preached among the Gentiles was their "hope of glory"; and this preaching coincided with the mystery being "made manifest to His saints" (Col. i. 26, 27). In like manner, the manifestation (the word "appear") of Christ would synchronize with the manifestation of the saints with Him in glory.

(2) The fact that his life was hid with Christ in God would be a blessed assurance to the believer when contemplating the attempts of the enemy to spoil and beguile of his reward. He would remember Col. ii. 3, 4: "In Whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. And this I say, lest any man should beguile you with enticing words."

The power of "that blessed hope" is next made evident:--

> "When Christ, Who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with Him in glory" (Col. iii. 4).

While the hope of all the redeemed is Christ, and His glorious coming, we must remember that this coming has several aspects. The redeemed will find their inheritance in at least three spheres—the earth, the "heavenly city" and in "heavenly places". So that we are not surprised to discover that the Second Coming of Christ has three aspects, corresponding with these three spheres.

First Sphere.

"His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives" (Zech. xiv. 4).

"This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall also come in like manner . . . . . Then returned they . . . . . from Olivet" (Acts i. 11, 12).

"Immediately after the tribulation of those days . . . . . shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven" (Matt. xxiv. 29, 30).

These passages have reference to the earth and the restoration of the kingdom to Israel. They have no immediate reference to the Church.

Second Sphere.

"So that ye come behind in no gift, waiting for the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Cor. i. 7).

"Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all" (Gal. iv. 26).

"For yet a little while, and He that shall come will come, and will not tarry" (Heb. x. 37).

"The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout" (I Thess. iv. 16).

"Now we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto Him . . . . . that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition" (II Thess. ii. 1-3).

These passages refer to the second sphere of blessing. They do not refer to the earth and Israel's kingdom, and most certainly not to the Body and the "heavenly places". There are too many associations with prophecy for this aspect of the Coming to be the hope of the Mystery, apart from the fact that the epistles quoted above (Corinthians, Thessalonians, Galatians and Hebrews) were all written before the dispensation of the Mystery was committed to Paul, the prisoner.

Third Sphere.

To be manifested in glory is the hope of the Church of the One Body. Its members are already seated there in the Divine purpose, and their hope when realized will place them there in fact. The epistle to Titus, written between the two imprisonments of Paul, speaks of this phase of the hope:--

"Looking for that blessed hope, and the manifesting of the glory of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ" (Titus ii. 13).

For the time being, He is hidden. His glory is not manifest; and so, as the apostle says in another context, "We walk by faith, not by sight" (II Cor. v. 7).

Summing up the apostle's argument in these opening verses of Col. iii., we may say: "Risen with Christ"--"Hidden with Christ"--"Manifested with Christ". A threefold cord, not easily broken, a pledge of life, security and future glory. While these things that are above occupy the mind, there will be little upon which the "old man" can seize, and true scriptural sanctification will be manifest.

Not until this groundwork has been laid does the apostle go on to speak of "mortifying" and "putting off". We, too, must abide by the Divine order and draw our strength from risen life rather than from death.

#33. Christ is all, and in all (iii. 5-11).
pp. 187 - 192

The first practical outworking of the position set forth in Col. iii. 1-4 is expressed in the solemn word "mortify". We can see at once that this springs from the statement: "For ye died", and is the putting into practical effect of the death in which the believer died with Christ. Two words are possible here, each of which can be translated "mortify"—thanatoo and nekroo. In this passage the apostle chooses the latter. In Rom. viii. 13 he chose the former. Thanatoo means "to put to death", "to kill". In Rom. viii. it is the "deeds" of the body that are to be thus treated. In Col. iii. 5 it is the "members which are upon the earth" that are to be mortified. The word nekroo differs from thanatoo in that it stresses the fact that the thing thus treated is "corpse-like". It is used twice of Abraham who, though as good as dead so far as parenthood was concerned, nevertheless became the father of many nations (Rom. iv. 19; Heb. xi. 12).

The fact of dying with Christ must necessarily leave a dead body or corpse. This must now be accepted as true and the new life regulated accordingly. Already much the same thing has been said with regard to the world:--

> "If ye died with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why, as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances?" (Col. ii. 20).

So we might paraphrase Col. iii.:--

> "If ye died with Christ to trespasses and sins, and have been quickened with Him, your life being hid with Christ in God, why, as though still living to sins, do you allow your members to rule and sway your manner of life?"

We found that Rom. vi. shed light upon the earlier verses of this chapter; and we shall find that Rom. vii. is a help to the understanding of the passage now before us.

It appears that "the members" are so intimately associated with the sinful acts which they implement, that the apostle in Col. iii. 5 uses the figure Catachresis ( - See articles of Figures of Speech in the series entitled "With all thy getting, get understanding"). He does not follow up his statement by specifying the separate members, as hands, feet, eyes, but by the evil things which these members do: "I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind" (Rom. vii. 23).

It is a humbling thought, that in epistles of such high spiritual standing as Ephesians and Colossians, the apostle does not refrain from warning against sins of the deepest dye. We generally feel a slight hesitation in public reading when we come to such a list of uncleanness as is set out in Gal. v. 19, Eph. v. 3-5, or Col. iii. 5; yet He Who knows the heart of man and the power of the flesh in us all has made no mistake. We must "deaden" or "treat as a corpse" all that belongs to the "flesh" or the "old man". Otherwise our state will by no means correspond with our standing. Seeing that our life is hid with Christ in God, our mind should be set on things above, to the mortifying of the members on the earth.

It may be useful, in spite of a natural reticence, to give a few words of guidance as to what is intended by the Holy Spirit in these forbidden acts of the old man.

Fornication.—The word so translated comes from pernao, "to sell", and so focuses the mind on the prostitution of one of the highest of God's gifts to man.

"Uncleanness."—This word needs no explanation, yet no one can realize the horror resident in it who has not read through the loathsome details of the Levitical law of uncleanness, and the eighteen references to unclean spirits found in the Gospels.

"Inordinate affection."—This is the translation of pathos, a word which, when used in a good sense outside the Scriptures, means "to suffer", but whenever it is used in the N.T. it indicates an overbearing passion. There are but two other occurrences of the word, viz., Rom. i. 26 and I Thess. iv. 5, supplying contexts that settle the apostle's meaning here.

"Evil concupiscence."—This word is seldom used outside theology, and to the average person does not convey a very clear-cut idea. It is derived from the Latin cupere, "to long for", and indicates intense desire. Now desire is the mainspring of action, and where desire is dead activity ceases. The desire here reproved, however, is evil, and is a fruitful source of trouble. The Greek word is epithumia. That the word does not in itself mean anything evil, may be seen from such a passage as Matt. xiii. 17: "Righteous men have desired to see (See also Luke xxii. 15; I Tim. iii. 1; Phil. i. 23). On the other hand such passages as Matt. v. 28 and Rom. vii. 7 show how easily desire can become sinful. It is this that is in view in Col. iii.

"Covetousness."—This is the translation of pleonexia, a word which literally means, "to have a fullness". Here we are at the extreme antipodes of the truth of Col. ii. 9, 10, for there the believer "has a fullness" in Christ Himself. To "have a fullness" outside of Christ is nothing less than spiritual idolatry, which is the word the apostle uses both here in Col. iii. and in Eph. v. 5.

At the close of this list of evil things the apostle adds as a deterrent:--

> "For which things' sake the wrath of God cometh on the sons of disobedience. In the which ye also walked in times past, when ye lived in them" (Col. iii. 6, 7).

We have, in the previous article, drawn attention to the connection between Eph. ii. 1 and Col. iii. 1-4 with reference to the glorious doctrine of death to sin and sins. There is also a close connection between the verses that follow Col. iii. 1-4 and the verses that follow Eph. ii. 1:--

> "Wherein in times past ye walked according to the age of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the sons of disobedience. Among whom also we all had our conversation in times past in the lusts of our flesh, doing the wishes of the flesh and of the mind; and were children of wrath, even as others" (Eph. ii. 2, 3).

The words of Col. iii. 7: "Ye walked in them, when ye lived in them" may be contrasted with Col. ii. 6: "As ye have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in Him."

The apostle seeks to deter the believer in Col. iii. by speaking of the wrath of God. In Eph. v. he uses a double argument to the same end—first a warning concerning the inheritance, and then a warning concerning the wrath of God. The first of these is in verse 5:--

> "For this ye know, that no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God" (Eph. v. 5).

This is a statement similar to that of Gal. v. 19-21, where a similar list of the works of the flesh concludes with the words:-- > "Of the which I tell you before, as I have also told you in the time past, that they which do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God" (Gal. v. 21).

The fact that these works of the flesh merit the wrath of God, and that, if persisted in, they will result in forfeiture of the inheritance of the kingdom of Christ and of God, should be sufficient warning to any who may have been tempted to think of liberty as though it meant license.

Before concluding our examination of this section, we must correct a possible misunderstanding. It is true that we are to mortify our members which are on the earth and consider them as good as dead. But this by itself may be misunderstood. The members of the body that we possessed in the days when we were without Christ, are the same members that we possess to-day. And they can and should be used in the service of the Lord. Scripture is very clear on this point:--

> "Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that you should obey it in the lusts thereof. Neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin: but yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God" (Rom. vi. 12, 13).

"I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service" (Rom. xii. 1).

The same truth is expressed in a very practical way in Ephesians:--

"Let him that stole steal no more: but rather let him labour, working with his hands the thing that is good, that he may have to give to him that needeth" (Eph. iv. 28).

While, therefore, death is stressed in Col. iii. 5, life is ever in mind. Putting off must be followed by putting on. Sanctification does not consist in dying, but in living; not in putting off, but in putting on; not in burial, but in rising to walk in newness of life.

The section we are considering extends to verse 11. The last four verses amplify the thought of the mortifying of the members with their deeds:--

"But now ye also put off all these; anger, wrath, malice, blasphemy, filthy communications out of your mouth. Lie not one to another, seeing that ye have put off the old man with his deeds; and have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him; where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free: but Christ is all, and in all" (Col. iii. 8-11).

Just as we have seen that death to sin is followed by life to righteousness, so putting off must be followed by putting on before the statement of truth is complete. The mere putting off by itself may rise no higher than the commandments of men with their "Touch not, taste not, handle not".

No human comment on this passage can be a substitute for the parallel found in Eph. iv., which we now quote, so that it may be read together with Col. iii. 8-11:--

"But ye have not so learned Christ; if so be that ye have heard Him, and have been taught by Him, as the truth is in Jesus: That ye put off concerning the former conversation the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts; and be renewed in the spirit of your mind: and that ye put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness" (Eph. iv. 20-24).

The "old man" was dealt with at the cross (Rom. vi. 6). The body of sin (the "members which are on the earth" of Col. iii. 5) has been rendered inoperative. And the object is that henceforth we should not serve sin, but that, in virtue of newness of life, we should be free to serve God. We can only repudiate the old man with his deeds, because of the finished work of Christ. Without that cross and that finished work, our efforts to repudiate the old man would only end in the cry of the "wretched man" of Rom. vii. 24.

A new creation is involved in this putting off and putting on. This is clearly seen in the use of such expressions as "being renewed" and "after the image of Him that created him". This reference back to Gen. i. 26 is important. The first man was created a living soul, but we are told in I Cor. xv. 46 that the first man, quite apart from the fall, was not spiritual. We have all borne the image of the earthly. The message of Col. iii. and Eph. iv. is that we may now bear the image of the heavenly. The renewal in knowledge of Col. iii. is explained as the renewal of the "spirit of your mind" in Eph. iv. The reference in Col. iii. to being created in the image of the Creator is explained in Eph. iv. as being "after God created in righteousness and holiness of truth" (Eph. iv. 24). In perfect line with these passages we find in Rom. xii. 1, 2 that the presenting of the body, now delivered from bondage, is intimately associated with "the renewing of your mind", without which the mere outward act is shorn of power and acceptance.

Finally, in this new creation all fleshly distinctions vanish. In reading Col. iii. 11 it is the word "where" that should be stressed, not the word "neither": "Where there is neither Greek nor Jew." Strictly speaking, the passage reads: "Where there is not Greek and Jew." Further, the words "But Christ is all, and in all" are for emphasis put in reverse order in the original: "But the all and in all Christ."

This utter repudiation of self, with all its distinctions, and all its failures, this discovery that Christ alone supplies and satisfies, is the "be-all and end-all" of true scriptural sanctification.

In conclusion, we suggest that the reader should consider the article in Volume XVIII, page 138, where consecration is seen to be the filling of the hands with the fullness of Christ, and then the receiving back by the Lord in loving service of that same fullness. This is but the teaching in type of what is here taught in doctrine, that "Christ is all".

#34. Filled to the full (iii. 12 - iv. 18).

pp. 235 - 241

Before proceeding to the section that is before us we would notice one item that belongs to the passage considered in our last paper. We there learned that everything was finished so far as the old man was concerned, and that now, for the believer, Christ is all.

It is interesting to notice that in the Greek of Col. iii. 8: “But now ye also put off all these, anger, wrath, etc.”, the expression used is ta panta, not all things universally but the all things that belong to the old creation. We are therefore glad to discover that in verse 11 this same expression recurs, Ta panta kai en pasin Christos, “Christ is all”. It is thus that provision is made in the new creation for every item that had been repudiated in the old.

The section before us, namely, Col. iii. 12-17, is the practical expression of the position already laid down in verses 5-11. It is of the utmost importance to observe that in this practical outworking it is the positive that is stressed: “put on”, “even as Christ forgave, so also do ye", "above all put on charity", "be ye thankful", "do all in the name of the Lord Jesus".

What a title is given to the church in this section: "The elect of God, holy and beloved", a reminder of Eph. i. 3-6 where the words "choice", "without blemish", "in love", and "in the beloved", revealed the high calling of the Church of the Mystery. When the apostle besought the saints at Ephesus to walk worthy of the calling wherewith they had been called, his first thought was, "with all lowliness and meekness, with longsuffering, forbearing one another in love", and he spoke in the context of the "bond of peace". So in Col. iii. 12, 13 his first thought in practical outworking was > "bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, longsuffering, forbearing one another and forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrel against any; even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye."

The context, moreover, speaks of the "bond of perfectness". To a mind trained in the study of Hebrew, the transition from "peace" to "perfection" is a natural one. Shalom, the Hebrew word for "peace", is also translated in the O.T. by "finished", "restore", "pay", "recompense", "make good", and "perfect".

That which binds together, the unity of the spirit, and the new man, is that which denotes a perfect settlement of all dues. This is peace indeed; all else is but a patching up until the occurrence of a further, inevitable outbreak of hostilities. The creation of the "one new man, so making peace", of Eph. ii. 15 is the doctrinal and dispensational basis of all the practical sanctification of Eph. iv. and Col. iii. It is a new man in two senses. It is a new man doctrinally, inasmuch as the old man has been crucified with Christ (Rom. vi. 6), and it is a new man dispensationally, inasmuch as Jew and Greek are gone, and in their place a new man has been created "of the twain".

Consequently in Col. iii. we have references to both aspects of the truth. The mortifying of the members is the putting off of the old man with his deeds. This is the doctrinal aspect. The new man, in which there is neither Greek nor Jew, is the dispensational aspect. This is borne out in verse 15: "And let the peace of God rule in your hearts, to the which also ye are called in one body", a passage to be compared with Eph. iv. 25: "Wherefore putting away lying, speak every man truth with his neighbour: for we are members one of another."

It is helpful to realize that the word translated "rule" is a link with Col. ii. 18. In ii. 18, 19 we read: "Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility . . . . . and not holding the head." Here the words "beguile of your reward" are the translation of the Greek katabrabeuo. The word "rule" is the translation of the Greek brabeuo, to act as umpire at the Greek games, while "prize" in Phil. iii. 14 is brabeion.

What was Paul's purpose in writing Colossians? He preached Christ the hope of glory, and warned every man and taught every man that he might present every man perfect in Christ Jesus (Col. i. 28). The object of the whole of the warning and teaching of Col. ii. was to save the believer from being sidetracked and spoiled of his armour

(Col. ii. 8), or cheated of his prize (Col. ii. 18). In Col. iii. he again preaches Christ, the hope of glory (Col. iii. 1-4), he still warns (Col. iii. 6), he still teaches (Col. iii. 5-17). His great objective and positive word was "The fullness of Christ". With this he met all the specious claims of philosophy and tradition, and with this he concluded his doctrinal presentation of the truth of the new man, saying: "Christ is all" (Col. iii. 11). In verse 16, the apostle brings together two passages in Ephesians and helps us to understand their import:--

> "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom; teaching and admonishing one another in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord" (Col. iii. 16).

The corresponding passage in Ephesians reads:--

> "Be filled with the Spirit; speaking to yourselves in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in your hearts to the Lord" (Eph. v. 18, 19).

We have already drawn attention, when dealing with Ephesians, to the fact that the grammar of this passage necessitates the idea that it is the Spirit that is the Filler. We now see, by the parallel passage, that He, the Spirit, fills the heart of the believer with the word of Christ. This, however, is not all. While Col. iii. says, "Let the word of Christ dwell in you", Eph. iii. prays that "Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith", and we are enabled to see that He, Christ, will dwell in our hearts by faith, as He, the Spirit, fills us with His word.

We must not forget, moreover, that the goal before the apostle in the prayer of Eph. iii. is "that ye might be filled up to all the fullness of God", which is but another way of saying what the apostle has been teaching in Col. ii. and iii. As we have seen in our opening paragraph, the fullness of Christ for His people more than takes the place of "the all things" that are put aside. Whatsoever we do, therefore, "in word or deed" we should do "in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God the Father by Him" (Col. iii. 17). This simple exhortation is so far reaching that compliance with it would solve every problem of conscience, settle all questions of right and wrong, and infallibly indicate the walk that is worthy. If "whatsoever" we did, whether by word of deed, was done in the name of the Lord, all question of sanctification would be over; it would be an accomplished fact. If, however, we each one have to confess that conformity to Col. iii. 17 is not wholly true of either our words or deeds, we may, nevertheless, be thankful that at least we know the pathway.

In the next nine verses the apostle applies the truth already enunciated to the "daily round and common task", where are no heroics to enable the soul to surmount difficulty, but where the grace of God will more definitely be seen than in any other sphere of service. In writing to the Ephesians the apostle expatiates at greater length than here on the subject of the relationships of wives and husbands, children and parents, servants and masters. In Ephesians it is to the relationship of husband and wife that the greatest space is devoted, and Eph. v. 21-33 should be read in this connection in conjunction with the epistle to the Colossians. In Colossians the greatest space is reserved for admonition to the servant, and as this evidently in accord with the apostle's motive, let us quote the passage:--

> "Servants, obey in all things your masters according to the flesh; not with eyeservice, as menpleasers; but in singleness of heart, fearing God: and whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord, and not unto men; knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance; for ye serve the Lord Christ. But he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons" (Col. iii. 22-25).

"The reward of the inheritance."—In this phrase is the key to the apostle's object in writing the epistle. The Colossian believers, being members of the body of Christ, were already "seated together in heavenly places in Christ"; already "accepted in the Beloved"; already sure of their presentation "holy and unblameable and unreproveable" in the sight of God. Already the apostle had said: "Giving thanks unto the Father, which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light" (Col. i. 12). Words not make clearer the assured position of the believer nor the completeness of his acceptance. Nevertheless, before the chapter is finished we have found Paul "warning" and "teaching", that he may "present every man perfect in Christ Jesus", and also at the close of the epistle we find Epaphras praying for the selfsame thing (Col. iv. 12). The reader should here refer to the chart in Volume XXIV, page 121. As it is evident that neither Paul nor Epaphras have any doubt that what has already been written of the saints, as to standing, in Col. i. 12, 13 and 22 remains unalterably true, it becomes necessary to distinguish between the common "inheritance of the saints in light", for which all believers have been made meet, and "the reward" attaching to that inheritance, which was associated to the high calling" which, as in Phil. iii., is associated with "perfecting" (Col. i. 28; iv. 12).

We must distinguish between that "holy, and unblameable, and unreproveable" position which is ours "in the body of His flesh through death", and the possibility of being blamed and reproved for the things done in service. If we "try the things that differ", we shall see that "hope" is on a basis of pure, unalloyed, grace, which excludes all possibility of either gain or loss, running or serving; and that the "prize" is on a basis of reward, given only to those who strive lawfully. Knowing these distinctions we shall be saved a multitude of vexations, and moreover not be found false witnesses of God, for without doubt, He teaches us that membership of the one body and participation in its one hope is entirely outside the range of attainment on our part. And with equal certainty He assures us that the prize of the high calling, the reward of the inheritance, and the crown of righteousness, fall within the category of attainment. True, nothing but grace will avail, but it is grace used. The reason for the apostle's assurance that our life is hid with Christ in God, is that we might know that life is not in question. He does not say in Col. ii. 18, Let no man beguile you of your life, or membership, or position: These are never in question. But he does echo the words of another dispensation and say: "Take heed, that no man take your crown."

The concluding exhortation of the apostle is twofold. First he asks for prayer for himself, that he may speak and make manifest the mystery "as I ought to speak", and secondly, he enjoins a walk in wisdom, redeeming the time, speaking with grace, so that the words spoken shall not be contradicted by the life lived, and that they may know how to answer every man "as they ought" (Col. iv. 2-6). This exhortation covers much the same ground as Eph. vi., with which it should be read.

The remaining verses of the epistle speak for themselves, yet the subject of the friends and fellow-servants of the devoted apostle merits a separate study itself. Look at the material: Tychicus, a beloved brother, a faithful minister and a fellow-servant in the Lord. Onesimus, a faithful and beloved brother, and Aristarchus his fellow-prisoner. Marcus, sister's son to Barnabas, who is to be received. Jesus, which is called Justus. Only these two latter were of the circumcision: they were Paul's fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God, and had been a comfort to him. When he speaks here of "the kingdom of God" the apostle does not intend anything different from the mystery. These two fellow-workers of the circumcision were engaged with Paul in the work of the one ministry left to him. It should be noted that the term "the kingdom of God" was used after Israel were set aside (Acts xxviii. 31), as it was before (Acts xxviii. 23). The designation "The kingdom of Christ and of God" occurs in Eph. v. 5, and the statement that the saints have been translated into the "kingdom of the Son of His love" is made in Col. i. 13. His appearing and "His kingdom" are in view in II Tim. iv. 1, as also "His heavenly kingdom" in II Tim. iv. 18. "His kingdom ruleth over all", and every calling and every sphere of blessing, whether of Israel, Body, or Bride, must come within the all-embracive sovereignty of God.

Continuing, the apostle next mentions Epaphras, a Colossian believer, a servant of Christ; one whose prayers coincide with Paul's ministry to the saints (Col. iv. 12 and i. 28), and whose zeal is commended by the apostle. Finally, "Luke, the beloved physician, and Demas". What a picture of faithful friendship is presented by the manner of Paul's reference to the former of these two: "Luke the beloved physician", he who was faithful to the end, for the apostle wrote in view martyrdom, "only Luke is with me" (II Tim. iv. 11).

But what of Demas? He is included among those who join with the apostle in sending greetings, but his name stand alone: "and Demas." There is no word of commendation, no reference to a faithful ministry, or to his attachment to the apostle, or love to the Lord. We are certain that the apostle would not thus have isolated Demas had he found it possible to say anything in his favour, and this is confirmed by the mention made of him in II Tim. iv. (where Luke's fidelity stands out so brightly), and where we realize that the apostle's fears are verified: "Demas hath forsaken me." When writing to the Colossians the apostle could find nothing good to say of him, but he refrained from saying anything evil.

Proceeding, the apostle salutes Nymphas, whose house entertained the church in his day. What an honour! The reading of this epistle and that from the Laodicean Church is then enjoined; Archippus is encouraged to "fill full" his ministry, in which connection may be noted the last of five occurrences in Colossians. These five occurrences so carry forward the teaching of the epistle that we will set them out here.

Pleroo in Colossians.

A | i. 9, 10. Prayer. Knowledge of His will. That ye might walk worthy.
B | i. 25. Ministry. Paul's ministry "filled up" the Word of God.
C | ii. 10. Position. The believer "filled full" in Christ.
A | iv. 12. Prayer. The will of God. That ye may stand perfect.
B | iv. 17. Ministry. Archippus enjoined to "fill up" his ministry, evidently by making known the mystery.

With this we conclude our survey of the epistle, only too conscious of depths unplumbed and heights unscaled. Of this we are sure, that not until the day when the Lord bids us cease, shall we for long be able to refrain from turning to these great stores of truth seeking fresh light and teaching, both for ourselves and for all the members of this glorious fellowship. "Remember my bonds" said Paul in closing. We do, and while we exalt his Lord, as the apostle would have us do, we are certain that the Lord's smile will be upon any who, realizing, as he may, all the evident earthliness of the vessel, spares a moment to thank God and take courage as he remembers the life and witness of the Lord's prisoner.

Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth. (Second Series).

JOSHUA.
#2. Good success and the Book of the Law.
pp. 14 - 18

Before pursuing the typical teaching of the book of Joshua further, we must endeavour to get some idea of its teaching as a whole. The great subject is the possession of the land of promise, and everything bears upon this one theme.

The death of Moses leaves the way clear for Joshua, and he is commanded to lead the children of Israel across the Jordan and on to victory. The history of this advance is a chequered one. Defeat and failure are chronicled, as well as victory and success. The presence of failure, and the fact that the children of Israel did not entirely drive out the inhabitants of the land, preclude the idea that the crossing of the Jordan can symbolize actual death and resurrection, or the entry into Canaan the entry into heaven itself. We shall discover in the history of this people a full-length portrait of ourselves—our failures and their causes, our victories and their causes—and if we are simple and truly wise, we shall, as a result of the study of these historical events that have been recorded for our learning, be the better prepared for the pursuit of the prize of the high calling.

The Book of Joshua as a whole.

The purpose of the record:--

> "And the Lord gave unto Israel all the LAND which he sware to give unto their fathers; and they possessed it, and dwelt therein. And the Lord gave them REST round about, according to all that He sware unto their fathers: and there stood not a man of all their enemies before them; the Lord delivered all their enemies into their hand. There failed not ought of any good thing which the Lord had spoken unto the house of Israel; all came to pass" (Josh. xxi. 43-45).

The Structure of the Record.

A | i. 1. THE DEATH OF MOSES.

B | i. 2 - vii. ENTRY INTO THE LAND.

The land.--To be divided (i. 2-18). | Be strong and very courageous.
Observe law of Moses.
Turn neither to right nor left.

The land.--Espied (ii.). | Rahab. The Scarlet Thread.

The land.--Entered (iii.-vii.). | Jordan, Circumcision.
Jericho and Victory.
Achan and Defeat.

C | viii.-xii. CONQUEST OF THE LAND. | Ai, Ebal and Gerizim.
The Thirty-one Kings.

"So Joshua took the whole land according to all that the Lord said unto Moses; and Joshua gave it for an inheritance unto Israel according to their divisions by their tribes. And the land had rest from war" (xi. 23).

B | xiii. - xxiv. 28. | POSSESSION OF THE LAND.

The land.--To be possessed (xiii.-xxii.) | Much left to possess.
Caleb the Overcomer.
Seven Tribes still without Inheritance.
Cities of Refuge.
Two and half tribes' inheritance.

The land.--"I have divided" (xxiii.). | Be very courageous.
Keep the law of Moses.
Turn neither to right nor left.

The land.--Of the Amorites (xxiv. 1-28). | Promises to fathers fulfilled.

A | xxiv. 29-33. THE DEATH OF JOSHUA AND ELEAZAR.

As will be seen in the structure, there are certain features common to the Lord's command to Joshua in chapter i. and Joshua's command to the people in chapter xxiii. The parallel we set out below so that its significance may be understood:--

"Only be thou strong and very courageous, that thou mayest observe to do according to all the law, which Moses My servant commanded thee: turn not from it to the right hand or to the left, that thou mayest prosper whithersoever thou goest" (Josh. i. 7).

"Be ye, therefore, very courageous to keep and to do all that is written in the book of the law of Moses, that ye turn not aside there from, to the right hand or to the left" (Josh. xxiii. 6).

The words "courage" and "be courageous" we naturally associate with the leader of an expedition, and principally in connection with the execution of the attack and the conquest of the foe. Courage, however, in the book of Joshua has more to do with resolution of heart to keep God's Word than with fighting and conquest. So we find the word "courage" used once of actual conflict and victory, and four times of faithful adherence to the Word of God (Josh. x. 25, and i. 6, 7, 9, 18).

There is in the original of the word "courage" an element of obstinacy, as may be seen, for instance, in Deut. ii. 30: "Made his heart obstinate." And the servant of God needs this element of obstinacy in his spiritual make-up, so that he may not be easily turned aside from the teaching of the Word of God. This can be seen very clearly in the character and example of the apostle Paul, who combined the tenderness of a nursing mother (I Thess. ii. 7) with an inflexible resolution (I Cor. ii. 1, 2; Acts xx. 24).

In Josh. xxiii. 6, the words "Be courageous" are the translation of another word in the Hebrew, meaning "to bind tight". This idea may be seen in II Sam. xviii. 9 where the reference is to Absalom whose hair "caught" in an oak (Septuagint: "entwined"). It appears again in Isa. xxviii. 22, where the idea is that of "tightening bands", and in Isa. xxii. 21, "girding with a girdle". It is used in opposition to "relax", a literal rendering of Isa. xxxv. 3 being: "Tighten the relaxed hands, make them tense" (see Parkhurst). Joshua, and all who would follow in his steps, need resolution and girding. We must "gird up the loins of our mind" (I Pet. i. 13); and have the "loins girt about with truth" (Eph. vi. 14).

In spiritual conflict there is but one weapon--"the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God" (Eph. vi. 17). Joshua's equipment resembles our own, in that he was enjoined to utter faithfulness regarding the Word of God. We are at times tempted to relax regarding some phase of the truth, in order to win an apparent victory, to retain a fellow-servant's sympathy or fellowship, or to advance in some way the cause we have at heart. This, however, must be resisted as of the Devil. No apparent success can ever justify departure from what is written. I Tim. ii. 12 is an instance of a case where the difficulties of service and the state of the times make loyal obedience sometimes appear a definite hindrance. Nevertheless we all acknowledge, when in the presence of the Lord, that no departure from His explicit commands can ever be blessed with "good success".

The "courage" of verse 7 was to be exhibited in "turning not from the law, to the right hand or to the left" (Josh. i. 7). This, we submit, is at the root of obedience and of success:--

> "Then thou shalt have good success" (Josh. i. 8).

In Josh. i. 7 and 8 the one word sakal is translated "prosper" and "have good success". The root idea of the word is "to act wisely", "to be wise". It occurs in Gen. iii. 6, and is variously translated by words indicating wisdom, prudence, understanding and skill. True prosperity and good success are the outcome of wisdom, and wisdom that leads to good success is found in adherence to the Word of God. The failures that are recorded in the book of Joshua may all be traced to one source—disobedience to the Word of God. This is a lesson that is not peculiar to one age or dispensation; it is inherent in Gen. iii., in Josh. i., in Ephesians and in the Revelation.

Let us take to heart the language of Josh. i. 2-9. The Lord promised that He would not fail Joshua, but that put no premium upon disobedience. The same Lord Who said, "I will not fail thee nor forsake thee", also said:--

"Every place that the sole of your feet shall tread upon, that have I given unto you" (Josh. i. 3).

"This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do all that is written therein; for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success" (Josh. i. 8).

In Joshua's day there were no Scriptures other than the law of Moses, called the "book of the law" (Josh. i. 8). Moses is named fifty-seven times in Joshua, and the law nine times (the references to Moses being fairly evenly distributed throughout the record from chapter i. to chapter xxiv.). To-day we possess "all Scripture", including the record of the coming of the Saviour, His death, resurrection and ascension, together with the revelation of the mystery that is so peculiarly our own. As we stand upon the threshold of Ephesians, and contemplate "all spiritual blessings in heavenly places", let us remember that to "possess our possessions" it is necessary that we hold fast the faithful Word. Above all, let us resist the dreamer of dreams, the man who "feels" certain things, or has had certain things "revealed" to him. Nothing can take the place of the Word of God, and all substitutes are ultimately, as they are originally, antichristian.

JOSHUA.
#3. Faith, the substance of things hoped for (ii.).
pp. 47 - 52

The story of the spies and Rahab the harlot recorded in Josh. ii. reverts to a period prior to Josh. i. 1-9. This is evident if we compare the statements of i. 11 and ii. 16.

In i. 11 we read that "within three days" Israel were to pass over Jordan; and in ii. 16 that the spies were lying hid for three days, apart from the time occupied in going and returning. This agrees with the marginal reading of Josh. ii. 1:--

"And Joshua the son of Nun had sent out of Shittim two men to spy secretly, saying, Go view the land, even Jericho."

One of the many evidences of the different authorship of Joshua from that of the books of Moses is found in the spelling of the name Jericho. In the law it is spelt Yarecho, but in Joshua it is spelt Yericho. The interest, however, of this chapter centres around the faith and deliverance of Rahab.

Some commentators have sought to soften the description of Rahab's character given here by observing that the word zanah might possibly be rendered "innkeeper". Alas, the testimony of over 90 occurrences removes all doubt as to Rahab's evil character, and if this were not enough, the references to her in Heb. xi. 31 and James ii. 25 use the word porne, which cannot be translated other than "harlot". Rahab, however, was not saved by her moral character; she was saved, as all are saved, by grace through faith. The name

Jericho is derived from a word meaning the moon, probably because it was worshipped here under the form of Ashtoreth; if this is so, it would explain why Rahab was a harlot, and lived in such a prominent place on the wall.

When Rahab received the spies with peace, and sent them out another way, she acted by faith, as Heb. xi. 31 and James ii. 25 make clear. Yet even though she believed God, and acted accordingly, she told falsehoods. This is not mentioned against her in the N.T. any more than the failures, sins and mistakes of countless millions of believers since her day will be remembered against them. Nevertheless we must be careful to differentiate between that which was of faith in Rahab and that which was of the flesh: the one we are enjoined to follow, the other we should seek grace to avoid.

The grounds of Rahab's faith are worthy of note for they are fundamental:--

> "And she said, I KNOW that the Lord hath given you the land, and that your terror is fallen upon us, and that all the inhabitants of the land faint because of you. For we have HEARD how the Lord dried up the water of the Red Sea for you when ye came out of Egypt; and what ye did unto the two kings of the Amorites, that were on the other side Jordan, Sihon and Og, whom ye utterly destroyed. And as soon as we had heard these things, our hearts did melt, neither did there remain any more courage in any man, because of you; for the Lord your God, HE IS GOD in heaven above, and in earth beneath . . . . . give me a true token . . . . . thou shalt bind this line of SCARLET thread in the window which thou didst let us down by . . . . . and she bound the scarlet line in the window" (Josh. ii. 9-21).

"I know . . . . . for we have heard."—This is faith's conclusion. Notice, however, the change of person, "I" and "we". Not all who hear believe, but all who believe must have heard:--

> "How shall they believe in Him of Whom they have not heard? . . . . . So then faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God" (Rom. x. 14-17).

The mighty deeds of the Lord that accompanied the exodus of Israel could not kept from the ears of the surrounding nations. Indeed it was a part of the Lord's purpose that this should be so:--

> "And in very deed for this cause have I raised thee up, for to show in thee My power; and that My Name may be declared throughout all the earth" (Exod. ix. 16).

Rahab knew the name of the Lord, for she said: "I know that the Lord hath given you the land" (the title Lord here is Jehovah). Moreover, Rahab acknowledged the Lord as God: "For the Lord your God, He is God in heaven above, and in earth beneath" (Josh. ii. 11).

Similar statements are recorded of Nebuchadnezzar:--

> "Your God is a God of gods, and a Lord of kings" (Dan. ii. 47).
> "Ye servants of the Most High . . . . ." "Blessed be the God of Shadrach . . . . ." (Dan. iii. 26-28).

"I blessed the Most High, and I praised and honoured Him that liveth for ever . . . . . He doeth according to His will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth" (Dan. iv. 34, 35).

(See also the proclamation of Darius and Cyrus: Dan. vi. 26, 27 and Ezra i. 1-3).

Moses had sung at the Red Sea, some forty years before the incident of Josh. ii., these words:--

"The people shall hear and be afraid; sorrow shall take hold on the inhabitants of Palestina . . . . . all the inhabitants of Canaan shall melt away" (Exod. xv. 14-18).

The confession of Rahab shews their fulfillment. Two of the wonders mentioned by Rahab are the drying up of the Red Sea, and the destruction of Sihon and Og. She was thoroughly convinced that the Lord was God, that the land was given to Israel and that her own people were under sentence of destruction. Realizing this, she had but one thought—"What must I do to be saved?" We hear no theological disputation with the spies as to the rights and wrongs of the case. Rahab is a true type of the sinner seeking salvation.

"Give me a true token."—It is important to remember that it was the same cord that was used to let down the spies to safety that become the token of Rahab's salvation:--

"Thou shalt bind this line of scarlet thread in the window which thou didst let us down by" (Josh. ii. 18).

It is as though the spies were acting out Paul's statement that the gospel that saved him was the gospel that must save all. The preacher must always point to the means of his own salvation as the only way of salvation for all the world. Scarlet is used repeatedly in the law to set forth redemption by the shedding of blood (see for example Lev. xiv. 4, 6, etc.). The scarlet thread in Rahab's window which saved her and her house from destruction, and the sprinkled blood on the doorpost and lintel at the time of Passover were both "tokens" of the redemption that is in Christ Jesus:--

"Give me a true token . . . . . this line of scarlet thread in the window" (Josh. ii. 12, 18).
"And the blood shall be to you for a token" (Exod. xii. 13).

Rahab, moreover, manifests a true spirit in that she does not merely ask her own safety; in fact she only mentions herself incidentally:--

"Since I have showed you kindness, swear that ye will also show kindness unto my father's house, and give me a true token. And that ye will save alive my father, and my mother, and my brethren, and my sisters, and all that they have, and deliver our lives from death" (Josh. ii. 12, 13).

"And she bound the scarlet line in her window" (Josh. ii. 21).

It is impossible to believe without acting upon that belief. Faith without works is dead. Rahab's trust was not in her kindness to the spies, nor in the mere possession of the scarlet thread. "She bound it in her window." It is idle to speculate as to what would have become of her if she had failed to exhibit this token; it is sufficient that she obeyed and was saved. This is sound doctrine; anything else is but vain jangling of words to no profit.

The word translated "line" (tiqvah) in Josh. ii. 18 and 21 occurs here for the first time in the Scriptures. Although it occurs in the O.T. some 34 times, it is never translated "line" again; but "hope" 23 times, "expectation" 7 times, "thing that I longed for" once, and "expected" once. In Joshua, tiqvah is used figuratively, the figure called Metonymy, where one name is used instead of another, to which it stands in some relation. In this case, it is the Metonymy of the adjunct, where something pertaining to the subject is put for the subject itself. Without the figure being translated, Josh. ii. 18 and 21 would read:--

> "Thou shalt bind this HOPE of scarlet thread in the window" (Josh. ii. 18).
> "And she bound the scarlet HOPE in the window" (Josh. ii. 21).

She had asked for a "true token" and she received it. Rahab figures in Heb. xi. as an example of those who had faith such as is explained in Heb. x. 1: "Now faith is the substance of things hoped for."

The scarlet line in Rahab's window thus become a type of the faith which confidently expects God to honour His Word.

The reader will doubtless expect some reference to be made to the presence of Rahab in the genealogy of the Saviour. Matt. i. 5 reads: "And Salmon begat Booz of Rachab." The only other references to Rahab in the N.T. are found in Heb. xi. 31 and James ii. 25, and in both these cases she is called "Rahab the harlot" even though at the time of which these writers spoke Rahab was a woman of faith. The only references to Rahab in the O.T. are in Joshua (ii. 1 and 3; vi. 17, 23 and 25); and in these five references she is three times called "the harlot", even though there could be no possibility of confusion. There is no record in the O.T. that Salmon married Rahab the harlot. We have simply assumed that the Rahab mentioned in Matt. i. 5 must be the same person as is mentioned in Joshua, Hebrews and James. If the reader consult Young's Analytical Concordance, he will find that there are seven entries under Rahab, divided into two sections:--

> "(1) A woman of Jericho who received and concealed the two spies, B.C.1452.
> (2) The wife of Salmon, and mother of Booz."

It is evident, therefore, that Dr. Young felt it wise to keep the two references separate.

In the Babylonian Gemara* (* - See articles on "The Volume of the Book", Volume XXI, pp. 127, 128), the tradition is preserved that Rahab "being made a proselytess, was married to Joshua". This is also asserted by Kimchi when speaking of Josh. vi. Some scruples, however, were entertained as to how Joshua could marry Rahab, when it was not lawful for any Israelite to contract marriages with the Canaanites, even though they became proselytes. If it would have been sinful for Joshua to have married a Canaanite, would it have been less sinful for Salmon to have done so? It seems best where the Scripture is silent that we should remain silent too. Had the reference in Matt. i. 5 followed the other references and said plainly, "Rahab the harlot", all doubt would have been removed. As it is, there is no necessity to explain the presence of a Canaanite in the genealogy of the Saviour, unless we are to assume that only one person ever bore the name of Rahab, which would be absurd.

Rahab the harlot stands out for all time as a type of the sinner who, realizing the truth and the fact of destruction, flees for refuge to the only hope that is set before us, the precious blood of Christ.

#4. The significance of the crossing of Jordan (iii. 1 - v. 1).

pp. 98 - 103

After the interlude of the visit of the spies to Rahab, we return to the time at which the Book of Joshua opens. In chapter i. we read the command:--

> "Arise, go over this Jordan . . . . .within three days ye shall pass over this Jordan" (Josh. i. 2, 11).

In chapter iii., in obedience to this command, we read:--

> "And Joshua rose early in the morning; and they removed from Shittim, and came to Jordan, he and all the children of Israel, and lodged there before they passed over. And it came to pass after three days, that the officers went through the host" (Josh. iii. 1, 2).

The passage of the Jordan is dealt with in iii. 1 to v. 12, but the subject is too great to be dealt with as a whole. In this article we shall devote our attention to that section which deals with the actual crossing of the Jordan, leaving the teaching of chapter v. to be considered separately.

The crossing of the Jordan.
Josh. iii. 3 - v. 1.

A | iii. 3-6. Command people. The Ark.
B | iii. 7. "This day will I begin to MAGNIFY thee."
C | iii. 8. Command to Priests.--"Stand still."
D | iii. 9 - iv. 10. Testimony to Canaanites and to Israel.--"Hereby ye shall know."

The waters, stones and people.
E | iii. 13-17. Waters on an heap.
F | iv. 1-10. | a | People pass over.
b | Twelve stones.
c | What mean ye?
b | Twelve stones.
a | People pass over.

A | iv. 10-13. Speak to people. The Ark.
B | iv. 14. "On that day the Lord MAGNIFIED Joshua."
C | iv. 15-17. Command to Priests.--"Come up."
D | iv. 18 - v. 1. Testimony to Israel and to Canaanites.--"That all the people of the earth might know."

The waters, stones and people.
E | iv. 18. Waters return.
F | iv. 19-23. | a | People come up.
b | Twelve stones.
c | What mean?
b | These stones.
a | Ye passed over.

The structure of the passage throws into relief those features that are of chief importance, and the time spent upon its discovery is more than compensated for by that approximation to "the full assurance of understanding" which in some small measure a grasp of the general trend of any passage provides. The theme is fourfold. (1) The Ark. (2) The magnifying of Joshua. (3) The Priests. (4) The testimony to the Canaanites and to Israel. As the material before us is rather great in bulk, it will simplify matters if we take each section separately and seek to discover its significance.

THE ARK.—The ark of the Covenant figures in four great episodes in Joshua:--

(a) The crossing of the Jordan (iii., iv.).
(b) The taking of Jericho (vi.).
(c) The discovery of Achan's sin (vii.).
(d) The recital of the blessings and the cursings (viii.).

The teaching that relates to the ark in the first episode is perhaps crystallized for us in the opening reference: "When ye see the ark . . . . . go after it" (Josh. iii. 3).

The full statement should be read:--

> "And they commanded the people saying, When ye see the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God, and the priests the Levites bearing it, then ye shall remove from your place, and go after it."

This command implies a resumption of the relationship that had been broken by the disobedience and failure of Israel in the wilderness:--

> "And they departed from the mount of the Lord three days' journey: and the ark of the covenant of the Lord went before them in the three days' journey, to search out a resting place for them" (Numb. x. 33).

This happy condition was interrupted by the failure so quickly manifested (see Num. xi.) and the last reference to the ark in the book of Numbers is that of xiv. 43, 44:--

> "Ye are turned away from the Lord, therefore the Lord will not be with you. But they presumed to go up unto the hill top: nevertheless the ark of the covenant of the Lord, and Moses, departed not out of the camp."

A glance at the verses shews the intimate association of the presence of the Lord with the ark: "The Lord will not be with you . . . . . the ark . . . . . departed not out of the camp" (Num. xiv. 43, 44).

From this time until the close of the wilderness wandering we find no mention of the ark of the covenant. The resumption of favour is indicated in Deut. xxxi. where Moses, at one hundred and twenty years of age, speaks these words to Israel:--

> "The Lord thy God, He will go over before thee, and He will destroy these nations from before thee, and thou shalt possess them; and Joshua, he shall go over before thee, as the Lord hath said" (Deut. xxxi. 3).

Continuing the account in Deuteronomy, we read:--

> "And Moses called unto Joshua, and said unto him in the sight of all Israel, Be strong and of a good courage; for thou must go with this people unto the land which the Lord hath sworn unto their fathers to give them; and thou shalt cause them to inherit it. And the Lord, He it is that doth go before thee: He will be with thee, He will not fail thee, neither forsake thee: fear not, neither be dismayed. And Moses wrote this law and delivered it unto the priests, the sons of Levi, which bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord, and unto all the elders of Israel" (Deut. xxxi. 7-9).
> "Take this book of the law, and put it in the side of the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God, that it may be there for a witness against thee" (Deut. xxxi. 26).

When Israel, therefore, were called upon to follow the ark, they had the consciousness that it contained the covenant engagement of the Lord to lead them triumphantly into the land of promise. All inheritance, whether enjoyed on earth or in the heavenlies, is by promise, and cannot be disassociated from the great propitiation for which the Mercy Seat stands. Moreover, the Mercy Seat was made of one piece with the Cherubim, and the Cherubim link the purpose of grace here with the promise made at Eden's gate (Gen. iii.) and the fall of the anointed Cherub* (* - See Index to Volumes I-XX for a series of notes under the heading CHERUBIM) before Adam was created (Ezek. xxviii.). The crossing of the Jordan, and the fall of Jericho take upon them fuller and deeper meanings as we see them in the light of the great purpose of the ages.

There are ten references in Josh. iii. and iv. to the "ark of the covenant"; and seven other references in which it is described either simply as "the ark" or by some title other than the "ark of the covenant". It may be useful to tabulate these seven references in which the "covenant" is not referred to:-- "The ark" (iii. 15 twice and iv. 10).

"The ark of the Lord, the Lord of the whole earth" (iii. 13).
"The ark of the Lord your God" (iv. 5).
"The ark of the Lord" (iv. 11).
"The ark of the testimony" (iv. 16).

There is an undoubted reference in Heb. xiii. to the confidence that the presence of the ark of the covenant inspired, and the promise of the Lord never to leave or forsake. The chapter also emphasizes death and resurrection, which the crossing of the Jordan typified:--

> "He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee . . . . . Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant . . . . ." (Heb. xiii. 5, 20).

A space of two thousand cubits was to separate the ark and the people following. The reason for this is given: "That ye may know the way by which ye must go; for ye have not passed this way heretofore" (Josh. iii. 4). The student of Scripture will immediately think of the words of John xiv.: "I go to prepare a place for . . . . . How can we know the way? . . . . . Arise, let us go hence."

The Lord Jesus fulfils all that the ark, the priests and Joshua enacted on that triumphant day.

Among the significant words spoken to or about the priests that bare the ark are the following:--

> "Ye shall stand still in Jordan" (iii. 8).
> "And the priests that bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord stood firm on dry ground in the midst of Jordan" (iii. 17).
> "The priests which bare the ark stood in the midst of Jordan until everything was finished" (iv. 10).
> "When all the people were clean passed over, the ark of the Lord passed over" (iv. 11).
> "Command the priests that bear the ark of the testimony, that they come up out of Jordan" (iv. 16).
> "When the soles of the priests' feet were lifted up unto the dry land, the waters of Jordan returned unto their place" (iv. 18).

The words "stand still" and "stood firm" are translations of the same word. To us, who look back upon the great work of Christ, the significance of words "Stood firm . . . . . until everything was finished . . . . . all were clean passed over" needs no explanation. We rejoice that in the finished work of Christ, we have a sure and safe passage through Jordan to the other side, where all the promises of God await fulfillment.

The command "to come up out of Jordan" is also significant. The people, as well as the priests with the ark, "came up out of Jordan" (iv. 19). And the next occurrence of the word is descriptive of victory: "And the people shall ascend up" (vi. 15). It is the same triumphant word that is used in such passages as:--

> "God is gone up with a shout" (Psa. xlvii. 5);
> "Thou hast ascended on high" (Psa. lxviii. 18).

And also in that tragedy of presumption when the ark was not with the people and "they presumed to go up unto the hill top" (Num. xiv. 44).

With Christ, we stand firm, we ascend, we triumph. Without Christ, all is vanity, failure and destruction.

Of all the significant features, however, that are associated with the crossing of the Jordan, the one that we must now consider is surely of the first importance:--

> "And as they that bare the ark were come unto Jordan, and the feet of the priests that bare the ark were dipped ('baptized', LXX) in the brim of the water (for Jordan overfloweth all his banks all the time of harvest), that the waters which came down from above stood and rose up upon an heap very far from the city Adam, that is beside Zaretan; and those that came down toward the sea of the plain, even the salt sea, failed, and were cut off: and the people passed over right against Jericho" (Josh. iii. 15, 16).

There is marginal reading here of the Massoretes that suggests as the true meaning: "Very far off, at the city called Adam." As a piece of topographical information the passage has little value, for the site of the city called Adam is unknown, and the site of Zaretan is only a conjecture. Its significance lies in its typical teaching, which becomes clear when we read it in the light of such passages as I Cor. xv. 22, Rom. v. 12, and the passage in Col. ii. 12 which refers to baptism (closely associated with circumcision, as we find also in Josh. iv.). Here is set forth in wonderful type, the canceling of the condemnation that comes down to us from Adam. This condemnation has one natural end, the death and destruction so vividly set forth by the Dead Sea into which the waters of Jordan run. The passage sets forth in type the burial and the resurrection of the saints by virtue of union with the Son of God. The priests are a type of Christ, the ark is a type of Christ, and Joshua is a type of Christ. Each sets forth one special aspect of that great work wherein the old man is reckoned dead and buried, and the new man put on.

We had hoped to have dealt with the four sections contained in the structure. We have found, however, that one alone has been of sufficient fullness to demand all the space at our disposal. We commend this section dealing with the ark and with Adam to the people of God, believing that a prayerful study will yield rich food for the spirit, and provide new matter for praise and thanksgiving.

JOSHUA.
#5. The twelve stones for a Memorial (iii., iv.).
pp. 171 - 175

It may be remembered that the structure of Josh. iii. and iv. threw into prominence four main subjects. We have already considered the first of these, the ark, and with it the third, the reference to the priests. The second subject, the magnifying of Joshua, speaks for itself. At that same river God began to magnify the Lord Jesus, saying: "This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased." The magnifying of the Son of God was completed at the resurrection when He was declared "Son of God with power" (Rom. i. 4). The word archomai that is used in the LXX of Josh. iii. 7: "I will begin to magnify thee", is also used by Luke in the passage that should be translated:--

> "Jesus was about thirty years of age when He was beginning" (Luke iii. 23).

We take up for our present study the fourth subdivision of the structure:--

> "Testimony to Canaanites and to Israel" (D | iii. 10 - iv. 9 and D | iv. 18 - v. 1).

The miracle of Jordan had two opposite effects on the people concerned. In the Canaanite it produced terror; in the Israelite assurance:--

> "And Joshua said unto the children of Israel, Come hither and hear the words of the Lord your God. And Joshua said, Hereby ye shall know that the living God is among you, and that He will without fail drive out from before you the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Hivites, and the Perizzites, and the Girgashites, and the Amorites, and the Jebusites" (Josh. iii. 9, 10).
>
> "And it came to pass, when all the kings of the Amorites, which were on the side of Jordan westward, and all the kings of the Canaanites, which were by the sea, heard that the Lord had dried up the waters of Jordan from before the children of Israel, until we were passed over, that their heart melted, neither was there spirit in them any more, because of the children of Israel" (Josh. v. 1).

Something of the same effect upon the spiritual Amorites and Canaanites is revealed in Col. ii. 15:--

> “And having spoiled principalities and powers, He made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in it.”

The testimony to Israel in this miracle of the crossing of Jordan is contained in the twelve memorial stones that were set up in Gilgal and in the midst of Jordan itself. We naturally associate the number twelve with Israel, and we are right in doing so here:--

> "Now, therefore, take you twelve men out of the tribes of Israel, out of every tribe a man" (Josh. iii. 12).
> "Take you twelve men out of the people, and of every tribe a man" (Josh. iv. 2).

> "Then Joshua called the twelve men, whom he had prepared of the children of Israel, out of every tribe a man. And Joshua said unto them, Pass over before the ark of the Lord your God into the midst of Jordan, and take ye up every man of you a stone upon his shoulder, according unto the number of the tribes of the children of Israel" (Josh. iv. 4, 5).
>
> "And the children of Israel did so as Joshua commanded, and took up twelve stones out of the midst of Jordan, as the Lord spake unto Joshua, according to the number of the tribes of the children of Israel, and carried them over with them unto the place where they lodged, and laid them down there" (Josh. iv. 8).

The above passages reiterate the association of the twelve stones with the twelve tribes. Two other passages complete the record, making six references to the number twelve in this section:--

> "Take you hence out of the midst of Jordan, out of the place where the priests' feet stood firm, twelve stones, and ye shall carry them over with you, and leave them in the lodging place, where ye shall lodge this night" (Josh. iv. 3).
>
> "And Joshua set up twelve stones ('other twelve stones' LXX) in the midst of Jordan, in the place where the feet of the priests which bare the ark of the covenant stood: and they are there unto this day" (Josh. iv. 9).

Several points call for notice in the above account. First of all, observe that what the twelve representative men did, is said to have been done by "the children of Israel" (Josh. iv. 8). We find the same principle at work in the record of the Passover, where, although the head of the house was the one who actually killed the passover lamb, yet, as it was a representative act, we read: "And the whole assembly of the congregation of Israel shall kill it in the evening" (Exod. xii. 6). Not only is the representative principle manifest in the reference to Israel, but also in the fact that the many passover lambs slain that night are spoken of as "it", plainly looking forward to the great Antitype. It is well to see this fact clearly, for there are some who would rob us of this glorious ground of acceptance.

We next observe that the twelve stones were not gathered from any part of the river bed that was most accessible, but had to be taken "out of the place where the priests' feet stood firm". Moreover Joshua set up twelve more stones in the midst of Jordan, in exactly the place from which the first twelve were taken. When we are dealing with stones, it is not possible for them to be in two places at once, but when we consider God's people, we learn that they are buried with Christ, and also raised together with him.

Again, we observe that it was Joshua, not the twelve men, who placed the twelve stones in the river bed, and it was Joshua, and not the twelve men who pitched them in Gilgal. We have symbolized in these two sets of stones a twofold work, that remained unexplained until Paul wrote the epistle to the Romans.

The special significance of Gilgal where the rescued twelve stones were pitched by Joshua will become apparent on reading Joshua. This chapter forms the second half of the crossing of Jordan, and is to be considered in our next article.

We can, however, deal with one point at once—the meaning of the word "pitch" in the passage: "Did Joshua pitch in Gilgal" (Josh. iv. 20). The word does not mean "pitch" as in "pitching a camp". For the pitching of a camp the word is chanah, or natah; but the word here is qum, which means to "stand up", "arise"—see the article "Joshua #1", on the words: "Moses is dead; now therefore arise" (Josh. i. 2). The stones brought from the depths of the waters of judgment now "stand up" as monuments of grace.

The typical character of the stones is indicated by the fact that provision is twice made for the time when the children should ask "What mean ye by these stones?" (Josh. iv. 6, 21).

On twelve different occasions we read of certain things or events being "for a memorial" to Israel. Eleven are found during the administration of Moses and Joshua, the twelfth appearing at the restoration of Israel described in the prophet Zechariah. All in their measure look forward to Christ.

1. THE PASSOVER.

"This day shall be unto you for a memorial" (Exod. xii. 14).

2. THE UNLEAVENED BREAD.

"This is done because of that which the Lord did unto me when I came forth out of Egypt. And it shall be for a sign . . . . . and for a memorial . . . . ." (Exod. xiii. 8, 9).

3. THE DESTRUCTION OF AMALEK.

"Write this for a memorial in a book, and rehearse it in the ears of Joshua: for I will utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven" (Exod. xvii. 14).

4. THE STONES ON AARON'S SHOULDERS.

"And thou shalt put the two stones upon the shoulders of the ephod for stones of memorial unto the children of Israel; and Aaron shall bear their names before the Lord upon his two shoulders for a memorial" (Exod. xxviii. 12).

5. THE STONES OF AARON'S HEART.

"And Aaron shall bear the names of the children of Israel in the breastplate of judgment upon his heart, when he goeth in unto the holy place for a memorial before the Lord continually" (Exod. xxviii. 29).

6. THE ATONEMENT MONEY.

"And thou shalt take the atonement money of the children of Israel, and shalt appoint it for the service of the tabernacle of the congregation; that it may be for a memorial unto the children of Israel before the Lord, to make an atonement for your souls" (Exod. xxx. 16).

7. THE BLOWING OF TRUMPETS.

"In the seventh month, in the first day of the month, shall ye have a sabbath, a memorial of blowing of trumpets, an holy convocation" (Lev. xxiii. 24; Num. x. 10).

8. THE OFFERING OF JEALOUSY.

"He shall put no oil upon it, nor put frankincense thereon; for it is an offering of jealousy, an offering of memorial, bringing iniquity to remembrance" (Num. v. 15, 18).

9. THE BRAZEN CENSERS.

"The brazen censers . . . . . and they were made broad plates for a covering of the altar, to be a memorial unto the children of Israel before the Lord" (Num. xvi. 39, 40).

10. THE CAPTAINS' OFFERING.

"And Moses and Eleazar the priest took the gold of the captains of thousands and of hundreds, and brought it unto the tabernacle of the congregation, for a memorial for the children of Israel before the Lord" (Num. xxxi. 54).

11. THE TWELVE STONES.

"These stones shall be for a memorial unto the children of Israel for ever" (Josh. iv. 7).

12. THE CROWNS OF SILVER AND GOLD.

"And the crowns shall be . . . . . for a memorial in the temple of the Lord" (Zech. vi. 14).

Here we have memorials of redemption, atonement, intercession, acceptance, joy, victory, sin, death, resurrection and glory. The last but one of these memorials is that of the twelve stones raised up at Gilgal by Joshua. The twelfth and last is the pledge of the coming of the great King-Priest, Who shall bear the glory, as He once bore sin, and shall sit as a priest upon a throne, in Whom all the hopes of all men are centred.

JOSHUA.
#6. The essentials of victory (v.).
pp. 221 - 226

We have seen something of the typical teaching that is inherent in the name of "the city Adam" (Josh. iii. 16), also the symbolic meaning of the twelve stones in Gilgal and in the river bed. We now learn the reason why the place was named Gilgal, and its significance as a type of good things to come.

A problem that now seems beyond our power to solve is whether the name Gilgal, that occurs some thirteen times in Joshua, refers to one or more places of the same name. We know that Gilgal of Josh. iv. was not so named until the act of circumcision took place there, and therefore the passages in Deut. xi. 30 and Josh. xii. 23 cannot refer to the same site. Moses speaks of Gilgal as being in the vicinity of Ebal and Gerizim, and so thirty miles from the Gilgal of Josh. iv. The word is sometimes rendered in the LXX by "Galilee", and is comparable with the term "Galilee of the nations". We could bring forward a number of authorities ancient and modern, Josephus, the Maccabees, Lightfoot and others, with reference to this problem, but for us the strict geography of the narrative is not so important as its significance. So that, with the obvious exception of Josh. xii. 23 which speaks of the "king of the nations of Gilgal", we shall take the name Gilgal throughout the book of Joshua to indicate the truth made known in chapters iv. and v., the rolling away of the reproach of Egypt in the rite of circumcision. Whether we are dealing with the same place always, or possibly another of the same name near Antipatris, and now called Jidjulah, is a matter which is difficult to decide, and is not for our purpose very important.

It is quite in keeping with the typical nature of the book of Joshua, and of Gilgal in particular, that the references of Gilgal in this book, so far as Israel is concerned, are exactly twelve in number. Further, it is the opinion of some authorities that "Gilgal" and "Golgotha" are both derived from the same Hebrew root. This would add to the symbolism of the name and the circumcision that took place there.

We have discussed the true significance of circumcision in Volume XIX, page 156, and also in Volume XXIV in the series on Colossians (Col. ii. 11-13), which the reader should consult if information on this matter is needed. It will suffice here to say that circumcision implies "no confidence in the flesh" (Phil. iii. 3) and "the putting off of the body of the flesh" (Col. ii. 11), and is closely associated with burial, baptism, and resurrection union with Christ, much as we have seen set forth in Josh. iii. and iv.

"The second time."—We must not suppose from Josh. v. 2 that the same persons submitted to the rite a second time; but rather, as is explained in verses 4-7, that it refers to the children that had been born in the wilderness "by the way as they came forth out of Egypt" and had not been circumcised. "The second time" is balanced by the words of verse 7: "Their children, whom He raised up in their stead." There had been "a breach of promise" (Num. xiv. 34). The carcasses of the murmurers fell in the wilderness—"but your little ones, which ye said should be a prey, them will I bring in, and they shall know the land which ye have despised" (Num. xiv. 29-31). This was fulfilled when Joshua led the people into the land.

The lesson for us is that conquest, victory, growth, the possessing of our possessions, are impossible apart from the putting off of the old man and the putting on of the new. It is surely not without significance that it was at Gilgal that Samuel hacked Agag the Amalekite to pieces—another symbol of the utter repudiation of the flesh (For notes on "Amalek" see Volume XV, page 177).

"The second time" also suggests the attainment of God's purpose for Israel:--

> "And it shall come to pass in that day that the Lord shall set His hand again the second time to recover the remnant of His people, which are left, from Assyria and from Egypt . . . . ." (Isa. xi. 11).

This element is characteristic of Israel's typical history. Joseph was at first rejected by his brethren, but received the second time: "And at the second time Joseph was made known to his brethren" (Acts xvii. 13). Moses was rejected the first time: "This Moses whom they refused, saying, Who made thee a ruler and a judge? the same did God send to be a ruler and a deliverer" (Acts vii. 35).

The same principle is seen in Israel's attitude to Christ. At His first coming they rejected Him; at His second coming, they shall look on Him Whom they pierced and mourn for Him:--

> "And unto them that look for Him shall He appear the second time without sin unto salvation" (Heb. ix. 28).

Thus this "second time" of Josh.v. is typical of Israel's final entry into her possessions.

We have already observed that when Joshua "pitched" the stones in Gilgal, the Hebrew word qum (meaning "rising in resurrection") is used, so emphasizing the typical teaching of the passage. We notice in the chapter now before us that the word translated "were whole" is chayah, "to live", "to be made alive", "to revive": "They abode in their places in the camp until they were whole" (Josh. v. 8).

This word in one of its forms is nine times rendered "quicken" in Psa. cxix. In other forms it is translated "save alive" (Josh. ii. 13; vi. 25), and "restore" (II Kings viii. 1, 5, where a dead body is restored to life). This further emphasizes the fact that Israel, brought up from the depths of Jordan, set forth in type the believer in newness of life. This, then, is the first principle that we may learn from the typical history of this typical people.

The reproach of Egypt has now been rolled away. God's people are free, not only from Egypt and its bondage, but from its reproach that clung to many even in the wilderness. While that reproach of Egypt clung to them, they were even willing to follow a captain back to their bondage (Num. xiv. 4). But now they are ready to follow their true Captain, Joshua, who is himself a type of the Lord, the Captain of our salvation (Heb. ii. 10), Who leads many sons, not into Canaan, but to glory. Before the chapter ends, this true Captain reveals Himself to the worshipping presence of Joshua (Josh. v. 13-15).

We have, therefore, in this chapter, four great principles that underlie all true success and victory:--

(1) The repudiation of the flesh	CIRCUMCISION (v. 9).
(2) The blood of Christ	PASSOVER (v. 10).
(3) The Word of God	FOOD (v. 11, 12).
(4) Christ as Lord	THE CAPTAIN OF THE LORD'S HOST (v. 13-15).

There was only one Passover—which took place in Egypt. All others have been memorial feasts looking back to that wonderful night, and celebrating the covenant that the Lord had made (Exod. vi. 3-8; Jer. xxxi. 31, 32). The first memorial passover feast was kept by Israel under Moses in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. ix. 1, 2). The second was observed under Joshua after the circumcision at Gilgal. The first baptism of Israel was unto Moses at the Red Sea; the second was in the waters of Jordan. The first baptism was followed by the gift of manna; at the second, the manna was discontinued. While the typical teaching of Joshua is not primarily concerned with salvation from sin—this was already set forth in type when Israel were redeemed out of the bondage of Egypt—it nevertheless unscriptural to imagine that those who are blessed in heavenly places have no need to be reminded of Christ their Passover. It is sufficient to glance at Eph. i. to discover in verse 7 a very full recognition of "redemption through His blood". This is parallel with the observance of the Passover by the victorious nation, newly come up out of Jordan.

On the morrow after the Passover, the unleavened cakes were made of the old corn of the land, and the day after, the manna ceased. The barley harvest began with the Passover (and it will be remembered that "Jordan overflows all its banks all the time of harvest" [Josh. iii. 15]), and not until the morrow after the Paschal Sabbath, and when the sheaf of the firstfruits had been waved, could Israel partake of the new corn. The Companion Bible draws attention to the fact that at the conclusion of the feast on the 21st day of Abib at even, exactly forty years had passed since the night of Exod. xii. 41, 42. During those forty years Israel had failed and wandered in the wilderness; but now in the plains of Jericho, a fresh start is made. Some thirty-eight years earlier Joshua and Caleb had brought back the bunch of grapes from Eshcol and reported upon the fruit of the land. At last their faith and loyalty are rewarded: "They did eat the fruit of the land of Canaan that year."

The cessation of the manna emphasized the fact that it was a miraculous gift. If we may draw an analogy between the experiences of Josh. iv. & v. and those of the believer who has passed through Rom. vi. and stands now in Col. ii., we may learn from the cessation of the manna that the miraculous elements that abound in the "forty years" interval of the Acts period, while the Lord stretched forth His hand to a disobedient and gainsaying people, must not be expected in the present dispensation. We would interpose a word here lest any reader should feel that the typical teaching of Joshua in any sense nullifies the statements of the prison epistles as to the exclusive character of the mystery.

We have taught over and over again that the mystery does not consist in the doctrines of redemption and justification, nor even of spiritual circumcision and newness of life with Christ. These are fundamental to the mystery, but do not constitute the mystery. They are all found in the epistle to the Romans, and are vital doctrines. But the mystery is not the doctrinal teaching even of Ephesians or Colossians. It is that exclusive revelation of the purpose of the ages concerning the Church which is the Body of Christ, which was chosen in Him before the overthrow of the world, and which is seated with Him at the right hand of God far above all principality and power. This phase of truth is not to be discovered in the typical teaching of Joshua, nor in any other O.T. book. But the underlying doctrine and its accompanying manner of life are illustrated by type and shadow throughout the history of the chosen people.

Joshua now has a vision. He was "by Jericho", and the thought is suggested that he was meditating upon the task before him of taking this stronghold, when, lifting up his eyes, he sees a Man standing over against him, with a drawn sword in His hand. He reveals Himself as the Captain of the Lord's host. Joshua falls on his face in worship, and the Captain of the Lord's host says to him: "Loose thy shoe from off thy foot; for the place whereon thou standest is holy" (Josh.v. 15).

The Lord had promised that as He had been with Moses, so would He be with Joshua. Moses saw a burning bush that was not consumed, and was told to take off his shoes (Exod. iii. 5). Moses' need was not so much a Captain to lead to victory, as a power that would endure. In Exod. iii. "the Angel of the Lord" appeared; in Joshua we read that "there stood a Man". There are some who are confident that in both cases we have a theophany of the Lord Jesus Christ. Others believe that the Angel of the Lord was Michael (see Dan. xii. 1). The whole of Israel's history is accompanied by angelic ministry:--

> "The Angel of God, which went before the camp of Israel, removed and went behind them; and the pillar of the cloud went from before their face, and stood behind them" (Exod. xiv. 19).
>
> "Behold, I send an Angel . . . . . to bring thee in the way which I have prepared. Beware of him, obey his voice, provoke him not; for he will not pardon your transgressions: for My Name is in him. But if thou shalt indeed obey his voice, and do all that I speak, then I will be an enemy unto thine enemies, and an adversary unto thine adversaries. For Mine angel shall go before thee, and bring thee in unto the Amorites . . . . . and I will cut them off" (Exod. xxiii. 20-23).

This second quotation is, we trust, explicit enough to settle the matter for us. It so exactly fits the circumstances of Josh. v. that we cannot but conclude that Josh. v. is the fulfillment of this promise.

Angelic hosts led by Michael shall yet war in heaven (Rev. xii. 7), and there shall be an overthrow of Satan's power in that day, of which the overthrow of Jericho will prove to be a type, in all of its essential features. This theme now lies before us. With the preparation of Josh. iii.-v. now complete, we can go on to consider the victory of faith.

JOSHUA.
#7. The taking of Jericho (vi.).
pp. 270 - 274

The section of the book of Joshua which now lies before us is twofold, viz., (1) The taking of Jericho and (2) The trespass of Achan. The two subjects are interrelated, as are the crossing of Jordan and the subsequent circumcision at Gilgal.

In this article we must limit ourselves to the account of the taking of Jericho. This again may be divided into two parts: first, the actual investment and taking of the city, and secondly, the devotion of all to the Lord. In the case of the inhabitants and their cattle this devotion to the Lord meant utter destruction; but the gold and silver, brass and iron, were saved and placed in the treasury of the Lord. Rahab, also, and her household were spared from destruction on account of her faith. The twofold division of the subject may be exhibited in the structure:--

Joshua vi.
The taking of Jericho.

i. vi. 2-16. The city given.
ii. vi. 17-26. The city devoted and cursed.

A consideration of the following outline impresses one with the fact that this is no private and personal conquest by Joshua or Israel, no sacking and looting of a city without discrimination. The city was devoted to the Lord. The city was given to Joshua by the Lord, and He alone had the disposal of all within its walls.

A | THE CITY GIVEN. |
A | 2. I have given into thine hand Jericho.
B | 3. Compass the city six days.
C | 4. Compass the city on the seventh day.
D | 5. Shout.
B | 6-14. Compass the city six days.
C | 15. Compass the city on the seventh day.
D | 16. Shout.
A | 16. The Lord hath given you the city.
A | THE CITY DEVOTED AND CURSED. |
E1 | 17. Only Rahab and her house shall live.
F1 | 18, 19. Devoted things, as gold, not to be kept privately.
F1 | 20, 21. Utter destruction of all else.
E1 | 22, 23. Rahab and her house brought out.
E2 | 24. The city burned with fire.
F2 | 24. Devoted things placed in treasury.
F2 | 25. Rahab saved and dwelling in Israel.
E2 | 26. The city. Cursed be the builder.

The solemn encompassing of the walls of the city for the six days must have been a severe test of the people's faith; and had they not had the crossing of the Jordan fresh in their minds, their hearts might have failed them.

The sounding of the trumpets on the seventh day at the completion of the seventh time of encircling the city by the seven priests is prophetic. The fulfillment of the type is found in the Revelation:--

> "In the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God should be finished, as He hath declared to His servants the prophets" (Rev. x. 7).
>
> "And the seventh angel sounded; and there were great voices in heaven, saying, The kingdom of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of His Christ; and He shall reign for ever and ever . . . . . The nations were angry, and Thy wrath is come . . . . . there was seen in His temple the ark of His testimony" (Rev. xi. 15-19).

Another and important point is the special type of trumpet which the priests were commanded to blow. The trumpets used here must not be confused with the chatsotserah, the straight trumpets used of war:--

> "Make thee two trumpets of silver . . . . . for the calling of the assembly . . . . . if ye go to war in your land against the enemy . . . . ." (Num. x. 1-9).

The trumpets used at the fall of Jericho are called trumpets of rams' horns, or better, "trumpets of Jubilee". They were used for announcing the Jubilee, and it is the typical fulfillment of Israel's Jubilee that is impressed upon us here at the fall of Jericho.

The word "Jubilee" is a translation of the Hebrew word Yobel. Its first occurrence is in Exod. xix. 13, and the last in Josh. vi. 4-13. The remaining occurrences are all found in Leviticus and Numbers, and are all translated "Jubilee".

> "And thou shalt number seven sabbaths of years unto thee, seven times seven years; and the space of the seven sabbaths of years shall be forty and nine years. Then shalt thou cause the trumpet of the jubilee to sound on the tenth day of the seventh month . . . . . ye shall proclaim liberty . . . . . ye shall return every man unto his possession . . . . ." (Lev. xxv. 8-19).

The fall of Jericho at the end of the seventh day and at the sounding of the seven trumpets, looks forward to the day when the seventy times seven years shall eventuate in the overthrow of Babylon and Satanic opposition, and the final restoration of Israel to their rightful place in the purpose of God (Dan. ix. 24-27). The sounding of the trumpet on the tenth day of the seventh month is the "last trump" of Israel's typical year. "The last trump" in I Cor. xv. 50-57, the "trump of God" and "voice of the Archangel" in I Thess. iv. 16, and the sounding of the seventh angel in Rev. x., xi. all belong to the same period, and fulfil the type of the Jubilee. Only those who endeavour to adjust I Cor. xv. and I Thess. iv. to the hope of the Mystery will find any difficulty in accepting this as truth.

This is not the place to introduce archæology. Much work of great interest has been done on the site of Jericho, and when the details are complete, we may be able to pass on some of them to the reader. We believe what God has said in Josh. vi., however, without having to await archæological confirmation. We pass on, therefore, to the second division of the subject: "The city devoted and cursed":--

> "And the city shall be accursed, even it, and all that are therein, to the Lord . . . . . And ye, in any wise keep yourselves from the accursed thing, lest ye make yourselves accursed, when ye take of the accursed thing, and make the camp of Israel a curse, and trouble it. But all the silver, and gold, and vessels of brass and iron, are consecrated unto the Lord: they shall come into the treasury of the Lord" (Josh. vi. 17-19).

The English reader is likely to be misled by the words "curse" and "accursed". The Hebrew cherem means "to devote", whether it be to destruction or to holy uses. To translate cherem "accursed" is to decide at once which of the two purposes of "devotion" is implied in the context.

Let the reader ponder the use of the word cherem in the law.

> "But the field, when it goeth out in the Jubilee, shall be holy unto the Lord, as a field devoted" (Lev. xxvii. 21).
>
> "Notwithstanding no devoted thing, that a man shall devote unto the Lord of all that he hath, both of man and beast, and of the field of his possession, shall be sold or redeemed: every devoted thing is most holy unto the Lord" (Lev. xxvii. 28).
>
> "None devoted, which shall be devoted of men, shall be redeemed; but shall surely be put to death" (Lev. xxvii. 29).
>
> "Devoted" (Num. xviii. 14).
> "Cursed thing" (Deut. vii. 26; xiii. 17).

When we examine the references in Lev. xxvii., we are struck by the close association between the Jubilee and this "devoting" of things to the Lord; and the "devotion" of Jericho and its possessions falls into line.

If we continue our examination, and are not content with mere references, we shall be rewarded with full and positive teaching. We are all too prone to be impressed with a string of references, and yield to the temptation of "taking them as read". To do so with the above references to Deuteronomy is to lose valuable help. We have purposely adopted this method of arrangement, to stimulate the true Berean spirit of "Search and see" for which this magazine stands:--

> "Thou shalt surely smite the inhabitants of that city with the edge of the sword, destroying it utterly, and all that is therein, and the cattle thereof, with the edge of the sword. And thou shalt gather all the spoil of it into the midst of the street thereof, and shalt burn with fire the city, and all the spoil thereof of every whit, for the Lord thy God: and it shall be a heap for ever; it shall not be built again. And there shall cleave nought of the cursed thing (i.e. devoted thing) to thine hand" (Deut. xiii. 15-17).

The city of Jericho had been "devoted" to the Lord. Apart from the specified exemptions (the silver and gold, etc., and Rahab and her household) nothing was to be spared. The warning given in Deut. xiii. 17: "There shall cleave nought of the cursed thing to thine hand" is echoed by the words of Joshua: "And ye, in any wise keep yourselves from the devoted thing . . . . . when ye take of the devoted thing" (Josh. vi. 18).

Jericho was a kind of firstfruits, and belonged wholly to the Lord. The words of Moses: "It shall be a heap for ever; it shall not be built again" are echoed in the words of Joshua:-- > "Cursed (arar, quite different from cherem) be the man before the Lord (contrast, 'devoted' to the Lord in verse 17), that riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho. He shall lay the foundation thereof in his firstborn, and in his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it" (Josh. vi. 26).

The word "build" implies fortification, for the city was given to Benjamin, and had been partially restored (compare Judges iii. 13 with Deut. xxxiv. 3).

What is the lesson of this chapter of Joshua? We learn that God at His own appointed time will fulfil the prophecy of the Jubilee, and at the sounding of the seventh trumpet accomplish both the overthrow of the citadel of evil, and the setting up of the kingdom of the Lord. We learn that this will never be accomplished by human strength. Soldiers marched round Jericho, but the Jubilee trumpets of the priests and the shout of the people were the only external agents in its overthrow. To the believer comes a solemn warning against letting his hand "cleave" to any of the things of this world, which are surely devoted to destruction. As with Abraham and the spoils of Sodom, we must rather forego even our legitimate dues, so that no advantage be given to the enemy over us.

In the sad story of Achan and his trespass, we shall learn something of the effect upon the overcoming life of the Lord's people of complicity in these devoted things. May the Lord keep us from "troubling" His people, and from reaping "trouble" for ourselves (Josh. vi. 18; vii. 25).

Notes and jottings from an old Bible.

#1. Seven distinctions between saved and unsaved.
pp. 23, 24

The Bible that we use at our desk is one that has seen so much service as to look almost like some ancient papyrus.

In the course of years odd notes have accumulated, some of them bearing upon the gospel, some on doctrine, and some on practice. We have no idea as to the source of many of these notes, so that it is impossible for us to render the authors their due, but we pass on certain of them in the hope that they will be of service to those who minister to others, or to those who by quiet meditation may extract comfort and cheer from their consideration.

One of these sets is a list of seven differences that Scripture indicates are observable between the saved and unsaved. The scripture references take no heed to dispensational distinctions, as the notes were written some years before the claims of II Tim. ii. 15 were recognized by us. Allowing a margin for this, the following may nevertheless lead our hearts out in praise unto Him Whose grace has "made us to differ", and in greater sympathy with those who are yet "out of the way".

Seven distinctions between saved and unsaved.

(1) AN UNDENIABLE DIFFERENCE.
"Appointed once to die" (Heb. ix. 27).
"God hath not appointed us to wrath" (I Thess. v. 9).
"Reserve the unjust . . . . . to be punished" (II Pet. ii. 9).
"Inheritance . . . . . reserved in heaven for you" (I Pet. i. 4).

(2) AN UNAMBIGUOUS DISTINTION.
"When we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world" (I Cor. xi. 32).

(3) AN UNAPPROACHABLE SPHERE.
"There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus" (Rom. viii. 1).

(4) AN UNQUALIFIED ASSURANCE.
"He that believeth on Him is not condemned: but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God" (John iii. 18).

(5) AN UNMISTAKABLE PROMISE.

"He that heareth My Word, and believeth on Him that sent Me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life" (John v. 24).

(6) AN UNSPEAKABLE PRIVILEGES.

"Herein is love with us made perfect, that we may have boldness in the day of judgment; because as He is, so are we in this world" (I John iv. 17).

(7) AN UNRIVALLED QUESTION.

"Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died; yea rather, that is risen again, Who is even at the right hand of God, Who also maketh intercession for us" (Rom. viii. 34).

#2. Unto the Lord.

p. 43

CLEAVING UNTO THE LORD, THE LAW OF FAITH (Acts xi. 23).

LIVING UNTO THE LORD, THE LAW OF LIFE (Rom. xiv. 8).

MELODY UNTO THE LORD, THE LAW OF WORSHIP (Eph. v. 19).

SERVICE UNTO THE LORD, THE LAW OF WORK (Col. iii. 23).

MINISTERING UNTO THE LORD, THE LAW OF SERVICE (Acts xiii. 2).

COMMENDING UNTO THE LORD, THE LAW OF SYMPATHY (Acts xiv. 23).

GIVING UNTO THE LORD, THE LAW OF FELLOWSHIP (II Cor. viii. 5).

#3. Hope.
p. 44

(i.) THE SUBSTANCE OF HOPE.

(1) Christ (I Tim. i. 1).
(2) Salvation (I Thess. v. 8).
(3) Grace (I Pet. i. 13).
(4) Resurrection (Acts xxiii. 6).
(5) Eternal Life (Titus i. 2; iii. 7).
(6) Righteousness (Gal. v. 5).
(7) Glory (Col. i. 27).

(ii.) THE CHARACTERISTICS OF HOPE.

(1) Personal (Phil. i. 20; Rom. xv. 4; II Cor. iii. 12; I John iii. 3).
(2) Indwelling (I Pet. iii. 15).
(3) Living (I Pet. i. 3).
(4) Good (II Thess. ii. 16).
(5) Blessed (Titus ii. 13).
(6) Joyous (Rom. xii. 12).
(7) Emboldening (Rom. v. 5).

(iii.) THE CLAIMS OF HOPE.

(1) Confession (Heb. x. 23*).
(2) Boasting (Heb. iii. 6).
(3) Explanation (I Pet. iii. 15).
(4) Purity (I John iii. 3).
(5) Endurance (I Thess. i. 3).
(6) Assurance (Heb. vi. 11).
(7) Abundance (Rom. xv. 13).

(iv.) THE CONDITIONS OF HOPE.

(1) GOD is its AUTHOR (Rom. xv. 13; Eph. i. 18).
GOD as OBJECT (eis II Cor. i. 10*; Acts xxiv. 15; I Pet. i. 21).
GOD as FOUNDATION (epi I Tim. iv. 10*; v. 5*; vi. 17*; I Pet. i. 13; iii. 5*).
GOD as SPHERE (en I Cor. xv. 19).
(2) GOSPEL its REVELATION (Col. i. 23).
(3) SCRIPTURE its WARRANT (Acts xxvi. 6; Rom. xv. 4).
(4) CHRIST its SUSTENANCE (Col. i. 27).
(5) HOLY SPIRIT its SUPPLY (Rom. xv. 13).
(6) HEAVEN its INCENTIVE (Col. i. 5).
(7) FAITH its BASIS (Heb. xi. 1).

[* - The words “faith” and “trust” in these passages are translations of the word usually rendered “hope”.]

#4. “I go to prepare a place for you” (John xiv. 2).
p. 88

The Lord Jesus went to the places mentioned below that we might be saved:--

THE PLACE OF BETRAYAL . . . . .
“Judas also, which betrayed Him, knew the place” (John xviii. 2).

THE PLACE OF JUDGMENT . . . . .
“A place called . . . . . Gabbatha” (John xix. 13).

THE PLACE OF CONDEMNATION . . . . .
“A place called . . . . . Golgotha” (John xix. 17).

THE PLACE OF BURIAL AND TRIUMPH . . . . .
“In the place . . . . . was a garden” (John xix. 41).

#5. Meditation.
p. 151

(A) ITS OBJECT.
- (1) GOD'S WORD . . . . . Josh. i. 8; Psa. i. 2; cxix. 15, 23, 48, 78.
- (2) GOD'S WORK . . . . . Psa. lxxvii. 12; cxliii. 5.
- (3) GOD HIMSELF . . . . Psa. lxiii. 6; civ. 34 (Never self or sin).

(B) ITS NATURE
- (1) PERSONAL . . . Psa. civ. 34. \ (*Psa. lxxi. 24; *lxxvii. 12; *cxix. 27;
- (2) REAL . . . . . Psa. xlix. 3. } *Prov. vi. 22).
- (3) VERBAL . . . . . Psa. v. 1 / [* - Talk].

(C) ITS TIMES.
- (1) DAY . . . . . Psa. cxix. 97 . . . . . That is to say God first.
- (2) EVENING . . . Gen. xxiv. 63 . . . After work is done.
- (3) NIGHT . . . . . Psa. lxiii. 6 . . . . . That is to say God last.

(D) ITS ELEMENTS.
- (1) REMEMBRANCE OF THE PAST . . . . . Psa. cxix. 23.
- (2) REALIZATION OF THE PRESENT . . . Psa. cxix. 97.
- (3) RESOLVES FOR THE FUTURE . . . . . Psa. cxix. 15.

(E) ITS BLESSINGS.
- (1) SPIRITUAL STRENGTH . . . . . Psa. i. 2 . . . . . Power to resist.
- (2) SPIRITUAL SUCCESS . . . . . Josh. i. 8, 9 . . . Power to bless.
- (3) SPIRITUAL SATISFACTION . . . Psa. civ. 34 . . . Power to enjoy.

(F) ITS APPLICATION.

"Meditate upon these things; give thyself wholly to them; that thy profiting may appear to all" (I Tim. iv. 15).

#6. Pleasing God.
pp. 198, 199

I. THE STANDARD.
- (1) God (I Thess. iv. 1).
- (2) Not man (Gal. i. 10; I Thess ii. 4; Eph. vi. 6; Col. iii. 22).
- (3) Neighbour (Rom. xv. 2).
- (4) Not self (Rom. xv. 1).
- (5) Theo enopion. To God. In presence of God (Heb. xiii. 21; I John iii. 22).
- (6) Unsaved cannot please God (I Thess. ii. 15; Rom. viii. 8).

II. THE POSSIBILITY.
- (1) Our Lord realized it (Rom. xv. 3; John viii. 29).
- (2) So did Enoch (Heb. xi. 5).

III. THE AIM.

Whether present or absent (II Cor. v. 9).

IV. THE SCOPE.

Everything (John viii. 29).

V. THE MANIFESTATION.
- (1) Surrender ("acceptable", Rom. xii. 1).
- (2) Obedience (I John iii. 22; Col. iii. 20).
- (3) Worship (Heb. xii. 28 "acceptably" same as xiii. 21).
- (4) Self sacrifice (Heb. xiii. 16; Phil. iv. 18).
- (5) Service (Rom. xiv. 18: "acceptable" same as Heb. xiii. 21).
- (6) Walk (Eph. v. 8, 10; Col. i. 10; I Thess. iv. 1).

VI. THE RESULTS.
- (1) God's testimony (Heb. xi. 5).
- (2) Answer to prayer (I John iii. 22).
- (3) Personal experience (Rom. xii. 2; Eph. v. 10: proving and approving).

VII. THE SECRET--HOW.

The Epistle to the Romans.

#51. The two natures and the law (vii. 13-25).
pp. 30 - 37

We now have before us one of the most controversial passages in the Scriptures. The greatest commentators differ as to the true meaning of the passage. Is it the experience of the believer? Is it the experience of the unsaved? Is it to be limited to the Jew under law? Why is this experience recorded? How far was it personally true of the apostle? These questions demand an answer, but an answer that is given merely "out of our own heart" will be valueless and probably wrong. We must have first a scriptural preparation. We shall, therefore, pursue our usual course. First the structure, in order to perceive the subject-matter and scope; next the individual expression, the actual material of which the structure is composed; and then, the purpose for which the experience is recorded.

Rom. vii. 13-25, though in one sense complete in itself, is part of an argument and essentially connected with all that has gone before:--

Rom. vi. 1-14	deals with the dominion of sin and death.
Rom. vi. 15 - vii. 6	deals with the dominion of law.
Rom. vii. 7-12	rectifies any possible misinterpretation of the apostle's argument, and shows that the law is holy.
Rom. vii. 13-25	reveals that because the law is holy, or spiritual, and because the flesh is carnal, it is vain for any one to look to the law and its observance for deliverance; and this is proved by the experience of the apostle himself.

We may see this more clearly if the relationship of these two sections dealing with the nature of the law are set out as follows:--

Rom. vii. 6-25.

A | 6. STATEMENT.—We were delivered from the law.
B | 7. QUESTION.—Is the law sin?
C | 7. REPUDIATION.—God forbid (me genoito).
D | 7-12. ANSWER.—
| The law of God and the law of sin.
| The conflict.
| I died; unto death; slew me.
A | 12. STATEMENT.—The law is holy . . . . . just and good.
B | 13. QUESTION.—Was that which is good made death unto me?
C | 13. REPUDIATION.—God forbid (me genoito).
D | 13-25. ANSWER.—
| The law of God and the law of sin.
| The deliverance.
| The body of this death.

Many expositors seem to lose sight of the fact that the primary object of the apostle is to defend the law against the charge of any complicity with evil, and to show that, just as the stirring up of dormant sin by the law could not by any means be made to prove that the law itself was sin, so the law is still "good", even though the flesh is utterly unable to get good from it. This necessitates a further exposition of the relation of indwelling sin to the flesh, and leads to the conclusion that nothing can enable the believer to rise above its dominion other than a complete abandonment of all efforts by the flesh or in the law, and a complete standing in Christ and in the Spirit. The sequel, which contains this latter truth, is reserved for Rom. viii., and flows, legitimately, straight out of Rom. v., without reference to the four parenthetical questions of vi. and vii.

The developments of the answer in Rom. vii. 13-25 is not by any means easy to discover, but the following outline will be of some service by showing the salient features and their inter-relation.

Romans vii. 13-25.

A | 13. Sin manifested, working in me death.
B | 14. | a | The law is spiritual.
b | I am carnal, sold under sin.
C | 15-20. Sin in the flesh.
c | What I do I allow not, I hate.
d | No more I, but sin that dwelleth in me.
c | What I would I do not; I find not.
d | No more I, but sin that dwelleth in me.
C | 21-23. The law of sin in the members.
e | I find then a law.
f | I delight in the law of God after the inward man.
e | I see another law.
f | Bringing me captive to the law of sin in my members.
B | 24, 25. | b | Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?
a | I myself serve the law of God with the mind.
A | 25. Law of sin served by the flesh.

Let us not lose sight of the main proposition, for if we do, we shall become involved in a never-ending debate as to the nature of the man whose conflict is here described, which is subsidiary to the main theme. The main theme is the character of the law.

To the possible objection, "Is that which is good made death unto me?" the apostle replies, "No, it is the abuse of the commandment that leads to death, and this but reveals the exceeding sinfulness of sin that thus abuse it".

> "Was then that which is good made death unto me? God forbid. But sin, that it might appear sin, working death in me by that which is good; that sin by the commandment might become exceeding sinful" (Rom. vii. 13).

This "exceeding sinfulness of sin" is now shown in its relation to the law: "For we know that the law is spiritual" (Rom. vii. 14). This has already been demonstrated. The law is not merely occupied with external acts, but with internal motives: "Thou shalt not desire." A law that extends to the most secret desires of the heart, demands something more than a Pharisee's obedience. By its prohibition, it reveals the presence of unsuspected sin. And the presence of this sin demands an explanation. The explanation is given in verse 14: "But I am carnal, having been sold under sin."

It is important to adhere strictly to the tense of the verb here:--

> "I am carnal (present), having been sold" (perfect).

This is true of all men, saved and unsaved; it goes back to Adam and the fall. The question as to whether this particular verse refers to the saved or the unsaved will be discussed after the whole passage has been surveyed.

The carnal state which is the result of having been sold as a slave is manifested by the service that is rendered:--

> "For that which I work out, I know not; for that which I will not, I practice; but that which I hate, that do I. If then I do that which I do not will, I consent unto the law that it is good" (Rom. vii. 15, 16).

Whether the state of affairs here be taken as true of the believer, or of the unbeliever (see Rom. ii. 14, 15) it is important to see that, in spite of its failure as a means of righteousness and life, the law itself is recognized as "good". This is one of the points the apostle intends to made clear:--

> "Now then it is no longer I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me" (Rom. vii. 17).

Here we begin to meet another great problem, the problem of the ego ("I"). One cannot read the statements made by the apostle in these verses without arriving at the conclusion that the man under consideration has two egos. Too many opposing statements are made for the "I" to be considered as always conveying the same meaning. In verse 18 we read:--

> "For I know that in me (that is, in my flesh) dwelleth no good thing."

Here the word "me" is identified with "the flesh". Yet we also read in verse 22:--

> "I delight in the law of God after the inward man."

To delight in the law of God is a characteristic of the new man, not of the old. We must, therefore, recognize the presence of two natures in the one person. There are seven references in this section to the "will", and every reference shews it to be on the side of good and against evil. This is a factor in the evidence as to whether the person here considered is a believer or not.

Thelo, "I will".

A | vii. 15. "For what I would, that do I not."
B | vii. 16, 17. "If then I do that which I would not . . . . . sin indwelling."
C | vii. 18. "For to will is present with me."
D | vii. 19. "For the good that I would, I do not."
A | vii. 19. "The evil which I would not, that I do."
B | vii. 20. "If I do that I would not . . . . . sin indwelling."
C | vii. 21. "When i would do good, evil is present with me."

"I find then a law . . . . . I see another law" (Rom. vii. 21-23).

What law is this? It is not given a specific name until we reach Rom. viii. 2, and there it is revealed as "the law of sin and death". The cry of the wretched man for deliverance from "this body of death" will only be answered completely at the resurrection:--

> "And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body" (Rom. viii. 23).

There are eight references to the "body" in Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39, and they are arranged in two sets of four. The last reference in the first set is the cry: "Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" (vii. 24). The last reference in the second set gives the answer: "Waiting for the adoption, the redemption of the body" (viii. 23).

The conclusion reached in Rom. vii. 25 is:--

> "So then with the mind I myself serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin."

Is there any reasonable doubt as to whom "I myself" represents? This "I" delights in the law of God after the inner man; it is the true "self" that serves the law of God.

While there is much that still requires investigation, we must not defer the question any longer as to the nature of the man who is passing through the experience of Rom. vii. 14-25. One of the strong objections to the suggestion that this experience can be true of a believer, loses its power when we realize that the doctrine of "death to sin" does not relate to character or conduct, but to state before God. Character grows out of this new state, but must not be confused with it. And again, we must distinguish between death to the guilt of sin, and death to its power.

The reader may perhaps suggest that the man described in this section of Rom. vii. is surely not free from the dominion of sin. Yet we must agree that, even though the members of his body and his flesh cause him great conflict, his mind, his will, his delight, the service of "I myself", are always Godward, and in spite of his wretchedness, he looks forward with thankfulness to his deliverance. Should the objection be raised, that no one who is saved is "carnal", it is enough to refer to the "saints" at Corinth (I Cor. iii. 3).

Reviewing the statements of verses 16 and 17 in his book on Sanctification, Fraser writes:--

> "What here would strike any mind free from bias is that this 'I' on the side of holiness against sin, is the most prevailing."

The words of verse 22: "I delight in the law of God after the inward man", demand the presence of the new life, for "the carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be" (Rom. viii. 7).

In verses 7-12 the apostle speaks of his unregenerate days when, in his fancied security, he could say, "I was alive without the law once". But with verse 14, the tense of the verb changes from the past to the present. The revelation here of the exceeding sinfulness of sin is in agreement with the apostle's instructions in other epistles. The Colossians saints who were "made meet" and were to be presented "holy and without blame" were taught, nevertheless, the need of mortifying their members on the earth. The Ephesian saints, while "accepted in the Beloved" and "seated together in the heavenlies" were, nevertheless, warned against some of the grossest sins of the flesh (Eph. v.).

In three ways the language of the apostle in Rom. vii. 14-25 is seen to be the language of the saint:--

(1) He "hates" sin.—This no unsaved man can really do.
(2) He "delights" in the law of God.—All such are "blessed" (Psa. i. 2).
(3) "He looks for deliverance to Christ alone through grace."

"Blessed be God", says Romaine, "for the seventh chapter of Romans.

There is a passage in Galatians that covers the whole ground in Rom. vii. and viii., and shews where the experiences of Rom. vii. fall short and, how Rom. viii. brings in completion:--

> "Walk in the Spirit (see Rom. viii.) and ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh. For the flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh (Rom. vii. 15-23): and these are contrary the one to the other; so that ye cannot do the things that ye would (Rom. vii. 15-19). But if ye be led of the Spirit (Rom. viii. 14), ye are not under law" (Gal. v. 16-18).

As we have said before, the true sequel to Rom. v. is Rom. viii., but the ideal often outruns the experimental. The ideal in the case of Israel at the Exodus was that they should pass out of Egypt, cross the Red Sea, and within a comparatively short time enter the land of promise. The actual fact was that they wandered for forty years in the wilderness. The ideal experience would be for the believer, who is delivered as in Rom. v. 12-21, to pass straight on to the sphere of the Spirit and resurrection power "more than conqueror". The actual experience, however, is that some lean towards the licence so strongly censured in Rom. vi., while others, failing to discern that so long as they possess mortal bodies they still possess that which at any time can be the instrument of sin which dwells in their flesh, pass through a severe conflict which does not issue in the complete deliverance of Rom. viii. until the necessary lesson has been learned with much agony of mind and spirit. While they could have passed straight away to the deliverance from the law of sin and death by the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus (Rom. viii. 2), they learn, for a time, by experience what that law of sin and death is (Rom. vii. 23). They are led to rejoice more completely in the liberty of the children of God (Rom. viii. 21) by experiencing something of the captivity to the law of sin that is in the members of the body (Rom. vii. 23).

While, therefore, Paul's experience may primarily set forth the vain endeavour of a Jew to perform that law which has "enlightened his eyes and converted his soul" (Psa. xix. 7-9), and so show to all mankind that the law can neither save, justify nor sanctify, the passage also sets forth in clear characters the warfare that must ever go on between flesh and spirit, until the day of complete deliverance and the redemption of the body.

> "The warfare between the flesh and the spirit, described in this chapter, has greatly exercised the ingenuity of men not practically acquainted with its truth. Few are willing to believe that all mankind are naturally so bad as they are here represented, and it is fondly imagined that the best of men are much better than this description would prove them to be. Every effort of ingenuity has accordingly been resorted to, to divert the apostle's statements from the obvious conclusion to which they lead, and so to modify his doctrine as to make it worthy of acceptance by human wisdom. But they have laboured in vain . . . . . Every Christian has in his own breast a commentary on the apostle's language. If there be anything of which he is fully assured, it is that Paul has in this passage described his experience; and the more the believer advances in knowledge and holiness, the more does he loathe himself as by nature a child of corruption which still so closely cleaves to him" (Haldane).

* * * * * * *

> "Thus does the Holy Spirit lay bare to our view His own explanation of the origin and nature of the experience possessed by every soul which is the subject of the grace of God, and which has the gift of the new nature as the result and sign of God's justifying . . . . . Those who fail to learn this lesson as to the conflict of the law, first with the old nature (vii. 7-12), and afterwards (21-25) with the new nature, will not only be in constant perplexity themselves, but will fall into that error of doctrine which is corrected in the epistle to the Galatians chapter iii. 3. Having begun with the truth as to the new nature (called 'spirit') they will, if they depart from it, seek to improve the old nature. This is the error which Gal. iii. 3 corrects, 'Are ye so senseless? having begun in the spirit (in the new nature) are ye now being perfected in flesh?' (i.e. in the old nature). This is what thousands are doing everywhere around us. They are seeking to perfect, or, at least improve, the old nature. Not seeing the truth or reality of the two natures, they are seeking to improve the only one which they are acquainted with. This is ever the work of all who are ignorant of what the Spirit is saying to the churches. Be they Buddhists, Romanists, Perfectionists, they are all alike endeavouring to convert the 'flesh' into 'spirit', to subdue the 'flesh', and by all kinds of arts, and artifices, and rules and regulations, pledges, and badges, to improve the old nature. All alike formulate 'rules for holy living, ignorant of the fact which lies before us in this scripture that the old nature knows no rules, and that the new nature needs no rules. Instead of reckoning the old nature to have died with Christ, they are ever seeking to put it to death! Instead of reckoning that it was crucified with Christ upon the cross, they are exhorting us to crucify it for ourselves. When God crucified it with Christ, He did it once and for all. But those who know nothing of this, tell us to crucify it. They do not tell us how we are to do it; but knowing how futile is the effort, they tell us we must do it every day. But, no! once would be enough if it could be done at all. And, thank God, it has been done. HE has done it Himself on Calvary; and now, we, in spite of all our conflict, in spite of the flesh (the old nature) lusting against the spirit (the new nature) and the spirit against the flesh; in spite of the fact that these are contrary the one to the other, so that we cannot do the evil which the flesh would have us do, and we cannot do the good that the spirit would have us do; in spite of this conflict, we find 'peace with God' and rest in the truth—that the child of God has his old nature, which can produce no good thing—and he has a new nature, which 'doth not commit sin' (I John iii. 9), 'sinneth not' (I John v. 18). And, further, that God reckons the old nature as having died with Christ, and as having therefore no dominion over us, though the conflict in actual experience is ever present with us. Those who learn this lesson have learned that the old nature is so bad that nothing can ever improve it, and that the new nature is so perfect that it needs no improvement. It is 'spirit', and its life cannot be 'deepened'. It is 'newness of life', and cannot be made 'higher'." (Dr. E. W. Bullinger—Church Epistles).

We make no apology for this lengthy quotation from the witness of that doughty warrior, Dr. Bullinger, and only wish that there were more to-day to testify to the reality of the two natures in the child of God.

We must now close this somewhat lengthy article; the supreme importance of the subject must be our justification for the space occupied. We are now ready to enter into the liberty and blessedness of Rom. viii. May our studies by abundantly blessed to us all.

#52. The spirit of Sonship (viii. 1-39).

pp. 70 - 74

Our earlier studies have taught us that Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39, the inner portion of this epistle, has its own special significance. It is concerned not so much with sins as with sin; not so much with the fruit as with the root; not so much with individual and multiplied transgression as with one initial sin that brought condemnation to the race; not so much with faith and believing as with the thought of being transferred from the headship of Adam to that of Christ. The emphasis is upon sphere—"in Adam", "in Christ Jesus"; and atmosphere—"in the flesh", "in the spirit". We have also seen that chapters vi. and vii. are parenthetical. They take up and dispose of a series of problems arising out of superabounding grace. They reveal the utter inability of the most enlightened conscience to free itself from the dominion of sin, and from the law of sin that is in the members.

As there are so many of God's children who go through the experiences described in Rom. vii., it is blessedly true to speak of "stepping out of Rom. vii. into Rom. viii."; but, while this may be true to the experience of many, experience is not the rule of our faith. It has been said that experience is like the tail-light of a ship; it can only illumine the past. The experience of Israel was a wandering in the wilderness for forty years before entry into the promised land; but a true conception of God's purpose would have seen only the shortest possible interval between the exodus from Egypt and the entry into rest. While, therefore, we most gladly agree that the glorious words of Rom. viii. 1 do often follow as God's answer of peace to the wretched man of Rom. vii. 24 (and, indeed, they could just as well follow on from Rom. vii. 6 or vi. 14), the real transition is from Rom. v. 21. The key-word is "condemnation", which in the Greek is katakrima. While the verb katakrino occurs elsewhere in the N.T., God has used the noun katakrima only three times—twice in Rom. v. to tell us how condemnation came in, and once in Rom. viii. to assure us that in Christ it has passed away. The following will illustrate the relation of the four chapters:--

CONDEMNATION (Rom. v. 16, 18).	THE FOUR QUESTIONS of ROM. VI. and VII.	NO CONDEMNATION (Rom. viii. 1).

The question here is so important that we must set out each passage in full:--

> "And not as through one that sinned, is the free gift. For indeed the judgment was by one unto condemnation, but the gift by grace is of many offences unto justification" (Rom. v. 16).
>
> "Therefore, indeed, as through one offence judgment came unto all men unto condemnation, so also through one righteousness the free gift came upon all men unto a justification of life" (Rom. v. 18).

Before quoting Rom. viii. 1, we draw attention to the fact that in each case the alternative to condemnation is a "justification", and that the word so translated is dikaioma. What this involves we must leave for the moment; we just wish to ensure here that the fact is noticed and recorded:--

> "There is, therefore, now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus . . . . . that the righteousness (dikaioma) of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh but after the spirit" (Rom. viii. 1-4).

Before we proceed, however, we must look at Rom. viii. as a whole, and discover, if possible, the underlying structure. At this point the reader may interject: Why spend time over this when it has already been done by others? We would assure the reader that we have considered most carefully everything on this subject that has come to our notice. The pressure under which these articles are written makes us jealous of minutes, to say nothing of the hours that the structure of a passage like Rom. viii. might cost us. We seldom speak about ourselves in this magazine, but we desire that every reader should appreciate the help that a true understanding of the trend of a passage is to its fullest unfolding.

Most of us have probably noted the opening and closing themes of Rom. viii.: "No condemnation" and "No separation": and it would have been easy to have adopted this view of the passage without further investigation. One feature, however, has always presented itself as central to the teaching of Rom. viii., and that is the prominence given to "adoption". In verse 15 we have the "spirit of adoption"; and in verse 23 we have the "adoption" itself, "to wit, the redemption of the body". Then, too, we have the "spirit of bondage again to fear", the deliverance from "the bondage of corruption", and the "liberty of the glory of the children of God". (In considering this chapter, the reader must remember that the word "adoption" is a compound in which huios, meaning "son", stands first. It means literally "placing as a son"). The earlier part of Rom. viii. is full of references to "the Spirit", which seem to reach their climax in this "sonship spirit" of Rom. viii. 15. The cry "Abba, Father" is evidently crucial too. And so, to cut a long story short, with these facts as guides, the following sevenfold outline based upon the recurrence of the word "Son" is the result:--

Romans viii. 1-39.

A | 1-4. No condemnation. God sent His own SON (huios).
B | 5-15. Led by Spirit of God. SONS now (huios).
C | 15-17. Spirit Itself bears witness. SONSHIP (huiosthesia).
D | 17-21. Suffering and Glory. Manifestation of SONS (huios).
C | 22-28. Spirit Itself intercedes. SONSHIP (huiosthesia).
B | 29, 30. Conformed to the image of His SON then (huios).
A | 31-39. Who condemns? He spared not His own SON (huios).

Just as the chapter opens with a statement concerning the believer's immunity from condemnation, so it closes with the same fact, and upon the same ground, namely, the gift of God's Son:--

> "There is, therefore, now no CONDEMNATION to them which are in Christ Jesus . . . . . God sending his Son . . . . . CONDEMNED sin in the flesh" (Rom. viii. 1-3).
>
> "He that spared not His own Son . . . . . Who is he that CONDEMNETH? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, Who is even at the right hand of God, Who also maketh intercession for us" (Rom. viii. 32-34).

This, then, is the beginning and end of the matter, even as it is the beginning and end of the structure—"His own Son".

The next fact that emerges is that all who are thus blessed are "sons of God" too. The member marked B | 5-15 is full of references to the Spirit, the spirit of resurrection anticipating now in this life and in these mortal bodies that glorious consummation when we shall in actual fact be "conformed to the image of His Son" in resurrection glory. And so the two corresponding members read:--

B | 5-15. "Led by Spirit of God. SONS now (huios)."
B | 29, 30. "Conformed to the image of His SON then (huios)."

Added to this leading by the Spirit of God is His "witness" and His "intercession":--

"The Spirit Itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God" (Rom. viii. 16).

"The Spirit Itself . . . . . maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God" (Rom. viii. 26, 27).

This "witness" and intercession" are closely associated with the fact that these sons of God are not yet in glory, but here in the midst of a groaning creation. They are strengthened to suffer because of the glory that is to come; they are "saved by hope"; and while they often know not what to pray for, they do know that all things work together for good. It is in this realm that the witness and intercession of the Spirit have their place. In the structure it will be seen that the word SON gives place to SONSHIP, which is the word "adoption" in the A.V.:--

C | 15-17. Spirit Itself bears witness. SONSHIP (huiosthesia).
C | 22-28. Spirit Itself intercedes. SONSHIP (huiosthesia).

This brings us to the centre of the structure:--

D | 17-21. Suffering and Glory. Manifestation of SONS (huios).

Until the reign of sin and death actually ceases, until creation itself emerges into the liberty of the glory of the children of God, the day of complete emancipation for the believer must be future. For the present, it is enough that we have passed from Adam to Christ, that there is now no condemnation, that during this pilgrimage we have the witness and the intercession of the Spirit, and that with all our ignorance of what to pray for, we know that all things work together for good to them that love God.

We commend this outline to the prayerful interest of the reader, believing that, as it is based upon the occurrence of words used by the Holy Spirit and not upon headings of our own devising, it does "divide aright" this precious portion of truth. It shews us the seven great sections into which the subject-matter falls, and provides us with well-defined bounds for our subsequent studies. We hope to deal with the opening section A | 1-4 in our next article.

#53. The Law of the Spirit of Life (viii. 1-4).
pp. 117 - 124

In the preceding study we surveyed the whole of chapter viii., and discovered its sevenfold division of theme, based upon the emphasis given to the idea of "sonship". Sonship is the antithesis in Scripture of slavery. The coming in of sin and death and their subsequent dominion over man, robbed Adam and his seed of their "place as sons".

There are some of God's children who do not speak of Adam as a "son of God", for fear lest some unscriptural deductions should follow. While we must emulate their desire to preserve the truth of God, we must not "put out our hand to stay the ark of God" by veiling any portion of His truth. Luke iii. 23-38 gives the genealogy of Christ, and traces it back through David, "which was the son of Jesse", Abraham, which was the son of Terah", Shem, "which was the son of Noah", and Adam, "which was the son of God". Adam was made in the image of God, though that image was subsequently marred through sin. It is yet to be restored in resurrection, as Rom. viii. 29 reveals: "For whom He did foreknow, He also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of His Son."

The creation, when Adam sinned, became subjected to vanity (Rom. viii. 20), and the redeemed share its groaning until the day of redemption. Spiritual powers intervened in Eden to separate man from his Maker, but his position "in Christ" is far more secure than that of unfallen Adam could ever have been, and "neither death, nor life, nor principalities, nor powers" shall be able to separate from the love of God those who are restored in Christ. The alternating references to "flesh" and "spirit" that occupy so large a place in the first half of Rom. viii. deal with these two spheres; the spirit of bondage being that of the flesh, and the spirit of adoption whereby we cry "Abba, Father", being the sonship spirit of resurrection, which is the dominant note of this section.

The section before us is that covered by Rom. viii. 1-4, and there we meet the first and most wonderful definition of the spirit in which we live, move and have our renewed being. Most editors of the Greek Text agree that the words of Rom. viii. 1: "Who walk not after the flesh but after the spirit" are an interpolation introduced into the text from verse 4. It may be that some felt that the statement of Rom. viii. 1 needed some modifying, that freedom from condemnation, if proclaimed without some limits and qualifications, would be harmful. This is exactly the opposition to free grace that the apostle anticipated and met in Rom. vi. 1 and 15. Bloomfield expresses this uneasiness by rendering the words "Who walk" by "If they do walk"; and he quotes other writers who suggest "So that they do but walk", "showing that justification through Christ's death can only be made effectual by sanctification through His Spirit". With all due regard to this wholesome association of "doctrine" and "manner of life", the introduction of conditions and qualifying terms here is unscriptural and subversive. Freedom from condemnation is not conditional upon the walk of the believer; it is entirely conditional upon the work of God's Son. We must be free, before we can think of walking according to the spirit. While we were in slavery, we were in the flesh, and could not please God.

The reader may remember that we drew attention in the preceding article to the fact that it is "justification" that is set over against "condemnation" in Rom. v. 16, 18 and viii. 1-4, and not "sanctification". In all this, of course, we have no word to say against sanctification—as the reader will see from the articles under that heading. What we seek to do is to keep each truth in its appointed place, and thus to be unashamed of our work.

The structure of Rom. viii. 1-4 shows most clearly the one and only ground of our exemption from condemnation:--

Romans viii. 1-4.

A | 1. NO CONDEMNATION. In Christ Jesus.
B | a | 2. The two laws. |
The law of the spirit of life.
The law of sin and death.
b | 3. What the law could not do. |
The law, weak through the flesh.
God, sending His Son in the flesh.
A | 3. CONDEMNATION. In the flesh.
B | b | 4. What has been done. |
The righteousness of the law.
Fulfilled in us.
a | 4. The two walks. |
Who walk not after the flesh.
But after the spirit.

We are saved by hope (viii. 24), we are waiting for the adoption (viii. 23), we groan within ourselves together with the whole creation (viii. 23), but we do not have to await the day of glory to be sure that condemnation is for ever past. "There is, therefore, now no condemnation." Let us not miss this blessed fact:--

"But NOW the righteousness of God without the law is manifested" (Rom. iii. 21).
"Being NOW justified by His blood, we shall be saved from wrath" (Rom. v. 9).
"By Whom we have NOW received the reconciliation" (Rom. v. 11).
"But NOW being made free from sin . . . ye have your fruit unto holiness" (Rom. vi. 22).
"The life I NOW live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God" (Gal. ii. 20).

We are acquitted now, we are free from condemnation now. Without the assurance of a present position of acceptance before God, sanctification, growth in grace, service and walk would be impossible. We should still be "in the flesh" and so unable to please God. The passage in Rom. vi. 22 quoted above gives us the true sequence:--

(1) Now made free from sin.
(2) Become servants to God.
(3) Fruit unto holiness.
(4) The end, everlasting life.

The words, "In Christ Jesus", belong not only to the statement of verse 1; they are equally necessary when revealing the power that accomplishes this deliverance, as revealed in verse 2: "For the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made free from the law of sin and death" (Rom. viii. 2). What is this "law of the spirit of life"? Many understand it as referring to the sanctifying influence of the Holy Spirit on the believer:--

> "The dictate of or inclination imparted by the Spirit, Who quickens those that once were dead in trespasses and sins, and gives them the predominant inclination to live in Christ" (Moses Stuart).

But surely this interpretation is seriously at fault. In what way can it possibly be taught that our subsequent growth in grace or "inclination imparted by the Spirit" is the effectual cause of our freedom from condemnation? We are not freed from condemnation because we are sanctified. We are freed because of the finished work of Christ, accomplished on our behalf while we were "yet sinners", and in order that we might be sanctified. Let us not intrude anything of ourselves, not even the new life given by God, into this solemn transaction, in which Christ alone must be the one great Worker.

In considering the expressions, "the law of the spirit of life" and "the law of sin and death", we must remember that the word "law" is often used in the Scriptures in a sense that is fuller and deeper than implied in the law of Moses. In the epistle to the Romans, while the earlier references to "law" (chapters ii.-vii.) are mainly concerned with the law of Moses, at verse 21 of chapter vii. we pass on to the discovery of another law, a law that works within: "I find then a law, that, when I would do good, evil is present with me." This is a reference to the "law of sin and death" from which those who are "in Christ Jesus" are now freed. Under this head may be included several other passages in Rom. vii.:--

> "I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members" (Rom. vii. 23).
> "So then with the mind I myself serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin" (Rom. vii. 25).

The working of the law of the spirit of life is also seen in this chapter:--

> "Now then it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me" (Rom. vii. 17).
> "To will is present with me" (Rom. vii. 18).
> "I delight in the law of God after the inward man" (Rom. vii. 22).
> "With the mind I myself serve the law of God" (Rom. vii. 25).

It is one of the attributes of "law" that it "has dominion", and, as Rom. vii. 1 makes clear, "dominion as long as man lives". The dominion of the law of sin and death is implied in Rom. v. and in Rom. vi., as the following passages shew:--

> "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin" (Rom. v. 2).
> "Death reigned" (Rom. v. 14).
> "By one offence death reigned by one" (Rom. v. 17).
> "By the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation" (Rom. v. 18).
> "By one man's disobedience many were made sinners" (Rom. v. 19).
> "Sin hath reigned unto death" (Rom. v. 21).
> "Knowing that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him" (Rom. vi. 9).

"Let not sin, therefore, reign in your mortal body" (Rom. vi. 12).
"Sin shall not have dominion over you; for ye are not under the law, but under grace" (Rom. vi. 14).

In these passages we have the operation of the law of sin and death, a law that has dominion over every one that is "in Adam", a law that reigns in the "mortal body", a law that is "in the members". Until "this mortal puts on immortality", the presence of that law of sin and death will be felt. We are not yet freed from its presence or its influence, but we are freed now from its condemnation. This present freedom is a blessed anticipation of that future "freedom of the glory of the children of God" when the spirit of adoption shall give place to actuality, and the members of this mortal body, which have been the seat and medium of sin, shall be laid aside for ever.

If the "law of sin and death" is that dominion and reign of sin brought in by the offence and disobedience of Adam, the "law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus" which sets us free is that reign of grace made possible by the "one righteousness" and the "obedience of One" Who bears the titles of "The Last Adam" and "The Second Man". We have already set out the references in Rom. v. and vi. to the law of sin and death that issued in our condemnation; we must now set out, in contrast to this, the glorious law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, that issues in our freedom from condemnation:--

"The judgment was by one to condemnation, but the free gift is of many offences unto justification" (Rom. v. 16).
"By obedience of one shall many be made righteous" (Rom. v. 19).
"Even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. v. 21).

In I Cor. xv., where death and immortality are in view, we read: "The first man, Adam, was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a life-giving Spirit" (verse 45).

Here, in the risen Christ, we find the "law of the spirit of life". "In Adam" all die; the law of sin and death operates, and condemnation is inevitable. "In Christ" all are made alive; the law of the spirit of life operates, and acquittal from condemnation must follow.

It almost seems that God has so worded Rom. viii. 1-4 that there shall be no possibility of intruding the thought of the believer's sanctification, for the apostle immediately follows with another explanation. Verses 2 and 3 both commence with the word "for":--

"FOR the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death" (Rom. viii. 2).
"FOR . . . . . God sending His Son . . . . . condemned sin in the flesh" (Rom. viii. 3).

We are not left in doubt as to the meaning attached to the word "free" in Rom. viii. 2. In various forms, the word occurs in Romans seven times:--

"Being made free from sin, ye became the servants of righteousness" (Rom. vi. 18).
"When ye were the servants of sin, ye were free from righteousness" (Rom. vi. 20).
"But now being made free from sin" (Rom. vi. 22).

> "But if her husband be dead, she is free from that law" (Rom. vii. 3).
>
> "The law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death" (Rom. viii. 2).
> "Because the creature itself also shall be set free from the bondage of corruption into the freedom of the glory of the children of God" (Rom. viii. 21).

Each of these passages illuminates viii. 2, but perhaps vii. 3 is most to the point. Nothing that a wife could do, could save her from being called an adulteress should she marry another man, except one thing, and that beyond her control—the death of her husband, and with him, the death of the law to her. Nothing that we can do or that can be done in us, can ever set us free from condemnation, except the death of the law to us, and our death to it. This, as we rejoice to know, is what has actually taken place. We are called upon to reckon as God has reckoned. By virtue of our union with Christ, when He died, we died with Him; when He arose, we arose with Him; and we are free.

This, however, does not contradict the fact that in our flesh dwelleth no good thing. Our freedom from condemnation and the dominion of sin, does not mean sinless perfection in the flesh. Experimental sanctification and unqualified acquittal must not be confused. Full freedom still awaits the glory, when mortality shall be swallowed up and the spirit of adoption, which is the earnest we now possess, gives place to the adoption itself, the redemption of the body. We live in the power of the risen life, but not yet in its actuality. The law, however, could not give this freedom. It spoke only of complete obedience or death. God's remedy was the gift of His Son, Who took upon Himself flesh and blood, was made like unto His brethren, and was made sin for us, Who knew no sin. Hence the remarkable words used in Rom. viii. 3: "God sending His own Son in the likeness of sin's flesh." The flesh was real, but it was "in the likeness of sin's flesh"; for He knew no sin. In that flesh, God condemned sin. "In the body of His flesh through death" we find our freedom, our justification, our newness of life.

There is one further point that demands attention, and we must ask the reader's patience a little longer, as the subject is so vital:-- > "That the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit" (Rom. viii. 4).

Most commentators see in this verse the resulting sanctification of the believer, now set free by the death of Christ. It is true that the whole law is summed up in "love" (see Rom. xiii. 8; Gal. v. 13, 14), and that the believer can now begin to obey that law which previously proved too much for his weak and sinful nature. All this is true, but we believe it is not the primary truth set forth here. The primary truth is not that we are set free from the law that we might fulfil the law, but rather that we are set free from the law to stand upon a higher plane altogether. Our justification is by "a righteousness of God apart from law". We learn that sin shall have no more dominion over us, for we "are not under the law, but under grace". Christ is "the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth". Let us, therefore, not be too eager to fasten the yoke of the law upon the liberated children of God.

The word "righteousness" in Rom. viii. 4 is dikaioma, and means "the requirement of the law", "the law's right", the thing the law demanded, its "sentence". The first occurrence in Romans has nothing to do with endeavouring to obey the law, but with recognizing the fact that where the law is broken, the law requires death: "Who knowing the dikaioma (the just requirement) of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death" (Rom. i. 32). The law, however, in the first place requires obedience, as the second reference indicates: "If the uncircumcision keep the just requirement of the law" (Rom. ii. 26). The important point, however, for us to remember, is that when once we have broken the law, the just requirement of the law is not then some future obedience on our part, but "death" and "condemnation". For the sinner, law-keeping is at an end; condemnation is all that is left.

Both senses of the word are found blended in the work of Christ in Rom. v. 16, 18, where dikaioma is twice rendered "justification". In all cases, the word carries with it the idea of a "sentence", a sentence either of death or of life.

The just requirement or sentence of the law has been fulfilled in us, for the Son of God was condemned for the sin under which we stood condemned. By this glorious redemption we are set free. And the fact that we who once lay under sentence of death are now no longer under law, but under grace, no longer walking after the flesh, but after the spirit, shows that the law's claims have been satisfied, and we are righteously free.

The full significance of the expression "fulfilled in us" we must leave for our next article, as the subsequent section (verses 5-15) is largely an exposition of the apostle's meaning. Meanwhile, may we give all the glory for our deliverance to Him Who was delivered up because of our offences, and was raised again because of our justification.

#54. The spirit of Christ (viii. 5-15).

pp. 165 - 171

The opening section of Rom. viii. sounds the jubilee for all those who were slaves of sin and are now "in Christ Jesus". Outside of Christ, there is no emancipation. To refuse the protection of the blood of the Passover Lamb is to remain in bondage worse than that of Egypt. "No condemnation" is true of us, because "condemnation" was true of Him the Son of God. The righteous sentence of the law has been fulfilled in the redeemed in the Person of their Saviour. "By His stripes we are healed."

The sphere of condemnation is the flesh, and unites us with Adam. The sphere of emancipation is the spirit, and unites us with Christ. The possession of life is indicated by activity. We rise from our shackles to "walk in newness of life", and to "serve in newness of spirit".

We now come to the section Rom. viii. 5-15. We must spare no pains and use all legitimate means to seek a true understanding of this important passage. Everything in it revolves round the "flesh" and the "spirit":--

The flesh.	The spirit.
For they that are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh;	but they that are after the spirit, the things of the spirit;
Here (in the passage above) the emphasis is upon the mind.
For to be carnally minded is death; Because the carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be.	but to be spiritually minded is life and peace.
Here we have death and enmity over against life and peace.
But ye are not in the flesh, Now if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of His. And if Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin.	but in the spirit, if so be that the spirit of God dwell in you. but the spirit is life because of righteousness.
Here we see the distinction between being in the flesh and in the spirit.
	But if the spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies, because of His spirit that dwelleth in you.
"Jesus" refers to the Lord Himself, "Christ" associates His people with Him, and the quickening of the mortal body shows the foretaste of the resurrection enjoyed now, the "spirit of adoption".
Therefore, brethren, we are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh. For if ye live after the flesh ye shall die.	but if ye through the spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live.
Once again the issues of life and death are brought before us.
For ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear.	For as many as are led by the spirit of God, they are the sons of God.
The flesh is enslaved, but the spirit is the free spirit of sonship.

Before we attempt an exposition of these words, which are full of meaning for us all, let us see the general disposition of the subject-matter in the structural form.

Romans viii. 5-15.
Flesh and Bondage. Spirit and Sonship.

A | Flesh v. spirit (5-8).
a1 | Flesh. Its mind.
b1 | Spirit. Its mind.
a2 | Flesh and its mind is death.
b2 | Spirit and its mind is life and peace.
a3 | Flesh and its mind is enmity against God and cannot please Him
B | The IF of the indwelling spirit (9-13)
c | IF spirit indwell: not in flesh.
d | IF any man have not the spirit of Christ.
e | IF Christ be in you; body dead; spirit life.
e | IF spirit dwell in you; body quickened.
d | IF live after the flesh; die.
c | IF mortify by the spirit; live.
A | Slave v. sons (14, 15).
a | Sons of God are led by the Spirit of God.
b | Spirit of slavery and fear.

The closing verses of Rom. vii. have already acquainted us with what the apostle calls the "law of my mind", which is in conflict with the law of sin in the members. The renewed child of God allies himself with this new mind:--

> "So then with the mind I MYSELF serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin" (Rom. vii. 25).
> "If then I do that which I would not, I consent unto the law that it is good. Now then it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me" (Rom. vii. 16, 17).
> "Now if I do that I would not, it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me" (Rom. vii. 20).
> "I delight in the law of God after the inward man" (Rom. vii. 22).

The reader will have observed that in both chapter vii. and chapter viii., we have references to some thing or some power "indwelling". If we accept the reading of the Vatican MS we shall find that the words enoikeo en ("indwell in") occur in vii. 17 and viii. 11, and oikeo followed by en in vii. 18, 20 and viii. 9, 11:--

> "It is no more I that do it, but sin that indwells in me" (Rom. vii. 17).
> "He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by His spirit that indwelleth in you" (Rom. viii. 11).

These, then, are the two "indwellers": sin in the flesh, as the active agent dominating life and all its outgoings, and the spirit of Him Who raised up Christ from the dead indwelling in us. We are "in the spirit", if it can be said of us that the spirit of God dwells in us:--

> "Ye are not in the flesh, but in the spirit, if so be that the spirit of God dwell in you" (Rom. viii. 9).

The apostle had learned that in his flesh dwelt no good thing, so that he did not look to the flesh to accomplish anything that would be acceptable to God. What is said of the flesh indwelt by sin, is said also of the mind of the flesh. It is enmity against God. It is not subject to the law of God. It cannot please God. It seems, therefore, that the flesh indwelt by sin, the members dominated by the law of sin, and the mind of the flesh which cannot please God, are associated together as closely as the spirit, soul and body of one person.

We await the redemption of the body, which will take place at the resurrection, when the sons of God shall be manifested, and we shall enter into the liberty of the glory of the children of God. This is the adoption. We receive now the "spirit of adoption". We are led by the spirit of God, and are thus indicated as sons of God here and now. And just as we look for a literal and physical resurrection in the future, so the indwelling of the spirit of Him that raised up Christ from the dead, gives us now the "spirit of adoption", and quickens our mortal bodies. That this refers to "the life I now live in the flesh" the apostle makes clear in Gal. ii. 20.

It is the blessed privilege of the believer in Eph. ii. 5 to be "quickened together with Christ". This precedes the thought of being "raised together" and must be considered separately. This does not, of course, exempt the saint from death—"the body is dead because of sin". But without this quickening, "life unto God" before resurrection would be impossible. "Walk in newness of life" follows being "raised up from the dead" (Rom. vi. 4):--

> "Yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God" (Rom. vi. 13).

We would refer the reader back to #36 of this series where the key-word "Spirit" is dealt with. The sphere of the new life is there seen to be "in spirit", its nature is seen to be "resurrection", and its expression "sonship".

It is well for us to remember that, just as the law has no more claim upon us, so of the flesh it can be said: "We are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh" (Rom. viii. 12).

Let us now look at the two sections of Rom. viii. A | 1-4 and B | 5-15. We observe that, in the first section, freedom from condemnation is associated with the "law of the spirit of life"; and in the second section we read: "The spirit is life because of righteousness." The positional teaching of Rom. viii. 1 and 2 is "In Christ Jesus", while the positional teaching of the subsequent section is "The spirit of God dwelling in you". Freedom from the "law of sin and death" permits the indwelling of the spirit of Him "Who raised up Christ from the dead", to quicken even the mortal bodies of the saints. The inability of the law because of the flesh (Section A) is linked up with the incorrigible character of the mind of the flesh: "It is not subject to the law of God (Section B). Walk according to the flesh and according to the spirit is seen to be largely a result of the "mind", the mind of the flesh leading to death, the mind of the spirit leading to life and peace.

Once again let us sound out the note of freedom that the apostle strikes here:--

> "The law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus has made me FREE" (Rom. viii. 2).
> "For ye have not received the spirit of BONDAGE" (Rom. viii. 15).

How have we been made free?:--

> "If her husband be dead, she is FREE from the law . . . . . Wherefore, my brethren, ye also are become dead to the law by the body of Christ . . . . . We are delivered from the law, having died to that wherein we were held; that we should serve in newness of spirit, and not in oldness of the letter" (Rom. vii. 2-6).

The close association of the spirit with freedom finds an exposition in II Cor. iii., where the ministration of death and condemnation is contrasted with the ministration of the spirit and righteousness. The conclusion reached is that "where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty" (II Cor. iii. 17).

Written plainly across Rom. viii. are the words: "The flesh profiteth nothing." Let us rejoice that condemnation is past and that the law under which we live is the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus. The life we now live in the flesh is by the faith of the Son of God, and only as indwelt by the spirit of Him that raised up Christ from the dead can we hope to live well pleasing to Him, to suffer without shame, and to rise more than conquerors.

The expressions found in Rom. viii. 5-15 to denote "the spirit" are full and varied. Among them we have pneuma Theou and pneuma Christou (viii. 9). The words Theou and Christou, "of God" and "of Christ", are examples of the "Genitive of Character", and mean Divine pneuma (or Divine spirit) and Christ pneuma (or Christ spirit). This refers to the new nature, and is set in contrast with the flesh which we derive from Adam. This Christ pneuma is the "sonship pneuma"; and as many as are led by the Divine pneuma, this new nature, are sons of God.

The first occurrence of "spirit" in Romans (Rom. i. 4) is important, as it refers to the nature of the Lord Jesus. As regards His flesh, He was "of the seed of David". As regards His spirit, He was "the Son of God". Here we have the Christ pneuma of Rom. viii., without which we cannot be "sons".

The spirit of Christ, in Rom. i. 4, is associated with resurrection and holiness. The word translated "holiness" here is unknown outside the Scriptures. The word is hagiosune and occurs three times: II Cor. vii. 1, I Thess. iii. 13, and Rom. i. 4. Hagiosune means something more than being holy as to character. It denotes the nature of holiness itself:--

> "Hence pneuma hagiosune, a pneuma of holiness, being the Genitive of Apposition, means a pneuma which is holiness itself. This agrees with Luke i. 35 where it is distinctly stated to Mary that 'that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God . . . . .' accordingly, at His birth He was declared to be 'the Son of God'.

> And being the Son of God 'it was not possible that he should be holden of death, therefore God raised Him from the dead' (Acts ii. 24); and by His resurrection He was thus by Divine power declared to be the Son of God" (The Giver and His gifts by Dr. E. W. Bullinger).

The spirit of Christ was not antagonistic to the flesh He bore, for that flesh knew no sin. In our case it is different. In our flesh dwells no good thing, and consequently the spirit of sonship, which partakes of His holiness, must for ever be diametrically opposed to the flesh. It is this antagonism that we see in Rom. viii., and wherever flesh is contrasted with spirit in the believer. The "spirit" of Rom. viii. 5-15 refers to the new nature in the child of God. It is a Divine spirit, being of God. It is Christ-spirit, since it is ours by union with Christ. And it is the spirit of sonship. Not until verse 16 do we read of the Holy Spirit.

It is good for us to get a clear conception of "the spirit we are of". We must not confuse the new nature, which is spirit, with either the Holy Spirit, or His gifts as at Pentecost. As Eph. i. 19, 20 teaches, the power that is to usward that believe is the power of His resurrection. And Rom. viii. would impress us with the fact that the spirit according to which we now walk is the free spirit of sonship, the spirit of Him that raised up Christ from the dead. Holiness or sanctification, therefore, is implicit in our justification and our acquittal, and its outworking in life and practice is the outworking of the spirit of sonship that we have received.

#55. The witness of the Spirit Himself (viii. 15-17).
pp. 216 - 221

The section before us contains the key-word of the chapter, "adoption"—a word of great importance and worthy of the closest attention. The "spirit of adoption" sums up all that has been said in the earlier verses of chapter viii. It is the spirit of life that is set over against sin and death. It is essentially "free"; for it is in contrast with the spirit of bondage and fear. It is not only the spirit of sonship, but includes also the conception of inheritance.

The following is the structural outline of the passage:--

Romans viii. 15-17.

A | SONS. | a | Ye have received.
b | The sonship spirit.
a | We cry.
b | Abba, Father.
B | Spirit Itself bears witness with our spirits.
A | HEIRS. | a | We are the children of God.
b | And if children.
b | Then heirs.
a | Heirs of God.

It is common knowledge that the epistle to the Galatians traverses a good deal of the ground that is more systematically dealt with in Romans; and it is in this epistle (to the Galatians) that we learn the true meaning of the term "adoption". If we examine Rom. viii., with this doctrine of adoption before us, we observe the following facts:--

(1) We receive now the spirit of adoption, but look forward to the adoption itself in resurrection (Rom. viii. 15 and 23).
(2) The spirit of adoption is placed in opposition to the spirit of bondage. As this bondage is called the "bondage of corruption", it follows that the spirit of adoption anticipates resurrection.
(3) This is manifested in present sonship, whereby we cry, "Abba, Father". While we are sons of God now, the day of our "manifestation" awaits the resurrection (verse 19). The freedom experienced by the children of God now is a foretaste of "the liberty of the glory", which is to come.
(4) What we have, therefore, are the "firstfruits of the Spirit" (viii. 23); and while we are "saved by hope" (viii. 24), this does not exempt us at the moment from "groaning within ourselves", as we wait for the adoption (viii. 23).
(5) The word "adoption" in the Greek is huiothesia, "to place as a son". It means something more than being a son by birth.

The testimony of Gal. iv. 1-6 as to the meaning of "adoption" is important:--

> "Now I say, That the heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be lord of all; but is under tutors and governors until the time appointed of the father. Even so we, when were children, were in bondage under the elements of the world: but when the fullness of the time was come, God sent forth His Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the spirit of His Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father" (Gal. iv. 1-6).

Instead of the bondage of corruption, as in Rom. viii., we have here the bondage of worldly elements. Instead of the "manifestation of the sons of God", we have "the time appointed of the father". Deliverance is effected by Christ as Redeemer both in Rom. viii. and Gal. iv. And the sequel, "Walk in the spirit" of Rom. viii. 4, is found in Gal. iv. 21-31.

Sir William Ramsay, D.C.L., writing concerning Gal. iii. and iv., says:--

> "Adoption was a kind of embryo will; the adopted son became owner of the property, and the property could pass to a person that was naturally outside the family only by his being adopted. The adoption was a sort of will-making; and this ancient form of will was irrevocable and public. The terms 'son' and 'heir' are interchangeable. An illustration from the ordinary facts of society, as it existed in Galatian cities, is here stated; 'I speak after the manner of men'. The Will (diatheke) of a human being is irrevocable when once duly executed. Such irrevocability was a characteristic of Greek law. The Roman-Syrian Law Book will illustrate this passage of the epistle. It actually lays down the principle that a man can never put away an adopted son, and that he cannot put away a real son without good ground. It is remarkable that the adopted son should have a stronger position than the son by birth; yet it is so."

"Adoption" is made up of two Greek words, huios, meaning "son" and thesia, meaning "to place". We quote the following comment upon the distinction between "sons" and "children" from the writings of Bishop Westcott:--

> "There is the position of 'sonship' (characteristic of the teaching of St. Paul), which suggests thoughts of privilege, of inheritance, of dignity: and there is also the position of 'childship' (characteristic of the teaching of St. John), which suggests the thoughts of community of nature, of dependence, of tender relationship. Sons may be adopted; children can only be born. The two conceptions are evidently complementary; but they must be realized separately before the full force of the whole idea which they combine to give can be felt. Two or three illustrations will be sufficient to indicate the gain to the student of Scripture from the faithful preservation of this distinction between the general conceptions of a Divine inheritance and a Divine nature. Thus we now read (in the R.V.) that the Lord gave them that received Him the right to become children (A.V. 'sons') of God, 'which were born . . . . . of God' (John i. 12). And again: "Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called children (A.V. 'sons') of God; and such we are' (I John iii. 1)."

So, conversely, in other places the title of privilege is restored to the English text. "They that are accounted worthy to attain that world . . . . . are equal to the angels; and are sons (A.V. 'children') of God, being sons of the resurrection" (Luke xx. 35):--

> "We have received the spirit of adoption (the placing as sons, involving the thought of an inheritance), whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit Itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are (or, because we are) the children of God: and if children, then heirs, heirs of God" (Rom. viii. 15-17).

We do not include the succeeding words, "And joint-heirs with Christ", for that takes us into the realm of suffering in view of glory. This would be additional to the subject before us, which is simply the fact of sonship, childhood and inheritance.

We have seen that under the Greek law that obtained in Asia Minor at the time of Galatians was written, a man could "adopt" as his heir one who was not his child by birth. We are assured, however, that all who have the spirit of adoption or sonship in the fullest sense, are the children of God. And it is at this point that the Holy Spirit is introduced:--

> "The Spirit Itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God" (Rom. viii. 16).

It must be remembered that while the English language has rid itself of almost all genders in words, other languages, like French for example, have retained them. With us the word "table" is neuter. With the French, it is feminine, la table. Obviously, however, it would not be a correct translation into English to refer to a table as "she". In other words, the gender of a word has no relation to the sex of the thing signified. The Greek word for "head" is kephale, and is feminine, but it would make strange doctrine if this grammatical fact obtruded itself into the thought of Christ as the Head of the church. The word pneuma, "spirit", is neuter and consequently is followed by the neuter pronoun "it", just as kephale would be followed by the feminine pronoun "she". The neuter pronoun does not in any way suggest the impersonality of the Holy Spirit; just as the feminine gender of the word "head" has no possible connection with the person of Christ, the Man at God's right hand. When, therefore, the word pneuma is followed by the neuter pronoun "it", the grammatical construction has no bearing upon the doctrine of the Holy Spirit. If the grammatical rule were broken, and the masculine pronoun used with the neuter word pneuma, then this departure from the normal sequence would have a special meaning. The reader may not know that such a departure does occur in John's Gospel, where the speaker is the Son of God. In John xiv. 26 and John xvi. 13 we have two passages where the word ekeinos, emphatic and masculine, is used, contrary to the grammatical rule. If the antecedent in the second passage is parakletos, the Comforter, then it is clearly a testimony to the personality of the Holy Spirit that the Lord should go back seventy words in order to find a word in the masculine gender rather than use the simple neuter.

The word ekeinos is used in John's Gospel quite frequently, and in many passages emphasis upon the person spoken of is intended. Take, for example, the following:--

> "He hath declared Him" (John i. 18).
> "He it is that loveth Me" (John xiv. 21).

Or the passage in John iv. (very similar to that in John xvi. 13):--

> "When He (ekeinos) is come, He will tell us all things" (iv. 25).
> "When He (ekeinos), the Spirit of truth is come, He will guide you into all truth" (xvi. 13).

It is quite clear that personality is intended by this usage of ekeinos, and every lover of the truth would do well to test the faithfulness of any literal translation of the Greek N.T. on these passages.

Coming back to Rom. viii. it is evident that, if we are not going to mislead, we must translate the passage: "The Spirit Himself."

The word "to bear witness" in the original is summartureo and occurs also in Rom. ii. 15 and ix. 1, where the conscience is referred to. Although it would require pages of writing to analyse what takes place when the conscience "bears witness", every reader must be familiar with it as a fact of experience. If, then, the conscience can bear witness, how much more may the Holy Spirit Himself impress with unquestionable conviction the truth that "we are the children of God".

In the physical realm, children can trace some measure of likeness with their parents, and discover certain family characteristics. These things are true also in the spiritual realm. The "children of God" have "received" and "believed" (John i. 12), and exhibit marked family characteristics (John viii. 39; I John iii. 1, 2, 10).

Moreover, fellowship with the Father is in itself an ever-abiding witness, though impossible of demonstration.

A comparison of Rom. viii. 14-17 with Gal. iv. 5-7 would lead us to place side by side, as parallel experiences, the receiving of the spirit of adoption, the witness of the Holy Spirit Himself, and the reception of the spirit of His Son:--

> "To redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the spirit of His Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father. Wherefore thou art no more a servant but a son; and if a son, an heir of God through Jesus Christ" (Gal. iv. 5-7).

Where Romans speaks of the witness of the Spirit Who testifies that we are the children of God, Galatians tells us that God sent the spirit of His Son into our hearts, crying, "Abba, Father". The spirit of His Son, therefore, is the spirit of adoption, for both lead to the same cry, "Abba, Father". "Children" of God in one case, and "sons" of God in the other, are heirs. What a confirmation of our glorious acceptance, relationship, and standing.

"Abba, Father."—One word is Chaldee, and the other Greek. Some commentators think that these two words are used to indicate the union in one family of Jew and Gentile. Their use, however, by our Lord in the garden of Gethsemane (Mark xiv. 36) makes it impossible to accept this suggestion. The Syriac Version reads, "Abba, my Father" or "Abba, our Father". Bishop Middleton says:--

> "The article has here, or elsewhere, the force of a possessive pronoun. Abba was the Oriental term, by which children familiarly addressed their parents; the addition of "my Father" was requisite to give solemnity and force."

The only places where these words occur together are in the record of Gethsemane, and in the record of the gift of the spirit of adoption to the redeemed. The Redeemer in His agony, the redeemed in their joy; suffering and glory inter-related. If we are soon to hear of sharing His sufferings, of joining in creation's groan, let us remember that we have the spirit of Christ, the spirit of sonship, whereby we cry, "Abba, my Father".

#56. Heirs, and Joint-heirs (viii. 17-21).
pp. 265 - 270

The epistle to the Ephesians reveals the "hope of our calling", while the epistle to the Philippians reveals the "prize of the high calling". Hope is associated with grace; the Prize with reward. Hope is ours because we are in Christ; the Prize will be ours, "if so be we suffer with Him". From this it follows that an heir of God is not, necessarily, also a joint-heir with Christ. It was "to him that overcometh" that the promise was made that he should sit upon the throne (Rev. iii. 21). "If we suffer", said the apostle Paul, "we shall also reign with Him" (II Tim. ii. 12). The doctrine has changed from "in Christ Jesus" to "with Christ". We do not meet the preposition sun, "with", in Rom. viii. until verse 16, where it occurs in the word summartureo, "bear witness together". After that we have sugkleronomos, "joint-heirs"; sumpascho, "jointly suffer"; sundoxazomai, "jointly glorified". The next occurrences are in verse 22, sustenazo, "groan together", and sunodino, "travail together", and in the latter half of the chapter, there are two or three more compounds of sun.

This use of the words "heir", and "joint-heir", the one a standing in pure grace, the other associated with faithfulness and possible suffering, is found in the epistle to the Colossians:--

> "Giving thanks unto the Father, which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance (kleros, the allotment) of the saints in the light" (Col. i. 12).
>
> "Knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance (kleronomia, the allotted portion); for ye serve the Lord Christ" (Col. iii. 24).

In the first instance the child of God has been "made meet", in the second there is introduced "reward", "service", and even "receiving wrong", showing that the two subjects are on different grounds, the one being followed by reference to the forgiveness of sins, the other by a reference to what the servant has done. So in Rom. viii., "If children, then heirs, heirs of God" is parallel with Col. i. 12. "Joint-heirs with Christ, if so be we suffer with Him", is parallel with Col. iii. 24, or as the apostle wrote to Timothy:--

> "If we died with Him, we shall also live with Him, If we endure, we shall also reign with Him" (II Tim. ii. 11, 12).

The structure emphasizes the glory, and associates with it present suffering and future liberty. Moreover, it shows that the revelation of the sons of God and the revelation of the glory synchronize. Much of the present suffering will be found to be a sharing in the patience of Christ, Who himself awaits the day of His revelation and coronation. We share His rejection as those of old shared the rejection of David at Adullam, and we shall share His glory when He reigns. Just as there were some who attained to the "first three" or the "thirty" (II Sam. xxiii.), and just as one star differs from another star, though both "in glory", so is it with the "heirs" and the "joint-heirs", that is with those made meet for the inheritance, and those who not only were made meet, but who will, additionally, receive a reward of the inheritance.

The structure of the section before us is as follows:--

Romans viii. 17-21.
Suffering and Glory.

A | 17. SUFFERING AND GLORY.
a | Joint-heirs (sun).
b | Suffer together (sun).
a | Glorified together (sun).
B | 18. REVELATION OF GLORY.
c | Reckoning.
d | Present Suffering.
c | Comparing.
d | Future glory (apokalupto).
B | 19. REVELATION OF SONS.
c | Expectation.
d | Of creature.
c | Revelation (apokalupsis).
d | Of sons.
A | 20, 21. LIBERTY AND GLORY.
a | Subjection of the creature.
b | In hope.
a | Emancipation of the creature (eleutheria).
b | From bondage.
a | Liberty of children (eleutheros).

We have stated our belief as to the meaning of the apostle when he used the two words "heirs" and "heirs together"; but in order that none shall feel that we have spoken without investigation, we refer to the other passages where sugkleronomos occurs. The next reference in order to Rom. viii. is that found in Eph. iii. 6, "That the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs".

We can imagine the criticism, This reference nullifies the idea expressed above on Rom. viii. 17. To this we would reply, The truth revealed in Eph. iii. 6 was unknown at the time the apostle wrote to the Romans; that it reveals the constitution of the mystery, making known the glorious equality that exists between all members of the One Body, whereas Rom. viii. 17 is a revelation concerning "fellow-heirs" of Christ in connection with suffering. No such qualification is to be found in Eph. iii. The next reference, Heb. xi. 9, 10, is more in line with Rom. viii. 17:--

> "By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tents with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise. For he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God."

"The land of promise" was Abraham's by gift. No suffering could win it or make it more secure. The promise of the land made by God, and recorded in Genesis, is unconditional. It balances the passage in Rom. viii. 17, "heirs with God". But Abraham, Isaac and Jacob lived only as pilgrims in the land of promise, and looked for something beyond and above, even the New Jerusalem, the heavenly city. Unmentioned in the O.T., this comes to light only in the N.T. Heb. xi. deals with overcoming faith; faith that endures; faith that has a recompense of reward; faith that avoids Esau's bartering of the birthright for the present mess of pottage. Its whole teaching falls into line with the second part of Rom. viii. 17, "Fellow-heirs with Christ, if so be we suffer with Him". The last reference, I Pet. iii. 7, brings us back again to the simpler conception of equality:--

> "Likewise ye husbands, dwell with them according to knowledge, giving honour unto the wife, as unto the weaker vessel, and as being heirs together of the grace of life."

Fellow-heirs of the grace of life can have no comparison with fellow-heirs with Christ if so be they suffer:--

A | Rom. viii. 17. Fellow-heirs. The PRIZE.
B | Eph. iii. 6. Fellow-heirs. The HOPE.
A | Heb. xi. 9. Fellow-heirs. The PRIZE.
B | I Pet. iii. 7. Fellow-heirs. The HOPE.

The hope of the church as expressed in the Epistle to the Romans was millennial (Rom. xv. 12, 13), consequently the joint-heirs with Christ who are in any sense overcomers will find much that illuminates their position in Rev. ii., iii. There, addressing Himself to the seven churches of Asia, the Lord makes certain promises "to him that overcometh": "The tree of life" (Rev. ii. 7), "The crown of life", and "The second death" (Rev. ii. 10, 11): "The hidden manna", "white stone", and "new name" (Rev. ii. 17): "Power over the nations . . . . . even as I received of my Father" (Rev. ii. 26-28): "White raiment", "Book of life", and "Name confessed" (Rev. iii. 5): "A Pillar", "A new name", the name of the "New Jerusalem" (Rev. iii. 12): and finally, "A grant to sit with Christ in His throne, even as He overcame, and sat with His Father in His throne" (Rev. iii. 21). To sit down with Christ in His throne as an overcomer, to reign with Him, because one has endured, to be a joint-heir of Christ, if so be we suffer with Him, are all expositions of the same truth, though it operates in different spheres, whether the dispensation of the mystery, or the Acts period.

Having stated the relation that God has made to exist between present suffering and future glory, the apostle proceeds to encourage the believer by comparing the present with the future, and by showing inexpressibly grand is the prospect of glory, both to the individual and to all creation:--

> "For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compare with the glory which shall be revealed in us" (Rom. viii. 18).

Throughout the remainder of the chapter this estimate of the apostle is substantiated by many and wonderful arguments. Let us see this for ourselves.

There is no comparison between our present sufferings and future glory for:--

(1) These sufferings are comparatively insignificant (verses 18-23).
(2) There is abundant provision made by the Lord for our sustenance under the sufferings, which includes the intercession of the Holy Spirit (verses 24-28).
(3) There is the most complete assurance that glory shall be ours, for it is a part of the divine purpose, and cannot fail of accomplishment (verses 29, 30).
(4) God being so evidently "for us", even to the sparing not of His own Son, it follows that neither condemnation nor separation shall ever be known by us (verses 31-35).
(5) We may pass through many and varied trials, but in the midst of them all we shall remain more than conquerors (verse 37).
(6) The apostle's opening words, "For I reckon", are now exchanged for his closing conviction, "For I am persuaded" that nothing in earth, hell, or heaven shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord (verses 38, 39).

We trust the reader enjoys something of this "strong consolation". If he does, he will already have reviewed some of his own "sufferings", which had appeared as "mountains", and seen them in their true perspective as mole-hills. Nothing so marks the believer's state as his attitude to suffering, irritations, vexatious waiting, and the need for long drawn out endurance. We need to keep Rom. viii. 17-39 continually in heart and mind, that we may lay hold of the hope set before us.

Unless the exposition of the remaining verses, 19-21, of this section be compressed into a short compass, and thus much that demands attention be missed, we must accept this introductory article for what it is worth, and be prepared, without more ado, to take up the examination of the remainder on resumption. This, we are sure, is the only wise course, and consequently we commend to the conscience of all what has been shown, praying that the glory that is yet to be may be our continual guide and incentive.

A review, and sign of the times.

New Eden.

(From the "News Chronicle", 14/1/1935).

p. 103

The traditional site of the Garden of Eden, now a barren, arid desert waste with only an occasional oasis, will, it is hoped, within three years become once more fertile and habitable.

This change is to be effected at a cost of over a million pounds by Messrs. Balfour and Beatty, of London, who were selected by the Iraqi Government, from many foreign rivals, to carry out this work.

They will construct a barrage across the Tigris at Kut, then dig a canal connecting the Tigris with a smaller river, the Shatt-el Gharraf, which runs down through the heart of Iraq, the traditional "Garden", almost as far as Ur of the Chaldees, the cradle city of civilization.

Faith Healing.

(From the News Chronicle, 4/4/1935).

p. 105

"As one who has been a lay pastor of the Elim Four Square Movement, I would like to say that although I have met many supposed faith-healing cures I have never met a case where a doctor's certificate could be produced before or after the supposed cure. They may exist, but I have never met them."

"If faith-healing is a fact, how comes it one of their pastors attended a spa for personal healing yet would practice faith-healing upon others? If it is not deception what is it? E. W. H…..L, Birghton, 6."

Ethiopia.
p. 280

Among the most important signs of the times that point to the close of the age, must be reckoned the movement of nations that will eventuate in the confederacy of kings under the Beast at the time of the end. The focal spot naturally is Jerusalem, and the central nation, Israel. Yet no one, untaught by the prophetic Scriptures, anticipated that the Great War which commenced in 1914 could not end until Jerusalem passed from under Turkish rule, but so it was.

The country of Abyssinia is not mentioned by that name in Scripture, but is nevertheless frequently referred to under the name Ethiopia. The Ethiopians are descendants of Ham, through his eldest son Cush. The words "Cush" and "Ethiopia" are interchangeable, and where we read in the A.V. the word Ethiopia, the reader should remember that the Hebrew word is always the name Cush.

A month or two ago, few would have given Abyssinia a moment's thought when compiling a list of the nations destined to play a part at the time of the end, yet the student of prophecy has always known that Ethiopia is to be in league, at least for a time, with Antichrist. Just before he "comes to his end", the willful king "shall stretch forth his hand also upon the countries; and the land of Egypt shall not escape . . . . . and the Lybyans and the Ethiopians shall be at his steps" (Dan. xi. 43). That Ethiopia will form part of the unholy alliance of nations at the time of the end, Ezekiel testifies. The land of Israel is to be invaded by "Gog, the chief prince (or prince of Rosh) of Meshech and Tubal" (Ezek. xxxviii. 1-5), and confederate with them will be "Persia, Ethiopia and Lybia". This confederacy will be overthrown, and numbers will perish, yet we find at the end Ethiopia numbered among the nations that will submit to the reign of the King of kings. Princes shall come out of Egypt; Ethiopia shall soon stretch out her hands unto God. Sing unto God, ye kingdoms of the earth; O sing praises unto the Lord" (Psa. lxviii. 31, 32).

The reader would be well advised to study for His own edification the prophetic references to other nations, such as Greece, Persia, Egypt, etc., so that instead of having a failing of heart as these terrible signs begin to appear, he will realize how complete is the foreknowledge and the control of the Lord, and safely lean upon His faithfulness.

"This God is our God."

#13. The only wise God.
pp. 5 - 7

There are some attributes of God that are specially singled out in the Scriptures as being His own peculiar possession. For example, we read, "Thou only art holy" (Rev. xv. 4) and "There is none good but One, that is God" (Matt. xix. 17). This exclusiveness is specially noticeable in connection with wisdom, and finds expression in three passages of Scripture.

We find it in Romans in connection with the hiding of certain of God's purposes as a secret or "mystery":--

> "To God only wise, be glory through Jesus Christ for ever. Amen" (Rom. xvi. 27).

In direct and structural* (We do not give the structure here, but hope to do so in a series of articles dealing with Pastoral Epistles.*) relationship with the "mystery of godliness" in I Timothy we have the passage:--

> "Now unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honour and glory for ever and ever, Amen" (I Tim. i. 17).

In Jude 25 we have this title for the third time; and although there is no definite reference to a mystery in the epistle, there is a reference to that spiritual foe whose presence and activities seem always to be in sight where the mysteries of God are concerned. It is in Jude that we read of the conflict between the Devil and Michael over the body of Moses, and that epistle ends with the words:--

> "To the only wise God our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever. Amen."

Although Rom. xi. does not use the actual words, "the only wise God", the passage inspires the fact:--

> "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are His judgments and His ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been His counselor? Or who hath first given to Him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again? For of Him, and through Him, and to Him, are all things: to Whom be glory for ever. Amen" (Rom. xi. 33-36).

Here once again a mystery is in view—the mystery of Israel's blindness (Rom. xi. 25). It is to this blindness and its sequel that verse 32 refers; and this leads on to the ascription of wisdom.

One other feature has probably attracted the reader's attention—that each of the four passages cited are doxologies. It is perhaps obvious that sinners saved by grace should be grateful for salvation, for mercy, for life, for blessing. It is not so obvious that we should render unceasing praise to God "only wise". It may be of service, therefore, to consider the wisdom of God together, so that we may praise Him as is His due.

Let us begin with the fact that God is "only wise". There are passages of Scripture that speak of the wisdom of men. Solomon is an outstanding example; and Daniel shines, too, in this respect. Others also could be named, but we need not go further, for all the wisdom of Solomon and Daniel is but as a drop in an ocean. Every atom of it was derived from the Lord Himself. He alone is wise, and the fountain of wisdom.

So infinitely above all human wisdom is the wisdom of God, that the Scripture uses in this connection the strange figure Catachresis, or Incongruity:--

> "The foolishness of God is wiser than men" (I Cor. i. 25).

With man, wisdom is the fruit of experience, of knowledge, of discipline, of time, and often the result of mistakes and failures. The wisdom of God is underived. It is His because He is God:--

> "Who hath directed the Spirit of the Lord, or being His counselor hath taught Him? With whom took He counsel, and who instructed Him, and taught Him in the path of judgment, and taught Him knowledge, and showed to Him the way of understanding?" (Isa. xl. 13, 14).

It would be well for us to keep steadily in mind that when we speak of the attributes of God, such as wisdom, power, righteousness, etc., we use a human device. There are in actuality no such attributes in the sense that God is compounded of so much substance and so many qualities. It would be truer to fact if we said that God Himself is wisdom, is power, is righteousness, and that when we speak of the wisdom of God, we really mean God acting wisely, or when we speak of the righteousness of God, we mean God acting justly.

Wisdom enters into the work of creation, for it is written:--

> "To Him that by wisdom made the heavens" (Psa. cxxxvi. 5).
> "The Lord by wisdom hath founded the earth; by understanding He established the heavens" (Prov. iii. 19).
> "He hath made the earth by His power, He hath established the world by His wisdom, and hath stretched out the heavens by His understanding" (Jer. li. 15).

The three items of related truth presented in Jer. li. 15 cannot be considered in this article with the care they demand. We may be able to devote space to this passage later.

It seems almost foolish to continue. The wisdom of God is so profound and altogether wonderful. Think of the variety of the works of the Lord. As the Psalmist says, "O Lord, how manifold are Thy works; in wisdom hast Thou made them all" (Psa. civ. 24). Apart from infinite wisdom, the very variety of created things would produce hopeless and inextricable confusion. But the wisdom of the Lord has adjusted each part.

Again, see the perfect fitness of each created thing. Observe how wonderfully it is adapted to its environment. The colouring of birds, beasts and insects is a study in itself. The stripes on the tiger, the spots on the leopard, all serve their purpose. The whole of Psa. civ. should be studied with this in mind. The recurring seasons, as well as the alternation of day and night, are all perfectly adapted to their purpose; and if we but examine ourselves, the body that is so fearfully and wonderfully made, the senses, the intellect, the marvels of speech, memory, ratiocination (logical reasoning), what a witness to the only wise God we should discover.

Perhaps one of the reasons why the wisdom of God is stressed in connection with His secret purposes, is that the enemy of God and man is also wise. His symbol is the serpent; his bait in the garden of Eden was that the forbidden fruit would make "wise" and "like God". He himself as the anointed Cherub had been "full of wisdom", but had "corrupted his wisdom by reason of his brightness" (Exek. xxviii. 12-19). However wise the god of this age may be, his wisdom is but folly in the presence of "the only wise God". Let us rejoice that "this God is our God".

#14. "His understanding is infinite" (Psa. cxlvii. 5).
pp. 45 - 47

In this Psalm the speaker calls upon his hearers to praise the Lord, as he views with prophetic vision the re-gathering of scattered Israel and the re-establishing of their kingdom:--

> "The Lord doth build up Jerusalem: He gathereth together the outcasts of Israel. He healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds. He telleth the number of the stars; He calleth them all by their names. Great is our Lord, and of great power; His understanding is infinite" (Psa. cxlvii. 2-5).

Lest any of the outcasts of Israel should feel that restoration was impossible, that God would forget, or that He would not have the necessary power, the Psalmist turns from the subject of Israel's restoration to the fact that the number and names of all the stars are known to the Lord. The number of stars that can be seen with the naked eye is about 6,000. By the aid of powerful telescopes and photography some hundreds of millions become visible. Astronomers, when speaking of the Milky Way, tell us that it is made up of "innumerable" stars. Innumerable they are to man; but we are assured that He Who made the stars know both their number and their names. No wonder the Psalmist says, "His understanding is infinite". It is interesting to note that the word "infinite" in verse 5 is en mispar, "without number". Infinite indeed is the understanding and knowledge of the only wise God. Another statement to the same effect is found in Isa. xl. 28: "There is no searching of His understanding." In Job, we have associated together the ideas of unsearchableness and of being without number:--

> "Which doeth great things and unsearchable; marvelous things without number" (Job v. 9).
>
> "Behold, God is great, and we know Him not, neither can the number of His years be searched out" (Job xxxvi. 26).

David, in Psa. cxxxix., speaks of the knowledge of God that takes cognizance of his down-sitting and uprising, his path and his ways, his words and his circumstances, and exclaims: "Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high, I cannot attain unto it" (Psa. cxxxix. 6).

Again, in another Psalm, he looks back to the horrible pit in which he had sunk, and the miry clay that threatened to engulf him. He looks back to the deliverance that set his feet upon a rock, established his goings and put a new song into his mouth. And as he ponders with grateful heart the outworkings of grace he says:--

> "Many, O Lord, are Thy wonderful works which Thou hast done, and Thy thoughts which are to usward: they cannot be reckoned up in order unto Thee: if I would declare and speak of them, they are more than can be numbered" (Psa. xl. 5).

Further on in the same Psalm, David speaks of "innumerable evils . . . . . iniquities . . . . . more than the hairs of mine head" (verse 12).

It is perfectly true that no man can enumerate the wonderful works and purposes of the God of all grace, and no man knows the number of his sins or of the hairs of his head, but the Lord does, for He has said: "The very hairs of your head are all numbered. Fear ye not therefore" (Matt. x. 30, 31).

Coming back to Psa. cxxxix., we find the Psalmist, after speaking of the omniscience of God and the wonders of His creative purpose in man, exclaiming:--

> "How precious also are Thy thoughts unto Me, O God! how great is the sum of them! If I should count them, they are more in number than the sand" (Psa. cxxxix. 17, 18).

And then follow words that at first seem to have no real connection: "When I awake I am still with Thee" (Psa. cxxxix. 18).

Just as the Psalmist could comfort the outcasts of Israel by speaking of the infinite understanding of the Lord, so he could himself repose in perfect confidence in the Lord Who, though He knew his shortcomings so minutely, had nevertheless such marvelous thoughts of grace toward him. If this mighty God saw his substance when it was made in secret and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth (verse 15), and had "covered" with His protecting care the unborn child (verse 13); then, when the time came for him to lie down and sleep until the resurrection morning, he could do so in perfect peace. His power and His understanding are infinite, and they are both ranged on our side and on our behalf. Well may we echo the words of the Psalmist: "How great is the sum of them!"

We do well, also, to remember that it is not wise for us to judge the thoughts of the Lord by our own standards:--

> "For My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways My ways, saith the Lord. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are My ways higher than your ways, and My thoughts than your thoughts" (Isa. lv. 8, 9).

There are doubtless many ways in which the thoughts of the Lord differ from the thoughts of men; one of these that is in view in Isa. lv. is that, whereas many of the thoughts of men never mature, the "thoughts" of the Lord, manifested in His "word", do not "return unto Him void".

While the contemplation of this unsearchable knowledge is overwhelming and humbling, it is surely comforting also when we remember that "this God is our God". Is it not a subject for praise, to be able to say with David, "Thou hast known my soul in adversaries" (Psa. xxxi. 7)? The sons of Korah found comfort in this knowledge of God:--

> "If we have forgotten the name of our God, or stretched out our hands to a strange god; shall not God search this out? for He knoweth the secrets of the heart" (Psa. xliv. 20, 21).

Again, how blessed, even though it cover us with shame, to be able to say: "O God, Thou knowest my foolishness; and my sins are not hid from Thee" (Psa. lxix. 5). And who is there that has never fled for refuge to that precious passage:--

> "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him. For He knoweth our frame; He remembereth that we are dust" (Psa. ciii. 13, 14).

"His understanding is infinite." "This God is our God."

#15. The goodness of God.
pp. 127 - 130

While it is a mere fancy unsupported by fact, that the English word "God" is derived from the word "good", there is nevertheless much truth behind the suggestion. For "God" is essentially "good". To the young man who addressed Him as "Good Master", the Lord replied, "There is none good but One, that is God" (Matt. xix. 17). And speaking of man, the apostle says in Romans, "There is none that doeth good, no, not one" (Rom. iii. 12).

What a wide range of application the word "good" has in our own language. If an argument is valid, it is called "good". If a claim is legally sound, it is "good". If food is wholesome, it is "good". If a post is lucrative and pleasant, it is "good". And so we might go on for scores of instances. When we consult the Scriptures we find that the goodness of the Lord ramifies through all His ways and acts. When Moses said, "I beseech Thee, show me Thy glory", the Lord replied:--

> "I will make all My goodness pass before thee, and I will proclaim the name of the Lord before thee" (Exod. xxxiii. 18, 19).
> "And the Lord passed by before him, and proclaimed, The Lord, The Lord God, merciful and gracious, longsuffering, and abundant in goodness and truth" (Ex. xxxiv. 6).

What might not ensue from infinite power and infinite knowledge, without infinite goodness? It is terrible to contemplate. But we need have no fear; it is impossible for any act of the Lord to be conceived or accomplished apart from His goodness. Moses learned that the glory of the Lord was inconceivable apart from His goodness, and that His very name, The Lord God, implied His goodness. His mercy, His grace and His longsuffering were but an expression of His "abounding goodness".

The Psalmist, too, in Psa. cxlv., realizes that the Lord's greatness and goodness are inseparable:--

> "Great is the Lord, and greatly to be praised; and His greatness is unsearchable . . . . . Thy mighty acts . . . . . glorious holiness of Thy majesty . . . . . wondrous works . . . . . Thy terrible acts . . . . . Thy greatness. They shall abundantly utter the memory of Thy great goodness, and shall sing of Thy righteousness . . . . . The Lord is good to all: and His tender mercies are over all His works" (Psa. cxlv. 3-9).

The fact that the Lord is good to all is the teaching of other parts of Scripture also. The apostle taught this truth to the idolatrous men of Lystra:--

> "Who in times past suffered all nations to walk in their own ways. Nevertheless He left not Himself without witness, in that He did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness" (Acts xiv. 16, 17).

These nations were sinful, dark, idolatrous; yet the goodness of the Lord was over all. As the Lord said in the sermon on the Mount: "He maketh His sun to rise on the evil and the good" (Matt. v. 45).

God is not only good, but He does good; and He expects His children to do likewise: "Thou are good, and doest good; teach me Thy statutes" (Psa. cxix. 68). It would appear from this verse that the statutes of the Lord are "good", and that they will teach the servant of the Lord to "do good" also.

Praise for the Lord's goodness, and a feeling that this goodness pervades all the history of His people is expressed in Psa. cvi. and cvii.:--

> "Praise ye the Lord, O give thanks unto the Lord; for He is good; for His mercy endureth for ever" (Psa. cvi. 1).

The Psalm surveys the history of Israel from their bondage in Egypt to the time of their captivity, which the Psalmist speaks of prophetically. Throughout their career, whether in favour or out of favour, the goodness of God remained unchanged and unchangeable. In Psa. cvii. this goodness punctuates the Psalm as by a chorus:--

> "Oh that men would praise the Lord for His goodness, and for His wonderful works to the children of men!" (Psa. cvii. 8, 15, 21, 31).

The goodness of God can be "shown" and "tasted":--

> "There be many that say, Who will show us any good? Lord, lift Thou up the light of Thy countenance upon us" (Psa. iv. 6).
> "O taste and see that the Lord is good: blessed is the man that trusteth in Him" (Psa. xxxiv. 8).

Again, the Scriptures speak of the blessings of goodness (Psa. xxi. 3), the crowning of the year with goodness (Psa. lxv. 11), goodness that is laid up (Psa. xxxi. 19), goodness that satisfies (Psa. lxv. 4), and goodness that follows (Psa. xxiii. 6).

If the goodness of God is over all His works, we shall easily discern that the same goodness is found in all His ways. What is grace, but goodness shown to the undeserving? Or what is mercy, but goodness going out to misery? Is not love the quintessence of all goodness? And are not judgment, punishment, lawgiving and other operations of God as much a part of His goodness as the more obvious attributes? The Psalmist utters a profound truth when he says:--

> "And slew famous kings; for His mercy endureth for ever. Sihon, King of the Amorites, for His mercy endureth for ever" (Psa. cxxxvi. 18, 19).

Is it not good to rid the earth of that which defiles and destroys physically? And shall it not be good to rid the world of all that defiles and destroys morally and spiritually? In a world of sin, the idea of "goodness" has sometimes acquired a sentimental character, and has become something that is mawkish, weakly benevolent, or "goody-goody". Such a conception finds no counterpart in the goodness of God. The goodness of God is spoken of in the same breath as His greatness, His holiness and His righteousness.

Some of the attributes of God are raised by the figure Metonymy, and made to stand as titles for God Himself. Thus we read: "Except the God of my father, the God of Abraham, and the FEAR of Isaac, had been with me" (Gen. xxxi. 42). So it is with this all-pervading attribute of goodness: "Blessed be the Lord . . . . . My goodness, and my fortress; my high tower, and my deliverer; my shield, and He in Whom I trust" (Psa. cxliv. 1, 2).

"Thou art good, and doest good." "This God is our God."

The volume of the Book.

#29. The Apocrypha.
Passages parallel with Rom. i.
pp. 40 - 43

In an earlier article (Volume XXI, page 75) we gave a passing glance at the Apocryphal Books of the O.T., and expressed the hope that at some future time we might be able to show the value of these writings, and the way that their phraseology has influenced some of the writings of the N.T. When we remember that the bulk of the Apocrypha was written in Greek and that, next to the Scripture itself, it had a tremendous influence on life, thought and doctrine, we must also realize that its use of words, its peculiarities of expression, and its sententious statements would inevitably colour all theological discussion. Unless the N.T. writers were going to invent a new language, it would be almost impossible for them to use the Koine, the common Greek of the day, without incorporating countless reminisces from the Apocrypha. It will surely be a piece of added knowledge that should prove useful, if we can trace any of these references to their source, for at any moment, through some simple comparison, new light may break in.

In the days preceding the last century, the Apocrypha was usually bound up with the Scriptures, and the English reader was familiar with its contents. To-day Bel and The Dragon, Judith, Tobit and other books are practically unknown except by name. How many of our readers would recognize the source of Shakespeare's words in the mouth of Shylock:--

> "A Daniel come to judgment. Yea, a Daniel."
> "O wise young judge, how I do honour thee?"

When was Daniel, as a young man, a judge? We may read the incident in the book called "The History of Susanna", which was "set apart from the beginning of Daniel, because it was not in the Hebrew".

However, we are not concerned in these articles with mere literary side of the subject, but with the possible help a comparative study of the Apocrypha may be to the interpretation of the N.T., and particularly the epistles of Paul.

As a result of comparing passage with passage it soon becomes evident that of all the books of the Apocrypha, the one that influenced the phraseology of the apostle Paul most was that entitled: "The Wisdom of Solomon." This is a book of nineteen chapters, containing 436 verses; in bulk, therefore, it is approximately the same as that of the Epistle to the Romans, which in the Authorized Version contains 433 verses.

We must now examine some of the parallels that may be discovered by comparing the Epistle to the Romans and the Book of Wisdom. The apostle, in Rom. i. 19-23 speaks of the heathen world as without excuse:--

> "Because that which may be know of God is manifest in them; for God hath showed it unto them. For the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse . . . . . they changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image . . . . ."

The thirteenth chapter of the Book of Wisdom reads as follows:--

> "Surely vain are all men by nature who are ignorant of God, and could not out of good things that are seen know Him that is; neither considering the works did they acknowledge the workmaster" (Verses 1 and 2).
>
> "For by the greatness and beauty of the creatures, proportionably the Maker of them is seen" (Verse 5).
>
> "Howbeit neither are they to be pardoned, for it they were able to know so much that they could aim at the world; How did they not sooner find out the Lord thereof? But miserable are they, and in dead things is their hope, who call them gods, which are the works of men's hands, gold and silver to show art in" (Verse 8-10).

This testimony, written two centuries before Paul's epistle to the Romans, is most helpful, showing that the witness of Paul must not be limited to the closing days of the Roman power, but is true from the beginning.

The many parallels between the passages are evident. The word "workmaster" is to be compared with the word "builder" of Heb. xi. 10. The expression, "They could aim at the world" means to "guess at the meaning of, or form an opinion about the world".

A little further on in Rom. i. the apostle writes:--

> "Even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient, being filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness; full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity, whisperers, backbiters, haters of God, despiteful, proud, boasters, inventors of evil things, disobedient to parents, without understanding, covenant-breakers, without natural affection, implacable, unmerciful; who knowing the judgment of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them" (Rom. i. 28-32).

With this terrible description let us compare some verses of Wisdom xiv.:--

> "Howbeit for both causes they shall be justly punished: both because they thought not well of God, giving heed unto idols, and also unjustly swore in deceit, despising holiness" (Wisdom xiv. 30).

The awful catalogue of crimes in Rom. i. finds a parallel in this chapter of Wisdom:--

> "For whilst they slew their children in sacrifices, or used secret ceremonies, or made revellings of strange rites; they kept neither lives nor marriages any longer undefiled: but either one slew another traitorously, or grieved him by adultery. So that there reigned in all men without exception, blood, manslaughter, theft, and dissimulation, corruption, unfaithfulness, tumults, perjury, disquieting of good men, forgetfulness of good turns, defiling of souls, changing of kind (or sex—Compare Rom. i. 26), disorder in marriages, adultery and shameless uncleanness. For the worshipping of idols not to be named is the beginning, the cause, the end of all evil" (Wisdom xiv. 23-27).

The writer of the Book of Wisdom traces all evils back to idolatry, as in Rom. i. 19-32. As soon as man degraded God, his own degradation followed. This is plainly stated earlier in chapter xiv., and the reference brings together idolatry, immorality and inventions of evil, just as in Rom. i. 19-32:--

> "For the devising of idols was the beginning of (spiritual) fornication, and the invention of them the corruption of life . . . . . for by vain glory of men they entered into the world" (Wisdom xiv. 12, 14).

The reader will also be struck by the phrase, "entered into the world", as he thinks of Rom. v. 12 and remembers that the sin that entered into the world was incipient idolatry: "Ye shall be as God." And this led to the "corruption of life".

There is a great deal in common between Romans and the Book of Wisdom, chapters xii.-xiv., which cannot be realized by piecemeal quotation. The reader will doubtless perceive that the following, though not so close as the other passages cited, still keep pace with the teaching of Rom. i. 19-32:--

> "They held them for gods, which even among the beasts of their enemies were despised" (Wisdom xii. 24).
>
> "Shall feel a judgment worthy of God" (Wisdom xii. 26).
> "Being corruptible, it was called god" (Wisdom xiv. 8).

We do not wish to take up too much space with this subject, and will therefore defer further comparisons until another time. We trust that what has been demonstrated will enable the reader to appreciate the value of these old writings. Although their teaching does not come with the authority of the inspired Scriptures, they surely have as just a claim to be considered as much that passes to-day for exposition.

#30. The Apocrypha.
Further parallel with the Epistles and the Gospel of Matthew.
pp. 94 - 98

The reader may have observed that the parallels already brought forward, between the Book of Wisdom and the epistle to the Romans, have been confined to that part of Rom. i. that makes no revelation of the grace of God or of the great plan of justification by faith. We find no obvious parallels in the Apocrypha to the doctrinal parts of Romans, and this we can readily understand; but upon reaching chapters ix.-ix., we do find some similarity. For example, compare the apostle's argument in Rom. ix. 20, 21 with Wisdom xii. 11, 12 and xv. 7:--

> "Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing that formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour?" (Rom. ix. 20, 21).

> "For it was a cursed seed from the beginning; neither didst Thou for fear of any man, give them pardon for those things wherein they sinned. For who shall say, What hast Thou done? Or who shall withstand Thy judgment? Or who shall accuse Thee in respect of the perdition of nations, which Thou Thyself madest? Or who shall state a case against Thee, as advocate in respect of unjust men?" (Wisdom xii. 11, 12).
> "For the potter tempering soft earth, fashioneth every vessel with much labour for our service. Yea, of the same clay he maketh both the vessels that serve for clean uses, and likewise also such as serve to the contrary. But what is the use of either sort the potter himself is the judge" (Wisdom xv. 7).

The apostle's words, "If some of the branches be broken off" (Rom. xi. 17) and the words of Wisdom, "The imperfect branches shall be broken off" (iv. 5) are similar. There are one or two more instances, but as they also appear to be reflections of O.T. passages they will not be cited here as examples.

When the apostle counseled the Romans in xiii. 1 to be subject to the higher powers, adding:--

> "For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God . . . . . for he is the minister of God to thee" (Rom. xiii. 1-4).

the Jews in that church would remember the words of Wisdom in the address to kings and judges:--

> "For power is given you of the Lord, and sovereignty from the Highest, Who shall try your works, and search out your counsels" (Wisdom vi. 3).

There is a further parallel between these two chapters in Wisdom vi. 18 and Rom. xiii. 10: "Love is the fulfilling of the law" (Rom. xiii.) and "Love is the keeping of her laws" (Wisdom vi.).

We shall not attempt a systematic survey of the parallels, but those that follow are sufficiently important to call for something more than a passing glance. Their cumulative effect is to leave the student with the impression that some of these apocryphal works had left their mark upon the language and the arguments employed by the apostle. They therefore merit attention as a means to the end of more clearly understanding his meaning. Can anyone, for example, read the following words in praise of wisdom, without immediately thinking of the apostle's ode to love in I Cor. xiii.?

> "Holy, one only, manifold, subtil, lively, clear, undefiled, plain, not subject to hurt, loving the thing that is good, quick, which cannot be letted, ready to do good, kind to man, steadfast, sure, free from care, having all power, overseeing all things, and going through all understanding, pure and most subtil" (Wisdom vii. 22, 23).

The words "free from care" that occurs here, are literally "without carefulness", and remind us of I Cor. vii. 32, "But I would have you without carefulness". In the same chapter, we have that said of Wisdom which reminds us of what is predicted by the apostle of Christ:--

> "For she is the brightness of the everlasting light, the unspotted mirror of the power of God, and the image of His goodness" (Wisdom vii. 26).

The apostle's use of the words "depart" and "departure" in Phil. i. 23 and II Tim. iv. 6 should be read with the words:--

> "In the sight of the universe they seemed to be dead and their departure was accounted a calamity . . . . . yet is their hope full of immortality . . . . . they shall judge the nations, and have dominion over the people, and the Lord shall reign for ever" (Wisdom iii. 1-8).

The association, moreover, with the thought of a "crown" or "prize" will not, we trust, pass unnoticed. While we are speaking of this subject of the "crown", we might read on in Wisdom until we reach chapter iv. where we read (concerning wisdom):--

> "It weareth a crown (that is, the wreath or garland used in athletic contests), and triumpheth for ever, having gotten the victory striving for undefiled rewards" (Wisdom iv. 2).

Can anyone read the following reference to "complete armour" without its calling to mind Eph. vi. 13-17?

> "He shall take to Him His jealousy for complete armour, and make the creature His weapon for revenge of His enemies. He shall put on righteousness as a breastplate, and true judgment instead of a helmet, He shall take holiness for an invincible shield, His severe wrath shall He sharpen for a sword" (Wisdom v. 17-20).

In Wisdom xi. 23 we read:--

> "But Thou hast mercy upon all; for Thou canst do all things, and winkest at the sins of men, because they should amend (literally, 'overlooked the sins of all men, with a view to repentance')."

We are forcibly reminded in this passage of Paul's words to the Athenians in Acts xvii. 30: "And the times of this ignorance God winked at; but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent."

Again, compare "the earthly house of this tabernacle" in II Cor. v. 1-4 with the following passage in the Book of Wisdom:--

> "For the corruptible body presseth down the soul, and the earthly tabernacle weighted down the mind" (Wisdom ix. 15).

Many of us, if we were asked the question, would probably say that we read of the translation of Enoch in the Book of Genesis. This is not strictly true, for the word does not occur in the Hebrew. It does, however, occur in the LXX and in the Book of Wisdom:--

> "He pleased God, and was beloved of Him: so that living among sinners he was translated" (Wisdom iv. 10).

Perhaps the most interesting of all comparisons connected with the Apocrypha are three evident references to it made by the Lord Jesus Himself in Matt. xxiii. and xxiv.:--

> "Wherefore, behold, I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes: and some of them ye shall kill and crucify . . . . . that upon you may come all the righteous blood . . . . ." (Matt. xxiii. 34, 35).
>
> "How often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not. Behold, your house is left unto you desolate" (Matt. xxiii. 37, 38).
>
> "All these are the beginning of sorrows" (Matt. xxiv. 8).

In the second book of Esdras we read these words:--

> "Thus saith the Almighty Lord, Have I not prayed you as a father his sons, as a mother her daughters, and a nurse her young babies, that ye would be My people, and I should be your God; that ye would be My children, and I should be your Father? I gathered you together as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings; but now, what shall I do unto you? I will cast you out from My Face. When ye offer unto Me, I will turn My Face from you: for your solemn feast days, your new moons, and your circumcisions, have I forsaken. I sent unto you My servants the prophets, whom ye have taken and slain, and torn their bodies in pieces, whose blood I will require of your hands, saith the Lord. Thus saith the Almighty Lord, Your house is desolate" (II Esdras i. 28-33).
> "The beginning of sorrows and great mournings: the beginning of famine and great dearth, the beginning of wars and the powers shall stand in fear, the beginning of evils" (II Esdras xvi. 18).

From these quotations it is evident that our Saviour had read and referred to the writings of Esdras, and if this is so, their interest to us is heightened.

Whether a careful collation of the writings of the Apocrypha with the N.T. has been made, we do not know. If any reader knows of such a work we shall be glad to hear, as we do not wish to spend time in vain; but what little we have seen by a casual reading convinces us that much more awaits the careful searcher. We trust the reader has received some help from these articles, and that the Apocryphal books of the O.T. have assumed a more kindly appearance. Another useful office filled by the Apocrypha is that of bridging the gulf between Malachi and Matthew, so supplying material that enable us to understand the changed conditions that we find upon opening the pages of the N.T. This, however, hardly falls under our title, “The Volume of the Book” and must await another series.

"What manner of persons ought ye to be."

#12. Symbols of Service. Interpreters and Intercessors.

pp. 10 - 12

The two symbols that are before us in this study are not only linked together by similarity of sound, but also—and this is far more important—by a common basic idea. The office of the interpreter and that of the intercessor merge into the idea of mediation, the mediation of the interpreter being manward, and the mediation of the intercessor being Godward.

THE INTERPRETER.—Even the church with all its gifts of tongues, miracles and prophecy was not complete without the gift of interpretation. The gift of tongues, so much coveted by the Corinthian church, was emptied of most of its value without the gift of interpretation also:-- > "Greater is he that prophesieth than he that speaketh with tongues, except he interpret, that the church may receive edifying . . . . . For if the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself to the battle? . . . . . Wherefore let him that speaketh in an unknown tongue pray that he may interpret . . . . . but if there be no interpreter, let him keep silence in the church" (I Cor. xiv. 5, 8, 13, 28).

We have given the above quotation, not because our readers belong to assemblies that have gift of tongues, but just to show how great a value was placed upon the gift of interpretation in the days when supernatural gifts were possessed by the church.

We do not feel called upon in this series to speak of the necessary qualifications for the interpreting of Scripture. That office is so distinct and rare; and if it is truly possessed, its possessor needs no help such as these articles could afford. There is, however, a ministry of interpretation that may be entered by us all, that is no less important than that of interpreting the Scriptures. It is the wonderful privilege of interpreting God to man.

This office was filled to the full by the Lord Himself. As the Word, and as the Image, He set forth God to men:--

> "No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath interpreted Him" (John i. 18).
>
> "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father" (John xiv. 9).

Job was told of this great Interpreter who would show to poor, sinful man His righteousness and point to the Ransom (Job xxxiii. 23, 24).

We remember, too, that Joseph and Daniel stand out prominently in the Scriptures as interpreters. Both were captives in a foreign land; both were used to reveal the will of the living God to heathen kings (Gen. xl., xli.; Dan. ii., iv., v., vii.). What sort of God do we reveal to those among whom we minister? Let us come down to the simpler issues. What of our high-sounding words concerning the purpose of the ages, and the fact that God is over all, and that habit of saying, "O bother it!" when we are vexed or disappointed? What sort of interpreters are we when we fail in longsuffering, patience, forgiveness and love? Interpretation has less to do with nouns and verbs than with thoughts and deeds. In the "Sermon on the Mount" we read:--

> "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven . . . . . Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you,; that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven" (Matt. v. 16, 44, 45).

"Pray for them"—this is the link between the interpreter of God to man and the intercessor for man with God.

THE INTERCESSOR.—The most unspiritual person would realize the incongruity of three believers kneeling in prayer, and beseeching the Lord to give the victory at a political election to three different and opposing parties. What the believer is to do and how he is to intercede is plainly revealed in I Tim. ii.:-- > "I exhort, therefore, that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men; for kings, and for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour" (I Tim. ii. 1-3).

It is evident that intercessory prayer covers a much wider sphere than that occupied by the Church. "All men", "kings", "all in authority" come within the scope. Wide, however, as is the scope of intercession, its purpose is limited. Kings and those in authority may be beneficent or tyrannical. Our prayer must not be debased into something political; it is to be directed to one end: "That we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty."

This twofold ministry of mediation, permitted to the believer, brings him very near to the Lord Himself, the one Mediator, the great Interpreter and Intercessor. It is a ministry that calls for no outstanding gifts; it makes no parade, and can go on in silence. It is a ministry, however, that is vital, and blessed are they who can, with unfeigned thanks, realize that in this respect they are following in the footsteps of the Son of God.

#13. Symbols of Service.
Joints and bands.
pp. 59 - 61

It is written of the Good Samaritan that "he came where he (the injured man) was". There is need for us to remember that all true service is blended with sympathy. Because this sympathy has, alas, sometimes been missing from charitable schemes, we find that the word "charity", which in the days of the A.V. could stand for love in its fullest sense, has now been set apart and is often viewed with suspicion. We even have the common phrase "as cold as charity". We therefore feel no hesitation in giving prominence to that aspect of service that is likened to a "joint" in the human body, a figure that demands unity as a first necessity.

Of all the tribes of Israel one, namely, Levi, was chosen to serve the tabernacle. The name Levi means "Joined". The origin of the name, speaking humanly, is pathetic. Leah, who was married to Jacob by an act of deception, must have felt her position badly. The Lord saw that Leah was hated, and to compensate, He granted to Leah that she should have several children, while Rachel, the beloved wife, remained barren. Leah's first child she called Reuben: "See a son", for she said, "Surely the Lord hath looked upon my affliction: now therefore my husband will love me." Again, she had another son, and called his name Simeon (that is, "Hearing") "Because", said she, "the Lord hath heard that I was hated". Again she had another son and called his name Levi, that is "Joined", saying, "Now this time will my husband be joined unto me". Her hopes do not appear to have materialized, for upon the birth of her fourth son, Leah said, "Now will I praise the Lord", and called his name Judah, meaning "Praise", and ceased bearing children (Gen. xxix. 31-35). It is not our purpose to pursue this theme; we have considered it only in so far as it throws light upon the name Levi. The tribe whose name means "Joined" is the tribe that stands for the service of God and man. That we are not drawing upon our imagination a reference to Numb. xviii. will show:--

> "Thy brethren also of the tribe of Levi, the tribe of thy father, bring also unto thee, that they may be joined (Heb. lavah as in Gen. xxix. 34) unto thee, and minister unto thee . . . . . before the tabernacle of witness . . . . . and a stranger shall not come nigh unto thee" (Numb. xviii. 2-4).

Here we not only see that the two phrases "joined unto thee" and "minister unto thee" are used together, but that the reverse is true—"a stranger" shall not come nigh. The word "stranger" is in the Hebrew zar, from zarah, "to sow, to scatter, to disperse"; so that it is just the reverse of the word "join". We do not feel that our readers require any elaboration of this point; it is obvious enough. We turn therefore to the N.T. parallel:--

> "The Head, even Christ: from Whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love" (Eph. iv. 15, 16).
> "Holding the Head, from Which all the body by joints and bands having nourishment ministered, and knit together, increaseth with the increase of God" (Col. ii. 19).

The unity here is twofold. First the whole body is joined to the Head. And secondly, every member is joined to some other member. Without the first union, there can be no life. Without the second, there can be no growth. Dislocation means disease, and without unity service is impeded, if not rendered impossible.

Barnabas gives us an example of what is right and what is wrong in the matter of fellowship in service. When the converted Saul of Tarsus assayed to join himself to the disciples at Jerusalem, they were afraid of him and believed not that he was a disciple. It was the good office of Barnabas, to lead the new disciple Saul by the hand, and to enable him to join the disciples as a brother and fellow-saint (Acts ix. 26, 27). On the other hand, it was Barnabas' determination to take John Mark with him on the visit to the churches of Asia Minor that caused the cleavage between himself and Paul (Acts xv. 36-41). We must be sure of those with whom we join; otherwise our very tenacity may prove our undoing.

There is also need to remember that fellowship in service does not cover the same ground as does fellowship in salvation. Many are under a wrong impression here. We ourselves have been criticized because of an apparent inconsistency in attitude. We do not make agreement in doctrine a basis for our fellowship, so far as the recognition of life in Christ and the hope of glory is concerned. But fellowship in service, and standing together on the same platform, with a believer who holds some doctrine that is unscriptural would not be an act of faith, but of compromise, and this we must avoid. We have said before that our "pew" is as wide as redemption itself; but our "platform" must be as narrow as the truth rightly divided.

The many references in which the apostle speaks of some beloved servant of Christ as a fellow-worker are helpful. One is graced with the title, "true yokefellow" (Phil. iv. 3); others in the same verse are called "fellow-labourers". Aristarchus had the honoured title "fellow-prisoner" (Col. iv. 10), while Epaphroditus bears the double title, "my fellow-worker and fellow-soldier" (Phil. ii. 25). The reader will be able to add to the examples here given, particularly if he can use the Greek concordance, for quite a number of examples appear that do not lend themselves as easily as those cited above to English translation.

Let us remember, then, that one essential in all service is unity; and one important symbol of service is that of Eph. iv. and Col. ii.: "Joints and bands."

#14. Symbols of Service.
The Keeper.
pp. 141 - 144

"None of us", said the apostle, "liveth to himself and no man dieth to himself" (Rom. xiv. 7). The context shews that the believer has a twofold responsibility: first to the Lord, and secondly to his brother. It is all too easy to say: "It is corban", to shirk our responsibility to our brethren under the plea that all is unto the Lord. It is also easy to put the service of our fellows on a plane higher than service to the Lord. We need the well-balanced presentation of the Word, that links together holiness and natural affection (II Tim. iii. 2, 3) as parts of one whole. The sad story of Cain is a record of double failure. We immediately call to mind his reply, "Am I my brother's keeper?" And we must also remember that he had already grievously failed in rendering to the Lord His due.

An important symbol of service is that of the "keeper", or "watchman" as the word is also translated.

Adam is described as a "keeper" in Gen. ii. 15: "And the Lord God took the man, and put him in the garden of Eden to dress it and to keep it." We must avoid confusing the two words here. "To dress it" refers to the ordinary work of the garden; the same Hebrew word occurs in Gen. ii. 5: "There was no man to till the ground." "To keep it", on the other hand, refers to the need for watchfulness as though the attack of an enemy were a possibility. How Adam failed to "keep" the charge entrusted to him, we all know to our grief. That the "keeping" had a direct connection with the tree of knowledge and the tree of life, Gen. ii. 16, 17 and iii. 24 bear witness:--

> "So He drove out the man; and He placed at the east of the garden of Eden Cherubims, and a flaming sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life" (Gen. iii. 24).

At the end of the O.T. in the Book of Malachi we find the words:--

> "The priest's lips should keep knowledge, and they should seek the law at his mouth: for he is the messenger of the Lord of Hosts" (Mal. ii. 7).

The Levitical priesthood, while primarily a sacrificing priesthood, was also the "keeper" of the law, the "keeper", not only in the sense of one who obeys and observes its precepts, but of one who watches over, guards and preserves inviolate the trust committed. This is a phase of ministry that is solemnly referred to by the apostle Paul in his last epistles:--

> "That good thing which was committed unto thee keep by the Holy Ghost, which dwelleth in us" (II Tim. i. 14).
>
> "O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust, avoiding profane and vain babblings, and oppositions of science falsely so called" (I Tim. vi. 20).

It is good to know that He Who looks to us to keep the trust committed to us, will Himself be our constant support. It was this that was the apostle's own stay, for he says in the context of the passage above:--

> "I know Whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to keep that which has been entrusted against that day" (II Tim. i. 12).

There are suggestions in these passages as to the evils against which the "keeper" should be on his guard, evils that spring from the same source as that which ruined Adam in the beginning. In referring to "profane and vain babblings and the antitheses of knowledge falsely so called", the apostle alludes to that specious system known as Gnosticism which, under different forms and names, still survives to-day.

"Be not ashamed." "God hath not given us the spirit of cowardice." "Nevertheless I am not ashamed." — These words from II Timothy suggest another avenue along which the sacred trust may be attacked. We are all "keepers"; and have our own particular gardens "to dress and to keep". Some good thing has been entrusted to us that we are expected to keep, and not all the refined opposition of "science falsely so called", nor the more brutal opposition of persecution must cause us to relinquish our post.

The title of "keeper" is employed in Scripture to define the work of a shepherd—"Abel was a keeper of sheep." In this connection David stands out prominently as one who was taken from the keeping of sheep to be ruler over the people of Israel (II Sam. vii. 8). What the keeping of sheep involved, let David tell us:--

> "Thy servant kept his father's sheep, and there came a lion, and a bear, and took a lamb out of the flock. And I went out after him, and smote him, and delivered it out of his mouth" (I Sam. xvii. 34, 35).

Young as he was, David had the true "keeper" spirit, for we read that when Jesse told him to go and visit his brethren at the battle front, he did not, with youthful forgetfulness, hurry off unmindful of his responsibility as a shepherd, but "rose up early in the morning, and left the sheep with a keeper" (I Sam. xvii. 20). His eldest brother taunted him in vain when he said: "With whom hast thou left those few sheep in the wilderness?" (I Sam. xvii. 28).

This same spirit is manifested by David on his arrival at the battle-field. He did not drop his baggage and run off to see what was going on, but first "left his carriage in the hand of the keeper of the carriage"—or, as Rotherham renders the passage: "Then David entrusted the provisions that were upon him to the care of the keeper of the stores" (I Sam. xvii. 22).

How many times have we left one part of service unprotected and unprovided for because of the claims of another. Yet true service is watchful of all responsibilities.

The Lord Himself, as the good Shepherd, entered into the "keeper" spirit of His office, and could say:--

> "While I was with them in the word, I kept them in Thy Name; those that Thou gavest Me I have kept, and none of them is lost . . . . . keep them from the evil" (John xvii. 12, 15).

The reader will be aware of the many passages that enjoin the believer to keep the Word of God, to keep the way, to keep the faith, to keep the unity. These should be found and added to the list, so that we may appreciate in some degree of fullness the fact that one great symbol of service is that of "the keeper".

#15. Symbols of Service.
The Labourer.
pp. 196 - 198

There are some who appear to look upon Christian service as though it were a matter of book knowledge and detailed examination of words, scarcely to be described as a piece of work at all. II Tim. ii. 15 opens with the word "study" (which actually means "endeavour", and has nothing necessarily to do with the "studious") but goes on to speak of a "workman"; and the same chapter speaks of service under the robust figures of athlete, soldier and farmer. True Christian service is labour. Let us see what Scripture says under this head. First, as to the different words so translated:--

Ergon.—Usually translated "work":--

> "I must work the works of Him that sent Me" (John ix. 4).
> "Always abounding in the work of the Lord" (I Cor. xv. 58).

This is the word used by the apostle in Philippians: "This is the fruit of my labour" (Phil. i. 22).

Kopos.—The word is derived from kopto = to strike, and means "a beating"; then, as if a beating of the breast, it means "wailing", "grief"; and carrying the idea still further, "wearisome effort", "toilsome labour", something that cannot be accomplished apart from toil and possibly tears. As an example we may take the words of the Lord in John iv. 38: "Other men laboured, and ye are entered into their labours."

Agonizomai.—This word belongs to the arena and the stadium. The substantive is translated "race", "fight", "contention" and "conflict". The verb is translated "strive", "fight" and "labour fervently". The cognate is translated "agony". The solemn association of this word with Gethsemane reveals an aspect of ministry that is far removed from anything merely scholastic or respectable. This word is used by the apostle in writing to the Colossians: "Always labouring fervently for you in prayer" (Col. iv. 12).

Closely allied with this the word translated "labour together" in Phil. iv. 3, where the original uses the word sunathleo, the latter half of which will be recognized as the origin of our word "athlete".

Christian service is, therefore, a work, a wearying labour and a conflict. Let us take a few specimen passages, which will show the usage of these words:--

> SERVICE IS WORK.—"As they ministered to the Lord, and fasted, the Holy Ghost said, Separate Me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them" (Acts xiii. 2).
>
> SERVICE IS LABOUR.—"In stripes, in imprisonments, in tumults, in labours, in watchings, in fastings" (II Cor. vi. 5).

Every word in this verse speaks of suffering and endurance, harmonizing with the primary meaning of the word "labour". The same association is found in II Cor. xi. 23:--

> "Are they ministers of Christ? . . . . . I am more: in labours more abundant, in stripes above measures, in prisons more frequent, in deaths oft."

The next five verses fill out a list of sufferings that are almost unbelievable—all an expansion of "ministry", weary labour indeed.

The apostle links together "labour and travail" in II Thess. iii. 8, yet we know that in all this labour, weary in it though he may have been, he was never weary of it, for as he wrote to the Thessalonians in the first epistle, his ministry was a "labour of love".

Service is Conflict.—The word agonizomai occurs only seven times in the N.T., and it may be helpful to see all the references together. We therefore give them without comment, to avoid occupying too much space:--

> "Strive to enter into the strait gate" (Luke xiii. 24).
>
> "If My kingdom were of this world, then would My servants fight" (John xviii. 36).
>
> "Every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things" (I Cor. ix. 25).
>
> "Wherein I also labour (kopiao) striving according to His working, which worketh in me mightily" (Col. i. 29).
>
> "Always labouring fervently for you in prayers" (Col. iv. 12).
>
> "Fight the good fight of faith" (I Tim. vi. 12).
> "I have fought a good fight" (II Tim. iv. 7).

To return to the words that most literally mean "labour", namely, kopos and kopiao, we cannot but rejoice to know that there is provision made for "all that labour and are heavy laden" in fellowship with One Who knew what it was to be despised and rejected and yet could at the same time look up to His Father with true submissiveness, and say: "Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in Thy sight."

We rejoice also to realize that though the apostle could, without boasting, say that he laboured "more abundantly than they all", yet he could add: "Yet not I, but the grace of God that was with me" (I Cor. xv. 10). In spite of a weariness sometimes overshadowed by death itself, we can rejoice that in the risen Christ, and by the power of His resurrection, no labour however wearisome can be "in vain", for such is "in the Lord" (I Cor. xv. 58).

#16. Symbols of Service. Messengers and Ministers.

pp. 246 - 248

In the days of our ignorance, many of us have sung: "I want to be an angel, and with the angels stand." We have since learned that the redeemed of the Lord will never be angels, although some, in resurrection glory, will be made like the angels in some respects. Some of us are rejoicing in a position, given by grace, that places us far above principalities and powers.

Angels, we are told, are "ministering spirits". Although the saint will never be an angel, yet in the wider sense of the word, all the redeemed may be "angels", for both the Hebrew malak and the Greek aggelos are translated "messenger". To be a messenger does not require learning or skill. It may call for expedition, but even a slow messenger is better than none. To be a messenger for the Lord is within the power of all.

A most important aspect of this form of service is expressed by Haggai:--

> "Then spake Haggai, the Lord's messenger in the Lord's message" (Hag. i. 13).

The messenger and the message should be closely associated, so that the one is but the outward expression of the other.

The words of Haggai might well be applied to dispensational truth, for one cannot dissociate Peter from the message to the circumcision, nor Paul from the grace of God to the Gentiles. And what is true of such messengers as Peter and Paul and Haggai should be true of us all. The man and his message should be closely united as possible. This, of course, involves practice as well as doctrine. As Paul puts it concerning himself: "Thou hast fully known my doctrine, manner of life" (II Tim. iii. 10).

The Book of Proverbs uses a striking figure when speaking of the messenger:--

> "As the cold of snow in the time of harvest, so is a faithful messenger to them that send him: for he refresheth the soul of his masters" (Prov. xxv. 13).

It is a blessed thought that the faithful messenger, even though his message be unpalatable to those who receive it, is a delight to the One who sent him. The figure is reversed further on in the same chapter of Proverbs, for in verse 25 we read: "As cold water to a thirsty soul, so is good news from a far country."

Thus the faithful messenger and the good news he brings refresh the heart of God and man. To be a messenger of the Lord, therefore, is no small privilege.

Heb. i. 14 has already shown us that messengers can be ministers. Let us look at this aspect of service. The words that are most frequently translated "minister" and "to minister" in the N.T. are diakonos and diskoneo. Some derive the word from the Greek, "Through the dust", indicating a runner in the hot dusty lands of the Bible. Whether or not this is true we cannot say, but the first thought associated with this form of service is lowliness. It is the sort of service that waits on others. In the narrowest sense, it is a "waiting at table". The essence of this aspect of ministry is seen in Christ Himself:--

> "Whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister . . . . . Even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many" (Matt. xx. 26, 28).

The Lord's own example in John xiii. fills out the words just quoted:--

> "If I then, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet; ye also ought to wash one another's feet. For I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done unto you" (John xiii. 14, 15).

The reader will hardly need reminding that the word "deacon" is the Anglicized form of the Greek word diakonos.

Another aspect of ministry is found in the word used by Paul of himself in Rom. xv. 16: "That I should be the minister of Jesus Christ."

Here the word is leitourgos, and its verbal form leitourgeo. Its meaning is "public service", derived from leitos, "public" (which comes from laos, "people") and ergon, "a work". At Athens, the leitourgoi were people of substance, who were obliged to assume certain responsibilities at their own expense. The word is used in the LXX of the ministry of the priests, and this aspects is evidently in view in the N.T. usage. It is so used in Luke i. 23 of the priest Zachariah, and in Heb. x. 11.

A reference to "public ministry" in the Athenian sense of the term is found in Rom. xiii. 4, 6, where the "powers that be" are in view. The word also occurs in Rom. xv. 27, in reference to the contribution made by the Gentiles for the poor saints at Jerusalem. "It is their duty", says the apostle, with an evident allusion to the obligation resting upon the men of substance at Athens.

One other word must be considered before we conclude our study, and that is huperetes, literally "an under-rower". It indicates a subordinate position, and may refer either to the relationship between the Lord's servant and the Lord Himself, or the relationship between one servant of the Lord and another. Paul was an "under-rower", and gladly accepted the office:--

> "I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness" (Acts xxvi. 16).

The lowest office is mentioned first. He could only be a witness, and an apostle, as he recognized the Lordship of Christ.

John Mark was given to Saul and Barnabas as their "under-rower". But he failed, and left them when the course was set for Pamphylia (Acts xiii. 5, 13; xv. 38). It is extremely difficult to find those engaged in Christian service who are willing to occupy this lowly place of "under-rower". Yet unless one is recognized as director and leader and another as subordinate and a helper, how can the work go forward?

When we remember that Paul himself so gladly took this lowly place, both at his commission (Acts xxvi. 16) as we have seen, and in his own voluntary submission—"These hands have ministered unto my necessities, and to them that were with me" (Acts xx. 34) we cannot but feel it a privilege to be entrusted with the same "under-rower's" place.

It was the glory of the Son of God that He was like a man "under authority" (Luke vii. 8), and the servant is not greater than his Lord. We bless the Lord for the ministry of humble hands and hearts, known by few on earth but treasured in heaven. Surely the believer whose doctrine includes the words, "Not I, but Christ", can be given no office, however lowly, that cannot be accepted gratefully as a means of glorifying the Lord and of following in His steps.

"When the commandment came"

(Being a series of articles based upon the testimony of readers as to the particular passage of Scripture that was used to enlighten them as to the unique character of the Dispensation of the Mystery).

#7. The Hope of the calling.
pp. 111, 112

We have chronicled in this series different passages of Scripture which have been used to bring conviction of the truth of the mystery, and, enlightenment to the mind as to its unique character. We have found that no two persons are alike in their approach to Scripture, and no two persons seem to be influenced in exactly the same way. Certain passages that have been brought forward may have appeared to some as rather remote from the subject; the one we are now to record, however, is a passage that is quite to the point. The reader whose experience we draw upon here was puzzled at the passage in Acts xiii. 46, which records the apostle as saying "Lo, we turn to the Gentiles". Did this mean that the dispensation changed at that time and place? Were the Jews set aside from Acts xiii. onward? Did the dispensation of the grace of God to the Gentiles then commence?

The opening verse of Acts xiv. prevents us from believing that the words of Acts xiii. 46 were addressed to the whole nation, for we find Paul once more following his custom and going to the synagogue of the Jews. After meditating upon the subject and searching the Scriptures further, our reader realized that the words of the apostle in Acts xxviii. 20 indicated that the hope of Israel covered the period of the Acts from beginning to end, and that the nation-wide rejection of Israel did not take place until the apostle had so solemnly spoken to the leaders of the Jews in Rome. What had been foreshadowed in Acts xiii. 40-46 now took place. The essential point that our brother realized was that "hope" and "calling" are allied. The "one hope" of the calling of the dispensation of the mystery could not possibly be connected with the hope of Israel. While the one remained in force, the other was not revealed. As soon as he saw this relation of "hope" and "calling", and its bearing upon the dispensational character of the Acts, and of the epistles written during that period, all was clear, and the joy of a clearly understood position before the Lord was his.

We commend to every reader this line of approach, both for their own enlightenment and confirmation, and for the help of enquirers. Bring together every passage of Scripture written during the Acts and in the epistles of the period (Galatians, I and II Thessalonians, Hebrews, I and II Corinthians and Romans) that deals with the hope before Israel and the church at that time, and the issue will be clear. Seek from Scripture the answer to the question, "What is the hope of the calling" that is in view, and this answer will lead to clearer views of dispensational truth.

"With all thy getting, get understanding" (Prov. iv. 7).

#16. Figures of Speech.
An examination of the scope of the subject.
pp. 12 - 14

The first examination in scriptural subjects taken by the writer after his conversion was in the subject of the "figurative language of the Bible", following a course of lectures given by the Rev. Jas. Neil, M.A. His little book, entitled "Strange Figures", consisting of only 96 pages, is a treasure, and every reader is urged to secure a copy whenever the opportunity occurs. The larger and more complete work on the subject is, of course, "Figures of speech used in the Bible" by Dr. E. W. Bullinger, which has become a classic. In that work two hundred and seventeen figures of speech are tabulated, explained and illustrated by Scripture, these illustrations amounting to nearly 8,000 references.

The Companion Bible, in Appendix 6, gives a list of 181 figures of speech, arranged in alphabetical order with their classical and English names, a short explanation, and several scriptural references. A patient examination of this Appendix alone would provide a very useful acquaintance with the figures of speech used in the Bible. The alphabetical order, however, although suitable for easy reference, does not provide the best way of learning the subject. The first figure given in this Appendix is Accismus or Apparent Refusal (Matt. xv. 22-26). Now this is starting the subject in the middle. We have to learn that Accismus is a figure of speech involving change; and further, that change affects the meaning, the arrangement, and the application of words. We discover, further, that Accismus involves change of application. In general, application may affect sense, person, subject-matter, feeling, and argumentation; and in the particular case of Accismus, it is a change in the application of its argumentation. Now this cannot be appreciated merely by reading lists of words. We must approach the subject, as we must approach all other lines of study, by seeing it first as a whole, then in its primary subdivisions, and then gradually descending until we arrive at the individual figures.

Figures of speech are a part of the subject "Language", and "Language" includes Grammar and Rhetoric. Grammar has to do with words in their constructive arrangements; Rhetoric is concerned with the art of speaking with persuasion. Another branch of the science of Language is Etymology, or a study of the derivation and pedigree of words. These three branches of the science of language cover the range of figures of speech. These may be grouped as follows:--

i. FIGURES OF ETYMOLOGY.—These are departures from the ordinary spelling of words; for example, the poetic use of "o'er" for "over", or the romantic use of the old-fashioned spelling "olde" for "old". With these we shall have little to do, as they are not many in number and do not appear in the Scriptures.

ii. FIGURES OF SYNTAX OR GRAMMAR.—These are figures of speech that alter the arrangement of words in a sentence, or alter the meaning of words for emphasis or effect.

iii. FIGURES OF RHETORIC.—These are figures that use words with an unusual application.

This threefold division is based upon the nature of the subject, and seems the most useful.

Dr. Bullinger arranged his treatise under the three following heads:--

i. Figures which depend for their peculiarity on OMISSION.

ii. Figures which depend upon ADDITION by REPETITION.

iii. Figures which depend upon CHANGE, or alteration in the usage or application of words.

The reader who, "in all his getting", desires to "get understanding", will probably appreciate the following remarks from Dr. Bullinger's Introductory Note to the subject:--

> "How are we to know, then, when words are to be taken in their simple, original form (i.e. literally), and when they are to be taken in some other and peculiar form (i.e. as a figure)? The answer is, that, whenever and wherever it is possible, the words of Scripture are to be understood literally, but when a statement appears to be contrary to our experience, or to known fact, or revealed truth; or seems to be at variance with the general teaching of Scriptures, then we may reasonably expect that some figure is employed."

We shall, therefore, watch carefully for any departure from the usual in Scripture, believing that all such departures are intentional and for a specific purpose. On the other hand, we shall be careful to keep to the literal truth of the Scriptures. God has spoken concerning Jew, Gentile and Church, concerning heaven, earth, and the sphere that is "far above all heavens" (Eph. iv. 10). We are not at liberty to interpret Zion as meaning the Church, or the 144,000 of the twelve tribes of Israel as meaning saved Gentiles. The specific promises made to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob concerning a land and a seed cannot be spiritualized and made to refer to a Church consisting of saved Gentiles, with no hope in Palestine, but a hope in heaven. With a true understanding of the significance of figures of speech, we shall not fall into the Romish error concerning the word of Christ, "This is My body"; neither shall we confuse symbolic titles such as the "Bride" and the "Body".

In our next article, we hope to take this study a step further, and deal with some important examples of Figures of Speech in the Bible.

#17. Figures of Speech.
Ellipsis, or Omission, as it affects words.
pp. 61 - 64

We saw in our last paper that Figures of Speech, so far as the Scriptures are concerned, are distributed under three heads: (i) Omission (ii) Addition (iii) Change.

The Figures that relate to Omission are eleven in number, and are divided as follows:--

Figures involving Omission.

(i) Affecting words.

1)	Ellipsis	:	or	Omission.
2)	Zeugma	:	or	Unequal yoke.
3)	Asyndeton	:	or	No ands.
4)	Aphaeresis	:	or	Front cut.
5)	Apocopo	:	or	End cut.

(ii) Affecting the sense.

6)	Aposiopesis	:	or	Sudden silence.
7)	Meiosis	:	or	Belittling.
8)	Tapeinosis	:	or	Demeaning.
9)	Catabasis	:	or	Gradual descent.
10)	Syllogismus	:	or	Omission of the conclusion.
11)	Enthymema	:	or	Omission of the premise.

The word "Ellipsis" is from the Greek, and means "a leaving in". From our point of view, we call it "a leaving out", as the gap that is "left in" suggests that words have been "left out". The following is an every-day example of Ellipsis from the advertisement columns of a daily newspaper, dealing with holiday apartments:--

"Brd.-Res. Bed-bkfst., excel. cuis. mod. 5 min. pier."

This, of course, is not a specimen of the literary figure, but is given to show that "Omission" is by no means merely academic.

Again, when one has to frame a telegram, the figure of "Omission" is nearly always employed, if only for the sake of economy.

In many cases, the Ellipsis is correctly supplied in the A.V. and R.V. by the use of italic type. In some cases, however, the italic additions of the versions are not true; each addition should be scrutinized before acceptance.

Ellipsis is of three kinds:--

(1) Absolute.—Here the omitted word or words are to be supplied from the nature of the subject alone.
(2) Relative.—Here the omission is suggested by the context.
(3) Repetitive.—Here the omitted word or words are to be supplied from a clause which precedes or follows.

The original of Eph. iv. 9, "Now that He ascended", reads as in the R.V., "Now this, He ascended". We must supply the Ellipsis and say: "Now this fact" or "Now this expression, He ascended, what is it (or what does it imply) if not this, that He also descended first into the lower parts of the earth?"

In Phil. iii. 12 the apostle says that he was not already "perfect"; yet in verse 15 he is represented as saying, "Let us, therefore, as many as be perfect, be thus minded". As there is no verb in the original, we are at liberty to substitute the words "desire to be" before "perfect", and so keep the passage in harmony with the context.

A most important passage in connection with our subject is II Tim. iii. 16. The A.V. reads: "All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable." The R.V. reads: "Every scripture inspired by God is also profitable."

The following passages are identical in their construction with II Tim. iii. 16: "All things are naked and opened" (Heb. iv. 13). According to the principle of II Tim. iii. 16 R.V. this would read: "All naked things are also opened" (which does not make sense).

"Many are weak and sickly" (I Cor. xi. 30). This would read: "Many weak ones are also sickly" (which tells us nothing).

There are altogether nine passages of this sort in the N.T., all of similar construction: Rom. vii. 12; I Cor. xi. 30; II Cor. x. 10; I Tim. i. 15, iv. 9; I Tim. ii. 3; I Tim. iv. 4; Heb. iv. 13; and II Tim. iii. 16. In all except II Tim. iii. 16, the Revisers follow the A.V. They single out II Tim. iii. 16, and supply a wrong ellipsis, thus robbing the passage of its point, and the epistle of its testimony to the inspiration of Scripture.

The reader will realize that we cannot attempt in these pages anything beyond the most superficial analysis of this great theme of Figures of Speech. Dr. Bullinger found 1104 pages none too many, and our complete output for one year's Berean Expositor is but 240. The examination of Ellipsis alone occupies 130 pages in Dr. Bullinger's work. The reader will see, therefore, that anything more than indication is beyond us.

Let us pass on for a moment to the second figure. Zeugma.—This means a "yoke", and the figure is so called because one verb is yoked on to two subjects, while strictly it refers only to one of them. The second verb is omitted:--

> "And Adah bare Jabal; he was the father of such as dwell in tents and . . . . . cattle" (Gen. iv. 20).

The A.V. supplies the missing verb by putting in italics "such as have".

Asyndeton (or "No ands".).—There is something dramatic in the use of this figure. We are not allowed to pause, but are hurried on to the climax:--

> "Now if any build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; every man's work shall be made manifest" (I Cor. iii. 12, 13).

We do not pause to consider each item, but are hurried on to the day when "every man's work shall be made manifest", declared by fire.

The figure opposite to this is called Polysyndeton, or "Many ands", and has just the opposite effect, causing one to stop and linger over each word or phrase.

Aphaeresis (or "Front cut") is seen in the change of name of the king who once was known as "Jeconiah" ("Let Jehovah establish") to "Coniah", of whom it was said, "Write this man childless" (Jer. xxii. 30).

Of the figures we have looked at, Ellipsis is by far the most important, and to enable the reader to appreciate this, we will conclude by a further analysis of Relative Ellipsis.

Relative Ellipsis.

(1) WHERE THE OMITTED WORD IS SUPPLIED FROM A cognate WORD, OCCURRING IN THE IMMEDIATE CONTEXT.—A good example is found in the italic type supplied by the A.V. in Rom. xii. 6-8.

(2) WHERE THE OMITTED WORD IS SUPPLIED FROM A contrary WORD.—Rom. vi. 17 must not be read as though the apostle thanked God that any were the servants of sin. The word "though" must be supplied: "Though ye were the servants of sin, yet ye have obeyed."

(3) WHERE THE OMITTED WORD IS SUPPLIED FROM analogous OR related WORDS.—Rom. xvi. 16 does not give sanction for men and women to kiss one another indiscriminately. The Ellipsis to be supplied is, "Salute one another (men and women respectively) with a holy kiss".

We trust none will allow themselves to be deterred by the strange names of these figures, or the apparent difficulties attending their study. No pains are too great that enable us to grow in knowledge of the Word, and as we proceed, further and fuller advantages attending this study will become apparent.

#18. Figures of Speech.
Ellipsis, or Omission, as it affects sense.
pp. 148 - 150

The Figures of Omission that affect sense are six in number.

Aposiopesis.—We sometimes find that "words fail us", or that silence is even more eloquent than speech. An example occurs in Gen. iii. 22:--

> "And now, lest he put forth his hand, take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live for ever—Therefore the Lord God sent him forth."

We are conscious that something is left unsaid. It would seem that the consequences attending the immortality of Adam after his fall are two awful for speech. The blank is eloquent. This is an example of Aposiopesis or "sudden silence"; a figure used in connection with a promise, anger, grief, etc.

Meiosis, or "a belittling", is a figure that is used when one thing is belittled in order to magnify another. The following are examples:--

> "And we were in our own sight as grasshoppers" (Numb. xiii. 33).
> "Who am less than the least of all saints" (Eph. iii. 8).

Tapeinosis, or "demeaning", differs from Meiosis in that Meiosis belittles one thing that it may magnify another, while Tapeinosis demeans a thing in order that it may increase or magnify it. When the apostle said that he was a citizen of "no mean city", he really held Tarsus in high esteem. And when he said he was "not ashamed of the gospel of Christ", we know that he really valued it beyond life itself.

Catabasis, or "gradual descent", emphasizes humiliation, sorrow, etc. Two examples will suffice; one from the O.T. and one from the N.T.:--

> "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength:
> They shall mount up with wings as eagles;
> They shall run and not be weary;
> They shall walk and not faint" (Isa. xl. 31).

Here the descent is manifest in the transition from "mounting with wings" to "running" and so to "walking".

> "Who, being in the form of God,
> Thought it not robbery to be equal with God:
> But made Himself of no reputation,
> And took upon Him the form of a servant,
> And was made in the likeness of men.
> And being found in fashion as a man,
> He humbled Himself,
> And became obedient unto death,
> Even the death of the cross" (Phil. ii. 6-8).

This figure is balanced by Anabasis or "gradual ascent", which comes under the Figure of Addition, to be considered later.

Syllogismus, or "omission of the conclusion", is a departure from the regular form of logical argument, partly for the sake of emphasis, and partly because it is often unnecessary, in conversation or writing, to follow to a logical conclusion. This leaves room for the imagination which fills up the gap far more vividly than a great deal of writing:--

> "But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, nor on the sabbath day" (Matt. xxiv. 20).

These words leave the reader to "draw his own conclusions". No Jew, resident in Palestine, knowing the condition of the roads, the fanaticism of the inhabitants, the effect of the weather on travel, needed a word to be added; his imagination would supply all the rest, and be a sufficient urge for him to make this prayer his own.

A similar figure to Syllogismus, which omits the conclusion of an argument, is Enthymeme, or the "omission of the premise". This is an everyday figure of speech, in spite of its learned appearance. We rarely present a complete argument, and the two Greek words that give us the name of this figure suggest that something is "held in the mind" but unspoken.

The omission of part of an argument may occur in three ways:--

FIRST ORDER.—The major premise understood:
John is a coward; for John is a liar.
SECOND ORDER.—The minor premise understood:
John is a coward; for all liars are cowards.
THIRD ORDER.—The conclusion understood:
All liars are cowards, and John is a liar.

This third order has already been presented under the heading Syllogismus.

Such everyday expressions as "Draw your own conclusion" and "It goes without saying" show how usual it is for our reasoning to run in the form of the Enthymeme, and not the complete and formal Syllogism. Compare any formal presentation of the argument with the agitation, fear, and concern of Pilate's wife, and her mode of reasoning when she said: "Have thou nothing to do with that just man" (Matt. xxvii. 19). The first would be quenched, and her appeal fall flat, if it were presented with major and minor premise, followed by "Therefore" and the conclusion.

The reader will find the Enthymeme used very effectively when the suggestion of the writer is ironical, and if he cares to read the speech that Mark Anthony made over the dead body of Cæsar, he will find several interesting examples.

We have now surveyed the Figures of Omission that are found in Scripture. This is the smallest group, and perhaps the least in importance and interest. Dr. Bullinger has devoted considerable space to this subject and the interested reader should refer to "Figures of Speech" or the "Companion Bible" for further information. Our space will not permit further notes here. We are but surveying this great subject, and trust that the little help we may be able to give on such a theme may not be too elementary or disjointed.

#19. Figures of Speech.
Figures involving addition.
pp. 192 - 196

The figures that involve omission are comparatively few in number and importance. Those that involve addition and repetition are much greater in number, interest and importance, and it will not be possible in these pages to deal with all that have been enumerated. We can give but a representative selection.

Before we deal with any one figure, it will be helpful to see the set of figures as a whole.

Figures involving Addition.

(i) Affecting words. (ii) Affecting the sense.

The figures that affect words are sub-divided as follows:--

(1) Repetition or addition of the same letters, e.g. Alliteration.
(2) Repetition or addition of different letters, e.g. Acrostic.
(3) Repetition or addition of the same word in the same sense. In this section there are sixteen varieties.
(4) Repetition or addition of the same word in a different sense. In this section there are four varieties.
(5) Repetition or addition of different words in similar order and sense. One example here is the figure Symploce or intertwining.
(6) Repetition or addition of different words in a different order but the same sense. There are two cases here, one being the well-known Inversion.
(7) Repetition or addition of different words similar in sound, but different in sense. Of this the common "pun" or play upon words is a familiar example.
(8) Repetition or addition of different words different in sound, but similar in sense. Of this the well-known Synonym is an example.
(9) Repetition of sentences or phrases. Five varieties are given.
(10) Repetition of subjects. This heading covers Parallelism, both simple and complex, and Correspondence, whether alternate, introverted or complex.

Figures of Addition that affect words, are distributed as follows: (1) By repetition. (2) By amplification. (3) By description. (4) By way of conclusion. (5) By interposition. (6) By way of reasoning.

Under these six headings, we find fifty-three different varieties, so that it will be readily seen that, however lightly we touch upon this subject, it is by no means an easy task, and the necessity to be brief adds to the difficulty. We therefore ask the indulgence of the reader, his prayerful sympathy and close attention.

The figure of Alliteration is difficult to set out in English, as the examples concern are written in Hebrew and in Greek. We therefore pass on to the Acrostic, which is of frequent occurrence in the Old Testament Scriptures, but even this will require translating into English equivalents.

Quite a number of passages of the O.T. stand out to the eye and impress the memory, by the fact that they are arranged so that each line begins with a letter of the alphabet, and in alphabetical order. Psalm cxix. is a familiar example, and with very slight modification we can use the A.V. of one stanza as it is, to set forth the effect upon the eye, of the original.

Teth (T).---Verses 65-72.

"Thou hast dealt well with Thy servant, O Lord, according unto Thy word.
Teach me good judgment and knowledge: for I have believed Thy commandments.
'Till I was afflicted I went astray; but now have I kept Thy word.
Thou art good, and doest good; teach me Thy statutes.
The proud have forged a lie against me: but I keep Thy precepts with my whole heart.
Their heart is as fat as grease: but I delight in Thy law.
'Tis good for me that I have been afflicted: that I might learn Thy statutes.
The law of Thy mouth is better unto me than thousands of gold and silver."

Perhaps the most wonderful Acrostic in the O.T. is the Book of the Lamentations of Jeremiah. There are 22 letters in the Hebrew alphabet, and the five chapters of the Lamentations will be found to have 22 verses each, except the third, which contains 66 verses. The first two chapters present two perfect Acrostics of the Hebrew alphabet, each verse commencing with a letter of the alphabet in its correct order. The central chapter of 66 verses has a peculiar variety of Acrostic—the first three verses open with Aleph, the next three with Beth, and so on right through the alphabet. Let us make this clear to the English reader. Our attempt must not, of course, be regarded in the light of a translation. Moreover, the third letter in the Hebrew alphabet is equivalent to G, and not C.

Lamentations iii. 1-9.
(Freely translated in order that the Acrostic may be seen).

Affliction I have seen, a man am I who has passed under the rod of His wrath.
Away from the light and into darkness He brought me.
Against me, surely, is He turned; He turneth His hand against me all day long.
Broken are my bones, my skin and my flesh made old.
Built in, and encompassed as with gall and travail.
Buried as in a tomb in darkness and with the dead.
Chained and hedged about so that I cannot go out.
Cry as I will and shout, He shutteth out my prayer.
Crooked hath He made my paths, and enclosed as with hewn stone.

For a very remarkable Acrostic that lies buried in the Book of Esther, the reader is referred to "Figures of Speech" (Dr. E. W. Bullinger), "The Companion Bible", or Dr. Bullinger's pamphlet: "The Name of Jehovah in the Book of Esther."

The figure Anaphora, or "Like beginnings", repeats a word several times at the beginning of successive phrases and so impresses us with its importance. Here are two examples, one from the O.T. (Hosea iii. 4) and one from the N.T. (Eph. vi. 12):--

"For the children of Israel shall abide many days WITHOUT a king, and \ i.e. neither a king of their own,
WITHOUT a prince, and / nor a foreign ruler.
WITHOUT a sacrifice, and \ i.e. neither Mosaic sacrifices,
WITHOUT an image, and / nor idolatrous ones.
WITHOUT an ephod, and \ i.e. neither Aaronic priests, WITHOUT teraphim." / nor idolatrous ones.

"For we wrestle not AGAINST flesh and blood, but AGAINST principalities,
AGAINST powers,
AGAINST the rulers of the darkness of this world,
AGAINST spiritual wickedness in high places."

The figure Polysyndeton, or "Many Ands", is the opposite of Asyndeton, or "No Ands", referred to on page 64. The use of Polysyndeton is a call to pause, to consider, to weigh each step and clause. We select a short example, but to get the full thought the reader should turn up the examples given in "Figures of Speech" and the examples noted in "The Companion Bible". Many of these are of great length, and it is the length that impresses.

"My sheep hear My voice
AND I know them
AND they follow me
AND I give unto them eternal life;
AND they shall never perish,
AND not any one shall pluck them out of My hand" (John x. 27, 28).

#20. Figures of Speech.
Figures involving addition (continued).
pp. 241 - 245

The figure called Epanadiplosis, or "Encircling", was known not only to the Greeks, but to the Jews, for the Massorah contains two lists of its use (See Dr. Ginsburg's Massorah). We give one example from the N.T. in an amended version. It must be explained that in the A.V. the word pneuma is translated both "wind" and "spirit" in this verse, but never translated "wind" elsewhere. Also, the word for "sound" is literally "voice"; and "listeth" is "willeth". Thus we read:--

> "THE SPIRIT breatheth where He willeth, and thou hearest His voice, but thou knowest not whence He cometh or whither He goeth: so is every one that is born of THE SPIRIT" (John iii. 8).

The figure is called "Encircling", because the word with which the sentence opens is repeated at the close.

Climax, or "Gradation", is the name given to that figure of speech by which the mind is conducted by a series of upward steps to a conclusion. The Greek word klimax means a ladder. We cannot, very easily, print passages so that the eye shall ascend, but that is the mental picture we should have of this figure:--

"We glory also in
TRIBULATIONS: knowing that
TRIBULATION worketh PATIENCE: and PATIENCE (worketh)
EXPERIENCE; and EXPERIENCE (worketh)
HOPE: and
HOPE maketh not ashamed" (Rom. v. 3-5).

Symploce, or "Intertwining", is the name given to the figure of speech in which there is a repetition of different words in successive sentences, without change of either order or sense:--

"IT IS SOWN in corruption;
IT IS RAISED in incorruption.
IT IS SOWN in dishonour;
IT IS RAISED in glory.
IT IS SOWN in weakness;
IT IS RAISED in power.
IT IS SOWN a natural body;
IT IS RAISED a spiritual body" (I Cor. xv. 42-44).

Epanodos, or "Inversion", employs repetition, but the words are used, while retaining the same sense, in inverse order:--

> "Make the HEART of this people fat, and make their EARS heavy, and shut their EYES; lest they see with their EYES, and hear with their EARS, and understand with their HEART" (Isa. vi. 10).

The reader will recognize that this and similar figures of speech underlie the "structures" that are such an important feature of the inspired composition of the Scriptures. To present this more clearly, it has been found useful to employ certain devices such as letters and indentation. Thus, the structure of the above citation from Isa. vi. would necessitate a framework as follows:--

A | HEART.
  B | EARS.
    C | EYES.
    C | EYES.
  B | EARS.
A | HEART.

While this is a very obvious case, and almost too simple to need setting out, we commend it to any who are at all puzzled by the more elaborate structural forms that are used. They can all be resolved into the most simple basic types.

When Epanodos (or "Inversion") opposes words one to the other it is called Antimetabole, or "Counterchange". Another name for this figure is Metathesis, or "Transposition". The following is an example, viz., Gal. v. 17:--

A | The FLESH lusteth.
  B | Against the SPIRIT.
  B | And the SPIRIT.
A | Against the FLESH.

Paronomasia, or "Rhyming Words": this is a figure that repeats words of the same sound, but not of the same sense. The dictionary definition of a "pun" is "a play on words that resemble each other in sound, but differ in sense": so that the figure Paronomasia is no stranger to most of us. It is difficult to represent the scriptural figure in English, for we are obviously dealing with Hebrew and Greek, and the play upon words disappears when translated.

However, many readers will be acquainted with the figure in Gen. i. 2:--

> "And the earth became tohu and bohu ("without form and void")."

Another example, which is possibly familiar to many, occurs in Jer. i. 11:--

"What seest thou? And I said, I see a rod of an almond tree (shaked). Then said the Lord unto me, Thou hast well seen; for I will watch over it (shoked)" (See R.V. and A.V. margin).

Synonymia, or "Synonymous words": the repetition of words similar in sense, but different in sound. The synonym and its selection is a subject in itself. The right choice of synonyms is a matter which requires care, and much truth may be distorted or veiled by carelessness. We hope to devote a special series to this subject later. Meanwhile we give on example of the figure from the epistle to the Philippians:--

"Those things, which ye have both LEARNED, and RECEIVED, and HEARD, and SEEN
in me, do" (Phil. iv. 9).

Amoebaion, or "Refrain", is the repetition of the same phrase at the end of successive paragraphs. It was the observation of this feature in Eph. i. 3-14 that led us to discover the structure of the passage, which is as follows:--

Eph. i. 3-14.

A1 | 3-6-. The WILL of the FATHER.
B1 | -6. The Refrain: "Praise of the glory of His grace."
A2 | 7-12-. The WORK of the SON.
B2 | -12. The Refrain: "Praise of the glory."
A3 | 13,14-. The WITNESS of the SPIRIT.
B3 | -14. The Refrain: "Praise of the glory."

Parallelism is a figure that employs the repetition of subjects instead of individual words. It is a form of the figure Synonymia, and has seven different varieties:--

I. SIMPLE: (1) Gradational. (2) Opposite. (3) Constructive.
II. COMPLEX: (1) Alternate. (2) Repeated Alternation.
(3) Extended Alternation. (4) Introverted.

The figure has been noted from the earliest times, but the names of Bishop Lowth and Bishop Jebb will always be gratefully remembered as pioneers in its modern presentation. We give one example of each of the seven kinds of Parallelism.

I. SIMPLE.

(1) Synonymous or Gradational.

"My soul doth magnify the Lord; And my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour" (Luke i. 46, 47).

Here the lines are parallel in thought, and the words used are synonymous: "soul" and "spirit", "magnify" and "rejoice", "Lord" and "God my Saviour".

(2) Antithetic or Opposite.

"A wise son maketh a glad father; But a foolish son is the heaviness of his mother" (Prov. x. 1).

(3) Synthetic or Constructive.

"The law of the Lord . . . . .
The testimony of the Lord . . . . .
The statutes of the Lord . . . . .
The commandment of the Lord . . . . .
The fear of the Lord . . . . .
The judgments of the Lord . . . . ." (Psa. xix. 7-9).

II. COMPLEX.

(1) Alternate.

A | "The Egyptians are men,
B | And not God:
A | And their horses are flesh,
B | And not Spirit" (Isa. xxxi. 3).

(2) Repeated Alternation.

A1 | "If any man love the world,
B1 | The love of the Father is not in him.
A2 | For all that is in the world . . . . .
B2 | Is not of the Father,
A2 | But is of the world" (I John ii. 15, 16).

(3) Extended Alternation.

A | "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth,
B | Where moth and rust doth corrupt,
C | And where thieves break through and steal.
A | But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven,
B | Where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt,
C | And where thieves do not break through and steal" (Matt. vi. 19, 20).

(4) Introverted Parallelism.

A | POWER.—Christ is the power of God.
B | WISDOM.—And the wisdom of God.
B | WISDOM.—The foolishness of God is wiser than men.
A | POWER.—The weakness of God is stronger than men" (I Cor. i. 24, 25).

Here we must leave this interesting subject, and in our next article take up the figure of Correspondence, which is based on parallelism of theme rather than of lines or words or propositions.

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS.

With the conclusion of another year's testimony, we are constrained to give a word of thanksgiving to the Lord for all-sufficient grace; a word of grateful acknowledgment to His people for continued fellowship; and a word commending this another Volume of The Berean Expositor to all who love the Scriptures and who appreciate our attempt at their right division.

While our primary object is to "make known what is the dispensation of the mystery," the reader will observe that fundamental truth has by no means been forgotten. Moreover, we trust that those articles which are designed to help to clearer thinking and the "getting of understanding" will be found useful.

With this Volume we conclude the re-issue of Volume VI., and again thank those friends whose fellowship has enabled us to re-print this Volume without increasing the cost of the magazine to the reader.

We rejoice with our fellow-labourers up and down the land not only for sustained interest but for growth in many centres of witness, and earnestly pray that all needed grace may be given to all concerned so that these open doors may be entered, and the truth made known.

We gratefully acknowledge another year's faithful co-operation on the part of a number whose names do not appear in print, but whose faithful services contribute in no small degree to the production and circulation of this monthly witness.

Yours in our One Head,

CHARLES H. WELCH.
FREDK. P. BRININGER.

The answer of a good conscience.

No. 4.

Liberties and Scruples.

The first epistle to the Corinthians provides a fairly full example of a "case of conscience" and the way the believer should act in such circumstances. In chapter viii. we have the question of eating things offered to idols, a custom in vogue throughout the Roman Empire in the days of the apostles. After giving the necessary warning that a mere boastful knowledge may be as harmful as a bad conscience, the apostle proceeds:—

> "As concerning, therefore, the eating of those things that are offered in sacrifice unto idols, we know that an idol is nothing in the world" (1 Cor. viii. 4).

From one point of view this settles the question. The piece of meat will be neither better nor worse for having been offered up to a block of stone, and it would be foolish to go without useful and wholesome food for such a reason. The question, however, is not finished and settled by this fact, since all believers are not of the same calibre, faith or understanding:—

> "Howbeit there is not in every man that knowledge: for some with conscience of the idol unto this hour eat it as a thing offered unto an idol; and their conscience being weak is defiled" (1 Cor. viii. 7).

It becomes evident that we have here the working of the principle found in Rom. xiv.:—

"I know, and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus, that there is nothing unclean of itself: but to him that esteemeth any thing to be unclean, to him it is unclean" (Rom. xiv. 14).

We are back again to the truth that conscience is not a standard, but an index telling us whether we are acting up to the standard we ourselves recognise as true:—

"All things indeed are pure; but it is evil for that man who eateth with offence" (Rom. xiv. 20).

"He that doubteth (or discerneth and putteth a difference between meat) is damned if he eat, because he eateth not of faith; for whatsoever is not of faith is sin" (Rom. xiv. 23).

A parallel line of teaching is found in 1 Cor. viii. 8, where we read:—

"But meat commendeth us not to God: for neither, if we eat, are we the better; neither, if we eat not, are we the worse."

By reading Rom. xiv. 14, 20 and 23 together with 1 Cor. viii. 4 and 8, we realize that it is not so much the thing in itself that is in view, but the reaction of our conscience in the matter. Many children of God are in need of the teaching of 1 Cor. viii. 8. In their abstinence from some action or habit, they are liable to cultivate a Pharisaic spirit and consider that they are "not as other men are." This may be a more serious evil than the matter in question. Let us keep well before the mind that in many things we are neither better nor worse by abstaining or not abstaining. The whole question is a matter of conscience, and how far one has appreciated human worthlessness on the one hand and Christ's fulness on the other.

We are not, however, left without guidance as to our behaviour:—

"But take heed lest by any means this liberty of yours becomes a stumblingblock to them that are weak" (1 Cor. viii. 9).

It is true that those thus stumbled are "weak." If they were stronger in the faith they would enjoy the same liberty. But this does not give the strong in faith liberty to ride roughshod over the feelings of the weak. While it would be possible for the stronger one in all good conscience to sit at meat partaking with thankfulness of that which had been offered to idols, yet rather than wound the weak conscience of his brother, he will put aside his rights and say with the apostle:—

"Wherefore, if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend" (1 Cor. viii. 13).

It is possible that some one may interpose here with the objection: Is it right to allow another man's conscience to decide matters that are personal to ourselves?

In the first place, are there any matters "personal to ourselves" that do not influence our fellows? Is it not written that "no man liveth unto himself?" In the second place, the Scriptures settle the matter, for we read in 1 Cor. x. 29: "Conscience, I say, not thine own, but of the other." The very objection we are considering is expressed in the same verse: "For why is my liberty judged of another man's conscience?" (1 Cor. x. 29).

To understand the apostle's meaning here we must look at the context of this rather remarkable verse. We find that we are still dealing with the matter of "things offered to idols" (verse 19). In verse 23 the apostle writes:—

> "All things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient: all things are lawful for me, but all things edify not . . . . Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, that eat, asking no question for conscience sake: for the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof. If any of them that believe not bid you to a feast, and ye be disposed to go: whatsoever is set before you, eat, asking no question for conscience sake" (1 Cor. x. 23—27).

Here we have the expansion of the fact that "all things are lawful for me." While the matter remains purely personal, I am at liberty, "for the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof," and no scruple can interpose.

While, however, any particular action may be "lawful," it may not be "expedient," it may not "edify." And so the apostle continues:—

> "But if any man say unto you, This is offered in sacrifice to idols, eat not for his sake that shewed it, and for conscience sake: for the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof" (1 Cor. x. 28).

Here the fact that the earth is the Lord's is repeated, but is introduced for another purpose. In the first case "all is lawful"; in the second, "all is not expedient." There is such a fulness and variety for each to choose from that no one need be in any difficulty in the matter of giving up whatever offends. The great covering principle that must guide all our actions is that which the apostle enunciates at the close of the passage:—

> "Whether therefore ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do; (1) Do all to the glory of God (All things are lawful). (2) Give none offence" (All things edify not) (1 Cor. x. 31 32).

It is therefore a part of true Christian grace to allow our liberties and rights to be curtailed for the sake of another man's conscience, for this is but fulfilling the law of Christ. Rom. xiv. contains a warning on both sides. The strong man is likely to "despise" the scruples of the weak; the weak man is likely to "judge" the freedom of the strong.

It is not for us to make a collection of things that are a matter of conscience among believers. Each one of us will know where he feels free and where he feels bound. Each of us must remember his proneness to "judge" on the one hand, or "despise" on the other. If these words are used by the Lord to save some of our readers from harshness or from slackness, from licence or from bondage, we shall not have laboured in vain.

With all thy getting, get understanding.

Figures of Speech.

Figures involving addition (continued).

The figure that we are to consider in this paper is named Correspondence. It is an extended form of parallelism, and occurs throughout Scripture. The name was first used by Thomas Boys, to whom must be given the credit for first observing this wide extension of parallelism.

Correspondence may be either "alternate" or "introverted." Its chief service is that it throws into prominence the argument concerned, defines boundaries for our study and offers means of checking interpretations of difficult passages by placing in a corresponding member some explanatory clause.

We now proceed to give examples of the figure Correspondence in its six forms:—

I. ALTERNATE.
- (1) Simple.
- (2) Extended.
- (3) Repeated: (a) Two members (b) More than two members.

II. INTROVERTED.

III. COMPLEX.

EXAMPLES:

Alternate (Simple).

Psalm xix.

A | 1—4. The Heavens.
B | 4—6. The Sun in them.
A | 7—10. The Scriptures.
B | 11—14. The Servant in them.

In Simple Alternation there are only two series, each consisting of two members. In Extended Alternation there are again two series, but the corresponding members are greater in number.

Alternate (Extended).

Ephesians ii.

A | 1—3. Once. The world and the flesh.
B | 4. But God.
C | 5—10. | Made alive together. | Raised together. | Made to sit together. } In relation to sins.
A | 11, 12. Once. Gentiles in flesh and in the world.
B | 13—18. But now.
C | 19—22. | Citizens together. | Fitly framed together. | Builded together. } In relation to dispensational privileges.

Alternate (Repeated).

(a) Two members in a series.

The disposition of subject-matter in Psa. xxvi. is an example of repeated alternate correspondence. We have a fourfold alternation of two themes "Prayer" and "Plea."

(b) More than two members.

In this case, however many items there may be, the first corresponds with the first, the second with the second, and so on throughout the passage. Psa. xxiv. is an example of threefold alternation: "Right," "Question" and "Answer."

Introverted.

The Greeks called this figure Chiasmos, owing to its likeness to the letter X. Bengel says of the figure that "its employment is never without some use"—meaning, of course, of some use in arriving at the meaning and purport of any passage that is thrown into this form. We give the structure of the Epistle to the Philippians as an example. This structure has not appeared in The Berean Expositor before. It was published for the first time in the book entitled: "The Testimony of the Lord's Prisoner."

The Epistle to the Philippians.

The structure of the book as a whole (Introversion).

A | i. 1, 2. Epistolary. Salutation. Bishops and Deacons.
B | i. 3—26. Fellowship in gospel from the first day.
C | i. 27—ii, 5. Conversation here. Stand fast. Mind of Christ. Now.
D | ii. 6—11. Sevenfold humiliation of Christ. Example.
E | ii. 12—17. Exhortation to work out,
F | ii. 17—30. Example of Paul, Timothy and Epaphroditus.
E | iii. 1—3. Exhortation to beware.
D | iii. 4—19. Sevenfold loss of Paul. Example.
C | iii. 20—iv. 10. Conversation there. Stand fast. Body of glory. Then.
B | iv. 11—20. Fellowship in beginning of gospel.
A | iv. 21—23. Epistolary. Salutation. Cæsar's Household.

Complex.

In this figure we have alternation, both simple and extended, together with introversion, so that the various forms possible are almost endless. As an example which may be of service, and at the same time not of undue length, we give the structure of Eph. ii. 19—22.

Ephesians ii. 19—22. The Temple.

A | a | 19. Fellow-citizens (sun).
b | 19. Of the saints (hagios).
a | 19. Household (oikeios).
b | 19. Of God.

B | c | 20. Built on (epi).
d | 20. The Foundation.
e | 20. Apostles and Prophets.
e | 20. Christ Jesus Himself.
d | 20. Chief Corner-stone.
c | 21. The Building (en).

A | a | 21. Fitly framed together (sun).
b | 21. Holy Temple in the Lord (hagios).
a | 22. Builded together (oikodomeō, sun).
b | 22. Habitation of God in spirit.

In these six forms all figures of correspondence are cast, and it is worth while noting their distinctive features and peculiarities. To some, the structure is just a novel sort of thing, interesting in its way, but nothing more. To others—including the present writer—the discovery of the structure of a passage is a passport into light, a liberation from the opinions of men, and an assurance that the truth has been seen in true proportion. One thing, however, is necessary, and that is to avoid man-made headings—including one's own. We must see that the correspondence is founded upon fact and not fancy, the "fact" of the inspired words of the passage itself.

What manner of persons ought ye to be.

Symbols of Service.

The nursing-mother and nursing-father.

From the variety of figures that we have already considered, ranging from "builders" and "fishers" to "angels" and "husbandmen," it will be seen that our idea of ministry must be exceedingly broad if it is to include all that the Lord intends by the term. The miracles of healing which our Lord and His apostles performed, set forth very vividly the spiritual needs of mankind; and we should be surprised if Christian ministry did not include some aspect of that service which, even among the ungodly, is held in high esteem—the service rendered by the nurse. To-day the nurse, whether public or private, is a highly-trained, skilful person, a picture of efficiency, cleanness and courage. It was not always so. We have but to think of Florence Nightingale in real life, or of Sarah Gamp in the world of fiction, to realize what a new meaning has become attached to the idea of nursing.

Among the many roles that the apostle fulfilled in his ministry to the saints, therefore, we are not surprised to find that he claimed that of the nurse. Writing to the Thessalonians he says: "We were gentle among you, even as a nurse cherisheth her children" (1 Thess. ii. 7). It is a sad thing to realize that this statement of the apostle is a part of his defence against false misrepresentation. He was obliged to refute charges of deceit, uncleanness and guile, and of using flattering words, and a cloke of covetousness (1 Thess. ii. 3—5). If such as Paul could not escape calumny, who are we (who often, alas, merit the hard things said of us) if sometimes we are called upon to walk the same path?

The apostle here makes a greater claim than at first appears in the A.V. For he actually says that he cherished them as a nurse cheriseth her own children. Further on, he changes the figure and says:—

> "Ye know how we exhorted and comforted and charged every one of you, as a father doth his own children" (1 Thess. ii. 11).

The words "his own" are the same in both verses. The nurse, therefore, is to be understood as a nursing-mother; and this is much more in line with Biblical usage than is our modern conception of a nurse. We read in Isa. xlix. 23 of kings as nursing-fathers, and queens as nursing-mothers, in the day of Israel's glory. Naomi, in Ruth iv. 16 and the mother of Moses in Ex. ii. 7, 9 are nurses of this type. And Moses in Num. xi. exclaims:—

> "Have I conceived all this people? Have I begotten them, that Thou shouldest say unto me, Carry them in thy bosom, as a nursing-father beareth the sucking child?" (Num. xi. 12).

It is evident that Paul intended the Thessalonians to understand that he had been both nursing-mother and nursing-father to them. A ministry that can be likened to such wonderful figures as these must be a ministry that is (1) gentle (2) cherishing (3) characterised by a willingness to impart one's own self (4) a labour that makes no charge for its services, and (5) a ministry that exhorts, comforts and charges, with the object that the children of such love and care should "walk worthy of God, Who hath called you unto His kingdom and glory" (1 Thess. ii. 12).

It is important to note the two sides of this wonderful ministry. There is the gentle cherishing that we rightly associate with the mother's care; and the exhortation and discipline that fall to the father's lot. Both are necessary, whether for the actual child at home, or for the believer growing up in the faith. All gentleness, or all discipline, is not good for either child or saint. A blend of the two, with the unselfishness that characterises the feelings of a parent, is as near an ideal of ministry as this world contains.

As we begin to realize the length and breadth of Christian ministry, we are driven to exclaim with the apostle, "Who is sufficient for these things?" It is a joy to know that the same grace that enabled Paul to be a wise master-builder, an ambassador in bonds, an under-rower, and a nursing-mother and nursing-father, is at the disposal of all who are engaged in the Lord's service. And we can remember, too, that we are never called upon to exhibit to our fellows any grace that has not first been shown towards us in superabounding measure.

Wisdom; Human and Divine.

Being a comparison of the groping after the truth of the ancient philosophers with the truth as it is revealed in Scripture, in order that the believer may the better appreciate the Word of God.

This group of articles is written as an extension of the series devoted to the exposition of Colossians ii.

No. 1.

The personal Christ, the end of all philosophy.

Philosophy is mentioned but once in Scripture, only to be set aside as "vain and deceitful" (Col. ii. 8). Philosophers are mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles—the "Epicureans and Stoics" (Acts xvii. 18)—but their ignorance is exposed by the apostle, who speaks of the "unknown God" whom they "ignorantly worshipped." To the believer in Christ, philosophy can contribute nothing. All that approximates to truth in philosophy is found without admixture in the Scriptures. Philosophy is a part of the wisdom of this world that comes to nought.

There is, however, a side of the question that is not without a bearing upon us all. The same apostle who exposed the emptiness of philosophy and taught the fulness of Christ, did not adopt towards these ancient philosophers an attitude of scorn, but rather one of pity. One piece of philosophy that the believer might well learn is that "Truth is one," no matter by whom made known. The apostle has no hesitation in quoting the hymn of the Stoic Cleanthes in Acts xvii. 28, even though that philosopher was born some 300 years before Christ, and was an unbeliever.

The apostle remembers that the Greeks and the Jews are of "one blood"; and teaches that the providence of God towards them was in order that "they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after Him and find Him, though He be not far from every one of us" (Acts xvii. 26, 27).

We shall realize more fully the bearing of these words upon the Stoic and Epicurean hearers after we have learned something of their peculiar teaching. Speaking to the idolaters at Lystra, the apostle says:—

> "He left not Himself without witness, in that He did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness" (Acts xiv. 17).

The second chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, problematic though it be, plainly indicates that the nations of the earth, although without the Law of Moses, were not left without witness. Moreover the apostle writes:—

> "For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, by nature do the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves: which show the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the meanwhile accusing or else excusing one another" (Rom. ii. 14, 15).
> "Therefore if the uncircumcision keep the righteousness of the law, shall not his uncircumcision be counted for circumcision?" (Rom. ii. 26).

The testimony of Rom. i. 19—23 is explicit. That which may be known of God, apart from Christ and His finished work, had been shown to the nations of the earth. They knew God, but they glorified Him not as God, and degenerated in consequence. It would not, however, be either true or charitable to deny that, in spite of ignorance and darkness, there were still some who, with a desire for truth that puts us to shame, and a seeking that we could well emulate, "felt after" God, if haply they might find Him.

To us the Son of God has come, and with His coming has solved every problem that baffled ancient wisdom. If we could realize the struggles of unenlightened human wisdom, we might perhaps be more grateful for the light of revelation, and for the solution of all mystery "in the face of Jesus Christ."

It is with this object in view that we present an examination of the philosophy of the Ancients, trusting that we shall not only be chastened in spirit as we contrast our attitude to revealed truth with the intense desire of these men of old, but that, by the very contemplation of their problems, we shall perceive the point in many neglected sayings of inspired Scripture. Speaking of but two out of many examples of ancient wisdom, F. W. Farrar says of the light that they had then, that it was "sufficient to give humility, and patience, and tenderness to an irresponsible Roman Emperor, and freedom and contentment, and imperial magnanimity to a Phrygian slave."

When writing to the Colossians, and warning them of the emptiness of philosophy, the apostle places in contrast the fact that in Christ dwells all the fulness of the Godhead bodily (Col. ii. 8, 9). Here is a truth which, when once perceived, turns all other so called "light" into midnight darkness, and writes folly across the wisdom of the world. We read the word "bodily" here, but how many of us have appreciated its full significance? After we have followed with amazement the speculations and the reasonings of ancient wisdom, to discover that the quest for "God" or the "Absolute" leads at length to a frozen realm of abstract ideas, it is then that we realize with renewed joy and peace that in Christianity all doctrine and all revelation of the Godhead is personal. God is seen "in the face of Jesus Christ." The Word was "made flesh." God Who is invisible is made known by Him Who is "the Image of the invisible God":—

> "Beware . . . . philosophy . . . . For in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily" (Col. ii. 8, 9).

The writer of these words cannot hope to convey to the reader the overwhelming sense of gratitude for the gift of Christ that the contemplation of the use of one Greek word brought to him in this connection. The word is found in Acts xvii. 27. The apostle is speaking of the heathen world left in ignorance and darkness, with only external providential dealings to guide them:—

> "That they should seek the Lord, if haply they might FEEL after Him, and find Him" (Acts xvii. 27).

The word occurs again in Luke xxiv. and I John:—

> "Behold My hands and My feet, that it is I Myself: HANDLE Me and see" (Luke xxiv. 39).

"That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have HANDLED, of the Word of Life" (1 John i. 1).

To us has been made known the "mystery of godliness, God was manifested in the flesh." The ancient philosophers never dreamed that all their problems would be solved by the condescension of God in the incarnation of Jesus Christ. In one sentence the Saviour settled the quest of the ages: "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father."

With the Scriptures before him, the humblest believer knows more than all the philosophers of antiquity. As it has been written concerning even the child at Sunday School:—

"Each little voice in turn
Some glorious truth proclaims,
What sages would have died to learn
Now taught by cottage dames."

Cowper, the writer of the Olney Hymns, and translator of the Iliad and the Odyssey, a man who knew both the truth of the gospel, and the teaching of the philosophers, wrote:—

"Tis revelation satisfies all doubts

* * *

How oft, when Paul has served us with a text,
Has Epictetus, Plato, Tully, preached!
Men that, if now alive, would sit content
And humble learners of a Saviour's worth,
Preach it who might. Such was their love of truth,
Their thirst of knowledge, and their candour too."

We are not going to fall into the error of allowing Plato to preach; what we hope to do in subsequent articles is to compare the "feeling after" of unassisted wisdom, with the "Handle Me and see" of the revelation of God in Christ. If at the end of each article our hearts do not burn within us as we remember, in contrast with the painful gropings of antiquity, how He, the Personal Word, talks to us by the way, our work will have been in vain. We earnestly pray that no reader will fail to appreciate as never before the grace of God manifested to us "in the face of Jesus Christ."

In this chart the great sections of Matthew's Gospel are set forth, the two great marks of time being illustrated by the two hour glasses. The words of the Lord in iv. 17 and xvi. 21 are identical in the Greek, "From that time forth began." The two divisions appear to belong to the twofold title of the Lord with which the Gospel opens: "Son of David and Son of Abraham." The Son of David, set forth in Solomon, speaks of the great King: the Son of Abraham, as set forth by Isaac, speaks of the offering made upon "one of the mountains of Moriah." The reader will notice that both sections open with the voice from heaven, saying: "This is My Beloved Son," and close with a confession. In the "David" section this confession concerning the Lord is from the lips of an Israelite —Peter, whereas the confession that closes the second or "Abraham" section is that of the Centurion—a Gentile. In the David or "King" section we find the Sermon on the Mount, and the parables of Matt. xiii. In the Abraham section, which pertains to the Priestly side of the work of Christ, we have parables that speak of His absence, and of the accountability of His servants. In this section comes the great prophecy of His second coming, viz., Matt. xxiv.

The threefold temptation and triumph of the King (Matt. iv.) is echoed by the threefold agony and triumph of the Priest (Matt. xxvi.).

It is rather difficult to say much about the words su eipas, as much depends upon the ability of the reader to appreciate the problems of deciphering early Greek MSS. Suffice it for the moment to say that the earliest Greek MSS. are full of contractions, such as our use of wd, cd, etc. Proper names and the names of God were also contracted. When the smaller Greek letters were adopted and words spaced as we know them now, a difference of opinion arose as to whether Matt. xvi. 18 should read su eipas, "Thou hast said," or whether it should be expanded into su ei Petros, "Thou art Peter." It will be observed that in Matt. xxvi. 64, in connection with the same subject as that of Matt. xvi., viz., the Person of Christ, we have the words again. No one of course ever dreamed of expanding su eipas to mean "Thou art Peter" in this place. More we cannot say now, than that our own opinion (for what it is worth) is that in both cases the Lord used the same formula, and that Peter's name was never mentioned.

The Parables.

No. 15.

The parable of the Fig Tree (Matt. xxvi. 32—51).

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

We now approach the concluding set of parables in the Gospel of Matthew.

Two kinds of servants (Matt. xxiv. 32—xxv. 30).

A | a | xxiv. 32—44. Noah. Coming as a thief while the goodman slept. "Ye know not what hour your Lord doth come."
b | xxiv. 45—51. The faithful and evil servants.—The one made ruler—the other has his portion with the hypocrites.—"Weeping and gnashing of teeth"
a | xxv. 1—13. The wise and foolish virgins.—"Ye know neither the day nor the hour."
b | xxv. 14—30. The faithful and unprofitable servants.—The one made ruler, the other cast into outer darkness.—"Weeping and gnashing of teeth."

It will be observed that the first two parables are introductory and preparatory to the more important and detailed parables of chapter xxv. The statement that follows the reference to the days of Noah, "Ye know not what hour your Lord doth come," is echoed in the words that conclude the parable of the Ten Virgins, "Ye know neither the day nor the hour." So is it with the other pair. Let us then, while we examine xxiv. 32—44, remember that it is providing a setting and preparing us for the parable of the Ten Virgins.

The parable divides itself into two parts, both parts leading up to the thought that the day and hour of the coming of the Son of man are not within the knowledge of man, and therefore watchfulness is imperative. This will be better seen if we give the structure of the parable as follows.

Matt. xxiv. 32—42.

A | 32—35. THE FIG.—Its lessons concerning what may be known.

A1 | 32, 33. a | Branch tender, and puts forth leaves.
b | Ye know that summer is near.
a* | When ye shall see all these things.
b* | Ye know that He is near at the doors.

B1 | 34, 35. c | This generation will not have passed away.
d | Till all these things shall have come to pass.
c* | The heaven and the earth shall pass away.
d* | But My words shall not pass away.

B | 36. WHAT NO ONE KNOWS.
- e | Concerning that day and hour.
- f | No one knows.
- f | Not even the angels of heaven.
- e | But My Father (knows) only.

A | 37—41. THE DAYS OF NOAH.—Its lessons concerning the coming of the Son of man.

A_2 | 37.
- a | The days of Noah.
- b | The coming of the Son of man.

} The days,

B_2 | 38, 39—.
- c | Eating, drinking, marrying.
- d | Till the day that Noah entered ark.
- d | Till the flood came.
- c | And swept them all away,

} The people.

A_3 | —39.
- a | Even so (like days of Noah).
- b | The coming of the Son of man.

} The days.

B_3 | 40, 41.
- c | Two men in field.
- d | One taken, other left.
- e | Two women grinding at mill.
- d | One taken, other left.

} The people.

B | 42. WHAT NO ONE KNOWS.—Ye know not at what hour your Lord cometh.

The majority of our readers will require no proof that the fig tree typifies Israel in the Scriptures, and together with the olive and the vine presents its destiny under the three phases, national, covenant privilege, and blessing. The fig tree is used particularly in the Gospels, where national fruitfulness and national excision is in view. The olive figures prominently in Rom. xi. where covenant privileges are in view. The vine in Isa. v. and Psa. lxxx. speaks of blessing. Apart from the reference in Matt. xxiv. 32 the fig tree is mentioned in one other place in that Gospel, namely, in chapter xxi. 19, 20, 21. There the tree, having "nothing thereon but leaves only," is cursed and withers away. This typified the fruitless condition of Israel when the Lord came "seeking fruit." Luke's Gospel provides another reference which supplements the statements of Matthew.

> "He spake also this parable; a certain man had a fig tree planted in his vineyard, and he came and sought fruit thereon and found none. And he said to the vine dresser, Behold, these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig-tree, and find none, cut it down, why should it render the earth unproductive" (Luke xiii. 6, 7).

The "fruit" is explained by John Baptist;—

> "Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance.....and now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees....." (Matt. iii. 8, 10).

At the first coming of Christ Israel proved a failure, there was "nothing but leaves," and the national fig tree was cut down.

As the days shorten, and the coming again of the Son of man draws near, the fig tree begins to show signs of life. The fig tree is putting forth its leaves. Once again eyes are turning to Jerusalem and Palestine. Within a short time we may see great things transpiring in connection with Israel and the Holy land. Luke xxi. 29 adds the words, "Behold the fig tree and all the trees." This addition refers to the "times of the Gentiles" of verse 24. The times of the Gentiles will "be fulfilled" when Israel comes forth from its long night of rejection. In Matt. xxiv. 34 we read, "This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." The expression, "this generation," must not be quickly disposed of as having reference only to those who lived during what we call the lifetime of a generation—it carries with it something more than length of time—it indicates character also.

Sixteen times do we read of "this generation" in the Gospels, besides other expressions like, "an evil generation"; "adulterous and sinful generation"; "the men of Nineveh and the queen of the south shall rise in judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it"; "of this generation shall be required the blood of all the prophets which was shed from the foundation (or overthrow) of the world" (Matt. xxiii. 34—36, Luke xi. 49, 50). This seems to indicate something more than a reference to those who were born and lived during the time of the Lord on earth. Heb. iii. 10 speaks of the Lord being grieved with "that generation," and the reader will find many parallels in the O.T.

Further, the words of Col. i. 26, speaking of the Mystery being hid "from the ages and from the generations," will help us further in seeing that the word has a meaning wider than the primary idea. The words of verse 34, "be fulfilled," should be rendered, "begin to be," or "may have begun to arise." If we glance back to verses 29—31 we shall see what was to "begin to arise." The sun was to be darkened, the moon was not to give her light, the stars were to fall from heaven, the powers of the heavens were to be shaken. Some may say that these things have not yet taken place. True, but they "began to arise," although cut off through Israel's failure. This may seem an assertion without foundation, but we believe a comparison of two passages of Scripture will help us. The margins of most of our Bibles refer us back from Matt. xxiv. 29 to Joel. In Joel ii. 10 we read words very similar to those of Matt. xxiv. 29. There, wonders shewn in heaven have a prelude on earth. The spirit was to be poured out upon all flesh.

> "Your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions. And also upon the servants and upon the handmaids in those days will I pour out My spirit. And I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth, blood and fire and pillars of smoke. The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come."

Peter on the day of Pentecost in Acts ii. positively declared that the outpouring of the spirit then manifest was what had been prophesied by Joel. He not only quotes the references of Joel to the spiritual gifts, but makes a complete quotation concerning the whole of these wonders with reference to the sun, moon and stars. In all there are fourteen items. Seven of them have been fulfilled; seven of them await fulfilment. They will be fulfilled when Israel repents (Acts iii. 19—21). The coming of the Son of man is preceded by these things.

The "generation" of Matt. xxiv. 34 is in view in Acts ii. 40, "Save yourselves from this untoward generation." It is perfectly true therefore to say that the generation alive during the ministry of Christ, and during the period covered by the Acts, did not pass away without these things "beginning to be." They will be resumed when the time comes, and Revelation i. goes on from Acts ii. and iii., the interval of Israel's rejection not being reckoned. Just as surely as the Lord could say, "this generation shall not pass," so He could say, "heaven and earth shall pass away, but My words shall not pass away."

> "The day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, in which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with a fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burnt up" (2 Pet. iii. 10).

Here the connection with Matt. xxiv. 35 and 43 is evident, strengthened moreover by Peter's allusions to the flood and to Noah.

Some men—not seeing the break that has come in the dispensational dealings of God—have said, "Where is the promise of His coming?" They maintain, with wilful ignorance, that all things have continued right through without a break since the beginning of the creation. Their wilful ignorance of the interposition of judgment at Gen. i. 2, and again at the flood, prevents them from seeing that once again the Lord has allowed a break to interpose in the unfolding of His purposes. "The Lord is not slack concerning His promise." The one thousand years or so of Israel's blindness are but a day. The apostle Paul in all his epistles treats of the purpose of God in the long interval between Acts and Revelation.

Reader, the fig tree seems about to bud. If so, the present parenthetical dispensation draws near to its conclusion. While we see no prophetic word concerning this period in Matt. xxiv., yet by application we may learn the same insistent message, "Watch therefore, for ye know not the hour." We have considered the moral principal of the parable (the Fig Tree); in our next paper we must consider the type (Noah and his days).

Things that differ.

No. 3.

The death of Christ.—Apothnesko.

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

We have considered the word thanatos ("death") so far as it is used in the N.T. in a doctrinal connection with the Lord Jesus Christ. We now turn our attention to the word apothnēskō ("to die") in its doctrinal connection with Christ. In John xi. 50—52 is recorded the prophetic utterance of Caiaphas that the Lord Jesus should "die for the nation that the whole nation perish not," and further that the children of God who were scattered abroad should be gathered together in one. "This spake he not of himself: but being high priest that year, he prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation." To this the Lord Himself had already referred in John x. 15, 16.

> "I lay down My life for the sheep. And other sheep I have which are not of this fold; them also I must bring. and they shall hear My voice. And there shall be one flock and one Shepherd."

"The other sheep," "the children of God scattered abroad," "the nation," these are the ones for whom the death was accomplished, "to bring into one flock," "to gather together in one," "that the whole nation perish not," these are the objects for which the Lord died. What is understood by us as the gospel is not prominent in these verses, but rather the national preservation and restoration of Israel.

> "Now is (a) judgment of this world; Now shall the Prince of this world be cast out. And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto Me. But this He said, signifying by what death He was about to die" (John xii. 31—33).

The kind of death is here indicated by the Lord, as well as some of its consequences. "Lifted up." Already this word has been used by Him in earlier passages. In John iii. 14 we meet it, "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up." John viii. 28, "When ye have lifted up the Son of man, then shall ye know that I am He." First as the antitype of the brazen serpent, lifted up by the command of God for the salvation of those who were perishing; then as one lifted up by a people in their ignorance and blindness, being unknown to them until thus shamefully treated, and finally, lifted up from the earth with a power to draw all men toward Himself. This consequence or effect (John xii. 31—33) is hardly ever dealt with contextually, and its full force is therefore scarcely ever perceived.

The word translated "draw" (helkuō and helkō), leaving out John v. 44 and the passage before us the meaning of which we have to determine, is always used in the N.T. of drawing with force, not merely exercising an attractive influence. John xviii. 10 uses it of the drawing of a sword; John xxi. 6—11 of the dragging of a net full of fish; Acts xvi. 19 of dragging Paul and Silas into the market place; Acts xxi. 30 of dragging Paul out of the temple; James ii. 6 of dragging men before the judgment seats. To substitute the milder idea of "exercising an attractive influence" for the word "drag" would simply create nonsense. Are we to believe then that the Lord Jesus meant to say that by reason of His death and the manner of it, He would forcibly drag all towards Himself? Yes, that is so, but such a way of putting it may lead to false conclusions apart from the great safeguard—the context. The Lord had said:—

> "Now is a crisis (or judgment) of this world, Now shall the Prince of this world be cast out, AND I (kagō, emphatic, and in strong contrast), if I be lifted up from the earth, will drag all men towards Myself."

Light upon the Lord's meaning will be found in Luke xi. 20—23.

> "If I by the finger of God cast out demons (cf. cast out the Prince of this world), no doubt the kingdom of God is come upon you. When the strong one fully armed guardeth his own court, his goods are in peace, but when a stronger than he shall come upon him, and overcome him, he taketh from him his whole armour wherein he trusted, and divideth his spoils."

By the death of Christ all men are taken by force from the tyranny and bondage of the evil one. Contend as he will, a stronger than he has come upon him, and "through death has destroyed (or rendered powerless) him who has the strength of death, that is, the devil." This does not necessarily imply that forgiveness, life and glory are therefore the possession of all. Faith is not spoken of in this passage. While in various other ways the death of Christ is referred to in John, these two passages are all that use apothnēskō in a doctrinal connection. John xviii. 32 and xix. 7 are the only other references that need be mentioned in this Gospel. It will be seen, as far as we have gone, that the death of Christ is here connected with two related phases of God's purpose.

(1) The national blessings of Israel.

(2) The overthrow of the authority of Satan.

These aspects of truth need to be kept well before the mind lest we confuse things that differ, and limit the great offering of Christ to the salvation of the elect, as is the case with those who rigidly adhere to what is called Particular Redemption, a truth indeed in its place, but an untruth when exalted to a place never intended for it in the purpose of the ages. The Acts of the Apostles does not use the word in reference to Christ. The remaining occurrences are found in the writings of Paul, a large number of which come in the Epistle to the Romans. These references we must consider in our next paper as the subject is too important to deal with briefly.

Perfected for ever.

Heb. xi. 14.

"What the law could not do."

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

On page 226 of Volume xxv. we drew attention to the true teaching of Heb. ix. 26, namely, the abrogation of the sin offering. An equally important change is necessary in the rendering of Heb. x. 1. The little controversy centres around the meaning and position of the words translated "continually." The Greek words thus translated are eis to diēnekēs, literally, "unto (or for) the unbroken continuance." The words occur four times in Scripture, and the whole four are found in Hebrews. We give the A.V. references first.

"Abideth a Priest continually" (Heb. vii. 3).

"One sacrifice for sins for ever sat down on the right hand of God" (Heb. x. 12).

"For by one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified" (Heb. x. 14).

It will be seen that the words have reference to the vital teaching of Hebrews. In connection with the infinite superiority of the Melchisedec Priesthood of Christ, one of the most important features is its permanence in contrast with the temporary character of the Aaronic order. In the Melchisedec type we have a "Priest continually." This continuance is in the "power of an endless life" (Heb. vii. 16), and is "intransmissible" (Heb. vii. 24). This as will be seen is set in contrast with a "carnal commandment," and the fact that the Aaronic Order could not remain unbroken in the person of one priest by reason of death. The priesthood being dealt with, the apostle approaches the offerings, and together with the old covenant they are put away (chapters viii. and ix.).

Chapter x. 12 has been variously rendered. Some put the comma after the words "for ever" (as in A.V.), and refer the words to the one sacrifice. Others say no, the words "for ever" should read on to the next statement thus, "for ever sat down," in contrast to the many sacrifices offered by the priests. We shall be better able to decide this when we have considered the remaining occurrences. The two other passages (x. 1. and x. 14) structurally balance each other. Verse 14 is clear. "For by one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified." Here there is no doubt but that the words "for ever" rightly attach to the word "perfected." In x. 1, both versions read the words "for ever" with the word "offer." "The same sacrifices which they offer year by year continually." We can see that an offering made "year by year" must of necessity be one that is "oft repeated" (verse 11), but is that the meaning of eis to dienekes? We believe it is not. The "continual" priesthood of Christ was such by reason of the fact that it was never to be repeated or passed on. The "continual" or "for ever" quality in the sacrifice of Christ is like His Priesthood, it is "one sacrifice," "offered once for all."

The fact is we have been misled by the looseness of an English word. "Continually" stands for two very different ideas (1) Permanently, without repetition (2) Frequently. Now "permanently" is the idea of eis to dienekes, and the impression made by the rendering "year by year continually" is false. This is easily demonstrated by changing the word thus, "year by year permanently or without repetition." Heb. x. 14 gives us the key. The one offering of Christ "perfects for ever," whereas Heb. x. 1 declares the annual offerings under the law could not "perfect for ever." This rendering of course necessitates a revision of the sentence. The order of the Greek words is given in the following.

"Every year by the same sacrifices which they offer for ever never is able those drawing near to make perfect."

The meaning is that the law being merely a shadow—emphasized by the annual sacrifices which were offered under its provisions—could not make those who draw near perfect for ever, whereas the one offering of Christ can and does. This is the insistent message of this passage. Regarding x. 12 the teaching is that He offered one sacrifice for sins for ever—never to be repeated. The idea sometimes given, "for ever sat down," is not the meaning of the passage. We may now be better prepared to consider the structure of the section x. 1—18. In the large view it is divided between the Law and the New Covenant.

A¹ | Heb. x. 1—9. The Law.—Shadow.
A² | Heb. x. 9—18. The New Covenant.—Real.

Taking the passage a little more in detail we get the following:—

Hebrews x. 1—18.

A | 1. | a | The yearly offerings.
b | Are not able to perfect for ever.
c | Those who draw nigh.

B | 2—4. | d | Argument.—Cessation of offerings.
e | Argument.—Remembrance of sins.

C | 5—10. | f | The prepared body.
g | No pleasure in sacrifices.
h | I come to do Thy Will.
i | The FIRST taken away.
i | The SECOND established.
h | By the which will.
g | Sanctified through one offering.
f | The body of Jesus Christ

C | 11—13. | f | The priest standing.
g | The repeated sacrifice.
h | Never take away sins.
g | Christ's one sacrifice.
h | For sins.
f | He sat down.

A | 14. | a | By one offering.
b | Perfected for ever.
c | Them that are sanctified.

B | 15—18, | e | Argument.—No remembrance of sins.
d | Argument.—Cessation of offerings.

A comparison of verse 1 with verse 14 in the structure shows that what the law could not do, Christ has done. Its many offerings could not perfect for ever; His one offering does. There is, further, another connection established which we hope to enquire into in some future paper; "those that draw nigh" in x. 1 are balanced by "them that are sanctified" in x. 14. Initial salvation is not in the scope of Hebrews; but rather the perfecting of the saint is in view.

To behold.

If you want to be miserable . . . . LOOK WITHIN . . . . Psa. lxxvii.
If you want to be distracted . . . LOOK AROUND . . . . Psa. lxxiii.
If you want to be happy . . . . LOOK UP . . . . . Luke xxi. 28.

"They looked unto Him, and were lightened" (Psa. xxxiv. 5).

Four different words translated "BEHOLD" are used in the N.T., which give, when taken together, the secret of a holy life.

(1) TO BEHOLD AS IN A MIRROR.

"But we all, with unveiled face beholding as in a mirror the glory of the Lord, are transfigured into the same image" (2 Cor. iii. 18).

(2) TO BEHOLD AS IN A THEATRE.

"And the Word was made flesh, and tabernacled among us, and we beheld His glory" (John i. 14).

(3) TO BEHOLD AS FROM A PRIVILEGED POSITION AT A HIGH OR SACRED FESTIVAL.

"Father, I will that they also, whom Thou hast given Me, be with Me where I am; that they may behold My glory" (John xvii. 24).

(4) TO BEHOLD AS AN INITIATE.

"For we have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye witnesses of His majesty" (2 Pet. i. 16).

(5) TO BEHOLD AS A SPECTATOR.

"Having your conversation honest among the Gentiles: that, whereas they speak against you as evildoers, they may by your good works, which they shall behold, glorify God in the day of visitation" (1 Pet. ii. 12).

"If any obey not the word, they also may without the word be won by the conversation of the wives: while they behold your chaste conversation coupled with fear" (1 Pet. iii. 1, 2).

There are five divisions here, but only four words. Nos. (4) and (5) are two meanings attaching to the same word, but the context demands that they shall be kept separate. The different references tell us that not only are we influenced as we behold, but that others are influenced as they behold us.

Paul and his Companions.

No. 1.

The emphasis upon fellowship in service.

To consider the various titles given by Paul to his friends in the Faith and in service is an education in both christian courtesy and the essentials of christian service. Furthermore it affords encouragement both for the lowly and the more highly gifted to press on in the fight of faith. A chief characteristic of the apostle's choice of these titles is the way in which he associates his friends with himself. He does not speak of their service as being rendered to himself, but rather expresses the desire that he and they, whoever they may be, and whatever the character of their service, may, in blessed fellowship, both serve the Lord Christ.

First of all let us consider those titles given by Paul to his friends that are prefixed by the word sun, "together with."

Sunkoinoneō; Sunkoinonos: "To have something in common with another."—For the general meaning of the word see Eph. v. 11. In Rev. i. 9 the word is translated "companion," and as this is the word we have adopted in our title, "Paul and his Companions," let us look for a moment at the make up of the word. Even in its English composition it is suggestive. Com, is simply the Greek sun. In Greek "S" was originally written "C" and the ending "m" or "n" changes according to the consonant with which it sounds. Thus in English we say Sympathy, but Synthesis. The second part of the word "companion" lives on in our word "pantry" and originally meant "the place where bread is kept." Moreover, the reader will recognise in this latter word the modern French word pain, "bread." Originally, therefore, a "companion" was one who had "eaten bread with another." This may have been bread shared in kindness, bread shared as a covenant, or bread shared as a fellow-sufferer. Out of all the churches to which he wrote, the apostle gives signal honour to the Philippian church, by reserving this title for them:—

> "Both in my bonds, and in the defence and confirmation of the gospel, ye are all partakers of my grace" (Phil. i. 7).
> "Notwithstanding ye have well done, that ye did communicate with my affliction" (Phil. iv. 14).

If we had no personal acquaintance with the truth, we might wonder how the words "my grace," in i. 7, become "my affliction" in iv. 14. Reference to Phil. i. 29 gives the link: "For unto you it was graciously given (charizomai) in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on Him, but also to suffer for His sake." As one reads the epistle to the Philippians, and especially the last chapter, we see how Paul, the independent (iv. 11—13) alternates with Paul, the lowly (iv. 14—16). He is strong enough to endure and to do all things through Christ, assuring the Philippians that he does not "desire a gift": yet, immediately, he withdraws, lest he should wound their feelings, and says, "nevertheless ye have well done," and even goes so far as to speak of their gifts in the same terms that God uses of the sacrifice of Christ. However, it is Paul, the independent, that has the last word, for he says: BUT My God shall supply all your need" (Phil. iv. 19).

Fellowship with a man of this calibre had to be real or it would be repudiated. See how scathingly he rejected the assistance of the Corinthian church (2 Cor. xi. 7—10). Paul could be melted by an act of pure christian charity, but he could scorch and wither the first approach of patronage. We may be certain that any who were honoured with his companionship were worthy indeed.

Suzugos: "I entreat thee, also, true yoke-fellow" (Phil. iv. 3).—It is impossible to come to any conclusion regarding the identity of the believer thus called "Genuine yoke-fellow." Some have thought that Paul here speaks of a sister in Christ, and the reference in the context to women who were "fellow-labourers" with the apostle in the gospel of Christ lends colour to the suggestion. Whoever it was, the title is a blessed one, and reminiscent of the words of the Lord in Matt. xi. In Phil. iv. 3 the A.V. uses the word "labour with" and "fellow labourers," as though the apostle used the same word twice, but this is not the case:—

> "And I entreat thee genuine yoke-fellow, help those women, who in the gospel strove together with me (sunathleō), with Clement also, and with other of my fellow-workers (sunergos), whose names are in the book of life" (Phil. iv. 3).

Sunathleō occurs once more in Phil. i. 27:—

> "Only let your conversation be as it becometh the gospel of Christ . . . . that I may hear of your affairs, that ye stand fast in one spirit, with one mind striving together (sunathleō) for the faith of the gospel."

This does not necessarily mean "preaching the gospel," it speaks of "conversation," or "manner of life," that

"becomes" the gospel; it speaks of "affairs" and suggests that the women thus commended, had stood fast, and taken their share in the witness, strengthening the hands of those who were more actively engaged in public service, without which much of such service would never have been accomplished. The other word sunergos, or "fellow-worker, is the more constantly used by the apostle. Priscilla and Aquila are greeted with this title in Rom. xvi. 3, and the intensely practical nature of their fellowship is seen in verse 4, "who have for my life laid down their own necks." Urbane, also, is given this title (Rom. xvi. 9), and Timothy in verse 21. Twice the word is translated "helper" and once literally "work-fellow."

In 1 Cor. iii. 9 we read: "We are labourers together with God," where the English rather leads one to believe the apostle's meaning to be, that he and others were labouring together with God. This however, is not the meaning, but rather, "We are God's 'workers together'; you are God's tillage; you are God's building." Paul was the planter, Apollos was the waterer, and both together were workers who belonged to the same God. Titus also bore the title (2 Cor. viii. 23), and certain of the circumcision who are mentioned in Col. iv. 10, 11. Timothy also is given this title in 1 Thess. iii. 2; so is Philemon and a number of others including Luke (Phile. 1 and 24).

These are some of the ways in which the apostle refers to his companions. May the very reading of the passages stimulate fuller and more faithful service.

Millennial foreshadowings (Acts ii. 41—47).

What were the immediate results of Peter's ministry on that day of Pentecost? Three thousand souls were added to the company of believers, and they that believed were together and had all things in common. Gladness and singleness of heart characterised this favoured company, who were not only pleasing to God, but in "favour with all the people." It will not do to pass over this section without examination, for in it, in germ, is the goal of Pentecost, and here we shall find a forecast of that future day when not 3,000 only, but all Israel shall be saved.

Acts ii. 41—47.

A | 41. | a | Glad reception of word; baptism.
| b | 3,000 souls added.

B | 42. | c | Stedfast continuance in apostles' doctrine.
| d | Fellowship, breaking of bread, prayers.

C | 43. | e | Fear, wonders, signs.

C | 44, 45. | e | All things common.

B | 46 | c | Continuing daily in the temple.
| d | Breaking bread from house to house.

A | 46, 47. | a | Gladness, singleness, praise.
| b | Saved ones added.

What was the apostles' doctrine in which the believers continued stedfastly? It could not have been that marvellous system of truth with which we associate the epistle to the Romans written by the, as yet, unconverted Saul. Justification by faith is unknown in the testimony of Peter. Reconciliation finds no place in the ministry of the circumcision. When we reflect that Peter and the other apostles had but now received power from on high, it is foolish to imagine that there existed some great system of doctrine that could be subscribed to, as though it were a creed. All that could be meant by the "apostles' doctrine," or teaching, is the witness that had been given concerning the resurrection of Christ, His lordship, His kingship, His coming, and the need on the part of the believer to be ready. The breaking of bread has been interpreted as of the Lord's supper, but this is pure assumption:—

> "Breaking bread from house to house, did eat their meat with gladness" (Acts ii. 46) shows that the term simply meant taking a meal. The same expression is used in the following passage relating to the shipwreck, where Paul exhorts those on board to take food for their "health":—

> "And when he had thus spoken, he took bread, and gave thanks to God in presence of them all: and when he had broken it, he began to eat" (Acts xxvii. 35).

Without their contexts, we might readily believe that Acts xx. 7, and Luke xxiv. 35 related to the partaking of the Lord's supper, yet the contexts preclude such a belief. The development known later as "the breaking of bread" is but one of the traditions of the elders.

> "And fear came upon every soul; and many wonders and signs were done by the apostles. And all that believed had all things common; and sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all men, as every man had need" (Acts ii. 43—45).

In these few lines we have compressed that which is expanded in Acts iii., iv. and v. In those chapters we have recorded the prophetically significant miracle of healing, and the equally significant miracle of judgment that caused "great fear" to come upon all the church. There is also a fuller statement concerning the having of things in common in Acts iv. 32—37, which compels us to ask whether the selling of possessions and community of goods was not a real part of the meaning and purpose of Pentecost. There have been companies of believers who, taking Pentecost as their basis, have sought consistently to follow out its practice, but the having of all things in common does not seem to have captured their mind in the same way as has the gift of tongues. Yet how can one speak of "continuing in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship," without realizing that this koinonia (fellowship) refers to and is expressed by the having of all things in common (eichon hapanta koina)?

Turning to Acts iv. 32—37, we observe that there is a restatement of this "fellowship," and as in Acts ii. 24—46, so here, the account of this new state of affairs is punctuated by reference to the witness of the apostles to the resurrection of the Lord. The reader will see that verse 33 of Acts iv. is, as it were, slipped in and breaks the flow of the narrative. This however is as intentional as the equally strange insertion found in Acts i. 13. The resurrection of the Lord, as testified by the apostles, was intimately associated with the restoration of the Kingdom to Israel, and to the time of the restitution of all things which had been spoken by the prophets. No Jew would need to be told, that just as the feast of Pentecost with its emphasis upon the word "fifty" was a recurring, annual reminder of the day of Jubilee, so the final prophetic, fulfilment of all that Pentecost stood for would be the real, great Jubilee toward which all prophecy pointed. Believing therefore the "apostles' doctrine," these believers put their faith into practice. If the Jubilee was near, all would receive their own inheritance, all forfeitures would be cancelled, all buying and selling of land and possessions would come to nought; consequently, although no one could sell or buy his inheritance, he could sell whatever else he had purchased, and use the proceeds for the common good, while awaiting the Lord from heaven. The case of Barnabas is specially mentioned. He was a Levite, and "having land, sold it, and brought the money and laid it at the apostles' feet" (Acts iv. 37). In Jer. xxxii. 6—14 we have the case of Jeremiah (who, like Barnabas, was of the priestly tribe). He bought land to demonstrate his faith in the Lord's promised restoration (Jer. xxxii. 15), and Barnabas sold land to demonstrate the same conviction. The law that governed the sale of land is found in Lev. xxv. The voluntary act of Barnabas in selling his acquired land and placing the proceeds at the apostles' feet is in direct contrast with the action of Ananias. He, too, sold a possession; he, too, laid the proceeds at the apostles' feet, but with the difference that he kept back part of the price, while pretending that he had given all. The apostle makes it quite clear that there was no compulsion about the selling of the land when he says, "While it remained, was it not thine own? and after it was sold, was it not in thine own power?" Ananias sinned in that he lied to the Holy Spirit. The sin of Ananias was the sin of Achan. The reader will find that the very words used of Achan in Joshua vii. 1 are used of Ananias. The LXX reads enosphisanto apo tou anathemàtos, "appropriated for themselves a part of that which was devoted." Acts v. 2, 3, twice applies this peculiar expression to Ananias and Sapphira: "kai enosphisato apo tēs timēs," "and kept back part of the price." This is no place to discuss the passage in Joshua, but the interested reader is urged to weigh over the arguments contained in the article on "Achan, the troubler of Israel," on pages 37—41, which show that the word "accursed thing" should be understood as "a devoted thing," i.e., devoted to the Lord. Peter and the apostles stood somewhat in the same position as did Joshua, and wielded the same awful discipline.

Pentecost anticipates the Millennium: the gifts are called "the powers of the world to come" (Heb. vi. 5), and so the summary judgment of the day of the Lord is seen to be in operation during the early days of the Acts:—

> "He that worketh deceit shall not dwell within My house; he that telleth lies shall not tarry in My sight. Morning by morning will I destroy all the wicked of the land; that I may cut off all wicked doers from the city of the Lord" (Psa. ci. 7, 8).

Millennial characteristics are also seen in Acts iv. 23—26, where the opposition of the rulers to the ministry of the apostles is regarded as a partial fulfilment of the last times :—

> "And being let go, they went to their own company, and reported all that the chief priests and elders had said unto them. And when they heard that, they lifted up their voice to God with one accord, and said, Lord, Thou art God, which hath made heaven, and earth and sea, and all that in them is: Who by the mouth of Thy servant David hast said, Why did the heathen rage and the people imagine a vain thing? The kings of the earth stood up, and the rulers were gathered together against the Lord, and against His Christ" (Acts iv, 23—26).

The language of the passage clearly shows the minds of the apostles fully occupied with millennial expectation.

The epistle to the Romans.

No. 57.

The hope of the groaning Creation (Rom. viii. 18—21).

In our examination of this section in the last article we reached the close of verse 17. We now take up the thread and pursue our way through verses 18—21. The thread that guides us, which, as we have already seen, runs through the remainder of the chapter (see Volume XXV. pages 265—270), is the apostle's conviction expressed in verse 18, that present suffering is not worthy to be compared with future glory.

When the apostle said: "For I reckon," he spoke not only with apostolic inspiration, but also from heart experience. In some things, his humility caused him to say that he was "less than the least of all saints," but when it came to suffering for Christ's sake, he could, with humility still, say: "I more." Let us allow him to recount the sufferings that he had already endured up to the writing of 2 Corinthians :—

> "In labours more abundant, in stripes above measure, in prisons more frequent, in deaths oft. Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one. Thrice was I beaten with rods, once was I stoned, thrice I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day I have been in the deep; in journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren, In weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness. Beside those things that are > without, that which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the churches. Who is weak, and I am not weak? Who is offended, and I burn not? (2 Cor. xi. 23—29).

It would do us good to take a sheet of paper, and as before the Lord tabulate our sufferings for Christ's sake. We should feel ashamed of our murmuring and pettiness, in view of this stupendous endurance of the apostle. He indeed had a right to institute a comparison, if any one had; and his "I reckon" should give us grateful peace and strong consolation. We shall discover that the law of relativity that has perhaps puzzled us by its modern application to the universe is largely true here. Which do we look at, the sufferings or the glory? A pin's head can eclipse the sun, if held near enough to the eye; but spiritual perspective puts everything in its true relative place, and we discover to our joy that :—

> "Our LIGHT affliction, which is but for a MOMENT, worketh for us a far more exceeding, ETERNAL WEIGHT of glory; while we look not at things which are seen" (2 Cor. iv. 17, 18).

The apostle has placed suffering and glory in the balance. He says that the one is "light," compared with the "weight" of the other. The one is "for a moment," when compared with the "age-abiding" character of the other. The standpoint from which this right relation can be seen is expressed in the last clause; "while we look not at things which are seen." The things which are seen are temporal, but we look forward to the things which are unseen, yet abiding. If we pursue our reading in Corinthians further, we find that the apostle goes straight on to the "redemption of the body," where "mortality is swallowed up of life" (2 Cor. v.).

Coming back to our study in Romans, we find that the A.V. speaks of the glory that shall be revealed "in us," while the R.V. speaks of the glory that shall be revealed "to usward" (Rom. viii. 18). The latter is a closer rendering of the preposition eis. The future glory, that is to be revealed, has us "in view." It is not a glory in which we shall be swallowed up and lost, but a glory in which we shall at last find "liberty" as well as life. We shall shake off "the bondage of corruption," and appreciate our salvation as never before.

There is a twofold "revelation" in this passage; but one of the two occurrences is disguised in the A.V. under the word "manifestation":—

> "For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be REVEALED to usward. For the earnest expectation of the creature (which also suffers during this present time) waiteth for the REVELATION of the sons of God. For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of Him Who hath subjected the same IN HOPE. Because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the LIBERTY of the glory of the children of God" (Rom. viii. 18—21).

There is evidently an intentional link here between "the children of God" and "the whole creation." The sufferings of the church are related to the groans of creation. As we read in James i. 18, we are "a kind of firstfruits of His creatures." The bondage of corruption not only holds mankind; it extends to the creation around us.

Some commentators have limited the words "the whole creation" and "the creature" to mankind, because of the words "earnest expectation," "hope," "groaneth," etc., but this is to ignore the very language of prophecy;—

"The land mourneth, for the corn is wasted; the new wine is dried up, the oil languisheth . . . . because joy is withered away among the sons of men . . . . How do the beasts groan! . . . . the beasts of the field cry also unto Thee" (Joel i. 10—20).

"How long shall the land mourn, and the herbs of every field wither, for the wickedness of them that dwell therein?" (Jer. xii. 4).

"The earth mourneth and languisheth; Lebanon is ashamed" (Isa. xxxiii. 9).

Passages that speak with the language of Rom. viii. 19—22 abound, not only with reference to the mourning and groaning that result from the curse that descended upon the earth for man's sake, but also with reference to the rejoicing that shall take place when the day of earth's jubilee shall come:—

"Sing, O heavens; and be joyful, O earth; and break forth into singing, O mountains: for the Lord hath comforted His people" (Isa. xlix. 13).

"Make a joyful noise unto the Lord, all the earth . . . . let the sea roar, and the fulness thereof . . . . let the floods clap their hands: let the hills be joyful together before the Lord; for He cometh to judge the earth" (Psa. xcviii. 4—9).

The apostle in Romans expresses the "earnest expectation of the creature," in language that is consonant with the rest of Scripture and full of intense feeling.

When Adam fell, he not only involved his seed in sin and death, but brought the earth and the lower creation into bondage also. The apostle reveals that this creation was subjected to vanity "in hope." We do not occupy space in discussing where the marks of parenthesis should be placed in Rom. viii. 20, as they are not needed. The truth is given by the passage as it stands in the A.V. Creation was subjected to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of Him Who hath subjected the same in hope. In Gen. iii. we see the subjecting, the vanity and the hope. Man and his dominion are intimately bound up together, both in their fall and in their restoration.

(1) The Subjecting.—The woman.—Sorrow and submission to the rule of her husband.

The man.—Sorrow in connection with the provision of his daily food, with death and dissolution at the end.

The earth.—"Cursed is the ground for thy sake."

The animal creation.—The Lord God made coats of skin, and clothed the man and the woman. Later He gave the animal creation to man for his daily food, whilst the fear and dread of man came upon the beasts of the field (Gen. ix. 2, 3).

(2) The Vanity.—The first children born demonstrate the vanity of this life. The firstborn became a murderer; and the second was named Abel, which means "Vanity." The productive powers of the earth became vain. "Thorns and thistles" are brought forth instead of every thing that is good for food. The sweat of the face, and the sorrow and conception are in vain, for all ends in death. As Ecclesiastes says, "This also is vanity."

(3) The Hope.—The Seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head. The clothing of the man and the woman with coats of skin, and the placing of the Cherubim, together with the flaming sword to keep, or protect, the way of the tree of life, were God's pledges of hope. The Cherubim, with their four faces (the lion, the ox, the man, and the eagle) symbolize man and his dominion—a dominion which he lost, but which is restored in Christ.

The very word "subjected" in Rom. viii. 20 is a word of hope. The carnal mind will never be "subject" to the law of God (Rom. viii. 7), but a day is coming when all things shall be subjected under Christ, the last Adam, and the last enemy, death, shall be destroyed (1 Cor. xv. 26—28).

Heb. ii. is a passage that should be read and compared with Rom. viii. 17—21. The chapter speaks of "the world to come" (verse 5); of Adam whose dominion was forfeited (verses 6—8); and of Christ, Who not only delivered those who were held in bondage of the fear of death (verses 14, 15), but Who, as the Captain of salvation, was made perfect through sufferings, in bringing many sons to glory.

The deliverance and liberation of the creature, and the liberty of the children of God, look forward to the earth's day of Jubilee. Isaiah gives a wonderful vision of that day, when the creation shall share in the glory of restoration:—

> "The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together: and a little child shall lead them . . . . They shall not hurt nor destroy in all My holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea" (Isa. xi. 6—9).

If the reader could spare the time to study afresh the Scriptures dealing with Israel's Jubilee, he would receive further light upon the way in which the sons of God are linked up with the hope of the groaning creation.

(The article on the Jubilee in Vol. XVI., pages 37—41, should also be consulted).

Biblical blessings.

No. 13.

Resurrection, the sphere and power of blessing.

We have followed the footsteps of Abraham from his departure from Ur of the Chaldees up to his triumph in connection with Sodom. Following the record a stage further, we come to the next point in Abraham's history that is associated with blessing.

One of the comforts that the Scriptures bring to the believer is that outstanding examples of faith like Abraham, Moses, David and Paul are revealed as men of like infirmities as ourselves. The Scripture does not mask their weaknesses or their failures. So, in the case of Abraham, we find that the double triumph of Gen. xiv. is followed by a double reaction in Gen. xv. When the excitement was over, he began to be a prey to fears. Would Chedorlaomer come back and avenge his defeat? And so the Lord, Who knows our hearts and remembers that we are dust, came to Abraham in a vision saying, "Fear not Abram: I am thy shield" (Gen. xv. 1). Not only did Abraham suffer the reaction of fear, he also seems to have experienced a reaction concerning his refusal of Sodom's riches. Had he been foolish? Was his attitude justified? Did it necessarily follow, because his God was the Possessor of heaven and earth, that he should refuse legitimate recognition of service? The Lord, Who knew his fears, knew also his doubts, and added: "I am . . . . thy exceeding great reward" (Gen. xv. 1).

This brings us to the next important step in Abraham's career—the birth of Isaac. In reply to the vision and its promises, Abraham says, in effect: "I am childless, and my possessions will all go to the steward of my house." Then comes the revelation, and the great act of faith. An old man, as good as dead, looks at the stars in a Syrian sky and dares to believe God when He says, "So shall thy seed be" (Gen. xv. 5; Rom. iv. 18).

If the reader were to make a graph of Abraham's faith, he would notice its resemblance to the temperature chart that hangs over a sick-bed in hospital. The line would not take an unbroken ascending curve, but would rise and fall. It would rise in Gen. xii. 1—9, but would fall again at the famine and Abraham's experience in Egypt in Gen. xii. 10—20. It would rise at the separation from Lot and Abraham's attitude toward Sodom; it would fall again at the reaction of fear and doubt in Gen. xv. 1. It would rise to a greater height when Abraham believed God concerning the promise of a son, but would sink again when Ishmael was born (Gen. xvi.). After circumcision and the repudiation of the flesh, it rises again and we reach the third statement of blessing:—

> "And God said unto Abraham, As for Sarai thy wife, thou shalt not call her name Sarai, but SARAH shall her name be. And I will bless her, and give thee a son also of her: yea, I will bless her, and she shall be a mother of nations; kings of people shall be of her" (Gen. xvii. 15, 16).

Abraham was now a hundred years old, and his wife ninety (Gen. xvii. 17). We are assured by Scripture that all hope of becoming parents had passed, so that the birth of Isaac was, in its degree, miraculous. Rom. iv., dealing with this incident, stresses the God of resurrection as the object of Abraham's faith.

We observed earlier that Heb. xi. seems to have brought together the four stages of blessing in Abraham's history. The third is found in Heb. xi. 11;—

"Through faith also Sarah herself received strength to conceive seed, and was delivered of a child when she was past age, because she judged Him faithful That promised."

The third element in realized blessing is to recognize the utter deadness of the flesh, and to trust implicitly in God, as the God of resurrection. The reader will remember that circumcision in its spiritual aspect is given extraordinary prominence in both Philippians iii. and Col. ii., and in both passages the utter repudiation of the flesh and the complete recognition of the resurrection is the dominant theme.

In the preceding article we drew attention to Abraham's reasonable concern for Aner and the others. Similarly, in Gen. xvii., Abraham is concerned for Ishmael: "And Abraham said unto God, O that Ishmael might live before Thee" (Gen. xvii. 18). Abraham had already acknowledged his error in connection with Ishmael, and had set forth his repudiation in the rite of circumcision. He does not, however, wash his hands of the responsibility; he recognizes it still. And God honours Abraham's tender conscience by hearing his prayer on Ishmael's behalf.

This, then, is the next lesson we learn from our study in relation to realized blessing—the necessity to recognize the supreme place that the risen Christ holds in the purposes of God, All blessing that is mediated to us through obedience or separation, is only mediated to us because He lives to die no more. All blessing that we now enjoy or ever shall enjoy comes to us bearing the image and the superscription of the risen Christ. Like Cæsar's penny it has two sides, the reverse and the obverse; and we must never forget that if on one side we discover "The risen Christ," on the other we shall find "Death to, and in, ourselves." Isaac was a true type, because he was not only given by promise, but he also came when his parents were "as good as dead."

Fundamentals of dispensational truth.

Joshua.

No. 8.

Achan, the troubler of Israel (Josh. vii.).

Achan, the son of Carmi, brought the dreaded "trouble" upon Israel (Josh. vi. 18). "Why hast thou troubled us? The Lord shall trouble thee this day" (Josh. vii. 25). In 1 Chron. ii. 7 we read; "And the sons of Carmi: Achar, the troubler of Israel, who transgressed in the thing accursed." Here the spelling is Achar. In the original, we discover that the word Achar is also the word "trouble." By name and by deed this man is set forth as an example of all those who are "troublers," who cause defeat where victory should have been achieved, and who will be found wherever the Church exists, until all trouble and troublers are no more.

The valley in which Achan was stoned was named after him "Achor" ("Trouble"). This valley comes into prophecy in Hos. ii. 15, a passage which we must consider later.

No one saw Achan take the gold, silver and raiment, no one reported the theft to Joshua; yet it soon became evident that something was wrong. Joshua sent men to view Ai, and as a result of their spying out the land, and apparently in view of the way in which Jericho had been overthrown, they suggested that it was not necessary to send all the people to take it, but that two or three thousand would be quite sufficient. So they went full of confidence. But to their consternation the men of Ai, far from being defeated, smote thirty-six of Israel, and Israel fled from before them. Instead of the hearts of the men of Ai melting in fear of Israel (Josh. ii. 11), we read that "the hearts of the people (Israel) melted, and became as water" (Josh. vii. 5). At this news, Joshua rent his clothes and fell to the earth before the Ark. Not knowing the cause of the defeat, he expostulates with God:—

> "Alas, O Lord God, wherefore hast Thou at all brought this people over Jordan, to deliver us into the hand of the Amorites, to destroy us? Would to God we had been content, and dwelt on the other side Jordan!" (Josh. vii. 7).

In these words of Joshua, we hear an echo of the words of unbelief that brought about the failure of Israel in the wilderness:—

> "Would God that we had died in the land of Egypt! Or would God we had died in this wilderness! And wherefore hath the Lord brought us unto this land, to fall by the sword . . . . were it not better for us to return into Egypt?" (Num. xiv. 2, 3).

At that time Joshua, the son of Nun, had stood firm, and had been threatened with stoning for his faithfulness. Now we see him lying on his face before the Lord, not so much to enquire where the evil lies, but echoing the murmur of unbelief. This is a faithful book. It does not flatter any man, and in its pages we may see ourselves. Dear reader, at times of defeat and failure, have we not sometimes acted as Joshua? Have we not implied that God was using us unfairly, that His promises were not being honoured, that we had a grievance against Him?

Joshua continues before the Lord, speaking of His great name, when the Lord cuts him short. "Get up . . . . Israel hath sinned." Every defeat of the believer must be attributed, not to the Lord, but to some hidden sin or failure.

Just as there had been the national circumcision at Gilgal, so there had to be the more individual clearing of the people at Achor. The intended parallel between Achor and Gilgal we shall see presently.

The Lord now reveals the sin that had brought defeat upon Israel:—

> "Israel hath sinned, and they have also transgressed My covenant, which I commanded them: for they have even taken of the accursed (devoted) thing, and they have stolen and dissembled also, and they have put it even among their own stuff" (Josh. vii. 11).
> "The children of Israel committed a tresspass in the accursed thing, for Achan . . . . took of the accursed thing; and the anger of the Lord was kindled against the children of Israel" (Josh. vii. 1).

How this emphasises the fact that no one lives, dies, sins or suffers to himself alone. We are related as parts of a whole, and any failure on my part or yours reacts upon the spiritual advance of the whole church.

The LXX Version shews, by the use of the word nosphisasthai, that the N.T. counterpart of Achan is Ananias. The passages in the LXX and the Acts read:—

> "But the children of Israel committed a great trespass, and purloined part of the accursed thing" (Josh. vii. 1).
> "But a certain man named Ananias, with Sapphira his wife, sold a possession, and kept back part of the price, his wife also being privy to it, and brought a certain part, and laid it at the apostles' feet" (Acts v. 1, 2).

The charge of "lying to the Holy Ghost" made by Peter in Acts v. 3 is closely parallel with the Hebrew words translated "committed a trespass," maal maal le Jehovah, the word here implying treachery and unfaithfulness. In both cases covetousness was at work, and in both cases the end was death.

Achan's confession is as follows:—

> "Indeed I have sinned against the Lord God of Israel, and thus and thus have I done. When I saw among the spoils a goodly Babylonish garment, and two hundred shekels of silver, and a wedge of gold of fifty shekels weight, then I coveted them, and took them; and behold, they are hid in the earth in the midst of my tent, and the silver under it" (i.e. the garment) (Josh. vii, 20, 21).

Years later, Saul spared Agag and the flocks and herds, instead of destroying them as the Lord had commanded. We are all prone to allow our baser nature, with its lusts and covetings, to betray both ourselves and our brethren.

In the Epistles, those against whom the apostle warns the church in Phil. iii. have much the same characteristics as those of Achan (Phil. iii. 17—19). And it will be remembered that the apostle himself realised that the flesh could rob him of the prize (1 Cor. ix. 24—27).

The fall of Achan, after the taking of Jericho, is even more tragic than the failure of undisciplined Israel in the wilderness. Achan had passed through Jordan and the experiences of Gilgal, with its repudiation of the flesh, and had been present at the taking of Jericho—and yet he fails.

The Book of Joshua, if it has nothing to say of the church as a whole, cannot be set aside by any who seek to "press toward the mark," for it is full of analogies and illustrations invaluable to the believer who has the prize of the high calling of God in view.

Achan is spoken of as a "troubler" (Josh. vii. 25). His own name means "trouble"; and "Achor," the valley named after him, has the same meaning. The LXX uses the words "to destroy" to translate the Hebrew word for "trouble." The Church has had these "troublers" from the beginning. They are with us yet, and are the cause of much failure and defeat. Let us see that we do not follow them in their evil ways.

Both Achan and Ananias failed to realize the spirit of their calling. They "kept back part of the price." Let the reader go through the epistle to the Philippians with that one thought in mind. He will recognize at every turn the characteristics of one who was the exact opposite of Achan and Ananias. The apostle Paul yielded up all. Not only liberty and self-defence, but life and all boasting in self. Neither fulness nor poverty could tempt him. For him "to live was Christ, and to die, gain."

The epistles of the mystery equally with the rest of Scripture warn against the evil of "covetousness" (Eph. v. 5 : Col. iii. 5 : 2 Tim. iii. 2) ; as does the epistle of the overcomer (Heb. xiii. 5).

Finally, there is an intended parallel between the repudiation of the flesh set forth in the circumcision at Gilgal, and the repudiation of the flesh in the punishment of Achan :—

> "And they raised over him a heap of stones unto this day" (Josh. vii. 26).

The word "heap" is gal, from the same Hebrew root as Gilgal. Twelve stones were taken from the bed of Jordan and made to stand up at Gilgal. Circumcision, carried out with "knives of stone" (Josh. v. 2) at Gilgal, the heap of stones in the valley of Achor; these things speak aloud to us who, though redeemed and members of the Body of Christ, have not yet reached in actual fact those heavenly places where neither the spiritual Canaanite nor the spiritual Achan shall trouble us any more for ever.

"For He must reign till He hath put all enemies under His feet" (1 Cor. xv. 24—28).

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

It is evident to all readers that the reign of Christ here referred to is to continue until every enemy is subdued or destroyed, and by the further teaching of the passage, that when those enemies are subdued or destroyed, the object and purpose of the reign will be achieved, and then that kingdom will not come to an end, but be handed back to the Father as needing no longer a Mediator—when God will be all in all.

A most important passage for our consideration is that which says, "the last enemy that shall be destroyed is death." Our English version has reversed the place of the article. In the original the word "last" is without the article, but the word "death" has it. The usage of the word rendered "last" (eschatos) is worth noticing in passing. We give only some of its occurrences. It will be found that many passages contrast the "last" with the "first," and the idea underlying the word and its usage seems to convey that of the last of a series. Matt. xix. 30, "the first shall be last." The word occurs ten times in Matthew, and each passage either actually refers to or implies the presence of the first (Matt. v. 26, xii. 45, xix. 30, xx. 8, 12, 14, 16, xxvii. 64). It is so in Mark and Luke. In John the frequent reference is to the "last day." That the "last day" need not necessarily mean that after that period there would be no more days is indicated by John vii. 37, "in the last day, that great day of the feast"—the last of the series of days which comprised the feast. The word occurs five times in I Corinthians.

"For I think that God hath set forth us the Apostles last" (1 Cor. iv. 9; cf Luke xiv. 9).

"Last of all He was seen by me" (1 Cor. xv. 8).

"A last enemy that is destroyed is the death" (1 Cor. xv. 26).

"The last Adam a life-giving spirit" (1 Cor. xv. 45).

"At the last trump" (1 Cor. xv. 52).

It will be seen that I Cor. xv. contains four of the five references, and that the idea of the last of a series is still uppermost. In the case of xv. 8 it is the last of a number of above 500 witnesses of the resurrection; in xv. 45 it is the last of a series of two only, the parallel being between the first Adam and the last Adam, between the first man and the second man.

While it may be true that death is to be destroyed last of all, the truth of I Cor. xv. 26 is that death is the last of a series of enemies which are to be destroyed. The other enemies which form the series are enumerated under the terms, "all rule, all authority and power," death being the last of them to be destroyed. Among the enemies of the believer we find principalities and powers as indicated in Eph. vi. These same foes are seen in Col. ii. 15.

It may be as well if we tabulate the passages where exousia, translated "authority," and dunamis, translated "power" in I Cor. xv. 24, are used in connection with spiritual beings.

Exousía.

"The power of darkness" (Luke xxii. 53).

"The power of Satan" (Acts xxvii. 18).

"The prince of power of the air" (Eph. ii. 2).

"The power of darkness" (Col. i. 13).

"The dragon gave him his.....great authority" (Rev. xiii. 2).

"He executeth all the power of the first beast" (Rev. xiii. 12).

"The dragon which gave power to the beast" (Rev. xiii. 4).

"Angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto Him" (1 Pet. iii. 22).

"Principalities and powers in the heavenlies" (Eph. i. 21; iii, 10; vi. 12; Col. i. 16, ii. 10, 15).

It will be seen that exousia is a word often used with reference to angelic or spiritual authorities.

Dunamis.

"The powers of the heavens shall be shaken" (Matt. xxiv. 29, Mk. xiii. 25, Luke xxi. 26).

"All the power of the enemy" (Luke x. 19).

"Angels, principalities, powers" (Rom. viii. 38).

"Angels, and authorities and powers" (1 Pet. iii, 22).

"The dragon gave him his power" (Rev. xiii, 2).

Returning to I Cor. xv., it would appear that the rule, authority and power which are to be destroyed are to be viewed together with death as enemies. Revelation xx. as a final act shows the destruction of death in the lake of fire after all other enemies have been dealt with, and immediately before the new creation with which Rev. xxi. commences.

Studies in the Book of the Revelation.

No. 10.

The glory and dominion. The first Amen (Rev. i. 6).

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

With this ascription of glory and strength we reach the first of a series of eight Amens which run through this book. The glory of redemption is His; He is the "stronger than the strong man armed"; He it is that has the keys of Hades and of death. The glory also of the kingdom is His.

The first time we read of glory in the N.T. is in Matt. iv. 8, where the tempter showed the Saviour the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them. We know how futile the temptation was, and here in Revelation i. we rejoice to see Him acknowledged as the One rightly to receive the glory as a sequel to His redeeming love.

The word translated "dominion" is kratos, and means "strength." Rev. v. 13 renders it "power," and these are the only occurrences in the Revelation. The word is used in Eph. i. 19:—

> "And what the exceeding greatness of His power towards us who believe according to the inworking of the strength of His might which He wrought in Christ when He raised Him out from dead ones."

This great strength seems to have reference to "him who has the strength of death, that is, the devil" (Heb. ii. 14).

Peter links glory and strength together in 1 Pet. iv. 11, "To Whom be praise and dominion" (glory and strength), and v. 11 also. Col. i. 11 links glory and strength for our practical walk now in the phrase, "according to His glorious power," literally "the strength of the glory." One thing at least is clear, we have here no empty glory, but a glory resting upon a solid foundation. He who had the strength of death has been vanquished, the glory long usurped is to be his no longer. It will be remembered that in Psa. viii. 2 we read, "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast Thou ordained strength." The LXX. and Matt. xxi. 16 give "perfected praise." This shows that the word "strength" must be the Figure of Metonymy, where the ascription of praise is called forth by the great strength of the overcomer.

Most of our readers will know that the title, "To the chief musician upon Muth-labben," which stands over Psa. ix., is really the conclusion of Psa. viii. This expression is taken to mean "the death of the champion," indicating in the first place the destruction of Goliath, and prophetically the overthrow of antichrist and satan, "the enemy and the avenger." A further and fuller light shines on Psa. viii, when we realize that "through death" Christ destroyed him who has the strength of death, and it is quite possible that the "champion" may refer more to Christ Himself than to the antitype of Goliath. This is strengthened by the quotation of Psa. viii. in Heb. ii., where it continues, "but we see Jesus,.....for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour."

The dual ascription of "glory and strength" is found in Psa. xxix. 1, and verse 2 continues, "Give unto the Lord the glory due unto His name." Verse 3 says, "The voice of the Lord is upon the waters, the God of glory thundereth," and verse 11 concludes with the comforting assurance that He to Whom glory and strength is ascribed "will give strength unto His people." As we ponder Psa. xxix. and then read in Rev. i. of the voice that is like the sound of many waters (verse 15), and see the strengthening power of His right hand (verse 17), we realize that the King of Psa. xxix. is before us. Psa. xcvi. introduces "a new song," and in verse 7 the "kindreds of the people" are called upon to ascribe to the Lord "glory and strength," and to "say among the heathen that the Lord reigneth" (verse 10), "for He cometh, for He cometh to judge the earth" (verse 13). We cannot help thinking of Rev. i. 7, "Behold He cometh with clouds."

The more we search and examine the O.T. prophecies, the more we realize the culminating fulness of the words of Rev. i. 6. The glory and strength thus ascribed is His "unto the ages of the ages." There are three variations of this usage of "age." We have in Heb. i. 8, "Thy throne, O God, is unto the age of the age"; in Eph. iii. 21, "The age of the ages"; Rev. i. 6, "The ages of the ages." Just as we have the expression "King of kings," "Holy of holies," "Servant of servants," "Hebrew of Hebrews," "Pharisee of Pharisees," so we have "Ages of ages," not merely an indication of length of time, but of superlative excellence. During the ages that are to ensue, commencing as far as we can perceive with the millennial reign, the glory and strength of them will be ascribed unto the Lord. Here we see Him crowned with glory and honour, highly exalted, and given the Name that is above every name. This enables us to look with confident expectancy beyond conflict of earth to the peace that shall come.

To this glorious ascription of praise heaven adds its first apocalyptic Amen. The use of this word "Amen" in Revelation is suggestive. We find it used in three connections. It follows: (1) The ascription of praise to the Lord, (2) The statement of and prayer for His coming, and (3) It is the title of the Lord Himself.

Amen.

A | i. 6. Glory to Him, etc.
B | i. 7. He cometh. Yea, Amen.
C | iii. 14. The Amen; the faithful and true Witness.
A | a | v. 14. Four living ones, and twenty-four elders.
b | vii. 11, 12. Angels.
a | xix. 4. Four living ones, and twenty-four elders.
B | xxii. 20. I come. Yea, Amen.

It will be seen that v. 14, vii. 12, and xix. 4 suggest an expansion of the first passage (i. 6), and a careful study of these verses will throw further light upon the One who is the Prince of the kings of the earth, the throne upon which He sits, and the circumstances under which He reigns.

We with the inspired book add our hearty Amen. To His glory we too say, Amen; to His coming again, Amen; and looking to the wonderful and manifold promises of God we say with the apostle, "In Him is the Yea and in Him the Amen, unto the glory of God" (2 Cor. i. 20).

The ages made and adjusted.

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

"God, Who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in times past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by (His) Son, Whom He hath appointed heir of all things, through Whom also He MADE the ages" (Heb. i. 1, 2).

"Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen. For in this the elders were attested. By faith we perceive the ages to have been ADJUSTED by a declaration of God that the things which are seen have not come to pass out of things which are apparent" (Heb. xi. 1—3).

Here in the epistle to the Hebrews we find two important passages that must not be passed over hurriedly by the earnest student. The ages were made, the ages were adjusted, the existing economy did not arise merely as a matter of course. The contexts of the two passages must be considered. In the first, the wondrous glory of the Son of God shines forth; in the second, the faith of the overcomers, leading on to the Author and Finisher of faith (xii. 2), is prominent. In both, the final word is either, "sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high," or, "is set down at the right hand of the throne of God," and in both there is a reference to redemption, "purged our sins," and "endured a cross."

It will be necessary to make the meaning of these passages as clear as possible in order that subsequent consideration may not be rendered ineffective. Before, however, looking at the contexts, and gathering up the teaching of the verses quoted above, we must endeavour to settle the meaning of one or two words.

Dia hou, "Through whom."—Some translators have rendered these words, "For whom," and as it is of great importance to understand which of these two phrases is the true one, we will give a little time to their study. Dia, followed by the genitive case, signifies the efficient cause, through or by; followed by the accusative, the final cause, for, on account of. Such is the grammatical rule. It can be easily illustrated from N.T. usage. With the genitive: Rom. i. 5, "Through Whom we received grace"; iii. 24, "Through the redemption"; v. 1, "Peace.....through our Lord Jesus Christ"; John i. 3, "All things were made through Him." With the accusative: I Cor. ix. 23, "This I do for the gospel's sake"; Rom. iv. 23—25, "For His sake.....but for us.....on account of our offences.....on account of our justifying." These few instances will be sufficient for a general view. The distinction between dia hou and di hon is made for us in the very epistle we are considering. Heb. ii. 10; "For whom (accusative) are all things and by whom (genitive) are all things." While we believe it to be true that the ages were made for or on account of Christ, yet that is not the truth of the verse before us. Just as John i. 3 declares that all things were made by Him (dia autou), and Col. i. 16 that all things were created by Him (dia autou), so Heb. i. teaches us that the ages are a part of His work. He made them. They form a part of the great purpose that necessitated them.

The quotation from Heb. xi. 3 is more difficult to apprehend and a few helps to its understanding may be welcomed. The word translated "framed" (katartizo) is used elsewhere in Hebrews, namely, x. 5, "A body hast Thou prepared Me," and Heb. xiii. 21, "make you perfect." The word occurs thirteen times in the N.T., and the first occurence, Matt. iv. 21, "mending their nets," conveys one of the principal ideas of the word, namely, the restoration, mending, or re-adjustment of parts; the idea of "fitted" seems best in Rom. ix. 22, "fitted to destruction."

We shall probably obtain most help by a more careful study of the use of the word in Hebrews itself. In Heb. x. 5, "a body hast Thou prepared me" cannot convey the meaning of restoration which sometimes attaches to the word katartizo. The verse is a quotation from Psa. xl. 6, yet when we turn to that passage we read, "mine ears hast Thou opened" (margin, Heb. "digged") instead of "a body hast Thou prepared me." "Opened" is misleading; the passage does not refer to the "hearing," but to the custom of Ex. xxi. 6. It was the sign of willing submission. This is carried out in the parallelism, "I come to do Thy will, O Lord." Hence, while Heb. x. 5 is not a literal quotation, it is an inspired commentary, and the "prepared" body of the Lord is referred to in Phil. ii. 7, "made Himself of no reputation, and took upon Him the form of a servant," in contrast to the glorious "form" of God. The same sense will apply to Heb. xiii. 21, and it would seem that we must keep to that aspect of its meaning in Heb. xi. 3, "By faith therefore we understand that the ages were prepared and adjusted by the word of God."

We must not confuse the expression "by the word of God," with the Logos ("The Word") of John i. 1. The word here is rhema, and occurs in Hebrews four times, the first passage being i. 3, "Upholding all things by the word of His power." He who can thus uphold all things, also perfectly adjusted the ages by the same word. This perfect adjustment, among other reasons, had the one in view which is written here, "that the things which are seen have not come to pass out of things which are apparent." The succeeding verses contain illustrations of this truth. Noah prepared an ark when warned of things "not seen as yet"; Abraham, going out "not knowing whither he went"; Moses endured "as seeing Him Who is invisible." The secret of their faith was that they did not judge by outward circumstances. They understood that the ages were perfectly fitted together, knew they were all prepared by God, and they relied upon His unalterable word. Even the dispensations which are within the ages have somewhat the same character. The dispensation of the mystery certainly would never have been anticipated by any before its revelation. The purpose of the ages, and the making of the ages are both in His hands, and we rest content that it is so.

The answer of a good conscience.

No. 5.

Conscience, and suffering for Christ.

The world has adopted the proverb, "Conscience makes cowards of us all." There is a serenity about a clear conscience that is more eloquent than any amount of self-justification. The French have a proverb: "He who excuses, accuses himself."

Let us now turn to Matt. xxvi. 69—75. When first Peter was challenged regarding his association with Christ, "he denied before them all, saying, I know not what thou sayest." The second time, his denial was fortified with "an oath"; and the third time "he began to curse and to swear, saying, I know not the man." When, therefore, Peter wrote about "conscience," he spoke feelingly of the problem and dangers besetting those who were apprehended and suffered for Christ's sake. Let us, therefore, hear what he has to say.

Turning to 1 Pet. ii., and reading from verse 11 onwards, we find that the apostle first brings forward the fact that his hearers are "strangers and pilgrims." This fact, if kept well in mind, will preserve us from many indulgences that would otherwise "war against the soul." The next step is the effect produced by such a manner of life upon the Gentiles:—

> "That, whereas they speak against you as evil-doers, they may by your good works, which they shall behold, glorify God in the day of visitation" (1 Pet. ii. 12).

Thirdly, he warns against the spirit that abuses freedom and makes it offensive. The believer submits to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake:—

> "As free, and not using your liberty for a cloke of maliciousness, but as the servants of God" (1 Pet. ii. 16)

Fourthly, the apostle writes:—

> "This is thankworthy, if a man for conscience toward God endure grief, suffering wrongfully. For what glory is it, if, when ye be buffeted for your faults, ye shall take it patiently? but if, when ye do well and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God" (1 Pet. ii. 19, 20).

Finally, the apostle comforts all who may thus be called upon to suffer, by the example of Christ Himself, Who "left us an example, that we should follow His steps."

After an interval, the apostle returns to the same theme in chapter iii. In verse 9 he writes: "Not rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing" (compare ii. 23). "But and if ye suffer for righteousness' sake," the apostle continues, "happy are ye." "Be not afraid of their terror, neither be troubled" (verse 14). Can any one doubt that when Peter wrote these words, his heart was back in John xiii. and xiv ? Immediately after he had learned that he would deny his Lord, the Saviour had said; "Let not your heart be troubled." The apostle is comforting those to whom he writes with the same comfort wherewith he had been comforted of God. Surely it was with tears that he wrote these words that exposed his own early weakness and the only road to peace that he himself had found:—

> "But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts; and be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you with meekness and reverence" (verse 15).

How the apostle would remember his own failure to sanctify the Lord, and how, instead of giving such an answer, he had denied with oaths and curses.

So once more he comes back to the possession of "a good conscience" in these matters, and couples it, as he does in chapter ii., with "a good conversation," concluding once again with the example of Christ: "For Christ also hath once suffered for sins" (verse 18).

The intimate association between "good conversation," "good works" and a "good conscience" underlies the somewhat difficult passage in iii. 21, where we meet the word "conscience" for the third time in this epistle. Baptism is but a figure or type, and water of itself can remove nothing more than the uncleanness of the flesh. The inner meaning of baptism is found in the answer of a good conscience toward God "by the resurrection of Jesus Christ." We do not stay over the many problems and difficulties that surround this passage. All we can do here is to emphasize the obvious association between the conscience, and its effects seen upon the conversation and life.

The setting of Peter's epistle is one of suffering with glory in view, and nothing will help the tired believer patiently to endure with a Christlike spirit, more than "the answer of a good conscience."

With all thy getting, get understanding.

No. 22.

Figures of Speech.

Figures involving Addition (concluded).

We have considered some of the Figures of Addition that affect the words of a passage: we have now to deal with those that affect the sense. There are six sections of this figure, with many subdivisions:—

(1) REPETITION.—Seven varieties.
(2) AMPLIFICATION.—Eleven varieties.
(3) DESCRIPTION.—Twelve varieties.
(4) CONCLUSION.—Eight varieties.
(5) INTERPOSITION.—Eight varieties.
(6) REASONING.—Seven varieties.

This is a formidable list. We do not propose to deal with more than a few of these varieties, our purpose being to stimulate interest and pave the way for more earnest and systematic study.

The seven varieties of REPETITION we leave without comment, as they are fairly obvious and simple. We commence with a variety of the second section—AMPLIFICATION and the figure called Pleonasm, or "Redundancy." This figure occurs when more words appear to be used than are strictly necessary. Such sentences as the following would be understandable without the redundant words, but not nearly so emphatic and arresting:—

"Yet did not the chief butler remember Joseph, but forgat him" (Gen. xl. 23).

"He confessed, and denied not; but confessed, I am not the Christ" (John i. 20).

"God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all" (1 John i. 5).

Another figure of AMPLIFICATION is called Periphrasis, or "Circumlocution," where again more words are used than are absolutely necessary. This figure is often employed to avoid something indelicate or offensive, and is sometimes used when we wish to refer to private matters in public. In 1 Thess. iv. 5, 12 and 13 the Gentiles are spoken of, yet how much more intense is the effect of the words that are actually used: "Which know not God"; "Them that are without": "Others which have no hope."

The figures that come under the heading DESCRIPTION and CONCLUSION need no special explanation, and we accordingly pass on to those headed INTERPOSITION.

In this section an important variety is Parenthesis:—

> "We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed (as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day star arise) in your hearts" (2 Pet. i. 19).

Unless we observe the parenthesis here, we shall be found believing that the Second Coming of Christ takes place when "the day star arises in our hearts"—as some do indeed teach.

When a sentence is added as a kind of explanation by the way, the Parenthesis is called Epitrechon or "Running along." For example:—

> "Now the sojourning of the children of Israel (who dwelt in Egypt) was four hundred and thirty years" (Exod. xii. 40).

The passage does not state that Israel sojourned in Egypt 430 years, although there are some who construct their chronology on this assumption.

When a Parenthesis is a statement complete in itself, and makes good sense when read separately, it is called Parembole or "Insertion." An important example is found in Eph. iii. 2—13:—

A | Eph. iii. 1. For this cause.

B | Eph. iii. 2—13. | Parembole, inserted to justify the claim of the apostle to be the prisoner of Christ for the Gentiles. It is complete in itself, and is most vital to the teaching of Ephesians.

A | Eph. iii. 14. For this cause. Resumption of argument commenced in verse 1.

The figures that come under the last heading, REASONING are not employed much in Scripture. They belong rather more to the realm of Philosophy.

The figure Apophasis, or "Insinuation," is beautifully used by the apostle in his letter to Philemon:—

> "I Paul have written it with mine own hand, I will repay: (albeit I do not say to thee how thou owest unto me even thine own self besides)" (Phile. 19).

It can, of course, be used in very unlovely ways and settings.

This concludes our survey of the Figures of Speech that involve Omission and Addition. By far the most important are yet to come, namely, those involving change, such as Simile, Metaphor, Metonymy, and the like. These we hope to deal with in due course, and to give more attention to detail than we have felt necessary with those already considered.

What manner of persons ought ye to be.

Symbols of Service.

Overseers.

It is remarkable that the controversy between Episcopalians and Presbyterians that was waged with so much bitterness years ago, should have been associated with two names which have fundamentally the same meaning. The Anglo-Saxon language tends to smoothness of speech. Thus the Scotch "kirk" becomes the English "church"; and the Greek word episkopos becomes the English "bishop." The word "presbyter" that gives us the other term, means an "elder"; and by comparing the passages where episkopos and presbuteros occur in the N.T. we discover that these two words are two titles of the same office. The literal meaning of the word episkopos is an "overseer," and the word is so translated in Acts xx. 28:—

> "Take heed, therefore, unto yourselves, and unto the flock over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of the God, which He hath purchased with His own blood" (Acts xx. 28).

The same "overseers" or "bishops" are called "elders" or "presbyters" in Acts xx. 17, showing that the titles are interchangeable. The word is translated in its four other occurrences by the word "bishop"; and in one of these references the title is applied to Christ Himself:—

> "For ye were as sheep going astray; but are now returned unto the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls" (1 Pet. ii. 25).

The first and last occurrences of the word link it with the office of a Shepherd. The apostle has this connection in mind when he writes:—

> "Feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight (episkopeō) thereof" (1 Pet. v. 2).

That the apostles were "bishops" is evident from Peter's words at the time of the appointment of Matthias. Speaking of the fall of Judas he says, quoting from the Psalms: "His bishoprick (episkopē) let another take" (Acts i. 20). The word episkopos is of frequent occurrence in the LXX. and was apparently taken from this version by the inspired apostles. We find, in this Version, that there were "overseers" of the army (Num. xxxi. 14); "overseers" of workmen (2 Chron. xxxiv. 12); and "overseers" of the house of the Lord (2 Kings xi. 18).

The title Episkopos is used to translate the name of God "El," in Job xx. 29; in one English translation the last word of the verse is rendered "The all-seeing God" or, as we say, "Providence."

Eleazar, the son of Aaron, is called an "overseer" in connection with the tabernacle and its furniture (Num. iv. 16).

We will not go into the specific qualifications mentioned by the apostle Paul in 1 Tim. iii. 1—7, as they pertain to "the office of a bishop" rather than to "oversight" in its wider meaning, which is the aspect with which we are concerned here.

The office of an overseer is a position of no small responsibility. It includes the thought of being responsible for soldiers, for workmen, and for the House of God, as well as the care of a shepherd for his flock. And when we discover that the title has been dignified by being applied to God Himself, we realize that to be made an overseer in any department of the work of the Lord is an honour indeed. As the apostle himself writes:—

> "If a man desire the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work" (1 Tim. iii. 1).

Wisdom, Human and Divine.

Being a comparison of the groping after truth by the ancient philosophers with the truth as it is revealed in Scripture, in order that the believer may the better appreciate the Word of God.

No. 2.

The work of the law written on the heart (Rom. ii. 15) as exhibited in the writings of two philosophers.

In our opening article, we sought to show that the Scriptures recognise that the ancient world had some knowledge of God, but that to a large extent this knowledge was abandoned. Nevertheless, the providence of God over all His works was so arranged that men should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after Him and find Him—"though He be not far from every one of us." It is not that God has removed Himself from man, but that man, by sin, cannot see or understand. Man needs a Mediator, he needs a Saviour; and the immense difference between all philosophy and the revelation of God finds expression in the Person and Work of Christ. Where the philosopher "felt after" but found not, the believer can say, "Our hands have handled." The One Who has revealed the Father to us has also removed our sin. Philosophy knows neither an atonement nor a redeemer, and must inevitably fail.

Before we go further, let us allow some of these ancient philosophers to speak for themselves, so that we may see just how far they penetrated, and just where they stopped. Let us go back to ancient Egypt, famed for its wisdom. We are told that Solomon's wisdom was such that it excelled "all the wisdom of Egypt" (1 Kings iv. 30), a comparison that prevents us from unceremoniously setting aside the wisdom of Egypt as superstition or ignorance. When Stephen speaks of Moses, he says that he was "learned in all the wisdom of the "Egyptians, and was mighty in words and in deeds" (Acts vii. 22). Moses certainly had much more to learn, and a great deal to unlearn, before he became the meekest man in all the earth and a fit instrument for the Lord to use, but the reference here to the wisdom of Egypt is sufficient to prevent our dismissing it scornfully.

Scattered through the writings of ancient Egypt are a number of "loan words" of Semitic origin, indicating close contact with Hebrew-speaking people and their ideas. For example, the words "a skilful scribe" are sopher yode; "mountain" is har; "quick" or "apt" is maher; "pure gold" is kethem, etc. In the British Museum there is a papyrus, numbered 10474, which dates from about the XVIIIth. dynasty, or the close of Israel's sojourn in Egypt. This papyrus contains the teaching of Amen-Em-Ope; and in a land that was so overrun with idols it is surely worthy of note that Amen-Em-Ope speaks of "God." In case some reader may think this mere sentiment on our part, we would remind him that such an eminently godly Hebrew as Joseph found no reason against a marriage with the daughter of a priest of On (Gen. xli. 50). We do not intend giving many quotations from this papyrus, but the following are so much in line with passages in the Scriptures as to make us wonder how much these early Egyptians knew of the truth. Take as an example the following parallels with passages in the epistle of James:—

"The tongue of man is the rudder of a ship,
But the Universal Lord is the pilot,"

"Be not influenced with fine clothes,
And refuse not him that is in rags."

"Of a truth thou knowest not the thoughts of God.
Thou canst not realise (?) the morrow" (Amen-Em-Ope).

"Behold also the ships, which though they be so great, and are driven of fierce winds, yet are they turned about with a very small helm, whithersoever the governor listeth" (Jas. iii. 4).

"If there come into your assembly a man with a gold ring, in goodly apparel, and there come in also a poor man in vile raiment: and ye have respect to him that weareth the gay clothing, and say to him, Sit thou here in a good place; and say to the poor, Stand thou there, or sit here under my footstool: are ye then not partial . . . . ?" (Jas. ii. 2—4).

"Go to now, ye that say, To-day or to-morrow we will go into such a city, and continue there a year, and buy and sell, and get gain: whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow" (Jas. iv. 13, 14).

We will give three more examples from the same papyrus, in this case parallel with passages in the Book of Proverbs:—

"Charcoal to embers, and wood to fire,
And a contentious man to inflame strife."

"Better is bread with a happy heart Than wealth with trouble."

"Say not, I have no sin,
And be not at pains to (conceal) it.
Move not the scales, and falsify not the weights,
And diminish not the parts of the corn measure" (Amen-Em-Ope).

"As coals are to burning coals, and wood to fire;
So is a contentious man to kindle strife" (Prov. xxvi. 21),

"Better is a little with the fear of the Lord
Than great treasure and trouble therewith" (Prov. xv. 16),

"Who can say, I have made my heart clean,
I am pure from my sin?
Divers weights and divers measures,
Both of them are alike abomination to the Lord" (Prov. xx. 9, 10).

As we have already remarked, the central doctrine of our faith, the finished work of the Son of God, is entirely absent from the teaching of unenlightened man; but the moral teaching of this ancient Egyptian is, nevertheless, in some respects comparable with the teaching of Solomon or of James.

Coming to the times of the apostle Paul, we have the writings of a slave named Epictetus. The following extracts from his discourses will help us to perceive how far he had traversed the road of "feeling after, if haply he might find."

"Freedom and slavery are but names, respectively, of virtue and of vice: and both of them depend upon the will. But neither of them has anything to do with those things in which the will has no share. For no one is a slave where the will is free."

"Fortune is an evil bond of the body, vice of the soul; for he is a slave whose body is free, but whose soul is bound, and, on the contrary, he is free whose body is bound, but whose soul is free" (Epictetus).

The reader will immediately think of Paul's words to the Corinthians and to the Romans:—

"He that is called in the Lord, being a slave, is the Lord's freeman" (1 Cor. vii. 22).

"When ye were the slaves of sin, ye were free from righteousness .... But now being made free from sin, and become slaves to God ...." (Rom. vi. 20, 22).

Epictetus was asked, "Who among men is rich?" to which he replied: "He who suffices for himself." The same truth is expressed in the Book of Proverbs: "A good man shall be satisfied from himself" (Prov. xiv. 14).

Again, when he was asked, "Who is free?" he replied, "The man who masters his own self." This is much the same truth as Solomon expresses in Prov. xvi. 32:—

"He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; And he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city."

Epictetus could not have given an answer to the deepest needs of the heart of man, for the liberating truth of redemption forms no part of human philosophy; but the parallel with O.T. morality is very evident.

There is also a remarkable parallel between the advice of Paul to the Corinthians concerning marriage, and that of Epictetus :—

"Since the condition of things is such as it now is, as though we were on the eve of battle, ought not the Cynic to be entirely without distraction for the service of God?" (Epictetus).

"I suppose, therefore, that this is good for the present distress . . . . that ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction" (1 Cor. vii. 26, 35).

The same Greek words are used by both writers in the phrase, "without distraction."

When Epictetus was asked how a man could grieve his enemy, he replied: "By preparing to act in the noblest way." So the apostle, in Romans, writes :—

"If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink; for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head" (Rom. xii. 20).

The following argument used by Epictetus is an interesting parallel with Paul's use of the "Jew inwardly" in Rom. ii. :—

"When we see a trimmer, we are in the habit of saying, This is no Jew; he is only acting the part of one; but when a man takes up the entire condition of a proselyte, thoroughly imbued with Jewish doctrines, then he is in reality as is called a Jew. So, we philosophers too, dipped in a false dye, are Jews in name, but in reality are something else . . . . we call ourselves philosophers when we cannot even play the part of men" (Epictetus).

"He is not a Jew who is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision, which is outward in the flesh: but he is a Jew who is one inwardly: and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God" (Rom. ii. 28, 29).

In his description of a true Cynic, Epictetus makes a remark that reminds us somewhat of Paul's words in Phil. iii. and other places :—

"Nor must he marry; marriage is right and honourable in other men, but its entanglements, its expenses, its distractions, would render impossible a life devoted to the service of heaven. Nor will he mingle in the affairs of any commonwealth: his commonwealth is not Athens or Corinth, but mankind."

We will not pursue these parallels further. If we have removed any existing prejudice, if we have excited the smallest sympathy with these men in their feeling after God, we have accomplished our end. We have no intention of setting up philosophy as a parallel with the faith. It is not and could not be. It lacks the essential ingredients of life and love found only in the Person and work of the Redeemer. If, however, we feel the smallest shame at our own low standards, as we think of this crippled slave in the Court of Nero, standing so solidly against its wealth and sin, our study will not have been in vain. And as we consider our own privileges, surely we shall turn in thankfulness to Him Who has not left us in our natural darkness, but has been made unto us "wisdom, and righteousness and sanctification and redemption" (1 Cor. i. 30).

Paul and his Companions.

No. 2.

Fellow-prisoners.

In the opening article of this series we considered four titles given by the apostle Paul to his companions in labour, which, by their composition with sun, "together with," emphasize the idea of fellowship. These four titles are sunkoinonos, partaker, companion, one who has fellowship; susugos, yokefellow; sunathleō, fellow-striver; and sunergos, fellow-worker. There is one other title similarly composed, and in order to make our study complete we must give it like consideration.

Sunaichmalotos, "fellow-prisoner" (Rom. xvi. 7; Col. iv. 10; Phile. 23).—The word aichmē, meaning "a spear," is from akme, "a point," and is found in our language in the word "acme." When Paul refers to himself as "the prisoner" of Jesus Christ, or of the Lord, in Eph. iii. 1; iv. 1; 2 Tim. i. 8 and Phile. 1 and 9, he uses desmios, a word that emphasizes the "bonds" that went to make up his imprisonment. To this aspect of his imprisonment he refers several times in his epistles, speaking of his "bonds" four times over in Phil. i. and, with a touch of pathos, he refers to them in Col. iv. 18, saying "remember my bonds." Again, in 2 Tim. ii. 9 and Phile. 10 and 13 mention of his bonds is made.

It is this word which we associate with Paul's "prison ministry." He had however suffered imprisonment many times before the occasion chronicled in Acts xxviii. We read of his imprisonment in Acts xvi. 23, xxii. 29, and xxiv. 27, while in 2 Cor. xi. 23, when comparing his experiences with that of other apostles, he wrote: "in prisons more frequent." We do not know how many times Paul suffered this indignity, but both before and after Acts xxviii. certain faithful souls shared imprisonment with him. The first to be mentioned are found in Rom. xvi. 7:—

> "Salute Andronicus and Junia, my kinsmen, and my fellow-prisoners, who are of note among the apostles, who were also in Christ before me."

It is difficult to decide whether by the word "kinsmen" the apostle intends us to understand that Andronicus and Junia were simply Israelites (Rom. ix. 3), or that they stood in the nearer place of relatives, as may be indicated by the use of the same word in verses 11 and 21. In Mark vi. 4 and in Acts x. 24 the meaning is, undoubtedly, "relatives," and we are inclined to believe that the apostle means us to understand that these "fellow-prisoners" were relatives, and he tells us that they had been christians longer than he. When merely the national relationship of Israelite is intended, and not kinsmen, the apostle uses the expression, "of the circumcision" (Col. iv. 11). It is an encouraging thought that apparently some of Paul's kinsfolk were amongst the earliest believers on the Lord, and had probably prayed for Saul at the very time he made havoc of the church. What joy would be theirs, even in prison, to go over the wonderful ways of God, and how their tears would be "lustred by His love" as they reviewed the grace of the Lord.

Aristarchus, the next to be mentioned, is introduced into the pages of Scripture at a perilous moment. Evidently there had been a rush to the Jewish quarters at Ephesus, in the hope of seizing Paul and dragging him into the theatre. In this the Jews were unsuccessful, but Gaius and Aristarchus, men of Macedonia, were "rushed with one accord into the theatre." On hearing this Paul "would have entered" the theatre, but the disciples "and certain of the chief of Asia" desired him not to do so (Acts xix. 29—31).

The second reference to Aristarchus is in Acts xx. 3, 4, where we find the Jews laying in wait for Paul, and a noble band of faithful believers, including Aristarchus, accompany him on his perilous journey. In Acts xxvii. 2 we again find Aristarchus with the apostle, this time on board the ship which was taking Paul as a prisoner to Rome. Evidently he went through the storm and the wreck with the apostle, and stood by during his Roman imprisonment, for in Col. iv. 10, as Paul's fellow-prisoner, he joins in sending salutations to the saints at Colosse.

What a record of faithful devotedness these few verses supply! When writing the epistle to Philemon Epaphras becomes the "fellow-prisoner" while Aristarchus is now called by Paul his "fellow-labourer" (Phile. 23, 24).

While there are indications that Paul was at times treated with some discrimination, being permitted to dwell in his own hired house, the fact remains that bonds are bonds, and to a man of the sensitiveness of Paul—a man who championed liberty with fiery zeal—bonds and bars of any sort would perhaps have become well-nigh intolerable, had it not been for the grace of God.

We sometimes forget that the grace of God through which we receive help in time of need will usually reach us through some human channel, and Andronicus and Junia, Aristarchus and Epaphras, as "fellow-prisoners" with the apostle, must be regarded in that light.

Paul himself is now for ever beyond the power of man. He awaits "the liberty of the glory of the sons of God," but his message remains, and his appeal to Timothy is of the same urgency to-day as when he wrote it:—

> "Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me His prisoner; but be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel according to the power of God" (2 Tim. i. 8).

Some of our readers may know a loneliness and an isolation as deep and as cruel as any prison experience. Certainly those intimately associated with the publication of this magazine know what the shut door of ostracism means. In a sense, all who believe the truth of the mystery become "fellow-prisoners" with the great apostle, and we trust that the contemplation of this phase of companionship, which is open to us all, will tend to sweeten the bitterness of the way, and cheer the lonely pilgrim thereon:—

> "Ye became companions . . . . ye had compassion on me in my bonds . . . . ye have in heaven a better and an enduring substance" (Heb. x. 33, 34).

This is the record.

Introductory.

Many years ago we had the privilege of addressing a Sunday School. Several years elapsed and we had the opportunity again. During the opening exercises of the School, we were struck by one unusual item. The Superintendent said, "Let us rise and give the record." The School stood to attention, and then together said:—

> "This is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life: and this life is in His Son. He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life" (1 John v. 11, 12).

The Superintendent turned and said, "We have given that record in this school ever since you were with us on the last occasion several years ago." The occasion and details of that earlier visit were only dimly remembered, but we could just recollect choosing out verse 12 for the younger members of the School as a verse containing a tremendous truth in words of not more than four letters, and drawing the attention of the older scholars to the variety of renderings of the word translated "record."

Perhaps it will be of service to readers other than Sunday School scholars to get a clear grasp of this important word. The words in 1 John v. that are variously translated "bear witness" (i. 2; v. 6, 8), "testify" (iv. 14; v. 9), "give record" (v. 10) are renderings of the Greek word martureō; the words "witness" (v. 9, 10) and "record" (v. 11) are translations of the word marturia. Both words are derived from martur, which gives us the English word "martyr." It means a witness who is willing, if necessary, to seal his testimony with his blood. The study of its etymology is involved, and considerable difference of opinion prevails among experts. We do not, therefore, feel justified in taking up valuable space over that which after all may not be of use.

There is one reference in the A.V that must be rejected. In 1 John v. 7, 8 the words, "in heaven . . . . in earth" must be omitted, and the passage read as in the R.V. No ancient Greek manuscript contains the passage, and it has crept into the text from the Latin Vulgate. We have therefore in 1 John six occurrences of martureō, the verb, and six occurrences of marturia, the noun. It is suggestive that the number twelve is emphasised in the opening of the Acts in connection with making up the number of witnesses.

Let us see these twelve passages together and consider their bearing upon the truth :—

Martureō, "to witness."

"For the life was manifested, and we have seen, and bear witness, and show unto you that eternal life, which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us" (1 John i. 2).

"We have seen and do testify that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world" (1 John iv. 14).

"This is He that came through water and blood, Jesus the Christ; not in water only, but in water and blood. And it is the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit is truth" (1 John v. 6).

"For there are three who bear witness, the Spirit, and the water, and the blood; and the three agree in one" (1 John v. 8, R.V).

"This is the witness of God which He hath testified of His Son" (1 John v. 9).

"He that believeth not God hath made Him a liar; because he believeth not the record that God gave of His Son" (1 John v. 10).

These six references fall into correspondence, stressing three phases of this testimony :—

A | i. 2. The Witness of the apostles who saw.
B | iv. 14. The Witness of the Father Who sent the Son.
C | v. 6. This Witness is true.
A | v. 8. The Witness of the three, the Spirit, the water and the blood.
B | v. 9. The Witness of God concerning His Son.
C | v. 10. The Witness rejected makes God a liar.

We must return to these references to consider more carefully what their testimony is, but for the moment our quest is a complete survey of the occurrences. We therefore give the six references to marturia : —

Marturia, "witness."

"If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater : for this is the witness of God which He hath testified of His Son" (1 John v. 9).

"He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself; he that believeth not God hath made Him a liar; because he believeth not the record that God testified of His Son" (1 John v. 10).

"And this is the record, that God hath given us eternal life, and this life is in His Son" (1 John v. 11).

These occurrences group themselves in a similar way to the occurrences of martureō:—

A | v. 9. The Witness of men. Receive.
B | v. 9. The Witness of God.
The Witness of God.
A | v. 10. The Witness in himself. Believe.
B | v. 10, 11. The Record of God.
The Record of God.

If we should say no more, the very presentation of these passages impresses the mind with the singleness and the solemnity of this witness. The singleness is most evident. The record of man and of God, of Spirit, water and blood is "concerning His Son." The solemnity is equally evident. The issues are nothing less than life or death; of believing God to be true or of making Him a liar; of possessing the conviction of the truth in our hearts, or of being lost in the darkness of a guilty world.

Sidelights on the Scriptures.

No. 11.

The Code of Khammurabi.

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

Near to the entrance to the fourth Egyptian Room stands a tall black stone pillar engraved with cuneiform letters. This is the famous code of laws inscribed by order of Khammurabi. The stone is of great antiquity, possibly the oldest monument in this Assyrian Room, for it dates back to the days of Abraham. Some of us may remember the words of Wellhausen concerning Abraham, viz:—

"We may not regard him as a historical person; he might with more likelihood be regarded as a free creation of unconscious art"!

Since these words of so-called criticism were penned, God has brought to light many wonderful witnesses to the historical accuracy of the Bible. Chedorlaomer becomes a living person, the dominance of Elam, as given in Gen. xiv., but denied by critics, proves to be an established fact; Arioch, King of Ellasar, is found in the inscription as Eri Aku, King of Larsa. Tidal (Tid-gal in the Hebrew, and Tud-Khula, or Tud-Ghula, in the inscriptions) has also been found. Amraphel has been identified with the name Ammurabi-ilu, "Khammurabi the god," the Amraphel of Gen. xiv. being the Khammurabi of the stone pillar we are now considering.

We are not endeavouring to prove anything directly connected with Abraham, but the link with Amraphel is noteworthy, as also the clear light of the Scripture on these ancient times. In Gen. x. 25 we are told that "unto Eber were born two sons; the name of one was Peleg.....his brother's name was Joktan," and from Joktan came the various tribes of Arabia. Peleg's descendants remained nearer their ancestral home, and when Abram was born are found in the Babylonian city Ur. Documents written in the days of Abraham, and in the land in which he lived, have brought to light his very name! In the Assyrian Eponym Canon we find the name Abu-ramu, or Abram, a name of one of the inhabitants of Abraham's land in Abraham's day. The ancient records of Arabia, moreover, make it plain that Khammurabi was from that same region, and that his language is closely allied with the Hebrew. Professor Sayce says that Khammurabi, like the rest of his dynasty, is not Babylonian, but South Arabian. The words of which they are compounded, and the divine names which they contain, do not belong to the Babylonian and Assyrian language, and there is a cuneiform tablet in which they are given with their Assyrian translation. We may be able to deal more fully with this line of things when considering various passages of Scripture in the light of Archæology. We pass on to consider the Code of Khammurabi itself.

The existence of this stone, with its codified laws eight hundred years before Moses, disposes of the fiction which we sometimes still hear that it was not possible in the time of Moses for a stone to be engraved with laws as is definitely set forth in Exodus.

> "These laws of Khammurabi governed the peoples from the Persian Gulf to the Caspian Sea, and from Persia to the Mediterranean, and were in force throughout Canaan." (Companion Bible, Appendix No. 15).

This same Appendix tabulates nine of the laws of Khammurabi operating in Genesis. We give a condensed summary for the sake of any who may not possess a copy of this invaluable work.

1. The law of Adoption. Gen. xv. Code 191.
2. The giving of Hagar to Abraham. Gen. xvi. Code 146.
3. Commercial enactments. Gen. xxiii. Code 7.
4. Taking of life for stealing. Gen. xxxi. 32. Code 6.
5. Taking of life by burning. Gen. xxxviii. 24. Code 110.
6. Death for theft from palace. Gen. xliv. 9. Code 6.
7. Special portion to favourite son. Gen. xlviii. 22. Code 165.
8. Reuben's punishment. Gen. xlix. 4. Code 158.
9. Inability of Abram to sell Hagar. Gen. xvi. 6. Code 119.

The laws of Khammurabi include other interesting items. If a surgeon kills a patient he must lose both his hands. If a house falls and kills anyone, the jerry-builder must be put to death. If a wife be not economical, but is a goer-about, she must be thrown in the river! Some of the penalties it will be seen are rather drastic. Where stealing is punished under the law of Moses by having to restore double, Khammurabi's Code condemns the thief to death. Some of the laws savour of the acceptance of man's person. For injuring a slave the law of God gave the slave his freedom, but Khammurabi's Code compensated the master. A rich or a poor man being injured, the law of Moses penalizes the offence by inflicting identical injury. Khammurabi's Code differentiates between rich and poor. The rich man's injury is punished as under the law of Moses, but the poor man's is expiated by paying a fine of one mina of silver.

We do not expect to find "statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law" that was given to Israel (Deut. iv. 8) in the Code of Khammurabi. The fact of a code of laws at all, their witness to a high state of civilization, their reflection in the very customs recorded in Genesis make this monument of great value. As we get nearer to the beginning, so we find traces of a knowledge of God becoming more distinct. Romans i. distinctly declares that the nations had a knowledge of God, but perverted it and were given up by God. Many of the problems that have arisen in connection with some of the laws of Moses would be easily solved did we know more of the times and customs prevailing. For example. To us, from the light of subsequent revelation, "an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth" seems very lacking in mercy, and yet when we remember that the custom of blood feud meant that for an eye, a life, or possibly many lives would be sacrificed, the strict equity of the Mosaic law becomes tinged also with mercy and grace. The Bible student we feel sure cannot look upon this venerable witness of Abraham's day without a very real interest.

Eternal life.

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

Among the doctrines which come before the student of Scripture in his search into its teaching regarding human destiny, is that of eternal or everlasting life. In order to avoid the traditional interpretation, and also to keep out of sight any ideas of our own, we shall transliterate the word translated "eternal," and call it aionion throughout this enquiry. Our present quest is to discover as far as possible all that Scripture says regarding aionion life, to whom it is given, upon what basis, whether it is exclusively proffered to faith, or to works, or to both; whether it is a present possession, or a future one; whether it has to do with the final or a transitional state, and anything further that may be learned by a careful and prayerful study.

The first occurrence of the words aionion life is in Matt. xix. 16, "Good Master, what good thing shall I do that I may have aionion life." It will be observed that "doing good" is directly associated with "having aionion life." The Lord, it is true, corrects the error contained in the loose usage of the word "good," but does not correct the idea that good works, or keeping the commandments, were necessary for the attainment of this life, for He said;—

> "If thou wilt enter into the life (the article seems to indicate the life under consideration, namely, aionion life, KEEP THE COMMANDMENTS."

Reading further, we find the Lord speaking of "being perfect," and of telling the young man to go and sell all that he had and give to the poor, to follow the Lord, and that he would have "treasure in heaven." We know how the young man failed. Although he had "kept from his youth up" all the commandments, yet he did not reach the standard necessary for "aionion life," or "for treasure in heaven." One cannot help comparing these two expressions together, and asking whether they both refer to the same thing. In verses 27—29 Peter asks a question arising out of the failure of the young man, and is answered, and there again a twofold description is given of the result of "forsaking all and following." To the disciples the Lord held out the prospect of sitting upon twelve thrones in the regeneration, and supplements that by a promise to "every one that hath forsaken....," that they "shall receive an hundred-fold, and shall inherit aionion life." Here, in place of "treasure in heaven," is found "sitting on thrones" and "receiving a hundred-fold." We must also bear in mind that the Lord did not say that a rich man could not enter into the kingdom of heaven, but that he would only enter with great difficulty.

It will be observed that the Lord uses the word "inherit" with aionion life. He never misused words, and it will be our wisdom to keep this idea of an inheritance before us as we continue our study. Mark and Luke record the incident of the rich young man, and in their Gospels the word "inherit" is used by the young man himself. Readers must not think this to be a discrepancy. The young man in all probability spoke Aramaic, and the Holy Spirit has given us in the translation two Greek words, "to have" and "to inherit," to help us to understand the meaning of the term. Mark's record clarifies our conception somewhat as may be seen by the following slight variation from Matthew's record, Mark x. 17—31, "What shall I do that I may inherit aionion life?"

We have heard it said that the young man was very wrong to have boasted that he had "kept all these things from his youth up," yet Mark tells us that when the young man had made this statement, "Jesus beholding him, loved him, and said, One thing thou lackest, etc."

Yet one other item is explained by Mark and Luke. Matt. xix. 29 leaves us with no settled knowledge as to when the "hundred-fold" should be received. The record in Mark is very explicit, "he shall receive a hundred-fold now in this time.....and in the coming age life aionion." So also in Luke xviii. 30. Luke records two occasions when the Lord was definitely asked the way to obtain aionion life. In chapter xviii. we read of the rich young ruler as in Matthew and in Mark, and in Luke x. 25—28 a certain lawyer asks the question tempting Him, but to him also it was shown that inheriting aionion life is linked with doing the commandments.

Many have felt how diametrically opposed to the way of justification and life these passages are to the doctrine revealed through Paul, and, failing to discern the things that differ, they have attempted to make the Lord teach the rich young ruler that aionion life was to be attained only by faith and not by works. In no other branch of study would such biased reading be tolerated. Nothing is clearer than that aionion life was connected with doing, keeping, forsaking and following. Matthew, writing with the kingdom of the heavens before him, uses aionion life with special reference to that period. The Lord himself links it with the kingdom and the regeneration, and the time when He shall sit upon the throne of His glory.

Once again, and only once, He refers to that throne, and it is there we find the next and last reference in Matthew to aionion life. Matt. xxv. 31, 32, "He shall sit upon (the) throne of His glory, and before Him shall be gathered all the nations." The nations are divided into two sections, the one section hear the words, "Come ye blessed of My Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you since the overthrow of the world.....the righteous into life aionion." Here it will be seen that these nations "inherit a kingdom," are "righteous," and enter into "aionion life." What is the basis of the entry? We unhesitatingly say, with the scripture before us, Works! This is the Lord's own explanation. "For I was an hungered:.....thirsty.....Then shall the righteous answer Him saying, Lord, when saw we Thee an hungered.....thirsty, etc?" They had done it unto His brethren, and were not conscious that it was received by the Lord as being rendered unto Himself. This therefore rules out the idea often read into the passage that it was an act of faith; faith does not enter into the passage. The rest of the nations are addressed as "Ye cursed," and while the righteous inherit the prepared kingdom, they enter the prepared fire, "aionion fire prepared for the devil and his angels." "These shall go away into aionion punishment." The basis for this punishment is the exact negation of the kind deeds shown by the righteous. This is the Lord's own explanation. "For I was an hungered .....thirsty.....Then shall they also answer Him, saying, Lord, when saw we Thee an hungered.....thirsty, etc." The way in which the Lord deals with these two classes shows how exactly He will keep to the law, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself:" Failure to observe this cost these nations the kingdom and aionion life. Instead, they received aionion punishment in aionion fire.

The relation which is observed between the subject of aionion life and the set of parables under consideration in other articles is important. The parable which precedes the first reference to aionion life in Matthew is the parable of the wicked unforgiving servant. He is delivered to the tormentors (same root as the word used so often in the Revelation), till he should pay all that was due. This is parallel with the passage in Matthew v. 26, "Verily I say unto thee, thou shalt by no means come out thence, till thou hast paid the uttermost farthing." The parable which immediately follows Matt. xix., and which commences with the word "For," is the parable of the house-holder and vineyard, where the penny a day seems to be in the parable what the aionion life is in the plain statement of xix. 29.

The parable that immediately precedes the last reference to aionion life in Matthew is the parable of the faithful and unprofitable servants. The faithful enters into the joy of his Lord; the unprofitable servant is cast into outer darkness, where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth. All these parables have service or manner of life before them, with their consequent rewards and punishments. It is so with regard to the way in which aionion life, punishment, and fire are used in Matthew.

There are many who do not hesitate to affirm that the aionion fire of Matt. xxv. is the second death of Rev. xx. 14. Colour is given to this interpretation by the fact that in Rev. xx. 10 we read that:—

> "The devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet (are), and they shall be tormented day and night unto the ages of the ages."

Let us not be too hasty in our conclusions. In the one case the fire is for torment day and night unto the ages of the ages. In the other case it is definitely called the second death. Death and Hades are cast into the second death, and nothing is said about Satan. So far as we have any knowledge, the Devil has never yet died, and if he be cast into the lake of fire of Rev. xx. 14, it would be the first death, not the second, for him.

The special emphasis upon "the overcomer" in the Revelation has already been pointed out in the articles dealing with that book. It should be kept in mind when considering the meaning of the passages relating to punishment. Note the alternatives in the addresses to the seven churches in chapters ii. and iii. So far as we can understand the term, aionion life may be for a limited period, and may end. Life in Christ is another matter, and must on no account be confused with it.

Matt. vii. 14 and xviii. 8, 9 are the only other references to "life" found in Matthew. We there learn of the "strait gate and narrow way that lead to life," with its alternative "destruction"; and in xviii. 8, 9 we read that it is better to enter into life halt, or maimed, rather than having two hands or two feet to be cast into the aionion fire. This aionion fire is further interpreted for us by the fact that the next verse says, "rather than having two eyes to be cast into the Gehenna of fire." The danger of the Gehenna of fire is first mentioned in Matt. v. 22; a parallel passage with xviii. 9 is found in Matt. v. 29, 30. The destruction of soul and body is referred to Gehenna in x. 28 (this should be considered over against the losing of the soul in Matt. xvi. 25, mistranslated "life"). The proselytes of the Pharisees and Scribes are spoken of as children of Gehenna, and the Pharisees and Scribes are asked, "How can ye escape the judgment of Gehenna?" (Matt. xxiii. 33). Gehenna occurs only in Matthew, Mark, Luke and James. It is exclusively used in connection with the kingdom, and never comes into sight in the Church Epistles; it is the divine explanation of the aionion fire as used by Matthew.

Enough has been shown that aionion life and aionion punishment as found in Matthew have an entirely different aspect from that evangelical offer of life connected solely with faith in the sacrifice of the Lord Jesus. Neither faith nor the atonement are ever in view in the passages we have been studying.

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

No. 16. Unsigned.—"Who is the Porter in John x 3?"

It is impossible to answer with certainty. It is part of a "proverb" (verse 6) translated there "parable." In the explanation that follows (verses 7—18) the interest centres around the Shepherd as the door of the sheep, and the one who gives His life for the sheep. The only passage in these verses that has the remotest reference to the Porter is verse 15: "As the Father knoweth Me." Subsequently in verses 24—42 the question concerning whether the Saviour was "the Christ" or not is revived. His answer is a reference to the works which He did in His Father's name. This is followed by the words, "My sheep hear My voice, and I know them, and they follow Me." Here we are taken back to the opening verses of John x.; and it will be seen that where, in the "proverb," Christ speaks of the "Porter," in the two explanations He speaks of the witness of the Father.

There is a special reference here also to the witness of John the Baptist. He declared that the reason why he came baptising was "that He (Christ) should be made manifest to Israel," and John it was who opened the door to the Good Shepherd in the first instance, which, combined with the voice from heaven (Matt. iii.) proved to all who had ears to hear that here, in the Person of the Saviour, was the true Shepherd. This seems to be the meaning of the "Porter" in John x. 3.

C.H.W. 35

While it may be too bold a statement that the idea of the Jubilee underlies the whole of the revelation of Scripture, one can safely say that the whole purpose of the ages appears to be constructed along the lines of the Jubilee. The present creation with its six days' work and seventh day rest conforms to this idea, and the ever widening series of sevens which are such a feature in Israel's typical feasts and prophecies but confirm the close association of the age purpose and the type of the Jubilee.

The Jubilee and its glorious anti-type at the end of the ages cannot be separated from the atonement, and in all the types there is present the alternative to "the acceptable year of the Lord," namely, "the day of vengeance of our God."

Not only does the Jubilee foreshadow the great purpose of the ages, but we find it colouring prophecy, doctrine, and hope. The prophecy of Dan. ix. is most obviously built upon the idea of the Jubilee, but instead of the period being one of 7×7 years, it is the longer period of 70×7 years.

The word translated "forgiveness" in Eph. i. 7 is the same as is used in the O.T. for the proclamation of "liberty." The second reference to redemption in Eph. i. looks to the day when every man shall return to his own possessions. The use of the title "Kinsman Redeemer" and the securing of the lost inheritance in the book of Ruth should also be taken into account.

Throughout Israel's history we meet with the blowing of trumpets. The overthrow of Jericho is intimately associated with the seven-times-seven, with the blowing of trumpets, with the scarlet thread, and with the execution of vengeance. Trumpets are associated with the second coming of the Lord, with the assumption of the kingdom, and with the resurrection.

It may not be granted to us all to attain to an earthly Jubilee, but we rejoice to know that not one of the redeemed of the Lord shall fail of that great anti-typical Jubilee, when "the creature itself shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God."

Paul and his Companions.

No. 3.

Ananias; the man who said "brother."

It is usual to speak of Barnabas as Paul's first companion, and if we limit the word companion to actual fellowship in service, perhaps Barnabas must be given first place. We are sure, however, that one name, associated with Paul's passing from blindness to sight, would be sure of a prominent place among Paul's companions; the name of one by whom Paul was cheered in the midst of his bitter reflections and remorse when he was addressed by that unexpected, but lovely, word "brother." To the end of his days, Paul retained vivid remembrances of his conversion, speaking of it with much feeling as late as his first epistle to Timothy. We feel sure that Paul himself never forgot the first time he was addressed by a Christian as "brother," and how that greeting was enhanced by the circumstances. Consequently we commence the goodly fellowship of the companions of the apostle with the name of Ananias.

To-day it is usual to associate the name Ananias with the sin of lying. Indeed, in the writings of some the word has been used in this connection as a synonym, much as Herod's name is used by Shakespeare in the phrase, "It out-herods Herod." But the name was a common one in the days of the apostles, and it is comforting to remember that of the two others of the same name beside the man who lied against the Holy Spirit, which are mentioned in the narrative of the Acts, Ananias was the name of the man to whom it was first revealed that Saul of Tarsus was a chosen vessel unto the Lord. Ananias was also the name of the High Priest before whom Paul stood, as recounted in Acts xxiii. The name means "Jah is gracious," and would speak to the heart of the stricken Saul. The grace of the Lord became the keynote of his after life and ministry, and in every sense the association of this name with the commencement of Paul's life as a Christian was fitting.

We are not drawing upon our imagination when we stress the name of this disciple who ministered to the newly-converted persecutor, for the Lord said of Saul;—

> "He hath seen in a vision a man named Ananias coming in, and putting his hand on him, that he might receive his sight" (Acts ix. 12).

Twenty-five years after, in spite of suffering beyond measure and labour beyond computation, the name and character of the man who first called him "brother" is remembered by Paul:—

> "And one Ananias, a devout man according to the law, having a good report of all the Jews which dwelt there, came unto me, and stood, and said unto me, Brother Saul, receive thy sight" (Acts xxii. 12, 13).

It was no small or easy commission that Ananias received when he was told:—

> "Arise and go into the street which is called Straight, and ask in the house of Judas for one called Saul of Tarsus; for behold he prayeth, and hath seen in a vision a man named Ananias coming in, and putting his hand on him, that he might receive his sight" (Acts ix. 11, 12).

Ananias knew only too well the character of the man to whom he was sent, and in his answer to the Lord declares how he had heard through many of the evil that Saul had done to the saints at Jerusalem, and that now even to far-away Damascus, armed not only with the persecuting zeal of a fanatic but with authority from the chief priests, had he come to bind all that called upon the name of the Lord. Ananias had heard "how much evil" this man had wrought. The Lord shows him "how great things" Saul must suffer for His sake. Ananias is in fear for those who call upon "the name" of the Lord, but the Lord reveals that this same persecutor shall bear His "name" before the Gentiles and Kings and the children of Israel, and that he shall suffer great things for that selfsame "name." Assured by these words, Ananias pursues his way along the street that is called Straight, and enters the home of Judas.

Scripture tells us that all that Ananias was commissioned to do was to put his hand upon the sightless eyes of Saul. But when, at last, Ananias stood in the presence of the stricken man, when, as he looked upon this trophy of grace, he recalled the Pharisee and the persecutor, when he realized the common bond that was now theirs, he was constrained not only to act, but to speak, and we believe Saul of Tarsus had never before heard so sweet a sound from human lips as the greeting, "Brother Saul." Here doctrine and practice met: he was still "Saul," but he was now "Brother." The proud persecutor had been received into the family of faith, not only by the Lord of glory, but by one of His humble children. The words and the attitude of Ananias are full. He followed this endearing and lovely salutation with the words, "The Lord, even Jesus" (emphasizing the Lordship of the risen Christ, another feature prominently marking the teaching of the apostle), and finally, he interpreted the gift of physical sight as being symbolic of spiritual illumination: "Receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost" (Acts ix. 17).

We have not yet mentioned the first title that Scripture gives to the apostle Paul. Without the Book, and without having Acts ix. before us, we believe that we should select many titles borne by the great apostle before the one given him in Acts ix. 15 came into our minds, viz., "He is a chosen vessel unto Me, to bear My name . . . ." Paul never forgot that he had been "chosen," a word allied with the word "elect," and, in Paul's estimation, a word redolent of grace beyond dreams. He never forgot that he was a "vessel," and in 2 Cor. iv. 6, 7, as though still thinking of that blinding light which he saw on the road to Damascus, he writes:—

> "For God, Who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us."

Then follows a list of sufferings, which shows that he had entered into that phase of his commission covered by the words, "how great things he must suffer for My name's sake."

There are but six references in the Scriptures to Ananias, five of them being in the record of Acts ix. and one in Acts xxii. when Paul is making his defence.

Ananias may not have lived to see the fulfilment of his vision, but he did see the miracle-working power of Christ's love. It was a great thing to be one of the Lord's "chosen": it was an honour to be a "chosen vessel": to bear the name of the Lord before Gentiles, Kings and Israel was a glory hitherto unknown by a son of man: to be entrusted with the fellowship of His sufferings was a trust indeed—each and all of these wondrous titles Ananias no doubt unfolded during that scene in the room in Damascus. But all was sanctified, and crowned and blessed beyond the power of human speech, by that grace-taught preface; "Brother Saul."

The Acts of the Apostles.

No. 14.

A dispensational miracle (Acts iii. 1—iv. 22).

Perhaps it is not quite right to single out the healing of the lame man and call it a "dispensational miracle," for the miracles performed by the Lord and His apostles in almost every case foreshadow spiritual truths. The miracle of the death death of Ananias and Sapphira, for instance, was a dispensational anticipation; and also the judgment of blindness that fell upon Elymas. Nevertheless, while all miracles are called "the powers of the age to come" (Heb. vi. 5), this initial miracle of the Acts in a special way follows on the day of Pentecost and illuminates its prophetic character.

We must first discover the general disposition of subject-matter, so that we may realise what are the salient features of the narrative, and not omit any step that is essential to the carrying forward of the theme.

While each of these members has its own structure, we will not set out the opening and closing sections in detail, as they are fairly obvious, and the explanatory teaching is developed in the central members. If we will but pay attention to the way in which this explanation has been written, a number of items will fall naturally into place, and we shall be able to concentrate on the dispensational foreshadowing which this miracle represents.

There is an insistence in this record on the fact that the Lord's name, in the power of which the lame man was healed, is "Jesus Christ of Nazareth." The choice of this name out of the many borne by our Lord is as inspired as any other part of Scripture, and has a definite bearing on the teaching of the passage. Most readers will know that the title never occurs in the epistles written to the Church. Five times in the Acts we meet the title "Jesus of Nazareth," but on the two occasions when it is used by Peter in connection with this miracle, it is "Jesus Christ of Nazareth." This is important, because it stresses the Messiahship of the rejected One, the acknowledgment of which is closely connected with the prophetic interpretation of the miracle. John, who was with Peter in the working of this miracle, has told us that Pilate wrote a title and put it on the cross:—

> "And the writing was, JESUS OF NAZARETH THE KING OF THE JEWS" (John xix. 19).

And he is careful to remind us, before the story of the crucifixion is ended, of the prophecy: "They shall look upon Him Whom they have pierced" (John xix. 37). When this takes place, Zechariah tells us that Israel's restoration will follow; and this same Jesus of Nazareth, so long despised, shall once more stand upon the Mount of Olives and accomplish all the purposes of grace that are awaiting Israel's repentance (Zech. xii.—xiv.).

The changed attitude towards "Jesus of Nazareth" which brings about the healing of the nation is seen in Isa. liii.:—

> "He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief: and He hid as it were His face from us (margin); He was despised, and we esteemed Him not" (Isa. liii. 3).

This is the Jewish estimate of "Jesus of Nazareth"; but immediately following, the prophet reveals to us the surprise which will be expressed by Israel when they look upon Him Whom they pierced:—

> "Surely, HE hath borne OUR griefs and carried OUR sorrows: yet we did esteem HIM stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted. But (and here note the dawning revelation of truth), HE was wounded for OUR transgressions, HE was bruised for OUR iniquities; the chastisement of OUR peace was upon HIM; and with HIS stripes WE are healed" (Isa. liii. 4, 5).

This passage must be read aloud to be appreciated. The stress must be put upon the pronouns "HE" and "OUR." Israel rejected Jesus of Nazareth and esteemed Him stricken and smitten of God. But when at last they repent and believe, they will acknowledge that it was for their sins, not His own, that He died, and they will then gladly give Him the title which Peter uses in Acts iii. and iv.—"Jesus the Messiah of Nazareth" (Acts iii. 6 and iv. 10).

Peter's words in Acts iii. 19—26 are a direct prophetic exposition of the meaning of this miracle. He urges repentance, with a view to the times of refreshing and of restitution that will be brought in by the return of the Lord from heaven. This coming of Christ, and the blessings that will flow from it, are in perfect harmony with the testimony of Moses and all the prophets (Acts iii. 22—24), and with the covenant made with Abraham and his seed (Acts iii. 25, 26). It is impossible to read "the church" into this passage, especially when we read the concluding words:—

> "Ye are the children of the prophets . . . . Unto you first God, having raised up His Son Jesus, sent Him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities."

The point of Peter's explanation lies in the word translated "salvation" (Acts iv. 12). We read that the lame man had been more than forty years a cripple, which makes us think at once of Israel in their unbelief. The words "perfect soundness" (Acts iii. 16) refer back to Israel's condition as described in Isa. i. 6, where the LXX. uses the same word, "no soundness." The word "whole" in Acts iv. 9: "By what means he is made whole," is sesostai, from sozo, "to save." The word "salvation" in Acts iv. 12 is he soteria, literally "the healing": "Neither is there salvation in any other."

This, then, is Peter's explanation. The lame man who had been healed, and who was seen walking and leaping and praising God (Acts iii. 8) was a picture of the millennial day when "the lame man shall leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb shall sing" (Isa. xxxv. 6). Bringing the healed man forward, Peter says, in effect:—

> "Look at this man. He has been healed by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, and stands before you as a prophetic anticipation of Israel's restoration; neither is there THE HEALING (that is, the healing and restoration of Israel) in any other. None but this despised and rejected Messiah can ever avail."

Alas, Israel did not repent. The next outstanding typical miracle is that of a Jew stricken with blindness, while a Gentile believes (Acts xiii.). The type is fulfilled in Acts xxviii., when blindness falls upon the whole nation and "the salvation of God is sent to the Gentiles" (Acts xxviii. 28).

We believe that the reader will now be able to interpret the details of this great section of the Acts without need of further exposition. We trust that we have made the dispensational character of the healing of the lame man clear, and this must suffice. With a book like the Acts, which is so full of incident and detail, we can only deal with the main outlines, and must leave the reader to fill in the details for himself.

The epistle to the Romans.

No. 58.

Waiting for the Adoption (Rom. viii. 22—28).

The structure of Romans viii. given on page 72, Vol. XXV., places verses 15—17 in correspondence with the section before us.

C | 15—17. Spirit Itself bears witness. SONSHIP (huiothesia).
C | 22—28. Spirit Itself intercedes. SONSHIP (huiothesia).

It is of the greatest importance, therefore, as we thread our way through the intricacies of interpretation, to keep before the mind the similarity of theme exhibited by these two sections.

Turning to the second of these sections, verses 22—28, we observe that it is divided into four parts by the recurrence of the verb "to know." These four parts are arranged as follows:—

A | 22—25. WE KNOW. Waiting for the adoption.
B | 26. WE KNOW NOT. The help and intercession of the Spirit.
B | 27. HE KNOWETH. The mind of the Spirit.
A | 28. WE KNOW. Working together of all things for good.

Each of these parts is complete in itself; and as we can only deal with one in the space of an article, we will give the expansion of A | 22—25 here, reserving the details of the remaining sections until we come to them in order.

Romans viii. 22—25.

"We know."

A | 22. The whole creation.
B | 22. Groaneth and travaileth together.
C | 22. Until now.

A | 23. Ourselves also, first-fruits.
B | 23. Groan within ourselves.
C | 23. Waiting for the adoption.

Waiting (24, 25) expanded,
a | Saved by hope.
b | Seen.
b | Not seen.
a | Wait with patience.

The "groaning," the "redemption," and the "hope" which form the basis of our present study have already been touched upon in the preceding verses of this chapter, and are largely dealt with in chapter vii. The struggle against indwelling sin, so vividly exhibited in the "wretched man" of Rom. vii., finds some answering hope in the revelation of that other "indwelling," the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead (Rom. viii. 11). In the Person of Christ Himself there was no conflict between the flesh and the spirit, but in our case there always will be, until we attain to the likeness of His body of glory. The groaning of the child of God comes largely from the consciousness of this indwelling sin; and, in contrast, it is the indwelling spirit that helps his present infirmities. This indwelling spirit is called "the spirit of sonship" ("adoption," A.V.) in verse 15, and it is the consummation of this sonship in resurrection glory that is the goal and expectation of the child of God, "delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God . . . . the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body" (Rom. viii. 21 and 23).

The groaning that forms part of the saint's experience is called in verse 18 "the sufferings of this present time"; or, as given in verse 22, "the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now." While these sufferings may be intense, they are limited to "this present time," to the "now" of verse 22, and are not worthy to be compared with "the glory" that shall be revealed at the "manifestation of the sons of God" (viii. 19), and "the liberty of the glory of the children of God" (viii. 21).

We have not to search far to discover the root cause of our present groaning and suffering. It is "subjection to vanity" and the "bondage of corruption." We have to go back to Gen. iii. to find its origin; and there too we learn its only remedy: "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head."

Interspersed among the solemn words of Rom. viii. 20—25 we find also words that cheer, encourage and illuminate. Before our first parents were expelled from the garden, they received the promise of the coming Deliverer. At the door of the garden stood the Cherubim, a pledge of future blessing, the four faces speaking of man and the creation that was ruined by his fall, but is destined in God's good time to be restored and glorified. So in Rom. viii. 20—25, we have an emphasis on the word "hope." The very words "groaning and travailing" are not without hope, for they speak of a birth that shall follow; and as John xvi. 21 says, "As soon as she is delivered of the child, she remembereth no more the anguish, for joy that a man is born into the world." In Rom. viii. the birth that shall turn all present sorrow into joy is the attainment of the adoption, "the redemption of the body" in resurrection glory.

In verse 15 the apostle speaks of "the spirit of adoption" as opposed to "the spirit of bondage"; in verse 23 it is "the first-fruits of the spirit" as opposed to "the bondage of corruption" in verse 21. On pages 165—171 of Volume XXV. (dealing with viii. 5—15) we have examined the usage of the word "spirit." The spirit given to the redeemed child of God is a Divine spirit, or new nature; it is a Christ-spirit, or Sonship-spirit; it is the spirit of resurrection, and consequently a first-fruits spirit, a blessed pledge and anticipation of the resurrection yet to come. The possession of this pledge does not, however, exempt from sharing in the universal groan of creation, nor does it speak of sinless perfection in the flesh. We have this spirit as the earnest until the redemption of the purchased possession.

The word translated "to groan" in Rom. viii. 23 is stenazo and literally means "to contract," "to make narrow or strait." It will be recognised in the modern word "stenographer," which does not imply that a shorthand writer groans while at work, but that "shorthand" is a contracted form of writing. In 2 Cor. v. 2 and 4 we have this groaning connected with the straitness of "this tabernacle," coupled with the "earnest desire" for "the house which is from heaven," which shall be entered when "mortality" is "swallowed up of life." The "earnest desire" of 2 Cor. v. is parallel with the "earnest expectation" and the "waiting" of Rom. viii. 19, 23 and 25.

The word "earnest expectation" in verse 19 is apokaradokia —apo, "from"; kara, "the head"; and dokaō, "to expect." It denotes eagerness, the neck outstretched, watching and waiting. The same eagerness is expressed in other passages by such figures as "your loins girded," "shoes on your feet," "lamps trimmed," etc.

The word "wait" in verses 23 and 25 also indicates eagerness. The Greek word is apekdechomai—apo, "from"; ek, "out of"; and dechomai, "to receive." The idea conveyed by the two prefixes apo and ek is that we receive, or look to receive, something away from this life and this present sphere, something which originates in the sphere connected with the manifestation of the sons of God.

In the doctrinal portion of Romans, chapters i.—viii., the word elpis ("hope") occurs nine times, and elpizo ("to hope") once. Of these occurrences, seven refer to the true hope. Let us look at these seven references grouped together:—

A | Rom. iv. 18. HOPE in spite of the deadness of self. A son in view.
B | Rom. v. 2. HOPE arising out of peace and justification.
C | Rom. v. 4 HOPE realised in experience and patience.
D | Rom. v. 5. HOPE and the love of God. Unashamed.

A | Rom. viii. 20. HOPE in spite of vanity and corruption. Sonship in view.
B | Rom. viii. 24. HOPE leading to complete salvation in that day.
C | Rom. viii. 25. HOPE expressed by patience and waiting.

These seven references have this in common, that they all speak of resurrection, and the utter failure of the flesh. They suggest that the true attitude of heart and mind of those who have such a hope should be one of patient expectancy.

> "For we are saved by hope: but hope that is seen is not hope: for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for? But if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it" (Rom. viii. 24, 25).

The outstanding quality of this hope is that it is not seen. The faith which is "the substance of things hoped for" in Hebrews xi., is linked with "the evidence of things not seen" (particularly with reference to suffering, see Vol. XVII., pp. 44—47). Throughout the ages, changes of dispensation have had something of this character in common (Heb. xi. 3). It was the outstanding feature of the faith of Noah, who was "warned of God of things not seen as yet" (Heb. xi, 7). It was the secret of the faith of Moses, who endured "as seeing Him Who is invisible." It was characteristic of Abraham, who "looked for a city which hath foundations" (Heb. xi. 10); and, indeed, of all those who died in faith, "having seen the promises afar off" (Heb. xi. 13).

We have already referred to 2 Cor. v. in connection with the groaning of the present time, and the earnest expectation of the resurrection body. We now refer to 2 Cor. iv., where we shall find the same kind of sequence as in Rom. viii.—sufferings not worthy to be compared with the glory that is to be revealed, the association of the glory with resurrection, and the sufferings with the "groaning" of the present time; and the linking of all this with "things not seen."

> "For which cause we faint not; but though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day. For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; while we look not at the things which are seen; but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal: but the things which are not seen are eternal. For we know that if the earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God . . . . For in this we groan, earnestly desiring . . . . our house from heaven . . . . God hath given us the earnest of the spirit" (2 Cor. iv. 16—v. 5).

The only other occurrence of blepō ("to see") in the doctrinal section of Romans is found in Rom. vii. 23: "I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind." Is it not a comfort to remember that "things seen" are temporal? The law of which the apostle speaks is not for ever. It is doomed to pass away. The hope we entertain has nothing to do with things seen, but with spiritual realities that will abide. If, therefore, everyday experience presses upon us the knowledge of creation's groan, may it also cause us to appreciate more fully the blessed teaching represented by the firstfruits of the spirit, the spirit of sonship, the unseen yet very real pledge of things to come.

Biblical blessings.

No. 14.

Fellowship with the Father and the Son.

We now come to the fourth element in the realization of blessing, as it is set forth in the life and experience of Abraham. Abraham had obeyed the call of God, at first partially (Gen. xi., xii.), and at the last, fully (Gen. xiii.). He had learned something of Divine sufficiency through the mediation of Melchisedec, and had gone on in faith to believe the promise of God that his seed should be as the stars for multitude. His faith and his experience have led him to resurrection ground, and to the recognition of the deadness of self. At this point the Lord appears to him, saying: "I am Almighty God; walk before Me, and be thou perfect" (Gen. xvii. 1).

Abraham's walk from this point was by no means one straight ascending line. There are still evidences of frailty, but there are also many evidences of the favour of God. His name is changed (Gen. xvii. 5); and he is visited by the Lord before the destruction of Sodom and taken into His confidence (Gen. xviii. 17). Abraham's intercession for Sodom is a revelation of the greatness of his faith and confidence. The promise of a son is at length fulfilled and Abraham's tent is filled with "laughter" (for such is the meaning of the name "Isaac"). This leads us to the fourth element of realized blessing.

"God did tempt Abraham" (Gen. xxii. 1). It is unfortunate that in modern English the word "tempt" has taken on a rather sinister significance. The more primitive meaning is still retained in the word "attempt," which simply means "to try." The same root word gives us "tentative," and also "tend," meaning "to aim at."

We have already found that Heb. xi. records the three phases of our subject so far considered, and it is a confirmation to discover that this fourth occurrence of the word "blessing" in Abraham's story is also noted in the same chapter:—

> "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac; and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten son, of whom it was said, That in Isaac shall thy seed be called: accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead; from whence also he received him in a figure" (Heb. xi. 17—19)

The trial of Abraham's faith has several features that it will help us all to consider.

In the first place comes fellowship with God. Let us never miss the essential reason for "separation." There are some natures that lean towards the severe, the use of the scourge, the philosophy of the Stoic. Separation in Scripture is never merely "from"; it is always "unto." Abraham was called out from his kith and kin—only that he might become the friend of God. His separation from Lot was essential to this friendship and to the enjoyment of his inheritance. He must also realize that the blessing of the Most High God does not accord with enrichment from the King of Sodom. All this separation "from" and "to," however, pales in the light of Calvary. We can never really "know" what "fellowship with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ" really is, unless at some time we have stood upon that lone mountain, as Abraham did, with eyes dimmed with tears, with heart breaking, yet with faith unfaltering. It was for this climax of fellowship that the Lord called Abraham in Gen. xxii. When Abraham obeyed, he knew, so far as it is possible for man to know, what it cost the Father when He spared not His Only Begotten Son for our sakes.

We can realize perhaps more vividly, as we stand with Abraham here, what the apostle meant when he said:—

> "That I may know Him, and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings, being made comformable unto His death" (Phil. iii. 10).

Phil. iii. becomes full of meaning when viewed in the light of that mountain where Abraham offered up his son. As it was with Abraham, so with Paul, he rejoices in true circumcision (Phil. iii. 3), and, like Abraham, is justified by faith (Phil. iii. 9). The fellowship of suffering common to both Abraham and Paul led on to "perfection," a "prize" and a "citizenship." For the fact that Abraham's faith was "perfected" we must turn to James; and for the "power of resurrection" that he shared with Paul, to Heb. xi.

The epistle of James is full of the thought of "trial":—

"Count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations; knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience. But let patience have her perfect work" (Jas. i. 2—4).

"Blessed is the man that endureth temptation: for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love Him" (Jas. i. 12).

Note in each case that "temptation" is explained in terms of "trial":—

"Was not Abraham our father justified by works, when he had offered Isaac his son upon the altar? Seest thou how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect?" (Jas. ii. 21, 22).

Here we have the trial of Abraham's faith leading on to "perfection." James links together the justification of Abraham, which was by faith without works, with that justification by faith which was shown to be true by works—the initial faith of Gen. xv. and its full fruition when Abraham was manifestly "the friend of God" (Jas. ii. 23). The association of "perfection" with "trial" and a "crown" or "prize" is evident both in James and Philippians.

For the fact that Abraham, like Paul, knew "the power of His resurrection" we turn to Heb. xi. 19:—

"Accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead; from whence also he received him in a figure."

What fulness is found in the conclusion of Gen. xxii.:—

"Now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, from Me" (Gen. xxii. 12).

"By Myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son; that in blessing I will bless thee . . . . " (Gen. xxii. 16).

This is the climax experience of faith. No service however strenuous or successful, no suffering however intense, no battle however severe, is on the same plane.

Abraham's fellowship with God commenced when he turned his back upon Ur of the Chaldees. It developed as he severed from Lot and dwelt in Hebron (which means "fellowship"). It grew after the incident of the King of Sodom; it blossomed when, after the repudiation of self, Isaac was born, the child of promise and resurrection life; and its glorious fruit was brought forth that day on the mountain top of Moriah.

The four phases of realized blessing that the life story of Abraham reveals are, therefore :—

(1) The obedience of faith.
(2) The principle of separation.
(3) The deadness of self and the place of resurrection. "God Who quickeneth the dead."
(4) Fellowship with the Father, Who "spared not His Own Son."

Here are Biblical blessings, realized and enjoyed. Let us look over the record of our own blessings, and see how far we have entered into them.

No. 17. T.J.M. "Regarding Romans xvi. 25, 26: I have never yet been able to interpret this scripture as referable to the members of the One Body."

Neither do we believe that this passage refers to the mystery as revealed in Ephesians. In Romans xvi. 25 the mystery under consideration is qualified by the following statements.

(1) It hath been silenced in age times.
(2) It was made manifest at the time of writing the Epistle.
(3) It was made known to all nations for the obedience of faith.

Of the mystery of Ephesians it is written that it had been hidden by God since the ages—a much stronger expression than "silenced" or "hushed." The mystery of Ephesians was not revealed through Paul until he was a prisoner. In the epistle to the Romans he is a free man, making plans for wider missionary efforts.

The reference to "all nations for the obedience of faith" links this passage with the first chapter (i. 5). To us, now, there is possibly no mystery as to the evangelizing of the Gentiles, but until the apostle Paul received the ministry of the reconciliation, even a pious Gentile like Cornelius would be reckoned by Peter as "common and unclean" (Acts x. 28). The estrangement of the Gentiles (Rom. i. 18—32) necessitated the reconciliation. But that this would take place, and when, and how, was not spoken of in the Scriptures. So it is that in Rom. xvi. 25 Paul's gospel is linked with the mystery that had been hushed or kept quiet during the age times, but was made manifest when he, the apostle to the Gentiles, received the commission unto all nations for the obedience of faith. The One Body and the mystery of Ephesians is nowhere in sight. The emphasis in your letter on "since" the world began is based on the A.V. There is no word for "since" in the original of this passage.

The blessings of the Son (Eph. i. 7—12).

The forgiveness of trespasses.

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

The first blessing given under this heading—Redemption through His blood—is particularized by the words, "the forgiveness of trespasses."

What a gracious word this is. What a relief to the sin-burdened mind to realize the forgiveness of sins as a present personal fact. There may be many precious results of the redemption of Christ, but the entry into them would be hindered, and their enjoyment rendered impossible, unless the barrier and guilt of our sins had been removed. Moreover, it is not the question of sin here. The depravity and fall of our nature inherited from Adam, and the utter ruin of the creature, is not so much in view as the personal sins and failures which we know we have committed. The apostle Paul uses the word hamartia, "sin" and "sins," over eighty times, the prison epistles having only three of these occurrences.

The question of sin evidently is not the leading theme of the epistles of the mystery. To understand how God has dealt with that, Romans and Hebrews will supply full teaching. The prison epistles, moreover, do not differentiate between SIN and SINS, or rather, they deal only with sins, sin itself not coming within their scope. While, however, it may be true that themes other than the question of sin and justification are before us (God in His condescension puts our hearts at rest regarding this), redemption carries with it the forgiveness of our sins.

The word forgiveness is aphesis. Emission, dismission, and remission are among its most primitive meanings. It is derived from aphiēmi, which means "to send away." "Then Jesus sent the multitude away" (Matt. xiii. 36); and "Jesus cried with (emitted) a loud voice" (Mark xv. 37). "Let not the husband put away his wife" (1 Cor. vii. 11). It will be seen that the root idea of dismissal is the leading one, and it can be easily traced in the secondary meaning "forgiveness." Let us learn the lesson while it is before us, viz., not to read back secondary meanings. The same applies to the rendering "forsook" in Matt. xxvi. 56. Rom. iv. 7 declares that it is a blessed condition to be in, to have one's sins forgiven, and may we not forget this as we contemplate all the spiritual blessings that are ours in Christ.

An inspired corollary to forgiveness, and an exceedingly comforting one, is that forgiven sin is forgotten sin. "Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more" (Heb. x. 17, 18). The same chapter indicates further that by virtue of the once offered sacrifice, "we being once cleansed have no more conscience of sins" (Heb. x. 2). If under the law with its typical blood of bulls and goats which can never take away sins there was blessedness, how much more ground of rejoicing have we who have the much better reality? The sins that have been "dismissed" have not been merely driven off to return again and imperil our peace; they have been "borne" in the the body of Christ on the tree (1 Pet. ii. 24). For them He suffered (1 Pet. iii. 18), for them He died (1 Cor. xv. 3). Christ has made a purification for sins (Heb. i. 3); He has made a propitiation for the sins of His people (Heb. ii. 17); He has put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself (Heb. ix. 26); He has died unto sin once for all (Rom. vi. 10). All this and more lies at the foundation of forgiveness. We trace the mercy of God in this blessing of forgiveness, but we trace more; we see a display of His righteousness. "He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins" (1 John i. 9), as He is "just and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus" (Rom. iii. 26). Herein is our confidence and boasting, and already we begin to anticipate the conclusion, "to the praise of His glory."

The word translated "sins" in the A.V. of Eph. i. 7 should have been translated "trespasses." There is a difference. God does not use different words without intent. Eph. ii. 1 uses both words together. Sin (hamartia) means a missing of the mark, a coming short; trespass (paraptōma) means a falling aside. Rom. xi. 11, 12 renders it "fall," Rom. v. 15 "offence," Gal. vi. 1 "fault," Col. ii. 13 "trespass." This last passage adds to the ground of our assurance by saying, "hav-forgiven you all trespasses." In this passage a different word is used for forgiveness. Instead of aphiēmi the word is charizomai, to deal graciously; to be gracious. It is this word that comes in Eph. iv. 32, "tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you," although the A.V. would lead the reader to think it was the same as in i. 7. In Eph. i. 7 the fundamental thought is not so much "forgiveness" as "deliverance from," which is even deeper.

The fulness of this blessing appears augmented when we read that it is "according to the riches of His grace which He caused to abound towards us." Here we have the first of a series of riches such as never entered the mind of man, many of them never coming within the ken even of the inspired writers of Scripture. Here we have riches of grace abounding in the forgiveness of trespasses; in i. 18 we read of "the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints"; in ii. 7 we are taken to the future where "in the ages to come, He might show the exceeding riches of His grace, in kindness upon us in Christ Jesus." In iii. 8, in conjunction with the mystery, the apostle preaches among the Gentiles the "unsearchable riches of Christ," and finally in iii. 16 the apostle prays that the saints may be strengthened "according to the riches of His glory."

The riches of His grace have overflowed towards us. The word translated "abound" indicates entire absence of restraint or barrier. We find the word in another form in Eph. iii. 20, "exceeding abundantly." The thought has already been expressed by the continual use of "riches." Chapter ii. 8 calls our attention to the fact that the "grace-by-faith-salvation" is God's gift. He makes all the overtures, He provides, He gives, He overflows in His grace towards us.

In i. 8 we must make a stop. To read on as in the A.V. and the R.V. is to confuse things that differ. The passage needs to be re-cast. The first part of verse 8 belongs to verse 7. While we are sure that there is no prodigality in the liberal grace and overflowing love of God, yet that does not appear to be the first thought here. Place a full stop after the words "abounded towards us." Then commence a new sentence thus: "In all wisdom and prudence having made known unto us the mystery." Here we are viewing two distinct spheres of the Lord's gracious operations. While He lavishes His grace with unstinting hand, He makes known the mystery "in all wisdom and prudence," revealing as much as we can bear at a time. It is for us earnestly to seek an answer to the apostle's prayer, "that He may give you a spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him."

It is our desire that these pages may, under God's blessing, help us forward in this direction.

The Parables.

No. 16.

The days of Noah (Matt. xxiv. 37—41).

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

In the study of the parable of the Fig Tree, we found that its teaching was echoed, not by another parable, but by reference to a typical event in history, "As it was in the days of Noah."

The book of Genesis gives a vivid picture of the days of Noah. Gen. vi. has been robbed of its significance by the failure to see that "The sons of God" are not men but angels. Job i. 6, ii. 1, xxxviii. 7; Psa. xxix. 1, lxxxix. 6; Dan. iii. 25 (see verse 28), use this title of angels. The LXX. of Gen. vi. 2 renders the words "sons of God" by "angels." Jude 6 makes it clear that some of the angels fell. What that fall involved is hinted in the same verse, "they left their own oikētērion." This word occurs again in 2 Cor. v. 2 where it has reference to resurrection. Whether it means there a resurrection body, or a heavenly abode, we are not at the moment prepared to say.

In Jude 7 further light is given; the sin of the angels was "in like manner" to the sins of Sodom and Gomorrha. Further, 1 Pet. iii. 20 and 2 Pet. ii. 5 link this fall with the days of Noah. The result of this unseemly irruption led on to the corruption and violence that necessitated the flood. "The giants," or as the Hebrew calls them, "the Nephilim," were monsters, and had to be destroyed first by the flood and afterwards by the sword of Israel. The sons of Anak were of the Nephilim (Num. xiii. 33). The giant cities of Bashan and the gigantic buildings still standing from antiquity testify to their skill and strength.

> "And the Lord said, I will destroy man whom I have created..... but Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord. These are the generations of Noah; Noah was a just man and perfect in his generations, and Noah walked with God" (Gen. vi. 7—9).

Not only was Noah a second Enoch in that he "walked with God," but he like Enoch witnessed against the ungodliness of the people, and "God took him" by means of the ark, as completely as He took Enoch by translation. The words "perfect in his generations" should read "uncontaminated as to his pedigree." God had preserved the line from Adam through Noah from the awful Satanic attempt to prevent the coming seed of the woman. But why all this? How does this help our understanding of Matt. xxiv.? Scripture gives no uncertain sound regarding the activity of evil spirits and fallen angels during the time of the end. The apostle Paul tells us that "in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of demons" (1 Tim. iv. 1). Spirit and angelic interference are prominent in the book of the Revelation, for example, the unclean spirits, spirits of demons who work miracles and who gather the kings of the earth to their destruction (Rev. xvi. 13, 14). This passage is immediately followed by the warning, "Behold, I come as a thief, blessed is he that watcheth," and so is linked still more with Matt. xxiv. Parable, prophecy and type tell us of days that shall be "as the days of Noah."

The record given in Gen. vi., vii. and viii. is full of instruction. We will draw attention to one point more, namely, the marks of time:—

(1) Noah's age—600 years (Gen. vii. 6).
(2) Forty days and nights the rain was upon the earth (Gen. vi. 12).
(3) The ark rested on the seventh month (Gen. viii. 4).
(4) And on the 17th day of the month (Gen. viii. 4).
(5) The removal of the cover of the ark was in the six hundred and FIRST year, in the FIRST month, the FIRST day of the month (Gen. viii. 13).

The 600 years of Noah's life seem to indicate the end of man, six being the number of man. It is considered by many that the age of the world up to the coming again of Christ will be 6000 years. The forty days and nights refer to a period of judgment and testing. The resting of the ark on the seventh month typifies the millennium, the thousand years, the "rest" (sabbatismos) that remaineth unto the people of God. The 17th of the seventh month is the 17th of Nisan, three days after Passover, bringing us to the typical day of resurrection. The threefold emphasis on the word first in connection with the drying of the ground is very suggestive.

Not only shall the character of the times be similar, but the character of the people shall be the same, "For as in the days that were before the flood....." There we find men going about their affairs with absolute disregard of the warnings of Noah or the building of the ark. So we find that Scripture tells us that in the days that are coming men will be in the field, women at the mill; one shall be taken and the other left. Many expositors read this passage as though it teaches that the one taken is taken away for judgment, and the one left is left for blessing. A superficial connection is also seen between the "taking away" by the flood, and the being "taken" by the invisible hand of God. This is not the meaning, however. Those taken are taken into the ark of the parousia, those left are left to the storms of tribulation.

The word used of the taking away by the flood is the same used of the depriving of the unprofitable servant of his talent (Matt. xxv. 29). The other word, "one shall be taken," means to take to one's self as a companion, and indicates the conferring of a favour. When the Lord selected Peter, James and John to view the transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 1) and to see the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mark v. 37), or to witness the agony in Gethsemane (Matt. xxvi. 37), He used this word "to take" in each case. Further, the point seems definitely settled by John xiv. 3, where the Lord says, "I will receive you unto myself" (same word). Hence, in Matt. xxiv. one shall be received by the Lord, and the other left. To be left is a term of judgment. "Let them alone" was said of the blind guides (Matt. xv. 14); "left" as a desolate house (xxiii. 38); "forsook" as did the disciples (xxvi. 56); and, in conjunction with "to take," compare John xiv. 3 with xiv. 18, "I will receive," "I will not leave you comfortless." The obvious conclusion is that those not taken will be left comfortless.

Rev. xii. brings before us in vision and symbol the same teaching as Matt. xxiv. 40, and when we deal with this passage in our papers on the Revelation we shall be able to show more clearly than here that the "man child" does not refer to the birth and ascension of Christ. Rev. ii. 26, 27 gives a clue:—

> "He that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give authority over the nations, and he shall rule them with a rod of iron."

The institution of this authority takes place when the man child is caught up "to God and His throne," for:—

"To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me in My throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with My Father in His throne" (Rev. iii. 21).

The words of Rev. iii. 3, 4 are also related to the same time and event:—

"If therefore thou shalt not watch, I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee.....Thou hast a few names..... they are worthy."

The words of Luke xxi. 36 seem to refer to the same time and people:—

"Watch ye and pray always that ye may be accounted worthy to escape those things that shall come to pass, and stand before the Son of man."

While the hope and the reward of the various bodies or callings of believers differ, there is a unity of principle regarding them that it is well for us to observe. 1 Thess. iv. speaks of the same period as Matt. xxiv., and 1 Thess. v. equally warns against being found sleeping (Mark xiii. 35), and speaks of the coming as like a thief in the night. We cannot shut our eyes to the conditions that are attached to the participation in the reward aspect of the believer's service (which is the aspect of Matt. xxiv. and xxv.). Matt. xxiv. 42, Luke xxi. 36 and Rev. iii. 3, "Watch therefore," or as in the case of the householders, and virgins, "readiness" is the word. By confounding the hope with the prize, either of the church, or of the heavenly calling, or of Israel, a great deal of wrong teaching has arisen. One system maintains that by reason of grace all believers will of necessity escape the great tribulation; others who see a line of teaching urging watchfulness, readiness, and being accounted worthy, etc., say that some only will escape. These subjects are too great to be decided upon in these articles, they demand a separate study.

It is important, however, to note that the parables which follow in Matt. xxv. emphasize the need of "readiness" (verse 10), "faithfulness" (verse 21), and "kindness" (verse 40) as a prerequisite for entering the marriage feast, for being made ruler over many things, and for entering into the kingdom. These varying degrees and aspects are summed up in the word "taken" (Matt. xxiv. 40), and in the appointment of verse 47. The sad alternatives, outside the marriage feast, outer darkness, and eonian fire, are summed up in the word "left" (Matt. xxiv. 40), and in the appointment of verse 51.

The hope and prize of the One Body (Eph. i. and Phil. iii.) are nowhere in view in Matt. xxiv. or xxv. Nevertheless, we do well to take heed to the words, "What I say unto you I say unto all, Watch."

"Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they which testify of Me.

"And ye will not come to Me, that ye might have life" (John v. 39, 40).

Read as translated and sub-divided in the A.V. there is certainly an observable connection between the two verses, but the full effect of the original is scarcely felt. The Revised Version corrects the translation, and by eliminating the break between the two verses emphasizes the close connection of the argument:—

"Ye search the Scriptures, because ye think that in them ye have eternal life; and these are they which bear witness of Me; and ye will not come to Me, that ye might have life."

Our own witness in these pages over a period of more than twenty-five years has been to the full inspiration and authority of Holy Scripture, and yet we do not "think that in them we have eternal life," for the very Scriptures which are our supreme authority teach us that they are "able to make wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus" (2 Tim. iii. 15). If the Scriptures were only inspired records of past ages, they would certainly be instructive, elevating, interesting and of moral influence; but if they did not lead us to the Saviour, if they did not by type and symbol, prophecy and proclamation, continually point to Christ, and reveal all the fulness of His saving work, their chief end would never be attained.

We search the Scriptures. It is the objection of some that our pages are too full of this searching, and that The Berean Expositor is not of much use to the casual reader. We lay everything under tribute in this search. Structure, grammar, manner and custom are all made to yield their quota; and yet, if our labours stop there, we have signally failed. We search the Scriptures, because they ever and always lead us to Christ. It may be Christ crucified, or Christ glorified. He may be seen as Prophet, or Priest, or King; but He must be seen, if the true end of all Bible searching is to be reached. And so the Saviour spoke these words to those who had been entrusted with the oracles of God.

An example of the attitude of mind that is here deplored is found at the period of the Saviour's birth. When Herod enquired of the chief priests and scribes as to "where the Messiah should be born," they had no need to ask for time in order to look the subject up. They apparently answered without hesitation, "In Bethlehem of Judæa"; and gave chapter and verse for their statement. But they did not go to Bethlehem to see. Angels from heaven, or shepherds, or the Eastern Magi might go and worship; but not those who so readily quoted the written word. What a tragedy!

The passage we have quoted from John v. is the last of eleven occurrences of the word "witness" in this chapter. Nine of these references are translated "witness," the remaining two being rendered "testimony" and "testify."

The first occurrence is found in John v. 31, where the A.V. and the R.V. give us the amazing statement:—

> "If I bear witness of Myself, My witness is not true."

The A.V., however, refers us to John viii. 14, where we read:—

> "Though I bear record of Myself, yet My record is true."

This is followed by the remarkable words of verses 15—18, which speak of the law of witness:—

> "And yet if I judge, My judgment is true: for I am not alone, but I and the Father that sent Me. It is also written in your law, that the testimony of two men is true. I am One that bear witness of Myself, and the Father that sent Me beareth witness of Me" (John viii. 15—18).

The passage referred to above should be translated:—

> "Though I bear witness concerning Myself, is not My witness true?" (John v. 31).

It is surely not possible to believe that we can accept the witness of John the Baptist, or of Peter, or John concerning the Lord, and yet that we should be justified in rejecting the Lord's own testimony concerning Himself as "not true." The Lord Himself is Truth, and although He condescends to confirm His word, His word is surely in itself enough for the believer.

Not only is there the witness of John the Baptist (John v. 33), but there is also the witness of the miracles: "I have a greater witness than that of John" (verse 36). Not only so, but the "Father Himself hath borne witness"; but His witness was not believed, because His word did not abide in the hearers. In the last verses of the chapter we read, concerning the testimony of the Scriptures:—

> "For had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed Me, for he wrote of Me. But if ye believe not His writings, how shall ye believe My words?" (John v. 46, 47).

"They testify of Me" . . . . "He wrote of Me."—It is utterly impossible to conceive of Christ, as set forth in the Scriptures, apart from "the Book." Before His birth at Bethlehem, He speaks of the "Volume of the Book" (Heb. x. 7). From the manger to the cross, in temptation and in triumph, in weakness and in resurrection power, we find Him intent upon fulfilling that Word, for that Word, to Him, was synonymous with the Will of the Father.

It is not for us to usurp His place and sit in judgment upon our fellow-believers; but it passes our comprehension to understand how anyone can call himself a Christian, and yet reject the Scriptures of the Christ; or rest for his eternal salvation upon the work of Christ, and yet sit in judgment upon His Word. Let this brief article suggest to the reader the happy experience of those two disciples whose "hearts burned within them" as, "beginning at Moses and all the prophets, He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself" (Luke xxiv. 27).

With all thy getting, get understanding.

Figures of Speech.

Figures involving change: Enallage.

We have given a passing review of a few of the figures of speech used in Scripture that involve omission, and that involve addition. We now come to the third and greatest division, those figures that involve change. This is much the most important class and is divided into three sub-sections:—

(1) Figures that affect the meaning and usage of words.

(2) Figures that affect the order and arrangement of words.

(3) Figures that affect the application of words.

The first of these which calls for consideration is Enallage, indicating the exchange of one word for another. When it is confined to the exchanging of one part of speech for another it is called Antimereia (from anti, "over against" and mereia, from meros, "a part"). When the Enallage is one of exchange of tense, mood, person, or number, it is called Heterosis, from heteros, "another." When it is the exchange of one case for another, it is called Antiptosis, from anti, "over against" and ptosis, "falling"—compare "declensions." When the Enallage is an interchange of construction it is called Hypallage; but this will be better understood when examples are given.

Let us now set out this Figure and its sub-divisions, bearing in mind the explanations given above.

Enallage.

The figure of Exchange, divided under four heads: (1) Antimereia, (2) Antiptosis, (3) Heterosis, (4) Hypallage.

We now give a few examples.

(1) Antimereia.—An example of the exchange of a noun for an adjective is found in 1 Cor. xiv. 12: "Ye are zealous of spirits." Here the noun pneumatōn, "spirits," is used for the adjective pneumatikōn, "spiritual." Both the A.V. and the R.V. recognise the figure and translate "spiritual gifts," placing in the margin the words "Gr. of spirits." "The Son of His love" (Col. i. 13) is translated "His dear Son." The two nouns are said to be in regimen, i.e., one governs the other in the genitive. Other examples are "fathers of our flesh" (Heb. xii. 9) and "a hearer of forgetfulness" (Jas. i. 25).

Special care must be observed when dealing with the usage of the name of God in Scripture. In modern speech, the name of God is not ordinarily used in this way—although poets sometimes employ the word "divine" to mean something great, beautiful or sublime. The following will illustrate this peculiar usage:—

"Wrestlings of God," i.e., great wrestlings (Gen. xxx. 8).

"A city great to God," i.e., an exceeding great city (Jonah iii. 3).

Another usage peculiar to Scripture is the employment of the words "sons" and "children" to indicate character:—

"Sons of pledges," i.e., hostages (2 Kings xiv. 14).

"Son of oil," i.e., a fruitful hill (Isa. v. 1).

"Children of disobedience," i.e., disobedient ones (Eph. ii. 2).

(2) Antiptosis.—The exchange of one case for another :—

"A kingdom of priests," i.e., a royal priesthood (Ex. xix. 6).

(3) Heterosis.—The exchange of Mood, Gender, Number, etc. :—

"Destroy this temple" (John ii. 19). This is not a command, but a prophecy that the Jews would do this.

A modern example is the oft-repeated injunction: "Feed a cold, starve a fever." This really means, "If you will insist on feeding a cold, you must be prepared to starve in order to reduce the fever that such feeding will produce." Some readers may have already suffered from the failure to recognize a figure of speech in this injunction :—

"By Whom we have received grace and apostleship" (Rom. i. 5). "We" is used for "I," for Paul alone is in view.

"Bloods" is used in Gen. iv. 10 for "life blood."

"The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit" (Psa. li. 17). The plural "sacrifices" is used to mean "the great sacrifice."

(4) Hypallage.—The interchange of construction, whereby an adjective or other word, which belongs logically to one connection, is grammatically united with another.

Dr. Bullinger quotes Shakespeare's words: "His coward lips did from their colour fly."

We give three N.T. examples of this figure :—

"The promise of eternal inheritance" (Heb. ix. 15), i.e., "The eternal inheritance which had been promised."

"The mystery of His will" (Eph. i. 9), i.e., "God's secret purpose or counsel."

"The law of righteousness" (Rom. ix. 31), i.e., "A righteousness attained by law."

We do not, of course, expect that the reader will be able, from our meagre examples, to appreciate this figure in any degree of fulness. When, however, it is realized that we have compressed into these few pages the material which occupies 48 pages in Dr. Bullinger's book, perhaps there will be some appreciation of the difficulty and fulness of the subject. Antimereia alone is sub-divided, in Dr. Bullinger's great work, into 22 sections, with over 200 examples and references. We mention this so that the reader may realize the fulness of the theme, and understand that our contribution is little more than a finger pointing the way for the earnest student. We have also to remember that this series is not necessarily of interest to all our readers, and must consequently be limited in its scope and space.

What manner of persons ought ye to be.

No. 19.

Symbols of Service.

Perfecters and Preachers.

As we pursue our theme, the comprehensiveness of the term "ministry" seems to expand, and in selecting the symbols of service for the present article, we have had to choose from quite a number of possibilities.

Every one engaged in ministry stands in need of prayer. Of each it should be said, as it was Paul, "Behold he prayeth." Every one engaged in ministry should also be a practiser. Of each it should be possible to say, as it could be said of Paul, that his doctrine and his manner of life went together.

The two aspects of ministry which we have chosen for this article are "The Perfecter" and "The Preacher," though we realize that each of these subjects contains enough material for a series of articles.

When the Lord called Peter and Andrew to follow Him, they were casting their nets into the sea (Matt. iv. 18), an act symbolical of preaching. When the Lord called James and John, they were mending their nets, and this is the word elsewhere translated "perfecting."

Before turning to the passage where the ministry of perfecting is spoken of dispensationally, we shall find another use of the term of a very practical kind in Gal. vi. 1:—

> "Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one in the spirit of meekness: considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted" (Gal. vi. 1).

Here is a ministry of "perfecting" that belongs to no particular dispensation or calling. To be a "mender" or "restorer" of the calibre suggested in this verse demands grace indeed. Perhaps the ability to "consider" oneself is at the root of the required fitness.

The dispensational use of the term is found in Eph. iv. 12 where the new order of apostles and prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers, is said to be given "for the perfecting of the saints." At Acts xxviii. a break had come, so deep and wide that nothing less than a new dispensation with new terms could meet the requirements. The gifts of the ascended Christ were given first, with a view to the "re-adjusting of the saints" into their new position, and then for the work of ministry, and the building up of the body of Christ.

Another ministry of "perfecting" is that exemplified by the apostle when writing to the Colossians. Here, he does not use the word katartismos as in Eph. iv. 12, but teleios: "Warning every man, and teaching every man in all wisdom, that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus" (Col. i. 28). The purpose of the apostle in this phase of his ministry is best seen by studying his "warning and teaching" in Col. ii. 4—23. There he warns against everything and anything that would come between the believer and his Lord, or would interpose any observances of any kind whatever, and dim the glory of the completeness that was already theirs in Christ. In this case the "perfecting" does not bear the thought of "re-adjusting," "restoring" or "mending," but rather the idea of "going to the end." Among other things which the apostle introduces into Col. ii. is the possibility of being cheated of the prize (Col. ii. 18), a figure that takes us back to Phil. iii., with its race and its goal, its singleness of purpose and the thought of "perfection" (Phil. iii. 11, 12, 14, 15).

There is yet another ministry of "perfecting" that must be included, which finds its best exposition in the example of Aquila and Priscilla (Acts xviii. 24—28). Here we have a man, Apollos, eloquent, fervent, mighty in the Scriptures, but "knowing only the baptism of John." To this man Aquila and Priscilla open their house, and "expound unto him the way of God more perfectly." There is a need for such ministry still. Many a believer is eloquent, fervent and mighty in the Scriptures up to the light he has. Of such believers it might be added, "Knowing only the baptism of Pentecost," or "Knowing only the foundation doctrine of Romans." May the Aquilas and Priscillas be multiplied, for the need is great.

Turning from these few notes on such an important theme, let us conclude our study with a word or two on the equally important ministry of preaching. As we all know, the word "preach," like the "gospel" itself, is derived from the idea of "good tidings." The preacher is the bringer of good news. What is not so commonly known is that another word of frequent occurrence and of great importance is used for "preaching"—the verb kerussō, "to proclaim as a herald," and the noun kerux, "a herald." Examples of this preaching will be found in 1 Cor. i. 23: "We proclaim Christ crucified," in 2 Tim. iv. 2: "Proclaim the Word," and in 2 Tim. iv. 17: "By me the proclamation might be fully known."

In many of the contexts of this word there is an atmosphere of opposition, where the preacher, instead of pleading with men to believe the glad tidings he brings, proclaims to them as a herald from heaven the truth, whether "in season or out of season," even though they will not "endure sound doctrine" and "turn away their ears from the truth." Such a preacher was Noah (2 Pet. ii. 5); and such a preacher Paul claims to be in 1 Tim. ii. 7 and 2 Tim. i. 11. If there is a need for those who can enter into the ministry of "perfecting," there is equally a need for those who will act as "heralds," attracting no crowds, having perhaps few converts, meeting much opposition, yet fulfilling a much-needed ministry.

Paul himself, as one who both prayed and practised, is seen as the pattern Perfecter and Preacher. We must not forget, however, that great as Paul may be, he acknowledged a Master. The Lord Jesus Himself was heaven's supreme Herald, for the word "preach" in Matt. iv. 17 is kerussō. When He said to the rich young ruler, "If thou wilt be perfect" He could add: "Come and follow Me" (Matt. xix. 21). The Lord Himself is the "Captain and Perfecter of faith" (Heb. xii. 2).

Wisdom, Human and Divine.

Being a comparison of the groping after truth by the ancient philosophers with the truth as is revealed in Scripture, in order that the believer may the better appreciate the Word of God.

No. 3.

Some extracts from the writings of Seneca.

Before we pass on to review the gropings of men for the truth, in contrast with the glorious light of revelation, we feel it incumbent upon us to give one more extract from an ancient philosopher, partly to give some idea of what a Stoic philosopher believed, but chiefly to demonstrate the parallels that exist between the writings of Seneca and the Scriptures.

Perhaps a word or two concerning the man himself is called for. Lucius Annæus Seneca was a Stoic philosopher, and the teacher of Nero; and it will surely quicken our interest in him to remember that while he lived amid all the guilt and shame of a Roman Court, fighting a losing battle for clean morals and upright conduct, there lived and died in despised Palestine the Son of God Himself, Who alone could have answered the cry of his soul. Gallio, before whom Paul stood, as recorded in the Acts, was the brother of Seneca, and a man of charm and gentleness, though this is not very evident in the reference concerned.

Most men owe much, either for good or ill, to their mothers. Seneca's mother lived in an age when immorality was not the exception but the rule among her class. To his mother Seneca writes :—

> "You never stained your face with walnut juice or rouge; you never delighted in dresses indelicately low, your single ornament was a loveliness which no age could destroy; your special glory was a conspicuous chastity."

Such words find an approving echo in the instructions of Paul to Timothy, and in the epistles of Peter. And yet they were written at a time when, as recorded by Pliny, Lollia Paulina's second best dress of emeralds and pearls cost 40,000,000 sesterces, or more than £32,000 (Nat. Hist. ix. 35, 36). Tradition has it that Paul and Seneca met, and the letters that passed between them are to be read to this day. Anyone, however, who is acquainted with the character of Paul's epistles, or with the tone of Seneca's writings, could not accept these traditional letters as genuine.

The life story of Seneca is a tale to make angels weep, but we dare not attempt the smallest summary here. We pass on to our primary object, to give extracts from his writings, not so much to show what Stoic philosophy was, as to demonstrate how closely some of his teaching approaches the language of Scripture. Contrary to the custom of his day, Seneca made friends with his slaves, and it is possible that some of his household were believers. From their lips he may have heard echoes of the teaching of the Lord and of the apostle Paul.

In the following extracts from Seneca, we have refrained from printing the parallel Scripture, and have merely given the references. In most cases the parallel is obvious, but where there is any uncertainty, we trust that the reader will not fail to acquaint himself with the passage of Scripture referred to.

Some parallels between Seneca and Scripture.

"The mind, unless it is pure and holy, comprehends not God."	Matt. v. 8.
"A man is a robber even before he stains his hands; for he is already armed to slay, and has the desire to spoil."	Matt. v. 21, 22.
"Cast out whatsoever things rend thy heart: nay, if they could not be extracted otherwise, thou shouldest have plucked out thy heart itself with them."	Matt. v. 29.
"What will the wise man do when he is buffeted? He will do as Cato did when he was smitten on the mouth. He did not burst into a passion, did not avenge himself, did not even forgive it, but denied its having been done."	Matt. v. 39.
"If you imitate the gods, confer benefits even on the unthankful: for the sun rises even on the wicked, and the seas are open to pirates."	Matt. v. 45.
"Avoid a rough exterior and unshorn hair and a carelessly kept beard and professed hatred of money and a bed laid on the ground and whatever else affects ambitious display by a perverse path."	Matt. vi. 16.
"Do ye mark the pimples of others, being covered with countless ulcers? This is as if a man should mock at the moles or warts on the most beautiful persons, when he himself is devoured by a fierce scab."	Matt. vii. 3.
"Expect from others what you have done to another." "Let us so give as we would wish to receive."	Matt. vii. 12.
"Therefore good things cannot spring from evil . . . . good does not grow of evil, any more than a fig of an olive tree. The fruit corresponds to the seed."	Matt. vii. 16, 17.
"Not otherwise than some rock standing alone in a shallow sea, which the waves cease not from whichever side they are driven to beat upon, and yet do not stir from its place."	Matt. vii. 25.
"Good men toil, they spend and are spent."	2 Cor. xii. 15.

"What blows do athletes receive in their face, what blows all over their body. Yet they bear all the torture from thirst of glory. Let us also overcome all things, for our reward is not a crown or a palm branch or the trumpeter proclaiming silence for the announcement of our name, but virtue and strength of mind and peace acquired ever after."	1 Cor. ix. 25.
"They consecrate the holy and immortal and inviolable gods in motionless matter of the vilest kind: they clothe them with the forms of men, and beasts and fishes."	Rom. i. 23.
"They are even enamoured of their own ill deeds which is the last ill of all; and then is their wretchedness complete, when shameful things not only delight them but are even approved by them."	Rom. i. 28, 32
"A man is not wise, unless his mind is transfigured into those which he has learnt."	2 Cor. iii. 18
"Gather up and preserve the time."	Eph. v. 16.
"Pertinacious goodness overcomes evil men."	Rom. xii. 21.
"What is man? A cracked vessel which will break at the least fall."	2 Cor. iv. 7.
"That gift is far more welcome which is given with a ready than that which is given with a full hand."	2 Cor. ix. 7.
"Which comes and passes away very quickly, destined to perish in the very using."	Col. ii. 22.
"I confess that the love of our own body is natural to us."	Eph. v. 28, 29.
"I reflect how many exercise their bodies, how few their minds." "It is a foolish occupation to exercise the muscles of the arms . . . . return quickly from the body to the mind, exercise that, night and day."	1 Tim. iv. 8
"How long wilt thou learn? Begin to teach."	Heb. v. 12.
"The whole world is the temple of the immortal gods." "Temples are not built to God of stones piled on high: He must be consecrated in the heart of each man."	Acts xvii. 24.
"God wants not ministers. How so? He Himself ministereth to the human race. He is at hand everywhere and to all men."	Acts xvii. 25.
"God is near thee: He is with thee: He is within."	Acts xvii. 27.
"Thou shalt not form Him of silver and gold: a true likeness of God cannot be moulded of this material."	Acts xvii. 29.

(In the last four scriptures Paul is speaking to Stoic philosophers, and it will be seen that his arguments would not be unfamiliar).

We remarked earlier that Seneca held converse with his slaves. Here are his own words on the subject—remarkable words when we remember the brutal cruelty of the days in which he lived :—

> "They are slaves you urge; nay, they are men. They are slaves; nay, they are comrades. They are slaves, nay, they are humble friends. They are slaves; nay, they are fellow-slaves, if you reflect that fortune has the same power over both. Let some of them dine with you, because they are worthy; and others, that they may become worthy."

> "He is a slave you say; yet perchance he is free in spirit. He is a slave. Will this harm him? Show me who is not. One is a slave to lust, another to avarice, a third to ambition; all alike to fear."

When one realizes how similar these statements are to the inspired utterances of the apostle Paul, one feels sad to think that, so far as we know, Seneca never heard the gospel of the grace of God. With all the high moral tone of his writings, Seneca lacked one thing, the personal Redeemer, without Whom the highest flights of philosophy but prepare for a greater crash at the last.

Stoicism has no room for the forgiveness of sins :—

> "The wise man will be clement and gentle, but he will not feel pity, for only old women and girls will be moved by tears; he will not pardon, for pardon is the remission of a deserved penalty; he will be strictly and inexorably just."

Seneca knew that pardon was "the remission of the deserved penalty." What he did not know was John iii. 16, and Rom. iii.

In spite of all his high moral teaching, we find Seneca "bowing in the house of Rimmon." Endorsing the blasphemous assumptions of the Emperor, we find him using the following terms, true only of God, in a flattering address concerning Claudius: "In him are all things, and he is instead of all things to thee." And again, compare the awful character of Nero with these words of Seneca, written to him:—

> "The gentleness of thy spirit will spread by degrees through the whole body of the Empire, and all things will be formed after thy likeness: health passes from the head to all the members."

What Seneca needed was Christ. He alone is "instead of all things" to us. He alone is the image and likeness to which one day we shall all be conformed. He alone is Head of the Body, the Church; from Him alone true health passes to all the members. In His sacrifical death is found "the remission of the deserved penalty," together with "inexorable justice." But it was not possible to discover this glorious truth by human wisdom; from first to last it was the gift of God.

Paul and his Companions.

No. 4.

Barnabas. The encourager.

Those of us who think of the apostle Paul generally picture him as he was during the middle or the close of his witness: a man who, in face of prison or death, could say: "None of these things move me." We are apt to forget the early days when all was new and strange, and, so doing, we undervalue the ministry of such as Ananias and Barnabas. Ananias expressed his fear concerning Saul of Tarsus, but love cast it out, and scales fell from more than eyes of flesh when Ananias uttered the pre-eminently christian salutation, "Brother Saul."

News of the evil that Saul had done to the saints at Jerusalem had been carried as far as Damascus (Acts ix. 13), so that we can scarcely be surprised that Saul's attempt to join the disciples at Jerusalem was met with suspicion and fear. It is hard to imagine the disastrous effects this might have had upon the spiritual life of so sensitive a character as, in spite of his persecuting zeal, Saul was. But He Who had chosen the vessel, and marked out the course, controlled also all the circumstances and the means for the accomplishment of that course. Already marked out as one eminently fitted for the task of bringing together Saul and the church, was a man, a Levite, of the name of Joses. Most would confess that they had never heard of him. Joses is best known to us by the name given him by the apostles, Barnabas. We find, then, that:—

> "Barnabas took him, and brought him to the apostles, and declared unto them how he had seen the Lord in the way, and how He had spoken unto him, and how he had preached boldly at Damascus in the name of Jesus" (Acts ix. 27).

In Acts iv. 36 we are told that the name Barnabas means "The son of consolation." The Greek word paraklēsis is from para, "beside," and kaleō, "to call," and gives us the word Paraclēte, "The Comforter" and "The Advocate" (John xiv. 16; 1 John ii. 1). In Vol. XXIII., pages 13—15, we discussed the meaning of this word, and showed that the idea contained in our word "encourage" most fits the majority of the occurrences of the word. The name Barnabas is made up of Bar, "a son," and Nabi, "a prophet." The word prophet is used in the Scriptures with wider significance than the foretelling of events, and in more than one passage in the N.T. prophesying and exhortation (paraklēsis) are found together:—

> "He that prophesieth speaketh unto men to edification and exhortation (paraklēsis) and consolation" (1 Cor. xiv. 3).

Of Judas and Silas it is said, that:—

> "Being prophets also themselves," they "exhorted (parakaleō) the brethren and with many words confirmed them" (Acts xv. 32).

Paul's witness at Damascus was brought to a close by the opposition of the Jews, who watched the gates day and night hoping to kill him. His witness at Jerusalem came to an abrupt end from the same cause: this time it was the "Grecians," Greek-speaking Jews, who went about to slay him (Acts ix. 24, 29). In both instances Paul is saved by the solicitude of the disciples, his qualms of conscience at thus, apparently, deserting his post, being quieted by a vision which he had in the temple at the time:—

> "And it came to pass that when I was come again to Jerusalem, even while I prayed in the temple, I was in a trance; and saw Him saying unto me, Make haste, and get thee quickly out of Jerusalem: for they will not receive thy testimony concerning Me. And I said, Lord, they know that I imprisoned and beat in every synagogue them that believed on Thee . . . . and He said unto me, Depart: for I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles" (Acts xxii. 17—21).

Obedience being better than sacrifice, Paul, being "sent forth to Tarsus" by the brethren, accepted the evident guidance, and there he tarried until sought out once more by Barnabas. We learn from Acts iv. 36 that Barnabas was of the country of Cyprus. This may have been regarded by the Lord in choosing Barnabas as the man best fitted to go to Antioch, for we read in Acts xi. 20 that:—

> "Some of them were men of Cyprus and Cyrene, which, when they were come to Antioch, spake unto the Grecians, preaching the Lord Jesus."

If the word "Cyprus" influenced the apostles in the choice of Barnabas, the word "Grecians" may likewise have influenced Barnabas in his next move:—

> "Then departed Barnabas to Tarsus, for to seek Saul" (Acts xi. 25).

We can hardly believe that Paul would refrain from telling such a friend as Barnabas of the vision he had seen in the temple, and Barnabas, remembering the words addressed by the Lord to Paul, would realize that Saul of Tarsus was the appointed witness, and that the ministry "far off unto the Gentiles" was about to commence.

It was from Antioch that Barnabas and Saul were separated to evangelize Galatia, and Acts xiii. and xiv. contain the record of their journeys, their perils and their return. The order of their names at the commencement of this ministry is "Barnabas and Saul" (Acts xiii. 1, 2), but by the time they have returned to Antioch Barnabas is almost forgotten. It was "Barnabas and Saul" that Sergius Paulus called, but it was Saul that was the actor and the speaker. After the incident in Paphos, we read of "Paul and his company," not "Paul and Barnabas," or "Barnabas and Saul" (Acts xiii. 13).

Paul and Barnabas are mentioned together in the repudiation of the Jews at Antioch (Acts xiii. 46), and at the healing of the lame man of Lystra (Acts xiv. 12). The fact that the inhabitants called Barnabas "Jupiter" and Paul "Mercury," suggests the greater activity of Paul, Mercury being the so-called messenger of the gods. It is interesting to read in Acts xiv. 14, "The apostles, Barnabas and Paul," revealing, as it does, another order of apostles than "the twelve." Paul departed with Barnabas from Derbe (Acts xiv. 20), and until the end of the chapter neither apostle is mentioned again by name: the record is content to say, "They preached," "they ordained," "they rehearsed."

The stalwart companionship of Barnabas during this critical period must have been of tremendous help to the young apostle at the beginning of his independent ministry. Once more Barnabas is to stand together with the apostle for the truth and the freedom of the Gentile, and then to succumb to the claims of family and the influence of fear. It is in Acts xv. that we find Barnabas standing by Paul for the last time before there came the great cleavage:—

> "When therefore Paul and Barnabas had no small discussion and disputation with them, they determined that Paul and Barnabas, and certain other of them, should go up to Jerusalem unto the apostles and elders about this question."

Closely parallel with Acts xv. is the record of Gal. ii., where Paul and Barnabas make their stand "for the truth of the gospel."

In Acts xv. 37—39 the happy companionship of these two men is broken by the strength of family affection, for John Mark was "sister's son to Barnabas" (Col. iv. 10). So in Gal. ii. 11—13 we read that "Barnabas also was carried away with their dissimulation." Paul mentions Barnabas once more, namely in 1 Cor. ix. 6, but never again do we find them working together. Barnabas, the encourager, had done his work: the great ship had been fairly launched, but unsuspected weakness revealed that he was unfit to go forward in the great enterprise. Nevertheless the Christian church can never be too grateful to the man whose foresight and encouragement, whose quickness to perceive the way in which the Lord's purposes were to be fulfilled, led him, at Jerusalem and at Antioch, to stand by the chosen vessel who was destined to bear the name of the Lord before the Gentiles.

Paul's personal ministry is now finished. No longer does he need companions, and both he and Barnabas await their Lord's "Well done." But Paul's ministry goes on. By humbler and weaker vessels is the God of all grace carrying on the good work. While none may be of Paul's calibre, there is obvious need for many "sons of consolation" who shall stand by, encourage, and support those who seek to follow in the steps of the great apostle to the Gentiles.

No. 18.—"What is the meaning of first part of Isa. liii. 12? 'Therefore will I divide Him a portion with the great, And He shall divide the spoil with the strong' (A.V.)."

These words are part of a section devoted to the reward and triumph which follow the great work of redemption. This section includes verse 10 to verse 12. The following is a simple structure of the portion:—

A | 10. His soul made an offering for sin.
B | 10, 11. Reward; seed, days, pleasure, satisfied.
C | 11. Justification and bearing iniquities.
B | 12. Reward; therefore spoil divided with strong.
A | 12. Because He poured out His soul unto death; sin, intercession.

The word twice translated "divide" is from the Hebrew chalag, "to be smooth, even, equable." In Isa. xxxiv. 17 we may see its close connection with the apportioning of an inheritance. The idea underlying the word is that there is a perfectly equable distribution made. When you also observe that in the large structure of Isa. lii. and liii., the passage lii. 13—15 corresponds in the structure to liii. 10—12, this equal apportioning is emphasized. "As many were astonished at Thee"—by reason of the marks of His suffering—"so" shall they be surprised at the evidence of His glory when He is "exalted and extolled" and shall be "very high."

We next observe that this dividing is connected with two persons. "Therefore will I divide.....and HE shall divide," and also observe "with the great" and "with the strong." There is something of a parallel here to such passages as, "Ask of Me, and I will give the heathen, thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth, thy possession" (Psa. ii. 8).

The reward of the Saviour is, in part, entered by those who by His grace overcome. Take for example Rev. iii. 21, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me in My throne, even as I overcame, and am set down with My Father in His throne." Still closer to the point is Rev. ii. 26, 27, for there Psa. ii. 8, 9, which originally is the fulfilment of "I will divide," is quoted as of the believer, "he shall divide."

Heb. i. 9 throws light on the expression, "therefore will I divide Him a portion with the great," for it declares that "God hath anointed Thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows." Or again in Heb. i. 4, "He hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than" the angels, being indeed raised far above principality and power.

You might notice the context of the first occurrence in Isaiah of "dividing the spoil" (ix. 3). It is the time of deliverance and of the accession of the Son of David to His throne. Or in xxxiii. 23, where Israel's restoration is in view, and the King is seen in His beauty, in direct contrast, and in answer to Isa. liii., where His visage being more marred than any man had no beauty that Israel should desire Him.

We trust these few thoughts will point you in the direction of a fuller understanding of this and related passages.

Phil. i. 21—25.

What is the right interpretation?

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

"For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain. But if I live in the flesh this is the fruit of my labour: yet what I shall choose I wot not. For I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ; which is far better. Nevertheless to abide in the flesh is more needful for you. And having this confidence I know that I shall abide and continue with you all for your furtherance and joy of faith" (A.V.).

The passage of Scripture quoted above has been interpreted in a variety of ways, the original being confessedly difficult to express fully. Most interpretations can be placed under one of two heads. The one given by those whose orthodox views led them to this passage as a proof text to show that "we may infer that he had no knowledge nor expectation of a middle state of insensibility between death and the resurrection" (Dr. Macknight); in other words, that upon the death of the believer he is at once taken to be "with Christ" apart from resurrection. The other group of interpretations are put forward by those who do not believe "sudden death is sudden glory," but who believe that the scriptural term "sleep" aptly describes the state between death and resurrection, and that there is no "hope" of being "with Christ" until the resurrection takes place. The crux of the controversy is the meaning of the word translated "depart," the orthodox seeing in it the death of Paul, the other interpreters the return of the Lord.

In this article we are going to approach the passage from neither standpoint. We believe that such methods of interpretation are (unconsciously, no doubt) biased. The second set of interpreters, which look upon "depart" as meaning the second coming of the Lord, were inspired not so much by an independent examination of the passage, but by an endeavour to prove the other school of teaching to be wrong. Words have been mistranslated, renderings have been adopted which under other circumstances would have been very much questioned, and parallels have been ignored. In ordinary reasoning all inferences which reach beyond their data are purely hypothetical, and proceed on the assumption that new events will conform to the conditions detected in our observations of past events. Even supposing the Universe as a whole to proceed unchanged, we do not really know the "Universe as a whole." Students of Scripture will readily admit that what is true of our limited knowledge of the works of God, is equally true of our knowledge of the Word of God. To limit ourselves by the alternatives, that (1) either believers when they die go straight to be with Christ, or (2) they fall asleep and are unconscious until the resurrection, is to assume that we have such a complete knowledge, that there is no possibility of a third or a fourth position if, in the course of revelation, it should be made known.

Let us come to Phil. i. 21—25 and seek out its meaning, regardless of what the result may be. God is responsible for what is written, and if we dare to turn His words to fit our theories, however scriptural those theories may be, we call in question the wisdom of His inspiration and shut the door upon the possibility of further and fuller understanding. Let us first set out the structural disposition of the passage.

Phil. i. 21—26.

A | 21. To me (emoi) to live. Christ.

B | 22, 23. | a | Live in flesh. Fruit.
b | Paul's desire. Not made known.
c | Paul's desire. With Christ.

B | 24, 25. | a | Abide in flesh. Needful.
b | Paul's confidence. I know.
c | Paul's continuance. With you all.

A | 26. By me (emoi) my presence. Glorying in Christ.

A strong argument has been made out of the fact that we read that the apostle in one breath tells us that he did not know what to choose between life and death, and yet that he had a strong desire for something which was far better. Now if the apostle did say this, then it seems reasonable to conclude that he was pressed out of the two by a third, namely, the return of the Lord, which is admittedly so much better than either living or dying. Two fallacies are here which demand immediate exposure. The first is an error of reasoning, the second of interpretation.

It is assumed that what Paul chose and what Paul desired would be the same. If Paul had been an average selfish person this reasoning might be good, but the context clearly condemns the inference. The whole of the chapter shows us a man who has risen above all selfish motives. His bonds have fallen out to the furtherance of the gospel, he rejoices that Christ is preached, even though some who preach Him seek to add to the apostle's sufferings. His magnificent "what then" is a rebuke to the narrow-minded inference that he would necessarily choose what he most desired. To Paul, to live was summed up by the one word—Christ, and to die by the one word—gain. "Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether by life or by death." The context, therefore, together with the statement, "For I have no one of equal soul (with myself), for all seek their own," denies the inference. Christ (ii. 21) and His people (i. 24) come first, and even though Paul's desire may lead in one direction, there is every probability that he would choose that which ran counter to his desire, if by so doing he could the better serve his Lord or bless His people.

The second fallacy is the wrong interpretation of a word. Much emphasis has been laid upon the statement that Paul says he did not know what to choose, and yet he did have a very pronounced desire for something very far better. Is this true? The A.V. and the R.V. seem to say it is, but the R.V. margin exposes the error. The word rendered here "I wot," or "I know," is gnorizō. Out of the twenty-four occurrences of the word, Paul uses it eighteen times, and out of that eighteen eleven occur in the three prison epistles (Eph., Phil., and Col.). We will not quote all occurrences, but give the whole of the references in these epistles, the only other occurrence in Philippians being shown first:—

"Let your requests be made known unto God" (Phil. iv. 6).

"Having made known unto us the mystery of His will" (Eph. i. 9).

"By revelation He made known unto me the mystery" (Eph. iii. 3).

"Which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men" (Eph. iii. 5).

"Unto principalities.....might be made known through the Church" (R.V.). (Eph. iii. 10). "Might be known by" (A.V.) of course means the same.

"That I may open my mouth boldly to make known the mystery" (Eph. vi. 19).

"Tychicus.....shall make known to you all things" (Eph. vi. 21).

"To whom God would make known what is the riches" (Col. i. 27).

"All my state shall Tychicus declare unto you" (Col. iv. 7).

"They shall make known unto you all things" (Col. iv. 9).

The word is rendered "to make known" sixteen times in the A.V., "certify" once, "declare" four times, "do to wit" once, "give to understand" once, and "wot" once. The last case is the passage in question; all others without exception can have but one meaning—"to make known, tell or declare." The fallacy that Paul did not know what to choose is therefore exposed by a consideration not only of his own usage, but of the usage of the word in the whole of the N.T. It is evident that he did know what he would choose, otherwise, to say "I do not tell" would be the empty equivocation of a braggart, who covered his ignorance by assuming knowledge. Under the word "Wot" in Dr. Bullinger's Critical Lexicon and Concordance is written, "gnorizō, to make known: declare, reveal."

Following on the idea that Paul did not know what to choose, we are told that he "was pressed out of the two, by reason of a third." Here again we must drop all theories, and take the facts of Scripture as they stand. The word, "I am in a strait," means to press together, to hold, to constrain. The A.V. renders the word as follows, "constrain" once, "keep in" once, "press" once, "stop" once, "throng" once, "man that holdeth" once, "be in a strait" once, "be straitened" once, "be taken with" three times, "lie sick of" once. Again the Concordance proves a stubborn thing—quite impartial and unmoved by the most desirable of theories. Dr. Bullinger's Critical Lexicon and Concordance says of sunēchō, "constrain, to hold, or keep together, confine, secure, hence constrain, hold fast." Let us observe the usage:—

"The men that held Jesus, mocked Him" (Luke xxii. 63).

"The multitude throng thee and press thee" (Luke viii. 45).

"And keep thee in on every side" (Luke xix. 43).

"And stopped their ears" (Acts vii. 57).

"For the love of Christ constraineth us" (i.e shuts us in to the one course indicated in verses 13 and 15) (2 Cor. v. 14).

"But I have a baptism to be baptised with, and how am I straitened till it be accomplished" (Luke xii. 50). (Until the Lord was crucified and raised again from the dead, He was "straitened," "confined," His ministry was confined to Israel, He said "Tell no man until after the resurrection").

Every passage demands the plain meaning "to hold fast," "to keep in," "to stop."

Following the words, "I am in a strait," the A.V. reads "betwixt two." The word betwixt is the rendering of the preposition ek. If betwixt does not accord with the meaning of ek, to have rendered sunechomai ek "to press out," certainly conflicts with the constant meaning "to keep in," "to throng," "to hold fast." It is easy to demonstrate how false or meaningless the translation "betwixt" may become in some passages—that however does not settle the meaning of Phil. i. 23; it only settles the meaning in a negative way for those particular passages. John iii. 25 says, "there arose a question between (ek) some of John's disciples and the Jews." Now while this is the only passage where ek is translated "between" in the A.V., and while it would be easy to show how absurd is such a rendering as "the resurrection between the dead," or to say how could we be "absent between the body?" yet that would only prove that ek was capable of bearing more than one meaning, and would by no means prove that "between" did not convey the sense of the original of John iii. 25.

The average reader who may have been led to think that "out of" is the only unquestioned rendering of ek, may feel a trifle surprised to hear that while in the great majority of cases "out of" is the best rendering, that it also is rendered "by means of" once, "through" twice, "with" twenty-five times, "by" fifty-five times, "by reason of" three times, "because of" three times, or eighty-nine times in all. Take the rendering "with."

"They bought with them the potter's field" (Matt. xxvii. 7).

"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength" (Mark xii. 30).

"Wearied with His journey" (John iv. 6).

"Filled with the odour" (John xii. 3).

"Drunk with the wine.....with the blood of the saints" (Rev. xvii. 2—6).

It would be quite easy to insert "with" in some passages where it would be absurd, but that would not prove the above passages to be wrongly translated. Again, look at the passages where ek is rendered "by."

"The tree is known by his fruit" (Matt. xii. 33).

"By thy words thou shalt be justified" (Matt. xii. 37).

"By this craft" (Acts xix. 25).

"Uncircumcision which is by nature" (Rom. ii. 27).

"Not by works of righteousness" (Titus iii. 5).

"By the Spirit" (1 John iii. 24).

"By the fire... ..which issueth out of their mouths" (Rev. ix. 18). (Here ek is rightly rendered "by" and "out of" in the one verse).

Rev. viii. 13 renders ek, "by reason of." One could not very well translate "woe to the inhabitants of the earth out of the other voices," unless we intended by "out of" origin, cause, or occasion. Again in Rev. ix. 2 and xviii. 19 it is rendered "by reason of."

To translate ek "out of" in 2 Cor. i. 11 would be manifestly unscriptural, for the gift of the apostle Paul was "by means of," not "out of," many persons. In Rev. xvi. 11 we read, "and blasphemed the God of heaven because of their pains and because of their sores." "Out of" as meaning place would be untrue; "out of" as meaning origin or cause would be true and is better expressed in English by "because of." To translate ek in Phil. i. 23 "out of" is only possible if we mean origin or cause. To use "out of" as meaning place is contrary to the meaning of the word rendered "press," which everywhere demands the idea, to hold fast, to keep in, to constrain.

The A.V. rendering "betwixt" is perhaps a little free, but conveys the meaning of the passage (Dr. Bullinger's Lexicon gives "literally, constrained by"), whereas "out of" while literally and etymologically true would be in reality false. "By reason of" is the most suitable rendering. J. N. Darby's rendering, "I am pressed by both," is true to the meaning, although rather free in the use of the word "both." Paul was held in some suspense "by reason of the two." He was not pressed out of the two into some hypothetical "third" —that is an invention. He immediately places before us "the two," and his double feelings can be easily understood. For I am held in constraint by reason of the two—here follows "the two," thus—(1) "Having a desire to depart and to be with Christ, which is very far better," but (2) "to remain in the flesh is more necessary for you."

Here the apostle presents the alternatives which were before him. Something "very far better" for himself is contrasted by something "more necessary for others." "Departing" is balanced by "remaining in the flesh." His "desire" to depart is outweighed by the remaining "for you." The choice which he did not tell is fairly manifest. At least, if we dispute the point as to whether he really did choose the harder path, he certainly does tell us that he knew he would remain, and seems to be joyful at the prospect of thus "spending and being spent."

We must now examine the word "depart." The original word is analuō, which is thus defined in Dr. Bullinger's Critical Lexicon and Concordance:—

> "Analuō, To loosen again, set free; then to loosen, dissolve or resolve, as matter into its elements (hence, Eng. analysis); then, to unfasten as the fastening of a ship, and thus prepare for departure (and with the force of ana, back) to return."

Schrevelius' Lexicon thus defines the word:—

> "Analuō, To unloose, free, release, relax, untie, undo; dissolve, destroy, abolish; solve, explain, analyse; weigh anchor, depart, die; return from a feast."

As the word occurs in but two passages in the N.T., and is rendered once "return" and once "depart," it will be seen that it would be just as logical to say that the rendering of the first passage should conform to the second, as vicé versa. Phil. i. 23 renders analuō "depart," and Luke xii. 36 "return." Those who advocate the teaching that analuō means "the return of the Lord" in Phil. i. 23 turn to Luke xii. 36 to support their argument. It is not established beyond all controversy that "return" is the true meaning of Luke xii. 36. J.N.D. renders the passage, "whenever He may leave the wedding." Rotherham gives the somewhat strange rendering "he may break up out of the marriage feast." This somewhat strange rendering will not be so strange to some who are acquainted with the schoolboy's idea of "breaking up" for the holidays. Here lies the secret of the various renderings. There is no doubt whatever that analuō means exactly the same as our English derived word "analyse"—to break up into its elements. The secondary meaning "to return" is somewhat parallel to the schoolboy's "break up." It came to have this meaning from the way it was used for loosing the cables of ships, in order to sail from a port (see Odyss ix. 178, xi. 636, xii. 145, xv. 547).

Luke xii. 36 speaks of the "coming" of the Lord as something subsequent to the "returning." It is perfectly true that they will not open the door when He departs from the wedding, but when He arrives. Scripture clearly differentiates between the "departing" or "returning" from the feast, and the subsequent "coming" and "knocking." So far as light upon Phil. i. 23 is concerned, Luke xii. 36 gives no warrant for departing from the elementary meaning of analuō. The references in the LXX. are equally indecisive. Sometimes the passage speaks of "returning," as Luke xii. 36, once the pure meaning "resolve into its elements" as melting ice.

Let the reader pause for a moment and ask whether a word which primarily means to "resolve a thing into its elements," and so return to its original state, is a fitting word to use for the Second Coming of the Lord Jesus Christ. In what way will it be an "analysis"? In what way will it be a "return," in the sense of "analysis." Surely there must be indubitable evidence for such a rendering before it can be accepted, and that evidence is not only not found, but is practically denied by the context of Phil. i. 23 when truly presented, and by the larger context of 2 Timothy to which we next turn.

The answer of a good conscience.

No. 6.

A faithful witness.

While it is of the utmost importance in our study of the Scriptures to "try the things that differ," it is occasionally useful to approach the truth from the other angle, and see what things are held in common. The epistle to the Romans stresses what is common to man, as well as those vital differences that grace has made. All have sinned. None are righteous. All, if they are to be justified at all, must be justified by faith. So, when speaking of the conscience in Romans, we observe that the apostle says precisely the same thing of the unsaved heathen as he says of himself:—

"Their conscience also bearing witness" (Rom. ii. 15).

"My conscience also bearing me witness" (Rom. ix. 1).

There are, at the same time, tremendous differences here. The apostle could speak of the "truth in Christ," and a conscience bearing witness "in the Holy Ghost," whereas the unevangelized heathen were left to the "work of law written in their hearts," a dim shadow of the law given by God to Israel. It is not our intention to discuss the problems of Rom. ii. in this article. We wish, rather, to draw attention to the fact that, whatever else may differ as between one man and another, the office of conscience remains the same. The standard by which the conscience is regulated may change, the light of reason and nature may give place to the light of law, just as the light of law may give place to the full blaze of grace, but the office of conscience in the heart of the heathen is the same as that in the heart of the apostle. The conscience "bears witness."

The word translated "witness" is sometimes rendered "testimony," as in 2 Cor. i. 12: "For our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience." Here the word "rejoicing" is literally "boasting." Whatever others may have said or implied as to the apostle's attitude and motives (see ii. 17; iv. 2; v. 12; vi. 4; x. 7—10; xi. 16—20), he had the witness of his conscience that—

"in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world, and more abundantly to you-ward" (2 Cor. i. 12).

The witness of a good conscience enabled the apostle to pursue his course unfalteringly. Men accused him of heresy, called him the ring-leader of a sect, and said that he was mad. He was accused of craft, guile, covetousness, self-seeking, uncleanness. He was numbered with the off-scouring of all things. The more he loved, the less, often, he was loved. He spent himself for others, and yet found that "all in Asia" had turned away from him. He was tried before Felix, before Agrippa, and before Nero; but, though at times deserted by all except the Lord Himself, he had the witness of his conscience, making him courageous where he might have become weak, gentle where he might have become exasperated, and a triumphant martyr with an assured crown where he might have been ashamed of the testimony and of his Lord.

While we must ever remember that the truth is greater than our conscience, let us also remember that the testimony of our conscience has an important place.

"Holding faith, and a good conscience" (1 Tim. i. 19).

Paul and his Companions.

No. 5.

Silas. The succourer.

Our last article dealt with Barnabas, the Encourager, where we saw that in four most important junctures in the life and witness of the newly-commissioned apostle, Barnabas had been of utmost service.

(1) He bridged the gulf between Saul and the disciples at Jerusalem.

(2) At Antioch he recognized that Saul was the man for the work developing there, and travelled as far as Tarsus to seek him out.

(3) Together with Saul, Barnabas was chosen to evangelize Galatia and initiate the great independent ministry of the apostle to the Gentiles.

(4) At Jerusalem he stood with Paul while the apostle laid before the assembly that gospel which he had preached among the Gentiles, and, with Paul, received from the other apostles the right hand of fellowship.

At the conference held at Jerusalem, which is detailed for us in Acts xv., another valued companion of the apostle is introduced, namely Silas.

"Then pleased it the apostles and elders, with the whole church, to send chosen men of their own company to Antioch with Paul and Barnabas; namely, Judas surnamed Barsabas and Silas, chief men among the brethren . . . . men that have hazarded their lives for the name of our Lord Jesus Christ . . . . being prophets also themselves" (Acts xv. 22, 26, 32).

Three outstanding characteristics of these men are remarked upon :—

(1) They were "leaders," the word "chief" being a translation of hegomai, which is from agō, "I lead."

(2) They combined in an eminent degree doctrine and practice, for they had "hazarded their lives" in their testimony for the Lord.

(3) They were moreover "prophets" and so could "exhort and confirm" those among whom they ministered" (Acts xv. 32).

We learn from verse 30 that these men reached Antioch and afterwards were let go in peace.

"Notwithstanding it pleased Silas to abide there still. Paul also and Barnabas continued at Antioch" (Acts xv. 34, 35).

The R.V. places verse 34 in the margin, but, whether it forms a part of the sacred text or not, Silas must have remained at Antioch, as the close of the chapter reveals.

We have no hint as to what was working in the mind of Silas. Whether he saw what was coming; whether he placed himself before the Lord as being willing further to hazard his life for His name: whether he was moved at the failure of Barnabas at this critical point (see Gal. ii. 11—13), we know not. We do know, however, that the Lord, Who knows the hearts of all men, knew just how far Barnabas would go, and so provided his servant Paul with another comforter and companion.

It must have been a great shock to Paul when Barnabas was "carried away," but when this was followed by the insistence of Barnabas that his relative, John Mark, should, in spite of his failure at Pamphylia, be included in the company to revisit Galatia, there was a breach, and Barnabas took Mark and sailed unto Cyprus. Thus Paul was left alone. But the visit to Galatia could hardly be undertaken single-handed. A companion was wanted who could be trusted; who was not easily moved with fear; who could, as occasion arose, take an active part in the ministry. Such a one was Silas, a "leader"; one who already had hazarded his life; one who could minister the spoken word.

> "And Paul chose Silas, and departed, being recommended by the brethren unto the grace of God. And he went through Syria and Cilicia confirming the churches" (Acts xv. 40, 41).

Now Barnabas was a Levite, but Silas was a Roman citizen, a difference not to be underestimated, seeing that the next step was the preaching of the gospel for the first time in Europe. That Silas was a Roman is made clear by Paul's words in Acts xvi. 37: "They have beaten us openly, uncondemned, being Romans."

After Paul had accomplished his design of revisiting the churches in Galatia, he most naturally continued his journey with the intention of preaching in Asia, but this was forbidden by the Holy Ghost. Turning north therefore they attempted to enter Bithynia, but again they were prevented by the Holy Spirit. Thus no alternative was left but to turn back, or to go straight on. We can well understand that to these pioneers the thought of turning back would have been intolerable. So, with doors shut on either side, they came to Troas. Here their problem was solved by the vision of the man of Macedonia, and thus fortified by the certainty of divine guidance, the apostle and his faithful band set foot for the first time in Philippi. Here Silas proved his willingness to suffer for the Lord, for it was Paul and Silas who sang together in the innermost prison.

Both at Thessalonica and at Berea, Silas is found faithfully seconding the apostle's witness. The Jews of Thessalonica stirred up the people at Berea, and in order to cover Paul's movements Silas and Timothy remained behind at Berea, while Paul was sent away to the sea, and conducted to Athens. From Athens Paul sent a request to Silas and Timothy to rejoin him with all speed (Acts xvii. 4, 10, 14, 15). However, Paul had given his testimony on Mars Hill, and reached Corinth before Silas and Timothy rejoined him (Acts xviii. 5). Once more Paul and his companions were exposed to the fury of the mob, but received assurance of protection by a vision in the night (Acts xviii. 9, 10).

We have no further record in the Acts of the witness of Silas, but under his full name he is mentioned by Paul in three of his epistles. We learn from 2 Cor. i, 19 something of the uncompromising character of their witness at Corinth.

> "For the Son of God, Jesus Christ, Who was preached among you by us, even by me and Silvanus and Timotheus, was not yea and nay, but in Him was yea."

Both of the epistles to the Thessalonians open with the words:—

> "Paul and Silvanus and Timotheus, unto the church of the Thessalonians in God the (our) Father and the Lord Jesus Christ."

All the way through these epistles this fellowship is maintained: "We give thanks," "our gospel," "followers of us," "our entrance in unto you," "we suffered," "we were bold," etc.

So far as the Scripture record leads us, the companionship of Silas with Paul terminates in the Acts with the founding of the churches in Thessalonica and Corinth, and with the epistles to those churches. Silas belonged to Jerusalem, he had been entrusted with the decrees, and had accompanied the apostle to fields of labour which, possibly, at the outset, had not entered his mind. Unlike Barnabas, whose companionship terminated in a quarrel, there is no hint in Scripture that Silas failed faithfully to carry out his work.

Soon after the epistles to the Corinthians were written, Peter wrote his first epistle. It was addressed to the dispersion in some of the places which had been visited by Silas: "Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia." It will be remembered that Asia and Bithynia were closed to Paul and Silas, in order that they might press on to Troas where they obtained direction by the vision of the man of Macedonia. To be entrusted by Peter with a message which included these very places must therefore have come as a blessed compensation to Silas. It is evident from the close of Peter's first epistle that Silas was well known to those who received the epistle, and there is every reason to believe that he is the same man who, earlier, had stepped into the breach and loyally shared with Paul the honour of planting the banner of the cross on European soil. Peter's words are:—

> "By Silvanus, our faithful brother, as I account him, I have written unto you briefly, exhorting and testifying that this is the true grace of God: stand ye fast therein" (1 Pet. v, 12).

Silas was a man of broad sympathies. He could work loyally with Paul and with Peter. The distinctive character of their two messages was not so much his burden as lending a hand wherever the grace of God was preached and help was needed. He would have had no sympathy whatever with the partisans at Corinth who said, "I am of Paul" or "I am of Cephas." Into the ministry of the mystery he was not permitted to enter, this honour being reserved for Timothy, who served together with Silas at the beginning. As we discern the different characters that gathered round Paul, the apostle, and how he thankfully and lovingly welcomed their companionship, one trusts that the very recital of these varied phases of service will be owned by the Lord in revealing to many of our readers avenues of witness and co-operation that have hitherto remained closed or unsuspected.

Fundamentals of dispensational truth.

Joshua.

No. 9.

Ai and Ebal (Joshua viii.).

While he may be keenly interested in all things pertaining to the exposition of the Word, the reader cannot be expected to retain in his memory all the many details involved in a complete visualization of any particular book. And so the fact that we have arrived at chapter viii. of the Book of Joshua may mean nothing more to the reader than progress from chapter vii. We have, however, arrived at a new and important division of the book, and as the recognition of this is necessary, if we are to appreciate fully the teaching it contains, we must acquaint ourselves with the general disposition of subject-matter as revealed by the structure. The structure of the book as a whole has been given in Vol. xxv., page 15. We will not repeat the whole structure here, but will be content with a synopsis, indicating the main themes.

Joshua as a whole.

A | i. 1. Death of Moses.

B | i. 2—vii. Entry into the land. Divided, espied, entered.

C | viii.—xii. Conquest of the land.

B | xiii.—xxiv. 28. Possession of the land. Possessed, divided, fulfilled.

A | xxiv. 29—33. Death of Joshua.

The land has been entered and divided (chapter i.—vii.), and our present study deals with the opening chapter of the section devoted to its conquest. This section contains five chapters (viii.—xii.) in which we have the conquest of Ai at the beginning, and the conquest of the thirty-one cities and their kings at the close. Two kinds of league are recorded, the league made with the Gibeonites (ix. 15), and the confederacy formed against the Gibeonites and Israel (x.—xi. 17). All scripture is profitable, and we shall find much that is written for our learning as we meditate on the history of these early people—how they suffered defeat or were victorious, how they were deceived or enlightened, according to whether they walked in their own strength, or trusted in the Lord.

Origen says, when writing on these chapters :—

> "What are these things to me? What good is it for me to know that the inhabitants of Ai were conquered? As if many other battles of far greater note had not been fought."

The answer is that we are here being taught by analogy. In the conquest of Canaan, the believer of another dispensation can see a picture of himself, his foes, and his only ground of victory.

The account of the conquest of Ai, with which chapter viii. is concerned, opens with a word of encouragement.

> "Fear not, neither be thou dismayed: take all the people of war with thee, and arise, go up to Ai. See, I have given into thy hand the king of Ai, and his people, and his city, and his land. And thou shalt do to Ai and her king as thou didst unto Jericho and her king: only the spoil thereof, and the cattle thereof, shall ye take for a prey unto yourselves: lay thee an ambush for the city behind it" (Josh. viii. 1, 2).

These words must be read in conjunction with what is previously recorded in chapter vii. :—

> "The men went up and viewed Ai. And they returned to Joshua and said unto him, Let not all the people go up; but let about two or three thousand men go up and smite Ai. And make not all the people to labour thither; for they are but few" (Josh. vii. 2, 3).

Whether these were words of faith, or, as some think, words of fleshly pride we cannot say. The three thousand that went up against Ai were defeated, and the hearts of the people melted. The reason for the defeat is given in the latter part of chapter vii.; it is not the pride of those who had viewed Ai that is mentioned, but the sin of Achan. When, therefore, that sin had been dealt with, the Lord, Who knew how the defeat at Ai and the exposure of Achan would react upon the faith of the people, gives the encouraging words with which this chapter opens. He does not demand of them that they shall trust their fortunes again with a few men, but commands that all the people of war shall go up, and not only so, but that the method to be adopted shall be that of an ambush.

A superficial reading of verses 3 and 4 gives the impression that 30,000 men were commanded to lie in ambush, whereas in verse 12 the number is said to be 5,000. A comparison of verses 9 and 12 will show that the place of ambush is the same in both cases. Some have supposed a mistake in the numbers; others have imagined that the 5,000 were an extra number detailed off to support the 30,000. While nothing is too hard for the Lord, and we believe He can as completely hide thirty thousand men as he can three, the fact that an ambush was adopted here shows that miraculous interposition was not intended. And the difficulty of hiding as many as 30,000 men between two cities, without their being discovered, cannot be lightly set aside. The solution of the problem seems to lie in the method often adopted in Scripture, of giving a short account of an occurrence, and then returning to supplement with fuller detail. All that verses 3 and 4 actually tell us is that, in obedience to the Lord's command, all the people of war arose, that 30,000 were chosen and sent away by night, and that the ambush was arranged. Subsequently we learn that the number thus left in ambush was 5,000. The plan adopted was to give the appearance of defeat and so lure the enemy out to accomplish their destruction. A rather similar method is recorded in Exod. xiv. 2 in connection with the overthrow of Pharaoh.

Our eyes turn away from Ai to a place called Calvary. There, was enacted what appeared to be the greatest defeat that the world had seen. Yet, with the complete N.T. before us, we know that the Cross was the greatest of all triumphs. Instead of representing a victory for Satan, it became the symbol of his defeat. Instead of the King of Ai triumphing over the fleeing Israelities, the battle ended with his own death and ignominy. The King of Ai was hanged upon a tree. Surely it is not without the deepest significance that we find the same words "hanged on a tree" (LXX version) used in the N.T. of Christ Himself (Acts v. 30; x 39; Gal. iii. 13).

Another important point in the record of the conquest of Ai, is the subsequent journey to Ebal and the fulfilment, not only of the commandment given by Moses, but of the earlier promise given there to Abraham himself. To some commentators, the journey of all the congregation of Israel, with the women and the little ones (verse 35) to Ebal at this time, is an impossibility, and unbelieving criticism has not spared the knife. If, however, we have come so far with Israel, what hinders us from taking one more step? True, the land was in the hand of enemies, and Ebal was situated some twenty miles to the north of Ai and Bethel. It would ordinarily have been an act of folly for any man to have thus exposed the whole nation to the possibility of surprise and defeat. But Joshua was acting under orders, and he had experienced enough of the power of the Lord on Israel's behalf to realize that in obedience was wisdom and safety, while in fleshly precaution lay defeat. How absurd, speaking naturally, to circumcise an army at such a critical moment as the crossing of Jordan. How absurd to invest a city with marching priests, and to expect its overthrow by the blowing of trumpets. Yet these events were still alive in their memories.

The command of the Lord to Joshua, through Moses, is given in Deut. xxvii.:—

> "On the day when ye shall pass over Jordan into the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, that thou shalt set thee up great stones, and plaister them with plaister. And thou shalt write upon them all the words of this law . . . . in Mount Ebal . . . . And there shalt thou build an altar . . . . These shall stand upon Mount Gerizim to bless the people, when ye are come over Jordan; Simeon, and Levi, and Judah, and Issachar, and Joseph, and Benjamin. And these shall stand upon Mount Ebal to curse, Reuben, Gad, and Asher, and Zebulun, Dan, and Naphtali" (Deut. xxvii. 2—13).

Then follow, in Deut. xxvii. and xxviii., the curses and blessings that the Levites were to pronounce. It is a legitimate question to ask at this point, "Why were these curses and blessings pronounced at Ebal and Gerizim, and what was the reason for which Joshua had to hasten to that region so early in the conquest of Canaan?" The answer appears to be that, when Israel passed over the Jordan into the land of their inheritance, they reached a stage in their development where fuller responsibility had to be assumed. A patient examination of the curses and blessings in Deut. xxvii. and xxviii. will leave us all with a profound sense of imminent failure. The curses pronounced in Deut. xxviii. anticipated the day when Nebuchadnezzar would subjugate Israel, and also the future oppressor whose deeds are recorded in Dan. viii.—xii. What nation could ever hope to hold the land of Canaan on such terms? It was the purpose of God in the giv- of the law, to show Israel, and through Israel all mankind, that no flesh, however much helped by miracle and hedged by law, could ever attain perfection. Is the record, then, to end in dismal failure? By no means. Human failure cries out for God, for grace, for someone who shall triumph where man has failed. This is one of the lessons we learn from Joshua viii.

For a moment let us leave Joshua, and turn back to the day when Abraham, at the command of God, left kindred and country and entered the promised land.

> "And Abram passed through the land unto the place of Sichem, unto the plain of Moreh. (And the Canaanite was then in the land). And the Lord appeared unto Abram, and said: Unto thy seed will I give this land. And there he builded an altar unto the Lord, Who appeared unto him. And he removed from thence unto a mountain on the east of Bethel, and pitched his tent, having Bethel on the west, and Hai on the east: and there he builded an altar unto the Lord, and called upon the name of the Lord" (Gen. xii. 6—8).

A reference to Deut. xi. 29, 30 will prove that Gerizim and Ebal were "beside the plains of Moreh." Joshua, therefore, was but retracing the steps of Abraham, travelling in the reverse order. Abraham started at Sichem, and ended at Ai and Bethel. Joshua started at Ai and Bethel and journeyed to Sichem. Both men built an altar, but in Abraham's case there was no plaistering of the stones and writing of the law upon them. The true commentary on these two men, standing upon the same ground, and associated with the same promise of the same land, is found in Gal. iii. We stand with Joshua and hear the curses and blessings pronounced from Ebal and Gerizim. We look upon the "handwriting of ordinances" and our hearts sink within us.

> "Is the law then against the promises of God? God forbid. For if there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law. But the Scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe" (Gal. iii. 21, 22).

> "Wherefore then serveth the law? It was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made; and it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator. Now a mediator is not a mediator of one, but God is one" (Gal. iii. 19, 20).

What is the meaning of the last sentence? It means that the very presence of a mediator indicates two contracting parties. Such is the nature of the law. But in the case of Abraham there was no mediator, for there was no contract. God simply and unconditionally promised the land to Abraham and to his seed, and that promise remains untouched by Israel's inability to comply with the terms of Sinai, Ebal or Gerizim.

> "And this I say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was 430 years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect. For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise; but God gave it to Abraham by promise" (Gal. iii. 17, 18).

Such is the lesson of Joshua viii., a lesson needed not only by Israel, and the spiritual seed of Abraham (Gal. iii. 29), but by the saved and called of every dispensation from the highest to the lowest, from the Church seated in heavenly places to the last believer in the "ends of the earth." None shall ever stand upon a foundation of law or works. Grace alone can avail, operating through righteousness and the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. Joshua's altar, with the added plaistered stones containing the law, may have looked more impressive than Abraham's, standing alone; but Abraham's altar speaks of peace and completion, while Joshua's tells of failure and disappointment.

The Book of Joshua is to Israel, what Philippians is to the Church of the Mystery, and Hebrews to the Church of the Acts. Each of the three books addresses a redeemed people and speaks of conquest, a prize and a crown. In each case, attainment is by grace through faith, and the law is resolutely set aside. May we be ready to learn the lessons that await us in this Book of Joshua, heeding its warnings, rejoicing in its victories, and emulating the faith of those who, like Caleb and Joshua, wholly followed the Lord.

The Acts of the Apostles.

No. 15.

The culminating opposition at Jerusalem (Acts iv. 23—vi. 15).

The witness that began at Jerusalem in Acts ii. does not expand until after the death of Stephen.

> "At that time there was a great persecution against the church which was at Jerusalem: and they were all scattered abroad throughout the regions of Judæa and Samaria, except the apostles" (Acts viii. 1).

The record from Pentecost up to the time of Acts viii. 1 comprises one main section of the Acts, and is characterised by a repeated alternation of witness among believers and among the outside nation.

We have already considered the prophetic explanation of the healing of the lame man as representing the nation (Acts iii. 1—iv. 22), and now the record returns to the witness among the brethren (Acts iv. 23—v. 11).

This section falls into two main parts:—

(1) iv. 23—31. The return of the apostles to their own company, and their report of all that the chief priests had said. The prayer that immediately followed, the answer that was given, and the resulting boldness with which the disciples spoke the word of God.

(2) iv. 32—v. 11. The oneness of heart and soul that characterised the assembly, not only in prayer and doctrine, but in having all things in common. Two examples are given of this community of goods, that of Barnabas, which was acceptable to the Lord, and that of Ananias, which was visited by death.

We do not purpose going over these passages in detail: the fact that they were anticipations of the millenial kingdom has already been demonstrated. This is further illustrated by the passage of Scripture quoted in the prayer of Acts iv. 25, and by the summary judgment that fell upon Ananias and Sapphira.

It may be as well to draw attention to the order in which the truth is presented in Acts iv, 32: first, unity of heart and soul, and then community of possessions. The appeal of the Communist to the second part of verse 32 is a case of wrong division of the Word of Truth.

The next section of the Acts deals with the testimony once more among the people, and occupies Acts v. 12—42. The signs and wonders which were wrought by the apostles multiplied, with the result that the opposition of the chief priests became more violent, and the apostles were put into prison. An angel liberates them, saying: "Go, stand and speak in the temple to the people all the words of this life" (Acts v. 20).

Brought once more before the rulers, they are warned that they had been straitly commanded not to teach any more in the name of Jesus. To which the apostles answer:

> "We ought to obey God rather than men. The God of our fathers raised up Jesus, Whom ye slew and hanged on a tree. Him hath God exalted with His right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance to Israel, and forgiveness of sins. And we are His witnesses of these things; and so is also the Holy Ghost, Whom God hath given to them that obey Him" (Acts v. 29—32).

The result of this testimony is that the rulers were cut to the heart, and took counsel to slay them (Acts v. 33). This enables us to see that the account of the next great witness, that of Stephen, which produced the same effect ("They were cut to the heart" (Acts vii. 54) must be read together with Acts v. As Stephen's speech is recorded with much more fulness, and its results are seen to be so much more critical, we turn our attention to the section vii.—viii. 1 which closes the purely Jerusalem testimony.

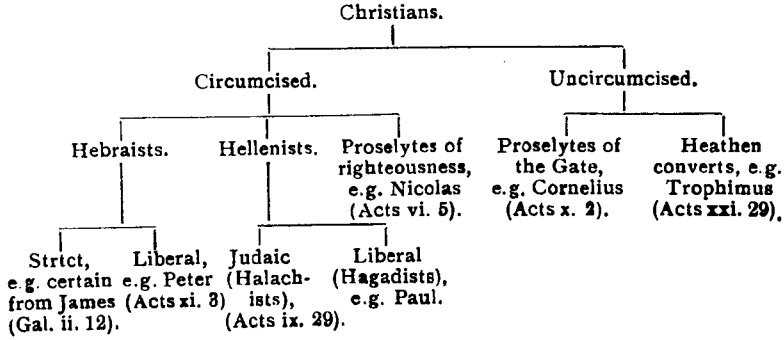
The appointment of Stephen arose out of the fact that the Greek-speaking Jews ("Grecians") felt that their widows were not receiving the same treatment as was meted out to the widows of the Hebrew-speaking section. We must remember that there was a considerable difference in point of view between the Jerusalem Jew and the Jew of the dispersion. The dispersion were more Greek in thought and sympathy, and used the Septuagint version exclusively. The Jerusalem Jew was much narrower in outlook. It is doubtful whether he would have quoted heathen poets, or referred to heathen sports without a shudder, whereas Saul of Tarsus, when he became Paul the apostle, felt no such reserve.

The reader must distinguish between Hellen, "Greek," and Hellenistes, "Grecian." The title "Greek" is used in contradistinction to either "Jew" or "Barbarian." The "Grecians," on the other hand, were Jews although distinguished from the "Hebrews." The trouble that arose in the church at this point was not between Greeks and Jews, but between Jews of extremely narrow views ("the Hebrews") and Jews who, by reason of birth and language, were more liberal in outlook. The Hebrews had a saying, "Cursed be he who teacheth his son the learning of the Greeks."

Farrar has a suggestive note as to the various classes of believers that come before us in the Acts, which may be helpful here.



Whatever real grounds there may have been for this murmuring, the apostles met it at once and mediated between the two sections, for the welfare of the church. Summoning the multitudes, they said:

> "It is not reason (arestos, fit, proper, or pleasing) for us to leave the word of God, and serve tables" (Acts vi. 2).

Whenever the financial affairs of the church are in view, we shall discover a great reluctance on the part of the apostles to give even the appearance of using their authority to turn the scale either one way or the other.

> "Look ye out from among you seven men of honest report, full of the holy ghost and wisdom, whom we may appoint over this business" (Acts vi. 3).

The apostle Paul acted in the same spirit in connection with the "collection for the saints":

> "When I come, whomsoever ye shall approve by your letters, them will I send to bring your liberality unto Jerusalem" (1 Cor. xvi. 3).

When we examine the qualifications deemed necessary for this new work, we are surprised and enlightened as we observe that "honest report" comes before "full of the holy ghost and wisdom." While "the holy ghost and wisdom" indicate spiritual gifts, an "honest report" has to do with manner of life and contact with others; and even to this day where financial matters are concerned, no amount of "spirituality" will justify the appointment of one who has not "a good report of them which are without" (1 Tim. iii. 7).

Seven men are chosen, of whom Stephen stands out prominently both at the beginning and in his subsequent witness.

> "And they chose Stephen, a man full of faith and of the holy ghost, and Philip, and Prochorus, and Nicanor, and Timon, and Parmenas, and Nicolas a proselyte of Antioch" (Acts vi. 5).

While every one of these men has a Greek name, it does not follow that they were all Hellenists. This would have been a cause of murmuring from the Hebrews. Nevertheless, the presumption is that most of them were Hellenists, and they would have had an influence in the right direction as the gospel spread in ever wider circles.

We know nothing of the subsequent ministry of these men except that of Stephen and Philip. It is Stephen that holds the attention from now on to the end of chapter vii.

"And Stephen, full of faith and power, did great wonders and miracles among the people" (Acts vi. 8).

The administration of the fund to assist the widows of the church did not monopolize the time of these men, and both Stephen and Philip engage in most definite public witness. In the course of his duties, Stephen would often be called upon to explain or defend the faith, and as the synagogue was at that time the home of the infant church, we can well understand the violent character of some of these gatherings.

"Then there arose certain of the synagogue, which is called the synagogue of the Libertines, and Cyrenians, and Alexandrians, and of them of Cilicia and of Asia, disputing with Stephen" (Acts vi. 9).

The number of synagogues in Jerusalem at this time was proverbial. The Talmud says that there were 480, and although these figures are to be received only after making a very great discount, the fact remains that Jews out of nearly every nation would find their own meeting-place represented in Jerusalem. It is impossible, from the wording of the text alone, to decide whether Stephen disputed in one synagogue only, that of the Freed Men of many nations; or in three synagogues, those of the Freed Men, and of the African and Asiatic Hellenists; or even in two synagogues, which would include the Hellenists of Cyrene and Alexandria, and the Hellenites of Cilicia and Asia. However this may be, our interest is focussed upon one synagogue—that of Cilicia, for here the young man Saul of Tarsus, a native of Cilicia, would naturally have worshipped, and here he doubtless took part in those disputes that so often ended with the overthrowing of Pharisaic pride and tradition.

"And they were not able to resist the wisdom and the spirit by which he spake" (Acts vi. 10).

The Rabbis had laid it down as a rule that the whole of their Scriptures prophesied concerning the days of the Messiah only. One can well understand how they would be staggered as Stephen took them to the prophecies of a suffering Messiah, and, using their own canon of interpretation, completely silenced them in their opposition to the Lord. In the course of his exposition, and in meeting the deep-rooted belief that the Law of Moses was eternal, Stephen would necessarily emphasize the contrast between the glory of the covenant that had passed away and the glory of the covenant that abides. He would draw attention to the prophetic utterance of the Lord that, in spite of all the veneration in which the Temple was held, not one stone would be left upon another; and that He had said that the Father seeks spiritual worshippers, who shall not be limited to the Temple in Jerusalem, or the Mountain in Samaria.

Among the zealots who would most bitterly resist any such argument, we may be sure Saul of Tarsus held a foremost place. Yet he was blameless "according to the law," and would never have stooped to the use of false witness. Others, however, who were less scrupulous, seized upon Stephen's doctrine and distorted it.

> "Then they suborned men, which said, We have heard him speak blasphemous words against Moses and against God . . . . And set up false witnesses, which said, This man ceaseth not to speak blasphemous words against the holy place, and the law. For we have heard him say, that this Jesus of Nazareth (or, Jesus the Nazarene) shall destroy this place, and shall change the customs which Moses delivered us" (Acts vi. 11—14).

It is quite possible that Stephen had sufficient wisdom and ability to have extricated himself, and to have temporized concerning the truth which, in its distorted form, told in such deadly fashion against him. It seems, however, that some conception of the glorious work that was his to do was revealed to him, and though it meant martyrdom, he redeemed the time, and spoke words that produced at least one result, for Saul of Tarsus never rested after hearing them, till he found rest "in Christ."

> "And all that sat in the council, looking stedfastly on him, saw his face as it had been the face of an angel" (Acts vi. 15).

The Council seem to have had some sense of the solemnity of the moment. As Chrysostom suggests, the High Priest and the Sanhedrin seem to have been awed by the face of Stephen, and in mild tone the High Priest asks the simple question, "Are these things so?"

We may well suppose that the apostle Paul would remember most vividly this witness of Stephen, and the diligent student will find in this witness the germ and seed which later became blossom and fruit in the early writings of the young man who "consented unto his death." When in "that day" sower and reaper, planter and waterer shall stand together before the Lord of the harvest, Andrew will not be forgotten by Simon Peter or by his Lord, and Stephen will be remembered among those whose loyalty, even unto death, spread the truth of the gospel in all its fulness and freedom.

The actual witness of Stephen as recorded in Acts vii. now awaits our earnest attention, and this present article must be regarded as a preparation for the study of this testimony, given by the Church's first martyr, the man whose Greek name means "a crown."

Studies in the Book of the Revelation.

No. 11.

Rev. i. 7.

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

We have reached the first Amen of this book, and find that the section bounded by the word deals with the revelation of the Lord Jesus and the manner of its delivery to John (by an angel), the ones to whom John is to send the written record of the visions, and the great theme, the fulfilment of God's promises to Abraham and David in the future regeneration and blessing of Israel as a kingdom of priests. Verse 7 which follows is in turn bounded by another Amen. This is the briefest section of the book, yet how important it is may be gathered not only from its contents, but by its unique position. The words of verse 7 are introduced by "Behold," a word that occurs some thirty times throughout the book. The last occurrence (xxii. 12) deals with the same great topic—the coming of the Lord: "Behold, He cometh with the clouds."

So often are clouds spoken of in connection with the coming of the Lord that we can readily believe that when the apostle says, "Behold, look, He cometh with the clouds," he would have us understand that he means that here is the fulfilment of the many passages which declare them to be the accompaniment of the returning Lord. The great passage referred to here is Dan. vii. 13, 14, It occurs after the "little horn" had spoken "great things," and the body of the beast was "given to the burning flame" (cf. Dan. vii. 8—11, 21—25 with Rev. xiii. and xix.).

> "I saw in the night visions, and behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven.....His (dominion) shall not pass away, and His kingdom shall not be destroyed" (Dan. vii. 13, 14).

The parallel between this chapter and the book of Revelation is very marked and must be kept much in mind. Matt. xxiv. 30 speaks of the clouds in the same connection: "and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory." Matt. xxvi. 64 deals with the same theme: "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." This thought is evidently of great importance, for it finds a place also in Mark and Luke. Acts i. 9 speaks of the ascension of the Lord from the mount of Olives: "and a cloud received Him out of their sight." Verse 11 declares: "He shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven." 1 Thess. iv. 17 tells us that the hope of those who are dispensationally described as the Church at Thessalonica is to be "caught up together in clouds, to meet the Lord in the air." A comparison of the teaching of 1 and 2 Thessalonians with Revelation will show that they refer to the same period. The word cloud (nephelē) is one of the words that occur seven times in the Apocalypse, and is associated with the Lord's coming, the time of reaping the harvest of the earth, the finishing of the mystery of God, and the triumph of those who loved not their lives unto the death. (It is interesting to know that among the Jews of early times the Messiah was called "Cloud-comer" and "Son of a cloud").

> "And every eye shall see Him, even those who pierced Him, and all the tribes of the land shall wail because of Him."

The statement "every eye" seems to be qualified in this sentence by the words that follow. Matt. xxiv. 30 undoubtedly refers to the same event, and says, "Then shall appear the sign of the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." The "tribes of the land," and the mourning of those who pierced Him, take us back to Zech. xii. 9—14:—

> "And it shall come to pass in that day, that I will seek to destroy all the nations that come against Jerusalem. And I will pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and supplication: and they shall look upon Me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for Him as one mourneth for his only son."

This passage contributes several particulars that are essential to the true interpretation of Rev. i. 7.

(1) The occasion and time of its fulfilment is after the nations have come against Jerusalem. This event is spoken of again in Zech. xiv. 12—16. The fearful judgment that falls upon those who have fought against Jerusalem is echoed in Rev. xix. 18.

(2) Those who "look upon Him whom they have pierced and mourn," are the "house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem," more fully particularized into houses and families, "Nathan, Levi, Shimei, etc." By no legitimate interpretation can these definite particulars be made to mean the church of the N.T.

(3) This "look" and this "mourning" results from the "spirit of grace and supplication." Repentance at last will be given, and the Lord "shall send Jesus Christ..... Whom the heavens must receive until the times of r estitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since an age" (Acts iii. 19—21).

Together with Zech. xii. 9—14 see xiii. 1: "In that day there shall be a fountain opened to the house of David and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem for sin and for uncleanness." Rev. i. 5, 6 has already referred to this. Further, Zech. xiv. 2—4 must be read:—

> "For I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle.....then shall the Lord go forth to fight against those nations.....and His feet shall stand in that day upon the mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem."

This reference links the passages up still more. The reader is prevented from spiritualizing "the mount of Olives" by the topographical statement, "which is before Jerusalem." This and much more in Zechariah (as indeed in all the so called minor prophets) throws light upon the time and locality of Rev. i. 7.

Referring again to Matt. xxiv. 29, 30, we learn one more item:—

> "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken. And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven, etc."

Rev. i. 7 then takes place not only in direct connection with Jerusalem, but "immediately after the tribulation." Now there is no possibility of doubt as to when this tribulation takes place. Matt. xxiv. 15—21 says:—

> "When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place.....then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since (the) beginning of the world until now, no, nor ever shall be."

There can only be one such tribulation in history, and therefore to this Rev. vii. 14 refers:—

> "These are they which came out of the tribulation, the great one."

Rev. i. 7 must therefore take place after Rev. vii. 14. Further, this tribulation is directly the result of the setting up of the "abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet." This is set out in detail in Rev. xiii. and the tribulation is connected with refusing to receive the mark of the beast. The unparalleled tribulation of Matt. xxiv., which is immediately followed by the coming of the Son of man as in Rev. i. 7, is referred to in Dan xii. 1—3:—

> "And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people, and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time; and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book. And many that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, these to eonion life, and those to shame and eonian contempt. And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars unto the age and beyond."

This passage emphasizes the "overcomer" as plainly as does the book of the Revelation. The reference to Michael takes the reader on to Rev. xii. 7—10:—

> "And there was war in heaven, Michael and his angels fought against the dragon .... Now is come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God and the power of His Christ."

The whole teaching of the Prophets and the Gospels bears one united witness to the fact that Rev. i. 7 is the hope of Israel, is to be literally connected with the Mount of Olives (as Acts i. 11, 12) and Jerusalem, that it will immediately follow the great tribulation, which takes place when Michael drives Satan to earth and the Antichrist arises in blasphemy. To be a kingdom of priests is Israel's destiny. To none other is such a promise made. To fulfil that promise the Lord Jesus as the King-Priest returns, and Rev. i. 7 records that coming. Rev. i. is as much future as Rev. xix. The traditional interpretation that makes the first three chapters past and present, and the future section to start from chapter iv. is wrong.

The apostle concludes this solemn verse with a double confirmation, "Yea, Amen," He uses the same expressions in xxii. 20:—

"Yea, I am coming speedily. Amen! Come Thou, O Lord Jesus."

This is the revelation of the Lord Jesus, Till this takes place earth will be a wilderness to faith, and a fruitful soil for sin. Till this takes place the god of this age will rule as the prince of the authority of the air. While the hope of the One Body is not expressed in any of the passages referred to, yet they, in sympathy with a groaning creation, a down-trodden and blinded Israel, and a doomed Gentile world, can also add heartily and prayerfully, "Yea, Amen. Even so, Come, Lord Jesus."

Fundamentals of dispensational truth.

No. 5.

The dispensations.

(Reprinted from Volume VI.).

We have seen that the Bible records the purpose of the ages, and that those ages are the periods during which various phases of that wondrous purpose are developed. In a great house there are rooms set apart for different purposes, the performance of which is proper in their place. In an army, or a kingdom, there are varying ranks and duties. So also it is with regard to the development of the purpose. The ages are not only characterized by some one covering title, viz., "this evil age," "the age to come," etc., but are also sub-divided into what we may call dispensations. The word is not used of all these divisions in the Scriptures, but we use it because no other word seems so fitting. Nothing is included in the Scriptures that is irrelevant to the unfolding of this purpose. Creation is a part of this great plan. To grasp this will alter to a great extent our outlook. Traditional orthodoxy seems to teach that having created man upon the earth, and man having failed, God then devised the scheme of redemption. We shall find that this is not so. Redemption, as a part of the purpose of the ages, was settled before man was made.

Creation must be considered in two aspects. First there is the primal creation recorded in Gen. i. 1. Although the earth is full of the geological remains of a creation prior to that of the six days, no details are given in the Bible. We must not suppose, however, that this primal creation of heaven and earth has no place in the purpose of God. It was in that creation that angels and principalities were created. In that creation Satan had a place of honour, and that creation ended with darkness and judgment. Heb. ix. tells us that the heavenlies need the cleansing of redemption as well as the earth. As that early creation, however, has not so much to do with the first revealed truth concerning man, two short verses suffice at the commencement of the Bible. The creation that follows is given with more detail, the six days' work ending with the seventh day's rest being typical of the earthly and manward development of the purpose of the ages. Earthly we say, by way of excluding that calling (which was kept secret since the ages) enunciated in the prison epistles, but not earthly to the exclusion of the heavenly calling as set forth in Hebrews, 1 and 2 Peter, and Revelation. The term, "the heavens and the earth," opens the Bible.

Gen. i. 1 tells us of the first which ended in the darkness and chaos of verse 2. Gen. ii. 1 tells of the second which continues until the day of God, while 2 Pet. iii. 13 tells us that there shall be a new heavens and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness. It is necessary to make a distinction between the "earth" and the "world." The word "world" indicates arrangement and order, and it has been pointed out that 2 Pet. iii. 6 tells us that the "world," not the "earth" perished in the time referred to by Peter.

Covering the great span of the ages we find "times and seasons." "Time" (chronos) conveys the idea of periods that are measured off, within which certain events take place, whereas "seasons" (kairos) speaks rather of the fitness of those times to the event. We use two words in English with similar distinction. The time that some event happened may be 30th August at 4 p.m.; the season would be summer. Several "days" are mentioned too. There is "man's day," translated "man's judgment" in 1 Cor. iv. 3, there is also the day of the Lord, the great and terrible day of the Lord, the day of God, and there is also (hidden by our A.V.) the day of (the) age (2 Pet. iii. 18). Coupled with this we read of "the acceptable year of the Lord and the day of vengeance of our God."

When we examine in greater detail these various phases of the great outworking, we shall see that the six days' creation, followed by the seventh day's rest, is the great initial foreshadowing of the purpose in boldest outline, afterwards filled in with more and more detail during the various "times," "ages," "seasons," and "days," and including the heavens and the earth, time past, present, and to come, until the cycle of the ages shall have become completed in the new heavens and the new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness.

These times, seasons, ages, and days are sub-divided into what are termed "dispensations." Do not use the terms "dispensation" and "age" as though they meant the same thing. During one age many dispensations may have run their course. During one age two or more dispensations may be running side by side. The very fact that God has a purpose of election will necessitate this. It is not pretended that the following series of dispensations is necessarily true either in number or in the period covered. All we can hope to do is to point out obvious changes in God's administrations, leaving an open mind for further light and fuller detail. Perhaps it would be more correct if we say that this series keeps close to the central thread of the purpose, closely following its development along the line of election of man, nation or church, leaving nations and individuals who are outside the elective sphere unaccounted for. For instance, during the time that the dispensations covering Israel's existence were in operation, there was a distinctly different dispensational attitude toward the nations. It was a period when God condoned ("winked at") their ignorance. Following, however, the main line of purpose from Adam, through Seth, to Noah and Abraham, we shall find the following sub-divisions to be helpful in our study, and fairly close to the division that the Scriptures indicate.

The dispensations.

1st. The six days' creation to the fall of Adam.
2nd. From the fall of Adam to the flood.
3rd. From the renewed world after the flood to the call of Abraham.
4th. From the call of Abraham to the Exodus from Egypt.
5th. From the deliverance from Egypt to the entrance into Canaan.
6th. From the entrance into Canaan to the setting up of the kingdom.
7th. From David to the Babylonian captivity.
8th. From the captivity to the birth of Christ.
9th. From the birth to the death and resurrection of Christ.

10th. From the day of Pentecost to Israel's rejection in Acts xxviii.

11th. The prison ministry of Paul called "the dispensation of the mystery."

12th. Commences with the recognition of Israel and is characterized by wrath.

13th. Occupies the thousand year's reign of Christ. The millennium.

14th. Occupies the period that follows the millennium unto the great white throne.

15th. Completes the series commencing with the new creation and ending with "God all in all."

In one sense of course the fourth to the tenth might be included under one head, i.e., from the call of Abraham to the rejection in Acts xxviii., but we feel that the divisions suggested will make the unfolding of the purpose clearer. While we keep before our minds the divisions of the Word, and note the different aspects of truth that are peculiar to each dispensation, it will be well to remember that underlying all dispensations are one or two items of the greatest importance that enter the first dispensation and remain until the last. We refer to sin and death. Without the awful presence of sin and death the dispensational unfolding of God's purpose could never have taken the form it has done. Accompanying sin and death are varying manifestations of law, grace, mercy and judgment. In some dispensations one will be found more prominent than another, so that one dispensation will be known as that of law, although grace and mercy are very evident in many of the dealings recorded.

We shall devote our attention, the Lord willing, to the consideration of these fifteen dispensations, and we believe that when these are seen in their large outlines, the difficult and detailed study of the dispensation more closely to do with ourselves will be entered with greater profit.

"Ye sent unto John, and he bare witness unto the truth" (John v. 33).

While it is incumbent upon all to believe without reserve the word of the Lord, yet such is the heart of man, and such the condescension of the Lord, that He stoops to the level of His creatures and confirms His word "by two or three witnesses."

Long before His birth, the Law, the Prophets and the Psalms spoke of Him. After this prophetic testimony, nothing more was strictly necessary other than a patient waiting for its fulfilment. The prophetic testimony, however, provided for a Forerunner, whose life and ministry would be sufficiently striking to call the attention of Israel to the signs of the Advent. To this the Lord refers when He concedes the point concerning His own testimony in John v.:—

> "There is another that beareth witness of Me; and I know that the witness which he witnesseth of Me is true. Ye sent unto John, and he bare witness unto the truth. But I receive not testimony from man: but these things I say, that ye might be saved. He was a burning and a shining light: and ye were willing for a season to rejoice in his light" (John v. 32-35).

Although the Lord says that John's witness is true, the A.V. makes it appear that He nullifies this by the remark, "But I receive not testimony from man." This sentence has caused a great deal of discussion among commentators, but one thing is plain, the testimony of John the Baptist was of God, and therefore could not be set aside. The words "from man" are in the original para anthrōpon. The same words occur again in John v. 41: "I receive not honour from men," and in Gal. i. 12, "I neither received it from man." Para means "beside." Its presence there in John v. does not repudiate the true witness of John; it rather reverts to the fact that the Lord actually needed no confirming testimony, as men do under the law, but that He accepted this lower standing "that ye might be saved." We therefore translate literally: "But I receive not testimony beside a man," i.e., "I have no need to place Myself on a human level, but I willingly do so if this will help you to believe and be saved."

The witness of John the Baptist is found in each of the four Gospels: Matt. iii. 1—17, Mark i. 2—11, Luke iii. 1—22, and John i. 6—8, 15, 19—36. The fact that each Gospel contains a different account of the Forerunner's work shows that it is important, and the facts recorded prove that it was true. Matthew, Mark, Luke and John have characteristic differences, but all refer to the fulfiment of the prophecy of Isaiah xl. 3 :—

> "For this is he that was spoken of by the prophet Esaias, saying, The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord" (Matt. iii. 3).

Luke gives much fuller detail regarding the occasion of the birth of John and records the prophecy of his father Zacharias, as well as the effect upon Elizabeth of Mary's salutation (Luke i. 36—80). While all this must be considered if we are to have a complete understanding of the testimony of John, the words of our Lord in John v. have particular reference to that which is recorded in John i., and as space is limited, we will turn our attention to that chapter.

When reading through John i. 1—36, one is struck by the way in which the narrative concerning Christ Himself and that which deals with John are intertwined. Without attempting a literary structure or a complete analysis of all its parts, the following will help the reader to visualize this interrelationship between Christ the Word and John the voice.

A1 | 1—5. THE WORD.—In the beginning.
B1 | 6—9. JOHN.—Not that light.
A2 | 10—14. THE WORD.—Made flesh.
B2 | 15. JOHN.—He was before me.
A3 | 16—18. THE WORD.—He hath declared Him.
B3 | 19—36. JOHN.—I am a voice.

When pressed for an answer to the question, "What sayest thou of thyself?" John replies: "I am a voice of one crying in the wilderness" (John i. 23). There is no article with the word "voice." John was but "a voice," for Christ Himself is "The Word," Who "declares" the invisible God to men. What a beautiful figure! And what a lesson in humble witness! He the Word, and I a voice to make that Word known.

In the same chapter we read: "He was not that Light, but was sent to bear witness of that Light" (John i. 8). Yet in John v. 35 we have already read that Christ said of John: "He was a burning and a shining light." There is, however, no contradiction here. In John i. 8, the word translated "light" is phos, whereas in John v. 35 the word is luchnos, "a lamp."

Where Christ is "The Word," John is "a voice." Where Christ is "The Light" John is "a lamp." Such was the character of John's witness.

If the Jews demanded acquiescence with the law, that each must have his testimony corroborated by "two or three witnesses," then, says the Lord, here is that corroboration. In Matt. xxi. He challenges them concerning the heavenly authority of John's testimony, and they cannot answer Him (Matt. xxi. 23—27). The Word had spoken in the human voice of John, the Light had been seen in the lamp of the Baptist, the King had been heralded by the divinely foretold Forerunner. The people of Israel were without excuse. Yet, said the Lord: "I have greater witness than that of John" (John v. 36). This greater witness we must consider in our next article.

With all thy getting, get understanding.

Figures of Speech.

Figures involving change: Metonymy.

The word "Metonymy" is derived from meta, "change," and onoma, "a name or noun." The figure is much used in everyday life, and is constantly adding to our language. We have had, for instance, in the past, a carriage called a "brougham" named after Lord Brougham, and a cab called a "hansom," after the inventor. More recently there is the "zeppelin," named after the inventor. And most readers will be acquainted with other examples belonging to their own sphere or calling.

Metonymy is of four kinds:—

(i.) METONYMY OF THE CAUSE, where the cause is put for the effect.

(ii.) METONYMY OF THE EFFECT, where the effect is put for the cause.

(iii.) METONYMY OF THE SUBJECT, where the subject is put for something pertaining to it.

(iv.) METONYMY OF THE ADJUNCT, where that which pertains to a thing is put for the thing itself.

A complete outline of the figure gives twenty sub-divisions. These we must omit, and devote what space we have to a series of examples.

(i.) METONYMY OF THE CAUSE.

"They have Moses (i.e. his writings) and the prophets" (i.e. their writings) (Luke xvi. 29).

"At the mouth (i.e. the testimony) of two witnesses" (Deut. xvii. 6).

"Purge me with hyssop" (Psa. li. 7). The hyssop was used as a sprinkler; the blood alone cleansed.

(ii.) METONYMY OF THE EFFECT.

"Mine eyes have seen Thy salvation" (i.e. Christ, the Saviour) (Luke ii. 30).

"There is death in the pot" (2 Kings iv. 40).

"In deaths oft" (2 Cor. xi. 23).

(iii.) METONYMY OF THE SUBJECT.

"Me he restored (i.e. declared that I should be restored) unto mine office, and him he hanged" (i.e. declared that he should be hanged) (Gen. xli. 13).

"He took the cup . . . . divide it among yourselves . . . . This cup is the new testament in My blood, which is shed for you" (Luke xxii. 17 and 20). Here the cup is put for the wine that was in it.

(iv.) METONYMY OF THE ADJUNCT.

"Days should speak" (i.e. men of days, or of full age) (Job xxxii. 7).

"The Fear of Isaac" (i.e. the God Whom Isaac feared) (Gen. xxxi. 42). See verse 53.

"Who hath believed our hearing?" (i.e. what they have heard, our report). (Isa. liii. 1). See Rom. x. 16.

"Before faith came" (i.e. before the doctrine of the Gospel was revealed to faith) (Gal. iii. 23).

"The sceptre shall not depart" (Gen. xlix. 10). The sceptre is put for the one who is entitled to hold it, the King.

"Thy rod and Thy staff, they comfort me" (Psa. xxiii 4). The shepherd carried two implements: the rod for the help of the sheep, and the club or staff to destroy their enemies. The rod and the staff, therefore, indicate care and defence.

"Cleanness of teeth" (Amos iv. 6) is put for famine.

"Making bald" (Micah i. 16) is put for grieving.

In addition to the four kinds of Metonymy, there is a double Metonymy, which is usually referred to as Metalepsis (meta, "behind" and leipō, "to leave"). The idea expressed in this name is that something which is left out has to be supplied by the thought, rather than by the association as in simple Metonymy.

"Therefore came they under the shadow of my roof" (Gen. xix. 8). Here the word "roof" is used for the whole house; and then the house is used for the protection and hospitality that it afforded.

The reader will perceive that while these figures of speech are not true to fact, they are often more true to feeling, and are consequently found in those places where the intensity of the subject demands something more than grammatical exactness. For example, the words: "There is death in the pot" can almost be heard shouting their warning.

What manner of persons ought ye to be.

Symbols of Service.

The Refresher.

When considering the symbol of "The Messenger," we read in Prov. xxv. 13 that a faithful messenger refreshes the soul of his master, like the cold of snow in harvest. It may at first sight seem a humble office to perform, but when we remember that the blessings that accompany the presence of the Lord at His Second Coming are spoken of as "times of refreshing" (Acts iii. 19), its value becomes more apparent.

The closing days of the ministry of the apostle Paul found him "such an one as Paul the aged, and now also a prisoner of Jesus Christ" (Phile. 9). This prisoner writes to Philemon a letter, in which, apart from the touching allusion to himself just quoted, his great concern is for others, and for Onesimus in particular.

"We have great joy and consolation in thy love, because the bowels of the saints are refreshed by thee, brother" (Phile. 7).

Philemon was a "refresher"—a title which we might well covet. The word is a rebuke to that conception of service that thinks only in terms of bustle and activity, for anapauō, the word used in Philemon, means "to give rest." Philemon was following in the footsteps of the Lord Who said, "Ye shall find rest unto your souls" (Matt. xi. 29). With a different prefiix (kata instead of ana) the word is used in Heb. iv. 4, where "God did rest on the seventh day," a rest that is defined in verse 9 as a "sabbatismos" that remains for the people of God. Paul, the aged, and a prisoner, looks to the loving ministry of Philemon as something equivalent to a sabbath rest. Surely this is a ministry that is not overcrowded, a service that many could render who may not be fitted for the fight or the race.

Paul reminds Philemon of this characteristic of his ministry because he is going to entreat for a runaway slave who has since become a brother in Christ; and as a conclusion to his appeal he reverts to the same thought:—

> "Yea, brother, let me have joy of thee in the Lord; refresh my bowels in the Lord" (Phile. 20).

In his second imprisonment the apostle had a divided experience. Demas forsook him; and at his first defence he had to record that all forsook him. Yet in the midst of it all he could write with tears of joy, "Only Luke is with me."

One other faithful helper is mentioned in 2 Timothy, and that is Onesiphorus:—

> "The Lord give mercy unto the house of Onesiphorus; for he oft refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain. But, when he was in Rome, he sought me out very diligently, and found me. The Lord grant unto him that he may find mercy of the Lord in that day: and in how many things he ministered unto me at Ephesus, thou knowest very well" (2 Tim. i. 16—18).

This is all we know of Onesiphorus. The references (2 Tim. i. 16; iv. 19) make it appear probable that he had died. His house is mentioned rather than himself. However this may be, the Lord knew all that Onesiphorus meant to the apostle both at Ephesus and at Rome. The apostle gives him the credit for seeking him out very diligently and finding him, realizing that had Onesiphorus desired an excuse he could easily have found one.

The figure that the apostle uses here, of the ministry of Onesiphorus is very beautiful: "He oft refreshed me (anapsuchō)." He came as a cooling breath of fresh air into the heat and oppression of Paul's prison house. The word is the verbal form of anapsuxis="refreshing" which is used by Peter to describe the blessings of the Second Coming of the Lord (Acts iii. 19).

There are some of the Lord's people whose very presence is refreshing, coming like a sabbath calm after the fitful fever of the world's working week, like a breath of clean air driving away the grime and the heat, or, as the Proverb has it, "Like the cold of snow in harvest." We need active service. Many must wrestle, and run, and fight, and pray. But when the fight is over for a time, and the wrestling has taken its toll, what a ministry is possible for those who can stand ready to soothe, to bind up the wounds of conflict, to ease the pressure, and to restore and refresh.

Wisdom, Human and Divine.

Being a comparison of the groping after truth by the ancient philosophers with the truth as it is revealed in Scripture, in order that the believer may the better appreciate the Word of God.

No. 4.

The link between Malachi and Matthew.

The failure of human wisdom.

We have endeavoured in the three opening articles of this series to accomplish the following ends:—

(1) To create a deeper appreciation of the revelation of truth given us in Scripture, by comparing its sublime statements with the gropings of the wisest men of all times.

(2) To set before the reader the one great outstanding difference between revealed truth and all systems of philosophy, which is, that Scripture focusses our attention not upon abstractions, but upon the Person of the Son of God. "God manifest in the flesh" answers the inarticulate cry of the ages. We see the glory of the invisible God in the face of Jesus Christ.
