Paul now closes this section by stating that while tongues should not be suppressed (the earthly kingdom was still a possibility—Acts iii. 19-26), yet prophecy, the greater gift, should be sought after (I Cor. xiv. 39). The overriding consideration was that all should be done in a decent and orderly manner (verse 40), for only in this way could the God of law and order be honoured and a witness given to the outsider that would be likely to impress and convict him of its truth.

The Apostle now turns to another vital subject concerning which they had possibly written him, that of resurrection. In the whole range of inspired revelation this is one of the most important subjects, for it underlies the whole purpose of God. No wonder then he devotes a long section to its consideration.

No.23. pp. 203 - 207

It is evident that the first epistle to the Corinthians came into being by reason of the problems of the church at Corinth, made known to Paul by the household of Chloe (i. 11) or by the questions they themselves had sent him (vii. 1). Chapter xv. 12 informs us that there were some at Corinth who disbelieved the resurrection from the dead, and as this great doctrine is fundamental to the whole purpose of God, the Apostle devotes a long section to its consideration. The fifteenth chapter is divided into three parts:

(1) verses 1-11, the evidence and the importance of the resurrection of Christ in connection with the gospel.
(2) verses 12-34, deal with the fact of the resurrection of Christ and of man.
(3) verses 35-58, the manner of the resurrection.

Paul commences by drawing attention to the gospel he preached. In his first letter, Galatians, he had made it quite clear that he had received it directly by the Lord's revelation, and not through any human instrumentality (i. 11, 12). The resurrection of Christ was the fundamental basis of this good news:

> "For I delivered unto you first of all that which also I received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures; and that He was buried; and that He hath been raised on the third day according to the Scriptures" (I Cor. xv. 3, 4 R.V.).

This good news he had handed on to them "first of all". "First" here may indicate priority in importance, as well as time and this gospel was clearly made known in the O.T. Scriptures. Paul does not quote any particular passage, but redemption and atonement in the O.T. is clearly linked with death and could not be experienced apart from it. The Passover is directly mentioned in I Cor. v. 7 and the Apostle evidently felt there was no need to back his statement up with O.T. details, for it was so obvious.

It is interesting to note the stress on burial, for this confirmed the reality of both death and resurrection. Christ must have really died, if He was buried, and resurrection was the taking up again of the life He laid down voluntarily on our behalf (John x. 17, 18). As both sin and death are the great enemies of God, His age-long purpose, and His people, the death of Christ and His resurrection is obviously God's answer to these tremendous problems. Nor could they have been dealt with and abolished in any other way.

Paul now brings forward the testimony of eye-witnesses, many of whom would have been still alive at this time. To gainsay this, the Corinthian objectors would have to maintain that the whole of the number were either deceived or liars upon whom no reliance could be placed. First in the list of appearances of the Lord is that to Peter (Cephas). Peter was certainly known at Corinth as i. 12 and ix. 5 clearly indicate: Luke xxiv. 34 reveals that Christ did appear to him. It may be that Peter is put first, because of the prominent position he held in the affairs related in the early chapters of the Acts of the Apostles, as the Apostle of the circumcision (Gal. ii. 7, 8).

After this the Lord appeared to the Twelve (I Cor. xv. 5). This is Paul's only reference to the Twelve and it makes quite clear that he did not consider himself to be one of them. Those who like to talk abut "apostolic mistakes", may try and place Paul amongst the Twelve, but when they do this it is obvious that they have not gripped the place the Apostle and his ministry have in the Divine programme. Nor can the consummation of his ministry, expressed in his prison letters, ever be understood if Paul is linked with the Twelve and Israel, of whom they were representatives (cp. Rev. xxi. 10-14).

Next we have the witness of 500 brothers at once, the majority living at the time Paul was writing (verse 6), which was some twenty years later than the resurrection appearances. We can find no reference to this in the Gospels, nor should we expect it, for they are a concentrated account of the earthly life and witness of our Lord and make no pretence of being exhaustive. In exactly the same way the appearance to James is not mentioned in the Gospels and it seems that by the phrase "All the apostles", Paul is going wider than the Twelve, as it seems unlikely he would repeat what he has already said (5).

Last of all was the Apostle's own witness—the dramatic appearance of the Lord Jesus to him on the road to Damascus, "as one born out of due time" (literally, an abortion). This is a strange word to use. It sounds as though, from a natural standpoint, he was hurried into the world to take his important place in the outworking of God's mighty purpose.

It may be that the thought behind the word had already been used by his enemies, who not only ridiculed his ministry, but even his physical appearance (II Cor. x. 10). They dismissed him as a freak. But in spite of this, his apostleship was one of reality (cp. Gal. i.), although, whenever Paul thought about it, he marveled at the exceeding grace and love of the Lord that should choose and call him to such a service and witness.

> "For I am the least of the apostles, that am not meet to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God. But by the grace of God I am what I am . . . . ." (I Cor. xv. 9, 10 R.V.).

If we compare Eph. iii. 8 and I Tim. i. 15, the Apostle expresses similar thoughts. The contrast is of course between himself and the Lord, not himself and other apostles, for in this case, he was in no way inferior to the superlative apostles (II Cor. xi. 5; xii. 11). Concerning himself, Paul had no illusions, he was once "a blasphemer, and persecutor and injurious" (I Tim. i. 13), one who could have no claim on God. It was nothing less than God's rich grace that saved and called him and he never forgot it. No wonder then that he refers to grace more frequently than any other N.T. writer. He was indeed the apostle of grace and this was manifest in his faithful and unremitting labours for the Lord and His people after his conversion. This was indeed not "in vain". He could say truthfully that he laboured more abundantly than all the other apostles (10). II Cor. xi. 23-27 gives only an abbreviated summing up of all his faithful witness for the Lord and at what tremendous cost! Yet the Apostle did not want to take the credit:

> "Yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me" (xv. 10 R.V.).

This section is now summed up by saying that all the apostles, including himself, had had practical experience of the Lord's resurrection. All had truthfully testified to this and the Corinthians had accepted this and believed, except a minority that Paul is now going to deal with.

> "Now if Christ is preached that He hath been raised from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?" (xv. 12 R.V.).

If the resurrection was not an historical fact, then the inescapable conclusion was that Christ was still dead, and in that case the gospel proclamation was empty, their faith useless, and the apostles were deceivers in proclaiming such a message. "No one can give himself to a dead man; no one can expect anything or receive anything from a dead man" (Schlatter). In other words, the Christian faith was completely destroyed. This would not only affect living believers, but those who had died.

> "Then they also which are fallen asleep in Chris have perished" (xv. 18 R.V.).

This is an unfortunate verse for the traditionalist who bases his hope for the future on the pagan conception of the immortality of the soul. Nothing could make the resurrection of the believer more basic or fundamental. Instead of considering dead believers as being consciously in the presence of the Lord and being safe for ever, this verse states the exact opposite. When will the Christian world really believe this and not give the resurrection of the saved just a nominal adherence? How often do we hear addresses emphasizing that without resurrection, a saved person is PERISHED, the same fact that is accorded to the unbeliever according to John iii. 16?

Cannot we see that the great doctrine of resurrection is absolutely fundamental to the whole redeeming purpose of God and without it, the plan collapses? Paul now continues the argument by saying that if Christian hope pertains to this only, then we are the most pitiable of all men (19).

The Apostle now leaves unreality for fact, with one of his magnificent "buts" (compare Eph. ii. 4 & 13 and note what has gone before).

> "But now in fact Christ has been raised from the dead as the firstfruits of those who are asleep. Since by man came death, by Man came also the resurrection of the dead; for as in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be brought to life" (xv. 20,21, C. K. Barrett).

Christ and Adam are here regarded as heads of the race. Here we have resurrection and its racial aspect. Paul now goes beyond those who have been touched by the gospel, and deals with the connection which the Lord's resurrection has with the whole race in Adam, in relation to the matter of headship. "The head of every man is Christ", even as the head of every woman is man which obviously goes further than those who are saved.

We must be very careful with the terms "in Adam" and "in Christ". The latter phrase, as we have seen, stands for those in relation with Christ. Does every human being that has ever been born came with the scope of "in Adam"? But for the Scriptural doctrine of the two seeds, the answer would be "yes". However one may dislike the thought of some being designated as "tares" by the Lord, the fact remains that he used this term in the parable of the tares and Gen. iii. 15 clearly teaches that there is a seed of God and a seed of the Devil. The parable of the Tares and the Lord's explanation of it should be carefully studied in Matt. xiii. 24-30, 36-42. It should be noted that the tares are quite separate from the true wheat from their inception to their destruction at the end. In no case are the 'tare' "wheat" that has gone wrong. Their introduction is by Satan to counterfeit and seek to overthrow God's purpose for the "wheat". Those that are represented by "wheat" cannot become "tares", neither can 'tares' be changed into "wheat", if we carefully regard the plain teaching of this parable.

From the human standpoint their appearance was identical, and looking at them from this standpoint one could assume that they were all one and the same company; but their origin was from Satan (John viii. 42-44 and note ek pratos tou diabolou "of your father the devil", ek being characteristic of John's writing to denote origin, both in his Gospel and epistles).

They were not "of God", ek tou Theon (John viii. 47), or of the Father (42) but were positively of "their father the devil" (44). If the 'tares' did not find their origin, being and end in God, we have no right to include them in the true "wheat". In other words we should not include the seed of the devil among those truly "in Adam".

We should also not that Paul does not deal with the subject of resurrection from every angle in I Cor. xv. Nothing is said of the special resurrection of Luke xx. 35 (note the personal "worthiness", and the preposition ek, out from the dead). Neither is resurrection expounded as it applies to Israel in the future. Likewise it does not deal with the theme as it applies to unbelievers. This obviously did not come within the scope of the problem started at Corinth by some who denied resurrection. The Apostle is concerned to show the falsity of this and that resurrection was absolutely fundamental to the hope of believers who had died.

No.24. pp. 224 - 228

In dealing with the great truth of resurrection which underlies the whole redemptive purpose of God, we have reached the section where the Apostle Paul deals with it from a racial aspect:

> "For as in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive" (I Cor. xv. 22 R.V.).

In our last study we considered the doctrine of the two seeds, one of God and the other of Satan, and its bearing upon the phrase "all in Adam", which we believe must be limited to the true seed of God. Just how many this comprises, we have no means of knowing, but God knows and as He does the sorting out at the end, there will be no mistakes made (Matt. xiii. 30, 41, 42). "All in Adam" goes wider than the elective purpose now in operation, either for the earthly kingdom or the heavenly Body of Christ.

It must include millions who have died in heathen lands not ever having the opportunity of hearing the Word of God or the Christ of the Word. These are dealt with in resurrection along the lines of Rom. xii. 12-16.

It should be hardly necessary to say that this is not universalism. Adam and Christ are the respective 'heads' of this company and as all the true seed are "in Adam", even so they will all be made alive in Christ. But not all at once. There is no Scriptural basis for one general resurrection as is often held, for the next verse in the chapter we are studying says:

> "Each one, however, will be brought to life in his own rank: Christ Himself as the firstfruits, then, at His coming, those who belong to Christ" (xv. 23, C. K. Barrett).

Let us not forget that I Corinthians was written during the Acts period when the Second Coming of Christ was imminent. The resurrection of the Lord having taken place, the next thing that believers eagerly awaited was His early return and the bringing to life of those believers who had already died. I Thess. iv. 13-18 makes this quite clear. The truth of the Mystery in Ephesians and Colossians had yet to be revealed and therefore finds no direct reference in I Cor. xv.

The Apostle continues:

> "Then cometh the end, when He shall deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when He shall have abolished all rule, and all authority and power. For He must reign, till He hath put all His enemies under His feet . . . . ." (I Cor. xv. 24, 25 R.V.).

Verse 24 reads literally, "then the end" and if we stop reading here we might assume that directly after the second Advent of Christ the termination of all things take place. It is however important to note that telos, end, means goal as well as end in time, the completion or conclusion of a purpose or object. Matt. xxvi. 58 and James v. 11 are examples of this.

The goal the Apostle had in view is stated in verse 28 "that God may be all in all", but the intervening verses make it clear that this is not attained at once. "Then" of verse 24 is dependent upon the two occurrences of "when" which follow. There is the abolishing of all rule and the subjugation of all enemies and until this is secured, Christ reigns (verse 25) which must cover a period of time.

Allowance must therefore be made for this reign with the objects stated, namely to put "all things under His feet". There is no ground for the amillennial view that the winding up of all things takes place immediately at the Second Advent. The goal is not arrived at in an unbroken sequence. The Lord Jesus we repeat, reigns as King until all enemies are subdued. These are included in the words "all rule and authority and power". Col. ii. 15 teaches that the work on the cross is the basis for the destruction of "principalities and powers" who are hostile to God and His children. They are linked with death in the closing verses of Rom. viii., over which the believer is "more than conqueror". On the other hand Col. i. 16-20 shows that some principalities will be reconciled. When all enemies of God have been abolished and all the redeemed brought into line or "subjected" to the great purpose of God, then the goal is reached and God is "all in all" (28). The word hupotasso, subdue, is linked with tagma, "order" or "rank" of verse 23. It is not a harsh word meaning despotic rule, but suggests the perfect alignment of all the redeemed in heaven and earth to the will and plan of the ages devised by the Lord.

This takes man back into the place intended for him in that great plan, for which sin and death had unfitted him. We can say that the whole of revelation is largely concerned with this object, namely the removal of all things that bar the accomplishment of the Divine purpose and this is what redemption and resurrection are all about and without them, such fruition would be impossible.

It is important to note that all enemies go under the feet of Christ (an Eastern figure of a conqueror), whereas the redeemed go under His headship, and the reign of Christ as King of kings and Lord of lords will not cease until this is accomplished. When this state of things has been reached:

> ". . . . . When all things have been subjected unto Him, then shall the Son also Himself be subjected unto Him that did subject all things unto Him, that God may be all in all" (xv. 28 R.V.).

Here we must take great care to note exactly what is said, for all sorts of wrong conceptions have sprung from a misreading of this verse. Many misread it as reading ". . . . . then shall the Son also Himself be subjected unto Him that did subject all things unto Him, that the Father may be all in all". This is the result of an erroneous conception of the Godhead in which the Father is God and the Son takes a lesser place in the Godhead. This is a confusing of status with role and operation. Oscar Cullman is right when he states "to speak of the Son has meaning only in reference to God's revelatory action, not in reference to God's being".

The revelation of the Trinity was necessary to carry out the great plan of redemption and victory over Satan, sin and death. We have no means of knowing whether this relationship obtains right throughout eternity, for Scripture does not inform us and it is foolish to speculate. Some have made up their minds that such a relationship is eternal, hence their substituting, in their minds at least, the Father in place of God in verse 28.

When the great goal has been reached at the end of the ages, it is not the Father, Son, or Holy Spirit that is said to be "all in all", but GOD, without any reference to any such relationship or need of mediation in the realized Kingdom of God and we should be content to leave it there.

The verse that follows is problematic and has lead to all sorts of extraordinary ideas in interpretation:

> "Else what shall they do who are baptized for the dead? If the dead are not raised at all, why are they baptized for them? (xv. 29 R.V.).

Some, like the Mormons, think this teaches baptism for the dead by proxy. Others teach that Paul is referring to those who were baptized on the basis of the testimony of some who had died. Yet another view postulates that such baptism refers to young converts who took the place of older brethren who had died. The difficulty lies in the preposition huper, "on behalf of". With regard to the Mormon view, there is no evidence that a rite of this kind arose at any time in the first century. There is nothing like it till the second century and then only in connection with heretics like the Marcionites, and in any case, knowing the Apostle's horror of false teaching, we should expect him to expose its falsity had it occurred at Corinth.

One thing is quite clear, namely that water baptism, symbolizing death, burial, and resurrection, would have no point if there was no resurrection. The rite would have been empty and meaningless. Dr. E. W. Bullinger suggests there is the figure Ellipsis here and by supplying the words "it is" as the translators have done in Rom. viii. 34, the verse then reads "What shall they do who are being baptized? It is on behalf of the dead if the dead rise not at all". He points out that nekros 'dead', with the article as is the verse we are considering, usually means dead bodies, whereas without the article it refers to dead people.

We believe this to be the best solution of the difficulty that confronts us in verse 29. It fits perfectly with the context and is in harmony with the verse that follows, "why do we also stand in jeopardy every hour?" What point would there be in incurring continual dangers that accompanied his apostleship if death was the end of everything? "In death oft" he wrote in his second letter to the Corinthian church (II Cor. xi. 23). We come to another problem in verse 32. What did he mean by fighting with beasts at Ephesus? He could not have been exposed literally to wild animals in the arena unless he had lost his Roman citizenship, of which there is no evidence whatsoever. It looks as though he was using it metaphorically of his enemies. "I die daily", he declared, that is, he was daily exposed to the risk of death, and if "merely as a man" he faced this then there was no point in it without the Christian hope.

Heroditus, of Ephesus, had described his countrymen as "wild beasts" 400 years before. Likewise Epimenedes called the Cretans "beasts" (Titus i. 12), and Ignatius, later on, described himself as "fighting with wild beasts, being bound to ten leopards" by which he meant a detachment of soldiers who were guarding him. The whole point is that such experiences were valueless if there was not the hope of resurrection; why not seek to avoid all such difficulty and danger? Why not "eat and drink, for tomorrow we die"? (32). This is a quotation from Isa. xxii. 13, but with a different context. Note Paul does not add the words "and be merry", as many do who misquote it without the solid hope of eternal life. There is little to be merry about in a world that is dominated by sin, death and disappointment.

From Darkness to Light

No.1. Two Covenants Compared.

pp. 213 - 216

Just as hyper-Calvinism has led some of its advocates to take II Cor. iii. 5 out of its context and, shorn of its place in the Apostle's argument, make it bolster up their doctrine of decrees, extending what Paul here refers to the matter of sufficiency in ministry, to practically everything, so there are those who have seized upon the words "the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life" to justify their attitude to the Word of God, deriding a faithful adherence to the actual language and grammar of holy Writ as a slavish bondage to "the mere letter" and magnifying their supposed enlightened and independent attitude to "the spirit". The Apostle is not speaking of the Scriptures, but of two covenants, the one having been written on tables of stone, the other being written on the heart, the one being denominated "letter" and the other "spirit".

The two essential differences between these two covenants is the difference of life and death:

> "For the letter KILLETH, but the spirit QUICKENETH."

Writing out of his own experience, Paul said later concerning the law:

> "For I was alive without the law once: but when the commandment came, sin revived, and I died" (Rom. vii. 9).

Just as he places the two covenants in such strong antithesis in II Cor. iii., so in Rom. viii., he says:

> "For the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death" (Rom. viii. 2), and in Galatians he said:

> "For I through the law am dead to the law, that I might live unto God" (Gal. ii. 19), and again:

> "If there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law" (Gal. iii. 21).

The comparison between the two covenants that commences with the contrasting features of life and death, pass by an easy transition to a comparison between the transient glory of the one to the lasting glory of the other, summed up in the last verse of the chapter in the words "From glory to glory".

The Old Covenant is called	The New Covenant is called
(1) The ministration of death.	The ministration of the Spirit.
(2) The ministration of condemnation.	The ministration of righteousness.

Related to these comparisons is the word "glory". The law of Mount Sinai "was glorious", not only in the magnificence and terror that accompanied the giving of the law, but in the extraordinary effect the receiving of the law had upon Moses. "His face shone" so that the children of Israel could not stedfastly behold the face of Moses "for the glory of his countenance". Yet that glory was transient, "which glory was to be done away". The glory of the New Covenant is expressed in such terms as "rather glorious", "exceed in glory", "the glory that excelleth", and the difference between the two covenants is summed up in the words:

> "For if that which is done away was glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious" (II Cor. iii. 11).

To enforce this fact upon the heart and conscience of his hearer, Paul proceeds to enlarge the reference to the glory of the face of Moses:

> "Seeing then that we have such hope, we use great plainness of speech: and not as Moses, which put a veil over his face" (II Cor. iii. 12, 13).

The word translated "plainness of speech" parrhesia is rendered many times "boldness" as in Eph. iii. 12, but the actual composition of the word and its usage here in II Cor. iii. and elsewhere indicate that "plainness" is the prime meaning of the term.

> "And He spake that saying openly" (Mark viii. 32).
> "For there is no man that doeth anything in secret, and he himself seeketh to be known openly. If thou do these things, show thyself to the world" (John vii. 4).
> "Howbeit no man spake openly of Him for fear of the Jews" (John vii. 13).

Speaking "openly" in the face of foes becomes speaking "boldly", but the primary idea of something open, frank, sincere, plain must never be forgotten.

"These things have I spoken unto you in proverbs: but the time cometh, when I shall no more speak unto you in proverbs, but I shall show you plainly of the Father" (John xvi. 25). Here proverbial and parabolic speech is put over against speaking "plainly". So the reference to Moses in no way implies that Moses was cowardly and that Paul was "bold", but that Moses used a "veil" and that Paul spoke "plainly".

> "And not as Moses, which put a veil over his face, that the children of Israel could not stedfastly look to the end of that which is abolished."

The word translated 'abolish' is katargeo, from kata intensive, and argos inactive, useless, inoperative. Into the word 'abolish' there has crept in modern use, the idea of destruction which does not reside in the etymology of the word, or in its usage. "Abolish" is derived by some etymologists from the Latin aboleo "To grow out of use" and is synonymous with "abrogate, annul, disannul, cancel and revoke, and is applied especially to laws, customs, institutions or offices". By Greek writers the word katargeo was particularly applied to land, as in Luke xiii. 7 "Why combereth it the ground?" Like practically every word in human speech, katargeo is used not only in the primary sense of abrogation, but in the derived senses that are the consequences of this abrogation, namely "to be destroyed", "to be delivered", "to be done away".

The primary sense is found in such a passage as:

> "Do we then make void the law?" (Rom. iii. 31).

In such passages as "she is loosed from the law of her husband" and "Now we are delivered from the law", the consequences of this abrogation are stated. The primary meaning of katargeo is restored if the sentence is put in reverse:

> "The law of her husband has been abrogated (by his death)" (Rom. vii. 2).
> "That law which held us is abrogated, because we have died to it" (Rom. vii. 6).

The use of katargeo in I Corinthians should be studied as a preparation for its use here in II Cor. iii.:

> "Whether there be prophecies, they SHALL FAIL."
> "Whether there be knowledge, it SHALL VANISH AWAY."
> "When that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part SHALL BE DONE AWAY."
> "When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child: but when I became a man, I PUT AWAY childish things" (I Cor. xiii. 8-11).

Here the Apostle places in contrast Pentecostal gifts and love, illustrating the point by the comparison between the thoughts and ways of infancy with those of a man, or contrasting the perfect with the partial. This method he employs in II Cor. iii. and iv., but in this passage he contrasts the transient glory of the Old Covenant with the glory that excelleth of the New Covenant, and finds an illustration in the fact that Moses veiled his face to prevent Israel from perceiving that the glory received on Sinai was passing, in contrast with the face of Jesus Christ, Whose glory abides.

The introduction of the figure of the veil at verse 13, like the mention of the tables of stone in verse 3, leads to a development of the new idea. The presence of the word "veil" in I Cor. iii. 14, 15 and 16 is evident, but it is itself veiled by the A.V. in verse 18, where we read "open face", and in II Cor. iv. 3 where it is translated "hid".

To the more careful consideration of the "veil" in these passages and the true intention of II Cor. iv. 3 and 4 we must devote ourselves in another study.

No.2. The Veil.
pp. 221 - 224

In the physical world darkness is just absence of light. No effort is needed to dispel the darkness of a room before light can be admitted. So, in the passage before us, darkness is brought about by interception, and the interception is set forth under the figure of a veil. Veils in the Scripture are used either for covering, as the veil used by Ruth, the same word being translated "mantle" in Isa. iii. 22. Another kind of veil is mentioned in Isa. iii. 23, the Hebrew word here used radid means "to descend", and then "to subdue, and bring into subjection". This veil not only reached down to the feet, but suggested at the same time some element of subordination. The veil of the Tabernacle and Temple was a "separator", the Hebrew baroketh meaning to break, to interrupt, "the Holy Ghost thus signifying that the way into the Holiest of all was not yet made manifest". The veil used by Rebekah is called a tsaiph, from a Hebrew word meaning to double. The figure of a veil is used by Isaiah in much the same way as it is used by Paul in II Cor. iv.

> "And He will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations" (Isa. xxv. 7).

This passage not only provides a parallel with II Cor. iv., but a closer examination reveals connections that, though obvious to a Hebrew using his native tongue, would be for ever "veiled" to an English reader.

The word veil that is found in Isa. xxv. is the Hebrew word masekah. Masak "to mingle" gives us the word meaning a veil, from the idea of the weaving or mingling of the threads, and so an unpenetrable hedge of thorns is mesukah (Micah vii. 4). All this is on the surface, and needs no great intimacy with the Hebrew language to discover. But no one but a Hebrew speaking his own language would see any connection between Isa. xxv. 7 which speaks of a veil, and Isa. xxv. 6 which speaks of wine purified from its lees or dregs, and no one but a Hebrew could have associated the adulteration of wine, as Paul has done in II Cor. ii. 17, with a veil (II Cor. iii. 13 - iv.6). Yet the 'mingled' wine of Isa. v. 22; the cup in the hand of the Lord full of "mixture" (Psa. lxxv. 8); the 'hanging' for the door of the Tabernacle (Exod. xxvi. 36) and the very "covering" of the King of Tyre (Ezek. xxviii. 13) are all variants of the same word in the original. He who mingles water with the wine of the Word, is friend and associate with him who mingles the threads of doctrine so that they form a veil.

We have already emphasized, when commenting on II Cor. ii. 17, that the Apostle was not dealing so much with a flat denial of the truth, but with the more specious, yet none the less deadly "watering down" of the truth. The alternating differences exhibited in II Cor. iii. between the transient glory of the Old Covenant, with the exceeding glory of the New, is after all but the principle of "Right Division" in process of application. This we shall see more clearly when we suggest a new translation of II Cor. iv. 3, 4. Moses placed a veil over his face so that the children of Israel should not perceive that the glory of the Old Covenant was transient, transient, because the covenant itself was to be annulled, abrogated, done away. The custom of wearing the Talith or "Prayer Cloth" over the head when reading the law is highly suggestive. Israel have a veil over their heart, and only when they turn to the Lord shall that veil be taken away. With this reflection, the Apostle turns to the believer, and continues his allegory. He has already emphasized the difference between the letter and the spirit (II Cor. iii. 6) this he now repeats, but turns the mind away from all covenants, whether old or new, to Christ Himself.

> "Now the Lord is that Spirit: and where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty" (II Cor. iii. 17).

Some have taken these words out of their context, and used them as a proof text for the deity of the Holy Ghost, a doctrine, although true, that is not in view in this passage. The "Spirit" pneuma is mentioned seven times in II Cor. iii., and it will be a help in our understanding of verse 17 if we see these passages together. These seven references fall into a pattern and carry the theme of this chapter like a thread carries a string of pearls.

Pneuma* in II Cor. iii.

A |	3. Epistle, written with the Spirit of the living God.	PNEUMA
B |	6. New Covenant. Not letter but Spirit. The Spirit giveth life.	LIFE
C |	8. The ministration of the Spirit, rather Glorious.	GLORY
A |	17. The Lord is the Spirit.	PNEUMA
B |	17. Where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty.	LIBERTY
C |	18. Transfigured from glory to glory by the Spirit of the Lord.	GLORY

It will be seen, that the gift of life is balanced by the gift of liberty and that the "more glorious" character of the New Covenant, is balanced by the change "from glory to glory". Christ, the Lord is the Spirit of the New Covenant, in contrast with Moses whose sphere was in the letter or the Law. To speak of the Lord Jesus Christ as "The Spirit" may seem at first, a trifle confusing. The Companion Bible has a valuable appendix which shows that the word "Spirit" is used of "God" (John iv. 24); of "Christ" (I Cor. vi. 17; xv. 45; and especially II Cor. iii. 17, 18); of "The Holy Spirit", generally with the article denoting the Giver, as distinguished from His gifts.

In I Cor. xv. 45 Christ is placed in contrast with Adam. Adam was made a living "soul", Christ was made a life-giving "Spirit". This statement coming in a chapter devoted to resurrection, which includes a 'body' and in which Christ is called "the firstfruits", shows that the word 'spirit' here must not be taken to indicate incorporeality. The Apostle indeed seems to go out of is way after speaking of a spiritual body, to add "There is a natural (soul-ical) body, and there is a spiritual body" (I Cor. xv. 44). Here the contrast is between Adam and Christ; in II Cor. iii. the contrast is between Moses and Christ. Christ is the Spirit of the New Covenant.

In Rom. viii. 2 we read of "the law of the spirit of life" which is in Christ Jesus, and this "spirit" is expressed in other ways in this chapter, as "the spirit of adoption" as contrasted with "the spirit of bondage", and "the spirit of Christ" without which we are none of His. We have the spirit of "His Son" in association with "the adoption" in Gal.iv.4,5.

In II Cor. v. 16 the Apostle takes us into the realm of the new creation, and says:

> "They call us mad—well, if so, it is for God; or if we be soberminded, it is for you. Our one constraining motive is Christ's love. Since He died for all, all in His death died to sin, and therefore the reason of His death was that we may not live to ourselves, but to Him Who died and rose again for us. From henceforth then, we recognize no relation to Him which is not purely spiritual. Your Jerusalem emissaries boast that they knew the living Christ; and in consequence maintain their superiority to us. If we ever recognized any such claim—if we ever relied on having seen the living Christ—we renounce all such views from this moment. He who is in Christ is a new creation; the old things passed away; lo! all things become new" (II Cor. v. 13-17, Farrar).

The reader will not miss the fact that whereas II Cor. iii. and iv. speaks of the Old and New Covenants, II Cor. v. speaks of the old and new Creations. In both, the old "passes away", in both there is a ministration, "a ministration of the Spirit" (II Cor. iii. 8), "the ministration of reconciliation" (II Cor. v. 18).

In these epistles to the Corinthians Paul has on three occasions adopted similar arguments.

Creation.	The old passes away. Christ after the flesh known no more.
Adam.	In contrast, Christ is a life-giving Spirit.
Moses.	The Old Covenant passes away, Christ is the Spirit of the New.

While each passage has its own set of terms and proceeds along its own lines, there is enough of similarity between them to demand attention.

"Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty" (II Cor. iii. 17). No proof is needed to substantiate the statement "where the sun shines, there is light", and apparently the statement "where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty" should be just as evidently true to the believer. In the context the "Spirit" is opposed to the "letter", the New Covenant to the Old, and consequently bring with them their associated categories "death" and "life". In verse 7 the Apostle calls the Old Covenant "the ministration of death", and we might have expected in the sequel the words "How shall not the ministration of life be rather glorious?" in verse 8, but Paul uses the phrase "the ministration of the Spirit" because "spirit" and "life" were synonymous. Life, light and liberty belong to each other as surely as death, darkness and bondage belong to each other. The blessed deliverance effected by the Gospel can be described as a passing from "death unto life" (John v. 24), or it may be spoken of as being called from “darkness to light” (I Pet. ii. 9); or yet again it may be spoken of as a turning “from Satan unto God” (Acts xxvi. 18); or once again it can be described as a deliverance from “the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God” (Rom. viii. 15). The word ‘there’ while used as an adverb of place in English, is also used idiomatically in such statements as “There’s a dear”, “Breathes there a man with soul so dead” and in other ways. It should be remembered that the word here in II Cor. iii. 17 is the adverb ‘there’ “in that place”, and when reading the sentence a slight stress should be put on the words “where” and “there”. This leads us to verse 18, the open face, the seeing through a glass darkly, the change, and the transition “from glory to glory” which are important enough to demand a study to themselves.

The Glorious Liberty of the Children of God

> "Ye have heard of my conversation in time past in the Jews' religion, how that beyond measure I persecuted the Church of God, and wasted it . . . . . but when it pleased God, Who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by His grace, to reveal His Son in me . . . . ." (Gal. i. 13-16).

If we were addicted to making pilgrimages, we might include Rome and Athens, but we should certainly visit the little town of Berea, and the site if possible of the synagogue of the Libertines at Jerusalem. It may be surprising to discover from the Talmud that there were over four hundred synagogues in Jerusalem, and even though we may suspect the customary exaggeration here, yet when we read that there were "Jews out of every nation under heaven" assembled at Jerusalem to keep the feast of Pentecost, and that they were astonished to hear the apostles speak in the language of the country in which they had been born, it would be most natural that each would make his way to that synagogue, however small and remote, where the service would be conducted and the address given in their native language, and one such would be "The synagogue of the Libertines . . . . . and of them of Cilicia" (Acts vi. 9). When we read in Acts vi. 9 of the synagogue of the "Libertines" we must not invest the name with the modern dictionary definition "Loose, licentious or lewd". Dr. Wiesler shows from Tacitus and Philo, that great numbers of Jews of the Provinces had been made slaves during the civil wars, but were afterward given their freedom, and many of them thus "manumitted" with due formalities became Roman citizens, and transmitted this freedom to their children. It is highly probable that Paul himself was a Cilician Libertinus, "a citizen of no mean city", and as he himself said "Born Free".

Acts vi. 9 could be translated:

> "Libertines or freemen from Cyrene, Alexandria, Cilicia and Asia."

We read of our Saviour, that "as His custom was", He attended the synagogue of Nazareth, and it would be the most natural thing in the world of Saul of Tarsus, a citizen of Cilicia to attend "the synagogue of the Libertines . . . . . them of Cilicia", and by so doing, all unconscious of the heart that had planned and the hand that now guided his steps, he was to make that epoch making acquaintance with Stephen and the first principles of the Christian faith, that, ultimately would turn the persecuting self-righteous Pharisee, into the humblest yet boldest champion of the faith, "which once he destroyed".

Here in this synagogue of free men, it pleased God to awaken in Saul of Tarsus those prickings of conscience that were only stilled and sanctified by the interposition of the Lord Himself on that road to Damascus, a spot unmarked by any monument or inscription, but nevertheless one of the most sacred spots on earth to those who being Gentiles, aliens and strangers, having no hope and without God in the world, were to owe under God, the blessed possibility not only of salvation by grace, but of glories undreamed and unrevealed until made known for the first time to "Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles". Paul must have visited that synagogue many times, and it was on one of those visits that he heard Stephen, disputing with the Jews, a dispute that crowned Stephen as the first Christian martyr and changed Saul of Tarsus into the Apostle of the Gentiles. If we compare Stephen's speech with that of Paul's, as recorded in Acts xiii., we shall not be able to resist the feeling that Paul was, perhaps unconsciously following the same pattern. Stephen made three points:

(1) Joseph. "The second time" (Acts vii. 13).
(2) Moses. "The second time" (vii. 35).
(3) Israel. "As your fathers did, so do ye" (vii. 51).

"And Saul was consenting unto his death" (Acts viii. 1). None could resist the wisdom and the spirit in which Stephen spoke. Paul saw Stephen's face as it had been the face of an angel. He heard Stephen declare that he saw the glory of God, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God. He heard him use the title "The Son of Man" and "The Lord Jesus", and he heard Stephen pray for his murderers "Lord lay not this sin to their charge", and yet, he consented unto his death! Nevertheless, it must have burdened the conscience of Saul of Tarsus, a self-righteous Pharisee, that he was obliged to side with such brutality, and stand against such lovely grace, and he found, himself "kicking against the pricks", and so to stifle his conscience, and to 'prove' to all that he had no sympathy with this heresy, he desired letters to Damascus to stamp out this superstition; letters however that led straight to that spot "near Damascus" where Saul the Pharisee died and Paul the Apostle was born. In Acts xxii. Paul rehearsed this dreadful experience, saying:

> "Lord, they know that I imprisoned and beat in every synagogue them that believed on Thee, and when the blood of Thy martyr Stephen was shed, I also was standing by, and consenting unto his death, and kept the raiment of them that slew him" (Acts xxii. 18-20).

When in that speech the Apostle reached the words "I will send thee far off to the Gentiles", the storm broke, and he lived again in his own person the martyrdom of Stephen. When Paul saw them "cast off their clothes", he must have remembered that earlier he once had the clothes of those who stoned Stephen laid at his feet. The reference in Acts ix. 5 to "kicking against the pricks" is to the ox-goad, against which a rebellious or back-sliding animal at the plough would be brought up suddenly. We must however remember that our present theme is "Liberty" and attractive as the early days of Paul ever must be, we must move from the synagogue of the Libertines, to become acquainted with a richer liberty than any "freed man" of the time ever knew.

Liberty

The words used in the Original.

There are two forms of the Greek eleutheroo "to set free" found in the N.T., namely eleutheria, and eleutheros.

When we lived at 33, Union Road, Clapham, London, our telephone exchange was Macaulay, and many roads in the vicinity were named after the "Clapham Sect" which under the leadership of Wilberforce brought about the freeing of slaves under the British flag. While this is something for which we must ever be thankful we are conscious that the whole human race, under any and every flag is in bondage, a bondage that no sect or Parliament can touch. We must remember too, that there were many slaves who were members of the early church. Writing to the Corinthians, Paul said:

> "You were a slave when you were called? Never mind. Of course, if you find it possible to get free, you had better avail yourself of the opportunity. But a slave who is called to be in the Lord is a freedom of the Lord, just as a free man who is called is a slave of Christ" (I Cor. vii. 21-23, Moffatt).

When, he said "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus" (Gal. vi. 17), he referred to the "slave owners' stamp" the stigmata, and, champion of liberty as he was, he gladly confessed that he was not merely a "servant" but a "bondslave (doulos) of Jesus Christ" (Rom. i. 1).

Bondage

In the Apostle's day he could speak of Barbarian, Scythian, bond and free, and while some forms of slavery are now obsolete, the bondage of corruption, the yoke of bondage, the bondage of ordinances, the bondage of the fear of death and the bondage of sin, are all alas as evident today as ever.

> "Know ye not, that to whom ye yield yourselves bondslaves to obey, his bondmen ye are to whom ye obey: whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness" (Rom. vi. 6).

It will "put us in the picture" if we consider the law and custom connected with the freeing of a slave, the privileges of a freeman, and the bearing of all this upon the term "adoption". While this has been considered elsewhere, the subject is of such importance that it bears repetition. A slave could be freed by a process called "manumission". North, translating Plutarch, says this about manumission:

> "Then Valerius judging that Vindicius the bond man, had well deserved also some recompense, caused him not only to be manumissed by the whole grant of the people, but made him a freeman of the city besides; and he was the first bondman manumissed that was made a citizen of Rome."

There is a slab in the walls of Delphi that records such a manumission, and contains some terms that are found in the N.T.:

> "Date. Apollo, the Pythian bought from Sosistus of Amphisa for freedom, a female slave, whose name is Nicaea, by race a Roman, with a price of three and half minae of silver."

Note the words "bought with a price", which are actually quoted in I Cor. vi. 20, and would speak movingly to any slaves or freedman in the Church at Corinth. In numerous records of manumission, the enfranchised person is said to be free "to do the things that he will", to which Gal. v. 17 and Rom. vii. 19 are evident allusions. The word exogorazo translated "redeem" in Gal. iii. 13 and iv. 5, Eph. v. 16 and Col. iv. 5, and agorazo refer to the agora or 'market' (Matt. xi. 16).

> "As slaves were bought and sold in the forum (Gk. agora) among other things, the word came to signify also to redeem, and be used of slaves who were bought at a fixed price and set at liberty, whence it is applied to our redemption by the precious blood of Christ" (Parkhurst).

To 'redeem' time, suggests the readiness to snap up a bargain, "to fore-stall" for Christ's sake, even as keen buyers spend many hours waiting for the 'sales' to commence. A "freeman" could be either (1) Liber; (2) Ingennus or "born free"; or (3) Libertinus "made free". One born free could be either (1) civis (citizen) or (2) a Latinus, i.e. occupying a position intermediate between that of a true-born Roman and a foreigner. All this and more would be common knowledge to Paul and to the Church of his day.

The privileges of a free citizen included:

(1) The right of voting in the comitea (Jus Suffragii).
(2) Eligibility for all public offices and magistracies, (Jus Honorium), and
(3) The right of appeal (Jus Provocationis).

This latter right was exercised by Paul when he "appealed" unto Caesar, a right which could not be denied. The Apostle himself was a free-born Roman citizen, and also being a Tarsian "a citizen of no mean city". These features are in the background of those references in the epistles to bondage, freedom, ransom, emancipation and citizenship, and would be more vividly seen and appreciated than they are at the present time.

Now the "glorious liberty of the children of God" involves "the adoption, to wit the redemption of our body" (Rom. viii. 23). To appreciate the Apostle's argument in Galatians iii. and iv., as also that of Rom. viii. 17-23, we must understand the law of adoption, and particularly the Greek law that obtained in Paul's day.

> "The adopted son became a member of the family, just as if he had been born of the blood of the adopter . . . . . As a matter of fact it was by this means that a succession amongst the Caesars was continued. It never descended from father to son . . . . . Nero was the great nephew of his predecessor Claudius, who had adopted him in the year 50A.D." (Septimus Buss).
> "Adoption was called a capitas diminutio, which so far annihilated the pre-existing personality who underwent it, that during many centuries it operated as an extinction of debts" (W. E. Ball).

The reader will not fail to re-read this legal "annihilation" and "extinction of all debts", in a spiritual emancipation as one redeemed by precious blood. Eph. i. 13, 14 probably refers to a Roman form of will. W. G. Ball translates the latter part of the passage:

> "Until the ransoming accomplished by the act of taking possession (of the inheritance)."

"When a slave was appointed heir, although expressly emancipated by the will which gave him the inheritance, his freedom commenced, not upon the making of the will, not even immediately upon the death of the testator, but from the moment when he took certain legal steps, which were described as 'entering upon the inheritance'."

The Epistle of Liberty. GALATIANS.

Elsewhere (in The Apostle of the Reconciliation, and in The Berean Expositor, Volume XXI, pages 207-211), we have set forth the evidence which appears to justify the assertion that Galatians was the first epistle written by the Apostle Paul, and while "Justification by Faith without the works of Law" is easily the prime doctrine there safe-guarded, the words 'liberty' and 'freedom' are key words of this epistle.

Eleutheria/as/oo in Galatians.

A | ii. 4. "Spy out liberty." Paul's stand.
B | iii. 28. "Bond or Free." All one in Christ Jesus.
C | iv. 23, 26, 30, 31. Sinai and Sion. An allegory.
A | v. 1. "Liberty." "Made us free." Stand fast.
B | v. 13. "Serve (as slaves) one another." Not flesh.

After the uncompromising defence of his independent apostleship set forth in chap. i., and indicated by the thrice repeated words "Not, Neither, But" (i. 1; 11, 12; 16, 17), we might have expected that the great doctrine that was being challenged, namely Justification by Faith, would immediately follow in chapter ii. This however does not appear until we read verse 15, the earlier part of this chapter being devoted to the Apostle's stand for freedom.

Paul tells us that he adopted certain measures because:

"Of false brethren unawares brought in, who came in privily to spy out our liberty which we have in Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage: to whom we gave place by subjection, no, not for an hour; that the truth of the gospel might continue with you" (ii. 4, 5).

Let us notice the tactics of those who oppose Christian liberty.

"Brought in unawares" pareisaktos. We can sense the insidious character of these false brethren, for Peter also speaks of such saying:

"But there were false prophets also among the people, even as there shall be false teachers among you, who privily (pareisago same word as above in different grammatical form) shall bring in damnable heresies" (II Pet. ii. 1).

"Crept in unawares" (Jude 4).

This preposition para "beside, alongside" comes in the next word pareiserchomai "to come in privily, or on the side". In purposed contrast we read that Paul "withstood" Peter "to the face" and what he had to say he said unto Peter "before them all" (Gal. ii. 11-14).

"To spy out our liberty which we have in Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage."

No.2. pp. 141 - 146

The Berean Forward Movement need not fear a frontal attack. What has to be watched is the appeal to charity, to not be too "narrow", etc., etc., which will surely come as time goes on. Our safeguard is that we are under an obligation to have a "Form of sound words" given by the Lord to the Apostle Paul, and to pass them on to "faithful men who shall be able to teach". If we keep to this we shall be safe. The one thing that these false brethren in Galatia detested, and which led them to stoop so low, was "the liberty" which these Galatian Christians enjoyed "in Christ Jesus". That their insidious efforts were unhappily successful for a time, we learn from Gal. iv. 9-11:

> "But now, after that ye have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn ye again to the weak and beggary elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage? Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years. I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain" (Gal. iv. 9-11).

These "elements" to which these Galatians were in bondage, belonged to the status of "children":

> "Even so we, when we were children, were bondage under the elements of the world" (Gal. iv. 3), but from this condition they had been redeemed, and had received "the adoption of sons":

> "Wherefore thou art no more a servant (a bond servant), but a son, and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ" (Gal iv. 1-7).

"No, not for an hour."

Upon what a knife edge, sometimes, mighty issues are balanced!

> "To whom we gave place by subjection, NO, NOT FOR AN HOUR; that the truth of the gospel might continue (right through dia meno) with you" (Gal. ii. 5).

What the history of Christian witness would have been had Paul yielded is too distressing to imagine. Thank God that this contingency did not arise—but at what a cost!

The next reference to freedom in this epistle is in chapter iii.,

> "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus" (Gal. iii. 27, 28).

There is an allusion here to the Jewish Prayer Book, which contains the following:

"O Lord our God, King of the Universe,
I thank Thee I was not born a GENTILE.
O Lord our God, King of the Universe,
I thank Thee I was not born a SLAVE.
"O Lord our God, King of the Universe,
I thank Thee I was not born a WOMAN."

Paul, since the age of twelve, when he became "a son of the law", had prayed this prayer. Here, in Gal. ii. 28, he sets all such distinctions aside for ever. All in Christ are "ONE". With the opening of chapter v., and arising out of the allegory of the story of Isaac and Ishmael, comes the clarion cry:

> "Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage . . . . . Christ is become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you as justified by the law: ye are fallen from grace" (Gal. v. 1-4).

Before he reaches the conclusion of this epistle, the Apostle refers to some of the dangers that accompany emancipation. It is only too possible to spell "liberty" as though it means "license".

> "Brethren, ye have been called unto liberty: only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve (douleuo 'serve as a slave') one another" (Gal. v. 13).

Paul could have sung the hymn with a good conscience which contains the words:

"I would not try my soul to save
By works that I have done
But I would work LIKE ANY SLAVE
For love of God's own Son."

It is therefore gloriously consistent for an epistle devoted so passionately to liberty to close with the words:

> "From henceforth let no man trouble me: For I bear in my body the marks (stigmata) of the Lord Jesus" (Gal. vi. 17).

Luther's translation of Galatians was one of the main instruments in promoting the Reformation, and all who have the responsibility of teaching and preaching are urged to give this epistle a prominent place in their witness. We do well to bear in mind always the clarion call of Gal. v.:

> "Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage" (Gal. v. 1).

Let us now turn our attention to the Greek word eleutheroo "to make free", which includes the verse quoted above. There is a joy that cannot be realized at second hand, in watching the evident superintendence of the Holy Spirit of the very words of inspired truth fall into a recognizable pattern. However, the reader can nevertheless appreciate what is here set out. Here are all the occurrences of,

ELEUTHEROO

A | John viii. 32. The truth shall make you free.
Expansion in verse 34, "Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin".
B | John viii. 36. The Son makes free indeed.
C | Gal. v. 1. Stand fast. Yoke of bondage.
A | Rom. vi. 18, 22. Ye became servants of righteousness.
Ye became servants of God "Being made free from sin."
B | Rom. viii. 2. In Christ Jesus, free from sin and death.
C | Rom. viii. 21. Made free from the bondage of corruption.

The key to the involved argument of John viii. 31-58 is the allegory built upon the history of Isaac and Ishmael, developed by the Apostle in Gal. iv., but well known to the Jewish reader. The A.V. prints the word Son with a capital S assuming that John viii. 35 refers to Christ. This is altered in the R.V. The argument is borrowed from Gen. xxi. 10 and quoted in Gal. iv. 30:

> "Cast out the bondwoman and her son: for the son of the bondwoman shall not be heir with the son of the freewoman."

In the verse following in John viii., The Son Who sets us free is of course Christ. The truth makes us free. The Son makes us free. Rom. vi. 18 and 22 repeat, in more doctrinal language, what is recorded in John viii. 32-36. Rom. viii. 2 says:

> "For the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death."

Sonship is the antithesis of slavery, and the key word of Rom. viii. is "sonship". The Greek words huios "son" and huiothesia "to place as a son" or "adoption" are of course linked.

SONSHIP in Rom. viii.

A	1-5-. No condemnation. God sent His Own Son.	(huios)
B	-5-15-. Led by Spirit. Sons now.	(huios)
C	-15-17-. Spirit itself. Sonship (adoption).	(huiothesia)
D	-17-21. Suffering and Glory. Sons manifested.	(huios)
C	22-28. Spirit itself. Sonship (adoption).	(huiothesia)
B	29, 30. Conformed to image of His Son. Then.	(huios)
A	31-39. Who condemns? God spare not His Own Son.	(huios)

In considering the expression "The law of the spirit of life" or "the law of sin and death", we must remember that the word "law" is often used in Scripture in a sense fuller and deeper than the law of Moses. While in the earlier chapters of Romans (ii.-vii.) we are mainly concerned with the law of Moses, at verse 21 of chapter vii., we pass on to the discovery of another law.

> "I find then a law, that, when I would do good, evil is present with me."

From this domination, those who are in Christ Jesus have been set free. Note the emphasis on freedom in Rom. vi. 18, 20, 21, 22; vii. 1; viii. 2 and 21. The apex and crowning glory of the eighth chapter is the central section, Rom. viii. 17-21 which contains the words:

We will reserve final comments on Rom. viii. until we reach the end of this study, for the glorious liberty there revealed of the children of God is the goal to which we press. For the moment, let us pause. We have seen how false brethren brought in unawares could menace our liberty, but we shall only be partly guarded if we do not include the salutary warnings that we find in the closing passages of Galatians, and to which we have made a slight reference.

> "For, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty: only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another. For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this: Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (Gal. v. 13, 14).

The word translated "occasion" is found in Rom. vii. 8, 11 and means:

> "the solid ground from which an impetus is derived: such as a place from which a spring is taken, hence generally a basis of operation. Make not your liberty a position to be taken advantage of by the flesh" (Glynne).

Instead of thus abusing your liberty, rather by love serve one another, and the reason that Paul gives is remarkable, after what he has said concerning the law in the opening verses of chapter v., namely that love "fulfils the law". The superficial believer would take exception to this; he would object that if Paul had occupied four whole chapters in repudiating the law, he would scarcely stultify his argument by now speaking of "fulfilling" it. Such an objection however makes it manifest how little the Apostle's teaching has been appreciated. True the law has been entirely set aside as a means of justification, but it does not mean that the ensuing liberty of the believer is to be a state of lawless license. Far from it. We have been partly prepared for this by the statement that:

> "Faith worketh by love."

Let us hear the Apostle speak for and of his own attitude, as he does in ICor.ix.19-21:

> "For though I be free from all men, yet have I made myself servant > unto all, that I might gain the more.
> And unto the Jews I became as a Jew, > that I might gain the Jews.
> To them that are under the law,
> as under the law,
> that I might gain them that are under the law,
> To them that are without law,
> as without law, > (being not without law to God, but under > the law to Christ)."

Notice Paul's reserve here. Though free from the law and saved only by grace, he was not "lawless", as he reminded the Galatians, who also were not "under the law", that by their attitude to an erring brother, they could bear one another's burdens, and SO FULFIL THE LAW OF CHRIST (Gal. vi. 1, 2).

Again in I Cor. x. 23 he said:

> "All things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient; all things are lawful for me, but all things edify not."
> "Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, that eat, asking no question for conscience sake' (I Cor. x. 25).

He gives no carte blanche to ride rough shod over the weaker conscience of others.

> "In matters where a little consideration and self-denial would save offence, there the strong should give up, and do less than they might; but in matters which affected every day of the year, like the purchase of meat in the open market, or the acceptance of ordinary invitations, then the weak must not attempt to be obtrusive or to dominate."
> "Here as usual, Paul shows himself transcendently superior to the Rabbis. In Abhoda Zara f.8, Rabbi Ishmael lays down the rule that if Israelites 'outside the land' are asked to a Gentile funeral they 'eat the sacrifices of the dead' even if they take with them their own food and are waited on by their own servants" (Farrar).

What about conscientious scruples?

What a wonderful conception of Christian liberty as opposed to bigoted license is the Apostle's word:

> "Conscience, I say, NOT THINE OWN, but of the other",

and the injunction:

> "Give none offence, neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, nor to the church of God" (I Cor. x. 29, 32).

If these words were uttered by some, they might have the appearance of laxity, but he who yielded subjection, no, not for an hour, when the truth of the gospel was at stake, shows how possible it is to be "All things to all men" without compromise. Tempered steel bends without breaking.

Another sore point with many believers is the question of holy days and their observance. The comments of Dean Farrar on Rom. xiv. are helpful and somewhat drastic, and have the merit of putting the familiar in unfamiliar dress.

> "Let each party follow their own course if they believe it to be the best but let each abstain from the guilt and folly of condemning one another."
> "Concerted illuminism is as deep an offence against charity as saintly self-satisfaction."
>
> "Let there be no intolerant scrupulosity, and no uncharitable disdain, but an avoidance of dispute and a reciprocal recognition of honest convictions."
>
> "It is in short, condescension towards the weakness of others, a willingness to take less than our due, and a readiness to waive our own rights."
> "Christian love is a thing more precious than even (so-called) Christian liberty."

As to the observance of "days", the Apostle has expressed himself with no uncertain sound in Gal. iv. 10, 11 and in Col. ii. 16, but in Rom. xiv., to quote Farrar again, Paul is seen as:

> "Broad yet sympathetic, inflexible in conviction yet considerate towards prejudice."

In this connection the following from the writings of Dean Alford is interesting, particularly in view of the fact that as Dean of Canterbury, he would naturally be obliged to uphold the observance of Sunday as "the Lord's Day".

> "One man (the weak) esteems (selects for honour) one day above another. Another man (the strong) esteems every day.
> Let each be fully satisfied in his own mind. It is an interesting question, what indication is here found of the observance or non-observance of a day of obligation in the Apostolic times. The Apostle decides nothing, leaving every man's mind to guide him on the point.
> The obvious inference from this strain of arguing is that he knew no such obligation, but believed that all times and days to be, to the Christian strong in faith ALIKE."

Truth out of balance becomes error. We have been called into liberty, we are to stand fast in that liberty, we are to be "stedfast", "unmoveable", yielding in subjection "no, not for an hour" and yet to have consideration for the weak, the bigoted, the ritualist, the rutualist, to be ready to limit our freedom and yield many of our "rights" for the greater claim of the law of Christ, and the law of love, which "stoops to conquer". It is easy for many natures to be rigidly stedfast and yet bitter. It is easy for others to be so yielding as to be too sweet. Grace alone can give us the happy blend.

> "If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed."

No.3. Bondage and Liberty in the O.T.
pp. 161 - 164

There are more ways than one adopted by the writers of the Scriptures to enforce the truth of the doctrines of the faith, and we have reviewed some of the key texts on the subject of Christian liberty in the Gospels and Epistles of the N.T. There is however a rich supply of teaching in the types and shadows of the Law and Prophets, and to a selection of these we now draw the reader's attention. Egypt is called "The house of bondage" ten times in the O.T., eight of these references are found in Exodus and Deuteronomy. Joshua refers to Egypt once under this head and Judges once. It is evident therefore that Israel's sojourn in Egypt and their deliverance by the Lord at the Passover must be given a place in any study of liberty in the Scriptures. A reference to Egypt as a symbol of bondage, is incorporated in the Ten Commandments, for the first commandment of the ten reads,

> "I am the Lord thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage" (Exod. xx. 2).

In the book of Deuteronomy, the law given a "second time", Israel is called to remember that they were bondmen (Deut. v. 15; xvi. 12; xxiv. 18, 22). This "remembrance" was to influence their attitude to any of their brethren who, because of adverse circumstances, had become bond-servants for a period, and similar attitudes of mercy are based upon the fact that Israel had known what bondage meant in Egypt. The reason why Israel should keep the law, do right and good, and observe to do all the commandments is stated:

> ". . . . . Then thou shalt say unto thy son, We were Pharaoh's bondmen in Egypt; and the Lord brought us out of Egypt with a mighty hand . . . . ." (Deut. vi. 20-25).

This is repeated in Deut. vii. 8 with the addition of the words "redeemed out of the house of bondage". This deliverance from bondage is expressed in several ways:

> "To let go" (Exod. v. 1); "to bring out" (Exod. vi. 6); "to deliver" (Exod. iii. 8).

The Exodus.

The twelfth chapter of the book of Exodus is devoted to the deliverance of Israel from Egypt by the blood of the Passover lamb, and to this great type of liberation we now turn.

> "And the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron in the land of Egypt, saying, This month shall be unto you the beginning of months: it shall be the first month of the year to you" (Exod. xii. 1, 2).

Towards the close of this chapter another reminder of time is introduced:

> "Now the sojourning of the children of Israel, who dwelt in Egypt, was four hundred and thirty years. And it came to pass at the end of the four hundred and thirty years, even the self same day it came to pass, that all the hosts of the Lord went out from the land of Egypt. IT IS A NIGHT TO BE MUCH OBSERVED unto the Lord" (Exod. xii. 40-42).

The Passover chapter begins (Exod. xii. 1, 2) and ends on this note of time (xii. 51). We shall evidently gain something for our good if we become more acquainted with what lies behind this section. In Gen. xv. 13-16 the Lord revealed to Abraham that Israel would be a stranger in a land that was not theirs, and they would be afflicted four hundred years, but that in the fourth generation they should return. The reader will observe that in Gen. xv. 13, 400 years are mentioned, whereas in Exod. xii. 40, 430 years are recorded.

This computation is taken from Anstey's The Romance of Biblical Chronology, but there are several ways in which the problem has been settled which we will not produce here.

If we were dealing especially with chronology, several other features would need to be considered, but for the moment we learn from Exod. xii. 40, 41 that in spite of all the resistance put up by Pharaoh, "at the end of the four hundred and thirty years, even the self same day" Israel were delivered. What is of importance to us is to realize that Habakkuk who was baffled because no answer seemed to come to his prayers, and no intervention to the crying wrongs that were his burden, uses the same words "at the end", for the Lord spoke to him, saying:

> "The vision is yet for an appointed time, but at the end it shall speak, and not lie: though it tarry, wait for it; because it will surely come, it will not tarry" (Hab. ii. 1-3).

We return to the time note at the opening of Exod. xii.:

> "This month shall be UNTO YOU the beginning of months: it shall be the first month of the year to YOU."

The stress on the words "to you" indicate some radical change that was being made. The first month of the Jewish year was originally Tisri corresponding with our October, and the Jews still keep their New Year at this date in spite of the insistence of change and the time of their redemption. God begins with Redemption; the believer begins a new life when Christ is seen as his "Passover" (I Cor. v. 7).

The Lamb without blemish.

"A lamb", "The lamb", "Your lamb", such is the progression in verses 3, 4 and 5, as they speak of the shadow and type of the Lamb of God.

> "The whole assembly of the congregation of Israel shall kill it" (Exod. xii. 6).

So even then the type with its many lambs, merges into the one great Passover Lamb of God.

"Your lamb shall be without blemish" (Exod. xii. 5).

The Levitical law is most particular, descending to minute details, that the holiness and perfection of the great Antitype should be ever before the mind:

> "Blind, or broken, or maimed, or having a wen, or scurvy, or scabbed . . . . . bruised, or crushed, or broken, or cut" (Lev. xxii. 22-24), were all rejected. The Lamb was taken on the tenth day of the month and kept until the fourteenth, so that it could be carefully inspected. Luke xxiii. contains a parallel examination of the Lamb of God:

Pilate	"I find no fault in this man."
Herod	"Nothing worthy of death is done unto Him."
Malefactor	"This man hath done nothing amiss."
Centurion	"This was a righteous man."

Matt. xxvii. adds further evidence:

Judas	"I have betrayed innocent blood."
Pilate's Wife	"That just man."

The blood . . . . . a token.

Where the A.V. reads "The Lord set a mark (token) upon Cain" (Gen. iv. 15) it should read "for Cain", as it was for his protection. The bow in the cloud is called the token of the covenant (Gen. ix. 12). This word oth is translated 'sign' many times in Exodus when speaking of the plagues, as in Exod. vii. 3. Moses also used miraculous powers as a sign or token that he had been sent by God (Exod. iv. 8). "The blood" sprinkled on the door post "signified" that life had been taken or laid down, and that in sacrifice.

> "The soul (nephesh) of the flesh is in the blood; and I have given it to you upon the altar to make an atonement for your souls: for it is the blood that maketh an atonement BY REASON OF THE SOUL (or life)" (Lev. xvii. 11, see R.V.).

"I will pass over you."

As the words stand, the impression that the Lord 'passed over' the houses and went on to the houses of the Egyptians. In verse 23 however this idea does not seem fully to fit the statement there made:

> "The Lord will pass over the door, and will not suffer the destroyer to come in unto your houses to smite you."

Here the "passing over" is synonymous with "protecting" and when we read in I Kings xviii. 21 "How long halt ye between two opinions"? Or in Isa. xxxi. 5:

> "As birds flying, so will the Lord of Hosts DEFEND Jerusalem: defending also He will deliver it; and passing over He will preserve it", we perceive that PAUSE OVER is more fitting term. The figure of an eagle "fluttering over" her young (Deut. xxxii. 11) is an evident allusion to the Passover protection. The two side posts and the upper door post were sprinkled, but not the threshold nor the floor. Israel's apostasy is characterized by "Trampling under foot the Son of God, and counting the blood . . . . . common" (Heb. x. 29).

The immediate result of the Passover deliverance was to turn the whole nation into pilgrims:

> "And thus shall ye eat it: > with your loins girded, your shoes on your feet, and your staff in your hand; and ye shall eat it in haste" (Exod. xii. 11).

The nature of the liberation brought about by the Passover is further expanded in such passages as Exod. vi. 6-8:

> "I will bring you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians, and I will rid you out of their bondage, and I will redeem you . . . . . I will bring you in . . . . . I will give it you for an heritage."

Fourteen times we read in Exodus how the Lord "brought out" Israel from Egypt; the last occurrence (Exod. xxxii. 12) being Moses pleading with God:

> "Wherefore should the Egyptians . . . . . say, For mischief did He bring them out."

"To rid" in Exod. vi. 6 is the translation of the Hebrew natsal and is used of "spoiling" the Egyptians (Exod. iii. 22; xii. 36) and means to snatch out of danger, to pull away. "To redeem" in Exod. vi. is the Hebrew gaal to free by avenging, as in the office of the "Kinsman-Redeemer" (Numb. v. 8). Such is the foreshadowed basis of our "glorious liberty".

No.4. The Jubilee.
pp. 181 - 184

Another picture of release from bondage is set forth in Israel's "Jubilee". The A.V. spelling Jubile is ignored in Young's Concordance and we adopt the spelling here as it makes for easier pronunciation. The word, comes from the Hebrew yobel, which is derived from yabal to flow or to go forth as in Isaiah,

> "For ye shall go out (yatsa, as in Exod. xiv. 8 and in the Jubilee, Exod. xxi. 2, 3) with joy, and be led forth (yabal) with peace" (Isa. lv. 12).

The first and last occurrence of the word yobel are Exod. xix. 13 and Josh. vi. 4, 5, 6, 8 and 13, where it is translated in the A.V. "trumpet" and "ram's horns". The remaining twenty occurrences, all of which are found in Leviticus and Numbers are translated by the word "jubilee". The Greek word used in the Septuagint throughout Leviticus and Numbers is aphesis:

> "And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year and proclaim liberty" (Lev. xxv. 10).
> "The spirit of the Lord is upon Me . . . . . to proclaim liberty to the captives . . . . . to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord" (Isa. lxi. 1, 2).

This "year" is called in Isa. lxiii. 4 "the year of the redeemed". Ezek. xlvi. 17 speaks of "the year of liberty". The N.T. uses the word aphesis as follows:

Forgiveness	Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 14 (and four other occurrences).
Deliverance	Luke iv. 18.
Liberty	Luke iv. 18.
Remission	Heb. ix. 22 (and eight other occurrences).

The Institution of the Jubilee.

> "And thou shalt number seven sabbaths of years unto thee, seven times seven years; and the space of the seven sabbaths of years shall be unto thee forty and nine years. Then shalt thou cause the trumpet of Jubile to sound on the tenth day of the seventh month, in the day of Atonement shall ye make the trumpet sound throughout all your land. And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof; it shall be a jubile unto you; and ye shall return every man unto his possession, and ye shall return every man unto his family" (Lev. xxv. 8-19).

The Jubilee and the day of Atonement belong to Israel as a redeemed people and not otherwise. The year of Jubilee was ushered in by the sound of a trumpet (Lev. xxv. 9). The sounding of the trumpet on the 10th day of the seventh month is "the last trump" of Israel's festal year, and the type of the "last trump" of I Cor. xv. 50-57. The Jubilee trumpet not only means deliverance for Israel, but the overthrow of Israel's enemies, for the very word which is translated "Jubilee" is translated "ram's horns" in Josh. vi. And here again the seven times encompassing of the city and the blowing of the seven trumpets perpetuates the symbolism. The symbolism of the Jubilee anticipates:

> The bondage suffered was limited in duration to the fiftieth year, and of the freed man it is said:
> (1) He shall go out (because redeemed Exod. xii. 41).
> (2) He shall return to his possessions and to his family (Lev. xxv. 10).

These blessed results find an echo in Ephesians, for there we read not only of release ("forgiveness" Eph. i. 7), but of the redemption of a purchased possession, and "the day" of redemption (Eph. i. 14; iv. 30), and also of the family to which restoration was promised (Eph. iii. 15). We turn therefore from the O.T. type to the N.T. reality, and consider what is involved in the words of Rom. viii. 21:

Children of God (teknon) are mentioned three times in Rom. viii.:

(1) "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God" (Rom. viii. 16).
(2) "If children then heirs" (Rom. viii. 17).
(3) "The creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God" (Rom. viii. 21).

The 'bondage' here, is called "the bondage of corruption", and for this reason, that when this glorious liberty is entered it will also be "the redemption of the body" in resurrection.

In the course of answering the question "How are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come?" the Apostle used a term in I Cor. xv. 37 that should be given careful consideration. Firsts he utters a truth, which is all important:

> "That which thou sowest is not quickened except it die" (I Cor. xv. 36).

This is in line with the words of Christ:

> "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit" (John xii. 24).

We quote from the writings of Professor Godet here:

> "The death of the seed, the condition of its return to life, consists in the dissolution of its material wrappings under the action of the earth's moisture and heat. It is by this process of destruction that the impalpable germ of life which dwells in it, and which no anatomist's scalpel can reach, is set free. In proportion to the putrefaction of all the material elements takes place, this force awakes and shows itself by the simultaneous appearance, in opposite directions of two vital shoots, the stem and the root."

Now the Greek word translated "grain" in I Cor. xv. 37 is kokkos, the word translated 'corn' in John xii. 24. The etymology of the French language is not our province, but we understand that the Greek kokkos gives us the word cocoon, which we have borrowed from the French. A cocoon, as we all know, is the outer covering of silky hairs with which the pupa or chrysalis of many insects, the silkworm for example, is protected. While the Apostle limits his example to the miracle of seed growth via death, God in nature has set before us a most wonderful illustration and answer to the question "How are the dead raised up and with what body do they come?"

First.	The depositing of the egg.
Second.	The caterpillar stage.
Third.	The chrysalis or pupa stage.
Fourth.	The emergence of the perfect butterfly or moth.

These four stages are repeated in the movement from the natural man's conversion until the entry into resurrection life and glory.

Stage one. The deposit of the egg.

When a natural man becomes a believer, a new life commences:

> "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin: for his seed remaineth in him: and he cannot sin, because he is born of God" (I John iii. 9).

We remember that John has previously said:

> "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us."
> "If we say that we have not sinned, we make Him a liar, and His word is not in us" (I John i. 8, 9).

Here the "truth" and the "Word" abiding in us does not mean that we never fall into sin.

It should be noticed that I John iii. 9 does not say whosoever is born of God never falls into sin, but does not COMMIT sin, and an examination of John's use of the Greek verb poieo will be helpful here. We find that John in his epistle is but expanding and applying what the Saviour said and what John himself recorded in his "Gospel".

Poieo in John viii. 34 - 44.

> "Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin."
> "I speak that which I have seen with My Father: and ye do (commit) that which ye have seen with your father."
> "If ye were Abraham's children, ye would do (commit) the works of Abraham."
> "This did (committed) not Abraham."
> "Ye do (commit) the deeds of your father."
> "Ye are of your father the Devil, and the deeds of your father ye will to do (commit)" (John viii. 34, 39, 40, 41, 44).

So in I John iii. 8, 9, the same doctrine is maintained, "He that committeth sin is of the Devil; for the Devil sinneth from the beginning. For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the Devil". "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin: for his seed remaineth in him." "In this the children of God are manifested, and the children of the devil." Here we are face to face with the "two seeds" once again, a subject of profound difficulty that meets us in the primeval prophecy of Gen. iii. 15, and in parable form in Matt. xiii. 36-42.

No.5. pp. 201 - 203

We move on now to Rom. viii. where the actual words "The glorious liberty of the children of God" are found. We shall find upon studying this majestic chapter that it is dominated by the word huios "son" or huiothesia "adoption" or "the placing of a son as heir"; and as "the glorious liberty" which is contained in the title of these studies is taken from Rom. viii., so it is fitting that all that has been here written should lead up to and be crowned by the teaching of this great passage. We repeat the outline of Rom. viii.:

SONSHIP in Rom. viii.

A |	1-5-. No condemnation. God sent His Own Son.	(huios)
B |	-5-15-. Led by Spirit. Sons now.	(huios)
C |	-15-17-. Spirit itself. Sonship (adoption).	(huiothesia)
D |	-17-21. Suffering and Glory. Manifestation.	(huios)
C |	22-28. Spirit itself. Sonship (adoption).	(huiothesia)
B |	29, 30. Conformed to image of His Son. Then.	(huios)
A |	31-39. Who condemns? God spare not His Own Son.	(huios)

While every section of this mighty chapter is of supreme importance, we must limit ourselves in the study to the central section of the structure, which contains the reference "The glorious liberty of the children of God" namely "D | viii. -17-21. Suffering and Glory. Manifestation. (huios)." The doctrinal portion of Romans (chapters i.-viii.) contain references to "hope", and they are as follows:

Hope in Rom. i. - viii.

A |	iv. 18. HOPE in spite of deadness of self. A Son.
B |	v. 2. HOPE arising out of peace and justification.
C |	v. 4. HOPE realized in experience and patience.
D |	v. 5. HOPE and Love of God. Unashamed.
A |	viii. 20. HOPE in spite of vanity and corruption. Sonship.
B |	viii. 24. HOPE leading to complete salvation.
C |	viii. 25. HOPE express in patient and waiting.

These seven references have this in common, they all speak of resurrection, and the utter failure of the flesh.

> "For we are saved by hope: but hope that is seen is not hope: for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for? But if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it" (Rom. viii. 24, 25).

The outstanding quality of this hope is that it is not seen. The faith which is "the substance of things hoped for" in Heb. xi. is linked with "the evidence of things not seen".

In II Cor. v., in connection with "the groan" of creation and the believer, we find the earnest expectation of resurrection, and in II Cor. iv. we shall find the same sequence as in Rom. viii., sufferings not worthy to be compared with the glory that is to be revealed.

> "For the which cause we faint not; but though the outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day. For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; while we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal: but the things which are not seen are eternal. For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God . . . . . For in this we groan, earnestly desiring . . . . . our house from heaven . . . . . God hath given us the earnest of the spirit" (II Cor. iv. 16 - v. 8).

If everyday's experience presses upon us the consciousness of creation groan, may it also cause us to appreciate more fully the blessed teaching represented by the fruits of the spirit, the spirit of sonship, the unseen pledge of things to come. It will help us to see the structure of the section that contains the reference to the glorious liberty of the children of God, Rom. viii. 17-21.

Romans viii. 17 - 21.

A | 17. SUFFERING and GLORY. |
a | Joint heirs sun.
b | Suffer together sun.
a | Glorified together sun.
B | 18. REVELATION of GLORY. (apokalupto). |
c | Reckoning.
d | Present suffering.
c | Comparing.
B | 19. REVELATION of SONS. (apokalupsis). |
c | Expectation.
d | of creature.
c | Revelation.
A | 20, 21. LIBERTY and GLORY. |
a1 | Subjection of creature.
b | In hope.
a2 | Emancipation of creature.
b | From bondage.
a3 | Liberty of children.

"I reckon" said the Apostle, and before we hear him belittle the things which he endured for Christ's sake, let us extract but one passage out of many:

> "In labours more abundant,
> In stripes above measure.
> In prisons more frequent.
> In death oft.
> Of the Jews five times received I
> Forty stripes save one.
> Thrice was I beaten with rods,
> Once was I stoned,
> Thrice I suffered shipwreck,
> A night and a day I have been in the deep;
> In journeyings often,
> In perils of waters,
> In perils of robbers,
> In perils by mine own countrymen,
> In perils by the heathen,
> In perils in the city,
> In perils in the wilderness,
> In perils in the sea,
> In perils among false brethren,
> In weariness and painfulness,
> In watchings often,
> In hunger and thirst,
> In fastings often,
> In cold and nakedness.
> Beside those things that are without,
> that which cometh upon me daily,
> The care of all the churches" (II Cor. xi. 23-28).

Here Paul gives one side of his balance account. The other side was the glorious liberty to which stood fast, and for which he counted all things but loss. His sufferings were a light affliction, and but for a moment, but were completely eclipsed by the far more exceeding weight of glory that is yet to be experienced in resurrection life.

STAND FAST TO THE LIBERTY.

The Inspiration and Canon of the Scriptures.

No.3. pp. 10 - 12

"Canon." Both 'canon' and 'cannon' come from the same Greek word which primarily meant something "straight", thus a 'cane' or 'reed' and so a 'rule' (Gal. vi. 16; Phil. iii. 16). Three terms used in this connection must be understood. They are genuine, authentic, and authoritative.

Genuine. A book is genuine if it was actually written by the person whose name it bears; or, if it be anonymous, it is genuine if it contains evidence that it was written at the time when it purports to have been written.

Authentic. A book is authentic if the matters of fact with which it deals actually occurred.

Authoritative. If any book of Scripture is either genuine or authentic or both, then it must necessarily be authoritative by its very nature.

Before the Christian era, the canon of the O.T. was fixed, "The Law, the Prophets and the Psalms" (Luke xxiv. 44). To this we have many witnesses. One is Josephus, who lived during the time of Paul, and of whom Scalinger says he "deserves more credit than all the Greek and Roman writers put together". Josephus says:

> "Nothing can be better attested than the writings authorized among us. In fact, they were never subject to any difference of opinion. It is therefore impossible to see among us, as among the Greeks, a vast multitude of books disagreeing with and combating one another. We have only twenty-two, which comprehend all that has taken place among us and which we have just ground for believing. Although so many centuries have already passed away, no person has ever dared to add, or to take away, or transpose anything" (Critia Apion, Bk. 1 par. 8).

Origen, Athanasius and Cyril give the same testimony.

Twenty-two books. In the English Bible there are 39 books. The difference is due to the fact that whereas we reckon the twelve Minor Prophets "twelve"; in the Hebrew they count as one. So also Ruth is reckoned with Judges, I and II Samuel reckon as one. We will set the O.T. books according to the Hebrew canon.

THE LAW (Torah).

A | GENESIS. The Beginning.
The nations and "the great nation".
B | EXODUS. Redemption.
The nation formed and separated.
C | LEVITICUS. Worship.
The nation trained "a kingdom of Priests".
B | NUMBERS. Wandering.
The nation's failure—finally blessed.
A | DEUTERONOMY. The End.
"The second time." Ready to enter the land.

The Prophets (Nebi'im).

A | JOSHUA.—"The Lord of all the earth."
Joshua the leader.
B | JUDGES AND RUTH.—Forsaking and returning. Israel.
C | SAMUEL.—Man's king rejected.
D | KINGS.—Failure of kings of Israel and Judah.
D | ISAIAH.—Blessing only under God's king, the Messiah.
C | JEREMIAH AND LAMENTATIONS.—Human kings rejected.
B | EZEKIEL.—Forsaking and Returning. The Lord.
A | THE MINOR PROPHETS.—"The Lord of all the earth."
Joshua the High Priest.

The Psalms (Kethubim. The Writings).

A | THE PSALMS.—Personal experience and future prophecy.

A | CHRONICLES.—Past history and foreshadowed future.

Gaussen, in his book on the Canon, adduces sixteen facts. We give a summary here:

(1) Almost every crime is charged against Israel except one. They were never charged with the falsification of the sacred books. "To them were entrusted the oracles of God."

(2) Christ said that they did not 'believe' Moses, but that they 'trusted' Moses who condemned them.

(3) The Apostles never accused Israel of unfaithfulness to their trust as custodians of the Holy Scriptures.

(4) Two witnesses of repute confirm this: Josephus and Philo. Both of them were learned men, both men of repute, both Pharisees, both of the line of Aaron.

(5) From the dawn of the Christian era, for nineteen centuries of rebellion, scattering and persecution, Israel has never relinquished the Scriptures.

(6) After thirty four centuries, the Jews from every quarter of the world receive only one canon. This identity of the copies of the Hebrew Scriptures is an astonishing phenomenon.

(7) In contrast stands the rapid deterioration of the many versions.

(8) While the Jews are divided into different and conflicting sects, all alike hold the canonical Scriptures.

(9) The law was placed in the Ark; death penalty was pronounced against the false prophet; the law was publicly read every seven years; the newly crowned king had to make a copy with his own hand.

(10) An unbroken chain of witnesses (the prophets) kept the canon alive.

(11) The calamities of the Jews: (a) Destruction of the Temple; this gave rise to "the synagogue in every city". (b) Their signatures; this gives a check on the text. (c) Loss of their language; this led to the formation of the class called "Scribes", the Targums (Chaldee paraphrases). (d) Oppression led to the Greek version known as the Septuagint. (e) The dispersion led to the Massorah, a collection of traditions, grammatical and other details relative to the sacred text, or called "The Fence of the Law".

(12) The miraculous preservation of the Jew is a pledge that his sacred Scriptures will be as faithfully preserved.

(13) No pressure or inducement could persuade the Jew to accept the Apocryphal books foisted upon the canon by Rome.

(14) "The Trent Catechism of the Orthodox Catholic Eastern Church" protests against including the Apocrypha.

(15) This was also the testimony of the whole Western Church until the Council of Trent.

(16) Neither the Septuagint nor the Latin versions could keep the Apocrypha out, but Israel did.

No.3. The Canon of the N.T.
pp. 37 - 40

There are twenty-seven books in the N.T. canon, and Michaelis says that, in the case of the N.T., the testimony is much stronger than in the case of any other ancient writings, for the books of the N.T. were addressed to large societies in many distant parts of the world, in whose presence they were often read, and who acknowledged them as the autographs of the writers themselves. Unlike other writings that have come down to us from antiquity, those of the N.T. were read over three-quarters of the known world, and an unbroken succession of writers, from the very age of the apostles to our own time, both friend and foe, make continual reference to them and give quotations from them.

Translations.

Before the close of the second century, translations of the N.T. had been made. This would effectively prevent alterations, additions, or subtractions, for such a fraud would immediately become known and exposed.

The Encyclopaedia Britannica, third edition, says:

> "This argument is so strong, that, if we deny the authenticity of the N.T., we may with a thousand times greater propriety reject all the other writings in the world."

A few facts.

(1) It cannot be shown that any one doubted the authenticity of any book of the N.T. in the period when such books appeared.
(2) There is no record that would lead one to reject any such books as spurious.
(3) No great length of time elapsed after the death of the writer before the N.T. was widely known.
(4) The books of the N.T. are actually mentioned by writers living at or near the same time as the Apostles.
(5) No facts are recorded of what actually happened after the deaths of the writers, apart, of course, from prophecy.

Some outstanding witnesses.

Irenaeus, born 120A.D., calls the books of the N.T. "The Rule of Truth", Tertullian said of Marcion, the Gnostic, that he appeared to make use of "a complete document". Clement of Alexandria exclaims against any other authority besides "the true evangelical canon". Origen was zealous in maintaining the "Ecclesiastical Canon'", and recognized "Four Gospels only, which alone are received without controversy in the universal church spread over the whole earth".

Athanasius speaks of three sorts of books:

(1) The canonical, those recognized at the present time.
(2) The ecclesiastical, which were allowed to be read in assemblies.
(3) The apocryphal, which had no place in the canon at all.

Irenaeus (120-202A.D.), educated under Polycarp who knew the Apostle John personally, Clement of Alexandria (150-215A.D.), Tertullian (155-230A.D.), are three men representing three great areas, Greek, Coptic and Latin, who are witnesses that cannot be decried.

Irenaeus speaks of the four Gospels as "the gospel with the four faces". He quotes the Acts over sixty times and shows the harmony of the Acts with Paul's epistles. He cites I Corinthians over 100 times, Romans over 80 times, Ephesians over 30 times, Galatians nearly 20 times, Colossians 20 times, II Corinthians 18 times, Philippians 11 times, I Peter 11 times, II Thessalonians 10 times, I Timothy 5 times, II Timothy 4 times, Titus thrice, I John thrice and I Thessalonians twice.

As it is impossible to quote books that do not exist, it is evident that all these books of the N.T. were well known early in the second century.

The testimony of enemies.

Irenaeus wrote a book against Heresies. As an example let us take the heretic Valentine and his disciples. In order to uphold their peculiar fables about "Aeons" they quote or make use of the following books of the N.T.:

The Gospels—Matt. 5:13, 14, 18; 8:9; 10:21, 34; 13:33; 20:1-16; 26:38, 39, 46; Mark 5:31; Luke 2:28, 36, 42; 3:17, 23; 6:13; 7:8, 35; 8:41; 9:37, 38, 60-62; 14:27; 15:4-8; 19:5; John 1:1-5, 14; 12:37.
The Epistles—Rom. 11:16, 36; I Cor. 1:18; 2:6, 14, 15; 11:10; 15:8, 48; Gal. 6:14; Eph. 1:10; 3:21; 5:13, 32; Col. 1:16; 2:9; 3:11.

Twenty-one other heretics are named, and their mishandling of the N.T. exposed, but how could Irenaeus expose this mishandling if the N.T. books were not already in existence and of recognized authority?

Further witnesses.

Barnabas, 71A.D; Clement of Rome, 69-100A.D.; Hermas, 100A.D.; Ignatius, 107A.D.; Polycarp, 71-166A.D. Dr. Lardner in his Credibility of the Gospel History, found allusions or quotations in these five early writers to every book of the N.T.

Catalogues.

There are three ancient catalogues, written before the Council of Nice. The first goes back to about the time of the death of John. The second, to the beginning of the third century, the last to the beginning of the fourth. The first is derived from the ancient Syriac version of the N.T. called the Peshitto, or "Simple". The second is supplied by Origen. The third by Eusebius in the third book of Ecclesiastical History.

The Peshitto version contains the whole of the N.T. except the Apocalypse, and the later epistles of Jude, Peter and John. The arrangement of the sacred books is as found in the N.T. today. The omitted books were written too late and at too great a distance for inclusion.

Origen catalogue.

In a commentary alluding to the sounding of the trumpets and the walls of Jericho, Origen makes an allegorical use of the books of the N.T. and enumerates without exception the twenty-seven books of the Canon.

Eusebius.

This historian divides the N.T. into two parts. The homologomena, "The Scriptures universally, unrestrictedly and uniformly recognized from the first as Divine by all churches or ecclesiastical witness", and the Antilogomena, denotes books which, though recognized by most churches or ecclesiastical witness, were not recognized by all such. These are five in number: II Peter, James, Jude, II John and III John. "These though publicly read experience some opposition or were less quoted by ancient witness."

The transmission and preservation of the Hebrew text.

"Some ancient authorities read." These words meet the student of Scripture both in Commentaries and the margin of the R.V. What do they involve? To appreciate their meaning we must be acquainted with the history of the Manuscripts, their transmission, their preservation, their differences and their combined testimony.

The transmission of the Hebrew text.

Every book was of necessity written by hand, and the scribe was hedged about by scruples and directions, which even though to modern minds are petti-fogging, nevertheless preserved the text in a marvelous manner.

A synagogue scroll must be written on the skins of clean animals. The fastenings must be sinews taken from clean animals. Every skin must contain a fixed number of columns throughout the entire scroll. Each column must not be less than forty-eight or more than sixty lines. The breadth must consist of thirty letters. The whole copy must be first lined. If three words be written outside a line it is worthless. Black ink, prepared according to a definite recipe, must be used. Only an authentic copy must be used, and no deviation is permissible. Not the smallest word or letter may be written from memory. Between every consonant must be a hairs breadth. Between every word the breadth of a narrow consonant. Between every new section the breadth of nine consonants. Between every book three lines. The fifth book of Moses must terminate exactly with a line. The copyist must sit in full Jewish dress, wash his whole body, and not begin to write the name of God with a pen not newly dipped in ink. Should even the King address him, he must take no notice of him. Rolls not prepared according to these rules, must not be used in the synagogue, but must be buried or burned, or used as reading books in schools.

A peculiarity that sometimes led to various readings.

Hebrew contains no vowels. Modern Hebrew uses a system of vowel points resembling those used in shorthand. An English illustration may help:

The letters BLL may mean Bill, Bell or Bull. There would be no uncertainty in a sentence that said the Bll was pd or the Bll was tlld or the Bll was fd with grss. Some momentary hesitation may occur if we read that the Bll was Rng, as a bell may be rung, but also may a bull by a ring in the nose, but the context would decide.

No.5. pp. 53 - 56

Owing to the scrupulous care put into these Scrolls, no Hebrew manuscript was allowed to become badly worn before it was discarded; consequently until the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls we did not possess Hebrew MSS earlier than the eighth century. We can go back to the Targums or Chaldee paraphrases to the time between Nehemiah and Christ and eleven such Targums are known.

The Targum of Onkelos is described as "A very simple and literal translation of the Pentateuch, and . . . . . for that reason the more useful as evidence for the Hebrew text from which it was taken" (Kenyon). Onkelos was the disciple of Hillel and Hillel was the grandfather of Gamaliel, at whose feet sat Saul the Pharisee.

The Talmud.

This word is the equivalent to our word "doctrine". The Talmud embodies all that had previously been written, in a series of rules, laws and institutions governing the civil and religious life of Israel.

The Talmud consists of two parts: (1) the Mishna, "the text"; (2) the Gemara, "the completion". Taken together with the Scriptures their testimony is final.

The Sopherim.

The work of the Sopherim dates from the days of Nehemiah and Ezra. Ezra himself was called a "Scribe" (Neh. vii. 4), or one of the Sopherim. The custom of having an interpreter in the synagogue at the reading of the law is referred by the Gemara to Nehemiah viii. 8.

The Sopherim in effect produced an A.V. of the Hebrew Scriptures. The Rabbinical work named Kiddush says "The ancients were called Sopherim 'numberers' because they numbered all the letters of the law; for they said that in Gachon 'belly' (Lev. xi. 42) is the middle letter of the whole book of the law.

The Massorah.

It was the business of the Massorites to preserve this version for all time. With the labour of the Massorites the final stage in the history of the Hebrew text is reached. Masar means "to deliver something into the hand of another". It was a sacred trust. The Massorites had a twofold object:

(1) To preserve a perfect orthoepic standard (i.e. correct pronunciations) of the Hebrew tongue.
(2) To the reading of a correct or inviolate text of the Hebrew Scriptures.

To accomplish this task the Massorites:

(1) Collect all that could be found in the Talmud concerning the traditional vowel points and punctuations, and produced a text with a series of points indicating vowel sounds.
(2) As the Hebrew Bible at that time had neither chapter nor verse, the Massorites divided the several books into: parashiotts "greater sections", sedarim "orders", perakin "chapters" and pesikin "verses".
(3) When the division was completed, the number of verses to each book was notified by a technical word. The middle verse, or clause, or the middle letter were registered, and the number of letters in each book counted.
(4) Notes were made of places where words or letters appeared to have been altered, omitted or added, and the results of this prodigious labour were placed in the margins of the Scrolls.
(5) The Massorites, moreover, introduced a series of accents which were intended to answer four purposes:
    (a) To certify the meaning of words.
    (b) To indicate true syllables.
    (c) To regulate the cantillation (or chanting) of synagogue reading.
    (d) To show the emphasis of an expression.

    The Massorah does not contain comment, and that scrupulous care, even to counting of letters, means that "not one jot or tittle" could be lost without knowledge. Consequently we have in our hands today the standard or Canonical Scriptures as they left the hands of Ezra over 2,360 years ago.

The Versions and Manuscripts.

(1) The Samaritan Pentateuch. This strictly speaking is not a version. It is written in ancient Hebrew, being the oldest Hebrew MSS in existence. The characteristics of the Samaritan Pentateuch point to the circumstances of II Kings xvii. 24-41 for its origin. The adoption of the square Hebrew letters of the Jews was partly because of their antipathy to the Samaritans. This MSS is a most valuable check upon the veracity of the existing Hebrew Books of the Law.

(2) The Septuagint. This version was made in Egypt by Alexandrian Jews, and it was in common use a century before Christ. At the time of Christ, Greek was the literary language of Palestine, Aramaic the spoken language, and Hebrew the tongue of the Rabbis and Students. A large proportion of the O.T. quotations that are given in the N.T. are from the Septuagint (generally abbreviated to LXX).

When the Jews realized what a powerful instrument this version was to the Christians, they repudiated it and another was prepared by a certain Aquila. This is an exceeding literal rendering of the Hebrew, so much so as to be sometimes unintelligible. It is valuable, however, as it indicates clearly the Hebrew text he had before him. This version is dated 150A.D. Another version by a Christian named Theodotion was produced to off-set that of Aquila, but this version is very free in its rendering. Theodotion's version of Daniel was so much better than that in the original Septuagint that it took its place.

About 200A.D. a version was prepared by Symmachus.

> "The special feature of this translation is the literary skill and taste with which the Hebrew phrases of the original are rendered with good and idiomatic Greek" (Kenyon).

(3) The Hexapla of Origen. The great Alexandrian scholar Origen (168-253A.D.), using these versions, produced his monumental work "The Hexapla" or the "Six-fold" version of O.T. Scripture.

As a result of the quickened interest in the LXX, three further editions appeared, one by Eusebius, one by Lucian and one by Hesychius.

Some Ancient Greek MSS.

We have already seen that the oldest Hebrew MSS goes back no further than eighth century. The Greek Manuscripts fortunately go back much further, and of these the most important are:

Codex Sinaiticus (4th century). Indicated by the Hebrew letter Aleph.
Codex Alexandrinus (5th century). Indicated by the letter A.
Codex Vaticanus (4th century). Indicated by the letter B.
Codex Ephraemi (5th century). Indicated by the letter C.
The Cotton Genesis (5th century). Indicated by the letter D.

Some Ancient Versions in other languages.

As the Gospel spread from Palestine, adjoining countries demanded the Scriptures in their own tongues. Accordingly we have:

The Syriac Version. Known as the Peshitto or "Simple" version. This was made about the second or third century after Christ. The copy in the British Museum was made in 464A.D., and is the oldest copy of the Bible of which the exact date is known.

The Coptic Versions. These were produced for use in Egypt. They are important as witnesses to the true text of the Greek N.T., and are of considerable help to the student of the LXX. The two most important are the one prepared for northern Egypt called the Memphitic, and the one prepared for southern Egypt, called the Thebaic, about the third century.

Ethiopic, Armenian, Arabic, Georgian and Slavonic versions appeared.

The Latin Versions.

These versions were demanded by the Roman provinces of Africa. They were defective and contained many pronunciations and defects of African translators. To remedy this a version called the Itala appeared in the second century.

Jerome. What Origen did for the Greek versions, Jerome did for the Latin. He prepared a translation of the O.T. in Latin direct from the original Hebrew, a work that occupied twenty years. This version became known as the Vulgate and was the Bible of the Roman Catholic church and of Europe until the Reformation.

We shall devote a separate study to the Septuagint and to other ancient manuscripts.

No.6. Further notes of the MSS and the pedigree of the R.V.

pp. 75 - 77

The MSS of the Greek N.T. fall into two classes, uncials and cursives. Uncials (from a word meaning "inch") are large capital letters with each letter formed separately; cursives (from a word meaning "running") are smaller letters, written in a running hand and joined together.

Kenyon, Paterson-Smyth, Young's Concordance, The Books and Parchments by F. F. Bruce, M.A., gives plates that exhibits these two forms of writing.

The uncials are the more ancient of the two, the cursives not appearing until the ninth century. The chief uncials are three in number, the Sinaiticus, the Vaticanus, the Alexandrinus. The cursives MSS run into over 2,000.

Codex Vaticanus (4th century). The reader should weigh very carefully any reading favoured by this most venerable MSS. Originally containing the complete Structures, it has suffered loses, and now commences at Gen. xlvi. 28. Psa. cvi.-cxxxviii. are missing also. The N.T. ends at Heb. ix. 4.

Codex Sinaiticus (4th century). Discovered by Constantine Tischendorf in the Monastery of St. Catherine, Mt. Sinai. It passed into the Imperial Russian Library at St. Petersburg, and subsequently was purchased by the British Government. The MSS bears evidence of careful correction from some earlier MSS, and four different scribes were employed upon its original production. As the "corrections" so often agree with the text of the Codex Vaticanus, their united testimony must be considered of extreme weight. Much of the O.T. is missing owing to the ignorance of the monks who used some of the precious pages as fuel!

Codex Alexandrinus (5th century). Like the Vaticanus this originally contained the complete Scriptures, but has suffered some losses in the course of time.

The material of which these ancient manuscripts are composed is parchment. This was not unknown in the days of the Apostles (II Tim. iv. 13), but papyrus was much more common (II John 12). The frail and brittle character of papyrus accounts for the lack of manuscripts of the opening century of the Christian era. Later, the process of preparing the skins of calves was improved, and the use of parchment or vellum became practically universal. The earlier MSS are characterized by the exceeding delicacy of the texture of the vellum used and is one of the evidences of the age of the manuscript. So much was vellum in demand, that earlier writing was erased or "blotted out", and the new writing written across. In many cases however, the older writing can be deciphered. These manuscripts are known as codices rescripti or palimpsest.

The style of writing varied considerably in different periods, and provide very useful criteria as to the age of the manuscript. We have already mentioned the uncials and the cursives. While it is impossible in this study to exhibit to the eye the many details that go to make up this evidence, the student should be aware of their existence. We give two of such forms of evidence here. They are (1) The variations that occur in the construction of the letters of the alphabet, of which alpha, delta, theta, xi, pi and omega provide the clearest evidence. Upright square uncials are more ancient than those which are narrow, oblong or leaning. (2) The formation of dipthongs, the iota ascript, the aspirates, punctuation and various devices for abbreviation, play a considerable part in providing evidence of age.

Ancient versions in various languages.

As no extant Greek MSS is earlier than the fourth century, the versions made in foreign tongues from originals now lost are of extreme value in arriving at the true text. We have already referred to the Peshitto, Egyptian and Latin Versions.

The Syriac Versions. The Peshitto. This language is distinct from Hebrew (Gen. xxxi. 47 margin), and was spoken in Babylon and subsequently throughout Palestine. The Philoxenian Syriac Version, is greatly inferior to the Peshitto both in accuracy and in style; it is however of great value to the textual critic.

The Curetonian Syriac. Dean Alford says of this version "perhaps the earliest and most important of all the versions".

The Latin Versions. A branch of the Church existed in Rome many years before Paul visited this city (Rom. xv. 23), and it is reasonable to suppose that among the earlier versions to be made would be one in Latin. Jerome and Augustine, together with the variations found in the old Latin manuscripts now in our possession, testify to "an original diversity of versions". Jerome, in his Latin version of the O.T., is not founded on the old Latin which in its turn was made from the Greek Septuagint, but, the Psalter excepted, was translated directly from the Hebrew. At length Jerome's translation of the O.T., his Psalter and the N.T. as revised from the Old Latin took shape as the Latin Vulgate. The history of the Latin Vulgate is practically the history of the Church during the Middle Ages.

The History of the English Version.

(1) The Paraphrase of Caedmon, written in Anglo-Saxon, 670A.D.
(2) The Psalter of Aldhelm, 700. The first true translation in English.
(3) Bede, 674-735.
(4) The Gospels of the Tenth Century. The oldest MSS written by Aelfric of Bath about 1000.
(5) The Old Testament of Aelfric, 990.
(6) Wycliffe's Translation, 1324-1384.
(7) Tyndale's Bible, 1525.
(8) Coverdale's Bible, 1535.
(9) Matthew's Bible, 1537.
(10) The Great Bible, Time of Thomas Cromwell, 1539.
(11) The Geneva Bible, 1557-1560.
(12) The Bishop's Bible, 1568.
(13) The Authorized Version, 1611.
(14) The Revised Version, 1885.

Such is the simple outline of our inheritance, its marvelous preservation and its widespread translation. Also its unanimity in all matters of faith and practice.

No.7. The Apocrypha.
pp. 94 - 96

The word Apocrypha is probably derived from apokrupto "to hide", although another derivation is suggestive, apo tes kruptes "away from the crypt, chest or ark" in which were deposited the sacred books of Israel. All writers use the term "to denote some kind of inferiority to the canonical Scriptures" (Churton).

(1) With the exception of Esdras, Judith, Todit and 1st Maccabees, the Apocryphal books were written by Alexandrian Jews in Greek:

> "It is an historical fact that the Greek language was not known to the Jews until long after inspiration had ceased, and the canon of the O.T. was closed" (Home).

Mal. iv. 4-6 intimates that no prophet would arise until the forerunner of the Messiah, and the Jews called Malachi, "The seal of the prophets" in consequence. In order that the Apocryphal book of "Wisdom" should gain acceptance, the author adopted the name of Solomon. He betrays himself by quoting Isaiah, by revealing that Israel was subject to their enemies, and by borrowing expressions from the Grecian games.

(2) In marked contrast with the canonical Scriptures, no writer of the Apocrypha claims inspiration. The Son of Sirach in his prologue to Ecclesiasticus asks pardon for any failure in interpretation. In 1 Maccabees 4:26, 9:27 and 14:41 is an express admission that there was no prophet among them.

The Apocrypha contains many fabulous statements, some unscriptural statements, and some serious doctrinal inaccuracies. Josephus says:

> "It is true, our history has been written since Artaxerxes, very particularly, but hath not been esteemed of the like authority with the former by our forefathers, because there hath not been a succession of prophets since that time" (Against Apion 1:8).

(3) There are evidences that a great literary activity sprang into being during the Apostle's lifetime. (See Luke i. 1 and II Thess. ii. 2). Some of these writings have been collected under the title "The Apocryphal New Testament", and the best refutation of them is found in comparing them with the writings of the N.T.

(4) Supposed quotations of Apocrypha in N.T. The Apostle Paul speaks of "Jannes and Jambres" in II Tim. iii. 8, and it has been suggested that he quoted from the Targum of Jonathan. There is however reason to believe that this Targum was not in existence in the Apostle's day, and the fact that Numenius, Artapanus and Pliny mention these names, makes it evident that it was a matter of common knowledge. Jude is supposed to have quoted from the Apocryphal prophecy of Enoch (Jude 9 and 14), but once again the passages are to be found loosely expressed in Rabbinical writings (see Surenhusius, 699-702). However, should Jude have actually quoted from an Apocryphal book, it would no more place that book in the canon, than Paul's quotation from a heathen poet (Acts xvii. 28) would put Aratus among the prophets or Apostles.

(5) The value of the Apocrypha. The value of the Apocrypha is twofold. It supplies a link that unites the days of Malachi with the dawn of the Christian era and it uses the Koine Greek of the common people in which the N.T. was written. Unless therefore the N.T. writers were going to invent a new language, it would be impossible for them to avoid the phraseology of such popular religious writings.

(6) The Book of Wisdom and the Apostle Paul. To appreciate the extent of the influence of this Apocryphal book upon the mind and language of the Apostle Paul, a personal comparison of books and epistles is imperative, as in many instances the influence though seen and felt defies quotation. The book of Wisdom is about the same size as the Epistle to the Romans, and there are many parallels between these two writings. For sake of space we will quote only from the book of Wisdom, leaving the student to read the corresponding passages of the Epistle.

In Rom. i. 19-23 the Apostle speaks of the heathen world and the evidences of the being and nature of God, that are made clear from creation. The thirteenth chapter of Wisdom contains the following:

> "Surely vain are all men by nature, who are ignorant of God, and could not out of the good things that are seen know Him that is; neither by considering the works did they acknowledge the workmaster" (1,2). "For by the greatness and beauty of the creatures, proportionally (analogus 'by analogy') the Maker of them is seen" (5).

Notice the echo of the word “invention” in Rom. i. 30.

> “For the devising of idols was the beginning of fornication and the invention of them the corruption of life” (Wisdom 14:12).

Other echoes in Rom. i. can be heard as we read:

> “They held them for gods, which even among the beasts of their enemies were despised” (12:24).
> “Shall feel a judgment worthy of God” (12:26).
> “Being corruptible, it was called a god” (14:8).
> “They thought not well of God” (14:30).

Again “Seeking God, and desirous to find Him” (Wisdom 13:6), is reminiscent of Acts xvii. 27 while “And winkest at the sins of men, because they should amend” (or with a view to repentance) (Wisdom 11:23) cannot be read without calling Acts xvii. 30 to mind.

Further where no actual word is similar, there is often a most evident parallelism of thought. Keep in mind I Cor. xiii. and read this on “Wisdom”:

> “For in her is an understand spirit,
> Holy, one only, manifold, subtil,
> Lively, clear, undefiled,
> Plain, not subject to hurt, loving the thing that is good, quick,
> Which cannot be letted, ready to do good, kind to man,
> Steadfast, sure, free from care,
> Having all power, overseeing all things,
> And going through all understanding, pure, and most subtil of spirits” (Wisdom 7:22,23).

Again think of Heb. i. 3 as you read:

> “For she is the brightness of the everlasting light,
> The unspotted mirror of the power of God” (Wisdom 7:26).

“Wisdom” speaks of “A glorious Kingdom” and a “crown of beauty” which shall be the reward of the overcoming righteous (Wisdom 5:16).

Without naming Enoch, “Wisdom” says:

> “He pleased God, and was beloved of Him;
> So that living among sinners he was translated” (Wisdom 4:10).

These are superficial gleanings. The deeper and richer correspondences wait upon the diligent reader of the originals.

No one with a love for freedom and a hatred of tyranny can read the books of the Maccabees unmoved. Coleridge said of the story of Judas Maccabeus that it was “inspiring enough to be inspired”.

The Prayer Book of the Church of England orders the Apocrypha to be read in public,

> "For example of life and instruction of manners, but yet it doth not apply them to teach any doctrine."

John Bunyan sought for more than a year "a text" which had helped him:

> "Look at the generations of old, and see; did ever any trust in the Lord, and was confounded?"

He found it at last in Ecclesiasticus 2:10.

"The Song of the Three Children", "Bel and the Dragon", and "The History of Susannah" are additions to the book of Daniel. In the History of Delection, Dorothy Sayer included the two last books in her earliest examples. Shakespeare makes Shylock refer to "Susannah" when he said "A Daniel came to judgment".

Old Bibles often have the Apocrypha bound up with them.

No.8. The Witness of Archaeology.
pp. 111 - 113

The Bible is its own witness. Proof of its truth comes with its study. Nevertheless it is a valuable asset to know and to be able to refer to the findings of the archaeologist as he brings to light records of the past.

We content ourselves in this paper with a reference to some of the most outstanding evidences of Scripture accuracy which the spade of the archaeologist has brought to light, but nothing less than a personal and painstaking acquaintance both with material and with method can give a true sense of the conviction which these evidences convey.

Archaeological Evidence.

The Flood. A Fact (Gen. vi.-ix.).

One of "the most important historical documents of its kind" is the description given by Dr. Stephen Langdon to the prism catalogued W.B.444, a cuneiform tablet purchased by Mr. H. Weld-Blundell in Baghdad. It contains 379 lines of which we give the following:

Line 1 -- Rulership which from heaven descended.
Line 2 -- At Eriden rulership began.
* * * * *
Line 39 -- The Deluge came up.
Line 40 -- After the Deluge had come.
Line 41 -- The Rulership which descended from heaven.
Line 42 -- At Kish was the Rulership.

Dr. C. L. Woolley excavating at Ur of the Chaldees said that after going through strata of pottery and rubbish the diggers came to a bed of clean clay:

> "Uniform throughout, the texture of which showed that it had been laid there by water . . . . . the clean clay continued without change until it had attained a thickness of a little over eight feet, then as suddenly as it had begun, it stopped . . . . . the flood which deposited it must have been of a magnitude unparalleled in local history."

Amraphel. A Fact (Gen. xiv.).

Chedorlaomer, and Arioch have been proved as historic persons, and the great Hammurabi has been proved to be the Amraphel of Gen. xiv. In the British Museum stood the famous Code of Laws written for this King, many of which can be discovered in operation in the book of Genesis. Nearly nineteen documents of Amraphel have been brought to light.

Abraham's City. A Fact (Gen. xi. 28).

Dr. C. L. Woolley has brought to light that Ur of the Chaldees was a city of great importance, inhabited by a highly civilized population, having schools, libraries, temples and well-built houses.

The Tower of Babel. A Fact (Gen. xi.).

Nebuchadnezzar restored the tower of Borsippa, of which he has left a record. He says of this tower:

> "As it was ages before I built anew; as it was in remote days I erected its pinnacle."

The name given to these towers is Zikkurat (Zokor—to remember as in Zechariah) so in Gen. xi., "To make us a name". The mound of ruins covers over 49,000sq.ft. and is nearly 300ft. high. It is made of "brick burned throughly" united together by "slime" or "bitumen".

Belshazzar. A Fact (Dan. v.).

His father's prayer naming "Belshazzar, my first born son" is in the British Museum.

The Fall of Jericho. A Fact (Joshua vi.).

Professor J. Garstang's discoveries.

Moses in Egypt. A Fact (Gen. and Exod.).

The testimony of Dr. A. S. Yahuda, gives abundant proof that whoever wrote Genesis and Exodus knew Egypt throughly and personally. Then there are the Tell-el-Amarna tablets, mentioning cities named in Joshua and showing that the names El and Jehovah were in use.

The Moabite Stone confirms II Kings i.-iii.

Sennacherib's Cylinder speaks of "Hezekiah" shut up "like a caged bird" in Jerusalem.

The Black Obelisk mentions "Jehu, the Son of Omri".

So far as N.T. Archaeology is concerned the following are important:

(1) The taxation of Luke ii. 1-3 is proved to be a fact.
(2) Officials and events named by Luke are Facts:
    (a) Sergius Paulus.
    (b) The Town Clerk of Ephesus.
    (c) Politarhs and Asiarchs (Acts xvii. 6, 8; xix. 31).
    (d) The Famine in the days of Claudius.
    (e) Herod. His reign and death, and its bearing upon the date of the Acts.

Then there is the testimony of the Papyrus. Bishop Lightfoot wrote in 1863:

> "If we could only recover letter that ordinary people wrote to each other without any thought of being literary, we should have the greatest possible help for the understanding of the language of the N.T. generally."

This desire has been answered by the recovery from the sand of Egypt of heaps of papyrus, using the language of the people and of the N.T. and dating from round about the time of the Apostles.

In ordinary course, questions can be set, knowing that the student has his Bible into which he may search to provide the answers. With archaeology the case is different. Most Bible students have some references, but the ground covered by the subject is vast. We accordingly give a list of some valuable books that should be consulted where possible.

Male and Female Created He Them

(A consideration of the God-ordained positions of man and woman.)

The creation of mankind was the topstone of God's work in the earth, after which He could pronounce upon all that He had made, "It is very good" (Gen. i. 31). The superior position of man over the rest of that creation was shown in that he was created "in the image of God" and given "dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth" (Gen. i. 27, 28; Psa. viii. 4-8).

But mankind was created "male and female", and it is quite evident from Scripture that God ordained a relationship between the two sexes, according to His own purpose, which just as much reflected His desire for order, as did the subjection of the animal creation under man as a whole, in God's "very good" creation.

That relationship, which far transcended any that existed between male and female of other creatures, has alas been misunderstood, abused, degraded and challenged by all manner of persons. The tendency of the past has been largely toward treating the woman as very inferior to the man (this being still so in some parts of the world), but the pendulum has now swung too far. The God-given position of the man is now being undermined (under the much bandied about terms of "equality" and "emancipation"), and disaster can only be the outcome.

To stand against the modern tendency is to be branded as old-fashioned, unenlightened and denying the equality of womanhood, and the unpopularity of such a position is inclined to influence men against their better judgment. Surely, it is sometimes argued, if a woman can do a job as well as (or even better than) a man, then it must be right that she should do it? But this is not the ground upon which the right relationship between the sexes ought to be determined, at least not for the believer. There can be but one appeal for him, "What saith the Scripture?" This then must be the sole source from which the respective positions of "male and female", and their relationship to each other, is judged, and it will be the only ground of argument presented in this series of articles.

Kosmos

It is clear from a reading of Scripture, that whatever else God desires it must include order. Disorder and lawlessness are quite contrary to His purposes in any part of His creation, but they have come in with the entrance of sin; in fact "sin is lawlessness" (I John iii. 4 R.V.). Such a desire for order on the part of God is seen in the word kosmos, "world", behind which word is the idea of regular disposition and arrangement.

> "Kosmos denotes the order of the world, the ordered universe, the ordered entirety of God's creation, but considered as separated from God. Then, the abode of humanity, or that order of things in which humanity moves or of which man is the centre . . . . ." (English and Greek Lexicon—Bullinger).

John's testimony to the kosmos is that "it came into being through Him (The Word)", whilst Paul noted that, "Sin came into the kosmos" (John i. 10; Rom. v. 12). An original order thus became spoilt.

But this is not the end of the story, for "God loved the kosmos so, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life"; He sent His Son "into the kosmos . . . . . that the kosmos through Him might be saved". That same Son, as the "Lamb of God" is the One Who "takes away the sin of the kosmos" (John iii. 16, 17; i. 29).

Whilst it would take a whole series of articles to do justice to the meaning of kosmos, enough for the present subject to note that behind the word is the suggestion of order; an order which proceeded originally from God, but which has become spoilt by sin and is now considered as separated from, and antagonistic to, God. To be "of the kosmos" is opposite to being "of God"; "the whole kosmos lies in the wicked one" (I John iv. 4-6; v. 19). But through God's great love, a work of salvation has been wrought in the kosmos, a work amongst men, by the Son of God. Through the Gospel of Christ men are being called back to order, called to be "in the kosmos" but not of it (John xvii. 14-16; James i. 27; II Pet. i. 4, etc.), called to exhibit already in this life God's intended order, by their manner of life:

> "For by grace are ye saved . . . . . not of works . . . . . we are His workmanship (Gr. poiema), created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them" (Eph. ii. 8-10).
> 'For though I be absent in the flesh, yet am I with you in the spirit, joying and beholding your order (Gr. taxis), and the stedfastness of your faith in Christ" (Col. ii. 5).

The Greek word poiema (related to the English "poem") is used in only two places in the N.T.; in the passage quoted above and Rom. i. 20. The connection between these two occurrences is worthy of note, and bears upon the thought of order.

In Rom. i. 20 the old creation (coming from the hand of God as "very good" and exhibiting order) is considered evidence for perceiving "the invisible things" of God:

> ". . . . . ever since the world (kosmos) was created, His invisible nature, His everlasting power and Divine Being, have been quite perceptible in what He has made (poiema)" (Moffatt).

It is of course true that since "sin came into the kosmos" disorder has come in with it, but there is still enough of the original order left to testify to even "His eternal power and Godhead".

The new creation likewise is to testify to God's order. The members of the Body of Christ, as part already of that new creation "in Christ Jesus", by their orderly lives, their "good works", demonstrate that they are God's poem (A.V. 'workmanship'). These "good works" and such a manner of life were part of God's original intention; they were "afore prepared that we should walk in them" (Eph. ii. 10 R.V.).

The work of salvation in the hearts of men is a work of restoration to order, God's original intention for every part of His creation. That salvation is to be lived out by the believer in demonstration that the effects of sin (lawlessness and disorder) have been dealt with in his life by the work of Christ. He no longer has to follow the dictates of "the age of this kosmos" controlled by "the prince of the authority of the air" (Eph. ii. 2 lit.), he is part of God's new poem, a new creation in Christ Jesus. As such he seeks God's order in his life.

It ought to be pointed out that there are dispensational differences between the ministry of John and that of Paul. Both use the word kosmos frequently and not necessarily identically. Also whereas Paul uses the conception of a "new creation" with regard to the salvation of man, John speaks rather of being "born of God", a "new birth" (II Cor. v. 17; Gal. vi. 15; Eph. ii. 10; Col. iii. 10; John i. 13; iii. 3, 7; I John iii. 9). Peter, also an apostle of the circumcision (Gal. ii. 9), is on very similar lines to John, referring to "being born again" and "begotten again" (I Pet. i. 23; i. 3). Peter also uses kosmos.

Whilst these differences must be recognized and taken into consideration in exposition, they do not detract from the fundamental idea that salvation, whether it be expressed in terms of a new birth or a new creation, deals with restoration to order. The believer is given a "sound mind" (sophronismos, related to sozo, to save and sophron, sober) and demonstrates it to be so by a walk in harmony with God's order.

The Greek word taxis (referred to above in Col. ii. 5) is translated "order" in its every occurrence, and also bears upon this theme. But the word is derived from tasso, to arrange or put in order, especially in a military sense. Since it is obviously connected also with hupotasso (subject, subdue, submit) it will be considered as part of that word which also speaks of "order".

Hupotasso

This word means literally, to set in order under; it speaks of submission (sometimes voluntary) and suggests, taken together with the thoughts already voiced on kosmos, that God in His wisdom ordained a certain arrangement, spoilt since by sin, but being restored by the work of Christ. A system of "rule and authority and power" was vested in created beings, but when "the end" arrives all will have been annulled and "put in subjection under His feet". Finally, even the Son Himself will voluntarily submit Himself that "God may be all in all" (I Cor. xv. 24-28).

In the Prison Ministry of Paul another aspect is introduced in connection with submission to Christ, in that He is seen as "Head over all things" and as such given to the Church which is His Body (Eph. i. 22, 23). The Church anticipates the "dispensation of the fullness of the seasons" being already under His Headship (Eph. i. 10 where "gather together in one" is literally "head up").

Hupotasso is also used of submission to earthly authorities (Rom. xiii. 1, 5-7) and of the submission of believers to one another (Eph. v. 21); which submission is then interpreted by the Apostle into specific terms (Eph. v. 22 - vi. 9).

This last passage brings the idea of order and arrangement back into the field of the subject, insofar that it speaks of the relationship between husband and wife. The long introduction has been necessary to impress upon the mind that the most important aspect of this whole subject is the thought that God has ordained an order, an arrangement, and that any understanding of the God-ordained positions of man and woman, and their relationship to each other, must be conditioned by the terms of that order. It behoves both man and woman to know the respective positions that have been given to them in the good pleasure and economy of God, and to walk accordingly.

Tragedy when "order" is defied.

Before entering more specifically into the enquiry of the relationship between man and woman, it is as well to notice that when God's order or arrangement have in time past been defied or rebelled against, tragedy has inevitably followed. Satan is the first case in point.

Identified as Lucifer in Isa. xiv. he is seen as seeking a position other that that given him in God's order.

> "I will exalt my throne above the stars of God: I will sit also upon the mount of the congregation, in the sides of the north: I will ascend above the heights of the clouds; I will be like the Most High" (verses 13, 14).

His judgment is quickly pronounced (15-20), but the effects of Satan's fall have been far reaching indeed, as any who know a little of Scripture will be aware.

Satan is seen at work in the garden of Eden under the guise of the "serpent". That it is Satan here can be known from Rev. xii. 9, but just how is not made clear. The 'serpent' (Heb. nachash, a shining one) of Gen. iii., who "beguiled Eve through his subtilty", need not have been the limbless reptile now generally associated with that word, for insofar that he is identified as Satan himself, he "transforms himself into an angel of light" (II Cor. xi. 3, 14). But on the other hand there is also the possibility that Satan demon-possessed the body of a real serpent (perhaps then in God's order not the unwholesome creature we know today) and spoke through it to Eve.

In the latter case God's order will have been transgressed, in that, part of the creation put under the dominion of Adam, was caused to step out of its proper place, being raised up by Satan out of its appointed order.

The next step in the tragedy is that Eve usurps the place of her husband, as guardian of the garden and the tree of knowledge, by reasoning with the serpent about the Word of God, and is consequently "thoroughly deceived" (Gen. iii. 1-7; I Tim. ii. 14).

Adam also fails to regard God's order, listening to the voice of his wife rather than to the Word of God (Gen. iii. 17). The end result of all these steps out of God's appointed order, is that sin and death enter the kosmos, and that creation begins to show everywhere the evidence of it.

So we read the steps which led to sin and death entering into God's order, as different parts of His creation step out of their appointed places. First Satan, then the serpent, then Eve and finally Adam, and hence tragedy follows. This terrible story of rebellion and disobedience ought to be a lesson to all mankind of the results that must surely follow the ignoring of God's order, and especially ought it to be given heed to by those who know and love the Word of Truth, and who seek to live out their lives in harmony with His good pleasure.

In the studies which are to follow concerning the God-ordained positions of man and woman, it is asked of the reader that he keep in mind this basic truth concerning order. Each part of God's creation is fitted to take and hold a certain place in His overall scheme. It should be the desire of each one of us to know what that place is, and then to live in obedience to it, and to Him Who so ordained it. Failure to do this can only lead to disorder and tragedy.

In the world around us there is a general revolt against "law and order"; the old values are fast being undermined, and there is a growing dissatisfaction with one's lot in life. It is easy to be part of this, carried along with the stream of popular opinion. One of the fields in which this revolt and dissatisfaction expresses itself is in the man-woman relationship. It behoves every God-fearing man and every God-fearing woman, to have nothing to do with popular trends, but to turn their thoughts to the Scripture of truth, and allow themselves only to be influenced by its teaching. God has a place for man, and He has a place for woman; they ignore this to their own peril and the dishonour of the Lord.

No.2. Man, Woman and Equality.
pp. 103 - 108

It has so far been observed that in considering the God-ordained positions of man and woman, the most basic truth to be kept in mind is the thought of order. God, in His wisdom, has determined overall arrangement, and it behoves all to both know what that place is, and then to live in obedience to it. Such order is the basis for determining the right relationship between man and woman, as they both obviously have a part in it, according to God's present economy. To ignore or rebel against God's order is to court disaster and dishonour Him.

The "arrangement revealed in Scripture.

To pretend to know where every part of God's creation fits into His purposes would be to go beyond what Scripture has revealed, but enough has been written to "know in part".

Angels are seen to be messengers and ministers of God, in a passage which contrasts the superior position of the Son (Heb. i. 6-8 quoting Psa. civ. 4). They are particularly associated with Israel in Scripture, being present at the giving of the law (Acts vii. 53; Gal. iii. 19), figuring prominently in the Second Coming of Christ to that same people (Matt. xvi. 27) and mentioned frequently in those parts of Scripture where Israel's hope is dominant (e.g. Hebrews, Revelation, Acts. cp. also Dan. xii. 1).

Principalities and powers are seen in their relationship to Christ as Head over all things; He being "far above all principality and power . . . . ." and "the Head of all principality and power" (Eph. i. 20-23; Col. ii. 10). These beings are associated with heavenly places (Eph. iii. 10).

Mankind, in relation to the earth, were given:

> ". . . . . dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth" (Gen. i. 28; Psa. viii. 4-8).

Something of the responsibility and authority of mankind can be felt from the command given them to "subdue" the earth; a word (Heb. kabash) translated in II Chron. xxviii. 10 "to keep under", and perhaps suggesting the possibility that were mankind not to exercise their responsibility, then disorder would ensue.

The Apostle Paul, in I Cor. xi. 3, brings together three aspects of God's order, in a passage in which the relationship between man and woman is touched upon:

> "But I would have you know, that the head of every man is Christ; and the head of the woman is the man; and the head of Christ is God."

Whilst the word "head" used in this context must be given special consideration in a later study, enough can be seen for now to recognize an order in the mind and purpose of God.

Thus it is seen that each part of God's creation, and indeed the Creator Himself (Christ) has a part to play in God's arrangement. It is fitting that at the head of it all stands the Son of God, of Whom such words as "subject" and "obedience" are used (Luke ii. 51; I Cor. xv. 28; Phil. ii. 8; Heb. v. 8). Such words give an indication of the "mind in Christ Jesus", and we are exhorted to let this mind be in us (Phil. ii. 5).

An important distinction.

A distinction is to be made between man and woman as individuals, and man and woman with respect to their positions in the economy of God. It is because this distinction has not been made in time past that so much confusion has arisen as to the "equality" or otherwise of woman with man. The position in Scripture is not that man is superior to woman, but that he has been given (in God's good pleasure) a different position. If this position speaks of authority and seems to be superior to that allotted to woman, this is not to be misunderstood as though it means that man himself is superior to woman.

A proper understanding of what is involved in the different positions given by God to man and woman, will not only solve many of the problems that arise between them, but provide a principle for clarifying other truth revealed in Scripture. To appreciate the distinction of position mentioned above, it will be necessary to refer firstly to the original creation of man.

The two creation records.

There are two creation records in the book of Genesis. No true believer will need to be told that they are not contradictory, but it is as well to observe that they serve different purposes.

In all probability the book of Genesis came about (as we now have it) when Moses put together a number of ancient records or histories, which had been handed down from the very earliest times, adding his own contribution. Such a Mosaic does not detract from the "inspiration" of Scripture, but rather supports it, in that Moses actually records his sources of information at the end (not the beginning, see New Discoveries In Babylonia About Genesis by P. J. Wiseman) of each section of the book:

> "This is the book of the generations of Adam . . . Noah . . . . . the sons of Noah . . . Shem . . . . .", etc. (v. 1; vi. 9; x. 1; xi. 10).

So it is seen that the first account of the creation of man belongs to "the generations (histories) of the heavens and of the earth", whilst the second is included in "the book of the generations of Adam" (ii. 4; v. 1). Hence the first record of man's creation shows the relationship of mankind to the rest of the work of God, but the second reveals more specifically the man-woman relationship.

In the first account it is only necessary to note that God created mankind "male and female"; but the second requires it stated that, "Adam was first formed, then Eve", that the woman was created "for the man" and "of the man", that the man was "commanded" concerning the garden of Eden before ever the woman appeared on the scene (I Tim. ii. 13; I Cor. xi. 8, 9; Gen. ii. 15-18). The second record will, therefore, have more bearing upon the relationship and positions of man and woman.

A help-meet for him.

"Adam was formed first, then Eve" (I Tim. ii. 13). The implications of the order will be more fully considered when the position of the man is studied. But the woman was made as "an help meet" for the man; she was created "on account of the man" (Gen. ii. 18; I Cor. xi. 9).

It is not strictly correct to speak of the woman as man's "help-meet". This has come about because the two words were "first improperly hyphened, and then taken as one word" (Oxford Dictionary). The A.V. margin reads, "an help as before him", and the meaning appears to be "a help corresponding to him", one in whom he would see his reflected image and hence find his completion. In fact the Septuagint version of the O.T. at Gen. ii. 20 has:

> ". . . . . a help like to himself", and even in the Apocrypha (although it is no part of "inspired" Scripture), Ecclesiasticus36:24 reads:

> "He that getteth a wife beginneth a possession, a help like unto himself, and a pillar of rest."

For Adam it was not good that he should be alone (Gen. ii. 18), but the only true companion for him could be one "like unto himself", his equal in fact. This much is surely seen in the choice that the Lord gave to him in deciding for himself who this one should be.

> "And out of the ground the Lord God formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air; and brought them unto Adam to see what he would call them" (Gen. ii. 19).

But Adam, although himself formed also out of the dust of the ground, could find no complete satisfaction in any other creature made in like manner. The birds and the beasts brought unto him, although coming equally from the hand of the Creator, were separate entities; Adam sought one with whom he could feel a closer unity, one whose heart beat in time with his own. Hence, after Adam had named every creature brought unto him, thereby indicating to the Lord that none were suitable, at last came the "building" of woman from a part of his own body (Gen. ii. 19-23).

What actually happened physically here is beyond the scope of these articles to consider, but the interested reader might like to give thought to the suggestion made by Dr. R. G. Sobey in a small booklet entitled Tsela, in which he says:

> "It does not seem possible anatomically to refute the biblical possibility, that the Tsela removed for the upbuilding of Eve was no less than one of the side chambers of the left lung, as then constituted, and more specifically the uppermost and third lobe of that left side."

Whatever we may think of the above possibility (and of course Scripture gives no details in this matter), it is certain that Adam found in this piece of Divine surgery, a help-meet for him.

> "And the man said, This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh: she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of Man" (ii. 23 R.V.).

Moses almost certainly added the explanation which followed (it is out of place in the mouth of Adam), in which it is seen that the man will find his completion in the woman, the two becoming "one flesh" again when the man "cleaved unto his wife" (Gen. ii. 24). This wonderful unity was to be used later by Paul as a picture of an even more wonderful relationship, which now exists between Christ and the Church which is His Body (Eph. v. 25-33).

Hence it is seen that the woman, as an individual, stands on a complete equality with the man; she is his counterpart, "like unto himself". In God's ideal and original arrangement, true completeness was to be found when the two came together again (even as they were one originally in the person of Adam); there was to be "one flesh". Man and woman were not, however, made identical with each other, but possessed those differences necessary for the fulfillment of their respective places in God's economy; and hence they were to be looked upon as complimenting one another.

The advent of sin into the world, bringing with it a certain amount of disorder, may have spoilt the balance that was originally intended, but it in no way invalidates the truth expressed in Gen. ii. 24. What the situation would have been had not sin entered to spoil, is not the subject of Scripture, but it does seem, on the basis of Gen. ii. 18-24, that every man would have found his complement and completion in a woman; it would have been, one man—one woman—one flesh. That this is not now universally so, nor in fact apparently ever has been, should not cause us to lose sight of God's original ideal as far as the earth and its economy is concerned.

Man and woman different positionally.

Whilst it must ever be maintained that man and woman as individuals before God stand on equal footing, there can be no doubt at all that they have been entrusted with different positions in God's present economy. Seen from the point of view of "faith in Christ Jesus", Paul could write:

> "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female" (Gal. iii. 26-28).

Also the Lord taught:

> "For in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven" (Matt. xxii. 30).

Such passages as these seem to do away with the distinction of sex, and hence the respective positions associated with that distinction. But there are other places where, for the present economy at least, that distinction is not only to be recognized, but to be lived by. It is in these latter passages that the position of the man is seen to be different from that of the woman.

Obviously when it comes to "faith in Christ Jesus" there can be no distinction made amongst men and women, and this must be true whether during the Acts dispensation (as in Gal. iii. 28), or the present one. But position is another matter.

Some of the passages which reveal the different positions allotted to man and woman, and which must have a bearing upon any conclusions that are drawn, are:

> "Unto the woman He said . . . . . thy desire shall be (subject) to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee" (Gen. iii. 16).
> ". . . . . the head of the woman is the man" (I Cor. xi. 3).
>
> "Let the woman learn in silence with all subjection. But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence . . . . ." (I Tim. ii. 11, 12).

If such passages seem to suggest that the position of the man is superior to that of the woman, this is not to be misunderstood as though it implied that the man himself is superior to the woman. There is an important distinction to be made between individual standing before God, and position in His present economy.

In the next article two examples will be given to show the difference between individual standing and position in God's economy and order. An important principle comes to light which reflects not only upon the man-woman relationship, but also upon other aspects of truth, touching even the Deity of Christ.

Attention has so far been drawn to God's desire for order in His creation, that every part of that work of His should find its proper place in His arrangement. As belonging to God's order, man and woman each have an allotted place, according to His pleasure, in the present economy. But it is necessary to draw a distinction between the positions given to man and woman, and their own individual standings before God. Misunderstanding of this distinction has led to the non-scriptural idea that man is himself superior to woman, whereas, in actual fact at best, it is only that the position allotted to man, since it speaks of headship and authority, is superior. This distinction is now to be illustrated by two examples.

Jew and Gentile during the Acts period.

"The Lord shall make thee the head, and not the tail", said Moses to Israel (Deut. xxviii. 13). It is quite evident that in choosing Israel, the Lord never suggested once that they were a superior nation above other nations of the earth. In fact:

> "The Lord did not set His love upon (cleave to) you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people; for ye were the fewest of all people: But because the Lord loved you . . . . ." (Deut. vii. 7, 8).

"Love" was the reason for such a choice, and hence Israel were not to exalt themselves, the Lord would exalt them in due course. They were chosen to fill a certain position in God's economy for the earth, and this position no more made them a superior nation, than God's vesting of the headship in the man placed him as a superior being over the woman.

During the Acts period, when both Jew and Gentile were being called by the preaching to Christ, a distinction is to be observed in this respect. With regard to "faith in Christ Jesus":

> "There is neither Jew nor Greek . . . . . And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. iii. 28, 29).

But Paul could also write:

> "What then is the superiority of the Jew? or what the profit of the circumcision? Much in every way: for first that they were entrusted with the oracles of God" (English Greek N.T. translation of Rom. iii. 1, 2).

And yet:

> "What then? are we (i.e. we Jews) better than they? No, in no wise: for we have before proved both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin" (Rom. iii. 9).

Unless the above passages are taken as contradictory, which they cannot be as part of the "inspired" Word of God, then some distinction must be made, and that distinction has regard to the different positions held by Jew and Gentile in the earthly purpose of God.

With respect to "sin" (Rom. iii. 9) and "faith in Christ Jesus" (Gal. iii. 28, 29), both Jew and Gentile, since they were both "under sin" and in need therefore of "faith in Christ Jesus", stood on an equal footing.

With respect to position in God's economy however, the situation was very different. The Jew here held a superior position, having been entrusted with "the oracles of God" (Rom. iii. 1, 2). To them pertained "the sonship, and the Glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises"; they were related to "the fathers" and it was "of" (Greek ek, out of) them that Christ came (Rom. ix. 4, 5). This was a position of privilege, authority and responsibility, and in this position consisted any superiority they had. For this reason even "the gospel" was:

> ". . . . . to the Jew first, and also to the Greek" (Rom. i. 16).
> "It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you (Jews)" (Acts xiii. 46).

Compare also Acts iii. 25, 26; Rom. ii. 9, 10; I Pet. i. 1; iv. 17.

Hence an important distinction is observed which throws light on the situation existing during the Acts period. This situation has since changed with the revelation, through Paul, of the "dispensation of the secret" (Eph. iii. 1-9 R.V.). Under the terms of this present economy the Jew and the Gentile are made into "one new man", and the distinction between them (created by the privileged position of the Jew) has been done away (Eph. ii. 11-22); in fact the situation under the present economy can be expressed as, "There is neither Greek nor Jew" (Col. iii. 10, 11).

There is however, no reason to suppose that the introduction of this administration through the Prison Ministry of Paul, has done away with the distinctive positions allotted to man and woman, rather the reverse, for God expects the truth of this present calling to be lived out giving due place to male and female:

> "Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands . . . . . the husband is the head of the wife . . . . .husbands love your wives . . . . ." (Eph. v. 22-33; Col. iii. 18, 19).

To defy such a God-given order is to fail to "walk worthy of the calling wherewith ye are called" (Eph. iv. 1).

An application to the Deity of Christ.

The Deity of Christ is often challenged from such a passage as John xiv. 28:

> "My Father is greater than I."

Here it is the Son that speaks, and a relationship is introduced. The same relationship is seen in I Cor. xv. 24-28:

> "Then cometh the end, when He (Christ, of verse 23) shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father . . . . . And when all things shall be subdued unto Him (i.e. Christ, the Son), then shall the Son also Himself be subject unto Him that put all things under Him, that God may be all in all."

It is quite wrong to read more into these verses than is there in the purpose of God. To argue that the Father is one Being, and that the Son is a lesser Being, is to fail to recognize that a distinction is necessary to understand the relationship between the Father and the Son. This same Son is recognized as such by Nathaniel, but He has already been identified by John as "the Word became flesh", Who "was God" (John i. 1, 14, 49). To argue that a different Being is spoken of in these verses, is to make nonsense of language.

Whilst it would be quite wrong to pretend to fully understand the Being of God (and hence the Deity of Christ), enough can be seen to recognize that it is only in the Father-Son relationship, where the different positions of Father and Son are revealed, that the word "greater" can be used. A father holds a "greater" position than a son in everyday life, but it cannot be maintained therefore, that the father is a superior individual to his son. The reader will be conscious that although care is needed in comparing the Father-Son relationship, the earthly is in some respects a help in understanding the heavenly.

Hence, as has been already observed in a previous article, even the Son Himself can be seen to have a position in the out-working of the purpose of God, and when that position is fulfilled, when "the end" arrives, even He is "subject unto Him that put all things under Him" (I Cor. xv. 24-28).

In God's arrangement and order every part of His creation has its place. But so has also the Father-Son relationship in which God has manifested Himself to us. It is not within the scope of these articles to develop the meaning of that relationship, simply to note that it does form part of an overall plan. It also reveals to us just how important the distinction is between individual standing and allotted position, and that distinction must be fully appreciated if the true conception of equality between the sexes is to be understood. "Male and female created He them" so that each would find their place in His purpose, complementing one another. For either to step out of their God-ordained positions can only lead to tragedy.

The world, having not understood the above distinction, firstly relegated the woman herself, and treated her as an inferior being to the man, and then, when the time of "enlightenment" had come, again misunderstood the true design of God by giving woman a position never intended for her. No true believer has any excuse for being taken in by this misunderstanding, since he has the Word of God for his guidance, and the Son of God for his example. The words "subject" and "obedience" were gladly taken by Him; they should characterize the believer (he or she) in his desire to honour the Lord and walk worthy of his calling.

Limitations of the subject.

Before examining the specific positions allotted to man and woman in the purpose of God, it is necessary to be aware of the limitations imposed on the subject by at least two factors.

(1) In God's original purpose for the earth, as far as it is possible to determine, it was intended that there should be a woman for every man, so that it could be truly said of all men:

> "Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh" (Gen. ii. 24).

There seems every reason to suppose that there would have been a perfect balance in numbers of men and women, so that what the Lord observed of Adam would be a true observation of all men:

> "It is not good that the man should be alone" (Gen. ii. 18), and this would be remedied in the fulfillment of the "one flesh" of Gen. ii. 24. None of this can of course be proved, since it is obviously not possible to be dogmatic about what the situation would have been, had not sin entered, but any Scriptural indications that there are at all points to such a balance as has been suggested above.

With the entrance of sin has come a certain disorder, instead of order, and as far as God's earthly purpose is concerned at least, the one man, one woman, one flesh conception has been spoilt so that not all married and others practiced polygamy. Some aspects therefore, of the respective callings of man and woman could not be fulfilled in the lives of those, who found themselves outside of this relationship.

As far as Israel was concerned, the production of a "seed" was of prime importance, and a special calling of the woman therefore came to be motherhood, and this could not lawfully be fulfilled outside of the marriage bond. (The levirate law concerning the duties of a "husband's brother" was a special circumstance.) Just how far this has any relation to the present dispensation must later be considered, but it can perhaps be already appreciated that such considerations are likely to impose a limitation upon what can be said (and put into practice) with respect to the man-woman relationship.

When, for example, the headship of the man is spoken of in I Cor. xi. 3, it is at least possible (as suggested by C. K. Barrett and others) that Paul in referring to the "man" (aner), actually means the "husband" (aner is translated "husband" many times in the N.T.). Hence the "woman" in the same context, would be the "wife".

> ". . . . . the head of a woman is her husband" (R.S.V.).

In Eph. v. 22-24 (the present dispensation) the headship of the man is spoken of within that same relationship, and it is not without significance that the wife is to submit herself unto her "own" husband (verse 22).

Such considerations suggest that a man can only completely fulfil his position as "head" in relation to a wife, although it cannot be entertained for one moment that any godly unmarried woman should misread this and usurp the position allotted to man:

> "I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp (exercise) authority over the man" (I Tim. ii. 12).

Whilst "man" is here again aner, it can hardly be maintained from the context that Paul is confining his word to husbands.

Hence it seems that in interpreting the complete meaning of man's headship, it can only be properly understood (and therefore fulfilled) within the marriage bond. Such will impose limitations upon what can be said (and practiced) concerning the unmarried.

(2) A second limitation to this subject is one which has often to be taken account of in practical truth, that of interpreting a general principle into specific practice. Paul touched upon this in Rom. xiv. 22:

> ". . . . . happy is he who has no reason to judge himself for what he approves" (R.S.V.).

Not every aspect of specific practice is mentioned in Scripture; the conscience enlightened by the Holy Spirit's application of the Word of God, is left to decide the rights or otherwise of the believer's way of life, where there is no "thus saith the Lord" in specific terms.

So also with the subject under consideration. The positions allotted to man and woman can be defined in certain terms; the "headship" of the man, the "submission" of the woman; the "authority" of the man, the "quietness" of the woman and so on (Eph. v. 22-33; I Tim. ii. 8-15, etc.), but the specific interpretation of those terms in everyday life (except where Paul, for example, specifically mentions "praying" in public and "teaching" (I Tim. ii. 8, 12), is left for the individual to work out before the Lord.

Granted that such limitations must be accepted in examining this subject, there is much guidance that Scripture gives whereby all believers might know how (as man and woman) they may "walk worthy of the calling" wherewith they are called.

No.4. The Headship of Man.
pp. 151 - 156

The Hebrew word 'head' (rosh) is not used of man in his relationship to woman in the O.T., but insofar that it is very frequently represented in the LXX by the Greek kephale ('head' in I Cor. xi. 3; Eph. v. 23, two relevant passages in this enquiry) it is important to note its usage. Apart from referring to the human head, the head of the serpent, etc., it is used as follows:

". . . a river . . . became into four heads" (Gen. ii. 10).
". . . the tops of the mountains" (Gen. viii. 5).
". . . the heads of their fathers' houses" (Exod. vi. 14).
"When thou takest the sum of . . . Israel" (Exod. xxx. 12).
". . . he overlaid their chapiters" (Exod. xxxvi. 38).
". . . restore it in the principal" (Lev. vi. 5).
". . . the chief fathers of . . . Israel" (Numb. xxxvi. 1).
". . . make them rulers over you" (Deut. i. 13).
". . . your captains of your tribes" (Deut. xxix. 10).
". . . the three companies blew the trumpets" (Judges vii. 20).
"Ezer the first, Obadiah the second" (I Chron. xii. 9).

It is also used significantly of the month Abib, which became for Israel, "the beginning of months" (Exod. xii. 2), and in the Psalms of the Lord's word, true "from the beginning" (cxix. 160). Hence it is also found represented in the LXX frequently by the Greek arche or archon ("beginning", "principality"; "ruler", "prince").

Rosh ('head') thus seems to denote primarily, "priority or precedence in respect of time, order, place or dignity" (Parkhurst). But its usage also suggests that it can include the idea of origin or source (Gen. ii. 10, beginnings of streams, 'heads'), an important consideration when thinking of the headship of man:

". . . . . the head (kephale) of the woman is the man . . . . . the man is not of (ek, out of) the woman; but the woman of (ek) the man" (I Cor. xi. 3, 8).

The original source of woman (in Eve) was man, insofar that:

". . . . . the rib, which the Lord God had taken from man, made He (into) a woman" (Gen. ii. 22).

C. K. Barrett (in his commentary on I Corinthians) refers to a passage in Herodotus (iv.91) where kephale, used in the plural form, is applied to the "source of a river". (Compare above, Gen. ii. 10.)

Another aspect of the usage of rosh (and also kephale) is of the whole number, the sum or principal as applied to persons (Exod. xxx. 12) or possessions (Lev. vi. 5). Certain papyri and Greek inscriptions, both before and after the period of the N.T., also suggest this meaning:

> "In P Oxy 11.273/18 (A.D.95) kephale is used of the 'whole amount' of land that was being ceded; in Michel 588/16 (2nd half ii./B.C.) of 'the total expenditure' . . . . ." (Vocabulary of the Greek Testament by Moulton and Milligan).

In the N.T. Authorized Version kephale is regularly translated 'head', although a cognate word, kephalaion is twice rendered "sum" (Acts xxii. 28; Heb. viii. 1) and kephalis, another word in the same family, "volume" (Heb. x. 7).

Putting all these thoughts together the following three basic meanings emerge as to the Hebrew rosh and the Greek kephale:

(1) Precedence with respect to time, order or position.
(2) Origin or source (out of).
(3) Sum or whole.

It is not without significance that all three of these meanings are applied to Christ in the N.T.:

(1) "He is before all, and all things hold together in Him. And He is the Head (kephale) of the body, the church; Who is the beginning (arche), firstborn out from the dead, in order that He might be in all things, holding the first place" (Col. i. 17, 18).
(2) "The Amen, the faithful and true witness, the origin (arche) of God's creation" (Moffatt—Rev. iii. 14).
(3) "In Him dwells all the fullness (pleroma) of the Godhead bodily . . . . . the Head (kephale) of all principality (arche) and authority . . . . ." (Col. ii. 9, 10).

Christ has precedence with respect to time, order and place; He is the origin of the creation and the fullness (related to the idea of completeness) of the Godhead. All things (ta panta), in the dispensation of the fullness of the seasons, will be headed up (anakephalaiomai) in Him, whilst the church which is His body already enjoys His headship (Eph. i. 10, 22, 23).

The connection of the word 'head' with the idea of sum (probably associated with the fact that in ancient times the sum or total of a number of figures was placed at the head, not the foot as now, of an account) must not be lost sight of when thinking of completeness in Christ. Insofar that all things found in Him will eventually acknowledge His headship, He having filled these "all things", they may be looked upon as summed-up in Him; Christ must be seen as "all in all" (Col. iii. 11) before I Cor. xv. 24-28 becomes a reality:

"Then cometh the end . . . . . God may be all in all."

The man-woman (expressed in the husband-wife) relationship, insofar that it includes the thought of headship, is a pale reflection of realities concerning the relationships between Christ and the church, and God and the whole creation.

The head of the woman is the man.

The title of this section is taken from I Cor. xi. 3 in a context where Paul is dealing with the relationship between man and woman in order to teach truth concerning the veiling or otherwise of the head in a public assembly. The passage is not easy to expound, there being a number of difficulties in it, but these will not detract from what Paul has to teach on the subject being considered.

> "I would have you know, that the head of every man is Christ; and the head of the woman is the man; and the head of Christ is God" (I Cor. xi. 3).

It has already been observed (in article 3 of this series) that the word "man" here (Greek aner) could be "husband", as in the R.S.V.;

> ". . . . . the head of a woman is her husband."

It has also been pointed out, that since man and woman complement each other, then the proper relationship between the two may only be completely understood and fulfilled within the marriage bond. These things must be kept in mind in all that is said of their relationship to each other.

Applying now what has been learnt of the meaning of headship from both Old and New Testaments, note first that man has precedence in time and position in God's economy:

> "Adam was first formed, then Eve" (I Tim. ii. 13).
> "Neither was the man created for the woman; but the woman for the man" (I Cor. xi. 9).

Paul, building upon the prior formation of Adam, deduces from it that the authority to teach (i.e. God's word) has been vested in man not woman. (He also uses a second argument to enforce his point, but this will be dealt with when the teaching of women is examined in more detail.) More light is thrown on this when the implications of the prior creation of man are seen in Genesis:

> "The Lord God took the man, and put him in the garden of Eden to dress it and to keep (guard) it. And the Lord God commanded the man . . . . . of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it . . . . . And the Lord God said, It is not good that the man should be alone . . . . ." (ii. 15-18).

It is seen that the man is placed in the garden to "guard it" (Moffatt) and commanded concerning the tree before the building of the woman; he is the one in whom the authority and responsibility for the garden and its forbidden tree are vested. It is to him that the word of the Lord comes, and since there is no record of the Lord having repeated His command to the woman, it is reasonable to suppose that it was also Adam's charge to make his wife aware of the prohibition concerning the tree. (That she did know of it is evident from iii. 2, 3 even though she minimized it by misquoting.) This charge may reflect on Paul's word in I Cor. xiv. 34, 35:

> "Let the women keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but let them be in subjection, as also saith the law. And if they would learn > anything, let them ask their own husbands at home: for it is shameful for a woman to speak in church" (R.V.).

The same subjection is resident in I Tim. ii. 11, 12. If any woman has any doubt as to what God thinks of this subjective quietness, let her consider I Pet. iii. 1-5:

> "Wives, be subject unto your own husbands . . . . . whose adorning let it not be that outward . . . . . but the hidden man of the heart . . . . . the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price."

The headship of man therefore involved him in a position of responsibility, a position for which he was fitted in the purpose of God. When he (in the person of Adam) allowed the woman to usurp that place in Eden, a position for which she was evidently not fitted (hence her deception), tragedy ensued. The aspect of this responsibility given to Adam which Paul (in a post-Acts epistle) sees fit to dwell upon, concerns the teaching of the word of God. This must therefore be given a large place in our understanding of man's headship.

Whilst thinking of the tragedy in Eden, note that the responsibility of Adam is further brought out when the Lord takes the reckoning. Note in particular the singular forms "him", "thou" and "thee" in the following quotation:

> "And the Lord God called unto Adam, and said unto him, Where art thou? . . . . . Who told thee that thou wast naked? Hast thou eaten of the tree, whereof I commanded thee that thou should not eat?" (Gen. iii. 9-11).

Adam is the one first sought by the Lord; he is to first give account, insofar that the Lord commanded him. The word of God was given to him and he was held responsible for the failure.

> ". . . . . by one man sin entered into the world . . . . . by one man's offence death reigned . . . by one man's disobedience many were constituted sinners" (Rom. v. 12-19).

It is evident from the context of this last passage that although Paul uses the Greek anthropos (which can be "a human being whether male or female") he has Adam in mind (verse 14) and not Eve, or man in general. Adam could be looked upon as being, in a sense, in covenant relationship with the Lord:

> "They (Ephraim and Judah) like Adam have transgressed the covenant" (Hosea vi. 7 R.V.), and this would explain how it was that "from Adam to Moses" there were those who did not sin "in the likeness of Adam's transgression" (Rom. v. 14), i.e. against a direct commandment from God. Moses is no doubt meant to represent the Law which brought Israel into covenant relationship to the Lord and which involved a number of direct commandments from Him (Exod. xix. 5, 6; xx. 1-17, etc.). Adam, in that the Lord God gave a direct commandment to him, was, in a sense, in a similar position to Israel, and this is probably what is in mind in both Hosea vi. 7 and Rom. v. 14, referred to above.

Man, insofar that the headship is vested in him, stands in a position of precedence in the man-woman relationship for the present economy (this not being mistaken with the idea that he himself has any precedence, there being no respect of persons with God). This position involves him in certain responsibilities and authority which woman is expected to recognize under the term "subjection" (I Cor. xiv. 34; Eph. v. 22-24; Colossians iii. 18; Titus ii. 5; I Pet. iii. 1-6). (The word "obedience" in the Authorized Version of I Cor. xiv. 34 and Titus ii. 5 is the same Greek hupotasso as in the other passages.) For either man to fail to take this position allotted to him (Adam's failure), or woman to usurp it (Eve's failure), can only mean a dishonouring both of the Word and the Lord Himself. This is especially serious in the light of the fact that the relationship between husband and wife is used in Scripture as a picture (perhaps a pale one) of that between Christ and the church:

> "Wives submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as unto the Lord. For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the church . . . . . Therefore as the church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in everything" (Eph. v. 22-24).

The meaning of man's headship in specific terms will be interpreted in the lives of those who seek the Lord's honour according to their understanding of their respective positions before Him. Husband and wife will conduct their lives "as unto the Lord", "in the fear of Christ" (Eph. v. 21, 22 R.V.), and the knowledge that their relationship in 'one flesh' is a picture of Christ and the church, should add to the carefulness of their walk.

With regard to the unmarried, difficulties have already been expressed concerning the fulfillment of the positions of man and woman in their relationship to each other. Again specific walk will be determined as before the Lord, and no godly man or woman will have any desire to do anything which seems to detract from God's original intention in creating "male and female" and allotting to them particular positions in His good pleasure.

> "Be subject to one another from reverence for Christ" (Eph. v. 21 Moffatt).

pp. 170 - 175

It has so far been seen that the headship of man, insofar that it involves him in a position of precedence, speaks of a certain authority and responsibility which he is to exercise in relation to the woman, in the purpose of God. The reader is reminded of the three basic ides which lie behind the Hebrew rosh and the Greek kephale ("head").

(1) Precedence with respect to time, order or position.
(2) Origin or source (out of).
(3) Sum or whole.

All three of these ideas are applied to Christ in Scripture, it being remembered that man's relationship to woman (expressed in the husband-wife unity) is but a pale reflection of Christ's relationship to the Church (Eph. v. 22-33), where the man pictures Christ.

The aspect of headship which involved man in precedence in time ("Adam was first formed", I Tim. ii. 13, cp. I Cor. xi. 9) has already been considered with some of its involvements. Now attention is drawn to a second aspect, represented under the idea of origin or source:

> ". . . . . the head of the woman is the man . . . . . the man is not (out) of the woman; but the woman (out) of the man" (I Cor. xi. 3, 8).

Closely connected in thought with this aspect of headship is a third, that of summation and completion, which also suggests unity. These last two aspects of headship are seen in Christ in that He is:

> "The Amen, the faithful and true witness, the origin (arche) of God's creation" (Moffatt—Rev. iii. 14), and with respect to the Body of Christ:

> ". . . . . speaking the truth in love, we may grow up into Him in all things, Who is the Head, even Christ: from (out of) Whom the whole body . . . . ." (Eph. iv. 15, 16).

Although this last passage is practical truth, it represents a present realization of the meaning of Christ's headship to the church, which headship will, in the dispensation of the fullness of the seasons, be effected as far as the whole creation "in Christ" is concerned (Eph. i. 10). Then, that whole creation will find its unity and completeness in Him; it will, in a sense, be summed up in Him.

> ". . . . . His purpose which He set forth in Christ as a plan for the fullness of time, to unite all things in Him" (R.S.V.).
>
> ". . . . . His good pleasure which He purposed in Himself for the administration of the fullness of times; to head up all things in the Christ" (The Englishman's Greek N.T.).

". . . . . His good pleasure which He purposed in Him,—For an administration of the fullness of the seasons—to reunite for Himself (under one head) the all things in the Christ" (Rotherham).

". . . . . the purpose of His design so to order it in the fullness of the ages that all things in heaven and earth alike should be gathered up in Christ" (Moffatt).

". . . . . His hidden purpose . . . . . to be put into effect when the time was ripe: namely, that the universe, all in heaven and earth, might be brought into a unity in Christ" (N.E.B.).

". . . . . God's merciful purpose . . . . . when the times are ripe for it . . . . . of restoring the whole creation to find its one Head in Christ" (Weymouth).

The above translations of Ephesians i. 10, taken respectively from the R.S.V., The Englishman's Greek N.T., Rotherham, Moffatt, N.E.B. and Weymouth, give some idea of that aspect of headship which suggests that the creation will one day find its unity and completeness in Christ.

Hence the whole creation "in Christ" had its origin, and will find its goal in Him, insofar that He is given as Head. In the headship of man is seen a shadowy picture of this wonderful relationship, and the building of woman took place in such a way that the truth of God's great purpose in Christ was foreshadowed:

"And the rib, which the Lord God had taken from man, builded He a woman . . . . . And Adam said, This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh: she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of Man. Therefore shall a man . . . . . cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh" (Gen. ii. 22-24).

Here, woman had her origin in man ("the woman is out of the man", I Cor. xi. 8) and he would find his goal and completion in her ("cleave unto his wife . . . one flesh")—a unity indeed.

It should be observed that the man does the cleaving, and this is a reminder that it was Christ Who cleaved to the church, not the church to Him. Although it is true to say that the creation finds its completion and goal in Christ as Head, this only so insofar that He first cleaves to it. He is the active one; the church responds to His love. This is always so in the things of God:

"We love Him, because He first loved us" (I John iv. 19).
"Christ loved the church, and gave Himself for it" (Eph. v. 25).

This thought will be seen to explain why it is that the husband is told to "love" his wife, whereas the wife is to "submit" to her husband (Eph. v. 25, 22). Love is initiated by the man (insofar that in this context he pictures Christ) and the woman's role (like that of the church) is responsive.

There are obviously limitations to interpreting types and shadows used in Scripture, and this must particularly be borne in mind when they set forth Christ. The headship of man is a pale reflection of the Headship of Christ, it can never fully set forth the true position, or accurately represent it. For example, as has been seen already, man and woman stand on an equality with each other, and it is only with respect to position that man is found associated with any suggestion of superiority. There are obvious difficulties in seeking to apply this aspect of the husband-wife relationship to Christ and the Church, for if care is not exercised it could be maintained that Christ (as a Being) is in no way superior to the church, but only positionally! Such a thought cannot be entertained.

However, granted such limitations, and since Scripture itself uses the husband-wife relationship as a picture of greater truths (Eph. v.), a good deal of help may be obtained by comparing these things together. Such comparison ought to have a very humbling effect upon us as we seek to live out in practice, even if only in a shadowy way, our relationship to each other as "male and female". It is a wonderful thought indeed that this earthly relationship binds up in itself (in picture form, granted) the two mysteries (secrets) of Eph. iii.:

(1) The secret of Christ, seen by the church as Head (iii. 4, 5).
(2) The secret, concerning the Body of Christ, the Church (iii. 3, 6, 9).

In Ephesians v. the two are set forth in the husband-wife relationship expressed in "one flesh", and they become, considered together, "a great secret" (verse 32). This "great secret" is lived out as a picture in the lives of all who take their God-ordained positions in the husband-wife relationship in obedience to His word.

The Apostle Paul has built practical truth upon two aspects of the headship of man already considered: (a) concerning the recognition by woman of that headship insofar that she has her head covered at worship (I Cor. xi. 3-16) and (b) with respect to teaching and authority (I Tim. ii. 8-15). These passages must be considered in later articles with respect to their relevance or otherwise for the present dispensation.

And he is the saviour of the body.

Do these words, found in Eph. v. 23, and linked to the thought of headship, apply to Christ only, or do they have some relevance to the husband? It hardly seems likely that Paul would have introduced them in this context, if they had no meaning at all apart from expressing the work of Christ, as Saviour of the body of Christ, the church. Surely it is logical to reckon that Paul introduced them here for a specific reason, and since his subject is the practical relationship between husband and wife, they must have some truth to convey in that light.

Commentators seem to have been frightened of allowing that this is so, no doubt because it most certainly cannot be maintained that a man is the "saviour" of his wife, if that word is to be given the full meaning that belongs to it when used of Christ.

Soter (saviour) however, may be used in a different sense than that normally conveyed by the English word which always translates it in the A.V. Consider, for example, the following observations from the Greek papyri on soter:

> "The designation is further extended to leading officials, as when a complainant petitions a praefect in the words . . . . . '(I turn) to you, my preserver, to obtain my just > rights' (P Oxy 1.38/18 A.D.49-50), and similarly in the account of a public demonstration in honour of the prytanis at Oxyrhynchus, the multitude acclaim him . . . . . 'Prosperous praefect, protector of honest men, our ruler!' (ib. 41/22 ii/iii A.D.)" (The Vocabulary of the Greek Testament by Moulton and Milligan.)

The word was also used of the Ptolemies and the Roman Emperors, one example in this connection having the phrase (pan) ton sotera, which should be compared with I Tim. iv. 10:

> ". . . . . the living God, Who is the Saviour of all (soter panton) men . . . . ."

In this last passage the word soter is given the meaning "Preserver" in the Englishman's Greek Interlinear Literal Translation, as it is also in F. F. Bruce's Expanded Paraphrase of the Epistles of Paul:

> ". . . . . the living God, the Preserver of all mankind, especially of believers."

Considering the context in which these words are found, the translation conveys the right sense in which the Apostle is using the word. Timothy is urged not to be taken up with the exercise of the body (for its preservation), but rather to exercise himself with a view to godliness (7). Not that bodily exercise is wrong, but that it is limited in its service, whereas godliness is profitable for everything, "since it holds the promise of life here and now and of life to come" (J. N. D. Kelley's translation of I Tim. iv. 8). Timothy is reminded that he has his dealings with the God, Who is the Preserver of all mankind. (No doubt there is much more behind Paul's concern for Timothy than has been suggested here, for the whole passage seems to be a warning against aestheticism, characteristic of later Gnosticism.)

Returning then to the clause of the original enquiry, "and he is the saviour of the body" (Eph. v. 23), it may be granted in the light of the usage of soter, that although when applied to the Saviour it must be given a very full sense, it could be true of the husband in a lesser way. He is to be the preserver and protector of his wife.

Before asking in what way he is to put this role into practice, it is interesting (and relevant to part of this subject) to note that the idea of salvation may be understood in this same way in I Tim. ii. 15:

> ". . . . . she shall be preserved (sozo, related to soter) through child-bearing . . . . ."

Moffatt has, "Women will get safely through childbearing" and Weymouth is substantially the same. This promise will be considered in a later article.

The husband's role as "protector".

If it is true to say that Eph. v. 22-33 is a practical passage of Scripture dealing with the outworking of the husband-wife relationship, then it is also logical to believe that the Apostle who wrote it included those thoughts which would be helpful in understanding what was involved in that relationship. It has already been seen that although the clause in verse 23, "and he is the saviour of the body" must apply in its fullness to Christ Himself, yet, in a lesser sense, it is also true of the husband, insofar that in the relationship being considered, he is a faint picture of the Saviour. Hence other truths expressed in their fullness of Christ in this context, may also be taken to have a relevance (even if only partial) to the role of the husband as "head".

In seeking to answer the question, "In what way is the husband a protector and preserver?", the following words from verses 25-28 seem relevant:

> "Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave Himself for it; that He might sanctify and cleanse it . . . . . that He might present it . . . . . not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing . . . . . So ought men to love their wives . . . . ."

The 'love' which the man is to exhibit to his wife is that which gives itself; a love, true in its fullness of Christ Himself (verse 25, cp. John iii. 16; x. 11, etc.), but pictured in the man. Its object is a presentation without "spot or wrinkle", two words which it is worth while considering.

"Wrinkle" (rhutis) is associated with age, but such may be brought on prematurely through worry or anxiety. The husband's role as "protector" must surely include the thought of shielding his wife from anything which might lead to "wrinkles" of this nature; He must bear the burdens of the marriage.

"Spot" (spilos), also used in II Pet. ii. 13, and found in the verbal form in James iii. 6 ('defileth') and Jude 23 ('spotted'). Dr. Bullinger says of the word, "a spot, a stain; mark, stain, in a moral sense" (Critical Lexicon to N.T.). The word is associated in the context with "the washing of water by the word" (26), and to a Hebrew, such as Paul, this would bring to mind the O.T. washings which removed ceremonial defilement (cp. Lev. xv. e.g.). Such cleansing was a constant reminder of the need for holiness (the outward being a picture of the inward) before God.

These things being so, the idea of a "spot" in this context, a moral blot, suggests that the husband further exercises his place as protector, in that he defends his wife from any such defilement. Was it here that Adam failed, failing to shield his wife from the serpent's cunning and possible defilement? Did he fail to assert his headship in this way, with the consequence that his wife was "thoroughly deceived" (ITim.ii.14, Weymouth)? It is possible that Adam was with Eve when she was tempted (Gen. iii. 6 note "with her" and "Ye" of verse 4), in which case he most certainly failed to defend her.

However this might be, when the life of Abraham is considered, the same fault is seen, for he opted out of his headship when he allowed Sarah to be thought of as his sister only thereby placing her in moral danger, and the seed with it (Gen. xii. 11-20). Isaac (like father, like son), did just the same (Gen. xxvi. 6-11). Did they inherit this basic weakness from their forefather Adam?

There are obviously practical considerations which make it impossible for a man (living in the present society) to be on hand at all times in the role of "protector". When the Western World changed from an agricultural to an industrial society, and thereby demanded that a man should work away from his own home, not only was the husband-wife relationship affected, but the family unit also. However, we note with thankfulness, that at least one aspect of 'protection' is afforded by "the word" (Eph.v.26). If husband and wife ("one flesh") live in obedience to that word, recognizing the specific positions that each have been given in the purpose of God, then they fulfil all that is possible, and this is irrespective of the conditions imposed by any society.

In that relationship, the husband is preserver, protector, provider and deliverer. He must exercise this role as best he can in the circumstances he finds himself, and according as the will of the Lord is revealed unto him. His aim and object, with respect to his wife, should be to shield her from anxiety and moral defilement, presenting her without "spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing".

No.6. The Failure in Eden.
pp. 187 - 191

The failure in the garden of Eden has already been touched upon in this series, but since it has a number of lessons to teach which are relevant to the subject of "male and female", it must be given some consideration. Before looking into this however, there is an important truth which ought to be noticed, and which affects an understanding of the God-ordained positions of man and woman.

Identification.

The human race has come into being in such a way that all mankind are identified with Adam; an important truth upon which the Apostle Paul has built great doctrines. This identification can be felt from such a passage as Acts xvii. 26:

> "He made of (ek, out of) one every nation of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth" (R.V.), and it is also resident in Rom. v. 12-21, where the "one man" Adam is contrasted with the "one Man", Christ.

But 'identification' is also behind some of Paul's arguments concerning "male and female", so much so that Adam, in a sense, stands for man as a whole, whilst Eve represents woman. Consider, for example how Paul rests his case concerning all women upon the experience of Eve in Eden:

> "I suffer not a woman to teach . . . For Adam was first formed, then Eve.
> And Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression" (I Tim. ii. 12-14).

Similarly, in I Cor. xi., he argues that a woman ought to worship with her head covered, from the facts of Eden:

"For the man is not (out) of the woman; but the woman (out) of the man" (8).

This fact was only literally true of the creation of Eve, for since then, as Paul later points out, it has been different:

"For as woman was made from man, so man is now born of woman" (12, R.S.V.).

The Apostle Paul wrote under the inspiration of God when he drew attention to this 'identification' of all men with Adam, and all women with Eve. He was surely conscious of the fact that there are differences among men, as there are also among women, but he has in mind in both of the above passages, the allotted positions of man and woman in the purpose of God. He does not consider whether any individual woman has the knowledge, ability, or even the desire to "teach", he has in mind only that in the good pleasure of God, revealed to him by what happened in Eden, it is not the woman's place. Was Eve deceived when she usurped the position of her husband?—so is any woman likely to be who places herself in the same position, usurping the authority of man. This is identification.

It is therefore important, in considering what happened in Eden, to keep this truth in mind, for it indicates that the tragedy which was enacted there reflects upon a proper understanding of the man-woman relationship, and the respective positions allotted to each of them. In the light of such "identification", we wonder whether any man or woman would dare to assert that they would have acted differently than did Adam and Eve, when subjected to such a test of obedience?

The transgression of Adam.

The word "transgressions" (Greek parabasis) means literally a "stepping aside". It is used of "breaking the law" (Rom. ii. 23), and, as Trench notes in his Synonyms of the N.T., "there must be something to transgress, before there can be a transgression". Hence it is written:

"Where there is no law, neither is there transgression" (Rom. iv. 15, R.V.).

Adam sinned against a direct command from God entrusted to him, and in doing so was not deceived (I Tim. ii. 14); he deliberately disobeyed God (Rom. v. 19). What induced him to do such a thing?

In seeking an answer to this question it must be remembered that Eve was made in such a way that Moses could write:

"Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife" (Gen. ii. 24).

The unity between husband and wife must have been greatly intensified in the first pair, before sin entered to spoil. May it not be that Adam's affection for Eve overcame his better judgment, and rather than be separated from "the woman whom Thou gavest to be with me" (Gen. iii.12), he chose to enter the darkness with her? (In stating this possibility, there is no desire to whitewash the sin of Adam and make him into a hero, any more than the recognition that Eve was deceived takes from her any blame for what happened.)

The sin of Adam is seen in a clearer light by noting that the word "disobedience", used of his fall in Rom. v. 19, is parakoe, meaning literally "to hear aside". This again links Adam's failure to his wife:

> "And unto Adam He said, Because thou hast hearkened (akouo in the LXX) unto the voice of thy wife . . . . ." (Gen. iii. 17).

Another great tragedy resulted from Abram giving way in the same manner; the birth of Ishmael, which brought into being a nation that have ever since been a thorn in the side of Israel:

> "And Sarai said unto Abram, Behold now, the Lord hath restrained me from bearing: I pray thee, go in unto my maid; it may be that I may obtain children by her. And Abram hearkened (hupakouo) to the voice of Sarai" (Gen. xvi. 2).

Ishmael was born (verse 15), but this attempt in the flesh to fulfil the promise of God was rejected by Him, and Isaac was promised (xvii. 15, 16, 21). The interested reader might also like to compare Gen. iv. 23 and xxxix. 10, but just to show that it is not always wrong to "hearken unto thy wife", note Gen. xxi. 12:

> "And God said unto Abraham . . . . . in all that Sarah hath said unto thee (concerning Hagar and Ishmael), hearken unto her voice."

Returning then to Adam, we note how greatly he seems to have been influenced by his wife; firstly in allowing his affection for her to overcome his loyalty to God, and hence in giving way to her "voice", in the matter of the forbidden fruit. Remembering the thought of "identification", we wonder just how much this tendency in Adam is a commentary upon all men; it is certainly true of some!

The influence of the woman.

This seems a good point to consider a factor in the man-woman relationship which makes a great impact upon the success or otherwise of a marriage, the important and influential part played by the wife in that union. Unfortunately that influence can be exercised for good or evil, leading either to tragedy (as in Eden) or blessing abundant.

This is not the place to discuss what part the woman's "influence" has in her calling of God, but it is important to note here what an effect it can have upon the husband, and his position as head.

> "A good wife is an honour to her husband; a shameless wife rots all his strength away" (Prov. xii. 4, Moffatt).
>
> "To gain a good wife is to gain a fortune—a boon bestowed by the Eternal" (Proverbs xviii. 12, Moffatt).
> "A rare find is an able wife—she is worth far more than rubies . . . . . Her husband is a man of note . . . . . She talks shrewd sense . . . . ." (Prov. xxxi. 10, 23, 26, Moffatt).

The writer of this section of Proverbs ends by calling for praise and due credit to be given to such a woman, who has played such an important part in the blessing and happiness of her husband and children (xxxi. 30, 31).

In other passages in Proverbs quite the contrary is seen in other women, who hypnotize men with their charms, and lead them like oxen to the slaughter (ii. 16-19; v. 3-6; vii. 5-27; ix. 13-18). It is true that the women described in these latter passages are harlots and adulteresses, but they are quoted to show just how the feminine charms and persuasion may be exercised to influence for evil, and bring men to dishonour, poverty, ill-health and remorse (v. 8-14). For an example of how a man may throw away all sense of sound judgment before the charms of a woman, consider Herod in Mark vi.:

> ". . . . . the daughter of Herodias . . . . . danced . . . . . pleased Herod . . . . . and the king said unto the damsel, Ask of me whatsoever thou wilt, and I will give it thee. And he sware unto her, Whatsoever thou shalt ask of me, I will give it thee, unto the half of my kingdom" (22, 23).

It may be argued that Herod was drunk and that it was a practice of the time for men in high positions to give rewards to dancers who pleased them (Ellicott Commentary on Matt. xiv. 7), but the "sorrow" of Herod is evidence that he was quite conscious of what was going on; his unthinking oath, drawn from him by the charms of a woman, had cost the head of John the Baptist (25-28).

The reader might like to compare as a contrast to this story, the influence for good displayed by Esther, who found herself with a similar promise, and yet turned it to the blessing of her own people (Esther v. 1 - vii. 10, see esp. v. 3, 6; vii. 2, 3).

Whilst the responsibility for failing to exercise his headship must be laid squarely at the feet of Adam (and indeed also of any man who follows his example), it must not be forgotten that marriage is the union of two people who complement each other, and that therefore both partners influence, for good or evil, the position of "head". It is surely the experience of happily married believers that neither partner is conscious of having to assert their proper place in the calling of God, there is a unity brought about by that word which has no need for such pressures; both "influence" the relationship according to their God-ordained positions in the purpose of God.

Love and obedience.

In considering the failure of Adam in Eden, it has been suggested that he allowed his affection for the woman to outweigh his loyalty to God, and it may be thought that, however wrong this may have been, at least it did show the depth of his love for her. But is this so? We know that such things are commonly asserted by the world, but the believer does not take his standard from such a source. The question seems to be "Can true love exist apart from obedience to God?"; where "true love" is considered in a Scriptural sense.

There can be but one answer to this, exhibited in the actions of the Father and the Son:

"Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us, and sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins" (I John iv. 10).

The love of God was shown in that He did not withhold His Son from the cross (Rom. viii. 32, cp. Gen. xxii. 12, 16); the other side being demonstrated in the "obedience" of the Son (Phil. ii. 8, cp. the same in Isaac Gen. xxii. 7, 8). The picture of Abraham and Isaac fulfilled in the Father and the Son, demonstrates for ever the meaning of true love, that it is closely related to obedience.

Adam did not exhibit "true love" for Eve in allowing himself to be persuaded to act contrary to the Lord's will; affection maybe, but not that love which knows obedience. True love in Adam would have caused him to exercise his headship against all persuasion, for he would have recognized in this his wife's greatest good. No relationship can be lived out contrary to the Lord's will and expect to enjoy true harmony, or experience true love.

The lesson of Eden concerning the headship of man, is a lesson for all time. "Male and female" ignore it to their own loss and the dishonour of the Lord. No man shows his love for his wife by opting out of his responsibility as head, however well meaning his action may appear to be, and likewise no woman usurping this position given by the Lord to her husband can claim that this is any demonstration of the love she has for him. Love and obedience to the will of the Lord go hand in hand. Herein lies the failure in Eden, and herein also is the tragedy which the world and the professing church are courting.

It has so far been seen that the failure of Adam consisted in the fact that he did not assert his God-given position as "head", so that he listened to the voice of his wife instead of to the word of God. He exhibited a weakness in allowing his wife to usurp his position, which divulged upon him the responsibility for the garden, "to dress it and to guard it" and the commandment concerning the tree of the knowledge of good and evil (Gen. ii. 15-17). This responsibility was given him before the building of Eve, a significant fact upon which Paul bases N.T. truth (I Tim. ii. 11-14).

The transgression of Adam involved disobedience, and it is to be noted that in his fall he was not deceived, no doubt suggesting that as "head" he was properly equipped to withstand any temptation from the Evil One. (If he was to guard the garden and the commandment concerning the tree, it is logical to reckon that he had been already equipped by the Lord for such responsibility, for does the Lord give any a job to do without first equipping them?).

Eve however, was apparently not so prepared (her calling lay elsewhere) and hence deception ensued.

The deception of the woman.

From the lips of Eve herself came the confession:

> "The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat" (Gen. iii. 13).

Paul wrote:

> ". . . . . the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty . . . . . the woman being deceived was in the transgression" (II Cor. xi. 3; I Tim. ii. 14).

It is necessary to go back to Genesis itself to find out how this "deception" came about, and since Paul builds important doctrine upon it, it will serve as a useful preparation to consider the steps which led up to this tragedy.

It was shown in a previous article that behind the tragedy in Eden lay the defying of God's "order"

(a) Satan, identified as Lucifer, desired a higher position in God's order than that allotted to him (Isa. xiv. 13, 14).
(b) The serpent is raised up out of its appointed order by Satan and beguiles the woman (Gen. iii. 1-6).
(c) The woman steps out of her appointed place by reasoning with the serpent, instead of referring him to her husband as the guardian (Gen. iii. 1-6).
(d) Adam listens to the voice of his wife instead of to the word of God. He thereby opts out of his headship (Gen. iii. 6, 12, 17).

Now note the steps in the deception of Eve:

> SERPENT. "Can it be that God has said, 'Ye shall not eat from any tree of the garden'?"

The crafty serpent expresses surprise at the stringency of God's commandment, at the same time throwing doubt on whether God can have indeed said such a thing. The serpent has in fact used a clever trick (which has been employed in argument many times since) of quoting something like the word of God (not the word itself), concerning which he will now be able to show its unreasonableness. He has added to the original word from God, making the commandment more stringent; the one tree of Gen. ii. 17 has become "every tree" (the idiom requires "any tree") in iii. 1. Upon this falsification he then throws doubt.

Eve is partially taken in by this trick, for in answering, she herself misquotes the original word of God:

> Eve. "From the fruit of the trees of the garden we may eat, but from the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, God has said, 'Ye shall not eat from it, and ye shall not touch it, lest ye die'."

Following the serpent, Eve also adds to the word of God, "and ye shall not touch it", at the same time minimizing the penalty of disobedience from "surely die" (ii. 17) to "lest ye die" (iii. 3). (The expression "thou shalt surely die" is literally, "dying thou shalt die", an emphatic figure which shows the certainty of death, if disobedience occurs.) Note how the woman has been already influenced by the Devil's opening words in which he has implied severity and unreasonableness on the part of God. She herself makes His commandments more severe ("and ye shall not touch it"), whilst suggesting that God cannot surely mean certain death ("lest ye die"), that being unreasonable. She also omitted the gracious emphasis "freely" (ii. 16 with iii. 2).

The mind of Eve is now already prepared for the serpent's next words, "God does not really mean what He says". She has herself failed to give His words their full weight, now the serpent takes her a further step:

> SERPENT. "Ye shall not surely die: For God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as God, knowing good and evil."

Here is a direct contradiction of the word of God, but with the cunning twist that, although God may well have spoken of the certainty of death, this was only said to deter Adam and Eve from partaking of a fruit which offered so much; God was in fact withholding something from them which would make them like Himself in knowing good and evil. The serpent does not suggest for one moment that there might be a very good reason for the withholding of this knowledge at this time, but simply presents God as one who has made an idle threat to keep mankind from it.

In examining the words used by the serpent in iii. 4, 5, it will be noticed that, apart from the first statement, "Ye shall not surely die", the rest is truth (see iii. 22). This cunning mixture of truth and error, which contains the root of the temptation put before Eve, is too much for her:

> EVE. "And the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was a delight to the eyes, and the tree was desirable to make one wise, and she took from its fruit, and ate; and she gave also to her husband with her, and he ate. And the eyes of them both were opened . . . . ." (iii. 6, 7).

Here in this final step lies the triumph of Satan. The word of God has been misquoted, doubted and openly contradicted, and now the woman turns from it altogether to her own judgment ("And the woman saw"). The tree appeared to have everything to offer; it looked appetizing, was aesthetically pleasing, and perhaps even more important, it offered knowledge. She judged that it was alright to partake of it; she was "thoroughly deceived" (I Tim. ii. 14, Weymouth).

Satan's triumph through the serpent came about for at least two reasons, both of which are relevant to what Paul builds on this tragedy in I Tim. ii. 11-15:

(1) The woman stepped out of the position allotted to her in the good pleasure of God, and usurped the authority of the man (given him in Gen. ii. 15-17), taking a place for which she was not fitted.

(2) She mishandled the word of God, adding to it and minimizing its terms (iii. 2, 3), and then eventually turned from it to her own judgment (iii. 6). She preferred intuition to inspiration.

Upon these two aspects of the failure of Eve, Paul bases truth for all women. (It might be added at this point that the writer of these articles is not responsible for what the Holy Spirit inspired Paul to record on this or any other matter, but he is responsible to faithfully deliver it.)

It would be a logical sequence to what has been seen of the failure of Eve in Eden, to go on now and consider what has been said in I Tim. ii. concerning the teaching of women, but that subject is reserved of a separate article. Hence it seems a good point to notice how the punishments meted out to Adam and Eve, because of their respective failures in Eden, were to remind them constantly of their failures, and God's intended places for them in His economy.

The reckoning.

It is a wonderful commentary on the nature of God, that He came seeking Adam after the fall; and then, not in the heat of the moment, but "in the cool of the day" (iii. 8). He came also not to vent his spite upon his creatures, but in love, and with the promise that the Devil and his works would one day be destroyed (Gen. iii. 15; Heb. ii. 14, 15; I John iii. 8 cp. John iii. 17). But it was not possible that things could remain exactly as they had been before the entrance of sin (Gen. iii. 22-24); there must be a reckoning.

Yet even in this reckoning the mercy of God shines through, for the punishments meted out to Adam and his wife were not arbitrarily chosen, but gave promise of life and taught man and woman that in future they should consider God's order, and their respective places in it.

Unto the woman God said,

> "I will greatly multiplied thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children; and thy desire shall be subject to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee" (Gen. iii. 16 margin).

The first words recorded in Scripture said to the man and woman together were:

> "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it . . . . ." (Gen. i. 28).

We have no reason to suppose that the first three terms of this command could be fulfilled in any other way than is now the experience of man and woman; an experience in which the woman plays the major part, insofar that she conceives, carries, brings forth and nourishes a child. That the production of a seed was of prime importance as far as God's earthly economy was concerned will be shown later in more detail, but here in Gen. i. 28 is the first suggestion of it. Upon the woman divulged the main part of this responsibility, and it was in keeping with this that the woman (when the reckoning was taken by God) should be kept constantly reminded of the presence of sin by now having "sorrow" attached to her experience.

But in this sorrow there shone through hope, for it was to be "the seed of the woman" that would bring salvation and restoration to mankind (Gen. iii. 15; Matt. iii. 20, 21). I Tim. ii. 15 has sometimes been connected with this promise of Christ by translating:

> "She shall be saved through The Childbearing" (i.e. the birth par excellence of Christ Himself).

The whole context of the passage mitigates against this suggestion, however, and it may also be noted that strictly speaking salvation comes only through the death and resurrection of Christ, not His birth (I Cor. xv. 14, 17 etc.).

What the Apostle actually meant in I Tim. ii. 15 by the phrase "she shall be saved through the childbearing" (lit.) will be made the subject of a separate study, when it will be seen that the words have more in common with the thought of working out one's salvation (cp. Phil. ii. 12) than with initial salvation in Christ. A woman will work out her own salvation, not by usurping the position allotted to man (in this context, "teaching"), but by abiding in her own calling in faithfulness and love. Eve was reminded of her peculiar calling in that now it was to be worked out in "sorrow" (Gen.iii.16). Such was the first part of the reckoning.

The second part of the judgment pronounced upon Eve, emphasized the first:

> "Thy desire shall be subject to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee" (Gen. iii. 16 margin).

A number of translations suggest that the first part of this verse means, "Your desire shall be for your husband" (R.S.V.); Moffatt and N.E.B. are similar. But the A.V. margin and The Companion Bible are more in line with the whole context, "thy desire shall be subject to thy husband". The LXX renders the Hebrew teshuqah ('desire') by the Greek apostrophe, "turning".

As the 'desire' of the woman had led her astray in Eden (Gen. iii. 6), so that desire should now be under the control of her husband; her "turning" should be "subject" to him, and he would exercise authority over her in this respect.

But this "rule" (Gen. iii. 16) was not meant to become despotic, making the woman little different from a slave, a situation which became the rule in ancient and modern heathenism, and was even perpetuated under so-called Christendom. Rather was it an emphasis of the relative positions of male and female in God's original design, positions which should have their roots in mutual respect and love, with obedience to God as the prime motive.

In the light of the revelation concerning the Body of Christ, it may be wondered how relevant this "rule" now is. But the Apostle Paul has no hesitation in using the word "submit" of the wife in such a context no less a parallel than that of the Church to Christ (Eph. v. 22-24). Mr. C. H. Welch wrote:

> "The idea of 'submission' in Ephesians v. is not one of a humiliating or servile description, but of recognizing the Lordship of Christ, and so to be willing for the lowest or the highest place, as He shall will" (Christ and the Church in Home and Business).

Whether it be the 'rule' of Gen. iii. or the 'submission' of Eph. v., one thing is quite evident; that God desires both male and female to remember their respective places in His wise economy.

Hence it is seen how that the judgment pronounced upon Eve was God-ordained place in the man-woman relationship, expressed in the idea of "submission". The punishment of Adam was intended to do as much for him also.

Unto Adam God said,

> ". . . . . cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee . . . . . In the sweat of thy nostrils shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground . . . . ." (Gen. iii. 17-19).

Adam had failed to assert his headship over the woman, who in turn, together with Adam, had failed to keep the animal creation in subjection (Gen. i. 27, 28; iii. 1-7). He now was to get a lesson from nature which would constantly remind him of his failure to exercise his authority; the ground would everywhere exhibit signs of his fall, and he would henceforth have to exert his strength to keep it in control ("the sweat of thy nostrils"—iii. 19). He would be kept in mind that he was the strong partner in God's economy; the woman was "the weaker vessel" (I Pet. iii. 7); he was to be employed in keeping 'order' in an earth which now had every evidence of disorder. As such he could surely not forget his proper calling of God at the "head" of God's "order" in the earth.

So were "male and female" taught, even in failure, their proper places in God's overall design. But it seems not to have been long, before (through the line of Cain) every effort began to be made to take the mind off the cursed ground and its lessons. Cities were built where man could forget the severity of life, and amusements and pastimes devised to concentrate his thought elsewhere (Gen. iv. 16-22). It is not without significance that the building of the first city is in the context of leaving the Presence of the Lord (Gen. iv. 16, 17).

It is beyond the scope of these articles to consider how such things have developed into the system which is so much a part of our everyday lives; civilization, with its comforts and attractions which give no sense of the heritage of Eden. But whilst it is not suggested for one moment that many of these things are intrinsically wrong, it would be tragic, if in the life of any believer, they played such a major role in his experience as to detract from the Lord and His intentions through "male and female".

The world of industry and business has been responsible to a great extent for blurring the distinctions between the sexes. It is sad indeed to see this also happening even amongst professing Christians. A proper understanding of the failure in Eden (alas just a myth to so many) will correct any such tendency in those who love the Lord and His Word.

No.8. The Calling of Woman.
pp. 228 - 233

Insofar that the headship of man has already been considered in this series of articles, and this speaks of a relationship, the calling of woman has also been touched upon. Also in article No.2, when referring to the equality of man and woman, it was seen that, since woman was built originally as an "help meet" for man, she is thus his complement. It would be a good preparation for the present article, if the reader went back to these previous articles (Nos.2,4,5) and read again what has been written there.

Woman created on account of the man.

The Scriptural reason for the creation of woman is made clear in two passages:

> "It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him an help meet for him . . . and the Lord God . . . made He a woman . . ." (Gen. ii. 18, 21-23).
> "Neither was the man created for the woman; but the woman for the man" (I Cor. xi. 9).

It will be appreciated that on the basis of these words, the peculiar calling of woman cannot properly be understood apart from her relationship to man. (By her "peculiar calling" is meant her calling as a woman, not her calling, for example, as a member of the Body of Christ, although the latter calling must obviously include the former.) She was originally built as a complement for man, the two together forming a unity—"one flesh" (Gen. ii. 24). There seems to be no reason to assume that this original intention has changed since, even in such a spiritual calling as the Body of Christ (cp. Eph. v. 22-33). What does have to be taken into account however, is that with the entrance of sin, this unity and relationship (which can only be realized in what we call "marriage") does not always come about. Some do not marry for one reason or another, and there are times when it is expedient not to do so (cp. I Cor. vii. 25-40). Such things as these impose limitations on this subject, as has been already indicated in article No.3.

Before proceeding any further it is important to make it quite clear that since both married and unmarried (men or women) are called as members of the Body of Christ, it is obviously possible for them to "walk worthily" of that calling, whether single or married. Otherwise, Paul's exhortation in Eph. iv. 1 would be so much mockery from the Lord. But there are further responsibilities which divulge upon the married (Eph. v. 22 - vi. 4; Col. iii. 18-21), and which represent part of their worthy walk. These latter responsibilities are a reflection of the peculiar callings of man and woman, understood and realized fully only within marriage.

Woman and the Earthly Calling.

By "the Earthly Calling" is meant, that calling of God which deals with the peoples whose hope is earthly in sphere, Israel holding the first place. Such a calling is revealed in the greater part of Scripture (the whole of the O.T. plus all the New with the exception of Paul's post-Acts xxviii. epistles, viz., Eph., Phil., Col., I & II Tim., Titus and Philemon). How relevant the calling of Womanhood in this Earthly Calling is to the present Heavenly purpose of God, must be given consideration.

Having noted the basic reason for the original creation of woman, "on account of the man", "as a help meet for him", consider now the first command given to man and woman as a pair.

> "And God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth . . . . ." (Gen. i. 28).

The words "fruitful . . . . . multiply . . . . . replenish" refer to the production of a seed. Both male and female are involved in this of course, but the burden obviously falls upon the woman, insofar that she is the one who conceives, carries, bring forth, suckles and protects the child in its early years. A large part of her special calling therefore involves her in motherhood. This is also appreciated from Gen. iii. 20:

> "And Adam called his wife's name Eve; because she was the mother of all living."

"Eve" means life or life-spring, and she was named by Adam in connection with her special calling of being a spring of life—motherhood.

The name "Adam" similarly conveyed a truth (remembering that the Hebrew adam is many times used of a human being, whether male or female—cp. Gen. i. 26, 27 "man"). Deriving from the word damah (see An Alphabetical Analysis, Part 1, page 36 by Charles H. Welch). It was a reminder that man was made "in the likeness of God" (Gen. i. 26; v. 1).

Referring again to Eve, it is also noted that when she is judged by the Lord after the fall, her particular punishment (which was not arbitrary) referred yet again to this special calling:

> "I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children . . . . ." (Gen. iii. 16).

Even the wonderful promise given to woman in I Tim. ii. 15 (written, it may be noted, after Acts xxviii.) points in the same direction.

> "She shall be saved in childbearing, if they continue in faith and love and holiness with sobriety."

In the Earthly Calling, where Israel predominated, the production of a seed was of prime importance. Israel was to be a great nation, and that greatness included amongst other things, numerical strength (Gen. xii. 2; xiii. 16; xxii. 17; Exodus i. 7-9;

I Kings iv. 20, etc.). Under such circumstances it was looked upon as a "reproach" for a wife to be barren (Gen. xxix. 31; xxx. 22, 23), and part of the Lord's blessing upon Israel was fruitfulness and safety in bringing forth young (Exod. xxiii. 26; Deut. vii. 14; xxviii. 4).

> "Lo, sons are a heritage from the Lord, the fruit of the womb a reward . . . . . ." (Psalm cxxvii. 3, R.S.V.).

It seems also that outside of Israel, and probably stemming from the original command to Adam and Eve in Gen. i. 28, similar ideas were held about barrenness. Abimelech, king of Gerah (a city of the Negeb) who lived in the time of Abraham, had a taste of the judgment of God when "the Lord . . . . . fast closed up all the wombs of the house of Abimelech" (Gen. xx. 17, 18).

A very big part of the calling of woman, as far as the Earthly purpose of God was concerned, was motherhood, and the great honour which was to be bestowed upon womanhood had been made known from the earliest times:

> "the woman . . . . . her seed . . . . . it shall bruise thy (the serpent's) head" (Gen. iii. 15), and when the fullness of time came, "God sent forth His Son, made of woman . . . . ." (Gal. iv. 4). Herein lay the great privilege and blessing of womanhood, to be the vehicle whereby the Word would become flesh, a promise which had its fulfillment in Mary, "blessed amongst women" (Luke i. 28, 42).

But this special calling of woman, the calling of motherhood, is very much tied to the Earthly Calling of God, where the production of a seed was of prime importance. How relevant is it to the present Heavenly Calling?

Motherhood and the Body of Christ.

It is quite evident from Scripture that the members of the Body of Christ have no command from God to produce a seed. Such a command, if it did exist, would be of such an important nature, that it would appear clearly in Paul's epistles of the Mystery, written from his Roman prison. But no such word is found therein.

On the other hand it is necessary to guard against a too spiritual outlook on this subject, which views the bringing forth of children as something too fleshly to have anything to do with such an high and holy calling as that given to the Body of Christ. Such an attitude savours of Gnosticism, which has been a great detracter from truth in all ages.

Writing after Acts xxviii., Paul assumed the existence of children in more than one context:

> "Children, obey your parents in the Lord . . . . . ye fathers, provoke not your children to wrath: but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord" (Eph. v. 1, 4).
> ". . . . . she shall be saved in childbearing . . . . ." (I Tim. ii. 15).

> "A bishop then must be . . . . . one that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity" (I Tim. iii. 2, 4, see also verse 5).
> "I desire therefore that the younger widows marry, bear children . . . . ." (I Tim. v. 14 R.V.).

Paul's admonition in the last passage is even a corrective so that no occasion should be given to the adversary (Satan, verse 15?) to revile.

It is necessary to take balanced view of childbearing within the calling of the Body of Christ, not reading into it terms which belong only to the Earthly Calling of God, vested largely in Israel, but on the other hand not confusing the spiritual nature of the present calling as though it mitigated against children. Whether or not members of the Body of Christ ought to have children (assuming the possibility) and how many, is one of those personal matters between the individual and the Lord. It introduces aspects of this subject which the writer does not consider are part of public exposition, since the Scriptures do not directly refer to them (the rightness or otherwise of contraception, for example). Such aspects as these must be left to Christian couples, as before the Lord, to decide.

However, there are a number of points that such couples might well keep in mind before reaching any decision as to what part motherhood is to play in the present calling of woman. They refer to differences between the situation in Israel when the Earthly Calling of God was in progress, and the present situation.

Firstly, there are not wanting indications that since the bearing of children formed a large part of the calling of woman in Israel, then she was given special strength to perform this function.

> ". . . . . the Hebrew women are not like the Egyptian women; for they are vigorous and are delivered before the midwife comes to them" (Exod. i. 19, R.S.V.).

The word "vigorous" (A.V. "lively") here is the Hebrew chayeh, cognate with chavah, "Eve", a name given to her in view of her special calling, "mother of all living" (Gen.iii.20). Whilst it cannot be ruled out that the midwives, who made the above statement, may have been lying to protect their own skins, it is probable that they did in fact speak the truth. The rapidity and ease of delivery of Arabian women in even modern times is remarked upon in the Keil and Delitzsch Commentary on Exodus 1:19 (referring to the writings of Burkhardt and Tischendorf).

This is not to say of course, that such strength and vigour were universal among Israel (or any other nomadic people not enfeebled by the luxuries of civilization). Nor is it right to assume that every birth was perfect; untimely births were not apparently unknown amongst the Israelites:

> "Wicked men . . . . . may they wither . . . . . like an abortive birth which melts away or a still-born child which never sees the sun" (Psa. lviii. 3, 7, 8, N.E.B.).

There was however the promise of Psa. cxxviii. 1-3:

> "Blessed is everyone that feareth the Lord; that walketh in His ways . . . . . The wife shall be as a fruitful vine . . . . . thy children like olive plants . . . . .", and who can judge what measure of blessing (of this nature) might have been enjoyed by the whole nation of Israel, if only they had hearkened to the Lord's judgments, to keep and do them (Deut. vii. 12-15)?

Turning now to the Body of Christ it is quite evident that no such fruitfulness, nor special "vigour", is promised to married women in connection with their calling within this company (although I Tim. ii. 15 should be taken into account), and this must be a factor to influence any understanding of the role of motherhood in this present calling.

Closely connected with this in thought, is the fact that part of the blessing of the Lord upon Israel involved their becoming a nation of great multitude, as the "dust of the earth", "the sand upon the sea shore" and as "the stars of the heaven" (Gen. xiii. 16; xxii. 17). No such promise is associated with the calling of the Body of Christ.

A further point of difference that may be noted is that whilst an Israelite woman might look upon herself as under the judgment of the Lord if she were found barren, wringing from her such a cry as that of Rachel to Jacob ("Give me sons, or I shall die") or such a vow as Hannah vowed before the Lord ("If thou wilt . . . . . grant me offspring, then I will give the child to the Lord for his whole life")—Gen. xxx. 1; I Sam. i. 11, N.E.B., there is no suggestion that barrenness ought to be viewed in such a light in the present calling.

Over against these points however, are the following thoughts taken from the post-Acts xxviii. ministry of Paul, which, it is trusted, may help the reader to arrive at some sort of balanced view between the extremes that some have been led into.

Paul sees in the ability of a man to manage his own household well, keeping his children in submission and respectful in every way, the kind of quality required in an overseer of an assembly (I Tim. iii. 1-5). Such a statement suggests that Paul considers it perfectly natural in the present calling, to have children, in fact the family circle seems to provide a good training ground (in this context) for such a position of responsibility.

I Tim. v. 14 is part of a special context dealing with widows. Paul shows a realistic appreciation of the emotional problems of "younger widows" (R.V.), and as an expedient desires, that in order to afford the Adversary no grounds for slander, they should remarry and have children. It is beyond the scope of this article to consider the context in any detail, and it is only brought forward here to show that Paul saw nothing wrong or unspiritual in motherhood; in fact here it serves as a corrective against gossip and misconduct (verses 11-13, 15).

Finally, it ought not to be forgotten, that perhaps the most "spiritual" calling of all, that revealed especially in Ephesians and Colossians, includes within it terms the ideas of "household" and "family" (Eph. ii. 19; iii. 15) when seeking to make known something of the purposes of God in Christ. The same epistles, which minister such a high calling, and take the believer to "heavenly places" (Eph. i. 20; ii. 6, etc.), are also just as concerned that a walk, “worthy” of that calling should include right relationships between parents and children (Eph. vi. 1-4; Col. iii. 20, 21).

All the above points, based upon Scripture, must be taken into consideration at least (to say nothing of many others which are purely common sense, e.g. health, environment and economies), in determining for the believer, as a member of the Body of Christ, just how far motherhood remains today a part of the peculiar calling of woman.

The Plan of God.

No.37. The Epistle to the Philippians (4).

pp. 16 - 20

We concluded our last study with the magnificent reaction of the Apostle Paul to the activities of his enemies at Philippi, who were seeking to add affliction to his bonds, doubtless out of jealousy and animosity. "What of it?" he exclaims. Whatever is happening, Christ is being proclaimed! This was what really mattered to the Apostle, who could rise above the rigours of his imprisonment and the petty behaviour of these people. He was sustained by "the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ" and their intercession for him (Phil. i. 19). Whether his "salvation" mentioned in verse 19 meant his deliverance from prison, or the final salvation with eternal glory (II Tim. ii. 10), the context does not make clear, but there is room for both conceptions. The latter one certainly fits in with the following verse, in which the Apostle mentions his "earnest expectation" and the hope of not being "ashamed", which looks forward to the Lord's future assessment of his service.

> "According to my earnest expectation and hope, that in nothing shall I be put to shame, but that with all boldness, as always, so now also Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether by life, or by death" (Phil. i. 20 R.V.).

It would seem that Paul had Job xiii. 16 in mind, where the LXX is identical. "This is also shall be my salvation" (R.V.).

The one thing that is dominant in Paul's thought right through this section is the proclamation and exaltation of Christ; self is completely left out. "Christ shall be magnified" is the note that is stressed right through; whether he lives or whether he dies is not the first concern of the Apostle. Either can contribute to the glory of the ascended Lord Jesus as He wills.

At first glance, verse 21 seems to contradict this:

> "For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain."

Whose gain? Christ's or Paul's? Most expositors seem to think it is Paul's, but this would contradict the very spirit of this context. It would introduce a self-motive which was completely lacking in the Apostle's mind here. Even if chapter iii. is remembered with its stress on the "prize of the high calling" (iii. 14), we must not assume that this is the only theme that is brought forward in this epistle. Paul has certainly avoided the spirit of Peter when he said "Behold, we have forsaken all, and followed Thee; what shall we have therefore?" (Matt. xix. 27). The Companion Bible note on Phil. i. 21 is,

"if his bonds had furthered the Gospel, what might not his death do?" and this is to the point. There is a structural chiasmos here, which, when fully filled out, reads:

> "For me to live is Christ (His gain), and to die is (Christ's) gain."

If we could only catch this spirit so that the whole of our life and service aims solely at Christ's glory and magnification!

Apokaradokia, "earnest expectation", is a picturesque word, used only by Paul in two contexts; Rom. viii. 19, "the earnest expectation of the creation", and here. It was possibly coined by him and describes a keen anticipation of the future, literally a "craning of the neck" to see what lies ahead. This future certain hope bore a relationship to his imprisonment and testing, making them "a light affliction", while he looked at this future glorious scene (II Cor. iv. 17, 18), and so enabling him more resolutely to magnify the Lord in his body, whether in its present sufferings or in final martyrdom!

At this point the Apostle's language becomes broken and irregular, reflecting in a vivid way his thoughts as they pass from the possibility of further service for the Lord on his release from prison, or the giving of his life for His Saviour.

> "But if to live in the flesh—if this is the fruit of my work, then what I shall choose I wot not" (i. 22 R.V.).

The R.V. margin gives the alternative reading "I do not make known". Gnorizo occurs 24 times in the N.T., but never in the sense of "knowing". It is generally rendered make known, or declare, and what Paul is saying here, is not that he did not know what to choose, but he did not make it known. Whatever his personal desires were, he put them on one side for the will of the Lord to be accomplished and His glory furthered.

Two alternatives presented themselves to him: (1) departing and being with Christ, (2) staying in this life with the object of serving Him and His people.

> "But I am in a strait betwixt the two, having the desire to depart and be with Christ; for it is very far better; yet to abide in the flesh is more needful for your sake" (i. 23, 24 R.V.).

These are two opposites which put him under constraint. He was "hemmed in on both sides (J. B. Lightfoot). If he merely considered himself, then to be with Christ was infinitely better, with all the sufferings and imperfections of this life finished for ever. But the spirit of this intensely unselfish man so controlled him that he was willing to put self and its desires entirely on one side. It was more needful for the Philippians (24) that he should stay here, and so this became the overriding consideration.

What a lot of wishful thinking and even rubbish has been read into the statement "to depart and be with Christ". Those who indulge in this seem to have forgotten that Paul had already dealt with the state after death and resurrection to follow in I Cor. xv., and II Cor. v., and that, being the man he was, he was not likely to contradict himself and cause confusion among the churches. The fundamental doctrine of the resurrection of the believer has been so jettisoned by modern Christianity, that many are only too glad to seize on this verse to support their unscriptural views. It can be said with certainty that, for the believer in the N.T. there is no way out of the grave except by resurrection, whether it is as the consummation of his certain hope, or an out-resurrection, a special one in connection with his prize. Those who do not believe this conveniently stress Phil. i. 23 and forget Phil. iii. 11 "if by any means I may attain to the out-resurrection, out from among the dead" (literally). This was the Apostle's great desire in chapter iii., and it does not express an opposite sentiment to i. 23. The two must and do blend together. To consider departing and being with Christ, apart from his longing for this unique resurrection, shows a biased mind.

This is not the place to give a detailed exposition of II Cor. v., but the reader should ponder it carefully and prayerfully and he will then see that the last thing Paul wanted was the death state—for that was like being naked. He rather longed for "his house from heaven", the permanent dwelling of the resurrection body in contrast to the temporal tent of the present mortal one. Without such a resurrection, believers who had died were perished (I Cor. xv. 18) another verse which the wishful thinkers conveniently ignore.

As to the timing of either the believer's resurrection or out-resurrection, we do not go into here, having already dealt with this point elsewhere. Far too much has been made of the timing rather than the certainty of these resurrections, and this timing is invariably by inference rather than from the clear teaching of Scripture. As far as the experience of the believer goes in these matters, it will be "death and sudden glory" for those who have "fallen asleep in Christ". There is certainly no legitimate ground here for violent disagreement or faction, and in these intensely dark and difficult days we need to take heed and not allow the enemy to come in as the divider of the brethren, and so nullify the Divine unities of Eph. iv. and the practical unity in service brought forward in Philippians.

Coming back to the context of Phil. i. 24, we have noted that the Apostle Paul put any private desires of his own on one side, and considered the needs of his loyal supporters at Philippi:

> "And having this confidence, I know that I shall abide, yea, and abide with you all, for your progress and joy in the faith" (i. 25 R.V.).

Not only this, but he felt confident that he would be released from his prison, and be in a position to visit them again (26). This would give them much joy. The A.V "rejoicing" is too mild. Kauchema is really "glorying" (as R.V.), or better, exultation. What a rich answer this would be to their prayers for the Apostle, and how it would thrill their hearts to see him again in the flesh and share with him the spiritual riches in Christ!

Verse 27 commences a section of exhortation and example, and no notice should be taken of the chapter break, for this section goes on to ii. 18.

> "Only let your manner of life be worthy of the gospel of Christ . . . . ." (i. 27 R.V.).

The verb politeuesthe is correctly rendered in the R.V. margin as "behave as citizens worthily". It could be rendered, "let your life as citizens be worthy of the gospel". They had a heavenly citizenship (iii. 20) and their present life here should reflect this, whether Paul was able to visit them or not.

We need constantly to be reminded that there is a three-fold injunction to "walk worthy" in the prison Epistles:

> "Walk worthy of the calling" (Eph. iv. 1).
> "Walk worthy of the gospel" (Phil. i. 27).
> "Walk worthy of the Lord" (Col. i. 10), and this covers every circumstance in the home and outside. The Philippians, as Roman citizens, were intensely proud of their civic privileges with all the benefits that accrued by being a Roman colony. Though living far from Rome, they enjoyed privileges as though they were resident there. As Dibelius puts it, "it signifies a colony of foreigners whose organization reflects in miniature the politeia of the homeland".

Similarly, from a spiritual standpoint, though far away from heavenly places, they were citizens by grace of an exalted sphere there, and thus could not avoid the responsibility that such an overwhelming blessing brought. We too, are in their position; from one sense very much on this earth, yet our home is not here. We are pilgrims, passing through to our eternal home in the heavenlies. May our practical response be like the Hebrew believers who by their faith and conduct declared plainly that they sought a better country, a heavenly one (Heb. xi. 14-16).

No.38. The Epistle to the Philippians (5).

In our last study we were reminded of the three-fold injunction to "walk worthy" in the prison epistles of Paul. The new section of Philippians, upon which we now enter, commences in i. 27 with the word "only" which is emphatic, as it is in Gal. iii. 2. It has the force of "above all", for the Christian practice which follows is essential if the truth is ever to make progress. If groups of believers cannot practically exhibit in their corporate life what they profess, who is going to listen to them seriously? The word that the Apostle uses is not the usual one, peripateo, but politeuesthai, which is cognate with the word "conversation" A.V., or "citizenship" R.V. of Phil. iii. 20. In the verse we are considering, the R.V. is to be preferred. "Let your manner of life be worthy of the gospel of Christ", and in the margin we read, "behave as citizens".

We have already pointed out the force of all this. If the Philippians as Roman citizens enjoyed great civic privileges, then they must also face up to the responsibilities which these brought. Likewise, as citizens of the heavenlies, they must act accordingly, and reflect this by standing together with dauntless courage in absolute unity in service and witness. There is no doubt whatsoever that this thought completes the precious unities of the Spirit, faith and body in Eph. iv., which form such an important part of the believer's "worthy walk". To talk about guarding these, at the same time to do anything that spoils the group-unity in service, is to delude oneself.

To enforce this truth, Paul's vivid mind quickly turns from the figure of civic privileges to a team of athletes united in mind and spirit:

> "Only let your manner of life be worthy of the gospel of Christ: that, whether I come and see you or be absent, I may hear of your state, that ye stand fast in one spirit, with one soul striving for the faith of the gospel; and in nothing affrighted by the adversaries . . . . ." (i. 27, 28 R.V.), and this thought is repeated in iv. 1, "stand fast in the Lord". Any possibility of the spoiling of internal harmony, such as had occurred in the Corinthian church, was dreaded by the Apostle. He knew only too well how such disruptive work played into the hands of Satan and ruined the witness for the Lord. The Philippians must stand not only individually, but together as a company in one soul (literally) and one spirit. They must strive together, "sunathleo", a term connected with the games, which Paul uses again in II Tim. ii. 5 R.V.:

> "And if also a man contend in the games, he is not crowned, except he have contended lawfully."

They must do this together, and this is the recurring thought in this most practical letter, which we ignore to our peril. Such united steadfastness, in spite of all attempts to scare them, would be a "manifest token of perdition" to their opponents. Moffatt vividly translates "fighting side by side", and over all this the Lord was presiding, overruling all to the Philippians' ultimate salvation and their being "more than conquerors" (Rom. viii. 37), while allowing the enemies, with the powers of darkness behind them (Eph. vi. 12), to manifest their own perdition.

The "faith of the gospel" is surely all that "good deposit" of truth which they had received through Paul's ministry, and which the enemies were seeking to overthrow. It was a privilege, not only to receive this by faith, but to suffer for it. The word "given", echaristhe, is formed on the stem of the noun charis, grace. To suffer for God-given truth is not something to be regarded with dread, but a mark of His signal favour, granted for Christ's sake. Such a view would transform the situation and enable the Philippian church to come through with flying colours whatever persecution they were called upon to endure. One is reminded here of Peter and John, who, after being flogged, departed from the Sanhedrin "rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for His Name" (Acts v. 41).

Such suffering then did not come by accident. The Lord was in control, and rather than being a mark of His displeasure, it was one of His approval. And moreover, the Lord identified Himself with the suffering of His children, as Paul doubtless remembered from the words of the Saviour when He arrested him so dramatically on the road to Damascus, and said "I am Jesus, Whom thou persecutest" (Acts ix. 4, 5). Paul reminds the Philippians that, not only were they being tested, but he himself was sharing in their sufferings, in his Roman prison. This he emphasizes by the word "same":

> "Having the same conflict which ye saw in me, and now hear to be in me" (i. 30 R.V.).

They were engaged in a common struggle, in part of which they had seen him involved in the early days at Philippi.

The Apostle now adds to his plea for practical unity with a further four-fold stress. The "if" of ii. 1 is not one of doubt. There was nothing more certain than the realities to which he appeals. "If" could be rendered "since", or supposing it to be retained, we must add the thought of "as indeed is the case". There is no verb in the Greek and most translations supply the verb "to be", but possibly "avails" might be better. Moffatt renders the passage:

> "So by all the stimulus of Christ, by every incentive of love, by all your participation in the Spirit, by all your affectionate tenderness, I pray you to give me the utter joy of knowing you are living in harmony, with the same feelings of love, with one heart and soul, never acting for private ends or from vanity, but humbly considering each other the better man, and each with an eye to the interests of others as well as to his own" (ii. 1-4).

This rendering gives the sense of the passage well. Paraklesis in verse 1 can be rendered "exhortation" as well as "consolation", and this would enforce the Lord's authorization, "exhortation in Christ", to what Paul was saying, showing it was more than a personal plea. "Comfort of love" is the next bond that they should have to keep them together. In Col. iii. 14 it is described as the "tie [bond] of love". This unselfish love is God-given and should cement them together in their witness. The third is "participation in the Spirit", practically sharing all the riches He has given through His truth. "Bowels and mercies" is best taken together as hendiadys "affectionate tenderness" (Moffatt), the bowels being looked upon as the seat of the emotional state, "the abode of tender feelings" (Lightfoot).

All this should have constituted a stirring appeal to the Philippian church. These lofty motives which have their origin in the Lord, if responded to, would complete the Apostle's joy and would lead to a four-fold result, being "of the same mind" (ii. 2 R.V.), "having the same love" (the love of verse 1), "being of one accord" (together in soul, literally), "of one mind" (repeating the verb phronein). Paul piles up these expressions, deliberately stressing practical and outward unity. The Philippians could be left in no doubt that this manifest unity in service was an absolute essential in the pathway to the heavenly prize. To ignore this was to invite the risk of running the race in vain and being disqualified by the Lord. Such an attitude of mind would lead to strife and vain ambition, and the only antidote was the opposite qualities of unselfishness and humility. This humility is stressed at the outset in the "worthy walk" of Eph. iv. 2. The Apostle himself had exhibited it constantly in his witness and dealing with the churches. He could truthfully say that he had served the Lord "with all humility of mind" (Acts xx. 19). This saved him from the original sin of pride and self-exaltation. Later on in the chapter he is going to bring forward the example of the Lord Who humbled Himself (verse 8).

Real unselfishness, so often talked about but so little practiced, would deliver from the bondage to self and the claiming of one's rights, "not looking each of you to his own things, but each of you also to the things of others" (verse 4 R.V.). The spirit that wins the prize is not concern for ourselves, but first of all for the needs of others. Self-renunciation is a hard lesson to learn, for with all of us the "I" has great pull, and we must watch constantly that self-interest does not enter into our motives for Christian service.

In order to enforce this most necessary lesson, in fact it is the very essence of this letter to the Philippians, Paul brings forward examples in the lives of others, the first thing being the supreme example of the Lord Himself:

> "Have this mind in you, which was also in Christ Jesus . . . . ." (ii. 5 R.V.).

There is no verb in the second part of the sentence. The A.V. and R.V. supply the verb "to be", but most modern expositors take the phrase "in Christ Jesus" in the usual Pauline sense of being positionally in Christ. F. F. Bruce's paraphrase is, "Let your purpose and attitude of heart be that which is becoming in those who are one in Christ Jesus". This is acceptable if it does not remove the introduction of the Lord as the Example above all others. If we still keep to the A.V. and R.V. rendering, we must realize that it is not the mind of Christ as a whole which Paul is exhorting the Philippians to have. It would be impossible for any limited human being to contain all the mind of God. Here it is rather the particular aspect of complete unselfishness which the Lord so wonderfully exhibited when He left all the glory that was His before the creation, and was willing to stoop so low, ending in the death of the cross for our sakes.

The great passage that now follows, is one of the most profound in the Bible, and has been recognized as such by Biblical scholars from the first centuries onwards. It abounds with difficulties in interpretation. The Scriptures say very little about the pre-existence of Christ before creation and this very fact complicates the teaching even further. One thing we may be sure of—Paul was not writing this passage to overwhelm the believers at Philippi, nor Christians of succeeding generations. The primary purpose was not to give a complete revelation of the position Christ had in eternity past, but to stress the exceeding love which was willing to give Himself to the limit and which we must have, if we are going to "run well" in the heavenly race.

In examining this context, we shall find there are seven steps of the Lord downward from the glory to the cross, and seven steps upward to that same glory that was His, originally, and this is balanced in the structure of the epistle by the seven gains of Paul in the flesh an his seven gains in the Spirit in chapter iii. 7-11.

Seven-fold Humiliation of Christ	His Seven-fold Exaltation
(1) He emptied Himself (made Himself of no reputation	(1) The Name above every name
(2) Became a bond slave	(2) Every knee shall bow
(3) Likeness of a man	(3) Things in heaven
(4) Fashioned as a man	(4) Things in earth
(5) He humbled Himself	(5) Things under the earth
(6) Obedient unto death	(6) Every tongue shall confess
(7) Even the death of the cross	(7) Jesus Christ is LORD

Many are the interpretations of this passage, and one might well be daunted in trying to ascertain the correct one, but we remember that the words used must have a definite meaning and have been within the comprehension of the Philippians, otherwise their important teaching would have been valueless.

No.39. The Epistle to the Philippians (6).
pp. 56 - 60

We are seeking to expound one of the most profound passages in the Bible namely Phil. ii. 5-11, dealing with the pre-incarnate Christ and His seven voluntary steps downward from the glory that was His before His Nativity, to the shame and degradation of the Cross, followed by seven steps upward to the glorious position He relinquished. Before we seek to deal with this section, we wish to point out that it was probably a hymn, and if so, it is one of the earliest examples of Christian hymnody we possess. Ernest Lohmeyer in his work Kyrios Jesus (Heidelberg 1928) pointed this out, noting the way the sentences are constructed and the rhythmical cadence of the lines. If this is so, one would expect it would be possible to arrange them into stanzas, and Lohmeyer has done so with six stanzas with three lines thus:

(1) Being in the form of God
He considered it not a thing to be seized
To be equal with God.

(2) But emptied Himself
By taking the form of a slave
Coming in human likeness

(3) And appearing on earth as a man
He humbled Himself
Becoming obedient unto death (indeed death on a cross)

(4) Wherefore God highly exalted Him
And bestowed on Him the Name
That is above every name

(5) That at the Name of Jesus
Every knee should bow
Of things in heaven, on earth, and under the earth.

(6) And every tongue shall confess
Jesus Christ is LORD
To the glory of God the Father.

Other scholars have modified this, but it is possibly true and would fall in line with other hymns contained in the N.T. such as the Nativity Canticles in Luke, and the hymns of praise in the Revelation and elsewhere. In view of Eph. v. 19 and Col. iii. 16, what more natural than that the early church should sing the praises of One who was so rich, yet for our sakes became poor, that through His poverty we should become eternally rich and endow us with such a high and holy calling? As to whether Paul composed this section of the epistle as a hymn, or is using another's composition under the Spirit's guidance, we cannot know for certainty. That the Apostle was capable of poetry of the highest order, "the hymn to love", as it has been called, of I Cor. xiii. clearly testifies.

But what early hymn has been so difficult to interpret? One writer, Karl Bornhauser, has observed that when there has been gathered all that has been written and issued on these verses, one has a library! Yet, as we have before stated, the passage must have been such that the Philippian believers could understand it, at least in a measure, otherwise it would have been of little value to them. And so, we take heart, believing that, if we notice very carefully what has been written, and avoid either adding ideas of our own or subtracting from the Divine record, we can receive such an understanding ourselves under the guidance of the Holy Spirit.

For those who are capable of deep study, and who have an up-to-date background of N.T. Greek, the writings of J. Lightfoot and E. H. Gifford may be consulted, together with other Biblical scholars of the Victorian period. The twentieth-century writers such as Barth, Lohmeyer, F. W. Beare, Dibelius, Jeremias, M. R. Vincent, among many others, give a different view point and should be weighed over in the light of Scripture. One recent monumental work is R. P. Martin's Carmen Christi, but this is a work chiefly for advanced students. Mr. C. H. Welch's The Prize of the High Calling is an obvious choice for those who value a rightly divided exposition, although Mr. Welch would never claim that what he has advanced is the last word on this Philippian passage. However, his deep insight into the truth made known through Paul's epistles, must always command respect and should never be ignored.

There are a number of points we must carefully consider in the exposition of Phil. ii. 5-11; (1) Being in the form of God. (2) The meaning of morphe, form. (3) Robbery harpagmos. (4) To be equal with God, to einai isa Theo. (5) He made Himself of no reputation, literally, He emptied Himself. (6) He took upon Him the form of a slave (servant). (7) He was made in the likeness of men. (8) Being found in fashion as a man He humbled Himself even to the death of the cross. If we can get a Scriptural conception of these eight points, we are well on the way to understanding what lies behind this profound passage.

Huparchon,* being in the form of God.

The word "being" is not the verb "to be" but huparchon "existing", though we must remember that this word had a weakened sense, almost equivalent to einai, to be, in N.T. times, as the grammarians such as Liddell—Scott—Jones, Moulton—Milligan, Bauer—Arndt—Gingrich, and A. T. Robertson, testify. Cognate with huparcho is huparxis (Acts ii. 45 "goods") and huparchonta, the participle used as a substantive, also translated a number of times "goods", thus being practically identical with "I have". Note Peter's use of huparcho in Acts iii. 6, "silver and gold have I none".

Huparcho can denote an original or fundamental possession as I Cor. xi. 7 testifies. Man is the image and glory of God, not by acquirement, but in virtue of his original creation by God (Gen. i. 27). Whatever morphe consists of, it was Christ's original possession. Very little is revealed in the Scriptures of the Lord's pre-incarnate state, and we need to be very careful in dealing with or accepting all the statements of the creeds. One would have thought that all careful students of the Bible would have insisted that, if ever there was a place where the actual wording of Scriptures must be carefully handled and adhered to without addition or subtraction, it is here. Yet what do we find? Too often mere influence or guess-work form the basis of theological ideas which cannot therefore be equated with the revealed truth. Some dogmatically push the sonship of Christ before Bethlehem, totally ignoring the fact that there is no direct statement of God's Word or revelation on this point. Where the Divine Book keeps quiet, we should be quiet too. We are certain that Divine sonship is true of the holy Babe yet to be born, for the angel definitely states this to be the case in Luke i. 35. Note he does not say that the holy thing that shall be born is called the Son of God but "shall be called" so.

The two important passages which deal with Christ's pre-incarnate existence are John i. 1 and Col. i. 15-19. What a magnificent opportunity the Apostle John had, when writing the prologue to his Gospel, of stating the eternal Sonship of Christ, if this was truth! He could have written:

> In the beginning was the Son, and the Son was with God and the Son was God, but he did not do so! Before Bethlehem the Lord Jesus was the Logos, the Word. Here we are on sure ground. Being originally the "Word" must therefore be parallel or identical with "being in the form of God", and had this been carefully considered, much profitless speculation that has been written on this passage would have been avoided. Of Christ's eternal existence we have no doubt, for if he was God, this must be true, but in what capacity had He always existed, is the point at issue.

Those who deny the Deity of Christ are unreliable expositors of the passage with which we are dealing. They rest on false premises. They perpetuate the fallacy of arguing from human experience, that a son implies a pre-existing father, not realizing that the word "son" is used in both Old and New Testaments divorced from the idea of generation or priority. In Hebrew, age is expressed by the phrase "the son of --- years", and the N.T. uses such expressions as the "sons of disobedience". It was one of the commonest ways of expressing identity.

Having misunderstood this, Arians often project the father-son relationship before Bethlehem and so, with a double error, they give us darkness rather than light. John i. 1 "In the beginning was the Word . . . . . and the Word was God", must be before our minds all the time when dealing with Phil. ii. 6-11 or we shall surely go astray. We have read a number of expositions from well-known scholars where John i. 1 is not even mentioned.

We come to the other great passage which deals with Christ in His pre-incarnate existence, namely Col. i. 15-19, where He is designated as the "Image of the invisible God". The Greek for 'image' is eikon which the LXX uses to translate the Hebrew tselem, image, in Gen. i. 26, "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness". In Dan. iii. 19 we have the phrase "the form of his (the King's) countenance", where the Aramaic equivalent tselem is rendered in the LXX by morphe. In fact eikon and morphe are used as interchangeable terms in the Greek Bible which helps us in our understanding of morphe in Phil. ii. The same can be said of eikon and doxa, glory, in the LXX, and we remember that Gen. i. 27 is directly quoted in I Cor. xi. 7; man is the "image and glory" of God, and the Lord Jesus Himself is described as the "Image and glory of God" (II Cor. iv. 4). The magnitude of God's glory is such that, unmediated and unveiled, no creature can see or endure it. It can only be seen partially by creation in Image—the Lord Jesus Christ.

To some extent the uncovered glory of God in its full blaze of light and majesty must be veiled. This Moses had to learn when He desired to see God's glory (see Exodus xxxiii. 18-23). This tremendous glory then is bound up with Christ, the eikon, Image of God. God is spirit (John iv. 24) and as such He has no dimensions or shape from which a likeness could be fashioned, as in the creation of Adam. God cannot be seen in His essence; only in His Image, the Lord Jesus Christ, and He wills that all the redeemed will finally be conformed to this Image (Rom. viii. 29). Even in the heathen world, it has been shown that an image, eikon, was not held to be a mere representation of an object, but was believed in some way to participate in the being of the object it symbolized. In some way, it was the object it represented, and as it has been expressed, it was "the reality itself coming to expression". How much more is this true with the Godhead! In Christ alone we see expression of the Divine glory, "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (II Cor. iv. 6). James ii. 1 literally reads "our Lord Jesus Christ, the glory".

Summing up then, morphe (form), eikon (image), and doxa (glory) are definitely connected in the Scriptures and throw light on each other. This should help us when we come to consider morphe by itself. It is not too much to say that a clear understanding here with respect to morphe gives us a good foundation for the correct appreciation of the rest of the hymn. We intend to proceed carefully and reverently, studiously avoiding ideas that are not backed up by the clear testimony of Scripture. We realize that this study is very difficult, but we have no means or ability to turn the "strong meat" of the Word, the deep things of God, into milk that all can receive without effort.

No.40. The Epistle to the Philippians (7).
pp. 71 - 74

In our consideration of the profound passage in Phil. ii. 5-11 we now address ourselves to the meaning of morphe, form—"Who, being in the form of God . . . . .". What adds to the difficulty of interpretation is the fact that many of the key-words and terms do not occur elsewhere in the N.T., so that we have no usage to guide us. Morphe only occurs once more, namely Mark xvi. 12. Harpagmos ("robbery") does not occur in the LXX and is a rare word in secular Greek. Huperupsoo, "highly exalted", is a unique word in the N.T as is Katachthonios, "under the earth". Some words and expressions are used in an unusual way. The verb Kenoo ("made Himself of no reputation") only occurs in four other contexts in Paul's writings and then in a bad sense (Rom. iv. 4; I Cor. i. 17; ix. 15; II Cor. ix. 3). Schema, "appearance", is only used once elsewhere by the Apostle (I Cor. vii. 31).

Morphe*, the form of God.

The standard commentary of J. B. Lightfoot on Philippians published in 1868 makes a convenient starting place in modern interpretation together with the work of E. H. Gifford, The Incarnation, a Study of Philippians 2:5-11. Lightfoot compares in detail a similar word schema ("fashion" in Phil. ii. 8) and concludes that morphe stands in contrast to schema as that which is intrinsic and essential is in contrast with that which is accidental and outward. He cites some parallels with Plato and Aristotle and comes to the conclusion that this word is used in a sense substantially the same as it bears in Greek philosophy, not that Paul was deliberately deriving his sense from this, any more than the Apostle John did when he used the word logos, "word", a term already used by the Greek philosophers.

Lightfoot's conclusion is clearly stated: "Though morphe is not the same as phusis, 'nature' or ousia, 'being', yet the possession of morphe involves participation in the ousia also." The same understanding is found in E. H. Gifford who states that morphe theon "is the Divine nature actually and inseparably subsisting in the Person of Christ" (The Incarnation, p.16). "The term includes the whole nature and essence of Deity" (p.19). The same viewpoint is taken by H. R. Mackintosh, and H. C. G. Moule.

One thing we must keep in mind is that the later archaeological discoveries giving much additional light on the Greek of N.T. days were largely denied these scholars. It is now clear that morphe does convey something relating to outward appearance, but at the same time we must not confuse it with schema, or treat the words as though they were synonymous. Schema refers to an outward appearance which does not express inner reality. Abbott-Smith describes the difference "as the outward and accidental" as contrasted with "the inward and essential". It may mean a "false appearance". In the corresponding verbs, the Lord Jesus is "transformed" or "transfigured" on the mount in glorious splendour (verb from the root morph). Believers are being metamorphosed into the image of Christ (II Cor. iii. 18), both these instances being something more than just outward appearance. But when Satan is transformed into "an angel of light", and his ministers into "ministers of righteousness", the verb used is a compound of schema, for this transformation is something outward only—merely a disguise.

As we have morphe again in verse 7, "He took upon Himself the morphe of a slave", it would be helpful if we inquired as to what morphe can mean in this connection and here, as we are within the realm of human experience, we can come to a true understanding which should certainly assist us in our consideration of the "form of God". We are amazed that so many expositors have not done this. Did a slave in N.T. times merely look different from his master, or did this go much deeper? Obviously it did, for a slave had no rights or possessions of his own; he belonged body and soul to his master and was virtually his property, to be bought or sold or even killed as his owner wished. The morphe of slave then is clear. It denoted the status of a slave which doubtless reflected itself in his outward appearance, for we cannot imagine that a slave's outward appearance was the same as his master's. There was therefore both an inward and outward aspect of the morphe form, of a slave. It can hardly be possible that the word morphe can be used in a completely different sense in the previous verse. There is no need therefore to make the word mean essence only (as Lightfoot and others), nor just outward appearance as the glory of God (as many modern commentators). It is not an either/or position, but a combination of both.

Moulton and Milligan say that morphe "always signifies a form which truly and fully expresses the being which underlies it" (Vocabulary of N.T. Greek). As Greville Ewing (a Greek and English Lexicon) expresses it, "this word is sometimes used to denote the nature itself or substance of anything" (our italics). Marvin R. Vincent in Word Studies in the New Testament states "Morphe, form, is identified with the essence of a person or thing". "To say that Christ was in the form of God, is to say that He existed as essentially one with God." The expression of deity through human nature, thus has its background in the expression of Deity as Deity in the eternal ages of God's being. Whatever the mode of expression, it marked the Being of Christ in the eternity before creation. "As the form of God was identified with the Being of God, so Christ, being in the form of God, was identified with the being, nature, and personality of God."

J. J. Muller in a footnote (The Epistles of Paul to the Philippians and Philemon) says, "morphe denotes the inner being, as it actually and concretely realizes itself in the individual". We therefore come to the conclusion that this difficult word refers to an outward visible manifestation of an inner essence or reality, not just one or the other. The Lord Jesus, in His pre-incarnate state, as the Image of the invisible God, appeared to the heavenly beings as God because in reality He is God (John i. 1). His outward visible appearance expressed His essential nature and character and this nature and character is that of God. As one scholar puts it (T. A. Thomas) "If he were not truly and fully God, He could not have been in the morphe of God".

It has been noted too, that morphe and eikon image, are closely linked, and it has been shown by commentators that even in ancient thought an image was not held to be a mere representation of an object but in some way to participate in the being of the object it symbolized. In some sense it was the object it represented, "the reality itself coming to expression". This is all in line with the meaning of morphe in Phil. ii.

He thought it not robbery to be equal with God.

Our next problem is the meaning of harpagmos "robbery". We have no help from its usage, for, as stated before, it occurs nowhere else in the N.T. and not once in the LXX. Furthermore, it is very rarely used in Greek literature generally. The word may be taken actively as the A.V., or passively as in the R.V. "Counted it not a prize to be on an equality with God." One view means that equality with God was Christ's normal possession and inherent right. It was not a thing to be seized, for in the "form of God" He had no need to grasp after that which He already had. The other view is that the Lord did not consider equality with God a thing to be maintained at all costs, "a prize which must not slip from His grasp" (Lightfoot), but emptied Himself and became incarnate. The question is not only which view fits the present context, but also the remoter context of John i. 1 and Col. i. 15-18. We feel that this has been forgotten by many expositors. Furthermore, are the expressions the "form of God" and "on an equality with God" parallel expressions? Those who say "yes" hold the view that the pre-incarnate Word already possessed equality with God and therefore there was no need for Him to attempt to seize it, but on the contrary, He voluntarily humbled Himself. The other view postulates that before Bethlehem Christ had not this equality. He could have seize it, but rather than doing so, chose the lowly path of obedience and humbling, waiting for the Father to exalt Him as Lord and give Him this equality which He did not have previously. This latter view has been largely followed by expositors since Lightfoot's day. We ask therefore which view fits the context of the whole of Scripture dealing with the Word Who was God and then in due time, God manifest in the flesh? In appealing to the example of Christ, do we expect to read of a right which He did not possess and might have seized, or a glory which He had and renounced for us and for our salvation, and one day will receive back again manifestly to all creation?

For ourselves, though not the fashion at the moment, we believe the latter view is the true one. However, there are modern scholars who accept it, such as S. H. Hooke (Alpha and Omega) and W. Barclay (Great Themes of the New Testament). Dr. Barclay writes, "Jesus Christ did not consider His own equality with God an act of seizure and of plundering. There was no necessity that He should do so, for that equality was His . . . . . by right".

We are told by some expositors that this view does not fit the context, but we are absolutely at a loss to understand why this is so. In our estimation it fits not only the context we are dealing with, but, as before stated, the remoter context of John i. 1 and Col. i., which is apparently forgotten by these critics and must be taken into consideration if a Scriptural and correct understanding of Phil. ii. 5-11 is desired. This may seem to raise a problem in the exaltation mentioned in the verses that follow but we must not try to trim the first statements of this hymn in order to fit (as we may think) its final lines.

The pre-incarnate Word was God and therefore equality with God was not something which the Word had any need to seize or usurp. But this very expression to "seize or usurp" seems to imply a contrast, and this has been seen by many expositors, some of whom contrast the Lord with Adam who grasped at the knowledge of good and evil, and others with Satan, who as Lucifer, attempted to seize divine honours.

With the former view, I Cor. xv. 47 is brought in with its teaching of Christ as the second Man and last Adam. Even here we must take care not to exceed what has been written, for some have done this, picturing the pre-incarnate Christ as little more than a heavenly man who descended to the earth. This view is apparently quite widely held among evangelical scholars. We will examine both these views in our next study, and we shall find that, if any contrast is intended by the Apostle, it is more likely to be with Satan and his ambitious pride rather than with Adam.

No.41. The Epistle to the Philippians (8).
pp. 96 - 100

In our last study of the profound passage in Philippians ii. 5-11, we saw that, in His pre-incarnate state, the Lord Jesus had no need to seize "equality with God", and suggested there may be a contrast here with either Adam or Satan. Quite a number of expositors have taken the former view, which is that Adam fell for Satan's temptation recorded in Gen. iii. 5 "Ye shall be as God", thus grasping at Deity which he certainly did not possess.

However, this is surely a misunderstanding of Gen. iii. To begin with these interpreters only partially quote verse 5, and thereby miss the full meaning. The whole verse reads:

> "For God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods (or God), knowing good and evil."

What Adam was grasping at was the knowledge of good and evil, not the position of God Himself. To believe the latter is to read into the verse what is not there. Adam's sin was bad enough without adding to it. There is always a right time for knowledge and in Adam's case God saw that this had not yet come. Doubtless as he developed, at some future time this knowledge would have been imparted, but knowledge without adequate moral and spiritual development is fatal, and looking on the world scene today, this should be obvious. When will some of our modern educationalists learn this? Man is acquiring knowledge which he is not fit to have, and in almost every case this is being twisted to wrong ends.

That the "knowledge of good and evil" can be a good thing Heb. v. 14 testifies, "but strong meat belongeth to them that are of full age (i.e. mature), even those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil". Such knowledge is for the mature mentally and spiritually; it is not for undeveloped babes, and this is what Adam was at the beginning.

No one surely is going to argue that the 'mature' who attain to the knowledge of good and evil, thereby attain to Deity and become God!

Furthermore, there is no hint anywhere else in Scripture that Adam was deliberately grasping after the position as God. Rom. v. deals clearly with Adam and his fall, but there is not a hint here of any such ambition. The whole of this extraordinary idea comes from partially quoting Scripture and thereby misquoting it, and should be a warning to us all.

If any contrast is intended with Christ in the Philippian passage, then it is much more likely to be with Satan, who certainly did grasp after God's position, and still seeks it. Isa. xiv. and Ezek. xxviii. show us that Satan in his unfallen state was probably the first and the most glorious of the angelic host, the chiefest of God's creation, but he was not satisfied with this. He said, "I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God . . . . . I will be like the most High" (Isa. xiv. 13-14). In other words he tried to seize God's position and to be God Himself. This was in utter contrast to the Lord Jesus, the pre-incarnate Word, Who was willing to humble Himself and stoop so low.

We must also take account of the Heavenly man theory which links Dan. vii. 13, 14 and I Cor. xv. 45-47. Some, like Lohmeyer, assert that Paul used the Gnostic myth of a Primal man, who, as a heavenly Redeemer, descends from heaven to accomplish a saving mission, and re-ascends back to heaven, taking back with him the trophies of victory. This we reject absolutely. God's revelation in His Word is not dependent on the darkness of pagan philosophies; rather it is the other way round. Gnosticism is often a corruption of Divine truth.

But there are some who hold to a similar theory and maintain that it can be substantiated from Dan. vii. and I Cor. xv. However, a careful scrutiny of these passages will show the falsity of such a view. If we take what is probably the grandest description of O.T. theophany, namely Ezek. i. 4-28, we find the prophet trying to describe what is really indescribable. All he can do is to use human terms to set forth in some measure what he saw, hence the frequent use of "like" and "likeness". Above the firmament he saw "the likeness of a throne, as the appearance of a sapphire, and upon the likeness of the throne, was the likeness as the appearance of a man above upon it" (i. 26). He speaks of the appearance of fire of His loins, and the bow that is in the cloud.

All these were the nearest human terms to describe the vision, but the reality utterly transcended his words. His eyes took in something of the Lord of glory, just as Isaiah did, when he too saw "the Lord sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up, and His train filled the Temple", and his ears heard the solemn worship of the seraphims crying, "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts; the whole earth is full of His glory. And the posts of the door moved at the voice of him that cried, and the house was filled with smoke" (Isa. vi. 1-4).

In neither case did these prophets see someone who was just an exalted man. What they saw in a measure was the pre-incarnate Christ and His overwhelming glory. With this accords Dan. vii. 11-14. Daniel likewise saw One like a son of man (R.V.), but the prophet is careful not to say that he saw a man, but One Who had a human appearance which is quite a different thing.

When we come to I Cor. xv. 45-47 we must take care not to read into it what is not there. Scripture is very clear that Christ took upon Himself manhood at Bethlehem and not before. He Who, as the Word, was God (John i. 1) in due times became flesh (i. 14) and so became the Second Man and Last Adam (I Cor. xv. 45, 47). He was not "flesh" before His Nativity and those who describe Him as the Primal Man in glory before His incarnation are exceeding the revelation of Scripture, and to bring any of these utterly inadequate ideas into the context of Philippians we are studying is disastrous to its understanding.

Proceeding with our consideration of this passage, we read in the R.V.:

> ". . . . . Christ Jesus, Who, being in the form of God, counted it not a prize to be on an equality with God, but emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men" (Phil. ii. 5-7).

It is to be noted that the A.V. "made Himself of no reputation" is literally rendered "emptied Himself". The Greek is kenoo, hence the term kenosis and the utterly unscriptural "kenotic" doctrine that Christ here gave up His Godhead and became just a human being. If this were true then Divine redemption collapses, for a man cannot redeemed men (Psa. xlix. 7, 8). God alone can be Man's Saviour. "I, even I, am the Lord: and beside Me there is no Saviour" (Isa. xliii. 11) and never do we read in Scripture that God has delegated this supreme work to anyone else.

What does kenoo mean? Volumes have been written on this. The verb is generally used in a bad sense. The adjective means, "empty-handed", "vain", "useless". Charles H. Welch points out that the LXX uses kenoo twice as the equivalent of the Hebrew amal "to become weak". This helps us considerably, for the testimony of Scripture is that the Lord Jesus became "poor" and "weak" on our behalf as part of His great stooping down to our desperate need (II Cor. viii. 9). F. W. Beare says that the English equivalent is He "beggared Himself", "became poor as a beggar", and this was really true for He had no home (Matt. viii. 20), or enough money even to pay His tax (Matt. xvii. 27); He Who, before His birth, had all the wealth which accompanied His Godhead!

Another important point which helps us understand the real meaning of "emptying Himself" is to note that, instead of the conjunctive "ands" between the two clauses as A.V. ("and took upon Him . . . . . and was made . . . . ") which are not in the Greek, the R.V. rightly renders the Greek aorist participles as, "taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men". The aorist here is of "coincident action" (J. H. Moulton) and the clauses are therefore explanatory. In other words these phrases are explaining what "emptying" means. This again guides us and prevents us from importing ideas into the context which are not really there. Christ emptied Himself by taking the form (morphe) of a slave, and by being made in the likeness of men.

We have seen that morphe means more than "essence" on the one hand or "external appearance" on the other but is a combination of both. So if the question is asked—did Christ empty Himself of the morphe He had originally? the answer must be that He divested Himself of the external glory of that morphe, for this could not be a part of the status of a slave. One thing is certain. This was voluntary. It was not that the Father stripped Him of His dignities, He stripped Himself of all external attributes of that glory which then became concealed or veiled. Calvin says, "He laid aside His glory in the view of man, not by lessening it, but by concealing it". Lightfoot puts it, "He divested Himself . . . . . of the glories, the prerogatives of deity".

This concealed glory on one occasion only shone through His human body, at the Transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 1-8), and its effect was to almost stupefy the three disciples who were with Him. It is obvious then that He could not walk among men like this, for they would have been overwhelmed and his ministry would have been impossible.

That we are on the right lines here is amply confirmed by the Saviour's prayer recorded in John xvii., "And now, O Father, glorify Thou me with Thine own self with the glory which I had with Thee before the world was" (xvii. 5).

It was of this tremendous outward glory that He divested or emptied Himself, and thus His Deity was untouched.

But what love, what condescension is here! Can we even begin to fathom it?

No.42. The Epistle to the Philippians (9).
pp. 108 - 111

Having attempted to get an understanding of the profound statement in Phil. ii. 7, "He emptied Himself" (R.V), we noted that the next two phrases were explanatory, "taking the form of a slave, being made in the likeness of men".

We have already seen that if we keep the meaning of morphe to external appearance only, we make it practically synonymous with schema, and the words are not identical. To say, as some expositors do, that Christ as the Image and Glory of God fulfils all that morphe means, is thus not going far enough, and, as we have already pointed out, if we place such a limitation on the meaning of this word in verse 6, we must consistently do so in verse 7, which will then mean that the Lord in taking the morphe of a slave, merely looked like one externally. This is surely too trivial to even consider. In "emptying Himself", He so stripped Himself that He not only became man (even if he became the greatest of men it would be a tremendous condescension for One Who was God) but He became a Man Who had the lowest status, that of a slave. Can we ever fully appreciate this? Surely this is part of the "love that passes knowledge"! (Eph. iii. 19). How He became man the Bible nowhere fully states. Luke i. 34, 35 and Heb. x. 5 go as far as we shall get an explanation.

Paul, in writing his first letter to Timothy, declares that Christ's taking upon Himself a human body is a great secret (I Tim. iii. 16), and how do we finite creatures ever expect to fully comprehend a great secret of God?

The language of Scripture is very careful and guarded when it touches the Lord's humanity. "Being made in the likeness of men." This is parallel to Rom. viii. 3, "God sending His own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh". God most certainly did not send His Son in sinful flesh, for if Christ partook of Adam's sin, He would have needed a Saviour Himself; He could never have been a Saviour for others. The sinlessness of the Son of God is of the utmost importance in the Divine plan of Salvation. The whole scheme of God collapses if this is not true. We are amazed at the light way some evangelicals treat the Virgin Birth as though it is of little consequence.

The angel, speaking of His birth to His mother, Mary, declared: "therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God". There has been no other holy baby since Adam's fall. The germ of sin is in everyone born into this world, and in due time surely manifests itself. The Lord Jesus could say with truth, "the prince of this world (Satan) cometh, and hath nothing in Me" (John xiv. 30), a statement which would be a lie if made by any other human being.

That His body was a real one, there can be no doubt. "A body Thou hast prepared Me" (Heb. x. 5), and nowhere in the Scriptures is there any hint that this was not so in actual fact. It was a body that could eat and sleep and manifest weariness, a body that could be seen, touched and heard. But it was a body that owed nothing to a human father, and everything to the action and overshadowing of the Holy Spirit (Luke i. 35).

The early Docetic doctrine was an error of the first magnitude, for if Christ did not possess a real body, He could not have really died on the cross, and again the whole of God's redemptive plan would have been brought to nothing. "And being found in fashion (schema) as a man. He humbled Himself" (8). In this verse we now have schema, meaning an outward appearance only, and not the deeper meaning of morphe.

The Bauer-Arndt-Gingrich Lexicon gives a good illustration from Josephus of a King who exchanged His royal robes for sackcloth and took on a schema tapernoin, "a lowly appearance". He obviously did not relinquish his position as king in so doing. It was his outward appearance that changed. So it was with the Lord Jesus.

If any should regard the phrase "in the likeness of men" as meaning no more than He became like a man but was not actually, this next phrase corrects such an idea. Scripture talks about the "days of His flesh" (Heb. v. 7), and in the eyes of all who saw Him He was a real man; His humanity was no pretence.

The Apostle continues, "He became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross" (8). Here we come to the lowliest depth of His humiliation. Both the main verb and the participle here are aorists, and participle explanatory. He humbled Himself in becoming obedient unto death, and not a noble death at that, but the degraded one that was reserved for slaves and criminals.

In recording that He deliberately yielded Himself in obedience to such a death, the Scripture clearly teaches, as it does elsewhere, that the Lord Jesus Christ is more than man, for death is the ultimate end of all men, whether they will it or not. They have no choice in the matter, but our Saviour asserted "no man taketh it (life) from Me, but I lay it down of Myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again" (John x. 17, 18).

This atoning death is the very centre of God's redemptive purpose and the whole Divine plan of the ages rests upon it. This is the main object of the Lord's seven steps downward from the glory that was His before Bethlehem. "The wages of sin is death", and those wages must be paid if ever these two monstrous things, sin and death, which directly oppose all God's purposes, are ever to be eradicated. There was no other way for this to be achieved, and we may be sure that, had there been one, God would have taken it and avoided the great cost to Himself.

We now trace the seven steps upward of the Son of God from the lowest depth to the highest heights which places Him as Lord of the universe.

> "Wherefore also God highly exalted Him, and gave unto Him the name which is above every name; that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven and things on earth and things under the earth, and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (ii. 9-11 R.V.).

"Wherefore also" (dio kai) could be translated "that is why", the rest that follows being the consequence of such sublime renunciation. This is a vindication of all the obedience involved and is the completion of the glorious story. "Highly exalted" (huperupsoun) is kept uniquely for this exaltation of the Savior, literally "hyper-exalted". Quite a number of commentators think there is a contrast here with His pre-incarnate state. In which case they assert that He is finally raised to a higher position than He had before Bethlehem. This is the logical end of interpreting, as so many do today, "thought it not robbery to be equal with God", as a prize which Christ might have seized for Himself, but did not do so.

This view brings many difficulties which conflict with other passages of Scripture; the chief being that the pre-incarnate Christ could not have been God in the fullest sense. In some respect He must have been inferior. This goes right against the general tenor of revealed Truth, for monotheism is one of the Biblical fundamentals. There never has been two Gods, one inferior to the other. This borders on the darkness of pagan polytheism and is really a species of the early Arian heresy. Bringing in the doctrine of the Trinity at this point does not solve the problem. It is true that these expositors do not state things so boldly, but it is what such a view logically means. Furthermore such teachings goes right against the clear statements of John i. 1 and Col. i. 15-18 regarding the Lord's pre-incarnate Deity. We are perturbed to see some conservative evangelicals taking this position and we are bound to reject such a view absolutely, and also their exposition of the passage we are now dealing with, treating it as a prize for Christ, giving Him finally a position which He never had before. The error here is contrasting the Lord's exaltation with His pre-incarnate state, whereas the contrast is with His earthly humbling. Professor F. W. Beare's comments here are so much to the point that we quote them in full:

> "The thought is not that God exalts Him to a higher rank than He held before, as being in the form of God. No such comparison between the pre-existent state of Christ and His exalted state is envisaged. We must altogether reject the notion, widespread as it is among the commentators, that Christ received as the reward of His humility the high station of equality with God which He refused to seize for Himself as plunder, by storming the heights like a Titan. The contrast is not between the pre-existent condition and the present exaltation, but between the earthly condition of slavery (self-humbling, obedience) and the consequent exaltation. Here is given, as it were, the archetypal pattern of the divinely established law: 'whoever shall humble himself will be exalted' (Matt. 23:11). It is in His manhood that Christ is now exalted and endued with all authority. Even the verb 'conferred', (granted as an act of grace), suggest that God is here dealing with Christ as man. God 'giveth grace to the humble' (I Pet. 5:5,6)" (The Epistle to the Philippians, pp.85,86. First two sets of italics ours).

We believe this puts the case clearly and is according to Truth. The other view would surely have been treated as heresy in the early centuries, for, however much they failed to grip the distinctive teaching of the Apostle Paul, they were at least clear on the Deity of Christ and held on to it tenaciously. We must surely "prove all things" and "hold fast that which is good" (I Thess. v. 21).

No.43. The Epistle to the Philippians (10).
pp. 130 - 133

We are now considering the seven upward steps to the highest glory for the Lord, who humbled Himself to the degradation of the Cross for our redemption. We noted that the contrast was not with His pre-incarnate position, but that of His humiliation as Man.

> "Wherefore also God highly exalted Him, and gave unto Him the name which is above every name; that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven and things on earth and things under the earth, and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (ii. 9-11 R.V.).

The Name which is above every name can only be one, that of LORD which designates Jehovah, the one great God. Jesus was His earthly name, the name of His humbling, and this is not mentioned by the Apostle as the signal for genuflection, as so many think. The supereminent Name is that which now belongs to Jesus in His superexaltation, that of LORD, and the O.T. makes it abundantly clear that there is "none else" beside Him. It is not that He is a step higher than other exalted beings, but rather that He is unique, in a class apart because He is the incomparable One.

> "To whom then will ye liken God? or what likeness will ye compare unto Him?" (Isa. xl. 18).
> "To whom then will ye liken Me, or shall I be equal? saith the Holy One" (xl. 25).
> "To whom will ye liken Me, and make Me equal, and compare Me, that we may be like?" (xlvi. 5).

Rom. xiv. 9 asserts that ". . . . . Christ died and lived again, that He might be Lord both of the dead and of the living" (R.S.V.). Phil. ii. 9-11 looks forward to the day when this shall be manifestly so, when He shall have the universal homage and worship of all creation. It is the will of the Father that "all (men) should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father" (John v. 23). The Apostle John in a heavenly vision foresees such a glorious goal:

> "And every created thing which is in the heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and on the sea, and all things that are in them, heard I saying, Unto Him that sitteth on the throne, and unto the Lamb, be the blessing, and the honour, and the glory, and the dominion, for ever and ever. And the four living creatures said, Amen." (Rev. v. 13, 14 R.V.).

What the Apostle Paul writes in our present context reinforces all this, for he does not hesitate, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, to apply one of the most magnificent contexts of the O.T., emphasizing the greatness of the one God, to the Lord Jesus Christ:

> "Look unto Me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth: for I am God, and there is none else. By myself have I sworn, the word is gone forth from My mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, that unto Me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear" (Isa. xlv. 22, 23 R.V.).

It is inconceivable that Paul in so doing had any doubts concerning the full Deity of Christ. He proclaims Him not just as Lord of the Church, but finally as Lord of the whole universe manifestly, and it is this that forms the magnificent climax of this section in Philippians. What He is now as Lord and Head of the Church, the Body of Christ, He will then be openly to the whole creation.

We cannot be absolutely sure what 'things' or beings 'under the earth' comprise. Most likely they refer to evil spirits under Satan's control. We do know that the abyss (bottomless pit A.V.) is linked with the sea (Gen. i. 2 LXX), and that the book of Revelation reveals that the abyss is the abode of demons (Rev. ix. 1-3; xiii. 1; xvii. 8), and this may be also true of the earth. In which case this great scene of exaltation is one of complete victory, for even the demons have to acknowledge the Lordship of Christ with the rest of creation. Exomologeisthai, does not mean just to make a confession of faith, but, as recent scholarship has shown, to "admit', "acknowledge", "own" or "recognize". All this is to "the glory of God the Father" (Phil. ii. 11).

Two things stand out here. First, that there is no rivalry between divinities. Such an idea was rife among the gods of surrounding paganism. Second, that the mediatorship of Christ still exists at this point of time. Not yet has the goal been reached when all rule, authority and power has been brought to nought, and Christ takes complete control (I Cor. xv. 24). But this scene of tremendous glory is the outward and visible vindication of His earthly humiliation and rejection by men. The One that was "despised and rejected of men" and opposed by the powers of darkness, is now universally recognized as King of kings and Lord of lords. All this is as much to the Father's glory as it is to His. It is not only to Christ's glory, but equally to the glory of the Father. Here is no glorification of the one as against the other. The Father and the Son are one in every sense; in the redemptive purpose before creation, in its performance, and finally in glorification.

We are conscious that the consideration of this most profound passage in Philippians has been "hard going". But, as we have stated elsewhere, we have no means of simplifying "strong meat" so that it becomes "milk". It has been difficult for the writer, as it must be for anyone who seeks to expound this passage honestly and carefully. It may be as well to sum up.

These verses were not introduced by Paul to give a profound account of the Godhead before Bethlehem or afterwards. They were written, possibly incorporating a primitive hymn, to enforce the injunction concerning unselfishness, each believer being exhorted not to look on his own things, but rather on the things of others, and here was One Who did that very thing and gave Himself to the limit for us men and for our salvation.

Christ Jesus was in the form (morphe) of God. This meant that He was God manifestly so, in a glorious form—the Image of the invisible God. (We have seen that morphe goes deeper than schema, an outward appearance.) As such, there was no need for Him to try and seize this position for His own ends, but seeing the tremendous need of all His people involved in sin and death and a ruined heaven as well, He emptied Himself of the glory attached to this morphe, and took upon Himself a human body, in order that He might bear the penalty of sin, namely death, in the place of His children. That glory was veiled by His humanity, but on one occasion (the Transfiguration) it shone through and overwhelmed the three disciples who were with Him.

He not only condescended to make the great step downwards from the throne of glory to the frailty of human body, but deliberately chose the status of a slave and finally yielded Himself to crucifixion, the shameful death of a criminal and in that death He was "made sin (or a sin-offering) for us Who knew no sin" (II Cor. v. 21). The Lord laid upon Him "the iniquity of us all" (Isa. liii. 6). He was the One "Who His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree . . . . ." (I Pet. ii. 24).

This, praise God, was not the end of the story. He was raised from the dead and "highly-exalted" (a unique word). Before the crucifixion He had prayed to the Father "glorify Thou Me with Thine own self with the glory which I had with Thee before the world was" (John xvii. 5). This prayer was abundantly answered, for He is now in that glory which was His before Bethlehem, the One Who was the Logos and was God (John i. 1); He Who was and is the Image of the invisible God. The goal of Him is to be manifestly acknowledged as LORD, the Supreme One, by the whole universe, including His enemies and all who oppose His rule. This is not only to His glory but also that of the Father.

We conclude with some recent words of Professor T. A. Thomas on the "emptying" of the Lord Jesus Christ:

> "Whatever effects His incarnation may have had upon our Lord, they can in no way be construed as diminishing from His absolute Deity. He was God incarnate, God manifest in the flesh, in full possession of all the attributes of Deity. Anything less than this is completely out of accord with the picture that we have of Him in the inspired inscripturated Word."

It is indeed refreshing to read this at a time like the present when there is so much false teaching concerning the Person and work of the Lord Jesus Christ. He is truly "our great God and Saviour" (Titus ii. 13 R.V.) now supremely exalted.

No.44. The Epistle to the Philippians (11).
pp. 156 - 160

The central point in the great hymn to Christ that we have been considering was His obedience unto death (Phil. ii. 8; Heb. v. 8). The Apostle Paul now brings the thought of obedience to bear upon the situation at Philippi:

> "So then, my beloved, even as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; for it is God which worketh in you both to will and to work, for His good pleasure" (Phil. ii. 12, 13 R.V.).

He says, in effect, as the Lord obeyed, so should you also! Paul does not seek to force this obedience in a harsh way. He addresses them as "my beloved", but at the same time his commands are definite and must be carried out. Just as they were obedient when he preached the gospel to them at the beginning (Acts xvi.), so they must continue to do so as believers, whether he is present or absent.

The next phrase has sometimes been taken out of its setting to teach that man can work out salvation for himself, if he tries hard enough. The constant negation of human works and merit in connection with the sinner's salvation all through Paul's writings, makes this impossible. "Working out" is not the same as "working for" salvation. Salvation is received as a free gift by faith in Christ (Eph. ii. 8, 9), but, once received, it must be "worked out" in daily life and practice by the believer.

It must not be inferred, however, that such an one is left to do this in his own strength, for "God works in" and gives the grace and strength so to do. Here we have the seeming paradox of Divine power and human responsibility illustrated. Whether the Apostle has in view the church at Philippi as a whole, and not individual Christians, as some expositors assert, is debatable. To say that the individual cannot be in view here because of the former injunction not to consider self but the interests of others, is misunderstanding the situation. The self-interest to be avoided is the concern for self-advantage in the things of this life, not the spiritual things concerning the life to come, and in any case, a church's spiritual growth is geared to the growth of each individual member.

This "working out" must be done, not with swagger and a false assurance, but with "fear and trembling". The same phrase is used in II Cor. vii. 15 for the attitude of the Corinthians to the visit of Titus, or the attitude of the servant to the master, with Christ in view (Eph. vi. 5). This "fear and trembling" recognizes the frailty of the flesh, realizing how easy it is to stumble and fail the Lord. Here indeed we can have "no confidence in the flesh" (Phil. iii. 3), but every confidence in the Lord's empowering, God working in us, so that we can accomplish this to His glory. The verb energeo, "works in", has the same root as our word "energy"; it is mostly used of Divine action in the sense of causing action in someone else (compare the mighty resurrection power that "worked in Christ", Eph. i. 19, 20).

This dynamic power is ours by the appropriation of faith, so that not one of us can say that our "working out" day by day is impossible. This practical response is well-pleasing to the Lord; it leads to His "good pleasure", and seeking to please Him should be first priority in every believer's life and aim. This is the key to continual fruitfulness and satisfaction.

Paul now adds a word of warning:

> "Do all things without murmurings and disputings; that ye may be blameless and harmless, children of God without blemish in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation, among whom ye are seen as lights in the world, holding forth the world of life" (ii. 14, 15 R.V.).

The Apostle goes back to the failings of the people of Israel when journeying in the wilderness. As the O.T. record shows, their walk was disfigured by constant grumbling against the Lord and His servant Moses. They could not stand up to the test of faith that such a journey imposed. The comment of the epistle to the Hebrews is clear: ". . . they could not enter in because of unbelief (for disobedience)" (Heb. iii. 19). This chapter and I Cor. x. should be carefully weighed over in this context. "Neither murmur ye, as some of them also murmured, and were destroyed of the destroyer" (I Cor. x. 10).

In fact God's longsuffering with this lasted out until the tenth time that they grumbled and rebelled (Numb. xiv. 22, 23), and then He solemnly pronounced that such a generation should not enter into the promised land and thus they all died in the wilderness, with the exception of Caleb and Joshua, who had fully responded in faith to the Lord.

The Philippian believers were warned to remember this and we should do the same. Too often grumbling is looked upon as something that we can indulge in without sinning too much, but we should bear in mind that such conduct has at its root, unbelief, which God can never tolerate, nor does it go with a life that is manifestly Christ-centred. The Philippians must not be content with just being believers; they must be manifestly so in their lives. The word "be" in verse 15 is not the verb "to be", but genesthe "become", or "show yourselves to be". Inward saving grace must be manifested by outward conduct, specially to a world of darkness and ignorance of the Lord. This is enforced by the words amemptoi (blameless) and akeraioi (harmless).

Amemptos means "irreproachable", a life at which no finger of criticism may be pointed. Such a life results from the "working out" of the "in-working" Divine power that the context stresses. Akeraios is the word the Lord uses in Matt. x. 16, "harmless as doves" or in Rom. xvi. 19 "simple concerning evil". In contemporary Greek it is employed of undiluted wine, or metals which have no weakening alloy, hence unmixed or pure. These words set forth vividly the will of God for His children. Their lives must be such that their "public behaviour is above criticism" (Rom. xii. 17, J. B. Philips) and no foreign element must intrude to undermine their witness.

We must not understand verse 15 to teach that such conduct is the means of salvation. "That ye may be . . . . . the children of God", means manifestly so, very much like the Sermon on the Mount, ". . . . . love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you . . . . . that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven" (Matt. v. 44, 45). Likewise the Philippians must "shine as lights in the world".

The imperative seems required here rather than the indicative and the Greek can read either way. Paul calls upon the Philippian church not to obscure the light of testimony by wrong doing, but rather to shine brightly in the surrounding darkness of a world that knows not God and is at enmity with Him. It may be that the Apostle has the Song of Moses in mind in connection with apostate Israel (Deut. xxxii. 5), and is concerned lest his converts at Philippi should backslide in this way.

We do well to remember that we are surrounded by a world that is hostile and critical; one that is in gross spiritual darkness. The only real light that can pierce such darkness is that of One Who said "I am the light of the world", and strictly speaking, the believer in Christ is a light reflector or light bearer. True lights does not originate from us; it comes solely from Him Who is Life and Light. What we are required to be is the bearer of His light, giving an unobscured daily testimony, His light thus shining through us. We should beware of the things that can obscure this light. In His earthly ministry the Lord said:

> "Is a candle brought to be put under a bushel, or under a bed? and not to be set on a candlestick?" (Mark iv. 21).

The "bushel", a measure of commerce, can stand for business and all its commitments, and the "bed", the love of ease, two things that can easily quench the light of faithful witness. These two things and anything else that hinders, must be avoided at all costs. Paul then urges the Philippian believers to remember the duty and the privilege of light-bearing, just as he wrote to the Thessalonians and reminded them that they should all be "children of light, and the children of the day; we are not of the night, nor of darkness" (I Thess. v. 5). Epechein can mean to "hold fast" or "hold out, offer" and both shades of meaning are true in Phil. ii. 16.

If his friends at Philippi faithfully adhere to the Word of life and hold it forth, the Apostle is assured in his mind, that at the great day of Divine testing of Christian witness and service, the Day of Christ, he will not have laboured in vain, for they will be concrete evidence of the fruit of his labours. The Apostle, while he delighted to call himself the "slave of Christ", working tirelessly for Him, yet had a dread of labour in vain, the expenditure of strength to no purpose. To the Galatians he wrote:

> "I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain" (Gal. iv. 11).

To be of any worth, Christian service must accomplish something for the Lord, and while we may not always see the fruit of our labours in this life, yet there are occasions when it is obvious that energy expended in certain directions is wasted, and the Lord does not ask us to spend our strength needlessly and to no purpose. We need heavenly wisdom at times like these to take the right course of action.

The Apostle now comes to the most solemn personal reference in the epistle. In his witness for the Saviour, Paul had spent himself without stint. Here he stresses the fact that this might cost him his life. While he hopes to be released and visit Philippi again, he cannot be absolutely sure at this stage:

> "Yea, and if I am offered upon the sacrifice and service of our faith, I joy, and rejoice with you all" (ii. 17 R.V.).

From this we can see that the possibility of execution is vividly in his mind, but rather than be afraid or depressed, he rejoices. What a spirit! Spendomai, "if I be offered" is a word of sacrifice, alluding to the drink-offering which accompanied some of the O.T. ritual. In no sense did Paul imagine that this had any redemptive value, either for himself or anyone else, but it did represent the fact that he was prepared to go to the very limit for Christ, in giving his life, if the Lord willed, as a libation poured forth unto Him, a tribute of his love and gratitude. However, he did not keep the thought of sacrifice to himself and his own witness and suffering. He spoke of the "sacrifice and service" of the Philippians' faith. Later on in the epistle he is touched by the gift they sent to him and calls it "an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God" (iv. 18). When he wrote to the church at Rome, Paul urged them to "present their bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service" (Rom. xii. 1).

In view of all this, surely sacrifice should mark all our service for the Lord. Can there be any value in work for Him that costs little or nothing? And it should be joyous sacrifice too. The Apostle, though contemplating the possibility of martyrdom, yet rejoices and bids the saints at Philippi to join with him in such rejoicing (Phil. ii. 17, 18). How easy it is to get depressed if the Christian way and witness results sometimes in personal loss!

Yet this touch of sacrifice should not occasion surprise. We should expect it and be ready to accept it as the normal experience of those whose home is not here, in a world of unbelief, but, rather, in heaven, as Phil. iii. 20 so clearly indicates. Let us remember that this epistle teaches us that it is not only a gracious privilege to believe in Christ, but also to suffer for His sake, if it is His will (i. 29).

No.45. The Epistle to the Philippians (12).
pp. 175 - 179

After likening his service for the Lord and the Philippian church to a "sacrifice", a joyous one, for he bids these believers to rejoice with him, even though the cost may be his life, Paul now looks to the future. He expresses his hope concerning his imprisonment and his intention of sending Timothy on a mission of goodwill.

> "But I hope in the Lord Jesus to send Timothy shortly unto you, that I also may be of good comfort, when I know your state. For I have no man likeminded, who will care truly for your state. For they all seek their own, not the things of Jesus Christ" (ii. 19-21 R.V.).

The Apostle intended to send Epaphroditus with the letter without waiting until his own case had been dealt with. He realizes that the believers at Philippi will be anxious to know the outcome of his trial, so he informs them that he will send Timothy with the news and possibly follow after with a visit himself. If there is no early release for him, then Timothy, as well as giving them valued advice and help, will be able to bring back news of them which Paul trusts will be encouraging for him. Whenever the Apostle plans for the future, he always acknowledges that God's will must be paramount (see Rom. xv. 32; I Cor. xvi. 7; Philemon 22) and this is also true in the context with which we are dealing.

Note he does not say "I hope in Christ" or "Christ Jesus", but uses the practical title of "Lord", which always expresses the believer's relationship to God when service is in view. A practical owning of the Lordship of Christ means that He is in control of all our planning and activity. We have no right to try and shape our future without consulting Him first, otherwise tragic results may follow.

Paul is saying that, if it is the Lord's will, Timothy will visit them with a twofold object: to give them first hand knowledge of himself and encourage them, and also that he (Paul) will be cheered when Timothy brings back good news of them. The Apostle now gives a very high commendation of his son in the faith. Like-minded, isopsuchos, literally "of equal soul", is a rare word, as is eupsuchein "be of good comfort" of the previous verse. Isopsuchos is used once in the LXX of Psa. lv. 13 (liv. 14 LXX), "a man mine equal" showing that it is used of close friendship, but with what a difference! The close friend of the Psalmist treacherously betrayed him, whereas here, Timothy stayed with the Apostle right to the end.

As Paul considers the brethren that are with him and the saints of Caesar's household, there is no one who exhibits the deep concern of Timothy for the Philippians. Like the Apostle, Timothy was genuinely unselfish, with a real practical concern for the needs of others. He was willing to share in the "care of all the churches", like Paul, so he was the ideal choice to be sent on the journey to Philippi.

When the Apostle says “all seek their own”, he cannot mean that every believer in the Philippian church was selfish, for he has already commended some for their practical fellowship in the gospel (i. 5). He must be making a general statement concerning those around him. The mission to Philippi called for wisdom, tact and patience and a genuine concern for the state of believers there, and there was no one at hand so fitted for the task as his beloved son Timothy. They knew his proven worth (22), for Timothy had been with Paul when he first brought the gospel to them (Acts xvi.). He had been tested and found worthy. “Proof”, dokime is related to the verb “approve” in i. 10.

The relationship of Paul and Timothy was not the cold one of master and servant, but the intimate one of parent and child. In I Cor. iv. 17 R.V., Paul describes him as a “beloved and faithful child in the Lord”, and in this close way they had worked together as the slaves of Jesus Christ. “Served” is edouleusen literally “to serve as a slave”, not that Timothy was Paul’s slave, but they had together served as the Lord’s slaves for the extension of the gospel and the truth committed to the Apostle, and this should remind us that the only position of honour in the church is one based on faithful service to the Almighty One, Who took the form of a slave (ii. 7) and was among His own as “He that serveth” (Luke xxii. 27).

Verse 23 shows how Paul’s mind balances the prospects, on the one hand of martyrdom or being released from prison. His hope is that there will be a favourable verdict at his trial and that he will be able to visit the Philippians himself. Through it all there is a confident trust in the Lord, for His peace was reigning in his heart freeing him from anxiety. He leaves all to the Lord’s will, for the phrase “in the Lord” is the equivalent of “if the Lord wills”. What is sure is that he will send Timothy as his representative, and if possible, he will follow shortly afterwards.

Paul now turns to the immediate present and commends Epaphroditus to the church at Philippi. The name has a pagan origin, being formed from the name of the Greek goddess, Aphrodite. A shortened form was Epaphras, which at once makes us think of the Epaphras of Col. i. 7; iv. 12, although we cannot identify the two as the same person for certain, for Epaphras was a common name. The Apostle speaks of him in glowing terms, as a brother, a fellow-labourer and fellow-soldier, one who had worked hard and closely with himself. He had come as a “messenger” (literally “apostle”) from the Philippian church bringing their gift to Paul in his prison. The Apostle now plans to send him back, presumably as the bearer of the letter he was now writing. While Epaphroditus waited for the completion of the letter, he ministered to Paul’s needs (25).

Unhappily he had fallen ill. The news of his sickness had reached Philippi and the friends there became concerned about him. A report of their anxiety had evidently reached Epaphroditus, which greatly distressed him. He longed after them all [epipothon, the word used for Paul’s keen desire to see them all (i. 8). Not only this, but he (Epaphroditus) was sore troubled (ii. 26 R.V.)]. This word ademonon is used of the Lord’s agony in Gethsemane (Matt. xxvi. 37), a strong word indeed, expressive of distress that follows a great shock. Note he was not upset because he was seriously ill, but rather because the Philippians had come to know of it and this had brought anxiety upon them. Here again is the spirit of the Philippian epistle, namely concern for others, rather than concern for self.

We do not know what his illness was, except that it was connected with his Christian service (30). It must have been extremely serious, because Paul tells us Epaphroditus was "nigh unto death" (27). What an opportunity the Apostle had to exercise his miraculous gift of healing, so evident during the Acts! (xix. 11, 12; xxviii. 8, 9).

If Paul still possessed this evidential gift after Acts xxviii., it is utterly incomprehensible that he did not use it in connection with such a close friend and valued fellow-labourer who was in such desperate physical need. The same could be said of Timothy's frequent physical weaknesses (I Tim. v. 23) and the illness of Trophimus (II Tim. iv. 20). Dispensational truth alone has the Scriptural answer. Instantaneous divine healing was one of the earthly kingdom miraculous signs of the Acts period and passed away when the earthly kingdom people, Israel, passed into their spiritual darkness, deafness, and hardness of heart, making them unusable by the Lord during this parenthetical age of grace.

The healing of Epaphroditus was the direct result of God's mercy, not only on him, but on the Apostle also (27). Had the Lord not intervened, Paul would have had the sorrow of bereavement on top of his prison sufferings. Resuming the statement of his immediate plans, Paul writes that he is more eagerly, or very eagerly, sending him back to them. This is possibly in case anyone in the Philippian assembly should criticize Epaphroditus for leaving Paul in his imprisonment and need. He should be received with all joy and held in honour (29) or highly valued. Verse 30 shows the extent this faithful servant of the Lord was prepared to go for Him. Note the R.V. "hazarding his life" as against the A.V. "not regarding his life". The omission of one letter in the Greek gives this deeper meaning and this is supported by modern editors generally. Paraboleusamenos is a gambling term and thus Epaphroditus almost gambled with his life for Christ's sake. This means more than being ill; it suggests some special danger to which he exposed himself for His Lord, the Apostle Paul and the Philippian assembly, who were unable to help the Apostle owing to the distance that separated them (30). This is Christian service indeed, where self is forgotten and the claims of the Lord and His people are first and foremost.

Chapter iii. commences with the phrase to loipon, translated in the A.V. and R.V. "finally", which gives the impression that Paul is concluding his letter. However, one peculiarity of the Apostle's style is the habit of "digression", the holding up of his main argument to explain or expand a point. (Note the parenthesis of Eph. iii. 2-13 and there are many other examples.) MacKnight states that to loipon is put for kata to loipon, "as for what remains", for loipos means "something left over".

Thus we need not deduce that Paul is now going to end immediately this epistle. He had still something remaining to say to the Philippians and this is seen in chaps. iii. & iv. where the real concluding remarks begin (iv. 8). His call to "rejoice in the Lord", repeated in iv. 4 is characteristic of the epistle as we have seen. But realizing certain dangers which lay ahead, he straight away turns to serious warning. For the protection of those under his charge, the Apostle frequently had to repeat himself. He assures the Philippians that this was not "irksome" (R.V.) for him and it was certainly safe for them that he did so. Evidently he had a hostile group of Judaizers in mind whom he describes in three ways: (1) dogs, (2) evil workers, (3) the concision, or self-mutilators. The scornful term "dogs" was given by the Jews to the Gentiles, who were Israel's enemies and refers to the scavenger dogs that roamed the streets (Matt. xv. 26, 27; Rev. xxii. 15) and were regarded as unclean. Paul hurls back the epithet against those of his own nation, who so constantly opposed him and the gospel that he sought to make known. They followed him wherever he went, seeking to bring Gentile converts under the bondage of the Mosaic law, and in the epistle to the Galatians, he largely has them in mind. They were "malicious workers"; he calls them "deceitful workers" in II Cor. xi. 13, and like the Lord Jesus Himself said of the opposing Pharisees, they would "compass sea and land to make a proselyte, and when he is made . . . . . make him twofold more a child of hell" than themselves.

The third term is a play on words. Katatome is a parody on the similar word for circumcision, peritome. The putting away of types and shadows in the gospel message of salvation, which found their realization in Christ and His finished work on the Cross, now made circumcision merely self-mutilation and on a par with the pagan practices forbidden in Lev. xxi. 5 (compare I Kings xviii. 28).

The physical rite that once upon a time put an Israelite into covenant relationship with God had passed, and its spiritual equivalent could not be applied to all God's redeemed people, whether Jew or Gentile. They are the real circumcision who have the inward reality, not just the external rite (Phil. iii. 3; Rom. ii. 28, 29).

No.46. The Epistle to the Philippians (13).

pp. 194 - 199

After warning the Philippian church of the activities of the "circumcision after the flesh", the Judaizers, the Apostle Paul asserts "for we are the circumcision, who worship by the Spirit of God and glory in Christ Jesus and have no confidence in the flesh" (Phil. iii. 3 R.V.). The A.V. reads "in the spirit". The earliest manuscript witness, the Chester Beatty papyrus, the word for "God" is omitted and the sense then is "who worship in spirit", the new nature, as opposed to the flesh, the old nature of sin. This accords with the important statement of the Lord in John iv. 24 R.S.V. "God is spirit, and those who worship Him must worship in spirit and truth", that is to say, truly in spirit, apart from the natural mind or the flesh.

This sweeping statement searches deeply into all worship, and that this is of great importance from God's standpoint is seen by the following words: "The Father seeketh such to worship Him . . . . ." As the Father continually seeks for such real worship, how much does He find in Christendom as a whole? This is a solemn thought which should exercise the minds of all believers. When will Christians realize that they cannot worship God with the senses all alone? There is so much sensual worship in the churches today that it is difficult to find any who are concerned with true worship in the spirit. That the senses can be employed in some degree in the outward expression can never produce acceptable worship by themselves. We do well to keep this constantly in mind.

We should note too, that latreuo, the word translated worship, is rendered "to serve", 16 times, and "do service" once. So that we must not limit the context to worship only, but also include the thought of acceptable service. Such service can never come from "the flesh". It can only proceed from the "spirit" or the new nature bestowed on the believer by God Himself (II Pet. i. 4). Christian service done in the strength of the flesh will be counted as "wood, hay and stubble", to be consumed as worthless in the day of Christ's testing the work of believers (I Cor. iii. 12-15).

Another mark of the true church is that each member rejoices or boasts in Christ Jesus and has no confidence in the flesh (iii. 3). Kauchaomai "to exult or boast" is almost exclusively a Pauline word, being used by him over thirty times. The statement in Philippians shows up the innate tendency of the human heart, to secure by its own effort and merit, approval and acceptance with God. To place one's confidence or trust in anything outside of Christ is to have "confidence in the flesh". This is a lesson that so few seem to learn, but it is basic to all growth in grace and knowledge of the Lord.

There was a time when Paul himself had not learned this lesson, as he is now going to tell us. If he is going to set aside personal advantages of birth and up-bringing, it is not because he did not possess them. He did, in full measure, but he was going to cut the ground from under the Judaizers, by showing how empty and futile this was in God's sight or with spiritual growth in view. He now turns back to his pre-Christian life and declares to the Judaizer and all who boast in self or self-made religion that if there was a competition between them, he would emerge as head of the list. He was indeed a true, full-blooded Jew and he details seven points to illustrate this.

(1) "Circumcised the eighth day", according to the provisions of the law (Lev. xii. 3). This proved that he was no ordinary proselyte, circumcised after his conversion to Judaism. He was so from birth, and thus put into covenant relationship with God from the beginning of his life.

(2) Of the race of Israel, the elect nation that God called out from all other nations and endowed them with such mighty privileges as Rom. ix. 3-5 clearly shows. When contrasting himself with some of his opponents in the Corinthian church, he could say "Are they Hebrews? so am I . Are they Israelites? so am I. Are they the seed of Abraham? so am I" (II Cor. xi. 22).

(3) Of the tribe of Benjamin. In spite of its smallness (Psa. lxviii. 27) the tribe of Benjamin was regarded with esteem. Situated in the south, it probably resisted pagan influences from the north and it had the privileges of containing the holy City and the Temple within its borders. It remained loyal to David after the disruption of the monarchy and further, Israel's first king, namely Saul, was drawn from its ranks. Saul was the Apostle's original Hebrew name, in which he took pride.

(4) A Hebrew of the Hebrews. This either means an eminent Hebrew, one who took special pride in belonging to Israel's race, or it could mean as Moffatt's translation, "a Hebrew son of Hebrew parents", informing us that the language in which he was reared was the ancestral mother tongue. Ability to speak in Hebrew and Aramaic was a mark of faithfulness to the old culture, showing that his parents had not succumbed to their environment by forgetting the ancient language. The three privileges that follow were Paul's own acquirement.

(5) As touching the law, a Pharisee. This meant that he was a member of a sect which was most strict in its adherence to the law of Moss. As Josephus expressed it "a body of Jews who profess to be more religious than the rest, and to explain the laws more precisely". Their one aim was to provoke the same zeal in others and bring them to a similar conformity.

We cannot help but remember the stinging reproaches of the Lord Jesus concerning some of the Pharisees of His day. "Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites . . ." (Matt. xxiii. 13, 14, 27). At the same time we must point out that not all Pharisees merited this condemnation. Some were sincere men, even if misguided. Paul does not use the name Pharisee as a reproach, but as a title of honour, and the Pharisees were highly regarded by masses of the people. His one aim was to safeguard the sacred Torah and in doing this, he conceived it to be his duty to try and stamp out any movement that appeared to oppose it. Hence Paul's rigorous persecution of the early believers of the Acts period.

(6) "As touching zeal, persecuting the church." Whilst it seems ironical that the one to whom was committed the doctrine concerning the church of God should write, "concerning zeal, persecuting the church" (iii. 6), yet this was the mark of his faithful adherence to Judaism as a Pharisee of the Pharisees, imagining he was doing God service! He enlarges this in Gal. i. 13, 14, "You have heard of my former life in Judaism, how I persecuted the church of God beyond all measure, and ravaged it—and I was making progress in Judaism beyond many of my own age in my nation, being exceedingly zealous for my ancestral traditions". Years later when writing to Timothy he reflected on God's mercy to him, describing himself as a persecutor, a blasphemer and injurious (I Tim. i. 13). He never ceased to marvel at the grace of God that met him on the road to Damascus and changed him from Saul the Pharisee, to Paul the Apostle to the Gentiles with a dispensation of grace and glory beyond computation (Eph. iii.). It was inconceivable that the Apostle, looking back on the bondage of Judaism in which he had been so proficient, could allow this grievous yoke to be fastened upon the Gentile converts. True, he had been zealous, but what a danger zeal can be without knowledge! It is so easy to be zealous in the wrong thing, because of blindness or perverseness! Saul of Tarsus, like his nation, had a "zeal without knowledge" (Rom. x. 2), and there are thousands today like him, even among professing Christians.

Christian witness is so often judged merely by activity and keenness, but these of themselves cannot produce acceptable service in the sight of the Lord. His truth must be the foundation and substance of all service first and foremost, and to err here is to err everywhere else. On the other hand we should avoid a knowledge of the truth without zeal. Such knowledge is cold and lifeless and produces no fruit for the Lord. The truth, rightly held, should certainly lead to warm response. The Lord wants all the keenness possible from His children, but first of all directed by His truth for the present age and a knowledge of His will.

(7) "As touching the righteousness which is in the law, found blameless" (iii. 6). The Apostle does not say he was blameless in the sight of God, but, as far as the observance of the law was concerned, he was blameless. We can now therefore understand the Lord's warning "I tell you except your righteousness exceeds the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, you will not enter into the Kingdom of heaven" (Matt. v. 20). It is not that men are called to produce a higher decree of the same righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, but rather they are brought into contact with a different kind of righteousness, as Paul now explains, the righteousness which proceeds from God and is accorded to faith.

This leads him now to the other side of the balance sheet, for what we have here is a statement of liabilities and assets and the advantages of birth and attachment to God's earthly people which he formerly set down in the column of assets, he now transfers to the column of liabilities, for in Christ he has something that is so infinitely better, that he must now seek to set it forth in seven further statements. Before he does this, he gives the reason for this dramatic revaluation:

> "But what things were gain (lit. gains) to me, these I have counted loss for Christ, Yea, verily, and I count all things to be loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord" (iii. 7, 8 R.V.).

"Everything as loss", that is anything that previously he would have counted as advantage to him. This goes wider than the religious privileges he enjoyed through being one of God's chosen people Israel. It included everything which might be reckoned as good by the natural man. It was as though the Apostle put them all in a parcel and consigned them to the refuse heap, so worthless were they in comparison with the excellency of the knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ.

We must distinguish between knowing about a person and actually knowing him. Paul is not here thinking of facts pertaining to Christ, as getting to know Him personally by faith. A close bond was formed between the Saviour and the Apostle on the Damascus road, and this became more intimate and deeper and wholly absorbing as time went on. There is no doubt that Paul conceives of God in terms of Christ. For him, getting to know Christ, was getting to know God, and with this there was nothing earthly that could compare with it, not even his religious beliefs that once meant so much to him as a Pharisee. In fact he tells us that for Christ's sake he had suffered the loss of all things, or forfeited everything. This would possibly include personal property which could have been confiscated on his renunciation of Judaism and certainly it included the high status which he once held therein. Everything had gone which would generally have been esteemed to be desirable in this life. But with his new valuation, seen through the enlightened eyes given by the Spirit of God, this meant little or nothing. And he is now going to tell us why in a sevenfold statement:

> ". . . . . (1) that I may gain Christ, (2) and he found in Him, not having a righteousness of mine own, even that which is of the law, but that which is through faith in Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith: (3) that I may know Him, (4)and the power of His resurrection, (5) and the fellowship of His sufferings, (6) becoming conformed unto His death. (7) If by any means I may attain unto the resurrection from the dead" (iii. 8-11 R.V.).

The word 'gain' is cognate with the "gain" of verse 7. What does Paul mean when he says that I may gain Christ? We must surely not forget the aim of the epistle as a whole, that is, not just to present Christ as Saviour or to give a setting forth of the gospel of salvation. It assumes the readers already experience this and now are prepared to work out that salvation in witness and practice with a prize or reward in view. Hence the figure of a race given later in chapter iii. which the Apostle always uses in a context of service with reward or loss in view (cp. I Cor. ix. 24-27). "Gaining Christ" was getting to know Him as Rewarder, even as Moses of old who esteemed reproach for Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt: for he had respect unto the recompense of reward . . . he endured, as seeing Him Who is invisible (Heb. xi. 24-27).

No.47. The Epistle to the Philippians (14).

We continue to study the section in chapter iii., where the Apostle Paul enumerates his "gains" and "losses" for Christ, a faint echo of the great losses and gains of the Lord Jesus of chapter ii., Who had given up so much for him and all His people in His matchless condescension and stooping down, and is now so highly exalted in the glory at the Father's right hand:

> ". . . . . I count all things to be loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: for Whom I suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung, that I may gain Christ, and be found in Him, not having a righteousness of mine own, even that which is of the law, but that which is through faith in Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith" (Phil. iii. 8, 9 R.V.).

We considered the meaning of "that I may gain Christ" in our last study. To know Christ as Rewarder presumes that first of all one is "found in Him" and the Apostle explains this by equating it with the gift of God's righteousness through faith in Christ. The possession of this righteousness is the one essential for acquittal at the tribunal of God. It is entire contrast to any human righteousness on the basis of law-keeping. This standard is far too low for that utter perfection which is the final condition of the whole of creation when the Divine redemptive purpose has been reached. There will then be not one blot or blemish in God's universe. Isaiah had already written of God's covering righteousness symbolically ". . . He hath covered me with the robe of righteousness . . ." (Isa. lxi. 10). God is the sole Author of this complete and saving righteousness which He is ready to impart to sinful men on the ground of complete trust in Christ. This is a perfect standing indeed. Millions labour to get it by their own efforts and must fail. The tragedy is that the very thing they are working so hard to get God gives as a free gift to those who accept His Son! To the Apostle, who had realized this astounding fact years earlier, this meant that he gladly gave up all his previous attempts to work out his own righteousness. This justification by faith is the main theme of his Roman epistle.

"That I may know Him" has been interpreted in several ways by expositors but this surely represents Paul's aim now he has realized in experience what this glorious standing is. The next step and one that never ends during this life, is to get to know Christ more deeply and intimately day by day. The phrases which follow are the filling out of this personal knowledge.

We can say with certainty that a real knowledge and acknowledgment of God is the highest goal that saved human mind can attain in this life—though even then it is but "partial" (I Cor. xiii. 9-12) this side of glory. Israel's tragedy of old, with all their constant failure, was due to the fact that, as God lamented concerning them:

> "The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib: but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider" (Isa. i. 3), and so, in this respect, Israel had fallen lower than animals, in spite of all God's loving dealings with them.

The unsaved person does not "know God". If the world as a whole did, we could not be in the terrible condition that we see all around us. One of the great aims of redemption is to bring the redeemed to a true knowledge of the Redeemer and this should colour the whole life of the believer in Christ. Paul had used the close, warm phrase, "Christ Jesus my Lord" expressing his gratitude and devotion. His greatest aim was to get to know Him better and to "win Him", though this was not done without some loss on his part, "for Whom I have suffered the loss of all things" he states, but without any sense of self-pity, for his present great gain made all these things seem of no more value than "refuse" (8).

Verses 10-12 are an expansion then of what getting to know Christ means and this is developed in terms of power and fellowship.

> ". . . . . that I may know Him, and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, becoming conformed unto His death" (iii. 10 R.V).

The Apostle was not content to know the Lord in His earthly life. Thousands of believers today are, and do not go on to know the risen and ascended Christ—the One Who said after His resurrection "All power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth" (Matt. xxvii. 18). Paul discounted a knowledge of Christ after the flesh (II Cor. v. 16). It was the risen Christ he had personal dealings with and to know Him meant getting to realize something of the greatest of all powers, namely that which conquers death, the power of His resurrection.

We live in an age of power and through scientific discovery have come to know the power that the Creator has locked up in matter. But we may be sure of one thing, atomic power will never bring someone from the grave and give him eternal life! Later on Paul prays for the Ephesian believers that they might know "the exceeding greatness of His power to us-ward who believe, according to the working of His mighty power, which He wrought in Christ, when He raised Him from the dead, and set him at His own right hand in the heavenly places . . . . ." (Eph. i. 19-23). From this one can see that such a mighty power is at the disposal of the believer for service. How much better than one's own puny strength! No wonder Paul stated that he could do all things through Christ Who empowered him (Phil. iv. 13). Realizing this, one can appreciate better how he longed to know the "power of His resurrection".

We may all join in such longing, but what about the item that follows—the fellowship of His sufferings? Koinonia fellowship or sharing, describes the close association between the Lord's sufferings and those of the Apostle (II Cor. xi. 23-28). He could truthfully say that daily he bore in the body "the dying of the Lord Jesus" (II Cor. iv. 10). These sufferings "for Christ's sake", he bore gladly, for at the very beginning the Lord had said "For I will show him how great things he must suffer for my Name's sake" (Acts ix. 16). It was this measure of sufferings he was anxious to "fill up" (Col. i. 24) in faithfulness.

Let us be quite sure of this, that the Christian pathway designated by the Lord will include suffering. We can sometimes avoid it, by departing from the Lord's will, but "no cross, no crown", is true for every believer. We need not shrink from it, for the wonderful promise of I Cor. x. 13 is for ever true.

Fellowship in the Lord's sufferings leads to "conformity to His death" (Phil. iii. 10) and this is best explained by the teaching and experience of Rom. vi. with its stress on identification with Christ in His death, burial and resurrection. In Him we die to the dominion of the sinful old nature and in Him rise to newness of life, but the experience of this demands obedience to Rom. vi. 11 to reckon this to be true, otherwise this remains doctrine and nothing more. It is important to note that Paul puts resurrection power before fellowship in the Lord's sufferings. To experience the latter without the former would be to commit spiritual suicide, for we could not endure such an experience in our own strength.

"Being conformed" or "conforming myself", is the present participle and suggests a daily and continual experience of this conformity. Each day brings its tests and temptations which can only be met successfully by the power that conquers death and a daily dying to everything that is out of the Lord's will.

The goal of all this is expressed in verse 11 "if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection from the dead". On the surface this seems an anticlimax. Did Paul who was undoubtedly saved, doubt whether he might be raised from the dead after death? The answer is "no" and the problem comes because of the translation not being adequate. Literally he wrote "the out-resurrection, out from the dead", the preposition ek being used twice, thus being emphatic. The doctrine of resurrection was a part of orthodox Judaism. When the Lord said to Martha concerning Lazarus, "thy brother shall rise again" (John xi. 23), Martha replied, "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day" (24) for this was the hope of every Jew. We can better understand the force of ek in Phil. iii. 11, if we turn to Mark ix. 9, 10. The Lord charged the disciples to tell no one of the things they had seen until He was risen from (ek) the dead. This puzzled them, for they questioned what the rising from or out of the dead could mean (10). A general resurrection was understandable, but a selective one, leaving others behind was something new to them.

We know that this is new also to many believers today for the creeds as a whole, teach one general resurrection at the end of time, whereas the Scriptures teach that it will be "every man in his own order" or rank (I Cor. xv. 23), as God wills. Not all will be raised at once, but according to the working out of the Lord's purpose for the various groups of His children. His timing is correct and no one can alter this. There is a resurrection which is the realization of hope and the consummation of salvation for the people of God. Rom. viii. 23 definitely teaches that this is the final out-working of redemption, and "the redemption of the body" and redemption is not complete without it. Redemption from sin is the beginning of salvation, and redemption from death which embodies resurrection is the climax or goal.

However, in addition to this there is a resurrection which leads to a prize or reward and this must not be passed by or confused with "hope". In Luke xx. 34, 35, the Lord, in answer to the Sadducees, declares that marriage belongs to the present age, but those who are accounted worthy to obtain that age and the resurrection out (ek) from the dead, do not marry. Here is a selective resurrection depending on personal worthiness or faithfulness and when we get the double ek in Phil. iii., we have similar teaching. The Apostle had not the slightest doubt that, if he died, he would be brought back to life. This was an essential part of his hope. But in Philippians he was pressing on in his eagerness to obtain not the hope but the prize in connection with the high calling of God in Christ Jesus, and this would be pre-fixed by this special out-resurrection which "if by any means" he endeavoured to obtain. Let us not confuse these two distinct aspects of teaching.

No.48. The Epistle to the Philippians (15).
pp. 236 - 239

We have given a consideration to the very important "out-resurrection" of Phil. iii. 11 and its purpose as a prelude to the PRIZE in connection with the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. Some find the doctrine concerning resurrection in its various aspects difficult to grasp. One feels this is largely because the average Christian mind is dominated by the Platonic idea of the immortality of the soul which is unknown to the Scriptures of truth. Modern Christendom is leavened with ideas which have their basis in paganism if traced back far enough and this is one of them.

Professor F. W. Beare is undoubtedly right when he says:

> "Paul, unlike us, was affected by Greek notions only in a secondary way. His inheritance was Hebraic, and the Hebrew thought instinctively of the person as a whole; for him the body was a valid expression of the whole person, not a more or less indifferent frame for the soul. Paul was constitutionally incapable of thinking of life eternal in terms of a 'soul' existing in some disembodied state . . . . . a 'spiritual' resurrection would to him be no resurrection at all; a disembodied existence would be no better than the shadowy and unsubstantial existence of a shade" (Epistle to the Philippians, pp. 125, 126, italics ours).

It is significant that the Scriptures never use the phrase "the resurrection of the body" which we find in the creeds, but always the resurrection of the dead, for it is always the whole person that is in view.

The Apostle now uses a favourite metaphor of a race, drawn from the Olympic games. We have references to this in I Corinthians & Galatians and it is significant that the epistle to the Hebrews likewise uses it (xii. 1, 2). When this figure is employed, we are not dealing with God's free gift by grace apart from merit or works, that is salvation and its kindred aspects, but service and the possibility of reward or loss. This is clear in I Cor. ix. 24, 25 and it is just as true in the Philippian context we are now considering. Paul was longing to reach the full end for which Christ had saved him. As J. B. Philips puts it: "grasping ever more firmly that purpose for which Christ grasped me". This means he is not content with being just saved, as so many are, but eagerly pressed forward to reach maturity, or full-growth (perfection), for attached to this is a Divine prize or reward. God has no crowns for immature Christians!

> "Brethren I count not myself to have yet apprehended: but one thing I do, forgetting the things which are behind, and stretching forward to the things which are before, I press on toward the goal unto the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" (iii. 13, 14 R.V.).

Here is the concentration of the disciplined athlete and runner. He is not going to be distracted, "one thing I do", nor is he going to turn his head backwards and glance at the "things that are behind", but with his eye on the goal, the Lord in heaven's glory, he is pressing forward with the greatest speed possible.

Sometime God's Word exhorts us to remember. Sometimes it is equally important to forget. It was indeed a sad day for Israel when they said "we remember the fish, which we did eat in Egypt freely; the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlick . . . . . let us make a captain, and let us return into Egypt" (Numb. xi. 5; xiv. 4). The insidious 'remembering' and looking behind at that from which they had been freed and redeemed, soon led to the wish to go back to the place of bondage, although their fickle memories forgot the suffering and misery connected with it.

We need to take a lesson from this and ask the Lord to deliver us from such deceiving memories. "Looking back" has no place for the urgent runner who is eager to obtain the prize. Paul's one aim was that he might "finish his course with joy" (Acts xx. 24) and so he must "run without swerving" (I Cor. ix. 26 Moffatt) for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

It is remarkable how often this phrase is misquoted and the last three words omitted. Some translate it "the upward call or summons" and while this sounds attractive it hardly fits in with the "calling which is IN Christ Jesus", not a summons TO Christ Jesus. "In Christ" is always positional as used by Paul, and this wondrous calling or vocation is IN Christ and cannot have any reality apart from this glorious position.

We should not translate the genitive, prize of the high calling, as one of apposition, meaning the prize, that is to say, the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. This would make the wondrous calling of Ephesians and Colossians one of personal attainment, instead of one of sheer grace as these epistles so clearly teach. It is rather the genitive of relation, meaning the prize in relation to this high calling. We must therefore distinguish between the "one hope" of this calling with its riches of grace, and the prize, which is something to be striven after even as the Apostle Paul was doing in the context we are studying. Those who are perfect (mature) must be "thus minded" said the Apostle. Whether he was referring to some in the Philippian church who claimed to have reached this position, it is difficult to say. It is hard to believe that any at Philippi had progressed further than Paul himself.

However in verse 15 we have the gracious promise that God would illuminate the minds of any who had real difficulty in understanding and in any case, each must walk and put into practice the light they had already received (16).

The Apostle now commences a section of warning. He was indeed the Apostle of freedom, but freedom did not mean licence or self-indulgence. "For brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, ..." (Gal. v. 13). Evidently there were some at Philippi or elsewhere who were doing this very thing. Some have tried to maintain that unbelievers are referred to here but a careful consideration of the statements made, make this impossible.

> "Brethren, be ye imitators together of me and mark them which so walk even as ye have us for an example. For many walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ, whose end is perdition, > whose god is their belly, and whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things" (iii. 17-19 R.V.).

Let us take the last phrase first, "who mind earthly things". It would be idle to accuse an unbeliever of doing this, as he of himself could do no other. How can an unbeliever mind heavenly things?

Again these people against whom the Apostle is warning the church are said to "walk"—a term used consistently of believers. One can then understand his profound sorrow, even to tears, that such could so degenerate in their daily life. Further than this they are said, not to be enemies of Christ, but of His cross. Now the cross stands for specific doctrine in Paul's epistles, standing between the believer and the flesh (Gal.v.24) and the world (Gal. vi. 14). It would have no meaning in the lives of those "dead in trespasses and sins".

The mind is all-important here, specially in relation to the runner in the race for the prize, which is an heavenly one. To attempt this with a mind whose bent is on earthly things is to court disaster. Writing to the Colossian church Paul insisted:

> "Set your mind on the things that are above, where Christ is seated on the right hand of God" (Col. iii. 2 R.V.).

This the runner must continually do. If his gaze is distracted he is likely to swerve from the track and drop out of the race. It is possible that some had succumbed to antinominianism at Philippi that is, the throwing off of all restraints under a wrong conception of grace and freedom. Some expositors think the Apostle is not necessarily meaning that all this was necessarily happening at Philippi, but that Paul had knowledge that such things were taking place elsewhere and so he warns the Philippians in advance. It does not really much matter, as long as the warning was given and heeded by those to whom he was writing, and by us today.

In direct contrast to all this Paul continues:

> "For our citizenship is in heaven, from whence also we wait for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ: Who shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of His glory, according to the working whereby He is able even to subject all things unto Himself" (iii. 20, 21 R.V.).

Politeuma, can be translated as "citizenship", "commonwealth", or "colony of haven" (Moffatt). Just as Philippi was a Roman military colony directly related to the capital city of Rome although far removed geographically, so we are citizens of a heavenly commonwealth far removed from this earth, and are pilgrims passing through this earthly territory to our real home in the heavenlies "far above all".

"From whence", ex hou, can refer only to politeuma and not to ouranois, heaven. "We eagerly await a Saviour the Lord Jesus Christ." Paul seldom uses the word Saviour in connection with Christ. It may be because the term was frequently used in the heathen world for their gods and the Roman emperors were designated as "saviours", so the term might be misconstrued as applied to Christ. Certainly salvation is not fully complete until we see Him face to face and are made like him. Now we have this body of our humbling (the word is cognate with "he humbled Himself" of chapter ii. 8). "Vile" is too strong as translation today though the English word in 1611 had a less intense meaning (cp. "vile raiment" James ii. 2). The body is not "vile" in this sense. It is indeed frail and mortal and cannot stand up to the conditions of the heavenly sphere of our calling. Flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God.

"We shall bear the image of the heavenly (One)", Christ in glory (I Cor. xv. 49). The body of the Lord's glory is the prototype of the believer's spiritual body, fashioned by the Lord's mighty transforming power. This power is so great that it will at long last align all things (subject) under the headship of the Lord Jesus. His omnipotence brings all things under His control, and nothing less than this is the glorious goal in which members of the Body of Christ and the redeemed of all callings will finally participate.

Purpose, Promise and Performance.

No.2. pp. 1 - 6

In Eph. iii. 11 we read:

> "According to the eternal purpose which He purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord", and to this passage we shall return for close scrutiny presently. The climax of God's gracious purpose in Ephesians is found in Eph. v. 27:

> "That He might present it to Himself a glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish."

Turning to Philippians, we find the stress is laid on the 'performance' of the promises made:

> "Being confident of this very thing, that He which hath begun a good work in you will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ" (Phil. i. 6).

Even though the Apostle expresses "confidence", some doubt has been injected into this verse, suggesting that what had been begun would be discontinued, but the rule of I Cor. ii. 13 when applied, shows what the Apostle meant by "begin" and "perform", for he uses the same two words in II Cor. viii. 10-11, where he reminds the Corinthians of what they had 'begun' a year ago, that there should be a "performance". It would make nonsense of his exhortation to teach that Paul told the Corinthians that their willingness a year ago to make a contribution to the poor saints should not now be fulfilled. Later in Philippians, Paul expresses the earnest wish that he may "apprehend that for which he had been apprehended of Christ Jesus". The change of this 'vile body' that it may be fashioned like unto the Saviour's "glorious body", is "according to the working whereby He is able even to subdue all things unto Himself" (Phil. iii. 12, 21). Colossians traverses much the same ground as Ephesians, but with different emphasis and different sequence. We read that Paul was made a special minister,

> "according to the dispensation of God which is given to me for you, to fulfil (or complete) the word of God; even the mystery . . . . ." (Col. i. 25, 26).

In II Timothy, the Apostle stresses the purpose of grace that is implied in his ministry, saying of God:

> "Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began, but is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, Who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel: Whereunto I am appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles" (II Tim. i. 9-11).

Having given this rough survey, we propose a more detailed and careful study of the words and context of "the eternal purpose" of Eph. iii. 11. Before considering the bearing of the context upon this passage, we must draw the reader's attention to the fact that while "the eternal purpose" has a majestic sound about it, its literal rendering should be "the purpose of the ages", and this demands some expansion and explanation. In the O.T. the word translated 'eternal' or 'for ever' is the Hebrew word olam, and if we consider its occurrences in Ecclesiastes, as translated in the A.V. we shall find it translated "for ever", "old time", "world" and "long" in Eccles. i. 4, 10; ii. 16; iii. 11, 14; ix. 6 and xii. 5. Such variety may be charming but can be misleading. Supposing we translated olam in Ecclesiastes consistently, we then have the following most suggestive index to this problematic book.

Olam in Ecclesiastes.

A | i. 4. The earth abideth to the age.—The passing generation.
B | i. 10. Already in or to the ages.—Nothing new under the sun.
C | ii. 16. No remembrance to the age.—Forgotten.
D | iii. 11. The age set in the heart of men.
C | iii. 14. What God does is to the age. It remains.
B | ix. 6. No portion to the age.—under the sun.
A | xii. 5. Man and the age home.—The passing generation.

While this analysis of itself may not appear very illuminating, the comparison of passage with passage will bring out into prominence some of the truth sought and taught in Ecclesiastes.

The epistle to the Ephesians is most intimately associated with all we believe and hope for, and so we turn without further comment to the way aion is found and is translated in that most wonderful epistle. First let us note the way the A.V. has rendered this one word, namely world, course, ages, world, eternal, world without end, world (Eph. i. 21; ii. 2, 7; iii. 9, 11, 21; vi. 12). Here we have this world which had a beginning, but which has no end, the course of this world, and the eternal purpose. If we translate consistently, light and instruction will immediately appear.

Aiõn in Ephesians.

A | i. 21. Rulers of this and age to come.—Subject to Christ in resurrection.
B | ii. 2. The age of the world.—Satanic energy (energeõ).
C | ii. 7. Ages to come.—Divine grace (future).
D | iii. 9. Hid since the ages.—The mystery (Central feature).
C | iii. 11. Ages, their purpose.—Divine wisdom (now).
B | iii. 21. The generation of the age of the ages.—Divine energy (energeõ).
A | vi. 12. Rulers of the darkness of this age.—Withstood in resurrection power.

This purpose or plan of the ages is vitally linked with the following features, most of which are unique 'and are not to be found in the ministry of any Biblical writer except Paul' as the prisoner of Christ Jesus for us Gentiles. We tabulate without attempting to comment or enlarge these unique items:

(1) Paul speaks of himself as the prisoner of Christ Jesus for us Gentiles.
(2) He speaks of a special dispensation of grace that was given him to us-ward.
(3) This involved the making known to him by revelation the Mystery (secret).

Having given some attention to the need to speak of the ages rather than that which lies beyond our grasp, namely eternity, which unlike the ages, can have no beginning or no end, a state that the human mind cannot grasp and with which the Scriptures are not concerned, we turn to the actual references in the great Prison Epistles that speak of Purpose, Promise and Performance. It is obvious that God had a wondrous purpose when He chose the members of the Church which is the Body of Christ, before the foundation (or overthrow) of the world, but the actual word 'purpose' first occurs in a verbal form in Eph. i. 9, and in the substantive in verse 11:

> "In all wisdom and prudence having made known unto us the mystery of His will, according to His good pleasure which He hath purposed in Himself, That in the dispensation of the fullness of times He might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth; even in Him: In Whom also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of Him Who worketh all things after the counsel of His own will."

What words are here! Before we dare to submit these verses to our poor inspection, should we not, in figure, "take off our shoes from off our feet"? The place whereon we stand is indeed "holy ground".

Let us consider the wording of Eph. i. 8. As the verse stands in the A.V., it seems to contain a contradiction. How can anyone "abound" or "over-flow" with "prudence"? How can anyone "abound", when the original means to overflow as well as be discreet, frugal, economical and provident at the same time? The contradiction exists only in the punctuation of the English translation,

(1) Redemption. This is made to abound with prodigal riches.
(2) Instruction. This is given little by little as we are able to bear it.

Let us read the passage once again, but put a full stop in the middle of verse 8, thus:

> "In Whom we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of His grace wherein He hath ABOUNDED toward us.
> In all WISDOM and PRUDENCE having made known unto us the mystery of His will, according to His good pleasure which He hath purposed in Himself.

This mystery, good pleasure and purpose, had a special dispensation in view:

> "With a view to (eis R.V. 'unto') a dispensation of the fullness of times He might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth; even in Him."

The word "dispensation", following the Revised Text, is used by the Apostle Paul four times:

Oikonomia

A | Eph. i. 10. A dispensation of the fullness of times (the mystery of his will) . . . . . purposed in Himself.
B | Eph. iii. 2. The dispensation of the grace of God given me to you.
A | Eph. iii. 9. The dispensation of the mystery . . . . . according to the purpose of the ages which He purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord.
B | Col. i. 25. The dispensation of God given me for you.

In the fullness of "time" (Gal. iv. 4) when God sent forth His Son, the Greek word for 'time' is chronos, but in Eph. i. 10 the word is kairos a "season", the time of harvest (Matt. xiii. 30), referring not to the clock, but to the season of the year. The usual Greek words translated "gather together" are not found in Eph. i. 10 but a compound of kephale "head", anakephalaioomai "to head up" is used. The R.V. reads "to sum up", but the presence of three expressions "the Head" and "the Fullness" and "all things" in Eph. i. 22, 23, and the added fact that in Colossians we learn that Christ is also "Head of all principality and power" (Col. ii. 10), and that in Him dwells "all the fullness of the Godhead bodily", make it imperative that we retain the word 'head' in the phrase which the A.V. translates "gather together", and read "to head up", and so suggest that what Christ is to the Church of the One body now (Eph. i. 22, 23), He will be when the goal, as indicated in I Cor. xv. 28, shall be attained. Now, in this anticipatory dispensation, Christ is All and in all (Col. iii. 11), but when "the end" comes, God will then be all in all. Both Eph. i. 22, 23 and I Cor. xv. 27, 28 flow out of the special interpretation given by Paul of Psa. viii.

The Inheritance.

The A.V. renders Eph. i. 11 "In Whom also we have obtained an inheritance", where the R.V. reads: "In Whom also we were made an heritage".

> Cunnington translates "We were made God's portion".
> Rotherham reads "We were taken as an inheritance".
> Moffatt reads "We have had our heritage allotted us".

The word kleroomai translated "obtain an inheritance" occurs nowhere else in the N.T. Dr. Bullinger, in his Lexicon, tells us the word is in the middle voice and means "to acquire by lot, to obtain, to possess", but leaves the question unsolved as to who it is that obtains.

We have on other occasions expressed our conviction, that many a doubtful passage in the N.T. can be rendered with certainty by referring to the parallel use in the LXX. One such passage is I Sam. xiv. 42, where in answer to the casting of lots between Saul and Jonathan, "Jonathan was taken". The Greek Katakleroumai here is the translation of the Hebrew lakad "to take", in what is called the niphal or passive voice, "be taken", not actively "to take". There are six occasions apart from I Sam. xiv. 41-42 where this word is used for being taken by lot.

> "The tribe of Judah was taken . . . . . and Zabdi was taken . . . . . and Achan . . . . . was taken" (Josh. vii. 16-18).
> "The tribe of Benjamin was taken . . . . . the family of Matri was taken, and Saul the son of Kish was taken" (I Sam. x. 20, 21).

It seems impossible to resist this evidence. Eph. i. 11 teaches us NOT that we have obtained an inheritance, but that we have been taken by God as His inheritance! Of this rendering Alford says: "This seems to me the only rendering by which philology and the context are alike satisfied".

We have already gained information by referring to the history of Israel. Let us turn again and see what that typical people tell us concerning this conception.

> "And the Lord spake unto Aaron, thou shalt have no inheritance in the land, neither shall thou have any part among them: I am thy part and thine inheritance among the children of Israel" (Numb. xviii. 20).

This is blessing contrary to nature indeed! The man that God would honour the most, is to have, apparently, least, but only apparently. The tribes of Israel may possess a portion of the land, but Aaron finds his part and inheritance in the Lord Himself. This is not on all fours with Eph. i. 11, but it is an approach. The Ephesian believer is taken one stage further; the Lord finds His portion in the members of the Church of the One Body. This too finds its counterpart in Israel:

> "The Lord's portion is His people: Jacob is the lot of His inheritance" (Deut. xxxii. 9).

We must not, however, make the mistake of insisting so much upon this aspect as to deny that Israel did have an inheritance. Truth out of proportion oft becomes a lie. In Deut. iv. 20, Moses reminds Israel that they were taken to be a people of inheritance unto the Lord, but in verse 21 he refers to the good land which the Lord had given them for an inheritance. Both statements are necessary for a full presentation of the truth. Both Israel and the Church are reminded that unless they are the Lord's portion, all other portions will be a mockery. Unless they find their inheritance in the Lord, mere possessions will become vanity.

> "All things are yours", said the Apostle, "whether Paul or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours: and ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's" (I Cor. iii. 22, 23).

The Apostle uses the word prothesis "purpose" once more in the Prison Epistles, namely in II Tim. i. 9, when speaking of the purpose of God, and once in II Tim. iii. 10 of his own purpose and manner of life.

So far we have been concerned mainly with the question of purpose. We now turn to promise and will discover that the promises of God march with His purposes, and first of all, find their beginning and ending in Christ.

No.3. The Promises.
pp. 21 - 26

> "For all the promises of God in Him are the Yea, and in Him Amen, unto the glory of God by us" (II Cor. i. 20).

These sentiments form the general tenor of all Scripture. However many times we have been assailed by doubtings and disappointments, we shall all say, out of full hearts, the words of I Kings viii. 56:

> "These hath not failed one word of all His good promise, which He promised . . . . ."

Both Sarah and Abraham are mentioned in the N.T. concerning their conviction that God keeps His promises. Abraham "staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief, but was strong in faith, giving glory to God, and being fully persuaded that, what He had promised, He was able also to perform" (Rom. iv. 20, 21). Sarah "herself received strength to conceive seed, and was delivered of a child when she was past age, because she judged Him faithful Who had promised" (Heb. xi. 11). God too, "willing more abundantly to show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of His counsel, confirmed it by an oath" (Heb. vi. 17). Here in these three quotations, we have the assurance that God is (1) Able, (2) Faithful, and (3) Unchangeable, with regard to His promises. So important and valued were these promises, that the Apostle when he lists the superior advantages of Israel says:

> "To whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises" (Rom. ix. 4).

In contrast, the Gentiles at that time were "Aliens . . . . . and strangers from the covenants of promise" (Eph. ii. 12) and so were without hope, without Christ, and without God.

Coming to the positive references to 'promise' in the Prison Epistles, and including the two epistles to Titus and I Timothy we read:

> "In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began" (Titus i. 2).

I Tim. iv. 8 speaks of the "promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come". II Tim. i. 1 opens with the words:

> "Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, according to the promise of life which is in Christ Jesus."

Coming to Ephesians we read:

> "Ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of His glory" (Eph. i. 13, 14), and among the special privileges that go with the membership of the Church which is His Body, we read:

> "That the Gentiles should be fellowheirs, and of the same body, and partakers of His promise in Christ by the gospel, whereof I was made a minister" (Eph. iii. 6, 7).

We have purposely refrained from digging too deeply into some of these passages, Eph. ii. 6 being one, but have simply emphasized the fact that God keeps His promises, that He is both able, and faithful and is worthy of our complete trust. These facts practically include our third item "Performance", but we will give this a hearing also that our joy may be complete.

Performance.

Jeremiah was staggered at the prospect of being a prophet unto the nations, and made as an excuse the confession:

> "I cannot speak, for I am a child" (Jer. i. 6).

To encourage him, the Most High condescended to give Jeremiah a sign, and said to him:

> "What seest thou? And I [Jeremiah] said, I see a rod of an almond tree."

The answer of the Lord is not very evident on the surface, for He said:

> "Thou hast well seen: for I will hasten My word to perform it" (Jer. i. 11, 12).

In Jer. xxxi. 28, the word translated 'hasten' in i. 12 is translated "watched". The almond is one of the first trees to blossom in Palestine, and was so called "the watcher", and this would need no explanation to Jeremiah or any Hebrew living in his day. To Abraham promises had been made which included a seed, and a land, and when Isaac was distressed by famine, the Lord told him not to go down into Egypt but,

> "Sojourn in this land, and I will be with thee, and will bless thee; for unto thee, and unto thy seed, I will give all these countries, and I will perform the oath which I sware unto Abraham thy father" (Gen. xxvi. 3).

As we have earlier quoted, Solomon speaks of the performance of God's promises of I Kings viii. 20, 24:

> "The Lord hath performed His word that He spake."
> "Who hast kept with thy servant David my father that Thou promisedst him."

Without further quotations, which the reader can supplement to his lasting benefit, we once again cite the Apostle's words from Phil. i. 6:

> "Being confident of this very thing, that He which hath begun a good work in you will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ."

Purpose Promise Performance

What a trinity of blessing these three words contain, and they belong equally to Israel and the Church, without the possibility of failure through lack of power, through changeableness, or for any possible reason. May this blessed 'confidence' be the portion of all who have put their trust in Him "Who is faithful that promised".

The Question Why?

There can be few, if any, who have walked along life's pilgrim pathway, without at times finding the word "Why?" forced from heart and lips, and we go straight to perhaps the most wonderful exampled of this human feature, the record of the crucifixion, and read the poignant words:

> "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?"

Matthew tells us that the language actually used by the Saviour was,

> "Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani?" (Matt. xxvii. 46).

These words are a quotation from Psa. xxii., and there is every evidence that the Saviour recited the whole Psalm and identified Himself with David and all perplexed believers, for later the Psalmist said: "They pierced My hands and My feet". "They part My garments among them, and cast lots upon My vesture", and the closing words of the Psalm "He hath done (this)" could easily be the equivalent of the closing words of the crucified Saviour, "It is finished". The cry "Why hast Thou forsaken Me?" cannot mean that Christ was taken unawares by His betrayal and actual crucifixion, such passages as Heb. x. 5-10, Matt. xvi. 21; xxvi. 2 and Luke xviii. 31 make such an excuse impossible. Let us for a moment turn to an earlier trial, and see how the Saviour met it. In Matt. iv. 1-10 we have a record of the temptation of the Son of God in the wilderness. How did He resist the temptation, rebuke and triumph over the tempter? He Who Himself was The Word met the tempter exactly in the same way that you and I must meet him, He said "It is written" three times, and quoted three passages from O.T. Scriptures. The reviling crowd spoke truth when they said "He saved others, Himself He cannot save".

Look at the record of Mark iv. 35, 36. At the close of a strenuous day of healing and teaching not only the multitudes, but when alone with His disciples, He at length said to them, "Let us pass over unto the other side". Now note the words that follow:

> "And when THEY [not He] had sent away the multitude, THEY took Him EVEN AS HE WAS in the ship", and even though a storm arose that threatened the safety of the ship, "He was . . . . . asleep on a pillow' (38). Here was "The Man Christ Jesus" dead beat, physically exhausted, working miracles for others, but never for Himself. At the disciples' cry however, He Who had been carried "even as He was", arose, rebuked the wind, and at His word "the wind ceased and there was a great calm" (Mark iv. 39-41). Now these passages (Matt. xxvii. 46; Matt. iv. 1-10 and Mark iv. 34-41) have been brought forward to show that the Saviour entered into all the physical and mental trials that are known to man, and so the question "Why?" came from His lips, not because He did not know the answer, or was ignorant of the purposes of God, but that He might assure us that the eternal question "Why?" that haunts man from cradle to grave is understood by Him, and shared by Him.

So far as we have any means of knowing, man is the only creature on earth that asks the question "Why?", and so with these introductory words, inadequate as they may appear to be, we turn to the Scriptures for examples and for the answers given to this ever-repeated question "Why?"

Psalm lxxiii.

This Psalm of Asaph shows us a man of like infirmities as ourselves, whose faith was sorely tried, but who was graciously led to the only place where his questioning heart could be satisfied. The Psalm is divided into three parts by the recurrence of the words "Truly" (1), "Verily" (13), and "Surely" (18), which are all translations of the same Hebrew word, and could be translated in each place "After all". First the Psalmist gives the conclusion that he had been led to after a period of doubt, and says "After all, God is good to Israel", and if we demur and say, did Asaph doubt this blessed fact? he himself says:

> "As for me, my feet were almost gone; my steps had well nigh slipped" (2), and this because he had become envious at the prosperity of the wicked who seemed to have no trouble as other men, whose eyes stood out in fatness and who had more than heart could wish. So in verse 13 he came to the sad conclusion:

> "After all I have cleansed my heart in vain."

But then came the wonderful change:

> "Until I went into the sanctuary of God, then understood I their end" (17).
> "After all, Thou didst set them in slippery places" (18).

Asaph's question "Why?" was solved as our questionings must be solved "in the Sanctuary". He had actually put his finger on the answer by his use of the word "chastened", for this is the Lord's dealings with His own. Asaph's feet "were almost gone", his steps had "well nigh slipped", but now he realized that those who had been the object of his envy would be cast down to destruction, while he emerged from the Sanctuary saying:

> "Thou shalt guide me with Thy counsel"
> "And afterward received me to glory"
> "Whom have I in heaven but Thee?" (24, 25).

Most of us at different times have felt like Asaph, but however slippery the path, and the assault of the enemy, we can say with him "Thou hast holden me by my right hand" (verse 23).

Abraham, the man of faith.

Abraham is lifted out by the Apostle Paul, both in Romans and in Hebrews as a wonderful example of a faith "that staggered not" at an almost unbelievable promise, yet, there is an illuminating passage which shows that he was much like ourselves, and became haunted with the question "Why?". This we find recorded in Gen. xv. Although Abraham believed in the Lord that Sarah should have a son and heir, Abraham nevertheless asked:

> "Whereby shall I know that I shall inherit it [the land]?" (Gen. xv. 18), and at first reading, the answer of the Lord sounds the very opposite of reassurance:

> "Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years" (13).

The assurance comes in the sequel:

> "But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again" (16), as we find they did (Exod. xii. 40-42).

There were several factors that led to delay. Terah's halt at Haran, and Lot's accompanying afterwards gave the evil one his opportunity. Now, instead of blotting out the Canaanite by one miraculous blow, the Lord seems to suggest that even the Amorite had some length of time allowed, "the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full" (Gen. xv. 16). Daniel also tells us that "when the transgressors are come to the full" (Dan. viii. 23) the closing phases of Prophecy will be at hand. This seems to be a principle that is observed even when dealing with iniquity. In the dreadful denunciation of hypocritical Pharisees and those that agreed with them, the Saviour said:

> "Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers. Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?" (Matt. xxiii. 32, 33).

The Apostle Paul, referring to the antagonism of the Jews to the gospel, speaks of killing, persecuting, being contrary, forbidding to speak to the Gentiles that they might be saved, concluding with the words:

> "To fill up their sins always" (I Thess. ii. 15, 16).

Here again some recognized 'measure' seems to be in view, and therefore may be an answer to another "Why?" that has often expressed the worry and anxiety of man under the centuries of Satanic power. Why should Satan be allowed 6000 years of rebellion? Perhaps so mighty an antagonist needs to have a greater extent of liberty before the final judgment falls. We cannot say for certainty that this is so, but, taking all these and parallel passages into account, the agonized cry "Why?" may have to be answered:

> "The iniquity of the Wicked ONE is not yet full", and like Asaph we shall have to go into the sanctuary of God to gain peace and assurance and understand the "End".

There is much that is left unsaid. If we can be assured that the Saviour Himself identifies Himself as the Son of Man by actually quoting as of Himself the agonized opening of Psa. xxii., and if we can sympathize with Asaph in his distress and learn with him the lesson that he learned, and if like Abraham we catch a glimpse of the measure of iniquity that must be filled before judgment falls, then, while we may still at times be moved to ask "Why?" of some of life's enigmas, we shall have the comfort of these Scriptures to enable us to trust where sometimes we cannot trace.

A Survey of the Books of the New Testament

No.1. Israel, in the Gospels and the Acts.
pp. 41 - 45

During the period covered by the Gospels, the Acts, Paul's early epistles and the book of the Revelation, Israel is present and is dominant, Israel is the channel of blessing Divinely appointed, and through which blessing to the Gentile must flow. It will not be necessary to deal with this feature exhaustively but the following passages will suffice for all who bow to the teaching of the Scriptures. The ministry of the Saviour, was, at the first, exclusively to Israel. Commissioning the twelve on their first mission, the Lord said:

> "Go not . . . . . but go rather."
> "Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not: But go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. x. 5, 6).

This restriction is observed later in the Lord's dealing with the Syrophoenecian woman:

> "But He answered and said, I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. xv. 24).

Only when the woman accepted the position of "little dogs" that eat the 'crumbs' that fall from their "masters" (Gk. kurion lord's) table could she receive a blessing. The Apostle acknowledges this pre-eminence of Israel in the epistle to the Romans. Not only does he say "to the Jew first" (Rom. i. 16); not only does he remind the Gentile believer that he was like "a wild olive grafted contrary to nature" into the olive tree of Israel (Rom. xi. 17-25), but lays it down categorically,

> "That Jesus Christ was a minister of the CIRCUMCISION for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the FATHERS", and subsequently, and only as an outcome of this, that "The Gentiles might glory God for His mercy" (Rom. xv. 8-12). It is acknowledged by all scholars, that the epistle to the Romans was the last epistle written by Paul before his Roman imprisonment. It therefore gives the last word on the place of Israel up to about Acts xx., and this is what the Apostle said of Israel in the ninth chapter of this epistle:

> "My brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh: who are Israelites; to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises; Whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came. Who is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen" (Rom. ix. 3-5).

In pointed and intended contrast with this unique position is the description given of the Gentiles "at that time", and written in one of the Epistles covering the period of Israel's absence:

"Wherefore remember, that ye being in time past Gentiles in the flesh, who are called Uncircumcision by that which is called the Circumcision in the flesh made by hands; That at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and with God in the world" (Eph. ii. 11, 12).

The Saviour Himself reminded the woman of Samaria that:

"Salvation is of the Jews" (John iv. 22).

The people of Israel occupy their pre-eminent place from Act i., until set aside in Acts xxviii., a period that covers and includes the seven epistles of Paul's early ministry. Let us tabulate the references for the sake of brevity.

(1) Arising out of the forty days opening up of the Scriptures of the O.T. and prompted, not by blinded Jewish prejudice, but after being assured that He Who had thus expounded to them, or "opened" the Scriptures, saw to it that their understandings were also "opened", the disciples put to the Lord the one question to which such an opening of the Scriptures must lead:

"Lord, wilt Thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" (Acts i. 6; see Acts i. 3; Luke xxiv. 27, 32, 44-48).

It is a sad comment, that those who believe that "the Body of Christ began at Pentecost" have to stoop so low in support of their traditions, as to label Acts i. 6 as "An Apostolic mistake"!

(2) When we examine Acts ii., we discover the following features. Those who had gathered from "every nation under heaven" to observe this feast, are denominated "JEWS". They are addressed by Peter as "Men of Judaea", "Men of Israel", "Men and brethren", "All the house of Israel" (Acts ii. 5, 14, 22, 36).

The Scriptures quoted in proving certain features, are the prophet Joel and the Psalms. These O.T. Scriptures have nothing to say about a church, but associate Pentecost with "the raising of the Lord to sit upon David's throne" (Acts ii. 16-21, 30, 33). The Revised Text omits the word "church" from Acts ii. 47; but even though it should be retained, Stephen's use of the word in Acts vii. 38 shows that the nation of Israel was at that time spoken of as the "Church in the wilderness".

(3) In Acts iii. 19-26, Peter provides the moral of the healing of the lame man. It was a foreshadowing of the "restoration of all things", and in relation with this great theme of prophecy, Peter said to Israel:

"Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed. UNTO YOU FIRST God, having raised up His Son Jesus, SENT Him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities" (Acts iii. 25, 26).

(4) Even after the stoning of Stephen, and the subsequent preaching in places as far off as Cyprus and Antioch, such nevertheless preached the word "To NONE but unto the JEWS ONLY" (Acts xi. 19).

Leaving the testimony of Peter let us turn to the teaching of Paul.

(5) In Acts xiii. Paul is separated by the Holy Spirit, and evangelized some of the cities of Galatia. He addressed the congregation in the synagogues as "Men and brethren, children of the stock of Abraham", (but added what Peter could not have added until the revelation given him in Acts x.), "and whosoever among you feareth God. To YOU is the word of this salvation SENT" (Acts xiii. 26).

Explaining his attitude subsequently, Paul said to the Jews:

> "It was necessary that the word of God should FIRST have been spoken to you: but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles" (Acts xiii. 46), and the closing words of Acts xiv. show that here, not in the Gospels, nor in Acts i.-xii., but here God "opened the door of faith unto the Gentiles".

(6) Paul's defence recorded in Acts xxii. was given in Hebrew, and when he spoke before king Agrippa, he acknowledged that Agrippa was "expert in all customs and questions which are among the Jews" and later said:

> "And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers: unto which promise our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come" (Acts xxvi. 6, 7).

It is evident that Paul had not heard of the "lost" ten tribes! And when at length Paul reached Rome, instead of fulfilling his long cherished desire (Rom. i. 9-13), he called the chiefs of the Jews together, and told them:

> "For the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain" (Acts xxviii. 17-20).

It is evident from these Scriptures, that throughout the gospels, and right through to the close of the Acts, Israel was a factor to be reckoned with, but what Gentile today could, if he would, become like the graft of wild olive?

The New Covenant and the Mystery. Two distinct callings and spheres of blessing.

The word "testament" is too closely interwoven into our speech that it cannot now be dispensed with, nevertheless it is unfortunate that it is used as a synonym for "covenant", for these two words have different associations. The chief use of the words "testament" or "testamentary" is to do with a person's will, as drawn up by a solicitor, which opens with the words:

> "This is the last will and testament of . . . . ."

The Greek word diatheke is translated both "covenant" and "testament" in parallel passages, as:

> "A Surety of a better testament" (Heb. vii. 22), and
> "The Mediator of a better covenant" (Heb. viii. 6).

There can be no doubt but that the word "covenant" should be used in practically every occurrence of the word diatheke. We are not however, governed either by the etymology of the Greek word or by its use by pagan Greeks. The word is employed in the LXX version to translate the Hebrew berith, which is translated in the A.V. O.T. "covenant" 260 times, beside "confederacy", and "league", all, or any of which translations imply an agreement made by two parties or more. It is amazing to ponder the different way in which many believers act when engaged in the business of this world, as over against their strange dealings with Scripture. No man in his senses would go to a Bank, an Insurance office, or a Building Society and act as though he had every right to that which was in some specific covenant, simply because he lived next door! Yet Christian men of understanding and integrity can read, both in the O.T. and in the N.T. that the New Covenant was made by the Lord "with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah", whose identity is further made clear by the added words:

> "Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day that I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt" (Jer. xxxi. 32).

God never led the "fathers" of any Gentile reader of these words out of Egypt to the foot of Mount Sinai, and all pretensions to rights and claims of blessing under the New Covenant are invalid and foolish. This new covenant falls into two parts:

(1) The forgiveness of sins (Jer. xxxi. 33, 34).
(2) The restoration of Israel to their land (Jer. xxxi. 36), and with this restoration, their entry into the position of a kingdom of Priests, which formed part of the broken covenant of Sinai (Exod. xix. 5, 6) which was forfeited, but which will be their blessed position by virtue of the blood of the New Covenant shed by Christ (Rev. i. 5, 6).

At the close of the Passover feast, which the Saviour commemorated with His disciples before He was offered as the true "Lamb of God", He took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it:

> "For this is My blood of the NEW COVENANT, which is shed for many for the remissions of sins" (Matt. xxvi. 28).

This is repeated in the epistle to the Corinthians (I Cor. xi. 25), for it was the Divine purpose that through Israel, all families of the earth should be blessed, and the forgiveness of sins was a sine qua non, before Israel could reach to their ultimate position as a Kingdom of Priests, or be restored as a nation. The first phase of the New Covenant was in operation all the while that Israel remained as a people before God, i.e. up to the end of the Acts. When, however, Israel were dismissed, and became lo-ammi "Not My people" (Hosea i. and iii.) the New Covenant was suspended, for how can it operate when one of the parties is out of commission?

We can see that the New Covenant is in force as long as Israel is in covenant relationship with God as His people. It is confirmed in the Gospels, by the offering of Christ, it is in course of fulfillment under the ministry of Peter, Paul, James, John and Jude (see I Pet. ii. 5); it lapsed at the close of the Acts, which date line was followed in a few years by the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple under Titus, and it will be resumed when the day of the Lord sets in as we learn from the Prophets of old and the Book of the Revelation. In the interval, and filling the gap caused by Israel's failure and dispersion, the Lord introduced "The dispensation of the Mystery" (Eph. iii. 9 R.V.) entrusting it to Paul as the Prisoner of Jesus Christ for us Gentiles (Eph. iii. 1; Col. i. 25). In this calling the New Covenant is not mentioned. In Ephesians and Colossians Israel's hopes and the promises made unto the fathers have no bearing. The recipients of the blessings that belong to this calling were "strangers from the covenants of promise" (Eph. ii. 12). Their blessings go back to a period called in Eph. i. 4 "Before the foundation of the world" (or as we have learned to translate it, "before the overthrow of the world").

No.2. The Olive Tree, and the Joint Body (Rom. xi. 17 - 24; Eph. iii. 6).

pp. 61 - 66

> "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity! It is like the precious ointment . . . . . As the dew of Hermon . . . . ." (Psa. cxxxiii.).

This Psalm of David appealed to Hezekiah when he arranged his fifteen Songs of the degrees, or steps (II Kings viii. 8-11, Isa. xxxviii. 8), for similar words are used of the united nation under David "as the heart of one man" (II Sam. xix. 14), as are used of the unity under Hezekiah "one heart" (II Chron. xxx. 5-18). (See The Companion Bible, appendix 67.) Later, Ezekiel was instructed to set forth the future unity of the nation of Israel, by writing the names "For Judah, and for the children of Israel his companions" on one stick, and "For Joseph, the stick of Ephraim, and for all the house of Israel his companions" on another stick.

> "And join them one to another into one stick: and they shall become one in thine hand" (Ezek. xxxvii. 15-19).

The first reference to any form of oneness in the early ministry of the apostle Paul, is in his first epistle, that to the Galatians.

> "For ye are all one in Christ Jesus" (Gal. iii. 28).

Lifted out of their context these words could be and are used of richest and fullest unity found in the N.T., but they form part of an argument, as the opening word "For" indicates, and not only so, they become luminous when read in the light of a threefold prayer, found in the Jewish Prayer Book, which reads like this:

> "O Lord our God, King of the Universe, I thank Thee I was not born a GENTILE.
> "O Lord our God, King of the Universe, I thank Thee I was not born a SLAVE.
> "O Lord our God, King of the Universe, I thank Thee I was not born a WOMAN."

When we remember that Paul had been a 'zealot' for the traditions of the fathers, and an advanced advocate for the Jew's religion (Gal. i. 14), his words in Gal. iii. 28, which are an expansion of the words already quoted, become full of meaning.

> "There is neither Jew nor Greek (Gentile).
> There is neither bond nor free (Slave).
> There is neither male nor female (Woman).
> For ye are all one in Christ Jesus."

The sequel does not go on to speak of the Church of the One Body but links this unity with Abraham:

> "And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. iii. 29).

No exposition of these words can be acceptable that ignore chapter iii. 16:

> "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ."

Whether this is a reference to Gen. xiii. 15, xvii. 8, or xxiv. 7, the promise of "the land" to this seed is so far removed from any possible reference to the dispensation of the Mystery with its sphere "heavenly places far above all", as to make comparison difficult. Two figures are employed in the epistles to set forth the nature of the unity of believers, during the Apostle Paul's Acts ministry, which contrast in one or two essential particulars with the unity of the church of the Mystery, the subject of Paul's second, or Prison ministry. I Cor. xii., sets forth the symbol of the human body in connection with the diversity of spiritual gifts enjoyed by the Church of that day. The insistence that though these were "diversities" of gifts, yet they were all from "the same" Spirit, is well illustrated by the fact that a body is not one member but many; the foot differs from the hand, the ear differs from the eye, yet all have been set in their place by God. In structural correspondence, the words:

> "But now hath God set the members . . . . ." (I Cor. xii. 18), are placed over against the words:

> "And God hath set some in the church . . . . ." (I Cor. xii. 28);

the several members of the body, being equated with:

> "First apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues" (I Cor. xii. 28).

It is illogical as well as undispensational to take the illustration of unity "the human body" and omit all references to supernatural gifts. It is illogical, for the Apostle explicitly states at the beginning of the chapter, that he is writing "concerning spiritual gifts", and it is undispensational, for the present dispensation of the Mystery is totally devoid of supernatural or miraculous gifts. The parallel to this reference to the gift of apostles, etc., is in Eph. iv. 8-11. In I Cor. xii. 28 Paul goes out of his way to indicate a numerical order in the gifts saying, whereas in Eph. iv. 11 we read:

> "FIRST apostles, SECONDARILY prophets, THIRDLY teachers",

> "And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers", and in Eph. ii. 20 we discover that the Apostles and Prophets were a "foundation" ministry, and never to be repeated in this dispensation, whilst the Evangelist and the Teacher are the legitimate successors of the Apostles and the Prophets, as we learn from II Timothy:

> "Do the work of an EVANGELIST . . . . . for (i.e. the reason) I (Paul, the apostle) am now ready to be offered" (II Tim. iv. 5, 6).
> "The things that thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to TEACH others also" (II Tim. ii. 2).

"The apostles" of Eph. iv., cannot refer to Peter, James, John and the rest of the twelve, for they were called and appointed by Christ on earth (Matt. x. 2-5), in a context of miracles (verses 1, 8) and under a prohibition "Go not into the way of the Gentiles" (verse 5). The apostles of Eph. iv. were given to the church by the ASCENDED Christ, and so constitute a new order, especially given:

> "For the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ" (Eph. iv. 12).

Returning for a while to Paul's earlier ministry, we turn to Rom. xi. By referring to Rom. x. 21 "To Israel He saith", to Rom. xi. 25, 26, 28 "Blindness in part is happened to Israel . . . . . and so all Israel shall be saved . . . . . the Deliverer shall come out of Sion and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob", we can be assured that the Church is not in view, but Israel as a nation. The figure employed here by the Apostle to illustrate the union of the Gentile believer with Israel, is that of an olive tree. The Gentile nations as such are not in view, but "believers" from among the nations, for the Apostle says:

> "Because of unbelief they (i.e. the natural branches, Israel) were broken off, and thou standest by faith" (Rom. xi. 20).

Here, then, under the figure of the olive tree, the unity of the Jew and Gentile that believed during the Acts is set forth. This, however, is by no means all. There are peculiar features that are of supreme importance, and must now be noted.

*The branches that were broken off were the unbelieving among Israel, the remaining branches constituting a remnant. Into the place from which the unbelieving of Israel had been broken off, the Gentile believer had been grafted, "contrary to nature".

[* - For a fuller examination of Rom. ix.-xi., with complete structural analysis, the reader is referred to the book Just and the Justifier.]

Why does the Apostle use the expression "contrary to nature"? The root and fatness of the olive tree belonged to Israel, and if Israel had repented, and had been restored at that time, no Gentile would ever have shared it with them, even temporarily. It was something exceptional that was in view. It is clear that Paul cannot be referring to the great promise of justification by faith, for two reasons. In the first place, he warns the believing Gentile that he might be "cut off", a warning that cannot refer to justification by faith, for Rom. viii. makes a separation for ever impossible; and secondly, Abraham himself was an uncircumcised Gentile when he was justified by faith, and so can be the father of all who believe, whether Jews or Gentiles, without any necessity for a grafting in "contrary to nature". So far as justification was concerned, the oneness of all believers, whether Jews or Gentiles, was so close, that many have taken the words of Gal. iii. 27-29 as though they were written in Ephesians. "Contrary to nature" cannot, therefore be used of the great doctrine of Rom. i.-viii.; it can only apply to the dispensational teaching of Rom. ix.-xi. The doctrinal truth remains, the dispensational aspects change, and pass away.

We have now seen enough, we trust, to convince us that truth is not in view in Rom. xi. Before passing on to the great conclusion, however, we must examine more carefully the Apostle's figure of the olive tree, and discover why he speaks of the process as engrafting into the true olive tree, branches of the wild olive, contrary to nature.

To provoke unto jealousy.

If the reader will glance at the structure of Rom. xi. 11-32, he will see that the word 'provoke' is given three times. Two of these references actually occur in verses 11 & 14, while in verses 17-24, instead of stating the fact for the third time, we find that the Apostle uses the figure of the olive tree. It is the usual custom in grafting to take a slip of the choice variety, whether it be apple or pear, or rose, and graft it into the stock of some stronger, though not so choice, variety. For example, in the case of the standard rose, the tall stem is the briar, and upon this is budded the more fragile flower. Paul appears to reverse all this, and there are many who bluntly say that he did not know anything about the culture of trees, and must not be taken literally. This, however, cannot be. He hangs the whole argument of Rom. xi. upon this figure, and if he is wrong in this, he may be wrong altogether. Paul himself recognizes that the process is "contrary to nature", but those who criticize, and suggest that he is using a far-fetched illustration, are themselves in error. While the engrafting of a wild olive into the true was "contrary to nature", it was by no means contrary to practice. Lucius Junius Moderatus Columella, a Latin writer on agriculture, gardening and trees, deals with the cultivation of the olive tree, and speaks of the very practice under consideration. It was found that when an olive tree began to cease fruit-bearing, the insertion of a wild graft had the same effect upon the tree that it was hoped the insertion of the Gentile would have had on Israel; it "provoked" the flagging olive tree to "emulation". The practice has been revived in our own day to provoke certain shy-bearing pear trees to fruitfulness. Columella flourished about 40A.D., so that Paul was not speaking "without the book".

The fact that the Gentiles who believed had received "the blessing of Abraham" in the form of the promised "spirit" (Gal. iii. 14), and that they possessed the gifts associated with Pentecost (I Cor. xiv. 21), was intended to provoke Israel to wake up to the fact that their unique position was going. The whole point of the olive tree in Rom. xi. lies in the purpose with which the wild olive was graft in, namely to provoke the flagging tree (Israel) to jealousy. Gentile nations are not in view in Rom. xi., for such cannot be addressed as "brethren", neither do they stand "by faith".

When we return to the epistle to the Ephesians we shall see that in the unity there revealed, the Jew as a Jew, and the Gentile as a Gentile, disappear, the one Body being a newly created new man. In that company, there can be no member graft "contrary to nature", no member is "natural", no member is "wild", it is a unity so unique that a term seems to have been coined to express it, which we will see presently. During the Acts of the Apostles, a "middle wall" divided the Jewish believer from the Gentile, but this was broken down, its enmity "slain" and a "new man" created. This theme occupies Eph. ii. 11-19, and is of sufficient importance to demand careful study.

We will give the structure of the passage, which is as follows:

Eph. ii. 11 - 19-. The new man.

D | O1 | 11, 12. IN TIME PAST.
P1 | n | 11. Gentiles IN THE FLESH.
o | 12. Without Christ.
Distance p | 12. Aliens from the commonwealth of Israel.
p | 12. Strangers from the covenants of the promise.
o | 12. Without hope.
n | 12. Godless IN THE WORLD.
O2 | 13, 14. BUT NOW.
P2 | q1 | 14. He is our PEACE.
r1 | "The BOTH" made one.
s1 | 14. Middle wall broken.
Peace t | 15. Enmity in flesh.
s1 | 15. Decrees abolished.
r1 | 15. "The TWAIN" created one new man.
q1 | 16. So making PEACE.
q2 | 16. Reconciled to GOD.
r2 | 16. "The BOTH" in one body.
s2 | 16. Through the cross.
Reconciliation t | 16, 17. Enmity slain. Peace.
s2 | 18. Through Him.
r2 | 18. "The BOTH" in one spirit.
q2 | 18. Access to the FATHER.
O3 | 19. NO LONGER.
P3 | 19. Strangers and foreigners.

The structure reveals a threefold subdivision of the subject matter, which is related to three time periods.

(1) In time past . . . . . What we once were.
(2) But now . . . . . What grace has done.
(3) No longer . . . . . The complete reversal of the past.

Each part of Eph. ii. deals with a time past in contrast with a time present, with its accompanying change. It is important to observe the distinctive features of these two parts, the former dealing with death and life, the latter with distance and nearness.

No.3. pp. 81 - 85

We should note the differences between the two contrasting sections of Eph. ii. dealing with the past and present. Instead of sin and trespasses we have dispensational distance; instead of the flesh with its lusts, we have the flesh in its uncircumcision and enmity. In the first section we have a new creation, and in the second the creation of a new man; in the first, believers are seated together in the heavenlies, in the second builded together as an habitation of God. These differences are important, for if the section before us deals with dispensational distance rather than with sin and death, this will materially colour the meaning of the reconciliation referred to here by the Apostle. The trend of the two parts of this chapter may be seen if set out as follows:

Ephesians ii.

A | DOCTRINE |
a | 1-3. Once. Walk. World and flesh.
b | 4. But God. Mercy. Love.
c | 5-10. Made Alive together.
Raised together.
Made to sit together.
A | DISPENSATION |
a | 11, 12. Once. Gentiles. In flesh. In world.
b | 13-18. But now. Nigh. One.
c | 19-22. Citizens together.
Fitly framed together.
Builded together.

The Gentiles who composed the majority of the members of the one Body had no Scriptures full of promises made unto their fathers; they were not only alienated from the life of God, but were also aliens from the commonwealth of Israel. The structure of the epistle as a whole throws into prominence two features—the new man, and this twofold alienation. For the moment our attention is to be directed to the dispensational alienation, the dispensational disability of being a Gentile as contrasted with the dispensational privilege of being a Jew.

What was the position, dispensationally, of those who are now members of the Body? This passage bids us remember that we were once:

a | Gentiles in the flesh.
b | Without Christ.
c | Aliens from the commonwealth of Israel.
c | Strangers from the covenants of the promise.
b | Having no hope.
a | Godless in the world.

There was nothing personally wrong in being a Gentile, but being born a Gentile carried with it great dispensational disabilities.

> "He sheweth His word unto Jacob, His statutes and His judgments unto Israel. He hath not dealt so with any nation: and as for His judgments, they have not known them" (Psa. cxlvii. 19, 20; see also Amos iii. 2; Rom. iii. 2).

We observe in Eph. ii. 11, 12 that the sphere of Gentile disability is "in the flesh"; so also is the sphere of Israel's privileges. Some of these privileges are set out by the apostle in Rom. ix. 3-5:

A | According to the flesh . . . . . Brethren.
B | Israelites.
C | Adoption (placing as sons).
D | Glory.
E | Covenants.
E | Law.
D | Service.
C | Promises.
B | Fathers.
A | According to the flesh . . . . . Christ.

In the flesh, the Gentile is without Christ. He can only reach Christ "in Spirit"; in the flesh he is without hope, for it was of Israel according to the flesh that Christ came. Thus the words en pneumati (Eph. iii. 5) really preface the threefold fellowship of the Mystery detailed in verse 6, of which more when we reach that passage.

At the close of the dark list of Gentile hopelessness are the words "in the world". The world is at the present time an abandoned evil, the enemy of God and of truth. Its prince is the devil, for the Saviour's kingdom is not of this world. The whole world lieth in wickedness, and its rudiments are antagonistic to Christ. It is totally oblivious of the work and witness of the Spirit. Its elements hold the Gentiles in bondage. Nothing but utter hopelessness, therefore, can be the condition of those who are "in the flesh" and "in the world".

From this pit of corruption and from this Godless, Christless, hopeless wilderness, God, in His rich mercy, stooped and saved those whose destiny is to be blessed with all spiritual blessings in the heavenly place in Christ.

The Syrophenician woman (Matt. xv. 22-28), shows us something of the meaning of the words:

> "Aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise" (Eph. ii. 12).

The Gentile was by nature "far off". How could he be made nigh? The answer is that, while the dispensation that included the nation of Israel lasted, Gentile believers could be grafted into the olive tree of Israel. Rom. xi. does not refer to a merely national position—those addressed were "brethren" and were reminded that they stood "by faith" (Rom. xi. 20, 25). The justified Gentile during the Acts period did not become a member of the Body of Christ; he became a graft in the olive tree of Israel of which Abraham was the root.

> "But now in Christ Jesus ye who sometimes were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ" (Eph. ii. 13).

When we realize something of the slavery of Satan and the dominion of sin (ii. 1-3), with what relief do we read the words of Eph. ii. 4, "but God". Again, when the helplessness and the hopelessness of the Gentiles' case dispensationally, as set forth in Eph. ii. 11, 12 is realized, how blessed the "but now" of verse 13! The blood of Christ which accomplished deliverance from the bondage of sin (Eph. i. 7), now breaks down all barriers and gives perfect access. The former condition of alienation is closely linked with a special enmity. The new status brings in peace, evidently the result of the cessation of that enmity.

It will be necessary to turn once more to the structure already given on this passage (see article No.2). Member P2, shows us a twofold division of theme. In the centre t and t we have the enmity, and at the four extremes (q1, q1, q2, q2) we have:

"He is our PEACE" . . . . . "So making PEACE"
"Reconciled to GOD" . . . . . "Access to the FATHER"

To understand these terms will enable us to understand both the dispensational condition of things during the Acts and earlier, and the mighty change brought in at the opening of the dispensation of the Mystery. Christ is evidently our peace, because He has:

(1) Made the both one, and
(2) Broken down a middle wall of partition.

What is this middle wall? As the salvation of the sinner is not in view, but the dispensational distance of the Gentile who needed to be "made nigh", we shall not accomplish much by interpreting this middle wall as sin. A further consultation of the structure (s1 and s1) will show that the middle wall stands in correspondence with ordinances or decrees that have been abolished.

What did God intend by these ordinances, and what did He mean by this middle wall of partition? The reference to the latter is an allusion to the temple that was standing at Jerusalem in the days of Christ and His apostles. This temple consisted of an outer square some six hundred feet wide, and a second, inner, area. Josephus describes it as follows:

> "On advancing to the second temple a stone balustrade was thrown around it four feet and a half high, and withal beautifully wrought, and in it stood pillars at equal distances proclaiming the law of purity, some in Greek and some in Roman letters, that no alien might pass within the sanctuary.
> Such was the first enclosure, and not far from it, in the middle, was the second ascended by a few steps and encompassed by a stone balustrade for a partition, which prohibited by inscription any alien from entering, under penalty of death."
> (Antiquities xv: xi:5).

In our own time one of the very stones spoken of by Josephus has been discovered by the side of the Via Dolorosa in Jerusalem. A cast of the stone is now in the British Museum. The translation of the inscription is as follows:

> "No one, being a foreigner, may enter into the enclosure around the holy place. Whosoever is apprehended will himself be to blame for his death which will certainly follow."

This was an outward and visible sign of an inward and real enmity. While this obtained, absolute unity and equality among believers was impossible. While both Peter and Cornelius were sinners saved by the same precious blood, the one had an access which the other was denied. Now, had this difference merely related to the Jerusalem temple it might not have mattered very much, but the middle wall of the temple represented a very real middle wall in fact. This difference, dispensationally, that existed between Jew and Gentile is seen quite clearly in the Saviour's words to the Syrophenician woman. (We say dispensationally, advisedly, for in the realm of doctrine and salvation Rom. iii. and x. declare that there is "no difference" whereas Rom. iii. and ix. are just as emphatic upon the privilege that pertains to the Jew only.) To this woman of Canaan the Lord said:

> "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. xv. 24).

Peter's attitude when he visited Cornelius shows the existence of the middle wall very clearly:

> "Ye know how that it is an unlawful thing for a man that is a Jew to keep company, or come unto one of another nation; but God hath showed me that I should not call any man common or unclean . . . . . I ask therefore for what intent you have sent for me?" (Acts x. 28, 29).

Peter, by his own admission, is still a Jew, still keeping the law that regulated ceremonials, still calling Gentiles, however devout and God-fearing, "common" and "unclean", and so far removed from the missionary ideal as actually to ask for what intent Cornelius had sent for him!

This middle wall was not, however, exclusively related to Peter. The assembled apostles and elders at Jerusalem, in solemn council, and uniting with their decision the Holy Ghost, perpetuated this middle wall between Jewish and Gentile believers:

> "Wherefore my sentence is, that we trouble not them, which from among the Gentiles are turned to God; but that we write unto them, that they abstain from pollutions of idols, and from fornication, and from things strangled, and from blood. For Moses of old time hath in every city them that preach him, being read in synagogues every sabbath day" (Acts xv. 19-21).

It is evident that while the Gentiles were asked to observe these four "necessary things" (verse 28), the Jewish church was still intent upon the whole ceremonial law. This could have but one effect—division. The Jewish believer would, no doubt, consider himself upon a higher plane of sanctity than the Gentile who was expected only to observe the four basic things. This decision at Jerusalem is called "the decrees", exactly the same word as is translated "ordinances" in Eph. ii. 15:

> "They delivered them the decrees for to keep, that were ordained of the apostles and elders which were at Jerusalem" (Acts xvi. 4).

There is one further reference to this middle wall and the decrees or ordinances, and that is found in Col. ii. Whether "the decrees" of Acts xv. and xvi. are in view in Ephesians ii. may be open to question; the passage in Col. ii., however, is beyond doubt. The passage uses the same words as are found in Eph. ii. 1 "and you being dead to trespasses", and proceeds:

> "and to the uncircumcision of your flesh, He hath made alive together with Him, having freely forgiven us all trespasses, having blotted out the handwriting of ordinances which was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, having nailed it to the cross" (Col. ii. 13, 14).

What these contrary ordinances were is immediately made known:

> "Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of a feast, or new moon, or sabbaths, which are a shadow of things to come, but the body is of Christ" (Col. ii. 16, 17).

For the Jewish believer the setting aside of these ordinances was symbolized in the rending of the veil, and is set out in the epistle to the Hebrews. For the Gentile believer the slaying of that enmity was symbolized by the destruction of the Temple itself some forty years after, when the middle wall was demolished. The removal of this enmity is a distinctive feature of the dispensation of the Mystery.

Let us give due heed to the very emphatic language used with reference to the setting aside of these ordinances:

> "Broken down"; "abolished"; "slain" (in Ephesians).
> "Blotting out", "taking away"; "nailing to the cross" (in Colossians).

Here is no reform, but abolition followed by a new creation.

In the passage we have been dealing with, Eph. ii. 11-17, those who were at enmity, but have now been made one, have been stressed. They are three times referred to as "the both" and once as "the twain".

The thought here is entirely opposed to the idea that the Gentile who was once an alien is now admitted into the fellowship of the covenants; it is entirely opposed to anything similar to the graft in the olive tree. The both are made one—"for to create in Himself of the twain one new man". This blots out both the Jew and the Gentile, as such.

There are some who would repudiate evolution, and stand by the doctrine of creation as given in Genesis, yet they are found denying a new creation and admitting evolution into the second chapter of Ephesians. Wherever we read of a new creation in Scripture, we find, as essentially connected with it, the passing away of former things.

> "If any man be in Christ, there is a new creation: old things are passed away; behold new things have come into being" (II Cor. v. 17).
> "I saw a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away: and there was no more sea . . . . . the former things are passed away" (Rev. xxi. 1, 4).
> "Behold, I create new heavens and a new earth; and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind" (Isa. lxv. 17).

Eph. ii. 11-19 is dispensational, and while the great foundation doctrines of Romans are as true as ever, the dispensational position of Romans and Corinthians is "passed away". New things, dispensationally, have come into being. Nothing that belongs peculiarly to the earlier dispensation must be allowed to intrude into the new. This new man is reconciled to God through the cross; and the both have access to the Father. The reconciliation is "to God", the access to "the Father". The one views the whole company; the other views the individual and is experimental.

We now draw to the conclusion of this section with the third time period—"No longer". Once we were strangers; we are strangers no longer. Once we were foreigners; we are foreigners no longer. Not that we have been merely placed on a level with Israel. We have been blessed in a realm of which Israel never dreamed.

Into this new creation we resolutely refuse to admit anything that has not the divine sanction. Here is a new creation and a new man. Here is the beginning of the one Body. Here is the unity of the Spirit, and the bond of peace.

When we were considering the opening verses of Ephesians, we found that the subject was threefold. We have the will of the Father, the work of the Son, and the witness of the Spirit. We drew attention to the way in which the three sections of the prayer that follows seem to keep this threefold division in mind. We meet these features once more in Eph. ii. 18:

> "Through Him (the Son) . . . we both have access by one Spirit . . . unto the Father."

In chapter iii., the Apostle speaks particularly of the dispensation given to him, of the Mystery, and the peculiar character of the unity there created.

> "In Spirit that the Gentiles should be fellow heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of His promise in Christ by the gospel whereof I was made a minister" (Eph. iii. 5-7).

The mystery or secret of the present dispensation is, of course, twofold; it deals with Christ and it deals with the church. Now Christ is the theme of all Scripture, the Hope of all callings, the Foundation of all structures. Consequently, while fuller and higher revelations were necessary to declare His exalted position at the right hand of God, such were in their nature an advance upon what had gone before. The revelation that pertains to the church, however, was entirely new. Nothing in any shape or form was known of it in Scripture. Its constitution, sphere of blessing and time of choice are all absolutely unique. Nowhere else throughout the whole range of revelation was it ever revealed that Gentiles should be "seated together" in the heavenly places; never elsewhere that of Jew and Gentile should a new man be created, associated with a fellowship of absolute equality.

This fellowship occupies a central position in the witness of Eph. iii. 1-13. It is shrined in the structure of the Mystery. It is bounded by the terms "in Spirit" and "in Christ", and has a threefold equality, a fellowship without precedent, expressed, so far as the English will permit, by the words "joint-heirs", a "joint body" and "joint partakers". The words "in Spirit" of verse 5 do not refer to the revelation made to apostles and prophets, but, as at the end of Eph. ii., indicate the only sphere in which such an equality is possible. In the flesh, Israel can brook no peer; in Spirit only can such an equality be possible.

Three times does the Apostle use the word sun, "together with". As translations we can use the terms "fellow heirs" and "fellow-partakers", but hardly "fellow-body". The best plan we can adopt is to translate the sun by the word "joint", remembering that it indicates perfect equality. In I Cor. xii. 13 we have "one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles"; this could not be written of the church of the Mystery, for here there is neither Jew nor Greek—both have been blotted out, and of the twain a new man has been created.

We must remember, when reading Eph. iii. 6, not to pause at the end of the verse, but to read straight on into verse 7. It is not the gospel simply, but "the gospel whereof I (Paul) was made a minister". A reference to Gal. ii. 7 will show that the members of the "body" of Ephesians could not have been equal partakers of the promise in Christ according to the gospel there set forth. The gospel in which these members equally share is that gospel of the grace of God which is in view in Acts xx. 24, a gospel exactly fitting the dispensation of the grace of God, even as the gospel of the Mystery exactly fits the dispensation of the Mystery.

The peculiar items of Eph. ii. 13-18 and of iii. 6, are expressed in the sevenfold unity of the Spirit in Eph. iv. 3-6. We have seen that from Matthew to the Revelation the people of Israel with their covenants, promises, miracles and superior position are dominant, with the exception of the parenthetical dispensation of the Mystery, resting upon the earlier doctrine of Romans and the Acts epistles of Paul, but differing essentially in its dispensational place, character and sphere.

Dear Fellow-members,

Yet another milestone is passed and we take this opportunity of recording our grateful thanks to the Lord for enabling us to produce this volume of The Berean Expositor. The mounting problems both personal and national have been great, but enabling grace has been far greater and once again we commend this volume to all who love the Word of God, that they will, like the Bereans of old, "search and see" and thus enter into the spiritual wealth which is made known therein.

And having done this, may we all seek further outreach that others may share with us the unsearchable riches of Christ and that each one of us may have a part, however small, in making "all men see what is the dispensation of the Mystery which from all ages hath been hid in God Who created all things" (Eph. iii. 9 R.V.).

Once again we render our heart-felt thanks to all both here and abroad, who have contributed in any way to the production of this volume and may the Lord receive the praise and glory which is His due.

Antonyms, or Clarity by Contrasts

No.1. Introducing the Principle of Contrast, as an aid to Interpretation.

pp. 17 - 20

To the average busy reader, eager as he may be for the truth, yet occupied for many hours of the day with the exacting demands of this life, such terms as homonym, synonym and antonym, may appear too much like a piece of pedantry, and we can imagine a few of our readers turning the page in search of something more practical. We ask such however, to stay a moment longer, for nothing can be more practical for the believer than true interpretation of Holy Writ, and anything that contributes to clarity and exactness, or preserves from error should be of supreme value.

When the Apostle wrote to the Corinthians that series of contrasts and asked what fellowship had 'righteousness with unrighteousness', 'light with darkness' or 'Christ with Belial', he was using antonyms, a means of instruction that is very powerful in that it forces the mind to perceive a truth by the strength of contrast. An antonym as the word implies, is a term which is the opposite of another, a counter-term. It is allied with a figure of speech called antonomasia, which is a change of name, like 'The Iron Duke' for 'The Duke of Wellington'. It is the opposite of synonym, which is the name given to two or more words in the same language, which possess the same general sense. The antonym is extremely useful in removing the ambiguity caused by homonyms in a language. A homonym is the name given to words, which though they have the same spelling, have entirely different meanings, such as LET, which means 'to permit, or to hinder, or to hire'. These words entered the language at different times, and the slight distinctions that might have been preserved in their spelling have been ignored. The reader may call to mind many other homonyms of everyday use: 'to lie' has two meanings, 'to baste' has three, and 'court' has four, while 'strike' has to our knowledge at least a dozen: it may mean a stoppage of work by employees, a half bushel basket, a discovery of oil, or the minting of coin; beside the more common use of the verb, to strike a match, or a clock striking the hour, of striking a circle, or of striking a sail; one can even strike an attitude. This English word 'strike'' is used in the A.V. to translate no less than ten Hebrew words, and six Greek ones, and as this is a common feature with all versions that do not set out to be literal, the value of some simple means that will lead to the recognition of such homonyms, and the discovery of some means of testing them, will be conceded by all. The antonym is exceedingly useful for this purpose. Let us illustrate our meaning by an example. Will the reader answer the following questions? "What is the opposite of 'light' in II Cor. iv.?". Most probably the word 'darkness' comes to most of our minds, and if there were but one reference in II Cor. iv, and that the passage which reads: "God, Who commanded the light to shine", then "darkness" would be the antonym. But there are two references to "light" in II Cor. iv. One whose antonym is 'darkness':

"For God, Who commanded the light to shine out of darkness" (II Cor. iv. 6), and another, whose antonym is ‘heavy’ or ‘weight’:

> “Our light affliction . . . . . weight of glory” (II Cor. iv. 17).

The ambiguity resident in the English word ‘light’ is resolved the moment we apply the antonym. This principle is of great use where the ambiguity of a word does not reside in the fact that it is an homonym, but that by usage it may have two or more shades of meaning. A most important illustration of this is found in connection with the Hebrew word which is translated ‘evil’ the word ‘ra’. This word can mean ‘evil’, in the sense of wickedness, a meaning that is found throughout the whole of the O.T. There are, however, too many passages where the meaning is ‘adversity’, ‘affliction’, ‘calamity’ and the like, for the reader to ignore; and to assume that every occurrence of ‘ra’ must of necessity mean moral evil or wickedness is both unwise and unscholarly. Take for example Psa. xxxiv. 19:

Can we translate this “Many are the moral wickednesses of the righteous”? We realize that we cannot, and the LXX did not hesitate to use thlipsis ‘affliction’. Even when the translation ‘evil’ is a good one, we must be careful not to confuse moral evil with righteous judgment. For example, when the Lord said:

> “See, I have set before thee this day life and good, and death and evil” (Deut. xxx. 15), the context makes it plain that the evil that was before Israel was the very opposite of being ‘blessed in the land’ (Deut. xxx. 16), and when the Prophet would emphasize to Israel these alternatives, he says in place of ‘life and good, death and evil’:

> “I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing” (Deut. xxx. 19);

which shows that the ‘evil’ of verse 16 was not the moral wickedness of the people, but the righteous judgment of God in sending ‘evil’ in the sense of punishment upon them.

If the reader turns to Ecclesiastes, he will observe that the writer is concerned with what ‘good thing’ a man should pursue in view of abounding vanity and vexation. So, in Eccles. i. 13 “This is sore travail” is ra ‘evil’, so is the word ‘grievous’ of ii. 17, ‘adversity’ of vii. 14, and ‘misery’ of viii. 6; quite apart from the passages which though they be translated ‘evil’ like “This also is vanity and a great evil” ii. 21 cannot possibly indicate moral evil and wickedness. Turning to the prophet Isaiah we read:

> “Woe to them that go down to Egypt for help . . . . . they look not unto the Holy One of Israel, neither seek the Lord. Yet He also is wise, and will bring evil” (Isa. xxxi. 1, 2).

No one in his senses would believe that Isaiah intends us to understand that God in His wisdom brings moral wickedness upon any one. The remaining verses of chap. xxxi. are a good commentary, and the fact that “He will not call back His words” shows that the judgment threatened by law and prophets upon apostasy would surely fall. So, with regard to that classic passage, Isa. xlv. 7:

> "I form the light, and create darkness: I make peace, and create evil: I the Lord do all these things."
>
> "Evil: never rendered 'sin'. God brings calamity about as the inevitable consequence of sin" (The Companion Bible).

Even had the phrase read 'good and evil', evil would not necessarily have meant moral wickedness, but when its antonym is 'peace' we know for a certainty that 'calamity' in the form of judgment is the only possible meaning that can be attached to Isa. xlv. 7. The Companion bible says, regarding the word 'create':

> "Heb. the past participle of the verb bara (create) which, with 'evil', requires the rendering 'bring about'. Not the same form as in verse 8, 12 or verse 18, in connection with the earth. In Jer. xviii. 11 the verb is yazar, to frame or mould. In Amos iii. 6 it is asah, to bring about, a word of wide meaning; its sense has to be determined by its context. Here disturbance in contrast with 'peace'."

It is not our intention to pursue this question of evil, or the correct translation of the Hebrew word ra, but this has provided a useful example of the value of the antonym 'peace' in deciding the meaning of 'evil' in Isa. xlv. 7. Neither is it our intention of dealing with synonym, antonym or homonym in any direct sense in subsequent articles, but to bring before the reader such evident contrasts as 'Bondage and Liberty", "Flesh and Spirit", "Law and Grace", with the belief and the hope that positive lessons of spiritual value will most certainly accrue.

No.2. A Study in Galatians. "Bondage versus Freedom."

pp. 56 - 60

The Apostle Paul knew the value of contrast in presenting the truth, and his epistles contain a number of helpful examples that will be profitable to study. Upon reading his epistle to the Galatians we are struck with the forcefulness of his use of at least five pairs of opposites.

(1) "Liberty versus Bondage" (Gal. ii. 4).
(2) "Works versus Faith" (Gal. ii. 16).
(3) "Spirit versus Flesh" (Gal. iii. 3).
(4) "Servants versus Sons" (Gal. iv. 7).
(5) "Law versus Grace" (Gal. v. 4).

There are lesser examples and some more diffuse than others, but the five selected above are obvious, and beyond doubt, intentional. Liberty, eleutheria is a blessed word, both in itself, and in its contrast with all the evils of bondage. The Apostle uses the word seven times in his epistles, as follows:

> "The glorious liberty of the children of God" (Rom. viii. 21).

"Why is my liberty judged of another man's conscience?" (I Cor. x. 29).
"Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty" (II Cor. iii. 17).
"Our liberty which we have in Christ Jesus" (Gal. ii. 4).
"Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free" (Gal. v. 1).
"Ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh" (Gal. v. 13).

It will be seen that this quality of liberty is very comprehensive. It reaches forward to 'the glory', it is found 'in Christ Jesus', it constitutes an element in our 'calling', it rules in the realm of 'conscience', but it never leads to or countenances 'license' or 'an occasion to the flesh'. Four out of these seven references are found in Galatians, where three of them deal with the positive liberty which we have received, and one with a warning concerning its abuse. Eleutheria is probably derived from eleutho 'to come' and Dr. Bullinger says in his Lexicon "eleutheros, one who can go where he will, hence, free, at liberty". Eleutheros is found in Galatians six times, five of the occurrences dealing with the allegory of Sarah and Hagar. There is a wealth of teaching which we may not stay to investigate here, but some of our readers may appreciate the help given by the parallelism of these six occurrences.

"Free" in Galatians.

A | iii. 28, 29. Abraham's seed and heirs. Cancels "bond and free".
B | iv. 22. Abraham's two sons. One by bondwoman. One by freewoman.
C | iv. 23. Son of freewoman was by promise.
C | iv. 26. Jerusalem above is free, and our mother.
B | iv. 30. Son of freewoman is heir.
A | iv. 31. Not children of bondwoman but of the free.

Eleutheroo occurs seven times in the whole N.T. Twice in John's Gospel:

"The truth shall make you free" (John viii. 32).
"The Son therefore shall make you free" (John viii. 36).

The Apostle preached Christ and stood for 'the truth of the gospel' in his fight for liberty, and was in full harmony with the dual statement of our Lord as recorded by John. Four occurrences are found in Romans:

"Being made free from sin" (Rom. vi. 18, 22).
"Made me free from the law" (Rom. viii. 2), and a future deliverance of the creature from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God (Rom. viii. 21). One occurrence only is found in Galatians:

"Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free" (Gal. v. 1).

Turning to the contrastive word 'bondage' we note that in Gal. ii. 4 the Apostle uses the emphatic form, not douloo but katadouloo "to captivate thoroughly" or 'to reduce to slavery'. It was this that caused him to put up such a valiant fight for 'the truth of the gospel', and for which we can never be too thankful. The following extract from Dr. John Taylor's Elements of Civil Law, throw a lurid light on the condition of a slave in N.T. times.

> "The common lot of slaves in general was, in many circumstances very deplorable. Of their situation take the following instances: they were held pro nullis, pro mortius, pro quadrupedibus, for no man, for dead men, for beasts; nay, they were in a much worse state than any cattle whatsoever. They had no head in the state, no name, tribe or register. They were not capable of being injured; nor could they take by purchase or descent; had no heirs, and therefore could make no will, of course . . . . . they could not plead, nor be pleaded, but were excluded from all civil concerns whatsoever . . . . ."

In contrast with the idea of eleutheros, the right and liberty to come and go at will, doulos, indicated a person without rights, simply the property of another, and so bound that to come or go at will was hopelessly impossible and foreign to the estate. The bondage of Rom. vi. is the bondage of sin (Rom. vi. 6), whereas the bondage of Galatians is the bondage of 'elements' (Gal. iv. 3). These 'elements' were either the rudimentary principles of Mosaic law, or the elements of any 'religion' soever—ever that of idol worship.

> "When we were children we were in bondage under the elements of the world" (Galatians iv. 3).
> "How turn ye again to weak and beggarly elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage? Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years" (Gal. iv. 9, 10).

This spirit which so grieved the Apostle we shall be able to deal with better when we are considering another set of contrasts namely 'Servant versus Son', for this governs the argument of the opening of chapter iv where we have in verse 3 the only occurrence of douloo in Galatians.

Bondage, douleia occurs twice:

> "The two covenants; the one from the mount Sinai, which gendereth to bondage, which is Agar" (Gal. iv. 24).
>
> "Be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage" (Gal. v. 1).

Peter referred to the yoke of the law saying:

> "Why tempt ye God, to put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples, which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear?" (Acts xv. 10), and Paul uses this figure to indicate literal slavery, saying:

> "Let as many servants (douloi slaves) as are under the yoke count their own masters (despotes) worthy of all honour, that the name of God and His doctrine be not blasphemed" (I Tim. vi. 1).

Apart from this servitude to the law, Paul's other references deal with the 'bondage' of corruption, and the fear of death (Rom. viii. 21; Heb. ii. 15), a state consequent upon the enslavement of sinful men. While Paul so thoroughly repudiated the shackles of legalism, he rejoiced in the bonds that bound him in happy devoted service to the Lord. Consequently we find doulos, a slave, used in two ways in Galatians elsewhere.

In a bad sense:

> "There is neither bond nor free" (Gal. iii. 28).
> "A child differeth nothing from a servant" (Gal. iv. 1).
> "Wherefore thou art no more a servant" (Gal. iv. 7).

In a good sense:

> "If I yet pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ" (Gal. i. 19).

When we remember the words quoted above from the writings of Dr. John Taylor, and remember also that Paul knew by actual living experience what the condition of a doulos was in his own day, the full, complete, unreserved character of both his and of all true Christian 'service' begins to become apparent.

In like manner douleuo 'to serve as a slave' is used in two ways in Galatians and elsewhere.

In a bad sense:

> "Ye did service unto them which by nature are no gods" (Gal. iv. 8).
> "Ye desire again to be in bondage" (Gal. iv. 9).
> "Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children" (Gal. iv. 25).

In a good sense:

> "For brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another" (Gal. v. 13).

The way in which the Apostle leads the believer out from the 'yoke of bondage' through Christian liberty, on to the 'yoke of love' is wonderful. The same word for yoke is used in a good sense in the well known words of Matt. xi. 29, 30, "Take my yoke upon you", as is used in the evil sense already quoted above. As the reader ponders these two contrasted states 'Bondage and Freedom' and meditates upon the passages which contain them, he cannot help but attain to a fuller and richer realization of both the abject nature of the slavery of sin, law and death, the absolutely devoted character of Christian 'service', the complete emancipation of the redeemed, and the true quality of this freedom, 'liberty' but not 'license'.

Although our allotted space is about filled, we cannot refrain from one further note. On the two occasions where the Apostle speaks of redemption in Galatians, he uses the word exagorazo. The agora or as the Romans called it, the Forum, was both the place of justice and the market place of the people. As for example:

> "Children sitting in the markets" (Matt. xi. 16).

Agorazo, thus signifies 'to buy' (Matt. xiii. 44), and is used of the setting free of slaves in I Cor. vi. 20 "Ye are bought with a price". Exagorazo, means to go into the market place of this world and to pay the price that is necessary to purchase the freedom of the slaves of sin, death and law. This Christ did, as Gal. iii. 13 and iv. 5 affirm, dying as the accursed One on the tree, to set free the slaves of the law, dying as One made of a woman and made under the law, that those under its bondage may be emancipated. No wonder with the true values of bondage and freedom which we but dimly perceive, and which the Apostle saw so clearly, no wonder we repeat, he cries with such impassioned appeal:

> "To the freedom with which Christ made us free, stand fast, and be not again held fast in a yoke of slavery" (Gal. v. 1).

It is not surprising that, having caught a glimpse of this blessed freedom, our own hymn-book contains such verses as these:

> "Separated for the Father,
> Saved to serve the Holy One,
> Man-made bonds and fetters vanish
> In His well-beloved Son", or,

> "There is fullness of freedom, no fetters can bind
> The soul that the Spirit of truth has set free;
> When the light of God's Word has illumined the mind,
> There is full, unalloyed and complete liberty", or again,

> "He has redeemed us, our sins are forgiven;
> Now, as His members, One Body are we:
> Bondage is past, all our fetters are riven,
> None can enslave whom the Son has set free."

No.3. A Study in Galatians.
"Works versus Faith."
pp. 61 - 64

The great contrast between the works of the law and the faith of Jesus Christ occurs in Galatians in that historic contention which took place between the two apostles, Peter and Paul, when Peter's attitude and dissembling jeopardized the whole fabric of Gospel salvation.

> "I said unto Peter before them all, if thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews? . . . . . Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law: for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified" (Gal. ii. 14, 16).

On three other occasions Paul speaks of the works of the law in Galatians:

> "Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?" (Gal. iii. 2).
> "He therefore that ministereth to you the Spirit, and worketh miracles among you, doeth he it by the works of the law or by the hearing of faith?" (iii. 5).
> "For as many as are of the works of the law are under the curse" (iii. 10).

Once he speaks of the works of the flesh in contrast with the fruit of the Spirit (Galatians v. 19), and his last reference speaks of those true works which manifest the possession of life:

> "Let every man prove his own work, and then shall he have rejoicing in himself alone, and not in another" (Gal. vi. 4).

It is evident that Paul has chiefly in mind in Galatians the works of the law. Now why should he be so certain that:

> "As many as are of the works of the law are under the curse?" (Gal. iii. 10).

Let Paul answer for himself. He gives four comprehensive and searching reasons, which leave unregenerate man without hope.

(1) "Cursed is EVERYONE." There is no respect of persons with God, and this is a two-edged argument that cuts both ways. In Rom. ii. Paul uses it to show that, should a Gentile by patient continuance in well-doing seek for glory, honour or immortality, the fact that he was a Gentile and not one of the favoured nation would not tell against him, for in this matter:

> "There is no respect of persons with God" (Rom. ii. 11).

There are no exemptions or favours therefore to any who endeavour by works of law to produce righteousness before God. "Everyone" is leveled, the Jew to the same plane as the Gentile.

(2) "Cursed is every one that CONTINUETH NOT." A spasmodic obedience is of no use here. An obedience that functioned on Sabbath days, but failed in the busy days of the work-a-day week, would not pass. There must be 'continuance'. This charge was laid against Israel by the Lord:

> "They continued not in My covenant, and I regarded them not" (Heb. viii. 9).

Where Israel failed there was no respect of the poor Gentile succeeding.

(3) "Cursed is every one that continueth not in ALL THINGS." That which is a strong temptation to one man leaves another unmoved, but in the matter of law, we are not at liberty to choose the commandment we find comparatively easy and ignore the rest. "All things that are written" sound the death-knell to all hope in the flesh, and James has given us as a principle the statement:

> "For whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all" (James ii. 10).

This sweeping statement becomes luminous in the light of Paul's utterance:

> "All the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this: Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (Gal. v. 14).

(4) "Cursed is everyone that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law TO DO THEM" (Gal. iii. 10). To do them! That is the one and only acknowledgment the law demands, and it is the one that no flesh can render. Many may approve the law. He may say with truth, that "the Mosaic law is the finest code ever introduced". But God does not ask for patronage; He asks for obedience.

> "The law is not of faith; but, the man that doeth them shall live in them" (Gal. iii. 12).

Scripture testimony forbids and personal experience disallows the possibility of any man passing this fourfold test. To be of the 'works of law' is to be indeed 'under the curse'. In strong contrast with such deadly works, the Apostle places 'faith'. "Faith" pistis, "to believe" pisteuo, and "faithful" pistos are derived from the passive form of peitho 'to persuade'. Macknight has a comment on Rom. xiv. 23 which is helpful in view of this association of 'faith' and 'being persuaded'.

> "Here, as in verse 22, faith signifies, not the belief of the gospel, but the persuasion that what one doth is lawful. So understood, the Apostle's declaration is perfectly just in every case; because if a man acts without that persuasion, he acts without any principle of virtue, being guided merely by his own inclinations."

In Galatians "faith" pistis occurs many times, and under different categories.

(1) The faith of Jesus Christ, of the Son of God (ii. 16, 20; iii. 22), where justification, life now in the flesh, and the receiving by the Gentiles of the promise of the Spirit are the associated themes.
(2) The hearing of faith, they which be of faith, the household of faith (iii. 2, 5, 7, 9; iii. 12; vi. 10).
(3) Faith as a medium "Through or by faith" ek, dia, (iii. 8 11, 14, 24, 26; v. 5).
(4) Faith as a power and a fruit (v. 6, 22).
(5) The faith, the substance of what is believed. "The faith which once he destroyed." "Before faith came." "Shut up to the faith." "After that faith is come" (i. 23; iii. 23, 25).

As the reader weighs the statements that are made concerning the utter failure of man under law, the curse that must inevitably fall, the righteousness so unattainable and yet so necessary, and then contrasts this with the glorious triumph of faith; first the faith OF Christ, and then that faith which rests upon Him; finding blessing instead of cursing, justification instead of judgment, and then on new ground, to discover that "faith" 'worketh' by love; who could contemplate without deep feeling the attempt to lead these emancipated slaves back to the bondage of legalism? Not the Apostle Paul, and not any believer who has drunk of the same life-giving fountain. In this comparison, and Paul even wished that they were even cut off that troubled the church in this vital matter (Galatians ii. 6; v. 12). It is not our intention to pursue these contrasted features to their limits; to do so would demand a series of articles upon each of these antonyms. We hope to impress the reader with the value of this method, and to bring to light actual examples from the writings of Paul, which will provide a starting-place for those of our readers who may desire to carry these studies a stage further as a matter of private study and from personal interest. To all who are in any way engaged in teaching or preaching we would most earnestly commend this subject because it gives a clearer conception of the contrasted themes, and because such themes are most evident very near the basis of the faith. The fight is clearly a fight for 'liberty', and this liberty is one that concerns 'faith'. This faith is no product of the flesh, but is of the 'Spirit' and is the expression of a 'son' not of a servant. The whole controversy is summed up by the fact that such are not under 'law' but under 'grace'. To appreciate these distinctions therefore is to make for appreciation of the great epistles to the Galatians.

No.4. A Study in Galatians.
"Flesh versus Spirit."
pp. 121 - 124

We have followed the Apostle in his battle for 'liberty' and have appreciated that liberty the better by the contrasted theme 'bondage'. We have learned that 'bondage' and works of law go together, and that 'liberty' and faith go together. We now come to the third of these Galatian antonyms, and enter, as it were, into the atmosphere in which these contrasted movements are conducted.

Flesh versus Spirit.

There can be no question that these are antonyms, for the Apostle says:

> "The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh: and these are contrary the one to the other: so that ye cannot do . . . . . that ye would" (Gal. v. 17).

"Contrary" is antikeimai 'to lie over against', and in five passages is translated 'adversary'. While there are eighteen occurrences of sarx 'flesh' and eighteen occurrences of pneuma 'spirit' in Galatians, there are six passages in which the Apostle places 'flesh' over against 'spirit' in his actual wording, while a number of other references are opposed by the very nature of their teaching. It is very difficult to decide whether 'spirit' should be rendered with a capital "S", meaning the Holy Spirit, or with a small "s", referring to the new nature which He gives to the believer. Possibly both meanings are included.

Let us see the actual antonyms first:

(1) The first set of contrasts.

> "O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you, that ye should not obey the truth, before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth, crucified among you? This only would I learn from you, received ye the spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith? Are ye so foolish? Having begun in the spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh?" (Gal. iii. 1-3).

(2) The second set of contrasts.

> "But as then he that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the Spirit, even so it is now" (iv. 29).

(3) The third set of contrasts.

> "This I say then, walk in the spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh" (v. 16).

(4, 5) The fourth and fifth set of contrasts.

> "For the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh: and these are contrary the one to the other: so that ye cannot do the things that ye would" (v. 17).

(6) The sixth set of contrasts.

> "For he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting" (vi. 8).

To appreciate these steps through the epistle, we should remember that each has its own special aspect. The first emphasizes 'beginning and ending'; the last emphasizes 'sowing and reaping'. The second emphasizes the consequence of the opposition of flesh and spirit, namely 'persecution'; the fourth and fifth emphasize the consequence of this antipathy, namely the inability to do the things that we would. The central set, the third, stresses the walk, and its effect upon the fulfilling of desire.

Set out graphically, the argument follows this course:

A | iii. 1-3. Beginning in spirit and ending in flesh.
B | iv. 29. Flesh persecuted those of the spirit even as now.
C | v. 15. Walk influences desire.
B | v. 17. The antipathy of flesh and spirit. Ye cannot do.
A | vi. 8. Sowing and Reaping. Corruption or Everlasting Life.

We must await the actual exposition of the epistle to the Galatians before we can discuss just exactly what the Apostle meant by 'spirit' in each of these occurrences, for our present purpose the argument is evident and the purpose obvious. While it is suggestive that the two words 'flesh' and 'spirit' occur the same number of times in Galatians, there is one occurrence of pneumatikos 'spiritual' (Gal. vi. 1) which does not find its echo in sarkikos 'carnal' in Galatians. The great allegory of Gal. iv. 23-31 is introduced by the question:

> "Tell me, ye that desire to be under the law" (Gal. iv. 21), so it is evident that the conflict between 'flesh and spirit' is intimately related to the opposition of 'law and grace'. This is demonstrated by the Apostle in his allegory, for he declares that the child of the flesh represents the Covenant of Sinai, while the child of promise (which is synonymous in some aspects with Paul's use of 'spirit') represents the New Covenant, or with Jerusalem which is above. To be born of the 'flesh' and so under 'law' is to be born unto 'bondage'; to be born of 'promise' or after the 'Spirit' is to be born 'free', and to sum up the tale, none but the 'free' can become the 'heir'. Here in this allegory Paul intertwines four out of the five sets of contrast which we have tabulated.

(1) "Liberty versus Bondage" (iv. 22, 24, 25, 26, 30, 31).
(3) "Spirit versus Flesh" (iv. 23, 29).
(4) "Servants versus Sons" (iv. 22, 30, 31).
(5) "Law versus Grace" (iv. 21, 24).

No.2 in our list is not actually mentioned, but the whole teaching of the epistle necessitates that 'faith versus works' must have been in the Apostle's mind all the time, and he reaches them in the sequel of chapter v.

"For we through the Spirit wait for the hope of righteousness by faith. For in Jesus Christ neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision; but faith which worketh by love" (Gal. v. 5, 6).

Reverting to the references to 'flesh' and 'spirit' we just draw attention to the necessity to distinguish between the various usages of these words. For example: "The life I now live in the flesh" (Gal. ii. 20) cannot mean that Paul lived 'after the flesh' for he says he so lived 'by the faith of the Son of God'. Again when he spoke of the 'infirmity' and the 'temptation' which was in his flesh when he first visited the Galatians (Gal. iv. 13, 14), we must not think of some dreadful moral lapse on the part of the Apostle, for the Galatians at that very time had received him as 'an angel of God' (iv. 14) and through this infirmity in his flesh, he had actually 'preached the gospel' at the first. Again, when he declares that he 'conferred not with flesh and blood', he does not mean 'flesh' in its moral sense, but he explains by amplifying his words 'Neither went I up to Jerusalem to them which were apostles before me' (i. 16, 17). Similarly with the word 'spirit', after the question in chapter iii. 1-3 'received ye the spirit?' we have in verse 5 the ministering of the spirit in connection with 'working miracles', which also may be partly in mind in Gal. iii. 14.

"That we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith."

This miraculous element, however, is foreign to the references we have just considered, for the fruit of the Spirit, namely, 'love, joy, peace', has no connection with spiritual 'gifts' as such. We cannot pursue this matter here, but we felt just a hint was necessary for the guidance of those who use these articles as steps to the fuller and personal study of the epistles themselves.

No.5. A Study in Galatians.
"Servants versus Sons."
pp. 146 - 150

We have now arrived at the fourth of Paul's Galatian antonyms, namely "Servants versus Sons". There are several words which are translated 'servant' in the N.T. and each has its own special significance. Let us begin our study with a tabulation of these different aspects of service.

(1) Doulos. "A slave", one 'bound' to serve, from deo 'to bind'. "When used of ordinary service it indicates the lowest scale of servitude, but when transferred to Christian service, it expresses the highest devotion of one who is bound by love" (Dr. Bullinger).

(2) Pais. This word first of all means a child, either boy or girl, then a servant, very much in the same way that the French word garcon which means a boy, is used for a waiter or a porter etc.

(3) Diakonos. If this word be derived from dioko to pursue, it would emphasize the alacrity and diligence of the service rendered. It is of course the origin of our 'deacon'.
(4) Oiketes. A domestic servant, oikos meaning 'house'.
(5) Huperetes. An under-rower, with reference to the galley slaves who worked at the oars.
(6) Therapon. Ministering care. In English, therapy means the medical treatment of disease.

There is only one word for 'servant' in Galatians, it is doulos 'a slave' (i. 10; iv. 1, 7). There is only one word for 'serve' in Galatians, it is douleuo 'to serve as a slave' (v. 13), and there is but one word for 'service' in this epistle namely douleuo 'do service' (iv. 8).

When the Apostle linked the words 'serve' and 'son' together in Phil. ii. 22, "As a son with a father, he hath served with me in the gospel", or in the epistles to Timothy (I Tim. i. 18; II Tim. ii. 1) where he exhorts his 'son' in the faith to service, Paul uses the affectionate term teknon or 'bairn'. Here in Galatians, he places the 'slave' in strong contrast with the 'son', and as this word 'son' is of great importance to the understanding of the argument of Galatians, we must devote some time in becoming acquainted with its meaning and usage. The Greek word translated 'son' in the sentence "Wherefore thou art no more a servant but a son" in Gal. iv. 7, is the Greek word huios. Four of the occurrences of huios in Galatians refer to Christ Himself.

> "When it pleased God . . . . . to reveal His Son in me" (Gal. i. 15, 16).
> "I live by the faith of the Son of God, Who loved me and gave Himself for me" (ii. 20).
> "When the fullness of time was come, God sent forth His Son" (iv. 4).
> "God hath sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father" (iv. 6).

The rest of the occurrences refer to men, either believers 'because ye are sons' (iv. 6), or to the sons of Sarah and Hagar (iv. 22-30). The English reader should note that two passages are wrongly translated 'children' in the A.V. which the Revisers were careful to alter. They are:

> "They which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham." This should read "sons of Abraham" (iii. 7).
> "Ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus." This should read "sons of God" (iii. 26).

When the Apostle wished to speak of the Galatians as 'little children' he had a suitable word at his command:

> "My little children" teknion, the diminutive of teknon (Gal. iv. 19).

Or where he wished to speak simply of children, he used teknon (iv. 25, 27, 28, 31), and where he wanted to introduce the figure of a babe, he used nepios, which occurs in Gal. iv. 1 and 3. It is therefore a great pity that we slur over these distinctions, especially when the very argument of Galatians turns upon the meaning of huios a 'son', as distinct from teknon or nepios 'children'.

Bishop Westcott, writing in Some Lessons of the Revised Version of the New Testament says of these two great words huios and teknon:

> "There is the position of 'sonship' (characteristic of the teaching of St. Paul), which suggests thoughts of privilege, of inheritance, of dignity; and there is also the position of 'childship' (characteristic of the teaching of St. John), which suggests the thoughts of community of nature, of dependence, of tender relationship. Sons may be adopted; children can only be born. The two conceptions are evidently complementary; but they must be realized separately before the full force of the whole idea which they combine to give, can be felt."

The full value of the Greek word 'son' and the idea of privilege that it contains, cannot be estimated apart from a knowledge of what is intended by the word translated 'adoption' which is huiothesia 'the placing as a son'. Israel, God's firstborn among the nations, had this 'adoption' as their distinctive privilege (Rom. ix. 1-5). The seed of Abraham, partakers of the heavenly calling, the church of the firstborn whose names are written in heaven, whose mother is Jerusalem that is above, this company have the right of the adoption as their special privilege (Gal. iv. 5) which is very parallel with the 'birthright' which Esau despised (Heb. xii. 16) and which these members of the heavenly calling were urged to avoid. Then the Church of the Mystery, the calling that pertains to the dispensation of the grace of God among the Gentiles of today, that also has, in its super-heavenly sphere, this privilege of 'adoption' (Eph. i. 3-5). If our contention is true, namely, that John's Gospel ministers to the great outside world, while Paul's prison ministry ministers to the smaller circle of the Mystery, it is but another evidence in its favour, that whereas Paul speaks of the believer as both 'children of God' and 'sons of God', for all the 'sons' are of course 'children' too, John never calls a believer a 'son of God', he always refers to them as 'children', and the reader is advised to follow the R.V. here where the necessary correction has been faithfully carried out.

The idea of both 'son' and 'adoption' is the appointing of the heir. Now we have already learned from the allegory of Isaac and Ishmael (Gal. iv. 22-30) that the child of the bondwoman cannot inherit with the child of the free. One of the characteristics of a 'child' as distinct from a 'son' says Gal. iv. 1-3 is that even though lord of all, yet is under tutors and governors until the time appointed of the father. In this state and period, he 'differeth nothing from a servant' (Gal. iv. 1).

> "But when the fullness of time was come, God sent forth His Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem (exagorazo, 'buy out of the market place') them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father" (Gal. iv. 4-6).

Selden has shown that slaves were not permitted to use this word in addressing the master of the family, which enables us to see the aptness of the introduction of such a strange word here. Ab, is the Hebrew 'father', but Abba is the Chaldee equivalent. As the Aramaic or Chaldee does not possess the definite article, the lack is compensated by the addition of a syllable at the end, thereby rendering the word either emphatic, "The Father", or putting it into the vocative "O Father". Lightfoot says:

> "As it is necessary to distinguish between the Hebrew and Chaldee idiom in the word abi and abba, so you may, I had almost said, you must, distinguish of their sense. For the word abi, signifies indeed a natural father, but withal a civil father, also an elder, a master, a doctor, a magistrate: but the word abba, denotes only a natural father: yea, it denotes, 'My father'."

Lightfoot gives a series of examples which are not intelligible unless the exact Hebrew and Chaldee is printed. His statement though giving practically the truth of the matter, is not to be taken to be the rule without an exception, for John Nicholson, translator of Ewald's Hebrew Grammar, cites the Targum translation of Gen. xlv. 8 and of Job xxxviii. 28 as exceptions, and also says that according to Buxtorf's Lexicon to the Talmud, the Talmudical writers did occasionally use abba to express rabbi and master, but these few exceptions do not alter the fact that the slave was not permitted to use this very personal name abba, O Father.

> "Wherefore" continues the Apostle, "thou are no more a slave but a son; and if a son then an heir of God through Christ" (Gal. iv. 7).
> "If a son then an heir."

Here then is another set of contrasting names, servant versus son, and if we have hitherto underestimated the glory of being not only a 'child' but a 'son' of God, we trust Paul's blessed antonym will have been the means of leading the read into fuller light.

No.6. A Study in Galatians.
"Law versus Grace."
pp. 175 - 180

We have now reached the fifth and last of the great antonyms of the epistle to the Galatians, "Law versus Grace", and although this set comes last, it really underlies all the rest. For:

> if the change of state from bondage to liberty be a change only just short of a change from death to life, and > if the change of instrument, faith instead of works, be like the coming of peace after war, and
>
> if the change from the flesh to the spirit be like the exchange from despair to triumph, and > if the change from the condition of servitude to that of sonship be a translation from what is most abject to what is truly glorious, then the change of dispensation from that of law to that of grace must be one of the most important features of truth that the believer can know.
>

And yet, how many true believers have spoken slightingly of 'Dispensational Truth', not realizing that until the dispensation of law gave place to that of grace, liberty though longed for, was unattainable, for the law 'gendereth to bondage' and nothing but 'the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus' could make the sinner 'free' (Rom. viii. 2). Those who were 'kept under the law', were necessarily 'shut up' unto the faith that could only come with the advent of Christ (Gal. iii. 23). The priceless gift of liberty therefore is only possible to those who are no longer under law but under grace.

So also with regard to 'faith'. Gal. iii. 12 declares that 'The law is not of faith'; the law demands deeds, and where these works of the law are not produced, condemnation must fall. Yet 'the works of the law' have failed because of the weakness of the flesh, and as many as are of the works of the law are under the curse (Gal. iii. 10). The blessed exercise of faith therefore is only possible to those who are no longer under law but under grace.

Then what shall we say of the 'Spirit'? "Where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty", and the Apostle calls the Old Covenant of the law 'the letter that killeth', but he calls the New Covenant grace 'the Spirit that giveth life', and the ministration of the New Covenant of grace as 'the ministration of the Spirit' (II Cor. iii.). The law itself was rendered 'weak through the flesh' (Rom. viii. 3), and we have learned that they which are 'in the flesh' cannot please God. However much we perceive the utter failure of the flesh, we can never know the living power of the Spirit while under the legal dispensation. So it is with the condition of servants which by grace has been exchanged for that of sons. All such have been redeemed from 'under the law, that they might receive the adoption of sons' (Gal. iv. 5).

> "Christ is become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law; ye are fallen from grace" (Gal. v. 4).

The Apostle has much to say about the law in this epistle and we are faced with a tremendous fullness of expression when we attempt to analyze his teaching on the subject. The thirty-two occurrences of the word nomos, demand 32 studies to do the most elementary justice to their variety and importance. This we can only acknowledge but not attempt.

Where we cannot attain to perfection however, we may assay something less ambitious, and though fully conscious of its inadequacy, to begin this great study, we present the following analysis of the Apostle Paul's use of 'law'.

Nomos. Law in Galatians.

(1) The law and righteousness.

> "A man is not justified by the works of the law" (ii. 16).
> "By the works of the law shall no flesh be justified" (ii. 16).
> "If righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain" (ii. 21).
> "That no man is justified by the law in the sight of God, it is evident" (iii. 11).
> "If there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law" (iii. 21).

"It is evident" said the Apostle (and his survey of the law as a means of righteousness reveals the weakness of the law [?flesh]) that the law means nothing apart from 'works'. A law that is never obeyed is a law that virtually does not exist. Consequently therefore, while the Apostle sometimes says the law justified no one, he is explicit elsewhere and says it is the 'works' of the law attempted by 'the flesh' that make justification by the law impossible. There is nothing wrong in the law itself; it is the failure of all flesh to conform to its high demands that makes justification by law impossible to man. It will be no vain repetition to summarize the Apostle's teaching under another heading, namely:

(2) The Law and Works.

> "A man is not justified by the works of the law . . . . . not by the works of the law: for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified" (ii. 16).
>
> "Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law?" (iii. 2).
>
> "He therefore that ministereth to you the Spirit, and worketh miracles . . . . . doeth he it by the works of the law?" (iii. 5).
>
> "For as many as are of the works of the law are under the curse" (iii. 10).
> "I testify again to every man that is circumcised, that he is a debtor to do the whole law" (v. 3).

If the failure of the law to justify the sinner resides in the necessity to produce acceptable 'works' which the flesh is quite unable to produce, and if nevertheless man can be justified before God, then some other way must have been found and so we have already discovered (No.3 of this series) that 'works of law' give place to the 'faith of Christ'. This brings us to the redeeming work of Christ.

(3) The Law and the Cross.

> "For I through the law am dead to the law, that I might live unto God, I am crucified with Christ" (ii. 19, 20).
>
> "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us: for it is written, cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree" (iii. 13).
> "When the fullness of the time was come, God sent forth His Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law" (iv. 4, 5).

One other argument concerning the law must be noticed and that is the purpose which it served, in view of the fact that it was a foregone conclusion that it would prove to be a ministry of condemnation and death.

(4) The Law and the Promise.

(a) Using the illustration of a "man's covenant (or will)" and relying upon the knowledge that the Galatians had of the law obtaining in Asia Minor concerning the making of a "will", the Apostle says:

> "Brethren, I speak after the manner of men; though it be but a man's covenant, yet if it be confirmed, no man disannulleth, or addeth thereto . . . . . And this I say, that the covenant . . . . . which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect" (iii. 15, 17).

(b) The question must inevitably come from every exercised heart 'wherefore then serveth the law?', and the answer is "It is added because of transgressions, till the Seed should come" (Gal. iii. 19).

(c) Another question comes to the surface.

> "Is the law then against the promises of God?" (iii. 21).

The answer given in the subsequent verses shows that while the law could not mediate the promises, it could lead the seeking soul to the only One Who could, namely Christ.

> "Before faith came, we were kept in ward under the law, shut up unto the faith which should afterward be revealed. So that the law hath been our tutor to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith. But now that faith is come, we are no longer under a tutor" (iii. 23-25 R.V.).

Neither 'life', 'righteousness', 'inheritance' or 'promise' came by the law (iii. 21; ii. 21; iii. 18)

What change therefore has been made by God in order that these blessed results might accrue? 'Grace' is the answer. The epistle to the Galatians states the fact that grace has taken the place of law, but it does not explain it or amplify its bearing upon the question of its effect upon the relationship of man and God, of sin and righteous judgment, of the justification of God Who justifies the ungodly. For this the reader must study the epistle to the Romans, where both the question of 'law' and 'grace' is given an exhaustive exposition. What is said however of grace in Galatians is blessed, and on page 180 we present the seven occurrences of charis. To him that hath ears to hear and eyes to see, the five great contrasts of Galatians and the structure following will show the earnest student his walk in life if he would follow the argument of the Apostle of liberty, faith, sonship, Spirit and grace.

Charis. Grace in Galatians.

A | i. 3. Opening Salutation.
Prefaced by reference to "Not of men, neither by man" and the evidence of his apostleship (verse 1).

B | i. 6. Removal from the grace of Christ.
Reference to "Him that called you".
Also references to "another gospel which is not another" and to "some who had troubled them".

Strong denunciation even of an angel that preached any other gospel,
"let him be accursed". "If I yet please men." "Do I now persuade men?".

C | i. 15. The grace manifested in the Apostle's call was characterized by the revelation of "the Son of God" in him, and this grace was not frustrated either by disobedience or by conference with flesh and blood.

D | ii. 9. "The grace that was given unto me."
In this epistle more stress is placed upon the messenger.
In Romans where the question of Paul's apostleship was settled, the stress is placed upon his message.

C | ii. 21. The grace of God not frustrated by the gospel.
So far as the life in the flesh is concerned Paul had died and now lived the faith of "the Son of God".

B | v. 4. Fallen from grace.
Reference to "Him that calleth you".
Also reference to being "otherwise minded" and to him that "troubleth you".

Strong denunciation of any who troubled the church.
"I would they were cut off". "If I yet preach circumcision." "This persuasion."

A | vi.183. Closing benediction, preceded by reference to the "marks" of his adherence to Christ and to "no man".

If the treatment of 'grace' is not so full as that which we find in Romans or Ephesians, yet this perfect distribution and the perfect number of occurrences (seven) cannot fail to impress the believing reader.

Archaic and Obsolete Words of the Authorized Version.

The articles in this series are concerned with words in the Authorized Version of the Bible that have become obsolete and archaic or have changed in meaning or acquired new meanings so that they no longer convey to the reader the sense that the A.V. translators intended to express. Most of these words were accurate translations in 1611, but today they have become misleading. Language is always in a state of flux. New words come in, others change or become obsolete. Sometimes this happens only in districts of the English speaking world. The word 'gotten' is an example. It is still used in U.S.A., but has become obsolete in Great Britain.

Words nearly always degenerate in meaning. This is an evidence of the Fall of Man. Seldom does a word improve or take on higher meanings than it had originally. Our A.V. of the Bible is nearly 400 years old and though it was sixteenth-century English at its best, 'the noblest monument of English prose', the English language has so changed since then, that a revision has been necessary. Not that the A.V. can be set aside. In our estimation this will never be done; it has become part and parcel of our life and rightly so. But if we are to understand the God-breathed revelation of Himself and His purposes for humanity as they are expressed in the original inspired Hebrew of the O.T. and the Greek of the N.T., then we must have a version which expresses as accurately as possible in modern English what God the Holy Spirit caused to be written through the human instrumentality of the O.T. and N.T. authors. These articles are not intended to give a history of the English versions of the Bible. For this fascinating subject we would recommend Professor F. F. Bruce's The English Bible published by the Lutterworth Press.

We have to face the fact that something is always lost in translating from one language to another for the simple reason that there are often no exact equivalents. This is true in translating contemporary languages and even more so when there is a large time gap between them, as for instance the original texts of the Scriptures and the English A.V. some 1600 years later. As Professor F. F. Bruce says "no Bible translator who knows his business counts himself to have attained perfection" and the translators of the A.V. certainly made no such claim, nor those of scores of renderings made since this time. If we are not Hebrew and Greek scholars the best thing we can do is to obtain several of the modern versions and read them side by side with the A.V. The Parallel Bible which places the Authorized and the Revised Versions side by side is helpful. If we do not do this, then we are bound to come across passages of our English version which are unintelligible or even misleading. In Judges ix. 53 we read "and a certain woman cast a piece of a millstone upon Abimelech's head, and all to brake his skull". What does 'all to break' mean in modern English? I Thess. iv. 15 reads ". . . . . we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them that are asleep". 'Prevent' in modern English means to hinder or stop. In what sense can living believers stop or hinder those believers who have died?

We read in Mark i. 30 "But Simon's wife's mother lay sick of a fever, and anon they tell Him of her". We might be pardoned for deducting from this that the disciples waited a while before telling the Lord of this illness. But Mark wrote eutheos, immediately, just the opposite of this. A similar context is Matt. xiii. 20, 21 where the A.V. again uses 'anon' for euthus reading,

> "But he that received the seed into stony places, the same is he that heareth the word, and anon with joy receiveth it; yet he hath not root in himself, but dureth for a while: for when tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the word, by and by he is offended."

The natural meaning of these words today is that when persecution arises because of the Word, later on some are offended, but this again is exactly opposite to what Matthew was inspired by the Holy Spirit to write, for again he uses euthus, immediately, teaching that such offence follows straight away during and after persecution. There is no interval between the two.

The A.V. renders exautes also as 'by and by' in Mark vi. 25 where the daughter of Herodias asks Herod for the head of John the Baptist. She said "I will that thou give me by and by in a charger the head of John the Baptist". She was not asking to received this some time later, but immediately as exautes means.

Again in Deut. xxii. 18, 19 we read "and the elders of that city shall take that man and chastise him; and they shall amerce him in an hundred shekels of silver . . . . .". What does "amerce" mean in modern English? It is possible that not one in a hundred people would know.

It should be clear from these examples (and there are many more) that if we are to get anything like an exact rendering in English of what the Holy Spirit wrote in Hebrew and Greek through the instrumentality of men nearly 2000 years ago, we need some of these archaic and obsolete words expressed in contemporary language, or else we are going to lose truth and this would be tragic indeed, for as we have seen above, the old English of 1611 is sometimes opposite to the truth of the original inspired Scriptures through the change of language. In practically every case the difficulty has arisen through the change of meaning of words and nothing can prevent this happening, for it is constantly going on in all languages. Not only this, but the development of the study of the Holy Scriptures, the discovery of important ancient manuscripts since 1611, and the new knowledge of Bible lands and languages afforded by archaeology, have made up-to-date translations necessary as companions to the A.V., although by no means supplanting it. We should constantly praise the Lord for all the valuable evidence that, under His guidance we believe, has been dug up from the soil of the Middle East, confirming the truth of His Word and throwing a flood of light on the meaning of koine Greek in which the Holy Spirit chose to write the N.T. Much of this information was denied to the translators of our English Bible, for it was discovered since their day. That they would have used this further knowledge had it been possible, there is no doubt, for in their Introduction, written to King James, they state that their translation was from "the original sacred tongues, together with comparing of the labours, both in our own and other foreign languages, of many worthy men who went before us, there should be one more exact translation of the holy Scriptures into the English tongue".

It should be noted that they did not claim infallibility, but that their work should be more exact. Infallibility was kept for the original sacred Scriptures alone and in this they were undoubtedly correct. Their translation was itself a revision of English versions that went back to Wyclif in the late fourteenth century and to Tyndale and his successors from 1525 onwards. John Wyclif's work was the first translation of the whole Bible into English and he was the most eminent theologian of his day. The later version of Tyndale greatly influenced the A.V. translators. Professor J. Isaacs writes "Tyndale's honesty, sincerity, and scrupulous integrity, his simple directness, his magical simplicity of phrase, his modest music, have given an authority to his wording that has imposed itself on all later versions . . . . . nine tenths of the Authorized New Testament is still Tyndale, and the best is still his". How grateful we should be to the Lord for raising up such faithful men so that we can read the Word of God in our own language!

We now propose to note some of the archaic and obsolete English in the A.V. and seek to give the modern equivalent.

No.2. pp. 99, 100

ADMIRE, ADMIRATION. These words in the seventeenth century simply meant wonder or astonishment without any thought of praise or approval that they have today. Thomas Fuller, the church historian, writing in 1639, said of Mohammedanism that it was 'admirable how that senseless religion should gain so much ground on Christianity', by which he meant that this fact was amazing. In no sense did he mean that this was a good things. He also told of a Cardinal Pole delivering "a dry sermon . . . . . many much admiring his discourse", that is, they were astonished at its poverty. The Apostle John in Rev. xvii. 6, according to the A.V., states, after giving a graphic description of the antichristian harlot in verses 3-5, "and I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus: and when I saw her, I wondered with great admiration". Now it cannot be that John admired or approved of this symbol of iniquity in the modern sense of the word, but rather that he was astonished at what he saw.

ADVERTISE. This word appears twice in the A.V., namely Numb. xxiv. 14 and Ruth iv. 4. In the former Balaam tells Balak "I will advertise thee what this people shall do to thy people in the latter days". This word in 1611 meant simply to inform without any idea of wide public notice. Balaam is saying, "I will let you know". In Ruth iv. 4 the statement of Boaz to Ruth's kinsman "I thought to advertise thee", was not a threat to make him a public exhibition. Rather he meant, "I thought I would tell you". When we understand these facts the contexts become clear and intelligible.

AFFINITY. Today this word means to join with anything, whereas in the Authorized Version of the Bible it is only used in the primitive sense of the Latin affinitas, relationship by marriage. In I Kings iii. 1 "And Solomon made affinity with Pharaoh King of Egypt", means "Solomon made a marriage alliance with Pharaoh King of Egypt". Likewise II Chron. xviii. 1 "Jehoshaphat . . . . . joined affinity with Ahab", means Jehoshaphat made a marriage alliance with Ahab. In the prayer of Ezra (ix. 14) "join in affinity with the people of these abominations" means more than making contact with them, rather it means intermarrying with them.

AGAINST. Today this means opposite or confronting. Generally this word is used understandably in the A.V., but there are one or two obsolete usages. In Gen. xliii. 25 we read "And they made ready the present against Joseph came at noon". This does not make sense in modern English, but in the A.V. 'against' means "for" and should read "for Joseph's coming". Exod. vii. 15 also sounds puzzling. The Lord said to Moses "Get thee unto Pharaoh in the morning . . . . . and thou shalt stand by the river's brink against he come". This latter phrase means "for him" and the sense is "stand and wait for him by the river's brink".

ALL TO BREAK. Judges ix. 53 records the fact of "a certain woman cast a piece of millstone upon Abimelech's head and all to break his skull". Does this phrase state the woman's purpose, or the result of her action? Does it mean 'almost broke' or 'quite broke'? The Hebrew means 'crushed his skull' and this is what the Middle English meant. The prefix 'to' expressed separation and 'to-break' meant break asunder or in pieces and with verbs of separation it simply emphasized or intensified their meaning. "All to" began to be regarded as an adverb meaning completely or entirely. In Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, Christina tells the interpreter about the efforts of Mrs. Timorous to persuade her not to make the journey, and she says 'She all-to-be-fooled me'.

AMAZE, AMAZAMENT. These were all stronger words than they are now. To amaze was to stun or stupefy by a blow, or to terrify by fear. Thus warriors were said to fall to the ground 'amazed' i.e. stunned. The statement in the N.T. (Mark xiv. 33) that the Lord "began to be sore amazed, and to be very heavy" in the garden of Gethsemane is not nearly strong enough in modern English. "He began to be greatly distressed and troubled." "Horror and dismay came over Him" (N.E.B.). Let us never forget that here He was confronting Satan and the powers of darkness (Luke xxii. 53). In I Pet. iii. 6, counsel is given to Christian wives to be "not afraid with any amazement", which means "let nothing terrify you".

No.4. pp. 138 - 140

AMERCE. This is a good example of an obsolete word used in the A.V. Deuteronomy xxii. 18 reads: "And the elders of that city shall take that man and chastise him; and they shall amerce him in an hundred shekels of silver . . . . .". This is an old Latin-French form which adds the idea of mulcting to that of a simple fine, having the victim at one's mercy. The angry Prince in Romeo and Juliet (III, 1, 195) says:

> "But I'll amerce you with so strong a fine
> That you shall all repent the loss of mine."

However, it is not a suitable word in the reference given. This is part of the code of the law of God given through Moses which is one of justice and the Hebrew word means to fine, "they shall fine him a hundred shekels of silver". There was no thought that he was being mulcted by this fine.

ANGLE. This is used in the A.V. in its original sense of a fish-hook. ". . . . . They that cast angle into the brooks" (Isa. xix. 8) means casting fish-hooks into the Nile. "They take up all of them with the angle" (Hab. i. 15) would be rendered today "with the hook". The word came to be used for the rod and line as well.

APPARENTLY and EVIDENTLY. These were originally strong words referring to sight. They meant, visibly, manifestly, clearly, but in usage their meaning has now weakened to seemingly, and 'evidently' is more often used in cases of inference than with respect to matters of sight. In Numb. xii. 8 God says "My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in Mine house. With him I will speak mouth to mouth, even apparently and not in dark speeches; and the similitude of the Lord shall he behold". The statement that God spoke 'apparently' to Moses sounds today as though He only seemed to do so but the context makes this impossible. Substitute 'clearly' for 'apparently' and there is no contradiction.

We are told of Cornelius in Acts x. 3 "He saw in a vision evidently about the ninth hour of the day an angel of God coming". Here again the word 'evidently' gives a sense of uncertainty, whereas the meaning is "he saw clearly in a vision". In Gal. iii. 1 "before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth, crucified among you", means "before whose eyes Jesus Christ was publicly portrayed as crucified".

ARK. The word is frequently used of the ark built by Noah, and the ark of the covenant in the Tabernacle. The word is a common one meaning a chest or box. The name Arkwright means a manufacturer of boxes. Wright is middle English for a workman coming from the Anglo-Saxon Wryhta. We read too of the ark of bulrushes in which the baby Moses was placed for safety. This of course was a basket made of bulrushes and daubed with bitumen and pitch to make it waterproof.

ARMHOLE. This meant originally armpit not a hole in clothing. Jer. xxxviii. 12 reads "put now these old casts clouts and rotten rags under thine armholes under the cords". The R.S.V. renders this "put the rags and clothes between your armpits and the ropes". The Hebrew word for armpit means joints of the arms, elbows, or wrists. Instead of "Sew pillows to all armholes" (Ezek. xiii. 18) which is puzzling to say the least, the meaning in modern English is "sew magic bands upon all wrists" (as R.S.V.).

ARTILLERY. The word was used long before there were cannons or howitzers. Bows and arrows could be artillery. The Oxford English Dictionary cites a sixteenth century diarist as listing under artillery 'drumes, flutes, trumpets . . .'. We read of Jonathan giving to a lad "his artillery", i.e. his bows and arrows which the Geneva Bible so renders the words. Tyndale's and Coverdale's Versions had weapons to which the modern versions have returned (see R.S.V.).

ASTONIED, ASTONISHED, ASTONISHMENT. These words are derived from the obsolete word astone which appeared also as astun and astony. It meant like the word 'amaze', to stun, to overwhelm, being much stronger in meaning than the modern usage and we must be careful to give the words this sense when we meet them in the Bible. Instead of astonied in Ezra ix. 3 we should read appalled. Ezra says "I sat down appalled", likewise in Jer. ii. 12; l. 13 and li. 37 where the fate of Babylon is dealt with and she will become not just an astonishment (A.V.) but a horror. Zech. xii. 4 God says "I will strike every horse with astonishment" (A.V.) meaning I will strike every horse with panic.

AWAY WITH. In Isa. i. 13 we read God's lament concerning Israel ". . . . . the new moons and sabbaths, the calling of assemblies, I cannot away with; it is iniquity, even the solemn meeting". In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries this meant tolerate, put up with. The sinful state of Israel made all their rituals empty and unendurable by God. Tyndale rendered Matt. xix. 11 "all men cannot awaye with that sayinge" instead of received or tolerate.

BARBARIAN, BARBAROUS. Originally these words were applied to all non-Greek speaking peoples, who were regarded as foreigners not necessarily uneducated people. Later on they took on the meaning of rude or uncivilized but in the N.T. barbaros is used only in its original sense and the modern word foreigner should be substituted for it.

The First Epistle to the Corinthians.

No.25. pp. 9 - 14

In the context of I Cor. xv. which we are considering, the futility of life without resurrection is stressed. If there is no future life beyond the grave we might just as well 'eat and drink for tomorrow we die' (verse 32), and the Apostle Paul's constant exposure to danger and death in his faithful witness for Christ would likewise be useless. If death is the end, there is little left to do but to pluck the temporary pleasures of the moment. But such carelessness, however much it may appeal to unbelievers, is not for those who are redeemed and belong to Christ. Paul now interjects:

> "Be not deceived: evil company doth corrupt good manners" (I Cor. xv. 33 R.V.), or it could possibly mean 'good characters' and so would read 'bad company ruins good characters'. This quotation is not from the O.T., but from a lost comedy of Menander's called Thais, which had evidently become proverbial. The Apostle stresses that the witness of the Corinthian believers would be ruined if they identified themselves with the unbelieving around them who lived so carelessly. Not that he expected them to be isolated entirely from the world. To live in the world was one thing. To cultivate bad company was quite another.

We have a saying today that a 'person is known by the company he keeps' and it was evident that some of the Corinthians were associating themselves too closely with pagans, hence his exhortation:

> "Awake up righteously, and sin not; for some have no knowledge of God. I speak this to move you to shame" (xv. 34 R.V.).

Professor Barrett's translation is to the point, "Wake up properly to a sober life and stop sinning. What some people have is ignorance of God. I say this to shame you".

A section now commences which amplifies the phrase of verse 23, 'every man in his own order', showing that a general resurrection is untrue.

> "But some will say, how are the dead raised? and with what manner of body do they come?" (xv. 35 R.V.).

Some questions do not arise from faith nor are they edifying. God has nowhere revealed how the dead are raised and to speculate therefore is profitless. He has however reveled that resurrection will be a fact and so calls for our faith and hope. To the merely curious Paul writes:

> "Thou foolish one, that which thou thyself sowest is not quickened, except it die: and that which thou sowest, thou sowest not the body that shall be, but a bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other kind; but God giveth it a body even as it pleased Him, and to each seed a body of its own" (xv. 36-38 R.V.).

The Apostle turns now to the analogy of the sown seed. Life can only come from seed if it dies. The Lord Jesus had already spoken the same truth ". . . . . except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit" (John xii. 24). One does not sow the mature crop, but just the bare grain at the beginning and from this God gives it a 'body' as He has chosen. So with the believer, death is not the end. At the time God wills an unending life with a resurrection body is provided by Him, but this does not mean that these bodies are identical.

Paul now changes his word from body to flesh in order to emphasize this:

> "All flesh is not the same flesh: but there is one flesh of men, another flesh of beasts, and another flesh of birds, and another of fishes. There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial: but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another. There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory. So also is the resurrection of the dead" (xv. 39-42 R.V.).

In nature God has provided variety; in the future life enjoyed in resurrection this is also true. There are heavenly bodies and earthly bodies, each having their particular 'glory'. These do not refer to stars, but to the resurrection bodies of believers. It is God's purpose that some shall occupy a position in the heavenlies, 'far above all', while others will be blessed on the new earth. These differing spheres of glory will demand bodies that are suited to the sphere.

Paul now does turn to astronomy and comments on the variation in brightness of each star. Like this, he declares, is the resurrection of the dead. The contrast is now made with the entry into this life where sin and death dominate, and the entry into the next where these great enemies are abolished for ever. The 'sowing' must not be made to refer to burial, but birth, for seed must be alive when it is sown, or nothing will come from it. The sowing is in corruption; the raising in incorruption. The sowing likewise takes place in dishonour and weakness; the raising up in power and glory.

The present body is 'natural'; the future body is 'spiritual'. The word 'natural' is psuchikos, allied to psuche 'soul'. It is the 'flesh and blood' body that is dominated by the five senses and as such, cannot inherit the kingdom of God (see verse 50). It could not exist in the future spheres of glory, being totally inadequate and imperfect for such conditions. But the resurrection body, animated by the Spirit of God, will give complete equipment and be all-sufficient. Thus resurrection is not just the re-animation of corpses. It is however completely dependent on Christ's resurrection but even so each retains its own individuality and receives a spiritual body suited to the sphere of glory that God has willed each to have in His redemptive purpose. This partly answers the query of verse 35.

The Apostle now goes back to the creation of man:

> "So also it is written, the first man Adam became a living soul. The last Adam became a life-giving spirit. Howbeit that is not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; then that which is spiritual. The first man is of the earth, earthy: the second Man is of heaven. As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy: and as is the > heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly. And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly" (xv. 45-49 R.V.).

It is hardly necessary for us to state that Gen. ii. 7 does not teach that man was given an immortal soul which was distinct from the animal world. Adam BECAME a soul; he was not given one together with other faculties in his make-up. Genesis clearly shows that the Creator gave nephesh 'soul' to the animal world as well, for Gen. i. 20, "the moving creature that hath life", and in verses 21 and 24 the word 'creature', and verse 30 life (see margin) is nephesh also. It should be plain that Adam was not spiritual but soulish, quite apart from sin. It is the second Man, the last Adam, Who is truly spiritual, and it is to His image that the redeemed will ultimately be conformed (Rom. viii. 29), for nothing less than this is adequate for God's great redemptive purpose.

> "For we wait for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ: Who shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of His glory, according to the working whereby He is able even to subject all things unto Himself" (Phil. iii. 21 R.V.).

Adam and Christ are the heads of the old and new humanity respectively.

The Apostle now begins to sum up his arguments:

> "Behold, I tell you a mystery (secret): we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality" (xv. 51-53 R.V.).

Paul now reveals, under the Spirit's guidance, a secret which deals with the living believers at the Second Advent, as well as the dead ones and dates it 'at the last trumpet'. The phrase 'the last trumpet' must refer to the last of a series and the only series of trumpets in the N.T. are those of the book of Revelation. It is pathetic to see the efforts of some expositors to try and dissociate 'the last trumpet' from the Revelation, for they can see that this would take these believers into the Great Tribulation. The problem is of their own making in that they insert the future church related to the Secret of Eph. iii. either at Pentecost or Acts xiii. and so bring it into the earlier position of the Pentecostal assembly being dealt with in I Corinthians.

Nor can we get out of the difficulty by saying that at this point we are at the end or the 'last day', so that this is the final trumpet of all time. The earthly kingdom has yet to run its course, and the whole creation be brought under the control of Christ as verses 24-28 testify. However, one thing is certain. In resurrection immortality and incorruption are put on. It may be that immortality refers to living believers at this time and incorruption those who are asleep in Christ.

If human beings possess immortality now then it cannot be 'put on' at the resurrection. Those who believe the pagan doctrine of the natural immortality of the soul, should carefully ponder Gen. iii. 22, 23:

> "And the Lord God said . . . . . and now, LEST he (Adam) put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and EAT AND LIVE FOR EVER: THEREFORE the Lord God sent him forth from the garden of Eden . . . . ."

One thing is abundantly clear from this, if there is one thing that God will not tolerate, it is an immortal sinner. God alone has immortality (I Tim. vi. 15, 16) and He gives it to His redeemed children when He awakes them from the dead and gives them a spiritual body fashioned like the resurrection body of the Lord Jesus.

At the sounding of the seventh and last trumpet in Rev. xi., "the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ" and immediately follows reference to the 'great power', 'the reign' and the 'time of the dead' (Rev. xi. 15-18). This is all connected with the parousia of Christ. His visible coming back to the earth in power and great glory, which He Himself dates after the Great Tribulation (Matt. xxiv. 21, 29). Let us rightly apportion the Word of Truth and not confuse this with the hope of Col. iii. 1-4.

No.26. pp. 32 - 37

We are coming to the conclusion of the setting forth of the great basic doctrine of resurrection in I Cor. xv. After looking forward to the resurrection of the believer as the culmination of his redemption (see also Rom. viii. 23), a time when immortality, previously absent, will be 'put on', Paul now designates it as victory over the last enemy:

> ". . . . . then shall come to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy victory? O death, where is thy sting? The sting of death is sin; and the power of sin is the law: but thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Cor. xv. 54-56 R.V.).

The Apostle is alluding to Isa. xxv. 8, "He will swallow up death in victory"; and Hosea xiii. 14, "O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction". Death is the result of sin (Rom. v. 12), but for the believer the sting has been drawn, for the redemptive work of the Lord Jesus at Calvary covers 'all trespasses' (Col. ii. 13), and because He has died for sinners death itself shall finally be destroyed. Wonderful though this vision is, Paul ends on a practical note:

> "In consequence of this, my dear brothers, be steadfast, immovable, abounding always in the Lord's work, since you know that your labour is not vain in the Lord" (xv. 58, C. K. Barrett).

The subject now changes and Paul returns to further questions concerning which the Corinthian believers had asked his guidance (see vii. 1; viii. 1; xii. 1). It was most probable that they had heard of the collection of money the Apostle was organizing for the poor saints at Jerusalem and now Paul gives them instructions in this matter:

> "Now concerning the collection for the saints, as I gave order to the churches of Galatia, so also do ye. Upon the first day of the week, let each one of you lay by him in store, as he may prosper, that no collections be made when I come" (xvi. 1, 2 R.V.).

At Jerusalem the Apostle had undertaken to "remember the poor" (Gal. ii. 10). For his activities in this direction the reader should consult Acts xi. 29, 30; xxiv. 17; Romans xv. 25-28; II Cor. viii. & ix. He emphasizes the freedom of this voluntary action in making a money gift to the mother church. There was no compulsion about it, but Paul evidently felt that his Gentile converts would need no great persuasion to help the brethren in need at Jerusalem. He instructs them to do as he had advised the Galatian churches. We have no record of these instructions and they are not referred to in his epistle to the Galatians, but the following verses in I Corinthians make clear what these were. They had possibly been passed on orally during the journey described in Acts xviii. 23.

They were as follows. Each believer should set aside for himself and save up whatever profit he made so that time might not be spent in taking collections when Paul visited them. No specific sum was mentioned; it was all according to how they 'prospered'. Doubtless they knew of God's claim on the Jew of the tithe, a tenth part of their income and they would hardly give less than this. The total gift could then be taken to Jerusalem by any whom the Corinthian church approved. The Apostle is not sure of his future plans, but states 'if it be meet for me to go also, they shall go with me' (xvi. 4 R.V.). The reader should study II Cor. viii. and ix. for further details of this collection.

Paul now deals with a future visit to Corinth:

> "I shall come to you when I pass through Macedonia; for my intention is to pass through Macedonia, but with you I will perhaps stay, or even winter, that you may send me on my way wherever I am traveling. For I do not wish to see you now in passing, because I hope to stay with you for some time if the Lord permit. But I shall stay in Ephesus until Pentecost, for a great and effective door is opened to me, and there are many who resist" (I Cor. xvi. 5-9, C. K. Barrett).

At the time of writing, the Apostle was at Ephesus (verse 8) and from there he would eventually travel northward by land and sea to Macedonia and then move west and south to Athens or Corinth where he would probably winter (6). He explains his plans so that there should be no misunderstanding at Corinth about a delayed visit to them. He did not intend moving from Ephesus at once. "But I will tarry at Ephesus until Pentecost" (the feast that fell seven weeks after Passover), the reason being, 'for a great and effectual door is opened to me and there are many adversaries' (9). There was, therefore, at this moment, a great opportunity for presenting the Truth, but at the same time Satan was resisting, as he always does, stirring up opposition from possibly Jewish Christians who opposed him wherever he went.

Paul loved to describe the Lord's leading as 'doors' which He opened or shut. In Rev. iii. 7 the Lord declares Himself as:

> "He that openeth and no man shutteth; and shutteth and no man openeth."

The Lord is sovereign in this and it is the most effective way of Divine guidance, much better than peculiar feelings and impressions that so many believers rely on to know the Lord's will. We can look to Him to open those doors which are definitely in His appointing and to close those which are not. Always our wills must be subordinate to His, lest we force open the door ourselves and thus make our own pathway which can so easily lead astray.

> "Now if Timothy come, see that he be with you without fear; for he worketh the work of the Lord, as I also do: let no man therefore despise him. But set him forward on his journey in peace, that he may come unto me: for I expect him with the brethren" (xvi. 10, 11 R.V.).

Before Paul's visit to Corinth, they could expect one from Timothy. According to iv. 17, Timothy had already been sent, but the reference here expresses doubt, "if Timothy comes". This could be because of the perils which beset all travelers (see II Cor. xi. 23), or it could have been for a reason that has not been expressed, and which therefore we do not know. Nor can we be certain what the Apostle means by saying that Timothy's stay with them should be 'without fear', unless he was trying to shield his assistant from unpleasant and threatening attitudes that some in the Corinthian church could take. This opposition is made clear in the second epistle and constitutes one of the chief problems Paul had with this church. Evidently there was some reason, fancied or otherwise, that might have led the Corinthians to despise him, but Paul reminds them that Timothy was as much the Lord's servant as he was himself and therefore they must recognize this and finally send him on his way 'in peace'. Christian assistance to traveling brethren was an important and practical manifestation of Christian love and at a time when there was much journeying to spread the Gospel far and wide, this was a real necessity without which the work would have been much hindered.

In verse 11 it is not clear whether 'the brothers' referred to were coming with Timothy, or waiting for him with Paul, in which case they could have been Stephanas, Fortunatus and Achaicus (verse 17). The Apostle now refers to Apollos and tells the Corinthians that although he had begged him earnestly to go to them, Apollos could not do so at the moment, but would take the opportunity when it occurred (12).

The last words and greetings in this epistle are now given:

> "Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong. Let all that ye do be done in love" (xvi. 13, 14 R.V.).

The first four exhortations use military words. They are present imperatives expressing actions that are to be continuous. "To watch", meant not only ordinary vigilance, but the attitude that looked for the early coming of the Lord, a possibility in the Acts period (iii. 19-26, and see Mark xiii. 35-37). They were to 'stand fast' and not yield (compare 'unmoveable' xv. 58), to 'play the man' and 'be strong'. All must be done 'in love' which had been so vividly described in chapter xiii.:

> "Now I beseech you, brethren (ye know the house of Stephanas, that it is the firstfruits of Achaia, and that they have set themselves to minister unto the saints), that ye also be in > subjection unto such, and to every one that helpeth in the work and laboureth" (xvi. 15, 16 R.V.).

The household of Stephanas (i. 16) were the first converts in Achaia, and now they had "set themselves" or "appointed themselves" for service to the saints. This was a self-imposed duty, which they evidently gladly assumed for other believers in the church. It is important to note that they had not been ordained or appointed by Paul or the assembly. Nor does Paul reprimand them for not getting such ordination. This opportunity for a practical expression of their beliefs had occurred and they took it gladly. We are not told of what this service consisted. Doubtless it included the proclamation of the Word as well as other practical matters and in this willingness to serve we have the beginnings of Christian ministry quite apart from any man-made ordinations.

The believers at Corinth are exhorted to recognize the leadership of Stephanas. It would seem that this was not easy for some who had the tendency to push themselves forward. Stephanas, together with Fortunatus and Achaicus were probably the bearers of the Corinthian letter to Paul (vii. 1). They had refreshed Paul's spirit and supplied his need (18). Final greetings now come from the churches of Asia and Aquila and Priscilla, those outstanding believers who had risked their lives for the Apostle (Rom. xvi. 3). They had a 'church in their house'. This is where the church began, not in special buildings which did not exist at this time. The believers' home was the meeting place for the church, and we believe that this is how it will be at the end of the age when apostasy is rampant. Let no one therefore despise 'house churches'. They are Scriptural and have the full blessing of the Lord. To what higher purpose could a home be dedicated?

Paul now takes the pen from his amanuensis and writes:

> "The salutation of me Paul with mine own hand. If any man loveth not the Lord, let him be anathema Maranatha. The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with you. My love be with you all in Christ Jesus. Amen" (xvi. 21-24 R.V.).

"Anathema" means 'under a curse' which separates a person from God. This is strong language, but it is evident that there were those at Corinth who needed this warning. Practical love for the Lord Jesus Christ is the very centre of Christian response. "Maranatha" is the Greek transliteration of an Aramaic word and means: "Our Lord is come" or "Our Lord cometh" and in view of the context of the whole epistle with its expectation of the Second Advent the latter is evidently meant, being very much like Rev. xxii. 20 "Come, Lord Jesus". The epistle ends with Paul's characteristic reference to grace (peculiar to him and his epistles) and last of all he sends his love, reminding them, as it were, that his rebukes sprang from love and extended to all, for he always had at heart their spiritual well-being, progress in the Truth and the practical response in their lives.

The Second Epistle to the Corinthians

No.1. Introduction and i. 1 - 13.
pp. 41 - 47

In the introduction to the first epistle we pointed out that the Corinthian letters were the most personal of all Paul's writings. Especially is this true of the second epistle where we find a deeper revelation of Paul the man than anywhere else. W. R. Inge writes: "Of all the epistles, the second to the Corinthians is one which contains the most intimate self-revelations, and few can read it without loving as well as honouring the author". It has been called 'the most letter-like of all the letters of Paul', yet it is difficult to interpret, largely owing to the fact that we can only ascertain its background approximately. In order to bring this before the reader, we think it wise to quote from the study we gave in The Berean Expositor, Volume XLV, pp 4 and 5:

> "Both external and internal evidences point strongly to the Pauline authorship of the letter. Clement of Rome wrote an epistle to the church at Corinth about 95A.D. and refers I Corinthians to 'the blessed Paul, the Apostle'. This is the earliest instance of the quotation of a N.T. writer identified by name. Other external evidence is provided by Ignatius and Polycarp. The characteristics of style, vocabulary and content harmonize with what is known of Paul and Corinth.
>
> The Apostle wrote the letter from Ephesus and the date many conservative scholars give is 55A.D., though C. K. Barrett suggests early 54 or the end of 53. It will be helpful to reconstruct the background to the writing of the Corinthian epistles, derived from the Acts and from the epistles themselves. Some of these points may be debated and there is no unanimity among Bible scholars here, but we believe the following will not be far from the true facts.
>
> We have already mentioned Paul's visit to Corinth described in the Acts and referred to in I Cor. ii. 1. After this visit he wrote them a letter which has not been preserved (v. 9). We need have no concern that any part of inspired Scripture has been lost. The Apostle must have written letters which do not form part of Holy Scripture and this is one of them. Disturbing news came from believers in contact with the Corinthian assembly and also a communication from them requesting information on certain problems. In order to meet these needs Paul wrote I Corinthians. Apparently this did not solve all the difficulties, and in consequence Paul was forced to pay them a hurried painful visit (II Cor. ii. 1; xii. 14; xiii. 1, 2). Following this the Apostle wrote them a third letter of very severe character (II Cor. ii. 4). His anxiety for the church there concerning their condition and also how they would receive this severe epistle was so great that he could not wait in Troas for Titus, the bearer of the severe letter, but hurried on to Macedonia where he met him and learned with great relief that the letter had produced the needed results and all was well. From Macedonia Paul then wrote the canonical II Corinthians (II Cor. ii. 13; vii. 5-16). After this he paid his last visit to the Corinthian church (Acts xx. 1-4).
> Some modern scholars hold that the 'severe letter' is contained in II Corinthians and that this epistle is not a unified work. They claim that vi. 14 - vii. 1 is an interpolation, because it breaks the sequence of thought, that chapter ix. largely duplicates what is in chapter viii., and that the last section (x. 1 - xiii. 14) is so different in character from the earlier sections that it must be part or whole of the stern letter Paul sent to Corinth. Against this there is absolutely no manuscript evidence for such a truncated epistle and a close study will reveal that, far from being disjointed, it shows a remarkable unity.

It will be good to look at the background of I Corinthians a little more closely. Apollos undoubtedly worked in Corinth (I Cor. iii. 6) and it is possible that Peter visited it too. Owing to their spiritual immaturity this tended to cause the Corinthians to break down into groups and to range themselves under the name of one of these leaders (i. 11, 12) thus producing disunity. There were problems and abuses at the Lord's Supper (xi. 18-22), public litigation among members (vi. 1-8), a notorious case of immorality (v. 1-5), arguments about eating food that had been sacrificed to idols (viii. 1-13; x. 14 - xi. 1), disagreements about the need for marriage (vii. 1-40) and of morality outside marriage (vi.. 12-20). Resurrection was denied by some (xv. 12) and Paul's own apostleship questioned by those who were very likely Judaists (iv. 3; ix. 1). All this was quite enough to produce an unhealthy spiritual state in the assembly and to cause great concern to Paul. Some of this bad news had been brought to Paul by the household of Chloe (i. 11). Additionally a trio, Stephanas, Fortunatus and Achaicus arrived from the Corinthian church, probably bringing the problems which Paul was asked to answer (xvi. 17). These may be seen in the recurring phrase "now concerning" (peri de vii. 1, 25; viii. 1; xii. 1; xvi. 1, 2). There were problems too about spiritual gifts. Some were placing too much emphasis upon the gift of tongues and upon these gifts in general, which appeared to be producing pride. Furthermore the gifts were not being used in an orderly or balanced manner. One can therefore readily see that guidance and warning through an epistle was absolutely necessary."

We now give the structure of the epistle as a whole and for this we are indebted to The Apostle of the Reconciliation by C. H. Welch:

II Corinthians.

A | i. 1, 2. Introduction. Salutation.
B | a | i. 3-11. Thanksgiving for comfort in affliction.
b | i. 12. The Apostle's manner of life.
C | i. 13 - ii. 13. Subject of writing. Visit. Vindication.
No rest in spirit. Macedonia.
B | a | ii. 14-16. Thanksgiving for triumph in affliction.
b | ii. 17 - vii. 4. The Apostle's ministry.
C | vii. 5 - xiii. 10. Subject of writing. Visit. Vindication.
No rest in flesh. Macedonia.
A | xiii. 11-14. Conclusion. Benediction.

The structure makes clear the importance of Paul's ministry and his anxiety over the condition of the church at Corinth which is so prominently featured in this epistle. It would appear that the Apostle had more trouble with the Corinthian church than with any of the other assemblies he founded by his missionary work. Yet his patience and love for them never failed, even though he had to correct them sharply. Let us never forget that the most wondrous ode ever written concerning love in its highest sense was addressed by Paul to this church!

> "Paul, an apostle of Christ Jesus through the will of God, and Timothy our brother, unto the church of God which is at Corinth, with all the saints which are in the whole of Achaia: Grace to you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ" (II Cor. i. 1 R.V.).

In the opening verses of I Corinthians Sosthenes is associated with Paul, but here Timothy is mentioned instead. From I Cor. iv. 17 it appears that he had been sent to Corinth and when he rejoined Paul later on at Ephesus he had to report failure in rectifying the troubles there. Possibly he moved on with the Apostle to Troas into Macedonia and he sends his greetings with those of Paul in the first verse of the epistle. It is clear that both the canonical letters to Corinth were intended to be read in other places by the author. In the first epistle "all that call upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ in every place" is added and here, "the saints which are in all Achaia" are linked with the Corinthian church.

Achaia was the name of the Roman province which included the isthmus of Corinth and the land south of it, roughly corresponding to the southern half of the modern kingdom of Greece. It is probable that the local churches kept copies of Paul's letters forwarded to them by their neighbours and thus came to possess collections of their own which would be read at their gatherings together with the Old Testament.

Paul continues:

> "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies and God of all comfort; who comforteth us in all our affliction, that we may be able to comfort them that are in any affliction" (i. 3 and 4 R.V.).

The Apostle first of all directs our thoughts not merely to God, but God Who has revealed Himself through the Lord Jesus as the One Who is all-compassionate and the origin of all comfort and encouragement, and this conception is paramount right through the epistle. Paraklesis, 'comfort' (translated 'consolation' in A.V. in verses 5, 6 and 7) is a key-word in II Corinthians, occurring no less than eleven times and the verb parakaleo, eighteen times.

When Paul speaks of this, he does so as one who was constantly experiencing it himself, for the overwhelming tests and tribulation which this epistle reveals that he passed through would have been otherwise unendurable. Not only does he come through these triumphantly, but he even obtains blessing through them! There is another aspect too which is related to the mystery of pain and suffering in this life. Much we may not be able to understand, but having passed through a measure of this, at least we can understand and comfort others who go through similar dark experiences. We are then able 'to comfort them that are in any affliction, through the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God' (verse 4) and so the tests are not valueless and unfruitful. Furthermore, when the Corinthians saw the Apostle's Christ-like conduct under suffering, they would be encouraged and inspired to make a similar stand themselves. This is what verses 6 and 7 mean:

> "But whether we be afflicted, it is for your comfort and salvation; or whether we be comforted, it is for your comfort, which worketh in the patient enduring of the same > sufferings which we also suffer: and our hope for you is stedfast; knowing that, as ye are partakers of the sufferings, so also are ye of the comfort."

Having made this clear, Paul straight away draws attention to a great test that he had recently passed through:

> "For we would not have you ignorant, brethren, concerning our affliction which befell us in Asia, that we were weighed down exceedingly, beyond our power, insomuch that we despised even of life" (i. 8 R.V.).

Whatever this may mean, it must have been very serious, for 'pressed out of measure' A.V., or 'weighed down exceedingly' R.V., indicate that he was like a beast of burden crushed beneath a very heavy load, so that he regarded immediate death as a certainty. Some think this referred to the uproar at Ephesus described in Acts xix. 23-41, but there is no suggestion in this context that Paul was in any personal danger at this time. It is possible that he is recalling a severe illness which nearly proved fatal. In any case we should remember that the experience to which he refers was not unique, for in xi. 23 he states that he was 'in death oft', such was the cost that this man had to pay for faithful witness for the Lord.

As he looked back on this terrible experience, he could see one reason at least why the Lord permitted it, and that was for him to realize his own utter helplessness and to trust in the "God which raiseth the dead" (verse 9). This is one of the great lessons stressed in this epistle, and one that we must all learn and practice, that is to have 'no confidence in the flesh', but every confidence in the risen and ascended One Who has conquered death. The power that vanquishes death is a limitless power that can accomplish anything, and Paul not only looks back to a wonderful deliverance, but forward to future testings and says "He will deliver" (verse 10 R.V.), and upon this he sets his hope, assisted by the intercession of the Corinthian saints, 'ye also helping together on our behalf by your supplication' (11 R.V.).

We have on other occasions stressed the importance of the ministry of continual intercession for others. There is no doubt that this is a vital part of Christian witness and service behind the scenes. This is prayer in the highest sense, where self is forgotten and the needs of others become paramount. Furthermore it is a service that all can engage in and we commend this to every reader of The Berean Expositor who loves the Truth. Do not think it is wasted time, or that other forms of service are more practical. Intercession along the lines of the Lord's will accomplishes things for Him and for the Lord's people.

There is abundant testimony that Paul valued highly the prayerful remembrances of the churches. He could say "For I know that this shall turn to my salvation through your prayer . . . . ." (Phil. i. 19); ". . . . . For I trust that through your prayers I shall be given unto you" (Philemon 22), so let us labour in prayer for one another, and when such prayer is answered, it will result in praise and thanksgiving which will redound to the glory of God. This is the sense of verse 11 in the chapter we are studying. Many persons prayed for the gift bestowed upon the Apostle and many gave thanks for the answer.

In the section that follows, Paul, contrary to what his opponents were saying, defends his integrity and his behaviour towards the Corinthian believers:

> "For our glorying is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in holiness and sincerity of God, not in fleshly wisdom but in the grace of God, we behaved ourselves in the world, and more abundantly to you-ward" (i. 12 R.V.).

The reader will notice the better rendering of kauchesis, "glorying" rather than 'rejoicing' A.V. and "holiness" instead of 'simplicity'. The Apostle had a clear conscience with regard to his treatment of the church at Corinth and it would seem that some were accusing him of insincerity in his letters, writing one thing and meaning something else. But Paul wrote nothing but what the Corinthians could read and understand. There were no double meanings:

> "For we write you nothing but what you can read and understand; I hope you will understand fully (i. 13 R.V.).

The Apostle hopes this will be true 'to the end', this being the near approaching 'day of our Lord Jesus', when He would return and render to every man according to his work. The previous section now leads to another (verses 15-22), in which Paul explains why a plan he had made to visit them had to be postponed. This was certainly not due to fickleness or changeability on his part. He was not a vacillator who says 'yes' and 'no' almost in the same breath. Knowing the sterling character of the Apostle, it seems amazing that he should have to defend himself in this way, but misunderstanding plays into the enemy's hands and so Paul takes the trouble to explain to the Corinthians why his proposed visit had to be deferred temporarily.

No.2. i. 14 - ii. 13.
pp. 64 - 68

We have now reached a section in chapter i. where Paul feels it necessary to explain the reason for the postponement of his promised visit to Corinth. Doubtless his opponents there were making much of the fact that the Apostle had not visited them and that he was therefore changeable in nature and his word was unreliable. In I Cor. xvi. 5 he had told them that he proposed to pay them a visit after he had passed through Macedonia. In the second letter in the context we are considering, he refers to another plan made after writing I Corinthians and out of consideration for the Corinthian believers. He would now cross over and come straight to Corinth, and after visiting Macedonia, return to Corinth again, whence he trusted to be 'brought on his way', i.e. 'given a good send-off' toward Judaea. The result of this would be that the church at Corinth would have a 'second benefit', the joy and profit of seeing him twice:

> "And in this confidence I was minded to come before unto you, that ye might have a second benefit; and by you to pass into Macedonia, and again from Macedonia to come unto you, and of you to be set forward on my journey unto Judaea" (i. 15, 16 R.V.).

In changing his plans, was he like a fickle man of the world, saying 'yes' one minute and 'no' the next?

> ". . . . . I wanted to come to you first, so that you might have a double pleasure (or favour). I wanted to visit you on my way to Macedonia, and to come back to you from Macedonia and have you send me on my way to Judea. Was I vacillating when I wanted to do this?" (i. 15, 16, 17 R.S.V.).

The thought of fickleness in dealing with his converts was absolutely abhorrent to the Apostle, so much so that he now makes a solemn assertion, "As God is faithful (or true), our word toward you is not yea and nay" (18, 19 R.V.). In other words, Paul did not say 'yes' and 'no' almost in the same breath. He followed consistently One Who was the unchanging Truth. Never could the Son of God be a 'yes and no' kind of person for He always gave an unqualified 'yes' to all the Father's will, whatever it cost:

> "For the Son of God, Jesus Christ, Who was preached among you by us, even by me and Silvanus and Timothy, was not yea and nay, but in Him is the yea: wherefore also through Him is the Amen, unto the glory of God through us" (i. 19, 20 R.V.).

So, for this reason, that of His unchangeability, all the promises of God are sure, for they are in Him, Who is the Amen or the Truth. "These things saith the Amen, the faithful and true Witness . . . . ." (Rev. iii. 14). We remember the number of times recorded in John's Gospel when He prefixed a solemn assertion by a double Amen, translated 'verily, verily' (literally, amen, amen). The Son of God, then, is the Amen to all the promises and will of the Father, and Paul could say that he followed Him closely and so, in spite of appearances, the Apostle was certainly not vacillating. He, with all other believers at this time, had been established in Christ, anointed and sealed and been given the earnest or foretaste of the Spirit (verses 21 and 22).

This 'anointing' included the Pentecostal gifts which were a foretaste of the coming earthly kingdom the soon returning Christ would set up. Among these was the supernatural gift of knowledge which John refers to in his first epistle, "But ye have an unction ('anointing' R.V.) from the Holy One, and ye know all things" (I John ii. 20). "But the anointing which ye have received of Him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you, but as the same anointing teacheth you all things . . ." (I John ii. 27). This 'anointing' or 'sealing' should lead to stability. It certainly had done so in the case of the Apostle, so that he now states to the Corinthians in all solemnity, that it was not lightheartedness or selfishness that caused him to change his plans. He had acted solely for their benefit:

> "But I call God to witness against me—it was to spare you that I refrained from coming to Corinth . . . . . For I made up my mind not to make you another painful visit. For if I cause you pain, who is there to make me glad but the one whom I have pained? And I wrote as I did, so that when I came I might not be pained by those who should have made me rejoice . . . . . For I wrote you out of much affliction and anguish of heart and with many tears, not to cause you pain but to let you know the abundant love that I have for you" (i. 23 - ii. 4 R.S.V.).

The situation lying behind Paul's statements here is not easy to ascertain for we have not all the facts. It could either be that Paul had determined that his second visit, which had not yet taken place, should not be a painful one; or that he would not pay the Corinthians a second painful visit, which would mean that he had already paid them two visits, the second of which, unrecorded in the Acts, had been of a painful character. The latter view seems the more probable. The Apostle's main wish was to promote their joy. If he had to use his apostolic power to discipline them because of the sinful failure of some in the church, it was with reluctance and sorrow that he took this step, for it caused him much anguish and tears owing to the great love he had for them. He would much rather have commended them, but a real friend is one that speaks the truth even though it hurts, always having the interests of the other person at heart. The wounds his words would inflict on them would be the faithful wounds of a loving friend who only wanted their spiritual progress, faithfulness in witness and response to the Lord.

The following verses (5-11) deal with the offender at Corinth. Who was he and what had he done? The person is not named. Some have assumed him to be the incestuous person mentioned in the first epistle, but this does not fit the passage we are now considering which seems to indicate an offence against the Apostle personally, either in his absence or when he last visited them.

> "But if anyone has caused pain, he has caused it not to me, but in some measure—not to put it too severely—to you all. For such a one this punishment by the majority is enough; so you should rather turn to forgive and comfort him, or he may be overwhelmed by excessive sorrow. So I beg you to reaffirm your love for him. For this is why I wrote, that I might test you and know whether you are obedient in everything. Anyone whom you forgive, I also forgive. What I have forgiven, if I have forgiven anything, has been for your sake in the presence of Christ, to keep Satan from gaining the advantage over us; for we are not ignorant of his designs" (ii. 5-11 R.S.V.).

It seems evident that the believers at Corinth, influenced by the painful letter the Apostle had sent them, had taken the step of punishing the offender. They had not been unanimous, but the majority had acted in obedience to Paul's advice and he was satisfied that it had been adequate, so much so that he now advised them to changed their attitude and seek to restore the sinner and assure him of their brotherly love lest he be overwhelmed with sorrow. They should now make clear to him their forgiveness and Paul states that he himself will also forgive, which would not have much point unless he has been personally wronged and involved in the matter. This forgiveness was important, because if it was not put into effect, some lasting damage might be done to the offender, a permanent breach caused and Satan would then get the advantage, for he waits tirelessly for the opportunity to get in and spoil the work of the Lord.

The Apostle now returns to the details of his personal movements subsequent to the terrible experience he describes in i. 8-10. He makes clear to the Corinthians that, having abandoned the original plan to go straight to Corinth, he went north to Troas with the intention of preaching the gospel there. This was a sea-port town from which he had previously sailed on his first crossing into Europe (Acts xvi. 8-11). Here he expected eventually to be joined by Titus on his return from Corinth and from him to have up-to-date news of the condition of things in the church there.

> "Now when I came to Troas for the gospel of Christ, and when a door was opened unto me in the Lord, I had no relief for my spirit, because I found not Titus my brother; but taking my leave of them, I went forth into Macedonia" (ii. 12, 13 R.V.).

Though this promising opening of the Lord had occurred, for which doubtless the Apostle was grateful, he had no peace of mind as he pondered over the state of the Corinthian believers. He knew only too well how Satan and the flesh could work to overthrow and spoil the Christian witness he had founded, and like any true leader, he had a very close link with his converts and what affected them affected him. Because of this uncertainty of mind he felt he could endure it no longer and proceeded into Macedonia hoping to meet Titus on his return journey along the main highway which spanned the province. This is what evidently happened—not only did he meet his fellow-worker, but Titus was able to reassure him concerning the Corinthian church that all was well in spite of his fears, the danger there was passed and they longed to see the Apostle again.

No wonder we have the outburst of praise for this answered prayer in ii. 14 although Paul does not describe his meeting with Titus until chapter vii. This context in the second chapter and the seventh shows us how human the Apostle was. He was no super-man who was indifferent to adverse circumstances. He knew what fear and anxiety were for others whom he loved and who were in danger, and all his interests being bound up with such, he suffered with them and for them. Here is real love and unselfishness. When he said 'for me to live is Christ' (Phil. i. 21) this is what he really meant, spending himself without limit and with practical concern for the Lord and for His people.

No.3. ii. 14 - iii. 18.
pp. 94 - 99

We have seen in the context we are considering (II Cor. ii. 12-16), Paul's anxiety and unrest as he pondered over the dangerous condition of things in the Corinthian church, and how he finally broke off his own work at Troas to meet Titus on his return journey from Corinth. His heart filled with a paean of praise when he learned that the danger was past and the Corinthian believers had responded to his warnings and not taken offence.

> "But thanks be unto God, which always leadeth us in triumph in Christ, and maketh manifest through us the savour of His knowledge in every place. For we are a sweet savor of Christ unto God, in them that are saved, and in them that perish" (ii. 14, 15 R.V.).

It is difficult to be sure of the exact meaning of thriambeuo. The R.V. and the R.S.V. give it its classical meaning 'leads in triumph' whereas the A.V. follows Augustine and the Latin tradition 'causeth us to triumph', for which there is no parallel. The figure is of a victorious general returning from victory in a triumphal procession in which the Apostle is sharing. The triumph of Christ was spreading all over the world as a sweet savour unto God and possibly the figure is continued here like the incense bearers in the conqueror's train scattering the fragrance far and wide.

The Apostle now comments upon the effect of the Gospel on its hearers. To Those who reject it is a 'savour from death unto death' (verses 15 & 16 and note the present tenses of the verbs correctly rendered by the R.V.). These two opposite effects of the gospel upon the human mind are always present when it is faithfully preached. Like the sun which not only softens the wax, but hardens the clay, it sharply divides its hearers. As Paul considers the terrible seriousness of this he says 'who is sufficient for these things?' The answer is 'no-one unaided', for he was not like a shady merchant who adulterates his goods. "We are not as many, corrupting the word of God" (17). Kapeleuo means to 'peddle', 'adulterate' or water down anything. Anyone can preach a 'watered down' gospel where all unpleasantness concerning sin and perishing are left out and the offence of the Cross omitted. This was probably referring to the work of the enemies at Corinth, but the Apostle refused to engage in such preaching. His ministry was the very opposite—sincere in the sight of God and his sufficiency was from Him. Alas, how often we get a 'watered down', diluted gospel today which offends no-one and is powerless!

Having explained his reasons for the postponed visit to Corinth, Paul now observes that there really was no need to go into further detail and commend himself to them. Their relationship had been so close that this should be quite unnecessary:

> "Are we beginning again to commend ourselves? or need we, as do some, epistles of commendation to you or from you? Ye are our epistle, written in our hearts, known and read of all men; being made manifest that ye are an epistle of Christ . . ." (iii. 1-3 R.V.).

Some were making use of testimonial letters written by other believers. The church at Ephesus had written such a letter commending Apollos to the Corinthians (Acts.xviii.27). Paul is not saying this was wrong, but that he himself did not need them. As their founder and leader he was well known to them and surely they were not so forgetful of his ministry as to want further credentials. They were themselves truly his epistle, though not written with material substance as ink—'written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not in tables of stone, but in tables that are hearts of flesh' (verse 3 R.V.).

This illustration brings to the Apostle's mind another divine writing which played a momentous part in the history of Israel. Moses received from God two tables of stone written with the finger of God containing the divine law (Exod. xxxi. 18). This law of God was a covenant made between Himself and the people of Israel (Exodus xix. 5; xxiv. 7, 8). It was the "Old Covenant", but, in absolute contrast, Paul had been made a minister of "the New Covenant" made by God with the same people. Jeremiah graphically records this in chapter xxxi. 31-37. This contrast the Apostle now expounds in the wonderful passage that follows. We should note that the 'Old Covenant' of law and the 'New Covenant' of grace are used with precision in the Scriptures. A covenant is a binding arrangement between two parties and applies to them alone. Those two parties are made perfectly clear in the Scriptures. They are God on the one hand and the people of Israel on the other (Exod. xix. 1-6; xxxiv. 27; Deut. v. 2-4; Jer. xxxi. 31-37) and we have no right to insert any other parties into these covenants. One has its basis in works and law-keeping, and the other in divine grace.

Because the New Covenant operates on the principle of grace, many assume that this covenant must be introduced whenever God deals in grace with sinners. But we should remember that God can have dealings of grace with such without making any covenant with them and such is the case with every member of the Body of Christ upon whom riches of grace are showered (Eph. i. 6-8). We therefore find no mention of the New Covenant in Ephesians or in any of the prison letters of Paul, for, by this time, Israel, the human party in the New Covenant, had passed into spiritual darkness and now was in unbelief (Acts xxviii. 25-28) and, in the new man now being formed (Eph. ii. 15), Israel as a nation does not exist. In it there is neither Jew nor Gentile as such. All such distinctions have vanished. Saving grace administered by covenant is only necessary to those who had already been dealt with by covenant, i.e. Israel (Jeremiah xxxi. 31-34; Romans ix. 4). Gentiles were 'strangers from the covenants' (Eph. ii. 12) and can be reached and saved by grace without the necessity for any covenant.

It is important to realize that both Old and New Covenants are national. Israel the nation is at the centre of both (Exod. xix. 5, 6; Jer. xxxi. 36). Saved Gentiles in the Acts period who were like wild olive grafts into the true (Rom. xi. 16-21) and therefore partook of Israel's covenant privileges, shared in the New Covenant blessings, but we cannot perpetuate this condition of things while Israel is dead spiritually and unusable by God. The New Covenant touches the heart upon which God Himself writes His precepts (Jer. xxxi. 33) whereas all through this age, Israel's heart has been 'gross' through their rejection of God's offer of mercy (Acts iii. 19-26) and so they cannot 'understand with their heart' (Acts xxviii. 27). This is the absolute negation of the New Covenant and it cannot be operating under such conditions when the main party which it touches, Israel, has a blinded and hardened mind. In this dispensation of grace (Eph. iii. 2) God can deal directly with sinners, either Jew or Gentile, in grace on the basis of the Lord's all-sufficient redemptive work on the cross and there is no need to bring any thought of a covenant in here. It is far better to keep accurately to the inspired Word and put both these covenants where God puts them, i.e. with Israel the nation at the centre of both.

It should hardly be necessary to say that the word 'testament' in II Cor. iii. should be rendered 'covenant' right through the chapter. Paul is not dealing with will-making but with the two covenants which have such a prominent part in Holy Writ and to emphasize the superiority of the New Covenant over the Old, he sets out a series of contrasts to make this clear. At this point it would be as well to point out that when he says 'the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life' (iii. 6) he is not dealing with the interpretation of Scripture, referring to a literal or spiritualizing method as many people think when they quote (or rather misquote) this verse to support the idea that the Bible must not be read literally. They should realize that 'the letter' refers to the Old Covenant of law, the breaking of which led to death and being under the curse (Rom. vii. 9, 10; Gal. iii. 10). It was indeed the 'letter that killeth' and the 'ministration of death', whereas the New Covenant, where human works and merit are disregarded and God alone works in grace bringing forgiveness and life, can truly be designated as the spirit which giveth life.

Not that there was no greatness or glory in the law. Of itself it was 'holy, just and good' (Rom. vii. 12). It reflected the character of the thrice holy God Who gave it, and at its inception there was glory and awe-inspiring majesty (Exodus xix. 16-20; Hebrews xii. 18-21), so much so that when Moses came down from the mount, his face reflected the glory so intensely that the people could not look at him and were afraid. He was then forced to put a veil over his face (Exod. xxxiv. 29-35). This not only moderated its brightness, but when it began to fade, hid this also from the Israelites. It will be helpful to set out the comparisons between the Old and the New Covenants in II Cor. iii.:

The Old Covenant	The New Covenant
The letter that killeth (6).	The spirit that quickeneth (6).
The ministration of death (7, 8).	The ministration of the spirit (7, 8).
The ministration of condemnation (9).	The ministration of righteousness (9).
That which is done away (11).	That which remaineth (11).
Moses and Israel veiled (13-15).	The veil done away in Christ (13-15).
When Israel turn, the veil removed (16-18).	We all with unveiled face (16-18).
The glory of God in the face of Moses "done away" (7).	The light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ (iv. 6).

Though the Old Covenant of law-keeping had its glory, it was a temporary one and fading at that, owing to the fact that it was 'weak on account of the flesh' (Rom. viii. 3). It showed a standard of conduct far above that which failing and sinful human nature could reach. The New Covenant, on the other hand, being all of God's doing in grace, replacing condemnation and death by imputed righteousness and life, had a glory which far outshone the Old Covenant, so much so that by comparison it scarcely appears to be glorious at all (iii. 10). The contrast therefore right through this long section is the condition of the Jew under the law in the Old Testament with its condemnation and blindness, and the emancipation and salvation of the Jew in the N.T. who believed in Christ and came under the gracious work of the New Covenant which was ratified by the Lord Jesus on the cross. The O.T. Israelite had his mind 'veiled' like the face of Moses (iii. 14) and the only way this blinding element could be removed was by coming into saving contact with Christ 'which veil is done away in Christ' (verse 14) which is expressed by 'turning to the Lord' (16). This turning was vital to the Jew of the N.T. for salvation and will be so for the whole nation when in the future it looks on the Lord Jesus Christ at His Second Advent and is convicted of sin, 'they shall look on Me Whom they have pierced' (Zech. xii. 10). They will then whole-heartedly turn to Him and be saved and this is all part of God's New Covenant dealing with Israel (Rom. xi. 25-29) so that at last they can be the Divine channel of blessing to the whole world that the Lord always intended they should be.

The New Covenant ministry therefore had a special relevance to the Acts period when Israel was being tested yet again by God and those who were saved, together with Gentiles, became a New Covenant 'firstfruits', a faithful 'remnant', looking forward to the day when the whole nation shall be saved and the hope of the New Covenant fulfilled and the earthly kingdom of the Lord established.

The closing verses of the chapter deal with the transformation that is being daily effected in the lives of those who have no veil coming between them and the Lord:

> "But we all, with unveiled face reflecting as in a mirror the glory of the Lord, are transformed into the same image from glory to glory, even as from the Lord the Spirit" (iii. 18 R.V.).

The R.V. 'unveiled face' is more accurate than the 'open face' of the A.V. and shows the connection inspired Scripture is making with the 'veil' of the context. This 'beholding of the glory of the Lord' is expressed in iv. 6 as the 'light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ'. The Lord Jesus sums up and fully expresses the glory of God which has been fully expressed in His redemptive work at Calvary. The more we experience this by faith and practical outworking, the more we progress 'from glory to glory' and come into a deeper knowledge and response. The Holy Spirit, Who is one with the Lord ("the Lord the Spirit", or "the Spirit which is the Lord", R.V. margin) alone makes all this possible.

No.4. iv. 1 - 18.
pp. 109 - 114

The Apostle Paul has made plain the superiority of the New Covenant of Jer. xxxi. over the old one of Exodus by a series of comparisons (II Cor. iii. 16-18). The nation of Israel was the centre of this New Covenant from a human standpoint and thus had first place in the Acts period during which II Corinthians was written. Paul and those with him were made 'able ministers' of this covenant (iii. 6) and they fully realized the responsibility that this divine appointment brought upon them. It may be in the opening of chapter iv. that he has in mind the evil work of his opponents at Corinth:

> "Therefore seeing we have this ministry, even as we obtained mercy, we faint not: but we have renounced the hidden things of shame, not walking in craftiness, nor handling the word of God deceitfully; but by the manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God" (iv. 1, 2 R.V.).

This great service in connection with the New Covenant had been committed to Paul by the mercy of God. This mercy had touched him at the very beginning of his Christian life (I Tim. i. 12, 13) and followed him all the way through together with God's abundant grace. Because of this he does not faint, or shrink from the duties this ministry brought upon him; he rather discharges them with frankness and courage, as opposed to some whose disgraceful underhanded ways (R.S.V.), craftiness and deceitful handling of the Word of God, played into Satan's hands. He knew, needless to say, that not all who hear the gospel respond to its claims. They hear with their ears, but that is as far as it goes. It does not touch their mind or conscience:

> "But and if our gospel is veiled, it is veiled in them that are perishing: in whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of the unbelieving, that the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, Who is the image of God, should not dawn upon them" (iv. 3, 4 R.V.).

Using a different type of language, the Lord in His earthly ministry taught the same thing, for out of four sowings of the Word of truth connected with the earthly kingdom only one was fruitful in the fullest sense. Here the Apostle Paul continues the figure of the veil which he has already used. One reason why the gospel is rejected is that Satan, the arch-deceiver, draws a veil over the minds of such so that they cannot 'see' properly or understand. The glory of Christ, which the gospel makes known, is hidden in this way and they continue to walk in spiritual darkness, however intellectually gifted they may be. The good news of man's salvation wrought out by the crucified and risen Christ is not only a deliverance from relentless bondage and a cleansing from guilt, but a rescue from blindness and darkness as well, as Col. i. 13 plainly teaches, and also this context. Only in this way can this mental and spiritual darkness be removed. Sinners have not sufficient ability or power to rescue themselves from such a terrible condition. Only the power of the risen Saviour can do this, as He is personally received and trusted:

> "For we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus as Lord, and ourselves as your servants for Jesus' sake. Seeing it is God, that said, Light shall shine out of darkness, Who shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (iv. 5, 6 R.V.).

The Apostle goes back in his mind to the Damascus road, on which the risen and glorified Christ met him, made him a new creation and completely changed his whole outlook and ways. The only adequate parallel reaches back to the beginning of creation when the same Lord Jesus, the Creator, commanded the light to shine out of darkness (Gen. i. 3). This therefore is repeated in the new creation, when He Who is the only Light of the world, the brightness of God's glory, shines into a darkened sinner's mind upon being savingly beheld by faith.

The knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ is the most treasured of all possessions. It is like an exquisite jewel, unique in its beauty. Literal jewels of beauty are usually encased in an equally lovely setting, but the opposite is found with this jewel of God, for He sets it in frail earthen vessels, men and women who are failing creatures, subject to infirmity and weakness. One thing this striking paradox makes clear is that the gospel is no product of human cleverness or lofty intellect, but is a revelation of God in His power and sovereign grace. He condescends in His great love and mercy to place this treasure in frail earthenware vessels to demonstrate, among other things, that His strength is made perfect in weakness (II Cor. xii. 9).

Paul now contrasts the often humiliating experiences he passes through as a faithful servant of Christ and minister of the gospel with the exceeding divine power that he finds to be all-sufficient in all circumstances. In the verses that follow, there are four pairs of present participles in an ascending scale, as it were. We find the climax to these testings in chapter xi. 16-28. In chapter iv. the Apostle states:

> "We are afflicted in every way, but not crashed; perplexed, but not driven to despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; struck down, but not destroyed; always carrying in the body the death of Jesus, so that the life of Jesus may also be manifested in our bodies" (iv. 8-10, R.S.V.).

It is difficult for any English translation to convey adequately the sense of the original Greek. Stenochoreomai literally means 'to be hemmed in'. "Straightened" (R.V.) comes nearer to the meaning of the word than 'distressed' (A.V.). The Twentieth Century New Testament renders it 'though hard-pressed on every side, we are never hemmed in' or Knox's paraphrase 'for ourselves, we are being hampered everywhere, yet still have room to breathe'. In spite of all restrictions, Paul still has room to move in his witness for Christ.

In the next statement there is a play on the words aporonmenoi and exaporonmenoi which is practically impossible to bring over into English. Perhaps 'hard put to it, but not put out' gets near to it. Then follows 'persecuted (or pursued or hunted) but not abandoned'. Paul is not abandoned to the enemy or left to his own frail resources. If he is persecuted in one place, he escapes safely to another, only to find fresh opportunities for witness as the record in the Acts makes quite clear.

Finally he states 'though struck down, never killed' (T.C.N.T.) or, as Charles William's translation 'always getting a knock down, but never a knock-out'. His experience at Lystra was a good example of this (Acts xiv. 19). Literally struck down by stones, it appeared as though he was finished, yet by the exceeding power of God he has mentioned, he stood up on his feet and continued his ministry, doubtless much to the surprise and dismay of his would-be murderers.

All this varied experience he sums up as follows:

> "Always bearing about in the body the dying of Jesus, that the life also of Jesus may be manifested in our body. For we which live are always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake, that the life also of Jesus may be manifested in our mortal flesh. So then death worketh in us, but life in you" (iv. 10-12 R.V.).

Paul, in a sense, was always under the sentence of death. "In deaths oft", he writes later on in the epistle (xi. 23). He could never be absolutely sure he would be alive on the morrow. In this he closely followed the Saviour in His earthly life, Who experienced the relentless hatred and persecution of His religious opponents right throughout His public ministry, who would have murdered Him before Calvary, if they could have done so. Note the fourfold use of the name 'Jesus' which is linked with the earthly life of the Son of God and is rarely used by the Apostle except in this connection, unlike Christians today who habitually refer to the Lord this way, unmindful apparently of the fact of His Deity and Lordship (John xiii. 13).

But if the Apostle experienced the 'dying of Jesus', he also experienced His risen life. In fact it was only this great power that enabled him to survive and triumph over all his difficulties. But even if he did give his life for Christ (and this was actually true later on when his work was completed and he had finished 'the race'), then there would be the certainty of resurrection to follow with a glorious presentation in the presence of God and eternal life to follow:

> "Knowing that He which raised up the Lord Jesus shall raise us up also with Jesus, and shall present us with you" (iv. 14 R.V.).

The grand truth of resurrection is going to dominate the section which follows right into chapter v. If this is not perceived, then the clue will have been lost to this wonderful passage with its reference to being 'clothed upon' that mortality may be swallowed up of (resurrection) life. 'All things', cries the Apostle, 'are for your sakes' and ultimately for the Lord's sake, because the more people who come to know the saving grace of God through the gospel Paul preached, the more there will be to render thanksgiving to Him and the greater the praise He will receive (verse 15).

In view of all this Paul does not faint or lose heart, even though his external self, his 'mortal flesh', is decaying, the 'inward man', the divine new nature, implanted in him at salvation by the Lord, 'is renewed day by day' (verse 16). This is a firstfruits of the glory yet to be and as he contemplates it, the Apostle's present sufferings and trials seem to fade away and be not worthy of comparison, so great is the glory lying ahead in resurrection. Viewed from any other angle, his sufferings would appear overwhelming and far from temporary. As Hodge remarks, 'it was only by bringing these sufferings into comparison with eternal glory that they dwindled into insignificance'.

> "For our light affliction, which is for the moment, worketh for us more and more exceedingly an eternal weight of glory: while we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal" (iv. 17, 18 R.V.).

In view of the heavy weight of glory, the present afflictions seem not only light, but very temporary. "While we look", are the important words. If our vision is in the wrong direction, then the present difficulties will doubtless appear overwhelming. If however we look to what God is keeping and reserving for us in the life to come, then they fade away to nothing. Paul uses tremendous language here. Hyperbole, 'exceeding' is used twice. He seems almost to exhaust language in this great crescendo of superlatives. We end with the translations of Goodspeed and Moffatt:

> "For this slight, momentary trouble is piling up for me an eternal blessedness beyond comparison, because I keep my eyes not on what is seen, but what is unseen. For what is seen is transitory, but what is unseen is eternal" (iv. 17, 18, E. J. Goodspeed).

> "The slight trouble of the passing hour results in a solid glory past all comparison, for those of us whose eyes are on the unseen, not on the seen; for the seen is transient, the unseen eternal" (iv. 17, 18, J. Moffatt).

No.5. v. 1 - 15.

After giving the magnificent testimony of II Cor. iv. 14-18 as to his triumph over his sufferings and trials as he considers the 'eternal weight of glory' that awaits him, the Apostle Paul goes on to develop this theme and to consider what it will involve if he is called upon to give his life for Christ and thus not be among those who are 'alive and remain to the coming of the Lord' (I Thess. iv. 15). He realizes that his human body is only a temporary structure like a tent, but however adequate for this earthly pilgrimage, it is not suitable for the glory yet to be, but will be dissolved after death. What follows then will be God's provision of a permanent 'house from heaven', the resurrection body, concerning which he had previously written to the Corinthian church in chapter xv. of the first canonical epistle.

> "For we know that if the earthly house of our tabernacle (tent) be dissolved, we have a building from God, a house not made with hands, eternal, in the heavens. For verily in this we groan, longing to be clothed upon with our habitation which is from heaven, if so be that being clothed we shall not be found naked. For indeed we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened; not for that we would be unclothed, but that we would be clothed upon, that what is mortal may be swallowed up of life" (v. 1-4 R.V.).

In Rom. viii. 23 he refers again to our present 'groaning with resurrection as deliverance', "For we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, the redemption of our body". Nothing can be clearer than that Paul dreaded the idea of any disembodied state and his statement in Phil. i. 23 must be interpreted in the light of Phil. iii. 11 and the context we are studying in II Corinthians. He could not think of a future life apart from resurrection. To be there apart from a body was like being naked, a condition from which he instinctively shrank.

The following quotation from Professor F. W. Beare is to the point:

> ". . . . . our minds are dominated, or at least profoundly affected by our Greek (essentially Platonic) inheritance, so that we think of immortality as the 'immortality of the soul' . . . . . we still feel that there is some essential part of our personality which alone is capable of immortality, and that part does not include the body . . . . . Paul was constitutionally incapable of thinking of life eternal in terms of a 'soul' existing in some disembodied state . . . . . A spiritual resurrection would to him be no resurrection at all; a disembodied existence would be no better than the shadowy and unsubstantial existence of a shade. He is therefore bound to express his hope of immortality in terms of attaining to the resurrection from the dead" (The Epistle to the Philippians, pp. 125, 126).

Also Professor F. F. Bruce:

> ". . . . . But if he (Paul) does (die), what will be the mode of his existence between death and resurrection? Must he endure some kind of disembodied state in the interval? To some people of a different tradition, disengagement from the shackles of the body was something infinitely desirable, but while Paul longed to be delivered from the present mortal body it was in order that he might exchange it for one that was immortal; to be > without a body of any kind would be a form of spiritual nakedness from which all his mind shrank" (1 and 2 Corinthians, p.200).

All this would be perfectly clear to Christians today if their minds were not clouded by tradition concerning the immortality of the soul and the idea that this part of each individual goes straight to heaven after death because it is immortal. It comes as something of a shock when the sincere Bible students finds this is not true. Specially as it is backed up by countless hymns which are sung in places of worship Sunday be Sunday. However we can say with certainty that in the revelation of the Word of God there is no life after death apart from resurrection and if we do not accept this then we can never understand the teaching of II Cor. v.

Redemption and Resurrection are the key to the final fulfillment of the purpose of God as it touches heaven and earth and this is central in the revelation of Christ as mediated through the ministry of the Apostle Paul. It is fundamental to the realization of hope whether in the Old Testament or the New. Paul contrasts the temporary dwelling in the body (likened to nothing more than a tent) with the permanent building, the resurrection body in the heavens. Its sole maker is God; no human hands have constructed it or played any part in its maintenance. It is indeed 'a building of God, a house not made with hands' (v. 1) and it is fashioned to suit the sphere of glory that God wills, and it lasts for ever. Even now while Paul 'sighed with anxiety' (groaned), owing to the burdens which he was continually bearing, this glorious future hope greatly strengthened and cheered him. It would then be true that 'mortality (death) would be swallowed up by life' (verse 4) thus bringing us to the same point as he makes in the great resurrection chapter of I Cor. xv. 53-55. Resurrection is the time when immortality is attained and not before. It is 'put on' then, and death at this point is annihilated for the believer. We may be sure that for such there is no consciousness of any interval between the dissolution of the 'tent' and the investiture of the permanent 'house from heaven' and as far as experience goes, this should be all that matters as far as the believer is concerned.

The Apostle goes on to assure us 'that He Who has prepared us for this very thing is God Himself' (v. 5), that is the endowment of immortal resurrection bodies. Further, He has given us the Spirit now as a guarantee ("Who gave us the earnest of the Spirit") that all this will one day be realized in glorious fact.

The result of all this is 'being always of good courage'. With such a wonderful goal in view despair could not enter, however great the present trials:

> "and knowing that, whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord (for we walk by faith, not by sight); we are of good courage, I say, and are willing rather to be absent from the body and to be at home with the Lord" (v. 6-8 R.V.).

It should be noted that the Apostle does not say (as is so often misquoted) 'to be absent from the body is to be present with the Lord', meaning in some disembodied state immediately at death. There are only two states envisaged by Paul here (1) being at home in the present body (2) being at home with the Lord in the resurrection body, and of the two it is the latter obviously that he 'considers good' (eudokeo, translated 'willing' A.V. and R.V.). To read traditional views into this passage, as is so often done, ruins the Apostle's argument. It is fatal to its understanding and is merely wishful thinking to prop up an idea that is considered to be 'orthodox'.

Paul, in contemplating the resurrection state, now stresses that among the first experiences will be for him to stand before the Lord's tribunal when He will assess his earthly service of what sort it is. The fact of this assessment for all believers he has already dealt with in the first Corinthian epistle (I Cor. iii. 10-15). With this in view he states that it has a profound effect upon his present life and outlook:

> "Wherefore also we make it our aim (literally 'we are ambitious') whether at home or absent, to be well-pleasing unto Him" (v. 9).

The thought of Christ as the righteous Judge (II Tim. iv. 8) was a profound stimulant to the Apostle, constantly urging him on to make all his thoughts and actions here and now conform to the Lord's approval and pleasure, for His final verdict is going to have eternal consequences.

> "For we must all be made manifest before the judgment-seat of Christ; that each one may receive the things done in the body, according to what he hath done, whether it be good or bad" (v. 10 R.V.).

Rom. xiv. 10 R.V. teaches similarly except that the phrase is the 'judgment-seat of God', which is a strong testimony to the Deity of Christ. All judgment has been committed to the Son (John v. 22-27) the One Who has added humanity to His Deity and so can judge men with absolute impartiality, whether it is unbelievers for their sins or believers for their service. The thought of this engenders awe and reverence in the Apostle. He therefore discharges his ministry with the fear or reverence of the Lord in view ('terror' in the A.V. is too strong. Believers have no need of being 'terrified' by the Lord). The Apostle's work is to preach the gospel faithfully and seek to persuade men, and in this he is transparently open to the Lord as he will be at His judgment seat in the future. He trusts the purity of his conduct is likewise recognized by his converts at Corinth (verse 11). At the same time he was not idly boasting, but with his critics in view, men who evidently did their best to belittle and undermine his witness, he gives the Corinthians material for a reply (verse 12).

Evidently these opposers did not hesitate to accuse Paul of being mad:

> "For whether we are beside ourselves, it is unto God; or whether we are of sober mind, it is unto you" (v. 13 R.V.).

The phrase 'we are beside ourselves' or 'are mad' could be a reference to the ecstatic revelations he refers to in chapter xii. which were being described as 'madness' by his enemies. This is for God to assess, declares the Apostle, not men—'it is unto God'. In his ministry to them he had passed on the message soberly and quietly which his opponents could not deny, and the great motive power behind it all was the love of Christ:

> "For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that One die for all, therefore all died; and He died for all, that they which live should no longer live unto themselves, but unto Him Who for their sakes died and rose again" (v. 14, 15 R.V.).

The Greek sunecho constrain, is used in Luke xii. 50 of the compulsion the Lord Jesus felt as He looked forward to the completion of His earthly work on the cross:

> "I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened (R.S.V. constrained) till it be accomplished."

Weymouth beautifully renders it 'overmasters us'. The overwhelming love of Christ Who gave His all for His people was so powerful an influence on the Apostle that he gladly gave himself in service for others, the only adequate way of expressing his love in return. We believe this is the only acceptable motive for Christian service. Do we do this because it appeals to us, or because we have been asked to do it, or perhaps because we want to please others? Not one of these motives is adequate. We should be able to say truthfully that we serve Him because we love Him. It is the only practical thing that we can do in response to His love for us which passeth knowledge' (Eph. iii. 19).

No.6. v. 14 - vi. 18.
pp. 141 - 146

Having stressed the love of Christ as the great motive for Christian service, the Apostle Paul continues:

> "For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that One died for all, therefore all died; and He died for all, that they which live should no longer live unto themselves, but unto Him Who for their sakes died and rose again" (v. 14, 15 R.V.).

The Lord Jesus has died as the representative of all His people and therefore by identification, all of them are reckoned to have died in the Person of their Representative. The second all has the article (hoi pantes) which shows that the reference is to the all for whom One has died. Just as the disobedience of Adam brought death and ruin to the old creation, so the life-giving death of the 'last Adam' brings a new existence, a new creation, so that those who live, (having died and risen with Christ) now belong to this new order and for them the old creation with its worldly standards has for ever passed away. The estimation concerning the Lord Jesus Christ and the estimation concerning other men has completely changed:

> "Wherefore we henceforth know no man after the flesh: even though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now we know Him so no more. Wherefore if any man is in Christ, he is a new creation (R.V. margin): the old things are passed away; behold, they are become new" (v. 16, 17 R.V.).

Paul is contrasting the standards and estimation of the old creation of unregeneracy with the entire new mental outlook of one who is truly saved and therefore can be designated by God as being in an entirely new sphere, namely in Christ. That is his standing by grace. For such a person the old life and its thinking and standards are finished. New things have come into being, namely those things pertaining to the new creation which is eternal and has God as its source. Paul's reckoning of Christ before conversion was distorted and wrong. He now no longer knows Him in this way 'after the flesh'. Nor for that matter does he estimate men after this fashion. He has God's view point and this alters and corrects his whole thinking and estimation.

> "All this is from God, Who through Christ reconciled us to Himself and gave us the ministry of reconciliation . . . . ." (v. 18 R.S.V.).

All things is ta panta, literally 'the all things', not all things without exception, and the R.S.V. translation rightly shows its defining power here. In the past some have used this phrase to teach that everything including sin comes from God, making Him the author of sin, but this is a gross abuse of what the Apostle has written. The Revised Standard Version is correct in its rendering "All this", namely the truth dealt with in the context, 'is from God', and He, says the Apostle, has given us the ministry of reconciliation. The Greek words translated 'reconcile' basically mean a change of outlook and condition. Reconciliation is only necessary where two parties are divided or at enmity. As far as God is concerned the enmity has been taken away by the death of Christ as the Representative and Head of the race. Adam's one offence involving all has been cancelled and from God's side there is now no barrier. Grace now reigns:

> "That as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. v. 21), and as this is so, Divine judgment for sin is held back. God is not now reckoning men's trespasses as a barrier between Himself and man. The Cross has broken this down and the enmity now is entirely on man's side. Before the effect of this great reconciling work can be the individual sinner's possession, this reconciliation must be personally received. Just as God's righteousness is 'unto all' without exception, it is only 'upon all them that believe' (Rom. iii. 22), so men are exhorted 'Be ye reconciled to God' (II Cor. v. 20) and true believers are those who have 'received the reconciliation' (Rom. v. 11 'Atonement' in the A.V. is literally in the old English of the A.V. 'at-one-ment' or in other words reconciliation).

Those who have not 'received the reconciliation' for themselves cannot claim redemption, salvation and all the glorious aspects of truth that are wrapped up in the redeeming work of the Son of God on the Cross and confirmed by His present risen life. They are still at enmity with God and remain so until their faith is placed in the risen Christ Who is able to save to the uttermost. Then the forgiveness, peace and power which flows from God's reconciling work becomes their own possession and experience. Never must we present the reconciliation provided through Christ as though it cancels the need for preaching the gospel of God's saving grace to lost sinners. The greatness and wonder of such a gospel is difficult to sum up but the Apostle has done it in a wonderful way in verse 21 R.S.V.:

> "For our sake He made Him (Christ) to be sin (or a sin-offering) for us, Who knew no sin, so that in Him we might become the righteousness of God."

The doctrine of the sinlessness of Christ from the cradle to the tomb is utterly essential to God's redemption. If the Lord Jesus had only sinned once, He would have needed a Saviour. He could not have been the Saviour of others. But in a way we can never fully appreciate, the Lord 'laid on Him the iniquity of us all' (Isa. liii. 6) and this is true, not only of Israel, but of all the Lord's people. There is a wonderful exchange here. Christ takes the believer's sins and receives the judgment of them in Himself, whereas the believer is given a righteous status before God, for it is nothing less than God's righteousness which is reckoned his as a free gift (Phil. iii. 9; Rom. iii. 22). Paul concludes this section relating to the ministry of reconciliation by saying:

> "And working together with Him we intreat also that ye receive not the grace of God in vain (for He saith, at an acceptable time I hearkened unto thee, and in a day of salvation did I succour thee; behold now is the acceptable time; behold, now is the day of salvation)" (vi. 1, 2 R.V.).

In using the plural 'we' here, the Apostle doubtless included other fellow-workers besides himself. In this glorious service men co-operate with God in making known the 'good news' and Paul underlines its urgency by quoting from Isa. xlix. 8. Men must avail themselves of the grace of God while the opportunity lasts, for the accepted time will not always be with us and we do well to bring this to the fore when we proclaim the gospel. The Apostle could do this with a good conscience, bearing in mind his opposers at Corinth who evidently had done their best to disparage his ministry and misunderstand his motives. There are always those who are glad of an excuse not to listen to the gospel and try to find one in the conduct of its ministers. But they could not truthfully do this with regard to the Apostle Paul. He could commend his service to them without boasting:

> ". . . . . but in everything commending ourselves, as ministers of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses, in stripes, in imprisonments, in tumults, in labours, in watchings, in fastings; in pureness, in knowledge, in longsuffering, in kindness, in the Holy Ghost, in love unfeigned, in the Word of truth, in the power of God; by the armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left, by glory and dishonour, by evil report and good report; as deceivers, and yet true; as unknown, and yet well known; as dying, and behold, we live; as chastened, and not killed; as sorrowful, yet always rejoicing; as poor, yet making many rich; as having nothing, and yet possessing all things" (vi. 4-10 R.V.).

What a defence! and what an eloquent list of the characteristics of a faithful servant of God! There are nine kinds of trials which divide into groups of three. In the first group there is general suffering, pressure physical and mental, hardships which could not be relieved, and frustrations on every hand. The second group deals with sufferings he endured at the hands of men (stripes, imprisonment, tumults). The third section gives us the qualities he sought to display in his Christian witness day by day, resulting in a series of antitheses which illustrate the way he was being maligned by his enemies. Sometimes he was praised, sometimes he was misrepresented. Sometimes he was flattered, sometimes he was harshly criticized, but whatever men's estimate of him was, he continues with his faithful service and witness for the truth committed to him. What an example to us all!

The Apostle's feelings must have been deeply stirred in writing this section—yet he has nothing but love for these Corinthians, even though some of them were doing their best to upset and grieve him:

> "O ye Corinthians, our mouth is open unto you, our heart is enlarged" (vi. 11).

Paul had written freely to them without constraint and his love and concern for them had grown. In return he asks that their regard for him should grow too (verses 12 & 13) and not be restricted (straitened). It would seem that this lack of response to him was largely because some of them had not separated themselves from pagan practices that existed all around them. Hence the Apostle goes on to warn them:

> "Be not unequally yoked with unbelievers: for what fellowship have righteousness and iniquity? or what communion hath light with darkness? And what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what portion hath a believer with an unbeliever? And what agreement hath a temple of God with idols? for we are a temple of the living God; even as God said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be My people. Wherefore come ye out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch no unclean thing; and I will receive you, and will be to you a Father, and ye shall be to Me sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty" (vi. 14-18 R.V.).

Do not become diversely yoked with unbelievers, says the Apostle. "Mismated" is the translated of the R.S.V. Any such tie is bound to pull the believer down. This of course applies to marriage, but it can go further and cover any close tie with the unsaved world. The amount of unhappiness and misery that has resulted from disobedience to this Divine command only the Lord knows. The wrecked homes, the unfruitful Christian life are a startling testimony to the truth and wisdom of this prohibition of the Lord, and yet many, alas, do not heed but choose to go their own way, deceiving themselves that somehow all will come right in the end.

Paul here gives five rhetorical questions introduced by the interrogative pronoun tis (what?) demanding a negative answer. He uses five synonyms, 'partnership' (metoche), 'fellowship' (koinonia), 'accord' (or harmony symphonesis), 'agreement' (sunkatathesis) and 'portion' (meris) and makes the contrast between righteousness and iniquity, light with darkness, Christ with Belial, the believer and the unbeliever, the temple of God with idols. Belial means 'worthless' or 'perdition' and is a title of Satan. The questions are followed by a series of quotations from the O.T. Such references as Lev. xi. 44; xxvi. 11, 12; Exod. xxv. 8; Ezek. xi. 20; xxxvi. 28; xxxvii. 27 should be consulted. The Corinthian believers are reminded that they are a sanctuary (temple) of a holy God and since He dwells among them, they must separate themselves from everything that is incompatible with His holiness. Only then can they experience God as a Father and know the intimacy, warmth and strength of such a close relationship.

No.7. vii. 1 - viii. 9.
pp. 161 - 165

Chapter vii. of this epistle is obviously carrying on the theme developed in the sixth chapter. The Apostle Paul had urged the Corinthians to separate themselves from all the pagan ways that surrounded them. This was practical sanctification and the gracious promise was made that if they did this God would be a Father to them with all the wonderful teaching that this close relationship implies.

> "Having therefore these promises, beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all defilement of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God" (vii. 1 R.V.).

"Perfecting holiness" on the surface seems impossible. How can holiness ever be improved? Epiteleo, perfecting, does not mean this, but 'to take to completion', to 'reach its goal' and this is achieved in the believer when the sanctification he has already in Christ (I Cor. i. 30) is made actual in practice. The present participle is used, teaching us that this must be a continual experience day by day.

The Apostle now goes back to his theme in vi. 11-13 and he urges them to 'open their hearts to him' (vii. 2). He has wronged no man or taken advantage of them and is prepared to die or live together with the believers at Corinth, so closely does he feel the tie to be between them. He expresses his confidence and pride in them and is overjoyed (verse 4), especially by reason of the good news Titus had brought of their renewed regard for him. Paul goes back to the memorable meeting with Titus in Macedonia, recorded in ii. 13. He recalls the restlessness which he felt before this meeting, his anxiety as to what was happening at Corinth, whether his enemies there were getting the upper hand, and then the wonderful relief that he felt when Titus was able to tell him that the Corinthians were repentant and keen to see him again and restore the happy fellowship they had previously enjoyed. Not only this but they mourned for their past behaviour (verses 5-7). In this way God comforted the Apostle and Titus too was comforted when he saw the complete change of heart at Corinth.

As Paul thought over this, he could now see that the painful letter he sent them (see introductory studies) had achieved its object, though he wondered at the time of writing whether it would produce this result or harden them still further against him. This painful letter, as we have shown, cannot be I Corinthians but must be an epistle that does not form part of inspired Scripture.

> "For even if I made you sorry with my letter, I do not regret it (though I did regret it), for I see that that letter grieved you, though only for a while. As it is, I rejoice, not because you were grieved, but because you were grieved into repenting; for you felt a godly grief, so that you suffered no loss through us. For godly grief produces a repentance that leads to salvation and brings no regret, but worldly grief produces death" (vii. 8-10 R.S.V.).

As it turned out, the severe letter which Paul felt forced to write them because of their conduct, had its desired effect. It produced repentance and a change in their attitude to himself, so the temporary pain was worth while. They were now anxious to clear themselves of the guilt in which they were involved and were ashamed at what had happened and were ready to mete out discipline to the offender. They had done the right thing at every point and were now guiltless in the matter. Not only had he been greatly encouraged by all this, but it had given Titus joy too and refreshed his spirit (verse 13). The Apostle had spoken highly of the Corinthians to Titus and their change of attitude had increased the affection of Titus for them. R. Knox translates 'he bears a most affectionate memory of you' (verses 14 & 15) for they had not received him disdainfully, but in fear and trembling had responded to his message. Consequently Paul had renewed confidence in them (16).

The subject of the collection for the poor saints at Jerusalem is now brought up. Something like a year had passed by since Paul last referred to it in I Cor. xvi. 1-4, and doubtless during this period of tension between him and the church, their interest in this offering had waned. The time was now propitious to remind them of this and the Apostle does so with care and tact, for he wanted this to be voluntary and not the result of any apostolic pressure. A long section of the epistle is devoted to this subject of Christian giving which serves as a guide to believers of all time.

Paul first of all refers to the example of the Macedonian churches in this respect:

> "Moreover, brethren, we make known to you the grace of God which hath been given in the churches of Macedonia, how that in much proof of affliction the abundance of their joy and their deep poverty abounded unto the riches of their liberality. For according to their power, I bear witness, yea and beyond their power, they gave of their own accord . . . . . but first they gave their own selves to the Lord, and to us by the will of God" (viii. 1-5 R.V.).

These churches were at Philippi, Thessalonica and Berea. We note that before making any money gift to the Lord's work, they first gave themselves to Him. Redemption by grace means we are not our own, 'we are bought with a price', but how easy it is to cheat the Buyer of His property and not continually yield ourselves to Him! He first wants us, before our money, and then He is pleased to use what we possess and joyously give Him as an expression of our love and obedience. Let us remember it is easier to give a sum of money to the Lord than to give ourselves!

Secondly, they gave joyfully and willingly, not by compulsion, but because they evidently loved the Lord Who had given His all for them. Thirdly, they didn't wait till times were easy before they gave, rather the opposite. Paul reminded the Corinthians that these churches were going through affliction and much difficulty. I Thess. i. 6 & ii. 14 record the suffering of the Thessalonians and Paul had himself received persecution at Philippi (Acts xvi. 20) and at Thessalonica (Acts xvii. 5). Fourthly, none of these were wealthy churches. The Apostle talks of their deep poverty (II Cor. viii. 2).

Taking all things into consideration, one might have excused these assemblies from making a money gift or only perhaps giving a small one. Not so, for Paul refers to the riches of their liberality, for they had given beyond their power. The greater their poverty, the greater their liberality seemed to be and furthermore they begged earnestly for the favour (grace) of taking part (fellowship) in this service for the Lord and His people. Professor R. V. G. Tasker points out that the Macedonian's poverty was partly due to the harsh treatment they had received from their Roman conquerors, who had exploited the rich natural resources of their land, and partly to the succession of civil wars which had been fought on their soil before Augustus became sole emperor.

But none of this was made as an excuse for not contributing to the gift for the impoverished Jerusalem saints. It was a case of the poor giving to the poor! and what an example this must have been to the Corinthian church and should be to us today also. Plummer's comment is apt here, 'the crowning point of their generosity was their complete self-surrender'.

Paul trusts that this will act as a stimulus to the Corinthians to complete their gift and accordingly he plans to send Titus to help them with the final stages of their donation (verse 6). He had asked them in I Cor. xvi. 2 to set aside their money gift systematically once a week, its size being decided by the way the Lord had prospered each one. It is significant that no actual sum is mentioned here or anywhere else in the N.T. In the O.T. dispensation the Lord had commanded that one tenth (the tithe) should be given to Him. In this present age of the abounding grace of God and the riches He has showered on us in Christ, we might ask ourselves, can we give less? This is for each child of God to decide, but the context we are studying assures us that 'God loves a cheerful giver' and he that gives to the Lord bountifully reaps a bountiful harvest of blessing, whereas the mean Christian can only receive back 'sparingly'. In any case, a mean believer is a contradiction in terms (II Cor. ix. 6-10).

The Apostle Paul assumes that the weekly giving of the Corinthians had been kept up and all that needed to be done was a final liberal gift to complete the sum. He reminds them that they abounded in spiritual gifts. Let them show themselves to be possessed also of the gift of liberality (viii. 7). Let them also remind themselves of the Lord Jesus Christ.

> "For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though He was rich, yet for our sakes He became poor, that ye through His poverty might be rich" (viii. 9 R.V.).

Can we ever assess what it meant to the Lord Jesus to leave all the supreme riches connected with His Godhead and to stoop down to this poverty-stricken human life, so much so that He hadn't enough money to pay His tax! (Matt. xvii. 25-27) nor even anywhere to lay His head (Luke ix. 58). He died without a single soldiers carrying out His execution! And He willingly submitted to this deep poverty for our sakes, so that we might be made eternally rich beyond all comprehension!

With all this (and more) in view, surely the Corinthians did not need any command to give. It was a joyous privilege so to do and we should realize that it still is for each one of us today. It should be hardly necessary to say that Christian giving in the N.T. was without any material return in the way of entertainment. When one looks around on modern Christendom and sees the whist drives, dances, etc. arranged in order to raise funds for Christian work, one is appalled and realizes that those who do these things can have absolutely no conception of the truth of the wonderful context we are studying. If a believer wants something back for his gift to the Lord—he had better not give it in the first place, for in any case it ceases to be a gift to Him.

Paul now gives his Christian advice (judgment) to the Corinthian church. They had been among the first to start a collection among themselves a year before. Let them now complete it. It was vitally important that they should have a willing mind (readiness R.V.) for without this, giving is of no value. The amount must be decided by their financial resources (verses 10-12).

It was a question of proportion rather than a fixed sum. On the surface the widow's two mites looked a very mean gift to put into the treasury. But, said the Lord Jesus, "she hath cast more in than all they which have cast into the treasury; for all they did cast in of their abundance, but she of her want did cast in all that she had, even all her living" (Mark xii. 43, 44). In this gift, small though it was, she had given everything she had, and the Lord who watched the donors took note of this. We should remind ourselves that He still does. God is never in any man's debt and the blessing that generous believers receive from Him outweighs all their giving, and in any case, as we have seen, all that we have is really His, and this includes our money. Let us constantly avail ourselves of the privilege of giving generously to the Lord Who has bought us by His supreme love and grace.

No.8. viii. 10 - x. 11.

We are examining the section of the epistle, namely chapters viii. and ix., which deals with the question of Christian giving in terms of money. The Corinthian church amongst others had started making a collection for the poor saints at Jerusalem, but somehow the work had got held up and now the Apostle Paul urges them to complete the task. He tells them that Titus would visit them to finalize this, together with two other unnamed brethren (verses 18 & 22). Titus did not need any urging to go. He had already conceived deep affection for the believers at Corinth on his previous visit (verse 17).

Who are the two brothers whom Paul does not name? The fact that he does not name them means that we cannot know them for certain, but both were well known to the various assemblies. The former one the Apostle says his 'praise in the gospel is spread through all the churches' (18) and of the latter, 'we have many times proved earnest in many things' (22). They were obviously two faithful and earnest Christians who could be relied on to handle possibly a large sum of money. Note Paul's wisdom in appointing two men where money was concerned, to avoid any adverse criticism of misappropriation, for doubtless there were critics of him at Corinth who would have loved to have been able to level such a charge against him.

Some have thought that the former brother mentioned was Luke. This was Origen's opinion, but it largely rests on taking the word 'gospel' as meaning the Gospel of Luke. It is very doubtful indeed whether this Gospel was in circulation at this time and it is better in matters like this not to guess. That this brother was a well-known preacher of the gospel is the evident meaning. We do not know who these brethren were, but the churches most certainly did and we must leave it at that. They, together with Titus, were messengers of the churches and because of their worthy walk, were reflecting the glory of Christ (verse 23) and so Paul exhorts the Corinthians to show to them the genuineness of their Christian love.

Some have thought the beginning of chapter ix. to be somewhat awkward as though a new subject was being introduced, whereas it is the same theme of Christian giving that is continued. But peri men gar ('for') links it to what has gone before. Paul states that it is superfluous for him to repeat what he has already told them. He had praised them to the Macedonian churches, saying that Achaia, the Roman province that included Corinth, had been ready a year ago. There is a difficulty here for it looks as though the Apostle was going beyond what was true. But Professor R. V. Tasker points out that parakeuastai ('were ready') should be taken as a perfect middle rather than a perfect passive, in which case the sense would be 'was prepared' and apo perusi can mean 'last year' rather than 'a year ago' (Moulton and Milligan). Thus the difficulty vanishes.

Paul was not only sending the brethren to help with the completion of their gift, but also so that his commendation of them to the Macedonian churches would not be falsified. It would have been embarrassing, to say the least, had the Corinthians failed with their donation after such praise (ix. 3, 4). They should therefore complete their gift (bounty, literally blessing, eulogia). This willing gift would be a concrete blessing to others in need at Jerusalem. It must be a spontaneous gift of real generosity, not by compulsion, otherwise it would lose all its benefit as far as the donors were concerned (ix. 5).

Paul now goes on to describe the blessings that rest upon the generous giver to the Lord, for let us remind ourselves that our giving is first of all to Him and no one need feel fear of destitution who gives in this way, for the Lord is able to give back in return out of all proportion to the gift we give Him. Farming is often used in Scriptures to illustrate spiritual truths, and here the Apostle states:

> "He that soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he that soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully. Let each man do according as he hath purposed in his heart; not grudgingly, or of necessity, for God loveth a cheerful giver" (ix. 6, 7 R.V.).

A number of passages in the O.T. confirm this. Prov. xi. 24, 25 reads:

> "There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty. The liberal soul shall be made fat: and he that watereth shall be watered also himself."

The LXX reads ‘every liberal soul receives a blessing’. One of the sayings of the Lord Jesus was ‘Give, and it shall be given unto you’ (Luke vi. 38). As we have seen, this must not be done grudgingly or by compulsion, as either of these motives will spoil the gift. It is a cheerful and willing giver that God loves, and here Paul quotes from the LXX of Prov. xxii. 9, “God blesses a man who is cheerful and a giver”. One is reminded of the attitude of David with his gifts for the Lord’s house described in IChron.xxix. and note verses 14 and 17. Such giving delights the Lord’s heart and in return He multiplies grace and blessing to the donor (II Cor. ix. 8). The Apostle again quotes from the O.T., namely Psa. cxii. 9 concerning the man that fears the Lord and delights greatly in His commandments (verse 1). God will certainly enrich the generous giver so that he will have the opportunity of further giving which will lead to further thanksgiving to the Lord on the part of the recipients.

Not only this, but the love of those who receive the gift will increase towards the givers as they consider the liberality of the contribution made, and this would stimulate their prayerful remembrance of the Corinthians (ix. 13 and 14) for the exceeding grace of God which has worked in them to make this practical expression of their generosity and unselfishness.

The last thought on the subject expressed by Paul is:

> “Thanks be to God for His unspeakable Gift” (ix. 15).

The Father’s gift of His beloved Son is the greatest of all gifts and when one contemplates the wonder and fullness of this, who can give in a niggardly way? Every time we support the Lord’s work and witness with our gifts of money, the Gift of all gifts should be constantly before our minds.

The Apostle Paul now changes the subject and deals with his personal ministry and the opposing minority at Corinth who constantly criticized him. They evidently accused him of being lowly or humble when with them face to face, but bold (‘of good courage’) when at a distance writing letters to them. But he followed One Who was ‘meek and lowly at heart’ (Matt. xi. 29) and so he ever sought to walk in this spirit, but if they did not realize this but opposed his apostolic authority, then he would be forced to adopt a different attitude. Paul was always reluctant to use severity, so he appeals to those who were confounding his gentleness with timidity to so behave that he may not have to deal with them severely in person when he visited Corinth. They may say that he was walking ‘according to the flesh’ (x. 3) but he forcibly reminds them:

> “. . . . . we do not war according to the flesh (for the weapons of our warfare are not of the flesh, but mighty before God to the casting down of strong holds); casting down imaginations, and every high thing that is exalted against the knowledge of God, and bringing every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christ” (x. 3b, 4, 5 R.V.).

The Christian warfare is a spiritual one and not with flesh and blood (Eph. vi. 12), and carnal weapons are utterly useless here. Human cleverness, eloquent speech, organizing ability and propaganda are absolutely unavailing in the task of pulling down the strongholds where Satan and evil are entrenched. Nothing less than the sword of the Spirit which is the Word of God, is needed here to overthrow all that exalts itself against the knowledge of God, and to bring it into captivity and obedience to Christ.

If entreaty is ineffective, the Apostle is ready to use his apostolic authority bestowed by the risen Christ when every disobedience would be dealt with and punished. Verse 7 is rendered as a question in the A.V. and a fact in the R.V. Either is permissible from the Greek and the verb can be either imperative or indicative, so three translations are possible: 'look on', 'you look on' or 'do you look on?'. "The things that are before your face" means things after the outward appearance. The Apostle apparently is reprimanding those who were judging merely by external appearance without going any deeper. His opponents claimed to have the authority of Christ; so did he likewise, for it was by special revelation that he had received the gospel of grace (Gal. i. 11, 12).

Even if he was to boast of his apostolic commission he could do so without shame or exaggeration:

> "For though I should glory somewhat abundantly concerning our authority (which the Lord gave for building you up, and not for casting you down), I shall not be put to shame" (x. 8 R.V.).

Yet he did not wish to terrify them by his letters. Even his enemies had to admit that his letters were weighty and strong, even if his bodily presence was weak and his speech of no account (x. 9 and 10). And this characteristic of his epistles has been admitted ever since by all those who have seriously considered them. Where his detractors at Corinth made a mistake was in assuming that the Apostle could not act with the same vigour and directness when he was personally with them. He warns such:

> "Let such a one reckon this, that, what we are in word by letters when we are absent, such are we also in deed when we are present" (x. 11 R.V.).

These people commended themselves, measuring themselves with themselves, making their own standards, and exalting themselves in their own estimation and conceit. "Self-praise is no recommendation", but some of the Corinthians were doing it unashamedly and were therefore without true understanding (x. 12 R.V.). If Paul is going to boast about his apostolic achievements, he will keep it within well-defined limits, that is, the sphere appointed to him by Christ as the minister of the gospel of the uncircumcision. This principle had been recognized by Peter, James and John at Jerusalem (Gal. ii. 9) and the Apostle never built on another's foundation or intruded into someone else's sphere of witness (Rom. xv. 20).

In other words he was a pioneer missionary to the Gentiles and therefore Corinth came within his bounds, for he was the first to preach the gospel there, and it was predominantly a Gentile church. In view of this the false apostles were ministering at Corinth merely with the position they had arrogated to themselves.

No.9. x. 12 - xi. 11.

The Apostle Paul has been stressing the province for service marked out for him by the risen Lord, which, as the Apostle of the Gentiles, he would not exceed or encroach into another's territory. This sphere, of course, included Corinth where the church had been founded by his faithful pioneering preaching of the gospel. His opponents there were interlopers. They had no right to interfere and they came with no commendation but their own. Yet there were some at Corinth who were listening to them! Paul, however, looks to the future and the possibility that Corinth may be a base for the extension of the gospel witness to lands beyond (II Cor. x. 15, 16). He does not specify these places, but doubtless they would include other parts of the Balkan peninsula, and after this Rome and even Spain (Rom. xv. 24, 28). He had no need to boast in another man's labours or sphere (II Cor. x. 16). The only true ground of boasting was the Lord Jesus and what He had done through His servants: "He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord" (quoting from Jer. ix. 24).

One remembers that when Paul and Barnabas returned from the first missionary journey, they rehearsed to the church at Antioch, not what they had done, but "all that God had done with them and how He had opened the door of faith unto the Gentiles" (Acts xiv. 27) and when Paul wrote to the Roman Church he said concerning his ministry:

> "I have therefore my glorying in Christ Jesus in things pertaining to God. For I will not dare to speak of any things save those which Christ wrought through me, for the obedience of the Gentiles, by word and deed, in the power of signs and wonders, in the power of the Holy Ghost" (Rom. xv. 17, 18 R.V.).

In chapter xi. the Apostle comes closer to the problem that the false apostles at Corinth were making. They did not hesitate to parade their so-called credentials and were obviously influencing some in the church. Because of this and Paul's great concern for the believers there, he is forced to do something he would have rather avoided and that is to indulge in what was apparently self-commendation, the thing he had just condemned! "A little foolishness" he called it, but so much was at stake that he is compelled to compare his own true apostleship with the false apostleship of his opponents.

His motive was a godly jealousy (xi. 2) such as God Himself had for the people of Israel in the O.T., this nation standing towards Him in the relationship of a wife to a husband. His yearning over them, especially when they went after other 'lovers', is described in many O.T. passages, and it is this same intense feeling that Paul had for the Corinthian church:

> "For I am jealous over you with a godly jealousy: for I have espoused you to one Husband, that I may present you as a pure virgin to Christ" (xi. 2 R.V.).

If the nation of Israel was looked upon as the faithless wife of Jehovah, the Bride represents the faithful remnant that remained true to the Lord all through; such, from faithful Abraham onwards, looked forward by faith to the better country linked with the heavenly Jerusalem whose destiny is the new earth (Rev. iii. 12; xxi. 2, 10) and this city is the Bride of the Lamb (Rev. xxi. 2, 9). This sphere would include the faithful and those that went on to perfection (Heb. vi. 1) in the Acts period, and those who are tested and found faithful on the future Day of the Lord, and it was Paul's great aim that those to whom he ministered, including the believers at Corinth, should be included in this favoured company. It is important to grasp that the heavenly city is a reward sphere for overcomers in Israel and those Gentiles linked with Israel. There is, therefore, no need to confuse this with the later revelation of the "Joint Body" of Christ, yet to be blessed with Christ in the heavenlies, 'far above all'.

Paul's godly concern for these Corinthian believers made him fear:

> "But I fear, lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve in his craftiness, your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity and the purity that is toward Christ" (xi. 3 R.V.).

This fear centred in the possibility of 'another Jesus' being presented to them by his enemies, together with 'another gospel' and 'a different spirit' to what they originally received. Here is Satan with his most deceptive wiles, the 'angel of light', preaching a 'Jesus' and a 'gospel' which, although appearing to be right on the surface, is false to the core and has one object, to oust the Christ of the New Testament from His rightful place as the only Saviour and Lord. And we can be sure of one thing, this activity of Satan has been going on in Christendom in this same way ever since.

Every professing Christian movement must of necessity bring in Christ, but we should ask ourselves in all seriousness, is it the Christ of the Scriptures, the holy Word of God, or the Christ of men's imagination? Too often, alas, it is the latter, and undiscriminating listeners, who keep the Book shut, are easily deceived into thinking that the Christ they hear about and profess to follow is the Lord Jesus Christ of the New Testament! False Christs today are being proclaimed everywhere from pulpits and platforms just as the Lord Jesus predicted would be one of the characteristics of the 'end of the age' with its Satanic deception (Matt. xxiv. 4, 5, 11, 24, 25). Never was there more need for all to test what they hear over the radio or television or in the churches, with the Word of God.

We should beware too of the use of the word 'gospel'. Like the word 'democracy', it can mean anything the user cares to make it mean. Every church or chapel today professes to 'preach the gospel', but how often is it the true gospel which Paul stated he had received 'by the revelation of Jesus Christ'? (Gal. i. 11, 12). To the Galatian churches he complained some were being 'removed from Him that called you into the grace of Christ unto another gospel: which is not another; but there be some that trouble you, and would pervert the gospel of Christ' (Gal. i. 6, 7), and this is still going on around us. There never was such a time of world-wide confusion and deception, and we should remember that the Saviour warned that the ultimate object was, if possible, 'to deceive the very elect' (Matt. xxiv. 24), and to do this what is put forward must look like the real thing, so let us be alert to this all the time.

Such corruption of the truth was being foisted upon the Corinthian church by the false apostles and no wonder the Apostle Paul was concerned lest their minds should be beguiled as Eve's was when she listened to the voice of the serpent (xi. 30).

> "For if he that cometh preacheth another Jesus, whom we did not preach, or if ye receive a different spirit, which ye did not receive, or a different gospel, which ye did not accept, ye do well to bear with him" (xi. 4 R.V.).

It should be pointed out that both the A.V. and R.V. in the last phrase of verse 4 miss the point and actually give the impression that the Corinthians would be doing a good things to tolerate these false teachers with their deception! "Ye might well bear with him" A.V., "Ye do well to bear with him" R.V. The R.S.V. gives the true sense, "You submit to it readily enough" and this was tragic, after they had received the Truth as ministered so faithfully to them by the Apostle Paul. To listen to and bear with such impostors was to be misled and dominated by them. Paul could say with truth:

> "For I reckon I am not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles" (xi. 5 R.V.).

Who are these superlative apostles? There are two explanations. (1) They are the leaders of the Jerusalem assembly, Peter, James and John. (2) They refer to the false apostles at Corinth whose conceit arrogated to themselves the position of the most important apostles, and Paul is referring in irony to them. It is not easy to decide which is the more likely to be true. If the reference concerns the Jerusalem apostles, then it is his opponents' portrayal of them that he is criticizing, i.e., they were asserting that Paul's apostleship could not compare with the leaders at Jerusalem. The Apostle is certainly not directly criticizing the latter's position or witness. We do know that, when his own ministry was being considered at Jerusalem as recorded in Gal. ii., he referred to Peter, James and John as those who 'seemed to be somewhat' (Gal. ii. 6), but here the burning question of his own apostleship was at stake at the very beginning, and there could be no compromise with 'those who came in privily to spy out our liberty which we have in Christ Jesus' who evidently associated themselves with the Jerusalem leaders, and probably asserted that their apostleship was greater than Paul's.

Again, such language as the 'very chiefest apostles' could hardly apply to anyone but them. Whatever is the true interpretation here, one thing is certain, namely, Paul's apostleship was the equal of any other and quite independent of them. He owed nothing to human leaders as far as his Apostleship goes. The threefold stress 'not of men, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ' (Gal. i. 1, 11, 12, 16, 17) shows this quite clearly, and he now demonstrates this truth in the passage with which we are dealing.

Another important point to note is that the quality of his divine calling did not depend on the ability to speak fluently and persuasively:

> "But though I be unskilled (rude) in speech, yet am I not in knowledge" (xi. 6), and moreover he had already written to the Corinthian church, giving his reasons for avoiding mere oratory, so that their faith should stand in God and not the human ability of any speaker (I Cor. ii. 4, 5). No one could deny the Apostle's deep knowledge of the Truth. By this time this should have been abundantly plain.

Another thing that still rankled with some was the fact that he refused to accept material support from them, though he had done so from other churches. The reason for this he had made clear in I Cor. ix. He would not be beholden to them in any way, though, as this chapter clearly shows, he had the right to do so as an apostle. By not doing so he appeared to 'abase himself' in this capacity (II Cor. xi. 7). Had he received material gifts, it would surely have been misrepresented by his critics and the last thing he wished was to appear to be sponging on them. Consequently he supported himself by tent-making (Acts xviii. 3) when he was at Corinth.

In this way he did not burden anyone there, though it might have seemed on the surface as 'robbery' to accept money support from other churches (xi. 8). His needs were supplied by brethren from the Macedonian churches (xi. 9). The reason for his independent spirit in connection with the Corinthian church was certainly not due to lack of love (xi. 9-11). God was his witness to that. Rather, as we have seen, it was to give no opportunity for his enemies, the false apostles, to have any grounds for accusation and criticism. The Apostle Paul was a wise man. He had learned to do what he had exhorted others to do, to walk in wisdom, even if this was at considerable cost to himself.

No.10. xi. 12 - 29.
pp. 226 - 231

Continuing our study of the eleventh chapter of II Corinthians, we are dealing with the section where the Apostle Paul, owing to misrepresentation on the part of his critics at Corinth, was forced to stress the superlative nature of his Christ-given apostleship, although this was very distasteful to him as it appeared to be self-praise. He had refused material support from the church and earned his own living by tent-making when he was with them. As he explains, this was not because he was too proud to receive such support, but rather because he would not give his opponents any opportunity to accuse him of making money out of them.

He now speaks of them in scathing terms:

> "And I shall go on doing as I am doing now, to cut the ground from under those who would seize any chance to put their vaunted apostleship on the same level as ours. Such men are sham apostles, crooked in all their practices, masquerading as apostles of Christ. There is nothing surprising about that; Satan himself masquerades as an angel of light. It is therefore a simple thing for his agents to masquerade as agents of good" (xi. 12-15, N.E.B.).

Satan goes about as a roaring lion 'seeking whom he may devour' Peter tells us (IPet.v.8). But more dangerous still is when he comes disguised as an angel of light and poses as a minister of truth! And never let us forget that he quotes the Bible when it suits his purpose (Matt. iv. 6). In fact, he knows the Word of God much better than many Christians and so do his ministers. These can be outwardly good living people with a show of righteousness, but underneath, they, like their master, are deceivers and one day will receive their just due from God. We need to be constantly on our guard lest we are carried away by any such deception, which alas, is everywhere around us today.

Paul now returns to his so-called 'boasting'. With a little irony he tells the Corinthians that they bear with fools, as they are so wise themselves (xi. 19). Not only this, but some of them were putting up with those who enslaved them and took advantage of them:

> "For you bear it if a man makes slaves of you, or preys upon you, or takes advantage of you, or puts on airs, or strikes you in the face" (xi. 20 R.S.V.).

If they went so far as this, surely they could tolerate the Apostle when he indulged in a little boasting! He compares himself with the false apostles at Corinth, showing in every way he exceeded all their personal claims:

> "But whatever any one dares to boast of—I am speaking as a fool—I also dare to boast of that. Are they Hebrews? So am I. Are they Israelites? So am I. Are they descendants of Abraham? So am I. Are they servants of Christ? I am a better one—I am talking like a madman—with far greater honours, far more imprisonments, with countless beatings and often near death. Five times I have received at the hands of the Jews the forty lashes less one. Three times I have been beaten with rods; once I was stoned. Three times I have been shipwrecked; a night and a day I have been adrift at sea; on frequent journeys, in danger from rivers, danger from robbers, danger from my own people, danger from Gentiles, danger in the city, danger in the wilderness, danger at sea, danger from false brethren; in toil and hardship, through many a sleepless night, in hunger and thirst, often without food, in cold and exposure. And, apart from other things, there is the daily pressure upon me of my anxiety for all the churches" (xi. 21-28, R.S.V.).

What a list of suffering and testing! Apart from the Son of God, did anyone ever approach this man in the cost that he willingly paid as a faithful servant of Christ? If his critics at Corinth had any spark of decency in them, they ought to have felt ashamed when they read these words. And when we read them today, do they not make us feel that we have hardly started to suffer for Christ yet, no matter what we have experienced? Every one of these statements is true without exaggeration and Paul calls God to witness to this fact (xi. 31).

The Corinthian troublemakers evidently boasted of their descent. Were they Hebrews? So was he; in fact he could call himself 'a Hebrew of the Hebrews' (Phil. iii. 5). A distinction is made in Acts vi. 1 where 'Grecians' are Jews of Greek language and culture and Hebrews who were Palestinian in origin and could speak Aramaic as Paul did in dealing with the crowd at Jerusalem recorded in Acts xxi. 40.

To be an Israelite was to claim a title of privilege, for Israel were a people chosen by God for His own peculiar possession to be guardians of His law, and to represent Him to the outside world. Paul was also a descendant of Abraham and not merely physically so 'in Israel', but spiritually, a distinction the letter to the Romans was to make abundantly clear (Rom. ix. 7). But coming to service for Christ, he leaves claims of birth for achievement and here, comparison with other servants of Christ appears to be self-aggrandizement and the utterance of someone out of his senses. However, he is forced to do it by his enemies' belittling of his apostolic status and witness.

Comparing with his detractors, Paul could say that he had undertaken more arduous campaigns in advancing the gospel (labours more abundant). He had suffered excessive corporal punishment, such as they had never endured. He had been imprisoned more frequently. Up to the writing of II Corinthians we only have the record of one imprisonment, i.e. at Philippi (Acts xvi.). Clement of Rome, writing in 96A.D. asserts that Paul was cast into prison seven times. Some modern scholars believe he was in prison at Ephesus during his stay recorded in Acts xix.

Five times he received the severe beatings by the Jews which were allowed under the law (Deut. xxv. 1-3). To assure that the maximum number of stripes was not exceeded ('forty' 40) it was ordained that this was limited to 39, a lash containing three thongs being used. Possibly from these beatings Paul nearly died ('in deaths oft'). Three times he was thrashed by the Roman authorities, one of these being at Philippi when he and Silas were beaten by the lictors' rods (Acts xvi. 22), although as a Roman citizen this was illegal. This was another experience of severe pain.

Once he was stoned and left for dead. This was at Lystra (Acts xiv. 19). Paul's experience of shipwreck must have been before the one described in Acts xxvii. on his way to Rome. A day and a night he was adrift at sea, possibly clinging to a fragment of a wreck. His travels were mostly dangerous owing to the brigands who infested the roads. Dangers from his own people, the Jews, from the Gentiles and in the city are graphically portrayed in the Acts of the Apostles. Perhaps the most bitter for the Apostle was 'danger from false brethren'. Open enmity outside is bad enough, but treachery within is worse and this has occurred right through the history of Christendom, starting with Judas among the original apostles.

On top of all this there was weariness and painfulness ('toil and hardship' R.S.V.) possibly referring to his manual labour, sleepless nights, through such experiences, hunger and thirst often, and as a climax, the burden and responsibility of all the churches, not just the one at Corinth, with their subversive doctrines, internal discord and unChristlike behaviour. What a weight to carry! "A daily pressure" Paul calls it and, but for the mighty enabling grace of God, he must have succumbed to it all long before this. In spite of everything, he was in sympathetic touch with all the churches' problems:

> "Who is weak and I am not weak? Who is made to stumble and I burn not?" (xi. 29 R.V.).

The Apostle could feel the weakness of some as though it was his own and he burned with indignation when others thoughtlessly upset a weaker believer by bad example and treatment.

This record of what it cost the Apostle Paul to follow his risen Lord faithfully seems incredible. Was ever a human experience like it? He solemnly states that God could vouch for the fact that it was all true in every detail (xi. 31). We should compare similar assertions in Gal. i. 20; Rom. ix. 1 and I Tim. ii. 7. The section is ended by narrating his escape from King Aretas at Damascus (Acts ix. 23-25) soon after his conversion. Aretas was a title for Arabian kings like 'Pharaoh' was used in Egypt. This king reigned over Nabataea, between the Red Sea and the Euphrates, from B.C.9 to 40A.D. He was father-in-law to Herod Antipas, the tetrarch of Galilee at the time of the earthly ministry of Christ. Paul had evidently incurred the enmity of this Aretas and that, together with the enmity of the Jews, caused him to make this dramatic escape through a little door or window in the city wall, through which he was lowered in a basket. This indeed was a foretaste of the great suffering and trials yet to come.

In dealing with his Corinthian enemies Paul now passes on to visions and revelations. They, too, possibly claimed to have received visions and once again the Apostle shows that in this respect, as in all others, he was their superior. Or they could have belittled his apostleship because it was based on a vision. The record of the Acts makes it clear that Paul received a number of visions of the risen Lord for imparting truth to him and guiding him in his ministry, commencing with the dramatic confrontation on the road to Damascus. Acts xviii. 9 records one at Corinth, another at Jerusalem during his last visit there (Acts xxiii. 11), another on the voyage to Rome (Acts xxvii. 23). See also Acts ix. 12 & xvi. 9 and note the promise of a future appearing of the Lord to him in Acts xxvi. 16 with further truth.

From these records we can see that the Apostle experienced a number of visions of and concerning the Lord Jesus Christ. He now speaks of himself impersonally, possibly to avoid the appearance of further boasting, very similar to the way in which the Apostle John in the fourth Gospel refers to himself as 'the disciple whom Jesus loved'. It has been suggested that Paul is not speaking of a revelationary experience of his in this context, but refers to the vision that John was given which is recorded in the Revelation concerning Paradise. But we should ask ourselves, in what sense does this fit the context which deals with Paul's vindication of his ministry and the spurious claims of the false teachers at Corinth? Paul was at pains to show that his experiences of Divine visions were far superior to any his opponents could claim to have had. The fact that John had a similar revelation does not touch the point at issue. Nor can it be proved that John was the only believer who was ever granted such a revelation. Abraham and those who followed in his steps of overcoming faith, saw the vision of the heavenly Jerusalem and country that John describes (Heb. xi. 8-10, 13-16) and for this they were willing to be strangers and pilgrims and forego much here and now.

Moreover, to keep Paul from becoming too elated and proud because of the abundance of the revelations which he had received concerning Paradise, the Lord gave the Apostle the counter-balancing ‘thorn in the flesh’. When he talks about the ‘abundance of the revelations’ he is surely speaking of his own experience, not that of the Apostle John. It would be difficult to understand why Paul should receive a thorn in the flesh because John had had an abundant revelation!

We therefore believe that in chapter xii. the Apostle is recounting his own great visionary experience in a modest manner. Let us not forget he states he will now pass on to visions and revelations of the Lord and the context is still that of dealing with his Corinthian opponents in connection with whom he has clearly shown he is infinitely superior in service and suffering.

No.2(?). "From glory to glory."

pp. 1 - 5

The figure of the veil, which covered the face of Moses, and which prevented Israel from perceiving the truth when they read the Old Covenant, is carried in II Cor. iii 18 and iv. 3, 4 by the Apostle, but because the A.V. reads 'open' face, and 'hid', the reader is not so conscious that the figure persists.

There are a number of different Greek words that can be translated 'open', some of which are used by Paul in his epistles to the Corinthians. He speaks of an opened door, and an opened mouth, of speaking boldly (which is elsewhere translated 'openly'), of making the truth manifest (again using a word, the root of which is elsewhere translated 'openly'). None of these are employed however in II Cor. iii. 18. The word there found is anakalupto. Now this selfsame word is found nowhere else in the New Testament than in verse 14 where it is translated 'untaken away' and refers to the veil over the heart and mind of Israel. This restores the Apostle's connection and enables us to perceive his argument. It also emphasizes the need there is to allow Paul to speak for himself lest, by our translations, we too 'veil' the truth. Here are the various combinations of kalupto in the N.T.

Kalumna is a veil (II Cor. iii. 13, 14, 15, 16).
Kalupto is to veil. This word is translated cover and hide and is found in IICor.iv.3 "If our gospel be hid".
Apokalupto is to unveil, or reveal, and occurs 26 times.
Apokalupsis is the unveiling, the Apocalypse, the Revelation and is used of the Second Coming of the Lord.
Anakalupto is to unveil (II Cor. iii. 14, 18).
Akatakaluptos is to be unveiled (I Cor. xi. 5, 15) not merely to be uncovered. As one writer says, a wisp of tulle worn on the head is in no sense obedience to the injunction not to be 'unveiled'.
Epikalumna is a veil drawn over, a cloke (I Pet. ii. 26).
Epikalupto is to veil over (Rom. iv. 7).
Parakalupto is to veil beside, to screen (Luke ix. 45).
Perikalupto is to draw a veil about, to blindfold (Mark xiv. 65; Luke xxii. 64; Heb. ix. 4).

It will be perceived that this root word is used in many combinations, but that in most cases the idea is of hiding from view, whether through modesty, mercy or malignity. The LXX version of Isa. lx. 2 uses kalupto when speaking of the darkness that covers the earth, which will only be dispersed by the appearing of the glory of the Lord. In contrast, therefore with Israel, the Apostle speaks of those who are blessed under the New Covenant as those with 'unveiled face'. These unveiled ones are said to behold as in a glass the glory of the Lord, and that this glory which they behold changes them 'from glory to glory even as by the Spirit of the Lord', in contrast with the evanescent glory of the face of Moses, which, so far as the record goes, changed nobody.

Katoptrizomai. This word is a compound, derived ultimately from optomai 'to see'. While the distinction between optomai and horao is extremely difficult to define, optomai is the more reflective seeing of the two. Katoptron is a mirror, and occurs in the LXX of Exod. xxxviii. 8 (verse 26 in the LXX), where we learn from the A.V. that the 'looking glasses' were made of 'brass'.

When writing to the Corinthians in the first epistle, the Apostle uses the figure of a mirror to show the contrast between present 'partial' knowledge, 'by means of a mirror, enigmatically', and the future revelation of truth when we are 'face to face' (ICor.xiii.12). Here in II Cor. iii., he reverts to the figure of a mirror, but this time with other thoughts in view.

Plato uses the word katoptrizomai, when he advised drunken persons to look at themselves in a mirror. Ancient mirrors were made of highly polished metal, and so it must necessarily have happened, as Parkhurst observes, that the person who looked at his image in them, would have his face strongly illuminated by the reflected rays.

Macknight translated the passage "Receiving and reflecting, in the manner of a mirror". Liddle and Scott, when dealing with katoptrizomai say, "In II Cor. iii. 18, to give back, reflect light, as by a mirror". As the believer looks into the burnished mirror of the Gospel, here in particular the New Covenant, he not only beholds, as James says his natural face, and then straightway forgetteth what manner of man he was (James i. 23, 24), but he beholds the glory of the Lord, for he cannot see 'his natural face'; he can only behold himself now as 'in Christ Jesus'. Moses when he beheld the glory of the Lord at the giving of the law, was momentarily transfigured, but like the Old Covenant itself, that glory faded. When we who believe behold and reflect that glory, "we are transfigured".

Metamorphoo has come over into our language in the form 'metamorphosis', and is used in science for the changes observed in rocks, and particularly in insects, from the caterpillar to the gorgeous butterfly. This is the word that is translated 'transfigure' in Matt. xvii. 2 and Mark ix. 2 and 'transform' in Rom. xii. 2. It is something for which we cannot be too thankful that evangelical preaching has always emphasized the Cross, the Death and the Resurrection of Christ, but it is to be deplored that neither the Ascension, nor the Transfiguration have been accorded their rightful places in the Gospel. These belong to the Gospel of the Glory, as surely as the others belong to the Gospel of grace. Peter refers to the confirming nature of the vision which he had 'in the holy mount' (II Pet. i. 18). Both Moses and Elijah too, were there, for all glory is passing, only the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ abides. That this 'transfiguration' has a spiritual equivalent in the believer, Rom. xii. 2 makes evident. In both I Cor. xiii and II Cor. iii. & iv. even though the purpose of the illustration is different, there is the passing from the present partial perception of truth to the full blaze of revelation, and this is indicated by the change from looking into a mirror, and speaking face to face. So II Cor. iii. 18 finds its glorious sequel and fulfillment in II Cor. iv. 6, the glory of the Lord as seen in a mirror, and the glory of God as seen in the face of Jesus Christ. Wonderful as the inspired Scriptures are, their supreme purpose is to lead us to the excelling glory of the Saviour Himself, the one after all but a 'mirror', the other blessed and utter reality.

"From glory to glory." Many and varied interpretations have been given of these words, and to repeat them here would not only use up valuable space, but simply provide an exhibition of human failure and lead to an appearance of boasting in self. When once we have considered the two Covenants, and have noted the fading glory of the one, and the abiding and excelling glory of the other, no interpretation can be acceptable that does not give full recognition to these contrasts. The believer has been changed from the passing glory of the Old Covenant, to the abiding glory of the New, and this phrase is employed in much the same way as the words of John i. 16, 17,

> "And of His fullness have all we received, and grace for grace (grace over against anti grace) for the law (which had grace, but only in type and shadow) was given through Moses, but grace and truth (i.e. real, antitypical grace) came by Jesus Christ."

This change is brought about by "The Spirit of the Lord". The A.V. translators were not happy about this rendering, so they put in the margin as an alternative 'or the Lord, the spirit'. This rendering is adopted by the Revisers, but they too were not quite satisfied, and so they have in the margin the alternative "The Spirit which is the Lord" Kathaper apo kuriou pneumatos. The indecision arises out of the order of the words Kuriou pneumatos under the heading 'The genitive of apposition'. The reader may possibly welcome a few illustrations of this use of the genitive "The temple of His body" which means, 'the temple, that is to say, His body' (John ii. 21). "The earnest of the Spirit" which means, 'the earnest, which is the Spirit' (II Cor. v. 5). "The bond of the peace" which means, 'the bond, that is to say, that peace (already indicated in ii. 14, 15)' (Eph. iv. 3).

The Apostle had already said in connection with the New Covenant, "The Lord is that Spirit", and so concludes that the transfiguration of the believer is the work of "The Lord", Who is the spirit of this Covenant, in contrast with the letter that killeth, associated with Moses.

One more development of this argument from the veil awaits us, but it is of such importance as to warrant a separate treatment. This we hope to give in our next study.

No.8. The Veil of "Undispensational" Truth.
pp. 37 - 40

The figure of the veil, as we have seen, is carried on into the conclusion of II Cor. iii., the words 'open face' being literally 'unveiled face'. We now turn our attention to the sequel in chapter iv. 3, 4:

> "But if our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost: In whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ . . . . . should shine unto them."

Let us consider this just as it stands. The 'lost' evidently are unbelievers, to whom the gospel is hid. So far we can travel with the A.V. without difficulty. When, however we continue, and read "In whom" we must of necessity understand this of the unbelievers who are lost, but when we continue our reading the difficulty of making sense of the passage increases. "To them that are lost, IN whom . . . . . the minds of them which believe not".

The word translated "lost" is apollumi, and is used not only in I Cor. i. 18 and II Cor. ii. 15 but in such passages as John iii. 16.

This same word apollumi is used of the passing away of the present creation, 'they shall perish' (Heb. i. 11) which 'waxes old'. This in its turn prefigures the passing away of the Old Covenant, for similar language is used of both:

> "In that He saith, a New Covenant, He hath made the first old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away" (Heb. viii. 13).

So we see that the word 'perish' can be used of a system as well as of persons under that system. We will keep that thought in mind while we proceed. We have already said that the two words 'hid' in II Cor. iv. 3 are the translation of kalupto 'to be veiled', which translation we find in the R.V. Now a veil can be 'over' a face, or 'upon' a heart (II Cor. iii. 13, 15), and it is in this same context that we read the words "But their minds were blinded (or hardened)". This blinding or hardening of the mind is the effect produced by the veil, and light will only drawn upon them when that veil is 'done away' (II Cor. iii. 14).

Katargeo, the word translated 'done away' is used four times in this chapter, thus:

> "But if the ministration of death, written and engraven in stones, was glorious, so that the children of Israel could not stedfastly behold the face of Moses for the glory of his countenance; WHICH GLORY WAS TO BE DONE AWAY . . . . .
>
> For if not that which is DONE AWAY was glorious, ...
>
> And not as Moses, which put a veil over his face, that the children of Israel could not stedfastly look to the end OF THAT WHICH IS ABOLISHED:
>
> But their minds were blinded: for until this day remaineth the same veil untaken away in the reading of the Old Covenant, which veil is DONE AWAY IN CHRIST"
> (II Cor. iii. 7, 11, 13, 14).

Returning to II Cor. iv. 3 we notice that it reads 'it is hid TO them that are lost'. Now the Greek preposition which is here translated 'to' is en, which reappears at the opening of verse 4 "In whom". Now the primitive meaning of en is 'in', but the figure of the veil prevented the translators saying 'in' them that are lost, and so they adopted the easier rendering 'to' them. The preposition en, is constantly used in the LXX to translate the Hebrew beth 'in' 'with' and 'by', and this is called "The en of investiture" as when it is said "The general came in his sword, the peers in their robes". The Greek of the N.T. extends this use of the preposition to accompaniments which do not literally 'invest' (Green). I Cor. iv. 21 en rabdo 'Am I to come to you WITH a rod?' In the epistles to the Corinthians, this preposition en is translated 'by' twenty-five times, thus 'enriched by Him', 'revealed by fire', etc. We believe the words 'the lost' of II Cor. iv. 3 do not refer to the individual unbeliever, but to the terms of the Old Covenant, which have now been 'abolished', and accordingly set out these two verses as follows:

> "But if our gospel be VEILED, it is VEILED by those things which are perishing, (i.e. those things which are 'abolished' and 'done away', referred to in II Cor. iii. 13, 14), by which the god of this age hath blinded the minds of them which believe not."

In other words, the enemy of truth fabricates a veil out of undispensational passages of Scripture, keeps the mind on a truth that has been abrogated, and so prevents the eye from beholding the light of the New Covenant gospel of glory, that shines, not in the face of Moses, but in the face of Christ. If many of the Lord's own children set no value on the principle of "Right Division" the enemy of truth, apparently realizes its high and liberating value.

Where the god of this age finds a mind ready for the instillation of doubt he will lead that one to deny the place of Moses altogether, and so strike the first blow at the whole fabric of revelation. The evil one however has no scruples. He can quote Scripture when it suits his purpose. To one he will bring pressure to bear until the inspiration of Scripture is denied. To another he will bring pressure to bear, so that one part of Scripture that is obsolete and undispensational shall so becloud the vision that the present truth shall be obscured. That is what he is represented as doing here in II Cor. iv. A veil has been fabricated out of 'those things that are perishing', the law of Moses which is 'abolished'. The Galatians had this veil over the eyes for a time, so that Paul had to write:

> "Tell me, ye that desire to be under the law, do ye not hear the law? . . . . . Behold, I Paul say unto you, that if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing . . . . . Christ is become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law; ye are fallen from grace" (Gal. iv. 21; v. 2, 4).

The Apostle asked the Galatians "Who hath bewitched you?" for the preaching of Jesus Christ crucified had been so set forth before their eyes as to indicate the interposition of this 'veil'.

Another element in the making of this veil is the fear of man, the fear of consequences, and to this the Apostle refers in Eph. i.:

> "That the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you the spirit of wisdom and revelation IN THE ACKNOWLEDGMENT of Him: the eyes of your understanding being enlightened; that ye may know . . . . ." (Eph. i. 17, 18).

Where acknowledgment is withheld, illumination ceases, the veil has done its work.

Pentecostal gifts, wonderful as they were, are likened by the Apostle to the accompaniments of childhood, and like the glory of the face of Moses these gifts were destined to 'vanish away'. Many a child of God is behind a thick veil fabricated of "Pentecostalism" and fails to realize that the cry 'Back to Pentecost' is really 'Back to the nursery'. We have used the word 'fabricate' in its primary sense of making, and a woven material, such as a veil, could be called a 'fabric'. The word 'fabricate' however has taken on a sinister meaning and means, a forgery, or a falsehood, especially with the intention of deceiving.

It is not enough to note that a book purporting to be Scriptural should be loaded with 'texts'; it is far more important to note what texts are quoted, from which contexts of Scripture they are taken, and what dispensational distinctions are ignored in the process. The express purpose and intention of the evil one is the fabrication of this veil as revealed in verse 4:

> "Lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, Who is the image of God, should shine unto them" (II Cor. iv. 4).

We hope to go on from here in a further article. In the meantime may we read the Word with clear eyes making sure that no veil of tradition affects our view.

No.6. The Promise, and the Promises.
pp. 68 - 72

The word diatheke occurs 33 times in the N.T., translated 'covenant' 20 times and 'testament' 13 times, and is the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew berith, the word most often rendered 'covenant' in the O.T. We have already given reasons for rejecting the translation 'testament' except in the exceptional case of Gal. iii. 15 which deals with a man's will. We read of a covenant made with the fathers called the covenant of circumcision, which was the special glory of the people of Israel (Acts iii. 25; vii. 8; Gal. iii. 17; Rom. ix. 4). It is utterly impossible to observe the principle of 'Right Division' and apply this covenant to the Church of the Mystery. To do so must and does induce blindness and this is the very stuff and fabric of the 'veil' employed by the god of this age. The attempt made by some to place the epistle to the Hebrews in the dispensation of the Mystery is a pathetic example of this blinding confusion. "Two Covenants" are contrasted in Gal. iv. 24, the Old Covenant, the first Covenant, the Covenant in which Israel did not continue (II Cor. iii. 14; Heb. ix. 15; viii. 9), and the New Covenant, sometimes called a better Covenant and an everlasting Covenant (Hebrews viii. 6; vii. 22; xiii. 20).

It is impossible to avoid the fact that these covenants, old and new, made with the fathers, sealed with circumcision, and made at Sinai with Moses as the mediator, belong to Israel (Rom. ix. 4). Gentiles could become partakers of New Covenant blessings while the New Covenant people continued as a people before God, and this is recognized in the two epistles to the Corinthians. The true fulfillment of the New Covenant yet awaits the day of the Lord, but the earnest of its blessings was enjoyed during the period that came to an end with the setting aside of Israel at Acts xxviii.

The only reference to a covenant in the five prison epistles is a negative one, namely, where the Apostle emphasizes in Ephesians the utterly bankrupt condition of the Gentile world.

> "Gentiles in the flesh . . . . . aliens . . . . . strangers from the covenants of promise . . ." (Eph. ii. 11, 12).

Let us now acquaint ourselves with the 'promises' that are found in the N.T., seeing that the Apostle has linked covenants and promises together in this one reference in Ephesians.

The Greek word is epaggelia which occurs 53 times in the N.T. Once it is translated 'message' (I John i. 5), the remaining 52 occurrences being consistently translated 'promise'. Here the wayfaring man though a fool (Isa. xxxv. 8) need not err. The whole story lies open on the face of the A.V. First of all we give the occurrences of the word 'promise' in those Scriptures outside the Prison epistles.

Acts. Five references, to promises made to the fathers or to their children (ii. 29; vii. 17; xiii. 23, 32; xxvi. 6). Two references to the promise of the Spirit (i. 4; ii. 33).

Luke. (xxiv. 49) "The promise of the Father" is repeated in the Acts.

Romans. Eight references to promises made to Abraham, to Israel, and to the fathers (iv. 13, 14, 16, 20; ix. 4, 8, 9; xv. 8).

II Corinthians. "All the promises of God in Him are yea, and in Him Amen" (i.20). "Having therefore these promises" (vii. 1).

Galatians. Nine references to promises made to Abraham (iii. 16, 17, 18, 21, 22, 29; iv. 23, 28). One reference to the promise of the Spirit, but directly connected with Abraham (iii. 14).

Hebrews. Fourteen references, referring mainly to the promise made to Abraham, and to those of like faith, [one passage, xi. 33 refers to some individual promise made to those who suffered martyrdom] (iv. 1; vi. 12, 15, 17; vii. 6; viii. 6; ix. 15; x. 36; xi. 9, 13, 17, 39).

II Peter. Two references, to promises of the Lord's Second Coming (iii. 4, 9).

I John. One reference, the promise of eternal life (ii. 25)

The reader is urged to acquaint himself with these references, observing in each case what the promise is and to whom it was made. He will find no promise that can legitimately be taken by a Gentile believer in the absence of Israel today. We turn from this negative aspect of the case to the epistles written by Paul since Acts xxviii. 28, for it is here we find our calling, and there we shall discover what promises, if any, belong to the Church of the Mystery.

The epistles that contain the word 'promise' are Ephesians, 4 references; I Timothy, 1 reference; II Timothy, 1 reference, and so six in all. Upon examination, two that are found in Ephesians do not count in the present study, namely the one declaring that the Gentiles were strangers to the covenants of promise which refer to the past, and the other referring to the command "Honour thy father and thy mother" (Eph. vi. 2). This leaves but four promises in the epistles of the Mystery. Two of these speak of 'life' (ITim.iv.8; II Tim. i. 1), one of the seal (Eph. i. 13) and one of the unique character of the membership of the one Body (Eph. iii. 6). Of the references in the epistles to Timothy, the one in I Tim. iv. 8 must be removed from our list, as it speaks of 'the promise of the life which now is, and of that which is to come' in a general way, without associating this promise with any covenant made with the fathers, Abraham or Israel or special time period.

We have therefore three passages only in all the N.T. that use the word 'promise' specifically of the church of the Mystery. Let us examine these references carefully, for our hopes are bound up with the doctrines they contain. As II Timothy deals with a promise of life, and life must come before any possibility of experience, let us consider that passage first.

> "Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, according to the promise of life which is in Christ Jesus" (II Tim. i. 1).

With this passage we can read the opening verses of the epistle to Titus:

> "In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began" (Titus i. 2).

The expansion of this promise begins at II Tim. i. 8 with a reference to 'the testimony of our Lord' and with Paul 'His prisoner'. We do well to note the order here. It is not the teaching, idea or fancy of Paul. The epistles are as much the testimony of Jesus Christ as is the Sermon on the Mount, the parables of the mysteries of the kingdom (Matt. xiii.) or the prophecy of Matt. xxiv. The perpetuation of these testimonies was entrusted to either Matthew or Paul according to their stewardship, but inspiration knows no dispensational boundaries. The Christ Who spake on earth, has since spoken from heaven, and Paul is as much His mouthpiece as were Peter and John. The fact that Paul emphasized his prison ministry is in line with the fact that he is still dealing with that dispensation that came into force at Acts xxviii. Saved Gentiles, called during Israel's blindness are in view, and here we find our calling and the basis of our hope. This calling goes back 'before the world began' (II Tim. i. 9; Titus i. 2) pro chronon aionion, literally 'before times of ages'. This calling therefore is identical with that of Eph. i. 3,4, which goes back to 'before the foundation (or overthrow) of the world'. The life that is the subject of this promise is defined as 'eternal, or age-abiding life', 'that which is to come', and 'life and immortality'. The figure of speech called hendiadys seems to have been employed in II Tim. i. 10 in the phrase 'life and immortality', for there can be no immortality where there is no life. Hendiadys, is the figure that uses two words where one thing is meant in order that one of the words may become emphatic. Thus 'grace and truth' (John i. 17) means 'TRUE grace' as contrasted with types and shadows of the laws, so 'Life and immortality' means 'IMMORTAL life'.

This promise is basic. It is not a distinctive prerogative of the calling of the church of the one Body. Immortality is predicated of all who take part in a blessed resurrection; it is here restated as being equally the hope of the church of the present dispensation.

The remaining references to a promise are those found in Ephesians, "Ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise" (Eph. i. 13); "That the Gentiles should be fellowheirs, and of the same body, and partakers of His promise in Christ by the gospel: whereof I was made a minister" (Eph. iii. 6, 7).

Note the parallel between II Tim. i. 8-13 and Eph. iii. 1-13. In both the Apostle is 'the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles'; in both he links the gospel with his own exclusive apostleship 'the gospel whereunto I am appointed a preacher', 'the gospel whereof I was made a minister'. In both he speaks of himself in the first person 'unto me', 'of me', and in both some measure of suffering is linked with this exclusive ministry 'wherefore I desire that ye faint not at my tribulation for you, which is your glory', 'For which cause I also suffer these things'. Eph. iii. 6, while difficult to translate, its threefold inspired emphasis with the preposition sun is nevertheless the very core of the Mystery so far as the participants are concerned. Under earlier economies the Gentiles could expect nothing but 'crumbs' that fell from Israel's table, they could look forward to being nothing but ploughmen and vine dressers to a dominant ruling people; at best they could be but wild olives grafted contrary to nature into the true olive, Israel. Here, however, in Eph. iii. 6 there is perfect equality. While by no means satisfied with the translation, the threefold use of the word 'joint' does at least emphasize this new relationship, "That the Gentiles should be JOINT heirs, JOINT body, and JOINT partakers". This relationship is new; and it is unique and of the utmost importance. It had never been enjoyed before and has no parallel in the economies that follow. It is exclusive to the dispensation of the Mystery. This promise is sealed to the believer, not as in former times with supernatural gifts, signs and miracles, but with the Holy Spirit of promise, the earnest of the future inheritance. Just as in Rom. viii. 15, the spirit of adoption was the pledge and earnest of the future adoption of verse 23, explained in that verse as 'the firstfruits of the Spirit', so the believer today has the Spirit of Christ, the spirit of sonship, as an earnest, pledge or firstfruits until the redemption of the purchased possession. The firstfruits are of the same nature as the subsequent harvest. Barley would be no firstfruits of a future harvest of grapes or olives, and the seal and earnest of II Corinthians, which included anointing and confirming gifts (II Cor. i. 21, 22) can be no seal and earnest of a calling which transcends in nature and in sphere any calling previously made known.

We must beware of the devices of the god of this age, who will provide the believer with a veil made out of truth that is undispensational in order that truth for the time, the truth of the Mystery, the truth entrusted to Paul the prisoner, shall not be perceived.

No.(?). "The Inheritance of the saints in Light."
pp. 81 - 85

Darkness, like sin, is not the prerogative of any people or calling. It is as universal as natural man. The nations of antiquity (Rom. i. 21), the nation of Israel (Rom. xi. 10) and the far-off Gentiles of the present day (Eph. iv. 18) all share this deadly thing.

There are five passages in the Prison Epistles that speak of darkness, and one in the Acts that looks forward to the ministry of the Mystery. It is a thing to be noted with thanksgiving that there are many more references to 'light' in the N.T. than to 'darkness', but so far as the Prison Epistles are concerned there are just the same number of references as there are to darkness, and just the one reference in the Acts. To this can be added the reference in I Tim. vi. 16 concerning the Lord Himself, and the reference to lights that shine in the world (Phil. ii. 15); also the two passages that speak of enlightenment or making men see (Eph. i. 18; iii. 9), and the passage already considered in part 'and hath brought life and immortality to light' (II Tim. i. 10). These varied references we will first of all set out so that their distinctive meanings can be kept before us.

Phos. "Light."

"To turn them from darkness to light" (Acts xxvi. 18).
"But now are ye light in the Lord: walk as children of light" (Eph. v. 8).
"But all things that are reproved are made manifest by the light: for whatsoever doth make manifest is light. Wherefore He saith, awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light" (Eph. v. 13, 14).
"Giving thanks unto the Father, Which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light" (Col. i. 12).

Phoster. "A luminary."

"Among whom ye shine as lights in the world" (Phil. ii. 15).

Photizo "To enlighten."

"The eyes of understanding having been enlightened" (Eph. i. 18).
"To make all men see what is the fellowship (dispensation R.V.) of the Mystery" (Eph. iii. 9).

Skotos. "Darkness."

"Ye were sometimes darkness" (Eph. v. 8).
"The unfruitful works of darkness" (Eph. v. 11).
"The rulers of the darkness of this world" (Eph. vi. 12).
"Hath delivered us from the power of darkness" (Col. i. 13).

Skotizomai. "To be darkened."

"Having the understanding darkened" (Eph. iv. 18).

We will not go over the ground already covered by the Apostle in his former defences, but deal rather with those items that he brings into prominence in this particular speech before Agrippa.

The Apostle begins by going over the ground already covered by Acts ix. and xxii.—his early life, his persecuting zeal and the vision on the road to Damascus. At verse 16, however, he breaks new ground. Truth hitherto unrecorded is now revealed, and as this new revelation is of vital importance to all who rejoice in the dispensation of the Mystery, verses 16-18 must be given our closest attention. Let us note first that it is here for the first time that we are told what the Lord Himself said to the Apostle on the road to Damascus. It may, perhaps, be objected that this statement is not true, and that in Acts ix. we can read for ourselves what the Lord said. To make sure about this point, let us turn to Acts ix.:

Verses 1 and 2 record the journey to Damascus.
Verses 3 and 4 record the vision and the Voice.
Verse 5 reveals that it is the Lord Who speaks.
Verse 6 tells Paul to go into the city and wait for instructions.
Verses 15 and 16 record what the Lord said to Ananias about Paul, but that is all.

It is clear therefore, that what the Lord actually said to Paul is not recorded in Acts ix., and it will be found that this is also true of Acts xxii. Chapter xxii. records the words of Ananias (verses 13-15), and we also learn that Paul was to be a witness of all that he had seen and heard, but it is to Acts xxvi. that we must turn to learn for the first time what the Lord actually said to Paul at his conversion and commission.

The new features contained in this record are found in the words "Both", "I will appear unto thee", and "Now I send thee" in verses 16 and 17, and in the summary of doctrine contained in verse 18:

> "To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among them which are sanctified, by faith that is in Me."

The close association between these words and the doctrine of the epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians will be obvious.

In contrast with this new commission, recorded here for the first time, is the old commission to which the Apostle returns in verses 20-23. In these verses he preaches "repentance", and proclaiming "none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come", which obviously could not refer to the Mystery hid in God.

We have already seen from Acts xx. 24 that Paul had received some commission from the Lord that was intimately associated with "bonds", and now, having appealed to Cæsar, the Apostle is at liberty to reveal the fact that from the beginning he had known that his commission was two-fold:

(1) Witnessing to Israel and the Gentiles the things which he had seen and heard, while
(2) Awaiting a future appearing of the Lord, when the terms of the new ministry associated with prison would be made known to him.

At last the fresh appearing had taken place, and the terms of the new commission given. Verse 18 anticipates, in a condensed form, the doctrine that is more fully expressed in Ephesians and Colossians (see Eph. i. 7, 13, 14, 18, and Col. i. 12, 13).

The word "both" necessitates a two-fold witness. Just as a believing and intelligent reading of John xvi. 12-14 compels us to seek for a subsequent revelation after the Spirit of Truth had come, so equally a believing and intelligent reading of Acts xxvi. 16-18 compels us to seek for that subsequent revelation of truth that was given after Paul had become the prisoner of the Lord for the Gentiles. This revelation is found in those epistles that bear the stamp of prison, namely: Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians and II Timothy. These epistles contain the revelation of the Mystery, and give dispensational grounds for the Gentiles' right to the blessings summarized in Acts xxvi. 18.

(Acts of the Apostles32, pp.99-105).

The condition of the Gentiles at this time is indicated in Eph. iv. 18; v. 8 and vi. 12.

Moral Darkness.

> "This I say therefore, and testify in the Lord, that ye henceforth walk not as other Gentiles walk, in the vanity of their mind. Having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their heart: who being past feeling have given themselves over unto lasciviousness, to work all uncleanness with greediness" (Eph. iv. 17-19).

This, according to verse 22, is the 'old man' and his 'conversation'; this is a darkness like that of Egypt, a darkness that can be felt. Two words are employed in the Greek N.T. of Ephesians for 'vain' namely kenos empty, referring to the contents of anything, and mataios, foolish, idle, useless, empty, referring to the results. Kenos is used in Eph.v.6 "Let no man deceive you with vain words". Mataios is used in Eph. iv. 17 "The vanity of their mind". It is as though 'Ichabod' had been written across the mind of man, rendering all his thinking, his planning, his devising, purposeless. Sin, indeed makes man, originally made in the image of God, 'come short'. Paul places over against the vanity of the mind, the darkening of the understanding. The faculty of moral reflection, dianoia, the ability to 'think through' a problem, was darkened, and this darkness was moral, and it was the outcome of the alienating character of sin. These Ephesians were aliens from the commonwealth of Israel (Eph. ii. 12) and alienated from the life of God (Eph. iv. 18). As Gentiles they suffered dispensational alienation, and this but reflected the deeper moral alienation of their hearts.

Enlightenment is associated with knowledge (Eph. i. 18), darkness with ignorance. Now there is an ignorance which excites our pity, and which it would be unjust to punish, but the ignorance here intended is of the heart, and can be rendered callousness.

Porosis, is derived from poros, a stone, something like marble, and in medicine, a calculous or chalky concretion. Dr. Johnson says of the word 'the hard substance by which broken bones are united'. The verb poroo, means to callous, to make insensible to the touch. In two passages, this verb is translated 'to blind' (Rom. xi. 7; II Cor. iii. 14), even as the noun porosis is so translated in Rom. xi. 25 and Eph. iv. 18. An insensibility whether of the eye, the ear, the mind or the heart, was the terrible condition of the Gentile world at the time when the light of God's glorious revelation of grace was about to dawn.

In Rom. i. 24, 26 and 28, the word paradidomi which in Eph. iv. 19 is translated 'have given (themselves) over', is used of the nations "Wherefore God also gave them up to uncleanness", 'to vile affections', 'to a reprobate mind'. This degenerate way was not followed with regret or any apparent hesitation, but was pursued 'with greediness'. What a picture of moral degradation, a darkness indeed that recalls that which enveloped Egypt, a darkness that could be felt. It must have been grace indeed that could deliver from such a condition, translate from such an authority, and make meet for partaking of the inheritance of the saints IN LIGHT.

No.(?). The Excellent Glory, in the face of Jesus Christ.
pp. 101 - 104

We have been some time arriving at the 'text' adopted as the heading of this series, namely II Cor. iv. 6, but on the other hand, a text is not a verse lifted out of its context and used merely as a peg upon which to hang the three points of a sermon. The text should conform to its derivation textus 'that which is woven, a fabric', and so related to the whole as the threads of a textile fabric are related to the weft. Shakepeare's words are worth remembering:

> "In religion
> What error, but some sober brow
> Will bless it, and approve it with a text" (Merchant of Venice).

And so all the threads, the 'watering down of the Word' that is so strenuously repudiated, the solemn comparison of the two Covenants, the veiled face of Moses, the unveiled face of the believer, the veil fabricated by the evil one out of undispensational related texts, and the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, all these threads are now gathered up and presented in the words:

> "For God, Who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (II Cor. iv. 6).

We have no knowledge, nor do we possess the power to understand what the conditions of life must have been before the overthrow of the world. We do know that so far as God Himself is concerned, He was under no necessity to be faced with darkness before He could appreciate light, "God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all" (I John i. 5).

> "Make no mistake about this, my beloved brothers: all we are given is good, and all our endowments are faultless, descending from above, from the Father of the heavenly lights, Who knows no change of rising and setting, Who casts no shadow on the earth" (James i. 16, 17, Moffatt).

During the ages, darkness alternates with light, and good is set over against evil, but these alternations are limited to the time being, and when the ages have run their courses the former things will pass away and a suggestion of what will be the new condition is found in the New Jerusalem:

> "The city had no need of the sun, neither the moon to shine in it: for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof . . . . . there shall be no night there" (Rev. xxi. 23, 25).

During the ages, however, we see through a glass darkly, we reflect as in a mirror the glory of the Lord; we see the story of God in the face of Jesus Christ.

There is a blending in II Cor. iv. 6 of the story of Gen. i. 3, a blending with the record concerning the face of Moses and the prophecies that speak of a day when the knowledge of the glory of God shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea, when the veil spread over the earth shall be removed and Israel's day shall have dawned, and they arise and shine and moreover there is a reference to the Apostle's own experience on the road to Damascus.

In our studies of the book of Job, which are to be found in The Berean Expositor Volumes XXXV and XXXVI, we noted a number of passages that anticipated the writings of Moses and the Prophets, but confessed that there were many more that awaited the patient investigator. We believe Paul, whose knowledge of the Septuagint Version is manifest makes reference here in II Cor. iv. 6 to a passage in Job which we had not previously noted. The parallel is not so obvious in the A.V. but the Greek rendering of Job xxxvii. 15 phos (poiesas) ek skotus "Light having made out of darkness", is similar to the Greek of II Cor. iv. 6 (ho eipon) ek skotous phos (lampsai) "The One commanding out of darkness light to shine".

We expected to find the Greek word paragello 'to command' employed by the Apostle here, but the Greek word eipon 'to say' is used instead. At first this seems less forceful than the English word 'command', but the true intention of eipon 'lays more in the adjuncts than in what is said' (Dr. Bullinger's Lexicon), consequently as Parkhurst points out:

(1) With a view to enquiring, it is in fact to ask (Matt. xi. 3).
(2) In reply it is to answer, as in Matt. ii. 5.
(3) With a view to obtaining anything, it is to request (Mark ix. 18).

At times this word means 'to command', and is so translated in the A.V. eight times, seven of the occurrences being in the Gospels and one in the epistles, the text under review. It is very likely that the Apostle had in mind the wondrous simplicity of Gen.i.3 "And God SAID . . . . ." where the word of the Lord was with creative power.

Something of the innate power in the word spoken by the Lord can be seen in the usage of Matt. iv. 3 "If Thou be the Son of God, command . . . . ." Consequently where Paul uses eipon 'to say', Job used poieo 'to make', for with God there is no divorce between word and deed. This light of the gospel illuminates not the surface of the earth, as in Gen. i., but illuminates the heart. The heart can be darkened (Rom. i. 21) and nothing less than the light of the gospel can dispel that darkness. This illumination is for a purpose. The A.V. has the verb 'to give' in italics. The actual word is pros 'toward' indicating a goal, 'In order to the shining forth'. We must not forget the figure already employed in II Cor. iii. 18 'beholding' or 'reflecting' the glory of the Lord. We are illuminated in order that others may catch some of the beams that have so blessedly enlightened our darkness. "The light" of the gospel of glory of verse 4 becomes 'the light' of the knowledge of the glory of God of verse 6, and in this later reference some O.T. prophecies seem to be included.

> "For the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea" (Hab. ii. 14).
> "Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee. For, behold, the darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people; but the Lord shall arise upon thee, and His glory shall be seen upon thee. And the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising" (Isa. lx. 1-3).

The expression 'as the waters cover the sea' demands a word of explanation. These words cannot apply to the sea itself, for the sea is composed of water, and the waters of the sea cover the sea-bed. The waters here refer to those living waters that are to flow from Jerusalem in the coming day, 'half of them toward the former sea, and half of them toward the hinder sea' (Zech. xiv. 8), the 'former' being the eastern, and from Ezek xlvii. we learn by the reference to Engedi that this 'former sea' is what is known as The Dead Sea. Wherever these healing waters were seen to travel they brought life in their train. A paraphrase of Hab. ii. 14 might read:

> "The earth shall be filled with the life giving knowledge of the glory of the Lord, even as the living waters that flow from Jerusalem, shall, in that day of restoration and Jubilee, blot out the typical Dead Sea."

"The gospel of the glory of Christ" and "the knowledge of the glory of God" (IICor.iv.4,6) are complementary, the one explaining and fulfilling the other. Glory is the ultimate, grace is the channel or means. The Gospel is received by faith; it leads on to knowledge. The interchange of teaching concerning 'glory' in chapter iii. (doxa is used eleven times), prepares for this glory that excelleth, the face of Jesus Christ being placed over against the face of Moses; the emancipating glory of the One set over against the fading glory of the other.

The word 'face' is often employed as a figure (the figure called Synecdoche) for the whole person, the most personal and recognizable part being used for the whole. Luke i. 76 speaks of a messenger going before 'the face of the Lord', Luke ii. 31 speaks of a preparation before 'the face of all people'. So II Cor. ii. 10 reads 'in the person of Christ', which is identical except for the addition of the name 'Jesus' (which many critical texts omit) with the original of II Cor. iv. 6, en prosopo Christou (II Cor. ii. 10), en prosopo Iesou Christou (II Cor. iv. 6).

In this brief study we have traveled from the Covenant of Sinai with its ministration of death, to the New Covenant, sealed by a better sacrifice than Moses ever offered and leading to a liberty and a glory that Moses could never promise. If, however, we leave the matter here, we shall in our turn be guilty of spreading a veil over the eyes of the believer for however excellent may be the glory of the New Covenant, that Covenant has no place in the dispensation of the Mystery. Darkness still gives place to light in this most blessed of dispensations, and glory is still most intimately associated with the person of Christ, but Ephesian truth does not rest upon the New Covenant, but upon one infinitely better promise, a promise made in Christ before the overthrow of the world, and unrelated either with Abraham or with Moses. It is therefore imperative that having gone so far we must go further. We must consider the ground of the dispensation of the Mystery; we must distinguish 'the promise' made before age times from all other promises made since and must seek a clear understanding of the true dispensational place of the New Covenant as compared with the basis of God's dealings with far off sinners of the Gentiles. To this we must apply ourselves in subsequent articles.

Helpers of your joy

The place that joy occupies

It is surprising in one sense, to note the emphasis which the apostle Paul puts upon "joy". When we come to think of the life he lived, the nature and revelation made known to and through him-the stewardship of the Mystery-his bonds and imprisonment, the loneliness and the abuse that seemed his daily meat, we should not be surprised after the manner of men, if "joy" never entered his vocabulary.

But, thank God we do not speak after the manner of men, having seen enough of the grace of God to be prepared for songs in the night and psalms from the innermost prison. Again and again in the epistle to the Philippians Paul bids his readers "rejoice", even though some brethren (not merely pagan enemies) were endeavouring to add affliction to his bonds.

The ministry for which The Berean Expositor was first called in existence, and which justified its continuance, is one so fraught with problems, and which makes such demands upon both reader and writer, that it is absolutely necessary that into all the hard study, and in some cases isolation that the truth entails, should be brought the remembrance that faith is not cold but warm and living, and that there is a "joy of faith" (Phil. 1:25) as well as the subject matter of the faith, the fight of faith and steadfastness in the faith. Faith not only leads to justification, acceptance, and life, blessings indeed beyond computation, but to "joy and peace in believing"(Rom. 15:13) with which we should be as much filled, as "with the spirit".

Some of the fruits of the Spirit are enumerated in Galatians 5:22,23 which sets forth a veritable cluster of Eschol, nine in all, including gentleness, temperance, and faith. The first in order of mention is "love", without which all knowledge, faith, and even martyrdom are reduced to nothing: and second in order of mentions is "joy". Can we conceive of gentleness without joy and still associate it with the Spirit? Temperance without joy may be a mischief-worker and a cause for stumbling. A joyless faith producing a joyless creed neither commends the gospel nor glorifies the Lord. Joy differs from happiness largely and depends upon what "happens", whereas joy is deeper, being independent of circumstances. The Apostle may at one time be exalted and at another depressed: he may be full or hungry, be in comparative comfort or in lonely neglect. He may be even in fetters and prison, but his joy remains unchanged.

Strictly speaking, there should be no need in a magazine of this type specifically to deal with such a subject. We should all be so keen to learn all that is possible concerning the Lord and His Word, that the pursuit of some intricate piece of grammar should be a joyful undertaking, the labour of discovering or of verifying and using a structure should be as joyful a piece of work as the singing of a lovely melody. Indeed, a peep behind the scenes would sometimes reveal that when after hours of close study, some intricate point had been resolved, or a complicated structure discovered, and the writer's manner of celebrating the event so far removed from such the deportment we usually associate with such studies. Some exuberance not only echoes Archimedes' famous cry of Eureka, but, and which is more to the point, is an echo of a joy such as that of Jeremiah who exclaimed: "Thy words were found and I did eat them: and or of the Psalmist who said: "I rejoice at Thy word, as one that findeth great spoil" (Psa. 119:162).

"I will not leave thee"

The subject of Christian joy may be approached from several angles, and it is associated with a variety of themes, but the one theme that calls for immediate expression seems to be the close association that Scripture indicates as existing between joy and the presence of the Lord. We might establish the truth of this by an appeal to the epistle to the Philippians, where one of the key-words is "rejoice", and where in chapter four the secret is revealed that "The Lord is near". We might appeal to the Psalmist who said: "in Thy presence is fullness of joy" (Psa. 16:11), and realize that all such enjoyment of the Lord's presence in this life is an anticipation of that future day of resurrection when we shall be satisfied (Psa. 17:15).

But in the first epistle of John we read: "These things write we unto you, that your joy may be full" (1 John 1:4). Upon examination it will be discovered that John is writing about fellowship with the Father and with the Son, of walking in the light as He is in the light. In other words he associates joy with the presence of the Lord.

Looking back to the verse in Psalm 16, proceeding that quoted above we read: "For Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell" (Psa. 16:10), and this reference provided us with the first of many aspects of that experimental enjoyment of the presence of God, which is our theme.

"Thou wilt not leave me". These words of the Lord spoken in the very valley of the shadow of death are calculated to minister to the joy of all who trust in Him. We observe that:

(1) The promise, "I will not leave thee" arises out of salvation itself:

> "Hide not Thy face far from me; put not Thy servant away in anger: Thou has been my help; leave me not, neither forsake me, O God of my salvation" (Psa. 27:9).

As the God of our salvation we can confidently call upon Him to "leave us not", and when we contemplate all that salvation has cost Him, we may gladly rest upon the fact that He will not leave those to perish who have been bought with such a price.

(2) “I will not leave thee” is also implicit in the fact that we so belong to the God of our Salvation, that we are called by His name:

> “O Lord, though our iniquities testify against us, do Thou it for Thy Name’s sake: for our backslidings are many; we have sinned against Thee. O the Hope of Israel, the Saviour thereof in time of trouble, why shouldest Thou be as a stranger in the land, and as a wayfaring man that turneth aside to tarry for a night? Why shouldest Thou be as a man astonished, as a mighty man that cannot save? Yet Thou, O Lord, art in the midst of us, and we are called by Thy Name: leave us not” (Jer. 14:7-9).

The context of this passage is one of terrible retribution. Not until Daniel, in is prayer of the ninth chapter, pleads for the city “which is called by Thy name…and They people (that) are called by Thy name” (Dan.9:18, 19) does an answer of peace come. Nevertheless, in spite of the long wait of 70 years, the prayer was heard. We are called by His name; He has called us by our name, and we can confidently put up the plea: “We are called by Thy name: leave us not”.

(3) “I will not leave thee” is implied in the promises of God:

> “And, behold, I am with thee, and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest, and will keep thee in all places whither though goest, and will bring thee again into this land; for I will not leave thee, until I have done that which I have spoken to thee of” (Gen.28:15)

Here is a ground of strong confidence. “I am with thee”; I will keep thee”; “I will bring thee” are all implied in the words: “For I will not leave thee until…”

(4) “I will not leave thee” is our strength in the conflict and our pledge of victory:

> “Be strong and of good courage, fear not, nor be afraid of them: for the Lord thy God, He it is that doth go with thee, He will not fail thee, nor forsake thee” (Deut. 31:16).

“I will not forsake thee”

Whenever we hear the words, “I will not leave thee”, we immediately add, if only mentally, the words, “neither will I forsake thee”. In on sense “leaving” and “forsaking” have an almost synonymous meaning and, indeed, the same original word is sometimes rendered “leave” and sometimes “forsake”. There are, however, one or two passages that we ought not to omit from our study together, and we trust that the survey will minister something of the joy of faith to any who may know something of what it means to be forsaken here below.

At the dedication of the temple, Solomon blessed the Lord saying,

> “Blessed be the Lord, that hath given rest unto His people Israel, according to all that He promised: there hath not failed one word of all His good promise, which He promised by the hand of Moses His servant. The Lord our God be with us, as He was with our fathers; let Him not leave us, nor forsake us” (1 Kings 8:56,57)

The way in which Solomon links together the fulfillment of the promise with the plea, “leave us not, neither forsake us”, leads our thoughts back to the beginning of Israel’s history in the land, under Joshua:

> "As I was with Moses, so I will be with thee: I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee…And behold, this day I am going the way of all the earth: and ye may know in all your hearts and in all your souls, that not one thing hath failed of all the good things which the Lord your God spake concerning you; all are come to pass unto you, and not one thing hath failed thereof" (Josh. 1:5, 23:14).

Let us notice one or two features that minister to the comfort of the believer.

(1) The fact that the Lord will not forsake His people is a pledge of preservation: "For the Lord loveth judgment, and forsaketh not His saints; they are preserved for ever" (Psa 37:28). Surely it must minister to our joy to realize that in spite of all the opposition of the enemy, and of the betrayal of their own failings, the saints are not forsaken, and their preservation is assured.

(2) the fact that the Lord will not forsake His people is because He is gracious and merciful, and slow to anger:

> "…in their rebellion appointed a captain to return to their bondage: but Thou art a God ready to pardon, gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and forsookests them not. Yea, when they had made them a molten calf, and said, this is thy God that brought thee out of Egypt, and had wrought great provocations: yet Thou in Thy manifold mercies forsookest them not in the wilderness: the pillar of the cloud departed not from them by day, to lead them in the way; neither the pillar of fire by night, to shew them light, and the way wherein they should go …Yet many years didst Thou forbear them, and testifiest against them…Nevertheless for Thy great mercies' sake Thou didst not utterly consume them, nor forsake them: for Thou are a gracious and merciful God" (Neh. 9:17,18,19,30,31).

(4) The fact that the Lord will not forsake His people delivers them from bondage of fear: "Be content with such things as ye have: for He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee. So that we may boldly say, the Lord is my Helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me" (Heb. 13:5,6).

Many children of God are compelled to walk in lonely paths. Faithfulness often cuts them off from fellowship. Natural ties are also severed, and friends prove false or frail. It is to such that the blessed assurance comes, with all its sweetness, that the Lord will not forsake them:

> "When my father and mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up" (Psa.27:10).
> "Can a woman forget her sucking child…Yea, they may forget, yet will I not forget thee" (Isa. 49:15).
> "At my first answer no man stood with me, but all men forsook me: I pray God that it may not be laid to their charge. Notwithstanding the Lord stood with me" (2 Tim.4:16,17).

The Apostle knew a little of the fellowship of His Lord's sufferings. He, like the Saviour, was forsaken by his own, but there the parallel ceases. Paul could add, "notwithstanding the Lord stood with me", but his Saviour, and ours, had to cry, "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me? (Matt.27:46).

Let us never forget in all the joy that comes to us by His gracious presence, that part of the price for such blessing included the forsaking of the Holy One for our sakes.

"I will be with thee"

The Lord has promised that He will neither leave nor forsake, His own, and in his double promise of His presence we rejoice. The words "not leave" and "not forsake", however, are negatives, and so we will turn to a positive declaration:

> "He shall call upon Me, and I will answer Him: I will be with him in trouble (Psa. 91:15)

There is no promise in Scripture that the believer will be exempt from trouble, but what is promised is that he need never be alone in his trouble. The Lord has said: "I will be with him in trouble". The saint may pass through fire and water, but the Lord will be with him and sanctify to him his deepest distress:

> "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee" (Isa. 43:2).

Joseph passed through a long period of trial and testing, yet in the midst of it all the Scriptures reveal the hidden source of his joy. First of all he was sold by his brethren into Egypt. At this the iron entered into his soul:

> "Whose feet they hurt with fetters: he was laid in iron (Psa. 105:18).

Or, as the margin says, "His soul came into iron". It must surely have been a bitter experience for the beloved son of Israel to be sold as a slave, and sold by his very brethren: yet one blessing, at least was his, the Lord was with him:

> "Potphar…bought him…and the Lord was with Joseph, and he was a prosperous man" (Gen. 39:1,2) or, as Whycliffe's quaint version puts it, "He was a lucky fellow".

But Joseph suffered yet deeper humiliation. He was falsely condemned and put into prison, a position not conducive to joy or peace, which often produces resentment and rebellion:

> "Joseph's master…put him into the prison…but the Lord was with Joseph…and that which he did, the Lord made it to prosper" (Gen. 39:20-23).

We are too apt to gauge our prosperity by our possessions or our standing in society, but these words reveal that truth prosperity is independent of circumstances: imprisonment my go hand in hand with prosperity, the deciding factor being the presence or absence of the Lord. The three men who were cast into the fiery furnace at the command of Nebuchadnezzar were certainly in an extremely perilous position, yet of them it could be written that upon their body the fire had no power, nor was an hair of their heads singed:

> "Did not we cast three men bound into the midst of the fire?"

Asked the king, and he continued:

> "Lo, I see four men loose, walking in the midst of the fire, and they have no hurt: and the form of the fourth is like the Son of God" (Dan.3:24,25).

Caleb, who wholly followed the Lord, knew the power of this blessed fellowship. At the division of the land under Joshua, Caleb came forward and reminded Joshua of what the Lord had said concerning both himself and Joshua forty-five years earlier:

> "Now therefore give me this mountain, whereof the Lord spake in that day; for thou heardest in that day how the Anakims were there, and that the cities were great and fences: if so be the Lord will be with me, then shall I be able to drive them out, as the Lord said…Hebron therefore became the inheritance of Caleb" (Josh 14:12-14).

Caleb's one qualification was: "if so be the Lord will be with me". That being granted, success was certain. The name of the place inherited by Caleb we Kirjath-arba and was named after Arba, a great man among the Anakims. The name was changed to Hebron, a word that means fellowship, and therefore enshrines the very thought of the gracious presence that Caleb so desired.

In His presence is fullness of joy, and that presence includes the promised: "I will not leave you", "I will not forsake you", and "I will be with you". Thus does the conscious enjoyment of the presence of the Lord minister to our joy.

"The joy of Thy salvation"

Despite the pressure of circumstances, the depressing effect of ill-health, the corrosion of care, and the anxieties that pertain to this life, the fact that God so loved the world as to give His only begotten Son, should lighten our everyday experience with joy.

The wise men from the east exemplify this. They had traveled far in search of the One that had been born King of the Jews, and, "when they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy" (Matt.2:10). Notice how the inspired narrative emphasizes their joy. It is not enough to say that "they were glad" or that "they rejoiced". They not only rejoiced, they rejoiced with joy and, more than that, with exceeding joy, yeah, exceeding great joy. And all this because the star at length stood over Bethlehem. What therefore ought to be our state of mind and heart who know not only the grace of Bethlehem, but the glory of Calvary, the triumph of the resurrection, and that ascension far above all!

Before the wise men found cause for rejoicing, the promise even of the forerunner of Christ was associated with joy. To Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, the angel said: "And thou shalt have joy and gladness, and many shall rejoice at his birth" (Luke 1:14).

When Christ was born, not only did men rejoice, but angels too, were moved to say, "Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy" (Luke 2:10).

The gospel is not only glad tidings of great joy that heralded the Saviour's birth, but an ever-living power unto salvation, and this, too, should lead us to rejoice. The Lord assures us that "there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth" (Luke 15:10). In spite of darkness of the present day, sinners are still repenting, and joy is still experienced in heaven. Shall we not also share this joy? Shall we not find a ground of rejoicing in every trophy of grace?

The report that God has opened a door of faith in any district should, if we are in the right spirit, fill us with joy:

> "They passed through Phenice and Samaria, declaring the conversion of the Gentiles: and they caused great joy unto all the brethren" (Acts 15:3).

Paul and Barnabas were on their way to Jerusalem to battle for the faith. They might have caused a great deal of harm had they discussed this matter with the churches in Phenice and Samaria. They chose the better path, and left great joy behind them.

Let us be unselfish in this matter of joy and will be flow like a river.

"The joy set before"

Writing to the church at Thessalonians the Apostle says that he gives thanks and prays unceasingly concerning their work of faith, labour of love, and patience of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ, in the sight of God and our Father, and then proceeds to tell them that he knew that they were the elect of God: "Knowing, brethren beloved, your election of God" (1 Thess.1:4).

While Paul has been the recipient of an abundance of revelations, and had received the stewardship of the mysteries of God, and had been caught away to paradise, there to hear unspeakable words, there is nowhere any suggestion that Paul or any many could ever look into the Book of Life, or that any man ever received from God private information concerning His elective purposes. Yet Paul knew that the Thessalonian saints were elect of God. He knew it by their fruits.

We may on some occasion have walked through an orchard. We may have admired and sampled some of its luscious fruits. Throughout the whole of our exploration of that orchard we should probably have not seen one single root, yet we should "know" that the invisible roots were there and functioning properly by reason of the visible fruit. So Paul saw the fruits of faith:

> "For our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance; as ye know what manner of men we were among you for your sake. And ye become followers of us, and of the Lord, having received the word in much afflictions, with joy of the Holy Ghost" (1 Thess.1:5,6).

The place that joy occupies here is only seen in true perspective as we view it in juxtaposition with the "much affliction". This is a spiritual joy, the fruit of the Spirit, and therefore in no wise dependent upon external circumstances. The reception of the gospel in its saving power, though accompanied by afflictions without, was accompanied by joy within, a joy that no man takes away.

In like manner, the Hebrew saints: "took joyfully the spoiling of their goods" (Heb.10:34). Unless there be some compensating element, no person takes joyfully the spoiling of his goods, and these Hebrew believers were not abnormal; they no more liked to see their poverty ruined than we should, but their joy was an anticipation of future glory:

> "Knowing in yourselves that ye have in heaven a better and an enduring substance (Heb.10:34).

This is the spirit of the Lord Himself:

> "Who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God" (Heb.12:2).

Thus all present joy is an anticipation of those pleasures which are for evermore at God's right hand. To live looking for that blessed hope will minister to our joy even though goods are spoiled and afflictions suffered.

C. H. WELCH

Helpers of your Joy

A great cause of rejoicing.

If we were asked what constituted our greatest joy, what should we answer? Our individual answers would probably reveal our spiritual apprehension. One very old saint has left on record what constituted his greatest joy, and we may profit by considering it:

> "I rejoiced greatly, when the brethren came and testified of the truth that is in thee, even as thou walkest in the truth. I have no greater joy than to hear that my children walk in truth" (3 John 3,4).

Here is a ground of rejoicing, far removed from personal feelings or motives, that we should do well to know. In his first epistle, it will be remembered this same Apostle had much to say concerning those who say and those who walk (1 John 1:6-10) Further he wrote:

> "He that saith, I know Him, and keepeth not His commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him" (1 John 2:4).
>
> " He that saith he abideth in Him ought to himself also so to walk, even as He walked" (1 John 2:6).

John sums up his teaching in the words of 1 John 3:18:

> "My little children, let us not love in word, neither in tongue; but in deed and truth".

He speaks scathingly of the boast of light that is accompanied by hatred of the brethren (1 John 2:9). He tells his readers that the doing of righteousness is the finest evidence that they are born of Him (1 John 2:29). He declares that all the boasted possession of the love of God is nullified by lack of love (1 John 3:17; 4:20). He had written telling them of the many antichrists and of the domination of the lie. In his second epistle he said: "I rejoiced greatly that I found of thy children walking in truth" (2 John 4), and, as we have seen, in his third epistle he says that he has no greater joy than to hear that his children walk in truth.

Some of us are apt t look around with the eyes of Elijah and say: "I only am left, and they seek my life". The Apostle tells us to consider others better than ourselves, and if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, to reckon, or impute, these things. If we do not rejoice greatly whenever we hear of the Lord's children putting into practice the doctrine they have learned, we have missed a real cause of joy, and allowed on part of our spiritual life to remain undeveloped. True joy is unselfish, and finds its cause in the blessing of others.

"Count it all joy".

We found that John has no greater joy than to hear that his children walked in truth. What should we say we counted "all joy" if we were asked? James writing to the dispersion said:

> "My brethren, count it all joy when we fall into divers temptations" (Jas 1:2).

This is certainly not a natural point of view. Most of us would count it all joy if we had escaped divers temptations. James, however, makes it clear that he is no misanthrope, no man who is only happy when he is miserable. He proceeds to explain:

> "Knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience. But let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing. Blessed is the man that endureth temptation: for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love Him" (Jas 1:3, 4:12).

He can count it all joy and be called blessed, not because of the temptations themselves, but because of their issue.

In their meaning in modern usage, the words "temptation" and "tempt" are somewhat limited, but the true meaning, that of making trial, is still found in the word "attempt", into which none dream of reading any idea of temptation. Temptation, or trial, can then be contemplated with joy by reason of its effects. It works patience, it leads to full maturity, it may at last lead to a crown. Much in the same spirit are the words of Paul in Romans 5:3,4: "We glory in tribulation", he said, not for tribulation's own sake, but because we know that "tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope". Peter also conveys much the same thought when he says:

> "That the trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth (though it be tried with fire), might be found unto praise and honour and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ" (1 Pet. 1:7).

Joy therefore may accrue from the most joyless of circumstances. We look beyond the present and immediate experience to see what its outworking will be. And if temptation or trial produces patience then we may rejoice in hope of the glory of God. It is good to cultivate an eye for this joy, or it may remain hidden and unseen in many a dark circumstance.

"Unspeakable Joy"

Zacharias was smitten with dumbness because of his unbelief. Christ was as a lamb dumb before his shearers. Yet again, some are rendered dumb through very excess of joy. The nearer any experience is the heart of things the less inclined are we to discuss it or talk about it. There is peace that passeth understanding, and there is a joy that is unspeakable:

> "Whom having not seen, ye love; in Whom, though now ye see Him not, yet believing, ye rejoice unspeakable and full of glory" (1 Pet. 1:8).

There is a close connection between the invisible, "Ye see Him not", and the unspeakable in this verse. At times we are tempted to endorse the desire expressed in the children's hymn where it says:

> "I wish that His hand had been placed on my head,
> That His arms had been thrown around me;
> And that I might have seen His kind look when He said,
> 'Let the little ones come unto Me' ".

Yet the Saviour Himself pronounces a blessing upon those who believed although they had been seen Him:

> "Jesus saith unto him, Thomas, because thou has seen Me, thou has believed: blessed are they who believed: blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed" (John 20:29).

And the Apostle wrote to the Corinthians:

Let This Mind be in You

pp. 90 - 94

In the context of 'lowliness of mind' or humility of mind (Phil. ii. 3, 5), Paul writes to the Philippian Christians exhorting them "Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus".

Many are the exhortations in Christian circles today to be humble, an emphasis which we hasten to add is perfectly Scriptural. Yet before the exhortation can be effective, we need to know what is meant by humility. Is humility an attitude to life which prevents us from either having convictions, or having them, from expressing them? "Hast thou convictions? Have them to thyself" seems to be the principle behind much that passes for humility at the present time. To be humble in the popular sense, we must be spineless and opinionless, always charming, and not daring to disagree with anybody. Or there is the self-conscious humility which results in a person well able to perform a particular task, and aware of the ability, responding "I could not possibly do that—I am sure some one else could do it much better".

There are two particular references in Scripture which lay down the fundamental of humility: I Pet. v. 6 reads "Humble yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of God, that He may exalt you in due season". Similarly, James writes (iv. 10) "Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord, and He shall lift you up". True humility is 'under the mighty hand of the Lord', is 'in the sight of the Lord'—and such humility may, on occasions, appear 'in the sight of men' to be nothing short of sheer arrogance and conceit. A member of a committee spoke out of strongly, sincerely held Scriptural convictions against a proposed course of action, and was met with the response 'What we need is a little humility'. In such a situation the believer's response can only be 'whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye' (Acts iv. 19).

But for the most perfect exposition of true humility, we must look to the passage following Paul's exhortation to "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus" (Phil. ii. 5-11).

Here is One (verse 6) "Who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God". The Companion Bible tells us that en morphe (the Greek translated 'in the form') signifies 'in the essential form of God' Thayer says 'the form by which a person or thing strikes the vision, the external appearance'. Perhaps we might paraphrase it by saying "Who was obviously God". The thought takes us back to John i. 1—"In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God". In essence God and Christ Jesus are indistinguishable. The significance of this fact is that here is a Being Who alone, either in or out of creation, has every right to insist upon His rights, to assert His abilities and claim His position. Yet, being in the essential form of God, He 'thought it not robbery to be equal with God'.

The word ‘robbery’ has been variously explained: The Schofield Bible margin gives ‘a thing to be grasped after’ and suggests the comparison of Gen. iii. 5-6, where Eve considered that to ‘be as gods’ was something worth disobeying the explicit command of God in order to obtain it. The Concordant Version renders the phrase ‘deems it not pillaging to be equal to God’; another suggestion is that He “thought it not a robber’s prize”. Christ’s equality with God was not considered by Him to be of such value as to merit the deliberate disregard of God’s will, nor to the extent of violently clinging to it at all costs. Here is the basic principle of Christian humility; nothing, nothing at all must hinder us from submission to the will of God. Our ‘rights’, any intrinsic ‘worth’ we may consider we have, reputation or standing, all must be laid under the mighty hand of God.

The next two verses of the passage go on to detail the extent to which Christ Jesus submitted to the will of God. He ‘made Himself of no reputation’, as the A.V. renders it. More accurately ‘He emptied Himself’. This does not for one moment suggest that (as some say), He became a mere man, with a man’s limitations—‘a child of His times’ is the phrase often used. He emptied Himself in the sight of God, not before men. An illustration which perhaps gives some help is that of a prince who wishes to discover for himself how some of his countrymen live; he divests himself of all his ‘royalty’, dresses and lives exactly as do his countrymen, and goes to live among them as one of them. He is still ‘royal’, he has not renounced royalty, and could, if he so wished at any time, exercise all the authority of royalty; but for the time being he has ‘humbled’ himself before the king. Having thus emptied Himself, Christ then further humbled Himself, “and took upon Him the form of a servant”—He took upon Him the essential form of a slave. He obviously became what all men should be, the bond-servant of God; He chose to have no will but the will of His Father.

“And being found in fashion as a man” continues Paul, saying in effect “as if this was not sufficient for such an One”, “being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself (yet further), and became obedient unto death”. He hearkened to the point of death. There were no limits to His submission to the Father. Indeed, when the disciples returned from the city where they went to buy meat, to Jacob’s well where the Lord had spoken with the woman of Samaria, He told them (John iv. 34) “My meat is to do the will of Him that sent Me, and to finish His work”. It was as necessary for the Lord to do the Father’s will as it was to eat, even though that will meant death. Here we touch the mystery of Christ’s humility and obedience; the Deathless One becoming obedient to the point of death. Could there be greater abasement, greater submission than that? Yes! for He “became obedient unto death, even the death of the Cross”. We find it difficult to appreciate the full force of ‘even the death of the Cross’. The appropriation of the Cross as the symbol of various organizations of mercy such as the Red Cross, has surrounded the Cross with an aura of kindness, if not sentimentality. The sheer brutality, horror, shame and suffering of death on the Cross would have given tremendous force to Paul’s readers in the words ‘even the death of the Cross’. In His humility and submission to God, Christ Jesus held back nothing. Had greater submission and humiliation been possible, and a necessary part of God’s will for His Son, it would still have been His ‘meat’.

Let this mind be in you! Can we be so minded, to look upon anything God may purpose for us as our necessary food? If we can begin, as the old hymn puts it, to recognize that:

> "He did it for me, He did it for me
> A sinner as guilty as guilty could be",

we have our feet on the first rung of the ladder which leads to that true humility which is total submission to the demands of 'the mighty hand of God'.

But what was the inspiration that carried our Lord through such depths of humiliation for us? We read in Heb. xii. 2 that it was 'for the joy that was set before Him (He) endured the Cross, despising the shame'. "He shall exalt you in due season" (I Pet. v. 6), "He shall lift you up" (James iv. 10). If we humble ourselves under the mighty hand of God, this will be the result. Christ Jesus having 'endured the Cross, despising the shame, is set down at the right hand of the throne of God'. This is very much in accord with the passage we are considering, for it continues (Phil. ii. 9-11) "Wherefore God also hath highly exalted Him, and given Him the name which is above every name, in order that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father". The Lord kept the end in view; His mind was set on things above, not on the earth, and for the joy set before Him He endured even unto the death of the Cross.

The end, for the Lord, was that He should be given THE Name which is above every name, that for the glory of God the Father every knee in the universe should bow, should submit, to Him, and every tongue confess (homologeo—say the same thing, agree) that Jesus Christ is Lord. At last the conflict is over, every rebel knee has submitted. Yes, every knee, even the knee of the arch-rebel Satan. This does not mean, as some have feared and some have hoped, that Satan will be restored, forgiven, for it is clear from Rev. xx. 10, 14 that the Adversary's end is in the Lake of Fire, which is the second death; destruction is his lot. Yet ere that takes place the confession will have been drawn from him that 'Jesus Christ is Lord', and that not wrung from his unwilling lips by inquisitorial methods, but to the Glory of God the Father. One meaning of doxa, glory, is reputation; the end of all Christ's humiliation and sufferings will be that the Father's reputation will be established, even from the lips of him who from the beginning has been a liar. What joy that thought must bring to the heart of Him Who for the joy that was set before Him endured!

It is not wrong for us to bear in mind the joy that is set before us; even if it is only a little part we may have in establishing the reputation of God as we submit to Him, and to Him alone. Indeed, as we have seen both Peter and James link the humbling of ourselves before God with the fact that, in His Own time, He will exalt us, lift us up.

In Phil. iii. Paul tells how, in submitting to the mighty hand of God, he counts all things but dung for the joy of coming to know Christ. His inspiration is the 'prize of the calling on high of God in Christ Jesus'—he pursues this prize, and the word he uses is that often translated ‘persecute’. With all the intensity, zeal and energy with which persecution is carried out, Paul devotes himself to the submission of himself to God and His will to the extent of ‘the fellowship of His sufferings and being made conformable unto His death’. He begins at the Cross in which alone he desires to glory, or boast; he continues with the intense desire for the prize of the upward calling of God in Christ Jesus, with the desire for that exaltation in due time which is the lot of those who humble themselves under the mighty hand of God.

Humble yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of God that He may exalt you in due season. Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus.

Male and Female Created He Them

(A consideration of the God-ordained positions of man and woman.)

No.9. The Calling of Woman (cont).

Under this title, 'The Calling of Woman', it was noticed in the previous article that the Scriptural conception is that woman was originally made as an 'help meet' for the man; she was created 'on account of' the man (Gen. ii. 18; I Cor. xi. 9). This being so, her peculiar calling, as a woman, cannot be properly understood without reference to the man's own peculiar calling. Hence some knowledge of what is involved in the headship of man is necessary, since that includes the idea of a relationship established between the two parties.

Also in the last article was discussed, just how far that part of the calling of woman which involved her originally in motherhood, is relevant today in the 'heavenlies' calling. If, as far as this latter point is concerned, it was not possible to quote Scripture so that there could be no doubt as to what God's will really is, at least it was possible to give some small guidance to the believer so that, as before the Lord, he could form his own judgment.

It might be as well, at this point, to remind the believer that when he (or she) is called upon to make specific judgments of such a nature as is mentioned above (i.e. with respect to the role of motherhood in the present calling of God), such judgments ought to be formed basically from general principles laid down in Scripture, and not from current views popular in the unbelieving world, or even professing Christendom.

"Civilization" (for all the respectability of the modern usage) has derived from the idea of living in cities, and it is not without significance that the first 'city' was built by Cain, after he 'went out from the Presence of the Lord' (Gen. iv. 16, 17). The next references are equally ominous, referring to Nimrod (whose kingdom began with Babel) and associated with judgment (Gen. x. 8-12; xi. 1-9). Those who sought to live by faith, looked only for a city 'whose builder and maker is God' (Heb. xi. 1, 2, 8-10).

It is not surprising, in the light of this, that although civilization, in the widest sense of that term, has conferred what are generally recognized as benefits, it has also led to a feeling of independence from God (even doubting His existence).

When the western world changed from an agricultural to an industrial society, civilization began to take on a new form, in which the distinction between man and woman's callings has slowly become more and more blurred. Two world wars have conditioned the mind to the acceptance of women working in almost every sphere, even in places of leadership, so that now, to return to the Scriptural conception of the calling of woman, is to be branded as denying the 'rights' that belong to her. Yet it behoves the believer, in the face of popular opinion, to have nothing to do with beliefs which are grounded on the world's misconceptions, and it particularly behoves Christian women (who could so easily be taken in by the emotional cries of "women's rights") to see that their own position is built upon nothing other than the Word of God.

It was felt necessary to give this long introduction in view of the vexed subject which is to follow, involving the thoughts of leadership and teaching in women. So often judgments are formed on the basis of current trends, the professing church taking its lead from the world; following, rather than setting the pattern. So often 'progress' is confused with 'change', whereas true 'progress' often means going back to old standards, not bringing in new. So it is with the calling of woman.

When the wind of 'emancipation' blew through the western world, it blew out a number of things, which on the basis of Scripture ought never to have been there in the first place, and which detracted from woman's essential equality with man; but it has also since brought with it other things which no godly woman can, again in the light of Scripture, have anything to do with.

Praying and teaching.

It is essential to an understanding of Paul's argument in I Tim. ii. concerning the place of woman with respect to prayer and teaching, for the reader to have in mind the events which led up to the tragedy in the garden of Eden. For this reason it is advisable that the reader should look again at Gen. iii. 1-7, keeping in mind those things which have already been observed in article No.6 (concerning 'identification') and article No.7 (under the title 'the deception of the woman'). Briefly they are as follows:

(1) Identification. Paul's word concerning all women is based upon the position and failure of Eve in Eden.

(2) Deception. The woman was cleverly weaned from the Word of God (which she misquoted and minimized) to form her own judgment on the basis of what she 'saw'. She was 'thoroughly deceived'.

(3) Authority. Woman as not equipped to withstand the cunning of the serpent by reasoning with him on the Word of God; this was not her place in God's "order". Adam was so equipped, having been entrusted with the guardianship of the garden and the commandment concerning the tree of knowledge. He was not therefore deceived.

I Tim. ii. 8-15 is a passage about which diverse views have been entertained, a fact which seems strange in the light of the clear statements of the Apostle (at least concerning the teaching of women). Verse 12 cannot surely be gainsaid under any circumstances, except those which do away with the conviction that 'all Scripture is given by inspiration of God' (II Tim. iii. 16) and reckon Paul to be giving his own opinion which may be accepted or rejected at will. A brief structure of the whole epistle was given by C. H. Welch in Volume XXXII of The Berean Expositor and in my next article I shall relate this to the subject before us.

pp. 25 - 31

Consideration has been given to Paul's word in I Tim. ii. 12 in the light of the background of Eden (verses 13, 14), concerning the teaching of women. Based upon her position in creation, 'Adam was first formed, then Eve' and her handling, and consequent 'deception', with the Word of God, Paul states unequivocally:

> "I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence."

These words do not indicate any 'personal bias' but are as much a part of the Word of God as any others Paul wrote. They represent truth for all generations of the present age, and may not be considered as applying only to the society in which Paul lived.

But whilst the above is true with respect to the teaching of the Word of God, it ought not to be missed that certain women are instructed to 'teach' in another context:

> "Bid the older women . . . . . to teach what is good, and so train the young women to love their husbands and children, to be sensible, chaste, domestic, kind, and submissive to their husbands, that the word of God may not be discredited" (Titus ii. 3-5, R.S.V.).

One ought not to discount this important part placed by the woman in bringing up her children, which must include some aspects of 'teaching', although not so as to contradict Eph. vi. 4:

> "Ye fathers, provoke not your children to wrath: but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord."

From Titus ii. it may be gathered that the 'home' was to play a large part in the calling of woman (especially married women), and the 'older women' were considered (no doubt because of their long experience in such matters) to be in a position to train (or 'school') the younger ones in this sphere of life. It may be noted that when, in a context dealing with the advisability of marriage for younger widows, Paul mentions the 'house', he uses the strong word oikodespoteo, master or rule of the house, in connection with the woman's place (I Tim. v. 14).

One cannot help observing also, that 'hospitality' was to characterize the believer (Rom. xii. 13; Heb. xiii. 2; I Pet. iv. 9), and there can be no doubt that such, whilst it was enjoined upon the man (cp. I Tim. iii. 2), greatly involved the woman (I Tim. v. 9, 10). It is sad indeed to see even Christian women despising the home, with all its important commitments, as though it represented some inferior part of life. Such have not appreciated what an important role it plays in the exhibition of truth in practice, as is witnessed by Eph. v. 22 - vi. 4. To speak of a 'kitchen sink philosophy' in connection with those who advocate a return to the Scriptural position of woman, is to misrepresent the whole case. If woman is to be degraded at all, it will not be by accepting her God-ordained position in the economy of God, but by usurping it. Shame is first associated in Scripture with the results of stepping out of God's arrangement (Gen. iii. 6, 7), and a woman's part in the home is to be lived out so that 'the word of God may not be discredited' (Titus ii. 3-5).

It is quite evident from the writings of both Paul and Peter, that they considered the great strength of womanhood to lie, not in ability to discourse on the Word of truth, but in:

> "the immortal beauty of a gentle, modest spirit, which in the sight of God is of rare value" (I Pet. iii. 4, Moffatt).

A husband, disobedient to the Word, may even be won over by such humble, quiet and unpretentious conduct (I Pet. iii. 1-4).

Prayer

Closely connected with Paul's statement concerning the position of woman with respect to teaching, is another dealing with prayer:

> "I desire therefore that the men pray in every place."

This quotation from the R.V. of I Tim. ii. 8 more accurately represents the original; the A.V. rather obscuring the sense. The verse obviously refers to leading in prayer in an assembly, as all (both men and women) pray in such a company.

Here again, diverse views have been, and still are held as to whether a woman ought to lead in prayer in any assembly. Sometimes an ellipsis has been supplied so that verses 8 and 9 read thus:

> "I will therefore that men pray everywhere, lifting up holy hands . . . . . In like manner also, that women pray everywhere, adorning themselves in modest apparel . . . . ."

In this way the equal right of women with men to lead in public prayer is maintained. But the weight of evidence is against this rendering, and it is not adopted by any of the following well known versions: A.V., R.V., R.S.V., Moffatt, Weymouth, Rotherham, J.N.D., N.E.B.

The context in which the 'adornment' of women is mentioned is however involved with prayer, and it may be that the instructions given by Paul 'refer particularly to their dress and deportment at public prayer' (F. F. Bruce). What is foremost in Paul's mind is 'the impropriety of women exploiting their physical charms on such occasions, and also the emotional disturbance they are liable to cause their male fellow-worshippers' (J.N.D.Kelly in his Commentary on 1Timothy in loco). Women take part in prayer as much as men, but should not lead. Such a word, coming from the Apostle and in this context, is in complete harmony with all that he has taught concerning the God-ordained position of the woman in the present dispensation.

Some however see a difference between what they call 'public' and 'private' prayer, reckoning 'public prayer' to be of a formal nature, such as would take place in a church or chapel, whilst 'private prayer' belongs to gatherings in homes or similar 'informal' places. Before any comment is made on this concept, the reader might note again the literal rendering of I Tim. ii. 8 as given by the Englishman's Greek N.T.:

> "I will therefore the men to pray in every place."

Are we to distinguish between 'public' and 'private' prayer in the light of Paul's "every place"? Also, can it really be maintained that the place where people are met for prayer and the nature (formal or informal) of the meeting, makes any difference to the principle behind Paul's word, 'I will therefore the men to pray . . . . ."? Added to this it may be noted that no 'formal' church buildings existed at the period when Paul wrote, believers meeting in each others houses (Rom. xvi. 5; I Cor. xvi. 19; Col. iv. 15; Philemon 2); all meetings were, from that point of view, 'informal'.

There is no end to the qualifications that some people make to get round plain statements of Scriptures and find some loophole, whereby they can dodge the real issue. Such qualifications are particularly appealed to where subjects like the teaching and leading in prayer of women are concerned. Artificial divisions are invented (such as that between 'public' and 'private' above) which obscure the real issue and blunt the testimony of Scripture. But for those whose sole appeal is the Word itself, unadulterated by popular conceptions, there can be but one course, to face the truth and keep it all costs.

In the passage under review (I Tim. ii. 8-15) Paul's injunctions concerning the relationship of woman to leadership and teaching are based solidly upon O.T. Scripture (verses 13, 14). His whole position acknowledges the God-ordained places of 'male and female' (13). He was wise enough to see that for a man or woman to step out of what God had originally intended was to court tragedy (14); let all be done 'decently and in order'—God's "order". For that reason he instructed (with no contradiction from the Holy Spirit) that the ministry of teaching the Word of truth belonged to "faithful men . . . able to teach others also" (II Tim. ii. 2) and that overseership (even leading in prayer) belonged also amongst men. Was he wrong? Can we treat his words as 'personal views', biased by the society in which he lived? No reader of these pages will need the answer to such questions. Faithfulness must never be dispensed with in favour of usefulness.

Deacons

It has been observed that Phebe (a woman) is referred to by Paul in Rom. xvi. 1 as a 'deacon of the assembly in Cenchrea' (the A.V. has translated the Greek diakonos 'servant'). Diakonos (the verbal form is diakoneo, minister or serve) is used in the N.T. of 'servants' at a wedding feast (Matt. xxii. 13; John ii. 5), of rulers (Rom. xiii. 4), of Paul and Apollos (I Cor. iii. 5), of Tychicus (Eph. vi. 21), of Epaphras (Col. i. 7) and of Timothy (I Thess. iii. 2 omitted by some texts). In particular it ought to be noted that the word is used of Christ Himself:

> "Christ became a servant to the circumcised to show God's truthfulness, in order to confirm the promises given to the patriarchs . . . . ." (Rom. xv. 8 R.S.V.); as well as of the 'ministers' of Satan (II Cor. xi. 15). In its verbal form it is used of angels (Matt. iv. 11), of Peter's mother-in-law (Matt. viii. 15), of Martha (John xii. 2) and in connection with the 'seven' chosen to relieve the Twelve Apostles of 'serving tables' (Acts vi. 1-6).

In secular history diakonos had technical applications, being used of 'the holders of various offices' (1st century B.C.) and a religious connotation insofar that it is found in a 'list of temple officials' (circa B.C.100)—Moulton and Milligan.

Such a wide usage makes it difficult to define as a specific ministry in Rom. vi. 1, since it seems to cover every aspect of service in the propagation of the gospel. Later, in Christendom, a specific order of deacons arose, but the origin of such is obscure, and it is doubtful whether the present conception of 'deacons' bears much resemblance to the usage of the word in N.T. times.

The Lord associated the word diakonos with the thought of self-sacrifice, a necessary prelude to greatness:

> "Whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister; and whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant (doulos): even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto (diakoneo), but to minister (diakoneo), and to give His life a ransom for many" (Matt. xx. 26-28).

As applied to women in Scripture, it is obvious that we must not read anything into their 'ministry' which contradicts what has already been noted under the ideas of teaching and overseership. Such a wide usage of the term 'deacon' must not be made an excuse to open every aspect of 'ministry' to woman, against the prohibitions listed elsewhere. Phebe was a valued servant in the assembly at Cenchrea, but her particular ministry (whatever else it may have included, and here we cannot be specific) involved the fact that 'she hath been a succourer of many', including Paul himself (Rom. xvi. 1, 2) not that she had preached the gospel or taught the Word.

"Succourer" is the Greek prostatis, occurring only here: it means a protectress, patroness or helper. Moulton and Milligan, whilst not being able to cite any usage of the noun, quote the verb prostateo (circa B.C.252) where a son writes to his father:

> "There will be nothing of more importance for me than to look after you for the remainder of life, in a manner worthy of you, and worthy of me" (Vocabulary of the Greek N.T.).

It is quite obvious that this ministry of Phebe, in the light of the above observations, involved hospitality of a particularly sacrificial nature, even to the point of offering protection to such as Paul, perhaps at great personal risk to her own life (cp. Rom. xvi. 3, 4).

In I Tim. iii. 11, in the light of the context, it seems the verse must be understood of 'women deacons', as for example Weymouth, who renders 'deaconness' and the N.E.B. margin which suggests the same. The word diakonos is not of course present in this verse, but it would be strange indeed if, in a passage devoted to the qualifications of 'deacons' (verses 8 to 13) Paul has interpolated a reference to women in general.

The A.V. which sees these 'women' as the 'wives' of men to be chosen for the diaconate may possibly be correct, but as J. N. D. Kelly points out:

> "it is very strange that only deacons' wives are singled out for mention, since the overseers' wives occupied an even more influential position" (Commentary on 1Timothy in loco).

It is also logical to expect that since women did 'serve' in the assemblies (as witness Phebe at Cenchrea) then Paul would have given some instructions to Timothy for their appointment.

The qualifications for these deaconesses can perhaps be best appreciated from F. F. Bruce's paraphrase of I Tim. iii. 11:

> "Similarly, ministering women should be dignified in their conduct, free from any tendency to spread scandal, sober in their habits and marked by thorough fidelity" (Expanded Paraphrase).

It must not be imagined for one moment that because the woman is not allowed to hold positions which speak of leadership and authority, that she cannot contribute just as much as the man to both the spread of the gospel and the building up of believers. Paul valued highly the labours of those who were associated with him in the gospel, who had 'laboured side by side' with him (Phil. iv. 3). In his salutations he mentions a number of women, who in various ways had done much to the advancement of the gospel (Phebe, Priscilla, Mary, Tryphena, Tryphosa, the mother of Rufus, etc., Rom. xvi.). "Certain women" were also associated with the Lord's earthly ministry 'which ministered (diakoneo) unto Him of their substance' (Luke viii. 2, 3). None of these had apparently either preached or taught, but they will be just as much commended for the part they did play, as the men they laboured alongside.

No.49. The Epistle to the Philippians (16).

pp. 5 - 9

Although we have a chapter break at Phil. iii. 21, it is evident that the first verse of chapter iv. is linked with the previous subject matter:

> "Wherefore, my brethren beloved and longed for, my joy and crown, so stand fast in the Lord, my beloved" (Phil. iv. 1 R.V.).

The exhortation to 'stand fast' has been stressed in i. 27. The oneness of spirit, soul and mind of i. 17 is repeated in iv. 2 as is the thought of 'striving together' sunathleo (i. 27 and iv. 3). Paul includes words of endearment reminiscent of his tribute to the Thessalonian believers (I Thess. ii. 19) "my joy and crown". Epipothetoi, 'longed for', recalls the words of i. 8 where he expresses his ardent desire to see the Philippians again. They would be his 'crown' in the Day of Christ, the seal of his apostleship, but the all important thing was to 'stand fast' and not yield an inch in faithful witness to the Truth, and this is just as important today and should constantly be before the minds of all of us.

The Apostle now addresses a personal message to two women who were evidently prominent in the Philippian church:

> "I exhort Euodia, and I exhort Syntyche, to be of the same mind in the Lord. Yea, I beseech thee also, true yokefellow, help these women, for they laboured with me in the gospel, with Clement also and the rest of my fellow-workers, whose names are in the book of life" (iv. 2, 3 R.V.).

These believers had evidently quarreled and imperilled the unity of the assembly. Women figured prominently in the beginning of the work at Philippi (Acts xvi. 13) and were held in high esteem in this part of the world. Bishop Lightfoot comments:

> "The active zeal of the women in this country is a remarkable fact, without parallel in the Apostle's history elsewhere and only to be compared with their prominence at an earlier date in the personal ministry of our Lord."

The rift between the two women mentioned had its dangers for there was always the possibility of a split developing in the church, some supporting one and some of other. This has happened countless times in Christian circles, much to the delight of the evil one whose object is to divide the brethren and ruin the witness. Paul now appeals to a third person whom he addresses as 'true yokefellow'. As this adjective is in the masculine form it must refer to a man and there have been many guesses as to who he was. Some link him with Epaphroditus or Luke. Others take the two words together as a proper name—"Syzygos (comrade), truly so called", but no trace of such a name has been found elsewhere.

Clement is the name of a believer in the Philippian assembly otherwise unknown. Some have tried to identify him with Clement, the bishop of Rome, but this is an unlikely conjecture. The name was common in the first century and would be familiar in a Roman colony like Philippi.

It is better not to guess, and one thing is sure—even though we do not know his name, he was certainly not forgotten by the Lord, for his record was in the "book of life". God's record in a 'book' occurs in the Old Testament as well as the New (Exod.xxxii.32; Psa. lxix. 28; cxxxix. 16) and in Luke x. 20 the Lord bids His followers to 'rejoice, because your names are written in heaven'. The Revelation has a lot to say concerning the record contained in 'books'. Biblion occurs 19 times; and biblos five times in connection with the 'book of life'. The important thing to realize is though men forget Christian virtues and service, God never does. He takes note and will praise and reward at the last all that has been faithfully accomplished with His glory in view.

Paul now sounds a stirring note:

> "Rejoice in the Lord always: again I will say, rejoice" (iv. 4 R.V.).

Earlier on we noted that, in spite of the suffering and conflict, real and abiding joy was possible. It is important to note that the ground of the believer's rejoicing is the Lord not circumstances. These may indeed be adverse and perplexing, but the Saviour, Who is the 'same yesterday, today and for ever' is the solid Rock on which we can always rely and in Whom we can constantly rejoice.

The Apostle now appeals for 'moderation' or 'forbearance' (verse 5 R.V.). It is not easy to find an English equivalent for epieikes. Kindliness, thoughtfulness for others, graciousness, yieldingness, are some of the shades of meaning it contains. C. H. Welch puts it beautifully when he says 'grace alone can enable the believer to exhibit at the same time inflexible tenacity, infinite gentleness, incorruptible loyalty, and a willingness to yield to every legitimate claim made by others" (The Prize of the High Calling, p.183).

"The Lord is near." This is another reason given to show forth this Christian grace. Some expositors read this as though it said 'the Lord's coming is near', but parousia does not occur in the context, nor is there any need to supply it. Psa. cxlv. 18 declares that 'the Lord is near to all them that call upon Him' and this has been always a consoling truth. He is always near at hand to guide, strengthen, encourage and bless. Paul continues:

> "In nothing be anxious; but everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall guard your hearts and your thoughts in Christ Jesus" (iv. 6, 7 R.V.).

Merimnao is translated in the A.V. 'take thought" with the future in view six times in Matt. vi. and is misleading, for wise provision for the future is right (I Tim. v. 8). It is foreboding or worry that is wrong and the Lord is referring to anxiety in the first Gospel. It has been said that 'hard work seldom kills, but worry does'. There was surely never a time like the present when increasing pressure is being brought to bear on us all in so many ways. Hence the turning to drugs and tranquilizers to ease the tension. But the wise believer, who casts all his cares on the Lord experiences something that is infinitely better and always works! In the place of worry comes the 'peace of God that passes all understanding'. He may not get all his requests answered in the way he desires, but he is assured of one answer always, the answer of peace.

"Our requests" covers every problem both spiritual and temporal to which the ingredient of 'thanksgiving' should always be added. Ingratitude is one of the basest of sins. We may not know how to pray as we ought, but we can always praise! A moment's reflection on the many blessings spiritual and physical which we constantly receive will provide subject matter for our prayers, and if we kept in this grateful state of mind, ever realizing what we owe to the Lord, we shall not stray far from His will day by day. "Peace with God" is the experience of the believer on realizing what salvation and justification by faith in Christ really means. The peace of God can be the permanent possession as all anxieties are cast upon Him. He offers to be our permanent burden-bearer! (Psa. lv. 22), and then we can continually know what is to have the God of peace with us and near us (Phil. iv. 9) all through our journey home to glory. Then indeed our hearts and minds are 'guarded' or protected by Him and nothing can enter that can harm.

> "Finally, my brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honourable, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things" (iv. 8 R.V.).

It is important in this context to realize that logizesthe, 'think' does not mean merely to 'meditate upon', but to 'reckon' or 'take account of' (see R.V. margin here). It is one of the important words of Rom. iv., where it is translated 'reckon', and 'impute'. This long list of graces is not given just to think about, but to 'take account of' in our own lives and the lives of other believers.

Instead of the tendency of criticize others, which we all have in some measure, how much better it would be to note these graces in other fellow-members of the Body of Christ and to thank God for them! How much easier Christian work and witness would be if this was our daily practice! It has been point out by expositors that this list gives the ideals and accepted virtues of pagan morality. If this was so, how much more should they be present in the life of the redeemed! "Virtue" is a frequent word in classical Greek, and is only used here by the Apostle Paul. It only occurs elsewhere in the N.T. twice in Peter's epistles (II Pet. i. 3, 5). Perhaps 'excellence' is the best translation of it.

"Praise" can be construed as 'what deserves praise' or 'anything that calls down the approval of the Lord'. The Apostle who followed the Lord so closely could point to his own example without egotism, for pre-eminently Paul was a man who practiced what he preached to others. Learned, received, heard and seen show how true this was and we should remember that before there was a complete N.T. the truth of God was learned, received, heard and seen in the lives and practice of the Apostles. They were indeed a living Bible! May we in our measure live the truth every day in the sight of others who are often totally ignorant of God and His Word.

No.50. The Epistle to the Philippians (17).
pp. 21 - 25

The Apostle Paul now gives attention to the gift the Philippian church had sent by means of Epaphroditus (iv. 18):

> "But I rejoice in the Lord greatly, that now at length ye have revived your thought for me; wherein ye did indeed take thought, but ye lacked opportunity" (iv. 10 R.V.).

The arrival of the gift caused great rejoicing in the Apostle's heart to the Lord. Paul was a man who was obviously sensitive where gifts of money or goods were concerned. The last thing he wanted was for anyone to think that he expected them to give him presents. He had a natural independence that could never stoop to begging. Yet on the other hand, when such gifts were made as a free expression of love, he was deeply touched and showed his appreciation. This is seen quite clearly in the context we are considering.

He declared that the Philippians' concern for him had flourished again. Not that they had forgotten his needs, but they had had no previous opportunity of showing practically their regard for him. Anethalete is found only here in the N.T. but is used in the LXX of Ezek. xvii. 24 of trees 'blooming again'. Ekaireisthe (you were unable to find occasion) is another word occurring only once in the N.T. and rarely elsewhere. Normally Paul supplied his own needs by working with his own hands, although he had declared that those who proclaim the gospel should live of the gospel (I Cor. ix. 11-15), yet he hated to be a burden to anyone:

> ". . . . . I seek not yours, but you: for the children ought not to lay up for the parents, but the parents for the children" (II Cor. xii. 14).

Although he was obviously in need in his Roman prison, yet he would never complain about it, and now he is going to explain to the Philippians how it was possible to be completely independent of circumstances:

> "Not that I speak in respect of want: for I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therein to be content. I know how to be abased, and I know also how to abound: in everything and in all things I have learned the secret both to be filled and to be hungry, both to abound and to be in want. I can do all things in Him that strengtheneth me" (Phil. iv. 11-13, R.V.).

The Apostle had indeed "learned", but it was not from a book but rather in the school of experience. Autarkes is yet another word only occurring here, meaning

"self-sufficient, independent" (Manual Greek Lexicon of the N.T. by Abbott-Smith). 'Content' as the A.V. is misleading, as is the translation 'therewith'. The R.V. is the better rendering, 'therein'. Paul was not content with his circumstances, but he was independent IN them. The Stoics used the same word and tried to face with equanimity and resolution all that life brought to them in difficulty and sorrow, but they attempted this in their own strength and often failed. Paul, however, is going to reveal his secret as to how he lived victoriously under all conditions however extreme. He could have everything and yet nothing. He could be full and at another time empty; he could be abased and yet abound. 'I have been initiated into a secret' he declared, using mueo a word which primarily meant 'to initiate into the mysteries' of the pagan cults.

The Lord had made known to Paul many secrets. He was indeed a steward of the mysteries (secrets) of God, and many of us are rejoicing in the great ones revealed in Eph. iii. But here was a secret devoted entirely to practice:

> "I have strength for everything in Him Who makes me strong" (iv. 13).

The Apostle had no 'confidence in the flesh' (iii. 3). He was well aware of his own weakness, yet realized that it was in this condition he could experience the mighty resurrection power of the risen and ascended Christ.

To him the Saviour revealed:

> "And He said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee: for My strength is made perfect in weakness. Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me . . . . . for when I am weak, then am I strong" (II Cor. xii. 9, 10).

Here is the secret then that we all must learn to put into practice if we are going to triumph over all circumstances instead of being overwhelmed by them, that is absolute confidence in the power of the Lord's resurrection that can 'work in us', and no confidence in self. No wonder Paul aimed at realizing more and more in experience of the 'power of His resurrection'! (iii. 10) and the Lord's ability to match every situation that could occur.

Paul now resumes his appreciation of the Philippian church's assistance: "Howbeit ye did well, that ye had fellowship with my affliction". To 'have fellowship' or 'share' meant more than appreciating doctrine together. It meant to share practically in another's need, and this characterized the Philippians' relationship with the Apostle from the very beginning of his gospel work at Philippi (verse 15) and later on when he was at Thessalonica. They had sent gifts to him 'once and again', that is, more than once they had practically remembered him. The Apostle here uses commercial terms fruit, abound, account. He did not personally seek any gift. His overriding desire was 'fruit that increaseth to your account' (verse 17 R.V.). Moule translates this as 'the interest which is accruing to your credit'. The Philippian gift was like an investment that would repay rich dividends in the service of the Lord, as accumulating interest stands to the credit of a depositor which, in the day of Christ, would not go unrecognized by the righteous Judge (II Tim. iv. 8).

> "But I have all things, and abound: I am filled, having received from Epaphroditus the things that came from you, an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God. And my God shall fulfil every need of yours according to His riches in glory in Christ Jesus" (iv. 18, 19 R.V.).

"I have all and abound." The papyri throw light on the special meaning of I have, apecho. In every day use it meant 'I have received', a technical expression for drawing up a receipt. The R.S.V. renders it 'I have received full payment, and more". The Apostle uses this in an illustrative sense, and now he describes the gift as not only pleasing to him, but pleasing to the Lord (verse 18). It was like an 'odour of sweet smell' using O.T. symbolism in connection with the sweet savour sacrifices which ascended to the Lord as something specially fragrant. The Apostle used terms which he employed of the supreme sacrifice of Christ in Eph. v. 2. What an honour that any service for the Lord can be bracketed with His! Paul's own service had been likened to the pouring out of a drink offering on the sacrifice and service of the faith (ii. 17). It looks as though all real and effective service for the Lord will be touched by sacrifice. What costs us little is not worth much in His sight. And is not our love for Him measured by how much we are prepared to spend ourselves, just that and no more? David said 'neither will I offer burnt offerings to the Lord my God which doth cost me nothing' (II Sam. xxiv. 24). May we ever be willing to give without stint to Him of ourselves and our possessions and then the next verse in Philippians will be true in our experience:

> "And my God shall fulfil every need of yours according to His riches in glory in Christ Jesus" (iv. 19 R.V.).

The A.V. 'but' is misleading. Verse 19 is not disassociated from verse 18 as 'but' suggests. The thought is 'you have been generous to me, and therefore God will be generous to you'. Some take verse 19 out of its context and do not fulfil the condition of verse 18 and then they wonder why the 19th verse does not work in their experience. However, can mean Christians expect to know in reality the overwhelming generosity of God? It was to a generous church this tremendous promise was made. Note the measure of the Lord's giving. It is not OUT OF His wealth but ACCORDING (kata) to it. Who can estimate the range and depth of this richness? (cp. Rom. xi. 33). If a millionaire gives out of his riches, he could just give a penny and no more. If he gives according to his wealth, he would have to give a very large sum indeed. God will be no man's debtor and we are dealing with a heavenly Father Whose generosity is beyond our computation. His riches are IN glory IN Christ Jesus Who is seated in the heavenly holiest of all above everything that can be conceived. What immense wealth is here!

The final greetings are now given from 'all the saints' specially "those of Caesar's household". This does not mean the relatives of Caesar, but persons employed in the domestic and administrative establishment of the Emperor. Most of them would be slaves and freed men equivalent to civil servants, some of whom had come into contact with Paul and thereby a knowledge a salvation. Such a 'household' existed in every Roman colony, but this does not militate against a Roman origin for this epistle, for such an establishment existed at Rome and must have numbered hundreds of employees in the capital.

Paul's last words, as always, refer to the Lord's abiding grace and thus ends this precious epistle, a wonderful balance to the Ephesian letter, with its stress on 'working out' in practice what God has so wonderfully 'worked in', with a view to the prize in connection with the 'high calling of God in Christ Jesus'. May we all participate in this 'working out' day by day.

No.51. The Epistle to the Colossians (1).

In the first century, Colossae was an ancient but declining commercial centre, situated in Phrygia on the south bank of the River Lycus, a tributary of the Maeander, about 100 miles eastward from Ephesus, near the cities of Laodicea and Hierapolis. The Christian message was evidently introduced there during Paul's Ephesian ministry (Acts xix. 5) possibly through the faithful witness of Epaphras (cp. Col. i. 7; iv. 12). Within 5 years the Apostle was a prisoner at Rome, waiting to have his case heard by the Emperor, to whom he had appealed. He was free to receive visitors, and among them Epaphras, who gave Paul up to date news of the churches in that area. The question as to whether any of his prison letters were written from an imprisonment at Caesarea or Ephesus rather than Rome has been dealt with in the introduction to the epistle to the Philippians (see Volume XLV, p.192).

Although there was much for which to thank God, one disquieting feature was the introduction at Colossae of teaching which, although outwardly appearing very spiritual, actually dethroned the Lord Jesus Christ from His unique place of having the preeminence in all things. It was a sort of pre-gnosticism combining Jewish and Greek elements which later developed more fully in the second century and it was to combat this error that the epistle to the Colossians was written. From its contents it is obviously a companion to the epistle to the Ephesians, and although some of the same ground is covered, yet it has its own distinct message with its central section of warning.

With the Colossian letter we must also link that to Philemon written at the same time and both were delivered by Tychicus and Onesimus, the runaway slave (iv. 3, 7-9; Philemon 12). As to which was written first with regard to Ephesians and Colossians, we do not elaborate, as it does not affect the doctrine of the epistles. Some expositors think that Colossians was the prior letter, but that they were written within a short time of each other there seems no doubt.

As regards the heresy which had developed at Colossae, we only have the internal evidence of the epistle to reconstruct it. It evidently combined Judaism with a stress on legal ordinances such as circumcision, food prohibitions, and the times of feasts of the sabbath and the new moon. Combined with this was a Gentile philosophy which dealt with the spirit world. A large place was made for angels, who had figured so largely in Israel's history and through whom the law was given. Some were of a higher order than others—principalities and powers, who controlled the spheres and the lines of communications between God and man. So important were these supposed to be that all prayer, worship and revelation could only be received through them and by their permission. They had special knowledge to impart and were therefore to be feared and respected. This could only be done by keeping the law and in addition to this, observing a rigorous asceticism.

This error was obviously more dangerous than the Galatian legalism which Paul had combated before. It struck at the roots of the doctrine concerning pre-eminency of the Person and work of Christ, consequently the Apostle lost no time in seeking to expose its satanic origin and cunning deception. It is therefore in the Colossian epistle the majesty, glory and fullness of the Lord Jesus are developed more fully than in any of the other writings of Paul. The 'tradition of men' is measured against the One in Whom dwells all the fullness of the God-head bodily, Who is pre-eminent in both the old and new creations. He is the one Mediator between God and men, combining Godhead and manhood, and is the victor over the very principalities and powers who were ensnaring the Colossian saints.

Not only this, but as Lord and Head of the church which is His Body, He fills to the full every member. What need then was there for the empty shadows the Colossians were striving after? They were only satanic means of canceling the liberty and fullness in Christ and bringing them into abject bondage. The Christians at Colossae had to learn that anything that detracts from the supremacy of Christ and the completeness of the believer in Him is deceiving error. In fact it can be said that all error does one of two things. It either tries to add something of its own to the unique position of the Saviour, or it detracts from Him. There can be no 'extras' to the Lord Jesus Christ. HE IS ALL and in all (Col. iii. 11). Once this profound lesson is grasped, one is saved from all sorts of deceit and deception which come from the wiles of the devil.

Everyone who names the name of Christ should seriously ask themselves: is Christ everything both as God and Man to me? Or must I add something else to Him to feel really comfortable and secure in my life and witness? And remember that these 'additions' can look very spiritual and attractive on the surface and not in the least fleshly or wrong. The Lordship of Christ needs greatly stressing today among His people. Too many of them know Him as Saviour and no more, and have advanced little beyond the stage of spiritual babyhood. This is often the result, specially in young believers, of doing a lot and keeping the Book shut, thus mistaking activity for spirituality. Whereas the great need of all is to soak ourselves, as it were, in the truth of these N.T. epistles, especially the prison letters of Paul—the apostle to the Gentiles, whose writings so wonderfully cover this age of grace with their distinctive and supreme revelation of 'our great God and Saviour, Jesus Christ' (Titus ii. 13 R.V.) and the heavenly Body and Temple He is now building (Eph. i. 19-23; ii. 19-22).

We come then to the exposition of this magnificent epistle and start with its divine structure which has been exhibited by C. H. Welch.

The Structure of Colossians as a whole.

B | i. 3-8. Faithful; ministry of Epaphras.

F | iv. 12-16. Prayer that they stand perfect (mature).
B | iv. 17. Fulfil ministry—Archippus.
A | iv. 18. Epistolary and salutation.

The balance between the various sections is self-evident, barring the central warning section H which is peculiar to this epistle, and deals with the Colossian heresy and its remedy. The opening verses associate Timothy with Paul, as in other letters (II Cor., Phil., I & II Thess., Philemon). Paul reserves the title 'apostle' for himself. Originally it was used for those who were directly commissioned by the risen Christ, and then later in a wider sense. As with the Ephesian letter, those addressed are not just saints, but faithful saints, and we have no right to omit this. Can all believers be truthfully described as faithful or loyal?

> "We give thanks to God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, praying always for you, having heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which ye have towards all the saints, because of the hope which is laid up for you in the heavens, whereof ye heard before in the word of the truth of the gospel" (Col. i. 3-5 R.V.).

It is noteworthy that Paul's usual habit is to commence with thanksgiving for the good news he hears of the various groups of Christians to whom he is writing. He looked for the good in believers first of all, not their faults. Later on, in true love, he has to correct what he finds wrong, but this love and Christian tact praises before it criticizes. Most of us can learn a lesson here in our contacts with others. The trio of graces that figure so prominently in I Corinthians, faith, hope and love, find their place also in Colossians and elsewhere, and they seem to sum up the spiritual qualities which should be evident in the lives of all God's redeemed children. The Colossian faith did not exist by itself; it rested upon and was placed in Christ Jesus, the only secure Foundation for faith. Thousands can talk of possessing faith, but the main thing is upon what or Whom is this faith placed? With many the faith is misplaced, for under test and the stress of life their foundation collapses and then utter disillusionment follows. Christ Himself is the only secure Foundation, the One Who is almighty, the same 'yesterday, today and for ever', the immovable Rock of ages.

The faith of the Colossian believers looked forward to the hope, sure and certain, laid up for them in the heavens. Ouranos is used here, whereas epouranios is the corresponding word in the Ephesian letter. But there is no contradiction. Ouranos is all embracive, starting with the region here birds fly (Matt. xiii. 32) right up to the abode of God Himself (Matt. v. 16), whereas the adjective epouranios is used of the highest heavens to which Christ ascended and is supreme above all (Eph. i. 19-23). This more restricted term must obviously be contained in the larger one, so there is no contradiction.

Peter also speaks of an inheritance reserved in heaven, and as he is one of the twelve apostles of the Lamb, he must be linked with the twelve foundations of the heavenly Jerusalem which is now reserved in heaven, but awaiting the time in God's great purpose, when in the new creation of heaven and earth at the goal of the ages it leaves the heavenly sphere and descends to the new earth (Rev. iii. 12; xxi. 2, 10). This was the 'better country' that the tested and suffering worthies of Heb. xi. looked for and Peter writes to a similar company enduring great trials (I Pet. i. 4-9) who had respect unto the recompense of reward like Moses of old. Although heavenly in character and now reserved in heaven, this glorious city is not destined by God to stay there. Hence those believers will finally enjoy its wonders when it descends and is linked with the new earth.

In contrast to this, the Body of Christ, which finally merges into the Temple as a dwelling place or home for God (Eph. ii. 19-22) is not only seated in Christ Jesus in the heavenlies now, but will realize its hope in the same heavenly places 'far above all'. They have been made meet or sufficient by the Father for this supreme inheritance of the 'holiest of all in the light' (Col. i. 12), the very holy of holies in heaven. Nothing less than this will fulfil the purpose of God for this exalted company which has its origin from first to last in abounding grace, beyond our dreams or our comprehension. Does our faith rise to this?

pp. 73 - 77

We have seen how the Apostle Paul had heard of the Colossian believers' faith, hope and love, which resulted from their acceptance of the word of the truth of the gospel. This good news had not only come to them, but had spread 'in all the world' (i. 6). No longer was Israel the first and practically the sole recipient of God's message, as had occurred during the earthly ministry of the Lord and the Twelve (see Matt. x. & xv. 24; Rom. xv. 8). The truth had spread right across the Roman empire and had reached the Lycus valley, resulting in the formation of the churches there of which Colossae was one.

Paul was glad to note that not only had the word of the gospel been received by faith Colossae, but since then it had borne fruit and grown:

> ". . . . the word of the truth of the gospel, which is come unto you; even as it is also in all the world bearing fruit and increasing as it doth in you also, since the day ye heard and knew the grace of God in truth" (i. 6 R.V.).

This was real evidence of the working of God in their midst, for the gospel was never meant to be static but a tremendous impetus urging the believer on to a deeper knowledge and love of the Lord, resulting in a more practical response in lip and life. The personal link between these believers and the Apostle was Epaphras, whom Paul describes as a 'beloved fellow-slave' and a 'faithful minister of Christ' on the Apostle's behalf. Epaphras had therefore visited Paul in prison and given him up-to-date news of the church at Colossae. Epaphras is a contracted form of Epaphroditus, but we cannot identify him with the Epaphroditus of the Philippian letter with certainty. Nor do we know the circumstances which enabled Paul to describe him as a 'fellow-prisoner' in Philemon 23. He had possibly shared one of the Apostle's many imprisonments (IICor.xi.23). What is certain is this man's sterling character as a leader and servant of the church, and his highly effective and continuous intercession for them (Col. iv. 12), the hall-mark of a true and faithful overseer.

The impaired news from Epaphras leads to the prayer of Paul for their spiritual welfare and then on to one of the great Christ-exalting passages of the N.T.:

> "For this cause we also, since the day we heard it, do not cease to pray and make request for you, that ye may be filled with the knowledge of His will in all spiritual wisdom and understanding, to walk worthily of the Lord unto all pleasing, bearing fruit in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God; strengthened with all power, according to the might of His glory, unto all patience and long-suffering with joy" (Colossians i. 9-11 R.V.).

This section is balanced by chapter iii. 16 - iv. 1 where the words 'wisdom', 'spiritual', 'work', 'giving thanks', 'pleasing' and 'inheritance' are all repeated and light and understanding can be gained by carefully comparing these contexts. The first thing the Apostle mentions in his prayer is the 'knowledge (epignosis) of His will in all spiritual wisdom and understanding'. We have seen in other studies that epignosis goes deeper than gnosis, as knowledge that causes response by the recipient, hence it is something more than mere intellectual grasp of facts. The Bible can be learned and stored in the brain like any other subject, but this does not and cannot give spiritual understanding or spiritual enlightenment which is absolutely essential if the truth lying behind the words is to be received and appreciated. The 'natural man' cannot receive the things of the Spirit of God, 'neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned' (I Cor. ii. 13, 14), and so he needs enlightenment, opened eyes, which only the Holy Spirit can give (Eph. i. 17, 18). It is absolutely essential to understand this. To go through a theological course does not and cannot of itself give this enlightenment or spiritual understanding. Natural understanding, as with ordinary earthly subjects, is useless here.

It is possible, in the context we are considering, that Paul makes a subtle contrast with the false knowledge of his opponents at Colossae, professedly more advanced than ordinary knowledge. He shows that mere intellectualism or any occult experience is no substitute for the thorough knowledge of the will of God in accordance with Divine wisdom and perception. So, before dealing with the false teaching which was Satan's substitute for the Truth in chapter ii., the Apostle stresses the real knowledge and acknowledgment which leads to lasting practical results. The reader should compare here the first prayer of Eph. i. 15-23 which likewise starts with wisdom. This is the first requirement if we are ever to have a real grip of God's truth with its riches of grace and glory. These supreme riches of God are the subject of Paul's prison letters. Is the Lord going to entrust them to foolish people?—and let us be honest, we are all foolish to some extent by nature. "If any man lack wisdom let him ask of God, Who giveth unto all men liberally . . . . ." (James i. 5) is the Divine promise that alone can remedy this.

"In experience then, this is where we must all start, with the gift of Divine wisdom, which the human intellect of itself cannot provide. From this will follow Divine understanding, the spiritual discernment, which again is a gift of God, and both of them leading to practical results, a walk that is worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing that is, giving Him complete satisfaction. This should be the first aim of our lives, and reminds us of Enoch, who pleased God with his walk and was later translated by God and 'was not found' (Gen. v. 24; Heb. xi. 5). We, too, as members of the Body of Christ are 'translated' ones (Col. i. 13). The worthy walk is expressed in three ways in Paul's prison letters—'worthy of the calling' (Eph. iv. 1), 'worthy of the gospel' (Phil. i. 27) and 'worthy of the Lord' (Col. i. 10). The Apostle likens such a walk to 'bearing fruit' and from this practical working out of the Truth comes a growing knowledge (epignosis) of God. Or could it mean that this vital spiritual growth springs from the acknowledgment of God and His claims. Both of these statements are of immense importance to each member of the Body of Christ. We only grow spiritually as we respond to the truth of God, and obedience to the knowledge of God that one has already received, is the necessary condition for reception of further knowledge. In other words, cramming the brain with Bible facts, merely an intellectual approach, accomplishes nothing. Nor will our heavenly Father give greater heavenly knowledge to us when we are not acting on what we already possess.

In his prayer, Paul now requests that the believers at Colossae be 'empowered with all power in accordance with the might of His glory'. This takes our minds to Eph. i. 19-23 where the Apostle describes this as the 'power of His resurrection' which conquered death and exalted Him to the supreme position at the right hand of the Father. This overwhelming force is put at the disposal of the redeemed. It is to 'usward who believe' and its practical apprehension would be all-sufficient to enable these believers to face up to all opposition and every trial that would test their faith. It is well to note that 'strengthened' translates the present participle dunamoumenoi which indicates a continuous experience, not one that is seldom or never repeated.

From this we are led to a three-fold fruit, patience, long-suffering and joyfulness. 'Patience' is better rendered 'endurance', the steady persistence exhibited by a runner in a race, who continues right to the goal without giving up. 'Longsuffering' will stand up to provocation without retaliation or bitterness. It has been pointed out that the Stoic often exhibited patience and longsuffering, but he seldom did it with joyfulness. One can show a measure of both and yet be a picture of misery. The Christian grace of abiding 'joy', not the empty bubble that the world calls 'fun', will transform the previous fruits and make the whole attractive for Christ.

All this should be accompanied by a grateful spirit:

> "Giving thanks unto the Father, Who made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light" (i. 12 R.V.).

One of the basest of human faults is ingratitude, and to be ungrateful in view of the supreme work of the Father described in this context is to sink low indeed. He has 'made us sufficient' or fitted us for a tremendous goal, nothing less than an inheritance in the heavenly holiest of all in the light. Hagion we can read as 'holy things' as well as 'holy people', and bearing in mind Heb. ix. 8 where the same word is rendered 'holiest (of all)', referring to the most holy place, the dwelling place of God's glory in the Tabernacle, we can better appreciate how this inheritance is 'in the light', the (shekinah) glory of God.

Here is something that eclipses any blessing that Israel possessed, great though these were. No Israelite would ever dream of dwelling in this most sacred place. Indeed, he lived his whole life without entering it once. Only the high priest, Aaron, had this unique privilege and then only once a year on the Day of Atonement, by virtue of his being a type of Christ Who has entered 'within the veil' in resurrection and ascension as the Forerunner (Heb. vi. 19, 20). But the Body of Christ is so favoured and graced that it will not only enter heaven's most sacred place, but will dwell there permanently, for there and not on earth, is their inheritance and each one is a living stone in this heavenly Temple and habitation of God (Eph. ii. 19-22). Nothing short of this is the tremendous goal for which the Father has fitted us. How grateful in practice should we then be!

Before the Apostle passes on to further truth, he bids us take a look back into the past:

> "Who (the Father) delivered us out of the power of darkness, and translated us into the kingdom of the Son of His love" (i. 13 R.V.).

The word 'deliver' means to 'rescue from danger' and how great this danger can be realized by remembering that in our unsaved state we were under 'the authority of darkness' or, as Eph. ii. 1-3 expresses it, we walked according to the 'prince of the power of the air', namely Satan himself, who animates all the unsaved. Eph. vi. 12 refers to the 'world rulers of this darkness' under his control, the evil principalities and powers who were defeated by the Lord Jesus Christ at Calvary (Col. ii. 15) but who still seek to overthrow us and against whom our 'wrestling' is directed. The whole might of these dark Satanic forces was directed against the Son of God at Gethsemane to prevent Him reaching the Cross and accomplishing there complete victory over them all. "This is your hour, and the power of darkness" He said (Luke xxii. 53). Let us never forget that Calvary means final victory over every foe for all the redeemed.

No.53. The Epistle to the Colossians (3).
pp. 85 - 90

We are considering the mighty work of the Father Who has made us 'sufficient to be partakers of the inheritance of the heavenly holiest of all', a tremendous goal, whose magnitude is beyond our limited comprehension. Foreseeing our great danger, our being under the dominion of sin and death and the powers of darkness, He has rescued us from this (Col. i. 13) and translated us into the 'kingdom of the Son of His love', a beautiful expression, not only expressing the great love that exists between the Father and the Son (John xvii. 22-24), but also the practical showing forth of it in His most gracious dealings with those who are members of the Body of Christ. Every member is a translated one from the domination and kingdom of Satan and the powers of darkness into the supreme glories of the heavenly phase of the kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ.

It is well to realize that in the 'dispensation of the Mystery' (Eph. iii. 9 R.V.) we have not left the thought of a kingdom behind. Many who value dispensational truth apparently do not realize this, for they say we must distinguish between the 'Kingdom and the Church', as though the word 'Kingdom' is always limited to Israel and does not occur after Acts xxviii. What they mean is right, but it is wrongly or inaccurately expressed. Paul uses the word 'kingdom' five times after Acts xxviii. (Ephesians v. 5; Col. i. 13; iv. 11; II Tim. vi. 1, 18), and to be faithful to what God has written we must not divorce the high calling of God in Christ Jesus, related to the Mystery, from the thought of a kingdom. As the context we are considering tells us, each member of the body has been translated and brought into the kingdom of Christ. Those with whom the Apostle was working when he wrote to the Colossians, he describes as "my fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God", and one of his last thoughts in his last epistle is that the Lord will 'preserve me unto His heavenly kingdom' (II Tim. iv. 18).

What we must realize is that there is more than one phase of God's kingdom purposes. There are His earthly kingdom purposes of which the redeemed people of Israel are the centre. This phase was postponed at Acts xxviii. when this people were laid aside in spiritual darkness after their rejection of Christ and the further offer of mercy and forgiveness in Acts iii. 19-26. But there is a heavenly side to God's kingdom purposes and here the Body of Christ is the centre and 'heavenly places, far above all' the sphere of operation. We must therefore 'rightly divide' and distinguish between these differing aspects of the purpose of the ages and not be lax in the way we use the word 'kingdom'. It is not sufficient to say we must not confuse the 'Kingdom' and the 'Church'. We should be more specific and say the earthly kingdom of God, (when the so-called Lord's prayer is fulfilled Matt. vi. 10), and the church, the heavenly people of the heavenly kingdom (which embraces the highest heavens as the sphere of blessing).

Realizing this, let us rejoice in the teaching of Col. i. 13, that at the present time we are members of this supreme calling in the Kingdom of the Son of His love. Its basis is of course redemption:

"In Whom we have redemption, the forgiveness of our sins" (Col. i. 14).

The words 'through His blood' are omitted by the best Greek texts, though, keeping Eph. i. 7 in mind, they are obviously implied. The Word of God knows nothing about redemption that is not based upon the sacrificial death of Christ. This is absolutely central to all the great plan of God and verses 20 & 22 of Col. i. give us this basic truth (and compare Rom. iii. 24). We now enter a section that experiences depths and heights, dealing with the old and new creations, one material and the other spiritual, and this with the object of combating the Colossian heresy. Paul shows that the Lord Jesus is preeminent in both, which would be a shattering blow to the seducing doctrines promulgated by the opposers at Colossae.

Several points of doctrine brought forward in this section are echoed again in iii. 9-15:

Colossians i. 13 - 20 and iii. 9 - 15.

G | i. 15, 16. The Creator. The Image.
H | i. 20. Reconciliation of heaven and earth.
I | i. 17, 18. Christ pre-eminent. All in Him.
J | i. 20. Peace and forgiveness of sins.
K | i. 22. Holy, blameless, unreproveable.
G | iii. 10. Created after Image.
H | iii. 11. Reconciliation of Jew and Greek.
I | iii. 11. Christ is all and in all.
J | iii. 13, 15. Peace. Forgive quarrel.
K | iii. 9, 12. Put off, put on, holy and beloved.

Charles H. Welch draws our attention to the parallels between John i., Colossians i. and Hebrews i.:

John i.	Colossians i.	Hebrews i.
The Word	The Image	The express Image
God never seen	The invisible God	The substance
All things made by Him	All things created by Him	Ages, heaven and earth made by Him
Preferred before John	Pre-eminent in all	Superior to angels
His fullness	All the fullness	Heir of all things
	All things by Him consist	All things upheld by Him
The Word was God		Thy Throne, O God
The only-begotten Son	Firstborn	Firstborn

The tremendous statements of these three contexts and others as well must be taken into consideration if we are to get any true appreciation of the passage we are considering. The Apostle here goes right to the heart of the matter that was troubling the Colossians by asserting the primacy of Christ in all things. The truth of this was sufficient to show up the false teaching at Colossae for what it was, the 'angel of light' doctrine that emanated from the arch-deceiver, Satan himself. The mediatorial position and work of the Lord Jesus Christ in creation is first brought before us:

> "Who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of all creation; for in Him were all things created, in the heavens and upon the earth, things visible and things invisible, whether thrones or dominions or principalities or powers; all things have been created through Him and unto Him; and He is before all things, and in Him all things consist" (Col. i. 15-17 R.V.).

God is spirit (John iv. 24 R.V. margin), and as such He is invisible and unapproachable. He needs a concrete representation of Himself if ever He is to be known in any measure by limited created beings and this has been fulfilled in Christ as the Image of God, or, as Heb. i. puts it, "the Express Image of His substance", the exact representation of all God is. This was the pre-existent Christ, the Logos, through Whom everything came into being and in Whose Image Adam was created (Gen. i. 26). We must be very careful with the word 'firstborn' (prototokos) and not make the gross error of arguing from the English word that Christ was the first being who was 'born' or created. This the Arians do, but they conveniently ignore the argument of the context. Christ was the Firstborn because by Him all things were created (Col. i. 16). In other words, it is as God the Creator He is described as the 'Firstborn' and only as such could it be said with truth that "He is before ALL things" (verse 17). This could never be said of a created being. We quote from The Deity of Christ by Professor F. F. Bruce and Dr. W. J. Martin:

> "The word 'firstborn' had long since ceased to be used exclusively in its literal sense, just as 'prime' (from Latin primus—first) with us. The Prime Minister is not the first minister we have had, he is the most pre-eminent. A man in the 'prime' of life has long since left the first part of his life behind. Similarly 'firstborn' came to denote not priority in time, but pre-eminence in rank." (Italics ours.)

In other words, prototokos expresses primacy and great dignity of rank and rather than limiting Christ or degrading Him into the position of a created being, it does just the opposite. Furthermore the word used by Paul, all, means exactly what is says. Had the Lord been a created being, the Apostle would have had to use the Greek word meaning 'other things' or the word meaning 'remainder' or 'rest' and the phrase would then have read that He was the first of all other beings to be created or born. Not only this, but Paul would have described Him as first-created, a term never applied to Christ. But let us note verse 17. "And He is before all things"; not He was before all things. This is surely parallel to the great statement of the Lord in John viii. 58 "Before Abraham was, I AM (ego eimi).

We must also take careful note of the fact that not only did the whole creation come into being through His agency, its goal is to Him also. It is not only through Him, but "unto Him". This again stresses His primacy in all things. Such a statement could never have been made with truth in connection with any created being, however great. Not only was He the Creator, but His omnipotence holds the creation together—"by Him all things consist". This goes far beyond the impersonal force of cohesion.

There is no doubt then, that as far as the material creation is concerned, the Lord Jesus Christ was its originator and is its upholder, and only One could fill this role, namely God Himself. Anything less than this would have nullified Paul's aim and argument, namely to combat the Colossian heresy in respect to degrading the Person and Work of Christ. It would have played into the hands of the opposers.

When the Apostle describes creation, he relates it to all things in heaven and earth, visible and invisible, but he concentrates on the invisible heavenly beings, 'thrones, dominion', 'authorities', 'principalities and powers', for he had the erroneous teaching at Colossae in view, which exalted angels and worshipped them (Col. ii. 18) putting them in the place of Christ Himself. These heavenly beings rather than being equal with God, must have been created by Christ and such owed their being to His work and were subject to Him. These five classes of angel-princes seem to represent the highest orders of the angelic realm, the aristocracy of heaven. Some were hostile powers and were conquered by the Saviour's work on the cross (Col. ii. 15). This, too, exalted Christ far above them.

There is no doubt, then, relative to the creation of this gigantic universe which includes the heavens, Christ is pre-eminent as Creator and Lord. No created being, however great, could fill this role. The whole witness of the Word of God, the Old and New Testaments, points to God as Creator. The epistle to the Hebrews states that "He laid the foundations of the earth, the heavens are the work of His hands" (Heb. i. 10), and "He that built all things is God" (Heb. iii. 4). God has not deputized any creature to do this work, nor could such a being accomplish anything so gigantic. But this is only half the story. Paul is now going to consider the new creation, and here, as in the material realm, the Lord Jesus Christ is First and Supreme.

No.54. The Epistle to the Colossians (4).

pp. 105 - 109

We have seen how the Apostle Paul in chapter i. was seeking to counteract the error that was creeping into the Colossian church, which denigrated the Lord Jesus Christ from His position as First and Last. The Apostle has asserted the Lord's primacy in creation and its maintenance. He now turns to the spiritual creation, and here, as in the material creation, Christ is first:

> "And He is the head of the Body, the church: Who is the beginning, the Firstborn from the dead; that in all things He might have the pre-eminence (first place)" (Colossians i. 18 R.V.).

It is clear that the title 'the Firstborn from the dead' balances 'the Firstborn of all creation' (i. 15). It was in resurrection, His victory over death, that He became the First of a new order. He was the 'Firstfruits' (I Cor. xv. 23) in resurrection and the Beginning (arche) of a new creation. This word occurs in the Divine titles used in Rev. xxi. 6, "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning (arche) and the end", and Rev. xxii. 13, "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning (arche) and the end, the first and the last". These majestic titles take us back to the middle chapters of Isaiah's prophecy where God asserts:

> "I am the first, and I am the last; and beside Me there is no God . . . . . Is there a God beside Me? Yea, there is no God" (Isa. xliv. 6-8).
> "Hearken unto Me, O Jacob and Israel, My called; I am He; I am the first, I also am the last" (Isa. xlviii. 12).

There can be no doubt from these verses that the title 'the first and the last' belongs to Jehovah, God alone. They are unconditionally given to the Lord Jesus in the book of Revelation. It is in this sense that He is the beginning, the First in all creation, either material or spiritual, and this is the meaning the word bears in the much misunderstood title in Rev. iii. 14, where the word beginning is this very word arche, 'first'. And in the context we are studying He is revealed as the 'Beginning' or 'the First', with one object:

> "that in ALL things He might have the first place (pre-eminence)" (verse 18).

Note it is not merely the first place in some things, but the first place in everything, and there is only one Person Who can rightly have such an exalted and unique position and that is God Himself and He has been revealed to us 'in the Person of the Lord Jesus Christ, the Image of the invisible God, the Head of the church, the Body'. In the light of all this, the heresy at Colossae was shown up in its true colours. The pre-gnostic ideas of many spiritual angelic mediators between God and men, claiming man's adoration, are swept aside and shown to be part of the Satanic lie. The opposers at Colossae who were seeking to put over these ideas were faced with a challenge of the first magnitude. They either had to abandon them completely or persist in their deception and apostasy, and all today who belittle or down-grade Christ are in a similar position. In these perilous times we should maintain the utmost watchfulness over all that comes our way concerning Him, either spoken or written. No one who names the name of the Lord Jesus and wishes to be regarded as sincere and faithful can take any less or different position. Men today either stone Him or worship Him as God manifest in the flesh. There is no middle position.

The Apostle Paul continues the theme of the uniqueness of Christ:

> "For it was the good pleasure of the Father that in Him should all the fullness dwell; and through Him to reconcile all things unto Himself, having made peace through the blood of His cross; through Him, I say, whether things upon the earth, or things in the heavens" (i. 19, 20 R.V.).

Not only is Christ first as Creator and as Head of the Body, but in Him all the fullness of the Godhead dwells in a bodily form (i. 19; ii. 9). Members of the Body as earthen vessels can be filled with God's fullness (Eph. iii. 19 R.V.—and note the 'unto' rather than 'with' of the A.V.), but neither they nor any other being, angelic or otherwise, can contain ALL the fullness of God. Pleroma, fullness, is one of the great words of the prison epistles, but it also occurs elsewhere. In the Gospels it is used of the patch put in to 'fill up' the rent in an old garment (Matt. ix. 16; Mark ii. 21) and of the left-over fragments which 'filled' several baskets after the miraculous feeding of the multitudes (Mark vi. 43). In Romans it is used both of the Jew and the Gentile (xi. 12, 25). For the Jew, restoration after their 'diminishing' in judgment for their unbelief, and for the Gentile, the completion of the Gentile period covering Israel's lo-ammi condition.

In Ephesians, the church is the fullness of Christ (Eph. i. 23) and each member is "filled full (complete) in Him" (Col. ii. 10 R.V.) and in the verses we are studying, the Lord Jesus Himself contains all God's fullness. Pleroma is obviously a word of great doctrinal import, sometimes with the thought of a rent or gap in the background, or it concerns the completion or totality of what the context treats. Here in Colossians, Paul is asserting that in Christ the completion of Deity dwells. He is not merely a being endued with great power, but is rather the dwelling place of the very essence of God.

From this follows His great reconciling work based on the offering of Himself on Calvary's cross which touches heaven and earth, ta panta, all things that are contained in the mighty, redemptive purpose and will of God. We have no real basis for universalism here, for we must remember that the same cross that is the Divine basis for the reconciliation of "the all things" (literally) is also the means whereby principalities and powers who were the enemies of God have been defeated and brought into subjection. The wide sweep of reconciliation here has in mind the creation which became subject to vanity because of man's sin (Rom. viii. 20) and looks forward to the final new creation of a heaven and earth wherein dwells righteousness and from which all rebels and sinners, whether angelic or man, are excluded.

In Col. i. 20 this reconciliation was a decisive act (note the aorist tense of the verb, not future) pointing to us the basis wrought once for all on the cross by the Lord Jesus, and upon this alone this mighty reconciliation rests and comes down to individual believers who once were 'alienated and enemies in their minds' to God. The verb for 'reconcile' is apokatallasso, found also in Eph. ii. 16 and nowhere else in the N.T. The shorter word katallasso occurs in Rom. v. 10 (twice), II Cor. v. 18, 19, 20 and the cognate noun katallage is found in Rom. v. 11; xi. 15; II Cor. v. 18, 19. Apokatallasso appears to be an intensified form of the verb 'to reconcile' and is kept by the Holy Spirit to the prison letters of Paul where reconciliation is seen in its highest and widest sense. All this has been accomplished by one Person and one act, that is the Lord Jesus Christ and the sacrificial offering of Himself on the cross, paying the penalty of sin, which is death. No angelic mediator could have accomplished this and all the while we must bear in mind the object here of Paul's writing, to show up the falsity of the heresy that was undermining the faith of believers at Colossae.

The reconciliation of Eph. ii. deals with the creation of a 'new man' from the Jew who was nigh and the Gentile who was alienated and at a distance, and the removal of all barriers between them in this newly created company. Here in Colossians after the mighty sweep of all creation, Paul shows how this full reconciliation touches each individual believer in the Body of Christ:

> "Yet now hath He reconciled in the body of His flesh through death, to present you holy and without blemish and unreproveable before Him" (i. 22 R.V.).

The ultimate aim of this great work of the Lord is to present each member, and the Body as a whole before Himself, in holiness and perfection. In the original will of the Father, this company was 'chosen in Christ' to be 'holy and without blemish before Him in love' (Eph. i. 14 R.V.) in the future presentation day and that will is carried out and completed in all its fullness through the redemptive work of the Son. Amomos, 'without spot', is used of Christ Himself in I Pet. i. 19 and this means that this church has nothing less than the very holiness of the Lord and in such a condition is 'unreproveable', literally, 'not accused'. There are no grounds in them for any accusation (Rom. viii. 33, 34). What a goal for sinners such as we are! Can we ever thank the Lord enough for all this? Surely words alone will not do. Our very lives must reflect here and now something of this Christ-likeness.

The Apostle Paul was concerned that this glorious prospect which he brought before the Colossian believers should not lead to complacency or slackness. If it is God's will that they should be presented as holy as He is, then he wills their continuing in faithfulness during this life:

> "If so be that ye continue in the faith, grounded and steadfast, and not moved away from the hope of the gospel which ye heard, which was preached in all creation under heaven; whereof I Paul was made a minister" (i. 23 R.V.).

The Apostle assumes they will continue in the course in which they have begun, no matter what temptations or difficulties come their way. He knew the danger of being hindered in the 'race' and the possibility of falling out with the Lord's disqualification at His award day as regards reward for service. Did not Paul say of himself 'I do not run aimlessly . . . lest after preaching to others I myself should be disqualified' (I Cor. ix. 26. 27 R.S.V.). This indeed would be a shameful thing after all that God has accomplished for the members of His Body. Hence the importance of their not being enticed away from the truth by the insidious teaching that was being circulated in their midst. The Colossian believers should not think that they were a small isolated group, for the fullness of this great gospel had been declared far and wide to the limits of the then known world.

In the Lord's strength they could stand and become 'more than conquerors' through Him that loved, died, rose again and ascended for them.

No.55. The Epistle to the Colossians (5).
pp. 129 - 133

Having stated that the good news concerning which he had been made a minister by the ascended Christ had been preached everywhere without any barriers (Col. i. 23), Paul now deals with the effect of that ministry upon himself and its relationship to the church which is the Body of Christ:

> "Now I rejoice in my sufferings for your sake, and fill up on my part that which is lacking of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for His Body's sake which is the church; whereof I was made a minister, according to the dispensation of God which was given me to you-ward" (Col. i. 24, 25 R.V.).

In the letter to the Ephesians the Apostle expresses the desire that these believers should not faint at his tribulations for them (Eph. iii. 13). Rather than indulging in self-pity, he rejoices at the sufferings he was enduring which were a necessary part of his faithful witness for the Lord and His people. At his conversion, Christ had expressly stated "For I will show him how great things he must suffer for My Name's sake" (Acts ix. 16) and in this perhaps Paul was unique. In the ordinary way the Lord does not inform us beforehand as to the trials and difficulties we must undergo in the future. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof" (Matt. vi. 34) and we can be thankful that this is so. How many of us could stand up to such knowledge, such as, if we knew that some terrible suffering and loss awaited us in a year's time? But with the Apostle Paul suffering would not be surprising after the Lord's statement recorded in the Acts. He did not shrink from such suffering, but rather was anxious to fill up just that measure that the Lord had willed for him. When writing to the Colossians he had not yet reached this state, but was ready to go on in his experience of trial and difficulty until the measure had been reached and 'filled'.

A similar figure is used when speaking of 'filling up' sins (I Thess. ii. 16) or of filling up 'the measure of the fathers' (Matt. xxiii. 32). While it is possible that some of our suffering may result from our own foolishness or lack of faithfulness, it is a joy to realize that all sufferings connected with true service and witness are the 'sufferings of Christ'. The link between the Lord and His redeemed people is so close that what affects them affects Him. Paul learned this at the outset, on the road to Damascus. "Why are you persecuting Me?", the Lord said to him, referring to his persecution of believers (Acts ix. 4).

The sufferings then that the Apostle was enduring when writing to the Colossian church, had a two fold aspect: (1) as it affected the Lord and (2) its connection with the instructing and building up of the Body of Christ. What it does not mean is that Paul or any other believer could have a share in the redemptive sufferings and work of salvation endured by the Saviour on the cross. This would have contradicted the whole witness of the Apostle in connection with the proclamation of the gospel of God's grace apart from merit or works, and indeed goes against the whole tenor of Scripture on this subject. If anyone cites Matt. xxiv. 13, then the context and time setting must be carefully studied. The verse cannot be properly understood if this is not done and in any case Scripture cannot contradict Scripture.

Paul realized his special calling and its significance. He knew that he had been divinely called to discharge a special stewardship of truth that was entirely new, for up to this point God had hid it in Himself (Eph. iii. 9) from all previous times and generations of people (Col. i. 26). It was a calling associated with riches of grace and glory beyond imagination and all this was principally for those who from a spiritual standpoint had been outcasts, Godless, Christless and hopeless (Eph. ii. 11-13). This stewardship or 'dispensation' had been a 'mystery' or secret because of the fact that God had hidden it, not even in the Scriptures where searching might have discovered it, but in Himself. And if God hides in this way, who can find, until He chooses to reveal? Yet how many profess to find this secret in the O.T. or in Scriptures written earlier than the prison epistles of Paul! This surely must be unbelief and deception, yet it often poses as spirituality! The Apostle had faithfully ministered all through the period covered by the Acts of the Apostles, but he never once described this ministry as God's secret which he was making known for the first time. Rather he insisted that all of it accorded with and went no further than Moses and the Prophets, i.e. the Old Testament (Acts xxvi. 22, 23). Therefore this early ministry of his could not have described as a 'mystery', something Divinely hidden, but was one of revelation since the Pentateuch and the Prophets had declared it.

It would be a good thing in our Bible study to contrast the secret of Ephesians iii. and Colossians i. with truth which has never been hidden, such as the condition of man as a sinner and the only remedy for it, God's salvation. Or the fact that from Abraham onwards God had Gentile blessing in mind all the while, even though for a long time He concentrated on Israel, preparing them as a channel of truth to reach the whole world. Those who imagine this great 'secret' is made known in the gospel of grace, or in Gentile blessing with Israel, have surely not gripped just what the 'mystery' really is, for both these things were never hidden. One almost gets tired of reading this sort of explanation of the Mystery in expositions of Ephesians and Colossians, the writers apparently being unable to see that they are making the Word of God contradict itself.

The Apostle now enlarges on this special ministry which Christ had given him relating to the church which is His Body:

> ". . . . . His Body's sake, which is the church, whereof I was made a minister, according to the dispensation (stewardship) of God which was given me to you-ward, to fulfil the word of God, even the mystery (secret) which hath been hid from all ages and generations, but now hath it been manifested to His saints, to whom God was pleased to make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery (secret) among the Gentiles, which is Christ in you, the hope of glory" (i. 24-27 R.V.).

This revelation and stewardship was given to Paul alone. There is no hint by any other N.T. writer that they had received such a commission from the ascended Christ, nor do they claim to reveal any such Divine secrets. They were appointed to serve elsewhere in the great purpose of God and they speak with authority in that particular sphere of service to which they were sent, chiefly in connection with the people of Israel who are the key to world blessing and the kingdom of God on earth. But Paul' commission deals with outcast Gentiles whose divine destiny after salvation is heavenly, whose commonwealth exists in the heavens (Phil. iii. 20), and who are now seen positionally in those very heavens 'seated together in Christ' (Eph. ii. 6). This was certainly a fullness of revelation that had never been made known before. The O.T. knows nothing of it, nor does the N.T. until we reach the prison letters of the Apostle Paul where he first unfolds the wonders of this divine secret and its purpose.

He assures us that, at this point, God willed or chose (R.S.V.) to make it known. Israel, the covenant people of God, had miserably failed and been set aside in blindness, hardness of heart and unbelief (Acts xxviii. 28). Instead of choosing another channel and proceeding with His purpose of world blessing and the establishment of His kingdom of righteousness and peace on earth, God now reveals a heavenly side to His kingdom, principally Gentile, with a heavenly hope, with whom the aristocracy of heaven, principalities and powers, are connected and are now learning the manifold wisdom of God. This company He plans to be a permanent home (habitation) for Himself (Ephesians ii. 20-22). What a destiny and what a revelation!

As far as the redeemed are concerned, it is surely unmatched in the rest of Scripture! No wonder the Apostle counted it the highest honour to be the human channel through which it was revealed! No wonder he desired above all things to make it known at whatever cost to himself!

Eph. iii. 3, 6-9 and Col. i. 27 are complementary in revealing this great secret. The Ephesian context tells us that the Body consists of chosen Jews and Gentiles who in this out-calling lose their status as such. In this church there is no Israelite or Gentile (Colossians iii. 10, 11). They are divinely called to be a new creation (not an evolution or improvement from what had gone before), a new man (Eph. ii. 15), and are members on a perfect equality for the first time, "joint-heirs", "joint-partakers" and forming a "joint-Body" (Eph. iii. 6). As we have seen, it had never been a secret that Gentiles would be blessed with and through Israel. This was God's express purpose in calling out Israel, as He clearly made known to Abraham (Gen. xii. 1-3). But in this relationship Israel did not lose her identity or her priority. Even during the Acts period the Gentile was reminded that he was but a wild olive grafted into the true (Israel) to partake of the root and fatness of the olive tree, that is, Israel's covenant blessings, but in doing this he was reminded 'thou bearest not the root, but the root thee' (Rom. xi. 18). Only by the means salvation was attained were they equal, that is by grace alone (Rom. iii. 21-23), for God has only one way of salvation whether it touches Jew or Gentile, namely—faith in Christ Jesus apart from any human works or merit.

The context in Colossians with which we are dealing gives another aspect. In Colossians i. 27 the preposition en occurs twice 'this mystery among (en) the Gentiles, which is Christ en (in or among) you, the hope of glory'. It does not seem likely that Paul uses this preposition in two different senses in these phrases which are so closely linked in position and meaning. The normal sense of en is 'in', but we cannot translate the former occurrence as 'Christ in the Gentiles'. With the plural, en can mean 'among' and translators are forced to render it as such. Why not keep this for its second occurrence which would then be 'Christ amongst you' (Gentiles, as the A.V. margin). If we render is as 'Christ in you', we make the indwelling of Christ the secret hid from all past time and generations of people. But a careful study of Scripture will reveal the fact that this marvelous privilege (and God forbid that we should ever appear to lessen it) had been known before, and in our next study we hope to deal with this. Meanwhile, may the Spirit of wisdom and revelation be given to us and the darkness of our minds taken away, lest we miss the priceless jewel of the Mystery from God's treasury of Truth.

No.56. The Epistle to the Colossians (6).
pp. 150 - 154

In our last study we reached the point in Col. i. where the Apostle Paul described the unique ministry that had been given by the ascended Christ to him to make known to the 'Gentiles'. It concerned a phase of the great purpose of God that up to this point He had kept hidden in Himself. Eph. iii. and this context in Colossians give us two aspects of it which relate to the church which is the joint-Body of Christ:

> ". . . . . to whom God would (or wills to) make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery (secret) among the Gentiles; which is Christ among (A.V. margin) you (Gentiles), the Hope of glory" (Col. i. 27).

As we pointed out previously, this Divine secret is not that of the indwelling Christ as the A.V. suggests. Their marginal reading is more accurate to the doctrine concerning the Mystery. The fact of Christ's indwelling of the believer is wonderful indeed and its experience is a matchless privilege. But this had been made known long before Ephesians and Colossians had been written and had never been called a secret. In Isa.lvii.15 we read:

> "For thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, Whose name is Holy; I dwell in the high and lofty place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit . . ."
>
> "Jesus answered and said unto him, if a man love Me, he will keep my words: and My Father will love him, and We will come unto him, and make Our abode (dwelling place) with him" (John xiv. 23).
>
> "And the glory which Thou gavest Me I have given them; that they may be one, even as We are One: I in them, and Thou in Me . . . . ." (John xvii. 22, 23).
> "I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me . . ." (Gal. ii. 20).

From these Scriptures it will be evident that God's indwelling of His redeemed children, wonderful though it is, is no secret which had been kept hidden 'from ages and from generations' (Col. i. 26). It had been known as far back as O.T. times and Paul in his first epistle (Galatians, written during the Acts) had declared this to be his precious experience and he was writing to churches who had a large proportion of Gentile believers. But he does not say here that this constituted the Mystery and Secret which he had been given as a special stewardship to pass on to the Gentiles. In fact he does not once speak of the churches of the Acts period as being linked with the Mystery.

Later on in the letter to the Ephesians he shows that the Gentiles were by nature 'without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world' (ii. 12). But in this new creation their great distance from Christ Jesus was cancelled. Now, instead of being 'far off', Christ was among them, independently of Israel or the covenants made with Israel. A new vista was opened to them connected with 'riches of glory' that belong to heavenly places where Christ is now enthroned and positionally they are seen by God as 'seated together in Christ Jesus' in these heavenly places (Eph. ii. 6). No such calling had ever been made known before, least of all to Gentiles so far off from God and utterly hopeless in themselves! What riches of glory are here! This new calling is closely connected to the wealth of the Godhead. 'Riches' occurs eight times in Paul's prison epistles and each reference is tremendous in its implications and needs revelation and careful and prolonged meditation to savour its fullness and wonder. We give the occurrences:

> ". . . . . the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of His grace" (Eph. i. 17).
> "What the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints (of in the 'holiest of all')" (Eph. i. 18).
> "That . . . . . He might show exceeding riches of His grace in His kindness toward us in Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 7).
> "That I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ" (Eph. iii. 8).
> "That He would grant you, according to the riches of His glory" (Eph. iii. 16).
> "My God shall supply all your need according to His riches in glory by Christ Jesus" (Phil. iv. 19).
> ". . . . . what is the riches of the glory of this mystery" (Col. i. 27).
> "unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding, that they may know the mystery of God, even Christ" (Col. ii. 2 R.V.).

These verses make known some of the almost incredible wonder of this new dispensation or stewardship which is God's revelation 'for us Gentiles'. Here indeed is truth, that up to this point had been kept secret. Where previously can we find such wealth, such spiritual treasure given in grace to far-off outsiders? All this was summed up in Christ Jesus and He is now 'among us' Gentiles in all His fullness. This indeed warrants Paul's statement 'the riches of the glory of this secret, Christ among you (Gentiles) the hope of glory'.

We wish however to point out that the indwelling Christ is certainly true for members of the church which is His Body for in the second prayer of Ephesians the Apostle prays:

> ". . . . . that He would grant you, according to the riches of His glory, to be strengthened with might by His Spirit in the inner man; that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith . . . . ." (iii. 16, 17), but Paul does not include this as part of the secret Christ had commissioned him to make known to the Gentiles. It is profitable to note that the important word 'Gentile' in the prison epistles also occurs 8 times, like the word 'riches' (Eph. ii. 11; iii. 1, 6, 8; iv. 17;

Col. i. 27; II Tim.i.11; iv.17). Another key word is doxa, glory, which occurs 24 times in Paul's epistles written after the Acts. However baffled we may be to explain this great word, we may rest assured that it stands for something absolutely real, even though too wonderful for explanation in human terms, for it enters into the very nature of God and the exaltation of the Lord Jesus 'far above all' that can be conceived, and He is the 'hope of (this) glory', which is so vitally connected with the heavenly inheritance of the Body, destined to become the 'dwelling place of God' when completed (Eph. ii. 20-22).

Paul now tells the Colossian believers that it is this ascended Christ, in Whom dwells all this spiritual wealth, that he is proclaiming to them:

> ". . . . . Christ in you (among you), the hope of glory: Whom we proclaim, admonishing every man and teaching every man in all wisdom, that we may present every man perfect in Christ; whereunto I labour also, striving according to His working, which worketh in me mightily" (Col. i. 27-29 R.V.).

We should notice that there are two 'presentations' in Col. i. and they are not just repetitions of each other. In verse 22 every member of the Body is assured of being presented 'holy, and without blemish and unreproveable in His sight' for this is what the Father originally willed (Eph. i. 3, 4) and the Son has died to procure (v. 25-27). In verse 28 however the presentation is different although the English version appears to teach the same, that is to 'present every man perfect in Christ'. Here the word 'perfect' is the very important word teleios which means 'mature' as opposed to infancy and inexperience. That all believers should develop spiritually and grow up, leaving babyhood behind Eph. iv. 13, 14 makes perfectly clear. That there is a danger of this not happening the context we are considering in Colossians reveals. Paul laboured intensely kopiao (implying labouring to the point of weariness) that this would not be the experience of the Colossians saints. He knew well that immature believers easily become the dupes of Satan. His 'cunning craftiness' easily deceives such, and this may have been at the root of the trouble at Colossae. The error that was creeping in and which this epistle directly combats, most probably was gaining ground in the minds of some who were not growing in grace and the knowledge and acknowledgment of Christ. Such are always a danger in a Christian community and the Apostle therefore strives, according to the working of Christ's resurrection power, to bring such back to Truth and vital spiritual growth which can only take place when the Lord Jesus is accorded His rightful place as the pre-eminent One in the Divine purpose of the ages. So important is this that Paul in ii. 1 refers again to his striving for them and also for those at neighbouring Laodicea and the fact that they had not 'seen his face in the flesh' shows that they had been brought to a saving knowledge of Christ through the ministry of others, in this case most probably the witness of Epaphras. The Apostle's concern for them was that they might be strengthened ('comforted') and 'knit together in love'. Divine love he assures us later on in the epistle is 'the tie of maturity' (iii. 14) that binds together the people of God. This love is pre-eminent among the gifts of the Holy Spirit (Gal. v. 22) and the unity of spirit which is cemented by this love has been made by Him and must now be jealously guarded (Eph. iv. 3). Satan always seeks to divide. God always unites His children. Real unity is strength and division leads to weakness. Let no one be deceived. There can be no 'worthy walk' without keeping 'this unity of the Spirit' which has been made between the members of the Body. Any breaking of this can only lead to trouble and a grieved Spirit of God (Eph. iv. 30). Not only this but it gives place to the Devil and he will not be slow to take advantage of the situation.

No.57. The Epistle to the Colossians (7).
pp. 166 - 170

The context in Col. ii. which we are studying lays great emphasis on unity which is so important in the out-working of God's gracious purposes. Hence the injunction to guard this unity as the first part of the worthy walk (Eph. iv. 1-16).

> ". . . . . being knit together in love, and unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding, that they may know the mystery (secret) of God, even Christ" (Col. ii. 2 R.V.).

Then follows one of Paul's supreme phrases, an antidote surely to the false knowledge that was leading some astray at Colossae and possibly elsewhere. The gnosis, knowledge, that the false teachers were trying to foist on the Colossians might have been externally impressive with its prohibitions and false holiness, but it could never lead to the 'full assurance of understanding' of God and the One Who sums Him up concretely, namely the Lord Jesus Christ. The 'secret of God' is Christ—He is not just a part of it. This should remind us that not all God's secret are fully revealed. The Saviour declared:

> ". . . . . no man knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal Him" (Matt. xi. 27).

It is impossible for any finite being to completely comprehend God whether revealed as Christ or as the Father. Now we only know 'in part' (I Cor. xiii. 12). Those who deny the deity of Christ and glibly talk of Him being a created being should remember this. Our knowledge of this profound mystery can only grow and deepen as we acknowledge in practice the One of Whom it can be said with truth that 'in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily' (Col. ii. 9). The words of C. H. Welch are to the point here:

> "The touchstone of all doctrine, whether it be expressed as 'philosophy', whether it has the sanction of 'tradition', or comes with all the force of the accepted 'rudiments of the world', is CHRIST (Col. ii. 8). Christ is revealed as our very life itself (Col. iii. 4), and eventually as our 'ALL and in all' (Col. iii. 11).
> It is the simplest yet the most profound lesson of the ages. 'The mystery of God' is the all embracive secret within which all other mysteries find their sphere, and which are solved in the Person of Christ. 'That I may know Him' is the climax of all prayer. 'I know Whom I have believed' is the basis of all assurance. 'To know the love of Christ' is to possess a knowledge far beyond our greatest faculties. 'The excellency of the knowledge of Christ' makes all lesser attainments so much offal, and the very unity of the faith unto which we all press is, above all, 'the knowledge of the Son of God' (Eph.iv.13). Paul's gospel was Christ (I Cor. i. 23; II Cor. iv. 5; Gal. i. 16). Paul's doctrine was Christ (Eph. iv. 20). His life here in the flesh (Gal. ii. 20), the goal of this life (Phil. i. 21), and the life of resurrection glory (Col. iii. 4) was Christ.

No language of ours can express anything approaching the fullness that the heart realized to be resident in these words of Col. ii. 2. Nothing less than a life-long exposition of these epistles could hope to touch the fringe of so mighty a theme."

(The Berean Expositor, Volume XXIII, pp.44, 45).

If these wise words impress afresh with the mightiness of the theme of Christ Jesus they are not in vain. Truly in Him alone are 'all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden' (Col. ii. 3 R.V.) and this is the great antidote to all error of doctrine, such as the false teachers were seeking to foist upon the Colossian believers. As Paul had previously insisted to the Corinthian church, Christ alone is the wisdom of God (I Cor. i. 24, 30). This glorification of the Lord Jesus was for the express purpose of preventing those at Colossae from being deceived:

"This I say, that no one may delude you with persuasiveness of speech. For though I am absent in the flesh, yet am I with you in the spirit, joying and beholding your order, and the steadfastness of your faith in Christ" (ii. 4, 5 R.V.).

Although the Apostle was severed by distance in his Roman prison, yet in the tidings that were brought to him by Epaphras he was with them in thought and prayer, keenly alert to their needs and noting their response. In the next two verses Paul sums up their Christian experience in their vital relationship to Christ Jesus, the One Who is Lord and God:

"As therefore ye received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk in Him, rooted and builded up in Him, and stablished in your faith, even as ye were taught, abounding in thanksgiving" (Col. ii. 6, 7 R.V.).

They had received Him as Saviour and Lord and thus were 'rooted' in Him. They were now expected to acknowledge Him in practice as Lord and Master. The Apostle uses two illustrations here to express the truth. 'Rooted' is the perfect participle in the Greek which points to an act that took place in the past, but whose effects persist in the present. This 'rooting' in Christ and close unity with Him is true for all time and therefore speaks of continuous security. Such healthy rootage leads to healthy growth and fruit. 'Built up' is the present participle which indicates a steady spiritual growth. 'Established' likewise expresses a continuous experience of strengthening and confirming resulting from this Christ-centred living. The 'faith' is the body of revealed truth that had been given by the risen and ascended Christ through the Apostle Paul (Gal. i. 11, 12; Eph. iii. 1-9; II Tim. i. 13, 14; ii. 2) and as a final note, abounding thanksgiving and gratitude is stressed, for this directs thought away from self to the Lord Who is the only source and substance of these glorious truths and to Whom all praise and glory should be given.

We now enter the distinctive section of this epistle which deals with the Colossian heresy and its antidote (Col. ii. 8 - iii. 4). Consequently the Apostle commences with a word of warning:

> "Take heed lest there shall be any one that maketh spoil of you through his philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ: for in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily, and in Him ye are made full, Who is the Head of all principality and power" (ii. 8-10 R.V.).

We have already touched upon the false teaching that was creeping into the Colossian church. While it is difficult to get a clear picture of it in detail, it was apparently a blending of Jewish legalism and pagan philosophy with its stress on the complete antithesis between spirit and matter which was considered to be evil. Consequently a holy God was divorced from His creation and no direct contact was possible between them. Any contact could only be achieved through intermediaries who were looked on as spiritual lords or rulers of the seven planetary spheres in which Sun, Moon, Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter and Saturn moved. Each was believed to be governed by one of these lords (an archon) and no direct approach to God was possible except through these angelic mediators. If this was accepted as truth, then one could understand the concern to please or placate these spirit beings.

The whole of this deceptive lie was an attack upon the Biblical doctrine of creation and redemption wrought through the sole agency of the Lord Jesus. He alone was the antidote to such falsity. The new teaching stressed a higher wisdom, but all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are found solely in Him. He alone was Creator; He alone summed up the Godhead bodily. He alone was the one Mediator between God and men and was also the conqueror of principalities and powers that were the believers' enemies. Therefore to leave him was to slip back into darkness and bondage from which they had been redeemed, no matter how plausible the new ideas were put across with their stress on a sanctity and humility which, seen in their true colours, were completely false.

The whole history of man since Eden has been interwoven with deception. Satan is above all the arch-deceiver. As such he deceived Eve and has been deceiving mankind ever since. There is no protection from this apart from the revelation of Truth, the Word of God, and the living Word Whom it reveals, Who is the Truth (John xiv. 6). In Him alone there is safety. So long as we hold fast to God's Word of truth and rightly divide it, refusing to go one step beyond what is revealed we are safe. To do otherwise is to follow darkness rather than light, to sow the seeds of error and finally to reap the harvest of shame, bondage and Divine disapproval. This is Satan's one aim, to lead believers away from the freedom in Christ and to bring them back under his control and slavery. "Let no man deceive you" said the Apostle, and the call is just as vital and necessary today as ever it was. Satan may alter his tactics but the end is always the same although it is covered up by attractive presentation, 'plausible speech' and the striking and capable personality of the so-called 'ministers of righteousness' that Satan often uses.

We should note from this context in Colossians that his attack is three-fold, described as 'false reasoning', 'enticing' and 'spoiling' and in carrying this out he uses three means (1) a vain and deceitful philosophy, (2) human tradition and (3) rudiments or elements of the world.

We can easily be deceived by false reasoning. While faith is never unreasonable, there are many Divine things that are above our reasoning or ability to comprehend. We are therefore shut up in these things to the Word of God and this should be enough for all who are convinced of its truth. If we do not accept this, then we become a prey to the Deceiver and his lies which are put over with 'enticing words' and made to appear so attractive and right. The Apostle deliberately avoided 'plausible speech' in his dealings with the Corinthian church, so that their faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God (I Cor. ii. 1-5) and so be safe from Satan's wiles.

To 'spoil' is sulagogeo, 'to take captive or to kidnap'. We repeat, this is ever Satan's aim—to undo the freedom which has been wrought for us by Christ's redemption and to bring again into slavery. May our eyes ever be open to the deadly tactics of the Enemy.

No.58. The Epistle to the Colossians (8).
pp. 181 - 185

We are dealing with the section of the epistle which makes known the Satanic error that was enslaving some of the Colossian believers. In our last study we saw that the attack was three-fold, false reasoning, enticing and plausible arguments, and spoiling or leading into captivity. Col. ii. 8 shows the three-fold means Satan uses to achieve this end: (1) a vain and deceitful philosophy, (2) human tradition, and (3) rudiments or elements of the world. Philosophy and vain deceit can be treated as hendiadys, that is, not two separate things, but one, a philosophy that is both empty (vain) and deceitful.

What is philosophy? It is the search by unaided human minds to discover knowledge and wisdom and to generally get to the bottom of things. There is nothing wrong in the quest for knowledge providing the searcher keeps within the limits of human capability of understanding. But directly he ventures further than this, that is into the realm of God and infinity, he is right out of his depth and is like a cork being tossed about by the ocean. His ideas then become mere speculation, however cleverly presented, and thus are empty (vain) and devoid of truth and are complete deception.

We should not limit Paul's term 'philosophy' to the Greeks and Romans. Josephus makes clear that the word was applied to the various sects of Israel:

> "The Jews had for a great while those sects of philosophy peculiar to themselves; the sect of the Essenes, and the sect of the Sadducees and the third set of opinions was that called the Pharisees" (Antiquities 18:1,2).

It apparently was a mixture of Jewish and Greek philosophy that was creeping in at Colossae as a substitute for the Divine realities in Christ. It emphasized the primacy of human reason and knowledge as against God's revelation of Himself in the Person of the Lord Jesus in Whom He had spoken finally. Christ-centred revelation is the opposite of any humanistic philosophy which begins with man and makes man's reason and intellect the measure of truth. Such a philosophy is utterly unconscious of its finite limitations, nor does it realize the human mind has been affected and blinded by sin.

The wise believer on the other hand comes to the Word of truth in humility to hear what God has to say to him. He is conscious of the limitations of his intellect and is willing to be taught by the Holy Spirit and not make his own reason the final arbiter of truth. It is still true to say with the Apostle Paul "the world by wisdom knew not God" (I Cor. i. 21). The false philosophy at Colossae had two supports, the tradition of men and the rudiments of the world. Tradition is used in both a good and bad sense in the Scriptures. The word refers to knowledge that is passed on to others and while the New Testament was being written, this was done orally from the apostles. Consequently Paul in II Thess. iii. 6 warns the one who walks disorderly and 'not after the tradition which he received of us'. Thus it is used here in a good sense. This was the truth in its purity. But, alas, truth often gets human additions which finally swamp it. Christ accused the Jewish leaders of transgressing the commandment of God, and making it of none effect by their tradition (Matt. xv. 2-6) and this has been a characteristic of Christendom ever since. How many tenets are held by professing Christians because they have personally tested them from the Word of God? For the most part they are believed because a certain church teaches them, or they are looked upon as the accepted thing and not questioned. This is disastrous to the appreciation of God's Truth, and brings the person into bondage who blindly accepts such tradition. Both Peter and Paul knew the binding power of tradition (see Gal. i. 14 and I Pet. i. 18). We need to make quite certain we are not being held by its shackles. Many a belief, hoary with age, has become attached to the pure Word of God and been accepted as truth. This then was what Satan was using at Colossae to ensnare the believers there.

The third means of the enemy's attack was the 'rudiments of the world'. Stoicheion means a 'first step' or the elements or beginnings of learning, the ABC of any subject as it were. In Heb. v. 12-14 it is translated 'first principles' and so linked with childhood and immaturity as contrasted with 'full age' (perfect A.V.). The word also means elemental substances, the basic elements from which everything in the natural world is made. Peter assures us that the time is coming when these shall melt with fervent heat (II Pet. iii. 10, 12) and a new heavens and earth created by God. Its third meaning is heavenly bodies, the signs of the zodiac and then the elemental spirits which were supposed to control the planets. Hence the reading of the R.S.V. in Col. ii. 8:

> "See to it that no one makes a prey of you by philosophy and empty deceit, according to human tradition, according to the elemental spirits of the universe, and not according to Christ."

These 'elemental spirits' are the evil spiritual rulers supposedly in control of the seven planetary spheres to which we referred in our last study. Modern astrology, which has now become so popular, is a first step towards this sort of conception. It is difficult to decide which of the two meanings represented by the A.V. and R.S.V. obtain in Col. ii. Probably there is truth in both as regards to error in the Colossians church. Both could be means that the enemy of truth was using to lead the believers at Colossae away from Christ and the rich fullness they had in Him. The vain and deceitful philosophy undoubtedly was presented very attractively, but it was not after Christ (ii. 8). Here is the touchstone of all truth, the standard by which all things must be measured. Let us not be deceived. We need not waste our time with any Christian scheme that does not stand this test. What does it make of the Lord Jesus Christ? Is He First and Last, the Centre and the Circumference of it all? If He is not, then if we are faithful, we can only do one thing, namely turn away from it.

The Apostle now applies the corrective to all this error:

> "For in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily, and in Him ye are made full, Who is the Head of all principality and power" (ii. 9, 10 R.V.).

Those who had really embraced by faith the supreme revelation of these two verses would surely not turn to the poverty-stricken substitute of spirit powers who had in any case been conquered by Christ on the cross (verse 15). In Christ Jesus alone the fullness of deity resided and that fullness had been imparted to believers. They had been 'filled full' in Him, no matter what size vessel they were, small, medium or large. The link between the fullness of God and the filling of the believer, so apparent in the Greek has been veiled by the A.V. translation 'complete' unless we think of it as 'filled to the brim'. This is surely one of the most stupendous truths for a believer to grasp.

Once this has been realized, it immediately becomes apparent that each member of the Body has everything in Christ that is precious, worthwhile and eternal. There are no desirable extras. Anything that appears to be so, is a snare and a delusion. The Apostle is going to follow with the argument that this 'filling' makes types and ritual completely unnecessary. At the best they can only be as unsubstantial as shadows. This Divine fullness which is spiritual is the supreme reality and none the less so because it cannot be touched or assessed by the senses. Who wants to try and grasp shadows when they have this imcomparable fullness? Thousands alas do and in fact still cling to the shadows, which only shows how little conception they have of this overwhelming wealth in Christ.

The Apostle now gives the Divine ground work that makes this filling of God possible for the members of the Body:

> "In Whom (Christ) ye were also circumcised with a circumcision not made with hands, in the putting off of the body of the flesh, in the circumcision of Christ; having been buried with Him in baptism, wherein ye were also raised with Him, through faith in the working of God, Who raised Him from the dead" (ii. 11, 12 R.V.).

The circumcision of Christ was not the rite performed when He was eight days old but rather His crucifixion, the putting off of the body of the flesh as i. 22 has already expressed. The baptism is not the result of anything a man does. It is not the work of any Christian minister or leader. It is positively the working of God as verse 12 stresses. Just as the circumcision relating to the believer is not literally but spiritual (not made by human hands), so is this Divine linking and identification of the believer with Christ which is treated in Rom. vi. and Eph. ii. No human being could accomplish this for himself or for anyone else. God does not wait till a saved person is immersed in water before He accomplishes this great work. It is His operation through and through and this becomes true the moment salvation is experienced. In just the same way the raising of the believer with Christ must be God's work alone. No dipping in water or raising out of it by a man can accomplish this. The dying, burial, quickening, raising and seating of the believer in Christ in the heavenlies is, we repeat, solely the operation of God. To bring any ritual operated by man here is to spoil the wonders of the context and ruin the Apostle's argument. He tells us that types and shadows have vanished because we now have the fullness of spiritual reality, being completely identified and made one with Christ in His death, burial, resurrection and ascension. It is pitiful to bring in water baptism here. This sticks out like a sore thumb. Even if one believed in baptismal regeneration (as do the Roman Catholic and high Churchmen) it is still out of place. If we are enjoying the glorious spiritual reality to the full, we need not be concerned with the types that once set it forth and even then not perfectly. We can surely let the 'picture book' go and praise God for the stupendous fact that in Christ, we are now filled to the brim with His fullness and that is all of His doing.

No.59. The Epistle to the Colossians (9).
pp. 201 - 205

Having stressed the glorious fact that by the working of God the believer has been identified with Christ in His death, burial, quickening and resurrection, all his sin having been graciously forgiven, the Apostle Paul also proclaims the fact that each member of the Body of Christ is now free from the dominion of the law which was 'contrary to us' and 'against us':

> "Having blotted out the bond written in ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us: and He hath taken it out of the way, nailing it to the cross" (ii. 14 R.V.).

The word cheirographon, handwriting, was a statement of debt signed by the debtor, setting forth his 'indebtedness'. The law of God with its ordinances stands as a Divine statement of our indebtedness as sinners. This has been cancelled and removed by the death of Christ, because not only did He perfectly fulfil that law, but He stood in the sinner's place and accepted in His Own Person the penalty due to the law-breaker. Thus the law as an instrument of condemnation has been dealt with by God and cancelled. It has been satisfied completely by the offering of the Son of God and now has no power to accuse or condemn and it is in this sense that it has been removed as far as the believer is concerned.

But this is not all that results from the victory of the cross. Not only has the bond of the law been cancelled, but it also spells victory over the spirit forces of evil:

> "Having put off from Himself the principalities and the powers, He made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in it" (ii. 15 R.V.).

This was like a conqueror who strips his foes and leads them as captives behind his chariot in his victory procession. Finally, Calvary means utter defeat for Satan and his hosts and, as this is so, how foolish and dangerous it was for the Colossians to seek to worship angels and subjugate themselves to them! In doing this they were throwing away the glorious freedom wrought by Christ from abject slavery from which they had been delivered! It was the great lesson of Galatians all over again:

> "Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage" (Gal. v. 1).

While this freedom must not be exercised in a selfish way (Paul was always ready to limit his freedom to avoid upsetting someone who was weaker in the faith), yet to put the shackles on again where fundamentals are concerned is to put oneself under the power of Satan which redemption has cancelled. Therefore, continues the Apostle:

> "Let no man therefore judge you in meat (food), or in drink, or in respect of a feast day or a new moon or a Sabbath day: which are a shadow of the things to come; but the body is Christ's" (ii. 16 R.V.).

Bondage to legalistic requirements was past, whether it related to annual, monthly or weekly observances. Verse 16 may go wider than Mosaic ceremonial, which did not touch drink regulations in connection with foods ceremoniously clean or unclean. It could have included special regulations stressed by the false teachers at Colossae with their spurious holiness. However, it did include observance of the seventh day, the sabbath, and we quote from Dean Alford here who certainly had no dispensational bias:

> "We may observe, that if the ordinance of the Sabbath had been, in any form, of lasting obligation on the Christian church, it would have been quite impossible for the Apostle to have spoken thus. The fact of an obligatory rest of one day, whether the seventh or the first, would have been directly in the teeth of his assertion here; the holding of such would have been still to retain the shadow, while we posses the substance. And no answer can be given to this by the transparent special pleading, that he is speaking only of that which was Jewish in such observances; the whole argument being general, and the axiom of verse 17 universally applicable" (Greek Testament Volume 3, p.225).

The same thing could be said of Paul's argument in Rom. xiv. 5, 6. Our Sunday is not the Sabbath of the O.T.; it is always designated 'the first day of the week' in the N.T. and there is no Divine command in the N.T. to observe it as the O.T. Sabbath. This does not mean that we do not appreciate having this day as one of rest and the opportunity to worship together and witness. Nor should we use our freedom to upset weaker brethren; we seek only to be regulated by what is clearly revealed in God's Word as commands for the church.

The fact remains that sabbath days are joined by Paul, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, with 'food and drinks' and classed as shadows. But, we are assured, the body (the substance, the reality) is of Christ. All types were prophetic; they looked forward to their fulfillment in the Person and work of the Lord Jesus. Once He had fulfilled them they had achieved their purpose. At the best they were only shadows, pointers to Him, but shadows have no purpose or place when the reality they set forth has come. We should remember that a shadow has no permanence apart from the body that projects it. When the body stands directly beneath the light the shadow disappears. And this is exactly where we are in the purpose of God. We now stand in the full blaze of revelation given in the prison epistles of Paul and, if we have any real appreciation of these supreme spiritual riches, we shall be quite ready to drop the shadows. They will vanish in the light of His ascended glory and our exalted position in Him, 'seated together in Christ Jesus in the heavenly places' (Eph. ii. 5, 6). By nature we are creatures of sense and feeling. If there is something we can see or hold on to or touch or taste, that is what appears to be real to us. But we must learn that this is not so in actuality: it is only the shadow as far as spiritual truth is concerned. The realities are the exceeding riches we have in Christ. These are eternal and unchanging and it is these that we should be holding fast by faith and rejoicing in; there is nothing earthly or visible that can compare with them in value.

So to all who might judge us on these things, our answer is the same, namely Colossians ii. 16. Having the Lord Jesus in all His fullness, we have everything. We are 'filled to the full (complete) in Him' (verse 10) and for us the shadows are for ever finished and passed away. The Apostle continues:

> "Let no man rob you of your prize by a voluntary humility and worshipping of the angels, dwelling in the things which he hath seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind, and not holding fast the Head . . . . ." (ii. 18, 19 R.V.).

Katabrabeuo, rob, occurs only here in the N.T. Its meaning in classical Greek varies from 'to deprive of a prize' to the more general 'to give an adverse judgment'; its usual meaning conveys the idea of depriving someone of something which he would have otherwise possessed. In view of the Apostle's fondness for illustrations drawn from the racecourse 'depriving someone of the prize' is undoubtedly his meaning here. It is good to realize that the enemy does not waste his time trying to make a believer lose his life in Christ or his salvation. This is impossible, for that life is safely 'hidden with Christ in God' (Col. iii. 3) and is, therefore, out of the enemy's reach. We remember that Satan was permitted to touch everything belonging to Job except his life. Satan does, however, seek to trip up the believer so that possibly a divine reward may be forfeited. It is 'prizes' and 'crowns' that can be lost (Rev. iii. 11), and those at Colossae who were being ensnared by the false teaching that was circulating there, were in danger of this very thing, a serious loss indeed that would be accompanied by shame, as II Tim. ii. 15 makes clear.

It is extremely difficult to render the Greek of the phrase 'intruding into those things which he hath not seen' (A.V.) for the textual evidence of many manuscripts omits the negative and embateuon occurs nowhere else in the N.T. and, therefore, we do not have usage to guide us. Only those with an advanced knowledge of N.T. Greek would be able to assess the technical difficulties which are discussed by such authorities as F. F. Bruce, J. B. Lightfoot, E. Percy, G. Taylor, J. R. Harris and others. The weight of evidence comes down on the R.V. rendering which fits the context very well. Those who were being led astray were receiving and dwelling on 'visions' which resulted in pride (puffing up by the sinful flesh). Although outwardly appearing to be humble (verse 23), this was a hollow caricature of the real thing, for it sprang from man's speculations rather than God's revelation and came from those who had lost touch with Christ ('not holding the Head') and were at the mercy of the darkened 'mind of the flesh'.

These pseudo-visions were evidently related to angels who posed as being the necessary mediators between God and men and so supplanted the One Mediator, Christ Jesus. This led to their worship, the very thing Satan craved, for he was behind these false spiritual powers. Satan desires nothing less than the position of God Himself and the adoration of all creation. How pleased he must have been about the developments at Colossae! And when we grasp what was happening there, we can better appreciate Paul's deep concern for the believers who formed the church in that place.

To cease to 'hold fast to the Head' could only lead to disaster. Using another figure, the Lord Himself said, 'As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in Me . . . . . if a man abide not in Me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered; and men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned' (John xv. 4-6).

Severance from Christ means spiritual death and fruitlessness. So the Apostle goes on to state:

> "If ye died with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why, as though living in the world, do ye subject yourselves to ordinances, handle not, nor taste, nor touch (all which things are to perish with the using), after the precepts and doctrines of men? Which things have indeed a show of wisdom in will-worship, and humility, and severity to the body; but are not of any value against the indulgence of the flesh" (ii. 20-23 R.V.).

Paul has already insisted on the believer's identification with Christ in His death, burial, quickening, raising and ascension. He goes on to further apply this to them in a practical way. If this was true, why did they act as though they were still the slaves of Satan and of men? Why subject themselves to such negative restrictions such as "don't handle this", "don't eat or touch that", etc., etc.? This was only a mockery of real sanctification. On the surface it might appear to be humble and wise and spiritual. In reality it was futile and utterly of no value in preventing the indulgence of the old sinful nature. Such taboos were also perishable and passed away in the very acts themselves. They were purely of human invention and were completely deceptive.

There are Christians today who need reminding that real sanctification is positive and active, not merely negative. It is not sufficient for a believer to say, 'I do not do this or that'. It is what we actually are and do that really matters. This is what an unbelieving world is watching, not merely our negatives.

No.60. The Epistle to the Colossians (10).
pp. 221 - 226

Having magnified the Lord Jesus Christ and put Him in the first place in material creation as Creator and spiritual creation as Lord and Head of the Church which is His Body, and having insisted that the redeeming work of God has united the believer with Him in His death, burial, quickening, raising and ascension, the Apostle Paul now seeks to bring the Colossian believers to the practical issue of all this. They were not to be side-tracked and robbed of their reward by being drawn away to worship false spiritual powers who in fact had been defeated by the victory of Calvary. They must continually view themselves as linked with the triumphant Lord Jesus in glory and not view things just from the earthly standpoint:

> "If then ye were raised together with Christ, seek the things that are above, where Christ is, seated on the right hand of God. Set your mind on the things that are above, not on the things that are upon the earth. For ye died, and your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ, Who is our life, shall be manifested, then shall ye also with Him be manifested in glory" (Col. iii. 1-4 R.V.).

It is evident that the attitude of the mind is of great importance here. As with the body, the mind of the believer can be allied with and controlled by the 'flesh', the sinful old nature inherited from fallen Adam, or it can be under the domination of the 'spirit', the new Divine nature bestowed at regeneration by the Holy Spirit. Under His control the mind then can aspire to heavenly things. The unregenerate world with its ways and its thinking is past and gone as far as the believer is concerned; heavenly places 'far above all', where not only the ascended Lord is, but the believer's inheritance too, can now be the sphere of his bent of mind. This inheritance is not earthly, like Israel's, for this 'citizenship exists in heaven' (Phil. iii. 20) as a present fact, we are assured, and also as a future hope. What is at the 'back' of a believer's mind is all-important, even though he has to employ his conscious mind in his daily employment.

The result of this should be reflected in the believer's life, in his words and actions, as well as his thinking and this should go on until the consummation of his faith is reached, the realization of the 'blessed hope', being manifested in the glory where the Saviour is enthroned 'far above all'. Now the believer is seen to be seated together in the 'heavenly places IN Christ' (Eph. ii. 6). Then he will be WITH Christ in the same exalted sphere. Christ Jesus expresses all our hope and He also expresses all our life and when this is realized and acted on, the sins of the flesh have no place (Col. iii. 5-9). The 'old man' and his deeds are 'put off', relying on the fact that they were crucified with the Lord when He died on the Cross. The 'new man' is constantly 'put on'.

"Mortify" (nekroo) means here 'to treat as dead', that is to count on the slaying of the old man with Christ crucified as being an actual fact. Then Rom. vi. assures us that it is nullified or 'put out of working order' ('destroyed' is too strong in the A.V. of Rom.vi.6). This being so, why try to fight and kill what God has already slain, as though we had the power to conquer the sinful old nature?

The climax of the list of sins is covetousness, which we might think was not nearly so bad as sexual impurity. But the Apostle insists that those who indulge in it are idolaters (Col. iii. 5; Eph. v. 5). The Greek word pleonexia means the desire to possess more than one ought to have, particularly that which belongs to someone else. This puts some object of desire in the central place which the Lord Jesus should occupy, and so it becomes idolatry. This is indeed dangerous and all the more so because it can assume so many respectable forms.

As against all this, the 'new man', the life and power of Christ within, is renewed by the Holy Spirit 'day by day' (II Cor. iv. 16) and thus Christ-likeness is being reproduced continually in the believer's life. It is 'renewed unto knowledge after the image of Him that created him' (Col. iii. 10 R.V.). This takes us back to the creation of Adam, made in the likeness of the One Who is the Image of the invisible God. The believer's life is not just an improvement or reformation of the old. It is something completely new, a creation by God and it is this that should dominate him right through to the end of his earthly pilgrimage.

But it is not only sinful habits that should not intrude into this new creation. All barriers that divided one from another are abolished, too, whether racial (Jew and Gentile), cultural (primitive Scythians and other barbarians who did not share in the Graeco-Roman culture), or social (such as that between slaves and free men). In the unsaved world these barriers still counted, but in Christ they ceased to exist. In the spiritual sphere and in His relationship to the church which is His Body, Christ is ALL. These last three words really sum up the Truth. There are no extras to the Lord Jesus Christ. Only when the believer, in his experience reaches the stage that this is real and vital in relation to himself, does he reach his full spiritual stature. There are so many 'other lords' which seek to have dominion over us and there is only One Who has the indisputable right to be there as Lord.

When we in truth crown Him 'Lord of all', then we are at last, from a practical standpoint, in the right relationship to Him, one in which we can realize to the full what He plans for us in our lives and service, and how rich then our Christian lives and witness can be!

The result of all this is bound to be shown in the day to day Christian walk of the believer, in his estimate of himself, his treatment of others and his treatment by others. The ground has already been stressed in Eph. iv. and v. There must be humbleness of mind leading to meekness and longsuffering. This certainly does not imply weakness, but refusal to retaliate in the face of provocation. These graces must be 'put on' by the believer continually (Col. iii. 12-14). There must be gracious forgiveness if one has been wronged and all is summed up in the greatest Christian virtue, 'love, which is the bond of perfectness (or maturity)', which forgets about self, its needs, and thinks constantly of the Lord and how much we owe Him and, after this, the needs of others. This is the only tie between believers that is really effective. When love is constantly in the forefront, misunderstanding and splits disappear. It is the tie that expresses maturity (perfectness) and should always be in evidence among those who have left spiritual infancy behind and are growing up in all things into Christ (Eph. iv. 15). The peace of Christ automatically follows when this is experienced and 'rules in the heart' as also does a thankful spirit. We have seen before what a safeguard this is against spiritual declension and forgetfulness of the many mercies we continually enjoy day by day. The pagan world had slid into darkness, not only because 'they glorified Him not as God', but also because they were not 'thankful' (Rom. i. 21). We do well to keep the spirit of gratitude ever before us.

With gratitude, praise naturally follows:

> "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom; teaching and admonishing one another with psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts unto God" (iii. 16 R.V.).

It is hardly necessary to say that the 'Word of Christ' which should dwell in us richly, can hardly mean all that He spoke on earth in His ministry to the people of Israel, for it would have been most unlikely for these Gospels to have circulated at this time as far as Colossae. The Word of Christ embodies all the revelation of the 'good deposit' of truth the risen Christ had made known to Paul and which he had so faithfully proclaimed and taught in the churches. It is amazing how great is this treasury of Truth which can only be appreciated by a close and careful study of his epistles. When this is personally appropriated by faith and divine understanding, we have a rich storehouse to draw on in every experience, need or emergency.

Does the 'you' mean individually, or collectively as an assembly? The answer is both. The more each individual member is indwelt by the Truth the more the assembly as a whole is indwelt and the greater the possibility that God's Truth will reign therein and He will be supreme. The praise that naturally follows, as Eph. v. 19 declares, is expressed in a threefold way: 'psalms, hymns and spiritual songs'. Little has been left on record to clearly indicate what these were, but the psalms almost certainly were drawn from the O.T. Psalter; the hymns possibly from N.T. passages of Scripture; and spiritual songs composed by members of the church who were gifted spiritually and musically to express truth in this way. Professor F. F. Bruce quotes from Tertullian (Apology 39) where the latter states ". . . . . each is invited to sing to God in the presence of others from what he knows of the Holy Scriptures or from his own heart", and from Pliny the Younger who, giving an account to the Emperor Trajan, states that the Christians of Bithynia met on a fixed day before dawn and 'recited an antiphonal hymn to Christ as God' (Epistles X.96). There is no doubt that Christian praise is important for the believer and it should be the best that we can render to the Lord, for He is surely worthy of nothing less than the best. At the same time we should bear in mind that praise should not only be with our lips, but continually with our lives, 'by giving up ourselves to His service'.

Verse 17 finally sums up the preceding verses, embracing every aspect of life and practically expressing the sovereignty of Christ not only in the so-called ‘sacred’, but also in the secular.

> “And whatsoever ye do, in word or in deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God the Father through Him” (iii. 17 R.V.).

To do this means to live and act as those who are indwelt by the Lord Jesus and entirely under His control as Head, and such obedience will not be merely a dry duty, but a joyous expression of thankfulness to Him. The injunctions that follow cover in a shorter form the same ground as Eph. v. 22 - vi. 9 and they touch all aspects of the home and business life. The phrase ‘in the Lord’ shows that, for the believer human relationships must be considered from the basic relationship to Christ. The practical attitude of the husband to the wife and the wife to the husband should reflect the original design of the Creator, both realizing that the part they play is an illustration of Christ Himself and the church which is His Body. There is then no question of one being inferior or superior to the other, but rather there will be harmony, lasting happiness and fruitfulness in Christian witness together when this is put into practice.

There is a complementary responsibility of parents and children. The latter are to be obedient and if parents do not wisely and lovingly discipline children to this end, how are the children ever to learn what obedience to God means? So many children today are totally ignorant of the meaning of this word and therefore one does not wonder at the terrible increase in lawlessness that we see all over the world.

On the other hand, parents are exhorted not to irritate or discourage their children. God’s Word is not one-sided, and sometimes difficult children are the product of unwise treatment by parents. There is a longer section given to the relationship of masters and slaves, possibly because slavery was part of the social structure of the time. The companion epistle to Philemon clearly shows the practical duties of these two classes in the Christian fellowship. The Christian slave or the Christian employer had to remember that they were both servants of a heavenly Master and were fully answerable to Him Who will deal with both with impartial fairness. “Whatsoever good thing done is recognized by Him for commendation and reward, whereas ‘wrong’ is equally dealt with by the ‘righteous Judge’, for with Him there is no respect of persons”. The O.T. likewise required similar impartiality: “thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty” (Lev. xix. 15) in lawsuits. The extremely important doctrine of reward or loss for the service of the believer is here touched upon and is dealt with more fully in other Pauline epistles such as I Corinthians, Philippians and II Timothy.

The Prayer of Faith.

pp. 47 - 51

Over the past fifty years or so, it has become fairly common to hear comments to the effect that in the past 'the church has neglected the ministry of healing'. It has taken for granted that the church of today has such a ministry.

A recent occurrence raises some doubts concerning this view point. A patient was admitted to hospital for a fairly serious operation; during the next few days little, if any, real progress was made. On the sixth day following the operation the 'laying on of hands with prayer' was administered. The next day the patient died. Had those involved been questioned, they would doubtless have answered that through the ministration of the laying on of hands, or anointing, God does one of three things: He either heals, or gives grace and strength to live with the disability, or He delivers through death. Probably the 'main plank' for those who believe that the church has a ministry of healing today is James v. 15, where it is clearly stated that 'the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up'. Perhaps we need to be reminded that to 'save' has a wider significance than is often given to it in Christian circles: Dr. Bullinger's Critical Lexicon gives the definition "to make sound, to save, preserve from danger, loss or destruction. To save in a Christian sense, is to save from death and judgment, (as the consequence of sin), and to bring in all positive blessing in the place of condemnation". Liddell and Scott's Lexicon states ". . . especially to keep alive . . ."—especially to keep alive!! What then went wrong in the instance mentioned above? Who, of those taking part in the little service, lacked faith? Was the rite of laying on of hands wrongly administered? According to James 'the prayer of faith' should 'keep alive' the sick person.

The problem is not lessened if we look further into the passage in the epistle of James. In the previous verse (James v. 14) we read "Is any sick among you?" The one 'sick' is literally one 'without strength', not necessarily someone who is ill. The passage has very much in mind the thought of 'bringing in all positive blessing'. In verse 15 the word for 'sick' is rather more specific signifying those who are really sick—from the same root comes a word meaning 'the dead'. Yet the prayer of faith shall 'keep alive' such sick folk, 'and the Lord shall raise him up'. The word translated 'raise up' occurs 141 times in the N.T., 70 times referring to resurrection. It would seem then, that we should be justified in saying that this passage (James v. 14, 15) refers to those who are 'off colour' (as we should say), and to those who are very sick indeed, possibly 'nigh unto death' when, if necessary, in response to the prayer of faith, the Lord will resurrect the patient.

Let us turn, in this connection, to the words of the Lord Jesus Christ Himself, spoken to Martha in John xi. 25—"I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth in Me, shall never die". Clearly this latter statement has been a problem for hundred of years: in a prayer used in the Funeral Service the compilers of the Book of Common Prayer altered it to read 'and whosoever liveth, and believeth in Him, shall not die eternally'. In other words he will die, but he is assured of resurrection. But the Lord has already made that statement—"he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live". Surely there must be something more behind the second statement?—and we believe there is. If we translate it literally it reads: "and everyone living and believing into Me by no means shall die unto the age". What does it mean 'shall not die unto the age'? There was another occasion when the Lord made a similar statement—and similarly of disputed significance: six days before the Transfiguration He said "Verily I say unto you, There be some standing here, which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in His kingdom" (Matt. xvi. 28). But the little Greek word an has not been translated, and indeed is more easily paraphrased than translated—"till they may see the Son of man coming". They would live long enough to see the Kingdom dawn, if . . . . . The Greek an signifies a contingency. Had the Jews received the Lord Jesus as Christ—the Messiah—it could have taken place within the lifetime of those 'standing here'. The same word an also occurs in John xi. 25, where it appears with kai (and, or even) as kan: an element of contingency is present. The Concordant Version renders it: "He who is believing into Me, even if he should be dying, will be living. And everyone who is living and believing into Me may by no means be dying for the eon". The element of doubt is found in 'even if he should be dying', the contingency being the coming of the eon or age of the Kingdom. To paraphrase: "Whoever is believing in Me, even if he should die before the coming of the age, shall live. And everyone who is alive and believes in Me shall by no means die before the coming of the age". Death, while not totally excluded, was viewed by the Lord as a fairly remote possibility. If the church today has the same 'ministry of healing' as that entrusted to the Lord's apostles and disciples, and evidently envisaged by the Lord in His words to Martha, why are there not those alive today who were then 'living and believing' in Him?

When John the Baptist sent to enquire whether the Lord Jesus was indeed 'He that should come' (Matt. xi. 2-6), the reply sent back to him was that 'the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are healed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the gospel preached unto them' (verse 5). These were the evidences that the Messiah was present, that the King had come, and included the raising of the dead. Throughout the Book of Acts we find these evidences are still present—including the raising of the dead. Tabitha (or Dorcas) was raised (Acts ix. 36-43); Eutychus, 'who fell down from the third loft' during Paul's "long preaching", "and was taken up dead" was brought alive (Actsxx. 9-12). It is true that there are also records of deaths which were not followed by resurrection: the martyrs James and Stephen, Ananias and Sapphira who 'lied to the Holy Ghost'. But these would seem to be special cases, the former to receive "the martyr's crown', the latter to be saved ' as by fire'. In I Cor. xv. Paul tells of those to whom the Lord appeared after His resurrection, and in verse 6 says "After that, He was seen of above five hundred brethren at once; of whom the greater part remain unto this present, but some are fallen asleep". At first sight this appears to be the normal toll by death to be expected; but the word translated 'some' is the Greek tines—'certain ones'. The same word is used by Paul in his second epistle to the Corinthians—iii. 1—"Need we", he says, "as certain ones, epistles of commendation?" implying that the 'some others' (as the A.V. puts it) were known to the Corinthians. Of the five hundred brethren to whom the Lord had appeared certain ones had fallen asleep, but the majority were still alive. As for the sick, not only did the 'prayer of faith save the sick' but Acts xix. 12 tells us 'So that from his (Paul's) body were brought unto the sick handkerchiefs or aprons, and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them'. On at least one occasion (Acts v. 16) we read 'and they were healed every one'. So it continues until the end of the period covered by the Book of Acts.

For evidence of the situation following Acts, we can only turn to the later epistles of Paul. After the healings (including 'every one'), and even 'special miracles' of which we have been reading, we are confronted with 'Epaphroditus, my brother, and companion in labour, and fellowsoldier' who has been 'sick nigh unto death'; with Trophimus 'I have left at Miletum sick'; with advice to Timothy "Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities". But there is no hint that any, at all, were healed. How can this situation be reconciled with that found in Acts?

In II Tim. ii. 17, 18 Paul writes of 'Hymenaeus and Philetus, who concerning the truth have erred, saying that the resurrection is past already and overthrow the faith of some'. We are given no indication of the grounds of their argument. It has been thought by some that they based their reasoning on the resurrection of the saints mentioned by Matthew (xxvii. 52-53)—"And the graves were opened; and many bodies of the saints which slept arose, and came out of the graves after His resurrection, and went into the Holy city, and appeared unto many". Yet, as we have seen, there were others raised from the dead during the course of several years following this, and it appears at least equally likely that Hymenaeus and Philetus argued that as now the dead were no longer being restored to life, the resurrection must therefore be past. It is certain that we have no record in Scripture of either healings or the raising of the dead, after the end of Acts.

Has the church of today a ministry of healing?—a ministry of healing which includes the raising of the dead, which ensures that whoever is living and believing in the Lord Jesus Christ shall be no means die until the coming of the kingdom? If it has, then we can only conclude that there is something terribly wrong with the church today, and that there has been something terribly wrong with it from about the middle of the 100A.D. Apart from straining at a doctrinal gnat and swallowing a theological camel in the process, the facts demand an approach other than that usually taken. The facts are that up to the end of the Book of Acts there were 'special miracles', extraordinary healings and raisings from the dead; from that point onwards there is no record whatever, in Scripture (and we dare not seek evidence elsewhere), of any healing or raising of the dead. The only solution which accepts these facts without seeking to distort them, or to provide extra-Biblical evidence or reasoning, is that provided by 'right division': that with the end of the Book of Acts came the end of a dispensation, that henceforth God is dealing with mankind on a different basis. The Covenant People had rejected the King, and following that rejection the earthly Kingdom, with its evidential signs and miracles, is in abeyance. We can only conclude that the church of today has no ministry of healing, and to teach to the contrary can only lead to disappointment and error, and serves to 'overthrow the faith of some'. Clearly this is not to say that God cannot now 'save the sick', for that would be unwarrantably to limit the Grace of God: it does mean that the prayer of faith today has its basis in the assurance given in Rom. viii. 28—"We know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to His purpose”.

The Will of God

No.1. The need for its Assessment.
pp. 114 - 119

We hope to write a number of articles on "The Will of God". This is a subject which is perplexing, perhaps particularly to young believers. At the outset, let us be quite clear that this is not the easy matter some would have us believe—save in its fundamental aspect, "This is the will of God, even your sanctification". We are well aware we have taken this out of its immediate context in I Thess. iv. which is that of moral impurity. Nonetheless the sanctification of the believer, is, above all else, the will of God for him. Many are the references to bear this out, e.g., I Pet. i. 15,16:

> "As He which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation; because it is written 'Be ye holy; for I am holy'."

In the context of the knowledge of the will of God, Rom. xii. 1, 2 is particularly apt, for it outlines the pre-requisite of this knowledge:

> "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service. And be not conformed to this world: but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God."

That this is particularly important is shown by Paul's appeal to the 'mercies of God'. Surely there can be no stronger appeal to a believer than the mercies of God, involving, as they do for us, the death of the Lord Jesus Christ on the cross. Yet in this epistle Paul musters a great 'weight' of the mercies of God; in the earlier chapters he deals with the believer's deliverance from sin and its power, with justification by faith, the believer's identification with Christ in His baptism into death—in short, with many of the fruits of Christ's death on our behalf. Often chapters ix.-xi. are referred to as a parenthesis—the appeal being back to chapter viii., yet who can deny that these three chapters also deal with the mercies of God? What are these chapters but the exposition of the particular mercies of God applied dispensationally? The believer is reminded of God's absolute faithfulness to His Word and Covenant, though man may be faithless; is reminded of the extension of His mercies to others in spite of, and indeed by reason of, the failure of His Chosen People.

It is on the basis of such incredible mercies of God—to 'speak as a man'—that Paul makes this appeal: "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the compassions of God, that ye yield your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, well pleasing unto God, which is your rational service . . . . . to your assessing what is that good, and well pleasing, and perfect will of God".

The mind needs renewing (of which more later) in order that the believer may assess what is the will of God. Not only that he may be able to weigh up the situation and decide “this is His will for me”; but also, and more importantly, be able to discover the ‘sterling worth’ of the will of God. The word translated ‘prove’ in the A.V. is one which can be used of ‘assaying’ metals, proving their value. No one can know how good, how well pleasing and perfect is the will of God, unless he presents himself a living sacrifice to God—as the old saying has it, “The proof of the pudding is in the eating”, so the proof of the will of God is in its performance.

Present your bodies a living sacrifice. The word translated ‘present’ in the A.V. is rendered ‘yield’ in Rom. vi. 13, 19, and in this sense implies that this, also, is the will of God for the believer. The primary sense is ‘to stand beside’ (hence, to yield), and in the days in which we live, how essential it is that in yielding to the mercies of God, we also take our stand beside Him! Unless we are prepared to do this, we shall never be in the position to ‘assess’ how good, well pleasing and perfect is His will.

In Rom. xii. 1, 2 Paul mentions two aspects of yielding—one negative, ‘be not conformed’, the other positive ‘be transformed’.

Be not conformed to this world: more accurately, be not conformed to this age. Basically the word for age has the significance of a long time, but a time with definite limits to it, and therefore, according to context, can have the significance of an age, a generation, or a lifetime, and in the latter sense speaks particularly to us: do not be conformed to the things of your lifetime. In the course of a lifetime many things change, and not always for the better. In the course of our own lifetime we have seen many things change in connection with Christian life and witness, conforming to current fashions and trends, and know from experience something of the pressures, both deliberate and incidental, to conform to the things of one’s lifetime.

The word ‘conform’ is one which occurs only twice in the whole of the N.T., and is not found in the LXX version of the O.T. The only other occurrence is I Pet. i. 14 “As obedient children, not fashioning yourselves according to the former lusts in your ignorance”—not conforming to former desires (the word does not necessarily have the implications associated with our normal use of ‘lusts’) when we knew no better. Rather, as Peter continues in the following verse, “as He which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation; because it is written, be ye holy; for I am holy”. The basic thought of ‘holy’ is separation—“Be separate from the things of your former conversation” Peter says in effect, and this is Paul’s thought when he exhorts “be not conformed to the things of your lifetime”.

Dr. Bullinger’s Critical Lexicon defines “conform”: ‘to form, fashion, or shape one thing after or like another’. Perhaps we might put it this way: Do not ape the things of your lifetime. The word also has implications of unreality and pretence, so that we could also put it “Don’t try to be what you are not: don’t pretend to be like others”, for the believer is a new creature in Christ; he is not of the world, and he should be like Christ.

The word translated ‘conform’ is a compound one suschematizo, ‘su’ being a form of sun meaning in conjunction with, jointly, the whole word, therefore, signifying here to fashion oneself like the world in conjunction with the world. The world plays its part in so fashioning the believer who wishes to conform to it, and in conforming, the believer becomes a part of the world. How can the believer do such a thing? In Rom. vi. 2 Paul says "How shall we, that are dead to sin, live any longer therein?", and in Gal. vi. 14 he boasts "in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by Whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world". If the believer is indeed 'in Christ', then the world is dead to him, he sees it as something lifeless and corrupting; but also he is himself dead to the world, there is nothing in him now to respond to anything in the world. How indeed shall we that are dead to the world, or to the things of our lifetime, live any longer therein?

Do not join the times in which you live by aping their ways . . . . . but be ye TRANSFORMED by the renewing of your mind. The transformation is the result of the renewing of the mind. The original does not give 'the renewing of your mind', but 'the mind'. If your mind is renewed, it is the mind of the old nature which is reinvigorated, and clearly this is not in Paul's thought here. There is a significant hint in the word used for 'renewing' which is anakainosis, the latter meaning 'to make new', while ana indicates motion upwards—a new mind which is higher, the whole word have the meaning of 'making other and different from that which had been formerly'. "We have the mind of Christ" says Paul in I Cor. ii. 16, and surely it is the mind of Christ which needs to be constantly renewed in the believer, transforming him from what he was into the new creature he is in Christ. We can do no more here than to say that the renewal of the mind of Christ in us comes as the result of searching the Scriptures, through prayer and by setting our minds on things above where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. The result will be transformed lives.

Like the word for conform, transform also is little used in Scripture. Apart from the use in Rom. xii. 2, and by both Matthew and Mark in their description of the Transfiguration of the Lord Jesus Christ, it occurs only in II Cor. iii. 18:

> "But we all, with open (unveiled) face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed (transformed) into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord."

Moses' unveiled face shone with the glory of the Old Covenant, when he returned from the mount. The believer's life should shine with the glory of the Lord. Far from being 'like the world', the believer should be 'like Christ'. The believer who is like the world, like those of this lifetime, is one who has not yielded himself a living sacrifice to God. Several years ago a young believer, clad in the rags of the latest fashion of the pop scene excused his appearance and practice, by claiming it was a sacrifice for him to do and be so—"I don't like it; I do it to reach the unconverted!". The magnet which is de-magnetized will never make another piece of iron into a magnet.

The Companion Bible defines "transform" thus: "to change to a new condition"—a very different thought from aping the world, albeit on the pretence of winning others for Christ. This word has also its own implication—of beauty. Paul is appealing on the basis of the compassions of God, for the believer to live a life of beauty before the Lord. When we recall the Psalmist's words (xxix. 2) "Worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness", there can be little doubt that Rom. xii. 1, 2 is an appeal for a life which is beautiful with holiness—beautiful in its separation from the things of this life.

Again, like the word for 'conform', the word translated 'transform' is a compound: meta-morphoomai, meta having the significance of 'in the presence of' or 'in the midst of'. The perfect illustration of the whole word is to be found in the account of the Transfiguration, where both Matthew and Mark make the clear statement, He 'was transfigured before them'. He changed to a new condition before the disciples, and at that moment was not associated with them in any way. So the believer should be changed to a new condition before the world, in no sense in association with them. It is not surprising to discover that the word Paul has used is exactly the word used by the evangelists to describe the change which took place in the Lord: Be not conformed, but be transfigured. The Lord became obviously different from the disciples; the believer should increasingly become obviously different from those of this age. This is what Paul desires for the believer, that he should become obviously different from those in the world among whom he lives.

We have already said that the believer's relationship with the will of God is not as easy as some would have us believe. This Scripture makes this point quite plain: "Yield yourselves a living sacrifice". It is a sacrifice which goes on day by day, week by week, month by month, year by year: there is a cost to the reasonable service. Yet compared with the compassions of God, and in the light of the increasing assessment that the will of God is good, and well pleasing, and perfect, how small is the cost! Nonetheless, the cost must be faced squarely first.

This aspect has to be faced before transfiguration can begin. The Lord Himself faced this question before His transfiguration.

> "From that time forth began Jesus to shew unto His disciples, how that He must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes and be killed . . . . . And after six days Jesus . . . . . was transfigured before them" (Matt. xvi. 21 and xvii. 1, 2).

And there, on the mount of Transfiguration He entered into a foretaste of the joy that was set before Him. He, 'for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame' (Heb. xii. 2). He knew the will of the Father to be good, and well pleasing, and perfect, and that its fulfillment could only result in glory.

Considering the compassions of God, and the eternal weight of glory which will result from our fulfillment of the will of God for us, in spite of the sacrifice involved, we should be living a transfigured life, which is a foretaste of the joy and glory which is set before us.

By the mercies of God, I beseech you! What compassion God has shown to us! He gave His Son for us a Sacrifice for sin on the cross; by Christ's death on the cross we are justified by faith and the righteousness of God is reckoned to us; we are members of the Church which is His Body; hence, we are blessed with every spiritual blessing in heavenly places; our hope is to be manifested with Him in glory. So we could go on. But all begins with the cross: with the sacrifice of Christ. Surely, in the light of such love, of such compassions, it is but our reasonable, logical service, to yield our bodies living sacrifices, separated, well pleasing unto God, being not conformed to this age, but being transformed by the renewing of the mind to our assessing what is the good, and well pleasing, and perfect will of God.

No.2. Desire and Determination.
pp. 133 - 138

Before we progress further in our studies on the will of God, it will be well for us to consider the two main words which are translated 'will'. For the sake of simplicity we refer only to the verbs at this point: thelo desire, wish; boulomai take counsel, determine, purpose. There is a marked degree of intensity between saying "I wished I could . . . . ." and "I am determined to . . . . .", or "I purpose to . . . . .". The difference is illustrated clearly in Mark xv. 7-15. In the questions put by Pilate to the people in verses 9 and 12, he uses the weaker word: "Do you wish me to release unto you the King of the Jews?" But in recording Pilate's action in verse 15, Mark uses the stronger word: "And so Pilate determined (or purposing) to content the people, released Barabbas . . .". Perhaps we could say thelo is a neutral word, while boulomai is active. After the meeting of the Sanhedrin mentioned in John xi., we read (verse 53): "Then from that day forth they took counsel together for to put Him to death". The verb 'took counsel together' (bouleuomai) has the same root as boulomai. It is clear they were determined to put Christ to death. A further instance of the strength of the second group of words is to be found in Acts xv. 37: "Barnabas determined to take with them John, whose surname was Mark . . . . . And (39) the contention was so sharp between them, that they departed asunder one from the other . . . . .". Barnabas had made up his mind, not even a rift between himself and his friend Paul would turn him from his purpose.

It is, perhaps, rather surprising to find how seldom boulomai and its associated words are used in connection with the sovereign God. These words are used in the N.T. between 50 and 60 times; but only on 10 occasions in reference to God Himself. (These ten references are Acts ii. 23; xiii. 36; xx. 27; Rom. ix. 19; I Cor. xii. 11; Eph. i. 11; Heb. vi. 17; James i. 18; II Pet. iii. 9; and Luke xxii. 42, in the Lord's Prayer in Gethsemane.) In the latter case The Companion Bible suggests: "If it be Thine intention remove this cup from Me". Possibly we might paraphrase it thus: "If it is in accord with Thy purpose". It is instructive to look a little more closely into the rest of this verse: "If it is in accord with Thy purpose remove this cup from Me; nevertheless not My wish (or 'desire'), but Thine be done". This verse establishes the relationship between the Father and the Son, between God and His Servant, and between us who are 'in the Son' and our God and Father. God's purpose must be carried out, our wishes and desires must be subordinate to His purpose. Whether or not we pray that His will may be done, His purpose will be fulfilled; but we certainly should pray that His wishes are fulfilled on earth among men. In the "Lord's Prayer" (Matt. vi. 9-13; Luke xi. 2-4) the petition "Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven" is to do with God's desire, not His purpose. It was His desire that the Kingdom should come, and His wishes be carried out, but the response of Israel was lacking, the coming of the Kingdom is yet in abeyance, and His desires still ignored.

This thought is brought out in a comparison of II Pet. iii. 9 with I Tim. ii. 4. Peter, referring to the appearance of scoffers who ask "Where is the promise of His coming?" says in verse 9: "The Lord is not slack concerning His promise . . . . . but is . . . . . not willing that any should perish . . . . .". The Lord does not determine, or purpose that any should perish. Here, surely, is the answer to those who say there are those predestined to damnation. This is not, says Peter, God's purpose. Writing to Timothy, Paul says "God our Saviour . . . . . will have all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth". God desires to have all men saved. But God has given to man the freedom of choice (not freedom of will, but the freedom either to comply with the desires of God for man, or to refuse so to do), and He will not override that freedom. Speaking of the sovereign will of God in Rom. ix., Paul refers to Pharaoh (verse 17): "For the Scripture saith unto Pharaoh, even for this same purpose (lit. 'thing') have I raised thee up, that I might shew My power in thee, and that My name might be declared throughout all the earth". He continues in verse 19: "Thou wilt say then unto me, why doth He yet find fault? For who hath resisted His will?"; who hath resisted His purpose? Had Pharaoh complied with that request or not, it was God's purpose to shew forth His power and to declare His name throughout all the earth, and nothing could prevent it. While Pharaoh resisted God's wish, he could do nothing to resist God's purpose. "Surely the wrath of man shall praise Thee" says the Psalmist (lxxvi. 10). If God's purpose could be resisted and prevented by man, or any other being, there could be no assurance, no certainty, no salvation.

With Israel's failure to repent and receive the Messiah, it seemed that Satan had succeeded in resisting and preventing the fulfillment of God's purpose. But through His foreknowledge, God was not found unprepared. He had planned to meet the eventuality. In terms of our subject, this is made clear in Eph. i. 9-11: Having made known unto us the mystery of His desire, according to (or perhaps, 'in harmony with') His good pleasure which He designed (lit. 'set before', hence to plan or design) in Him; unto the dispensation of the fullness of times to sum up for Himself in one all things in Christ, things above the heavens and things on the earth; in Him, in Whom we obtain an inheritance having been marked out beforehand in harmony with the design (or plan) of Him Who worketh all things in harmony with the purpose of His desire. God has made known to us the (now) 'open secret' (as Moffatt has it) of His desire which He designed 'before the foundation of the world' (verse 4), a design still in harmony with His desire, and still well-pleasing to Himself. He had not been 'caught out'. His desire for His creatures left them a degree of latitude enabling them to frustrate His desire; but, as it were, within the sphere of His desire is the 'hard core' of His purpose which cannot be frustrated, and it is in harmony with this 'hard core' that he worketh all things. Hence, upon the failure of Israel to conform to His desire for them, His purpose was continued in the Church which is the Body of Christ.

Nevertheless, "Hath God cast away His People?". No! for within His desire for Israel is the 'hard core' of His purpose to fulfil the covenants with them, and with Abraham their forefather.

> "Thus saith the Lord; if ye can break My covenant of the day, and My covenant of the night, and that there should not be day and night in their season; then may also My covenant be broken with David My servant, that he should not have a son to reign upon his throne; and with the Levites the priest, My ministers . . . . . If My covenant be not with day and night, and if I have not appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth; then will I cast away the seed of Jacob, and David My servant, so that I will not take any of his seed to be rulers over the seed of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob; for I will cause their captivity to return, and have mercy on them" (Jer. xxxiii. 20-26).

There are two Scriptures only, involving the use of a word to do with the purpose of God, which have possible applications to members of the Body of Christ. The first is to be found in James i. 18:

> "Of His Own will begat He us with the word of truth, that we should be a kind of firstfruits of His creatures", or more literally having purposed (or determined) He begat us. God does not merely wish, or desire that certain ones should be begotten with the word of truth, for that would leave our new nature and our salvation at the mercy of our desires, and our response, we should be saved by our decision. We are saved 'according to the purpose of Him Who worketh all things after the counsel of His Own will'. As with those to whom James wrote, so we also are 'begotten' with the word of truth, and if they were to be 'a kind of firstfruits of His creatures', may we not say, in the light of Ephesians, that we are to be 'a kind of firstfruits' of 'the all things'? In Heb. vi. 17 we read:

> "Wherein God, willing more abundantly to shew unto the heirs of promise the immutability of His counsel, confirmed it by an oath."

God purposing . . . . . to shew . . . . . the immutability of His purpose; and by the unchangeableness of His purpose to 'the heirs of promise', confirms to us 'the immutability of His purpose' for us. We have every reason for the utmost confidence; our salvation depends upon His purpose, and our hope is secured to us by the 'immutability of His purpose'.

But for those whose salvation is certain, and their hope secure, God has certain desires. It is of these that Paul writes in Rom. xii. 1, 2: "that ye may assess what is the good and well pleasing, and perfect desire of God". Clearly as human beings, even if we were in the position fully to know the purpose of God, our limitations would prevent us from being able to 'assess' it. We do need to be able to discover the good and well pleasing and perfect desire of God to us, and above all, as we experience it, as we test it, to discover that it is indeed, for us, good and well pleasing and perfect. Fundamentally this desire is, as we saw in the last study, our sanctification: "This is the desire of God, even your sanctification". He desires that we should be separated, not so much separated from anything, as to be separated to Himself. As, increasingly, we are separated to Him, we shall thereby be separated from those things which are not well pleasing to Him. It is quite possible for a person to be separated from the things of the present age, and yet not separated to God. Such a person may have all sorts of reasons for becoming separate from the world, indeed, is this not what so many 'drop outs' are in fact seeking to do? They have become disillusioned by the things of the world, tired of the speed of modern life, and from such things they have separated themselves, and not infrequently they have separated themselves to drugs and the like. God desires those who are His to separate themselves to Him.

James has a word of warning which is particularly applicable to some forms of 'evangelism'. In chapter iv. 4 he has this to say:

> "Know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God? Whosoever therefore will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God."

Let us note that the word translated 'will' is the one we have mainly considered in this article, purpose, intent. Whoever intends to be a friend of the world, James tells us, is the enemy of God. Surely a very sobering thought, when so many today are advocating friendship with those in the world, with the consequent use of the methods of the world, in order, so they claim, to bring the knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ. How very near they may be coming to enmity to God.

As we started in the previous article, the knowledge of the will of God is not the easy matter some would have us believe. We must distinguish between His purpose, or intent, and His wish or desire. As we realize His purpose we find security, strength and confidence in Him, and surely by so doing, it should be our intent to fulfil His desires for us. In the light of His purpose made plain in Christ Jesus, the mercies of God, we should offer ourselves as living sacrifices, that we may fulfil His desire to be separated to Himself.

No.3. This is the Will of God.

pp. 155 - 160

In our last study we distinguished between the desire, or wish of God, and His Purpose or Intention. For most believers the problem is to know what is the wish of God for them, in their particular circumstances. This is no easy matter, and in the last resort is a matter entirely for the individual to decide in the light of prayer and study. There are however, certain clear guidelines in the N.T., which may be helpful in coming to a decision. Twice we read "For this is the will (or desire) of God" (I Thess. iv. 3; v 18), and once "For so is the will of God" (I Pet. ii. 15). The first concerns sanctification, the second giving of thanks, and the third submission to lawful authority.

We have briefly considered sanctification in an earlier study, and we saw that sanctification is a matter of separation, and that not so much from anything, as to God.

As we are separated to God, so we shall thereby be separated from all that displeases Him. Yet sanctification is one of the subjects on which a very great deal of confusion reigns. There are those who believe sanctification is a matter of a 'second blessing' and should result in 'sinless perfection'; others expresses the opinion that they are already sanctified, and therefore can now do as they like; yet others make this an experience which is entirely the work of the believer. While there is some truth in each of these positions, not one of them is wholly true, and each one of them has its own particular perils.

It is true that the believer is already sanctified, such Scriptures as I Cor. i. 29-31 bear this out:

> "That no flesh should glory in His presence. But of Him are ye in Christ Jesus, Who of God is made unto us . . . . . sanctification . . . . .: that, according as it is written, he that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord."

In the same epistle Paul is writing (verse 2) "Unto the church of God which is at Corinth, to them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus, called to be saints . . . . .". The original shows a very close relationship between the words for 'sanctified' and 'saints', so much so that it could be rendered "to them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus, called 'sanctified ones'." Yet these sanctified ones are, we find as we read on in the letter, guilty of immorality "as is not so much as named among the Gentiles" (v. 1). Nonetheless they are called of God and sanctified. It is significant that of all his letters, only in this one, to a church which is particularly unsanctified and carnal (iii. 1, 3) does Paul lay such stress upon the fact that they 'are sanctified'. It seems clear that his purpose is to encourage them to reckon on the fact of their sanctification in Christ Jesus, and so to live according to the fact, to be in practice what they are in Christ in the sight of God. Having dealt with their divisions, their immorality, their litigiousness and their general unrighteousness in chapter v. and the first part of vi., he continues (vi. 11) "And such were some of you: but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God". Of such people the Apostle could say "ye are sanctified!" But obviously he is not satisfied with their behaviour, for he continues: "All things are lawful unto me, but all things are not expedient: all things are lawful for me, but I will not be brought under the power of any". While it may be true that because they are sanctified and justified "all things are lawful", nevertheless "all things are not expedient", and they should not be 'under the power of any' of those things which once exercised authority over them. The reason for this is "ye are not your own. For ye are bought with a price." Paul reminds them that the supreme compulsion for their behaviour should be 'the mercies of God' (Rom. xii. 1), 'therefore' he says, 'glorify God in you body'. The motivation for Christian living is the glory of God.

The word for glory, doxa, has to do with opinion, judgment, reputation; from the same root comes doxoo 'to give one the character of being so and so'. Hence, whatever else may be involved in the meaning of glory, it has very much to do with the character of God. The believer's life should accord with the character of God. No longer is it what I wish to do, but a life which will reveal, increasingly, the true character and reputation of God. There is no sphere of life which is exempt from this high standard. Some one has written: "Thus there are those (a) who do not accept Christ and are subject to the desires of their own mind and body and (b) who have accepted the sovereignty of God and have settled for a life of unity with and obedience to God through the operation of His Spirit working with the believer's spirit".

> "What constitutes the outward difference between (a) and (b)? Think about this yourself. Mainly it will be a choice of friends, pastimes, reading material and viewing. Convince yourself that these are pleasing to the Lord, especially your thoughts. Your thoughts are an open book to Him. The allocation of your time and money; the choice of a marriage partner are all subjects that should be placed before the Lord in prayer. If we have trusted Him to give us an answer in His own time, and moreover we have followed this lead, then we may be sure that our lives will be transformed. If we chose the things of the Spirit, life's empty pleasures will lose their hold and will be replaced by the lasting joy of the knowledge of God and a conscious participation in His will."

This kind of life will be very much 'other' than the life lived by the majority of folk today. It is a life of complete honesty before God: how easy it is to convince oneself that a particular activity is pleasing to the Lord, and will bring glory to Him, when in fact we are simply rationalizing our own desires. It is a life which, in the eyes of the world, is narrow and we must be prepared to be known as 'narrow-minded'; but it is a life which is increasingly filled with the joy of the Lord. It is a life which in every detail submits to the approval of God. This is the desire of God, even your sanctification.

In I Thess. v. 18 we read 'in everything give thanks: for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you'. Here is an aspect of God's desire for His people which is often overlooked. He desires that in everything we should give thanks: not merely in those things which we enjoy, nor in those matters in which we are successful and prosperous, nor in those times when all goes smoothly; but in the things we do not enjoy, in those matters where failure and loss attend us, in those times when all seems to go wrong for us. Do we give thanks in everything?

Among the answers the Psalmist gives to his own question: "What shall I render unto the Lord for all His benefits toward me?" (Psa. cxvi. 12) is this: "I will offer to Thee the sacrifice of thanksgiving, and will call upon the name of the Lord" (17). It becomes the more pointed when we realize that it signifies "I will sacrifice the sacrifice of thanksgiving". Thanksgiving can be costly. In O.T. times this was recognized in the offering of an animal without blemish, as a peace offering for thanksgiving. All thanksgiving thus is marked with a cost. It may be that there are times when we do not 'feel' like thanking God for the various experiences we are undergoing, nonetheless there is every cause for so doing. "For we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to His purpose" (Rom. viii. 28). This is not an easy lesson to learn; it is one which can take a lifetime. Yet we have cause to 'in every thing give thanks'. We are inclined to think that thanksgiving must always spring from a 'feeling', but the believer's thanksgiving should spring from the fact of his knowledge that even in this circumstance, God is working for his good. In everything give thanks: for this is the desire of God in Christ Jesus concerning you.

The third reference before us (I Pet. ii. 15) has particular reference to submission to every human creature for the Lord's sake; whether it be to the king . . . . . or unto governors. Peter also brings in the same thought we found to be Paul's in considering sanctification:

> "For so is the will of God, that with well doing ye may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men: as free, and not using your liberty for a cloak of maliciousness, but as the servants of God" (I Pet. ii. 15, 16).

Perhaps 'a covering of badness' might be a little simpler to understand than 'a cloak of maliciousness'. The thought is that, because of the liberty which is the believer's in Christ, some may say they are no longer under obligation to obey human authorities, and in so doing they would take their stand beside the lawless and appear as bad as they. But the believer is now lawless, though he may be free from every human ordinance. As the servant of God, however, he puts himself under every human ordinance for the Lord's sake. The thought is similar to that of Paul in Rom. xiii., where (verse 1) we read:

> "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God."

Paul continues in the next verse "Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God". In submitting therefore to the 'powers that be', the believer is submitting to God, and we have come very close to the thought that he should in all he does bring glory to God. Both Paul and Peter, in what they say on this matter are quite uinequivocal, so much so, that there are those who express the opinion that 'every ordinance of man' should be obeyed unquestioningly, even if it should be against the ordinance of God. Yet if we look more closely into Rom. xiii. 1-7, it becomes apparent that Paul assumes, for sake of argument, that the 'power' will not misuse the authority given him by God. In verse 4 we read:

> "For he is the minister of God to thee for good. But if thou do that which is evil, be afraid; for he beareth not the sword in vain: for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil."

Again verse 7:

> "Render therefore to all their dues: tribute to whom tribute is due; custom to whom custom; fear to whom fear; honour to whom honour."

Peter concludes his exhortation to submit to every ordinance of man, I Pet. ii. 17: "Honour all. Love the brotherhood. Fear God. Honour the king". Respect all: love fellow-believers: fear, even dead, God: respect the king. In this context surely only one conclusion can be arrived at: the believer's submission to God overrides his submission to all others. If the higher power so abuses his God-given authority that he orders his subjects to undertake some course which conflicts with the known will of God, then the servant of God must fear Him. The statement of the Lord Jesus Christ Himself would seem conclusive:

> "Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear Him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell" (Matt. x. 28).

Where there is a conflict of submission, then the submission must be to the Greater, God Himself. Submit . . . . . for so is the desire of God.

God's desire is that each one of us should live moment by moment "as unto the Lord, and not unto men": He desires that in everything we should give thanks, knowing that everything works together for our good: He desires that we should submit to earthly authorities who hold their position from Him, only withholding submission to them, when their ordinance conflicts with His.

No.4. Human Freewill.
pp. 170 - 175

In any study of the Will of God, sooner or later we must consider the response of man. Often this is referred to as 'free-will' by theologians and Christian writers. It is taken as axiomatic that man's will is free.

It must, however, be borne in mind that the expression 'free-will' is not a Scriptural term; nor, for that matter, is the alternative 'freedom of choice'. Both terms represent human attempts to express a fundamental aspect of the human situation. Whether either is accurate remains to be seen.

We can make no progress in our consideration of this subject without first seeking to discover whether man's will is free. Paul, in Gal. iv. 3 tells the believers to whom he is writing that at one stage in their experience "we . . . . . were in bondage under the elements of the world": we were enslaved. A little further light is shed on the subject by Rom. vi. 17-18: "But God be thanked, that ye were the servants of sin, but ye have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered you. Being then made free from sin, ye became the servant of righteousness". Ye were the slaves of sin . . . . . ye became enslaved to righteousness. Dr. Bullinger's Critical Lexicon defines doulos (slave) in the following terms: "a slave, one bound to serve . . . . . one whose will and capacities are wholly at the service of another . . . . . doulos is use of the lowest scale of servitude . . . . ." (The italics are ours). Your wills and capacities were wholly at the service of sin! Where is either freedom of will, or freedom of choice? Ye became those whose wills and capacities are wholly at the service of righteousness. Where is either freedom of will, or freedom of choice? Bound to serve sin, or bound to serve righteousness! (The believer's experience is that, in the latter case he does not always fulfil his bond. This point will be discussed later.)

But it may be argued that at least in Eden Adam and Eve had freewill, or freedom of choice. Is this so? Gen. ii. 16, 17 tells us "And the Lord God commanded the man, saying, of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die". The freedom to eat of every tree was commanded by God! The prohibition to refrain from the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil was commanded by God! The word for 'command' is so translated well over 400 times, the other 60 or so alternative translations all have the underlying sense of command, e.g. appoint, forbid, etc. Even in Eden man was ordered to do right, and to refrain from wrong. "And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof, and did eat, and gave also to her husband with her; and he did eat" (Gen. iii. 6). Immediately, in accord with the command of God, 'death (entered into the world) by sin' (Rom. v. 12). From that moment the situation was radically changed.

Until death entered into the world 'as by one man', Adam and Eve were 'free' to do God's Will in the sense that to obey Him they had to do nothing. The only other course open to them was to disobey, and to do this they had to act, and from the moment they acted, a reversal of the situation took place. The Concordant Version of the New Testament translates Rom. v. 12 thus:

> "Therefore, even as through one man sin entered into the world, and through sin death, and thus death came through into all mankind, on which all sinned . . . . .".

The 'natural' result of the entrance of death into the world by sin, was that all men sin: the result of sin is death, for 'the wages of sin is death' (Rom. vi. 23). In consequence of the Fall mankind has ever since been held in the bitter bondage of the vicious circle of death giving rise to sin, and sin resulting in death. From that sequence man cannot break free. In his bondage man is free to sin, free to disobey his Creator: he needs to do nothing to remain in rebellion, and the life of obedience is beyond his power.

Neither in Eden, nor at any time since, has man had freewill. Freewill implies that man can do anything, but as we have seen, man has at all time been strictly confined so that at best he might be said to have freedom of choice. In no sphere of life is man able to do anything or everything. A topical illustration of this point is the environment where, in the opinion of many, pollution has reached a critical level. Persistently man has exploited nature and is now reaping what he has sown. It has been suggested that the atmosphere is so badly polluted that there is sufficient oxygen for only twenty years left. While this may be panic conclusion, it is true that the Mediterranean Sea is becoming one vast sewer, already bring death and desolation to vegetation on its shores in some areas. Man has flouted and continues to flout God's will in the laws of nature: if the laws of nature are obeyed, all is well; but if the laws of nature are disregarded disaster inevitably follows. There may be many different ways of disregarding the laws of nature, but the outcome is always the same—disaster. In the sphere of the environment there are only two courses open to man: to accede to the laws of nature . . . . . or, to choose disaster. The 'freedom' accorded to man is very limited: he has, basically, the choice between two ways, one result in blessing, the other in disaster.

Throughout the Bible, throughout human history and experience this remains true. Man's choice is between blessing and disaster, salvation and perdition. To man, in any one given situation, there may seem to be many ways, but essentially there are only two: God's way, or man's way. The choice for Israel is clearly outlined in Deut. xxx. 15-19:

> "See I have set before thee this day life and good, and death and evil; in that I command thee this day to love the Lord thy God, to walk in His ways, and to keep His commandments and His statutes and His judgments, that thou mayest live and multiply: and the Lord thy God shall bless thee in the land whither thou goest to possess it. But if thine heart turn away, so that thou wilt not hear, but shalt be drawn away, and worship other gods, and serve them; I denounce unto you this day, that ye shall surely perish, and that ye shall not prolong your days upon the land, whither thou passest over Jordan to go to possess it. I call heaven and earth to record this day against you, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing . . . . .".

Though it might seem to some of those who heard these words it was a choice of one out of many gods, it was simply a choice between the one true Lord God and the worship of falsehood. A similar choice was given to the nation by Joshua "Choose you this day whom ye will serve; whether the gods which your fathers served . . . . . but as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord" (Josh. xxiv. 15). Again the choice is put by Elijah on Carmel (I Kings xviii.) where it would seem indecision is the issue (verse 21):

> "How long halt ye between two opinions? if the Lord be God, follow Him: but if Baal, then follow him."

Indecision is as much a mark of the bondage of man's will as outright rebellion. This was made clear by the Lord Jesus Christ "He that is not with Me is against Me" (Matt. xii. 30). As we have suggested above Adam and Eve needed to do nothing to remain 'with' God, they had to act to disobey: man today need to do nothing to remain in rebellion. Adam and Eve had to choose to go against God: man today must choose to go with God. But that very choice means the right choice will put man against the main stream of life on earth: added to the bondage of his will is the further discouragement and opposition of the way of life of those around him.

The Man Christ Jesus chose God's way, chose God's will. At the well at Sychar when the disciples, bringing Him food, questioned whether 'any man brought Him ought to eat', He told them "My meat (or My necessary food) is to do the will of Him that sent Me and to accomplish His work". To do the will of His Father was more important to Him than anything else. The result of His choice was that "he was despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief" (Isa. liii. 3). He was concerned to do the will of God, He chose the will of God, and inevitably all the influence of a fallen race was against Him. In Him was nothing to respond to that influence, in us is so much which is responsive that we well nigh despair of performing the good that we would.

When we choose the will of God rather than our own, the magnitude of the problem becomes apparent. We find with Paul "to will is present with me; but how to perform that which is good I find not". Some have suggested this was the apostle's experience before his conversion; but is it possible for one whose will is in bondage to choose the will of God? "With the mind I myself serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin" (Rom. vii. 25). This is one whose will has been set free from the bondage of sin and death, whose will is in bondage now to righteousness, whose cry, because of the conflict, is "O wretched man that I am!" Paul has no difficulty in desiring that which is good—"the willing is on hand", as it might be put, "but the accomplishment is not". With all his heart he desires to do the will of God, but in spite of everything he finds a law "that, when I would do good, evil is present with me". But because he delights in the law of God after the inward man (verse 22), because his desire is to do the will of God, he discovers "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus" (Rom. viii. 1). The desire for the will of God is accounted to him for righteousness.

This is no easy way out of the problem: it does not mean that the believer can now do exactly as he pleases. How can the man who desires with all his heart to do the will of God, now go his own way? This easing of the problem is for the man (or woman) who has a definite, almost desperate, desire for the will of God; for the one who echoes the Apostle's cry "O wretched man that I am"—a phrase which could almost be translated "O suffering man that I am". The conflict between the desire for the will of God, and the inability 'to perform that which is good' gives rise to anguish of spirit. For such, for those truly desiring 'that which is good' then Rom. viii. 28 holds good:

> "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to His purpose", and the will, the desire is accounted for that which is good.

This great doctrine of justification by faith relieves the anxiety of the problem, enabling us, in addition to desiring the will of God, to set our minds on things above, not on things on the earth (Col. iii. 2); enabling us to look for Christ, and to leave with Him the conflict and the problem, for He has set us free (Gal. v. 1). And as our minds are thus freed from the strife and anxiety, being set on things above, that which God has worked in us "both to will and to do of His good pleasure" (Phil. ii. 13), is worked out in our daily living. It cannot be without significance that that which God works in us begins with the will, with the desire.

Freewill? No. Free choice?—even here it seems our wills are not free until they are freed by God working in us. We have a bias, a leaning to go against God. Thus we naturally, freely choose that which is against the will of God. Even when by faith we are 'in Christ', while we can desire God's will, our will knows not 'how to perform that which is good', for it is not sufficiently free, for there is in the flesh no good thing (Romans vii. 18). Added to the opposition of the flesh is also the external opposition of the influence of the fallen race among which we live.

Freedom of will, freedom of choice, becomes possible only in proportion to the measure in which we yield our bodies living sacrifices, holy, acceptable unto God . . . . . that we may prove (or assess) what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God (Rom. xii. 1, 2). Then, as our minds are freed from the bondage of sin and death, we submit ourselves as the bondservants of righteousness and of God, "Whose service is perfect freedom".

The natural man knows no freedom of will or of choice. Release from the bondage of sin and death comes only through the cross of the Lord Jesus Christ, when we become the servants of righteousness, and with the Apostle Paul delight to call ourselves the bondservants of Jesus Christ.

No.5. The Ten Commandments.
pp. 190 - 196

It would seem strange if God had not given certain explicit indications of His will to His ancient People who were under tutelage. These indications we find in the Law. For our purposes perhaps we may place the covenantal Law under three division: the ceremonial or ritual, the dietary and the Ten Commandments. As to the ceremonial or ritual, clearly this has been fulfilled in Christ and was obviously a shadow of that which was to come. The dietary may be considered outside the scope of this study as being a subject which is seldom, if ever, raised as a point of dispute. There remains, however, the Ten Commandments.

There are those believers who are convinced that the Ten Commandments are as obligatory today as they were for those to whom they were first given, while on the other hand there are those who are firmly convinced that the obligations of the Ten Commandments were included in the 'handwriting of ordinances that was against us' and which Christ took 'out of the way, nailing it to His cross' (Col. ii. 14). It is by no means a question of unimportance to the members of the Church which is Christ's Body: are we under obligation to observe the Ten Commandments?

We will seek to deal with this question in two ways: (1) what, if anything, is said in the prison epistles in connection with the Commandments and (2) the 'lawful' use of the Law.

The first Commandment states: "I am the Lord thy God . . . . . Thou shalt have no other gods before my face" (Exod. xx. 2, 3, see The Companion Bible note). What is here enjoined is stated as a fact by Paul in Eph. iv. 6 "There is . . . . . One God and Father of all". No member of the Body of Christ is likely to dispute this, nor claim the liberty to have any other god. So the will of God concerning the relationship existing between Himself and His people of all dispensations is made plain: There is one God.

"Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image" says the second Commandment, 'or any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is in earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth'. Paul, however, takes the standard higher in his statement "No . . . . . covetous man, who is an idolater hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God" (Eph. v. 5, cf. Col. iii. 5). To covet anything is to make of it a god, an idol. Perhaps here is an instance where we need to exercise particular care due to the influence of the materialistic society in which we live.

"Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain." Among those things 'which are upon the earth' and are to be mortified (Col. iii. 5, 8) Paul include 'blasphemy'. This he tells Timothy is one of the marks of the last days (II Tim. iii. 1, 2), pointing out that 'men shall be lovers of their own selves . . . . . lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God' (verses 2, 4). In such a situation the name of God and all things holy are unlikely to be held in reverence. Nor, would we think, even allowing for the influence of the ungodly society around us, would any member of Christ's Body wish to speak lightly, or without reverence, of God.

Of all the Ten Commandments, the fourth is the one which is most in dispute so far as members of the One Body are concerned. But there are certain points to be noted: the fourth Commandment is as much (perhaps more) a command to 'labour six days', a point worth noting at the present time when the working week grows gradually shorter and even nominal acknowledgment of God grows less. In the second place the emphasis is upon remembering the sabbath day to keep it holy. "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the Lord blessed the sabbath day, and hollowed it." The sabbath, as such, is then first an ordinance of creation and then, following six days of labour, a welcome opportunity for man to rest from his labours, as God did from His. Dr. E. W. Bullinger's comments in Number in Scriptures are of interest here (p.9):

> "Moreover, man appears to be made on what we may call the seven-day principle. In various diseases the seventh, fourteenth, and twenty-first are critical days; and in others seven or 14 half-days. Man's pulse beats on the seven day principle, for Dr. Stratton points out that for six days out of seven it beats faster in the morning than in the evening, while on the seventh day it beats slower. Thus the number seven is stamped upon physiology, and he is thus admonished, as man, to rest one day in seven. He cannot violate this law with impunity, for it is interwoven with his very being."

Man therefore, being made on 'the seven day principle', it is hardly surprising to find that the People of God were enjoined in this covenant relationship with God 'to remember the sabbath day' following six days of labour.

But what should be our attitude to the 'sabbath'? Paul makes but one reference to it in the prison epistles, Col. ii. 16, "Let no man judge you . . . . . in respect of an holy day, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days". The matters of which he has been speaking are, he says, 'a shadow of things to come; but the body (or substance) is of Christ'. :Let no man judge you"; but precisely what does Paul mean by this? The primary significance of 'judge' (krino) is 'to separate, divide, put apart: hence to pick out'. "Let no man pick you out . . . . . in respect of an holy day, etc." The principalities and powers, who, it would seem, had some jurisdiction or authority in these matters have been 'spoiled'. Indeed the inference suggests that prior to the triumph of the cross, these principalities and powers clung to Christ Himself in an adverse way; these He 'stripped off' as a garment, divesting Himself of their influence. Having done this, He displayed them freely, revealing them for the 'weak and beggarly' things they are and showing that the areas in which they had held sway were mere shadows of the reality to be found in Himself (Col. ii. 15). Let no man 'pick you out' in respect of shadows.

A few verses later (Col. ii. 20) Paul questions their subjection to ordinances, according to the precepts and teachings of men. This, surely, is the crux of the matter. It is wrong for the believer to be subject to the opinions of men, and unthinkingly to adopt a course of action or a way of life, simply because other people, albeit other Christians, 'lay down the law' on the matter. There is the danger that members of Christ's Body may err by going from the extreme of "thou shalt not" to "thou shalt" and vice versa, thereby equally becoming 'subject to ordinances according to the precepts and teachings of men'. We are free 'with the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free'; free to do the will of God. We are freed from the bondage of the sabbath law, or the first day of the week: the fact that there is the possibility of choice on this point indicates the bondage has been removed.

But what should be our attitude to 'Sunday observance'? We have already seen that 'man appears to be made on what we may call the seven day principle', and thus needs, physically one day's rest in seven: is it not equally true that he may need a similar opportunity for his spirit? C. H. Welch has this to say (Just and the Justifier, p.316):

> "While the believer today may not be in danger of judging or despising so far as 'meats' are concerned, there are many who adopt the attitude here condemned (Rom.xiv.) regarding the observance of the so-called 'Lord's Day'. Those of us who are free from the tradition concerning the observance of either the Sabbath or the First Day of the Week, should remember that we are called upon to respect the consciences of those who, though 'weak', 'regard the day unto the Lord'. It is not the first part of this sentence that matters, it is the second part: 'unto the Lord'."

Following his discourse on the question of meats and the observance of 'days' in Rom. xiv., Paul continues in chapter xv. thus:

> "We then that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves. Let every one of us please his neighbour for his good to edification. For even Christ pleased not Himself . . . . .".

Again in Volume XI, p.27, of The Berean Expositor, C.H.W. says:

> "We are bound to observe no day in particular (this does not give license to outrage other believers' feelings concerning Sunday) but gladly seek to walk worthy before the Lord and our fellows."

We have dealt at some length with the Fourth Commandment because we believe this to be an issue of particular relevance in the days in which we live. The way in which we treat Sunday can have a great influence upon our witness as believers.

Passing on, then, to the Fifth Commandment: "Honour thy father and thy mother", we find the Apostle Paul makes specific reference to this in Eph. vi. 1-3 and Col. iii. 20 and it is worth noting his comment in the former: "which is the first commandment with promise". So also the comment in Col. iii. 20 should be noted: "for this is well pleasing unto the Lord". Here at least is a commandment which should be taken as an indication of what is 'well pleasing unto the Lord', and hence of His will for His people.

While it is true there is no specific mention of murder in the prison epistles, bearing in mind that the Lord Jesus Christ said:

> "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, thou shalt not kill . . . . . But I say unto you, that whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment . . . . ." (Matt. v. 21-22).

Eph. iv. 26, 31 and Col. iii. 8 make it clear that wrath and anger, the root of murder, have no place in the life of the member of Christ's Body.

So it is with theft: "Let him that stole steal no more" (Eph. iv. 28). Similarly with false witness, Eph. iv. 25 exhorts the putting away of lying and the speaking of truth every man with his neighbour. Covetousness is doubly condemned both as covetousness and idolatry.

Clearly and logically, nine of the Ten Words will be fulfilled by members of the Church which is Christ's Body. This being the case is there any good reason why the Fourth should be an exception?

However, why should we be bound by any of the Ten Commandments when Christ has made us free from the Law? In writing his first letter to Timothy Paul gives us the answer, Chapter i. 8-11:

> "But we know that the law is good, if a man use it lawfully; knowing this, that the law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners, for unholy and profane, for murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, for manslayers, for whoremongers, for them that defile themselves with mankind, for men stealers, for liars, for perjured persons, and if there be any other thing that is contrary to sound doctrine . . . . .".

So then the law is not for the 'righteous' man, but rather for the 'unrighteous'. The principle is laid down in Rom. iii. 31:

> "Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid: yea, we establish the law."

That is to say, we are no longer subject to the law, nonetheless our conduct does not make the law pointless; rather it gives point to the law, for those for whom it is intended, i.e., 'the lawless', etc.

Perhaps we can make the difference clearer by referring to Gal. iv. 1-7. Before the 'redemption' which is in Christ Jesus we were infants (better than 'child' as in A.V.), but since "God sent forth His Son . . . . . to redeem them that were under the Law", we have received 'the adoption of sons', and are no more servants, but heirs. "The law was our schoolmaster" (Gal. iii. 24). It is the difference between the immaturity of the infant and the responsibility of the mature son; the latter can be relied upon to conduct himself properly without the need for the discipline of the law. The reason for the existence of laws in our own society is often the irresponsibility of many people. For example, the responsible driver would naturally slow down when traveling through a built up area, but there were many who did not do so, with the result that a law had to be drawn up restricting the liberty of the 'lawless'. This law was not given for the law-abiding, but for the law-breaker. Thus those who are 'in Christ', are not subject to the law, but this does not give them license to break the law, nor does it mean that they will do so, for by so doing they number themselves among those for whom it was given!

What believer is there who willfully breaks the Ten Commandments? Do we know of any believer who has another god as well as God or who worships a 'graven image', who claims the right to commit adultery or bear false witness? Why then should there be any who turn from the privilege afforded by our society for one day's rest in seven: an opportunity to turn from the specific claims of daily living for worship, meditation on the Word of God, fellowship with other believers, an opportunity for a 'day of rest and gladness'? We are not subject to such a day, we are not obliged to observe one day above another, nor in our observance of it do we hedge it about with all sorts of pettifogging restrictions. But as nine of the Ten Commandments are clearly the expression of God's desire for us, why should the one (the fourth) not be also His desire for us?

It seems clear then that in the Ten Commandments we have laid down for us the basic principles of the Will of God for us and that, while we may not be 'under the law', the members of Christ's Body will delight to do His will with the psalmist of old. For it was for this reason:

> "He hath chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before Him in love: having predestinated us unto the adoption of children (better: placing as sons) by Jesus Christ to Himself, according to the good pleasure of His will, to the praise of the glory of His grace wherein He hath made us accepted in the beloved" (Eph. i. 4-6).

God has placed us as sons in Christ that we should be holy and without blame before Him in love to the praise of the glory of His grace.

No.6. The Way of Responsibility.
pp. 211 - 216

In the last article reference was made to the adoption, or 'placing as sons'. This we suggested involved responsibility, and it is of this we wish to think more fully in the current article.

We commenced this series of articles with the consideration of Rom. xii. 1, 2 which includes the exhortation to be 'transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that . . . . . will of God'. Hence, as we saw, the renewed mind is of the utmost importance both in discovering and confirming the will of God as it is carried out. Probably the mind plays a far greater part in discerning the will of God, and in the Christian life in general, than we are wont to think.

Yet this is no easy way out of the problems which confront us concerning the discernment and fulfillment of the will of God. Something of the problem is indicated in Rom. viii. 5-8:

> "For they that are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh; but they that are after the Spirit the things of the Spirit. For to be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace. Because the carnal mind is enmity against God: for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God."

In this passage the noun and verb translated 'mind' both have the significance of 'what one has in mind', 'to regard, care for'. That is to say it is the content of the mind which is in question. "They that are after the flesh . . . they that are after the spirit . . .". The significance of the Greek kata translated 'after' is that of 'going along with'; they that go along with the flesh are compared with those who go along with spirit, and here a tragedy is revealed. It is quite possible for believers who have experienced regeneration by the Holy Spirit to 'go along with the flesh'. There are those of whom Paul speaks in Phil. iii. 18, 19:

> "For many walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ: whose end is destruction, whose God is their belly, and whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things."

The content of their minds is 'things on the earth'; they are those who, in the context of the chapter, have 'confidence in the flesh' (verse 3). They seek to live the Christian life in the wisdom and strength of the flesh. "They are the enemies of the cross of Christ"; "the carnal mind is enmity against God". The primary thought behind 'enemy' is something 'hated, odious, adverse'. Small wonder that the Apostle speaks of such 'even weeping', for here are believers whose minds are filled with matters odious to God and opposed to the cross of Christ. Their end is 'utter loss': they have not been prepared to 'count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus', and if they so continue, the fulfillment of their lives will be nothing, they have sown to their flesh and will reap ruin (Gal. vi. 8). How sad it is that 'many walk' so.

But there are those who 'go long with' the new nature begotten in the believer by God. Such occupy their minds with spiritual things (Rom. viii. 5). They find that 'to be spiritually minded is life and peace': a clear inference, surely, that if our minds are occupied with spiritual things we shall find we are doing the will of God, for the things of the spirit are the things of God.

It is precisely the same verb 'to mind' (phroneo) which Paul uses in Phil. ii. 5 "Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus". Let this disposition, intention, or purpose be in you which was also in Christ Jesus; let the content of your mind be as the content of His mind. Clearly the content of His mind was 'things above'. It is not surprising, then, to find Paul using the same verb in Col. iii. 2 "Set your affection on things above": the things above occupy your minds, not those upon the earth. The previous verse perhaps makes clearer what is entailed in setting the affections on the things above:

> "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God."

"Seek after, search out, inquire into, investigate" those things which are above. Obviously this entails effort and the expenditure of time. The passive aspect of it is that we should be mindful of the things above, the active that we search out, give diligence to the things above. Nor should "Bereans" need any exhortation so to do, professing to emulate the Bereans of Acts xvii. 11, who 'searched the Scriptures daily, whether those things were so'. A different word is used for 'search', but it is one which is at least equally strong, meaning 'to search out'. Again there is emphasis on zeal in connection with the Scriptures and things above in II Tim. ii. 15, "Study to shew thyself approved unto God". The word 'study' is perhaps rather limited compared with the original, which would better be translated "Give diligence". Clearly in the context of 'rightly dividing the word of truth' study is involved, but diligence also is required. It is not enough to do study for the purpose of preparing a talk, and then do no further 'searching out' until another talk demands it. So also diligence is required in making time for the things of the spirit, and sometimes in making the effort to search them out.

We need to 'let this mind' be in us 'which was also in Christ Jesus'. We need minds so occupied with the things and will of God that there is nothing we count so dear as to keep us from the things of the spirit. If we find the prospect daunting, let us remember that the one who exhorted 'Let this mind be in you', himself said:

> "Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect: but I follow after, if that I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus" (Phil.iii.12).

Again he strikes the note of diligence in the word he uses for 'follow'; it is the word often translated 'persecute'. He will give all the zeal and intensity, the persistence and patience which is the mark of a persecutor, to the attainment of that for which he has been 'apprehended of Christ Jesus'. But has he not already done enough? He has, he tells us, 'counted loss' all the things of the flesh in which he might have confidence, and counts them but dung that he might win Christ. His all prevailing passion is, he tells us, "That I may (come to) know Him, and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings, being made conformable unto His death" (Phil. iii. 10). He continues (15-17):

> "Let us therefore, as many as be perfect (mature), be thus minded . . . . . Brethren, be followers together of me."

Become fellow-imitators of me in being 'thus minded'. As Christ was completely devoted to the mind of God, so Paul was completely devoted to the mind of Christ, and his desire for other believers is that they should be equally devoted to the mind of Christ.

Paul could say, probably with unmatched devotion, "With the mind I myself serve the law of God". But here he uses a different word for 'mind': nous, it is 'the organ of thinking and knowledge, the understanding; or especially, the organ of moral thinking'. It is that which is filled either with the 'carnal mind' or 'the mind of the spirit'. This is the word he uses when he says, 'we have the mind of Christ' (I Cor. ii. 16). The Companion Bible note on Rom. vii. 25 includes this comment: "mind = mind (the new nature) indeed". It is this which Paul says in Rom. xii. 2 needs to be 'renewed' that being thus transformed, we may 'prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God'. It is also plain from the first two verses of Rom. xii. that the renewal of the mind comes as we present our bodies living sacrifices, holy, acceptable unto God, which is our reasonable service.

We have the responsibility as believers to see that the content of our minds, the 'minding', is worthy of the 'mind' which is given to us. This mind, the organ of our thinking and understanding, may be strengthened and nourished if occupied with 'those things which are above'; it will certainly be choked and weakened if occupied with the things 'which are upon the earth'. The more it is occupied with the things of the spirit, the more effective it will become and the more certainly shall we fulfil the desires of God for us. But if constantly kept occupied with the things of earth, with the 'mind of the flesh', it should hardly surprise us if we find great difficulty concerning the will of God. Someone once said 'Love God, and do as you please': if we love Him sufficiently to count all things but loss, if our minds are so completely taken up with Him, then the things we do will be such as will please Him.

We pointed out in the first article that in Rom. xii. 2 it would be more accurate to render 'the renewing of your mind' as 'the mind', and that the word for 'renew' includes the preposition ana, which in a composite word has the significance of 'up to, towards, up, ... hence with a sense of strengthening'. The mind of the believer needs to be strengthened by being occupied with the things above. This results both in the transformation of the life, and the proving 'what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God'.

However, few of us attain to the standard put forward by Paul in Phil. iii., and, as we have seen, even he was not satisfied with his attainment in this connection. Are we then doomed to a Christian life in which we just manage to 'muddle through'? Must we then 'do the best we can' and leave it at that? Can we never satisfy our God by fulfilling His wishes for us? It is at this point the great doctrine of Justification by Faith comes to our aid. For in Rom. xii. we read of the conflict between 'the good that I would' and 'the evil which I would not'. The solution is in verse 25:

> "So then with the mind I myself serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin."

Paul at least, of the next chapter clarifies the matter:

> "For they that are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh; but they that are after the Spirit the things of the Spirit. For to be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace. Because the carnal mind is enmity against God: for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God" (Rom. viii. 5-8).

Here is a clear denial of the idea wrongly attributed to the doctrine of Justification by Father, that the one justified can now do as he pleases, living a carnal life. For those who 'mind' the things of the flesh 'cannot please God'. It is plain that the mind which serves 'the law of God', is a mind which is occupied with the things of the Spirit. If our thinking and our desires are directed to pleasing God, then, and only then, our endeavours, our intentions are accepted as well pleasing unto the Lord. As some one has put it "The Will of God for us is that we should will to do the will of God". Our minds and our 'minding' should be directed to God and set 'on things above', for 'as he thinketh in his heart, so is he' (Prov. xxiii. 7). The believer is what his thoughts are. Am I no better than my thoughts? What a challenge to us all!

The responsibility for our thoughts rests squarely with us. It is true we cannot keep wrong thoughts out of our minds, but we are accountable if they remain there. Luther is reported to have said, in this connection, "You cannot stop the crows alighting on your heads; but you can stop them making nests in your hair". Many thoughts, in the course of the day, come into our minds from 'the world, the flesh and the devil', we have the responsibility not to welcome them into our minds. Our responsibility to God is to be able to say with Paul:

> "With the mind I myself serve the law of God."

No.7. The Worthy Walk---"Practical Teaching".
pp. 231 - 237

In the course of our studies on this important subject, we have ranged over a variety of aspects, but there still remains the difficult problem of relating the Will of God personally. Perhaps there is no greater emphasis on "the worthy walk" than in our own fellowship. But what is the worthy walk? What advice can be given to enable anyone young in the faith to attain to a worthy walk? What practical teaching can be given to this end?

At the present time there is a great demand in Christian circles to 'be practical', for it is considered that only a practical life can be one which constitute the worthy walk. Hence there is a great demand for practical teaching, for it is argued that if the Christian faith is anything, it must be practical. It is a demand which places in opposition 'practical' and 'doctrinal' teaching. But are there two kinds of teaching, 'practical' and 'doctrinal' or dogmatic? Although theological students are taught 'dogmatics' & 'ethics', this is no proof that the two can be separated, and indeed such double-mindedness can lead to serious errors and consequences.

In Roman Catholic theology such a division, arising from the assumed need for practical guidance, has given rise to the distinction between 'mortal' and 'venial' sins. We quote from an authorized Roman book of instruction:

> "In the world to come mortal sin is punished with the fire of hell, so is venial sin punished with the fire of purgatory . . . . . No number of venial sins, however great, will of themselves destroy the grace of God in the soul, or make a mortal sin."

One kind of sin, then, will destroy 'the grace of God in the soul', while another kind of sin, no matter how often committed, nor how numerous they may be, will not of themselves do so. Rom. iii. 23 defines sin as 'coming short of the glory of God', and indeed one of the words of sin, perhaps the most frequently used one, both in Hebrew and Greek, signifies 'to miss the mark'. "Practical teaching" concludes that we can 'miss the mark' or 'fall short' in certain areas (and that time and again), without suffering eternal consequences! It matters little whether the rope thrown to a drowning man falls short by one inch or by one mile: the man still drowns. Sin, whether 'great' or 'small' (in the eyes of man), is a very serious matter, and any distinction arising from the desire for 'practical' guidance can only belittle the seriousness of sin. The only 'practical' solution to the problem of sin is doctrinal: "The Blood of Jesus Christ (God's) Son cleanseth us from all sin." Neither purgatorial suffering, nor the flames of the traditional 'hell' can deal with sin. Yet the desire for 'practical' teaching and guidance, a desire which seeks to avoid personal responsibility, leads only to serious doctrinal error.

In other areas 'practical' teaching leads on to very serious consequences. We have heard of a Bible Class leader who recommends that before condemning anything, we need to have experience of it. His advice is given, it is true, in the context of films: he therefore advises his young people to see such films as “The Clockwork Orange” or “The Exorcist” before they are condemned. One young woman following this advice saw the latter film only to be seriously disturbed for some time afterwards: she could indeed condemn it from personal experience, but at a cost to herself which may not have been fully paid yet. Several years ago a young woman, of eighteen or so, working among drug addicts concluded her help would be the more ‘practical’ if she had personal experience. She died a horrible death as a drug addict herself. ‘Practical” teaching can have some very serous and far-reaching consequences.

Yet clearly, if these studies are to be of value, they must be practical and give practical teaching concerning the worthy walk of the believer, and especially the believer who is a member of the Church which is the Body of Christ.

In the desire to walk worthy, there are those who look towards involvement with ‘good works’. Such would value advice concerning the drug addict, the alcoholic, the social ‘dropout’, lawlessness or any of the other spheres of popular concern. WE ARE NOT SAYING THERE IS NO PLACE FOR GOOD WORKS IN THE ACCEPTED SENSE OF THE EXPRESSION; but it may be we shall find the ‘good works’ to which the believer is exhorted are not necessarily quite what they are popularly supposed to be. The question is often asked “How will the world know of our faith, apart from good works, if we do not show our love?” But who is the Christian told to love? In giving what none can deny was practical teaching to His disciples shortly before His death, the Lord Jesus Christ said ‘If ye love Me, keep My commandments’ (John xiv. 15). In the next chapter, verse 12, He said “This is My commandment that ye love one another, as I have loved you”. Again in John xiii. 34, 35:

> “A new commandment I give unto you, That ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another. By this shall all men know that ye are My disciples, IF YE HAVE LOVE ONE TO ANOTHER.”

There is plenty of similar evidence elsewhere in the N.T. John’s First Epistle is full of the thought:

> “And this commandment have we from Him, That he who loveth God love his brother also.”

Much turns on the question “Who is my brother?” John also answers this question in his First Epistle (v. 1):

> “Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God: and every one that loveth Him that begat loveth him also that is begotten of Him.”

Paul also indicates a similar emphasis on love for one another: e.g. I Thess. iv. 9:

> “But as touching brotherly love ye need not that I write unto you: for ye yourselves are taught of God to love one another.”

Perhaps the nearest Paul comes to telling us to love, or care for, all men is in Gal. vi. 10:

> "As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household (or family) of faith."

We are, then, to have a prime concern for the welfare of our fellow-believers; even when 'all men' are mentioned the emphasis is laid upon 'especially them who are of the household of faith'.

It is not infrequently suggested that the believer shows his love for God by demonstrating his love for others. What saith the Scripture?

> "By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God, and keep His commandments" (I John v. 2).

We only know that we do in fact love our brethren in Christ, when we love God and put Him first. How often 'other commitments' are our excuse for not giving first place to God! And 'other commitments' can be the means whereby we deny our fellow-believers fellowship. How many ministers have become dispirited by lack of support by reason of 'other commitments': in turn they fail those to whom they minister because so dispirited: and indeed those whose 'other commitments' have led to such a situation are also deprived of the ministry they need. It is true that Paul was speaking of 'the other Body', but his words in I Cor. xii. 25, 26 are pertinent to the situation of the members of the One Body:

> ". . . . . the members should have the same care one for another. And whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honoured, all the members rejoice with it."

"We are members one of another" (Eph. iv. 25). In the context of our dealings with the 'weaker brother' Paul says "For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself" (Rom. xiv. 7). As believers and members of the Body of Christ we cannot live in isolation: each member needs 'that which every joint supplieth'; each member, being in a right relationship with Christ, the Head, is a means whereby spiritual nourishment is ministered to his fellow members.

But it may be argued that in Matt. v. 44 the Lord Himself appears to take it further:

> "But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you."

This, however, is found in the Sermon on the Mount in which the Lord expounded the laws for entering the Kingdom, and occurred early in His ministry and before the Kingdom and the King had been rejected by the Jews. After His rejection, and just prior to the crucifixion we read:

> "These things I command you, that ye love one another. If the world hate you, ye know that it hated Me before it hated you. If ye were of the world, the world would love his own: but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you. Remember the word that I said unto you, the servant is not greater than his Lord. If they have persecuted Me, they will also persecute you; if > they have kept My saying, they will keep yours also. But all these things will they do unto you for My name's sake, because they know not Him that sent Me" (John xv.17-21).

By the time these words were spoken the situation had radically changed: because of persecution believers would need help the one from another, they would need to have 'love one for another'. From this time on there would be hostility between the world and those 'born of God', for 'the whole world lieth in the wicked one' (I John v. 19). The time was approaching when it could be saith "(the Father) hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of His dear Son" (Col. i. 13). In this country we know little of persecution at the present time; but as the days darken and 'lawlessness abounds' we may find ourselves confronted with suffering for Christ's sake, then we shall realize the need to show our love one for the other. There are those in other countries who have for some time known the importance of caring for their fellow believers: it has been forced upon them by the secular and Godless state. Yet perhaps in our society, a society which is indifferent to the things of God, there is a greater need that we should recognize this aspect of the worthy walk and of the will of God, for the indifference of the society in which we live, breeds indifference in the believer unless he is awake to the situation. Why am I so indifferent? Is it because you are indifferent? And why are you so indifferent? Is it because I am indifferent? We each need all the support and fellowship the other can give; and if one fails, all suffer with him.

We live in days when the hostility of the world and the Prince of this World for the believe is coming to a climax, at a time when the 'perilous times' to which Paul make reference in II Tim. iii. 1 are drawing near (if they have not already dawned). What practical advice has the Apostle for his young friend for those days? Beginning with chapter ii. 15 "Give diligence (study) . . . . . the Word of Truth", he leads on through 'profane and vain babblings . . . . . ungodliness' to the perilous times, concluding that passage with the injunction:

> "But continue thou in the things which thou hast learned and hast been assured of, knowing of whom thou hast learned them; and that from a child thou hast known the holy scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus. All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness: that the man of God may be perfect, throughly furnished unto all good works" (II Tim. iii. 14-17).

The only practical teaching for such times as those in which we live is that we give diligence to the Word of Truth, recognizing that all Scriptures is given by inspiration of God and is profitable.

Our first concern as we seek to know and do the will of God, walking worthy of our calling and our Lord, should be to love God, and to get to know Christ. This may well call for a reappraisal of our priorities and our commitments, may call for self-sacrifice in order to give diligence to these matters, but as Rom. xii. 1, 2 points out (as we have more than once in these studies suggested), it is as we present our bodies living sacrifices, holy, acceptable unto God, that we shall prove what is the Will of God. We have the responsibility to set our minds on things above, and not on things on the earth (Col. iii. 2) the responsibility to fill our minds with the things of God.

> "They that are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh; but they that are after the Spirit the things of the Spirit. For to be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace. Because the carnal mind is enmity against God: for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God" (Rom. viii. 5-8).

As we have already pointed out in the previous article, the mind is filled either with the things of the flesh, or with the things of the Spirit. There are those believers who allow themselves to be 'at home' in the flesh, and are therefore minding the things of the flesh; we should be just 'lodgers', waiting until the time comes when we shall be where our minds are set.

The only really practical teaching in the Word of God is to be found in doctrine which outlines principles which must be personally worked out. No one can do this for me, nor can anyone do it for you. "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind" (Rom.xiv.5), for 'a double minded man is unstable in all his ways' (James i. 8). To be 'double minded', to be less than 'fully persuaded' can lead to disaster: the man of God in I Kings xiii. allowed himself to be persuaded contrary to his own conviction, and died. The fact that it was a prophet who brought to him the "Word of Jehovah" made no difference; he was not fully persuaded in his own mind. Many will tell us what is God's will for us, but we dare not heed their advice without first searching the Scriptures to see whether these things are so.

The practical advice for Christian living, for the worthy walk, for finding out the will of God is to give diligence to the Word of Truth, searching the Scriptures, remembering that every Scripture is inspired of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction and for instruction in righteousness. The object of the effort (and it may well take a great deal of effort to find the time) is simply "to (get to) know Him", for He is "the Way, the Truth and the Life".

Dear Fellow-members,

We thank the Lord God that we achieved another two years' witness to the riches of His Word by means of The Berean Expositor. Since the completion of the previous volume, XLVII in 1974, we are conscious of a steady decline in the acceptance of the Scriptures as the fully inspired Word of God by the general public and also by a large section of organized religious bodies. For such people to accept only part of the record God has placed in our hands, is to undermine the basis of salvation, and to deny to many the wonderful news of the calling of the Mystery, that crowning message of the Apostle Paul to us Gentiles.

May this volume continue to awake interest in the Book of Life and assist the reader to surmount the difficulties of translations and appreciate to the full the meaning behind the words and paragraphs that the Holy Spirit has enshrined in God's Word.

Antonyms, or Clarity by Contrasts

pp. 16 - 20

When we pass from the epistle to the Galatians to the first epistle to the Thessalonians, we pass from an atmosphere of conflict to one of comparative calm. We shall therefore expect to find a great difference in the method adopted by the Apostle. We should not expect such a challenging opening to Thessalonians as we found in Galatians, for the Thessalonians had not challenged either the validity of Paul's apostleship or of his gospel. Paul's antonyms will be in harmony with the purpose they are to subserve, and in the calmer atmosphere of this model church, his contrasts will be run in a gentler mode. We have listed eleven however, with which we must be acquainted if we would gain that 'clarity' which 'contrast' gives, although we shall not find these contrasts ramifying through the epistle as we did those found in Galatians.

Let us first of all set out the contrasts which Paul has employed in this epistle, and then examine them a little more in detail in order to appreciate their force and application. We discover upon investigation that these contrasts fall into three groups:

(1) The Gospel. Not "Word" only but "power" (i. 5; ii. 13).

(2) The Apostle. Not pleasing men, but God (ii. 4).
Not burdensome but gentle (ii. 5-7).
In presence not in heart (ii. 17).
Paul and Satan (ii. 18).
Comfort and affliction (iii. 7).

(3) The Coming of the Lord.
The dead and the living (iv. 16, 17).
Peace and destruction (v. 3).
Darkness and light (v. 4, 5).
Wrath and salvation (v. 9).
Watchful and drowsy (v. 10).

Let us confine our attention to the contrast made by the Apostle in connection with the Gospel; and before we do, let us observe that in chapter i. of this epistle, by an easy transition, he passes from 'Gospel' (i. 5), to 'what manner of men' and 'what manner of entering in' he and his fellow servants had, and so to the coming of the Lord 'to wait for His Son from heaven', as though he anticipated in the opening chapter the line of argument he was to develop in the remainder of the epistle.

Once again, as in Galatians, we cannot attempt an exposition of these passages, for to do so without the context of the epistle as a whole is not and never will be our method.

We must be satisfied for the present with some fairly obvious items of fact and interest, which however are by no means unimportant because found lying near the surface. For example, we find that the word 'gospel' euaggelion, comes six times in the epistle, and the word 'euaggelizo' "to preach the gospel", comes but once, making seven occurrences in all. The gospel if it is to be made known, must be made known through the instrumentality of 'words'. Without 'words' neither the apostles, nor we their more humble followers, could either 'preach' or 'teach', and so, while realizing, alas, the mockery and hollowness of 'mere words', we must also appreciate more than ever the importance of this channel of communication. We discover that logos occurs nine times in Thessalonians, and observing that in I Thess. ii. 13 the three occurrences are to be considered as practically one, 'the Word of God, not as the word of man, but as it is in truth the Word of God', we find another sevenfold distribution of terms.

Logos* "Word" in I Thessalonians.

A | i. 5. Our gospel came not in word only.
B | a | i. 6. The word with affliction.
b | i. 8. The WORD OF THE LORD "from you".
C | ii. 5. Not flattering words.
A | ii. 13. Not as the word of man.
B | b | iv. 15. The WORD OF THE LORD "unto you".
a | iv. 18. The word and comfort.

This presentation speaks for itself. The reader will notice particularly the two references to "The Word of the Lord" and should he meet the unwarranted assertion that the fact that the passage dealing with the Coming of the Lord in chapter iv. is introduced by the formula "The Word of the Lord" and so 'proves' that I Thess. iv. presents a secret and hitherto unrevealed aspect of the Second Coming, he will know just how much truth such a statement contains. That which 'proves' too much 'proves' nothing.

The contrast in I Thess. i. 5 is between "Word only" on the one hand, and "power, Holy Ghost and much assurance" on the other. The contrast in I Thess. ii. 13 is between 'the word of men' and 'the Word of God' which effectually worketh in them that believe. "Power, Holy Ghost, and much assurance" and 'effectual working' are but two ways of referring to the same thing. The word translated 'effectual working' is energeo, 'to work in', and from which comes our English word energy. The A.V. translators on eight occasions, felt impelled to use the word 'effectual' in addition to 'working', indeed in one reference, namely II Cor. i. 6, the word 'work' is omitted and we read 'which is effectual' pure and simple.

There is some justification for the addition, for power can conceivably 'work' without that work being 'effectual'. The word of men 'works', but whether it always works 'effectually' is another matter. Paul gives us a threefold evidence of the effectual character of the Word of God:

(1) Power. This is 'the work of faith with power' that is found in II Thess. i. 11. When the church of the Thessalonians was founded, the word preached was 'with the demonstration of the Spirit and of power' which the Apostle contrasts as here with "enticing words of man's wisdom" (I Cor. ii. 4). This association of 'power' with 'the Spirit' is twofold. It refers to that which was demonstrated or displayed' and so referred to accompanying miraculous gifts. It also referred to the fact that the 'Word of God' was "In the words . . . . . which the Holy Ghost teacheth" (I Cor. ii. 13). Even so, when writing the second epistle to the Thessalonians, and speaking of the travesty of truth that will usher in the man of sin, this travesty is said to be 'after the working (energy) of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders' (II Thess. ii. 9).

(2) In pneuma hagion (holy spirit). An examination of the usage of these two words would take more space than we can afford. The matter however resolves itself into the following features. When the article is used with both pneuma and hagion it is generally safe to conclude that the Holy Spirit, the Giver is intended. Where pneuma hagion stands alone without the article, it indicates the gift, never the Giver. These 'gifts' may be miraculous gifts, as detailed in I Cor. xii., or the new nature as opposed to the flesh (Rom. viii. 4, 9). In the Acts period when the epistles to the Thessalonians were written, the gift of the new nature 'spirit' was accompanied by supernatural gifts, miracles, tongues, etc., and they would receive this added confirmation. This gift of 'holy spirit' is mentioned again in verse 6:

> "And ye became followers of us, and of the Lord, having received the word in much affliction, with joy of holy spirit" (I Thess. i. 6).

This distinguishing mark of the believer is mentioned once more in this epistle, this time with reference to the Giver:

> "He therefore that despiseth not man, but God, Who hath also given unto us His Holy Spirit" (I Thess. iv. 8).

The third item in this threefold evidence of the reality of the Thessalonian conversion is given as 'much assurance'.

(3) Much assurance. Plerophoria.

This word is made up of pleres 'full', and phero 'to carry'. Here are the various ways in which plerophoria, and plerophoreo are used.

Plerophoria.

"The full assurance of understanding" (Col. ii. 2).
"In much assurance" (I Thess. i. 5).
"The full assurance of hope" (Heb. vi. 11).
"In full assurance of faith" (Heb. x. 22).

Plerophoreo.

"Those things which are most surely believed among us" (Luke i. 1).
"Being fully persuaded" (Rom. iv. 21).
"Let every man be fully persuaded" (Rom. xiv. 5).
"Make full proof of thy ministry" (II Tim. iv. 5).
"The preaching might be fully known" (II Tim. iv. 17).

"To be carried along", in the Greek sense of the word is very different from the English expression 'to be carried away'. Here faith, hope and understanding play their part, and in these the Thessalonians found their assurance. Here then in I Thess. i. 5 and ii. 13, we have the antonyms of the Word, not word 'only' and not just as the 'word of men'.

The next set of contrasts deals with the characters of Paul and his helpers, 'what manner of men' they were (I Thess. i. 5). These we must consider together in our next article.

No.8. A Study in I Thessalonians. A Fivefold Picture of "What manner of persons" the Apostles and his helpers were.

pp. 36 - 40

The antonyms of I Thessalonians fall into three groups: (1) The Gospel. (2) The Apostle. (3) The Coming of the Lord.

We have considered the contrasts that are given in I Thess. i. 5 and ii. 13 regarding the gospel, and we now turn our attention to the messengers, the Apostle Paul and his helpers. This sequence is in line with I Thess. i. 5, which starting with the gospel, ends with 'what manner of men' the preachers of that gospel were. There are five contrasted terms used by the Apostle to enforce what 'manner of men' they were, and we will endeavour to understand them as a whole in this article.

(1) Not pleasing men but God (I Thess. ii. 4).

The gospel is still in view:

> "But as we were allowed of God to be put in trust with the gospel, even so we speak; not as pleasing men, but God, which trieth our hearts" (I Thess. ii. 4).

The next occurrence of aresko 'to please' is enlightening and somewhat humbling:

> "They have persecuted us; and they please not God, and are contrary to all men" (ii. 15).

Here, instead of the first statement 'please God' being contrasted with 'pleasing men' it is echoed by the parallel term 'contrary to all men'.

It is easy to work by a rule of thumb, and by an uncompromising rigidity to produce the effect of consistency and loyalty. It requires abundant grace to sacrifice apparent consistency to the higher claims of principle. Had the Apostle been of a lower order, he would have feared to circumcise Timothy (Acts xvi.) after his uncompromising stand (Acts xv.; Gal. ii.) and he was, most likely, the subject of a good deal of criticism as a consequence. It is easy for the religious flesh to apparently 'do all to the glory of God'. It is certainly easy for the weakling in faith to 'give none offence' or to be 'all things to all men', but to so act that the glory of God is not compromised while we give none offence, or that we do not offend either Jew or Greek while we yield not for an hour for the glory of God, demands something more than the most religious of flesh can ever attain. We shall profit much if we can appreciate and exemplify the underlying principle of both I Thess. ii. 4 and I Thess. ii. 15. The theme 'pleasing God' is one that could well occupy our fullest attention for many a page, but we have four more contrasted themes to consider, and so we pass on to:

(2) Not burdensome but gentle (ii. 5-7).

The full passage reads as follows:

> "For neither at any time used we flattering words, as ye know, nor a cloke of covetousness; God is witness: nor of men sought we glory, neither of you, nor yet of others, when we might have been burdensome, as the apostles of Christ. But we were gentle among you, even as a nurse cherisheth her children" (ii. 5-7).

When the Apostle claimed that he pleased God and not man, he added that this God he pleased 'trieth our hearts'. Now when he repudiates 'flattery' he adds 'as ye know'; and 'covetousness', 'God is witness'. It is important that we observe the correct dividing line in this passage, otherwise, if we read straight on without pause, we can make it appear that 'flattery' and 'covetousness' were a legitimate part of an apostle's rights, which would be both unscriptural and immoral. The passage is divided as follows:

(a) Not flattery. You know. \
Not covetousness. God is witness } What they were not.
Not glory of you or others. /

(b) When we might have burdensome \ What they might have been.
as apostles of Christ. /

(c) But were gentle among you \ What they were.
as a nurse. /

Writing to the Corinthians, Paul had said:

> "I robbed other churches, taking wages of them, to do you service. And when I was present with you, and wanted, I was chargeable to no man: for that which was lacking to me the brethren which came from Macedonia supplied: and in all things I have kept myself from being burdensome unto you, and so will I keep myself" (II Cor. xi. 8, 9).
>
> "Behold, the third time I am ready to come to you; and I will not be burdensome to you; . . . . . for the children ought not to lay up for the parents, but the parents for the children. And I will gladly spend and be spent for you; though the more abundantly I love you, the less I be loved. But be it so, I did not burden you: nevertheless, (to quote the opinion of some evil minded and little-souled person) being crafty, I caught you with guile" (II Cor. xii. 14-16).

This however was more than the Apostle could tolerate, so immediately after he had apparently resigned himself to misunderstanding and false implication, he burst forth:

> "Did I make a gain of you by any of them whom I sent unto you? I desired Titus, and with him I sent a brother. Did Titus make a gain of you?" (II Cor. xii. 17-18).

Paul had made it clear elsewhere, that as an apostle he had rights, but these he had waived for Christ's sake. In contrast with this legitimate burdensomeness he had taken their burden upon himself. He had been like a nursing mother, cherishing her own children. Instead of being burdensome, he reminded the Thessalonians saying:

> "For ye remember, brethren, our labour and travail: for labouring night and day, because we would not be chargeable unto any of you, we preached unto you the gospel of God" (I Thess. ii. 9).

Again we must resist the temptation to explore more fully this question of the Apostle's legitimate burden, and of the contrasted gentleness that he manifested, and pass on to:

(3) In presence not in heart (ii. 17).

> "But we, brethren, being taken from you for a short time in presence, not in heart, endeavoured the more abundantly to see your face with great desire" (ii. 17).

It could never be said of the Apostle Paul, that with him to be 'out of sight' was to be 'out of mind'. His epistles abound with an intense personal remembrance and desire concerning all those whose salvation and growth, ministry and endurance, were in any measure a part of his care, extending even to agonizing over those who had not seen his face in the flesh (Col. ii. 1).

To appreciate the intensity of the Apostle's antonym 'in presence, not in heart' we should acquaint ourselves with the many passages found in the epistles of affectionate prayerful remembrance, keen interest and deep longing over all with whom his ministry had brought him in contact. This however is quite outside the scope of the present series.

(4) Paul and Satan (ii. 18).

This antonym may appear at first sight somewhat far-fetched, but in one way and another, Satan is mentioned in Paul's fourteen epistles no less than nine times. He protested that his absence from the Thessalonians was not because of any desire of his own.

> "Wherefore we would have come unto you, even I Paul, once and again; but Satan hindered us" (ii. 18).

While the Apostle makes no reference to Satan in the epistle to the Romans, the 'hindrance' he speaks of probably came from the same source.

> "Now I would not have you ignorant, brethren, that oftentimes I purposed to come unto you, but was let hitherto" (Rom. i. 13).
> "For which cause also I have been much hindered from coming to you" (Rom. xv. 22).

If Paul, with all the resources of grace at his disposal could be 'much' hindered, and prevented 'once and again' from fulfilling his heart's desires in these matters, we should take heart when we too, in our smaller degree, are at times similarly baffled.

(5) Comfort in Affliction (iii. 7).

> "Therefore, brethren, we were comforted over you in all your affliction and distress by your faith: for now we live, if ye stand fast in the Lord" (iii. 7, 8).

It would be no great or strange matter if any one should be comforted in their affliction by the kindness, the sympathy, the succour of others, but the Apostle's comfort was quite disinterested. It was because of their faith, and he reveals the motive behind his intense desire to see the faces of these Thessalonian saints (I Thess. ii. 17) and why Satan so purposely hindered (I Thess. ii. 18, see also Rom. i. 12 'mutual faith').

Here then is a fivefold picture, intensified by contrasts, setting before us in the intense language of heart and feeling what manner of persons the Apostle and his fellow labourers were, to whose fruitful and unstinted service the early church together with ourselves are so overwhelmingly in debt.

No.9. A Study in I Thessalonians. Contrasts that minister Comfort.

pp. 54 - 58

The three groups of antonyms that are before us in I Thessalonians deal with three related themes:

(1) The character of the Word spoken.
(2) The character of the speakers.
(3) The Message itself.

We remember that the epistle is written to believers, and therefore, we do not expect to read of the way of salvation so much as to learn something of things which accompany salvation. Consequently the Apostle stresses not so much 'faith' but 'the work of faith', not so much 'hope' but the 'patience of hope', and it is hope and its patience, together with other essential characteristics that meet us in the third and last series of contrasts.

(1) The dead and the living (iv. 16, 17).

The return of the Lord, during the early ministry of the Acts of the Apostles was not conceived as a far off event that would take place at long last, but a fulfillment of the pledge:

> "A little while, and ye shall see Me, because I go to the Father" (John xvi. 16).

The scoffers found in Peter's testimony concerning the imminence of the Lord's return, a butt for their scorn, saying:

> "Where is the promise of His coming?" (II Pet. iii. 4).

The Thessalonian Church had been commended by the Apostle for their 'patience of hope'. Their conversion, service and hope had been summed up in the first chapter as:

> "Ye turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God; and to wait for His Son from heaven" (I Thess. i. 9, 10).

The problem that confronted these believers, and concerning which the Apostle wrote in the fourth chapter was not so much the fact of the Lord's return, but what would be the fate of those who fell asleep in death before that hope was realized.

The section does not open with the words:

> "I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning the nature of the Second Coming, whether it will be before or after the tribulation, or whether it will be secret or open."

The concern of the Thessalonians is indicated by what Paul actually said:

> "I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep" (I Thess. iv. 13).

And even so, if we stop here, we shall still be 'ignorant' of the one thing Paul sought to make known. The Thessalonians were evidently NOT in need of teaching concerning the state of the dead. In this chapter Paul refers to such, as those that are 'asleep', as those that 'sleep in Jesus' and 'the dead in Christ' (I Thess. iv. 13, 14, 15, 16). These erstwhile idolators were apparently better instructed than many a child of God today. No, it was neither the character of the Lord's return nor the Scriptural doctrine of death that was uppermost in the mind of the Church and the Apostle, it was something more specific and personal:

> "I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope" (I Thess. iv. 13).

"That ye sorrow not", opens the section. "Comfort one another with these words" closes it. Yet I Thess. iv. is usually taken as the key passage which teaches a secret rapture and a new phase of the Second Coming; an idea quite foreign to the Apostle's mind or the Thessalonian necessity.

So the teaching proceed:

> "For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain . . . . . shall not prevent them which are asleep . . . . . the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words" (I Thess. iv. 15-18).

It will be helpful if we pass over the intervening contrasts, (2), (3), and (4) and deal with the fifth, for by so doing we shall follow the line of argument used by the Apostle and demonstrate the essential difference that is made between those that 'sleep in Jesus' (I Thess. iv. 14), and 'those that sleep in the night' (I Thess. v. 7).

(5) Watchful or Drowsy (v. 10).

The reader will perceive that we have altered the wording from that of the A.V. We must now prove the truthfulness of this correction. There are two distinct words used in I Thessalonians for 'sleep'. In I Thess. iv. 13, 14 and 15 the word 'sleep' is koimaomai. This word means 'to fall asleep' particularly in death. Our English word cemetery is from the Greek koimeterion 'a dormitory'. The heathen poets used 'sleep' as a symbol of death, but they generally added the words 'perpetual', 'eternal' or the like, as they had 'no hope'. Thus:

> "But we, or great or wise, or brave,
> Once dead, and silent in the grave
> Senseless remain; one rest we keep
> One long, eternal, unawaken'd sleep" (Moschus Idyll).

Homer says of a slain hero:

> "He slept a brazen sleep", and Virgil speaks of 'an iron sleep' and eyes closing in 'everlasting night'. This word already fixed in its meaning, was used in the N.T., in the Gospels, Acts and Epistles, the only, but glorious, difference being that, while the idea of 'sleep' is retained unaltered, the blessed hope of resurrection introduces the new conception of an awaking from that sleep.

When we turn to I Thess. v. another word is used for 'sleep', katheudo, a word never used for those who 'sleep in Jesus'. It differs from koimaomai in that this word means 'to fall asleep', whereas katheudo means 'to compose oneself to sleep', and so means 'to drowse' or 'be drowsy'. Katheudo is used in I Thess. v. 6, 7, 10. The alternative to koimaomai, the sleep of death, is 'to awake' (John xi. 11), but the alternative to katheudo is not so much 'to awake' but 'to be wide-awake', 'to watch', or if the play on words will help, the alternative to "drowse" is to "rouse". Gregoreo, which is used in I Thess. v. 6, 10 comes in the exhortation 'Watch therefore', that follows the parable of the Wise and Foolish Virgins. These two sections I Thess. iv. 13-18 & I Thess. v. 1-11, are thrown into a correspondence thus:

A | iv. 13. Concerning those that have fallen asleep.
B | iv. 14-16. The sleeping saint.
The living saint.
C | iv. 17. "Together with" hama sun.
D | iv. 18. Comfort one another.
A | v. 1-4. Concerning the times and seasons.
B | v. 5-10. The sleeping saint.
The watchful saint.
C | v. 10. "Together with" hama sun.
D | v. 11. Comfort one another.

The Apostle makes it clear that the child of God differs from the children of night, and that 'sleepiness' belongs to the unsaved and 'watchfulness' pertains to the redeemed and, in other places and in other contexts, he has spoken of 'the terror' of the Lord, the possibility of losing all and of being saved ‘so as by fire’. While this remains true, it was not the intention of the Apostle to introduce the difference between ‘hope’ and ‘prize’ here. He wanted to administer ‘comfort’ and so, while realizing that to be ‘sleepy’ is a grievous fault for a believer, he passes on to the conclusion, that even so:

> “God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ, Who died for us, that, whether we are watchful or drowsy, we should live together with Him (although drowsy ones were not likely to ‘reign’ together with Him, which however is another matter altogether). Wherefore comfort yourselves together and edify one another (here the addition of the word ‘edify’ suggests that the supplementary ‘warning and teaching’ that drowsiness and watchfulness demand, is not quite lost sight of) even as also ye do” (I Thess. v. 9-11).

The intervening contrasts that have been passed over in this article must be considered together in our next one. Meanwhile let us be grateful for the glorious care of our God, in thus ministering to the comfort of His children, and of using the opportunity for giving certain great principles which apply to the dispensation of the Mystery as well as that which obtained during the period of the Acts.

No.10. A Study in I Thessalonians. Aspects of the Day of the Lord.

pp. 73 - 79

In our last paper we dealt with the first and last of the five contrasts that relate to the Second Coming, these two sets having specific bearing upon ‘comfort’, enabling us to see the difference between that involuntary fall on sleep, which is death, and drowsiness, for which a believer will be held responsible. The three remaining antonyms deal with:

(2) The false peace brought in under the reign of the Beast.
(3) The essential difference between Darkness and Light.
(4) The blessed fact that the redeemed have not been chosen to Wrath, but unto Salvation.

Peace and Safety v. sudden destruction (v. 3).
Darkness v. Light (v. 4, 5).
Wrath v. Salvation (v. 9).

The first pair indicates the condition that obtains at the time of the end. War and rumours of war will at length give place to “Peace and Safety”. In themselves ‘peace and safety’ are commendable; it is the motive that matters however. “Peace” that ignores the claim of God or the Person and work of Christ, and ‘safety’ that is the product of anything other than the redemptive work of the Son of God, is the masterstroke of Satan, and by these watchwords a sin-stained war-weary world will be induced to put their trust in the shadow of a bramble (Judges ix. 15).

"When they shall say, peace and safety; then sudden destruction cometh upon them" (I Thess. v. 3).

The word translated 'safety' here, is asphaleia, which is derived from sphallo, to trip up, make to fall, and is used in classical Greek of the reeling and staggering of a drunken man. This 'safety' then is an illusion, for those who raise this cry are actually children of the night, and are drunken in the night. They only can really use the rallying call 'peace and safety' who wear the helmet, the hope of salvation. The times in which we live are compelling those in authority to seek some solution to save the world from chaos and ruin, and the Man of Sin will be the solution offered by the Devil and accepted by his dupes. "When", "then". How shortlived the peace! How transient the 'safety', for when they thus speak, 'sudden destruction' 'stands over' them. Ephistemi is translated 'come upon' (Luke xxi. 34), 'be instant' (II Tim. iv. 2), 'at hand' (II Tim. iv. 6), 'it impends'. The word translated 'sudden' is aiphnidios, and is derived from aiphnes 'unexpected'. This in its turn is derived from a negative and phaino to appear, and so unawares, unforeseen, quicker than sight. Aphno the adverb is found in Acts ii. 2; xvi. 26 and xviii. 6. The Apostle had said to the Thessalonians:

"Ye have no need that I write unto you. For yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night" (I Thess. v. 1, 2).

This knowledge may have been the result of Paul's own personal instruction, just as their knowledge of other aspects of the Day of the Lord (II Thess. ii. 5). On the other hand, it is possible, that Luke had written and circulated his gospel by this time, and it may be to that gospel that Paul here makes reference. They knew, said Paul 'perfectly', a word used by Luke in chapter i. 3. From Luke xii. 35-39 they would have gathered that the Coming of the Lord would be like a thief, and that 'loins girded', a 'light burning', were but a figurative way of expressing the attitude of watchfulness enjoined in I Thess. v. Again if they had read Luke's gospel they would have already come across the word translated 'sudden' in I Thess. v. 3, for the only other occurrence of aiphnidios in the N.T. is in Luke xxi. 34, where we read:

"Take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting, and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares."

Here we have 'drunkenness' and the verb 'to come upon' as in I Thess. v. 1-3, and in the word 'unawares' the only other occurrence of aiphnidios. The evil character of the cry 'peace and safety' which ends in 'sudden destruction' of I Thess. v. 3 is revealed in Luke xxi. 35:

"For as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth."
"They shall not escape", said the Apostle (I Thess. v. 3).
"Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man" (Luke xxi. 36).

The exhortation to 'watch' in Luke xxi. is synonymous with the words 'watch—be sober' and 'wake' of I Thess. v. 6 and 10, while the exhortation "pray always" (Luke xxi. 36), finds its complete echo in 'Pray without ceasing' (I Thess. v. 17). Moreover, if the Thessalonians were acquainted with Luke's gospel they would not fail to apprehend the alternative ‘worthy to escape’ and ‘they shall not escape’ of the two passages, and later when they received the second epistle, the context of II Thess. i. 5, 11 with all its prayer that ‘God would count you worthy’, and the exhortation ‘to watch’ so that they may ‘be counted worthy’ (Luke xxi. 36) would not escape them. The word translated ‘to count worthy’ in II Thess. i. 5 and Luke xxi. 36 is kataxioomai, and this word does not occur elsewhere except in Luke’s writings (Luke xx. 35 and Acts v. 41). While it makes no difference to us today, whether the Thessalonians were in possession of Luke’s gospel, or whether at this time they depended only upon what Paul had told them, it is evident that Paul’s influence on both of Luke’s book is unmistakable.

There is no ground for fear or terror in the mere ‘suddenness’ of an event, the suddenness is only inimical if we are unready. Nothing can be more ‘sudden’ than the ‘twinkling of an eye’, yet the Apostle declares that the change which must take place in every believer before he enters glory will be as sudden as that, but there is no element of fear in such a movement.

The Day of the Lord will come suddenly upon a world that is unready, and to such this suddenness will be as a thief in the night, but for those who know the times and the seasons, and who are ordering their conduct accordingly, this suddenness will be but the exchange of ‘trouble’ for glorious ‘rest’ (II Thess. i. 6, 7). Consequently we find in IThess.v. that the Apostle relates the thief-like aspect of the coming of the Day of the Lord with the drunken unreadiness of those who are of the ‘darkness’. It will come as a thief in the night only to those who are of the night, but it will be the dawn of hope and joy to those who wait for their Lord as children of the day.

Darkness and Light.

> “But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief. Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day: we are not of the night, nor of darkness” (I Thess. v. 4, 5).

Whether the Day of the Lord shall come upon men as a thief in the night, or whether its coming shall be like the rising of the morning sun, depends, not so much upon the Day of the Lord itself, but upon the character of those upon whom it dawns.

> “Ye brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief.”

In Matt. xxiv. 43, 44 the question as to whether that day shall ‘overtake as a thief’, is decided by ‘readiness’.

> “But know this, that if the good man of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up. Therefore be ye also ready: for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh.”

The Apostle associated darkness and being overtaken as a thief with drunkenness, so Matt. xxiv.

> "But and if that evil servant shall say in his heart, my lord delayeth his coming; and shall begin to smite his fellowservants, and to eat and drink with the drunken; the lord of that servant shall come in a day when he looketh not for him, and in an hour that he is not aware of" (Matt. xxiv. 48-50).

When Peter referred to the coming of the Day of the Lord as a thief (II Pet. iii. 10) he had the 'scoffers' in view (3, 4), and in contrast with such he says:

> "What manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness?" (II Pet. iii. 11).

As Peter refers to the epistles of Paul (II Pet. iii. 15, 16), it is possible that he makes a direct allusion to I Thess. v. 2 when he speaks of the Day of the Lord coming as a thief, and the 'swift destruction' of II Pet. ii. 1 is parallel with the 'sudden destruction' of I Thess. v. 3. The Day of the Lord is characterized by "destruction" and "wrath" (Isa. xiii. 6, 9), yet the believer need not fear, even though, like the Thessalonian saints, his calling may not exempt him from the tribulation of the last days:

> "For God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Thess. v. 9).

Salvation is a covering term, and includes many aspects of the Redeemer's work. There is the glorious exemption from condemnation which Rom. viii. 1 brings before us, this aspect of truth, however, is not before us in I Thess. v.

"Wrath and Salvation" (I Thess. v. 9).

"Wrath" is a characteristic of the Day of the Lord (Rev. vi. 16, 17; xi. 18; xiv. 10 [indignation]; xvi. 19 and xix. 15). When the Thessalonian church came into being 'that day' was imminent, and the Apostle in his summary of their salvation links together their conversion with the Second Coming of Christ, saying:

> "And to wait for His Son from heaven, the One delivering us from the wrath which is about to be" (I Thess. i. 10).

The wrath is not the 'condemnation' with which Rom. viii. 1 deals, but a 'wrath' from which the Thessalonians confidently expected to be delivered at the Lord's return to the earth. Wrath is used in I Thess. ii. 16 of the judgment that fell upon the Jew and his stubborn resistance of the gospel. In like manner 'salvation' is used in both epistles to the Thessalonians with reference to the future; their salvation from sin is not in view, they being already 'saved' in that blessed sense. Consequently in I Thess. v. 8 Paul speaks of 'the hope of salvation' associating it with the Coming of the Lord and deliverance when the Day of the Lord comes as a day of wrath upon the world. In II Thessalonians salvation occurs but once and in a similar context. Chapter ii. commences with a reference to the Day of the Lord, and speaks of the dreadful days of the Man of Sin, and the fearful judgment that is to fall upon those 'who believe not the truth'. This however leads to the great contrastive 'salvation' of the believer:

"But we are bound to give thanks always to God for you, brethren beloved of the Lord, because God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth" (II Thess. ii. 13).

Thus the three contrasts we have considered, together with the pair that occupied us in our last article, deal with the Second Coming of the Lord and the characteristics of that advent. They may impress their message the more if in conclusion we show their relationship as follows:

A | I Thess. iv. 14-17. The dead (asleep) and the living. "Comfort."
B | I Thess. v. 3. Peace and Safety in contrast with Destruction.
C | I Thess. v. 4, 5. Darkness and Light.
B | I Thess. v. 9. Wrath ("destruction" above) in contrast with Salvation ("Peace and Safety" above).
A | I Thess. v. 10. Sleepy or Watchful. "Comfort."

No.11. Examples in I Corinthians. Foolishness v. Wisdom. Weakness v. Strength.

pp. 92 - 95

There are sixteen chapters in this epistle, and there are also sixteen easily discerned antonyms, not necessarily one in each chapter, but nevertheless fairly evenly distributed throughout the teaching and discussion of the varied subjects. The introduction occupies chapter i. 1-9 which does not make any demands upon us here. The first great section, I Cor. i. 10 - iv. 16 contains seven clear antonyms, which we must now examine:

(1) Foolishness v. Wisdom (i. 25).
(2) Weakness v. Strength (i. 25).
(3) Man's words v. Words of the Holy Ghost (ii. 13).
(4) Natural v. Spiritual (ii. 14, 15).
(5) Milk v. Meat (iii. 2).
(6) Foundation v. Superstructure (iii. 10).
(7) Man's judgment v. the Lord's judgment (iv. 3-5).

Upon examination, it will be found that these seven antonyms arise out of a common theme, the divisions that had occurred at Corinth in which the names of Paul, Apollos and Cephas had been misused and turned into unwilling leaders of party strife.

With this, the section opens:

"Now I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ . . . . . no divisions . . . . . there are contentions . . . . . I am of Paul; and I of Apollos; and I of Cephas; and I of Christ" (I Cor. i. 10-12).

With this, the section closes:

> "And these things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myself and to Apollos for your sakes; that ye might learn in us not to think of men above that which is written, that no one of you be puffed up for one against another" (I Cor. iv. 6).

While the actual names of the apostles do not occur in chapter ii., the purpose before the apostles expressed in verse 5: "that your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God" is very evident. Paul is still turning their minds away from Paul, Apollos and Cephas as such. The subject is resumed in chapter iii., for after charging them with being babes and unspiritual and with being carnal, he advances as proof of their party spirit:

> "For while one saith, I am of Paul; and another, I am of Apollos; are ye not carnal?" (iii. 4).

Out of this arises the theme of the foundation and the superstructure as a consideration of I Cor. iii. 5-9 will show. This party spirit is again in mind when the Apostle contrasts man's judgment with the judgment of the Lord (I Cor. iv. 1-6).

In order to show the evil of their attitude, the Apostle startles the Corinthians by daring to speak of God's "foolishness", and by decrying human wisdom. The Corinthians, being Greeks, sought after 'wisdom' (I Cor. i. 22), and to the Greek the preaching of the cross was 'foolishness' (I Cor. i. 23). Nevertheless, "unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God" (ICor.i.24), even as the preaching of the cross is to them that perish 'foolishness', but unto us which are 'saved' it is the power of God (I Cor. i. 18). No other epistle or set of epistles can compare with those to the Corinthians in the use of the words 'wisdom' and 'wise'. Sophia 'wisdom' is used in I and II Corinthians eighteen times, and in all the remaining epistle of Paul but ten times. Sophos is found in I Corinthians eleven times, and in the rest of Paul's epistles but twice! Paul, writing to the Corinthians, was touching upon a subject as dear to their national pride as was the Law and its observance to the Jew. It is unfortunate that the two expressions "Jew and Greek" and "Jew and Gentile" should be confused or treated as being synonymous. Every Greek was certainly a Gentile, but every Gentile was not a Greek, and the Greek drew a most decided line between himself and the 'barbarian'. We must therefore remember that just as the Jew stood for signs, for law, for ceremonial, so the Greek stood for wisdom and for physical beauty and fitness. In both cases the end was an occasion for 'boasting' (kauchomai, kauchema, kauchesis). "Where is boasting?" asked Paul at the close of Rom. iii. "That no flesh should glory in His presence" is the conclusion of I Cor. i. 29. Circumcision had degenerated into an occasion to boast in the flesh (Gal. vi. 13) whereas the true circumcision were those who 'boasted' in Christ Jesus and had no confidence in the flesh (Phil. iii. 3). And so, by a bold figure, the Apostle attacked the centre of the Corinthians' pride, namely "Wisdom":

> "Not with wisdom of words, lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect" (I Cor. i. 17).
> "Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world?" (I Cor. i. 20).
> "In the wisdom of God the world by wisdom knew not God" (I Cor. i. 21).

If the 'wisdom of this world' is of no avail in the things of God, if the very wisdom of this world has become foolish and, conversely, if the preaching of the cross is to them that perish 'foolishness' (I Cor. i. 18, 21), then God will accept the estimate of the world and, by the very 'foolishness' of preaching, He will save them that believe. It is here that Paul introduced his double antonym, saying:

> "Because the foolishness of God is wiser than men; and the weakness of God is stronger than men" (I Cor. i. 25).

The Corinthians had to learn, as we must learn too:

> "But of Him are ye in Christ Jesus, Who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption: that, according as it is written, he that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord" (I Cor. i. 30, 31).

The same interplay of figure brings chapter iii. to the same conclusion:

> "If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wise. For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God . . . . . Therefore let no man glory in men. For all things are yours; whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours; and ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's" (I Cor. iii. 18-23).

The word 'foolish' or 'foolishness', moros, moria, moraino, means something 'insipid' and is translated of salt that 'lost its savour' (Matt. v. 13). The word 'weakness' is asthenes, which like 'foolishness' was a reproach in the eyes of the Greek. I was with you in 'weakness' said the Apostle (I Cor. ii. 3); 'his bodily presence is weak' commented the Corinthians, 'and his speech contemptible' (II Cor. x. 10). Yet said the Apostle, I learned that His strength is 'made perfect in weakness' (II Cor. xii. 9), and of the Saviour Himself he wrote:

> "He was crucified through weakness" (II Cor. xiii. 4).

All this was but to bring pride in human attainment down to the ground that all boasting should be in the Lord. If the very 'weakness' of God is 'stronger' (ischuros) than man, what shall we say of the 'mighty' (ischus) power that triumphs in resurrection? The gospel is not foolishness, the cross is not folly, God is not weak. The intensity of the Apostle's language but emphasizes the utter folly of human wisdom, and the innate weakness of all human strength, to the end that we should not trust in ourselves but in God that quickeneth the dead. We shall catch the strains of this interplay of foolishness and weakness in the remaining portion of I Corinthians and in II Corinthians as well. Whether we be Jews, Greeks or Barbarians, whatever trust we may have put in the flesh, must all be relinquished in the presence of the cross of Christ.

> "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Gal. vi 14), is the conclusion of the Apostle, not only when writing to the Galatians but when summing up the attitude of himself and all of like precious faith.

No.12. Examples in I Corinthians.
Man's words v. the words of the Holy Ghost (ii. 13).
pp. 116 - 120

We have looked at the first pair of antonyms used in I Cor. i., the 'foolishness' and the 'weakness' of God, as compared and contrasted with the 'wisdom' and 'strength' of man. We now consider a group that arises naturally out of the first pair and which caries the teaching a stage further along the path which the Apostle pursues in this opening section of I Corinthians, a path that leads ultimately to the judgment seat of Christ, and the trial of every man's work (I Cor. iii. 14).

The group of antonyms now before us consists of three contrasted subjects:

(3) Man's words v. Words of the Holy Ghost (ii. 13).
(4) Natural v. Spiritual (ii. 14, 15).
(5) Milk v. Meat (iii. 2).

These three antonyms are used to illustrate and enforce the lesson of the opening chapter, with particular reference to 'the Word'. This subject is by no means in the background of chapter i., but in our comment we did not refer to it, as the subject is developed in the chapter before us. Turning back therefore to I Cor. i., we observe that the Apostle says:

> "For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel: not with wisdom of words (logos) . . . . . For the preaching (logos) of the cross is to them that perish foolishness" (I Cor. i. 17-18).
>
> "It pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe . . . . . We preach Christ crucified . . . . . unto the Greeks foolishness" (I Cor. i. 21, 23).

It is very evident from these references that the contrast between "man's words" and the "word of the Holy Ghost" is but an expansion of this 'word' and 'preaching' which those that perish counted 'foolishness'. It becomes more evident that those who perish will be the 'natural' men, and those who are saved the 'spiritual' of I Cor. ii. 14, 15. The third of these antonyms, namely "milk v. meat", reveals that not only must we divide the 'saved' and the 'lost' into two groups, 'spiritual' and 'natural', but that something parallel is discoverable between two groups of the saved themselves, for the 'babes' who can only take 'milk' are considered as 'carnal' not 'spiritual' (I Cor. iii. 1) and they 'walk as men' (I Cor. iii. 3). In one sense the whole controversy of I Cor. i.-iv. turns on the fatal attraction that the things of 'man' had over the Corinthians.

> "The foolishness of God is wiser than men; and the weakness of God is stronger than men" (I Cor. i. 25).
>
> "Not with enticing words of man's wisdom" (ii. 4).
>
> "That your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God" (ii. 5).

"Eye hath not seen, nor ear hear, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him. But God hath revealed them unto us by His Spirit" (ii. 9-10).

"Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth; comparing spiritual things with spiritual" (ii. 13).

"The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned" (ii. 14).

"Are ye not carnal, and walk as men?" (iii. 3).

"Therefore let no man glory in men" (iii. 21).

"But with me it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you, or of man's judgment" (iv. 3).

Here we have man, his wisdom, his words, his walk and his judgment in direct contrast with God, and it is this antipathy which forms the core of I Cor. i.-iv., and around which the whole doctrine and exhortation revolve. The first of these antonyms which we are to consider is that of I Cor. ii. 13, "Man's words v. The words of the Holy Ghost". The detailed structure of I Cor. ii. must await exposition of the passage when the whole epistle comes before us in due course. Its main subdivisions however and the place in the structure of verse 13 can be seen by the following skeleton structure:

I Corinthians ii.

A1 | 1-5. Speech and Wisdom.
Not with enticing words of man's wisdom.

A2 | 6-12. Speech and Wisdom.
Not the wisdom of this world nor of the princes of this world that come to naught.

A3 | 7-16. Speech and Wisdom.
Not in the words that man's wisdom teacheth.

Man's words are evidently taught by man's wisdom (I Cor. ii. 13) and if human wisdom is utterly unable to comprehend the Mystery and the testimony of God, then of necessity to adopt human argument and to use human phraseology will but increase the darkness. Here then comes the necessity for inspired Scripture and for words 'which the Holy Ghost teacheth', words that are definitely selected by heavenly wisdom as the fit vehicle for divine truth.

In the course of conversation, of preaching, or of exposition we are obliged at times to expand as we expound, to use phraseology that is our poor attempt to illuminate the sacred text. We have warrant for this in the example of the Apostle, who we find 'reasoning', 'opening' and 'alleging' as he dealt with the testimony of Scripture. In the course of our witness, we have been compelled to adopt or invent certain phrases, such as 'Dispensational Truth' which we use to indicate that peculiar manner of dealing with men at any particular period as distinct from 'Doctrinal Truth' such as 'sin', 'death', or 'redemption' which underlies the whole fabric of revelation. In the same way we have adopted the phrase 'earthly Kingdom Truth' in order to enforce the necessary distinction between the kingdom associated with Israel and the sphere and calling of the church which is the Body of Christ. Yet these phrases, convenient as they are, must not be used as a substitute for the language of inspiration, for the church itself is a part of the kingdom in its wider aspect, and all truth is necessarily dispensational truth, even to the matter of 'the simple gospel'. Consequently, we must never incorporate into our 'creed' or into the foundation of our faith, human attempts to comprehend that which is not fully explained in the Book, all such attempts will lead us into the dark and must be avoided. The reader of The Berean Expositor will be aware that certain phrases found in the creeds of the church are never used in these pages, not because such phrases are necessarily wrong, but they may be, or they may be addition, subtraction or substitution, lead away from the faith, and consequently are avoided. How are we to understand the expression:

> "Comparing spiritual things with spiritual?"

The R.V. retains the A.V. reading, but places in the margin "Or, interpreting spiritual things to spiritual men", which shows that, while there is much to be said for a revision of the A.V., much also can be said in its favour. Rotherham translates the passage:

> "By spiritual words, spiritual things explaining."

Weymouth renders the passage:

> "Adapting, as we do, spiritual words to spiritual truths", with a footnote 'truths' or 'men'. Moffatt reads:

> "We interpret what is spiritual in spiritual language."

The possibility that the word pneumatikos may mean 'spiritual persons' rather than 'spiritual things' is because the masculine and the neuter plural dative both end in ois, consequently an appeal to grammar will not lead to a decision. The context must decide. Then the meaning of sugkrino must be ascertained, and here again the context influences the shade of meaning which must be attached to any particular word, and consequently an examination of its usage is demanded before we come to a conclusion. So far as sugkrino is concerned, there are only three occurrences of the verb in the entire N.T. and these are all found in Paul's epistles to the Corinthians. It is a word with which the Greeks would be familiar, occurring as it does in several philosophical writings, and generally with the meaning of 'combine' or 'compare'. Let us therefore allow Paul to be his own interpreter.

> "For we dare not make ourselves of the number, or compare ourselves with some that commend themselves: but they measuring themselves by themselves, and comparing themselves among themselves, are not wise" (II Cor. x. 12).

No other word than 'compare' is possible here, and there is completely unanimity among the translators cited above. The usage of the word in the LXX of the O.T. is limited, either to the interpretation of a dream or the correspondence of practice with the rites and ceremonies of the law. The 'interpretation' of a dream is but the 'comparison' of the imagery of the vision with the facts which this imagery is intended to represent. We therefore accept the A.V. and the R.V. text and read 'compare', and not 'explain' as some have suggested. If we adopt the word 'compare', then we cannot readily adopt the alternative ‘spiritual men’, for there is no sense in saying: “comparing spiritual things with spiritual men”. We can only say, “explaining spiritual things to spiritual men”.

The two subjects of the sentence are (1) the things revealed and (2) the words used in speaking them, and to these the two adjectives naturally refer. Alford’s rather cumbrous rendering has the merit of adhering closely to the original, and his comment is justified:

> “ ‘Putting together spirituals with spirituals’ i.e. attaching spiritual words to spiritual things, which we should not do, if we used words of worldly wisdom to expound spiritual things” (Alford in loco).

Perhaps the translation of Bishop Shuttlew brings the Apostle’s thought nearest to us, when he translates ‘expounding spiritual things in spiritual language’.

We must leave the other two antonyms of this group for a consideration in another article, as the space available does not permit a fuller examination of these vital themes.

No.13. Examples in I Corinthians. Natural v. Spiritual (ii. 14, 15). Milk v. Meat (iii. 2).

pp. 127 - 130

The fact that ‘spiritual things’ need ‘spiritual words’ for their conveyance demands a ‘spiritual hearer’, otherwise the language and the theme must appear ‘foolishness’. Man is not ‘spiritual’ by birth, he is ‘natural’ or, as the word really is, ‘soulical’, although such a word has not been endorsed as good English:

> “But the natural men receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned” (I Cor. ii. 14).

The word “natural” is the translation of psuchikos, which is derived from psuche “the soul”, a word which is a true synonym for the Hebrew nephesh, which it translates, as for example in Acts ii. 27 with Psa. xvi. 10 and particularly I Cor. xv. 45 with Gen. ii. 7. Paul uses the word in its specific sense when writing to the Corinthians in the first epistle, possibly because of the need he felt they had of realizing the close association of the ‘soul’, the ‘natural’ man and ‘Adam’. Let us quote the only reference to psuche in Corinthians in its context. It will be found that if we quote the context of I Cor. xv. 45, we shall include all the other occurrences of psuchikos that are found in Corinthians, and indeed that are found in any of Paul’s epistles, and it will be seen that the ‘natural’ man is the man who is like Adam at his creation, and differing widely from that man who, being in Christ, is a new creation (II Cor. v. 17).

Speaking of the contrasts that are found between the present body of the believer and the resurrection body, the Apostle uses a series of opposing terms:

"So also is the resurrection of the dead.

It is sown in corruption;	It is raised in incorruption:
It is sown in dishonour;	It is raised in glory:
It is sown in weakness;	It is raised in power:
It is sown a natural body;	It is raised a spiritual body.

There is a natural body and there is a spiritual body, and so it is written:

The first man Adam	The last Adam was made a living soul;	made a quickening spirit.

Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural, and afterward that which is spiritual.

The first man is	The second Man is of the earth, earthy;	the Lord from heaven."

(I Cor. xv. 42-47).

Here we have the meaning which Paul attached to psuchikos 'natural' in I Cor. xv. It was that quality which belongs to man as a son of Adam, unregenerate, unsaved, unenlightened, of the earth, earthy, mortal, corruptible, flesh and blood, the very antithesis of 'spiritual' which is the quality belonging to man as a son of God in Christ, quickened with newness of life, saved, enlightened, destined to bear the image of the heavenly, an heir of immortality and incorruption. To the 'natural' or 'soulical' man the things of the spirit must appear 'foolishness', for the world by its very wisdom knows not God, and calls the very preaching whereby man can alone be saved 'foolishness'. In all this, we must not forget that Paul was writing to the 'church' and, though he spoke of 'natural' men, he was speaking to 'spiritual', his purpose being to convict the carnal Corinthians of their sad lapse that, though they were 'in Christ' and therefore 'spiritual', they had adopted the attitude of the natural man to such an extent that Paul wrote:

> "And I brethren, could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal, even as unto babes in Christ" (I Cor. iii. 1).

In the natural world, a babe is a lovely thing and the Apostle must not be misunderstood here. While the innocent prattling toddler with its dawning consciousness is a lovely thing, a full grown man who has never developed, who is a babe in mind and understanding and manners, is not a lovely thing. He is a being to awake our pity and it is this lack of growth that led the Apostle to liken 'babes' with 'carnal' and 'natural' men:

> "I have fed you with milk, and not with meat: for hitherto ye were not able to bear it, neither yet now are ye able" (I Cor. iii. 2).

Writing to the Hebrews the Apostle had used a similar figure and his own parallel expressions will be the surest commentary:

> ". . . . . ye are dull of hearing. For when the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles of the oracles of God; and are become such as have need of milk, and not of strong meat. For every one that useth milk is unskillful in the word of righteousness: for he is a babe. But strong meat belongeth to them that are of full age, even those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil" (Heb. v. 11-14).

The term ‘full age’ is the translation of the Greek teleios which word is found in ICor.ii.6, where the translation is ‘perfect’. This usage of the word ‘perfect’ establishes a further link between I Corinthians & Hebrews. It is a misunderstanding of ICor.ii.2 that derives from the Apostle’s determination to know nothing ‘save Jesus Christ and Him crucified’, a standard for all evangelical preaching. In the first place Paul was not preaching the gospel to the unsaved, he was addressing saints. He was not laying down a rule for the preacher nor for himself, for we have only to read on to verse 6 and we shall find that he did know much more among those that were perfect or of full age. If we quote we should quote accurately and in full, and include Paul’s reference to a visit he had paid to Corinth and that it was only because of their carnal divisions and unspirituality he said:

> “I determined not to know anything AMONG YOU, save Jesus Christ, and Him crucified.”

If we continue our reading until we come to chapter xv. we shall find that without the resurrection the death of Christ avails us nothing. Paul did, therefore, have more to preach and teach.

Paul’s attitude was regulated by the inability of the Corinthians ‘to bear’ further truth. We shall find when we come to chapter iv. that he knew that the Corinthians had been disappointed. They had expected ‘mysteries’ but as a steward his first duty was faithfulness and, as they were still ‘babes’, he had fed them with ‘milk’. Two more antonyms await us before this great section is covered, but these we leave for another article.

No.14. Examples in I Corinthians. Foundation v. Building (iii. 10 - 15). Man’s judgment v. The Lord’s judgment (iv. 1 - 6).

pp. 146 - 151

In our last study, we observed the way in which the Apostle’s thought traveled, noticing first the difference between words taught by man’s wisdom, and the words taught by the Holy Ghost; and then the difference between the natural man, to whom the words of the Holy Ghost seem foolishness, and the spiritual man who is able to discern and appreciate the words of heavenly wisdom. The Apostle proceeded to apply this lesson to the Corinthians, who, though believers and saved, were acting not as spiritual, but as carnal, and so had to be fed with milk as babes, and not with meat as perfect or adults.

Two further antonyms complete our examination of the opening section of I Corinthians:

(6) Foundation v. Superstructure (iii. 10-15).
(7) Man’s judgment v. the Lord’s judgment (iv. 1-6).

There is a single thread running through this section which unites the different phases of Paul's argument, and which saves the reader when he sees it from importing extraneous matter into the Apostle's theme; it is the reference to the divisions which had developed in Corinth around the names of Paul, Apollos and Cephas. These references are I Cor. i. 12; iii. 4, 5, 6, 22; and iv. 6. Out of the first of these references, the argument of I Cor. i. 13-31 develops, which is further expanded in chapter ii. In chapter iii. the Apostle reverts to the abuse of the names of the apostles and teachers, saying:

> "For while one saith, I am of Paul; and another, I am of Apollos; are ye not carnal? Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed, even as the Lord gave to every man?" (I Cor. iii. 4, 5).

"From this statement a chain of argument links the contrasting babes and full grown with the antonym of the foundation and the building. The argument is that Paul and Apollos are but ministers, and all such ministry is 'as the Lord gave to every man'. Consequently, to magnify the minister is to forget the Lord Whose grace alone makes all and any ministry profitable. In order to enforce this thought, the Apostle speaks of his own ministry and that of Apollos in terms of husbandry:

(2) I have planted.
(3) Apollos watered.
(4) But God gave the increase (or growth).

The Apostle said, in effect, see how foolish this party spirit really is. Transfer your argument to the field worker. Consider, of what use is the planter without his planting receiving subsequent care? Or, of what use is watering if there has been no preceding planting? Don't you see, the work of both is inter-dependent? Above and beyond this however is a more serious omission. Suppose one plants most carefully, and another waters most assiduously, of what avail will all this labour be apart from God, Who giveth the increase? Behind all the labour of man in the field, stands the miracle of life and growth:

> "So then neither is he that planteth anything, neither he that watereth; but God that giveth the increase" (I Cor. iii. 7).

On the other hand, continued the Apostle, when once you have these things in their true perspective, then you can return to the individual minister, for God is not unjust or unmindful, for:

> "He that planteth and he that watereth are one" (I Cor. iii. 8).

Even so, there is no confusion of service, recognition, or reward in the eyes of the Lord:

> ". . . . . and every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labour" (iii. 8).

It is a blessed truth that all true ministry is co-operation with God Who alone gives the growth. This is expressed in the A.V. of I Cor. iii. 9:

> "For we are labourers together with God."

The workers, and the work are all 'of God', consequently, how foolish must be that partisan spirit that boasts in man! The transition from planting and watering to building, leads on to the antonym of the foundation and the building. The foundation once laid is Christ. This the Apostle as a wise master builder had laid once and for all. There could be no thought of any other. All subsequent building was the erection of the servants of God, whose individual work might differ as much as a temple or palace built of gold, silver and costly stones differs from a hovel built of wood and stubble. Salvation is nowhere in view, it is 'work' that is to be manifested and of what 'sort' it is (verse 13); it is the 'work' that will either 'abide' or be 'burned' (verses 14,15); it is service that will either receive a 'reward' or involve the worker in 'loss'.

> "But he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire" (iii. 15).

In this connection we remind ourselves of Kipling's words:

> "If you can bear to hear the truth you've spoken > Twisted by knaves to make a trap for fools",

Although we would substitute a less opprobrious title than 'knaves' for those with whom we fundamentally differ in this connection. We speak of the essential difference between the 'hope' and the 'prize', 'living' and 'reigning', 'gift' and 'reward', 'salvation' and 'service', which is so evidently in mind in I Cor. iii. When we read an article which distorts Phil. iii., with its running for 'the prize of the high calling', into an endeavour to attain to membership of the church of the Mystery, a sphere of blessing from which every atom of effort is excluded and only grace and gift are operative, we are tempted to reply perhaps with over vigorous language, but by grace, we have found it more in line with our calling:

> "To watch the things you gave your life to broken
> And stoop and build them up again with worn out tools."

And so, we commend the teaching of the Apostle here in I Cor. iii. to all who confuse 'foundation' with 'superstructure', and fail to distinguish the fundamental grace of Ephesians with its 'boldness of access', from the exhortation of Philippians, with its 'fear and trembling'. At the close of this third chapter the Apostle reverts to the divisions at Corinth saying:

> "Therefore let no man glory in men. For all things are yours; whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours; and ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's" (I Cor. iii. 21-23).

With the opening of I Cor. iv., the Apostle applies the teaching of the builder to himself and Apollos:

> "And these things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myself and to Apollos for your sakes; that ye might learn in us not to think of men above that which is written, that no one of you be puffed up for one against another" (I Cor. iv. 6).

Paul and Apollos were 'stewards of the mysteries of God'. The Revised Version text of I Cor. ii. 1 reads musterion 'mystery' in place of marturion 'testimony', and it is possible that Paul disappointed the Corinthians by his determination to know nothing among them save Jesus Christ and Him crucified, a resolution which would lead many to criticize his method, matter and motive. To this he now returns. Stewards of the mysteries (secrets) of God must be 'found faithful', all else is subsidiary. The fact that his life's work would be submitted to the test of 'that day' rendered the puny criticisms of man in this day, of little or no account. The word translated 'judgment' in I Cor. iv. 3 is literally 'day' and is evidently used in opposition to the 'day' of I Cor. iii. 13 which should 'declare' and 'reveal' the nature of all service.

> "But with me it is a very small thing that I should be judged (examined) of you, or of man's judgment (day): yea, I judge (examine) not mine own self. For I know nothing against myself; yet am I not hereby justified: but He that judgeth (examineth) me is the Lord. Wherefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, Who will both bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and make manifest the counsels of the hearts; and then shall each man have his praise from God" (I Cor. iv. 3-5, R.V.).

Here is the great distinction between "man's day" and "that day". To be over careful regarding the former, is to degenerate into a man-pleaser, a time-server, a popular yet unfaithful steward. To study to show one's self approved unto God, to be unashamed at desertion, adverse criticism and denunciation, to know Whom we have believed, to leave all unto 'that day' is to follow in the victorious footsteps of the despised Apostle.

The expression 'I know nothing by myself' (I Cor. iv. 4) is somewhat ambiguous. "By" can have the meaning 'concerning' in vulgar use, as 'I have done my duty by him', and this usage was common at the time of the A.V. translation. For example "He that setteth not by himself" (Psa. xv. 4 Prayer Book) for "He that is not wise in his own conceits". Alford complained that this meaning of 'by' does not occur in our ordinary dictionaries. This defect is made good in the Oxford English Dictionary, which has, as one subdivision:

> "About, concerning, with respect to, in regard to, as concerns" and signifies by the letter OE, that this is an Old English usage.

To make the Apostle's meaning intelligible today, we must adopt the R.V. and read "I know nothing against myself". The verb 'to know' used here, gives us the word suneidesis 'conscience', and occurs in Paul's epistles twenty-six times, and is used by Paul in Acts xxiii. 1 and xxiv. 16. Paul was not 'conscious' of any delinquency, but this did not form any ground of self-justification. What he looked upon with friendly eyes, the Lord might judge in that day as unfaithful service. This being so, the Apostle left the whole question of judging to the Lord, and to that day. Consequently, if that were his attitude, it is not likely that he would be perturbed by the judgment of the Corinthians. All this, however, was not uttered in pride, but in humility, so that the Corinthians in the matter of their preference for Paul or Apollos should not be:

"puffed up for one against another."

"For" continued the Apostle, "Who maketh thee to differ from another? And what hast thou that thou didst not receive? Now if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory, as if thou hadst not received it?"

So ends our survey of the first seven antonyms of I Corinthians. The lessons embodied therein are of peculiar value to all who would serve the Lord acceptably. May these lessons by contrast not be lost upon any of us, writer and reader alike.

Archaic and Obsolete Words of the Authorized Version.

No.5. pp. 174 - 180

BASE. This word as an adjective does not mean worthless or wicked, but of low rank, lowly, humble. "The basest of men" (Dan. iv. 17) does not mean men of bad character but the "lowliest of men". In II Cor. x. 1 Paul refers to himself as "who in presence am base among you", i.e. humble among you. Likewise Ezek. xxix. 15, "the basest of kingdoms" means "the most lowly of the kingdoms".

BESTEAD originally meant placed or situated, and then came to be used only in cases of difficulty or hostility. In Isa. viii. 21 we read, "And they shall pass through it hardly bestead and hungry". This means 'hard-pressed and hungry'. Shakespeare uses it in this sense.

BEWRAY means to reveal or disclose, almost the same as 'betray', except it did not have the thought of treachery or disloyalty behind it. Of Peter after his denial of the Lord it was said 'thy speech bewrayeth thee', that is, your pronunciation reveals your identity or your origin.

BOLLED. In Exod. ix. 31 we are told that through the Lord's judgments on Pharaoh and Egypt, the flax and barely were ruined, "for the barley was in the ear, and the flax was bolled". The Hebrew word means bud, so the A.S.V. translates 'the flax was in bloom' and the R.S.V. 'the flax was in bud'.

BOOTIES is the plural, now obsolete, of booty and occurs once in the A.V. namely Hab. ii. 7 "shall they not rise up suddenly that shall bite thee, and awake that shall vex thee, and thou shalt be for booties unto them?". Now we should use 'booty' always in the singular and this is followed by modern translations.

BRAVERY. This word has nothing to do with being brave but with women's finery. Its occurrence in Isa. iii. 18-23 makes this clear. "In that day the Lord will take away the bravery of their tinkling ornaments about their feet, and their cauls, and their round tires like the moon." Cauls comes from the old French cale and means cap or headgear. Tire has no connection with fatigue, but is a shortened form of attire, another word for headgear or an ornament worn on the head.

BRUIT. This means a report spread abroad, a rumour or tidings. "All they that hear the bruit of thee shall clap the hands over thee" (Nahum iii. 19), that is the news spread around concerning the Divine judgment on the king of Assyria. Jeremiah says concerning Judah, "Behold, the noise of the bruit is come", that is the rumour of the coming devastation of Judah.

BUNCH. This has nothing to do with a collection of anything as it is used today. It is an obsolete term for a hump on a camel's back or of a deformed person. "They will carry . . . . . their treasures upon the bunches of camels" (Isa. xxx. 6), means they will carry their treasures on the camels' humps or backs. In Shakespeare's King Richard III the humpbacked Richard is called 'that poisonous bunch-backed toad' (Acts 1, Scene 3).

BY AND BY. This is another instance where a phrase has completely changed its meaning in England since the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. At that time it meant immediately, as also did the words 'anon' and 'presently'. These words gradually lost this sense and came to mean 'after a while', or at some indefinite time in the future.

In the account of John the Baptist's beheading recorded in Mark's Gospel, it is odd to read of Salome's haste in coming before the King and in contrast her apparently leisurely request that John's head be given here 'by and by' (vi. 25, 27). But the word she used meant 'immediately', 'instantly'. She was not prepared to wait.

In the parable of the sower (Matt. xiii. 21) the Lord says of the stony ground hearer 'for when tribulation or persecution ariseth . . . . . by and by he is offended'. The A.V. archaism here suggests 'at some time later on' he is offended. But the Lord said "immediately he is offended"; which is very different and as the phrase is used today it completely misses the sense.

Another important reference is Luke xxi. 8, 9 where the Lord Jesus is dealing with the solemn times leading up to the destruction of Jerusalem (70A.D.), and then later in the chapter in connection with His Second Advent He said:

> "But when ye shall hear of wars and commotions, be not terrified; for these things must first come to pass; but the end is not by and by",

in which case, in modern English, it would mean the fulfillment will not be later on, but at once. But this is the opposite of what the Lord was teaching. What He actually said was "the end will not be at once, or immediately" which only shows the care that must be exercised when using the A.V. by itself.

BY COURSE. In I Cor. xiv. 27, the A.V. reads:

> "If any man speak in an unknown tongue, let it be by two, or at the most by three, and that by course."

The last two words rendered in modern English mean ‘in turns’. Paul did not use the word ‘unknown’ and this is an addition of the translators. The sense is, “If any speak in tongue (or dialect), let there be only two or at the most three, and each in turn (not at once), and let one interpret”.

CARE, CAREFUL, CAREFULNESS. These words can easily be misunderstood, for today they mean the opposite of being careless or indifferent. They have lost the meaning of anxiety or worry which they had originally and which is obvious in the Greek original. The Lord gently reproved Martha for being ‘careful . . . . . about many things’ (Luke x. 41) which is certainly not a fault in its modern usage. What He actually said was, “Martha, you are worried and troubled about many things”.

In Phil. iv. 6 the Apostle Paul gives the injunction, “Be careful for nothing” (A.V.), but this would be terrible advice if these words were used in their modern meaning. “Have no anxiety about anything” the Apostle actually wrote. It was freedom from the stress of worry and tension he was concerned about which is also evident in ICor.vii.32, “I would have you without carefulness”, or in up-to-date English, “I want you to be free from worry”. Imagine believers being advised in the sacred Scriptures, not to be careful!

CARRIAGE. “After those days we took up our carriages and went up to Jerusalem” (Acts xxi. 15). What does Luke mean by this, for it was a well-known fact that, rather than a road, there was little more than a mountain track between Caesarea and Jerusalem? What sort of carriages could traverse such a track? Some who disbelieve Scripture have made merry over this, but they are ignorant of the fact that in the sixteenth or seventeenth centuries the English word ‘carriage’ referred to baggage and not the vehicle that carries it. The Great Bible and the Bishop’s Bible (contemporary with the A.V.) render the phrase ‘took up our burdens’, but Tyndale is even nearer to the original, “After those days we made ourselves ready and went up to Jerusalem”.

In I Sam. xvii. 22 we read “David left his carriage in the hand of the keeper of the carriage” has no reference to any vehicle but means “David left the things in charge of the keeper of the baggage”. The A.V. of Isa. x. 28, “laid up his carriages” means “stores his baggage”.

CASTAWAY. The Greek work behind this A.V. translation is adokimos referring to metals or coins that fail to meet the test. It has no reference whatsoever to shipwrecked people. The word is the opposite of dokimos, translated “approved unto God” in II Tim. ii. 15. In I Cor. ix. 27 the Apostle is stating the possibility that, after proclaiming the truth to others, he might himself fail to finish the race through unfaithfulness or other reasons, and so receive the Lord’s disapproval and loss of reward. He is not saying that there was the possibility of his losing his salvation which has its source in God’s infinite grace (not works or attainment) and grace characterizes this salvation right to the end. Salvation basically is the free gift of God in Christ which He never takes away for the 'gifts and calling of God are without repentance' (i.e. change of mind on His part, Rom. xi. 29).

CAST DOWN. These words appear in Daniel's description of the overwhelming vision that he records in the seventh chapter, "I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit" (vii. 9). But in what sense could these thrones which were intimately connected with God, be cast down or overthrown? In which case, how could they be sat on? The contemporary translations of Coverdale, Matthew and the Great Bible render it "until the seates were prepared" and the Geneva and the Bishop's Bible had "till the thrones were set up". The Septuagint and Vulgate have words which mean "were placed" and undoubtedly this is the correct meaning and fits the context, which the A.V. translation does not.

CHAMPAIGN. This word occurs in Deut. xi. 30 ". . . . . in the land of the Canaanites, which dwell in the Champaign over against Gilgal, beside the plains of Moreh". It was an old French word meaning "open, level country or plain" and this is its meaning in Deuteronomy.

CHAPMEN. The A.V. uses this word in II Chron. ix. 13, 14:

> ". . . . . the weight of gold that came to Solomon in one year was six hundred and threescore and six talents (666) of gold, beside that which chapmen and merchants brought . . . . ."

Chapmen were traders who traveled about selling goods. Even in 1611 the word had begun to lose its primary significance of 'merchant' and came to be used of itinerant hawkers and pedlars, and was looked on with disdain, as is expressed in Shakespeare's lines from Troilus and Cressida:

> "Fair Diomed, you do as chapmen do, > Disguise the thing that you desire to buy" (Act 2, scene 1), and in another context he speaks of the "base sale of chapmen's tongues". "Traders" is the meaning in II Chron. ix. 14.

CHARGEABLE. This word in 1611 meant 'burdensome' and refers to persons rather than commodities. In Neh. v. 15 we read of governors 'who were chargeable unto the people', that is, they laid heavy burdens on the people. The Apostle Paul reminds the Thessalonians that he worked night and day so that he 'might not be chargeable' to them (I Thess. ii. 9; II Thess. iii. 8). "I was chargeable to no man" (II Cor. xi. 9) means I did not burden anyone.

CIEL, CIELING (I Kings vi. 15). These words are obsolete spelling of CEIL and CEILING, and mean walls lined with wood paneling. In II Chron. iii. 5 it states that Solomon's "greater house was cieled with fir tree" which means overlaid with this wood. The Lord complains through Haggai the prophet "Is it time for you, O ye, to dwell in your cieled houses and this house (the Temple) lie waste?" The Israelites had luxuriously decorated their own homes and showed little interest in the Lord's house which lay in ruins (Hag. i. 4).

COME BY. In the storm and shipwreck so vividly described in Acts xxvii. 16 we read, "we have much work to come by the boat". This is old English meaning it was hard to control the boat and so secure it.

COMFORT. This comes from the Latin comforto, meaning to strengthen, and this often is its meaning in Scripture in addition to soothing or consoling. It is interesting to note examples from Wyclif's translation which preceded the A.V., "he comforteth hym with nailes" (Isa. xli. 7) sounding peculiar to us today. Also "he comforteth the lockis of thi gatis" (Psa. cxlvii. 13). In each case our modern equivalent would be 'strengthen'.

In the N.T. the word occurs many times meaning 'encourage or strengthen' in addition to consoling and this should be borne in mind in the contexts where it occurs.

COMFORTLESS. John xiv. 18 reads, "I will not leave you comfortless" where the Greek means 'left as orphans' and the thought behind this precious promise is that, though the Lord was to leave them shortly, they would not be bereft or destitute.

COMMUNICATE. Basically this means 'to share' rather than to pass on a message. It refers to practical fellowship and generous acts. "To do good and to communicate forget not" (Heb. xiii. 16), that is practical sharing among believers. Paul commended the Philippian church because they communicated with his affliction when he was imprisoned (Phil. iv. 14). This does not mean that they sent letters to him, but rather practical gifts to help him, as the context makes perfectly clear. "Evil communications corrupt good manners" (I Cor. xv. 33). This means something deeper than bad language or writings and embraces all social influences in which conversation plays only a part. It means moral character as a whole and what Paul meant was 'bad company ruins good morals'.

COMPREHEND. This word comes from a Latin verb that means to seize or grasp and in the sixteenth century was used in both the physical and intellectual senses, whereas today it is only used in the latter sense. In John i. 5 we read "the light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not". This does not mean "the darkness did not understand it", but rather the darkness did not grasp and extinguish the light, in other words, did not overcome it. In Christ was "the light of men, the light shines in the darkness, and the darkness has not overcome it". This is a triumphant assertion that fits in with the glorious revelation of the opening words of John's Gospel. Other translations back this up. "Did not master it" (Moffatt); "Has never put it out" (Goodspeed); "Has never overpowered it" (Weymouth); "Did not conquer it" (Rien).

No.6. pp. 196 - 200

CONDESCEND. This word is defined in the Oxford English Dictionary as "to stoop from one's position of dignity or pride". This is its modern meaning, but not that of its one occurrence in our A.V. namely Rom. xii. 16 "Mind not high things, but condescend to men of low estate". Today the word nearly always has a snobbish meaning, but in Romans there is none of this. The sense is "Do not be proud, but associate with the lowly or humble". The last word here is used by the Saviour concerning Himself—"I am meek and lowly in heart" (Matt. xi. 29) and He was the One Who 'humbled Himself' (Phil.ii.8) and as a noun the word appears as 'humility' (Acts xx. 19) or 'lowliness' (Eph. iv. 2). These are the types of people with whom we should associate.

CONFECTION, CONFECTIONARY. Today these words are confined to sweetmeats and sugar foods. In the days of the A.V. they referred to spices and perfumes, and this can be seen in Exod. xxx. 35, where God's instruction to Moses concerning the holy incense was "thou shalt make it a perfume, a confection after the art of the apothecary". Confectionary is used in I Sam. viii. 13 where Samuel warned the Israelites that if they insisted on a king "he will take your daughters to be confectionaries, and to be cooks and to be bakers". Here "confectionaries" means "perfumers".

CONVENIENT. This word originally had the meaning of proper, becoming, right. It has lost these meanings and is now applied to what is suitable to one's self. In Eph. v. 4 unclean talking is not convenient (A.V.) which today should be translated 'proper' or 'right'. In Philemon 8 "to enjoin thee that which is convenient" means 'to command thee to do what is required'. In Rom. i. 28 "to do those things which are not convenient" signifies "to act improperly".

CONVERSATION. In 1611 this always referred to conduct or manner of life, never just to talking. The "vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers" (I Pet. i. 18) was not their words, but their actions, in fact their whole lives. In IPet.iii.1,2, the Apostle exhorts Christian wives to be in subjection to their husbands, so that, if they were not saved, they might be won by the conversation of the wives. But he did not mean that wives could talk their husbands into receiving the truth, rather he exhorted that their whole manner of life might be a testimony to them. Every time the reader of the A.V. comes across the word 'conversation', he should be careful to read it as 'conduct'.

Once, the A.V. translates another Greek word (politeuma) as conversation (Phil.iii.20), "our conversation is in heaven" which, needless to say, does not mean 'our talking is in heaven', but "our citizenship exists in heaven".

CONVINCE. This word occurs in the A.V. in an obsolete sense. Its modern meaning is convict. "Which of you convinceth Me of sin" (John viii. 46) should now read "convicteth Me of sin". In I Cor. xiv. 24 the phrase 'convinced of all' means "convicted by all". In James ii. 9 our A.V. reads "If ye have respect to persons, ye commit sin, and are convinced of the law as transgressors". "Convicted by the law" is what is meant. "To convince all that are ungodly" (Jude 15) should now read "to convict all the ungodly".

COUNTERVAIL. This is another word that has become obsolete. ". . . . . The enemy could not countervail the king's damage" is meaningless in modern English. The word used has the sense of 'compensating' or 'making up for'. The Bible in Basic English renders it "for our trouble is little in comparison with the king's loss".

COUNTRY. John xi. 54 reads in the A.V. "Jesus . . . . . went into a country near to the wilderness" which gives the impression that the Lord went into another land and nation, but this is not so. The inspired Greek has the country, meaning "countryside". The Rheims Version of 1582 correctly renders this as "the country" and John Wesley corrected the A.V. in 1755 on this point and has been followed by modern translators generally.

COUSIN. This word as used in the A.V. means any relative and the modern word would be 'kinsfolk'. This should be noted in Luke i. 36 and 58.

CUNNING is used in both good and bad senses in the A.V. whereas today it is only used in a bad sense. In a good sense it meant one who was skilful. Esau was a "cunning (skilful) hunter" (Gen. xxv. 27). Saul's servants, in order to sooth him, sought for "a cunning player on the harp" (I Sam. xvi. 16) i.e. a skilful player. In I Kings vii. 14 we are told that Hiram was "filled with wisdom, and understanding, and cunning to work all works in brass", that is, a skilful worker in metal, and in preparation for the Tabernacle we read of 'cunning men' and 'cunning workmen' and 'cunning work'.

CURIOUS. The old English meant 'made with care' not 'peculiar'. Exod. xxviii. 8 rendered in the A.V. "and the curious girdle of the ephod" means "a skillfully woven band". Bezaleel devised 'curious works' (Exod. xxxv. 32), that is, 'artistic designs'. Psa. cxxxix. 15 is an interesting reference to the unborn child ". . . . . made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth". The formation of different members of the body before birth is likened to embroidery or the arranging of the threads and colours in a beautiful piece of tapestry.

DAYSPRING. This word means daybreak or dawn and should be understood as this in such passages as Job xxxviii. 12 and Luke i. 78.

DELICACY and DELICIOUSLY. Rev. xviii. 3, 7, 9 does not refer to the plentiful supply of dainties in Babylon but is used in the sense of sensual luxury and voluptuousness. The kings of the earth who 'lived deliciously with her' indulged in lust and sensual pleasures. Tyndale renders it 'lived wantonly with her'.

DESCRY. This word means to discover, or perceive, investigate or spy out. Judg.i.23 states that "the house of Joseph sent to descry Bethel" which means that the house of Joseph sent to spy out Bethel.

DIVERS and DIVERSE. These were originally the spelling of the same word. In 1611 'divers' meant various, several, more than one (without stating how many). The word occurs 36 times in the A.V. but is completely obsolete today. "Divers of Asher" (II Chron. xxx. 11) means "a few men of Asher". In Mark viii. 3 we read that the Lord Jesus had compassion on the multitude "for divers of them came from afar", which means, in modern English, "Some of them had come a long way". The prohibition of sowing a vineyard "with divers seeds" (Deut. xxii. 9) means sowing with two or more different kinds of seeds. "Divers diseases" (Matt. iv. 24) means "various illnesses", "divers trials", "various test".

DOCTOR. This word originally meant nothing more than teacher. In Luke ii. 46 we have the occasion of the Lord Jesus visiting the Temple as a boy and "sitting in the midst of the doctors". These were not medical men but teachers of the law as in Luke v. 17. "Doctrine" likewise means "teaching", and in the A.V. the act of teaching as well.

DUKE. This word, in the A.V., is used for the Chief of Edom. It has no thought of a hereditary title of nobility as used in Great Britain. The word just means a leader, coming from the Latin dux (leader). Wyclif translates Matt. ii. 6 "for of thee a duke shall go out that shall govern my people Israel", referring to the Lord Jesus, but he was translating from the Latin. Tyndale used the word "captayne" and the A.V. the word "governor".

EAR and PLOW. Both these words are old verbs which have the same meaning, to prepare the soil for sowing by turning it over in furrows. The word 'ear' is used by the

A.V. in Gen. xlv. 6, Exod. xxxiv. 21, Deut. xxi. 4 and I Sam. viii. 12 and in other places, meaning ploughing the ground. It is quite obsolete today.

ENSUE. This word was used in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries in the sense of pursue. So in I Pet. iii. 11 "seek peace, and ensue it" means "seek peace and pursue it".

EQUAL. In these centuries 'equal' had the moral meaning of what is fair, just and right as well as stating size or quantity. Ezekiel makes the protest in the name of the Lord: "Yet ye say, the way of the Lord is not equal. Hear now, O house of Israel; is not My way equal? Are not your ways unequal?". In modern English we should say "Is not My way just or right? Are not your ways wrong?". In Col. iv. 1, "give to your servants that which is just and equal" means, "treat your slaves justly and fairly".

ESCHEW. This obsolete word means to avoid wrong doing or escape a danger or inconvenience. Job is described as "one that feared God and eschewed evil" (Job i. 1). Peter says, in his first epistle, let those who would see good days "eschew evil and do good" (iii. 11), which means, of course, turn away from evil and do what is good and right.

No.7. pp. 215 - 220

EXPECT, EXPECTATION. The word 'expect' occurs in the obsolete sense of 'wait' in Heb. x. 13: "From henceforth expecting till His enemies be made His footstool". The word expectation as used in the A.V. means 'hope'. In Psa. ix. 18, "the expectation of the poor" means "the hope of the poor". In Psa. lxii. 5 the writer says, "My soul, wait thou only upon God, for my expectation is from Him". In modern English it would read "for my hope is from Him". Prov. xxiv. 14 says, "Thy expectation shall not be cut off" meaning "Your hope will not be cut off". Jer. xxix. 11 "to give you an expected end" is "to give you a future and a hope".

FAIN. This obsolete word as a noun, adjective or verb means 'glad', coming from the Old Saxon fagan, 'glad'. The word occurs in the parable of the Prodigal Son, "he would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat". In modern English this reads, "he would gladly have fed on the pods that the swine ate" (Luke xv. 16 R.S.V.). Coverdale, in the Prayer Book version of the Psalms renders Psa. lxxi. 23 "my lips will be fain when I sing unto Thee".

FAMILIAR SPIRIT. Those who 'have familiar spirits' are often referred to in the O.T. and these are evil powers under the control of Satan, and those who deal with them are called 'wizards'. These were nothing more than spiritist mediums who claimed to be in communication with the spirit powers and such spirits to be responsive as a servant (famulus) to their call. Under the law in the Old Testament such were to be put to death (Lev. xx. 27). Such stringent rules were to prevent contact with the evil spirit world. It is significant that spiritism is increasing today under various guises and the Lord's people need to be warned to avoid any contact with this evil that Satan so easily uses to enslave the minds of people with his lie and deceit.

FEEBLE MINDED. In Elizabethan days this word did not mean mentally deficient but 'discouraged'. So in I Thess. v. 14 "comfort the feeble minded" in modern English should be rendered 'encourage the faint hearted'.

FETCH ABOUT. This is an obsolete expression occurring in II Sam. xiv. 20 "to fetch about this form of speech hath thy servant Joab done this thing" and today such a sentence is unintelligible. "Fetch about" means to contrive, devise or change, and the R.V. greatly improves things by rendering "to change the face of the matter".

FETCH A COMPASS. This is another obsolete phrase and sounds strange today. Needless to say it has nothing to do with a compass in the modern sense, but means take a roundabout course, or make a circuit. It occurs five times in the A.V., one of these being in the N.T. After Paul's shipwreck, Luke tells us he (Paul), his guards and companions sailed from Syracuse. "From thence we fetched a compass, and came to Rhegium" which means "from there we made a circuit and arrived at Rhegium". In II Sam. v. 23 the phrase means "to go round to their rear".

FLUX. This is an old English word for dysentery and it was this illness (a 'bloody flux') that affected the father of Publius (Acts xxviii. 8).

FOOTMEN. These are not servants, but men who are in military service—foot soldiers (II Kings xiii. 7).

FORETELL. This word in the A.V. means more than predict. It is used in the A.V. to tell or warn someone beforehand and in II Cor. xiii. 2 this is its sense. "I foretell you" means "I warn you".

FRANKLY. Luke vii. 42 is its one occurrence in our English Bible "he frankly forgave them both". It is not used in the modern sense of openly or candidly but freely or generously; though why the A.V. uses the word at all is not clear, as there is no word in the original Greek for it.

FRAY. This is a shortened form of the verb "affray" which in 1611 meant frighten or to make afraid. The word 'afraid' is just the modern form of the past participle "affrayed". In Deut. xxviii. 26 comes the warning—"thy carcase shall be meat unto all the fowls of the air, and unto the beasts of the earth, and no man shall fray them away" that is, "frighten them away". Likewise Jer. vii. 33. In the vision of Zechariah, four carpenters came to fray or terrify the four horns which had scattered Judah (Zechariah i. 18-21).

FRET. This word occurs four times in the A.V. in the obsolete sense of eat into, gnaw, decay. A fretting leprosy is referred to in Lev. xiii. 51, 52; xiv. 44 and "it is fret inward" in xiii. 55, that is leprous decay of the flesh. These are Tyndale's terms which were accepted by the A.V. translators.

FROWARD—NESS. This obsolete word is cognate with 'from-ward", like the phrase "to and fro" for "to and from". It is the opposite of 'toward'. It had the meaning of contrary, perverse, crooked or devious and 17 of the 24 occurrences are to be found in Proverbs.

GENDER. When used as a verb this word refers to the breeding of cattle (Lev.xix.19; Job xxi. 10). The well-known phrase in Gal. iv. 24 "Mount Sinai, which gendereth to bondage" means "which bears children for slavery", and in II Tim. ii. 23 we are warned against foolish questions which "gender strifes" or breed quarrels.

GHOST. Except in connection with the Holy Spirit, this old word only occurs in the phrases, 'give up the ghost' (16 times) and 'yield up the ghost' (3 times). Both phrases mean the same thing and represent a single Hebrew or Greek word meaning 'to die'. The word 'ghost' in 1611 did not mean an apparition, but the spirit or immaterial part of a person as distinct from his body and 'ghostly' meant spiritual. The literature of this period is full of references to church ministers being called ghostly advisers, ghostly instructors, ghostly fathers, etc. Ghostly counsel was spiritual counsel. The word is now quite obsolete in this sense. The Holy Ghost should now be rendered the Holy Spirit.

When a ghost in the modern sense is used in the N.T. the Greek has the word phantasma not pneuma, spirit. When they saw the Lord Jesus walking on the water, the disciples said, "it is spirit" (Mark vi. 49) according to the A.V. But the word is phantasma not pneuma and should be rendered, as in the modern versions, "it is a ghost".

GOVERNOR. In James iii. 4 this is used in the obsolete sense of a pilot of a ship. Paul, in Gal. iv. 1, 2 writes 'the heir as long as he is a child . . . . . is under tutors and governors, until the time appointed of the father'. "Tutors and Governors" is better translated 'guardians and trustees'. We have 'the governor of the feast' in connection with the marriage at Cana. He was the same as 'the ruler of the feast' (John ii. 8, 9) which is equivalent today of the head waiter or steward whose duty was to manage all the details and procedures of the wedding breakfast.

GRUDGE. This word originally meant to murmur, grumble or complain from an earlier variant 'grutch' which corresponds to the modern colloquial 'grouse'. In James v. 9 the A.V. reads "Grudge not one against another", meaning "do not grumble against one another". In Psa. lix. 6, 7, 14, 15 the Psalmist compares his enemies to dogs and says, "let them wander up and down for meat and grudge if they be not satisfied". This does not make sense today. The R.S.V. gives the meaning more clearly: "they roam about for food and growl if they do not get their fill".

HABERGEON. This means a coat of mail. In the Authorized Version this word is used for three Hebrew words, but it only properly applies to one, shiryon, which occurs in II Chron. xxvi. 14 and Neh. iv. 16.

HAP means chance or fortune either good or bad. The good meanings cluster round the related words happy, happily, happiness. The neutral ones are linked with such words as happen, happening, haply, perhaps. In Ruth ii. 3 the A.V. renders the sentence "her hap was to light on a part of the field belonging unto Boaz". Put in modern English, this would be "she happened to come to the part of the field belonging to Boaz". "Haply" means perchance or perhaps.

HARDLY in 1611 meant 'with difficulty'. "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God" (Mark x. 23) is equivalent to "how hard or difficult it will be for those who have riches to enter the kingdom of God".

In Isa. viii. 21 the words 'hardly bestead' mean 'greatly distressed'. The phrase is quite obsolete today.

HEADY. This word means precipitate, headstrong, rash and occurs in the list of vices of the last days listed in II Tim. iii. 1-5. The Greek adjective mean reckless, rushing headlong, and is used in Acts xix. 36 where the town clerk urged the citizens of Ephesus 'to be quiet and do nothing rash'.

HEAVE OFFERING. The Hebrew word is ternmah which the A.V. renders oblation 18 times, offering 28 times, heave offering 24 times. The term heave offering is misleading for it implies the rite of elevation which is doubtful and the word ‘heave’ suggests strenuous effort, lifting or throwing something very heavy. The word ‘heave’ is best omitted. Numb. xviii. 32 reads in the A.V. “ye shall bear no sin by reason of it, when ye have heaved from it the best of it”. This is unintelligible today. The sentence means “ye shall bear no sin by reason of it, when ye have offered the best of it”.

HEAVINESS appears 14 times in the A.V. but never in the sense of physical weight. It always has a psychological meaning denoting a state of mind. It is a pity that the A.V. uses ‘heaviness’ to represent 7 different Hebrew words and 3 different Greek words, each of which has its own shade of meaning and this has therefore been lost in our old English Version. Some of these anxiety, sorrow, fasting, despair, have to suffer, painful. Proverbs xii. 25 reads, “Heaviness in the heart of man maketh it stoop”, which is better render “Anxiety in a man’s heart weighs him down”.

HEAVY. Some usages of this word by the A.V. are not very happy. Ahab’s vexation over Naboth’s refusal to let him have his vineyard is described by the A.V. as being ‘heavy and displeased’ (I Kings xxi. 4). In the garden of Gethsemane the Lord Jesus “began to be very heavy” (Mark xiv. 33), but the Lord’s attitude was the very opposite of Ahab’s. When his greed was thwarted, Ahab became ‘vexed’ or ‘resentful’, whereas in connection with our Saviour, “He began to be deeply distressed and troubled. My soul is overwhelmed with sorrow to the point of death, He said to them” (N.I.V.). The translation ‘heavy’ in both these cases is misleading and inaccurate.

HIGH, HIGH-MINDED. The word ‘high’ is used in the sense of ‘haughty’ in Psalms xvii. 27; ci. 5. In Isa. x. 12 we have the king of Assyria and ‘the glory of his high looks’ which means his haughty pride. “High-minded” is now always used in a good sense. We speak of those who have ‘high principles’. In the 16th century the word was more often used in a bad sense, so in Rom. xi. 20 and xii. 16 “high-minded” meant haughty or proud. In II Tim. iii. 4, “high-minded” occurs in a long list of evil dispositions of the last days. The Greek word means ‘swollen with conceit’.

No.8. p. 240

HOLPEN. This word is the old past participle of ‘help’. From the 14th to the 17th century it was also spelled ‘holpe’ or ‘holp’ and these were gradually displaced by ‘helped’. The A.V. uses both ‘holpen’ and ‘helped’ in about equal numbers. In Mary’s Magnificat we have the rendering “He hath holpen His servant Israel” in which the Book of Common Prayer had influenced the A.V. translators. In Tyndale’s first translation he used ‘holpen’ (1525) in Luke i. 54, but he rejected it in his final edition (1534) and used ‘helped’. No English version previous to the A.V. used ‘holpen’. The Great Bible and the Bishop’s Bible had ‘helped’ in this context. We should remember that Tyndale’s Version greatly influenced the translators of our A.V. as did the Prayer Book.

HONEST occurs seven times in the N.T. not as the opposite to deceit, but in the sense of honourable, noble, worthy of honour. “Having your conversation honest among the Gentiles”, means, “maintain honourable conduct among the Gentiles” and this is its meaning in II Cor. viii. 21; xiii. 7; Phil. iv. 8 and Rom. xii. 17.

The Second Epistle to the Corinthians

No.11. xii. 1 - 10.
pp. 6 - 10

We continue with our consideration of Paul's vindication of his ministry with respect to his opponents in the Corinthian church. He has already shown that this ministry was more than equal to that of his critics both in faithfulness and personal suffering and endurance.

In chapter xii. he passes on to visions and revelations of the Lord. This suggests that his enemies were also claiming to have such visions and revelations, but here again his experience far outweighed theirs. He is so averse to personal boasting and the exaltation of self that he begins to speak of himself impersonally:

> "I know a man in Christ, fourteen years ago (whether in the body, I know not; or whether out of the body, I know not; God knoweth), such a one caught up even to the third heaven" (II Cor. xii. 2, R.V.).

The A.V. "I knew a man" is incorrect here and also in verse 3. This gives the impression that the man referred to was no longer known to Paul!

We have already noted that the book of the Acts records a number of appearances of the Lord Jesus to the Apostle, but the one he is dealing with here cannot be equated with any of these, unless we add our own thoughts and ideas to Luke's narrative, and this we refuse to do. Nor must we make the mistake of identifying these 'fourteen years' with the fourteen years of Gal. ii. 1. If we go back from the probable date of the epistle we arrive at the time when Paul was sent to Tarsus and then fetched by Barnabas from Tarsus to Antioch (Acts ix. 30; xi. 25). About this time he was caught away to the third heaven. The Greek verb is found in Acts viii. 39 where it is stated that "the Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip" who was found later on at Azotus. It is also used in I Thess. iv. 17 which describes the Lord's parousia, His arrival on the earth, to set up the earthly Kingdom. Those believers who are alive and remain shall be caught up to meet the Lord in the air and then return with Him in His triumphal procession to the earth in power and great glory attended by the angels of heaven.

The expressions 'the third heaven' occurs only here in the N.T., but one must not forget the phrase 'all heavens' in Eph. iv. 10 in connection with the Lord's ascension. While we sometimes read of heaven in the singular in the Bible, describing the whole heavenly sphere, yet this is obviously subdivided into sections, otherwise Eph. iv. 10 and II Cor. xii. 2 are meaningless. We cannot tell how many sections there are, for this is not revealed*, but there must be at least three or more. Peter, in his second epistles refers to (1) the heavens that were of old [II Pet. iii. 5], (2) the heavens and the earth that are now [verse 7] and (3) a new heaven and a new earth yet to be created wherein dwelleth righteousness [verse 13].

{* - It is interesting to know that in Jewish writing about the time of Christ, seven heavens were enumerated. cf. The Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, "The Testament of Levi", chapter 3.}

So there are three heavens in time as well as at least three departments of heaven itself. The Apostle John, in the Revelation, links this new creation with Paradise (Rev. ii. 7), so it would appear that both Paul and John were given a preview, as it were, of this wonderful new heaven and earth where at last is absolute perfection and untold glory and joy. The word 'paradise', a Persian word meaning 'park', is used in the LXX of the garden of Eden and in the Revelation of the new earth. We should note that in both cases it is linked with the earth and not with heaven.

The rapturous experience that Paul had was beyond expression in human words. He did not know whether it was 'in the body' or 'out of the body' (verse 2). He says nothing about what he saw. What he heard he describes as 'unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter'. The Scriptures say little about resurrection life after death. Suffice it to say that it is so wonderful that there are no human means of adequately describing it. But its superlative and eternal wonders are real, and faith is willing to wait until the day of glory when all the shadows and limitations will have gone and we shall know and enjoy fully the pleasures that are at God's right hand for evermore (Psa.xvi.11).

Such an extended revelation might have puffed up the pride of any man and even the Apostle was not immune from this, for he states:

> "And to keep me from being too elated by the abundance of revelations, a thorn was given me in the flesh, a messenger of Satan, to harass me, to keep me from being too elated" (xii. 7, R.S.V.).

Our heavenly Father, in His love and wisdom, knows how to balance us up so that we can remain in the centre of His will and be usable by Him. Some Pentecostalists assert that all bodily ailments are foreign to the will of the Lord for the believer. The Lord's death, they claim, was to save us from bodily illness as well as from our sins.

However, this is completely disproved by Paul's experience here. Three times he prayed and asked the Lord to remove the 'thorn'. Doubtless he thought he could do better work for the Lord if he was relieved of this burden. But the Lord's answer was 'No'. He said to the Apostle 'My grace is sufficient for you and My power is made perfect in weakness'. There was a lesson that Paul had to learn through the experience of 'the thorn', so the Lord did not remove it.

We should be wise too, if, instead of asking for our 'thorns' to be removed, we prayed that we might learn whatever lesson the Lord wants to teach us in the experience we are undergoing. Let us not make the mistake of keeping grace to the gospel of salvation. Grace, as well as saving, strengthens, guides and enables us to become 'more than conquerors through Him Who loved us' (Rom. viii. 37). In fact, grace follows us all through our earthly pilgrimage and service, and will be with us till the day of glory dawns, and there is not a moment we can dispense with it.

Just what was Paul's thorn in the flesh? Many have been the opinions of believers on this point. Professor F. F. Bruce summarizes some of them:

> "Pain in the ear or head (Tertullian). Such troublesome characters as Hymenaeus and Alexander (Chrysostom), epilepsy (M. Krenkel, J. Klausner), ophthalmia (J. T. Brain), convulsive attacks (M. Dibelius), sufferings caused by constant persecutions (J. Murick), attacks of depression after periods of exaltation (H. Clavier), the agony caused by the unbelief of his Jewish brethren (P. H. Menoud), malaria (W. M. Ramsay, E. B. Allo), or by the memory of his persecution of the church (A. Osiander, A Schlatter)."

The very variety of ideas shows that certainty is unattainable. The Greek skolops means 'thorn' or 'splinter' rather than 'stake' (R.V. margin). This is confirmed by the LXX (compare Numb. xxxiii. 55; Ezek. xxviii. 24; Hosea ii. 6). The examples of this word in the papyri strongly confirm this rendering. The dative case (te sarki) could be either locative 'in the flesh', or a 'dativus incommodi', 'for the inconvenience of the flesh'. If the latter, then we have to understand the word 'flesh' in the peculiar sense of the sinful old nature. This was the interpretation of the Reformers and some of the early Fathers who regarded the word in a spiritual way, sent by the Lord 'for the flesh', i.e., to quell any possible pride or arrogance that might have arisen in the Apostle after such an exalted experience.

However, we believe that the plain, literal meaning of the Bible, wherever it makes good sense and is in accord with the general teaching of Scripture, is always to be preferred to 'spiritualizing'. That Paul suffered sever physical trials, II Corinthians has already made clear in chapter vii. In Gal. iv. 13-15 the Apostle referred to a physical ailment evidently connected with his eyes, for he bears witness to the fact that the Galatian believers would have given him their own eyes if they could have done so. It would appear that he suffered from a chronic and ugly discharge from his eyes. The word 'reject' in verse 14 is literally 'splitting out' something offensive. In spite of this affliction which sometimes made him look revolting, these believers loved him so much that they could completely overlook this. And after his vision of the glory of the risen Saviour at his conversion which he described as "above the brightness of the sun" (Acts xxvi. 13), and which rendered him blind for three days (Acts ix. 9), we can well believe that his eyes were left permanently weak. Satan could have aggravated this condition, for the Word of God reveals that with the Lord's permission, he can affect the body. Job was an O.T. example, and the bent woman in Luke xiii. 16 (described as 'whom Satan hath bound') is another.

However, the Lord's grace is all-sufficient at all times and for every experience; as He said, "My power is made perfect in weakness" (II Cor. xii. 9). Thus, when the effectiveness of Paul's preaching was so evident, then the transcendent power was manifestly the Lord's and not his own. This was a witness in itself. "Most gladly therefore", he said, "will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me" (verse 9). This is not the statement of a fanatic who rejoices in pain, but rather of one who is being protected by the overshadowing and almighty power of Christ. The phrase 'may rest upon me', means literally 'may pitch His tent upon me', a beautiful thought.

Thus he was able to endure the 'thorn' and the sufferings it cause, for Christ's sake. No one in his senses can take pleasure in suffering which is brought on either by inflicting upon himself or is the consequence on his own folly, but the believer, for the Lord's sake, can even welcome it, for then he can be strong, not in himself, but in the Lord and the power of His might (Eph. vi. 10).

A new section now starts in the Corinthian epistle which deals with the signs of a true apostle. Paul has now finished what he termed his foolish boasting which was forced upon him by his enemies at Corinth. May we all learn the lesson of the 'thorn that remains', and the glorious overshadowing power of the Saviour which can be our continual experience.

No.12. xii. 11 - xiii. 14.
pp. 21 - 26

Chapter xii. 11 commences a new section in this epistle. Paul has finished his 'foolish boasting'. As we have seen, it would not have been necessary for him to have started it had not his opposers at Corinth forced him to do so by reason of their exalting themselves and belittling him as the apostle of Christ. He could say 'in nothing was I behind the very chiefest apostles, though I am nothing' (verse 11). The Corinthians had had the miraculous signs of a true apostle manifested before their eyes when Paul evangelized their city:

> "Truly the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, by signs and wonders and mighty works" (II Cor. xii. 12, R.V.).

Just as Christ's earthly ministry to Israel had been confirmed by evidential miracles ('miracles, wonders and signs' Acts ii. 22) as also was the witness of the Jerusalem apostles (Acts ii. 43), so had the ministry of Paul been so attested by God. There could be no doubt then of his apostleship. None of the false apostles at Corinth could claim such Divine credentials. Why did some of them then doubt him? They had enjoyed all the blessings that other churches had received through his ministry. Why should they then think they had received inferior treatment (xii. 13)? He had refused to be burdensome to them and for this 'wrong' he ironically begs their pardon.

Paul now refers to a third visit in verse 14. The second visit to them was the 'painful' one referred to in ii. 1. This third visit would also prove painful if the situation warranted it (see xiii. 1, 2), though the Apostle doubtless fervently hoped that they would mend their ways and make such apostolic discipline unnecessary.

Once more he makes known his motives to them. He does not want to be a burden, nor does he want their property, but it is themselves he is anxious to win. They are his spiritual children and as such it was right for him as their spiritual father to make provision for them, not the reverse (verse 14). He is prepared to go to the limit in spending himself for their spiritual profit and his love for them was unbounded. If only theirs for him had been likewise! (verse 15).

He continues:

> "But be it so, I did not myself burden you, but, being crafty, I caught you with guile" (xii. 16, R.V.).

The latter part of the verse must not be misunderstood. The Apostle had stated in chapter iv. 2 that he had renounced craftiness (panourgia), so he certainly was not being crafty (panourgos) in his dealings with the Corinthian church. Rather he is quoting what some at Corinth were saying about him. The R.S.V. makes this clear by supplying the words 'you say'.

He challenges them to say if he had taken advantage of them in financial or other matters through any of his messengers:

> "Did Titus take any advantage of you?"

The question is expressed so as to require the answer "No", for it is introduced by the negative me. Paul had urged Titus to visit them in connection with their money gift for the poor saints at Jerusalem (cp. viii. 6 and 17). Only one brother is mentioned here accompanying him, whereas two are mentioned in chapter viii. 18. One is probably omitted here because he was not Paul's representative, but sent as a delegate from one of the other churches who were contributing. Titus' companions are called 'messengers of the churches' in viii. 23.

Paul now further challenges them:

> "Ye think all this time that we are excusing ourselves unto you. In the sight of God speak we in Christ. But all things, beloved, are for your edifying" (xii. 19, R.V.).

This could be read as a question "Have you been thinking . . . . .?" The Apostle was not concerned about his own reputation. As one sent by Christ he knew what constituted his ministry and this was principally the building up of believers everywhere. What he desired above all things was their spiritual growth and maturity.

The last thing he wanted was to find them in the same state as when he made the 'painful' visit. This would not only be painful to them, but to him also. He would certainly feel humbled if he continued to find some of them indulging in the sins listed in verse 20. He would then 'mourn for many who had sinned and not repented' (verse 21) for this would probably means excommunication.

Once again, in the first verse of chapter xiii., he refers to his proposed third visit and also to Deut. xix. 15 (and compare xvii. 6 and Numb. xxxv. 30), where accusation must be backed up by more than one witness to avoid a false charge. Again he warns them that he will be forced to deal ruthlessly with those who ignored him and continued in their evil ways, just as he did on his second visit (verse 2), and this statement shows us that this upsetting visit actually took place although we only have allusions to it.

Some had evidently said that his reluctance to use his apostolic power in judgment meant that in reality he was no apostle:

> "Since you desire proof that Christ is speaking in me, He is not weak in dealing with you, but is powerful in you. For He was crucified in weakness, but lives by the power of God" (xiii. 3 & 4, R.S.V.).

To all such he asserts that the power of Christ would be a reality amongst them and he would be a vehicle of that power. By worldly standards the Lord was 'crucified in weakness', but Christ crucified in reality was the power of God (I Cor. i. 18) and this power would be manifested in no uncertain way in their midst.

Did they demand proof of his apostleship? Let them examine themselves first and test the genuineness of their own faith:

> "Examine yourselves, to see whether you are holding to your faith. Test yourselves. Do you not realize that Jesus Christ is in you?—unless indeed you fail to meet the test!" (xiii. 5, R.S.V.).

The Apostle expresses the hope that the Corinthians will realize that he is no 'counterfeit' (adokimos, reprobate) apostle. Also that they may not do wrong, rather the reverse (verses 6 and 7). He would gladly appear to be weak in their eyes, as long as they are strong, not in themselves, but in Christ and the power He alone can impart:

> "This we also pray for, even your perfecting" (xiii. 9, R.V.).

The word translated 'perfecting' here is katartisis, which is cognate with katartizesthe, 'be perfected' in verse 11. This is not the usual word which means maturity as 'let us go on to maturity (perfection)' of Heb. vi. 1. Katartizo is twice rendered mending their nets in Matt. iv. 21 and Mark i. 19. It occurs in Gal. vi. 1 where a believer who is overtaken in a fault is restored. The word means 'restoration to wholeness', and usually there is the thought of rupture in the background.

At Corinth there was certainly rupture and disunity caused by sin and failing, and Paul is concerned to see this lamentable condition remedied and full unity in walk and witness restored. If this was done there would be no need for him to have to deal severely with offenders when he visited them:

> "For this cause I write these things while absent, that I may not when present deal sharply, according to the authority which the Lord gave me for building up, and not for casting down" (xiii. 10, R.V.).

Thus he feels it essential to repeat himself (see x. 8) and warn them again, doubtless hoping that this would be effective, so avoiding another painful confrontation such as had occurred on his second visit. Paul was always desirous of constructive building up. It is a rewarding study to note the contexts which deal with 'edification' which is at the root of all profitable ministry and teaching. It is so easy to tear down and criticize, but it takes a real knowledge of the Word of God together with patience and wisdom to build up believers in the Truth.

We now come to the final exhortation, greetings and benediction in xiii. 11-14:

> "Finally, brethren, farewell. Mend your ways, heed my appeal, agree with one another, live in peace, and the God of love and peace will be with you. Greet one another with a holy kiss. All the saints greet you. The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ and the love of God and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit be with you all" (xiii. 11-14, R.S.V.).

"Be comforted" (verse 11 R.V.). Parakaleo can mean 'be exhorted' or 'be comforted', but in view of the context 'exhort' is better. It could be taken as the middle voice rather than the passive and then it could be rendered 'exhort one another'. The title the 'God of love and peace' is not found elsewhere in the N.T. It is possible that, in view of the fact that the Corinthian failure was due to lack of practical love to the Lord and to one another, that love is linked with peace here.

As in I Cor. xvi. 20, they are advised to greet one another with a holy kiss. This was the recognized form of salutation in those days, very much like shaking hands is today. We are not sure who the saints were who joined with Paul in salutation, as we cannot say with certainty where the Apostle was when he dispatched this letter. In all probability they belonged to one of the Macedonian churches.

Paul, as his custom was, now writes the benediction with its reference to grace, that wonderful gift that was at the heart of all his faithful ministry and witness. He uses a Trinitarian formula, a threefold expression of the Godhead. While the word 'trinity' is not used in the holy Scriptures, yet the fact of it certainly is, whatever those who deny the Lord's deity may say.

And so we come to the end of one of the most personal of Paul's letters, revealing his personality possibly more than any other.

What was the effect of this epistle on the Corinthian church? The answer is we do not know, for Scripture does not give us any indication as to the result. However, forty years later, we have information about the church at Corinth in the letter addressed to it from the Roman church, traditionally known as the first epistle of Clement (of Rome). In it we find that division and anarchy are still in evidence and there is little indication that this church had made much progress towards spiritual maturity. This reminds us of the fact that the apostolic age was not ideal in unity and purity of doctrine and practice as is sometimes asserted. In our booklet, The Early Centuries and the Truth we have sought to show that few really gripped the truth given through the Apostle in his day and the succeeding generations.

If we today are rejoicing in any knowledge of the 'unsearchable riches of Christ' made known through Paul, how thankful we should be and how diligently we should be seeking to make this known to others while the day of grace lasts!

The Love of the Truth

No.1. pp. 58 - 60

This subject with all its ramifications is as vast as the Truth itself, and no article or series of articles could do it justice. It is, nonetheless, a very important subject and deserving of our attention.

In Paul's second epistle to the Thessalonians, chapter ii. 9-13, we read of the parousia of the man of sin, or better, the lawless one:

> "Even him, whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie; that they might be damned (or judged) who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness. But we are bound to give thanks always to God for you, brethren beloved of the Lord, because God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth."

Here, as in similar passages, there is the contrast between the love of the Truth, and the love of a lie. It is important to note that these folk upon whom comes the judgment of believing a lie because they 'received not the love of the truth'. It is not primarily a question of receiving truth, but the desire to know it. It is evidently equally possible to receive the love of a lie. We find those who 'loveth and maketh a lie' classed with "dogs, and sorcerers, and whoremongers, and murderers, and idolaters" in Rev. xxii. 15. It is the intent of the heart which distinguishes the one from the other.

But, bad as all this is, the position becomes the more sinister when we discover that failure to receive the love of the truth results in the condemnation to 'believe the lie'. There are, apart from this reference in this epistle to the Thessalonians, three other Scriptures which speak of the lie.

The first of these is found in John's Gospel:

> "Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do. He was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him. When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own: for he is a liar, and the father of it" (John viii. 44).

When he speaks the lie, he speaks from (or 'out of') his own, and this because he stood not in the truth. Because he stood not in the truth, he is a manslayer from the beginning. So soon as the human race began he was ready with his death-dealing lie, and this because of his previous apostasy from the truth (apostasis has the root thought of 'standing from').

To discover the lie we need to turn back to the beginning of mankind, to the temptation in Eden. There we find the lie is threefold:

> ". . . . . the serpent . . . . . said unto the woman, 'Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden?' And the woman said unto the serpent, 'We may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden: but of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, God hath said, Ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die'. And the serpent said unto the woman, 'Ye shall not surely die: for God doth known that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil'." (Gen. iii. 1-5).

Without considering the distortions of the woman's reply, except to note that to listen to the lie is already to have received the love of it, and to be influenced by it, let us note the serpent's words. In verse 1 it would be better to render the words: "Can it be that God hath said, 'Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden'?". Surely God is not so hard-hearted as that! In our day we are more familiar with the same ploy in such terms as "God is a God of love!", or "Jesus is a kind God". But notice the facts in the previous chapter (ii. 16, 17):

> "And the Lord God commanded the man saying, 'Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die'."

Not only did the serpent seek to distort the character of God, to distort the Word of God, but he also sought to distort man's estimate of himself: "Ye shall be as God".

The Lie consists of a threefold denial of the Truth: the truth about God, the truth of what God has said, and the truth concerning man. For practical purposes the lie is that man 'is as God': man forms his own opinion of the character of God; man judges the Word of God; man thinks of himself as answerable only to himself.

In the next study we shall see the outworking of this as outlined by Paul in the first chapter of the epistle to the Romans—"they received not the love of the truth".

No.2. The Lie in Rom. i.
pp. 79, 80

The second of the references to the lie to which we make reference is Rom. i. 25:

> "Who changed the truth of God into a (the) lie, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, Who is blessed for ever."

"Since they changed the truth of God for the lie." The result of this exchange is, that those who make this exchange now worship and serve the creature or created thing rather than the Creator. The creature seems to specify one created thing as being the object of fallen man's worship, and the suggestion of the serpent in Eden points to man himself: "ye shall be as Elohim (God as Creator)" (Gen. iii. 5). From that point on, until the climax is reached in the worship of the Man of Sin, man has put himself first in all his thoughts and schemes. Sometimes this has been distorted by the fact that man has made himself gods in the likeness of "birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things" (Rom. i. 23), but such gods were 'man-like' in their conduct, desires and the forms of worship employed. As has been said "God made man in His own image, and ever since man has made God in his own image".

But the thought of creature-worship is not yet exhausted. For in worshipping man, and creating man-like gods, man has followed the injunction of Satan to be 'like God'. So that in worshipping himself and gods made in his own image, man has in reality been worshipping Satan, and in submitting to Satan has based his whole way of life upon the lie.

They 'worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator'. While the A.V. is correct in its thought here, the word for 'more than' (para) is rather illuminating. It signifies 'alongside, leaving on one side'. It is not only those who 'worship and serve the creature more than the Creator'; but also those who do so alongside the Creator. God's demands are total, and to seek to worship the creature (in whatever form) is in fact to leave God on one side. This is made clear in the first two Commandments:

> "I am the Lord thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage. Thou shalt have no other gods before Me (before My face). Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth. Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them: for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God . . . . ." (Exod. xx. 2-5).

"Thou shalt have no other gods before My face." The expression 'before My face' or before the Lord elsewhere has the significance of being in rebellion. Gen. x. 9 speaking of Nimrod says:

> "He was a mighty hunter before the Lord: wherefore it is said, even as Nimrod the mighty hunter before the Lord."

The Companion Bible note at this point is "before = in defiance of" and refers to Genesis vi. 11 "The earth also was corrupt before God, and the earth was filled with violence". So to have any other 'god' instead of, or alongside the Creator is to be 'in defiance of' the true God, and assuredly leads to 'corruption' and 'violence' as a reading of Rom. i. makes clear. The same chapter of Romans also makes clear the awful result of persistence in this defiance: "God gave them up".

No.3. The Lie in Rom. i. (continued).

In our last study we saw that the lie does not necessarily involve the outright rejection of God as Creator, but does involve the worship of something from the created order alongside God. This is rebellion, and leads inevitably on to 'corruption' and 'violence', as a result of which 'God gave them up'.

They 'changed the truth of God into the lie', but those who did so, and do so, first 'hold the truth in unrighteousness' (Rom. i. 18). The word for 'hold' (katecho) may have the significance of 'hold fast' (e.g. I Cor. xv. 2 where it is translated 'keep in memory'), or to 'hold down', 'suppress', 'restrain'. With the thought of 'restrain' in mind, it is particularly significant that after having spoken of some who 'received not the love of the truth', in the second epistle to the Thessalonians, Paul then continues (iii. 1) to ask for prayer that 'the word of the Lord may have free course, and be glorified'. In such a situation as that envisaged in the second chapter nothing must be allowed to restrain the 'word of the Lord'. And in the days in which we live we need to have particular care to see that nothing is permitted to restrain the truth, for there are many areas in which the Word of the Lord is both restrained, and suppressed. Further, as we recognize this restraint and suppression the increase in violence and corruption in society today should come as no surprise to us.

In the time of which Paul wrote in the first chapter of the Roman epistle, the restraint upon the suppression of 'the truth of God' resulted, as the A.V. puts it, in that truth being 'changed into a lie'. But can the truth ever be changed into a lie, or even the lie? The word for 'change' in verse 25 is a strong one meaning, perhaps, to *ex*change, or thoroughly to change. It is seldom, in the strategy of Satan that there is an outright exchange of the truth for his lie: he is far more subtle than that. Chapter iii. of Genesis shows how he normally works with the truth, thoroughly changing, or perverting the truth into his lie. He takes the truth, placing it in the context of his lie and altering its meaning. It seems that it would be better to translate the phrase: "changed the truth in the lie".

It may well have been, as some suggest, that in the O.T. record of Baal worship, the worshippers had been persuaded (as some would have us believe today) "we all worship the same God. It's only the name which is different". With the result that the children of Israel not only countenanced Baal worship in others, but adopted it themselves. We have heard so-called Christian missionaries make a similar claim, suggesting that Christians should be willing to learn from other religions. Scriptures makes it plain that 'there is none other Name' and the Lord has stated clearly "My glory will I not give to another". Satan's perversion of the truth is often so persuasive, reasonable and logical. It is difficult to understand how professing Christians, if they have 'received the love of the truth', can make such claims, or accept them.

Those referred to in Rom. i. clearly had not received the love of the truth. Notice the progression (i. 18) men who restrain or suppress the truth, become (i. 23) those who change the glory of the uncorruptible God, and finally (i. 25) change the truth of God in the lie. But notice also the progression of retribution, (i. 24) God gave them up to uncleanness, (i. 26, 27) God gave them up to unnatural lusts, (i. 28) God gave them up (gave them over A.V.) to a reprobate mind: a worthless, base mind, one which will not pass the test. It is the mind described in verse 32:

> "Who knowing the judgment of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them."

This is the ultimate in corruption, the ultimate in the perversion of both conscience and mind. The word for mind (Rom. i. 28) is nous, a word which we use to signify common-sense, intelligence. The perverted, reprobate mind is devoid of common-sense and intelligence, intent on self-destruction and the destruction of others under the guise of being 'liberal' and 'liberated'. It is the mind which rejects the divine order in creation, speaks of the 'equality of the sexes' (cf. i. 26, 27), excuses or even applauds gross perversions condemned in Scripture, and seeks to corrupt the innocent.

Verse 30 in the A.V. describes such as 'haters of God', and clearly in view of verse 32 they are such. But the word used (theostuges) really mean 'hateful to God', and then "Godforsaken". These are not innocents deluded by misrepresentation, they are those who step by step have taken a path in deliberate defiance of what they know of God. "Who knowing the judgment of God" (i. 32): the word is epignontes, acknowledging, or perhaps 'having full knowledge' of the just sentence of God, nevertheless they deliberately continue in their perversity and corruption, and as if that were not bad enough 'have pleasure in' or 'approve of', 'sympathize with' them that do them. This would almost seem to be a stage further than the position outlined in verses 19-21:

> "Because that which may be known of God is manifest in (or among) them; for God hath shewed it unto them. For the invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse: because that, when they knew (came to know) God, they glorified Him not as God."

But here (i. 32) are some who acknowledge, or have full knowledge of God's just sentence. How deserving are such, then, of the hatred of God, how deserving to be God forsaken. And of such the Apostle has already said three times "God gave them up": as we might say "God washed His hands of them".

The Lie in Ephesians.

The third occurrence of 'the lie' comes in Eph. iv. 25,

> "Wherefore putting away lying, speak every man truth with his neighbour."

Putting away, ridding yourselves of the lie, speak each one truth. There is a similar thought in verse 22: "That ye put off concerning the former conversation the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts". That ye get rid of . . . . . the old man, because the old nature is corrupt according to the desires of the deceit. Again in verse 14 we read:

> "That we henceforth be no more children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive."

The latter phrase could be translated: with a view to the wile of the error. The lie, the deceit, the error: if the believer would be mature in Christ he must be rid of all that concerns the error: 'But speaking the truth in love may grow up (mature) into Him in all things'. Strictly here it is not 'speaking the truth', but, to coin a word, 'truthing': being the truth. The inference is that the truth should be so much to the believer that he is in his daily walk the embodiment of the truth. So with the things of the deceit. The believer should be rid of the deceit through 'the truth in Jesus' (iv. 21). Equally he needs to be rid of the things of the lie, speaking truth. The old man, the old Adamic nature results from the lie, the error and the deceit, whilst the new man results from the truth.

It is a solemn thought that as there is still in the believer the old nature to be rendered ineffective (Rom. vi. 6, where 'destroyed' is rather to drastic), so there is also something of the love of the lie and of the error and of the deceit to be got rid of. The antidote is the truth, and the truth alone. It is a matter of experience that when we are confronted with an aspect of the truth which, for one reason or another, we are not prepared to accept and act upon, there is no further spiritual growth until that truth is received.

First and foremost we need to receive the love of the truth. "Love" is the same word (agape) which is used of God's love: our attitude to the truth should be the attitude to the truth God has, to be as concerned for the truth as God is concerned for it. This may lead into costly paths, but the alternative is to take the first steps on a path of which we have been thinking earlier in this article, a path trod by those 'who knowing the judgment of God' nevertheless persist in going their own way, which is the way of the lie. That there were those in the early days who were at least associated with the believers is clear from Titus i. 16, "They profess that they know God; but in works they deny Him, being abominable, and disobedient, and unto every good word reprobate".

The love of the truth: fundamentally this must mean the love of the Lord Himself, Who is The Truth. If we have begun to understand the meaning of Phil. ii. 5-11, how can we not love Him? And if we love Him how can we not love the truth whereby we come to know Him better and love Him more?

No.4. The Lie in II Thess. ii.
pp. 112 - 116

The second chapter of the second epistle to the Thessalonians briefly speaks of the time when the Lie will come into its own as never before. Bad as the situation outlined in Rom. i. may seem, it will be outmatched by that referred to by Paul here. Satan's Lie, which made its first appearance in Eden (Gen. iii.) will come to fruition.

Had Israel fulfilled the conditions presented to them, the days of which Paul speaks in this epistle could have approached in a comparatively short time. But Israel finally rejected the offer of their King and the earthly kingdom, and in turn were themselves laid aside by God. It is important to be clear that Paul writes to those who are believers: many today assume the epistles were written to all men, and in so doing encourage the growth of the Lie. But it is clear to whom he is writing: "unto the church of the Thessalonians in God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ" (i. 1), "We are bound to thank God always for you . . . . . because that your faith groweth exceedingly" (i. 3). When, then, he begins chapter ii. with a warning, it is a warning to believers. It is a warning believers today would do well to heed as the situation of which he warns once more draws near, this time to find fulfillment.

He warns first of the danger of being 'shaken in mind, or frightened (the word has the root meaning of 'cry aloud, shriek', hence 'frighten'), neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter as from us' (ii. 2). So he continues in verse 3 "Let no man deceive you by any means". The word he uses for 'deceive' means 'to deceive thoroughly, seduce', and in the phrase he employs a double negative by way of emphasis. Paul wants his readers to understand very clearly the reality of the danger that they, believers though they were, could be deceived. Just what he means when he warns against being deceived 'by spirit', or better 'by spiritual', may be difficult to decide; but it would seem likely to link up with the lying power, signs and wonders of verse 9. It may well be that Paul had in mind a 'spiritual' communication which purported to come from him from a spirit (rather than spiritual) source, a warning many today might heed to their spiritual well-being.

The reason he gives for this warning is 'for that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first'. The word for 'falling away' is apostasia, apostasy, with the strong inference that the spiritual or spirit communication would be one resulting from the apostasy. Here was (and is) the danger: a brother respected for his godliness hitherto has now been carried away from the purity of the faith, influenced by the Lie. How easy then for the unthinking to continue to follow his teaching. Let no one deceive you by any means at all, says the Apostle.

This apostasy will pave the way for the revelation of the Man of Sin in whom Satan's original Lie finds its fulfillment. He sets himself an adversary to God, exalting himself above all that is called God, sitting in the Temple of God, pointing himself out as God to be worshipped (verse 4)—man deified.

Paul then continues (verse 9) to speak of 'the lawless one', 'whose coming is after the working of Satan'. This one's coming will be energized by Satan in every lying power and sign and wonder, with every form of deceit. Here is the danger; for to deceive, this power, these signs and wonders, must purport and appear to be genuine. There would be little purpose in warning believers of miraculous occurrences which were obviously of the Lie. Paul warned the Corinthians of some:

> "For such are false apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ. And no marvel; for Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light. Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as the ministers of righteousness" (II Cor. xi. 13-15).

Yet whilst appearing as ministers of righteousness, their works are with every form of deceit.

"And with all deceit of unrighteousness for them that are perishing" (II Thess. ii. 10 R.V.). This 'because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved', where 'because' is the translation of a Greek term having the force of 'in return for which'. That is to say an exchange took place: they exchanged the love of the truth for every form of deceit. This must surely remind us of a Scripture we have already considered in this study: "who changed the truth of God into a Lie, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator" (Rom. i. 25). This is precisely what those of whom Paul speaks will do. Having failed to receive the love of the truth, they will accept the Man of Sin in his claims to which Paul makes reference in verse 4.

Because of this, "God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe (the) lie" (verse 11). But let us be quite clear; it is not God Who deludes them. He merely confirms them in the condition they have chosen. It is of a piece with the Lord hardening Pharaoh's heart, etc. A helpful illustration is found concerning leprosy in Lev. xiii. The leper goes to show himself to the priest who (verse 3) "shall pronounce him unclean". The Companion Bible points out that the Hebrew signifies "shall make him unclean". Clearly the man was a leper, and therefore according to the Law unclean, but his condition and his uncleanness had not been officially confirmed until the priest 'made him unclean'. The point is reached with those who receive not the love of the truth where they have gone too far ever to change and God, as it were, officially pronounces them 'deluded'; sending a 'working of error' (strong delusion, A.V.) to the end that they should believe the Lie. Perhaps the significance of the latter statement becomes clearer if we translate it 'to the end that they should trust the Lie'. It is the verb pisteuo, to have faith, trust, to rely on: they rely on the Lie.

Paul is not particularly concerned to teach his readers details of the Second Coming in this passage. He makes it quite clear that he has already given them sufficient teaching on this subject:

> "Remember ye not, that, when I was yet with you, I told you these things?" (verse 5).

His object, as we have already pointed out, is to warn his believing readers against the possibility of deception. Having outlined what will be involved in the revelation and parousia of the Man of Sin, and the consequences which will result to those who received not the love of the truth, he continues:

> "But we are bound to give thanks always to God for you, brethren beloved of the Lord, because God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth" (verse 13).

The believer was chosen, and is chosen, to salvation through reliance on the truth. How can those whose reliance is on the truth be partakers in any way with those whose reliance is in the Lie? Indeed they have been chosen through separation of the Spirit and reliance on the truth. "Those whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder" says the marriage service. Yet how frequently do we find a lack of separation in those who claim to rely on the truth, to have received the love of the truth! Separation and the truth must go together. Perhaps it is not without significance that Paul here puts 'separation of the Spirit' before 'belief of the truth'.

Time and again in Scripture this point is emphasized. John goes so far as to say it is wrong to greet one who does not bring 'this doctrine' of Christ (II John 10). Literally it is "Do not say 'rejoice'."; do not encourage him, having refused him entrance into your house. How easy it is nowadays to say to such a person, "Well, I don't agree with you, I can't have fellowship with you, but you are entitled to your beliefs, God bless you". John continues in the next verse, "For he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds". For this reason Paul is so concerned that his Thessalonian friends should be warned of the possibility of deceit.

Paul writing to Timothy makes a similar point:

> "Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof: from such turn away" (II Tim. iii. 5).

This, like the letter to the Thessalonians, is in the context of 'the last days' (verse 1). Paul returns to the theme again some verses later (II Tim. iv. 1-5). Again it is in the same context: the appearing of the Lord Jesus Christ (verse 1). Here Paul outlines countermeasures to be taken by the man of God. He is to "preach the Word; be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all longsuffering and doctrine" (verse 2). This because there will be those who 'will not endure sound doctrine' but will multiply teachers of the Lie, and will turn from the truth accepting myths (verses 3, 4). But you live soberly . . . . . fully accomplish your ministry (verse 5).

The truth is precious, therefore it is demanding.

No.5. The Lie, and the antidote.
pp. 131 - 135

We have noted the connection of the Lie with the 'last days', and now we wish to think of the development of this falsehood in that closing period of time, with particular reference to the church which is Christ's Body.

In his first letter to Timothy, Paul says:

> "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils" (I Tim. iv. 1).

"Depart" is the Greek word aphistemi, to apostatize or, literally, to stand from, hence to put away, remove, separate, with the additional thought of hindering and frustrating. It is sometimes thought that the apostasy is to be found in the world, but those who are in the world are 'without Christ . . . . . without God' (Eph. ii. 12): how can those in such a condition put away, or remove from the faith? It is, alas, 'believers' the Apostle has in mind. It is to be noted that the 'departure' from the faith is connected with 'seducing spirits, and doctrines of demons'. This suggests a pseudo spiritually—a spirituality which derives from the Lie. How careful should the believer be when confronted with some unusual or new manifestation of spirituality! It is not only those who 'profess and call themselves Christians' who need to be 'led into the way of truth' who are at risk, there is danger for even the genuine believer in these 'perilous times'. Even to Timothy, Paul was constrained to say 'from such turn away' (II Tim. iii. 5), "refuse profane and old wives' fables" (I Tim. iv. 7), "continue thou in the things which thou hast learned" (II Tim. iii. 14).

Paul also warns Timothy:

> "For the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears; and they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables" (II Tim. iv. 3, 4).

It is a sad thing that there are many who only want 'the simple gospel', who look for 'experience', for 'feelings' and excitement rather than 'sound doctrine', of which they are inclined to say 'it is too deep for me'.

"The time will come when they . . . . . will follow their own fancy and gather a crowd of teachers to tickle their ears" (N.E.B.). The criterion of a 'good preacher' today so often is not his faithfulness to the Word of God, but whether what he says is an 'entertainment'. The result of these 'fancies' is that:

> "They shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables" (II Tim. iv. 4).

The word 'fable' occurs only five times in the whole of the N.T., four of them being in the Pastoral Epistles. Three of these are warnings to 'refuse' or not to 'heed' these fables, which are described as 'ministering questions' (I Tim. i. 4), "profane and old wives' (perhaps 'silly' or 'trifling') fables" (I Tim. iv. 7), and classified as 'Jewish' coupled with 'commandments of men' are said to 'turn from the truth' (Titus i. 14). 'Silly' they may be, but they are not to be treated lightly: the consequences of trifling with them are far too serious! It is easy to pour scorn upon the views held by some, but the fact that they are held, and in consequence the truth is being rejected, should remind us of the serious character of even the 'silliest' fable. To some it may seem of small import that there are those who believe in 'the immortality of the soul', the important thing being that they trust in the Lord Jesus Christ for salvation. Yet here is a fable which 'ministers questions, rather than godly edifying', a fable which 'turns from the truth' in that it is part of Satan's original lie: "Ye shall not surely die" (Gen. iii. 4), in direct contradiction of God's clear statement "Ye shall surely die" (Gen. ii. 17).

Against such background of the Lie, aspects of which may from time to time appear rather trifling, Timothy is exhorted 'Take heed unto thyself, and unto the doctrine' (I Tim. iv. 16), "Hold fast the form of sound words" (II Tim. i. 13), rightly to divide the word of truth (II Tim. ii. 15), "continue thou in the things which thou hast learned and hast been assured of, knowing of whom thou hast learned them" (II Tim. iii. 14), and in II Tim. iv. 2:

> "Preach the word; be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all longsuffering and doctrine."

The emphasis is clear: 'doctrine', 'the form of sound words', 'the word of truth', 'the things which thou hast learned', 'the word'. Similarly Titus is told to 'speak thou the things which become sound doctrine'. In terms of our subject all these injunctions could be summed up 'love the truth'.

Timothy is bidden 'preach the word; be instant in season, out of season'. Proclaim the word: be a herald of the word, give public notice of it. Timothy was not to hide his light under a bushel! He was to make it known publicly. He was to be instant, the Greek word is ephistemi: stand upon, stand by. This in contrast to those who depart (aphistemi) from the faith (I Tim. iv. 1). The New English Bible (N.E.B.) translates:

> "proclaim the message, press it home on all occasions, convenient or inconvenient."

Moffatt renders it:

> "preach the word; keep at it in season and out of season."

There were those who did, and those who would 'stand apart from' the faith and the Word; but these were of those who 'received not the love of the truth'. Those who receive the love of the truth will take their stand upon the Word, and stand by it at all times regardless of personal convenience.

The faithful proclamation of the Word is with purpose:

> "reprove, rebuke, exhort with all longsuffering and doctrine."

This is to be done 'in season, out of season'. Of the two words 'reprove' and 'rebuke' the Companion Bible's note includes this: "The difference between these two Greek words is that the former means to bring to conviction, ... while the latter can be used of unjust or ineffectual rebuke . . . . .". The object of the faithful proclamation of the Word is to convict and so convince, but the ineffectual preaching is no cause to refrain, but rather calls for exhortation: an appeal to the hearer by way of exhortation, encouragement or comfort. There may be no quick result. Patience and longsuffering will be necessary. Appeal must always be through doctrine, or teaching. The exhortation of verse 2 begins with the Word and concludes with teaching. The proclamation of the Word of God has no place in it for the studied appeal to the emotions: the appeal is always the teaching of Scripture. Then, it may be, there will be a response by the emotions: but the intent has been the proclamation of the Word, not the deliberate stirring of the emotions.

"But watch thou in all things" (verse 5). The word translated 'watch' occurs six times altogether, and apart from this instance is always rendered 'sober'. The N.E.B. puts it: "But you yourself must keep calm and sane at all times". The N.I.V. has it: "But you, keep your head in all situations". Stability is needed in those seeking to combat the Lie, undue emotionalism has its place with deceitfulness. But the one who faithfully stands by the Word must be prepared to 'endure afflictions', suffer misfortune, bear hardship patiently whether these things come by way of force of circumstances, or by the evil intent of others.

Timothy is also exhorted to 'do the work of an evangelist'. It would seem possible that Timothy's main task was that of teaching:

> "And the servant of the Lord must not strive; but be gentle unto all men, apt (able) to teach, patient, in meekness instructing (training) those that oppose themselves" (IITim.ii.24,25).

None the less he was not to neglect the opportunities of telling the good news. Indeed, he was to 'discharge all the duties of your ministry' (N.I.V.).

In the face of world events, and of developments in the church, in the broad sense of the word, there can be little doubt that, if we are not yet in 'the latter days' we must be very near to them indeed. Very many of the indications of those days are in evidence, and we who profess to have received the love of the truth may learn much from the instructions given by Paul to Timothy. Truth, the Word, doctrine or teaching figure large. He is to guard the good deposit: "that which is committed to thy trust" (I Tim. vi. 20), "that good thing which was committed unto thee" (II Tim. i. 14). In proclaiming the Word he is to 'stand by or upon' it, he is to be 'sober' in everything. He is to continue, stay, in the things he has learned and of which he has been assured, recognizing that all Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and therefore is profitable for all that the man of God needs to be fitted and equipped for God's purpose for him. In all this he is to be diligent to gain God's approval, having no shame as he rightly divides the Word of truth.

In the perilous times in which we live, may we all be alive to the dangers, and receiving the love of the truth, uphold it 'in season, and out of season'.

No.6. The Spirit of the Truth.
pp. 151 - 155

The expression 'the Spirit of truth' (literally: the Spirit of the truth), occurs four times in the N.T., all of them in John's writings. Three are in the Gospel of John, and the fourth in his first epistle. In the latter reference (I John iv. 6) is contrasted "the Spirit of truth, and the spirit of error": ". . . . . of the truth . . . . . of the error". In Eph. ii. 2 the identity of "the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience" is revealed as 'the prince of the power of the air'. Later in the same epistle reference is made to 'the wile of the error' (Eph. iv. 14, where the last phrase would better be rendered 'with a view to the wile of the error'), and the wile of the error is shown in chapter vi. 11 to be 'the wiles of the devil'. Thus far in our studies on this subject we have been concerned with the activities of 'the prince of the power of the air', 'the spirit of error' and the author of the Lie. In this article we wish to consider the Spirit of the Truth.

Turning to the first reference to the Spirit of the truth in John's Gospel (xiv. 16, 17), we read:

> "And I will pray the Father, and He shall give you another Comforter, that He may abide with you for ever; even the Spirit of truth; Whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth Him not, neither knoweth Him: but ye know Him; for He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you."

The Spirit of the Truth is revealed as 'another Comforter'. The word 'other' (allos) has the significance of "another of the same kind (denoting numerical distinction). The second of two where there may be more" (Appendix 124, Companion Bible). It is clear this 'other' Comforter is identified with a 'former' Comforter, inasmuch as 'ye know Him; for He dwelleth with you'. "With" (Gk. para) signifying 'beside'. The 'other' Comforter is none other than the Lord Himself.

The world is not able to receive the 'other' Comforter because it has not received Christ. We might paraphrase part of verse 17 in this way: "the world is not able to comprehend Him, because it does not see ('seeth' assumes actual presence) Him, neither comes to know Him". The apostles had received Christ, and would therefore be able to receive His Spirit, the Spirit of the Truth, when He came. After Pentecost the converse was true:

> "Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of His" (Rom. viii. 9).

The apostles having loved Christ were able to receive His Spirit; now no man can love Christ without having received His Spirit, and Christ is the Truth (John xiv. 6). To claim to trust in Christ, to love Him, is to claim to have received His Spirit, the Spirit of the Truth. Thus every believer claims to have received the love of the Truth. The condemnation of II Thess. ii. 10-12 is not for believers.

Nevertheless Paul is at pains to protect the Thessalonian believers from deception (II Thess. ii. 1-3), as we have already seen. There are also similar warnings to believers of the present dispensation as has been pointed out in earlier studies. Although not yet having reached its peak, the Lie abounds today as perhaps never before in history. How much we need to heed the warnings of Scripture! How much we need the help and protection God has provided for us.

The Spirit of the Truth is the Comforter. The N.I.V. translates it as "Counsellor". In I John ii. 1 it is rendered 'advocate'—"we have an Advocate with the Father". It seems there has been some difficulty in supplying an English equivalent which will fully convey the meaning of the original. It has been said that an early translator coined the word Comforter from the Latin 'con' and 'forte', meaning 'with strength', but the thought of the Holy Spirit as the Strengthener seems to fall short of the full meaning. It is generally agreed that the Greek parakletos literally means 'one called alongside to help', an advocate; but in our understanding of 'advocate' nothing more than an intercessor or mediator is signified. The Comforter was to be 'another Christ' to the disciples, and only the four Gospels are a sufficient commentary on His relationship with them. He had been to them Counsellor, Strengthener, Encourager, Reprover, Guide, Teacher, and much else besides Mediator. Such an One is the Spirit of Truth to the believer. He encourages us as when He 'bears witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God' (Rom. viii. 16), He helps when 'we know not what we should pray for as we ought', then 'the Spirit Himself maketh intercession for us' (Rom. viii. 26).

"I will not leave you comfortless: I will come to you" said the Lord (John xiv. 18). "I will not leave you orphans", literally: the disciples would not be left bereft of all He had been to them. This is underlined by the remaining two references to the Spirit of the Truth in John's Gospel:

> "When the Comforter is come . . . . . even the Spirit of truth . . . . . He shall testify of Me" (xv. 26).
>
> "When He, the Spirit of truth, is come, He will guide you into all truth: for He shall not speak of Himself; but whatsoever He shall hear, that shall He speak: and He will shew you things to come. He shall glorify Me: for He shall receive of mine, and shall shew it unto you" (xvi. 13, 14).

The complete ministry of Christ as 'Comforter' would be undertaken by the Spirit of the Truth: He would completely 'mediate' the presence of Christ to the believer.

Against a background of hatred, rejection and persecution by the world (John xv. 18-21), when the faith of the disciples might be shaken, "That One shall bear witness concerning Me" (xv. 26). Because 'sorrow hath filled your heart' on learning that their Lord was returning to the Father, He would guide them into all the truth they would need, would make known to them the coming things, and, above all, would glorify their Lord. "Sorrow" (xvi. 6), is probably not strong enough: the root thought is of pain:

their hearts were filled with pain, with anguish at the thought that their Lord was leaving them. But it was 'expedient', profitable to them that He should go away, for then He would send the Comforter to them, and He would abide with them for ever (xiv. 16).

Although the circumstances are different, yet we need the same ministrations of the Spirit of the Truth. As the darkness gathers, and the love of many grows cold, we too would be 'bereft' without His ministry, but through His presence in our hearts the Lord Himself is with us. We may not yet have reached the stage of active hatred and persecution by the world for His Name's sake, the very indifference of those around us tends to blunt our keenness and contributes to indifference in our own hearts, but the Holy Spirit bears witness to us concerning Christ. Often our hearts are grieved, or they should be, by the indifference to the truth even among believers, then the Spirit of truth leads on into the fullness of truth. Perhaps there are times when we need to be reminded that the darkness and indifference all around are but a part of the coming things, that the dawn cannot come until the night has reached its darkest point. When so many 'glory in the flesh' it is good that the Spirit of the Truth should glorify our Lord to us: when the pressures of life tend to fasten our attention on 'things on the earth' we need the Spirit's aid to 'set our affections on things above'.

The work of the Holy Spirit is essential, and never more so than at the present time. Here the believer needs to heed the warning to 'let no man deceive you', for there are many today who emphasize, and over-emphasize the work of the Holy Spirit: they glory in the Holy Spirit, they glory in what they claim are His gifts to them. The Holy Spirit, the Spirit of the Truth glories in, and glorifies the Lord Jesus Christ. "He shall not speak of Himself" (John xvi. 13). The mark of the Spirit filled believer is that he glorifies the Lord.

The final reference to the Spirit of truth comes in John's first epistle:

> "We are of God: he that knoweth God heareth us: he that is not of God heareth us not. Hereby know we the Spirit of truth, and the spirit of error" (I John iv. 6).

Those who 'are of God' listen to those who are of God: they have fellowship one with another. They have in common the desire to glorify their Lord, to learn more of Him from their fellow-believers. The spirit of the error, however, has no place for those who are concerned with the truth, and is in fact the 'spirit of antichrist'. It may be that the reason for trying the spirits is today different from that which John had in mind in the fourth chapter of this first epistle, but the spirit of antichrist is as active in the world today as it ever was, and there are as many 'false prophets' (iv. 1). Trusting to the guidance of the Spirit of the Truth, we must search the Scriptures constantly.

Against the background of docetism: an early heresy which denied the reality of Christ's sufferings on the cross, claiming that He only seemed to suffer, John says:

> "Hereby know ye the Spirit of God: every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God" (iv. 2).

Polycarp paraphrases this: "Everyone that doth not confess that Jesus Christ hath come in the flesh is Antichrist; and whoso doth not confess the mystery of the cross is of the devil". Here is the basis of all truth: that God so loved . . . . . that He gave His only begotten Son. "God commendeth His love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. v. 8). There are many today who, having not received the love of the Truth, deny this fact.

No.7. The Glory of Christ.
pp. 166 - 170

Christ is the Truth. Those who have received the love of the Truth desire to know Him, and to know Him more and more. Something of the importance of this knowledge can be gained from Paul's statement in Phil. iii.:

> "But what things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ. Yea doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: for Whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung, that I may win Christ . . . . . that I may know Him . . . . ." (7-10).

That I may know Christ: the word is ginosko, to obtain knowledge. Yet surely, there is no one who had a greater knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ than Paul. How is it, that this man, with the tremendous knowledge of Christ he obviously had, desired to obtain further knowledge of Him? It is possible Paul had actually seen, even met and spoken to the Lord during His ministry on earth: there are some who take the Apostle's words 'though we have known Christ after the flesh' (II Cor. v. 16) to mean nothing less. But over and above such a possibility, he had met the risen Lord on the Damascus road, he had been given visions and revelations. If Paul's knowledge of the Lord was not complete, whose can be? The answer can only be that the knowledge of Christ is infinite: with all that is implied in such a statement.

Who was, and is this One who claimed to be the Truth? Was He merely a good man, very good man, Who 'lived before His time'? There are many who would so say. Was He the "Firstborn of all creation" in the sense some would have us believe, i.e., He was created by God by Whom creation was effected: the first created being? Was He of some indeterminent nature neither really God, nor really man: a god? Or was He indeed God incarnate, God with us?

This is a subject which has many times been dealt with, both more capably and more fully than we can hope to do. Yet it is a subject of the very greatest importance, and we make no excuse for our own contribution.

There are one or two preliminary remarks we believe to be necessary. In considering the nature of the Lord Jesus Christ, and His relationship with the Father, we are dealing with the self-revelation of the Almighty God and with His nature. He is infinite: we are finite, and our minds simply are not capable of understanding an infinite subject. We can only hope to see 'pointers' which will enable us to realize that while we may not understand, the subject is not irrational. It is a matter of interest that in all the discussions concerning the deity and nature of Christ, in all the writings we have seen, no one has dared to say 'you make too much of Christ', for if Christ is less than fully God in the last analysis the claim that He is God is to make too much of Him. But is it possible to make too much of Him Whom the Holy Spirit's main task is to glorify?

"In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God" (John i. 1). No one seriously disputes that the Word is the Lord Jesus Christ, this is quite clear from what follows. Yet many dispute the statement "the Word was God". Dr. Moffatt mistranslates it "the Logos was divine" (as he similarly mistranslates ITim.iii.16 rendering 'great is the mystery of godliness' as 'profound is the divine truth of our religion'): but then he did not believe in the deity of Christ. Others 'with an axe to grind' put it 'the Word was a god'. Yet little knowledge of Greek is required to realize this is not correct. This 'translation' turns on the fact that in the phrase under consideration the definite article (the) does not appear before 'God'. But the subject of the whole verse is the Word, not primarily God, and the word 'God' in the latter phrase occurs in a position which places emphasis upon it: the Word was God. But there are similar constructions in the same chapter which no one would consider translating in the same way. The result would be nonsense. John i. 6, there was a man sent from a god; verse 12, power to become sons of a god; verse 14, as of the only begotten of a father. The statement is plainly and clearly "the Word was God".

"And the Word was with God": 'with' is the preposition pros, of which The Companion Bible says it implies 'personal presence and relation'. That is to say, if we are to accept that the Word was a god, then a god was personally present with God. Yet in Deut. xxxii. 39 Jehovah clearly states 'and there is no god with Me'. If the Word is a god, then He obviously was never with God, or Jehovah is lying.

There are many scriptures which identify Jehovah with the Lord Jesus Christ, Isa. xlviii. 11, 12 (see also xli. 4; xlii. 8; xliv. 6) states:

> ". . . . . I will not give My glory unto another . . . . . I am the first, I also am the last."

Compare this with Rev. i. 8, 17:

> "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty."
> ". . . . . I am the first and the last."

The speaker is 'one like unto the Son of man', a Being, from John's description, glorious almost beyond words. He claims to be 'the Almighty' and 'the first and the last'.

Similarly in Rev. xxii. 13 (where the speaker identifies Himself, verse 16 "I Jesus"):

> "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last."

Again in Isa. xlv. 21, 23:

> ". . . . Have not I the Lord? and there is no God else beside Me; a just God and a Saviour; there is none beside Me . . . . . I have sworn by Myself, the word is gone out of My mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, that unto Me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear."

Compare this with Phil. ii. 10, 11:

> "That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father."

If there is any difference, greater glory appears to be given to Jesus Christ than to Jehovah! But "My glory I will not give unto another".

Both Jehovah and Christ are identified as Creator. Isaiah records:

> "For thus saith the Lord that created the heavens; God Himself that formed the earth and made it; . . . . . I an the Lord; and there is none else" (xlv. 18).

Jehovah claims to have created: I the Lord and none else. Yet John i. 3 says of the Word:

> "All things were made by Him; and without Him was not any thing made that was made."

Jehovah exclusively created: the Word, Who is none other than Jesus Christ, exclusively created. Either the two are one, or the Bible is completely unreliable and false. Similarly Paul writes:

> "Who is the image of the invisible God, the Firstborn of all creation; for in Him were all things created, in the heavens and upon the earth, things visible and things invisible . . . . . all things have been created through Him, and unto Him; and He is before all things, and in Him all things consist" (Col. i. 15-17, R.V.).

Even though it is beyond our understanding, somehow the Word must be "God Himself", somehow 'the image of the invisible God' must be 'God Himself'.

Salvation and redemption also are both attributed to Jehovah and to Christ:

> "I, even I, am the Lord (Jehovah); and beside Me there is no saviour" (Isa. xliii. 11).
> "Yet I am the Lord (Jehovah) thy God from the land of Egypt, and thou shalt know no god but Me: for there is no saviour beside Me" (Hosea xiii. 4).

Ample evidence is to be found in the N.T. to support this identification. In his first letter to Timothy, Paul refers only to 'God our Saviour' (I Tim. i. 1; ii. 3), and to the 'living God, Who is the Saviour of all men' (iv. 10): in the second epistle to Timothy it is 'our Saviour Jesus Christ' (i. 10). Most significant are the references to "Saviour" in Titus:

> "God our Saviour (or, our Saviour God)" i. 3.

"the Lord Jesus Christ our Saviour" i. 4.
"God our Saviour" ii. 10.
"the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ" ii. 13.
"God our Saviour" iii. 4.
"Jesus Christ our Saviour" iii. 6.

It will be noticed that the concept of God as Saviour alternates with that of Jesus Christ. A better translation of ii. 13, and attested to by J. N. Darby, R.V., R.S.V., Weymouth, N.E.B., and others, is even more significant: "our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ".

To both Jehovah and Christ is ascribed by Scripture, Creatorship, Almightiness, the ultimate worship of all created beings and Saviourship: each of which is claimed by Jehovah exclusively. These are facts evidently accepted without question by early believers. Only when the appearance of heresy made it necessary was there any attempt at definition. Yet by definition the Infinite is indefinable.

No.8. The Glory of Christ (2).
pp. 186 - 191

In our last study on this very important subject we saw that Scripture ascribes to both Jehovah and Christ, Creatorship, Almightiness, Saviourship and the ultimate worship of all created beings.

We now turn, briefly, to the testimony of those around the Lord during His earthly ministry. A week after the resurrection, the disciples were gathered together in the Upper Room, together with Thomas, who had indicated his refusal to believe apart from the evident of the wounds. When the Lord stood in the midst and confronted Thomas with both his unbelief and the evidence Thomas had desired, he could only say "My Lord and my God" (John xx. 28). An 'explanation' of the significance of this statement by some who deny the deity of Christ is that having said "My Lord" looking at the Lord Jesus, he then turned his eyes heavenward and continued "and my God!" The literal translation of Thomas' statement is "The Lord of me and the God of me", and would seem to be conclusive of the intent behind his words.

There were others, far more hostile to the Lord, who had no doubt of the claims He made. At the feast of the dedication, when the Lord Jesus was walking in the Temple in Solomon's porch, the Jews came to Him and asked:

> "How long dost Thou make us to doubt? If Thou be the Christ, tell us plainly" (John x. 24).

Following His reply to them we read:

> "Then the Jews took up stones again to stone Him" (verse 31).

Their reply to His question as to why they wished to stone Him was:

> "For a good work we stone Thee not; but for blasphemy; and because that Thou, being a man, makest Thyself God" (verse 33).

The Jews did not understand His claim to mean 'a god'! They were acting in (what they considered to be) obedience to Lev. xxiv. 16:

> "And he that blasphemeth the name of Jehovah, he shall surely be put to death, and all the congregation shall certainly stone him: as well the stranger, as he that is born in the land, when he blasphemeth the name of Jehovah, shall be put to death."

It is clear from the Ten Commandments that only God Himself can claim to be God, and be 'guiltless':

> "Thou shalt have no other gods before Me" (1st Commandment, Exod. xx. 2).
> "Thou shalt not take the name of Jehovah thy God in vain; for Jehovah will hot hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain" (3rd Commandment, Exod. xx. 7).

In the eyes of the Jews the Lord Jesus Christ had been misusing the name of Jehovah, their God. Hence He must be stoned.

There is a considerable volume of further evidence such as we have been considering. What can be made of the statement in Isa. xliv. 6,

> "Thus saith Jehovah the King of Israel, and His redeemer Jehovah of Hosts; I am the first, and I am the last; and beside Me there is no God."

Here it is also noteworthy that Jehovah of Hosts is the kinsman-redeemer. Does God need a kinsman-redeemer? The context seems to make it clear that the kinsman-redeemer is needed by Israel. Here is (if we may so put it) a Jehovah who is kinsman to a human nation. That same One, with Jehovah the King, makes the claim (with which we have already dealt) "I am the first, and I am the last; and beside Me there is no God": not "We are the first", etc.

Again, in Zech. xiv. of the coming of the day of the Jehovah, and in verse 3 we are told:

> "Then shall Jehovah go forth, and fight against those nations . . . . . (and verse 4) And His feet shall stand in that day upon the mount of Olives . . . . .".

With these statements compare Rev. xix. 11-16, and Acts i. 11. The Lord Jesus Christ will return to the Mount of Olives, and it will be He Who goes 'forth to fight against those nations'. The conclusion must be that here, again, Jesus Christ and Jehovah are one and the same.

The use of the word 'person' in connection with the definition of the relationship between Father, Son and Holy Spirit has not been helpful, for 'person' in modern usage signifies 'individual'. This, however, was not the significance of the Latin 'persona'; persona was the mask an actor wore in a play to represent the character he depicted. That is to say the persona, or mask, was a representation. Taking the Latin word in that significance the three persons of the Godhead are three representations of the Godhead. This same Latin word is used in modern psychology for 'the aspect of the personality that is presented to the outside world'. The persons of the "Trinity" are aspects of the Godhead that are presented to the outside world. In other words the 'persons' of the Godhead are aspects of the One God by which He has chosen to present Himself and to make Himself known.

This leads on to a further misunderstanding concerning the Father. It is generally assumed that the Father is God in His totality: that while the Father is God, the Son and the Holy Spirit, while equally God, are representations of the Father. But God is infinite: when the full conception of God as Father has been exhausted, there must still be much of God beyond. To put it another way, if God, in all His fullness is no more than Father, then He is a Being with limits, He is not infinite. The Father is an aspect of the personality of God, and it is a gracious condescension on His part to be known as "Father".

If God is God, infinite, infinitely greater than man, man can never get to know God by searching, by his own effort. Zophar rightly said to Job (xi. 7) "Canst thou by searching find out God? canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?" It follows then that all attempts to define the nature of God are doomed to failure: they cannot be 'unto perfection'. Man can only get to know God, as God is prepared to reveal Himself, and in and on the terms He Himself lays down. The terms which He in His infinite wisdom has laid down for us are those of Father, Son and Holy Spirit. Why has He specifically limited His self-revelation to these three aspect? Why should He not also reveal Himself as "God our Mother"? A sermon was once preached on Isa. xlix. 15 to show that this is the case: but Isaiah does not say "God is Mother"; he takes maternal love to illustrate the fact that the Love of God is far greater than that of even a nursing mother. We are told that God is 'like a shepherd', and so on. God knows human capacities far, far better than we do: He knows what, and how many 'aspects of His personality' we can best deal with, with our very limited capacity for understanding, and has chosen these three aspects as the ones best suited to be the means whereby He makes Himself known to us.

Moreover the Bible is very largely a Hebrew book, meant primarily for the Hebrew mind. The Hebrew mind had little or no capacity for philosophical concepts, and there are few if any such concepts in the Bible: it is all in picture language. Wisdom is depicted in the book of Proverbs as a woman; God's love as exceeding that of a nursing mother; His care for His People as the care of a shepherd for his own sheep. God has 'pictured' Himself as Father, Son and Holy Spirit. As we study these aspects of Himself, which He has given to us, we get to know Him more and more, in the way He intends that we should. Even so, this is beyond the full comprehension of the human mind—or there would be no necessity for a study such as this! Nor would there be any difficulty for us in understanding the nature of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The concept of God as 'Father' is a condescension on the part of the Almighty. He is infinitely more than Father: if we could fully comprehend all that God as Father means, we would find still more of God beyond that—and so on, without end. The Father IS God, but beyond is infinitely more: the Son IS God, but beyond is the Father.

Because of the nature of this study we cannot speak of 'proofs'; but insofar as the word may justly be used, the final 'proof' must be the inferred identification of Himself by the Lord Jesus Christ, with Jehovah.

> In Exod. iii. 14 "God said unto Moses, I AM THAT I AM . . . . . I AM hath sent unto you."

In John's Gospel the Lord uses the expression "I AM" on a number of occasions, which associated with Jehovah. John x. 11, 14:

> "I am (ego eimi, very emphatic) the good shepherd . . . . .".
> "I am (ego eimi) the good shepherd, and know My sheep."

Surely only one can be described as "the good shepherd", yet, emphatically, the Lord Jesus Christ says "I am the good shepherd". David, in Psa. xxiii., says "The Lord (Jehovah) is my shepherd". This psalm summarizes the title of Jehovah, and it is difficult not to see in the claim "I am the good shepherd" the claim also to the titles of Jehovah.

We refer to only one more of the great ego eimi statements of the Lord Jesus Christ, that recorded in John xviii. 3-8, the arrest of the Lord. In response to His question "Whom seek ye?", those who had come to take Him said "Jesus of Nazareth". To this He said "I am" (the "he" is not in the original), ego eimi. At this 'they went backward, and fell to the ground'. Similarly in verse 8 the Lord again says "I am (ego eimi)". Some try to explain the reaction of the men and officers from the chief priests and Pharisees as simply surprise that the One they had come to arrest should admit to being the One they wanted. Is there really anything in that to call for such an extreme reaction? It seems much more likely that the words were uttered with such authority and majesty that for the moment they were aware of the deity of the One they had come to arrest. Police officers do not normally react to "It's a fair cop" in such an extreme way.

In our apprehension of the deity of the Lord Jesus Christ a great deal depends upon the standpoint from which we approach the subject. If we begin with the babe at Bethlehem, and the man Jesus of Nazareth, then it is impossible for us to begin to understand. How can a man be God? If, on the other hand, we begin with God reaching out to lost mankind, seeking a means of touching them, making Himself known, and redeeming them, the possibility of God becoming man is not so remote. We may not be able to understand; but it is not impossible. The lesser cannot assume the characteristics of the greater; but the greater may well in His Wisdom and for His Purpose assume "the likeness of sinful flesh".

The Miracles in the Gospels.

#1. Introduction & Matt. viii. 1 - 15.
pp. 210 - 215

In earlier numbers of The Berean Expositor we had a series of articles dealing with THE PARABLES of Matthew, and while they touched upon Scriptures which were familiar to all readers, some aspects of their teaching, particularly their dispensational aspect, were set out and proved to be of much help to those beginning their acquaintance with right division of the Word. The present series goes over the ground in more depth.

It may be as well here if we notice the scriptural words and expressions used for miracles in the New Testament:-- DUNAMIS.—An act of power. The English dynamo, dynamite and dynamics have power as their dominant note.

SEMEION.—A sign. Used chiefly by John.
TERAS.—A wonder, a prodigy, something which strikes terror. John iv. 48 and Acts ii. 22 are the only references to Christ, the remaining fourteen occurrences are used of false christs, the Apostles, and Moses.
ERGON.—A work. The miracles are spoken of as the work of God, good works, and works which none other man did.
EUDOXIA.—Glorious things (Luke xiii. 17).
PARADOXIA.—Strange things (Luke v. 26).
THAUMASIA.—Wonderful things (Matt. xxi. 15).

Many of the miracles of Christ were miracles of healing. Never did He work a miracle of judgment upon a son of man. The withered fig-tree and the destruction of the herd of swine are the nearest approaches to miracles of judgment, but in neither case did they touch a human being. On the contrary, the blind receive their sight, the dumb speak, the deaf hear, lepers are cleansed, and infirmities are cured. Even the dead are brought back to life again, thousands are fed with a few loaves and fishes, and the marriage at Cana is graced by His miraculous provision. The winds and waves obey the voice of the Lord, the fish of the sea yield themselves to the net, or to pay the tribute at His command; demons and evil spirits are cast out, and the possessed set free. On two occasions the Lord passed through a crowd unseen.

The first record of miracles in the gospels is that of Matt. iv. 23, 24:--

"And Jesus went about all Galilee, TEACHING in their synagogues, and PREACHING the gospel of the kingdom, and HEALING all manner of sickness, and all manner of disease among the people, and His fame went throughout Syria, and they brought unto Him all sick people that were taken with divers diseases and torments, and those which were possessed with demons, and those which were lunatick, and those that had the palsy;
AND HE HEALED THEM."

The result of these mighty works was that:--

> "there followed Him great multitudes of people from Galilee, and from Decapolis, and from Jerusalem, and from Judea, and from beyond Jordan" (verse 25).

A glance at the map shows that thus early in the Lord's ministry His mighty works were known throughout the length and breadth of the land. It is important to observe the setting in which these miracles were wrought. The miracles were not mere exhibitions of power, neither were they performed to strike terror into the observers, for they were all of one character, viz., miracles of healing, and attracted followers from all parts of the country. The miracles formed a supplement to TEACHING and PREACHING. The last reference to miracles in the Gospel narratives says the same thing, "and they went forth and PREACHED everywhere, the Lord WORKING with them, and confirming the WORD with signs following" (Mark xvi. 20). Again, in Matt. x., we find the same connection, "As ye go, PREACH, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand, heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out demons". Yet again the necessary association of preaching and miracles is implied in Matt. xi., "He departed thence to TEACH and to PREACH in their cities". The object (or at least a prominent object) with which the miracles were wrought is given in Matt. xi. 20, "then began He to upbraid the cities wherein most of His mighty works were done, because they repented not". The close connection between the miracles and the testimony is also indicated in Matt. xiii. 58, "He did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief". Matthew ix. 35 presents a practical repetition of Matt. iv. 23, as the reader can observe, and should be read in connection with the commission of Matthew x.

One of the characteristic accompaniments of the preaching of the gospel of the kingdom was the presence of evidential miracles. One of the characteristic features of the preaching of the Mystery concerning the Body of Christ is the absence of miracles. We might notice the extent of the miraculous healing given in Matt. iv. 23, 24, "healing all manner of sickness and all manner of disease"; "all sick people that were taken with divers diseases, and torments, and those which were possessed with demons, and those who were lunatick, and those who had the palsy, and He healed them ALL". The details are given more fully as the narrative advances, and when we see the complete list of the mighty works that are recorded in the Gospels we shall begin to realize what a confirmation is given to His ministry; and when we add to that the testimony of John xxi. 25, "there are also many other things which Jesus DID, the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written", the confirmation of His Messiahship must have been overwhelming. Yet they crucified Him! Yet they repented not! What a testimony then to the nature of the human heart.

(Miracles10, pp.9-11).

The Leper, the Centurion's Servant, and Peter's Wife's Mother (Matt. viii. 1 - 15).

After the record of Matt. iv. 23, 24 the Lord ascended a mountain and taught. Teaching begins the chapter and teaching is the last thing spoken of in Matt. vii. 28, 29, viz., "sayings", "doctrine (or teaching)", and "taught as one having authority". Mighty words on the mountain are immediately followed by mighty works in the valley, "When He was come down from the mountain, great multitudes followed Him, and behold there came a leper". The three miracles that are recorded in Matt. viii. 1-15 are suggestive of much teaching.

The Leper.	Israel.
The Lord touched him.
The Centurion's Servant.	The Gentile.
Healing at a distance.
His faith compared with that of Israel.
Peter's Wife's Mother.	A Woman.
The Lord touched her.

The Pharisee in his prayer thanked God that he was not born (1) a Gentile, (2) a slave, or (3) a woman, which position of "splendid isolation" is gloriously done away "in Christ" for Gal. iii. 28 shows that there is

(1). Neither Jew nor Greek.	The Gentile.
(2). Neither bond nor free.	The Slave.
(3). Neither male nor female.	The Woman.

Here in these three opening miracles the Lord breaks through many traditional barriers; He touched a leper! He healed a Gentile! He healed a woman! There is a dispensational lesson here which the reader should observe, as well as a moral one. Both the leper and the woman were healed by personal contact; the Gentile, however, was healed at a distance. This peculiarity comes out again in Matt. xv. 21-28; in both cases, too, reference is made to the great faith of the Gentile.

Going back again to the first of these miracles, let us see for what the leper prayed, "Lord, if Thou wilt, Thou canst make me CLEAN". The response equally insists upon the same thought, "immediately his leprosy was CLEANSED". The command that followed still keeps cleansing uppermost, "show thyself to the priest, and offer the gift that Moses commanded for a testimony unto them".

Lev. xiv. contains the intensely instructive "law of the leper in the day of his cleansing". Christ's dying and rising again is clearly set forth; the cleansed leper is atoned for by the blood, and re-consecrated by the oil. Here in the leper may be seen Israel's condition before God, "no soundness, but wounds, bruises and putrifying sores". The leper's condition cut him off from worship and service, rendering him quite unfit for any act of ministry in any shape or form; such was Israel—Israel that was destined to be a kingdom of Priests, Israel of whom the Gentile will yet say, "They are the ministers unto our God"; Israel a leper.

The two questions that appear in this miracle are those concerning the Lord's power and will. Of the Lord's power the leper had no doubt, "If thou wilt, thou canst". The Lord alone could decide the question of willingness, and He did so, saying, "I will, be thou clean". Think for a moment of a mere man, confronted by the awful plague of leprosy (incurable still in this day of medical knowledge), daring to say, "I will". The One before Whose will leprosy flees away at a word, Who can say, "Be thou clean", is the same One Who uttered the words recorded in Gen. i., "Let there be light, and there was light". The miracle is full of prophetic hope for the uncleansed nation. He Who was and is their Messiah is both ABLE ("thou canst"), and WILLING ("I will"), and in God's good time the leper will be cleansed and receive the anointing oil of re-consecration. After Israel's cleansing will follow that of the Gentiles; this is the consistent theme of prophecy, type and doctrine:--

> "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law . . . . . that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ" (Gal. iii. 13-14).
>
> '"Saying unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all kindreds of the earth be blessed. Unto you first, God, having raised up His Son Jesus, sent Him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities" (Acts iii. 25, 26).

The cleansing of the leper by personal touch is followed by the healing of the centurion's servant by a word spoken at a distance. The Lord is no sooner acquainted with the servant's condition, than the gracious willingness is again made manifest. Before the request is actually made the Lord said, "I will come and heal him"; then follows an exhibition of faith so great that it is written of the Lord that He marveled. On only one other occasion is it recorded that the Lord "marveled", but then it was at the "unbelief" of those who were of His own country, and kin and house (Mark vi. 6).

The words of the centurion reveal how clearly he recognized the Lord as the SENT ONE. All who see Him thus will be brought to the same estimate of themselves, "I am not worthy that Thou shouldest come under my roof". Then come the words of faith that cause the Lord to marvel, "but speak the words only, and my servant shall be healed". What a contrast with another military Gentile—Naaman, who said, "behold, I thought he will surely come out to me, and stand, and call on the name of the Lord his God, and move his hand up and down over the place".

(Miracles10, pp.42-46).

Much more needs to be said on these three important miracles and comment will continue in the next issue.

#2. Matt. viii. 1 - 15 (continued).
pp. 225 - 228

It is remarkable how much teaching lies beneath the words and selection of incidents that the Holy Spirit has guided the writers of the Gospels into recording from our Lord's ministry. Before reading this article it would be profitable to go over again the previous one that displayed the features linking these three miracles.

Great faith can dispense with all means and accessories, and can rely on "the word only". It was faith indeed on the leper's part to say to the Lord, "if thou wilt, thou canst", but it was greater faith for the centurion to dare to decline the personal visit of the Lord and rest confidently in His spoken word. We suggest that he recognized Christ as the Sent One, because of his added explanation. He said more than the A.V. records; not merely did he say, "for I am a man under authority", but he said, "for I ALSO am a man under authority". The fact that he was under authority gave authority to his words; he said to a soldier, "Go, and he goeth", and the authority under which he himself was placed gave, in its turn, all the weight to his commands. So with the Lord, He spoke not His own words, but the Father's; the works He did He declared were not His, but the Father's that sent Him. The whole of John's Gospel rings with the fact that Christ was the Sent One. The healing of the centurion's servant was John v. 24 in tableau,

> "He that heareth My word ('speak the word only'), and believeth on Him that sent Me ('for I also am a man under authority'), hath everlasting life."

The words of Christ that follow show that the miracle was connected, in some way at least, with teaching:--

> "I say unto you that many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven, but the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness, there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth" (Matt. viii. 11, 12).

The centurion's faith was real and strong, for the Lord said:--

> "Go thy way, and as thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee, and his servant was healed in the selfsame hour" (Matt. viii. 13).

The parallel record in Luke vii. 1-10 should be read. The Companion Bible considers this a second miracle of healing, suggesting that the Lord had blessed the centurion before (Matt. viii. 12, 13), i.e., before the calling of the twelve in Matt. x. 1, etc. The second healing of the centurion's bondman took place after the calling of the twelve (Luke vi. 13-16). It must be remembered that Matthew selects his items with a view to the object of his gospel, and nowhere claims that historical order is maintained. Luke, however, does claim that he writes "in order", and we take Luke's record of any incident to be the true historical order of its happening. Many have found a "discrepancy" in the fact that whereas Matt. v.-vii. was evidently spoken on a mountain, Luke vi. 17 says that a body of teaching of exactly the same character was spoken "in the plain". "There", says the critic, “the narrative is contradictory, one says a mountain, the other a plain”. Others, to avoid the difficulty, say (and with truth), that the Lord could have repeated His teaching again elsewhere. The whole controversy is dispelled by looking at the original, and using simple common sense. First as to the mountain, Matt. v. 1 says:--

> “And seeing the multitude, He went up into a mountain, and when He was set, His disciples came unto Him.”

Luke vi. 12 says:--

> “And it came to pass in those days, that He went out into a mountain to pray, and continued all night in prayer to God and when it was day He called unto Him His disciples, and of them He chose twelve, whom He also named apostles.”

This passage supplements Matthew’s record. Matthew evidently had no reason to say why the Lord went up the mountain, except that it was because of the multitude. The multitudes which followed Him were from Galilee, Decapolis, Jerusalem, Judea and beyond Jordan, according to Matthew; they were from all Judea, Jerusalem, the sea, and coast of Tyre and Sidon according to Luke. Both records are true, each gives his own account which does not contradict, but complements the other.

Now as to the plain. The actual words are este epi topou pedinou, which rendered literally are, “He on a level place”. These words are only another way of saying, “and when He was set”; no one could address a company of people upon the oblique slopes of a mountain side, but coming down a little way until He reached “a level place” such as is often to be found at any height, He could then address them comfortably. The contradiction therefore vanishes, as does the need for two separate occasions when the actual facts are considered. Both Matthew and Luke record the entrance of the Lord, after this “Sermon on the Mount”, into Capernaum. Matthew adds the miracle of the leper, and both record the miracle of the centurion’s servant. What Matthew speaks of as being simply the words of the centurion without mediators, Luke explains in fuller detail. The reason why the centurion spoke of his unworthiness appears in Luke’s account, because there it is recorded that the elders of the Jews had said that he was worthy for whom He should do this.

In verse 3 of Luke vii. the word “sent” is apostellö = sent away, the sender remaining behind. In verse 6 it is pempõ = to send with. The word “saying” (legon) indicates that the centurion is personally present and speaking to the Lord. It seems more reasonable that we should have the variations of one event, than that on two separate occasions the Lord utter a similar lengthy address, then enter Capernaum, then be asked to heal the centurion’s servant, be answered in exactly the same way, and marvel for the second time at the great faith evidenced. Then as to the calling of the twelve, Luke vi. 13-16 positively states that after that night of prayer the Lord chose the twelve, whereas Matt. x. 1 says that He called unto Him the twelve disciples without stating when He had chosen them. The only reason why these two passages should have been confounded, is the fact that the names of the twelve are given at length.

The healing of Peter's wife's mother could easily be misunderstood in the same way. In reading Matthew's account we should naturally assume that the miracle took place after the healing of the centurion's servant, but both Mark and Luke place it considerably earlier (cf. Mark i. 29 and Luke iv. 38). The fact that Peter's house was in Capernaum (Luke iv. 31-38) links this miracle with the others that were associated with Capernaum, and Matthew, without pretending to keep the historical order, has grouped them together. The Lord again touched the object of His compassion, and this time the restored one arose and ministered unto Him.

So will Israel in the day of her healing, and so may we since He put forth His grace to us.

No.61. The Epistle to the Colossians (11).

pp. 1 - 5

The Apostle Paul now issues his final instructions. He stresses the importance of intercession, a ministry in itself of great importance as we saw when we studied the parallel section in Ephesians (vi. 18). There is no doubt that prayer along the lines of the Lord's will accomplishes much, and the believer who neglects it does so to his great spiritual loss:

> "Continue steadfastly in prayer, watching therein with thanksgiving; withal praying for us also, that God may open unto us a door for the Word, to speak the mystery of Christ, for which I am also in bonds; that I may make it manifest, as I ought to speak" (Col. iv. 2-4, R.V.).

The plural pronouns 'us' doubtless include Paul's friends who were free, like Timothy and Epaphras. The idea of a 'door being opened' is characteristically Pauline (ICor.xvi.9; IICor.ii.12), a new opportunity being given by the Lord for witness. In Eph. vi. it is to make known the good news concerning the Mystery, the great secret revealed in the earlier chapters. Here it is the secret concerning Christ and His exaltation which has been so stressed in this epistle as the antidote to the error which was circulating at Colossae. Both these secrets are stressed in Eph. iii. and both are necessary to get a balanced view of the prison ministry of the Apostle Paul for us Gentiles. First we must have our eyes opened and our minds enlarged to grasp the greatness of the Lord's exaltation 'far above all' in the heavenly places (Eph. i.). Only then can we begin to appreciate what it means to belong to a newly created company of believers taken from Jew and Gentile and linked with Him there (Eph. ii. 6). With such a great stewardship of Truth it is no wonder that the Apostle asks for prayer so that he may make it manifest, for according to Col. i. 27 God wills to reveal the greatness of this secret to His people and in the first place used Paul as a channel so to do (Eph. iii. 3, 8, 9).

The Apostle goes on to exhort believers to walk carefully in view of those 'without', that is, those who are non-Christians, for the unbelieving world cares little about Christian doctrine, but carefully notes the words and actions of those who profess to name the name of Christ. We are to be epistles 'known and read of all men' (IICor.iii.2), specially to those who do not read the Bible and, as living epistles, we must 'redeem the time' (Col. iv. 5), in our witness to those who know not the Saviour. Kairos is not the ordinary word for 'time', but means a special opportunity which may soon pass. "Buy it up", says the Apostle, "while it lasts", and those who are keen for Christ and the stewardship of the 'good deposit' which Paul was ministering, will be eager and vigilant to seize every such opportunity for witness that presents itself. The speech of all such must be gracious and a preservative against evil and error, like salt in food (Col. iv. 6). In other words, the believer who wishes to be faithful and fruitful must not only be opportune as regards time, but also speak appropriately to the person concerned, and here heavenly wisdom will be needed as to the best way to handle each one that comes our way, for everyone is individual in his needs.

Paul now refers to his associates and messengers and brings forward Tychicus who was the bearer of the letter to the Ephesians as well, and also possibly one to Laodicea (Eph. vi. 21). He is mentioned twice in the Pastoral Epistles (II Tim. iv. 12; Titus iii. 12) and is designated by the Apostle as a faithful friend and helper who would declare his circumstances to them. Onesimus, the runaway slave, who in the providence of God had come into contact with Paul at Rome and become a believer, is the subject of the letter to Philemon. Though once an unbelieving slave, he is now 'one of you' and, from a spiritual stand-point, on an equal footing with the other members of the Colossian church. Tychicus and Onesimus would be able to give them an up-to-date account of the Apostle and the circumstances surrounding him as the 'prisoner of the Lord' at Rome.

The Apostle now sends greetings from six believers who were with him at the time of writing, three of them Jews and three of them Gentile. Aristarchus was associated with Paul in the riot of Ephesus (Acts xix. 29) and later went to Jerusalem as one of the two delegates sent from Thessalonica. He also, together with Luke, accompanied the Apostle when he set sail from Caesarea to Rome (Acts xxvii. 2). Paul describes him as his 'fellow-prisoner' which probably means he shared the Apostle's imprisonment voluntarily.

Mark joins in the greetings (iv. 10). He is described as the cousin of Barnabas (R.V.) which explains the link between him and Barnabas in the Acts (xv. 37), causing the dispute between Paul and Barnabas when he failed and left them, not being able apparently to stand the rigours of the way. Now, at the time of writing the Colossian letter, he had redeemed his reputation. It would appear that the Colossians had received some communication regarding Mark (iv. 10) and they are bidden to receive him if he should visit them.

Of Jesus Justus we know nothing apart from this reference. Jesus is the Greek form of Joshua and Justus was a common Latin name. "These only are my fellow-workers unto the Kingdom of God" declared the Apostle. We have shown earlier on that the thought of a Kingdom is stressed in the Prison Epistles after Acts xxviii. as well as before, and therefore it is quite erroneous to try to limit the thought of a Kingdom to the people of Israel. It is the sphere of the Kingdom that differs before the Acts and afterwards, inasmuch as earth is distinct from heaven.

There is no part of God's redemptive purpose (touching both heaven and earth) that does not come under God's sovereignty. Almost the last thought of Paul in his final letter is to declare that the Lord would preserve or save him "unto His heavenly Kingdom" (II Tim. iv. 18). These Jewish Christians had been a comfort and support to the imprisoned Apostle.

He goes on to name three other believers, Gentile by birth. Epaphras, as we have already seen, was the human link between Paul and the Colossian church, and chapter i. stresses his faithfulness and zeal for the Christians at Colossae. His effective life of intercession for them is summed up in verse 12 (R.V.):

> "Epaphras, who is one of you, a servant of Christ Jesus, saluteth you, always striving for you in his prayers, that ye may stand perfect and fully assured in all the will of God."

This was vital intercession, complementary to the Apostle's as chapter i. makes clear. Both were 'striving for them in prayer', which clearly shows that real prayer or intercession is not something that is just pleasant and easy. It is an exacting work that costs, but how rewarding it can be! All those who profess to rejoice in the fact that they are 'complete, or filled full in Christ' (ii. 10) should know something of this in experience and service for others.

Luke and Demas complete the list of those sending greetings. Here we are told that Luke was 'the beloved physician'. The Lord gave Paul a faithful friend who stayed and assisted him right through to the end of his course (II Tim. iv. 11), looking after his physical needs as well as his spiritual and temporal ones. Luke is probably a shortened form of Lucius, a very common Gentile name throughout the Roman Empire. We do not see any point in trying to establish, as some have tried to do, that Luke was a Jew. A Jew was not likely to have a Gentile name!

Lastly we come to Demas and note that Paul makes no comment regarding him. Later on he is evidently pained to record that Demas had left him 'having loved this present world' (II Tim. iv. 10). Could he see the traces of this already appearing in Demas when the Colossian epistle was being written? If so, it would explain his silence concerning him. What a powerful effect love can have, either for good or evil! It is obvious we should take great care concerning the things and the persons we profess to love as these can alter the whole course of our lives one way or the other.

In closing the epistle the Apostle Paul directs that it should be passed on to the church at Laodicea after the Colossians had read it at a church meeting. Not only this, but the Colossians should publicly read an epistle of his from Laodicea. There has been a great deal of discussion about this letter, but we cannot be certain as to its contents. Some suggest that it has been lost. If this is true then it did not form part of inspired Scripture, for who can question the ability of the Lord to preserve parts of His own Word and superintend their gathering together in one volume? We do know that Paul wrote letters which do not form part of Holy Writ (e.g. to the church at Corinth, additional to the ones we already have).

On the other hand, some scholars suggest that the Laodicean letter is our epistle to the Ephesians, which, as we have seen, was not addressed to one church, but was for wider circulation. If Colossians was written before Ephesians, as some think, this would be a difficulty. However, it may be the other way round and J. B. Lightfoot and A. Harnack and others uphold the Ephesian letter theory mentioned above. The fact is we do not know for certain and, therefore, it is not wise to dogmatize. At a later date there was an apocryphal letter entitled "The Epistle of Paul to the Laodiceans", but this comes in the category of apocryphal literature which was prominent in the early centuries, just as the Book of Jasher and other so-called 'lost books' stimulated other writers to issue compositions bearing these titles.

Paul ends with a personal message to one member of the church:

> "And say to Archippus, take heed to the ministry which thou hast received in the Lord, that thou fulfil it" (iv. 17).

Archippus is mentioned in Philemon 2 where the Apostle described him as his 'fellow-soldier', and it would seem that he was a member of Philemon's household and possibly his son. What the ministry involved we do not know, but it was evidently important enough for Paul to send him this stimulating message and it would have been all the more effective because it would have been read before the whole church. Archippus may have been slipping back spiritually and needed this reminder of his responsibility to discharge his God-given ministry (literally 'fill up', a typical Colossian thought).

Paul now takes the pen from the amanuensis and concludes in his own handwriting which was a guarantee of the genuineness of the letter:

> "The salutation of me Paul with mine own hand. Remember my bonds. Grace be with you" (iv. 18, R.V.).

We should note the last personal touch which was full of feeling, "Do not forget my bonds". While he rejoiced in being, not the prisoner of Nero, but of Christ Jesus for us Gentiles, yet there was a great personal cost he had to pay and it would do us all good to remember at what price, even from a human standpoint, the precious Word of God has come down to us, first of all through the faithful Apostle of the Gentiles, and then through loyal successors, many of whom gladly gave their lives for the Lord Jesus.

The First Epistle to TIMOTHY

No.1. Introduction, i. 1 - 4.
pp. 41 - 46

It is evident that the three Pastoral Epistles of Paul form a group and were evidently written within a short interval of time between his two Roman imprisonments. Thus they were written after the end of the Acts and their contents cannot be fitted into the Acts period.

Authorship. It was universally held by the early church that Paul was the author and this was never questioned until about 100 years ago. Ignatius, Irenaeus, Polycarp, Athenagoras, Justin Martyr and the early Muratorian fragment give their testimony to the Pauline authorship. The reader is referred to the introduction to II Timothy for further facts. We shall only touch upon the assertions of the critics here.

Their main reasons for denying the authorship of Paul are:

(1) There is no exposition of the great basic doctrines (such as justification by faith) which are characteristic of Paul's epistles. But the Apostle was addressing leaders in the truth, Timothy and Titus, who did not need this for they had been well grounded by Paul's oral teaching for some 15-20 years.

(2) The church set-up (e.g. as regarding bishops) was not that of the first century but the second, during the lifetime of Ignatius. But this is not true. We find there were bishops (note the plural) and deacons at Philippi (Phil. i. 1) and Paul had ordained elders in every church he founded (Acts xiv. 23). When a new assembly came into being there was obviously the need for someone to take charge and care for the spiritual welfare of the group. We find nothing of the exaggerated elevation of one bishop ruling over assemblies such as took place at the time of Ignatius and was finally exhibited in the Roman Catholic set-up.

(3) The Pastorals exhibit the developed Gnosticism of the second century. This again is not true. In the Pastorals we find an incipient Gnosticism, a transitional stage from Judaism to developed Gnosticism. And even if this were not so, we should remember that Paul had the gift of prophecy and could foresee how events were going to shape (cp. Acts xx. 29-31).

(4) Linguistic difficulties. In the Pastoral epistles there are a number of words not used elsewhere in the N.T. But this can be accounted for by the different circumstances of writing. Some have laid great importance on word statistics, but the comment of Dr. R. P. Martins is to the point here:

> "One of the great gains of recent Pauline studies is the growing distrust of the value of word statistics in determining apostolic authorship, and our admission that we cannot say with dogmatism just what he could or could not have written" (Philippians p.107).

It is absurd to try to guess just what Paul's vocabulary was or to try to restrict it to one's own ideas. In any case would a forger introduce non-Pauline words at about seventeen words per page of the Greek Text if he wanted the epistle to be accepted as Paul's writing?

We shall say no more about the human authorship, believing that the author was Paul the Apostle and that this rests upon a solid foundation.

We next give the structure of the epistle:

The structure of I Timothy.

A | i. 1, 2. Salutation.
B | i. 3-20. Hetero didaskaleo, "Teach no other doctrine" (i. 3).
The King, incorruptible, invisible (i. 17).
Shipwreck (i. 19).
C | ii. 1-7. Salvation of all men (ii. 4).
D | ii. 8 - iii. 15-. These things I write (iii. 14).
E | iii. -15, 16. The MYSTERY of GODLINESS. Angels.
E | iv. 1-8. The APOSTACY. Doctrines of demons.
C | iv. 9-12. Saviour of all men (iv. 10).
D | iv. 13 - vi. 2. These things teach (vi. 2).
B | vi. 3-20. Hetero didaskaleo, "Teach otherwise" (vi. 3).
The King, immortal, unseen (vi. 15, 16).
Drowning (vi. 9).
A | vi. 21. Salutations.

This structure shows the balance of the epistle and its leading features. The correspondence is shown by noting the sections headed by capitals. The purpose of the epistle was the guidance of Timothy as a Christian leader as to his attitude to those within and those without; what his charge involved and what his personal conduct and example should be. The same can be said of the epistle to Titus.

In the opening verses of I Timothy Paul stresses his God-given authority:

> "Paul, an apostle of Christ Jesus according to the commandment of God our Saviour, and Christ Jesus our hope; unto Timothy, my true child in faith: grace, mercy, peace, from God the Father and Christ Jesus our Lord" (I Tim. i. 1, 2, R.V.).

This personal authority is in order to make unmistakable the authority of the message he teaches and this is intensified by the expression 'by the commandment of God'. He usually says 'by the will of God', but he wanted Timothy to realize afresh, and any others who would read the epistle, that he was not expressing his own ideas, but was a man under authority and that authority was nothing less than the authority of God Himself.

The expression "God our Saviour" may appear unusual for the Apostle, but he uses it interchangeably with the phrase "Christ our Saviour" as the occurrences in the epistle to Titus show:

God our Saviour i. 3. Christ our Saviour i. 4.
God our Saviour ii. 10.
Our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ ii. 13.
God our Saviour iii. 4. Christ our Saviour iii. 6.

Those who deny the deity of Christ will have an insoluble difficulty here, unless they are prepared to state there are two Gods and two Saviours referred to in this epistle, which is of course sheer heresy, denying the truth of the Old and New Testaments concerning one God and one Saviour and 'none else'.

Well may E. K. Simpson write concerning the opening verses of I Timothy:

> "This is no slender proof of his conviction of the deity of Christ, especially when we reflect that the statement comes from a monotheist to his finger tips like this Hebrew of the Hebrews" (The Pastoral Epistles, p.25).

The word 'Saviour' would have a contemporary significance when we remember it was used in the cult of Emperor-worship, being applied to such an infamous character as Nero. What a contrast! Here, Christ Jesus is both Lord and Hope. Let us never forget our hope is indissolubly bound up with a Person not a creed, and that Person is the ever-living Saviour.

This is what gives the word 'hope' absolute certainty in the N.T., an element that is usually lacking in our modern usage. The true believer, grounded in the Lord Jesus Christ, does not have to speculate about his final end. He knows for certain he is linked for ever by grace with the One Who said "Because I live, ye shall live also" and He lives, never to die again, the eternal Saviour and Lord, Who, "being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over Him" (Rom. vi. 9).

Timothy is addressed as gnesios, 'true-born', 'genuine'. There was nothing spurious about Timothy or his standing in the faith. He was the recognized representative of the Apostle. Teeknon, 'child', rather than huios, 'son', strikes a caressing note and shows the close and warm relationship between Timothy and his spiritual father. The Apostle continues:

> "As I exhorted thee to tarry at Ephesus, when I was going into Macedonia, that thou mightest charge certain men not to teach a different doctrine, neither to give heed to fables and endless genealogies, the which minister questionings, rather than a dispensation of God which is in faith; so do I now" (I Tim. i. 3-4, R.V.).

The reference to Ephesus need not imply that Paul had recently been there or that Ephesus was his starting point. Poreuomenos, 'when I was going', not A.V. 'when I went', seems to indicate that Timothy was left en route for Ephesus and was charged by the Apostle to remain there for the reason expressed by the next verse, namely to correct the false teachers and uphold the truth committed by the Lord. Timothy's sensitive nature may have shrunk from this, but he was exhorted to take a strong line with the offenders and maintain the 'good deposit' of truth. This was obviously a recognized body of doctrine, as we have seen in other studies, and related to what the risen Christ had revealed and committed to Paul as his human vehicle for making it known to the Christian world. Timothy was to charge certain ones that they were not to teach a different doctrine. "Charge" parangello, is a strong military term which means literally 'to pass commands from one to another'. Heterodidaskaleo, means 'to teach amiss'.

This word gives a timely warning against introducing novelty or deviating from the specific truth which God had deposited with Paul. All who teach should have this warning before them continually. The Lord does not take a light view of any mishandling of His Word and those of His children who do this must not be surprised if, instead of meeting Him with joy in the future, they do so with shame. Faithfulness is the first requirement by God.

The error of false teachers consisted in 'fables and endless genealogies'. Muthoi, 'fables' occurs in Titus i. 14, where they are described as Jewish, and it is more than likely that we have the same thing here. While we have not the developed Gnosticism of the second century the beginnings are here with semi-Gnostical theories of aeons and emanations. In addition there was the Jewish delight in speculation, leading to the composition of mythical histories based on the O.T. such as is found in the Jewish book of Jubilees. This mixture of error was doubtless being promulgated at Ephesus and was Satan's counter attack to the truth of the Mystery. The 'endless genealogies' possibly resulted from the idea that God, called Buthos or Depth, by acting on His own mind produced two other beings of different sexes called Aeons or Emanations and from these two sprang a series of other Aeons. When anyone attempted to trace this celestial pedigree or genealogy, there arose great arguments as to the number of Aeons and their order of procession. Here was Satan's travesty of the purpose of the ages with its false mediators in the place of the only genuine One, the Lord Jesus Christ.

The danger of all this was that it broke the spiritual unity among members of the Body of Christ and so led to endless queries and doubts. This is always the aim of the enemy, to split the people of God who hold the truth and, looking back upon the past centuries, he has been eminently successful. These are still his tactics today, so let us keep a watchful eye and not be drawn aside from what God has committed to our charge. This truth Paul describes as a 'dispensation of God' (verse 4 R.V.). This is nearer in translation to what Paul was inspired to write than 'godly edifying' of the A.V.

There is hardly any need for us to stress the importance of the word 'dispensation'. It is not synonymous with the word 'age', but means the administration of a stewardship. We have this word and its cognate rendered 'steward' in Luke xvi. 1, 2. In revealing the great truth of the Mystery (Secret) in Eph. iii., Paul declared it to be a dispensation or stewardship in verse 9 (R.V.) and grace in verse 2. Of course it is a 'fellowship' (A.V.) but the Apostle reveals that it is something much deeper and higher than this. It was this precious dispensation of God that these false teachers were marring by their unfaithfulness and erroneous doctrine, hence the serious warning Paul gave to his son in the faith.

No.2. i. 5 - 17.
pp. 66 - 71

Paul had left Timothy at Ephesus to deal with false teachers who were straying from the Truth committed to him and made known through his witness. The best antidote to error is always the truth of God and here the Apostle calls it a 'dispensation (stewardship) of God' which had been the subject of the Ephesian and Colossian epistles (I Tim. i. 4, R.V.) and the goal of it all was love:

> "But the end of the commandment is love, out of a pure heart and a good conscience and faith unfeigned" (i. 5).

The word parangelia, 'commandment' (a military term) is cognate with the verb in verse 3. Telos is the aim or goal; surely the goal of all truth is divine love in all its sacrificial giving and unselfishness. Its source is made clear by the preposition ek (out of) which clearly draws attention to its origin in three ways:

(1) A pure heart. The heart stands for the totality of a man's moral affections and outlook, and without purity there, Christian love is impossible. The Lord Jesus had a special promise for the pure in heart (Matt. v. 8).

(2) A good conscience. The word suneidesis (conscience) implies self-judgment and moral consciousness, a constant awareness of God and His truth. In this very epistle we find the opposers of the truth have a seared or branded conscience (I Tim. iv. 2), one that cannot act because it has been quenched and ignored so many times and finally put out of action by the system known in Scripture as 'the lie', whose author is Satan.

(3) Faith unfeigned. True faith or trust is where we start in our dealings with God. "He that cometh to God must believe (have faith) that He exists . . . . ." (Heb. xi. 6). Pretence here ruins the whole approach and in fact all our relationship with Him. The Apostle links love and faith together in his great hymn recorded in I Cor. xiii. and such faith leads to the greatest of all graces—love.

This trinity of graces was conspicuously absent from the opposers of the truth in our context:

> "From which things some having swerved have turned aside unto vain talking; desiring to be teachers of the law, though they understand neither what they say, nor whereof they confidently affirm" (i. 6, 7, R.V.).

These false teachers, instead of keeping to the race track of truth, had swerved off it into a barren waste, their words being nothing more than meaningless chatter (vain jangling). The desire to be 'teachers of the law' shows their Jewish character and their ambition seemed to be to rival contemporary Rabbinical exposition, rather than to minister the truth.

Paul's indictment of them is scathing. They were utterly incompetent, being both ignorant and unintelligent. The mention of the law leads the Apostle to discuss it and its purpose, but he does not attempt to deal with it exhaustively. To appreciate this we must study both Romans and Galatians, especially Rom. vii. In I Timothy Paul gives one of the main reasons for the law, the restraint of evil doing:

> "But we know that the law is good, if a man use it lawfully, as knowing this, that law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and unruly, for the ungodly and sinners, for the unholy and profane, for murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, for man-slayers, for fornicators, for abusers of themselves with men, for men-stealers, for liars, for false swearers, and if there be any other thing contrary to the sound doctrine; according to the gospel of the glory of the blessed God, which was committed to my trust" (i. 8-11, R.V.).

The law has little relevance for law-abiding people; they do not need its restraints and it was not designed for them, but for the lawless and insubordinate, who are not amenable to discipline. The catalogue of sins here begins with those against God and then against one's fellow man. The reference to murderers of fathers and mothers should probably be understood as smiters of parents as the R.V. margin suggests, an extreme violation of the fifth commandment.

Paul rounds off these offences with anything that is contrary to sound (healthy) doctrine. There is a tremendous contrast between teaching designed for criminals (the law) and teaching designed for the believer who wants to go on to perfection (maturity). Both didaskalia teaching, and hugiainouse, sound or healthy, are peculiarly words of the Pastoral Epistles. Didaskalia occurs fifteen times in these epistles, eight of them being in I Timothy (i. 10; iv. 1, 6, 13, 16; v. 17; vi. 1, 3). Furthermore the following cognate words should be noted which are also a feature of these important epistles, all revolving round the thought of teaching: Heterodidaskalia, to teach otherwise (I Tim. i. 3; vi. 3). Nomodidaskalos, teacher of the law (i. 7). Didaskalos, teacher (ii. 7). Didasko, to teach (ii. 12; iv. 11; vi. 2). Didaktikos, apt to teach (iii. 2). The prevalence of these words is easily accounted for when we remember that they were addressed to leaders and teachers like Timothy and Titus. But nothing is clearer than the fact that all such teaching, to be acceptable to the Lord, must conform to His good deposit of truth made known through Paul. In his second epistle the Apostle reminds Timothy of this when he states "Hold the pattern of sound words which thou hast heard from me" (II Tim. i. 13 R.V.).

This exceedingly rich and uplifting deposit of truth Paul now designates as:

> "According to the gospel of the glory of the blessed God, which was committed to my trust" (i. 11, R.V.).

The full grandeur of the original Greek has been missed by the A.V. "glorious gospel". The emphasis is not so much on the word 'gospel', but rather the word "glory" (doxa), which is so intimately bound up with the Mystery and its supreme hope (Ephesians i. 6, 12, 14, 17, 18; iii. 16, 21; Phil. i. 11; ii. 11; iii. 21; iv. 19, 20; Colossians i. 1, 27; iii. 4; I Tim. i. 11, 17; iii. 16; Titus ii. 13; II Tim. ii. 10; iv. 18). Note that in every case the noun doxa is used, even when the A.V. translates it as 'glorious'. For instance, our blessed hope is 'the appearing of the glory of our great God and Saviour, Jesus Christ" (Titus ii. 13). That tremendous glory is now hidden and the hope of the Body of Christ coincides with its manifestation (Col. iii. 4).

In I Timothy Paul thrills with joy at the thought of his high commission of proclaiming the good news (gospel) contained in the priceless deposit of truth, filled with the unsearchable riches of Christ and ablaze with His glory (Eph. iii. 9). Yet, at the same time, he cannot help thinking of his own unworthiness especially his pre-conversion days. If the Lord Jesus could change Saul of Tarsus, the chief of sinners into Paul, the Apostle of the Gentiles, then there is no limit to His transforming power, and there is hope for the weakest of us if we come into contact by faith with such an almighty Saviour and Lord. This sudden outburst of thanksgiving is typical of the Apostle, who never ceased to marvel at the grace and long-suffering of God and his own past sinfulness and blindness.

He does not attempt to excuse himself in his headstrong persecution of the Lord's people. He ravaged the early church like a wild animal (Gal. i. 13). In I Timothy he describes himself as a 'blasphemer, a persecutor and injurious', only the English "injurious' is not strong enough. Hubristen means a violent man, one who is arrogant and overbearing. In his self-drawn sketch we can hardly believe that such a person could ever become one of the most faithful and Christlike servants of the Lord, but such is the truth. All people are naked and open to the all-seeing God (Heb. iv. 13) and in considering Saul of Tarsus, the Lord recognized one who was absolutely faithful to his light, however small it might have been, and that there was a mighty potential in this man once he was saved and enlightened. Whatever Saul of Tarsus was in his pre-conversion days, he was not a hypocrite, "I did it ignorantly in unbelief", he says (I Tim. i. 13). Here was no willful ignorance which cannot be excused, but the blindness of unregeneracy which, when removed by the risen Christ, could be replaced by the full knowledge and acknowledgment of the liberating truth of God which is resident alone in the ascended Lord. No wonder the Apostle Paul never forgot the wonders of grace and we are not surprised to find that he makes more references to grace than any other N.T. writer. It was the Lord's saving grace that stopped him in his mad career, replaced it by a new spirit of faith and love and a keen desire to 'apprehend that for which he had been apprehended by Christ Jesus' (Phil. iii. 12).

The striking formula, "Faithful is the saying" occurs five times in the Pastoral Epistles and nowhere else (I Tim. i. 15; iii. 1; iv. 9; Titus iii. 8; II Tim. ii. 11). This is supposed to present a problem to Pauline authorship, but who can dogmatically say that Paul could not, or would not have appealed to such sayings if they were truth? It appears that he is quoting statements in a rhythmical form current in the churches, which were acknowledged to be 'sure words', and pistos, faithful, is a characteristic word of the Pastorals, occurring no less than seventeen times. Truth and fidelity are brought to the fore here. The statement that "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners" breathes the very soul of the gospel as one writer has expressed it, and gives us the basic fact of the Christian faith. In introducing it, Paul is still thinking about himself and the depths of his sinful past for he adds, 'of whom I am chief'. Paul holds no inflated idea of his own importance. It is 'less than the least' (Eph. iii. 8) and 'the least of the apostles' (ICor.xv.9). But here he thinks not only of himself for he realizes that, in laying hold of him, the ringleader of the revolt against Him, the Lord was not only displaying the riches of His grace as far as he was concerned, but was also giving an example of what His grace could do for all subsequent sinners:

> ". . . . . that in me as chief might Jesus Christ show forth all His longsuffering, for an example of them which should hereafter believe on Him unto everlasting life" (i. 16, R.V.).

Hupotuposis, 'example', occurs again in II Tim. i. 13, "the form of sound words". The word means an outline sketch or a word illustration. Paul's experience was to serve as a compelling example of grace abounding to countless numbers who should hereafter believe on the Lord Jesus unto life everlasting. Epi, 'on', with the dative case is rare in the N.T., but Paul uses it again in Rom. ix. 33 and x. 11. It points to Christ as the only firm basis of faith. Remember no one is saved by faith alone. Faith must rest on someone or something. It cannot be suspended as it were in mid-air. The faith that saves and brings eternal life of inexpressible joy must be faith or trust that is resting solely and securely on the great Rock of ages, the un-changing Christ and all that He has accomplished for sinners.

Once more an irresistible impulse prompts the Apostle to break forth into praise and thanksgiving:

> "Now unto the King of the ages (margin), incorruptible, invisible, the only God, be honour and glory for ever and ever (to the ages of the ages). Amen" (i. 17, R.V.).

The striking title, "the King of the ages", occurs in Rev. xv. 3 R.V. and in the Apocrypha (Tobit 13:6,10) so it was evidently current in Jewish circles. It is correct to keep the title of God as King solely to Israel, for it is used twice in I Timothy, here and vi. 15 (See also Rev. xix. 16). The invisibility of God as Spirit is stressed in other Scriptures (e.g. Col. i. 15). He is the Author and Ruler of the Ages which He has appointed to carry out His great redemptive purpose and this 'plan of the ages' (eternal purpose A.V. Eph. iii. 11) is centred in Christ Jesus. He is mono Theo, "God alone", and there is 'none else' to be compared with Him as the middle chapters of Isaiah reveal. To Him be all the adoration and praise for all time and eternity to follow!

No.3. i. 18 - ii. 7.
pp. 101 - 105

After his rapturous doxology (I Tim. i. 17), Paul reverts to the main purpose of his letter, to impress upon Timothy the solemn charge he had been given in connection with the Truth:

> "This charge I commit unto thee, my child Timothy, according to the prophecies which went before on thee, that by them thou mayest war the good warfare; holding faith and a good conscience . . . . ." (I Tim. i. 18, 19, R.V.).

It is significant that the verb commit or deposit (paratithemi) is used of Timothy passing the good deposit of Truth to others (II Tim. ii. 2). This young fellow had evidently been marked out by those who had been given the gift of prophecy during the Acts, as being God's choice for being Paul's successor, and as such he had no light responsibility, as this epistle makes clear. Satanic opposition and the forces of darkness made warfare inevitable and this has been true ever since Satan's fall, but Timothy must be the Lord's good soldier and loyally take his stand and not yield an inch, 'fighting the good fight of faith' (vi. 12) and holding faith and a good conscience. Faith and conscience are joined together three times in this epistle (Compare i. 5 and iii. 9). These embrace the fundamentals of true doctrine and practice and the surrender of one can ruin the other. Faith keeps us in close contact with the Lord and His truth, and a sensitive conscience will tamper with nothing that is false, lax, or doubtful. These are really the expansion of the whole armour of God that is described in Eph. vi., which ensures the safety of the believer in this highly dangerous conflict. Paul had witnessed many a spiritual downfall due to lax regard of these essentials and so he warns his son in the faith:

> ". . . . . holding faith and a good conscience; which some having thrust from them made shipwreck concerning the faith: of whom is Hymenaeus and Alexander; whom I delivered unto Satan, that they might be taught not to blaspheme" (i. 19, 20, R.V.).

Hymenaeus and Alexander were the concrete examples of this who would have been known to Timothy. Hymenaeus is mentioned again in II Tim. ii. 17 in connection with false teaching concerning resurrection and Alexander is spoken of in Acts xix. 33 and II Tim. iv. 14. As Alexander was a common name it is not possible to say definitely that these are one and the same person, but it seems unlikely that Paul would be referring to two different Alexanders in the Pastoral Epistles without making this clear.

Whoever these men were, they called for strong disciplinary action, if the purity of the Truth was to be preserved. One of the Apostle's powers was to be able 'to deliver to Satan' such people for chastisement, and if possible reformation, under the over-ruling of God. Some think this means excommunication, but in view of Job's experience in the O.T. it could have related to serious bodily affliction. Acts xiii. 11 and I Cor. xi. 30 are examples of this. In the case of the two mentioned in I Tim. i., the object was remedial: "that they may learn not to blaspheme", so there was mercy at the back of it all.

The Apostle now proceeds from his general charge to specific regulations concerning the worship and organization of the church:

> "I exhort therefore, first of all, that supplications, prayers, intercessions, thanksgivings, be made for all men; for kings and all that are in high place; that we may lead a tranquil and quiet life in all godliness and gravity. This is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour; Who willeth that all men should be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth" (I Tim. ii. 1-4, R.V.).

The words 'first of all' relate not to time but to importance. How easy it is to become narrow in our praying! Paul would have us take in all men in our prayers. The four words he uses here throw light on the great ministry of prayer. Deesis (supplications) brings out the sense of need. Proseuchai (prayers) is the more general word for prayer as a whole. Enteuxis (intercessions) is the regular word for petition on behalf of someone else, a vastly important aspect of our prayer life and a ministry in itself. The very variety of terms serves to emphasize the richness and fullness of this spiritual exercise. Giving of thanks (eucharistias) is an element that is too often forgotten. "We know not what we should pray for as we ought" (Rom. viii. 26) is so true, but we need have no difficulty in giving thanks and praising the Lord for all His goodness and mercy to each one of us! If we have problems in our prayer life, let us think of the innumerable blessings we receive from day to day and then express our heartfelt gratitude to the Lord.

Paul brings before Timothy the need for prayer on behalf of kings and those in authority. Too often this is forgotten. Whether rulers or civil authorities are perverted and hostile or not, they should be subjects for remembrance at the Throne of Grace, the object being 'that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life' so that the work and witness for the Lord may not be hindered. Let us not think that rulers are beyond the Lord's influence:

> "The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord, as the rivers of water; He turneth it whithersoever He will" (Prov. xxi. 1).

The exiled Jews at Babylon were bidden to pray for the pagan city by Jeremiah, saying 'for in the peace thereof shall ye have peace' (Jer. xxix. 7), and in the first century, prayer for those in authority would have included the infamous Nero! Let us not forget then, in our prayer for 'all men' to remember the government of nations and those in authority, for we are assured, in the context we are studying, that this is good and acceptable to God our Saviour, and here is the criterion of all prayer and worship. Is it acceptable and well pleasing to the Lord? If not, it is just 'will worship' of our devising and quite empty and fruitless.

The words "Who will have all men to be saved and come to a knowledge of the truth" (ii. 4) have been the centre of controversy for a long time between Calvinism and Arminianism specially in the seventeenth century. It is not easy to assess the distinction between (thelo) 'will', used here and boulomai also translated 'to will' in other passages. Sometimes they are used interchangeably in Greek, but generally speaking boulomai as G. Abbott-Smith says in his Lexicon, means "to will, wish, desire, purpose, be minded implying more strongly than thelo the deliberate exercise of volition", whereas thelo expresses desire as the simple act of volition without deliberation or consideration. So, in the context we are considering, it would appear that Paul is stating not the decrees of God, but His general attitude to men, without distinction of race, colour, condition or status.

It is foolish for any Christian to get involved in lengthy and unprofitable arguments as to God's sovereignty and man's responsibility. However contradictory they may seem to us, they are both found in God's will and the problem arises from our short-sightedness and inability to comprehend all the ways of God. Heavenly wisdom will keep us from stressing one at the expense of the other. We can be certain of one thing, namely that I Tim. ii. 4 is not a proof text for universalism and those that use it in this way are disregarding the wider context of Scripture as a whole.

E. K. Simpson points out that sozein, to save, to the ordinary Greek ear conveyed nothing more than making safe and preserving. "Saviour" was a popular term for adulation given to the Roman emperors signifying little more than Protector. The word is used in this lesser sense in Matt. xiv. 30; John xii. 27; Acts xxvii. 31 and it could be used in this sense in the context of I Timothy. The first coming of Christ was a revelation of the kindness and love of God towards mankind as a whole (Titus iii. 4). Prayer for rulers accords with the divine willingness that all should be preserved from lawless misrule and come to a recognition of the truth which is resident only in Christ, for peaceful conditions give scope to the propagation of the gospel.

The source of all mercies and blessings is one and the same for all, whoever they may be, and Christ is the sole medium of their bestowal, which is what the Apostle is now going to emphasize:

> "For there is one God, one Mediator also between God and men, Himself man, Christ Jesus, Who gave Himself a ransom for all; the testimony to be borne in its own times; whereunto I was appointed a preacher and an apostle (I speak the truth, I lie not), a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and truth" (I Tim. ii. 5-7, R.V.).

The position of the Lord Jesus as Mediator—a go-between for men and God is brought forward in Paul's epistles. The need for such a one has been felt from the earliest times. Hence Job's pathetic cry for a Daysman (Job ix. 32, 33). The gulf between man with his smallness and limitations and the limitless and infinite God is so tremendous that it calls for someone who can fully touch both God and man and the only person who can achieve this is none other than the Lord Jesus Christ. As God and Man, He can completely touch both heaven and earth and this doctrine needs emphasizing today for it has largely been forgotten by evangelicals. Our Saviour is like Jacob's ladder that stretched from heaven to the earth (Gen. xxviii. 12; John i. 51). A true Mediator must be both God and man. If he is not God, he cannot fully reach to heaven and if he is not man, he cannot fully touch and understand mankind. He must be able to fully represent both God and man and this is exactly what the Lord Jesus does. We learn from the papyri that mesites was a business term for middleman. Let us constantly thank God for such a wondrous Mediator, and remember that our approach to God must always be through Christ as the one and only Way to God (John x. 1-9; xiv. 6), the great Intermediary on our behalf.

It is only because He is the only Mediator, that He can become the all-needed Ransom for men. In Matt. xx. 28 the Lord asserts that He came to give His life, a ransom for many (lutron anti pollon). But Paul uses here antilutron, a very rare word which indicates something more than this. It signifies a counter ransom price and draws our attention to the infinitude of the Offering. As E. K. Simpson so aptly expresses it: "Of priceless jewels we say they are worth a 'king's ransom'; but Christ crucified presents the ransom of the King of kings, a Sacrifice intrinsically illimitable, outweighing everything that can be placed in the counter scale".

Spurgeon once said: "in Christ's finished work I see an ocean of merit; my plummet finds no bottom, my eye discovers no shore". This transcendent sacrifice for sin is the basis on which freedom may be granted to all. Yet not all enjoy that freedom. The ransom has infinite value, but the benefits require the appropriation of individual faith in Christ. God does not force His supreme benefits on men. Man must have a real sense of need, and as he is not a machine, but a moral creature with the power of choice, he must decide whether this priceless treasure is to be his own possession or not.

Now is the time, or season, the Apostle asserts, for the proclamation of this glorious truth far and wide. Once again we see the emphasis on the right time for the revelation of truth. God is never too early or too late and the careful student of the Word of God will never spoil the revelation of God by ignoring these divine time-periods.

No.4. ii. 8 - iii. 1.
pp. 141 - 145

The context of this epistle which we were studying in the last article, makes known the great doctrine of the One Mediator between God and men, Christ Jesus. He Who was declared to be God (John i. 1), 'became flesh' (John i. 14) taking upon Himself a human body which could be offered in death as the unique sacrifice for sin. Paul declares that in his ministry, the right time had come to make this known (I Tim. ii. 7) and he makes a solemn assertion that, in stating this, he is not lying. The critics of this epistle find a difficulty here that the Apostle needed to make such a statement to a loyal believer like Timothy who knew him so well. But Paul is looking wider with his opposers in view, who constantly sought to undermine his apostleship. Note the stress on his Gentile mission. He was pre-eminently the Apostle of the Gentiles, the human mouthpiece of Christ to the Gentile world in this age of grace. And not only this, but he was the prisoner of Christ Jesus for us Gentiles (Eph. iii. 1). It does seem extraordinary that so many who are Gentiles by birth, seek for God's truth anywhere but through the channel God has appointed!

Paul now passes on to deal with the attitude of men in prayer and the delicate subject of women's actions and attire in the assembly and outside it, for there is nothing in the passage to restrict it to the gatherings of believers for prayer, worship and proclamation of the truth. Katastole, translated apparel, can mean demeanour as well as clothing. The Apostle's injunctions here are addressed to believers whom the pagan world were watching closely. Those who wished to adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour in all things would reflect this in simplicity of dress and modesty of behaviour in direct contrast to the ostentation that many Asiatic women assumed with their finery, showy jewelry, etc.

> "I want men everywhere to lift up holy hands in prayer, without anger or disputing. I also want women to dress modestly, with decency and propriety, not with braided hair, or gold or pearls or expensive clothes, but with good deeds, appropriate for women who profess to worship God" (ii. 8, 9, 10, N.I.V.).

Dress is a reflection of personality and a woman's dress is a mirror of her mind. Outward ostentation is not in keeping with a devout approach to God. The old English shamefacedness and sobriety can be rendered 'modestly and self-control', or as the N.I.V. has rendered it above. These words do not indicate mere seriousness of face and expression, but seriousness of purpose as opposed to frivolity and outward display. Paul is not denying all adornment for women, but if a woman's greatest asset is a devout and godly life, then her exterior will harmonize with this in contrast to the gaudy dress which so many Eastern women assumed. In addition to this there was a danger of newly emancipated Christian women abusing their new-found freedom by lording it over men and indulging in empty chatter during the worship of the assembly.

The Apostle enjoins silence on women in public worship reminding them of the God-given status of men and women. This he had already done to the Corinthian church (I Cor. xi. 3; xiv. 34, 35). If disrepute was not to be brought on the whole community, as had evidently happened at Corinth, the subject needed to be dealt with firmly and tactfully. A woman should discuss her problems at home, not in the public assembly. Nor should she teach a mixed congregation including men, for this contradicted God's order to which we have just alluded. Let us not forget that Paul is dealing with public teaching. There was no injunction against women teaching women or children in the home.

In these days when the equality of the sexes is so much stressed, such injunctions are not likely to be popular but are to be explained, one finds so often, by the assertion that Paul was a woman hater. Nothing could be further from the truth for he gladly acknowledges his indebtedness to women helpers among his fellow-labourers, such as Priscilla (Rom. xvi. 3-5) and Euodias and Synteche (Phil. iv. 2, 3). Paul could hardly write the words 'I lie not', and then a little further promulgate his own ideas and make them binding on the church. Much is being made today of women's public ministry as teachers, but the fact remains that this is not in accordance with God's will, whether we understand the reason for it or not.

It is not that men are better characters, cleverer or better teachers than women. It could often be the other way around, but God Who has a good and sufficient reason for all He does and commands, has made His mind known on this subject, and we do not believe that any Christian women who reverences the Lord and is sensitive to His mind and will is going to object to this.

The question of the relationship of the sexes is taken further by the Apostle:

> "For Adam was first formed, then Eve; and Adam was not beguiled, but the woman being beguiled hath fallen into transgression: but she shall be saved through the child-bearing (or her child-bearing, margin), if they continue in faith and love and sanctification with sobriety" (ii. 13-15, R.V.).

In I Cor. xi. 9 Paul had already taught that the priority of man's creation places him as head in relation to the woman. This relationship, as E. K. Simpson has pointed out was 'not competitive, but concordant and counterpart'—it is not a question of superiority or inferiority.

Another reason given by the Apostle here is that Adam was not deceived, but the woman was, and became a transgressor. At the same time Paul did not absolve Adam from responsibility and sin as Rom. v. 12 and onwards makes perfectly clear. "By one man sin entered the world, and death by sin", and in this context, Eve is not mentioned. There was evidently a reason why the tempter approached Eve rather than Adam. Generally speaking, women, with their more sensitive nature and awareness, are more impressionable than men.

This in many respects may be perfectly harmless, but when it comes to spiritual things can be very dangerous, and Satan knew only too well than his arguments and deception would have far greater effect on Eve than Adam. It is significant that many of the false religious cults have originated from women and an all-wise God has ruled that women teaching men is not allowable in connection with Christian doctrine and its proclamation.

From the reference to Eve, Paul passes on to women in general, by stating 'she shall be saved in child-bearing' which is one of the most difficult expressions used in the Pastoral Epistles.

In what sense is the word 'saved' used here? There are at least four different explanations to be considered:

(1) Moffatt translates the phrase "women will get safely through child-birth", giving them encouragement to have children without fear and this accords with Gen. iii. where a doom is pronounced on Eve, that in sorrow she shall conceive and bring forth children. It could be that child-bearing is emphasized here to counter the false teachers who advocated abstinence from marriage (I Tim. iv. 3).

(2) In this view the word 'saved' is used in its spiritual sense, but this brings tremendous difficulties for this would make women's salvation from sin a matter of works on her part, and it is inconceivable that Paul could mean this and so contradict the whole of his witness for salvation by grace apart from human effort or merit. And in any case what were unmarried women to do who could not legitimately bear children—or childless wives for that matter?

(3) There is a third suggestion, but equally improbable, that the words should read 'she shall be saved by the child-bearing' (i.e. the Messiah). If this is what Paul really meant he could hardly have used a more ambiguous way of saying it. The Greek article is generic, describing the whole process of child-baring, rather than one particular instance. Does the Scripture anywhere teach that the virgin Mary was saved and her sins cancelled, because she bore the Saviour?

(4) The fourth idea takes the phrase in question to mean 'she will be saved, even though she must bear children', but this imposes an unnatural meaning on the preposition dia.

There seems no doubt to us that (1) is the true meaning of the passage and this imposes no strain on any other part of the Word.

We note that the verbs change from the singular to the plural, "she shall be saved'; "if they continue", which shows that the latter part of the verse refers to Christian wives in general. They are to show the virtues of faith, love and self-control and in so doing they need have no fear of child-birth. It is the sphere of home life where the woman shines pre-eminently and as E. K. Simpson says:

> "the pity is that the 'new woman' so often scorns her rightful crown and seems to nurse a standing grudge against heaven that she was not born a man . . . . . when extraordinary cases arise, they must be accredited by peculiar circumstances like David's seizure of the shew bread. Many tasks not strictly feminine must fall to the lot of female mission pioneers in solitary posts, or in seasons of emergency elsewhere. But the Head of the Church allots the posts of the members of His Body as His wisdom wills; and those who quit that appointed station for one of their own affecting, flout His prerogative of choice to their certain harm and loss" (The Pastoral Epistles, p.49).

Paul now proceeds to guide Timothy regarding the qualifications of those who were to lead the local assembly. He gives another of the faithful sayings of the Pastoral Epistles:

> "Faithful is the saying, if a man seeketh the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work" (iii. 1, R.V.).

It is important to realize that the modern word 'bishop' does not represent the Greek word episkopos, which means an overseer. Bishops in the time of the Apostle Paul were not highly educated scholars who had been theologically trained and wore a particular garb. There was no division into clergy and laity. Bishops were ordinary believers who had been adjudged faithful and had the spiritual qualifications the Apostle is about to enumerate. There was no hint here or elsewhere in the N.T. of the monarchical conception of episcopacy such as was later lauded by Ignatius, one man controlling a province consisting of a number of churches. This was a backward step finally leading to Romanism with its spiritual autocracy and its domination by the priesthood.

Every assembly had its leaders or bishops, (not one controlling bishop). The Philippian church had its bishop and deacons (Phil. i. 1) and the Ephesian its elders (Acts xx. 17). Shepherds (pastors) and teachers are the gifts of the ascended Christ in Eph. iv. 11.

Moffatt translates I Tim. iii. 1:

> "It is a popular saying that whoever aspires to office is set upon an excellent occupation."

Oregomai translated 'desire' literally means 'to stretch oneself out', hence 'to aspire to', but not in a bad sense. The second verb epithumeo expresses strong desire "to set one's heart upon". We shall see in our next study the divine qualifications for being a leader or overseer in charge of a company of believers in the Apostle Paul's day.

No.5. iii. 2 - 15.
pp. 192 - 196

Our last study ended in a consideration of I Tim. iii. 1, where the Apostle Paul commends the office of an overseer or bishop guiding an assembly of believers. We saw that this was not a sphere of service demanding special theological training or exceptional mental ability, but rather one of Christian character. This is made clear in the verses that follow:

> "The bishop therefore must be without reproach, the husband of one wife, temperate, sober-minded, orderly, given to hospitality, apt to teach; no brawler, no striker; but gentle, not contentious, no lover of money; one that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity; (but if a man knoweth not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?) not a novice, lest being puffed up he fall into the condemnation of the devil" (I Tim. iii. 2-6, R.V.).

Some of these conditions seem to be obvious as relating to a leader, but we must remember that most of these believers were converts from the grossest paganism and so these qualities needed to be stressed. An overseer must be blameless, of good report, specially in respect to the items that follow, which are largely connected with his home life. Practical Christianity starts in the home, as the Prison Epistles of Paul clearly teach, and if conditions are wrong here, they are likely to be wrong everywhere else. "Husband of one wife" has caused much controversy. Is this directed against polygamy or does it ban second marriages? Regarding the former, it can be stated quite clearly that no one would have been allowed to practice polygamy in Christian circles, even though this was rife in the Gentile world. However, it could have been a ban to exclude any who before their conversion had been polygamists.

We may find help from v. 9, where one of the qualifications for the support of a destitute widow was that she must have been 'the wife of one man' and this can only mean that she had been married once. A Christian woman could not have had a plurality of husbands. It could well be that the lax views on divorce which obtained at this time could have resulted in a man having a number of wives living, such as we often see in the entertainment and society world of today, thus bringing the sacred state of marriage in God's sight into disrepute.

The next virtues might be better rendered 'temperate, self-controlled, well-behaved, hospitable, competent to teach'. The first three are linked and describe an orderly life. The importance of hospitality will be better appreciated when we consider the stress Paul lays on the overseer's command of his family and home. A 'striker' represents a violent, pugnacious person and a 'brawler' one who was contentious. The opposite of this is epieikes, a gracious, kindly and considerate person, who is not a money grubber.

The Apostle now looks upon the home; in fact all the Christian qualifications here are reflected in the home-life. the would-be overseer must be one who exercises wise, but firm control over his family. Slipshod paternal discipline disqualified him from rule in the assembly of God's people and the reason the Apostle gives is unanswerable. If a man fails in a lesser sphere, he is not likely to succeed in a larger one. If he cannot control and lead his own household wisely, how can he take care of the church of God? (verse 5).

Moreover, there was another important reason. The early church met in a believer's home. Three times in the N.T. we have the phrase the "church in the house", there being no buildings specially erected at this time for meeting and worship (Rom. xvi. 5; I Cor. xvi. 19; Philemon 2). We can now understand the importance of hospitality and a well controlled household. One can easily imagine the problems that would have arisen in a home where there was a lack of warm hospitality and a disorderly, undisciplined family. On the other hand what greater honour was there for a Christian home than to be the meeting place of the church of God where His Word honoured and proclaimed, members of His Body built up in the faith and encouraged in their daily lives, and the warmth of true Christian fellowship experienced?

Taking the subject further, Paul insists that the aspirant to the office of overseer must not be a novice, which means both immaturity of age and recent experience of conversion and salvation. Rapid promotion of such meant running the risk of pride creeping in and so committing the sin that brought about the fall of Satan (verse 6).

Not only this, a good report from non-Christians ('those that are without') was needed. On the surface this may have appeared to be impossible, remembering the antipathy shown towards Christianity in the pagan world. Yet those outside usually have a good idea of the sincerity and genuineness of a person's character and faith, and it was essential that an overseer had the respect of those living in his neighbourhood.

The Apostle Paul now deals with the office of a deacon. The earliest reference to deacons is found in Acts vi., where they were concerned in the distribution of the church's charities and with the 'ways and means' of its outward maintenance. They were the assistants of the bishops or overseers and appear together in Phil. i. 1. The list of qualities that follow are closely akin to those already mentioned:

> "Deacons in like manner must be grave, not double-tongued, not given to much wine, not greedy of filthy lucre; holding the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience. And let these also first be proved; then let them serve as deacons, if they be blameless" (iii. 8-10, R.V.).

Semnos, grave, once more lays stress on high-mindedness, seriousness of purpose, not seriousness of outward facial expression. "Double-tongued" means saying one thing to one person and something different to another, in fact being unreliable gossips. A deacon must be impervious to avarice or money bribes, his visitation of homes possibly exposing him to this temptation. Moreover he must be a man of spiritual conviction and discernment, faithfully adhering to the faith, the body of truth relating to the Mystery of Ephesians and Colossians. If he came up to the standard of these tests, he was eligible to serve as a deacon in the local assembly of believers.

The Apostle now passes on to women in a parenthesis. Are these wives of deacons or are they deaconesses? It would seem that the latter are intended, for there appears to be no reason why special rules should apply to the wives of deacons and not also to the wives of bishops which are not mentioned. If the wives of deacons were meant one would expect the word 'their' (their wives) which is not in the Greek. Also hosautos, 'in like manner' denotes a transition to another class of persons. We must not forget that a deacon was not confined to the male sex. Phoebe was a deaconess at Cenchrea (Rom.xvi.1, where 'servant' is diakonos, deacon). It seems natural that Paul, after specifying the qualities of a deacon should pass on to those of the kindred office, the deaconess:

> "Women in like manner must be grave, not slanderers, temperate, faithful in all things" (iii. 11, R.V.).

A deaconess must exhibit the same qualities as a deacon. She must be 'faithful in all things' or 'absolutely trustworthy' as Moffatt renders it. More showy gifts would be made of none effect without complete reliability. If one cannot rely on a Christian, what is the use of his or her profession?

Reverting to deacons, Paul asserts that they, like bishops, must be in complete parental control and then he says:

> "For they that have served well as deacons gain to themselves a good standing, and great boldness in the faith which is in Christ Jesus" (iii. 13, R.V.).

The word rendered 'degree' A.V. or 'standard' R.V. is bathmos, literally a 'step' or vantage ground, apparently referring to the esteem of the community of believers to which bishops and deacons belonged. "Boldness", parrhesia, means outspokenness, a confidence that comes from experience in the practical outworking of the faith.

The next section of the epistle gives the reason for the Apostle's injunctions to the leaders of the assemblies. In the Greek text the subject of the verb 'behave' is omitted and therefore could refer to Timothy himself (as the A.V.), or to men generally (as the R.V.) or both:

> "These things write I unto thee, hoping to come unto thee shortly; but if I tarry long, that thou mayest know how men ought to behave themselves in the house of God, which is the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth" (iii. 14, 15, R.V.).

Paul hoped to meet Timothy soon, but he wrote his instructions in case he was delayed. This was most likely to be confirmatory of oral advice given to Timothy at the Apostle's departure, thus strengthening Timothy's authority. At this point we come to the key to this epistle and the Pastoral Epistles as a whole, which was to give Timothy and those leaders under his charge explicit guidance as to the discharge of their official Christian duties.

The idea of the assembly as an household has already been given in verse 5. This is no material building but a spiritual one, and the absence of the definite article before 'church' here and in verse 5 suggests that the local community is envisaged, yet conceived as a part of a large whole.

The phrase 'pillar and ground of the truth' has caused great difficulties because it appears to give greater eminence to the church than to the truth represented by Christ, the living Word and the Scriptures the written Word of God. Bengel and other Protestant expositors got over the difficult by re-punctuating the sentence to read:

> "The pillar and ground of the truth and confessedly great is the mystery of godliness."

On the surface this looks attractive and would act as an antidote to any Romish pretensions, but alas this does violence to the Greek original. E. K. Simpson pronounces it as 'fatally artificial and cumbersome'. Dean Alford goes so far as to say that such a clumsy Greek would be sufficient to prove the Epistle spurious.

When we give this context a closer inspection we shall see that such an explanation is unnecessary and is like putting out our hand to stay the ark of God. We will give the problem a closer study in our next article.

No.6. iii. 16.
pp. 221 - 225

In our last study which concluded with I Tim. iii. 15, we pointed out the impossibility of rendering the verse, 'the pillar and ground of the truth and confessedly great is the mystery of godliness' which has been put forward to avoid giving the church the position of 'foundation', and not Christ and the Word of God. Let us look closer at this verse. Stulos means a pillar, prop or support. Hedraioma (ground A.V.) can be translated 'bulwark' (Moulton and Milligan's Vocabulary of the Greek Testament). Peter, James and John likened to 'pillars' in Gal. ii. 9, but this did not oust Christ from His position as the primary Foundation.

We must note that the definite article is not used before either of these nouns, so the sense of the verse is that the church was a support and bulwark of the truth (amongst others). A building needs more than one pillar and the truth of God has more than one 'stay' to support it. Obviously there could be no pillar for the truth in the darkened pagan world. Surely in the groups of God's people who had been lately enlightened into the teaching of the Mystery the Truth was resident, as they shone as lights in the world of darkness, their corporate witness being a support and bulwark for the truth made known through Paul's ministry.

The fact that the churches declined from this cannot alter the fact that Christ intended the members of His Body to be a bulwark and guard for the truth committed to them, as these Pastorals epistles clearly teach. Once this is seen the difficulties of verse 15 vanish.

But our problems are not over for another one faces us in the next verse:

> "And without controversy great is the Mystery (Secret) of godliness; He Who was manifested in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached among the nations, believed on in the world, received up in glory" (I Tim. iii. 16, R.V.).

The A.V., based on the Received Text, reads "God was manifest in the flesh". Into the vexed question of what is the correct text here we cannot enter because this touches the very specialized knowledge of textual criticism. Let it be said straight away that few have the deep knowledge of N.T. Greek and long experience in handling the various classes of manuscripts which form the basis for all translations and this is necessary for any sound judgment on this matter. We are sometimes amazed at the dogmatism shown by some who truthfully are no more than amateurs in this respect and we deplore some of the wild and partisan statements that have been made regarding the Received Text. All who desire to be 'bulwarks' for the truth should shun this sort of thing.

The reader may be acquainted with the arguments concerning the original reading of the phrase under consideration in the Alexandrian manuscript in the British Museum. Since it came to England 250 years ago the writing has faded considerably and it is so frayed that it is practically impossible to decide whether it reads Theos contracted (God) or Hos (He Who). In spite of all the investigation, including X-ray treatment of the manuscript, it must be declared as 'not proven', and in any case we must remember that no dependence can be placed on one manuscript by itself.

Andrew R. Fausset, who edited Bengel's Gnomon, puts in a footnote on Volume IV page 263:

> "Theos (God) of the Received Text has none of the oldest MSS in its favour, no version as early as the seventh century, and as to the fathers, ex. gr. Cyril of Alexandria and Chrysostom, quoted for Theos (God), see Tregelles on the printed text of the N.T. in which he shows that these fathers are misquoted. Theodore, however, does support it. Liberatus, Victor Tununensis (both of 6th century) affirm that Macedonius, under the Emperor Anastasius changed Hos (who) into Theos (God) in order to support Nestorianism. AC corrected G, read Hos (Who), ... The Syr. Peschito, and in fact all the versions older than the seventh century have the relative Hos (Who) not Theos (God) . . . . . The silence of the fathers of the fourth century, though Theos (God) would have furnished them with a strong argument, is conclusive against it."

The Companion Bible in the margin says:

> "The R.V. prints 'He Who', and adds in the margin, 'Theos (God) rests on no sufficient evidence'. The probability is that the original reading was ho (which), with the Syriac and all the Latin Versions, to agree with musterion (neuter). The Greek uncial being O, some scribe added the letter s, making OC (He Who), which he thought made better sense. Later another put a mark in this O, making the word ΘC, the contraction for ΘEOC, God. This mark in Codex A in the British Museum, is said by some to be in different ink."

As we did with verse 15, we will look at the next verse more closely. The reading "He Who was manifested in the flesh" can only refer to Christ. It denotes pre-existence and cannot describe any created being. If anyone objects and says that angels have appeared as men in Scripture both in the Old and New Testaments, this does not contradict what we have just written. The first chapter of John's Gospel declares that the Word (Christ) was with God and was God (John i. 1). In verse 14 John states "the Word (Who is God) was made flesh, and dwelt among us". This is what angels have never done. They were given the power to assume a body (as the angels appearing to Abraham, Gen. xviii. 1, 2, 8) but they never stayed and lived with humanity in order to aid the human race. John's Gospel reveals "God manifest in the flesh" and this is what ITim.iii.16 does, so whether we translate as the A.V. or R.V., the deity of Christ is not touched. In any case this fundamental doctrine of the Christian faith does not rest on one text. The testimony of the whole of Scripture to this truth is overwhelming. The reader is referred to the author's booklet, The Lord Jesus Christ, God or only man? where much of this evidence is assembled.

Paul continues by saying that the Lord Jesus was 'justified in the spirit'. This appears to be parallel to the previous phrase. "In the flesh" denotes the sphere of operation of the Word 'manifest' and 'in the spirit' the sphere of the word 'justified'. This is very much like the statement in Rom. i. 2-4:

> "The gospel of God . . . . . concerning His Son Jesus Christ our Lord, which was made of the seed of David according to the flesh; and declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead."

The Lord Jesus was vindicated in the spiritual realm—specially in resurrection. He was 'seen of angels'. Angels rendered praise at His birth; they appeared to strengthen Him in Gethsemane and after His resurrection they were at the empty tomb and finally at His Ascension (Acts i. 10, 11). They were never able to see God in His essential nature as spirit.

Christ was 'preached among the nations, believed on in the world, received up in glory' (I Tim. iii. 16). The failure of Israel was overruled by the Lord for the gospel to spread over the then known world, and in this the ministry of the Apostle Paul was pre-eminent. The verse fittingly closes with the triumphant return of the Lord to the glory that was previously His:

> "And now, O Father, glorify Thou Me with Thine own self with the glory which I had with Thee before the world was" (John xvii. 5).

And the Ascension records the answer to this prayer. He was 'received up in glory'. Glory is a place—evidently associated with the 'right hand of God', the highest of all heights and it is this exalted sphere where the Saviour is now seated and the church which is His Body is seen to be seated with Him (Eph. ii. 6).

Many expositors have felt that in the verses of I Timothy that we have been considering, we have the outline of an early Christian hymn. The short unconnected sentences with the words similarly arranged, and the number of syllables almost equal and the ideas antithetically related, are characteristic of such a hymn. The clauses stand in parallelism; each two are connected as a pair turning on the opposition of heaven to earth: flesh and spirit, angels and Gentiles, world and glory, and there is a correspondence between the first and the last 'manifested in the flesh, ... received up in glory'.

Whether this is a primitive hymn or not, one thing is certain, namely that at the beginning and end of the epistle we have 'God invisible' and in the middle, "God manifest":

A | i. 17. The King immortal, invisible.
B | iii. 16. Christ Jesus, Who is God, manifest in the flesh.
A | vi. 15, 16. King of kings . . . Whom no man hath seen or can see.

We should note that the 'Mystery of godliness' is in direct opposition to the 'mystery of iniquity' (II Thess. ii. 7) and both find their expression in a person (1) the Lord Jesus Christ and (2) the man of sin, the son of perdition, energized by Satan, and both represent a climax of revelation of these two opposing forces. Let us never forget that Christ is Himself the Mystery (secret) of God (Col. ii. 2 R.V.)—Who later became 'manifest in the flesh'.

Having pointed out the exaltation of Christ in ascension, Paul now deals with the opposition of the evil one in the next chapter, for wherever truth flourishes, Satan will see to it that error will raise its head. This has been so from the beginning and will be intensified as this age comes to its end. We warn all who know and value the dispensation of the Mystery to be on their guard for this, to 'test all things' by the Word of God rightly divided, rigorously rejecting all that fails to meet this divine standard, no matter where it comes from. Satan's object is to undermine the truth committed to us and divide those whose eyes have been enlightened to see it and who are faithfully doing their utmost to make it known. Paul could say, regarding himself, 'we are not ignorant of his (Satan's) devices' (II Cor. ii. 11).

Would that this were true of all who love the truth of the 'good deposit'. The divided state of Christendom is a warning to us all as to how well Satan can do his deadly work. Let us see to it that, putting on the whole armour of God (Eph. vi.), we do not give place to the great deceiver in any respect.

The Second Epistle to TIMOTHY

No.1. Introduction, i. 1 - 6.
pp. 26 - 32

We now come to Paul's last epistle, his second letter to Timothy. That this is Paul's last divinely inspired writing, there can be no doubt. In chapter iv. 6 and 7 we read:

> "For I am already on the point of being sacrificed; the time of my departure has come. I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith" (R.S.V.).

These words are perfectly clear. They can be interpreted in no other way than that the Apostle had reached the end of his Christ-appointed ministry and his martyrdom was near at hand. But it has been represented that Col. i. 25 should read: "According to the dispensation of God which is given to me for you, to complete the Word of God", instead of 'fulfil' as the A.V. and R.V., and thus Colossians was not only the last epistle of Paul, but also the last writing of the N.T.

However, such an idea is completely foreign to the context, where the Apostle is dealing with his special ministry in connection with the Body of Christ which revealed the Mystery. It was this fulfilled the Word of God relating to this exalted company of believers. When Paul wished to refer to the Scriptures he used the words grammata and graphe, "all Scripture is given by inspiration of God" (II Tim. iii. 16) and if the completion of the Bible had been his subject in Col. i., these were the words he would have used. The word translated 'fulfil' he uses in Rom. xv. 19:

> "Through mighty signs and wonders, by the power of the Spirit of God; so that from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum, I have fully preached the gospel of Christ."

He certainly did not mean that his gospel witness by voice and pen ended here because it was completed in the sense of being finished. In Col. i. 25 the R.S.V. rendering is 'to make the Word of God fully known'. Professor A. T. Robertson's comment here is:

> "A fine phrase of a God-called preacher, to fill full and or give full scope to the Word of God. The preacher (Paul) is an expert on the Word of God by profession. See Paul's ideal about preaching in II Thess. 3:1" (Word Pictures of the N.T., p. 484).

Those who deny that II Timothy is Paul's last epistle take refuge in the argument that the Apostle thought he had finished the race when he wrote this epistle, not knowing there was a further ministry ahead of him. But if this is true, Paul made some serious statements which proved to be mistakes on his part. If he erred here, how can we accept any statement in this epistle as being God's truth? He might have made mistakes in other places, in which case the very foundation of Truth is undermined. This idea must be resisted at all costs.

Furthermore much is made of the fact that the word "mystery" does not occur in II Timothy. But then neither do the words 'redemption', 'hope' and others that are vital to the good deposit of truth made known through the Apostle of the Gentiles. Are we to assume that Paul had given up the thought of redemption and also 'that blessed hope' when he wrote this epistle?

Let it be said quite clearly that no one with any wisdom bases doctrine on negative arguments alone. This is a foundation of sand. Negative statements are of value only when they are accompanied by strong positive ones. If it had been incumbent on Paul to mention every item of doctrine that was of importance when he wrote to the churches or to individuals, he would have had to write books instead of epistles. Furthermore they had the great benefit of his oral teaching, making such writing unnecessary. (For this, compare II Thess. ii. 5 and note the context.) There is no doubt whatsoever that the second epistle to Timothy is Paul's last divinely inspired writing.

As regards human authorship, the unbroken tradition of the professing church up to the nineteenth century was to regard the Pastoral Epistles (I & II Timothy and Titus) as the work of Paul and therefore authentic. The first determined attack upon the apostolic authorship was made in 1807 by Schleiermacher, followed by Eichorn, Baur, deWette and others. Some have denied Pauline authorship, but have sought to keep a few genuine fragments, such as Harrison in his book The Problem of the Pastorals (1921), despite the fact that this argument has not shred a documentary evidence on which to rest. However, this viewpoint has been ably answered by scholars such as D. Guthrie and E. K. Simpson.

As to the supposed author of such a concoction, Simpson writes:

> "If the solemn avowal of these epistles that they are the apostle's authoritative missives be not instinct with the most sterling honour and integrity, but an equivocation, or if they are a patchwork of truth and falsehood, they form no part of the Church's treasures, but sink to the level of pious frauds . . . . .
>
> Dr. Harrison . . . . . tries to varnish the matter by asserting his factotum's "loyal devotion to Paul's name", but how a fraudulent abuse of that name breathes the spirit of loyalty is hard to perceive . . . . .
>
> He was a sorry specimen of a Paulinist, this pseudo-Paul conjured up from a nameless grave by the magic hand of criticism to vend smuggled wares under sacred auspices with such cool effrontery." The Pastoral Epistles, pp. 6 & 7.

If any reader wishes to pursue this any further, he is referred to the works of these two scholars. For ourselves, we unhesitatingly believe that Paul was the human author of this great epistle and this attitude is maintained throughout this study.

The structure (by C. H. Welch) of the epistle is now given and those who find such structures helpful should note the balancing sections carefully which will act as a guide to interpretation. The opening verses give the salutation and stress the Apostle's ministry which, as he frequently stated, accorded with the will of God. This is an essential ingredient for all Christian service and witness. The believer who wishes to be accounted faithful by the Lord dare not run unsent. He has to be certain that he is in the centre of God's will, for without this, it is valueless. Paul was a divine messenger with a divine message for the outcast Gentile world, and in this he was unique in his lifetime. He goes on to add 'according to the promise of life which is in Christ Jesus'. He was at the end of his earthly course and death was not far away. In these circumstances, what more precious thing could there be than the promise of endless life which was treasured up and only found in the Lord Jesus Christ? In comparison with this, the present life is nothing more than a shadow, transitory and without any permanent endurance.

Alexander—"The Lord will recompense him".
Paul heralding to the Gentiles (kerugma, verse 17).

A | iv. 19-22. Salutations. Eubulus, Pudens, Linus, Claudia. Benediction.

"God hath given to us eternal life and this life is in His Son" corroborates John in his first epistle (I John v. 11). We now have God's promise relating to it. That promise is fulfilled in resurrection, when this corruptible puts on incorruption and this mortal puts on immortality. Then indeed death will be swallowed up in victory (I Cor. xv. 51-54), and the 'life which is life indeed' will commence, never to have an end. Such is absolutely fundamental to our 'high calling of God in Christ Jesus', for how could this be enjoyed without life unending?

The Apostle adds 'mercy' in verse 2 to his usual salutation of grace and peace. Paul uses this word twelve times and it signifies 'compassion' and strikes a tender note here. We have a God Who is rich in mercy and in understanding of our every need and Timothy would be reminded that this was so. The bond between the Apostle and the young man was close, indeed closer than that of any other of Paul's fellow-workers. While he appreciated all those who faithfully laboured with him, his relationship with Timothy, as a father and son (Phil. ii. 22), was unique, warm, intimate and specially dear to his heart, as the second verse of this letter makes clear where he addresses Timothy as 'my beloved child' (R.V.).

This led to constant intercession on the part of the Apostle, for he knew the great importance and value of this ministry of prayer on behalf of others (cp. Rom.i.9; Phil.i.4; Col.i. 3). As he thinks of Timothy he thanks God (verses 1-3) Whom, he declares, he served 'from my forefathers'. While God's leading and revelation had taken him away in some respects from Judaism, so much so that he was deemed a heretic, ". . . after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and in the prophets" (Acts xxiv. 14), yet he had not left their God. He still served Him with a pure conscience (I Tim. i. 5), this assuredly helping him to hold on his way, although it was often a way of loneliness and misunderstanding.

This intercession of Timothy was in no sense spasmodic, it was continuous, "without ceasing, night and day" (verse 3) which shows the seriousness of the Apostle's purpose, reminiscent of Acts xx. 31. This was not only true in relation to his son in the faith, but also for all the churches. It provides a wonderful example to us all. How often believers have to mourn the poverty of their prayer life!

Paul now refers to the young man's tears, evidently at their last parting. He was obviously deeply attached to the Apostle and felt the severance keenly. Paul does not disguise his own pleasure at the prospect of seeing Timothy again 'greatly desiring to see thee' (i. 4), "that I may be filled with joy". As we have seen, the word 'fill' (pleroo) is one of the great words of the Colossian epistle and Paul uses it no less than 23 times. Here his joy would abound as he contemplates their meeting once more if possible, and he is reminded, as he contemplates Timothy's "unfeigned faith", of his Christian background, his godly grandmother and mother. These powerful home influences and the saintly atmosphere had evidently greatly impressed Timothy, and many a believer today has to thank God for the influence of an out and out Christian home.

The indwelling faith in Timothy is paralleled in Paul's epistles by the indwelling God (II Cor. vi. 16), the indwelling Spirit (Rom. viii. 11; II Tim. i. 14) and the indwelling Word of Christ (Col. iii. 16). The illustration of a building is often used by the Apostle to express the inner characteristics of the Truth of God. There was no doubt whatsoever of the reality and genuineness of Timothy's faith.

There occurs a threefold reference to 'remembrance' in chapter i. and we shall find the number three stamped on this epistle as it was on Ephesians. Paul now reminds Timothy that he needed no new gift for his Christian service but rather a re-kindling of that already received. We need not be disturbed because the young man was asked to stir up a gift that was given him during the Acts period. Some of the Pentecostal gifts were basic to faithful ministry and so were beyond dispensational limitations. The Apostle does not describe this gift, so it is useless to try to guess what it was, but it was evidently as needful to Timothy at this juncture as when it was first given. The word is used of re-kindling the dying embers of a fire. Something needed reviving in Timothy's experience, hence the exhortation. The times had become difficult and dangerous indeed. Paul's young son in the faith could not afford to neglect any source of strength. As we look around today, we are in a similar position. Let us lean hard upon the Lord's strength and the greatness of all His promises that can never fail.

No.2. i. 7 - 11.
pp. 49 - 54

After exhorting Timothy to stir up that had been given him at the outset of his ministry, Paul reminds him that "God has not given us the spirit of fearfulness, but of power and love and discipline" (II Tim. i. 7 R.V.). Deilia 'fearfulness' means shrinking to the point of cowardice and here the Apostle is delicately reminding his sensitive son in the faith of the need of being brave and not playing the coward, however difficult and dangerous were the times. For this the almighty resurrection power of Christ was at his disposal to make him more than sufficient, together with the love of God that 'passes understanding', both of these leading to self-control and practical prudence which would be invaluable in the outworking of the 'good deposit' of truth.

Now comes a threefold reference to being ashamed (R.V.):

> "Be not ashamed therefore of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me His prisoner" (8).
> "I was appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher. For the which cause I suffer also these things: yet I am not ashamed" (11, 12).
> "Onesiphorus . . . . . oft refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain" (16).

We need not assume that Timothy had already shown symptoms of shame, but Paul is evidently seeking to strengthen his mind should the temptation arise. The Apostle was now living for the most part in loneliness and rejection. Imprisonment for the truth evidently carried with it a social stigma and the danger of giving a public witness to a religion that was now illicit, made the possibility of shame a real one.

At first sight it seems extraordinary that the Apostle should couple himself with the Lord. We can well understand the need to urge Timothy not to be ashamed of his Saviour, but at the same time to say 'do not be ashamed of me either' appears to be sheer egotism. This is not the only time he seems to push himself forward. Note the following:

> ". . . . . the gospel; whereunto I am appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles" (i. 10, 11).
>
> "Hold fast the form of sound words which thou hast heard of me" (i. 13).
>
> "All they which are in Asia be turned away from me" (i. 15).
>
> "The things that thou hast heard of me . . . . . commit thou to faithful men . . . . ." (ii. 2).
>
> "Remember that Jesus Christ . . . . . was raised from the dead according to my gospel" (ii. 8).
>
> "Thou hast fully known my doctrine, manner of life, purpose, faith, longsuffering, love, patience . . . . ." (iii. 10).
>
> "Notwithstanding the Lord stood with me, and strengthened me; that by me the preaching might be fully known, and that all the Gentiles might hear" (iv. 17).

This stress on self would be sheer egotism apart from the position given him by the ascended Christ as His mouthpiece to us who are Gentiles. When Paul refers to himself alone, he is 'less than the lest of all saints' (Eph. iii. 8), and 'the chief of sinners' (ITim.i.15), and he can say with truth, "not I, but Christ" (Gal. ii. 20). But when he speaks as the Apostle of Christ to the Gentiles, he is then the channel through which the Lord Himself is speaking, and he writes and teaches with all His authority. When this is understood, the constant references to himself and his ministry can be seen in their true light and we therefore do not talk of "Pauline doctrine" as though his epistles were just the putting forward of his own ideas.

To be ashamed of Paul and his ministry is to be ashamed of the Lord and this reminds one of His solemn words in Luke ix. 26, "for whosoever shall be ashamed of Me and of My words, of him shall the Son of Man be ashamed, when He shall come in His own glory, and in His Father's, and of the holy angels". Alas, it is only too easy to deny, by word or deed, the special testimony given through Paul, the prisoner of Christ Jesus, or to keep silence when we should speak, for fear of other believers and their attitude toward us. May we ever be delivered from the 'fear of man that bringeth a snare', and any attitude or mode of life that can be construed as being ashamed of the glorious deposit of truth given through Paul's prison ministry.

Timothy is now reminded that he must be ready to accept any hardship that a faithful witness to this 'good deposit' might bring:

> ". . . . . suffer hardship with the gospel according to the power of God" (i. 8, R.V.).

Sunkakopatheo 'suffer hardship' seems to have been coined by the Apostle 'to share suffering with someone else' (compare also ii. 3). Timothy is invited to share Paul's sufferings and this evil treatment meted out to those who determined to be faithful is a recurring theme in this epistle (ii. 9; iv. 5). Later the Apostle states, 'all that would live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution' (iii. 12 R.V.) and this is a reminder to all of us that there is a price to be paid if we want to be counted among those whom the Lord deems 'faithful'. Let us not therefore be surprised when the tests and difficulties come.

However, it is indeed good to realize that the almighty power of God is the source of all strength, wisdom and endurance and again and again the Apostle relied alone on this and urged other fellow-believers to do the same. To trust in anything else is to court disaster; to rely on the exceeding power that conquered death is to find it always more than sufficient for every need. So Timothy is urged not to fear the consequences of standing loyally for the sacred trust committed to him, for this glorious power could be his at all times, enabling him to triumph over all the trials and persecution through which he might have to pass.

Paul now continues:

> "God, Who hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to His own purpose (plan) and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the age-times" (i. 9, R.V.).

While the Bible is the revelation of a mighty plan conceived by God in past eternity involving both heaven and earth, how wonderful it is that the individual child of God is not lost in all its vastness! Each member of the Body of Christ did not come into this relationship by accident or human choice. It was all part of the Lord's design and exceeding grace and love. Human merit could not come into it, for there was none ('not according to our works'). Just as Eph. i. 4 assures each member that he was 'chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world', so here a glorious part was given to every member in Christ Jesus before the age-times (literally), a unique time period, as we have seen when studying Ephesians. Other phases of God's purposes are linked with the period 'since the foundation of the world' and if words mean anything, these two periods must be distinct, for before an event and after an event express two distinct aspects of time. We have the same expression in Titus i. 2 which the A.V. translates 'before the world began'. J. N. Darby renders both 'before the ages of time' and Weymouth's original version reads 'before the commencement of the ages', which are both truer to the original God-inspired Greek than the A.V.

In contrast to this vast look back into the past and the beginning of God's great plan for His creation is the now of manifestation:

> "But hath now been manifested by the appearing of our Saviour Christ Jesus, Who abolished death, and brought life and incorruption to light through the gospel, whereunto I was appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher" (i. 10, 11, R.V.).

This is parallel again to the opening of the epistle to Titus, the 'now' of II Timothy corresponding to the 'due times' of Titus i. 3 A.V., or as the R.V. renders it:

> "God, Who cannot lie, promised before times eternal (lit. age-times), but in His own seasons manifested His word in the message wherewith I was intrusted according to the commandment of God our Saviour."

God chooses His own time in His perfect wisdom to reveal the various phases of His redemptive purposes, and these time periods are always exact and fitting. The accurate student of the Word will always recognize this and seek to avoid the error that comes from reading past truth into the present and vice versa. Much confusion in Christendom could have been avoided if this had always been carried out. How often do we read of an explanation of the Mystery of Eph. iii. that takes us back to the O.T., when it is clearly stated that, at that time, it was hidden in God! (Eph. iii. 9; Col. i.26). The revelation of this great Secret to the children of God and its heavenly calling and destiny is now, according to God's own season, and is made known through Paul 'the prisoner of Christ Jesus', according to His commandment.

The epistle continues:

> ". . . . . our Saviour, Christ Jesus, Who abolished death, and brought life and incorruption to light through the gospel, whereunto I was appointed a preacher ('herald' margin), and an apostle, and a teacher" (i. 10, 11, R.V.).

'Abolish' is too strong a translation, for we know only too well that death is still with us. Katargeo 'abolish' is one of Paul's favourite words, for he uses it twenty-five times. It is a rare term scarcely used outside the papyri. It means to frustrate, nullify, disempower or more literally, to put out of gear or render inoperative. We notice its usage in Rom. vi. 6 where it is translated 'destroyed', again too strong a rendering, for we know, alas, from practical experience at times that our sinful old nature has not been destroyed.

It has been 'rendered inoperative' by being crucified with Christ and this becomes true in our experience when we 'reckon' it to be so. Death was not abolished at our Saviour's first advent, but He defeated it by His redemptive work on the cross, and by His glorious resurrection took the sting out of it for the believer, which is sin (I Cor. xv. 56) and so the 'king of terrors' has been robbed of his domination and fear, for the Lord Jesus has tasted all death's bitterness in our stead and for us who know Him as Saviour and Lord, we only 'fall asleep'. Death cannot finally hold the believer, for he has been united to the Conqueror of death, and because He lives, we shall live also eternally.

Not only did the Lord Jesus make death inoperative for the believer, but by His sacrificial work on the cross He brought life and incorruption to light by it. We have already seen that this incorruptible life and immortality are to be found only in Christ and not in fallen humanity. Any teaching that man possesses these apart from the Lord and His salvation is pagan in origin, flatly contradicting the Scriptures and comes from the father of lies. The Apostle refers to his threefold office of herald (preacher or proclaimer), apostle and teacher once more in I Tim. ii. 7. He was a proclaimer of the truth committed to him by the Lord Jesus, a sent one (apostle) by Him and a teacher of the Gentiles, and to emphasize the importance of his ministry he declares 'I lie not' (ITim.ii.7), showing that he was not inventing or exaggerating the unique position given to him by God, as His mouthpiece to the Gentile world.

No.3. i. 12 - 18.
pp. 61 - 66

The Apostle Paul, having referred to the gospel which had been committed to him by the risen Christ (I Tim. i. 10, 11), now reminds Timothy of the cost: "for which cause I suffer these things". His imprisonment and treatment as a criminal was the direct result of his faithful stand for Christ and his ministry during the perilous time in which he was living. Yet, in order to encourage Timothy, he states:

> "Yet I am not ashamed; for I know Him Whom I have believed, and I am persuaded that He is able to guard that which I have committed unto Him against that day" (i. 12, R.V.).

The margin of the Revised Version reads "or, that which He committed unto me" (Greek: my deposit). Paul did not say "I know what I have believed", but "I know Him Whom I have believed", and this is immeasurably greater and better. The knowledge of Christ Jesus is the summing up of all truth, and the goal for the believer is "that I may get to know Him" (Phil. iii. 10). This will include, of course, the precious deposit of truth which He has committed to us to guard and proclaim for His glory. This truth He will most certainly protect until "that day", and Paul's continuous assurance of this is made clear by the perfect tense in the Greek.

Paratheke (deposit) is the shortened form of the full term for a legal deposit parakatatheke, and many examples of its use can be found in the papyri. This word occurs in verse 14 and I Tim. vi. 20 describing the truth deposited with Timothy and it has the same meaning in verse 12. Paul is not thinking of something which he had deposited with the Lord, but rather the wondrous revelation of truth the Lord had deposited with him to make known primarily to the Gentiles. This is further explained in verse 13:

> "Hold the pattern of sound words which thou hast heard of me in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus."

Hupotuposis (form or pattern) is only used in one other place in the N.T. where the salvation and ministry of Paul is declared to be a 'pattern' for those who would hereafter believe (I Tim. i. 12-16). The word means delineation or outline. Arndt and Gingrich in their Greek-English Lexicon give the meaning as standard, which fits the context in II Timothy perfectly. All the truth deposited by the Lord with the Apostle Paul was the divine standard of truth for Timothy, and still is the standard by which all Christian preaching, teaching and service must be measured. As the Apostle of the Gentiles his ministry specially fits this Gentile age. How thankful we ought to be that we have this divine standard by which we can test all we hear and read with so many conflicting ideas on every hand. This is the only sure way we can sort out for ourselves truth from error and know exactly where we stand.

Although Timothy knew of the ministry of Peter and John he is not directed to this by the Apostle. Such constituted the standard of truth relating primarily to the faithful remnant of Israel and it will be so again at a future time when the Lord takes up Israel again just prior to His Second Advent. Timothy must now guard what he had heard and received from Paul in faith and minister it in love (13). The Apostle reminds him of the one source of power that is sufficient, namely 'the Holy Spirit that dwelleth in us'. The important word 'deposit' is another term occurring three times in II Timothy. We have had it in i. 12, 14 and in ii. 2 it occurs in a verbal form and is translated 'commit'.

It is well to be clear as to what this 'good deposit' embraces. It surely consists of all the truth made known through Paul's Prison Epistles, namely the glorious news of salvation by faith in Christ Jesus through grace, apart from human works or merit. This he received directly from the Lord Jesus (Gal. i. 8-12). But this is not all. It is a profound mistake to stop here. This gospel is certainly the foundation, but upon it rest the truths of sanctification, consecration in service and then, to crown all, the revelation of the Mystery (secret) concerning the joint-Body, the church which is Christ's fullness (Eph. i. & iii. and Col. i.). Its special constitution, witness, walk and hope are at the heart of this 'good deposit' which Paul declares was made known to him by revelation of the Lord Jesus (Eph. iii. 1-3). In the mercy and purpose of God this has been preserved by the Lord and come down to us today. Have we entered into it by faith and, rejoicing in it, do we regard it as a sacred trust?

Timothy is thus encouraged by the Apostle to hold fast and guard the special teaching that had been delivered to him by God. Now he warns Timothy of some who had not done so:

> "This thou knowest, that all that are in Asia turned away from me: of whom are Phygellus and Hermogenes" (i. 15, R.V.).

The defection of the Asiatics is spoken of as a fact well known to Timothy. It has been suggested that witnesses for the Apostle who had come from various centres in Asia Minor became terrified to Christianity and, out of fear, forsook Paul lest they should become involved. This may have been true, but such a number could hardly justify the phrase "all in Asia", nor can this be construed as meaning "all from Asia". That the perils of the day played a large part in this defection there can be no doubt. Any who publicly associated themselves with the Apostle took their lives in their hands and, if they failed to stand with him, who are we to judge them? Are we prepared to give our lives for the Saviour if need be? Two Christians are named who would be known to Timothy, namely Phygellus and Hermogenes. These were evidently leaders in this defection who failed Paul in his hour of supreme need and would therefore be a warning to his beloved son in the faith. Even allowing for the danger of the times, we can see that the spiritual condition of the sphere in which Paul had laboured could not have been healthy. No mention is made of local churches by Paul in this epistle nor their attitude toward him at this time of his service testing. The Apostle was making a lonely stand. In iv. 16 he says, "at my first defence no one took part, but all forsook me; may it not be laid to their account". We quote the words of Dr. H. D. M. Spence on this passage in chapter i.:

> "The simple and more obvious meaning is here to be preferred, and we assume as certain that the forsaking, the giving up St. Paul, took place in Asia itself. Large numbers of Christians, if not whole churches, repudiated their connection with the great father of Gentile Christianity, and possibly disobeyed some of his teaching. What, in fact, absolutely took place in Asia while St. Paul lay bound waiting for death in Rome, had been often threatened in Corinth and in other centres. Party feeling ran high in those days, we know, and one of the most sorrowful trials the great-hearted St. Paul had to endure in the agony of his last witnessing for his Lord, was the knowledge that his name and teaching no longer was held in honour in some of those Asian churches so dear to him. The geographical term Asia is rather vague. It may, and indeed strictly speaking does, include Mysia, Phrygia, Lydia, Caria; but such widespread defection from Pauline teaching seems improbable and there is no tradition that anything of the kind ever took place. St. Paul probably wrote the term more in the old Homeric sense and meant the district in the neighbourhood of the river Cayster."

There are some expositors who deny that there was any large scale apostasy at this time, but one comes to a different conclusion when one searches for the distinctive truths of his prison ministry in the early centuries that followed. While there must have been the faithful who had eyes to see and divine courage to hold fast to the good deposit of truth, for the most part Paul's witness has made little impression upon history all down this age. The early believers and leaders did not fully grip this doctrine and gross spiritual darkness soon followed, coming to its climax in the Middle Ages up to the Reformation. Even the basic truth of justification by faith was lost, so it is not to be wondered at that great truth of the Mystery was all but unknown. Since the Reformation, truth has been in the process of recovery in the inverse order in which it was lost*. If today we are glorying in the spiritual riches revealed in Paul's prison ministry, let us not only rejoice and be thankful, but also realize the great responsibility this brings and the need for absolute faithfulness to witness to this sacred trust.

[* - The first truth to be lost was the Mystery, then the doctrine of the Second Coming, followed by Justification by faith.]

The Apostle Paul now refers to the testimony of one who had remained loyal to him and therefore was an example to Timothy:

> "The Lord grant mercy unto the house of Onesiphorus, for he oft refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain; but, when he was in Rome, he sought me diligently, and found me (the Lord grant unto him to find mercy of the Lord in that day); and in how many things he ministered at Ephesus, thou knowest very well" (i. 16-18, R.V.).

Onesiphorus was a brave man, for we have pointed out the danger of anyone linking himself publicly with Paul. How easily he could have excused himself by saying Paul's whereabouts were difficult or impossible to find! But instead of this, he searched 'diligently' for him till he discovered where he was imprisoned. Not only this, but the Apostle declared 'he often refreshed me'. The word translated 'refreshed' is unique in the N.T. As a noun it occurs in Acts iii. 19, 'the times of refreshing', referring to the blessed effects of the Lord's Second Advent. Moffatt's translation is 'he braced me up'.

The simple ministry of this believer was like a refreshing breeze to the Apostle, undergoing the rigours of his Roman imprisonment and would not be forgotten by the Lord 'in that day', that is the day of His assessment of Christian witness and service. Onesiphorus was not ashamed of the witness for which Paul stood and this gives us the third occurrence of the word 'to be ashamed' in this epistle.

Because Paul refers to the house of Onesiphorus some have argued that he must have been dead when the Apostle wrote. But he could just as easily have been away from home and in any case we should realize that the head and his household are inseparable. The Roman church has tried to make capital out of the prayer here offered by asserting that this was an example of prayers for the dead.

One thing is certain, that such a practice finds no foundation whatsoever in any part of the Scriptures, and a person must be hard pressed to try to extract this meaning from these verses.

The Apostle's son in the faith knew very well of his friend's loyal service at Ephesus, for Timothy was the overseer there, and this again would be an encouragement for him to emulate the faithfulness and courage of Onesiphorus.

We live in similar days of testing and difficulty. The need is great for us to avail ourselves of the Lord's strength so that we can say in Paul's words:

> "I can do all things through Christ Who makes me strong" (Phil. iv. 13).

No.4. ii. 1 - 9.
pp. 81 - 87

The second chapter commences with the word 'therefore' which links it with what has gone before:

> "Thou therefore, my child, be strengthened in the grace that is in Christ Jesus" (ii. 1, R.V.).

The encouragements and warnings of the first chapter must be constantly borne in mind by Timothy and the one thing needful to face up to these adequately was to be strong. The only strength however that would be all-sufficient was found alone in Christ Jesus and for Timothy to trust any other was to court disaster. This is a practical word for us all. We are brought back once more to the grace of God, and it is a profound mistake to limit such grace to initial salvation; "Unto every one of us is grace given according to the measure of the gift of Christ" (Eph. iv. 7). Divine grace not only saves, but it equips and strengthens us for Christian service, however exacting this may be. The word translated 'be strong' is used eight times in connection with the Apostle Paul. This is the number of resurrection and it is no less than resurrection power that is at our disposal by faith (Eph. i. 18-21). This is the greatest of all powers, the power that conquers death. How foolish we should be not to trust it to work in and through us rather than to rely on our own feeble strength!

Paul's message to Timothy continues:

> "And the things which thou hast heard from me among many witnesses, the same commit (deposit) thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also" (ii. 2, R.V.).

The Apostle had received this sacred deposit of truth from the risen Lord Jesus and had made it known through his oral and written ministry. In this way Timothy had received it, and with the Apostle's witness so soon coming to an end, he was about to assume the leadership and full responsibility for this great deposit of truth.

In his turn, he must look to the future, for Paul was ever solicitous for the preservation of this distinctive and precious witness, and such preservation must never be left to chance. Timothy must pass on or deposit this teaching (paratithemi a word linked with paratheke, deposit, which we have already considered). But this must be to (1) faithful men, (2) with the ability to pass it on and teach others. Let us note the order, for it is of the utmost importance; it is absolute loyalty first and ability afterwards. Many times this has been reversed with disastrous consequences. A man is given prominence in Christian work because he is an able speaker; or he is a brilliant scholar; or he has a winning personality and is very capable. None of these qualifications will be sufficient without the necessary ingredient of faithfulness. "It is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful" (I Cor. iv. 2). "Well done, thou good and faithful servant" (Matt. xxv. 21, 23). Over and over again this is stressed in God's Word, for the Lord requires not quantity first but quality. Those who ignore this do so at their peril, for there is the judgment seat of Christ to face for all of us in regard to our Christian service. Without utter faithfulness, all our efforts may be regarded as 'wood, hay and stubble', to be consumed by the fire of God's holiness (I Cor. iii. 11-15).

Faithfulness may well be costly to us of course, sometimes leading to a pathway of loneliness and misunderstanding, but what does this matter when the Lord Himself has promised never to leave or forsake us, and in the day of resurrection, His smile, His commendation, His reward, will more than outweigh either the praise or the condemnation of men. It is important too to note that in this context we have the only 'apostolic succession' known to the N.T. All else is based on claims that cannot be substantiated by the Word of God.

We have already seen in our Ephesian studies the importance of teaching. The teacher is as much a gift of the ascended Christ as the evangelist (Eph. iv. 11). For the most part today the evangelist gets the prominence, while the teacher is relegated to second place, or no place at all! Is it any wonder that churches and chapels contain babes in Christ who never advance and grow spiritually? Such cannot receive any more than the milk of the gospel (I Cor. iii. 1, 2). The 'strong meat', the exceeding spiritual riches of Paul's prison ministry, is beyond them, and this is one reason why the unsearchable riches of Christ are so little known and received among God's children today.

Another reason is the difficulty and often isolation of the way that accompanies faithful witness to this truth. This has been so from the beginning, for Paul now says to Timothy:

> "Suffer hardship with me, as a good solider of Christ Jesus" (II Tim. ii. 3, R.V.).

None of us likes hardship and the temptation is to desert the straight and narrow pathway of loyalty when we see it coming. The Apostle does not paint this pathway in rosy colours. Timothy is warned before hand of the cost (compare also i. 8), and to emphasize this Paul uses three illustrations (1) the soldier, (2) the athlete, and (3) the farmer or husbandman.

(1) The good soldier is brought forward first, but it is not fighting qualities or prowess that are stressed! Indeed the faithful servant of the Lord is told that he 'must not fight (strive A.V.)' (II Tim. ii. 24). Rather it is suffering and endurance and the complete freedom from all entanglements which was demanded of the Roman soldier. A good soldier must be prepared to 'rough it', to endure hardness and discomfort. Not for him are the comforts and luxuries of the home. Soldiering must be a full-time occupation without any distractions:

> "No soldier on service entangleth himself in the affairs of this life: that he may please him who enrolled him as a soldier" (ii. 4, R.V.).

The word bios, life, has a different shade of meaning from zoe the more frequent word. It is translated 'living' in Mark xii. 44; Luke viii. 43; xv. 12. It means 'livelihood' or getting one's living by one's business or daily work. Now there is nothing wrong in this until it entangles. When this happens it begins to occupy the place of Christ-directed service and with the result that we are weighed down in the heavenly race. The earnest runner must be on the alert for this, for weights must be laid aside (Heb. xii. 1, 2) if we wish to run like the Apostle did and finish our course with joy.

(2) Paul further enforces his point by referring to the athlete in the Olympic Games:

> "And if also a man contend in the games, he is not crowned, except he have contended lawfully" (ii. 5, R.V.).

Many points could have been stressed in connection with the athlete, but the one brought forward here by the Apostle is the need 'to contend lawfully', in other words to keep the rules. The rules governing the Olympic Games were strict. Athletes had to state on oath that they had completed ten month's training before they were eligible to enter the contest.

Any runner who had not done this would have no chance to win and be crowned, but would also lower the standard of the Games. Severe penalties were imposed on all who infringed the rules. The application to the believer is clear. Saving grace has placed our feet at the beginning of the heavenly race, but there is no possibility of receiving the Lord's approval at the end and being crowned by Him unless we have kept the rules which are so clearly set out in the practical sections of the Prison Epistles which make known our 'high calling of God in Christ Jesus'.

(3) The Farmer:

> "The husbandman that laboureth must be the first to partake of the fruits" (ii. 6, R.V.).

The reference here is to the labouring husbandman, i.e. the farmer of gardener who works. Everyone knows that hard work must precede any lasting results in gardening or farming. The lazy man gets no results. His land, covered with weeds, is an open indication of his idleness. In this section of the epistle therefore, the stress is on Christian service and all that it entails. In the Scriptures distinction is made between the believer looked at as a saved sinner and justified in the Lord's sight by faith and grace, and the believer as a servant of the Lord who can render to Him either good or bad service. Let us be quite clear as regard to this. Some, not recognizing the all-sufficiency of God's work in justifying the sinner who believes in Christ, try to combine this with human works and so attempt to supplement what God has done. This is serious indeed for it denies the finished work of Christ on the cross. When He said "It is finished", the work of redemption was completed in the fullest sense of the word and needed no human addition.

Indeed, all such are an evidence of unbelief. On the other hand, there are others who so stress salvation by grace apart form works that "good works" form no part of their conception of Truth. They have forgotten that although Eph. ii. 8, 9 states that grace-by-faith-salvation is 'not of works', yet it is 'unto good works' (verse 10). In other words 'good works' or Christian service and witness should flow from such free and unmerited salvation. The sinner has been saved to serve, and let us make no mistake, every true believer is called by the Lord to serve Him and to discover His will in this respect. It is only self-deception to refuse to recognize this. The words servant and service so permeate the epistles that it must be deliberate blindness that eliminates such service and responsibility to the Lord from the Christian's life. To the believers at Colossae Paul wrote 'ye serve the Lord Christ' (Col. iii. 23, 24) and what a privilege it is to be allowed to serve such a Saviour and such a Master! On the other hand let us remember that the Lord has no conscripts among His people. Service will never be forced by Him. It must rather be the practical response of our love and gratitude to Him. We can be good servants or bad servants, faithful or unfaithful, and a righteous heavenly Father must and will take account of this in the day of reckoning for what we have done in His Name during our earthly life time.

In the section of II Timothy we are studying, we repeat that it is the labouring farmer that is being stressed. How far are we prepared to really labour for the Lord? Are we prepared to sacrifice and tire ourselves for Him? We can often tire ourselves in our pleasures, but what about our daily service for the One Who has given His all for us? The true answer to this shows the extent of our love for Him, no more and no less. Let us stir ourselves while the day of opportunity lasts and make the most of the time remaining to us!

The Lord will not be in any man's debt and He takes account of all loyal and practical response to Him. Crowns and rewards are for faithful servants, those who have pleased Him in their outworking of His truth and have been prepared to suffer if need be. "No cross, no crown" expresses this truth. II Timothy is really going over the same ground as Philippians, but with different illustrations. In both it is the response of the believer that is stressed, with the possibility of a prize or crown at the end. Never let us forget that prizes or crowns may be lost, but equally they may be won. We are deciding each day which it is to be in our experience when we meet the Lord in resurrection face to face.

Let us sum up the teaching of these three illustrations:

THE GOOD SOLDIER. Endurance. Non-entanglement.
THE DISCIPLINED ATHLETE. The Crown. Keeping the rules.
THE PRACTICAL FARMER. Toil. Then first partaker of the fruits.

Verse 7 continues:

> "Consider what I say; for the Lord shall give thee understanding in all things" (R.V.).

Noeo, translated 'consider', means 'to think over', 'to grasp the meaning' and if Timothy will do this, the promise is that the Lord will supply all needed understanding. For our encouragement we should remember that if we ponder and apply God's truth to our own lives, the Lord will increase our power of understanding which will blot out our ignorance and conform our lives closer to His will.

Paul has not only brought before Timothy God's truth, but also what it would cost, if faithfully lived and proclaimed.

There were 'afflictions of the gospel' (i. 8). He would be called to suffer hardship with the Apostle (ii. 3) and in order to come triumphantly through these experiences, Timothy's gaze is now directed to the risen Christ just as it is expressed in Heb. xii. 1-3. So Paul goes on to say:

> "Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead, of the seed of David, according to my gospel: wherein I suffer hardship unto bonds, as a malefactor; but the Word of God is not bound" (II Tim. ii. 8, 9, R.V.).

The A.V. reads "Remember that Jesus Christ . . . . . was raised from the dead" as though the Apostle was asking Timothy to remember the fact of His resurrection. There was no need to ask Timothy to accept the truth that Christ had been raised from the dead. As a genuine believer, he could not do otherwise. What the A.V. has missed is the passive participle (egegermenon) which draws attention to a present experience of the risen Lord. He is saying in effect, "look away from the present testing and hardship to the risen One Who is all-sufficient for your needs". Paul was doing this very thing, for although he was now being treated as a criminal, chained night and day in a Roman dungeon, yet the risen and ascended Lord Jesus was his constant sufficiency. The Apostle's reference to Christ as the "seed of David" takes us back to Rom. i. 3 where, as in our present context, he is dealing with the gospel he had received form Christ (Gal. i. 11, 12). But this gospel was not without its cost to Paul. He was able to endure all his sufferings "for the elect's sakes". He realized that although nominally he was the prisoner of Nero, in actuality he was the 'prisoner of the Lord for you Gentiles' (Eph. iii. 1). He was in this position by Christ's permission, and although he himself was chained, yet the Word of God was still free and making headway in bringing sinners to a knowledge of salvation and then to the deeper truths resident in Christ. Satan might rejoice that he was shut up in prison, yet he could never imprison the Word of God! "The Word of God is not bound" (II Tim. ii. 9). These triumphant words still ring out with truth today.

No.5. ii. 10 - 15.
pp. 106 - 111

The Apostle Paul has stated a reason for the endurance of his sufferings as a prisoner at Rome. It is "for the elect's sakes" (II Tim. ii. 10), that is, not only for those who had already responded to the Truth, but for those in the future who would yet do so. The Apostle doubtless had in mind the whole company of God's children who constitute the Body of Christ, those whom the Father had elected in Christ before the foundation of the world (Eph. i. 3, 4). His desire was not just that they might be saved but might experience 'that salvation with eternal glory' (II Tim. ii. 10) which takes the thought much further. It is comparable with the salvation to the uttermost of the epistle to the Hebrews, which like Philippians and II Timothy is stressing in parallel teaching the maturing of the saint; the running of the race with respect to the recompense of reward (Heb. xi. 24-26) as Moses did.

That there is such a difference the following verses of II Timothy make clear. To enforce this, Paul quotes the fourth of the five "faithful sayings" of the Pastoral Epistles (I Tim. i. 15; iii. 1; iv. 9; II Tim. ii. 11; Titus iii. 8). These were probably fragments of hymns in which doctrine was embodied. This one reads:

> "Faithful is the saying: for if we died with Him, we shall also live with Him: if we endure, we shall also reign with Him: if we shall deny Him, He also will deny us: if we are faithless, He abideth faithful; for He cannot deny Himself" (ii. 11-13, R.V.).

We shall have problems with this context unless we recognize two distinct lines of truth that we have already touched upon when dealing with the Philippian epistle. We must distinguish between (1) salvation by grace and all it entails, which is not of works, but is the free gift of God and is received personally by faith in Christ and what He has accomplished on the cross, and (2) Christian service which should follow or 'accompany' salvation, resulting in a prize or crown which will be awarded by the Lord if that service is reckoned by Him as faithful. If not, the crown or reward will be denied, as the above verses teaches, but initial salvation cannot be lost, for "He abides faithful, He cannot deny Himself", or take back what He has given as a free gift, for the 'gifts and calling of God are without repentance', that is, change of mind on His part (Rom. xi. 29). The reader should carefully ponder I Cor. iii. 10-15 where a sharp distinction is made between reward for service and salvation by grace.

Since all believers died with Christ in God's reckoning, they will all live with Him in resurrection somewhere in that new heaven and earth that He is yet to create when the present universe passes away. Their dying with Christ does not depend upon their faithfulness or unfaithfulness in service; it is solely God's doing. Likewise their living with Him by being raised from the dead and changed into His likeness does not depend on them either. It is the consummation of the glorious work of salvation wrought by the Lord Jesus and will be brought about by Him 'that quickeneth the dead'. He said "Because I live, ye shall live also" (John xiv. 19).

But in II Tim. ii. 12 we step out of the realm of free grace into the realm of responsibility and service. We are saved to "work out our salvation" (not work for it) which God has worked within us (Phil. ii. 12, 13). If we do this faithfully, then this context assures us that we shall not only live with Christ, but also reign with Him. The word 'also' shows this is something additional to salvation. We have millions of people living in Great Britain, but only one, our Queen, is reigning on the throne. There is a vast difference between living and reigning, even in human affairs. It is the reigning, symbolized by the crown, that the Lord will deny His children if they are counted by Him as being disloyal or unfaithful. The passage may be set out as follows:

A | "Faithful is the saying, for if we died with Him, we shall also live with Him.
B | "If we patiently endure, we shall also reign with Him.
B | "If we deny Him, He will also deny us
(the reigning with Him, sharing His throne).
A | If we are faithless, He abideth faithful, He cannot deny Himself"
(that is, He cannot deprive such of their resurrection life with Him).

Living with Christ does not depend upon the faithfulness of the believer, for resurrection to eternal life is the culmination of salvation by grace. The believer is eternally linked with the One Who said "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live" (John xi. 25). The believer's subsequent failures after salvation cannot alter the initial fact of his future life with Him. But when we come to the question of sharing Christ's throne and His reign over the whole creation in heaven and earth, we are dealing with something additional to salvation. Whether we are considered by God worthy as good servants, for a 'crown', obtaining a 'prize', receiving a reward or in other words reigning with Christ, depends upon our response to the claims of His Truth here and now.

When we study the word translated 'deny', we find it to be equivalent with the words 'to be ashamed':

> "Whosoever therefore shall be ashamed of Me and of My words . . . . . of him also shall the Son of man be ashamed, when He cometh in the glory of His Father with the holy angels" (Mark viii. 38).
>
> "But whosoever shall deny Me before men, him will I also deny before My Father which is in heaven" (Matt. x. 33).

We can now better understand the statement 'if we deny Him, He will deny us' and the link with not being ashamed in II Tim. i. 8, 12, 16 and the most important verse 15 of chapter ii., 'a workman that needeth not to be ashamed'. There is not one of us today who does not need a clear understanding of these distinct yet related truths and a constant reminder of their practical implications. To be denied by the Saviour is surely a solemn thing, and thus to lose the matchless privilege of sharing His throne will be a terrible loss indeed.

These are such important truths for the believer to apprehend that Timothy is now instructed to remind those under his charge of these great facts:

> "Of these things put them in remembrance, charging them in the sight of the Lord, that they strive not about words, to no profit, to the subverting (overthrowing) of them that hear" (ii. 14, R.V.).

This is not the first time that Paul had warned Timothy concerning this senseless and dangerous striving (I Tim. i. 4, 6, 7; vi. 3-5, 20 also Titus i. 10, 14; iii. 9) which could only lead to the overthrowing of the faith. The word katastrophe, 'subvert' literally means 'to turn upside down', the very opposite of edification or building up. It may not be possible to say exactly what the 'endless genealogies' were, but it seems clear that Satan had fabricated a scheme involving ages and false mediators, (angelic princes), which was a travesty of the Truth revealed in the Scriptures which is centred in Christ. The Colossian heresy, as we have seen, was probably linked with a similar conception. This led to endless debates and arguments and word battles which only accomplished what the enemy was aiming at, namely the dividing of the people of God and turning them away from Christ as the fullness of God.

The next section of II Timothy revolves around the great subject of the Truth of God. The word 'truth' occurs three times, 'rightly dividing the word of Truth' (ii. 15); 'those who concerning the Truth have erred' (ii. 17, 18) and 'repentance to the acknowledging of the Truth' (ii. 25). Can anything be more important to the practical believer than a knowledge of God's Truth? How can he live the Truth and pass it on to others if he does not apprehend it himself? If what he believes proves to be error then he is a deceived person and becomes a tool of Satan the arch-deceiver and is a misleader of other people. The 'girdle of Truth' (see Eph. vi. 14) is an essential part of the protective armour of God against the wiles of the devil. Surely we come here to the heart of all Christian service and witness. If we are wrong here, we shall be wrong everywhere.

But what is Truth? Pilate's question comes ringing down the centuries and many thousands have asked it since, apparently oblivious of the fact that the Saviour has already answered it in John xiv. 6 "I am the Truth" and "Thy Word is Truth" (xvii. 17).

To show the great importance of this subject, the Apostle links our attitude to it with the approval of God:

> "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the Word of Truth" (ii. 15).

The word spoudazo, study, does not refer to reading books. It occurs again in iv. 21 where it is translated 'do thy diligence'. It has the notion of persistent zeal and could be rendered in up-to-date language, 'do your utmost', the aim being to present oneself approved unto God, a workman without any shame. What greater aim than this can there be for the servant of God? The approval of men can be discounted. The only approval or commendation that matters is one that comes from God when we stand before Him and give an account of our stewardship.

It is this that must constantly be in the forefront of our minds as we live day by day. All else is of secondary importance, for stupendous things are resting on the way we have handled and used the sacred Scriptures, the Word of God, in this day of opportunity. If we have handled the Word unfaithfully or with slackness, then, as the previous section of this epistle has shown, we shall have denied God's Truth and He will deny us the supreme privilege of reigning with Him over the restored universe. We shall be ashamed before Him, and He will be ashamed of us as unfaithful servants. The perfection of our standing in Christ must not be brought in here to try to undo as it were the serious statements of the context we are studying. We are amazed how some who claim to see the Mystery do this and so stress grace that service and responsibility before the Lord are ruled out! Yet they constantly quote II Tim. ii. 15 and talk about 'right division'! This verse makes perfectly clear that only those who are unashamed workmen have rightly divided the Word of God. In other words these are practical people, workmen, who have rendered acceptable service to the Lord in the way they have handled and proclaimed the Truth of the Scriptures.

What does "right division" mean?

The faithful workman is one who has 'rightly-divided the Word of Truth'. Orthotomeo is not easy to define because it is used nowhere else in the N.T. and only occurs twice in the Septuagint (the Greek translation of the O.T. used by the Lord and the apostles). The passages are Prov. iii. 6 and xi. 5 where, instead of "He shall direct thy paths" (from the Hebrew text) we have "He (or it, referring to wisdom in verse 5) shall rightly divide thy paths". The illustration here is that of a sign-post dividing off and pointing to the right road out of a number before the person concerned. This would certainly influence Timothy's understanding as he knew the holy Scriptures (the O.T.) which had made him 'wise unto salvation through faith in Christ Jesus' (II Tim. iii. 15).

The word orthotomeo has a primary meaning of 'cutting straight'. It also had a secondary meaning of 'handling aright' and translators have used either of these two meanings. We give a selection:

> Rotherham: "Skillfully handling the Word of truth".

Cunnington: "Rightly handling the message of truth".
Moffatt: "The way you handle the word of truth".
R.S.V.: "Rightly handling the word of truth".
N.I.V.: "Correctly handles the word of truth".
J. N. Darby: "Cutting in a straight line the word of truth".
Berkeley Version: "Correctly analyzing the message of truth".

The Berkeley Version is suggestive here. "To analyze" is 'to divide or resolve into constituent parts', and as the Word of God is a supreme revelation of 'the eternal purpose (or the purpose of the ages) in Christ Jesus' (Eph. iii. 10, 11) which touches the heavens as well as the earth, we need to divide or distinguish between these wonderful facets of God's almighty plan which lies behind the creation of the universe. If we do this and give due weight to all the revelation that God has given in His Word, we shall be 'handling it aright' with that faithfulness which God demands from everyone who seeks to know it and proclaim its unsearchable riches which are treasured up in Christ Jesus.

No.6. ii. 15.
pp. 121 - 127

We have been considering II Tim. ii. 15, a verse of vast importance, for it impinges upon our understanding and proclamation of the truth of the Word of God. Moreover it is solemnly associated with a believer's service for the Lord and the Lord's approval or disapproval which will result in the gaining or losing of a 'crown' which symbolizes not just living with Christ in the future glory, but reigning with Him over the restored universe.

Now what are the practical implications of verse 15? First of all let us state what it is not. "Right Division" does not mean chopping up the Bible into sections of our making which may accord with the pet ideas that we hold. When properly understood, it is not divisive in the wrong sense of the word. What it does in its application is to recognize the distinctions that the Author, God the Holy Spirit, has Himself made. The margin of Phil. i. 10 tells us 'to try the things that differ' and this is with the object of 'approving things that are excellent', in other words getting to know God's best. The word 'better' is one of the key-words of the epistle to the Hebrews and 'better things' can only be appreciated by believers who are doing this. We believe that this is the way God wants us to approach and handle His precious Word. Right Division is therefore a great principle of interpretation of the Scriptures and we will try to indicate its application to this great Book of Truth.

Examples of Right Division.

(1) If we obey the injunction of II Tim. ii. 15 we shall note the various time periods of Scripture and not confuse them. Time is of the utmost importance in the revelation of God's redemptive plan for earth and heaven. God's clock is always correct and there is always a special time for the revelation of His Truth. He is never a moment too soon or too late.

The importance of God's time is seen in Titus i. 1, 2:

> "Paul, a servant of God and an apostle of Jesus Christ for the faith of God's elect and the knowledge of the truth that leads to godliness, a faith and knowledge resting on the hope of eternal life, which God, Who does not lie, promised before the beginning of time, and at His appointed season He brought His Word to light through the preaching entrusted to me by the command of God our Saviour" (N.I.V.).

The truth given through Paul's ministry therefore was divinely regulated as to time as well as to its content. It would have been out of place before this and too late if it had been postponed to the future. We must therefore learn from this and distinguish between the time periods of Scripture. What was true and according to the will of God in the O.T. times is not necessarily true today. If a believer sins now, he does not bring an animal sacrifice to God in order to be forgiven. Yet this was God's command to Israel in the O.T. and refusal to obey it would have resulted in judgment from Him. It was truth then; it is not truth now. This is obvious, but it is a plain example of a principle that obtains throughout Scripture.

Conversely, the present must not be read into the past. For instance, the great Secret (mystery A.V.) concerning the Body of Christ, dealt with in Ephesians and Colossians (Eph. iii. 1-9; Col. i. 24-27) which God hid in Himself from past ages (time) and generations (people) must not be read into the past or in fact any time before this was revealed to Paul as the chosen human channel (carefully note this in the last two Scripture references). The time of its proclamation was from his Roman prison after the Acts period. He alone claims to be the appointed minister by Christ in connection with this favoured heavenly company of believers. If we do not distinguish the time periods of the Bible we make the Word of God contradict itself, which is a serious thing in the sight of God, and we turn it from truth to falsehood and rob ourselves of the glorious revelation it contains.

We must also note that the future must not be read into the present. The future prophetic period of wrath and judgment of God known as the Day of the Lord must not be read into the present age of grace (Isaiah ii. 12; xiii. 6-9; Zeph. i. 14, 15; Joel i. 15; ii. 11).

The example of the Lord Jesus in connection with Right Division.

We have a supreme example of the Lord Jesus applying this principle to the time periods of Scripture in Luke iv. 14-21. He gave the public reading of the O.T. in the Synagogue which was taken from Isa. lxi. The reader should turn to this reference and read it carefully and then compare it with what the Lord did. His reading was indeed short. He stopped in the middle of verse 2, closed the book and sat down. No wonder His listeners were surprised and gripped, not only at its brevity, but also for the fact that He stopped reading after the phrase 'to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord'. Had

He gone on and read 'and the day of vengeance of our God' He could not have said with truth, "this day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears" (Luke iv. 21), for He came, as He had taught, not to judge and condemn, but to save (John xii. 47).

Now is the age of grace. Grace now reigns (Rom. v. 21) and God does not sit on a throne of grace and judgment at the same time. Judgment and wrath are now held back, and in infinite patience God waits for the repentance and response of a sinful race. But He does not wait for ever. The age of grace has its end and then wrath and judgment must follow.

That Christ believed and taught this too the context of Luke xxi. 22 makes perfectly clear and Rev. vi. 16, 17 solemnly reveals that the future wrath of Christ will be a terrible reality. This may not be popular theology, but it is revealed truth.

Here then we have an example given by the Lord Jesus of 'rightly dividing the Word' and separating the present 'acceptable year of the Lord' from the future Lord's Day of wrath and judgment and all who handle the Word of God are surely without excuse with this divine example before them.

(2) We must distinguish between Law and Grace, especially with relationship to the gospel and the way of salvation. Salvation by faith in Christ, the forgiveness of sins and eternal life are the free gifts of God, and can never be attained by attempting to keep the law. Man's imperfect sinful nature makes this impossible, for God requires perfect keeping of His law (James ii. 10, 11), if this is the ground that man chooses to approach Him. Salvation and righteousness are 'not of works (human merit or attainment) lest any man should boast' (Eph. ii. 8-10), but it is 'unto good works' after salvation. This we have already stressed and 'right division' will carefully note the difference between receiving the gifts of grace by faith (God's favour to the unworthy) and human attempts to obtain salvation by one's own unaided efforts.

(3) This leads to the difference between salvation by grace, apart from works, and prize or reward resulting from faithful service following salvation which we have already touched upon. The former is sure and certain because it depends solely upon what Christ has done on the cross and what He is now doing for us in resurrection and not in any way upon the believer. The Lord will surely finish the salvation He has begun:

> ". . . . . He Who began a good work in you will carry it on to completion until the day of Christ Jesus" (Phil. i. 6, N.I.V.).

Prize or reward is not certain. It is only for those believers who have been faithful to the truth committed to them and have endured even through suffering and loss for the truth's sake.

(4) "Right division" will also distinguish between the standing and the state of the believer, the distinction being what the believer is made to be by God, in Christ, holy and clothed with His righteousness, and his state, what he is in himself in thought, word and deed. All the believers at Corinth were addressed as saints (holy ones, I Cor. i. 2), but many of them were anything but saintly in their walk and witness as the epistle shows. Our constant aim must be to balance our state with our standing and seek to do this in the strength of the Lord.

(5) We must learn to distinguish between the various judgments of Scripture. The assessment of a believer's service by the Lord (II Cor. v. 9, 10; I Cor. iii. 10-15) must not be confused with the judgment of the living nations at the Second Advent of Christ (Matt. xxv. 31, 32), and the judgment of the Great White Throne (Rev. xx. 11).

(6) There is more than one resurrection in the Word of God and these must not be confused. Scripture knows nothing of a 'general resurrection'. It is 'every man in his own order' (I Cor. xv. 23). The first or former resurrection before the Millennium (Rev. xx. 5) cannot be the same as the Great White Throne judgment with its resurrection after it (Rev. xx. 11-15). The word 'first' clearly indicates there must be more than one.

(7) The future spheres of blessing indicated in Scripture for the redeemed should be noted carefully. If 'the meek shall inherit the earth' (Matt. v. 5) is the same as being 'seated together in the heavenly places, far above all' (Eph. ii. 6), where Christ is now enthroned, then words have lost their meaning and Bible study is a waste of time. Yet, in spite of this, many Christians believe that all the saved will go to heaven, while others insist that all the saved will be blessed on earth. Both cannot be right. God's Word reveals that there are three goals for companies of the redeemed: earth (Matt. v. 5), the 'heavenly Jerusalem' which finally descends to the new earth (Rev. iii. 12; xxi. 2, 10) and heavenly places 'far above all' (Eph. ii. 6; Phil. iii. 20; Col. iii. 1-4).

If these are confused or not apprehended, how can a clear hope for future glory be entertained?

The above are some examples of the great interpretive principle of II Tim. ii. 15 in practice. They have only been lightly touched upon since a large volume would be needed to do the theme justice. This principle governing interpretation ramifies throughout the Bible, going much further than distinguishing dispensations, which are often confused with ages or periods of time. A dispensation is the administration of some important aspect of the truth of God. It is in the realm of time of course, but is much more than a time period.

Some translators, as we have seen, insist that orthotomeo must be rendered with its secondary meaning of 'handle correctly', rather than 'rightly divide'. Even if this is allowed, provided it is faithfully followed in our exposition of the sacred Scriptures, the results will be the same. How can the Word of God be 'correctly handled' if the foregoing lines of teaching are confused or ignored? Some truths in the Bible are true for always. They are basic or foundational, not dispensational, e.g. sin, and its remedy, God's salvation, sanctification and consecration. Others, as we have seen, are true only for a limited time, e.g. the Mosaic law of type and shadow, or they are separate lines of truth which must not be confused.

We believe that this is a sane and reverent way of handling the Word of God, and moreover it is a principle we all carry out to some degree in our daily lives. Who would mix up the contents of the bedroom, lounge and kitchen in their homes, or the various departments of their business? The same sanity is needed in the approach to and interpretation of the Word of God.

If the principle of II Tim. ii. 15 is not obeyed, then confusion reigns and we see the result of this in the divided state of Christendom around us. All denominations appeal to the Bible yet they are all in disagreement on many points of doctrine. If this sacred Book can be interpreted in any way one pleases without any divine guiding principle then it becomes like a musical instrument that plays any tune the player wishes. Even Satan can and does quote Scripture but he never rightly divides! The most serious consequence is that Truth is not obtained however much the Bible is quoted. Every text has a context, and each context is related to truth that is linked to the company of the redeemed to whom God has sent it.

Taken out of the setting in which God has placed it, the Bible becomes untruth and we believe this is why such solemn consequences follow the refusal to obey II Tim. ii. 15. Nothing can be more serious than turning the Word of truth into error and if we do so we must not be surprised if we do not receive God's approval in that future day of glory.

Too often this is treated lightly by Christians, but we say with definiteness that no believer can consistently disobey the divine command of II Tim. ii. 15 and be 'approved of God'. The divine 'crown' will not be his, this heavenly prize will be forfeited.

On the other hand if 'right division' or 'correct handling' is faithfully carried out and its result is manifest in our lives, we can confidently look forward to God's richest blessing here and now and His exaltation of us to His throne in the next life.

One more important fact needs to be brought before the reader namely that, when II Tim. ii. 15 is consistently applied every statement of the Scriptures can be taken without alteration. It allows God to mean what He says and have a meaning for everything He says. There are no contradictions, and everything falls into its proper place in the outworking of the great purpose of the ages centred in Christ Jesus, and is finally seen to be carried out to a glorious conclusion by Him Who works all things after the counsel of His own will.

No.7. ii. 16 - iii. 5.
pp. 155 - 160

Having given some consideration to the great principle of interpretation contained in II Tim. ii. 15 we proceed to note that the Apostle Paul now goes on to bring before Timothy two professing Christians who failed to 'rightly divide the Word of truth' namely Hymenaeus and Philetus:

> "But shun profane babblings: for they will proceed further in ungodliness, and their word will eat as doth a gangrene: of whom is Hymenaeus and Philetus; men who concerning the truth have erred, saying that the resurrection is past already, and overthrow the faith of some" (II Tim. ii. 16-18, R.V.).

Hymenaeus is referred to in I Tim. i. 20 where the Apostle delivers him to Satan so that he might learn not to blaspheme. Evidently he had already gone off the track of truth. Of Philetus, we know nothing, but both were obviously well known to Timothy.

Paul takes a very serious view of their false teaching, likening it to a spreading gangrene which was dangerously affecting other believers. In what way could they have taught that resurrection (there is no definite article) was past already? They could not have been referring to the Lord's resurrection (I Cor. xv. 20) for this was already a blessed historical fact and certainly past at the time Paul wrote. It could therefore only refer to the resurrection of the believer. They either denied the need of the believer for a bodily resurrection by spiritualizing and interpreting it as a purely spiritual experience, or they taught that believers who had died had already received a bodily resurrection. Either denies the truth of a literal bodily resurrection in the future at the manifestation of the Lord.

The Apostle had already clearly emphasized this:

> "We wait for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ: Who shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of His glory" (Phil. iii. 20, 21, R.V.).

There is teaching today the comes perilously near to the two false ideas mentioned above. We need to watch carefully lest we fall into the same error as Hymenaeus and Philetus. Let us note that they did not deny the fact of resurrection as some had done at Corinth (I Cor. xv. 12), they merely misplaced it as regards time, putting a future truth into the past. Here is a definite example of wrongly dividing the Word of truth and it stands out all the more vividly in a context that stresses the supreme importance of right division.

Not nearly enough attention has been paid by expositors to the time element in Scripture. As we have pointed out before, all truth has its time setting and is made known by an all-wise God not a moment too soon or too late. Let us note I Tim. ii. 5-7 and Titus i. 1-3 ". . . . . Christ Jesus, Who gave Himself a ransom for all; the testimony to be borne in its own times" (R.V.); ". . . . . the knowledge (or acknowledging) of the truth which is according to godliness . . . . . but in its own seasons (margin) manifested His Word in the message, wherewith I (Paul) was intrusted". There is a right and fitting season or time for the revelation of God's truth which must be recognized.

The Apostle now turns away from error to the firm foundation of God that stands sure and unchanging and likens it to a seal or coin whose two sides represent (1) the infallible Lord and His knowledge, "the Lord knoweth them that are His"; the tares and the wheat are all known to Him; and (2) "Let everyone that nameth the name of the Lord depart from unrighteousness" (II Tim. ii. 19). The first is internal and unseen by men and may be likened to a root. The second is external and can be seen by all and may be compared with fruit. "By their fruits ye shall know them." We should be thankful that the final sorting out between the true and the false will be accomplished by the Lord Who will make no mistakes.

An allusion is made to Numb. xvi. 5 and 26 in which the Israelites are reminded of this fact. God unerringly knows His own children and while we have both Divine sovereignty and human responsibility here, it is the fact of responsibility that the Apostle wished to bring home to Timothy. Consequently he now brings forward the illustration of a great house and its furniture:

> "But in a great house there are not only vessels of gold and of silver, but also of wood and of earth; and some to honour, and some to dishonour (or no honour). If a man therefore purge himself from these, he shall be a vessel unto honour, sanctified, and meet for the master's use, and prepared unto every good work" (II Tim. ii. 20, 21).

The vessels unto honour may be likened to the ornaments of beauty in the drawing-room or lounge; the baser vessels, those of a lack of honour or beauty, in the kitchen. The stress here is not the use of these articles, but on their quality or worth. Paul is urging Timothy to aspire to be a vessel of real worth to the Lord, one who can bring glory to His Name.

Hymenaeus and Philetus and those who followed them could be compared with vessels of dishonour, and there was only one course open to Timothy, namely to purge himself and separate himself from such. Only then could he be true to the name Timothy, which means 'one who honours God' or is 'honoured by God'. The tenses of the verb here should be rendered, 'having been sanctified' and 'having been prepared', that is by God, 'unto every good work'. The root meaning of sanctification is separation, and here we have separation for service (the Master's use). By separating himself from all who taught false doctrine, Timothy would be taking to a practical conclusion the sanctification which was his in Christ. Only by so doing could he be loyal to the Lord and the truth committed to him and thus be a vessel of beauty and honour, a vessel that the Lord could use to His glory. Doubtless by so doing he would render himself open to the charge of being narrow and unchristian, but there must be no compromise whatever the cost.

All who wish to become honoured servants of the Lord must follow the same pathway. Such must choose whether they wish to please men or please the Lord, remembering the words of the Apostle Paul in another context, 'for if I yet pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ' (Gal. i. 10).

Paul continues:

> "Flee also youthful lusts: but follow righteousness, faith, love (charity), peace, with them that call on the Lord out of a pure heart" (II Tim. ii. 22).

We have seen that the word translated 'lust' is sometimes used with a good meaning in the Scriptures (see Luke xxii. 15; Phil. i. 23; I Tim. iii. 1). It denotes any strong feeling or wish, either bad or good. Inasmuch as strong inclinations can be fraught with danger, specially during the impetuosity of youth, Timothy is exhorted to avoid such and exhibit the fruit of the Spirit that alone could make him outstanding as a leader for the Lord.

Again he is warned to avoid those who quibble and cause quarrels, thus breaking the unity of the Spirit:

> "The Lord's servant must not strive (fight), but be gentle towards all, apt to teach, forbearing, in meekness correcting them that oppose themselves" (ii. 24, 25, R.V.).

How difficult it is to be gentle and meek yet inflexible where God's truth is concerned! How often opposition stirs the very worst in us and we hit back in the strength of the sinful old nature and spoil our witness! Only by consciously and continually drawing upon the Lord's inexhaustible grace can we yield 'no, not for an hour' (Gal. ii. 5), yet avoid fighting and anger which so often has disfigured controversies in doctrine. Those who oppose may be temporarily in the devil's snare, and they need that change of mind (repentance) to the acknowledging of the truth, so that they may recover themselves out of it (verse 26). The Lord's servant should remember he follows One Who did not strive or cry, but rather enlightened and instructed (Matt. xii. 19).

Graphic words are used in the closing verses of the chapter. The word ananepho, 'recover themselves', literally means 'that they may return to soberness' (R.V. margin) as though they have been duped, intoxicated and paralyzed by the devil. Let us never forget that all around us the great battle for the domination of man's mind goes on unceasingly, for whoever controls this controls the whole personality. The unsaved are walking according to the prince of the power of the air (Eph. ii. 2) and only God's saving power can break this terrible bondage and bring liberty. The believer who has already been freed can become enslaved again if he gives place to the devil and it is these things that Paul has in mind when he warns Timothy of this possibility.

We must be careful here with the pronouns him and his. To whom do they refer? The A.V. suggests in both cases ('taken captive by him at his will') the devil is the antecedent. The R.V. margin reads 'by the devil unto the will of God' which we feel is what Paul is teaching. It is difficult to believe that Satan can capture any believer who is walking worthy, just whenever he chooses. This would take away all assurance and make Christian service and witness one of uncertainty and fear. The devil can only touch the child of God with His permission (as in the case of Job) or the believer can walk in the flesh and expose himself to Satan's activities (as Hymenaeus and Philetus). Even here it is under the Lord's control and the enemy's domination can be snapped by a change of mind (repentance) which the Lord can give to those who realize and acknowledge their sinfulness and foolishness.

Chapter iii. opens with a preview of the last days of this dispensation and it does not make pleasant reading:

> ". . . . . men will love nothing but money and self; they will be arrogant, boastful and abusive, ... they will be implacable in their hatreds, scandalmongers, intemperate and fierce, strangers to all goodness, traitors, adventurers, swollen with self-importance. They will be men who put pleasure in the place of God, men who preserve the outward form of religion but are a standing denial of its reality" (II Tim. iii. 1-5, N.E.B.).

While Timothy lived to see the beginning of this terrible state of affairs, the Apostle concentrates on the end of this Gentile age with all its godlessness and corruption.

Wherever this is dealt with in the Scriptures, whether in prophecy, symbol or doctrine; whether in the Gospels (and specially note the Lord's discourse concerning the end of the age in Matt. xxiv.) or in the epistles, the picture is as black as it can be. In fact Christ depicts a time of world trouble whose climax has never been equaled in the past or ever will be in the future (Matt. xxiv. 20, 21). It is a time when humanity can annihilate itself and would do so unless God steps in (verse 22). This He will do and cut short these terrible days by the personal coming to the earth of the Lord Jesus Christ in power and great glory (verses 29 and 30). Only by God's personal intervention in this way can world deliverance be accomplished and Satan's domination and kingdom be destroyed. There is certainly no room in the Scriptures for the deceptive idea that the world will get better and better and man will eventually bring in the millennium of peace and plenty! And it is now a fact that the annihilation of the human race is a possibility which is an ominous sign of the times.

No.8. iii. 6 – 17.
pp. 161 - 166

The last days of this age in which we live, described by Paul in the opening verses of II Tim. iii., are terrible indeed. They have always existed in some measure of course, but here they are world-wide and describe a time of darkest paganism and utter apostasy in the world of religion where men will turn away their ears from the truth of God to myths (iv. 4). They are indeed 'perilous times' (iii. 1). Chalepos, 'perilous', could be rendered 'menacing'. The only other place of its occurrence in the N.T. is Matt. viii. 28 describing the condition of demon-possessed men.

Rom. i. 28-32 gives a similar description of the pagan world in the Apostle's day. In the terrible list of vices we note the recurrence of the word 'love'; (1) lovers of their own selves; (2) 'covetous', literally, 'lovers of money'; (3) 'not loving (despisers of) those that are good'; (4) 'lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God' or perhaps 'lovers of pleasures rather than lovers of God'. Here is the stark tragedy of misplaced love. When we love we touch the very centre of our being whether for good or evil. Where truth is concerned, all may be summed up in the word 'love' which is perfectly expressed in the law of God (Rom. xiii. 10). It fulfils all Christian service (Gal. v. 13; I Thess. i. 3) and without it Christian labour is rendered null and void (I Cor. xiii. 1-3). The believer is 'rooted and grounded in love' (Eph. iii. 17) and his main aim should be to get to know more of the love of Christ which surpasses knowledge (Eph. iii. 19).

The tragic fact is that sin has twisted man's capability of loving in the proper sense, with the result that we see the passage that is now before us. Instead of loving God with all his heart, man loves himself, his pleasures, his money and anything that ministers to his own desires and thus his love is frittered away on empty transitory things that can never satisfy. It is indeed sad to read in II Tim. iv. 10, "Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world". The warning is given regarding this in I John ii. 15-17, "love not the world, neither the things that are in the world . . . . . the world passeth away, and the lust thereof: but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever".

It seems impossible that after nearly two thousand years of Christianity, man could lapse into such a condition as Paul describes, but the Word of God never exaggerates. This is a true picture of the end time and believers must face up to it. These last days will have no place for Christ crucified, risen and ascended and the glorious gospel centred in Him. All this will be unknown or denied, following the turning away from the truth of the Word of God to fables, myths and lies of the devil, which will dominate the thinking and actions of mankind who will have rejected God and His claims.

As we look around today who can doubt that these times are already upon us? The rapid downward slide morally and nationally that we see everywhere today is evidence of this. Some Christians are hoping and believing that all this can be halted and ended by revival. But there is no place for any such revival in II Tim. iii. Those who expect revival should remember that the work of the Holy Spirit is bound up with the Word He has written. There can be no possibility of revival, in individuals or on a large scale, until the Word of God is given its rightful place in heart and life. Only then has the Holy Spirit something to work on in order to exalt the living Word, the Lord Jesus Christ. This is His supreme work to testify to the Lord Jesus and to glorify Him (John xv. 26; xvi. 14).

But these last days are times of turning away from God's Word and rejecting its light and truth. Those of us who are truly believers in Christ can best serve Him by holding fast and faithfully holding forth the word of life (Phil. ii. 15, 16), and not yielding an inch from the great deposit of truth the Lord has placed in our hands. Results we must leave to Him, they are not our province, but faithful testimony by lip and life is what God requires from all His children however dark the days may be.

The reference to Jannes and Jambres, the magicians who withstood Moses, again throws light on the Satanic character of the opposition of the Truth. These were able, up to a point, to copy the miracles that Moses wrought and they did it by Satanic power. Satan is always the ape of God, and the Scriptures warn us of lying wonders, signs and miracles that he produces at the end of this age in order to deceive the whole world (II Thess. ii. 8-10; Rev. xiii. 11-15).

Those who withstand the truth of God at this time do so by the same means; they are corrupt and reprobate concerning the faith (II Tim. iii. 8). The word 'reprobate' is the negative of the word translated 'approved' in ii. 15. This is the opposite of the unashamed workman. These reprobate ones worm their way into houses, seeking women of the weaker sort. "Silly women" of the A.V. is literally 'little women', a contemptuous terms indicating feebleness of character. Such are 'laden with sins'; their consciences are overwhelmed and they clutch at any solution before them. They are 'swayed by various impulses' (iii. 6 R.S.V.) and while they listen to other people, their minds have become so warped that they become incapable of attaining to 'a knowledge of the truth'. Thus they become an easy prey to the false teachers and Satan behind them.

The Apostle now turns back in his thought to Timothy and reminds him:

> "But thou (emphatic) didst follow my teaching, conduct, purpose, faith, longsuffering, love, patience, persecutions, sufferings; what things befell me at Antioch, at Iconium, at Lystra; what persecutions I endured: and out of them all the Lord delivered me" (iii. 10, R.V.).

Timothy had been closely linked with the Apostle from the earliest days of his ministry and up to this point had followed Paul in his doctrine and manner of life. How good to be able to link together teaching and conduct! It could always be said with truth that the Apostle practiced what he preached. He not only called attention to his teaching, but could uphold it all by the manner of his life, thus giving power to his witness. He could say without egotism, "Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ" (I Cor. xi. 1). His life was dominated by one great purpose, namely to make known fully and complete the truth ("the good deposit") entrusted to him by the risen Saviour.

Timothy knew well Paul's faith, his persuasion, his longsuffering and patience which enabled him to endure extremes of testing when others would have given up; his love which ever manifested itself in pouring himself out for others, a practical example of the wonderful exposition of divine love he gave in I Cor. xiii. Timothy knew the Apostle's sufferings and persecutions for Christ and how faithfully they were endured.

Paul's mind travels back to the beginning of his ministry at Antioch and the first great missionary journey he undertook when justification by faith was first preached (Acts xiii. 38, 39); then to Iconium and the assault made on him there (Acts xiv. 1-5) and lastly Lystra, where he was stoned and left for dead (Acts xiv. 6-20).

However, we cannot but feel that in the mind of the Apostle the terrible experience at Lystra was softened by the fact that this was the place that gave him his beloved son in the faith. Timothy was a native of Lystra (Acts xvi. 1, 2). Lest these great tests should overwhelm Timothy, Paul adds, "but out of them all the Lord delivered me", clearly showing that he dealt with an almighty God Who was able to rescue in all circumstances, however intense the trial. He continues, "Yea, and all that would live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution" (iii. 12). Weymouth renders this verse 'everyone who is determined to live a godly life', for we have more than the plain future tense here. In Acts xiv. 22 he warned the disciples that 'we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God'. Christ Himself had said, "Remember the word that I said unto you, the servant is not greater than his Lord. If they have persecuted Me, they will also persecute you . . . . ." (John xv. 20), and faithfulness to Him will surely entail misunderstanding, persecution and perhaps loneliness, for we follow One Who is still 'despised and rejected of men'.

Timothy is now warned of a rapid increase in evil (iii. 13) and truth having been cast away, deception is bound to take its place. World-wide deception is the hallmark of the end of this age (Matt. xxiv. 4, 5, 24; II Thess. ii. 9, 10; Rev. xiii. 11-15), and its only antidote is the Word of truth, which protects completely from Satan's lie. Timothy must learn to stand firm whatever the cost, and realize the tremendous importance of the holy Scriptures as the foundation and equipment of the man of God for all demands that are made on him:

> "But continue thou in the things which thou hast learned and hast been assured of, knowing of whom thou hast learned them; and that from a child thou hast known the holy Scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus. All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness: that the man of God may be perfect, throughly furnished unto all good works" (iii. 14-17, A.V.).

Timothy's effectiveness as a teacher was bound up with faithfulness to the Word of God, which had been brought before him from the earliest days of infancy by a wise Christian mother and grandmother (i. 5) and then, on attaining manhood, he had come to know the distinctive truths committed by the Lord to Paul and embodied in his epistles, which were already getting recognition as part of the holy Scriptures as the Apostle Peter makes clear (II Pet. iii. 15, 16).

This section of II Timothy is of utmost importance, for it deals with the divine origin of the Word of God which is the basis of the Christian faith. No wonder it has been the subject of persistent attacks by the evil one and his followers. If the Bible can be entirely discredited then Christianity crumbles, for we have no historic basis for our faith, for 'faith cometh by hearing and hearing by the Word of God' (Rom. x. 17), and we can know little or nothing about the Lord Jesus Christ Who is the centre and circumference of it all if the Bible has no authority.

Satan always seeks to undermine what God has said and to sow doubt in the minds of those who read it. This commenced in Eden with the insidious question, 'hath God said?', and has continued all down the centuries. Doubt in the Bible leads to doubt regarding Christ. Doubt is really unbelief, and unbelief is the one sin that cuts a person off from God (Heb. xi. 6; I John v. 10-12). It is therefore in Satan's interest to keep man in a perpetual state of unbelief. In contrast the holy Scripture, the written Word of God, reveals the living Word, the Lord Jesus Christ Who can meet every problem and need of man. He has given Himself and therefore given His all for him and because of this is utterly worthy of man's faith and confidence.

As Timothy had known the holy Scriptures from his earliest days and evidently believed them, there was no need for the sudden 'right about turn' that was necessary for Christ-opposing Saul of Tarsus. In the O.T. Scriptures Christ is portrayed by type and shadow, all being prophetic of the One Who was to be the Saviour of mankind. Old Testament believers therefore looked forward to Him by faith as we today look back with that same faith. We will consider the supremely important words Paul gave concerning the inspiration of the Scriptures in our next study.

No.9. iii. 16.
pp. 181 - 186

In the context of this epistle which we are studying, we have seen that in II Tim. iii. 14-17 the Apostle Paul, in order to combat the evil effect of the false teachers and degenerates, now refers Timothy to the written Word of God as the antidote.

He assures him that all of it is inspired by God and fully sufficient to equip the man of God for all his needs. This most important passage needs careful attention, for it is dealing with one of the fundamentals of the Christian faith. First of all, we must be careful with the word 'inspired' and not import into it modern ideas. Men can look at a work of art or listen to a symphony written by one of the great masters and call these 'inspired', that is to say, they are of superb quality. But Paul does not use the word 'inspiration' in this way. The word theopneustos, is very rare, being found only three times in secular literature up to this period. It means "God-breathed", literally, and puts the Scriptures in a class by themselves as does the adjective 'holy' in the previous verse. The 'holy letters', hiera grammata, and the God-breathed 'scripture' (graphe) are one and the same, and of all the millions of books written by men, not one can truthfully be said to have the imprimatur of Deity on it and so be described as 'holy', which is God's prerogative alone.

Much controversy has raged concerning the proper translation of the opening words of verse 16. The R.V. reads "Every Scripture inspired of God is also profitable" etc. and puts in the margin as an alternative, "Every Scripture is inspired of God, and profitable". The modernist, and all who reject the plenary inspiration of Scripture, find that by pulling verse 16 of the R.V. out of its context, they have a basis for teaching that only the inspired parts of the Bible are profitable, assuming this context allows that some parts are not inspired. But to be fair to the Revisers, we have seen that the 'sacred writings' of the previous verse describe the whole of the written Word, so that their translation of the next verse asserts that every one of these sacred writings is inspired. It would be impossible to teach in one verse that the sacred writings as a whole are 'holy', but at the same time (in the following verse), only some of them are inspired.

While the translations of the A.V. and R.V. are grammatically possible, we believe the A.V. more clearly renders what Paul is writing to Timothy, and one is glad to see that this translation is adhered to in modern versions such as the Revised Standard Version, the Berkeley Version, the New International Version and others.

Some translators treat theopneustos, as an adjective (Paul omits the verb 'to be') rendering the phrase "Every God-breathed Scriptures is profitable etc.", but this makes the rest of the sentence tautological for it stands to reason that every God-breathed Scripture must as a consequence be useful in the fullest sense. Moreover the natural place of the adjective would be before the noun, not after it as here.

While the Greek pas can mean both 'all' and 'every', constructions similar to IITim.iii.16 demand the rendering 'all', otherwise we should have the following translations of Rom. vii. 12, "the commandment (being) holy is also just"; I Cor. xi. 30, "many (being) weak are also sickly"; Heb. iv. 13, "All things (being) naked are also opened before the eyes of Him with Whom we have to do"; and I Tim. iv. 4, "Every good creature of God is also not one of them to be rejected".

Such renderings are impossible and taking everything into consideration, the A.V. translation of II Tim. iii. 16 "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God" is fully justified. E. K. Simpson rightly comments here:

> "This enthronement of the Holy Scriptures (primarily, but not exclusively, the O.T.) in the seat of authority is so insistent and prolific of consequences that we cannot wonder that the modern spirit of license rises in revolt against it or labours to dilute its significance. First of all we have the declaration that the sacred graphe, the invariable meaning of the word, whether singular or plural, in the N.T., re-echoing the hiera grammata of the previous verse, God-breathed in quality, has the seal of divine truth stamped upon it throughout. The imprimatur of Deity countersigns these scripts, instrumentally the work of human minds . . . . . yet prompted by an unseen Power. That fact sets them apart from all other writings" (The Pastoral Epistles, p.151).

The word 'Scripture' means 'that which is written' and if all that was written was God-breathed, there was no room left for fallible human opinion in the original manuscripts. Other evidences for the full inspiration of the Bible are given in the author's God's Word Written, obtainable from The Berean Publishing Trust. The reader will note that we do not propound any theory of inspiration, for the simple reason that it is impossible. We reject any mechanical theory which amounts to automatic dictation. The Word of God is a blending of the divine and the human, like the living Word, Christ Himself Who combines Deity with humanity. The God-breathed Scriptures are a miracle, and miracles by their very nature, are not explainable. Those who believe that the Lord Jesus miraculously fed the 5,000 and raised Lazarus from the dead should have no difficulty in accepting the plenary inspiration of the Word of God as asserted in IITim.iii.16. Either God is almighty and is able to do this or His is not. The modernists, and alas many of them are Christian leaders and teachers, deny the infallibility of the sacred Scriptures, and therefore they have no sure ground for their faith, for if the Bible is only inspired in parts, who is to decide without any doubt which are these parts and which are not? They are forcibly thrown back on fallible human opinion where there is no agreement. The Apostle Paul taught that the Word of God is the 'sword of the Spirit' (Eph. vi. 17), the one offensive weapon permitted to the believer, sufficient to overcome all the attacks of Satan, and we have the divine example of the Saviour's use of it three times in the wilderness so effectively that the devil retired defeated (Matt. iv. 1-11).

The modernist has a broken sword in his partly inspired Bible, one that is utterly useless to foil the great deceiver of mankind. The most impressive fact to all who sincerely trust in the Saviour and who seek to follow Him faithfully is His attitude to the Scriptures. This was always one of complete reverence and acceptance. Not once did He suggest that any part of the O.T. was untrue. On the contrary He declared "Thy Word is Truth" (John xvii. 17) and stated that it cannot be broken, and every jot and tittle must be fulfilled (John x. 35; Matt. v. 17, 18). He pointed to the truth of the Pentateuch as a prelude to belief in Himself (John v. 46, 47), and accused His enemies of being in error because of their ignorance of the Scriptures (Mark xii. 24).

Surely no one has the right to name the Name of Christ and call himself a *Christ*ian, who does not accept all that the Saviour taught. E. K. Simpson was quite right when he stated that the modern spirit of license rises in revolt against a fully inspired Bible, for once this is accepted, then one's own thoughts and ideas must be subjected to its divine teaching, and this obedience is something that the pride of man will not allow. He must be able to bring in his own opinions and have the last word in his beliefs, or it would be better to describe them as his unbeliefs.

We would point out, in order to avoid misunderstanding, that the word 'God-breathed' as Paul used the term, referred to something already in existence, namely the O.T. Scriptures and the N.T. as far as it had been written. This was God's Word written as far as he was concerned and this was what he was commending to Timothy. It should be the same to us also who profess to follow him even as he followed Christ. It cannot refer to future translations, some of which were not made for over 1,000 years later, nor does it mean that all that is contained in the Bible is inspired. We have the words of Satan in the prologue to the book of Job. Often we read of the sayings and doings of those who were the enemies of God. Neither of these could be 'inspired', but the account of them is, and therefore is true.

Regarding translations, we should be thankful for faithful scholars, men of God like Dr. E. W. Bullinger, Charles H. Welch, F. F. Bruce and others who have laboured to give us accurate versions in our own language. The scholars who gave us our A.V. recognized the originals to be the Word of God and, as Hebrew and Greek scholars, made their translation from the Greek and Hebrew manuscripts, having regard also to the versions already made, especially Tyndale's, which greatly influenced them.

Professor J. Isaacs state “nine tenths of the Authorized New Testament is still Tyndale, and the best is still his”.*

and see The English Bible by F. F. Bruce.]

There is no need therefore for anyone who has no access to the original languages to be in any doubt as to what God has written. Some are perturbed because God did not see fit to preserve the original documents. But it was His wisdom that overruled this. Just imagine what the Roman Church would have made of them as idols for worship together with many so-called relics and other superstitions that this church holds! We are reminded of the reformatory acts of king Hezekiah which included the destruction of the brazen serpent Moses had made. This, in Hezekiah’s day, had become an object of worship (II Kings xviii. 4) thus producing idolators among the people of God.

If the Lord has not seen fit to preserve the original manuscripts, He certainly watched over the texts from which our translations are made. And here we should be thankful for the archaeological discoveries which, under the Lord’s guiding hand, have so wonderfully confirmed the truth of God’s Word. Sir Frederick Kenyon, generally recognized as being the greatest textual authority of this century states:

> “We must be content to know that the general authenticity of the New Testament text has been remarkably supported by the modern discoveries, which have so greatly reduced the interval between the original autographs and our earliest extant manuscripts, and that the difference of readings, interesting as they are, do not affect the fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith.”*

What is the alternative to plenary inspiration of the Bible? Either fallible human opinion or an equally fallible church. The Roman Catholic rests upon a church that claims to be infallible and therefore the infallible interpreter of the holy Scriptures. This claim every true Protestant rejects, for Rome has never been able to substantiate such a claim and is getting more unsure of herself in this respect.

Some profess to honour the living Word, Christ Himself, but reject the full inspiration of the written Word which alone reveals Him. This is illogical, for if the Word of God is not true in every particular, how much certain knowledge could we have of Christ today? All one could be sure of is what history records, namely that a man called Jesus Christ walked this earth nearly 2,000 years ago and somehow stamped His name on our calendar. Who He really was, or what He did or said, are questions of which we could know practically nothing with certainty without the N.T. record, for He Himself left nothing in writing.

There is no doubt that the Bible stands or falls as a whole on its claims to be the Word of God and we are shut up to it for all that can be known of our Saviour, His redeeming love and God's great purpose reveled in and through Him. If II Tim. iii. 16 is not true, we can never say with certainty, "Thus saith the Lord" as the prophets of old did, but are thrown back on fallible human opinion and are forced to replace assurance and peace with doubt and uncertainty. Moreover both Paul and Peter must have been deceived men; for Peter, together with Paul, insists on the divine origin of the Scriptures (IIPet.i.21 R.V.). This view is regarded as old fashioned and unintelligent today, but it matters not, for what good enough for Christ should be good enough for us. We can unhesitatingly pin our faith to the "Word of God that liveth and abideth for ever" (IPet.i.23).

No.10. iii. 16 - iv. 5.
pp. 201 - 206

Having stated that all God's Word written is by its very nature "holy" and "God-breathed" and therefore unique, the Apostle Paul now stresses to Timothy its great purpose to equip the believer fully for all the will of the Lord in life and testimony. It is:

> "profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction (discipline, margin) which is in righteousness, that the man of God may be complete, furnished completely unto every good work" (II Tim. iii. 16, 17, R.V.).

Teaching (doctrine) occupies a very important place in the Pastoral Epistles where it occurs 15 times, 8 occurrences in I Timothy, 3 in II Timothy and 4 in the epistle to Titus. The ability to teach and pass on the Truth to others has already been emphasized in II Tim. ii. 2. In chapter iii. we have the one great subject matter for the teacher, namely the inspired Word of God. One of Paul's last injunctions to Timothy is to 'proclaim (preach) the Word' (iv. 2), and this is not only a piece of advice to preachers or ministers of religion, but a command to all who would loyally witness to the Saviour.

The great lack today, especially in our pulpits, is the ability to expound the Scriptures. Too often the Bible is used merely as a peg on which to hang the opinions of the speaker. What we greatly need today is not just fluent preaching or attractive oratory, but a clear and faithful setting forth of the message of God's Word. This gives the Holy Spirit the good ground of truth to work on, for God has promised: "My Word . . . . . shall not return unto Me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereunto I sent it" (Isa. lv. 11). Timothy, to be a profitable leader for Christ, must constantly rightly divide, correctly handle and set forth the Word of God. This is the only teaching that God will recognize and bless, and it is the profound ignorance of the holy Scriptures all around us that is the cause of the landslide in spiritual and moral standards, bringing so many personal problems, besides giving the opportunity for many false cults to flourish.

The inspired Word is also profitable for reproof. The word means 'refutation of error' and the conviction that comes from it. Correction is next mentioned by the Apostle. This means to 'straighten out' or to set right what is wrong; and both ideas are included in the next item, "instruction in righteousness". The A.V. has rendered this word 'chastening' or 'chastisement' in Heb. xii. 5, 7, 8, 11. "Discipline" would be a good rendering. We all need the constant discipline and guidance of the Scriptures, otherwise we shall surely stray from the pathway of Truth.

Paul links the Word of God with the infant (brephos, iii. 15) and right through to spiritual adulthood, to being a 'man of God'. This outstanding title was first borne by Moses, and then by Elijah, Elisha, David, Shemaiah and Igdaliah. Timothy, who was well acquainted with the O.T., could not fail to appreciate the importance of this title when it had been borne by so many illustrious characters.

The Apostle continues: "that the man of God may be perfect" (complete, R.V.). The Greek word is used of the complete equipment of a soldier for service, or of a ship for a voyage. All that is necessary for the voyage of life is found within the covers of the Book. There is no need to look anywhere else. Such divine equipment would cause Timothy to be 'furnished completely unto every good work' (verse 17 R.V.) and thus he could be the loyal and fruitful servant that God desired, and this is true of all of us today who seek to walk worthy of the 'high calling of God in Christ Jesus'.

Chapter iv. opens solemnly with a charge to Timothy. We are now reading the Apostle Paul's last words of his written ministry to his son in the faith and they are rich with meaning and importance. When writing his first letter to Timothy the Apostle had used the word 'charge' twice (I Tim. v. 21; vi. 11-14) in connection with church affairs. Here was his last charge:

> "I charge thee in the sight of God, and of Christ Jesus, Who shall judge the quick (living) and the dead, and by His appearing and His kingdom; preach the Word . . . . ." (II Tim. iv. 1, 2, R.V.).

Timothy's gaze is now directed from himself once more to the Lord Jesus and the fact of His future assessment of his Christian service. Some would like to eliminate this from the Body of Christ, just as others would remove the word 'kingdom' from this church and limit it to the people of Israel. We have dealt with this before, but would again point out that this is indeed dangerous and must be avoided by all those who desire to be commended by the Lord as faithful witnesses to His truth. Later on in the chapter, Paul describes Christ as 'the righteous Judge', Who will award him the 'crown of righteousness' (iv. 8). All wise Christian servants will constantly keep an eye on this future assessment of service by the Lord and this will deliver them from bondage to men or man's approval. Only His verdict will matter in that day.

Let us not miss truth because of archaic words in our A.V. "Quick" means living, so from this verse we can deduce there will be some members of the Body who will be alive at the Lord's manifestation. All of us should therefore "live . . . . . looking for the blessed hope and appearing of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ" (Titus ii. 12, 13, R.V.), and keep this as a daily inspiration for service. This can sweeten all the trials and troubles that may beset us and enable us to hold on our way without swerving from the track of truth.

Paul does not go into details with Timothy as to how this will be accomplished, but he had already taught that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, so the glorious transformation of Phil. iii. 20, 21 is a necessity and we can rest assured that it will be true of all, whether alive or asleep in Christ, at the manifesting of the Lord's glory in the heavenlies. The Apostle has already referred to the kingdom of the Son of His love in Col. i. 13 into which the Body of Christ has been graciously placed by the Father, and at the end of II Tim. iv. he looks forward by faith to this 'heavenly kingdom' (verse 18) associated with the ascended and seated Christ at the right hand of God. This must not be confused with the earthly phase of God's kingdom with which redeemed and restored Israel is so intimately associated. Phil. iii. 20 makes clear that our homeland is not an earthly one but exists in heaven, and Colossians urges us to keep our minds fixed there as our certain hope and not on things on the earth (Col. iii. 1).

As the darkness described in II Timothy descends upon us, may our testimony to the good deposit of God's truth entrusted to us shine all the brighter as 'lights in the world' (Phil. ii. 15). We can constantly be light-bearers for Him Who alone is the true Light of the world (John viii. 12).

Paul now gives five exhortations in his last charge to Timothy. We give Moffatt's vivid translation:

> "Preach (proclaim) the Word; keep at it in season and out of season, refuting, checking and exhorting men; never lose patience with them, and never give up your teaching; for the time will come when people decline to be taught sound doctrine, they will accumulate teachers to suit themselves and tickle their fancies, they will give up listening to the truth and turn to myths" (II Tim. iv. 2-4).

We have seen that we must not confine the word 'preach' to the pulpit. It applies to all of God's children who should feel the responsibility that a knowledge of the truth brings. Each one of us is under an obligation to the Lord to proclaim the Word to others in wisdom as opportunity offers and this must be done at all seasons. If we fail to do this, we are not 'redeeming the time' (Eph. v. 16). Our privilege is to pass on to others, not our opinions, but God's truth which He has placed in our keeping.

It is significant that the Greek logos, translated 'word' occurs seven times in this epistle, which marks its importance (i. 13; ii. 9, 11, 15, 17; iv. 2, 15). Here is an expanse of spiritual knowledge which can never be fully plumbed this side of glory, but it is more than sufficient for both teacher and those taught till that day of glory dawns.

Timothy is told to reprove, exhort, and teach with all patience and not to give up, specially as there will be a turning away from the truth and people will only want to hear the things that please them and tickle their fancy. What a temptation it is for the servant of God to give his hearers what they want rather than what they need, in other words to avoid the risk of displeasing them. There is many a minister today who is at the mercy of his congregation. He dare not proclaim all he knows of God's truth for fear of losing his job. Quite a lot of opposition to the witness given through Paul has this as its basis if only the critics would be honest and state the real reason.

The result is clearly given by the Apostle: "they . . . . . will heap to themselves teachers after their own lusts; and will turn away their ears from the truth, and turn aside unto fables" (verses 3, 4 R.V.). In chapter i. 15 Paul declared that all in Asia had turned away from him. If people turn away from the human channel through which the risen Christ is speaking, there can be only one consequence, they will turn away from the truth. And that is precisely what we see all around us today. Modern Christendom has largely turned away from the revelation of Christ given through the Apostle of the Gentiles, and the result is confusion, declension and the reception of myth in the place of the 'good deposit'. If truth is rejected, something must take its place and that can only be error.

Much of today's opposition comes from what is described as 'science', but it is anything but scientific, being merely speculation. Yet how many eagerly cling to this rather than submit to the authority of the Word of God, which only indicates where their hearts and true inclinations lie!

The Apostle's thoughts turn back to Timothy:

> "As for you, always be steady, endure suffering, do the work of an evangelist, fulfil your ministry" (iv. 5, R.S.V.).

The Greek su is emphatic, which the R.S.V. rightly indicates by translating it, 'as for you'. Timothy must always be on the alert and be ready at all times to "rough it" for Christ's sake. It is surprising to find that, with the frequent stress upon evangelizing or preaching the gospel, the word evangelist only occurs three times in the New Testament (Acts xxi. 8; Eph. iv. 11 and here). After the foundation ministry of apostles and prophets, before the N.T. was completed, there followed the evangelist, pastor, and the teacher (Eph. iv. 11). We are to expect no more apostles and prophets, for their work finished after laying the foundation. They are succeeded by a lower yet necessary order of ministry, namely the three referred to above.

To be an evangelist in those early days meant doing rough pioneering work that is often foreign to modern evangelization. One has only to compare the conditions in Paul's day with ours. Thus Timothy is exhorted to finish the work that had been entrusted to him, no matter how difficult the conditions. This was the same message that the Apostle gave to Archippus in Col. iv. 17.

We have many discouragements and results seem very small, but let us never forget that we are in the safe keeping of One Who, having started us on the heavenly race, can bring us safely to the goal as we appropriate Him continually by faith.

No.11. iv. 5, - end.
pp. 232 - 240

The Apostle, having given his last solemn charge to Timothy in view of his impending martyrdom, goes on to say:

> "Do the work of an evangelist, fulfil thy ministry. For I am already being offered, and the time of my departure is come" (II Tim. iv. 5, 6, R.V.).

Paul had already used the words 'depart' and 'offered' once before in Phil. i. 23 and ii. 17. The R.V. margin of verse 6 points out that the word 'offered' (spendomai) means 'poured out as a drink offering', a beautiful figure of sacrificial spending of himself in service for His Lord. We readily understand this figure when we see people giving their lives in devoted service for others. We say they are 'pouring themselves out' for the benefit of other people. Thus it was with the Apostle Paul; his conception of service was to spend himself and all that he had without stint for his Saviour and Lord. This was the 'mind of Christ Jesus' (Phil. ii. 5-8) Who freely gave Himself for sinners to the utmost, even to Calvary's cross, and this attitude of mind remained with Paul right to the very end.

We might well ask ourselves, how much does our Christian service cost us? Are we willing to go 'all out' for the One Who gave His all for us? Service that does not cost is worth very little!

Paul continues:

> "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give to me at that day: and not only to me, but also to all them that have loved His appearing" (iv. 7, 8, R.V.).

The three perfect tenses here convey a sense of finality. For the Apostle this is the end. In I Tim. vi. 12 he had appealed to Timothy to 'fight the good fight of faith' and now he states that his own fight is over. "I have finished my course (race)" he declares. When he addressed the Ephesian elders in Acts xx., considering the afflictions that lay ahead, he said,

> "But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus" (Acts xx. 24).

This was his own aim all along, 'one thing I do . . . . . I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus' (Phil. iii. 13, 14). He has now attained his goal and could write with truth: "I have finished (completed) the race (course)". While he was running he had to say 'not as though I had already attained' (Phil. iii. 12). Now he has the assurance that at last he had breasted the tape and won the victor's crown. We have seen that the 'crown' speaks of the added reward and reigning of the overcomer and faithful servant. "If we patiently endure, we shall also reign with Him" (IITim.ii.12) and we have already pointed out the vital difference between salvation, membership of the Body of Christ by grace and living with Him, contrasted with the added prize, reward or crown. This will give the unspeakable privilege of not only living with Christ, but of sharing His throne and the administration of the universe in the glory to come, all being contingent on loyal and unselfish service for the Lord right to the end.

The Lord is the righteous Judge or Umpire, Who will justly award to each member of the Body his due. We can certainly leave all to His impartial assessment. The opinions of others concerning our lives will not intrude there and we can safely disregard them here. One is our Master, even Christ, and all service must be rendered as to Him and not to men.

The R.V. correctly translates the perfect tense, "have loved His appearing", not "love His appearing" (A.V.). A sudden love for any phase of the Second Advent at the end of our lives will not win a crown; it must be the consistent love all along, influencing our life and witness. The N.T. speaks of various "crowns": (1) an incorruptible crown (ICor.ix.25); (2) a crown of life (James i. 12; Rev. ii. 10); (3) a crown of rejoicing (IThess.ii.19); (4) a crown of glory (I Pet. v. 4). All these give us various aspects of the added prize a believer in each calling of Scripture may obtain. With Paul it was a crown associated with righteousness; righteousness being at the very heart of his ministry, commencing with Galatians and Romans, "the just (righteous) shall live by faith".

The concluding section of this epistle (iv. 9-22) now follows, commencing with some personal requests. He urges Timothy once more to do his utmost to come to him as quickly as possible lest the difficulties of traveling should prevent him from doing so, and it was all the more urgent because of the defection of Demas. His forsaking the Apostle is attributed to his love of the present age instead of loving the Lord's appearing. How we need to beware of the insidious pull of present things around us rather than the 'things above where Christ sitteth' (Col. iii. 1, 2). In contrast to disloyal Demas, we find Luke, the beloved physician, faithful to Paul right to the end. The Lord was merciful in not only granting him the precious boon of a faithful friend, amidst so many who deserted him in his time of need, but one who could care for his health.

John Mark, in contrast to Demas, though once unfaithful, causing the dissension between Paul and Barnabas, is now 'profitable (or useful) for the ministry' (i.e. Christian service of any kind). Timothy is to pick him up en route and bring him along. Of Crescens we know nothing, but tradition links him with the churches of Vienna and Mayence in Gaul. The dispatch of Titus to Dalmatia seems to indicate that his work in Crete had finished. His new sphere was on the eastern shore of the Adriatic sea which is now Yugo-Slavia.

Tychicus was one of Paul's reliable associates. He was the bearer of the epistles to both Colossians and Ephesians and it is possible that he was to relieve Timothy at Ephesus during the latter's absence while visiting Paul in Rome.

Timothy is now enjoined to bring the cloak which the Apostle had left with his host, Carpus, at Troas. This was an outer garment of heavy material that would help to ease the rigours of climate in a Roman dungeon. Paul did not attempt to pose as a martyr. There was no virtue in feeling cold needlessly, though we know from his list of sufferings for Christ, detailed in II Cor. xi., that many times he must have experienced this.

We know nothing of the books and the parchments. These were evidently documents that the Apostle valued and possibly some contained parts of Scriptures. These personal requests bear strong marks of authenticity. A fabricator would be very unlikely to write in this way. Paul then warns Timothy against Alexander the coppersmith who had bitterly opposed him and his ministry. We cannot identify him for certain with the Alexander of Acts xix. 33, 34 or the one mentioned in I Tim. i. 20, as Alexander was a common name, but it is possible that he is the same person as was mentioned in I Timothy, otherwise Paul would have differentiated them clearly. In verse 14 the verb 'requite' is in the future tense, 'the Lord will requite him for his deeds'. There is no wish for revenge on Paul's part as suggested in the A.V.

The Apostle now comes to the incidents pertaining to his trial before Nero:

> "At my first defence no one took my part, but all forsook me: may it not be laid to their account. But the Lord stood by me, and strengthened me; that through me the message might be fully proclaimed, and that all the Gentiles might hear: and I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion" (II Tim. iv. 16, 17, R.V.).

It would appear that this is a reference to the preliminary investigation preceding the formal trial. So dangerous had it become to be publicly associated with such a prominent Christian leader as the Apostle Paul that no one was brave enough to come into the open as his friend and plead his cause. All in Asia had turned from him (i. 15) and Paul stood deserted and alone. Like his Saviour (for all forsook Him and fled) Who prayed for those who crucified Him, saying, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do", so this great man of God, left by all, as Christ was in His hour of need, could pray and say, "may it not be laid to their charge".

But Paul, severely tested though he was, could never cry, like the Lord Jesus, "My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" Rather, he gladly recorded that the Lord stood by him and strengthened him to go through to the end victoriously, so that the sacred deposit of truth committed to him 'might be fully known and that all the Gentiles might hear' (verse 17). This was evidently the last opportunity Paul had for public testimony to the truth entrusted to him primarily for the Gentiles, for he was the Apostle of the Gentiles, the channel through which the Lord made known the Gospel of His grace to all nations (Rom. i. 5) and through whom all who were to constitute the Body of Christ would be enlightened as to the Mystery (Eph. iii. 1, 9 R.V.).

There has been much speculation as to what the Apostle meant by being rescued from the lion's mouth (verse 17). Some have thought this is a reference to Nero, or possibly Satan, the roaring lion (I Pet. v. 8). It is most unlikely to refer to being thrown to the lions in the amphitheatre, for this was not allowable for a Roman citizen. It evidently was deliverance from some immediate and extreme danger, which enabled Paul to fully perform his Christ-directed ministry. All the opposition of Satan and the powers of darkness could not prevent this. It meant that the Apostle was immortal till his work was done, and then he could look forward with unspeakable joy to the glories of the Lord's "heavenly kingdom" (verse 18). Almost his last thought therefore was for the Lord's kingdom and this heavenly aspect of it. God's great kingdom embraces all the heavenly spheres as well as the earth, and we have learned, we trust, not to confuse these two linked yet distinct portions of His great redemptive purpose.

Before laying down his pen for the last time, Paul mentions believers who had been intimately associated with him and Timothy. Priscilla and Aquila, the devoted couple who had laid down their necks for him and to whom all the Gentile churches were indebted (Rom. xvi. 3, 4); the household of Onesiphorus, the refresher (i. 16, 17). Erastus remained at Corinth. There is one Erastus mentioned in Rom. xvi. 23, described as the city treasurer, and another person of the same name in Acts xix. 22. Whether either of these is to be identified with the Erastus of II Tim. iv. we cannot say for certain. Trophimus is left at Miletum ill and here again we are reminded, as also with Epaphroditus (Phil. ii. 25-27) of the change of dispensation, and the absence of the gift of miraculous healing as an evidential miracle. It is unthinkable that Paul, if he still had the gift of healing, would not have used it on behalf of these faithful believers who were in such desperate need physically, and who meant so much to him. Acts xx. and xxi. should be consulted for details of the association of Paul and Trophimus.

Once more Timothy is urged to make every effort to come to the Apostle before winter sets in (verse 21). Salutation is sent from Eubulus, Pudens, Linus and Claudia. We know little or nothing of these believers who were evidently well known to Timothy. According to Irenaeus, Linus was the first bishop or overseer of the church at Rome. Some have tried to identify Pudens and Claudia with two people of the same name mentioned in two poems of Martial, the wife being British. But it has been pointed out that Martial did not come to Rome until 66A.D. and most of his epigrams belong to the next generation, so this identification is far from being established, interesting though it is.

The Apostle Paul's last words, in his own handwriting, were his characteristic ones referring to grace which guaranteed the authenticity of his epistles (II Thess. iii. 17, 18) and they were his final message to his dearly-loved son in the faith:

> "The Lord be with thy spirit. Grace be with you" (iv. 22, R.V.).

The last pronoun is plural showing Paul also had in mind the remainder of the faithful ones of that time.

Did Timothy reach the Apostle before his execution? Did he stand faithfully after Paul's departure? We do not know, for church history does not mention him, but we shall know when we all stand together in resurrection likeness to our Saviour and Head before His presence. Neither can we say whether Paul went to his triumphal death alone or with the faithful few. Tradition tells us that he was led three miles out of the city of Rome and executed by the Roman sword, that three of the guard were converted on the way and that they too suffered martyrdom later on for the Lord Jesus.

How much Timothy would need the Lord's presence, strength and grace in the dark and dangerous times which lay ahead of him, only Paul himself knew. But he must have been assured that the One Who had caused him to triumph over all difficulties, discouragements, persecutions and bitter opposition would be more than sufficient for this young man, so soon to take the tremendous responsibility for the truths that characterize this age of abounding grace.

What can we say concerning such an utterly faithful and devoted servant of the Lord? We can only seek by the same grace to follow loyally in his steps as he followed Christ (I Cor. xi. 1) and to thank the Lord with all our hearts for such a wonderful example to us Gentiles (Eph. iii. 1, 13; Col. i. 24). F. W. Farrar's words are appropriate here:

> "No saint of God has ever attained the same heights in so many capacities, or received the gifts of the Spirit in so rich an outpouring, or borne in his mortal body such evident brand marks of the Lord. In his lifetime he was no whit behind the very chiefest of the apostles and he towers above the very greatest of the saints who have striven to follow the example of his devotion to his Lord."

And so our study of these prison letters of Paul draws to a close. A careful and prayerful consideration of the riches contained in these epistles will indicate something of their vast spiritual wealth which awaits our exploration by faith:

> "(Christ, the Beloved One) in Whom we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of His grace . . . . ." (Eph. i. 6, 7).
> "the eyes of your understanding being enlightened; that ye may know what is the hope of His calling, and what the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints . . . . ." (Eph. i. 18).
> "that in the ages to come He might show the exceeding riches of His grace in His kindness toward us in Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 7).
> "that I (Paul) should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ . . . . ." (Eph. iii. 8).
> "that He would grant you, according to the riches of His glory, to be strengthened with might by His Spirit" (Eph. iii. 16).
> "But my God shall supply all your need according to His riches in glory by Christ Jesus" (Phil. iv. 19).
> ". . . . . the mystery (secret) which hath been hid from ages and from generations, but now is made manifest to His saints: to whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery (secret), which is Christ among (margin) you (Gentiles), the hope of glory" (Col. i. 26, 27).
> ". . . . . being knit together in love, and unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding, that they may know the mystery (secret) of God, even Christ" (Col. ii. 2, R.V.).

May both reader and writer learn to 'possess our possessions' by faith in what God has revealed in these prison letters of Paul and then by grace remain absolutely faithful to such a wondrous calling and inheritance whatever the cost in these darkening and testing days, remembering that our 'blessed hope' cannot be far distant. May this constantly strengthen, encourage and inspire us while we are:

“awaiting our blessed hope, the appearing of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ, Who gave Himself for us to redeem us from all iniquity and to purify for Himself a people of His own who are zealous for good deeds” (Titus ii. 13, R.S.V.).

Thoughts on John's Gospel

No.1. pp. 95 - 100

John, having finished his account of the gospel story, writes:

> "And there are also many other things which Jesus did, the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written" (John xxi. 25).

Thus we see that a selection of events concerning our Lord and His word was made with this in view:

> "And many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of His disciples, which are not written in this book: but these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ (the anointed or appointed One), the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through His Name" (John xx. 30, 31).

Here then is a simple and plain statement of what we shall expect to find in this Gospel. The first two verses of chapter i. speak of the 'Word'. For the human mind to begin to understand an idea or thought, it must be made manifest to our senses of sight or sound. We cannot know God without an intermediate medium for He is spirit. God now declares the link between Him and us is the Word and then identifies that word with the Lord Jesus Christ and Himself:

> "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God . . . . . And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us" (John i. 1, 2, 14).

Again to anticipate the message of this Gospel we shall find it is that the Father, the Son, the original written word in our Bible and the Spirit of Truth (see John xvi. 13, etc.) are all one, and are linked for the purposes of God. Each of the manifestations of God has to be accepted in its respective context and with our human limitations we cannot expect to understand how God can be the Father, Son and Spirit at the same time.

> "All things were made by Him; and without Him was not anything made that was made. In Him was life; and the life was the light of men" (John i. 3, 4).

The writer consulted the many volume of Encyclopaedia Britannica to learn how the pundits defined "life". It was: "There is no generally accepted definition of life" (13/1083).

Col. i. 16-17 reads:

> "All things were created by Him, and for Him: and He is before all things, and by Him all things consist."

"Consist" has the sense of 'put together' or 'set'. When we consider all life about us there is design and an ordered balance. For example, the interchange of gases in the atmosphere to make human and plant life possible: the interaction of birds, insects, animals (in the popular sense) and plants to maintain the process of nature. This design, if man will only see it, is to teach man about the invisible things of God:

> "The invisible things of Him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead" (Rom.i.20).

The supreme power of God through the ages (His eternal power and Godhead) of the earth has manifested itself at specific points of time in the Bible record. For example: the creation of Gen. i.; the universal deluge of Noah; the signs and wonders performed by Moses before Pharaoh; the parting of the Red Sea; the virgin birth of Christ; the raising of Lazarus; the resurrection of Christ, etc.

When we see how complex life is and yet purposeful in God's hands we do not wonder man cannot define it in words. Yet God declares through His Word that Christ is life. Can we not see that Christ and the message of this Gospel are going to make meaning and purpose to all life? The O.T. focuses by type and prophecy, attention on the coming Saviour of the world, while the N.T. magnifies and explains the result of His first advent, and looks forward to the blessed results of His Second Coming. All this teaching is in human terms (life) that we can understand (light). For example:

> Gen. xxii. The faith of Abraham ready at the command of God to sacrifice his long awaited son. This is a picture of the ordeal of God the Father. "He that spared not His Own Son, but delivered Him up for us all" (Rom. viii. 32). Needless to say the story of Abraham has other implications.
>
> Exod. xvi. The daily provision of manna to Israel in the wilderness. A picture of the True Bread from heaven. "Your father did eat manna in the wilderness . . . . . I am the living bread which came down from Heaven" (John vi. 49-51).

In this context Christ speaks of eating His flesh and in verse 63 He explains that 'the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life'. When we eat bread (a food containing many life sustaining chemicals) it becomes part of us. Even so the picture is that by reading and understanding the Word of God with guidance by the Spirit of Truth we can grow in spiritual understanding of the will of the Father through the words He has committed to the Son. This understanding leads to true life.

Consider a perfect human family. Man, his wife, one flesh in procreation, the training of the infant child, at first firm quick correction unexplained, later discipline with explanation for application, and later still at maturity entering and enjoying the close counsels of his father. All this is a picture of what our relation with God can be in spiritual terms. The Bible teems with similar lessons including the characteristics of the ant, moth, rust, sow, dog, etc. These examples of human experience in contact with surrounding works of God's creation are not chance, but we believe they have all been planned by God to teach those who are ready to be taught the spiritual realities of God's will.

The selection by John, guided by the Holy Spirit, of our Lord's teaching on the subject of life continuously underlines the gift of unending spiritual life the believer enjoys by his complete acceptance of the person and work of the Lord Jesus Christ. There is, however, a more immediate blessing stated by our Lord in John x. 10 "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly". This blessing of more abundant life is an experience that the believer can expect to enjoy as he becomes so free from concern for himself that he allows the Spirit of Christ free rein in his daily living. Thus it will make every thought and action a most satisfying contribution to the glory and the will of God. When we consider this latter aspect of life, we remember that it can cover mental ability and judgment as well as the physical functions of the human body. The O.T. has many examples where this same aspect of more abundant life was given to men for the special purposes of God. Some of these were:

> "Through faith also Sarah herself received strength to conceive seed, and was delivered of a child when she was past age, because she judged Him faithful Who had promised" (Heb. xi. 11). See Gen. xviii. and xxi. for the story.
>
> "And his master (Pharaoh) saw that the Lord was with him (Joseph), and that the Lord made all that he did to prosper in his hand" (Gen. xxxix. 3).
>
> "And God gave Solomon wisdom and understanding exceeding much, and largeness of heart, even as the sand that is on the sea shore" (I Kings iv. 29).

Deut. xxviii. lists the blessings and curses that God has in His power to bestow to reward the actions of His people Israel. Do we realize that these and many other examples of life bestowed are in the hands of the Son of God, Who is the same yesterday, today and forever, and that this power is as potent as ever?

Associated with 'life' in the context of John i. 4 is 'light'. This word like 'life' has implications in this physical world as well as the mental and spiritual. Its physical properties teach us mental and spiritual truths. Where light is absent we see nothing. All objects become visible and assume colour and character by the reflection of the prime source of light. With light we can see obstacles, find our way, observe the face of our neighbour and judge his pleasure or anger or other emotion. We can observe the marvels of nature. Taking our picture book into the adult realm of the mental and spiritual, we begin to understand what Christ can do for us when He claims and the Scriptures declare "He is the light of the world".

> "He was in the world, and the world was made by Him, and the world knew Him not" (John i. 10).

Here is the plain statement that the Creator of the world visited the world in person and the world did not recognize Him as such, and the next verse records that His own people, who should have been ready to recognize Him because of their teachers and the reading of the O.T. in their synagogues, also failed to discern the arrival of the long prophesied Messiah or the appointed One of God. John, writing his Gospel so many years after Christ's visit could still say, "The world knew Him not". Of how many today, alas, is this still true? Although Christ is preached the message is ignored by so many.

> "But to all who received Him, who believed in His name, He gave power to become children of God" (i. 12, R.S.V.).

Although as we have said the general reaction of the world and even the Jewish people was to fail to recognize Who He was, yet the above verse declares that those who did then, and do today, accept Him as being all that His name implies, have the power (authority to assume a position) to become a child of God. Notice the importance and insistence on the "Name" given by God to His Son in the Scriptures. This name or names, as we shall find, describe Who He was and it is on our unqualified acceptance of these descriptions that the decision rests whether we can have the power to become children of God.

> "Thou shalt call His name Jesus: for He shall save His people from their sins" (Matthew i. 21).
>
> "They shall call His name Emmanuel, which being interpreted is, God with us" (Matthew i. 23).

If we could put in few words what is involved here we should declare: God in the person of His Son paid the penalty for our sins for us, or instead of us, on the cross. Explanation and expansion of this vital transaction of God on our behalf must be deferred, but at this stage let it suffice to say that it is this plain statement that we have to accept, trusting that God as a result will lead us into life in its fullest sense and one of satisfying and rewarding service and unity with Him, and this blessed state leading on to fulfillment in resurrection.

No.2. pp. 135 - 140

The first article in this series, looking at John i., reviewed the implications of light and life. We hope readers have had their own thoughts on this as it affects their own experience and environment in their business and home life. It is important to remember that the existence of darkness is stressed. So very many people go through life without close contact with Christ and His Word and despite what they think, they must be walking in darkness if the Word of God has any meaning at all: "the darkness comprehended it not".

John the Baptist was specifically prepared by God to bear witness to this Light. In very emphatic words he points away from himself to the Light itself:

> "He was not that Light, but was sent to bear witness of that Light" (i. 8).

How sad it is that many actively engaged in organized church work do not make their first aim to point to Christ and His Father's Word, the Bible. Later in this chapter Christ will call His disciples to begin their witness to this Light, that is Christ, and His Father's words. May we prepare ourselves as reflectors and be seen by others reflecting this Light.

The more we get to know God the more we appreciate sweet reasonableness of His ways and this is so often hidden from the world, for at times, men in rebellious words question His justice and righteousness. God told John the Baptist how he would recognize the Messiah:

> "Upon Whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining on Him, the same is He which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost" (i. 33).

In an equivalent but less dramatic way God honours our response in faith by things that have a personal message to us:

> "He that hath received His (Christ's) testimony hath set to his seal that God is true" (iii. 33).

If we see a seal on a document we can identify the one who has authorized the deed. So God says I will make Myself known to you in apparently small ways that will be recognized by you who have been seeking Me.

At the end of chapter i. Philip comes to Nathanael saying they had found Him of Whom Moses and the prophets had written. They had been seeking and they knew the Scriptures. Christ saying to Nathanael that He had seen Philip call him under the fig tree was the seemingly inconsequential happening that sealed Nathanael's faith in the Lord. To us confirming events can happen in a variety of ways, but most common will be the passages of Scriptures that will for us stand out in startling clarity and appositeness to illuminate a problem we have at that moment.

The life of Mary the mother of our Lord must have been full of such incidents revealing the identity of the Lord Jesus as God's Son. When Mary therefore appeals to Christ to supply what was lacking on that family occasion, namely wine for a wedding feast, she is quite prepared to see something supernatural if that is necessary, and warns the servants accordingly:

> "Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it" (ii. 5).

What must have been going through the mind of Christ? In Matt. xxii. He reveals by parable His knowledge of the plans of His Father that the faithful in Israel should typically become His Bride, but the precise hour of the fulfillment of prophecy has always in the hand of the Father alone. Rev. xix. 7 refers to this fulfillment. Thoughts on these happenings may well have been in the mind of Christ when He said the strange (to us) words:

> "Woman, what have I to do with thee? Mine hour is not yet come" (ii. 4).
> "The beginning of miracles did Jesus in Cana of Galilee, and manifested forth His glory: and His disciples believed on Him" (ii. 11).

Here is a definite statement that this was a miracle. Why is it that many leaders of Christianity think that they must reconcile such happenings with the laws of nature in order that the gospel shall be acceptable to the youth of today? Moses, that great man of God, was barred from entering the promised land because he spoilt the typical nature of the miracle of water coming from the rock by the word only:

> "Take the rod . . . . . speak ye unto the rock before their eyes; and it shall give forth his water. Moses . . . . . said . . . . . hear now, ye rebels; must we fetch you water out of this rock? And Moses lifted up his hand, and with his rod he smote the rock twice. And the Lord spake unto Moses, because ye believed Me not, to sanctify Me in the eyes of the children of Israel, therefore ye shall not bring this congregation into the land which I have given them" (Numb. xx. 8-12).

Moses, by not obeying God's precise command, not only made the incident less of a miracle than God intended but also spoilt the picture and its message that God planned this miracle to convey both to Israel at that time and also to the world who would later read the record of its occurrence. The miracles of God carry an underlined message and the very nature of their occurrence is their identification with the Creator. What is man that he should rob God of His glory because in man's puffed up human wisdom he cannot reproduce these miracles in his laboratory, or see such happenings in surrounding nature in his small life span? We should take warning of God's judgment on the unbelief of Moses.

Before we leave the opening chapters of this Gospel, consider the important place God accorded to John the Baptist. Indeed, Christ testified of him:

> "Among those that are born of women there is not a greater prophet than John the Baptist" (Luke vii. 28).

This important witness for God was given special circumstances surrounding his birth (Luke i. 5-25), and the date and place can be fixed today by the details given in verse 5. John the Baptist's witness can be summarized:

1. I am not the Christ (John i. 20).
2. I am not Elias (verse 21. He is referring to Mal. iv. 5 where Elijah, same as Elias, is prophesied as coming before the dreadful Day of the Lord, an event still future).
3. I am not that prophet (verse 21. He is referring to Deut. xviii. 18, a prophecy made by Moses concerning Christ).
4. Positive testimony:

> "The next day John seeth Jesus coming unto him, and saith, behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world" (i. 29).
>
> "And John bare record, saying, I saw the Spirit descending from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon Him. And I knew Him not: but He that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending and remaining on Him, the same is He which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost. And I saw, and bare record that this is the Son of God" (i. 32-34).

This almost reads like evidence in a court of law. For many of us, familiar with the Bible in a superficial way from childhood, some passages have lost their bite and impact. The above verses underline the importance God considers should be attached to the Person and words of His Son, and the evidence should be more than sufficient to satisfy the critical Thomases of today.

Coming to chapter iii. and the visit by night of Nicodemus to Christ, we notice that Nicodemus accepted Christ as a prophet sent by God, for he accepted the works of Christ as true miracles, but that was as far as he would go. Christ goes straight to the need of Nicodemus:

> "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God" (iii. 3).
> "That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit" (iii. 6).

Let John in his first epistle supplement this teaching:

> "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God . . . . . whosoever is born of God overcometh the world, and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith. Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God" (I John v. 1, 4, 5).

Here, let it be said, is the foundation of the Christian faith. Birth means infancy in spirit whatever the natural age of the one professing faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. The figure of the natural baby carries with it the thought of food selected for stages of growth. Milk where the bones and sinews are forming, with meat at the final state of development. The baby in spirit needs the same programme of nourishment from the Word of God. Foundational truths are needed first to be learnt and absorbed: faith in God, redemption, sanctification, resurrection, etc. At the other end of the diet sheet, for the mature adult we find the advanced teaching of Paul's letters from prison which enshrine amongst other precious things the Truth of the Mystery. All is necessary but in the right order. Most important of all, let us not stay in babyhood:

> "Therefore leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on unto perfection; not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith toward God, of the doctrine of baptisms, and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment" (Heb. vi. 1, 2).

While this passage is addressed to Hebrew Christians the appropriate warning applies as well to us who are Gentiles.

> "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up" (iii. 14).

This verse refers to Numb. xxi. 4-9. God had delivered His people from bondage. He had miraculously provided bread and water, yet they could not wait for His eventual blessings in the promised land. They murmured against Him and God used the serpent to bring death to them in judgment. Adam and Eve had all the wonderful delights of a new creation put at their feet. Yet they could not trust God Who in His wisdom denied them at that time, participation in the knowledge of good and evil. Adam and Eve neglected the wise control of their Maker and the penalty of death eventually fell. God in this chapter of John again places before the world a choice. See the alternatives spelt out:

Verse	15	Perish—Eternal life.
	16	Perish—Eternal life.
	17	Condemnation—Salvation.

18 Belief, not condemned—Believeth not, condemned.
19 Darkness—Light.
20-21 Hating the light, evil deeds—Doeth truth (lives out their faith in Christ), cometh to light.

The story of Israel and God's rewards and chastisement of His people is a witness that God means what He says and we need to re-examine the message of salvation in all its aspects.

The story of Abraham and Sarah, their long years waiting for a son to bring fulfillment to their lives is recorded in Gen. xxi. Can we imagine the joy this couple must have experienced when God overruled the weakness of old age to give them renewed life to have their son Isaac. And now God tests the faith of Abraham:

> "Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, ... and offer him there for a burnt offering" (Gen. xxii. 2).

Abraham obeyed God:

> "Abraham stretched forth his hand, and took the knife to slay his son" (Gen. xxii. 10).

Abraham did not have to slay his only beloved son:

> "Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou any thing unto him; for now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son from Me" (Gen. xxi. 12).
>
> "God so (like this) loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life" (John iii. 16).

May this well used text lose nothing of its depth of meaning when we remember that our heavenly Father caused the story of Abraham and Isaac to portray only something of the full sorrow that the Father had to bear to righteously give us His erring children the opportunity of forgiveness and eternal life with Him.

Shall we look at John iii. 23 to the end? These verses bring to our notice the special and differing ministries that God had entrusted to John the Baptist and our Lord. John wants the distinctive messages to be understood and not that human traditions should intrude to confuse and divert attention from the teaching:

> "Then there arose a question between some of John's disciples and the Jews about purifying" (iii. 25).

God gave His servant Moses rules for Israel to observe for washing or purifying after contact with such as God declared at that time to be unclean to that nation. Lev. xi. contains many such rules. What had happened? The Jewish elders had enlarged the rules given by Moses and because these traditions were of themselves they took excessive pride in their observance, just as they did for their interpretation of how the sabbath was to be observed. Yet for all their zeal they were quite prepared to adulterate other parts of the law of Moses where it affected their financial interests:

> "This people honoureth Me with their lips, but their heart is far from Me. Howbeit in vain do they worship Me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men. For laying aside the commandment of God, ye hold the tradition of men, as the washing of pots and cups: and many other such like things ye do. And He said unto them, full well ye reject the commandment of God, that ye may keep your own tradition. For Moses said, honour thy father and thy mother; and, whoso curseth father or mother, let him die the death: but ye say, if a man shall say to his father or mother, it is corban, that is to say, a gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me; he shall be free. And ye suffer him no more to do ought for his father or his mother; making the word of God of none effect through your tradition, which ye have delivered: and many such like things do ye" (Mark vii. 6-13).

Notice the implication that the elders had delivered many of their traditions without divine authority.

In John iii. 26 we see some of John the Baptist's disciples finding an element of competition in numbers between his followers and those of Christ. John immediately emphasizes the distinctive qualifications of each servant of God and his distinctive message; Christ the Bridegroom to the elect of Israel while John was the friend of the Bridegroom sent to prepare His way on earth and speaking of earthly requirements.

We see a similar failure by the Corinthians to give attention and importance to the word of God rather than to the vessel used to declare it:

> ". . . . . one saith, I am of Paul; and another, I am of Apollos; . . . . . who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed, even as the Lord gave to every man?" (I Cor. iii. 4-5).

John now emphasizes the origins of himself and the Lord Jesus and the consequent character and importance of the message we have from each:

> "He that cometh from above is above all: he that is of the earth is earthly, and speaketh of the earth: He that cometh from heaven is above all."
>
> "For He Whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God; for God giveth not the Spirit by measure unto Him. The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into His hand" (John iii. 31, 34, 35).

Would it not be better for us today to avoid problems of textual criticism and the opposition of scientific theories and rather give all our attention to the words God has put in our hands, trusting Him that He would not permit man to weaken His Book with legends, myths and half truths. What mystery of divine instruction from the Father lies in the words "what He hath seen and heard, that He testifieth" (verse 32) and again "He Whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God" (verse 34). How can God say more plainly that here is divine revelation from heaven?

While we are considering the failure of the majority of men in our Lord's day to see the spiritual truths behind the earthly figures of water baptism, the Lamb of God, the Bride, the Bridegroom, etc., let us look at another very important truth our Lord taught by an earthly symbol. A few chapters ahead in chapter vi. Christ declares that He is the Bread of Life. So important is it, He says it over and over again as in:

> "He that eateth My flesh, and drinketh My blood, dwelleth in Me, and I in him. As the living Father hath sent Me, and I live by the Father: so he that eateth Me, even he shall live by Me. This is that bread that came down from heaven: not as your fathers did eat manna, and are dead: he that eateth of this bread shall live for ever . . . . . It is the Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life" (John vi. 56-58, 63).

Does not this text declare that the words of God are spirit and quicken us, giving the essential means to grow, the divine plan for spiritual growth? The study of these words of God (the whole Bible), their acceptance and understanding, leads us to be one with the Father and His Son. The reading of the Word and subsequent incorporation into every part of our life is illustrated by the extremely strong metaphor of eating the flesh of the Son. Drinking His blood carries the figure in a similar way, that of receiving into our lives all the implications of the work of Christ on the cross and its blessed resultant benefits to us here and hereafter.

The words in John vi. 63 provide an example of an antonym, a favourite subject of Mr. Welch currently running in The Berean Expositor. We quote the literal English translation of the Nestle Greek text:

> "The Spirit is the One quickening; the flesh not profits anything" (Emphatic negative).

There is no question that it is the Holy Spirit working on the words of Christ that gives us life, and this is in line with the purpose of God. Thus we are not making a god of the Bible (an accusation once leveled at me by a vicar), but rather giving this Book its rightful place in God's scheme of revelation. A further paraphrase we believe could read:

> "It is the Spirit (the Lord's words and the Holy Spirit behind them) that makes alive (or gives life); the flesh (the body and the old nature) profits nothing."

Can there be greater confirmation of this teaching than by our Lord's quotation from the O.T.?:

> "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God" (Matt. iv. 4).

Our Lord was quoting from God's words recorded by Moses:

> ". . . . . the Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep His commandments, or no. And He humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna . . . . . that He might make thee know that man doth not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live" (Deuteronomy viii. 2, 3).

The manna for Israel in the wilderness prefigures the part our Lord and the Bible play in the world today. God does not now force on us supernatural demonstrations of His presence and existence. We see no angels with additional revelations from our Creator. Rather He is suffering us to be without human proof of His presence but is trying our faith by letting the complete Bible be His sole tangible witness. God's Son has completely accomplished the Father's will in making a righteous way back into reconciliation and unity with Him. The Lord Jesus Christ has instructed His servant Paul to explain to us this gospel and to announce to us the abiding presence of His Spirit that can empower and guide the life of a believer in His Name. This is the Bread of life that we have figuratively to eat so that in spiritual growth such knowledge of God and His Son become part of us. Herein is full life, health of mind and body, peace and unity not only in the believer but in his relationship to God and his neighbour.

Many of those that first heard the doctrine of eating the Lord's flesh (John vi.) were offended, finding it a hard saying to accept and walked no more with the Lord. Today many also misunderstand the words of the Lord. They miss this pointer to the channel of life, the Word of God, and allow instead this chapter to be linked with and to anticipate the church's ordinance of Holy Communion, thus diverting attention from such a vital lesson from God.

No.4. pp. 206 - 210

This chapter (iv.) includes the encounter by the Lord with the woman at the well in Samaria and the healing of the nobleman's son. Remembering that every word in this Gospel was written for a purpose we look at verse 27:

> "And upon this came His disciples, and marveled that He talked with the woman: yet no man said, what seekest Thou? or, why talkest Thou with her?"

This verse indicates that God wishes us to have an enquiring mind that seeks to get behind the words written, and so achieve the maximum benefit and instruction from the text. The woman was of Samaria and verse 9 reminds us that Jews had no dealings with Samaritans. Our Lord's disciples could therefore well have asked Him why He was acting contrary to the Jewish custom. The woman, however, asked this very question and was rewarded by our Lord's encouragement for her seeking, by His words relative to the true worship of God. Our Lord or John inspired by the Holy Spirit goes on to say:

> "But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth: for the Father seeketh such to worship Him. God is a Spirit (or better, God is spirit. R.V. margin): and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth" (iv. 23, 24).

Only by soaking ourselves in the Word of God and relying on His spirit of Truth to dwell with us and teach us, can we know how God works, the goals to which He is working, and most important of all His justice, righteousness and infinite love. To know, assess, value, accept, and praise is really the spiritual worship that God desires. The words and attitude of His Son exemplify this requirement from us.

In II Kings xvii. Israel by their persistent idolatry were removed from Samaria to Assyria and men from Babylon and other nations (verse 24) were set up in the cities of Samaria instead. The new inhabitants not fearing God were subjected by Him to attacks of lions. On appealing to the king of Assyria he arranged for Jewish priests to live in Beth-el and teach the new inhabitants how to fear the Lord, but it is recorded that they still followed their idolatrous religion. The lapse of time between II Kings xvii. and our Lord's day may well have modified the composition of the population of Samaria and its religion yet Christ could still say to the woman: "Ye worship ye know not what" (iv. 22).

The Lord's supernatural knowledge of her past life made a great impression on her and she says: "Sir, I perceive that Thou art a prophet", and then goes on to take advantage of the opportunity to settle some of her religious problems, mainly the vexed question as to whether Jerusalem was the only place where God had set His name for worship.

Before we consider our Lord's reply let us admire the earnest spirit of enquiry shown by this Gentile woman and later by her compatriots. Would that there was today a greater move to question and examine the basis of church worship and ordinance so that it could be entered into with knowledge and understanding acquired first hand from the Word itself. To her and a few selected people Christ plainly reveals Himself as the Messiah. To direct questioning from antagonistic Jewish leaders He gives no direct reply that can be twisted against Him, but leaves them in no doubt as to His claim to the title.

> "How long dost Thou make us to doubt? If Thou be the Christ, tell us plainly?" (iv. 24).

Our Lord's statement "I and My Father are one" (verse 30) was the most satisfaction He would afford them on this occasion.

To those who have made much of the Bible their own, it is good sometimes to stand back and try to see the broad plan God has for His creation, and this is not only earth but heaven with its host of spirits as well. What a wonderfully comprehensive summary of the gospel is II Cor. v. 19: "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto Himself". John's gospel is devoted to forging the links for this plan of reconciliation. First the insistence by the Son that the Father had sent Him. Secondly that He and His Father were one. Thirdly, the blessed gift of eternal life to those who understood and accepted all that the sacrifice of the Lamb of God involved and secured.

John's gospel anticipates the way Jew and Gentile responded to this message. In this chapter (iv.) of John's gospel the Gentile Samaritans say:

> "Now we believe, not because of thy saying: for we have heard Him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world" (iv. 42).

But of the Jews, our Lord said to some:

> "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe" (iv. 48).

For us the path of salvation commences with faith:

> "For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of Him Who hath subjected the same in hope" (Rom. viii. 20).

"Hope" here is our utter conviction in the truth of God's Word. How overjoyed our Lord must have been to have received this response from the people of Samaria.

Looking now at John iv. 10:

> "Jesus answered and said unto her (the woman at the well), if thou knewest the gift of God, and Who it is that saith to thee, give Me to drink; thou wouldest have asked of Him, and He would have given thee living water", and in verse 14:

> "Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life."

Here is a picture of the life in Christ—the new nature—being born a child of God—a spring that will beautify, strengthen and feed our every act and thought in our life in Him. The cup of water from the earthly well refreshes and then we thirst again, but with this gift of God we have a well of spiritual water implanted in us. The words 'springing up' suggest development with the goal of eternal life. Natural water is the vehicle designed by God to feed and maintain all the functions of the human body. Spiritual water has a counterpart in us. The visible vehicle has been deliberately chosen by God to demonstrate the invisible operation of the Spirit. Think it out for yourself. The words of God are not empty rhetoric. The woman at the well seems to have missed the lesson our Lord taught. It may well have dawned on her later. If we read the Word hurriedly and without meditation we too may miss the many precious lessons that are going to strengthen and guide our spiritual education and maturity.

The new nature—life in Christ—is the gift of God and is one of several gifts that John records:

iii. 16: "God gave his only begotten Son."
iv. 10: links the above gift with "living water".
x. 11: ". . . . . the Good Shepherd giveth His life for the sheep."
xiii. 15: "I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you." One of the many examples set before us to emulate.
xvii. 8: "I have given unto them the words which Thou gavest Me."
xvii. 14: "I have given them Thy Word."
xvii. 22: ". . . . . the glory which Thou gavest Me I have given them."

And what can we understand by this last text? Glory carries the idea of approval by God. Where we let the Spirit of Christ have full reign and free rein in us we shall be conscious of a unity with Him, and our lives by reflection will witness in measure His glory to the world.

Finally the episode of healing the nobleman's son who was at the point of death:

> "And as he was going down, his servants met him, and told him, saying, thy son liveth. Then enquired he of them the hour when he began to amend. And they said unto him, yesterday at the seventh hour the fever left him" (John iv. 51, 52).

The nobleman's time check proved to him the miracle of Christ's gracious act of healing:

> "So the father knew that it was at the same hour, in the which Jesus said unto him, thy son liveth: and himself believed, and his whole house" (iv. 53).

Divine prophecy is used by God to demonstrate to man His overruling power through the platform of time. If man would see it, it vindicates the truth of His Word. As an example, Stuart Allen in The Unfolding Purpose of God lists 14 prophecies that were fulfilled concerning the Lord Jesus Christ in 24 hours, and these prophecies were spread all over the O.T. May we prime ourselves with such prophetic utterances and their fulfillment that we like Paul in Acts xxviii. 3 can in some measure be qualified to persuade men out of the law of Moses and out of the prophets 'concerning Jesus'.

No.5. pp. 229 - 232

A rhyme tells of a dear old and tired charwoman who, at the end of her days, looked forward to heaven where 'she could do nothing for ever and ever'. The facetious skeptic talks of playing on a harp on a cloud. But what says the Scriptures:

> "Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? . . . . . Know ye not that we shall judge angels?" (I Cor. vi. 2, 3).
>
> "And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as My Father hath appointed unto Me; that ye may . . . . . sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Luke xxii. 29, 30).
>
> "In My Father's house are many mansions . . . . . I go to prepare a place for you" (John xiv. 2).

These are not the only references to our future state, but if few in number, our finite human conditions could not envisage the spiritual conditions of God's other kingdoms for which this life is a preparation. Israel was an earthly example of such a plan of God.

The children of Israel were delivered by God out of the bondage and idolatrous conditions of Egypt and began in their wilderness journey a course of preparation for the future service of God. Their immediate goal which He had promised them was a land flowing with milk and honey:

> "I am come down to deliver them out of the hand of the Egyptians, and to bring them up out of that land into a good land and large, unto a land flowing with milk and honey" (Exod. iii. 8).

On the threshold of this land God ordered selected men to be sent to reconnoiter the land and bring back specimens of its fruits:

> "And they returned from searching of the land after forty days . . . . . and said . . . . . surely it floweth with milk and honey; and this is the fruit of it . . . . . But the men (not Joshua and Caleb) that went up . . . . . brought an evil report" (Numb. xiii. 25, 27, 31, 32).

The men of Israel had not faith in the God of their fathers but, ignoring that God had kept faith with them and graciously given them material witness of the blessings of the land, they discounted the power of God to aid them in the overthrow of its occupants as the Lord had promised. Rather they impugned God and accused Him of wanting to destroy them and their little ones in the wilderness. In judgment God kept that nation impotent in the wilderness until all that generation of adult males had died, namely for thirty-eight (38) years:

> "And the space in which we came from Kadesh-barnea, until we were come over the brook Zered, was thirty and eight years; until all the generation of the men of war were wasted out from among the host, as the Lord sware unto them" (Deut. ii. 14).

Turning at last to the subject of this article, John v., we find that here Christ is outlining the spiritual equivalent of Israel's journey in the wilderness. The miracle or selected sign at the beginning of the chapter; the healing of the impotent man, in that condition for 38 years (5) and that due to sin (14); makes a link with our opening remarks.

Christ makes several references to the work of His Father:

> "The Son can do nothing of Himself, but what He seeth the Father do: for what things soever He doeth, these also doeth the Son likewise. For the Father loveth the Son, and sheweth Him all things that Himself doeth: and He will shew Him greater works than these, that ye may marvel. For as the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth them; even so the Son quickeneth whom He will" (v. 19-21).

Our scientific books propound the existence of planetary systems such as ours with a central sun, being repeated in infinite numbers at infinite distances in space in every direction. How then shall we even start to think of the work of the Father? We should be utterly lost if the Son did not bring into our finite vision and understanding sufficient to witness to the certainty of spiritual horizons that could be the goal and promised land of those of us who have faith. The raising of Lazarus and other miracles are 'the grapes of Eshcol' of our future estate. And Heb. vi. 5 describes them as 'powers of the world to come'.

Christ makes repeated statements of the links between His Father and Himself:

Verse	19	The Son—nothing done of Himself but what He sees the Father do.
	20	The Father loves the Son and shows Him His works.
	21	The power to quicken the dead, common to Father and Son.
	22	The Father commits all judgment to the Son.
	23	Honour common to Father and Son.
	26	Life in Himself, common to Father and Son.
	30	Judgment of the Son just, for "as I hear I judge".
	36	Christ came to "finish" the works of the Father.

It is of interest to note the reference in verse 36 to 'finishing' the works of the Father. We remember our Lord on the cross before yielding up the ghost said "It is finished". All the works of God in Christ "reconciling the world unto Himself" find their climax here.

At verse 37 Christ points to their dependence on Him to bring to them the knowledge of the Father:

> "Ye have neither heard His voice at any time, nor seen His shape."

We can imagine the excitement amongst these Jews when they thought that Christ in saying this was ignoring all the oracles that Moses had delivered to them from God. But our Lord confronts them:

> "(Ye) search the Scriptures: for in them ye think ye have eternal life; and they are they which testify of Me" (v. 39).
>
> "Had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed Me: for he wrote of Me" (v. 46).

The over ruling necessity for man is to have the Word of God abiding in him and this is done by faith in God's messengers whom He has sent them—Moses, the prophets, the apostles and here the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God:

> "And ye have not His Word abiding in you: for Whom He hath sent, Him ye believe not" (v. 38).

Even as it is true that without Christ, the Living Word, we cannot know the Father, so it is true that without the written Word, the canon of Scripture, that God has preserved for us, we can have no adequate knowledge of God and His purposes for us.

In the service of God in this life each one will vary from others in sphere and function. God has a purpose for every believer. God foresaw our response and we are children of His in His family. Age, environment, health, infirmities, finance, spiritual maturity will all play their part as to how God can use us. May we do as Paul enjoined Timothy "stir up (rekindle) the gift of God . . . . . for He has given us . . . . . the spirit of power, and of love, and of a sound mind" (II Tim. i. 6, 7). As we use these gifts let us entirely forget ourselves—our pride or position and 'seek the honour that cometh from God' only (John v. 44).

Before leaving this chapter, one verse requires mention:

> "If I bear witness of Myself, My witness is not true" (v. 31).

Mr. Welch in his excellent book Life Through His Name, page 172, shows why we cannot accept the Authorized Version's translation and puts forward sound reasons for the better rendering:

> "Though I bear witness of Myself, is not My witness true?".

Blessed be God, we know this is so:

> "He that hath received His testimony hath set to his seal that God is true" (John iii. 33).

May we, with the impotent man, having found the Lord Jesus, put away spiritual slumbering and 'walk in the Spirit' fulfilling our part in the work of the Father.

The Will of God

No.8. The Worthy Walk---Ephesians.

pp. 10 - 16

As we consider the worthy walk as an expression of the Will of God for the member of Christ's Body, let us turn to Paul's epistle to the Ephesians.

In the prayer at the commencement of this letter (i. 17-23), Paul makes clear that this calling is none other than the calling of Christ Himself: "that ye may know what is the hope of His calling" (18). Thus it is a calling almost beyond comprehension: how can we understand the full significance of "His calling"? Perhaps it can be summed up in words which Paul uses elsewhere: 'that God may be all in all' (I Cor. xv. 28). Hence it is necessary for the believer to come to the point where he recognizes in practice that in the new man "Christ is all, and in all" (Col. iii. 11). But as we consider the walk which is counted 'worthy' in Ephesians we find that in contrast to the tremendous heights 'far above all' at the commencement of the epistle, the later 'practical' section brings us very much 'down to earth'.

It is in the first verse of chapter iv. that Paul says 'I therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called'. The word he uses for 'worthy' has the significance, when used of price, of 'equal value': our walk should 'balance with' or 'equate with' His calling. Here is a tremendous thought! We may well ask 'who is sufficient for these things?' It is, then, not surprising to find that we are to walk 'with all lowliness', or better, 'with humility of mind'. For our walk to equate with His walk we must "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus" (Phil. ii. 5), and this exhortation is in the context of 'lowliness of mind' (verse 3). In both instances Paul uses exactly the same word. It is with the disposition of the mind that the worthy walk begins. Christ 'being in the form of God', was called to walk with such humility of mind that 'even the death of the cross' was not beneath His dignity. The 'lowliness' this calling demands of us should equate with this. But 'meekness, with longsuffering' is also called for: 'gentleness, with patience (or endurance)'. These qualities are required for 'forbearing one another in love'. So often it is when we are not lowly in mind we are impatient with others, but realizing there are aspects of our own character others may find a trial, we are gentle with them and prepared to 'put up with' them 'in love'. Clearly this love is something far greater, and different from, much that passes for 'love' in our day: this love is not dependent on feelings, nor does it seek gratification, it is a self-giving concern such as that manifested by the Lord when He became obedient unto death, and that the death of the cross. The whole of verse 2 might well be summed up "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus".

Arising directly from this in the worthy walk is the endeavour 'to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace'. The word for 'endeavouring' is precisely the one Paul uses in II Tim. ii. 15, "Study to shew thyself approved unto God". Perhaps here a better translation would be 'give diligence to keep the unity'. How careful we ought to be, both in word and deed, in our dealings with one another to preserve (or guard) the spiritual oneness. For it is a 'oneness' which exists by reason of 'the peace'. The peace which we all enjoy with God was made 'through the blood of His cross' (Col. i. 20), and it is the 'bond' which binds us together. The bond is a strong one, it can be translated 'cramp'. We are bound together, 'cramped' (or clamped) together because we each have peace with God. Here, as always, our relationships with each other result from a prior relationship with God and not, as is sometimes suggested that our relationship with God depends upon our right relationship with one another.

When we come to verse 4, The Companion Bible note suggests, "Ye are" as better than "There is one body, and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling". This would seem to supply the sense better: being bound together with the peace, says Paul, ye are one Body, and indeed, have one Spirit, for "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of His" (Rom. viii. 9). On this basis it would seem almost difficult not to keep the spiritual oneness, yet we all know from our own experience that, in spite of the fact that we are one in Christ, it is only too easy for that oneness to disappear on occasions. Hence the need to 'give diligence' to this matter. Yet in addition there is but "One Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all". Notice there is one God Who is the Father of all, and not only so, He is also above all, through all, and in you all. God has supplied the strongest possible basis on which to preserve the spiritual oneness. Self, in its varied and multitudinous forms, destroys what God has established; how much we need to "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus"!

The most important, and therefore practical, instruction concerning the worthy walk is 'doctrinal' or 'theological'. Here are the basic facts which do not depend upon us in any way whatsoever, they are all of God. To these facts we should 'give diligence', 'studying' them until we come to 'reckon' on them, and to 'reckon' with them in our dealings with each other.

But the worthy walk does not mean that every one has the same responsibilities, the same capabilities. These are given 'according to the measure of the gift of Christ' (Ephesians iv. 7). "Wherefore (better, 'for this reason') He . . . . . gave gifts unto men." The gifts Paul mentions in particular are gifts of ministers given for certain particular reasons:

> "For the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ: till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ" (Eph. iv. 12, 13).

Thus it seems that primarily the Will of God for the believer, and therefore the worthy walk, is concerned with the well-being of the Body. Is this how we live our lives?

Then for the moment Paul turns to the 'unworthy walk'. The unworthy walk is very much concerned with doctrine: the doctrine of 'the error'. His desire is that 'we be no longer babes' swayed by the opinions and teachings of men, but that we should come to maturity in Christ. In contrast to heeding the doctrines of the error, the believer should be 'speaking the truth in love': more accurately 'truthing in love'. Speaking the truth in love is of course included, but the thought is very much wider: being the truth, embodying the truth, living out the truth we believe. The object is that we 'may grow up (mature) into Him in all things' (Eph. iv. 15). He is the Head:

> "From whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love" (Eph. iv. 16).

Again there is emphasized the good of the Body and the need for it to mature. It is also 'according to the effectual working of every part'. If the Body is to come to maturity then every one of us has a contribution to make, however small that contribution may seem to us. If this is 'the grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ' it is as important in His eyes as the contribution made by the most gifted.

Verses 17-19 outline the kind of walk which is not the Will of God for the believer, and this because "ye have not so learned Christ". Hence comes the exhortation to 'put away . . . . . the old man . . . . . and (put on) be clothed with the new man'. A similar injunction is found in Rom. xiii. 13, 14:

> "Let us walk honestly, as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying. But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof."

Here also the thought is to put on as a garment the Lord Jesus Christ: in our conduct, in our walk we should 'make visible' our Lord.

Having enjoined clothing with the new man Paul continues in Eph. iv. 25 and onward, by expounding what this means: putting away the lie, speaking truth. He deals with anger, and whatever may the precise meaning of verse 26 it is clear that at most anger must be put away as speedily as possible; place must not be given to the devil. We should be careful to do nothing, to go nowhere, indeed to think nothing, on which the devil may work. The former thief is to work and so be able to help the needy; conversation should be of such a nature as to edify and minister grace to the hearers. We should do nothing to grieve, pain or cause sorrow to the Holy Spirit. Rather we should be 'kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you' (iv. 32). Paul continues through the first part of chapter v. in much the same vein, interspersing practical exhortations with doctrinal statements. Then from verse 22 he deals with personal relationships.

The relationship between husband and wife should be governed by that between Christ and the Church. Children are to obey their parents 'in the Lord'; fathers are not to provoke their children, but rather 'bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord'. Servants are to be good employees, not with fear and trembling before their human masters, but before Christ, thus whole-heartedly doing the will of God. Employers also are to behave in a similar way to their servant, recognizing that they have themselves a Master to Whom, as employees, they are rendering service.

So far Paul has been dealing with conduct, relationships and situations which are common to all. But what of situations peculiar to the individual? It is here that so often difficulty is experienced in knowing the Will of God. He continues (vi. 10) "Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of His might". "Finally" is literally 'of the remaining': of those matters which are individualized and to which he has made no reference. Nor can he do so, he can only say "Be strong in the Lord, and in the power of His might". Yet what more can he say? "Be empowered (or enabled) in the Lord", he has already exhorted "Be clothed with (put on) the new man". But this is not all, for the enablement is also "in the power of His might". The word translated 'power' is the one from which our demo*cracy*, theo*cracy* are derived (kratos), and has the significance of 'power of mastery, or government', and in His might is the power to 'master' any situation which can arise; power to govern our every situation and action. Small wonder then, that he continues "Be clothed with (put on) the whole armour of God". The 'armour' we need is Christ Himself, 'that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil'. Here the word translated both 'that' and 'against' is the little word pro which has the general significance of 'towards'. There are sometimes situations from which we would choose to flee, to take 'the line of least resistance', but Christ has the mastery in such situations, and we should face 'towards' them in 'the power of His might', for in them the devil is cunningly scheming for our downfall.

Paul reminds his readers (and us) that often, when personalities are involved, and, perhaps, we fear to give a friend offence, we struggle not against flesh and blood, but against spiritual beings, both of the highest and lowest orders, who are seeking our undoing. On account of this, says the Apostle, take up the whole armour of God, the panoply (the equipment of the heavy-armed soldier) of God. Once this equipment has been taken up, every weapon of defence is at hand in order that ye may be able to stand against in the evil day, and having done all, to stand firm. It has been pointed out that in the inventory of the equipment which follows there is no protection for the back.

As we look in detail at the equipment available for us the whole panoply can be summed up in the Lord Jesus Christ. First on the list is the girdle of truth; without the Truth we have no prospect whatsoever of dealing with these difficult situations, yet the One in Whose power and might we are to stand against(?) is the One Who claimed "I am . . . . . the Truth". The breastplate of righteousness, what is this but Christ living in and through us? The sandals of the preparation (or readiness) of the Gospel of the peace are provided for us through 'the blood of His cross' (Col. i. 20); the shield of the faith, it has been suggested, is Christ Himself (Jehovah said to Abraham, 'I am thy shield', Gen.xv.1); the helmet of salvation can come from none other than Christ Himself, and the spiritual sword, which is the Word of God, speaks to us of Christ Who is Himself the Living Word. When each member of the Body takes up the whole armour of God 'Praying always . . . . . with all prayer and supplication . . . . . for all saints' (18) a formidable and invincible phalanx is formed. It is said that when Roman soldiers formed close order with their long, oblong shields overlapping, no chariot was capable of breaking their ranks; rather the chariot would be driven over them without harming them. How much we need the help of each other, even when it comes to the question of finding the Will of God for our own personal problems.

The walk which is worthy of this highest of all callings is very lowly: with lowliness of mind, with patience and forbearance, with mutual concern, simply living a very ordinary everyday kind of life, but doing so 'as unto the Lord, and not unto men', living clothed with the Lord Jesus Christ that our lives may be governed by His might, praying always for all saints.

Perhaps it may all be summed up in the first two verses of chapter v.:

> "Be ye therefore followers of God, as dear children; and walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us, and hath given Himself for us an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweetsmelling savour", or again, as Paul puts it to Titus, 'adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things'.

No.9. The Worthy Walk---Colossians (1).
pp. 32 - 36

In the last study we saw how the 'worthy walk' reflects the will of God for the member of Christ's Body, as that walk is outlined for us in the Epistle to the Ephesians. In the present study we wish to see how His will for us is reflected in the outline of the worthy walk in Colossians. There are re-statements of a number of the factors involved, together with new thoughts and expansions.

Paul's prayer in Col. i. 9 onwards is pertinent to our subject. As in the case of the prayer in Eph. i., so here the prayer is 'on account of' their 'faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which ye have to all the saints' (Col. i. 4, 8). He prays 'in order that ye might be filled with the knowledge of His will': completed with the knowledge of His will. It is not, however, simple knowledge (gnosis), but 'upon-knowledge' (epignosis) which is sometimes taken to signify 'further knowledge', sometimes 'acknowledgment'. There seems to be no good reason why both thoughts cannot be included here. So far, the knowledge these Colossian believers had, had resulted in 'faith and love', but faith without further knowledge can be 'blind' faith, mere credulity: uninformed love can mislead. It is worth noting that in both the other main prison epistles the initial prayer is concerned with epignosis: 'may give unto you the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him' (Eph. i. 17), 'that your love may abound yet more and more in knowledge' (Phil. i. 9). The latter reference leads up to that tremendously challenging third chapter with its call to emulate the Apostle Paul in his desire 'to know Him' (to get to know Him). There is also in this prayer in Colossians the same inference: Paul 'asks that ye might be completed in the knowledge of His will', and after enumerating the glories of Christ in chapter i. 13 onwards, he concludes (ii. 10) "And ye are complete in Him". It seems clear then that the knowledge of God's will is found in the knowledge of Christ, and it is to the end 'that ye might walk worthy of the Lord'. The 'worthy walk' requires further knowledge of Christ.

In any sphere knowledge which is not put into practice is of little value: here also, the knowledge we have, and the further knowledge we gain, needs to be put into practice, needs to be acknowledged. Hence we have suggested above that both thoughts may be included in this instance.

The phrase 'in all wisdom and spiritual understanding' is very near to the thought in the Ephesian prayer for 'the spirit of wisdom and revelation' (Eph. i. 17), and reminds us that the knowledge of Christ does not come by means of human reason, wisdom or ability. We need to be granted by God the spiritual wisdom and ability which will unfold to us the superlative glories of Christ and of His place at the right hand of God in 'heavenly places'.

All this is required to the end 'that ye might walk worthy of the Lord'. Recalling that to walk worthy is to live a life which 'balances' or equates with the Lord, we can understand to some extent why all this is needed, when we come to consider the glories of our Lord and Head detailed for us later in this first chapter.

The worthy walk, and therefore the will of God for each one of us, is 'unto all pleasing', which might be paraphrased 'every desire to please the Lord'. The R.S.V. puts it 'to lead a life worthy of the Lord fully pleasing to Him': every desire to please Him in everything would seem to sum up the thought. Are we so motivated?

The prayer continues 'unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work'. This almost suggests that being occupied in 'every good work' we shall be 'fruitful'. But the 'good works' are not themselves the fruit: bearing fruit in every good work is more accurate, suggesting the 'good work' as the sphere in which the fruit is borne. This brings us to the question what are the 'good works'? Are they those activities popularly known today as 'good works'? Should the member of Christ's Body be a 'do-gooder'? There is a reference in Eph. ii. 10 dealing with good works which may be helpful:

> "For we are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them."

This would seem to make clear that the good works are the 'worthy walk', for we are to 'walk in them'. The 'walk' equates with the 'life': good works are the life of the believer, not part-time or spare-time activities. This is made clearer in Titus iii. 14:

> "And let our's also learn to maintain good works for necessary uses, that they be not unfruitful."

Here again 'good works' and 'fruitbearing' are linked together. These good works are for 'necessary uses'. Our people, says the Apostle, are to bear fruit in good works for necessary uses: for necessary needs. Perhaps we may simplify this expression by 'for necessities', bearing in mind the emphasis. Many of those covered by the term 'ours' at that time had but recently been converted from paganism, which was (in the widest sense) 'permissive'. Some of them may have had their occupations directly dependent upon the worship of a pagan deity, as in the case of the "silversmiths" at Ephesus (Acts xix. 23-27), the occupations of others may have been indirectly so, as in the case of food sold in 'the shambles' at Corinth, where a good deal of the meat had probably been 'offered to idols'. Against this background it becomes clearer that the 'good works' are occupations, the means of livelihood, which were honest and morally good. In such a situation the choice of an occupation which would be worthy of their Christian profession could well mean that their income would be seriously reduced, and their consideration must not be primarily to obtain lucrative work, but, providing their necessary needs were met, that which was honest and good.

Possibly the position today is even more complicated than it was in the days of the Apostle. Paganism, although of a different kind, is as widespread now as it was then. Some thirty or forty years ago a business man remarked that 'it is almost impossible to be a Christian and in business today', and in the years since then there has been no improvement in the situation. In seeking employment or a change of employment there are certain areas in which it should be quite clear to the believer he can have no part; it should also be clear that the primary interest should be the reputation of the occupation rather than its profitability. Yet there are many occupations where there is not such clarity: some printers publish pornographic literature: does this mean that no believer can have a part in the printing industry? Here it would seem that the occupation is honest and largely of good repute, and therefore suitable for the believer, but if the Company being considered is known to produce undesirable publications, that Company cannot be considered to provide 'good works'. In many spheres in modern business only the individual can decide for himself, in the light of Scripture and his conscience before God. What, for example, is the position of a family of believers who breed race horses and who claim that they only breed horses, it is nothing to do with them to what use the animals are put after they are sold? For what purpose can horses bred for racing be put?

Paul speaks of some in the following terms:

> "They profess that they know God; but in works they deny Him, being abominable, and disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate" (Titus i. 16).

Here were some who were not prepared to acknowledge the knowledge of God in Christ which had come to them, and they had professed to receive. The meaning of 'reprobate' (adokimos) is 'not standing the test', and so 'worthless'. The test of the believer is whether he is prepared to put into practice (to acknowledge) what he professes to know of God, even, if need be, to the extent of being reduced to the bare necessities of life: whether his walk is 'worthy' or 'worthless'.

Clearly 'good works' in the popular sense of the expression are not excluded: here may be one of those occupations suitable for a believer, one where he may earn little more than enough for 'necessary uses'. For some, one or other of such good works may provide a useful spare time occupation. The test must always be: is this what "God hath before ordained that we should walk in them"?

It is therefore significant that Paul continues to pray (Col. i. 10) "and increasing in the knowledge of God". If our knowledge (and acknowledgment) of God stagnates, so will our knowledge of His will, and imperceptibly our walk will deteriorate from 'worthy' to 'worthless'.

Considering these matters one may ask "Who is sufficient for these things?" Paul recognized the difficulties involved in the worthy walk, and so he is found praying also (11) 'strengthened with all might, according to His glorious power'. As we recognize the frailty of our flesh there comes the assurance that God will enable us with all enablement. Here is an echo of the Apostle's claim in Phil. iv. 13:

> "I can do all things through Christ Which strengtheneth me."

Moreover the enablement is 'according to His glorious power', or the might of His glory. How important it is then that we should pray for 'the spirit of wisdom and revelation . . . . . that (we) may know . . . . . what is the exceeding greatness of His power to usward who believe'; this again is 'according to the working of His mighty power', the energy of the strength of His might. Here is ability, energy, strength beyond description, save that it is that:

> ". . . . . which He wrought in Christ, when He raised Him from the dead, and set Him at His own right hand in the heavenly places, far above all . . . . ." (Eph. i. 17-23).

No.10. The Worthy Walk---Colossians (2).

pp. 46 - 49

Involved in the worthy walk is also 'all patience and longsuffering with joyfulness' (cf. Eph. iv. 2). Here 'joyfulness' is added; it is quite possible to endure and suffer-long miserably! Yet with such tremendous sufficiency available, and recognizing all that is expressed later in this same chapter, how can it be otherwise than with joyfulness?

There is some uncertainty whether 'with joyfulness' should be linked with 'patience and longsuffering', or with 'giving thanks to the Father'. For the believer should not both apply? Certainly as we consider all for which we have to 'give thanks unto the Father', this should fill our hearts with joy as can nothing else. To begin with He has 'made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light': we, who once were:

> ". . . . . without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world" (Eph. ii. 12).

He has made such 'meet' for an inheritance beyond comprehension! Moreover He has rescued us from the authority of darkness, 'and hath translated us into the kingdom of His dear Son'. Clearly an exposition of this and the following verses is beyond the scope of this study; but in this passage are the grounds both of Christian joyfulness and of the worthy walk. Notice how Paul's prayer "That ye might walk worthy" inevitably points to Christ and His glories: without the appreciation and apprehension of these the worthy walk is not possible.

The basis of all our belief, experience and service comes next (i. 14):

> "In Whom we have redemption through His blood, even the forgiveness of sins."

It is true all the critical Greek texts omit 'through His blood', but in the light of the parallel verse in Eph. i. 7 there can be no doubt that the thought was very much in Paul's mind, as later he refers to 'peace through the blood of His cross'. Notice the extent of that forgiveness (chapter ii. 13), 'having forgiven you all trespasses'.

Now follows a description of the One through Whom we have this inheritance, through Whom we are rescued from the authority of darkness and in Whom we have this great redemption. He is the 'image of the invisible God'. In defining the word for 'image' (eikon) Dr. Bullinger's Critical Lexicon states: "denotes not merely the image but also the pattern . . . . .". In Christ is the pattern of the invisible God, a thought which is expanded in verse 19, "for in Him all the fullness of God was pleased to dwell" (R.S.V.), or again (ii. 9) 'for in Him the whole fullness of deity dwells bodily' (R.S.V.). It may be beyond our ability to comprehend the wonder and immensity of this fact, yet it remains true that in some sense God was wholly present in Christ. He is also 'the Firstborn of all creation', and this "because by Him were all things created', and the remainder of verse 16 clearly places the emphasis on all things, as John puts it in his gospel (John i. 3):

> "All things were made by Him; and without Him was not anything made that was made. In Him was life."

So He is the Creator Himself, the very Source of all life, a point further emphasized by the following verse (Col. i. 17):

> "He is before all things, and in Him all things hold together" (R.S.V.).

All such descriptions as 'chief corner stone', 'foundation' and 'head' come together in this thought. Without Christ, even if a creation were possible, it would be self-destroyed; it could not 'hold together'. The whole universe, the whole created order, depends upon Him both for existence and maintenance. No other being is of more importance than the Lord Jesus Christ. The context of these three verses makes it plain that 'Firstborn' does not mean the first created being, as some erroneously claim: in which case the first created being has become of greater importance than the Creator.

He also 'is the Head of the body, the church: Who is the beginning, the Firstborn from the dead', and this is so that in this sphere (the church which is His body), 'in all things He might have the pre-eminence': and perhaps this is the most complete and satisfying definition of the worthy walk. Through Him also is reconciliation and peace, 'through the blood of His cross'. We can no doubt include ourselves within the scope of verses 21 and 22:

> "And you, that were sometime alienated and enemies in your mind by wicked works, yet now hath He reconciled in the body of His flesh through death, to present you holy and unblameable and unreproveable in His sight."

These thoughts lead on to the affirmation that the believer is united with Christ (Colossians ii. 10-13), and this in turn to the exhortation of chapter iii. 1-5. Here is the underlying secret of the worthy walk, and of the knowledge of the will of God:

> "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. Set your affection (or mind) on things above, not on things on the earth."

Not until these 'doctrinal' matters have been dealt with, as being a part of the worthy walk, does Paul then outline the 'practical' instructions. These are very largely a restatement of the similar instructions given in the epistle to the Ephesians. For this high calling, for this glorious Lord and Head, the worthy walk in its 'practical' aspects is to live an ordinary life on earth but 'as unto the Lord, and not unto men', with the mind 'set' on things above, on Christ Himself at the right hand of all authority and power and glory. May we not thus say: This is the will of God concerning you?

No.11. Summary.
pp. 71 - 73

As we conclude this series of articles on the Will of God, we would re-affirm what we said at the commencement. This subject is by no means easy. We have sought to deal with it comprehensively, though not exhaustively. We trust we have been able to cover the important points which we now purpose to summarize, but in so doing we would emphasize that it is not possible to lay down certain principles which if applied will reveal God's will in any given circumstance. The only sure advice which can be given is to have a right relationship with the Lord Jesus Christ Himself; this we believe will be made clear, if the previous articles have failed to do so, in the summary which follows.

In the first of this series we thought of Rom. xii. 1, 2, where the key-thought is to 'yield yourselves a living sacrifice', by no means a popular thought nowadays. The unpopularity arises out of forgetfulness and neglect; forgetfulness of the 'mercies of God' to which Paul draws attention in this very Scripture as the ground of his appeal, and neglect of the 'glory' which always accompanies thoughts of sacrifice and suffering in Scripture. It is at least hinted at in Rom. xii. 1, 2 'be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind', where the word 'transformed' is the same one translated 'transfigured' in the accounts of the Transfiguration of the Lord. The Lord, when speaking to the disciples of His death, always went on to speak of His resurrection, e.g., Matt. xvi. 21,

> "From that time forth began Jesus to shew unto His disciples, how that He must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and be raised again the third day."

The same thought of suffering and sacrifice occurs in the first letter to the Corinthians,

> "Know ye not that they which run in a race all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain. And every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible. I therefore so run, not as uncertainty; so fight I, not as one that beateth the air: but I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection: lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway" (I Cor. ix. 24-27).

If 'they' are prepared to make sacrifices for a mere laurel wreath which will soon fade and fall, how much more incentive have we for a 'crown' which will last eternally?

Closely associated with the thought of 'yielding' sacrificially is that of 'sanctification', of separation to God so that the whole life is lived 'unto the Lord' (Colossians iii. 23), a combined thought which has recurred frequently in our studies of this subject.

The believer is one who has 'received the adoption', the placing as a son. God receives him as 'My beloved Son in Whom I am well pleased'. He is accounted by God as spiritually mature and should therefore live maturely, live a Christ-like life. But how can we live like Christ unless we know Him? Clearly the better we know Him the more like Him shall we live. Hence the importance of 'getting to know Him', the value of such knowledge being so great to Paul that he counted no sacrifice too great to increase it (Phil. iii. 7-11, and note the association of 'resurrection' with the 'fellowship of His sufferings'). Dare any of us compare favourably our knowledge of Christ with that of Paul? Paul had found that the more knowledge of Christ he had, the greater was his desire to know Him even better—a desire which for Paul, or any of us, can only be fulfilled when "we see Him as He is".

As we put into practice what we know of the Will of God for us seeking to be well pleasing to the Lord, we come to know Him better, and are the better equipped to know more of His Will for us. Particularly in the more personal aspects of this matter, in those circumstances which are uniquely our own, His Will becomes the plainer the better we know Him. In the wider spheres of everyday life, as we have seen from both the epistle to the Ephesians and that to the Colossians, it is simply a matter of living an ordinary, everyday life, but with a motive very different from that of the 'man in the street', with the object of being 'well pleasing unto the Lord'.

To know the Will of God for me, in my own particular circumstances, is not at all easy. Most of us will have seen at some time or another a 'Darby and Joan'; an old couple who have live closely together for many years, they have probably known a 'fellowship of suffering' in the course of their life together, they have shared their joys and their sorrows, and now they not only think alike, but (often) even look alike. Such a couple present a parable for all who seriously would know the Will of God; live closely with the Lord and as your knowledge of Him increases you will increasingly think 'like' Him, and in deeds be 'like' Him.

The prayer, above all others, for those who earnestly desire to know the Will of God is, ‘that I may know Him’.

Dear Fellow-members,

At the time of completing another two years witness with The Berean Expositor, we have reprinted Mr. Welch's Parable, Miracle and Sign of Matthew and John considered dispensationally. A very significant conclusion drawn to our notice by its author is that the leaven put into three measures or meal (Luke xiii. 20, 21) represents the evil and error being ascribed to God's truth (p.72). The failure of Christendom to accept the Bible as God's inspired Word is an echo of Satan's first lie "Hath God said?" (Gen. iii. 1). Having this in mind, how vital is the stand made by such a publication as this which has always taught the plenary inspiration of the Scriptures.

We pray that Volume 50 (L) of The Berean Expositor may attract many new friends and readers who will support us by prayer and finance to counter the seducers of truth in our day.

The Acknowledgment of the Son of God.

pp. 61 - 67

From time to time we have to consider the overwhelming subject of the Godhead, and two aspects of it relating to the Lord Jesus Christ are constantly coming to the fore, namely His Deity and His Sonship. We state straight away that, concerning God unconditioned and limitless, we know nothing. We are shut up completely to what He has been pleased to reveal of Himself in the holy Scriptures. Then again we must remember our very limited powers of comprehension and that, however advanced we are spiritually, we can now only see partially as in a mirror (I Cor. xiii. 12) which often creates for us a puzzling problem. This being so, we approach the subject in real humility and dependence upon the power of the Holy Spirit, Whose main object is to reveal and exalt the Lord Jesus (John xvi. 7, 14).

That the Scriptures reveal the one God in a threefold capacity as Father, Son and Holy Spirit is true for all who have eyes to see and minds that are unbiased. In his Institutes of Theology, the theologian Dr. Chalmers states that this, when viewed as separate propositions is abundantly plain, but it is when we seek to bring them together and attempt their reconciliation that the problems start.

This is certainly true concerning the Deity and Sonship of Christ and the subject has been made increasingly difficult by some of the creeds. If ever there was a need to be accurate and to keep within the bounds of the Word of God it is in respect of the Deity and Sonship of Christ. Once we exceed or detract from what God has written concerning Himself we get into an uncharted ocean and are completely lost. We have dealt with the Deity of Christ in the booklet The Lord Jesus Christ, God or only man?. We now wish to consider His Sonship.

There are those who believe in 'the eternal Sonship of Christ', but when one seeks plain Scriptural basis for such doctrine, we find it is conspicuously lacking. We are treated to theological statements such as 'the eternal generations of the Son' (attributed to the early Fathers), but these words are meaningless and no one who uses them ever attempts to explain them. We never find such expressions as 'the eternal Son' or 'the eternal Father' in the Bible, and we should expect them there if they were true. Sonship in relation to human beings is invariably connected with the thought of being begotten and this thought is definitely connected with the Son of God when He became incarnate. He was begotten by the Father through the overshadowing of the Holy Spirit. The angel who appeared to the virgin Mary said to her:

> "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God" (Luke i. 35, and see verse 32).

Note that the Son of God was not His name before His birth, but the future child that was to be born. Through this miraculous birth, He would be called the Son of God. On this point we should carefully note the quotation from II Sam. vii. 14 given in Heb. i. 5:

". . . . . And again, I will be to Him a Father, and He shall be to Me a Son."

This was prophetically looking forward to His future manifestation in the flesh. It was at that future that this context stresses the Father-Son relationship, not in past eternity. The dogmatism of the creeds on this point is amazing, considering there is no clear statement in Scripture that teaches this relationship obtained before the birth of the Lord Jesus. The title "Only begotten" as applied to the Lord Jesus is not only a term of strong endearment, but one expressing unique relationship, of which Isaac's relationship to Abraham was a type. Isaac was Abraham's "only begotten son" (Heb. xi. 17), and although he had other children, no other son was begotten in the same wonderful way as the child of promise and of resurrection power. Isaac was truly born 'according to the Spirit' (Gal. iv. 29). Similarly the word 'begotten' is definitely used of the Son of God as born in time and in no other sense is the word 'only-begotten' ever used of Him.

Another reference back to Heb. i. should make this clear in its quotations from the Psalms:

> "For unto which of the angels said He at any time, Thou art My Son, THIS DAY have I begotten Thee?" (Heb. i. 5).

The divine begettal of the Son took place at a specific moment in time—THIS DAY and it therefore cannot refer to past eternity. If we ask when THIS DAY occurred, the next quotation from the Psalms tells us:

> "And again, when He bringeth in the First begotten into the world, He saith, And let all the angels of God worship Him" (Heb. i. 6).

The bringing in of the First begotten into the world relates to His birth. Furthermore, although the Father-Son relationship commenced here, His Deity is still affirmed, for the angels are bidden to worship Him and worship in the Scriptures is the sole prerogative of God. The worship of any created being, however exalted, is not tolerated. It is noteworthy that Paul in Acts xiii. 33 links the quotation from Psa. ii. 7 ("this day have I begotten Thee") with the resurrection of Christ. So we see that this divine begettal is linked with the beginning of His human life and reaffirmed at the beginning of His new life in exaltation when He was raised from the dead by the Father.

Theologians, feeling that the word 'begotten' implied the posteriority of the Father Who begat the Son, and not seeing that this referred to Him Who was born of a virgin in time, tried to escape the difficulty by asserting that in some way the Deity of the Son was derived or communicated from the Father in past eternity. This leads to serious error, denying His external existence in the past as God and according Him the position of a lesser Deity than the Father, thus in turn denying the emphatic monotheism of the Word of God from Genesis to Revelation.

The Bible reveals little of the Lord Jesus Christ before Bethlehem. What an opportunity John had when he commenced writing his Gospel to support the view we have just given if it was truth. John did not write:

> "In the beginning was the Son, and the Son was with God, and the Son was God" (John i. 1).

John was careful to avoid this, giving Christ the title of the Word before His birth. The title of the Son is found in a variety of associations:

(1) The Son (Matt. xxviii. 19).
(2) The Son of God (Matt. iv. 3).
(3) The Son of David (Matt. ix. 27).
(4) The Son of Man (Matt. viii. 20).
(5) The Son of the Highest (Luke i. 32).
(6) My Beloved Son (Matt. iii. 17).
(7) His only begotten Son (John iii. 16).
(8) The Son of His love (literally Col. i. 13).

Every reference in the N.T. to Christ as the Son of Man goes back to Psa. viii. and the great prophetic use of the title there showing us He was truly Man. By comparison with I Cor. xv. 23-28, Heb. ii. 5-9 and Eph. i. 22, 23, we see the Lord as the second Man and the last Adam with all things finally under His feet as enemies, or under His Headship of the universe as redeemed. The Son of God emphasizes His divine origin, teaching us that He had no human father, thus being free from the taint of sin and making it possible for Him to become the Saviour of sinners. The two titles, the Son of Man and the Son of God are complementary. Neither can he held apart from the other.

It is the fusion of His human nature with His Deity that becomes the great problem for our limited understanding:

> ". . . . . no man knoweth the Son (that is completely), but the Father . . . . ." (Matt. xi. 27), and truly Christ is the secret (mystery) of God (Col. ii. 2 R.V.). The Bible makes no attempt to explain this great secret, but it is there in the Word of truth for our faith and acceptance even if we cannot fully comprehend it. Sometimes the Scriptures stress His Deity and sometimes His humanity as the Sent One, the perfect Servant. The danger comes when anyone stresses one at the expense of the other or ignores one and concentrates solely on the other. This is bound to lead to a defective view of God and is dangerous indeed for the believer.

There are at least two reasons why the Lord Jesus became man. One is that God "Who only hath immortality" cannot die, yet death was the penalty He had prescribed for sin (Gen. ii. 17), and if ever man was to be saved and death abolished, this penalty must be paid. So, in His infinite love, He took upon Himself a sinless human body so that it could be said with truth that the Lord "laid on Him the iniquity of us all" (Isa. liii. 6) and that 'through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil' (Heb. ii. 14).

Another reason is that sin and death make a yawning chasm between man and God that no created being can ever bridge. It needed someone who was both God and man, to be able to reach right up to heaven and right down to earth, in other words the perfect mediator or Go-between:

> "For there is one God, one Mediator also between God and men, Himself man, Christ Jesus, Who gave Himself a ransom for all . . . . ." (I Tim. ii. 5, 6, R.V.).

Until the redemptive purpose of the ages is realized and at last a perfect creation embodying heaven and earth comes into existence, the mediatorial work of the Son of God is necessary.

When all that separated God and man is removed and abolished then we read:

> ". . . . . Behold, the tabernacle (dwelling place) of God is with men, and He will dwell with them, and they shall be His people, and God Himself shall be with them, and be their God" (Rev. xxi. 3).

At last there is no more need of Temple ritual, priests or mediators, for all barriers between men and God have vanished at this point of time and God's great redemptive purpose is finally achieved.

When we consider the earthly life and service of Christ in the Scriptures, we link it therefore with His Sonship and His voluntary humiliation in laying aside His will for the will of the Father (John v. 30; vi. 38), so that this will might be permanent in word (John xiv. 24) and work (John xiv. 20; xvii. 4).

The Lord, as it were, suppressed His own Deity. He 'emptied Himself' ("made Himself of no reputation" Phil. ii. 7) of everything pertaining to His own will, His own words and His own deeds, and became the "Sent One", the perfect Servant of the Father. It was from this standpoint and from this only that He said:

> "My Father is greater than I" (John xiv. 28).

It was only from the standpoint of relative position during His earthly life when He became the Son and the Servant, that this was true. In human affairs a lieutenant is in an inferior position to his captain, though he may be personally and in ability much his superior. We must not confuse status with role and operation. Oscar Cullman was right when he expressed a similar thought: "to speak of the Son has meaning only in reference to God's revelatory action, not in reference to God's Being". The essence of God was not touched when He Who was the Word and was God (John i. 1) became flesh and took upon Himself a human body. That human Body was never a substitution for His Deity, but an addition to it. It was "God Who was manifest in the flesh" (I Tim. iii. 16) not just an exalted human being raised up by God.

When we realize that His Sonship commenced at Bethlehem, we can understand why the four Gospels have more reference to this Sonship than the rest of the N.T. Coming to the Prison Epistles we are struck by the fact that there are two references only to Christ as the Son:

"Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge (acknowledgment) of the Son of God . . . . ." (Eph. iv. 13).

"(The Father) Who delivered us out of the power of darkness, and translated us into the kingdom of the Son of His love" (Col. i. 12, R.V.).

When He is the ascended and exalted Son in glory, it is His Headship over all things to the church which is His Body, that is now stressed. There are seven references to this supreme Headship in the prison ministry of Paul (Eph. i. 22; iv. 15; v. 23; Col. i. 18; ii. 10, 19. Also Eph. i. 10 where "gather together in one" is literally "head up again" all things "in heaven and earth").

The object of all this is 'that in all things He might have the first place (pre-eminence)' (Col. i. 18) which will be demonstrated in a future day of triumph manifestly when every being in existence bows the knee to Him and gives Him His rightful place as LORD (Phil. ii. 9-11).

His mediatorial position lasts as long as it is needed, that is as long as sin and imperfection remain in the creation. We come to the furthest point in I Cor. xv. 24-28 when at last a new heaven and earth come into being (Rev. xxi. 3-5), when sin and death are eradicated for ever, and the whole universe is now standing in the power of God Himself and not in the strength or ability of any created being. Then, and not till then, will the Son hand over the kingdom to the Father that GOD (not the Father, Son, or Holy Spirit) may be all in all. Here we have traversed a huge circle:

"In the beginning GOD created the heaven and the earth" (Gen. i. 1).
At the end "GOD all in all" (I Cor. xv. 28).

In between is the long span of time covered by the ages during which God is working out His great redemptive plan to bring all things back to perfection. In order to do this, He has found it necessary to manifest Himself in a threefold way, as Father, Son and Holy Spirit.

The Word of God reveals nothing of eternity past or eternity in the future when the ages are completed. We are therefore not in a position to say that the Trinity existed in past eternity and will do so in the future for evermore. If we keep to what is revealed we shall link the Trinity with the redemptive purpose of God and go no further. This does not touch the eternal Being of God nor alter the glorious fact that the Lord Jesus Christ, the Word of God, has wonderfully made Him known to us, "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father" (John xiv. 9).

Archaic and Obsolete Words of the Authorized Version.

No.9. p. 60

HOUGH. This belongs to the series of English words with different pronunciations as cough, though, plough, rough, tough, etc. The word is only used as a verb in the A.V. and is pronounced 'hock'. It means to cut the tendons at the back of the foot of a horse or other animal, in other words "to sever the hamstring" (Josh. xi. 6, 9; II Sam. viii. 4; I Chron. xviii. 4).

HUSBANDMAN. This meant a tiller of the soil and is used of Noah (Gen. ix. 20) and others. Sometimes it is equivalent to 'farmer' as in II Tim. ii. 6. Where the cultivation of vines is concerned, the word means a 'vine-dresser'.

INDITE. This word originally meant to dictate a form of words to be repeated or written down and then it came to mean any expression of one's thought in writing. In Psa. xlv. 1 we have 'my heart is inditing a good matter'. The Hebrew verb however, is more vivid meaning to bubble up or boil over. So the R.S.V. renders it "my heart overflows with a goodly theme; I address my verses to the king; my tongue is like the pen of a ready scribe".

INFIDEL occurs twice in the A.V., 'what part hath he that believeth with an infidel' (II Cor. vi. 15) and "if any provide not for his own . . . . . he is worse than an infidel" (I Tim. v. 8). The word comes from Tyndale, who meant 'one who is without faith' rather than a person who denies or deliberately rejects it, in other words an unbeliever or unsaved person. II Cor. vi. 15 clearly teaches that the marriage of a believer with an unbeliever is disobedience in God's sight, whether the unbeliever opposes the truth or not, and young believers should constantly remember this if they want to avoid a life of misery and spiritual unfruitfulness.

No.10. p. 80

INJURIOUS. This is an A.V. translation of the Greek hubristes and 'injurious' is not strong enough in modern English. The equivalent today would be insolent or insulting, the conduct of a bully (I Tim. i. 13). This is the Apostle Paul's description of himself before the grace of God saved him.

INQUISITION. The word is often linked in the mind with persecution and torture because of the Inquisition of the 13th century in Spain set up by Pope Innocent III for the suppression of heresy and punishment of so-called heretics. But its normal meaning is 'inquiry', specially of judicial investigation. "The judges shall make diligent inquisition" (Deut. xix. 18), that is, they shall inquire diligently. In Esther ii. 23, "when inquisition was made of the matter" means, "when the affair was investigated".

No.11. pp. 119, 120

INSTANT, INSTANTLY. In the A.V. these words do not refer to time but to the manner of an action. The Jewish elders besought the Lord to heal the servant of the centurion. "They besought Him instantly", means "they besought Him earnestly". Paul, in Acts xxvi. 6, 7 declares that the twelve tribes "instantly serve God day and night". In modern English "they earnestly serve (or worship) day and night".

INTELLIGENCE. In Dan. xi. 30 we read the 'vile person' will 'have intelligence with them that forsake the holy covenant'. This means 'have an understanding with' or 'give heed to'. In Dan. xi. 37 the Hebrew word is translated 'regard'.

INWARD. In Job xix. 19 we have 'all my inward friends abhorred me'. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the word 'inward' meant intimate, belonging to the inner circle of one's friends. Job is lamenting that even his closest friends had deserted him.

KNOP is an old word for the bud of a flower or an ornamental knob. It is used in the description of the golden lampstand in Exod. xxv. 31-36; xxxvii. 17-22, which Bezaleel made under the direction of Moses.

LATCHET does not mean a small latch, but a shoelace or thong to fasten a shoe or sandal. In Gen. xiv. 23 Abraham tells the king of Sodom, “I will not take from a thread even to a shoe latchet” (from him), and John the Baptist, referring to the Lord declares: “there cometh One mightier than I after me, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to stoop down and unloose”.

LEASING. This is an archaic word for lying or falsehood. In Psa. iv. 2 we have in the A.V. “how long will ye love vanity, and seek after leasing”, and in Psa. v. 6 we read, “Thou shalt destroy them that speak leasing”. In I Tim. i. 10 Wyclif’s version reads “lesyngmongers” for liars. Both words are quite obsolete today.

LET. There are two English verbs spelled LET, but which come from two distinct Anglo-Saxon roots and they have opposite meanings. One means to hinder or prevent and the other, permit or allow. Both were used in 1611 and occur in the A.V. Only the second is in use today except in the legal phrase ‘without let or hindrance’. In our old English Bible the first meaning occurs three times: Isa. xliii. 13, “There is none that can deliver out of My hand: I will work, and who shall let it?” This means “who can hinder it?” Paul speaks of his intention to visit the believers at Rome: “often times I purposed to come to you, (but was let hitherto)”, that is, he had been prevented from coming.

In II Thess. ii. 6, 7 we have an important occurrence: “He Who now letteth will let, until he be taken out of the way”. The difficulty of these verses is increased by this obsolete English word. The Greek word means to hold fast or restrain. The N.I.V. renders the passage “And now you know what is holding him back, so that he may be revealed at the proper time. For the secret power of lawlessness is already at work; but the One Who now holds it back will continue to do so till he is taken out of the way”.

No.12. pp. 139, 140

LIBERTINES. This occurs only once in the A.V.: “then there arose certain of the synagogue, which is called the synagogue of the Libertines . . . . . disputing with Stephen” (Acts vi. 9). These were not dissolute or licentious men, but respectable freedmen, probably descending from the Jews who had been taken as prisoners to Rome by Pompey in B.C.63 and there sold as slaves. In modern English we should render the phrase as ‘the synagogue of the Freedmen’.

LIGHT. In the A.V. this is easily understood as a verb or adjective when applied to things, but twice the translators use it of persons in the obsolete sense of shallow character. Abimelech, we are told, ‘hired vain and light persons, which followed him’ (Judges ix. 4). But the word ‘light’, in its obsolete sense, is not strong enough. The R.S.V. translates ‘worthless and reckless fellows’ which is nearer the sense of the Hebrew.

In Numb. xxi. 5 we have the record of the people of Israel complaining they had no bread or water and saying ‘our soul loatheth this light bread’, referring to the manna. Here again the A.V. is not strong enough. In their backsliding the Israelites actually said ‘we loathe this worthless food’ (R.S.V.). What a shocking state of mind to get into, describing the delicious food which the Lord provided for them freshly every day! This but anticipated the Israel of later centuries to whom He Who was the true manna, the Bread of Life, came and was rejected. As Isaiah foretold “He was despised and rejected of men” (Isa. liii. 3).

LIGHTNESS. This word is now obsolete in the sense the A.V. uses it. God condemns the false prophets ‘who cause My people to err by their lies, and by their lightness’ (Jer. xxiii. 32). “Recklessness” would be far better.

When Paul says in II Cor. i. 17 “when I therefore was thus minded, did I use lightness?’, he means ‘was I vacillating when I wanted to do this?’.

LIST. This occurs four times in the A.V. meaning to desire or wish. “Whatsoever they listed” (Matt. xvii. 12) means “whatever they pleased”. “The wind bloweth where it listeth” (John iii. 8) can be rendered “where it pleases”. In James iii. 4 “Whithersoever the governor listeth” means “Wherever the will of the pilot directs”.

LIVELY. This word does not mean spritely or active in the A.V. but living. Moses received ‘the lively (living) oracles’ from God (Acts vii. 38). I Pet. i. 3 speaks of a ‘lively (living) hope’ and in ii. 5 we have ‘lively (living) stones’.

LUCRE. This word means ‘gain’, but in the Scriptures it is only used in the sense of dishonest gain. There is one occurrence of it in the O.T. in I Sam. viii. 3 where we are told that the sons of Samuel, as judges, “walked not in his ways, but turned aside after lucre, and took bribes and perverted judgment”. The expression ‘filthy lucre’ is found in I Pet. v. 2 where it means dishonest gain. There is no basis in the Scriptures for the habit of referring to money as ‘filthy lucre’.

LUNATICK. Some of those brought to the Lord Jesus for healing are termed in the A.V. ‘lunatick’ (Matt. iv. 24; xvii.. 15). The Greek word means ‘moon-struck’, the Latin equivalent being lunaticus, from which the English word is taken. Mental disorders were thought to be influenced by the moon, but it is probable that epilepsy is referred to in Matthew’s Gospel rather than people suffering from insanity.

LUST. This word was used at the time of the A.V. for any desire for something good, but it later became limited to the bad sense that it has today. The Greek verb epithume means to long eagerly, to desire strongly and is used in a good sense as well as a bad one. This is seen in Luke xxii. 15 where the Lord says "with desire I have desired to eat this Passover with you before I suffer". We should take great care with our strong desires and inclinations to see that they are totally in line with the Lord's will.

No.13. pp. 177 - 180

MANSIONS. This word in the seventeenth century had no reference to a manor house or a large building: It simply meant a place of abode and would have described the smallest dwelling place. We must keep this meaning in John xiv. 2, "In My Father's house are many mansions". The Father's house evidently describes the whole of the final new creation embodying heaven and earth and in this vast and wonderful dominion there are many 'abodes', some earthly and some heavenly into which God wills that His redeemed children shall enter in resurrection and enjoy for ever.

MAUL. This word occurs once in Prov. xxv. 18, "A man that beareth false witness against his neighbour is a maul, and a sword and a sharp arrow". "Maul" means the same as "mace", a heavy club made of metal and was used as a weapon of war.

MEAT is used in the A.V. for food in general and not restricted to flesh foods. In Ezekiel xlvii. 12 "tress for meat" means "trees for food". "Purging all meats" in Mark vii. 19 means "thus He declared all foods clean" (that is, from a ceremonial standpoint). The Lord said to the disciples "I have meat to eat that ye know not of" (John iv. 32) which refers to nourishment generally and not the flesh of animals (see also verse 8). In the O.T. we have the 'meat offering' mentioned over 100 times, but it contained no flesh and was a meal or cereal offering. We still sometimes use the phrase 'grace before meat' and this of course means saying grace before any meal.

MESS. This is an old word for a portion of food. We are told that Joseph sent to his brethren "messes unto them from before him: but Benjamin's mess was five times so much as any of theirs" (Gen. xliii. 34). We would point out that the often used phrase 'a mess of pottage' in connection with Esau's sale of his birthright is not Scriptural. It does not occur in the Bible.

METEYARD. This word occurs once in Lev. xix. 35, "Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, in meteyard, in weight or in measure". "Meteyard" is an ancient word for a rod to measure length. It is now obsolete.

MOTION. In Rom. vii. 5 this word is found in the plural and it is its only occurrence. "For when we were in the flesh, the motions of sins, which were by the law, did work in our members to bring forth fruit unto death." Here it is used in the obsolete sense of inward passions or impulses and means 'sinful passions' in this verse.

MUNITION. In the A.V. the word is used in the obsolete sense of a fortification or fortress. Isa. xxxiii. 16 reads "his place of defence shall be the munitions of rocks" which in modern English would be 'fortress of rocks'. The same can be said of xxix. 7 "even all that fight against her and her munition" which refers to Ariel's stronghold.

NAUGHTINESS, NAUGHTY. This word is used in our English Bible of something worse than trivial misbehaviour. It means downright wickedness. The command in James i. 21 to 'lay apart all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness' should be rendered 'all filthiness and rank growth of wickedness'. In his vision recorded in xxiv. 2, Jeremiah refers to 'naughty figs', but this means that they were so bad that they could not be eaten.

NEESING. This is an old word for sneezing and is found once in Job (xli. 18), "by his neesings a light doth shine". The Hebrew word is atishah, matching the sound exactly.

NEPHEW. One should bear in mind that, according to the Oxford English Dictionary, 'nephew' meaning 'grandson' was common in the 17th century. "If a widow have children or nephews" (I Tim. v. 4) means children or grandchildren.

OCCUPY. Luke xix. 13 gives the best known context where this word occurs. "He called his ten servants, and delivered them ten pounds and said unto them, occupy till I come." Here it is used in the obsolete sense of 'use' or 'trade with'. The Greek verb means 'to do business', but the translators followed Coverdale here and rendered it 'occupy'. In the Book of Common Prayer Psa. cvii. 23 reads "they that go down to the sea in ships, and occupy their business in great waters". In Exod. xxxviii. 24 we read "all the gold that was occupied for the work", meaning "that was used for the work".

OFFEND. In addition to its usual meanings the word is used as a translation of skandalizo—to place something in another's way causing him to stumble or fall, or sin. "If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out . . . . ." has the meaning "If your right eye causes you to stumble or sin". Paul's statement, "if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend" in modern English would read, “if food is a cause of my brother’s falling, I will never eat meat, lest I cause my brother to fall”. Again, in II Cor. xi. 29, “who is offended, I burn not?” should be rendered, “Who is made to fall and I am not indignant?”.

OUCHES. Here is a word that was already becoming obsolete in 1611. Tyndale had used it in his translation of Exodus with a note of explanation, “ouches, ornaments fit to display jewels or precious stones”. It was the gold filigree work that surrounded the jewel and this is its meaning in Exod. xxviii. 11, 13, 14, 25; xxxix. 6, 13, 16, 18.

OUTLANDISH. This is used concerning Solomon in Neh. xiii. 26 where it means alien or foreigner, “nevertheless even him did outlandish women cause to sin”. These were foreign women who brought their false religion with them.

PASSENGER. The word is used in the old sense of a passer-by, a traveler and not one who is carried in a vehicle or ship. Prov. ix. 15 should be rendered ‘calling to those who pass by’ rather than ‘to call passengers’ and the former reading should obtain in Ezekiel, chapter xxxix.

No.14. pp. 199, 200

PECULIAR. It is a difficulty with some that the word of God should refer to believers being ‘peculiar people’ (Titus ii. 14; I Pet. ii. 9). Today the word has the meaning of odd or eccentric, but this was a later development after 1611. At that time it meant “one’s very own” and was used of private property distinguished from what is owned in common. Israel were a “special people” belonging to the Lord, or treasure that He valued. The Hebrew segullah is rendered ‘peculiar treasure’ in Exod. xix. 5; Psa. cxxxv. 4; Eccles. ii. 8. The Body of Christ are ‘a people of His own’ (Titus ii. 14) which may consist of oddities by nature, but by redeeming grace become ‘holy, unblameable and unreproveable in His sight’ (Col. i. 22).

PEELED. This translates a Hebrew verb which means to make smooth or bare, to scour or polish. In Ezek. xxix. 18 we read ‘every shoulder was peeled’ which means ‘every shoulder was rubbed bare’. In Isa. xviii. 2 Ethiopia is referred to as ‘a nation scattered and peeled’. The R.V. renders the phrase ‘tall and smooth’ which means ‘sleek’ in appearance.

TO PILL. Pill, as a verb, means to peel or strip off the skin or rind of anything. "And Jacob took him rods of green poplar, and of the hazel and chestnut tree and pilled white strakes in them" (Gen. xxx. 37, 38) means 'peeled white streaks in them'.

POLL. The basic meaning of this words is the human head. "To take a poll" is to count heads. "Every male by their polls" means "every male head by head".

As a verb it means to cut the hair. Hence Absalom "polled his head" (II Sam. xiv. 26) or cut it once a year.

POMMEL. This refers to the bowl-like ornament at the top of a pillar (see I Kings vii. 41, 42).

PORTER. In the Bible a porter is not used in the sense of a luggage porter, but means a gate-keeper or door-keeper. In I Chron. xvi. 42 we are told that 'the sons of Jeduthun were porters', but the margin reads 'for the gate'.

POST. The word is used eight times in the sense of running or a runner. II Chron. xxx. 6, 10 reads: "So the posts went with the letters of the king and his princes". "So the posts passed from city to city . . . . .". These were royal messengers which were used in the king's service.

PRESENTLY is used in the A.V. meaning immediately, at once, not later on. The withering of the fig tree after the Lord's pronouncement was immediately not presently in the modern sense (Matt. xxi. 19). In Matt. xxvi. 53 the Lord asserts that the Father could presently (A.V.) give Him more than twelve legions of angels, but of course He meant immediately on asking. This would have avoided Calvary and all that God had planned for redemption, so this request was never made, for which we can praise the Lord.

PREVENT. This word is used 17 times in the Scriptures and always in the obsolete sense of go before, anticipate or precede. "Prevent" comes from the Latin prae before and venire to come. In Psa. cxix. 147 the writer says "I prevented the dawning of the morning" which is mystifying to the modern English reader for, in no way whatsoever could he have stopped day and night. What he meant was that he anticipated the dawning of the morning, by rising before dawn for meditation in the Word of God. In verse 148 the psalmist says "Mine eyes prevent the night watches", that is, "My eyes are awake before the watches of the night".

The well known reference in I Thess. iv. 15, "we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them which are asleep", means shall not precede or get before them which are asleep.

No.15. pp. 219, 220

PROPER GOOD. When David announced to Israel the plans for building the Temple and the store of materials he had provided, he made a personal gift of 3000 talents of gold, 7000 talents of silver which he described as "mine own proper good" (I Chron. xxix. 3, 4). "Proper" meant "owned as property", an archaic use of the word and "good" is archaic for "goods", and so the meaning is "I have a treasure of my own of gold and silver", out of which he gave generously to the Lord, realizing that all of it came originally as the Lord's gift and was really His, not David's. He said "for all things come of Thee, and of Thine own have we given Thee" (xxix. 14). Would that all believers would remember this. "The silver is Mine, and the gold is Mine, saith the Lord of Hosts" (Hag. ii. 8). We talk about money being ours, but who gave us the health and ability to earn it or superintended the means that provided it?

PUBLICAN. This word in the Scriptures has no reference to modern usage. It denoted one who had the right to collect taxes in a particular district. Often this was exercised in greed and unfairness and therefore publicans were hated and despised by the Jews, especially as they had to maintain continual contact with Gentiles which forced them to be regarded as ceremonially unclean.

Zacchaeus is described as "a chief among the publicans and rich" (Luke xix. 2). He was probably the head of the tax organization for the Jericho district.

QUICK, QUICKEN. The adverb 'quickly' is used in all the English translations and causes no problem. But the adjective 'quick' translates different words and always means 'alive' or 'living'. "The quick and the dead" is "the living and the dead" (Acts x. 42; II Tim. iv. 1; I Pet. iv. 5). "The Word of God is quick and powerful" (Hebrews iv. 12) means living and powerful. In the O.T. we are told that Korah and his company went down quick into the mouth of the earth (Numb. xvi. 23-33). This does not refer to the speed of their descent but to the fact that they were buried alive. The verb 'quicken' occurs 11 times in the N.T. and should be rendered 'makes alive'. "It is the Spirit that makes alive" (John vi. 63). In I Cor. xv. 45 "The last Adam became a life-giving Spirit" is clearer than "a quickening Spirit". "Hath quickened us together with Christ" (Eph. ii. 5) means "hath made us alive with Christ".

RECORD. The word occurs 34 times, 27 of which use the obsolete meaning of witness or testimony. "I call heaven and earth to record this day against you" (Deuteronomy xxx. 19) means 'witness against you this day'. "God is my record, how greatly I long after you all in the bowels of Jesus Christ" (Phil. i. 8) means "God is my witness, how I yearn for you all with the affection of Jesus Christ".

"To bear record" is used some 12 times in John's epistles and means 'to bear witness' or 'testify'. "I take you to record" (Acts xx. 26) is obsolete for "I call you to witness", but more accurately it should be "I testify to you".

RISING. This word, as a noun, occurs in Lev. xiii. 2, 10, 19, 28; xiv. 56 in a medical context and refers to a body swelling which is a symptom of disease. Lev.xiii.28 reads "it is a rising of the burning" which is equivalent to "it is a swelling from the burn".

No.16. pp. 239, 240

REINS. This is a name for the kidneys or kidney region—the loins. It comes through the French from the Latin renes. The word often has a figurative meaning and is the equivalent of the word 'heart'. "I the Lord search the heart, I try the reins (kidneys)" (Jer. xvii. 10). The second phrase repeats the sense for emphasis. "My reins also instruct me in the night seasons" means "In the night my heart instructs me" (Psa. xvi. 7).

RUDE. The word goes back to Tyndale and is used in the archaic meaning of inexpert, or unskilled. It does not mean rough or unrefined in the Bible. When Paul said he was "rude in speech" he meant that he was not a professional orator.

SCALL. This is only found in Lev. xiii. 30-37; xiv. 54. It means a scab, an eruption on the skin. The Oxford English Dictionary says that dry scall is psoriasis and humid scall is eczema.

SEETHE, SOD, SODDEN. These words are now obsolete and mean to cook by boiling or stewing. "Sod" is used as the past tense of the verb and "sodden" its past participle. Gen. xxv. 29 says Jacob "sod pottage" meaning that he was boiling pottage. Regarding the passover, it was definitely stated that the lamb must not be boiled but roasted. "Eat not of it raw, nor sodden at all with water, but roast with fire" (Exod.xii.9). "Sodden at all with water" now means "boiled with water" as it also does in II Chron. xxxv. 13.

SEVERAL is sometimes used in the obsolete sense of 'separate'. King Azariah "dwelt in a several house" because he was a leper (II Kings xv. 5; II Chron. xxvi. 21). In other cases it is a tautology and can be omitted. "Every several gate was of one pearl" (Rev. xxi. 21). "Each one of the gates" would be modern English. "To every man according to his several ability" (Matt. xxv. 15), the word "several" can be omitted.

SHAMBLES is often used today to describe a scene of wreckage but originally it referred to a slaughterhouse. In I Cor. x. 25 we have ‘whatsoever is sold in the shambles, that eat, asking no question for conscience sake’. “Meat market’ would be an up-to-date rendering.

SIMPLE. Paul wrote in Rom. xvi. 19 “I would have you wise unto that which is good and simple concerning evil”. He did not mean to be gullible or foolish, but free from duplicity, innocent and so the Greek should now be rendered.

The Epistle of James.

No.1. pp. 121 - 126

This epistle is one of a group of seven generally known as General or Catholic epistles because they were not addressed to any particular church. In our A.V. they come in the order of the Latin Vulgate and many of the Greek manuscripts, and it is interesting to know that they are often found as a whole along with the Acts of the Apostles, for they have a direct bearing on the period covered by the Acts. The authorship of the epistle has been often debated, as James was a common name in the N.T. times and there are three in the N.T.: James, the son of Zebedee, James, the son of Alphaeus (called the Less or Little), and James, the brother of the Lord.

We can rule out James, the son of Zebedee, by reason of the fact that he as put to death by Herod Agrippa I in the year 44 and it is well nigh impossible to date the epistle as early as this. As for James the son of Alphaeus we know little about him and there is no evidence that the epistle was ever assigned to him in the early church. We can have much more confidence in taking the Lord's brother, as the author of the epistle. He heads the list of four men who are described as the Lord's brothers in Matt. xiii. 55 and he became the leader of the mother church of Hebrew Christians at Jerusalem. He is mentioned first in Gal. ii. 9.

It would seem that James became a true believer after the resurrection when the Lord appeared to him (I Cor. xv. 5, 7) and soon became the recognized leader at Jerusalem, and Gal. ii. makes it clear that he was 'a pillar' of the church. After Peter was miraculously released from prison, he bade his friends give a report of all that had happened 'to James and to the brethren' (Acts xii. 17). When Paul made his first visit to Jerusalem after his conversion, to visit Peter, he saw none of the other apostles "save James the Lord's brother" (Gal. i. 19). This must have been a visit of outstanding importance to the Apostle Paul, for he could learn much of the Lord's earthly life and witness from Peter and further than this, intimate details of His home life from James.

Those who 'came down from Judaea' (Acts xv. 1) and taught that circumcision was necessary to salvation, may not have accurately reflected the teaching of James, but it seems evident that at the first he did not encourage Jewish and Gentile believers to eat together, for there was a strong possibility that the Gentiles, lately converted from paganism, would not adhere to the strong O.T. regulations regarding food, and so they would cause offence and division. This explains Gal. ii. 12 where 'certain came from James', that is from Jerusalem church and found Peter eating with Gentiles. The fear of man came in here and we are told Peter withdrew himself from them.

James obviously presided over the conference at Jerusalem recorded in Acts xv. which was called together to consider the terms of admission of Gentile converts to the Jewish church in order that all friction might be avoided. James' words, "my judgment is" (Acts xv. 19) shows the authority he possessed and it was in his name and that of the other apostles that the epistle embodying the council's decisions was sent to the churches in Antioch, Syria and Cilicia and this, incidentally, is the first epistle of the N.T.

There are certain linguistic resemblances between James' speech and the epistle of James which have been noted by Bible scholars and this helps to confirm his authorship, but it must be said that such similarities can be found in other epistles. There is no doubt that James, the Lord's brother, has the strongest claims for the authorship of the epistle we are about to study and there is certainly nothing in the N.T. that directly militates against it.

There have been other theories by scholars, but we do not think it profitable to consider them. Those who desire to do so can consult Dr. Donald Guthrie's New Testament Introduction. Some have mentioned that it was unlikely that a simple Galilean could write such good Greek, but no less an authority as Dr. A. T. Robertson writes, "the incongruity of such a small piece of Greek as the epistle of James being written by a Palestinian Jew like James vanishes when we consider the bilingual character of the people of Palestine" (A Grammar of the Greek New Testament, p.123).

If the authorship of James, the Lord's brother, is accepted, the date of writing could be any time just before (between) 50 to 60A.D. According to Josephus and Eusebius James was martyred in 62 or 68A.D. If written in the early part of this period then (with the exception of the letter from the Jerusalem conference) it was the first of the N.T. epistles. There is no mention of the fall of Jerusalem in 70A.D. and the social conditions described in chapter v. concerning rich land owners did not apply after the destruction of the city. The meeting place of the church is called a 'synagogue' (ii. 2 R.V.) and the stress upon the imminent coming (parousia) of the Lord, a feature of all the epistles written during the Acts period, and the general Israelitish character of the epistle strongly suggests an early date.

The structure of the epistle, largely based on the one given in The Companion Bible is as follows:

A | a | i. 1-4. Patience.
b | i. 5-8. Prayer.
B | c | i. 9, 10-. The law exalted. The rich made low.
d | i. -10, 11-. Life likened to grass.

A | a | v. 7-12. Patience.
b | v. 13-20. Prayer.

To whom was the epistle addressed? This is clearly stated in the first verse as 'the twelve tribes in dispersion', disapora being a technical term for Jews living outside the land of Palestine. The recipients of the epistle were evidently Hebrew believers from the twelve tribes comprising Israel and whose home was outside the land. Peter's epistles and the epistle to the Hebrews are addressed to a similar group of believers from Israel, all of whom were evidently being tested by suffering and loss. These epistles were written to encourage them to 'go on to perfection' (or maturity) no matter how severe their trials were, the goal being a 'crown' or reward given by the Lord for faithfulness and endurance.

The epistle commences with greetings to its readers:

> "James, a servant (a bond-servant) of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ, to the twelve tribes which are of the Dispersion, greeting" (i. 1, R.V.).

Although he was the leader of the Hebrew church at Jerusalem, James does not mention his office, but humbly describes himself as a 'bond servant' in the same way as his brother Jude (verse 1). What is quite clear in the N.T. is the fact that early converts were soon put to the test by trials and sufferings. Satan gave them no respite, hoping to overwhelm and crush their faith at the very beginning. So James makes it clear that this experience was normal for the believer and once the overruling of the Lord could be seen in it, then it was not a thing to be shunned but rather welcomed:

> "Count it all joy, my brethren, when ye fall into manifold temptations: knowing hat the proof of your faith worketh patience. And let patience have its perfect work that ye may be perfect and entire, lacking in nothing" (i. 2-4, R.V.).

Peter writes similarly to Hebrew Christians who were enduring suffering:

> ". . . . . though now for a little while, if need be, ye have been put to grief in manifold temptations, that the proof of your faith, being more precious than gold that perisheth though it is proved by fire, might be found unto praise and glory and honour at the revelation of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 6, 7, R.V.).
>
> "Beloved, think it not strange concerning fiery trial among you, which cometh upon you to prove you, as though a strange thing happened unto you . . ." (I Pet. iv. 12, R.V.).

And also the epistle to the Hebrews:

> "But call to remembering the former days, in which, after ye were enlightened, ye endured a great conflict of sufferings; partly, being made a gazing stock both by reproaches and afflictions . . . . ." (x. 32-33, R.V.).

These believers must understand the reason why these severe tests were permitted by God, otherwise they would be overwhelmed by them. The Lord is concerned not only with the fact that each child of His has true faith, but also that this faith might grow and develop. In His earthly life four times the Lord Jesus had to lament concerning the little faith of the disciples (Matt. vi. 30; viii. 26; xiv. 31; xvi. 8), whereas it was the despised Gentiles who had great faith (matt. viii. 10; xv. 28).

Now faith is like the human body; it cannot develop and grow without exercise, and this is what trial and suffering, when rightly regarded, do for the faith of a believer.

When the sun shines and all goes well, there does not seem to be a need for faith or trust in the Lord. But when the storms come, then it is we learn what sort of faith we possess and how much we are dependent upon our God and Saviour. The more we exercise our faith in the Lord, the more it grows and the Lord is concerned that we should be those of 'great faith', for otherwise how can we serve Him to the fullest extent? Little faith will not take us far along the Christian road with all its tests.

James was concerned that his readers should learn this most valuable lesson:

> "Knowing that the proof of your faith worketh patience (endurance). And let patience (endurance) have its perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, lacking in nothing" (i. 4, R.V.).
>
> "Consider it pure joy, my brothers, whenever you face trials of many kinds, because you know that the testing of your faith develops perseverance. Perseverance must finish its work so that you may be mature and complete, not lacking anything" (i. 4, N.I.V.).

The word teleios (perfect) and its cognates is one of the most important words in the N.T. relating to the believer. The word does not primarily mean sinlessness, but maturity, leaving spiritual babyhood behind and growing up to adulthood. Only as spiritual adults can we fully serve the Lord and meet all the tests of the pilgrim pathway.

One of our great aims should be to "grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ" (II Pet. iii. 18). Let us see to it that we do not suffer from arrested spiritual growth!

No.2. pp. 152 - 157

Having dealt with the testing of faith with a view to its growth, leading to endurance, so that the believer may be 'perfect and entire, lacking in nothing' (i. 2-4), the writer proceeds:

> "But if any of you lacketh wisdom, let him ask of God, Who giveth to all liberally and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him" (i. 5, R.V.).

Worldly cleverness and capability are of little use in the pilgrim pathway. Nothing less than the wisdom of God is needed, giving the believer spiritual insight that will preserve him from walking after the flesh and accepting the false standards of the world around him. One of the great Biblical commentaries on wisdom is found in the early chapters of I Corinthians where man's wisdom is contrasted with the wisdom of God. What men deem to be wise is considered utter foolishness by God (I Cor. iii. 19). The only wisdom that is worthwhile is found in Him Who is Himself the wisdom of God (i.24). It is important to note how wisdom is stressed in the Prison Epistles of Paul, where it occurs no less then 9 times (Eph. i. 8, 17; iii. 10; Col. i. 9, 28; ii. 3, 23; iii. 16; iv. 5). These verses make it abundantly clear that the 'worthy walk' of Eph. iv. is impossible without heavenly wisdom.

But how can we obtain this? James i. 5, 6 is the answer. God Who alone possesses it is ready to give it to all who realize their lack of it and moreover, we are encouraged to read that He 'giveth to all liberally and upbraideth not' ("without finding fault"). The Lord always gives generously without reproaching the petitioner. Calvin remarks here that the words 'upbraideth not' are added 'lest anyone should fear to come to God too often . . . . . He is ready to add new blessings to the former ones without any end or limitation'.

James however, warns that prayer for wisdom must be the prayer of faith, "without doubting" (i. 6). Unbelief can never be tolerated by God, for it makes Him a liar (I.John.v.10). It limits Him and cuts the believer off from blessing, leaving him with disquiet in his mind, causing him to waver to and fro, and preventing him from leaning upon God. James likens such a person to waves of the sea tossed about by the wind, the very opposite of stability. Certain it is that that man will not receive anything of the Lord (i. 7). He is a 'double minded' person and thoroughly unstable or unreliable.

Real prayer involves turning the whole person to the Lord. We cannot face two ways at once when we are praying along the lines of His will.

Another important fact is now brought out by the writer of the epistle:

> "But let the brother of low degree glory in his high estate: and the rich, in that he is made low: because as the flower of the grass he shall pass away" (i. 9, 10).

God is a great leveler. Money speaks loudly in human affairs but in God's estimation it is less than nothing. James has quite a lot to say about money and the lack of it. Here he refers to the poor and the rich, encouraging the poor believer, because in his new relationship to the Lord as His child, he is exalted to true wealth in Jesus Christ. At the same time he warns the rich of the transitory and unsatisfying nature of riches and the need for a totally different evaluation of material things than that obtaining in the world around him.

Human life, with its weakness and short-lived character, is often compared to grass in the Bible. Isaiah compared the frailty of 'all flesh' to the grass that withers and whose flower fades (Isa. xl. 6-8), contrasting it to the unchanging and eternal Word of God. Peter quotes the same words (I Pet. i. 23-25), showing the difference between the abiding life of those newly born again by the seed of the Word and the emptiness of the natural life dominated by sin and death. James draws attention to the almost instantaneous wilting of the grass from the burning heat of the sun and the scorching wind (i. 11).

The Lord Jesus Himself made a comment about this. He said "When ye see the south wind blow, ye say, There will be heat; and it cometh to pass" (Luke xii. 55). The lesson that James draws is that the one who is living just for money and material things will 'fade away' just like the scorched grass and of what use then is his wealth?

The writer now returns to the theme of trial of faith and looks towards its reward by God:

> "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation (trial): for when he hath been approved, he shall received the crown of life, which the Lord promised to them that love Him" (R.V., i. 12).

It has already been shown that such tests are the means God uses to develop faith and Christian character and without them, faith cannot reach maturity. James now points out that only those who are experiencing and enduring such trials are really happy (blessed), paradoxical as this may seem, for then theory is exchanged for real experience and reality of what the Lord can achieve for those who fully trust Him. It is clear that inward trial and not outward temptation is uppermost in James' mind for it has been truly said, inner enticement to evil would have to be resisted not endured. This abiding joy looks forward to the future when the Lord will give 'the crown of life' which He has 'promised to those that love Him' (i. 12). Crowns in Scripture are always the symbol of reward given by the Lord to the faithful, and the writers of the N.T. use the word with varying expressions. Here it does not mean that eternal life is the crown, but this crown is associated with endless life, showing the approval of the divine Giver.

In order to avoid any misunderstanding regarding temptation, James now makes it quite clear that he does not mean temptation to sin or that such temptation could ever come from God:

> "Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God: for God cannot be tempted with evil, and He Himself tempteth no man: but each man is tempted, when he is drawn away by his own lust, and enticed" (i. 13, 14, R.V.).

God allows men to be tested, as Abraham and Job, and in fact all His people, and the purpose behind it is, as we have seen, to develop their faith, thus leading to spiritual growth. But God never tries men with evil intent, so tempting them to sin. He, by His very nature, cannot be tempted with evil. He is the thrice holy God, Who 'will by no means clear the guilty' (Exod. xxxiv. 7). He cannot sin or plan that sin shall happen. Those who believe the terrible and subtle doctrine that God is the author of sin, must find these verses impossible of interpretation if they are honest.

Deep students of the Word have failed here, in that they believe that God willed sin to happen so that His great love in redemption could be manifested. The argument is that man could never have known such love unless he was a sinner needing redemption and forgiveness. Such a view is completely untrue for, as we have seen, it is an affront to His holy nature and going right against the revelation of Himself in the holy Scriptures. Furthermore, it limits Him to one course of action in manifesting His love.

Even failing human beings do not act on this principle. Do loving parents urge their children to sin so that they may experience the joy of being forgiven? And what would such parents think if it was asserted that only in this way could they adequately make their love known to their children?

Furthermore, the Apostle Paul sounds the death knell of such doctrine relating to God when, in Rom. iii. he writes:

> "But if our unrighteousness (sin) commend the righteousness of God, what shall we say? Is God unrighteous Who taketh vengeance? (or punishes?) . . . . . God forbid: for then how shall God judge the world?" (Rom. iii. 5, 6).

If Satan and Adam were only doing what God planned they should do, then it would be impossible for God to judge or condemn them, for they would only be carrying out His will. The Apostle goes on to say:

> "And not rather, (as we be slanderously reported, and as some affirm that we say,) Let us do evil, that good may come? whose damnation is just" (Rom. iii. 8).

If God acted in this way, He would be deliberately causing sin to occur so that good might eventually come, but the Apostle strongly repudiates such an idea, and those who hold it will come under God's righteous condemnation (damnation).

Satan is the evil tempter of mankind, not God, and in any case, James points out that it is man's sinful nature that leads him to transgress: ". . . . . but each man is tempted when he is drawn away by his own lust and enticed". The Lord Jesus emphasized the same truth when He said;

> "But those things which proceed out of the mouth come forth from the heart; and they defile the man. For out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies: these are the things which defile a man; . . . . ." (Matt. xv. 18-20).

None of these things, or sin in any form, can originate or be purposed by a holy God. Such doctrine comes perilously near blasphemy.

So far from God tempting men with evil intention, He is the source of all good:

> "Be not deceived, my beloved brethren. Every good gift and every perfect boon is from above, coming down from the Father of lights, with Whom can be no variation, neither shadow that is cast by turning" (i. 16, 17, R.V.).

All the Father's gifts are perfect and they come from One Who never varies. He knows what is best for His children and gives without stint, so that every need is supplied. Not only this, but these Hebrew believers owed their spiritual birth to Him as He worked upon His own life-begetting Word (i. 18) in their hearts. Thus they became a 'firstfruits' of His kingdom, becoming part of the elect remnant of Israel spoken of in Rom. xi. 1-5.

In the O.T. God claimed the firstfruits (Lev. xxiii. 10) and in the same way the faithful remnant of the Acts period were a 'beginning' of His earthly kingdom purposes.

No.3. pp. 173 - 177

Having stated that the Hebrew believers were 'a kind of firstfruits' (i. 18) of the earthly kingdom ministry that was proceeding during the Acts, James goes on to indicate the kind of practical walk that should accompany such a calling:

> "Ye know this (or know ye), my beloved brethren. But let every man be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath: for the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God" (i. 19 20, R.V.).

Some of the ancient texts read iste, instead of hoste (wherefore) and the former word can either be imperative (know, or take note of) or indicative (ye know). If taken as imperative, it would be a command to note the context, and this would make the meaning more forceful. The characteristics of the new spiritual life resulting from the new birth must be evident in practice. Believers must be 'swift to hear'. They must be constantly on the alert to hear the voice of God speaking to them through His Word.

On the other hand, they should be 'slow to speak', taking care that they first absorb for themselves this Word of God, before they attempt to teach others and most certainly they should be 'slow to wrath'. If this is indulged in (??? - more rightly "not indulged in"), then the voice of God cannot be heard, nor will anyone listen to a bad-tempered speaker. All wrath is better left to the One Who is absolutely righteous and can indulge in it without sin. Further than this, there must be a putting away of 'all filthiness and overflowing of wickedness' (i. 21 R.V.). The A.V. has 'superfluity of naughtiness' and the old English fails to convey today what James actually wrote. He cannot mean that it is only the surplus of naughtiness which must be laid aside, and the middle English 'naughtiness' is not nearly strong enough, for the word has changed its meaning over the centuries. The R.V. is better and in the place of sin, all should receive with meekness the engrafted or implanted word which could 'save their souls'.

The Scriptural meaning of the 'saving of the soul' we have dealt with elsewhere. The reader should consider Matt. xvi. 24-27 in the R.V. and note the insistence of the Lord by the repetition of the word 'life', which the margin shows is the word 'soul' in the Greek. Likewise Heb. x. 39 should be consulted. Each of these occurrences together with the reference in James is addressed to saved persons and therefore cannot be referring to the salvation of the sinner, as the phrase is used today. There is a further aspect of salvation which should concern the believer and this is linked with suffering, testing and the perfecting of faith, which finally results in reward from the Lord and each of these contexts is dealing with this very important doctrine.

The writer has been stressing readiness and keenness to hear, but something more is required than passive listening:

> "But be ye doers of the Word and not hearers only, deluding your own selves. For if a man is a hearer of the Word, and not a doer, he is like unto a man beholding his natural face in a mirror: for he beholdeth himself, and goeth away, and straightway forgetteth what manner of man he was" (i. 22-24, R.V.).

It is comparatively easy to listen, but far harder to listen and then practice what we hear. James gives the illustration of someone taking a hasty look at himself in a mirror and then going off and soon forgetting what he saw. Mayor, noting the aorist and perfect tenses of the Greek verbs, renders it "Just a glance, and off he goes". What he sees makes no impression on him. He turns at once to other things and forgets "what manner of man he was".

The mirror, which reflects the imperfections of the outer man is now contrasted with the perfect law of freedom which reflects the inner man. James refers to the law 8 times (i. 25; ii. 8-12; iv. 11 twice). He calls it the royal law (ii. 8) and the law of liberty twice (i. 25; ii. 12). The writer is not dealing with the law of God as it relates to the unsaved and the futile attempt of the unbeliever to keep it by his own efforts. We need to take great care here otherwise we shall be setting up the teaching of James against that of Paul. Many have done this, including great names like Luther, but they have disregarded the context and to whom the epistle was written. As we have seen, it was addressed to Hebrews who are saved and are now being taught what 'going on to perfection' or maturity means. The 'perfecting of faith' through trial and suffering was stressed in chapter i. 2-4.

Teleios, perfect or mature occurs five times (i. 4 twice; i. 17, 25; iii. 2). Teleioo, to make perfect or mature occurs once in an important context relating to Abraham's faith (ii. 22). Teleo, to finish or fulfil is found in ii. 8 "If ye fulfil the royal law". Telos, end or goal is used in v. 11 "the end of the Lord". This very important group of words gives us one of the clues to the interpretation of the epistle, specially its relationship to the law. We must remember that while justification of the sinner is not by law-keeping, going on to maturity for the believer is certainly related to practical response. This is the standpoint of James and we shall give this further consideration in chapter ii. where the controversial passage concerning Abraham and his justification occurs.

The Hebrew believers to whom James addressed his letter are now reminded of this fact. While the beginning in experience of the truth of God is related to the opened eye and the opened ear, progress in it depends upon the practical working out in daily living, and so a progressive Christian will constantly 'look into' the Word of truth for guidance in this respect (James i. 25).

The word parakupto means literally 'to bend down and peer into' for close inspection, such as Peter and Mary did in the empty tomb on the great resurrection morning (John.xx.5,11). Peter also tells us that angels desire to 'peer into' the contents of the gospel (I Pet. i. 12). Likewise the saved who are putting first things first, delight in God's commandments and are eager to obey them. After giving them consideration they do not forget such things, but rather they continue therein (i. 25) making these their daily delight. Did not the Lord Jesus say concerning His teaching, "if ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them" (John xiii. 17)? Further than this James reminds his readers that in so doing they will be blessed (i. 25). He follows this with a warning:

> "If any man thinketh himself to be religious, while he bridleth not his tongue but deceiveth his heart, this man's religion is vain" (i. 26).

Dokei means 'seem in his own estimation'. Such a person imagines himself to be progressive spiritually because he is often engaged in religious observances. At the same time he does not control his speech and so denies in practice his profession. This man's religion is empty declares James, who is nothing if not practical all through this epistle.

Threskos religious and its cognate threskia, describes the details of formal worship or ritual, in other words the externals of religion. Thousands are very punctilious in this respect, but the Word of God makes it abundantly clear that such acts are unacceptable to God unless the attitude of mind is right with Him, accompanied by practical obedience.

Israel's scrupulous observance of Mosaic ritual was spurned by God when they turned away from Him. Isaiah had to write:

> "What to Me is the multitude of your sacrifices? says the Lord; I have had enough of burnt offerings of rams and the fat of fed beasts . . . . . Bring no more vain offerings, incense is an abomination to Me . . . . . your appointed feasts My soul hates; they have become a burden to Me, I am weary of bearing them" (Isa. i. 11-14, R.S.V.), and all this because Israel had become ‘a people laden with iniquity, offspring of evil doers, sons who deal corruptly’ (Isa. i. 4 R.S.V.).

Later on the Lord Jesus Himself said, “This people draweth nigh unto Me with their mouth, and honoureth Me with their lips, but their heart is far from Me” (Matt. xv. 8). Much that was external in ritual was correct, but it was all in vain as far as God was concerned because their minds and daily lives were far removed from Him.

And so it always has been. All such conduct is no more than empty profession. If it comes to external acts then James tells his readers:

> “Pure religion and undefiled before our God and Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows and to keep himself unspotted from the world” (James i. 27).

This does not attempt to give a complete definition of what pure religion is. Rather it gives two characteristics of the truth in practice, which are better than external acts of worship taken by themselves. Widows and orphans were not provided for in ancient society, they were typical examples of those needing help. God Himself is revealed in His Word as “a Father of the fatherless” and “a judge of the widows” (Psa. lxviii. 5), and the Lord Jesus strongly condemned some of the Pharisees for embezzling the property of widows (Mark xii. 40). We remember too Paul’s injunctions to Timothy concerning widows’ needs (I Tim. v. 3) and the concern of the early church for them (Acts vi. 1).

Truly our God is a practical God and while there is plenty of ‘religion’ about today, how much of it really counts in the Lord’s estimation? Routine attendance at a place of worship on Sunday and a forgetfulness of the Lord and His claims during the week do not harmonize. One cannot help feeling that much in Christendom is no more than this. No wonder such Christian profession is devoid of power or attractiveness and the riches of God’s revealed truth are so little appreciated. May all of us who claim to have “opened eyes” seek grace and strength to be “living epistles” clearly making known Whose we are and Whom we serve.

When we come to chapter ii. of this epistle we find that James is still dealing with the practical expression of the faith of the Hebrew believers to whom he wrote:

> "My brethren, show no partiality as you hold the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory. For if a man with gold rings and in fine clothing comes into your assembly, and a poor man in shabby clothing also comes in, and you pay attention to the one who wears the fine clothing and say, Have a seat here, please, while you say to the poor man, Stand there, or, Sit at my feet, have you not made distinctions among yourselves, and become judges with evil thoughts?" (James ii. 1-4, R.S.V.).

James gives a hypothetical case of two people coming into their 'assembly' (synogoge, synagogue), one rich and the other poor. The rich person gets favoured treatment and is given a special seat. The poor man in the first instance, is not even given a special seat, but told to 'stand' or if he does sit down, it must be on the floor in a lowly place. First of all, this denies the fact that in the sight of God all are equal and He is no respecter of persons and the fact that some who have money counts as nothing with Him. Secondly, such treatment shows a divided allegiance and is an example of the "double mindedness" that is condemned in chapter i. 7 and 8. Thirdly, those who differentiate between rich and poor in this way become judges, and show an unrighteous and biased mind. "Judges of evil thoughts" (A.V.) is misleading. The R.V. is correct, rendering it "judges with evil thoughts" and only this sense fits the context properly.

Such sinfulness is directly opposite to the thoughts and ways of God:

> "Hearken, my beloved brethren; did not God choose them that are poor as to the world to be rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which He promised to them that love Him?" (ii. 5, R.V.).

God's ways are not man's ways. God is concerned with the true riches (note Luke.xii.20,21). In the same way the Apostle Paul enjoined Timothy:

> "Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high minded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, Who giveth us richly all things to enjoy . . . . . that they be rich in good works . . . . ." (I Tim. vi. 17, 18).

It is not that God has limited His choice to the poor, but He gives them a special place (Luke i. 52; I Cor. i. 26, 27), and makes them heirs of that glorious kingdom which had been the theme of all the O.T. prophets and one day will be established on the earth when Christ will return and take control of everything and bring in His righteous rule.

Not only this, but it was a strange thing to single out for preferential treatment some of the rich who at that time were the violent oppressors of believers:

> "Do not the rich oppress you, and themselves drag you before the judgment seats? Do not they blaspheme the honourable Name by the which ye are called?" (ii. 6, 7, R.V.).

In chapter v. 4-6 James gives an example of the kind of oppression he has in mind, but the greatest offence of these well-to-do tyrants was that they blasphemed the sacred name of Christ and for any Hebrew believer to show partiality to such people meant that they themselves were committing sin, and so the Apostle continues:

> "If you really fulfil the royal law, according to the Scriptures, 'you shall love your neighbour as yourself', you do well. But if you show partiality, you commit sin, and are convicted by the law as transgressors. For whosoever keeps the whole law but fails in one point has become guilty of all of it" (ii. 8-10, R.S.V.).

It is important to realize that the moral law is a unity, an expression of the undivided will of God the law-giver. It is one law expressed in ten different ways, each one being summed up in the word 'love'.

Paul expressed it thus:

> ". . . . . he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law . . . . . love is the fulfilling of the law" (Rom. xiii. 8-10).

This is expanded in various ways, touching adultery, killing, stealing, false witness, but it is all briefly comprehended in this saying, namely "thou shall love thy neighbour as thyself" (ii. 9). So that the sinner, no matter what his sin is, has touched the very heart of the law that unifies it and has broken the commandment 'to love'. This is what James means when he says that the wrong-doer if he only fails in one point, is guilty of all. Respect of persons disobeys 'the royal law', for in one of the subsidiary laws derived from this royal law it is stated:

> "Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty: but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour" (Lev. xix. 15).

Moreover, the law clearly brands those who break it as transgressors. The words in the A.V. are now archaic ". . . . . and are convinced of the law" (James ii. 9). They should read ". . . . . being convicted by the law". What men have to learn is that they cannot pick and choose in God's sight. It is useless to excuse their failure to observe one part of the law, by pointing to their observance of other parts. God is not honoured in this way, nor will He allow exceptions. We cannot subtract and omit the laws we do not like. It is all or nothing, and it is man's absolute failure to obey God's law in its entirety that makes it necessary for his salvation to depend, not on his own righteousness or attainments, but upon the all-satisfying righteousness of Another, namely the Lord Jesus Christ (Phil. iii. 8, 9).

Christian love must be shown both in speech and action "so speak ye, and so do, as men that are to be judged by a law of liberty" (ii. 12) and this is expressed by mercy, remembering all the while that it was a God of infinite mercy Who save sinners and therefore He expects those whom He has saved to be merciful constantly to others. "For judgment is without mercy to him that hath showed no mercy: mercy glorieth against judgment" (ii. 13 R.V.). Mercy is therefore a product of practical love and where this is absent, the love that Scripture stresses is absent too.

In the same way James now proceeds to show that where such love does not exist, real faith is lacking:

> "What does it profit, my brethren, if a man say he hath faith, but have not works? Can that faith save him?" (ii. 14, R.V.).

It is important to note that the writer does not say 'though a man has faith', but "though a man say he hath faith and have not works". Such a professed faith, being totally lacking in results, is useless. James asks two rhetorical questions both demanding the answer 'certainly not'. The A.V. 'can faith save him?' is misleading and fails to bring out the force of the Greek definite article. "Can that sort of faith save him?" is what is meant. The illustrations given of this are forceful. What would be the use of saying to someone naked or destitute of food 'depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled', or to put it in modern English, 'goodbye, get some clothing and nourishing food', and not raise a finger to supply this basic need? "What doth it profit?" says James, "of what practical use is this sort of thing?". It is dead, callous and utterly useless, no matter how much the word 'faith' is used. Some may talk loudly about faith, but the writer makes clear that he wants practical proof in action for all faith, and without this it is barren and futile (ii. 18-20).

No.5. pp. 211 - 219

Now follows the controversial passage concerning Abraham's faith which has led some undiscerning people to imagine that James is contradicting Paul in Paul's emphasis on faith apart from works. Even Luther stumbled here, calling this epistles a 'strawy' one. What has been missed is the fact that James and Paul are looking at two different phases of the faith of Abraham:

> "Was not Abraham our father justified by works, in that he offered up Isaac his son upon the altar? Thou seest that faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect" (ii. 21 and 22, R.V.).

The key is contained in the words 'faith made perfect". Teleioo to make perfect, means to bring to completion. When Paul uses Abraham as an example of faith without works, he is looking at the beginning of his faith, when he first heard God speak to him and he responded and believed Him. James is looking thirty years later in Abraham's experience, when the final great test by God was given in the command to offer up Isaac. The patriarch stood the test, very difficult though it was, and by his obedience his faith was brought to completion. It became great faith. There is no contradiction at all between Paul and James when this is understood. James had one aim, to destroy the pretence of those who professed to have faith when there was no evidence in the way they behaved to show their faith was real and alive. The word 'justified' in verse 21 means in effect "shown to be justified". Abraham's works here declared without any doubt that his faith was real, that it had grown to great faith which could trust God without any reserve whatsoever, even though His demand was overwhelming from a human standpoint.

In verse 21 the A.V. translation 'when he had offered' is better rendered in the R.V. "in that he offered" (noting the aorist participle of the verb), and the imperfect tense of the word 'wrought in', shows that this co-operation was continually going on.

The climax to all this is that God gave him the supreme honour of calling him His friend. What a privilege! Just imagine an insignificant 'human being' being called the close friend of almighty God! No wonder God said in Gen. xviii. 17 "Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do?" Close friends have no secrets! This reminds us of the words of the Lord Jesus:

> ". . . . . I have called you friends; for all things that I have heard of My Father I have made known to you" (John xv. 15).

In Isa. xli. 8 God again calls Abraham His friend and in II Chron. xx. 7, he is declared to be God's friend for ever.

As God looks at us by day and notes our response to Him in obedience and the exercise of faith, can He say the same of us and call his (us) His close friends?

We have seen that James in dealing with justification by faith underlines that its final practical working out was one to great faith and spiritual maturity. He now brings this to bear upon his readers. In taking the example of Abraham, he was not looking at the initial steps of faith that Paul stressed in the epistle to the Romans, and thus there is no contradiction between these two writers as has been imagined by Luther and others. Real faith is never static, but is a practical response to the revelation and claims of God which results in obedience. In other words it expresses itself in action. Paul does not hesitate to speak of 'the obedience of faith' (Rom. i. 5; xvi. 26) and if professed Christian faith does not result in outward action and response, then one doubts whether the inward reality is really there.

James now goes, as it were, to the bottom of the social ladder and cites the example of Rahab the prostitute. She certainly professed faith, for she said "the Lord your God is God in heaven above, and in earth beneath" (Josh. ii. 11), but this was not merely barren faith, but faith that immediately expressed itself in effective action. She received the messengers in a friendly way and sent them out, so enabling them to escape. This practical faith of hers is mentions in Heb. xi.:

> "By faith the harlot Rahab perished not with them that believed not, when she had received the spies with peace" (Heb. xi. 31).

The R.V. is better here, "in that she received . . . . . and sent them".

James has therefore made it perfectly clear that the mere profession of faith is in itself a dead thing. If it is not productive of active obedience, it is not really faith at all and can only be compared to a corpse:

> "For as the body apart from the spirit is dead, even so faith apart from works is dead" (James ii. 26, R.V.).

The next section of the epistle develops this practical viewpoint by dealing with the responsibility of teachers. We should remember the English word 'master' used in the A.V. of chapter iii. 1 was used in 1611 of teachers. We still talk about 'school-masters'. The word does not mean an employer. The Greek word didaskalos means a teacher and should be so rendered in modern English. The R.V. and modern versions recognize this:

> "Be not many teachers, my brethren, knowing that we shall receive heavier judgment" (James iii. 1, R.V.).
>
> "Let not many of you become teachers, my brethren, for you know that we who teach shall be judged with greater strictness" (R.S.V.).
>
> "Not many of you should act as teachers, my brothers, because you know that we who teach will be judged more strictly" (N.I.V.).

There is no doubt whatsoever that the crying need today in Christian circles is for reliable and well-equipped teachers. Yet, as James reminds us, this most important Christian service is not to be undertaken lightly, because of the great responsibility to the Lord that is involved. We have sometimes been amazed at the way some push forward to teach and lead, and are inexperienced and ill-equipped themselves to take on such responsible work. They are 'untaught teachers' who can mislead others, however sincere they may be. Every Christian teacher should remember the truth of James iii. 1 which is truth for all time.

Those who teach should obviously know more than those taught, otherwise they have no right to attempt to instruct others. The fact is, all truth brings responsibility in the Lord's sight and the teacher, who thereby claims to have greater knowledge of the Word of God, is more responsible to Him than others without this knowledge. Believers often pray that the Lord will give them more light upon His Word of truth. But do they realize that if this is granted their responsibility to the Lord is increased? We should not shrink from praying like this; at the same time it is needful to remember all that is involved. Teaching and expounding the Word of God is a wonderful ministry. But it is also a solemn ministry, for the Lord does not take a light view of those who mislead others and bring them into error.

From the thought of teaching James now proceeds to consider speaking in general. He declares that we all stumble in our speech at times, yet the mark of perfection, or spiritual maturity is shown by the way we speak:

> "He that stumbleth not in word, the same is a perfect man (mature), able to bridle the whole body also" (iii. 2, R.V.).

The Word of God gives us many characteristics of the mature person from a spiritual standpoint, but one that is often forgotten is controlling the tongue. Such a person can only control his speech, but his whole body also, for the tongue is the hardest member of the body to discipline. How often we have to regret things we have said! No wonder the Lord Jesus declared "By thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned" (Matt. xii. 37). We all need the controlling power of the Holy Spirit to bring every thought to the obedience of Christ (II Cor. x. 5) for "out of the abundance of the heart (or mind) the mouth speaketh" (Matt. xii. 34) and it is from within that evil words arise (Mark vii. 21-23). James gives practical illustrations of the power of the horse, by which, if their mouths are controlled, the animal is brought to obedience and the rider is able to 'turn about its whole body' (iii. 3). In the same way the rudder of a ship, though small, can guide and alter the direction of the largest ship (iii. 4). The word behold (idou), so characteristic of Jewish writers, occurs six times in this epistle, introducing each time an illustration (iii. 3, 4, 5; v. 4, 7, 11).

The power of speech is tremendous for good or ill. We all know how great oratory can sway multitudes. In the context we are considering, it is the distinctive power of the tongue that is stressed. A spark can set on fire a great mass of material and uncontrolled speech can destroy much that is precious. Verse 6 is strong language and is a terrible warning of the damage that the tongue can do. Moreover, it is beyond the power of man when left to himself, to completely control it. Man can control the animal world, but he cannot control himself (iii. 7, 8). For the believer it is only when the new nature, energized by the Holy Spirit, is dominant, that the tongue can be tamed, and then its highest use can be the praise of Him Who is our Saviour, Lord and Head. Calvin truly said "He who truly worships and honours God will be afraid to speak slanderously of men". The Apostle Paul said:

> "let your speech be alway with grace, seasoned with salt, that ye may know how ye ought to answer every man" (Col. iv. 6).

Let us remember that speech always shows the inward personality and if the Lord's grace has taken possession of us, then our speech will always be gracious, and a preservative against evil, just as salt prevents putrefaction.

To sum up this section, James deals with two kinds of wisdom. One which comes down from above and is from God. The other which is 'earthly, sensual and devilish (or demon-like)' (iii. 15). The former he has dealt with in the first chapter, where he tells us that if we lack this wisdom, God will give it liberally if we ask Him (i. 5), so there is no excuse for us not to possess it. Its characteristics are:

> "But the wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without variance, without hypocrisy" (iii. 17, R.V.).

It is associated with meekness in verse 13. Its greatest exponent was the Lord Jesus Himself, for He could say with truth of Himself "I am meek and lowly of heart" (Matthew xi. 29), and Paul does not hesitate to appeal to "the meekness and gentleness of Christ" (II Cor. x. 1). How very different is "bitter jealousy" and "selfish ambition and strife" (James iii. 14). Contentiousness, arrogance or self-assertion show infallibly that those who exhibit these traits are not fit to be teachers or leaders in the Christian sphere, no matter what their capabilities are or their intellectual grasp of the Bible. Such only lead to variance and division, so breaking the unity of the Spirit which is God's creation and we are exhorted to guard it at all cost (Eph. iv. 1-3).

From the beginning of chapter iv., it is evident that all was not well with some of the groups of Hebrew Christians to whom James was writing:

> "Whence come wars and whence come fightings among you? Come they not hence, even of your pleasures that war in your members?" (iv. 1, R.V.).

The A.V. 'lusts' is correctly rendered 'pleasures' in the margin. James diagnoses the cause of these destructive factions as pleasure-seeking and this surely is one of the greatest forces that operates in the unregenerate mind. The Apostle Paul when he wrote to Titus also described the time of unregeneracy as ". . . . . serving divers lusts and pleasures" (Titus iii. 3) and in his description of the last days of the age he says "lovers of pleasures rather than lovers of God" (II Tim. iii. 4 R.V.). When we consider the amount of time, energy, money and enthusiasm spent in the pursuit of pleasure, we can appreciate that James is not exaggerating, but stating sober truth.

Now there is nothing wrong with pleasure in itself, providing it comes from and is concerned with wholesome things. The devil loves to portray God, specially to the unsaved, as long-faced, frowning upon every enjoyment. It is only when pleasure becomes the over-riding ambition of life that it is deadly. It is like drugs which become habitual and finally need ever larger doses to produce results. Hedonism is a terrible master and holds its victims in its remorseless clutches and millions today are enslaved by it. Yet it never satisfies; it promises so much and gives back so little and for this to grip the mind of any true believer is tragedy indeed. The more one grows in grace and knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ, the simpler one's pleasures become and they assume the right proportion in life and do not become a snare. Moreover the instructed child of God knows that the time for real and lasting enjoyment and satisfaction relates to the next life, and not this one. "At Thy right hand are pleasures for evermore" (Psa. xvi. 11).

In the context we are considering, we have seen that James is warning against the devastating effect of uncontrolled earthly pleasure in the life of a believer (iv. 1-3). Such a condition militates against the prayer life:

> "Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may spend it in your pleasures" (iv. 3, R.V.).

Two things are said here which nullify prayer. "Ye have not because ye ask not" (James iv. 2), and self-centredness, which wants answers to petitions in order to gratify selfish desires. I John v. 14 gives us a good guide to effective praying ". . . . . if we ask anything according to His will, He heareth us". Nothing is clearer in the Scriptures of truth than the fact that none of us can go to God with demands of our own which are not in accord with His will. It appears that some believers feel that if they persist long enough, God will finally grant their requests. It is as though by worrying Him, He will finally give way. This will never happen no matter how long such prayer is maintained. Our attitude must constantly be that of the Saviour, "Thy will be done, not mine" (Luke xxii. 42).

James reminds his readers that those who were obsessed with worldly pleasures were friends of the world and enemies of God, for this world system is Satan inspired and entirely anti-God. God's enemies would certainly not get satisfactory answers to their prayers! We remember that the Lord Jesus said "because ye are not of the world . . . . . therefore the world hateth you" (John xv. 19). The antidote to all this wrong thinking and action is grace and the spirit of humility:

> "Wherefore the Scripture saith, God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble" (iv. 6).

It is significant that we find the same words in I Pet. v. 5, the repetition showing how important is the truth expressed in these verses.

The A.V. of James iv. 5 presents a problem:

> "Do ye think that the Scripture saith in vain, The spirit that dwelleth in us lusteth to envy?"

There are few people who have not had a difficulty in understanding this verse. It is not easy to associate envying or lusting with a holy God, that is if the word 'spirit' is a direct reference to the Holy Spirit. On the other hand the word could be a reference to the sinful state of mind of the unregenerate and of the old nature in the believer. The Companion Bible has a note here which says "this can only refer to the general testimony of Scripture that the natural man is prone to selfish desires leading to envy of others who possess the things desired". We feel this is the answer that fits the context. Certain it is that wherever we find pride mentioned in the Bible it is unreservedly condemned by God, for it was the parent sin that caused the fall of Satan. The Lord will not tolerate the exaltation of self. God brooks no rivals and nothing is truer than the old saying that 'pride goes before a fall'.

On the other hand the truly humble will 'submit themselves to God' (iv. 7) realizing that His will must always be paramount and His infinite knowledge of our real needs is past our understanding. We are not surprised therefore that James continues with "resist the devil and he will flee from you". Satan knows only too well that if he encourages pride in the believer, a voluntary submission to the Lord and His claims will be impossible. The Apostle Paul stressed this when he wrote to Timothy warning him not to appoint one who was a novice, "lest being lifted up with pride he fall into the condemnation of the devil" (I Tim. iii. 6). The big "I" has been the undoing of many a believer. May we all seek grace to manifest constantly the real spirit of humility found in the Lord Jesus Christ.

Men God Called

No.1. Noah.
pp. 32 - 37

Throughout the centuries there have been men and women "subject to like passions as we are", who have been raised up by God for His purposes. The records of their exploits are 'written for our learning', and as examples for us.

Noah was such a man. The background to his calling is outlined in Gen. vi. 1-7. In verses 1, 2, 3 and 4 the word 'men' (or 'man') represents in the original "the Adam". This is translated by J. N. Darby as 'mankind' in verse 1, and draws attention to the fact that it is true human beings who are in mind in contrast to 'the giants' or nephilim who were the off-spring of the illicit union between the 'sons of God' (i.e. angelic beings) and the daughters of Adam. It is a somber and sobering thought that even as early as the daughters of Adam, Satan was not only at work, but found ready response in the human race.

As a result of this state of affairs 'the wickedness of man was great in the earth'. The word 'wickedness' has the significance of lewdness, and moral depravity, and draws attention to a significance of the Lord's words in Matt. xxiv. 37, 38, which is often overlooked:

> "But as the days of Noe were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. For as in the days that were before the flood they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the Ark."

In the light of the account in Gen. vi. "marrying and giving in marriage" takes on a more sinister meaning. It can hardly be the fact that they were 'marrying and giving in marriage' that is so significant, for throughout the history of mankind this has been going on. Moreover Paul specifically states in Heb. xiii. 4:

> "Marriage is honourable in all, and the bed undefiled: but whoremongers and adulterers God will judge."

It is the abuse of the married state that comes under the judgment of God. This is found in the state of affairs recorded in the passage before us: there was a combination of 'supernaturalism' and moral depravity. There is a similar situation in the world today: moral depravity abounds, and there is an increasing interest in supernaturalism, in the occult, spiritism, and even Satanism.

The description of the world wide situation in Gen. vi. 11-13 has a familiar ring today. "All flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth" (verse 12), "the earth was filled with violence" (verse 11). Such was the situation that "The Lord said, I will destroy man whom I have created from the face of the earth" (verse 7). The events in the world today, in the light of Scripture, are leading up to God's judgment upon mankind. It was against the background of a world situation not so dissimilar from that today that Noah was called.

In the midst of all the corruption and violence there was one notable exception:

> "But Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord" (Gen. vi. 8).

Noah only was acceptable to God, and when this is so, acceptance by God brings responsibility, and so it was with Noah:

> "And God said unto Noah, ... Make thee an ark of gopher wood; rooms shalt thou make in the ark, and shalt pitch it within and without with pitch" (verses 13-14).

Could anything be more ridiculous? Here was a man who was not merely holding to old fashioned, outmoded ideas, but was stupid enough to try to build a ship on land, far from any sea. But was he subject to any more ridicule than before? He had always been the 'odd man out' among his contemporaries. Verse 9 could be rendered:

> "This is the family history of Noah: Noah was a just man and without blemish among his contemporaries, and Noah walked habitually with the Creator."

All his past life had been a preparation for the work he was now to undertake for God. He had been 'faithful in little', now he was to be given the opportunity to be faithful in much.

Paul summarized Noah's call in these words:

> "By faith Noah, being warned of God of things not seen as yet, moved with fear, prepared an ark to the saving of his house; by the which he condemned the world, and became heir of the righteousness which is by faith" (Heb. xi. 7).

Noah was 'warned of God'. The word 'warned' is one which is always used of divine communications, and in Luke ii. 26 a corresponding word is translated 'it was revealed'. In the response to this revelation 'moved him with fear'. It was not fear in the sense of terror, but of caution, being circumspect or discreet, even to wait quietly for. Arndt and Gingrich put it "Noah took care and built an ark". The cautious man builds a ship on dry land! Then quietly waits for all that God has revealed. It was through faith Noah did this. He trusted God, trusted in the revelation given to him, taking heed to do all that God had said, taking care to do what God had told him, quietly waiting God's time. The truly cautious thing to do at all times is to trust in God, and to do His will.

In this way Noah became "a preacher of righteousness".

> "God . . . . . spared not the old world, but saved Noah the eighth person, a preacher of righteousness, bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly" (II Pet. ii. 5).

The context of this statement is instructive: "The angels that sinned"; "Sodom and Gomorrah". In a time of moral and spiritual corruption Noah became a preacher, or better, a herald. He proclaimed righteousness, and proclaimed it whether his hearers took heed or not. Surely the 'righteousness' he proclaimed was that the coming judgment was just. The chapter also begins with a reference to 'false prophets', and there are many such in the world today; it continues (verse 10 on) with walking 'after the flesh in the lust of uncleanness', it makes reference also to 'the way of Balaam': immorality, rebellion and corruption. In such a situation Noah became a herald of righteousness.

Like many another of those called of God, Noah was called to what someone has called 'a ministry of failure'. For all his faithful proclamation of righteousness, not one took heed to his message. Only Noah and his immediate family were saved from the judgment of the deluge. Because he was called to 'a ministry of failure', he was called to a ministry of faithfulness. As a result he 'became heir of the righteousness which is by faith'. "Through faith Noah . . . . . became heir of the righteousness which is by faith." Should not those who by faith have inherited righteousness be faithful?

Seldom, if ever before, has there been a time like the present to parallel the days of Noah. Yet the time was foreseen by the Lord, "As it was in the days of Noah . . . . .". So also Paul spoke of the days leading up to those of which our Lord spoke.

> "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils (demons); speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their conscience seared with a hot iron; forbidding to marry and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth" (I Tim. iv. 1-3).

Some shall depart from, stand aloof or withdraw from the faith; some will not remain faithful in the difficult 'latter times'. They will give heed to seducing spirits: seducing is the Greek word planos, wandering, straying. Perhaps this gives greater significance to the A.V. 'seducing' in the light of 'the angels which kept not their first estate', but wandered, or strayed from it, taking wives from among the daughters of men.

Similarly in II Tim. iii. Paul emphasizes the dangers of 'the last days', for they shall be 'perilous times' of great apostasy. Verse 8 has a salutory warning in the reference to "Jannes and Jambres" who withstood Moses. These are the names of the magicians who counterfeited the signs performed by Moses before Pharaoh. Just as these apostates will resist the truth. There will be counterfeit signs and wonders performed by some (at least) of those who stand aloof from the faith. They do not necessarily deny the faith; the situation is more perilous than that, for they have 'a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof'. This is reinforced by Paul's statement to the Thessalonians concerning the coming of 'that day' and the presence (parousia) of the man of sin 'whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness' (II Thess. ii. 9, 10).

Noah's calling, with his faithfulness in days of great moral laxity and spiritual corruption, with his faithfulness in heralding righteousness, and in his faithful obedience to the will of God for him, speaks to us, living, as we do, in days of great similarity to those in which Noah lived. Should not we, in our great calling, seek to be spiritually without blemish among our contemporary believers, habitually walking worthily before God, remaining faithful in what might appear to some to be God's delay, being heralds of the righteousness which is to be found in Christ alone? There may be little response to the truth we proclaim, but following the faithful example set us by Noah let us continue to seek to enlighten all men what is the stewardship of the secret which from the beginning of the world has been hid in God. Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord.

No.2. Abraham.
pp. 50 - 55

On the immediate historical background to the great man of faith, Scripture is silent. We know that Abraham was the son of Terah, and that originally he lived in Ur of the Chaldees (Gen. xi. 31).

We do know that, all too soon after the Flood, men engaged in planning the Tower of Babel. It is clear from the account in Gen. xi. 1-9, that this was an act of rebellion against God, and was judged by Him as such. Up to this time God had been dealing with mankind as a whole; now He begins to move towards the calling of one family, one race and nation. With the call of Abraham this purpose comes into operation.

In some instances those called of God for His service experienced that call over a very short period. Others, like Abraham found that their calling extended over a much longer period, developing step by step. If we have experienced one of these, we must be careful not to deny the other. To some God speaks in an instant; to others He speaks over a more prolonged period of time, leading them step by step to greater things. Nor must we look upon those whose experience differs from our own as being less spiritual, or more spiritual than we are. God deals with us as individuals, and chooses and uses us according to our needs and abilities. From the human standpoint it might seem that one needed to be led step by step, as was Abraham; and Abraham merited the proud title of 'father of the faithful'.

In recounting the history of the chosen People Stephen, before his accusers, said this of Abraham:

> "The God of glory appeared unto our father Abraham, when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran, and said unto him, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and come into the land which I shall shew thee. Then came he out of the land of the Chaldeans, and dwelt in Charran: and from thence, when his father was dead, he removed him into this land, wherein ye now dwell" (Acts vii. 2-4).

"Then came he out." Heb. xi. 8 adds to this information by telling us "and he went out, not knowing whither he went". This is often quoted as support for those who 'leave all' to serve the Lord, giving up the means of livelihood, and 'trusting to the Lord' to supply their needs. It is just as frequently forgotten that Abraham took his livelihood with him, in the shape of flocks and herds! "He went out, not knowing whither he WENT". He knew from whence his next meal would come, and from the same source, as wool or skins would come his clothing, and accommodation could also be provided by tents made from skins. This is not to say that God does not, or cannot supply every need; He can, of course. But sometimes what passes for faith is nothing more than credulity.

> "Now the Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will shew thee: . . . . . and I will bless thee" (Gen. xii. 1, 2).

Having made this statement, the account continues (verse 4) "so Abram departed, as the Lord had spoken unto him". Although the call had been "from thy father's house", when, after 25 years delay at Haran, Abram went into the land of Canaan, it was "as the Lord had spoken unto him".

"And Lot went with Him" (verse 4). The next verse states: "An Abram took Sarai his wife, and Lot his brother's son". The inference seems to be that Lot wanted to go with Abram, although he was not called, and Abram, in spite of the injunction "Get thee . . . . . from thy kindred", acquiesced to the young man's request, and took him with him. We know from the history of Abram that Lot was the cause of a good deal of trouble for him later on. It is also significant that neither Acts vii., nor Heb. xi. makes any mention of Lot.

We are given the initial call to Abraham in Gen. xii. 1-3:

> "Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will shew thee: and I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing: and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed."

He was called, then: (1) to a land; (2) to a blessing; (3) to be a blessing; (4) to a great name; (5) to be a blessing to those who blessed him; (6) to be a curse to him who cursed him; (7) to be the means of blessing to all the families of the earth.

Abraham was called 'to a land', yet already, in verse 7 there appears to be a hint to the effect that Abraham, himself, would not inherit the land:

> "And the Lord appeared unto Abram, and said, Unto thy seed will I give this land."

This is developed further in Heb. xi. 8-10:

> "By faith Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went. By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise: for he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God."

To a place he should after receive for an inheritance. The word translated 'he should after' signifies 'he was about to'. It was his if he wanted it. But 'by faith he sojourned in the land of promise'. Sojourned is the word paroikeo: to dwell beside, or near, hence to live as a stranger. The substantive of this word occurs in Luke xxiv. 18, "Art thou only a stranger in Jerusalem?" The sense of verse 9, then, is "he dwelt as a stranger in the land of promise". It was his, God had given it to him, yet in it he lived as a stranger!

Nonetheless, the promise to Abraham was that the land was given to him:

> "For all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever" (Gen. xiii. 15).

Similar statements are also found in Gen. xv. 7; xvii. 8. Yet Abraham lived as a stranger in the land of promise. The reason for this is given in Heb. xi. 10:

> "For he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God."

The word 'looked for' in the original, occurs also in Heb. x. 13, "From henceforth expecting till His enemies be made His footstools". The basic thought of the word is to take, or receive from: to take up. Abraham took up the city whose builder and maker is God. He had 'an option' on either the land, or the city. He took up the option on the city. God had given him the land, and this was good; but at some point God had also revealed to him the possibility of inheriting the city, and this was better. To gain the better, he had to renounce the possibility of the land which God had given him. Abraham knew it was not possible 'to have the best of both worlds'.

Believers today have a similar choice: "Life through His Name" with an earthly inheritance, or citizenship and eternal life in heavenly places; the good, and the better. But as Abraham found with his choice, there is a cost attached to the better; that of becoming 'strangers and pilgrims on the earth'.

Those of old time, who looked for the heavenly city, did not obtain the promises (Heb. xi. 13), "but seeing and greeting them from afar, and confessing that they were strangers and sojourners on the earth (or land)", made manifest that they sought a fatherland. Those heavenly citizens became strangers to, and sojourners, in the promised land. Yet, "if they had been mindful of that country from whence they came out, they might have had opportunity to have returned". Abraham had set out not knowing whither he went, to a land God had promised him. Then it was made known to him that beyond the land (all the land which thou seest), was an unseen fatherland, which was far better.

When this 'secret' was made known to Abraham, we do not know. That there was progression in his calling seems certain:

> "And I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth: so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered" (Gen. xiii. 16).
>
> "Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them: and He said unto him, So shall thy seed be" (Gen. xv. 5).

Here may be more than a hint of the earthly calling (the dust of the earth), and of the calling to the heavenly city (the stars of heaven).

It is instructive to note what preceded the second of these two promises. After the victory over Chedorlaomer and the kings with him, Abram met the priest-king Melchizedek, and to him Abram gave 'tithes of all'. About the same time the king of Sodom offered to Abram all the booty of the battle:

> "And Abram said to the king of Sodom, I have lift up mine hand unto the Lord, the most high God, the possessor of heaven and earth, that I will not take from a thread even to a shoe latchet, and that I will not take anything that is thine, lest thou shouldest say, I have made Abram rich: save only that which the young men have eaten" (Gen. xiv. 22-24).

Chapter xv. begins:

> "After these things the word of the Lord came unto Abram in a vision, saying, Fear not, Abram: I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward."

Abram renounced earthly reward, and desired only to 'glory in the Lord'. As a result the Lord declared Himself to be Abram's exceeding great reward, and there followed the promise of a seed as numerous as the stars of heaven. Nevertheless, the land is still mentioned, and this is also the case in chapter xvii. 8. When we come to the confirmation of the covenant with Abraham in chapter xxii., following the offering of Isaac (16), for the first time there is no mention of the land as the inheritance of Abraham. He is promised that his seed shall be 'as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore' (17), and in his seed all the nations of the earth are to be blessed.

Progressively, step by step, the Lord led Abraham on, and step by step and in response to the faith displayed by Abraham in his obedience, God made known to him more of his purpose. It cannot be ascertained at what point Abraham became aware of the calling to the heavenly city; but what is clear, is that Abraham was content with nothing less than the best.

As with many another whom God called, Abraham had experienced the 'awe-fulness' of God. When the Lord covenanted the full extent of the promised land (Gen. xv.) we read:

> "And when the sun was going down, a deep sleep fell upon Abram; and, lo, an horror of great darkness fell upon him . . . . . And it came to pass, that, when the sun went down, and it was dark, behold a smoking furnace, and a burning lamp that passed between those pieces" (Gen. xv. 12 and 17).

Abraham was one whom God was pleased to call "my friend" (Isa. xli. 8), yet in the presence of God he experienced 'an horror of great darkness'. He knew the greatness and the holiness of the One with Whom he had to do. Surely this is the secret of faithfulness in any servant of God.

Today, in our calling, there is usually a progression to what has been termed 'a calling within a calling'. Normally we begin with the knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ as our Saviour, and then, by the grace of God progress to the knowledge of the Secret, the calling to heavenly places. There is, as many know from experience, a price to pay if we desire the best. So it was with Abraham, who was numbered among those who:

"died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth" (Heb. xi. 13).

No.3. Moses.
pp. 68 - 72

It is probably hardly necessary to recount the antecedents of the man Moses, they are so well known. Heb. xi. 23-27 gives us the summary:

> "By faith Moses, when he was born, was hid three months of his parents, because they saw he was a proper child; and they were not afraid of the king's commandment. By faith Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt: for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward. By faith he forsook Egypt, not fearing the wrath of the king: for he endured, as seeing Him who is invisible."

An unusual element to his birth, as is the case with several of those whom God called, he was hidden by his parents, his sister stood guard over him when in the 'ark of bulrushes', and was found by the princess of Egypt. But when he had grown, and quite possibly as a result of the teaching of his mother, who had nursed him, he obviously knew something of the God of his fathers, and so, "by faith he refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter". This knowledge led him to the incident recorded in Exodus ii. 11-15:

> "And it came to pass on those days, when Moses was grown, that he went out unto his brethren, and looked on their burdens: and he spied an Egyptian smiting an Hebrew, one of his brethren. And he looked this way and that way, and when he saw that there was no man, he slew the Egyptian, and hid him in the sand. And going out the second day, behold, two men of the Hebrews strove together: and he said to him that did the wrong, Wherefore smitest thou thy fellow? And he said, Who made thee a prince and a judge over us? intendest thou to kill me, as thou killedst the Egyptian? And Moses feared, and said, surely this thing is known. Now when Pharaoh heard this thing, he sought to slay Moses. But Moses fled from the face of Pharaoh, and dwelt in the land of Midian."

In The Companion Bible structure this section is headed "Moses self-sent. Failure and flight".

Moses saw the need of his people; He desired to serve God. Like many another since, he had to learn that the mere recognition of need, is not necessarily God's call. He saw the need, but thus far he was neither called nor sent by God. Possibly this was because his knowledge of God was not personal; he knew God only by hearsay. No one can serve God until head knowledge becomes heart knowledge.

Nevertheless, his mistaken action brought him to the place of revelation, an instance of "all things work together for good". Having fled from Egypt and the wrath of Pharaoh, Moses went into Midian, where he came in touch with Jethro, the priest of Midian. Tending Jethro's sheep Moses saw the burning bush, from which God spoke to him:

> "Now Moses kept the sheep of Jethro his father-in-law, the priest of Midian: and he led the flock to the backside of the desert, and came to the mountain of God, even to Horeb. And the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a flame of fire out of the midst of a bush: and he looked, and, behold, the bush burned with fire, and the bush was not consumed" (Exod. iii. 1, 2).

It has been suggested that the burning bush signified the affliction of the Hebrew nation: the bush burned, but was not consumed. For Israel the fire still, to this day, burns on, yet the nation is not, and has not been consumed. But may it not (also) signify the affliction of Moses as God's man? We have already seen that Paul, writing to the Hebrews pointed out that Moses chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, rather than the pleasures of sin, he esteemed the reproach of Christ greater riches than those of Egypt. Moreover others of those whom God called were confronted with more than the possibility of suffering in the service of God. Paul is perhaps the outstanding example of this, for he was told at the time of his call "how great things he must suffer for My name's sake" (Acts ix. 16). Paul is the one who makes quite clear what is at issue here:

> "But what things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ. Yea, doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus our Lord: for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung, that I may win Christ" (Phil. iii. 7, 8).

"Win" would be better translated "gain", for here Paul is setting forth a spiritual 'profit and loss account': the 'treasures of Egypt' are not to be compared with the incalculable gain of the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord.

Again like others called to God's service, Moses was made aware of the holiness of the One calling him.

> "And when the Lord saw that he turned aside to see, God called unto him out of the midst of the bush, and said, Moses, Moses. And he said, Here am I. And He said, Draw not nigh hither: put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground. Moreover He said, I am the God of thy father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. And Moses hid his face; for he was afraid to look upon God" (Exod. iii. 4-6).

Without the sense of God's holiness and greatness, service relies too much on 'the arm of flesh'. As we saw in the last study, Abraham experienced 'an horror of great darkness' at the time when the covenant was enacted. Without the sense of the greatness of God, we have a God Who is 'too small'.

The God Who spoke to Moses from the bush revealed Himself as Elohim, the God of creation: Elohim then changes to Jehovah. Moses must know Him as the God of the Covenant, the Covenant keeping God:

> "And God said moreover unto Moses, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, Jehovah God of your fathers . . . . . sent me unto you: this is My name for ever" (Exodus iii. 15).

Personal confrontation had to become a personal relationship. Moses must know, before he commences his work that the God whom he will serve is a faithful God, and can be relied upon in every circumstance.

Again, Moses had to realize the all-sufficiency of God.

> "And God said unto Moses, I AM THAT I AM" (Exod. iii. 14).

A statement which is wonderfully all-inclusive. It is sometimes said it would be better to translate it "I WILL BE WHAT I WILL BE". God will do His own will, nothing will prevent it. Yet in all the history of His people He will be found to be all, and indeed more than all that they need. With all the experiences involved in the exodus from Egypt, Moses had need to know this from the outset. When confronted by the Red Sea, with the hosts of Pharaoh behind, it would be a strength to Moses to know their God was able: in the wilderness needing water, needing food, it would be a strength to him to know that God would supply.

Yet there was one aspect of the character of Jehovah Moses had yet to learn. In this incident Moses shows a commendable humility: verse 11, "Who am I, that I should go unto Pharaoh, and that I should bring forth the children of Israel out of Egypt?" Chapter iv., verse 1 Moses doubts his ability to convince his hearers, a few verses later (10) he speaks of his inability to speak eloquently, and goes on (13) "O my Lord, send I pray Thee, by the hand of him whom Thou wilt send". The outcome of this final objection was that he was commissioned to include in his ministry his brother Aaron: an arrangement which later led to trouble. Moses had to learn that "God's calling is God's enabling". His commission could not be shared with another. There is a humility which is right, and in due course Moses came to that right humility; but there is a humility which is wrong. Peter defines the humility needed by Moses, and needed by us all:

> "Likewise, ye younger, submit yourselves unto the elder. Yea, all of you be subject one to another, and be clothed with humility: for God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble. Humble yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of God, that He may exalt you in due time" (I Pet. v. 6).

True humility is first the submission of oneself to the will of God. Whatever His will may call upon us for, He will be sufficient.

For the man, or woman, called of God, faith in the God of creation must give way to a personal relationship through personal confrontation. He must wait until he has been called before embarking on any course of action, to do otherwise can only lead to trouble. As he looks to the future, he needs to realize that the man chosen of God is 'immortal till his work is done'. It is essential that he appreciates fully the spiritual 'profit and loss account', seeking only to 'get to know Him'. He cannot include in his own personal calling any to assist him. Again, to do so will only lead later on to trouble. He also needs to recognize the all-sufficiency of God in Christ, that in the new man "Christ is all, and in all". He must be humble; but that does not mean he will submit to the demands and wishes of all and sundry, but that, above all else, he will humble himself under the mighty hand of God.

No.4. Joshua.
pp. 87 - 92

Moses was dead: he had converted a rabble of ex-slaves into a nation, had laid the foundation of their status as the People of God, and, not without many difficulties and problems, had brought them through the wilderness to the borders of the Land God had promised to them. What would happen, now that Moses was dead? More than once over the past forty years they had longed for "the flesh pots of Egypt". Would they now be prepared to go ahead and fulfil what God purposed for them, or would they, once more, begin to think in terms of returning to Egypt? Who was there, capable of leading them, and keeping them faithful to their God?

It was clear that they needed a man of experience: one who knew how things had been for them, and was strong enough to counter any signs of the rebellious spirit they had shown in the past. Joshua was such a man.

The first reference to Joshua, in Exod. xvii. 9, 10, shows him, on the instruction of Moses, leading the nation into battle.

> "And Moses said unto Joshua, Choose us out men, and go out, fight with Amalek: tomorrow I will stand on the top of the hill with the rod of God in mine hand. So Joshua did as Moses had said to him, and fought with Amalek: and Moses, Aaron and Hur went up to the top of the hill."

There can be little doubt that, in addition to the experience Joshua gained of fighting, he also learned through this battle the efficacy of prayer, for "when Moses held up his hand, ... Israel prevailed: and when he let down his hand, Amalek prevailed". According to The Companion Bible note on this incident, Joshua was now a man of 53. He had experienced the bitterness of slavery in Egypt, he had experience of travel in the wilderness, and now, experience in battle as captain.

> "And Joshua discomfited Amalek and his people with the edge of the sword. And the Lord said unto Moses, Write this for a memorial in a book, and rehearse it in the ears of Joshua . . . . ." (Exod. xvii. 13, 14).

"Rehearse" means to set, or place. What was it Moses was to set, or place in the ears of Joshua? Was it that Joshua had routed the Amalekite army? Surely his first victory on the battle field would be an unforgettable event in his life. Was it not that so long as there was prayer, God's People could perform God's purpose?

Moreover Joshua had experienced the holiness of God, like others of those God called.

> "And Moses rose up, and his minister Joshua: and Moses went up into the mount of God" (Exod. xxiv. 13).
>
> "And Moses turned, and went down from the mount . . . . . And when Joshua heard the noise of the people as they shouted, he said unto Moses, There is a noise of war in the camp. And he said, It is not the voice of them that shout for mastery . . . . . but the noise of them that sing do I hear" (Exod. xxxii. 15-18).

Immediately prior to the first ascent mentioned in Exod. xxiv., Moses, in the company of Aaron, Nadab, Abihu and seventy of the elders of Israel:

> "saw the God of Israel: and there was under his feet as it were a paved work of a sapphire stone, and as it were the body of heaven in his clearness" (xxiv. 10).

It seems unlikely that Moses was not also accompanied by his minister on this occasion.

But not only was Joshua a man of experience, he had also demonstrated his faithfulness:

> "These are the names of the men which Moses sent to spy out the land. And Moses called Oshea (named verse 8 as one of the spies) and son of Nun Jehoshua" (Numb. xiii. 16).
>
> "And Joshua the son of Nun, and Caleb the son of Jephunneh, which were of them that searched the land, rent their clothes: and they spake unto all the company of the children of Israel, saying, The land, which we passed through to search it, is an exceeding good land. If the Lord delight in us, then He will bring us into this land, and give it us; a land which floweth with milk and honey. Only rebel not ye against the Lord, neither fear ye the people of this land . . . . ." (Numb. xiv. 6-9).

With Caleb, Joshua was the only one to set forth a balanced view of the situation they had found in the land after they had explored it. Following this incident, Joshua learned the lesson that faithfulness would not bring popularity:

> "But all the congregation bade stone them with stones" (Numb. xiv. 10).

Joshua had learned an invaluable lesson before he finally embarked on the great work to which God later called him.

So often nowadays the leader, the minister must be the choice of the people: the minister goes to the church to 'preach for a call'. Not so with Joshua. On the instruction of Jehovah Moses had 'ordained' Joshua:

> "And the Lord said unto Moses, Take thee Joshua the son of Nun, a man in whom is the spirit, and lay thine hand upon him; and set him before Eleazar the priest, and before all the congregation; and give him a charge in their sight. And thou shalt put some of thine honour upon him, that all the congregation of the children of Israel may be obedient . . . . . And Moses did as the Lord commanded him . . . . . And laid his hands upon him, and gave him a charge, as the Lord commanded by the hand of Moses" (Numb. xxvii. 18-23).

The choice of the new leader was given to Moses, a man of the Spirit, who would recognize that the Spirit was also in Joshua.

Moses was also instructed to 'encourage' Joshua, and this in view of his own experience as leader of this people.

> "Also the Lord was angry with me for your sakes, saying, Thou also shalt not go thither: But Joshua the son of Nun, which standeth before thee, he shall go in thither: encourage him: for he shall cause Israel to inherit it" (Deut. i. 37, 38).
>
> "And Moses called unto Joshua, and said unto him in the sight of all Israel, Be strong and of a good courage: for thou must go with this people unto the land which the Lord hath sworn unto their fathers to give them; and thou shalt cause them to inherit it. And the Lord, He it is that doth go before thee; He will be with thee, He will not fail thee, neither forsake thee: fear not, neither be dismayed" (Deut. xxxi. 7, 8).

In the light of this, verse 25-29 are of particular import:

> "Moses commanded the Levites, which bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord, saying, Take this book of the law, and put it in the side of the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God, that it may be there for a witness against thee. For I know thy rebellion, and thy stiff neck: behold, while I am yet alive with you this day, ye have been rebellious against the Lord; and how much more after my death? Gather unto me all the elders of your tribes, and your officers, that I may speak these words in their ears, and call heaven and earth to record against them. For I know that after my death ye will utterly corrupt yourselves, and turn aside from the way which I have commanded you; and evil will befall you in the latter days; because ye will do evil in the sight of the Lord, to provoke Him to anger through the work of your hands."

The work to which Joshua had been called was no sinecure, and Moses knew from his own experience that this was so. The result was that he sought to prepare the way, so far as was possible, on the one hand by encouraging Joshua, and on the other by warning the Levites and the nation as a whole, of their rebelliousness.

Joshua was also a wise man; but it was not the wisdom of the world, it was wisdom from above, "for Moses had laid his hands upon him" (Deut. xxxiv. 9). There is no place in the man God calls for the wisdom of the world, perhaps, in terms of today, no place for the wisdom of the business world. Paul reminds us that 'the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God' (I Cor. iii. 19), and the converse is true: the wisdom of God is foolishness with the world. This was to be apparent in the strategy Joshua was to employ in the conquest of the land.

In Joshua we have a man of experience, a man who has proved himself faithful, a man who is wise, and one appointed by the previous leader. But all this would be in vain without the commission of God. This commission is recorded in detail in Josh. i. 2-9. The commission was to enter and to conquer the land, and certain aspects of it underline points we have been considering. Verse 5, "as I was with Moses, so I will be with thee: I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee"; verse 6, "Be strong and of a good courage: for unto this people shalt thou divide . . . . . the land". It would certainly need a man of courage and strength to apportion the inheritance. One can imagine the disagreements and disputes that could arise over such a matter! It is interesting to note a slight change in 'formula' in verse 7:

> "Only be thou strong and very courageous, that thou mayest observe to do according to all the law, which Moses my servant commanded thee: turn not from it to the right hand or to the left, that thou mayest prosper withersoever thou goest."

Now that Joshua was leader, there would be many occasions when the temptation to lower the standard of the law would be very strong, when compromise would appear to be the best course; but true prosperity would not lie that way. Great courage would sometimes be needed to remain the faithful man he had proved himself to be in the past.

To the end that he might have the required courage Joshua is told:

> "This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein: for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success" (Josh. i. 8).

Notice again that true prosperity and 'good' success will depend upon the place the law is given by Joshua: it is to be constantly in his thoughts. The true prosperity and success of the man God calls is his faithfulness, and for us our true prosperity and good success comes to us as we are faithful to the written Word, and in consequence faithful to the Living Word.

Verse 9 completes the commission: I have commissioned you; therefore be strong and of good courage, for I am with you where ever you go, says Jehovah.

Following his commissioning, and immediately before the attack on Jericho, Joshua is instructed in the strategy to be employed. The instruction is preceded by another experience of the holiness of God (Josh. v. 13-15), and in response to that experience "Joshua fell on his face to the earth, and did worship". Before such an adventure, so foolish in the eyes of the worldly wise, an experience of the holiness and greatness of God would greatly encourage and strengthen Joshua.

Then Joshua is instructed on the strategy to be employed in the siege of Jericho. The victory is to be the Lord's, and His only. The people are to do nothing more than march around the city daily for seven days: then on the seventh day to blow trumpets! But the weakness of God is stronger than men, and through the faithfulness of Joshua in carrying out his instructions, the city fell.

To sum up the qualifications of this man called of God: he was an 'elder', being 53 years of age when he first makes an appearance; he was a man of experience, not a novice (Timothy seems to be an exception, but he was versed in Scripture from a child); he was a faithful man with a balanced view, though that view did not accord with that of the majority; he was wise with the wisdom of God, and aware of the holiness of God. Joshua was commissioned to do the ridiculous in the eyes of the world.

Perhaps Joshua, more than any other, impresses the need for the man or woman called of God to be strong, courageous, conscious of the Lord's abiding presence, and to be a 'man of the book'.

No.5. Gideon.
pp. 113 - 119

The immediate background to the call of Gideon is recounted for us in Judges vi. 1-10. "The children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord", and as a result the Midianites became their overlords for seven years. The Israelites worked, and the Midianites benefited. The latter were as 'grasshoppers', or better, 'locusts', indeed they were worse than locusts, for not only did they destroy 'the increase of the earth', they left 'neither sheep, nor ox, nor ass'. "They entered into the land to destroy it." Nothing can be more disheartening than to labour successfully, and then at the last moment be deprived of the reward. Great impoverishment was the outcome for Israel, and the people were finally driven to 'cry unto the Lord'. But there is no hint of repentance, as is made clear in verses 8-10:

> "The Lord sent a prophet unto the children of Israel, which said unto them, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, I brought you up from Egypt, and brought you forth out of the house of bondage; and I delivered you out of the hand of the Egyptians, and out of the hand of all that oppressed you, and drave them out from before you, and gave you their land; and I said unto you, I am the Lord your God; fear not the gods of the Amorites in whose land ye dwell: but ye have not obeyed my voice" (Judges vi. 8-10).

Neither does the prophet make any mention of deliverance.

The sequel demonstrates the patience and longsuffering of God; for although there is still no hint of repentance on the part of the nation as a whole, in mercy He acts:

> "And there came an angel of the Lord, and sat under an oak which was in Ophrah, that pertained unto Joash the Abiezrite: and his son Gideon threshed wheat . . . . . and the angel of the Lord appeared unto him" (Judges vi. 11 and 12).

It was the angel of the Lord: the angel of Jehovah, the covenant God who came to Gideon. Although deliverance was to be effected through Gideon, it was not on the grounds of national repentance, but on the grounds of God's faithfulness to His covenant. This is perhaps emphasized in the greeting the angel gave: "Jehovah is with thee, thou mighty man of valour". It was a personal message to Gideon: thee, thou. Yet like others, such as Moses and Daniel, Gideon associates himself with his people, and in his reply says "if the Lord be with us". He included himself in the corporate responsibility of the nation.

Gideon was addressed as a 'mighty man of valour'. The word for 'mighty man' is 'gibbor': a man of physical strength. This point is underlined by the use of the word

'valour': strong, force. But Gideon was sufficiently perceptive to realize that physical strength was not enough, although in human terms the situation demanded a leader of strength and a people of military strength. In his reply Gideon acknowledges the strength of Jehovah, and concludes, as the nation has been reduced to such impoverishment, that Jehovah has deserted them:

> "And Gideon said unto him, Oh my Lord, if the Lord be with us, why then is all this befallen us? and where be all his miracles which our fathers told us of, saying, Did not the Lord bring us up from Egypt? but now the Lord hath forsaken us, and delivered us into the hands of the Midianites" (vi. 13).

Jehovah's answer to this shows what was in Gideon's mind at the time: "Go in this thy might, and thou shalt save Israel . . . . . have not I sent thee?" Physically strong Gideon might be, the ideal man to deliver Israel; but his true strength was his trust in the power of God.

Gideon's response to this commission, at first sight, appears to be a case of false humility:

> "Oh my Lord, wherewith shall I save Israel? behold, my family is poor in Manasseh, and I am the least in my father's house" (vi. 15).

The angel had spoken to 'a mighty man of valour', now Gideon says he is the smallest, or youngest in his father's house. Humanly speaking he was therefore the least likely to be called upon to deliver the nation; one of his brothers would be more suitable. This is given some support in chapter viii. 18, 19:

> "Then said he unto Zebah and Zalmunna, What manner of men were they whom ye slew at Tabor? And they answered, As thou art, so were they; each one resembled the children of a king. And he said, They were my brethren, even the sons of my mother."

He was the smallest, or youngest, of a family of strong, powerful men. Like David, whose family seem scarcely to have thought of him, until Samuel enquired whether all the sons were present, Gideon was God's choice. Often God chooses and calls the least likely, and the least suitable from an outward standpoint to fulfil His purposes.

To this objection, Jehovah replied, "I will be with the, and thou shalt smite the Midianites as one man" (vi. 16). An assurance given to Moses, to Joshua and to others. It is still true that "God and one are a majority". The man God calls needs to have a soundly based conviction that God is with Him.

Gideon was a cautious man: a fact which makes the method of his choice of those who would go with him against the Midianites the more remarkable. At this point he seeks reassurance that it is Jehovah Who speaks to him:

> "And he said unto him, If now I have found grace in thy sight, then shew me a sign that thou talkest with me" (vi. 17).

He had already pointed out that Jehovah had, in the past performed miracles for His people (vi 13), now he requests a sign that he may be certain he is not being deceived.

The sign is recorded for us in verses 18-21, where we read that fire rose up out of the rock and consumed the provisions brought by Gideon for the angel. Gideon placed great emphasis on the power of God to perform 'miracles', as we see also from verses 36-40 where the signs of the fleece are recounted. It would be nothing less than a miracle if Gideon, even with a large band of his compatriots, could save Israel from the Midianites, and Gideon sought proof of the power of God, which had not recently been exercised on behalf of Israel.

Like others we have considered in these studies, Gideon also was aware of the holiness of God:

> "And when Gideon perceived that he was an angel of the Lord, Gideon said, Alas, O Lord God! for because I have seen an angel of the Lord face to face. And the Lord said unto him, Peace be unto thee; fear not, thou shalt not die" (vi. 22, 23).

If on perception of an angel Gideon reacted in this way, he clearly recognized that the holiness of God was much greater. The response of Gideon to this was worship:

> "Then Gideon built an altar there unto the Lord, and called it Jehovah-shalom" (vi. 24).

The one called of God is 'worshipful': he worships, and worships with gratitude in his heart. Today so many lack the sense of the holiness of God, and hence they lack the spirit of worship and reverence.

The first of the exploits performed by this man called of God, was the destruction of the altar of Baal. The background to this incident is curious: Gideon's father was named Joash. A name that means 'Jehovah gave". It thus seems likely that Joash had been brought up in a godly home, where Jehovah was reverenced and worshipped. Yet the altar that Gideon destroyed was 'the altar of Baal that thy father hath', and he was also bidden to destroy the 'grove' or asherah that was by it. An altar to Baal with all the pagan symbols attaching to it, owned by the one "Jehovah gave". Moreover Joash says after the altar has been destroyed "If Baal be a god, let him plead for himself" (31). In which God did Joash believe? In Jehovah or Baal? Or is the confusion revealed in the incident symptomatic of an attitude current today: "It's the same God, under a different name"? This would provide a further reason for Gideon's insistence on signs, and Jehovah's ability and power: he wanted to be quite certain it was Jehovah and not Baal Who was addressing him.

This incident also shows Gideon as indeed a man of courage. He was prepared to destroy his father's altar to Baal, and,

> "He feared his father's household, and the men of the city" (vi. 27).

Perhaps there is here a hint that Joash, in his heart worshipped Jehovah, but because of popular opinion was prepared to compromise. Gideon was not prepared to compromise. Though 'the men of the city' were against him, and his own kith and kin, he had to make a clear and clean break with Baal. Gideon destroyed the altar of Baal, and built an altar to Jehovah. Once again we are reminded that service must be preceded by worship.

Then from chapter vi. 34 to the end of chapter vii. we read of Gideon's army and conquest of the enemy. He gathered to himself a company of twelve thousand and twenty (possibly, even of thirty-two thousand). But this force was too large, and perhaps too strong, to be used of God. He was instructed to reduce the numbers with him, and after an appeal for those whose hearts were not in the fight and who were afraid, to leave, no less than "twenty and two thousand" went home. But still the number was too large. After the test at the water (vii. 5, 6) only three hundred were left. The fearful (possibly the faithless?), and the incautious, or possibly idolaters departed.

It is interesting to note the title given to the three hundred who remained. In verse 8 they are spoken of as 'the people': an inference that in this small band Gideon had the 'faithful remnant' of his day.

Then comes the well known story of the defeat of Midian. By the most ridiculous means the enemy army was reduced to chaos and confusion. After the breaking of the pitchers, and the sudden appearance of the light of the torches, and the equally sudden shout of "The sword of the Lord, and of Gideon", "all the host ran, and cried, and fled".

> "And the three hundred blew the trumpet, and the Lord set every man's sword against his fellow, even throughout all the host" (vii. 22).

Thus it appears that the defeat of Midian was accomplished without the three hundred using their swords. Only when the Midianites had fled, did Gideon call together the men of Israel to pursue, and to consolidate the victory. It was an excellent example of:

> "God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things that are mighty; and base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to nought things that are: that no flesh should glory in His presence" (I Cor. i. 27-29).

Indeed, this was very much what Jehovah said to Gideon concerning the numbers with which he set out:

> "The Lord said unto Gideon, The people that are with thee are too many for Me to give the Midianites into their hands, lest Israel vaunt themselves against Me, saying, Mine own hand hath saved me" (Judges vii. 2).

But, alas, Gideon, like so many men God calls, was not without his faults. He resisted the suggestion that he should be king (Judges viii. 22, 23), but he made an ephod of the spoils of battle that came to him.

> "And Gideon made an ephod thereof, and put it in his city, even in Ophrah: and all Israel went thither a whoring after it: which thing became a snare unto Gideon, and to his house" (viii. 27).

It may have been that Gideon did this with the best of intentions, seeking to re-establish the worship of the true God, but it led the whole nation astray, and became 'a snare' to Gideon and his family. Nevertheless his commission:

> "Go in this thy might, and thou shalt save Israel from the hand of the Midianites" (vi. 14), was fulfilled:

> "Thus was Midian subdued before the children of Israel, so that they lifted up their heads no more. And the country was in quietness forty years in the days of Gideon" (viii. 28).

Gideon was one of the comparatively few called to a ministry which, in terms of the world's assessment, might be called 'successful'.

No.6. Samson.
pp. 131 - 135

> "And what shall I more say? for the time would fail me to tell of . . . . . Samson" (Heb. xi. 32).

It sometimes comes as something of a shock to the thoughtful reader to find Samson listed among the 'heroes of faith' in Heb. xi. Samson whose morals can hardly be said to be of a very high standard: Samson whose exploits often appear to be little more than childish tricks. Yet Samson is named as one of those "who through faith subdued kingdoms . . . . ." (Heb. xi. 33).

Perhaps more than others, of those God called, it is necessary to put Samson in his historical background. It was a time of which it is recorded:

> "And the children of Israel did evil again in the sight of the Lord; and the Lord delivered them into the hands of the Philistines forty years" (Judges xiii. 1).

Twice it is recorded in the book of Judges "every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (xvii. 6; xxi. 25). The lawlessness (or, as we might say, the permissiveness) of the times may account in part for the failures of this man. For it is only too easy for the godly person to be influenced by the customs of his day without realizing it.

Like Samuel and John the Baptist, Samson was one of those born of a barren woman: like Jeremiah and Paul, he was one of those specifically mentioned as marked out by God before birth. He was marked out for, and placed in the position where he could fulfil God's will for him; yet his failures are more familiar to us than his successes. May it not be said that Samson was predestined by God for His purpose, and demonstrates a point often overlooked in the consideration of predestination, that there is no element of fate involved. Predestination requires man's co-operation: Samson's co-operation was only partial.

The angel of the Lord told his mother before his birth:

> "For, lo, thou shalt conceive, and bear a son; and no razor shall come on his head: for the child shall be a Nazarite unto God from the womb: and he shall begin to deliver Israel out of the hand of the Philistines" (Judges xiii. 5).

Samson was to be a Nazarite: one separated to God from his birth. It was God's intention that Samson should be wholly concerned with the Lord's will for him: frequently he was concerned only with his own desires and will. Nevertheless, Samson is an illustration of the fact that "the gifts and calling of God are without repentance" (Romans xi. 29). God purposed that he should begin to deliver Israel from the Philistines, and in considering this man called of God, this needs to be remembered. Frequently he is thought of as a Judge, with all that is implied to us in the word: but it was not as a judge that he was commissioned. His commission was to 'begin to deliver Israel', and in this, and to this extent, he succeeded. While the frailty and sinfulness of human nature is very clearly to be seen in the life of this man, he did fulfil his commission to this extent. Yet as we look at the life and exploits of this man called of God, recognizing that he did 'begin to deliver Israel', we can only say 'what might have been'. How very much more he might have accomplished had he not given way to his own likes and dislikes, his own desire and whims.

It is clearly the responsibility of believing parents to bring up their child in the way that he should go. Samson was fortunate in that his home influence was godly:

> "Then Manoah intreated the Lord, and said, O my Lord, let the man of God which Thou didst send come again unto us, and teach us what we shall do unto the child that shall be born" (Judges xiii. 8).
>
> "So Manoah took a kid with meat offering, and offered it upon a rock unto the Lord" (xiii. 19).

Samson was born into a family which desired to know the will of God, and to do it; a family which worshipped Jehovah. Yet, alas, Samson was not all he might have been.

Samson's first exploit is recorded in chapter xiv.: what a disappointment it must have been to his parents to find their son, of whom such great things had been foretold, desiring marriage with a Philistine woman. Yet there was something about it they did not realize:

> "But his father and his mother knew not that it was of the Lord, that he sought an occasion against the Philistines" (xiv. 4).

It was of the Lord that he sought an occasion against the Philistines. When marriage with aliens was forbidden by God, it is clear that the occasion Samson found was one of his own devising: God's Spirit moved him to seek an opportunity to move against the Philistines; but his own wishes found him an occasion which pleased him. We also need to beware lest we seek to do God's will our own way.

Samson, it seems, always sought an excuse, if not a reason, for attacking or injuring the Philistines. In this case the 'reason' came through the riddle: the Philistine guests at the wedding cheated! As a result Samson slew thirty Philistines. The discovery, later, that (evidently in accord with custom) his wife had been given to the 'best man', gave him a further opportunity to take action against the Philistines. Following his revenge taken by releasing in pairs with burning firebrands tied to their tails, three hundred foxes, events led up to the situation in which "he smote them hip and thigh with a great slaughter" (xv. 8). The combined result of these events was that the Philistines came against Samson, and persuaded no less than 3,000 men of Judah to take him (xv. 9-16). The outcome of this was a further 1,000 Philistines slain by him.

This latter incident reveals just how submissive to the Philistines the children of Israel were at this time. Three thousand of them meekly went to capture their own champion at the bidding of their enemies! There is another hint of the extent of the subservience of the nation to the Philistines in the incident where Samson kills the lion with the jawbone of the ass. I Sam. xiii. 19-21 informs us:

> "Now there was no smith found throughout all the land of Israel: for the Philistines said, Lest the Hebrews make them swords or spears . . . . . so it came to pass in the day of battle, that there was neither sword nor spear found in the hand of any of the people . . .".

With a nation meekly submitting to their enemies, and with the complete absence of weapons among them, it is no wonder Samson could only begin to deliver Israel!

The downfall of this man God called is recorded in chapter xvi. 1-21. Samson saw an harlot. The Companion Bible note at this point reads:

> "He could rend a lion, but not his lusts. He could break his bonds, but not his habits. He could conquer the Philistines, but not his passions."

Not long after, it seems, came his affair with Delilah. The Philistines were able to capitalize on this weakness of Samson's, and to discover the secret of his strength by means of the seductions of Delilah. Samson was captured.

> "The Philistines took him, and put out his eyes, and brought him down to Gaza, and bound him with fetters of brass; and he did grind in the prison house" (xvi. 21).

From God's appointed leader of His people, reduced to the work of women and slaves in the prison of his enemies.

Then, his hair, the symbol of his separation to God, began to grow in prison. The day came when his enemies gathered in the temple of Dagon to rejoice over the downfall of Samson, and he was brought in 'to make sport'. Calling upon his God to grant him once more his strength, he pulled down the pillars on which the whole structure of the temple depended: "So the dead which he slew at his death were more than they which he slew in his life" (xvi. 30).

Did he repent? or did he simply recognize another God-given occasion against the Philistines, by which he could also revenge for his eyes? We cannot be certain. We can be certain of his faith in Jehovah, even at the darkest moment of his life. If only he had, in all things, put God first!

Why should this bloodthirsty man be included with the heroes of faith? The Philistines were mixed with 'the giants': Goliath, slain by David later, was the Philistine champion. These were the offspring of Rapha, one of the nephilim, the result of unlawful, and unholy union between the 'sons of God' and the daughters of men. Satan's object in this was the defeat of the purpose of God. It was therefore right that they should be destroyed.

Samson: physically strong, morally weak and childish. Was it necessary for him to visit the dead body of the lion and so be defiled? What was the purpose of his riddle? or of the removal of the Gates of Gaza? On two occasions at least he was not strong enough to withstand a woman. But he had faith: he ought to have been a better man: but he began to deliver Israel.

No.7. Samuel.
pp. 168 - 173

In our last article on Samson we noted that the historical background was one of lawlessness. When Samuel was called of God the situation had not appreciably changed, for we read at the end of the book of Judges:

> "In those days there was no king in Israel: every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (Judges xxi. 25).

Yet, as always, there was the faithful remnant, of whom was Elkanah, the father of Samuel. However, in spite of the faithful remnant, the situation in Israel was very serious:

> "The word of the Lord was precious in those days; there was no open vision" (I Sam. iii. 1).

Is there here just a hint that the faithful remnant were unable to worship openly? Recorded for us in I Sam. ii. 22-25 are the evil doings of Eli's sons. This seems to suggest that the worship of Baal went on openly, even at the tabernacle of the congregation.

Not only was there no king in those days, but there was also no effective priesthood. It is possible that Eli had a personal devotion to Jehovah, but he was not of sufficiently strong character to provide an effective leadership. He was unable to control his own sons, and it seems they despised him (ii. 25). He was also, himself, reproved by a man of God (ii. 27-36), who foretold his punishment.

This situation resulted in there being 'no open vision in those days', "and the word of the Lord was precious". No doubt to the faithful, as always, the word of the Lord was indeed precious and to be prized. Yet in the immediate context it would seem more appropriate to translate "the word of the Lord was costly", and there were few prepared to pay the cost. The Hebrew word (yakar) signifies 'heavy in price'. The word of Jehovah was rare in those days, because the cost of observing it was too great.

Against such a background it seems hardly possible that there should be a family sufficiently loyal to God to dedicate a son to Jehovah's service, even before he was born. Yet the devotion of Elkanah and Hannah to Jehovah was of sufficient strength and character, and their perception and discernment clear enough for them to see the urgency of the need for one man completely committed to God.

The situation in the world today comes close to that of Samuel's day. Many gather for worship; but how many worship in spirit and in truth? The Word of God is 'precious', rare, so that in many churches and chapels it is at a discount. There are many who should be leading others in the way of God, who are, in fact, misleading them. How great is our need of loyalty to the Word of God. How great is our need of perception and discernment lest we should be led away by the attitude of so many who 'profess and call themselves Christian'. Moreover, perhaps particularly with the example of Samson in mind, it is incumbent upon every believing parent to have special care in training their children in the ways of God, and to love His Word.

Samuel was probably about twelve years of age before he was taken to the House of the Lord. Can it be doubted that in such a home as his, he had been taught the things of God to prepare him for his life's work? We are not told how long he was under the instruction of Eli, nor is there certain evidence to show that such training was all it should have been.

Samuel had no personal knowledge of Jehovah, although he must have had knowledge about God. To be brought up in a godly home is no alternative to a personal commitment to God. His father was a Levite, and evidently of rare and habitual devotion. "This man went up out of his city yearly to worship and to sacrifice unto the Lord of Hosts in Shiloh" (I Sam. i. 3). The word translated 'yearly' is literally 'from days to days' perhaps implying that Elkanah went, not only 'yearly', but with regularity to all the feasts of Jehovah. Yet,

> "Samuel did not yet know the Lord, neither was the word of the Lord yet revealed unto him" (iii. 7).

Perhaps part of the significance of this statement is that he did not fully understand what he had been taught, and needed a personal confrontation by Jehovah to enlighten him. We recall Paul's prayer in Eph. i., for the spirit of wisdom and revelation.

Then came the time when God spoke to Samuel, and perhaps there is more to it than meets the eye in the words "and ere the lamp of God went out in the temple of the Lord". Jeremiah prophesied at a time when the Word of God had been lost in the Temple! We have drawn attention before to the fact that frequently the times of apostasy were countered by God by His man either called before birth (as in the case of Jeremiah, i. 5), or, as in the case of Samuel, by one dedicated to His service before birth. More than once in the history of the people of God, of more than one dispensation, the lamp of God has almost gone out, and gone out in God's House, e.g., the time of the Reformation. If the lamp of the Word of God goes out, the ark of God, with its Mercy Seat is unknown, the cross of Christ is unknown. Surely the mark of the last great apostasy of the last days is that the Word of God will be rejected and cast from the House of God: a situation which now appears not so remote. How very careful the 'Berean' should be to give full heed to all that is said in a 'rightly divided' Word of Truth, remembering that 'all Scripture is God-breathed'.

At such a time God called Samuel: and Samuel answered "Here am I" (iii. 4). The one point to note here is that he was willing. When first he was called, he thought Eli called him; but he was willing to go on responding in spite of the 'rebuff' he received from the old man. It may seem strange that Eli did not immediately recognize that God was speaking to Samuel. But it was not only his physical eyes which began to wax dim that he could not see clearly: his spiritual perception also had 'waxed dim'. Samuel was also persistent: three times he went to Eli before it was suggested that the Lord called him. When at last Eli perceived Who called Samuel, it is to his credit that he did not discourage the young lad: He could have said "Ah! He called three times: He won't call again. What a pity!" No. His response, when he realized that it was Jehovah Who called was:

> "Go, lie down: and it shall be, if He call thee, that thou shalt say, Speak, Lord; for Thy servant heareth" (I Sam. iii. 9).

Samuel obeyed the old man Eli, and went and laid down in his place.

> "And the Lord came, and stood, and called as at other times, Samuel, Samuel. Then Samuel answered, Speak, for Thy servant heareth. And the Lord said to Samuel, behold, I will do a thing in Israel, at which both the ears of everyone that heareth it shall tingle" (iii. 10, 11).

Like many another whom God called, Samuel was not given an easy and popular ministry. His first task, youth though he was, was to be the bearer of Eli of tidings of judgment upon Eli and his house. And Samuel did not fail.

> "And Samuel feared to show Eli the vision: Then Eli called Samuel, and said, Samuel, my son. And he answered, Here am I. And he said, What is the thing that the Lord hath said unto thee? I pray thee hide it not from me: God do so to thee, and more also, if thou hide any thing from me of all the things that He said unto thee. And Samuel told him every whit, and hid nothing from him" (iii. 15-18).

We are sometimes tempted to think of those whom God called as being fearless; but they were also men 'subject to like passions as we are'. Samuel feared: but when Eli asked him to reveal all the Lord had told him, he did not hesitate to do so. From Samuel's call we learn that those whom God calls must be willing and persistent:

(1) To know God, perhaps above all else, this should be the attitude of the true 'Berean'. Paul's great desire was to get to know Him (Phil. iii. 7-10). For Paul no sacrifice was too great 'that I may know Him'.

(2) To receive 'the spirit of wisdom and revelation'. For only as we are prepared to pray that tremendous prayer of Eph. i. are we able to go on and to 'get to know Him'. There have been, and are, many who have studied the Life of Christ, yet they have never known Him as Saviour, much less as Head of the Church which is His Body. They have not sought first the spirit of wisdom and revelation.

(3) To be faithful with an unpopular ministry. This is of first importance, remembering that it is required in stewards that a man be found faithful. This, surely, must include the ability to resist demands that he should 'popularize' either himself, or his ministry. This inevitably leads to compromise, and to the adoption of methods his Lord would not own.

(4) To overcome his fears. One of the greatest fears that can be experienced by the man God calls, is the fear of men. This was the experience of Samuel, but by the grace of God he was able to overcome his fear of what Eli would think: and note his fear was, it would seem, the fear of hurting the old man Eli. But which is the greater hurt: the hurt of speaking God's Truth, or the hurt which results when the feelings are spared?

Whatever the task to which God has called us, we can be best fitted for it as we say, and mean, with Samuel: Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth.

No.8. David.
pp. 206 - 211

The immediate historical background to the call of David is the failure of king Saul to obey completely the commands of the Lord. Through His servant Samuel God had instructed Saul:

> "Now go and smite Amalek, and utterly destroy all that they have, and spare them not; but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass" (I Sam. xv. 3).

At the conclusion of the expedition against the Amalekites, Saul found it necessary to excuse his conduct of the engagement by saying to Samuel:

> "They have brought them from the Amalekites: for the people spared the best of the sheep and of the oxen, to sacrifice unto the Lord thy God; and the rest we have utterly destroyed" (I Sam. xv. 15).

Not only had Saul, and the people, brought the 'best' of the livestock, but they had also spared Agag the Amalekite king. It is also significant that Saul speaks to the prophet of 'the Lord thy God'.

God reveals to Samuel that He has rejected Saul as king. This causes Samuel great grief, until the Lord says to him:

> "How long wilt thou mourn for Saul, seeing I have rejected him from reigning over Israel? fill thine horn with oil, and go, I will send thee to Jesse the Bethlehemite: for I have provided Me a king among his sons" (xvi. 1).

But the broader background goes back to the choice of Saul as king. Samuel was an old man, and had appointed his sons as judges in Israel:

> "And his sons walked not in his ways, but turned aside after lucre, and took bribes, and perverted judgment" (I Sam. viii. 3).

As a result the elders of Israel came to Samuel and demanded a king:

> "And said unto him, Behold, thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways: now make us a king to judge us like all the nations" (viii. 5).

Verse 6 tells us 'the thing displeased Samuel'. The Companion Bible note at this point is:

> "Displeased = was evil in the eyes of: i.e., in not waiting for God's time and for God's king, as promised (Gen. xvii. 6, 16; xxxv. 11; xlix. 10; Numb. xxiv. 17; Deuteronomy xvii. 14-20)."

Moreover the people of Israel wanted a king 'like all the nations'. They wanted to be like the rest of the world, they were not concerned with their position as a people separated to God. The seriousness of the situation was not that they merely wanted to replace an earthly judge for an earthly king:

> "And the Lord said unto Samuel, Hearken unto the voice of the people in all that they say unto thee: for they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected Me, that I should not reign over them" (I Sam. viii. 7).

Nevertheless, although their desire for a king was an act of rebellion against their God, He chose the man for them:

> "Now the Lord had told Samuel . . . . . Tomorrow about this time I will send thee a man out of the land of Benjamin, and thou shalt anoint him to be captain over My people Israel . . . . ." (ix. 15, 16).

Although their desire was for a king, the king's appointment was to be controlled by God, for 'the powers that be are ordained of God' (Rom. xiii. 1). Man may seem to be having his own way, but God's controlling hand is over all: and a nation so gets the leadership it deserves. The kind of king Saul would prove to be is described in I.Sam.viii.10-18. He would be a despot, and though the nation would cry to Jehovah, He would not hear them.

There is a threefold aspect to the appointment of Saul, as there is a threefold anointing of David. The people chose a king regardless of the purpose of God for them, then came the incident of the lost asses, and the event recorded in I Sam. ix. 22 - x. 1. The fact that rulers such as Saul, and the Lawless One when he comes to power, are permitted and overruled by God should be a matter of reassurance for the believer; for God is always ultimately in control. Finally Saul was revealed to the people (I Sam. x. 17-25). He was an outstanding man who would appeal to them: "when he stood among the people, he was higher than any of the people from his shoulders and upward", a fact which gives greater point and emphasis to the comment by Jehovah to Samuel at David's first anointing.

The well known account of David's selection and anointing is found in I.Sam.xvi.1-13. God's sovereignty over rulers is emphasized in the first verse: Saul is rejected by Him, and He has already provided Himself a king among the sons of Jesse. The rulers are provided by God, for Himself. God's choice is frequently of the unlikely. He chose as His king 'the youngest' (11). It was not so much what David was, or did, but God's choice which made David "the man after God's heart". Both His foreknowledge and His enabling are involved in this.

Having arrived at Bethlehem, and all the preparations completed, Samuel asks for the sons of Jesse to be brought before him. When Eliab appeared before him the prophet's reaction was "Surely the Lord's anointed is before Him" (xvi. 6). Eliab was evidently a very presentable young man, and the elder son. In the eyes of men, this would more than qualify him to be chosen.

> "But the Lord said unto Samuel, Look not on his countenance, or on the height of his stature; because I have refused him: for the Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart" (xvi. 7).

Samuel was evidently so impressed with the appearance of Eliab, that he did not wait to see any of the other sons of Jesse. It is worthy of note, however, that he did not say "Surely the Lord's anointed is before me"; he recognized that he was merely the instrument through whom Jehovah would make known His choice. His choice rested on one Jesse's own family had discounted.

> "(Samuel) sanctified Jesse and his sons, and called them to the sacrifice . . . . . And Samuel said unto Jesse, Are here all thy children? And he said, There remaineth yet the youngest, and, behold, he keepeth the sheep" (xvi. 5 and 11).

There is an interesting contrast between Saul, who lost his father's sheep, and David, who kept his father's sheep.

The fact that David was 'ruddy and withal of a beautiful countenance, and goodly to look to (a stripling with handsome eyes, of noble mien)' seems to have been almost incidental. It is, however, a reminder that however unlikely, God's choice is always the best.

The principal of God's choice was not 'the height of his stature' (7): Saul had been noted, as we have seen, for 'the height of his stature'. It was 'the man within', for "the Lord looketh on the heart". God's choice having been made known to Samuel, he then anointed David among his family:

> "Then Samuel took the horn of oil, and anointed him in the midst of his brethren" (xvi. 13).

Some fourteen years later David was anointed in his tribe. Saul and Jonathan were dead. David did not seize upon the opportunity to establish himself as king. First "the man after God's heart" sought to know what was in God's mind:

> "And it came to pass after this, that David enquired of the Lord, saying, Shall I go up into any of the cities of Judah? And the Lord said unto him, Go up. And David said, Whither shall I go up? And He said, Unto Hebron" (II Sam. ii. 1).

In obedience to Jehovah's instructions, David 'went up':

> "And the men of Judah came, and there they anointed David king over the house of Judah" (ii. 4).

So David's progression to the kingship of the nation developed. First in his family, then in his tribe, and finally in the whole nation.

It was a further seven years before David was finally anointed king over the whole house of Israel (II Sam. v. 1-3). Numerology is a subject to be treated carefully, yet there are certain aspects of the calling and appointment of David which are worthy of note. His calling, or appointment was over a period of 21 years; a period of three sevens. Three is the number of completion and seven that of perfection. Now, at length, David is king over the complete nation, and is perfectly suitable, being God's choice. The nation entered into blessing because it, and in turn, accepted God's choice.

God is never in a hurry. From God's choice of David to his complete acceptance by the nation took 21 years. God is never too soon, nor is He too late. It could have been a time of frustration and disappointment, even of rebellion against God for David. He was prepared to wait for Him.

David reigned over Israel for forty years (I Kings ii. 11). Forty is the number of probation; but it comprises the factors four (the number associated with creation and the earth), and ten (the number signifying divine order). So David's reign is symbolic of Christ's millennial reign: the perfection of the divine order for creation for one thousand years. One thousand being 10 X 10 X 10 is symbolic of the completeness of the divine order.

David's call demonstrates, perhaps more than any other, the progressive nature of God's purpose for the believer, and reminds us that God's choice is best, though, not infrequently, the choice is not one we ourselves would make, and that the man God calls, needs the co-operation of those to whom he is to minister, if success is to attend him. Isaiah and Jeremiah are instances of men whom God called who were not given the co-operation of those to whom they ministered: and their 'success' was their faithfulness to the Lord.

The Miracles in the Gospels.

No.3. The Twelve Miracles that precede Rejection (Matt. viii. - xii.).

pp. 15 - 20

Twelve separate miracles are recorded by Matthew. Eight separate signs are recorded by John. Evidently therefore the writers of these "gospels" made a choice of the event to suit the purpose of their respective narratives.

We know that twelve is associated with Israel, and with government. Let us look at these twelve miracles together, and notice anything that will help us to see what their special purpose may be.

viii. 2. The Leper cleansed.
viii. 5. Centurion's servant. Asks on behalf of another.
viii. 14. Peter's wife's mother.
viii. 16. Collective miracles and O.T. quotation, "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Isaiah the prophet saying, Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses" (Isa. liii. 4).
viii. 24. The Storm.
viii. 28. The Demons.
ix. 2. Sins forgiven. Brought by others. O.T. quotation (13), "Go ye and learn what that meaneth, I will have mercy, and not sacrifice" (Hos. vi. 6).
ix. 18. Ruler's daughter.
ix. 22. Issue of blood.
ix. 27. Blind men.
ix. 32. Dumb demon. Brought by others.
ix. 35. Collective miracles and O.T. quotation, "As sheep having no shepherd" (Zech. x. 2).
xii. 13. Withered hand.
xii. 15. Collective miracles, and O.T. quotation, "That it might fulfilled which was spoken by Isaiah the prophet saying, > Behold my servant, Whom I have chosen, My beloved in Whom my soul is well pleased: I will put my spirit upon Him and He shall shew judgment to the Gentiles. He shall not strive, nor cry; neither shall any man hear His voice in the street. A bruised reed shall He not break, and smoking flax shall He not quench, till He send for the judgment unto victory. And in His name shall the Gentiles trust" (Isa. xlii. 1).

xii. 22. Blind and dumb demon
The people's enquiry, "Is not this the SON OF DAVID?"
The Pharisees' objection, "He casts out demons by Beelzebub."

The first three miracles touch the orders of human society which would make a direct appeal to the Jew.

The leper, representing Israel, their uncleanness removed.
The centurion's servant, representing the Gentiles, healed at a distance.
Peter's wife's mother. A woman; very little esteemed so far as spiritual things were concerned.

The Old Testament quotations that follows these three miracles shows that the healing of these diseases was part of the Lord's work as the suffering Messiah. He was "acquainted with grief", for He hath "carried our sorrows" as well as borne our sins.

As in the case of the woman who touched the Lord, virtue went out of Him when He thus bore the sickness of sin stricken Israel. This will sufficiently account for the Lord's sound sleep in the ship. Mark's account is very full here. The Lord after a strenuous period of service said to His disciples, "Let us pass over unto the other side. And when they (not He) had sent the multitude away, they took Him even as He was in the ship". Oh, wondrous weakness, oh, mighty condescension. "He saved others, Himself He could not save."

No miracle did the Lord work throughout His course to spare Himself. Thus it was that being wearied He was fast asleep on a pillow, while the storm began to swamp the ship. The result of the stilling of the storm upon the disciples was to make them exclaim, "What manner of man is this, that even the winds and the sea obey Him".

We do not feel it would be profitable to enter into a detailed discussion concerning the question as to whether this miracle is different from that recorded in Mark iv. and Luke viii. The only gospel narrative that claims to have set out the events "in order" is that written by Luke. The other writers use what events serve their purpose without of necessity pledging that the sequence is always historical. Such a statement, however, as that this miracle of Matt. viii. was before the calling of the twelve: and that the other was after that event is misleading. By the calling of the twelve in Matthew we can only suppose Matt. x. to be meant. Now Matt. x. speaks of that time when the Lord called unto Him His twelve disciples to give them power over unclean spirits, and sent them forth to preach. This is exactly parallel with the record in Mark vi. 7-13 & Luke ix. 1-6, and all three passages come after the miracle of the stilling of the tempest.

The references in Mark iii. 13-19 and Luke vi. 13-16 refer to a prior nomination, and this is moreover suggested in Matt. x. 2, "Now these are the names." Not that this passage (Matt. x.) is to be taken as the same as Mark iii. Matthew does not record the parallel for this earlier call. Then again the storm is followed in Matt. viii. by the healing of two possessed of demons. They cry, "What have we to do with Thee, Jesus, thou Son of God? Art Thou come hither to torment us before the time?" Then follows the remarkable request that they should be permitted to enter the herd of swine, which rush into the sea and perish. The result was that the people besought Him to depart from their coast. The same thing happens immediately after the miracle of the tempest in Mark iv. Matthew calls the place, "the country of the Gergesenes", Mark "the country of the Gadarenes", while Luke adds, "which was over against Galilee", but this is explanation not contradiction. It seems more difficult to believe that on two separate occasions, within a short while of each other, there arose two storms, that the disciples in both cases was asleep, that He rebuked their little faith, that on both occasions they express their astonishment, using similar words, and that the two separate miracles on the sea were each followed by the healing of the demon-possessed, the demons confessing Christ, and referring to their torment, and in each case asking to be permitted to enter a herd of swine, which were killed in the sea. If the slight differences in the narratives are to be taken as signs that a different event is being recorded, then we shall have to make three separate miracles, for the reader can easily find differences between the two narratives of Mark and Luke.

Let us not miss the point of these great powers and signs. The Lord was demonstrating His Messiahship. The world of the physical, the elemental, and the spirit were beneath His control. At a touch leprosy vanishes. At a word sickness departs. At a rebuke the storm subsides. At the word "go" the demons enter the herd of swine. A yet fuller and deeper power is exhibited in the next miracle which closes another series; His power over sin. What is it to us if He can heal the body and cannot heal the deadly wound of sin?

Christ is no mere wonder-worker, but God's appointed Saviour, Whose redemption shall make universal what was the peculiar possession of the few. These miracles were "powers of the world to come". Christ will reign not only in the world of sense, but also of spirit, all things in heaven and earth, yea and under the earth, will own His sway. All this is set forth in these wondrous works. So it was that when they brought to the Lord the sick of the palsy He took the opportunity of declaring His greater power.

Mark places this miracle before the miracles of the storm and of the swine (Mark ii.), nevertheless it is one and the same event. Luke's order is equally very different from either Matthew or Mark; nevertheless one miracle is thereby intended.

The healing of the palsied man and the forgiving of his sins very much resemble the opening miracle of Peter's pentecostal ministry, and his application of it to the salvation of the nation (Acts iii.; iv. 1-12). While the faith of the palsied man is presumed, this miracle is another instance of the efficacy of the faith of others on behalf of the sufferers. There is no indication that the centurion's servant exercised faith, neither is there that the Syro-phænician woman's daughter believed.

Knowing what we do of the Person and Work of Christ, the fact that He should say, "Son, Be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee", does not strike us as it did those who heard the words actually uttered. The Scribes immediately said, "This man blasphemeth". Mark ii. 7 records that they said, "Why doth this man thus speak blasphemies? Who can forgive sins but God only?" Luke tells us that the Scribes and Pharisees were present and began to reason in their hearts. Thus the little differences need no solving, the miracle is one.

The Lord does not hesitate to call their thoughts "evil". This of itself testifies to the abundant proofs He had already given that He was the sent One of God. Nicodemus, Pharisee, member of the Sanhedrim, "the teacher" of Israel, bore witness that such was the case: "Rabbi we know that Thou art a teacher come from God; for no man can do these miracles that Thou doest except God be with him". For a man uncommissioned to stand up and say, "Thy sins be forgiven thee", would be indeed "blasphemy". The question does not touch the Person of Christ in His official capacity. As the sent One He had power on earth to forgive sins, and the signs and wonders were His credentials. He will however demonstrate His commission and authority yet once more. The reasoning of the Lord is invincible. It is certainly easier to SAY, "Thy sins be forgiven thee", than to SAY, "Arise and walk", for while none can test the fulfillment or otherwise of the first statement, all can witness the second. There are many to-day who pronounce the forgiveness of sins and wield a tremendous power over the ignorant and the superstitious, who could not abide this challenge. So the Lord of glory stooped again in long-suffering gentleness:--

> "But that ye may know that the Son of man hath authority on earth to forgive sins (then saith He to the sick of the palsy), 'Arise, take up thy bed, and go unto thine house.' And he arose, and departed to his house."

The result according to Matthew was, "When the multitude saw it they marveled, and glorified God, which had given such authority unto men". Mark says, "they were all amazed, and glorified God, saying, We never saw it on this fashion". Luke's record is, "They were all amazed and they glorified God, and were filled with fear, saying, We have seen strange things to-day".

Each Gospel records the calling of Matthew, immediately after this miracle. Each records that at the feast that followed the Lord said, "They that be whole need not a physician but they that are sick, for I am not come to call the righteous but sinners to repentance". Thus, as in the miracle, the physical shadows forth the spiritual.

No.4. The Third Group.
The Culmination of Israel's Rejection (Matt. ix.).
pp. 45 - 50

This group contains four miracles. Two are wrought upon women and two upon men.

The domain of ceremonial LAW had been entered when the Saviour, in spite of the law of Moses, touched the leper. National exclusiveness had received a shock when the Gentile Centurion's prayer was heard, and his faith recognized as greater than any exhibited in Israel. The unnatural despising of woman in the estimation of the orthodox Jew received a rebuff when the Lord deigned unasked to cure Peter's wife's mother.

The domain of SIN was entered and spirit forces compelled to recognize their Master in the second set.

The third series brings the Lord face to face with DEATH. A ruler comes and worshipping Him says, "My daughter is even now dead, but come and lay Thy hand upon her, and she shall live". What a stupendous request! yet see how naturally the Lord receives it. "And Jesus arose and followed him, and so did His disciples." He even allows Himself to be intercepted on the way to heal another sufferer. The woman who had an issue of blood for twelve years (Israel's number coming out again), is another example of Israel's condition. Her complaint would render her unfit to attend the house of God. It was recognized by tradition as a sufficient ground for divorce, it placed her outside the pale of society generally. She was in effect in much the same position as the leper. Yet she dared to contemplate touching the fringe of the Saviour's garment! Something must have told her that no defilement could adhere to Him. Had He not touched lepers? Was He not even now going by request to touch the very dead? How closely He came to the suffering world! How wonderful beyond thought that He, the holy, harmless, undefiled and separate from sinners, could so mingle with them as to appear in the eyes of the unsanctified as a friend of publicans and sinners, in a sense lower than the Scriptural one! There is often more of the unsympathetic Pharisee about our ideas and practice of "separation" than that of the Lord Jesus Christ, the true Holy One of God.

Faith appears in some miracles very prominently, in others it is not mentioned. The faith of the Centurion called forth the words of Christ, "Verily, I say unto you, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel". There does not appear any room for faith in the case of Peter's wife's mother. It was evidently possessed by the leper, for his "if" was merely a question of "will", not of "can".

The mention of "faith" in the storm is one of rebuke—"O ye of little faith". Faith does not figure in the miracle of the two demon-possessed. The faith which is expressly mentioned in the account of the healing and forgiving of the man sick of the palsy is the faith of those who brought him (ix. 2). To the woman whose issue of blood was healed the Lord said, “Thy faith hath made thee whole”. No one can question the faith of the ruler, but the word does not appear. In the next miracle, that of the blind men, faith is prominent, and the cure was conditional upon it.

The references to faith in this Gospel are subject to a definite arrangement, and as some of the passages are directly concerned with the miracles, we will give the order for the sake of future study, Faith.

A | viii. 10. Great faith; outside Israel. Man for servant.
B | ix. 2. Their faith. Led to forgiveness.
C | ix. 22. Thy faith. Exeranthe (dried up), Mark v. 29.
D | ix. 29. According to faith. Eyes of blind opened.
HERE COMES REJECTION (xii., xiii.).
A | xv. 28. Great faith; outside Israel. Woman for daughter.
B | xvii. 20. As mustard seed. Luke xvii. 6 links with forgiveness.
C | xxi. 21. Remove mountains. Exeranthe (withered), verse 20.
D | xxiii. 23, 24. Pharisees omit faith. Blind guides.

There is a lesson in all this. It is surely intentional that the two first occasions on which faith is mentioned concern Gentiles seeking the blessing for others, in one case so markedly as to cause the Lord to marvel, and in both cases to remark upon the greatness of the faith exhibited. Yet the Lord would not deny the faith that was as small even as a grain of mustard seed. His final charge against the blind guides of Israel, who were leading them quickly into the ditch of rejection and unrepentance, was that they omitted among other weighty matters, “faith”. The faith even of others was blessed by the Lord, how much more the faith of the individual! And so the last miracle that speaks of faith, before the crisis (Matt. xii.), makes healing conditional upon faith.

Two blind men address the Lord by His kingdom (the true dispensational) title, the title which Israel should have recognized and believed, “Thou Son of David, have mercy on us”. Seven times in Matthew’s Gospel is the Lord addressed as Son of David, this being the first occasion. Here at last comes the confession that in their midst stands Israel’s long-promised King. Would the eyes of this nation be opened to see Him? or would He have to say that the words of the prophet were fulfilled, “their eyes they have closed”. Therefore, not for the individual’s sake, but because of the typical value of all the miracles, the Lord replies:-- > “Believe ye that I am able to do this? They said unto Him, Yea, Lord. Then touched He their eyes, saying, According to your faith be it unto you.”

This is what might have happened nationally, but faith was absent. The persistent unbelief brought the evidences of the Messiah’s presence to an end (Matt. xiii. 58). Therefore it was that the Lord straitly charged the two blind men, “See that no man know it”.

The last miracle of the series makes the rulers of Israel speak out their antagonism. A demon-possessed man, rendered by his possession dumb, is cured, and the multitudes marvel saying, "It was never so seen in Israel". Then comes the Pharisees' blasphemy against the Holy Spirit. Look at chapter xii. 22-32. The healing of another demoniac caused the people to say, "Is not this the Son of David?" Again the Pharisees immediately counteract the impression by saying, "This fellow doth not cast out demons but by Beelzebub, the prince of the demons". The Lord in reply, after showing the folly of their argument says:--

> "But if I cast out by the Spirit of God, then the Kingdom of God is come unto you . . . Wherefore I say unto you . . . the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit shall not be forgiven unto men, . . . neither in this age of the one about to be."

Herein is the supreme responsibility of the rejection of God's evidences, a subject that comes again prominently forward in the Gospel of John.

We retrace our steps a little to observe the gathering opposition and the development of events, the healing of the man with the withered hand. The word here for "withered" is akin to that used of the fig-tree that withered. Christ stood ready to heal their barrenness and withered unfruitfulness, and they chose the dust-dry pettiness of Sabbath-day observances, even contemplating the murder of the very Lord of the Sabbath. In the previous cases, when others interpose, it has been for the purpose of obtaining blessing for the sufferer. Here, the man with the withered hand is brought forward, not for any love for him or sympathy with his affliction, but that he may prove a bait to catch the Lord of life and glory.

The Rabbis had taught that there was "no Sabbatism in the Temple". The Lord could have appealed to this, but He preferred to take a simpler and wider view, and asked, in fact, whether a man was not of more value than a sheep. That which God had given as a "delight", they in their withered barrenness made the symbol of all that was exclusive, narrow and formal. The way in which their leaders had fenced the observation of the Sabbath with the most minute and ridiculous restrictions blinded them to the spiritual significance of the day. We shall find that much of the opposition of the Pharisees was related to the Lord's attitude to their conception of the Sabbath. This we must deal with separately, as space will not suffice here and now.

The Pharisees now take counsel against the Lord as to how they might destroy Him. What perversity is this! His every act had left behind Him mercy, peace, health, thankfulness, life from the dead, sight for the blind, yea, the forgiveness of sins—yet they hated Him, these scrupulous Sabbath-keepers.

Then follows the quotation which at last speaks of the Gentiles. With this quotation, Isa. xlix. 3-7 should be read. There the close connection between Israel's rejection of the Lord, and the blessing of the Gentiles is seen. One of His titles there is, "Him whom the nation abhorreth"! We have already looked at the closing miracle. The last words indicate the possibility that Israel may receive the Lord as the Son of David. Here the Pharisees interpose their blasphemous statement, and Israel sinks into unrepentance and blindness.

The miracles keep pace with the theme. Each Gospel writer chooses or rejects in accordance with the special object of his narrative, and this is by far the most important aspect in which to view the miracles. They can be considered in a detached and undispensational manner safely afterwards, but that is not our present purpose.

(Miracles10, pp.105-109).

No.5. The Miracles of the Rejection (Matt. xiii. - xxi.).
pp. 97 - 100

We have traced the ever deepening character of the evidences given to the Messiah by the miracles which are recorded. Things physical and temporal, things spiritual and eternal, come within their scope. We notice the cumulative character of the effect produced:--

> "His fame went throughout All Syria . . . . . and there followed Him great multitudes of people from Galilee, and from Decapolis, and from Jerusalem and from Judea, and from beyond Jordan" (Matt. iv. 24, 25).

The emphasis here is mainly on the geographical extent of the evidence. It included practically all the land then occupied by the people of Israel.

The disciples themselves are the next to exhibit their impressions, marveling and saying, "What manner of man is this, that even the winds and the sea obey Him!" When the multitude witnessed the miracle of the healing of the sick of the palsy, "they marveled, and glorified God, which had given such power unto men". As a result of His raising the ruler's daughter from the dead, "the fame thereof went abroad unto all that land". The blind men who were healed disobeyed the Lord's injunction of silence and as a result the fame of the Lord was spread abroad in all that country. When the dumb man possessed with a demon was cured, the multitudes marveled, saying, "It was never so seen in Israel".

Then follows the commission of the twelve (chapter x.) who received from the Lord power over unclean spirits, and to heal all manner of sickness and disease. Their power was very full: "Heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out demons". Their testimony was widespread. John in prison heard of the works of Christ and was confirmed in the belief that these were indeed His evidences (xi. 1-6).

After the healing of the blind and dumb demoniac, "the people were amazed, and said, Is not this the Son of David?" This in the eyes of the Pharisees was a perilous question, so that they reiterated their blasphemy that the Christ of God was in league with Satan.

We first of all find it touched upon in ix. 34, "The Pharisees said, He casteth out demons by the prince of demons"; and no comment is passed. In xii. 24 we discover it to have gathered strength, and then the Lord exposes their thoughts and brings to bear upon them the fact that the kingdom of God had come unto them. Will it be believed that after all the signs and wonders which the Lord had given, miracles for which He had become famous throughout the length and breadth of the land, these insolent rulers of this age have the temerity to say, "Master we would SEE A SIGN from thee" (xii. 38)? The Lord's answer indicates that the time for showing signs is passed. The next great sign shall be that of His resurrection.

We shall observe the same order in the Gospel of John. Seven out of the eight signs come in the first half of the Gospel. Then comes chapters xiii.-xvii., where the Lord is with His own, and the eighth and concluding sign is that which follows His resurrection.

The parables of the mysteries of the kingdom (Matt. xiii.) follow the Lord's rejection, and the miracles that follow are a complete set by themselves. The first reference to miracles after the great rejection (chapters xii. and xiii.) is of a negative character: "He did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief" (xiii. 58).

We will look at the whole series however before we consider any in detail:--

The Miracles after the rejection.

A1 | xiii. 58. Not many because of unbelief.
B1 | Seven miracles. |
| C | a | xiv. 14. Many healed.
| b | xiv. 15-21. 5,000 fed.
| D | xiv. 22, 23. The Sea.
| E | xiv. 36. Perfectly whole.
| D | xv. 21-28. The woman of Canaan.
| C | a | xv. 29, 30. Many healed.
| b | xv. 31-39. 4,000 fed.
A2 | xvi. 1-4. The demand for a sign refused.--
No sign but that of the prophet Jonah.
B2 | Seven miracles. |
| F | xvii. 14-21. Lunatic. Faith remove mountains.
| G | xvii. 27. Tribute. Kingdom not yet come.
| (xix. 2. Multitudes healed).
| H | xx. 30. Blind. Son of David.
| H | xxi. 1. Colt. Thy King cometh.
| G | xxi. 14. Blind and Lame. Son of David.
| F | xxi. 19. Fig tree withered. Faith to remove mountains.
A3 | xxvii. 42-44. Demand for evidential miracle refused.
B3 | xxvii. 52 - xxviii. 8. THE SIGN OF JONAH.

The first set of seven miracles does not partake so much of the character of signs as of miracles of compassion. He went about doing good. "And Jesus . . . . . was moved with compassion" (xiv. 14). The feeding of the 5,000 resembles the feeding of the 4,000, and there again the Lord says, "I have compassion on the multitude".

The second series of seven begins to foreshadow the development of events. Immediately after the glory of the transfiguration the Lord deals with a difficult case of demon possession and makes reference to a faith capable of removing mountains. Then follows the miracle of the tribute money and its question:--

> "Of whom do the Kings of the earth take custom or tribute? of their own children, or strangers? Peter saith unto Him, Of strangers. Jesus saith unto him, Then are the children free. Notwithstanding, lest we should offend them, go thou to the sea, and cast an hook, and take up the fish that first cometh up; and when thou hast opened its mouth, thou shalt find a piece of money, that take and give unto them for Me and thee."

Has the reader observed one great difference between the miracles performed before the twelfth chapter and those after it? In the case of those that are detailed in the first half of Matthew Christ works them entirely alone. A change comes with this new series.

The disciples are the ones first addressed with regard to the feeding of the 5,000. "Jesus said unto them, They need not depart, give ye them to eat." While the disciples were utterly unable to comply with the task they have an ample share in its outworking. Peter evidently began to realize that the working of miracles in conjunction with the Lord was now expected, for he asks the Lord to bid him come to Him upon the water!

The repetition of the feeding of the 5,000 by the feeding of the 4,000 seemed intentional, but the disciples did not at the time appear to grasp the Lord's purpose. The Lord rebukes both lack of memory and lack of faith as to these two miracles (xvi. 5-12). He rebukes the lack of faith again when the disciples confessed their inability to cast out the demon (xvii.), and reminds them that prayer and fasting were essentials. Peter shares, however humbly, in the miracle of the tribute money; the disciples take a part in the miracle of the colt, and when the disciples marveled at the withering of the fig tree, they are again reminded of the faith which removes mountains. There is a reason for this, "Greater works than these shall ye do, because I go to My Father", said the Lord, and Mark xvi. closes with the words, "The Lord working with them, confirming the Word with signs following". These are therefore all indications of the coming dispensation of Pentecost. All was now awaiting that sign of all signs, the sign of the prophet Jonah.

The references to the coming of the King, and the hosannas to the Son of David, again indicate how near the common people were to accepting the Lord as their Messiah. What a shocking charge lies at the door of their spiritual rulers, who instructed them to choose Barabbas instead of Christ! How soon will this piece of history be repeated on a grander scale? The spiritist activity and world wide conditions seem to indicate that the Lord is near.

There are two miracles which we reserve for more detailed consideration owing to their bearing upon the dispensational outlook, namely, that of the woman of Canaan, and that of the withered fig tree. These we hope to deal with in our next article.

(Miracles10, pp.139-142).

No.6. Two Miracles of Dispensational Importance (Matt. xv. 21 - 28, and xxi. 19).
pp. 135 - 138

(1) The Syrophenician Woman (Matt. xv. 21 - 28).

All the miracles, as do all the parables, have a definite dispensational character, but the two we select in this article have that character in a very prominent way. The first of the two take place near the close of the Lord's ministry as the Son of David, the second near the close of His ministry as the Son of Abraham. Soon after working the first miracle the Lord began to speak of His approaching death, while soon after the second He was led away to be crucified. A simple outline of the miracle of Matt. xv. 21-28 is as follows:--

A1 | Have mercy, O Lord, Thou Son of David.
  B1 | But He answered; not a word.
A2 | Send her away for she crieth after us.
  B2 | But He answered; not sent but to lost sheep of Israel.
A3 | Lord, help me.
  B3 | But He answered; not take children's bread and cast to dogs.
A4 | True Lord, yet the dogs eat of the crumbs.
  B4 | Then Jesus answered, O woman, great is thy faith.

The woman was of Canaan, a Gentile, a Syrophenician by nature (Mark vii. 26), and she approached the Lord, calling Him by His title, "Son of David". Now as Son of David He came to be King, "King of the Jews" (Matt. ii. 2; xxvii. 37, 42). This sovereignty was primarily of an exclusive character. The promise to David regarding his throne will be fulfilled in Christ, and in its primary interpretation it has no place for any nation but Israel. When the earthly kingdom is established and that King is reigning, then world-wide blessing will result. So it was that the Saviour, Who so often was moved with compassion as He contemplated fallen and suffering man, "answered her not a word".

His reply to the disciples' request reveals the reason of this strange silence, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel". These words, to weak faith, would have sounded as the death knell of hope. The woman however penetrated the reply and learned its lesson. As Son of David He could do nothing for her; she must therefore drop that title and approach Him simply as Lord; she had no right in Him as Son of David such as Israel had. "Then came she and worshipped Him, saying, Lord, help me." This request draws from the Lord a personal answer, but what will He say? Will He grant her request? "He answered and said, It is not meet to take the children's bread, and cast it to kunaria (little dogs)." At first sight this answer seems as forbidding as the former one.

Israel were the lost SHEEP, what had He, their shepherd, to do with DOGS? Israel were the children of the house; surely it was not right to take the children's bread and cast it to dogs? The faith of this woman enabled her to believe that what He spoke to her was absolute truth, and she seized upon the word He had used for dogs. As the reader will know, the dog is a term of reproach throughout the east, and is a symbol of all that is depraved, forsaken and cast out, e.g., "without are dogs". The Lord in His reply said "little dogs", or, as we say, puppies. The rule regarding the dog has an exception in the case of the little puppy; children in the east, like children in the west, like to pet and fondle the little puppies and for a short time they are allowed inside the house. "Truth, Lord", replies the woman, "yet the puppies eat of the crumbs which fall from their master's table". She knew that the exclusiveness of the Lord's ministry to Israel was not for any mean or narrow reason, a saved Israel will be saved not for their own sake, but that all families of the earth may be blessed in them.

The twofold aspect of this phase of God's dealings is emphasized in Rom. xv. 8, 9, "Now I say that Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God to confirm the promises made unto the fathers"—this is an exclusive ministry to Israel with reference to promises made in the past—"and that the Gentiles might glorify God for His mercy"—this follows as the designed sequence. So it was that the woman sought the crumbs. She gave Israel their rightful place, they were the Masters (the very same word twice rendered "Lord"). She was but a little dog, they sat at the table, she could only expect the crumbs. As soon as this was recognized, blessing came. How vital to this woman's case a correct appreciation of dispensational truth! How many to-day are perplexed because the Lord answers not a word, simply because they are asking amiss! The miracle clearly shows us what was the relationship between Israel and the nations at the time of the Lord's earthly ministry. In Rom. xi. the figure changes to that of wild olive branches grafted into the true olive. In Eph. ii. it further changes to the creation of one new man. Which shall we believe, the Scriptures, or those who speak against "dispensational" truth?

(2) The Barren Fig Tree (Matt. xxi. 19).

The second miracle has also a dispensational character. Here is a symbol of Israel as a nation, the fig tree. The fig, the vine and the olive represent Israel in various capacities:--

> "And when He saw one single fig tree by the way, He came to it, and found nothing thereon, but LEAVES ONLY, and said unto it, Let no fruit grow on thee henceforth for ever, and immediately the fig tree was withered."

In the prophecy of Luke the Lord separates the fig tree from all others—"Behold the fig tree, and all the trees," (Luke xxi. 29-31). The sign of the Lord's return is found in the budding of the nation and all the nations; a day is coming when "Israel shall blossom and bud and fill the earth with fruit" (Isa. xxvii. 6). At the time, however, when the miracle was performed, the Lord found "leaves only". The crowd had spread their garments in the road, had cut down branches from the trees and scattered them on the road, they had shouted saying, "Hosannah to the Son of David"; but it was "leaves only".

The same crowd within a few days were prevailed upon to cry, “Away with Him, crucify Him”. The Lord had foretold this (Matt. xiii. 5, 6):--

> “Some fell upon stony places where they had not much earth, and forthwith they sprung up, because they had no deepness of earth: and when the sun was up they were scorched, and because they had no root, they withered away.”

The Hosannahs were leaves only; the fruit depends upon root. The scorching sun indicates persecution:--

> “He that received the seed in stony places, the same is he that heareth the word, and anon with joy receiveth it, yet hath he not root in himself, but endureth for a while, for when tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the word, immediately he is offended” (Matt. xiii. 20, 21).

The fig tree and those hearers on stony ground withered. Such was the parable of Israel: they began to cumber the earth; soon the word would go forth, “cut it down”. Israel will bring forth no fruit until the age (translated “for ever”).

It is deeply suggestive to us all to note the fact that the only miracle of judgment which the Lord performed was upon a tree. Never did He work such upon a human being. The only other occasion where anything resembling a judgment might be found is the case of the swine which were choked. Yet here it was the swine, not the men, who were drowned.

Thus these two miracles taken together speak of the blessing going out to the Gentiles, and of the cutting off, for the time being, of an unfruitful people. In this case there are lessons for all to learn, lessons not rendered the less pointed by seeing them in their true dispensational perspective.

Reflections on ISAIAH.

(Fundamentals34)
ISAIAH.
#27. Isaiah xlii. 12 - xlv. 15.
Restoration Promised, Conditioned, Foreshadowed.

The late Mr. Welch had a series of studies running up to Volume XXXV of The Berean Expositor under the general heading of Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth. For some reason the final nine (middle nine rather!) on Isaiah were mislaid. These have now come to light and we felt our readers would still enjoy having them reproduced here. Mr. Fred Leigh of Preston, one of our proof readers made the following comment: "I am now able to return the Parts 1-9 of the Studies on Isaiah by Charles H. Welch . . . . . I feel sure that many older members particularly will welcome this series, and of course in future, libraries of volumes of The Berean Expositor will be passed on to younger generations (such as I am hoping mine will be) and they will be glad of the complete studies on Isaiah. I was particularly struck by the skill with which C.H.W. was able to discover 'structure' in the midst of so much details between chapters xl. and lii. He was a remarkable man, to whom we all owe a great deal".

ISAIAH.
#27. Isaiah xlii. 12 - xlv. 15.
Restoration Promised, Conditioned, Foreshadowed.
Restoration Promised (xlii. 18 - xliii. 9).

My Witness (=) Restoration Promised, Condition, Foreshadowed.
Cyrus, the shadow of the Great Restorer (=) Restoration Foreshadowed.

One further witness is to be brought forward before this great section closes; the prophecy concerning Cyrus. Cyrus is presented in a twofold aspect:

(1) As the Persian king, who was moved to make the proclamation that led to the rebuilding of Jerusalem and who encompassed the overthrow of the city of Babylon, as predicted.

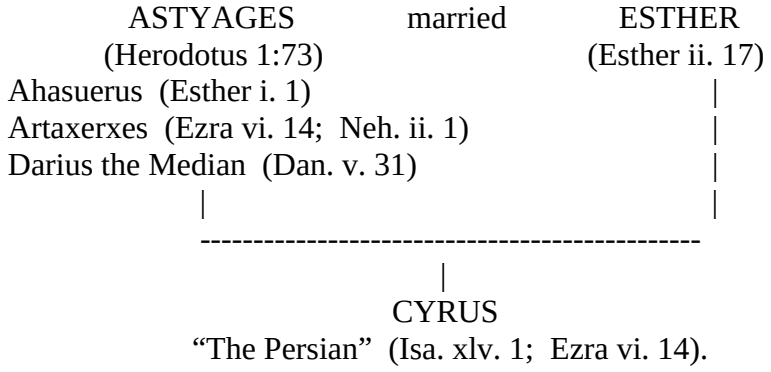
(2) As foreshadowing the Messiah, Who shall accomplish in fulness, what Cyrus accomplished only in measure. This we may see in the very titles given to this great king. He is called "My Shepherd' (Isa. xliv. 28); and "His anointed" (Isa. xlv. 1). There is moreover a parallel between the words used of Cyrus and those of the Messiah, as for example:

"Whose right hand I have holden" (Isa. xlv. 1).
"I the Lord . . . . . will hold Thine hand" (Isa. xlii. 6).
"I will go before thee, and make the crooked places straight" (Isa. xlv. 2).
"The crooked shall be made straight" (Isa. xl. 4).

Cyrus is called 'the anointed' in the same way that the Medes are called 'My sanctified ones' in Isa. xiii. 3. Personal holiness is not predicated of the Medes, nor was Cyrus the 'Messiah', but they were set apart for the work that God had determined they should do. The Scriptures speak of Cyrus by name 22 times, and the books wherein these references occur, are II Chronicles; Ezra; Isaiah and Daniel. External testimony to the person and work of Cyrus is threefold. We have the testimony of Josephus; the cuneiform inscriptions; and the writings of Herodotus, Xenophon and Ctesias. The testimony of Josephus is valuable. Here is a short extract from the eleventh book of Antiquities:

> "In the first year of the reign of Cyrus, which was the seventieth from the day that our people were removed out of their own land into Babylon . . . . . stirred up the mind of Cyrus, and made him write throughout all Asia . . . . . This was known to Cyrus by his reading of the book which Isaiah left behind him of his properties . . . . . This was foretold by Isaiah 140 years before the temple was demolished" (Antiquities Bk. 11, Ch. 1).

The testimony of the inscriptions brings to light the genealogy of Cyrus, the foreknowledge and provision of God, and the character of the man that Isaiah prophesied would be the Lord's "Shepherd" and "Anointed". The combined evidence of the cuneiform inscriptions and the history of Herodotus is set out in The Companion Bible, appendix 57 at great length. The following short extract focuses our attention on one feature of supreme interest:



No proof is offered here that Ahasuerus, Artaxerxes and Darius the Median are titles of one and the same person. The interested reader must consult Records of the Past for himself, or failing that he should give very careful attention to appendix 57 of The Companion Bible which sets out the genealogy of the Persian kings. If Esther was the mother of Cyrus, we can see the hand of the Lord preparing a deliverer for His people and we can see how timely this prophecy comes in the book of Isaiah, giving a pledge and a foretaste of that fuller restoration which should be accomplished by the true "Shepherd" and the true "Anointed" Who was to come.

The edict of Cyrus is recorded in the book of Ezra:

> "Thus saith Cyrus king of Persia. The Lord God of heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth; and He hath charged me to build Him an house at Jerusalem, which is in Judah" (Ezra i. 2).

Dr. Samuel Davidson criticizes this record, and speaks of the edict as "A Judaizing paraphrase of the original". Instead of this being damaging evidence, it is in reality a very wonderful confirmation, for Prof. Sayce says:

> "In Reading the words of Cyrus, we are irresistibly reminded of the language in which the Books of Samuel describe the rejection of Saul and the selection of David in his place."

But not only so:

> "It is a fact the most Hebraic of all the cuneiform texts known to us . . . . . Even the vocabulary of the inscription is not altogether free from what we may term a Hebraism. There we find malka, the Hebrew melech, used in the sense of 'king' in place of sarru, the Hebrew sar. Everywhere else in cuneiform literature sarru is 'king', malka the subordinate 'prince'. It is only here that the Hebrew usage is followed, according to which melech was the 'king' and sar the 'prince'." (Records of the Past, Prof. Sayce).

If Esther was the mother of Cyrus, and knew the destiny that awaited her son, we may be sure that however small her influence may have been in his training, such a woman as Esther would have left some lasting impression behind.

When Isaiah described the march of Cyrus against Babylon in Isa. xxi. 1-10, he used the strange figure of a chariot drawing asses and camels. Herodotus tells of an oracle which said:

> "Be afraid when the Medes shall be commanded by a mule, and Nebuchadnezzar some time before his death foretold a disaster which none of the gods could avert, when 'A Persian mule shall come against you, who, with the help of the gods, shall bring you into bondage'."

Cyrus, the child of a Persian father and a Jewish mother fulfilled this strange figure. Let us now return to the prophecy of Isaiah and observe some of the utterances that were so closely and accurately fulfilled:

> "That saith to the deep, Be dry, and I will dry up thy rivers" (Isa. xliv. 27).

What have these words to do with Cyrus or prophecy? We learn that when Cyrus invested the city of Babylon, he, accompanied by his chief officers, rode around the walls, in the vain attempt to find some weak spot, or assailable point. It was then that Cyrus conceived the scheme, already foreshadowed by Isaiah. It meant nothing less than the deflection of the course of the river Euphrates. A great trench was dug, ostensibly for the purpose of blockade, and Herodotus comments:

> "If the besieged had either been aware of the designs of Cyrus, or had discovered his project before its actual accomplishment, they might have effected the total destruction of the troops. They had only to secure the little gates which led to the river, and to man the embankment on either side, and they might have enclosed the Persians as in a net from which they could never have escaped." (Herodotus lib. 1:191).

Xenophon records that Cyrus said:

> "My friends, the river yields to us its bed, to make for us a way into the city; let us enter it with confidence."

And so while Belshazzar and his lords were drinking wine to the gods of wood and stone, that finger was seen writing his doom 'upon the plaster of the wall', while the army of Cyrus was marching into the city:

> "One post shall run to meet another, and one messenger to meet another, to show the king of Babylon that his city is taken at one end, and that the passages are stopped" (Jeremiah li. 31, 32).

Thus, as Cyrus has recorded on the cylinder, which is in the possession of the British Museum, "Without battle and without fighting" Babylon was taken.

As our space is limited, it will assist us in obtaining a clear view of the general trend of this passage if we set out in barest outline the structure (regrettable split) as follows:

The witness of Cyrus (xliv. 28 - xlv. 14).

A1 | xliv. 28-. "My Shepherd." Type of Messiah.
B1 | xliv. -28. Jerusalem. "Thou shalt be built."
A2 | xlv. 1-. "His anointed." Type of Messiah.
B2 | xlv. -1-3-. Babylon. Overthrown.
C | xlv. -3-6. | a | The God of Israel.
b | There is none else.
D | xlv. 7-12. | I create (7) (moral).
| I create (8) (spiritual).
| I create (12) (physical).
A3 | xlv. 13-. "Raised in righteousness." Type of Messiah.
B3 | xlv. -13. Jerusalem. "He shall build My city."
C | xlv. 14. | a | God is in thee.
b | There is none else.

God is Creator in each realm, moral, spiritual and physical:

> "I form the light, and create darkness: I make peace, and create evil: I the Lord do all these things" (Isa. xlv. 7).
> "Righteousness . . . . . Salvation . . . . . I the Lord have created it" (Isa. xlv. 8).
> "I have made the earth, and created man upon it" (Isa. xlv. 12).

With this glorious, all embracive fact in view the Lord addressed Israel saying:

> "Thus saith the Lord, the Holy One of Israel, and His Maker, Ask Me of things to come concerning My sons, and concerning the work of My hands command ye Me" (Isaiah xlv. 11).

What did Vashti know of the purpose of God when she refused the command of the king? What did Mordecai know of the part that Easter would play, either in the deliverance of Israel at that time, or subsequently through the ministry of her unborn child Cyrus? What did Haman know of the purposes of the God of Israel? Yet whether the instruments intended evil or good, the Holy One of Israel accomplished His purposes. He surnamed Cyrus even though Cyrus knew Him not, He girded him, He held his hand. He overthrew Babylon itself, all to accomplish the word that He had spoken. If all this and more was not too much for the Lord to plan and achieve in bringing about the temporary restoration of Israel after the seventy years captivity, what may He not plan and accomplish, for the fulfillment of all those wondrous promises of complete and glorious restoration that shall be associated with the advent of a greater than Cyrus, and the overthrow of a Babylon greater than that lost by Belshazzar?

No.2. "Israel My Glory" (xlvi.).
pp. 26 - 32

Chapter xlv. in its closing section, gives us a glimpse of the Day of Christ when 'every knee shall bow' (Isa. xlv. 23), and the reader may remember that in the epistle to the Philippians where this passage is quoted 'things under the earth' are included—so universal is the homage that shall at length be paid. What these 'things under the earth' may include we do not know, but it is at least significant that the opening words of Isaiah xlvi. are "Bel boweth down, Nebo stoopeth" (Isa. xlvi. 1).

There have been many exposures of the utter futility and folly, to say nothing more, of the worship of idols in the chapters of Isaiah we have already studied, but till now, no specific god or idol has been mentioned by name. We are about to consider the great prophecy of Babylon's doom (Isa. xlvii.), and it is therefore fitting that the two great gods of Babylon should be mentioned in the passage before us. Bel was the national god of Babylon, and the word signifies confusion. Jeremiah appears to play upon this meaning of the word when he says "Babylon is taken, Bel is confounded" (Jer. l. 2), or as we might say "The confounder is confounded". Babylon stands for all the Satanic opposition to God and His Word which constitutes the conflict of the ages. It is Babylon that at length falls accompanied by the alleluias of the redeemed in the book of the Revelation, and with the fall of Babylon comes the glorious restoration and the millennial reign of Christ (Rev. xix. and xx.).

Bel, the great god of Babylon bows down before the mighty God of Jacob. Nebo, as the word suggests, is the prophet or interpreter of the gods, and his symbol was the planet Mercury, known to the ancients as Hermes, and giving us hermeneutics or the science of interpretation. That Nebo was greatly revered by the Babylonians can be seen by the way the name of the god entered into the names of the people. Thus we have such names as *Nebu*chadnezzar and *Nabo*nidus, etc. The worship of Baal or Bel was very closely allied to the productiveness of nature and the reader will realize that anyone intimately acquainted with the significance of these gods Bel and Nebo, would find allusions to them in Isa. xlv. where God is revealed as the Creator Who created "not in vain" (18), and Who moreover "declared from ancient time" (21) things that came to pass:

> "That frustrateth the tokens of the liars, and maketh diviners mad" (Isa. xliv. 25).

The God of Israel in all His ways is set in glorious contrast to the miserable deceptions, Bel and Nebo.

> "Bel boweth down, Nebo stoopeth."

Looking at the opening verse of Isa. xlvi. the reader cannot help agreeing that the heading adopted by Geo. Adam Smith for this chapter is very apt. He entitles it "Bearing or Borne".

"Foolish men, instead of letting God undertake for them, go to and try what their own hands and hammers can effect."

"This cleavage is permanent in humanity—between the men that are trying to carry their religion, and the men that are allowing God to carry them."

"Over against this kind of religion, which may be reduced to so many pounds avoirdupois, the prophet sees in contrast the God of Israel" (Geo. Adam Smith).

"Bel boweth down, Nebo stoopeth, their idols upon the beasts, and upon the cattle: your carriages were heavy loaden; they are a burden to the weary beast. They stoop, they bow down together; they could not deliver the burden, but themselves are gone into captivity. Hearken unto Me, O house of Jacob, and all the remnant of the house of Israel, which are borne by Me from the belly, which are carried from the womb: and even to your old age I am He; and even to hoar hairs will I carry you: I have made, and I will bear; even I will carry, and will deliver you" (Isa. xlvi. 1-4).

The reader will observe two features here. First, there is the emphasis upon dead weight—"heavy loaden", "burden", "weary beast", but the transition at verse 3 introduces in the English version a new theme, that of bringing to birth. This is only a new theme however in the translation. Anyone acquainted with the original would have already sensed the double meaning of the prophet. This underlying meaning we must attempt to make clear, but the effect will be laboured and spoiled in the explaining, it cannot strike the reader with the freshness that it does when coming upon it first of all without the interposition of the Lexicon and Concordance.

Let us examine the words used, and endeavour to approach a little toward the vantage ground of the reader of the original. "Bow down." This word is the translation of the Hebrew kara, and is used chiefly either for bowing the knee in adoration or worship, or bowing in submission to a conqueror:

"Unto Me every knee shall bow" (Isa. xlv. 23).

"At her feet he bowed, he fell, he lay down: at her feet he bowed, he fell; where he bowed, there he fell" (Judges v. 27).

There is one occurrence where this word is associated child-birth:

"And his daughter-in-law, Phinehas' wife, was with child, near to be delivered: and when she heard the tidings that the Ark of God was taken, and that her father-in-law and her husband were dead, she bowed herself and travailed; for her pains came upon her" (I Sam. iv. 19).

"Heavy loaden" (amas). This word occurs in Isaiah but twice, and provides an example of the double meaning we are endeavouring to show:

"Your carriages were heavy loaden" (Isa. xlvi. 1).

"Which are borne by Me from the belly" (Isa. xlvi. 3).

"Deliver" (malat). This word is used chiefly with the idea of being delivered from an enemy, or escaping from some threatened calamity. It is used however on one occasion in Isaiah in the sense of being delivered of a child:

"They could not deliver the burden" (Isa. xlvi. 2).

"I will carry, and will deliver you" (Isa. xlvi. 4).

"She was delivered of a man-child" (Isa. lxvi. 7).

"Carried" (nasa). This word occurs several hundred times in the O.T. Scriptures, with the meaning to bear, lift up or take away:

"Surely He hath borne our griefs . . . . . He bare the sin of many" (Isa. liii. 4 and 12).

There are however at least two occasions where this word is used in connection with child-birth:

"Which are carried from the womb" (Isa. xlvi. 3).
"Have I conceived all this people? have I begotten them, that Thou shouldest say unto me, Carry them in thy bosom, as a nursing father beareth the sucking child" (Numb. xi. 12).
"I have made, and I will bear" (Isa. xlvi. 4).

It is written of the Lord, that He shall see of the travail of His soul and shall be satisfied. He not only brings to the birth, He carries all the day long, and will finally accomplish all His pleasure. The key thought seems to be in the words:

"I have made and I will bear."

We must leave the reader to use this material while we pass on to other matters that await our investigation.

Before we quite leave this passage which opens with the bowing down of Bel and the stooping of Nebo, it may be well to remember that there are indications in other parts of Scripture of this attitude of the Lord to the gods of the nations. Let us consider two such examples.

At the Passover and the Exodus from Egypt, the Lord said:

"I will pass through the land of Egypt this night, and will smite all the firstborn in the land of Egypt, both man and beast: and against all the gods of Egypt I will execute judgment" (Exod. xii. 12).

When the Philistines took the Ark of the Lord, and put it in the house of their god, Dagon, we read:

"Behold, Dagon was fallen upon his face to the earth before the Ark of the Lord . . . . . and the head of Dagon and both the palms of his hands were cut off upon the threshold: only the stump of Dagon was left to him" (I Sam. v. 3, 4).

Such, coupled with the bowing of Bel and the stooping of Nebo set forth the overthrow at long last of every false hope and every usurpation of the Only wise God.

As we read this forty-sixth chapter of Isaiah we pass from the Almighty's ability to 'make and to bear', from birth to hoar hairs, to the extraordinary foreknowledge of this same Almighty God, manifestly in prophecy:

> "Declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times, the things that are not yet done, saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all My pleasure. Calling a ravenous bird from the east, the man that executeth My counsel from a far country: yea, I have spoken it, I will also bring it to pass; I have purposed it, I will also do it" (Isaiah xlvi. 10, 11).

The 'ravenous bird' symbolizes Cyrus. Xenophon wrote of him:

> "He had for ensign a golden eagle, stretched upon a long spear; and this even still continues to be the ensign of the Persian king" (Cyrop. 47).

The Hebrew ayet which is translated 'ravenous bird' is very probably the root of the Greek word aetoo, which is translated 'eagle' four times in the N.T.

The title given to Israel in this chapter demands our attention, it is "Israel My glory".

Without consulting the original of this passage we should have felt practically certain that the word translated 'glory' here, would be the Hebrew word kabod, which is so translated in Isaiah no less than 33 times. This guess turns out, however, to be a mistake, the Hebrew word being tipharah which is translated 7 times 'glory' in Isaiah. This word occurs many more times than this in Isaiah, and is translated 'bravery', 'comely', 'beauty', as well as 'glory'.

> "In that day shall the Lord of Hosts be for a crown of glory, and for a diadem of beauty, unto the residue of His people" (Isa. xxviii. 5).
> "I will glorify the house of My glory" (Isa. lx. 7).
> "Thy God thy glory" (Isa. lx. 19).
> "Our holy and our beautiful house" (Isa. lxiv. 11).

We meet the word first in the book of Exodus, where it is used to describe the holy garments of the High Priest (Exod. xxviii. 2), and of the priests (Exod. xxviii. 40).

> "And thou shalt make holy garments for Aaron thy brother for glory and for beauty."

Israel are not only a 'royal nation' they are a "Holy priesthood". They are to be a 'kingdom of priests' even as their Messiah is a "Priest after the order of Melchisedec", who was king of Salem and also Priest of the Most High God. Israel's restoration not only restores them as a nation, not only restores them to their land, not only restores their city, the city of the great king, Jerusalem, it also restores their temple, and constitutes them the priest-nation of the earth. Like the high priest of Zech iii. Israel will be cleansed, clothed and crowned by grace to enter, at last, upon their high and holy destiny. Let us never forget their crowning aspect of the blessed restoration which constitutes the theme of Isaiah's prophecy.

> "And they shall build the old wastes . . . . . and strangers shall stand and feed your flocks . . . . . But ye shall be named the priests of the Lord: men shall call you the ministers of our God" (Isa. lxi. 4-6).

No.3. Babylon said, I am and none else (xlvii.).
pp. 106 - 113

As the analysis of Isaiah considered as a whole was given in The Berean Expositor as far back as volume XXX, it may not be amiss to give a summary:

A | PRE-ASSYRIAN INVASION (i.-xxxv.).
a | i.-xii. THE REMNANT SHALL RETURN.
b | xiii.-xxvii. BURDENS AND BLESSINGS.
c | xxviii.-xxxv. WOES AND GLORIES.
B | ASSYRIAN INVASION AND DELIVERANCE (xxxvi.-xxxix.).
A | POST-ASSYRIAN INVASION (xl.-lxvi.).
a | xl.-xlviii. COMFORT AND CONTROVERSY.
b | xlix.-lx. LIGHT AND PEACE.
c | lxi.-lxvi. ACCEPTABLE YEAR AND DAY OF VENGEANCE.

The whole prophecy moves toward the fulfillment of the "Acceptable year of the Lord, and the day of vengeance of our God", and these two notes are struck in the two sections of Isa. xl.-xlviii. that await examination.

(1) "Babylon said, I am and none else."
This brings down upon it the vengeance of God.
(2) "His servant Jacob, redeemed."
This is the effect of the acceptable year of the Lord.

It is not without significance that the name Babylon occurs exactly thirteen times in Isaiah, a number significant of rebellion and evil, and that the city is not mentioned in the closing sections of Isa. xlix.-lx. and lxi.-lxvi.

In the same way, the reader will remember the repeated exposure and denunciation of idols and false gods that are so characteristic of Isaiah's prophecy. These two come to an end with the great section now before us.

In place of the blasphemous assumptions of Babylon and the false trust placed in idols, the closing portions of Isaiah reveal the equally abominable assumption of righteousness and the false trust in self and its works, that are after all the animating spirit of all idolatry since the fall of man.

In Isa. xiii. the fall of Babylon is anticipated:

> "And Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah" (xiii. 19).

The word ‘glory’ in the title “Israel My glory” suggests the priestly nature of Israel’s calling. This same word is found in Isa. xiii. 19, quoted above, where it is translated ‘beauty’, a further indication of the usurping character of all that Babylon stands for.

If Bel the god of Babylon ‘boweth down’ (Isa. xlvi. 1) it must follow that the worshippers of the god, must come down too. Consequently, it is in the very nature of things that Isa. xlvii. should open with parallel words:

> “Come down, and sit in the dust, O virgin daughter of Babylon.”

If in the preceding chapter there has been a repeated claim by the Lord, found in the words “I am, and there is none else”, we are not surprised to find still further evidence of Babylonian usurpation in Isa. xlvii.:

> “Thy wisdom and thy knowledge, it hath perverted thee; and thou hast said in thine heart, I am, and none else beside me” (xlvii. 10).

Yet further. The reader will remember the continuous claim by the Lord to His power of foretelling the future, and the challenge that is made with regard to this great fact in connection with the idols of the nations:

> “I am God, and there is none like Me, declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done” (Isa. xlvi. 9, 10).
>
> “Let them bring them forth, and show us what shall happen . . . . . or declare us things for to come. Shew the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are gods . . . . . Behold, ye are of nothing, and your work of nought: and abomination is he that chooseth you” (Isa. xli. 22-24).

So, in Isa. xlvii., which deals with the utter failure of Babylon and Bel that Babylon stands for, we read:

> “Stand now with thine enchantments, and with the multitude of thy sorceries, wherein thou hast laboured from thy youth; if so be thou shalt be able to profit . . . . . thou art wearied in the multitude of thy counsels. Let now the astrologers, the star gazers, the monthly prognosticators, stand up, and save thee from these things that shall come upon thee” (xlvii. 12-13).

The invasion of the Assyrian and the false corrupt teaching of Babylon constitute the dark background of this prophecy of deliverance and restoration. Let us with this preparation, consider the chapter that is before us.

The Judgment of Babylon (xlvii.).

Rotherham's translation is so suggestive of the truth underlying the language of Isaiah in this chapter that where we quote from this passage here, it will be from his version that excerpts will be made.

> "Down—and sit in the dust, O virgin,
> Daughter of Babylon.
> Sit on the ground—throneless
> Daughter of the Chaldeans;
> For thou shalt no more be called > Tender and Dainty."

Babylon is probably styled the virgin daughter because hitherto the city had not been taken by enemies previous to the capture by Cyrus. The humiliation associated with sitting in the dust is a figure with which every reader is acquainted. To take the millstone and to grind meal, is to undertake the most menial of tasks, and as none but the lowest class of women in Eastern lands ever go uncovered, or ever travel on foot, but are completely veiled from head to foot, the reference to 'putting back the locks' (or the veil) lifting up the skirt and uncovering the thigh and wading through rivers, would indicate to the Eastern mind how low this great kingdom was to fall.

> "I will take vengeance, and I will not meet thee as a man" (Isa. xlvii. 3).

Rotherham's version reads: "An avenging will I take, And will accept no son of earth."

The commentators have offered a great variety of translations of these words:

> "I will suffer no man to intercede" (Lowth).
> "I will ask no man (i.e. to avenge)" (Jarchi).
> "I will strike a league with no man" (Gesen).
> "I will spare no man" (Hend).
> "Though I should meet with no man" (Vitx).
> "I shall encounter no man" (Steir).
> "I shall not meet a man (i.e. shall be wholly desolate)" (Hahn).
> "I shall not pardon any man" (Delitzsch).
> "I will meet thee not as a man" (Mayer).
> "I will not accept or regard any man" (C. Bible).
> "I will accept (or make truce with, Heb. meet) no man" (R.V.).

This exhibition of differences reveals the intensely humbling nature of the task we undertake in The Berean Expositor.

Paga, the Hebrew translated 'meet', primarily means 'to strike upon', or as the English idiom is 'to light upon'. It may be of set purpose or by accident; it may be with violence (I Sam. xxii. 18 'fall upon'). It is found in two senses in the book of Ruth:

> "That they meet thee not in any other field" (ii. 22).
> "Intreat me not to leave thee" (i. 16).

Here, in Ruth i. 16 the word enters its secondary meaning. To assail anyone with petitions; and so in Isaiah we read:

> "He made intercessions for the transgressors" (liii. 12).
> "He wondered that there was no intercessor" (lix. 16).

Consequently Gesenius says of Isa. xlvii. 3 that it should read:

> "I will take vengeance and will not make peace with any man."

Where scholars disagree, the reader may find confirmation and certainty by considering the influence of parallel passages. Now we know that 'the day of vengeance' of our God is contrasted with 'the acceptable year' of the Lord in this same prophecy, and Isa. xlvii. 3 read in the light of such passages, suggests that the true rendering is that given in The Companion Bible or by Gesenius.

We must now pass to other subjects:

> "I had been provoked with My people,
> Had profaned Mine inheritance
> And given them unto thy hand . . . . .
> Thou showedst them no compassion,
> Upon the elder madest thou very heavy thy yoke.
> And thou saidst,
> Unto times age-biding shall I be Mistress—
> Insomuch that thou laidst not these things to thy heart, > Didst not keep in mind the issue thereof" (Isa. xlvii. 6, 7).

There is a similar statement to this in Zech i. 14, 15 where the Lord said that He was very sore displeased with the heathen, for He had been but a little displeased with Israel, but that these nations had helped forward the affliction.

In Isa. x. 5-15 the reader will find an exposition of this same principle.

The Assyrian had been the rod of God's anger, and he had been sent in judgment against Israel:

> "Howbeit he meaneth not so, neither doth his heart think so; but it is in his heart to destroy and cut off nations not a few . . . . . wherefore it shall come to pass, that when the Lord hath performed His whole work upon mount Zion and on Jerusalem, I will punish the fruit of the stout heart of the King of Assyria, and the glory of his high looks . . . . . shall the axe boast itself against him that heweth therewith?" (Isa. x. 5-15).
>
> "To their full have they come on thee spite of the mass of thine incantations, spite of the great throng of thy spells" (Isa. xlvii. 9, Rotherham).
>
> "Take thy stand I pray thee, with thy spells, and with the throng of thine incantations . . . . . Peradventure thou mayest be able to profit, peradventure thou mayest strike Me with terror" (Isa. xlvii. 12, Rotherham).

The reader will not need any comment on the above passages. "Spite . . . . . Spite", "Peradventure . . . . . Peradventure" are sufficient indications.

"Astrologers, star-gazers and monthly prognosticators" neither warned Babylon of this impending doom, nor could they save it when judgment threatened. It is a sad thing to see how much space is still devoted in the columns of certain newspapers to these self-same deceivers, who while peddling about with their pettifogging 'monthly prognostications' hopelessly fail in warning the nation concerning the developments of the great conflicts in which the world is at grips.

> "They shall wander every one to his quarter; none shall save thee" (Isa. xlvii. 15).

As it was said in Isa. xlvi. 2 "But their own soul into captivity hath departed", so here in Isa. xlvii. 14 it says, "They shall not deliver their own soul from the grasp of the flame". Worshipper and worshipped alike prove utterly futile, the Lord alone is God, there is none else like Him.

No.4. His servant Jacob, redeemed (xlviii.).
pp. 126 - 130

Comfort and controversy (Isa. xl.-xlviii.) come to an end with the destruction of Babylon (Isa. xlvii.) and the redemption of Israel (Isa. xlviii.). The great controversy however persists throughout this chapter as the most casual reading will make evident. Israel swear by the name of the Lord, and make mention of the God of Israel—they do indeed, "but not in truth, nor in righteousness" (Isa. xlviii. 1, 2).

One of the reasons given for the constant practice of prophetic foretelling, declaring 'the former things from the beginning' was to prevent Israel from saying "Mine idol hath done them, and my graven image and my molten image, hath commanded them" and moreover lest Israel should say "Behold I knew them" (Isa. xlviii. 3-7). Israel is charged with treachery (8) and it is lamented that they had not hearkened to the commandments of the Lord, for "then had thy peace been as a river" said the Lord (18), and their seed should have been as the sand, his name should not have been cut off.

Jenour's summary of the chapter is worth reading:

> "The contents of this section are addressed to the carnal Jews, with whom Jehovah expostulates for their hypocrisy and formality, verses 1, 2; declares the reason why He had made known the fate of Sennacherib's army only a short time before it was destroyed, verses 3-5; promises further revelations respecting His people, and reprove them for their rebellion and obstinate unbelief, verses 6-8; intimates that He would deliver them from captivity, yet not for their sakes, but for His own glory, verses 9-11; appeals to His prophecies concerning Cyrus, as a proof of His being the first great cause of all things, verses 12-16; addresses a pathetic apostrophe to Israel as a nation, mingled with many encouraging promises, verses 17-19; and concludes with an exhortation to His people, now supposed to be captives in Babylon to come forth and return home, verses 20-22."

The structure of this chapter must now be discovered, and it appears to be divided into two parts, the former being devoted to the refining of the people, the latter part to the redemption of the people.

Exodus from Egypt.

The charge of formalism and hypocrisy with which the chapter opens, reminds the reader of a similar charge made in the first chapter (Isa. i. 11-15).

It is not enough to ‘swear by the name of the Lord’, ‘Make mention of the God of Israel’ or call oneself ‘of the holy city’. These things are only effective and of value if done “in truth and in righteousness”.

Among the many items that ask for attention, is the strange expression found in verse 3 “I did them suddenly”. It must be confessed that the words of the poet:

> “The mills of God grind slowly
> But they grind exceeding small”, expresses the general truth concerning the ways of God. Yet, there are occasions when He has, or will act ‘suddenly’, and these occasions are usually associated with judgment.

In the preceding chapter, speaking of the judgment of Babylon, the prophet says:

> "Desolation shall come upon thee suddenly" (Isa. xlvii. 11), which words expand the threat of verse 9:

> "But these two things shall come to thee in a moment in one day."

A passage that bears upon Isa. xlviii. 3 is that found in the prophet Malachi:

> "Behold I will send My messenger . . . . . and the Lord, Whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to His temple" (Mal. iii. 1).

The 'sudden' coming is associated by Malachi with the 'refining' of Israel:

> "But who may abide the day of His coming? and who shall stand when He appeareth? for He is like a refiner's fire, and like fuller's soap: and He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver: and He shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness" (Mal. iii. 2, 3).

The reader will remember that in Isa. xlviii. we have not only a passage speaking of a 'sudden' work of the Lord, but of a refining work also:

> "Behold, I have refined thee, but not with silver; I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction" (Isa. xlviii. 10).

In chapter i., the prophet had said:

> "Thy silver is become dross . . . . . I will turn My hand upon thee, and purely purge away thy dross, and take away thy tin, and I will restore . . . . ." (Isa. i. 22-26).

The Psalmist said:

> "Thou, O God, hast proved us: Thou hast tried us, as silver is tried" (Psa. lxvi. 10).

And the prophet Zechariah says:

> "An I will bring the third part through the fire, and will refine them as silver is refined" (Zech. xiii. 9).

Israel shall be refined as silver is refined. What therefore does the prophet Isaiah mean when he says:

> "Behold, I have refined thee, but not with silver"? (Isa. xlviii. 10).

We have sufficient knowledge of the Word of God to know that there can be no contradiction or discrepancy here. The Psalmist said they had been refined as silver, the prophets declare that they shall be refined as silver. Isaiah as surely declares the same thing, for we have already quoted his words in Isa. i. 22-26. He must therefore be speaking of something else in Isa. xlviii. The Lord's anger he tells us is 'deferred'. This word translates the Hebrew arak, which means to 'lengthen' ("That thy days may be long upon the earth"); and is found in Isa. liii. 10 "He shall prolong his days". The Lord's anger was not deflected or deferred, it was attenuated, stretched out, and the idea is translated by the Greek makrothumia 'longsuffering'.

> "For My name's sake will I defer Mine anger, and for My praise will I refrain for thee, that I cut thee not off" (Isa. xlviii. 9).

These words introduce the expression "I have refined thee, but not with silver", and partly explain it.

The sufferings through which Israel had passed, had not at that point resulted in their perfect refining, that day was yet future, but the Lord had put a limit to His anger, and at the end of the period of seventy years He had raised up Cyrus and not utterly cut off Israel. In other words, the restoration that took place in the days of old was but a faint shadow of the restoration that shall take place in the Day of the Lord.

To the English ear, the phrase "but not with silver" does not make very good sense. The Hebrew participle B usually translated "in" comes to mean "with, "by" or "at" by reason of the innate sense of nearness resident in the word, and so in some instances it takes on the meaning 'like' or 'as'.

What Isaiah intends us to understand is that the refining of Israel up to that point was 'not like silver' is refined, it was a temporary return but by no means final or complete. There is to be a future refining that shall completely and for ever separate Israel to the Lord and from all evil. A movement in this direction is indicated in verse 20:

> "Go ye forth of Babylon, flee ye from the Chaldeans", this had an immediate partial fulfillment in the days of Cyrus, but will have its real fulfillment in the Day of the Lord:

> "And I heard another voice from heaven, saying, come out of her, My people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues" (Rev. xviii. 4).

So ends the first great section of the second half of Isaiah.

"Comfort ye, comfort ye My people" are the words with which it opens (Isa. xl. 1). The fall of Babylon and with the words "There is no peace, saith the Lord, unto the wicked" (Isa. xlviii. 22) are the subjects with which it is brought to a close.

We are now about to enter the second great section of this part of Isaiah, and instead of Babylon and Cyrus, or Hezekiah and Sennacherib, we are brought face to face with "The sufferings of Christ and the glories that should follow", a subject which has had the whole of the prophecy as a preparation, and without which the glorious restoration, which is its burning vision, would for ever be beyond attainment or hope.

No.5. Messiah's "light" work (xlix. 1 - 12).
pp. 147 - 152

The second great section of Isaiah which commences with chapter xl., opens with the words of comfort and restoration to Israel: "Comfort ye, comfort ye My people". John the Baptist came in partial fulfillment of this prophecy:

> "The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord" (Isaiah xl. 3; Matthew iii. 3).

Nevertheless the reader will remember that John himself confesses that though he was not Elijah, the one who was to appear before the Day of the Lord, yet the angel had announced before his birth that:

> "He shall go before Him in the spirit and power of Elijah" (Luke i. 17).

In God's good time, the 'acceptable time' of Isa. xlix., the chapter we are about to examine, Israel shall be restored, but the prophet now prepares his hearers for the terrible fact that history was to confirm; that Israel were to reject the Messiah; that instead of being gathered at His first advent, they should be for the time rejected.

It is now revealed that great as the restoration of Israel is in the prophecies of the O.T., "it is a light thing" when compared with the entire plan of the ages, for God also intends that this same Redeemer shall be a "light to lighten the Gentiles, and salvation unto the ends of the earth" (Isa. xlix. 5, 6). Chapter xlix. commences the second great subdivision of the prophecy of restoration that occupies chapters xl.-lx. Chapter xl. 1-11 we have headed "Good tidings to Zion" but chapter xlix. 1-12 we have headed "A light to lighten the Gentiles". Similarly the closing passage of the section which opens with 'good tidings to Zion', closes with "His servant Jacob, redeemed" (Isa. xlviii.), while consistently, the closing section which opens with the promise of light to the Gentiles, closes with "Gentiles come to thy light" (Isa. lx.).

The passage before us, Isa. xlix. 1-12 opens and closes on the key note: "Listen, O isles, unto Me; and hearken, ye people, from far; (the far off Gentiles)" (verse 1); "Behold, these shall come from far" (verse 12). These constitute the opening and closing members of the structure which is now given.

"A Light to lighten the Gentiles" (xlix. 1 – 12).

A | 1-. "From far." Call.
B | -1-6. "Given." A Light to Gentiles and salvation to end of earth. |
a | Called from the womb.
b | My servant.
c | Labour in vain.
a | Formed from the womb.
b | My servant.
C | 7. Abhorred by the nation (Goi). Worshipped by princes.
B | 8-11. "Given." A covenant of the people. Inherit heritages. |
a | Acceptable time.
b | Inherit.
a | Prisoner go forth.
b | Fed and led.
A | 12. "From far." Come.

We need at this point to clear a textual problem in verse 5 and the sentence:

> "Though Israel be not gathered, yet shall I be glorious in the eyes of the Lord" (A.V.).

But in the R.V. this passage reads:

> "And that Israel be gathered unto Him; (for I am honourable in the eyes of the Lord . . .)", with a note in the margin which says:

> "Another reading is 'But Israel is not gathered, yet shall I be etc.'."

In the Hebrew text the word translated "not" is l'o, but this has been marked to read lo "to Him" and this alteration is confirmed by the list of readings given in the Massorah. The Septuagint versions is evidence that the Hebrew text which these translators used read lo "to Him" and we therefore accept the evidence presented and read the passage as given in the R.V. The Companion Bible says in a note on this problem:

> "Probably both readings may be correct, for Israel was not gathered at His first coming (John i. 11), but will be at His second coming."

We give the reader the benefit of this comment, although we ourselves believe that every passage in the Scriptures can have had but one intended and exclusive meaning when written by the inspired penman, and cannot permit this elastic principle into our canon of interpretation.

We can now proceed to examine the passage as it unfolds its teaching. It is not without significance that the opening and closing members of the structure speak of those who are called and who come "from far". Isaiah when he speaks of the restoration of Israel, says "Thy sons shall come from far" (Isa. lx. 4), but here are words in these opening and closing verses of Isa. xlix. that show us that the Gentiles are here in view.

"Listen O Isles unto Me." The Hebrews used the word translated "Isles" in three senses:

(1) Dry land as opposed to water, "I will make the rivers islands" (Isa. xlii. 15).
(2) Land surrounded by water, "The isles of the sea" (Esther x. 1).
(3) All countries divided from Palestine by the sea.

This wider usage is the earliest, for we meet it in Gen. x. 5: "By these were the isles of the Gentiles divided in their lands", and in Jer. xxv. 22 where the A.V. reads "The isles which are beyond the sea", the margin reads: "region by the sea side".*

[* - The reader should be safeguarded against a specious interpretation that seizes upon the English word "isle" in order to bolster up a theory concerning Britain and Israel.]

Continuing our study, we read in verse 12:

"Behold, these shall come from far: and lo, these from the north and from the west; and these from the land of Sinim."

Sinim is probably China. Some writers have suggested that the word refers to Egypt, others to the inhabitants of Syene, but it seems improbable that the translators of the Septuagint would be ignorant of this if such were the case. Instead, we read in the Septuagint: "and others from the land of the Persians". Persia extended to the borders of India, and consequently it would be but one step more to China itself. The Arabian knew the Chinese as "Sin", and the Syrians knew them as "Tsini". It is not vital to the understanding of the prophecy, whether Sinim refers to China, Persia or any land in particular. The important point being that here is a reference to Gentiles, living in some remote parts of the earth who are to respond to the call and be gathered to the Lord. If we grasp the significance of this fact, we have grasped the key thought of this section.

If we glance at the structure given on page 148 (see above) we shall see that not only have we in the opening and closing members an emphasis upon the Gentiles, but we find that the central member uses a word which is not often applied to the nation of Israel, the Hebrew Goi. The plural Goyim is generally used of the Gentiles, and indeed is the word so translated in Isa. xlix. 6, the juxtaposition of these two references is more than suggestive:

"I will also give Thee for a Light to the Gentiles (Goyim)" (Isa. xlix. 6).
"To Him Whom the nation (Goy) abhorreth" (xlix. 7).

It is a demonstrable fact that as the people of Israel began to pass off the scene, the Gentile nations are brought nigh, a feature that forms the basis of the Apostle's argument in Rom. xi. which the reader should consult. As every reader may not be able to refer to the original or be in possession of means to verify the references, we give a selection of passages where Goy is used in Isaiah, we say a selection, for the word occurs nearly 70 times in that prophecy:

Used of Israel.
"Ah sinful nation, a people laden with iniquity" (i. 4).
"I will send him against an hypocritical nation" (x. 6).

Used of the nations.

"All nations shall flow unto it" (ii. 2).
"The nations are as a drop of a bucket" (xl. 15).
"The nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish" (lx. 12).

Used of the Gentiles.

"To it shall the Gentiles seek" (xi. 10).
"He shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles" (xlii. 1).
"Declare My glory among the Gentiles" (lxvi. 19).

These focal points in the structure prepare us for the revelation that is now made:

> "It is a light thing that Thou shouldest be My Servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel: I will also give Thee for a light to the Gentiles, that Thou mayest be My salvation unto the end of the earth" (Isa. xlix. 6).

Two phases of the Redeemer's work are brought before us in this passage and both phases are amplified as the following arrangement will make clear:

A	a	Tribes of Israel—raised up.
	b	Preserved of Israel—restored.
A	a	To the Gentiles—light.
	b	To the end of the earth—salvation.

The restoration of Israel needs no expansion or emphasis to any reader who has so far followed us through these studies, but as the reference to the Gentiles is of dispensational importance, we give that theme, as here introduced, our attention.

The blessing of the Gentiles was never a 'mystery' in the O.T. Scriptures, it was incipient in the covenant with Abraham.

> "The Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed" (Gal. iii. 8).

Early in the ministry of the Apostle Paul, he saw that the failure of Israel to repent and believe, with the blessing of the Gentile as a sequel, is implied in this prophecy of Isa. xlix.:

> "Then Paul and Barnabas waxed bold, and said, It was necessary that the Word of God should first have been spoken to you: but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles. For so hath the Lord commanded us, saying, I have set Thee to be a light of the Gentiles, that Thou shouldest be for salvation unto the ends of the earth" (Acts xiii. 46, 47).

A careful examination of the quotation of Isa. xlix. 6 in this chapter of the Acts, will reveal one or two slight departures both from the Hebrew original and from the Septuagint translation. The fact to be remembered is that Isa. xlix. does not prophecy of Barnabas or Paul, Isaiah did not say of either of these servants of the Lord "I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles". This is reserved in all its blessed fulness of Christ Himself at His second coming, but Acts xiii. has much in it of a typical character, as for example, the miraculous blinding of a Jew and the consequent conversion of a Gentile. So the widening purpose is revealed, Israel shall be restored, the far off Gentiles saved, "and all flesh shall see the salvation of our God".

No.6. Sold for nought. Redeemed without money (xlix. 13 - lii. 12).

pp. 181 - 186

This section now before us is a long one, and full of problems of interpretation, but it is an essential link between the earlier promise of 'comfort' and the glorious revelation of Him Whom alone can be His people's comfort, namely the suffering yet victorious Messiah of Isa. liii.

The second great portion of Isaiah's prophecy (Isa. xl.-xlvi.) opens with the words "Comfort ye, comfort ye My people, saith your God" (Isa. xl. 1). We then wait until we reach Isa. xlix. 13, the opening verse of our present study, before we read that word 'comfort' again. Yet further, it is on this same note that the section ends (Isa. lii. 9).

> "Sing, O heavens; and be joyful, O earth: and break forth into singing, O mountains: for the Lord hath comforted His people, and will have mercy upon His afflicted" (Isa.xlix.13).
>
> "Break forth into joy, sing together, ye waste places of Jerusalem: for the Lord hath comforted His people, he hath redeemed Jerusalem" (Isa. lii. 9).

It is fairly evident that these passages will form the corresponding members in the structure of the section, and with this commencement, we proceed. We are immediately met with such a wealth of material, that it is extremely difficult to close our eyes to the richness of detail, and pursue only the great connecting links in the theme.

As we read and re-read this section, we become conscious of another note that finds its echo in a corresponding passage:

> "Behold, for your iniquities have ye sold yourselves" (Isa. l. 1).
> "Ye have sold yourselves for nought; and ye shall be redeemed without money" (Isaiah lii. 3).

There follows in Isa. l. that majestic passage concerning the Messiah, the One Who gave His back to the smiters, and His cheeks to them that plucked off the hair, and the thrice uttered call to Israel to "hearken" (Isa. li. 1, 4, 7); and the thrice uttered call to "awake" (Isa. li. 9, 17; lii. 1). As these exhaust the remainder of this section of the prophecy, they must have some relation with one another, but at first sight that relationship is not evident. It is there however awaiting the believing and patient seeker. Before the words 'Hearken' (Heb. shamea) and 'Awake' (Heb. ur) are used of Israel, they are used of their Messiah, for in Isa. l. 4 we read:

"The Lord God hath given Me the tongue of the learned, that I should know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary: He wakeneth morning by morning, He wakeneth (Heb. ur) ear to hear (Heb. shamea) as the learned" (Isa. l. 4).

We perceive the underlying structure of this great section, and can proceed to set it forth so that it may be before us as we enter into fuller examination of details.

Isaiah xlix. 13 - lii. 12.

A | xlix. 13-26. |
a | 13. Sing.
b | 14-26. Reason. The Lord hath comforted His people.
B | l. 1-3. Sold. "For your iniquities."
C | l. 4-9. |
c | Wake. \ The Messiah.
d | Hear. /
D | l. 10, 11. The voice of His Servant.
C | li. 1 - lii. 2. |
d | Hearken. \ The Lord and
c | Awake. / His people.
B | lii. 3. Sold. "For nought."
A | lii. 9-12. |
b | Reason. The Lord hath comforted His people.

This section as we observe opens and closes with a song. "Sing, O heavens", "Sing together ye waste places of Jerusalem". The rejoicing of the heavens, as well as of the ravaged earth, are by reason of the fact that "The Lord hath comforted His people". While the call to the heavens to sing, may be explained as the figure of prosopopoeia or personation, that explanation must not be so used as to 'explain away' the truth. The fate of the earthly city Jerusalem and the fate of the earthly people Israel, is an intimate concern of 'the heavens' and they that dwell therein.

Isaiah opens his prophecy with the words "Hear, O heavens, and give ear O earth", and complains of the callous ingratitude of Israel (Isa. i. 2); an ingratitude which led to the desolation of their country (Isa. i. 7). At last however the prophet reaches the blessed opening of the new section, and cries "Comfort ye", and it is in view of this comfort that the heavens and the waste places are now called upon to sing.

Zion's Despondency. Jehovah's Promise (xlix. 14 - 26).

A | 14. Objection. Zion forsaken and forgotten.
B | 15, 16. Encouragement, "Can a woman forget . . . yet will I not".
C | 17-23. | a1 | 17. Thy sons.
b1 | 18, 19. Behold . . . as a bride.
a2 | 20, 21-. My sons.
b2 | -21. Behold . . . where had they been.
b2 | 22-. Behold . . . Gentiles . . . People.
a2 | -22. Thy sons . . . brought . . . carried.
D | 23. . . . They shall bow down . . . lick up the dust of thy feet, and thou shalt know that I am the Lord.
A | 24. Objection. Shall prey be taken from the mighty?
B | 25. Encouragement, Even captives of mighty taken away.
C | 25. | b1 | 25-. I will contend.
a1 | -25. Thy sons . . . I will save.
D | 26. They shall be drunken with their own blood. . . . All flesh shall know that I the Lord am thy Saviour and thy Redeemer, the mighty One of Jacob.

At the call to the heavens to sing and to the earth to be joyful, Zion interposes saying: "The Lord hath forsaken me, and my Lord hath forgotten me" (Isa. xlix. 14).

"Forsaken!" "Forgotten!!" Two of the saddest words in human language. Israel however 'forgot' that they as a nation had 'forsaken' the Lord, and that the desolation that had overtaken them was a direct consequence of their sin. Of this the Lord could most justly have reminded them, but He is of tender mercy, and not only refrained from censure, but graciously gave wondrous assurance.

There is no love on earth so selfless as the love of a mother for her babe. The Lord appeals to this acknowledged example in order to show the intensity of His love for Israel:

> "Can a woman forget her sucking child . . . . . yea, they may forget, yet will I not forget thee" (Isa. xlix. 15).

From the figure of a mother's love, the Lord turns to a human practice that belongs to all ages:

> "Behold I have graven thee upon the palm of My hands; thy walls are continually before Me" (Isa. xlix. 16).

There is an element of incongruity in the association of "graving" on the palms of one's hands, but if we remember that the same Hebrew word chaqaq is translated 'portray', 'note' and 'print' this sense of apparent incongruity will give place to appreciation.

> "Take thee a tile . . . . . and portray upon it the city" (Ezek. iv. 1).]
> "The images of the Chaldeans portrayed with vermillion" (Ezek. xxiii. 14).
> "Note it in a book" (Isa. xxx. 8); "Oh that they were printed in a book" (Job xix. 23).

Here, the Lord seems to say, that, just as men sometimes cause the name of someone dear to them, to be tattooed upon their skin, so He had the walls of Zion continually before His mind and in His memory.

The sweetness and blessedness of this fact is not limited to Zion or to Israel, it is a truth that illumines every phase of redeeming love, and every calling of Divine grace. Let us now examine the letters D and D in the structure previously given:

> "Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I will lift up Mine hand to the Gentiles, and set up My standard to the people . . . . . they shall bow down to thee . . . . . and lick up the dust of thy feet; and thou shalt know that I am the Lord: for they shall not be ashamed that wait for Me" (xlix. 22, 23).
>
> "I will feed them that oppress thee with their own flesh; and they shall be drunken with their own blood, as with sweet wine: and all flesh shall know that I the Lord am thy Saviour and thy Redeemer, the mighty One of Jacob" (xlix. 26).

The reader will notice the setting of this 'knowledge' of the Lord. Israel shall know, all flesh shall know, but Israel shall know as those who are redeemed. In a period of awful judgment, all flesh shall know that the Lord is Israel's Redeemer.

The words "They shall know that I am the Lord" are used in the great Redemption Book, the book of Exodus. If we will but let these passages speak to us, we shall be able the better to understand the import of the two passages that are quoted above in Isa. xlix.

The passages as they occur in Exodus are as follows:

A | "I will take you to Me for a people, and I will be to you a God:
and ye shall know that I am the Lord your God, which bringeth you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians" (vi. 7).

B | Plagues. | "The Egyptians shall know . . . when I stretch forth Mine hand upon Egypt" (vii. 5).
"In this thou shalt know . . . I will smite" (vii. 17).

C | Lord of all. | a | "None like unto the Lord" (viii. 10).
b | "In midst of the earth" (viii. 22).

And they shall know that I am the Lord your God,

Here in Exodus is a foreshadowing of what will take place on a larger scale at the time of the end. In Exodus, it was the Egyptians that were taught by the terrible plagues to acknowledge the Lord. In Isaiah it is "all flesh" that "oppresses" and that shall learn the same lesson. There in Exodus it was a typical redemption, here, in Isaiah it will be the glorious reality. The emphasis that there is "None like the Lord" found in Exodus, is echoed in the passages already studied in Isaiah. The fact that the earth is the Lord's (Exod. ix. 29) forms a part of the Seraph's worshipping testimony in Isa. vi. God intends that all men shall know, but there is an indication in the use of this expression both in Exodus and in Isaiah, that some will know the Lord as their Redeemer, whereas, some will only know the Lord as the Redeemer of His people, a knowledge that leaves them still unsaved. The subject however is not exhausted by these references or by these two sub-divisions. The knowledge of the Lord finds a big place in the N.T. both in its doctrine for the immediate present, and in its hope on the approaching future. We can but indicate the trend of these passages.

No.7. (xlix. 13 - lii. 12).
The awakened ear (l. 4 - 9).
pp. 233 - 239

It may be somewhat difficult at first to perceive the relation of the opening verses of Isa. l. with the chapter going before. If we read the passage and allow our minds to be occupied with the subject of 'divorce' to the exclusion of the object with which that question of divorce is introduced we may find it hard to believe that there is any continuity. The reader will remember that in Isa. xl., the blessed promise of restoration is met by doubt, which the Lord dispels by saying, in effect:

> Truly, all flesh is grass, but the restoration of My people is not going to be brought about by "flesh", it is the Word of the Lord that endureth for ever, and it is the promise and the Promiser, not poor frail man, that pledges the restoration of His land and people.

In the great section that is before us, namely Isa. xlix. 13 - lii. 12, we shall find the glorious promises interwoven with similar doubts that arise in the heart, as though the prospect were indeed too good to be true and that the mind is haunted by memories of its own lapse and failure.

Redemption is no sooner celebrated by a call to the heavens to 'sing' and to the earth to be 'joyful' then there is interposed the doubt:

> "But Zion said, the Lord hath forsaken me, and my Lord hath forgotten me" (xlix. 14).

This doubt is met by a question:

> "Can a woman forget her sucking child?" (Isa. xlix. 15).

Then the blessed promise of restoration is resumed:

> "Kings shall be thy nursing fathers . . . . . they shall not be ashamed that wait for Me" (Isa. xlix. 23).

The doubter says:

> "Shall the prey be taken from the mighty?" (Isa. xlix. 24), and again the Lord assures the doubting soul by saying:

> "Even the captives of the mighty shall be taken away . . . . . I will save thy children" (Isa. xlix. 25).

Then for a third time the voice of doubt is heard, this time implied in the reference to the bill of divorcement and the selling of children for debt:

> "The form in which this challenge is put, assumes that the Israelites themselves had been thinking of Jehovah's dismissal of Israel as an irrevocable divorce and a bankrupt sale into slavery" (Geo. A. Smith).

Until the student of Isaiah is acquainted in some degree with the law of Moses, the point of the reference to a bill of divorcement may be missed. In Deut. xxiv. 1-4, we find the law concerning divorcement and read:

> "When a man hath taken a wife . . . . . find no favour . . . . . then let him write her a bill of divorcement, and give it in her hand, and send her out of his house . . . . . she may go and be another man's wife. And if the latter husband hate her, and writer her a bill of divorcement, and giveth it in her hand . . . . . her former husband, which sent her away, may not take her again to be his wife . . . . .".

Here, as Geo. Adam Smith says, are the ideas of absoluteness, deliberateness and finality; -- of absoluteness, for throughout the East, power of divorce rests entirely with the husband; of deliberateness, for in order to prevent hasty divorce the Hebrew law insisted that the husband must make a bill of writing of divorce instead of only speaking dismissal; and of finality, for such a writing, in contrast to the spoken dismissal, set the divorce beyond recall.

The second figure introduced by the doubting Israelites is that of the sale of children by a father who put his children away, not as the husband put his wife away in his anger, but in his necessity, selling them to pay his debts and because he was bankrupt.

Israel had indeed been put away, but the very essence of Isaiah's prophecy is that their dismissal was not beyond recall, they shall yet be restored and comforted. Israel had indeed been sold, but they had sold themselves!

> "Behold, for your iniquities have ye sold yourselves, and for your transgressions is your mother put away" (Isa. l. 1).

It is ever the same. Man, who is a responsible agent and suffers for his own actions, flies from a guilty conscience to some fatalistic theory which he disguises under the high sounding title of “The Sovereignty of God” and credits some decree of God with the results of his own sin.

Quit a number of commentators read the words of Isa. l. 1 in the light of John i. 11, “He came to His own, and His own received Him not”, but this does not fit the context of Isa. l. well enough, neither does it give room for the testimony of a similar phrase in other parts of Isaiah in prophecy. This debated passage reads:

> “Wherefore, when I came, was there no man? when I called, was there none to answer? Is My hand shortened at all, that it cannot redeem? or have I no power to deliver?” (Isa. l. 2).

It will be observed that the argument is not concerned with whether men believed or did not believe, which is the argument of John i. 11, but whether there was any lack of power or ability on the part of the Lord.

Keeping to the second half of Isaiah, we observe that the expression ‘no man’ or ‘not a man’ occurs as follows:

A | xli. 28. Good tidings. Behold there was no man.
B | l. 2. Deliverance. No man, none to answer.
Is His arm shortened.
C | lvii. 1. Perishing. No man layeth it to heart.
B | lix. 16. Salvation. No man, no intercessor.
His arm brought salvation.
A | lxiii. 3. Vengeance. Not a man with Me.

If we but quote at length the last two references, we shall have no need to go to John i. 11 for light:

> “And He saw that there was no man, and wondered that there was no intercessor: therefore His arm brought salvation” (Isa. lix. 16).
> “I looked, and there was none to help; and I wondered that there was none to uphold: therefore Mine own arm brought salvation unto Me” (Isa. lxiii. 5).

Before entering upon the examination of the next section, a blessed anticipation of Isa. liii., in that it speaks of the suffering, yet triumphant Saviour, it will be helpful to have an outline of the general theme.

Isaiah l. 1 - lii. 3.

B | l. 1-3. Ye have sold yourselves.
C | l. 4-9. |
c | Awake. \ The Messiah.
d | Hear. /
D | l. 10, 11. The voice of His Servant.
C | li. 1 - lii. 2. |
d | Hear. \ The Lord and
c | Awake. / His people.
B | lii. 3. Ye have sold yourselves.

Such is the barest outline, but its value is in the fact that by the exclusion of detail it forces upon the attention the evident parallel between the Messiah Whose ear was awakened to hear (Isa. l. 4-9), and Israel who are called upon to hearken and to awake. The passage which deals with the Messiah is rich enough and full enough to occupy all the space available in this article, leaving Isa. li. and lii. for future consideration.

A noteworthy feature of the brief passage before us namely Isa. l. 4-9 is the fourfold repetition of the Divine title "The Lord God", Adonai Jehovah. The Companion Bible says of Adonai:

> "Adonai is the Lord in His relation to the earth; and as carrying out His purposes of blessing in the earth."
>
> "Jehovah is the same God (as Elohim the creator of all things) in covenant relation to those whom He has created (cp. II Chron. xviii. 31)."

The Lord God is deeply concerned for His people, and has a purpose of mercy and of love that involves His beloved Servant the Messiah in vicarious suffering, a subject which reaches its zenith in Isa. liii., but which finds a noble prelude in the passage before us. Israel must 'hearken' and 'awake' if they are to be saved, He, their Messiah will 'awake' and 'hear' so that He may have a word in season for the weary: "The Lord God hath given Me the tongue of the learned" (Isa. l. 4). We must remove at once the false idea created by the word 'learned'. Today such a term connotes scholarship and venerable learning, whereas the word here means, rather 'discipleship'. Isaiah has already used a word that means 'learned' it is yada sepher "to know a book" and occurs in Isa. xxix. 11, 12. Here in Isa. l. 4 the Hebrew words used is limmud which is found in the first instance in Isa. viii. 16 where it is translated 'disciples'. All God's children shall be taught (limmud) of the Lord (Isa. liv. 13) in the day of their restoration and so the Messiah adds to the 'awakening' and the 'hearing' which must also characterize them, this attitude of the 'learned'.

This 'tongue of the disciplined' is given to the Messiah that He may know how "to speak a word in season to him that is weary". There is no word in the original for 'season' in this passage. The single Hebrew word uth means 'to succour' and while the recognition of this robs us of the lovely associations of 'a word in season' it restores what is more important, a connection with a passage in the N.T.

> "For in that He Himself hath suffered being tempted, He is able to succour them that are tempted" (Heb. ii. 18).

We have in other studies noted a close connection that exists both physically and spiritually between the 'tongue' and the 'ear'. Many are dumb simply because they are deaf. When the Lord would heal the man who was dumb He removed his deafness:

> "And straightway his ears were opened and the string of his tongue was loosed, and he spake plain" (Mark vii. 35).

It has been the experience of most faithful witnesses that the opened ear and the opened mouth lead to the smitten back, the plucked hair, the shame and the spitting. Blessed be God, our Saviour Whose heart was tender, set His face 'like a flint'. He was strong in the righteousness of His cause and said:

> "He is near that justifieth Me" (Isa. l. 8).

Adversaries must wax old as a garment, but He remains:

> "Jesus Christ, the same, yesterday, and today and for ever."

Thoughts on John's Gospel

No.6. Chapter vi.
pp. 11 - 15

This chapter (vi.) starts off with the feeding of the five thousand. Arising from this, the Jews refer to the manna (verse 31) and in the chapter Christ develops this theme to say He was the true Living Bread from heaven sent by God:

> "I am the living bread which came down from heaven: if any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever: and the bread that I will give is My flesh, which I will give for the life of the world" (vi. 51).

Finally Christ links the bread with His flesh and that with His words:

> ". . . . . he that eateth Me, even he shall live by Me" (vi. 57).
> ". . . . . the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life" (vi. 63).
> "Then Simon Peter answered Him, Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life" (vi. 68).

We should remember that the words of our Lord are not only those recorded in the four Gospels and spoken by Him during His earthly life, but just as important to us, are the words He gave to Paul to record after His resurrection and ascension.

In common with other chapters of this Gospel, the Lord Jesus here glorifies His Father by stressing the part God has taken in bringing us to this source of spiritual nourishment and eternal life:

(1) Guidance of the Son by the Father.

> "When Jesus therefore perceived that they would come and take Him by force, to make Him a king, He departed again into a mountain Himself alone" (vi. 15).

Matthew adds (xiv. 23) that this was to pray. Here was a crisis, the crowd wanting to make Him a king. Our Lord seeks the guidance of His Father.

(2) The seal of God the Father on the work of His Son.

> "Labour not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life, which the Son of man shall give unto you: for Him hath God the Father sealed" (vi. 27).

A seal to us in this life is evidence that a certain person has authorized the terms of a written document. It is used twice in John's Gospel, here and in John xxxi. 32: "He that received His (Christ's) testimony hath set to his seal that God is true". Where we believe the words of Christ and accept His act of redemption recorded in the Scriptures, the Holy Spirit confirms with our spirit that God is true. This is testimony (like a seal) that all our readers, we hope, have experienced. Here in John vi. 27 the point is that God the Father will raise from the dead His Son and this will be the Father's seal (visible evidence and proof of intent) to our hope of resurrection to eternal life.

(3) The will of the Father.

> "I came down from heaven, not to do Mine own will, but the will of Him that sent Me" (vi. 38).

(4) The Father has in His control the choice of the elect. This is a disturbing statement but one we have to face:

> "No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent Me draw him" (vi. 44).
> ". . . . . therefore said I unto you, that no man can come unto Me, except it were given unto him of My Father" (vi. 65).

Consider the following:

> "But as many as received Him (Christ), to them gave He (Christ) power to become the sons (children) of God, even to them that believed on His (Christ's) name" (John i. 12).

But see how this is qualified by: ". . . . . which were born . . . . . of God". So here again God has the final control.

(5) God has a hand in our spiritual education and with that instruction we come to Christ.

> "It is written in the prophets, and they shall all be taught of God. Every man therefore that hath heard, and hath learned of the Father, cometh to Me" (vi. 45).

The prophets here can be Isa. liv. 13 and Jer. xxxi. 34, specific future occasions when God will put His word into the hearts of Israel, but it must surely extend back to contemporary and present times.

These five features indicate functions of God the Father complementary to the work of the Son. The seeming separate manifestations of the Deity present problems to some. God is Spirit and we have no conception of what He is like in essence. Christ Himself said of His Father:

> "Ye have neither heard His voice at any time, nor seen His shape" (John v. 37).

How is God going to achieve His declared purpose of being "all in all" with man (I Cor. xv. 28) when He Himself is unknowable by man? To do this He has caused Himself to be represented by terms that the human mind can understand. This is a great condescension on God's part for any human title carries with it a limitation of meaning and it limits His glory to have to apply to Himself for example the human title of 'father'.

We have here a subject too big for this article so we can only give pointers. To righteously redeem fallen man God had Himself to assume human flesh and die on the cross. To do this God provided the conception of Father and Son. Through the example of Abraham and the record of John iii. 16 God could thus in this complementary figure demonstrate His love for the world and His plan of salvation. We have seen in this chapter of John how this figure of Father and Son was carried to reality. The Lord Jesus Christ was the perfect and obedient Son to the Father throughout His ministry to the last moments on the cross, when he could say of His Father's work for Him: "It is finished".

As we look over this chapter we think of those words which occurs towards the end of this Gospel:

> ". . . . . these are written (the selected signs and words), that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through His Name" (John xx. 31).

In the chapter before us we have life and eternal life repeated again and again:

> ". . . the Bread of God . . . . . giveth life unto the world" (vi. 33).
> ". . . the Father's will . . . . . that I should raise it (the believer) up again at the last day" (39).
> ". . . every one . . . . . that believeth on Him, may have everlasting life: and I will raise him up at the last day" (40).
> ". . . I will raise him up at the last day" (44).
> ". . . he that believeth on Me has everlasting life" (47).
> ". . . if any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever" (51a)
> ". . . My flesh, which I will give for the life of the world" (51b).
> "whoso eateth My flesh, and drinketh My blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day" (54).
> ". . . he that eateth of this bread shall live for ever" (58).

Only when we extract such a feature and list the occurrences do we realize how important it is considered by the Holy Spirit. The whole work of Christ is directed to this end—that we might have eternal life. We might take serious thought to the solemn result to those who willfully refuse this most wonderful gift.

The Bible's history of Israel's response to God has many similarities to that made by mankind in general today. Consider Israel's dreadful reaction to God manifesting Himself to the representatives of that nation and His glory to all that people.

> "Then went up Moses, and Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel: and they saw the God of Israel: and there was under His feet as it were a paved work of a sapphire stone, and as it were the body of heaven in His clearness" (Exod. xxiv. 9, 10).

The nation's leaders had seen this amazing appearance and yet after only forty days absence by Moses in attendance on God this incredible people pressed Aaron to make them gods: ". . . . . for as for this Moses . . . . . we wot not what has become of him" (Exod. xxxii. 1).

Christ appeared again to Israel two thousand years ago, this time in human flesh and the twelve apostles have witnessed to us His life and resurrection, yet is there not a similar careless response by the world today to this precious Gift of God? Only the man lost and dying of hunger and thirst learns the true value of bread and water that he has lightly regarded under easy circumstances. May we who are blessed be primed and prepared to make known to those around us this glorious message of life eternal in Christ Jesus.

No.7. Chapter vii.
pp. 37 - 40

> "Now the Jew's feast of the tabernacles was at hand" (vii. 2).

It is not generally realized what an extensive place the word "Tabernacle" has in the Word of God. Israel was used by God to show in terms for human understanding His gracious desire to dwell with men and eventually to take those, who have responded, to Himself.

The Tabernacle was a temporary dwelling place for God whilst His people Israel were pilgrims in the wilderness. Every detail of its construction and contents were designed by God, and Moses was warned to adhere strictly to the instructions God passed to him for the building and furnishing of the Tabernacle. All these details were symbol of how God had dealt with Israel (for example the pot of manna) and set forth in type God's plans for the future redemption and restoration of mankind.

Heb. ix. confirms the place this erection had in God's purposes:

> "The Holy Ghost this signifying, that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing" (Heb. ix. 8).

The description of the Tabernacle occupies 15 chapters of Exodus (xxv.-xl.) and this underlines the importance it must have had in the mind of God. In these days when faith is so dim, and evident revelation seems so long ago, it is good to reflect that the great God of the universe came and dwelt with His chosen people, identified to the congregation by the visible fire by night and the cloud by day. These historical facts should be our comfort and strength that He Who is ever the same has us also firmly in His eternal purpose and love.

The Day of the Lord when Christ will return to the Mount of Olives still includes an aspect of the Tabernacle:

> "Behold, the day of the Lord cometh . . . . . For I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle . . . . . Then shall the Lord go forth, and fight against those nations . . . And His feet shall stand in that day upon the mount of olives . . . . . And it shall come to pass that every one that is left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem shall even go up from year to year to worship the King, the Lord of Hosts, and to keep the feast of Tabernacles" (Zech. xiv. 1-4, 16).

Finally the prophecy of Rev. xxi.:

> "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth . . . . . Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them" (Rev. xxi. 1, 3).

In the context of Zech. xiv. the nations are compelled to keep the feast of Tabernacles in Jerusalem or suffer the penalty of drought.

Returning to John vii. 37 our Lord knowing the Jews sought to kill Him, bravely attended that great feast, and on the last day stood and cried:

> "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me, and drink."

These symbolic words are an echo of John iv. 14 where a similar message was given to the woman of Samaria. It is spiritual water that will pour out for the life of the world. It is significant in Zech. xiv. when "the Lord shall be King over all the earth" then:

> ". . . . . living water shall go out from Jerusalem, half of them towards the former sea, and half towards the hinder sea" (Zech. xiv. 8).

This spate of fresh water from the depths, will heal the salt Dead Sea and bring life to all that valley.

Our opening remarks are an attempt to give a background to John vii. through which we find a common theme, that of the question of man's judgment of the events concerning, and the claims of the Lord Jesus Christ:

> "The world cannot hate you; but Me it hateth, because I testify of it, that the works thereof are evil" (vii. 7).

The Jewish leaders had a strong tradition for the interpretation of the Mosaic Law and many rulings depended on what various Rabbis had declared in the past—much like the precedent of English Case Law today. For one, who in their opinion was unlearned, to stand up and express doctrine without reference to tradition was inflammatory and engendered the hate to which our Lord refers. Where our personal judgments are questioned pride enters in. All personal opinions and values must be moved from self to those emanating from the Word of God led by the indwelling Spirit of Truth.

How easy to write a sentence like that but how extremely difficult to put it into practice. We really have to learn humility and empty ourselves that He may fill us. Only in that spirit can He use us. If we have personal reservations on the truth of the Bible or of the completely righteous path of God, we shall fail. Degrees of irritation can arise in our heart and spoil the glorious appreciation of God's desire, and steps to dwell and tabernacle with us.

Our Lord's brethren were skeptical and jealous, egging Him on to what they knew were for Him perilous streets of Jewry.

He replied to them:

> "My time is not yet come: but your time is always ready" (vii. 6).

What a wealth of purpose is hidden behind "My time is not yet come". Instructed by His Father, the Son's life was made up of fulfilling prophecy. The prophetic Word of God is the vindication before heaven and earth in the future that all things were and are controlled by Him and that they are inexorably working to the final fulfillment of His plans. This fulfillment will be made despite the deadly opposition of Satan throughout the ages which seeks to sabotage this glorious work of restoration.

Our Lord has to ensure that as the "Lamb of God" He should eat the Passover with His disciples, and on the same day (the Jewish day, 6a.m. to 6p.m.), the exact day be offered up as the Passover Lamb, and by His death preserve the life of the household of God.

This well attested fact of history, should in the eyes of the world, demonstrate the truth and accuracy of the O.T. record from the Passover Lamb of the exodus through the Temple ritual to successive pronouncements of God's prophets.

No.8. Chapter viii.
pp. 55 - 59

This chapter (viii.) is one of confrontation between our Lord and the leaders, the scribes and Pharisees. We saw them in the last chapter desperate to stop the teaching of Christ. With what anticipatory excitement they must have forced on our Lord the issue of judgment on a woman taken in the very act of adultery (see Lev. xx. 10 for the penalty of death). Which ever way Christ judged they felt that it would either show His violation of the Law or bring alienation from the common people. They had nationally been constantly guilty of spiritual adultery going after other gods when Jehovah looked upon Himself as their husband. It is ironic that physical adultery featured in their test. Our Lord's reply that the one without sin was to cast the first stone, left them defeated. What gracious words He addressed to this poor woman:

> "Neither do I condemn thee: go, and sin no more" (viii. 11).

Throughout the following verses our Lord in patient love seeks to show His violent opponents that Satan unknown to them was their driving force, using them for his own schemes to sabotage the plans of God. How can some today deny the existence of Satan, saying that it is only the contrariness of man's heart that is wrong and that Satan is a figure of sin generally and not a person. Consider:

> "Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do. He was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him. When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own: for he is a liar, and the father of it" (viii. 44).

In saying this our Lord may well have had in mind the first recorded lie: "Ye shall not surely die" (Gen. iii. 4) and the action of Cain who could have been the progeny of Satan

(I John iii. 12). For the one who is an unbeliever in Christ and is therefore not a child of God, the domination by Satan can be a very real thing. It might be helpful to remind ourselves of a passage from Luke's Gospel:

> "And the seventy returned again with joy, saying, Lord, even the devils are subject unto us through Thy name. And He said unto them, I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven. Behold, I give unto you power to tread on serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy: and nothing shall by any means hurt you. Notwithstanding in this rejoice not, that the spirits are subject unto you; but rather rejoice, because your names are written in heaven. In that hour Jesus rejoiced in spirit, and said, I thank Thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes: even so, Father; for so it seemed good in Thy sight. All things are delivered to Me of My Father: and no man knoweth Who the Son is, but the Father; and Who the Father is, but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal Him" (Luke x. 17-22).

The scribes and Pharisees by their very refusal to see and accept Christ as the "sent" Son of God were spiritually blinded, asking derisory questions:

> "Where is Thy Father?" (viii. 19).
> "Who art Thou?" (viii. 25).

These leaders were the 'wise and prudent' of Luke x. 21. If we come as "babes" (same verse) relying in faith to be taught by our Father we shall be illumined by the "Light of the World". Another comparison we find made by Christ:

> "And the servant abideth not in the house for ever: but the son abideth for ever" (viii. 35).

This thought is echoed in I John ii. 17: "And the world passes away . . . . . but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever". The servant dies in service. "Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin" (viii. 34). Christ warned the scribes that unless they repented they would die in their sins (viii. 21).

To those who threatened His life our Lord patiently points out that there are two witnesses to the Truth. His words, given Him by the Father, and His miracles, the witness of the invisible Father through the hands of Christ. Such was our Lord's reply to their unreasonable statement that "Thy record is not true" (viii. 13).

Well may we say that these words today are constantly put into the mouths of many people by Satan. It is just like Satan's first attack on God's word by his lying suggestion "Ye shall not surely die" (Gen. iii. 4). The constant denial of the plenary inspiration of the Scriptures is repeated in many forms by people both in and out of organized religion. If Satan can weaken or destroy the channel by which the knowledge of God and His salvation comes, the ground is clear for every evil idea of departure from the way God has planned.

One extreme of such deviation results in the practice of sodomy. This is repeatedly condemned by God in the Old and New Testaments yet the voice of church leaders is silent. The press report frightening advances of religious cults. These misuse the Bible and bear fruits of disruption of family ties and twisted minds. All this is because Satan is being allowed to silence and weaken the Word of God. How thankful we should be that like the Ephesians, Paul could also have said to us:

> "And you hath He quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins; wherein in time past ye walked according to the course of this world, according to the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience" (Eph. ii. 1, 2).

The continued patient appeal of reason to the Pharisees left them still rebellious to the truth. Their final charge against our Lord was:

> "Say we not well that Thou art a Samaritan, and hast a devil?" (viii. 48).

When they made this utterance Satan must have felt that here at least for him with these leaders was victory:

> "And whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him: but whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come" (Matt. xii. 32).

The climax of this chapter is in verse 58:

> "Jesus said unto them, verily, verily, I say unto you, before Abraham was, I AM" (viii. 58).

Here our Lord unequivocally claims the O.T. name God gave to Himself when Moses enquired of Him His designation:

> "Say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you" (Exod. iii. 14).

Satan is powerless to disrupt the prophecied plan of salvation and although they pick up stones to kill the Lord of Glory, He passes through the midst of them unharmed. How we should continually praise God that His Son was preserved to achieve the work of redemption on the cross on our behalf. Our praise should equally be given to Him that His Word of Truth has been placed in our hands giving us access by faith and His spirit into His presence.

Finally with Satan still in our minds observe how he had his disciples ready when Paul began to turn from the Jews to the Gentile. Paul and Barnabas had found at Paphos a deputy of the country interested in the truth:

> "And when they had gone through the isle of Paphos, they found a certain sorcerer, a false prophet, a Jew, whose name was Bar-jesus: which was with the deputy of the country, Sergius Paulus, a prudent man; who called for Barnabas and Saul, and desired to hear the word of God. But Elymas the sorcerer . . . . . withstood them, seeking to turn away the deputy from the faith. Then Saul (who also is called Paul), filled with the Holy Ghost, set his eyes on him, and said, O full of all subtilty and all mischief, thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord?" (Acts xiii. 6-10).

This attempt by Satan to pervert (turn aside from its proper use - dictionary definition) the right ways of the Lord continues to this present day.

The parable of the sower shows that it is those by the wayside who do not understand the Word that are robbed of the Seed of life by Satan. Paul in that wonderful letter to the Ephesians warns them of this dangerous foe:

> "Put on the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to withstand against the wiles of the devil. For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places . . . . . And take . . . . . the sword of the Spirit which is the Word of God" (Eph. vi. 11, 12, 17).

Our digression on this subject is to emphasize that Satan appears to be working through those under his control to accelerate the decline in human standards and the encouragement of every perversion and departure from perfect family relationships and responsibilities that God laid down in the beginning. God's ways, His love and Truth all have a common aim, that of eventual unity between His children and then Himself. Every thought and action not contributing to this divine aim, find affinity with those who took up stones against the Lord Jesus Christ.

No.9. Chapter ix.
pp. 75 - 80

Key words of this chapter (ix.) could well be:

> "I am the Light of the world" (ix. 5).

This is an echo of John i. 9:

> "That was the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world."

Sight depends on light to illumine the object to be seen. Spiritual sight depends on the Light of the world. Verse 5 is prefaced by "as long as I am in the world". We today have the privilege of 'shining as lights in the world' (Phil. ii. 15) and so continuing in our smaller measure the wonderful light that the Saviour brought into a world of darkness. Spiritual sight is the fruit of the believer's faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. Before we have faith or belief there must be knowledge:

> "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God" (Rom. x. 17).

Hardness of heart about which we read so much consists of man's resistance to this Word of God, his refusal to humbly accept it and his ready forgetfulness of its message. In all ages man has sought his own prestige by attempting to secure his salvation by his own efforts and by the glory of his own mental and physical accomplishments. God's way for fulness of life by reclamation and the salvation of man is the one and only way—the way the Lord Jesus Christ accomplished to the full on our behalf for His Father. This way is just and righteous and when man understands and accepts it in faith it will be found acceptable to man's reason in every respect. It is only the hardness of man's heart that refuses out of pride to see God as the Author of His record.

Lack of faith as we have said induces spiritual blindness and the result is widespread refusal to accept the Bible's authority and plenary inspiration. To accept only part of this record is to place man in judgment on the Holy Spirit as to how much of His own words He managed to get recorded in the canon of Scripture. Diversity of human opinions (resulting from only partial acceptance of the inspiration of the Scriptures) is evidenced by a multitude of separate Christian church bodies all having their own opinions of emphasis, selection or addition, especially addition to the record provided by God.

Israel were an example all through their history of the effect of the dire results that accrue from the neglect of or lack of faith in the words of God. In Exod. xix. Israel met with God:

> "And Moses brought forth the people out of the camp to meet with God; and they stood at the nether part of the mount" (Exod. xix. 17).

There Israel saw some of the glory of God—smoke, fire, earthquake and the sound of the trumpet. Moses began to give them the words of God (chapter xx.) and God authorizes them by prefacing the ten commandments and all that follows by:

> "I am the Lord thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage."

In His earthly ministry, Christ patiently besought the Jews to see His marvelous works as the power and presence of His Father working with Him. God has always given man good grounds for faith and it is only the hardness of heart that man has inflicted on himself that has kept him from the blessing and riches of the Truth.

Moses on the instructions of God returned to the mountain top to receive details of the Tabernacle and other instructions. And Moses said:

> "Tarry ye here for us, until we come again unto you: and behold, Aaron and Hur are with you: if any man have any matter to do, let him come unto them" (Exod. xxiv. 14).

Moses was only absent forty days but on his return Israel had already forgotten that it was God Who had brought them out of Egypt and had also forgotten the express words of Exod. xx. 23 "Ye shall not make with Me gods of silver, neither shall ye make unto you gods of gold". What words of their's could be more obtuse or rebellious than:

> ". . . . . make us gods, which shall go before us; for as for this Moses, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him" (Exod.xxxii.1).

At the time of these events the skin of Moses' face shone after having been in the presence of the Lord. Because of the fear this caused among the people, Moses put a veil over his face. It is remarkable that this action has been perpetuated to the present day by a veil being worn by the reader of the law in a synagogue.

". . . . . until this day remaineth the same veil untaken away in the reading of the old testament (covenant)" (II Cor. iii. 14).

Paul is saying in this chapter of Corinthians that because Moses had a veil on his face to obscure the reflected glory of God attending the giving of the law etc., they could not see when in reality the shine went from the face of Moses. So while this veil was still there (in our Lord's time) at the reading of the law, in symbol there was a veil over their spiritual eyesight that obscured the fact that the glory of the law was being replaced by the glory of Christ and His law of the Spirit.

So we come back to John ix. and the healing of the man born blind. The circumstances related should prevent human misunderstanding of its teaching. First the man born blind is indicative of his desperate and helpless condition. Then the question of sin is eliminated and the plain purpose of the miracle is stated:

"Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents (to cause this blindness): but that the works of God should be made manifest in him" (ix. 3).

Christ could have spoken words and healed the blind man but to help the faith of man in this instance He links Himself with the miracle by making the clay. How necessary was this action, for the Jews said to the man: "Give God the praise" thus seeking to eliminate the channel of blessing even though the source was the same. Notice the Jews demand for a third account of the healing and the man's reply to them: "I have told you already, and ye did not hear: wherefore would ye hear it again?". Here is a willful deafness. Look at their impudent comment:

"We know that God spake unto Moses: as for this fellow, we know not from whence He is" (ix. 29).

Compare this with their forefather's comment at Mount Sinai about Moses who they now acknowledge:

". . . . . as for this Moses, ... we wot not what is become of him" (Exod.xxxii.1).

The blind man's knowledge grows from "a man that is called Jesus" (ix. 11) to "a prophet" (17) and finally his faith in and worship of Jesus as "the Son of God" (35-38). The man's faith enables him to give personal testimony in the face of threats from the Jewish leaders. Even so the best testimony that any man can offer the world is the utter conviction from his heart that in Christ is ALL life, hope and truth.

The healing of the blind man was another miracle performed on the sabbath day. The Pharisees and the other leaders were obsessed with detail of sabbath observance rather than remembering the One Who ordained it and the meaning behind it—the day of rest and restoration that the Saviour was there to bring to them. The leaders of the Jews prided themselves in their knowledge of the law and its interpretation. Thus our Lord could say: "You say you see".

The Lord had told Moses that He was 'long suffering' (Exod. xxxiv. 6) and how many times in the O.T. do we see this blessed attribute of God demonstrated. There does come a time when 'there is no remedy'. See the culmination of many rebellious acts by Israel in II Chronicles:

> ". . . . . they mocked the messengers of God, and despised His words, and misused His prophets, until the wrath of the Lord arose against His people, till there was no remedy" (II Chron. xxxvi. 16).

Here is a people chosen by God to teach the world about Himself and we find a crisis has arrived when they are unusable and there is 'no remedy' for their correction. Let us digress again and seek to understand in part how our God works. God has the supernatural power to see the ages ahead and their happenings. This is quite beyond us to explain or understand. It is a fact, for God has placed in the Scriptures prophetic happenings of future events, many of which have been fulfilled and many are still to happen. God created the angels and man with free choice. Prophecy touches both these realms. What we must not think is that God causes His prophecies to come true by making us mere puppets. What He does do is to overrule the actions of Satan and his spirits and the activities of rebellious man in such a way that His final purpose is achieved. Throughout the ages there has been this dual action going on and the reason why God permits this interference with His plans would seem to be that He has a wide long term education for man and the spirit world. The goal of this tuition is to show that the ways of God are always best and result therefore in the greatest good for man and for the redeemed or saved in final unity with their Creator and Redeemer.

Having such thoughts in mind consider the warning God sent to Israel by the hand of Isaiah:

> "Go, and tell this people, Hear ye indeed, but understand not; and see ye indeed (cp. John ix. 41), but perceive not. Make (declare) the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and shut their eyes; lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and convert, and be healed" (Isa. vi. 9, 10).

To understand this prophecy we must view it as a decision by God to institute a period of time when He would not only nationally refuse spiritual sight to Israel but would leave their land wasted and untenanted. God waited patiently, delaying this sentence, and the warning was repeated (Matt. xiii. 14; Mark iv. 12; Luke viii. 10; John xii. 40; Acts xxviii. 26, 27; Rom. xi. 8). Acts xxviii. was the last time the warning was nationally disregarded and the period of blindness commenced for Israel.

The advent of Christ gave to all the opportunity to see the Light and receive spiritual illumination. It alas also supplied condemnation to those that preferred the darkness that fitted their deeds:

> "And Jesus said, For judgment I am come into this world, that they which see not might see; and they which see might be made blind. And some of the Pharisees which were with Him heard these words, and said unto Him, Are we blind also? Jesus said unto them, If ye were blind, ye should have no sin: but now ye say, We see; therefore your sin remaineth" (John ix. 39-41).

May our complete and utter faith in the Word of God enable the Holy Spirit to have full access to our minds and so yield acceptable service to the Lord Jesus Christ.

No.10. Chapter x.
pp. 92 - 96

This chapter (x.) centres largely on a parable of sheep, their shepherd, their pasture and their enemies. In verse 6 it is written: "They understood not what things they were which He spoke unto them". The thing is, do we understand? The figures we refer to above, represent factors in our life today. The words of our Lord are precious to us and vitally important, but if their deep import is missed how tragic the loss for us.

The Good Shepherd is the Lord Jesus Christ and His own sheep are those who believe on His Name. What of the pasture, the most important thing in the life of a sheep? Turn to John xxi. 15 and onwards. Peter is being exhorted by the Lord to care for His flock after His ascension:

John xxi. 15	Feed (bosko—pasture)
	My lambs (arnion—a little lamb, the immature believer).
John xxi. 16	Feed (pornaino—tend as a shepherd)
	My sheep (probaton—an adult sheep, the developing believer).
John xxi. 17	Feed (bosko—pasture)
	My sheep (probaton).

Again, turn to Peter's epistles to see how he carried out this charge with the help of the Holy Spirit:

> "As newborn babes, desire the sincere milk of the Word, that ye may grow thereby" (I Pet. ii. 2).

The first principles are recommended for study for the beginner. (cp. Heb. v. 12-14).

> "We have also a more sure (steadfast) word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day star (light bearer) arise in your hearts: knowing this first, that no prophecy of the Scripture is of any private interpretation. For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man: but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (II Pet. i. 19-21).

Peter is adding to his personal witness of the person of Christ by referring the believer to God's authorized record of His Son's act and words especially at that time to the O.T. with its education by types and prophetic words concerning Christ's advent. The reference to the dawn and the day star gives a beautiful picture of the believer growing spiritually nearer to his Lord by patient attention to His Word and so becoming a 'light bearer' in joyous and profitable service. Here is the picture of Shepherd and pasture, finding its intended goal.

> "But there were false prophets also among the people, even as there shall be false teachers among you, who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction" (II Pet. ii. 1).

Here Peter 'tends as a shepherd' and warns of the wolves (John x. 12) who with false doctrine would confuse and scatter the sheep. Consider "Beware of false prophets, which come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves" (Matt. vii. 15). One can see many such around today.

In II Pet. iii. he addressed the mature believers to 'stir up' their remembrance of the O.T., warning them that the judgment of God had fallen in the past and would fall in the future (consider those who today scoff at the account of the universal flood and hence for whom future judgment has no terrors). The dispensation of law changed with the death of our Saviour to one of grace at the revelation of the dispensation of the Mystery (Ephesians iii. 9 R.V.). May we make the most of the period before it ends and that of judgment begins.

So then the pasture for the sheep (the believer—the new man) is the Word of God. Spiritual under-nourishment throws us open to all sorts of dangers, just as physical under-nourishment lowers the resistance of the body to the attacks of germs and other ills.

Verse 3. The Porter openeth to the Good Shepherd. Verses 7 and 9 "I am the door". Verse 30 "I and My Father are one". Here the work of Father and Son merge in a mystical unity.

> "He that entereth not by the door into the sheepfold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber" (John x. 1).

Today one would think it obvious that to be a Christian, the understanding and acceptance of God's plan of life and redemption through the work of Christ on Calvary, was an essential part and that there was 'no other way'. But consider the witness and statements of many professing Christians both lay and leaders, and one is taken aback by what is considered sufficient for acceptance by God. God through His beloved Son has not spoken lightly on this matter: "who climbeth up some other way is a thief and a robber".

Who were these thieves and robbers that had come before Him (x. 8)? They were indeed those who sought to enter the fold other than by the Saviour Himself (x. 1). The one who attempts to by-pass God's plan of salvation is not only robbing his followers of their salvation but more often than not is making personal gain in the process. Our Lord discloses some aspects of this in Matt. xxiii. where He denounces the scribes and Pharisees. Without naming names today consider the many rich religious cults which have robbed the Lord Jesus Christ of His rightful place as the only Mediator between God and men.

How are we to understand the use of the figure of the 'voice' of the Good Shepherd? We cannot audibly hear the voice of the Lord Jesus but the Holy Spirit will glorify the Son of God (see John xvi. 13, 14) by guiding our spirit into understanding the Word of God and guiding us in our service for the Father too:

> "And when He putteth forth His own sheep, He goeth before them, and the sheep follow Him: for they know His voice" (x. 4).

Under the guidance of the Holy Spirit—the voice of the Good Shepherd—the believer will not be enticed by the voice of 'the stranger'. Nor will the faithful believer be shaken or deterred by the voice of some of the 'higher critics', or the flood of educational statements on evolutionary theories that conflict with Scripture:

> "And a stranger will they not follow, but will flee from him" (x. 5).

"Stranger" is allotrios—belonging to another, that is other than the Holy Spirit.

Even as the Lord commissioned Peter to 'feed the lambs and the sheep', so as we grow in the service of the Lord we are expected to serve the flock, leading the young in faith to the riches of the Word of God and by example exhibit the fruit of the Spirit for their emulation. We should be experienced in the words of comfort and guidance with which the Scriptures abound.

> "I am the Good Shepherd: the good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep" (x. 11).

In the near context of John fills out this figurative picture by our Lord's words:

> "Therefore doth My Father love Me, because I lay down My life, that I might take it again. No man taketh it from Me, but I lay it down of Myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment have I received of My Father" (x. 17, 18).

This statement of the Lord Jesus Christ leaves no room for His enemies to say His life ended in failure. Here is a categorical link—Christ is laying down His life for the believer—He has power to do this and He has power to take it again so that His resurrection is the blessed assurance of eternal life for every believer. Moreover and this is vitally important, "This commandment have I received of My Father".

The authority, approval and participation of God the Father is claimed by the Son, the witnesses of His resurrection prove the truth of His claims.

When you consider the crass disobedience of Israel throughout their historical record in the Bible and this in the face of a patient and long suffering and merciful Jehovah it is utterly amazing that John could write under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit:

> "God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son" (John iii. 16).

Then again on the Son's part:

"Therefore doth My Father love Me, because I lay down My life" (x. 17).

Here is a most wonderful display of love and grace extended to man by both Father and Son in concert. We surely should seek to match our response to our Creator's deep concern for us.

No.11. Chapter xi.
pp. 157 - 160

With all these articles on the chapters of John's Gospel, we have sought the purpose of the Holy Spirit in selecting just the few incidents from 3½ years' ministry by our Lord when innumerable addresses had been given, actions and miracles performed. This Gospel is largely set to show the links between God the Father (unknowable in essence), the Lord Jesus Christ (the sent one) and the written and spoken Word (the Bible). Mankind is lost without this chain of testimony. The savant and hopeful philosopher seek without success to establish a "Being" or "first cause" that can satisfy their independent ego.

The raising of Lazarus seems to stand next in importance to the Lord's own resurrection:

> "Jesus . . . . . said, This sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of Go might be glorified thereby" (xi. 4).

Demonstration was needed to proclaim to the countless thousands in the future who would die believing in the Lord Jesus that their future heritage was assured even though that resurrection day might be delayed for a long time. The Lord Jesus purposely delayed coming to His friend:

> "When He had heard therefore that he was sick, He abode two days still in the same place where He was" (xi. 6).

The deity of our Lord Jesus Christ can bring problems to the human mind. The power to raise and quicken the dead by God and His Son can also raise questions. In both cases we need to let the Holy Spirit in the Word of God express facts in His own words. As soon as man, perhaps with the best of intentions, seeks to analyze, explain or try to reconcile the powers and positions of God and His Son he is lost and error must creep in.

God saw fit to manifest Himself in the person of His Son. God has stated the limitations He has placed on Himself, that in Christ we have the perfect man, begotten by the Father, qualified to redeemed us righteously from our sins. Nothing man writes must weaken this position. On the other hand the Scriptures and especially John's Gospel underline the full and complete link between Father and Son so essential to confirm the Son's words and His authority. Look up all the references that refer to the Son glorifying the Father and the Father glorifying the Son. Again the repeated insistence that the Father had 'sent' the Son; that the Son was doing the Father's will and work; that the Son could see and hear the words and actions of the Father, and followed them. All these things are written that we may be sure of the divine identity and authority of the Son without impairing His role on earth in the Father's plan.

Having said this we return to the scene at the tomb where Christ asks for the stone to be rolled away and at which point He addresses a prayer of thanksgiving to the Father:

> "Father, I thank Thee that Thou hast heard Me. And I knew that Thou hearest Me always: but because of the people which stand by I said it, that they may believe that Thou hast sent Me. And when He had thus spoken, He cried with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth. And he that was dead came forth" (xi. 41-44).

The words of this prayer and its outcome give point to what I have tried to convey in the two previous paragraphs. The verses underline the close association and mutual glorification (proving or vindication) of Father and Son in demonstrating to mankind the way of resurrection to eternal life.

Confirmation of the fact of this miracle is found in the reaction of our Lord's enemies, these agents of Satan:

> "Caiaphas . . . . . said . . . . . Ye know nothing at all, nor consider that it is expedient for us, that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not" (John xi. 49, 50).

Satan using Caiaphas was seeking to break God's word of prophecy by accomplishing the premature death of Christ on a false reason for saving the nation. Note however, how this enemy of God was still held as it were in a voice to prophesy in truth the words God intended to be spoken:

> "And this spake he not of himself: but being high priest that year, he prophesied that Jesus should died for that nation; and not for that nation only, but that also that He should gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad" (xi. 51, 52).

Compare Numb. xxii. 38 for another example of an unwilling prophet having to speak the words God gave him. Caiaphas did not of course realize the aspect of truth in his statement.

It is of interest to see what N.T. texts reveal of the opinion or belief held at that time concerning resurrection:

> "Jesus saith unto her, Thy brother shall rise again, Martha saith unto Him, I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day" (John xi. 23, 24).
>
> "And when they heard of the resurrection of the dead, some mocked: and others said, We will hear thee again of this matter" (Acts xvii. 32).
>
> "For the Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel, nor spirit: but the Pharisees confess both" (Acts xxiii. 8).
>
> "Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you (king Agrippa), that God should raise the dead?" (Acts xxvi. 8).

> "I (Paul) continue . . . . . witnessing . . . . . that Christ . . . . . should . . . . . rise from the dead . . . . . Festus said with a loud voice, thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad" (Acts xxvi. 22-24).

Today, the present generation among its older members may have a reasonable percentage of those who have faith that life extends beyond the grave, no doubt due to their childhood training in Sunday School or church. But even in this age group one meets many who are quite content to have no hope at all. What however, of the younger generation growing up? They will be handicapped by lack of religious instruction in schools and the failing work of most churches to teach from the Bible. It is on this empty and negative ground that the message of this chapter needs to be sown. The distressing thought of the complete disintegration of the physical body requires convincing words to assure a believing mourner that their loved one will be clothed again with a new body having the ability of a two way recognition and response with friends in that future state.

The strong enmity of the Jewish leaders to our Lord at this time seems to have been reaching a climax and when Christ said "Let us go into Judea again" His disciples feared both for His safety and their own. Jesus answered:

> "Are there not twelve hours in a day? If any man walk in the day, he stumbleth not, because he seeth the Light of the world" (xi. 9).

The figures of light, darkness and 12 hours to a day are repeatedly used in this Gospel. Why not write out the words of these references and study them: i. 4, 5, 7, 9; iii. 19; viii. 12; ix. 4, 5; xi. 9, 10; xii. 35, 45. Like other figures such as water, bread, etc., they have great application to our present lives and need our meditation and realization. To walk (in the Scriptures) is our way of life, our thoughts especially (known to God), and from these our judgments, friends, priorities, amusements, reading, viewing, etc. Are we not enjoined to walk in the Light of the world, as in the presence of the Lord Jesus, so that our life in all its aspects conforms to that Light.

Furthermore our Lord's reference to the need to work while it is day (xi. 9) underlines the fact that there is a time in the plans of God that brooks no delay or hindrance:

> "But exhort one another daily, while it is called To-day" (Heb. iii. 13).

Whether we are old or young, none knows when our life here will end. The Scriptures record no hope of a second chance to do what we delayed to do while it was "To-day". God has a use for each one of us who are His children. May we ever stand in the Light and so see each step of the way He bids us take.

No.12. Chapter xii.
pp. 191 - 195

In this chapter (xii.) we have a variety of incidents which show how the people surrounding our Lord assessed and judged His ministry and acts and their resultant response. From a quiet study of their reactions we should find for ourselves emulation or warning. Perhaps the highlight is the action of Mary:

> "Then took Mary a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly, and anointed the feet of Jesus, and wiped His feet with her hair: and the house was filled with the odour of the ointment" (xii. 3).

The priorities of Mary and her sister Martha had already been compared in Luke x. 40-42:

> "But Martha was cumbered about much serving, and came to Him, and said, Lord, dost Thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone? bid her therefore that she help me. And Jesus answered and said unto her, Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things: but one thing is needful: and Mary hath chosen that good part, which shall not be taken away from her."

The return of Mary's beloved brother Lazarus from the dead by the word of Christ, was only one of many reasons for her devotion and thankfulness to the Lord Jesus Christ. Mary expressed this in the only way she could think of—the sacrifice of a costly box of perfume anointing His feet and wiping them with her hair. A similar gesture of devotion by another woman is recorded in Luke vii. 37-48. Here our Lord compares her response with that accorded to Him by His host.

God places great importance and value on our response to His grace and loving provision. We need daily to reflect on all His benefits to us from the heights of the gift of His Son to the many answers we receive to our prayers. Consider the story of Job and God holding up Job as an example to Satan. Nearer to home:

> ". . . . . that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known by the church the manifold wisdom of God" (Eph. iii. 10).

Our response to the exceeding riches of God's grace to us in Christ should be an example to principalities and powers in heavenly places and thus glorify the wisdom of God in so trusting us. May our response be doing this indeed.

> "But the chief priests consulted that they might put Lazarus also to death; because that by reason of him many of the Jews went away, and believed on Jesus" (xii. 10, 11).

Here is another comparison of response. Many of the people believing, but the Jewish leaders seeing in Christ only a menace to their nation and their position in the Mosaic hierarchy:

> "For they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God" (xii. 43).

How often the response of man in his worship of God is evaluated and guided by the well meaning but doubtful traditions of church leaders rather than that found in the Word of God when it is properly understood.

The theme of prophecy fulfilled is found yet again in this chapter:

> "Fear not, daughter of Sion: behold, thy King cometh, sitting on an ass's colt. These things understood not His disciples at the first: but when Jesus was glorified, then remembered they that these things were written of Him, and that they had done these things unto Him" (xii. 15, 16).

If those inspired by the Holy Ghost to write the Gospels had not added the words "as it is written" the ordinary reader might have missed this prophecy tucked away in Zechariah ix. 9 and in so many other words and incidents that fulfilled O.T. prophecy. God seems to have used this declaration and fulfillment of prophecy as His seal of truth on the O.T. and its recorded fulfillment in the N.T. There is no escaping this glorious and wise plan of God and it is of great interest we read the following:

> "He that rejecteth Me, and receiveth not My words, hath one that judgeth him: the word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day. For I have not spoken of Myself; but the Father which sent Me, He gave Me a commandment, what I should say, and what I should speak" (xii. 48, 49).

Does not this infer that man in the last day will be confronted by the Word of God and judged on his acceptance or rejection of it? Again let us remember when Christ refers to His words we must include all that vital body of doctrine the risen Lord gave His Apostle Paul to deliver to us.

Indicative of the span of prophecy, verse 31 looks back to Gen. iii. 15:

> "I will put enmity between thee (Satan) and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy (Satan's) head (authority and position), and thou shalt bruise his heel."
>
> "Now is the judgment of this world: now shall the prince of this world (Satan) be cast out" (John xii. 31).

Following prophecy through the ages, we see signs in this chapter of the change in dispensation:

> "But though He had done so many miracles before them, yet they believed not on Him: that the saying of Esaias might be fulfilled, which he spake, Lord, who hath believed our report? and to whom hath the arms of the Lord been revealed? Therefore they could not believe, because that Esaias said again, He hath blinded their eyes, and hardened their heart; that they should not see with their eyes, nor understand with their heart, and be converted, and I should heal them" (xii. 37-40).

While verse 42 records that many believed, yet the signs of national rejection were already being established.

Continuing with this thought:

> "And there were certain Greeks among them that came up to worship at the feast; the same came therefore to Philip . . . . . we would see Jesus" (xii. 20, 21).

When our Lord knew of these visitors He sketches the process whereby the message to the world of His death, resurrection and life in the spirit would be preached to the world. Unless the wheat seed dies in the earth no life can be passed on and fruit produced (verse 24). This supreme unselfish sacrifice is enjoined in measure to His disciples and again earthly and spiritual values are compared and evaluated.

Israel have rightly been called the people of the Book and in verse 34 they ask a question:

> "We have heard out of the law that Christ abideth for ever: and how sayest Thou, The Son of man must be lifted up? Who is this Son of man?"

Our Lord's answer seems enigmatic:

> "Yet a little while is the light with you. Walk while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you: for he that walketh in darkness knoweth not whither he goeth. While ye have light, believe in the light, that ye may be the children of light" (xii. 35, 36).

Yet John the Baptist had repeatedly referred to Christ as the Light of the world and our Lord had linked light, walking and darkness when He said:

> "I am the light of the world: he that followeth Me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life" (John viii. 12).

The conclusion from this still applies today, so the Scriptures must be brought to the light, they must be read in faith in the Son of God, they must be read with the help of the Holy Spirit. They will then speak their message and the believer will receive the life they offer.

It seems incredible that the One Who created the marvelous universe around us, the limits of which by telescope or microscope are untraceable and unreachable, nevertheless speaks to us out of this Book He has ordained. Moreover in His wisdom, He has placed the disclosure of these riches in His own sovereign will and has bypassed the cleverness of man and rather has set the academic pride of man at nought. What a wonderful heavenly Father is this. I Cor. i. has remarkable words on how God has dealt with the wisdom of the world and verse 19 looks back to Isaiah's message to Jerusalem (Ariel) in Isa. xxix. 14:

> "For it is written, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent."

"Well may we join the Psalmist (ciii. 1) in singing "Bless the Lord, O my soul: and all that is within me, bless His holy name".

No.13. Chapter xiii.
pp. 230 - 233

This chapter (xiii.) and the next six (xiv.-xix.) cover what must have seemed for our Lord the longest and most cruelly exacting day in His earthly life. The very first verse underlines the all important and sublime message Christ was to enjoin on His disciples and indeed on all His followers, namely that they "love one another". Our Lord's example in this attitude is proclaimed from the start:

> ". . . . . when Jesus knew that His hour was come that He should depart out of this world unto the Father, having loved His own which were in the world, He loved them unto the end" (xiii. 1).

The word for love agape as a noun and in verbal form is used by John in his Gospel and epistles over 70 times which is some indication of the importance accorded to it by the Holy Spirit. The ascended Christ later amplified His teaching to His disciples (e.g. Acts xxiv. 27) and included instruction on love to Paul, who recorded it in I Cor. xiii.:

> "If I speak in the tongues of men and of angels, but have not love, I am a noisy gong or a clanging cymbal. And if I have prophetic powers, and understand all mysteries and all knowledge, and if I have all faith, so as to remove mountains, but have not love, I am nothing. If I give away all I have, and if I deliver my body to be burned, but hat not love, I gain nothing. Love is patient and kind; love is not jealous or boastful; is not arrogant or rude. Love does not insist on its own way; it is not irritable or resentful; it does not rejoice at wrong, but rejoices in the right. Love bears all things, believes all things, hopes all things, endures all things. Love never ends" (I Cor. xiii. 1-8, R.S.V.).

We need to ponder well verse 2. Some with the help of the Holy Spirit may rise to great responsibility and possess great gifts in the service of God but it is solemnly stated that such a person is nothing without love. Allegories are unsatisfactory but it is as if we said the finest Rolls Royce car was useless without oil in the engine to ensure the sweet running of all moving parts that come into contact with one another. Examine the positive and negative aspects of love in the above text. Unless all self is removed and we are reflecting and giving effect only to the love of God to others, our service is useless. What this love of God is to others and its outworking is something we have to learn from the Scriptures with the help of prayer and the Spirit of Truth. All the practical things we can do for others such as financial help, advice, companionship, must all be conditions for what is best for them in the long run in the sight of God and this is seldom what we would offer them on the spur of the moment. We should be able to see that all the things such as irritation, arrogance and self pride are absolutely opposed to this quality of love we are to possess.

Our Lord would know what temptations would assail the Apostles after He had gone. They would be endowed from on high with wonderful gifts and each one would find himself assuming positions of trust and responsibility quite foreign to their previous humble backgrounds. How necessary then the impressive lesson that the Son of God gave in washing the disciple's feet, one of the lowest tasks expected from a servant.

The verses that follow I Cor. xiii. 8 indicate that as our earthly life ends and eternal life dawns, faith and hope will vanish with sight and reality, but love will remain as an indispensable attitude and outworking, both between the saint and his fellow saints, but also between them and their heavenly Father.

The defection of Judas Iscariot has been the subject of many studies and much surmise. It may be really only helpful to observe what has been actually recorded. Our Lord was grieved and troubled (xiii. 21) in the knowledge He had of this imminent act of gross betrayal. Judas had already witnessed the selfless sacrifice of riches to display utter devotion by Mary with her spikenard. Our Lord's rebuke (John xii. 7, 8) to Judas was lost on him. The example set by Christ in washing his feet was passed over and finally the honour done to him by being the one to whom Christ gave the sop can only have hardened the heart of Judas still more.

Our Lord realize here the Judas would not repent and that another prophecy placed by God in the O.T. (Psa. xli. 9) was being fulfilled by Him and so He says to Judas:

> "That thou doest, do quickly" (xiii. 27).

In order that the subsequent action by Judas should not be a cause of discouragement and despair to the disciples, He assures them of His prior knowledge of the betrayal (19) and its importance as prophecy fulfilled. It is this latter fact that leads Christ to say:

> "Now is the Son of man glorified, and God is glorified in Him. If God be glorified in Him, God shall also glorify Him in Himself, and shall straightway glorify Him" (xiii. 31, 32).

We see nothing in the way of 'glory of magnificence' of Christ then or in His appearances after resurrection. We are told of His coming glory, of that resplendent nature, in many places in the Scriptures including Luke xxi. 27: "Coming in a cloud with power and great glory". To what glory then is our Lord referring in the context of John xiii. 31, 32? Surely it is the faithful fulfillment of O.T. prophecy set there by His Father, so vindicating the truth of the Scriptures, and by the resurrection of Christ the vindication of all the words and claims of the Lord Jesus Christ in regard to His relation to His heavenly Father and specifically His apostleship, that is "the sent One" from God. This chain relationship—the Father, the Son, and the Word we have referred make us realize its paramount importance in the world today. It establishes the message of salvation and knowledge of the ways of God, for otherwise we should have no link with an unseen and unknowable Creator and God.

This chain Christ now extends to His disciples who were to carry the witness on after our Lord's return to heaven:

> "He that receiveth whomsoever I send receiveth Me; and he that receiveth Me receiveth Him that sent Me" (xiii. 20).

We do not go far into the Acts of the Apostles before we see this chain of witness working. Peter, accompanied by John, heal the lame man at the gate called "Beautiful" of the temple. Peter says:

> "Why look ye so earnestly on us, as though by our own power or holiness we have made this man walk?" (Acts iii. 12).

Here, in operation, is the lesson of humility they had learned, and glory is directed to the real source of healing and power:

> "The God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob, the God of our fathers, hath glorified His Son Jesus . . . . . Whom God hath raised from the dead; whereof we are witnesses, And His name through faith in His name hath made this man strong . . . . . But those things, which God before had showed by the mouth of all His prophets, that Christ should suffer, He hath so fulfilled . . . . . Whom the heavens must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the world began" (Acts iii. 11, 15, 16, 18, 21).

One could continue to quote to the end of this chapter and put it all in italics for it seems so vital, as it was to Israel then and as it is to us today. God has proved His Scriptures true by fulfilled events. These same Scriptures, and they alone, record, God's intentions that He, God, the Creator of the world and the whole universe, will grant to us life through His (that of the Lord Jesus Christ) name, the name of His only Son Who died in our stead on the cross. This eternal life is granted to those who come in faith believing His written and living Word.

Looking back on that commandment our Lord gave "love one another", we close this article illustrating a small facet of love that has regard to the many old people we meet around us. It is the prayer of the very old:

> Blessed are they who understand
> My faltering step and shaking hand.
> Blessed who know my ears today
> Must strain to catch the things they say.
> Blessed are they who seem to know
> My eyes are dim, my mind is slow.
> Blessed are they who looked away
> When tea was spilled on the cloth today.
> Blessed are they who make it known
> That I'm loved, respected, not alone.
> And blessed are they who ease the days
> Of my journey home in loving ways.

The First Epistle to TIMOTHY

No.7. iv. 1 - v. 4.
pp. 1 - 5

Having dealt with the mystery (secret) of godliness, which was Christ Jesus manifest in the flesh, culminating with His being received up into glory, the Apostle Paul now comes to the opposing elements under the domination of Satan. We should always be prepared for the fact that wherever Christ as the Truth is proclaimed, the enemy will contest every inch of the way. Thus chapter iv. begins:

> "But the Spirit saith expressly, that in later times some shall fall away from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils, through the hypocrisy of men that speak lies, branded in their own conscience as with a hot iron, forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God created to be received with thanksgiving by them that believe and know the truth" (I Tim. iv. 1-3, R.V.).

This ministry of the Spirit is emphasized by the word rhetos 'expressly' or 'in specific terms'. The phrase 'in later times' is not parallel with 'in the last days' of II Tim. iii. 1. It suggests a more imminent time, subsequent to the Apostle's day. "Fall away", apostesontai gives us the word 'apostasy', and this is brought about by some who give heed to deceiving spirits or demons and put forward their lying doctrines. These apostates are hypocrites and liars through which these evil powers find a ready channel. Doubtless these are the 'world rulers of this darkness' to which Paul makes reference in Eph. vi., the great spiritual foes of the Body of Christ, under Satan's control. Those who come under this domination, have consciences that cannot function because they have been 'cauterized' or quenched.

Their false teaching comprises two prohibitions: marriage and certain foods. This is surely incipient Gnosticism and a form of it had already taken place in the Colossian church where we have a 'neglecting of the body' and a spurious asceticism, which was a travesty of real holiness. In opposition to this, the Apostle insists that these foods, as well as marriage, are the gifts of the Creator which should be received in a thankful spirit. Nothing is to be rejected, for it has been 'sanctified through the Word of God and prayer' (iv. 5). This seems to be a clear reference to grace before meals. In his earthly lifetime, the Saviour blessed food before it was eaten (Mark vi. 41; xiv. 22), and we may be sure this was not an empty formality. Such food is then sanctified, i.e. set apart for the body's use. Chrysostom said "grace before meat disinfects even what has been offered to idols".

Timothy, in order to be a faithful leader, must bring these things before the notice of the brethren under his charge:

> "If thou put the brethren in mind of these things, thou shalt be a good minister of Christ Jesus, nourished in the words of the faith, and of the good doctrine which thou hast followed until now" (iv. 6, R.V.).

The good doctrine is obviously in contrast with the evil doctrine that Paul had just been mentioning. The word used for 'nourished' is the present participle entrephomenos which shows there was a continual process of being nourished up in the words of the faith, that body of doctrine which the ascended Christ had deposited with the Apostle Paul. The false teaching was likened to "profane and old wives' fables" vividly rendered by Moffatt 'driveling myths'. These must be rejected firmly for there must be no compromise (iv. 7).

The Apostle now makes a further comparison between physical and spiritual discipline. He does not say that there is no value in bodily exercise, but that it profits for a little time (cp. James iv. 14) in contrast to the lasting profit of spiritual training which not only embraces this life but also the life to come (iv. 8).

Another of the 'faithful sayings' follows in verses 9-11:

> "Faithful is the saying, and worthy of all acceptation. For to this end we labour and strive, because we have our hope set on the living God, Who is the Saviour of all men, specially of them that believe. These things command and teach."

It is difficult to say whether the 'faithful saying' related to the previous verse (8) or the verses that follow. Either way, truth is being stressed. We must be careful with the word soter, Saviour, remembering that its usual Greek meaning is 'preserver', such as is expressed in Psa. xxxvi. 6:

> ". . . . . Thy judgments are a great deep; O Lord, Thou preservest man and beast."

The Scriptures often raise this word to a higher level and the fact that believers are specially mentioned in verse 10 shows that Paul uses it here in a double sense. What is certain is that the Apostle is not teaching universalism, and those who use it for this purpose must be hard pressed indeed.

Timothy is now enjoined to teach these things with authority even though this meant instructing believers who were older than himself. "Let no man despise thy youth", said the Apostle, but we must not infer from this that Timothy was a mere stripling. Moulton and Milligan quote from Irenaeus showing that neotes could apply to anyone up to the age of forty and Timothy at this point could have been between 35 and 40 years. Whatever his age may have been, he was to be an example (tupos, type) to all under his charge, manifesting seriousness of purpose, trustworthiness, consideration for others and self-control.

Verse 13 instructs Timothy to devote himself to these pursuits, public reading, exhortation and teaching. The reading referred to his public services, the reading aloud of the Old Testament Scriptures to the congregation. The phrase occurs in Luke iv. 16 and Acts xiii. 15 of the synagogue lessons. The proclamation of the Word of truth was of the utmost importance and still is, and should always accompany Christian gatherings for worship and divine instruction. There is a need of those who can read the Scriptures distinctly and with understanding. God is always prepared to work on His own Word!

The public reading was followed by exhortation based upon the passage concerned and teaching (doctrine), the importance of which is given prominence in the N.T. especially in the Pastoral Epistles. There is scarcely a deeper need today than faithful teachers who can clearly expound the Word of God. Preaching sermons can often be beside the point and ineffectual. "Preach the Word" was one of the Paul's last commands (II Tim. iv. 2) and the lack of this largely accounts for the ignorance of God's truth in professing Christian circles with its consequential falling away from spiritual standards. The Apostle continues:

> "Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery" (iv. 14, R.V.).

Prophecy has already been mentioned in i. 18, but in the reference above it refers to the beginning of Timothy's public ministry received by the 'laying on of hands' of the body of elders (presbytery). There should be no difficulty with a somewhat similar statement by Paul in II Tim. i. 6, for there the Apostle speaks of his own part on this occasion, nor need there be any problem over the fact that this goes back to the Acts period. Not every gift (charisma) of the Spirit was necessarily linked with the testimony to Israel. Some were of enduring value in public service for all time and though Paul does not specifically mention what the gift was, it was evidently of this nature. Here his son in the faith is not to neglect it and in II Timothy he is bidden to 'stir it up', the word being used of a dying fire that needed re-kindling. He is to be 'diligent' in these things. Meletao can mean either 'practice' or 'meditate' and both meanings fit the context.

Timothy was to absorb these necessary qualities till they became second nature. "Give thyself wholly to them", the result being that his 'progress' (not profiting A.V.) might be recognized by all. He must 'keep an eye on himself', then on the teaching he gives, and lastly over his hearers, 'for in doing this thou shalt save both thyself and them that hear thee' (verse 16). The verb 'save' here must be used in the sense of Phil. ii. 12, that is, working it out in practice. In no sense could it refer to the salvation and new creation of the sinner which is wholly of grace, apart from works (Eph. ii. 8). This was one of the fundamentals of the doctrine committed to Paul and never does he deviate from it.

The next section of the epistle, commencing with chapter v., deals with the needs of various sections of the assembly under Timothy's charge. First of all he is to avoid severely censuring those who were older in years. Presbuteros here does not refer to the body of leaders, but to a person's age. His contemporaries he was to treat as though they were brothers, the older women as mothers, and the younger ones as sisters 'in all purity'. This phrase is added to safeguard his relationship. The N.I.V. renders the passage:

> "Do not rebuke an older men harshly, but exhort him as if he were your father. Treat the younger men as brothers, older women as mothers, and younger women as sisters, with absolute purity."

The Apostle now deals with the needs of widows in verses 3-16. This is quite a long passage, but ever since Acts vi. 1-4 the position of widows had been one of great concern to the churches.

Timothy is bidden to honour widows who are in real need. The word 'honour' means more than being respectful, and includes the idea of material support. "Widows indeed" means widows with no other means support, that is, those who were genuinely destitute. It was a Christian duty to provide for such. But Paul is concerned that this should not be abused. Widows who had close relatives should be maintained by them (verse 4). The Apostle knew the tendency of some to avoid their responsibility and expect the church or other benevolent institutions to keep relatives in need. This was selfishness and a definite breach of the fifth commandment of the law, whereas practical concern for them was acceptable and pleasing to God (verse 4 and cp. I Tim. ii. 3).

No age has a monopoly of poverty and it is good to realize all through the Scriptures, the poor and the needy are recognized by God and He expects His people, whether earthly or heavenly, to respond generously to their needs.

No.8. v. 3 - 25.
pp. 21 - 26

We are still dealing with the section of this epistle (v. 3-16) relating to the needs of destitute widows. Paul now gives the characteristics of the true widow who was eligible for practical support by the local church. She was 'desolate' (memonomene, meaning left entirely alone). She had her hope set on God (that is, she was a true believer), and was also a woman of constant prayer (she continued in prayer, verse 5). This reminds one of Anna (Luke ii. 37), whereas the widow, whose needs were not genuine, lived for an empty life of pleasure, and Paul likens her condition graphically to a living corpse (v. 6). Such had no claim on the assembly's care and provision.

"These things" Timothy should command, that is the responsibility of children to support their parents in need, and in so doing they would be irreproachable (anepilemptos cp. iii. 2). Provision for one's own close relatives was an indisputable Christian duty and those who omitted to do this were 'worse than unbelievers' (v. 8). The word 'infidel' (A.V.) in its modern sense is too strong. Even the unregenerate pagan world recognized its family ties and it was unthinkable that Christian standards should sink below this.

The Apostle goes on to deal with eligible widows and the service they can render.

Some of the statements are not easy to apprehend:

> "Let none be enrolled as a widow under threescore years old, having been the wife of one man, well reported of for good works; if she hath brought up children, if she hath used hospitality to strangers, if she hath washed the saints' feet, if she hath relieved the afflicted, if she hath diligently followed every good work" (v. 9, 10, R.V.).

A careful consideration of this passage leads one to think that a special set of widows is referred to here, not destitute widows generally, for it is inconceivable that a destitute woman would have to reach the age of 60 before she became eligible for practical help from the church.

It would appear that special duties in the local church were reserved for some of the old widows receiving aid, official recognition of this being given by being placed on a list. Apart from the age-restriction, it was necessary that she was 'the wife of one man', which can only mean she had not re-married after her husband's death (on this point compare a similar condition for an overseer of the assembly, iii. 2, 12). Furthermore she must be well reported for her conduct in the home and outside.

Such a person would be a valuable aid in entertaining visiting Christians, looking after orphans and attending to many practical details, such as feet-washing which reminds one of the Lord's own humble action (John xiii. 1-7).

All these points were not so likely to be in evidence with a younger person who was not so experienced or mature. They might commence well and then change their minds and want to give up the work and to be re-married.

The N.I.V. gives the sense well:

> "As for younger widows, do not put them on such a list. For when their sensual desires overcome their dedication to Christ, they want to marry. Thus they bring judgment on themselves, because they have broken their first pledge. Besides, they get into the habit of being idle and going about from house to house. And not only do they become idlers, but also gossips and busybodies, saying things they ought not to. So I counsel younger widows to marry, to have children, to manage their homes and to give the enemy no opportunity for slander. Some have in fact already turned away to follow Satan" (I Tim. v. 11-15).

One thing is clear, that any service begun for the Lord was to be regarded as a serious thing with first priority. Those widows who had commenced such work and then given it up had 'waxed wanton against Christ' (verse 11). And we should remember today that service for the Lord is not something for us to take up and drop when we feel like it. There is a solemn as well as a joyful aspect to Christian service, knowing that one day this, together with all our works, is coming under His searching scrutiny.

It is evident that Paul was legislating for conditions as he knew them and was using heavenly wisdom in the directions he gave to Timothy, so that problems might be avoided and the witness go on unhindered. If anyone has difficulty with the fact that during the Acts period, in I Corinthians, Paul recommended the unmarried to remain as they were, we would remind the reader that at that time 'the end of all things was at hand', with the possibility of the Lord's Second Coming being very near, waiting upon the repentance of Israel (Acts iii. 19-26; v. 30, 31). This chosen nation was laid aside in unbelief at the end of the Acts, for they did not repent and that aspect of the earthly kingdom was postponed, the revelation of the dispensation of the Mystery or Secret, taking its place (Eph. iii. 1-11) for the age in which we are now living.

In verse 16 “if any woman believer has widows” may raise problems, but there is an alternative reading “if any man or woman who believes” and this accords better with the context, for it is difficult to accept that the responsibility to relieve destitute widows would be confined to women alone.

Paul now deals once more with elders, this time concerning their remuneration. That “honour” (time) is used in this sense, verse 18 makes clear. The Apostle quotes the Mosaic precept of Deut. xxv. 4 which he had previously used in I Cor. ix. 9 and also the saying of the Lord recorded in Luke x. 7 which is more than a current proverb. The adjective ‘double’ appears to have the sense of generous provision. If God was concerned for cattle treading the corn and ordained that ample provision should be made for them, surely, the Apostle argues, those who take responsibility in service, (‘rule well’), specially those who preach and teach (verse 17) should be adequately compensated.

Further rules are now given to protect leaders from false accusations. The law of God gave through Moses required the agreement of at least two witnesses before a man was called to answer a charge against him (Deut. xix. 15). Matt. xviii. 16 and II Cor. xiii. 1 agree with this. The Apostle writes:

> “Against an elder receive not an accusation, except at the mouth of two or three witnesses. Them that sin (meaning persist in sin) reprove in the sight of all, that the rest also may be in fear” (v. 19, 20, R.V.).

At this point Paul gives Timothy a solemn charge concerning these regulations:

> “I charge thee in the sight of God, and Christ Jesus, and the elect angels, that thou observe these things without prejudice, doing nothing by partiality” (v. 21, R.V.).

This stresses even further the importance of the commands given. We do not know who ‘the elect angels’ are. There appears to be a variety of grades of heavenly beings. Those mentioned here evidently belong to the highest class. In II Tim. iv. 1 we have a similar solemn charge, but without any reference to angels. Timothy must carefully observe all the instructions given and be absolutely unprejudiced and impartial, never allowing his personal feelings to influence his judgment:

This warned Timothy against hastily appointing anyone for specific Christian service without due regard to their suitability. Some think it might refer to the restoration of penitents after discipline, but this is far-fetched and there seems no doubt that the former meaning is the correct one. It would be easy to appoint someone for Christian work who appeared to be keen, but was he worthy and fitted to carry out his task? This is what Timothy must carefully ponder and do nothing in a hurry.

Undue haste in Christian appointments has led to unworthy people being brought into the Lord’s work, which has wrought havoc and played into the enemy’s hands. Someone has said that today there are too many ‘untaught teachers’ who are quite unsuitable for the work they have taken upon themselves. Such should remember the warning of James iii. 1, bearing in mind that the word James used which is translated ‘masters’ in the A.V. is really the word ‘teachers’. Expounding the Word of God is a solemn responsibility which should never be taken on lightly. Those who do so are deeply responsible to the Lord, and if thy have taught error instead of truth they will surely receive ‘the greater condemnation’, for they have not only professed to know more than the people they teach, but have been misled themselves, and consequently have misled others also.

Commentators have been puzzled over the next verse because it appears to have no connection with the context:

> “Be no longer a drinker of water but use a little wine for thy stomach’s sake and thine often infirmities” (v. 23).

But Timothy had just been advised ‘to keep himself pure’ and he might have construed this as meaning asceticism. He evidently was not robust physically and had a tendency toward ‘neglecting the body’. Now the body must be neither over-indulged nor neglected. We know that ‘neglecting of the body’ was part of the false holiness propounded by some in the Colossian church (Col. ii. 20-23) and the Apostle Paul, who knew Timothy better than anyone else, took care to check any tendency in him to this sort of thing. Hence his advice to the young man who was the leader of his assembly, to take a little wine as a tonic. Some Christians may be surprised at this, but Paul was a good deal wiser than his critics and knew what he was doing. He had not only Timothy’s welfare at heart, but that of the whole church over which he presided.

Regarding the next verse, it is better to link it with verse 22 and treat verse 23 as a parenthesis:

> “Some men’s sins are evident, going before unto judgment; and some men also they follow after. In like manner also there are good works that are evident; and such as are otherwise cannot be hid” (v. 24, 25, R.V.).

We also give this passage in the modern N.I.V. translation:

> “The sins of some men are obvious, reaching the place of judgment ahead of them; the sins of others trail behind them. In the same way, good deeds are obvious, and even those that are not cannot be hidden.”

The Apostle is giving Timothy further advice concerning the appointment of men to Christian service. A distinction is drawn between those whose faults are obvious and others whose failings are not immediately apparent but come out later on. Timothy’s judgment must take this into consideration and this is another reason why he must not be in a hurry to appoint anyone to a Christian office. First impressions may be wrong, leading him to make wrong decisions, but this must be avoided at all costs. Of course the judgment of sin finally will be made by God, but Timothy must exercise wisdom and caution, so that the Lord’s witness and work may not be hindered.

No.9. vi. 1 - 16.
pp. 41 - 45

At the beginning of chapter vi., the Apostle Paul turns from instructions that affect the local church to those touching the household. The relationship of believing slaves to Christian, or unbelieving masters raised problems. If a slave worked for a truly saved master, he should count this a privilege and not lose his respect for such a master because he had become a brother in Christ:

> "Let as many as are servants (slaves) under the yoke count their own masters worthy of all honour, that the name of God and the doctrine be not blasphemed. And they that have believing masters, let them not despise them, because they are brethren; but let them serve them the rather, because, they that partake of the benefit are believing and beloved. These things teach and exhort" (I Tim. vi. 1, 2, R.V.).

The overriding consideration was the effect their conduct would have on Christian witness as a whole. The 'benefit' that would accrue could apply to either master of servant in the increased goodwill on both sides.

The Apostles now reverts once more to the false teachers:

> "If any man teacheth a different doctrine, and consenteth not to sound words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the doctrine which is according to godliness; he is puffed up, knowing nothing, but doting about questionings, and disputes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, evil surmisings, wranglings of men corrupted in mind and bereft of the truth, supposing that godliness is a way of gain" (vi. 3-5, R.V.).

"Those who teach a different doctrine" are referred to in i. 3 and heterodidaskaleo is used in both contexts. The 'sound words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ' are descriptive of the 'good deposit' of truth which Paul had received from the ascended Lord Jesus and had passed on to Timothy (vi. 20; II Tim. i. 12, 13; ii. 2). This is the 'doctrine' of the Pastoral Epistles around which these epistles revolve in its proclamation and practice.

It is unlikely to refer to the Gospel records of the Lord's earthly ministry which did not embrace the truth of the Mystery or the heavenly calling of the Body of Christ. It is not even certain that they were in circulation at this time.

Paul's prison ministry formed the pattern ("form of sound words") to which all teaching must conform. Those who refused to do this left a trail of havoc behind them. The N.I.V. renders these verses:

> "He (the false teacher) is conceited and understands nothing. He has an unhealthy interest in controversies and arguments that result in envy, quarrelling, malicious talk, evil suspicions and constant friction between men of corrupt mind, who have been robbed of the truth and who think that godliness is a means to financial gain."

The Apostle does not wrap things up, but clearly warns Timothy and those who stood with him of the dangers that would result if this pernicious teaching was embraced. Not only were these false teachers leading believers astray, but they were making a good thing out of it financially. "They imagine religion is a paying concern" is Moffatt's translation.

Having touched on the topic of money, Paul gives it a closer scrutiny and points out some of its dangers in relation to the believer:

> "But godliness with contentment is great gain: for we brought nothing into the world, for neither can we carry anything out; but having food and covering, we shall be therewith content. But they that desire to be rich fall into a temptation and a snare and many foolish and hurtful lusts, such as drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is a root of all kinds of evil, which some reaching after have been led astray from the faith, and have pierced themselves through with many sorrows" (vi. 6-10, R.V.).

These are indeed graphic words and need to be constantly before the mind of the believer. The Father's gracious provision sees to it that His children get all the necessities of life but not necessarily all they desire. It is important to note that "they that will be rich" of the A.V. is not just the future tense, but refers to those who desire or make it their object to amass money. The futility of this is seen in verse 7 which Paul apparently bases on Eccles. v. 15:

> "As he came forth of his mother's womb, naked shall he return to go as he came, and shall take nothing of his labour which he may carry away in his hand."

This is a lesson that so few learn. Materialism is dangled before people in so many ways today and represented as being essential for happiness. Thus governments constantly bring before the electorate the desirability of a 'rise in the standard of living' and people really believe that if they had more money and more possessions they would be perfectly content. This deceptive myth is accepted by millions and most of modern living is geared round it. The believer needs to be constantly on the alert that he avoids this attitude of mind for it can only lead to frustration, spiritual barrenness and a poverty of Christian witness and service. The Lord warned: "Take heed, and beware of covetousness; for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth" (Luke xii. 15), and "ye cannot serve God and mammon (riches)". To see a Christian ensnared by this sort of attitude is pathetic in the extreme. Solomon's experience of materialism should be a warning to all (Eccles. ii.) and his conclusion is "He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver" (v. 10). Rather than satisfying, Paul asserts that such a view can only lead to serious hurt and destruction (I Tim. vi. 9).

Verse 10 in the A.V. is not accurate. The Apostle does not say that money is the root of all evil, because this is not true. An inordinate love of money is at the root of much evil, but not all evil. The definite article is omitted in the Greek. The R.V. is more accurate, "the love of money is a root of all kinds of evil". How much better is it for the believer to look on money and the ability to earn it as a gift from the Lord and for Him to have first claim upon it! "The silver is Mine and the gold is Mine, saith the Lord of Hosts" (Hag. ii. 8), and when we give money to Him we should say, as David did of old, "of Thine own have we given Thee" (I Chron. xxix. 14).

As a contrast to money grabbing Timothy as a "man of God" must flee from this sort of thing (vi. 11). Paul gives a similar warning in II Tim. ii. 22. Timothy would doubtless remember that the title 'man of God' was given to such illustrious characters as Moses, Elijah, Elisha, David, Shemaiah and Igdaliah and he therefore had a high standard set before him and so he must pursue righteousness, godliness, faith, love, endurance and gentleness (vi. 11). He is now exhorted to:

> "Fight the good fight of the faith, lay hold on the life eternal whereunto thou wast called, and didst the good confession in the sight of many witnesses" (vi. 12, R.V.).

The word 'fight' (agonizo) means 'to contend in the games' and the cognate agon, 'race' is also used. E. K. Simpson claims that the military meaning is also present. Whether this is so or not, the verb implies a disciplined struggle that is continuous. He is also to lay hold of, or clasp, eternal life. This does not mean that he did not possess it by faith apart from works, but that now he was to continually appropriate it with a sure hold in his daily life and service. The good confession in the sight of many witnesses doubtless refers to his ordination to which allusion has already been made.

Paul now gives the last charge of this epistle to Timothy and breaks into a magnificent doxology:

> "In the sight of God, Who gives life to everything, and of Christ Jesus, Who while testifying before Pontius Pilate made the good confession, I charge you to keep this commandment without spot or blame until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ, which God will bring about in His own time—God, the blessed and only Ruler, the King of kings and Lord of lords, Who alone is immortal and Who lives in unapproachable light, Whom no one has seen or can see. To Him be honour and might for ever. Amen" (N.I.V., vi. 11-16)

Some commentators apply the whole of this doxology to the Father, although the Apostle does not address God as such here. It is better to see this as an ascription of praise to the Triune God. He is the Quickener, the Giver of life, (the Holy Spirit). The title "King of kings and Lord of lords", the supreme King and the supreme Lord, is twice ascribed to the Lord Jesus in Rev. xvii. 14 & xix. 16, and reminds one of Deut. x. 17: "For the Lord your God is God of gods, and Lord of lords, a great God, a mighty and a terrible, which regardeth not persons, nor taketh reward". God the Father, in His essence as Spirit, cannot be seen or approached and it is Christ, as the Image of the invisible God (Col. i. 15; ii. 9), Who sums Him up concretely.

Already in I Tim. i. 17 immortality (athanasia) is ascribed to God. In the context we are considering we have the statement "Who only hath immortality" that is, inherently. If this most important statement had really been believed by the professing church down the centuries, we should never have had the unscriptural and pagan idea of the immortality of the soul. The words 'soul' and 'spirit', occurring many hundreds of times in Scripture, are never termed immortal. God alone possesses it. Man can be described as a candidate for immortality. Adam the sinner lost it ("and now, lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live for ever, therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the garden of Eden", Gen. iii. 22, 23). Immortal life is found only in Christ and can be received by faith in Him as Saviour and Lord, for He has brought life and immortality (incorruption) to light through the gospel (II Tim. i. 8-11), and both immortality and incorruption are to be 'put on' by the redeemed at resurrection and not before (I Cor. xv. 51-55).

Needless to say, one cannot 'put on' what is already possessed.

No.10. vi. 17 - 21.
pp. 72 - 75

Having poured out his praise in this doxology, the Apostle Paul returns to the theme of riches, with the difference, that, in the former section he dealt with those aspiring to be rich, whereas here he is concerned with those who are already rich:

> "Charge them that are rich in this present world, that they be not high-minded, nor have their hope set on the uncertainty of riches, but on God, Who giveth us richly all things to enjoy; that they do good that they be rich in good works, that they be ready to distribute, willing to communicate; laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on the life which is life indeed" (R.V., vi. 17-19).

Believers who were wealthy were warned against a proud and lofty attitude of mind and too much dependence upon money. An abundance of material possessions is apt to produce a feeling of superiority—a dangerous attitude of mind for any believer, who is only usable by the Lord as long as he keeps really humble. There is always the danger too of relying on wealth, forgetting that money can easily take wings and fly away. In fact we all have a duty to keep a check on ourselves that our hope is not resting on the transient material things of this life, but upon the Lord and the eternal abiding riches we have in Him by grace. The advent of the Welfare State today can also be a danger, where everything is supposedly cared for "from the cradle to the grave". Let us never forget that our constant assurance rests solely upon the changeless Saviour Whose love and bounty towards us never wavers.

Those who have money in good supply are exhorted by the Apostle to use it, not for themselves, but for the benefit of others with whom they can have the privilege of sharing. In doing so they would be laying up for themselves a good and solid foundation for the future, culminating with their appearance before the Lord, the righteous Judge, Who will test and assess every man's service as to its quality, and decide whether it merits His approval.

The concluding phrase "that they may lay hold on eternal life" echoes verse 12, but with the variation that should be translated "life which is life indeed". This is the real life—the unending life to come. The present one is only a shadow, a prelude to this eternal reality. Millions live just for the present life with its problems, uncertainties and short duration. Only the believer in Christ can look forward with absolute certainty to the life to come with its unending and eternally satisfying richness, and happy is he who can live the life on earth with the future life constantly in view by faith.

The Apostle Paul concludes by giving his spiritual son a final reminder of the good deposit of truth which first of all had been given him (Paul) by the risen and ascended Lord Jesus, and now had been placed in Timothy's charge:

> "O Timothy, guard that which is committed unto thee, (the deposit, literally), turning away from the profane babblings and oppositions of the knowledge which is falsely so-called; which some professing have erred concerning the faith. Grace be with you" (vi. 20, 21, R.V.).

"The deposit" or "the good deposit" (II Tim. i. 14), had been already set forth vividly in Ephesians and Colossians, relating to the Body of Christ. This Timothy must watch over and guard as precious treasure, not allowing himself to be distracted with secondary pre-occupations. As a trustee, he must keep the terms of this divine trust and neither turn to the right hand nor to the left. Constantly he must exhort those under his charge to do likewise, for the activities of the enemy were ceaseless. His dupes would constantly seek to divert him and them by their endless arguments and disputes, which Paul called 'godless chatter and opposition' (N.I.V.). They were the ones who claimed to have the real knowledge, but all of it was false. The word translated 'science' (A.V.) must not be restricted to the modern meaning. It is knowledge (gnosis), but false knowledge can apply today in much that is deemed scientific, for it is nothing more than unproved theory. It may have a 'show of wisdom', and on the surface appears to be right, but Satan, the great enemy of God and His people, uses it to cause those who embrace it to 'wander' (astocheo) from the truth. The Apostle has used this word in i. 6 where it is translated 'swerve from'.

Alas, we can see his deadly work at the present time. There are quite a number who once stood faithfully for 'the good deposit' of truth witnessed by the spoken and written word. Now they have 'swerved aside' and left the track of truth, even opposing the things they once stood for so loyally. This is indeed distressing, but at the same time it is a warning to us all.

In the mercy of God, the rich and precious truth associated with the Body of Christ through Paul's writings has been preserved by Him, coming down to us today. It should be a constant challenge to us all who profess to receive it by faith that we seek to proclaim it in every way possible by life and lip. The age darkens and hastens to its terrible end, but let us make sure that the light of this 'good deposit' is constantly shining through us unhindered in any way. The divine charge to Timothy comes down to us who profess to be members of Christ's Body, 'the fullness of Him that filleth all in all'. Let us see to it that, by the infinite grace of God and His almighty resurrection power, we do not fail Him, but prove to be faithful members, "meet for the Master's use", channels through which He can constantly bless and enlighten others.

The last words of the epistle centre around this grace, which conclusion is peculiar to Paul's epistles. In this benediction the word 'ye' is plural, showing that this letter was designed for others besides Timothy, doubtless those under his charge. Let the last thought of the free and undeserved grace of God constantly be before our minds, for we were chosen and saved by His grace, and by that same grace alone we live and serve Him acceptably.

The Twofold Purpose of the Ages

No.1. pp. 81 - 87

The epistle to the Romans not only deals with the evils of sin and death that affect all mankind, but reveals that the whole creation has become involved, bringing problems that are beyond the ability of man to solve:

> "For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body. For we are saved by hope" (Rom. viii. 22-24).

It is hardly possible for any sensitive or thinking person to contemplate the centuries o sin, death, pain and perplexities that have characterized the history of man in general, and the believer in particular, without at times asking the question "why?". True, the context of Rom. viii. speaks of incomparable glory that will outweigh the sufferings and difficulties, and links the pain with salvation by hope and final deliverance, and, by subsequent reference to the 'groanings' of the interceding Spirit gives us the assurance that we are not left to face our sorrows and problems alone. But in spite of this, the question remains, "why was it necessary that God's plan for creation should take the course it has done?". We know from the teaching of Ephesians that the Body of Christ was chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world with the object that it should enjoy all spiritual blessings in heavenly places where Christ is now enthroned in glory. Why then did we not at creation pass straight into heavenly places with spiritual bodies fitted to experience this wealth of spiritual blessing, instead of coming into a world marred by sin and death necessitating redemption by the shed blood of the Lord Jesus Christ and also the stupendous miracle, namely that of resurrection, before the original purpose of electing love could be realized? Even though we quote "Shall not the Judge of all the world do right?", the problem still remains.

It is true to say that, with our present limitations, we shall never fully resolve this perplexity. Nevertheless the Word of God does shed a certain amount of light on this and we wish to search the Scriptures and obtain what help we can get from them. If the first two chapters of the book of Job were hidden from us, as they were from Job and his three well-meaning friends, we should be as baffled as they were in their attempt to find a reason for Job's sufferings. Those opening chapters reveal the presence of a spiteful spiritual enemy, Satan, and a challenge which the Almighty One accepted with one important reservation (Job i. 9-12).

We also possess the concluding chapter, which the three friends did not know until after the event, where Job receives 'double'. Again, we ask "why?. A gleam of light is found on enquiring into the meaning of the word "Job". C. H. Welch pointed out in his study of Job that in an appendix found in the Septuagint (the Greek translation of the O.T. which was used by the Lord Jesus, the apostles and the believers of this period) we have a statement that tells us his name was originally "Jobab". Consequently the change to Job be intentional because of its significance.

The word 'Job' in Scripture is found first of all in the Hebrew of Gen. iii. 15 where it is translated 'enmity'. Job's story is an exhibition of the enmity that exists between Satan and the seed of the woman. God said to the serpent:

> "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel" (Gen. iii. 15).

These two opposing seeds are clearly seen in the parable of the wheat and the tares. The Lord disclaims responsibility for the tares. He declares that 'an enemy (Satan) hath done this' and that the tares are the children of Satan (Matt. xiii. 27, 28, 38). Here is a suggestion that the problem of the ages, set forth in the experience of Job, derives from the Satanic antagonism and enmity to the purpose of God in creating mankind. There are other reasons of course, such as the very nature of man, designed not as a machine, but as a moral being with the power of obedience or disobedience, of going right or going wrong and thus spoiling God's intentions. It may be too that there are certain lessons and experiences that could only be realized by passing through human nature and that, in this present life, we are learning valuable and necessary lessons as a prelude to the eternal life to come in glory. However, we have not finished with the consideration of Satan's malignant activity against God and His people.

Israel, a stranger in a land not theirs (Gen. xv. 13).

This enmity is further shown in the story of Abraham and the revelation of God's purpose through him and his posterity. When Abram responded to the call of God, he was assured by the repeated unconditional promises of God that the land to which he had come would be given to him and his seed (Gen. xii. 7; xiii. 14-17; xvii. 8). In Gen. xv. Abram is again assured:

> "I am the LORD that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees, to give thee this land to inherit it" (xv. 7).

Upon hearing this promise, Abram replied:

> "Lord God, whereby shall I know that I shall inherit it?" (xv. 8).

Then follows a strange transaction with an unexpected prophecy. Abram is told to arrange for the making of a covenant which involved offerings, and then, instead of being one of the parties to the making of this covenant, he is purposely put into a deep sleep so that he himself could promise nothing. The divine answer to his question is the extraordinary revelation that his posterity, instead of occupying the land of promise, would become strangers in another land not theirs, that they would become servants or slaves and be grievously afflicted. After a long gap of 400 years, in the fourth generation, they would return 'hither again', while Abraham, to whom the promise was made would die and be buried in a good old age, without inheriting this land! (Gen. xv. 13-15). This extraordinary prophecy is borne out by the history of this people in the book of Exodus, and not till the 400 years were nearly fulfilled do we read "And God heard their groaning, and God remembered His covenant with Abraham, with Isaac, and with Jacob" (Exod. ii. 24).

The people of Israel who had been given the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession, could only return to it after 215 years of bondage and misery in Egypt, by way of the typical redeeming blood of the passover lamb! However, the above quotation is partial and the reason given by God to Abraham for this strange and protracted interlude is:

> "For the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full" (Gen. xv. 16).

The Amorites were Satan's counterfeit seed, represented later in the parable of the tares to which we have already alluded. In this parable there is not immediate divine judgment on these "tares". They are not to be rooted up straight away, but left till the harvest. Then they will be gathered out by God's agents, the angels, blotted out by being burnt up and destroyed. We say 'destroyed' advisedly, because the universalist somehow must bring them back into being if his creed is true. Any gardener understands the illustration used here. He uproots the weeds and burns them up in a bonfire, not to preserve them, but to destroy them, and this would be a most unsuitable picture of the purpose of God if His final plan is to save them for eternity. Just as the tares are left till the harvest before they are destroyed, so the Amorites' destruction is not immediate, for not until a certain quantity of evil is 'filled up' does God judge them and blot them out. In this we have a principle throughout Scripture that God often waits before judging for sin. In His righteousness He does not punish until sin has reached a certain level that deserves this, and then He acts. This must be remembered because we may sometimes fail to understand and remove them from hindering His great purposes. His righteousness and His infinite grace and longsuffering have to be reckoned with here.

The Second Time.

It is understandable that we should think that if God be God almighty, He could not take second place in His dealings with man, yet the whole record of His purpose for heaven and earth seems to point to 'the second time'. Without being irreverent, we may liken the conflict of the ages to a great game of chess where the opposing players are God and Satan with the powers of darkness under his control. In this conflict God, since creation, sometimes seems to allow Satan to make the first move. But however many moves there are and however protracted the game may be, we know for certain that it will finally be 'check-mate' with God as the Victor and Satan and his hosts defeated and annihilated. God will finally be 'all in all' and at last the wondrous plan, conceived by Him in past eternity, can go on unhindered to a glorious completion.

This principle of "the second time" can be seen in Stephen's address recorded in Acts vii. He points out that Joseph was made known to his brethren "the second time" and Moses was accepted by Israel, but only after his primary rejection (Acts vii. 13, 35). Again in Heb. ix. 28, even though 'once at the consummation of the ages' (end of the world A.V.), Christ had already 'appeared', it will not be until He appears "the second time" that salvation will be received or attained (Heb. ix. 28). In the same way, Heb.viii.7 sets aside the first covenant in favour of the second, the first covenant becoming 'old and vanishing away', while the second is established (Heb. x. 9). Hebrews also speaks of a 'better hope', a 'better covenant', 'better promises' and an infinitely 'better sacrifice', even though the rejected hope, covenant, promises and sacrifices were all ordained by God Himself originally.

We cannot help noticing too the place that pairs occupy in the early types of the O.T.—Cain and Abel, Ishmael and Isaac, Esau and Jacob and so on. This twofoldness goes right throughout Scripture. Without going into details here we list the following:

(1) The whole Bible, the Old Testament and the New Testament.
(2) The book of Genesis as a whole and in variety of pairs.
(3) The book of the Revelation, the complement of the book of Genesis.
(4) The book of the Revelation, the complement of the book of Exodus.
(5) The book of the Revelation, the complement of the Gospel of Matthew.
(6) The twofold nature of the book of Exodus.
(7) The twofold nature of the book of Isaiah.
(8) The twofold nature of the Gospel of Matthew.
(9) The twofold nature of the Acts of the Apostles.
(10) The twofold nature of the epistle to the Ephesians.
(11) The twofold character of prophetic Truth.

There are other considerations like the twofold witness of the Apostle Paul, during the Acts period and afterwards, but this list gives us a beginning, illustrating this twofoldness which is found right throughout the Scriptures.

The Twofoldness of the Word of God.

The Bible comes to us in its complete form as a twofold composition commonly referred to as (1) the Old Testament and (2) the New Testament. These titles are too ingrained for them to be exchanged for the Old and New Covenant, but that, strictly speaking, is what these books should be called.

The Greek word diatheke occurs 17 times in the epistles to the Hebrews, 11 times the word is rendered in the A.V. 'covenant' and 6 times 'testament'. The choice of these two terms seems arbitrary, for in Heb. vii. 22 we read that 'by so much' Jesus was made a surety of 'a better testament', whereas in Heb. viii. 6 we read 'by how much also He is the Mediator of a better covenant'. In Heb. viii. 8 we read 'I will make a new covenant', but in ix. 15 we have 'He is the Mediator of the new testament'. In xii. 24 He is once more the Mediator of 'the New Covenant'.

Bloomfield writes on this in his Greek Testament:

> "The sense properly assigned to it, testament, is now generally rejected, from its involving something like an absurdity. For how, it is asked, can anyone be called the mediator of a testament? How can a testament need a mediator? How can anyone be > called the mediator of his own testament? How can it be said that the testator died to make it valid?" (p.514).

The following literal translation of Heb. ix. 16, 17 is found in Dr. E. W. Bullinger's Greek Lexicon:

> "For where a covenant (is) a death (is) necessary to be brought in, of him or that which makes the covenant, for a covenant over dead ones, or victims (is) sure, since at no time has it force when he is living, the one who is making the covenant."

The last lines of this translation, if they were speaking of a covenant where the victim was an animal, such as bulls or goats, would read 'when it (i.e. the sacrificial victim) is living'. But as the victim and the One Who makes the covenant is the Lord Jesus Himself, we read, 'when He is living' which probably influenced the translators to think in terms of will-making rather than the making of a covenant.

No.2. pp. 101 - 106

In further consideration of the twofold purpose of God revealed in the holy Scriptures, we look at the book of Genesis. This contains within itself 'the book of the generations of Adam' (Gen. v. 1). In contrast to this the N.T. opens with 'the book of the generations of Jesus Christ' (Matt. i. 1). In the first book is the introduction of sin and death; in the second we have God's salvation and the hope of eternal life. These books contain the backbone of what the Word of God reveals and unfolds. The last book in the Hebrew canon is not the prophecy of Malachi, but the two books of Chronicles which open with the words 'Adam, Sheth, Enosh' and contain on the last page the ominous words 'no remedy or healing' (II Chron. xxxvi. 16), whereas the last pages of the book of the Revelation speak of the resorted 'right to the tree of life', the leaves of which are for the 'healing' or health of the nations, sin and death having been for ever removed.

There are important links of pairs in Genesis that must not be missed. They are:

(1) The creation (i. 1) and the re-fashioning (i. 2 - ii. 3).
(2) Two Adams. One present (i. 26; ii. 7), the Other promised (iii. 15; I Cor. xv. 45).
(3) Two coverings—leaves (iii. 7), skins (iii. 21).
(4) Two ways—Abel (iv. 4). Cain (iv. 5).
(5) Two Lamechs and the curse (iv. 11, 19-24 and v. 29, 30).
(6) Two heads of the nations—Adam (i. 28). Noah (ix. 1).
(7) Two pledges—the Ark (Gen. vi.). The coffin (l. 26).
(8) Abraham's two sons, Ishmael and Isaac.
(9) Isaac's two sons, Esau and Jacob.
(10) Twofold type of Christ, Joseph and Benjamin.

The first and last Adam.

It is the fashion nowadays to deny the historicity of Gen. i.-v. In many schools the pupils are taught that these chapters are no more than myth. There was never a real man called Adam. The whole story was just a fairy tale or legend, a convenient way of making a beginning in the Bible. Not only in schools, but in many pulpits these ideas are promulgated and anyone who believes that these chapters are literal history is looked on with pity or amazement.

But let us face the consequences of denying the historicity of the first five chapters of Genesis. First of all, the whole validity of the O.T. is involved, for the closing books of the Hebrew canon, as we have already pointed out, are the books of Chronicles. The first nine chapters of I Chronicles are devoted to a genealogy starting with Adam (I.Chron.i.1) and adopt without question the genealogies set out in the book of Genesis, in which there are eleven. It then goes through unbroken succession to David and his sons, the ninth chapter opening with the comment:

> "So all Israel were reckoned by genealogies."

These governed the right of succession, inheritance, marriage, priesthood and were never questioned, but always accepted as valid. So, to be reasonable, the critic must set aside the complete O.T., for it is an organic whole. When we come to the N.T., the seriousness of this repudiation becomes evident. Not only did the Lord Jesus Christ endorse and accept the O.T. as the Word of God of which not one jot or tittle should pass unfulfilled, nor can it ever be broken (John x. 35), but in resurrection, and not under the so-called limitation of the kenosis theory ("He emptied Himself", Phil. ii. 7 literally), as the conqueror of sin and death. When He was about to ascend and take His place at the right hand of the majesty on high, the Lord Jesus said "These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you" (Luke xxiv. 44) and so endorsed all that He had said concerning the O.T. Scriptures during the days of His flesh. He continued:

> "That all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the Psalms, (i.e. the whole of the O.T.) concerning Me."

Coming to the specific question concerning Adam, we note that if Gen. i.-v. is unhistorical, the genealogy of Christ is validated. Luke iii. 23-28 ends with ". . . which was the son of Enos, which was the son of Seth, which was the son of Adam, which was the son of God".

If we refer to the genealogy given in Matt. i. which commences with Abraham, we read "Abraham begat Isaac . . . . . begat Joseph the husband of Mary" (Matt. i. 1-16). How can fictitious characters beget children? There is only one logical thing to do if we deny the record of Gen. i.-v., and that is to repudiate the genealogies of the Saviour and in so doing we shall be forced to lose all the blessed and wonderful consequences resident in the prophecy and the name "Emmanuel", "God with us", which is one of the links in this chain. Further than this, in Mark x. 1-12 we have the account of the Pharisees' questioning of the Lord regarding divorce. In His reply (6, 7) Christ said:

". . . . . but from the beginning of the creation God made them male and female. For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and cleave to his wife . . . . ."

Here the Lord is quoting literally from the Septuagint version of Gen. i. 27 and ii. 24 and from this there can be no doubt whatsoever that He regarded Adam and Eve as literal persons. The context makes no sense without this.

How can anyone therefore call himself a *Christ*ian, a true believer in Christ, who does not accept as true everything that He taught? But there is more than this. The whole central section of the epistle to the Romans, namely v. 12 - viii. 39 stands or falls with a literal Adam:

"Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin . . . . . death reigned from Adam to Moses . . . . . if through the offence of one many be dead, much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which is by one Man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto many . . . . ." (Rom. v. 12-15).

Surely if 'one man' Adam is a myth, the whole of the Apostle's argument and doctrine is jeopardized. Its basic doctrines of the Christian faith: justification by faith apart from works or human merit, its "no condemnation" and its glorious 'persuasion', all have no logical basis if they do not rest upon historical fact. Both Paul and Christ must have been deceived if Adam never existed and who can trust deceived people for time and for eternity? Truly we can echo the cry of Mary, "they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid Him" (John xx. 13).

Not only is the fundamental epistle to the Romans invalidated, the glorious hope of resurrection is likewise nullified:

"For since by man (Adam) came death, by Man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive" (I Cor. xv. 21, 22).

Here the argument from Rom. v. is reinforced by the emphasis on resurrection. That Paul completely and unreservedly endorsed the opening chapters of Genesis, let the subsequent references to Adam in I Cor. xv. 45-49 speak:

"And so it is written, the first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening Spirit . . . . . the first man is of the earth, earthy: the second Man is the Lord from heaven . . . . . and as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly" (I Cor. xv. 45-49).

When we are dealing with the doctrine of resurrection, let us remember we are handling the very foundations of our faith and hope in the future. If there is no resurrection then the whole Christian faith collapses:

"And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain. Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God; because we have testified of God that He raised up Christ: Whom He raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not. For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised: and if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished" (I Cor. xv. 14-18).

We can thank the Lord with hearts continually full of gratitude that our hope is sure and certain and based upon true historical facts whether we are dealing with the O.T. or the N.T. for both these rest squarely upon a crucified and risen Saviour.

There are three more references to Adam in N.T. to complete the tale:

> "Adam was first formed, then Eve."
> "Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression" (I Tim. ii. 13, 14).

How much better and safer it is to believe the facts of God's Word, than to be deceived by the fallible opinions of men living nearly two thousand years after Christ, yet are sure that their pronouncements concerning Adam are right and the Lord Jesus (Who claimed to be the Truth, John xiv. 6), and the apostles are wrong. These people are blind leaders of the blind and their false ideas must be completely rejected.

Jude, knowing that the son of Cain was called Enoch, wrote in his epistle "Enoch, the seventh from Adam" (Jude 14), and Paul refers to the temptation of Eve by the serpent in II Cor. xi. 3. If Adam is a myth, we have no God-given Redeemer, but are stranded without chart or compass with but one thing to do, namely 'to eat and drink for tomorrow we die'! What a prospect!

The Two Coverings.

The first reaction to the consciousness of guilt, as recorded in Gen. iii. 7 is that of seeking and providing a covering. The guilty pair 'made themselves aprons', and although these man-made coverings were stripped off, being completely insufficient, nevertheless coverings were provided by God, but these were of skin and so were sacrificial (Gen. iii. 21). Psa. xxxii. 1 says "blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered", yet Prov. xxviii. 13 tells us "he that covereth his sins shall not prosper".

There is no contradiction here. Sin must certainly be covered, but if it is merely 'covered up', in contrast to being 'confessed' and 'forgiven', it is wrong. If it is covered because 'lifted up' and borne away (Heb. nasa 'forgiven'), it is blessed indeed. The word nasa translated 'forgiven' is rendered 'bear' 156 times, beside 'be borne' and 'carried', and is employed in such passages as "Surely He hath borne our griefs" and "He bare the sin of many" (Isa. liii. 4, 12). The cry of Cain, according to the A.V. of Gen. iv. 13 is "my punishment is greater than I can bear", but the margin reads "mine iniquity is greater than that it may be forgiven", with a reference to Gen. xix. 15 where 'iniquity' in the text is 'punishment' in the margin. So interwoven in the Hebrew conception is sin and punishment, forgiveness and sacrifice, that the words used are as it were the reverse and observe of a coin. One side cannot exist apart from the other.

We have no information as to how far our first parents were instructed in the symbolism of this provision of a sacrificial covering made by God. But we who have the complete Scriptures and can see both type and fulfillment set before our eyes, have no excuse. This leads us to consider the two opposing ways of approach to God recorded in Genesis which are linked with Cain and Abel. Let no one think that the antiquity of this subject makes it quite irrelevant today. It is basic for all time. God Himself has provided the way back to Himself for sinful man. He has provided one only, but it is all sufficient. The tragedy is that millions ignore it.

The Two Ways --- The Way of Cain and the Way of Abel.

Having considered the basic teaching that is inherent in the 'two coverings' revealed in the early chapters of Genesis, we now note that there are two opposing ways which are illustrated in the actions of Cain and Abel. Before we consider this, it will be helpful to realize that redemption does not stand alone in Scripture. It is followed and completed by atonement and these are not just two ways of saying the same thing, as so many Christians think. The former gives us our exodus, the way out from sin, bondage and death, whereas the latter gives us our access into the presence of a holy God, our way in, and this is associated with the worship of the One Who has redeemed us.

At the east of the garden of Eden the Lord placed the cherubim and a flaming sword which turned every way to keep the way of the tree of life. Here the word 'placed' is the Hebrew shaken, familiar to many in the term "the shekinah glory". This gives us the word 'tabernacle'. At the east end of the garden which our first parents lost, was erected the first place of worship for man who had sinned. The cherubim, subsequently found in the Ark which was placed in the Tabernacle (Exod. xxv. 18), are an integral part of the Mercy Seat (note the marginal reading at verse 19). This blood-stained Mercy Seat was a picture of the propitiation which the Lord Jesus, centuries later, was to make on Calvary's cross (Rom. v. 13-15). The rich teaching associated with the cherubim rests squarely in the redemptive work of Christ and the last references to them are found in the Book of the Revelation, where unfortunately the A.V. speaks of them as 'the four beasts'. "Living ones" is what John wrote and they are not to be confused with the wild beasts representing Satan's kingdom in this great prophecy. This last book of the Bible deals with 'the restoration of all things spoken by all the holy prophets' which relate to the setting up of the earthly phase of the kingdom of God, when Christ at last will reign supreme over the earth.

In Genesis, the flaming sword that turned every way to keep or guard the way of the tree of life was not there just as a barrier or a threat, for the word shamar is translated many times 'preserve', and ultimately that sword was to 'awake' and 'smite' the Shepherd (Zech. xiii. 7) not the sheep. We are not told that Adam and Eve drew near to worship at any time. Their story illustrate the two coverings; it is left to their two sons to set forth the two ways of approach to God.

"In the process of time" or "at the end of days" (Gen. iv. 3) Cain and Abel brought their respective offerings unto the Lord. Some particular time is indicated by this phrase. In Gen. viii. 6 and xli. 1 we have similar words, "the end of forty days" and "the end of two full years". In all probability it was a sabbath or a set season already established. Cain's offering was of "the fruit of the ground" which had been cursed, and so links up with the bloodless covering of leaves which was made by Adam and Eve.

Abel brought "the firstlings of his flock" and the fat thereof. It is important to note that the word 'also' in Gen. iv. 4 should be read with the sacrifice and not with Cain, thus:

> "And Abel brought also (that is in addition to a similar offering brought by Cain) of the firstlings of the flock and of the fat thereof."

The many references to the 'fat' in the offerings ordained by God through Moses (Exod. xxiii. 18; xxix. 13; Lev. iii. 3) and the typical teaching attached to it, make it clear that our first parents, together with Cain and Abel, were taught of God concerning the right approach of a worshipper. It is interesting to know that the Septuagint rendering of Gen. iv. 7 reads:

> "Hast thou not sinned if thou hast brought it rightly, but not rightly divided it?".

While the Greek is different from II Tim. ii. 15, the thought is the same. Cain had not 'rightly divided' or appreciated the difference of meaning that lay behind the fruit of the earth and the offering of the firstlings of the flock. Let us look closer at this verse:

> "If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted?".

This is fundamental. If mortal and sinful man could 'do well', if he could produce a righteousness that would stand the test of the divine scrutiny, he would need neither offering nor Saviour. "It thou doest not well", what then? There is nothing that can be done but rely entirely upon God's mercy, point to the Lamb of God and cry "God be merciful to me the sinner".

"Sin lieth at the door" (Gen. iv. 7). This phrase is usually interpreted as meaning 'your sin is charged against you and is ready to spring and trap you further'. It is a gratuitous inference to think that, in the days of Cain and Abel, "to lie at one's door" could mean "to impute or lay to one's charge". It is far more likely to refer to the door of the tabernacle (Gen. iii. 24 "placed" = as a tabernacle). The phrase is used repeatedly of the door of a tent (Gen. xviii. 1, 2, 10; Exod. xxvi. 36; xxix. 4, etc.). The word 'to lie', instead of referring to a crouching beast ready to spring, is used of sheep (Gen. xxix. 2) and in Psa. xxiii. 2, "He maketh me to lie down in green pastures". Finally, the word 'sin" chattah, is translated 'sin offering' 116 times (e.g. Exod. xxix. 14; Lev. iv. 3). The words 'desire' and 'rule over' are the same as those used in Gen. iii. 16.

Gen. iv. 7 therefore should read:

> "If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou doest not well, a sin-offering coucheth or lieth at the door (of the tabernacle or tent at the east of the garden of Eden). And unto thee shall be his desire, and thou (as the first-born) shalt rule over him."

Jude links together in an unholy trinity "the way of Cain", "the error of Balaam" and "the gainsaying of Korah" (Jude 11). Any gospel that is not based squarely on the offering of Christ for sin, is advocating the way of Cain and is sheer deception. Our pulpits today are full of such a travesty of the real 'good news'. "Try to be like Jesus, imitate Him day by day and do your best" is the basis of many sermons, the hope being that somehow God will make up the deficiency and ignore our failures because He is love. Millions are being lulled into a sense of false security by such teaching, but this lie can only end in eternal death. In Christ Jesus alone we have the one Mediator and Saviour "Who gave Himself a ransom for all" and whose blood "speaketh better things than that of Abel" (Heb. xii. 24).

Two attitudes to the curse on the ground.

Most believers will remember that Enoch was the one who walked with God and was translated (Heb. xi. 5). A glance at Jude 14 reveals that the writer refers to Enoch as "the seventh from Adam". Why should he say this? Simply because there was another Enoch who can easily be confused with the former one. Cain's first son was also called Enoch (Gen. iv. 17; v. 19). This Enoch had as his descendants Irad, Mehujael, Methusael and Lamech, while the Enoch of Gen. v. 18 had as his father, Jared, and as his son Methuselah, who in turn had a son named Lamech, the two names Irad and Jared differing only in the initial letter of the Hebrew.

This similarity of names is used by the arch-deceiver, Satan, in a similar way as at Babylon, there was used 'brick' for 'stone' (Gen. xi. 3). At the end of this dispensation Satan is going to fabricate a system that is so like the truth that 'if it were possible' it would 'deceive the very elect' and it will finally deceive the whole world except those faithful ones whose names are written in the Lamb's book of life (Rev. xiii. 7, 8, 13, 14). Then the deceiver will at last get what he has been scheming for since his fall, the worship of all mankind.

In Genesis it would be easy to mistake Methusael for Methuselah, whilst both Lamechs are identical in spelling. There is more in this therefore than a mere accident or superficial likeness. It is a further division of the two ways, the way of Cain leading to the Lamech of Gen. iv. 18 and the way of Enoch leading to the Lamech of Gen. v. 25.

Two further links are found in the narrative. Lamech makes his boast:

"If Cain shall be avenged sevenfold, truly Lamech seventy and sevenfold" (Gen. iv. 24).
"And all the days of Lamech were seven hundred seventy and seven years and he died" (Gen. v. 31).

There is a fundamental difference between the two Lamechs. Cain was cursed from the earth (Gen. iv. 11). The Companion Bible here reads:

"From the earth." The Hebrew accent (athnach) after 'cursed' suggests 'more than the ground' (Gen. iii. 17).

To alleviate the effects of this curse on the ground, Cain built a city with all its attractions. Lamech's son Jubal invented musical instruments, while Tubal-Cain became a worker in brass and iron. Lamech's boast about slaying a man and his contrast with Cain's protection by God (iv. 15) suggest that the metal working of his son Tubal-Cain provided him with weapons. Today, civilization with its many inventions, has laid a veneer over the curse of the ground and deadened the results of this curse. While life at the present time is easy in comparison with life in the earlier ages of man, it nevertheless prevents him from realizing his need for a Saviour and Deliverer.

The second Lamech took a different line. He called the name of his son Noah saying:

"This same shall comfort us concerning our work and toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed" (Gen. v. 29).

Toil of the hands and sweat of the face can be mitigated by the inventions of the line of Cain and yet at the same time play into the hands of the evil one, to remove or cover up the sense of utter need of a Saviour:

"This only have I found, that God hath made man upright; but they have sought out many inventions" (Eccles. vii. 29).

From one point of view it would be pessimistic defeatism to speak against the creative urge implanted in man. What wonderful things beyond man's present attainment might have been made had he not become a sinner! One thing we should have been spared is the brilliance of his mind being turned to evil things, such as fabricating terrible weapons of war leading to untold suffering and destruction. Yet, on the other hand, who among us would willingly go back to smoking flax, to a tinder box, or the rubbing of two sticks to produce a spark?

The reference to man's "inventions" in the Scriptures do not minimize their advantages, but reveal the fact that they so often displace trust in God for a stronger reliance on self, which in spiritual matters is fatal. In II Chron. xxvi. there is recorded the tragic history of king Uzziah. He started so well at the commencement of his reign for he "did that which was right in the sight of the Lord" (xxvi. 4). Yet later on, "when he was strong", his heart was 'lifted up to his destruction', for he attempted to usurp the office of the priest which was forbidden by God and he died a leper (xxvi. 16-21). The worst sin of all, pride, caused his downfall, for it is the one sin that God will not tolerate, specially in the heart of His children. No wonder we have the constant stress in the N.T. on meekness and lowliness of mind, these graces being the first characteristics of the 'worthy walk' in Eph. iv. relating to the Body of Christ.

However, other factors entered in Uzziah's case which ultimately led to this exaltation of self and these factors were related to human inventions. In his early days 'he sought God', and as long as he sought the Lord, God made him to prosper (xxvi. 4, 5). God wonderfully helped him against the Philistines and the Arabians, and the Ammonites were constrained to bring him gifts. As a consequence his name spread abroad to Egypt 'for he strengthened himself exceedingly' (xxvi. 8), but there is an ominous omission of any recognition or reference to the Lord as was recorded of him earlier.

He built towns and fortified the gates and armed his forces but the record goes on to say 'he made in Jerusalem engines, invented by cunning men, to be on the towers and upon the bulwarks, to shoot arrows and great stones withal and his name spread far abroad, for he was marvelously helped till he was strong. But when he was strong his heart was lifted up to his destruction" (xxvi. 9-16). Here is where human inventions came in and led his mind away from trust and dependence upon the Lord to trust in self and weapons of war and then pride had the mastery and he became its slave. The Hebrew word for 'engine' is chishshebonoth, the same word being used in Ecclesiastes. Perhaps the greatest blow to all who trust in such inventions, is to read in Eccles. ix. 10:

> "Three is no work, nor device (same word as invention), nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave, whither thou goest."

Human inventions cease at the grave and then what?

No.4. pp. 161 - 168

Coming back to Genesis, we note that one son of Lamech was 'the father of all such as handle the harp and the organ' and another 'the instructor of every artifice in brass and iron' (Gen. iv. 21, 22). We need not rush to extremes and deduce from this, as some do, that all music and art proceed from Satan. There could have been no music or colour unless the Creator had made these possible. Moreover we note that Satan, in his unfallen state was given 'tabrets' and 'pipes' by the God Who made him and when we come later to Israel's Temple we note the provision God made in ordaining a choir and a large orchestra to accompany His praise, and we have a number of references in the N.T. to singing and music in heaven, though this will doubtless transcend anything we know on this earth. God Himself is the supreme Musician and Artist and we see evidences of this around us in nature even though man has fallen and creation is subject to vanity. Who can look at a beautiful sunset with all its gorgeous colouring, without being moved? Satan certainly did not invent that! And the final city, that God Himself will build, the new Jerusalem is graphically described by the Apostle John in Rev. xxi. where every colour is lavished on it and its supreme beauty will be an object lesson to the whole creation.

Satan, in his wickedness, is quite prepared to use good things as well as evil things to achieve his ends, but because he uses them, this does not make them wrong in themselves. In Genesis, the boast of Lamech that he had slain a man and could avenge himself seventy and sevenfold was in direct opposition to Lamech, the descendant of Seth, of whom it is stated:

". . . . . he begat a son: and he called his name Noah, saying, This same shall comfort us concerning our work and toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed" (Gen. v. 28, 29).

While this Lamech did not live to experience the deliverance accomplished through Noah, his attitude is the one that should be ours, who are redeemed. While "we use the world" we do not 'use it to the full' (literally, 'Abuse' A.V.) or as Moffatt translates it:

"Let those who mix in the world live as if they were not engrossed in it, for the present phase of things is passing away" (I Cor. vii. 31).

The subject is vast in its scope and in its associations. It implies the pilgrim character of the redeemed and warns of the pitfalls that harmless and necessary things may become if once we yield to the false assurances and reasonings of Satan, the enemy of truth. We pass on to:

Noah, the Second Man.

Rom. v. 14 tells us that Adam is 'a figure of Him that was to come'. Adam is one of the names of Christ as 'the second Man' (I Cor. xv. 45, 47), and in the typical teaching of the first part of Genesis, Noah is the type of Christ in this respect. This can be seen if the following parallels are considered:

A D A M	N O A H
"Be fruitful and multiply, and replenish (fill) the earth" (i. 28).	"Be fruitful and multiply, and replenish (fill) the earth" (ix. 1).
Possible judgment in the background (i. 2).	Judgment in the background (vi. 7).
Let the dry land appear (i. 10).	The ground was dry (viii. 13).
Have dominion and subdue it (i. 28).	Fear and dread (ix. 2).
The image of God (i. 27).	The image of God (ix. 6).
Three sons (iv. 1, 2, 25).	Three sons (x. 1).
Nakedness covered (iii. 7, 21).	Nakedness covered (ix. 22, 23).
Cain cursed (iv. 11).	Canaan cursed (ix. 25).
The ground cursed (iii. 17).	The ground no more cursed (viii. 21).

A careful study will add to these, but the above correspondencies will at least show that Adam found his complement in Noah and illuminates Lamech's resolve already noted.

The Two Prophecies of Enoch.

Noah was the grandson of Methuselah who lived longer than any other man on earth, reaching the great age of 969 years, thus nearly attaining a millennium. Enoch called his son Methuselah because of the prophetic meaning of his name 'at his death it (the flood) shall be', or as The Companion Bible puts it, 'when he is dead it shall be sent'. Simple arithmetic will reveal the exactness of this prophecy:

Methuselah was	187 years at the birth of Lamech (Gen. v. 25).
Lamech was	182 years at the birth of Noah (Gen. v. 28).
Noah was	600 years at the time of the flood (Gen. vii. 6).
	---
	969 (Gen. v. 27).

Enoch, however, uttered another prophecy which is not recorded in Genesis, but preserved by Jude in his epistle. We quote from the R.V.:

> "And to these (not of these) also Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied, saying, Behold, the Lord came (not cometh A.V.) with ten thousands of His holy ones to execute judgment" (Jude 14).

It is important to notice that the Lord's coming referred to by Enoch was a past event in his day, not the coming of the Lord in a future day which is called His Second Advent. What Enoch said was a warning to those of his own time, that just as surely as a day of judgment in the future (the flood) was indicated by the meaning of his son Methuselah's name, so there had been a judgment by the Lord in the past and the only Scriptural event we can link this with is the fall of Satan and the angels that sided with him. Both of these tremendous judgments, as II Peter reveals, foreshadow the gigantic judgment of the last days (II Pet. ii. 4, 5; iii. 4-7).

The Twofold Nature of Genesis.

The book of Genesis falls into two parts, the first headed by Adam, the father of the human race, the second headed by Abraham, the father of the nation and the nations. Noah brings the first part of Genesis to a conclusion and builds an ark so that all flesh should not be destroyed. Joseph brings the second part of Genesis to a close, saying, "God did send me before you to preserve life" and "to preserve you a posterity in the earth" and "save much people alive" (Gen. xlv. 5, 7; l. 20). The first part of Genesis ends with an Ark; the second ends with a coffin, but with resurrection in view (l. 25, 26; Heb. xi. 22). An outline therefore of Genesis could be set out thus:

The Deep (Abyss) (Gen. i. 2).	Adam to Noah The Race	The Flood (Gen. vi.) The Ark
	Abraham to Joseph The Nation	Beyond Jordan (l. 11) The Coffin

Abraham's Two Sons.

The Apostle Paul has used the fact that Abraham had two sons, the one, Ishmael by a bond woman, the other, Isaac, by Sarah the free. This 'allegorizing' of an historical event is found in Gal. iv. 21-31. The fact that Abraham had two sons is therefore intentional in type and demands consideration although he had six more children by Keturah. Paul's use of the record in Genesis concerning Isaac and Ishmael is governed by the need to warn the Galatians believers of the spiritual implication of allowing themselves to be put under law (Gal. iv. 21; v. 3, 4). Ishmael, born of a bond woman, Hagar, represents the covenant instituted at Sinai and answers to "Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children. But Jerusalem which is above is free", and Isaac and those who are of faith are 'the children of promise'. At the close of this section the Apostle gives his clarion call:

> "Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage" (Gal. v. 1).

Many other valuable lessons can be gathered from a prayerful consideration of Genesis xii.-xxii. which Paul did not introduce into Galatians as they did not form part of his argument. The two sons represent the slavery of sin and death, represented by the law given through Moses and the mighty deliverance which Christ, the true Isaac, has accomplished for the believer by His atoning death and glorious resurrection.

We can all sympathetically enter into the trial of Abraham's faith in waiting so long for God's appointed time in the gift of Isaac, the child of promise. One of the hardest tests of the believer's pathway is to learn the lesson of waiting, for we are all more or less impatient. "Rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for Him" (Psa. xxxvii. 7), but how difficult we sometimes find this is to put into practice! Abraham was 75 years old when he departed from Haran (Gen. xii. 4). He had to wait 25 years till he was 100 years old before the promised son was given, and when he and his wife were physically incapable of having a child. Meanwhile, in line with the existing laws codified by Khammurabi, Abraham and his wife resorted to an expedient to help the Lord out of an apparent difficulty and Ishmael was born. But they had to learn that this was wrong and the hard lesson of waiting was continued. The effects of this mistake are felt to the present day, for it is from Ishmael that the Arab nations sprang. Before Isaac was given, the names of his parents were changed. Abram was altered to Abraham, "father of nations" and this name given to a man who was old and impotent! Sarai was changed to Sarah, a princess, and the covenant of circumcision was introduced.

All these things having a spiritual lesson for this aged couple who at last had their faith rewarded by the God of resurrection, Who quickened their mortal bodies by His mighty resurrection power and caused His promise of a son to be wonderfully fulfilled to the letter. Rom. iv. 16-25 and Heb. xi. 11, 12, 17-19 graphically sum up this story, and in Rom. ix. 6-9 Paul uses the record of the birth of Isaac to teach the truth of the two seeds and the plan of God which selected the descendants of Isaac and not of Ishmael, to carry out His purpose of a kingdom of priests, headed by the great King-Priest Himself, the Lord Jesus Christ through Whom God's kingdom on earth would finally be established.

The same elective purpose of God is seen in His dealings with the two sons of Isaac—Jacob and Esau. This is clearly stated in Rom. ix. 10-13:

> "When Rebecca also had conceived by one, even by our father Isaac; (for the children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God > according to election might stand, not of works, but of Him that calleth;). It was said unto her, The elder shall serve the younger."

It is a profound mistake to limit the doctrine of election to salvation. "The eternal purpose" (Eph. iii. 11) or better "the plan of the ages" has been mapped out by God which includes the human avenues through which it will surely be fulfilled and come to a triumphant conclusion. Not all the opposition of Satan, the powers of darkness and unregenerate men can thwart what God determines to be carried out, so that a perfect creation with perfect creatures will finally be established for ever.

The Twofold Gift of the Land.

In other studies we have pointed out the unconditional gift by God of a seed (posterity) and a land for Abraham. These must be kept together as they are in the original promises, and in doing this we shall be prevented from the error of spiritualizing them. The land is given definite geographical boundaries and must be taken literally (Gen. xv. 18) "unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt (the Nile) unto the great river, the river Euphrates". The following Scriptures should be carefully pondered. They are too long to quote fully: Genesis xii. 1-3; xiii. 14-17; xv. 17, 18; xvii. 7, 8; xxii. 17, 18.

This dual promise of God was repeated to Isaac (xxvi. 3) and to Jacob (xxviii. 13, 14) hence its importance in the divine purpose.

We must notice, however, that the gift of the land is in two parts. The large piece of land we have just noticed embracing the Middle East, contains Palestine, which in O.T. times was called Canaan and this is stressed as being a gift of God. His words to Abraham were:

> "I will give unto thee, and to they seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession . . . . ." (Gen. xvii. 8), and later to Moses:

> "I have also established My covenant with them, to give them the land of Canaan, the land of their pilgrimage, wherein they were strangers" (Exod. vi. 4), also in I Chron. xvi. 15-18:

> "Be ye mindful always of His covenant . . . . . Even of the covenant which He made with Abraham, and of His oath unto Isaac; and hath confirmed the same to Jacob for a law, and to Israel for an everlasting covenant, saying, Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan, the lot of your inheritance . . . . .".

So also Lev. xxv. 38, and Deut. xxxii. 49. Canaan covers the area of modern Palestine and this part of the divine gift Israel enjoyed in Joshua's day. All of God's promise concerning Canaan was realized by Israel and it is to this that Josh. xxi. 43-45 refers. Joshua's campaign was confined to Canaan. He certainly did not touch Egypt or the far east containing Babylonia and reaching to the Euphrates. Even in the most prosperous days of Israel's history under Solomon we are definitely told that Israel dwelt safely, "every man under his vine and under his fig-tree, from Dan even to Beer-sheba, all the days of Solomon" (I Kings iv. 25). Dan and Beer-sheba were the extreme north and south of Palestine only and while Solomon's suzerainty extended much further eastwards, he only reached westwards 'to the border of Egypt' (II Chron. ix. 26) and not across Egypt to the Nile.

From this it should be clear that Israel in the past has only enjoyed a portion of the land originally promised to Abraham in Gen. xv. 17, 18. God is always true to His promises and therefore Israel must yet enjoy the much larger inheritance and we believe will do so when the earthly kingdom is established at Christ's second Advent. Surely Isa. xix. 23-25 will then be fulfilled:

> "In that day shall there be a highway out of Egypt to Assyria, and the Assyrian shall come into Egypt, the Egyptian into Assyria, and the Egyptians shall serve with the Assyrians. In that day shall Israel be the third with Egypt and with Assyria, even a blessing in the midst of the land: whom the Lord of hosts shall bless, saying, Blessed be Egypt My people and Assyria the work of My hands, and Israel Mine inheritance."

The Twofold seed of Abraham.

Gal. iii. 16 on the surface seems to contradict what we have already seen concerning the numerous posterity God originally promised to Abraham unconditionally:

> "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ."

This is a favourite reference of spiritualizers who deny that the people of Israel as a nation have any future in God's plans. All the promise to Abraham has been realized in Christ, they say! but they are only looking at half of the divine picture. Paul is recalling such a verse as Gen. xxi. 12 "In Isaac shall thy seed be called". Here the Hebrew zera, which is a collective noun, is used in the singular sense with a singular verb and looks forward personally to Christ. But in Gen. xvii. 7 the same word is used in the plural sense "thy seed in their generations" and must refer to Abraham's posterity. Thus we see that God's promise to Abraham relating to his seed is twofold: (1) A natural posterity, (2) All resting on the foundation of THE SEED, Christ, "the Son of David, the Son of Abraham" (Matt. i. 1). One is not complete without the other. We should note that the Apostle Paul in Gal. iii., not only stresses the singularity of the seed, but also its plurality: "And if ye be Christ's, then are ye (all the Galatian believers) Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. iii. 29).

Jacob's Two Sons.

The reader may feel that a mistake has been made here, for Jacob had 12 sons and also a daughter. Although this is true, there are two who specially carry the story and the purpose on to the end of Genesis. They are Joseph and Benjamin.

There are seven great types of Christ found in the book of Genesis:

A | ADAM. Sin and death. Return to the dust (iii.).
B | ABEL. Accepted offering (iv. 1-4).
C | SETH. Substitution. "Instead" (iv. 25).
D | NOAH. Atonement. "Pitch" (vi. 14).
C | ISAAC. Substitution. "Instead" (xxii. 13).
B | JUDAH. Surety. "Instead" (xliv. 33).
A | JOSEPH. Preserver of life. "The coffin" (xlv. 5; l. 26).

Some may wonder why Abraham does not figure here, but he was more a type of God the Father, Who "spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all" (Rom.viii.32).

Jacob's record opens in Genesis with the words:

> "And Jacob dwelt in the land wherein his father was a stranger, in the land of Canaan. These are the generations of Jacob . . . . ." (Gen. xxxvii. 1, 2).

Jacob's generation was not written as from Padan-aram the home of Laban, but from Canaan, the land of promise, and does not commence with Reuben the firstborn, but with Joseph. Again, the record does not say 'now Jacob loved Joseph' but "Israel loved Joseph", indicating that this love was something over and above natural affection. The coat of many colours was no mere dressing up. It marked Joseph off from his brothers both as the heir and priest of the family. The consequence of this preferment was that 'his brethren . . . . . hated him'. When Rebekah prepared Jacob to deceive Isaac and so to procure the birthright, she took 'raiment of desires' literally (Gen. xxvii. 15), and throughout the Scriptures clothing has a symbolic value.

The dreams of Joseph were of great importance and were misunderstood by his brothers and even his parents. We must remember that, in Joseph's day, there were no written Scriptures and as far as the record goes, no one who possessed the gift of prophecy. Dreams were probably rare then, and God used them to make known His will. They were not given to Joseph for himself; they were prophetic. Even the dreams of this period run in pairs as follows:

First pair.	Joseph dreams of pre-eminence.	Prison.
Second pair.	Prisoners' dreams interpreted.	Deliverance.
Third pair.	Pharaoh's dreams interpreted.	Glory.

Joseph was bound to make known his dreams, for they were a communication from God Himself and could not be kept secret. The reaction of his brothers very closely anticipated the attitude of the Jews against Christ centuries later:

> "Shalt thou indeed reign over us? or shalt thou indeed have dominion over us? And they hated him yet the more for his dreams, and for his words" (Gen. xxxvii. 8).

Stephen, in Acts vii., uses the story of Joseph stressing 'the second time' and of Moses, 'whom they refused', to enforce the lesson upon his own countrymen (vii. 13, 35). It can be no accident that Judah (Judas in the Greek) suggested selling Joseph for twenty pieces of silver (Gen. xxxvii. 28).

Joseph's pathway to the throne of Egypt via prison, sets forth in type the two advents of Christ, who, during the interval while Israel suffered want, was being used to bless Gentile Egyptians and who married a Gentile wife. While there is still disagreement over the exact meaning of the title Pharaoh gave to Joseph, namely "Zaphnath-paaneah" (Genesis xli. 45) which the A.V. margin renders 'a revealer of secrets', the possibility is that it can mean 'abundance of life' or 'of food for the living' (see The Companion Bible note). If so, it was anticipating Christ as "the Bread of life". The words "what he saith to you do" (Gen. xli. 55) is echoed by Mary "whatsoever He saith unto you, do it" (John ii. 5), even as the words 'his father observed the saying' (Gen. xxxvii. 11) remind one of Mary who 'kept all these sayings and pondered them in her heart' (Luke ii. 19,51).

The necessary stages of prophetic foreshadowing can be summed up thus:

(1) The repentance of Israel (Gen. xlii. 13, 21, 22).
(2) The revelation to Israel (Gen. xlv. 1-4 cp. Zech. xii. 10).
(3) The restoration of Israel (Gen. xlv. 7, 11; xlvi. 6).
(4) The resurrection of Israel (Gen. xlix. 29; Heb. xi. 22).

So far we have been concerned with one son of Israel, Joseph, who is a very rich type of Christ. Who is the other, without whom the type is not complete? Let us first enquire why Joseph was so called. The verb 'to add' in Hebrew is jasaph and is so translated in the A.V. 39 times, its first occurrence being in Gen. iv. 2 where we read that, after the birth of Cain, 'she (Eve) added to bear his brother Abel' (she again bear in the A.V.). Here, at the beginning of the book, the birth of two sons is recorded, one being added to the other and setting forth the two opposing seeds from Cain and Abel. The other pair at the end of Genesis, which we are now considering, uses the very word "jasaph" or "Joseph" because his mother Rachel said:

> "The Lord shall add to me another son" (Gen. xxx. 24).

In Gen. xxxv. 16-18 we have the record of the birth of Rachel's second son during which she died and "as her soul was in departing, (for she died) that she called his name Ben-oni: son of my sorrow". In the ordinary course of things, no husband who loved his wife as Jacob had loved Rachel would have altered her last wish, but Jacob was constrained, (we believe by the Lord) to name him Ben-jamin, 'son of my right hand'.

To complete the type of Christ set forth in the life of Joseph we need to 'add' the picture of Benjamin, the Son of the Right Hand, as in Psa. cx. 1, "Sit Thou at My right hand" or as it is reiterated in Hebrews (Heb. i. 3, 13; viii. 1; x. 12; xii. 2). The type of Joseph ends with death in Gen. l. 26, a coffin in Egypt. We cannot stop here, for a risen Christ is essential for redemption and the final fulfillment of God's purpose, so Benjamin completes the picture by portraying the Christ Jesus of resurrection—"Son of My right hand".

The Twofoldness of the Book of Exodus.

The second book of the Bible is written around two sacrificial types of the work of Christ, namely the Passover and the Mercy Seat. In the N.T. two words are used to bring these two aspects of truth into prominence, the words exodus and eisodus. The former will be familiar to us as the title of the second book of Moses and means 'a way out'. The other word eisodus means the opposite, 'a way in'. While all Gospel preaching if it is to be faithful must stress the great work of deliverance or redemption as set forth in the Passover, a picture of the offering of the Lamb of God on Calvary's cross, it is a mistake to stop there. While redemption sets us gloriously free, we need to be able to come into the presence of a thrice holy God and so need atonement and this is based just as securely on the finished work of the Lord Jesus.

We find the word exodus in Luke's record of the Transfiguration:

> ". . . . . Moses and Elijah, who appeared in glory and spake of His decease (exodus) which He should accomplish at Jerusalem" (Luke ix. 30, 31).

Both Moses (Exod. xiv.) and Elijah (II Kings ii. 14) are associated with a miraculous parting of the waters, either of the Red Sea or of the Jordan, and there, on the Mount as representatives of the law and the prophets they both speak of His 'exodus' of which theirs were but foreshadowings.

The eisodus, or 'the way in', is found in the epistle to the Hebrews:

> "Having therefore, brethren, boldness of the eisodus (boldness to enter) into the holiest by the blood of Jesus" (Heb. x. 19).

The two aspects of Christ's finished work are indicated in Exodus iii. 7, 8, 10 and vi. 6, 7:

> "I am come down to deliver them out of the hand of the Egyptians, and to bring them up out of that land unto . . . . . a land flowing with milk and honey; unto the place of the Canaanites . . . . . that thou mayest bring forth My people the children of Israel out of Egypt."
>
> "I will bring you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians, and I will rid you out of their bondage, and I will redeem you . . . . . I will take you to Me for a people."

The Passover is the great type of the real exodus the Lord accomplished at Calvary. After Israel had crossed the Red Sea and were in the wilderness, the Tabernacle was erected with all its typical furniture and offerings. These complement the Passover with its 'way out' by stressing the equal need for a sacrificial basis to give Israel, represented by the High Priest, a 'way into' the Lord's presence without which their deliverance from Egypt would have been incomplete.

Let us give further attention to this by considering the teaching lying behind the Passover and the Tabernacle. We have this twofold aspect of the one offering of Christ in several parts of the N.T.:

> "In Whom we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins" (Eph. i. 7).

The word 'forgiveness', aphesis, is translated in Luke iv. 18 'deliverance' and 'to set at liberty'. This is the exodus aspect.

> "Ye who sometimes were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ" (Eph. ii. 13).

This is the eisodus aspect. Peter likewise presents this twofold truth:

> Redemption. "Ye were not redeemed with corruptible things . . . . . but with the precious blood of Christ" (I Pet. i. 18, 19).
> Atonement. "Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the Just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God" (I Pet. iii. 18).

The word translated 'to bring' in I Pet. iii. 18 is prosagoge, the same word that is rendered 'access' in Eph. ii. 18.

The same order is observed in Titus ii. 14:

> ". . . . . Who gave Himself for us, that He might redeemed us from all iniquity, and purify unto Himself a peculiar people . . . . .".

No.6. pp. 201 - 206

Continuing our consideration of the finished work of Christ in its twofold aspect, redemption and atonement, we notice that John's Gospel opens with 'the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world' (redemption). In the opening of his first epistle John reveals the fact that the cleansing blood of Christ enables the redeemed 'to walk in the light, as He is in the light' (atonement, I John i. 7). Israel had first to be delivered from the bondage of Egypt before they could learn the preciousness of access into the holiest of all. The one offering of Christ is both our redemption and our atonement, our 'way out' and our 'way in'. In spite of the indiscriminate use of the term, atonement is not primarily for unsaved sinners, but for the complete salvation of the redeemed:

> "Being justified freely by His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus: Whom God has set forth as a propitiation (atonement or mercy seat) through faith in His blood" (Rom. iii. 24, 25).

Before examining the record of the Passover in Exod. xii., let us acquaint ourselves with the distinctive meaning of the two words redemption and atonement as used in the O.T. The word padah which is translated 'redeem' and 'redemption' a number of times primarily means 'to sever, separate or divide'. In Exod. viii. 23 we read 'I will put a division between My people and thy people'. The Septuagint uses the word diastole translated 'difference' in Rom. iii. 22. Again, where Isa. xxix. 22 uses the word padah ('the Lord Who redeemed Abraham'), the Septuagint translates by the Greek aphorisen 'separated' as in Rom. i. 1.

The tract of country called Padan-Aram is the country separated by the two rivers, Euphrates and Tigris, and named by the Greeks Mesopotamia, the land lying in the midst of the rivers. Gaal or Goel refers to the wonderful type of Christ as the Kinsman-Redeemer. The office of the Kinsman-Redeemer is set forth in the book of Ruth and this is the One Job spoke of when he said "I know that my Redeemer liveth" (Job xix. 25).

The Passover (Exod. xii.).

Let us first of all see this chapter in outline:

A | 1, 2. The beginning of months.
B | 3-11. The feast of Passover.
C | 12, 13. I will pass over.
B | 14-17-. The feast of Unleavened Bread.
C | -17. This day I brought you out.
A | 18-20. The first month.

> "This month shall be unto you the beginning of months: it shall be the first month of the year to you" (Exod. xii. 2).

Notice that the words 'unto you' and 'to you' indicate a change. The first month of the year, till the institution of the Passover was Tisri, corresponding with our October. Here, at the Passover, Israel started anew and their New Year began which corresponds with our March-April. This is Gospel truth in type and shadow.

> "If anyone is in Christ, he is a new creation; the old has gone, the new has come!" (II Cor. v. 17, N.I.V.).

It is Christ on the cross where the sinner must commence. There is no other beginning that God recognizes. "It (the Passover) shall be the beginning of the year to you." "A lamb", "the lamb", "your lamb", such is the suggestive progression in verses 3, 4, 5, that from a Saviour, we may pass to the Saviour and not have rested until we can say my Saviour. "Your lamb shall be without blemish" (Exod. xii. 5). The law in Leviticus is stringent right down to minutest details, that the holiness and perfection of the great Antitype, the Lord Jesus Christ, might be constantly in the fore and ever be in the mind of the believer:

> ". . . . . there shall be no blemish therein. Blind, or broken, or maimed, or having a wen, or scurvy, or scabbed . . . . . ye shall not offer unto the Lord that which is bruised, or crushed, or broken, or cut . . . . . they shall not be accepted for you" (Lev. xxii. 21-25).

All such animals must be set aside "It shall be perfect to be accepted" (verse 21). The lamb was to be taken on the tenth day of the month and sacrificed on the fourteenth. This would give time and opportunity for careful inspection.

The true Lamb of God was constantly under inspection by His family, His disciples and the multitudes around Him. One day He threw out a challenge 'which of you convicteth Me of sin?' (John viii. 46). No one could reply for it was impossible. He was 'holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners' (Heb. vii. 26) and only as such could He be the Saviour of failing men and women. Had He sinned but once in thought, word, or deed, He would have needed a saviour Himself. A sinner cannot atone for or put away his own sin and put perfection in its place, let alone atone for the sin of the whole world!

Luke xxiii. contains the finding of those who examined the true Lamb of God:

Pilate.	I find no fault in this man (verses 4 and 14).
Herod.	"No, nor yet Herod: for I sent you to him; and, lo, nothing worthy of death is done unto Him" (15).
The Malefactor.	"We receive the due reward of our deeds: but this man hath done nothing amiss" (41).
The Centurion.	". . . . . glorified God, saying, Certainly this was a righteous man" (47).

Matt. xxvii. adds further evidence:

Judas.	"I have betrayed the innocent blood" (verse 4).
Pilate's wife.	"Have nothing to do with that just man" (19).

God's doctrine necessitated the tremendous statement that Christ 'was made sin for us', but it immediately adds 'Who knew no sin' (II Cor. v. 21). Peter insists that He Himself 'bare our sins' but straight away states 'Who did no sin' (I Pet. ii. 22-24) and speaks of "the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot" (I Pet. i. 18, 19).

"It shall be PERFECT to be accepted." Such was God's requirement for the type of His Son for such is the Lamb of God, our Saviour.

Exod. xii. 13 reads:

> "And the blood shall be unto you for a token upon the houses where ye are: and when I see the blood, I will pass over you."

The word oth, 'token', is often translated 'sign' in the O.T. The rainbow in the cloud is called the token or sign of the covenant (Gen. ix. 12). "The blood shall be to you for a sign", that is, it signified something and that something was life laid down:

> "The soul (life) of the flesh is in the blood: and I have given it to you upon the altar to make an atonement for your souls (lives): for it is the blood that maketh an atonement by reason of the soul (life)" (Lev. xvii. 11).

The shed blood atoned for the soul or life, by reason of the soul in it. The sprinkled blood upon the door post was a sign that redemption had been made. Nothing else could be that sign and nothing else did the Lord 'see'. No genealogy showing direct descent from Abraham could be a sign; no promises, vows, prayers, nothing but the sprinkled blood redeemed and protected those in the house. It is important to understand that the Lord 'passing over' each house of the Israelites was synonymous with protecting. It is difficult to understand that the act of passing over a building could protect it from harm. But when we realize that the word pasach, "pass over", is rendered "halt" in I Kings xviii. 21, 'how long halt ye between two opinions?' and here is the thought of suspension of movement. 'Hovering' gives the sense better in Exodus. The theme of Deut. xxxii. 11 seems appropriate here:

> "As an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings . . . . .".

The Lord, like the eagle, spread abroad His wings, hovered over the houses of His people, protecting them from the destroyer that went through the land and caused death in every house. Psa. xci. 4 expresses the feeling of pasach—'to pass over' without using the word:

> "He shall cover thee with His feathers, and under His wings shalt thou trust."

We should note too that the two side posts and the upper door post were sprinkled with the blood, but never the floor and the threshold, for not even in type would God allow 'trampling under foot the Son of God and counting the blood of the covenant . . . . . an unholy thing' (Heb. x. 29). God's true Passover Lamb was perfect inside and out and in Him alone can we find redemption, acceptance and access.

The immediate result of the Passover was that all who came under the redeeming action became 'pilgrims':

> "And thus shalt ye eat it: with your loins girded, your shoes on your feet, and your staff in your hand; and ye shall eat it in haste" (Exod. xii. 11).

There could be no more waiting in Egypt, the place of bondage, after such redemption, the exodus to freedom must start straight away. All this great illustration of the fulness of redemption must have been in Paul's mind when he wrote:

> "Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us" (I Cor. v. 7).

The Atonement.

After Israel were separated by redemption from Egypt (a type of the world system under the domination of a greater than Pharaoh, Satan), the next great typical movement was the erection of the Tabernacle. In this, the Mercy Seat is the central feature. Priests are necessary, cleansing is emphasized and the solemn privilege of access and entrance into the holiest of all is set forth where the blaze of God's glory, the shekinah dwelt. We say 'solemn privilege of access' advisedly, because only one Israelite went into this most sacred dwelling place of God, once a year. God surrounded Himself with barriers as it were to impress on His redeemed people that access into His holy presence was a privilege beyond estimation. The ordinary Israelite lived the whole of his life without once entering the most holy place in the Tabernacle. Aaron only went in once a year in his capacity as the high Priest, representing the people of Israel on the great annual Day of Atonement and then 'not without blood', for access to a thrice holy God would be for ever impossible for sinners unless they had been redeemed and cleansed by the precious blood of Christ. But we read in Heb. x. 14:

> "For by one Offering (Himself) He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified."

The most holy place of the Tabernacle was a picture of the reality in the highest heavens:

> "For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands (the earthly Tabernacle), which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us" (Heb. ix. 24).
>
> "Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest (the most holy place) by the blood of Jesus . . . . . let us draw near" (Heb. x. 19-22).

What no Israelite could do in the O.T. dispensation before the redemptive and atoning work of Christ on the cross, we who are saved and members of the Body can experience at all times:

> "For through Him (the Lord Jesus) we both (Jewish and Gentile believers) have access by one Spirit unto the Father."
>
> "In Whom (the Lord Jesus) we have boldness and access with confidence by the faith of Him" (Eph. ii. 18; iii. 12).

How highly favoured we are! May we ever value highly such a tremendous privilege and remember that the basis of it is nothing in ourselves, but it has all been wrought out for us by our glorious Saviour and Head. Redemption snaps the bondage and slavery of sin. Atonement cleanses from the defilement of sin and makes us fit to enter the holiest of all in heaven through our Lord Jesus Christ, the Way and the one Mediator, unto our God and Father.

The Twofold Nature of the Prophecy of Isaiah.

The place occupied by the prophecy of Isaiah in the Hebrew canon can be best seen if the prophets as a whole are set out in their inter-relationship. This has been ably done by C. H. Welch in An Alphabetical Analysis Part 9, p.184 and for the sake of completeness we give it here:

Structure of the Prophets according to the Hebrew Canon.

A | JOSHUA. "The Lord of all the earth."
Failure to possess the land (xviii. 3).
The Canaanite still in possession (xv. 63).
B | JUDGES. Failure. Thirteen judges.
Israel forsaking and returning to God. "No King" (xxi. 25).
C | SAMUEL. Saul (type of Antichrist). David (type of Christ).
Israel want to be "like the nations".
D | KINGS. Decline and failure under Kings.
Removal from the land.
D | ISAIAH. Israel's only hope, final blessing, and restoration.
Messiah—God's King.
C | JEREMIAH. Nebuchadnezzar (type of Antichrist).
David's "Righteous Branch". "Raised up" the Deliverer.
Israel sent into captivity among the nations.
B | EZEKIEL. The glory of God forsaking and returning to the land and people.
Jehovah Shammah. The Lord is there.
A | MINOR PROPHETS. "The Lord of all the earth." Joshua the High Priest.
Restoration of Israel to the land.
"No more Canaanite in the house of the Lord of hosts" (Zech. xiv. 21).

From this arrangement of the Prophets, we an see that Israel reached the depths of apostasy, the glory has departed and they and all mankind have proved a failure. With Isaiah we start a new movement. The nation of Israel was called to be the Lord's "servant-nation" (Isa. xli. 8), but it is the Messiah, Who, in the time of Israel's failure, is spoken of in the words of Isa. xlii. 1 "Behold My Servant". Israel is destined to be the Lord's "witness-nation" to the world (xliii. 10), but it is the greater than David Who is given as a Witness in Isa. lv. 4. The theme of this book as of all the prophets, is tersely expressed in a twofold way in Jer. xxxi. 10 "He that scattered Israel will gather him". In other words the prophets give the record of God's judgments on Israel for their apostasy and the nations associated with them for their sin, but because of His unconditional promises to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, concerning their seed and the promised land (of which Palestine is only a small part), God will honour His Word and finally save and restore the nation of Israel so that they can at last fulfil God's will and be the channel of salvation and blessing to the whole world.

Israel's only hope is presented in the above structure:

> "Israel's final blessing, restoration and only hope is in Messiah, God's King."

Isaiah's prophecy is divided, not only by these two opposing themes, but also by the history of Sennacherib's invasion recorded in chapters xxxvi.-xxxix., his challenge and defeat. The introduction of this piece of past history into a prophecy which speaks of deliverance from a future oppressor is for the encouragement of God's people. Just as the prophecy of Daniel is in two parts, so that we may see, what God say He will do in the future, he has already done in measure in the past. So before we come to the wondrous words of Isa. xl. 1:

> "Comfort ye, comfort ye My People, saith your God", the reader may be assured that what God has promised He is able to perform.

The first section of the prophecy (chapters i.-xxxix.) gives us God's judgments on Israel. In chapter i. they are likened to Sodom and Gomorrah (i. 10). They had sunk lower than animals, for even animals recognize their master. Israel failed to do so (i.3,4). Not only is Israel disciplined, but Gentile nations as well who had come into contact with Israel and for their own ends, and had injured the chosen people, for God always has respect to His promises, both for judgment and blessing. He had told Abraham that he would 'curse him that curseth thee' (Gen. xii. 3).

From chapter xl. onwards there is a dramatic change to comfort and blessing (xl. 1) ending up with a glorious picture of the future nation, saved and becoming the priestly kingdom that God had always intended they should be. Chapters lx. and lxi. should be studied as a whole (see lx. 1-3, 12, 19-22; lxi. 5-9). All this will come to pass after the Lord's Second Coming.

Twofoldness of the Gospel according to Matthew.

This gospel is divided into two parts by its dating. The words in italics are identical in the Greek:

> "From that time forth Jesus began to preach, and to say, Repent: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt. iv. 17).
>
> "From that time forth began Jesus to show unto His disciples, how that He must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders, and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and be raised again the third day" (Matt. xvi. 21).

The first part gives the commencement of the Lord's public ministry and is connected with the kingdom of heaven, the earthly phase of God's kingdom (Matt. vi. 10). This ministry is kept solely to Israel as is the ministry of the twelve disciples (xv. 24; x. 1-8). This can never be understood unless one has the Biblical conception of the role God willed Israel to fulfil in taking the knowledge of Himself to the ends of the earth (Genesis xii. 3; Acts xiii. 46, 47). The Lord planned to reach the Gentile world through the Jew and will still do so when this nation is convicted of sin and born anew at the second Advent of Christ.

The second section of Matthew deals with the death and resurrection of the One Who had come to be Israel's Messiah and King-Priest and was to be rejected. Up till xvi. 21 the Lord Jesus had kept silent about His death. The words of xvi. 21 are unambiguous and Peter's attitude, when that death was announced, confirms the truth of this statement (xvi. 22, 23). The Lord's lament over Jerusalem (xxiii. 37-39) foretells its doom owing to Israel's rejection of Him: "Your house is left unto you desolate" (38). In the mercy and longsuffering of God yet another opportunity was going to be given to this people to repent and turn to God (Acts iii. 19-26) and this covered the whole of the Acts with the promise that, if they obeyed this command, Christ would be sent back to them and the glory of God's kingdom on earth, so graphically portrayed by the O.T. prophets, would then be realized. But again they rejected Him (Acts xxviii. 17, 23-28) and were left in the spiritually blinded condition which has characterized them up to the present time and will continue to do so until, at the Lord's Second Advent, "they look on Him Whom they have pierced" (Zech. xii. 10-14), acknowledge their sin, repent and become saved and spiritually made anew by God.

At that time they will be prepared and made ready to take the knowledge of the Lord and His salvation to the ends of the earth, and will be the greatest missionaries the world has ever known. The kingdom, so long postponed, at last will be gloriously realized, for then 'the knowledge of the Lord will cover the earth, as the waters cover the sea', and He will be "King over all the earth. In that day there shall be one Lord and His name one" (Zech. xiv. 9).

The Twofoldness of John's Gospel.

As with Matthew, this Gospel is divided into two parts:

John i.-xii. The public ministry.
John xiii.-xxi. The ministry to the eleven "Having loved His own which were in the world, He loved them unto the end" (xiii. 1).

The Gospel commences with the rejection by Israel. "He came unto His own, and His own received Him not." This was written after Acts xxviii. It could not have been written before, because Israel was put to the test again during the Acts period and not laid aside in unbelief till the last chapter (Acts xxviii. 17-28). John's Gospel was written for neither Jew nor Gentile as such, but for all men. The "world" is one of its key words occurring no less than 79 times. In his epistles the word is used another 21 times. Out of 188 occurrences of kosmos, world, in the N.T., John uses the word 100 times. Any exposition of the Gospel of John that fails to take into account this key word will certainly miss the mark. While the account of the Gospel deals with aspects of the Lord's ministry in the flesh to Israel, it was certainly not written for Israel, but for mankind at large, whether Jew or Gentile and deals with the basic doctrine of life unending, which is given 'through His Name' and received by faith in Christ (John xx. 30, 31).

The Twofoldness of the Acts.

Again this book is really in two parts revolving round the witness of two men, Peter and Paul—chapters i.-xii., Peter; xiii.-xxviii., Paul. The first part concerns the longsuffering of God with Israel after crucifying their Messiah and King and the possibility of the earthly kingdom being 'restored' to them upon repentance and turning to God (Acts i. 6; iii. 19-26). Here Peter, the minister of the circumcision, is dominant until the conversion of Paul, and then as Paul's ministry commences, Peter's fades out. Paul's ministry is twofold, to the Jew first and then to the Gentile. Wherever Paul covered new ground with the Gospel, he went to the Jew and the synagogue. It was necessary to do this, he stated (Acts xiii. 46, 47) for Israel were the channel chosen by God to make the knowledge of Himself known all over the earth so that His kingdom might become a reality. Just as the Lord in His earthly life and Peter at the beginning of the Acts witness to the Jew in the land, Paul and those associated with him minister to the Dispersion, the thousands of Israelites living outside the land. When this was accomplished and the question asked late in the Acts period "have they (Israel) not heard?", the answer is "Yes, truly (verily)" (Rom. x. 18). Still they were disobedient as a whole to obey God's command to repent, and in the last chapter of Acts they are laid aside by the Holy Spirit in the darkness of unbelief. It is in this state they have been as a race ever since and will be so until the blindness is taken away from them, when the Deliverer, the Lord Jesus Christ will come back and 'turn ungodliness from Jacob (Israel)' (Rom. xi. 25-29).

Paul's prison ministry follows and this deals with the heavenly aspect of the kingdom of God, kept secret and hidden by God in Himself till revealed to Paul the prisoner for us Gentiles and then made known through his ministry, specially that of Ephesians and Colossians.

The Twofoldness of the Epistle to the Ephesians.

This wondrous letter associated with the Colossian epistle, touching heights and depths of doctrine unmatched anywhere in Scripture, is likewise divided into two sections. The first three chapters contain teaching concerning the new calling after Israel's laying aside in unbelief by God at Acts xxviii. In them the revelation is given of a secret (Mystery) kept hidden by God in past ages and from past generations of people and now made known through Paul, the prisoner of Christ Jesus for us Gentiles (iii. 1). It rests, as the whole purpose of God does, on redemption and the finished work of the Lord Jesus Christ (i. 6-8) and concerns the creation of a new company of the redeemed (ii. 14, 15), a heavenly one, which is seen closely linked to the ascended Head in the heavenly places where He is now exalted (ii. 4-6).

In the whole of this section there are no commands or exhortations. It is purely a revelation of this overwhelming calling of grace. The second part (chapters iv.-vi.) starts the practical section which enjoins a worthy walk day by day to match this supreme calling. It is interlaced with doctrine which expands what has been given in chaps. i.-iii. This epistle, together with Colossians, touches the high water mark of divine revelation.

The Twofoldness of Prophetic Truth.

Charles H. Welch dealt with this aspect of twofoldness relating to prophecy in a series of tapes. To those who have not heard these and in order to show its application to prophetic truth we give the headings and contrasts:

TWO APPEARANCES OF CHRIST ON THE EARTH
In the Past	In the Future
"He hath appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself" (Heb. ix. 26).	"Unto them who look for Him shall He appear the second time without sin unto salvation" (Heb. ix. 28).

What follows shows that Satan is no creator, but a very clever and deceptive imitator, travesting the revelation and plan of God, seeking to defeat Him and His purposes of grace:

TWO SEEDS
"Her (Eve) seed" (Gen. iii. 15).	"thy (the serpent—Satan) seed" (Gen. iii. 15).
"Wheat" (Matt. xiii. 24, 25).	"Tares" (the children of the wicked one—Satan) (Matt. xiii. 38, 39).
"Harvest (the end of the age)" "gather into barn" (Matt. xiii. 30).	"Harvest (the end of the age)" "bind in bundles to burn them" (Matthew xiii. 30).
TWO CITIES
"Salem" (Gen. xiv. 18). "Jerusalem" (Isa. lii. 1, 9).	"Babel" (Gen. x. 8-10). "Babylon" (Rev. xiv. 8 - xvii. 5).
TWO MYSTERIES (SECRETS)
The secret of godliness God manifest in the flesh (I Tim. iii. 16).	The secret of iniquity The man of sin manifested in the flesh (II Thess. ii. 3, 6).
TWO ANOINTED ONES
The Lord's anointed (Psa. ii. 2, 6). "The Lord hath anointed Me" (Isa.lxi.1; Luke iv. 18).	The anointed cherub (unfallen Satan) (Ezek. xxviii. 14-19).
TWO DYNASTIES
"David" (Psa. lxxxix. 20-37; Hos.iii.5; Luke i. 31-33).	"Nebuchadnezzar" (Dan. ii. 37, 38).
TWO FULNESSES
"Israel . . . their fulness" (Rom. xi. 12).	"Fulness of the Gentiles" (Rom. xi. 25).
TWO WOMEN
"The Bride" (Rev. xxi. 2, 9).	"The Harlot" (Rev. xvii. 3).

TWO SET OF MIRACLES
"Signs, wonders and gifts of the Holy Ghost." "to confirm" the testimony of the King and the earthly kingdom (Acts ii. 22; Heb. ii. 3, 4).	"After the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders." "to deceive" (II Thess. ii. 8-12).
TWO TRINITIES
The Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit (Matt. xxviii. 19; II Cor. xiii. 14).	The dragon, the beast and the false prophet (Revelation xiii. 1; xvii. 8; xix. 20).
TWO RESURRECTIONS
"Now is Christ risen" (I Cor. xv. 20).	"His (the beast's) deadly wound was healed" (Rev. xiii. 3, 8, 11).
TWO COMINGS (Parousia)
The Lord's Second Coming (Matthew xxiv. 29, 30; I Cor. xv. 23; II Thess. ii. 9).	The man of sin (II Thess. ii. 8, 9).
TWO SONS
The Son of God (Matt. iii. 17).	The son of perdition (II Thess. ii. 3).
TWO MYSTIC NUMBERS
Jesus 888.	The Beast 666 (Rev. xiii. 18).
TWO NAMES (in forehead)
The Father's Name (Rev. xiv. 1).	The Beast's name (Rev. xiii. 16, 17).
TWO BUILDING MATERIALS
Precious stones—The New Jerusalem (Isa. liv. 11, 12; Rev. xxi. 10-21).	Brick for stone (Babel) (Gen. xi. 3).
TWO COVENANTS
The New Covenant (Jer. xxxi. 31; Heb. xii. 24).	A covenant made and broken (Daniel ix. 27).
TWO THRONES
God (Rev. xxii. 1).	Satan and the beast (Rev. ii. 13; xvi. 10).

These prophetic pairs are two opposing lines of revelation headed by God and Satan and give a good deal of detail concerning the great conflict of the ages. This conflict is real, intense and never ceasing. How thankful we should be for Him Who was manifested to destroy the devil (Heb. ii. 14) and all his works (I John iii. 8), and, gathered under the protective care of redemption, believers in Him are for ever safe. We are on the winning side, for "if God be for us, who can be against us?" (Rom. viii. 31). Not that we must treat this tremendous battle lightly. Of ourselves we are no match for Satan and the powers of darkness under his control. But clad in the panoply of God, described in detail in Eph. vi., we are safe and can go forward without fear. May all who own the Lord Jesus as Saviour, Lord and Head so live that it may be manifest to all Whose we are and Whom we seek to serve in obedience and loyalty.

Dear Fellow-members,

Each time we write a preface to a volume of The Berean Expositor we cannot help but express our thanks and gratitude to the Lord and to all who have laboured to make these volumes possible. Difficulties increase all over the world, yet we are still able by the grace of God to issue this witness to the truth of His Word and the abundant spiritual riches contained therein.

We send this 50th volume with the prayer that the Lord will use it mightily to open blind eyes and to build up and strengthen the members of His Body so that they may be better able to give a constant and faithful witness to His Truth.

No.14. to No.21. 161-185

Reflections of Isaiah, p.31

Editor: As we indicated in the first of this series of nine studies on Isaiah, these manuscripts of the late Mr. Welch turned up unexpectedly amongst old papers. It would seem that much that Mr. Welch was anticipating at the end of this article has been included in volumes XXXIV and XXXV of The Berean Expositor, but to what extent other material has been lost we cannot say.

Archaic and Obsolete Words of the Authorized Version.

No.17. pp. 19, 20

SIMPLICITY. It is difficult to know why the A.V. translators used 'simplicity' in Rom. xii. 8, "he that giveth, let him do it with simplicity", specially as they have correctly rendered it "liberality" in II Cor. viii. 2. The Greek word means generosity or bountifulness which comes from singleness of mind. The Apostle is exhorting giving to be done with liberality.

SITH is an ancient word meaning 'since' and occurs once in the Bible in Ezek.xxxv.6 "Sith thou hast not hated blood, even blood shall pursue thee". Shakespeare uses it a number of times.

SKILL. There is an obsolete phrase "can skill" used in Solomon's message to Hiram, king of Tyre. "There is not among us any that can skill to hew timber like unto the Sidonians." The words mean "have knowledge" or "know how to do" a thing. "Can skill of" occurs in II Chron. xxxiv. 12 "all that could skill of instruments of music", meaning skilful with musical instruments.

SLEIGHT has practically passed out of modern usage except in phrases like "sleight of hand" used in juggling or tricks. 'Sleight' in Eph. iv. 14 means literally dice-playing, cheating or trickery, which is a warning against the wiles of the arch-deceiver, Satan.

SLIME was a word Tyndale used in his translation and the A.V. translators followed him "Slime they had for mortar" (Gen. xi. 3). "The vale of Siddim was full of slime pits". The Hebrew word means bitumen or asphalt and the Greek Septuagint uses asphaltos. Bitumen should be used in these contexts.

SNUFF. This is an Elizabethan word which means to inhale the breath audibly. To "snuff at" something expressed disdain or contempt. This is now replaced by "sniff at". Mal. i. 6-14 accuses the priests of apostasy and showing contempt for the altar. Verse 13 says "ye snuffed at it". We should say now "You sniffed at it" (in contempt).

SOTTISH. Up to the 17th century a ‘sot’ was a foolish person and then the word ‘besotted’ became restricted to drunkards. “Sottish” occurs once in our old English translation, “For My people is foolish, they have not known Me; they are sottish children: they have none understanding” (Jer. iv. 22). “Stupid” would be the modern equivalent here.

STILL. The old sense of this word meant continually, constantly. In Psa. lxxxiv. 4 we read “Blessed are they who dwell in Thy house; they will be still praising Thee” meaning “they will be ever singing Thy praise”. May this constant attitude of praise and thanksgiving be ours!

STOMACHER. This old word means an ornamental covering for the chest which was worn by women under the bodice. The word in the original means a rich rope, so its one occurrence in Isa. iii. 24 should read “. . . . . instead of a rich rope, a girding of sackcloth”.

STRAIN AT. “Strain at a gnat” (Matt. xxiii. 24) does not represent what the Greek actually says, which should read “strain out a gnat”, and was thus correctly rendered by Tyndale and all the other sixteenth century versions. There is the possibility that this “strain at” was a printer’s error which was never corrected. This was the opinion of Bishop Lightfoot and Archbishop French (Trench). If this was not true, it is difficult to see how the A.V. translators made this mistake. “Strain out a gnat” is correct and understandable.

No.18. p. 40

STRAWED. This is the past tense of the obsolete verb ‘straw’, which means the same as ‘strew’. We read in Exod. xxxii. 20 that Moses burnt the golden calf which Aaron had made, “and ground it to powder and strawed it upon the water, and made the children of Israel drink it”. II Chron. xxxiv. 4 tells us that king Josiah “brake in pieces” the images Israel had been worshipping “and made dust of them and strowed it upon the graves of them that had sacrificed unto them”. In Matt. xxi. 8 we read of those who cut down branches of trees and “strawed them in the way” of the Lord Jesus as He came to Jerusalem. In Matt. xxv. 24-26 a different word is used in the Greek and means “to winnow”: “. . . . . An hard man, reaping where thou hast not sown, and gathering where thou hast not strawed”. The last phrase should read “gathering where you did not winnow”.

No.19. pp. 99, 100

STUDY. In the verse so well known and vital to most of us who read this Bible study magazine (II Tim. ii. 15) it is important to realize that the Apostle Paul is not referring to study books. The Greek verb spoudazo means "be zealous", "be keen" to do a thing. In II Tim. iv. 21 it is rendered "do thy diligence to come before winter" which in modern English means "do your utmost to come before winter" because of the difficulty of traveling at that time of the year. We can be keen about many things, some of which are not really important, but the keenness of II Tim. ii. 15 is absolutely vital to the believer who earnestly desires to win the Lord's approval of his service and to stand before Him in resurrection unashamed.

SUBURBS. This word occurs over 100 times in our A.V., but hardly has the modern meaning of the word which is now kept to the outskirts of a city. Migrash means "common or pasture lands".

SUCCOUR. This old word comes from the Latin through the French and means "to run to the aid of". In Rom. xvi. 1, 2, Paul commends "Phoebe, our sister, which is a servant of the church which is at Cenchrea . . . . . that ye assist her in whatsoever business she hath need of you, for she hath been a succourer of many and of myself also". We know nothing of this Christian woman who was probably of some wealth and importance and could afford to aid and give hospitality to the Apostle and others in their journeys. Arndt and Gingrich translate, "she has been of great assistance to many, including myself".

SUFFER. This word is often used in the A.V. as it is in modern English, meaning to feel pain and endure hardship. But it is often used in the nearly obsolete sense of "permit". The Lord said, "Suffer little children and forbid them not to come unto Me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. xix. 14). This is not an injunction to tolerate little children, but the meaning is "Let the little children come to me and do not hinder them". All the modern versions reject the word "suffer" owing to its change of meaning today.

SWELL, SWELLING. There is one reference in the A.V. which is not clear from the standpoint of modern English. "The swelling of Jordan" (Jer. xii. 5; xlix. 19; l. 44) does not refer to a swelling flood of water, but to the lush vegetation on its banks. Jeremiah xii. 5 reads "If thou hast run with the footmen, and they have wearied thee, then how canst thou contend with horses? and if in the land of peace, wherein thou trusteth, they wearied thee, then how wilt thou do in the swelling of Jordan?" This is not very understandable today. The R.S.V. here is much better, "If you have raced with men on foot, and they have wearied you, how will you compete with horses? And if in a safe land you fall down, how will you do in the jungle of the Jordan?"

In II Cor. xii. 20 the Apostle Paul mentions a list of sins which he fears he will find in the Corinthian church. Among these are "swellings" which means, in modern English, conceit.

No.20. pp. 139, 140

TABERING. This obsolete word occurs once in Nahum ii. 6, 7 where we read ". . . she shall be brought up, and her maids shall lead her as with the voice of doves, tabering upon their breasts". "Taber" meant a drum and the verb "taber" meant "to beat as upon a drum". The lamenting maidens, beating upon their breasts in dismay, are a natural part of the context.

TABRET is the diminutive of 'taber', meaning a small drum or tambourine. Sometimes the A.V. translates it as 'timbrel'.

TACHE. This old word means a fastening which links two parts together. Originally the word "tack" had the same meaning and both are connected with "attach" and "detach". In Exodus "tache" describes the golden clasps that fitted into the loops on the Tabernacle curtains to hold them together.

TAKEN WITH THE MANNER. In Numb. v. 11-31 we have the hypothetical case of a wife's infidelity and the statement if "there be no witness against her, neither she be taken with the manner". This phrase was used by Tyndale who greatly influenced the A.V. translators. It means "taken in the act". The word 'manner' came from 'mainour', an Anglo-French term and refers to someone who is discovered doing something unlawful.

TEACHER. The word didaskalos is frequently used of the Lord Jesus in His earthly ministry, but this fact is veiled from the reader because 41 times the A.V. renders the word 'master' instead of 'teacher' which they only use once in connection with His witness. The Lord chose the role of teacher in His ministry to men. How wise were those who listened and responded to this greatest of all teachers! In James iii. 1 we have "My brethren, be not many masters, knowing that we shall receive the greater condemnation". The word is 'teachers' and James is reminding his readers of the deeper responsibility a teacher has than the pupil. While it is a glad privilege to teach the truth of the Scriptures, all teachers should constantly remember that there is the judgment seat of Christ to face in the next life when their service will come under His review. Teaching is therefore a solemn responsibility, for God does not treat lightly those who have wrongly taught and misled others.

The word ‘master’ meaning a ‘teacher’ probably came from the usage in schools where teachers are called ‘masters’. “Doctor” also originally meant a teacher. The earthly parents of the Lord Jesus, found Him “sitting in the midst of the doctors” in the Temple. He was sitting among the teachers. A “doctor of law” (Luke v. 17; Acts v. 34) stands for a “teacher of the law”.

TELL. This occurs 8 times in the obsolete sense of number or count. The Lord said to Abram “Look now toward and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them”. The command was to count the stars. “They told the money” (II Kings xii. 10) would be in modern English “they counted the money”. “I may tell all my bones” (Psa. xxii. 17) means “I can count all my bones”.

TEMPERANCE. This word in the Bible must not be restricted to alcohol. It means self-control and is part of the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. v. 22, 23). In I Cor. ix. 25 Paul states “every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things”. The modern equivalent is “Every athlete exercises self-control in all things”. Other occurrences are Acts xxiv. 25 and Titus i. 7, 8.

No.21. p. 160

TEMPT, TEMPTATION. These words are sometimes used in the Scriptures meaning “to put to the test”, “make trial of” without any sense of enticing to sin and they need to be used with care, specially when applied to God. “And it came to pass after these things, that God did tempt Abraham” (Gen. xxi. 1). This means “God tested Abraham”. In no sense did God try to lead Abraham to commit sin. James i. 13, 14 asserts, “Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God, for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth He any man. But every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust and enticed”.

TENDER EYED. The Scriptures testify to the fact that Jacob preferred Rachel to Leah. “Leah was tender eyed, but Rachel was beautiful and well favoured”. This does not mean that Leah had beautiful or attractive eyes, but rather that her eyes were weak. The Septuagint and the Hebrew make this clear.

THOUGHT. This word is found 13 times in the Scriptures in the sense of anxiety or worry and it is important to know this, otherwise quite the wrong sense of a passage may be taken. “Take no thought for the morrow” in the sermon on the mount means “Do not worry about tomorrow" (Matt. vi. 34). Not to make legitimate provision for the future is a sin as I Tim. v. 8 shows: "But if any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith and is worse than an infidel (unbeliever)". It is worry regarding future things for which he has made provision, that the Lord wants to save us from.

TIRE. This word has no connection with tiredness or exhaustion, but is a shortened form of 'attire'. As a substantive it means an ornament or headdress and as a verb it means to adorn. "Bind the tire of thine head upon thee" (Ezek. xxiv. 17) means "bind on your turban". "Round tires like the moon" (Isa. iii. 18) were crescent-shaped ornaments that were worn by women.

No.22. pp. 207 - 209

TO. This common word occurs hundreds of times in our English Version, but in two passages it is used in an obsolete sense. "I have a Levite to my priest" (Judges xvii. 13) and in Matt. iii. 9 "We have Abraham to our father". In these cases it is used in an archaic sense, meaning "for", "by way of", "in the capacity of". With this meaning it can also be found in Shakespeare and Spenser.

TRIBUTE. The A.V. never uses this word in the modern sense of praise. It means a tax paid or compulsory work by a vassal or subject state. In Josh. xvii. 13 Israel "put the Canaanites to tribute" means "put the Canaanites to forced labour". II Sam. xx. 24 reads "Adoram was over the tribute" and this is equivalent to "Adoram was in charge of the forced labour". Solomon likewise used conscription "upon those did Solomon levy a tribute of bondservice unto this day" (I Kings ix. 21) the meaning of which is "these Solomon made a forced levy of slaves, and so they are to this day".

TROW is an old word meaning "think", "to be of opinion", and occurs once in Luke xvii. 9, "Doth he thank that servant because he did the things that were commanded him? I trow not".

TRUE is sometimes used in the A.V. in an archaic sense. "We are true men, thy servants are no spies". Here true means honest. In John xix. 35 we have "And he that saw it bear record, and his record is true: and he knoweth that he saith true, that ye might believe". Today we would render it "He who saw it has borne witness—his testimony is true and he knows that he speaks the truth, that you also may believe".

TURTLE. The A.V. uses this word five times for the turtle-dove and not the animal. The Song of Solomon ii. 12 is a well known sentence ". . . . . the voice of the turtle is heard in our land" and it would seem that "turtle" was used in a more endearing sense than "turtle-dove".

TUTOR. In its one occurrence in our old English Version (Gal. iv. 1, 2) the word does not mean a teacher, but a guardian and this was its meaning in 1611. The Apostle Paul is dealing with the position of a young person who was not fully grown up. The N.I.V. renders the verses, "What I am saying is that as long as the heir is a child, he is no different from a slave, although he owns the whole estate. He is subject to guardians and trustees until the time set by his father".

TWAIN. This old word has the meaning of "two". "Which of the twain will ye that I release unto you?" means "which of the two do you want me to release for you?". "For to make in Himself of twain one new man" (Eph. ii. 13-18) in modern English would be "in order that He might create in Himself one new man in place of the two (Jew and Gentile)". It is important to note that the word 'make' should be rendered "create". The joint-Body of Christ is an entirely new creation taken from Jewish and Gentile believers, in which the status of Jew and Gentile has completely vanished and a new company of the redeemed has been formed with a new destiny in view—the heavenly places where Christ is now enthroned (Eph. ii. 6).

VAINGLORY. This word means idle boasting or conceit "Let nothing be done through strife or vainglory" (Phil. ii. 3) is a warning against warring and empty conceit, springing from the parent sin of pride which is so detested by the Lord.

VANITY. In the A.V. the word is never used in the modern sense of conceit which is inherent in "vainglory". It means emptiness, worthlessness, futility and is one of the key words of Ecclesiastes where so many things of this world, now ruined by sin and Satan, are regarded as empty and devoid of any lasting or eternal worth. Often it is connected with idols and idolatry. "Are there any among the vanities of the Gentiles that can cause rain?" (Jer. xiv. 22), means "can any of the false gods of the nations bring rain?". In Jer. viii. 19 "strange vanities" refers to foreign idols. "Lying vanities" in Psa. xxxi. 6 are vain idols. God says in Deut. xxxii. 21, "They have provoked Me to anger with their vanities", meaning their idolatry.

VEX. In Elizabethan English this word had a much stronger meaning than it has today, when it usually means little more than irritation. In 1611 the word stood for physical aggression, to hurt, afflict or torment. In Exod. xxii. 21 "to vex a stranger" meant to hurt or harm a stranger. In the N.T. the son who was "lunatic and sore vexed" means he was an epileptic who “suffered terribly”. “Those vexed with unclean spirits” were afflicted or harmed by unclean spirits.

VEXATION. In the same way, this was a strong term in the sixteenth century for terror or anguish. “It shall be a vexation to understand the report” is better rendered in the R.V. “. . . . . it shall be naught but terror to understand the message”.

VILE. Originally this word from the Latin vilis meant lowly, cheap or worthless. Later on it acquired the meaning of disgusting either morally or physically, but this meaning is quite absent from this word as used in the Bible. The A.V. translators were fond of ‘vile’ which they used in order to translate a number of different Hebrew words. When Job said “I am vile” (Job xl. 4) what he really meant was “I am nothing”, “of no value”. In the N.T., Phil. iii. 21 in the A.V. talks about “the vile body”, but here the Greek word means lowly or humble. There is nothing vile in the modern sense with respect to our bodies. It is rather “the body of our humiliation or humbling”. In James.ii.2 we have a poor man coming into the synagogue in “vile raiment”. This meant “shabby clothing” because of his poverty. There was nothing disgraceful about it.

VIRTUE. In two of its occurrences in the N.T. the word virtue is misleading in the A.V. The Lord said “Somebody touched Me; for I perceive virtue is gone out of Me” (Luke viii. 46). Virtue here and in Luke vi. 19 is dunamis power. The Lord sensed that power had left Him, not virtue.
