his tent", of the children of Hamor, at Shechem (Sychem in Acts vii. 16). Here Stephen says that it was Abraham who bought this sepulcher, and this is an apparent contradiction or discrepancy. When dealing with such ancient history, a little modesty on our part is not out of place, for after all, how much do we know of the every day life and business transactions of Abraham and Jacob? Let us remember that Stephen was "full of the Holy Ghost", and that he was speaking to men who thirsted for his blood, and that had he made the slightest slip, they would have pounced upon it at once. We do know that Abraham built an altar at Shechem, and he does not appear to be the man to filch ground from the Canaanite, even though the whole land was his by promise. There is every reason to believe that both Abraham and Jacob bought pieces of ground at this spot sacred to so many memories. It is further objected that Stephen was apparently confused, for he makes Abraham buy the land of Emmor the son of Sychem, whereas it was Jacob who did so. Here again we travel rather too fast. If we pick out such names as Pharaoh or Abimelech from their context, can we not introduce confusion. Was it Abraham OR Isaac that had dealings with Abimelech? the answer is that they both had dealings with him. Should anyone say that Pharaoh was kind to Israel, yet Pharaoh sought to destroy Israel, the obvious answer would be "Pharaoh is a title, not of one, but of many kings of Egypt".

Hamor or Emmor was the name of the Princes of the Shechemites, and the title persisted for at least 500 years after Jacob's time, see Judges ix. 28, even as does the title Abimelech.

The emphasis upon Samaria as a chosen spot both by Abraham and the patriarchs was a strong point in Stephen's speech, for he was the earliest advocate for spreading the truth beyond the narrow confines of Judaism, and a young man who heard his burning words, later lived and died to make that advocacy real.

The period of time between Abraham's death and Jacob's purchase was eighty-five years, and by reason of his long absence, Jacob's title may have become obscure, and he paid a fourth of the original sum in the way of a forfeit.

In Gen. xlviii. 22, we learn that Jacob not only paid for a parcel of ground in Shechem, but that he also had to resort to force of arms to recover possession. Here again a statement is made without further explanation, and we must therefore suppose that Moses was speaking of that which was common knowledge in his day.

This leads us to the story of Joseph and the land of Egypt which must form the subject of future articles.

No.21. M I S S I N G

No.22. Dothan, Goshen, Jacob-el and Joseph-el.
pp. 115 - 117

With the story of Joseph now before us, the "place" is obviously Egypt, but on the very frontier as it were, we may pause to learn a little of the place called Dothan.

> "And Joseph went after his brethren and found them in Dothan" (Gen. xxxvii. 17).
> "Just beneath Tell Dothan, which still preserves its name, is the little oblong plain, containing the best pasturage in the country, and well chosen by Jacob's sons" (Tristram).

The place was an important halting place on the great caravan road from Damascus into Egypt. On the lists of names inscribed by Tothmes III at Karnak, we find the name Duthina, which is the Egyptian spelling of Dothan.

Numerous cisterns have been discovered in the neighbourhood, hewn out of the rock, shaped like a bottle, and so making escape impossible to any one unfortunate enough to be put inside one. One of these cisterns gives the name to a khan close by which is called "The Khan of Joseph's Pit", so preserving in the very neighbourhood, the ancient story:

> "Behold a company of Ishmeelites came from Gilead . . . . . Then there passed by Midianite merchants" (Gen. xxxvii. 25-28).

First this company are called Ishmeelites, then they are called Midianites, and in chapter xxxix. 1, they are called Ishmeelites again.

Ishmael and Midian were both sons of Abraham, the former by Hagar the maid-servant of Sarah, and the latter by Keturah (Gen. xvi. 11, 12 and xxv. 2).

From Judges viii. 1 and 24, we discover that the Midianites and the Ishmeelites were still found together in the days of Gideon, and the Ishmeelites apparently were distinguished from the Midianites by the fact that they wore ear-rings (or nose-rings). The narrative of Joseph's capture is written in the language of everyday life, and the interchange of the names Midianites and Ishmeelites is easily explained by the fact that these two tribes seem to have lived and worked together.

Syrian slaves were highly prized in ancient Egypt. The most ancient treaty that is known, namely, that made between Rameses II and the Hittites, contains a clause that fugitives who have found a refuge in Syria, shall be sent back to Egypt. Professor Flinders Petrie found a will near the pyramid of Illahum which contains the statement:

> "I am giving her the four Eastern (Syrian) slaves that my brother gave me."

"From all times", writes M. J. Sourig, in an article in the Revue des deux Mondes, "the Egyptian have held in peculiar esteem the services of Semitic slaves . . . . . in the crowded streets, Syrians and negroes ran before the chariots of the rich citizens".

The land of Goshen must now be given our attention, for here the sons of Jacob were fostered by Joseph and here they multiplied and prospered until there arose the new king who knew not Joseph. From the statement made in Genesis, Goshen must have been of easy access to Canaan, not far from the Red Sea and suitable for the grazing of cattle. The LXX translates "the land of Goshen" by "Heroonpolis in the land of Rameses" (Gen. xlvi. 28). We shall have to return to this presently.

A part of the land of Goshen is called "the field of Zoan" (Psa. lxxviii. 12), and we learn that "Hebron was built seven years before Zoan" (Numb. xiii. 22). The Greeks called this place Tanis, but we now know that the Egyptian name was Zean or Zoan, and that the book of Genesis has preserved it for us intact.

"The town of Tanis is everywhere in the Egyptian inscriptions designated as an essentially foreign town, the inhabitants of which are represented "as the people in the eastern borderland" (Brugsch). The Egyptian Commandment of the fortresses which were erected here is called "Governor of the foreign peoples". Ancient Semitic names meet the archæologist in this district.

> "We meet everywhere on the eastern side of the Delta with towns and fortresses, the names of which point to very ancient Semitic colonies" (Brugsch).
> "The endeavour to pay court, in the most open manner, to whatever was Semitic, became, in the time of the nineteenth and twentieth dynasties, a really absurd mania . . . . . They used Semitic expressions like the following rosh "head"; sar "king"; beit "house" . . . . . shalom "to greet"; rom "to be high"; barak "to bless" and many others" (Brugsch).

We have actual monumental authority to show that the reception of the sons of Jacob by Pharaoh was not exceptional. A Governor writing to Menephtah, the son of Rameses II says:

> "I will now pass to something else which will give satisfaction to the heart of my lord—that we have permitted the races of the Shashu of the land of Adumo (Edom) to pass through the fortress . . . . . to nourish themselves, and to nourish their cattle on the property of Pharaoh, who is a sun for all nations" (Brugsch).

We have already observed that the LXX translated "the land of Goshen" by "Heroonpolis in the land of Rameses", and we find that the Coptic version gives the name of the place "Pithom". M. Naville tells us in his "The Store-city of Pithom" that he found Roman inscriptions bearing the name ERO CASTRA, i.e. "the (Roman) Camp Ero". Now the Greek erou represents the Egyptian aru plural of ar "magazine" or "store-house".

> "The traveler who leaves the station of Zagazig and journeys towards Tel-el-Kebir crosses, in all its width, what was the old land of Goshen" (Naville).

The Egypt of the Exodus we must consider separately, but we must draw attention to what may possibly be a most interesting link between the two books, Genesis and Exodus.

At Karnak, Thothmes III had engraved a list of 119 names of places in Palestine that were tributary and the 102nd and the 78th names in the list are of special interest to us. The former, reads Jacob-el, the latter, reads Joseph-el.

The transliteration of the name of Jacob from Hebrew to Egyptian is exact; in the name Joseph we have the Sh instead of the S, but such dialectic variations are common, as for example the two pronunciations of Shibboleth and Sibboleth.

H. G. Tomkins drew attention to two other names on this list that are illuminating. The name preceding Joseph-el is Har, which he identifies with the upland district of Mount Ephraim "Har Ephraim". Another name in the list is Naun or Nun.

Jerome tells us that the holy lady Paula, who visited Timnath-serah wondered that Joshua, who was ruler of Israel, chose such a rough country track for himself. It may be that he chose the inheritance of his fathers, the family probably had possessions there. Joshua was the son of Nun, and Nun is the name borne by this region where Thothmes subjugated the country. If Har be indeed Har Ephraim, then Joseph-el may linger in the name Yasuf, anciently called Yusepheh, but known as Yasuf in the Samaritan Book of Joshua. Yusepheh may have been softened from Yusephel, just as Ekrebel (Judith 7:18) has been softened into Akrabeh, and Yabneel into Yebnah ("Memoirs Palestine Survey").

Iqbala, six miles west of Jerusalem, may be the Jacob-el of the Karnak list. We know very little of these things, "Our work is perhaps a faint ray of light in these shades" wrote M. Groff in 1885. We are thankful for the light that subsequent archæology has thrown on Bible lands, and hope to avail ourselves of its testimony as we proceed. With one further article, dealing with a minor problem in chronology, we bring this series, so far as the book of Genesis is concerned, to a close.

No.23. A Threefold Computation (Gen. xlvi. 26, 27 and Acts vii. 14).

pp. 156, 157

On three occasions the Scriptures speak of the number of souls that entered Egypt, "66 souls" (Gen. xlvi. 26); "70 souls" (Gen. xlvi. 27; Deut. x. 22); and "75 souls" (Acts vii. 14). Confusion may exist in the minds of the casual reader, but there is nothing but absolute accuracy in the Divine record.

> "All the souls that came with Jacob into Egypt, which came out of his loins, besides Jacob's son's wives, all the souls were threescore and six" (Gen. xlvi. 26).

All the difficulty vanishes in connection with these three sets of numbers 66, 70 and 75, when the records are examined and each computation would pass the most scrupulous audit. The lowest number 66, is the sum of all the souls that came "with" Jacob into Egypt, which came out of his loins, "besides" Jacob's son's wives.

The second number 70, refers to a different method of computation.

> "The sons of Joseph, which were born him in Egypt, were two souls: all the souls of the house of Jacob, which came into Egypt, were threescore and ten" (Gen. xlvi. 27).

Here we have the addition of the two sons of Joseph, the addition of Jacob himself, for it does not here say that this number "came with Jacob" and the addition too of Joseph, for he was already in Egypt.

The third reference is found in the speech of Stephen, where he said:

> "Jacob and all his kindred threescore and fifteen souls" (Acts vii. 14).

As Stephen was appointed to oversee the affairs of the "Grecian" members of the church, he would naturally use the Septuagint, or ancient Greek translation of the O.T., and in that version there is an addition at Gen. xlvi. 20 which reads:

> "And there were born unto Manasseh and Ephraim, whom his concubine the Aramitess bare him, Machir; and Machir begat Gilead. And the sons of Ephraim the brother of Manasseh were Shuthelah, Tahath and the sons of Shuthelan, Edem (or Bered or Becher)."

These names are actually found in the Authorized Version of Numb. xxvi. 29, 35 and I Chron. vii. 14, 20. It will be seen that Edem, Berech and Bered are names that are interchangeable. Before tabulating this threefold list, we present the summary for clearness sake.

The sons of Leah (Gen. xlvi. 8-15), omitting Er and Onan, who died in the land of Canaan, amount to 31, to which must be added the one daughter Dinah, making 32 in all.

The sons of Zilpah (Gen. xlvi. 16-18) which include Serah the daughter of Asher amount to 16, which brings the sum up to 48.

The sons of Rachel (Gen. xlvi. 19-22), are fourteen in number, but from this must be subtracted Joseph, Manasseh and Ephraim, from the list of those who comprise the 66, as they were already in Egypt. This brings the number to 59, of those who went "with" Jacob, or 62 of those who came into Egypt. To these totals must be added the Sons of Bilhah (Gen. xlvi. 23-25) seven in all making the total 66. (??? out of fourteen of Rachel can only Manasseh and Ephraim be subtracted! Therefore one is accountable.)

The three lists may be visualized thus:

	The "66"	The "70"	The "75"
The Sons of Leah, Zilpah, Rachel, Bilhah	66	66	66
Jacob himself		1	1
Joseph, Manasseh and Ephraim		3	3
Two sons of Manasseh & three of Ephraim			5

With this computation, the time periods of the book of Genesis come to an end. With the opening of the book of Exodus we are confronted with another chronological problem but that we will leave for another article.

Mere lists of figures may not be very edifying, but as we face the fact that every link in the chronological chain from Adam to Joseph is complete, that nothing is left to surmise or chance, that an apparent omission in one place is supplied by material in another, we cannot help expressing our delight and our thankfulness in all these evidences of inspiration and of truth, and find it increasingly impossible to lower the standard that the Scripture sets for itself, "given by inspiration of God".

No.24. The Forty Years, from the Exodus to the border of Canaan (Exod. xii. - Josh. v.).

pp. 201 - 204

While the book of Genesis forms a part of the Pentateuch and was written by Moses, the book of Exodus, which we are about to study is the first book that contains the great leader's name. The genealogy of the book of Genesis leads us steadily on, with every date checked and accounted for until in the last chapter we arrive at the year 2369 since Adam, with Joseph's age as 110 years. When we turn to the book of Exodus, however, we are at a loss. There is no connexion established between the closing verses of Genesis and the opening of Exodus so far as chronology is concerned. All we know is that a change of dynasty has taken place, "A new king who knew not Joseph" has arisen and Israel are seen to be in affliction in the land of Egypt. The problem before us is how are we to bridge the gulf and establish a true connexion with the dates that subsequently appear in Exodus and onward. We have all the material to hand, although at first it does not appear very evident.

We have already seen that from the call of Abram at the age of 75, to the Exodus of Israel from the bondage of Egypt was 430 years. The proofs of this are given in earlier articles of this series. It is again asserted by Scripture for Exod. xii. 40 says: "Now the sojourning of the children of Israel who dwelt in Egypt, was four hundred and thirty years". The call of Abram took place in the year 2083 (Gen. xi. 31; xii. 1; Acts vii. 4). If we add 430 to this date, it will give us 2083 + 430 = 2513 as the date of the Exodus.

In Exod. ii. 11 we read: "It came to pass in those days, when Moses was grown." How old was Moses "when he was full grown"? It would be fruitless to speculate. Any age, say 21 or 33 would be just as reasonable a guess as another.

Stephen in his speech before the high priest said:

> "And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in words and deeds. And when he was full forty years old, it came into his heart to visit his brethren the children of Israel" (Acts vii. 22, 23).

We must remember that Stephen spoke in the presence of his most bitter enemies, and that the slightest mis-statement that he made would have brought them down upon him like a pack of howling wolves. There may have been preserved records that were accessible at the time of Stephen, he may have spoken by direct inspiration of God, or he may have accepted the tradition of the Rabbis on this point. This does not mean that by accepting tradition, Stephen would have been wrong, for tradition can and is sometimes right. As for example the traditional names of the magicians of Exodus, Jannes and Jambres, are endorsed by the apostle Paul.

Dr. Lightfoot quotes from Beresh Rabba and Shemoth Rabba:

> "Moses was forty years in Pharaoh's court and forty years in Midian, and forty years he served Israel. Rabba Jochanan Ben Zaccai exercised merchandise forty years, was learning the law forty years, and forty years he ministered to Israel. R. Akibah was an illiterate person forty years, he bent himself to study forty years, and forty years he ministered to Israel" (Hebrew and Talmudical Exercitations on the Acts).

From Exod. vii. 7 and Acts vii. 30 we learn that Moses was eighty years of age at the end of the Midian sojourn, when he stood before Pharaoh. Going back to our chronological lists we find that from the call of Abram to the death of Joseph (2083-2369) was 286 years. If we add the age of Moses 286 + 80 = 366, and subtract this sum from 430 (430 – 366 = 64), we discover that the interval between the death of Joseph and the birth of Moses was 64 years. We can now continue our table of dates and carry it forward from the record of Genesis.

2369	Joseph died at the age of 110 years (l. 26).
64	Add 64 years to the birth of Moses.
2433	Moses born (Exod. ii. 2).

The reader will remember that in Gen. xv. 16, the Lord said that Israel would return from their bondage "in the fourth generation". In Exod. vi. 16-20 we have the genealogy of Moses from Levi.

> "These are the names of the sons of Levi according to their generations: Gershon, and Kohath and Merari . . . . . the sons of Kohath, Amram . . . . . and Amram took him Jochebed his father's sister to wife; and she bare him Aaron and Moses."

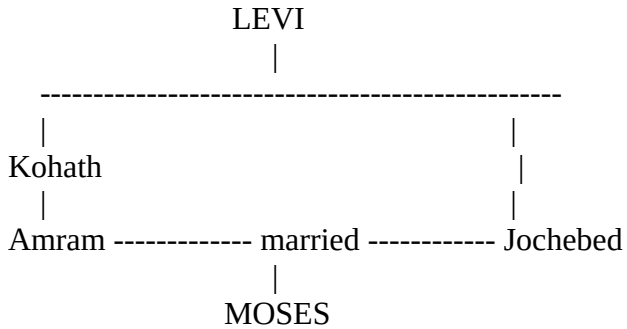
It is evident that Amram married his aunt, and until the law, there was apparently nothing revealed that would forbid such a union. Numb. xxvi. 59 adds to the genealogy of Exod. vi., the comment:

> "The name of Amram's wife was Jochebed, the daughter of Levi, whom her mother bare to Levi in Egypt."



"In the fourth generation."

Four generations therefore do actually span the interval, strange as it may appear at the first.

It is not without significance that the length of the period which covers Exod. i. 6, the death of Joseph 2369, to the Exodus of Exod. xii. 40, 2513 is 144 years, a number that carries the mind on to the overcomers under a greater tyrant than Pharaoh.

According to the record of Deut. xxiv. 7, 8, Moses was 120 years old when he died. That means, that from the Exodus of Exod. xii., to the end of Deuteronomy is another period of 40 years. Now, with a book so ancient as the Pentateuch, we might expect that, while quite a number of dates occur throughout the record of Israel's wanderings, yet, absolute accuracy, that takes account of months, yea, of days, is neither to be looked for nor expected. We are dealing however with an inspired volume, and the Higher Critical conception of a veritable "Mosaic" of different authors put together long after the event by an unknown and unhonoured "editor" makes the accuracy of this chronological data verge upon the miraculous, so that it is simpler to believe that Moses wrote the whole while under the inspiring control of God.

The first set of dates that must receive attention are those that link the Exodus with the setting up of the Tabernacle, and these form a chain of three well-established links. (1) From the Exodus to the Wilderness of Sin; (2) From the wilderness of Sin to the giving of the Law at Sinai; (3) From Sinai to the erection of the Tabernacle. We find our data in the following passages. A new date line is drawn at Exod. xii. 1.

> "This month shall be unto you the beginning of months: it shall be the first month of the year to you" (Exod. xii. 1).
> "The fourteenth day of the same month" (Exod. xii. 6).
>
> "It came to pass at midnight . . . . . Israel journeyed from Rameses to Succoth" (Exod. xii. 29-37).
>
> "And Moses wrote their goings out according to their journeys by the commandment of the Lord . . . . . they departed from Rameses in the first month, on the fifteenth day of the first month, on the morrow after the Passover" (Numb. xxxiii. 2, 3).
> "On the fifteenth day of the second month Israel came unto the wilderness of Sin, after their departure out of the land of Egypt" (Exod. xvi. 1).

Nothing could be more explicit. Exactly one month was occupied in this journey, and we note the fact and pass on to the next station, Sinai.

> "In the third month . . . . . the same day came they unto the wilderness of Sinai" (Exod. xix. 1).

While Moses does not actually say "the fifteenth day" here, the words he uses "the same day" indicate as much, and the happenings recorded in Exod. xvi., xvii. and xviii. can scarcely be crowded into a lesser period. This then gives us one month to Exod. xvi. 1 and one month to Exod. xix. 1. We now consider the third link in this chain. The tabernacle was erected,

> "In the first month in the second year, on the first day of the month" (Exod. xl. 17).

This gives us a period of nine months and a half, and consequently Exod. xii.-xl. covers just eleven and a half months.

Exodus to Wilderness of Sin	1 month
Wilderness to Sinai	1 month
Sinai to Tabernacle	9½ months

	11½ months

The next book, Leviticus, contains no dates, but we gather from the opening of Numbers, that the giving of the Levitical laws occupied another month:

> "And the Lord spake unto Moses in the wilderness of Sinai in the tabernacle of the congregation, on the first day of the second month in the second year" (Numb. i. 1).

Leviticus, therefore occupies one month. The book of Numbers is occupied mainly with the wandering of Israel in the wilderness, and we go to the first chapter of Deuteronomy and the third verse to get a fixed point from which to work back.

> "In the fortieth year, in the eleventh month, on the first day of the month" (Deut. i. 3).

This is the date of the close of Numbers, and its locality is—> "in the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho" (Numb. xxxvi. 13).

From this first day of the eleventh month, we can go back a period of exactly 6 months to the death of Aaron which took place according to Numb. xxxiii. 38, 39 on the first day of the fifth month of the same year. The death of Miriam is recorded in Numb. xx. 1, when the children of Israel arrived at Kadesh at the close of their wanderings. This occurred in the first month, but we have no date given to tell us the exact day.

The complete period of 40 years extends to Josh v. 10-12 where the manna ceased, and Israel for the first time ate the corn of the land. The duration of Israel's wanderings coincide with the eating of the Manna, and so we are on certain ground here.

> "The children of Israel did eat manna forty years, until they came to a land inhabited: they did eat manna, until they came unto the borders of the land of Canaan" (Exod. xvi. 35).

2433	Moses born (Exod. ii. 2).
80	Add 80 years when Moses began to lead the People.

2513	The Exodus of Israel from Egypt.
2513	The Exodus of Israel from Egypt.
40	Add 40 years from the Exodus to Gilgal (Josh. v. 10).

2553	The entry of Canaan under Joshua.

Here for the time being we must stay. The reader would find help on the typical character of these 40 years, by looking up and carefully reading the other occasions where 40 is used in a similar way as a period of trial and test. To facilitate this piece of personal study, we give references to a number of occasions where the number 40 is most evidently used in a symbolic manner. Gen. vii. 17; Numb. xiv. 33; I Kings xix. 8; Jonah iii. 4; Ezek. iv. 6; Matt. iv. 2.

No.25. The Allegorical Character of Egypt, "the House of Bondage".

Having traced the chronology of the books of Moses, and established that the entry into the land of Canaan occurred in the year 2553 from Adam, it is evident that if we assign the year B.C.4004 for the creation of Adam, this will bring us to (4004 – 2553 = 1451) the year B.C.1451 for the entry into the land. The reader will find that this is the date arrived at in the Appendices of "The Companion Bible", although the intervening steps may not always coincide with what has been brought forward here. We must now retrace our steps, for not only is time an important factor in the outworking of the purpose of the ages, but the place where certain events occurred has often a contribution to offer. Returning therefore to the opening of the book of Exodus the very first verse speaks of Egypt, and the place that Egypt occupies in the unfolding of the purpose of the ages must now be given consideration. The size of the country known as Egypt has not varied to any appreciable extent since the beginning. The bounds indicated by Ezek. xxix. 10 and xxx. 6 are true to-day. For all practical purposes, however, "Egypt" is the tract of land irrigated by the River Nile. Upon this the very life of Egypt depends.

The Hebrew name for "Egypt" is "Mitzraim" or "the land of Mitzraim". This was the name of the second son of Ham, and consequently, the Canaanites were closely related to the Egyptians. Just as the word "Canaan" indicates "the low country", the strip of coast lying along the Mediterranean, so Mitzraim means "dual" and is used to indicate the natural division of Egypt into Upper (the South) and Lower (the North). Occasionally the singular form Matzor occurs, but whether this is a poetic title or is intended to refer to one half of Egypt only, has never been satisfactorily decided.

We have positive proof that Egypt must be considered as having an allegorical significance in the one reference that we find in the book of the Revelation. There, in the eleventh chapter, we have "the two witnesses", even as Egypt had the two witnesses, Moses and Aaron. These witnesses have power—among other things—"over waters to turn them to blood, and to smite the earth with plagues" (Rev. xi. 6), closely resembling the plagues sent upon Egypt. At the end of their appointed time we read that these two witnesses will be killed:

> "And their dead bodies shall lie in the street of the great city, which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt, where also our Lord was crucified" (Rev. xi. 8).

Light is let in upon one of the great characteristics of Egypt by a word in the fourteenth of Zechariah. Speaking of the days that follow Armageddon, the prophet says that:

> "Everyone that is left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem, shall even go up from year to year to worship the King, the Lord of Hosts, and to keep the feast of tabernacles" (Zech. xiv. 16).

The nations which disobey are to be punished "even upon them shall be no rain" (17). Egypt however is an exception. Egypt does not depend immediately upon rain, but upon the overflow of the River Nile, and consequently the punishment reserved for Egypt is "plague" (18, 19). Here is one of the allegorical features of Egypt. It does not depend upon rain—in other words it is a picture of the world that does not consciously depend upon God. We say "consciously" advisedly, for the "Nile" is not self sufficient, it must ultimately be fed with rain from heaven, and the most godless depend moment upon moment for life and breath and all things upon the God they deny. Typically, however, Egypt stands for a world where there may be "gods many" but where there is no confessed dependence upon God. So in famine, Abraham "went down into Egypt" (Gen. xii. 10) and we feel sure that the words "went DOWN" have more than a mere geographical intent. It was a downward movement spiritually, even though the test was great.

Another feature of Egypt that is allegorical, in application, is the use and number of its chariots and horses. In the law of Moses it is written for the guidance of Israel's kings:

> "He shall multiply horses to himself, nor cause the people to return to Egypt, to the end that he should multiply horses" (Deut. xvii. 16).

Hezekiah was reminded by the representative of Assyria of this temptation to trust in the horses and chariots of Egypt.

> "How then . . . . . put thy trust on Egypt for chariots and horsemen?" (Isa. xxxvi. 9).

In the thirty-first chapter the prophet pronounces "Woe to them that go down to Egypt for help; and that stay on horses and trust in chariots, because they are many; and in horsemen, because they are very strong, but they look not unto the Holy One of Israel, neither seek the Lord . . . . . Now the Egyptians are men and not God; and their horses are flesh and not spirit" (Isa. xxxi. 1, 3). The typical meaning of this emphasis upon "horse and chariot" is once more independence of the Lord. "Flesh" not "spirit", mere numbers and physical strength. The Psalmist said:

> "Some trust in chariots and some in horses; but we will remember the name of the Lord our God" (Psa. xx. 7).

On one occasion, a short article dealing with Psalm xx. 7 was sent direct to the printer, without being first made readable by the typist. Being unaccustomed to our handwriting, the printer made a valiant attempt to decipher it, and although we could not allow his interpretation to appear, it nevertheless, though a mistake, expressed the very truth of the matter. This was the printer's version:

"Some trust in charity, and some in works &c."

and it can be left as a comment upon the second typical character of Egypt.

When Stephen would summarize the training which Moses received at the court of Pharaoh he said that Moses was "learned in all wisdom of the Egyptians" (Acts vii. 22).

This wisdom of Egypt which makes some of their buildings to-day the wonder of the world, and makes the record of their intelligence and industry almost like a fabulous tale, this wisdom nevertheless was "the wisdom of the world" that finally "crucified the Lord of glory". To the Egyptians, owing to the usurpation of the "Shepherd Kings" a "sheep" was an "abomination", and Israel's ritual which demanded the sacrifice of a lamb was to the Egyptian abhorrent (Exod. viii. 26). So was enacted upon the soil of Egypt the age-old antagonism of human wisdom to the cross of Christ. This wisdom of Egypt, moreover, led the people into the lowest of idolatrous degradation:

> "Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, and changed the glory of the uncorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things" (Rom. i. 22, 23).

It must be remembered that when the Lord smote the firstborn, He also said "against all the gods of Egypt will I execute judgment".

Egypt stands therefore for all that is attractive and prosperous in a world that knows not God. Its wisdom, its idols, its wealth, its horses and chariots, its very climate, all combine to present us with a picture of this present evil world (Gal. i. 4), its bewitchment (Gal. iii. 1), its trust in "men" not "God" (Gal. i. 1, 10), "flesh" not "spirit" (Gal. iii. 3) where the "cross" is an offence (Gal. v. 11), even as a sheep was the abomination of the Egyptians, and where the child of God is in "bondage" (Gal. ii. 4). The attractiveness of Egypt, "leeks, and onions and garlick" (Numb. xi. 5) and the decision "Let us make a captain, and let us return unto Egypt", find an echo in the cry of the apostle:

> "But now after that ye have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage?" (Gal. iv. 9).

Ten times in the A.V. of the O.T. is Egypt denominated "the house of bondage", and this title is embedded in the ten commandments (Exod. xx. 2), and remembered wherever "the law" is known. There are other occurrences (e.g. Deut. vii. 8; Jer. xxxiv. 13 "out of the house of bondmen") and other variants which we have not tabulated. Five times in Deuteronomy, Moses reminds Israel that they were Pharaoh's "bondmen" and in xxviii. 68, reveals that for their sins the nation will know something of this experience once again.

Another suggestive title given by the Scriptures to Egypt is “the iron furnace”:

> “The Lord hath taken you, and brought you forth out of the iron furnace, even out of Egypt” (Deut. iv. 20).

This is remembered in Solomon’s great dedicatory prayer (I Kings viii. 51), and by Jeremiah (Jer. xi. 4).

> “The fining pot is for silver, and furnace for gold: but the Lord trieth the hearts” (Prov. xvii. 3).

Israel were tried in this furnace of Egypt, but they carried out with them much dross mixed with their gold. Another fiery trial awaits them (Mal. iii. 1-3) when the Lord will sit as a refiner, and the sons of Levi (the priests) shall indeed be purged and the offering of Judah (the King) be pleasant.

The Prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel abound with references to Egypt, and of the Minor prophets Hosea, Joel, Amos, Micah, Nahum, Haggai and Zechariah together refer to Egypt twenty-seven times.

The subject is vast, but we give a selection from the prophet Isaiah so that the typical character of Egypt may be seen: “The shame of Egypt” (xx. 4); “Trust in the shadow of Egypt” (xxx. 2); “Woe to them that go down to Egypt for help” (xxxi. 1); “This broken reed, Egypt” (xxxvi. 6).

Lastly, we must draw attention to the King of this house of bondage, Pharaoh.

> “There arose up a new king over Egypt, which knew not Joseph” (Exod. i. 8).

When Joseph ruled in the land, the Hyksos or Shepherd Kings were reigning, and Manetho, the ancient Egyptian historian says that these Hyksos “kept possession of Egypt five hundred and eleven years”. After this, he says, “The Kings of Thebais and of other parts of Egypt made an insurrection against the shepherds” and out of this insurrection arose “the new king” who knew not Joseph and who afflicted Israel.

In case any reader should feel that we have made a serious omission in not dealing with the promise made in Isaiah to the ultimate blessing and Assyria, we just remark that this is rather a blessed example of superabounding grace than anything to do with Egypt as a type.

No.26. Step by Step, From Succoth to Sinai.
pp. 239 - 244

We are now to follow, as faithfully as possible, the route of the Exodus and the journey of Israel to Mount Sinai. It is obvious that before we can attempt this, we must arrive at some clear understanding as to the locality from which the Exodus started. Egypt as we know was divided into Upper and Lower, the lower being to the north and including the Delta. In Psalm lxxviii. we read:

> "Marvellous things did He in the sight of their fathers, in the land of Egypt, in the field of Zoan."
> "How He had wrought His signs in Egypt, and His wonders in the field of Zoan" (Psa. lxxviii. 12, 43).

The ancient city of Egypt, known to-day as Tanis, was originally called Zoan.

> "According to the geographical inscriptions, the Egyptians gave to this plain, of which Tanis was the centre, the name of Sokhot Zoan, 'the plain of Zoan', the origin of which name is traced back as far as the age of Rameses II" (Brugsch).

Not only is there this "remarkable agreement", but Scripture provides further information concerning the ancient city. In Numb. xiii. 22 Moses refers to Hebron, a Canaanite city founded by the Hyksos on their way through Palestine, and this leads him to speak of another city closely associated with these Shepherd Kings and Israel, namely "Zoan", saying:

> "Now Hebron was built seven years before Zoan in Egypt" (Numb. xiii. 22).

Reginald Stuart Poole says that Zoan had borne another name in times earlier than Moses. It was called Ha-awar and was the celebrated Avaris, the stronghold of the Shepherd dynasty in which they had a garrison of 240,000 men, with large stores of provisions. The name Ha-awar is Semitic. The new King, who arose after the Shepherd Kings were overthrown, swept away every possible trace of their hated presence. The name of their city was changed to Zoan, and the past was so effectually blotted out that Manetho, who lived B.C.300 did not know that Avaris was Tanis. Higher Criticism teaches that the book of Numbers was written about a century earlier than this date by a Babylonian, or Palestinian Jew. If Manetho after searching the records of the Egyptian Temples was ignorant of the whereabouts of Zoan, how could this writer of the higher critics have discovered it? Believing Numbers to have been written by Moses who knew the close connexion of Israel with both Zoan and Hebron, all is clear.

Scripture however does more than reveal a knowledge of the past. The future is just as certainly an open book to the Great Author. Ezek. xxx. 14 reveals that Zoan would become desolate, "I will set fire in Zoan". Sir Gardner Wilkinson says:

> "The plain of San (the Arabic form of Zoan) is very extensive, but thinly inhabited; no village exists in the vicinity of the ancient Tanis . . . . . The field of Zoan is now a barren waste: a canal passes through it without being able to fertilize the soil."

Tanis or Zoan therefore, is the locality associated with the Exodus of Exod. xii. Indeed both the ancient name Ha-awar or Avaris, and the latter Zoan, mean "going out" or "departure", it being a fortress that was built in anticipation of Assyrian attack and so was placed near the frontier.

Did the Exodus start, however, from Zoan? We know that some distance must have separated Israel from the Egyptians because of the discrimination made regarding the effect of the plagues. The record of Exod. xii., reads:

> "And the children of Israel journeyed from Rameses to Succoth" (Exod. xii. 37).

Not only so, but later, Moses was commanded to write the record of these journeys, and gives most careful details as to where they pitched and the number of days' march the journey occupied. This is found in Numb. xxxiii:

> "And they departed from Rameses in the first month, on the fifteenth day of the first month . . . . . and the children of Israel removed from Rameses, and pitched in Succoth" (Numb. xxxiii. 3, 5).

Although Rameses and Succoth have not yet been identified by the excavator, Pithom which is associated with Rameses, has been unearthed. It was a "treasure city" (Exod. i. 11), and a monument bearing the name Pa-Tum has been discovered. M. Naville laid bare the granaries in which corn was stored, and came across thick walls of crude bricks. Historians have referred to Phitom under the name Heroopolis, this we now find was a Greek form of Ar the Egyptian word for storehouse. The district around Pithom however bore the name of Succoth.

> "Thuket or Succoth was a district before being a city: its name is often mentioned in papyri of the nineteenth dynasty . . . . . Its name is generally written with the determinative of foreign lands, although it was a part of Egypt, thus showing that it was a border land" (Edouard Naville).

That Succoth and Pithom were both frontier cities and in the midst of pasturage, an official report of the time of Menephthah makes clear:

> "We have allowed the tribes of the land of Atuma (probably Edom) to pass through the stronghold of King Menephthah, of the land of Succoth, towards the lakes of Succoth, in order to feed themselves, and to feed their cattle on the great estate of Pharaoh."

At this frontier stronghold Israel passed the first night of their journey. Had Pharaoh not given his consent Succoth could have effectually prevent Israel's advance. From Succoth the host of Israel went to Etham, on the edge of the wilderness (Exod. xiii. 20).

We learn from the great tablet of Philadelphus, found near Pithom, that this city and its neighbourhood were the starting point of commercial expeditions to the Red Sea. While therefore we have not yet discovered Etham, we are practically certain of its locality. Israel must have turned eastward or north-east, and come to the verge of the wilderness. This was of course the nearer way to Palestine. A few more marches and they would have been involved in war with the Philistines. To avoid this (Exod. xiii. 17, 18) God led them about, through the wilderness of the Red Sea. Pharaoh misread this apparent change in the direction of the host and concluded, to his own destruction, that they had become "entangled" in the land, and that the wilderness had "shut them in" (Exod. xiv. 3).

A certain amount of difficulty in following the journey of Israel to Sinai was experienced by investigators, so long as it was believed that the crossing of the Red Sea took place somewhere about Suez. The discovery of Pithom, Rameses and Succoth, revealed the impossibility of Suez being the site of the crossing, and the discovery that the "bitter lakes" were originally part of the Red Sea which in the course of centuries has receded to its present position, practically fixes the site of the crossing.

The reader will not expect from us a geographical survey, but we must give some proof for the statement concerning the Red Sea. Naville found evidences at Pithom that the "Red Sea extended much farther north than it does now". The Greek name for this city, as we have said, is Heroopolis, and a Latin inscription bearing the name Ero Castra was found on the site. Both Greek and Latin authors state that this city was built at the head of the Arabian Gulf. Artemidos, states that ships sailed from Heroopolis. Ptolemy said that the head of the Heroopolitan gulf was one-sixth of a degree south of the city. About twelve or fifteen feet above the present sea level, there are, near the bitter lakes, layers of salt, and Sir J. W. Dawson says:

> "We have indisputable evidence in the marine beds with Red Sea shells extending towards the Bitter Lakes . . . . . these shells are of recent Red Sea species."

These evidences by reliable investigators are sufficient proof for our assertion that the Red Sea penetrated further north than it does to-day.

Close to Pithom there was a city called Pi-ker-chat, apparently the Pi-hahiroth* of Exod. xiv. 2. Following the narrative of the Exodus, we come to the next stage in their journey.

> [* - The reader who knows the Hebrew alphabet will not be disturbed by the gutturals that are found in the Egyptian, but absent from the English spelling. Nearly all vowels and aspirates in Hebrew require heavier breathings than we are accustomed to use.]

Somewhere near Pi-hahiroth and over against Baal-zephon the Israelites crossed the Red Sea, or as it is in the original Yam Suph "The Sea of Reeds". Their itinerary is resumed in Exod. xv. 22:

> "So Moses brought Israel from the Red Sea, and they went out into the wilderness of Shur; and they went three days in the wilderness and found no water. And when they came to Marah, they could not drink of the waters of Marah, for they were bitter" (Exod. xv. 22, 23).

In the record of Numbers there is a slight difference:

> "And they departed from before Pi-hahiroth, and passed through the midst of the sea into the wilderness, and went three days journey in the wilderness of Etham, and pitched in Marah" (Numb. xxxiii. 8).

A careful examination of the original makes all plain.

> "They went out toward the wilderness of Shur" (Exod. xv. 22).

Exod. 15 supplies us with the information we first need. We ask, which direction did Israel take after crossing the Red Sea? We now know "they went towards the wilderness of Shur". Now Shur means "a wall", and this is exactly what the district looks like.

> "Its unvarying wall-like front, here the most conspicuous object in the landscape, might well have given the name 'wilderness of Shur' (wall) to the desert region in which it is situated" (Ordnance Survey).

The record of Numb. xxxiii., however, ignores this "direction" and reports the actual journey accomplished, "three days journey in the wilderness of Etham". This wilderness is situated about sixty miles north of Suez, opposite the Bitter Lakes, and it was through this waterless wilderness that Israel marched for three days before they came to water.

Where is Marah? So long as Suez was held to be the point where Israel crossed the Red Sea, the wells known as Ayum Mousa "the wells of Moses", which are a few miles south of Suez, could hardly be the site of Marah, for Israel took three days to reach this spot. If, however, the crossing took place at Pi-hahiroth, then the forty-odd miles is fully accounted for, and the wells which bear the name of Moses exactly fit the requirements of the narrative.

From Marah the Israelites marched to Elim where were twelve wells of water, and threescore and ten palm trees (Exod. xv. 27). Where is Elim? There is some few miles further on, a spot that answers very fully to the necessities of the case.

> "The eye is again refreshed by the sight of green tamarisks and feathery palms, and just off the customary track is a pleasant stream of running water. This is Wady Charandel, generally regard as Elim" (Prof. Palmer).

The Speaker's Commentary says:

> "The only objection to the identification of this valley with Elim is the shortness of the distance, between it and Howara, the supposed Marah. This 'objection' does not exist for those who place the crossing at Pi-hahiroth, and we can be reasonably sure that Elim has been placed upon the map."

From Elim, the camp move unto the wilderness of Sin (Exod. xvi. 1). Here the conditions were such that the Israelites said:

> "Ye have brought us forth into this wilderness, to kill this whole assembly with hunger" (Exod. xvi. 3).

Here the Lord intervened and gave the people the "Manna". From the wilderness of Sin, the people moved on to Rephidim, where Amalek met them and where Moses prayed while Joshua gave battle (Exod. xvii.).

Urquhart, in his "New Biblical Guide" asks and answers several pertinent questions that deal with the presence of Amalek and the site of Rephidim.

(1) Was there a population big enough to offer resistance to Israel? Proofs are given from inscriptions and from the remains of buildings that a large population inhabited the vicinity of Sinai in the days of Moses.
(2) Was there any reason why a conflict should take place at that time—April or May? The answer is found in the intense heat and the extreme value of every drop of water.
(3) Was there any spot along this route, where trained men of war would instinctively seize and hold? There is. If the reader will consult a map he will find where the road dips down somewhat toward the base of Serbal, Hesy el Khattalin. Beyond that point the fertile track begins; while here, at Hesy el Khattalin, it is a dry and thirsty land where no water is.

> "In the Wady Feirain moreover is a rock which Arab tradition regards as the site of the miracle" (Prof. Palmer).

There is also at hand a hill Jebel Tahu (Windmill Hill), about 700 feet high, exactly suited for the place where Moses lifted up his hands in prevailing prayer.

Now as to Sinai:

> "In the third month, when the children of Israel were gone forth out of the land of Egypt, the same day came they unto the wilderness of Sinai . . . . . and Israel camped before the mount . . . . . go ye not up unto the mount nor touch the border of it . . . . . they stood at the nether part of the mount" (Exod. xix. 1, 2, 12, 17).

Speaking of the journey from Rephidim to Sinai, Dean Stanley said:

> "I cannot imagine that any human being could pass by that plain and not feel that he was entering a place above all others suited for the most august sights on earth."

Mount Sinai is a huge mass about two miles in length. The narrative demands a mountain with a camping space before it capable of accommodating 3,000,000 people, with still further room for them to move forward at command, to a mountain that "might be touched". All the conditions are met by Jebel Musa, "the mountain of Moses".

In front of that part of the mountain known as Ras Sufsufeh, there stretches a plain which by actual measurements has been shown capable of affording one square yard for every one in the host of Israel, with two Wadies for them to withdraw into in their fear.

> "Ras sufsufeh rises up from the plain, inviting, one might say, a closer approach, and presenting no obstacle whatever, had the people been incited by a common impulse of curiosity" (Urquhart).

The reader must remember that the name Horeb is used interchangeably with Sinai, and while Horeb is applied as a name to the whole peninsula, Sinai is reserved as a name for the mountain itself.

Had the Exodus covered a district that had remained thickly inhabited, the chance that any possibility of following the itinerary after so many centuries would be practically nil. As it happens, Sinai is a desolation, and has been for a lengthy period, and so the route taken by Israel over 2,000 years ago is still perceptible.

The SECOND EPISTLE to TIMOTHY.

No.34. The Fourfold Equipment of the Man of God (iii. 16, 17).

pp. 8 - 12

As the limit of our space had been reached when we had dealt with the opening statement of II Tim. iii. 16, namely, that "all scripture is given by inspiration of God", we were obliged to defer the consideration of the consequences of this statement until the present article. In order that we may perceive the relation of parts in this passage, let us note the following:

All Scripture Divinely Inspired

for doctrine	\		/	The man of God
for reproof	\	in order	/	may be perfect for correction	/	that	\	thoroughly furnished
for instruction	/		\	unto all good works.

Writing to the Hebrews, the Apostle said: "The word preached did not profit", and the reason that he gives is "lack of faith" (iv. 2). This supplies an important corrective. The Scriptures, even though divinely inspired, are addressed to intelligent moral creatures. They are certainly "profitable" if received by faith, acknowledged by obedience and held in love, but there is not the slightest warrant for believing that they can be of any profit to anyone who does not "mix with faith" the things he hears. If it were otherwise, then the superstitious Jew who wears his phylacteries or who fixes the Mezuzah to his doorpost is an example to be followed. It is well to realize the mind of God in this matter. Take another example. The epistle of James ask a pointed question and only a shallow reading could ever misunderstand and lead to the idea that James is teaching something contrary to justification by faith.

> "What doth it profit . . . . . though a man SAY he hath faith, and have not works? can faith save him?" (ii. 14).

Or when the apostle speaks to the Jew trusting in the external rite of circumcision:

> "For circumcision verily profiteth if thou KEEP the law; but if thou be a BREAKER of the law, thy circumcision is made uncircumcision" (Rom. ii. 25).

Or once more, let the apostle show the hollowness even of martyrdom, where "charity" is lacking:

> "And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing" (I Cor. xiii. 3).

Inspired Scripture is most certainly profitable, but only if it be accepted in faith and acknowledged in life.

Ophelimos occurs four times in the New Testament and each of the occurrences falls within the pastoral epistles.

Ophelimos* "Profitable".

> "For bodily exercise is profitable for a little; but godliness is profitable unto all things" (I Tim. iv. 8).
> "These things (i.e. that believers should maintain good works) are good and profitable unto men" (Titus iii. 8).
> "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable" (II Tim. iii. 16).

The apostle condemns the doctrine of the false teachers, not saying their teaching is "uninspired" but that it is "unprofitable" (Titus iii. 9), "useful for nothing" (II Tim. ii. 14), "vain" (I Tim. vi. 20), in utter contrast with inspired Scripture which is "sound" or "healthful" (I Tim. i. 10; II Tim. i. 13) and profitable indeed. There is nothing vague about the "profitableness" of Scripture, and the apostle proceeds at once to specify the four ways in which the Scriptures are peculiarly profitable to "the man of God".

First and foremost, the apostle places "doctrine". One has only to read through the pastoral epistles to perceive how anxious the apostle was that Timothy should know and hold fast the doctrine that he had received. He is warned against anything "contrary to sound doctrine" (I Tim. i. 10), he is exhorted to give attention to "the reading . . . . . to doctrine" (I Tim iv. 13), to keep a vigilant look out for "teaching that is otherwise" heterodidaskaleo, but to maintain the doctrine that is according to godliness (I Tim. vi. 3). So when he would call Timothy's attention to his past, he opens with "thou hast fully followed my doctrine" (II Tim. iii. 10). These mattes have been dealt with in some degree of thoroughness in No.30 of this series.

If we translate didaskalia "teaching" here in II Tim. iii. 16, we shall be quite true in doing so, providing that we realize that the meaning of the apostle is the teaching of the person, and not conferring upon the person a gift of teaching. As Alford with a play upon the words "ability" and "stability" puts it:

> "It is not Timothy's ability as a teacher, but his stability as a Christian, which is here in question."

Doctrine is perhaps positive truth, the very stuff with which the teacher builds up the believer. It will be remembered, however, that the apostle at times combined "warning" with his "teaching" (Col. i. 28). So the second item of profitableness that the apostle gives, is "reproof".

Elegchos, the word translated "reproof", primarily means "the refutation of error" then "conviction" as a result. The Authorized Version translates elegchos "to tell one's fault"

(Matt. xviii. 15), "to reprove" (Eph. v. 11), "convince" and "convict" (John viii. 9, 46), "rebuke" (Titus i. 13; ii. 15).

> "A bishop must be blameless as the steward of God . . . . . holding fast the faithful word, as he hath been taught, that he may be able by sound doctrine both to exhort and to convince (elegcho) the gainsayers . . . . . Wherefore rebuke (elegcho) them sharply, that they may be sound in the faith" (Titus i. 7-13).

Reproof, therefore, has the blessing of the one reproved in view, consequently, the third items given in II Tim. iii. 16, is "correction" epanorthosis. In the classics this word means "to straighten what has been crooked" and is applied to manner of life. It contains the word orthosis which is from orthoo "to rectify". This word comes in II Tim. ii. 15, for "rightly to divide" is orthotomeo. In Titus i. 5 where the apostle says "set in order" the things that are wanting, the word is epidiorthoo. These two "reproof" and "correction" are included in the final item, "instruction—for paideia is derived from pais "a child". The word occurs but six times in the New Testament and four of these are found in Hebrews, where the Authorized Version translates the word "chastening" or "chastisement" (xii. 5, 7, 8, 11). The apostle leaves "reproof" and "correction" undefined, but "instruction" he defines as "instruction in righteousness". In the thirteenth verse of the fifth chapter he says that "a babe" is unskillful in "the word of righteousness", which shows that there was a similar idea in the apostle's mind when he wrote that epistle. Also we shall see that the "crown" that he expected, is the "crown of righteousness", and so Timothy, "the man of God", would have been disciplined by the Scriptures, with this goal in view.

> "That the man of God may be perfect; thoroughly furnished unto all good works" (II Tim. iii. 17).

Timothy is the only New Testament character to whom the title "man of God" is given. Peter refers to the "men of God" (II Pet. i. 21) but this reference is to Old Testament prophets. This title is first borne by Moses, and he is referred to with this name in six different places (Deut. xxxiii. 1; Joshua xiv. 6; I Chron. xxiii. 14; II Chron. xxx. 16; Ezra iii. 2; and Psa. xc., title). Others who bear the title are Elijah, Elisha, David, Shemaiah and Igdaliah. Added to this list must be the references to five unnamed witnesses, one of whom proved to be an angel (Judges xiii. 6-8). Timothy, who knew the Holy Scriptures, would not fail to realize the solemnity, and the importance, of such a title. He was being called upon to take up a position, indicated by prophecy (I Tim. i. 18) and reinforced by gift (II Tim. i. 6), that placed him in a singular place of trust, and all the opposition which Moses, David, Elijah and Elisha endured would probably be his, but all the encouragement of the triumph of those men of God, by grace was his also. Timothy was at this time still a young man, and Paul could say to him "Flee youthful lusts", "let no man despise thy youth", yet the apostle also knew by actual living experience, the altogether wonderful enabling of the grace of God. With all this it is surely for our encouragement that this gifted, prophetically appointed, man is at the last referred to the fourfold equipment of the inspired Scriptures, just as any ungifted person must be to-day. We are therefore not justified in sitting down with folded hands, simply because the day of "gift" and "prophecy" has passed. "We have a more sure Word" (II Pet. i. 19).

The word translated "perfect" and the word translated "throughly furnished" are both derived from the same root word.

Artuo "to make ready" is found in the New Testament with but one figurative meaning "to season with salt" (Mark ix. 50; Luke xiv. 34; Col. iv. 6), but this word is at the basis of a series of compounds and derivatives that speak of "making ready" or "equipping" for any particular purpose.

The word translated "throughly furnished" exertismenos occurs in Josephus.

> "They were in a mighty disorder, and in want of all necessaries, and yet were to make war with men" tois pasi kalos exertismenous, "who were throughly well prepared for it" (Ant. iii. 2, 2).

Here the equipment is that of a soldier. It can be used also for the complete equipment of a ship for a voyage. Now whether we think of the equipment of a soldier or of a ship, that equipment needs to be very thorough. In the case of a ship, the world has a proverb that shows how completely ready for every emergency a ship needs to be, for the saying is "There is no back door to a ship". Timothy has no need to fear, for he can triumphantly rely upon the completeness of the equipment the Word of God gives to the man of God. The apostle here thinks of service, even as in verse fifteen he thought of salvation. The equipment is "unto every good work". There is a parallel to this combination of fitness and good work in Heb. xiii. 21, "Make you perfect (katartizo) in every good work".

The apostle, in chapter two, had used three figures in illustrating the special characteristics of one who would press toward the mark for the prize—the soldier, the athlete and the husbandman. What inexhaustible supplies for the man of God in these great typical characters, the scriptures provide. Is he a good soldier? then his girdle is the truth, his sword is the Word of God. Is he an athlete? then the histories of such overcomers as Caleb and Joshua, and those who obtained just report (Heb. xi.) are his example and inspiration. Is he an husbandman? the seed he sows is the Word of Truth, and the harvest is sure.

> "St. Paul frequently uses the Old Testament for teaching, i.e. to enforce or illustrate his doctrine; e.g. Rom. i. 17. The numerous quotations from the Old Testament in the Romans and Galatians, are mostly examples of its use for confutation.
> Epanorthosin means the setting right that which is wrong. The Old Testament is applied for this purpose by St. Paul in I Cor. xiv. 21, I Cor. x. 1-10, and generally, wherever he applies it to enforce morality.
> Paideian ten en dikaiosune. The word paideia has the meaning of chastisement or discipline; compare Heb. xii. 7. It is used here as a severer kind of epanorthosis. Then the Old Testament is applied in I Cor. v. 13" (Conybeare and Howson "Life and Epistles of St. Paul).

It is the Old Testament that Paul speaks of in II Tim. iii. 15, 16 as "sacred" or "inspired by God". There is no problem about the New Testament. It goes without saying that if the O.T. be inspired then the N.T. must be—but the converse is just as true, if the O.T. be not inspired, then the N.T. cannot be, for the O.T. histories, doctrines, types and prophecies are so interwoven into the Gospels, Epistles and the Apocalypse, that the inspiration of the N.T. is impossible if the inspiration of the O.T. be denied.

We may not be worthy of the title given to Moses, Elisha or Timothy, but we can at least hold fast that truth which characterized every "man of God", namely that the Scriptures are the inspired Word of God.

No.35. Paul's solemn charge to Timothy (iv. 1).
pp. 31 - 36

Having seen the extreme importance of the Scriptures in the life and equipment of the man of God (II Tim. iii. 16, 17) we now turn to their use and application. So full is the Word, that it not only gives "seed to the sower", but also "bread to the eater" (Isa. lv. 10). It saves, and it equips for service.

Before we come to the preaching of this inspired Word, with its wondrous doctrine, and with the most tragic refusal of such inspired teaching, the Apostle pauses to give Timothy a charge, and turns Timothy's attention away from present suffering, to future glory, away from the censure of men, to the approval of the one great Judge, away from this season of His silence, to that day of His appearing and commendation.

A reference to the structure shows how this same aspect influenced the Apostle himself, he also looked forward to standing before the Judge, and to receiving a crown at His appearing. This theme lies very near the heart of both Philippians with its "prize" and II Timothy with its "reigning" and "crown" and must be given most earnest attention by all who seek to stand approved in that day.

"I charge" diamarturomai. The solemnity of this charge may be gathered from the use that Moses made of it, when he, too, had finished his course, and was giving his last testimony to Israel. It occurs five times in the LXX version of Deuteronomy, and the settings of these five occurrences will show how serious was the apostle when he chose this word to express his thoughts.

> "I call heaven and earth to witness against you this day, that ye shall soon utterly perish" (Deut. iv. 26).

This solemn testimony was consequent upon the sin of idolatry.

> "I testify against you this day, that ye shall surely perish" (Deut. viii. 19).

This too is consequent upon forgetting God and His leading, and so lapsing into idolatry.

> "I call haven and earth to record this day against you, that I have set before you life and death" (Deut. xxx. 19).

Again the context speaks of the heart turning away, and the people not hearing, and so being led to worship other gods.

> "Gather unto me all the elders of your tribes, and your officers, that I may speak these words in their ears, and call heaven and earth to record against them. For I know that after my death ye will utterly corrupt yourselves, and turn aside from the way which I have commanded you, and evil will befall you in the latter days" (Deut. xxxi. 28, 29).

Can anyone read these words, and not think of Paul, when he too said:

> "For I know this, that after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock" (Acts xx. 29).

Are we not prepared to find that Paul, too, use diamarturomai in this same speech?

> "Testifying both to the Jews and also to the Greeks" (Acts. xx. 21).

The parallel is maintained also with reference to the warning concerning "the last days".

If the parallel between Moses and Paul is marked in this thirty-first chapter of Deuteronomy, surely it is even more so when we record the last occurrence of diamarturomai:

> "And Moses came and spake all the words of this song in the ears of the people, he and Joshua the son of Nun . . . . .Set your hearts unto all the words, which I testify among you this day . . . . . the Lord said to me . . . . . die . . . . . and be gathered unto thy people" (Deut. xxxii. 44-52).

Here, Joshua, the successor of Moses, is parallel with Timothy the successor of Paul. Here Moses knew that he was to die, and Paul knew that the time for this departure had come. Here Moses, who failed to sanctify the Lord under the great provocation of Israel, reveals that he had lost the reward of entering the land, whereas Paul could blessedly reveal that he had kept the faith, and that for him was reserved a crown. Surely, Timothy would remember that the title given him of the "Man of God" was borne by Moses who failed in this high matter, and of Elijah who triumphed! Would not these things crowd in upon him as he read that solemn word diamarturomai, for from a child he had known these sacred letters. In the first epistle to Timothy, Paul had used this solemn word:

> "I charge thee before God and the Lord Jesus Christ and the elect angels, that thou observe these things without referring one before another, doing nothing by partiality" (I Tim. v. 21).

The introduction of the elect angels here, though strange to our ears, is parallel with the calling upon heaven and earth by Moses, or the reference to the Lord's appearing and kingdom in II Tim. iv. 1. This association of "elect angels" with a solemn adjuration is illustrated in Agrippa's speech, where he sought to dissuade them from war with the Romans.

> "I call to witness your sanctuary, and the holy angels of God, and this country common to us all, that I have not kept back anything that is for your preservation" (Wars of Jews, Bk. ii. 16).

The reader will not only see that this adjuration was common, but he will also see a parallel with Paul's words of Acts xx. 20:

> "I kept back nothing that was profitable unto you."

A somewhat parallel charge, at least in its solemnity is found in first Timothy:

> "O man of God . . . . . fight the good fight of faith . . . . . I give thee charge in the sight of God, Who quickeneth all things, and before Christ Jesus, Who before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good confession: that thou keep this commandment without spot, unrebukeable, until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Tim. vi. 11-14).

The reader will not fail to see that the references to "the Man of God" and "the appearing" and the "good fight" connect this passage with II Tim. iv. 1-8.

We bring with us now, something of what Timothy would have realized without so much research, when he read "the charge" of II Tim. iv. 1.

The judgment of "the quick and the dead" may refer to the judgment of all, whether saved or unsaved, as in Acts x. 42 and I Pet. iv. 5, or it may be limited to the judgment seat of Christ when living and dead saints shall stand before Him to receive His approval or otherwise of their service. The nature of the case settles the matter for us, for Timothy had no fear of "condemnation" (Rom. viii. 1) and, as the context proves, Paul was thinking of the "righteous Judge" in connexion with the awards for faithful service "at His appearing" (II Tim. iv. 8).

We must now examine both the wording and the intention of the Apostle in the remainder of this charge to Timothy.

> "Who shall judge the quick and the dead at His appearing, and His kingdom" (II Tim. iv. 1).

The first matter that demands attention is a question as to what is the correct reading. The Authorized Version reads "Who shall judge the quick and the dead AT His appearing, and His kingdom", whereas the Revised Version reads "Who shall judge the quick and the dead, AND by His appearing and His kingdom", which reading and rendering is endorsed by the Companion Bible.

It may seem a slight and insignificant thing, as to whether we read kata "AT" or kai "AND", but an important doctrinal point that belongs to the hope of the church is involved. Accepting the Revised reading, and with Alford, reading kai instead of kata, we now face the question of interpretation. Did Paul simply mean that he adjured Timothy by two great events, namely in view of the judgment of the quick and the dead, and in view of the approaching manifestation and kingdom? Shall we translate with Rotherham:

"Who is about to be judging living and dead, both as to His forthshining and His kingdom," or is there something even more important that cries out for an hearing. Can we translate this passage:

"Who is about to judge living and dead, BOTH at His appearing and at His Kingdom."

If this is allowable, then the question that has arisen in many hearts is answered. There will be some members of the One Body living in the flesh, when the hope of the mystery is realized. The translation however of "both at" is questionable, most translators who have accepted the reading kai render, as the Revised Version, "and by His appearing".

There is however one other point that appears to have been overlooked by many. If the Apostle knew that there would be none of the members of the One Body left alive at the time of the epiphany, there does not seem to be any good purpose served by using the terms "the quick and the dead", which terms however are just what the apostle does employ.

The hope of the church during the Acts is explicitly stated to include those which "are alive and remain", who together with those raised from the dead shall be caught up together (I Thess. iv. 15, 17). With this the Apostle had associated himself, before the great dispensational change, using the personal pronoun "we" which are alive.

Writing now in this second epistle to Timothy, he knows that he is about to be offered, and that the time of his departure had come. He looked forward to the "heavenly kingdom" (II Tim. iv. 18) and knew that he would enter it "in that day" (8). This however does not preclude the possibility that some believers who belong to the present calling, will be "alive and remain", and for their encouragement the Apostle employs the terms "the quick and the dead", as something as truly applicable to them as it is in I Thess. iv.

There is no scriptural evidence that such living members of the church will be visibly "raptured" or "caught up"; the manner of their departure is veiled, all we know is that whether living or dead, they will all be manifested with the Lord "in glory" (Col. iii. 1-4).

We can well believe that Gestapo methods and concentration camps will mark the rule of "The Beast" and sudden disappearances of individuals will again recur, so that the taking away of a few living members of the Body would cause little or no comment in the great trouble that would be experienced at the time of the end. Again, while "The Ascension" of Christ was visible, and took place after forty days, it seems evident that there was an ascension immediately after the resurrection, that was seen of no man (John xx. 17), and it may be in this manner that "the quick" will be taken. Nothing explicit however can be said, we know Whom we have believed, and are content to leave the outworking of His purposes to His own wisdom and grace, thankfully acknowledging whatever has been written for our learning, and gladly leaving that which is unrevealed until He sees fit to make all things plain.

If the presence of "angels" has caused some comment in I Tim. v., the presence of the word "kingdom" in II Tim. iv. 1 has also given rise to questionings. For the sake of distinguishing between the kingdom of Israel in either its earthly or heavenly aspects, and the church of the mystery, we have adopted the phrases "Kingdom truth" for the one, and "Church truth" for the other, and no harm is done if the users of these expressions use them with discretion. If however we go so far as to eliminate the word "church" from the kingdom of Israel we are manifestly in error, for the Scripture so uses it (Acts vii. 38; Matt. xvi. 18; and Acts ii. 47). In the same way, if we rigidly exclude all references to a "kingdom" from the teaching of the mystery, we are equally wrong. Paul retained the reference to "the kingdom of God", even though Israel were set aside (Acts xxviii. 23, 31). He spoke of the believers at Colosse as having been "translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son" (Col. i. 13) and he warned the Ephesian saints concerning the possible forfeiture of inheritance "in the kingdom of Christ and of God" (Eph. v. 5). Paul could speak of his early ministry as "preaching the kingdom of God" (Acts xx. 25) and could fulfil his prison ministry with the same (Acts xxviii. 31). This kingdom of God covers the future glory, as I Cor. xv. 50 will show, and is the title for the very last phase of the Mediation of Christ, long after all the redeemed have entered their respective inheritances (I Cor. xv. 24). Paul himself was encouraged in the midst of all his sufferings, by the consciousness that he would be preserved "unto His heavenly kingdom" (II Tim. iv. 18). Further, if the conception of a king and a kingdom be entirely foreign to the revelation of the mystery, what sense can there be in the saying that is called by Paul "a faithful saying".

> "If we endure we shall also reign with Him" (II Tim. ii. 12).

"To reign with" sumbasileuo occurs once more in I Cor. iv. 8, where the apostle says:

> "Ye have reigned as kings without us: and I would to God ye did reign, that we also might reign with you."

It is therefore unscriptural to teach that the church of the mystery has NOTHING to do with a kingdom, all that we can truthfully say is that the church of the mystery must be distinguished from the kingdom which pertains to Israel, both in its earthly and its heavenly phases, but that every calling whether Israel, Bride or Body comes within the all embracive kingdom of God.

The expression "At His appearing" in the Authorized Version is kata ten epiphaneian, kata meaning "according to" or "corresponding with", and its use here seems to demand the rendering "At the time which corresponds with His appearing". Matt. xxvii. 15, Acts xiii. 27 and Heb. iii. 8 are instances of similar usage.

It was customary "at" the feast, for a prisoner to be released. It was customary "at" the Sabbath to read the prophets. Do not harden your hearts, said the apostle, in any way corresponding with the day of temptation in the wilderness. So "at" His appearing, directs the attention not merely to the "time" but the fitness of that time. It will be in direct contrast with the present time with its persecution and rejection of the truth.

When we arrive at the eighth verse we shall take the opportunity of referring to the special use of words that refer to the Second Coming of the Lord.

Where our version reads "Who shall judge" in II Tim. iv. 1 it is not the simple future that is so translated; the words that stand for "shall" here is tou mellontos "the One about to" judge. Mello primarily means "to delay" but subsequent usage led on from the idea of delaying or loitering, to an act that was about to be done, but with no uncertainty intended.

"To be about" to do something, is very nearly an equivalent phrase in English, and we find this translation in Acts iii. 3, "Seeing Peter and John about to go"; Acts xviii. 14 "When Paul was not about to open his mouth". The phrase "things to come" which we meet in Rom. viii. 38, I Cor. iii. 22, Eph. i. 21, Col. ii. 17, I Tim. iv. 8 is a translation of mello. Timothy was exhorted to remember that the Lord was about to come as judge of dead and living, and with this before his mind, the apostle knew that he would be the more faithful and stedfast.

No.36. The character of the close of this dispensation, indicated in the charge made by Paul to Timothy (iv. 2 - 4).* pp. 72 - 76

[* - See also a series entitled "Signs of the Times", in Volumes XXXV, XXXVI.]

We have examined the solemn setting in which the apostle placed his charge to Timothy, solemn because it was "before God", solemn because it was "before the Lord Jesus Christ", solemn because it was in the presence of One Who was about to judge the living and the dead, solemn because of the prospect of His appearing and his kingdom. We now turn to the charge itself, and the charge also is invested with solemnity.

To preach the Word is no light undertaking, to be instant in season and out of season, adds to the solemnity of the effort, to be conscious that a time will come when sound doctrine will not be endured, increases the feeling of responsibility.

The structure of II Tim. iii. 10 - iv. 8 has been set out in some detail in Volume XXXVI, p.169, and the exhortation to "Preach the Word" comes in correspondence with the close of II Tim. iii., where the inspiration and profitableness of all Scripture is taught.

It may not be amiss if we set out the heads of this structure, in order to see where the passage before us comes in the development of the theme.

Outline Structure of II Tim. iii. 10 - iv. 8.

A | iii. 10-12. Paul's doctrine and ministry. The beginning (Acts xiii., xiv.).
B | iii. 13-17. Scripture for doctrine.
C | iv. 1. The Judgment at the appearing.
B | iv. 2. Preach the Word . . . with doctrine.
A | iv. 3-7. Paul's doctrine and ministry. The end "I have finished".
C | iv. 8. The Judgment at the appearing.

It will be seen that the charge given in the first verse of chapter four is in view of the judgment of verse eight, and that the exhortation to preach the Word, reproving, rebuking and exhorting with all longsuffering and doctrine, is an expansion of the passage that teaches the inspiration and profitableness of the Scriptures, for doctrine, reproof, correction and instruction.

"Preach the Word" The word "preach" here is kerusso "to proclaim as a herald", the last occurrence of the word in the New Testament being that of Rev. v. 2:

> "And I saw a strong angel proclaiming with a loud voice, Who is worthy to open the book, and to loose the seals thereof."

Here the simple idea of the word kerusso as a proclamation, without entreaty, pleading, reasoning or teaching is evident. The word kerusso is of frequent occurrence in the LXX. It is used for the announcement of a royal proclamation, as in Gen. xli. 43, where Joseph was publicly hailed as deliverer and ruler over Egypt, and in II Chron. xxxvi. 22 where Cyrus King of Persia "made a proclamation". So also the "proclamation" made by Moses concerning the tabernacle (Exod. xxxvi. 6), and by Aaron concerning the feast of the golden calf (Exod. xxxii. 5). The prophets use the word in announcing the Day of the Lord, and the day of judgment (Joel ii. 1; iii. 9; Jonah i. 2; iii. 2).

Kerusso differs from euaggelizo, in that it gives no idea of its message, whereas euaggelizo is intimately associated with the euaggelion "the evangel" or "good tidings" that it brings. Out of the 56 occurrences of euaggelizo "to preach" that are found in the N.T., 30 include the word "gospel" or "glad tidings" in the Authorized Version. No such extension is found with kerusso, for wherever the addition "gospel of kingdom", "baptism of repentance", &c. are found, these are not resident in kerusso but are actually added in the original.

Kerusso is translated five times "publish" and twice "proclaim" in the A.V., and in one reference the context plainly alludes to the office of the herald and the Greek sports (I Cor. ix. 27).

Timothy, in this same fourth chapter is exhorted "to do the work of an evangelist", and so the proclamation of the Word included the preaching of the gospel. This charge to Timothy, to herald or proclaim the word in an atmosphere of hostility and opposition, was not uttered by one who lived a shielded life. Here we find the apostle fully living out his own injunctions:

> "Through me the proclamation (kerugma) might be fully known, and that all the Gentiles might hear; and I was delivered out of the month of the lion" (iv. 17).

When the apostle made the solemn claim to be "a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles" (I Tim. ii. 7 and II Tim. i. 11), the word translated "preacher" is kerux.

There is therefore need not only to preach the glad tidings of great joy, but to proclaim the Word as an herald, even though the hearers prove antagonistic or indifferent.

Moreover, Timothy is enjoined to "preach the WORD". This word logos occurs seven times in the second epistle, and is evidently a key word. Its distribution is as follows:

A | i. 13. The form of sound words, hugiaino "sound".
B | ii. 9. Paul suffering, the word not bound.
C | ii. 11. The faithful saying.
D | ii. 15. The principle, Rightly divide the Word of truth.
C | ii. 17. The word like a canker.
A | iv. 2, 3. Preach the word . . . sound doctrine, hugiaino "sound".
B | iv. 15-18. Paul's word withstood. Prison.

One item of value that comes to the surface by putting these references together, is that the correspondence of A | i. 13 and A | iv. 2, 3, indicates that the "Word" which Timothy was exhorted to preach would be in line with that "form of sound words" which he had learned of Paul. It was that "good deposit" about which the apostle was so concerned, and he knew that just as at the beginning, men had "turned away from" himself the preacher (II Tim. i. 15), so in the latter days men would "turn away from" the teaching he had received, for which he had lived and suffered and for which he was about to die.

> "Preach the Word, be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all longsuffering and doctrine. For the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they heap unto themselves teachers, having itching ears; and they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables" (iv. 2-4).

"Be instant." This word has now become obsolete. It must not be confused with a word of the same spelling which means, the time now present. Instancy is still in use bearing the meaning of urgency.

Ephistemi, the word translated "be instant" is used by Paul once again in this same chapter, when he says "The time of my departure is at hand" (iv. 6). Paul uses the word on only one other occasion, namely in I Thess. v. 3 when he said "Sudden destruction cometh upon them" There is an urgency in the word, and this is intentional on the part of the apostle. "Be diligent", "study", "be instant", "make full proof" are so many indications of the apostle's concern for his son in the faith. There is still the same need to-day for the exhortation. Hands grow slack, the best grow weary in well doing, loins need to be girt, shoes should be on the feet, the whole armour of God put on, and a vigilant watch maintained. We should remind ourselves that "the time is short", that our lamps should be trimmed, that our attitude should be that of those who wait for their Lord and desire to be found "occupying" until He shall come.

The need for instancy in Timothy's ministry is further revealed by the words that follow, "in season, out of season" (iv. 2). The absence of the conjunction "and" is suggestive, as though while it will always be "seasonable" for the preacher, it may be expected that the attitude of Felix, when he said "at some more convenient season" will be the attitude of the hearer in general.

It is a moot point among believers how far zeal for the witness of the Word justifies the invasion of the ordinary man's privacy. Some there are who have no compunction in monopolizing the attention of a whole railway carriage full of passengers, whether they desire to hear the gospel or no. Others feel that to act in that manner is tantamount to stealing the privilege and privacy for which the passenger has paid. Doubtless there is something to be said for both attitudes and each one must be fully persuaded in his own mind. There can be no two opinions, however, about the readiness that should characterize the preacher, a readiness that sets aside all personal convenience, even as the Medical man responds to the mid-night call, though his own convenience has to be set aside.

Timothy's urgent ministry of the Word was threefold. "Reprove, rebuke, exhort with all longsuffering and doctrine" (iv. 2). It is evident that this looks back to the close of the previous chapter, where the Inspired Scriptures were said to be profitable "for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness" (iii. 16).

The structure given in Volume XXXVI, p.169 shows that the word "season" of verse 2, is repeated in verse 3, where the A.V. translated the same original word "time".

> "Be instant in season, out of season . . . . . for the season will come when they will not endure sound doctrine."

Here, therefore, is the apostle's own explanation of the words "in season, out of season", it is that this urgency, this buying up of opportunity, is the more needful, because the season was approaching when the Word would be refused and distorted.

This intolerance of sound doctrine will be manifested in the last days of this dispensation in a special way:

> "After their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears, and they shall turn away their ears from the truth: and shall be turned unto fables" (iv. 3, 4).

We have already touched upon the meaning of "lust" here, when dealing with II Tim. iii. 6, which the reader should consult if uncertain, and as space is limited we pass on to the remainder of the verse. The wording of the A.V. is somewhat ambiguous, for one cannot be sure whether the congregation or the teacher has the itching ears. The R.V. removes the ambiguity, reading:

> "But having itching ears, will heap to themselves teachers after their own lusts."

When speaking of the "last days", in the previous chapter, the apostle uses the word soreuo "laden" with sins. He reverts to the same figure when he says that men will "heap" to themselves teachers. It is a strange word to choose, the idea of "piling up", a "cumulus", a "heap", does not readily fit in with the thought of "teachers". There must be something in the word itself that would illuminate the apostle's intention if we could discover it.

Among other meanings which the word has in classical Greek is that of a "sepulchral mound" and in some versions of the LXX moreover, according to Wordsworth, it is used for the heaping up of a mound by an enemy against a city. The tumulus raised to commemorate the dead that fell at Marathon is still called soros, and in heathen mythology the mountains heaped up by the giants became a sepulchral mound to those who raised them. The apostle would not be ignorant of this usage, and we cannot avoid the conclusion that his hearers also would be acquainted with the associations of this word, and so would understand the apostle to suggest, that although these teachers would be from one point of view throwing up of a mound by the enemy as an attack against the citadel of truth, yet in the long run, this accumulation of evil teaching would become the sepulchral mound of those responsible for its erection. If, moreover, the allusion of Marathon be permissible the context of II Tim. iv. 3, 4, with its reference to "finishing a course" and so winning a crown, would add to the significance of the word.

Coming to the next figure, "itching ears", Wetstein gives references to both Greek and Latin authors where this figure is used to describe the flattery of sophistical teachers. Plutarch uses the expression in his book "de Superstit". Plato says, that music was given to men to indulge their luxury, kai kneseos oton, or tickle their ears.

This expression was well known and popular, and the apostle's words would need no interpretation. We also in our own day know full well that the doctrine that will tickle the ears, and satisfy the "itch" of those for whom the sound teaching of the Word is unbearable, cannot be of God.

Shakespeare uses a similar figure when he says:

> "O, it offends me to the soul to hear a robustious periwig-pated-fellow tear a passion to tatters, to very rags, to split the ears of the groundlings; which for the most part are capable of nothing but inexplicable dumb shows, and noise."

Such debasement of true ministry can have but one sad result:

> "They shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables" (iv. 4).

"Nature abhors a vacuum", said the old scholars, before the pressure of the atmosphere had been demonstrated. This may have been a learned way of covering ignorance, but it nevertheless expressed a truth. Ears that turn away from truth must listen to something, and the penalty is that such ears will be opened to myths.

Writing of the close of another period of deception the same apostle said:

> "With all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie; that they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness" (II Thess. ii. 10-12).

This movement had startled in the apostle's own day, "All they which are in Asia be turned away from me" (i. 15), and the first movement that turned away from the apostle, will complete its circle when it turns away from the truth entrusted to that same apostle.

The many attacks, misrepresentations and the way that the testimony of Paul the Lord's prisoner has been ignored, bring home to those who love the truth, how truly the apostle has depicted the closing days of this dispensation.

The Christian Church as a whole has turned away from "the Mystery". The Greek words Mystery and Myth come from the same root, and like the two sons of the one father Abraham, they represent the spirit and the flesh.

We will not waste our space or the reader's time in tabulating the "myths" that have been accepted in place of the truth of God. We would only ask him when he opens some modern commentary to notice how frequently the word "myth" is used in the exposition of the foundation book of all Scripture, namely the book of Genesis. Here we pause and in our next study we must consider the contrasted ministry towards which the apostle urged his son Timothy, and all who would "honour God" as the name Timotheus means.

No.37. The Work of an Evangelist (iv. 5).
pp. 95 - 98

The opening of the charge to Timothy reveals that it is no light undertaking to have to preach the Word in the condition that the apostle has indicated in II Tim. iv. 2-4. We return to the subject and gather from the nature of the exhortation to Timothy and the apostle's references to himself and his work, the true character of witness for these closing days.

> "But watch thou in all things, endure afflictions, do the work of an evangelist, make full proof of thy ministry" (II Tim. iv. 5).

Nepho, the word translated "watch", is derived from pino to drink, with the negative. Now it would be a great mistake to assume from this literal meaning of the word chosen by the apostle, that there was a tendency on the part of Timothy to over indulge in strong drink. The reverse, in fact, was the truth. Timothy was so very abstemious in his habits, that the apostle had to write to him saying:

> "Be no longer a hydropoteo, a water drinker, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities" (I Tim. v. 23).

The word nepho took upon itself, quite naturally, a secondary meaning. Not only did it mean "sober" as distinct from being "drunk", it meant "watchful" or "vigilant" as opposed to slackness and irresponsibility. The Lord used the figure in His parable of the unready servant:

> "But and if that evil servant shall say in his heart, My Lord delayeth His coming, and shall begin to smite his fellow servants, and to eat and drink with the drunken" (Matt. xxiv. 48, 49).

Nepho occurs but six times in the N.T., three passages occurring in Paul's epistles to Timothy and three in the first epistles of Peter. We shall gather the intention of the apostle, if we consider these six occurrences in their contexts.

> "Therefore let us not sleep as do others, but let us watch and be sober, for they that sleep, sleep in the night: and they that are drunken are drunken in the night. But let us, who are of the day, be sober" (I Thess. v. 6, 8).

The context speaks of the second coming of Christ, and the day of the Lord, which, coming as a thief in the night, will overtake the unwatchful:

> "Therefore gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 13).
> "But the end of all things is at hand: be ye therefore sober, and watch unto prayer" (I Pet. iv. 7).
> "Be sober, be vigilant: because your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion walketh about, seeking whom he may devour" (I Pet. v. 8).

The context of these references in Peter's epistle, is the "end of all things", "the revelation of Jesus Christ", and the presence of an adversary who, like a roaring lion, seeks his prey. It is a word with such contexts that Paul used when he called upon Timothy to "be sober". The context of II Tim. iv. 5, has the coming of the Lord, or "His appearing and Kingdom" in view, and the atmosphere is thick with danger and the attack of adversaries, both fleshly and spiritual.

Timothy was exhorted to "watch in all things", this would include "prayer" as I Pet. iv. 7, it would include the special precautions in view of the activity of the "adversary" (I Pet. v. 8), and as the word "to the end" of I Pet. i. 13 is actually in the Greek teleios "perfectly", so Paul exhorted Timothy by means of his own example to maintain that same vigilance "to the end", saying "I have finished (teleo) my course" (II Tim. iv. 7), and just as Peter in the context of his last reference, speaks of:

> "a crown of glory, which fadeth not away" (I Pet. v. 4).

so Paul in his exhortation to Timothy speaks of "a crown of righteousness" which the Lord would give to all who love His appearing.

The exhortation to watchfulness, is associated with another exhortation, "endure affliction" kakopatheo, a word which we have met before in this epistle.

The three occurrences of this word in Paul's writings, are limited to this second epistle (II Tim. ii. 3, 9 and iv. 5) to which must be added sugkakopatheo "to endure affliction together" (II Tim. i. 8), where it is specifically associated with the testimony of the Lord's prisoner, and the gospel entrusted to him.

While no servant of the Lord is exempt from his share in the common afflictions of humanity, and the groan of creation, the afflictions which Paul has in mind here, are evidently those extra trials which come to the believer as a consequence of his association with the rejected message of Paul the prisoner of Jesus Christ.

> "A work do thou of an evangelist" (II Tim. iv. 5).

This apostle of "grace", is also the apostle of "work". There are but four occurrences of ergon "work" in Peter's epistles, and but five in the three epistles of John, but Paul uses ergon over eighty times in his epistles.

In view of the approbation of the Lord, the apostle uses the title "workman" in II Tim. ii. 15, ergates, a word translated "labourer" in I Tim. v. 18.

Paul had used the title "the man of God", when he spoke of the equipping power of the Scriptures:

> "That the man of God may be perfect, throughly furnished unto all good works" (II Tim. iii. 17), and had used the same expression "every good work" when speaking of the vessel that was "meet for the master's use".

To Paul, the preaching of the gospel was something more than an office, it was essentially "work".

Seeing that the word "gospel" euaggelion, and "preach" euaggelizo occur so frequently in the N.T. it is somewhat surprising to discover that there are but three references to the evangelist euaggelistes. Philip is called the evangelist in Acts xxi. 8, Timothy is exhorted to do the work of an evangelist in II Tim. iv. 5 and the only other occurrence is in the fourth chapter of Ephesians where the ascended Christ gave gifts unto men, and the special order of ministry for the church of the mystery is specified.

"And He gave some apostles;	\	Foundation ministry and some prophets;	/	(Eph. ii. 20).
and some evangelists;	\	Subsequent ministry and some pastors and teachers.	/	(II Tim. ii. 2; iv. 5).

The apostles and prophets are associated with the beginning of this new work:

> "And are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets" (Eph. ii. 20), whereas, so far as the ministry of the mystery is concerned, the evangelist is not appointed until the apostle is about to finish, and he, the evangelist, in turn, is to appoint "teachers" to carry on the work.

> "The things that thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also" (II Tim. ii. 2).

We are to expect no more apostles and prophets, their work is done. They were succeeded by a lower order of ministry. The evangelist succeeding the apostle as the preacher and the organizer, and the teacher succeeding the prophet.

Poimeen "shepherd" is allied with poimne "flock" and in Acts xx. 29, the apostle refers to the Church of God as a "flock". This is the one occasion throughout his ministry that we find him doing so. When he said "feed" the Church of God (Acts xx. 28), the word he used is poimaino, "to feed a flock of sheep", and is the same word that was used in John xxi. 16 to Peter "Feed my sheep" and in I Pet. v. 2 "Feed the flock".

Those who were exhorted to "feed" the flock in Acts xx. 28, 29 were episkopoi "overseers", or "bishops" (Phil. i. 1 and I Tim. iii. 2), and Peter unites the title "Shepherd and Bishop" in I Pet. ii. 25 as though they were synonymous.

Something of a shepherd's vigilance, longsuffering, care and sympathy is incorporated in the ministry to which Timothy and his associates were called at the passing of the great apostle.

"Make full proof of thy ministry." Plerophoreo, the word translated "make full proof" is composed of two words pleres "full", and phoreo or phero "to carry". The substantive plerophoria is translated "full assurance' in the four passages where it occurs in the N.T. (Col. ii. 2; I Thess. i. 5; Heb. vi. 11 and x. 22). Plerophoreo occurs five times as follows:

> "Those things which are most surely believed among us" (Luke i. 1).
> "Being fully persuaded" (Rom. iv. 21).
> "Let every man be fully persuaded" (Rom. xiv. 5).
> "Make full proof of thy ministry" (II Tim. iv. 5).
> "That by me the preaching might be fully known" (II Tim. iv. 17).

With the exception of II Tim. iv. 5, the occurrences of plerophoreo use the word in the passive, II Tim. iv. 5 being the only occurrence of the word in the active voice. The apostle did not say to Timothy "Be fully assured of your ministry" but carry it, with all its responsibilities to a complete conclusion, and had already in his mind what he was subsequently to put in writing, that he too had "finished his course", and that through the enstrengthening grace of the Lord Who stood by him, the proclamation had been "delivered in full measure" (see Alford).

To the same effect is the exhortation given in Col. iv. 17:

> "Say to Archippus, Take heed to the ministry which thou hast received in the Lord, that thou fulfil it."

It was a great concern with the apostle that those who had "begun" should "finish". He wrote to the Galatians an expostulation:

> "Having begun in the spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh" (Gal. iii. 3).

He wrote to the Thessalonians telling them of his great concern:

> "Praying exceedingly that we might see your face, and might perfect that which is lacking in your faith" (I Thess. iii. 10).

He told the Colossians that he "agonized" over them in connexion with his desire "to present every man perfect in Christ Jesus" (Col. i. 28, 29).

Writing to the Romans, Paul could say that he had "fully preached" the gospel of Christ (xv. 19), and that when he visited Rome, he was sure that he would come "in the fullness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ" (xv. 29). Paul was the apostle of the "fullness", and desired for himself, for Timothy, for Archippus, and for all who followed his steps, that this completeness should characterize their ministry too. Awaiting us in the near context, and already in the apostle's mind is the lone and tragic figure Demas, the man who did not finish his course. The apostle, as it were, brings to bear upon Timothy and ourselves the two examples of himself and of Demas, and his prayer as his purpose in writing was, that all who have been entrusted with this precious ministry, should "stay the course". For Timothy's encouragement and for ours, he speaks of himself, of his prospect, of the Lord's gracious sustaining presence, that Timothy and we may take heart of grace, and hold forth, hold fast and hold on to the end.

> "That I may finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God" (Acts xx. 24).

No.38. The Good Contest. The Course Finished (iv. 7).
pp. 111 - 114

It is evident that the apostle's call to Timothy to endure, to watch, to do the work of an evangelist, to enter fully into the ministry unto which he had been set apart, and for which he had so long been qualifying, was contingent upon his own end:

> "For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand" (II Tim. iv. 6).

The casual conjunction "for" as its name signifies, is the sign of an argument, and it connects the call of Timothy with the departure of Paul, not merely as two separate and independent statements, but as logically linked together. Paul was about to die, but he does not use the word. Instead, he used two figurative expressions which are full of meaning and suggestion.

"Offered", "Depart". Once before, the apostle had used these self same words when writing to the Philippians, saying:

> "Having a desire to depart" (Phil. i. 23), and > "If I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith" (Phil. ii. 17).

In the epistle to the Philippians, where these two words occur, Paul was still pressing on for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus (Phil. iii. 14). In II Tim. iv., Paul is assured that he will receive "a crown". In Philippians he had to say:

> "Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect" (Phil. iii. 12), whereas in II Timothy he could say "I have finished my course".

In Philippians he desired "to depart" but knew that he would remain for the benefit of the Philippians and others, but in II Timothy, the time for this departure had come. In Philippians, he expressed his willingness "to be offered", in II Timothy, the moment had come for that offering to be made.

It was a constant thought with the apostle, that of the close association of service and sacrifice. Here, in the expression "I am about to be offered" the thought is not the offering of the sacrificial animal, but the "pouring out" of the accompanying "drink offering".

Spendomai, the word translated "offer" occurs nowhere else in the New Testament. It is found many times in the LXX and generally translated "pour out" as a drink offering. The first occurrence is found in Gen. xxxv. 14, where Jacob, as an act of gratitude, erected a pillar of stone at Beth-el, and "poured a drink offering thereon". Under the law the daily sacrifice was always to be accompanied by:

> "The fourth part of a hin of wine for a drink offering" (Exod. xxix. 40).

When we read in Exod. xxxvii. 16 that the vessels for pouring the drink offering were "of pure gold", it seems impossible to believe that Paul would not have had this in his mind, when he wrote about those vessels of gold that were "unto honour" and "meet for the Master's use".

Apart from the offerings in the tabernacle and temple, and the idolatry into which Israel fell, the only other use of spendomai in the LXX is that act of David in connexion with the water of the well of Bethlehem:

> "And David, longed and said, Oh that one would give me drink of the water of the well of Beth-lehem, that is at the gate! And the three brake through the host of the Philistines, and drew water out of the well of Beth-lehem, that was by the gate, and took it and brought it to David: but David would not drink it, but poured it out to the Lord" (I Chron. xi. 17, 18).

To this drink offering and its associations of joyful sacrifice the apostle referred when he likened himself to the wine poured out upon the sacrifice and service of faith.

The last thing one would think of doing to such a man as Paul at this time, would be to have commiserated with him. He needed no comfort, mourners, tears, his departure was triumph and his hope full of glory.

"Depart" analusis, in English analysis. The word means, as the English equivalent shows, the breaking up of a body into its constituent parts, and is a fit expression to describe that which is written in Gen. iii.:

> "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground: for out of it wast thou taken: dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return" (19).

By no manner of means can analysis be made to teach that Paul was about to "depart to glory".

> "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith" (II Tim. iv. 7).

The position of the article, and the adjective in the words "the fight, the good one, I have fought", indicates strong emphasis.

The word translated "fight" is agona, and "to fight" is agonizomai. The English word agony is of course derived from this word, and the word agonistic refers to sport, especially the ancient Greek sports. The word "fight" is misleading, and should be reserved for military or pugilistic combat, as "Ye fight and war" (James iv. 2) machomai, "Michael and his angels fought" (Rev. xii. 7) polemeo, "So fight I, not as one that beateth the air" (I Cor. ix. 26) pulteuo.

The word used to translate agonizomai must be wide enough to include wrestling, and racing as well as other forms of athletic contest. "To contest" is as good as any that we know. The word occurs in seven different verbal forms and combinations in the N.T. and it will be useful to become acquainted with them, as the subject with which it deals lies very near to the heart of the epistle to the Philippians with its "out resurrection" and its prize.

(1) Agon. Six occurrences, all in the epistles of Paul. "Conflict" (Phil. i. 30; Col. ii. 1); "Contention" (I Thess. ii. 2); "Fight" (I Tim. vi. 12; II Tim. iv. 7); "Race" (Heb. xii. 1).
(2) Agonia. "Agony" (Luke xxii. 44).
(3) Agonizomai. Seven occurrences. Two in Gospels, Five in Paul's Epistles: "Strive" (Luke xiii. 24; I Cor. ix. 25; Col. i. 29); "Labour fervently" (Col. iv. 12); "Fight" (John xviii. 36; I Tim. vi. 12; II Tim. iv. 7).
(4) Antagonizomai. "Striving against" (Heb. xii. 4).
(5) Epagonizomai. "Earnestly contend for" (Jude 3).
(6) Katagonizomai. "Subdued" (Heb. xi. 33).
(7) Sunagonizomai. "Strive together" (Rom. xv. 30).

In Heb. xii. 1 we observe the word agon is translated "race", and that in the fourth verse we have the word antagonizomai "striving against". Let us read the passage:

> "Wherefore seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses (Gk. martus), let us lay aside every weight and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of faith; Who for the joy that was set before Him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God. For consider Him that endured such contradiction of sinners against Himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds. Ye have not yet resisted unto blood striving against sin" (Heb. xii. 1-4).

Here is a conflict, associated with a race, and an endurance even "unto blood". We think of the "agony" and "bloody sweat" of Luke xxii. 44, and are sent back to Hebrews, chapter v., where the conflict and triumph of Gethsemane is used to encourage the believer to "go on unto perfection" (Heb. v. 7-9; vi. 1), remembering that the word "finisher" in Heb. xii. 2 is teleiotes "perfecter" and belonging to the same family as "I have finished" (teleo). The "crown" of II Tim. iv. and the "joy" and "the seat at the right hand" of Heb. xii. carry the subject forward, while the relation of "perfecting", "pressing to a goal" and "prize" of Phil. iii. shows how much this theme is interwoven in the epistles of Paul. When we turn to I Cor. ix. 25, where agonizomai is translated strive, we are in the atmosphere of the Greek games. "The prize" is "a crown" (I Cor. ix. 24, 25) even as "the prize" in view in Phil. iii. and "the crown" in view in II Tim. iv., are the same.

In no passage where we read of contest, conflict, race, crown or prize is salvation or dispensational position in view. Salvation can neither be won nor lost. Membership of the body of Christ is not held out as a prize to be won, it is a most serious error to confuse the fight of faith with the gift of grace. Let us avoid it, and bear a clear testimony. Writing to Timothy in the first epistle, Paul said: "Fight the good fight of faith" (I Tim. vi. 12), and the apostle evidently has this aspect of the contest in view in Heb. xii. "the author and finisher of faith", as in II Tim. iv.: "I have fought a good fight . . . . . I have kept the faith." "The faith." In those two words the apostle summed up the sacred trust which he had so faithfully guarded and fulfilled. "I have finished my course." When the apostle came to the end of his first ministry and announced to the Ephesian believers that bonds and afflictions awaited him, he then uttered the words with which his last epistle closes:

> "But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God" (Acts xx. 24).

Dromos, the word translated "course" means a place where people "run" especially "a race course". The English reader will recognize the word in such modern adaptations as Hippodrome, Aerodrome, Dromedary and the like. One word used in Heb. vi. 20 appears to have been misunderstood by some commentators, that is, the word "forerunner". It is highly probable that the reader's mind reverts to John the Baptist when he sees the word "forerunner", and there may be some of our readers who would be prepared to affirm that a text could be found where John the Baptist was so named. The image that the word produces in the mind is that of a slave running before his master's chariot, and with this image and the mission of John the Baptist in mind, we are puzzled by the apparent incongruity of the figure in Heb. vi. 20, "Whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus."

Classical Greek provides examples of prodromos meaning "running forward, in advance, with head-long speed, premature", "of men sent on before to reconnoiter, scouts", "of horsemen who ride first, as an advanced guard", and of prodrome "a sally" or "sudden attack". No such usage is found in Biblical Greek. The two occurrences of the word translated "forerunner" in the LXX version of the O.T. refer to the "firstripe" grapes (Numb. xiii. 20), or to "hasty" fruit before summer (Isa. xxviii. 4).

Prodromos "forerunner" means "One who comes to a place whither the rest are to follow", not "one who runs before another" as did John the Baptist, and with the LXX use before us, "one who is a kind of first fruits, a pledge of the harvest that is to be". Heb. xii. picks up the theme. We have a race to run (I Cor. ix. 24, 25; Heb. xii. 1), but Christ has run the race before us. He endured, He triumphed, and the exhortation is to look off unto Him the author and perfecter of faith, and with His example to encourage and His grace to enable to run with patience the race set before us.

At the beginning of this section (II Tim. iii. 10 - iv. 8) the apostle refers Timothy to his agoge his "manner of life". At the close, he speaks of his agon his "contest". These words are not only linked by their place in the structure, not only joined by a common root ago, but they are vitally associated with the doctrine involved, for the "contest" of the apostle, stood for his whole life's witness, from the beginning—Antioch, Lystra, Iconium (Acts xiii.; II Tim. iii. 11); from stoning to shipwreck, from riot to Rome, and leaves him at last, battered, scarred, bearing in his body the marks of the Lord Jesus, but already with joyful anticipation, looking up to where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God, his hope, his crown, his reward.

"That I may win Christ" was his prayer, and the blessed answer is recorded by his own pen in the epistle we are studying.

No.39. The Crown of Righteousness (iv. 8).
pp. 134 - 139

We have now arrived at the last member of this great section (II Tim. iii. 10 - iv. 8). It may refresh the reader's memory if we give the two corresponding members of the structure, the whole of which was set out on page 169, Volume XXXVI.

C | iv. 1. The Judgment of Quick and Dead at Appearing.
g | 1. The Judge.
h | 1. His Appearing.

* * * * * * *

C | iv. 8. The Judge of Paul and others at Appearing.
g | 8. The righteous Judge.
h | 8. His appearing.

What had Paul, what has any believer, to do with Christ as a "Judge"? The answer depends upon what the word "Judge" signifies. If we think of a Judge sitting in a criminal court, with prisoners before him, who have all been "brought in guilty" (Rom. iii. 19) then blessed be God, the answer is: Neither Paul nor ourselves, nor any believer can have anything to do with or to fear from such a Judge. Sin has been condemned in the Person of the Son of God (Rom. viii. 3) and we are in the glorious position of being able to say: "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?" (33), and to have no fear respecting the answer that must be given.

It will profitable for us, not only in connexion with the verse immediately before us (II Tim. iv. 8), but with regard to the teaching of the apostle generally, if we take this opportunity of becoming acquainted with the whole family of words of which krites "judge", is one.

Krino, the verb translated "to judge" in II Tim. iv. 1, "judge the quick and the dead", means primarily, to divide, to separate, to discern, to make a distinction, to come to a decision, and is akin to the Latin cernere "to sift" (Cremer). "Not merely sentence of condemnation, but also a decision in any one's favour" (Dr. Bullinger). The translation "to esteem" one day above another (Rom. xiv. 5), shows that discernment, not condemnation, is the root idea of the word. The word then becomes associated particularly with judicial decisions "sue thee at law" (Matt. v. 40), and so to the sentence passed "condemned already" (John iii. 18). From this root comes krisis, "judgment", "sentence" (Matt. v. 21; xxiii. 33). The English usage of crisis, is not found in the N.T., it is a development with which all students of language will be familiar.

Krites, "he who decides":

> "I will be no judge of such matter" as "words, names and your law", said Gallio to the Jews (Acts xviii. 15).

Kriterion, an instrument of krinein, a touchstone, and then, a court of justice (James ii. 6). In modern usage criterion is "a canon or standard by which anything is judged".

Kritikon, the discerner, as in Heb. iv. 12.

In modern use, the word critic has fallen from its high place and is often used in a carping, captious sense.

> "You know who the critics are? The men who have failed in literature and art" (Disraeli).

Modern depraved usage, however, is no "criterion" for the Bible student.

We do not propose following this root krino through all its variations in the N.T., there are twenty-nine altogether, and no student of the Word is really equipped who is not personally acquainted with them all. This part of the reader's education is, however, not within our province, we have merely traveled so far in order to let the reader see that Paul could speak of the Saviour as a "righteous Judge", without necessarily referring to the question of salvation or condemnation.

The Umpire at the Greek sports was called Krites, and at Athens it was used especially for the judges at poetic contests. It is this aspect of judgment that Paul had in mind when he wrote:

> "Henceforth is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous Judge shall give me at that day; and not to me only but unto all them also that love His appearing" (II Tim. iv. 8).

"Henceforth", loipon. This word comes from loipos "remnant" (Matt. xxii. 6); "the rest" (I Cor. xi. 34), and means "something left over". The course having been finished there was nothing left but to await the day when the Lord would assess every man's service and reward those who had "kept the faith". The word loipon is translated "finally" five times in Paul's epistles. The translation "henceforth" is a link with Heb. x. 13, where the Lord having "finished" the work which He came to do, sat down at the right hand of God, "from henceforth expecting". The exhortation to run the race with the example of Christ in view which the apostle had given in Heb. xii. 1, 2, he has now fulfilled in his own life and service.

"There is laid up" apokeimai. Bloomfield cites Plutarch, Demosthenes, Pindar and Josephus, to support the idea, that:

In Colossians Paul had taught that our "life" is hid with Christ in God, and that it is in safe keeping until "the appearing" (Col. iii. 3, 4). This hope, he said was "laid up" (apokeimai) in heaven (Col. i. 5). The same blessed security attaches to the crown when once it has been won, it is "laid up" and will be awarded "in that day". Paul knew that a believer could be "beguiled of his reward" (Col. ii. 18), even as he could not assume that he had "attained" the prize in Phil. iii. 3-14, knowing full well the typical history of his fathers (I Cor. ix. 24 - x. 13), but, once the believer receives the assurance that he has finished his course, then, he need no more fear of failing to receive his reward, than that his life which is hid in Christ with God can ever be forfeited or lost.

"The crown of righteousness." Paul makes it very clear in all his testimony, that righteousness is unattainable by any works that the flesh can produce. He who was assured that he would receive the crown of "righteousness" said that he had flung aside as so much refuse, all righteousness that may have come to him by his own obedience to the law (Phil. iii. 8-10), and with justification by faith as a solid fact, he entered the running for the prize (Phil. iii. 11-14), which he learned at length was "the crown of righteousness".

We have demonstrated in earlier volumes, that the epistle we are studying is balanced by the epistle to the Philippians. In both we have the references to "depart" and being "offered". In both there is the atmosphere of a race, a conflict. Philippians speaks of "pressing toward the mark", II Timothy says: "I have finished my course", and "no man is crowned except he strive lawfully". In II Timothy the reward is that of a "crown", in Philippians it is that of a "prize". The apostle when writing to the Corinthians had already indicated that the "prize" he had in view was a "crown".

It is pitiable to read the attempt of the Commentators to justify the apostle's exhortation to run and to win, with the doctrine of free grace, and salvation by faith alone. There is no need to attempt a justification, for the apostle is not dealing with salvation but with "going on unto perfection" after that salvation is secure.

In Gen. xv. Abraham is "justified by faith"; in Gen. xvii., he receives the exhortation to "be perfect"; in Rom. iv. Paul treats of Abraham's initial justification by faith, and James, in his epistle, deals with Abraham's subsequent justification by works. Paul takes us to Gen. xv. for his basis; James takes us to Gen. xxii., and tells us that the latter "perfected" and "fulfilled" the former.

Writing the epistle to the Hebrews, Paul makes it plain that he has believers in view, for he calls them "Holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling". Yet he brings Israel's forty years wandering in the wilderness to bear upon their subsequent "going on unto perfection", and urges them to lay aside every weight and run the race which was set before them. This same "example", namely Israel's failure in the wilderness, is before the apostle when he wrote I Cor. ix. 24 - x. 13.

> "Do you not know that in a foot-race the runners all run, but that only one gets the prize? You must run like him, in order to run with certainty. But every competitor in an athletic contest practices abstemiousness in all directions. They indeed do this for the sake of securing a perishable wreath, but we for the sake of securing one that will not perish. That is how I run, not being in any doubt as to my goal. I am a boxer who does not inflict blows on the air, but I hit hard and straight at my own body and lead it off into slavery, lest possibly after I have been a herald to others, I should be rejected (as unworthy of the crown and the prize)" (I Cor. ix. 24-27 Weymouth).

We have, in earlier numbers of this series of studies, referred to the crown and the reign of II Tim. ii., and we will not go over the ground again. We most earnestly beseech every reader to weigh over most carefully the essential difference which the Scripture teaches between assured salvation, "we shall live with Him", and subsequent prize, and moreover, reject as false, any teaching which would lead one to suppose that membership of the One Body could by any possible mans, be a "prize" which any saint or sinner could "win". To entertain for a moment such a conception is to give a fatal blow to the fullness of unmerited grace which so characterizes our calling, gospel and dispensation.

Why does Paul call the crown which he has won, "the crown of righteousness"?

First let us acquaint ourselves with the usage of stephanos "crown". The only occurrences of stephanos in the four gospels, refer to the Saviour's "crown of thorns".

Adam at his creation was "crowned with glory and honour" (Heb. ii. 7), and Christ, who, like Adam, was made a little lower than the angels, He too was "crowned with glory and honour for the suffering of death" (Heb. ii. 9).

On two occasions Paul speaks of believers as "his crown"; to the Philippians he wrote:

> "Therefore my brethren dearly beloved and longed for, my joy and my crown" (Phil. iv. 1), and to the Thessalonians he wrote:

> "For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at His coming?" (I Thess. ii. 19).

Specific crowns are mentioned in the New Testament:

(1) An incorruptible crown (I Cor. ix. 25).
(2) A crown of life (James i. 12; Rev. ii. 10).
(3) A crown of rejoicing (I Thess. ii. 19).
(4) A crown of glory (I Pet. v. 4).
(5) A crown of thorns (Matt. xxvii. 29).
(6) A crown of gold (Rev. iv. 4).
(7) A crown of twelve stars (Rev. xii. 1).

The O.T. provides us with many instances of the figurative use of a crown. In Job xxxi. 36, Job appears to gather up his rectitude and to declare that in spite of all that may be said against him he would wear it as his crown. The book of Proverbs speaks of a virtuous woman being a crown to her husband, and children's children being the crown of old men. A head of white hair is said to be a crown of glory, if it be found in the way of righteousness.

Crowns were associated with festivals and weddings and the apocrypha speaks of a crown of rosebuds, and a crown of rejoicing: "He that resisteth pleasures crowneth his life" (Ecclus. 19:5). The words of Shakespeare in Henry VIII: "No day without a deed to crown it", are suggestive of the meaning of this crown of life, this crown of righteousness. It seems fitting that Paul's crown should be a crown of righteousness, for Paul is the exponent of righteousness in the New Testament.

Dikaiosune, "righteousness" receives its fullest exposition in his epistles. The apostle who alone used the glorious words "the just shall live by faith", who fought against any attempt to attain righteousness by works of the law and the flesh, nevertheless urged the believer to adorn the doctrine of God his Saviour, agonized over the believer that his faith might be perfected, that he should go on unto perfection, that his manner of life should correspond with his doctrine, and that his walk should be worthy of his calling. It is fitting therefore that this apostle should look forward to "the crown of righteousness". This crown, the apostle looked to received "at that day". This fact does not prove that the apostle Paul did not go straight to glory upon his death, but the analogy of the faith is all in favour of the doctrine which applies equally to rewards as to resurrection itself, namely:

> "That they without us should not be made perfect" (Heb. xi. 40).

The saints of the Pentecostal dispensation were taught explicitly that they:

> "Which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall not go before them which are asleep . . . . . the dead in Christ shall rise first, then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them" (I Thess. iv. 15-17).

In the manner of reward, the analogy of the O.T. is in favour of the doctrine that Paul, with others, will await that day and not receive a reward before others of the same calling. Caleb and Joshua earned the reward of the inheritance, but they waited nevertheless the whole forty years of Israel's wandering before they entered into it.

"That day." The apostle had the day of Jesus Christ before him throughout his ministry, and "that day" would not necessarily suffer a change because a new dispensation had come into "this day".

"The day shall declare it" (I Cor. iii. 13).
"The day of the Lord Jesus" (I Cor. v. 5).
"The day of the Lord Jesus" (II Cor. i. 14).
"The day Jesus Christ" (Phil. i. 6).
"The day of Christ" (Phil. i. 10; ii. 16).

In the second epistle to Timothy, the apostle uses the expression "that day" three times:

A | i. 12. Paul in spite of all opposition knew that the Lord was able to guard that which had been entrusted to the apostle, "until that day".
B | i. 18. Paul prayed that Onesiphorus might receive mercy of the Lord in connexion with the service he had rendered unto the apostles, "in that day".
A | iv. 8. Paul was at length assured that he would receive from the Lord the crown of righteousness, "at that day".

Because the apostle was so influenced by "that day" he could remain unmoved by "man's day" (I Cor. iv. 3, margin), and all who would attain the crown, the prize of our high calling, will have "that day" in mind too. This we are to see most tragically illustrated by Demas, who loved this present day too well.

No.40. The Love of His Appearing (iv. 8).
pp. 152 - 155

Limitations of space compelled us to defer the consideration of the closing words of II Tim. iv. 8 to this article.

Paul had expressed his assurance of victory and of reward. He looked forward to "that day" when the Lord the righteous Judge should give him the crown of righteousness, and then, using a blessed *epanorthosis kindles hope in the heart of the humblest believer by saying:

"And not to me only, but unto all them also that love His appearing."

[* - A recalling of what has been said, in order to correct it as by an afterthought, as in Gal. ii. 20, "Yet not I, but Christ liveth in me".]

The servant who had five talents, was expected to gain five. The servant who had two talents was expected to gain two, and if the servant who had but one talent had only produced another talent, he would have received the "well done, good and faithful servant", and would have entered into the joy of his Lord (Matt. xxv. 14-23). Without intending that Paul can be fitted into Matthew twenty-five, or that he had five talents and no more, we can see at least that as—he had much to answer for. To each one of us his more lowly followers:

"Is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ" (Eph. iv. 7).

and He Who knows that measure, will not expect us to reach the standard demanded of Paul.

It would be more true to the sense of the original to follow the R.V. here and read "and not only to me". The apostle does not say that the crown is reserved for those who "suffer", as he did in II Tim. ii. 12, or for those who "strive lawfully", nor for those who "are temperate in all things" as he did in I Cor. ix. 24-26, nor for those who "forget the things that are behind" and who "press toward the mark" as he did in Phil. iii., nor for those who stand in all their "completeness" in Christ and are "not beguiled of their reward" as he did in Col. ii., nor for those who fully followed the Lord, as they did in Heb. ii. and iii., he sums up all these qualities and qualifications in one comprehensive expression:

"Those that love His appearing."

The perfect tense, egapekosin should be translated "those that have loved", meaning that they not only loved in the past, but their love continued right through until the end.

Those who "love" His appearing, will be saved from falling into the position of the evil servant who said "My Lord delayeth His coming" (Matt. xxiv. 48), they will not say to their Lord, like the man who hid the talent "I knew Thee that Thou art an austere man" (Matt. xxv. 24). If the believer really "loves" the appearing of Christ, he will not lose sight of it, and be ensnared by lesser attractions.

The "love" of the Lord's appearing is placed over against the "love" of Demas, and "the appearing" and "that day" is set over against "this present world".

"Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world."

"His appearing." The Coming, Revelation, Presence or Appearing of the Lord Jesus Christ is the hope that is set before the believer of each and every calling and dispensation. The kingdom believer awaits the Advent of the King, The Bride awaits the Bridegroom, The Body awaits the Manifestation of the Head. It does not follow, however, that all callings and dispensations will realized their hope at exactly the same time or in the same place.

"His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives" (Zech. xiv. 4), and this will be the consummation of the hope of those who are members of the kingdom upon earth. While the same blessed Person will fulfil Zech. xiv. 4, as He will II Tim. iv. 8, few there are who would teach that the fulfillment of Zechariah's prophecy and the fulfillment of Paul's hope synchronize.

This leads us to recognize a most important principle in connexion with the subject of "Hope". It will be found upon examination, that "Hope" in the Scriptures, when it refers to the Coming of the Lord, is either: the fulfillment of a promise, or the realization of a calling. Consequently, before we can speak with any certainty about the Second coming of Christ, we must be acquainted with the promises that await fulfillment, and the callings that are yet to find their realization in that day.

Let us note the promises that are awaiting fulfillment and see whether they can possibly relate to the same phase of the Second coming.

> "And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers: unto which promise our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night hope to come" (Acts xxvi. 6, 7).

"The Fathers" belong to Israel. "Whose are the fathers" (Rom. ix. 5). "All our fathers were under the cloud . . . . . Moses" (I Cor. x. 1). "Moses truly said unto the fathers" (Acts iii. 22).

The Church of the One Body is not looking for the fulfillment of the promises which God made unto "the fathers". "The Twelve Tribes" limit this promise and hope to the earthly sphere of blessing, and to that phase of the second advent which relates to the earth.

The kingdom, however, had a heavenly section as well as an earthly one. Paul addressed his epistle to the Hebrews as "Holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling" (Heb. iii. 1), and Abraham who received the earthly inheritance as an unconditional gift, is represented as reaching out after "a better country, that is a heavenly" (Heb. xi. 16). This better and heavenly section of the kingdom is focused in the New Jerusalem, "the heavenly Jerusalem" (Heb. xii. 22), which was the "Mother" of the believers at Galatia, who, though Gentiles by nature, were Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise (Gal. iii. 29; iv. 26). Here therefore is another set of promises with their corresponding hope and these will not be fulfilled on the earth, or when the Lord stands upon the mount of Olives, these will be fulfilled when the saints meet the Lord in the air. The early epistles of Paul, Galatians, I and II Thessalonians, Hebrews, I and II Corinthians and Romans, belong to this calling and company.

Galatians is linked with Hebrews by Jerusalem which is above, and Romans and Galatians are vitally joined by the common fatherhood of Abraham. I Thess. iv. belongs to this group and must be taken as expressing the hope of the church during the Acts of the Apostles. II Thess. ii., shows that this hope would not be entered or realized until the days when the Beast and False Prophet of Rev. xiii. are upon the scene.

This heavenly aspect of the hope, however, is not the blessed hope of the Church of the Mystery. This company is unrelated to any promises made unto Abraham or the fathers, neither is it related with the heavenly Jerusalem.

"The one hope of the calling" of the Church of the Mystery must harmonize with that calling. This calling antedates all promises that are discoverable in the Old Testament. It goes back to a period before the overthrow of the world, it is a holy calling made in Christ before age times (Eph. i. 3-5, 18; iv. 4; II Tim. i. 9). Its sphere of blessing is neither the earth nor the New Jerusalem, it is "where Christ sits at the right hand of God", and it is "there" its hope will be realized.

> "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. Set your affection on things above, not on things on earth. For ye died, and your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ Who is our life shall be made manifest, then shall ye also be made manifest with Him in glory" (Col. iii. 1-4).

In his earlier epistles, Paul used distinctive words to express the character of the Second coming of Christ.

Parousia. A word indicating "personal presence" and used in Matt. xxiv. and in the epistles of James, Peter and John, as well as in Paul's epistles to the Corinthians and Thessalonians. This word, however, is never used of the coming of Christ by Paul after Acts xxviii.

Apokalupsis, "revelation" or "unveiling". This word is used of the second coming by Paul in Corinthians and Thessalonians, by Peter, and by John in the Revelation, but it is never used by Paul of the coming of Christ after Acts xxviii. In place of these two words, the apostle uses phaneroo and epiphaneia to express the special aspect of the coming of the Lord for the Church of the Mystery.

Phaneroo, "to appear", "make manifest" in connexion with hope is used in Col. iii. 4 which we have quoted in full above; and epiphaneia, appearing or manifestation, occurs as follows:

> "The appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Tim. vi. 14).
> "At His appearing and kingdom" (II Tim. iv. 1).
> "Them also that love His appearing" (II Tim. iv. 8).
> "The glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ" (Titus ii. 13).

In I Cor. xv. 23, the apostle has said of the resurrection and the second coming "every man in his own order". This principle underlies what we have endeavoured to show in the choice of distinctive words, and in the association of different phases of hope with different callings.

The calling of the Church of the Mystery is unique and its hope must partake of the same unique character. The sphere of blessing is unique, "in heavenly places", "where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God". The realization of its hope must therefore be associated with that selfsame sphere of blessing where faith has already placed it. Those who love His appearing, are those who are looking for that blessed hope, the hope that will see them manifested with Christ in glory. After this manifestation has been accomplished, the Lord will descend from heaven, and the hope of the Church of the Acts period will be realized, they will meet the Lord "in the air", then His feet will stand upon the Mount of Olives and the hope of the earthly Kingdom will be realized.

The reader will find, in The Berean Expositor, Volume XXVI, p.178, a chart illustrating these three features of the Second coming which we commend, and in Volume XXV, p.8, there is a chart illustrating the association of the Acts and the early epistles of Paul, with the hope of Israel, and on page 65 of the same volume, is a chart illustrating the three spheres of blessing with which the three phases of the Second coming are associated.

If we "love" His appearing, it will make us more concerned, not less concerned, with every detail of that blessed event. No one who was expecting the return of a loved one, would be indifferent to the question of how, when and where to meet him, and love will not be dimmed by weighing the differences between parousia and epiphaneia, it will rather be quickened as it perceives in their discriminate use, indications of a loving guidance, which will enable them indeed to live . . . . . looking . . . . . (Titus ii. 13).

No.41. Paul's longing for Timothy, and the forsaking of Demas, with structure of the Section, (iv. 9 - 22).

pp. 196 - 200

What a perfectly "natural" man, the beloved saint of God must have been! Without hesitation, without apology, without the remotest suspicion of what is called "side", he steps from the heights of glory, and the prospect of a crown, to the immediate needs of himself as a poor solitary prisoner, dreading the cold of winter and the awful loneliness of desertion. Men of a lower calibre would have hesitated to mingle such high and holy things with such temporal and sordid elements; but Paul had not so learned Christ. He could step from the exhortation to put on the whole armour of God, the contemplation of conflict with spiritual foes, and the high dignity of being an Ambassador for the mystery, to the homely and personal interchange of "news", "my affairs and how I do" (Eph. vi. 10-22).

Paul saw no incongruity in speaking in the same context of "elect angels" and Timothy's weak "stomach" (I Tim. v. 21-23). We remember hearing some time ago that a missionary in foreign parts was thrilled to receive the homely news, that her mother in England had at last purchased a new hearth brush! To the superficial, to those who have to keep up a spiritual appearance, such an idea would be met with a frown, but we can readily believe that in Paul, this lady missionary would have found a boon companion in her loneliness. Let us "put on" the new man by all means, but let us avoid like the poison it is that "putting on" of spiritual airs and graces which are but the acknowledgment of emptiness within.

So, without a transition, Paul steps from II Tim. iv. 8 with the crown and its glory, to the urgent need of Timothy's presence and care before winter, and this closing section is bounded by his insistence "Do thy diligence to come" (II Tim. iv. 9, 21).

By the time we reached this section in our book "The Testimony of the Lord's Prisoner" our available space was well nigh filled, and we contended ourselves with a very formal presentation of the structure of this closing section. As we are not limited to one or more articles in the present series, we have felt it incumbent upon us to turn to the passage afresh and to recast the analysis in more useful form.

The section opens with a call to Timothy to exercise diligence in coming to the apostle, and almost at the close this note is struck again. The remainder of the section is a series of alternations between Desertion and Fellowship, Absentees and Close friendship, Oppositions and Divine Help, and with the prayer for Divine help the section closes.

"Do thy diligence." spoudazo. The word means to act with expedition and haste. We must however exclude the secondary and degenerate meaning of "haste" from the word, for "Raw haste is half sister to Delay".

Speudo from which spoudazo and spoude are derived is translated "haste" in its six occurrences in the N.T. (Luke ii. 16; xix. 5, 6; Acts xx. 16; xxii. 18; II Pet. iii. 12). In no case however is there the idea of precipitous haste, flurry or fluster; rather does the haste proceed in five cases out of the six from eagerness to attain.

From this conception of eagerness comes the idea of diligence, in which no time will be wasted in the pursuit of the goal. The word has already met us in II Timothy, namely in that important exhortation II Tim. ii. 15, where it is translated "study". The same word is translated "endeavour" in Eph. iv. 3; "be forward" (Gal. ii. 10) and "labour" (Heb. iv. 11). Spoude besides being translated "diligence" is rendered "haste", "business", "care", "carefulness", "earnest care" and "forwardness". Paul had prepared Timothy for this call, by reminding him, at the commencement of the letter, of the earnestness manifested by Onesiphorus, who,

> "When he was in Rome, he sought me out very diligently, and found me" (II Tim. i. 17), which remark contains the suggestion that Onesiphorus could have found many excuses for not being able to find Paul if he had been so minded. If Onesiphorus could use such diligence, then surely his own son in the faith would not fail him.

> "Do thy diligence to come to me shortly" (II Tim. iv. 9).
> "Do thy diligence to come before winter" (II Tim. iv. 21).

We must not think that because Paul wrote these words from Rome, or that because Timothy was even further south than that latitude, the winter was not formidable. Its very name in the Greek speaks otherwise. Cheimon, is connected with cheimazomai, "to be tossed with a tempest" (Acts xxvii. 18), an experience which the apostle could never forget. Cheimon is translated "foul weather" (Matt. xvi. 3) and "tempest" (Acts xxvii. 20), and the prayer "that your flight be not in the winter" (Matt. xxiv. 20) reveals the serious problem that travel in the winter implied. For this reason the apostle asked Timothy to bring with him "the cloke" which he had left at Troas (II Tim. iv. 13). Phailone, this cloak was a cloak with long sleeves and reaching to the feet, designed specially for winter use. Some authorities lean to the idea that Paul was referring to a parchment valise or portmanteau and read phelone here instead of phailone, a valise in which his books were kept; but as Alford remarks:

> "It would be unnatural, in case a bag of books had been left behind, to ask a friend to bring the bag, also the books and especially the parchments."

It is, however, a bad argument to bring forward the fact that the Jews had a word of similar spelling for a cloak, for they used exactly the same word for the linen with which they wrapped round the scroll of the law, so that that argument cuts both ways. If the meaning "cloak" is retained, there is a parallel with the closing days of William Tyndale that is suggestive. Writing from his damp prison in Vilvorde in the winter that preceded his martyrdom he asked "for the Lord Jesus sake", for a warmer cap, something with which to patch his leggings, a woolen shirt, and above all his Hebrew Bible, Grammar and Dictionary.

What the "books" and especially "the parchments" were we do not know.

> "Poor inventory of a saint's possession! not worth a hundredth part of what a buffoon would get for one jest in Cæsar's palace, or an acrobat for a feat in the amphitheatre . . . If he has the cloak to keep him warm, and the book and parchments to teach and encourage him, and Mark to help him in various ways, and if, above all, Timothy will come himself, then life will have shed on him its last rays of sunshine; and in lesser things as well as in all greater, he will wait with thankfulness, even with exultation, the pouring out in > libation of those last few drops of his heart's blood, of which the rich full stream has for these long years been flowing forth upon God's altar in willing sacrifice" (Farrar).

We must now give some attention to the list of names that the apostle, in spite of his cares and condition, remembered and wrote.

The first is Demas. This man is mentioned in Colossians and in Philemon:

> "Luke, the beloved physician and Demas, greet you" (Col. iv. 14).
> "Marcus, Aristarchus, Demas, Lucas, my fellow labourers" (Philemon 24).

These epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon, are related. Onesimus was a Colossian (iv. 9), and Philemon was his master, and to both the Church at Colosse and Philemon, Demas sends greetings. In the salutation sent to Philemon Demas is mentioned before Luke. When we read the list of names in the fourth chapter of Colossians, and arrive at the words "and Demas", we are conscious of something strange.

Tychicus is first mentioned, and he is called:

> "A beloved brother, and a faithful minister and a fellow servant in the Lord" (Col. iv. 7).

Yet all that Paul says is "and Demas", not "brother", "minister", nor "fellow". The omission in any book or letter would be striking, but in an epistle of Paul it is ominous.

> Onesimus is described as "a faithful and beloved brother" (9).
> Aristarchus, is "my fellow prisoner" (10).
> Marcus is "sister's son to Barnabas . . . . . receive him" (10).
> Jesus, called Justus is a "fellow worker" and a "comfort" as were all those previously mentioned (11).
> Epaphras is a fervent labourer (12).
> Luke is "the beloved physician" (14).
> Nymphas is marked off as having "the church" in his house, and Archippus is exhorted to fulfil his ministry (15, 17).

No name is mentioned in this list, without some note of recognition, of commendation, of grateful remembrance. Moreover, it is evident that Paul did not scatter his praise without thought and reason. He is lavish in his praise of Tychicus, he is moderate in his praise of Marcus and Justus, and the very fact that he appears concerned to render all their due, makes the unqualified words "and Demas" stand out all the more. Paul evidently perceived that Demas' loyalty was being undermined. However Demas may eventually betray Paul, Paul will not betray Demas. He cannot and will not, however, indulge in fulsome flattery, no man was less likely to use words of mere conventional praise than the apostle. The breaking point with Demas appears to have been the re-arrest of Paul, and the extreme danger in which any "christian" then stood, but the fact that Demas broke under the strain is revealed in the fact that rottenness had crept into his fibre.

> "Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world, and is departed unto Thessalonica" (II Tim. iv. 10).

"Forsaken" egkataleipo, a word for ever sacred by the Saviour's cry on the cross (Matt. xxvii. 46, its first occurrence), exceedingly precious by reason of the promise:

> "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee" (Heb. xiii. 5), and solemn in its suggestiveness in its last occurrence "All men forsook me" (II Tim. iv. 16), where Paul shared one aspect of his Saviour's rejection, the forsaking of man, but was for ever spared the bitterness of being forsaken by his God. "Persecuted, but not forsaken" (II Cor. iv. 9), is a summary of his life (II Tim. iii. 12; iv. 17).

There is an intensity about this word that should not be missed. Leipo means simply "to leave", a meaning found in profane Greek but not in the N.T. where it has the sense of "lacking", "wanting" or "destitution".

Kataleipo, a more intensive form, has the meaning "to leave" in the N.T. (Matt. iv. 13; Titus i. 5).

Egkataleipo however, "To leave in" means to desert.

> "This word is particularly emphatical. Kataleipo is to leave, forsake; but this is more: it is to forsake a person in distress, to leave him plunged in the deep mire" (Leigh).

And so Paul, encouraged as he was by the presence of the Lord and of His deliverance (II Tim. iv. 17, 18), nevertheless longed to see the face of his son Timothy, if only for the briefest moment. This is evident by the connective "for".

> "Do thy diligence to come shortly unto me (no reference yet to cloke, books or parchment, no reference yet to the advent of winter) FOR, Demas hath forsaken me, ... only Luke is with me."

No.43. Desertion and Deliverance. Paul before Nero (iv. 14 - 18).

pp. 235 - 239

The apostle mentions Demas and his betrayal, only to follow it with the name of Luke and the fragrance of his loyalty. We now come to the mention of an active enemy, Alexander, only to find it followed by most glorious recognition of the Lord's sustaining and delivering grace.

> "Alexander the coppersmith did me much evil, the Lord reward him according to his works: of whom be thou ware also, for he hath greatly withstood our words. At my first answer no man stood with me, but all men forsook me: I pray God that it may not be laid to their charge. Notwithstanding the Lord stood with me, and strengthened me: that by me the preaching might be fully known, and that all the Gentiles might hear: and I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion. And the Lord shall deliver me from every evil work, and will preserve me unto His heavenly kingdom, to Whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen."

"Alexander the coppersmith." Was this the same man as is named in I Tim. i. 20? Is he the same as the Jew who was put forward to speak at the riot at Ephesus in Acts xix. 33? Who can say? We can but examine the passages, hear what they say and seek to arrive at a conclusion that will not strain the testimony of any passage.

The Alexander mentioned in I Tim. i. 20, was evidently a Christian, for he is said to be among those who having put away "faith and a good conscience" were making shipwreck of the faith, and together with Hymenæus had been handed over to Satan that they may learn not to blaspheme. The Alexander of II Tim. iv. did much evil to the apostle. Did the apostle mean that Alexander had gone to Rome and had witnessed against him there? Not necessarily. The statement concerning Alexander is complete in itself, and the statement concerning the apostle's defence follows as a connected, but separate event. Alexander is said to have "greatly withstood" Paul's "words". This seems to refer to opposition to the preaching and teaching of Paul, rather than damaging evidence against Paul before Nero. There is every probability that Hymenæus and the Alexander of both I and II Timothy are the same individual, and the added title "the coppersmith", does suggest that he might also be the Jew, Alexander, who was put forward to disassociate the Jewish fraternity at Ephesus, from the "heresy" preached by Paul, for even though Alexander were a believer, he would still have been a "Jew", and the Jewish Christian were often very bitter against their Gentile brethren, and wished to avoid the too common lot of being made a scapegoat for others' offences. The evidence is not sufficient for anyone to-day to dogmatize, we can only say that there is the possibility that Alexander of Acts xix., I Tim. i. and II Tim. iv. were one and the same person and leave the matter there.

The identity of Alexander is too remote from our present time to be of great interest to us, but it is of intense interest to Alexander. There will be no mistake when those who bear the name of Alexander (even though numbers of them had been coppersmith), stand before the judgment seat of Christ. Paul has made it clear in his early and in his later epistles, that there will be an assessment of service associated with reward and forfeiture for all believers (I Cor. iii. 12, 15; II Cor. v. 10; Rom. xiv. 10; and Col. iii. 22-25).

The received text uses the optative apodoe, "may the Lord reward him according to his works", here and the revised texts read the future apodosei, "The Lord will reward". While we cannot decide concerning the question as to which is the true reading here, it is obvious that many would wish to alter the optative to the future, but it is inconceivable—if the future had originally been written—why anyone should alter back to the harder reading. Whichever may prove to the true reading, the sense and purpose remains unaltered. If the apostle had taught, as we have seen that he did, that every believer must stand before the judgment seat of Christ, if in this very chapter he has spoken of reward, using the very same verb:

> "The crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous judge shall give (apodosei) me at that day and not to me only" (II Tim. iv. 8), shall he not with equal intensity speak of the just settlement of evil. Could the apostle calmly see his life's work attacked, knowing the sacredness of the trust committed to him, without being glad that, though it was not within the province of any believer to execute vengeance upon another, yet the Lord Who was able to keep that which had been entrusted, would most certainly deal with those who had opposed the truth. Such not only made shipwreck of their own faith and of others, but were destined to suffer loss, and even though saved, to be saved so as by fire.

Where the apostle does intervene, and express his own mind, is in the verse that follows:

> "I pray God that it may not be laid to their charge" (II Tim. iv. 16).

Here, he followed the blessed example of the Lord Himself, who prayed for those who had delivered Him up saying: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

"At my first answer no man stood with me." Paul here refers to his trial. He had appealed unto Cæsar and, theoretically, none but Nero could be his judge. While the ancient law was still nominally recognized, it was set aside continually in daily practice. Paul was probably heard in the first instance by the City Prefect. There he had stood, humanly speaking, alone. So bitter was the hatred which now had grown, against "Christians" that no man dared to appear either as his friend or to plead his cause. In the ordinary course he would have had no difficulty in procuring the services of an advocate, or of a procurator.

> "and it was the custom, both in the Greek and the Roman courts of justice, to allow the friends of the accused to intercede for him" (Conybeare & Howson).

Paul stood his trial alone. Yet, not alone, for the Lord never forsook him but stood by and strengthened him. The expression "first answer" or "defence" is explained by a note in Suetonius, where we learn that it was the practice of Nero to hear and decide each branch of the accusation separately.

> "Amongst the Romans, as amongst ourselves, the indictment consisted of several counts, which were heard seriatim" (Lewin).

Who was "the lion" from whose mouth Paul had been delivered at this first hearing? It might refer to Satan (I Pet. v. 8) but that is unlikely, the figure being foreign to Paul's usual description of Satan and his antagonism. It might have been a reference to Nero himself, and Paul, student as he was of the apocryphal writings of his people would know the text in the Megillah where Esther cried to Ahaseurus "save me from the lion's mouth", but there is every reason to justify us taking the statement literally.

> "Nero had been intensely anxious to fix on the innocent Christians the stigma of that horrible conflagration, of which he himself had been dangerously suspected, and the mere suspicion of which, until averted into another channel, had gone far to shake even his imperial power. And now the greatest of the Christians—the very coryphaeus of the hated sect—stood chained before him. He to whom popularity, forfeited in part by his enormous crimes, had become a matter of supreme importance, saw how cheaply it could be won by sacrificing a sick, deserted, aged and fettered prisoner, for whom no living soul would speak a word, and who was evidently regarded with intense hatred by Gentiles from Asia, and by a dense rabble of the city, and by Jews from every quarter of the world" (Farrar).

"Notwithstanding", said Paul, "the Lord stood with me". Paristemi "stand beside", was used by the Saviour, in His hour of trial, when He said:

> "Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to My Father, and He shall presently give Me more than twelve legions of angels?" (Matt. xxvi. 53).

We have met the word earlier in this epistle for in the exhortation "Study to shew thy self approved unto God" (II Tim. ii. 15), the word translated "shew" is paristemi. This twofold use is full of teaching and encouragement. Paul found it to be true, he assured Timothy that it would be true for him, and we are sure that it has been, and will yet be true for countless more. In effect Paul teaches us by this double reference that if we but "stand beside" God "approved" and make it our endeavour so to do, we can rest assured that He will "stand beside" us in our hour of trial.

Endunamo "to enstrengthen", is a word used only of or by Paul. Once again we turn back to the second chapter, to find the only other reference in this epistle. To Timothy, Paul had said:

> "Thou therefore, my son, be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus" (II Tim. ii. 1), and here, in his hour of need, Paul testifies to the faithfulness of the Lord Who not only stood by but strengthened him.

"Sick, deserted, aged, fettered"—so Nero beheld him with the outward eye—but Paul was clad from top to toe in the whole armour of God, for the exhortation in Eph. vi. to put on the whole armour of God, is introduced by the same word "be strong" (vi. 10).

When a man of Paul's sensibility had suffered imprisonment for two years at Cæsarea, and then another two at Rome, the most natural thing would be for him to ask his friends to pray earnestly for his release. Yet, when, in Col. iv. he does ask prayer for "an open door", it is not that he may walk out of prison a free man, but that the Word may be freely preached, whether he be bound or free (Col. iv. 3, 4). So here in his extreme peril, the apostle does not say: "Notwithstanding, the Lord stood with me, and strengthened me so that I escaped the dreadful punishment that awaited any one convicted of setting fire to Rome". No, his uppermost thought is the opportunity granted by this deliverance for the completion of work among the Gentiles that had been entrusted to him.

> "That by me the preaching might be fully known, and that all the Gentiles might hear, and (then in its right place he adds) I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion" (II Tim. iv. 17).

Preaching first. Mission to Gentiles first, deliverance from the lion second. Such was Paul. His supreme desire was "to finish" his course with joy, and it was abundantly granted.

"Fully known" is plerophoreo a word generally bearing the meaning "fully persuade" or "full assurance". The word however is made up of pleres "full" and phero "to carry", and its primitive meaning comes to the fore in the two references which we find in II Timothy. "Make full proof of thy ministry" (II Tim. iv. 5). So, Alford's rendering of verse 17, "might be delivered in full measure", is warranted.

"That all the Gentiles might hear." What are we to understand by this statement. Even though Rome was the metropolis of the world, only a small percentage of "all the Gentiles" then living would ever enter its walls, and a smaller percentage still would hear of the trial of this lonely prisoner. Paul cannot be speaking numerically. He was however "the apostle of the Gentiles" (Rom. xi. 13); and his apostleship, whether the "gospel" of chapter one or the "mystery" of chapter sixteen, was directed to "all nations" (Rom. i. 5; xvi. 26). Under the Abrahamic covenant, which Paul ministered until Israel were set aside in Acts xxviii., the blessing of "all nations" was equivalent to the message of justification by faith (Gal. iii. 8-14), and after the dispensational boundary of Acts xxviii., when Paul became the prisoner of Jesus Christ, it was "for you Gentiles" (Eph. iii. 1), and in that chapter of Ephesians, the apostle makes it clear that it was through him that "all" must be enlightened as to the Mystery, if ever they were to see it. In both epistles to Timothy the apostle emphasized his ministry to the Gentiles (I Tim. ii. 7; II Tim. i. 11) and now, with his course ended, he can review the past, and can see that he has been sustained up to that point, when everything necessary to ensure that all the Gentiles would hear, had been accomplished. This would include a geographical survey, from Jerusalem to Rome, a satisfaction that even though his projected visit to Spain may never be accomplished, yet that some faithful minister was already equipped for that work. Men of God had been sent to the various outposts—Tychicus to stand in the breach at Ephesus, Titus to carry the work forward in Dalmatia. His epistles which bore the stamp of Divine inspiration were now completed, and these, under the Lord's care, would accomplish more than any personal witness of Paul could hope to reach. And so, with a consciousness that his work was done, and that nothing had been omitted that was necessary to its persistence, the apostle laid down his pen, his armour and himself, saying:

> "And the Lord shall deliver me from every evil work, and will preserve me unto His heavenly kingdom; to Whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen" (II Tim. iv. 18).

Truth in the Balance.

No.12. The Testimony of the Types.
pp. 157 - 160

Among the fruitful studies of Scripture, the study of the types, with their corresponding antitypes must be given a place in any series that looks at truth in the balance. The word tupos has passed into our language, and means something that is symbolized or figured. The Greek word is derived from tupto "I strike or beat" and tupos means, first "a blow", as tupis means "a hammer", then the mark or impression produced by the blow or the impression of a seal, the stamp of a coin, the trace of a footstep, and so a form, figure, image, pattern, model, example, emblem or type. So antitype, antitupos, meant originally in classical Greek something that repelled or hit back, tupos antitupos meant the "blow against blow" of the hammer and the anvil, and so the word came to mean a copy, an impression, or the thing prefigured by the type. The O.T. abounds with types. Not only are there such obvious types as the Passover Lamb, but there are typical men, like Adam or Joseph, and typical events like the Flood and the Six days Creation. We are told in I Cor. x. 6 and 11, that the wilderness wanderings of Israel, with their murmurings and experiences "happened unto them for ensamples" (I Cor. x. 11). Both "ensample" and "example" are used in this chapter to translate the Greek word tupos. Ensample is obsolete, example is from ex+emere to take out, exempt, and means "something taken out, a sample". This, however, is only part of the intention of tupos, for tupos is not only an example, it is a figure which demands an antitype to make its purpose complete.

We are told, positively in the N.T. that the following were types. Adam, "who is the figure of Him that was to come" (Rom. v. 14). The teaching of I Cor. xv. concerning the first and the last Adam is fundamental. It involves the Headship of Christ, His resurrection and the deliverance of His people, His future domain when all things shall be put under His feet, all of which find their anticipatory type in the creation, position and expressed intention at the creation of Adam. Peter uses the Ark and its deliverance from the waters of the flood as a figure of salvation when writing to the dispersion, saying:

> "The like figure whereunto even baptism doth also now save us" (I Pet. iii. 21).

This passage literally rendered reads:

> "Which (i.e. water; the relative, being neuter, can only refer to the word 'water') being antitypical (Gk. antitupos)" ("Companion Bible").

The apostle, writing to the Hebrews concerning the tabernacle and its antitype heaven, says:

> "For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures (antitypes) of the true, but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us" (Heb. ix. 24).

In Heb. ix. 9 another word is translated "figure", namely, parabole, parable or continued simile:

> "But into the second went the high priest alone once every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself, and for the errors of the people: the Holy Ghost this signifying, that the way into the Holiest of all was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing: which was a figure (parabole) for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience; which stood only in meats and drinks and divers washings (baptismos), and carnal ordinances, imposed on them until the time of reformation" (Heb. ix. 7-10).

This passage is followed immediately by the balancing revelation concerning Christ. It is so important and so illustrative of the method we are here pursuing that we continue our quotation, in order that this "parable" with its truth in the balance may be seen:

> "But Christ being come an High Priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building (ktisis, creation); neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by His own blood He entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us. For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh: how much more shall the blood of Christ, Who through the eternal Spirit offered Himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God" (Heb. ix. 11-14).

Here we have on the balance, the holiest of all that belonged to this creation, and the Holiest of All, which being heaven itself, belonged to the spiritual realm. The earthly high priest needed to offer to himself, whereas the heavenly High Priest was "holy, undefiled, and separate from sinners", and needed not to offer for Himself as the earthly types did, neither did He need to offer "daily".

> "For this He did once, when He offered up Himself" (Heb. vii. 26, 27).

He needed not the blood of others (ix. 25), He offered "His own blood" (ix. 12). He was a high priest of good things to come of which the "law" was but a 'shadow" (x. 1). The typical offerings never touched the conscience; the one offering of Christ did. So the parallel advances, and so the Lord instructs us in this most precious truth.

If we are to spend as much time in examining every type, this series will grow beyond reasonable dimensions, although it is possible, we may have to return to this fruitful theme when dealing with the types alone. Here we are rather considering many and varied examples of truth in the balance of which the types are but one important instance.

Let us consider some of the outstanding types in the Scripture, being guided in our selection by the writers of the N.T. Firstly, let us tabulate a few typical men.

Adam, we have already seen was a "figure" of Him that was to come (Rom. v. 14) and the references to Adam in I Cor. xv. must be added.

Cain provides John with a type of the children of the devil, and the world's hatred (I John iii. 9-13).

Abel's offering provides a type of the blood of Christ, which speaketh better things than the blood of Abel (Heb. xii. 24).

Noah, the Ark, the flood, the number of those saved, the character of the times, and the angelic sin and fall associated with the days of Noah are referred to as typical (Matt. xxiv. 37; I Pet. iii. 20; II Pet. ii. 5).

Melchisedec, who appears in the record of Scripture, having neither pedigree nor term set to the length of his priesthood; without any record of his birth or death; yet remarkably great by the fact that Abraham made an offering to him of a tithe of the spoils and received in return his blessing; all these items are gathered up in Heb. v.-vii. to show by the type, the infinitely greater Priesthood of Christ.

Joseph. The life of Joseph is marvelously full as a type of Christ. Beloved by his father, sent to his brethren who hated him, sold by Judah (Judas in the N.T.) for silver, lost to sight for years, imprisoned for a crime he did not commit, between two other prisoners, one of whom was restored and one hanged, like the two malefactors, finally the instrument of deliverance to his brethren, who repented and acknowledged their sin, and especially indicated by Stephen in his speech as a type of the Lord Who, like Joseph, "the second time" will be acknowledged by His brethren.

From typical men, we may turn to typical observances, with which the religion of Israel was replete.

The Passover. "Christ our Passover sacrificed for us" (I Cor. v. 7).

The Leaven. "Purge out therefore the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump, even as ye are unleavened" (I Cor. v. 7).

The Firstfruits. "But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the firstfruits of them that slept" (I Cor. xv. 20).

Pentecost. "When the day of Pentecost was fully come" (Acts ii. 1).
"This is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel" (Acts ii. 16).

Tabernacles. "The last day, the great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying, if any man thirst, let him come unto Me" (John vii. 7).

The "End" of the age. The Sunteleia (used in Matt. xiii. 39, 40, 49; xxiv. 3; xxviii. 20 and Heb. ix. 26), the word used was the title given to the third feast of the year, "the feast of the ingathering, which is in the end of the year, when thou hast gathered in thy labours out of the field" (Exod. xxiii. 14-16).

The experiences of Israel in the wilderness, we have already seen were "examples", and we tabulate a few:

The Manna. "Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness and are dead . . . . . I am the living bread which came down from heaven" (John vi. 49-51).

The Rock. "They drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them, and that Rock was Christ" (I Cor. x. 4).

The Brazen Serpent. "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up" (John iii. 14).

Here we must stop. We have gathered enough to illustrate the importance of observing the testimony of the types of Scriptures as part of the wider principle which is implied by the title of this series, namely, "Truth in the Balance".

U.K.

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS,

Since we penned the Foreword to Volume XXXVII two years ago, much has transpired to encourage us in our testimony to the Truth rightly divided.

Prominent among these encouragements must be placed the reception that was given to our ministry throughout the visit to America during May and June of 1955. Not least among the causes for thanksgiving was the abundant evidence we received that our literature was treasured and studied by a goodly number of ministering brethren.

Then too we would preserve in these pages the note already printed in the Editor's page. We repeat the comment made on our U.S.A. ministry that our testimony is essentially CHRISTO-CENTRIC. For this we humbly give thanks and pray that it ever be so.

The issue of the booklet "The Dispensational Frontier" encouraged us to continue this mode of providing literature that could be used for circulation, and a number have since been added which we commend to all who love the Word.

Adverse criticism has prevented us from settling on our leas, and has only deepened our convictions; and under the good hand of God, the work is extending that is in the care of our Assistant Principal, Stuart Allen.

So once again we rejoice to sign ourselves

Yours for the Truth Rightly Divided,

CHARLES H. WELCH,
GEORGE T. FOSTER,
LEONARD A. CANNING.

CREATION OR CATASTROPHE (Gen. i. 2) 6

Less than the Least and its sequel "An Alphabetical Analysis".

It was with some trepidation that we acceded to the suggestion to write a brief account of the early history of the movement that has grown out of the witness of The Berean Expositor. In the series entitled "Less than the Least" which commenced in Volume XXXV, the personal element could not be avoided, simply because the stewardship of the truth involved had been so evidently entrusted to a single person. Without the loyal and self-sacrificing fellowship of a devoted few this witness, speaking humanly, must have succumbed to the arduous circumstances of its birth. The final responsibility, however, has always rested from the beginning upon one frail and very earthen vessel.

The true object of this series, however, was not so much the story of the earthen vessel as to set forth the treasure that by grace had been poured into it, and as the peculiar character of that teaching is known, for good or ill, as "Dispensational Truth" we are glad to announce the completion of a work entitled "An Alphabetical Analysis" of some 1,000 pages which is devoted to "terms and texts" that relate to Dispensational Truth.

The first volume of this new work is now ready and covers the letters A to E and subsequent volumes will be issued at convenient intervals.

At first we limited ourselves to dispensational features, and much regretted that while we could stress the need for "Right Division" we could not at the same time set forth the claims of the "Word of Truth" to its divine inspiration. In the same way, while we could enlarge on the dispensational place of the "ACTS", we had to pass without comment such a theme as "ATONEMENT". This, however, we are in process of rectifying and the volume with which the series will close will be devoted to outstanding doctrines, without which dispensational truth is without basis.

We commend this series to the reader and trust that it may prove to be indeed a blessed "Tool" for the "Unashamed Workman".

Creation or Catastrophe

We assume, in this series of brief notes, that the reader is acquainted with the arguments put forward to substantiate the translation of Eph. i. 4 "Before the overthrow of the world" and the arguments and evidences to prove that the condition "without form and void" (Gen. i. 2) is the "overthrow" referred to. In this series of one page notes a few subsidiary evidences will be brought to the reader's notice, but if the matter should be new and strange, a fairly exhaustive treatment will be found in Volume XXXVI, pages 61, 81, 101, 121 and 141 to which he is referred . . . . .

In the present study our attention is limited to the meaning of the Hebrew conjunction vav, generally translated "and". It is found in its primitive use in the first verse of Genesis where it joins the two parts of the universe together "The heaven and the earth". This same vav commences the second verse "And the earth was without form and void", and it is taught by some that its presence necessitates the repetition of the verb "created" from verse one, revealing that creation was actually brought about in this chaotic condition, reading "And (God created) the earth . . . . . without form and void". Our translators however were well aware that vav has to do justice to a variety of meanings; where the English uses or, then, put, notwithstanding, howbeit, so, thus, therefore and that, the Hebrew has the simple vav. For example: "But of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt eat of it" (Gen. ii. 17); "But unto Cain" (Gen. iv. 5); "But Noah" (Gen. vi. 8) are sufficient to show the reasonableness of this translation. This rendering is enforced by the Septuagint, where the conjunction kai "and" is replaced by the disjunctive de "but". Gen. i. 2 therefore can read:

> "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth, BUT the earth was without form and void, and darkness was on the face of the deep."

We do not, however, put this rendering forward as a translation of the whole verse, but only to indicate the meaning of the Hebrew Vav, which we have rendered "But".

In another note on this verse we shall consider the translation of the two words printed "was" and "was" in the A.V. but this must wait a convenient opportunity.

No.29. Three Prayers of Ephesians compared.
pp. 7 - 11

In The Berean Expositor, Volume XXXV, page 142 is a drawing showing a house of some pretensions, having a central tower, and two wings, each wing having seven rooms, and these two wings with their seven rooms balancing one another on plan. This is explained as being a pictorial exhibition of the structure of the epistle to the Ephesians, in which seven doctrinal sections occupy chapters i., ii. and part of iii., while seven corresponding sections dealing with practice occupy chapters iv., v., vi. Our guide has broken into his description of the contents of the Muniment room three times, saying "to the praise of His glory", he now conducts us to the next room in the building which we have called "The Chapel of Acknowledgment"* for here, he ceases to teach us and begins rather to pray for us.

> [* - The reader may be interested to know that the illustration used at the head of this article is a drawing made in the Chapel of the Opened Book, from the vestry looking across the reading desk to the Pulpit.]

"Wherefore I also." This little word "also" has occurred several times already.

"In Whom also", that is, over and above the fact that Christ is to head up all things in heaven and in earth, "we also" said the Apostle have a part. "In Whom ye also" were sealed and given an earnest. "Wherefore I also", I now come forward, says Paul, recognizing your position by grace, to pray for your enlightenment and appreciation of the grace so lavishly bestowed upon you. There are some matters that call for prayer, the only condition being man's abject need of Divine grace. There are some matters, however, that cannot form the basis of true prayer, apart from the fulfillment of certain conditions. We are facing one such instance here. It would be useless to pray for these Ephesians, that they "may know what is the hope of His calling", if they had received no instruction on the subject. Verses 3-14 which reveal the "calling" must come before verses 15-19 which lead on to its "hope". There comes a moment also when teaching must stop. Unless there is response and acknowledgment of what has already been revealed, to add instruction would be an evil. "Then shall ye know if ye follow on to know the Lord" is a sound principle at all times. These Ephesian saints appear to have fulfilled certain of these conditions for the Apostle told them that he gave thanks and prayed for them "After I heard of your faith in the Lord Jesus, and love unto all the saints" (Eph. i. 15).

EPHESIANS i. 15 - 19. PAUL'S PRAYER.

A | 15, 16. Faith according to you in the Lord Jesus. Kata.
B | That He may give. |
17. Spirit of wisdom and revelation.
17. Acknowledgment of Him.
18. Eyes of heart enlightened.
B | That ye may know. |
18. What is the hope.
18. What is the riches.
19. What is the greatness.
A | 19. To usward who believe. Kata.

This prayer leads on directly from the revelation given in the chapter (Eph. i. 3-14) and is particularly connected with the third portion, the Witness of the Spirit, where "faith" and "hope" appear, as well as the inheritance which is to be entered in the day of redemption. The whole of the previous section has been directed upward and outward. The believer's attention has been turned away from self and experience, to the elective and redemptive purposes of grace, with its heavenly places and its spiritual blessings. At the close of the doctrinal section of the epistle we shall find another prayer (Eph. iii. 14-21) and yet once more when the practical section is nearly closed, a third prayer of the Apostle is recorded. These prayers are interrelated, and are an integral part of the teaching of the epistle. The following comparison, though it be only in outline, will show the connecting points, yet reveals the different aspects of the truth to which the attention is directed. In the first prayer, the direction is up, to where Christ sits, and away from self. In the second, the attention is focused upon "Christ in us", "the inner man", "at home in the heart" rather than being seated at the right hand of God. In the first prayer "every name that is named" speaks of the supreme exaltation of the Saviour. In the second passage it is "every family . . . . . is named", where high exaltation gives place to the figure of home.

THE TWO PRAYERS
i. 15 - 19.	iii. 14 - 21.
THE PRAYERS ARE ADDRESSED TO
The God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory.	The Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.
THAT HE MAY GIVE
A spirit of wisdom and revelation.	Strength by the Spirit in the inner man.
THAT YE MAY KNOW
Hope, riches, power.	Love.

SOMETHING "EXCEEDING" (hyperballo).
Exceeding power.	Knowledge-exceeding love.
THE MEANS
We in Christ.	Christ in us—"The inner man".
THE POWER IS
The power wrought in (energeo) Christ.	The power that worketh in (energeo) us..
THE MIGHT (ischus) IS
The might exhibited at the resurrection.	The might necessary to comprehend with all saints.
THE GOAL IN EACH CASE
The fullness of Him that filleth all in all.	That ye might be filled up to all the fullness of God.
HEAVENLY POWERS MENTIONED
Every name that is named.	Every family in heaven and earth is named.

There is also an evident correspondence between the opening and closing prayer. In chapter one Paul prays for the believer, in chapter six, he asks the believer to pray for him. In the opening prayer the burden is "that ye may know", in the closing prayer "that I may make known". The prayers of Ephesians, therefore, stand related thus:

A | i. 15-19. Prayer for the ACKNOWLEDGMENT - - - EYES.
"That ye may know"

The student with time to spare for the delightful and fruitful task, can, with the start given by these few comparisons continue the process and will find many treasures of truth awaiting his prayerful investigation. It is evident from the fact that the Apostle ceases to teach new doctrine, and turns to prayer, that there is a warning and a lesson here. At the first, we are absolutely dependent upon the initial revelation that God makes, whether it be the gospel of our salvation, or the revelation of the Mystery, but there comes a moment when such teaching must be received, appropriated and acted upon. If this be not done, to continue teaching would treat us as though we were automatons into whom at stated intervals so much truth should be poured. But even a motor car does not receive continual fillings of petrol unless the petrol already received is used, how much more the mind of the believer endowed with faculties of reason, and under the monitorship of an enlightened conscience and the leading of the Spirit. It is on this basis that the prayer proceeds.

"Wherefore" dia touto "because of this" or "on this account". Without mechanically repeating the clauses of the teaching already given, we can see upon examination that the prayer of the Apostle has that teaching in mind.

The Charter.	The Prayer.
The Will of the Father.	What is the hope of His calling?
The Work of the Son.	What is the riches of . . . inheritance?
The Witness of the Spirit.	What is the . . . power . . . who believe?

Paul tells the Ephesians that he had heard of their "faith" and their "love" and consequently proceeds to pray concerning their "hope", these three often being brought together in his epistles.

The original wording of Eph. i. 15 is somewhat strange. Our version reads "After I heard of your faith in the Lord Jesus" which is straightforward enough. Weymouth inserts the words "which prevails among you". Darby adds "which is in you", Rotherham has "on your part". Each of these translators were endeavouring to express the intention of the Apostle who said:

Dia	touto	kago	akousas	ten	kath' humas pisten
Because	of this	I also	having heard	of the	according to your faith

"The according to your faith" is not English, and conveys no true meaning, yet the very fact that so strange a term should be introduced here is a challenge. In Acts xxvi. 3 we read "especially because I know thee to be expert in all customs and questions which are among the Jews", where the original reads ton kata Ioudaious. Again in Acts xviii. 15, "but if it be a question of words and names, and of your law, look ye to it". Here again the Greek reads kai nomou tou kath' humas "and of a law that is according to you". In these references we readily perceive that the Roman Gallio or in Paul's speech to King Agrippa, laws, customs and questions that are peculiarly Jewish are in mind. The preposition kata is translated "according to" 108 times, and is found in Ephesians, so translated, 14 times. Let us observe its occurrence in the charter of the Church (Eph. i. 3-14). These believers were predestinated to adoption "according to the riches of His grace". The revelation of the mystery of His will was "according to His good pleasure, which He hath purposed in Himself", and the taking of these believers for an inheritance was also "according to the purpose of Him Who worketh all things after the counsel of His own will". It is impossible to avoid the fact that the high calling of this church, its revelation at that time and all that pertained to it was "according to" plan. If the same word is used once more in verse fifteen, surely we are expected to continue this thought. Your faith, said the Apostle in effect, must not be confounded with the faith that is put forth by a believer in some other dispensation or calling. It may not be the "gift of faith" by which mountains are moved, it must be that aspect of faith that HARMONIZES ("accords") with your calling. It is however only too true, that there may be a clear comprehension of the distinctive character of our calling with very little corresponding "love unto all the saints" and where this is lacking, growth must cease. Happily the Ephesians manifested both the true faith and the consequent love, and on this basis the Apostle goes forward with his unceasing prayer for them. What he actually prayed we must consider in the next article. Meanwhile let us not forget the connexion established here, between the revelation of truth, and its manifestation in life.

No.30. The Chapel of Acknowledgment (i. 15 - 19).

An examination of the word translated "knowledge" (i. 17).

pp. 21 - 23

> "That the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him" (Eph. i. 17).

With these words, the great prayer opens. Before examining any of its parts or phrases, it is incumbent upon us to explain the reason why we have used the word "acknowledgment" in the heading of this article, where the A.V. uses "knowledge". The word under consideration is the translation of the Greek epignosis. This word undoubtedly is used for "knowledge" in several passages, but it is also rightly translated "acknowledgment" in others. This is true also of the verb epignosko. In some instances the A.V. translators have used one word in one occurrence and the other word in a parallel passage thus. In II Tim. ii. 25 we read of "repentance to the acknowledging of the truth", whereas in the next chapter we read "never able to come to the knowledge of the truth" (II Tim. iii. 7). Which is right? Why should the words be translated differently? The R.V. uses "knowledge" in both places.

Let us consider one or two passages where the word "knowledge" is used. Suppose we believe that epignosis means "full knowledge". We read in Matt. vii. 16: "Ye shall know them by their fruits." If we import "full knowledge" into this passage we rob it of its intention and we state an untruth. A peasant to whom the words biology and botany would be meaningless, would be able to "recognize" grapes, figs or thistles, not from any profound knowledge of the science, but by sheer "recognition". When the Saviour, speaking of John the Baptist, said "That Elias is come already, and they knew him not" (Matt. xvii. 12), it is evident that He meant that they did not recognize him. In Mark vi. 33, it is evident that the people "recognized" the Lord at a distance and ran to meet Him. So in some passages the A.V. uses the word "perceive" instead of "know" (Mark ii. 8; Luke i. 22 and v. 22). The word "recognize" aptly suits Luke xxiv. 16, "their eyes were holden that they should not recognize Him", so in Acts iii. 10, iv. 13, xii. 14, xix. 34, xxvii. 39, all these passages are better understood if the word "recognize" is substituted. Epignosko is translated "acknowledge" in the following passages in the A.V.: I Cor. xiv. 37 "Let him acknowledge"; xvi. 18 "therefore acknowledge"; II Cor. i. 13 "shall acknowledge (twice)"; i. 14 "ye have acknowledged". So with the noun epignosis, the A.V. reads "acknowledgment" or "acknowledging" in Col. ii. 2; II Tim. ii. 25; Titus i. 1 and Philemon 6.

Writing in Titus, the Apostle seems to have followed much the same path as is indicated in the first chapter of Ephesians. After introducing himself as a servant and an apostle he stops, and in parenthesis says according to (1) the faith of God's elect; this is comparable to the charter of the church; (2) the acknowledging of the truth which is after godliness. The sequel is the prayer and the acknowledgment which follows in Eph. i. 15-19. Here too, is "hope" and "promise" and a period "before the world began" and a period called "due time" for its making known, and a "committing" of the same to Paul. In Col. ii. 2 Paul writes, at the conclusion of another prayer, "that their hearts might be comforted, being knit together in love and unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding to the acknowledgment of the mystery of God—Christ (Revised text), in Whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (Col. ii. 2, 3). We believe that in Eph. iv. 13 and Col. i. 9, 10, the truth is better expressed by "acknowledgment" than knowledge. The verb epignosko occurs once in the epistle to the Colossians, namely, in the phrase "and knew the grace of God in truth" (i. 6) and the substantive, epignosis, occurs four times, as follows:

> "That ye might be filled with the knowledge of His will" (i. 9).
> "Increasing in the knowledge of God" (i. 10).
> "To the acknowledgment of the mystery of God" (ii. 2).
> "Which is renewed in knowledge after the image . . . . ." (iii. 10).

It will be observed that whether it be the verb or the noun, each reference is practical in its character, and has growth as its goal.

In Col. i. 6, we read of "fruit bearing" and "increase", although the A.V. here gives no translation of the second word, auxanomenon, an omission supplied by the R.V. which reads, "bearing fruit or increasing". Now this growth and evidence of life is associated with "recognizing the grace of God in truth". "The truth" may be conceived as the opposite of "the lie" (Rom. i. 25), or "the truth" may be conceived as the opposite of "type and shadow" (John i. 17). That which is "true" is often placed in contrast with the typical, as, for example, "the figures of the true" (Heb. ix. 24), or "the true bread" (John vi. 32). The Colossians did not merely "know the grace of God", they "recognized, or acknowledged, the grace of God in reality". This, as we saw in our last article, is essential to maturity, as it is here essential to growth and fruitfulness.

In the prayer that commences at Col. i. 9 the Apostle uses the word epignosis twice. Care must be exercised in translating these two passages, otherwise the precise meaning of the Spirit will be missed, and human ideas substituted. There is no preposition which stands for "with" in the first reference, but the case of the word permits the translation "filled with" or "filled as to". Ten epignosin is in the accusative case, "the accusative of equivalent notion" (Jelf). Ten epignosin is the "fullness" implied in the preceding verb "to fill". The reader will remember that "the fullness" comes in Eph. iv. 13 as part of the "measure" of the perfect man.

Paraphrasing the Apostle's words, therefore, in order to bring out this meaning we suggest the following:

> "For this cause, namely, that you have 'recognized' the grace of God 'in reality' and are manifesting this recognition by fruit-bearing and increase, we do not cease to pray for you, and to desire that you might be filled, and this fullness is none other than the 'recognition' of His will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding."

This prayer is very much along the lines of that found in Eph. i. 15-19 where the Apostle prayed that in the sphere of this acknowledgment or recognition, the spirit of wisdom and revelation would be granted. At the close of the prayer, the Apostle reverts to this "recognition", and once again we must carefully examine the original in order to perceive the truth. In the first instance we must note that there are several readings of the manuscripts of Col. i. 10.

The Received Text reads eis ten epignosin, "unto the knowledge". A few MSS read en te epignosei "in the knowledge", but the bulk of the best texts read simply te epignosei, the dative case, without either the prepositions eis or en. Some of these readings can be seen in the footnotes of various editions of the Greek New Testament. "The Companion Bible" notes a few, but textual criticism is a specialized study, consequently we translate Col. i. 10: "Being fruitful in every good work, and increasing by the recognition, or acknowledgment, of God."

It is "by" the acknowledgment of God, that we both "bear fruit" and "increase", and apart from that acknowledgment or recognition growth ceases, sight becomes dim, and the keenness that once characterized our pursuit of the high truth of the Mystery wanes.

We believe that the Apostle in Eph. i. 17 is not concerned with "knowledge", he, in effect, says "we must stop for a while. In the charter of the church there is enough knowledge to last a lifetime—what is needed is the grace and the willingness to acknowledge the wondrous truth". It is just here that so many fail. We have met those whose intelligence was bright enough for them to see very clearly that with the passing of Israel a new dispensation was called for. They saw only too well that there were exceeding different conditions in the Mystery from that which obtained during the Acts, they drew back, not because they did not see, but because they saw only too well, and realized that a price would be exacted by christendom if they dared to step out into the full light and liberty of the Mystery. So, failing to "acknowledge" what they had seen, they soon failed to recognize the truth, and are now quite content with the ordinances and their appropriations of Pentecost. The fear of man bringeth a snare, and "repentance unto the acknowledging of the truth" (II Tim. ii. 25) is the only means of deliverance.

The Father of Glory.

pp. 61 - 64

Having shown the reason for using the word "acknowledgment" in verse seventeen, we now consider the prayer of the Apostle in detail. The prayer is addressed to "the God of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Eph. i. 17). It will be observed that the second prayer is addressed to "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ". There are several occasions when the two titles are used together, as in II Cor. i. 3, which in the original is word for word with that of Eph. i. 3. At the resurrection it will be remembered, the Saviour said to Mary:

> "Go to My brethren and say unto them, I ascend unto My Father and your Father; and to My God and your God" (John xx. 17).

Immediately after this we read that He Who said "My God" was Himself acknowledged by Thomas with the same words! In the epistle to the Hebrews we have another extraordinary use of the term.

"Unto the Son He saith, Thy throne O God is for ever and ever", yet in the very next verse He Who is addressed as God is now said to have a God "Therefore God, even Thy God hath anointed Thee . . . . . above Thy fellows" (Heb. i. 8, 9). This same One has already been called "Lord" and the work of creation attributed to Him. Evidently the writers of Scripture saw no inconsistency in ascribing the title "God" to the Saviour, and yet of speaking of the Father, as "the God of our Lord Jesus Christ". When the Lord took upon Him the form of a servant and the fashion of a man, He stooped from the high status of Creator, to the lowly status of creature. As such He acknowledged One Who sent Him, One Whom He obeyed, One Whose doctrine He taught, One Whose will He delighted to do. He acknowledged that His Father was greater than Himself, even when He claimed that He and His Father were one. In the status of a true servant, and in the fashion of a man, He must either have refused to acknowledge God which is inconceivable, or He must have acknowledged God, which He most blessedly did. He never said "Our Father", that He left for His followers. He went out of His way to say "My Father and your Father", thus while one with them in the common humanity, He was for ever separated from them by His essential Deity. The most solemn and awful occasion when the Saviour used the words "My God" was on the cross, forsaken as the bearer of our sin. He said "My God" on the cross. He said "My God" on the resurrection morning, and the Apostle speaks of the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, when he speaks of His ascended glory. There is therefore a definite reason for the introduction of this title. God is God, whether man believes or does not believe. "Even from everlasting to everlasting, Thou art God" (Psa. xc. 2). Yet on occasion He says "I will not be your God" (Hos. i. 9). It is evident therefore that when we read "The God OF", as we do in Eph. i. 17, there is something more intended than that God is, and that Christ was in the form of a servant. Throughout the Scriptures we read "I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, the God of Jacob" by which we understand that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were in covenant relationship with God. He is called the God of Israel and the God of our fathers, but where does He ever say "I am the God of Moses"? "I am the God of Isaiah?" When we come to the epistles of the Mystery, the covenant with Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, is temporarily suspended, inheritance of the land postponed, the high honour of being a kingdom of priests, for the time being forfeited. The members of the One Body, being Gentiles, had no "fathers", no "covenants", no "promises", only one promise, and that made before the world began. Consequently when we read that Paul prayed to "the God of our Lord Jesus Christ" we lose its significance if we begin to argue about His Deity; to us, He is more than Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were to Israel, and when we give the title to the Father, "the God of our Lord Jesus Christ", we are claiming the same intimate relationship on higher ground and with richer blessing, than Israel claimed on their lower ground and with lesser blessings, when they called on the God of their Fathers. It is especially used when the Son of God is peculiarly associating Himself with His people. The strong doctrinal element of the first prayer is associated with the title "God", the mellow experimental nature of the second prayer is associated with the title "Father". In the former, we have high exaltation, all things under His feet and universal sovereignty, in the latter we have family and home. In the former it is "power" that is exceeding, in the latter it is "love". In the former it is revealed that this church will be "the fullness of Him that filleth all in all", a statement of fact, wonderful beyond our wildest dreams. In the latter we are urged so to comfort ourselves that we "might be filled up to (eis) all the fullness of God". It is "the God of our Lord Jesus Christ" in the first prayer, it is "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" in the second. In the first prayer we look up. In the second He comes down. The fact that both "God" and "Father" are employed in these prayers, shows that the Lord Jesus is still viewed in His mediatorial capacity. There in the highest glory He sits, "the MAN Christ Jesus", and as "the Son" He reigns until the goal is reached (I Cor. xv. 28). As "the Man" He sits on high as the Head of the Body the Church, as in Him, the Man, all fullness dwells, as the Man He will be manifested with His church in glory, as the Man all Principality and Power are beneath his feet, a glory faintly foreshadowed in Adam as revealed in the eighth Psalm. We may not fathom all the reasons why, after choosing the church IN CHRIST, before the foundation of the world, it was necessary that every member of this company should first come into existence "IN ADAM" but some glimmerings of the mighty purpose are here to be seen.

Following the title "The God of our Lord Jesus Christ" is another of like import, "The Father of glory". We must resist all efforts to turn this into a figure of speech that would make it mean "the glorious Father". There is more here than appears at first. A parallel is found in II Cor. i. 3 where we read "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort". When we read Eph. i. 17 for the first time "the God of our Lord Jesus Christ" it appears to put the Lord in a strange position, seeing that He, too, is most definitely given the same august title. But no such feeling is aroused when we read "The God of all comfort". Comfort is not worshipped, but is the possession or attribute of God, "Who comforteth us" as the Apostle goes on to say. So in Ephesians "the Father of glory" like "the Father of mercies" is the author and dispenser of both "mercies" and "glory". What that term "glory" implies here, must be gathered from the context. It is no more introduced suddenly and with no association with the theme of Eph. i. than are the parallel titles of II Cor. i. 3 introduced without reference to the "comfort" and "consolation" with which the chapter abounds. If we know what aspect of "glory" appears in the context of Eph. i. 17 we shall be able to appreciate the use of the title here in this prayer.

The threefold charter (Eph. i. 3-14) already examined is divided into its parts by the recurrence of the word "glory in a note of praise. Thus:

The Will of the Father	Unto the praise of the glory of His grace.
The Work of the Son	Unto the praise of His glory.
The Witness of the Spirit	Unto the praise of His glory.

Grace appears but once, and that at the close of the will of the Father, where the blessings of His will and choice are summed up as "accepted in the Beloved". Here, in this word "accepted", the word "grace" is buried from sight in the English translation, but appears when the two Greek words are placed side by side. Grace—charis, accept—charitoo. It is the glory of this grace that is first spoken of. Following the redemption and liberating of the heirs of God comes the next reference to glory, with the extraordinary feature which we have already noted, that the believer has been taken by God as HIS inheritance, and finally, in view of the completion of the whole purpose in the redemption of the purchase at the last, once more His glory is uppermost. Then in the prayer that follows, comes the petition "that ye may know . . . . . what the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints" (Eph. i. 18). It is in the capacity of "the Father of glory" (tes doxes) that God grants the spirit of wisdom and revelation. Neither wisdom nor revelation are sought after here for their own sakes, but as a means to an end, "that ye may know". These introductory steps must be distinguish from the actual goal. They are:

(1) The grant of wisdom and revelation.
(2) In the acknowledging of Him.
(3) Taking for granted that the eyes of your heart having been enlightened.

It will help us if we pause here, so that we may devote all space available in the next article to the examination of these three essential steps to the attainment of the three items of knowledge that constitute the mode of the Apostle's prayer. These three items are:

What is the HOPE of His calling.
What the riches of the GLORY of His inheritance in the saints.
What the exceeding greatness of His POWER to usward.

The Hope contemplates the goal before it is reached. The Power guarantees that the goal shall be reached. The glory reveals what the goal will be when it is reached.

Surely the very contemplation of these things should set our hearts aglow, and turn our worshipping faces to the throne of heavenly grace.

No.32. The Chapel of Acknowledgment (i. 15 - 19).

The Prayer for Perception.

pp. 81 - 83

Let us consider the three steps indicated by the Apostle in his prayer.

(1) The spirit of wisdom and revelation. Strictly speaking we should omit the article "the" and speak of "a spirit of wisdom and revelation"—a gift, not exactly the same as the supernatural gift of "knowledge" and "wisdom" (I Cor. xii. 8) which was enjoyed during the Pentecostal period, but "a gift" nevertheless. No amount of human learning, study or training, no amount of reading or erudition can attain to the goal before us. As in other days, so now, God reveals many things to the babe that are hidden from the wise and prudent, and a chastened spirit bows before the Lord and makes no demands, but quietly waits, and realizes that all that is asked for of the Father of "glory" will be granted by Him as the God of "grace".

When writing to the Colossians, the Apostle has recorded a similar prayer, saying:

> "Since we heard . . . . . For this cause we also, since the day we heard it do not cease to pray for you, and desire that ye might be filled with the knowledge of His will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding" (Col. i. 4-9).

The reader may remember that in article No.30 of this series we have examined Col. i. 9, 10 and suggested a slightly different meaning.

> "We do not cease to pray for you, and to desire that you might be filled, and this fullness is none other than the 'recognition' of His will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding."

What are we to understand by a "spirit of wisdom and revelation?? J. Armitage Robinson says: "It is a teaching spirit, rather than a teachable spirit, which the Apostle asks that they may have." Our thoughts travel to the book of the Revelation, where we read: "The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy" (Rev. xix. 10). This is not the testimony borne by our Lord, for the angel said: "I am thy fellowservant, and of thy brethren that have the testimony of Jesus"; it is this testimony that is the spirit of prophecy. So, the "acknowledgment" which is the essence of the Apostle's prayer for the Ephesians is the vehicle by which this spirit of wisdom and revelation is received. Wisdom, in the book of Daniel, is related particularly with the unveiling of Divine secrets (Dan. i. 4, 17, 20; ii. 20, 21, 23, 30; v. 11, 14). The term "the wise men" which occurs in Dan. xiv. fourteen times, is used with particular reference to the unveiling of mysteries. "Wisdom" in Ezekiel is confined to chapter twenty-eight. The only reference to "wisdom" in Romans is in chapter xi. 33, where the unsearchable ways of God are spoken of. So in Ephesians the three occurrences of "wisdom" (Eph. i. 8, 17 and iii. 10) are linked with the Mystery, even as the title "The only wise God"

(Rom. xvi. 27; I Tim. i. 17; Jude 25) is associated with the Mystery and the working out of the purpose of the ages. All the wisdom in the world, however, can never discover what God hides. Until He is pleased to remove the veil, wisdom may lead to a consciousness of the need of a revelation, but it cannot provide it. The two together however, "wisdom and revelation", are what the Apostle prayed for and what we all must receive. This spirit of wisdom and revelation, we have already discovered is related to "acknowledging" Him (see the previous article).

(2) We come therefore to the next preparation:

> "The eyes of your understanding being enlightened" (Eph. i. 18).

This is not another gift, it is rather a presupposed condition "having been enlightened". The Apostle uses the word photizo "to enlighten" three times in his earlier epistles, and three times in his later epistles. The three in the later Prison epistles are:

Eph. i. 18	"Eyes of understanding having been enlightened.
Eph. iii. 9	"To make all men see what is the dispensation.
II Tim. i. 10	"Hath brought life and immortality to light.

"Understanding", dianoia "a thinking through", is the faculty of reflection, and is found in Eph. ii. 3, iv. 18 and Col. i. 21. The Revised Text however reads kardia "heart". It is important to remember that that critical passage Isa. vi. 9, 10 that marks the failure of Israel both in Matt. xiii. 15 and Acts xxviii. 27 speaks of understanding with the heart, as though the blindness of Israel was the result of willfulness than poorness of intellect.

The relation of "the eyes" to understanding is a constant figure in the Scriptures. We read of the single eye and the evil eye, and Israel closed their eyes before they failed to understand with their heart. When Paul made known that he was about to enter his prison ministry, he gave a summary of its characteristics and among them he placed "to open their eyes" (Acts xxvi. 18). This threefold preparation, the spirit of wisdom and revelation, the acknowledging, and the illumination of the eyes of the heart, leads on to the knowledge which is the burden of this prayer. This knowledge also is threefold, thus:

That ye may know

1. What is the hope of His calling.
2. What the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints.
3. What the exceeding greatness of His power to usward who believe.

Notice too, the thrice repeated "His". In this prayer as we have already seen our thoughts are directed away and upward and outside of ourselves, and it is only when the glorious teaching of chapters ii. and iii. has been received, that the Apostle in his second prayer turns the believer's attention to "the inner man" to Christ dwelling "in your hearts by faith", to the saints being "filled". Strange spiritual aberration may follow the reversal of this divine order. To be taken up with the "inner man" apart from the power of the risen Christ is dangerous in the extreme.

Let us pause before we proceed to the question of "Hope", "Riches" and "Power" to acquaint ourselves with the meaning of this word "know", for there are two Greek words, which between them supply the thought of knowing in the N.T., namely ginosko and oida. The former when prefixed with epi provides us with the word "knowledge" in Eph. i. 17 or, as we have translated, "acknowledgment". Oida, the word we are considering, is associated with mental vision, and is so linked with this conception of sight, that Dr. Young, in the Index of his Analytical Concordance, gives two cross references. We look at oida, and we are referred to eidon, we consult eidon and we are referred to horao, we refer to horao, and we find it is translated "see" eighty-six times, and "behold, look, appear", etc., every rendering being referable to vision or sight. We should not, perhaps, be quite correct to translate Eph. i. 18 "that ye may see what is the hope", but we should, I think, be nearer the truth if we rendered the passage "that ye may perceive". Vision rather than knowledge is in the Apostle's mind. This too would harmonize with the enlightenment of the eyes of the heart, and even find an echo in the original meaning of revelation, namely "unveiling". We have already preferred to the relation of eyes and heart in the prophecy of Isaiah which speaks of Israel's terrible failure, and just as the willful closing of their eyes resulted in the hardness of their hearts, so judicial blindness came as an awful sequel "If thou hadst known, even thou at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes" (Luke xix. 42). The Apostle who knew only too well the relation of eyes, heart and rejection (Acts xxviii.) would pray the prayer for the Ephesian saints with an intensity of meaning and a reality of concern.

The three things he desired that they should thus "perceive" must form the subject of future studies. Let us examine ourselves afresh and see how we stand in relation to the great necessity of "acknowledging" Him, knowing full well that vision will fail and perception will be dim if that great clarifying attitude be not willingly and readily maintained. If the Proverb says:

> "In all thy ways acknowledge Him > and He shall direct (rightly divide LXX) thy paths."

the epistle in effect says:

> "In all thy ways acknowledge Him
> And He will give you vision and perception."

No.33. The Chapel of Acknowledgment (i. 15 - 19).

"What is the hope of His calling" (i. 18).

pp. 101 - 103

The first petition of the threefold prayer offered by the Apostle for these Ephesian believers is concerning "hope", but not hope in general, it is "the hope of His calling". Apart from a few occasions where the word hope is used in a secondary sense, such as the reference to ploughing in hope (I Cor. ix. 10), and "hope of gain" in Acts xvi. 19 the remaining fifty occurrences have to do with resurrection, the Second Coming, one's calling and related themes. Here the prayer is specific, "the hope of His calling". While the threefold petition of the prayer does not rigidly follow the threefold subdivision of the preceding section (The Charter of the Church, Eph. i. 3-14), The Will of the Father (Eph. i. 3-6) is most certainly closely connected with a "calling", even as the second petition, which speaks of an inheritance in the saints, picks up the theme of Eph. i. 1.

Paul had written at least seven epistles, before he wrote Ephesians, and the subject of "hope" is given a fairly comprehensive survey. There is a great passage in I Thess. iv., the equally great passages in I Cor. xv., Rom. xv. 12, 13 and Heb. xi. When all that is revealed in these portions is assembled, a fairly comprehensive picture of the hope of the church of that period is obtained. There we find such references as "the voice of the archangel"; "the last trump"; "the rise (of Christ) as the root of Jesse to reign over the Gentiles", and "the heavenly Jerusalem" to give colour and background to the hope thus entertained. These Ephesian had been evangelized by the apostle, and a church with elders flourished at the time when Paul had revealed to them that he was about to enter a new phase of ministry. He had spent, subsequent to Acts xx., two years in Caesarea and probably one year in Rome before this epistle to the Ephesians was written. Yet he prays that they may "perceive" "what is the hope of His calling". Had he said that he hoped they would "remember" what he had already told them, had he said to them as he had earlier to the Thessalonians "You yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night" it would be understandable, but here he appears to be approaching this question of "hope" as though it were something new.

Of course the reader appreciates the fact that this is exactly the state of the case. Something new had been revealed. A calling going back before the foundation of the world (Gen. i. 2), and up above the firmament of Gen. i. 6, to the heaven of Gen. i. 1. No calling had ever been associated by Prophet or Apostle in Old Testament or New with such remote spheres. Now "hope" is the anticipation of the fulfillment of the promises that make up any particular calling, and because hope and calling are so related, we find the two positive references to hope in Ephesians linked with calling:

> "What is the hope of HIS calling" (Eph. i. 18).
> "Called in one hope of YOUR calling" (Eph. iv. 4).

This, of course is the true order. Unless He has called us, we have no calling. There may be no intentional connexion, but the use of the interrogative tis in Eph. i.-iii. is suggestive:

What is the	HOPE?	What is	BREADTH?
What is the	RICHES?		LENGTH?
What is the	POWER?		DEPTH?
What is the	DISPENSATION?		HEIGHT? (Eph. i. 18, 19; iii. 9-18).

Most certainly is it true, that only as we comprehend these four great subjects, will we comprehend what is the breadth, length, depth and height of the mighty purpose of grace.

What is the hope of His calling? Hope looks forward in expectation, but it is intimately related with faith. Coming for a moment to another calling, namely the heavenly calling of Heb. iii. 1, we learn that all they who entertained this calling and its hope died, not having received the fulfillment of the promises; they died in "faith" (Heb. xi. 13), so, we read in verse one:

> "Now faith is the substance of things hoped for."

This must not be construed as a definition of faith as though Paul were writing a doctrinal treatise. He is speaking to those who had suffered the loss of their goods, and needed encouragement to persevere. Faith, he says is the "substance" of things hoped for. The Greek word translated "substance" is hupostasis, a word which has come into English in connexion with scientific, philosophic and theological statements. In medicine it means a sediment. In theology it means personality, especially when speaking of the three Persons in the Trinity, and in metaphysics, it refers to that which subsists, or underlies anything, as opposed to attributes or "accidents".

Take a crude illustration of the metaphysical usage. Let us imagine we have before us a brick. Its shape is philosophically an "accident"; it is not of the nature of essence, for a brick can be reduced to powder without altering its chemical composition or its weight. Its colour too is reflected light, and if the light be changed, its apparent colour too will change too. In this way we may remove one after another of the "attributes" of a brick until the mind begins to inquire "what IS then a brick?" and we are brought face to face with the fact that even in the world of such palpable stuff as "brick", a world with which we are acquainted, we are after all only acquainted with the superficial; the underlying reality of matter is still beyond our ken. It is for this reason that we find the word hupostasis in Heb. i. 3, where it is translated "Person". Here again is a word in common use. Yet here again we use a term that is highly significant. The word "person" comes from the Latin persona "to speak through" and means a mask, especially one worn by play actors. So Jeremy Taylor writes:

> "No man can long put on person and act a part but his evil manners will peep through the corners of his white robe."

In Heb. i. 1-3 Christ is said to be "the Express Image of His Person". Here we have two suggestive Greek words in apposition, character "express image", and hupostasis

"person". Charakter comes from a word which means "to engrave'. Wycliffe uses it in his translation of Rev. xiii. 16. The word character also means "a letter" and in natural science, the essential marks which distinguish a mineral, plant or animal, and so the ordinary use of the term to indicate personal qualities. God is Spirit. God is invisible, and Christ is "God manifest in the flesh". He is the "character" of God made evident. The invisible hupostasis, that which "stands under" the substance, being in Him made visible and expressed. Faith therefore is the underlying reality, the substance, of things hoped for. In a legal document, the "Petition of Dionysia", the word is used as a technical term for the "title-deeds" of a property which was the subject of litigation. We can therefore translate somewhat freely, Heb. xi. 1, "faith is the title deeds of things hoped for".

This brings us back to Eph. i. 18. "The hope of His calling" cannot be severed from the faith, from things believed. Things believed must refer to the revelation made in Eph. i. 3-14, which received the seal and the earnest of the Spirit; we are therefore contemplating something new. A new calling, a new sphere, calls for a corresponding hope, and instead of actually teaching what that hope will be, the Apostle rather prays, knowing that an understanding of its distinctive features will grow out of the believer's acknowledgment of the truth already believed. In some things we ourselves answer our own prayers. The hope of His calling therefore must be closely related to the quality of our blessings "all spiritual"; the sphere of our future inheritance "in the heavenly places", and the period of our election "before the foundation (or overthrow) of the world".

Our hope therefore will be far above "the earth" which in the millennium and in the New Earth will blossom as the rose and be "Paradise restored". Our hope will be realized "in heavenly places", anything lower than this highest of all spheres, would introduce a discrepancy between what we now entertain by faith, and what we should actually enter by hope, which cannot be. The fact that our election antedates Gen. i. 2 removes this calling from any covenants subsequently entered into either with Adam, Noah or Abraham. What is true regarding the hope, will be found to be true when considering the two remaining petitions of this prayer. These however are too important to be surveyed in the limited space now available, we accordingly propose to give them a consideration in the next article of this series.

No.34. The Chapel of Acknowledgment (i. 15 - 19).

Ton hagion or "Heaven itself".

pp. 121 - 125

The first petition, "what is the hope of His calling", looks back to the will of the Father (Eph. i. 3-6), the second, "what is the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints", looks back to the results of redemption, as set forth under the heading "the work of the Son" (Eph. i. 7-12), where the inheritance is first mentioned. When we were examining Eph. i. 11 we discovered that the true teaching of this passage was not so much that WE had OBTAINED an inheritance, as that WE had been TAKEN to be an inheritance. This translation is discussed in No.24 of this series. The possibilities that such a calling opens up are overwhelming. To obtain an inheritance in the high glory of heavenly places, where Christ sits far above all principality and power, staggers the imagination, but "what is the riches of the glory of HIS INHERITANCE in the saints" is left unexplained. The Apostle transfers the question to the section dealing with prayer. We cannot appreciate it while remaining in the "Muniment Room", we can only learn something of its wonder in "The Chapel of Acknowledgment".

The answer to the question "what the riches" is not found written on the page of Scripture, but is rather written on the tables of the heart. The eyes of the "heart" must be enlightened, the renewed mind must readily "acknowledge" if this truth is to be received. While "inheritance" is the theme in general, it is the "riches of the glory" of the inheritance that is the particular burden of the prayer. The following are all the references to "riches" in the Prison Epistles.

Plousios "God Who is rich in mercy" (Eph. ii. 4).
Plousios (adverb) "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly" (Col. iii. 16).
Ploutos "Forgiveness . . . . . according to the riches of His grace" (Eph. i. 17).
"What (is) the riches of the glory of His inheritance" (Eph. i. 18).
"The exceeding riches of His grace" (Eph. ii. 7).
"The unsearchable riches of Christ" (Eph. iii. 8).
"According to the riches of His glory" (Eph. iii. 16).
"According to His riches in glory" (Phil. iv. 19).
"What is the riches of the glory" (Col. i. 27).
"Unto all riches of the full assurance" (Col. ii. 2).

It will be seen that we have riches of mercy and of grace issuing in salvation, and riches of glory, related to our inheritance, to the spiritual anticipation of some of its glories even now (Eph. iii. 16), the supply of all needs, and the special character of the Mystery (Phil. iv. 19; Col. i. 27).

Three passages out of this series stand out as a unit. The prayer of Eph. i. 18, the prayer of Eph. iii. 16, and the making known of the peculiar character of the Mystery (Col. i. 27). These we will set out more fully.

"What is the RICHES OF THE GLORY of His inheritance in the saints."

> "That He would grant you according to the RICHES OF HIS GLORY to be strengthened with might by His Spirit in the inner man, that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith."
>
> "The Mystery . . . . . now made manifest to His saints, to whom God would make known what is the RICHES OF THE GLORY of this Mystery among the Gentiles, which is Christ in you the hope of glory."

If we take these passages in the reverse order, we shall have the following logical progress:

(1) Col. i. 26, 27. The riches of the glory of this Mystery is explained, as "Christ in you the hope of glory".
(2) Eph. i. 18. The appreciation of this high glory as the outcome of spiritual enlightenment.
(3) Eph. iii. 16, 17. The indwelling of Christ in the heart, the experimental echo of Col. i. 26, 27.

The words of Col. i. 27 "Christ in you the hope of glory" need careful treatment. Does the Apostle mean by this, the indwelling that is the theme of Eph. iii. 16? Some say yes, come say no. Moffatt renders Col. i. 27, 28 "in the fact of Christ's presence among you as your hope of glory. This is the Christ we proclaim". The Companion Bible draws attention that "in" is the same word as "among" in this verse. The grammatical rule is, that where en "in" is used with a plural, the meaning is generally expressed by "among" not "in". We could pour the contents of a gallon jar into another gallon jar, and say that the liquid was "in" the other jar, but if we poured the contents of a gallon into four separate quart pots, we could not so truthfully use the word "in" for the gallon would be distributed "among" the four rather than "in" them". So Matt. ii. 6 "among the princes of Juda" not "in". "His sepulcher is with or among us unto this day" (Acts ii. 29) not "in". So in I Pet. v. 1, 2 "the elders among you . . . . . the flock among you". So therefore we must read "This Mystery among the Gentiles, which is Christ among you" in Col. i. 27. What does the Apostle mean by "Christ among you"? Before the revelation of the Mystery the ministry of Christ was limited, first to the lost sheep of the house of Israel (Matt. x. 6), and then to those Gentiles who were joined to Israel under the New Covenant as branches in the olive tree. Gentiles as such were alien, without God, without Christ, and consequently without hope. When Israel were set aside, as they were in Acts xxviii., the salvation of God was sent to the Gentiles, and in the preaching of Christ by the one appointed Apostle of the Gentiles Christ is said to have come "and preached peace" to those who were far off as well as to those who were nigh (Eph. ii. 17).

The preaching of Christ "among the Gentiles" therefore was a sufficient pledge of their "hope of glory", for it indicated a change of dispensation, and a change in their favour. Col. i. 26, 27 links the two petitions of the Ephesian prayer together: "what is the hope . . . . . what the riches of the glory." "What is the riches of the glory of this Mystery among the Gentiles, which is Christ among you the hope of glory." Something of the peculiar nature of these riches of glory is expressed in the phrase "of His inheritance in the saints". It is not their inheritance, but His, and we have already seen this is the revelation made in verse eleven. His inheritance is "in the saints". This is blessedly true as Eph. i. 11 reveals, but there is more in this expression than meets the eye. In No.5 of this series, the distribution and general usage of the words "saints" is considered, and it was there promised that a more extended examination of the clause "in the saints" would be given when we reached Eph. i. 18.

Ton hagion, in the Greek, may be either masculine, feminine or neuter, and it must be kept in mind that while the English language would not permit us to speak of a "place" as a "saint", the Greek does. Consequently we read in Heb. ix. 23, 24 of the "Holy Places" which by a figure known as "the plural of majesty" mean "The Most Holy Place", even as the better sacrifices can only mean the "infinitely better sacrifice". The following passages in Hebrews employ the word hagion "saint" in the neuter, and in the plural:

Hagion.

Heb.	viii. 2	A minister of the sanctuary.
	ix. 1	Divine service and a worldly sanctuary.
	ix. 2	Which is called the sanctuary.
	ix. 3	Which is called the Holiest of all.
	ix. 8	The way into the Holiest of all.
	ix. 12	Entered in once into the holy place.
	ix. 24	Into the holy places made with hands.
	ix. 25	Into the holy place every year.
	x. 19	To enter into the holiest by the blood.
	xiii. 11	Brought into the sanctuary.

The antitype of these Holy Places is "heaven itself", the true sanctuary pitched by God and not man. It is where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God, and it is there the inheritance of the church of the Mystery will be enjoyed. In Eph. ii. 19 we read "now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow citizens with the saints" which presents no grammatical problem until we realize that ton hagion should be rendered "of the saints", and then the question arises "how can we ever become fellow citizens OF the saints". We can hardly be fellow citizens of one another. If we allow the lead set us in Hebrews, we shall translate this passage "fellow-citizens of heaven's holiest of all", and begin to realize "what is the riches of the glory of this inheritance" indeed. So, when we come to Eph. iv. 12, we shall have to revise the translation "the perfecting of the saints". Again, Col. i. 12 which uses this word hagion, should be rendered "partakers of the inheritance of the Most Holy Place in the Light". The reader who may not posses copies of Things to Come, may appreciate the following comment written by Dr. Bullinger in April 1910.

> "Now if we take Mr. Welch's interpretation that it means, or at any rate refers to 'The MOST HOLY PLACE' or ' the Holiest of all' into which Christ has entered (Heb. 9:24), then we can understand and grasp more clearly what is meant by the somewhat special usage of the word in Ephesians."

Dr. Bullinger then proceeded to translate the passages in Ephesians where the words "in heavenly places" occur, as follows: Eph. i. 3 "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings, in the holiest of all, in Christ" and so on through the remaining passages. "Believers cannot have 'saints' for their inheritance, but they can have, and thank God they do have what answers to the Holy of holies—even Heaven itself. There, 'in THE Light', in the presence of what answers to the Shechina of the tabernacle and temple, even the light of the glory of God they find their inheritance."

As the believer "acknowledges" this most wondrous aspect of the high calling of the Mystery, the second petition of the Apostle's prayer in Eph. i. 18 will be answered: "Hope", "Riches", "Power". These three items are the basis of the threefold prayer of Eph. i. 15-19. We now give attention to the third petition found in verse nineteen.

> "And what the exceeding greatness of His power to usward who believe."

If the preceding petitions are associated with the two subdivisions of Eph. i. 13, 14 "The Will of the Father" and "The Work of the Son" this third petition is definitely linked with the third division "The Witness of the Spirit", for it is in this section alone that we find any reference to "believing". Note too that it is HIS calling, HIS inheritance and HIS power, with which we are concerned, and only as we know these shall we be ready and able to understand what is OUR calling, OUR inheritance, and OUR power; they will then be held in their right relationship.

The word "exceeding" is the first of three occurrences of the Greek word so translated, namely huperballo "to throw beyond", and a figure of speech called hyperbole is so named because it often over-shoots or exaggerates to heighten the sense, as the spies heightened their report, saying that cities of the giants were "walled up to heaven" (Deut. ix. 1). When Paul compared the Old and the New Covenant, he used the word huperballo when he spoke of the "glory that excelleth" (II Cor. iii. 10). The three occurrences in Ephesians are:

> The exceeding greatness of His power (i. 19).
> The exceeding riches of His grace (ii. 7).
> The love of Christ which passeth knowledge (iii. 19).

We are called upon in Eph. i. 19 to consider the surpassing "greatness" of His power. Greatness is the Greek megethos from megas "great". This word enters into the make up of the word translated "majesty" (Heb. i. 3); it is used in Eph. v. 32, I Tim. iii. 16 and Rev. xvii. 5 of a "great" mystery. It is to be noted that the first occurrence of megethos "greatness" is in the triumphant song of Moses, at the overthrow of Pharaoh and the safe transit of Israel across the Red Sea (Exod. xv. 16). Here in Ephesians, it refers to a greater overthrow of a greater enemy, followed by a greater translation (Col. i. 13). This exceeding great power is "to usward who believe". The "believing" is not the consequence of this mighty power, rather it is the essential condition for its reception. The occurrences of dunamis "power" in Ephesians are interlinked and this relationship can be most readily seen if we print the occurrences in structure form.

A | i. 19. The exceeding great of His power.
Note it is “exceeding”; it “worketh in us” and is “to usward”.
It leads on to “the fullness of Him that filleth all in all”.
B | i. 21. Far above all principality and power and might.
A | iii. 7. The effectual working of His power.
Note “less than the least” and it “worked” in Paul.
It leads on to “all the fullness of God”.
B | iii. 16. Strengthened with might by His Spirit.
A | iii. 20. The power that worketh in us.
Note “exceeding” abundance of the answer.
It “worketh in us” and flows from the references to “fullness”.

The witness of the Spirit, the ministry of Paul, the answer to prayer, all alike are the outcome of the exceeding greatness of His power to usward that believe. The word “believe” occurs in Ephesians only in the two corresponding passages, Eph. i. 13 where “after ye believed” comes “the seal” and “the earnest” of the Spirit, and Eph. i. 19, the passage before us. Faith however occurs eight times as follows: Ephesians i. 15; ii. 8; iii. 12, 17; iv. 5, 13; vi. 16, 23.

The remainder of verse nineteen “according to the working of His mighty power” belongs to the next section of the epistle, and must be considered in relation to the whole division: Eph. i. 19 - ii. 7. This we must consider in our next article.

No.35. The Throne Room (i. 19 - ii. 7).

"Mighty power inwrought" (i. 19).

pp. 141 - 144

We have now followed our guide through the Muniment Room (articles Nos.6-28) and the Chapel of Acknowledgment (articles Nos.29-34). We now enter "The Throne Room" where the high exaltation of the Saviour, together with the exaltation of the members of His Body, is to occupy our wondering attention. Our first concern is the inspired disposition of the subject matter which is revealed by the structure, this being the exhibition of the essential features of the passage which are thrown into prominence by the correspondence of part with part.

Eph. i. 19 - ii. 7.

A | a | 19. Energy (energeia, energeo) Mighty power.
b | 20. Wrought in Christ.
B | 20. Raised HIM - - - Heavenly places.
20. Seated HIM - - - Age to come.
22, 23. Gave HIM.
C | 23. The Church. Body and Fullness.
A | a | ii. 1, 2. Energy (energeo). Prince of power.
b | ii. 3. Wrought in sons of disobedience.
B | ii. 4, 5. Quickened US.
ii. 6. Raised US - - - Heavenly places.
ii. 6, 7. Seated US - - - Ages to come.

Before we take note of the terms "working", "power" and the like, let us not fail to observe one essential feature. We read a threefold "HIM" before we read a threefold "US". This order can never be reversed when we are dealing with grace. Of what value would it be to be told that I was destined to sit at the right hand of God in heavenly places, unless I am already assured that Christ is there, and there on my behalf? Consequently we observe in the next place that when we read the threefold "US" we read at the same time a threefold "together", not one of these blessings can be enjoyed apart from this union with the ascended Christ. Possibly it is already beginning to dawn upon us "what is the exceeding greatness of His power to usward" if such a destiny and such a fellowship are indeed ours. The first thing to consider is that this exceedingly great power is "according to" something. It is the outworking of a purpose.

Kata, the Greek preposition translated "according to", when it governs the genitive case retains its primary meaning "down", but when it governs the accusative case, as it does in the passage under review, it often has the meaning of conformity and is translated "according to". It would be outside the range of these studies to attempt a lengthy disquisition on the origin, development and character of prepositions, but the reader may be helped if he remembers that prepositions are associated with movement or rest, each one having its own direction, ek moving "out", eis moving "into" and the like. Kata in its two modes represents either a movement that is vertical, "down" when used with the genitive, and horizontal "along" when used with the accusative. Whatever is the subject under consideration if it be in the accusative, kata is conceived as going "along" with it, hence the term "according to". Kata occurs twenty-four times in Ephesians, always with the accusative. The following are the occurrences in the first chapter of Ephesians, and this horizontal movement "going along with" should be supplied mentally as each passage is considered.

verse	5	According to His good pleasure.
	7	According to the riches of His grace.
	9	According to His good pleasure.
	11	According to the purpose of Him.
	11	Who worketh all things after (or according to) the counsel.
	15	After I heard of your faith (the faith according to you).
	19	According to the working of His mighty power.

It will be seen that where it is used of God, kata is associated with pleasure, purpose and power, or the riches of His grace, and in two passages it is further allied with "work". In the first case God is represented as One Who worketh all things according to the counsel of His own will, in the other the great power to usward who believe is said to be according to the working of His mighty power. We can therefore only hope to receive an answer to the prayer "what is . . . . . the power to usward . . . . ." when we know with what it is in "accord". There is in this passage a multiplying of terms that denote power. Dunamis, power, miracle, dynamic; energeia, energy, inworking; kratos, strength, in the sense of ability to hold fast, and ischus, strength in its prevailing power. All these terms are focused upon one tremendous event, the resurrection of Christ. When the Scripture speaks of the great act of Creation, both power and wisdom are ascribed to God, but no such combination of these terms for strength is used as is used of the resurrection. In creation "He spake", it was "done". When He commanded it stood fast, but resurrection is in another realm. Sin, redemption, righteousness, moral evil and spiritual antagonism call for power beyond that demanded by creation. This power is defined as that which He "wrought in Christ when He raised Him from the dead, and set Him at His own right hand in the heavenly places far above all . . . . ." (Eph. i. 20, 21). It will be seen that even "resurrection" does not complete the statement. It is resurrection, ascension, seating, pre-eminence and fullness (Eph. i. 19-23) that necessitates such a display of mighty power. When it is realized that what has been written in these verses is to reveal the kind of power "that is to usward who believe", the mind falters in its attempt to comprehend either the wonder of the gift or the marvel of the power that is at our disposal. Paul himself realized something of this mighty enabling. Speaking of the ministry which he had received as the prisoner of Jesus Christ for us Gentiles, he said:

> "Whereof I was made a minister, according to the gift of the grace of God given unto me by the effectual WORKING of HIS POWER" (Eph. iii. 7).

Here, as in Eph. i. 19, 20, we have energeia and dunamis, and not only so, there is a reference to "principalities and powers in heavenly places", not this time subjected beneath the feet of the Saviour, but learning through the Church the manifold wisdom of God. This energizing power is again introduced at the close of the central prayer, Eph. iii. 20. This prayer asks that the believer may be "strengthened with might by His spirit in the inner man" this time combining the words dunamis and krataioo which form a part of the combination of power revealed in Eph. i. 19, 20. Then, having included in his request such a glorious possibility as that of Christ dwelling in the heart by faith, the comprehension with all saints of what is the breadth, length, depth and height, the "knowledge surpassing love of Christ" (using the word hyperballo as in Eph. i. 19), and having nothing less as a goal than being "filled with (eis unto, or up to) all the fullness of God", introducing the word pleroma, as in Eph. i. 23 the Apostle comes to the question of what possible guarantee can there be for an affirmative answer to so mighty a petition. That guarantee, once again is "the power that worketh in us" (Eph. iii. 20).

The word "power" is veiled from the English reader, who may not realize that the verb dunamai is translated "able" not only in Eph. iii. 20, but in iii. 4 "may" and vi. 11, 13 and 16 "able". When the Apostle wrote the parallel epistle to the Colossians, he employed the words "strengthened with all might according to His glorious power" (Col. i. 11). Here the words are dunamis, dunamoo and kratos, and when referring to his own ministry he again attributes any success he may have achieved to "His working, which worketh in me mightily", using the words energeia, energeo and dunamis (verse 29). In Philippians there is but one occurrence of dunamis, namely in Phil. iii. 10 "the power of His resurrection" which the Apostle was most eager to know, and one occurrence of dunamai, in connexion with the same theme, "the out-resurrection", where in view of the transfiguration of this body of humiliation to a body of glory like unto that of the risen Lord Himself, he once again falls back upon the same mighty power "according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto Himself" (Phil. iii. 21). Here there is not only the recurrence of the words energeia and dunamai, but a further reference to the exaltation of the Lord, with all things in subjection beneath His feet, that we have found already at the close of the first chapter of Ephesians.

Finally this same mighty power was the basis of the Apostle's confidence, even in view of desertion and death. "I am persuaded", he said, "that He is able to keep that which has been entrusted, against that day" (II Tim. i. 12). Had we confined our reading to the closing verses of Eph. i., we should have been impressed with the tremendous power at our disposal who believe, but as we contemplate its application both to the Apostle and to the believer in view of ultimate glory, we must surely exclaim "what manner of persons ought we to be", upheld and energized by such a wealth of power!

Before proceeding to the examination of the closing verses of Eph. i. we are reminded by a glance at the structure that there is another reference to inworking power in Eph. ii. 2; we therefore include this passage, in order that the intended contrast shall be appreciated. We will not attempt to deal with Eph. ii. 1; this will come better in its place in the exposition, but go straight to the terms "the Prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience". Here, by antithesis, this mighty power, this "Ruler of the authority of the air" is set over against the exalted Lord, his sphere of activity being "the course or age of this world" and "now". He too employs a mighty energy "the spirit that now worketh in (energeo) the sons of disobedience". It may be well to tabulate the seven references to energeo found in the Prison Epistles.

Energeo.

Him Who worketh all things. (Eph. i. 11).
Which He wrought in Christ. (Eph. i. 20).
The spirit that now worketh in the sons of disobedience. (Eph. ii. 2).
The power that worketh in us. (Eph. iii. 20).
God which worketh in you both to will and to do (work) of His good pleasure. (Phil. ii. 13).
Which worketh in me mightily. (Col. i. 29).

Lest we should imagine that the fact that there is a mighty spirit power energizing the unbeliever suggests that the unbeliever is at the mercy of a power and not responsible for his actions, we are reminded that those in whom he works are "children of disobedience" and that they are fulfilling the desires of the flesh and the mind. So, in like manner, while we may at first be overwhelmed with the display of power that is to usward, we must remember, also that it is to usward who believe. Intelligent and responsible co-operation is by no means ruled out, but rather encouraged. When the Philippians were assured that it was God Who worked IN them, they had already been exhorted to work OUT their own salvation.

We can now return to the original passage that was before us, and attempt to understand what is involved in the exaltation of the Lord set forth in verses 20-23.

No.36. The Throne Room (i. 19 - ii. 7).

"Far above all" (i. 21).

pp. 181 - 186

In the sequel to the Apostle's reference to the mighty power that is "to usward who believe", our attention is directed to four great movements, all in connexion with the Saviour, as follows:

"He raised Him from the dead."
"He set Him at His own right hand."
"He put all things under His feet."
"He gave Him to be Head over all things to the church."

In verse seven we have the record of redemption "through His blood", after which nothing is said of the death of Christ until the passage before us which speaks of His resurrection from the dead. Every section of the purpose of the ages depends for its fulfillment on the exaltation of the Saviour. At first, remembering the opening chapters of Matthew and of Luke, we might have imagined that it was the Divine intention that the Lord, born at Bethlehem and declared to be the son of David and heir to his throne, should at that time in those circumstances ascend the throne and introduce the reign of peace. That this was not the Divine programme both the events themselves and also the Scriptures make clear. Psa. ii., which speaks of the earthly rule and the earthly inheritance of the Son of God, nevertheless refers to Him as raised from the dead; otherwise what do the words of verse seven mean:

> "Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee"?

They cannot refer to the miraculous begetting that preceded the birth at Bethlehem for the words "this day" could not be thus spoken. They refer, as the N.T. declares, to the Resurrection.

> "He hath raised up Jesus again; as it is also written in the second Psalm, Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee" (Acts xiii. 33).

To the same effect, Peter refers to other prophetic statements of David saying:

> "Therefore being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, He would raise up Christ to sit on his throne; He seeing this before spake of the resurrection of Christ" (Acts ii. 30).
> "The God of our fathers raised up Jesus . . . . . Him hath God exalted . . . . ., to be a Prince and a Saviour" (Acts v. 30, 31).

If we turn to the book of the Revelation, the title that stands out in the opening of the book is "the Prince of the kings of the earth", and the whole apocalyptic imagery, involving heaven as well as earth is made to bear upon the moment when the seventh angel sounds, and:

> "The kingdoms OF THIS WORLD" become "the kingdoms of our Lord, and of His Christ" (Rev. xi. 5).

What is true in the earthly sphere, is true of the heavenly calling of which the epistle to the Hebrews is an exposition (Heb. iii. 1). When the Apostle at the opening of chapter eight would sum up his teaching, he said:

> "Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: We have such an high priest, Who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens" (Heb. viii. 1).

Without the risen, ascended, seated Christ, Abraham and his seed would look for the heavenly city in vain. So, when we come to the third and highest sphere of blessing, that of the Mystery, we still find that the risen, exalted, seated Christ is the one and all comprehensive guarantee for the access and acceptance into that most wonderful of all spheres of blessing for the believer. We have touched lightly upon Psa. ii., Acts xiii. Rev. xi. and Heb. viii., but we must look more carefully at the statements of Eph. i. 20-23, for they are vital to the high calling of the church of the One Body of which we are members. Christ is said to have been set at the right hand of God "in the heavenly places" (Eph. i. 20). This phrase has been considered with some degree of fulness in Article No.8 of this series. It was there shown to be unique, being found only in this epistle and in association with the Mystery. The Apostle proceeds at once to explain this term, revealing by his language something of the scope that is envisaged in this sphere "heavenly places". He says it is "far above all principality and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come" (Eph. i. 21).

Before we proceed to the worshipping consideration of the Saviour's high glory here revealed, let us pause at the statement "set Him at His own right hand", for we are going to read presently of believers who are "seated together" in these self same heavenly places (Eph. ii. 6). The act of "sitting" means ever so much more than resting; it means the assumption of authority. Thus Matthew was "sitting" at the receipt of custom (Matt. ix. 9). In the same way when Christ answered the high priest He said "Ye shall see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power" (Matt. xxvi. 64) which was immediately denounced as blasphemy. Pilate sat down on the judgment seat (Matt. xxvii. 19) in the exercise of authority. The passage that is often quoted in the N.T. to this effect is Psa. cx., "Sit Thou at My right hand, until I make Thine enemies Thy footstool", and in the Revelation we are not only directed to consider the throne, but He that sat thereon (Rev. iv. 2, 3). The number of references in the Apocalypse to this seating is too great to transcribe here, but they should be considered. The seated Priest, is the glory of the epistle to the Hebrews (Heb. i. 3; viii. 1; x. 12 and xii. 2) even as the seated Lord is the glory of the epistles to the Ephesians. The fact that He is seated THERE indicates a finished work, the displacement of the Accuser, and His investment with all authority. Without the Ascension and Session of our Lord, the revelation of the Mystery would be a mockery. Because He sits there, the members of His Body can look forward to the blessings of this calling with confidence and joy.

"Far above all." These words are the translation of the Greek huperano, a compound made up of huper above, and ano up. It will be seen that either word means up or above, consequently the compound must be expressed with some intensity, and the English "far above all" is as good a rendering as any. Huper can sometimes only be fully expressed in this way. In Eph. iii. 20 the presence of huper is indicated by the word "exceeding" as well as the word "above". So, also in II Thess. i. 3 "groweth exceedingly" and Eph. i. 19 "exceeding greatness" or in Gal. i. 13 "beyond measure". In Eph. iv. 10 we learn that Christ ascended up far above all heavens, even so we are all only too conscious of the poverty of language to indicate the high exaltation of the Son of God. Isaiah seems to have expressed this when he used not one, not two, but three words to indicate the high glory of the ascended Saviour "He shall be EXALTED and EXTOLLED and be VERY HIGH" (Isa. lii. 13).

Had the Apostle Paul simply stated that Christ now sits at the right hand of God in the heavenly places, we should know that He was occupying the highest conceivable pinnacle of glory in the wide universe, but this is enlarged and emphasized when we consider the realms that are placed beneath His feet. He is far above all "principality and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come" (Eph. i. 21). Let us take this opportunity of acquainting ourselves with these heavenly powers, among whom our future lot is cast. Principality is the Greek arche. The primary meaning of this word is beginning, in order of time, and then of dignity, the first place, government. We will not occupy space by recording the passages which speak of time; there are a number of which Luke i. 2 is a sample. Coupled with arche in Eph. i. 21 and elsewhere, is the word translated power, exousia which is bettered rendered "authority" and which we shall more fully consider presently. They occur together in Luke xx. 20, where we read of "the power (arche) and authority (exousia) of the governor". In like manner, Luke xii. 11 translates arche by "magistrate". Turning our attention now to those heavenly and spiritual spheres with which Eph. i. 21 is concerned, we read in Jude 6 that angels kept not their "first estate" (arche), "abandoned their own domain" (Moffatt); in the book of the Revelation arche is never used except as a title of Christ.

> "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty" (Rev. i. 8).

Here it will be observed the title "beginning and ending" is placed in correspondence with the great name Jehovah, the name of God in covenant, redemption and purpose, thereby revealing how it is that a word which primarily indicates time, can be a title of the Lord, for He gathers all time to Himself, "Jesus Christ, the same, yesterday and today, and for ever". In the second occurrence, the Lord is called "The beginning of the creation of God", a title that cannot be ignored when reading Gen. i. 1. This takes us to our epistles and in Col. i. 18 we read of Christ "He is the Head of the body the church: Who is the beginning, the firstborn from the dead; that in all things He might have the pre-eminence."

From the way in which these principalities and powers are introduced in the N.T. it appears that most of them are evil powers, but whether we can say as Dr. Bulllinger does in his Lexicon, remains to be seen. The first reference is that of Rom. viii. 38, which arises out of the fact that there can be no condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus. "Who is even at the right hand of God, Who also maketh intercession for us." These principalities and powers are classed with angels, and are included among those invisible powers like death itself, which shall not be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. From this it would appear that these principalities and powers may be inimical to the believer. In I Cor. xv. 24, we are taken to "the end" or to the goal of the ages, when "all rule and all authority and power" shall be "put down" (a term yet to be examined), and to continue the quotation from Dr. Bullinger's Lexicon commenced above:

> "Used of supra-mundane powers, probably evil powers."

> "In I Cor. 15:26 we read of eschatos echthros, the last enemy, which may imply that these names (Col. 1:16, etc.) designate the material rank of evil supra-mundane powers, so far as they relate to men."

This brings us to the prison epistles where these supra-mundane powers are mentioned six times. The six references are distributed as follows and their inter-relation is made evident by the parallelism here exhibited:

A | Eph. i. 21. Christ above all principality and power.
In this world and world to come.
The church His Body and fulness.
He the Head.

B | Eph. iii. 10. Some principalities and powers are learning through the church the manifold wisdom of God, and so do not appear to be "evil powers" or "against us".

C | Eph. vi. 12. These principalities and powers are spiritual wickedness, rulers of the darkness of this world against whom we wrestle, and because of whom we must "put on" the whole armour of God.

A | Col. i. 16-19. Christ before all; principalities and powers were created by Him and for Him, and He is before all things.
Fulness dwells in Him.
He is the Head of the Body the church.

B | Col. ii. 10. In association with the church which is "complete in Him" are these principalities and powers, for Christ is here said to be their "head".
This balances Eph. iii. 10 above.

C | Col. ii. 15. Here, however, are "enemies" again.
These use "the rudiments of the world".
The Saviour spoiled or "stripped off" these principalities and powers at the cross.

The one other occurrence of arche in the prison epistles, namely Col. i. 18 is suggestive. Christ is "the arche" the beginning, the principality, all others were created by Him and for Him and by Him all consist (Col. i. 16, 17). In the realm of the first creation these powers appear to have been delegated, but in the new creation of which the church is the first great foreshadowing, these principalities lose their authority, which is exercised by Christ alone. This will continue until the last enemy is destroyed and the goal of the ages is reached. To the above six references therefore, this seventh outstanding and separate reference should be associated swallowing up all such rule, even as He will swallow up death in victory.

It is interesting to note that in I Pet. iii. 22, Peter says of Christ "Who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God; angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto Him". He substitutes angels here for principalities. Angels are only mentioned once in the prison epistles, and then only to be set aside, namely in the passage which speaks of "worshipping of angels". The Church of the Mystery is not concerned with heaven's "messengers" and "ministers" (Heb. i. 4), but with heaven's aristocracy "thrones" and "dominions". The high exaltation of Christ as Head of the church is the better realized when we perceive the high order of spiritual beings that are placed beneath His feet.

"Powers." The word "power" should strictly be reserved for the translation of dunamis, and the word "authority" be used for the Greek word exousia which is found here in Eph. i. 21. Exousia, is derived from exesti "It is lawful" (I Cor. vi. 12; x. 23; II Cor. xii. 4). In Matthew, exousia is translated "authority" in six passages, and "power" in four, Matt. vii. 29 being the first occurrence, and Matt. xxviii. 18 the last. In addition to the six occurrences of the phrase "principality and power" already noted above, there are two occurrences in the prison epistles where exousia is used alone. These are:

> "The prince of the power of the air" (Eph. ii. 2).
> "Delivered . . . . . from the power of darkness" (Col. i. 13).

The "authority" of the prince of the power of the air, will ultimately be given to the great antichristian "Beast" at the time of the end (Rev. xiii. 2, 4) which gives some idea of the nature of the foe beneath the Saviour's feet. Dominion is the Greek kuriotes "lordship", a position which seems to have been abused and forfeited, and which is to be exercised in the fulness of its meaning by Christ, when in the day of His exaltation, every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is LORD (kurios) (Phil. ii. 11).

Alford says of these four words:

> "The most reasonable account of the four words seems to be thus: all principality gives the highest and fullest expression; authority is added filling out arche in detail, exousia being not only government, but every kind of power, primary and delegated . . . Then in the second pair dunamis is mere might, the raw material, so to speak, of power, kuriotes is that pre-eminence or lordship which dunamis establishes for itself. So that in the first pair we descend from the higher and concentrated to the lower and diffused; in the second we ascend from the lower and diffused to the higher and concentrated."

Then follows a general statement "and every name that is named not only in this world but also in that which is to come" (Eph. i. 21) comparable to a similar expansion in Rom. viii. 39 "nor any other creature". The word translated "world" in Eph. i. 21 is aion and should for consistency be rendered "age".

The universality of the Saviour's dominion can at least be appreciated if not comprehended, as we survey these dignities that are beneath His feet, this will be enhanced when we come to the O.T. reference that follows, but this we must leave for our next article.

If the reader is not acquainted with the place that Psa. viii. has in making known "The mystery of Christ", he is directed to Volume XXXVI, page 54.

No.37. The Throne Room (i. 19 - ii. 7).

"All things under His feet."

pp. 223 - 226

The exceeding greatness of the power that is to usward has been brought before us in Eph. i. 20, 21 focusing our attention on the resurrection, the session in heavenly places and the exaltation of Christ "far above all" rule and authority. We now find that this is enforced by a quotation from Scripture, a quotation which has this peculiarity, namely, that Paul alone of all the writers of the N.T. makes it. It is found in I Cor. xv., Heb. ii. and in Eph. i. These quotations we must examine together, as they are closely related to the goal of the ages. Turpie, in his analysis of O.T. quotations in the New, does not include Eph. i. 22, presumably because it is not specifically "quoted", the words "and hath put all things under His feet" being embodied in the epistle. This feature we will consider after the other references have been before us.

First of all let us turn to the Psalm from which the quotation is made. Most of our readers know that the Psalms consist of five books which correspond with the five books of the law, each book of the Psalms ending with a double Amen. For a full exhibition of this feature the Companion Bible should be consulted. The first book of the Psalms corresponds with the book of Genesis and refers back to Adam and forward to Christ. The reinstatement of the Psalm titles, through the labours of Dr. J. W. Thirtle, removes the heading "Upon Muth-labben", which in the A.V. is at the commencement of Psa. ix., and places it at the conclusion of Psa. viii. This feature is set out in Appendix 64 of the Companion Bible, showing that the complete Psalm is constructed as follows:

(1) The super-scription and the title proper.
(2) The body of the Psalm itself.
(3) The sub-scription.

Psa. viii. therefore has the super-scription "A Psalm of David" and the subscription "To the chief Musician upon Muth-labben". In No.57 of this series the bearing of the words "upon Muth-labben" will be discussed as they are also in an article entitled "The Secrets of the Son" published in Volume XXXVI, page 54 which the reader should consult.

The passage under immediate consideration reads as follows:

> "What is man, that Thou art mindful of him?
> And the Son of man, that Thou visitest him?
> For Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels,
> And hast crowned him with glory and honour.
> Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of Thy hands;
> Thou hast put all things under His feet" (Psa. viii. 4-6).

The quotation of this passage in Heb. ii. is luminous when seen in its setting. For this we need the structure, which reduced to simpler elements is as follows:

HEBREWS i. & ii.

A | i. 1, 2. God once spoke by prophets. Now by His Son.
B | i. 2-14. BETTER than angels.
A | ii. 1-4. God once spoke by angels. Now by the Lord.
B | ii. 5-18. LOWER than angels.

It will be seen that the quotation of Psa. viii. in Heb. ii. is part of a consistent comparison of the ministry of the Son of God with that of angels. It appears from Heb. ii. 5 that a former "world" was under the rule of angels, but that "the world to come" will not be, and the proof is found in the reference to Adam in his capacity as a figure of Him that was to come. The Psalm enumerates the orders that were put under the feet of the first man, Adam, they were:

> "All sheep and oxen , yea, and the beasts of the field; the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas" (Psa. viii. 7, 8), but, when the Apostle uses this in Heb. ii., he says "Thou hast put all things in subjection under His feet" and instead of referring to sheep and oxen, fowl and fish, he draws the extraordinary conclusion "For in that He put all in subjection under Him, He left nothing that is not put under Him". Here is universal dominion, "nothing" that is not put under Him. Using the same argument in the epistle to the Corinthians, the Apostle safeguards the truth by saying:

> "But when He saith, all things are put under Him, it is manifest that He is excepted, which did put all things under Him" (I Cor. xv. 27), for the Corinthians by reason of their original paganism, their "gods many and their lords many" may have stood in need of this reminder. The One glorious exception however but emphasizes the universal nature of the Saviour's dominion. Here too is the one occasion where Christ is called the last Adam and the second Man.

We have elsewhere given our reasons and submitted proofs of the Pauline authorship of the epistle to the Hebrews, and this peculiar handling of Psa. viii. in both Hebrews and Corinthians bespeaks a common author according to the accepted rule of higher criticism. The rule and authority and power that is placed beneath the feet of the Son are "enemies" as the context reveals:

> "For He must reign, till He hath put all enemies under His feet" (I Cor. xv. 25), the last being death. This leads on to the great goal of the ages when "God shall be all in all", and it is anticipated in Eph. i. 22, 23 by the headship of Christ over the church:

> "And hath put all things under His feet, and gave Him to be Head over all things to the Church, which is His Body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all."

God all in all in the future; Christ all in all in the present—the church of the Mystery being the clearest and fullest exhibition and foreshadowing of that glorious goal. "Where . . . . . Christ is all, and in all" (Col. iii. 11).

Returning to I Cor. xv., we observe that the word translated "put down" in verse 24 and "destroyed" in verse 26 is the one Greek word katargeo. This has a variety of renderings in the N.T. Abolish, bring to nought, make of none effect, make void, destroy, cease and fail, give a fairly clear idea of its primary meaning which is "to render inoperative". Katargeo is used in Luke xiii. 7 "why cumbereth it the ground?" Paul uses it in Romans six times as follows:

> Shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect? (Rom. iii. 3).
> Do we then make void the law through faith? (iii. 31).
> Faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect. (iv. 14).
> That the body of sin might be destroyed. (vi. 6).
> If the husband be dead, she is loosed from the law. (vii. 2).
> But now we are delivered from the law. (vii. 6).

The way in which the Apostle uses katargeo in I Cor. xiii. 8, 10, 11 where it is translated "fail", "vanish away", "done away" and "put away" must be remembered when we come to the next occurrences, namely in I Cor. xv. 24 and 26. All rule, all authority and power will be "done away", will "vanish away", will be abrogated, repealed, dissolved, the last of these enemies thus to be repealed, abrogated and done away being death itself. The only occurrences of katargeo in the Prison Epistles are:

> "Having abolished in His flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments contained in ordinances." (Eph. ii. 15).
> "Who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." (II Tim. i. 10).

In Eph. i. 22 this aspect of truth is not made prominent, "He hath put all things under His feet" precedes and prepares the way for the great abolition. Principalities and powers are not yet "abolished", indeed armour is provided and warning given concerning their animosity (Eph. vi. 12), but the first great step has been taken. These spiritual enemies are now "under His feet". The rapid transition "feet . . . . . Head" in Eph. i. 22 reminds us that there is a blessed side to this exalted position of the Lord. He has been given as Head, not over all things universally yet, but Head over all things so far as the church is concerned, a blessed forecast of things to come. This church has a double title, it is now "the Body", it will then be "the Fullness". The title "the Body" must be used with discretion. Paul was a member of that Body, but the members of that Body now living were, at the time of the writing of Ephesians, unborn. Consequently there never has yet existed a company of believers on earth that has comprised every member, the term "Body" being used of the existing company to set forth their relationship one with another as fellow-members, and with the Lord as their Head. When however every member is gathered in and the number of the elect is complete, the title changes. From being called the Church which is His Body, it will then become "The Fullness of Him that filleth all in all". This is so far reaching that we do not feel that justice could be done to it in the space at our disposal, and so we defer consideration of this glorious title until the next article.

The reader who sees the incomparable position of the seated Christ will not need a lengthy argument to prove that, to teach that He is seated "among heavenly beings", instead of "in heavenly places", is utterly untenable.

Emmanuel, God with us.

No.5. "With us." "He was numbered with the transgressors." pp. 15 - 17

The fact that the Saviour "bore our griefs and carried our sorrows" long before He ultimately "bore our sins in His Own body on the tree"—in other words lived out the implications of the blessed name Emmanuel, God with us, is warp and woof of the four Gospels. He came to reveal the Father, He came to manifest His love, He came to seek and to save that which was lost, but the first fact to note is that in all these things, "He came". Had he sent a messenger to reveal the Father, doubtless that revelation would have been glorious, but it could not have partaken of the essential character of that revelation made by Him Who is Emmanuel. We leave this phase of our study to the reader to follow out as time permits, and pass on to other and deeper aspects of this same great theme. The believer's hope is summed up in the word "with Him", whether it be expressed in John xiv., I Thess. iv. or Col. iii. The great doctrine of the believer's identification with the Saviour irradiates the central portion of the epistle to the Romans (chapters v.-viii.) with its wondrous grace, and these blessed fruits of Emmanuel's land must yet be examined and enjoyed. Before all this, however, one solemn aspect of Emmanuel's association with us as sinners needing salvation, demands consideration. Before ever we could think of "reckoning" ourselves to have "died with Christ" another reckoning had to be made, a reckoning foreshadowed in the types of the O.T. sacrifices, foretold in the Prophecy of Isa. liii., and fulfilled when Christ died the Just for the unjust that He might bring us to God.

> "And with Him they crucify two thieves; the one on His right hand, and the other on His left: And the Scripture was fulfilled which saith, And He was numbered with the transgressors" (Mark xv. 27, 28).
> "When I sent you without purse . . . . . lacked ye anything? . . . . . But now, he that hath a purse, let him take it . . . . . For I say unto you, that this that is written must yet be accomplished in Me. And He was reckoned among the transgressors: for the things concerning Me have an end" (Luke xxii. 35-37).

The preposition meta "with" that is used in Matt. i. 23, is employed here, translated "with" in Mark xv. 28, and "among" in Luke xxii. 37.

It will be seen that the accounts given in Mark and Luke are not identical. One refers to the actual crucifixion; and one to the events leading up to it. One is the comment of Mark, the other the words of the Saviour Himself. Let us consider these two passages in their historical order, and commence with Luke.

The first thing that we observe is that the quotation of Isa. liii. made by Luke is flanked on either side with the word "temptation".

> "Ye are they which have continued with (meta) Me in My temptations . . . . . Satan hath desired to have thee."
> "Pray that ye enter not into temptation" (Luke xxii. 28, 31, 40, 46).

The quotation from Isaiah is introduced in answer to the question put by the Lord concerning "purse" and "scrip" and "sword". Up till that moment, the Lord's personal protecting care had been sufficient, but a change was imminent, introduced by the words "but now". If Christ Himself was to be reckoned among transgressors, His followers would necessarily be reckoned among them too. True, He was to "fulfil" this great prophecy in a sense that no sinful man ever could fulfil it. He was holy, harmless, undefiled and "SEPARATE from sinners", yet was "reckoned among them". "He Who KNEW NO sin, was made sin for us"; He "died the JUST for the unjust".

The gathering point of the age was near. This that is written must yet be accomplished (teleo). The things concerning Him have an end (telos). Here we have an anticipation of John xix. 28, 30, "all things were now accomplished . . . . . it is finished (teleo)".

He Who was born at Bethlehem and given the name Emmanuel, God with us, now faced the cross, and was numbered with us transgressors.

The quotation from Isa. liii., is made in Mark's Gospel at the crucifixion itself. It comes after a long and dreadful series of indignities, cruel treatment and bitter spite.

How was it that an earthly governor like Pilate could sit in judgment upon the Son of God? The answer is He was numbered with transgressors, and stood in their place.

How was it that the Son of God permitted the Roman soldiers to handle Him, mock Him, spit upon Him, and crucify Him? The same answer will suffice. He, Emmanuel, was numbered with the transgressors. He was treated exactly like any other criminal. The accusation and superscription were put over His sacred head, and on either side of that cross, there were crucified WITH HIM two thieves. The verb sustauroo "to crucify with" occurs nowhere else in the N.T. than in the records of the actual crucifixion of Christ (Matt. xxvii. 44; Mark xv. 32; John xix. 32) and in the two great passages of Paul's epistles:

> "I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live" (Gal. ii. 20).
> "Our old man is crucified with Him" (Rom. vi. 6).

We shall learn upon examining the epistles of Galatians and Romans, that this crucifixion with Christ, is by "reckoning" and we now perceive the Divine reason why He, the Substitute and Sacrifice, should be "reckoned" with transgressors. At the cross we not only see that Emmanuel means "God with us" in wondrous love, but that by amazing grace, it contains the doctrine expressed in the words "with Him", with Him in His death right on by a series of steps until manifested with Him in glory.

Our path therefore is indicated, we must follow these steps that link the cradle, the cross and the crown as the great name Emmanuel is fulfilled before our wondering eyes.

No.6. "Reckoning" the link that makes us "One".
pp. 24, 25

It will now be necessary to pause, and consider what has passed before us and what lies ahead, and to observe any changes that are of importance. At first we may be so overwhelmed by the grace exhibited at the coming of Christ at Bethlehem, as to be ready to endorse the teaching, put forth by some, that at the Incarnation God not only came to be "with us" but that we also came to be joined "with Him". Before we go further into this line of teaching we must pay attention to the meaning of two Greek prepositions, the use of which in this teaching is of vital importance. The word translated "with" in the name "God with us", is the Greek preposition meta, and this is the word translated "with" and "among" in the two passages that tell us that "He was numbered with the transgressors".

Meta "with" is a preposition of association, and not of actual oneness. It consequently is sometimes translated "among" and "after" indicating association rather than union. When the angel said "Why seek ye the living among the dead?" (Luke xxiv. 5) the word "among" is meta. There can be no idea of "union" with the dead being read into this question. When we read that the Lord was "with" the wild beasts while enduring the forty days testing in the wilderness (Mark i. 13) it is "association" not "unity" that is implied. It will be remembered that Aristotle named a treatise "Physics" and followed it by a second which he called "Meta-physics", those things that follow, and go beyond the range of mere physical science. Meta means "with", but with in association, with in a series, not with in union and oneness.

At the Incarnation God was manifested in the flesh, but even though Christ was perfect MAN, that did not make all mankind "one" with God, for the fact that Christ was PERFECT Man, sinless, holy, harmless, undefiled, made Him, at the same time, "separate from sinners" not "one" with sinners. The very Incarnation that brought Him so near to man, emphasized the gulf that existed, and which could not be bridged by the fact of His human birth. The good Samaritan came where the wounded man was, and he showed what the word "neighbour" implied, but the good Samaritan did not, and could not, take the place of the wounded man, he could not be "wounded for" him, and in this lies the problem which we are now facing. Consequently, we are prepared for a further movement by the God of all grace. In the second chapter of Philippians, we see the Lord coming down from the heights of equality to the "form of a slave" and the "fashion as a man", down beyond Incarnation to "death, even the death of the cross". It is here, where true union begins, and the exactness of Scripture in its choice of prepositions is demonstrated. In Mark xv. 28, we arrive at the last use of "meta" so far as the Person and Work of Christ is concerned, until after His resurrection. He was numbered "with" the transgressors. The verse which precedes this passage in Mark introduces the new preposition, sun "together with", in the statement "and WITH Him they crucify two thieves" (Mark xv. 27).

Meta indicates "proximity", but sun indicates "conjunction", and implies something in common union, and the compound verb sustauroo "to crucify with" meets us for the first time (Matt. xxvii. 44; Mark xv. 32; John xix. 32). Be it noted, this same word sustauroo is used by the Apostle Paul to indicate the first of a series of links that unites the believer for ever with His Lord: "I am crucified with Christ" (Gal. ii. 20), "Our old man is crucified with Him" (Rom. vi. 6).

At the birth at Bethlehem Christ became Emmanuel, "God with us", where meta indicates the limits of this blessed proximity of God to man, but at the cross, the believing sinner becomes one "with Christ" and now the preposition of union and oneness is employed, sun.

From this initial union there arises a wonderful doctrine, found only in the epistles of Paul, the first rung of the ladder being "crucified with Christ", the last being "manifest with Him" in glory. The Emmanuel aspect of Christ's association with man was by "birth", but the closer union at the cross was by "reckoning". The same word is translated "numbered" in Mark xv. 28, and "reckoned" in Luke xxii. 37. It is the Greek logizomai. The only way in which the Holy Spotless One could be "one" with sinful men was being "reckoned" so. The only way in which corrupted sinful man could be "one" with Christ, was by being "reckoned" so. Apart from James ii. 23, I Pet. v. 12, the Gospels and Acts xix. 27, logizomai is found thirty-five times in Paul's epistles. The epistle of this reckoning is Romans, where logizomai occurs nineteen times.

In the fourth of Romans we read "It was counted unto him for righteousness", a reward not being "reckoned of grace" but of debt, and God is seen "imputing" righteousness without works, and "reckoning" faith for righteousness. In the sixth chapter the whole blessed teaching is found expressed in two verses: The new bond of union "crucified WITH" (6) and the link "reckon ye also yourselves to be dead" (11). Because He was sinless, He could only be reckoned with (meta) sinners, but inasmuch as His sacrificial death put away our sin, we, the sinners, can be reckoned with (sun) Him, not in His birth, but in that new relationship made possible first by reckoning and then by substitution. At present our union with Christ is by reckoning only, for we are still in ourselves mortal and sinful. However, in resurrection, what is ours only by reckoning will be ours in glorious reality. All barriers to complete union will then have gone and we shall indeed be One.

After what we have seen, it will be misleading to pursue this new line of teaching under the heading "Emmanuel, God with us", we shall have to adopt a new title and commence a new series, but the reader will not forget that had the Lord never condescended to the birth at Bethlehem, He could never have descended further to the death of the Cross. He became "God with us" in order that it might be possible for us to be made one "with God".

The First Principles of the Oracles of God

(A series especially addressed to new readers)

No.1. Our Basis. The Inspired Word of God.

pp. 1 - 6

At the time of writing these lines, The Berean Expositor has been in existence for over forty-five years, and it is not to be wondered that during that period changes in the presentation of the truth made known should have taken place. Where once every term used was explained, as time went on and readers became aware of the main lines of teaching, lengthy explanations became unnecessary. Readers who have lately become interested in the truth naturally find themselves facing articles which, by their very nature, assume a fair acquaintance with the terms employed. We continually use the term "Dispensational Truth" but cannot lengthen every article to provide a definition or to give examples. We assume in every article an endorsement of the basic principle of "Right Division", without explanation or without actually quoting the text. As the early bound volumes of The Berean Expositor are out of print and practically unobtainable, even at second hand, we have already re-written the early expositions on the epistle to the Ephesians and the epistle to the Hebrews, which are either now appearing, or will appear in this magazine shortly. We are becoming aware through our mail, that another generation of readers must be catered for, and feel sure that the most mature of our readers will welcome a new presentation of basic truth, and feel thereby more willing to introduce the magazine to younger readers. The nature of our witness, must ever render the writing and reading of such articles "difficult" and what may be now labeled "elementary" by some readers, will still, alas, be considered too advanced by many "who for the time ought to be teachers". Recognizing, therefore, the necessity to consider these "first principles of the oracles of God", and also the limits which our space and the ability we may possess impose upon us we commence, with this number, a fresh approach to the consideration of those things which are most surely believed among us. These things include that which may be called Doctrine, such as the teaching of Scripture concerning the Person and Work of the Son of God, the claims of Scripture to its inspiration and authority, the nature of man, of sin, of salvation, of punishment, and of those things which more naturally range themselves under the heading of Dispensational Truth and which constitute the peculiar witness of The Berean Expositor, and which includes the different callings, the constitution of the Church, the question—did the Church begin at Pentecost? the place of Israel in the scheme of redemption and the consequences that follow the rejection of that people at the end of the Acts, the two-fold ministry of the apostle Paul, the Dispensation of the Mystery and the distinctive place of the "Prison Epistles", &c., &c. The following taken from an announcement of meetings at the Chapel of the Opened Book, may not come amiss as an expansion and explanation of these aspects of truth.

THE THREEFOLD DIVISION OF ALL TRUTH

The revelation given in the Scriptures comes to us in three forms. (1) Doctrinal Truth, (2) Dispensational Truth, (3) Practical Truth.

What do we mean by Doctrinal Truth?—Doctrinal truth embraces all that has been revealed concerning the Being and Attributes of God, and all that God has done, commanded, promised or foretold in Creation, Law and Grace. "All have sinned" is true under whatever dispensation we may be called. "God is just" is as true under grace as it was under law. "To the Jew first" was true during the period covered by the Acts, but cannot be put into practice since the dismissal of the Jew in Acts xxviii. This latter statement therefore comes rather under the next heading.

What do we mean by Dispensational Truth?—Dispensational truth takes note of the purpose of the ages, the changes that have been introduced since Creation, such as may be denominated the dispensations of Innocence, Law, Kingdom, Grace, Church, Mystery, &c., and the office of Dispensational truth is to decide whether any particular doctrine—be it command, promise, calling or prophecy—does or does not pertain to any particular individual. Dispensational truth would lead the believer to distinguish between the blessing which says, "The meek shall inherit the earth", and those blessings which are described as "all spiritual" and to be enjoyed "in heavenly places".

What do we mean by Practical Truth?—Not until Doctrine has passed the mesh of Dispensational truth, can Practical truth put in its claim. It is obvious that the people of Israel, called to be a royal priesthood and a holy nation, with its sphere of influence in the earth, could not be called upon to put into practice the injunctions of Eph. iv.-vi. In like manner, the Church of the One Body has no guarantee that obedience to the special truth attaching to that calling will result in blessing in "basket and store". Those who are under the law, must have a very different form of practice from those who are under grace.

Only by loyally preaching and teaching the truth of God as related to these three aspects can we hope to become workmen who need not to be ashamed, for only by so doing shall we "rightly divide" the Word of truth.

As all our teaching, whether Doctrinal, Dispensational or Practical is based squarely upon the actual wording of the Scriptures, a word concerning the Scriptures themselves may not come amiss in this opening article.

How were the Scriptures written? How did they come? Paul supplies an answer to the first question, and Peter to the second:

> "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God" (II Tim. iii. 16).
> "Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (II Pet. i. 21).

HOW WAS SCRIPTURE GIVEN?—"By inspiration of God."
HOW DID SCRIPTURE COME?—"Holy men were moved by the Holy Ghost."

Let us give earnest heed to these statements and examine them in the light of their contexts. Both are the utterances of men in view of death, and there is a suitable solemnity about the two epistles containing them that pervades their whole doctrine. In both instances the immediate contexts speak of death:

> "The time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith" (II Tim. iv. 6, 7).
> "Shortly I must put off this my tabernacle as the Lord Jesus Christ hath shewed me" (II Pet. i. 14).

Thus, on the eve of martyrdom, both Paul and Peter give unambiguous testimony to the absolutely divine origin of the Scriptures. How, then, can we hope to finish our course, how keep the faith, how entertain the hope of a crown or a "well done" if we deny or trifle with the Scriptures held so dear by these two servants of the Lord?

> "From a child thou hast known the holy scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus. All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness: that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works" (II Tim. iii. 15-17).

Graphe, the Greek word translated "Scripture", is practically an English word, having been in use in our language for a great while. It occurs in such words as photo*graphy*, geo*graphy*, graphic, &c., and always means something written. While graphe could, of course, refer to anything written at any time by anyone, it assumes a special meaning in the Word of God, and when used without qualification always means "The Scriptures", the writings par excellence. So gegrapti, "It is, or hath been, written" is a phrase that indicates the Scriptures. We trust that no more need be said to stress the fact that we are dealing not with thoughts, ideas, or even spoken words, but something written. As will be seen in the sequel this is most important.

The Old Testament abounds in references to writing and to books. Moses wrote all the words of the Lord in a book (Exod. xxiv. 4, 7). So did Joshua (Josh. xxiv. 26). Over and over again appeal is made to the written law (Exod. xxxi. 18; Deut. xxviii. 58; Josh. viii. 31). The foundation of our faith is written testimony.

What does Scripture say as to the way in which the subject matter of these holy writings was given? Paul answers in one word, Theopneustos. Theos is the Greek word for "God" and is too well known to need comment here. Pneustos is the third person singular, perfect, passive, of pneo, to breathe. This also gives us pneuma, which is usually translated "spirit". The close association of pneuma with breath is seen in our words pneumatic and pneumonia, while to inspire, to respire and to transpire are all processes of breathing either in or out by nostril, pore or cell. Let us now put together the two parts of Paul's great utterance. All Scripture that is written, is given by inspiration of God, that is, God-breathed.

Now if what is written is what was breathed by God, there is no interval in which the prophet or the writer may, by meditation, incorporate a vision of his own heart. However intelligently the writer might co-operate with the divine Spirit, or however mystified he might be by the words given him to write, when it was a question of the making of Scripture, and the receiving of the oracles of God, the writers ceased to act merely in the capacity of thinkers, theologians or philosophers, they became willing instruments. Thus while personality is stamped upon every page of Scripture, Moses differing from Isaiah, Paul from Peter, Matthew from Luke, yet all its writers were instruments in the hand of God. The readers of The Berean Expositor will never see the actual words written by the Editor that later appear on these pages, neither will the printer nor the proof readers. The manuscript will be turned into type-script, to save the time and temper of the compositors, and the type-script into the printed page. Each stage will have had its peculiar characteristics, yet each will convey the same message. It would be but a quibble to say that the Editor did not actually write the article, simply because only the matter set up in type is read.

So with the writing of Scripture, "God, at sundry times and in divers manner, spake in time past by the prophets" (Heb. i. 1). However divers the manners, one thing remained constant, it was "God" Who "spoke". Moses was peculiarly favoured by God. "Hear now My words: If there be a prophet among you, I the Lord will make Myself known unto him in a vision, and will speak unto him in a dream. My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all mine house. With him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches: and the similitude of the Lord shall he behold" (Numb. xii. 6-8).

Into the question of how the revelation of truth was given we will not enter further here, but turn to the testimony of Peter, as given in the first chapter of II Peter. Speaking of the second coming of the Lord, Peter declares first of all: "We have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (II Pet. i. 16). His testimony now divides into two parts: (1) His own personal experience, and (2) The testimony of the word of prophecy.

Peter's experience on the mount of transfiguration was blessedly real and true. So far as Peter was concerned nothing could remove the impression he there received. But he was commission to preach, not his experiences, but the Word. Experiences are of secondary importance when compared with one clear statement of Scripture. Yet many a child of God is misleading himself and others by so-called experiences. And strictly speaking, the value of these experiences often becomes very small when stripped of all associations and sentiments, and submitted to a cross-examination. Peter, therefore, turns even from the true experience of the mount of transfiguration to something "more sure":

> "We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed in your hearts, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day star arise" (II Pet. i. 19).

The word of prophecy is "sure", sure as the promise (Rom. iv. 16); steadfast as the word spoken by angels (Heb. ii. 2), fast as the anchor of hope (Heb. vi. 19).

> "Knowing this first, that no prophecy of the Scripture is of any private interpretation. For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man: but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (II Pet. i. 20, 21).

The word "moved" used by Peter is found in the record of the storm in Acts xxvii. 15 and 17, "we let her drive"; "and so were driven". The human element was set aside in that driving storm, even as Peter testifies, the human will was not permitted to interfere with the direct inspiration of the writers of Scripture. As a most blessed endorsement of these two testimonies, is the undeniable attitude of the Saviour to the integrity and authority of the Scriptures. At Bethlehem the Scriptures were fulfilled. At the cross, the resurrection and the ascension, the Scriptures were proved to be true down to the veriest detail. During the earthly ministry of the Son of God, He declared that it was impossible to believe His teaching while repudiating the writings of Moses (John v. 47), and reaffirmed this in resurrection by "beginning at Moses and all the prophets" (Luke xxiv. 47). Whatever difference there may be discernible between the aspect of truth presented by Matthew and by John, by Peter and by Paul, they stand solidly by the affirmation "All scripture is given by inspiration of God" and this must be recognized as the basis of all the teaching set forth in The Berean Expositor or any of its publications. As by faith we gaze at the cross of Christ, as we see indissolubly linked together the finished WORK of Calvary and finished WORD of God, there we take our stand, and with heart and life declare that our Saviour's Bible so far as the Old Testament is concerned is our Bible, and that His deep reverence for the written Scriptures shall be our continuous example. "Beginning at Moses", moreover, seems to suggest the only way in which the present series of elementary studies should proceed, and accordingly with this introduction we turn the reader's attention to some of the outstanding teaching of the book of Genesis in our endeavour to set out some of the "First principles of the oracles of God". The book of Genesis closes with a "coffin in Egypt". This can be no ordinary book to justify so strange an ending. We catch something of the importance of this reference by nothing that of all that might have been brought forward this is recorded of Joseph in Heb. xi. 22. We believe our subsequent studies will reveal the reason for this strange sequel.

> "And Joseph said unto his brethren, I die: and God will surely visit you, and bring you out of this land unto the land which He sware to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob. And Joseph took an oath of the children of Israel, saying, God will surely visit you, and ye shall carry up my bones from hence. So Joseph died, being an hundred and ten years old: and they embalmed him, and he was put in a coffin in Egypt" (Gen. l. 24-26).

The book of Genesis moves from Creation to New Creation, embodied in the unfaltering hope of Joseph, even as the whole of the Bible moves from the Creation of the heaven and the earth in the beginning to the new heaven and the new earth, wherein sin, sorrow, death and the curse shall be "no more" (Rev. xxi. 1, 4; xxii. 3).

Here for the moment we stay, except to draw the reader's attention to a series of articles which commenced in Volume XXXIV of The Berean Expositor which is entitled "Time and Place" and which in Volume XXXVI, page 176 brings the chronology of Genesis to a close with the year 2369, the date of the death of Joseph. We quote in this connexion from the Rev. Martin Anstey, B.D., M.A.:

> "Each step in the progress of the chronology is clearly explained in the above table, and the 'proof' is given in the 'testimony' of the Scripture cited. These proof texts are the historical data with which the science of chronology is built up. The result arrived at is characterized by the accuracy and certainty of an exact science. It cannot be one year more. It cannot be one year less."

The first of the first principles of the oracles of God is, therefore, the inspiration, integrity and authority of the Holy Scriptures.

No.2. "Beginning at Moses."
pp. 33 - 35

"Beginning at Moses." These words are taken from Luke xxiv. 47, and describe the line of teaching adopted by the Risen Christ, when instructing His disciples. We cannot hope to improve on such an example and in this series, addressed particularly to new readers, we too can find no other approach to the task before us than to begin at Moses also. Even when we are dealing with the unsaved, who are seeking light and guidance on the question of salvation, we are driven back to the opening chapter of Genesis. If there be no Creator, man is not a responsible being, for there is no one above him to whom he can he held accountable. If he is not responsible, there can be neither sin nor salvation, purpose or goal. Life becomes an insoluble enigma, we seem to be but pawns in a terrible game of chance. If, however, I have a Maker, and if He made me in His image, then I have a purpose to fulfil, and to fail or "come short" constitutes the basic meaning of sin. We shall have to elaborate this aspect of the truth later. We feel however that before we embark on such themes both the example of Christ Himself, the example of Paul (Acts xxviii. 23) and the construction of the Scriptures, make the commencement at Genesis imperative.

In the series we shall endeavour to avoid over-elaboration or too minute analysis. Where outlines are given, they will be as it were sketched in charcoal. Where meanings of words are dealt with, the original Hebrew and Greek will only be indicated. Where, however, it will be wise and necessary for the reader to consider more extensive proofs or analysis, an index of articles or books bearing on the particular theme will be given at the close.

The composition of the book of Genesis appears to consist of the collation of ancient family records, edited by Moses, and endorsed by the Spirit of God, to which an inspired revelation is given in the opening chapter. Further, these family records consist of genealogies, giving the chronology of Genesis in unhesitating steps from Adam to Joseph.

A glimpse at the book of Genesis as a whole will reveal a unique arrangement of subject matter. It opens with the creation of heaven and earth "in the beginning", it closes with the record of Joseph's death in Egypt.

> "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth" (Gen. i. 1).
> "So Joseph died, being an hundred and ten years old; and they embalmed him, and he was put in a coffin in Egypt" (Gen. l. 26).

Did any book ever begin and end like this? What possible connexion can there be between so vast a theme as the creation of the universe, and the embalming of one man, aged 110 years, in Egypt? The first item that emerges is that the record of creation given in Genesis is not put there as a matter of scientific interest, it evidently subserves another purpose. That purpose embraces man and his destiny, and the purpose that underlies the inclusion of "a coffin in Egypt" is REDEMPTIVE, so that the fate of Joseph is of more consequence than the appointment of sun, moon or star. When once this aspect of truth is accepted, we shall have made the first step to the understanding of the Scriptures, we shall understand why Moses devotes almost as many chapters in Exodus to the description of the tabernacle, its foundation and its priesthood, as he devotes verses to describe the creation of the world.

In a subsequent study we shall have to consider the relation of Genesis, the first book, with the Revelation, the last book, but all in good time. We now come a little closer to Genesis, and while still considering it as a whole, let us endeavour to trace its outline in the large. Chapters i.-xi. deal with the whole human race, Adam to Noah. Chapters xii.-l. deal with the one chosen nation Israel, Abraham to Joseph. We therefore use the word RACE for the first part, and NATION for the second. Next we observe that the first half ends with an ARK, while the second half ends with a COFFIN. In order to be able to appreciate this strange correspondence, the reader must permit a reference to the Hebrew and the Greek words involved, but there will be nothing put forward which need bother the simplest.

The word "ark" in Gen. vi.-ix. is the translation of the Hebrew word tebah, a word that is described by grammarians as "a loan word" from the Egyptian T-B-T "a chest". If the reader possesses "Young's Analytical Concordance", he will observe that under this heading Ark tebah, there are listed all the references in the record of the flood, with two references from Exodus in addition. Now there can be no reference discovered in Exodus to the Flood, but Moses had been saved from death. His own mother had made an Ark of bulrushes, daubed it with slime and with pitch, and Moses remembering his mother's devotion used the selfsame Egyptian word for the Ark, made by Noah of wood, which was also covered within and without in pitch.

The word translated "coffin" in Gen. l. 26 is the Hebrew word aron, which is translated "chest" six times and "ark" 195 times. There is therefore a closer connexion between Noah's Ark and Joseph' coffin than at first appears. This is by no means all, however. We discover that this word translated "coffin" is used in Exodus for the Ark of the Covenant! and not only so, a consultation of the N.T. reveals that the selfsame word kibotos speaks of the Ark prepared by Noah (Heb. xi. 7) and the Ark of the Covenant

(Heb. ix. 4). Consequently had Moses chosen, he could have avoided the Egyptian word which had such moving associations with himself, and have used the word aron for both the Ark in Gen. vi. and the coffin in Gen. l., the pitch, the slime and the embalming alike being used as preservatives. The two portions of Genesis therefore end on the same note:

From Adam to Noah - The Ark. Preserving seed.
From Abraham to Joseph - The coffin. Preserving seed.

The life of Joseph teems with interest, and it is morally certain that had any of us been entrusted with the task of selecting one event or feature of Joseph's life that should take its place in the list of faith, we would scarcely have selected the one that we find in Heb. xi.:

> "By faith Joseph, when he died."

When he DIED, yet all his life that life teemed with incidents.

> "By faith Joseph, when he died, made mention of the departure of the children of Israel: and gave commandment concerning his BONES" (Heb. xi. 22).

One of the first principles therefore of the oracles of God is that the Bible is primarily concerned with REDEMPTION, other important themes, such as creation itself, are not introduced for their own sakes, but as subsidiary items to the main theme.

No.3. Creation and the Purpose of the Ages.
pp. 64 - 67

Most students of Scripture are aware of the many items that occur in the book of Genesis, and which find their sequel and balance in the book of Revelation. The recognition of this fact is not merely the recognition of some sort of literary construction or pattern, but the acknowledgment of the presence, the pursuit and the attainment of a purpose. Anything that brings to the believer the assurance that there is a purpose underlying the welter and confusion of human history is of itself a Gospel, or good news, for there is nothing so disheartening as the feeling that all is in vain, that we are traveling nowhere in particular, that we have neither chart, compass, nor destiny. Therefore, in spite of the fact that these corresponding features have been set out before in these pages, we must do it again so that all without exception, shall be in possession of these liberating details.

In subsequent studies we shall bring forward the evidences necessary to show that the condition of things indicated by "without form and void" in Gen. i. 2 was a condition into which the primary creation fell, but for the moment we take this interpretation for granted in order to set out before the eye the general plan of the Bible, with particular reference to the relationship of Genesis with Revelation. Before doing so we want to establish that there will be an equivalent period of dissolution at the time of the end, to that of Gen. i. 2, before the new heaven and the new earth appear. For this we will appeal to two portions of Scripture here, although the reader will doubtless be able to supplement these passages by others with which he is familiar. First a passage from the O.T. telling us of a future period of dissolution comparable to Gen. i. 2:

> "And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll: and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth off from the vine, and as a falling fig from the fig-tree. For My sword shall be bathed in heaven . . . . . it is the day of the Lord's vengeance" (Isa. xxxiv. 4, 5, 8).

We anticipate future studies by drawing attention to the fact that the two words translated "without form and void" in Gen. i. 2 occur in verse 11 of this same chapter, there translated "confusion" and "emptiness". This of itself confirms the thought that Gen. i. 2 is to be in some measure repeated in the future.

Secondly, a passage from the N.T.:

> "Looking for and earnestly desiring the coming of the day of God, by reason of which the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat. But, according to His promise, we look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness" (II Pet. iii. 12, 13, R.V.).

Again we anticipate future studies by assuming as true, that the work of the six days of Gen. i. was the preparation of the earth—so long submerged—for man. These things being accepted, the pattern of the ages (another term that must be considered in its place) can be set out somewhat as follows:

CREATION	«--- The present heaven and earth ---»		NEW CREATION
Gen. i. 1	The platform of the Age-Purpose and destined to pass away.		Rev. xxi. 1
	Gen. i. 2 Chaos Vengeance	II Pet. iii. 12 Chaos Vengeance

Supplementing this survey we will now present a few of the most evident parallels between Genesis and the Revelation. The new heaven and the new earth of Rev. xxi. 1 answers Gen. i. 1. The "first" heaven and earth, should read "the former heaven and earth", as the word is translated in verse four. This refers, not to the primary creation of the Universe (Gen. i. 1) but to the present creation, the limited heaven (called the firmament, yet to be considered) the present earth.

The added statement "no more sea" refers to the great deep of Gen. i. 2 which, like death, pain and the curse, are to be "no more" (Rev. xxi. 4; xxii. 3).

Paradise is lost in Gen. iii. together with the tree of life. Paradise is restored in Rev. xxii., together with the tree of life, the leaves of which will be for the healing of the nations, a contrast with the leaves used by Adam and Eve after the fall.

The cherubim were placed or "tabernacled" at the east of the garden and in Ezekiel these cherubim are described as having the face of a lion, a man, an ox and an eagle. In the Revelation the "four beasts" or better "the four living ones" with similar description are found closely associated with the glorious purpose of restoration. The intention of the cherubim will form a separate study and cannot be considered here.

Nimrod, first king of Babylon is mentioned in Gen. x. 8, 9 and his anti-type the Beast, the great Babylonian rebel at the time of the end, is seen in Rev. xiii. to xviii. The Serpent of Gen. iii. is identified as "The Devil" (N.T.) and "Satan" (O.T.) in Rev. xii. 9. The list can be expanded to great length, and the reader will find great help and blessing if he discards all helps in this matter and patiently and prayerfully endeavours to construct a set of parallels for himself.

Not only does Genesis anticipate Revelation, but the use of the word "beginning" in Gen. i. 1 anticipates "the end" of I Cor. xv. 24-28, when God will not only be "All" as He must ever have been as the Creator, but "all in all" as He will be when Redemption issues in Restoration and all enmity is for ever subdued. This subject, however, calls for a careful examination of the term "beginning" and deserves an article to itself. This we hope to give in the succeeding pages of this series. For the moment we pause and consider as an appendix to our meditations the essential place that Creation plays in the Scriptures of the Law, Prophets, Psalms, Gospels, Acts, Epistles and the Revelation. We are told, by some, that we have outgrown the primitive idea of placating an angry God (a distorted version of the Love that provided the great sacrifice for sin) and that modern science has made the idea of creation childish and impossible. If the reader would but go through the N.T. books and cut out all references to Redemption by blood, the Creation and the Miraculous, what he had left would be unreadable and worthless. For the moment our theme is Creation, and we draw attention to the way in which "All Scripture" is committed to this theme:

(1) The Law of Moses. (Gen. i. 1; Deut. iv. 32; Exod. xx. 11).
(2) The Prophets. (Isa. xl. 26; xlii. 5; Mal. ii. 10).
(3) The Psalms. (Psa. xcv. 5, 6; cxxxiv. 3; cxlvi. 6; Eccles. vii. 29; xii. 1).
(4) The Gospels. (Mark x. 6; xiii. 19; John i. 1-3).
(5) The Acts. (Acts xiv. 15; xvii. 24, 26).
(6) The Epistles. (Rom. i. 20; I Pet. iv. 19; II Pet. iii. 4; Col. i. 15, 16).
(7) The Revelation. (Rev. iii. 14; iv. 11; x. 6; xiv. 7).

The destiny of the people of Israel is intertwined with the fact of Creation.

> "For thus saith the Lord that created the heavens: God Himself that formed the earth and made it, He hath established it, He created it not IN VAIN . . . . . I said not unto the seed of Jacob, Seek Me IN VAIN . . . . ." (Isa. xlv. 18, 19).
> "For behold, I create NEW HEAVENS and a NEW EARTH . . . . . I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy" (Isa. lxv. 17, 18).

> "For thus saith the Lord, which giveth the sun for a light by day, and the ordinances of the moon and of the stars for a light by night, which divideth the sea when the waves thereof roar; the Lord of hosts is His name. If those ordinances depart from before Me, saith the Lord, then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before Me for ever" (Jer. xxxi. 35, 36).

The Gospel is never expressed in terms of self-improvement, of any "turning over a new leaf", of any sort of "evolution", but in terms of a New Covenant, which NEW Creation implies an OLD.

> "Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature (or there is a New Creation). Old things are passed away, behold new things are come into being" (II Cor. v. 17).
>
> "For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a NEW CREATURE (or creation)" (Gal. vi. 15).
>
> "Put on the NEW MAN, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness" (Eph. iv. 24).
> "And have put on the NEW MAN which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him Who created him" (Col. iii. 10).

The vexed question as to the creation of the six days, and all that this implies, and which modern science forces the believer to ponder, must be given the attention which such a question demands, and this will form the subject of an article in this series in the near future.

No.4. Gen. i. 2. A judgment, not a mode of creation.
pp. 95 - 98

We can quite understand how difficult it must be for any one, with even a most elementary knowledge of the findings of modern science, to believe that the earth is only just about 6,000 years old. The sad thing is that so many in the name of science affirm that this is the teaching of the book of Genesis, and then proceed to set the Scriptures aside without first of all assuring themselves that what they say represents the facts and that it is they who stand in need of correction. Surely it is an elementary rule that a scientist should deal with fact and evidence, and if the first chapter of Genesis be the object or research, then WHAT IT SAYS should be most scrupulously noted and adhered to before any opinion is formed or expressed. A scientist worthy of the name who reads Gen. i. 9, 10 would immediately conclude that such a statement cannot possibly refer to primal creation.

> "And God said, Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together into one place, and LET THE DRY LAND APPEAR, and it was so. And God called the dry land EARTH."

Here are two plain statements. The land that had been submerged beneath the waters, was made to "appear", and this restored land is denominated "earth". That is what this text-book tells us, and being truly scientific, we too will use the term "earth" as the text-book directs. We shall not read "appear" (Heb. raah "become visible") as though it were bara, the Hebrew word "create". We should scrupulously keep to facts as stated. This means of course that the opening verses of Genesis have been misread and so we turn back to verse two to examine its testimony. The reader may have noticed, that the A.V. printers have taken the trouble to use two sorts of type for printing the word "was" in that verse.

> "And the earth was (ordinary type) without form and void; and darkness was (italic type) upon the face of the deep" (Gen. i. 2).

As this series of articles is primarily for new readers, we purposely refrain from too many grammatical notes, but we believe that all will be able to follow the explanation here given. When the ordinary sense of the verb "to be" is intended (am, art, is, was, &c.), no Hebrew word is employed, its presence is assumed, and so in English the word "was" is printed was. When the sense is "become" rather than "be", the word "was" is printed in ordinary type, signifying that the Hebrew verb is actually used. Now this verb occurs in Gen. ii. 7 where man "became" a living soul, for he certainly was not "living" until he breathed the breath of life. Again we read in Gen. iv. 2 that Abel "was" a keeper of sheep, and that Cain "was" a tiller of the ground. But common sense tells us that some years must have elapsed after their birth before this could have been possible, and all is in harmony if we remember that the word here is "become".

> "And Abel became a keeper of sheep."

In Gen. xix. 26 the verb is translated correctly "she became a pillar of salt", indicating a catastrophe subsequent to her normal well being. At some time after the initial creation of heaven and earth, a period as long as astronomy and geology may demand, the earth became without form and void. This places the teaching of Genesis on its true basis. It teaches that the universe was created "in the beginning"; that a chaotic condition at some time supervened and that this period of darkness and deluge can be of any length of time, and that the present heaven and earth, prepared for the habitation of man, came into being some 6,000 years ago. There is more to it than merely settling a scientific objection however. The question arises "why did this state of affairs take place?" Science here can provide no answer. Unless God Himself has told us, we do not know. The reader will probably remember that on page 65 we set out a tentative illustration of the pattern of the ages, in which we balanced the state of affairs described in Gen. i. 2, with that described in I Pet. iii., a chaotic condition supervening at the beginning and again at the end of the present world system. This is completely justify by the way in which inspired Scripture uses the words translated "without form and void" elsewhere. Let us turn to Jer. iv. Jeremiah laments the condition of Israel, and foresees the terrible consequences of its departure from the Lord.

> "I beheld the earth, and lo, it was without form and void" (Jer. iv. 23).

Here the same Hebrew words are used as found in Gen. i. 2. Let us in the next place observe their setting here.

The fruitful place has become a wilderness.
The cities thereof are broken down.
The land is to be desolate, the earth to mourn, the heavens to be black.
(Jer. iv.25-28).

No one in his senses would teach from Jer. iv. that the land thus described was actually created a wilderness, the only legitimate interpretation is that it became so. No one either with this parallel usage can teach that creation originally came into being "without form and void" but that the pristine creation of Gen. i. 1 became the chaotic confusion of Gen. i. 2. The next question is "why?" Jeremiah supplies the answer. "All the cities thereof were broken down at the presence of the Lord, and by His fierce anger." Is that not judgment? Can it by any possible way refer to initial creation?

We have another witness in Isaiah, who also uses the words translated "without form and void", but in the A.V. they are rendered "confusion" and "emptiness".

"He shall stretch out upon it the line of confusion (same word "without form") and the stones of emptiness (same word as "void")" (Isa. xxxiv. 11).

Here again the context is one of judgment.

"Indignation . . . . . fury . . . . . utterly destroyed . . . . . slain . . . . . sword . . . . . curse. It is the day of the Lord's vengeance" (Isa. xxxiv. 2-8).

In verse four we have a passage parallel with II Pet. iii. 10-12, the dissolution which ushers in the new heavens and the new earth:

"And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll: and all the host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth off from the vine, and as a falling fig from the fig tree" (Isa. xxxiv. 4).

We are enjoined to compare spiritual things with spiritual, which comparison will take note of the words "which the Holy Ghost teacheth", and in these two prophets we have the fullest warrant that we can hope to find, for interpreting Gen. i. 2 as a judgment that fell, rather than as the primitive condition of creation itself. "The earth became without form and void." Not only does this interpretation rob the scientific objection of any basis for its objection, it does more, it throws light upon the period of time spoken of in Eph. i. 4 where we read:

"According as He hath chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world."

To "prove" this connexion would demand an examination of the Greek word translated "foundation" and that we are avoiding in this more elementary approach. We will however direct the reader to recent articles where the subject is given meticulous care, and sincerely hope that all who desire the fullest understanding of the distinctiveness of the calling made known in Ephesians, will spare the time to acquaint themselves with the evidence there assembled. These articles will be found in Volume XXXVI, pages 61, 81, 101, 121 and 141, all that we will do here is to sum up the findings which are there set out.

Two sets of time are found in the N.T. that should be kept distinct, "from the foundation of the world" and "before the foundation of the world". The latter is used once only of the redeemed, namely of those called during the dispensation of the Mystery. The verbal form of the word translated "foundation" is rendered "cast-down" in II Cor. iv. 9 and Rev. xii. 10, and in the articles mentioned above, twenty-nine occurrences of this same word used in the Septuagint (the Greek version of the O.T.) are set out where the translation is consistently "throw down", "break down", "overthrow", never create, build or plant. If each reference be read in its context, the references will be found to be those of battle, of siege, of destruction, of judgment. We believe it is impossible for any reader not to be impressed with the solidarity of its witness.

The first verse of Gen. i., tells us of the initial act of creation, which took place in the dateless past.

The second verse of Gen. i. tells us of an overthrow, a judgment that fell upon the earth, the darkness only being dissipated at long last by the movement of the spirit of God and the words of God "Let there be light".

These words compel us to turn to one utterance made by the apostle Paul, which will show that he at least believed that Gen. i. 1, 2 speaks of a state comparable to the fall and conversion of man.

> "For God Who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (II Cor. iv. 6).

The context of this quotation speaks of Satan and his ways, and we shall have to consider the teaching of Scripture with reference to the fall of the angels before we can answer the question "why did judgment fall upon the earth?" as indicated in Gen. i. 2.

No.5. The Present Creation likened to a Tabernacle.
pp. 110 - 113

At either end of the Sacred Volume a revelation is given for which no human witness was or could be available, namely, in Genesis, Moses looks back before Adam to the preparation of the present heaven and earth for man, and John, in the Revelation looks forward to the future Day of the Lord and the ushering in of the New Heavens and New Earth, for which, once again, no human witness was possible. The prophetic vision alone could reveal either the past to Moses or the future to John. The past was made known to Moses in a series of revelations occupying seven days, all of which except the seventh, being divided into two parts, the evening and the morning were the first, second, third day, etc. The future was made known to John by a series of revelations in the form of seven visions, each being a pair, (1) something taking place in heaven, followed by (2) something taking place on earth. These lead up to the New Creation of Rev. xxi. 1.

It is nowhere hinted that these seven visions of Revelation comprise all that God will do during the Day of the Lord, they are seven vignettes, giving enough information to guide the overcomer whose difficult pathway is under review from Rev. ii. 7 until he is seen inheriting "all things" in Rev. xxi. 7. In like manner, it is nowhere suggested in Gen. i., that God did nothing else on day one, but call light into being and divide the light from the darkness. The complicated inter-relationships of created beings is so vast, that not only pages, but books would have to be written to give in barest outline what God must have wrought between the calling of light into being and the making of Man.

Some godly men of science have spent laborious hours in the endeavour to show that the geological order of creation as set forth by the rocks and fossils of the earth, keeps pace with the order of created beings that is set forth in the six days of Gen. i. This, though well meaning, is labour in vain, partly because of the ever-changing patterns of the universe as it is unfolded to the men of science and partly because no such idea can be found in the record of Gen. i. The simplest explanation of the record of the six days work is that it was a series of six visions granted to Moses, in much the same way as the seven visions of the Revelation were granted to John, and whether it actually took the Lord six days or six ages cannot be proved and does not concern us, so long as we realize the underlying reason for the selection of this number of days that Moses so faithfully records.

The second day is devoted to the making of the "firmament", a word which appears at first sight so unscientific as not to be taken seriously. The translators of the A.V. were influenced by the Latin Vulgate which employed the word firmamentum to translate the Greek word found in the Septuagint, namely stereoma, which in its turn was used to translate the Hebrew word raqia which means "an expanse" as given in the A.V. margin. The verb raqa is translated "spread abroad", "spread out", "stretch out" and in Exod. xxxix. 3 it is translated "beat" in reference to beating out thin plates of gold. Isaiah not only speaks of the heavens that have been "stretched out" (Isa. xlii. 5), but in chapter forty records the purpose for this peculiar work of the second day.

> "That stretcheth out the heavens AS A CURTAIN and spreadeth them out as a TENT TO DWELL IN" (Isa. xl. 22).

The very same word for "tent" is used over and over again by Moses to speak of the tabernacle which he erected in the wilderness. Not only is the heaven which was stretched out over the earth likened to a tent as though God would teach us that the sole purpose of the present heaven and earth was redemptive, we find that according to Job the "foundations" on which the earth rests are "sockets" and identical with the silver sockets upon which the tabernacle rested, and which were made of the redemptive shekels of silver taken from the people (Exod. xxx. 13-16; xxxviii. 25-27). When the redemptive purpose of the ages has been accomplished, the present limited "firmament" will roll together as a scroll (Isa. xxxiv. 4) just before the chaotic condition of Gen. i. 2 is repeated (Isa. xxxiv. 11) as we have already seen in No.3 of this series. The present heavens and earth are to be folded up as a vesture and put aside when their redemptive purpose has been served.

Gen. i. introduces the Jubilee element on the opening page of Scripture, and this feature is enforced by parallel heptads as the following list will show:

DAYS	Seven days of creation, ending in a sabbath of rest (Gen. i. 2, 3).
WEEKS	Seven sabbaths to the morrow. Pentecost (Lev. xxiii. 15, 16).
MONTHS	Seven months complete the festal year (Lev. xxiii. 24-44).
YEARS	Seventh year kept as a sabbath.
JUBILEE	Seven seven years, liberty proclaimed (Lev. xxv. 8-10).
CAPTIVITY	Seventy years, which lead on to the seventy sevens (Dan. ix. 1-23).
PROPHETIC	Seventy sevens, Gentile dominion, Israel's restoration (Dan. ix. 24-27).

It is abundantly evident that the vision given Moses of the six days work and the seventh day's rest of the creation and restoration of the earth as a dwelling-place for man was intended to be typical, setting forth in this first of a series, the redemptive purpose of the ages. The heaven of Gen. i. 1 lies entirely beyond the limits of the firmament of Gen. i. 6 and will never pass away. Through these limited and stretched out heavens the Saviour passed at His ascension (Heb. iv. 14 dierchomai "to pass through"), was made "higher than the heavens" (Heb. vii. 26), and "ascended up far above all heavens" (Eph. iv. 10). These words are emptied of meaning unless we perceive that "far above" the stretched out curtain or firmament, there remains unaltered by the advent of sin and death, the "heaven of heavens" (I Kings viii. 27).

What is the significance of this teaching concerning the present heavens? Because Abraham, Isaac, Jacob looked for a city which hath foundations, they were content to dwell in tabernacles as tent-dwellers, and by so doing declared plainly that they sought a heavenly country (Heb. xi. 9-16). They "sojourned" in the land of promise, the word in both the English and the Greek suggests a temporary residence. "We are strangers before Thee, and sojourners, as were all our fathers: our days on the earth are as a shadow, there is none abiding" (I Chron. xxix. 15). David in Psa. xxxix. 12 says:

> A settler like all my father" (Young's Lit. Trans.).

It is that expression "with Thee" that is so startling. We can understand Abraham and David being sojourners, but in what way was the Lord Himself associated with such a mode of living? Shaken, the word translated "dwell" in Exod. xxv. 8 and Gen. ix. 27 and in Job xviii. 15 means to dwell as in a tent or a tabernacle and consequently, many of the passages which speak of God "dwelling" imply that He too, during the outworking of the purpose of the ages, He too, shares with His redeemed this attitude of heart; He too dwells, as it were in a tent, until the Day of glory dawns, and sorrow and sighing flee away.

Every one of us who have been redeemed, and have consequently set our affection on things above, who look for our equivalent of a heavenly city and heavenly country, every one of us can have the overwhelming joy of knowing that God Himself is with us in our pilgrimage, we are sojourners with Him. This present world is a vast tabernacle, its great purpose is the outworking of God's great redemptive purpose, and when this purpose is achieved, the tabernacle or tent with its sojourning, pilgrimage and limitations, its types, shadows and ceremonial, will give place to fullness and stability when God shall be all in all.

No.6. Adam, Image, Likeness and Dominion.
pp. 144 - 149

The supreme moment in the six days of Gen. i. is when God ceased to say "Let there be", "Let the earth bring forth", "Let the waters bring forth" and when the record suggests a pause and a deliberation.

> "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness" (Gen. i. 26).

With these words uttered at his creation, Adam and his descendants appear to be unique in the universe, for there is not the remotest hint that any creature, anywhere, at any time, angel, principality or power, was ever thus distinguished. The word "image" translates the Hebrew word tselem, and this word is translated in every occurrence but one "image", the exception being Psa. xxxix. 6 "in a vain show", which Rotherham more correctly translates "Surely as a shadow doth every man wander" and if the reader remembers the reference made to the "sojourner" in the preceding article of this series, he will remember that that reference is taken from Psa. xxxix. also. The whole Psalm is written around the transient character of man's earthly life. Tselem "image" is used of the image seen by Nebuchadnezzar in his dream, an image which set forth in symbol the beginning, end and character of Gentile dominion. It may be that there is nothing significant in the fact that the Hebrew word is translated sixteen times "image" and once "vain show", and that the Chaldee word is also translated sixteen times "image" and once "form", the exceptional translation being in Dan. iii. 19 "the form of his visage was changed". The root of the word is tsel, meaning "shadow" and is so translated forty-five times in the O.T. The second term used in Gen. i. 26 "likeness" is the translation of the Hebrew demuth. This word is found in Ezek. i. 8 and 10 where it is used in the description of the cherubim.

For the moment we turn from this subject to consider another, but one that is vitally related, and will prove to be illuminating. That subject is the meaning of the name Adam. The reader of the A.V. may have been led to believe that this word does not occur until we meet in it Gen. ii. 19, but such is not the case. The Hebrew word adam occurs in Gen. i. 26, 27; ii. 5, 7, 8, 15, 16 and 18, where it is translated "man". What is the meaning of the first name given in the Bible? There can be no question but that the names in Scripture often have a significance and particularly so in the early chapters. "Cain" means "gain" and enters into the verb "I have gotten" (Gen. iv. 1). The five other occurrences in Genesis are translated either "purchase" or "bought".

"Seth" means "set" and is translated "appointed" in Gen. iv. 25. The reader who uses Young's "Analytical Concordance", should note that while the index reads "appoint" three times, only two references are given under the Hebrew word sheth, Gen. iv. 25 for some reason being omitted. This is a mistake. Sheth is used in Gen. iv. 25. The translation "set" is found in Gen. xli. 33 and in twenty-two other places. After the fall, Adam called his wife's name Eve, for said he, she was the mother of all living, "in that she was made mother of every one living" (Gen. iii. 20 Rotherham) which suggests that Adam believed the promise made to the woman in Gen. iii. 15, 16. Eve is the English spelling of chavah. It will be remembered that Ezekiel uses the word "image" a number of times when speaking of the cherubim; these he calls "the living creatures" chaivah thirteen times in Ezek. i.-x.

We are glad to learn that Cain, Seth and Eve were names of deep significance, and we also observe that in the very verse where these names first occur, the inspired penman is guided to give the explanation. If Cain, Seth and Eve are of such importance, surely the name given to the first man Adam must be of the greatest significance, yet so far as we can discover on the surface, no explanation is found in the first occurrence of the word, Gen. i. 26. The usual interpretation is that seeing that man was made of the dust of the ground, "ground" being the Hebrew adamah as in Gen. ii. 7, "red earth" is its significance. Truly we are taught that man is of the earth, earthy, we nowhere read that the earth from which we was taken was "red", and so we still return to the first occurrence of the name, and wonder why it should have received no explanation there.

If similarity of sound be sufficient justification for this connexion of Adam with the adamah, and if we find not only similarity of sound but close association with the word "image" and its presence in the very verse in which the word Adam first occurs, then the word translated "likeness" has even greater claim than the remoter adamah had. "Likeness" is derived from the Hebrew word damah, and in the light of the other verses where names are explained upon their first appearance, we believe that Adam was so named, not because he was taken out of "red-earth" but because he was a "shadow", a type, a likeness of Him Who is the true IMAGE OF THE INVISIBLE GOD, Him Who created all things which are in heaven and earth" (Col. i. 15, 16). We learn from Rom. v. 14 that Adam was a "figure of Him that was to come".

By creation man is "the image and glory of God" (I Cor. xi. 7) but this image is, after all, "earthy".

> "The first man is of the earth earthy; the second man is the Lord from heaven . . . . . as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly" (I Cor. xv. 47-49).

Even now, before the day of glory dawns, "we have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him" (Col. iii. 10). Col. i. 16 makes it clear that the Son was the Creator of Gen. i. 26 and that Adam foreshadowed "Him that was to come", "the last Adam".

Returning to Gen. i. 26, we must now consider a little more closely the added clause "after our likeness" (demuth). The LXX Version translates this by kath homoiosin, which we may compare with the Apostle's use of the word when speaking to the Athenians in Acts xvii.:

> "Forasmuch then as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like (homoios) unto gold, silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device" (Acts xvii. 29).

Isaiah also challenges us with the question:

> "To whom then will ye liken (damah, see demuth above) God?" (Isa. xl. 18).

And Ethan says:

> "Who in the heaven can be compared unto the Lord? Who among the sons of the mighty can be likened (damah) unto the Lord?" (Psa. lxxxviii. 6).

Nevertheless it is true that man was made after the likeness of God, and in James iii. we read, concerning the tongue:

> "Therewith bless we God, even the Father; and therewith curse we men, which are made after the similitude (homoioses) of God" (James iii. 9).

The prophet Hosea uses the word damah when speaking of the way in which God had condescended to use figures of speech:

> "I have multiplied visions, and used similitudes by the ministry of the prophets" (Hosea xii. 10).

During His public ministry, the Lord Himself used many similitudes. For example:

> "The kingdom of heaven is like (homoios) unto treasure" (Matt. xiii. 44).
> "Unto what is the kingdom of God like?" (Luke xiii. 18).
> "Whereunto shall I liken this generation?" (Matt. xi. 16).

Man is to God what a figure of speech is to thought, a symbol, an analogy, a type.

When Nebuchadnezzar saw in a dream the successive kingdoms of Gentile rule in the form of an image, neither he nor Daniel ever imagined that such kingdoms were actually like the image itself, but simply that this image and its peculiar construction "shadowed forth" in symbol the moral characteristics of the kingdom concerned. So, in Gen. i. 26, there is no question of external resemblance. Whether seen in the frail type of Adam, or in the glorious person of the Son of God, the "image and likeness" are never to be understood as physical. The Saviour Himself taught that God is spirit, that no man has ever seen His shape. It is true that He declared that "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father", but no one with any understanding of the word would think that He intended physical likeness here. The Father was set forth in the life and character of the "Word made flesh", but the Father was not "like" the physical form which the Lord took when He was “found in fashion as a man”. So, in connexion with Adam, the “image” and “likeness” have reference to what is moral and mental.

How far, and in what direction, was Adam intended to shadow forth God Himself? How far was he, as a creature, able to represent Deity? What limits can be set? The reader will no doubt be acquainted with the two extreme answers to these questions. There are some who will not allow the image and likeness to be anything more than physical, while there are others who would deduce from this passage the inherent immortality of the soul. The truth lies mid-way between the two extremes, and is associated with the words that follow referring to image and likeness.

> “And God said, LET US make man in OUR image, after OUR likeness; and LET THEM have dominion” (Gen. i. 26).

We have seen that the name “Adam” is similar to the Hebrew word for “likeness”. This “likeness” was expressed in the “dominion” which was originally conferred upon man. When sin entered into the world, however, resulting in a curse upon the earth, his dominion over the lower creatures was impaired. When Noah, whom we can regard as a sort of second Adam, steps out of the ark into a new world, and the word “dominion” is no longer used, and “the fear of you and the dread of you” takes its place (Gen. ix. 2). Man, however, is still looked upon as being “in the image of God” (Gen. ix. 6), and “in the likeness of God” (James iii. 9).

The dominion that was given to Adam was:

> “over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth” (Gen. i. 26).

This dominion was a “shadow” of the greater dominion that was to be exercised by Christ, the true Image of God, and is even included in the dominion given to Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. ii. 38). David, in the eighth Psalm, sees something of this, and the apostle Paul in the N.T. completes the story:

> “When I consider Thy heavens, the work of Thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which Thou hast ordained; What is man, that Thou art mindful of him, and the son of man, that Thou visitest him? For Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honour. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of Thy hands; Thou hast put all things under his feet: All sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field; the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas” (Psa. viii. 3-8).

If we turn to the Epistle to the Hebrews, we shall see that Adam foreshadowed Christ. The Creator of Gen. i. 26 is addressed in Psa. viii., and the Psalmist says that “the heavens are the work of Thy fingers”. Unless we are willing to quibble over the difference between “fingers” and “hands”, it is clear that Christ is the Creator in Whose image and likeness Adam was created, for in Heb. i. we read:

> “And Thou Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundations of the earth: and the heavens are the works of Thine hands” (Heb. i. 10).

From Heb. i. we proceed to Heb. ii., where we have Psa. viii. quoted, with the comment:

> "For in that He put all in subjection under Him, He left nothing that is not put under Him" (Heb. ii. 8).

This shows that we have passed from the type, whose dominion was over sheep and oxen, to the Antitype, Whose dominion is over all. The apostle continues:

> "But now we see not yet all things put under Him. But we see Jesus, Who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour; that He by the grace of God should taste death for every man" (Heb. ii. 8, 9).

This dominion, of which Adam's "likeness" was but a faint shadow, is further expanded in Eph. i., where we reach the zenith of the revelation of "the mystery of Christ". In this epistle we are concerned with that section of the "all things" that is associated with the exalted sphere where Christ sitteth "far above all heavens" (Eph. iv. 10). And so we read, in chapter one:

> "He raised Him from the dead, and set Him at His own right hand in the heavenly places, far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this age, but also in that which is to come; and hath put all things under His feet, and gave Him to be Head over all things to the church, which is His body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 20-23).

With this rapid glance at the relationship between this "dominion" and "mystery", let us turn now to I Cor. xv., to see one further application of the passage:

> "Then cometh the end, when He shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when He shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. For He must reign, till He hath put all enemies under His feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For He hath put all things under His feet. But when He saith all things are put under Him, it is manifested that He is excepted, which did put all things under Him. And when all things shall be subdued unto Him, then shall the Son also Himself be subject unto Him that put all things under Him, that God may be all in all" (I Cor. xv. 24-28).

This goal of the ages is the fulfillment of the pledge shadowed forth in the creation of Adam.

We must now turn to Gen. i. 26, in order to investigate what is actually implied by the word "dominion". There are various possible alternatives that are not used in this passage. The word used here is not baal, "to have dominion as lord and proprietor" (Isa. xxvi. 13), or mashal, "to reign as a governor, or a superior" (Judges xiv. 4), or shalat "to rule" (Psa. cxix. 133), but radah, "to tread down, to subdue". The following are three passages in which this particular word occurs:

> "They that hate you shall reign over you" (Lev. xxvi. 17).
> "With force and cruelty have ye ruled" (Ezek. xxxiv. 4).
> "Rule thou in the midst of thine enemies" (Psa. cx. 2).

These references indicate something of the nature of this particular type of dominion, and particularly the passage from Psa. cx., which is Messianic and speaks of the Day of the Lord. The Psalm goes on to speak of the Lord "striking through kings", "filling places with dead bodies" and "wounding the heads over many countries" (Psa. cx. 5, 6). This conception of dominion is carried over into verse twenty-eight of Gen. i. where we read:

> "Replenish the earth and subdue it."

The word "subdue" is a translation of the Hebrew kabash, and its significance may be gathered from the fact that its substantival form means a "footstool" (II Chron. ix. 18). In Neh. v. 5 it is rendered "to bring into bondage"; and it is the word used by the King when he exclaims of Haman, "will he force the Queen?" (Est. vii. 8). The word is also used of the conquest of Canaan under Joshua (Josh. xviii. 1), a subjugation whose rigour there is no need to quote chapter and verse to prove. The LXX translates the word "subdue" by katakurieuo, meaning "to rule imperiously", "to lord it over", "to get the mastery". Its occurrences in the N.T. will give further light on its meaning:

> "Ye know that the princes of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them" (Matt. xx. 25; Mark x. 42).
>
> "The man in whom the evil spirit was, leaped on them, and overcame them, and prevailed against them" (Acts xix. 16).
> "Neither as being lords over God's heritage" (I Pet. v. 3).

The creation of Adam, his very name, and the dominion given to him, all foreshadowed the subduing of all enemies beneath the feet of the Lord Jesus Christ. An enemy is most certainly in view in Gen. i. 26-28, and in chapter three he is revealed. He is "that old serpent, called the Devil and Satan" (Rev. xii. 9).

No.7. The essential difference between a mechanical and a moral creation. Gen. i. and ii.

pp. 228 - 231

The name of God in Gen. i. is the Hebrew word Elohim, a plural word, yet followed by a singular verb, a feature which demands a separate study. The name of God in chapter two is "The Lord God", in Hebrew, Jehovah Elohim. In Gen. i., under the title "God" we have creation. In Gen. ii., under the title "The Lord God", we have purpose, and we pass from creation in general to the story of a responsible creature, man. All creation is "held", but man is "held accountable", in other words man is not a mechanical creation, obeying the laws of God as do the sun, moon stars and tides, but is a moral creature, who can be addressed, promised, warned, rewarded or punished. Should there be any aberration of the sun or the moon, such could by no means be termed "sin", but any departure from obedience on the part of man is sin. The nature of creation is seen in the words used at its inception:

"For He spake, and it was done; He commanded, and it stood fast" (Psa. xxxiii. 9).

This is seen to be true in Gen. i. "And God said, Let there be light, and there was light" (Gen. i. 3).

At the close of the record of the second day we read "and it was so". Again and again we get the phrase "and it was good". Light is good, but light here is not moral but physical. The gathering of the waters, the growth of grass, herb and tree, the rule of sun, moon and stars, the creation of sea monsters and creeping things are called "good", but not in the moral sense. It is inconceivable that the dry land could or would refuse to "appear", it is outrageous to think of either rewarding the sun when it shines, or of punishing the moon when the sun is eclipsed. Here in Gen. i. we have a mechanical and physical creation, but with the advent of man, the moral element enters, and with the moral comes the contingent "IF". It would have been impossible without altering the nature of man for such words as "it was so" to have followed the command concerning the tree of the knowledge of good and evil; man's obedience was not inevitable. As a creature man was pronounced "good" (Gen. i. 31), but whether he would "do good" could not be ascertained apart from trial and proof. Moral good cannot be ready made, it must be acquired.

There were three ways in which evil could have been prevented:

(1) God could have created a being who was incapable of sinning. Had He done so, the creature thus formed could never have risen above the level of a brute beast. His actions would have been governed by the promptings of instinct, and would have had no moral value.

(2) God could have created a being capable of sinning, and yet have kept him from all possible internal and external temptation. Had man been thus formed and hedged about, he would have remained innocent, but would never have been upright. He would have been as innocent as an animal is innocent, but could never have been upright as a man can be upright.

(3) God could have created man, and allowed temptation, and yet have prevented him yielding to it. If this had been done, the very act would have destroyed the moral nature that had been formed. Enforced goodness, coerced love, compulsory worship are contradictions. Goodness, love and worship are emptied of their essential meaning the moment the principle of compulsion enters. God can create innocent beings, but in the very nature of things, the creation of a virtuous character or a ready-made righteousness is impossible. A virtuous character cannot be bestowed by Divine fiat.

This leads us to the vexed subject, the Tree of the knowledge of good and evil. In the first place it must be remembered that it is not "good and evil" that were open to Adam and Eve, but "the knowledge of good and evil". Now it is affirmed in Gen. iii. that God said man has become "as one of us, to know good and evil" (Gen. iii. 22) and in Heb. v. 14 we find such knowledge commended and indeed desirable in those who were "perfect" or adult, as contrasted with those who were but "babes". Adam was a babe so far as experience was concerned, and to acquire an adult's knowledge with a babe's experience was fatal. Man was made "for a little, lower than the angels", though destined to be "above" them. To attempt to penetrate into the realm of the spirit before the right time, resolves itself into witchcraft and spiritism, and to attempt to grasp universal knowledge while still a babe is equally disastrous. It may include the ability to split the atom, but may also lead to self destruction. Man will one day "know, even as he is known", but he must be willing to wait God's time.

The same thing is true with regard to the kingdoms of the world. It is the revealed purpose of God that, when the seventh angel sounds, the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ (Rev. xi. 15). On the other hand, for the Lord to have yielded to the temptation of the Evil One, to grasp this sovereignty before the appointed time, would have been the same in principle as the act which brought about the downfall of Adam. Where however man failed, in a garden of plenty, the Lord triumphed in a wilderness of want (Matt. iv. 8, 9).

A knowledge of good and evil really comprises the whole realm of knowledge. He who knows all good and all evil, knows all things. This was evidently understood in O.T. times, as the language of the woman of Tekoah indicates:

> "As an angel of God, so is my lord the king to discern good and bad" (II Sam. xiv. 17).
> "My lord is wise, according to the wisdom of an angel of God, to know all things that are in the earth" (II Sam. xiv. 20).

Comparing the two passages, we see that "good and bad" and "all things on the earth" are synonymous. Isa. xlv. 7 is often misquoted, as though it taught that God was the Author of moral evil. The passage reads "I make peace, and create evil", and not "I make GOOD and Create EVIL". The opposition of "peace" and "evil" here fixes the meaning we must attach to the word "evil".

There is a tendency with most of us to read the words of Gen. ii. as though they emphasized evil, the passage reading: "the knowledge of good and evil", or even "the knowledge of evil". We must remember, however, that the tree represented both good as well as evil. "Good" out of place, and before its time, can be definitely harmful. Marriage, for example, is "honourable in all" but that which is most blessed within the limitation of the marriage bond, is itself a sin if entered into apart from those Divinely appointed limits. Again we observe that "good" and "evil" are not things in themselves, but terms which refer to the actions of particular people.

We will conclude by giving, in the form of a table, a list of some of the characteristics that distinguish the sphere of mechanical determinism from that of moral accountability.

CREATION (Mechanical)	CREATION (Moral)
Title: God.	Title: Lord God.
Pronouncement: "It was so."	Pronouncement: "Thou shalt not."
Created things "good".	Moral creatures "tested".
Created things "held".	Moral creatures "held responsible".
No option.	Freedom of choice.
Things or animals.	Persons.
Sin not possible.	Sin possible.
Faith and love impossible.	Faith and love possible.
No fellowship.	Fellowship.
"Let there be light."	"Let us make man."

No.55. GALATIANS.
The argument for faith without works (ii. 15 - 20).
pp. 17 - 20

Having seen the structure of Gal. ii. 15 - iv. 12 as a whole, we return to the personal testimony of Paul, which he made at Antioch and recorded in Gal. ii. 15-20.

It will be necessary to examine with some care both the terms and the arguments which the Apostle used, for in this most personal testimony is enshrined the "Truth of the Gospel", together with the question of the Apostle's own personal integrity which was so much at stake in those early days of witness. First of all let us consider the general outline of the subject.

A | 15. Not sinners of the Gentiles.
B | 16-17. | a | "Knowing." Justification by faith asserted.
b | "Believed." Justification by faith. Gospel.
a | "For." Justification by faith confirmed by O.T.
b | "While." Justification by faith sought.
A | 17. We ourselves are found sinners.
B | 17-20. | Peter's action. |
a | Is Christ minister of sin?
b | God forbid.
b | If build again.
a | I make myself transgressor.
Paul's testimony. |
c | I, through law, to law died.
d | Dead to law.
e | Live unto God.
c | I, crucified with Christ.
d | Christ liveth in me.
e | I live by faith of Son of God.

The Apostle approaches his argument by way of privilege. He contrasts "Jews by nature" with "sinners of the Gentiles".

Israel were called "the natural branches" of the Olive, and the inclusion of the Gentile was compared to a grafting a tree wild "by nature" and "contrary to nature" (Rom. xi. 21, 24). The Gentile is referred to as having "not the law by nature" (Rom. ii. 14), and as "the uncircumcision by nature" (ii. 27).

As compared with the Jew and his religious privileges the Gentiles were called "sinners". In the gospel according to Matthew, we read "The Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners" (xxvi. 45) which in Luke xviii. 32 reads "He shall be delivered unto the Gentiles". Luke vi. 33 reads "for sinners also do even the same". So, too, the expression "publicans and sinners", indicating the thought that any one who had sunk so low as to collect taxes for an heathen government had sunk to the level of the Gentiles and had forfeited the high privileges which he had as a "Jew by nature". In Phil. iii. Paul gives some idea of what ground of boasting a Jew had "in the flesh", which he himself had cast away as worth nothing, to be "found in Christ, not having mine own righteousness which is of the law.

It is evident therefore that in this argument with Peter, Paul is not using the title "sinners" in the universal and doctrinal sense, but is adopting the current Jewish reference to the Gentiles. This we must not forget when we meet the word again in Gal. ii. 17, otherwise the point of Paul's argument will be lost.

At first reading, there is a deal of repetition in verse sixteen that makes the public reading of this verse something of a test, and its analysis calls for care.

We have suggested in the structure that the references to being "justified" divide into four links in the chain of argument.

(1) We, that is both Peter and Paul, know that a man is not justified except (ean me) through faith. Justification by works of law has already been set aside as hopeless and impossible.

(2) This is evident from the fact that "even we" believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by faith, and not by works of law.

(3) The next clause would be an unmeaning repetition unless the Apostle is seen to be reinforcing his own argument by a free citation of scripture. The introductory "for" dioti suggests a quotation, as does the Hebraism ou pasa "not all". The same citation is found in Rom. iii. 20; and Psa. cxliii. 2 seems to have become the basis of a maxim, a quasi-proverb, that could be cited to clinch an argument.

With these three steps in the argument solidly placed and impossible of denial, Paul proceeds to his conclusion:

(4) "But." The de here is both adversative and logical. A contrast is now to be instituted. If what has been said is true, if we Jews have believed in Christ in order to be justified, if after all, if seeking thus to be justified by Christ, we ourselves are "found sinners" then the conclusion is inevitable, "Christ is the minister of sin". Such a thought however is intolerable—away with such an idea, the thought is profane. Our guilt lies not in abounding the law as a means of life and righteousness, our guilt lies in seeking it afresh and using it to supplement the gracious work of Christ.

If we keep in mind the opening words of Gal. ii. 15 and remember that a "Jew by nature" was one who, through circumcision and the observance of the Mosaic ritual, believed that he had acquired merit in the sight of God, while the rest of the world had no interest in the promises, covenants or fathers, and were indeed "sinners of the Gentiles", we shall be better able to appreciate the conclusion found in Gal. ii. 17.

If we ourselves, then (as Peter's attitude seemed to suggest), through the desire of ceremonial observance become no better than "sinners" (and this we must be if circumcision by indispensable to salvation), what must be the inference? It must be that Christ, in Whose name we have thus acted and believed, by ridding us of this incubus of ceremonial law has but brought us to the level of the uncircumcised, unsaved, sinner of the Gentiles!

Paul as we know from similar argument in Rom. vi. and vii. cannot long dwell upon the fallacy which he would expose. Passing from the use of "we", the Apostle gives his own personal testimony and the uses the pronoun "I" which Peter is invited to apply to his own case.

> "For if I build again the things which I destroyed, I make myself a transgressor" (Gal. ii. 18).

It may be useful at this point to draw attention to the fact that while in the Apostle's statement of the truth, the great doctrine of justification by faith is uppermost, it must be remembered that the conflict between the apostles was not so much the question of justification by faith, but the defence of the Apostle's own character, commission and independent message that is prominent.

> "The things which I pulled down" Ha katelusa.

The charge against Stephen, which the converted persecutor Saul, so soon had to meet was:

> "We have heard him say, that this Jesus of Nazareth shall destroy (kataluo) this place, and shall change the customs which Moses delivered us" (Acts vi. 14).

Where there is "no law" there can be "no transgression of the law" (Rom. iv. 15); and if the law be revived, then there must come about a revival of transgression, and so, said Paul, I shall constitute or commit myself of being a transgressor.

The sacrificial death of Christ is the one unanswerable rejoinder of the Apostle to each and every attack upon the believer's perfect emancipation by faith. This can be seen in other epistles beside Galatians. Does the objector bring forward the specious plea "shall we continue in sin that grace may abound?" The Apostle does not enter into a lengthy disquisition, he cuts the false argument short with his "God forbid. How shall we, that are DEAD to sin, LIVE any longer therein?" (Rom. vi. 2).

Does his Jewish objector look upon the giving up of the law of Moses for the faith of the gospel as a kind of spiritual adultery? The Apostle meets the objection by saying "for the woman which hath an husband is bound by the law to her husband so long as he liveth, but if the husband be dead, she is loosed from the law of her husband . . . . . Wherefore, my brethren, ye also are become DEAD to the law by the body of Christ: that ye should be married to another, even to Him Who is raised from the dead" (Rom. vii. 2-4).

The conversion of Saul of Tarsus was no mere change of creed or change of opinion, it was a matter of death, followed by a new life.

This being the basic doctrine of the Apostle's preaching, it is not surprising that he discontinues the line of argument started in the fifteenth verse, and stakes his all on the death of Christ, and his own death as reckoned in Him:

> "For I through the law am dead to the law, that I might live unto God" (Gal. ii. 19).

The word "law" is the Greek nomos, which occurs many times in Paul's epistles, sometimes with the article "the" and sometimes anarthrous, or without the article "the". Here in Gal. ii. 19 both occurrences are anarthrous and should read "For I through law, to law died". Nomos with the article represents a specific code of laws, like for example "the law of Moses" and "the laws of Khammarabi". Nomos without the article represents the idea of obligation arising out of law.

In what way could Paul say that "through (the instrumentality of) law, he had died to law"? The best answer is found in the verse that immediately follows, read in the light of Gal. iii. 13:

> "I am crucified with Christ . . . . . Who loved me, and gave Himself for me" (Gal. ii. 20).
> "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us; for it is written, Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree" (Gal. iii. 13).

In some wonderful way Paul realized that the law had been honoured, its curse endured and removed, and that though he personally had been mute and helpless, while the Son of God undertook his complete redemption, yet in the marvelous provision of grace, when Christ died the just for the unjust, he, Paul, had been reckoned to have died too. This matter is so vital, so near the heart of the gospel, so closely related to the whole scheme of redeeming love, that we cannot feel that the closing paragraphs of an article are the proper place for its discussion. We will carry this introductory part of Paul's argument with us when we resume our studies in the next number of this series.

The preceding article "Emmanuel God with us" (Emmanuel38, pages 24, 25) was written some years after this present series, and without conscious pre-arrangement takes up this important subject "reckoning", which we commend to the quickened understanding of the reader.

No.56. GALATIANS.
The Cross, Life and Law (ii. 19, 20).
pp. 29 - 32

We have considered the first part of Paul's argument with Peter upon the defection of the latter at Antioch, and reach the point where Paul gives his own personal testimony to clinch the matter and place it beyond dispute.

> "I through law, to law, died, that I might live unto God" (Gal. ii. 19).

How Paul died both "through" law and "to" law is not stated in so many words, but the subject is most evidently continued and expanded in the subsequent verse, which we now proceed to examine.

> "I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, Who loved me, and gave Himself for me" (Gal. ii. 20).

In the first place, let us attempt a more literal translation of this passage in order that we may build on a good foundation. The apostle is most evidently moved by the solemnity of his subject when he penned these words, for he throws them into a form, named Epanadiplosis on Encircling, thereby giving completeness to the statement, and suggesting by the opening and closing members of the circle the most important feature. This is how the passage appears to the Greek reader:

> "CHRIST, I have been crucified-together-with, yet I live: and yet it is no longer I that live, but, in me, CHRIST."

In the next place we must draw attention to the verb "to be crucified with". In the A.V. it is cast in the present tense "I am crucified with Christ", whereas the original uses the perfect tense "I have been crucified with Christ".

There are three primary modes of indicating time—present, past, and future—and any action can only be regarded as having happened in one or the other of these three modes. Moreover every action may be (1) finished or perfect, (2) going on, or unfinished and imperfect, and (3) indefinite.

The verb sunestauromai is in the perfect or finished tense, and should be translated "I have been crucified with". The thing has been done, gloriously, blessedly, finished, and the perfect or finished tense together with the Epanadiplosis of the title "Christ" is no small part of the apostle's conclusive argument.

Alford punctuates the passage thus:

> "I have been crucified with Christ but it is no longer I that live but (it is) Christ that liveth in me" and comments that the punctuation as in the A.V. "is altogether wrong".

Gwynne's comment here, however, is salutary:

> "In sense varying immaterially from the received construction, it presents a pleasing parallelism to the ear, but dearly purchased at the expense of the old familiar paradox 'I am crucified with Christ nevertheless I live' which bears so unmistakeably the impress of Pauline antithesis, see II Cor. viii.-x." And of Alford's pronouncement he adds: "It requires something more than mere assertion to sustain the allegation."

The R.V. adopts the following punctuation in the text: "I have been crucified with Christ; yet I live; and yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me", and in the margin gives the alternative "Or, and is no longer I that live, but Christ, &c."

The reader will see that whatever punctuation is adopted, the sense remains practically the same, and we therefore, while taking note of these variations, shall continue to use the A.V.

Stauroo "to crucify" is used in Galatians three times (iii. 1; v. 24; vi. 14), once of Christ, Who, said the apostle, had been evidently set forth crucified among them, and twice of the believer, of whom he says that they have crucified the flesh, and to whom the world was crucified. Three times, the cross itself, stauros, is mentioned (v. 11; vi. 12, 14); speaking of "the offence" and "persecution" which attached to it, and the only ground of "boasting" which Paul left to him.

Sustauroo "to crucify with" occurs in Gal. ii. 20 and in Rom. vi. 6, elsewhere only in the Gospels, Matt. xxvii. 44, Mark xv. 32 and John xix. 32. We shall gain light on Paul's reference in Gal. ii. 20 by considering the teaching both of Rom. vi. and of the Gospels.

Rom. vi. and vii. contain many expression and follow much the same argument as is compressed into Gal. ii. 15-20. In Rom. vi. it is the "old man" that was crucified with Christ, so that the body of sin should be rendered inoperative, and that henceforth the believer should not serve sin. These words illuminate the language of Gal. ii. 20, "I have been crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live".

Moreover, Paul had said "I through the law, to law died", and in Rom. vi. 7 he writes: "For he that is dead is freed from sin", and it is the recognition of an important piece of doctrine to note that the word "freed" is dedikaiotai "hath been justified". Death has vindicated the law and settled its claims. The references to sustauroo in the Gospels relate to the thieves who were crucified with Christ on Calvary.

> "The thieves also, which were crucified with Him, cast the same in His teeth" (Matt. xxvii. 44).
> "And they that were crucified with Him reviled Him" (Mark xv. 32).
>
> "Then came the soldiers, and brake the legs of the first, and of the other which was crucified with Him" (John xix. 32).

Luke does not use the word, although he records the fact that there were malefactors "one on the right hand, and the other on the left" (Luke xxiii. 33). Luke's contribution however is of far deeper import than merely to record the literal physical fact of crucifixion, he enables us to hear the confession of one of those thus "crucified with" Christ:

> "Dost not thou fear God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation? And we indeed justly: for we receive the due reward of our deeds; but this man hath done nothing amiss" (Luke xxiii. 40, 41).

These words let light in upon the doctrinal intention in the words "crucify with" as used by Paul. Paul as much as said, I too, like that malefactor recognize two facts: (1) that I was condemned by the law, and merited death; this curse of a broken law is set forth under the Hebrew judgment of "hanging on a tree" (Gal. iii. 13); (2) I also recognize that Christ had done "nothing amiss", that He was indeed without sin and perfectly righteous. Consequently I saw with rapturous faith that "the Son of God had loved me, and given Himself for me". I realized that He had not only died "for" me as my Substitute, but that by the gracious reckoning of God, I can now be looked upon as having died in my Substitute, that I can indeed take to myself in a sense unknown before the words "crucify with", and have passed for ever out of the dominion both of sin and law, to find my life in Christ Who died form me. "So far as I now live in the flesh, it is a life of faith" (Lightfoot). The "now" is not used here to indicate a contrast with present life on earth, and future life in glory, but rather a contrast between the old life, the old man, the ego of Rom. vii. 14, and the newness of life, the new man, the ego of Rom. vii. 25 (see also Rom. vi. 4).

All now depends upon the Son of God. The faith of the Son of God refers to His faithfulness, not merely the believer's faith in Him. Faith "in Christ, must be distinguished from the faith "of" Christ, the one refers to the believer's exercise of faith in the person and work of the Saviour, the other refers to the faithfulness unto death and beyond that is the sure anchor of all our hopes. This matter is of sufficient importance to demand our most earnest attention.

"The faith of Christ." The usual interpretation makes the faith of Jesus Christ nothing more than the believer's faith in Him. That something is wrong with such an interpretation is manifest the moment we attempt to introduce it into the Scriptures. For example who would tolerate such a rendering of Rom. iii. 21, 22 that read:

> "The righteousness of God has been manifested through the believer's faith in Jesus Christ"?

Both in Rom. iii. 22 and 26 this aspect of faith is found. The second reference hides it under the translation "him which believeth in Jesus". The near context provides a proof of the translation suggested, for in Rom. iv. 12 "the faith of our father Abraham" can by no stretch of imagination mean the believer's faith in Abraham.

The word translated "faith" in these passages is pistis. In the LXX of Hab. ii. 4 "the just shall live by faith" the Greek word pistis is used to translate the Hebrew emunah. This Hebrew word and its cognate amanah often mean "faithfulness" as for example:

"His righteousness and His faithfulness" (I Sam. xxvi. 23).
"The men did the work faithfully" (II Chron. xxxiv. 12).
"All His works are done in truth" (Psa. xxxiii. 4).

The "faith of God" (Rom. iii. 3) is practically synonymous with "the truth of God" (iii. 7) and shows that Paul retained the Hebrew meaning of the word. In Gal. iii. 22 we have the two expressions used together:

> "In order that the promise out of the faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe."

The context speaks of another possible source, ek nomon "out of law" (Gal. iii. 21). But righteousness cannot arise "out of law", it can only arise "out of the faith of Jesus Christ". His faith and faithfulness, not my belief in Him, is the one great foundation of the gift of righteousness.

So in Gal. ii. 20, the apostle's new life as well as the free justification he had received, originated and was sustained by the faith and faithfulness of his Substitute and Surety, or as he so feelingly puts it "The Son of God, Who loved me and gave Himself for me".

> "Nevertheless I live: yet not I, but Christ liveth in me, and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God Who loved me and gave Himself for me."

Paul who could say "I have been crucified with Christ" could nevertheless affirm that he lived. The words "Yet not I" refer not to Paul absolutely in himself, or to Paul relatively as distinct from others, but to Paul naturally, the old man, the descendant of Adam, the breaker of law. He still had to live "in the flesh" though he no longer was under any obligation to walk after the flesh.

Sarx "flesh" has a variety of meanings, each of which must be decided by the context. "Flesh and blood" (Gal. i. 16) is repudiated, "no flesh shall be justified" (ii. 16) gathers up into itself all human nature, "Are ye now made perfect by the flesh" (iii. 3), refers to the activities of a carnal chimerical religion; "infirmity of the flesh" (iv. 13) makes reference to the mortal nature of the apostle. Here, in Gal. ii. 20 "the life which I now live in the flesh" does not stress mortality, carnal religion or mere human nature, it is a way of indicating the present, transitory life, lived here under similar conditions and limitations as before, but now activated by a new power "Christ liveth in me". "I live by the faith of the Son of God."

No.57. GALATIANS.
Structure and Argument of the Section (ii. 21 - iii. 7).
pp. 67 - 69

The structure of the epistle to the Galatians reveals a large member covering ii. 15 - iv. 12, of which the present smaller section ii. 21 - iii. 7 now falls to be examined.

In the structure of ii. 15 - iv. 12 this section is found to be in correspondence with another, and this we will lift out and display here:

B | ii. 21 - iii. 7. | d | Atheteo. Frustrate.
e | Ei gar. For if righteousness come by law.

* * * * * * *

B | iii. 15-21. | d | Atheteo. Disannul.
e | Ei gar. For if law could give life.

While the second member iii. 15-21 must be considered together with its context in the orderly exposition of the epistle, it is important to observe this recurring note. The apostle is keenly aware of the objections that would be made against the free salvation which he preached and taught, objections that found an expression in the accusation against Stephen (Acts vi. 13, 14), and later were to be laid to the apostle's account also (Acts xxi. 21). Neither the grace of God, nor the promise of God can be frustrated or disannulled, neither can the law provide righteousness nor life. Let us therefore with these points or correspondence in mind return to the section ii. 21 - iii. 7 to acquaint ourselves more intimately with its teaching. Before we attempt any detailed examination of this section, let us note the structural outline.

A | ii. 21. Righteousness not by law. |
a | Frustrate.
b | Grace.
b | Righteousness.
a | In Vain.
B | iii. 1-5. | c1 | y | Foolish.
z | Received ye the spirit.
d1 | By works of law.
e1 | Or by hearing of faith.
c | Foolish.
d | Begun in spirit.
e | Perfected in flesh.
c2 | y | In vain.
z | Ministry of the spirit.
d2 | By works of law.
e2 | Or by hearing of faith.
A | iii. 6, 7. Righteousness comes by faith. |
a | Abraham.
b | Righteousness.
b | Children.
a | Abraham.

> "I do not frustrate the grace of God: for if righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain" (Gal. ii. 21).

The word translated "frustrated" atheteo, is composed of a the negative, and thetos "placed" from tithemi "to place". In a mild form this word is used in the sense of "despising" or "rejecting" persons (Matt. vi. 24; Luke x. 16; John xii. 48; I Thess. iv. 8; Jude 8), the fuller sense of nullify, abolish or abrogate is seen in the noun form athetesis (Heb. vii. 18; ix. 26), where it is used of the abrogation of the law and of the sin offering. In both instances, something else that takes its place is in view. In Heb. vii. it is the oath that appointed Christ a priest after the order of Melchisedec, and not the carnal commandment that appointed the priests after the order of Aaron, and in the ninth chapter it is the abrogation of the sin offering by reason of the once offered sacrifice of Christ. In Gal. ii. 21 the sense is to nullify, bring to nothing (I Cor. i. 19) the grace of God.

What is here intended by the expression "the grace of God"? Reading the entire verse we observe that the death of Christ is substituted for the grace of God. The evil which the apostle here condemned "frustrated" the grace of God, and proved that the death of Christ was "in vain".

There is what is known as "a suppressed premise" in this verse, which can be supplied as follows:

> "I do not nullify the grace of God, which I should do, did I attempt to justify myself by legal works, for if righteousness come by the law, then Christ died in vain."

"In vain" is not a good rendering of dorean, for to say that Christ died "in vain" really intimates that his death was "ineffectual", whereas the intention of the apostle is to give the impression that Christ would have died "unnecessarily".

> "I say ouk atheto, for it is an immediate inference, that if the law had been the medium of dikaiosune, Christ's death would have been purposeless" (Ellicott).

Dorean "in vain" is from dorea a gift as in Rom. v. 15. In the adverbial form, the form in which it is used in Gal. ii. 21, it means (1) in a good sense, "freely", "gratis", as in Rom. iii. 24 and (2) in a bad sense "undeservedly", "without cause", "gratuitously", as in John xv. 25.

Calvin's comment on this passage is worth recording:

> "If we could produce a righteousness of our own, then Christ hath suffered in vain; for the intention of His sufferings was to procure it for us; and what need was there that a work which we could accomplish for ourselves should be obtained from another? If the death of Christ be our redemption, then were we captives—if it be satisfaction, we were debtors—if it be atonement, we were guilty—if it be cleansing, we were unclean. On the other hand, he who ascribes to works his sanctification, pardon, atonement, righteousness or deliverance, makes void the death of Christ."

To which quotation we might add that of Theodoret who said:

"The death of Christ was superfluous, if the law is sufficient for justification."

The argument which has been put forward in the first person now ceases, and the apostle addresses the Galatians direct. Notice this use of the pronoun "I" in verses 19-21.

> "Thus St. Paul courteously uses the first person I instead of the second thou, and with that delicate refinement and consummate skill of which he is master, leaves St. Peter to adopt his words and apply them to himself" (Wordsworth).

With the opening of the third chapter the apostle addresses himself to the main purpose of his epistle. Up till now, he has not directly established the doctrine of justification by grace through faith, but has devoted his attention to the vindication of his apostleship and the authority and nature of his gospel. The way is now cleared for the definite enunciation of the gospel way of righteousness which this epistle was written to show, and with the preparation provided by these studies as a background we hope to take up the main argument of this epistle in our next article.

No.58. (16) GALATIANS.
Galatians ii. 21 - iii. 7.
"Jesus Christ . . . crucified" (iii. 1).
pp. 92 - 95

With the closing verse of Gal. ii., the apostle leaves behind the personal approach to his great theme, and addresses himself to proof. He had vindicated his apostleship, he had shown that those who seemed to be pillars at Jerusalem were compelled to admit his claims and endorse the gospel which he preached among the Gentiles, he shows that Peter was in the wrong when he acted as he did at Antioch under pressure of the Circumcision, and had concluded by giving his own personal testimony.

With the opening of Gal. iii. "he enters upon a course of reasoning as close, as logical, and as conclusive as is to be met with in the works of the most metaphysical of modern writers" (Gwynne). "O foolish Galatians." To address the inhabitants of Phrygia and Iconium as "Galatians" is to take the Roman point of view. "The very fact that only Romans or person speaking decidedly and pointedly from the Roman point of view employed the name in that sense . . . . . the 'men of the Province of Galatia' are, therefore, those who desire education, who have shaken off the numbing and degrading influence of magic and superstition . . . . . who lay claim to insight and noesis. There is a telling innuendo in the juxtaposition anoetoi Galatia, 'you who are showing yourselves devoid of noesis' 'Galatae who fail the first characteristic of Galatae'." (Ramsay).

This suggestion is put into plain language in Gal. iv. 9-11, which the structure places in correspondence with the argument of Gal. ii. 15-20. Did the apostle open his argument with these believers who were so dear to him, with the somewhat rude and brutal word "stupid"? "Even could it be proved that the Galatians were a stupid people, insult we cannot imagine to have been intended by the apostle" (Bloomfield). There are at least four ways of calling a person a "fool" in N.T. Greek, and each one has its own significance. Had Paul wished to be rude he could have called these beloved saints of God "morons" (Matt. v. 22), a word that has passed into our own vocabulary. He could have called them "senseless" and used the word aphron as he did in I Cor. xv. 36. He could have implied that they were lacking in wisdom and used asophos as in Eph. v. 15, but he uses none of these terms. He chose the same epithet that was employed by the Saviour in Luke xxiv. 25 when it was evident that "their understanding" needed to be opened (Luke xxiv. 45).

Anoetos the word used in Gal. iii. 1 means "thoughtless", being made up of a the negative and noeo "to understand" (Eph. iii. 4); "to perceive" (Mark viii. 17) and "consider" (II Tim. ii. 7); which in turn is derived from nous "the mind" (I Cor. ii. 16); and "understanding" (Luke xxiv. 45).

Dr. Bullinger in his Lexicon explains anoetos as "unreflecting, never applying the nous (mind) to moral or religious truth" which is similar to Ellicott's remark "it seems to mark, not so much dullness in, as a deficiency in, or rather insufficient application of, the nous".

The argument of Gal. iii. 2-7 is an intense "application of the nous". It is a deadly and a deadening thing to allow a false deduction from the necessarily evil character of mere human "reasoning" to lead to the assumption that faith is irrational or blind, or that there can possibly exist any divergence between true "reason" and living "faith". Anything that is demonstrably not "right" can form no part of the creed of a moral creature, this turns the noble word "faith" into the base word "credulity" and belongs not to the free but to the enslaved.

Had the Galatians, who had been justified, and who had been set free by grace, but applied their emancipated minds to the Judaistic proposals that had caused such havoc, all might have been well. As it turned out, their lapse has been overruled to provide this great polemic and apology "The Epistle to the Galatians". The apostle, in measure, explains the idea he had when he used the word "thoughtless"—for he continues "who hath bewitched you?" and by so saying shifts the blame somewhat from the Galatians themselves to those emissaries of Satan, who, appearing as they may as angels of light and ministers of righteousness, stultify the truth by preaching "another Jesus", "another gospel" and "another spirit" (II Cor. xi.).

"To bewitch" baskaino becomes in its Latin form the word "fascinate" and had special reference to the bewitching power of the "evil eye", a spell which was supposed, among other evils, to check the growth of children—a feature that the Galatians would be quick to perceive.

The LXX translators use the word always in the sense of the "evil eye" as may be seen by consulting Deut. xxviii. 54, 56; Prov. xxiii. 6 and xxviii. 22. There is resident also in the word the idea that "envy" is the moving cause of this bewitchment. These Galatians had been "fascinated"—and a philosopher can be quoted as saying that fascination is "evil by the eye" a thought that is suggestive as we read the next statement of Gal. iii. "Before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth crucified among you" (Gal. iii. 1). The Revised text omits the words "that ye should not obey the truth" which appear to have been interpolated from chapter v. 7.

Paul's preaching of "Jesus Christ and Him crucified" must have been vivid, as we can well believe. He uses a figure borrowed from the hustings, for the words "evidently set forth", prographo, refer to the exhibition of placards which modern though it may sound, was a practice in common use at the time of the apostle.

Prographo when used in its primary sense "to write beforehand" occurs in Rom. xv. 4 and Eph. iii. 3. In Jude 4, it indicates rather a notice of trial or condemnation, but when writing to the Galatians, Paul uses the word, as he does the word diatheke "covenant" in Gal. iii. 15, "after the manner of men", and the Galatians would know the practice that was common in their day, of using placards for making public notices and proclamations. There may also be a glance at the practice of both heathen and Jew to resort to amulets and phylacteries as charms to avoid the evil eye, and concerning this Wordsworth has the following comment:

> "O foolish Galatians—foolish as children—who was it that bewitched you with his evil eye of jealousy? who envied you the liberty of Christ, and desired to spoil you of it? Who beguiled you, my children (Gal. iv. 19), whom I was rearing up as a father, unto men in Christ? Who beguiled you back into Judaism, with its rites and ceremonies and external observances? Your false teachers who so deal with you, would have written and bound before your eyes the scrolls of the Law; they would have laid upon you its outward fringes and phylacteries, and thus have entangled you to bondage. Who envied you the liberty of the Gospel, which I your apostle, preached to you? Who bewitched you, before whose eyes was written and bound by me, as your true scriptural scroll, your frontlet of Faith, your Scriptural Phylactery, CHIRST CRUCIFIED; and whom I had thus guarded, as I thought, against all the envious fascination of your spiritual enemies?"

The words "among you" are omitted by the Revised texts, though some commentators still reckon that they should be retained. If they are, it is important to remember that they must be construed as a "regular local predicate appended to proegraphe" (Ellicott) and must not be understood as referring to the word "crucified". The order of the words in the original adds greatly to the pathos and emphasis, "written before, in you, crucified". The words "in you" moreover must be understood as a reflection of the truth expressed in Gal. ii. 20 "Christ liveth in me", and as here, that the last word of the sentence—for emphasis sake—is the word "crucified".

The extreme importance that the apostle attached to the Cross of Christ, is most evident from these two references (Gal. ii. 20 and iii. 1), and it would be profitable and illuminating to pause, while we considered all that has been said of this most wondrous theme—yet, it seems better to let the apostle pursue his own argument in his own way. We shall find him introducing the Cross early in the argument (iii. 13) and with great point. Consequently with the atmosphere created by the consideration of Gal. iii. 1, all is ready for the argument which develops with the opening words of Gal. iii. 2 "This only would I learn of you", which must be the subject of our next article.

No.59. (17) GALATIANS.
Galatians ii. 21 - iii. 7.
"Spirit" v. "Flesh".
pp. 113 - 116

The apostle having quickened the interest of the Galatians by the various ways in which he has already approached the main issue before them, now begins to show to them the folly of their actions and the evil they had permitted, by a series of closely reasoned arguments. As we said earlier, there are some who would ban all "reasoning" as evil, but such would have to ban the apostle himself, and incidentally ban their own "arguments" that "reasoning" is evil. It is discoverable upon the surface of the Scriptures that Paul often "reasoned" with his hearers, for the reader of the A.V. can find four such statements in the Acts of the Apostles, there are, however, nine such passages, some hidden from the English reader under the translation "preach", as though the translators themselves wished that Paul had not used logic so freely. Let us see this series of references, for if Paul be our pattern, then to hide, or disguise any one of his accredited methods cannot be tolerated.

Dialegomai

"And Paul, as his manner was, went in unto them, and three Sabbath days reasoned with them out of the Scriptures" (Acts xvii. 2).

"Therefore disputed (reasoned) he in the synagogue with the Jews, and with the devout persons, and in the market daily with them that met with him" (Acts xvii. 17).

"And he reasoned in the synagogue every Sabbath, and persuaded the Jews and the Greeks" (Acts xviii. 4).

"He himself entered into the synagogue, and reasoned with the Jews" (Acts xviii. 19).

"And he went into the synagogue, and spake boldly for the space of three months, disputing (reasoning) and persuading the things concerning the kingdom of God" (Acts xix. 8).

"He separated the disciples, disputing (reasoning) daily in the school of one Tyrannus" (Acts xix. 9).

"And upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached (reasoned) . . . . . and continued his speech until midnight . . . . . and as Paul was long preaching (reasoning), ..." (Acts xx. 7, 9).

"And as he reasoned of righteousness, temperance and judgment to come, Felix trembled" (Acts xxiv. 25).

It will be remembered from these passages that Paul's method persisted even though circumstances changed. The first set of references are confined to the synagogue, and we might at first sight have felt that "reasoning" was perhaps a limitation under which the apostle laboured. But upon separating the believers from the synagogue, the apostle "disputed daily" in the school of one Tyrannus—consequently, the change of ground did not call for a change of method. At Troas where the disciples assembled together to break bread, and where the company presumably was mostly made up of believers, Paul occupied a "long time reasoning", and finally, when dealing with an individual sinner needing salvation, Paul, the one who said of himself "woe is me if I preach not the gospel", "reasoned" with Felix concerning righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come.

Instead, therefore, of banning the exercise of reason in the ministry of the Word, we have every "reason" to see that its exercise and use is commended and blessed. The apostle therefore, when he commenced to "reason" the matter of justification by works of law, as over against justification by faith, adopted the best procedure that he knew, and we who follow at a distance would do well to keep his method before us.

"This only would I learn of you" (Gal. iii. 2). He teaches them for the moment nothing. He adopts what has been called the Socratic method of argument, namely, the enforcement of the truth by the asking of questions. Paul is the one who would "learn"—the Galatians are the ones who are to teach him!

Every argument, however it be pursued, consists of two parts (1) that which is proved and (2) the means by which it is proved. The "means" varies from the strictly syllogistic and formal, to the inductive and the appeal to common sense, experience and authority. We shall no expect to find in the epistle to the Galatians, the argument proceeding step by step from one proved syllogism to another, the apostle uses a variety of means to the one end. Let us follow therefore the inspired penman as he endeavours by the grace of God, to overthrow the false teaching that had descended like a blight and a bewitchment upon the churches of Galatia, and let us observe the varying means he adopt to bring them back to the only ground of their acceptance before God.

> "Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of the faith?" (Gal. iii. 2).

This is the first reference to "The Spirit" in Galatians, but it is evidently of such importance that the apostle was willing to base his whole argument upon its reception and continuance. "This ONLY would I learn of you." Omitting the two passages where "the spirit of meekness" (Gal. vi. 1) and "your spirit" (Gal. vi. 18) refer to the spirit in a different sense than that intended in Gal. iii. 2, we observe that in this epistle there are fourteen occurrences of pneuma, in chapters iii.-v. of which seven passages use the word with the article to pneuma, "The Spirit", and seven use the word without the article, even though in every case the A.V. inserts the article for the sake of the English reader. Let us set out these two sets of references, observing particularly any allusions in the context to the controversy that prompted the writing of the epistle.

To Pneuma. "THE SPIRIT." (The Seven Occurrences).

(1) "Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?" (Gal. iii. 2).
(2) "He therefore that ministereth to you the Spirit, and worketh miracles among you, doeth he it by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?" (Gal. iii. 5).

There is but one answer to this repeated question "NOT by works of the law BUT by the hearing of faith".

(3) ". . . . . Redeemed from the curse of the law . . . . . that the blessing of Abraham might come on to the Gentiles through Jesus Christ; that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith" (Gal. iii. 13, 14).

Again the only answer must be "faith"; not "works of law" see verses 10-13.

(4) ". . . . . Redeemed them that were under the law . . . . . because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts; crying, Abba, Father" (Gal. iv. 5, 6).

The context shows that by redemption that status of "servant" has been removed, and the glorious position of "son" given, with the cry "How turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage?" (Gal. iv. 7-11).

(5, 6) "The flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh; and these are contrary the one to the other" (Gal. v. 17).

These, said the apostle, are "contrary" antikeitai the one to the other, and we must remember in all our studies that the apostle has placed "flesh" and "spirit" in two contrary categories, so that it is impossible to be in both and one at the self same time.

(7) "The fruit of the Spirit if love . . . . . against such there is no law" (Gal. v. 22, 23).

This "fruit" is in direct contrast with the "works of the flesh" (v. 19-21) with the sequel such "shall not inherit the kingdom of God" and therefore a parallel with the sequel here "against such there is no law".

Pneuma. " SPIRIT." (The Seven Occurrences).

(1) "Are ye so foolish? having begun in Spirit, are ye now made perfect in flesh?" (Gal. iii. 3).

We have learned from the preceding set of references that "spirit" and "flesh" are contrary one to the other, so that there can be but one answer to this question.

(2) "But as then he that was born according to flesh, persecuted him that was born according to Spirit, even so is it now" (Gal. iv. 29).

This as we know is a part of the allegory that the apostle built upon the record of the two sons of Abraham, the son of the bond maid and the son of the free; Mount Sinai with its bondage, and Jerusalem that is above, with its freedom. We have given a more literal rendering of these occurrences than is found in the A.V.

(3) "Christ is become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law; ye are fallen from grace. For we in Spirit wait for the hope of righteousness by faith" (Gal. v. 4, 5).
(4) "Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lust of flesh" (Gal. v. 16).
(5) "If in Spirit, ye are led, ye are not under law" (Gal. v. 18).
(6, 7) "If we live in Spirit, in Spirit also we should walk" (Gal. v. 25).

We have grouped these passages together as they all insist upon a logical and manifest outworking of the truth, maintained by the apostle, in the daily life and walk.

Although these words found in later chapters of the epistle were not written when the apostle asked the question in Gal. iii. 2, this doctrine was already known and was in his mind and teaching. It is clear, before we examine the subject in full detail, that there could be no compromise. "That which hath been born of the flesh is flesh, and that which hath been born of the spirit is spirit", was the utterance of the Lord as recorded by John, was endorsed by the apostle, and is true to-day in the dispensation of the Mystery.

With this preparation we must for the moment stop, but we shall be the better able to appreciate the argument of Gal. iii., since we have seen what "works of law", "hearing of faith", "flesh" and "spirit", mean in the doctrinal language of the apostle.

No.60. (18) GALATIANS.
Galatians ii. 21 - iii. 7.
The Argument from the ministry of the Spirit (iii. 2 - 5).
pp. 134 - 136

We have considered the way in which the apostle refers to the "Spirit" in Galatians, and have discovered that it is placed in direct contrast with the works both of the flesh and of the law.

So the Apostle continues in Gal. iii.:

> "Are ye so thoughtless? having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh?" (Gal. iii. 3).

The same two verbs occur together in another epistle:

> "Being confident of this very thing, that he which hath begun (enarchomai) a good work in you will perform (epiteleo) it until the day of Jesus Christ" (Phil. i. 6).

Paul was "confident" that if anything had been "begun" by God, by God it would be "perfected", and the Galatians were "thoughtless" not to have the same conviction.

Incidentally, should the reader have been troubled by an interpretation put forward to teach that Paul in Phil. i. 6 meant by "perfecting" a bringing to an end so that, for the time being the particular work should discontinue while something else was put into its place, he now has the corrective in the identical combination in Gal. iii. 3, and should set the interpretation referred to aside.

A passage almost parallel with Gal. iii. 3 is that of II Cor. viii. 6, where the word "begun" is proenarchomai "to begin before", while the word "finish" is epiteleo the same as in Gal. iii. 3 and Phil. i. 6.

It is not only unreasonable to think that Paul desired Titus to discontinue or bring to an end the offering of the Corinthian Church, it is contrary to the truth, for in verse eleven he uses epiteleo again saying "now therefore perform the doing of it . . . . . so that there may be a performance". The Galatians had "begun in Spirit" and it was illogical to think of being brought to the full end in any other sphere or by any other agency. To allow "works of the law and the flesh" to intrude at the goal, when they were repudiated as valueless at the commencement was neither of faith or reason. To bring the Galatians to a fuller sense of their irrational behaviour, the apostle appeals to their past experiences, even as he appeals later in the epistle to his own.

> "Have ye suffered so many things in vain? If it be yet in vain" (Gal. iii. 4).

At the time of the conversion of the Galatians, suffering normally followed the reception of the gospel, and so the apostle turned aside for a moment to ask, "was all that endured in vain?" Yet it was hard for him to think so "if it be really in vain", for ei ge leaves a loophole for doubt, and kai widens this, implying an unwillingness to believe this on the part of the speaker. Reverting to the Galatian defection when writing chapter four, the apostle speaks, not of their suffering "in vain", but of his labours on their behalf.

> "I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain" (Gal. iv. 11).

These persecutions had been endured mainly at the hand of Jews or Judaizers. What an extraordinary thing, said the apostle in effect, you suffered at the hands of the legalists when you were first saved by grace, and now you contemplate attaining the goal of faith by reverting to their questionable and obsolete practices!

In order that the force of his opening question should not be dulled by the subsequent development of his argument, the apostle reverts to it with the phrase ho oun "well then, as I said, etc."

> "He therefore that ministereth to you the Spirit, and worketh miracles among you, doeth he it by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?" (Gal. iii. 5).

The apostle had before him seven different words that are translated "to minister" in the N.T.; the one he chose here is epichoregeo. Choregeo meant originally "to lead a chorus", in course of time it came to mean, especially in Athens, "the defraying of the cost of solemn public choruses", and so, ultimately to "furnishing" and "supplying" generally. This defraying of the expenses of the Greek Chorus was usually undertaken by a wealthy citizen who found the members, furnished instructions, musicians, and the dresses. The intensive form used by the apostle, epichoregeo, adds the thought of completeness to the provision, and so of itself emphasized the folly of the Galatians in their attempt to mingle their own puny works of law with the grace that supplied so liberally and so completely.

The Galatians would discover that Peter himself rebukes their folly for, concerning the conversion of Cornelius, he said:

> "God made choice among us, that the Gentiles by my mouth should hear the word of the gospel, and believe (c.f. "the preaching of faith" Gal. iii. 5).
> "And God, which knoweth the hearts, bare them witness, giving them the Holy Ghost, even as He did unto us; and put no difference between us and them, purifying their hearts > by faith. Now therefore why tempt ye God, to put a yoke upon the neck (a "yoke of bondage" indeed, Gal. v. 1) of the disciples, which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear? But we believe that through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ we shall be saved, even as they" (Acts xv. 7-11).

In addition to the opening reference to the "Spirit" (Gal. iii. 3), the apostle adds "and worketh miracles among you". Now it is the testimony of Scripture that "John (the Baptist) did no miracle", the signs and wonders, that accomplished the preaching of the gospel both during the Lord's earthly ministry and that of the apostles at Pentecost and after, were definitely a confirmation of this last revelation of Divine grace (Heb. ii. 1-4; I Cor. i. 5, 6; Rom. xv. 19; II Cor. xii. 12), but are never associated in the N.T. record with the law of Moses, its works and its ceremonial. One of the most formidable obstacles to the full reception of the gospel of the grace of God, was the age-long tradition that made Moses and the law he gave, eternal. The Jews who were guilty of breaking the commandment every day, were nevertheless opposing the gospel by enthroning the very law that condemned them.

Paul now moves to his great argument, the age-lasting nature of the promises made to Abraham, as over against the limited character of the covenant of works. The promises are "by faith" and therefore sure, the Old Covenant rested on "works" and was rendered "weak because of the flesh" (Rom. viii. 3). Together with this contrast between Abraham and Moses, the apostle introduces another feature. Abraham's "seed" is not limited to physical descent, it includes those who walk by faith. To enforce this new line of argument the apostle appeals to the Scriptural record of the justifying of Abraham, shows the impossibility of attaining righteousness by works of the law, turns to the Galatian law that governed the making of a will and the appointing of the heir to enforce the claims of the promise made to Abraham, and concludes with the glorious doctrine of "adoption". This left them no longer "servants" but "sons" and consequent "heirs" of God through Christ with complete exemption from law, its "tutors and governors".

Galatians ii. 21 - iii. 7.
The realm of faith (iii. 6, 7).
pp. 150 - 152

The apostle Paul had no scruples about using figures borrowed from the race course, the theatre, the pugilistic ring, or the throwing of dice (I Cor. ix. 24-26; iv. 9; ix. 27; Eph. iv. 14) and we are sure that he would appreciate the figure that comes to our mind when we speak of the introduction of "Abraham" into the argument both in Galatians and in Romans, as the apostle's "trump card". In each of these epistles the name of Abraham occurs nine times, and every reference is a definite part of a consecutive argument. Let us note these references in Galatians before proceeding.

(1) Justification is by faith. "Even as Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness" (Gal. iii. 6).
(2) Children be faith. "That they which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham" (Gal. iii. 7).
(3) The Gospel and faith. "The scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed" (Gal. iii. 8).
(4) Blessing by faith. "So then they which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham" (Gal. iii. 9).

The apostle now reveals the fact that any attempt to be justified by works of the law is virtually putting oneself under a curse. Yet in accomplishing redemption, Christ became a curse for us, with this object.

(5) Promise through faith. "That the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ; that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith" (Gal. iii. 14).
(6) Promises made to the Seed, which is Christ. "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ" (Gal. iii. 16).
(7) Inheritance by promise. "For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise; but God gave it to Abraham by promise" (Gal. iii. 18).
(8) Christ's are Abraham's seed. "If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. iii. 29).

After an interval in which the figure of adoption is introduced, and the retrograde movement of the Galatians placed on all fours with a turning back to paganism, the last reference to Abraham is made in which the two children, one of the free woman and one of the bondmaid are used as an allegory.

(9) "It is written, that Abraham had two sons, the one by a bond maid, the other by a free woman . . . . . mount Sinai . . . . . bondage, Jerusalem, which is above is free" (Gal. iv. 22-26).

These references fall into three groups, each group having one dominating word. The first four references are under the heading of "faith", the next three deal with "promise", the last two with "Seed" or "Son". It would occupy too much space, to go through the nine references to Abraham found in Romans, but we are sure that the reader would gain further and fuller light if this were undertaken. We must now return to Gal. iii., where the apostle introduced Abraham and associates with him the glorious doctrine of justification.

The point of the apostle's argument concerning justification by faith may be more keenly felt if we remember that the Jews' tenet concerning the Law as contained in the Talmud and Rabbinical writings descends from:

> "The six hundred and thirteen precepts of the law as collected by Moses Maimonedes reduced by David to eleven in Psa. xv.; further brought within the compass of six by Isaiah (Isa. xxxiii. 15); further reduced to three by Micah (Mic. vi. 8), and again to two by Isaiah (Isa. lxi. 1), to one by Amos (Amos v. 4), and crystallized by Habbakuk in the words "the Just by his faith shall live."
>
> "Thus", says Dr. Lightfoot—"the Jews witness against themselves, while they conclude that faith is the sum of the law, and yet they stand altogether upon works:—a testimony from Jews exceedingly remarkable."

This confusion of faith and works accounts for the saying of the Jews concerning Abraham, "Abraham performed all the law, every whit".

"Even as." The answer to the question already propounded is assumed, Lightfoot puts it "surely of faith; and so it was with Abraham". As we have seen, there are four links with Abraham in verses 6-9, and each the word "faith". First of all, and fundamental to all, is the question of justification. This is the issue before the apostle, before the Galatians, before the church to-day and will be before all men at the last.

In the Garden of Eden, two coverings symbolize the two methods that were then adopted and will always be adopted until the end of time, the one a covering of leaves, the other a covering of skins, the former a fit symbol of the fading covering of human provision, the latter resulting from sacrifice and provided by God. Outside the garden of Eden, these two ways are again set before us in the two offerings, the one of Cain, like the apron of leaves being rejected, the other by Abel, like the coats of skin being accepted and for this same reason. The apostle here brings this twofold aspect of righteousness up to date. The Judaizers with their "works of law" were treading the way of Cain, the only alternative being the way of Abel. While the cases of Adam and Abel are Scriptural, the apostle knew how proudly these Judaizers clung to the thought that they were the "children of Abraham". In Rom. iv. 9-11 he demolished this claim by showing that at the time that Abraham was justified he was uncircumcised; here, he attacks the same exclusivism by showing that Abraham's justification, as also the privilege of being Abraham's children, is "by faith".

The precise doctrine of justification by faith and the doctrinal meaning of the term "faith imputed for righteousness" is not so much the apostle's immediate concern as to prove his point that these Galatian believers had "begun" in the realm of faith, whether he uses the ministering to them of the "Spirit" or whether he dwells upon the place that faith occupies in evangelical justification is all one. He is eliciting from them the answer to his question "the hearing of faith"; he is forcing them to perceive that any claim upon Abraham and the clinging to works of law were mutually destructive, for if they were really children of Abraham, they must be children of faith.

> "Know ye therefore that they which are of faith, the same ('these' emphatic 'these and these only', see Rom. viii. 14) are the children of Abraham" (Gal. iii. 7).

Among the services rendered to the truth by the R.V. is the observance of the two words translated "children" and "son". In many passages the A.V. has rendered the word huios by the word "child", and has rendered the word teknon by the word "son". In practically every case the R.V. consistently reads "son" for huios, except in the phrase "the children of Israel", which it was found impossible to change owing to the power of its long associations.

> "There is the position of 'sonship' (characteristic of the teaching of St. Paul), which suggests the thoughts of privilege, of inheritance, of dignity; and there is also the position of 'childship' (characteristic of the teaching of St. John), which suggests the thought of community of nature, of dependence, of tender relationship. Sons may be adopted; children can only be born" (Some lessons of the R.V. of the N.T. by Bishop Westcott).

The sequel Gal. iii. 15 - iv. 12 with its insistence upon the "adoption" demands the recognition here in Gal. iii. 7 that the apostle intentionally used huios and not teknon "sons" (not "children") thereby intensifying the correlated thoughts of dignity, inheritance, and liberty, each of which were endangered by the retrograde steps that the Galatians had taken.

"By faith" they had been justified. "By faith" they had become sons. No wonder the apostle should exclaim:

> "O thoughtless Galatians who hath bewitched you?"

Galatians iii. 8 - 12.
The appeal to the Scriptures (iii. 8).

Before proceeding to the exposition of Gal. iii. 8, which lies immediately before us, we must pause to note that we now pass into another section of the structure.

C | iii. 22, 23. | f | The SCRIPTURE concluded.

The introduction of Abraham in Gal. iii. 6 is also the first reference to the Scriptures in the epistle. Right through chapters one and two the apostle has followed the method so characteristic of him when dealing with a mixed company of Jews and Gentiles, namely an appeal to experience and present facts, knowing full well that there is no conflict between the ways of God as recorded in Holy Writ and the ways of God in the process of their unfolding, always allowing of course, for dispensational changes. When however the moment comes for the apostle to speak of the Scriptures, there is never any uncertainly in his reference to them or his belief that they are inspired, authentic and authoritative.

To the apostle the Scriptures were "holy" (Rom. i. 2) and "sacred: (II Tim. iii. 15); they are to be received as "the word of God" (I Thess. ii. 13). Then defining the simple foundation of the gospel he preached, the apostle relates the death and resurrection of the Saviour to "the Scriptures" (I Cor. xv. 3, 4), and over and over again the formula "it is written" provides a Scriptural basis for his teaching and arguments. There are at least thirty-seven occurrences of the phrase in the four epistles Romans, I and II Corinthians and Galatians to which must be added such allusions and quotations that are introduced by such words as "And again he saith . . . . . again . . . . . and again Esaias saith" (Rom. xv. 10-12). Then we find the apostle not only quoting, but seeing in the O.T. prophet a kindred spirit with himself, as for example in Rom. x.:

> "First Moses saith . . . . . but Esaias is very bold, and saith" (Rom. x. 19, 20).

When the apostle introduces the Scriptures into the argument he does so by using the somewhat remarkable words "the Scripture foreseeing", this personifying of the Scriptures being very common among the Rabbinical writers who often use the formula "what saw the Scripture?" When the Scriptures as a whole are referred to, the word graphe is generally put in the plural graphai, but where some particular passage is intended, we find the singular graphe used as in "another scripture" (John xix. 37); "this scripture" (Luke iv. 21). This rule does not apply when "the whole Scripture" is referred to as in II Tim. iii. 16.

In this passage, Gal. iii. 8, the Scripture is said to have done two things. "The Scripture foreseeing . . . . . preached." The one other occasion where proeidon "foresee" is used is Acts ii. 30, 31:

> "Therefore being a prophet, and knowing . . . . . he seeing this before spake of the resurrection of Christ."

In this passage Peter reveals that the language used in Psa. xvi. was uttered by David as a prophet who saw beforehand what should come to pass. So, the utterances recorded in Gen. xii. 3 and xviii. 18, go further than the blessings associated with the setting up of Israel in the land of promise, they include the blessings of salvation during the gospel period that precedes that era.

While the controversy among the Galatian Christians necessitated some insistence upon the Gentile, as we have already seen in Gal. i. 16, ii. 2, 8, 12, 14, the word must not be unduly stressed in the quotation made from Gen. xii. 3 for the simple reason that when Abraham was called, there were no Jews in existence, the word ethne then referring to all the nations that were then occupying the surface of the earth.

We do not lose, we gain rather by remembering this all inclusiveness of the gospel—"all nations", Gentiles as well as Jews, Jews as well as Gentiles, all were to be justified in one way only—"by faith", no other way ever being conceived, and no other way ever open to man whether he be Jew or Gentile, since the dawn of history. Israel had many privileges and many advantages, but in this respect there has never been any difference, the whole human race including all its tribes and nations standing on an equality both in their need and in the provision of the gospel.

When the gospel was "preached before unto Abraham", the Mystery was unknown. It is evident that any argument that does not differentiate between the gospel and the Mystery must be fallacious; any argument that does not distinguish between "doctrinal truth" and "dispensational truth" fails at the outset. Objectors to the revelation of the Mystery have instanced Abraham, not realizing that Abraham could have known all the terms of the gospel, without ever having heard of the third sphere of blessing and the dispensation of the Mystery.

So again, the apostle has no hesitation in Gal. iii. of blending into one the grace of salvation by faith and the gift of miraculous powers, the gospel being "doctrinal truth" and persistent, while the gift of miracle was "dispensational truth" and passing.

In order to compel the reader to recognize that justification can only be by faith, the apostle turns to the testimony of Scripture concerning the position of all men who are "of the works of the law" saying of all such that they must be "under the curse". This statement would naturally be challenged and so the apostle proceeds to prove the point.

> "For it is written, Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them."

These exacting terms if taken point by point, leave man hopelessly undone, but not only is this so, there is a second argument gathered from the same source:

> "But that no man is justified by the law in the sight of God, it is evident: for, The just shall live by faith."

This second argument is strengthened by the observation:

> "The law is not of faith: but, the man that doeth them shall live in them," and the whole reduced to impotence in the presence of the cross of Christ:

> "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us: for it is written, Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree!"

And so by way of redeeming love the apostle returns to Abraham's faith and blessing saying:

> "That the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ; that we might received the promise of the Spirit through faith" (Gal. iii. 10-14).

The chain of reasoning adopted by the apostle commences and concludes with the reception or promise of the Spirit, the intervening links being:

(1) The unreasonableness of concluding that having begun in the Spirit one could be perfected by the flesh.
(2) The sufferings endured at conversion being all in vain if this were to be so.
(3) The example of Abraham.
(4) The character of all his sons.
(5) The preaching of the gospel by the O.T. Scriptures.
(6) The foredoomed nature of all attempts at seeking a righteousness by the works of the law.

Some of the arguments we have considered, some await out attention; all must influence our judgment and understanding and should deepen our regard for the grace that has been brought to us by our Saviour Jesus Christ.

No.63. (21) GALATIANS.
Galatians iii. 8 - 12.
"For as many as are of the works of the law are under the curse" (iii. 10).
pp. 226 - 228

The proofs just considered (Gal. iii. 6-8) are positive in nature, we now advance to a negative argument, the impossibility of attaining to justification by law. Speaking of the Apostle's method of reasoning, while sometimes it is closely akin to the Rabbinical method that sees proof where a Western mind would see none, he does at times approach nearer to the syllogistic form of argument, as may be seen from what has already been adduced.

"They of faith are the children of Abraham."
"The children of Abraham are blessed."
"So then they of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham."

We now consider the negative argument, and we can anticipate an objection. Is it not jumping to a conclusion, of admitting prejudice, of damning a man before trial to make so sweeping a statement that "As many as are of the works of the law are under the curse"? The relative pronoun hosos allows no exceptions. Sometimes it is translated "whatsoever" (Rom. xv. 4); when referring to time it is translated "as long as" (Gal. iv. 1); or in the account of the woman of Samaria "He told me all that ever I did" (John iv. 39). "As many as" are of the works of the law, "so many" are under the curse. Such is the statement. Now for the proof.

The Apostle compels the objector to attempt to pass through the sifting meshes of a passage borrowed from the O.T., each mesh in the sieve becoming smaller, and he challenges any one successfully to pass the test, or to produce from history any one who has.

Here are the tests:

(1) Cursed is EVERY ONE. No respects of persons must be expected, for none will be shown. Every one without exception, without favour, must stand here.

(2) First demand of the law is "continuance". No mere perfunctory performance can satisfy the claim of the law. Here is no sabbath day observance, but a day by day, hour by hour performance from cradle to grave.

The word here translated "continue" is emmeno, a compound of en "in" and meno "to abide, remain or continue". The Apostle uses two other variants of the word in Galatians thus, epimeno "to remain upon, or at", "to abide" (Gal. i. 18), indicating that, for the whole course of the fifteen days, Paul did not change his place of abode, but "remained upon" it.

Diameno "to continue right through" as the gospel did, in spite of all the antagonism of Judaistic opponents, by the grace of God and the faithful witness of the apostle Paul, when he stood alone against all "the somebodies and somewhats" at Jerusalem.

Emmeno "to continue in". It is used of the faith in Acts xiv. 22 "exhorting them to continue in the faith" and is used of the failure of Israel "they continued not in My covenant" (Heb. viii. 9).

There are many indications that the epistle to the Galatians was a "covering letter" sent together with the epistle to the Hebrews. The omission of any reference to circumcision in Hebrews is inexplicable taken by itself, but with the matter so thoroughly disposed of, as it is in Galatians, it is understandable. Here are all the references to emmeno in the N.T. (omitting a reading in the Alexandrian MSS of Rev. xx. 3), and the fact that the epistles to the Galatians and Hebrews use this word in connexion with one subject, the inability of man to continue in the observance of the law, is one of many incidental links between the two epistles. Most, if not all, fail to pass this intense test. But suppose for argument's sake some could, let us note what is said further.

(3) ALL things. Just as every one without exception is intended in the opening of the argument, and all the time without reprieve is demanded in the next step, so every commandment without exception must be thus "continued in" or the curse must fall.

Most men, except the utterly depraved, discover that they have their strong points as well as their weak ones. Where one man would be proof against the sin of adultery, he may be an easy victim to covetousness. Where one would scorn to bear false witness, he may be slack in the honouring of his parents, and if we bring the subject forward and understand the law to be the love of God with all the heart, soul, mind and strength, and the neighbour as oneself, then it is evident that not one can hope to continue in all things which are written in the law. Further, both O.T. and N.T. point out that ignorance is no excuse. "Though he wist it not, yet is he guilty, and shall bear his iniquity" (Lev. v. 17), "For whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all. For He that said, Do not commit adultery, said also Do not kill" (James ii. 10, 11).

Finally, the last test is simple but complete: "'To DO them." Volumes have been written in praise of the Mosaic code. Praise has been bestowed upon the sanity and the salutary nature of its precepts. Comparison with such as the Code of Khammurabi reveals the exalted nature of the law of Sinai, yet God never asked man to pass his opinion upon the law, to extend his patronage to the law, to render lip service to the law, he was simply under the obligation to DO the works of the law, or to come under the curse. Alford sadly misses the argument and misrepresents God, when he says, from Gal. iii. 11 "not even could a man keep the law, would he be justified, the condition of justification, as revealed in Scripture, being by faith". It is untrue to teach that God would repudiate perfect obedience; He would not, the argument is directed to another thought namely, justification, which, if ever it is to be received, will have to be by faith as a free gift, because no one would ever be able to produce the obedience required by the law to merit it.

God shuts no man out. Man shuts himself out by his own failure. To every man God says as he said to Cain:

> "If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou doest not well, the sin offering coucheth at the door" (Gen. iv. 7).

Man can, theoretically, be justified by a perfect obedience, but practically he can be justified only through the offering of Christ. There is no middle course, and no other way.

In Gal. iii. 11 "law" as such is now set aside. Not merely "the law", there is no article here, and "by" should be rendered simply "in". "The more inclusive en is thus, perhaps, chosen designedly, as the Apostle's object is apparently to show that the idea of justification falls wholly out of the domain of the law, and is incompatible with its very nature and character" (Ellicott). The argument now adopted by the Apostle may be stated thus:

> "It is written that justification is only of faith" (verse 11);
> "But the law admits not of justification by faith" (verse 12);
> "Consequently, no man under law is justified" (verse 10). (Gwynne).

Throughout this sustained argument the initial question "received ye the Spirit by the works of law, or by the hearing of faith?" is never dropped. It is in view in each step of the argument.

First. Blessing is the inheritance of those who are justified by faith (verse 9).

Secondly. As many as are of the works of the law (primarily Jews but including all others who place themselves under law) are subjects, not of blessing, but of the curse (verses 10-12).

Thirdly. This curse has been lifted from all those who were under the law, by redemption, this being accomplished by Christ coming under a curse in their room and stead; the fact that He died by being "hung upon a tree" revealing the character of His sacrificial death.

This third and last member of the present argument is too important to occupy the few remaining lines at our disposal, so will accordingly be given fuller consideration in our next study.

"Go ye and learn what that meaneth"
(Matt. ix. 13)

(A series of studies on the importance of, and the comprehension of, "meaning")

No.1. Meaning
pp. 78 - 80

The Holy Scriptures, even though they had been written in letters of burnished gold would not have been a revelation of God to man, if the meaning of those burnished letters was hidden from man. It matters not how fair the script may be, or whose hand wrote the lines—they may even be engraved by the finger of God Himself as were the Ten Commandments, yet they would still fail of their purpose if no meaning were attached to the holy symbols. Significance, meaning, intention, these are the spirit; the actual words used are but the body, and as the body without the spirit is dead being alone, so is a word divested of its meaning.

In order to be sure of the meaning of the Scriptures, we must give attention to grammar, to usage, to structure, to manner and custom, to time, place, circumstance and to the changing dispensations.

Before us as we write is a book which contains a "Form of service for the observation of the Passover". Prayers preceding and following the search for leaven in the house are given, the disposition of the table, the cakes, shank bone, &c., is set out, the sanctification for the Passover is pronounced and prepared for, and then at the filling of the cup of wine the second time, the youngest child in the company asks: "Wherefore is this night distinguished from all other nights? On all other nights we may eat either leavened or unleavened bread, but on this night only unleavened bread; on all the other nights we may eat any species of herbs, but on this night only bitter herbs; on all the other nights we do not dip even once, but on this night we dip twice; on all other nights we eat and drink either sitting or leaning, but on this night we lean?" There is also provision "for him who hath not capacity to inquire" and the head of the family must begin to discourse, as it is said, "and thou shalt show thy son on that day".

The Passover feast was never intended to be a mere empty ritual. Provision was made by Moses in the very day of its institution, that children should ask "What mean ye by this service?" (Exod. xii. 26). The same provision is found in connexion with the feast of unleavened bread (xiii. 8) and the setting apart of the firstborn. Another symbolic memorial which had attached to it the duty of explaining its meaning, was the erection of the twelve stones in the bed of the Jordan, for it is written, "When your children ask their fathers in time to come, saying, What mean ye by these stones? Then ye shall answer them . . . . ." (Josh. iv. 6, 7).

When we ask the "meaning" of any word or thing, we use a word that is derived from the Anglo Saxon maenan "to intend", and a word has no message or power, that has no meaning or intention. A dog, who has no ability to consult either a dictionary or a lexicon knows what his master intends, when he makes certain sounds, and if his master had always said "in front" when he meant "to heel" the faithful animal would have obeyed the intention regardless of the common usage of the words. Significance is everything.

In the eighth chapter of Daniel a vision is recorded, and after the record come the words "And it came to pass, when I, even I Daniel, had seen the vision, and sought for the meaning", that a voice commanded "Gabriel make this man to understand the vision" (viii. 15, 16), showing the Lord's pleasure in this desire of his servant.

Zechariah the prophet manifests a vivid inquisitiveness, that is answered by the heavenly visitant, and his questions "What are these, my lord?" "What is it?" and "whither?" run through chapters iv., v. and vi.

We find when turning to the N.T. that the same concern that the "meaning" of the message should be perceived actuates both the Lord and His apostles. "Declare unto us" said the disciples, "the parable of the tares of the field" (Matt. xiii. 36), and a patient comparative explanation follows. Peter received a strange vision, and hears a yet stranger command to "Rise, kill and eat", and while he pondered what the meaning of such a vision could be the answer is provided by the embassy from Cornelius (Acts x. 17).

The Apostle makes much of intention, significance and meaning, when he sought to guide and restrain the Corinthians in the use of the gift of tongues. Let us read Moffatt's translation:

> "Suppose now I were to come to you speaking with 'tongues' my brothers, what good could I do you, unless I had some revelation or knowledge or prophecy or teaching to lay before you? Inanimate instruments, such as the flute or the harp, may give a sound, but if no intervals occur in their music, how then can one make out the air that is being played either on flute or on harp? If the trumpet sounds indistinct, who will get ready for the fray? Well, it is the same with yourselves. Unless your tongue utters language that is readily understood, how can people make out what you say? You will be pouring words into the empty air! There are ever so many kinds of language in the world, every one of them meaning something. Well, unless I understand the meaning of what is said to me, I shall appear to the speaker to be talking gibberish, and to my mind he will be talking gibberish himself. So with yourselves; since your heart is set on possessing 'spirits' make the edification of the church your aim in this desire to excel" (I Cor. xiv. 6-12).

As the body without the spirit is dead being alone, so the Scriptures deprived of their meaning are empty sounds and unedifying symbols.

In the O.T. "meaning" is the translation of either the word binah "to understand" (Dan. viii. 15), damah "to think, or devise", from the root meaning "to be like" (Isa. x. 7); or chashab "to devise, to count". In the N.T. "meaning" is expressed, either by parts of the verb "to be", as esti "it is" (Matt. ix. 13); eie "it would be" (Acts x. 17); a combination of "to be" and "to wish" thelo einai (Acts ii. 12); or dunamis "power" (I Cor. xiv. 11). Should the student seek the Hebrew word that is translated "mean" in Exod. xii. 26, in "Young's Analytical Concordance", he will not find it, simply because there is no word in the original that stands for it, the literal version of Exod. xii. 26 reading "What is this service to you?" but of course the intention is evident just the same.

In this series our purpose is to consider from a variety of angles, this great question of "meaning" and "intention" in order that in the study of the Inspired Words, we may attain unto a fuller understanding of the Inspired Word.

perception, conception, intelligence, conclusion, thinking, considering, understanding, the heart, the mind, learning, remembering, accounting, knowledge and acknowledgment, acquaintance, wisdom, prudence, reason, comparison, reception, judgment, enlightenment, fitness, growth, inclination, experience, ideas, persuasion, reflection, search, study, exercise, fellowship, and practice. Added to this list could be concomitant delight, love of the truth, and holding of the form of sound words. These are some of the ways along which the mind travels as it seeks "meaning".

As an illustration both of the wonder of words, and the pitfalls to avoid when seeking their meaning we will consider in this article some mistakes and misconceptions that have crept into our language. Here are a few odd items of interest collected together without any attempt at classification.

Adamant. This word in Greek means "the invincible" and in order to illustrate this quality the word was used to indicate the hardest metal, probably steel, and then from the German demant via the French diamant we reach the English diamond. Some late Latin writers however misunderstood the word and read it adamantem (lapidem) "the loving" (stone) and then applied it to the load-stone. This accounts for such strange expressions as "the armorous steel" Norris (1678) and Thomas Fuller (1648) asks of the loadstone "how first it fell in love with the north?" Here is an example to show what a crop of strange ideas a false etymology can produce.

When the writer was a boy, a favourite joint at the week-end dinner table was "The aitch-bone" of beef, and he remembers in answer to the question "why?" that there was some supposed resemblance to the letter H. Others at different times have speculated on this name and propounded ash-bone, each-bone, edge-bone (C. Lamb) and ice-bone. The mistake arises out of the failure to realize that just as "an apron" originally was a napron, a form still preserved in napkin and napery, and "an adder" was originally a nadder, so

"an aitch-bone" is a misunderstanding of the older form a nache bone a word derived through old French from the Latin natis buttock.

As the word "belfry" is now written, it is perhaps excusable to see some reference to the "bells" that hang therein. This however is the result of a corruption. The original spelling of the word was berfrey and berefreid meaning a "watch-tower" and tower of defence, adopted from the old German bergan "protect" and fridu "peace". The Italians manufactured a different form of the same word, associating the belfry with the "striking" either of a bell or clock, hence the Italian battifredo. It is our own unestablished speculation that the term "bats in the belfry" may have arisen from this peculiar turn in the spelling of the word.

"A pretty kettle of fish" means to most of us a perplexing state of affairs, but the "kettle" has no reference here to the pot in which the fish may be cooked, it refers to the keddle, a net fixed with osier stakes, old French quidel, and so an enclosure alive with floundering fish. We are not likely to perpetuate the definition given in a learned German publication "A fort, is a place to keep men in, fortress to keep women in".

Not far from the Chapel of the Opened Book is the Church of St. Giles, Cripple-gate. Most guides assure us that the gate was so called because of the cripples who begged there. Stowed says that "the postern of Cripplegate was so called long before the Conquest". The postern itself was the original crypel otherwise creep, a low arch opening through which there was a passage. A crypel-geat in Wiltshire is mentioned in the Domesday Book, and the word is used in Yorkshire for a low opening in a fence or walk.

"Who", says Dr. Smythe Palmer, "would not feel confident that the verb 'to adjust', to arrange and settle, was a derivative of the Latin ad and justus, and meant to make just or even, to set right?" The word however is derived from the old French joste and the Latin juxta, which means to bring things "near" and so to harmonize or match them. So arises the ambiguity of our phrase "It is just twelve" which may either mean "It is nearly twelve, but not quite" so following the original idea of juxta or "it is exactly twelve" so following the mistaken original, the Latin juste. When being shown over an old house, visions of cream and golden butter come before the mind when the guide says "This is the buttery". The word is derived from "butt" which meant a cask.

It is universally assumed that the Trade Winds are so called because they are serviceable to shipping and so encourage trade. This however is but an accidental connexion. The original word "trade" meant a "course" with which we should compare the Saxon trod, a track, or the Sussex trade, a ro+++. As Shakespeare makes King Richard II say:

> "I'll be buried in the King's highway,
> Some way of common trade, where subjects' feet
> May hourly trample on their sovereign's head;
> For on my heart they tread now whilst I live" (Rich. II. iii. 3. 158.).

It would be similarly a surprise to many to be told that when a visitor leaves a house, or takes his leave, even though the intention is similar, namely that of taking his departure, the two words nevertheless are totally unrelated. In the former instance leave is simply old English leven "to quit" and so depart. But "to take leave" is the old English leve, permission, and akin to life, be-lieve and love.

When we say that some antiquated or superstitious belief is "exploded" we naturally think of a spent bomb, or of an explosion that has "blown the argument to bits". This is quite beside the original meaning of the figure. The word really retains the meaning of the Latin ex-plodere i.e. ex-plaudere, to drive or hoot off the stage an unpopular actor, the direct opposite of "applaud". Milton says that Enoch was "exploded" by his unbelieving contemporaries, but Milton never intended the thought that because Enoch was "not found" that he had been "blown to bits".

The number of examples of false analogies and misinterpretations could be multiplied to many pages, but sufficient has been indicated to show that great care must be exercised in coming to a conclusion concerning the etymology of any word or phrase, lest by coming to a false conclusion we should be found building our doctrinal teaching upon sand. The examples of false analogy and misinterpretation have been selected from the many that are given in the book The Folk and their Word-Lore by A. Smythe Palmer, D.D.

The reader is advised to check the etymology offered by any dictionary that may be employed, or any book that is read, by such a work as The Concise etymological Dictionary of the English language by W. W. Skeat.

No.3. The senses and the parts of speech.
pp. 116 - 119

We have suggested that in the pursuit of "meaning" the activities of the mind can be reduced to six stages or processes. The first three being Sensation, Memory, Reason, and then limiting our investigation to the "meaning" of Holy Scripture, we have another three steps or links, Revelation, Translation and Interpretation. Let us give attention to these essential steps, and begin, where all must and do begin with "sensation".

Human language occasionally manifests by a sudden gleam, by a momentary relation of words, the underlying basis of all thinking. This is seen in the fact that in English the word "sense" has two meanings. The first meaning that which limits the meaning of the word "sense" to the five senses, sight, hearing, smell, taste and touch, the second meaning that which indicates the ultimate goal of "sense" that is "meaning", as when we say "the sense of this remark is . . . . .", "Take the sense or the meaning" or as in Neh. viii. 8 "They read in the book in the law of God distinctly, and gave the sense". So also we speak of a person who fainted, that he is "senseless" referring only to the physical senses, or we may say that a remark is “senseless”, intending this time the idea “meaningless”. Again, we may say that a person is very “sensible” and by so remarking, make no observation upon the physical senses, of sight, hearing, etc., or we can, with Macbeth say:

> “Art thou not, fatal vision sensible to feeling, as to sight.”

A “sensualist” may indicate a person who is devoted to the gratification of his baser appetites, but the term may indicate a supporter of the sensual theory of philosophy. Enough has been said to show that the first door by which perception enters is the door of the five senses, and then, traversing the chamber of the mind, that which came in as a “sensation” emerges as “sense”.

The underlying substratum of all experience is twofold, namely that of space and time. Every event that has ever happened of which the human mind is capable of thought must have taken place someWHERE and at some TIME. Timeless immensity, while capable of being written or spoken, cannot be comprehended. An infant entering into this world, is immediately influenced by light, heat, sound, smell and taste. In course of time he begins to associate these impressions with objects outside of himself, he reacts to these sense impressions and experiences comfort or distress, and so feels an inclination towards or an aversion from the origins of these sensations. Qualities such as hardness, softness, light, heavy, rough and smooth, begin to enter into the mind, and a world “other” than himself is recognized and accepted. Time is not associated in the infant mind with clocks or the sun, but with sequence, repetition, succession, and that mainly as associated with feeding, bathing and daily routine. Arising out of these experiences comes the need to give them a name, and the first use of language is that of naming an object, of attaching a signal to it that will recall it to the memory, and at the same time separate the named object from others that are different in degree or kind.

It must be remembered however, that unless there were some intuitive sense, which forms a part of the original creation of man, none of these external objects as perceived by the senses would give rise to thought, reason or understanding. Certain axioms lie at the basis of all the processes of thought, and are often of a mathematical nature, such as:

> “The whole is greater than the part.”

The “signal” thus appropriated to each object is called by grammarians “a noun” or a name, which part of speech is defined by Aristotle to be “a sound which by convention is significant, but does not determine the time”. Aristotle here really distinguishes between the difference between a noun and a verb. The noun represented a permanent thing, the verb a temporary and transitory state. We are therefore dealing with “things” and with “states”. Nouns and names represent things, and consequently states must have some other part of speech devoted to their expression. This power of expressing the various “states” of a “thing” is the office of the adjective and the verb, and in reality every verb can be reduced to an adjective—notion, combined with one particular word expressing time, past, present and future. Thus “he writes” can be expressed “he is—writing”. “He sings" can be expressed "He is—singing" so that all verbs are fundamentally one, the verb to be with its three tenses is, was, shall be combined with the adjective-notion "writing", "singing", etc.

Mathematics and grammatical analysis may, at first appear to be far removed from the sense impression received by an infant in its cradle, but they are after all but extensions of the two notions of space and time that comprise an infant's early impressions. The infant moreover enters into a complex world. Sense impressions do not come singly but in battalions, and he soon discovers the necessity to express the relationship in which one object stands to another. These relationships are expressed in terms of movement or of rest—in, out, from, with, above, below, near, far, etc.—and are called prepositions. Speech therefore is primarily divided into four parts. Nouns, names or substantives to express substances; adjectives to indicate attributes, like good, smooth, hot, cold; prepositions to denote relations in, out, from; and the verb to indicate the relation of the substance to time, or to assign various attributes.

Any one who has opened a book devoted to "Figures of Speech" will acknowledge the complexity and diversity of the subject, yet, all figures of speech begin in the cradle. Before I can appreciate the figure involved in the expressions "hardness of heart", "a rough speech", "an upright nature", "a sweet disposition"; before the expressions "inflamed by anger", "warmed by affection", "swollen with pride", or "melted with grief" can be appreciated, hard and rough materials must have been handled, sweet and sour things tasted. So, the prepositions originally expressed the circumstance of place "the man was in the room" "The cat sat on the mat." This elementary significance of place, is transferred by figure to apply to certain conditions and situations of an abstract nature, and so "in" is employed to express more abstract circumstances, such as "in health", "in doubt". Even the word we have just employed, "circumstance" is primarily a word of place. Circum is the Latin for "around", stance for "stand". Circumstances are things, or a state of things, that "stand around". Crabb says: "many circumstances constitute a situation", and in this definition Crabb employs two other words that are figures of place, which if expressed literally would read:

> "Many things which stand around cause to stand together a location or site."

It will be seen therefore that we move from the concrete to the abstract, from things seen to things not seen, and here again the two words "concrete" and "abstract" are figures derived from the senses. Concrete meaning "to grow together". Abstract means "to draw apart". The concrete "like" has the abstract "likeness"; the concrete "father and son" have the abstract "paternity" and "filiation" (see Mill). In "Pilgrim's Progress" the character called "Honest" said of himself "Not Honesty in the abstract, but Honest is my name". Even the word "figure" in the term "figure of speech" is itself a "figure", for it is derived from a word that means "shape". So also is the word "speech" his is foreign to modern thought, but if the reader can put himself in spirit back into O.T. times, the aptness of the figure will be appreciated.

The Greek equivalent to zakar is mnaomai. This Greek verb has two meanings: (1) to woo, to court, to sue for, and to solicit (Matt. i. 18) and (2) to think, and to remember. In all probability they were originally one in meaning, for there is not a great distance between thinking much of a thing, and trying to get it. In the Epic and the Ionic dialects mnaomai was used in both significations, but later mimneskomai was confined to "thinking" or "remembering" while mnaomai was used exclusively of "wooing" or "soliciting". This note may be necessary, as students who consult Dr. Bullinger's Lexicon will not find mnaomai in the body of the book, a note in the Greek and English Index reading mnaomai, see mimnesko. Mnaomai suggests the sequence re-mind, re-collect and re-member, and is found in the Greek N.T. in about nineteen or twenty forms and combinations. Mnemonics is an English word derived from this Greek root, and means "the act of memory; the principles and rules of some method to assist the memory". In this category we must place the Acrostic Psalms, of which Psa. cxix. is an outstanding example. While it is evident that amnesia (a word used to indicate loss of memory), is derived from this same Greek root, it may not be so generally known that an "amnesty" is also from the same, and means "an act of oblivion".

> "The past shall be covered with a general amnesty" (Macaulay).

It will not serve our purpose to quote every occurrence of the twenty forms of mnaomai, but there are a number that have to do with the understanding, or the attaining to meaning, that must be recorded. The place that memory plays in arriving at meaning and truth is plainly indicated in the promise of the Comforter:

> "He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you" (John xiv. 26).
> "These things have I told you, that when the time shall come, ye may remember that I told you of them" (John xvi. 4).

Earlier in John's Gospel the part that memory plays is suggested in the language of chapter ii. 17 and 22.

> "And His disciples remembered that it was written, The zeal of Thine house hath eaten Me up."

In arriving at an understanding of the Saviour's meaning, when He "spake of the temple of His body" memory played a part for the passage continues:

> "When therefore He was risen from the dead, His disciples remembered that He had said this unto them; and they believed the scripture, and the word which Jesus had said" (John ii. 22).

Again in connexion with the ride into Jerusalem we read:

> "These things understood not His disciples at the first: but when Jesus was glorified, then remembered they that these things were written of Him, and that they had done these things unto Him" (John xii. 16).

Peter stresses the value of remembrance saying:

> "Wherefore I will not be negligent to put you always in remembrance of these things . . . . . Yea, I think it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up by putting you in remembrance" (II Pet. i. 12, 13).
> "This second epistle, beloved, I now write unto you; in both which I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance, that ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets, and of the commandment of us the apostles of the Lord and Saviour" (II Pet. iii. 1, 2).

In Peter's estimate memory is associated with a stirring up of the mind. Diegeiro occurs just seven times in the N.T. and in the five references other than those used by Peter, the word is used of one awaking from a sleep (Matt. i. 24; Mark iv. 38, 39; Luke viii. 24); and the effect upon the sea of a great wind (John vi. 18). Moses too was inspired to stress the value of remembrance and the danger and evil of forgetfulness.

> "And thou shalt remember all the way which the LORD thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness . . . . . Beware that thou forget not . . . . . thine heart be lifted up, and thou forget . . . . . but thou shalt remember the LORD thy God . . . . . if thou do at all forget . . . . . ye shall surely perish" (Deut. viii. 2, 11, 14, 18, 19, 20).

To recapitulate. The sense impressions received from the external world provide us with the basic material of thought, but these basic materials only minister to thought when they can be examined and compared and when deductions can be drawn from the results of this comparison. Without memory, we should be for ever making bricks, but never building. Each day we should receive the impressions made through the eye, the ear, the taste, touch and smell, but we should never be able to translate these into terms of thought unless we could re-call them at will, or at least by effort.

At long last memory will be seen to become almost synonymous with identity. A man who has lost his memory, has lost his identity. A man is an individual who possesses one peculiar set of memories, memories that, while they include others, are memories that belong to him and to him alone. At the resurrection, a new body will be provided, but given to this new body will be the one and only individual memory that makes you, YOU. Unless we remember the past, we shall not be able to realize the wonder of redemption, forgiveness or the many blessings of grace. Without memory, we might as well have never existed and never have been redeemed.

Having the material, the sense impressions, and having the power to recall them, reason is made possible. Reason is much more than redeemed impressions, but remembered impressions are essential to reason. Shakespeare in his wonderful way speaks of memory as "the warder of the brain" and as "the receipt of reason". We must consider this next step on the road to "meaning" namely "reason", in our next article.

No.5. Reason.
pp. 157 - 159

We have seen that sense impressions apart from memory could form no basis for the exercise of thought, but that memory enables the mind to re-collect these impressions, and so make the comparison of one impression with another possible. Thus, the way is open for that process of the mind, which we call "reason". The word "reason" is derived from the Latin ratio. Ratio means essentially a calculation or a reckoning, and ratiocination is the act or process of deducing consequences from premises.

Because some have placed reason in the place that faith should occupy, and because the true and beautiful word "rational" has been degraded by the term "rationalism", that is no justification for denying the supreme place that the exercise of reason holds in the process of thought. Whoever uses a grammatical sentence intelligently employs reason, for there is a logical connexion between noun and verb, between adjective and noun, etc., that makes language what it is. We have heard of some who "want a religion without argument" but such are confusing terms. Without argument, a book would be but a collection of words without association, relation or intention. Reason has been explained as "the power of thinking consecutively; the power of passing in mental review all the facts and principles bearing on a subject, and after carefully considering their bearings, drawing conclusions" ("Lloyd Encyclopædic Dictionary"). The "Oxford Dictionary" defines reason as "a statement of some fact (real or alleged) employed as an argument to justify or condemn some act, prove or disprove some assertion, idea, or belief".

"Reason issues in judgment, and judgment leads to a conclusion. Judgment is the act or process of the mind in ascertaining the truth by comparison of ideas, facts or propositions. It is the examination of the relationship between one proposition and another. It is the faculty of judging wisely, truly, or skillfully: discernment, discrimination, good sense" (Unknown author).

At last in this attempt at definition, the word "sense" emerges, as we found that it did earlier. We employ our senses, to enable us to attain to the sense of any statement, but this use of the "senses" to arrive at the "sense" is by the employment of what is called "commonsense" which is but reason dressed in lowly garb. Reasoning can be an indication of unbelief, and the verb dialogizomai is employed many times in this sense (see Matt. xvi. 7; Mark ii. 6), yet who will accuse Mary of unbelief when we read that she "cast in her mind" what manner of salutation it was that the Angel had given her? (Luke i. 29), or shall we accuse Caiaphas of indiscretion when he use this same word saying "nor consider that it is expedient for us that one man should die for the people"? (John xi. 50).

Paul however is the great "reasoner" of Scripture, yet who is his equal as a man of faith? Not only does he "reason" out of the Scriptures, but his epistles abound in logical particles. First, let us acquaint ourselves with passages that tell us that in the exercise of his ministry Paul "reasoned". We shall find the word in the Acts of the Apostles, and it is translated "reason", "dispute" and "preach", while the one occurrence in the epistles is found in Heb. xii. 5 where the reference is to God Himself, and the word is translated "speaketh".

> "And ye have forgotten the exhortation which speaketh (reasoneth) unto you as unto children" (Heb. xii. 5).

Let us tabulate the references in the Acts:

> "And Paul, as his manner was, went in unto them, and three sabbath days reasoned with them out of the Scriptures" (Acts xvii. 2).

Let us note the following facts. This took place in the synagogue, a place devoted to the worship of the Lord, to prayer, to the reading of the Scriptures, and to exhortation and teaching. Even if this had been the only record of Paul's teaching, the words "as his manner was" would compel us to recognize that "reasoning out of the Scriptures" was a characteristic of his ministry. Moreover this took place upon the Sabbath, was repeated on successive Sabbaths, so that "reasoning" was a calculated method adopted by the apostle, not something done in the heat of the moment and regretted afterwards. Finally, note that Paul did not simply "reason" he reasoned "out of the Scriptures". The Scriptures were his premises, his teaching was but the drawing of conclusions, the method was that of comparison and observation of things that differ. Would to God that there were more such "reasoners" and "reasonings". The choice really lies between such acceptable preaching and the blind acceptance of "authority" which no true Berean can tolerate. In the same chapter of Acts that tells us that Paul reasoned out of the Scriptures on the sabbath day, we find him "disputing" not only with the Jews in their synagogue, but in the market place at Athens.

Dealing with pagan idolators and philosophers, Paul could not reason with them out of the Scriptures, for they did not accept his premises, he simply "disputed" (same Greek word) and based his argument upon the conscious failure of their religion, "the unknown god" (Acts xvii. 23) and of their accepted teaching concerning the nature of man (28). Here therefore, is a warrant for sanctified "reasoning" where the Scriptures are unknown.

We follow the footsteps of the apostle from Athens to Corinth, from Corinth to Ephesus, on to Troas and finally private witness at Jerusalem, and on seven more occasions the Scriptures record his faithful "reasoning" and "disputing".

> "He reasoned in the synagogue every sabbath, and persuaded the Jews and the Greeks" (Acts xviii. 4).
>
> "And he came to Ephesus . . . . . entered into the synagogue, and reasoned with the Jews" (Acts xviii. 19).
>
> "And he went into the synagogue, and spake boldly for the space of three months, disputing (reasoning) and persuading the things concerning the kingdom of God . . . . . he separated the disciples, disputing (reasoning) daily in the school of one Tyrannus. And this continued by the space of two years; so that all they which dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus, both Jews and Greeks" (Acts xix. 8, 9, 10).
>
> "And upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached (reasoned) unto them, ready to depart on the morrow; and continued his speech until midnight . . . . . and as Paul was long preaching . . . . ." (Acts xx. 7, 9).
> "And as he reasoned of righteousness, temperance and judgment to come, Felix trembled" (Acts xxiv. 25).

There are one or two features of special importance that must not be overlooked in this record. The apostle's "reasoning" at Ephesus was so helpful that the Jews desired him to tarry longer, but although he had to leave them he promised to return. This he did, and for the space of another three months he "disputed" or "reasoned" with them. The goal of this disputing was their "persuasion", the subject of their persuasion was "the kingdom of God", while the persuasion itself was an act of faith, peitho being allied with pistis "faith". When separation became necessary, the disciples were removed from the synagogue and the little company met in a school, and this witness continued for two years, and as a result of this two years "disputing" all that dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus. Here we have the seal of God upon this sanctified exercise of reason, confirmed by signs and wonders wrought by the hands of Paul. In Acts xx. 7 and 9 dialegomai is actually translated "preach" in the A.V. which the R.V. changes to "discourse". A very little while after this, the apostle summed up his ministry saying that he had kept back nothing that was profitable, but that he had showed, and taught, in public and private, testifying repentance and faith, and that as a consequence he was "pure from the blood of all men".

Finally, when Paul had the opportunity of preaching the gospel to a Roman Governor, we are told that he "reasoned" of righteousness, temperance and judgment to come. These nine passages that reveal Paul's accustomed manner of preaching are given us as a "pattern", and we should be very suspicious of that form of teaching that says, because man has fallen and his faculties have become warped by sin, that we should exclude "reason" and simply accept upon the authority of anyone who cares to lord it over our faith any doctrine that may be brought forward.

The Bereans were well pleasing to the Lord for the very opposite quality. They did not "accept" without previous examination, they search the Scriptures daily, to discover whether the things taught by Paul were "so". In the next article of this series we will devote all our available space to the examination of Paul's epistles in order to discover his use of what we call "the logical particles" of discourse. While we must never be numbered among the “reasoners” who explain away the Truth of God, let us rejoice in the fact that at salvation the mind has been “renewed” and whether in testifying to others, or reading for ourselves, the things believed (like the offering of our bodies), must be reasonable (logikos) service. Less than this dishonours both God and man who was made in the image of his Maker.

No.6. Some logical particles.
pp. 238 - 241

We have seen that in the quest for “sense”, the mind advances from sense impressions to reason by the aid of memory. We have seen that to “reason out of Scriptures” was an outstanding characteristic of Paul’s ministry, and we should strenuously resist any attempt by a teacher of the authoritarian school (the school so contrary to the Berean spirit) to intimidate us by a disproportionate emphasis upon the failure of human reason to arrive at the truth.

As a supplement to the study of Paul’s manner which occupied our space in article No.5, we devote the present article to an examination of some of the logical particles which of themselves imply a reasoning faculty, and which are of such frequent and pointed occurrence in his writings.

conjunction, an adjective or an adverb. "That" is used to introduce a clause which is logically the subject, the object, or a necessary complement of an essential part of the principle sentence. It introduces the reason, purpose, object or end. Let us take as an illustration of the following:

Hina in classical Greek is an adverb of place, and this sense of direction is inherent when it is used as a conjunction. It indicates an end or a goal, and so should be translated "in order that", "to the end that", "with the object that". Dr. Bullinger comments "thus hope is followed by hoti which represents the object of the hope, while prayer is followed by hina showing the purpose and design of the prayer".

In many instances hina is followed by the subjunctive mood, to signify the objective, possibility or intention, "in order that it might be". In other cases it is followed by the indicative pointing to the fact rather than to the mere possibility. Keeping to Rom. i. we note as examples of hina "for I long to see you IN ORDER THAT I may impart unto you some spiritual gift IN ORDER THAT I might have some fruit" (Rom. i. 11, 13). And, passing over to Rom. iv., we have the important statement of doctrine, "therefore it is of faith, IN ORDER THAT it might be by grace" (Rom. iv. 16).

Hoti. This word expresses the substance or content, and then the reason why anything is said to be or to be done, "because", "since", "for that".

> "First I thank my God . . . . . THAT (because) your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world" (Rom. i. 8).
>
> "Now I would not have you ignorant, brethren, THAT often times I purposed to come unto you" (Rom. i. 13).

Hos. This word is used in comparisons.

> "For God is my witness . . . . . THAT (how that) without ceasing I make mention of you" (Rom. i. 9).

It is evident therefore by these few examples taken mainly from Rom. i., how "logical" is the method of Paul's presentation of the truth.

Let us turn our attention to another term which will repay examination. Men . . . . . de. Lexicographers have differed over the origin of the particle men. Some see in it a derivation from the Hebrew that supplies us with the word "Amen", but it is more generally considered to be formed from the Greek word that means "one" even as de which so often follows it, is but a shortened form of duo "two". "On the other hand" is a somewhat clumsy way of expressing these two words in English. De is frequently employed, when something new is subjoined, distinct or different from what proceeds, though not strictly its very opposite.

An example of the us of men . . . . . de is found in Rom. vi. 11.

> "Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed (men) unto sin, but (de) alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord."

An example of the way in which men . . . . . de is not fully translated in the A.V. is provided in Rom. v. 16.

> "For the judgment (on the one hand) was by one to condemnation, but (on the other hand) the free gift is of many offences unto justification" (Rom. v. 16).

We will not multiply examples, but give a few further references, where the A.V. gives no sign that the words men . . . . . de are in the original. I Cor. i. 12, 18, 23; Gal. iv. 8, 23, 24; Phil. i. 16, 28; iii. 13, are passages that should be examined and noted. In Hebrews there are eighteen passages where these discriminating particles men . . . . . de occur, but in six passages only is there an English equivalent in the A.V.

It will not be possible, neither is it necessary, that we should give examples or tabulate the many logical particles that are found in the N.T.; we will be content with one more, and that the word "IF". Shakespeare, that master of words, says "there is much virtue in your if", and the old saying has it, that:

> "If 'ifs' and 'ans' were pots and pans,
> All the world would tinkers be."

"If" ei puts the condition simply, "for if, when we were enemies we were reconciled to God" (Rom. v. 10). "For if through the offence of one many be dead" (Rom. v. 15). Here "if" assumes the hypothesis as an actual fact, no doubt being thrown upon the supposition "for if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised" (I Cor. xv. 16). If of course the word is followed by the subjunctive or the optative mood, then conjecture and uncertainty necessarily enter.

Ean, is strictly a combination of ei "if" and an "haply". Ean implies an objective possibility, and refers therefore to something future. It is usually followed by the subjunctive mood, which expresses a condition of uncertainty. "For circumcision verily profiteth, if thou keep the law" (Rom. ii. 25). "But if the husband be dead, she is loosed from the law of her husband" (Rom. vii. 2).

Other variants are eige and eite. Eige "If at least", "if indeed", "If ye have heard of the dispensation" (Eph. iii. 2). Eite "whether", "if a man speak in an unknown tongue" (I Cor. xiv. 27). We leave the student the happy labour of patiently examining the epistles of Paul and of extracting from them the many and varied particles of speech that the Apostle uses in his logical enforcement of the doctrine that is according to godliness. We cannot arrive at the sense of a passage if we ignore the sequences, the links, the steps that lead on from one conclusion to another. Even the title of Christ "The Word" means much more than an articulate sound, logos implies a reason as well as word, Christ is the logical account of God. He is the Divine Reason and Purpose made manifest. Ultimately we can only arrive at the "sense" of God and His Redeeming Love through Christ, but in a lesser degree we arrive at this "sense" through the mediation of the language that is employed to express ideas.

We must now turn our attention more particularly to the Scriptures under three headings, Revelation, Translation and Interpretation. This we hope to do in subsequent articles.

HEBREWS

Perfection or Perdition

No.1. The evidence for the Pauline authorship.

pp. 84 - 88

In the year 1918 we commenced a series of studies in the epistle to the Hebrews that continued until 1930, but there can be very few readers to-day who possess volumes VIII-XX, and even if these volumes are still in use, they are not accessible to readers who have become interested in Dispensational Truth during the last thirty years. We therefore propose a new set of studies, in which the epistle will be opened up afresh, and pray that its meditation may be blessed. It is quite the fashion to believe that almost any name except that of Paul should stand at the head of this epistle, and while we do not intend wading through this controversy, readers will find a fair amount of material for the pros and cons in the commentaries of Alford and Wordsworth. One work on the subject of Pauline authorship cannot be passed over so lightly, and that is Forster on the Epistle to the Hebrews published in 1853 and now only to be obtained at second hand. Its 670 pages are literally crammed with examples in which the peculiar diction, grammar and mannerisms of Paul, taken from his acknowledged epistles, are echoed in Hebrews. We can give one or two as specimens only, the complete presentation of evidence demands more than we can attempt in articles of this character.

1.) In Heb. x. 30 the author quotes from Deut. xxxii. 35 but does not give a literal translation of the Hebrew, nor a literal quotation of the LXX. In Rom. xii. 19 Paul quotes from the same passage, and uses the same personal and peculiar translation that is employed in Hebrews. That is evidence of identical authorship.

2.) Words peculiar to Paul. Agon "race", "fight", "conflict", a word borrowed from the Grecian games. This word occurs in Phil. i. 30; Col. ii. 1; I Thess. ii. 2; I Tim. vi. 12; II Tim. iv. 7 and in Heb. xii. 1. Upon examination we find that the context of Heb. xii. 1 uses such words as "run", "patience", "witness", "faith", "perfect" that are characteristic of the context of the Apostle's usage elsewhere.

3.) Sometimes a passage in an undoubted epistle must be read with one in Hebrews, before the full meaning of the word used can be assessed. For example the word "mediator" occurs in Gal. iii. 20 and in Heb. viii. 6; ix. 15. In Galatians the mediation of Moses is treated of, while the Mediation of Christ is left to be inferred. The references in Hebrews however supplement this and give prominence to Christ, the mediation of Moses being rather inferred from the word "better" than from any explicit statement.

4.) "All things under His feet."

These words taken from Psa. viii. are found nowhere else in the N.T. than in I Cor. xv. 27; Eph. i. 22 and Heb. ii. 8. The peculiar argument of Corinthians "It is manifest that He is excepted which did put all things under Him" is echoed by a similar argument in Hebrews "He left nothing that is not put under Him" and indicates identity of authorship.

5.) "The just shall live by faith."

These words are taken from Habakkuk, and are found in Romans, Galatians and Hebrews, and nowhere else in the N.T. The apostle does not quote the actual words found in Habakkuk, but gives his own rendering. The words found in Rom. i. 17 and in Heb. x. 38 are identical. This is just another evidence of identical authorship.

6.) In Galatians Paul allegorizes, and uses the record of Genesis concerning Ishmael and Isaac to enforce the difference between Jerusalem that is below and in bondage and Jerusalem that is above and free (Gal. iv. 21-31). A similar use of Sinai with its blackness and darkness and Mount Sion with its angels and firstborn manifests the same hand (Heb. xii. 18-26).

In The Christian for 27th April and 4th May, 1916, there appeared two articles by J. W. Thirtle, LL.D., wherein the writer sought to show that the epistle to the Hebrews "in very early times followed that to the Galatians". Quoting from this interesting article:

> "What, in reality, do we find? Just this—two epistles or writings, in close succession, in a professedly Pauline section of the New Testament, are merely separated or divided off, the one from the other, by the words pros Hebraious—'to Hebrews'."

The writer proceeds to give evidence to prove that the epistle to the Galatians is the "covering letter" and the epistle to the Hebrews is an "enclosure" written especially for the Hebrew believer in the churches of Galatia. The reader is referred to these articles for the details and evidence brought forward. Parallels between the two epistles are suggested; the quotation of Hab. ii. 4 in Gal. iii. 2 and Heb. x. 38; the covenant teaching of Gal. iii. 15-17; iv. 24; Heb. viii. 6-11; ix. 15-20; x. 16. Both epistles deal with mediatorship (Gal. iii. 19, 20; Heb. viii. 6; ix. 15; xii. 24). Gal. iv. 26 speaks of the Jerusalem that is above, Heb. xii. 22 of the heavenly Jerusalem.

Leaving much that is of interest and help unquoted, we ask the reader's attention to another parallel which immediately comes to our mind. In Gal. iii. 3 the apostle asks:

> "Are ye so foolish? Having begun in the spirit, are ye now PERFECTED in the flesh? Have ye suffered so many things in vain? If it be indeed in vain."

This is practically the question dealt with in Hebrews. The Galatians were in danger of being led back to bondage; to avoid persecution the Judaizers constrained them to be circumcised, and to such the apostle's words are very severe; however, there were some whose attitude towards the flesh enabled them to be designated as the "Israel of God", the name given to Jacob when the hollow of his thigh was withered, and who, after that mighty change, limped in evidence that his spiritual gain meant "no confidence in the flesh".

One subject is dealt with exhaustively in Galatians, namely the place that circumcision holds in the economy of grace. If Hebrews was sent together with Galatians, we have a sufficient explanation. When writing of the better things to the Hebrews, the apostle did not deal with circumcision. The omission even of the word is inexplicable if Hebrews stand alone. If however the covering letter be Galatians then the matter is dealt with once and for all, and the way is open for the Apostle to address the Hebrews with his "word of exhortation" (Heb. xiii. 22).

Returning to the question of authorship, let us consider the evidences that Scripture itself produces that bear upon the reason why the title "Apostle" and the name "Paul" should be withheld from the epistle to the Hebrews.

When we turn to the epistle to the Hebrews, no reference to Paul by name is found either in the salutation or in the body of the epistle, but that the Hebrews to whom the epistle was written knew the identity of the writer is evident, for, toward the close of the epistle he said "Pray for us . . . . . that I may be restored to you the sooner" (Heb. xiii. 18, 19). "Timothy" is also closely associated with the writer (Heb. xiii. 23), and the epistle ends with the words "Grace be with you all. Amen", a salutation which constituted the token of Paul's authorship in each of his epistles, as he states in II Thess. iii. 17, 18.

We an but conjecture the reasons that made Paul omit his name, but we have more positive ground to stand on when we consider the omission of the title "apostle".

(1) Paul was the Apostle to the Gentiles (Rom. xi. 13; Gal. ii. 8; I Tim. ii. 7; II Tim. i. 1).
(2) He was about to write to the Hebrews concerning their calling and confession, and to urge them to consider the Lord Jesus Christ as "The Apostle and High Priest" of this calling and confession (Heb. iii. 1).

While keeping within the bounds of his commission to the Gentiles, Paul spoke with the full authority that apostleship brings, but when he addressed Hebrews he asked them to "suffer the word of exhortation" (Heb. xii. 22), and omitted both his name and the credentials of his authority.

Peter was the Apostle of the Circumcision, and includes the title in the salutation of his two epistles. Towards the close of the second epistle he alludes to something that Paul had written, which must refer to either to some writings now lost and never heard of throughout the history of the church, or to this epistle to the Hebrews. Peter had addressed his first epistle "to the strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia" (I Pet. i. 1), and his second to the same scattered companies (II Pet. iii. 1). There are other evidences that favour the idea that the epistle to the Galatians was a covering letter to the Hebrews, but this must await the completion of our studies in the comparison of Hebrews and Ephesians. For the present purpose attention must now be concentrated on the following facts:

(1) Paul's name, together with his office, appears in the salutation of Ephesians.
Paul's name and office are omitted from the opening of the epistle to the Hebrews.

(2) Paul's name is repeated, together with the new title, "The prisoner of Jesus Christ", in the body of the epistle to the Ephesians (Eph. iii. 1).

Paul's name does not occur once in the whole of the epistle to the Hebrews.

It is therefore evident that Paul's authority as an apostle did not cover this epistle to the Hebrews, and this evidence of the withholding of his authority goes to show that the calling and sphere of the Hebrews was outside of the dispensation entrusted to him.

(3) Paul uses the personal pronoun, ego, three times in Ephesians; "I Paul, the prisoner", "I therefore, the prisoner", "I speak concerning the church" (Eph. iii. 1; iv. 1; v. 32).

Paul never uses ego of himself in the epistle to the Hebrews.

Paul uses eme once in Eph. vi. 21, "my affairs" (lit. the things as to me).

Paul never uses eme in the epistle to the Hebrews.

Paul uses emoi once in Eph. iii. 8, "Unto me, less than the least", with special reference to his peculiar ministry.

Paul uses emoi once of himself in Hebrews, where he says "The Lord is my helper" (Heb. xiii. 6), which obviously has no special bearing upon the calling and sphere of the epistle.

Paul uses emou in Eph. vi. 19 where he asks prayer on his behalf in relation to his stewardship of the Mystery.

Paul never uses emou of himself in the epistle to the Hebrews.

Paul uses me once in Ephesians, namely, vi. 20, where he says, "as I ought to speak".

Paul uses me once of himself in Hebrews, namely, in xi. 32, where he says, "the time would fail me to tell, etc." which once again, has no bearing upon the theme of the epistle.

Paul uses moi four time in Ephesians, each occasion having reference to the ministry of the Mystery, which was his peculiar trust (Eph. iii. 2, 3, 7; vi. 19).

Paul uses moi of himself once in Hebrews, namely at xiii. 6, when he says that he would not fear "what man shall do unto me", which has no ground for comparison with Eph. iii. 2, 3, 7 or vi. 19.

In Ephesians Paul uses mou "my prayers"; "my knowledge"; "my tribulations for you"; "my brethren"; "my mouth" (Eph. i. 16; iii. 4, 13, 14; vi. 10 and 19).

Paul never uses more of himself in the epistle to the Hebrews.

Here is internal evidence that Paul was personally and intentionally identified with the calling which we associate with Ephesians, but that he was not an apostle or a minister of the calling of the Hebrew Christians, to whom the epistle to the Hebrews was written.

One further piece of evidence must suffice. We learn from the second epistle to the Thessalonians, that even at that early date, a false epistle, purporting to have been written by Paul, was in circulation and to assure the reader on this matter the apostle concluded the epistle with these words:

> "The salutation of Paul with mine own hand, which is the token in every epistle. So I write" (II Thess. iii. 17).

Like many another of his day, Paul dictated his letters, and these were written by slaves who were trained pen men. We know the name of the one who wrote out the epistle to the Romans (Rom. xvi. 22) who is seen to be a brother also in the Lord. When dictating the letter to the Galatians, the apostle seems to have been so desirous of gaining their attention, that he finished the epistle with his own hand (Gal. vi. 11). If however we look at the close of any of Paul's epistles, we will not discover the name Paul, consequently there must have been something written by Paul's own hand that would be to all intents his signature. What he wrote with his own hand at the close of II Thessalonians was:

> "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen" (II Thess. iii. 18).

It will therefore be a simple matter to look at the close of Paul's epistles and see whether this holds good.

Galatians. "Brethren, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit. Amen."
I Thessalonians. "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen."
II Thessalonians. "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen."
I Corinthians. "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. My love be with you all in Christ Jesus. Amen."
II Corinthians. "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all. Amen."
Romans. "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all." (Rom. xvi. 24).
Ephesians. "Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. Amen."
Philippians. "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen."
Colossians. "The salutation by the hand of me Paul. Remember my bonds. Grace be with you. Amen."
I Timothy. "Grace be with thee. Amen."
Titus. "Grace be with you all. Amen."
II Timothy. "The Lord Jesus Christ be with thy spirit. Grace be with you. Amen."
Philemon. "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit. Amen."

Here are the salutations of Paul, appended to thirteen of his epistles. They vary in their wording, but use the words "Grace be with you" as the basis of every benediction. We turn to the close of Hebrews, and there we see with our own eyes "the salutation of Paul with his own hand"

"GRACE BE WITH YOU ALL. AMEN."

As a matter of curiosity and obtaining a negative witness, we look at the epistles of James, Jude, John and Peter, seven in all, in none of them do we find the words "Grace be with you" in the salutation. In the presence of this testimony, it matters little what the early fathers thought, or what the opinions of scholars may be, so far as we are concerned, the internal evidence of the epistle itself is all sufficient. We shall therefore speak of the writer of the Hebrews, as Paul, without further proof or apology, and accept as true that fourteen (7*2) epistles from his pen form part of Holy Scripture.

No.2. The scope of the Epistle decided by the structure.
pp. 108 - 110

We have satisfied ourselves as to the Pauline authorship of the epistle to the Hebrews, and believe there is every reason to think that when Paul was dealing with the Galatian problem of the place of the law in the economy of grace, he took the opportunity of using the epistle to the Galatians as a covering letter, dealing with the same problems not from the point of view of the believing Gentile, but from the point of view of the believing Hebrew.

Our next consideration must be to discover the scope of the epistle, "what it is all about", and this is indicated best by the structure. Now while we must not "invent" a structure, for that would stultify our very object, we must admit that the features that constitute the structure of a book or epistle do not always appear on the surface. We look at chapter i., and note its contents, and let our eye glance on to the opening verses of chapter ii. As we do so, something seems to "click", we are conscious of the pressure of a theme that may be the beginning of our quest.

> Heb. i. 1, 2. God hath spoken.
> Heb. ii. 2, 3. If the word spoken . . . . . first began to be spoken by the Lord.

The intervening subject matter stresses the superiority of the "Son" to Prophets, of the "Lord" to angels. We read of others who "spoke" in the chapters that follow, but we are arrested at the reference in Heb. xii. 25 because it is a most evident allusion to chapter ii.

> "See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh. For if they ESCAPED NOT who refused Him that spake on earth, much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from Him that speaketh from heaven."

Here the apostle is most evidently resuming the theme of chapter ii.

> "How shall we ESCAPE, if we neglect so great salvation, which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord" (Heb. ii. 3).

So far so good, but we remind ourselves that "one swallow does not make a summer" and prosecute our investigation. In chapter xiii. the apostle seems to sum up Christian ministry under the heading,

> "Who have spoken unto you the word of God" (Heb. xiii. 7).

We can tentatively record our first findings thus:

A | Heb. i., ii. The word spoken, the Prophets, the Son.

* * * * * * *

A | Heb. xii., xiii. Him, and they, that speak the word.

If these are indeed the opening and closing members of the underlying structure, there will be confirmation in the context. These soon emerges:

> "Thou remainest. Thou art the same" (Heb. i. and ii.).
> "Things that remain. Jesus Christ the same" (Heb. xii. and xiii.).
> "How escape if neglect." "Not escape if refuse" (Heb. ii. and xii.).
> "Bring in again the first begotten." "Brought again from the dead" (Heb. i. and xiii.).

The matter now passes from the possible to the certain. We have the opening and closing members of the structure confirmed to us. We seek further and are struck with the alternations that are brought forward in chapters vi. and x.:

> "Let us GO ON unto perfection" (Heb. vi. 1).
> "We are not of them who DRAW BACK unto perdition" (Heb. x. 39).

These two headings commend themselves at once, and we soon discover that they are supported "up to the hilt" by their contexts. "Let us come boldly" is answered by "let us draw near" (Heb. iv. 16; x. 22). The examples of unbelief of chapter iii. are gloriously answered by the examples of faith in Heb. xi. In chapter v. we have "babes" set over against "full grown", but in chapter xii. we have "sons" over against "firstborn". That dreadful passage which has caused so much anxiety to sensitive souls, "no renewal unto repentance" finds its explanation in the corresponding section of the epistle in Esau who "found no place for repentance", and which shows us that the fear in chapter vi. was not the loss of salvation but of birthright and the firstborn's position.

Let us now assemble our material.

HEBREWS as a Whole.

A | i., ii. THE WORD SPOKEN.
Thou remainest.
Thou art the same.
How escape?
Bring the First begotten.

B | iii.-vi. ON TO PERFECTION.
Let us come boldly.
Example of unbelief.
Perfect v. Babes.
No renewal unto repentance.
Senses exercised.
Crucify afresh the Son of God.

C | vii. - x. 18. PERFECTION, WHERE FOUND.
But this Man.
No perfection in priesthood.
No perfection in law.
No perfection in ordinances.
No perfection in sacrifices.
But this Man.

B | x. 19 - xii. 25. BACK TO PERDITION.
Let us draw near.
Example of faith.
Sons v. Firstborn.
No place for repentance.
Discipline exercised.
Trod under foot the Son of God.

A | xii. 25 - xiii. HIM THAT SPEAKETH.
Things that remain.
Jesus Christ the same.
Not escape if refuse.
Brought from the death.

In chapter v., adults are manifested by the presence, not only of "senses" but "senses exercised", which is balanced in chapter xii. with "discipline exercised". In chapter vi. some are said to crucify afresh the Son of God and in chapter x. we read of those who have trodden under foot the Son of God. There is therefore no possible doubt but that here we have the material for the two flanking members of the central section. Chapters vii. to x. 18 therefore are left in the centre of the structure. This central section develops the flanking slogans "on to perfection" and "back to perdition" by devoting itself to the place where perfection can be found. It opens and closes with a reference to "This Man", the Man Christ Jesus.

The earnest student will "search and see" and make this structure his own. We are now mercifully granted an infallible guide in our researches in this epistle, though we ourselves may be very slow to avail ourselves of its help.

Throughout the series of studies now commencing we shall seek to honour this God-given structure by continually aligning our comments and discoveries with its general bearing. Let no one accuse us of bombast; we no more "invented" this structure than Christopher Columbus "invented" America. We simply discovered what is there already, and give God thanks.

No.3. An examination of the alternatives of Hebrews vi. 1 and x. 39.

pp. 129 - 134

The two foci "Perfection" and "Perdition" must now be given attention, for if we are wrong in our apprehension of their respective meanings, we shall necessarily miss the argument of the whole epistle. The English word "perfect" is made up of per "through" and facio "to do", and from this same facio comes our word "fact". So, the English word suggests the salutary idea of "making a doctrinal truth an experimental fact". The Greek word "perfection" is teleiotes, one of a number of words derived from telos "the end". The fundamental conception in all the variants of this word, teleios, teleioo, teleiotes, teleiosis, to say nothing of compounds made with apo, ana, en, epi, dia and sun, is that of taking whatever is in hand or in view to a finish or conclusion. This feature can be demonstrated in several ways:

(1) "Perfecting holiness" (II Cor. vii. 1).

Of all subjects, the one that cannot conceivably be "improved" must be holiness, and without the context such an expression as "to perfect holiness" seems to be more senseless and impossible than it would be "to gild the lily or to paint the rose". If however we observe the context of this exhortation, we shall see that practical sanctification is in view. Not to be unequally yoked with unbelievers is to "perfect holiness"; to remember that, if we are looked upon as the temple of the living God, there can be no possible agreement with idols and with the promise attached to the separation from any unclean thing, the apostle says "Having therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us CLEANSE OURSELVES from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, PERFECTING HOLINESS in the fear of God" (II Cor. vii. 1). Perfecting, making what is yours by gift, grace and reckoning "a fact", per-fect. In other words taking sanctification to its logical conclusion.

(3) "The perfect" is sometimes used to indicate an adult, as over against the immature or the babe:

"Ye have need that one teach again which be the first principles of the oracles of God are become such as have need of milk, and not of strong meat. For every one that useth milk is unskilful in the word of righteousness; for he is a babe. But strong meat belongeth to them that are of full age (teleios)". (Heb. v. 12-14). The connection between this passage and the opening exhortation of Heb. vi. is plain. In Eph. iv. 13,14 we have the perfect man placed over against children, and I Cor. ii. & iii. with its use of "perfect" and its "babes", its "milk" and its "meat", is another evidence that the writer of Corinthians wrote the epistle to the Hebrews.

(4) The figure of a race or contest uses these words. Heb. xii. 2 just quoted associates the "finisher" with "running the race", and Paul, who in Philippians was running with the prize of the high calling in view, confessed that he was not at that time "perfect", is permitted in his last epistle to realize that he had touched the tape, saying:

"I have fought a good fight (agona "race" Heb. xii. 1),
I have finished (teleo) my course,
I have kept the faith; henceforth . . . . . a crown" . (II Tim. iv. 7, 8).

It is utterly impossible to believe that the Saviour could be "improved" morally or spiritually, and where it says "He learned obedience by the things which He suffered, and being made perfect" (Heb. v. 8, 9) it indicates that He went through "to the end", and as a consequence He became "the author" of eternal salvation; in Heb. ii. 10 "The Captain of our salvation" was made "perfect" through sufferings, and in Heb. xii. 1, 2 He became "the author" and "the finisher", and for the joy set before Him endured the cross.

We shall meet with these words, these derivatives of telos "the finish" or "the end" in about thirty passages in Hebrews, and when we meet with them in the ordinary course of exposition, we can deal with their immediate bearing on the passage in hand, our comprehension being already enriched and illumined by the present survey.

Turning from Perfection, we face the dread alternative, Perdition. In view of the many statements of Scripture that the redeemed shall "never perish", "shall not come into condemnation" and the like assurances, the idea of any child of God drawing back unto perdition sounds untrue. If we mean by "perdition" the orthodox theological view given by the Oxford Dictionary, for example "the condition of final damnation; the fate of those in hell, eternal death", then our objections are valid, but if we are resting our arguments upon the usage of the English term, we are unwise. We must be guided by the usage of the original word. Apoleia and apollumi are both compounds of luo "to loose" and in the majority of cases the meaning of the word apollumi is expressed by the words "perish" or "be destroyed". In some places, this "perishing" is modified as in the expression "the lost sheep of the house of Israel", and a further suggestive aspect of the term is seen in the translation "lose his ward" or "lose his life for My sake". In Luke xv. apollumi is used of the "lost" piece of money, the "lost sheep" and the "lost" son, who himself said "I perish with hunger". Coming to Hebrews, we find the word in chapter i. 11 "they shall perish" used of creation. Apoleia "perdition" occurs twenty times in the New Testament and is used of the broad way that leadeth to "destruction", of "damnable" heresies, of "pernicious ways" and eight times of "perdition". John xvii. 12 uses this term of Judas, who is called the son of perdition, and II Thess. ii. 3 uses the same title for "the man of sin".

We must not omit to consider the bearing of context when attempting to interpret any word in Scripture, and we find that the word "perdition" in Hebrews is set in a context of persecution, long endurance, with the prospect of a "great recompense of reward", but that owing to the wearing down of patience and the frailty of the strongest under trial, there was a need to urge these tempted souls to cast not away their confidence, to remember that a little while and He that shall come will come and will not tarry and that during this hour of testing "the just shall live by faith"; the alternative being the drawing back unto perdition. In Phil. iii. we find the Apostle using the same words "perfect" and "perdition" in close connection with the attaining to the prize of the high calling:

> "Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect: but I follow after . . . . . I press . . . . . for the prize" (Phil. iii. 12-14).

Then follows the warning concerning those whose example is evil, who by their attitude make themselves enemies of the cross,

> "whose end is perdition (destruction)" (Phil. iii. 17-19).

It is not conceivable that believers who had reached so high a standard as these Philippians should need to be exhorted not to follow the ungodly pagans among whom their lot was cast. The warning is uttered about the example of Christians, whose God is their belly, who glory in their shame, who mind earthly things, who by their self-indulgence antagonize all that the "cross" stands for, in contrast with those whose conversation is in heaven. We observe that in Heb. x., the loss of a "reward" is in view; in Phil. iii., the loss of the "prize" is in view. Further light upon the intention of the apostle in Heb. x., may be gathered from the use of apoleia in Matt. xxvi. 8, where it is used in a non-doctrinal sense:

> "But when His disciples saw it, they had indignation, saying, To what purpose is this WASTE?"

In I Corinthians we have those who are "perfect" (I Cor. ii. 6) placed over against those who were "babes", who were fed with "milk" and not with "meat", just as we have in Heb. v. In Heb. vi., the apostle introduces the figure of husbandry, even as he does in I Cor. iii. 9 and says:

> "That which beareth thorns and briers is rejected, and is NIGH UNTO cursing; whose end is to be burned" (Heb. vi. 8), and these thus figured lacked those things that "accompany salvation" not salvation itself. So in I Cor. iii.:

> "If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer LOSS: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire" (I Cor. iii. 15).

Again observe, the alternative to suffering loss, is receiving a REWARD (I Cor. iii. 14). The alternatives in Hebrews are "going on unto perfection" or "drawing back unto perdition" and we must not so interpret "perdition" as to leave in the mind that the alternatives are "going on unto salvation" or "drawing back to eternal punishment". The former word "perfection", with its associated meanings, influences the application of the latter word "perdition" with its associated warnings.

We have seen the scope of this epistle set out in the structure and have some idea of the meaning of the alternatives set before the reader. We must now return to the opening chapter to learn what encouragements are offered and what warnings given to accomplish the twofold purpose of these exhortations. We close the present study with a comparison. What the Sermon on the Mount is to the calling of the kingdom on earth, and what Hebrews is to the high calling of the Mystery. In each we have the alternations of Perfection or Perdition (Matt. v. 48; vii. 13; Heb. vi. 1; x. 39 and Phil. iii. 12, 19) together with Reward or Prize. It will therefore be a fitting close to the present study if we exhibit the extraordinary literary correspondence that exists between Hebrews and Philippians.

Need we repeat that Hebrews does not directly minister to the church which is the Body of Christ? What we have learned is that there is a parallel in the ways of God with His redeemed people, whether they are members of the Bride or the Body, the earthly Kingdom or the Church. And as the principle of Hebrews has been so fully developed, it is necessary that we should acquaint ourselves with it, so that we shall perceive the true place with Philippians has in regard to the Church.

The hope of the Church cannot be taught from Philippians. There is no room for the words, "If by any means I might attain" in connexion with our blessed hope. Philippians deals with those things which accompany salvation, and is therefore rightly associated with a prize, with pursuing, with examples unto perfection or perdition.

pp. 189 - 194

"God, Who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by His Son" (Heb. i. 1, 2).

Many pages have been written in the attempt to express accurately the meaning of "sundry times" and "divers manners", but so far as we are concerned, all we need to remember is that the Old Testament Scriptures wherein God spake to the fathers were given over a long period of time through the ministry of many prophets, and that a variety of means was adopted, law, prophecy and type bulking large. Let it suffice, with Moffatt, that "many were the forms and fashions" that God employed, or with Weymouth "in many distinct messages and by various methods" or even with Theodoret (386A.D.) "in various dispensations, pantodapas oikonomias", God has spoken. What is important is that in Heb. i. 2 we are compelled to face a wondrous change and focus our attention on one glorious Person:

> "Hath in these last days spoken unto us by His Son."

The transition being easily visualized as follows:

A | In sundry times (i.e. in earlier dispensations).
B | Unto the fathers.
C | By the prophets.
A | In these last days (i.e. in the opening of the New Testament).
B | Unto us (The Hebrews).
C | By His Son.

It is interesting to see that Theodoret uses the word "dispensation" and the reader may be further interested to know that Clement of Alexandria (192A.D.) uses the word at least fifty times in his writings. The way many believers speak today of "Dispensationalism" one would think that it was some newly invented catch-word of modernism; or even the copyright slogan of The Berean Expositor!

"In these last days." When Paul refers to the last days in his epistles to Timothy, he is looking down the centuries to the closing days of the present dispensation; here in

Heb. i. 2 the closing days of the Jewish dispensation are intended. The true reading of Heb. i. 2 suggests the translation "at the end of these days" (see note in The Companion Bible). The Rabbis divided time into "this age" or "the coming age". Peter uses the expression in Acts ii. in this sense, "for to take his words in any other sense (as some do for the last days of the world) is to make an allegation utterly impertinent and monstrous" (Dr. J. Lightfoot). Some see in "these last days" the commencement of the new dispensation which goes right on unto the Second Coming of Christ. Alford's comment on this is, "It is not of a beginning, but of an expiring period, the writer is speaking". The Gospel according to Matthew is most obviously a continuation of the Old Testament, the new dispensation of the grace of God awaited the resurrection of the Saviour and the commission of the apostle Paul. The parable puts it like this:

> "But last of all (not first of all) He sent unto them His Son, saying, They will reverence My Son" (Matt. xxi. 37).

The sending of the Son represents therefore a climax. It is evident from the reading of the A.V. that "the Son" is placed in antithesis with "the prophets", but the reader may wonder why the word his is printed in italics in the A.V. Usually the italicized words in the A.V. are added by the translators, but when we remove the word "His" it leaves an unreadable phrase, "by Son". We discover that the preposition translated "by" is en "in", but still we may feel "in Son" to be a strange way of speaking. God did not speak through the Son as He had spoken through the prophets or even as He had spoken in the prophets; at last God became incarnate, no longer using the mouth of an Isaiah, or a Jeremiah, but partaking of human flesh and blood, God spake "IN SON". Moses, the greatest of the prophets, we learn, was after all but a servant, Christ is the Son (Heb. iii. 5, 6).

God is invisible, Christ is the image of the invisible God. No one hath seen God at any time; in Old Testament days the Word revealed Him, and in the last of the days, the Word made flesh revealed Him. Theology often mystifies, and by such unscriptural expressions as "the eternal generation of the Son" has made the Word of God of none effect. We sometimes read or hear, "The Old Testament reveals the Father. The Gospels the Son, and the Epistles the Spirit"; this is untrue. Shut up to the Old Testament, what should we know of God as Father? The allusions to God as a Father may be counted upon the fingers; this is true also of the Son. Sonship and Fatherhood commence together; a man is not a father until his child is born. This in no wise touches either the Deity or the pre-existence of Christ, for as the Word He was in the beginning, and was God.

When the Word became flesh, then His glory, as the only begotten of the Father, could be seen. Christ was not man when "in the form of God", but when He took upon Him "the form of a servant" He was "made in the likeness of men" (Phil. ii. 6, 7). There is need for more care than has been used among us with regard to the titles of God; how many have used the argument to belittle Christ that the Father is greater than the Son. This has power only upon the mind if the word Father and God are considered synonymous. What we need to realize more is that the invisible God has manifested Himself to us in the Person of the Father as well as in the Person of the Son, and that while, for the purpose of His grace, one manifestation may be spoken of as greater than another, this in no wise touches the question of essential Deity.

When Scripture itself urges us to consider the fact that the Word when made flesh came down, laid aside His glory, humbled Himself, was made subject even to earthly parents, we are led to expect that the Father would be greater than He. The Son continually speaks of Himself as "the sent One" (see John's Gospel), and that the words He spake, the works He wrought were not His but the Father's Who had sent Him; and this, and so much more, is brought to notice by the omission of the articles in Heb. i. 2. If we could but appreciate the un-English expression, "God spake in Son", understanding it as we should, "God spake in flesh", or "was manifest in flesh", as "in English" or "in Greek". The Hebrew beth, translated mostly "in", must be studied before the full meaning of "in Son" can be realized. Take for example Exod. vi. 3, "I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, B'EL SHADDAI", literally in God Almighty; again, in Exod. xviii. 4, the words "the God of my father was mine help", are literally "was in my help".

Psa. xxxix. 6 gives an example where the translators have sought to retain the "in" by changing the words that follow, "in a vain shew"; this is literally "in image". Another confessed instance of this beth essential is found in A.V. of Prov. iii. 26, "for the LORD shall be thy confidence", literally, "in thy confidence".

In the Person of the Son, God has not merely added another name to the long list of prophets, He has provided a Theophany, He has spoken "in Son", and "in flesh".

When we consider the glorious titles that are given the Son in the very next verses, we shall have the Scripture's own comment upon the meaning of the passage before us. May the grace of God herein manifested to us be thankfully acknowledged, and may the fact that He has sent His Son be to us the greatest thing in the world. The apostle has evidently led up to this extraordinary statement that characterized the last of the days, and apparently intended to develop at once the superiority of "Him that speaketh" over all the prophets and priests, but the wonder of this Person held his ravished attention. He could not go on until he had established Him as the altogether lovely One in the eyes of his readers. It is the very focus and centre of Hebrews that all else may perish and will perish, law, priest, sacrifice, yea creation itself, but the apostle exultantly teaches that so long as He "remaineth", all is well. Consequently we gladly bide, while this lover of Christ brings some of the glories of the Son before the eyes of the Hebrews to whom he writes. We must devote ourselves later on to the Person of the Son, but before doing so, let us follow the apostle as he begins to enlarge upon the glories and the wonders of the Saviour.

The first of His glories is that God hath appointed Him HEIR OF ALL THINGS.

> "The Son, as God, hath a natural dominion over all. To this He can be no more appointed, than He can be to God" (John Owen).

Did the passage stand alone, we might feel that the "appointing" here as Heir of all things took place at the Incarnation, the Baptism or some other period of the Saviour's earthly life, but the statement that follows "by Whom also He made the worlds" takes us back to the beginning, and so forbids such an interpretation. It should be noted that God as the "Father" has not yet been mentioned by name. It is "God" (Elohim) Who spoke to the fathers by the prophets, it is "God" that ultimately spake "in Son", as it is "God" that appointed this One Who in fullness of time became flesh and Whose glory as of the Only Begotten was seen; but we are anticipating our study of the sonship of Christ. As "The Word" (John i. 1) and as "The Image" (Col. i. 15) He created heaven and earth, visible and invisible, or as John puts it "all things were made by Him". "All things" were made by Him and "all things" constitute His inheritance. Not only so, but we shall read soon that He upholds all things by the word of His power (i. 3); that all things are put under His feet (ii. 8); that all things are for Him and by Him (ii. 10). These give some idea of the extent of His inheritance. Colossians adds more "He is before all things, and by Him all things consist" and "In all things He has the preeminence" (Col. i. 16-18). His title "The Firstborn of every creature" is but another way of saying that He is the Heir of all things. He is not only the Firstborn of every creature, He has now become the Firstborn from the dead that in all things He might have the pre-eminence, and so we see that "all things" embraces not only the visible and invisible universe, its sun, moon and stars, its men, angels and principalities, but the new creation of the redeemed who will one day be presented to the Father, that God may be all in all.

In Rom. iv. 17 we read that when God said to Abraham "I have made thee a father of many nations", Abraham and Sarah were "dead" so far as parenthood was concerned; the child Isaac was not born for some years after Abraham had been made a father of many nations. Again, even when Isaac was born, the "many nations" were in the distant future. Now the words "l have made" of Rom. iv. 17 and the words "He hath appointed" of Heb. i. 2 are both translations of the Greek tithemi. The only other occurrences of tithemi in Hebrews are in i. 13 and x. 13 where we read of enemies being made a footstool. This event also is future, the Son of God sits at the right hand of God "from henceforth expecting till His enemies be made His footstool". The Saviour had a glory "before the world was", a glory which He shares with none, not even the redeemed. He also has a glory which has been given to Him in His capacity as Kinsman Redeemer. This He shares with His own:

> "And the glory which Thou gavest Me I have given them; that they may be one, even as We are one" (John xvii. 22).

The inherent glory of the Son of God is defined in 1 Tim. vi. 16 as being unapproachable, and a glory that "no man hath seen, nor can see". As Creator, He most obviously possessed by right "all things" but as Redeemer He was appointed to be Heir of all things. This is the glory that was given to Him, an inheritance to be shared by the many sons He brings to glory. So in Heb. i. 4 He is said to have "by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than the angels". But who needs to be told that He Who created all things visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, dominions, principalities or powers, has a more excellent name than His creatures? It is as the Son, the only begotten, the Man Christ Jesus, the one Mediator, that Christ was appointed to be heir of all things, and in that inheritance the redeemed find their portion, even as the two typical "heads", Noah and Abraham, are called in this epistle "heir of righteousness" and "heir of the world". In addition to this, Heb. i. 2 says "By Whom also He made the worlds". At first reading this added statement seems to conflict with what we have already seen. The order seems to be:

1.) Creation. 2.) Appointment as Heir of all things.

But in this verse the making of the worlds follows this appointment. When John revealed the fact of creation and said "the world was made by Him", he used the Greek word kosmos, "world". When writing Heb. i. 2 the word "worlds" is not the Greek kosmos but aion. Moses Stuart says "The classical use of aion is (1) age, period of time. (2) age of man, time of life. Aionas (plural) then is used here for world, worlds, universe. Theodoret explains it as meaning ages: and so others have since done." This is strange reasoning. Aion means age, yet the plural means world or worlds, Theodoret and others have maintained that aion means "age", therefore it means "world"! Creation is ascribed to the Lord in Heb. i. 10, but the purpose of Heb. i. 2 is to show that the same Lord is Jehovah, the God of Redemption, Whose name is His memorial for the age and unto all generations, Who is the same, yesterday, and today, and unto the ages.

In like manner, we shall see that the "ages" are in view, and not the material creation, when we come to examine Heb. xi. 3. There is a majestic sound in such phrases as "eternal salvation" and "everlasting covenant", but we may be sacrificing precious truth by adopting this high sounding and traditional translation. One objection to the translation "He made the ages" might be that the word "made" is more suggestive of the material creation, than of ages or dispensations. It may be useful therefore to note that in Hebrews we have the verb poieo "to make" used many times with the sense "appoint". "Who maketh His angels spirits", i.e. appointed them, they were already created, the sequel being "His ministers a flame of fire". Christ is said to have been "faithful to Him that appointed Him, as also Moses was faithful in all his house". The margin turns us back to a parallel usage in I Sam. xii. 6, where the phrase "advanced Moses and Aaron" employs the Hebrew word "made" (asah) in like manner. The "covenant made with the fathers" does not mean "made" in the sense of creating. "Through faith he kept the Passover", means "to celebrate", the word used in the Old Testament for keeping the Passover being asah. Heb. i. 2 can therefore be translated:

> "By Whom also He appointed the ages".

As to the employment of the word aion in Hebrews, see what light is thrown upon the Mediatorial office of the Son if we translate Heb. i. 8:

> "But unto the Son He saith, Thy throne, O God, is unto the age of the age", pointing on to the consummation, when God shall be all in all, the Mediatoral kingdom being at last rid of all enemies (I Cor. xv. 28). In like manner "Thou art a priest unto the age", for the office of a priest indicates the necessity for mediation, suggests that the redeemed are still at some distance, that reconciliation, in its full experimental sense is not yet complete. It is the glory of the age purpose of God, that at last sacrifice and priesthood will have so completed their appointed work that they will be ended and be no longer necessary.

"The powers of the age to come" is more to the point here. When the apostle wished to speak of the "world" to come he uses an entirely different word oikoumene "the habitable world" (Heb. i. 5). Again, instead of reading "eternal salvation", "eternal redemption" and the like, read:

> "He became the author of age abiding salvation"
> "Having obtained age abiding redemption"
> "The promise of age abiding inheritance"
> "The blood of the age abiding covenant" or better still, accustom ourselves to the use of aeonian, a word in the English dictionary that has the merit of leaving the precise meaning of the term to be settled by the usage and context. Readers may remember Tennyson's use of the word in his poem "In Memoriam".

> "The sounds of streams that swift or slow
> Draw down aeonian hills, and sow
> The dust of continents to be."

We rejoice to know that "The child born" or "The Son given" was seen in prophetic vision by Isaiah not only as "The mighty God" but as "The Father of the age", "Father of futurity" (Rotherham), where there is no confusion of the Persons of the Father and the Son, the title here being one of pre-eminence in relation to the ages, as "Firstborn" gives Him pre-eminence both in Creation and in the Church.

No.5. "The Brightness of His Glory."
pp. 231 - 235

One verse in the opening of this epistle to the Hebrews speaks of times past and of the prophets to whom God spake, and then the SON dominates the rest of the book:

> "Hath in these last days spoken unto us IN SON, Whom He hath appointed heir of all things, by Whom also He made, or appointed, the eons".

From now on "The Son" is supreme, and is purposely contrasted not only with the prophets of "times past", but with all other agents until time shall be no more.

The Son is contrasted with angels (Heb. i. 5-13).

> "For unto which of the angels said He at any time, Thou art My Son . . . . . let all the angels of God worship Him . . . . . He maketh His ministers a flame of fire BUT unto the SON He saith, Thy throne, O GOD, is unto the eon of the eons . . . . . BUT to which of the angels said He at any time, Sit on My right hand, until I make Thine enemies Thy footstool."

The Son is contrasted with Moses (Heb. iii. 1-6).

> "Consider Him . . . . . Who was faithful to Him that appointed Him, as also Moses was faithful in all his house . . . . . Moses verily was faithful . . . . . as a servant . . . . . But Christ as a Son over His OWN HOUSE."

The Son is contrasted with Aaron (Heb. iv. 14; v. 4, 5; vii. 1, 3, 28).

> "Seeing then that we have a great High Priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God . . . . . And no man taketh this honour unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron. So also Christ glorified not Himself to be made a High Priest; but He that said unto Him, Thou art My Son, to day have I begotten Thee."
> "Melchisedec . . . . . made like unto the Son of God; abideth a priest continually . . . . . For the law maketh men high priests which have infirmity, but the word of the oath, which was since the law, maketh the Son, Who is consecrated for evermore."

This superiority of the Son is further seen by the way in which the apostle uses the comparative "better". As a result of His Mediatorial work, which made Him for a little lower than the angels, He is now "so much better than the angels". He is the "Surety of a better covenant (testament)" which is established on "better promises". The Sacrifice offered by the Son of God is "better" than all that were offered under the law, and His blood speaks "better" things than that of Abel. These wondrous words as they are found in Heb. i., range themselves under different dispensational categories, which it may help us to observe.

A | Heb. i. 2. The Son. Better than the prophets.
B | i. 2. Heir of all things—The Lord of time.
Ages appointed ---
C | i. 3. Brightness of glory—Before the world began.
Image of Person ---
B | i. 3. Upholding all things—The Lord of Creation.
Purged our sins --- and Redemption.
A | i. 4, 5. The Son. Better than the angels.

But we have no need to go further than verse 3 of chapter 1 to be faced with some of the most stupendous qualities ever ascribed to any one since time began. Continuing from the fact that God has spoken "in Son" and so commencing an entirely new and wondrous phase of Divine dealing, we learn that not only was this Son appointed Heir of all things, and the One by Whom the ages were appointed, we go on to learn more of His personal attributes.

> "Who being the brightness of His glory, and the express image of His person, and upholding all things by the Word of His power, when He had by Himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high" (verse 3).

The matter awaiting our immediate study is in the first half of verse 3, the glory that was His before the world began, in contrast with that glory which was given to Him as a consequence of His Mediatorial work making Him "better than the angels". There is an evident distinction to be noted between the words "Who being" of verse 3 and "being made" of verse 4. "Being" is part of the verb eimi "to be", "being made" is part of the verb ginomai "to become". This is no mere academic distinction, it is vital to the true understanding of these momentous verses. This distinction is observed in John i. 1 & 3:

> "In the beginning was (eimi to be) the Word."
> "All things were made (ginomai to become) by Him."

Or in John viii. 58:

> "Before Abraham was (ginomai), I am (eimi)."

The glory of Heb. i. 3 is the glory which the Saviour had as The Word, The Image, the Form of God, before the creation of the world, before the beginning. The glory of Heb. i. 4 is the glory which has been given to the Saviour as a consequence of His work of Redeeming Love. In the one glory none can share, it is "unapproachable" (I Tim. vi. 16); in the other glory, the redeemed will share (John xvii. 22).

We must not translate the word "brightness" as though it were a reflection:

> "The Son of God is, in this His essential majesty, the expression and the sole expression of the Divine light—not, as in His incarnation, its reflection" (Alford).

Apaugasma, "brightness", does not occur elsewhere in the New Testament. Augazo the lesser form of the word occurs in II Cor. iv. 4 where it is translated "shine". Other variants found in the New Testament are auge "break of day" (Acts xx. 11); diaugazo "dawn" (II Pet. i. 19) and where the Received Text reads diaphanes "transparent", some critical texts read diauges in Rev. xxi. 21. Both Paul, and the Hebrews to whom he wrote, were familiar with the writings of the Apocrypha, and so would be reminded by his words of the passage in the Wisdom of Solomon, where speaking of Wisdom it says:

> "She is the breath of the power of God . . . . . she is the brightness of the everlasting light, the unspotted mirror of the power of God and the image of His goodness."

Here, the word "brightness" is the Greek apaugasma, and standing alone in the Apocrypha, cannot but have some bearing upon the apostle's intention in Hebrews. Most readers have a passing acquaintance with the findings of science, even though none of us would venture to express opinions in a domain so far removed from our personal experiences. But most, if not all of our readers, will know that light is itself INVISIBLE. Should any doubt this, a few experiments would help. For example, I see the paper on which these words are being written, because the light which is coming through the window, and which falls upon the sheet of white paper before me, is reflected by the surface of the paper to my eye, but I do not see the light that is reflected as a visible beam. Again, when I see a beam of sunlight tracing its gleaming path along a passage, it would be excusable perhaps to say "that shows that light is visible, you can see the beam". Strictly speaking, you see thousands of gleaming motes of dust floating in the path of the light. If a red hot wire be introduced into the beam of light, a dark patch will surround the wire, simply because the dust reflectors are destroyed but the light itself goes on. Again, we are all familiar with the term "infra red" and "ultra violet" rays. These are rays of light that lie on either side of the spectrum (the rainbow colours); they are powerful in their action, but invisible to the eye. One can therefore assume that God

Who created light and knows its nature would use it as a figure with full intention, and we can demonstrate the apostle's use of the word "brightness" by appealing to the threefold disposition of light.

The Father.	Invisible.	Likened to the infra red rays.
The Son.	God Manifest.	Likened to the central rays of the spectrum, the only part of light by which we "see".
The Holy Spirit.	Invisible.	Likened to the ultra violet rays.

The only way in which we can "see" the glory of God, is "in the face of Jesus Christ", and the passage in II Cor. iv., which makes this statement, contains the only occurrence of augazo in the New Testament, namely in II Cor. iv. 4.

As the epistle to the Hebrews naturally speaks of the Tabernacle, its furniture, its priesthood and its offerings, it is a thing to be expected that, if Christ is set forth as "better" than all these types and shadows, then even in this initial setting forth of His office as "the brightness of His glory" we shall have a link with the typical teaching of the Old Testament. The cherubim are called "the cherubims of glory" in association with the mercy seat (Heb. ix. 5), and Psa. lxxviii. 61 uses the word "glory" as a name for the ark, and Phinehas' wife said "the glory is departed from Israel: for the ark of God is taken" (I Sam. iv. 22). The Son of God is therefore comparable to the Shekinah glory of the tabernacle. John i. 14 tells us that He "tabernacled" among us, and Col. ii. 9 that "in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily". Moses, it will be remembered, said "I beseech Thee, show me Thy glory", but the Lord told him "Thou canst not see My face . . . . . and live . . . . . I will take away Mine hand, and thou shalt see My back parts: but My face shall not be seen" (Exod. xxxiii. 18-23). This request apparently arose out of the promise "My presence shall go with thee" (Exod. xxxiii. 14). Although it was made clear to Moses here that he could not see the face of God and live, yet in the same chapter we read "And the LORD spake unto Moses face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend" (Exod. xxxiii. 11). These words seem to involve a contradiction. Verse 11 says that the Lord spake face to face with Moses, yet verse 20 says "Thou canst not see My face and live". The reader will readily call to mind other apparent contradictions. Jacob said:

> "I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved" (Gen. xxxii. 30), yet John i. 18 categorically denies that anyone at any time has ever seen God. In Numb. xii. 8 the Lord said concerning Moses:

> "With him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches; and the similitude of the LORD shall he behold".

"Apparently" is the translation of the Hebrew mareh "pattern" (Num. viii. 4); "appearance" (Num. ix. 15); "countenance" (Jud. xiii. 6) and Ezek. i. 26 "the appearance of" a man. The pattern was shown to Moses in the mount, and the comment in Heb. viii. 5 shows that all these "serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things". The "appearance" of Numb. ix. 15 is the presence of the Lord rendered terrible by the "appearance of fire". When the parents of Samson realized that "the man of God, whose countenance was like the countenance of an angel of God" was indeed "The angel of the Lord" they said "we shall surely die, because we have seen God". We remember how that at Peniel, where Jacob saw God "face to face", we are told "a man" wrestled with him, which Hosea xii. 4 interprets as an "angel". The word "appearance" comes over and over again in the opening visions of Ezekiel's prophecy. Describing the "likeness" of the four living creatures, Ezekiel said "And this was their appearance; they had the likeness of a man" (Ezek. i. 5), and throughout the wondrous and perplexing imagery of these chapters that "likeness of a man" persists, and at the close of chapter i. the prophet said:

> "And above the firmament that was over their heads was the likeness of a throne . . . . . and upon the likeness of the throne was the likeness as the appearance of A MAN above upon it . . . . . this was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the LORD" (Ezek. i. 26-28).

Let it be noted, Ezekiel saw the "likeness" of the firmament, the "likeness" of the throne, the "likeness" of the glory of the Lord. He even says:

> "Upon the LIKENESS of the throne was the LIKENESS as the APPEARANCE of a man above upon it".

Not merely "likeness", but "likeness of appearance" stressing the interposition of type, shadow and similitude. The description of this man is striking:

> "And I saw as the colour of amber, as the appearance of fire round about within it, from the appearance of his loins even upward, and from the appearance of his loins even downward, I saw as it were the appearance of fire . . . . . And when I saw it, I fell upon my face, and I heard a voice of One that spake" (Ezek. i. 27, 28).

Note again, Ezekiel is careful to say that what he saw was "as" the colour of amber, it was "as" the appearance of fire. He does not say he saw the "loins" of this man but "the appearance" of his loins. There can be no possible doubt that the vision granted to Ezekiel and the vision granted to John are of the same blessed Person.

> "In the midst of the seven candlesticks one like unto the Son of Man . . . . . His eyes were as a flame of fire; and His feet like unto fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace . . . . . and when I saw Him, I fell at His feet as dead" (Rev. i. 13-17).
> "The similitude of the LORD shall he behold" (Numb. xii. 8).

Just as Col. ii. :2, 3 declares that the mystery of God is solved in the person of Christ, so the apparent contradictions cited above of the experience of Moses, of Jacob, of Manoah and of Ezekiel, are all resolved into harmony by the revelation of Heb. i. 3, that He, Who in fullness of time was made flesh, was from the creation of the world, "God Manifest" even as later He stooped to become "God manifest in the flesh". The brightness of His glory is followed by "the express image of His person", an equally mighty theme that must occupy our worshipping attention in another article.

THE KEY OF KNOWLEDGE

OR

DISPENSATIONAL TRUTH

pp. 41 - 60

Supposing the reader is sure that "all Scripture is given by inspiration of God", and that he is logical enough to believe that inasmuch as the Gospel according to Matthew is a part of "all Scripture", it is therefore with the rest equally "inspired", we ask the question would it be wise or right to decide to distribute freely among the unsaved the Gospel according to Matthew? We can well understand that such a question will be met in many cases with a most decided token of objection, and we hasten to assure the reader that no attack is being made on the Scriptures or on the Gospel according to Matthew, but that a serious objection is being laid against their "indiscriminate" use. Continuing our supposition, let us say that a copy of this Gospel according to Matthew has been placed in the hands of an unsaved man with the assurance that this Gospel is indeed and in truth the Word of God. He discovers that "everlasting life" is found in Matt. xix. 16, 29 and xxv. 46, and accordingly, being intensely interested, he reads these passages in the hope that the way of everlasting life may be made clear. He is somewhat disturbed to read the question,

> "Master, what good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal (everlasting) life?"

and is even more disturbed to read the Lord's answer,

> "If thou wilt enter into life KEEP THE COMMANDMENTS," and he is not left in doubt concerning what commandments are in view (xix. 16-22). While pondering this legal and unattainable qualification for everlasting life he observes a second reference in the same chapter, and with some hope of discovering terms within his powers, reads:

> "And every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for My name's sake, shall receive an hundredfold, and shall inherit everlasting life" (xix. 29), and is hard put to it to decide which of the two sets of conditions are the more difficult or the more hopeless. In any case he is not at all sure that these passages are "good tidings" so far as he is concerned. However, he learns that one other pronouncement on this vital theme is found in chapter twenty-five, and accordingly discovers that those who are denominated "the righteous", who go into "life eternal" (everlasting), are those of the nations who have treated the Lord's brethren with kindliness, even though they confessed that they had no idea at the time that they were doing such acts unto the Lord Himself. In no instance is faith in exercise or the finished work of Christ in view, but in each case some element of merit is prominent. He can gain everlasting life by "keeping" the ten commandments, or by "forsaking" home and land, or by "ministering" to the Lord's brethren, without consciously ministering unto Him, and he is rightly puzzled. There is one answer to this and every similar perplexity. There is a which a misguided prejudice has hidden from both tract distributors and seeking sinner, and that key is the much abused and much misrepresented

DISPENSATIONAL TRUTH.

Anyone who has been rightly taught, discriminates one part of Holy Scripture from another. Such honour the Word by believing implicitly ALL that it says. A discriminate believer, that is to say one who appreciates dispensational truth, would believe, without reservation, the limitations imposed on Matthew's Gospel by the words:

> "Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not: But go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel."
> "I AM NOT SENT but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (x. 5, 6; xv. 24).

He would know of another gospel which speaks of and to "the other sheep", which were not of "this fold", namely, the Gospel according to John, and there, the seeking sinner would find in such passages as John iii. 15, 16, 36; v. 24; vi. 40, 47 and x. 28 that everlasting life is the unmerited gift of God, received upon believing His Son. Matthew is as equally inspired as is John, but it is not sufficient to believe II Tim. iii. 16 concerning "all scripture", we must also as assuredly believe II Tim. ii. 15 and "rightly divide the word of truth" if we would be "unashamed" workmen, and ashamed will all be who indiscriminately use Matthew where John is dispensationally indicated, or in any other way fail to use this divinely given Key of Knowledge.

Before we elaborate this important principle of interpretation, let us be sure of our material, the words employed and their usage and meaning. The word "dispensation" occurs in the A.V. four times, and translates the Greek word oikonomia. This has come over into English in the form economy.

Oikonomia is a compound made up of oikos "house" and nemo "to administer", its usage extending much further than the limits of domestic economy, but never completely losing sight of its homely origin. No examination of the word oikonomia can be considered complete or trustworthy that ignores the fact that it was in use in the Septuagint Version for over two hundred years before the N.T. was written. The usage in the LXX must of necessity influence the usage in the N.T. and moreover, by consulting the LXX we can turn back to the Hebrew O.T. and observe what Hebrew words were translated by oikonomia and oikonomos in that ancient version. In Isa. xxii. 19 and 21 the LXX uses oikonomia to translate two Hebrew words:

> "I will drive thee from thy station" (Heb matsab).
> "I will commit thy government (Heb. memshalah) into his hand."

Shebna had been treasurer "over the house". He was to be deprived of his office, and Eliakim the son of Hilkiah was to be installed in his place. What this office of oikonomia involved can be seen by the language used in verses 21 and 22:

> "And I will clothe him with thy robe, and strengthen him with thy girdle, and I will commit thy government into his hand: and he shall be a father to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and to the house of Judah. And the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder, so he shall open and none shall shut; and he shall shut, and none open."

Matsab means station or garrison (I Sam. xiii. 23). In other forms it means to stand as a watchman (Isa. xxi. 8); a prefect or deputy (I Kings iv. 19). Memshalah means rule, dominion (Gen. i. 16), mashal (Gen. iii. 16). This word oikonomia is the one translated "dispensation" in I Cor. ix. 17; Eph. i. 10; iii. 2; Col. i. 25, and the associations of oikonomia and their Hebrew equivalents must be kept in mind when we come to the N.T. occurrences of this term. Oikonomos, i.e. the person who exercises this rule, and translated "steward" in Luke xvi. 1 and in I Cor. iv. 1, 2, is found eight times in the LXX version; two being found in the book of Esther, three in I Kings and three in II Kings. In Esther viii. 9 oikonomos translates the word "lieutenant" which in its turn is the Persian achashdarpenim "satrap", which is found in Ezra viii. 36; Esther iii. 12; viii. 9 and ix. 3. In the plural this Persian word is translated "princes" in Daniel where it occurs nine times. This Persian word is translated in the LXX dioiketes Ezra viii. 36, oikonomos Esther viii. 9, strategos Esther iii. 12, turanos Esther ix. 3, toparches Dan. iii. 2, hupatos Dan. iii. 2, 3; vi. 7. Dioiketes means a treasurer, from dioikes to keep house, to manage affairs, to administer; strategos refers to a military leader, a "Captain"; turanos a tyrant, sovereign; toparches a governor, one who rules over a place (topos); hupatos supreme, a consul. Here, therefore, is the background of the term that emerges in the N.T. as a "dispensation". It will be seen that it is no synonym for the ages, times or seasons. To speak of "ages and dispensations" however is not correct, for the ages are not simply the duration or flight of time, they give the characteristics of any one or more segregated periods during which the Lord deals with men, nations or assemblies, in some manner peculiar to the times. Old Testament usage, as we have seen, conjures up in the mind either a public official, or a house manager, a combination of Treasurer, Ruler, Consul, General, Satrap, Prince, Governor, all of which when extraneous characteristics are eliminated can be expressed in the one word "Steward".

We now turn to the N.T. remembering that the language of the Greek N.T. is strongly influenced by the Greek version of the O.T. What oikonomos or oikonomia mean to the Greek-speaking Jew at the time of the advent of Christ, would be the meaning he would be supposed to attach to them, when for the first time he came across them in the Gospels and the Epistles, unless an inspired warning were given, telling of a change of meaning that must now be accepted. Of the four gospels, Luke's is the only one in which the Greek words oikonomeo, oikonomia or oikonomos are used. These three words occur nineteen times. Of these, eight occur in Luke, ten are found in Paul's epistles, and one only in Peter. The first reference is Luke xii. 42:

> "Who then is that faithful and wise STEWARD (oikonomos), whom his Lord shall make ruler over his household, to give them their portion of meat in due season?"

The particular concern of this steward is "rightly to divide" the portion allotted to each of the household. This is expressed in two ways, (1) "to give their portion of meat"; (2) "in due season". Sitometrion is a compound of sitos "corn" and metron "measure". Theophrastus, a disciple of Plato, when describing "a mean, sordid" persons, says "he will himself measure out the usual allowance to his domestics". The custom was observed also among the Hebrews. Where the A.V. reads "feed me with food convenient for me" (Prov. xxx. 8), the margin reads, "Heb. of my allowance". The only occurrences of sitometreo in the LXX are in Gen. xlvii. 12, 14:

> "And Joseph nourished (sitometreo) his father, and his brethren, and all his father's household, with bread, according to their families."

In verse 14, the LXX reads:

> "And Joseph gathered all the money that was found in the land of Egypt, and the land of Canaan, in return for the corn which they bought, and he distributed corn (sitometreo) to them."

Here it will be observed, Joseph is acting as an oikonomos, a steward, and he dispenses the food not only in amount but in quality, according as it would be appropriate for Jacob himself, for his brethren and for the household, siton kata soma, literally "corn according to body" or "corn suited to each person". In this we have an early illustration of "dispensational truth" which takes into account the different ranks, and spheres of blessing, and also sees to it that babes have milk and adults have a full diet. Paul as a steward of the mysteries of God most carefully observed this essential rule, as may be seen in his reference to "babes and full grown" in I Cor. iii. 2, Heb. v. 11-14, Eph. iv. 14. In the fourteenth verse of the forty-seventh chapter of Genesis we see Joseph as a faithful steward, faithfully and honestly distributing the corn in exchange for the money taken for that purpose, and our mind immediately travels down the age to the unfaithful steward who said to his Lord's debtors "How much owest thou? . . . . . write down fifty" or "four score".

This parable gives us the first occurrence of the Greek words oikonomia and oikonomos, which are found together in Luke xvi:

> "There was a certain rich man, which had a steward (oikonomos); and the same was accused unto him that he had wasted his goods. And he called him, How is it that I hear this of thee? give an account of thy stewardship (oikonomia); for thou mayest be no longer steward. Then the steward said within himself . . . . .my Lord taketh away from me my stewardship . . . . . when I am put out of the stewardship . . . . ." (Luke xvi. 1-4).

Here we have three occurrences of oikonomos "steward" and three of oikonomia "stewardship". The duties of this steward are manifest. He occupied a position of trust. He shared that position with no one else. He had control of the goods of his master, and could, if he were dishonest, alter the terms of contract between his lord and his lord's debtors. The charge laid against this steward is that he had "wasted" his master's goods. Diaskorpizo means to scatter (Luke i. 51), and one of the other meanings given in the Lexicons is "to DISPERSE", the very opposite of "to DISPENSE", for this is to dispense in an evil sense. The preacher and teacher who boasts that he has no room for "hair-splitting" or for "ultra-dispensationalism" often ignores the distinctive dispensational features of the Scriptural message, e.g. "I am not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. xv. 24), "other sheep I have which are not of this fold" (John x. 16), "now I say that Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision" (Rom. xv. 8), "They gave to me (Paul) and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship: that WE should go to the GENTILES, and THEY unto the CIRCUMCISION" (Gal. ii. 9), "I Paul the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles" (Eph. iii. 1), and dissipates or indiscriminately scatters to all and sundry, instead of giving "convenient" food in "due season". This time note "in due season" it will be remembered was used of the faithful steward in Luke xii. 42, and is employed by the apostle Paul when speaking of the truth entrusted to him. It is a solemn fact that the preacher or teacher who ignores "the due season" will as surely dissipate the truth entrusted to him, as will the man who consciously handles the Word of God deceitfully. Dispensational Truth therefore is Truth for the Times.

We move now from the Gospel of Luke to the epistles of Paul, and there we find the word oikonomos used as follows "Erastus the chamberlain of the city" (Rom. xvi. 23). The R.V. replaces the word chamberlain by the word treasurer. In either case Erastus occupied a position of trust, that involved both the disposition of money and of service, and was used by the same apostle that had already applied the title oikonomos to himself (I Cor. iv. 1), and was to claim a special oikonomia as the Prisoner of Jesus Christ for us Gentiles (Eph. iii. 1). If Erastus of Rom. xvi. is the same as the Erastus of II Tim. iv. 20, it appears that he was the chamberlain of the city of Corinth. One feature which is almost too obvious to mention, but which the undispensational treatment of Scripture makes necessary, is that Erastus was chamberlain of one particular city. He had not right to interfere with the finances and the laws of any other city. Peter, James and John recognized this essential feature (Gal. ii. 7-9) but alas, dispensational frontiers have been so indiscriminately crossed and re-crossed to-day, that it is now considered to be a mark of enlightenment to say that they do not exist, except in the minds of those who hold the so called "Coles-Bullinger-Welch heresy". Before Romans was written, Paul addressed two epistles to the city of Corinth, where Erastus exercised his office as oikonomos.

> "Let a man so account of us as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God. Moreover it is required in stewards that a man be found faithful" (I Cor. iv. 1, 2).

Let it be noticed and remembered, that the first time Paul uses the title "steward" of himself, he links it with the word musterion "mystery". The fitness of this we shall see in all its fullness when we come to the epistles of the Mystery, Ephesians and Colossians. The R.V. reads "mystery" instead of "testimony" in I Cor. ii. 1, as also does the revised text by Westcott and Hort. In chapters ii. and iii. we have a demonstration of the faithful stewardship of the mysteries of God entrusted to the apostle. The Corinthians were critical of the apostle's manner of speech saying it was "contemptible" (II Cor. x. 10) and Paul was exceedingly sensitive to this criticism, so much so, that he reveals that he was with them in fear and much trembling (I Cor. ii. 3). This admission is bounded on either side by a reference to his "speech".

> "And I, brethren, when I came to you, came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom declaring the MYSTERY of God," and then goes on to reveal something of the cause of his anxiety. Apparently the Corinthians, like many others, were desirous of having their ears tickled with high sounding phrases, but, said the Apostle, I resolved to limit my message among you, to "Jesus Christ and Him crucified", even though he knew that by so doing he would arouse their antipathy. "Howbeit", he continued, "we speak wisdom among them that are perfect . . . . . we speak the wisdom of God in a mystery". In chapter three he returns to this limitation which he had imposed upon himself saying:

> "And I, brethren, could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal, even as unto babes in Christ. I have fed you with milk and not with meat" (I Cor. iii. 1, 2).

The subject matter of Inspired Scripture is so vast that the reader, in order to comprehend with any clearness both the matter and the application of its teaching, naturally and rightly subdivides the material before him, arranging the teaching of the Word under such headings as:

(1) Doctrinal Truth, e.g. "Justification by faith".
(2) Practical Truth, e.g. "Walk worthy of the vocation".
(3) Prophetic Truth, e.g. "The coming of the Lord".
(4) Church Truth, e.g. "The church which is His Body".
(5) Kingdom Truth, e.g. "The kingdom of heaven".

We can well understand that both those who agree with us and those who do not, may say "Where in this list is DISPENSATIONAL TRUTH? why is that omitted?" It has been omitted with intent, for Dispensational Truth cannot share with any of these subdivisions, for ALL Truth is Dispensational, there is no other, and unless and until doctrine is correctly related with the dispensation which at the moment obtains, such a doctrine will be rendered false. Practice flows out of doctrine. Practice is the fruit of which doctrine is the root. I cannot "walk worthy of the vocation" of Ephesians, until I know wherein that vocation consists, and to know that, I must know its dispensational setting, otherwise I shall, as a member of one calling, attempt to put into practice the walk that is worthy of another, and end in confusion.

The bulk of prophetic truth pertains to Israel as a people, to Israel's Messiah, and to the land and kingdom associated with the promises made to Abraham and to David. Until I, as a Gentile, an alien from the commonwealth of Israel, and a stranger from the covenants of promise, having no "fathers" in the Scriptural sense, see my true dispensational place, I shall be tempted to appropriate prophetic statements to myself, to distort the Scriptures so that where they say "Israel" I shall say "church" (as the headings of some chapters in the prophets of the A.V. actually do), and refer to chapters such as Matt. xxiv. and I Thess. iv., or passages in Daniel and the Revelation, as though they all speak of the blessed hope of the church of the parenthetical dispensation of the Mystery.

THERE IS NO TRUTH THAT IS NOT DISPENSATIONAL.

The attitude of many critics is therefore not only misleading but fatal. The cry "ultra-dispensationalism" which apparently is the battle cry of many of the self-styled defenders of the Faith, has really the same effect as the veil, by which the god of this world blinds the eye of the believer, dangling in front of him Scriptures that belong to another calling in order that he shall not see the truth of his own. That friendly person who says in effect: "Dispensational Truth is just a 'bee in the bonnet' of certain teachers, particularly followers of Dr. Bullinger and of Charles H. Welch. We do not object to you entertaining this peculiar idea, providing you keep it to yourself, and soft pedal this aspect of your teaching, allowing us to continue our mixture of Jew, Gentile and Church of God, heavenly places, earth, Jerusalem, body, bride and the like, and to continue in that state of 'bliss where it is folly to be wise' " is but helping to veil the eyes of the believer. It is our conviction, which we hope to demonstrate in these pages, that Dispensational Truth, instead of being the pet theory of a fanatical few, is "the key of knowledge" which tradition, orthodoxy and "churchianity" have hidden from the seeking believer.

EVERY WORD NEEDED AND UNALTERED IS OUR CLAIM.

One great claim of those whose studies are guided and guarded by Dispensational Truth is, that under this system of interpretation, and under this system alone, every word that is written in Holy Scripture is seen to be necessary, not one statement needs to be altered, modified or omitted. Jew will always mean Jew, the Israel of God will not mean the church, Gentile will always mean Gentile. The meek that inherit the earth, cannot be the same company whose blessings are "in heavenly places"; the Church which is "the Perfect Man" (aner, male, bridegroom, husband) cannot be "the Bride the Lamb's wife". We therefore re-arrange the list set out on page 46 to show that the different subdivisions of truth are all subdivisions of the one great all-covering principle—Dispensational Truth.

«----------DISPENSATIONAL TRUTH----------»

Doctrinal Truth	Practical Truth	Prophetic Truth	Church Truth	Kingdom Truth
Law and Grace	Calling or walk	Israel or lo-ammi	Body or Bride	Kingdom of God or Kingdom of Heaven

It must be our privilege and our responsibility to consider these items and to show that apart from Dispensational Truth we are always liable to confound things that differ and to affirm as present truth that which has waxed old and is vanishing away.

By dispensational truth therefore we mean that particular revelation of God's will to man during some particular administration or economy, and specially appertaining thereto. When we speak of some teaching or practice as being undispensational, we mean that owing to the introduction of a new administration, certain things that obtained under a previous regime have become obsolete. By the term undispensational teaching, therefore, we mean that the teaching peculiar to one dispensation has been imported into another and differing dispensation, where the conditions of divine dealing render the practical application of such teaching quite inadmissible.

What do we mean by Doctrinal Truth? Doctrinal truth is concern with sin, salvation, justification and the like and from one point of view it would seem that such things remain unaltered by changes of dispensation. That this is not so, let Paul testify as he does in the epistle to the Galatians:

> "Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage. Behold I Paul say unto you, that if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing . . . . . Christ is become of none effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law; ye are fallen from grace" (Gal. v. 1-4).

While Christ changes not, an undispensational view of the law, or of the imposition of the rite of circumcision, can make the finished work of Christ PROFITLESS and of NONE EFFECT! Who, after this, will say that dispensational truth can be ignored, or opposed with impunity? What a dilemma those are in who have no place for dispensational truth! If dispensational distinctions mean nothing to them, then such are in this awful predicament. Like the Galatians, if they do not submit to the rite of circumcision, they must be cut off from His people (Gen. xvii. 14) and if they do they fall from grace, and Christ profits them nothing. They are like the landless fugitive, having no claim to either heaven or earth, kingdom or church. The apostle Paul had no two thoughts about the bearing of dispensational truth in the place of the law and of the gospel. In his epistles the old covenant is called the "letter" that "killeth", whereas the new covenant is the "spirit" that gives "life". Yet both covenants are of God, and if Scripture is not to be "rightly divided" we must straddle this fence and juggle with law and grace until the day of doom. The Apostle calls the law "the administration of death" and its glory, something that was to be "done away". He compares and contrasts the fading glory of the "face of Moses" with the knowledge of the glory of God in the "face of Jesus Christ". The law of Moses is as fully inspired as is the Gospel of Christ, yet dispensational truth transfers the believer from the Truth that condemns, to the Truth that saves, and it is sad to realize that some in their antagonism to what they do not understand are actually assisting the god of this world, who veils the eye of the believer, forcing him to look at Truth that has become obsolete, so that Truth for the time shall neither be seen nor appreciated (II Cor. iv. 3, 4). Dispensational truth translates us "from glory to glory", from the fading glory of the law to the permanent glory of the gospel. Who then will deny its efficacy and its grace?

Let us take one special feature of the law that is strongly urged upon the believer to-day; either from one extreme by such as the Seventh Day Adventists, or from another by the Lord's Day Observance Society. Dispensational Truth alone puts both in their right place, and in no other way can these contrary claims on our obedience be really set aside. Among the explicit commands of God is the observance of the Sabbath day. It is an integral part of the ten commandments, its observance was not left to private judgment, and disobedience was punished by death.

"Ye shall keep the sabbath therefore; for it is holy unto you: every one that defileth it shall surely be put to death: for whosoever doeth any work therein, that soul shall be cut off from among his people" (Exod. xxxi. 14).

"And while the children of Israel were in the wilderness, they found a man that gathered sticks upon the sabbath day . . . . . and the Lord said, The man shall be surely put to death; all the congregation shall stone him with stones without the camp" (Numb. xv. 32-35).

How do you react to these passages of God's Word? Should the reader make the slightest movement in the direction of the idea, that since the law was given by Moses, grace and truth has been brought in by Jesus Christ, he will be unwittingly advocating the supremacy of Dispensational Truth as a deciding factor and that it is indeed the key of knowledge. If we believe that consequent upon the resurrection of Christ, the first day of the week takes the place of the seventh, then we shall be sheltering under the much vilified protection of Dispensational truth, even though there is no evidence that the Lord's Day of Rev. i. 10 refers to any day of the week, but much evidence to show that it refers to the great prophetic "Day of the Lord".

If we deny the validity of dispensational truth, we must admit two things:

(1) We are guilty of such disobedience that we should have been stoned to death long ago.
(2) We have no scriptural and logical answer to the questions Why has this penalty not been enforced? or Has God failed as a Law-Giver?

Before leaving this subject, let us return to the verses quoted from Exodus and Numbers, and see for ourselves that the "key" is there waiting for us all the time and easy to be seen had prejudice not blinded our eyes. The words printed in italics constitute the dispensational items which completely and righteously exonerate all believers to-day from either the obedience to, or the penalty for breaking, this law.

"Speak thou also unto the Children of Israel, saying Verily My sabbaths ye shall keep: for it is a sign between Me and you throughout your generations: that ye may know that I am the LORD that doth sanctify you. Ye shall keep the sabbath therefore; for it is holy unto you . . . . . It is a sign between Me and the children of Israel for ever" (Exod. xxxi. 13, 14, 17).

The wards of this key of knowledge are visible to all: the Children of Israel, the sign between Me and you, the sanctifying of you, the consequence "therefore", the pointed words "unto you". No Gentile, called during this day of grace, called during the period of Israel's dispersion, called during the parenthetical dispensation of the Mystery, called after Acts xxviii. 28, called while Israel are lo-ammi "not My people", can have the remotest connexion with these words quoted from Exod. xxxi. or from Numb. xv. Before, therefore, any doctrine of the Scripture can be considered obligatory upon us, or addressed to us, we should seek an answer to the following questions:

(1) Is the commandment addressed to Israel?
(2) Is the commandment found in Paul's epistles?
(3) If so, is it found in epistles written before Acts xxviii., while the Jew was still "first"?
(4) Or is it found only in those epistles written by the Apostle as the "Prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles" after the present dispensation came into force (Eph. iii. 1)?

When we have arrived at a Scriptural answer to these questions dispensational truth will either open or shut the door, give entrance or forbid access according to whether the command does or does not belong to the present economy.

"To whom, when, where and why" are the wards on this key of all truth. Quite a number of the Lord's people sweep aside all these questions as unprofitable, and say that all they are interested in is "practice". These are the people who seem to have a great fondness for "brass tacks" for calling a "spade a spade" the very opposite of these fantastic hair splitters, known by the unworthy title "Ultra-dispensationalists". Let us face this matter squarely. Christian practice arises out of Christian doctrine. The Christian doctrine of grace differs from Mosaic doctrine of law, consequently before we can "practice" we must know what is our calling, whether we are under law or under grace, whether we are dispensationally a "wild olive graft contrary to nature" into the olive tree of Israel (Rom. xi.), or whether we belong to that newly created "one new man" the other side of the demolished "middle wall of partition" (Eph. ii.).

One word employed in the Scriptures to designate "practice" is the word "walk". This is true under law or under grace, but surely the walk enjoined upon those who were under the law cannot be the same as the walk of those who are under grace, for the full statement of this practical outworking of truth is that all such "walk" must be worthy. Now the word worthy (axios) suggests the beam of a balance, a correspondence, an equivalence, and following the exhortation of Eph. iv. 1, the walk enjoined must be "worthy", it must correspond with the "vocation" or "calling". We must believe and know Eph. i.-iii. before we can do and follow iv.-vi. Until a builder sees and studies the plans that have been drawn up and approved, he cannot commence "work". Should he "saw" wood, "lay" bricks, or execute any other of the processes involved in building before consulting his plans, he would but waste precious time and material. In the same way, a believer who does not know his calling cannot walk "worthy" of it. It is useless to stress Eph. iv.-vi. when Eph. i.-iii. is either ignored, misunderstood or denied. If we place ourselves in the Acts of the Apostles, with its two baptisms we shall find it impossible implicitly to accept the one baptism of Eph. iv. We shall find ourselves attempting to explain away this insistence on "one". We repeat our contention that when once we accept the all covering authority of dispensational truth we need all that is written, just as it is written, to whom it is written, without alteration, modification or private interpretation. Practice is the fruit, Doctrine is the root, the character of both depends upon the tree that has been planted, the soil in which its roots are fed, the climate that decides the growth and produce. In other words both doctrine and practice are governed and decided by the dispensation to which they belong. I have seen date palms and orange trees growing in the open garden of a friend, but if I imagined that it was mere "ultra-horticulturalism" to tell me that a back garden in a London suburb was "all one and the same" as a vineyard in the South of France, nature would go its own way in spite of all my labour, prayers and so-called "faith". I should get no fruit. Such gardening would have ignored time, place and condition, in other words, it would be undispensational to attempt to grow plants whose habitat is so different from the one I know. Some objectors to dispensational truth adopt the attitude that so long as we are "sincere" we can afford to ignore all this "hair-splitting". However, on one occasion I was able to demonstrate the futility of such "sincerity". I was standing in a bus queue, and a man in front of me made it known that he wanted a bus to X. I said to him in effect, "however sincerely you may believe, however convinced you may be that all the rest of the queue are wrong and you alone right, you will never arrive at X if you wait here, there is your bus, and that is your queue, some fifty yards further along the street". Happily this particular person did not airily wave my information aside as "mere dispensational hair-splitting". The fact that he had his return ticket or his fare, the fact that he was a believer in buses, the fact that he sincerely hoped to get to X, all was of nothing worth while he stood in the wrong queue. In like manner neither doctrinal nor practical truth come into the picture until dispensational truth adjusts the focus.

What is true of doctrine and practice is equally true of prophecy and its interpretation. The prophecy of Isaiah is concerning Judah and Jerusalem (Isa. i. 1) and the primary interpretation of this prophecy must relate to that people of that city. The application of its teaching when tempered by true dispensational understanding opens its treasures for all believers, but the rule remains unchanged, namely, that while all Scripture is FOR our learning, not all Scripture is TO us or ABOUT us. Callings must be discriminated. It is impossible within the limits of this article to attempt a survey of prophecy, as a whole, we will therefore limit ourselves to the consideration of one important phase of prophetic truth, namely the Second Coming of Christ. Matt. xxiv. is the sequel to early chapters of that same gospel. There Christ is seen as "born King of the Jews", in Bethlehem, the city of David. Before Him, in fulfillment of Isa. xl., went John the Baptist. The temptation in the wilderness reaches its climax in the vision of the kingdom and glory of the world. When the disciples used the expression "the end of the world" (Matt. xxiv. 3) the sunteleia, they used a well-known term, found in Exod. xxiii. 16 "the feast of the ingathering". While all attempts to compute the date of the second coming of the Lord are forbidden, two periods of time are nevertheless given in Matt. xxiv. The second coming of that prophetic chapter will take place "AFTER the tribulation" (Matt. xxiv. 29, see verse 21) and DURING the last week of Dan. ix. (Matt. xxiv. 15; Dan. ix. 27). These items provide a dispensational test that must not be ignored, and effectually prevent us from reading into Matt. xxiv. the hope of the church of the Mystery. Again, it is not the teaching of this chapter that all nations will have been evangelized before the end comes, but that "this gospel of the kingdom" shall be preached in all the oikoumene (the prophetic earth) for a witness unto all nations (Matt. xxiv. 14). Those who accept the Divine rule of dispensational truth, have no need to alter mentally "this gospel of the kingdom" with its miraculous signs, to "the gospel of the grace of God" without miraculous gifts, they do not stretch the limited word oikoumene to include the ends of the earth, they do not alter the words "for a witness" to read "unto salvation" or "unto everlasting life". Dispensational truth rejoices to accept without alteration or demur, every word given by inspiration of God. Can one ask for more? Can those who deny dispensational truth say as much? Rom. xv. says of the hope that was before the church during the Acts period, and while Israel were still a people, and while the Jew was still first:

"There shall be a root of Jesse, and He that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles: in Him shall the Gentiles trust (hope, elpizo). Now the God of hope (elpis) fill you with all joy and peace in believing" (Rom. xv. 12, 13).

While Isa. xi. contains a gracious promise, the Millennial conditions there anticipated and shared by the Church during the Acts are not, and cannot be the hope of the church of the Mystery. Again I Thess. iv., with its insistence on "the archangel" links the phase of the second coming with Israel, for Michael the archangel stands for Israel (Dan. x. 21; xii. 1, 2). In like manner the second coming of I Cor. xv. 52 is related to "the last trump". The hope of the Mystery, set out in Col. iii. 1-4, "the manifestation in glory" is a fitting climax to those promises that speak of heavenly places, far above all (Eph. i. 20, 21) and is a different aspect of that coming that is intended by the words "in the air" (I Thess. iv. 17), and "on the Mount of Olives" (Acts i. 11; Zech. xiv. 4). Hope in Scripture is either the realization of a calling, or the fulfillment of a promise, and the Church of the Mystery, is entirely disconnected with the promises made unto the fathers (Eph. ii. 12) whereas this was the prerogative of Israel (Rom. ix. 3-5). Dispensational Truth recognizes that Israel is the key to prophetic truth while they are a "people" before God, the promises made to the fathers, the Millennial glories, the Headship and Kingly-Priesthood of Israel must colour the hope set before the believer. When Israel became lo-ammi (not my people) in fulfillment of Hosea i. 9, iii. 1-4, Israel the appointed channel of blessing being temporarily removed, God introduced the dispensation of the Mystery, using the apostle Paul as the Prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles, as the mouth-piece to "make all men see" (Eph. iii. 1-14; Col. i. 23-27). We cannot expect to walk worthy of this calling, or to know what is the hope of this calling (Eph. i. 18; iv. 1) if we persist in ignoring the distinction that Scripture makes between the purpose of God with Israel as a people, and the purpose of God while Israel are scattered abroad in unbelief—in other words if we persist in ignoring the sovereign rights of Dispensational Truth in the realm of its interpretation of Holy Scripture. What has been said along this line is enough to convince any who will examine the matter without bias, and to multiply examples will not necessarily strengthen the argument, and so there we must leave this aspect of the matter. It might however be, that where the reader will not listen to the arguments we have brought forward, he may feel obliged to listen to the example of his Lord. Consequently, we ask him to turn to the record of the Saviour's opening ministry, as recorded in Luke iv., and see for himself that the Lord recognized dispensational truth.

"And He came to Nazareth, where he had been brought up: and, as His custom was, He went into the synagogue on the sabbath day, and stood up for to read.

And there was delivered unto Him the book of the prophet Esaias. And when He had opened the book, He found the place where it is written, The Spirit of the Lord is upon Me, because He hath anointed Me to preach the gospel to the poor; He hath sent Me to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised.

To preach the acceptable year of the Lord.

And He closed the book, and He gave it again to the minister, and sat down. And the eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened on Him.

And He began to say unto them, This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears" (iv. 16-21).

The passage quoted by the Lord is Isa. lxi. 1, 2. If we turn to that passage we shall see that the second verse continues "and the day of vengeance of our God". Consequently the Saviour broke off His reading at the first sentence, and the comma found in the A.V. of Isa. lxi. 2 represents a period of nineteen hundred years at the very least, for the day of vengeance has not yet come. Had the Lord continued with the second sentence of this second verse, He could not have said "This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears" but He graciously honoured the principle of "Right Division" (II Tim. ii. 15). He accepted the key of interpretation "Dispensational Truth" and reserved the "Day of Vengeance" for His Olivet prophecy (Luke xxi. 22).

Two important facts emerge from our Lord's use of Isa. lxi.

(1) Stopping as He did when reading verse 2, He acknowledges the dispensation principle.
(2) Quoting the remainder in His prophetic reference to His second coming, He showed that while Dispensational Truth divides the truth according to its legitimate time and place, it never denies that at the appointed time all must be fulfilled. "That all things which are written may be fulfilled" is only completely realized when dispensational truth is allowed its full force and sway.

While much more could be brought forward from the Scriptures, we believe sufficient Scriptural data has been placed before the reader, to justify, at the least, a suspension of judgment until all the implications of these examples are weighed in the balances of the Sanctuary. The one grand principle of interpretation is that given by Paul to Timothy, namely, "Rightly Divide the Word of Truth" (II Tim. ii. 15). A principle that distinguishes spheres of blessing, character of calling and the different ways that God has dealt with men since Adam fell, while the purpose of the ages has been unfolded and the stages in the attainment of the goal of Redeeming Love have succeeded one another; in which Patriarchal rule has been succeeded by Law, Kingdom by Church, and all making a perfect and harmonious whole; wherein no discordance can be heard, no contradiction tolerated, no confusion admitted, but where all is seen as the worthy product of Infinite Wisdom, Love and Grace, where all Truth resolves itself into DISPENSATIONAL TRUTH in which, while there may be "differences of administrations" it is "the same Lord" and "the same God which worketh all in all".

Dispensational truth has something deeper and richer than an academic interest, it is essentially

TRUTH FOR THE TIMES

If the reader has followed the argument of this article so far, he will have arrived at the conclusion, that each dispensation has its own "body of truth" and that those epistles written by Paul as "The Prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles" constitute "Truth for the Times". Now, in such a claim there is a challenge. First, it supposes that there can be "truth" in God's Word that is not "for the times". Secondly, that such a discrimination is proper and Scriptural, and thirdly, that four* epistles (Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, II Timothy) minister truth for the present dispensation, as no other part of Scripture can.

[* - Philemon does not treat of the distinctive character of the dispensation of the mystery, its gracious spirit permeates all the epistles by whomsoever written.]

Let us take these three divisions of our subject and examine them separately in the light of all Scripture.

First. Can there be "truth" that is true at one time and not true at another? In one sense, any word that God has said is eternally, unalterably, true. The law given through Moses is as true to-day as when it was first instituted. Yet, not one of those who read these words has ever kept all those laws, which are true, nor has he any intention of doing so. The law of Moses, as we have already seen, contains commands that were not only enjoined upon the people, but accompanied by severe penalties for non-observance. There is a series of commands accompanied by the threat of disobedience, that "He shall be cut off from his people". Such are the rite of circumcision (Gen. xvii. 14), the eating of leaven during the days of unleavened bread (Exod. xii. 15), the keeping of the sabbath (Exod. xxxi. 14), the keeping of the day of atonement (Lev. xxiii. 29), the observance of the Passover (Numb. ix. 13), the purification upon touching a dead body (Numb. xix. 13, 20). Now either these passages are the truth of God, or they are not. We believe that they are truth, the words of Moses being endorsed by the Saviour Himself (Luke xxiv. 27, John v. 46, 47). Here therefore are words of truth, recognized as truth by believers, who nevertheless agree that they have not obeyed them, and do not intend to obey them, yet they have not suffered the penalties involved, nor do they expect to. Indeed, as we have already observed, in the self-same Bible that enjoins, with such solemnity, circumcision or the keeping of the Sabbath day, we also read "If ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing . . . . . ye are fallen from grace" (Gal. v. 2 and 4). And again, to the same effect, "Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holy day, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days" (Col. ii. 16).

How are we to reconcile these, apparently, conflicting statements? You must be circumcised; you must not be circumcised. You must keep the Sabbath day; you should not keep the Sabbath day. You will be cut off if you fail to observe these commandments; you will fall from grace if you do. Unless the whole of the revelation of God is to be reduced to a mass of contradictions, surely there is a key provided that will give an honourable and satisfying solution of the difficulty. There is, and that key is implied in the term Dispensational Truth, the principle "Right Division", in other words "truth for the times". We therefore arrive at the next inquiry.

Secondly. Such a discrimination between one scripture and another is both proper and Scriptural. When the Apostle enjoined Timothy "rightly to divide the word of truth", or when he urged the Philippians to "approve things that are excellent", or, as the margin indicates, to "try the things that differ", he had this principle of interpretation in view. When the Apostle distinguishes between Jew and Gentile, between kingdom and church, between earthly promises and heavenly places, between Bride and Body, between the citizenship of the New Jerusalem and the seating together of some "in heavenly places", each portion of Scripture is recognized as "truth", but not every portion referred to is "truth for the times".

This principle of discrimination is called "dispensational truth", simply because all these differences are the result of changes in the developing purposes of God.

Now, Thirdly: After Israel had been set aside, as recorded in Acts xxviii., we find Paul still a prisoner at Rome, but free to receive all who would come to him, and in that condition he remained for two years. From that prison he wrote four epistles, each indelibly bearing the marks of his imprisonment in the body of the epistle. These four epistles are Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians and Philemon. Subsequently, he wrote the second epistle to Timothy, in which he again refers to the fact and significance of his imprisonment.

> "I Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles, if ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to youward" (Eph. iii. 1, 2).
> "I am an ambassador in bonds" (Eph. vi. 20).

These words make it clear that Paul, as the prisoner, had a special stewardship regarding the Gentiles, and we read further that this stewardship relates to "a mystery" revealed for the first time to men through Paul, and that it "completes" the Word of God (Eph. iii. 3-11; Col. i. 23-27). It is of the essence of a mystery that it should be "hid" until the time arrives for it to be revealed, and these scriptures, cited above, show that this mystery was "hid in God", "hid from ages and from generations" but has "now" been made manifest through the exclusive ministry of Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ.

To the believer, brought up in orthodoxy, accustomed to the phrase "the church began at Pentecost", taking to himself as a matter of course the words "we are the people of His pasture, and the sheep of His hand" (Psa. xcv. 7), the results of the application of "right division" and the somewhat startling claims of "dispensational truth", may seem after all to rest upon the somewhat uncertain basis of human deduction and inference. It may be that if we can discover that those dispensational changes which subdivide the purpose of the ages, have always been announced, and that spiritual deduction only finds its place after, and not before, the announcement has been made public, the recognition of the differences that claim attention and which are vital to the full acknowledgment of our calling may be simplified.

In the endeavour to discern the changing dispensations, we may collect together "things that differ", we may observe that one calling is associated with the period "before the foundation of the world", and another with a period "from (or since) the foundation of the world". We may observe that in one calling Christ is "King"; in another He is represented as "Priest after the order of Melchisedec", in another He is denominated "Head over all things to the church which is His body". We may observe that some believers are "to inherit the earth", but that others find their place in the "New Jerusalem", and yet others are blessed with all spiritual blessings "in heavenly places", and that this sphere of blessing is "where Christ sits at the right hand of God". We might moreover bring forward the prevalence of miraculous gifts and the persistence of the hope of Israel, right through the Acts of the Apostles to the last chapter, and compare and contrast this state of affairs with the teaching of "Prison Epistles". These, and many other studies are a legitimate approach to the study of the Scriptures, and fulfil the injunction "comparing spiritual things with spiritual". In this present study the key word is the word "witness", and our contention is that every dispensational change is introduced, or accompanied by an accredited witness. We are not left to our own searchings or deductions, we find witnesses at intervals along the way, who declare in the name of Him that sent them that this or that change has taken place. If this be so, then we should spare no pains to become acquainted with so important a feature in the unfolding of the divine purpose.

The first thing that we must do is to discover who, and what are called "witnesses" in the New Testament and, in order to avoid cumbering ourselves with unwanted material, we shall ignore references to "false witnesses" or those witnesses referred to who have no bearing upon the subject in hand.

(1) JOHN THE BAPTIST. "The same came for a witness" (John i. 7).
(2) THE LORD JESUS CHRIST. "I am one that bear witness of Myself" (John viii. 18).
  (a) The Father bears witness of Christ.
    "The Father that sent Me beareth witness" (John viii. 18).
  (b) The Holy Spirit's witness of Christ.
    "He shall testify of Me" (John xv. 26).
  (c) The Scriptures bear witness of Christ.
    "They are they which testify of Me" (John v. 39).
(3) SUPERNATURAL GIFTS AND SIGNS.
  (a) To Christ.
    "The works that I do, bear witness of Me" (John v. 36).
  (b) To apostles.
    "God also bearing them witness . . . . . with signs" (Heb. ii. 4)
(4) PETER and THE TWELVE. "Ye shall be witnesses unto Me" (Acts i. 8)
(5) THE APOSTLE PAUL,
  (a) Paul, before Acts xxviii. "His witness unto all men of what thou hast seen and heard' (Acts xxii. 15).
  (b) Paul both before and after Acts xxviii. "A witness both of these things which thou hast seen and of those things in the which I will appear" (Acts xxvi. 16).
  (c) Paul after Acts xxviii. "The testimony of our Lord nor of me His prisoner" (II Tim. i. 8).

It is written of John the Baptist "John did no miracle" (John x. 41), and there is neither sign, wonder nor miracle recorded of the apostle Paul after the change of dispensation which took place at Acts xxviii. We therefore distribute the witnesses in the New Testament as follows:

A | John the Baptist. No miracle.
  B | Christ, and His apostles until Acts xxviii.
    Sign, wonder and miracle.
A | Paul the Prisoner. No miracle.

It should be noticed with heart searching seriousness, that each one of the "witnesses" enumerated in the list above, were actually "martyrs". John the Baptist was beheaded, The Lord Jesus Christ was crucified, Peter was forewarned by the Lord as to the death he should die and spoke of the near approach of his "decease" in his second epistle, and Paul wrote his second epistle to Timothy in view of his approaching death which tradition says, as well as the evidence of the epistle, was by execution. They were witnesses in the double sense of the word. It cannot be too strongly emphasized therefore that only in a secondary sense can any one of us to-day be called "witnesses".

JOHN THE BAPTIST.—"How far was he an eye-witness"?

> "The next day John seeth Jesus coming unto Him, and saith, Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world. THIS IS HE OF WHOM I SAID . . . . . and John bare record (martureo same word 'bear witness' John i. 7), saying I SAW the spirit descending from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon Him. And I knew Him not; but He that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, Upon Whom thou shalt SEE the spirit descending and remaining on Him, the same is He which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost" (John i. 29-33).

THE TWELVE.—"How far were these eye-witnesses"?

> "Wherefore of these men which had COMPANIED with us ALL the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, BEGINNING at the baptism of John, UNTO that same day when He was taken up from us, MUST one be ordained to be a WITNESS of His resurrection" (Acts i. 21, 22).

PETER.—"He was seen of Cephas" (I Cor. xv. 5).

PAUL.—"Chosen . . . . . see that Just One and . . . . . hear His voice' (Acts xxii. 14).

As we trace the unfolding purpose in the New Testament we observe that at each central epoch, a witness is raised up.

Witnesses for Pentecost and its message are abundant in the early Acts. Even the number "twelve" had to be made up—for had not the Lord spoken of "twelve thrones" that must be occupied by the "twelve apostles"?

With the call and commission of Paul, however, a new witness appears and his advent indicates another dispensational change. He is given a number of titles, "A chosen vessel" being the earliest recorded. Paul was to bear the name of the Lord before the Gentiles, and Kings and the children of Israel. "Gentiles" occupying the first place even as they do in the prophetic utterance of old Simeon (Luke ii. 32). The emphasis upon the Gentiles in these passages, cannot be disassociated from the withdrawal of favour from Israel.

> "It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you; but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles" (Acts xiii. 46).

From Acts xxii. 6-15 we learn more fully the commission given to Paul following his conversion on the road to Damascus:

> "For thou shalt be His witness unto all men of what thou hast seen and heard" (15).

and referring to this first ministry which ends with the shadow of prison in Acts xx., he summed it up as "testifying (or witnessing) both to the Jews, and also to the Greeks, repentance towards God, and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ" (21).

In his defence, the Apostle more than once linked the two sections of his ministry by the word that is translated either "witness" or "testify".

> "As thou hast testified of Me in Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at Rome" (Acts xxiii. 11).

In like manner, Paul's prison ministry, the ministry that unfolded the new dispensation of the mystery, the ministry that finds its exposition in the "Prison Epistles", Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, Philemon and II Timothy, this too is a "witness" or a "testimony". The first ministry comes to an end in Acts xx., and the new ministry is envisaged. Referring to the prophecies that spoke of "bonds and afflictions" Paul said:

> "But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, TO TESTIFY the gospel of the grace of God" (Acts xx. 24).

This implies something more than preaching the gospel as an "evangelist", it includes this, but it gives meaning to the emphasis which is laid on "the grace of God", for in the Prison Epistles we read that "the dispensation" which had been given to the apostle as "the Prisoner of Christ Jesus for you Gentiles" was "the dispensation of the grace of God" (Eph. iii. 1, 2).

Again, in his defence before Agrippa the apostle spoke of his twofold ministry, again using the word translated either "witness" or "testimony".

> "I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a WITNESS both of these things which thou hast seen, and of those things in the which I will appear unto thee, delivering thee from the people, and from the Gentiles, unto whom now I send thee" (Acts xxvi. 16, 17).

The apostle's prison ministry is called "the testimony (or witness) of our Lord" and of Paul "His prisoner" (II Tim. i. 8). The special teaching which Timothy was enjoined to commit to faithful men, was a teaching which he had heard of Paul "among many witnesses" (II Tim. ii. 2). So, in his first epistle to Timothy, Paul speaks of the great message concerning "One God and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, Who gave Himself a ransom for all", he adds (our translation):

> "THE TESTIMONY IN ITS OWN PECULIAR SEASONS" (I Tim. ii. 5, 6).

Then immediately following this most discriminating claim, he adds:

> "Whereunto I am ordained a preacher and an apostle (I speak the truth in Christ, and lie not), a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and verity" (I Tim. ii. 7).

The words translated "in due time" in I Tim. ii. 6, which we have rendered "in its own peculiar seasons", are the Greek words idios and kairos in the plural dative. Idios means something peculiarly one's "own", and is so translated in I Tim. iii. 4, 5, 12. A similar phrase, similarly translated in the Authorized Version is found in Titus i. 2, 3:

> "In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before age-times (pro chronon aionion); but hath in due times (kairois idiois) manifested His word through preaching, which is committed unto me according to the commandment of God our Saviour."

Here we find it is a "God that cannot lie" which strikes the same note as the interjected words of I Tim. ii. 7 "I speak the truth in Christ I lie not", and suggests that this peculiar dispensational claim here "attested" would be strongly "contested", a fact that most of those associated with The Berean Expositor will endorse. Here also we have a message "committed" to Paul in harmony with a "commandment of God", which is but another way of saying "whereunto I am ordained" (I Tim. ii. 7).

The revelation of the mystery and the dispensation of the grace of God, especially committed to Paul the Prisoner with its accompanying Gospel of the grace of God (?), and its teaching concerning the one Mediator Who gave Himself a ransom for all, as distinct from the more limited reference in Matt. xx. 28, which was "for many", this new ministry was a testimony or a witness that had its own peculiar season for its manifestation and announcement. Therefore every fresh unfolding of the dispensations has been accompanied at its inception, with a specially equipped and commissioned witness. Dispensational truth, like all other aspects of truth, can be supported, illustrated and enforced, by comparison, by study and by every other legitimate means, but it is an occasion for thanksgiving to have seen, that its discovery does not depend upon the WIT of man, but stands solidly and unassailably upon the WITNESS of God. From the days of John the Baptist until the end of time, each and every dispensational change could be heralded with the words employed by Paul "A testimony in its own peculiar season".

Dispensational Truth is "Attested Truth".
Dispensational Truth is "Truth for the Times".
Dispensational Truth is "The Key of Knowledge".

Grapes of Eshcol

A sequel to the booklet "The Dispensational Frontier"

pp. 161 - 180

A cluster of peculiar blessings, brought from the high calling of the Mystery, and exhibited to the Lord's people in much the same spirit as prompted the witness of Caleb and Joshua.

The book of Deuteronomy opens with the words of Moses "on this side Jordan" in the wilderness over against the Red Sea, but the record is interrupted at the second verse, by a parenthetical observation:

> "There are eleven days' journey from Horeb by the way of Mount Seir unto Kadesh-barnea" (Deut. i. 2).

Somewhat comparable, and at first sight as difficult to understand, is the strange interruption of the narrative of Acts i. 15:

> "And in those days Peter stood up in the midst of the disciples and said, the number of names together were about an hundred and twenty, Men and brethren, this Scripture, etc., etc." (Acts i. 15, 16).

We have purposely omitted the marks of parenthesis (. . . . .), there being none in the original to intensify the strangeness of this interpolation. The structure reveals that there is a correspondence between this 120 with the addition of Matthias to the "eleven", thus making up the number of the apostolate (12) (Acts i. 26), and with the number of different countries represented at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii. 9-11) which are twelve, because it was essential, if Israel were to be called once more to repentance, that there should be "twelve" thrones judging the "twelve" tribes of Israel. So, returning to Deuteronomy, the break in the narrative is inspired and purposeful. Let us ponder its meaning and its implications. At Horeb, the solemn covenant had been made between the Lord and this people, and from Mount Sinai to Kadesh there are twenty-one stages indicated (Numb. xxxiii. 16-37) and some of these were marked by gross disobedience as at Kibroth-hattavah, so that Israel took much longer than "eleven days" to traverse the route laid down in Numb. xxxiii. Disobedience and unbelief apart, the direct route would have occupied just eleven days, and the implication is that one more day would have seen Israel over the border, and into the land. Instead, Moses reminded Israel:

> "The space in which we came from Kadesh-barnea, until we were come over the brook Zered, was thirty and eight years" (Deut. ii. 14).

The thirteenth and fourteenth chapters of Numbers set out the tragedy of Kadesh-barnea at some length. The twelve spies search the land from one end to the other, and at Eshcol, a valley in the vicinity of Hebron (Numb. xiii. 22, 23), very near the Southern border of the land of promise, they cut a cluster of grapes which they bore between two upon a staff, and brought it as an evidence of the goodliness of the land towards which the Lord, through Moses, was leading His people. Alas! while Caleb and Joshua testified to the goodness of the land, and to the faithfulness and power of the Lord to fulfil His promise and give them the land for their inheritance, the ten spies intimidated the people by their report concerning the giants, the sons of Anak, so that the faithful two were threatened with stoning for their pains.

In this booklet we too are bringing as it were "a cluster" from Eshcol even at the risk of being as badly treated for our pains as were Caleb and Joshua. The country which we have searched and on which we report is represented by the epistle to the Ephesians, and in the history of the Church, Israel's defection has been, alas, only too faithfully copied to its loss. Paul, like the faithful spies, was forsaken at the close of his life. "All in Asia" turned away from him; the precious revelation of the truth of Mystery which it was his glory to make known was discounted, and so completely was his testimony rejected that no vestige of it is discernible in the writings of the "Fathers" who go back to the early portion of Acts, and wandered in their wilderness, even as Israel did in theirs. Should the reader not quite appreciate this analogy, we suggest that the earlier booklets of this series be consulted, namely "The Dispensational Frontier, Acts xxviii. 23-31" and "Who then is Paul?" otherwise we shall have to occupy much of our limited space in going over ground already covered.

We have however prepared a pamphlet pointing out that leading men among the early "Brethren" saw the distinction between the calling of the church formed during the Acts and that of the church called afterwards, and before producing some of the high glories of the Ephesian epistle, called by us "The Grapes of Eshcol" in reference to this halt and withdrawal at our spiritual "Kadesh-barnea" we will reproduce that pamphlet here, in the hope that some may be led to deprecate the attitude that not only refuses to go on into the high calling of the Mystery, but which threatens to "stone" those who would emulate the simple trust of Caleb and Joshua.

> An appeal, addressed to readers of the writings of B. W. Newton and C. H. Macintosh, concerning the unique character of the dispensation of the Mystery and of Acts xxviii. as a dispensational frontier.

In 1907 and 1908, J. J. B. Coles wrote a series of articles in "Things to Come" under the Editorship of Dr. E. W. Bullinger, entitled KADESH BARNEA, in which he saw in the timidity of many believers, when faced with the teaching of Eph. iii. 1-13 and Col. i. 24-28, and the unpleasant consequences of accepting that claim of the Apostle to have received a dispensation for the Gentiles, a repetition of the attitude of the ten spies who said "we be not able to go up" (Numb. xiii. 31). While literal "stoning with stones" (Numb. xiv. 10) has not been resorted to by Christians who condemn our insistence upon Acts xxviii. as a dispensational frontier, the spiritual equivalent alas, has not been unknown in the past, can still be sensed in the present and will possibly be intensified in the future, if we do not misinterpret certain signs. It is not our custom to quote the opinions of others, or to cite their teaching, whether it be for or against our own, but to occupy our time, strength and resources in giving positive teaching, leaving the vindication of our witness or its refutation to the Saviour Whom alone we recognize as "Master and Lord". However, in this leaflet, we are making some quotations from the writings of men who were prominent teachers among "The Brethren" whose testimony, had it been followed, would have led the believer over the dispensational frontier of Acts xxviii., into the exclusively new and parenthetical dispensation of the Mystery, leaving intact Matt. xxiv. with its association with Dan. ix., as the hope of Israel, and yet allowing the position laid down in Rom. xi. to colour the teaching, as it should and does, of the early epistles of Paul, namely Galatians, Hebrews, I and II Thessalonians, I and II Corinthians and Romans. These epistles while giving the great doctrinal basis of Justification by Faith for all time, revealed that Israel was still "first", that the Gentile believer though "justified" was, dispensationally, a "wild olive" grafted contrary to nature into the existing olive tree of Israel. The organ of the Sovereign Grace Advent Testimony (Watching and Waiting, March-April 1953) gives the testimony of one such teacher among the early Brethren. He saw that the lo-ammi condition of Israel since the rejection of their Messiah, demanded some compensatory change in the dealings of God with the Gentile world, and practically demanded the church of the new calling which was revealed to Paul as the prisoner of Jesus Christ. The article in question is entitled:

and one or two statements there recorded indicate how near that man of God came to ascending the hill country of the Amorites and entering into the high calling of the dispensation of the Mystery.

"The question is (says J. J. B. Coles in his opening article in 'Things to Come', March 1907), have we entered Canaan by way of the mountain of the Amorites? or, are we going with the multitude by the way of Jordan? The lesson of Kadesh-Barnea has been lost to many, and Caleb's whole-heartedness has found but few imitators. We must of course be careful not to press an Old Testament type beyond a legitimate application." B. W. Newton's immediate quest was the true interpretation of Prophecy, but Scripture is one in its testimony, so that to approximate to the truth of Prophecy will necessarily lead to the illumination of related revelation.

First we quote B. W. Newton's interpretation of Rom. xi.:

> Circumstances, however, occurred, that led me to consider with care the eleventh chapter of Romans. I could not close my eyes to the fact that the future history of the literal Israel was there spoken of; and that it was put in marked contrast with the history of those who are at present being gathered out from among the Gentiles, during the time of Israel's unbelief. I saw the words 'there shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob' could not be explained of any past act of Grace that has hitherto been shown, either towards Jews or Gentiles. I saw that it could be explained only of the future forgiveness of Israel, as a nation. I saw also that Israel when nationally converted, are not to be merged in the present Gentile Church, for then they would have been represented in this chapter as graffed in upon the Gentile branch, which constitutes in Rom. xi., the symbol of the present professing Church. On the contrary, it is said in this chapter that, as a distinct branch, they shall be graffed back into their own olive tree. These, and a few other connected truths, I began to discern, though dimly and imperfectly."

B. W. Newton goes on to give clear and uncompromising testimony to the failure of the Preterite system of Prophecy, in which so much that is really future is interpreted of the past, and with this, we are in complete agreement, but his conviction now to be cited, that there is a threefold division of time in Israel's history, pointed so clearly to the present dispensation of the Mystery, that one is still left amazed and distressed that eyes so touched by the spirit of grace should not have seen the open door, and have entered into all the blessings that are revealed in the great Epistle of the Mystery, Ephesians. We quote again from B. W. Newton:

"THREE PERIODS IN ISRAEL'S HISTORY

> I observed also, that the history of Israel during the time of their punishment and subjection to the Gentiles is distributed into three distinct divisions: the first extending from Nebuchadnezzar to their dispersion by Romans, the second being the present Period of their dispersion, the third, the yet future period of their natural re-establishment in unbelief; so, the prophetic visions of Daniel are to be divided into three parts, corresponding to these three periods. But I observed this likewise, that when the first of these periods terminated, historic detail terminated. As soon as the dispersion of Israel was effected, and they ceased to have a recognized national existence in their land, there is a pause in the historic detail of Daniel—no person, no place, no date is mentioned during the present period of dispersion. But when the third period of their unbelieving history commences, when they again have returned in unbelief to their own land, then the historic detail of Daniel re-commences, and is given even with greater emphasis than before. So entirely is Gentile history made in the Scripture to revolve around Jerusalem as its centre. Whilst Jerusalem nationally exists, the history of the nations that are brought into connexion with it is given; but when Jerusalem ceases to exist nationally, the history of the Gentiles in Scripture ceases too.
> We are in the interval, the period of dispersion, now. It will terminate when Jerusalem is nationally reconstituted. (Watching and Waiting, March-April 1953)."

Look at the words "no person, no place, no date is mentioned during the present period of dispersion". These words cry aloud that Dispensational Truth demands during the period of Israel's blindness which commenced at Acts xxviii. 23-31, that no O.T. Prophecy is being fulfilled. Matt. xxiv. also must belong, not to the present calling of the Mystery, but to the "third period" when the "historic detail of Daniel recommences"; that a new revelation, with a new sphere, constitution and hope must be given by God if any Gentile is to be saved and blessing during the setting aside of the hitherto exclusive channel of blessing—Israel. Accepting B. W. Newton's view and taking it to its logical conclusion, we have the following threefold division of Israel's history:

FIRST DIVISION	SECOND DIVISION	THIRD DIVISION
From Nebuchadnezzar to Dispersion by the Romans, 70A.D., a few years after Acts xxviii.	"There is a pause." Here comes the dispensation of the Mystery, a parenthesis, unconnected with Israel, Prophecy or Covenants. From Acts xxviii. to the resumption of prophecy.	Unbelieving history commences, histories detail of Daniel recommences. Dan. ix. in intimately linked with Matt. xxiv. (Matt. xxiv. 15) and so completely disassociated from the Second Division.

To the making known of the unique calling of this "Second Division" wherein Israel is "dispersed" the writer of this present leaflet has devoted the bulk of his life and energies, yet those who advocate the teaching of B. W. Newton as set out in the above quotation, can, at the self same time see nothing incongruous in seeing in Matt. xxiv. with its incisive reference to Dan. ix., characteristics of the hope of the church to-day. Is it too much to believe that a few, after pondering these things may be led, Berean like, to "search and see"?

The May issue for 1952, "Questions and Answers", edited by Dr. Harold P. Morgan, Riverton, New Jersey, U.S.A. opens with the following headline:

WHAT WERE THE TEACHINGS OF EARLY PLYMOUTH BRETHREN REGARDING THE CHURCH, THE BODY OF CHRIST?

Quotations are made in answer to this question from two teachers among the early Brethren, namely C. H. Macintosh, and Richard Holden.

> "The thought of a church composed of Jew and Gentile 'seated together in the heavenlies' LAY FAR BEYOND (our emphasis) the range of prophetic testimony . . . . . We may range through the inspired pages of the law and the prophets, from one end to the other, and find no solution of 'the great Mystery' of the Church . . . . . Peter received the keys of the kingdom, and he used those keys, first to open the kingdom to the Jew, and then to the Gentile. But Peter never received a commission to unfold the mystery of the church" ("Life and Times of Elijah the Tishbite").

How strange to find C.H.M. and C.H.W. saying the same things, yet how strange to note the way in which "The Brethren" have honoured the one, and repudiated the other!

In 1870 Richard Holden wrote a work entitled:

THE MYSTERY, THE SPECIAL MISSION OF THE APOSTLE PAUL. THE KEY TO THE PRESENT DISPENSATION.

Here is a brief quotation from this very precious testimony:

> "To make all see what is the dispensation, or in other words, to be the divinely-appointed instructor in the character and order of the present time, as Moses was in the dispensation of 'law', is that special feature in the commission of Paul in which it was distinct from that of the other apostles . . . . . If then it shall appear, that, far from seeing 'what is the dispensation of the Mystery' the mass of Christians have entirely missed it, and, as the natural consequence have almost completely misunderstood Christianity, importing into it the things proper to another dispensation, and so confounding Judaism and Christianity in an inexpressible jumble; surely it is a matter for deep humiliation before God, and for earnest prayerful effort to retrieve with God's help, this important and neglected teaching."

It seems almost unbelievable that a movement that could produce such a testimony, could nevertheless perpetuate that "inexpressible jumble" namely of confusing the NEW COVENANT or TESTAMENT, made only "with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah" (Jer. xxxi. 31), and make it the very centre of that worship and assembly, thereby "confounding Judaism" with the truth of the Church of the Mystery, the present dispensation and calling, in which no covenant new or old finds a place, but a choice and a promise made "before the foundation of the world".

We send forth this leaflet with the prayer that the Lord may direct its distribution, so that some, at present distracted by the "inexpressible jumble" entertained by the successors of such writers as C. H. Macintosh and Richard Holden, may have their eyes opened to see "what is the hope of His calling".

A reference to the closing words of J.N.D. in his "Synopsis" on Acts xxviii., will show that he too believed at the setting aside of the Jew, believers enter into "another sphere on other grounds", yet his followers definitely turn back from this Kadesh-Barnea, and build upon the epistle to the Corinthians for their assembly and its communion, and say hard things, as did Israel, of those who have accepted this position and who have followed out its logical conclusions.

This interim dispensation is called in Eph. iii. 9, R.V. "The dispensation of the mystery, which from all ages hath been hid in God who created all things."

THE MYSTERY

"WHAT IS THE DISPENSATION OF THE MYSTERY?" (Eph. iii. 9 R.V.)

For the guidance of the earnest inquirer after truth, most books of the Bible contain one or more key words, which if faithfully accepted and applied, unlock treasures of truth that must otherwise remain undiscovered. Some time ago attempts were made to teach that the epistle to the Hebrews and that to the Ephesians taught the same truth, ministered to the same calling, belonged to the same dispensation. Nevertheless, however many parallels may have been discovered, no unbiased mind could resist the fact that whereas the central feature of Hebrews is THE NEW COVENANT, explicitly referable to the prophecy of Jeremiah (Heb. viii. 8-13; Jer. xxxi. 31-34); the central feature of Ephesians is THE MYSTERY, explicitly said to have been "hid in God" (Eph. iii. 9), and "hid from ages and from generations, but now made manifest" (Col. i. 26). It is not our intention to take up this controversy here, but in this booklet it will be our endeavour to set out as clearly as grace will enable, an answer to the question "What is the dispensation of the Mystery?" Before considering either the occurrences of the word "mystery" or its several contexts and connexions, it will be necessary to seek the essential meaning of the term.

THE MEANING OF "MYSTERY"

In the first place we observe that the Greek word musterion has not been translated, but carried over from the original and expressed in English letters. The word is derived from muo "to close, to shut" as the lips or the eyes and so to preserve a secret. This root mu appears in other languages than the Greek, with much the same significance. "Mute", dumb, comes via the Latin mutum, the Greek muo and the Sanskrit muka, and so also is derived "mutter", and such words as mum, mum-chance, mum budget, mumble, all of which have the idea of something shut or hidden, as a common factor. There are other terms found in the N.T. that indicate an intended contrast with the pagan mysteries which were in active operation in the earth. The many references to "the perfect" is one such term, the word indicating one who had been "initiated" into the mysteries.

> "Howbeit we speak wisdom among them that are perfect . . . . . the wisdom of God in a mystery" (I Cor. ii. 6, 7).
> "Let us therefore, as many as be perfect, be thus minded" (Phil. iii. 15).

When the Apostle said "in all things I am instructed" (Phil. iv. 12) he used the Greek word mueomai "to be initiated into a mystery". It is significant that where some of Israel are shown to be blind and the proclamation of the near advent of the kingdom of heaven gives place to "the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven" that the word kammuo is used, "to close, and to shut" the eyes (Matt. xiii. 15), kammuo being a compound of kata "down" and muo "shut". While it must ever remain true, that if God hides a thing, no human wisdom or power will ever lead to its discovery, it is also true that, when once such a mystery has been made known, it is as understandable as any other subject of revelation, and the following passages make this feature quite clear.

> "It is given unto you TO KNOW the mysteries" (Matt. xiii. 11).
> "Ye should not be IGNORANT of this mystery" (Rom. xi. 25).
> "According to the REVELATION of the mystery" (Rom. xvi. 25).
> "We SPEAK the wisdom of God in a mystery" (I Cor. ii. 7).
> "Though I UNDERSTAND all mysteries" (I Cor. xiii. 2).
> "Having MADE KNOWN the mystery" (Eph. i. 9; iii. 3).

Other passages could be cited but these are sufficient to show that there is nothing "mysterious" about the mysteries of Scripture, they are secrets, hidden by God until the appointed time for the revelation arrives and thus they form a part of the truth that pertains to the time then present.

MYSTERY OR MYTH

The word translated "fable" in I and II Timothy, Titus and II Peter is the Greek muthos, another derivative of muo. At the end of his ministry, the apostle Paul warns of perilous times, and among other things says:

> "All they which are in Asia be turned away from me."
> "They shall turn away their ears from the TRUTH, and shall be turned unto MYTHS" (II Tim. i. 15; iv. 4).

We can see this sad turning away from Paul and his teaching to-day, and the ever-increasing substitution of the "myth" with all its blight and deception, for the "mystery" with all its glory and grace.

The first occurrence of musterion "secret" or "mystery" is in the book of the prophet Daniel, and there is significance in that simple fact. Daniel may be likened to the apostle Paul. Both were "prisoners of the Lord", both had a special message for the "Gentiles", both exercised their ministry consequent upon the failure of Israel. The relationship of Daniel, Israel, Gentile and Mystery may be seen in the following sequence:

Daniel	Kingdom of Israel suspended.	Times of Gentiles begin.
Matt. xiii.	The mysteries of the Kingdom.	Isa. vi. 9, 10.
Acts xxviii.	Kingdom and hope of Israel suspended.	Mystery "For you Gentiles".

So far as Israel is concerned it can be written:

"When HISTORY ceases, MYSTERY begins."

It can be demonstrated from the O.T. records, that on more than one occasion the prophetic clock stopped, and while mundane time goes on, time as related to Israel is limited to their being as ammi "My people"; it ceased to be reckoned by God, when Israel become Lo-ammi "not My people", and during the waiting period spoken of in Hos. iii., the parenthesis of the present dispensation of the Mystery was introduced by God at Acts xxviii. No prophecies, other than those found in Paul's epistles, especially those dealing with "the last days" in I and II Timothy, will be fulfilled during the dispensation of the Mystery. Israel are the people of the prophecy and when they emerge from their long exile and look upon Him Whom they have pierced, the present dispensation will have come to a close.

ISRAEL AND THE MYSTERY

When we consider all that God has said concerning the place that Israel occupies in the outworking of His purposes, when we remember that the Lord Himself acknowledged that "Salvation is of the Jews" (John iv. 22) any failure on their part to live up to their high destiny, must inevitably bring about catastrophic consequences, and whether we believe that at Acts xxviii., that great dispensational rupture occurred or not, the events that happened both to Israel and Jerusalem in 70A.D. make a change of the attitude of God to the Gentile imperative if salvation is not to die out of the earth. What God would do, should Israel fail, no one could tell, for such an event is neither foreshadowed nor discussed. No one living before Acts xxviii. became history, except possibly Paul himself, knew that before the foundation of the world, God had foreseen and provided against such a condition, and until this new truth was revealed to Paul as the Prisoner of Jesus Christ for us Gentiles, it necessarily remained a "mystery" in the fullest sense of the term. That aliens and strangers, Christless, Godless, hopeless Gentiles could ever be the objects of such superlative grace, that of such it could be written:

> "And hath raised us up together, and made us SIT TOGETHER in heavenly places in Christ Jesus," never entered the mind of man, and even to-day is received by comparatively few.

When the seventh angel sounds, the mystery of God will be finished. Had there been no sin, no death, no failure, no serpent, Satan or Devil there would have been no need for mystery or secret. Israel's failure at the proclamation of the Gospel of the Kingdom is met by the introduction of the "mysteries of the kingdom of heaven" in which the long deferred end is related to the words of the second parable "an enemy hath done this". The mystery of the gospel as spoken of in Rom. xvi. 25, something that had been "hushed" since the world began, looks to Rom. xvi. 20 where Gen. iii. 15 is brought into light, and the enmity between the two seeds is seen to be the background. As we go through the several mysteries of the N.T. that impinge upon our calling, we shall find that this feature is constant. The Mystery is the answer of the Wise God to the machinations of His wily foe. He reveals His will, but does not always make known what might be the "mystery" of His will (Eph. i. 4, 5, 9). It was the revealed "will" of God that if Adam disobeyed the Lord's command, "in the day . . . . ." he would surely die. It was the mystery of His will, and all unknown to Adam, to provide a Redeemer "before the foundation of the world" (I Pet. i. 19) and so take the wise in his own craftiness and outwit the Devil in all his ways.

THE BAPTISM INTO MOSES

(The baptism from which water was excluded)

We who publish this booklet have been, by that faith which is the substance of things hoped for, into a land of promise, a land not bounded by earthly frontiers, not flowing with milk and honey, not the seat of an earthly Jerusalem, containing no "Dead Sea", but of which the earthly land of promise can be used as a type. We have been redeemed by the precious blood even as Israel were by the Passover (Eph. i. 7), and have had our Red Sea experience at least in one vital sense. Israel, on leaving Egypt were "baptized INTO Moses" (I Cor. x. 1) we have been baptized INTO Christ. This is the first of all baptisms and the most neglected. Christian societies have concentrated so much attention on the baptisms that were introduced into the tabernacle worship, which the epistle to the Hebrews speaks of as "divers baptisms and carnal ordinances, imposed on them" (Heb. ix. 10), that the one essential baptism has been overlooked and neglected.

In most places where the Red Sea crossing is mentioned in the Scriptures, our attention is drawn to the singular fact that Israel went "on dry land in the midst of the sea".

> "The children of Israel went into the midst of the sea upon the DRY GROUND . . . . . the children of Israel walked upon DRY LAND." (Exod. xiv. 22, 29).
>
> "The children of Israel went on DRY LAND in the midst of the sea." (Exod. xv. 19).
>
> "The Lord DRIED UP the waters of the Red Sea." (Josh. ii. 10).
>
> "The Lord your God DRIED UP the waters of the Jordan from before you . . . . . as . . . . . the Red Sea." (Josh. iv. 23)
>
> "He turned the sea into DRY LAND: they went through the flood on foot." (Psa. lxvi. 6).
>
> "He rebuked the Red Sea also, and it was DRIED UP: so He led them through the depths, as through the wilderness." (Psa. cvi. 9).
>
> "That led them through the deep, as an horse in the wilderness." (Isa. lxiii. 12, 13).
>
> "By faith they passes through the Red Sea as by DRY LAND." (Heb. xi. 29).

If we believe that "all Scripture is given by inspiration of God" then this repeated insistence upon "dry land" is essential truth. If we believe that the O.T. types foreshadowed N.T. realities, we cannot, we dare not use water baptism to fulfil the type of the baptism of Israel into Moses. The church of the Mystery is baptized into Christ, and there is the same insistence upon the absence of water. In the unity of the spirit (Eph. iv. 3-5) there is but "one" baptism, whereas during the Acts there was baptism in both water and spirit (Acts x. 47). This unity will not tolerate two baptisms, anymore than it will tolerate two Bodies, two faiths or two Lords. Before there can be any participation in the high glories of the Ephesian teaching, this one baptism, typified by the baptism of all Israel "into Moses" without a spot of water in the process must become a fact.

> "Buried with Him in baptism" (Col. ii. 12) follows "In Whom also ye are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands . . . . . by the circumcision of Christ", and when it can be proved that the church of Colosse were instructed to perform the rite of literal circumcision, it will be time enough to argue that the burial with baptism that follows takes place at the font by sprinkling or at the pool by immersion.

Assuming that the reader has traveled with us in spirit so far and is willing to examine the clusters of blessings that may be represented by this bunch of the grapes of Eshcol, let us turn our attention to some of the unique features of this great Epistle to the Ephesians.

ALL SPIRITUAL BLESSINGS (Eph. i. 3)

Writing to the believer before the great dispensational landmark of Acts xxviii., Paul speaks of "the blessing of Abraham" coming on the Gentiles, but Abraham is never mentioned in the "Prison Epistles", and no blessing of Abraham is associated either with "heavenly places" or "before the foundation of the world". There are some terms used in the Scriptures, which by their very nature and the place they occupy in the scheme of salvation, come over and over again in the writings of the apostle. Such terms as "faith", "redemption", "justification" will come to the mind immediately, and are found in many of the epistles whether written before or after Acts xxviii. No one moreover could deny the use of the word "blessing" when speaking of these great doctrines of salvation, yet the fact remains that Rom. xv. 29 "the fullness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ", I Cor. x. 16 "the cup of blessing which we bless" and Gal. iii. 14 "the blessing of Abraham" are the only other occurrences of the word in Paul's epistles. So far as the Prison Epistles are concerned Eph. i. 3 stands alone, the word "blessing" meeting us in the very opening words of the new revelation and never again employed in any capacity by the apostle. Terms such as "seated together" and "blessing" receive emphasis by their glorious solitariness They stand alone and are beyond compare.

Green, in his handbook says that where the adjective pas "all" in the singular number is written without the article "the", it signifies "every", but with the article it means "the whole of" the object which it qualifies. Thus pasa polis means "every city"; pasa he polis or he pasa polis "the whole city" and he polis pasa would have a slightly different meaning—either "the city, all of it" or "the city in every part".

The church of the one body is blessed "with every blessing that is spiritual". This is even wider in its scope than to say "all spiritual blessings", for if the number of blessings were but few—say four, they could still be defined as "all spiritual", whereas the mind reels as it endeavours to grasp the fact that there is no blessing that comes under the category of "spiritual" that is omitted. It is highly improbable, that, while we are in this life, we shall be able to appreciate a tithe of what is here so freely bestowed.

In complete contrast with the spiritual blessings of the Mystery, are the "carnal" or "natural" blessings of the law.

> "Blessed shalt thou be in the city, and blessed shalt thou be in the field . . . . . blessed shall be thy basket and thy store . . . . . the Lord shall command the blessing upon thee in thy storehouses . . . . . the Lord shall make thee plenteous in goods . . . . ." (Deut. xxviii. 1-3)
> "Blessed is every one that feareth the Lord: that walketh in His ways. For thou shalt eat the labour of thine hands: happy shalt thou be, and it shall be well with thee. Thy wife shall be as a faithful vine by the sides of thine house, thy children shall be like olive plants round about thy table" (Psa. cxxviii. 1-3).

How completely opposite all this is from the experience of the believer under the dispensation of grace. Like Paul, he may know what it is to suffer need, to be in want, to know what it is to be continually in trouble. He will have no guarantee of a settled dwelling-place, he has no promise of special protection during periods of danger, his "basket and store" may show impoverishment, while the ungodly may appear to prosper. It would be foolish to assess a man's spiritual worth to-day by the size of his bank balance, or any other material standard. Eph. i. 3 does not speak of daily bread, of dwelling place, of home comforts or of business success. It visualizes a new plane, the spiritual, which is on resurrection ground. The earnest of our inheritance is not a bunch of grapes as it was when the spies returned with the grapes of Eshcol, neither are our enemies men of flesh and blood, but they are spiritual Canaanites, principalities and powers.

IN HEAVENLY PLACES (Eph. i. 3)

We have said elsewhere that this phrase is unique, that it occurs in the epistle to the Ephesians and nowhere else. The unwary can easily be moved when they read that, in spite of what we have said, epouranios occurs in fifteen other places outside of Ephesians, as widely distributed as Matthew, John, I Corinthians, Philippians, II Timothy and Hebrews. We have been accused of misleading God's people and of misquoting scripture, and yet, in spite of all that has or can be said we repeat that the phrase "in heavenly places" en tois epouraniois is unique, occurring nowhere else than in the epistle to the Ephesians. The word "heavenly" epouranios most certainly occurs elsewhere, this we have never denied, we read in Matt. xviii. 35 of "My heavenly Father" and in John iii. 12 of "heavenly things", in I Cor. xv. 40 of "celestial bodies" and in Hebrews of those who "tasted of the heavenly gift". No one, so far as our knowledge permits us to say, has ever maintained that those Hebrews who had tasted of the heavenly gift, had actually ascended up to heaven itself in order to taste it! Many things may be heavenly in origin and in character that are not enjoyed "in heaven", and this is the point, it is this feature that is unique. The reader will agree that the word "places" answers the question "where?" and our first consideration must be to examine the Scriptures to see whether "this is so".

Hou is an adverb of place, and is used elliptically instead of the full expression eph hou topou "in what place". We read in Col. iii. 1 "seek those things which are above WHERE Christ sitteth at the right hand of God". Presently we shall see that "heavenly places" is synonymous with "where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God", and that it is moreover allied with the word ano "above", which also is directly connected with these heavenly places.

This one passage, Col. iii. 1, establishes that Christ is represented as being someWHERE, and if He is said to be seated at the right hand of God in heavenly places in Ephesians, no more need be said on that score. That such a statement is true every reader is aware, for Eph. i. 20, 22 directs our wondering attention to the exalted position of Christ, Who being raised from the dead was set "at His own right hand in the heavenly places". This sphere of exalted glory is further defined, it is said to be "far above all principality and power" (Eph. i. 21). Now the simple connective ano is sufficient to take us to "where" Christ sitteth at the right hand of God (Col. iii. 1), consequently the intensive huperano employed by the Apostle, and translated "far above" in Eph. i. 21, cannot certainly mean less, it must mean more than the simple ano. If we allow the Apostle to speak for himself we shall be left in no doubt as to the nature of this exaltation. In the fourth of Ephesians we read:

> "He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens, that He might fill all things" (Eph. iv. 10).

Let us notice one or two important features in this passage "He ascended up" anabaino literally means "to go up" as one would a mountain (Matt. v. 1); or as the false shepherds who "climb up" some other way (John x. 1). The Ascension is put in contrast with His "descent" katabaino. This also primarily means "to go down" as rain descends (Matt. vii. 25), or when one descends a mountain (Matt. xvii. 9). Eph. iv tells us that His descent was to "the lower parts" kaloteros and that His Ascent was "far above all heavens", and lest we should be tempted for any reason to set a limit to this ascent, we are further informed that this Descent and this Ascent was in order that He may "fill all things". Consequently, the Saviour ascended to the highest conceivable position in glory. Now this position described as huperano "far above all heavens" is found in Eph. i. 21, "far above all principality and power". They are co-extensive in scope and meaning. In other parts of the New Testament we read of this Ascension and one or two passages give further meaning and point to the phrase we are examining. The apostle speaks of the Ascension when writing to the Hebrews, says of Christ that He "is passed into the heavens", which the Revised Version corrects to read "passed through the heavens". The word here is dierchomai "passed through" as Israel passed through the Red Sea (I Cor. x. 1) or as the proverbial camel is spoken of as going through the eye of a needle (Matt. xix. 24). Again, in Heb. vii. 26 Christ is said to have been made "higher than the heavens". We can therefore understand that the epi in the compound epouranios does really indicate position and place—every reference so far considered points to that one fact, this is "where" Christ sits, this is "where" all spiritual blessings will be enjoyed.

However, we have not yet concluded our examination. Christ is said to be in "heaven" (Heb. ix. 24) in the self same epistle that says He "passed through the heavens". How can this be? The Hebrew reader acquainted with the first chapter of Genesis would need no explanation. The heaven, which is "at the right hand of God" is the heaven of Gen. i. 1. The heavens through which Christ "passed" and above which He ascended is called the "firmament" or "expansion" in Gen. i. 6. This "heaven" spread out during the ages "as a curtain" and "as a tent to dwell in" is to pass away. The Lord is far above this limited "heaven" and so is the sphere of blessing allotted to the church of this dispensation. (EPHESIANS36, pp.21-24)

Here then are two unique features of this high calling of Ephesians.

It is not possible, nor even desirable, that we should take notice of every difference of opinion that is current, but in the present instance silence could be misinterpreted and damage done to the cause of truth. An honoured teacher who has stood for the great principle of right division for many years has published his findings in the matter of "heavenly places" in a booklet that is headed:

> "The Earth, not Heaven, is the future home of God's redeemed".
> "This is what I believe. It is a belief that is not based upon tradition, upon emotion, or upon wishful thinking. It is not a conclusion that I have arrived at hurriedly."

This brother's contention is that the words translated in Eph. i. 3 "in heavenly places" should be rendered "among heavenly beings".

In the first place if the addition of the word "beings" be permissible so also can the addition of the word "places". If Eph. i. 3 were the only occurrence of the Greek phrase thus translated, we should have to admit that there was just as much reason to accept one translation as the other. This however is not so. We turn to the second occurrence of this phrase, namely in Eph. i. 20.

There the reference is to the Ascension which, as Eph. iv. 10 shows, placed the Lord "far above all heavens", that He might fill all things, even as Eph. i. 20-23 reveals that Christ our Head is seated at the right hand of God "far above all principality and power".

Christ is not represented here as being seated AMONG these heavenly beings but ABOVE them. The apostle even goes so far as to include "every name that is named" either now or in the future and clinches his argument by the quotation "and hath put all things under His feet". Paul has not left us in doubt as to what this quotation implies.

> "For in that He put all in subjection under Him, He left nothing that is not put under Him" (Heb. ii. 8).
> "But when He saith all things are put under Him, it is manifest that He is excepted, which did put all things under Him" (I Cor. xv. 27).

With this as our guide, we must decline to accept any conclusion, however slowly arrived at, that would read into this passage that the seated Christ is only conceived of as AMONG and not FAR ABOVE every heavenly or spiritual being, "GOD" alone being the most glorious exception.

We are more sure than ever that we have been blessed with all spiritual blessings IN heavenly places, and while thankful for the contrary opinion that has compelled us to "search and see", we cannot but be concerned about those who may not be able to examine such suggestions for themselves.

Summarizing so far, the "grapes" of our "Eshcol" include:

(1) Every blessing that is spiritual, which will be enjoyed
(2) In heavenly places, where Christ sits at the right hand of God.

BEFORE THE FOUNDATION OF THE WORLD (Eph. i. 4)

This unique company "the church which is His Body" is not only blessed with every blessing that is spiritual, not only blessed in heavenly places, but was chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world. This too is unique. We have a number of passages which speak of those who are associated with a choice and a call FROM or SINCE the foundation of the world, but one company only is ever said to have been chosen BEFORE. Let us set the Scriptures that use these terms before the eye:

FROM THE FOUNDATION.

(1) With reference to the use of parables, in speaking of the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven.

"That it might be fulfilled which was spoken of by the prophet, saying, I will open my mouth in parables; I will write things which have been kept secret from the foundation of the world" (Matt. xiii. 35).

(2) With reference to the separation of the nations at the second coming of Christ.

"Then shall the king say unto them on His right hand, Come, ye blessed of My Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world" (Matt. xxv. 34).

(3) With reference to the character of those who killed the prophets sent to them:

"That the blood of all the prophets, which was shed from the foundation of the world, may be required of this generation" (Luke xi. 50).

(4) With reference to the typical character of the Sabbath:

"As I have sworn in My wrath, if they shall enter into My rest: although the works were finished from the foundation of the world" (Heb. iv. 3)

(5) With reference to the character of the offering of Christ:

"Nor yet that He should offer Himself often . . . . . for then must He often have suffered since the foundation of the world" (Heb. ix. 25, 26).

(6) With reference to names written in the book of life:

"Everyone whose name hath not been written from the foundation of the world, in the book of life of the Lamb that hath been slain" (Rev. xiii. 8 R.V. margin).

"They whose name hath not been written in the book of life from the foundation of the world" (Rev. xvii. 8 R.V.).

BEFORE THE FOUNDATION.

(1) With reference to Christ alone:
   (a) "Thou lovedst Me, before the foundation of the world" (John xvii. 24).
   (b) "As of a lamb without blemish and without spot; who verily was foreordained before the foundation of the world" (I Pet. i. 19, 20).

(2) With reference to the Redeemed:
   "Chosen in Him before the foundation of the world" (Eph. i. 4).

Comment upon the most obvious difference between these two sets of passages is unnecessary. Let us, however, not miss one precious item of doctrine that is revealed by comparing the three references to "before the foundation" together.

In John xvii. 24 Christ was "loved" agapao; in I Pet. i. 19, 20 He was "without blemish and without spot" amomos. In Eph. i. 4 the believer is said to have been chosen before the foundation of the world "in love" agape, to be "blameless" amomos.

Here, those who were chosen in Christ, were looked upon as being so closely identified with Him, that the same terms are used. No wonder that as we proceed we read of further identification with the Beloved, that not only speaks of being "crucified together with Christ" but "raised together" as in the early ministry of Paul, but "seated together" and ultimately to be manifested together with Him in glory in the epistles of the Mystery.

These two sets of terms "before" and "since" indicate two distinct time periods. Further studies will show that "before" or "since" the age times is a somewhat similar set of terms, but before these can be allied we must arrive at some understanding of the meaning of the word "foundation".

Now, happily, we have a New Testament quotation in Heb. i. 10, where the word "foundation" is expressed by the word themelion, but when we turn to any of the passages where the words "before" or "from" the foundation of the world occur, themelion is not found, but instead the word katabole is employed.

Now it is impossible to argue that Paul, for some peculiar reason, would not and did not employ the word themelion, for it occurs as the translation of the foundation of a temple in Eph. ii. 20, "the foundation of the apostles and prophets", and again in I Cor. iii. 10 and II Tim. ii. 19. Therefore, there must be some good reason for choosing so different a word as katabole. This word has entered into our own language as a biological term, metabolism, being the name given to the process in an organism or a living cell, by which nutritive material is built up into living matter and this process is divided into (1) constructive metabolism which is called anabolism, by which protoplasm is broken down into simpler substances to perform special functions; and (2) destructive metabolism, which is called katabolism.

In its biological use, katabole indicates "destruction". It is strange, that if this word means "to place upon a foundation", it should have been adopted by scientists to indicate the very opposite, namely disruption. Very clear evidence of the essential meaning of katabole can be gathered from the usage of the verbal form kataballo. This verb kataballo is used three times in the New Testament:

> "Cast down, but not destroyed" (II Cor. iv. 9).
> "The accuser of our brethren is cast down" (Rev. xii. 10).

indicate very clearly the meaning of the word. The other reference is Heb. xi 11 where it is translated "conceive".

In Heb. vi. 1 the word is used with themelion, the true word for a foundation, but this addition alters the whole intention, and there it appears to have its primitive meaning "cast down", but whether in the sense of overthrowing, or of laying a foundation, only a most exhaustive study of the context can decide. Job xii. 14, quoted below, has a bearing.

Kataballo occurs twenty-nine times in the Septuagint version of the Old Testament Scriptures. It will strengthen the faith of many, and deepen the conviction of most, if these references which contain the word kataballo are quoted, but to avoid occupying a disproportionate amount of space, verses will not be given in full. We will also quote from the A.V. instead of giving a translation of the LXX version, except in those cases where the LXX uses an entirely different text. Those who have access to the LXX will not be hindered by this course and those who cannot refer to it will be helped.

> "Joab battered the wall, to throw it down" (II Sam. xx. 15; LXX II Kings).
> "Ye (they) shall fell (felled) every good tree" (II Kings iii. 19, 25; LXX IV Kings).
> "As one was felling a beam" (II Kings vi. 5; LXX IV Kings).
> "I will cause him to fall by the sword" (II Kings xix. 7; LXX IV Kings).
> "They slew him with a sword" (II Chron. xxxii. 21).
> "Behold He breaketh down, and it cannot be built again" (Job xii. 14).
> "He teareth me in His wrath" (Job xvi. 9).
> "He breaketh me with breach upon breach" (Job xvi. 14).
> "To cast down the poor and needy" (Psa. xxxvii. 14; LXX xxxvi.).
> "Thou casteth them down into destruction" (Psa. lxxiii. 18; LXX lxxii.).
> "To overthrow them in the wilderness" (Psa. cvi. 26, 27; LXX cv.).
> "She hath cast down many wounded" (Prov. vii. 26).
> "The words of a talebearer are as wounds" (Prov. xviii. 8).
> "Like a city that is broken down, and without walls" (Prov. xxv. 28).
> "Esebon and Eleale have cast down thy trees" (LXX translation, Isa. xvi. 9).
> "The lofty city He layeth it low" (Isa. xxvi. 5).
> "I will cause them to fall before their enemies" (Jer. xix. 7).
> "I will cast down your slain men before your idols" (Ezek. vi. 4).
> "Thy remnant shall fall by the sword" (Ezek. xxiii. 25).
> "They shall destroy the walls of Tyrus, and break down her towers" (Ezek. xxvi. 4).
> "He shall cast down with his swords" (LXX translation, Ezek. xxvi. 9).
> "He shall cast down thy walls" (LXX translation, Ezek. xxvi. 12).
> "I will leave thee thrown into the wilderness" (Ezek. xxix. 5).
> "I will cause the sword to fall out of his hand" (Ezek. xxx. 22).
> "Have him cast down upon the mountains" (LXX translation, Ezek. xxxi. 12).

"Will I cause thy multitude to fall" (Ezek. xxxii. 12).
"Thou shalt fall upon the mountain of Israel" (Ezek. xxxix. 4).
"He shall cast down many ten thousands" (Dan. xi. 12).

This is rather a formidable list, and the verification of each reference is no light task, as in one or two passages there is no obvious Hebrew equivalent, yet we believe it is impossible for any reader not to be impressed with the solidarity of its witness. Every single reference is for the translation "overthrow", not one is for the translation found in the A.V. of Eph. i. 4.

This however is not all. If each reference be read in its context, the references will be found to be those of battle, of siege, of destruction, of judgment, which tilt the beam of the balances still further. If in addition we discover what Hebrew words have been translated by kataballo in the LXX our evidence will be complete. These we will supply, for the benefit of any who may not have the facilities to discover them.

Naphal.	"To cast down, to fall" (LXX, II Sam. xx. 15 and sixteen other references).
Charas.	"To crush" (LXX Job xii. 14; Ezek. xxvi. 4, 12).
Shachath.	"To mar, corrupt or destroy" (LXX Ezek. xxvi. 5).
Natash.	"To leave, spread out" (LXX Ezek. xxix. 5; xxxi. 12).
Nathats.	"To break down" (LXX Ezek. xxvi. 9).
Parats.	"To break forth" (LXX Job xvi. 14; Psa. xxv. 29).
Taraph.	"To tear" (LXX Job xvi. 9).
Satam.	"To hate" (LXX Job xvi. 9).

Not a solitary Hebrew word that means to build, to lay a foundation, to erect, is here but a variety of words everyone meaning destruction, is spoiling, or causing to fall. This is "proof positive", no reasoning is necessary except the most elementary recognition of fact when it is presented. From every point of view, the word katabole in Eph. i. 4 should be translated "overthrow".

The Church of the One Body consequently is blessed with peculiar blessings, these blessings are to be enjoyed in a peculiar sphere, and this Church is the only company connected specifically with the "overthrow of the world". Proof that this "overthrow" is referred to in Gen. i. 2 will be found in the articles on Ephesians in Volume XXXVI of The Berean Expositor. (EPHESIANS36, pp.61-65)

ACCEPTED IN THE BELOVED (Eph. i. 6)

When we think of the wonder of redeeming love, and can turn to such passages as I Cor. i. 30 or iii. 22, 23 where Christ is made unto the believer "wisdom and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption" and where we read "ye are Christ's and Christ is God's" we may well demur at the suggestion that to be "accepted in the Beloved" is one of the unique blessings of the dispensation of the Mystery. Let us see for ourselves. The words "made accepted" translated the Greek charitoo which occurs in but one other place in the N.T. It is the salutation of the angel to Mary.

"Hail thou that art HIGHLY FAVOURED" (Luke i. 28).

So unique is this term that the Greek word is unknown to classical Greek, and surely no one will deny that Mary the mother of our Lord held a unique place in the history of womankind. To have focused upon her the prophecy of Gen. iii. 15 and Isa. vii. 14 and ix. 6, and to be associated as she was so intimately with the mystery of Godliness (I Tim. iii. 16) gives this lowly woman a place that is indeed one of high favour. It is this word that the Apostle singled out from all the words that were available, because NO OTHER CALLING is so related to Christ in His super-heavenly position as this church of the Mystery. The title of Christ "The Beloved" too is as rare as it is lovely. The title is found in Matt. iii. 17, xii. 18 and xvii. 5 in which we read the added words "well pleased". In Colossians, which belongs to the same dispensation as Ephesians, Christ is called "The Son of His love" (Col. i. 13), but Eph. i. 6 is the only occurrence of the title "Beloved" outside the Gospels. Both the "acceptance" therefore, and the One in Whom this acceptance is found, are unique.

We have now exhibited some of the blessings that belong exclusively to this dispensation of the Mystery. We do most earnestly plead with the reader to ponder them as before God, to re-read the exhortation given by Caleb and Joshua (Numb. xiv. 6-9) and the awful alternative of Numb. xiv. 10. There are, however, more unique blessings to exhibit, and the next is a title given to the church of the one body that seems too wonderful to be true. It is called:

THE FULNESS OF HIM THAT FILLETH ALL IN ALL (Eph. i. 23)

The Saviour descended into the lower parts of the earth, and ascended far above all heavens, that He might fill all things (Eph. iv. 10, 11), and the church which is His Body is the fullness of Him that filleth all in all! This church has a standard, it is nothing less than "The measure of the stature of the FULNESS of Christ" (Eph. iv. 13). Where in the whole range of the Scriptures can such a position or such a title be found? To this most high and wondrous calling the Apostle refers in Col. ii. 9, 10:

> "For in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily, and ye are FILLED TO THE FULL in Him, which is the Head of all principality and power."

The following comment, by J. Armitage Robinson, D.D., is suggestive:

> "We now come to what is perhaps the most remarkable expression in the whole epistle. It is the phrase in which St. Paul further describes the church, which he has just declared to be Christ's Body, as 'the fullness of Him Who all in all is being filled'. When the Apostle thus speaks of the church as the Pleroma or Fullness of Christ, and in the same breath speaks of the Christ as 'being fulfilled', he would appear to mean that, in some mysterious sense, the church is that without which 'the Christ' is not complete, but with which He is or will be complete . . . . ."

Just as in Philippians we read that for the purpose of salvation, the Lord "emptied Himself" (heauton ekenose Phil. ii. 7), so, still in relation to the redemptive purpose, and in no way intruding into the realm of essential Deity, that "self-emptying" of His most wonderful DESCENT into humanity, is more than compensated, by this equally wonderful counterbalancing "filling" associated with His ASCENSION as Head of this company. He shall indeed in every sphere be "satisfied" (Isa. liii. 11).

Following close upon this most wonderful revelation of the Divine purpose in this unique church, is the equally overwhelming statement, that this company is potentially

MADE TO SIT TOGETHER IN HEAVENLY PLACES IN CHRIST JESUS (Eph. ii. 6)

This church shares with those whose calling is found in the epistle to the Romans, in that both are reckoned to have been quickened together, raised together with Christ, but never in all the highest flight of teaching, or of exultant worship, has any believer of any other calling, ever been seen as "seated together" where Christ sits at the right hand of God. Sunkathizo occurs but once more in the N.T namely in Luke xxii. 55 which passage has no bearing on the subject before us, leaving Eph. ii. 6 unique in the record of blessing. Kathizo means "to sit" but there are comparatively few passages where the idea of authority is absent. This aspect of the word has come over into our language; cathedra is a chair, to speak of ex cathedra is to speak with authority, and a cathedral is so named for the "seat" or throne of the bishop which it contains. When we read in Eph. i. 20-22, it seems almost unbelievable that any believer, let alone those who were Gentiles, should be so closely joined to the Lord, as to be reckoned not only to have been raised up together, but made to sit together in those heavenly places "far above all", but such is the glory of His grace. The epistle to the Hebrews emphasizes the fact that Christ is seated at the right hand of God, but nowhere throughout that epistle is the believer ever said to be "seated together" in heaven's holiest of all. The Hebrew believers were bidden to "draw near", the Ephesian saints were "made nigh" and wondrous as the calling revealed in Hebrews is, there is nothing comparable to Eph. ii. 6 to be found in any other epistle.

CONCLUSION

Here, under the symbol of the grapes of Eshcol, we have presented a few of the unique blessings that are to be found ONLY in the Dispensation of the Mystery, and which are peculiar to the epistles of Paul which were written by him after Israel were set aside and became "Lo-Ammi" at Acts xxviii.

Should the present reader be unable to accept the idea that Acts xxviii. constitutes a "Dispensational Frontier" he is recommended to see the evidences set out in the pamphlet of that name. If after searching to see, the reader remains unconvinced, we must accept some measure of blame for the manner of our presentation, but on the other hand such readers may belong to another calling, for no amount of argument can ultimately over-ride the initial choice of the believer to this high calling that was made

“before the foundation of the world”. We are but instruments through whom that sovereign choice may at times be implemented. “How shall they hear without a preacher?”

On the other hand it has been, and still will be, our joy to see the light dawn, and to see those who by nature are aliens and without either promises, covenants or fathers, entering into the blessings of the highest calling of God made known in the Scriptures.

Such can come without further preparation; they have no need to invent for themselves such titles as “spiritual Israel”, such have no need to thrust themselves into a “covenant” made specifically with “the house of Israel and with the house of Judah” and which cannot be implemented while the contracting parties are called by God Himself “NOT MY PEOPLE”.

May many be led to emulate the faith shown by Caleb and Joshua, to shun the unbelieving attitude of the ten spies, to accept the evidence of these “Grapes of Eshcol”, believe, accept and thank the Lord for such overwhelming grace to those so far off, and then seek to walk worthy of such a high calling.

TO HIS FRIENDS

While the Apostle's message was not "yea and nay", the arrangements which he made, and the journeys he planned were not so fixed (II Cor. i. 17-19). They were always liable to alteration as circumstances indicated or the will of the Lord was made known.

In the January number of this magazine, we told our friends that we did not contemplate entering into discussion concerning the Millennium, feeling that our limited space was all too short for the making known of the glory of our high calling. However, we have (in the spirits of II Cor. i. 17) been obliged to change our plans. We have met enough undigested exposition as to demand some positive presentation of the truth. We are moved to take up the question of the Pre-Millennial kingdom, because we see only too clearly that there will be one, and it is outlined in Rev. xiii.-xix., but it is the kingdom of the Anti-christian Beast! It is a horrible thing to contemplate, that an earnest believer might unconsciously be preparing those who accept his teaching, to receive the false for the true, for we are warned that the deception will be such that the very elect would be deceived apart from Divine interposition.

We have read many books and pamphlets on the Millennium but few, if any recognize that there are only ten verses in the Scriptures that speak positively of that period. To that inspired and basic passage we hope to devote a portion of each issue of the Berean Expositor during 1957-58.

The claims of the Testimony of the Lord's Prisoner have been paramount, and the Apocalypse has in consequence not been given so much attention. However, what we now lay before the reader is incipient in the article published in the Berean Expositor for May 1916, but not expanded until the present article in September 1956.

We urge all who may read this exposition to put everything to the Berean test. Remember the example of Barnabas. He stood firm with Paul, he dissembled with Peter (Gal. ii. 13). Let all "Search and see" if what is written is "so".

FOREWORD

II Timothy ii. 14-26 has been before us in writing the following, somewhat provocative article.

(a) Striving, and striving about words to no profit, is forbidden (14, 24).
(b) The only approval we should seek is that of God (15).
(c) To misplace a truth, may eat as a gangrene (17, 18).
(d) While we have no fears concerning the "sure foundation", we have a responsibility to "depart from iniquity" (19).
(e) We have no call to attempt to "purge" other servants of God, but if we would be "meet for the Master's use" we must "purge ourselves" from any complicity with known error (21).
(f) Such exhortations as "shun", "depart", "flee", "avoid", cannot be ignored (16, 19, 22, 23). We cannot sit on the fence.
(g) All at length leads to "IF GOD PERADVENTURE". Here we stop and God alone carries forward (25, 26).
(h) The dreadful alternative being II Timothy iii. 7.

ZION, THE OVERCOMER,

AND THE MILLENNIUM

The Millennium

We have doubtless heard of the little old lady who drew such comfort from "that blessed word MESOPOTAMIA", and have passed it over with indulgent smile. Yet we all seem to have been bewitched by the word MILLENNIUM, for no such term is found in Scripture. The word has passed beyond the confines of Scriptural exegesis, to the world outside, so that a Member of Parliament may dismiss a suggestion as "thinking we can bring about the Millennium!"

"All engineering commences on the drawing board." A moment's reflection will show how sane this observation really is. If only expositors of the Scriptures would get the overall plan of Prophecy before them, and then see how far their theories fit or fail, what a deal of trouble, misunderstanding and false teaching would have been spared. The reader will perceive that this principle is before our mental vision in all the attempts in this analysis to piece the intricate subjects of Prophecy together. For example, we were at first attracted by the teaching known as "The Pre-Millennial Kingdom" but before committing ourselves we took it to the Drawing Board, in other words, looked at the overall picture of Gentile dominion in Dan. ii. We defy anyone to find a loophole for any such kingdom in verses 44, 45, and so, in spite of the claims of friendship and sincere admiration, that pleasant vision had to be set aside. We hope that every one of our readers will do the same with every suggestion made in this Analysis, for it is, alas, only too possible that we have a clearer view of the errors of others than of our own.

The Key Passage

It is time we rubbed our eyes, took off the spectacles that prophetic students have supplied, and exercised the Berean spirit, which is so highly commended in the Word of God. All that is positively stated in the Scriptures on the subject will be found in TEN VERSES of Rev. xx.; all other descriptions, promises, characteristics, are introduced into this period by inference, rightly or wrongly, but by inference only. Books on the Millennium pay little attention to the actual wording of Rev. xx. 1-10, but expatiate and enlarge upon peace and prosperity, with superlatives that find no warrant in the key passage of Rev. xx. We have moreover, by continually speaking of "The Millennial Kingdom", unwittingly limited the Reign of Christ to a thousand years; whereas a true statement would speak of that period as "the first thousand years of a kingdom, which, commencing with the coming of Christ and the end of Gentile dominion, goes on unbroken (it shall never be destroyed, and shall never pass away Dan. ii. 44; vii. 14, 27) until the Son having put all things under His feet (for He "must reign" until this is accomplished I Cor. xv. 25,26 which reaches to the Great White Throne judgment and beyond), delivers up the kingdom to God, even the Father, that God may be all in all". This is the reign of Christ, the Millennial reign being but a portion of it, and possibly a small portion at that. ALL that the Scriptures SAY in Rev. xx., about a Millennium are the words ta chilia ete "the thousand years".

The Thousand Years

These words are in themselves no more "blessed" than the word "Mesopotamia". They may be a thousand years of misery for all that this term "Millennium" teaches. Some of us have come to our conclusion as to the character of this Millennial kingdom only by ignoring what is actually written in the Apocalypse. The prophetic clock does not automatically stop at the end of the thousand years; what does come to an end is the reign of the OVERCOMERS. "The King of kings" does not abdicate. The day of the Lord is to be succeeded by the day of God, just as the Davidic kingdom characterized by the presence of the enemy and of war, was succeeded by the Solomonic kingdom of Peace. Is it too much to ask the reader, with these challenging statements before him, to lay aside for the time being at least, whatever he may have held and taught, and approach this important subject afresh? We turn therefore to the key passage:

> "And I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit and a great chain in his hand. And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the Devil, and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more, till the thousand years should be fulfilled: and after that he must be loosed a little season. And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them: and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the Word of God, and which had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection. Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with Him a thousand years. And when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle: the number of whom is as the sand of the sea. And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city: and fire came down from God out of heaven, and devoured them. And the Devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever" (Rev. xx. 1-10).

The Three R's

Three features stand out in this record :

(1) The Restraint of Satan.
(2) The Reign of the overcomer.
(3) The Rebellion at the close.

Here are three R's that are fundamental and ignored at our peril. Satan is only loosed for "a little season" yet the response to his deception is immediate: "they went up". The objection, that this is beyond the Millennium, is invalid. What takes place in 1958 is intimately connected with what was done and thought in 1957. The nations who are thus deceived are differentiated from the people of Israel. The nations are called Gog and Magog, and inhabit the four quarters or corners of the earth, whereas Israel, we must assume, occupy the beloved city and form the camp of the saints (Rev. xx. 9). The antichristian character of this rebellion in spite of the intervening thousand years, is indicated by the titles Gog and Magog. The writer of the Apocalypse assumes acquaintance with Ezekiel.

Gog and Magog, Used With Intention

> "Son of Man, set thy face against Gog, the land of Magog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal, and prophesy against him" (Ezek. xxxviii. 2).

In association with Gog and Magog, are Persia, Ethiopia, Libya, Gomer and all his bands, the house of Togarmah of the north quarters and all his bands; and many people with thee (Ezek. xxxviii. 5, 6). This invasion by these hordes will be met by the Lord Himself.

> "I will turn thee back, and put hooks into thy jaws" (Ezek. xxxviii. 4).
>
> "It shall come to pass at the same time when Gog shall come against the land of Israel, saith the Lord GOD, that My fury shall come up in My face" (Ezek. xxxviii. 18).
>
> "Thou shalt fall upon the mountains of Israel, thou, and all thy bands, and the people that is with thee: I will give thee unto the ravenous birds of every sort, and to the beasts of the field to be devoured. And I will send a fire on Magog" (Ezek. xxxix. 4-6).
>
> "I will give unto Gog a place there of graves in Israel . . . . . and seven months shall the house of Israel be burying of them" (Ezek. xxxix. 11, 12).
> "Speak unto every feathered fowl, and to every beast of the field, Assemble yourselves, and come . . . . . ye shall eat the flesh of the mighty, and drink the blood of the princes" (Ezek. xxxix. 17, 18).

The parallel of this passage with Rev. xix. 17-21 is INESCAPABLE. There again we have the call to the fowls to eat the flesh of captains and kings. Here the warring hosts are gathered by the Beast who is cast into the lake of fire.

The "Millennium" is bounded on each side by an invading army, led either by the Beast or deceived by Satan, either gathered against "Him that sat on the horse" or "against the beloved city and camp of the saints" and both end in fire, being destroyed as were the cities of Sodom and Gomorrha. If only a handful of rebels were discovered at the close of the thousand years, it would cause us to question the idea of universal peace or righteousness, but this is no "handful". The number is said to be "as the sand of the sea", nothing but the overriding desire to hold to a personal pre-conception could ever lead a child of God to belittle this description.

Sand of the Sea---Numberless

From the blessing of Abraham in Gen. xxii. 17 to Hosea i. 10 this figure is used consistently:

> "Yet the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be MEASURED nor NUMBERED" (Hos. i. 10).

This unnumbered host with antichristian intent go up "on the breadth of the earth" and even though this should be limited to the "land" of Palestine the implication is obviously the same as in Isa. viii. 8 and Hab. i. 8 where the overwhelming nature of the invasion is thereby depicted.

No rhapsody, no poetic phrase, no private interpretation, no wishful thinking can alter the fact, that the "Millennial Reign" ends, as it began with a terrible rebellion. The Millennium is not the FIRST of a new series, but the LAST of an old one, in which man has been tested under different forms of government, and in every case been found wanting. This Millennial kingdom is the LAST OF DELEGATED authority. David may have reigned on earth as vice-regent, the twelve apostles may have sat on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel, the overcomers may have reigned as priests of God and of Christ, but all in vain. Christ must put down ALL authority, whether good or bad, and reign alone and supreme if ever the goal of the ages is to be reached.

Characteristic Features

We turn our attention for the moment to a series of features that characterize the Millennium, this closing period of man's probation.

(1) The restraining of Satan.
(2) The restraining of transgression.
(3) The sealing up of sin.
(4) The rule of a rod of iron.
(5) The willing obedience of Israel.
(6) The feigned obedience of many of the nations.

The final weeks of the seventy weeks of Dan. ix. immediately precede the thousand year reign, and carry into that period the blessings indicated in verse 24. The first thing that will be accomplished when the Seventy Weeks attain their goal is said to be "to finish the transgression" (Dan. ix. 24). This translation, however, leaves much to be explained. Will transgression be "finished" in the sense that it is so completely accounted for by Atonement and Forgiveness, that it will never again raise its head? (Heb. kalah). Will transgression be "finished" in the sense of the Hebrew word shalam? The answer is no, the Hebrew word being kala, which though it resembles the Hebrew kalah must not be confounded with it. Kala is translated as follows :

Forbid 1, keep 1, keep back 1, refrain 2, retain 1, shut up 4, withhold 2, be stayed 2, be restrained 2, be stayed 1, and finish 1.

This is not mere opinion, but evidence and evidence which cannot be neglected or denied without spiritual disaster. Be it noted, that the only reference in the A.V. that contains the translation "finish" is Dan. ix. 24, which the margin corrects by saying "or restrain". The word is used of the imprisonment of Zedekiah and of Jeremiah and the noun forms kele, and beth kele are translated "prison". Dan. ix. does not teach us that when that prophecy is fulfilled transgression will be "finished", it will be RESTRAINED or IMPRISONED. This will be also the condition of Satan through the Millennial Kingdom, he will be "bound" for a thousand years, but he will by no means be "finished". In like manner, sins will be SEALED UP, as the margin indicates against the reading "to make an end of sins". The Hebrew word chatham is translated as follows :

Seal 16, seal up 6, be sealed 2, mark 1, be stopped 1, and the Chaldaic word in Dan. vi. 17 seal.

Proof of Feigned Obedience

We gather from the marginal references in the A.V. that some of the nations will yield "feigned obedience". Is this translation justified? Let us see. The passages under review are Psalms xviii. 44; lxvi. 3; and lxxxi. 15. The A.V. and the R.V. read "feigned obedience" in the margin, and the note "Hebrew lied". Is this marginal interpretation correct? We could refer to such expositors as Perowne, Hengstenberg, Young's Literal translation and Rotherham. Rotherham reads "Come CRINGING unto me". Of course this unanimity among scholars may be but the blind leading the blind, on the other hand they may express the mind of God. There is only one authoritative test. The consistent usage of the word and a frank exhibition of its occurrences. The Hebrew word kachash occurs twenty-eight times, and in no other passage than the three Psalms quoted is it translated "submit". The remaining references are translated as follows :

Fail 1, be found liars 1, belie 1, deal falsely 1, deceive 1, deny 5, dissemble 1, fail 2, lie 5, lies 4, lying 1, and leanness 1.

In no passage is it possible to substitute "obedience" or "submit" in any one of these twenty-four occurrences. If "usage" has any weight, then "feigned obedience" must stand. To deny it is to defy the testimony of Scripture. Deut. xxxiii. 29 which employs the Hebrew kachash reads:

> "And thine enemies shall be found liars unto thee".

The scholarly Lexicon of Brown, Driver and Briggs gives the meaning of kachash:

> "Be disappointing, deceive, fail, grown lean", and in reference to the Psalms in question, their note reads:

> "Cringe, come cringing, make a show of obedience".

The Hebrew Kachash is Very Rigid

We cannot sweep aside this unanimous testimony without betraying that ulterior motives are prompting our decision. Further, although the LXX is not infallible, yet surely we must allow Hebrews of that early age to understand their own tongue, at least as well as the best of us today. The LXX uses epseusanto "they lied" in Psa. xviii. 44 and Psa. lxxxi. 15 exactly as they do in Deut. xxxiii. 29. We believe the candid student will be convinced that the Hebrew kachash is very rigid in its meaning, and cannot be made to favour a period of universal peace and righteousness. To accept the rendering "to yield feigned obedience" shatters the unscriptural dream of The Millennium. That thousand year reign is not the perfect kingdom on earth.

Psa. xviii. 44, 45 places in correspondence these features:

> "The strangers shall submit themselves (margin, yield feigned obedience) unto me. The strangers shall fade away, and be afraid out of their close places (and come trembling)."

Their submission is false.

Psa. lxvi. 3, 5-7. The immediate context refers to the exodus from Egypt.

> "How terrible art Thou in Thy works!
> Through the greatness of Thy power shall thine > enemies submit themselves unto Thee.
> (whether willingly or unwillingly is not revealed here)
> He is terrible in His doing toward the children of men.
> He turned the sea into dry land . . . . .
> Let not the rebellious exalt themselves."

Pharaoh is an example of such forced submission.

We learn from Zech. xiv. 16-19 that some of the nations will rebel against the command to go up to Jerusalem to keep the feast of tabernacles, yet at the selfsame time and period Israel will be so soundly converted and blessed, that the sacred words, originally limited to the Mitre of the High Priest, namely "Holiness unto the Lord", shall be on the bells of the horses and on the very pots in the kitchen of this blessed kingdom of Priests, yet their holy presence does not prevent disobedience rearing its head among the surrounding nation.

The Rule of the Rod of Iron

Another revealing feature is the use of the rod of IRON. It is beside the point to dwell on the meaning of the Greek word rhabdos or its Hebrew equivalent, the word that clamours for consideration is the word IRON. No tender shepherd uses a rod of IRON for the shepherding of his flock, he uses that as a weapon of defence against their enemies, the robber, the lion and the wolf.

Psa. ii. 9; Rev. ii. 27; xii. 5 and xix. 15 speak of "breaking" or "ruling" with a rod of IRON, and it is this quality of IRON that demands attention, and if ignored leads to untruth and bondage (II Tim. ii. 25, 26). When the prophet would impress us with the terrible nature of the fourth beast of Dan. vii., he speaks of its "great IRON teeth" (Dan. vii. 7). In the same way, when the image that symbolizes Gentile dominion is described, it deteriorates from gold to iron, with this comment:

> "Forasmuch as iron breaketh in pieces and subdueth all things: and as iron that breaketh all these, shall it break in pieces and bruise" (Dan. ii. 40).

That is the inspired comment on iron; "it breaks in pieces", it bruises, and shall we object to or attempt to correct the language of Holy Writ, without coming under the charge of yielding feigned obedience? Iron is mentioned in the Psalms five times. Apart from Psa. ii. iron is used of fetters and likened to affliction, and the bars of a prison (Psa. cv. 18; cvii. 10, 16; cxlix. 8). Iron is introduced into the Scriptures as one of the attempts of the line of Cain to alleviate the curse that had come on the earth (Gen. iv. 22). Egypt is likened to "an iron furnace" (Deut. iv. 20), and no tool made of iron was permitted to fashion the stones used in building an altar (Deut. xxvii. 5), and a heaven above and an earth beneath likened to iron, was a disciplinary judgment (Lev. xxvi. 19; Deut. xxviii. 23). Several times we read of the "chariots of iron" employed by the Canaanites (Josh. xvii. 16, 18; Judges i. 19; iv. 3, 13). The question of Jeremiah "shall iron break the northern iron and the steel?" (Jer. xv. 12) is answered in the Millennium. The rod of iron will do this. The devouring great iron teeth of the Beast, the down treading feet of iron and clay of the image will be met and more than met by the rule of the rod of IRON. The Hebrew word raa to break, is used in Psa. ii. 9; Jer. xv. 12, and its equivalent Chaldaic word in Dan. ii. 40. These are facts which no amount of special pleading can set aside. Again let us note the testimony of Psa. cx.:

> "The LORD said unto my Lord, Sit Thou at My right hand, until I make Thine enemies Thy footstool. The LORD shall send the ROD OF THY STRENGTH out of Zion: rule Thou in the midst of Thine enemies" (Psa. cx. 1, 2).

Blessing Radiates from Jerusalem

If the words "The LORD said unto My Lord" undoubtedly refer to Christ (Matt. xxii. 44), then the objection that the proximity of "the Lord" and "His Anointed" rules out Christ from Psa. ii. is shown to be invalid. Here the Lord is seen ruling not in a world of universal peace, but "out of Zion" and "in the midst" of enemies. At the same time, and at the very same period in which many of the nations will yield feigned obedience, we read:

> "Thy people shall be willing in the day of Thy power" (Psa. cx. 3 A.V.).
> "Thy people offer themselves willingly (margin, are freewill offerings)" (Psa. cx. 3 R.V.).

Here we have inspired comparison. The nations yielding feigned obedience; Israel, at last, offering willing obedience. This leads on to another feature associated with the fact namely that the blessing of this Millennial kingdom and afterwards is first of all focused in Jerusalem as a radiating centre, and from that centre light and truth will be spread until the knowledge of the Lord fills the earth, as the waters cover the sea.

> "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all My holy mountain", that is the first statement.

> "For the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea" (Isa. xi. 9), that is the sequel. The answer to the rebellion of the kings of the earth is found in Psa. ii. 6,

"Yet have I set My King upon My holy hill of Zion".

Beyond this holy hill the heathen in the uttermost parts are to be disciplined with a rod of iron, and the rebellious kings and judges of the earth are given counsel and warning.

> "Lest He be angry, and ye perish from the way, when His wrath is kindled but a little" (Psa. ii. 12).

This divinely appointed centre is the theme of Isa. ii.:

> "And it shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the LORD'S house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow unto it. And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the LORD, to the house of the God of Jacob; and He will teach us of His ways, and we will walk in His paths: for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the LORD from Jerusalem" (Isa. ii. 2, 3).

First the rod of His strength shall be sent "out of Zion" where the Lord will rule in the midst of His enemies (Psa. cx. 2). He will, as Psa. ii. 12 threatened, "strike through kings in the day of His wrath" (Psa. cx. 5). After the Lord returns unto Zion, and Jerusalem becomes "a city of truth" (Zech. viii. 3) "many people and strong nations shall come to seek the Lord of hosts in Jerusalem, and to pray before the Lord . . . . . In those days it shall come to pass, that ten men shall take hold out of all languages of the nations, even shall take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew, saying, We will go with you: for we have heard that God is with you" (Zech. viii. 22, 23). When the glory returns to Jerusalem and the temple is built according to the specifications given in the closing chapters of Ezekiel, then the title of the Lord will be indeed Jehovah Shammah "The Lord is there" (Ezek. xlviii. 35).

The Millennial kingdom ends as we have seen with a rebellious rising of the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, the number of which is so great as to justify the figure "the number of whom is as the sand of the sea" (Rev. xx. 8). Rebellion therefore was incipient during the 1,000 years. No such rebellion will mar the day when I Cor. xv. 28 is fulfilled, but that lies beyond the limits of the Millennial kingdom and is not spoken of in the Book of the Revelation. We may discover that much that we have imagined belonged to the Millennium will prove to belong to the period that follows. The day of the Lord is followed by the day of God, the Sabbath, followed by "the first or eighth day".

If we keep strictly to the record of Rev. xx. we shall see that the so-called Millennial kingdom is the period when the suffering overcomer who has refused to recognize the Beast or his authority, will "live and reign with Christ, a thousand years", but nothing is said of the bulk of the nation of Israel, except to reveal that there was also on the earth at the same time "the camp of the saints" and "the beloved city". To a large extent this phase of the kingdom is God's answer to the only pre-millennial kingdom known in the Apocalypse, namely the Pre-Millennial kingdom of the Beast! When Jerusalem is created a rejoicing and her people a joy, it is then that the wolf and the lamb shall feed together, and the lion shall eat straw like the bullock, and (yet, at the selfsame time) dust shall be the serpent's meat. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all My holy mountain, saith the Lord (Isa. lxv. 18, 19, 25).

The reference to the serpent here suggests that the perfect kingdom has not yet arrived, and in line with this, in the midst of this section which speaks of "Millennial" blessedness when "as the days of a tree" shall be the days of His elect (Isa. lxv. 22), we learn that a "child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed" (Isa. lxv. 20). While the age of Methuselah is proverbial, and the age of many of the patriarchs of Genesis chapters i. to xi. approached to the 1,000-year limit, not one ever reached it. "The days of a tree" may mean a thousand years, and for any one in that day to die at a hundred years of age would be like a child dying. The fact, however, that it can be contemplated that a "sinner" should "die" at a hundred years of age or be "accursed" (however difficult may be the true exposition of Isa. lxv. 20), makes one thing certain, it comes before the descent of the New Jerusalem to the earth, for then there will be "no more" sin, death or curse. This together with the reference to the SERPENT in verse 25, makes it evident that during the "Millennial" kingdom there will be some who will be punished for their sin, even as there will be a multitude as numerous as the sand of the sea, that shall be devoured by fire that comes down from God out of heaven at the close (Rev. xx. 8, 9). Gog and Magog must have been ready; it only took "a little season" to gather them. We must look to the "eighth day" beyond the Millennial Sabbath for the perfect kingdom. The subject before us is of sufficient consequence to call for a summing up before examining some most extraordinary items that await us in Rev. xx.

A Summary of Millennial Features

(1) Positive teaching concerning the Millennium is limited to ten verses in Rev. xx. All else is a matter of inference, legitimate possibly, but to be treated with necessary reserve.

(2) The term "the Millennium" is not a Scriptural title for the period covered by Rev. xx. 1-10, for the word is simply Latin for 1,000 years and that is the number of years covered by this prophecy, and expressed six times over, in verses 2, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7. The term however must not be invested with meanings and characteristics that belie or ignore what is written in Rev. xx.

(3) It is correct to speak of this period as a "kingdom", for the overcomers not only "live" but "reign" with Christ a thousand years (Rev. xx. 4, 6). The Greek word for kingdom is basileia, the Greek word for reign is basileuo. (See article KINGDOM in An Alphabetical Analysis, part 2, p. 227).

(4) Strictly speaking the overcomer (Rev. ii. 7, 11, 17, 26; iii. 5, 12, 21; xii. 11; xv. 2 and xxi. 7) is the thread that links all the prodigious events of this Prophecy together, and unites both passages under Rev. iii. 21 thus:

	"To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me in My throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with My Father in His throne" (Rev. iii. 21).

"And I saw as it were a sea of glass mingled with fire: and them that had gotten the victory over the BEAST, and over his IMAGE, and over his MARK, and over the NUMBER of his NAME, stand on the sea of glass, having the harps of God" (Rev. xv. 2).		"And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them: and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not worshipped the BEAST, neither his IMAGE, neither had received his MARK upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years" (Rev. xx. 4).

The words of Rev. xx. 4 "for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God", form a link with the opening statement of Rev. i. 9, 10 when John was taken in spirit to the day of the Lord from the isle called Patmos where he shared the tribulation of these overcomers, before their time "for the word of God, and for the witness of Jesus".

The Pre-eminent Feature

"The Millennial kingdom" seems to have been used by writers on prophecy as a convenient period in which to place passages that are somewhat difficult to fit into the overall scheme, and this has blunted the edge of the testimony of Rev. xx., which places as a pre-eminent feature, the reward for the Overcomer, and hardly refers to any other company, people or calling. Regarding the statement "This is the first resurrection", it cannot mean the first that ever was, but the former of two. The reference to the beloved city brings with it the numerous passages of Old Testament prophecy which speak in glowing terms of the restoration of Israel and Jerusalem. Isa. liv. 6-17 reveals a city of jeweled splendour, echoing the glories on earth of this heavenly Jerusalem itself. Even so, the chapter ends with a reference to those who will gather together against Jerusalem, with the comforting words:

> "No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper", even as we have read in Rev. xx. 8, 9. If the inhabitants of the land during the Millennium are those of Israel who looked upon the Lord Whom they had pierced and repented, if the nations are those who were "alive and remained" at the Second Coming, we have no "problem" about Isaiah lxv. 18-25, for there we read of the possibility of dying and being accursed, and of the length of life being "as the days of a tree", which, however extended, cannot be a synonym for life eternal and certainly not of immortality.

The Overcomer

Let us observe how these "overcomers" of Rev. xx. 4 are intertwined with the prophetic revelation of the last days. The rewards held out to the overcomers in the seven churches are :

(1) To eat of the tree of life which is in the midst of the paradise of God (Rev. ii. 7).

(2) Not to fear, he shall not be hurt of the second death (Rev. ii. 10, 11).
(3) He will eat of the hidden manna, have a white stone and a new name (Rev. ii. 17, see Rev. xix. 12).
(4) He shall rule the nations with a rod of iron (Rev. ii. 27).
(5) He shall be clothed in white, and his name shall not be blotted out of the book of life (Rev. iii. 5).
(6) He will be made a pillar in the temple, and have the name of the new Jerusalem written upon him (Rev. iii. 12).
(7) He will be granted to sit with Christ on His throne, even as Christ also overcame, and is set down with His Father in His throne (Rev. iii. 21).

All is linked with the book of the Revelation itself, even as we see that in Rev. xx. 4, none live and reign except those who were martyred under the Beast of Rev. xiii. 18.

"The Millennial kingdom" is a very exclusive kingdom. We are not told in so many words that Israel is a restored people, we can only infer that from the reference to the beloved city and the camp of the saints. If Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and David, have been raised from the dead at this time, they do not enter into the picture drawn in Rev. xx. They have no place in "the first resurrection". The inspired qualification limits this resurrection to martyrs of the last three-and-a-half years of Antichristian Dominion. Two resurrections, and two only are envisaged here and they form a pair :

(1) The overcomers, every one a martyr. This is "the first" resurrection.
(2) The rest of the dead. No other resurrection takes place until that of the great white throne at the end of the thousand years. And these two resurrections complement one another and make a pair—"overcomers" v. "the rest" not "saints" v. "the wicked dead", as is usually taught.

It will be seen we trust, that so far as the record of Rev. xx. is concerned, the Millennial kingdom is preeminently the sphere of reward for those who have suffered unto death during the persecution instituted by the Antichristian Beast of the time of the end. We only learn from that passage that there are "nations" on the earth at the same time, by the reference to the rebellion at the end. We learn at the same time that the beloved city and the camp of the saints have a place there too, but these are not the theme of the Apocalypse.

Only one resurrection is recorded as taking place in this kingdom, and the names of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and David are not even mentioned.

We realize that inasmuch as the Millennium is the immediate outcome of the Second Coming of Christ to the earth, all other prophetic features associated with that phase of the coming must find a place here. We learn from other passages that there will be a resurrection of Israel (Dan. xii. 1-3 and Ezek. xxxvii. 1-14). These too must find a place. It is possible that some prophetic passages refer to the period that follows the Millennium, when the Heavenly Jerusalem shall descend to the earth and be the glorious administrative centre of the earth for we read that:

> "The nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it: and the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honour into it . . . . . they which are written in the Lamb's book of life" (Rev. xxi. 24-27).

The period immediately following the Millennium is marked by five outstanding features :

(1) The rise of Gog and Magog like the sand of the sea, and their destruction.
(2) The casting of the Devil into the lake of fire.
(3) The Great White Throne.
(4) The New Heavens and the New Earth.
(5) The descent of the New Jerusalem.

The Former of Two

The resurrection of the overcomers, is said to be the "first". "When two ordinal numbers are used in such a connection as this, they are used relatively . . . . . hence in English we always say, in such cases, former and latter" (Dr. E.W. Bullinger). The resurrection of the overcomers is the former of two, the resurrection at the Great White Throne being the second or concluding member of the pair. But whoever has heard this Scriptural association even hinted at? We have been too ready to look at the Great White Throne as the judgment of the wicked dead or of the untold millions who never heard of Christ, and by so doing we have separated what God has joined together. However, merely saying this, proves nothing; "to the law" and the "testimony". Here is the sequel to the statement of Rev. xx. 4:

> "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection (i.e. the former of two): on such the SECOND DEATH (i.e. connected with the second resurrection of the two) hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with Him a thousand years" (Rev. xx. 6).

Whoever heard of any one comparing and contrasting the being "Priests" of God, with the character and fate of those who stand before the Great White Throne? What congruity is there in saying:

> "Either they will be overcomers, and reigning Priests" or they will be "the countless millions of wicked dead, multitudes of whom never heard the name of Christ"?

Yet John, writing Rev. xx. 6 does not appear to have any qualms. If the Great White Throne judgment deals with the mass of mankind, what need was there to assure these overcomers that the second death had no power over them? The second death as generally interpreted can have no power over any saved sinner, let alone over an OVERCOMER. What this passage actually does is to put in opposition :

The second death, and reigning with Christ.

The apostle writing to Timothy said :

"It is a faithful saying, for :
A | "If we died with Him, we shall also LIVE with Him.
B | If we suffer, we shall also REIGN with Him.
B | If we deny Him, He also will deny us.
A | If we believe not, yet He abideth faithful
He cannot deny Himself."

A similar discrimination is found in I Cor. iii. 12-15. A believer can "suffer loss" but he cannot be LOST.

The Seven Churches

Let us turn to the exhortation given to the churches of Rev. ii. and iii. Look at the church of Smyrna. Not one word of rebuke or censure is given, but an exhortation to remain faithful until death with the promise "I will give thee a crown of life" (Rev. ii. 10). And in addition to the overcomer, the Saviour adds:

> "He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death" (Rev. ii. 11).

Can anyone who holds the generally accepted view of the Great White Throne, explain how it is possible to bring together the assurance of the CROWN of life, and exemption from the SECOND DEATH? They have no common ground. The writer of these lines is a believer in Christ. He is saved and knows it, and even though his Christian life and witness be of the poorest quality, he can say as before the Lord, that he needs no assurance that he will not be hurt of the second death. The question does not arise. This being so, we are forced to believe that the second death here has been misunderstood.

The Book of Life

Let us look at the church of Sardis (Rev. iii. 1-6). Here there was ground for reproof, their works were not found "perfect before God". However, to those who were undefiled, promises were made, and we read:

> "He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment; and I WILL NOT BLOT OUT HIS NAME out of the Book of Life, but I will confess his name before My Father, and before His angels" (Rev. iii. 5).

Again, if the accepted view of the Great White Throne is true, then this promise is gratuitous, the second death could never happen any way, while Rom. viii. 38, 39 remains. However difficult it may be to harmonise with the rest of Scripture one fact emerges from these considerations, namely that the Millennial kingdom and the Great White Throne are two parts of one whole. The Book of Life figures in the Revelation five times, thus:

A | iii. 5. Promise to the overcomer "I will not blot his name out of the book of life".
B | xiii. 8. These shall worship the beast.
xvii. 8. These shall wonder at the beast.
xx. 12. The book of life opened.
xx. 15. Those not in the book of life.
A | xxii. 19. Threat to take the name out of the book of life.

To this list we might add Rev. xxii. 18 where the plagues recorded in this book will be added to any who add to the things written, thus rounding off the intimate connection that exists with the earlier and closing sections of this prophecy.

A List of Evils Related to Apostacy

Another challenging passage is Rev. xxi. 7, 8. Over against the overcomer, who is to inherit all things, is placed a list of evils, that at first glance belongs only to the wicked, the ungodly and the unsaved. Yet remembering what we have already seen, and observing once more that it is in contrast with the OVERCOMER, not with the average believer, that this list is presented, perhaps the reader will hesitate to pronounce judgment until the Scriptures are permitted to speak for themselves. Here is the list:

> "The fearful, and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone: which is the second death" (Rev. xxi. 8).

Can such a list have any relation with a professed believer? Before this study we might have pronounced an unhesitating "no" but perhaps we are not quite so sure now. Let us "search and see".

> "The fearful" Greek deilos. This word occurs only three times in the New Testament.
> "Why are ye so fearful, O ye of little faith?" (Matt. viii. 26; see also Mark iv. 40).

These words are addressed to the DISCIPLES. Deilia occurs but once, and it is used by Paul in his letter to Timothy in view of the perilous position Timothy was about to step into:

> "God hath not given us the spirit of FEAR . . . . . be not ashamed" (II Tim. i. 7, 8).

Deiliao occurs but once, namely in John xiv. 27:

> "Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid".

The LXX uses deilos of Rehoboam who was young and "tender hearted" and so understood not "the children of Belial" (II Chron. xiii. 7). In like manner, and connected with the overcoming character, Deut. xx. 8 uses deiliao for the soldier who is "fearful and faint-hearted". Here therefore is proof, that the "fearful" can and does include many of those who are nevertheless saved, disciples or servants of the Lord.

"The Unbelieving" apistos. That it is possible for a believer to have "an evil heart of unbelief in departing from the living God", Heb. iii. 12 makes clear, and the context likens this attitude to the character of those who, though redeemed from Egypt, nevertheless "fell in the wilderness" (Heb. iii. 17) and in contrast with the two "overcomers" Caleb and Joshua (Heb. iii. 16). II Tim. ii. 13 has already been quoted as showing that though the words "if we believe not" can alas apply at times to those who nevertheless "shall live", they cannot be said of those who both "live and reign".

"The Abominable", bdelussomai. This word is used with reference to "the Abomination of Desolation" spoken of by Daniel the prophet (Matt. xxiv. 15; Mark xiii. 14; Rev. xvii. 4, 5; xxi. 27). The fearful, the unbelieving, the abominable, are all related to the state of mind that the terrible persecution of the Beast at the time of the end will induce.

"The Murderer", phoneus. The reader may with some reluctance have followed so far, but at the word "murder" will probably draw back. Yet Peter did not feel it necessary to explain and excuse the introduction of so dreadful a term, when he wrote:

> "Let none of you suffer as a murderer, or as a thief, or as an evildoer, or as a busybody in other men's matters. Yet if any man suffer as a Christian . . . . . ." (I Pet. iv. 15, 16).

To us, it seems odd to link "murder" with "being a busybody" or of using such an exhortation to "Christians", but Peter did not feel that way evidently. Paul likewise, when writing to the Galatians puts together "emulations, envyings, drunkenness and revellings" with "murder" (Gal. v. 19-21), and adds to all such, not to murder only, "such . . . . . shall not inherit the kingdom of God". That self-righteous Pharisee, who became the beloved apostle of the Gentiles, could say of his early life "touching the righteousness which is in the law" that he was "BLAMELESS" yet he had set out on a mission breathing out threatenings and MURDER (phonos) against the disciples of the Lord (Acts ix. 1).

When the Man of Sin is in the ascendant, when no one will be permitted to either buy or sell that has not the mark of the Beast, then many shall "betray one another" and deliver up the true believer to be "killed" (Matt. xxiv. 9, 10). To those thus betrayed will come the promise:

> "Fear none of those things which thou shalt suffer . . . . . be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life . . . . . He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death" (Rev. ii. 10, 11).

"The Whoremongers" pornos. This word and its variants refer to any allegiance, in the day of the Lord, to that evil system associated with "The mother of Harlots" (Rev. xvii. 1).

"The Sorcerers" pharmakeus. These sorcerers are mentioned in Rev. ix. 21 and xviii. 23 and reveal the Satanic powers that will be at work in the day of the Lord. In the list already quoted from Gal. v., Paul includes "witchcraft" (pharmakia). These awful powers are seen at work in Rev. xvi. 13, 14:

> "And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet. For they are the spirits of devils, working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty."

"Idolaters and all liars" conclude this dreadful list. The apostle did not hesitate to say when writing to the church at Corinth "If any man that is called a BROTHER be . . . . . an idolater" (I Cor. v. 11), neither did he feel it unnecessary to say "neither be ye idolaters as were some of them" (who did not overcome like Caleb and Joshua) (I Cor. x. 7). See I Cor. ix. 24 where this passage is introduced, not with salvation, but with prize and crown, and with the possibility of being a "castaway" or "disapproved".

The worship of the image of the Beast (Rev. xiii. 15) when resisted led to the martyrdom and the crown of those who reign during the thousand years (Rev. xx. 4). Finally "all liars" is extended in Rev. xxi. 27 as "whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie" and in Rev. xxii. 15 is further expanded to "whosoever loveth and maketh a lie". "The lie" is of the Devil, it is "his own" (John viii. 44). "The lie" is associated with the Man of Sin and the working of Satan, together with those who received not the love of the TRUTH and have pleasure in unrighteousness (II Thess. ii. 9-12). In the church, those who posed as apostles were found "liars" (Rev. ii. 2), and the liar is definitely associated with Antichristian denial (I John ii. 22). This list of dreadful sins is all related to the time of stress which comes upon the world under the domination of the Beast and the False Prophet To lean towards that blasphemous teaching, to submit rather than suffer, becomes an act of treachery on a field of battle, and the treatment of all such offenders must be drastic in the extreme.

There remains to be considered one more feature, and one that may cause considerable feeling; that is the bringing into the realm of the church (Rev. ii. 3) the possibility of ending up in the Lake of Fire. Traditional theology in the past has entertained few qualms as it contemplated the countless millions of unevangelized heathen being consigned to that dreadful place, but it may be the nearer approach will stimulate a keener interest. The Lake of Fire is implicit in the two references to the churches, the second death, and the Book of Life already considered (Rev. ii. 11; iii. 5). In the first place, this dreadful doom was not prepared for the sons of men, it was "prepared for the Devil and his angels" (Matt. xxv. 41) and in the Revelation, the first to enter are The Beast, the False Prophet, and the Devil (Rev. xix. 20; xx. 10).

In times of peace, the punishment for some act directed against a Government might be several years" imprisonment, but the selfsame act in time of war might be punishable by death. Into the churches of Rev. ii. and iii. we can perceive the infiltration of the fifth columnists, false apostles, liars, Nicolaitanes, the blasphemy of those pretending to be Jews, but who are of the synagogue of Satan; Satan"s throne, the doctrine of Balaam, the woman Jezebel, the threat to "kill her children with death", the depths of Satan, a name to live yet dead. These constitute the associations of some of those who, having sold themselves to Satan, received the mark of the Beast, and so will be counted worthy of suffering the same fate as that infernal trinity, the Beast, the False Prophet, and the Devil. The Psalms, many of which are prophetic, are full of complaints and prayers concerning the enemy, the deceitful man, the persecutor, the betrayer.

Where Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, David, the believing remnant of Israel, and of "all Israel" that will ultimately be saved come in this period and sphere, must be gathered from other Scriptures. Abraham, we know from Heb. xi., will find his place in the heavenly Jerusalem but this does not descend to the earth until the thousand years are finished. The one positive teaching of Rev. xx. 1-6 is that the martyrs of the final three and a half years of Gentile dominion, shall "reign" and be "priests" of God and of Christ.

Three Days

Before we consider the teaching of Rev. xx., concerning the Great White Throne, let us gather what we may from the testimony of 2 Peter chapter iii. He speaks of:

(1) The day of the Lord (II Pet. iii. 10).
(2) The day of God (II Pet. iii. 12).
(3) The new heavens and earth (II Pet. iii. 13).
(4) The day of the age (lit.) (II Pet. iii. 18).

The wording of the A.V. obscures the relation of the day of the Lord with the day of God, the R.V. is nearer to the original.

> "But the day of the Lord will come as a thief; IN THE WHICH the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall be dissolved with fervent heat, and the earth and the works that are therein shall be burned up."
>
> "Looking for and earnestly desiring the coming of the day of God BY REASON OF WHICH the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat?" (II Pet. iii. 10-12 R.V.).

"In the which", "by reason of which" clearly distinguishes the one from the other. The day of God succeeds the day of the Lord and is beyond the dissolution of heaven and earth. For that day, said Peter, we look, and that day of God is explained further to be :

(1) The new heavens and new earth.
(2) The Day (pre-eminently) of the age hemera aionos (II. Pet. iii. 18). The Millennium is not the goal, the goal is the Day of the Age, the Day of God, symbolized in the typical Scriptures as "the eighth day" the first day of a new week.

When we consider the opening of the seals, we find that the sixth seal (Rev. vi. 12-17) takes us to the frontier of the Millennium. The sun becomes black, the moon like blood, the heavens depart as a scroll, the day of His wrath is come. There can be no more than one occasion when the heavens depart as a scroll.

Psalm ii. speaks of the gathering of the kings and rulers of the earth and is quoted in Acts iv. 26, 27 of Christ. The kindling of the wrath of the Son is parallel with the passage quoted from Rev. vi.

The Great White Throne

Let us now turn our attention to the Great White Throne. We observe that this judgment is twofold. First there is a judgment of works, and this is followed by the judgment that issues in life or the second death. The judgment that will be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrha can scarcely be made to fit in here, neither can the judgment of the unevangelized Gentile world be easily aligned here as it is described in Rom. ii. 6-16. The latter at least is a judgment according to "deeds" (Rom. ii. 6), and of course may be all one and the same as this judgment of Rev. xx., but for the moment the decision is not vital to our quest. The Gospel preacher often refers to the Great White Throne in language that exceeds anything written in Rev. xx. Instead of this chapter telling us that "whoever stands before the Great White Throne is necessarily damned", the reverse is the truth. John ceases to speak of multitudes, he descends to the singular kai ei tis . . . . . eblethe "If ANYONE . . . . . He was cast".

The Great White Throne resurrection and judgment is the complement of the Overcomer's resurrection and judgment and being so, may have no reference to the millions of unevangelized dead.

Here for the moment we stay. Much re-adjustment will be necessary and this requires time, care and prayerful study. We believe sufficient has been brought forward in this analysis to justify a re-examination of many existing theories, and if it only calls a halt, and sends us all back to the neglected yet central portion of Scripture in this connection, namely Rev. xx. 1-10, enough will have been achieved to justify publication. By speaking of the "Millennial" kingdom we have blinded our eyes. We ought to speak of the first thousand years of a kingdom that shall have no end until the Son of God delivers up a perfected kingdom to God the Father, that God may be all in all.

Delegated Authority

The "Millennium" is the last of the rule of God upon earth that employs DELEGATED authority. David in resurrection, will be the Saviour's Viceroy. The twelve apostles will sit upon the twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel, the martyrs of the Antichristian persecutions will reign with Christ, and even then, the 1,000 years ends in rebellion. The reign that follows is the age of the Son of Man alone, and this ushers in the day of glory. We are conscious that much that we have written in this article is rather disconcerting, but we ask only one thing of our readers. Have we built squarely upon the revealed Word of God? Have we introduced any private interpretations of our own? We earnestly desire to be corrected if we have unconsciously done the latter, but we make no apology for any of our teaching that is in harmony with the Scriptures.

The interested reader will find in The Berean Expositor, Volume VI, page 66, that what we have here expanded was there foreshadowed, but the claims of the Dispensation of the Mystery made demands that put the question of the Millennium on the shelf. Recent suggestions have prompted us to the present analysis.

Two challenging items must conclude this survey.

Whose Works Will be Judged?

(1) At the Great White Throne there will be a judgment of WORKS. If those judged are the wicked dead, why differentiate between sins and works? Commentators seem to be unanimous that this judgment refers to the teeming millions of unevangelized heathen. But, seeing that Rev. ii. 11 and iii. 5 and xx. 6 tie the whole of the Apocalypse together and must not exclude xx. 12-15, and seeing that "works" are definitely a subject of "judgment" in Rev. ii. 2, 5, 9, 13, 19, 26; iii. 1, 2, 8, 15 and the rewards of these same chapters all point forward to the same closing scenes of the Apocalypse, does it not cry out for recognition that "the works" of Rev. xx. 12, 13 are NOT the works of the unevangelized millions but of those who could not be included in the FORMER resurrection of the overcomers, both characters being found in the seven churches?

(2) Again, the Book of Life is defined in Rev. xxi. 27 as "The Lamb's book of life", even as it is in Rev. xiii. 8 in direct reference to the worship of the Beast. Heb. xii. 23 will help us here. Heb. xii. 5-7 deals with sons, the theme of Heb. xii. 18-29 is the especial blessing of the "firstborn" in connection with "Mount Sion . . . . . the heavenly Jerusalem". The names of those firstborn are "WRITTEN IN HEAVEN" and the threat or the exemption concerning the "blotting out of the name from the book of life" has reference to those who during the three years and a half of the great tribulation, become either "overcomers" or wait for the resurrection at the Great White Throne.

We particularly ask every reader—Do you, or will you START all your investigations of this great subject of prophecy with the key passage—Rev. xx. 1-10? Dr. Bullinger used to say "Some use the Scriptures as a BUTTRESS, to support their convictions. Others go to the Scriptures as a BUCKET let down into the well of truth, and come up full of the water of life". Which kind are you? We had thought to head this article "Beyond the Millennial Reign" but we have done little else than clear away some of the accumulated rubbish that has prevented genuine building (Neh. iii. 1-32; iv. 10). We doubt not but that we shall have to build not only with trowel, but as Nehemiah did with a sword near at hand (Neh. iv. 18) but it will be a well worth fight (II Tim. iv. 7). The ages that follow the thousand years must be the theme of future studies.

The following study may help us to recognize the place that the overcomer plays in prophecy.

Readers overseas may be pardoned for thinking of London as one great city, but in reality there are two Londons. The one a square mile, with place names still indicating the gates of the city, such as Bishop's Gate, Aldgate, Cripplegate, etc. and odd remnants of the old city wall. This is "The city of London" with its ancient history, its city police, its city giants, and its valued citizenship. Greater London is governed by the London County Council and differs in many essential respects from the city.

So, it is easy for the reader to think of Jerusalem as of one undivided city, but closer examination of the Scriptures will lead to a discrimination between the city Jerusalem and the stronghold of Zion. As certain aspects of truth are especially related to Zion, this distinction must be kept in mind. The first reference to Jerusalem, is in Josh. x. 1 where we find it ruled by the Amorite king Adoni-zedek "the Lord of righteousness", Satan's substitute for Melchizedek "King of Righteousness" (Gen. xiv. 18). Although Jerusalem was taken by Joshua we read:

> "As for the Jebusites the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the children of Judah could not drive them out: but the Jebusites dwell with the children of Judah at Jerusalem unto this day" (Josh. xv. 63).

Zion and the Overcomer

Coming to the days of David we find the first reference to Zion. David reigned first over Judah in Hebron, and then over all Israel in Jerusalem (II Sam. v. 5), but we learn that there was a "stronghold" held by the Jebusites that defied him. So confident were they in the impregnability of Zion that they manned the walls with the halt and the blind in derision. A secret entrance called "the gutter" became known to David, and he announced that whoever could get up this gutter and capture the stronghold of Zion should be made Chief Captain. This Joab accomplished, climbing up a shaft that connected what is now called "the Virgin's Fount" with the interior of Zion (II Sam. v. 6-9). In I Chron. xi. 4-6 this exploit is recorded, and there we have not only the added note "So Joab the son of Zeruiah went first up, and was chief" but the remainder of the chapter is significantly devoted to enumerating the names and the exploits of "the first three", "the thirty" and a list of "valiant men" all marked out for conspicuous bravery. The first reference to Zion, links it with the "overcomer".

Sion is Equivalent to the Heavenly Jerusalem

When we turn to the New Testament we find this association preserved. "Ye are come to Mount Sion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem . . . . . the church of the firstborn which are written in heaven" (Heb. xii. 22, 23). Sion is mentioned also in the book of the Revelation where we see the 144,000 overcomers stand on Mount Sion with the Lamb (Rev. xiv. 1, 4). Hebrews xii. and Gal. iv. place Mount Sinai in contrast with Mount Sion, and in Gal. iv. the apostle speaks of "Jerusalem which is above" (Gal. iv. 25, 26). Paul would be familiar with the fact noted by Josephus that Sion was referred to as "The upper city" using the same word ano as is found in Gal. iv.; he ano agora, he ano Ierousalem. Putting these references together, we perceive that Sion differs from Jerusalem in that it is associated with overcoming, it is the Upper City, it is the alternative title to the heavenly Jerusalem. In the Old Testament this heavenly city is unrevealed, and Zion refers there to the centre of the Lord's administration not in days of perfect peace, but in the midst of enemies:

> "The LORD shall send the rod of Thy strength out of Zion: rule Thou IN THE MIDST OF THINE ENEMIES."
> "The Lord at Thy right hand shall STRIKE THROUGH KINGS in the day of His WRATH" (Psa. cx. 2, 5).

This passage is comparable with Psa. ii. There we have the kings of the earth setting themselves against the Lord, and against His anointed, but He that sitteth in the heavens shall have them in derision, and when He speaks to them, it is in His WRATH, saying:

> "Yet have I set My King upon My holy hill of Zion."

This King whose dominion includes "the uttermost parts of the earth" shall "break them with a rod of iron" and these kings are enjoined to "Kiss the Son, lest He be angry, and ye perish from the way, When His WRATH is kindled but a little" (Psa. ii. 6, 8, 9, 12).

The Millennium follows immediately upon the Coming of Christ (Rev. xix. 21; xx. 1, 2). There is no interval for a Pre-Millennial kingdom in the records of the Apocalypse except it be the kingdom of the Beast. When Christ comes, He comes to Zion:

> "The Redeemer shall come to Zion . . . . . Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the LORD is risen upon thee" (Isa. lix. 20 to lx. 1).

At the selfsame time, namely at the coming of the Lord to Zion "darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people . . . . . and Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising . . . . . the nation and the kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish, yea those nations shall be utterly wasted" (Isa. lix. 20; lx. 1, 2, 3, 12). Again we read in the prophecy of Joel:

> "Blow ye the trumpet in Zion, and sound an alarm in My holy mountain: let all the inhabitants of the land tremble: for the day of the LORD cometh, for it is nigh at hand . . . . . The LORD also shall roar out of Zion . . . . . and the heavens and the earth shall shake: but the LORD will be the hope of His people, and the strength of the children of Israel . . . . . for the LORD dwelleth in Zion" (Joel ii. 1; iii. 16, 21).

The Millennium opens (1) with the Lord reigning in Zion, or (2) it does not. If it does, then the Millennium cannot be a kingdom of universal peace, to say so denies the testimony of Scripture. When the Lord reigns in Zion it is in the midst of enemies. Wrath is to be feared. Rule will be severe—a rod of IRON. Nations are in danger of perishing and so are kings, and the nation and the kingdom that refuse to serve Israel shall perish "Yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted" (Isa. lx. 12). This will be the day when Israel shall be named "The Priests of the Lord" and "Ministers of our God", the day when those that mourn "in Zion" shall have beauty for ashes (Isa. lxi. 3, 6).

So we could continue. We must either believe that when the Lord reigns in Zion, it will be on an earth where enemies still exist, or we can believe one or other of the theories with which the Millennial kingdom has been invested, but it is impossible to believe both.

The Last Test

The Millennium is man's last opportunity and test. Here, when sin is restrained and the Devil bound, man still proves utterly unable to stand, and the Millennium is the last of a series that commenced with Eden, and which continued under patriarchal rule, the dominion of law, and the reign of David, even to the advent of the Son of Man in His humiliation on earth.

Right Division Obtains Here

We have evidently placed in the Millennium prophecies that belong to a succeeding age, and not to the reign of the overcomer. A day follows the Millennium when the heavenly Jerusalem descends to the earth, to be the jeweled centre of a new earth, and Peter tells us that the day of God follows the day of the Lord. The new heavens and the new earth to which Peter directed his readers (II Pet. iii. 13) where, he said, "dwelleth righteousness" is an aspect of truth to which we turn our attention in subsequent articles.

Reckoning and Reality

(A sequel to the series entitled "Emmanuel, God with us")

No.1. The Seven Steps to Reality.

pp. 39, 40

Our first concern must be to establish the connexion, suggested in our title, between the present series of studies, and the series already in progress under the title "Emmanuel, God with us". To avoid repeating what has already been written, we represent this connexion by means of a diagram. We trust that this, together with the accompanying explanation, will suffice to make the point clear.

- - - I l l u s t r a t i o n - - - (BE-XXXVIII.39).

At His birth the Saviour became Emmanuel ("God with us") but, although this condescension is beyond the power of man to compute, it did not itself accomplish redemption from sin. It was only a step in that direction. The preposition meta ("with") does not indicate union, but association. By His very sinlessness the Saviour was "separate from sinners". The Incarnation provided the body by which He was to make the one all-sufficient sacrifice for sin. The last occurrence of the word meta, before He endured the cross, is found in the record of Mark xv. 28, "He was numbered (reckoned) with (meta) the transgressors". At this point a new principle is introduced, the principle of "reckoning". By this principle "He Who knew no sin" could be made sin for us, even as we who had sinned, could be made "the righteousness of God in Him".

Because of this principle of "reckoning" (Rom. iv. 10), or "counting" (Rom. iv. 3), or "imputing" (Rom. iv. 22-24), as the word logizomai is variously translated, we are enabled to "reckon" ourselves "dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. vi. 11). In connexion with this "reckoning" a new preposition sun is introduced, displacing the preposition of mere proximity meta by the preposition of union. We are made one with Christ, not in and by His birth, but in and by His death.

This new bond of union which commences at the cross, leads on to the glorious climax of being "manifested with Him in glory" (Col. iii. 4), where "reckoning" is exchanged for "reality".

There are seven rungs in the ladder of grace, commencing with the Cross and ending in Glory. We will arrange the seven passages concerned in the order in which they appear in the development of the doctrine, and also in such a way that the first rung in the ladder shall be the lowest on the page.

(7)	"Manifested with" in glory (Col. iii. 4).	Sun phaneroo.	REALIZATION.
(6)	"Seated with" in heavenly places (Eph. ii. 6).	Sugkathizo.	RECKONING.
(5)	"Raised with" (Col. iii. 1).	Sunegeiro.	RECKONING.
(4)	"Quickened with" (Eph. ii. 5).	Suzoopoieo.	RECKONING.
(3)	"Buried with" (Rom. vi. 4).	Sunthaptomai.	RECKONING.
(2)	"Dead with" (II Tim. ii. 11).	Sunapothnesko.	RECKONING.
(1)	"Crucified with" (Rom. vi. 6).	Sustauroo.	RECKONING.

The first six steps in this blessed ascent are taken during the present life: the seventh and last step awaits the resurrection. The first six steps are taken while we are still mortal; the seventh and the last step awaits immortality. The first six steps are ours only by "reckoning". Steps 1, 2 and 3 are beyond our personal participation. Steps 4, 5 and 6 are a kind of first fruits. The seventh and last step will be ours in "reality".

Not until every vestige of the old nature has gone completely can there be any "real" union with the holy Son of God. During this life that union is by "reckoning", but in the life to come the believer can be truly united with the Risen Christ by virtue of the New Life which is the gift of God through the offering of His Son, and conferred upon the believer at the Resurrection. Here at length all barriers to complete union will have been dissolved, and what was hitherto enjoyed by the gracious principle of reckoning will then be enjoyed in reality.

No believer has been actually "crucified with Christ"; he can be graciously "reckoned" so, but no more. No believer has actually "died with Christ"; he can only do so by "reckoning". This principle of "reckoning" is the first true link between the Saviour and the saved. He, the sinless One was "reckoned" with the transgressors, so that they could be "reckoned" with Him in His sacrificial work. No longer is He "with" us only (meta) in close association; He is also one with us (sun) in a blessed and eternal union.

Every one of these seven steps has already been dealt with in the course of our exposition of Romans, Galatians, Ephesians and Colossians, but there is more in them than any one exposition can ever hope to reveal, and the consideration of them as a series is demanded by reason of their extreme importance.

When these seven steps to full Realization have been examined, there will be necessitated a still further series, which must include those other references to the believer's union with Christ that lie outside this great ascent.

No.2. "Thou shalt be with Me in Paradise." A preliminary study.

pp. 70 - 73

The first of the seven steps to reality, in which the believer is said to be "with" Christ, is connected with His crucifixion. Two passages make use of the verb sustauroo "to crucify with". Of the seven terms, five are not used in any other connexion than that of the union of the believer with his Lord in being either buried with Him, quickened with Him, raised with Him, seated with Him, or manifested with Him. The first two however, are used in other connexions than those immediately referring to union with Christ, and this we must first of all investigate. For the time being we are limiting our inquiry to the term "to crucify together". Sustauroo is used three times in the Gospels, to speak of the thieves who were "crucified with" the Lord (Matt. xxvii. 44; Mk. xv. 32; Jn. xix. 32).

> "Then were there two thieves crucified with Him, one on the right hand and another on the left" (Matt. xxvii. 38).
>
> "And they that were crucified with Him reviled Him" (Mark xv. 32).
> "Then came the soldiers, and brake the legs of the first, and of the other which was crucified with Him" (John xix. 32).

For the purposes of this present study we do not feel it would be of any help to make a digression and discuss the question whether there were two only who were thus crucified with Christ, or whether there were two thieves, and two malefactors. The interested reader will find all the relevant data in Appendix 164 of "The Companion Bible". Luke does not use the words "crucify with" but expresses the fact in another way saying "There they crucified him, and the malefactors, one on the right hand, and the other on the left" (Luke xxiii. 33).

The passage in Mark xv., which gave us the first great "reckoning" "He was numbered with the transgressors", supplies us also with the one occurrence in that gospel of the words "to crucify with" (Mark xv. 27, 32). As used by Mark, this word sustauroo does not mean union, but physical proximity and similarity of execution, but as used by Paul the new and wonderful doctrine of identification intensifies the meaning of the words.

While Luke does not employ the words "crucify with", he alone reveals the conversation, the conviction, and the confession of the dying malefactor, and the contrasted mental attitude of the two malefactors provides a transition of meaning, where mere physical proximity passes over into blessed union expressed in the promise "Thou shalt be with Me in paradise" (Luke xxiii. 43).

Let us note the words of the dying malefactor. In answer to the railing of his companion in condemnation, it is written:

> "But the other answering rebuked him, saying, Dost not thou fear God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation?"

What did this man mean when he said "the same condemnation"? Did he mean the same condemnation that he himself was in, or did he look at the dying Saviour and say in effect "we are all being treated alike, we are in the same condemnation"? There seems to be no point in this rebuke unless it refers to the crucifixion of Christ. Both the Holy Saviour and the guilty sinners were "in the same condemnation", the One being reckoned with the transgressors, the others, as the malefactor continued:

> "And we indeed justly. We receive the due reward of our deeds; but this Man hath done nothing amiss" (Luke xxiii. 41).

Here is a series of statements, each of which foreshadow the great doctrine of the epistles of Paul. They can be arranged under the following heads:

(1) Both the Lord and the malefactors were in the same condemnation.
(2) In the case of the malefactors, this condemnation was a just reward for their deeds.
(3) But "this Man" had done nothing amiss, and so was either:
  (a) Suffering because of a miscarriage of human justice; or
  (b) Suffering as a Substitute; or
  (c) Suffering both because of a miscarriage of human justice, and at the same time by Divine appointment.

> "Him being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain" (Acts ii. 23).

> "For He hath made Him to be sin for us, Who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him" (II Cor. v. 21).

While, therefore, the first use of sustauroo "crucify with" meant only physical association, it becomes apparent as the record proceeds, that one of these dying malefactors becomes the first great type of believer, who by faith is "reckoned" to have died with Christ the great Substitute and Head. If this be so, we must become more fully acquainted with the transaction recorded in Luke xxiii. 41-43, before we turn to the two passages in Paul's epistles, where the doctrine of crucifixion with Christ is fully enunciated.

Having made the threefold confession concerning his own condemnation, the sinlessness of the Saviour, and yet the sharing with them of the same condemnation, the dying malefactor turned to "this Man", this forsaken, crucified Man, Who had been "numbered with the transgressors", Who had saved others, but refused to save Himself, he turned and addressed this dying Man of Nazareth as "Lord"; he saw beyond the crown of thorns and the mockery of the superscription that He was indeed "King". The words "when Thou comest into Thy kingdom", should be translated "when Thou comest in Thy Kingdom", even as Matt. xxv. 31 "When the Son of Man shall come in His glory". The verb "comest" is the chief word of this clause, and the words "in Thy Kingdom" the qualification. This dying malefactor saw more clearly than the apostles themselves did, before Pentecost, that here, crucified at his side was the Messiah, the King of Israel.

> "And Jesus said unto him, Verily I say unto thee, Today shalt thou be with Me in Paradise" (Luke xxiii. 43).

The reader will be aware that the orthodox interpretation of these gracious words, is that the soul of the malefactor, fully conscious after death, entered into the intermediate state on the very day of the crucifixion, and as far as we know, he is there still "unclothed" and will remain so until the day of resurrection. Let us examine these words afresh.

Paradise. This is evidently the well-known paradise of Scripture for the Greek has the article "The Paradise". The word "paradise" occurs in three passages in the Hebrew O.T., "forest" (Neh. ii. 8), "orchard" (Eccles. ii. 5; Song of Sol. iv. 13).

The word is not strictly a Hebrew word, but is rather a term borrowed from the Persian, where it signified a pleasure garden. The word is found in the Sanscrit as paradeesha.

The word paradise is found in the Septuagint Version of the O.T., five times in Gen. ii. and eight times in Gen. iii., where it translates the Hebrew word for "garden". Apart from the reference in Luke xxiii. 43, the word paradise occurs but twice more in the Greek N.T., namely at II Cor. xii. 4 and Rev. ii. 7.

It is extremely difficult to interpret Rev. ii. 7 as of the intermediate state, for the reference to the tree of life implies a garden and the reference is made so evidently to what is described in Rev. xxii. 1-5, as to make any reference to Hades and the intermediate state impossible.

II Cor. xii. 2 and 4 speaks of Paul being "caught up to the third heaven" and "caught up to paradise", harpazo. This word which is translated "caught up" is incorrectly invested by such a rendering with a sense of direction. There is nothing in the word itself to show whether the catching is "up" or "away". Its primary meaning is that of the action of a beast prey as in John x. 12. This idea underlies the variants of the word, as for example harpage extortion, spoiling (Matt. xxiii. 24; Heb. x. 34); harpax ravening (Matt. vii. 15); harpagmos robbery (Phil. ii. 6). Wild beasts, spoilers, robbers, do not necessarily catch or snatch up. Philip was "caught away" by the Spirit of the Lord and transferred to a desert (Acts viii. 39), even as the wicked one "catcheth away" the word of the kingdom (Matt. xiii. 19). Where the context demands an upward direction, that can be included as in I Thess. iv. 17. Paul therefore could have been caught away to the future Paradise which, as Rev. xxii. shows, is on the earth. This paradise comes after the mention of the new heaven and new earth of Rev. xxi. In Gen. i. 1 we have the first heaven and earth, in Gen. i. 3, Rev. xx. 15 we have the second heaven and earth, and in Rev. xxi.-xxii. we have the third heaven and earth. To this period Paul was caught away. There is no Scripture that gives the slightest warrant for transferring paradise from earth, either to hades beneath or to heaven above.

When the Lord therefore said to the malefactor "Thou shalt be with Me in paradise", He was looking to the end of the age and the consummation of His great work. There, this poor dying rebel will find a place. Before we go further with this aspect of the subject, we must consider the bearing upon all this of the words "To-day". It is assumed that the Lord assured the dying malefactor that on that very day of crucifixion he would be in paradise. Let us look at two passages in Luke's gospel, where there is no shadow of doubt as to the meaning.

> "And He began to say unto them, This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears" (Luke iv. 21).

No one would dream of detaching the words "This day" from the rest of the Lord's utterance. They form an integral part of what He said. Moreover, He Himself did not say the preceding words "And He began to say unto them" they are the words of Luke.

> "And Jesus said unto him, This say is salvation come to this house" (Luke xix. 9), and again, we must understand that the words "This day" form a part of what the Lord actually said to Zaccheus.

Now these two passages taken from the same writer differ in one essential particular from the wording of Luke xxiii. 43. In both passages, the actual words spoken by the Lord are prefaced by the particle hoti "that", and the presence of this particle in Luke iv. 21 and xix. 9 proves that the words "This day" belong to the remainder of the sentence. When we examine Luke xxiii. 43, we discover that the particle hoti is not used. The common Hebrew idiom is fully represented by the Lord's reply in Luke xxiii. 43.

> "I call heaven and earth to witness against you this day, that ye shall soon utterly perish from off the land" (Deut. iv. 26).

This idiomatic use of the phrase "this day" occurs forty-two times in Deuteronomy, and the forty-two passages are given in "The Companion Bible" at Deut. iv. 26. What the Lord said therefore, was indeed a reply to the dying man's request:

> "Lord, remember me, WHEN THOU COMEST IN THY KINGDOM."
> "Verily I say unto thee today, THOU SHALT BE WITH ME IN PARADISE."

We have yet to consider the way in which the apostle Paul has used the word sustauroo "to crucify with", but we must defer that study until the next article of this series.

No.3. The First Reckoning, "Crucified with Christ".
pp. 104 - 107

In the preceding article of this series, we noted the occurrence in the Gospels and in the epistles of sustauroo "to crucify with", but paused to examine the Lord's promise to the dying malefactor. We discovered that this man who was "crucified with" the Saviour was directed to the goal that was before Him, the Paradise of God, when the kingdom should indeed be the Lord's. This dying man is the first great pledge and type of all who shall thus reach the crown by means of the cross, whether in the kingdom or the church.

No other books in the N.T. outside of the Gospels make use of the word "to crucify with" than Paul's epistles to the Galatians and Romans. The words stauros "cross" and stauroo "crucify" are not found in the epistles of the circumcision, but are found only in the epistles of Paul. In Paul's epistles stauros occurs eleven times and stauroo eight times. For this there must be a reason. Peter speaks of Christ being slain and "hanged on a tree", as does Paul (Acts v. 30; x. 39; Gal. iii. 13); and in his epistles Peter tells us that Christ bare our sins in His own body on the tree (I Pet. ii. 24), but he never once speaks of "The Cross" neither does he ever use the word "crucify" except in his charge against the people of Israel (Acts ii. 36; iv. 10) repeating the historical fact already made known in the Gospels but never using the term when speaking doctrinally or of redemption.

It appears from this, that when either of the apostles are speaking of the death of Christ to those who were or who had been under the law, they used the word "tree", referring back to the law of Moses, as Paul actually does in Galatians and in Acts xiii. 29 saying: "For it is written, cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree" (Gal. iii. 13). Not only is this difference observable, but another most important doctrine emerges; "the curse" which is so intimately associated with "the tree" and "the law" is never spoken of by the apostle Paul when dealing with the Gentiles as such. Only by putting themselves "under the law" can a Gentile come "under the curse" (Gal. iii. 10). In the O.T. from Genesis to Malachi we meet with the possibility of coming under a curse, and so widespread is this imprecatory teaching, that we find, even when limiting ourselves to the A.V., that the O.T. contains seventy references to cursing, and that nine Hebrew words are employed to express it. Of these seventy references, sixty-five belong to Israel, and five only occur before the call of Abraham. These are the primeval curse upon the ground because of the sin of Adam and of Cain, and the curse pronounced by Noah upon Canaan.

From these facts we are led to see the reason why Paul in his peculiar ministry, was inspired to adopt the Gentile words "crucify" and "cross" in place of the Hebrew words "hang" and "tree". Once only in the LXX does the Greek word stauroo occur, namely in Esther vii. 9, where we read "and the king said, let him be hanged thereon". In this particular passage the writer is reporting the saying of a Gentile king, and so puts into his mouth the word "crucify". The Hebrew word thus translated is talah, and occurs in Esther ii. 23; v. 14; vi. 4; vii. 9, 10; viii. 7; ix. 13, 14, 25, but in none of these passages is stauroo employed. In every passage in the book of Esther where the word "gallows" is found, that word is the translation of the Hebrew etz "tree". He therefore, according to the testimony of Esther, who was "hanged on a tree" was "crucified", the one form of speech being Hebrew, the other Gentile. Crucifixion was unknown among the Hebrews until they came into contact with Persia. The Greek and the Roman borrowed this form of punishment from the Phoenicians, and it was in force during the time of Constantine.

The fact that crucifixion was essentially a Gentile form of punishment and is employed alone by Paul among the apostles, makes any reference that he may make of supreme importance to ourselves. The first thing that we must do is to collect together the references found in the epistles of the words stauros and stauroo.

"THE CROSS" IN PAUL'S EPISTLES.

"Lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect" (I Cor. i. 17).
"For the preaching of the cross is to them that perish, foolishness" (I Cor. i. 18).
"Then is the offence of the cross ceased" (Gal. v. 11).
"Lest they should suffer persecution for the cross of Christ" (Gal. vi. 12).
"God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Gal. vi. 14).
"That He might reconcile both unto God in one body by the cross" (Eph. ii. 16).
"Even the death of the cross" (Phil. ii. 8).
"The enemies of the cross of Christ" (Phil. iii. 18).
"Peace through the blood of His cross" (Col. i. 20).
"Nailing it to His cross" (Col. ii. 14).
"He endured the cross despising the shame" (Heb. xii. 2).

"TO CRUCIFY" IN PAUL'S EPISTLES.

"Was Paul crucified for you?" (I Cor. i. 13).
"But we preach Christ crucified" (I Cor. i. 23).
"Save Jesus Christ and Him crucified" (I Cor. ii. 2).
"They would not have crucified the Lord of glory" (I Cor. ii. 8).
"He was crucified through weakness" (II Cor. xiii. 4).
"Evidently set forth crucified among you" (Gal. iii. 1).
"They that are Christ's have crucified the flesh" (Gal. v. 24).
"By whom the world is crucified unto me" (Gal. vi. 14).

An examination of the context, the purpose, and the people to whom these words were addressed, reveal that the preaching of the cross has a much larger place in the ministry to those already saved, than it has in the initial preaching of the gospel to the unsaved, and this is markedly true of the two occurrences of sustauroo "to crucify with". The first passage is Gal. ii. 20, where Paul makes his own point clear to Peter and the Church. The point at issue was the doctrine of Justification by faith without the works of the law, and Paul breaks off his expostulation with Peter to give his own personal testimony.

> "For I through law, to law died, that I might live to God. With Christ I have been crucified; nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, Who loved me, and gave Himself for me" (Gal. ii. 19, 20).

It is a pity that the translators did not respect the way in which the apostle differentiated between "the law" that is the law of Moses, and "law" of any kind whatever.

The following references are separated into two categories by the presence or the absence of the article in the original.

"THE LAW" IN GALATIANS.

"The book of the law" (iii. 10). "The law is not of faith" (iii. 12). "The curse of the law" (iii. 13). "The law which was four hundred and thirty years after" (iii. 17). "Wherefore then serveth the law?" (iii. 19). "Is the law then against the promises?" (iii. 21). "The law was our schoolmaster" (iii. 24). "Do ye not hear the law?" (iv. 21). "A debtor to do the whole law" (v. 3). "All the law is fulfilled" (v. 14). "And so fulfil the law of Christ" (vi. 2).

Here, every reference is to the law of Moses, except the last which is to the law of Christ.

"LAW" IN GALATIANS.

"Works of law" (ii. 16). "I through law am dead to law" (ii. 19). "If righteousness come by law" (ii. 21). "Received ye the Spirit by works of law?" (iii. 2). "Works of law" (iii. 5, 10). "No man is justified by law" (iii. 11). "If the inheritance be of law" (iii. 18). "Righteousness should have been by law" (iii. 21). "We were kept under law" (iii. 23). "Made under law" (iv. 4). "To redeem them that were under law" (iv. 5). "Ye that desire to be under law" (iv. 21). "Justified by law" (v. 4). "Ye are not under law" (v. 18). "Keep law" (vi. 13).

Here, the law of Moses is not particularly in mind, but rather law and legalism of any and every kind.

Here is Paul's first great reckoning. When Christ died on the cross He died by law and to law. For the Jew under the curse of the law of Moses, that cross is "the Tree", and the One Who died upon it became "a curse" and He is said to have been "hanged" that the curse of the law might be removed from those who were under it. To the Gentile who had never been under the law of Moses, redemption of this sort was not necessary. But all sin presupposes a law, for where there is no law there can be no transgression. Yet sin was in the world long before Moses, and because of this the apostle, in the selfsame epistle, speaks of the Redeemer hanging on a tree and of being crucified on a cross, according as he has the curse of the law of Moses, or the transgression of law as such, in view.

The second and last reference to sustauroo is found in the inner section of Romans (Rom. v. 12 - viii.). Although there are many references to the law of Moses in Rom. vii., they refer rather to the apostle's past experience, than to the experience of the Roman Christians. Rom. v. 12 - viii. is concerned more with "sin" than with "sins", with “the law of sin and death”, the law in our members, the law of our mind, rather than the law of Sinai.

Consequently we find Paul speaking of the “old man” the inner seat of sin, the radiating point for the law of sin and death, and here it is that he speaks once again of being “crucified with Christ”.

> “Knowing this that our old man is crucified with Him” (Rom. vi. 6).

The believer is never told to crucify the old man himself, he is told to look at the cross of Christ and see that there the blessed “reckoning” operates. We may have “put off concerning the former conversation the old man” (Eph. iv. 22), and we may have “put off the old man with his deeds” (Col. iii. 9), we can deal with the “conversation” and “the deeds” of the old man, but we cannot deal with the old man itself. Neither will all our “putting off” be of any avail unless based squarely on the great initial reckoning with Christ when the old man was crucified with Him. What the crucifying of the old man involves is immediately explained in Rom. vi. 6.

(1) “That the body of sin might be destroyed” (A.V.)
“In order that our sinful nature might be deprived of its power” (Weymouth).
“That the body of sin might be annulled” (Darby).

(2) “That henceforth we should not serve sin” (A.V.)
“So that we should no longer be slaves of sin” (Weymouth).
“And free us from further slavery to sin” (Moffatt).

The emphasis is placed here upon being freed from a dominion, and that because of the intervention of death. This death was not our own, but Another’s, and we are graciously reckoned to have been crucified with Christ, and our old man reckoned to have been crucified with Him, so that we may make the first step up the sevenfold ladder of life that leads from Reckoning to Reality.

Here for the time we must stay. That Cross and the Crucifixion terminated in death; it is not “The Cross” but “the Death of the Cross” that is stressed. It is not the “Cross” but “the blood of the Cross”, “the shame” of crucifixion, the complete rejection and abandonment that such an execution implied, that is brought to bear upon our old and sinful nature. We might have thought that this was enough; that no one could ever think of attempting to be saved by his own works, or by putting himself under law again. The Lord however knew otherwise, and so we are to go on with Him and learn that “dying with Him” and being “buried with Him” must be considered before we at last turn our back upon self completely and enter into newness of life.

“I have been crucified with Christ.”

No.4. The Second Reckoning, "To have died with Christ".
pp. 125 - 129

The Scripture teaches that "the wages of sin is death", and this is the testimony not only of the epistles of Paul, but of the early chapters of Genesis. For our salvation Christ was born, was attested to be without spot, suffered the contradiction of sinners, manifested the Father, was numbered with transgressors, was crucified; yet had He not gone to the end and become "obedient unto death, even the death of the cross" we should still be without a Saviour. "Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures." "In due time Christ died for the ungodly"; such is the testimony of the apostle Paul. We have pondered the grace that is made manifest in the fact that He the Righteous One, should be "reckoned with the transgressors" and how this self-same reckoning enables the believer, though sinful and condemned, to be reckoned among the righteous, but this supposes that what was commenced on the cross, was taken to its end in death and the grave, and still on to the glorious sequel of Resurrection. We must therefore consider this next great step in the upward movement from reckoning to reality, namely the identification of the believer with his Saviour in the death of the cross.

First let us observe what is actually written concerning that death and how it is associated with ourselves and our deliverance. "Christ died FOR the ungodly"; "while we were yet sinners, Christ died FOR us". "Christ died FOR our sins"; "if One died FOR all, then all died" (Rom. v. 6, 8; I Cor. xv. 3; II Cor. v. 14). Into this aspect of the Saviour's gracious work we cannot enter. When He bore our sins He bore them alone, and in the very nature of things, it could not be otherwise. He not only died "for" our sins as our Substitute however, He died TO sin as our Representative also, and it is in this aspect of His wondrous work that "reckoning" makes us one.

The compound word sunapothnesko occurs but once in the epistles of Paul in reference to the work of Christ, namely in II Tim. ii. 11, the other occurrence, namely II Cor. vii. 3 being personal to the apostle. It is interesting to note that the apostle waited until he was writing his last epistle before he actually used the full expression "to die with". When he does employ the term it is not in order that he may introduce and explain the doctrine, but in order that he may make it a basis of appeal to Timothy that he should go on to perfection.

> "It is a faithful saying: For if we be dead with Him, we shall also live with Him" (II Tim. ii. 11).

We will not go into the question that awaits us in the context concerning "suffering" and "reigning", "denying" and "being denied", our business is with this initial reckoning that must without peradventure issue in life. Reigning and Crowning belong to another category. The death of Christ FOR us ensures our forgiveness, justification and peace; it also obtains for us the grant of newness of life, and this is received and entered by "reckoning" ourselves to have died with Him.

> "Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. vi. 11).

This verse, however, is at the close of the revelation of a great truth, and so before we can appreciate at anything like its true worth what this reckoning involves, we must go back on our journey. Rom. v. 12-21 reveals that a principle is at work. By reason of one man's disobedience, we read, many were made sinners, and so, by the obedience of One, shall many be made righteous. The one whose disobedience is in view, is Adam, the One Whose obedience more than counterbalances is Christ (Rom. v. 19). The verb "to make" is used both transitively and intransitively in the English language. Transitively it means "to cause to exist"; intransitively it means "to tend, to move in a direction". These two definitions do not by any means exhaust the shades of meaning that this word assumes, but it indicates the categories under which they must be ranged. In Rom. v. 19 the word "make" is intransitive. Moreover, the Greek word that is translated "to make" more than anything else, is poieo. The word used in Rom. v. 19 however is kathistemi, which is composed of kata an intensive and histemi "to stand". This is a prolific Greek root and occurs in sixty-nine different forms and combinations in the Greek N.T. From this root came stauros "the cross", and stauroo "to crucify" and anastasis "resurrection".

When therefore the apostle spoke of the consequences of the sin of Adam upon his children, he did not teach that his children were made sinners, or made to sin, he said they were "constituted" sinners, even as by grace they could be "constituted" righteous. No clearer mental picture can be made of the apostle's meaning than that which comes from a literal translation:

> "For as by one man's disobedience many were made to stand sinners, so by the obedience of One shall many be made to stand righteous."

"Standing" is in view, not actual participation. The two headships, Adam and Christ, are in view, not individual and personal sinners. Paul many times speaks of the "standing" of the believer. He stands "in grace"; "by faith"; "in the gospel"; and "perfect and complete" (Rom. v. 2; xi. 20; I Cor. xv. 1; II Cor. i. 24; Col. iv. 12).

This standing either in the position of a sinner, or of a saint, is primarily a matter of "reckoning" and Rom. v. introduces us to Rom. vi. Rom. vi. 1-14, which is a complete section, uses the word "dead" and "death" fourteen times, which of itself is an indication of its importance in the apostle's argument. These fourteen occurrences are translations of four words, and it is essential that they should be distinguished in order that their relationship may be perceived.

Thanatos	"Death."	Sentence and State (Rom. vi. 3, 4, 5, 9).
Nekros	"Dead."	Used only of persons (Rom. vi. 4, 9, 11, 13).
Apothnesko	"To Die."	Death consummated (Rom. vi. 2, 7, 8, 9, 10).
Thnetos	"Mortal."	Liable to death (Rom. vi. 12).

The subject is so fundamental, that we cannot leave the examination of these words without a fuller acquaintance with their context and association. We must now set each occurrence before the reader.

Thanatos. This word indicates the state of death consequent upon the condemnation pronounced upon sin, whether it be the initial sin of Adam as federal head of the race, or of the individual sin of his children (Rom. v. 12, 14).

> "Know ye not that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ, were baptized into His death" (Rom. vi. 3).
> "Therefore we are buried with Him by baptism into death" (Rom. vi. 4).
> "Therefore if we have been planted together in the likeness of His death" (Rom. vi. 5).
> "Death hath no more dominion over Him" (Rom. vi. 9).

Nekros. This word speaks of dead persons, those who have passed into the state of death (Rom. i. 4).

> "Like as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father" (Rom. vi. 4).
> "Knowing that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more" (Rom. vi. 9).
> "Likewise, reckon ye yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin" (Rom. vi. 11).
> "Yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead" (Rom. vi. 13)

Apothnesko. This word is an intensive form of thnesko and refers to the consummation of the death sentence.

> "How shall we that are dead to sin live any longer therein?" (Rom. vi. 2).
> "For he that is dead is freed from sin" (Rom. vi. 7).
> "Now if we be dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with Him" (Rom. vi. 8).
> "Knowing that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more" (Rom. vi. 9).
> "For in that He died, He died unto sin once" (Rom. vi. 10).

Thnetos. This word is used to describe those who though still living are subject to death, as distinct from nekros which speaks of those actually dead.

> "Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body" (Rom. vi. 12).

We have yet further examination to make. First we must observe the order in which these words are introduced into the argument, and we will endeavour to make an unbroken explanation, passing from word to word as the argument develops. The argument is first of all not death as the punishment of sin, neither is it the death of Christ that opens this section of Rom. vi. It is the believer's death to sin that is introduced to show how impossible it is to deduce from the reign of grace an excuse for "continuing in sin". The reader is deprived of the insistence of the words te hamartia, by the translations in Rom. vi. 1 "in sin" and in Rom. vi. 2 "to sin". There is no actual word for "in" or "to" here, these are but two translations of the dative case. They are rightly translated "in sin" and "to sin" because of the demands of the context. The preposition "in" does not occur until we reach the words "live any longer therein".

It is therefore the believer's death to sin that is in view at the opening of this section. But the question now presents itself, how can a believer "die to sin"? The answer follows

"we were baptized into His death". We must leave the question as to what is intended by "baptism" here until we have completed the chain of argument that we are examining. The apostle continues with his reference to baptism, saying that "we were buried with Him by baptism into death". This union with Christ he still further illustrated by speaking of the believer being "planted together in the likeness of His death", and both the terms "planted together" and "likeness" demand attention. Just as baptism into His death is followed by "like as Christ was raised up from the dead, even so we . . . . .", so being planted together in the likeness of His death is followed by the assurance that we shall be also in the likeness of His resurrection. For the moment, the apostle looks back to the cross that preceded the death of Christ, and says that our old man was crucified with Him, thereby rendering the body of sin inoperative, and making slavery to sin no longer necessary. He then returns to the use of the word "dead" saying "he that is dead, is freed (dedikaiotai 'justified') from sin". This freedom and justifying operates in new life, and the apostle reaffirms his argument by saying "now if we be dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with Him", and the reason for this assurance is that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more, neither can death have any more dominion over Him. He died to sin once, He now lives to God.

We now come to the word that contains within itself the explanation of the terms "made sinners" and "made righteous", "baptized" and "likeness", namely, the word "reckon". Earlier in this epistle the "reckoning" has been by God alone, the sinner having nothing to do or to say. For the first time this word is used as of the believer's own volition, based as it is on all that has preceded in Rom. vi. 1-10.

"Likewise reckon ye also yourselves on the one hand (men) to be dead to sin, but on the other hand (de) to be alive to God in Christ Jesus." The change of title "Jesus Christ our Lord" found in the A.V. is justified by the Revised Text. The translation "through" Jesus Christ our Lord, is not a true rendering of en "in" and as Alford remarks "in this chapter it is not Christ's Mediatorship, but His Headship which is prominent". This stand now being taken by the believer, certain consequences must follow. He is still in the mortal body, only by "reckoning" can he view himself as "alive from the dead", but this is a very real standing. He can at last yield himself unto God as those that are alive from the dead, and just as death has no more dominion over the Saviour, so sin shall not have dominion over the believer.

We have made no reference yet to Col. ii. 20, where once again we meet the words "if ye be dead with Christ", but this passage is linked with Rom. vi. by the fact that here also Paul speaks of the believer as having been "buried with Him by baptism" and consequently, as we must devote another article to these passages in Rom. vi., we must defer consideration of Col. ii. until this further study of Rom. vi. has been attempted.

No.5. The Third Reckoning, with special reference to the word "Baptism".
pp. 152 - 156

Unless we have very signally failed, the reader is by now fully aware that the modus operandi adopted by the God of grace, to bring about a union between the sinner and the Spotless Son of God, is by "reckoning". We have seen that He was reckoned among the transgressors, and that we are reckoned to have been crucified with Him, and as a consequence, we can now be exhorted to put this reckoning into practical effect.

> "Likewise RECKON ye yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. vi. 11).

This exhortation comes at the close of a series of links with the death of Christ introduced with the words "how shall we that are dead to sin, live any longer therein?" We observe it is not dying because of sin, or dying as a sacrifice for sin, but dying TO sin that is in mind, and that neither forgiveness nor justification are before us. Instead of the word "reckon" the apostle employs one or two other expressions to indicate the union of the believer with the Lord, in this great matter of dying TO sin, and of living TO God. The sphere of this new activity is "newness of life", life the other side of the grave, and consequently we have the words "baptized", "buried", "planted together" and "likeness" with a backward glance to what we already "know", namely our old man is crucified with Him that the body of sin should be rendered inoperative, and that henceforth we should not serve sin. We can now link this passage on to Col. ii., where being dead with Christ is associated on the one hand with complete deliverance from "the rudiments of the world", and with burial by baptism (Col. ii. 12, 13, 20).

It is evident that we have before us a doctrine of tremendous import, together with related features that demand most prayerful and careful attention. Instead of baptism being a simple subject, or at most a question of either "dipping" or "sprinkling", it is used in a variety of ways and contexts, none of which can overlap or intrude into the domain of the other without confusion and damage.

First. The baptisms enjoined by the Levitical Law.

> "Except they wash they eat not" (Mark vii. 4).
> "The washing of cups and pots" (Mark vii. 4, 8).
> "The doctrine of baptisms" (Heb. vi. 2).
> "Meats, drinks and divers washings" (Heb. ix. 10).

The purport and character of these baptisms are summed up for us by the apostle in Heb. ix. 9, 10:

> "Which was a figure for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the > conscience; which stood only in meats, and drinks, and divers washings, and carnal ordinances imposed on them until the time of reformation."

In order to appreciate the apostle's teaching here, we must be prepared to give this passage something more than a passing examination. We can reduce the apostle's argument to the following heads:

(1) The Tabernacle and all its service was "a figure".
(2) This typical service was for a limited time "for the time then present".
(3) This typical service was imperfect: "it did not touch the conscience."
(4) This typical service was "imposed until the time of reformation".

For our present purpose we must assume that the reader has no need of a description of the Tabernacle, or a detailed proof of its typical character. We must come to the case in point "the washings" or baptisms. The word baptizo occurs twice in the LXX, once it translates the Hebrew word baath "to make afraid" (Isa. xxi. 4), the figure using the word "to baptize" in the sense of plunging into trouble, being overwhelmed, being greatly perturbed. The other occurrence is II Kings v. 14, which reads in the A.V.:

> "Then he went down, and dipped himself seven times in Jordan."

What the prophet told Naaman to do was "go and wash in Jordan seven times" (II Kings v. 10), and in the pleading of Naaman's servant, come the words "wash and be clean". There can be no possible doubt but that the translators of the LXX equated "washing" with "baptizing" here. The Hebrew word translated "wash" in these passages is rachats, and this word is used many times of the ceremonial "washings" referred to in Heb. ix. 9, 10. There are twenty-one such "washings" recorded in Leviticus, and these include the washing of the parts of the sacrifice (Lev. viii. 21), the washing of the leper (Lev. xiv. 8), and the washing of the priest (Lev. xvi. 4). See also Exod. xxix. 4, 17; xxx. 19, 21 and xl. 12, 31.

It will be seen therefore that the A.V. is right when it translated baptismos "washings". These "baptisms" are defined as "carnal ordinances" that were "imposed" as something in the nature of a burden, a part of the yoke which neither the apostles nor the fathers could bear (Acts xv. 10). This imposition was for a limited season, "until the time of reformation", when the needs of the "conscience" would be met.

Just as many believers assume that the dispensation of the Church begins with Matthew's Gospel, so it is assumed that baptism is a distinctly Christian and church ordinance. This is far from being the truth. The Pharisees, when they questioned John concerning the purpose of his baptism, never questioned baptism itself. Here are a few extracts from Maimonedes in his great register of Jewish customs.

> "By three things Israel entered into covenant: by circumcision, baptism, and sacrifice."
> "A stranger that is circumcised, and not baptized, or that is baptized and not circumcised, is not a proselyte."

The reader will probably anticipate our next remark, namely that Paul closely associates "circumcision" and "baptism" in Col. ii. 11, 12 and that both baptism as well as circumcision can only be interpreted now in a spiritual sense. They must both stand together.

Before the institution of the Levitical law, there had been a more comprehensive "baptism" concerning Israel, which is mentioned by the apostle in I Cor. x. 1, 2:

> "Moreover brethren, I would not that ye should be ignorant how that all our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea; and were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea."

This "baptism unto Moses" in the cloud and in the sea is referred to in Psa. cvi., and by Isaiah:

> "He rebuked the Red Sea also and it was dried up; so He led them through the depths, as through the wilderness" (Psa. cvi. 9).
>
> "That led them by the right hand of Moses with His glorious arm, dividing the water before them, to make Himself an everlasting name? That led them through the deep, as an horse in the wilderness, that they should not stumble?" (Isa. lxiii. 12, 13).

In the song of Moses, sung by him and the children of Israel on the banks of the Red Sea, we read:

> "And with the blast of Thy nostrils the waters were gathered together, the floods stood upright as an heap, and the depths were congealed in the heart of the sea" (Exod. xv. 8).

Here is the initial baptism of the Bible. This baptism took place before the institution of the Levitical ceremonials, and is entirely disconnected with them. Everything is said to ensure that the reader shall be aware that at the baptism of Israel unto Moses, water was miraculously absent! Israel were led through the deep as a horse is led through a wilderness, the floods stood in an heap, the depths were congealed.

> "He divided the sea, and caused them to pass through; and He made the waters to stand as an heap" (Psa. lxxviii. 13).

At the crossing of the Jordan under Joshua, once again the waters are said "to stand upon a heap" as far back as the city of Adam, while the Israelites passed over on dry ground (Josh. iii. 13-17). Although the figure is not actually stated, this crossing of the Jordan was as much a baptism, as was the crossing of the Red Sea.

> "The sea saw it and fled. Jordan was driven back" (Psa. cxiv. 3).

If we read the opening of this Psalm, we shall see that the sea that fled must refer to the Red Sea, thus linking together the two crossings, one under Moses at the beginning, and the other under Joshua after the long interval of temptation and wandering. "The depths" and "the deep" through which Israel were led are described by the same word as is employed in Gen. i. 2 "the deep", whose fountains were broken up at the flood (Gen. vii. 11). This baptism at the Red Sea has no discernible connexion with the subsequent "baptisms" practiced by Israel up to and including the days of Christ and the apostles. The law had come in, and had relegated the earlier and fuller baptism into the background. As the dispensation drew to its close, so the earlier and richer baptism demanded its antitype, and that we discover in Rom. vi. and Col. ii.

The baptism of all Israel "by the cloud and by the sea" (the preposition en here referring to the instrument, for we are distinctly prevented from translating "in the sea") was not a "washing" but a symbol of union. It was "unto Moses". The baptism of the Epistles is "unto Christ" and whoever confuses the ceremonial cleansings with this great initiation, does so at his own peril, and the imperiling of precious truth.

The baptism of repentance, the ceremonial cleansings of pots, cups and beds, the baptism that was associated with the washing away of sins, the baptism that was for the remission of sins, the baptism that led to salvation and was followed by signs and miracles, this doctrine of baptisms, has been left behind as among the rudiments and elements that belong to spiritual childhood, as Heb. vi. 1, 2 show. It is impossible to "go on unto perfection" where alone the "conscience" is touched (Heb. ix. 9, 10; x. 1, 2) and retain these obsolete ordinances that were only imposed until the time of reformation.

With this somewhat lengthy preamble, we can now return to Rom. vi. and see that the baptism spoken of by the apostle cannot possibly refer to ceremonial baptisms and washings, but to the antitype of that baptism "unto Moses" that took place at the Red Sea. The apostle assumes that his reader had been "baptized unto Jesus Christ" which no baptism in water ever accomplished or was intended to accomplish. What his readers did not fully appreciate was that such baptism baptized them "unto His death". Baptism therefore of this sort, is another form of "reckoning". The apostle takes the question further; he declares that such were "buried" with Him by baptism "unto death" that like as Christ was "raised up" from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life. In order to enforce his teaching, the apostle uses another figure, he speaks of being "planted together". Alford says: "planted together is inadmissible, phutos being not from phuteuo but from phuo . . . . . intimately and progressively united."

Thayer's note reads: "born together with, of joint origin, i.e. 'Connate, congenital, innate, implanted by birth or nature' and comments on Rom. vi. 5: If we have become united with the likeness of His death (which likeness consists in the fact that in the death of Christ our former corruption and wickedness has been slain and buried in Christ's tomb), i.e. it is part and parcel of the very nature of a genuine Christian to be utterly dead to sin, we shall be united also with the likeness of His resurrection, i.e. our intimate fellowship with His return to life will show itself in a new consecration to God". Alford further adds: "Christians, it is true, partake of the likeness not only of Christ's death, but of His actual resurrection itself as the change of construction shows."

Passing to Col. ii., we observe that "the rudiments of the world" are in opposition to the completeness of the believer's standing in Christ (Col. ii. 8, 14, 16, 17, 20). To all such the believer "died with Christ". So complete is this severance from the dominion of the handwriting of ordinances, that the apostle uses the double figure "circumcision" and "baptism", and it is admitted that the circumcision here in view is the spiritual reality of which circumcision made by hands was but a poor type.

The burial with Him in baptism, is further expanded as being "dead in ('to') your sins and the uncircumcision of your flesh". It is not possible in the space available to attempt an exposition of Col. ii., but we believe sufficient has been shown from the Scriptures to show that the baptism "unto Christ", and so unto His death, looks back, not to the ceremonials of the Tabernacle service, but to the crossing of the Red Sea and again the crossing of the Jordan where Israel were baptized "unto Moses" and where the waters stood on a heap as far back as "Adam", a symbolism that awaited the exposition of the secret that had been silenced (Rom. xvi. 25, 26). It was the glory of Paul's ministry to make this known, as he does in this inner section of the epistle to the Romans (Rom. v. 12 - viii.) where Adam and his one offense is first spoken of as having a place in the great scheme of Redeeming Love.

No.6. The Third Reckoning (cont.). The first and last "Baptism" of all Scripture.

pp. 195 - 200

We dealt with various aspects of baptism in the preceding articles of this series, but the subject is of such importance that we have reserved the present study for one particular baptism that has a bearing upon the use of the terms in Rom. vi. and Col. ii.; we refer to the baptism of all Israel unto Moses at the Red Sea, and the repetition of this baptism with similar miraculous accompaniments under Joshua at the River Jordan.

First it will be necessary to establish the typical connexion of these two events. In Psa. cxiv., we have these two great events linked together. "The sea saw it, and fled: Jordan was driven back"; "What ailed thee, O thou sea, that thou fleddest? thou Jordan that thou wast driven back?" (Psa. cxiv. 3, 5). The Psalm opens with the words: "When Israel went out of Egypt", and leaves us without doubt as to what "sea" is intended. These two men, Moses and Joshua, together provide a type of the twofold work of the Lord Jesus Christ, Who both died and rose again.

> "Moses My servant is dead; now therefore arise, go over this Jordan, thou and all this people" (Josh. i. 2).

The types of the O.T. set forth not only the death of the Saviour, His spotlessness, His innocence, and the substitutionary nature of His offering, they also set forth His resurrection. This could have been accomplished in one of the three following ways:

(1) The person (Moses), or the offering (the Lamb) could have been literally raised from the dead.
(2) The person or the offering need not to have died.
(3) Two persons, or two offerings could be used in foreshadowing the death and resurrection of Christ to the believer, the one dying, the other being free to live.

The strong objection to the first suggestion would be the multiplication of the miracle of resurrection so that it rendered the unique character of this mighty event void by reason of familiarity. Moreover, a type ceases to be a type if it actually accomplishes that which it is supposed only to foreshadow. The objection to the second suggestion must be, that without actual death and shedding of blood, the supreme importance and nature of the one offering of Christ, would not have received sufficient emphasis. The third alternative is that which has been adopted by Divine Wisdom in setting forth this twofold work.

Abel dies, but Seth is appointed "in the stead" (Gen. iv. 25). Two goats were appointed for the day of atonement, one which was offered for a sin offering, the other "the scapegoat" presented "alive" before the Lord, and "let go" into the wilderness (Lev. xvi.). Two birds were used at the cleansing of the Leper. The one was killed, the other "the living bird" was dipped into the blood of the dead bird, and then let loose into the open field (Lev. xiv. 1-7).

As to typical persons, while no proof is necessary to demonstrate the fact that David was a type of the Lord's true Anointed, it may be forgotten that Solomon was "the King's Son" (Psa. lxxii.) and the king whose reign is associated with such peace and prosperity as was never again enjoyed by Israel, he also is required to complete the Scriptural type of the great reign of the Son of God.

> "The death of Moses and the succession of Joshua prefigured the continuance of the law till Jesus came (Acts xiii. 37; Luke xvi. 16).
>
> Moses must die, that Joshua may succeed."
>
> "Joshua begins his office at the banks of Jordan; and there Jesus was baptized and entered upon the public exercises of His prophetical office. Joshua chose there twelve men out of the people, to carry twelve stones over with them; Jesus thence began to choose His twelve apostles, those foundations in the Heavenly Jerusalem" (Bishop Pearson).
>
> "Joshua brought the people into Canaan, after they had been lying, as it were, helpless under the Law in the wilderness for thirty-eight years after their sin and exclusion at Kadesh-barnea. Jesus came to the impotent man who had been thirty-eight years in his infirmity, and lay beneath the shade of Bethesda with its five porches, and bade him rise and walk" (Chr. Wordsworth, D.D.).

Let us examine these two typical events in order that the light they give may illuminate our understanding as we ponder the meaning of baptism in Rom. vi. and Col. ii.

The baptism of Rom. vi. and Col. ii. is not only a burial into death, but in both cases leads on to fellowship with Christ in His resurrection. The burial into death is that of Moses at the Red Sea, the rising again is with Joshua at the Jordan. The interval between these two events is occasioned by Israel's failure and by the interposition of the law. A further check is administered by the imposition of carnal ordinances that could only be done away by Christ Himself, and so it was not possible for Moses to fulfil the complete type, the supplemental action of Joshua at the Jordan being necessary to round off the whole foreshadowing.

Not only are there two movements symbolized in this great baptism, but two phases of Redemption are also associated, the one with Moses and the other with Joshua. The sixth chapter of Exodus shows that this twofold deliverance was always in the mind of the Lord. This is the redemption effected under Moses.

> "I am the Lord, and I will bring you OUT . . . . . I will rid you OUT . . . . ." (Exod. vi. 6).

This is the further redemption accomplished under Joshua.

> "I will bring you IN . . . . . I will GIVE it you" (Exod. vi. 8).

In the first deliverance, a mighty foe is destroyed at the moment of Israel's baptism; in the second, the walls of Jericho fall flat after the second baptism at Jordan. Following the first baptism unto Moses, the Manna was given (Exod. xvi. 35), and immediately after the crossing of the Jordan "the manna ceased" (Josh. v. 11, 12). The baptism unto Moses followed the first Passover (Exod. xii.-xiv.), the baptism at the Jordan is followed by the observance of the Passover (Josh. v. 10). As a prelude to the mission of Moses, a burning bush is used to teach a lesson, "and when Moses drew near to see this great sight, God said to him, Draw not nigh hither: put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground" (Exod. iii. 1-5). So, in the case of Joshua, immediately after the manna ceased, he saw a man standing with drawn sword and when he went forward to question him, this "Captain of the Lord's host" said "Loose thy shoe from off thy foot; for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground" (Josh. v. 13-15).

The powers of the enemy were shaken by the news of the crossing of the Red Sea and at the destruction of Pharaoh and his host.

> "The people shall hear and be afraid; sorrow shall take hold on the inhabitants of Palestine . . . . . all the inhabitants of Canaan shall melt away" (Exod. xv. 14-16).

The powers of the enemy were further shaken by the crossing of the Jordan by the children of Israel:

> "When all the kings of the Amorites . . . . . all the kings of the Canaanites . . . . . heard that the Lord had dried up the waters of Jordan from before the children of Israel . . . . . that their hearts melted" (Josh. v. 1).

This "melting" effect upon the two sets of enemy, is associated in both Exod. xv. 16 and in Josh. v. 1 with their "passing over": "till Thy people pass over"; "until we were passed over".

The baptism of Israel "unto Moses" was that of the entire nation. "Not a hoof" was left behind in Egypt (Exod. x. 26). "I would not have you ignorant, how ALL our fathers were under the cloud, and ALL passed through the sea; and were ALL baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea" (I Cor. x. 1, 2). It was the baptism of the whole nation. As a solemn background to this baptism was the Passover, and the fact that gave the Passover such significance "there was not a house where there was not one dead" (Exod. xii. 30), either a firstborn in the houses of Egypt or a Lamb instead in the houses of Israel. The baptism unto Moses was a symbolic setting forth of this great fact.

> "Know ye not that so many of us as were baptized INTO Jesus Christ were baptized INTO His death . . . . . buried with Him by baptism unto death" (Rom. vi. 4).

We must now turn our attention to the baptism of Israel at the Jordan under Joshua.

> "Moses is dead: now therefore ARISE" (Josh. i. 2).

Here the Hebrew word kum is translated "arise", the word used by the Saviour when He said Talitha cumi (Mark v. 41). "Within THREE DAYS" (Josh. i. 11). Here, resurrection is set forth in type. "Thou and ALL this people" (Josh. i. 2), here is the same emphasis upon "All" that we found to be true at the Red Sea.

The crossing of the Jordan is described in Josh. iii. 1 to v. 12, and by eliminating every reference but the barest minimum, we find the following items standing out as of first importance.

The Magnifying of Joshua. "This day will I begin to magnify thee" (iii. 7). "On that day the Lord magnified Joshua" (iv. 14).

The Command to the Priests. "Stand still" (iii. 8) "come up" (iv. 15-17).

The Twelve Stones. "What mean ye?" (iv. 1-10, 19-23).

The Magnifying of Joshua anticipates the exaltation of the Saviour at the resurrection. The LXX uses the Greek word hupsoo to translate the Hebrew word for "magnify" here, and this word is found in Isa lii. 13 "He shall be exalted and extolled and be very high", and is used by Peter when he said "Him hath God exalted with His right hand" (Acts v. 31, also ii. 33).

The twofold command to the Priests stresses two great doctrinal facts:

(1) "Stand still"; "stood firm"; "until everything was finished"; "When all the people were clean passed over" (iii. 8, 17; iv. 10, 11). Here we have the finished work of Christ set forth as the basis of all that follows.
(2) "Come up out of Jordan."

> "When the soles of the priests' feet were lifted up unto the dry land, the waters of Jordan returned unto their place" (iv. 16-18).

It may be that the reader mentally questioned our right to use the word "baptism" in connexion with the crossing of Jordan. Our justification is that the LXX translators have used the verb bapto in translating Josh. iii. 15:

> "And as they that bare the ark were come unto Jordan, and the feet of the priests were dipped bapto (LXX) in the brim of the water . . . . . that the waters which came down from above stood and rose up upon an heap very far off, at the city called Adam (Massoretic marginal reading), and those that came down toward the sea of the plain, even the salt sea, failed, and were cut off" (Josh. iii. 15, 16).

Waters cut off "from Adam to the Dead Sea". Who that knows the teaching of Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39 can deny the prescience of inspired Scripture, or the fullness of the O.T. types? The testimony of the twelve stones. Twelve is the number of Israel.

> "Now therefore, take you twelve men out of the tribes of Israel, out of every tribe a man" (Josh. iii. 12, so also iv. 2).

Each of these twelve representative men who passed over before the ark and from the midst of Jordan took up a stone "according to the number of the children of Israel" (Josh. iv. 4, 5, 8). These stones were taken "out of the place where the priests' feet stood firm" (Josh. iv. 3). But the place of these stones was to be occupied by "other twelve stones" (LXX) in the midst of Jordan where the feet of the priests stood. These were set up by Joshua himself, and the record says: "they are there unto this day" (Josh. iv. 9).

It is illuminating to observe that what the twelve representative men did, is said to have been done by "the children of Israel" (Josh. iv. 8). This principle has already met us in the Passover that preceded the baptism unto Moses "The whole assembly of the congregation of Israel shall kill IT in the evening" (Exod. xii. 6).

The two sets of twelve stones provide us with an instance of the use of a double type where death and resurrection have to be indicated. As it is not possible for these twelve stones to be in two places at the same time, the transfer from the river bed to the dry land, and the transfer from the dry land to the river bed, does bring before the mind the truth that they who are "raised with Christ" are also those who were "buried with Him by baptism".

These stones are said to have been "pitched" in Gilgal (Josh. iv. 20). This word "pitch" must not be confused with the words that indicate the pitching a camp, for which chanah and natah are used, the Hebrew word translated "pitch" here is kum "to stand up", "to arise" which we have already noted in Josh. i. 2. That these twelve stones had an important symbolic teaching is evident by the fact that provision is made for the time when the children should ask "what mean ye be these stones?" Just as Col. ii. links spiritual circumcision with spiritual baptism, so here at the Jordan, circumcision immediately follows the crossing of the Jordan, and this in connexion with the teaching that we are seeking to establish, namely, that the baptism unto Moses and the baptism at Jordan are intentionally linked together, the interval of human frailty and law being as it were cancelled. This truth is expressed in the words of Josh. v. 2 "The second time". By reading Josh. v. 4-7 we learn that this circumcision "the second time" referred to the children that had been born in the wilderness "by the way as they came forth out of Egypt". This typical resumption is the more enforced by the words of verse seven "their children, whom He raised up in their stead". The "breach of promise" (Numb. xiv. 34) being healed, Joshua fulfils that which was commenced but never finished by Moses.

Lest any reader should feel that all this reference to O.T. types is contrary to the exclusive character of the Mystery, we would remind ourselves that the Mystery does not consist of the basis doctrines of redemption and justification, nor even of the doctrine of identification as taught in Rom. v. and vi. These are fundamental to the Mystery, but are not the Mystery itself.

We can bring to bear upon this O.T. teaching concerning baptism the argument of Gal. iii. 17-19, changing the terms from that which deals with the promise made to Abraham 430 years before the law, to that which deals with the one great initial baptism at the Red Sea.

> "And this I say, that the baptism of all Israel unto Moses at the Red Sea, temporarily suspended, and resumed by the baptism of all Israel at the crossing of the Jordan, this initial baptism which was 430 years from the call of Abraham, and two years before the setting up of the tabernacle with its 'baptisms and carnal ordinances, imposed until the time of reformation' which, as Gal. iii. 19 reveals were 'superseded' (prosetethe), these baptisms cannot displace the initial baptism at the Red Sea, which will be most gloriously fulfilled when every ordinance has passed away."

We must never omit from our consideration that baptism which the Lord spoke of, long after He had been baptized in the waters of Jordan. That too is beyond the fluctuation of dispensational changes, and gives meaning even to the carnal and passing ordinance. Yet one more note. The reader may have met at times some such question as the following:

Consider this group of names: Shakespeare, Browning, Gladstone and Byron. Which name is an intruder? Naturally, Gladstone, for he was a politician, the other being poets. So also can we propound a question.

Crucifixion, Death, Baptism, Quickening, Raising, Seating, Manifesting with Christ. Which word is an intruder? Again the answer is obvious. To put an ordinance into this series is to intrude. It must be substituted by the word Burial, and all is harmony. Here then is light upon "baptism" wherein the believer is "buried" and reckoned "with Christ" both in death and in resurrection.

The baptisms of water, whether the carnal ordinances of the law imposed on Israel until the time of reformation, the baptism of repentance of John the Baptist, or the baptism as practiced by the Pentecostal Church, have been allowed by orthodoxy to eclipse the only baptism that matters, namely that baptism toward which the Lord Himself looked, long after His baptism at Jordan (Luke xii. 50).

This is the baptism of the Spirit, the baptism that is associated with the One Body (Eph. iv. 5), the baptism that fulfils all that the baptism unto Moses and Joshua foreshadowed and more. To introduce the rite of baptism in water into such a passage as Rom. vi. or Col. ii. is not only an anachronism, it is an intrusion, dispensationally untrue and consequently dangerous. Let us try the things that differ, and hold fast that which is good.

No.7. The Fourth Reckoning.
"Quickened together with Christ."
pp. 235 - 238

It is a common mistake, when enumerating the steps that link the cross with the future manifestation in glory, to step from union in death with Christ, to being raised with Him, "Crucified with Him, dead with Him, buried with Him, and raised with Him", but by so doing, we omit the first great anticipatory "reality". The next rung in this ladder of life is given in Eph. ii. It is "quickened with Him", and this precedes being raised with Him, and is experience here and now.

"Even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ" (Eph. ii. 5).

The word translated "quicken together" is suzoopoieo, and occurs only in Eph. ii. 5 and Col. ii. 13, its composition being obvious. The word zoopoieo to make alive, or to quicken, occurs twelve times in the Greek N.T., three of which occurrences are found in John's Gospel, one in Peter's first epistle, and eight in the epistles of Paul, of which seven occurrences are found in the epistles written before Acts xxviii., and one only afterwards.

Zoopoieo is used six times in the LXX, where it is set forth as the prerogative of God (Neh. ix. 6); and withheld from "the wicked" (Job xxxvi. 6).

The way in which this word is employed by the Apostle Paul, will prepare our minds for its application in Eph. ii. 5 and Col. ii. 13.

(1) It is of the very nature of God as the God of our salvation, that He be believed on as "God Who quickeneth the dead" (Rom. iv. 17). It was this faith that justified Abraham.
(2) It is of the very nature of the Law and the Old Covenant, that they could neither justify nor "give life" (Gal. iii. 21; II Cor. iii. 6).
(3) It is of the very nature of this "quickening" that it be associated with the resurrection brought in by Christ as the second Man and the last Adam (I Cor. xv. 22, 36 and 45).
(4) It is of the very nature of the life we "now live in the flesh" after having believed in the Lord Jesus Christ, that this life should be an anticipation of the future resurrection here and now, "but if the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by His Spirit that dwelleth in you" (Rom. viii. 11).

In the two epistles Ephesians and Colossians, the word zoe "life" occurs but three times.

(1) "Alienated from the life of God" (Eph. iv. 18); the condition of all men by nature.
(2) "Your life", "our life" (Col. iii. 3, 4). Here Christ is revealed as our life, this life is hid with Christ in God, and our manifestation with Him in glory will not take place until He Himself is manifested.

So far we have attempted to catch the outstanding characteristics of this word, we must now come closer to its contexts in Ephesians and Colossians.

The translation of Eph. ii. 1-5 found in the A.V. and the R.V. robs the believer both of the intended association of this passage with Rom. vi., and of the fact that Paul here is not speaking of the sinner's state by nature, but of the believer's standing in grace. He is not speaking of death IN sins, but of death TO sins. This we must examine and establish before we can proceed.

First, let us set out the Greek original so that it can be referred to by the English reader:

Kai humas ontas nekrous tois paraptomasi kai tais hamartiais.

Secondly, let us give a word for word literal rendering:

"And you being dead ones to the trespasses and to the sins."

The words that demand particular attention are (1) ontas "being" and (2) tois . . . . . tais "to".

There is no reticence noticeable on the part of the Apostle in his employment of the preposition en "in". Wherever its use is needed the preposition is employed, and that repeatedly. It occurs twenty-eight times in the first chapter of Ephesians and is translated "at", "with", "in", and "wherein"; and twenty-eight times in the second chapter, where it is translated "wherein", "in", "among", "through", "at", "by" and "thereby". The fact that Paul employs the preposition so frequently in these passages, when set over against the other fact that he does not use the preposition in Eph. ii. 1 and 5, should at least make us pause. When the Lord desired to speak of the state of "being dead IN sins" the preposition en is used (John viii. 21, 24) and when the Apostle uses the hypothetical argument of I Cor. xv. 17 he uses the preposition en. The reader may ask, what warrant is there in Eph. ii. 1 to use the word "in" in the translation? The answer is, that the dative case, indicated by tois. . . . . tais can be so translated where the subject demands it, but in the majority of cases, the dative is better expressed by such words as "to" or "at".

It may be that not every reader of these lines will be clear as to what is meant by the "dative case", and we are sure that those who do know, will be the first to join us in our desire to make this feature as plain as our limited space will permit.

First, as to the word "case". This word is not to be confused with a word of the same spelling which is derived from the Latin capio "to hold" and so a case, as in the word "suit-case"; it is derived from the Latin casus "a chance", from cado "to fall". When we use the term "dative case", we must remember that the nominative, or the subject of the sentence was conceived as being upright and that other relations indicated by the genitive, the accusative and the dative, were thought of as deflections from the upright and hence called "cases". It will be perceived that to speak of the nominative case is rather like saying "the upright deflection". The word "dative" from the Latin word datives means "giving", is so named, because when we say, for example "give me the book", we actually mean "give TO me the book". "The fundamental conception of the dative is juxtaposition . . . . . hence the dative is diametrically opposed to the genitive" (Farrar). So, the dative is employed with en "in" whereas the genitive would be used with ek "out".

When Paul wanted to say "to the saints" he wrote tois hagiois (Eph. i. 1) and when he wanted to say "in the saints" he wrote en tois hagiois (Eph. i. 18). We therefore believe that the omission of en from Eph. ii. 1 and 5 is intentional, that the Apostle did not speak of the unbeliever's dreadful condition of being "dead IN trespasses and sins" but rather of the believer's blessed liberation "being dead TO trespasses and sins". This however is by no means proof, so we continue.

In I Pet. ii. 24 we read "that we being dead to sins should live unto righteousness". Here the Greek reads tais hamartiais, which the reader can compare with the last two words of the Greek of Eph. ii. 1 set out on page 236. It would be monstrous to translate this blessed passage in Peter "that you being dead IN sins, should live unto righteousness". This is not all. The same grammatical form meets us in Rom. vi. with the one difference that the word is in the singular "sin" and not in the plural "sins".

"We that are dead TO sin" te hamartia (Rom. vi. 2).
"He died UNTO sin once" te hamartia (Rom. vi. 10).
"Dead indeed UNTO sin" te hamartia (Rom. vi. 11).

It is absolutely impossible to use the words "IN sin" in these passages; to attempt it in verse two would be nonsense, and in verse 10 blasphemy.

The Apostle in Eph. ii. 1 and 5 is building upon the great teaching of Rom. vi. There "sin" and "the old man" are in view, whereas in Ephesians "trespasses and sins" are in view. The "old man" together with his "former conversation" as Eph. iv. 22 puts it, thereby carrying the teaching one stage further from the doctrinal, into the practical realm along the path of complete emancipation. Before we leave Eph. ii., we must notice the verb that is translated "were" in verses one and five. There is no possibility of a difference of opinion here. The word ontas is the present participle of the verb eimi, and in English reads "being". One error is productive of others. When once the translation has been adopted "dead IN sins" it was manifestly impossible to put into the epistle of Paul "And you BEING dead IN sins" without complicating the argument and distorting the doctrine, consequently the present participle is translated "were", yet two wrongs do not make a right, and the only translation that abides by the language of inspiration is that offered "and you being dead to" indicating the present condition of the believer by grace.

We must now turn to the parallel passage in Col. ii. In the Received Text the preposition en "in" is found in verse thirteen which justifies the translation "dead IN your sins". Lightfoot's comment is: "the en of the received text, though highly supported, is doubtless an interpolation for the sake of grammatical clearness." En is not found in either the Vatican or the Sinaitic manuscripts, and the Numeric New Testament omits it.

The whole of the context is against the idea that the believer's state by nature "dead in sins" is in view; rather it is his standing in grace; he had died to these things.

> "And you, being dead (here the A.V. translates ontas correctly) to trespasses and to the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath He quickened together with Him, having forgiven you all trespasses" (Col. ii. 13).

To appreciate in any measure of fullness this passage in Col. ii., necessitates an acquaintance with the structure of Col. ii. 4-23, some knowledge of the incipient agnosticism that was at work, and the place that philosophy, religion and the rudiments occupied in the Colossian conception of the faith, but such vast themes are entirely beyond the range of the present series. To all such the believer died with Christ, and the life that he now lives "with" Him, is for ever free from bondage of all such rudimentary religion that can only operate in the realm of the flesh, but can never intrude into that newness of life into which the believer even now enters by faith in glad anticipation of the day of reality, when He Who is our LIFE shall be manifested, and we be manifested with Him in glory.

The SECOND EPISTLE to TIMOTHY.

No.44. Paul and the heavenly kingdom (iv. 19).

pp. 11 - 15

The "exigencies of time and space", to use a journalistic cliché, prevented us from doing more than quote the apostle's closing doxology, as he reviewed the past, rose triumphant over the present, and confidently looked forward to the future.

The circumstances are too solemn to permit us to discuss his last words so unceremoniously, and we therefore take up our study where we left it in the preceding article.

"And the Lord shall deliver me."

Paul's earlier testimony to the Lord's deliverance was threefold (II Cor. i. 10), and his closing testimony was threefold (II Tim. iii. 11; iv. 17, 18).

> "We were pressed out of measure, above strength, insomuch that we despaired even of life; but we had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God which raiseth the dead; Who delivered us from so great a death, and doth deliver: in Whom we trust that He will yet deliver" (II Cor. i. 8-10).

Here is deliverance, past, present and future. It was a deliverance from "so great a death", from a pressure that was "out of measure" and "above strength", and although the two words translated "sentence" ("answer" in the margin of II Cor. i.) and "answer" in II Cor. i. and II Tim. iv. are not the same, they both breathe the atmosphere of the law court with its grim possibilities. This early threefold deliverance took place "in Asia". Its memory encouraged the apostle when he was "in Rome". The threefold deliverance of II Timothy takes a wider sweep. It goes back to the beginning of Paul's ministry, and it appears at the end.

A Past Deliverance. "Persecutions, afflictions, which came unto me at Antioch, at Iconium and Lystra; what persecutions I endured; but out of them all the Lord delivered me" (II Tim. iii. 11).

A Present Deliverance. "I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion" (II Tim. iv. 17).

A Future Deliverance. "The Lord shall delivered me from every evil work" (II Tim. iv. 18).

What did the apostle mean by "every evil work"? Such an expression hardly fits such a deliverance as "out of the mouth of the lion", "work" rather looks to the deeds of the individual himself. It cannot mean the attack of evil men, or the course of his trial before Nero, for he was not "delivered" from these. Paul's concern was not so much with the attacks of evil men upon himself, but with his own faithfulness, even unto death. He had previously written:

> "If we suffer, we shall also reign with Him; if we deny Him, He also will deny us" (II Tim. ii. 12).

He looked forward to that "crown", and the deliverance he prayed for was not from the hands of men, but from the slightest denial that he might be tempted to make of his Lord. Those of our readers who have ever stood before an earthly tribunal, who have had the well bring of self and loved ones in their hands, need no reminder of the strength of that temptation that presents itself to temporize, to compromise, in other words "to deny" one's Lord or calling. And if by grace one has emerged from such an ordeal, with the veriest rags of decency left, no one who knows his own heart, could ever adopt boastful language, but would rather see in one's "stand", a "deliverance" from oneself, a "deliverance" from an "evil work" indeed.

Paul makes it clear that "profession" "works" and "denial" go together, for writing to Titus he said:

> "They profess that they know God, but in works they deny Him."

Moreover, the passage in Titus adds the words:

> "and unto every work reprobate" (Titus i. 16), which is the very opposite of the word rendered "approved" in II Tim. ii. 15, and is translated "castaway" in connexion with being "disqualified" for the crown in the Greek races (I Cor. ix. 24-27). In view of "that day" Paul saw the whole of Christian service as "work", and that:

> "Every man's work shall be made manifest . . . . . every man's work of what sort it is" (I Cor. iii. 13).

The "works" that occupy the apostle in his last epistle are:

(1) The works of the flesh which are entirely set aside in the scheme of gospel grace (II Tim. i. 9).
(2) "Good works" which sum up acceptable service and for which the Scriptures equip (II Tim. ii. 21; iii. 17).
(3) "The work of an evangelist", the "full proof" or goal of Timothy's ministry (II Tim. iv. 5).
(4) The "works" of Alexander the coppersmith which will come up for "reward" either of gain or loss in "that day" and,
(5) "Every evil work" that would militate against the apostle's own perseverance and loyalty to the end (II Tim. iv. 18).

The apostle had the choice of several words to express the "evil" character of the works from which he trusted for deliverance: kakos, poneros, adikos, phaulos.

These four words have slightly different meanings which should be observed when translating or interpreting any given passage. Kakos indicates something useless, unsuitable, bad, whereas poneros is positive and means something dangerous, injurious or evil. Poneros ascribes quality as regards effects, kakos looks rather to quality as regards nature. Kakos differs from adikos "as state differs from conduct" (Cremer). Phaulos (Titus ii. 8) means "light", "worthless". The word used in II Tim. iv. 14 is kakos, but in II Tim. iv. 18 it is poneros.

> "In a moral sense—bad, evil, answering somewhat to the German unnütz, useless, what is good for nothing. It is therefore in Greek, in the first place, the opposite of chrestos, as applied to persons who diligently follow their calling, and thus support themselves, e.g. of a clever housewife, good parents, good citizens" (Cremer).

Paul dreaded those things which would spoil his position as a vessel "meet for the master's use" euchrestos (II Tim. ii. 21), or render him unprofitable for the ministry achrestos (iv. 11). He had waned against the "striving about words to no profit", in contrast with showing oneself "approved" (ii. 14, 15), and "profit" here is cherismos.

It is evident therefore that when the apostle speaks of "evil work", he has in mind own perseverance and loyalty to the Lord and His word, unshaken by desertion, betrayal or death. This "deliverance" is followed by another step along the road to glory:

> "And will preserve me unto His heavenly kingdom" (II Tim. iv. 18).

The word translated "preserve" is sozo the simple verb "to save". Salvation not only deals with the initial act of grace whereby sinners are saved (I Tim. i. 15), it covers the whole redeeming process from the deliverance from bondage of sin to the final deliverance from the bondage of corruption. Moreover, there is never absent from sozo its primary meaning of "health" and "soundness". When Peter said to Israel "Neither is there salvation in any other" (Acts iv. 12) he referred to the type of their salvation that was immediately before them, using the verb sozo in the sentence "By what means he is made whole" (Acts iv. 9).

The three opening references to sozo in the N.T. as we possess it are Matt. i. 21, viii. 25, and ix. 21, and they give us in turn salvation "from sin", salvation "from peril" and salvation "from bodily disease". Paul therefore, knowing the full meaning of the verb "to save", uses it of the end of his course as he does for its beginning (I Tim. i. 15).

A believer can be "saved, yet so as by fire" (I Cor. iii. 15), he could also obtain that salvation which is accompanied with "eternal glory" (II Tim. ii. 10). The apostle endured what he did so that this blessed result may be the lot of those who believed, and he desired that he might also endure to the end so that after heralding to others, he himself should not be disqualified (I Cor. ix. 27). Here, in II Tim. iv., there are no doubts. The Lord did deliver. He will "save to the uttermost", save right to the full end, as panteles "uttermost" literally means, save so that Paul shall be able to say I have finished (teleo), I shall be numbered among those that are "perfect" (Phil. iii. 12, teleioo).

The full sentence in which sozo appears is:

> "And will preserve me unto His heavenly kingdom" (II Tim. iv. 18).

Let us not lose "things" by endeavouring to preserve "words". In order to differentiate between that body of truth which deals with Israel and the kingdom, and that body of truth which deals with the Church, it has been found convenient to use two terms "Kingdom truth" and "Church truth". Now these terms are good servants but bad masters.

While the kingdom of Israel differs exceedingly from the Church of the Mystery, we must not blind our eyes to the fact that the whole of the nation of Israel was a "church" in the sense, that "ecclesia" means a company of people "called out" and separated for a special purpose. So, Israel is called "the church in the wilderness" by Stephen (Acts vii. 38), and in the Gospel of the Kingdom, with Peter receiving the keys of the "kingdom" of heaven, Christ speaks about His "church". Again, while the Church of the mystery is completely separated by calling, sphere and constitution, from the kingdom of Israel, yet the apostle does not hesitate to speak of the kingdom in these epistles of the mystery.

The Colossian saints had been translated "into the kingdom of God's dear Son" (Col. i. 13), and the Ephesian believer had been warned against possible forfeiture of the "inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God" (Eph. v. 5). Paul charges Timothy to faithfulness, in view of the Lord's "appearing" and "kingdom", at that appearing Paul himself expected a "crown", and those who endured expected "to reign", and having finished his course he was looking forward to his place in the "heavenly kingdom". Every department of God's administration is within His kingdom. Israel on the earth, the seed of Abraham in the Heavenly City, the Church of the One Body "in heavenly places" all are departments in the kingdom of Christ and of God. Paul did not merely say "kingdom" in II Tim. iv. 18. He said "heavenly" kingdom, even as he had linked the "kingdom" in the first verse with the "appearing".

And so, with a doxology, the weary but happy warrior sheathes his sword: "To whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen."

We are sure that no one would have intruded at this glorious climax an argument as to whether the word aion means "an age", whether there is an end suggested to the glory that is here ascribed—such things would be an impertinence. This age, this present evil age (II Tim. iv. 10) which had ensnared Demas, was soon to pass. Another age was coming in which sin, death and curse should be for ever removed. "That day" and "the ages of the ages" might differ, but they were united in the one glorious sense that they stood for complete emancipation, glorious triumph, blessed and eternal fellowship, and reward outweighing the heaviest of earthly trials.

Here again we must pause. The apostle stoops down yet once again to things of earth before he comes to a finish, and we will defer our conclusion, so that we may bide with him to "the last hour of act".

No.45. Demas, Titus, Luke, Mark. Those who leave, those who abide and those who arrive (iv. 9 - 22). The Closing hours of a devoted life.

pp. 26 - 29

The reader will remember that the very fact that Paul said nothing about Demas in Col. iv., was an indication that he could not say anything good.

We are told why Demas forsook Paul, he "loved this present world". Why he went to Thessalonica we can only conjecture. The apostle tells us that he had sent Tychicus to Ephesus (II Tim. iv. 12) and that he had left Trophimus at Miletus sick. These are therefore accounted for. We have a sinking at heart however when we read straight on from the betrayal of Demas, without comment or qualification. "Crescens to Galatia, Titus unto Dalmatia" (II Tim. iv. 10). The verb that one naturally supplies is the word used of Demas who "departed" to Thessalonica.

> Demas "departed" to Thessalonica,
> Crescens "departed" to Galatia,
> Titus "departed" to Dalmatia.

We know nothing of Crescens, but Titus we do know. He had, the years before, been summoned from Crete to join the apostle at Nicopolis (Titus iii. 12). Dalmatia lies North of Nicopolis, and it may have been that Paul's determination to winter at Nicopolis was cut short by the Roman authorities, and that Titus had continued on from Nicopolis to Dalmatia, to complete the work in Illyricum which the apostle then knew that he himself would never finish. Possibly Paul linked Demas and Titus together, not because they had both forsaken him, but that for whatever reason, good or bad, he was deprived of their fellowship and presence.

Demas had gone, so had Crescens, so had Titus. One after another had been called upon to leave him. Sickness had claimed Trophimus, and for some unexplained reason Erasmus abode at Corinth, where he had been Chamberlain (Rom. xvi. 23).

"Only Luke is with me."

Paul was not only in deadly peril, but so also would all be who sought him out and associated with him.

> "Christianity had been pronounced a crime against the State, and an 'outrage against humanity'." (Tac. Ann.).

No longer did Paul enjoy the fellowship of friends as he had in the previous imprisonment at Rome. He now suffered as a "malefactor". One by one his friends forsook him. "All in Asia have left me." First Phygellus and Hermogenes, then Demas, and Luke alone left—loyal, faithful, unobtrusive Luke!

Luke's appearance in the Acts of the Apostles is indicated by the presence of the pronoun "we", he joined the apostle at Troas after he had seen the vision of the man of Macedonia (xvi. 10). Luke apparently continued with Paul until he left Philippi (xvii. 1). He rejoined the apostle at Philippi (xx. 5) and continued with him until he arrived at Jerusalem (xxi. 18). He again enters the narrative at Acts xxvii. 1, continuing with the apostle right through to Rome and remained with him there while he wrote the epistles to the Colossians and Philemon, and is found with him at the end*. (* See "The Apostle of the Reconciliation", p.6, the "We" sections.)

Timothy alone of all Paul's fellow-workers appears to have been dearest to Paul. Luke was his physician, Luke was his biographer, and Luke was his cheer. Whether his eyes ever again beheld the face of his beloved son in the faith—whether winter or death intervened before Timothy could reach Rome—we know not, but we are particularly sure that among the last of human faces upon which Paul's eyes rested before they closed in glorious martyrdom, was the face of Luke the beloved, Luke the loyal, Luke the unobtrusive. That Luke was a physician, is proved beyond question by his choice of words, words found in the medical works of Hippocrates, Aretaeus, Galen and Dioscorides, covering a period from B.C.460 to 100-200A.D.

A very full examination of Luke's medical language will be found in the book of Hobart on the medical terms used by Luke, and in our own book "The Apostle of the Reconciliation", pages 11 and 12 we have given seventeen examples.

It is not proper or possible to write here concerning our own selves and our witness over these forty years, but those few who really know the inner history of this testimony*, and the Lord Himself Who has watched over it all this time, they know that history has repeated itself, and that if there have been those like Phygellus, Hermogenes and Demas who have, for various reasons, failed us, and if there have been those like Alexander the coppersmith who have opposed us, there have been those who most certainly have filled the role of Luke the beloved physician, Tychicus a beloved brother, faithful minister and fellow servant, Timothy the son in the faith, the homely fellowship of Priscilla and Aquila and others of Paul's stalwart friends.

[* - Some idea may be obtained by reading the series "Less Than the Least", Volume XXXV.]

> "Take Mark and bring him with thee: for he is profitable to me for the ministry" (II Tim. iv. 11).

In direct contrast with Demas, is Mark, and it is noteworthy that Demas is never mentioned without Mark's name being associated with him (Col. iv. 14; Philemon 24 and II Tim. iv. 10, 11).

Demas is an example of one who did run well but who failed to finish the course. Mark is an encouragement to those timid souls who make a poor show at the start, yet who grow in grace and come out into clear light and testimony at the end. Mark had already been commended to the church by the apostle:

> "Marcus sister's son to Barnabas (touching whom ye received commandments: if he come unto you receive him)" (Col. iv. 10).

The inclusion of Barnabas here, plainly refers back to the incident recorded in Acts xv. 36-39. There, Mark had turned back when he learned the project to enter Pamphylia, now he stood boldly by the side of the imprisoned apostle. The incident illumines the character of more than that of Mark. Peter, with whom Mark had laboured, had evidently helped the younger man and had certainly not prejudiced him against Paul. It throws light, too, upon the nature of Paul, who did not hesitate to commend and accept the services of the selfsame man on account of whose departure, at Perga, he had sacrificed the friendship of Barnabas. Tradition is unanimous that Mark was the companion and interpreter of Peter. Peter was in the habit of visiting the house of Mark's mother (Acts xii. 12), and there the young disciple would learn most of the facts which he was afterwards inspired to place in the "Gospel" that bears his name. Jerome wrote concerning the office that Titus filled in service to Paul as compared with that of Mark:

> "Therefore he had Titus for a secretary, and the blessed Peter had Mark, whose Gospel was composed by him after the dictation of Peter."

Thus, in the prison cell at Rome there gathered with the apostle of the Gentiles, Luke who wrote his gospel to a Gentile "Theophilus", and had the Gentiles in mind all the time, as a comparison with Matthew will reveal, and Mark, who wrote his gospel, presumably for those Gentiles who had become attached to the kingdom ministry of Peter, as a comparison of his gospel with that of Matthew will show. Who can estimate the worth or the fruit of the written testimony of these three men who at the time were despised, ill-treated and reckoned of no possible account.

"But Tychicus have I sent to Ephesus." The "but" suggests a contrast between those mentioned before, who were absent, and Tychicus who had definitely been sent by the apostle. There is every reason to believe that Timothy was at Ephesus when this second epistle was written to him.

In II Tim. i. 16-18 and iv. 19 the reference to the household of Onesiphorus and his ministry at Ephesus, certainly suggests that that city was his home. In ii. 17 Hymenæus, the teacher, and in iv. 14 Alexander the coppersmith, are mentioned separately, but in I Tim. i. 20 they are mentioned together, and Alexander figures in the riot at Ephesus (Acts xix. 33). Timothy, at the time of writing, was evidently not far from Troas (II Tim. iv. 13) and would have to pass through this city if he were journeying from Ephesus to Rome.

The last notice of Mark was a recommendation of him to the church at Colosse (Col. iv. 10), and Paul assumes in his second epistle, that Timothy would find Mark near at hand. With all the anxiety which his own personal affairs brought, Paul is seen here still mindful of the stewardship with which he had been entrusted and while not hesitating to call Timothy to his side, did not omit to provide another faithful minister in his place.

There was still an amount of important matter to be considered as the apostle drew near to the conclusion of his life's work. The next to be mentioned by name is Alexander, who did Paul much evil. But let us leave the apostle with his beloved friend Luke to solace and cheer, eagerly expecting the coming of his son Timothy and of Mark, with Tychicus already on his way to Ephesus to fill the breach.

The sands of time are sinking, but the last word has not yet been said, let us therefore devote one more article at least to these precious moments, before we say "Hail and farewell" to one of the noblest servants that ever followed Christ.

No.46. Hail and Farewell (iv. 19 - 22).
pp. 74 - 78

It is fitting that the dispensation which opened so far as its inspired literature is concerned, with the words "Blessed be God" (Eph. i. 3), should end with the doxology with which preceding study closed (II Tim. iv. 18).

This epistle, however, is not the only one where the heart of the apostle as it were overflows and compels him to add to his "last" word. The reader will remember that in Philippians the apostle said "finally" twice, and that in Romans, there is a doxology in chapters i. 25, ix. 5, xi. 36, and that he appears to come to a conclusion twice before actually doing so (Rom. xv. 33, xvi. 20 and 27). Ephesians pronounces a doxology in the middle of the epistle (iii. 21), and Philippians ends in much the same way as does II Timothy, for after the doxology of Phil. iv. 20, the apostle sends his salutations and benedictions to every saint in Christ Jesus (iv. 21-22). Paul was a man of thanksgiving, every epistle except that to the Galatians contain the words eucharisteo, echo charin, eucharistos, eucharistia or charis, 45 references in all. Paul had "endured to the end", and a thankful spirit was no small contribution to his success. Even on the lower plane of life, it is true that:

"A merry heart goes all the day,
Your sad tires in a mile-a."

Not only was Paul a man who gave thanks on every possible occasion, he was a man who loved those who had been given into his charge, so that they were in his mind and heart, night and day. For some of us it would have been impossible to step down from the heights of II Tim. iv. 18, to think of sending greetings to a few believers, but it is the very essence of the apostle's conception of grace that he could and did mingle the sublime with the homely. It would, we believe, have been a cause of great grief to him, had he forgotten the simple salutation to "Prisca and Aquila". They had come into his life when he first set foot in Corinth (Acts xviii. 2) and their home had provided not only a shelter for the apostle himself, but an opportunity to earn a meager livelihood "with his own hands", and so maintain that independence which he perceived was essential in his ministry at Corinth (II Cor. xi. 7-11). In the hour of his own peril, he would remember that to this devoted pair both he and the Church of the Gentiles owed much, for, sending them greetings at the close of the epistle to the Romans, he said:

> "Greet Priscilla and Aquila my helpers in Christ Jesus; who have for my life laid down their own necks: unto whom not only I give thanks, but also all the churches of the Gentiles" (Rom. xvi. 3, 4).

How blessedly unconscious of an "halo" was the apostle! For in this hour of death, forsaken by most and in extreme distress, his irrepressible spirit bubbled over, and he used the familiar pet name "Prisca" for the "proper" name Priscilla! What volumes might be filled at the writing of such a name at such a moment! Who, but the simply great, would combine martyrdom and pet names, without some sense of the unseemly! Yet so complete is the Apostle's trust, so victorious his hope, he can slip from the doxology to endearment without the slightest self consciousness, and God has preserved the record for all time among His sacred Scriptures. The fact that Paul salutes "the household of Onesiphorus" suggests that Onesiphorus was either deceased or away from home. After Onesiphorus, the apostle speaks of Erastus and of his abiding at Corinth. We know nothing of the motives that moved Erastus, we can only ponder the statement and leave it there. This reference to Erastus however will prove to be an important item when we endeavour to arrive at a conclusion of the vexed question concerning Paul's imprisonment. Some contend that Paul's imprisonment at Rome, as narrated in the twenty-eighth of Acts, ended in his martyrdom. Some contend that Paul was liberated, and that during that interval he wrote the first epistle to Timothy and the epistle to Titus, and that he was subsequently apprehended, taken back to Rome, imprisoned as an evil-doer, condemned and executed.

We hope to take up these epistles (I Timothy and Titus) as a sequel to the study now drawing to a close and we may then give all the available arguments that are at our disposal in settling this important matter.

The fact that Trophimus had been left at Miletum, sick, coupled with the fact that Epaphroditus had been sick nigh unto death (Phil. ii. 27), and that Timothy suffered "often infirmities" (I Tim. v. 23), is an indication that a change of dispensation had occurred since the miracles of healing were wrought in Melita (Acts xxviii. 1-10), after the setting aside of Israel and their hope (xxviii. 20, 25), and the sending of salvation to the Gentiles subsequent to this crisis (xxviii. 28).

The recognition of the dispensational boundary of Acts xxviii. and the vital association of Paul's imprisonment with the new dispensation of the mystery, has been the warp and woof of our ministry since the first line of The Berean Expositor was penned. We have given Acts xxviii. a detailed examination in the series devoted to the Acts of the Apostles, to which we refer the interested reader. Paul not only sends greetings himself but he mentions by name a number of believers at Rome who join with him in saluting the saints. Before he mentions this however, he reverts to the overwhelming desire that he had to see Timothy, saying:

> "Do thy diligence to come before winter" (II Tim. iv. 21).

Then come salutations from Eubulus, Pudens, Linus and Claudia, besides all the brethren. Of Eubulus nothing is known, except that he was a fellow-worker with Paul, and honoured by having his name included in the epistle. Linus was the name of the first bishop of Rome, and Irenæus says that Linus was succeeded by Anacletus, and in the third place from the apostles Clement received the Episcopate of the city, a person who had beheld the blessed apostles, and had enjoyed intercourse with them, and had their preaching still sounding in his ears (Irenæus 3:3).

> "Who was Claudia who is here connected with Pudens and Linus? Was she the daughter of Cogidunus king of the Regni, now Surrey and Sussex? or was she the daughter of Caractacus, the renowed British chieftain?" (Lewin).

"The Companion Bible" has the following note:

> "Pudens and Claudia are supposed by some to be husband and wife, and have been identified with Titus Claudius and Claudius Quinctilia, whose inscription over a child they lost has been discovered near Rome."

At Chichester has been found an inscription which speaks of one Pudens, in conjunction with King Cogidunus, dated when Nero was Consul for the fourth time, namely 60-68A.D. Claudia of II Tim. iv. is identified by some with a British Princess whom Pudens married, daughter of either the British king Cogidunus or Caractacus. There is a good deal of conjecture in this identification and we can only look upon the two names in II Tim. iv. with interest, in that it may have been, that the apostle Paul while at Rome made the acquaintance of a Princess from our own shores, and that the Church in Rome met at times under the roof that sheltered one of our own race. In ancient British tradition Linus is said to be the Llin of Welsh Hagiography, the son of Caractacus, and so the brother of Claudia. These traditions and suggestions are interesting, but they do not form part of our faith. The Lord knows the individuals which Paul has here named, and there will be no mistaken identities in "that day".

Whether Timothy ever reached Rome in time, we do not know, whether Paul found physical comfort in the cloke, and spiritual comfort from the parchments is hidden from us. Whether he made a confession of the faith at his last trial, whether he went to his triumphant death alone or with the faithful few, we have no knowledge.

Tradition has left some account, and while tradition must always be submitted to examination and received with reserve, it is not necessarily false.

Tradition tells us that Paul was led out through the gate which now bears his name. Three miles further on, not far from the Ostian Road, is a place anciently known as Aquæ Salviæ, and now as Tre Fontane, and there the execution is said to have taken place. Thus without pomp or show, but rather in ignominy and desertion the great apostle yielded up his life for the truth which had been more dear to him than life itself.

Tradition tells us moreover that those of the guard, Longinus, Acestus, and Megistus, were converted on the way, and that they afterwards suffered martyrdom for the name of Christ.

We have no words with which, adequately to express our own appreciation of this man of God. We cannot trust our pen at this point, lest in the eyes of some, we appear too fond. We cannot however say farewell to this lonely child of grace, this champion of truth, this herald of light and liberty, without some tribute, and so we quote the words of another, who, though viewing much of the Scriptures from a different angle from that held by ourselves, was an unreserved lover of Paul the apostle.

> "Here was one to whom no single man that has ever lived, before or since, can furnish a perfect parallel. If we look at him only as a writer, how immensely does he surpass, in his most casual Epistles, the greatest authors, whether Pagan or Christian, of his own and succeeding epochs. The younger Pliny was famous as a letter-writer, yet the younger Pliny never produced any letter so exquisite as that to Philemon. Seneca, as a moralist, stood almost unrivalled, yet not only is clay largely mixed with his gold, but even his finest moral aphorisms are inferior in breadth and intensity to the most casual of St. Paul's. Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius furnish us with the purest and noblest specimens of Stoic loftiness and thought, yet St. Paul's chapter on charity is worth more than all they ever wrote. If we look at the Christian world, the very greatest worker in each realm of Christian service does but present an inferior aspect of one phase only of Paul's many-sided pre-eminence. As a theologian, as one who formulated the doctrines of Christianity, we may compare him with St. Augustine or St. Thomas of Aquinum; yet how should we be shocked to find in him the fanciful rhetoric and dogmatic bitterness of the one, or the scholastic aridity of the other! If we look at him as a moral reformer, we may compare him with Savonarola; but in his practical control of even the most thrilling spiritual impulses—in making the spirit of the prophet subject to the prophet—how grand an exemplar might he not have furnished to the impassioned Florentine! If we consider him as a preacher we may compare him with St. Bernard; yet St. Paul would have been incapable of the unnatural asceticism and heresy-hunting hardness of the great Abbot of Clairvaux. As a reformer who altered the entire course of human history, Luther alone resembles him; yet how incomparably is the Apostle superior to Luther in insight, in courtesy, in humility, in dignity, in self-control! As a missionary we might compare him to Xavier, as a practical organizer to St. Gregory, as a fervent lover of souls to Whitefield, and to many other saints of God in many other of his endowments; but no saint of God has ever attained the same heights in so many capacities, or received the gifts of the Spirit in so rich an outpouring, or borne in his mortal body such evident brandmarks of the Lord. In his lifetime he was no whit behind the very chiefest of the Apostles, and he towers above the very greatest of all the saints who have since striven to follow the example of his devotion to his Lord" (Farrar).

Faithful to the end, the apostle did not forget his promise to the church in the beginning.

The Thessalonians had been deceived by a letter purporting to come from the apostle (II Thess. ii. 2), and to safeguard them and us he said:

> "The salutation of Paul with mine own hand, which is the token in every epistle; so I write. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen" (II Thess. iii. 17, 18).

Paul never failed of this promise. Every epistle that he wrote concludes with a salutation that contains the word “grace be with you”. This salutation is found at the close of Hebrews, but is not found at the close of the epistles of either James, Peter, Jude or John.

Inspiration does not make a man like Paul write meaningless platitudes. Those words “the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with you” are characteristic of the apostle and his own personal desires. He can wish nothing better to either a church, a minister or a fellow believer, and so on this note:

“Grace be with you. Amen,”

the apostle of grace lays down both his pen, his sword and his life, to await that day when grace shall give place to glory, and he and we shall be for ever with the Lord.

Tools for the Unashamed Workman.

No.6. Commentaries with Greek Text.
pp. 98 - 100

Our survey of the many translations of the Scriptures that are of service to the workman in the Word, would not be at all complete without a reference to those larger works that not only give a translation, but provide a commentary at the same time. We draw the reader's attention to the following, which are not however placed in order of merit.

He Kaine Diatheke, The New Testament with English Notes, Philological and Explanatory. By E. Valpy.

The fourth edition, published in 1836, is enriched by a fairly full contribution on the Greek Article contributed by Bishop Middleton, Dr. Tilloch and Mr. Granville Sharp. While we do not say that this commentary has anything exceptional about it, the reader would be well advised should he see it second hand for a few shillings to secure it. Here and there its philological notes and explanatory passages are suggestive.

A work of much greater value and authority is that entitled:

> "The Greek Testament with English Notes, Critical, Philological and Exegetical, especially adapted for the use of theological students, and ministers."
>
> By the Rev. S. T. Bloomfield, D.D. The ninth edition of this work was published in 1858.

His own note which we extract from the preface, very aptly introduces the words "cautious", "candour", "charity", which we would ourselves use in characterizing this work.

> "To revert in a general way to the two departments of his present labours—the critical and exegetical. As to the former, the Author trusts that his recent very extensive researches have enabled him materially to improve the Text which he had long ago framed; at any rate he has been guided by a spirit alike remote on the one hand from the reckless innovation, and, on the other, from a slavish adherence to what had been indeed received . . . . . As to the latter and more important department, he is not aware that aught has been left undone to serve every necessary purpose of the Student in Theology, the Minister and Preacher, and the general Reader of Divinity. Accordingly he trusts that the work will be found to present a constant Handbook supplying an ever ready Aid, and, as far as is needed (though the materials for judgment are always placed before the reader), a Guide. In regard to such portions as concern Systems of Theology—nay even points of doctrine whereon professing Christians, however sober and conscientious, have differed and do differ, he has been anxious to lay down the course of Exegesis (on the adjustment of which the decision of such points turns), in the most cautious manner ever endeavouring to open out the mind of the Spirit in the spirit of love, candour, and Christian charity; at any rate studiously avoiding to treat such passages polemically or controversially."

In the same year that Bloomfield's ninth edition was published, there appeared:

> The Greek Testament, with notes grammatical and exegetical > by William Webster, M.A.. and William Francis Wilkinson, M.A.

In explanation of their work, the authors say:

> "Our intention of undertaking this task was conceived more than twenty years ago, when Dr. Valpy's was the only annotated edition in the hands of students at our universities. Though since that period the labours of Bloomfield, Burton and Trollope have supplied to some extent the defect which then existed, we cannot regard the amount of attention which the New Testament in the Original has received from English annotators, as at all commensurate with the theological or classical literature of our day . . . . . Six years ago, this volume was in a state of considerable forwardness, when the announcement of a similar publication by Mr. Alford caused us to pause, till we saw how far the reception of his labours might render the prosecution of our own unnecessary."

As a result, Webster and Wilkinson, still believing that there was room for an annotated Greek Testament along the lines they had planned, published their labours, deviating largely from the path of their predecessors in that, (1) They omit altogether the department dealing with Textual Criticism; (2) They modify or decline as superfluous to their purpose much that is common to preceding annotators; and in lieu thereof, (3) dwell upon points which have hitherto received but partial attention.

Both Bloomfield and Webster & Wilkinson refer to Alford's monumental work the third edition of which was published in 1856. It was entitled:

> "The Greek Testament, with a critically revised text: a digest of various readings: marginal references to verbal and idiomatic usage: prolegomena: and a critical and exegetical commentary." By Henry Alford, B.D.

Each section of this work is prefaced by Prolegomena which treat of Authorship, Origin, Readers, Time, Place and Language, Genuineness and Authenticity, Style and Character.

While Alford supplied the reader with the names of the MSS that are both for and against certain readings, the reader would do well to follow his leading with caution as in the last report Alford gave too great a prominence to "internal probability". He adopted that reading "which on the whole seemed most likely to have stood in the original Text".

In the notes that accompany the Greek Text, the student will find not only a suggestive translation, but the reasons for and against the rendering adopted together with arguments for rejecting or accepting the translations of such commentators as Calvin, Benger and Meyer, &c., beside a copious reference of the "Fathers".

One other commentary of this same kind we must mention, and that is:

> "The New Testament of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ in the original Greek, with notes and introductions." By Chas. Wordsworth, D.D.

While there are other similar Greek New Testament commentaries available, we feel that sufficient has been said for our purpose, their multiplication but encumbers. The reader must be prepared, in practically all his researches, to find that "Dispensational Truth" is scarcely recognized, and that most commentators hold opinions concerning hell, baptism, the Lord's Supper, &c., that are contrary to the teaching for which The Berean Expositor stands. With all this however, those works mentioned above if used with discretion can become tools in the hands of the workman of God, especially in the elucidation of the finer points of grammar and translation, leaving the reader himself the privilege and responsibility of arriving at the true interpretation and application of the truth thus illuminated.

NO No.7, (No.5 also).

No.8. Works that show by undersigned coincidences the accuracy of Acts and the Epistles, by William Paley, D.D. and T. R. Birks, M.A.

pp. 119, 120

The two books that come before us for examination are most helpful and stimulating. The first is entitled:

Horae Paulinae or The Truth of the Scripture History of St. Paul evinced by a comparison of the epistle which bear his name with the Acts of the Apostles and with one another.

He Kaine Diatheke, The New Testament with English Notes, Philological and Explanatory. By E. Valpy.

The fourth edition, published in 1836, is enriched by a fairly full contribution on the Greek Article contributed by Bishop Middleton, Dr. Tilloch and Mr. Granville Sharp. While we do not say that this commentary has anything exceptional about it, the reader would be well advised should he see it second hand for a few shillings to secure it. Here and there its philological notes and expl*anatory passages are suggestive.*

He Kaine Diatheke, The New Testament with English a high and deserved reputation, not only as a decisive argument for the genuineness of St. Paul's epistles, and the fidelity > of St. Luke's narrative, but as a pattern of sagacious and discriminating historical criticism . . . . . No candid reader, after a perusal of the work, can escape the full conviction that the Acts of the Apostles, and the epistles of St. Paul, forming together nearly one half of the New Testament, could neither be the result of fraud on the part of contemporary authors, nor have an artificial origin in later times, but are certainly what they bear upon their face, a genuine history, and authentic letters of the great apostle of the Gentiles."

Birks carried Paley's method further. He gleaned many coincidences that Paley had overlooked, and applied the same argument to the four gospels. Birks included the epistle to the Hebrews in his survey, and his contribution is greater in bulk than the original work of Paley, but just as interesting. We would suggest that these works be consulted whenever any serious examination of the N.T. is intended, they are worthy "tools for the unashamed workman".

No.9. Some Valuable Books on the Septuagint.
pp. 139, 140

The reader of The Berean Expositor who has been acquainted with its method of exposition for any length of time, will be aware that the testimony of the Septuagint, especially for the light that is sheds upon the meaning of N.T. words, is held in high esteem. In our Index of Volumes I-XX of The Berean Expositor, we devoted two pages to a special Index of references to the Septuagint Version of the O.T.

A book which we recommend every student to obtain if possible is the work by E. W. Grinfield, M.A., published in London by William Pickering in 1850, and now only obtainable at second-hand. He entitled his book:

> "An Apology for the Septuagint, in which its claim to Biblical and Canonical Authority are briefly stated and vindicated."

While we may not follow this writer to the full length of his argument and believe as he does that the LXX is of equal inspiration and canonicity as the Hebrew originals, we do certainly value the testimony that he gives to the extreme value and importance of this great Version. An apology is a justification rather than an excuse, and an apologetic is a formal defence of a person, doctrine, course, etc., and is first found in use in 1605. An apologist is a defender, as Lord Broughton wrote "Mr. Hume, the staunch apologist . . . . . of all Stuarts".

The reader will find no "apology" in the weak and secondary sense of the word in Grinfield's work. The following extracts will give some idea of the nature of this "apology".

> "This Greek version was received by the immediate successors of the apostles, on authority which they could not hesitate to acknowledge. They had heard it preached and quoted by the apostles; they found it more or less in every chapter of the New Testament."

"The terms repentance, faith, righteousness, justification, redemption, sanctification, etc., together with the titles Lord, Christ, Saviour, Holy Spirit, etc., are the very same in the Alexandrian version (the LXX) as in the New Testament, and they are used precisely in the same meaning. It is this identity of doctrinal terms and expressions which constitutes the unity, and which secures the continuity of faith and doctrine, in the Old and the New Testament."

"Dikaios, in the LXX and in the New Testament, is one, whom the Judge pronounces innocent, i.e. who He absolves or pardons, whereas dikaios, in Classic Greek, signifies one, who is just in himself, and on his own account, who therefore needs no pardon."

"If you attempt to attire the language of the Scriptures in a classic form, you are in danger of substituting heathen ethics for Christian morals, by bringing down the doctrines of the Bible to the level of human speculation."

"The eloquence of Paul, a Valckenaer has remarked, is quite another kind from that of the Greek orators. His vocabulary is chiefly confined to the LXX, and those who would comprehend his arguments or appreciate his excellence, must give their days and nights to the study of the Septuagint."

In his introduction Grinfield says:

"This 'apology' may be regarded as a natural sequel to my Hellenistic Edition of the Greek Testament."

This indicates that Grinfield had worked for some time in the study of the Greek of the O.T., and another work by this same writer is of extreme value, in the matter of comparing passages of the Greek O.T. and the Greek Fathers, with the Greek of the N.T. Its title is rather forbidding, it is Scholia Hellenistica in Novum Testamentum, but the reader needs no Latin to use the work.

No.10. Some Valuable Books on the Septuagint (contd). pp. 241, 242

In association with the works of Grinfield referred to in the preceding article, we would mention The New Testament Quotations, by Henry Gough, because he gives the original Hebrews, the corresponding Septuagint Greek, and the N.T. quotations, together with English translations that enable the reader to compare and check every quotation made from the LXX in the N.T.

"Large as this collection is, it must not for a moment be supposed that it comprehends all the verbal similarities to the Old Testament, and especially to the Septuagint version of it."

"Had not such a translations (i.e. the LXX) been published and received a proper time before our Saviour's advent, the composition of the New Testament in Greek would, humanly speaking, have been impossible."

Henry Gough's book was published in 1855, and in his preface he pays a tribute to the learned and valuable works of the Rev. E. W. Grinfield.

We must include a more modern work among our books of reference to the LXX and that is:

> An introduction to the Old Testament in Greek, by Henry Barclay Swete, D.D., published in 1900 by the Cambridge University Press.

In this work of over 590 pages almost every phase of the subject is dealt with. The book is divided into three parts:

I. The History of the Greek Old Testament and of its transmission. This is subdivided into six chapters and occupies pages 1-194.
II. The contents of the Alexandrian Old Testament. This is subdivided into six chapters and occupies pages 197-366.
III. Literary use, value, and textual condition of the Greek Old Testament. This is subdivided into six chapters and occupies pages 369-497. There is an Appendix and two Indexes.

It must be clearly understood that in recommending books as tools in this series, we expect the student to be discreet, that he has no hesitancy regarding the Inspiration of the Scriptures, and where a modernistic tendency is observable, he will nevertheless be able to use what is good and true without endorsing everything that is put forward and without accepting every conclusion.

One other books must be mentioned under this heading, it is:

> Essays in Biblical Greek by Edwin Hatch, M.A., D.D., published in 1889.

The work consists largely of the lectures delivered by the author as Grinfield Lecturer on the Septuagint. The contents are in the form of seven essays, and are very comprehensive in their scope and full of detailed examples. The seven essays are:

I. On the value and use of the Septuagint.
II. Short studies of the meaning of words in Biblical Greek.
III. On psychological terms in Biblical Greek.
IV. On early quotations from the Septuagint.
V. On composite quotations from the Septuagint.
VI. On Origen's revision of the LXX text of Job.
VII. On the text of Ecclesiasticus.

The book does not permit of extracts. It is a valuable acquisition. With these works and a good concordance to the LXX, the earnest student has not only a mine in which Treasure lies, but real tools with which to work it out.

For the benefit of any who may have been perturbed by a recent misleading reference, take note, the phrase en tois epouraniois "in heavenly places", does not occur in the LXX.

Truth in the Balance.

No.13. Prophecy and its Fulfillment.
pp. 35 - 38

Among the subjects that demand the "balance" for their interpretation and the appreciation of their value, must be numbered Prophecy and its fulfillment.

The following paragraphs written by Horne, in his "Introduction" are worth reproducing:

> "The knowledge of future events is that object, which man, with the greatest desire, has the least ability to attain. By tracing cause and effect in their usual operations, by observing human characters, and by marking present tendencies, he may form some plausible conjectures about the future; and an experienced politician, who is thoroughly acquainted with the circumstances, interests, and tempers both of his own community and of those who are his neighbours, will frequently anticipate events with a sagacity and success which bear some resemblance to direst prescience, and excites the astonishment of less penetrating minds. Still, however, he is limited to a kind of contact with present circumstances. That which he foresees must have some connexion with what he actually beholds, or some dependence on it; otherwise his inquiries are vain, and his conjectures idle and delusive; and even within those narrow limits, how often is his penetration baffled, and his wisdom deceived. The slightest intrusion of uncommon circumstances, the smallest possible deviation from rules, which cannot by any means be rendered exact, destroys the visionary chain which he has constructed, and exposes his ignorance to himself and others. The prescience of the most experienced politician, in short, bears a close resemblance to that of an experienced general or a skilful chess player."

Prophecy in the sense of an unfulfilled prediction, has little or no meaning or weight apart from its fulfillment, and the demonstration that any prophecy has been fulfilled is an evidence that God is at work, for:

> "To foresee and foretell future events is a miracle of which the testimony remains in itself. It is a miracle, because to foresee and foretell future events, to which no change of circumstances leads, no train of probabilities points, is as much beyond the ability of human agents, as to cure diseases with a word, or even to raise the dead, which may properly be termed miracles of power. That actions of the latter kind were ever performed can be proved, at a distant period, only by witnesses, against whose testimony cavils may be raised, or causes for doubt advanced: but the man, who reads a prophecy and perceives the corresponding event, is himself the witness of the miracle; he sees that thus it is, and that thus by human means it could not possibly have been. A prophecy yet unfulfilled is a miracle at present incomplete; and these, if numerous, may be considered as the seeds of future conviction, ready to grow up and bear their fruit, whenever the corresponding facts shall be exhibited in the theatre of the world. So admirably has this sort of evidence been contrived by the wisdom of God, that in proportion as the lapse of ages might seem to weaken the argument derived from miracles long since performed, that very lapse serves only to strengthen the argument derived from the completion of prophecy."

The Prophecies of the Scripture are reducible to four heads:

(1) Prophecies relating to Israel in particular.
(2) Prophecies relating to the neighbouring nations.
(3) Prophecies relating to the Messiah.
(4) Prophecies given by the Lord Jesus Christ Himself, and His apostles.

Prophetic utterances concerning Israel begin with the call of Abraham, and are continued to Isaac and Jacob. These prophecies foretell that the posterity of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, shall possess the land of Canaan, and that though they should lose the enjoyment of this land for a time, owing to their sinfulness, yet their title to the land should never be alienated, but that in God's good time they should be gathered back and given possession of their land, there to continue in peaceful enjoyment to the end of time. The passages of Scriptures that contain these prophetic utterances are Gen. xii. 7; xiii. 14, 15, 15; xv. 18-21; xvii. 7, 8; Exod. iii. 8, 17; Deut. xxx. 1-5; Jer. xxx. 3. When the original prophecy was uttered, Abraham was an old man, without children, and had just left the land of his nativity to become a pilgrim in the land beyond the Euphrates unto which the Lord has led him. That land moreover was held by a number of warlike tribes, some of them being giants with "cities walled up to heaven", yet the book of Numbers (chapter xxi.), Deut. ii. and Josh. iii. onwards, reveal how exactly these prophecies began to be fulfilled, while the remainder of the O.T. reveals the fulfillment of the threat to scatter the children of Israel from their land. We now confidently await the fulfillment of the third feature—Israel's gathering, restoration and blessing. What has been fulfilled encourages us to believe that all will be fulfilled in God's own time.

When the days drew near for the prophecy of the captivity of the Jews to take place, the prophet Jeremiah foretold Nebuchadnezzar by name (Jer. xxvii. 3-7). For a composite prophecy, so written before the event as to produce the feeling of contradiction, one is referred to the double prophecy of Jeremiah and Ezekiel concerning the fate of Zedekiah. If we compare Jer. xxxiv. 2-7 with Ezek. xii. 13 we find that Zedekiah should "see the king of Babylon", yet he should "not see Babylon", that he should be "carried to Babylon", yet should die in peace and be buried after the manner of his ancestors, yet that he should die, nevertheless, at Babylon. The history of Zedekiah reveals a faithful fulfillment of all that was prophesied. He did see the king of Babylon, who ordered his eyes to be put out, he was brought to Babylon without seeing it, and that he died there (Jer. xxxiv. 4, 7; II Kings xxv. 6, 7). The only feature that is left unrecorded is that after his death Zedekiah was given an honourable burial, but in the absence of any word to the contrary this can be safely assumed.

Prophecies concerning the Nations, occupy a large portion of the prophetic scriptures. Tyre, Egypt, Babylon, Nineveh, Ethiopia, the successors of Nebuchadnezzar, namely, the Medes and Persians and the Greeks are named. To give details of these embracive prophecies is beyond our present scope. To mention them is for the moment sufficient for our purpose. So marvelously did the fulfillment agree with the prophecy, "that the celebrated infidel Porphyry, in the second century, could only evade the force of them by asserting, contrary to all evidence, that they were written long after the event".

Prophecies concerning the Messiah, however, cannot be treated in this fashion. They lie so near to the heart of truth, so close to the basis of all our hopes, that if they could be explained away we should be of all men most miserable. Let us tabulate some that are outstanding.

The place where Messiah was to be born, namely, Bethlehem, a little village among the thousands of Judah, was predicted by Micah the prophet (v. 2) 700 years before the event, which is as though someone in 1066 foretold the birth of an individual in some obscure village in England in the reign of George the Third!

The extraordinary character of this birth, namely, that the Messiah should be born of a virgin, was foretold by the prophet Isaiah (vii. 14; ix. 6, 7).

The extraordinary marvelous character of His death, is foretold by Isaiah, in that wonderful chapter, the fifty-third. Isaiah even goes so far as to foretell such details as:

> "He made His grave with the wicked ones (plural), and with the rich one (singular) in His death" (liii. 9).

The death and resurrection of the Messiah were foretold with extraordinary exactness. The Psalms reveal that He would not see corruption (xvi. 10), that the instrument of His death should be crucifixion (xxii. 16) a mode of punishment unused among the Jews in David's time; that He should sit on the right hand of God waiting until His foes be made His footstool (cx. 1), and that He should come again, His feet standing in the last day upon the Mount of Olives, the spot from which the N.T. records that He actually ascended (Zech. xiv.; Acts i.). Finally, for the present section, Daniel predicted the number of years that should intervene from the time indicated in Dan. ix. 25 to the coming of the Messiah the Prince Who should "be cut off and have nothing", a prophecy which is a never-ending source of wonder to all who take the trouble to compute and examine chronology and history. Christ was born "in the fullness of time".

The prophecies of the N.T. fall into two great groups. Those which were uttered by Christ concerning His own death and resurrection and which were immediately fulfilled, and those uttered by Christ and His apostles concerning the close of the age and the second coming of Christ, which prophesies necessarily await fulfillment, although the signs of the times, as predicted in I Tim. iv. and II Tim. iii., iv. are most certainly making themselves evident. The Saviour foretold His death, where it should take place, who would be instrumental in bringing it about, and what would precede it. He would be "killed" at "Jerusalem", and suffer many things of "the elders, and chief priests and scribes" (Matt. xvi. 21). He specified what these "many things" would be. He would be delivered to the "Gentiles to mock, scourge and crucify" Him (Matt. xx. 18, 19). He also foretold His betrayal, indicated the traitor, and moreover, knew that all His disciples would forsake Him in the hour of His extremity (Matt. xx. 18; xxvi. 23, 31); and He even foretold that Peter would deny Him thrice before the cock crew twice (Mark xiv. 30). In every case the prophecy was fulfilled to the letter.

The Saviour just as explicitly foretold His resurrection. He would rise again "the third day" (Matt. xvi. 21), and that after He was risen He would go before the disciples into Galilee (Matt. xxvi. 32; xxviii. 16). The Lord foretold the descent of the Spirit and the enduement of the day of Pentecost (Luke xxiv. 49; Mark xvi. 17, 18), the destruction of Jerusalem with its temple (Mark xiii. 2; Luke xxi. 20-24). It would be a profitable exercise to trace out and tabulate the various expressions, such as: "That it might be fulfilled", "That the Scripture might be fulfilled", which are found in the four gospels, so that the close association of "promise and fulfillment" which characterizes the connexion between the Old Testament and the New might be appreciated for its true worth. There are twenty-eight such references where pleroo is used, beside other references and allusions. When all is placed in the balance that can be brought forth from the Scriptures concerning Prophecy and its fulfillment, the reader will possess an evidence for God and His Word, for Christ and His Redemption, that is overwhelming. Let us take courage. The prophecy that has been fulfilled is sufficient pledge to the believer of the prophecy which awaits fulfillment. "None shall want her mate" (Isa. xxxiv. 16).

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS,

It is with sincere gratitude that we write this Foreword, as it completes the forty-ninth year of the Berean Expositor.

While the actual subject matter is still the work of the Editor, it has become increasingly evident that the expansion of our witness called for helpers in many departments.

In addition to the most valuable work done by our Honorary Secretary, Mr. George T. Foster, by our Publication Secretary, Mr. Leonard A. Canning, and by our Assistant Editor, Mr. Stuart Allen, willing helpers have come forward to check MSS, to read proofs, to type the MSS ready for print, to address envelopes, to keep stock and to do the numberless jobs that must be done behind the scenes without recognition, except in the knowledge that in so doing such are serving the Lord Christ.

As fellow-members "In the measure of every part", every one according to "The measure of the gift of Christ" play their role as "Joints of supply" (Eph. iv. 1-16), and for this practical outworking of our high calling, all who value the testimony of the Berean Expositor must be thankful.

My fellow-Trustees commend this volume of Expository Truth both to the Lord and to His people.

Yours by grace,

CHARLES H. WELCH,
STUART ALLEN

How shall we sing the Love that sought?
    Its breadth and length, its depth and height.
Its fullness passes all our thought,
    As mid-day sun surpasses night.

What shall for us its length define?
    No measure can to this extend:
The Love that died to make us thine
    Has no beginning and no end.

Its height no angel wing can soar,
    Far, far above all power and might;
Yet such His grace, for us in store,
    To share the Holiest in the light.

pp. 1 - 6

The church which is the Body is also called "the fullness of Him that filleth all in all". This title taken by itself is evidently one of supreme importance and dignity, but when taken in relation with the outworking of the purpose of the ages, it will be seen to have a deeper significance. The student who is acquainted with Dispensational Truth is also aware of the presence of "gaps" in the outworking of the Divine purpose. The Saviour's recognition of this "gap" in Isa. lxi. is made evident when we read Luke iv. 16-21 and Luke xxi. 22. So when we read I Pet. i. 11 or the quotation of Joel ii. 28-32 in Acts ii., the presence of a gap or interval is made evident. The word translated "fullness" is the Greek pleroma, and its first occurrence in the N.T. places it in contrast with a "rent" or a "gap":

> "No man putteth a piece of new cloth unto an old garment, for that which is put in to fill it up taketh from the garment, and the rent is made worse" (Matt. ix. 16).
>
> "No man also seweth a piece of new cloth on an old garment: else the new piece that filled it up taketh away from the old, and the rent is made worse" (Mark ii. 21).
> "No man putteth a piece of new cloth on an old; if otherwise, then both the new maketh a rent, and the piece that was taken out of the new agreeth not with the old" (Luke v. 36).

The words that call for attention are: "that which is put in to fill up"; this is the translation of the Greek pleroma "fullness". In contrast with this "fullness" is the word "rent" which in the Greek is schisma. Two words translated "new" are used: in Matt. ix. 16, and in Mark ii. 21 agnaphos, not yet fulled, or dressed, from gnapheus, a fuller, and kainos, which is used in Luke v. 36, which means newly made. In place of "put into" or "put upon" used in Matt. ix. 16 and Luke v. 36, we find the word "to sew on" epirrhapto employed in Mark ii. 21. One other word is suggestive, the word translated "agree" in Luke v. 36. It is the Greek symphoneo. Now, as these terms will be referred to in the course of the following exposition, we will take the present opportunity of enlarging a little on their meaning and relationship here, and so prepare the way.

Pleroma. This word, derived from pleroo "to fill", occurs seventeen times in the N.T. Two of these occurrences occur in Matthew, Mark as we have seen; the remaining fifteen occurrences are found in John's Gospel and in Paul's epistles. It is noteworthy that the word pleroma "fullness" is never used in the epistles of the Circumcision. When Peter referred to the problem that the "gap" suggested by the words "where is the promise of His coming?" he referred his readers to the epistles of Paul, who, said he, deals with this matter of longsuffering and apparent postponement and speaks of these things (II Pet. iii. 15, 16). The word pleroma is used in the Septuagint some fifteen times. These we will record for the benefit of the reader who may not have access to that ancient translation. I Chron. xvi. 32: "let the sea roar and the fullness thereof." So, Psa. xcvi. 11; xcviii. 7; xxiv. 1 "the earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof", and with slight variations, Psa. l. 12; lxxxix. 11.

In several passages, the fullness, or "all that is therein" is set over against flood or famine, as Jer. viii. 16; xlii. 3; Ezek. xii. 19; xix. 7; and xxx. 12. Some of the words used in the context of these Septuagint references are too suggestive to be passed over without comment. Instead of "time of healing" we find "anxiety", the land "quaking", "deadly serpents" and a "distressed heart" (Jer. viii. 15-18). Again, in Jer. xlvii. 2 (xxix. 2 in the LXX) we have such words of prophetic and age time importance as "an overflowing flood" Greek katakluzomai, kataklusmos and variants, a word used with dispensational significance in II Pet. ii. 5 and iii. 6, and preserved in the English cataclysm, a word of similar import to that which we have translated "the overthrow" of the world. The bearing of II Pet. iii. on this "gap" in the outworking of the purpose of the ages, will be given an examination in this series.

In the context of the word "fullness" found in Ezek. xii. 19, we have such words as "scatter" diaspero, a word used in James i. 1 and in I Pet. i. 1 of the "dispersed" and "scattered" tribes of Israel, also the word "waste" which calls up such passages of prophetic import as Isa. xxxiv. 10, 11 and Jer. iv. 23-27 where the actual words employed in Gen. i. 2 are repeated. The pleroma or "fullness" is placed in direct contrast with desolation, waste, flood, fire and a condition that is without form and void. Schisma, the word translated "rent" in Matt. ix. 16, is from schizo which is used of the veil of the temple and of the rocks that were "rent" at the time of the Saviour's death and resurrection. Two words translated "new" have been mentioned. One agnaphos refers to the work of a "fuller", who smoothes a cloth by carding. The work of a fuller also includes the washing and scouring process in which fuller's earth or fuller's soap (Mal. iii. 2; Mark ix. 3) is employed. A piece of cloth thus treated loses its original harshness, and more readily yields to the cloth that has been more often washed. The whole purpose of the ages is set forth under the symbol of the work of a fuller, who by beating and by bleaching at length produces a material which is the acme of human attainment, for when the Scriptures would describe the excellent glory of the Lord, His garments are said to have been "exceeding white as snow, so as no fuller on earth could white them" (Mark ix. 3).

So too, the effect upon Israel of the Second Coming is likened to "a refiner's fire and like fuller's soap" (Mal. iii. 2). It is this "fulled" cloth that makes the "fullness", although there is no etymological connexion between the fuller and the fullness. The other word translated "new" is kainos, and has the meaning of "fresh, as opposed to old", "new, different from the former" and as a compound the meaning "to renew". It is this word that is used when speaking of the new covenant, the new creation, the new man, and the new heaven and earth. We shall have to take this into account when we are developing the meaning and purpose of the fullness. The only reason for lifting out the words translated "to sew" is the significant use of the word in the Septuagint version of Job xiv. 12 "till the heavens are unsewn". The bearing of this upon the argument of II Pet. iii., the present firmament and the fullness will appear when we call to mind the passages which speak of the heavens as "curtains" or a "tent" as Isa. xl. 22. Finally, we have the word sumphoneo "to agree". Sumphonia is translated "musick" in Luke xv. 25, and of course is the Greek original of our word "symphony". In Eccles. vii. 15 the word is used with a rather different meaning from "agreement". The Church of the One Body is the great outstanding anticipation of the goal of the ages. It is associated with Him, under Whose feet are all things, it is associated with a dispensation of the fullness of the seasons, when all things are to be summed up in Him, and it is itself called:

> "The fullness of Him that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 23).

How are we to try to understand this statement? It falls into line with the last occurrence of pleroma in Colossians, and for that matter, in the N.T.:

> "For in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily" (Col. ii. 9).

The first occurrence of pleroma in Ephesians, stands by itself (Eph. i. 10) the remainder form a group that expand the theme, thus:

A	Eph. i. 22, 23.	"The Church which is His Body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all."
B	Eph. iii. 14-19.	"The whole family in heaven and in earth . . . . . that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith . . . . . filled unto all the fullness of God."
C	Eph. iv. 8-13.	"He ascended up far above all heavens, that He might fill all things . . . . . unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of the Christ."
B	Col. i. 16-20.	"For by Him were all things created . . . . . all things were created by Him and for Him . . . . . He is the Head of the Body the church . . . . . for it pleased the Father that in Him should all the fullness dwell . . . . . to reconcile all things . . . . . in earth and things in heaven."
A	Col. ii. 9, 10.	"For in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily, and ye are filled to the full in Him, Which is the Head of all principality and power."

Here is a very complete conspectus of this mighty theme, point answering point with such precision, that no approach to one corresponding member can be undertaken without due consideration of the other. This, the reader will perceive, is fraught with immediate consequences. It forces a comparison between Eph. i. 22, 23 and Col. ii. 9, 10. The passage in Col. ii. 9 has been taken as one of the proof texts of the Deity of Christ. The doctrine of the Deity of Christ constitutes one of the four tenets of the trust of the Berean Forward Movement, yet we believe it to be a mistake to use Col. ii. 9 as a proof of that wondrous doctrine. The church of the One Body is "the fullness of Him that filleth all in all" but such a revelation does not justify the thought that the church is Divine. The prayer of Eph. iii. is that the believer may be filled with all the fullness of God and if to be filled with all the fullness of the Godhead bodily, proves the Deity of Christ in Col. ii. 9, what does Eph. iii. 19 teach of the believer? Identical language, pan to pleroma "all the fullness", is found in Eph. iii. 19, Col. i. 19 and ii. 9, and these passages cannot be separated and interpreted independently of each other. The "fullness" of Christ dwells "bodily" in the church, even as the "fullness" of the Godhead dwells "bodily" in Him. Philippians does not contain the word "fullness", but it reveals the blessed condescension of the Lord that alone made the "fullness" possible, for the word is always used with a redemptive meaning. The words of Phil. ii. 7 "He made Himself of no reputation" are literally "He emptied Himself". As our Mediator, He emptied Himself, so that as our Mediator He might become our fullness. The same thought underlies the words of Heb. i. and ii. "He was made a little lower than the angels", and as a result He was "made so much better than the angels" (Heb. ii. 7; i. 4, 5).

There are moreover many contextual links that bind these references together as one whole. In Eph. i. 21-23 the stress is upon the Headship of Christ as the risen and ascended One, with all things under His feet, the Church which is His Body, being the fullness of Him Who in His turn filleth all in all. In Col. i. 15-20 the two creations are brought together, with Christ as "Firstborn" in each (Col. i. 15, 18), with Christ as pre-eminent in each (Col. i. 17, 18). Things in heaven and earth were His creation (Col. i. 16) and they are the objects of reconciliation (Col. i. 20). When we come to Col. ii. 4-23, we have left the positive revelation of truth, and have entered into the sphere of conflict with error. The complete structure of this passage has been set out on page 84 of Volume XXIII, but for our present purpose we will give the opening and closing members of this great correspondence.

-23. Filling of the flesh. plesmone

Whatever is intended by Col. ii. 9 "all the fullness of the Godhead bodily" is closely and intimately carried forward into verse ten, for the word translated "complete" is pepleromenoi, even as conversely, the title of the church as "the fullness" is carried upward to Christ , as the One Who is filling (pleroumenon) the all things in all. Col. ii. 4-23 combats the invasion of a vain and deceitful philosophy, supported by tradition and the rudiments of the world, but "not after Christ", and later in the same argument, not only philosophies and traditions, but even Divinely appointed "new moons and sabbath days" are alike set aside as "shadow of things to come" because "the Body is of Christ". The whole fullness, toward which every age and dispensation has pointed since the overthrow of the world, is at last seen to be Christ Himself. All types and shadows that once filled the gap caused by sin, are now seen to be but transient, or of value only as they point the way to Him, and then disappear.

He is Head, He is Pre-eminent, He is Creator and Redeemer, He is the Firstborn of all creation, and the Firstborn from the dead. He is the Beginning of the creation of God (Rev. iii. 14; Col. i. 18) the Alpha and Omega, the First and the Last, in deed and in fact "Christ is all, and in all" (Col. iii. 11) in the church of the One Body, as He will yet be in the whole redeemed universe. No more glorious position for the redeemed is conceivable than that revealed in Eph. i. 23. To be one of a kingdom of priests on the earth is a dignity so great, that O.T. prophets have piled imagery upon imagery in setting it forth. Yet when we come to the Bride of the Lamb, or the description of the heavenly Jerusalem, we realize how much more glorious is that calling than the highest calling on earth. What shall be said then of that company of the redeemed, blessed neither on earth nor in the New Jerusalem, blessed neither as a kingdom nor as a bride, but blessed "with Christ' where He now sits "far above all", blessed not only as the members of His Body which is dignity indeed, but actually destined to be "the fullness of Him", in Whom dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily!

It is evident from what we have discovered in the Word, that the term "fullness" is vital to the accomplishment of the Divine purpose, and there is one point more that must be considered before we close this article. Head and members, or Head and Body, are relative terms. The one cannot exist or function without the other. This we all recognize must be true of the members, but is it not also necessarily true of the Head? Christ, as HEAD, needs the complement of His Body, just as surely as the Church His Body needs the complement of the Head. In the words "the fullness of Him that filleth all in all" the words thus translated to pleroma tou "the fullness of Him" are cast in the form known as "the genitive of relation". Words ending in ma often have a passive significance. Chrysostom, in his commentary says:

> "The fullness of the head is the body, and the fullness of the body is the head . . . . . that is just as the head is filled (or fulfilled) by the body."

Beza says something very similar:

> "However complete He is in Himself, yet as Head He is not complete without His Body." Pleromenou "that filleth" is not passive but middle . . . . . to fill up or complete for Himself."

The very fact that God has a goal, and is moving toward that goal, implies that this relationship of the redeemed with the Redeemer is essential to the glorious achievement of the ages. God is moving from the status of God Who is Creator, to God Who is the Father, and the title Father is itself relative, it necessitates a family. While therefore the redeemed are nothing in themselves, they are precious by reason of His gracious purpose, and their place through grace in it.

No.39. The Throne Room (i. 19 - ii. 7).

Dead IN, or Dead TO? (ii. 1).

pp. 21 - 26

The first half of this section is taken up with the exceeding exaltation of Christ seated at the right hand of God, seated in the heavenlies and seated far above every conceivable authority. We do well to pause with worshipping wonder as we glory in the fact that "He shall be exalted and extolled, and be very high" (Isa. lii. 13). We shall lose the real import of this passage, however, even as we shall miss the import of Isa. lii. 13 if we leave the Lord in isolated exaltation. Isa. liii. provides the sequel "Therefore will I divide Him a portion with the great, and He shall divide the spoil with the strong" (Isa. liii. 12). "He shall divide the spoil." Some of the redeemed therefore are to share this high glory, and that is exactly the reason for the revelation of Eph. i. 20-23. The whole section is an exposition of "His power to usward who believe". The Saviour's glory now at the right hand of God, is the glory of the Mediator and Redeemer. He had a glory that antedates time, and He Himself distinguishes between that glory which is His intrinsically and which cannot be shared, with that glory which He has received as Mediator and Head, which He intends most certainly to share with the redeemed:

> "And now, O Father, glorify Thou Me with Thine own self with the glory which I had with Thee before the world was" (John xvii. 5).

That is one aspect of the subject. Here is the other:

> "The glory which Thou gavest Me I have given them; that they may be one, even as We are one" (John xvii. 22).

The wondrous goal "that they may be one" is reflected in the title of the church "the fullness of Him".

We return then from the contemplation of the high glory of Eph. i. 22, 23 to realize with reverence and awe, that after all this, glory is a part of our high calling by grace, and we can perhaps the better appreciate the translation favoured by many, of Eph. ii. 1 "Even you". Reading the A.V., the grace and glory of this relationship between the Head and the members of the Body, between the Redeemer and the redeemed, is interrupted by the statement "who were dead in trespasses and sins", but we must never allow ourselves to "prefer" a reading simply because it accords with our creed. Most readers of the Berean Expositor believe that "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God" and the epistle to the Romans leaves us in no doubt on that dread score.

We do not need to hold on to the A.V. translation here in the fear that a proof text for universal sinfulness will be lost. We desire the truth, and we are sure that truth is one, and no disagreement is possible between its parts or statements. When we read the epistle to the Romans we are reading an epistle that specifically sets out to deal with the question of sin. Trespass, offence, sin and sins meet us in that epistle continually, occurring all told forty-nine times. In Ephesians we meet with "sins" once (Eph. i. 7) and trespasses twice (Eph. ii. 1 and 5). Romans is the foundation, Ephesians the temple erected on it, and things that are essential to a foundation, may be intruders in the finished building. We believe instead of harking back to our condition before salvation Paul is revealing our state by grace, when he penned Eph. ii. 1. Here is a transcription of the words of the original:

Kai humas ontas nekrous tois paraptomasin kai tais hamartiais.

First let us observe that there is no word "in" (en) in the original, that is supplied by the translators because of the presence of the dative case. There is no reticence noticeable elsewhere on the part of the Apostle in his employment of the preposition en "in". Wherever its use is needed, the preposition is employed, and that repeatedly. It occurs twenty-eight times in the first chapter of Ephesians, and is translated "at", "with", "in" and "where*in*", and twenty-eight times in the second chapter, where it is translated "in", "among", "through", "at", "by", "whereas" and "thereby". The fact that Paul uses this preposition so frequently, when set over against its absence from Eph. ii. 1 and 5 is important. When the doctrine, being dead IN sins is being stated in Scripture the preposition en is used (John viii. 21, 24 and I Cor. xv. 17). The only warrant for supplying a preposition where it is not actually used is the presence of the dative case, and this is often done by adding "to" or "at" and in some cases by "in". The dative case is the "giving" case, for when we say "give me the book" we really mean "give TO me the book". This is the one employed in Eph. ii. 1. We are, however, not left to our own devices here, there is complete evidence in the Apostle's own writing to show that he was telling the Ephesian believers that they were dead TO trespasses and sins, not dead IN them. Here are some examples of the usage of the dative case in connection with death and sin:

"We that are dead TO sin" (Rom. vi. 2).
"He died UNTO sin" (Rom. vi. 10).
"Dead indeed UNTO sin" (Rom. vi. 11).
"Dead TO the law" (Gal. ii. 19).
"Dead TO sins" (I Pet. ii. 24).

To the list we add Eph. ii. 1, reading:

"Dead TO trespasses and sins."

Let us, for the sake of the truth, endure the horror that the following translations must inspire in any grace-taught heart. If the A.V. of Eph. ii. 1 be accepted as the truth, then let us read:

"How shall we that are DEAD IN SIN, live any longer therein."

Is there sense, let alone doctrinal truth, in such a rendering? NO. Again shall we read:

> "For in that He died, He died IN SIN once."

We cannot conceive of anything more shocking than such a statement, and we are sure every reader repudiates with horror.

> "Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed IN SIN."

Alas, we have no need for such reckoning, our natural condition is most evident but how can the believer, looking at His Lord, say "likewise I will reckon myself to be dead IN SIN". Surely the only translation that is true is as the A.V. gives it. The context of Peter's reference to "being dead to sins" illuminates the expression. He tells us that Christ's sufferings leave us a "copy" (hupogrammos, a copy set for a pupil) with the object that he may "follow His steps", "that we being dead TO sins, should live unto righteousness" (I Pet. ii. 21-24). When "example" is introduced into the Scripture we are not dealing with "sin" but "sins". We are never exhorted to put off the old man, what the Scripture says is put off the old man with his deeds or as regards our former conversation. So we return to Eph. ii. 1 not only convinced that the Apostle is emphasizing the most gracious fact that the members of the church of the One Body, died to sin, but died to sins, "trespasses and sins" to be exact. Trespass (paraptoma), "a falling when one should have stood upright, a mishap; hence a falling from right and duty, the particular and special act of sin from ignorance, inadvertence or negligence; sin rashly committed by one unwilling to do an injury" (Dr. Bullinger, Lexicon).

How few of us can say that we have never sinned rashly even thou "unwilling to do an injury"? Well, to all this, in Christ we have died. The A.V. reads "who were dead", the Greek reads humas ontas "you being", using the present participle. The Apostle had the choice of four terms to express "being dead". He could have used the verb thnesko as in Acts xxv. 19, or apothnesko as in Col. ii. 20 and Heb. xi. 4, or nekroo as in Rom. iv. 19. He uses none of these but the present participle "being" and the word nekros, "a dead person", you being dead is the literal and true rendering of Eph. ii. 1. Eph. ii. 1 reads in the A.V. "were" dead, which of course is the past tense of the verb. The original reads ontas, the present participle of the verb eimi, and should be translated "being". Now obviously the Apostle could not be represented as saying "And you BEING dead IN sins" when addressing saints, so we see that the one error, namely the addition of the preposition "in" led to another, the substitution of "were" for "being". Two wrongs, however, do not make a right, and nothing can justify robbing the believer of his present position by grace.

A parallel passage is Col. ii. 13. Lightfoot's comment is "The en of the Received Text, though highly supported, is doubtless an interpolation for the sake of grammatical clearness". En is not found in either the Vatican or the Sinaitic manuscripts. The whole context is against the idea that the state by nature is in view; it is his state by grace.

> "And you being dead (here the A.V. translates ontas correctly) to trespasses and the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath He quickened together with Him, having forgiven you all trespasses" (Col. ii. 13).

At a Bible study held some years ago, the name of the Editor of The Berean Expositor was being severely condemned for advocating this translation, when one reader rose and said, "I believe a number of those present possess and use 'Newbury's Bible'. Would anyone kindly read the note appended to Eph. ii. 1 in that valuable edition?" The note in Newbury reads "being-dead" and "or to-the" and the sign of the present participle an inverted T is affixed to the words "being-dead". We add this note for the benefit of any who are fearful of what may prove to be a private interpretation.

To resume, instead of Paul turning from the heights of heavenly places, and the glorious calling of the church, to remind his readers that they were once dead in sins like the rest of the human race, he reminds them of the miracle of grace that has happened, that in Christ they were at the moment of writing not only dead TO sin as a root (this is the foundation doctrine of Rom. vi.), but TO sins as the every day fruit, a line of teaching to which he returns in Eph. iv. 22-25 where he speaks of the putting off concerning the former conversation, the old man, and the putting on of the new man.

Shorn of all explanatory additions, Eph. ii. 1-5 reads "Even you . . . . . hath He quickened together with Christ", but the necessary parenthesis holds up the actual statement, so that we may perceive what a need there was for this quickening, and how it fulfilled the reference to the power to usward who believe, for we are now to read of a mighty spiritual power in direct antagonism to the working of grace. The Apostle's primary intention is to place in correspondence with the raising and seating of Christ, the raising and seating together of the believer, but as in Eph. iii. 1 and 14 the main argument is held up while a most enlightening parenthesis explains the nature of the dispensation of the Mystery, so here, in Eph. ii. 1-4, room must be provided in our examination for a digression full of teaching.

Taking the hint from verse 1 as compared with verse 5 where the theme is resumed, we see that the section before us falls into the following pattern:

A | 1. Dead ones to sins.
B | 2, 3. What was involved:
A walk . . . this world.
An energy . . . the prince of the power of the air.
A conversation . . . the wills of the flesh.
C | 4. Rich.
A | 5. Dead ones to sins.
B | 5, 6. What is involved:
A quickening together.
A raising together.
A seating together.
C | 7. Exceeding riches.

Before these believers died to trespasses and sins, they had walked according to the course of this world. "Walk" is a term which belongs to practical truth. It is the outward expression of inward life, as Shakespeare says, "the apparel oft proclaims the man", and in the practical section the words "put off" and "put on" literally refer to clothing. Eph. ii. 2 and 10 contrast the walk of the old and of the new, but it is left to chapters iv.-vi. to develop this practical aspect, as it does in iv. 1, 17; v. 2, 8 and 15. Here, in Eph. ii. the walk that characterized the believer's past was "according to the course of this world". The word translated "course" here is aion, literally an age, but not to be limited merely to lapse of time, the word carries with it something of character, even as we say today "the golden age", "the age of innocence". This meaning the A.V. has attempted to give by the rendering "course". Weymouth translates the passage freely thus:

> "Your offences and sins which were once habitual to you while you walked in the ways of the world."

In other contexts, the Apostle speaks of "the rudiments of the world" in much the same way. It is the most natural thing "to walk according to the course of the world" for otherwise, there would be a mad scramble, a traffic jam, and progress would be impossible. Yet in spite of this "sweet reasonableness", the fact remains that this world is at present in a state of enmity with God, and to walk in harmony with its ends and aims is contrary to the will of God and to the design of His great salvation. After having said so far, the Apostle draws aside a veil, and shows that what on the surface appear to be the free actions of free agents, are many times the result of a spiritual power that is using the desires of men to accomplish his own ends. This spiritual power is named "The prince of the power of the air". We have already noted the fact that the "principalities" of Eph. i. 21 is the translation of the Greek arche. We now note that the word "prince" translates the Greek word archon. This is a verbal noun, derived from archo, translated usually "to begin" but on two occasions "to reign over" or "to rule over" (Rom. xv. 12; Mark x. 42).

The English word "prince" is from the Latin princeps "taking the first place", and only in a secondary sense it is used of the son of a sovereign. The word archon is used of the rulers of the Jews (Matt. ix. 18), the prince of the devils (Matt. ix. 34), and the princes of the Gentiles (Matt. xx. 25) in one Gospel. In John's Gospel, the title "the prince of this world" is found three times, and "the prince of the power of the air" is not removed from "this world" as a reference to Eph. vi. 12 will show. The word translated "power" in this title is not dunamis, but exousia, a word already found in Eph. i. 21. The fact that arche and exousia (principalities and powers) have a prince (archon) who exercised power (exousia) shows that there is a definite link between the evil powers that work their way in this world, with the principalities and powers beneath the feet of the ascended Lord. This prince is said to be "the prince of the power, or authority, of the air". Why "the air"? Today, our first thought when we speak of the "air" is that gaseous compound of nitrogen, oxygen and carbon that lies next to the surface of the earth, usually styled the atmosphere. The Ancients, however, had no such knowledge. To them the "air" was the lower, even as the "ether" was the upper portion of the atmosphere, and the air often became synonymous with mist, gloom and darkness. The LXX uses the word aer but twice, namely in II Sam. xxii. 12 and in the parallel passage in Psa. xviii.:

"He made darkness pavilions round about Him, dark waters, and thick cloud of the skies."

The A.V. uses the English word "air" twenty-one times to translate the Hebrew shamayim "heaven" when that word is associated with "fowls" or "birds", showing that the heavens extended from the very surface of the earth to the heights above. When we remember the association which the Greek word had with the lower regions of the atmosphere, and so with gloom and darkness, the fact that this Prince exercises his authority in the air, and that his spiritual servants are called "the rulers of the darkness of this world" show something of the nature of his rule. Moreover, in the Revelation when the seventh angel poured out his vial, he poured it "into the air", and so important is this, that we read "and there came a great voice out of the temple of heaven, from the throne, saying, it is done" (Rev. xvi. 17).

Finally, when the Lord descends from heaven with a shout and with the voice of the archangel, His redeemed people meet Him "in the air", a term evidently conveying far more than may at first sight have been believed. They meet their Lord in that region, that once was ruled and invested by the powers of darkness, and as the enemy of truth is dislodged and comes down to earth, so the believer is translated to the vacated sphere in triumph. We must reserve consideration as to the way in which this prince of darkness works his will among the children of men, for our next study.

No.40. The Throne Room (i. 19 - ii. 7).

"What is the depth?" (ii. 2, 3).

pp. 61 - 63

In our last study we learned that those who were called and chosen to the high glory of the church which is the fullness of Him that filleth all in all, were dead TO trespasses and sins, not, as the A.V. puts it, dead IN trespasses and sins. Although this new rendering makes Eph. ii. 1 speak of a blessed state by grace rather than a wretched state by nature, it is obvious that no unfallen being would ever be under the necessity to die TO sins. Consequently we learn in the succeeding verses, that two great forces were at work, combining together to enthrall and condemn the children of men. The first is that "the prince of the power of the air" energizes such, and the second is that this energizing runs not contrary, but parallel with their own desires and intentions. All such are so clearly responsible, that they are described as "sons of disobedience" and "children of wrath".

We have already examined the title "the prince of the power of the air" and must now turn our attention to the way he works, and the ground that the natural man gives him. He is called "the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience". There is an evident correspondence intended by the Holy Spirit. The word "worketh in" is the Greek energeo, a word we have already met both as verb and noun in Eph. i. 19, 20 "working" and "which He wrought in". Two spiritual activities are here revealed. The one "to usward" who believe, the other in the children of disobedience. In Eph. v. 6 the

A.V. puts in the margin against the word "disobedience" the word "unbelief" and in Rom. xv. 31 "do not believe" in the text is altered to "are disobedient" in the margin. There is only one occasion where a word is translated "disobedient" which in the original actually means insubordinate or refractory, namely I Tim. i. 9; in every other case the words disobedience and disobedient translate either apeitheo and its derivatives, "unwilling to be persuaded", "refusing to believe" or parakoe "to hear aside, amiss". Those who were thus energized by the prince of the power of the air, must therefore have had some relation in the first place with faith, and by their reaction, and refusal, laid themselves open to his wiles and deceits.

II Thess. ii. 10-12 has a terrible thing to say about those who "received not the love of the truth"; they become the subject of a strong delusion, and believe "the lie". The A.V. says that those thus energized were "children of disobedience". The truer translation reads "sons of disobedience" and employs a Hebraism that is well known. The same figure is found at the close of a list of dreadful immoralities in Eph. v. 6 where once again "wrath" is said to come upon them. We read elsewhere of "sons of this world" Luke xvi. 8; "sons of light" xvi. 8; and "sons of day" in I Thess. v. 5.

"Ye walked . . . . . we all had our conversation." The Apostle and those who were with him, were no different from, nor better than those just mentioned. They were "children of wrath" as the rest. The keys upon which the devil plays are said to be "the lusts of the flesh" and the response made by the individual concerned "fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind". Without "desire" man would remain inactive and apathetic. Eph. ii. 3 is the only passage in the A.V. where the Greek word thelema is translated "desire", usually thelema is translated "will" as in Eph. i. 1, 5, 9, 11; v. 17; vi. 6. The word however does not convey the idea of determination so much as desire or wish. The words translated "lust" epithumia and the word translated "desire" thelema are in themselves colourless. While "the lusts of the flesh" are practically always evil, the words epithumia and epithumeo are used in a good sense in several places. For examples, in Matt. xiii. 17 the Lord told His disciples that many prophets and righteous men "desired" to see the things which they saw. It is used of the Lord Himself in His great desire to eat the Passover with His disciples (Luke xxii. 15), and of Paul's "desire" to depart (Phil. i. 23). It was because "the flesh" had become the instrument of sin in which no good thing lived, that to follow its desires was but to put oneself at the mercy of the Prince of the power of the air. Such, said the Apostle, were "by nature children of wrath, as the rest".

The use of this word "nature" has caused a great deal of heart searching on the part of teachers and preachers. Phusis, the word so translated, occurs in the N.T. thirteen times, and apart from Eph. ii. 3 it is innocuous. When Paul said that certain practices were "against nature" (Rom. i. 26), and when he said to the Corinthians "doth not even nature itself teach you?" (I Cor. xi. 14), the word is used of something that is right and proper. The selfsame word is used of the "Divine nature" (II Pet. i. 4). We must not confuse this with the word psuchikos (I Cor. xv. 44, 46), which refers to the "soul" as contrasted with the "spirit". Those who were "Jews by nature" (Gal. ii. 15), or those who were "uncircumcision by nature" (Rom. ii. 27), were not esteemed to be wrong because they were thus Jews and Gentiles. Yet here in Eph. ii. 3 "those who were by nature children of wrath even as others, or the rest", will not fit into this category. To discover, as some have, an answer to the problem by saying the "ye" of verse two refers to the Gentiles and the "we" of verse three to the Jews, does not alter the fact that the Jews as well as the Gentiles were "by nature" children of wrath. Josephus in his Antiquities, says of David "but David fell into a very grievous sin, though he was otherwise naturally a righteous and religious man" (Ant. 7:7,1). The laboured comment of Barnes in his commentary, is a testimony both to his extreme sensitiveness to the thorny points of the problem, his great reluctance to admit what is known as the depravity of our nature, yet his conviction at the close, seems worth repeating here:

> "And were by nature." By birth, or before we were converted. By conversion and adoption they became the children of God; before that, they were all the children of wrath. This is, I think, the fair meaning of this important declaration. It does not affirm when they became to be such, or that they were such as soon as they were born, or that they were such before they became moral agents, or that they became such in virtue of their connexion with Adam—whatever may be the truth on these points; but it affirms that before they were renewed, they were the children of wrath. So far as this text is concerned, this might have been true at their very birth; but it does not directly and certainly prove that. It proves that at no time before their conversion were they the children of God, but that their whole condition before that was one of exposure to wrath. Comp. Rom.2:14,27; 1Cor.11:14; Gal.2:15. Some men are born Jews, and some heathen; some free, and some slaves; some white, and some black; some are born to poverty, and some to wealth; some are the children of kings, and some of beggars; but, whatever their rank or condition, they are born exposed to wrath, or in a situation that would render them liable to wrath. But why this is the Apostle does not say. Whether for their own sins, or for the sins of another; whether by a corrupted soul, or by imputed guilt; whether they act as moral agents as soon as born, or at a certain period of childhood, Paul does not say. The children of wrath, exposed to wrath, or liable to wrath. They did not by nature inherit holiness; they inherited that which would subject them to wrath. The meaning has been well expressed by Doddridge, who refers it "to the original apostasy and corruption, in consequence of which men do, according to the course of nature, fall early into personal guilt, and so become obnoxious to the Divine displeasure. Many modern expositors have supposed that this has no reference to any original tendency of our fallen nature to sin, or to native corruption, but that it refers to the habit of sin, or to the fact of their having been the slaves of appetite and passion. I admit that the direct and immediate sense of the passage is, that they were, when without the gospel, and before they were renewed, the children of wrath; but still the fair interpretation is, that they were born to that state, and that that condition was the regular result of their native depravity; and I do not know a more strong or positive declaration that can be made to show that men are by nature destitute of holiness, and exposed to perdition.

The term "by nature" here, must therefore refer to what man had become. Sin and death had so invaded his nature as to distort his reason, give the reins over to the flesh, and make him a slave to his own desires, so that he became an easy prey to the great deceiver. Any other explanation of "by nature" here has the appearance of special pleading, and goes against the obvious meaning of the Apostle. All this however but leads us to the great thought of this section, the fact that the believer is associated with Christ in His high exaltation. To look back to the depths from which we have been called, is salutary. We will walk humbly, for all here is of grace. The change is introduced in Eph. iii. 4 with the words "But God", a triumphant interference of Omnipotent Love. To this we must devote our attention in the articles that follow.

No.41. The Throne Room (i. 19 - ii. 7).

"But God" (ii. 4).

pp. 101 - 103

Although we may have made an advance, and learned an essential truth by recognizing that Eph. ii. 1 does not refer to our state "by nature" dead in sins, but our state by grace "dead to sins", we shall seriously miss our way both in Eph. ii. and Rom. vi. which provides the doctrinal basis, if we stress this death to sin as an end in itself. The goal is life, "that we might live unto God".

> "What shall we say then? Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound? Let it not be so. How shall we that are dead to sin, LIVE ANY LONGER THEREIN? Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into His death? Therefore we are buried with Him by baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised up by the glory of the Father, even so we also should WALK IN NEWNESS OF LIFE. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of His death, we shall be also IN THE LIKENESS OF HIS RESURRECTION . . . . . Now if we died with Christ, we believe that WE SHALL ALSO LIVE WITH HIM . . . . . For in that He died, He died unto sin once: BUT IN THAT HE LIVETH, HE LIVETH UNTO GOD. Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, BUT ALIVE UNTO GOD THROUGH JESUS CHRIST OUR LORD" (Rom. vi. 1-11).

In Gal. ii. 20 Paul not only said that he had been crucified with Christ, but he added "nevertheless I live". And so we come to Eph. ii. 4, 5 where the word wrongly supplied in verse one, is at length recorded "quickened". Eph. ii. is subdivided by the notes of time indicated by the word "in time past" and "at that time" (Eph. ii. 2, 11, 12). The relationship of these time periods can be seen by the following set-out of the subject matter:

A | DOCTRINE |
a | 1-3. Once. Walk. World. Flesh.
b | 4. But God. Mercy. Love.
c | 5-10. Made Alive together.
Raised together.
Seated together.
A | DISPENSATION |
a | 11, 12. Once. Gentiles. In flesh. In world.
b | 13-18. But now. Nigh. One.
c | 19-22. Citizens together.
Framed together.
Builded together.

"But God." At times the interposition of grammatical and exegetical features may appear to be an intrusion where worship seems called for rather than exposition. However, the truth has been channeled to us through words and sentences, and their humble ministry is of first importance to us all. "But" is a word that should not be lightly passed over. It is "a disjunctive conjunction" which at first sounds like a contradiction in terms. "It is a conjunction in which the second sentence or clause is in opposition to the one preceding it, and arrests an inference which that first sentence or clause would else have suggested" (Bain). The close of the last sentence was "children of wrath, even as others". The word "but" does indeed most blessedly "arrest an inference", for without God and His grace, the only inference that we could draw from this state of things would be gloomy in the extreme. An adversative conjunction, however, is of itself of little value, and of no point. The glory of the change that is here manifested is only to be discovered when we say "But God". The structure already given, shows that in verse thirteen the same break is made with the words "but now". In the one it is the intervention of God, Who is rich in mercy, in the other it is the intervention of the person and work of Christ. The original instead of saying "God Who is rich" says ho de theos plousios on, using a participial clause "God being rich". This gives the ground of all that follows.

Instead of looking upon us in our sinful state with loathing, He looked upon us in compassion and mercy. Mercy looks upon wretchedness, grace upon unworthiness. Here mercy is to the fore, rather than guilt is evidently uppermost in Eph. ii. 2, 3. Eleos mercy, gives us eleinos "miserable" (I Cor. xv. 19; Rev. iii. 17) and must be distinguished from the word used by the Publican when he cried "God be merciful to me a sinner" for there the word is hilaskomai, a word implying atonement. If we take the epistle to the Romans as the repository of fundamental doctrine, we shall discover that the word "mercy" does not enter into the teaching of Rom. i.-viii. It is found in Rom. ix., xi., xii. and xv., and especially in connexion with the dispensational position.

So we discover that even though the first part of Eph. ii. is largely doctrinal (sins, death, wrath, salvation, grace, faith, works), and the second half largely dispensational (uncircumcision, distance, aliens, strangers, made nigh, access), yet the whole of the doctrine of Ephesians is an instrument which leads to the supernal glory of heavenly places, and so the dispensational word "mercy" comes early in the record here. God has riches of grace where redemption is in view (Eph. i. 7), and riches of glory where the inheritance is in view (Eph. i. 18), and exceeding riches of grace, when the ages to come are in view (Eph. ii. 7) but here, in the riches of His mercy, He stoops to lift the wretched sons of disobedience and children of wrath to the highest place that glory affords! This rich mercy originates not in our misery, neither does it arise out of any covenant with our "fathers", it is "For His great love wherewith He loved us". The word agape "love" occurs ten times in Ephesians, six of these references being used of the believer's love manifested to the saints (Eph. i. 15; iv. 2, 15, 16; v. 2; vi. 23). The phrase "in love" occurs six times also, being used of God (Eph. i. 4) and of the believer (Eph. iii. 17; iv. 2, 15, 16 and v. 2).

Reverting to Romans again for a comparison, we discover that the Apostle could traverse the whole story of redemption in Rom. i.-iv., without mentioning the love of God once, this being reserved for Rom. v. 1, where he can say:

> "Therefore being justified by faith . . . . . the love of God is shed abroad."

Again, we read right through the gospel of Matthew, without reading once that God loved the sinner or the saint. The same is true of Mark and Luke, unless we include the words of Mark x. 21 "Jesus beholding him loved him". We must traverse the four gospels up to John iii. 16 before we come to the first reference to the love of God to man. The fact therefore that so early in Ephesians, i. 4, we read of the love of God is all the more remarkable, and further to realize that that love was in operation ages before we came into existence makes it even more wonderful. The love of God operating "before the foundation of the world" (Eph. i. 4) prompted His choice of us in Christ, this same love, in time, moves Him in great mercy to quicken us (Eph. ii. 5), and sets before us an endless yet ravishing quest, namely "to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge" (Eph. iii. 19). If Paul, writing his triumphant conclusion to Rom. viii., could say:

> "I am persuaded . . . . . nor principalities nor powers . . . . . shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. viii. 38, 39), how much more we, whose destined sphere of glory is "far above all principality and power", can rejoice in this unchanging everlasting love.

We come back again to Eph. ii. 4. Because of the love that God had towards us, manifesting itself in His choice before the foundation of the world, persisting in spite of the advent of sin and death, enduring even though the destined heirs of glory had become "children of wrath" even as others, loving so much as to go to the extreme of the death of the cross on their account, this love and rich mercy are seen in this passage to issue in life, life from the dead, "He hath quickened us . . . . . raised us". Eph. ii. 5 resumes after the parenthesis, but with one slight difference kai humas "And you": kai hemas "And we". It is a false interpretation that makes the pronoun "you" refer exclusively to the Gentile and the "we" exclusively to the Jewish member of the body. When the Apostle says "we" he speaks of both Jew and Gentile together, one in common need, one in a common salvation, one in glory. If this should be doubted the experiment should be made by the reader, segregating all that is said of "us" and "we" from all that is said of "you". It will be found to yield no intelligible result and is artificial in the extreme. What is true of "you" (Eph. ii. 1) is true of "us" (Eph. ii. 5) for "the both" and "the twain" of later verses are already in view.

No.42. The Throne Room (i. 19 - ii. 7).

"Quickened together."

pp. 121 - 124

The introduction of the italicized words "hath He quickened' into Eph. ii. 1 may at first seem harmless enough, but when we arrive at verse five and read "hath quickened us together with Christ", we perceive that the omission of the words "together with Christ" is serious—indeed fatal to the understanding of the teaching awaiting us. The quickening, the raising and the seating, now to be described, find their power and their glory in the fact that they are "together with Christ", and we must school ourselves so that we do not slip into speaking of them apart from this great fellowship and gracious oneness "with Christ".

Suzoopoieo is of rare occurrence, being found only in Eph. ii. 5 and Col. ii. 13. It is exclusive to the teaching of the Mystery. Elsewhere we read zoopoieo "to quicken, or make alive" but without the preposition sun "together with". This great doctrine is built upon the foundation already laid in Paul's earlier ministry, where the word translated "quicken" is found seven times in the epistles written before Acts xxviii., and once after. Abraham, when he believed the promise recorded in Gen. xv., did not simply believed "God", he believed "God that quickeneth the dead" (Rom. iv. 17). This is the faith that justifies.

This "quickening" is also related to actual and physical resurrection as I Cor. xv. 22, 36 and 45 will show. While literal and future resurrection will be indeed "a making alive", the believer is able by grace to anticipate that day, for He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by His spirit that dwelleth in you (Rom. viii. 11). This great blessing belongs to gospel grace, the law could neither provide righteousness nor life (Gal. iii. 21; II Cor. iii. 6). If a number of believers were asked to complete the series which commences with "crucified with Christ", "dying with Christ", "buried with Christ", the majority would continue "raised with Christ", omitting the intervening and present blessing "quickened with Christ". The seven associations of the believer with his Lord are as follows:

A | The Cross. Crucified with Christ.
  B | The Death. Dead with Christ. The past reckoned.
    C | The Burial. Buried with Christ.
      D | The present experience, quickened with Christ.
    C | The Resurrection. Raised with Christ.
  B | The Ascension. Seated with Christ. The future anticipation.
A | The Glory. Manifested with Christ.

If now we turn to the passages that supply these "texts" we shall find that in most of them "life", "living unto God" or "living in the flesh", is in the context. "I am crucified with Christ" wrote the Apostle to the Galatians, but these words are immediately followed by "nevertheless I live" (Gal. ii. 20). "If we be dead with Christ" found in Rom. vi. 8 is immediately followed by "we believe that we shall also live with Him". The statements of Rom. vi. 3-5 "ye . . . . . were baptized into His death", "buried with Him by baptism into death", "the likeness of His death", are followed at once by "the likeness of His resurrection".

Not only so, but if we retrace our steps and return again to Gal. ii., we shall find the present "quickening" there too. Paul does not say "I have been crucified with Christ, nevertheless I know that my Redeemer liveth, and in the latter days I shall live again in resurrection", he says "nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I NOW LIVE IN THE FLESH I live by the faith of the Son of God, Who loved me, and gave Himself for me". So, in Rom. vi., future and literal resurrection is anticipated by a "walk in newness of life" and "the likeness of His resurrection", and we are enjoined to reckon ourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but ALIVE UNTO GOD through Jesus Christ our Lord. This present "quickening" enables us to shake off the dominion of sin (Rom. vi. 14); the power of the "old man" (Rom. vi. 6), and also enables us not only to rise and walk in newness of life, but to serve in newness of spirit (Rom. vii. 6).

Let us tarry a little while we ponder some of these present anticipations of resurrection life. We have already referred to Gal. ii. 20, we must refer to it again. The Apostle there says that even though he had been "crucified with Christ" nevertheless he lived. It will be evident to every reader that Paul was not literally and physically crucified with Christ, but he was "reckoned" to have died with Him, and enjoined the believer to take his stand also: "likewise reckon ye also yourselves . . . . . dead . . . . . alive" (Rom. vi. 11). Paul lived by "reckoning" as God reckoned, standing where grace had placed him, realizing that in this position and in this position only was life and victory.

"Yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." How are we to understand this? If we take the passage to extremes, it will mean that Paul as Paul had been obliterated, that he was indeed non-existent. If that be the teaching, then Paul was not saved; he had been destroyed. Paul could not look forward to receiving a crown of righteousness, for he had not kept the faith, or finished the course; Christ had taken his place and Paul no longer counted as an individual. The use of the word ego "not I" finds illustration and explanation in Rom. vii.:

> "I was alive without the law once . . . . . sin revived, and I died . . . . . it slew me . . . . . I am carnal, sold under sin; for that which I do I allow not: for what I would, that do I not; but what I hate, that do I . . . . . now then it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me . . . . . so then with the mind I myself serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin" (Rom. vii. 9-25).

Here is a complicated argument, and a double use of the ego. The ego evidently can be dominated by sin, having its seat of operation in the flesh, which term embraces both "the members" and "the mind" (Rom. vii. 23 and viii. 7). Paul however has been redeemed, and he now sees the war that is going on in his members is waged against the law of his mind, and that with the mind he can now serve God. He now, as it were sides with God, and speaks of the new man as "I myself". What Paul teaches in Gal. ii. 20 is not that his body was tenantless, or that he had become a nonentity, but that he had a new master, Christ, now taking the place previously occupied by sin, "the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death" (Rom. viii. 2). "We have the mind of Christ" (I Cor. ii. 16). Later in Rom. xii., the Apostle returns to the theme and says that we are "transformed by the renewing of the mind" which is expressed in Eph. iv. 23 as the renewing of the spirit of the mind.

The dominion of sin and death has been broken. Christ now has "dominion", "dominion" being the Greek verb kurieuo, and "Lord" being the Greek word kurios. We acknowledge the Lordship of Christ now, and in so doing make it gloriously possible for the life we now live in the flesh to manifest and anticipate this resurrection power and glorious victory that are resident in the concept "Lord". Gal. ii. 20 says that this life now lived in the flesh is by "the faith of the Son of God". Rom. viii. 9-11, which immediately follows the statement concerning the mind of the flesh (the carnal mind) attributes the quickening of the mortal body here and now to the indwelling of the spirit of Christ. "If Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin; but the spirit is life because of righteousness", and if this resurrection spirit dwell in us, He that raised our Saviour will also quicken these mortal bodies by that same indwelling spirit. In Col. ii. the Apostle not only repeats the teaching of Eph. ii. (Col. ii. 13), but applies it with the trenchant question:

> "Wherefore if ye be dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why, AS THOUGH LIVING in the world, are ye subject to ordinances?" (Col. ii. 20).

We can perhaps appreciate the reason why the Apostle broke the thread of his argument in Eph. ii. 5, 6 by interposing the words that are placed in parenthesis (by grace ye are saved). The word here translated "ye are saved" is the perfect passive participle "ye have been saved". Sometimes salvation is introduced as a process "ye are being saved" as in I Cor. i. 18; here it is a work done in the past which has continued and present effect. The words that are interjected come again in verse eight, where they introduce the great plan of salvation by grace through faith. It is important however to remember that before the Apostle has said "raised together" and "made to sit together" which seem to include nearly all that salvation has wrought, he cay say, immediately after the quickening has been mentioned, "ye have been saved by grace", for quickening means life, and life however feeble, if it be life after death, is marked with immortality. Moreover, this life is not isolated, it is "with Christ". Those who have passed from death unto life, those in whom the minutest germ of incorruptible life is at work, these are they who "have been saved". True, salvation is still spoken of as a "hope" (Rom. viii. 24), and as yet unseen; nevertheless the word used in Rom. viii. 24 is esothemen "ye were saved", saved from the beginning, even though salvation in some of its aspects is yet future.

No.43. The Throne Room (i. 19 - ii. 7).

Roused together (sunegeiro) and seated together.

pp. 141 - 144

We have considered something of the teaching of Eph. ii. 5, and now give our attention to the next revelation of our union with Christ and His work, namely the opening words of verse 6:

> "And hath raised us up together."

Christ is set forth as both "raised" and "seated" (Eph. i. 20); the believer here is said to be "raised up together" and "made to sit together", blessings that are most evidently intended as a sequel. Before we proceed, there is a great need for discrimination, as there are two words used in the original which are translated "raise", but only one of them is compounded with the preposition "with". The urgent need to discriminate will be seen when we remember that there were some who said in the Apostle's day that "the resurrection is past already". An article appeared some time ago in which the reader was informed that the Greek word for resurrection was anastasia, a word derived from anistemi, to raise, and the writer then went on to expound the wonder of being "raised with Christ", without instructing the reader that sun "together with" is never used with the Greek words anistemi or anastasis. This even though innocently done, is nevertheless evil, for it provided a basis for an untrue inference. The uninstructed reader would naturally assume that just as there is the compound exanastasis "the out-resurrection", so there must be sunanastasis, and this being assumed, provided the basis for the teaching that the believer is thus "raised together" with Christ, and as the writer referred to put it, "the believer had been ALREADY RAISED with Christ", consequently for such the resurrection was past already! There is not one single occurrence of the words sunanastasis or sunistemi in the N.T. The word of Eph. ii. 6 employs another term, the word there being sunegeiro. This word we find in two passages in Colossians:

> "Buried with Him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with Him through the faith of the operation of God, Who hath raised Him out from dead ones" (Col. ii. 12 literally).
>
> "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God" (Col. iii. 1).

Egeiro differs from anistemi in that it means "rouse" rather than "raise", "to wake up" rather than "stand up". The A.V. occasionally gives this primary translation "His disciples . . . . . awoke Him" (Matt. viii. 25). "It is time to awake out of sleep" (Rom. xiii. 11). "Awake thou that sleepest" (Eph. v. 14). In this passage taken from Ephesians, we find both words occurring thus:

A	Awake (egeiro)	\	subject "sleep".
B	Thou that sleepest (katheudo)	/
A	Arise (anistemi)	\	subject "death".
B	From the dead (nekros)	/

Here we see "arousing" where the subject is sleep, and "arising" or "standing up" when the subject is the dead. Even where the A.V. uses "arise" to translate egeiro it is evident that awaking out of sleep is intended as in Matt. ii. 13. Diegeiro is found in Matt. i. 24 "raised from sleep" and Luke viii. 24 "awoke Him", and gregoreo is translated "watch", "wake" or "be vigilant". Diagregoreo occurs in Luke ix. 32 "when they were awake, they saw His glory". It is the teaching of Scripture that the believer will be RAISED from the dead and anistemi and anastasis is rightly used in this connexion, but where we read "raised together with" it is always the compound of egeiro. Even though we are still here in mortal bodies, we have been "made alive with Christ" and have been ROUSED with Him, a blessed anticipation of the ultimate resurrection from the dead.

Sunegeiro "to raise (or rouse) together" occurs three times in the N.T.: Eph. ii. 6; Col. ii. 12 and iii. 1. A person awakened from sleep, usually is first roused and then stands up. This is the experimental order of faith. We are "roused" even here, in this life, we shall "stand up" in the day of resurrection. If we are "roused" it suggests that we are at least awake and aware, and we can be exhorted to watch. I Thess. iv. and v. clearly distinguishes between the full awakening of future resurrection, and the partial "arousing" even here and now. In I Thess. iv. 13, 14, 15, "sleep" and "asleep" translate the Greek word koimaomai; these are described as "the dead in Christ".

In I Thess. v. 6, 7, 10 the word so translated is katheudo. Now katheudo means "to lie down to sleep", a voluntary action, whereas koimaomai means rather "put to sleep" involuntarily, as in death. The one is voluntary and so can be used of a sleepy person who should be watching, the other means to fall asleep involuntarily, hence is used as a figure of death. The word to "wake" in I Thess. v. 10 is the Greek gregoreo "to watch" and is so translated in verse six. There it is associated with being drunk and being sober, not with physical death, whereas I Thess. iv. deals only with death, and not with moral sluggishness. When the Scriptures speak of the Saviour Himself, both words egeiro "to rouse" and anistemi "to cause to stand up, to raise" are employed, for in His case there was no interval as there is between the conversion and quickening of the believer, and his resurrection in glory. As we have before remarked, Eph. v. 14 differentiates the two terms:

> AWAKE (egeiro to arouse) thou that SLEEPEST, and > ARISE (anistemi to cause to stand up) from the DEAD.

We see that the words "and hath raised us up together" do not teach that for the believer "the resurrection is past already", and in the same way, we must remember that the words that follow "and made us sit together in heavenly places" do not alter the fact that those originally addressed were living at Ephesus or some other city; they were still here upon earth surrounded by sin and temptation, called upon to walk worthy of their calling and to avoid complicity with the unfruitful works of darkness.

Even though made to sit together in heavenly places, where they neither marry nor are given in marriage, those so blessed still belong to that society in which there was husband and wife, parent and child, and in connexion with the obedient children there is even added the promise of long life "on the earth". Further, complete armour is provided in view of a future "evil day". The word translated "made to sit together" is sunkathizo and the only other occurrence in the N.T. is in Luke xxii. 55. There are comparatively few occasions when kathizo means simply "to sit" in the sense of resting, it is generally associated with authority. This idea of authority in connexion with being seated is found in the use of kathedra "a chair" in English.

A cathedral is so named because it contains "the Bishop's throne" or "chair" so we use the expression "ex cathedra" of one who by reason of his office speaks with authority. Similarly we use the English word "chair" (which is itself derived through the Latin cathedra from the Greek). We speak of "taking the chair" or of "a chair" meaning a professorship at a university. So we find kathizo used:

(1) For the authority of a teacher. "When He was set." "The Pharisees sit in Moses' seat."
(2) For the authority of a judge. "Pilate . . . . . sat down in the judgment seat."
(3) For the authority of a king. "When the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of His glory."

It has special significance when it is associated with the right hand of God.

> "He was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God" (Mark xvi. 19).

The word kathizo has a special significance in the epistle to the Hebrews:

> "When He had by Himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high" (Heb. i. 3).
>
> "Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: We have such an high priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens" (viii. 1).
>
> "But this man, after He had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down on the right hand of God" (x. 12).
> "Looking unto Jesus the Author and Finisher of faith; Who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God" (xii. 2).

It is entirely foreign to the teaching of Hebrews, to think of associating any believer with the seated Christ. The teaching of Hebrews is rather that as the high priest, He was there ALONE (Heb. ix. 7). If it came as a shock to Peter to be told "Rise, Peter; kill, and eat" (Acts x. 13), how much more would he have said "not so, Lord", had anyone dared to associate the holiest believer of either Israel or the church with the seated Christ! One believer who has come to the conclusion that Hebrews presents to us the ultimate revelation of the Scriptures, was quite logical when he denounced us for teaching such a thing. Yet Eph. ii. 6 still stands written. The Hebrew believers were bidden "to draw near", but none were ever told that they were made "to sit" together there. This but emphasizes the extraordinary nature of the calling of Ephesians. It is one of a series of unique blessings found in the epistle of the Mystery, but revealed nowhere else.

The words "with Christ" must be repeated mentally in Eph. ii. 6. We are quickened together "with Christ". Eph. ii. 5 says so. We are raised together "with Christ", for there is no point in stating that the believer today is raised together with other believers, for that takes place at the coming of the Lord. By all the laws of language and of sense the same must be true of the third association. This seating together is said to be "in heavenly places". This looks back to the closing verses of Eph. i. where Christ is both "raised" and "seated", in the same heavenly places, at the right hand of God. If this be not truth in excelsis, it approaches very nearly to blasphemy. This position is far above anything revealed elsewhere, and but emphasizes the distinctive character of the truth reveled in this epistle of the Mystery. The term "in Christ Jesus" embraces the three verbs:

Quickened together	\
Raised together	}	In Christ Jesus
Seated together	/

The title, as we have shown elsewhere, is exclusive to the ministry to the Gentiles. It is never found in Hebrews. "In Christ Jesus" occurs seven times in Ephesians, thus:

"To the faithful in Christ Jesus" (Eph. i. 1).
"Quickened, raised, seated together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus" (i. 4).
"In His kindness toward us through (lit. in) Christ Jesus' (Eph. ii. 7).
"His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus" (ii. 10).
"But now in Christ Jesus . . . . . made nigh" (ii. 13).
"The purpose of the ages . . . . . in Christ Jesus" (iii. 11).
"Unto Him be glory in the church in (lit.) Christ Jesus" (iii. 21).

There is, as it were a seven-runged ladder, reaching from earth to heaven, each one being a compound of sun "with". Believers are reckoned to be "crucified with"; "dead with"; "buried with"; "quickened with"; "raised with"; "seated with" and finally be "manifested with" Christ. We have therefore reached in Eph. ii. 6 the sixth and last step of "reckoning" in grace that leads to the seventh step, the "realization" in glory. That step is found, not in Ephesians, but in the parallel epistle to the Colossians, namely in Col. iii. 1-4.

This seven-rung ladder is dealt with in the series "Reckoning and Realization".

No.44. The Throne Room (i. 19 - ii. 7).

An exhibition of kindness in the ages to come.

pp. 161 - 164

We have mounted in faith the rungs of the ladder "with Christ" until we find ourselves potentially "there, where Christ sitteth", the last and highest anticipation of the glory of the Mystery, until faith shall be exchanged for sight, and hope to realization. The final, the seventh rung of the ladder, is reserved for Col. iii. to make clear that when Christ, Who is our life, shall appear or be made manifest, we shall appear or be made manifest "with Him" in glory. The verse of Eph. ii., which concludes the present section, namely verse seven, takes us forward to that day of glory, but instead of dwelling on the one great moment of manifestation, it surveys the remainder of intervening time before the consummation is reached, and gives a glimpse of the nature of our reception and the kind of treatment we may expect when we are presented "without spot or wrinkle or any such thing" at the right hand of the Majesty on high. The first call to pause and consider is the purpose that is expressed in the word "that" with which verse seven opens.

Hina. Some words translated "that" focus attention on the manner and method adopted, as II Thess. i. 12 "so that the name . . . . . may be glorified", and in I Cor. i. 29 "so that no flesh may boast"; others on comparison, or to time, but hina focuses attention on purpose and result. In the generality of cases, hina is followed by the subjunctive "in order that He may, or that He might". This is the condition of the sentence now before us in Eph. ii. 7. The "purpose" or "intention" of all that has gone before is now to be unfolded. This union with Christ in His death, resurrection and present session at the right hand of God, is "in order that" the way may be cleared for such an outpouring of kindness as to exhaust the possibility of language to describe. We give a new translation of verse seven:

> "In order that He might exhibit in those ages which are coming, the surpassing riches of His grace in kindness toward us in Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 7).

"Exhibit" A.V. "shew". "Shew" may mean "to make manifest" as in II Pet. i. 14, but here in Eph. ii. 7 the thought rather is to "exhibit". The original word is derived from deiknumi, the word used in Rev. i. 1 and so gives "example" (Jude 7), and "make a shew" (Col. ii. 15). Paul uses this word when he speaks of himself "that in me first Jesus Christ might show forth all longsuffering, for a pattern" (I Tim. i. 16), or in Phil. i. 28 "an evident token".

Hupodeigma is translated "example" (Heb. viii. 5), and "patterns" (Heb. ix. 23). Some, like Pharaoh, are exhibitions of wrath; some through mercy are exhibitions of grace, and Rom. ix. which speaks of the exhibition of wrath in Pharaoh, contrasts the vessels of wrath with other vessels of mercy which He had afore prepared unto glory. Let us never forget that all such vessels of mercy were "children of wrath" even as those that were left; consequently we can understand the interposition of the words "by grace ye are saved" in Eph. ii. 5 and the succeeding emphasis upon grace apart from merit "lest any man should boast" (Eph. ii. 9). The word hina comes in verse nine as well as in verse seven. It is of the Divine purpose that in the ages to come He shows his kindness to us in Christ Jesus, and it is also the Divine purpose "that" no man should boast.

When at last the church of the Mystery is manifested in glory, it will be among other things "an exhibit" of what grace means to all the serried ranks of spirit beings. We do not do the passage justice however if we stay here at the word grace. We have "riches" of grace, but even that is not all. We have "exceeding riches" of grace to consider, to preach and to give thanks to God. Even that is not all, for these exceeding riches of grace are to be expressed in "kindness" toward us. "Riches" of grace, of glory, of Christ, and of full assurance, characterize the epistles Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians; and Romans speaks of the riches of His goodness, and glory, and contains the doxology that opens with "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God", but there are only two passages in all Paul's epistles which say that God was or is rich.

> "Though He was rich, yet for our sakes He became poor" (II Cor. viii. 9).
> "God, Who is rich in mercy" (Eph. ii. 4).

No believer who rejoices in salvation by sacrifice will need a lengthy argument to prove that the one passage is linked to the other, as is cause and effect. We can only be the recipient of these riches of grace, because He Who was rich, became poor on our account. God Who is rich in mercy, provided the steps, "quickened with", "raised with", "seated with", and He also provides the goal "manifested with", or, as in the verse before us, kindness beyond dreams. The term "the ages to come", could strike a note of fear were we not assured of this grace, but Paul includes the age to come in that which is placed in subjection beneath the feet of Christ, and we have already seen how this is accomplished.

His being raised	is balanced by our being raised with Him
His being seated	is balanced by our being seated with Him

So now we can add a third correspondence:

> The age to come is beneath His feet; the ages to come can contain nothing but grace and kindness for His believing people.

These riches are said to be "exceeding" huperballo, a word that occurs three times in Ephesians:

> "The exceeding greatness of His power toward us" (Eph. i. 19).
> "The exceeding riches of His grace . . . . . towards us" (ii. 7).
> "The love of Christ, which passeth knowledge" (iii. 19).

An hyperbole in language is a figure of exaggeration (to be distinguished from hyperbole the answering of an argument by anticipation), and generally indicates that the subject is so vast as to go beyond the powers of human language to describe. Huperballo is composed of huper "over" and ballo "to throw". There are four derivatives from ballo in Ephesians that seem to grow in richness when seen together. Two are used of the Lord in His grace, and two of the evil one in his attack. We were chosen in Him "before the overthrow (katabole) of the world" (Eph. i. 4). We look forward to the ages to come, to exceeding (hyperbole) riches of grace (Eph. ii. 7). There is an enemy, named the devil (diabolos) to whom we should give no place (Eph. iv. 27) and this enemy has fiery darts (belos) all of which are extinguished by the shield of faith.

Those who are blessed in the huper or super-heavens (Eph. i. 20, 21) are blessed huper, or exceedingly above the comprehension of the human mind. The exceeding riches of His grace that are to be exhibited to us in the ages to come will be manifested in a peculiarly gracious way. Grace, charis, has already been exhibited toward us in our salvation (Eph. ii. 8); and grace is the very denomination of the present dispensation (Eph. iii. 2). The glory of His grace and the riches of His grace are the moving causes of our acceptance and redemption (Eph. i. 6, 7), the very word "made accepted" being charitoo. Even the forgiveness of Eph. iv. 32 whether that of God extended to us, or of one believer to another, is charizomai. These are all references to what is past or present, but Eph. ii. 7 refers to the future. The grace that saved, that forgave, that accepted, is the grace that will prompt the Divine Kindness. This is one of the fruits of the Spirit (Gal. v. 22), where the Greek word is used as a near synonym with goodness, and where in Titus iii. 4 it is a near synonym with "philanthropy" (see original).

Chrestotes "kindness" occurs fourteen times in the Septuagint version and consistently translates variants of the Hebrew tob meaning "good" or "goodness", e.g. Psa. xxi. 3 and cvi. 5. Some of the translations of chrestos and chrestotes are suggestive: "easy" (Matt. xi. 30); "gracious" (I Pet. ii. 3); "goodness" (Rom. xi. 22) and "gentleness" (Gal. v. 22). The idea of future glory has been so coloured by magnificence and splendour, that the fact that the goal of the ages is expressed in terms of home and family is likely to be lost sight of, or relegated to the background. Here, the epistle of the Mystery brings into relation with the highest position of glory such lovely and homely things as "gentleness", being "easy" and "kindness".

Whenever it falls to our lot to interview or be interviewed by the great and the wealthy, there is, however hidden, an element of uneasiness and the sense of an ordeal. All this is absent from the believer's mind as he contemplates this most high and holy introduction. "Made meet" for the inheritance of the saints in light; "accepted" in the Beloved, having not only access, but "boldness and access with confidence", he looks to be presented faultless and with joy, and then when the presentation is over, not to feel strange among his celestial associates, not to be overawed by the presence of principalities and powers, but to be "easy", to be treated with overwhelming kindness, all because we are viewed by the Father as being not "through" as the A.V. reads, but "in Christ Jesus". Thus ends the section which visualizes a throne, a seated position in heavenly places, a glory far above all! Thus ends this amazing revelation of supernal glory, not on the note of overwhelming brilliance, but on the lovely and lowly note of kindness, a kindness that sets us at "ease", a kindness greater in richness but not different in kind from that we are enjoined to show to one another here and now.

No.45. The Almonry (ii. 8 - 10).

The oblation of God.

pp. 181 - 183

The reader will remember that we have adopted the figure of a great house to set forth the literary structure of Ephesians, and should he have commenced to study with us since the opening articles were published in Volume XXXV, he will see the diagram of the Great House with an explanation of the chart, on pages 141 to 146.

The present section, Eph. ii. 8-10, we have called "The Almonry". This word comes to us through the French aumonerie, which is derived from the Greek word eleemosune, meaning "pity" or "mercy". This was a room in which alms were distributed, especially in monastic buildings. Eleos has already appeared in Eph. ii. 4 where we read of God Who is rich in "mercy", and this is its translation in every one of the twenty-eight occurrences of the word.

Eleeo means to have pity, have mercy, obtain mercy or have compassion and it is so translated in the A.V.

Eleemosune is limited to Matthew, Luke and the Acts, where it is translated alms and almsdeed. Those to whom alms are given, are generally those who have little or nothing of themselves. Where Luke xii. 33 reads "sell that ye have, and give alms", Matt. xix. 21 reads "Go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor", where "give to the poor" is an evident synonym for "give alms". We therefore have full justification for adopting the idea of an almonry in this series, where the rooms in a great building are used to symbolize the structural subdivisions of the epistle.

Ephesians ii. 8 - 10

A | For by grace are ye saved through faith
B | a | Not of yourselves
b | The gift of God
a | Not of works lest (hina) any should boast FAITH
A | For we are His workmanship, created
B | a | Unto good works
b | Foreordained of God
a | That (hina) we should walk in them WORKS

Salvation is not out of works, but it is nevertheless unto works, for the same God that "predestined" us (prohorizo) from before the foundation of the world, as surely "foreordained" (proetoimazo) that there should be a gracious practice corresponding to our high calling. He Who elected us apart from any personal merit on our part, has declared that this unmerited election is demonstrated by our attitude to His Word and the gospel (I Thess. i. 4, 5), while Peter speaks of those virtues which, when added to faith, make our calling and election sure (II Pet. i. 10). The fact that the Apostle introduces this testimony regarding salvation by "for", shows that he related the past outpouring of grace in "salvation" with the future outpouring of "kindness", seeing in the one the root, and the other the fruit of the all embracing grace of God; "for by grace are ye saved through faith".

The emphasis here is placed upon "grace"; it is the instrumental cause of salvation; "faith", which is added, being the causa apprehendens, as Hooker has said "the hand which putted on Christ to justification". Grace is objective, the cause. As Rom. iv. 16 puts it "Therefore it is of faith, that it might be by grace; that the promise might be sure". Faith is subjective, the medium. The section before us is the shortest in the whole epistle, not because Paul held the gospel of salvation cheaply, but because he was writing to those already saved, seeking to lead them on. What he does say, however, is to the point, but for a full outline of salvation by grace through faith, and which is not of works, we must read his great epistle to the Romans. Here, in Eph. ii. 8-10, as in Phil. iii. 9, the doctrine of Romans is epitomized, and we are supposed to know it; it is the foundation upon which the superstructure of Ephesians is built. He who knows the epistle to the Romans, can never mix grace or faith, with works and wages (Rom. xi. 6). Grace imparts, faith receives. "Are ye saved" este sesosmenoi literally "ye are those having been saved". This combination is very strong. It unites the past with the present. You have been, and still are, saved. The participle "having been saved" is almost a title—how the redeemed can be named.

"And THAT not of yourselves, it is the gift of God." The fact that the word "faith" is followed immediately by "that" has led some to teach from this passage that "faith is the gift of God". This has been adopted by hyper-Calvinism, in opposition to the teaching of Calvin himself (see Alford's note) and has introduced the element of fatalism in the gospel of salvation. There is such a thing as "faith, the gift of God", but it is a special gift to one who is already a believer (I Cor. xii. 9). George Müller had a "gift" of faith, and by that faith he built and maintained the orphanage that bears his name, but that gift of faith must not be confused with the faith whereby George Müller believed the gospel unto his salvation, neither must we teach that because we are "believers" that we are called upon to emulate George Müller. Let us consider the matter more fully.

> "He that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him" (John iii. 36).

Can we paraphrase this solemn passage and say:

> "He to whom God withholds the gift of faith . . . . . the wrath of God abideth on him"?

Can man be held responsible for not believing, if believing is in the sovereign disposal of God? We might as well hold that man be held responsible for the fact that he cannot live without food, water or air. Before attempting an interpretation of this or any other passage, attention must be paid to the grammar. The word "that" in Eph. ii. 8 is the Greek touto and it is NEUTER; the word "faith" is FEMININE, therefore "the grace by faith salvation" must be conceived of as a whole, the word faith forming a part of the parcel, and it is this, this scheme of salvation which, while it excludes works, admits faith, it is this, that is the gift of God.

A number of derivatives of the Greek root do are translated "gift" in the N.T., which root is easily recognizable in the English words "donate", "donor".

Didomi, the verb "to give" occurs twelve times in Ephesians.

Doma, something given, a gift. Occurs in Eph. iv. 8 "And gave gifts unto men".

Dorea, a free gift, in Eph. iii. 7 and iv. 7 "the gift of grace" and "the gift of Christ".

Doron is a special form of the word, employed as an equivalent of the Hebrew corban, and it is this word that is selected by the Apostle to speak of salvation as "the gift of God". Doron occurs twenty-one times, and with the one exception of Eph. ii. 8 it is used of gifts and offerings made by man either to God, or to their fellows. Doron is used of the gifts brought by the wise men (Matt. ii. 11) and of the gift offered to God (Matt. v. 23, 24). It is "corban" (Mark vii. 11), and so on. The word corban comes from the Hebrew qarab "to come near" and in a special sense, to bring an offering to the Lord. We learn from Rabbinical sources that there were thirteen Corban chests in the temple, formed like trumpets, each set apart for its own peculiar use. It was into one of the Corban chests that the widow cast her mites. The LXX uses the word doron in thirty-seven occurrences of the Hebrew qarab. In Leviticus for example (Lev. i. 2, 3, 10, 14, 15, etc.). The fact that Eph. ii. 8 uses a word that means an "oblation" something "offered" makes it all the more impossible that the passage should mean that "faith" is the gift of God. In what sense can faith be conceived of as an oblation, an offering made by God? We already know that the blessings of the church of the Mystery are peculiarly "all spiritual", that the sphere of their enjoyment is peculiar "in heavenly places", that the period of their choice is peculiar "before the overthrow of the world". These make manifest the exceeding grace of God to which is added the "kindness" that is in store in the ages to come.

What can we say however when we learn that in this calling it is God Who makes the oblation, it is God, not the humble worshipper, Who brings the offering; it is God Who comes out with both hands full of blessing, and pours them out at the feet of the worthless and undone. Salvation by grace through faith is the gift, the oblation of God. Let us close our lexicons, let us put aside for a moment our grammars, let us rather bow our heads in worship as we say out of full hearts:

"Thanks be unto God for His unspeakable gift."

No.46. The Almonry (ii. 8 - 10).

"Not of works . . . . . unto good works."

pp. 221 - 224

We have learned with wondering adoration that the great plan of salvation by grace through faith is the oblation (corban) of God. It hardly seems necessary to continue "not of works", but He Who knows the heart of man, even redeemed man, knows only too well that he will seize upon any pretext to "boast".

> "Not of works, lest any man should boast. For we are His workmanship" (Eph. ii. 9, 10).

The word ek "out of" is emphasized here.

> "And that not out of (ek) yourselves: it is the gift of God: not our of (ek) works, lest any many should boast."

This is the consistent message preached by Paul. The same use of the preposition ek is found in Phil. iii. 9:

> "And be found in Him, not having mine own righteousness, which is out of (ek) the law, but that which is through faith of Christ, the righteousness which is out of (ek) God by faith."

These passages but echo the basic teaching of the epistle to the Romans where the word ek is used continually with this meaning. Here are some of the passages by way of example:

> "From faith", "by faith" (Rom. i. 17).
> "By the deeds of the law"; "by faith"; "by works"; "of the law"; "of faith" (Rom. iii. 20, 30; iv. 2, 16).

In all these references, the preposition ek is used. Summing up the way of salvation in Rom. iii., the Apostle says "where is boasting then?" and answers his own question with the word "excluded" (Rom. iii. 27). Summing up the way of salvation in I Cor. i., he says "that no flesh should glory in His presence" (I Cor. i. 29). Boasting or glorying in Christ Jesus, is the antithesis of confidence in the flesh, according to Phil. iii. 3. Whatever changes may have been made after Acts xxviii., one feature remains constant; salvation is of grace, and Eph. ii. 8-10 is not revealing this truth for the first time; it is stressing and enriching it as the basis of the exceeding grace made manifest in the present dispensation of the Mystery. Instead of our works coming into the picture, our attention is drawn to the Great Worker Himself "For we are His workmanship".

Alford, Ellicott, Wordsworth and others, translated the word poiema "workmanship" by "handiwork" and the usage of the word in the O.T. favours this more intimate idea. For example Isa. xxix. 16 uses the word poiema in the LXX for the work of a potter. In spite of the busy activity of man, there is only one reference in the thirteen occurrences of the word "maker" in the O.T. that refers to man, namely in Isa. xxii. 11; all the references in Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Jeremiah, Hosea and the rest of Isaiah, speak of God as "The Maker". Job found assurance in the fact that God had a desire unto the work of His hands (Job xiv. 15) and man's dominion consisted in his suzerainty over the works of His own hands (Psa. viii. 3).

Psa. cii. 25, which speaks of the heavens as the work of God's hands, is quoted in Heb. i. 10 as of Christ. The word creation brings with it something of the Majesty of the Divine fiat "He spake and it was done", "Let there be light, and there was light", but when the Apostle said "we are His workmanship", His handiwork, there is something homely, something lovely about that shaping, moulding, handling of material, as the Great Potter forms out of bare clay a thing of extraordinary beauty. Because of this, the Greeks used the word poiema and poietes of a "poem" and a "poet", for a poem, even though the child of inspiration, is nevertheless something upon which much love and labour must be spent.

It is reported that Tennyson revised his poem Maud a thousand times, and the reader will remember the comment of one lover of Shakespeare, when told that Shakespeare never blotted a line, "Would God he had blotted a thousand!" It is a wonderful thought that the Church of the One Body can be looked upon as God's Poem. Poiema is used in one other passage, namely that of Rom. i. 20 "things that are made" where the Apostle says:

> "The invisible things of Him from (since) the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made."

What the works of His hand in creation are to the world, making manifest His eternal power and Godhead, so the work of His hands is the church; it manifests the invisible characteristics of the God of all grace. We are a new creation, and indeed, creation immediately follows the making of Eph. ii. 10.

> "Created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God before ordained that we should walk in them."

Ktizo "to create" occur seven times in the Prison Epistles, thus:

> "Created in Christ Jesus unto good works" (Eph. ii. 10).
> "For to make in Himself of the twain one new man" (Eph. ii. 15).
> "Hid in God, Who created all things by Jesus Christ" (Eph. iii. 9).
> "The new man . . . . . created in righteousness" (Eph. iv. 24).
> "By Him were all things created" (Col. i. 16).
> "All things were created by Him, and for Him" (Col. i. 16).
> "The new man . . . . . the image of Him that created him" (Col. iii. 10).

These references fall into the following pattern:

A | Eph. ii. 10. Created in Christ Jesus. |
b1 | Eph. ii. 15. New man. doctrinal
c1 | Eph. iii. 9. All things. ref. to Mystery b1 | Eph. iv. 24. New man. practical b2 | Col. i. 15, 16. Image. Creator c2 | Col. i. 16. "All things." ref. to Body the Church
b2 | Col. iii. 10. Image. created

It is evident that in the Prison Epistles, creation is mainly concerned with the Mystery and things relating to the Mystery, and the attempt to make Col. i. 16 bear the burden of universal reconciliation is seen to be ruled out by the limitation of the context and the evidence of the concordance.

There are some teachers, who because they have recognized the utter impossibility of "good works" ever being admitted as a procuring or a qualifying cause of our acceptance, seem to have developed an antipathy to good works altogether, as though Paul had not continued "not of works . . . . . unto good works". Works are the visible fruit on the tree, making it evident that the invisible root is alive and active. "By their fruits ye shall know them" is a principle true for all time. Just as balance is exhibited in the epistle as a whole, so is it in its parts. To emphasize the complete exclusion of works as a cause of salvation is right; to omit reference to the need to produce good works after salvation is wrong. The only thing that is true is proportionate emphasis upon both doctrines. This quality of balance may be seen in other of the Apostle's writings. What can be clearer than the following?

> "Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us" (Titus iii. 5).

Yet in the next verse or so comes the balance:

> "This is a faithful saying, and these things I will that thou insist strenuously that they which have believed in God might be careful to maintain good works" (Titus iii. 8), which is a complete parallel with Eph. ii. 9, 10:

> "Not by works . . . . . unto good works . . . . . ordained that we should walk in them."

Both in our words and our works we may deny the Lord.

> "They profess that they know God; but in works they deny Him, being abominable, and disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate" (Titus i. 16).
>
> "Speak thou the things which become sound doctrine . . . . . in all things showing thyself a pattern of good works" (Titus ii. 1, 7).
>
> "The grace of God that bringeth salvation . . . . . teaching us that . . . . . we should live . . . . . looking . . . . . zealous of good works" (Titus ii. 11-14).

The last reference is another parallel with Eph. ii. 9, 10. The grace that saves us teaches us to "live . . . . . looking". The redemption that saves us has a twofold object, viz.:

(1) To redeem us from all iniquity.
(2) To purify us unto good works.

This new creation has a characteristic walk. Exactly what the walk involves is outside the province of doctrine to explain, all it does is to state the fact and leave it to the practical section to develop, and this it does very thoroughly. In the doctrinal view there are but two walks known to God, the walk related to the old creation (Eph. ii. 2, 3), "in times past ye walked", and the walk of the new creation (Eph. ii. 10), "unto good works that we should walk in them". Between these two walks, what miracles are to be found; dead, quickened, raised, seated. No attempt is made to alter the walk, but God makes a new creature. Life is not altered by the walk; the walk but expresses the life.

> "For which things' sake the wrath of God cometh on the children of disobedience: in the which ye also WALKED some time, when ye LIVED in them" (Col. iii. 6, 7).
> "As ye have therefore RECEIVED Christ Jesus the Lord, so WALK ye in Him" (Col. ii. 6).

What is the meaning of the expression "before ordained" in this section? Does it teach that, after salvation, every word and action is fixed by predestination? That in the sphere of the new creation the believer has no responsibility? If so, why reward for service? Why suffer loss? Why exhort a believer to "walk worthy" if all is ordained beforehand? Evidently the Apostle did not entertain such an idea, for he says:

> "Walk in love . . . . . let no man deceived you with vain words; for because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience" (Eph. v. 2-6).

The words "before ordained" translate the Greek word proetoimazo. "I go to prepare a place for you" (John xiv. 3); "The preparation of the gospel of peace" (Eph. vi. 15); "They that were ready went in" (Matt. xv. 10); "The third time I am ready" (II Cor. xii. 14): these are examples of etoimazo and hetoimos. The word hina, translated "that", may be rendered "in order that", and the passage stands as follows:

> "For good works, which God prepared beforehand, in order that we should walk in them."

Titus iii. 1 says "Be ready to every good work"; the readiness or preparedness being on the part of the believer. II Tim. ii. 21 speaks of the believer being prepared unto every good work. The Emphatic Diaglott translates Eph. ii. 10:

> "Good works, for which God prepared us, that we might walk in them."

This is but an expansion of the great passage in Eph. i. 4:

> "Chosen in Him before the overthrow of the world, that we might be holy and without blemish."

Here then is a new creation, and there is accordingly a new walk suitable to the new creation. This walk is expressed in good works, and for these good works each member of the Body has been before prepared.

In this section of Ephesians (chapters i.-iii.), which is mainly devoted to the unfolding of doctrine, while the question of walk is raised, no details are given. That is supplied in the practical portion (chapters iv.-vi.), which opens with the exhortation to "walk worthy". In Eph. ii., the two walks are just put into their categories. It is either the walk of the unregenerate "In time past ye walked according to the course of this world", or it is the walk of the newly-created "good works which God hath foreordained that we should walk in them".

This brings us to the end of the smallest section of this epistle, The Almonry, Eph. ii. 8-10. Yet what wealth is here, wealth not merely stored up, but out-poured. A glance back to verses two and three will show the condition, view spiritually, in which the recipients of this grace were "by nature". The next section opens up the equally dark prospect that was before those thus saved, when looked at as they were nationally, Gentiles in the flesh.

The First Principles of the Oracles of God

(A series especially addressed to new readers)

No.8. Man formed of the dust, breathes the breath of life.

pp. 16 - 20

The book of the generations of Adam given in Gen. v. 1, refers back to both Gen. i. and Gen. ii., linking the two accounts as of one person, act and period.

> "This is the book of the generations of Adam. In the day that God created man, in the likeness of God made He him, male and female created He them."

Here there is undoubted reference back to Gen. i. 26-28.

(1) The likeness occurs here, but not in Gen. ii.
(2) Male and female created refers to Gen. i. The actual formation of Eve is described in Gen. ii.
(3) The blessing is a reference back to Gen. i. 28, the words "bless" or "blessing" do not occur in the second record.

The apostle when speaking of Adam in I Cor. xv. speaks of the "image" of the earthy as opposed to the "image" of the heavenly. If he is quoting at all, he must be quoting from either Gen. i. 28 or Gen. v. In the same context however, Paul quotes from Gen. ii., Adam is the one who was created "a living soul" (I Cor. xv. 45), and this is not written in Gen. i., or in Gen. v., but in Gen. ii. The inference is beyond question therefore, that in the estimation of Moses, who wrote Gen. i. and v. as well as Gen. ii., and in the estimation of Paul also, the man created on the sixth day, is the same man whose creation is given a fuller detail in Gen. ii. We make no attempt to square the teaching of Scripture with archaeology or with anthropology; that is not our business, the fact that cannot be circumvented is that Adam is spoken of as the "first man" and Christ as the last Adam and the second man. All who die, die in Adam, and no man living today in the remotest corner of the earth is outside that all inclusive embrace. Gen. ii. does not refer to a subsequent and second creation, but enlarges and goes into fuller detail concerning the constitution of one who was called into being during those six momentous days, namely Adam.

In Gen. i. 26 we read: "And God said, Let us make man in our image." In Gen. ii. 7 we read: "And the Lord God formed man (Adam) of the dust of the ground." It is the same God, it is the same man, the purpose of Gen. i. 26 being to speak of man's peculiar distinction "the image" and "the likeness", the purpose of Gen. ii. 7 to reveal the lowliness of his origin and his dependence upon the Lord. The word translated "formed" is used of the work of a potter (Jer. xviii. 2); in fact it is translated "potter" seventeen times. While we are fully prepared to admit that the figure known as anthropopatheia is employed here, ascribing to God what belongs to human beings by way of condescension, that does not remove the intimate relationship indicated between the Creator and creature; He "formed" man. He did not simply say "Let man be, and it was so".

The material out of which the body of this first man was formed is the material out of which the bodies of all his descendants were and are formed, "the dust of the ground".

The word translated "dust" here may also be rendered "ashes" (as of an animal that has been burnt, Numb. ix. 17), "powder" (into which the vessels and the altars of Baal were stamped, II Kings xxiii. 4, 6, 12), "rubbish" (that had accumulated on the broken walls of Jerusalem, Neh. iv. 2), and "earth" (out of which iron can be taken, Job xxviii. 2). "The highest part of the dust of the world" in Prov. viii. 26 refers to the soil, without which neither vegetable nor animal life would be possible.

We often speak of the "ground" but how many of us associate the word with the verb "to grind"? The "ground" has literally been ground by the action of flood, fire and frost, and so made into a comparatively fine powder. From this "dust of the ground" the body of man was made, and to this at death his body returns. Let us now examine the composition of this wonderful frame, and see how far the "dust of the earth" enters into it.

The composition of the body of a man weighing a little over 150lbs. would be as follows:

> Oxygen 90lbs., Carbon 36lbs., Hydrogen 14lbs., Nitrogen 3lbs.8ozs., Calcium 3lbs.12ozs., Phosphorus 1lb.14ozs., Chlorine 4ozs., Sulphur 3½ozs., Potassium 3ozs., Sodium 2½ozs., Fluorine 2ozs., Magnesium 1½ozs., Silicon ½oz., Iron ½oz.

These are the main constituents of the human body, but there are other elements also present in small quantities. In addition to the 150 lbs. detailed above, we have a "trace" of the following:

> Lead, Cerium, Argon, Manganese, Zinc, Vanadium, Beryllium, Aluminum, Lithium, Chromium, Helium, Iodine, Cobalt, Boron, Neon, Arsenic, Bromine, Scandium, Nickel, Lanthanum, Strontium, Titanium, Copper, Neodymium, Molybdenum, Silver and Tin.

Perhaps the reader would appreciate a few further words on the essential work that some of these elements perform.

> POTASSIUM, which figures so largely in the composition of seeds, is the mineral basis of all muscular tissues, and is essential in the formation of proteins. It can be truly said: "No life without potassium."
>
> SODIUM.—This is one of the principal constituents of blood and lymph. Without sodium, lime and magnesia salts are liable to form injurious deposits in the body.
>
> CALCIUM and MAGNESIUM.—Magnesium assists in the assimilation of phosphorus, while magnesium, calcium and iron form the albumen of the blood. One percent of magnesium enables the lime taken into the body to harden in the formation of the bones.

MANGANESE.—It has been discovered that animals deprived of manganese lack the maternal instinct.

ZINC is associated with the action of vitamins.

NICKEL is associated with the insulin of the pancreas.

If it be true that there is "no life without potassium", it is equally true that there is "no thought without phosphorus". The elements fluorine and iodine are also important: fluorine plays an important part in the composition of the iris of the eye, while iodine in the thyroid gland is essential to growth and development.

The following is a summary of the various functions governed by these constituents of soil, seed and herb:

CALCIUM is a counter to acid, and is the executive element.
SULPHUR purifies, and is the maid of all work.
POTASSIUM stimulates the liver, and is the balancer.
PHOSPHORUS aids the growth of nerve and brain, and is the thought medium.
IRON is the vehicle of oxygen, and is the master chemical.
IODINE eliminates toxins, and is the gland regulator.
MANGANESE improves resistance, and is the chemical of poise.
SILICA gives gloss to the hair and sparkle to the eyes, and is the optimist.
FLUORINE protects against infection, and is the youth preserver.
CHLORINE keeps the body supple, and is the laundryman.
SODIUM prevents acidosis, and is the alkalinizer.
MAGNESIUM is alkaline and sleep promoting and is the refresher.

Such is the composition of the body of man. He is of the earth, earthy. The story of Gen. ii., however, is not yet told. After telling us that the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, the record proceeds "And breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul".

Let us examine the two statements, "the breath of life" and "a living soul". Contrary to popular theology, man is not the only "living soul" on the earth. This opinion is fostered by the A.V. which does not use the word "soul" in Gen. i., reserving that for man in Gen. ii. 7. In a case like this, however, the foundation upon which we must build must be the original Hebrew, and not a translation however precious that translation may be. The word translated "soul" is the Hebrew word nephesh.

Nephesh in Gen. i.

"The moving creature that hath life (margin soul)" (Gen. i. 20).
"Every living creature (lit. living soul) that moveth" (Gen. i. 21).
"The earth bring forth the living creature" (Gen. i. 24).
"Everything . . . . . wherein (there is) life (margin living soul)" (Gen. i. 30).

Here are the four occurrences of nephesh in Gen. i., and these demand our attention. "Soul" is predicated in this chapter of "creeping creatures" brought forth by the waters (verse 20), "great whales" (verse 21), elsewhere called "serpents" (Exod. vii. 9), "dragons" (Deut. xxxii. 33), and "sea-monsters" (Lam. iv. 3)—"cattle", "creeping thing", "beast of the earth" (verse 25) and finally:

> "Every beast of the earth, and every fowl of the air, and everything that creepeth upon the earth, wherein there is soul life, or living soul" (verse 30).

Nephesh in Gen. ii.

> "Man became a living soul" (Gen. ii. 7).
> "Adam called every living creature" (Gen. ii. 19).

It is easy for us to point to this passage (ii. 7) as evidence of bias on the part of our translators and to ask why the English reader is led to believe that man differs from the beast and creeping thing. Similarly it is easy in the blindness that pride, even of perceiving one aspect of the truth, can bring, to fall into the equally fatal error of saying that man is nothing more than the beasts that perish. Let us observe one or two facts that are to be found in these two chapters.

> Man is undoubtedly a living soul. Cattle and creeping things and great whales are also undoubtedly living souls. To stay here, however, is to be content with half the truth, which, as the poet says, is "ever the blackest of lies".

In chapter i., where the animals are called "living souls", man is not so called. When man is to be made, God does not say, "Let the earth bring forth", but:--

> "Let us make man in Our image after Our likeness: and let them have dominion . . . . . so God created man in His own Image, and in the Image of God created He him; male and female created He them" (Gen. i. 26, 27).

Is it necessary, when repudiating the error of the immortality of the soul, to plunge into the equal error of denying all that is implied by this deliberation of God at the creation of man? While man and beast are alike "living souls", man alone was created in the image of God. In Gen. ii. 7 we have the additional statement, not mentioned in Gen. i. 27, concerning the "breath of life":

N'shamah.

This word n'shamah is generally translated "breath" or "breathe" in the A.V., its other renderings being "blast", "inspiration", "soul" and "spirit". The word occurs 24 times, and we believe in 23 of the occurrences man only is the subject. The one passage which demands a more lengthy analysis is Gen. vii. 21, 22.

Appendix 16 of The Companion Bible gives the 23 references to n'shamah in the O.T. For easy reference we number each occurrence selected from it.

1. "And breathed into his nostrils the breath of life and man became a living soul" (Gen. ii. 7). It may be queried who it is that is said to breathe, God or Adam, for the pronoun "he" does not decide the question. This breath is by the nostrils, and therefore differs in nothing from that of the lower creatures. Be the answers to these questions what they may, here is the introduction of something special in the process of creation, something quite exceptional, occurring nowhere in the record of Gen. i., but finding somewhat of a parallel in the equally distinctive pause and counsel of Gen. i. 26.

2. "Thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth" (Deut. xx. 16). We know that sometimes both man and beast were destroyed by the advancing Israelites, as was the case at Jericho. But when taking the next city, Ai, Israel were by divine command expressly told to spare the cattle. "And thou shalt do to Ai and her king as thou didst unto Jericho and her king: only the spoil thereof, and the cattle thereof shall ye take for a prey." If we insist that n'shamah in Deut. xx. 16 must include cattle, we introduce a serious problem, but if we leave it to mean man, all is harmony. A glance at Deut. xx. 17, 18 will strengthen this view, for it immediately goes on to enumerate those who were to be utterly destroyed, namely, the Canaanites, and the reason given is "that they teach you not, etc.".

3. "So Joshua . . . . . utterly destroyed all that breathed" (Josh. x. 40). This is parallel with No.2. (What is Man - be-xix)

Our space is nearly used up. The reader should look up the remaining occurrences, which are II Sam. xxii. 16; I Kings xv. 29; Job xxvii. 3; xxxii. 8; Psa. cl. 6 and Prov. xx. 27.

If these references are examined, it will be seen that all who have ruach "spirit" do not necessarily have n'shamah "the breath of life". Psa. xviii. 15 speaks of the blast (ruach) of the breath (n'shamah) of Thy nostrils, and the quotations from Job xxxii. 18 and Prov. xx. 27 show a close connection between this breath of life, understanding and conscience, which goes beyond the range of the mere nephesh or living soul, without the additional breath of life. The living creatures (souls) of Gen. i. 21 had not conscience. If there be no such distinction, then Gen. vii. 21, 22 tells us that all died twice over.

Man stands therefore as it were between two worlds. So far as his body is concerned, he is a living soul, like the lower animals, and lower than the angels. But he was made in the image of God, he received the breath of life and this links him with the world above, and he is destined to be raised in His Redeemer above angels.

No.9. Genesis iii. (1) The Serpent.

pp. 35 - 38

While no one can read the record of Gen. i. and ii. without being impressed with the wonder of creation, and the evidence of purpose that the creation of man in the image of God implies, we soon realize as we commence the third chapter, that it is here that the supreme purpose of the Bible is revealed, the conflict between Good and Evil, the nature of the enemy and the form of his attack, the countermove of the Creator and the opening up of the great Redemptive purpose that from Gen. iii. to the last chapter of the book of Revelation characterizes the whole teaching of Scripture.

Before attempting to explain any one feature of Gen. iii., it will be wise to see the chapter as a whole, and to indicate the trend of its argument, which trend is best visualized by noting the literary structure of the passage.

Pledge of man's restoration. /

In his first epistle, John declares that Christ was manifested (1) to take away our sins, and (2) that He might destroy the works of the devil (I John iii. 5, 8).

We assume, it will be observed, that "The Serpent" is the Devil, but we must not forget the Berean attitude which is commended by the Lord. We therefore examine the Scriptures to see if this is "so". In the summing up of the six days creation found in Gen. i. 31, we read "And God saw everything that He had made, and, behold, it was very good". If the Serpent of Gen. iii. belonged to the six days creation, then it was included in the "everything" that was "very good". But as the teaching of Scripture consistently affirms that this Serpent is evil, we are forced to the conclusion that it belonged to a previous creation, associated with the judgment indicated in Gen. i. 2 and is represented as an intrusion into the state of affairs indicated in Gen. ii. It is the last book of the Bible, the book that corresponds with Genesis, the first book of the Bible, that contains the explicit statement:

> "That old serpent, called the Devil and Satan."
> "That old serpent, which is the Devil, and Satan" (Rev. xii. 9; xx. 2).

The word "old" does not refer to the age of the serpent, the Greek word archaios takes us back to the "beginning" arche. The serpent of antiquity is the Devil. He belongs to the "old world" (II Pet. ii. 5) the "old" creation (II Cor. v. 17). It will be noted further, that the Scriptures are not content merely to say that the serpent is the Devil, and that the serpent is Satan, but that both titles are employed together. Now "Satan" is Hebrew, and is found in Job i. 6; Psa. cix. 6; Zech iii. 1, 2 and is brought over into the N.T. where it is mentioned thirty-six times. That Paul believed and taught that the old serpent was the devil and Satan we can discover by reading his epistles:

> "But I fear, lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty."
> "Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light" (II Cor. xi. 3, 14).

The Devil is the N.T. title and is the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew word Satan. The reader must distinguish between the title "Devil" in the singular, which is the Greek diabolos, and "devils" in the plural, which should in every case be translated "demons".

Returning to Gen. iii. 1 we note that the serpent is spoken of as being more subtil than any beast of the field which the Lord God had made. This at first sight is a difficulty. How can a mighty spirit, as the devil and Satan is set forth in the Scriptures, be compared with a beast of the field? We learn that after Judas Iscariot had received the sop at the table, that "Satan entered into him" (John xiii. 27). We discover that fallen angels "left their own habitation" (Jude 6) and that this word "habitation" is the Greek oiketerion, a word used of the resurrection body of the believer "our house from heaven" (II Cor. v. 2). Not only so, we read that when angels appeared to men, they were almost always in the form of men, so much so that Abraham prepared for them a meal (Gen. xviii. 2) to which the Apostle alludes when urging the entertaining of strangers, saying:

> "For thereby some have entertained angels unaware" (Heb. xiii. 2).

For the purpose of deception, Satan selected the most subtil of the creatures that God had made, invested himself in that animal's body, invaded the sanctity of the Garden, and inveigled our first parents into the disobedience and sin.

Referring to the structure of Gen. iii., we note that it opens and closes with two peculiar references. It opens with the devil inhabiting the form of a serpent, and it closes with the cherubim, which are elsewhere described as having the form of a man, a lion, an ox and an eagle, creatures unknown except by revelation, and evidently symbolic. The word translated "serpent" is the Hebrew word nachash which means "shining" and "brazen".

It will be remembered that when the people of Israel were bitten by serpents, Moses was commanded to make a "serpent of brass" where the Hebrew words are nachash nechoseth (Numb. xxi. 9). This was afterward destroyed by Hezekiah, because of the idolatrous practices of Judah, calling it nehushtain "a piece of brass". In a slightly different form nachash is translated "enchantment" and "to divine" (Lev. xix. 26; Gen. xliv. 5), and is associated with witchcraft, familiar spirits, necromancy, and other abominations associated with spiritism and intercourse with evil spirits (Deut. xviii. 10-12).

The one purpose which Satan had in thus appearing to Eve in the garden was to deceive, to destroy and to gain a hold upon the newly created world that had come into being, supplant Adam the type, and Christ the anti-type, and become "The prince of this world" and "the god of this age" (John xvi. 11; II Cor. iv. 4). To us today, the appearance of such a sight, the speaking of such an animal, would not only startle us, but raise suspicion in our minds, but we must remember, Adam and Eve were a pair of innocents, suddenly awake in a world of wonders, where experience was no criterion as to what could or could not be expected.

As we have said, this nachash, this shining one, is balanced at the close of Gen. iii., by the cherubim. We must devote a complete article to the reason why the cherubim were thus placed at the East of the garden, and what these strange beings signify.

We close this article with a quotation from the prophet Ezekiel, whose prophecy opens (Ezek. i.-x.), closes (Ezek. xliii.), and deals in the middle (Ezek. xxviii.) with cherubim. The passage we quote is Ezek. xxviii. 12-19, to which we must return in a later article. We commend it to the meditation of our readers in preparation for future examination.

> "Son of man, take up a lamentation upon the king of Tyrus, and say unto him, Thus saith the Lord GOD; Thou sealest up the sum, full of wisdom, and perfect in beauty.
>
> Thou hast been in Eden the garden of God; every precious stone was thy covering, the sardius, the topaz, and the diamond, the beryl, the onyx, and the jasper, the sapphire, the emerald, and the carbuncle, and gold: the workmanship of thy tabrets and thy pipes was prepared in thee in the day that thou wast created.
>
> Thou are the anointed cherub that covereth; and I have set thee so: thou wast upon the holy mountain of God; thou hast walked up and down in the midst of the stones of fire.
>
> Thou wast perfect in thy ways from the day that thou wast created, till iniquity was found in thee.
>
> By the multitude of thy merchandise they have filled the midst of thee with violence, and thou hast sinned: therefore I will cast thee as profane out of the mountain of God: and I will destroy thee, O covering cherub, from the midst of the stones of fire.
>
> Thine heart was lifted up because of thy beauty, thou hast corrupted thy wisdom by reason of thy brightness: and I will cast thee to the ground, I will lay thee before kings, that they may behold thee.
>
> Thou hast defiled thy sanctuaries by the multitude of thine iniquities, by the iniquity of thy traffic; therefore will I bring forth a fire from the midst of thee, and it shall devour thee, and I will bring thee to ashes upon the earth in the sight of all them that behold thee.
>
> All they that know thee among the people shall be astonished at thee: thou shalt be a terror, and never shalt thou be any more" (Ezek. xxviii. 12-19).

No.10. Genesis iii. (2) The Cherubim.
pp. 68 - 70

We have already seen that the serpent of Gen. iii. 1 is placed in correspondence with the cherubim of Gen. iii. 24, both being animal forms invested with supernatural powers and associations. We shall discover that whereas the serpent procured Adam's loss of Paradise and deprived him of both life and dominion, the Cherubim, together with the flaming sword, are given as a pledge that Paradise shall be restored, dominion and life preserved and finally enjoyed. To explore this theme with any fullness demands a volume, and even the Apostle said when dealing with the cherubim "of which we cannot now speak particularly". This series is expressly prepared for those who are comparatively young in the faith, consequently much that could be said must be omitted, and only those essential features that will make an immediate contribution must be included.

The reader was asked in the preceding article to read Ezek. xxviii. 12-19. The serpent's words of Gen. iii. 5 are echoed in the blasphemous aspiration of the prince of Tyrus "thou hast said, I am a God" (Ezek. xxviii. 2), and will be found to have a bearing on the purpose and place of the cherubim. The King of Tyrus (Ezek. xxviii. 12, 13) can be no son of Adam. Of no man since the fall, can it be said that he sealed up the sum full of wisdom, and perfect in beauty. This "king" had been in Eden, the garden of God (Ezek. xxviii. 13), and if we keep strictly to the record, we have four, and four only of whom this is true: Adam, Eve, the Serpent and the Lord.

Adam and Eve are obviously not intended here. Neither can the Lord be intended, for "iniquity" was found in this mysterious "king" and moreover he was for all his greatness a "created" being (Ezek. xxviii. 15). Only one of the four is left, namely "the serpent", the nachash, the shining one, and what a "shining one" is suggested by the description of Ezek. xxviii. 13! where nine precious stones, including the diamond, the sapphire and the emerald are said to be his covering. This mysterious king of Tyrus is named and his high office indicated.

> "Thou art the anointed cherub that covereth: and I have set thee SO: thou wast upon the holy mountain of God."

The word "anointed" gives us the O.T. title "The Messiah" and the N.T. title "The Christ". Here we have a mighty being who was the Lord's anointed, who fell, and became the adversary (Satan) of both God and of man whom God had made in His image and likeness.

There is considerable difference of opinion regarding the meaning of the Hebrew word cherub. The word never occurs as a verb, and so we are deprived of an important means of discovering its meaning. Rab means whatever is great. "It is the formal name of magnificence or majesty or dominion", says Marius de Calasio. The Hebrew particle ki includes "likeness" and suggests the emblematic character of the cherubim, which word could mean “like the greatness” or “like the majesty” or “like the dominion”. This last meaning could comprehend, not only the glorious majesty of the Lord that was usurped by Satan, but the delegated dominion given to Adam, which was lost. When Adam at his expulsion from the garden saw the cherubim “tabernacled” (as the word “placed” is literally), he saw a composite emblematic creature, with the face of a man, a lion, an ox and an eagle (see Ezek. i. 10), and in that emblem he saw himself (the man) and the dominion he had lost (the animal creation) which according to Psa. viii. 6-8 and Paul’s application of the words “all things under His feet”, look back to the type, Adam, and forward to the great antitype, Christ, pledging in Christ, the restoration of the dominion that had been lost, and associating that restoration with redemption (the Tabernacle and the flaming sword).

Without going into details, the following list of occurrences indicates the epochs in which the cherubim appear in the Scriptures. It must be remembered that “the four beasts” of the book of the Revelation are the same as the cherubim of the O.T. as a comparison with Ezek. i.-x. will prove.

THE CHERUBIM IN THE SCRIPTURES

(1) Ezek. xxviii. In Eden. Profaned, cast out. Anointed.
(2) Gen. iii. In Eden. The pledge of life and restoration.
(3) Exodus. The tabernacle and the covenant.
(4) Kings. The glory and the temple.
(5) Ezekiel. The glory departing and then returning.
(6) The Revelation. Paradise restored. Restoration.

It will be seen that the anointed cherub of Ezek. xxviii. refers to a period that lies before the creation of Adam. This mighty being by aspiring to some measure of equality with God, fell, and when he in the guise of the serpent tempted Eve, he used the same blasphemous aspiration as the bait, “ye shall be as God”. The tabernacling of the cherubim at the east of the garden was a pledge to fallen Adam that the dominion lost by sin would be restored. The references to Exodus, the book of Kings and the opening and closing chapters of Ezekiel, relate the cherubim with Israel. The fact that both in the Tabernacle in the wilderness and in the Temple in the land the cherubim are found in the holiest of all, shows that this pledge of restoration is vitally associated with atoning blood; the whole purpose is redemptive. Ezekiel shows the departing and the returning glory linked with the cherubim, and the references in the book of Revelation to the four “beasts” (literally “living ones” or “living creatures”) lead on to Paradise restored in Rev. xxii.

As we survey this list of references, two things press for attention. Why are there SIX sets of references? The whole purpose of redemption since the seven days of Gen. i., the Jubilee with its 7*7 years, the great prophecy of Dan. ix. with its 70*7 years, seems to demand that these epochs of cherubim reference should also fall into line. Yet there is no reference in the N.T. apart from the Revelation that supplies the gap, if gap there be. Again, the anointed cherub that sinned, seems to demand a corresponding reference to Christ, the Lord’s Anointed Who was without sin, Who, in contrast with the fallen one of Ezek. xxviii., "thought it not robbery to be equal with God". Yet it hardly seems right to class the Son of God with the cherubim. We remember however that there are four Gospels, not three or two, and that these four gospels have distinctive points of view thus:

1.	Matthew	The King	Symbol: The LION.
2.	Mark	The Servant	Symbol: The OX.
3.	Luke	The Man	Symbol: The MAN.
4.	John	The Son of God	Symbol: The EAGLE.

These characteristics have been considered with some care and illustrated by a drawing in a booklet entitled "The Four Gospels" which can be obtained from Mr. L. A. Canning.

When we realize that the fourfold presentation of the Saviour is God's countermove to undo the works of the Devil, we find that we have, not only our perfect number of references, SEVEN, but also a complete structure of the whole series. The humility of the Son of God being the answer to the pride of the Anointed Cherub.

THE CHERUBIM

A | The ANOINTED. His pride and fall.
B | Paradise LOST.
C | Tabernacle and wilderness.
Temple and Land.
Glory and Return.
A | The ANOINTED. His humility and triumph.
B | Paradise RESTORED.

Having considered the beginning of the redemptive purpose Gen. iii. 1, and its glorious close presented in symbol in Gen. iii. 24, we can now return to the story of man's fall, God's provision and promise, and follow with wandering faith the battle and the triumph, the promise and its consequences, that foreshadow both the cross and the crown in this great chapter of Gen. iii.

No.11. Genesis iii. (3) The Temptation.
pp. 135 - 140

No statement is made in Gen. iii. to inform us as to the apparent absence of Adam. We do not know whether he was present or absent, all we know is that the Serpent addressed himself to the woman.

"Yea, hath God said?" "Can it really be?" (Rotherham).
"Can it be true?" (Young).

This is the tempter's opening gambit—to sow the seed of doubt. The first temptation recorded in the O.T. was presented in a garden of plenty, the first recorded in the N.T. was presented in a wilderness of want, but the opening words reveal the same line of approach: "If Thou be the Son of God."

The stress should be placed on the word "every" when reading Gen. iii. 1:

> "Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of EVERY tree of the garden?", the insinuation being that God was withholding something, that He was niggardly and He was depriving them of something good. The truth could have been expressed by placing the emphasis thus:

> "What a lovely garden, every possible need so freely and fully supplied, nothing withheld that love and wisdom can grant, and only one small reservation in the midst of this prodigal supply, must surely indicate a loving protection, rather than a heartless and meaningless prohibition."

But such an approach was not in line with the tempter's attack. The woman had learned about the tree of knowledge of good and evil through her husband, Adam, and he had received the communication direct from the Lord. We place the words of the Lord and the reply of Eve together for comparison.

> The Words of the Lord. "Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die" (Gen. ii. 16, 17).
> The reply of Eve. "We may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden: But of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, God hath said, Ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die" (Gen. iii. 2, 3).

We note the omission of the word "freely" which plays into the tempter's hand a little. We learn from Gen. ii. 9 that the tree of life was in the midst of the garden, but we are uncertain from the wording whether the tree of knowledge was in the midst or not. Eve said that it was, and we must give her the benefit of the doubt. The words "neither shall ye touch it are not found in the Divine commandment but may have been an added precaution suggested by Adam for their safety, and if so need not be quoted against her.

"Lest ye die" however is a serious understatement; the words "thou shalt surely die" allowing no room for doubt. It is looked upon as a form of spiritual bondage by some to keep to the letter of the Word, but it would have meant salvation to Eve had she kept rigidly to what God had said. Satan is a master at double dealing, and Shakespeare has put into the mouth of Macbeth some sentiments that we would all do well to heed:

> "I pull in resolution and begin
> To doubt the equivocation of the fiend, > THAT LIES LIKE TRUTH . . . . . And be these > juggling fiends no more believed > That palter with us in a DOUBLE SENSE;
> That keep the word of promise to our ear,
> And break it to our hope."

One has but to observe the like sounding names in the line of Cain and in the line of Seth, to be conscious of an attempt to deceive. In both is a son named Enoch, and Jude is careful when he makes his reference to define Enoch as "the seventh from Adam". Both lines have a Lamech, the one boasting of his 70*7, the other living until 777 years, and illustrations could be multiplied. Paul complained of those who preached another "Jesus", and another "Gospel" in immediate sequence to the references to the beguiling by the Serpent of Eve (II Cor. xi. 3, 4). We are therefore well advised to note the reply of Eve to this initial temptation, and to resolve by grace to treat the very words of Scripture with reverence and care. However slight the change of wording, the Serpent apparently realized the success of his opening in the way in which the woman replied, for his next words are clear, emphatic and without equivocation or paltering in a double sense, "ye shall not surely die".

Here the issues are plain, the Serpent's words are a complete denial of the Word of God. Whether the words of the Devil were intended to lay the foundation of a doctrine or not, there has certainly arisen a system of teaching which denies the fact and the reality of death. Spiritism definitely affirms that there is no death, and alas many Protestant and Evangelical systems of Theology, by the introduction of the Philosophy of the natural immortality of the soul, deny both the realities of death and the essential necessity of the resurrection. This is not all however. The denial of the reality of death was but a bridge to a bolder assertion:

> "For God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil."

Again we have in these words "the equivocation of the fiend, that lies like truth". It is written before this chapter closes:

> "And the Lord God said, Behold, the man is become AS ONE OF US, to know good and evil."

But at what a price. "And now, lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life and eat, and LIVE FOR EVER; therefore the Lord God sent him forth . . . . ." (Gen. iii. 22, 23). The words "ye shall be as gods" are given in the R.V. "ye shall be as God" the word Elohim being exactly the same in the opening of verse five "for God" as in the close "as God". That "God" not "gods" is intended, Gen. iii. 22 bears its testimony.

In article No.7 of this series, a word or two has been given on the words "good and evil" to which the reader's attention is drawn should he feel in need of a further gleam of light on a difficult subject. The consequences of disobedience to the Divine prohibition were immediately manifest. Their eyes were indeed "opened". They "knew" but what they knew produced shame and a sense of guilt. In the process something that belonged to innocency had been forfeited. "They knew that they were naked."

Here is a pair of innocents, tricked into disobedience, lured into the belief that they were being cheated of their due, whereas, it is clear from Heb. v. 14 that the knowledge of good and evil would most surely have been given to them, after a period had elapsed, when being "perfect" and "of full age" and having their "senses exercised", they would have advanced as knowledge kept pace with responsibility. This "short cut" is not only evident in Gen. iii., it re-appears in the temptation of Matt. iv. 8, 9 and it underlies that other and similar temptation "let us do evil that good may come".

THE CONFLICT OF THE AGES (Gen. iii. 15)

We now approach the centre or the heart of this great chapter, the portion that contains the great primeval promise, namely Gen. iii. 15. The guilty pair are addressed individually, first Adam, then his wife and finally, the Serpent.

GENESIS iii. 7 - 21

A | 7-11. They made themselves aprons.
B | 12. The Man, I did eat.
C | 13. The Woman, I did eat.
D | 14. The Serpent cursed.
D | 15. The Serpent enmity.
C | 16. The Woman. Sorrow in conception.
B | 17-19. The Man. Thorns, thistles, sweat.
A | 20, 21. The Lord God made them coats of skins.

Not only does the subject matter fall into this obvious correspondence but the section it will be observed is divided into two parts. In the first half which ends with the curse upon the serpent, there is no hint of Redemption. The guilty man and woman could expect nothing but death, as already announced in Gen. ii. 17. With the opening of the second half comes the promise of the Seed of the Woman Who should bruise the serpent's head. Instead of hearing the sentence of death pronounced, the man and his wife hear of childbirth, and of cultivating the soil, until some distant date when they would return to the dust from which they had been taken. True, conception and childbirth was to be accompanied by sorrow, and the equality of Eve with her husband suffered a reduction in status "he shall rule over thee"; true the soil that was to produce bread, would also bring forth thorns and thistles, and sweat of face. True, the food thus provided would not make those who partook of it "eat and live for ever" yet, in spite of all this limitation, the curse, the sorrow and the toil, verses 16-19 constitute a reprieve, and this is justified by reason of the fact hitherto unrevealed, that Christ had been verily foreordained as a Lamb without blemish, and this reprieve is further justified by the symbolic clothing of the guilty pair with coats of skin. In all this there is wondrous truth expressed in word and in symbol, that demands our attention.

First let us consider the two coverings that were provided: the first by man himself, the second by God. Sin evidently needs a covering, for although the aprons of fig leaves were entirely inadequate, the Lord did not do something entirely different, He simply provided a covering that conformed to His own conception of what was adequate. The sense of shame, the attempt to propitiate God or gods, is well nigh universal. However crude or cultured the attempt may be, the sense of need is right, even though the method employed is wrong.

Herein we meet a vital principle that we do well to keep well before us. The whole scheme of Redemption, while confessedly the sole work of God, is nevertheless in harmony with the deepest convictions of the human heart, and faith will never make demands that the conscience must condemn, and that reason, when uninfluenced by sin and mortality, would reject. Adam and Eve knew that they needed a covering. God also agreed that this was so, the difference being that man made aprons of leaves provided a covering of sorts, but the coats of skin, not only provided a complete covering, but did so at the cost of life laid down. The word translated "apron" is usually rendered by the word "girdle". This apron or girdle is sometimes of sackcloth, sometimes of linen, sometimes for the hanging of a sword, and is used many times in the phrase "gird up the loins". In fact in Ezek. xxiii. 15 where we read "girded with girdles", the second word is ezor "loin cloth". Adam and his wife made a temporary covering out of a newly-developed sense of shame; God made "coats" of "skins" and covered not only one part of the body, but the whole of it.

The Hebrew word kethoneth, "coats", in Gen. iii. 21, tunic, long coat, is used of the coats worn by the sons of Aaron. Is there a suggestion that the guilty pair, thus covered, were not only forgiven, but granted even fuller access than before? The word kethoneth occurs eight times in Genesis, the seven other occurrences than Gen. iii. 21 referring to the coat of many colours given to Joseph by Jacob his father, thereby marking him off as the firstborn and priest of the family! While Adam and his wife lay under the expectation of death, innocent animals were slain, thereby providing the first of a long series of types setting forth the basic truth that without shedding of blood is no remission.

The first recorded death in Genesis was the death of substitutionary victims which took place 930 years before Adam, who had been condemned, actually died. The same wondrous doctrine is set forth in Exod. xii., when at the Passover we read "there was not a house where there was not one dead" (Exod. xii. 30), the only difference between Israel and the Egyptians being, that in the house of the Egyptians, it was the firstborn that was dead, and in the house of Israel it was a lamb. Many other details could well occupy our time and study, but we have limitations, and so pass to the great primeval promise Gen. iii. 15:

> "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise His heel."

In this prophetic promise lies concealed the conflict of the ages, the death of the cross, the triumph of the Saviour at the end, and the presence of two seeds. On the first day of creation God had divided the light from the darkness (Gen. i. 4), so now He divides the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent, "I will put enmity". This word translated "put" occurs next in Gen. iv. 25 where we read "God . . . . . hath appointed me another seed instead of Abel, whom Cain slew". In the slaying of Abel we have the conflict of the two seeds set forth, anticipating by 4,000 years the death of Christ, whose blood speaketh better things than that of Abel. Cain "was of that wicked one", the fruit of the Serpent's seed.

The word enmity is the translation of the Hebrew ebah spelled in Hebrew aleph, yod, beth, he. Enemy is oyeb, aleph, yod, beth, and the name of the patriarch Job is spelled aleph, yod, vav, beth. Moses was inspired to use the same word in Gen. iii. 15 for enmity, that he employed when writing the prelude to the book of Job* (* - See the Booklet "Job, or the Enigma of the Ages"). While the seed of the woman thus spoken of in this great promise speaks of the Lord Jesus Christ, we must never forget that it includes also the true seed, those who were to be ultimately delivered from the authority of darkness. This we can prove by referring to Rom. xvi. 20. When Paul wrote the epistle to the Romans, Christ had died, been buried, had risen again, ascended, and was at the time of writing seated at the right hand of the Father "from henceforth expecting till His enemies be made His footstool". Yet Paul could write to the believers in Rome:

> "The God of peace shall BRUISE SATAN UNDER YOUR FEET shortly" (Rom. xvi. 20).

This is conclusive evidence that in Gen. iii. 15 Christ and His people are indicated by the woman's seed, and Satan and his followers are indicated by the Serpent's seed. We will return to this most vital teaching of Scripture later, but at the moment we must continue our examination of the terms used in Gen. iii. 15. When we read of the bruising of the head and of the heel, our thoughts naturally travel to Isa. liii., where the Saviour is set forth as "bruised for our iniquities" and where it is written "it pleased the Lord to bruise Him". We must however recognize that something different is intended in Gen. iii. 15, if only because the word there translated "bruise" is peculiar. In Isa. liii. 5, 10 the Hebrew word is daka, but in Gen. iii. 15 the Hebrew used is shuph, and whether we understand the meaning of the two words or not, it is evident on the surface, that they spring from entirely different roots. Shuph occurs elsewhere only in Job and the Psalms:

> "He breaketh me with a tempest" (Job ix. 17).
> "Surely the darkness shall cover me" (Psa. cxxxix. 11).

The figure is of overwhelming tempest and darkness, anticipating once again that which the Saviour Himself said was the hour and the power of darkness. The word reappears in Gen. xlix. 17 in a duplicated form. Shephiphon "Dan shall be a serpent by the way (nachash as in Gen. iii. 1, the only other chapter in Genesis where nachash is used), an adder (shephiphon, derived from the same word that is translated 'bruise' in Gen. iii. 15), that biteth the horses heels (aqeb the word translated 'heel' in Gen. iii. 15), so that his rider shall fall backward".

Here we have light upon the wording of this great primeval promise. Many expositors have turned to the story of the heel of Achilles, in illustration of this figure, but it is well to remember that Achilles was unknown when the promise was made in Eden, and is evidently a Greek adaptation of the original record. The references to the "heel" (Heb. aqab) and "to supplant" or "take by the heel" (Heb. aqab) are interesting. The two other references to the heel in Genesis are xxv. 26, where we read of Jacob, that his hand took hold on Esau's heel, and Gen. xlix. 19 where it is translated "at the last" in the sentence "he shall overcome at the last"; which the R.V. renders "he shall press upon their heel". This last reference it will be noted is in the vicinity of the reference to the adder and the heel already considered.

In the light of these passages, Gen. iii. 15 seems to say that the conflict of the two seeds, and pre-eminently between Satan and Christ, will be intense, overwhelming as with darkness and tempest; that the attack of the serpent will be like that of the adder that biteth the horses heels, and the emphasis upon the idea of supplanting that the heel-catcher indicates, gives further light upon the intention of the Serpent both in his attack in Eden and down the ages. He is, in intention, the great Supplanter. The head is the vulnerable part of a snake, but the Saviour in giving this fatal blow, receives one almost as deadly. He must be bruised in the heel who attacks this shephiphon, this nachash, this adder. In the light of Rom. xvi. 20, and of the book of the Revelation we can rejoice that ultimate victory is assured.

No.12 MISSING

No.13. "He shall see His seed."
pp. 176 - 180

We now arrive at the necessity to concentrate our attention upon a most vital theme, and to this we now address ourselves.

In all our published studies we have sought either to exhibit the one all embracive purpose of the ages, or to indicate by more detailed study, the subsidiary doctrines that pertain to the unfolding dispensations. From one angle we believe that the suggestion put forward in an earlier study is a true one, that the whole of the Bible and its unfolding purpose can be visualized in terms of the Jubilee, an institution in Israel that emphasizes the sabbatic time periods of the great unfolding, and the emancipation, and restoration as its goal. From another angle we have seen that the one all embracive purpose of the ages can be expressed in the words of the Apostle "the end . . . . . that God may be all in all" (I Cor. xv. 24-28), and that "conformity to the image of His Son" is an essential feature in that consummation.

Our studies in the book of Job have brought into prominence not only the conflict of the two seeds so dramatically therein portrayed, but have compelled us to perceive that in understanding of what is involved and implied by the "Seed" as it pertains to Christ Himself, to the believer, and to the false seed of the Serpent, as revealed in both O.T. promise and in N.T. fulfillment will also shed great light upon the purpose of the ages. To this investigation therefore let us apply ourselves, praying that all our studies may be conducted in the conscious Presence of the Author of both Revelation and Salvation.

Our first investigation must be into the words employed. We observe that the word "seed" as found in the A.V. is a translation of either the Hebrew words zera or perudoth, or the Greek words sperma, sporos, spora or speiro. Perudoth, "the seed is rotten under their clods" (Joel i. 17) need not disdain us; it is derived from the Hebrew word parad, "to be separated or scatter", and does not occur elsewhere. The word zera is the word we must consider both in its primitive meaning and in its usage. This word is derived from zara "to spread or scatter" as in Zech x. 9 "I will sow them among the people". In two passages, zera is translated "child" (Lev. xxii. 13; I Sam. i. 11), but the most frequent translation of the word is "seed". It enters into the composition of the name Jezreel, "sown of God" (Hos. i. 4).

The word "seed" is used in the Scripture of man, of beast and of plant. We meet the word "seed" in the first chapter of Genesis, where the substantive occurs six times, and the participle, translated "bearing" and "yielding" in relation to seed, three times.

> "The herb 'seeding seed' and the fruit tree yielding fruit, after his kind, whose seed is in itself" (Gen. i. 11).

In the first case, this is a statement of material fact, but the record of Gen. i. has more in it than the record of material creation. Paul's use of Gen. i. 2, 3 in II Cor. iv. 6 "for God, Who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts" is an indication that this record subserves spiritual purpose.

We are therefore prepared to find that what is said of the seed of "herb" and of "fruit trees" will be also true of "the seed" in its highest and spiritual sense.

Three items of interest call for notice.

> The expression "yielding seed", or as it is literally "seeding seed", brings before us the initial fact that a succession, a progeny is in view.
>
> The statement "after its kind" assures us that the continuance or succession preserves its relationship and likeness to the parent seed. Intermixture is apparently disallowed.
>
> "Whose seed is in itself" further impresses us with the bounds that are set, and which are not to be transgressed.

These features are true of plants and of animals, but when we learn, as we shall when reading Gen. iii., that there is One, Who is called The Seed of the Woman, Who is in conflict with another seed, the seed of the serpent, these statements take upon themselves a deeper significance. The power and purpose of a seed to continue the line, and its relation to the creation of man "made for a little lower than the angels" should be noted. So far as we know, angels are separate creations, "they neither marry nor are given in marriage", and have no seed. Adam, by his creation, was allied to the animal world in that he could be the father of a succeeding race, and so distinct from the angelic world, where progeny is unknown. In this, the Scripture suggests that he was a figure of Him that was to come, the second Man and the last Adam, who in a higher and spiritual sense was to "see His seed".

Unlike the angels, all men are derived from a common ancestor, and are made of "one blood", and the teaching of Rom. v. shows that Adam and Christ stand as type to antitype and that "as by one man's disobedience many were constituted sinners so by the obedience of One shall many be constituted righteous". Mankind are organically one as the angels never could be.

When Seth was born, his mother called his name Seth, "for God, said she, hath appointed me 'another seed' instead of Abel, whom Cain slew" (Gen. iv. 25). Here we have reference to both the attack upon the true seed, and to its preservation. The Ark was prepared by Noah at the command of God with the express purpose of keeping seed alive upon the face of all the earth (Gen. vii. 3) and the destruction of all flesh by the flood is intimately connected with the abnormal alliance of the sons of God, with the daughters of men, and their resulting hybrid progeny, the seed of the serpent. With Noah's seed, preserved in the Ark, the covenant of Gen. ix. 9 was made.

The next reference to a seed is that of Gen. xii. 7 where the promise of God to Abraham is expressed in the one sentence "unto thy seed will I give this land". The Bible record is one of conflict, and this conflict is between two seeds, the establishment of the line through which that seed should come, namely that of the descendants of Shem, and the family of Abraham, occupies the bulk of the O.T. Scriptures. Ishmael is passed by and Isaac is chosen, Esau is set aside and Jacob chosen. Of the sons of Jacob, Judah is chosen, and of Judah, the family of David, and so on unto the birth of Christ at Bethlehem. We are however conscious that in thus stating the case, we have narrowed our survey down to One, namely Christ, whereas it is perfectly clear from Scripture that the seed of Abraham was to be multiplied as the stars of heaven and as the sand of the sea shore. We must return accordingly to Gen. iii., where the great prophecy concerning the Seed of the Woman is recorded and consider it closely.

It is however impossible to hope to arrive at any clear understanding of the import of Gen. iii. 15 if we do not see its relation with the surrounding context. We must go back at least to Gen. ii. 18-20 where we read that the animals were caused to pass before Adam who named them all, yet, adds the passage "for Adam there was not found an help meet for him". Common and uncritical usage has introduced into our language the word "helpmeet" which first being improperly hyphenated, then became taken to mean "help-mate". This however does not fully express the truth intended. True, the wife is a help-mate, but the intention of Gen. ii. 18 goes deeper. The Hebrew reads ezer "help", ki "as", and neged "the front part, the front of a thing next to the speaker, before, in the presence of, over against" (Gesenius).

The LXX translates these words, once by kat'auton "according to him", and homoios auto "like to himself". Here it is insisted that the principle already enunciated "after its kind" operates in the matter of man and marriage. The process whereby the woman was brought to man illustrates the principle "whose seed is in itself". Man by his constitution is called a being that "breathes": "And the Lord God . . . . . breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul" (Gen. ii. 7). "All in whose nostrils was the breath of life" (Gen. vii. 22). With this we should remember the word translated "rib" is in the LXX rendered by the word pleura and is associated with the lungs and breathing. Woman was evidently, like the seed in the plant "after its kind". Adam looked upon the woman brought to him as a help meet for him and said "This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh", and Jacobs, in the Anthologia Palatina, shows that the Greek word pleura was used for "a wife". The progeny of such a pair must be unmixed and "after its kind". Another matter of importance is the evident relation of Gen. ii. 25 with iii. 1. In both verses a word derived from the Hebrew word arom is found. In Gen. ii. 25 it is translated "naked", and the spelling of the Hebrew word can be shown in English as arohm, and in iii. 1 it is translated "subtil", the spelling of the Hebrew word in English being aroom. In the first occurrence the primitive meaning of nudity is retained; in the second the secondary meaning to be cunning or crafty in a bad sense is added.

The figure of the seed is however not quite out of mind, although to the modern and Western reader there is nothing to call up the idea of "seed" in these words. When the word takes the feminine form in the plural aremah, it is then translated "heap of corn" (Ruth iii. 7), and this because the corn was "naked" or stripped of husk and straw, the threshing being done on the spot. To this the Apostle refers in I Cor. xv. 37 when speaking of the resurrection body as "bare grain". Here the word translated is gumnos "naked" and so translated in connection with resurrection in II Cor. v. 3 "We shall not be found naked". Adam and his wife were "bare grain", stripped of all that is suggested by “chaff” or “husk”. Bare or naked grain was grain or seed ready for sowing, ready to be “fruitful and multiply”.

We are reminded in I Cor. xv. moreover that “to every seed its own body” is a principle as true in the spiritual reality of resurrection as it is in the physical creation. The body of the believer, like the body of Adam is at first “natural” and afterward in resurrection “spiritual”, for, “there is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body”. The natural body is that which we receive from “the first man Adam”, the spiritual body we receive from “the second Man, the Lord from heaven, the last Adam”.

This association of the believer with Adam and with Christ, and the two bodies that are in view, is embraced in the figure of the “image”.

> “As we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly” (I Cor. xv. 49).

The over-reaching subtlety of the serpent, while plunging man into sin and death, opened the door for the Redemptive purposes of God to operate, and symbolically and by redemption man was “clothed upon” before being expelled from the Garden, anticipating the fully clothed condition which will be attained only in resurrection. It is to be noted with worship and wonder, that the Hebrews word translated “skin” is a derivative of the word “naked”, and differs only from the Hebrew word for “naked” by the absence of the final letter “m”, skin being “ar”, naked being “arum”. Before this clothing of the nakedness of the man and his wife took place, the promise of the Coming Seed is given:

> “I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise His heel” (Gen. iii. 15).

With the light we have received in this preparatory study, let us approach this great central prophecy with chastened hearts, yet with exultant spirits, for here lies enshrined the purpose of the ages, its conflict and its ultimate triumph.

No.14. Light on the purpose from Heb. ii.
pp. 191 - 194

The second chapter of the epistle to the Hebrews is necessarily an integral part of the epistle, and the interpretation of this chapter or any one verse in it cannot be attempted without due regard to the purpose of the epistle and its structure as a whole. Acknowledging this, we would nevertheless draw the reader's attention to several elements of truth that emerge from a study of this chapter:

(1) Angels evidently had some form of rule or jurisdiction in the past, but are not to hold a similar role in "the world to come" (Heb. ii. 5).

(2) Immediately following this statement is a quotation from Psa. viii. concerning man who was made "for a little lower than the angels" who was a shadow or type of the Lord, "the last Adam" (ii. 6-9).

(3) Something connected with the nature of Adam leads the Apostle to dwell upon the "oneness" that has been established between the Redeemer and the redeemed, "all of one", "brethren", "Behold I and the children which God hath given Me", "flesh and blood . . . . . He Himself likewise took part of the same" (ii. 11-15).

(4) Immediately following this statement is the comment "For verily He took not on Him the nature of angels; but He took on Him the seed of Abraham" (ii. 16).

The earlier rule of angels that is in mind in Heb. ii. 5 is connected with the law as is evident from verse two "For if the word spoken by angels . . . . . every transgression and disobedience" and the Scriptures teach that the law of Mount Sinai was administered by angels.

The epistle to the Galatians which has some features in common with Hebrews, and may have been a "covering letter" sent with that epistle says:

> "Wherefore then serveth the law? It was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made; and it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator" (Gal. iii. 19).

Stephen, also in his speech, says of Israel:

> "Who have received the law by the disposition of angels, and have not kept it" (Acts vii. 53).

The world to come of which the Apostle speaks, will not be put in subjection to angels, but to man, who was made "for a short time" (brachus) "less" or "inferior" to the angels. This man Adam was a type of Him Who was to come, to whom subjection over all things foreshadowed. While the A.V. reads in Heb. ii 9 that the Saviour tasted death for "every man", the following verse is more explicit and declares that He Who thus tasted death for "all", brought many "sons" to glory. These subjects of grace are further called "brethren" and "children" and the oneness which is stressed is a oneness not only of spirit and of purpose, but of "flesh and blood", the Saviour fulfilling the dual role of the Avenger of blood and the Kinsman Redeemer, indicated by the two words "destroy" and "deliver" (Heb. ii. 14, 15). Finally, the Apostle does not say in verse sixteen that in passing by the angels He took on Him the seed of ADAM, but that He took on Him the seed of ABRAHAM (Heb. ii. 16).

If the Saviour took not on Him the seed of Adam, then we Gentiles have no Redeemer, but we know that this is not so. Why then does the writer of this epistle limit the seed to that of Abraham? The same answer that we give to the apparent limitation in the genealogy of Matt. i. 1, will suffice here also. The presence of the genealogy of Luke iii. which goes beyond Abraham to Adam, prevents any real limitation being read into Matt. i. 1, the answer to the problem being that the purpose of Matthew was fully served by establishing the fact that the Saviour was the "Son of Abraham", but that this did not deny or exclude the fact that He was also the Son of Man in the fullest sense, even as he is "the Second Man" and "the last Adam". This limitation in Heb. ii. 16, however, is of extreme importance in this sense, it suggests that what happens of Israel may be looked upon as an epitome, a miniature, of that which befalls the race, and we discover that where sometimes the teaching of Scripture concerning the race may not be very explicit, it becomes so when the analogy of faith realizes the place that Israel occupy in the revelation of truth.

The rule and dominion of angels as related to Israel is limited to Sinai in Heb. ii. 1-3, but it points back to a dominion that angels exercised before the "foundation (or overthrow) of the world". This principle of interpretation can be seen at work in the epistle to the Romans. In Rom. v. 12 the Apostle goes back to Adam and the eighth chapter which speaks not of Israel, but of creation itself that shall be delivered (Rom. viii. 20, 21), continues the theme. With the opening of Rom. ix., however, Israel dominate the argument to the end of chapter xi. It may not be possible to put one's finger on any one text and say "that verse defines who are in Adam", but the analogy of Israel's calling makes it very clear who are meant by "all in Adam".

For example, we can quote Rom. xi., and maintain that "ALL" Israel shall be saved, and if no reference is made to the teaching of Rom. ix., we may feel convinced that "all means all" and that this passage is universal in its embrace. The eleventh chapter however is preceded by the ninth, and there we are left in no doubt as to the extent of "all Israel".

(1) They are not all Israel who are of Israel.
(2) Merely to prove descent from Abraham is not sufficient.
(3) The seed are called only in Isaac.
(4) That is to say, the children of the flesh are not the children of God, but the children of the promise, these are "counted from the seed" (Rom. ix. 6-9).

Therefore when we read "all Israel shall be saved", it does not refer to the mere physical descendants of Abraham, for if it did, Ishmael would be included; it refers to a promise and reckoning, which later is revealed to be an "election", an election which reckoned Jacob as the seed but excluded Esau. This principle, namely the fact that Israel presents the purpose of the ages in miniature, can be seen in the construction of the book of Genesis.

Genesis i. to x.	Genesis xi. to l.
THE RACE	THE NATION
Adam to Noah	Abraham to Joseph
The Ark	The coffin

When Peter wrote about the world that then was being overflowed with water (II Pet. iii. 6) he may not have referred to Gen. i. 2, but to the flood in the days of Noah, but seeing that he wrote for Hebrew readers that would be quite in harmony with the Scriptural rule, the flood in the days of Noah being the background of the call of Abraham, even as the deep of Gen. i. 2 is the background of the creation of Adam. We can well believe that some readers will look somewhat askance at the way in which we have put the "ark" of Noah and the "coffin" of Joseph in correspondence.

In the N.T. the same Greek word is used of the Ark of Noah, and the Ark of the Tabernacle, namely kibotos, which shows that they are to be considered as similar. This word is employed for both arks in the Septuagint version. The words employed by Moses, however, differ. He uses the word tebah for the Ark of Noah, and the word aron for the Ark of the tabernacle. Parkhurst says that the word tebah is derived from the same root that gives us tohu meaning "hollow", the word which is translated "without form" in Gen. i. 2, and that reference of itself is suggestive in linking the "deep" of the overthrow with the means of deliverance from the deluge in the days of Noah. Whether we are likely to discover the true root meaning of tebah is questionable, but the Scriptural use of tebah has a lovely human touch about it. Apart from the references in Gen. vi.-ix. this word occurs in one other passage namely in Exod. ii. 3, 5, where it is used of the ark made by the mother of Moses in which she placed her infant son:

> "She took for him an ark of bulrushes, and daubed it with slime and with pitch."

The ark made by the mother of Moses was treated with "bitumen" or "pitch" but the ark made by Noah was treated with a "covering", the word "pitch" not being the same as that used in Exod. ii. 3. One cannot help feeling that when Moses came to write the record of the Flood he could not help remembering the little ark in which he had been entrusted to the Nile, and the choice of the same word in Gen. vi.-ix. may indicate a loving remembrance of that Hebrew mother in Egypt.

How does all this justify the correspondence with Joseph's "coffin"? Well, the self same word aron that is found in Exod. xxv. and translated "ark" is the word translated "coffin" here, and had Moses not been influenced by his childhood remembrances, the N.T. and the LXX make it plain that he might well have used the word aron (translated "coffin") in Gen. vi.-ix. also.

No.15. The evident importance of the Seed in the unfolding purpose.

pp. 231 - 234

We have seen by the examination of Gen. i.-iii. that "The Seed", its purity, its preservation and its enemies therein foreshadowed, justifies the title that has been given to these early chapters of Genesis, namely "The Seed Plot" of all Scripture. If this be admitted it will be further acknowledged that, lying at the very centre of the purpose there foreshadowed, is the dual prophecy concerning the Seed of the Woman and the seed of the Serpent (Gen. iii. 15), and that any attempt to understand or explain the purpose of the ages that fails to give a prominent place to this prophecy, must necessarily be deficient and possibly misleading. Before concentrating upon the actual terms of this prophecy let us take a large view.

The last of the prophets is Malachi, and he it is that points back to Gen. ii. and iii., and by so doing brings the teaching of the whole of the O.T. revelation to a full circle. When we open the N.T. we are confronted with a genealogy "The book of the generation of Jesus Christ" as the son of David, the son of Abraham, and in a peculiar sense the son of the woman, a son who is nevertheless Emmanuel "God with us", and in perfect correspondence with this, on the last page of the N.T we read of Him Who is both the "Root" as well as "the Offspring of David".

We have therefore O.T. and N.T. linked together as prophecy and fulfillment, by these four passages:

A | Gen. i.-iii. The Seed of the Woman.
B | Mal. ii. 10-16. The Seed of God.
A | Matt. i. The Son of the Virgin. Emmanuel.
B | Rev. xxii. 16. The root and offspring of David.

Let us examine this passage in Malachi.

The A.V. reads in Mal. ii. 15 "a godly seed", but in the margin informs the reader that the Hebrew reads "a seed of God". When the O.T. writer wished to speak of the "godly" he used the Hebrew chasid, a fitting word, meaning one who has received grace, and so should be gracious. Here, in Malachi, something deeper is intended and the Hebrew word Elohim should be translated "God" in chapter ii. 15 as it is in the six other passages where it occurs in Malachi. Malachi reproves both the priests and the people, and the first two chapters are devoted to this dual theme. It would take us too far afield to exhibit the complete structure of Malachi but a brief outline of Mal. ii. 10-16 will enable the reader to see the unity of the theme, and the essential features will be thrown into prominence.

Malachi ii. 10 - 16

A | 10. ONE Father ONE God. |
a | 10. Covenant of fathers.
b | 11. Treacherous dealing.
B | 11. The daughter of a strange god.
A | 15. ONE made Wherefore ONE? |
b | Treacherous dealing.
a | Covenant of marriage.
B | 15. A Seed of God.

Israel's departure from their God, the dishonouring of the Covenant, the profaning of the holiness of the Lord, is associated with marriage with the daughter of a strange god, even as the purpose of God both at the creation of man, and afterwards in the separating laws of Israel indicates that He sought "a Seed of God". The law forbidding the sowing of "mingled seed" (Lev. xix. 19) had more in its intention than good husbandry, and its bearing upon the peculiar character of Israel is seen in Ezra ix. 2 and the remainder of the book, where great grief is manifested at the "mingling of the holy seed" with the people of the land. Nehemiah also spoke severely concerning this same act, instancing Solomon's sin in these things . . . . . in marrying strange wives (Neh. xiii. 23-27). In the prophecy of Daniel we see very clearly that the "strange god" will be associated with the blasphemous beast of the time of the end (Dan. xi. 39), and in the forecast of Gentile dominion, Daniel reveals that at the time of the end some shall "mingle themselves with the seed of men" (Dan. ii. 43), which suggests that "as it was in the days of Noah" so shall it be at the time of the end.

To make the people of Israel aware of their profanation, the prophet Malachi leads them back to Gen. ii.:

> "Did not He make one?"

Both the record of Gen. ii. 18-25, and the comment of the Saviour in Matt. xix. 4-6 stress the fact that to Adam God gave one wife. Yet, continued the prophet, this limitation was not due to any deficiency, "He had the residue of the spirit (or breath)", and could have provided Adam with a number of wives had He so intended. At marriage man and wife become "one flesh", and this holy unity is designed by God to further His purpose, He sought thereby "a Seed of God". This fact will become more evident when we are examining the teaching of Scripture concerning the seed of the serpent.

Coming to the genealogy of Matthew, we observe that it is the book of the generation of Jesus Christ, the son of David, the son of Abraham, the son of Mary, Emmanuel, God with us. In that genealogy there is a name that strikes us: it is Zorobabel (verse 12). We have already seen that the Hebrew word for "seed" is zera and so Zorobabel, or Zerubabbel as it is written in the O.T. speaks either of the seed or the shoot of Babel, or Confusion, or of those who were "scattered" in Babylon. It is arresting, whatever its primary meaning may be for another reason, and that is its recurrence in the genealogy of Luke iii.

Zerubbabel is called "the son of Shealtiel or Salathiel" (Ezra iii. 2, 8; Hag. i. 1; Matt. i. 12; Luke iii. 27), but in I Chron. iii. 19 he is called the son of Pedaiah, the brother of Salathiel (17, 18). We may not know just exactly what occurred, but that something of importance happened we gather by consulting the genealogy given in Luke iii. There, we read once more of Zorobabel and Salathiel (Luke iii. 27). At first one may see nothing remarkable in this fact. Are not Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and David found in both genealogies? Why should not these two men figure in both?

The answer is that David had two sons, Solomon and Nathan. The line that is pursued in Matthew's genealogy is that through Solomon, but the line pursued by Luke is that through Nathan. Now no man can be the son of his father's brother, and consequently when we read in Luke that Salathiel was the son of Neri who was in direct descent from Nathan, we must understand the expression to mean "son-in-law" and this is substantiated by examination of the passage:

> "Jesus Himself began to be about thirty years of age, being legally reckoned (nomizo) the son of Joseph, who in his turn was legally reckoned the son of Heli. Heli was the father of Mary (Dr. John Lightfoot quoting Hieros, Chagigah) and Joseph the son of Jacob (Matt. i. 16) became his son by marriage."

There is, however, more in this genealogy than meets the eye. To illustrate our point, let us turn back to Gen. xxxvi. It is clear from verses 24 and 25 that "Anah" was a man. "He" fed his father's asses, and was "the father" of Aholibamah.

With this knowledge let us read Gen. xxxvi. 2:

> "Aholibamah, the daughter of Anah, the daughter of Zibeon the Hivite."

To the uninstructed this reads as though "Anah" a man, is called "the daughter of Zibeon". The truth is of course that the genealogy should read:

> "Aholibamah was the daughter of her father Anah, and so Aholibamah was also the daughter of Zibeon, not that her father Anah was the daughter of Zibeon."

So, when we read in the genealogy of the Saviour, the words "which was the son of" that recur throughout, refer always to Christ:

> "Jesus (as was legally reckoned) the son of Joseph, and so the son of Heli, and at length the son of Adam and finally the son of God."

Luke does not teach here the Adam was the son of God although this is not denied, the phrase is a continuous and unbroken succession from Jesus Christ to God His Father, Joseph at one end of the scale and Adam at the other being but human links in the chain.

Owing to the failure of Jechoniah who was written "childless", it appears that a marriage took place uniting the line of Zerobabel through Solomon, with the line that descended from Nathan, and so to Mary the mother of the Christ, the Woman's seed. Both Matthew and Luke speak of the virgin birth of Christ, but this is too solemn a subject to attempt to crowd into a paragraph. We must give our attention to the teaching of Scripture regarding the Seed of Abraham, the seed of David, the bearing of Rom. xvi. 20 upon the prophecy of Gen. iii. 15, the purport of the words relative to the parable of the Sower "How then will ye know all parables?" (Mark. iv. 13), and the words of Gal. iii. 16 and 29 "Not, and to seeds, as of many; but as of one, and to thy seed, which is Christ"; "then are ye Abraham's seed", before the main issues of this important subject are even touched upon. These items we hope to deal with in future articles of this series.

Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth. (Second Series).

No.64. (22) GALATIANS. Galatians iii. 13 - 20.

The curse of the law (iii. 13). pp. 13 - 16

With verse thirteen, we enter a new section of the epistle, as indicated by the structure; a section denominated "Redemption", which together with its corresponding member, iii. 24 - iv. 7 contains the only occurrences in Galatians of the word exagorazo.

D	iii. 13-20.	i	Exagorazo. Redeemed. Heirs.
		j	Covenant prior to Law.
	* * * * * * *
D	iii. 24 - iv. 7.	j	Schoolmaster prior to Christ.
		i	Exagorazo. Redeemed. Adoption.

It has been a matter of debate among commentators of all times, as to the parties intended by the word "us". Some have maintained that since the Gentile and his salvation is as much in view as that of the Jew, that the word "us" must comprehend them both, and that the "law" in view is not to be limited to the law given at Mount Sinai, but of that law which came into operation with Adam. The matter is of sufficient importance to justify a careful study. And first, let us observe what "law" has been in mind throughout the epistle so far. There are thirteen occurrences of nomos "law" in Gal. i.-iii. 13. Of this number, nomos occurs with the article "the" in three places, the remaining ten occurrences being anarthrous i.e. without an article.

Those which are anarthrous deal with "law" as opposed to "faith", without exactly specifying the law of Moses. These references are Gal. ii. 16, 19, 21; iii. 2, 5, 10 (first occurrence in the verse), 11. The remaining references which speak of "the law" are:

"Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them" (Gal. iii. 10).
"And the law is not of faith" (Gal. iii. 12).
"Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law" (Gal. iii. 13).

It is clear that the "curse" is specifically related to "the book of the law", and if we continue our collection of passages we shall find that this law is dated, being given four hundred and thirty years after the promise made to Abraham (Gal. iii. 17) which (1) makes it impossible for it to refer to Adam in Eden, (2) compels us to limit the expression to the law given by Moses. Further, the statement of verse nineteen "it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator" is a reference to Sinai as we shall see later.

Again, if the "us" of Gal. iii. 13 refers to all men both Jew and Gentile, it should have sufficed in verse fourteen to have written:

> "Christ hath redeemed US . . . . . that WE might receive the blessing"—but the apostle does not so speak. He says "Christ hath redeemed US . . . . . that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles".

Primarily, the pronoun "us" in verse thirteen refers to the Jew, and only in a secondary sense does it include the Gentile, and only so if he should be so foolish to put himself under the law, which is the very heart of the controversy.

To show the utter folly of the Galatian retrogression the Apostle tells them that such is the condition of those naturally "under the law" namely Israel, that they needed to be redeemed at such a cost that the mind almost refuses to believe the statement "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law being made a curse for us". As we shall see when considering verses fifteen onwards, the law stood in the way of the promise; it was temporary, and imposed only for a time, whereas the promise was of a permanent character, and was made four hundred and thirty years before. It was not a covenant that made demands upon the people, but was conceived in grace, addressed to faith, "to the end the promise might be sure" as the Apostle reasons in Rom. iv. 16.

The Apostle does not say that Christ became accursed, but that He became A curse, the abstract for the concrete. This is much more forceful than saying that Christ became a person who was accursed. For the same reason, it was said that the Saviour "was made SIN for us Who knew no sin", God having laid upon Him the iniquity of us all and to emphasize the enormity of human hostility, He said not that man is an enemy, but that "the carnal mind is enmity against God".

The passage of the law referred to by Paul is found in Deuteronomy:

> "And if a man have committed a sin worthy of death, and he be to be put to death, and thou hang him on a tree: his body shall not remain all night upon the tree, but thou shalt in any wise bury him that day; (for he that is hanged is accursed of God); that thy land be not defiled, which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance" (Deut. xxi. 22, 23).

Some interpret the words "accursed of God" by "accursed of the judges" for the word elohim is translated "judges" in Exod. xxi. 6; xxii. 8, 9. Other interpretations including "an insult against God" have been put forward, and the omission of the words "of God" by the Apostle when quoting the O.T. may have been in order to avoid any unnecessary explanation which would have made no contribution to his main argument.

The word "tree" is in the LXX and in the epistle to the Galatians; the Greek word is xulon. The Hebrew word used in Deut. xxi. is ets which, while primarily meaning a tree, is also translated "gallows" (Esther v. 14), "sticks" (Numb. xv. 32), "timber"

(II Kings xii. 12), and "wood" (Gen. vi. 14). The Hebrew word ets does not denote necessarily a growing tree, for it is associated with atsah to shut or fix and etsem "a bone". In like manner, xulon is rendered in the N.T. "staves", "sticks", "wood" as well as "tree". Liddell and Scott give as the meaning of xulon:

(1) Wood cut and ready for use, such as fire wood.
(2) A piece of wood, which includes "a pole, cross or gibbet".
(3) Live wood, a tree.
(4) A blockhead, A block.
(5) A measure of length—3 cubits.

The word enters into several English words, mainly of a scientific character such as xylite, xylophone, xylonite, etc., none of which have reference to a living tree. As the Roman form of gallows was either a stake or a cross, the word "tree" could be used interchangeably with stauros. It is noteworthy that Peter, James and John in their epistles never use the word stauros "cross", neither do they use the word stauroo. Peter speaks of the Saviour bearing our sins in His Own body "on the tree", but he was addressing Jewish readers. He used it in Acts v. 30 and x. 39. Paul uses it in Acts xiii. 29 when his audience was composed mainly of Jews (see the context). This avoidance of the word "cross" by the writers to the circumcision (with the two exceptions Heb. xii. 2 and Rev. xi. 8) and the fact that only to the Churches of Galatia (either in an oral address as at Antioch, or in an epistle, as in the epistle to the Galatians) does the apostle Paul use the word "tree" suggests very strongly that in Gal. iii. 10-13 he has the Jewish hearer prominently before him.

This becoming a "curse" and so removing the curse of the law, was:

> "That the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ; that we (both Jews and Gentiles) might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith."

In the next verse, the Apostle turns from addressing the Jew, to the Gentile portion of the church. This is indicated by a new approach:

> "Brethren, I speak after the manner of men" (Gal. iii. 15).

The argument takes a new turn; not only is the law set aside so far as salvation is concerned by the cross of Christ, but other equally cogent reasons may be given, and these he borrows from the law, not of Moses, but of the Galatians in connexion with the making of a will and the adopting of an heir.

This must occupy our attention in the next article.

No.65. (23) GALATIANS.
Galatians iii. 13 - 20.
The Galatian Will (iii. 15, 16).
pp. 32 - 35

We have observed the strong Hebrew colouring of Gal. iii. 10-13, and the clearing of the way for the blessing of Abraham to come on the Gentiles through faith, apart from the law and its works. Gal. iii. 15-20 is occupied with a further argument to show how completely the law is set aside in the Gospel, and this appeals not to the Jew or to Jewish customs or O.T. types, but to the existing law of the land in which the Galatians lived.

> "Brethren I speak after the manner of men" (Gal. iii. 15).

This expression introduces an illustration from common life in Rom. vi. 19. No knowledge of the Hebrew Scriptures was necessary to understand "slavery" for many of those who read the epistle to the Romans were at the time slaves themselves.

Many commentators, because not possessed of certain historical facts now brought to light, and not safeguarded by humility in the presence of the inexplicable in Scripture, have not hesitated to pronounce the Apostle's argument in Gal. iii. 15-20 as "very weak, and such as the Apostle ought not to use for the confirmation of a matter of so great importance" (Luther). Yet upon consideration it will be admitted, that whereas there was O.T. evidence for the fact that the original promise made to Abraham was addressed to "faith", no such O.T. evidence was available to meet the next difficulty, namely, that the subsequent introduction of the law of Moses four hundred and thirty years after the promise, cancelled the terms made with Abraham and substituted in their place "works of law". With a quick wit, sharpened as it must have been by his deep concern for these Galatians as well as used and illuminated by the Holy Spirit, the Apostle fastened upon the existing Galatian law of adoption to furnish an argument.

> "Though it be but a man's covenant."

Here, before we can proceed, it will be necessary to settle the meaning of the word diatheke "covenant".

In every case where the O.T. is in view diatheke must be rendered "covenant", agreeing with the Hebrew berith, which refers to the ceremony of cutting or dividing the sacrificial victim. Even where it is associated with the word "testator" in Heb. ix. 16, 17 a literal rendering of the passage leaves this translation of diatheke unaltered. Realizing this, many commentators have strenuously maintained that diatheke in Gal. iii. 15 must be translated "covenant". Where disputants seem to have missed their way in this matter is the recognition of the clause we have used above: "in every case where the O.T. is in view". Here in Gal. iii. 15 Paul is turning away from the O.T. Scriptures and appealing to some matter of common knowledge shared by himself and the Galatians.

There is a useful comment in Grimm's Lexicon which reads:

> "Diatheke. (1.) A disposition, arrangement, of any sort which one wishes to be valid; Gal. 3:15, where under the name of a man's disposition is meant specifically a testament, as it is a specimen and example of that disposition . . . . . a testament or will (so in Greek witness from Aristophanes). (2.) a compact, covenant very often in the Scriptures from berith (Vulgate testamentum)."

Here, by the happy choice of the word "disposition", we may use it either in the sense of a man's will, or of God's covenant.

Sir William Ramsay, commenting upon the attitude of many writer, says:

> "The Biblical usage is a different topic . . . . . The commentators have not been sufficiently careful to keep those two questions separate from one another."

The word diatheke is often found in inscriptions, and always in the sense of will or testament, and Paul by prefacing his comments with the words "I speak after the manner of men" shows what is in his mind. Dr. Bullinger, who strongly maintains the translation "covenant" in Heb. ix. 16, 17, says in his Greek Concordance:

> "Diatheke, a disposition, especially of property by will and testament. This word is the usual rendering of berith in the O.T. which certainly means a covenant."

The point of Paul's argument in Gal. iii. 15 is that a will once made is irrevocable. If we assume that the law governing the making of an ancient will is the same as that which is in force today, then we certainly find no cogency in the Apostle's illustration; but to quote Sir William Ramsay again:

> "Our procedure must be very different. We have to take the word diatheke in its ordinary sense, 'after the manner of men'; . . . . . then we observe what is the character attributed by Paul to the known classes of will in other ancient nations, and so determine its origin."

Archaeology demonstrates the truth that this irrevocability was a characteristic of Greek law. The making of the will was the appointment of the heir, and this by a process was entitled "adoption". When once such a will had been confirmed, no alteration was allowable or possible. Moreover a will today is secret; then, in Galatia, it was public and open.

The Roman-Syrian Law-Book cited by Mitteis well illustrates Gal. iii. 15:

> "It actually lays down the principle that a man can never put away an adopted son, and that he cannot put away a real son without good ground. It is remarkable that the adopted son should have a stronger position than the son by birth; yet it was so."

Every will had to be passed through the Record Office of the city. This illuminates the Apostle's argument "when it hath been confirmed". The Galatians, fully acquainted as they were with their own laws, would appreciate the Apostle's argument. Granted that a will had been confirmed, the heir appointed, the adoption made, then "no man disannulleth or added thereto". If this be so, continues the Apostle, see how this bears upon the problem before us. The blessing of Abraham comes to you by a covenant made by God four hundred and thirty years before the giving of the law at Mount Sinai; how then can you believe that such a law, coming so long afterwards should either disannul, or make the promise of none effect?

Before this conclusion is reached, however, Paul interposes another rather startling statement:

> "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ" (Gal. iii. 16).

We must handle with extreme care this argument of the Apostle, otherwise we may do ourselves or others damage. First we remember that Paul was both a good Hebraist and a master of Greek, and he would know that the plural of the Hebrew word "seed" which is zeraim could not possibly be used in the original promise to Abraham, for zeraim means "various kinds of grain" just as the plural spermata does in I Cor. xv. 38. Ellicott's note here seems so sane and so sound that we feel every reader would benefit by it. He says:

> "We may here pause to make a brief remark on the great freedom which so many commentators have allowed themselves to characterize St. Paul's argument as either artificial or Rabbinical, or as Baur, Apost. Paul, p. 665, has even ventured to assert 'plainly arbitrary and incorrect'. It may be true that similar arguments occur in Rabbinical writers; it may be true that sperma (like the Hebrew zera) is a collective noun, and that when the plural is used as in Dan. i. 12 'grains of seed' are implied. All this may be so—nevertheless we have here an interpretation which the Apostle, writing under the illumination of the Holy Ghost, has deliberately propounded, and which, therefore (whatever difficulties may at first sight appear in it) is profoundly and indisputably true. We hold, therefore, that there is as certainly a mystical meaning in the use of zera in Gen. 13:15, 17:8 as there is an argument for resurrection in Exod. 3:6, though in neither case was the writer necessarily aware of it."

It may be that the true solution of the problem raised by this argument as to the word "seed" lies in the fact that He Who knew the end from the beginning, and intended that Christ should be the true Seed and the one Heir, so worded the original statement, avoiding all plurality, that when in the fullness of time He sent forth His Son, made of a woman, made under the law, there should be no obstacle in the way of believing this great and important truth.

If we read on in Gal. iii. we shall come to the words:

> "And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. iii. 29), which is an evident reference back to the statement of verse 16.

The argument is now resumed with verse 17, and continues to verse 20, but as these verses contain much important teaching and at least one great exegetical problem, we must devote another article to its consideration.

No.66. (24) GALATIANS.
Galatians iii. 13 - 20.

The argument from the Galatian Will applied (iii. 17 - 20).
pp. 78 - 80

"And this I say." With these words the Apostle resumes the main argument of this section. It is not true to say that verse sixteen is a digression, or even a parenthesis, it is but the suspending of the main argument for a moment to ensure that Christ, the true Seed, shall be clearly seen in His rightful place before the conclusion is reached.

If verse seventeen ignores verse sixteen, and treats it as a parenthesis, what "covenant" is intended? If it be the covenant which is identified with "the promise" of verse sixteen, all is clear. It is that covenant, not "a man's covenant" which is now the theme. This covenant, said the Apostle, was "confirmed before of God in Christ", and that is shown to be the fact by his inspired teaching concerning the word "seed". Therefore, if a man's will when once confirmed stands, no man either adding to it or disannulling it, how much more shall not God's covenant stand? "The law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect."

In another series of articles entitled "Time and Place" the chronology of the Scriptures is traced step by step from Adam to the Babylonian captivity, and it is obvious that any chronological note given here cannot demonstrate its accuracy, as no proof can be offered for the dates already assumed, but a word or two is necessary, as there has been a sorry misconception on the part of many eminent commentators, who by reason of their failure to discern things that differ, and observing that two periods are mentioned, one of 430 years (Exod. xii. 40 and Gal. iii. 17) and the other of 400 years (Gen. xv. 13 and Acts vii. 6), they have given way to such comments as:

> "The difficulty lies . . . . . in the Hebrew text of Exod. xii. 40" (Alford).
> "The length of the sojourn is given in round numbers" (Lightfoot).
> "Supposing it could be proved that St. Paul's knowledge of ancient chronology was imperfect, this need not surprise us" (Conybeare and Howson).

The 430 years:

> "Now the sojourning of the children of Israel, who dwelt in Egypt, was 430 years" (Exod. xii. 40).

The 400 years:

> "Thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them 400 years" (Gen. xv. 13).
> "His seed should sojourn in a strange land; and that they should bring them into bondage, and entreat them evil 400 years" (Acts vii. 6).

The 430 years date from the call of Abraham (Gen. xii. 4); but the 400 years date from the casting out of Ishmael and the weaning of Isaac. The 30 years difference in these two datings is made up as follows:

Age of Abraham at the call of Gen. xii. 4.	75
* * *	* * *
From call to marriage of Hagar (Gen. xvi. 3).	10
From marriage to birth of Ishmael (Gen. xvi. 16).	1
From birth of Ishmael to birth of Isaac (Gen. xxi. 5).	14
	25
Add five years to the casting out of Ishmael and the weaning of Isaac.	5 30

For a complete and detailed chronology of this whole period, the reader is referred to the series of articles entitled "Time and Place" in the Berean Expositor, Vol. XXXVI. The proof is not necessary here. It is sufficient for the purpose of the Apostle's argument that the promise made to Abraham was given a long time prior to the giving of the law, to show that the subsequent introduction of the law at Mount Sinai "doth not invalidate so as to render the promise inefficacious".

> "For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise; but God gave it to Abraham by promise" (Gal. iii. 18).

Very similar in form is the argument of Rom. xi.:

> "If by grace, then it is no more of works: otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then is it no more grace: otherwise work is no more work" (Rom. xi. 6).

The abrupt "but God gave it to Abraham by promise" silencing all objection, is similar to "but not before God" of Rom. iv. 2. While "the inheritance" promised to Abraham may include many and diverse blessings, one only is here in view. The one with which the argument opened "received ye the Spirit by the works of the law or by the hearing of faith?" and this question is never lost sight of in the development that follows. A question now arises, a question that forces itself once more into Rom. vi. and vii., namely, these things being so, "wherefore then serveth the law?" The answer given by Paul has been given many explanations; indeed, on verse twenty Lightfoot says "the number of interpretations of this passage is said to mount up to 250 or 300. Many of these arise out of an error as to the mediator, many disregard the context, and not a few are quite arbitrary".

It will be obvious to all that the actual person intended by the Mediator of verse twenty, will be decided by the meaning given to the words of verse nineteen "it was added because of transgressions". Looking at the law as a whole we can say that:

(1) The law instead of bringing life and righteousness actually became "a ministry of condemnation".
(2) Its pressure stirred up rebellion and revealed and multiplied transgressions.

(3) It was temporary, given until "The Seed should come" and so in no competition with the age-abiding covenant made with Abraham.
(4) It did not come direct from God, as did the promise to Abraham, but was mediated by angels in the first instance and by Moses and the High Priest in the second instance.
(5) It was therefore in the nature of a contract, depending for its fulfillment on the observance of its conditions, whereas the promise made to Abraham in Gen. xv. was so given that Abraham was unable, even as he was unasked, to promise anything.

In one sense, this is sufficient for the purpose of following the argument of the Apostle, but the Word of God is a great deep, George John Gwynne, B.A., Rector and Vicar of Wallstown, Diocese of Cloyne, must be given the credit of bringing forward a fuller and more satisfactory interpretation than any other that the present writer has yet seen.

The questions which await solution, and upon which Gwynne was enabled to give fuller light, are:

(1) What "law" is intended in the words "wherefore then serveth the law?" His answer is "the ceremonial law".
(2) "It was added"; his contention is that it is a law that was "superadded" to an existing law that is in mind and not the addition of the law to a promise made years before.
(3) "Because of transgressions"; the primary meaning of charin "because" should be retained, not reversed, and that primary meaning is "on behalf of".
(4) The law that was superadded was temporary "till the seed should come".
(5) The Mediator is not Moses, but the High Priest.

When we examine this question in our next article, we shall learn that even Gwynne, keen as he was, missed the inspired guidance of one passage, which modifies his exclusion of Moses in the reference to the mediator, and compels us to include much more than the ceremonial law. But of this, more when we have all the material before us.

No.67. (25) GALATIANS.
Galatians iii. 13 - 20.
The super-added law.
pp. 108 - 112

We commence, as promised at the close of the last article, an examination of Gal. iii. 19, especially on four counts. (1) What was "the law"? (2) Why was it that this was "added" and to what? (3) What is the true significance of charin translated "because"? (4) Who is intended by the Mediator?

"Wherefore then serveth the law?" This is a legitimate question. For while we grant that the promise given to Abraham cannot be invalidated by the law subsequently given, yet the law is the law of God and it cannot be lightly set aside. It must have a purpose.

Under the one category ho nomos "the law" we must allow three great subdivisions (1) The Moral Law, (2) The Sacrificial Law, (3) The Political and Civil Law. These Galatians were being induced to make their salvation secure by grafting on to the gracious plan of salvation revealed in the gospel the ritual of the law of Moses. "Except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses, ye cannot be saved" (Acts xv. 1); and although they may not have been sensible to the implication, the Apostle assures them that if they submit to this rite of circumcision Christ shall profit them nothing; they become debtors to do the whole law, they are fallen from grace (Gal. v. 2-4).

When the Apostle asked the question:

> "Are ye so foolish? having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh?" (Gal. iii. 3), the words "by the flesh" can well refer to the carnal observances of the ceremonial law. It is to this particular association with the ceremonial law that the Apostle refers in Gal. iv. when he likened their retrograde movement as parallel with a return to paganism, saying:

> "Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years, I am afraid of you" (Gal. iv. 10-11).

Whitby has a comment on this passage which says:

> "The Galatians are said to return to those elements, not because they before observed Jewish ceremonies, but because the ceremonies of the law being in matter mostly the same with those the Gentiles used to their heathen deities, by returning to them, they returned to those elements."

This "law" the Apostle said was to continue "till the Seed should come". In one sense, this is true of the whole law, whether it be the moral law, the ceremonial law, or the burdensome statutes and laws that governed the political life of Israel when in the land. All law, all the works of law, all ideas of ever attaining to righteousness and life by law of any kind, for ever vanish in the presence of Jesus Christ and Him crucified. Yet, it must also be remembered that the two epistles that most definitely exclude "the works of law" as factors in salvation, namely Romans and Galatians, are at great pains to emphasize its eternal validity (Rom. xiii. 8-10; Gal. v. 13, 14). The command "Thou shalt not steal" is as binding upon a Christian under grace as it was upon a Jew under law (Eph. iv. 28); the honouring of father and mother was not abrogated and emptied of meaning at the advent of grace (Eph. vi. 2). The ceremonial law however has gone. Christ has "blotted out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to His cross" (Col. ii. 14), and the close proximity of "meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holyday, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days" (Col. ii. 16) shows that the ceremonial law is in view. The elaborate ritual given to Israel "stood only in meats and drinks, and divers washings (literally baptisms), and carnal ordinances, impose on them until the time of reformation. But Christ being come an High Priest of good things to come . . . . ." (Heb. ix. 10, 11), we are certainly safe if we include the ceremonial law in that which was added "till the seed should come".

"It was added because of transgressions." Charin "because of". A very great diversity of opinion has been held by commentators on the precise meaning of charin here. Ellicott has summed up these differences under three heads:

> 1.) Ad coercendas transgressiones, to restrain transgressions, as Chrysostom and most of the old expositors; 2.) Transgressionum gratia, that is, to call forth transgressions, to multiply them, to bring them to a head, some modern expositors; and 3.) Transgressionum causa, in order to make known transgressions, and in this way to compel men to acknowledge their guilt, Calvin.

Ellicott objects to the first that it is untenable "because no satisfactory examples have yet been adduced of such a practically reversed meaning of charin". The second though more plausible he rejects as being "open to the grave objection, that in a comparatively undogmatical passage it ascribes a purpose directly to God which would have certainly needed a fuller explanation". The third he retains "with some confidence, which is lexically defensible, and yields a good pertinent sense . . . . . to make man feel his need of a Saviour". This is true, yet the lexical objection is strong, namely, "that the force of charin is in gratium" (Meyer).

It is undeniable that charin means "in any one's favour, for his pleasure; for the sake of a person or thing, on account of" (Dr. Bullinger's Lexicon). The number of occurrences is nine, and they are the following: Luke vii. 47 "wherefore"; Gal. iii. 19 "because"; Eph. iii. 1, 14 "for this cause"; I Tim. v. 14 "no cause of"; Titus i. 5 "for this cause"; Titus i. 11 "for . . . sake"; I John iii. 12 "wherefore"; Jude 16 "because of". We will return to this word, its place and meaning, after we have considered the rest of the sentence.

"It was added" prostithemi. Now this word assumes that there exists something to which the addition can be made. For example, one cannot "add one cubit" to one's stature unless one is already of some height (Matt. vi. 27); when the promise was given that "all these things shall be added unto you" (Matt. vi. 33), the sense is "superadded", added in addition. It is easy for a reader of Galatians to say "surely it means that the law of Moses" was super-added to the "promise" made to Abraham; but there are strong objections to this namely, the promise was given 430 years previously and there is no hint in Exod. xix. and xx. that either Israel or Moses spake or thought of the nature of the promise to Abraham which it seems they must have done, if the law of Sinai was actually superadded to that promise, and there is no apparent relation between the promise of Abraham and the law of Moses. Here is "no epidiatheke, but a totally fresh institution" (Meyer). The provisions of the promise are diametrically opposed to those of the law, and says Gwynne: "How this can with any propriety of language be said to be 'superadded' to it, is a mystery which I am unable to solve."

When giving credit to Gwynne for directing our attention to the idea that the word "added" in Gal. iii. 19 refers to the adding of the ceremonial law to the existing commandments on the tables of stone, we suggested that even he had not observed that there is waiting for us a reference that, if studied, leads us out into even fuller light and certainty. That reference is Heb. xii. 18, 19. Before quoting this and following up its implications, the writer went through the commentaries that were immediately accessible—Lightfoot, Alford, Bloomfield, Ellicott, Webster and Wilkinson, McKnight, Valpy, Conybeare and Howson, Ramsay, Sadler, Lewin, Wordsworth and the Companion Bible, but not one of these valuable and helpful works makes so much as a passing reference to Heb. xii. 18, 19.

If the reader says "why should they?" the answer is that whoever attempts to interpret and explain a passage of Scriptures without putting forward prominently the principle "comparing spiritual things with spiritual" will necessarily, deprived of that light and authority, be compelled to depend upon his own sagacity, and the opinion of others. So it is that men of learning and understanding are found following one another in a blind circle, instead of humbly yet boldly enquiring at the Fountain Head. Every Greek concordance gives a list of prostithemi, commencing with Matt. vi. 27 as the first occurrence in the New Testament and ending with Heb. xii. 19 as the last.

In the presence of the names cited above, the present writer must retire if it be a matter of learning, erudition or scholarship, but however modest he may well be, the fact remains that the observance of the principle of I Cor. ii. 13 leads straight to the heart of truth, whereas the learning and the scholarship that ignored this principle never reached clear light. This moment of apparent boasting is allowed us, for what such simple observance can do for the writer, it can do for the reader, however retiring and unlearned he may be.

Let us now turn to Heb. xii.:

> "For ye are not come unto the mount that might be touched, and that burned with fire, nor unto blackness and darkness, and tempest, and the sound of a trumpet, and the voice of words; which voice they that heard intreated that the word should not be spoken to them any more . . . . . but ye are come unto Mount Sion . . . . . and to Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant" (Heb. xii. 18-24).

Here in the phrase "the word should not be spoken to them any more" we have the word prostithemi "added" as used in Gal. iii. 19. Dr. Weymouth renders the passage "entreated that no more should be added". Moses Stuart says of Heb. xii. 19 "the exact shade of the writer's meaning is the hearers of which (voice) refused that a word should be added to them, viz. autois rhemasi, to those commands". Now the Scriptures referred to in Heb. xii. 18, 19 are Exod. xx. 19; Deut. v. 5, 25; and xviii. 16. A consultation of these passages shows that after the actual giving of the ten commandments, the people pleaded that the rest of the law should be given through the mediation of Moses. Moses reminded the people of this, when reviewing the past in Deut. v.:

> "The LORD our God made a covenant with us in Horeb. The LORD made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us, even us, who are all of us here alive this day. The LORD talked with you face to face in the mount out of the midst of the fire (I stood between the LORD and you at that time, to show you the word of the LORD; for ye were afraid by reason of the fire, and went not up into the mount)" (Deut. v. 2-5).

Enlarging upon this in chapter xviii., Moses brings forward his own typical mediation as prophetic of the work of Christ.

> "The LORD thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me; unto Him ye shall hearken; according to all that thou desiredst of the LORD thy God in Horeb in the day of the assembly, saying, Let me not hear again the voice of the LORD my God, neither let me see this great fire any more, that I die not. And the LORD said unto me, They have well spoken that which they have spoken. I will raise them up a Prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words in His mouth . . . . ." (Deut. xviii. 15-18).

The "added" words are explained:

> "commandments, and the statutes, and the judgments, which thou shalt teach them, that they may do them in the land which I give them to possess it . . . . . all the ways . . . . . that ye may live . . . . . now these are the commandments, the statutes and the judgments . . . . ." (Deut. v. 31-33; vi. 1).

The rehearsal of these "added" laws occupies the bulk of Deut. vi. 1-23. We cannot therefore limit the law that was "added" in Gal. iii. 19 to the ceremonial law alone, although the words "because of transgressions" do focus our attention upon that part of the added law, that had to do with sin and sacrifice, circumcision and ablution. Neither is it possible to exclude Moses from the office of mediator, that Gwynne in his exposition does, for Heb. xii. and Deut. xviii. settle that matter. What is true however, is that under the law, the mediation of Moses was not sufficient, the high priest also is a mediator, a type of Christ as the Mediator of the new covenant (Heb. viii. 6; ix. 15).

Returning to Gal. iii. let us note that in verse fifteen the Apostle said of the Galatian will "no man . . . . . added thereto". In verse nineteen he says the law was "added". If we interpret this to mean that the law of Moses was added to the promise made to Abraham, we shall compel the Apostle to contradict himself. If we, in the light of Heb. xii., teach that the "added" law was that part of the law of Moses which was given to him as a mediator subsequent to the ten commandments, all is Scriptural and clear.

Paul's use of this fact in Gal. iii. is to force the Galatians to see how foolish they really were, to allow the imposition of such a law upon the glorious grace of the gospel.

Charin "because of" transgressions, retains its primitive sense, the law that was "added" included the provision of priest and sacrifice, shadows of good things to come. Neither the law as a whole nor the ceremonial law as a part, could provide righteousness or life.

> "Now a mediator is not a mediator of one, but God is one" (Gal. iii. 20).

As we have said earlier, between 250 and 300 interpretations have been noted, of this difficult verse. These it will be profitless to discuss, for they all ignore the testimony of Heb. xii. The innate idea of a mediator demands two parties. This is true of the law, God being the One and the people of Israel the other contracting party. In the promise made to Abraham, "God was One". Abraham was caused to fall into a "deep sleep" (Gen. xv. 12) so that he could promise nothing. The Apostle therefore, picking up the argument started in Gal. iii. 15 concerning the Galatian will, proves the superiority of the promise made to Abraham, and the impossibility that the law, given 430 years afterward, should make it invalid or of none effect.

No.68. (26) GALATIANS.
Galatians iii. 21 - 23.
"Shut up unto the faith."
pp. 127 - 131

In Gal. iii. 19 the Apostle asked the question "wherefore then serveth the law?" and provided the answer "it was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made". Now lest there should appear to be any inherent antagonism between the promise of God and the law of God, he puts another question: "Is the law then against the promises of God?" and his answer, like the answers to similar questions in Rom. vi. and vii. provides a complete denial of such an idea, "God forbid". The apparent antagonism is only produced by the attempt to compare things that differ. The promise of God, asks nothing of the flesh, and takes no account of human frailty; the law, however, as a covenant was rendered "weak through the flesh" (Rom. viii. 3), because a "covenant" implies contracting parties. To make the promise "sure", it was implemented by faith and grace (Rom. iv. 16); the law was not intended as a provider of righteousness and life, but rather that it should reveal human inability of produce righteousness, and lead the sinner to the only source of righteousness and life, the Son of God Himself as proclaimed in the gospel.

> "For if there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law" (Gal. iii. 21).

The emphasis must not be placed on "given", for assuredly a law had been given, and life was attached to complete obedience thereto (Gen. ii. 16, 17), but the emphasis must be placed on "could have given" for the failure of all men to render such obedience turned the commandment which had been ordained unto life, into an instrument of condemnation and death (Rom. vii. 10). This passage is in structural correspondence with Gal. ii. 21, where the Apostle wrote "if righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain". We proceed therefore to the next step in his argument, where once more the Scriptures are spoken of as though they themselves spoke and thought. Gal. iii. 22, 23 is in correspondence with Gal. iii. 8-13, and the following extract from the complete structure exhibits this feature quite clearly.

C | iii. 8-12. | f | The SCRIPTURE preached beforehand.
g | Justification by faith. Ek pisteos.
h | Hupo. Under a curse.

* * * * * * *

C | iii. 22, 23. | f | The SCRIPTURE concluded.
g | Promise by faith. Ek pisteos.
h | Hupo. Under sin. Under Law.

The word "concluded" is a compound of kleito "to shut", which in its turn is connected with kleis "a key". The Apostle uses ekkleio in Gal. iv. 17 where the A.V. translate it "exclude", and it is this same word that he emphasized in Rom. iii. 27 when he said "where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? of works? Nay: but by the law of faith".

The word sugkleio "conclude" is used once again in Gal. iii. 23 "shut up" unto the faith, and to ignore its presence while attempting an interpretation of the same word in verse twenty-two is of course fatal. In verse twenty-two the Scripture is said to have "shut up" all under sin, in order that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe; and in verse twenty-three we learn that before faith came we were kept under the law, "shut up" unto the faith which should afterward be revealed. The words "shut up unto" are found in the Septuagint, as in Psa. lxxviii. 50 "He gave their life over to the pestilence"—shut them up with no way of escape, and Bengel sites Polybius "he was shut up unto the very hopes which his own slaves and friends "possessed", and Irenaeus, "the sons of God are shut up to the belief of His coming".

The Apostle, therefore, when writing Gal. iii. 22, 23 does not stress the condemnation that is associated with being "shut up" in prison, so much as that mankind by reason of sin were "shut up" to but one way of escape, and that way by faith in Christ, as distinct from works of law. The same truth is expressed in John's Gospel and by Peter in different words, but with the same intent:

> "No man cometh unto the Father, but by Me" (John xiv. 6).
> "There is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved" (Acts iv. 12).

The promise is said to be “by faith of Jesus Christ”, and given to them “that believe”. There is no tautology here, the “faith of Jesus Christ” means something different from them “that believe”. Had the Apostle intended to teach the idea of our faith in Jesus Christ, he could have said without ambiguity, and indeed has said so in many of his Epistles. The “promise” is “by the faith of Jesus Christ”, that is the Saviour’s Own personal faith and faithfulness even unto death. His faith, not ours, is the source of this indefectible promise that nothing can disannul or make void. It becomes effective and personal to each seeking sinner that “believes”.

As many readers will not possess Volume XVIII of the Berean Expositor we believe the importance of this expression “the faith of Jesus Christ” will justify the re-printing of the following extract from the exposition of the epistle to the Romans.

WHAT IS THE FAITH OF CHRIST?

The usual interpretation makes the faith of Jesus Christ to mean the believer’s faith in Christ, or the faith which Jesus Christ has enjoined. This would interpret Rom. iii. 21, 22 as:

> “The righteousness of God has been manifested through the believer’s faith in Jesus Christ.”

This has neither good sense nor good doctrine to commend it. It appears that we must abandon this interpretation and come to the Word afresh. Referring to the structure of Rom. iii. 21-28 given on page 85 of Volume XVIII, we see that “the faith of Jesus Christ” (Rom. iii. 22) is balanced by the expression “the faith of Jesus” (Rom. iii. 26), a phrase translated in the A.V. “believeth in Jesus”. The two passages together stand in relation to the great cause of our justification—“to him which is of the faith of Jesus”. We are not left entirely without guidance on this subject, for the very next chapter takes up the expression in connexion with Abraham in a way that leaves little room for doubt as to its true import. In Rom. iv. 12 we read concerning Abraham that he was the father of those “who also walk in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham”. The faith “of” Abraham cannot mean my faith in him, or faith enjoined by him to me; it simply means Abraham’s own faith. I am enjoined to walk in the steps of that faith. Thus we have presented here the two aspects that are already found in Rom. iii. 22 and 26.

The apostle Paul, quite apart from the question of inspiration, would not, unless he were a careless writer, so soon have used the same expression with a totally different meaning, and that without a word of warning. Rom. iv., however, is manifestly an expansion of the argument of Rom. iii. 21-28 and consequently it seems difficult to resist the conclusion that the terms “the faith of Jesus Christ” and “the faith of Abraham” must be interpreted in the same way. In fact the testimony of the law and the prophets spoken of in Rom. iii. 21 is actually the basis of Rom. iv., which cites the book of Genesis and the Psalms on this very point (Rom. iv. 3-8).

Pistis, ITS USAGE IN THE SEPTUAGINT

Paul's great teaching, justification by faith, is confessedly enshrined in the words of Hab. ii. 4, "the just shall live by faith". This one verse is quoted in three different connexions by the Apostle, viz., Rom. i. 17, Gal. iii. 11, and Heb. x. 38. The Hebrew word that is translated pistis in the LXX of Hab. ii. 4 is emunah; this and the cognate word amanah are so translated many times, and with the idea of faithfulness, and not simply believing, e.g.:

> "His righteousness and His faithfulness" (I Sam. xxvi. 23).
> "Did ordain in their set office" margin = trust (I Chron. ix. 22).
> "The men did the work faithfully" (II Chron. xxxiv. 12).
> "All His works are done in truth" (Psa. xxxiii. 4).
> "We make a sure covenant" (Neh. ix. 38).

The Hebrew text of Hab. ii. 4 reads as the A.V.: "the just shall live by his faith (or faithfulness)." What that faith involved can be seen in Hab. iii. 17-19. The LXX departs a little from the Hebrew and reads: "The just shall live by My faith (or faithfulness)." The Apostle, who knew both the Hebrew and the LXX, omit both the pronouns ("his" and "my"), and so can use the verse in three different contexts, emphasizing one or other of the shades of meaning as the case demands.

"The just shall live by his and by My faithfulness" is a rendering which approaches the dual teaching of Rom. iii. 22 and 26. "The faith of God" (Rom. iii. 3) is practically synonymous with "the truth of God" (Rom. iii. 7), showing that Paul retained the O.T. meaning of the word. Gal. iii. 22 uses the two expressions "out of the faith of Jesus Christ" and "to them that believe": "in order that the promise out of the faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe." To translate this: "in order that the promise out of believing in Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe" is not good sense, to say nothing of the demands of the context.

The context speaks of another possible source, ek nomou, "out of law" (Gal. iii. 21). But righteousness cannot arise "out of law"; it can only arise "out of the faith of Jesus Christ". His faith and faithfulness, not my belief in Him, is the great cause and foundation of the glorious gift of the gospel. To put the law where God puts promise, to substitute a legal righteousness where God puts one by faith, may indicate zeal, even as Israel's similar action (Rom. x. 2), but, as Gal. iii. 16-18 shows, it is contrary to Scripture. Abraham's faith had no reference to Sinai and its covenant looked to Christ in Whom the promises were made. It is the faithfulness of Christ as the true Seed both of the woman (Gen. iii. 15), and of Abraham (Gen. xii. 7), and not His obedience to the law and covenant of Sinai that is ever uppermost in the Apostle's doctrine.

Before passing on we will put the reader in possession of a list of all the occurrences of the expression "the faith of . . . . ." in the N.T. so that all may "search and see" whether what we teach is "so".

> "Have faith of God" (margin), i.e. great faith (Mark xi. 22) (See parallels in Matthew and Luke).

"Upon (epi) the faith of His name" (Acts iii. 16). (The faith of the lame man in the Lord is not mentioned; faithfulness to all His name implies is rather the thought.) His name was called Jesus, "for He shall save His people from their sins" (Matt. i. 21).

"Shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect?" (Rom. iii. 3).

"Even God's righteousness through Jesus Christ's faith" (Rom. iii. 22).

"Justifier of him who is out of the faith of Jesus" (Rom. iii. 26).

"Who walk in the steps of the faith of our father Abraham" (Rom. iv. 12).

"A man is not justified by the works of law, but through faith of Jesus Christ . . . . . justified by faith of Christ" (Gal. ii. 16).

"The promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe" (Gal. iii. 22).

"Boldness of access . . . . . through His faith" (Eph. iii. 12).

"Righteousness . . . . . which is through faith of Christ, the out-of-God righteousness upon faith" (Phil. iii. 9).

"Buried . . . . . also raised with Him through the faith of the inworking of God, Who hath raised Him from the dead" (Col. ii. 12).

"Your faith" (the faith of you) (I Thess. iii. 2, 5, 7, 10).

"Have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ . . . . . with respect of persons" (James ii. 1).

"When a writer would describe a person as the author or owner of a thing, the proper and obvious course is to write the name in the genitive case; if he desires to present him as the object of reference, a variety of forms suggest themselves (which are freely employed by N.T. writers, such as eis, epi, pros, and sometimes en, with their respective cases), by which his purpose can be effected without exposing himself to the charge of ambiguity, or the risk of misapprehension. Should he, however, passing over all these forms, select the genitive which is the natural expression of source or proprietorship, it is to be presumed that it was his intention so to do, and the genitive is to be understood subjectively" (Glyne on Galatians).

No.69. (27) GALATIANS.
Galatians iii. 24 - iv. 7.
Redemption and Adoption.
pp. 151 - 155

The passage before us corresponds with iii. 13-20, thus:

D | iii. 13-20. | i | Exagorazo. Redeemed. Heirs.
j | Covenant prior to Law.

* * * * * * *

D | iii. 24 - iv. 7. | j | Schoolmaster before Christ.
i | Exagorazo. Redeemed. Adoption.

The two occurrences exagorazo "redeem" occur in these sections in the sense of "buying a slave out of a market in order to set him free". In the former section, the law is preceded by the Covenant, in the latter, the faith is preceded by the law. In one "heirs" are in view, in the other "the heir" as the word "adoption" implies. Looking at the section iii. 24 - iv. 7 as a whole we observe that the figure employed to enforce the next phase of truth is that of a minor under tutelage who finally enters into the status of a son and heir, and consequently becomes free from the discipline that belongs to childhood. The following structure sets this balance of teaching before the eye.

Galatians iii. 24 - iv. 7

A | iii. 24, 25. The Schoolmaster. Hupo "under" | a | The law was our schoolmaster.
b | Unto Christ.
b | After faith has come.
a | No longer under a schoolmaster.
B | iii. 26-28. Ye are all children. |
c | Ye are children of God.
d | Baptized into Christ.
d | Put on Christ.
c | Ye are all one in Christ Jesus.
C | iii. 29. "IF" ye be Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed and "heirs" according to the promise.

A | iv. 1-5. Tutors, Governors, Elements. Hupo "under" | a | The child. \
b | The Servant. \ The
c | The Tutors and Governors. / Figure.
d | Time appointed of the father. /
a | When we were children. \
b | The servitude. \ The
c | The elements of the world. / application.
d | Fullness of time; God sent. /
B | iv. 6. Ye are sons. |
e | Ye are sons.
f | Spirit of His Son.
g | Abba Father.
e1 | No more servant but son.
f | Spirit of His Son.
g | Abba Father.
e1 | No more servant but son.
C | iv. 7. "IF" a son then an "heir" of God through Christ.

The fact that Gal. iii. 24 opens with the word "wherefore" indicates the connexion between the statement of verse twenty-three and the section now before us. The "schoolmaster unto Christ" is an expansion of the condition "shut up into the faith", but on the surface there does not seem much connection between the office of a schoolmaster and the action of shutting any one up. Upon examination however we discover that the word thus translated, paidagogos "pedagogue", means a guardian rather than a schoolmaster.

> "Among the Greeks and Romans the name was applied to trustworthy slaves who were charged with duty of supervising the life and morals of boys belonging to the better class. The boys were not allowed so much as to step out of the house without them before arriving at the age of manhood" (Thayer).

In chapter iv. the Apostle returns to the figure, this time using the double office "tutor and governor", epitropos and oikonomos, guardians, having special reference to the manners and morals of the child; and stewards, dealing more particularly with the property of the child. When Paul called himself "the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles" and went on to speak of the "dispensation" (oikonomia) that had been given to him, he knew that many stewards were slaves although promoted to high responsibility.

The Apostle takes one more step in the pursuit of this figure, and this time he speaks of "the elements of the world" instead of pedagogue, guardian or steward. The word "element" is stoicheion from stoichos a row, rank or series, hence any first thing or principle. It denotes (1) The letters of the alphabet; (2) The elements out of which the universe is composed; (3) The heavenly bodies, partly because of the regulation by them of times and seasons. Thus we have three developments of one argument revolving around the employment of three related figures:

(1) The pedagogue.
(2) The tutor and governor.
(3) The elements of the world.

It is evident that in the last figure, the Apostle reaches his point and consequently, while we need not know much about pedagogues or tutors to appreciate his argument, we need to be well acquainted with his use of the words stoicheion "elements" and stoicheo "to walk as by rule".

Stoicheion is used by Paul five times as follows:

> "The elements of the world" (Gal. iv. 3).
> "Weak and beggarly elements" (Gal. iv. 9).
> "After the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ" (Col. ii. 8).
> "If ye be dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why, as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances" (Col. ii. 20).
> "Ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles of the oracles of God" (Heb. v. 12).

Stoicheo is used of or by Paul five times, as follows:

> "Thou thyself also walkest orderly, and keepest the law" (Acts xxi. 24).
> "Who also walk in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham" (Rom. iv. 12).
> "If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit" (Gal. v. 25).
> "As many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them" (Gal. vi. 16).
> "Let us walk by the same rule" (Phil. iii. 16).

The reader will doubtless have called to mind the context of some of these references. The Galatians were being put into bondage by the imposition of the stoicheia of the law, whereas the Colossians were being put into bondage by the imposition of the stoicheia both of a vain deceitful philosophy and of ordinances cancelled by the cross of Christ. Both Galatians and Colossians, though led in different paths, came near the same thing in the end.

To the Galatians Paul wrote:

> "Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years. I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain" (Gal. iv. 10, 11).

To the Colossians Paul wrote:

> "Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holyday, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days: which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ" (Col. ii. 16, 17).

The parallel between Galatians and Hebrews is found in the reference to the state of children as contrasted with that of adults:

> "For every one that useth milk . . . . . is a babe, but strong meat belongeth to them that are of full age" (Heb. v. 13, 14).

When we compare the contexts of stoicheion and stoicheo within the epistle to the Galatians itself we have the "weak and beggarly elements" of the law which pertain to childhood and bondage, contrasted with the walk that is beyond the touch of law, a walk that is in line with the new creation; and it was to wean from the one and lead to the other that the Apostle spent himself in writing this moving epistle. The "time appointed by the father" finds its equivalent in the "fullness of time" when Christ came into the world.

It is evident that if there is a plan and a purpose in the Bible, some control of time is essential if that plan and purpose is to be attained. It is made very clear in Scripture that there is a time and season "to every purpose under heaven". This purpose is called "The purpose of the ages" (Eph. iii. 11 lit.). When the Saviour commenced His ministry he did so with the announcement "the time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand: repent ye, and believe the gospel" (Mark i. 15).

It was the "fullness" of time also in the sense that the necessary preparatory period was finished. Nations had been permitted to grope in darkness and these times are called "the times of this ignorance" (Acts xvii. 30). Many different forms of government had been weighed in the balances and found wanting. Israel too had passed through the fire, and it had been proved to a demonstration that, however closely hedged about a people may be, however just the laws, no man can by his own works provide a righteousness that would be accepted with God. Jewish religion, Greek wisdom, Roman power all stood self confessed failures. The time had come for the Redeemer to be born.

> "Made of a woman, made under the law" (Gal. iv. 4).
> Ek gunaikos, genomenon hupo nomon.

Many commentators have been tempted to read more into these words than the context demands. There is no necessary reference to the Virgin birth, it rather emphasizes the true humanity of the Redeemer. The sayings "man that is born of a woman" (Job xiv. 1), "among them that are born of women" (Matt. xi. 11) make no specific reference to the individual mothers, but rather indicates something universal, something that is true of all men. This universal fact would not exclude the fulfillment of the prophecy concerning "the seed of a woman" made in Gen. iii., it would most naturally direct the thought back to that germ of all prophecy, and in so doing would travel back before Abraham and lead back to Adam, thereby indicating that the Deliverer now come was akin to all men and not related only to Israel. The added words "under law" revealed that the Redeemer was fully qualified to deal with Israel's special case, and so reveals how fully the ruined state of all men has been met by the gracious intervention of Christ. He thus came that He might redeem; He came that those redeemed might receive, and as a result that they may be enabled to cry "Abba Father".

As we have already seen, the word translated "redeem" is used in Gal. iii. 13 with special reference to the curse of the law, so here He came to redeem them that were under the law. Such receive "the adoption of sons". We gave some consideration to this subject when dealing with Gal. iii. 15-17, showing that by "adoption' is meant the appointing of the heir.

"Abba Father." Here we have Aramaic and Greek, Jew and Gentile expressing in their own tongue this closest of all relationships. "Because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father." The two words come together in Mark xiv. 36 and in Rom. viii. 15. Rom. viii. is the chapter of sonship (for structure that reveals this see Just and the Justifier) and "the Spirit" of which that chapter speaks is in the main "the sonship spirit"—a precious truth, a priceless privilege, often beclouded by confusing it with the gift of the Spirit at Pentecost and after. The structure shows that the Apostle clinches his argument in its two developments with "IF".

> "If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs acco4rding to the promise" (Gal. iii. 29).

This establishes the superiority of "promise" above "law".

Now, having looked at the condition of "bondage" that is associated with "law", and the condition of "sonship" associated with "promise", Paul for the second time uses the "IF" of argument.

> "Wherefore thou art no more servant, but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ" (Gal. iv. 7).

No.70. (28) GALATIANS.
Galatians iv. 8 - 12-.
The inexplicable return to "weak and beggarly elements".
pp. 197 - 200

We now come to the closing appeal of the great argument that occupies Gal. ii. 15 - iv. 12. The Apostle started his argument by appealing to Peter to consider what he was really doing when he attempted "to build again the things destroyed", clinching the argument with an appeal, "I am dead to the law".

Now having shown the place that the promise has above the law, the superiority of sonship above serfdom, the passing of the pedagogue and the coming in of the fullness of Christ, the Apostle turns to the Galatians who had been misled by Judaistic enthusiasts and applies to them the same form of argument and appeal that he had used with Peter. The structure demonstrates this, and we give the opening and closing members again so that the evidence shall be before us.

A | ii. 15-20. | a | Phusis. "By nature." Jews.
b | Build again things destroyed. Palin.
c | Personal. "I am dead to the Law."

* * * * * * *

A | iv. 8-12. | a | Phusis. "By nature" gods.
b | Turn again to elements. Palin.
c | Personal. "Be as I am."

"We who are Jews by nature", said Paul to Peter. "Ye did service unto them which by nature no gods", said Paul to the Galatians. "If I build again the things which I destroyed, I make myself a transgressor", said Paul to Peter. "How turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements", said Paul to Galatians. Then Paul turns from argument to appeal, and said to Peter:

"I am dead . . . . . I am crucified with Christ"—so he turns from argument with the Galatians and appeals to them, "Brethren, I beseech you, be as I am; for I am as ye are".

The Apostle is not questioning the real existence of the gods of the heathen. That question does not arise, for however far the Galatians had slipped into ritualism, they had not given up their faith in the true God. Among the heathen there were "gods many and lords many" (I Cor. viii. 5), but, says the Apostle, you once served those who though no gods at all, were ignorantly considered to be so, yet now, even though you have come to a saving knowledge of the gospel, you have gone back in principle to the self same elements that held you in bondage before your salvation. "How turn ye again . . . . . ye desire again." The Apostle uses the word palin "again" twice, and in the second instance he follows it with the added word anothen "anew".

The weak and beggarly elements to which the Galatians were turning were such observances as circumcision, holydays and the like, and at first it may sound strange if not untrue to say that these Galatians were returning to the service of pagan gods. The Apostle, of course, was not accusing them of a lapse into idolatry; what he would make them see by this rather severe method of argument was that by stepping down from the high and blessed position into which free grace had placed them to the "elements" of the law, with its ceremonies, its rites, its days and observances, they were going back at least to "elements" even though they were not returning to idolatry. The Apostle who venerated the law, and declared that the commandment was holy, just and good (Rom. vii. 12) nevertheless does not hesitate to speak of this law as comprised of "weak and beggarly elements" and places it on a parallel with the elements of paganism when such a misuse of the law is permitted so that it becomes either a competitor with, or a perfecter of the Gospel of grace.

The same charge of being "weak" is made against the law in Rom. viii. 3, but the Apostle is careful to say "weak through the flesh". So here, there is no charge laid against the law as such, but against its misuse, for he has already declared, that "if righteousness come by the law, then Christ died gratuitously" (Gal. ii. 21). The Apostle calls the elements of the law "beggarly", a word already used in its literal sense (Gal. ii. 10), and translated "beggar" in Luke xvi. 20 and 22, and it was so when contrasted with the riches of grace offered so freely in the gospel. Elements, whether Mosaic or pagan, were weak and beggarly when compared with grace, and for any believer who has been set at liberty to prefer "the yoke of bondage", or who has been honoured with "sonship" to go back to the status of a "slave", who has been relieved of the supervision of "tutors and governors" to seek the re-imposition of observances and ceremonials, seemed to the Apostle inexplicable.

He does not merely say "ye desire again" but "ye desire again afresh" palin anothen. Palin by itself ordinarily means "again" (Gal. i. 9, 17; ii. 1, 18; iv. 9, 19; v. 1 and 3), the addition therefore of the word anothen must be intentional and demands translation.

Anothen. This adverb is related both to place and to time. When it refers to place, it is translated "the top" (Matt. xxvii. 51) when it refers to time it is translated "from the beginning" (Acts xxvi. 5). When combined, as in Gal. iv. 9 with palin, it looks back to the position which was occupied before, and contemplates reoccupying it afresh. This but enforces the idea that to go back to legalism was all one and the same as to go back to paganism; it was but the exchange of one system of bondage for another.

In order that the Galatians should have no misunderstanding as to what the Apostle referred to, he proceeds to enumerate these stoicheia or "elements".

> "Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years" (Gal. iv. 10).

The Apostle was no arbitrary martinet; he endeavoured to act in grace, and in Rom. xiv., warns the strong believer against an uncharitable attitude towards a weaker brother who "esteemed one day above another" (Rom. xiv. 5). This Galatian movement however was in an entirely different category; it was so serious that if persisted in "Christ would profit them nothing". In another epistle the Apostle was obliged to speak strongly concerning the "elements" and concerning the observance of days:

> "Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments (stoicheia) of the world, and not after Christ" (Col. ii. 8).
>
> "Wherefore if ye be dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why, as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances" (Col. ii. 20).
>
> "Blotting out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to His cross; and having spoiled principalities and powers, He made a shew of them openly, triumphing over them in it. Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holyday, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days: which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ" (Col. iii. 14-17).
>
> "I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain" (Gal. iv. 11).

It is untrue to think of the Apostle as being "afraid OF" these Galatians; no servant of Christ was more bold in service; Ellicott renders the passage "I am apprehensive of you", or as we might say today "I am fearful FOR you". The words that follow "lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain", must be regarded as the explanation of the Apostle's "fear".

To spend himself was Paul's practice and desire, but to spend himself for nought was a sacrifice that did not commend itself to him. Earlier in this epistle he revealed how he blended the utmost caution with the utmost boldness "Lest by any means" he said "I should run, or had run, in vain" (Gal. ii. 2). The same economy is expressed in the epistle to the Philippians, when he said: "Holding forth the word of life; that I may rejoice in the day of Christ, that I have not run in vain, nor laboured in vain" (Phil. ii. 16). Yet this extreme caution is immediately followed by exceedingly generosity, for he continues "Yea, and if I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy, and rejoice with you all" (Phil. ii. 17).

So again, writing to the Thessalonians, the Apostle expressed his satisfaction that his entrance in unto them "was not in vain" (I Thess. ii. 1); and later, having heard of the trials through which the Thessalonians were passing, he wrote "For this cause, when I could no longer forbear, I sent to know your faith, lest by some means the tempter have tempted you, and our labour be in vain" (I Thess. iii. 5). There is no hard and fast rule for guidance in this matter, indeed it is a continual call for watchfulness, yet speaking for ourselves, hardly a week passes but what we willingly spend several hours endeavouring to help one correspondent, while at the very same time, we refuse to spend more than a few minutes on another. If we were asked to explain the grounds of such discrimination, we may be at a loss, but we can only say that unconsciously we have been putting into practice the lesson which is before us; we refuse, willingly to labour "in vain", while rejoicing to be used to the utmost where sacrifice is rightly demanded.

The Apostle now brings this long section to a close by a personal appeal:

> "Brethren, I beseech you, be as I am; for I am as ye are" (Gal. iv. 12).

Commentators both ancient and modern fall into two groups in their explanation of this appeal:

1. One group, taking the language of I Kings. xxii. 4 as a proverbial utterance say that Paul says "Let us be friends".

2. The other group consider that the Apostle alludes to the fact that he, a Hebrew and a Pharisee had already become like a Gentile so far as the law was concerned, and that he appeals to the Galatian believers to take their stand with him. Moffatt's rendering of Gal. iv. 12 is very free, but it gives a pointer "Do take my line brothers, I beg of you—just as I once took yours".

Ellicott sees in this a "dissuasive from Judaism urged on the ground of his own dereliction of it"; compare I Cor. ix. 20, 21. The structure, as always, decided for us that the sentiment of Gal. iv. 12 corresponds with that of Gal. ii. 19. It is not an appeal for their friendship, it is a parallel with the appeal made to Peter, calling attention to the Apostle's attitude to the law, and in effect saying "If I, a Hebrew, should have seen it essential to my salvation to die to the law that I might live unto God, how utterly inexplicable must your conduct be, being by race Gentiles, to turn back to that system after having been made Christ's free men".

With this appeal we bring this most vivid and vital section of Galatians to a conclusion. There is much more close reasoning and earnest appeal to be considered, but before we can proceed further, a survey of the next great section is called for. This we hope to give in our next article.

No.71. (29) GALATIANS.
Galatians iv. -12 - 20.
The travail of an apostle.
pp. 234 - 237

We have now given consideration to the first great central member of Galatians, namely Gal. ii. 15 - iv. 12, which can be summed up under the heading "The Cross v. The Law", and divided under the sub-headings Faith v. Works and Liberty v. Bondage. We now turn our attention to the corresponding great member, Gal. iv. 12 - vi. 10, which may be summed up under the headings "The Cross v. The Flesh", and subdivided under the sub-headings Spirit v. Flesh and Liberty v. Bondage. This great section must naturally be broken up into smaller portions if we are to study it intelligently, and so we concentrate our attention at the moment on Gal. iv. 12-20, which is in the nature of a personal appeal to the Galatians, referring to their past love and their present zeal and the evil influence of their Judaistic teachers.

The structure emphasizes the great difference which the Apostle observed between the reception with the Galatians had given him on a former visit, even though circumstances were adverse, and the present coldness of their attitude toward him under the influence of their false teachers. Let us see this before proceeding to a more detailed analysis.

Galatians iv. 12 - 20

A | 12. Ye have not injured me.
B | 13. Infirmity of the flesh. At the first.
C | 14-15. | a | My temptation.
b | Not reject, but received.
Early b | As angel, as Christ Jesus.
affection a | Your eyes.
A | 16. Am I become your enemy?
C | 17, 18. | a | They zealously affect you.
b | But not well.
b | They would exclude you.
a | That ye might affect them.
Present a | It is good.
affecting b | To be zealously affected always.
a | In a good thing.
b | Not only when I am present.
B | 19, 20. I travail in birth again.

"Ye have not injured me at all" (Gal. iv. 12).

A great deal of discussion has arisen as to the intention of the Apostle in these words. Calvin and many more recent writers take the view that "this is intended to remove the suspicion which might have rendered his former reproofs more disagreeable . . . . . So far as respects myself, I have no cause to complain of you".

Ellicott says that the meaning is "Ye did not injure me formerly, do not injure me now by refusing . . . . ." Others have suggested that Paul meant "ye have not injured me, but Christ". To these suggestions there are objections, both grammatical and contextual. It is proverbial that there are none so difficult to conciliate as those who have done an injury, consequently the Apostle assures them that rather than feeling that they had injured him at all, he entertained the warmest recollection of the way they had received him, even when the circumstances were adverse. So, he continued, never think that because I tell you the truth, and that truth be somewhat unpleasant, that I can possibly be or become your enemy. We may get a little light on his intention by observing the way he uses adikeo "to injure" elsewhere. In Acts xxv. 10, 11, he said "To the Jews have I done no wrong . . . . . if there be none of these things whereof these accuse me, no man may deliver me unto them". Paul was not charged with immoral conduct, with bribery, corruption or theft, he was charged with antagonism to "the law of the Jews, the temple and Caesar" (Acts xxv. 8).

Again in II Cor. vii., he uses the expression, "Receive us; we have wronged no man" and proceeds to use such expressions as "I speak not to condemn you, for I have said before, that ye are in our hearts to die and live with you". He confessed he had "made them sorry with a letter" (II Cor. vii. 2-8) yet, as he afterward explained, his object in thus writing, was "not for his cause that had done the wrong, nor for his cause that suffered wrong, but that our care for you in the sight of God might appear unto you" (II Cor. vii. 12).

So the Galatians were to remember that Paul did not allow personal grievances to interpose between himself and his duty. He still loved these erring Galatians; loved them so much that he uses the strange figure of going through the pains of child-birth on their account the second time.

"Ye have not injured me at all" but, he says, you know, on the contrary, how you received me when I first preached the gospel to you. What does he mean by "through infirmity of the flesh I preached the gospel unto you"?

Dia "through" followed by the accusative, as it is here, usually denotes "the ground or motive of an action". It is possible that the rarer meaning "throughout a period of infirmity" may be intended, and it is difficult for anyone at the present time to decide, simply because facts known to the Galatians are unknown to ourselves. The straightforward translation of the passage yields the idea that at the time Paul was suffering some physical infirmity. He had, in such unprepossessing conditions, not only preached the gospel acceptably, but in spite of the trial such a condition imposed upon them and himself, instead of "despising" and "rejecting" him as they might have done, they had on the contrary received him as an angel of God, even as Christ Jesus.

The word translated "reject" is ekptuo, literally "to spit out", suggesting that the sickness which had fallen on Paul, rendered him somewhat loathsome or objectionable. He speaks of this infirmity as "my temptation", which is altered in the R.V. and reads "and that which was a temptation to you". The word "temptation" means a "trial", and while this bodily infirmity of Paul would have been a great trial to himself, it was in fact a greater means of "trial" to the Galatians, and they had been proved worthy by it, for they had not only received the Apostle "as an angel", weak and despicable as he then was, but had manifested such love and esteem for him that had it been possible, they would have plucked out their own eyes and have given them to him.

There are those who point to various proverbs which speak of "giving the very heart out of one" for another, but there are one or two reasons for believing that Paul refers to a definite affliction of his own eyes, rather than to making a proverbial reference here. In the first case, if this be a proverb, it is rather an extravagant one, and not in line with the usual practice of the Apostle, and secondly, it is not reasonable to use an extravagant proverb, and yet to limit its application by the matter of "possibility"—yet to limit its application by the matter of "possibility"—yet he says "if it had been possible". Then, had this utterance been a proverb it would probably have read "You would have been ready to have given your eyes to serve me", but here, Paul uses the word "to root out" and "give unto me". There can be little doubt but that he suffered some form of ophthalmia, a disease very prevalent in the East in his day, and induced in him by the vision he had received on the road to Damascus. With such a disease, he would be always very conscious of the pitiable spectacle he presented, and remembered the more with warmest feelings the attitude of the Galatians at such a time. Indeed said he "you felicitated yourselves" (Gal. iv. 15) on having such a teacher in your midst, and now, am I to understand that, seeing you on the brink of spiritual sin, I tell you plainly the truth concerning your violent lapse from grace, that I must therefore be your enemy?

The Apostle now turns from the deceived to the deceivers. Already in chapter i. we became aware of the presence of a pernicious influence at work among the Galatians.

> "There are some that trouble you, and would pervert the gospel of Christ" (Gal. i. 7).

Was it the association of ideas that made him speak immediately after this about "an angel from heaven"? (see the sequence in Gal. iv. 14-17). Again, in chapter v., reference is made to those which "trouble" the Galatians (Gal. v. 10, 12).

Ellicott and Alford translate the word rendered "zealously affect" as "they are paying court" but there does not seem any evidence that the false teachers were paying court to the Galatians. The word zeloo means to be zealous, then to covet or envy. So in I Cor. xii. 31 "covet earnestly". These false teachers being moved with envy, had attempted to exclude the Apostle from contact with the Galatians.

> "So then, I am become your enemy, forsooth, because I tell you the truth! They who persuade you to this effect, desire to gain you over to themselves, not by fair and honourable means, but by artful misrepresentation. They would shut you out from—whom? or from what? from whom, doubtless, but from their spiritual pastor and guide—the man who, of all others, stood directly in the way of their designs, and in order to damage him in their estimations they descended to those base and unworthy devices."

After this conciliatory and personal note, Paul returns to the serious matter that called this epistle into being.

> "My little children, of whom I travail in birth again until Christ be formed in you, I desire to be present with you now, and to change my voice: for I stand in doubt of you" (Gal. iv. 19, 20).

Then follows the "allegorizing" of the story of Hagar, Ishmael, Sarah and Isaac in a further attempt to demonstrate the "foolishness" of the backward movement of these beloved Galatians, but this must occupy our attention in the next article.

"Go ye and learn what that meaneth"
(Matt. ix. 13)

(A series of studies on the importance of, and the comprehension of, "meaning")

No.7. Revelation.
pp. 38 - 40

In our study of the laws that govern the approach to "meaning" we have confined ourselves to the natural processes with which all men are endowed, but which, by reason of sin and death, are defective, and by reason of the spiritual character of the Scriptures are inadequate. The three natural steps, (1) Senses, (2) Memory, (3) Reason, now give place to three parallel steps, (1) Revelation, (2) Translation, (3) Interpretation, when dealing with the meaning of the Inspired Word. The slow and at times painful process of "trial and error" that must of necessity characterize the employment of the senses, gives place in the Spiritual realm to the inspired and positive statements of Revealed truth.

The infant, through his senses, can eventually find out something both of himself and of the world about him, but who by searching can find out God unto perfection? Instead therefore of spending our days slowly accumulating evidences, for the existence of God, for the nature of man, for the character of sin, or of righteousness, for the nature of the soul, for the purposes of the ages, for the nature of the Person and Work of Christ, we acknowledge that these are subjects of revelation, and that they yield their meaning and message to faith.

Let us seek to understand some of the implications of this terms Revelation. We can reduce the subject to five heads.

(1) Revelation implies a Revealer, someone able to undertake and accomplish the task.
(2) Revelation implies that there is something hidden, that will not perceived unless revealed, something beyond the attainment of human research or experiment.
(3) Revelation suggests, moreover, that Some One is desirous of making Himself, His Purpose, His Truth known, and has taken infinite care in the process.
(4) Revelation moreover is impossible unless there be one who can perceive and appreciate the subject revealed. Man the receiver must be, either by creation or regeneration adequately equipped to receive a revelation.
(5) Revelation necessitates the employment of a fitting medium. Creation itself, the Story associated with the Stars, the law of God engraven on the conscience, and finally, the Revelation effected by the Word, first of all by the Scriptures the Written Word, and secondly by Christ Himself the Living Word.

Let us use this outline as a guide, and first, let us consider:

(1) THE REVEALER.

In the wisdom of God, Nebuchadnezzar not only demanded of his wise men the interpretation of the dram that troubled him, but a revelation of the dream itself, and this illustrates the utter failure of the wisdom of this world to reveal the truth of God. If human wisdom had been capable, then "the magicians, and the astrologers, and the sorcerers and the Chaldees" (Dan. ii. 2), "the wise men, the soothsayers" (Dan. ii. 27; v. 7), "the star gazers and the monthly prognosticators" (Isa. xlvii. 13) should have been sufficient. But all was in vain. It is the testimony of Daniel that "there is a God in heaven that revealeth secrets" (Dan. ii. 28).

In the A.V. we read:

> "The secret things belong unto the Lord our God; but those things which are revealed belong unto us and to our children for ever" (Deut. xxix. 29).

While this makes good sense, this translation does not express the meaning of the original. Rotherham has the following footnote here:

> "A very ancient official document . . . . . has dots (denoting spuriousness) upon the words Yahweh our God. 'When these are cancelled', says Dr. Ginsburg, 'we obtain the sense—"The secret things and the revealed things belong to us and to our children for ever if we do all the words of the Law".' That is, the secret things, or the doctrines which have not as yet been revealed (comp. Deut. xxxi. 11-14), belong to us and our children, or will be disclosed to us. It is remarkable that Rashi already expresses the opinion that the words L'YHWH ELOHENU, To the Lord our God, ought to have been pointed, but reverence for the Divine name prevented its being done" (G. Intro., p. 318, 321, 330).

Readers of the Companion Bible will find fuller explanation in Appendix 31.

Throughout the Bible, it is God that speaks, it is His Word that is recorded, and it is unnecessary just here to occupy space and time attempting to "prove" that which is the accepted basis of all our teaching. God is the Revealer, and the Scriptures are the record of that revelation. We pass therefore to the essential meaning of revelation and what the term implies.

(2) REVELATION.

What is Revelation? What does it imply? First let us acquaint ourselves with the Hebrew word employed. It is galah, and to the uninitiated it is rather bewildering to discover that the same word, in the same construction of the verb, means "to reveal" and "to carry away captive". This phenomenon usually indicates that there is a common root lying behind these two concepts which, once seen, makes all clear. The primary meaning of galah is "to uncover, especially to uncover and expose nakedness" (Lev. xx. 11-21). When a people are deported and carried into captivity the land that is left is conceived of as being "naked" or "uncovered". The act of revealing anything is expressed in opening the ear (Job xxxiii. 16; I Sam. xx. 12; II Sam. vii. 27 margin) or opening the eye (Job xxxvi. 15; Numb. xxiv. 4) where in each case the true reading is "to uncover the ear, or the eye". Gesenius says galah means "to be naked . . . . . especially used of the ear by taking away the hair; of the face by taking away a veil".

This brings us to the Greek words apokalupto to reveal, and apokalupsis revelation. The Greek word kalupto means the opposite of the Hebrew galah "to uncover", it means "to cover" or "to veil" kalumma meaning a veil (II Cor. iii. 13). Apo, meaning "away from", makes apokalupsis therefore an "unveiling". The English words veil, and reveal, both come from the Latin velum, a covering or a veil—so that "revelation" in our own tongue means exactly the same as the Hebrew galah and the Greek apokalupsis. Secret or hidden things are the subjects of "revelation". God is spoken of as "He that revealeth secrets" (Dan. ii. 29), and a "secret" sathar is something that is hid (Exod. iii. 6; Deut. xxix. 29; Gen. iv. 14). The unveiling of hidden secrets is the object of revelation, and cannot be attained by unaided human reason.

(3) THE REVEALER. The personal element in the conception of revelation.

The subject of revelation deals with the most wonderful of all subjects, the purpose of the ages, the problem of sin and its remedy, the manifestation of the nature of God and of man, and the revelation of grace in the person and work of the Redeemer. All this is personal to a degree. Man does not put up the request for revelation, God initiates the unveiling. Man would never have dreamed of the existence of the hidden secrets that form the core of Divine truth. God had a desire unto the work of His hands, He sought fellowship with His creatures, He crossed the barrier that divides the absolute from the conditioned, the invisible from the manifest. It is God Who reveals, and gives that revelation to man.

(4) THE RECEIVER.

The fact of a revelation, written or spoken in human language, using figures and ideas that are intelligible to man, not only presupposes a Personal Revealer, but demands some affinity on the part of the receiver. Just as it is impossible for one human being to conduct an argument until some common ground is reached where both persons concerned are in agreement, so it is impossible for God to communicate His Revelation unless the ones to whom such a revelation is directed have some common ground with the One Who made the revelation. God is Creator, man a creature, and a great gulf divides the two; but God created man in His image and likeness, and by so doing made it possible that the thoughts of God could be communicated to the lowly yet honoured work of His hands.

(5) THE MEDIUM.

As the ages unroll, and the need for a revelation of God's purpose became insistent, so the means used changed until it was concentrated in "The Word".

To the translation and interpretation of the Scriptures therefore we next turn our attention as we seek to attain to their meaning.

No.8. Translation.
pp. 71, 72

In the course of our pursuit for "sense" and "meaning" we come to the great fact that God has made a revelation of His Will and Purpose; that this revelation constitutes the Holy Scriptures, and that these Scriptures were written in Hebrew, Chaldee and Greek. Now if these languages were our mother tongue, or if we were as familiar with them as we are with English, the next step in our advance towards meaning, would be denominated "Interpretation". But few if any of the readers of the Berean Expositor, are so familiar with these ancient languages as to be independent of the office of a translator. Those who are thus privileged are in need of no word here from us on the subject, and those who are not cannot be turned into translators by the perusal of an article. What then can we do? The teaching of grammar and the necessary practice in translation is quite outside the scope of this journal, we can only look at the translator at work, consider principles that guide him and come to whatever conclusions sound thinking and prayer may lead us.

The word "translation" does not occur in the Scriptures in the sense in which we use it in this article, but in the primary sense of transferring someone or something from one place to another (Col. i. 13; Heb. xi. 5). Metatithemi which is the word rendered "translate" in Heb. xi. 5 is used of carrying out the body of Jacob from Egypt to Sychem (Acts vii. 16), for the removing of the believer from the faith (Gal. i. 6) and for the change of priesthood consequent upon the death and resurrection of Christ (Heb. vii. 12). Metathesis "translation" in Heb. xi. 5 is rendered "change" in vii. 12 and "removing" in xii. 27. Methistano which is employed in Col. i. 13 is translated elsewhere "put out", "remove" and "turn away" (Luke xvi. 4; Acts xiii. 22; xix. 26; I Cor. xiii. 2).

While the word "translate" occurs but once in the O.T. of the A.V. namely in II Sam. iii. 10 "to translate the kingdom from the house of Saul", the Hebrew word thus rendered is in constant use. It is the Hebrew abar "to cross over" as of the crossing of Jordan. In II Samuel itself where the word abar occurs about forty-seven times, and in every passage except iii. 10, physical transference over or across is intended, as for example: "and there went over a ferry boat to carry over the king's household" (II Sam. xix. 18).

It may be said that goods transferred by ferry boat from one side of a stream to another remain unchanged, but if we widen the breach and transfer goods from the shores of England to the shores of France, while the material remains the same, conformity to the new conditions, new customs, new dues, new prices, new climatic effects, must be taken into account. This crude illustration brings us to the first great controversy regarding the translation of the Scriptures or of any other book from one language to another.

> "With a slavish literality delicate shades of meaning cannot be reproduced, nor allowance be made for the influence of interwoven thought, or of the writer's ever shifting—not to say changing—point of view. An utterly ignorant or utterly lazy man, if > possessed of a little ingenuity, can with the help of a dictionary and grammar give a word-for word rendering, whether intelligible or not, and print 'Translation' on his title page. On the other hand it is a melancholy spectacle to see men of high ability and undoubted scholarship, toil and struggle at translation under a needless restriction to literality, as in intellectual handcuffs and fetters, when they might with advantage snap the bonds and fling them away, as Dr. Welldon has done" (Dr. Weymouth, Preface to First Edition).

Dr. Weymouth refers to the R.V. and better still to Darby's New Translation, saying that if the reader is bent upon getting a literal rendering, he will find it in these versions, but should be on his guard against their strong tendency of mislead because of the idioms that are found in the Greek of the N.T., Greek that is interpenetrated with Hebraisms, which "a literal rendering into English cannot but partially veil, and in some degree distort the true sense". Moffatt quotes from De Qunicey's essay on "Protestantism", on the popular delusion that "every idea and word which exists, or has interchangeable equivalent in all languages". "Thus", continues Moffatt, "there is no exact English equivalent for terms like logos and musterion and dikaiosune".

On the other hand, J. N. Darby says, in connection with this same subject:

> "My endeavour has been to present to the merely English reader the original as closely as possible. Those who make a version for public use must of course adapt their course to the public. Such has not been my object or thought, but to give the student of Scripture, who cannot read the original, as close a translation as possible."

Speaking of the A.V., Darby says:

> "There is one principle which the translators avow themselves, which is a very great and perilous mistake. Where a word occurs in Greek several times in the same passage or even sentence, they render it, as far as they possibly can, by different words in English. In some cases the effect is very serious; in all the connection is lost. Thus in John 5 we have 'judgment' committed to the Son; shall not come into 'condemnation'; the resurrection of 'damnation'. The word is the same in Greek, and every one can see that 'not coming into judgment' is a very different thing from 'not coming into condemnation'. The whole force of the passage depends on this word, and its contrast with life."

The reader, though he know not a single word of either Hebrew or Greek, and has never attempted to translate a single sentence from one language to another, will be conscious that translation and interpretation are not so severely separated as not to mingle and influence one another. As we are not able to help the reader to become a translator, and as the ability to appraise any particular translation depends upon a combination of qualities and attainments that may be possessed but which cannot be given, we will pass from this specialized feature of translation, to the more general work of interpretation, in which all gifts and talents may be employed whether by scholars or common folk, whether they labour in ancient languages or merely use their own mother tongue.

No.9. Interpretation.
pp. 116 - 118

In our quest for "meaning" and "sense" we have arrived at the last phase "Interpretation". We might do worse than commence this study with a quotation from Crabb's English Synonyms:

> "To explain, is generic, the rest are specific: to expound and interpret are each modes of explaining. Single words or sentences or symbolic sign is interpreted. It is the business of the philologist to explain the meaning of the words by a suitable definition; it is the business of the divine to expound Scripture; it is the business of the antiquarian to interpret the meaning of old inscriptions on stones or of hieroglyphics on buildings. An explanation serves to assist the understanding, to supply a deficiency, and remove obscurity; an exposition is an ample explanation, in which minute particulars are detailed and the connection of events in the narrative is kept up . . . . . to explain is simply to render intelligible; to illustrate and elucidate are to give additional cleverness . . . . . we explain by reducing compounds to simples, and generals to particulars; we illustrate by means of examples, similes and allegorical figures; we elucidate by commentaries, and the statement of facts. Words are the common subject of explanation; moral truths require illustration; poetical allusions and dark passages in writers require elucidation."

INTERPRETATION. Interpretation is the act of explaining that which is otherwise unintelligible, not understood, or not obvious.

> "Do not interpretations belong to God?" (Gen. xl. 8).

Interpretation unfolds the intent, meaning or reason of any sign or event:

> "Pharaoh told them his dream; but there was none that could interpret them unto Pharaoh" (Gen. xli. 8).

Interpretation covers two allied processes: 1. Exegesis. 2. Hermeneutics.

> "The Science which discloses to us the tenets of Holy Writ we call Biblical Exegesis or Interpretation. Biblical Archaeology and Biblical Introduction are the proper instruments for the accomplishment of that object, which we call the Historical Interpretation of the Scriptures; the true and perfect Biblical interpretation is thus comprised in the category of GRAMMATICO-HISTORICAL EXEGESIS" (Kitto).
>
> "Hermeneutics and Exegetics are closely akin, but not identical. The former lays down the principles of Biblical interpretation; the latter deals with the practical application of the principles thus laid down. In other words, Hermeneutics is a science, Exegetics is an art" (Lloyd).

If Hermeneutics is the science, and exegesis the art of explanation, our course is clear. We must start with Hermeneutics. Now it may be that to many this word will itself need explanation, so let us devote the remainder of our space to the explanation and interpretation of Hermeneutics.

The word is evidently of foreign origin, and the first thing we must do is to "translate" the term. Hermes is the name in Greek Mythology which was given to the son of Zeus, the messenger of the gods; and so the god of science, commerce, eloquence, and many of the arts of life, is called "Mercury" by the Romans, or "Hermes" by the Greeks. The reader may feel a certain reluctance in using the name of a false god in connection with so sacred a task as the interpretation of Holy Writ, and so the next step must be to enable the reader to see that no such reluctance is manifested by the writers of the Scripture.

Hermes and Mercury. The idolatrous people of Lystra when they saw the miracle and heard the Apostle speak, said:

> "The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men. And they called Barnabas, Jupiter; and Paul, Mercurius, because he was the chief speaker" (Acts xiv. 11, 12).

Here, the idolaters indicated some reason for their choice, Mercury, or Hermes as the word is in the Greek of the N.T., being associated with speech. Hermes had become a proper name among the Greek, as Rom. xvi. 14 will show, while among those who turned away from the Apostle at the end was one named Hermogenes.

The verbs hermeneuo, diermeneuo, and methermeneuo are found in the N.T. all with the meaning "to interpret". Let us consider the way in which these words are employed by the inspired writers.

Hermeneuo.

> "They said unto Him, Rabbi, (which is to say, being interpreted, Master)" (John i. 38).
> "Thou shalt be called Cephas, which is by interpretation, A stone" (John i. 42).
> "Go, wash in the pool of Siloam (which is by interpretation, Sent)" (John ix. 7).
> "First being by interpretation King of righteousness" (Heb. vii. 2).

Diermeneuo.

> "He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures" (Luke xxiv. 27).
> "A certain disciple called Tabitha, which by interpretation is called Dorcas" (Acts ix. 36).
> "Do all interpret?" "Except he interpret." "Pray that he may interpret."
> "Let one interpret" (I Cor. xii. 30; xiv. 5, 13, 27).

Methermeneuo.

> "Emmanuel, which being interpreted is, God with us" (Matt. i. 23).
> "Which is, being interpreted, Damsel, I say unto thee, arise" (Mark v. 41).
> "Golgotha, which is, being interpreted, The place of a skull" (Mark xv. 22).
> "We have found the Messias, which is being interpreted, the Christ" (John i. 41).
> "Surnamed Barnabas, (which is, being interpreted, The son of consolation)" (Acts iv. 36).
> "Elymas the sorcerer (for so is his name by interpretation)" (Acts xiii. 8).

In addition we have interpretation hermenia (I Cor. xii. 10; xiv. 26); and interpreter diermeneutes (I Cor. xiv. 28).

No.10. What do we mean by "interpret"?
pp. 131 - 135

We have seen the importance of Interpretation in the quest of "meaning" and have considered some phases and aspects of the term. There are, besides the words hermeneuo and its compounds, other Hebrew and Greek words that must be considered before we are ready to go forward with the study of Interpretation.

It is one thing to possess tools, it is another thing to know how to use them. No amount of book learning will make a novice into a craftsman, and no rules that we can give will make a believer into a trustworthy interpreter of God's Word. Yet the craftsman learns certain rules, and the unashamed workman will appreciate help in the great work of handling aright the Word of God.

What do we mean when we use the word "interpret"?

On one or two occasions it has been the writer's privilege to speak to gatherings of the Lord's people in other countries, and to have the assistance of an interpreter. One such person gracefully volunteered to interpret just whatever we chose to say, although he himself did not believe all the things we said. With the best intentions in the world, his mere literal interpretation failed. At another meeting of the same series another enthusiastic believer, who did most heartily endorse our teaching regarding the Mystery, undertook to be the interpreter, but his very zeal and anxiety that his hearers should not miss the point, or that no feature should be withheld, made him not only interpret what was actually said, but anticipate what might have been intended, and supplement by comments of his own, so that the address had to stop while an agreement was come to as to what was the correct role of an interpreter. We must never misinterpret the office of an interpreter as one speaker did, and call it an "interrupter"! There are alas many, who in the guise of translators or interpreters, obscure or distort the plain meaning of Holy Writ, from whose baneful characteristics may the Lord deliver us. While the A.V. is itself a human interpretation, and therefore must never be placed in the position that the inspired originals alone occupy, we shall not go far astray at this point if we collect together the different words found in the original that are translated interpret and interpretation in that Version.

We have in Gen. xl. 22 the first occurrence of the word in the story of Joseph:

> "He hanged the chief baker: as Joseph had interpreted to them."

The word used in this passage occurs fourteen times in Gen. xl. and xli., and is limited to the interpretation of dreams. We are not called upon to interpret dreams today, and consequently need not linger over this phase of the subject.

The next reference, however, is of the utmost importance and has a direct bearing upon our theme:

"To understand a proverb, and the interpretation; the words of the wise and their dark sayings" (Prov. i. 6).

At the first glance, one may think that something is astray in this translation, for how else could anyone understand a proverb, apart from its interpretation? We must put into practice a rule which is to be explained later in this series, namely, the observance of parallels.

To understand a proverb . . . . . and the interpretation.
The words of the wise . . . . . and their dark sayings.

A proverb is obviously the word of the wise, therefore, if the rule of parallels be a sound one, the "interpretation" should have something in common with "dark sayings". This word translated "interpretation" is found in Hab. ii. 6, where it is translated "taunting". The Companion Bible renders it "satire, or the point of what is said". One may translate "the words of the wise", and give the most literal and consistent equivalents that can be conceived, and yet miss the "point", and if this be so, we are giving chaff for wheat. The A.V. finishes the introduction to the book of Proverbs at verse six. It should however include verse seven:

"For putting a distinct meaning into a proverb or an enigma;
Into the words of the wise and their intricate things;
The fear of the Lord is the main knowledge:
A wisdom and a discipline that fools despise" (Prov. i. 6, 7 Miller).

One may have the most fool-proof of systems, but no amount of method will take the place of that initial qualification "the fear of the Lord". There needs to be not only the intelligent use of the concordance but a heart in concord with the will of God when the "point" of the passage is to be discovered and presented.

Another word translated "interpret" is found in Eccles. viii. 1:

"Who is as the wise man? and who knoweth the interpretation of a thing?"

The Hebrew word pesher "interpretation" occurs but once, but the parallel Chaldee p'shar is used in Dan. ii. 14 - vii. 16 thirty-two times, and always in connection with dreams of prophetic import given to Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar or Daniel. The recurring thought of Ecclesiastes is expressed in the question "what shall come to pass hereafter?" and consequently this passages in Eccles viii. 1 deals more with prophetic interpretation than the humbler service contemplated in this series.

When Joseph would hide his identity from his brethren we read:

"He spake unto them by an interpreter" (Gen. xlii. 23).

Here the Hebrew word is luts a foreigner, and is allied with melitsah "taunt" and "point", already considered in Prov. i. 6. Its primitive meaning and most frequent translation is that of a "scorner". The word luts means to speak unintelligibly, in a foreign language, to stammer, hence to mock, and only in a derived and secondary sense does it mean an interpreter.

However strange the transition of thought may be from mocking, stammering, to interpreting, we have here for the first time in the many words used in Scripture, one that does bear upon our present quest. The interpreter, among other things, deals with a foreign language—in the case of the Scriptures, Hebrew and Greek—and he must possess two qualifications:

(1) of apprehending the meaning of the original Scriptures, and
(2) of making that meaning intelligible to others.

This second feature is another item that we shall have to deal with at large later. A word that comes nearer to the sense of interpretation that is intended in this series is found in Ezra iv. 7:

> "And the writing of the letter was written in the Syrian tongue, and interpreted in the Syrian tongue."

There appears to be something strange about this statement, for a letter written in Syrian could not be interpreted in Syrian—there would be no need for such interpretation.

The R.V. reads:

> "Was written in the Syrian character, and set forth in the Syrian tongue."

This gives the true meaning of the passage. For a letter might have been written in the Syrian tongue but in the letters of another language.

> "The Chaldee and Syrian tongue was once all one, as appeareth in Gen. xxxi. 47; Ezra iv. 7; Dan. ii. 4. In character indeed they differed; they of Babylon, using one kind of letter; they, of Syria, another: this was that that nonplussed the Babylonian wizards about the writing of the wall, so that they could not read it, though it were in their own language, because it was not in their own letters" (Lightfoot).

This, however, is by the way. Our chief concern is the word translated "interpret" here, the Hebrew targem. This word is familiar to Bible Students under the form "Targum", for it is used to indicate the Chaldee paraphrase of the O.T. It lives on today in the word "Dragoman", the ordinary guide and interpreter of the East, and who, though he exhibits some faults that the true interpreter must avoid, ideally is a good picture of the Scriptural interpreter. We learn from the scrupulous care of the enemies of the Jews a lesson that every interpreter of Holy Writ should have at heart, namely, to consider nothing too trifling that will ensure the plainest possible presentation of the message to be given.

While the mere appearance of the printed page is secondary to the matter (and for the sake of the truth contained therein we have plodded through some very badly printed pages at times), yet a reasonable attention to paragraphs, and the separation of quotations of Scripture from the rest of the writing, are details that should commend themselves to every unashamed workman. One more word from the O.T. and we pass to the New:

> "The telling of the dream, and the interpretation thereof" (Judges vii. 15).

Here the word interpretation is sheber, which means "to break", the word is so translated in Judges vii. 20 "brake their pitchers", and the true interpreter "breaks up" the vehicle in which the revelation of truth is made, so that the meaning shall become as clear as the lamps in the hand of Gideon's men when their pitchers were broken. Word study and grammatical analysis are not to be pursued for their own sake, but for the light contained within the earthen pitchers of human language.

Turning to the N.T. we find that there are two words that are translated "interpret":

> Epilusis. "No prophecy of the scripture is of any private interpretation" (II Pet. i. 20).

This however is not referring strictly to the "interpretation" of the Scripture, but as to how the Scriptures originally came into being. This is manifest by the sentence that follows, prefaced as it is with the explanatory word "for".

> "For prophecy came not in old time by the will of man: but holy men of God spake as they were moved by Holy Ghost" (II Pet. i. 21).

Epilusis should be translated "unfolding". Like its cognate analusis to loose up or analyze, and dialusis to dissipate or dispense, epilusis means to solve, loosen, unbind. This word occurs in Mark iv. 34:

> "But without a parable spake He not unto them: and when they were alone, He expounded (epiluo) all things to His disciples."

Mark tells that the Lord expounded or solved the meaning of the parables, but Matt. xiii. shows us how He did so. The reader should ponder the Lord's explanation of the Sower, and of the Tares, as examples of epilusis.

In the preceding articles of this series we have examined the meaning and usage of the Greek word hermeneuo "to interpret", we can therefore devote the remaining articles of this series to a consideration of the principles of interpretation, so far as they may be of service to the unashamed workman in his endeavour to "preach the Word" and to "make all men see what is the dispensation of the Mystery".

No.11. Various systems of Interpretation Examined.
pp. 148 - 151

Before one has learned by experience the necessity for giving instructions both negatively as well as positively, one is inclined to brush aside anything that does not appear to go straight to the point. A fuller acquaintance with human nature will bring one to realize the value of indicating what not to do as a supplement to the positive instruction. Anticipating the conclusion of this article, we state that the only method of interpretation that commends itself to us is known as the "grammatico-historical" system, but we feel sure the superiority of this method over all others cannot be appreciated unless those other methods are at least known. It will therefore be no waste of time if we consider and compare the various methods that have been adopted, in order that we may more fully appreciate the one which we here advocate.

(1) The Allegorical System.

The men whose names come to mind when the Allegorical system is mentioned, are Philo, a Jew of Alexandria, born about B.C.20, and Origen, a Greek Christian, 185-254A.D. Philo's theory is based upon the idea that the Scripture has a twofold message, the exoteric addressed to the psuchikoi (the natural man, the soulish man) and the esoteric which is addressed to and discerned by the pneumatikoi (the spiritually minded man). One has but to read I Cor. ii. 13, 14, 15 to realize that Philo had a substratum of truth for his exposition of the O.T.; it is however the abuse and misapplication of these features that rendered his interpretations of little value.

As an example, we observe that the four rivers named in Gen. ii. 10-14 which remain rivers and nothing more to the illiterate and unilluminated, become, in the allegorical interpretation, four virtues, namely, prudence, temperance, courage and justice. We must not confuse this allegorical interpretation however with the legitimate use of true type and symbol, for the Scriptures abound with these figures; but we must be on our guard against finding deeper and spiritual significations where none are intended, for sooner or later these will distort both doctrine, prophecy and practice.

(2) The Mystical System.

The mystical system of interpretation seems to have been the result of a revulsion from the cut-and-dried teaching of the Schoolmen. The literal sense of the Scripture, in this system is discarded, and manifold shades and depths of meaning were sought in every word of Scripture. Tyndale has made some trenchant remarks on this system, which are worth repeating:

> "They divide the Scriptures into four senses, the literal, tropological (i.e. figurative), allegorical, and anagogical (i.e. mystical)—the literal sense has become nothing at all . . . . . Twenty doctors expound one text twenty ways, and with an antitheme of half an inch some of them draw a thread of nine days long . . . . . They not only say that the literal sense profiteth nothing, but also that it is hurtful and noisome and killeth the soul. And this they prove by the text of Paul, II Cor. iii 6 'The letter killeth but the spirit giveth life'. Lo! say they, the literal sense killeth, the spiritual sense giveth life."

(3) The Pietistic System.

The great principle that actuates this system is known as the "inner light". A misapplication of I John ii. 20, 27 "But ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things" sets the votary of this system free from the encumbrance of grammar and accepted meanings, and gives reign to the wildest imaginings and contradictory teachings. Like the two systems already renewed, it has a substratum of truth, namely, that without the Spirit of Christ within and the illumination of the Sacred Page by the Lord no amount of scholarship can avail. The early pietists were undoubted men of God, but their system degenerated into fanaticism.

(4) The Accommodation System.

The man whose name is closely associated with the Accommodation System is Semler, the father of the destructive school of criticism. Modernism is its logical result.

There is an accommodation that is right and true. The condescension of the Lord that uses the common language of man, the illustration by means of parable and type, the giving of "milk" to babes, and "meat" to full grown, these are examples of formal accommodation that graciously "speak after the manner of men". The system which is before us is not this kind at all. It supposes that our Lord and His apostles "accommodated" their doctrines to the prejudice and ignorance of the Jews to whom they spoke. Because the Jews believed that a man named Moses wrote the Pentateuch our Lord is supposed to have endorsed the popular error! The system is so derogatory to the Son of God and to the God of the Bible that those who have any love for truth will need no further description of this system, which stands self-condemned.

(5) The Moral System.

"This system owes its origin to the celebrated Immanuel Kant." Kant's philosophy had rejected the objective and maintained that there was no certainty in anything but practical reason. This led to extracting from the Scriptures only such ideas as conformed to the principles of practical morality that were implanted in the human breast, and rejecting all else. The only value and purpose of the Bible was to teach and confirm the religion of reason. Kant wrote:

> "The historical part of the Scriptures, which contributes nothing to make men better, is purely indifferent, and may be disposed of as we please."
>
> "We do not assert that the sense given by us to the holy books was intended by the authors, but . . . . . assume only the possibility of the authors so intending."

The reader will, we trust, have no room for a system that disregards the "sense intended", and in its place "assumes only the possibility" of such intention!

(6) The Naturalistic System.

This system is the one associated with Paulus, a German Theologian of 1828A.D., of which the following specimens will be sufficient. His exposition of John vi. 19 is:

> "When they had rowed about five and twenty or thirty stadia they see Jesus walking about over the sea (on the bank or shore, which is higher than the sea) and near the ship (which kept near the shore)."

The explanation offered for the feeding of the 5,000 is that the disciples began to share out the bread and fish, and so following their example the whole multitude shared round what they had and all were satisfied! We need give no further notice of this system.

Closely allied with the naturalistic system is the Rationalist mode of interpretation, which does not seek from the Scriptures its teaching but receives only that which squares with some previously accepted philosophy. "An external standard is set up to which Scripture must bend" (Davidson).

This description also applies to that system that selects its specimen texts and quietly says nothing about others that may not support the special view advocated. In other words "usage" is ignored".

(7) The Mythical System.

This system proceeds on the assumption that the histories and biographies of Scriptures are not necessarily actual occurrences, but myths. In the Life of Jesus by Strauss and by Weisse, 1838A.D., the mythical system is given full scope. The genealogies of Christ given in Matthew and Luke merely indicate that there is a connection between Judaism and the new message of salvation. Joseph is neither the real father nor the step father of the Saviour, he symbolizes the relation of Judaism and Christianity. The historic sense is entirely lost. In the words of Strauss, either "the divine cannot have taken place in such a way, or that which has so taken place cannot have been divine". The apostle Paul speaks of the teachers of the last days who:

> "shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned into fables (myths)" (II Tim. iv. 4).

(8) The Apologetic and Dogmatic System.

The objection to this system is that instead of approaching the Scriptures to discover what they teach, it approaches Scripture to discover proofs for doctrine already formulated and held. It is no justification of this system that many of the doctrines thus supported turn out to be Scriptural; the doctrine may be right but the procedure is wrong. We are not to ransack the Bible to find proof texts, but to humbly and earnestly give heed to its own statements of truth and desire them all without reserve and without partiality; Usage again!

(9) The Grammatico-historical System.

"Nearly all the treatises on hermeneutics", says Moses Stuart, "since the days of Ernesti, have laid it down as a maxim which cannot be controverted, that the Bible is to be interpreted in the same manner, that is, by the same principle, as all other books . . . . . these principles are coeval with nature . . . . . the person addressed has always been an interpreter in every instance where he has heard and understood what was addressed to him".

This is the system of interpretation that commends itself to those who seek truth at the fountain head.

No.12. Rule #1. "Rightly Divide the Word of Truth."
pp. 173 - 176

We have looked at the meaning of the word "interpret" in our opening article, and now we turn our attention to those rules found either within the pages of the Word, or recognizes as fundamental and necessary by all interpreters in all spheres of their work. There can be no two thoughts as to what must be the first and fundamental principle, the chief guiding rule for the unashamed workman. The very term "unashamed workman" has been borrowed from II Tim. ii. 15, and in that great text will be found the guiding principle for all right handling of the Word of Truth.

> "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."

The reader of the Berean Expositor will need no introduction to this text. It has been printed on the front page of this magazine throughout the years of its witness, and its application to the subject in hand has become second nature with us. Yet it is remarkable that while quite a number of volumes have been written entitled "Bible Hermeneutics" or similar titles, and canvass the subject from end to end, yet not once can we remember ever seeing II Tim. ii. 15 quoted, let alone commented upon by their authors.

In order that we should give the best to our readers, we have made it a point to consult various standard works. These includes Fairbairn, Davidson, Ernesti, Seiler, Campbell, Sawyer, Pareau, Bosanquet, Child, Terry, Cave and Marsh, together with articles in Encyclopaedias, Introductions and Handbooks, yet the fact remains, not one of these authors have been under any necessity to give "right division" a place in their schemes.

Although practically every reader is familiar with this theme, we must take nothing for granted, and must give it as much attention as though it were something new. We remember that Timothy was the son of a Jewish mother and a Greek father; that he lived in the province of Galatia, and that it is as certain as anything can be, that he read the Septuagint version of the O.T. (For an explanation of the title "Septuagint" and what it entails, the reader is directed to Volume XXII, page 33). Timothy's mother who had taught her son the Holy Scriptures since babyhood (II Tim. i. 5; iii. 15) would most surely have instructed him in the book of Proverbs. Consequently when the Apostle wrote to him his second epistle, and Timothy saw the word which is translated "rightly dividing" in our version, he would have no need to consult a Greek dictionary, it would have been as familiar to Timothy as any word in the vocabulary of his faith. The Greek word is orthotomounta, the present participle of orthotomeo from orthos "straight or right", and temno "to cut", as in the word anatomy. In the Septuagint version of Prov. iii. 6, that is to say in Timothy's Bible, the word is found:

> "In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall rightly divide thy paths."

Even the word used in the A.V. signifies much the same, for if one is called upon to "direct" any one, it is of no service to describe half a circle and say the way is "over there". When one directs the steps of another, it is essential that the district be "rightly divided". This is not necessarily a long process. The simple pointing of the finger, and the words "over there" of necessity set aside all other points of the compass. Right division, as understood by Timothy would simply mean following the direction of the finger post along, the highway. All the redeemed are treading the way of life, but all the redeemed are not to be blessed in the same sphere or in the same company. Consequently there will be a sign post along the road which will point one way to an "earthly" and the other way to an "heavenly" inheritance; for some are to inherit the earth, as is abundantly attested by the Prophets, the Sermon on the Mount and the book of the Revelation. Another sign post bears the names Peter, Apostle of the Circumcision, and Paul, the Apostle of the Uncircumcision, as Gal. ii. 7-9 shows.

Believing Hebrews who endured to the end, looked for a heavenly city, as did Abraham, and were partakers of the heavenly calling (Heb. xi. 16; I Pet. i. 1, 4). This is the heavenly phase of the kingdom, and must not be confused with the higher calling of the Church of the Mystery. This church is blessed in heavenly places, far above all principality, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God, and so is distinct from all other callings.

In Volume XXV, page 77 (???) we have reprinted the opening article of the series "The Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth". We do not feel justified in going over the ground covered by that article except by way of a summary. The following items are touched upon, but it will suffice for the present to set them out in tabulated form.

RIGHT DIVISION
L a w	G r a c e
Old Covenant.	New Covenant.
Gospel of the Kingdom.	Gospel of the glory of Christ.
Presence of miraculous gifts.	Absence of miraculous gifts.
The Second Coming of Messiah to earth.	The appearing in Glory.
Ordinances, ceremonials, shadows.	The Body is of Christ.
The Twelve apostles (Matt. x.; Acts i.).	The Apostles of the Ascended Lord (Eph. iv..)
The Royal Priesthood.	The One Body.
The restored Wife.	The Bride of the Lamb (???).

In every one of these pairs of teaching most important "things that differ" appear, but instead of dealing with them further, let us open the book at II Tim. ii. where our text is found, and observe the many items that await the application of this principle in that chapter itself.

> "The things that thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also" (II Tim. ii. 2).

Here the Apostle "rightly divides" between the truth committed to himself as the prisoner of the Lord, and that committed to the Apostle of the Circumcision. Failure to recognize this distinction lies at the root of much confused teaching today. Timothy was to "rightly divide" among the redeemed, and commit this precious truth to those men only who were "faithful". This however was not sufficient. All faithful men are not "able to teach others" and so a further process of right division must be put into operation.

> "No man that warreth entangleth himself with the affairs of this life" (II Tim. ii. 4).

We must "rightly divide" between the two words translated life namely zoe and bios. Zoe is used mainly of the life principle (John iii. 16) whereas bios deals with the phenomenon of life, the means of living (Mark xii. 44).

> "Remember that Jesus Christ of the seed of David was raised from the dead according to my gospel" (II Tim. ii. 8).

The same Christ had been raised from the dead as an historic fact independently of anybody's gospel. He had been raised from the dead according to Peter's gospel (Acts ii. 30) with a view to David's throne, being somewhat different from the position that Christ held according to the gospel committed to Paul.

> "Therefore I endure all things for the elect's sakes, that they may also obtain salvation which is in Christ Jesus with aionian glory" (II Tim. ii. 10).

This is not salvation pure and simple, but that salvation which is accompanied with "aionian glory". This distinction is the subject of the verses that immediately follow:

> "It is a faithful saying: For if we died with Him, we shall also live with Him (salvation in its simplest form). If we endure, we shall also reign with Him (salvation and aionion glory). If we deny Him, He also will deny us (i.e. of the added glory). If we are faithless, He abideth faithful, He cannot deny Himself (i.e. so far as initial salvation is concerned)" (II Tim. ii. 11-13).
>
> "Of these things put them in remembrance, charging them before the Lord that they strive not about words to no profit, but to the subverting of the hearers" (II Tim. ii. 14).

Here Timothy has to divide between "words to no profit" and "these things" that deal with salvation and glory.

Pursing our investigation beyond verse fifteen we observe that Hymenæus and Philetus did not actually deny the resurrection but misplaced it. They failed to "rightly divide" as to time (II Tim. ii. 17, 18). Then we see that the foundation of God has a seal with two sides, one emphasizing divine grace and the other human responsibility (II Tim. ii. 19). We further learn that there is need to "rightly divide" between the vessels that are found in a great house (II Tim. ii. 21), also we are taught what to "flee" and what to "follow" (II Tim. ii. 22), and to distinguish between "striving" and "meekly instructing" (II Tim. ii. 24, 25).

Here therefore in one chapter is a fairly good series of examples of the necessity of “right division”, and if we had gone beneath the surface and examined the words of the original, the number of example would have greatly increased. What has been brought forward however will suffice. Our first great principle of interpretation and the first great rule for the unashamed workman therefore must be that of “right division”.

HEBREWS

Perfection or Perdition

No.6. The Express Image.
pp. 155 - 158

We have seen that "the brightness of His glory" is illustrated by the Shekinah glory of the Tabernacle, the Presence rendered visible in the pillar of fire, and anticipated in the prophecy of Ezekiel. We now must ponder the words that follow:

> "The express image of His Person "

In Col. i. 15 Christ is said to be "the Image of the invisible God", and it is evident that the word "image" is placed over against the word "invisible" with intention. The A.V. translators apparently intended us to understand that a different word was employed in the original of Heb. i. 3, for there we read not "image" but "express image". The R.V. margin reads "impress". However figurative the usage of such expressions as "express", "impress", "oppress", "depress" and the like may be, the fundamental idea of "pressure" remains, and when we note that the word employed in Heb. i. 3 is the Greek charakter, we realize the reason for the translation given.

The Greek word charakter of course supplies us with the English "character". The idea of "one's character", i.e. one's personal qualities, is a secondary one, the primary meaning being a stamp, mark or sign engraved or stamped, the "mark" of Rev. xiii. 16, according to Wycliffe's translation. The letters of the alphabet are called "characters" as also the handwriting of a person.

> "I found the letter . . . . . You know the character to be your brother's?" (King Lear).

We no longer use the verb "to character" but in Shakespeare's day this was so:

> "O Rosalind! these trees shall be my book
> And in their barks my thoughts I'll character" (As You Like It).

The Greek verb charatto means "to engrave" and is similar in sound to the Hebrew cheret "graving tool" (Exod. xxxii. 4), and charath "to engrave" (Exod. xxxii. 16). Charagma is used by Paul in Acts xvii. 29, when he said "we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device". Classical usage of charakter shows that Plutarch employed it for letters engraved or inscribed on waxed tablets; Sextus Empericus for the impressions or impressed images made by seals; Aristotle for stamping and coining money, literally "putting the impress on it", giving a coin its "image and superscription".

Philo, a learned Jewish philosopher of Alexandria, born a few years before Christ, and who in 40A.D. petitioned the Emperor Caligula, wrote very fully regarding the Logos, who is variously named The Image of God, the Firstborn Son, His Shadow. He says in one place that the Logos is designated "the impressed seal of God". We found that the "brightness of His glory" looked back to the Tabernacle and its Shekinah, and we shall therefore not be surprised to find that the figure of something engraven takes us back also to Old Testament imagery. The apostle refers to the tables of the law as being "written and engraven in stones", while Exod. xxviii. 11 and 36 speaks of the engraving of the stones of the High Priest's ephod, and of his mitre, engraved with the words "Holiness to the Lord".

In Heb. i. 3 Christ is set forth as "The character of His Person". The introduction of the word "Person" here is somewhat of an anachronism, the theological term "person" was not in use until after the first four centuries of the Christian era, after the Arian controversy. The Greek word thus translated is hupostasis, and in none of its occurrences elsewhere can the translation "person" be tolerated. Could we possibly say "Now faith is the person of things hoped for"? (Heb. xi. 1). Could we imagine the apostle saying "If we hold the beginning of our person steadfast unto the end" (Heb. iii. 14)? Yet the same Greek word is so translated.

The English word "substance" is an exact equivalent of the Greek, but is derived from the Latin. Both hupo and sub mean under; histanai and the Latin stare have similar meanings, both being capable of the meaning "to stand". The first meaning of the English word "substance" is not something physically solid as, for example, a brick, and the statement that faith is anything but a "substance" is only true if this lower meaning of the word is intended.

A dictionary gives the undermentioned meanings to the word substance in the following order:

> "Being; something that exists, something real, not imaginary; something solid, not empty; that which underlies all outward manifestation; substratum; that which constitutes anything what it is: nature, real or existing essence; the most important element in any existence; the characteristics of anything; anything that has a material form: body, matter, estate, property. We call a noun a substantive because it designates something that exists, or some object of thought, either material or immaterial."

We have gone to this length of definition because if we merely say that hupostasis means substance, we use a word of varied meanings. What we mean by substance here is "that which underlies all outward manifestations". The hidden unknown characteristics of God are the hupostasis (substance) of which the Son, God manifest in the flesh, is the Express Image. It is well to remember that the Greek of the New Testament is a language used by men who thought in Hebrew, or at least had been trained in the Jewish school. The LXX therefore becomes of great service to us, showing us the Hebrew equivalents for these Greek words. In Psa. cxxxix. 15 (A.V. numbering) we read:

> "My substance was not hid from Thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth."

Verse 13 speaks of the period of birth, but this verse speaks of something far more mysterious. This secret thing, wrought in the lower parts of the earth, the LXX calls "my hupostasis", and this hupostasis is to birth (13) what the Substance of Heb. i. 3 is to the Express Image. While the verse which follows does not contain the same word in the LXX, it is nevertheless an expansion of the meaning of hupostasis.

> "Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being unperfect; and in Thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them."

In the earlier verses of the Psalm there is found this same thought of something hidden and unseen except by God (See verses 2 and 4). Another passage where the word occurs in the LXX, is Psa. xxxix. 5 "Behold, thou hast made my days as an handbreath, and mine age (hupostasis) is as nothing". Here the word "age" is in Hebrew cheled, something that creeps imperceptibly, and so not manifest. "Time slips our notice and unheeded flies". The Syriac version used cheled to translate, "to creep in" in II Tim. iii. 6.

Psa. lxix. 2 gives us an example of the simpler concept of "standing". Our own word "understanding" is a faculty of the mind, a meaning we can very well imagine a would-be expositor ridiculing, who simply used the dissecting knife and limited himself to the etymology "stand" "under". In the New Testament we find hupostasis used in the sense of "confidence", a most natural development of the idea of underlying reality, II Cor. ix. 4; xi. 17; Heb. iii. 14. Heb. xi. 1 reads, "Now faith is the substance of things hoped for", something real, though not seen. The unseen faith of the worthies that occupy Heb. xi. was manifested in their lives.

Their hupostasis had its express image in their lives and conduct. One thing was common to them all. They lived, suffered, and died for something "unseen", or "seen afar off"; they endured as seeing Him Who is invisible. If faith is the substance of things hoped for, we can use either term with good sense. Instead of the words, "By faith Abel . . . . . Noah, Abraham", we can say, By the conviction produced by the substance (the deep hidden reality) of things hoped for, Abel, Noah, Abraham did this or that.

Christ is the charakter of God's hupostasis. No law or set of laws, no fasts, feasts, or sacrifices, no series of typical men could ever be the Express Image; Christ alone is that. It is this thought that permeates the epistle to the Hebrews. It is because of this that the title occurs here. It is essential to its true understanding that we remember that it would not have been employed if the theme of the epistle had not demanded it. Because Christ, and Christ alone, is the Express Image, He is above angels (Heb. i.), above Moses (Heb. iii.), and Joshua (Heb. iv.), above the high priesthood of the order of Aaron (v.-viii.), above all typical sacrifices and offerings (ix.-x.), and above all examples and patterns (xii. 1, 2). None but Christ in every phase of His charakter can express the glorious hupostasis of the invisible God.

No prophet, however closely he walked with God, could ever be "The Express Image of the Divine Substance". This is the prerogative of Him Who is the Image of the invisible God, originally the Form of God and called in John's gospel the Logos. As such He must set aside all types and shadows. They were not "the very image" (Heb. x. 1), even as John i. 17 tells us that the law, with its types was given by Moses, but REAL GRACE, the true antitypical reality, came by Jesus Christ.

Writing to the Corinthians, Paul had spoken of the passing glory that shone in the face of Moses, as contrasted with the abiding glory seen in the face of Jesus Christ, and in the epistle to the Hebrews in which the writer seeks to wean these believers from the "Word of the BEGINNING of Christ" and to lead them on to "Perfection", he brings them, in the opening verses of his exhortation, into the presence of Him in Whom dwells "all the fullness of the Godhead bodily".

The final attribute given to the Son, before His mediatorial work is introduced, is that He upholds all things by the word of His power, and this wondrous theme must occupy our attention in the next article of this series.

No.7. The Word of His Power.

pp. 194 - 197

God has spoken to us "in Son". We reiterate this unique expression that the marvellous truth contained therein may enable us to realize the glory of the One we call Saviour and Lord. He is the appointed Heir of all things; by Him the ages were made. He is the Effulgence of the glory of God; He, the Express Image of His substance.

The glories of the Son are not yet exhausted, for the passage proceeds, "and upholding all things by the word of His power". While the Greek word phero occurs over sixty times in the New Testament, it is only translated "uphold" once. It is rendered "bring" over thirty times, but the primary meaning of the word ("to bear") seems to be the one intended in the passage before us. Outside the epistle to the Hebrews the word occurs but twice in Paul's epistles:

> "Endured with much long-suffering" (Rom. ix. 22).
> "The cloak that I left at Troas . . . . . bring with thee" (II Tim. iv. 13).

The word is used five times in Hebrews:

> "Upholding all things" (Heb. i. 3).
> "Let us go on unto perfection" (vi. 1).
> "There must . . . . . be (brought in, marg.) the death of the testator (or covenant victim)" (ix. 16).
> "They could not endure that which was commanded" (xii. 20).
> "Bearing His reproach" (xiii. 13).

It will be seen that the word is one which has many usages. The primary idea of bearing as a burden, supporting and sustaining, seems to be the meaning in Heb. i.

Moses, when speaking of the responsibility he felt, in Numb. xi. 11, 12 says, "Thou layest the burden of all this people upon me", and that God had said, "carry them in thy bosom". In Hebrews we see "all things" (not merely the burden of one people) upheld by the word of Christ.

When considering the words, "the express image of His substance" we noted a parallel in Col. i. 15-17. We must turn to that passage again:

> "Who is the Image of the invisible God, the Firstborn of every creature: for by Him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by Him, and for Him: and He is before all things, and by Him all things consist."

We note that there are several parallels here with Heb. i. The Image of the invisible God, and the Express Image of His substance; the creation of all things, and the making of the ages; the statement that by Him all things consist, and that by His word all things are upheld; in both passages He is spoken of as the prototokos, the Firstborn. In Colossians the titles are introductory to revealing Christ as the Head of the Body, the church, and the Firstborn from the dead. In Hebrews the titles are introductory to His office as Mediator of the New Covenant, and the Firstborn in the habitable world whereof the apostle speaks in this epistle. The creation in its universal sense is intended in Col. i.; the ages and their burden occupy the thought in Heb. i. The former is held together by the hand that created them, the latter is upheld and carried by the word of His power. Something must be accomplished during the course of the ages, and the word of His power is pledged to bring it to pass. Concerning the Son it is written in Hebrews that He is the upholder of all things, appointed heir of all things, that all things are to be placed in subjection under His feet. It is a comforting as well as a majestic thought to realize that the burden of "all things" pertaining to the purpose of God is resting upon the Son of God. With matchless wisdom, with infinite grace, with mighty power, and with Divine foreknowledge, the whole of God's marvellous plan is brought to its goal by that One Who died, rose again, ascended and is now seated at the right hand of the Majesty on high.

What is the means whereby the Son beareth or upholdeth all things? His hands made the heavens; His feet shall have all things placed beneath them; His body bore our sins. It is His Word, however, that upholds all things.

Rhema (word) differs from logos (word) in that it indicates a spoken word or command, e.g., "by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God". We find rhema in Hebrews as follows:

> "The word of His power" (i. 3).
> "Tasted the good word of God" (vi. 5).
> "The worlds (ages) were framed by the word of God" (xi. 3).
> "The voice of words" (xii. 19).

The Word that framed the ages is the Word that upholds all things, the Word that called them into being will surely prevail over all opposition and bring all to perfection.

It is "the word of His power". He was crucified in weakness, but He liveth by the power of God (II Cor. xiii. 4). He was marked off the Son of God with power, by the resurrection (Rom. i. 4). As the risen One He said, "all power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth" (Matt. xxviii. 18). This word "power" is rendered by "miracle" in Heb. ii. 4, and is linked with rhema in vi. 5, "the good Word of God, and the powers of the coming age". The High-Priesthood of Christ differs from that of Aaron in that it is "according to the power of an endless life" (vii. 16); and in xi. 11, 34 it again occurs. It is the power of the risen Christ that makes His Word effective; He will destroy him that has the power of death, that is the devil. As the risen One He holds the keys of Hades and of death. He is the Son of God with power.

Let us turn for a moment to the records of His life on earth, for there we shall find, even in His humiliation, that His word was with power. When He said to the two fishers, "Follow Me", there was no hesitation, "they straightway left their nets, and followed him" (Matt. iv. 19, 20); when the Lord had finished the "Sermon on the Mount" we are told, "the people were astonished at His doctrine, for He taught them as one having authority, and not as the Scribes" (vii. 28, 29). A leper came and worshipped Him, saying, "Lord, if Thou wilt, Thou canst make me clean. And Jesus put forth His hand, and touched him, saying, I will; be thou clean. And immediately his leprosy was cleansed" (viii. 2, 3). This miracle is followed by one that even more clearly testifies to the power of His spoken word. A centurion who sought the Lord on behalf of his sick servant said, "Speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed . . . . . and his servant was healed in the self-same hour" (viii. 5-13). Shortly after this the Lord and His disciples are found in a ship, and upon a great tempest arising, the disciples call upon the Lord to save them; He rebuked the waves and a great calm followed, "but the men marvelled, saying, What manner of man is this, that even the winds and the sea obey Him?" (viii. 24-27).

The miracle of the healing of the man sick of the palsy is a definite demonstration of the power of the Lord's Word. He had said, "son, be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee", and, answering the thought of those who heard these words, said, "for whether is easier, to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Arise, and walk? But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins, (then saith He to the sick of the palsy), Arise, take up thy bed, and go unto thine house" (ix. 1-8). So the record continues, His word then was most certainly with power.

If this is the character of His Word while in the form of a Servant, what shall be the character of His word as the risen Son of God with power? So Heb. xii. 25, 26 admonishes:

> "See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh. For if they escaped not who refused Him that spake on earth, much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from Him that speaketh from heaven: Whose voice then shook the earth: but now He hath promised, saying, yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven."

Although primarily this passage goes back to the giving of the law at Sinai, the Old Testament furnishes illustration of the Lord's Word of power, "and God said, Light be, and light was" (Gen. i. 3); "By the Word of the Lord were the heavens made; and all the host of them by the breath of His mouth"; "For He spake, and it was done, He commanded, and it stood fast" (Psa. xxxiii. 6, 9). Shall we not say that Psa. xxix., the Psalm of the "Voice", looks forward to that happy day when the Son of God shall have brought or carried all things on to the reign of peace?

"The LORD will bless His people with peace" (Psa. xxix. 11).

The reader will remember the insistence that the structure of the epistle places upon the word "spoken". The Hebrews naturally clung to the Law, and the record of the majestic accompaniment on Sinai would intensify their attachment to that law introduced by the words:

"And God spake all these words" (Exod. xx. 1).

Here in Christ they would or should perceive One whose Voice could not only shake the earth, but the heavens also, and be led to trust in Him whose Word is so powerful that it upholds all things. Creation is wonderful, but surely it is equally a wonder how the creation with its multifarious activities, combinations and possibilities, "consists". Col. i. 17 and Heb. i. 3 give the only answer possible. He Whose hands laid the foundation of the earth, and Whose fingers made the heavens (Psa. cii. 25-27; Psa. viii. 3) is the only possible upholder. The discovery of atomic fissures, the consciousness of the terrific force that resides in the smallest piece of matter, only intensifies our appreciation of the Power that can and does hold these destructive forces in leash.

No.8. The Purification of sins.
pp. 227 - 230

The glories of the Son are not introduced into the opening verses of this epistle without intention; they are now to be focused upon the great work for which He left the glory, became a Man, and died upon the cross. The R.V. omits the words "our" and "by Himself" reading:

> "When He had made purification of sins" (Heb. i. 3 R.V.).

We should, however, be aware that not only are these words found in several ancient manuscripts, but are confirmed by some ancient versions. Tischendorf restored them in his edition of 1858.

> "In this verse the Apostle affirms the union of the human nature with the Divine, in the one Person of Christ, and then proceeds in a natural order to speak of His exaltation and session in glory in that nature" (Bishop Wordsworth).
>
> "The Son of God being God Most High, humbled Himself and became Man; and as Man He received that glory which He ever possessed as God" (Theodoret).

"This purification was 'by Himself' di'heautou (Heb. i. 3), "through death" dia tou thanatou (Heb. ii. 14) "through His blood" dia tou idiou haimatos (Heb. ix. 12) and "through the sacrifice of Himself" dia tes thusias hautou" (Heb. ix.26).

This last expression I regard as the full form, expressing what is elliptically expressed in our text by di'heautou "by Himself" (Moses Stuart)."

The word katharizo is used for the cleansing of a leper (Matt. viii. 3), and the ceremonial cleansing of the outside of the cup (xxiii. 25). It is used in the epistle to the Hebrews, as indeed are the other forms of the word, and it will enlighten us as to the meaning if we consider all the other references in this epistle:

"How much more shall the blood of Christ, Who through the aionian Spirit offered Himself without spot to God, purge (katharizo) your conscience from dead works to serve the living God?" (Heb. ix. 14).

"For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying (katharotes) of the flesh" (Heb. ix. 13).

"And almost all things are by the law purged (katharizo) with blood" (Heb. ix. 22).

"It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified (katharizo) with these" (Heb. ix. 23).

"Our bodies washed with pure (katharos) water" (Heb. x. 22).

As we examine these passages we shall observe that they do not speak primarily of the forgiveness of sins, or the justification of the sinner; they do not speak of redemption, but of one only of its effects, viz., purification. The type which will indicate fairly clearly the object of the work of Christ in Heb. i. 3 is that of the "ashes of the heifer".

The nineteenth chapter of Numbers gives a detailed statement of this institution. Let us briefly analyze the record:

(1) The red heifer had to be without spot or blemish, and one upon which had never come a yoke.
(2) It was slain "without the camp" (see Heb. xiii. 12).
(3) The whole heifer, together with cedar wood, hyssop and scarlet, was burned to ashes; these ashes were used for the purpose of purification.
(4) Uncleanness was contracted by touching a dead body, or by being in a tent wherein a man died, or by touching a bone, or a grave.
(5) Purification was effected by mixing the ashes with living water and by sprinkling with a bunch of hyssop on the third and seventh days.
(6) An unclean person who refused to be purified was cut off from the congregation; he had defiled the sanctuary.

It will be noticed that the whole question is one of defilement and its resulting exclusion from the service of the Lord. Some of the causes of uncleanness were quite outside the volition of the person involved, the touching of one slain in the field, or the death occurring in one's own home were shadows of the defiling contact of the world. Had the water of purifying not been at hand, many would perforce have been absent from the Lord's house. The great Antitype of the ashes of the heifer is "the blood of Christ"; this "purges the conscience from "DEAD works". The reference to the defilement of Numb. xix. is obvious; the dead man, the bone, and the grave are here exchanged for "dead works"; the privilege of access to the Tabernacle being exchanged for "service to the living God". The running water was a type of the "aionian Spirit".

The next passage refers to the fact that almost all things by the law are purified with blood, and that the Tabernacle, the book and the people were thus purified.

> "For when Moses had spoken every precept to all the people according to the law, he took the blood of calves and of goats, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, and sprinkled both the book, and all the people, saying, This is the blood of the testament which God hath enjoined unto you. Moreover he sprinkled with blood both the tabernacle, and all the vessels of the ministry. And almost all things are by the law purged with blood" (Heb. ix. 19-22).

Here we have the other type of purifying, not the ashes of an heifer this time, but the blood of calves and goats. The effect, however, is the same; the result is purifying, and also a solemn dedication; the covenant, the Tabernacle, and all the vessels of the ministry, all had to be CLEAN. The parallelism of Heb. x. 22 will perhaps now be more obvious, as also the way in which the type merges into the antitype, "hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience" is the New Covenant equivalent of "bodies washed with pure water", as also the words, "let us draw near", which is impossible without purifying. It will be evident that we must include "the blood of sprinkling" (Heb. xii. 24), and indeed all the references to blood in Hebrews.

Speaking without the book, and from a superficial acquaintance with its theme, one would feel certain that in the epistle to the Hebrews a full statement concerning redemption by the blood of Christ would be found. Redemption is not conspicuous in the first reference (Heb. i. 3) to the work of Christ, the whole imagery and teaching has to do with a people already saved, who have access to God, who are pressing on to Canaan, and who need the continual ministrations of the priest and offering for their sanctification. But let us see for ourselves; here are the references to blood in this epistle:

> "The children are partakers of flesh and blood" (ii. 14).
>
> "Into the second went the high priest alone once every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself, and for the errors of the people" (ix. 7).
>
> "Neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by His own blood He entered in once into the holy place, having obtained aionian redemption for us" (ix. 12).
>
> "For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh" (ix. 13).
>
> "How much more shall the blood of Christ, Who through the aionian Spirit offered Himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God?" (ix. 14).
>
> "Whereupon neither the first testament was dedicated without blood" (ix. 18).
>
> "He took the blood . . . . . and sprinkled both the book, and all the people" (ix. 19).
>
> "Saying, This is the blood of the testament which God hath enjoined unto you" (ix. 20).
>
> "Moreover he sprinkled with blood both the tabernacle, and all the vessels of the ministry" (ix. 21).
>
> "And almost all things are by the law purged with blood" (ix. 22).
>
> "And without shedding of blood is no remission" (ix. 22).
>
> "Nor yet that He should offer Himself often, as the high priest entereth into the holy place . . . . . with blood of others" (ix. 25).
>
> "For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins" (x. 4).
>
> "Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus" (x. 19).

"Of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing" (x. 29).

"Through faith he kept the passover, and the sprinkling of blood, lest He that destroyed the firstborn should touch them" (xi. 28).

"Ye have not yet resisted unto blood" (xii. 4).

"To Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel" (xii. 24).

"The bodies of those beasts, whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest for sin, are burned without the camp." (xiii. 11).

"Wherefore Jesus also, that He might sanctify the people with His own blood, suffered without the gate" (xiii. 12).

"Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the aionian covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do His will" (xiii. 20, 21).

Those that refer to redemption are ix. 12, 22; x. 4; and xi. 28; of these ix. 12 speaks of redemption as having been obtained already, and is not the result of the offering there, as verses 13, 14 prove; ix. 22, speaking of remission, may at first seem to be a direct statement, yet it is in the midst of a context dealing with the Covenant and Tabernacle, and rather indicates that the remission which is a part of the new covenant (Heb. x. 16-18) cannot be enjoyed without this blood of sprinkling that links the people and the book together; xi. 28 refers to the passover, the true type of redemption, which offering is outside the scope of the epistle, for Hebrews has no place for redemption from Egypt, its setting being the wilderness and its centre the Tabernacle. Salvation in the evangelical and gospel sense is not the theme of Hebrews; it deals with a saved people, and their sanctification. Redemption, in the evangelical sense, is presupposed.

The teaching of the epistle as to sanctification is directly bearing on the "purifying for sins", which Heb. i. 3 brings so prominently forward. It figures again in ii. 11 and x. 10, 14, "we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all . . . . . for by one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified". The context speaks of the New Covenant, of access into the holiest, and of despising the blood of the Covenant whereunto one is sanctified; it is not the salvation of the sinner, but the perfecting of those who are sanctified that is here in view; so we come back to Heb. i. 3. Of all the phases of the sacrificial work of Christ this one is selected; selected by reason of the fact that it is vitally connected with the purpose of the epistle. The greatness of the One Who thus provided the purifying, the Son of God, makes willful defilement a terrible thing. It does despite to the spirit of grace.

Heb. x. 12 tells us that after the Lord had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, He sat down; this is the testimony also of Heb. i. 3, "When He had made a purifying for sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high". This has reference to His high priesthood, "we have such an High Priest, Who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens" (viii. 1), and to Himself as the Pattern, "looking unto Jesus the author and perfecter of faith, Who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God" (xii. 2). Both the High Priest and the Pattern are for believers, so also this one phase of the work of Calvary, "the purifying of or for sins".

In Glory (Col. iii. 4).

pp. 118 - 120

Do these words indicate:

(1) A sphere of blessing, or
(2) simply the goal of salvation?

How easy to pose the question, how satisfactory to sit back and wait for the failure "to give a straight answer", yet how false and misleading this "or" that divides the two propositions as though they neutralize one or the other. Much that appears as legitimate argument is a fallacy. The particular fallacy involved in the predicament posed in the opening dual question is really a mere trick, which consists in asking two or more questions as if they were one; then the respondent is trapped whether the answer is in the affirmative or the negative.

The standard illustration is asking a man "whether he has ceased beating his wife?" Lawyers are often guilty of this sophism when they insist on a "categorical answer" "yes or no". If this logical "trick" be intentional it is reprehensible but not very dangerous. The dangerous sophism is when it is put forward with all honesty of purpose; it not only deceives its author, but it is more likely to deceive those who listen, especially if they hold the author of this fallacy in high esteem. Truth is not either pure black or pure white. All truth must be related to something else before we can arrive at truth itself. Glory is both a goal of salvation, and at the same time interpreted correctly only when its associations are included. For example: the all-covering theme of I Cor. xv. is "Resurrection", the sub-divisions are "how", "what" or "where". The all-covering statement is that the dead, all the dead who fell asleep "in Christ", shall be "raised IN GLORY" (I Cor. xv. 43). It is a fallacy however to conclude that this statement alone settles where resurrection will be enjoyed, or whether resurrection may be enjoyed in more than one sphere, while being all the time "in glory". The words that immediately precede in I Cor. xv. 40, 41 make that clear:

> "The glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another . . . . . for one star differeth from another IN GLORY."

Sphere or place or whatever better word we choose, cannot be eliminated from I Cor. xv. 43. Glory is the accompaniment of the Second Coming of Christ in more than one aspect. For example:

> "The Son of Man shall come in the glory of His Father" (Matt. xvi. 27).
> "The Son . . . . . shall sit in the throne of His glory" (Matt. xix. 28).
> "Coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory" (Matt. xxiv. 30).

Here the same word "glory" is used as is found in Col. iii., yet no reader of The Berean Expositor, we trust, would dream of confusing the spheres wherein these appearings will take place. At the Transfiguration Moses and Elijah appeared "in glory"

(Luke ix. 31) but these words do not cancel out the differences that we see exist between the coming of Christ to the earth, and the hope of the believer of the Church of the One Body. When James and John asked that they might sit, one on the right hand and the other on the left "in the glory that is Thine" were they contemplating the blessed sequel to being potentially "seated together in heavenly places"? If so, what value is there in the principle of "Right Division", or what difference is there between the ministry of our Lord, as the minister of the circumcision (Rom. xv. 8), and the testimony of our Lord, and of Paul His prisoner?

Coming now to Col. iii., we notice that the believer is enjoined to seek "those things which are ABOVE". This supposes a different sphere and place, than that which holds "things that are below" and this is justified by the adverb of place "where" that immediately follows. "Where" does not denote quality, or quantity, but locality. The affection of the believer here is to be focused on:

(1) Where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God.
(2) On things above, not on things that are on the earth.

The following parallels are eloquent:

A | Your LIFE
  B | Is HID
    C | With CHRIST
      D | IN GOD
A | Our LIFE
  B | Shall APPEAR
    C | With HIM
      D | IN GLORY

The pattern is complete. Point answers point and needs no advocate. If we are asked the question "WHERE" are these believers' lives hid, there is only one answer "with Christ IN GOD". If we are asked the question "WHERE will that life be manifested", we can only answer "with Christ IN GLORY". If we lift these words "in glory" our of their context and look upon them with the cold eye of the grammarian we can easily "prove" that they can have no relationship with any particular place or a sphere of blessing, but if we heed the exhortation of Col. iii. 1-3 we shall know "where" glory awaits us, whether we can convince the gainsayer or not.

As we said earlier, truth is not expressed simply in terms that are just black and white, it is expressed in terms that imply relationships. The glory for which we wait must be the sequel of the position we occupy now by faith, for in every calling:

"Faith is the substance of things hoped for."

Now blest in heavenly places,
In Christ at God's right hand;
And filled with all His fullness,
Complete in Him to stand.
Sing to the praise and glory
Of Him Who thus hath shown
Such gracious love and mercy,
To call us for His own.

As looking to Christ Jesus,
In Whom we find our peace;
Our praise and adoration,
And love to Him increase.
May we, who thus are looking,
Walk worthy of the grace,
The blessed hope and calling,
Until we see His face.

O help us, by Thy mercy,
The shield of faith to take;
To walk in love and meekness,
For our Redeemer's sake.
Then shall we be all pleasing,
As we in love abound;
To each and all forbearing,
May we in Christ be found.

The Judgment Seat of Christ

No.1. A Preliminary Enquiry.
pp. 159, 160

There is nothing more solemn to the believer than that he must one day stand before his Redeemer and give an account of his stewardship, and this fact with its many consequences finds expression in a number of passages of the N.T. Neither is it confined to any one dispensation or calling. We find the principle expressed in the form of parable in the Gospels, and by doctrinal statement in the epistles.

The language in the epistles is plain.

> "We shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ" (Rom. xiv. 10).

The solemn fact is implied in such a passage as I Cor. xi. 31, 32:

> "If we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged. But when we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world."

A number of important distinctions call for consideration here. We propose an examination into this heart searching subject, and will seek an answer to the many questions that arise, including such as:

(1) How does the teaching of Rom. xiv. 10 or I Cor. xi. 31, 32 harmonize with the doctrine of a full free forgiveness, justification and perfect acceptance in Christ?
(2) How does the appearance of the believer before a judgment seat of any description harmonize with such a passage as Rom. viii. 33, 34?
(3) Does this scrutiny at the judgment seat of Christ belong only to the earlier ministry of Paul, or does it find a place in the dispensation of the Mystery as well?
(4) If we limit this judgment to the believer's "works", "service" or "stewardship", can we affirm that disloyalty, self seeking or any other form of unacceptable service, is when found in the redeemed, something other than sin?
(5) How does the award of "loss" at that day accord with the forgiveness of ALL trespasses?
(6) What can be meant by receiving the things done in the body (II Cor. v. 10)? and how can a believer who has put on immortality in resurrection ever possibly "reap corruption"? (Gal. vi. 8). Is this "reaping" operative only in this life?

These and many like questions will press upon us for a Scriptural answer. In some cases we may have to confess that it is beyond our knowledge to provide one. We will "hasten slowly" and build as solidly as grace will permit. The first thing that seems to call for consideration is the term "the judgment seat", and to this we devote the remainder of this article.

The Greek word translated "judgment seat" is bema, a word that occurs twelve times in the N.T., twice of the Lord, and eight times concerning earthly judgment seats, once a "throne" and once "to set (foot) on". This last translation, found in Acts vii. 5 (literally "foot room") reveals that there is no element of "judgment" in the actual composition or derivation of the word. Bema comes from baino "to go, to step" and there are no less than forty-two variants of this root. For example, parabasis "a step aside" is translated "transgression". Anabasis "a step up" is translated "stair", etc. A bema is a raised platform erected for any purpose, but in actual use limited largely to a dais from which a sentence is pronounced, a decision given, an award made. It can mean a place of judgment such as that occupied by Pontius Pilate (Matt. xxvii. 19), or the judgment seat of Gallio (Acts xviii. 12, 16, 17), of Festus (Acts xxv. 6, 17) or of Caesar (Acts xxv. 10). In Acts xii. 21 Herod occupied the bema for the purpose of making an oration. Dr. M. Panton says "The tribunal before which the disciples appear is peculiar, it is a bema, not a thronos, a judgment seat for the investigation of disciples, not a throne for the arraignment of rebels".

In Neh. viii. 4 the LXX employs the word bema for a "pulpit" and this can in no sense be construed as a judgment seat except in the sense that any and every reading of the Word causes the hearer an exercise of conscience. The Apocrypha uses the word bema for a pulpit (Esd. 9:42) and for "a judgment seat" (2Macc. 13:26); and some editions associate the word with the judgment of Urim and Thummim (Syr. 19:26; 45:11). Classical Greek uses the word bema for (1) A step, a pace. (2) A pace, as a measure of length. (3) A raised place, a tribunal, the Latin rostra; the verb bematizo does not appear to have been used in the sense of judging, but means "to measure by paces". We may find this idea of measuring to see whether one has attained a specific standard coming out very prominently in our subsequent studies.

Of the twelve occurrences of bema in the N.T. two only occur in the epistles:

> "We shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ" (Rom. xiv. 10).
> "We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ" (II Cor. v. 10).

It may be that some of our readers who have realized their perfect acceptance in the Beloved, may hesitate to bring any element of the judgment of a believer into the epistles of the Mystery. It should be remembered that the same epistle that teaches the Mystery, and stresses the fact that the believer has been made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light, says:

> "Whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord, and not unto men; knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance: for ye serve the Lord Christ. But he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons" (Col. iii. 23-25).

Linked with this reference must be the references to "the day of Christ" found in Philippians. We therefore approach this very solemn subject with subdued hearts, seeking to give due weight both to the freedom from condemnation which is our blessed portion and to the scrutiny that is most certainly indicated in the reference "the judgment seat of Christ". To the discovery of the truth we dedicate our grace given faculties, praying that all we commit to paper and print may be consciously published in view of "that day".

No.2. Chastening v. Condemnation (I Cor. xi. 31, 32).
pp. 237 - 240

In our preliminary inquiry, I Cor. xi. 31, 32 was quoted without comment. Let us take this passage as a starting point for the examination of the whole issue.

> "If we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged. But when we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world."

The immediate occasion for these solemn words was the attitude of the believer to the Lord's Supper, and inasmuch as the dispensation of the Mystery does not include the memorial feast of the New Covenant, we may at first feel that this passage can have no bearing upon us. There is, however, an underlying principle governing this adjuration which can apply to other occasions where present personal judgment of self may save future scrutiny. Let us observe the context of these verses. The epistle as a whole can be set out as follows:

I Corinthians as a whole

A | i. 1-9. Waiting for the coming of the Lord.
B | i. 10 - iv. 21. "It hath been declared unto me."
C | v. 1 - xiv. 40. The body, physically, spiritually,
ecclesiastically.
B | xv. 1. "I declared unto you."
A | xvi. Maranatha. The Lord cometh.

It will be seen that chapter xi. falls within the great central section, where "the body", whether the body be the physical body of the believer, the body viewed as an instrument for service, or the body used to illustrate the constitution of the church which possessed as a body does its members, the spiritual gifts which were the character of the dispensation then obtaining. This great inner section opens with chapters v. 1 - vi. 20 the body physically, and closes with xi. 2 - xiv. 40 the body ecclesiastically. Now in the opening section, we have a case of immorality. The Apostle pronounces judgment upon the offender saying:

> "For verily, as absent in body, but present in spirit, have judged already, as though I were present, concerning him that hath done this deed, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, when ye are gathered together, and my spirit, with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ, to deliver such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus" (I Cor. v. 3-5).

Here we have a passage that not only corresponds in the structure with the verses quoted at the head of this article, but which illustrates the Apostle's words there employed. Judgment must either take place here and now, or it must take place before the Bema. If here and now, it may go so deep as to involve "the destruction of the flesh", but the spirit will be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. So, if any believer partook of the Lord's supper "unworthily", he ate "damnation to himself", and this damnation was immediate "For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep" (I Cor. xi. 29-30). Consequently, the Apostle admonishes the believer to "examine himself" and so let him eat that bread and drink that cup. Present judgment is set over against condemnation, the "we" who are chastened, set over against the "world" that shall be condemned.

A word or two upon the key words of I Cor. xi. 31, 32 is called for.

"If we judge ourselves, we should not be judged." The two words here translated "judge" are not identical. The first word is in the Greek diakrino "to discern" (Matt. xvi. 3), and is so translated in I Cor. xi. 29 "Not discerning the Lord's body". Perhaps "discriminate" covers most of the passages where this word is used. "Who maketh thee to differ?" (I Cor. iv. 7) shows this clearly. The second word translated "judge" in verse 31, and again in verse 32 is krino, which in the noun form krima is translated "damnation" in verse 29, "condemnation" in verse 34. This word krino is used in chapter v. 13 for the judgment of them which are without, and of "going to law" (vi. 6).

The condemnation of the world is put over against the chastening of the believer by the Lord. Those who are "In Christ Jesus" can never come into the condemnation (Rom. viii. 1). While the believer can never share this condemnation with the unforgiven and unjustified world, he can and does experience "chastening" which touches him in body and estate. Chastening is the act of a Father, condemnation is the sentence of a Judge. Heb. xii. will be examined presently, in which this relationship of true son, father, and chastening is more fully developed, but before we turn to that chapter, there are other passages in I Corinthians itself that bear upon our theme that must be examined.

"EVERY ONE" or "EACH"?

We have observed that in I Cor. v. and xi., there are references to a present "chastening" as over against a future "condemnation", and must now supplement this examination by the consideration of an earlier and perhaps key reference found in chapter iii. This chapter of I Corinthians is a part of the larger portion contained in i. 10 - iv. 21, introduced by the words "It hath been declared unto me" and the chief failure of these Corinthians dealt with in this opening section was their carnality expressed, not here, as in chapter vi. by gross immorality, but by their tendency to division and faction. They ranged themselves as opposing sections under the leadership of "Paul" and "Apollos" and thereby revealed their spiritual immaturity, the consequence being that the damage done to the faith exposed them to severe censure here and now, as well as before the Lord in that day. In chapter iii., the Apostle reverts to these divisions saying:

> "Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed, even as the Lord gave to every man?" (I Cor. iii. 5).

These concluding words "even as the Lord gave to every man" become the starting point of a disquisition upon the difference between salvation and service, gift and reward, that will throw a deal of light upon the subject before us. Paul speaking of his own ministry likens it to "planting", and the ministry of Apollos he likens to "watering", but before he says another word as to the relative value of "planting" and "watering" he reminds us all that apart from the living "increase" or growth which can come alone from the Creator Himself, all such labour would be meaningless and vain. From that angle Paul can say:

> "So then neither is he that planteth anything, neither he that watereth: but God that giveth the increase."

This at first reading seems drastic and unsympathetic—but the Apostle had an obvious lesson to teach before he could safely speak of the individual share of each believer in the mighty scheme. When however the fact that growth or increase alone comes from God is acknowledged, the relative value of individual service is recognized.

> "Now he that planteth and he that watereth are one: and every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labour."

Here, however divine the labour, or relatively more important one phase may appear than another, each one will be assessed by an impartial judgment. A matter that will need the most careful consideration is the scope of the words "every man" here. The same necessity for care will be present when we examine II Cor. v. 10 where at the Bema we learn "every one" will receive the things done in his body. There are two words translated "every", "every man" and "every one" in the N.T. that need to be used with discrimination.

Pas. This word is translated "every man" in I Cor. ix. 25 where it means every man without distinction, the same applies to the translation "every one" in I Cor. xvi. 16. Pas is, of course, the word usually translated "all", as in I Cor. i. 2 "all that in every place call". The word employed by the Apostle however in I Cor. iii. 5 and II Cor. v. 10 is the Greek ekastos. Etymologists differ in their opinion as to the root of this word, but all are agreed that it means "each one separately or distinctly". In I Cor. iii. 5, 8, 10 and 13, we are not dealing with "all . . . . . everywhere" but with individuals, "each one".

The words "Even as the Lord gave to every man" are preceded and explained by the words "ministers by whom ye believed". "Each one" of such ministers shall receive "his own reward according to his own labour". When the Apostle said "let every man take heed how be buildeth" he of necessity limited "every man" to those who were "builders". So the double reference to "every man" in verse 13, does not refer to every one of the redeemed as such, but to every one who has work that can be tried so as by fire. This by no means limits this passage to so-called "ministers"; all believers have a work to do. It is nevertheless important to realize that I Cor. iii. deals not with initial salvation but with subsequent service.

The passage we have quoted from II Cor. v. 10 "For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that every one may receive" cannot be interpreted apart from its context. The verse begins with "for" which links that he may be "accepted of Him". Paul, equally with all the redeemed found his full acceptance in the Beloved, and this entirely by grace. Service, once again, not salvation is in view in this passage. The terms used by the Apostle in II Cor. v. 9 refer to acceptableness in the sight of God and relate to advice and walk. Where Gen. v. 22, 24 says that Enoch "walked with God" the LXX says he "pleased God", as in Heb. xi. 5, 6. Euarestos "accepted" or "well pleasing" is connected with "reasonable service" (Rom. xii. 1), and with proving as by a separate walk that is "that good, and acceptable and perfect" will of God. So in Rom. xiv. 18; Eph. v. 10; Phil. iv. 18; Col. iii. 20; Titus ii. 9 and Heb. xiii. 21, every occurrence is related to practice and not to standing or salvation by grace. It may be that every believer without exception, even "babes" in Christ will have to appear before this judgment seat, but our understanding of the references examined above, compels us to say that if "all believers" do appear there, they will appear not so much as those who are redeemed, but as those, being redeemed, who have manifested the life that they possess in "service".

Meditations on Psalm LI

No.1. The Prophetic character of the Psalmist's Experiences. pp. 77, 78

Before we enter into the intensely personal character of David's sin, confession, cleansing and restoration, and by so doing see something of the nature of all sin and of all phases of salvation by grace, let us look at the Psalm from a somewhat different angle. Many, if not all the Psalms, have a dual character. For example, David was actually betrayed and the grief is genuine that causes him to cry:

> "Yea, mine own familiar friend, in whom I trusted, which did eat of my bread, hath lifted up his heel against me" (Psa. xli. 9), yet this was a prophecy of the betrayal of Christ by Judas. The reader will think of other Psalms that fall under the same category as Psa. xli., such as Psa. xvi. and Psa. xxii. Sometimes the prophetic element in the Psalm looks not so much to the Messiah, but to some experiences of Israel in the latter days.

As we read the closing verses of Psa. li. which speak of Zion, the building of its walls, the acceptable offering of sacrifices, we are conscious that there is a transition from the personal experience of David, to the experiences that shall yet be known by a repentant and restored Israel. David was guilty, so far as this Psalm is concerned, of two sins (1) murder and (2) adultery. If we include the testimony of Psa. xxxii. we shall have to add one more sin, the sin of obstinate refusal to acknowledge guilt. When we turn our attention away from David, to David's people, we realize that the selfsame sins are laid to their charge also.

MURDER.

> "Ye . . . . . killed the Prince of Life" (Acts iii. 15).
> "The Just One; of Whom ye have been now the betrayers and murderers" (Acts vii. 52).
> "Then answered all the people, and said, His blood be on us, and on our children" (Matt. xxvii. 25).

Israel, as a nation, are guilty of murder. They too must acknowledge as David did "bloodguiltiness" (Psa. li. 4). Of them it is written:

> "I will pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and of supplications: and they shall look upon Me Whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for Him, as one mourneth for his only son" (Zech. xii. 10).

ADULTERY.

> "Backsliding Israel committed adultery" (Jer. iii. 8).
> "Turn O backsliding children, saith the Lord; for I am married unto you" (Jer. iii. 14).
> "Surely as a wife treacherously departeth from her husband, so have ye dealt treacherously with Me, O house of Israel, saith the Lord" (Jer. iii. 20).

NON-REPENTANCE.

"Only acknowledge thine iniquity" (Jer. iii. 13).
"Rend your heart, and not your garments" (Joel ii. 13).
"After thy hardness and impenitent heart treasurest up unto thyself wrath" (Rom. ii. 5).

Like David, Israel shall yet be "washed" "white as snow" (Isa. i. 18); like David, Israel shall be "restored" (Isa. i. 26; Joel ii. 25; Jer. xxxi. 10); and like David, shall become the teacher of God's ways to transgressors (Isa. ii. 3; Zech. xiv. 16).

Millennial Studies

No.1. The Bottomless Pit and The Little Season.
pp. 6 - 10

We have remarked in another article that the positive teaching concerning the Millennium is confined to TEN VERSES of Holy Writ, namely Rev. xx. 1-10. All else must agree with what is there revealed before it can be admitted as a further revelation concerning that prophetic period.

The opening verses speak of the binding of Satan, Rev. xx. 1-3, which will be one of the great characteristics of this great Day. We have in these three verses, such words as "key", "bottomless pit", "a great chain", "to lay hold", "bound", "shut up" and after the thousand years "to loose". It would be an insult to the intelligence and the integrity of the reader to set out a detailed "proof" that these terms mean all that we associate with "imprisonment". The "bottomless pit" however calls for examination, although no one we hope needs an explanation of the figure "bottomless", which simply means "fathomless" or deep beyond human gauging.

The Greek word so translated is abussos, which becomes in English abyss, and this Greek word is found in the Apocalypse seven times. In Rev. ix. 1 and 2 it is joined with the Greek word phrear "a well or pit", the remaining passages using the word abussos alone.

The way in which this word is distributed in the book of the Revelation clearly indicates that it is of importance. Let us see.

ABUSSOS in Revelation.

A | ix. 1, 2-11. Key. Let loose. Locust scourge.
The Angel called in Hebrew Abaddon in Greek Apollyon.
B | xi. 7. The Beast ascends out of the abyss, overcomes saints.
B | xvii. 8. The Beast ascends out of the abyss, Lamb overcomes (14).
A | xx. 1-3. Key. Shut up. Loose. Deceive.
Serpent called Diabolos (Greek) and Satan (Hebrews).

When we examine Rev. xiii. 1 we learn that the Beast rises up (same word as "ascend") out of the sea, and this proves a help not a problem, for we shall find that the abyss is constantly associated with the sea. This of course we learn by considering its usage in the Septuagint. We find it equated with the sea in Job xxviii. 14; xxviii. 16; Psa. xxxiii. 7; xlii. 7; lxxvii. 16; cxxxv. 6; but more important still, we discover that in all these passages, the Greek word translates the Hebrew tehom, "the deep" of Gen. i. 2, and of Gen. vii. 11, the flood of judgment before the advent of Man, and the flood of judgment in the days of Noah. Psa. civ. 6 says "Thou coveredst it with the abyss as with a garment: the waters stood above the mountains". Psa. cvi. 9 says "He rebuked the Red Sea also, and dried it up: so He led them through the abyss as through the wilderness". Psa. cxlviii. 7 associates "dragons" with all deeps, and Isa. li. 9-10 does the same. Prov. viii. 23, 24 takes us back to "the beginning, or ever the earth was, when there were no abysses". Amos vii. 4 reveals that the great abyss could be devoured or eaten up "by fire" while the poetic vision of Hab. iii. 10, 11 associates the trembling of the mountains and the abyss lifting up its hands, with the paralyzing of the sun and moon. Such are the predecessors of the seven references to the Abyss in the Revelation. The first occurrences in Rev. xx. 1 and 3 link the purpose of the ages, just as surely as the re-appearance of the Paradise of Rev. xxii., links this passage with the expulsion of Gen. iii. All this gives point to the words of Rev. xxi. 1 "and there was no more sea", no more abyss, no more "deep". Associated with this connexion of the deep with Satan and his imprisonment, is the statement in Rev. ix. 14:

> "Loose the four angels which are bound in the great river Euphrates."

We can no more explain how this river could hold in restraint four such angels, and the "two hundred thousand thousand" demon horsemen that slay a third part of men, than we can understand what sort of "key" or "chain" or "abyss" could keep in hold such a being as Satan for a thousand years, but these are revealed facts and they agree. We can, however, see that the Euphrates has a connexion with Babel, even as the Abyss is linked with Gen. i. 2.

Returning to Rev. xx. 1-3, we see that the imprisonment of Satan is the first and the cause of a series of "restraints" that characterize the Millennial reign. The margin of Dan. ix. 24 reads "to restrain the transgression" where the A.V. reads "to finish transgression". The Hebrew word is kah-lah "to keep back, be restrained, shut up". The noun form of this word keh-leh is translated in its ten occurrences "prison" with six marginal notes which read: (lit. house of restraint). Transgression will by no means be "finished" when Dan. ix. 24 is fulfilled, it will be "restrained" or imprisoned along with the Devil, but will break out as soon as the Devil is loosed from his prison.

Dan. ix. 24 also says "to make an end of sins" and the margin reads "to seal up". The same word appears in the later reference in the same verse "to seal up vision and prophecy". The Hebrew word is chatham and appears again in Dan. xii. 4 "shut up the words and seal the book", and this "even to the time of the end". We meet the word again in Dan. xii. 9 "the words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end", and in Dan. vi. 17 "the king sealed it with his own signet". The words "shut up" and "close up" of Dan. viii. 26, xii. 4, 9 but confirm the meaning of the words of Dan. ix. 24. Satham means "to stop up" as one would a well or source of water supply. Sennacherib attempted to stop the waters that supplied Jerusalem, and Hezekiah stopped up the watercourse of Gihon (II Chron. xxxii. 3, 30). We can therefore translate Dan. ix. 24 freely yet nevertheless truthfully "TO IMPRISON the transgression, to SEAL UP, as a book or as a well, sins".

We have seen that the "deep" of Gen. i. 2 finds an echo in the "abyss" of Rev. xx. We have seen the possibility of a "little season" when Satan, "that old Serpent", was loosed from the abyss of Gen. i. 2 and immediately set about his campaign of deceit in Genesis that echoes the "little season" and the "deceit" of Rev. xx. There is however another parallel that bears upon the subject of "restraint" that we have before us, but for the key to this we must turn to Psa. viii. When it says "that Thou mightest STILL the enemy" (Psa. viii. 2) the word translated "still" is the Hebrew shabath and is used in Gen. ii. 3 in the words "He had RESTED from all His work". It means a sabbath keeping. God rested on the seventh day of Creation work; Satan will unwillingly keep sabbath in prison for the sabbath that remains for the children of God is the 1000 year reign of Christ. He will indeed be "stilled", but who, without access to the original, would have dreamt of such a correspondence or such a teaching. Here is "restraint" indeed covering the whole period.

The remaining terms of Dan. ix.: reconciliation, righteousness and the anointing of the Most Holy, belong to a separate enquiry. We are concerned at the moment with "the bottomless pit", the chain, the restraint of the Devil and his works that introduce the Millennium into the pages of Scripture, namely at Rev. xx. 1-3. Sin is by no means "finished" or "made an end of" in the evangelical sense of the words, and the A.V. margin reveals that the translators were not quite happy in thus translating the Hebrew words used. This element of restraint is reflected in the "feigned obedience" that will characterize some of the nations in the Millennium, and after the reader has surveyed the evidence given for this marginal translation of Psa. xviii. 44, lxvi. 3 and lxxxi. 15, he may realize that there is no need to attempt to justify the marginal rendering, the problem will be rather to understand why the translators should have departed from their own rendering in so many other places. Had they been consistent, the problem would never have arisen. That there could not have been "a finish" or "an end" to transgression or sin, Rev. xx. 8, 9 will demonstrate to all who have no theory to justify, for the terms Gog and Magog", "gather to battle", "sand of the sea", "went up on the breadth of the earth", "compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city" together with the judgment of fire which "devoured" them with which the Millennium ends, are all so far removed from any conception of peace and sinlessness as to make a long disquisition unnecessary. We can only say if these are symptoms of "perfect peace", are words of any use as vehicles of truth?

THE LITTLE SEASON

After the thousand years during which the overcomers reign with Christ, Satan will be let loose from the abyss, and go out to "deceive" once more. We already know that much that is found in Genesis finds its sequel in the Revelation. Here, may be, is yet another of those illuminating correspondences. We may often have wondered at the sudden entry of the "serpent" into Gen. iii., with his great deception. If, as we have already seen, "the deep" of Gen. i. 2 which is translated "the abyss" or "bottomless pit" by the Septuagint, if that "deep" had been his prison, could he not have been loosed at the close of some definite period (and see the minute exactness of the time in Rev. ix. 15) to test and try the newly-created Adam? However, this is not our theme. What are we to understand by the "little season"? The word that should be translated "season" is the Greek work kairos, whereas in Rev. xx. 3 the word is chronos, "time".

Kairos in Revelation

"The time is at hand" (i. 3).
"The time of the dead" (xi. 18).
"He hath but a short time" (xii. 12).
"A time, and times, and half a time" (xii. 14).
"The time is at hand" (xx. 10).

Two references stand out for consideration here.

> "Woe to the inhabiters of the earth and of the sea! for the devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a SHORT TIME" (xii. 12).

In this chapter Satan is given his full title:

> "The great dragon, that old serpent, called the Devil and Satan which deceiveth the whole world, was cast out into the earth" (Rev. xii. 9).

"The dragon, that old serpent, which is the Devil and Satan" shall be loosed out of prison when the thousand years are finished, and shall "go out to deceive the nations", "for a little season". He knew that he had "a short time", he is let loose for "a little season". The word used in Rev. xx. 3 is chronos.

"I gave here SPACE to repent" (Rev. ii. 21).
"They should rest yet for a LITTLE SEASON" (vi. 11).
"There should be TIME no longer" (x. 6).
"He must be loosed a LITTLE SEASON" (xx. 3).

These occurrences seem to explain one another. Thus, the word of the mighty angel, immediately preceding the voice of the seventh angel when the mystery of God should be finished, and the kingdom set up (Rev. x. 7; xi. 15), instead of declaring that time should cease, which is contradicted by the references to time, days, night, months and years that are found later in the book, to say nothing of the explicit statement that there will be "space to repent" no longer, and chapter x. is immediately preceded by the words:

> "Neither repented they of their murders, nor of their sorceries, nor of their fornication, nor of their thefts" (Rev. ix. 21).

Under the fifth seal, where the martyrs are told to rest for a little season, we find similar words to those used in Rev. xx. 4. These were slain for the Word of God, and for the testimony which they held. The white robes given to them link them with those that come out of "The Tribulation, the great one" (Rev. vi. 11-17). "He that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them . . . . . and the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them" (Rev. vii. 14-17). This tribulation is the same as that of Matt. xxiv. 21, 29 which is followed immediately by the Coming of the Son of Man with power and great glory. This Coming must be the same as that of Rev. xix. The reference to the throne shows that these overcomers are linked with the heavenly Jerusalem:

> "A throne was set in heaven . . . . . in the midst of the throne . . . . . four living creatures . . . . . in the midst of the elders, stood a Lamb . . . . . the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it (i.e. the New Jerusalem)."

The fact that the Devil will only be loosed a "little season" shows how rapid will be the deception of the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth. These nations will have kept as far from the beloved city as possible and by their attack upon the camp of the saints and the beloved city, they reveal their innate, though covered animosity. This time there will be no further respite, "fire came down from God out of heaven, and devoured them". The fact that such a trial should be necessary after the thousand years, declares plainly that the Millennium was no more sinless and perfect and secure than was the garden of Eden in the beginning. Man, tried in the most advantageous conditions, yielded, and man after a thousand years when the Devil shall be under restraint, manifests that no delegated authority, or advantageous environment is enough to bring in that perfect kingdom which the Son will deliver up to God even the Father. That kingdom follows the Millennium, but it is not the purpose of the Apocalypse to do more than lead up to it, which it does in its two closing chapters.

No.2. The Rest of the Dead.
pp. 26 - 32

We have seen from the testimony of Scripture itself that the only company of the redeemed for whom the Millennial reign is introduced into the pages of Holy Writ, is the overcomer. Rev. xx. 1-10 is the only portion of Scripture that gives positive teaching concerning the Millennium; other Scriptures contain passages that may and do belong to that period, but all other companies of either saved or lost can only be introduced into this kingdom by inference.

The companies mentioned in Rev. xx. 1-10 are the following:

1. The martyrs who withstood the Beast and refused his image. They not only "live" but "reign" with Christ a thousand years.
2. The "rest of the dead" is another company, only mentioned in order to make it clear that they do not live again until the thousand years are finished.
3. The overcomers or martyrs are called "Priests of God and of Christ".
4. After the thousand years, "nations" are revealed to have been living during that reign, and some of these nations lived "in the four quarters of the earth".
5. Inasmuch as the "camp of the saints" and the "Beloved City" could be compassed by these rebellious nations, they too must have been on the earth during the Millennium.

We have considered the meaning and bearing of the martyred saints in the article entitled "The Overcomers". We now round off the study by considering the remaining four items listed above, "the rest of the dead". The Greek word translated "rest" is loipos. "Peter and the rest of the apostles" (Acts ii. 37). This implies that Peter also was an apostle.

> "The election hath obtained it, and the rest were blinded" (Rom. xi. 7).

Here the "election" and "the rest" both belong to Israel, as the opening of the verse shows. We could not say "the election" (of Israel) and "the rest" (of the Gentiles) without adding an explanatory clause. Loipos occurs in Revelation eight times, thus:

> "Unto the rest in Thyatira" not unto the rest of the seven churches, or the rest of the world. (Rev. ii. 24).
> "Strengthen the things which remain" (iii. 2).
> "By reason of the other voices" (viii. 13).
> "The rest of the men which were not killed with the plagues." Plainly not the rest of mankind as a whole. (ix. 20).
> "The remnant were affrighted" (xi. 13).
> "The remnant of her seed" (xii. 17).
> "The remnant were slain" (xix. 21).
> "The rest of the dead lived not again" (xx. 5).

This last reference which directs us to the judgment of the Great White Throne warns us that a special company is envisaged. It is composed of believers, who together with those who were martyred, formed one company AND NO OTHERS are in view. The wicked dead of all ages will have their judgment, but that is not contemplated here. One company and one only are before us, and that company is divided into two portions: (1) the overcomers, (2) those who were not overcomers, or briefly "the rest". The overcomers live and reign during the thousand years. "The rest" do not live again until the Millennium is over. They do not forfeit "life" necessarily, but they have lost the "crown", a doctrine not confined to any one dispensational as I Cor. iii. 10-15, Phil. iii. 11-14 and II Tim. ii. 11-13 will show. This is the first resurrection; the "former" of two, as we have seen earlier.

These overcomers are called "priests of God and of Christ". There seems a need to discriminate once again between the restored nation, which will be a priestly nation on the earth, and this company of priests which exercise their priesthood in the Heavenly City. Let us see. At the foot of mount Sinai, the whole nation were given the terms by which they could become "a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation". Those terms none have ever kept; with those conditions no one has ever complied (Exod. xix. 5, 6). Isaiah, visualizing not the old covenant, but the "everlasting covenant" (Isa. lxi. 8) looked down the age and beheld Israel restored, having the oil of joy instead of mourning, rebuilt and raised up and repaired (Isa. lxi. 3, 4), and named "The Priests of the Lord: men shall call you the Ministers of our God . . . . . the seed which the Lord hath blessed" (Isa. lxi. 6-9). Just as the restored earthly Jerusalem will have a resemblance to the Heavenly City, with its foundations of sapphires, and its gates of agates (Isa. liv. 11, 12), so we find at the close of Isa. lxi. this restored priestly nation likened also to a bridegroom or to a bride. This must not lead us to confuse this company with the Bride of the Lamb (Rev. xix. 7), for Isa. liv. 6-8 makes it clear that Israel as a "woman forsaken" and a "wife of youth" who had been refused, is in view, whereas the Bride, the Lamb's wife, is not the nation of Israel, once divorced but now restored, but a company of overcomers whose seat of authority is not the earthly but the heavenly Jerusalem, a company that had never known divorcement. When we open the book of the Revelation the first company of the redeemed we meet with are those who say:

> "Unto Him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in His own blood, And hath made us kings and priests unto God and His Father" (Rev. i. 5, 6).

While all whoever they may be, and whatever their calling, must have been cleansed by the blood of the Lamb, there seems some special reason why it should have been introduced here. The word "washed" is the Greek lousanti, but the best texts read lusanti which means "loosed". Again, redemption sets free, and employs a number of words derived from luo "I loose". Nevertheless the way in which the word luo is used in the book of the Revelation makes us suspect that something more is intended here in Rev. i. 5, 6, than purely evangelical salvation. Let us assemble the occurrences of luo which are seven in number.

Luo in Revelation.

"Loosed us from our sins in His own blood." (i. 5).
"Loose the seals." "Loose the seven seals." (v. 2, 5).
"Loose the four angels." "The four angels were loosed." (ix. 14, 15).
"He must be loosed." "Satan shall be loosed." (xx. 3, 7).

Haima "blood" occurs seventeen times in the Revelation. Four references are to the blood of the Lamb. Thirteen to blood shed or sent in judgment. The four that interest us at the moment are:

"Loosed us from our sins in His own blood." (Rev. i. 5).
"Redeemed us to God . . . . . kings and priests." (v. 9).
"Washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." (vii. 14).
"They overcame by the blood of the Lamb." (xii. 11).

The references to blood that remain fall into two groups:

1. The call for vengeance.

> "Avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth." (Rev. vi. 10).
> "For they have shed the blood of saints and prophets, and Thou hast given them blood to drink; for they are worthy." (xvi. 6).
> "Drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus." (xvii. 6).
> "Avenged the blood of His servants at her hand." (xix. 2).
> "He was clothed with a vesture dipped in blood." (xix. 13).

2. The judgment by blood.

> "The moon became as blood." (Rev. vi. 12).
> "Hail and fire mingled with blood." (viii. 7).
> "Third part of the sea became blood." (viii. 8).
> "Power over waters to turn them to blood." (xi. 6).
> "Blood came out of the winepress." (xiv. 20).
> "The sea . . . . . became as the blood of a dead man." (xvi. 3).
> "Rivers and fountains . . . . . became blood." (xvi. 4).
> "And in her was found the blood of prophets and of saints, and of all that were slain upon the earth." (xviii. 24).

The recording and the reading of this list is nauseating, but the facts that are recorded will be horrible beyond description. And here again we add one more of the many correspondences which these studies are making with the book of Genesis, namely the solemn words of Gen. ix. 6:

> "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed", to which is added both the basic reason and another connexion with the Revelation:

> "For in the image of God made He man."

It is a solemn thing to know that it is possible to "blaspheme" our fellow-men who are made in the "image" of God (Titus iii. 2 and Rev. xiii. 6). Idolatry violates that glory conferred upon man as well as the glory of God Himself:

> "They . . . . . changed the glory of the uncorruptible God into an image made like unto corruptible man . . . . . who changed the truth of God into a lie (or 'exchanged the glory' for 'THE LIE'), and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, Who is blessed for ever. Amen" (Rom. i. 21-25).

This abandonment leads straight on with excessive abuse of the gift of sex, even as this same evil is seen to preponderate in the book of the Revelation. The worship of the Beast and of his IMAGE dethrones not only God, but man, and turns the whole direction of life toward "the lie", Satan's counterfeit. Because of this we read of "the wrath of God".

WRATH

The word orge (translated "wrath") occurs twelve times in Romans, and of these occurrences seven are found in the first great doctrinal division (Rom. i. 1 - v. 11). It is an important word, and seeing that it is placed in distinct relation to righteousness in Rom. i. 17, 18, it demands a prayerful study. We observe in the first place that "wrath" is used in the outer portion of Romans only. The word is not used in Rom. v. 12-viii. 39. The word "wrath" is not used of either Adam or of man seen in Adam. Judgment, condemnation and death there are, but unaccompanied by wrath. There is no wrath either in connexion with the lake of fire, or the great white throne in Rev. xx. All is calm, books are opened, every one is dealt with in pure justice. Wrath, anger, indignation, fury, these words are of a different category.

Many times do we read that the wrath or the anger of the Lord was "kindled", as in Exod. iv. 14, or of wrath "waxing hot", as in Exod. xxii. 24, or of His anger "smoking" (Psa. lxxiv. 1), and of it being poured out in "fury" (Isa. xlii. 25). The nature of the wrath of Rom. i. 18, and of the day of wrath with which it is connected (Rom. ii. 5), is discovered in the book of Revelation. Those upon whom this wrath is poured are the "nations", and the time is the time of the dead that they should be judged and rewarded (Rev. xi. 18; xix. 15). This wrath falls particularly upon Babylon (Rev. xvi. 19), and in direct connexion with its idolatry and uncleanness (Rev. xiv. 8-10); Babylon is in view in Rom. i. 18-32. There we see that Satanic system in all its naked horror; there we see the domination of darkness and the lie. In this section we read of those who by their deeds are "worthy of death", and who "have pleasure" in deeds of evil (Rom. i. 32). This section therefore is connected with wrath.

There is much to be learned by comparing I and II Thessalonians with this passage in Romans.

> "Wrath revealed from heaven" (Rom. i. 18).
> "The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven" (II Thess. i. 7).
>
> "When they knew God, they glorified Him not as God . . . . . They did not like to retain God in their knowledge" (Rom. i. 21, 28).
> "In flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God" (II Thess. i. 8).
>
> "They have pleasure in them that do them" (Rom. i. 32).
> "They had pleasure in unrighteousness" (II Thess. ii. 12).
>
> "The changed the truth of God into the lie" (Rom. i. 25).
> "They received not . . . . . the truth . . . . . the believe the lie" (II Thess. ii. 10, 11).
>
> "They changed the glory of God into an image made like to man" (Rom. i. 23).
> "The man of sin . . . . . showing himself that he is God" (II Thess. ii. 3, 4).
>
> "Wrath revealed . . . . . idolatry" (Rom. i. 18-25).
> "Ye turned to God from idols . . . . . saved from the wrath to come" (I Thess. i. 9, 10).
>
> "God also gave them up to uncleanness" (Rom. i. 24).
> "Not in the lust of concupiscence, even as the Gentiles which know not God" (I Thess. iv. 5).

If we also bring together the parallels that we find in the book of the Revelation, we shall have a full reference to that Satanic system of iniquity commenced at Babel, dominating the nations of the earth from that time onward until judged at the coming of the Lord in the day of wrath.

The reference in Rom. i. 19, 20 to the evidence of creation finds an echo in the Revelation.

So in the days when Babylon and its system shall be revived and in full power, the "everlasting gospel" will be preached, which gospel is nothing more nor less than a proclamation of the Lord as Creator:

> "Fear God, and give glory to Him; for the hour of His judgment is come: and worship Him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters. And there followed another angel, saying, Babylon is fallen, is fallen" (Rev. xiv. 7, 8).

There is a slight alteration in the words translated "change" in these verses in the A.V. of Rom. i. We have attempted to indicate the difference by using "change" and "exchange". First they changed the glory of God without actually giving up God altogether, but this soon led to the next step, for they exchanged the truth of God for the lie, and then worshipped and served the creature rather than the Creator. It is not possible for God to take second place. "Ye cannot serve God and mammon."

Into the third item we cannot go. The defiling character of idolatry may be gathered from its annals, and we do not feel that any good purpose would be served by elaborating this revolting subject here. At the same time we know only too well that human nature is not a whit better today than when it openly practiced the sins condemned in Rom. i. We need faithfully to warn the rising generation, speaking very tenderly and lovingly, yet nevertheless plainly, for Babylonianism in all its forms is rising like a flood, and the book of the Revelation reveals Rom. i. in a superlative degree. We need not go so far into the future as the book of Revelation, however, for II Tim. iii. 1-8 uses many of the words of Rom. i. to describe the perilous times at the close of this present dispensation. The sequence of the apostasy and its relation to the development of the mystery of iniquity, otherwise called "the lie", and the mystery of godliness, otherwise called "the truth", can be traced through Paul's epistles. Taking the statements of Rom. i. we find them worked out in the other epistles.

A comparison of the list of sins in Rom. i. with that of II Tim. iii. 1-7 will show how completely the parallel is recorded. The reader must supply further parallels by studying the intervening epistles.

(1) "As God." The creature more than the Creator.	"The man of sin . . . as God" (II Thess. ii. 3, 4).
(2) "The lie." "The truth.	"They received not the love of the truth . . . they believe the lie" (II Thess. ii. 10, 11).
(3) "Given up to an undiscerning mind.	"God shall send them strong delusion" (II Thess. ii. 11
(4) "Pleasure in them that do them."	"Had pleasure in unrighteousness" (II Thess. ii. 12).
(5) "Neither were thankful."	"God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth" (I Tim. iv. 3, 4).

Another feature that contributes to the build-up of the actual purpose that runs throughout the Revelation is the use of the title "Lamb", arnion. Apart from the one reference, John xxi. 15, "feed my lambs", the remaining 29 occurrences are all found in the Revelation. Although the first thought that comes into mind when we think of Christ as "The Lamb of God" is the One Who takes away the sin of the world, no such association is made in the Revelation. We read of "the wrath of the Lamb" and even of those who drink of the wrath of God . . . . . in the presence of the Lamb" (Rev. vi. 16; xiv. 10). We read of "the throne of the Lamb" and of "the marriage of the Lamb" and "the book of life of the Lamb" (Rev. xxi. 1; xix. 7; xiii. 8). We read of those who overcome by "the blood of the Lamb"; of those who are "firstfruits" unto God and to the Lamb, and of those who sing the song of Moses . . . . . and of the Lamb, with which the seven vials of wrath is associated (Rev. xii. 11; xiv. 4; xv. 3-8). The only time that redemption is associated with the Lamb is in Rev. v. 9 and xiv. 3, 4. At the opening of the sealed book by "the Lamb that had been slain" a new song was sung: "Thou wast slain and hast redeemed us (or them) to God by Thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation; and hast made us (or them) unto our God KINGS and PRIESTS: and we (they) SHALL REIGN ON (over) THE EARTH." Epi is translated "over" in Rev. ii. 26; 6:8; xiii. 7; xvi. 9 and xvii. 18. Another new song is recorded in Rev. xiv. 3, 4, where once more redemption is found.

"The hundred and forty and four thousand which were redeemed from the earth . . . . .
these were redeemed from among men, being the firstfruits unto God and to the Lamb."

These are exclusive and exceptional, but they are the only ones "redeemed" so far as this book is concerned. Redemption in the Evangelical sense, as deliverance from sin and issuing in forgiveness does not enter into the record. We come then once again to Rev. xx. 6. These "priests of God and of Christ" who "reign with Him" are not an earthly priesthood, they are heavenly, and minister and reign from their exalted position in the Heavenly Jerusalem. Heaven has its "Temple" (Rev. xi. 19; xv. 5, 6, 8), its "Ark" (Rev. xi. 19), its "Altar" (Rev. viii. 3), its "Incense" (Rev. viii. 3, 4) and consequently has a heavenly priesthood. The "overcomer" his suffering, his endurance, his deliverance and his reign as a priest with Christ in the heavenly Jerusalem, is the theme of the Apocalypse, and limits the use of the word The Millennium so much that every passage from either the Old or New Testament, which is labeled "Millennial" by countless commentators, must be challenged lest by a zeal without knowledge we rob the Millennium of its distinctive character and are found entertaining instead a vision of our own hearts. The "nations", the "camp" and the "beloved city" are of necessity on the earth during the Millennial reign, but have no such distinct place in it as do these overcomers. We must consider their place in another article. Meanwhile to any who may be disturbed or even angry, we still commend the Berean spirit "search and see", for you may never "see" if you avoid the "search".

No.3. The Nations and The Camp of the Saints.
pp. 64 - 68

We have postponed an examination of the terms "the nations", the "camp of the saints" and "the beloved city" which are mentioned in the Millennial chapter (Rev. xx.) until the present article. Psa. lxxii. is the prayer (1) of David for his son Solomon, and (2) in a fuller prophetic sense for His greater Son, the Lord Jesus Christ. Other features that David foresaw concerning this kingdom refer to the nations, as distinct from his own people Israel; His dominion is to be from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth. The kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents, the kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts, yea all kings shall fall down before Him; ALL NATIONS shall serve Him, ALL NATIONS shall call Him blessed.

As we have said already, we can only include such a prophetic foreview in the Millennium by inference, but as it is directly connected with the kingdom of David's Son, the inference appears to be justified. At some time God is to inherit ALL NATIONS (Psa. lxxxii. 8), and at some time ALL NATIONS shall come and worship before the Lord (Psa. lxxxvi. 9). ALL NATIONS will one day "flow unto" the house of the Lord, and He shall judge among the nations, so that nation shall not lift up sword against nation, nor learn war any more (Isa. ii. 1-4). In the day when the "lion shall eat straw like the ox" an ensign shall be set up for the nations (Isa. xi. 7-12). When the Lord of hosts shall REIGN in mount Zion, the moon shall be confounded and the sun ashamed, for He will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the vail spread over all nations, at the time when He will swallow up death in victory, and wipe away tears from off all faces (Isa. xxiv. 23; xxv. 7, 8). Similarly when the Redeemer comes to Zion, the words follow immediately:

> "Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee. For, behold, the darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people . . . . . the Gentiles shall come to thy light . . . . . the nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish" (Isa. lix. 20; lx. 1-12).

When Israel can be likened to a Bridegroom or a Bride, the Lord will cause His praise to spring forth before ALL the NATIONS (Isa. lxi. 10, 11). This will coincide with Israel becoming "priests of the Lord" (Isa. lxi. 6) and when Jerusalem shall be called Hephzi-bah "My delight is in her" (Isa. lxii. 4). ALL NATIONS and tongues shall come and see the glory of the Lord, and the chapter that contains this promise leads up to the "new heavens and the new earth" (Isa. lxvi. 22), which must be read together with Rev. xx. and xxi. At the close of the Revelation we read that the nations of them that are saved shall walk in the light of the heavenly Jerusalem, and the kings of the earth shall bring their glory and honour unto it, while the leaves of the tree of life shall be for the healing of the nations. "The nations" are mentioned but twice in Rev. xx., and in both references, they are related to the deception of Satan.

In a separate article we have dealt with Gog and Magog, but whether this can be included in this series, or whether it must wait for the publication of the Alphabetical Analysis, remains to be seen. Nations are most evidently on the earth during the Millennium, but it is not the purpose of Rev. xx. to develop this aspect of the subject; the ONLY specific passage dealing with the Millennium does not enlarge upon their place in that kingdom. On the contrary, it reserves ALL reference to "nations" to the climax act of rebellion at the close, which discrimination must be accepted as a Divine direction to our thoughts if we accept the inspiration of all Scripture.

The Camp of The Saints (Rev. xx. 9).

Does the word "camp" agree with a state of universal peace?

When we read in Rev. xx. 9 of "the camp of the saints", most of us have conjured up a vision of peaceful idyllic bliss, an extended "feast of Tabernacles" with all the accompaniments of perfect peace. When, however we put into practice that infallible rule of all true exegesis, speaking in words "which the Holy Ghost teacheth, comparing spiritual things with spiritual" instead of investing the words of Scripture with the colourings of our own theories, the conception that the Millennial kingdom is one of universal unqualified peace is rudely shattered. The Greek word (one of the words which the Holy Ghost teacheth) is parembole and in six out of ten occurrences it is translated "castles" (Acts xxi. 34, 37; xxii. 24; xxiii. 10, 16, 32). Here we have no peaceful idyllic camp, but a castle, with "soldiers and centurions", "captains and chains" and all the associations of military preparedness and iron strength. The word occurs three times in Hebrews. Once it is translated "armies" and twice "camp" (Heb. xi. 34; xiii. 11, 13).

When we turn to the Septuagint we discover that this Greek word is used to translate in the majority of cases the Hebrew machaneh, which meets us for the first time in Gen. xxxii. 2 where we read "This is God's host: and he called the name of that place Mahanaim". Here the LXX uses the Greek word parembole. Both Hebrew and Greek words are used in Exod. xiv. 9 and 24 of Pharaoh's army, with its horses and chariots. The book of Numbers devotes several chapters to the formation of the camp of Israel, and the words of Numb. i. 3 "all that are able to go forth to war in Israel" are repeated thirteen times over in that one chapter. This is "the camp" of Israel, a warlike disciplined company with the tabernacle and the ministering families in the midst (Numb. ii. 17). "Castle", "camp", "army", these are the three words which translate parembole in the N.T. The castle of the Romans, the army of aliens, the camp of the saints. The LXX uses the substantive parembole and the verb paremballo in Exod. xiv. 9 of the Egyptian "army" and of Israel's "encamping". The Levites were appointed to take charge over all the tabernacle and its vessels "and shall encamp round about the Tabernacle. And the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death" (Numb. i. 50, 51). Special instructions were given in case of war, for the sounding of trumpets that, "when ye blow an alarm, then the camps that lie on the east parts shall go forward" (Numb. x. 5-9). When Israel "pitched" (paremballo) near Moab, Balak, having seen what this "camp" had done to the Amorites, was sore afraid (Numb. xxii. 1-3). In Psa. xxvii. 3 David uses these words "camp" and "host" in correspondence with the rising up of "war".

Taking another great stride we find that the minor prophets still retain this warlike meaning.

> "And the Lord shall utter His voice before His ARMY: for His CAMP is very great" (Joel ii. 11).

This moreover is in connexion with signs in the heaven that place it in "the day of the Lord" (Joel ii. 20). Amos also knew that a "camp" could be associated with being "slain with the sword" (Amos iv. 10). Zech. xiv. speaks of the investment of Jerusalem "to battle", and a plague is sent upon all the people that have fought against Jerusalem . . . . . in these TENTS (Zech xiv. 1, 12, 15). From one end of the O.T. to the other, and in seven references out of ten in the N.T. "the camp" is associated with war, soldiers and armies.

It is impossible to ignore this for the sake of "private interpretation" when we come to the reference in Rev. xx. The moment we see that this is "so", our vision is cleared and we are enabled to see something else, for truth is one, and the clarifying of one passage illuminates others. Gog and Magog, the nations deceived by the Devil at the close of the Millennium, have one object before them: not conquest of territory but an attack upon the holy things of God. The revolt in Psa. ii. has nothing to do with politics, diplomacy, territory or defence of liberty, it is definitely directed "against the Lord, and against His Anointed". It is definitely directed against the "restraints" we see will characterize the closing week of Dan. ix. (see Millennial Studies).

> "Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us" (Psa. ii. 3).

There is no idea at this stage that any kings had been literally "bound in fetters" (Psa. cv. 22; cxlix. 8), the word translated "bands" means also "to bind" one's soul by an oath (Numb. xxx. 2), and in the language of the Gentile, it is translated "a decree" made by a king (Dan. vi. 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 15). Again, the "cords" against which these rulers and kings revolted, is the Hebrew word aboth, used of the "wreathen" work which bound the breastplate upon the heart of Israel's High Priest (Exod. xxviii. 14, 22, 24, 25). In Psa. cxviii. 27 these "cords" are used to bind the sacrifice to the horns of the altar. In Hos. xi. 4 it is used in the delightful expression "I drew them with cords of a man, with bands of love". The revolt of Psa. ii. was the revolt against holiness. These kings are exhorted to "serve the Lord with fear and to rejoice with trembling; to kiss the Son, lest He be angry, and they perish from the way, when His wrath is kindled but a little" (Psa. ii. 10-12).

Look at the wars that are recorded in the Revelation and note the object of their hostility:

> "These (i.e. the ten kings) shall make war with the LAMB" (Rev. xvii. 14).
> "There was war in heaven: Michael . . . . . and the dragon fought" (xii. 7).
> "The Dragon . . . . . went to make war with the remnant of her seed" (xii. 17).
> "The Beast . . . . . shall make war against them (i.e. the two witnesses)" (xi. 7).
> "It was given unto him (the Beast) to make war with the saints" (xiii. 7).

And when Gog and Magog are gathered together "to battle" or "to make war" (same word), the objective is still one and the same, "the camp of the saints". Thus the "Holy city shall be trodden under foot for forty and two months (i.e. the 3½ years, the midst of the week of Dan. ix.)". The strange words of Rev. xxii. 11 present a solemn choice in that day, "He that is filthy . . . . . he that is holy", for these are THE issues at stake, headed by the Lamb on the one hand and by the Dragon on the other. The immediate destruction by fire from heaven and the devouring instantly of the enemies of holiness, is but the climax of a series of such exhibitions of Divine wrath. We have already quoted the general statement that any unauthorized person who drew near the sacred tabernacle was punished by death, but there are instances where this death came about by direct fire from heaven. The judgment of fire from heaven and from the Lord, seem to be reserved in the O.T. for sins of sacrilege, false worship or extreme wickedness. The judgment upon Nadab and Abihu is an example of sacrilege:

> "And there went out fire from the Lord, and devoured them" (Lev. x. 2).

The cities of Sodom and Gomorrha are set forth as an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire (Jude 7). The conflict between the prophets of Baal and the prophet Elijah illustrates the third class.

> "Call ye on the name of your gods, and I will call on the name of the Lord: and the God that answereth by fire, let Him be God" (I Kings xviii. 24).

And examination of Psa. xcvii. is illuminating in this context:

1st. "The Lord reigneth."

2nd. While the earth is called to rejoice.
3rd. A fire goeth before Him, and burneth up His enemies round about Him. So that there will be such enemies in the Millennium which will be set up at His coming.
4th. The hills will melt like wax at His Presence.
5th. This fiery judgment is related to the worship of graven images.
6th. The words of xcvii. 7 "worship Him, all ye gods" are cited in Heb. i. 6.

> "And when He again bringeth (margin) in the firstborn into the world He saith, And let all the angels of God worship Him."

It should be noted here that the "world" here is the Greek oikoumene and this leads us to Heb. ii. 5:

> "For unto the angels hath He not put in subjection the world (oikoumene) to come, whereof we speak."

Here once more we reach the crucial point. The rebellion at the end of the Millennium which is cut short by fire from heaven is of the same character as those that have preceded it, a definite, idolatrous rejection of the supremacy of "The Lamb". The first example (Lev. x. 2) and the last (Rev. xx. 10) are much alike in their wording:

Rev. xx. 10 Pur apo tou theou . . . . . kai kataphegen autous.
Lev. x. 2 Pur para kuriou, kai katephagen autous.

The words "the camp of the saints" are followed by "and the beloved city" but these two descriptions may refer to the same thing, the conjunction kai being sometimes translated "even". "Even he is the eighth" (Rev. xvii. 11); "even as she rewarded" (Rev. xviii. 6); "even so come" (Rev. xxii. 20). The "camp" or "army" of the saints would have defended the beloved city, even as the camp of Israel in the wilderness defended the Tabernacle and its holy vessels. Again we ask, if these things are so, then the Millennium is a period of blessing for Israel, but is by no means a period of universal peace. That comes in the succeeding "Day of God".

No.4. WHITE, its usage in the Apocalypse.
pp. 104 - 107

The words of repentant David "Wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow" (Psa. li. 7), have seized the mind, and entered into the preaching of the gospel during all times. In the book of the Revelation, the only gospel that is preached (so far as the record goes) contains no reference to Christ, His finished work or to faith (Rev. xiv. 6, 7), and if preached to-day would merit the anathema of Gal. i. 8. The words translated righteousness (dikaios, dikaiosuen, dikaios and dikaioma), refer either to judgment (Rev. xv. 3,4; xvi. 5, 7; xix. 2), war (Rev. xix. 11), or the personal righteousness of saints (Rev. xix. 8; xxii. 11). The evangelical concept of justification by faith is nowhere seen or spoken of in the book of Revelation.

We have examined every reference to the phrase "the blood of the Lamb", and to the shedding of blood generally, but out of all the references, the only one that speaks of deliverance from sin is that of Rev. i. 5 and this is discussed in an article yet to be published . . . . . where its connexion is seen to be not with the average sinner but with a peculiar company, "kings and priests", who play so important a part in the outworking of its prophetic import. Two quotations call for insertion in this article:

> "They made them WHITE in the blood of the Lamb" (Rev. vii. 14).
> "They OVERCAME him by the blood of the Lamb" (Rev. xii. 11).

These two passages are related. Those who wash their robes and make them WHITE are those who come out of great tribulation. Those who OVERCAME, do so by the same blood of the Lamb, and under enormous pressure. Both companies are martyrs. When this company is complete, it is likened to a Bride prepared for her husband:

> "And to her was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white: for the fine linen is the righteousness of saints" (Rev. xix. 8).

The usage of the word translated "arrayed" links the Bridal company with the overcomers, as will be seen from the following list of occurrences of periballo:

> "He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment" (Rev. iii. 5).
> "I counsel thee to buy of Me . . . . . white raiment, that thou mayest be clothed" (Justification is by faith and cannot be "bought") (Rev. iii. 18).
> "A great multitude . . . . . clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands" (Rev. vii. 9).
> "What are these which are arrayed in white robes?" (Rev. vii. 13).
> "She should be arrayed fine linen, clean and white" (Rev. xix. 8).
> "And He was clothed with a vesture dipped in blood" (Rev. xix. 13).

In the days of the outpouring of the vials, a blessing is pronounced upon him that watcheth "and keepeth his garments" (Rev. xvi. 15), a reference back to Rev. iii. 5 & 18. The same Greek word himation is used of the Overcoming King of kings (Rev. xix.16) and His Vesture also was "dipped in blood" even as were those of the suffering overcomers. The evidence is accumulative and overwhelming, that the OVERCOMER is the key to the Revelation, and to the essential character of the Millennium.

The word mostly translated "white" in the Revelation is the Greek leukos, but in two references (Rev. xv. 6 and xix. 8), the word is lampros translated elsewhere by "gorgeous", "bright", "goodly", "gay" and "clear" (Luke xxiii. 11; Acts x. 30; James ii. 2, 3; Rev. xxii. 1). The usage of the word "white" in the Revelation suggests a threefold subdivision:

1. The Lord Himself. 2. The Overcomers. 3. Judgment.

(1) The Lord Himself. First as King-Priest. Then as King of kings (Rev. i. 14; xix. 11). The three descriptions of the Transfiguration refer to the opening vision of Rev. i.:

> "He was transfigured before them; and His face did shine as the sun, and His raiment was white as the light" (Matt. xvii. 2).
>
> "His raiment became shining, exceeding white as snow; so as no fuller on earth can white them" (Mark ix. 3).
>
> "The fashion of His countenance was altered, and His raiment was white and glistering" (Luke ix. 29).

White as light, white as snow, white as lightning. Peter tells us that on that mountain he, with James and John, were eye-witnesses of His Majesty, and that the prophecy of the Second Coming was made even "more sure". At the Second Coming, He Who is called Faithful and True is seen coming out of heaven seated upon a white horse, and coming in righteousness to judge and make war. Any interpretation that evades, ignores or minimizes this express statement of Scripture must necessarily be rejected by all who love and believe the Word.

The words "judge and make war" are expanded in xix. 15 where we have such adjuncts of discipline and extreme severity as "a sharp sword", "smite the nations", "rule them with a rod of iron", "tread the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God". There is no exegetical necessity or justification in dividing Rev. xix. 21 from Rev. xx. 1. The dealing with the beast and the false prophet, the slaying of the remnant, and the binding of Satan are all leading up to the Millennial reign, which at its conclusion finds enough insubordination to justify the terms "Gog and Magog", "the sand of the sea" and destruction by "fire" from God out of heaven.

The white horse of Rev. vi. 2 under the opening of the first seal, is Satan's travesty of Christ. This rider is not followed by the armies of heaven, faithful and true, but by war, famine, pestilence, death, martyrdom and the wrath of the Lamb.

(2) The Overcomer.

> "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it" (Rev. ii. 17).

The High Priest of Israel, who entered the Holiest of all once a year, never lifted the Mercy Seat or ate from the golden pot of manna that was hidden beneath it. These "Priests" of God and of Christ do. The white stone bears a "new name" which is one of several references to a similar honour. In Rev. iii. 12, the overcomer is honoured by having the name of God, the name of the city, and a "new name" written upon him. All this in direct contrast with Mystery Babylon, that had her awful name written upon her forehead (Rev. xvii. 5) and in contrast with those who had "the name of the beast, or the number of his name" (Rev. xiii. 17). Immediately following this awful branding come the words:

> "Lo, a Lamb . . . . . with Him an hundred and forty and four thousand, having His Father's name written in their foreheads" (Rev. xiv. 1).

Just as no one knew the name on the white stone, saving he that received it, so no man could learn the new song sung by this company, but such as had been "redeemed from the earth". And lastly, Rev. ii. 17 links these overcomers with the Lord in His Coming, for He too "had a name written, that no man knew, but He Himself" (Rev. xix. 12). To the overcomer in Sardis, the Lord promised, that "they shall walk with Me in white: for they are worthy". "The same shall be clothed in white raiment" (Rev. iii. 4, 5).

How it can possibly be congruous to add to such "And I will not blot out his name out of the book of life" is dealt with in the article entitled "The Book of Life", which should be consulted. We find that this links up with Rev. xx. 6, where "priests of God and of Christ" are assured that "on such the second death hath no power", again a subject that has been discussed in the article referred to above. That these "white raiments" are not symbols of salvation by grace through faith, is manifest by the terms of the next reference:

> "I counsel thee TO BUY of Me . . . . . white raiment" (Rev. iii. 18).

The gold that is offered also is that which has been "tried in the fire" which Peter associates with "manifold temptations" but which will be found with praise and honour at the APOCALYPSE of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 7). Moreover the purpose of Rev. iii. 18 is expanded and explained in verse nineteen "As many as I love, I rebuke and chasten".

In Rev. vi. 11 "white robes" were given to the martyrs who had been slain for the word of God, and for their testimony. This is a plain indication as to what "white robes" and "white raiment" symbolize in this book. The fellow servants who were yet to suffer must include those described in Rev. xx. 4. The wearers of the white robes in Rev. vii. 13, 14 are those that came out of great tribulation "and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb". No one can wash robes in blood to make them white. These symbols of overcoming martyrdom are linked with the Great Overcomer, "A Lamb as it had been slain" (Rev. v. 5, 6), and the words of Rev. vii. 14 should never be used in an evangelical sense, or in a gospel hymn; such usage is a negation of the terms of the Gospel, and a beclouding of the meaning of Rev. vii. In like manner, these overcomers are linked with "the armies" of heaven which follow the Lamb upon "white horses", who are also clothed in fine linen "white and clean".

(3) Judgment and War.

The vision of the Son of Man upon a white cloud, having in His hand a sharp sickle (Rev. xiv. 14) is no reference to a peaceful and happy harvesting of the redeemed. The grapes thus gathered were "cast into the great winepress of the wrath of God" (Rev. xiv. 19).

Finally, the Throne of Judgment after the close of the Millennium, which is for "the rest" of the dead who were not counted worthy to be numbered with the "first resurrection", that throne is defined as being "white" (Rev. xx. 11). There are many references to a throne in the Revelation (thronos occurs 46 times), but no colour or description is given to forty-five of these references. The fact that the throne of Rev. xx. 11 is defined as "white" definitely links it with the "rest of the dead" who failed to "overcome". (See other articles under the covering title "Millennial Studies" for further proofs and exposition of this and kindred themes.)

Here again we pause. The testimony of the employment of "white" in the Apocalypse ranges with and supplements a great number of other features that testify with one voice, that the Millennium is pre-eminently the sphere in which the martyrs who suffer during the Antichristian oppression will "live and reign with Christ a thousand years". All theories concerning the Millennium must line up with the positive teaching of the Apocalypse, all theories that ignore or belittle such testimony must be repudiated by all who love and honour the Scriptures as the Word of Truth. Rev. xx. 1-10 is the only sure starting point for studying the meaning and character of the Millennial kingdom. Many prophecies, hitherto forced into that kingdom, may belong to the succeeding Day of God (II Pet. iii. 12) which is scarcely touched upon in the Apocalypse.

What John said concerning the earthly ministry of the Son of God in his gospel, namely:

> "There are also many other things which Jesus did, the which, if they should be written everyone, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written" (John xxi. 25), could be said of the fulfillment of O.T. prophecy. The visions of the Apocalypse are as much selected, as were the eight signs of the gospel of John.

The prophecies of the O.T. have a focus, a gathering point, and this is sufficiently definite to ensure that the student who observes their limits and the items that converge at the time of the end, will have a sufficient guide and chart to the outworking of prophecy, until faith merges into sight and the day dawns, and shadows flee away.

No.5. THE HEAVENLY JERUSALEM.
pp. 124 - 127

In the epistle to the Galatians "Jerusalem" is mentioned five times. Three of these occurrences refer to Jerusalem, the literal city on earth to which Paul went to see Peter (Gal. i. 17, 18; ii. 1). In the allegory of Gal. iv., Sinai in Arabia answers to Jerusalem "which now is", but those who form the unity expressed in Gal. iii. 28, 29 belong to "Jerusalem which is above" (Gal. iv. 26). There can be no doubt as to the intention of that word "above" which translates the Greek word ano: "filled up to the brim" (John ii. 7); "beneath . . . . . above" (John viii. 23). "In heaven above . . . . . in earth beneath" (Acts ii. 19), are some examples. When we are exhorted to set our affections on things above, we are also told that such things are (1) not on the earth, but that (2) they are where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God (Col. iii. 1, 2). Jerusalem which is "above" therefore is in contrast with Jerusalem which is on the earth. It is not only heavenly in character, it is also heavenly in situation. When this city is mentioned in Revelation, it is called:

> "New Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God" (Rev. iii. 12).

This feature is repeated in chapter xxi. 2 and 10:

> "And I John saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven."
> "And He carried me away in the spirit to a great and high mountain, and shewed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God."

For the moment we leave the question as to when this city descends, and consider the place that it occupies in the epistle to the Hebrews, the only other portion of the N.T. that speaks of it. This is found in Heb. xii. 22 where we read:

> "But ye are come unto mount Sion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem."

This, as in Gal. iv., is in contrast with Mount Sinai. This city is moreover inhabited by an innumerable company of angels, and angels, while they visited the earth on missions of blessing or judgment, are designated as "the angels of heaven" in the Scriptures. In Heb. xi. we see how the vision of this city influenced Abraham, for it is written:

> "These all died in faith . . . . . and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth . . . . . they seek a country . . . . . they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly . . . . . God . . . . . hath prepared for them a city" (Heb. xi. 13-16).

For this, Abraham was willing to be a tent dweller, "for he looked for a city which hath (the) foundations, whose builder and maker is God" (Heb. xi. 9, 10). We learn from Isaiah that when God calls Israel to Himself as a woman forsaken, as a wife of youth when refused, who for a little time had been under the cloud of wrath, and under the hiding of His face, He declares:

> "I will lay thy stones with fair colours, and lay thy foundations with sapphires. And I will make thy windows of agates, and thy gates of carbuncles and all thy borders of pleasant stones" (Isa. liv. 11, 12).

Here, this city is seen to be an earthly reflection of the heavenly Jerusalem, but must not be confused with it. One feature alone shows that the two cities are distinct, the gates of the one are of carbuncles, the gates of the heavenly Jerusalem were "every several gate of one pearl" (Rev. xxi. 21). Consequently there can be no confusing of these two cities, beautiful as they both will be. The city of Isa. liv. may be invested by an enemy, and the promise is that no weapon that is formed against it shall prosper (Isa. liv. 15-17), but there is no thought in the Apocalypse that the heavenly Jerusalem will ever be, or ever could be thus threatened. The city that Abraham looked for cannot be the city of Isa. liv., it must have been the city of Rev. xxi. and xxii.

Some difficulty may be experienced by the reader when he reads the dimensions of the heavenly Jerusalem, given in Rev. xxi. 16:

> "And the city lieth foursquare, and the length is as large as the breadth: and he measured the city with the reed, twelve thousand furlongs. The length and the breadth and the height of it are equal."

Commenting on this verse, and the problem that arises, Dr. Bullinger wrote in his Apocalypse "In this case the city will be 1,500 miles high" and, referring to another system of measurement, says "Is 375 miles high easier to believe than 1,500?" We know that great changes will take place not only in the Holy land but in the earth at large, and so a city of these vast proportions, set in the centre of a world in which there was "no more sea", need not be disproportionate. However, an article in The Faith suggested that 12,000 furlongs refer to the area of the square base, and the square root of 12,000 is 109, which, taking the stadium to be 582 feet (see Twentieth Century Dictionary), gives about 12 MILES for the length of one of the square sides. By comparing this with Ezek. xlviii. 35, and 18,000 measures or reeds of 6 cubits would give us, with 25 inches to a cubit, a circumference of 46 miles. This, when divided by four, gives 11 miles for one side and so is practically identical with the suggested measurement given above, and means, if it be true, that the heavenly Jerusalem would descend and rest upon the basis formed by the restored Jerusalem on earth. A city 12 miles square is a reasonable proportion, and 12 miles in height could symbolize world-wide dominion, 12 denoting Governmental perfection.

However, we are perfectly sure that when the day of fulfillment comes, there will be perfect harmony between the event and the prophetic record. Whatever the size the city may be, it will perfectly fulfil the purpose for which it was prepared. It will be the jeweled centre of the new earth.

We return now to the question, when will the New Jerusalem descend? When the New Jerusalem descends from heaven, there will be:

"No more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain: FOR THE FORMER THINGS ARE PASSED AWAY" (Rev. xxi. 4).

"He that sat upon the throne said, Behold I make ALL THINGS NEW" (Rev. xxi. 5).

The arrangement of the material of Rev. xxi. 1-5 is as follows:

A | a | 1. NEW. Heaven and Earth.
b | 1. FORMER. He prote. Pass away.
c | 1. NO MORE. Sea (ref. to Gen. i. 2).
B | 2. I SAW. New Jerusalem.
B | 3. I HEARD. Tabernacle.
A | c | 4. NO MORE. Death, sorrow, pain (ref. to Gen. iii.).
b | 4. FORMER ta prota. Pass away.
a | 5. NEW. All things.

This Tabernacle is the New Jerusalem, and unlike the tabernacle in the wilderness which was limited to "Israel", this is now "with MEN", anthropos. The resplendent tent, made after the pattern shown to Moses in the mount, foreshadowed this bejeweled city not in a wilderness, nor limited to Israel, nor temporary as a tent, but when all families of the new earth shall ultimately be brought into blessing. The New Jerusalem evidently descends from heaven to rest upon the New Earth. During the Millennium therefore it must have been in the heavens. This raises another question. Do those who are destined to walk its golden streets enter into their inheritance:

(1) At the commencement of the Millennial reign, or
(2) Do they have to wait until the 1000 years are finished, if so
(3) Are they not raised from the dead until the 1000 years are finished, or
(4) Where are they during that time?

The overcomer, among other things, is to be made:

(1) A pillar in the temple of God.
(2) He is to have written upon him, the name of God, and the name of the city of God, New Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from God.
(3) The overcomer begins his reign with Christ at the commencement of the 1000 years (Rev. xx. 4, 5).

From other Scriptures we gather that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob will sit down in the kingdom of heaven, and the reference to the "east and west" shows that this refers to the earth (Matt. viii. 11), yet Abraham looked for a heavenly, not an earthly country or city, and God has prepared for him "a city" (Heb. xi. 16). We also learn that "in the regeneration" the apostles shall sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, presumably on the earth, while all the time we read that the foundations of the heavenly city were made up of twelve precious stones, bearing the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb (Rev. xxi. 14, 19-20). Moreover, the gates are twelve and bear the names of the twelve tribes of Israel, yet the twelve tribes as such will inherit the land as Ezek. xlviii. reveals, and not the heavenly city, for that is reserved for the overcomer.

It is evident therefore that the overcomer will enter the New Jerusalem while it is still in heaven, and will reign and rule over the earth, with that city as the seat of authority, even as the Satanic counterfeit reigned over people, multitudes, nations and tongues in the mock Pre-Millennial kingdom of the Beast. When the Millennium closes, and the Day of God succeeds the Day of the Lord, the earth will then receive this resplendent city, and the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it, and the kings of the earth will bring their glory and honour unto it. What Jerusalem on the earth during the Millennium partly accomplished (for feigned obedience, and the rise of Gog and Magog indicate that the influence of Jerusalem was not universally complete), the Heavenly Jerusalem will. It is this kingdom which is envisaged in I Cor. xv. 24-28 which will ultimately be delivered up to God, even the Father, the goal of the ages be attained, and "eternity" (for the want of a better word) begins.

No.6. THE EVE OF THE MILLENNIUM.
pp. 145 - 148

The intense desire for peace on earth and good will toward men which is one of the deepest yearnings of the individual, but alas is so regularly frustrated by the clash of national interests, leads the mind of the believer to dwell on such a passage as Isa. ii. 4 with great joy, but seems to have made many turn a blind eye to such a passage as Joel iii. 9, 10. Let us place them together and consider their import:

> "They shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more" (Isa. ii. 4).
> "Proclaim ye this among the Gentiles; Prepare war, wake up the mighty men, let all the men of war draw near; let them come up: beat your plowshares into swords, and your pruninghooks into spears" (Joel iii. 9, 10).

The passage from Isaiah speaks of the Millennial day, when the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, but the passage in Joel deals with days that precede "the great and terrible day of the Lord" (Joel ii. 31). In both Joel ii. 30, 31 and iii. 15 the sun shall be turned into darkness, showing that both chapters deal with the same period, namely the very eve of the Millennium. The special feature that calls for fuller consideration is this. The call to beat plowshares into swords, suggests that before this there had been a mock millennium, where the nations of the earth either by intimidation or deception, or both, had beaten their swords into plowshares, and concluded that war had ceased in the earth for ever. Many of those who read these lines have lived through periods of war that were to end war. They have heard of conferences for disarmament and hoped that they would succeed. Such yearnings are natural and right, but they may be ill-timed and if so doomed to failure. Two words sum up the condition aimed at, "peace and safety". Yet we read that at the very time that the day of the Lord comes as a thief in the night, sudden destruction overtakes those whose slogan will be these very words "peace and safety", and they shall not escape (I Thess. v. 2, 3).

This "peace and safety" is therefore spurious; it is not of God, therefore it must be the false travesty of the Devil, there is no other alternative. A false peace can destroy (see Dan. viii. 25). At the rise of the world's last dictator (Rev. xiii.), war will temporarily cease, not because of the conversion of all mankind by grace, but the paralysis of all nations by fear.

> "Who is like unto the beast? Who is able to make war with him?" (Rev. xiii. 4).

The figure "beating swords into plowshares" indicates a turn over to the more peaceful employment of labour and resources, which, for a time at least will bring prosperity, "peace and safety". It should be remembered that the chief aim of Satan is to dethrone the Son of God. He, Satan, must deplore that crime and degradation ever follow his efforts to rule this world. If he could have a Millennium without Christ it would suit his plan completely. After six thousand years of blood and misery, Satan will appear to have attained his goal, but the record reveals its utter failure, it lasts "one hour" (Rev. xvii. 12; xviii. 10, 17, 19). Some light upon the extraordinary prosperity that shall characterize this pre-millennial travesty of Satan is found in the description of Babylon's merchandise.

> "The merchandise of gold, and silver, and precious stones, and of pearls, and fine linen, and purple, and silk, and scarlet, and all thine wood, and all manner vessels of ivory, and all manner vessels of most precious wood, and of brass, and iron, and marble, and cinnamon, and odours, and ointments, and frankincense, and wine, and oil, and fine flour, and wheat, and beasts, and sheep, and horses, and chariots, and slaves (Gk. bodies), and souls of men" (Rev. xviii. 12, 13).

Here is a luxury trade, mingled with provision for idolatrous practices giving prominence to "costliness" (Rev. xviii. 19), and including not only costly goods but "the bodies and souls of men". A pre-millennial kingdom in the absence of Christ is the dream and the goal of the Enemy of Truth. For a brief period he will attain a superficial semblance to that goal, and then, at a later date, will himself be brought to an ignominious end "and never be any more" (Ezek. xxviii. 19). Satan did not hesitate to attempt a bargain with the Son of God (Matt. iv. 9) and what He, the Blessed One, refused, will prove the bait to catch the Man of Sin (John v. 43). As a travesty of the Mystery of godliness, wherein "God was manifest in the flesh" this son of perdition will oppose and exalt himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; "so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God" (II Thess. ii. 4).

To the end his activities are in the realm of religion and worship, but he, Satan, cannot prevent the crimes that are concomitant, though he may deplore them. Worship, not wickedness is ever in the mind of Satan. Preposterous as it sounds "all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them" were offered to the Son of God for ONE ACT OF WORSHIP (Matt. iv. 9), so much does Satan seek it. The immediate effect of the rise of the Beast of Rev. xiii. is the temporary attainment of this very same end:

> "And they worshipped the dragon which gave power unto the beast: and they worshipped the beast . . . . . and causeth the earth and them which dwell therein to worship the first beast, whose deadly wound was healed . . . . . as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed" (Rev. xiii. 4, 12, 15).

Here is a kingdom and worship which is universal "all that dwell on the earth". It will being "peace and safety" and a standard of living that can only be described as luxurious. War will have ceased. Swords will have been beaten into plowshares, so that at the end when war is again "prepared" or as the word is literally "sanctified" (Joel iii. 9 margin), the nations of the earth who have lived in this pre-millennial travesty of the Truth, will have to start all over again to "beat" their "plowshares into swords". The reference in Joel iii. to the valley of Jehoshaphat (Joel iii. 12) turns us back to a typical incident in Israel's history as recorded in II Chron. xx. Moab, Ammon and others came against Jehoshaphat to battle. Jehoshaphat, all Judah with their little ones, their wives and their children, stood before the Lord in prayer. In answer to their petition a message was sent to them:

> "Be not afraid nor dismayed by reason of this great multitude; for the battle is not yours, but God's" (II Chron. xx. 15).

There was no need to fight in that battle; all that the people had to do was to set themselves or take their stations. "Stand ye still, and see the salvation of the Lord" (verse 17).

> "So the realm of Jehoshaphat was quiet: for his God gave him rest round about" (II Chron. xx. 30).

Jehoshaphat, like David, Solomon and the best of men, was in himself a failure (see II Chron. xx. 31-37) but the type still holds. Just as Edom said concerning Jerusalem "Rase it, rase it, even to the foundation thereof" (Psa. cxxxvii. 7), so will the nations at the time of the end. Indeed, almost identical words have been reported in the Press recently. The presence of Israel in the Devil's millennium will prove a great disturbance to the false peace that for the time obtains and so all nations will be gathered against Jerusalem to battle. As in the day of Jehoshaphat, so they will gather again. "Then shall the Lord go forth, and fight against those nations, as when He fought in the day of battle. And His feet shall stand in that day upon the mount of Olives" (Zech. xiv. 3, 4). It is this way upon Jerusalem and Israel that necessitates beating plowshares back again to swords, and which ends with the judgment of all the heathen in the "valley of decision". In that day "Egypt shall be a desolation, and Edom shall be a desolate wilderness, for the violence against the children of Judah . . . . . but Judah shall DWELL FOR EVER, and Jerusalem from generation to generation. For I will cleanse their blood that I have not cleansed: even I the Lord that dwelleth in Zion" (Joel iii. 18-21 margin). Here is proof that at the self same time that Israel are restored (Joel iii. 1) the nations will be gathered unto this valley of Jehoshaphat (Joel iii. 2), that at the self same time when Judah and Jerusalem are safe for ever, Egypt shall be desolation. Yet after all this, Isaiah declares that:

> "In that day shall Israel be the third with Egypt and with Assyria, even a blessing in the midst of the land: whom the Lord of Hosts shall bless, saying, Blessed be Egypt My people, and Assyria the work of My hands, and Israel Mine inheritance" (Isa. xix. 24, 25). (see for a fuller examination of Isa. xix., the booklet "Egypt".)

It is an axiom of all rational thought that "a thing cannot both BE, and NOT BE at the same time". "In that day" includes too many opposite events to allow us to think of the Millennium as a period of unsullied glory and perfect peace from the beginning of the thousand years to the end. What does fit all that is said, is that Israel will be a nation "born at once" (Isa. lxvi. 8), whereas gross darkness will still envelop most of the nations. Nevertheless, light and truth shall radiate from Zion as a blessed centre, until at last the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea. God's ordination at the beginning was that "the evening and the morning" should constitute a day. A thousand years in his sight are like a day that is past, and the Millennial day may conform to the same pattern. The Millennial reign begins with an "evening". When the Lord comes the second time to inaugurate that reign, He comes to MAKE WAR at the first (Rev. xix. 11). There is not a word to warrant the idea that at the stroke of the clock, the moment the thousand years commence, all will be peace. The Lord will reign in Zion in the midst of enemies. The nations will learn slowly the law of the Lord from Jerusalem, and only as the thousand years (the day of the Lord) come to their close, and the Day of God succeeds, when all delegated authority shall be under the feet of the Son of God, will that kingdom be at length perfected and ready for the Day of the Age, the goal of all purpose and prophecy, that God may be all in all (I Cor. xv. 28).

It is right for us to look eagerly for that blessed consummation, but it is also right to be on our guard, lest over eagerness should lay us open to the deception of the Devil, and we be found pointing the Lord's people to a travesty of truth, with all its accompanying misery and disillusionment. We make no claim to a complete understanding of the teaching of prophecy, but what we do claim to have done is to insist that all that is written, and not selected passages, is the only safe foundation upon which to build whether for our individual salvation, or for a true appreciation of the Millennial reign and the ultimate goal of the ages.

No.7. The Lake of Fire, and the Millennium.
pp. 164 - 173

Why a "lake" of fire? Of the commentators we have consulted, none make any reference to this particular word, its meaning and the reason for its use. The Greek word translated "lake" is limne. Parkhurst says that the word indicates a lake of standing water, as opposed to a running stream, and is so called from lian menein "remaining very quiet"; so the Latin, stagnum, a pool. Schrevelius reads limne, a port, harbour, haven, station, refuge, accusative limena; as if lian menei, because there the ships rest in safety; hence limenarches, a harbour master. Limne occurs in the LXX in Psa. cvii. 30 "haven"; Psa. cvii. 35, cxiv. 8 "a standing water"; Song of Sol. "fish pool" (vii. 4). The word occurs in the N.T. ten times and is always translated "lake". Apart from the five references in the Revelation, the remainder occur in Luke v. 1, 2; viii. 22, 23, 33, the lake of Gennesaret, elsewhere called the Sea of Galilee, and the sea and lake of Tiberias, and in the O.T., the sea of Chinnereth.

In Luke viii. 22, 23 "the lake" is associated (1) with the storm that threatened the lives of the disciples, and which the Saviour "rebuked", and the place where the swine, possessed of demons, were choked. In every place a lake of water is intended, which makes it strange that a "lake of standing water, a haven, and a harbour" should burn with "fire and brimstone". There is only one other set of references that may have some bearing, and these are found in the Apocrypha.

Difficult as it may be for us to understand, at the sounding of the sixth trumpet, four angels are let loose, which had been bound in the great river Euphrates (Rev. ix. 14). How could angels be held by a river? In the article entitled "The Bottomless Pit" we show the connexion that exists in Scripture between "The Abyss", "The Sea" and "The Deep" of Gen. i. 2. That connexion must be kept in mind here. In the 2nd book of the Maccabees, xii. 1-9 we have the following record:

> "The men of Joppe also did such an ungodly deed: they prayed the Jews that dwelt among them to go with their wives and children into the boats which they had prepared, as though they meant them no hurt, who accepted of it according to the common decree of the city as being desirous to live in peace, and suspecting nothing: but when they were gone forth into the deep, they drowned no less than two hundred of them.
> When Judas heard of this cruelty done unto his countrymen, he commanded those that were with him to make them ready. And calling upon God the righteous Judge, he came against those murderers of his brethren, and burnt the haven ("lake") by night, and set the boats on fire, and those that fled thither (or from the fire) he slew . . . . . But when he heard that the Jamnites were minded to do in like manner . . . . . he came . . . . . and set fire on the haven and navy, so that the light of the fire was seen at Jerusalem two hundred and forty furlongs off."

We Gentiles have never had impressed upon our hearts, minds and memory the exploits of the Maccabees. Were we to have had a revelation written especially for English speaking people, it might use a mixture of figures; it might speak of a fat boy carved in stone, a monument built by Sir Christopher Wren, and refer to Pudding, Pie, and the sin of gluttony; but it is very unlikely that a Chinese reader, or come to that, some readers nearer home, would make sense of this oblique reference to the great fire of London! So, the essentially Hebrew atmosphere of the book of the Revelation not only draws freely upon O.T. imagery, but contains allusion to uncanonical or traditional happenings that may never find a place in a respectable commentary written for English readers. It may be that this "lake" of fire, before the judgment of that day, had been a "haven" for those evil beings, the Beast and the False Prophet, and it had been "prepared for the Devil and his angels" as the place of their final destruction. Nothing definite can be adduced from what we have presented, but we have at least given the term employed something more than a casual glance.

We have devoted some attention to the promise to the overcomer, that such would not have their names blotted out of the book of life. We must now devote some attention to the parallel promise given to the overcomer in the church of Smyrna "He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death", and this second death, together with the book of life and the lake of fire, figures prominently in the judgment of the Great White Throne

(Rev. xx. 11-15). The choice of the word "hurt" by the A.V. translators may have been influenced by such passages as:

> "Lo, I see four men loose, walking in the midst of the fire, and they have no hurt" (Dan. iii. 25).
>
> "So Daniel was taken up out of the den, and no manner of hurt was found upon him" (Dan. vi. 23).

In contrast with the three who were not "hurt" in the furnace is the fate of the men who stoked the fire (Dan. iii. 22) and in contrast with Daniel, is the fate of those who accused him (Dan. vi. 24). The word translated "hurt" in Rev. ii. 11 is adikeo, which is so rendered in eight other passages in the Apocalypse, and twice translated "unjust" in Rev. xxii. 11. The overcomer in Smyrna, being a believer, had no need to be told that he would not be CAST INTO the lake of fire, but that he should not be HURT by it, a different matter altogether. From what we have already seen, it will be recognized that some wider survey of the references to "fire" and its implications is called for. Matt. v. 22 coming in the Sermon on the Mount, has reference to disciples and not to the ungodly outside world. It is set in a form of progression, the penalty keeping pace with the offence thus:

> "Whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause, shall be in danger of
> THE JUDGMENT: and > Whosoever shall say to his brother Raca, shall be in danger of
> THE COUNCIL: but > Whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of > HELL FIRE."

The "Council" here is the Sanhedrin. Raca is a word like "empty-head", "Hell fire" here is Gehenna.

> "But what was there more grievous in the word 'fool' than in the word 'Raca'? Let King Solomon be interpreter, who, everywhere, by a "fool" understands a wicked and reprobate person; foolishness being opposed to spiritual wisdom. 'Raca' denotes indeed, 'morosity' and lightness of manners and life; but 'fool' judgeth bitterly of the spiritual and eternal state" (Lightfoot).

While we can recognize a series of degrees in these actions, and that they are accompanied by corresponding degrees of punishment, it still seems to be inexplicable that for saying raca, a man was amenable to the Sanhedrin, but for saying fool, the offender was in danger of hell fire. Put into modern terms, we could read:

> The first offence would be liable to a fine imposed by a magistrate.
> The second offence might lead to assizes, and a term of imprisonment.
> The third offence to a punishment of inconceivable horror, far worse than that of being beheaded or hanged.

If we turn to Matt. xxv. we shall be met with a similar problem. There, at the Second Coming of the Lord, the nations of the earth gather before Him and they are judged on one issue only, namely, the way in which they have treated His "brethren".

To one section the King says:

> "Come, ye blessed of My Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world" (Matt. xxv. 34).

To the other, the King says:

> "Depart from Me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels" (Matt. xxv. 41).

The kindness shown to the Lord's brethren was not intentionally rendered to the Lord, as the astonished inquiry of verses 37-40 will show, and the lack of kindness was not intentionally withheld from the Lord, yet one group go "into everlasting life" which is equated with the kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world, and the other group go "into everlasting punishment" which is equated with "everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels". Let us observe, the inheritance was actually prepared for the one group, but the other enter a punishment not originally "prepared" for them, but for the devil and his angels. If from these verses we are to gather that failure to visit the brethren of the Lord in prison, merits everlasting punishment, and everlasting fire in the sense of a traditional "Hell", then all argument is at an end. We stand appalled, but helpless, before a power beyond our own, but whether we stand assured of its utter and unquestioned righteousness, each one of us alone can answer. Before we leave these unhappy nations to their awful lot would it not be well if we knew the word used by the Lord for "punishment" here? There is the choice of at least four words:

> Ekdikesis "the punishment of evildoers" (I Pet. ii. 14).
> Epitimia "suffered . . . . . is this punishment" (II Cor. ii. 6).
> Timoria "sorer punishment" (Heb. x. 29).

These words are not found in Matt. xxv. The word employed there is kolasis "a pruning" (Dr. Bullinger's Lexicon). The one other occurrence of kolasis is in I John iv. 18 "torment". Kolazomai is translated "punish" in Acts iv. 21 & II Pet. ii. 9. The first meaning of kolazomai given in Liddell and Scott is "curtail, dock, prune", and secondly to catigate, keep within bounds, correct, punish. Kolasis is used with dendron "trees" in the sense of pruning. Turning to the usage of the word kolasis in the LXX we read in Ezek. xviii. 30:

> "I will judge you O house of Israel, saith the Lord, each one according to his way: be converted, and turn from all your ungodliness, and it shall not become to you the punishment of iniquity."

Again in Ezek. xliv. 12-14, The Levites, because of their departure and ministry of idols, became "a punishment" of iniquity to the house of Israel, with the consequences that these Levites could no longer draw near, nor approach the holy things, but they shall bear their reproach (atimian "no honour" see usage in II Tim. ii. 20, 21) and take a lower service. This is understandable, but to translate this word kolasis as equivalent to everlasting torment in hell, is here impossible. Before attempting a conclusion of this matter in Matt. xxv., let us get a little light by turning to Heb. vi. It will, we trust, be conceded that for Israel to "crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put Him to an open shame" is a deeper sin than neglecting to visit the Lord's brethren in prison. Yet while there is reference to "burning" as a consequence, it is remedial.

> "For the earth . . . . . which beareth thorns and briars is rejected, and is nigh unto cursing; whose end is to be burned" (Heb. vi. 7, 8).

The "earth" here is a piece of land under cultivation. The word "rejected" is adokimos, "disqualified" having failed the test, and it is not cursed, but "nigh unto" cursing. The burning which is its end, burns up the "thorns and briars", but does not destroy the land itself, but rather benefits it. It is comparable to the "pruning" of a tree. If we can allow the gentler meaning of the term in Matt. xxv., the nations who failed will go away into an age-long pruning, thereby missing the glory of the Millennium, but benefiting by its administration and correction.

Let us examine the Scriptures as to the usage of "fire" to indicate the Holiness and the Presence of God, before we go further in our search.

Fire, and the Holiness of God.

> "Our God is a consuming fire" (Heb. xii. 29).

These words refer back to Deut. iv. 24 and ix. 3. This fire turns both ways. Its flame scorches the covenant people who provoke the Lord to jealousy, the flame destroys the enemies of His people. The association of fire with the presence of the Lord quite irrespective of sin or wrath, is the burden of many references.

> "The sight of the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire" (Exod. xxiv. 17).

This fire devoured Nadab and Abihu (Lev. x. 2) as it consumed the murmurers in Numb. xi. 1. Deut. v. is full of references to this association of fire with the presence of the Lord, and in Ezek. i.-x. fire is associated with the appearance of the Lord there. "Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings?" asks Isaiah (xxxiii. 14). God Himself being a consuming fire, it must follow that saved and lost must, if in that sacred Presence, alike be affected by its searching character, the believer being able to answer the challenge of Isa. xxxiii. 14 "who shall dwell with everlasting burnings" because clothed in the asbestos (the Greek word is found in four passages) covering wherein they are accepted in the Beloved. This glorious immunity being theirs, is found "in Christ", not having their own righteousness as a protection, but the righteousness of God which is by faith. These selfsame believers however who are thus immune from the searching flame of the Divine Presence may have with them and about them "works" which by their very nature cannot stand the test of fire, and so are mercifully shriveled as they draw near. This aspect we must now pursue as it impinges eventually on the interpretation we must put upon the lake of fire in Rev. xx. and elsewhere. We have used the word asbestos in its modern meaning; in the N.T. it refers to the fire that is unquenchable, not to the material that is unburnable (Matt. iii. 12; Mark ix. 43, 45 and Luke iii. 17).

Fire, and the Redeemed (Their perfect exemption, protection and standing in Christ).

Let us take the illustration found in Dan. iii. The overweening pride of Nebuchadnezzar left the three friends of Daniel no alternative but to disobey his commands, even though the consequence of disobedience was to be cast into a "burning fiery furnace". To ensure their destruction Nebuchadnezzar commanded that the furnace be heated seven times more than was wont, and so vehement was its flame that the men who took up the faithful three were themselves instantly slain, but Shadrach, Meshach and Abed-nego, though they "fell down bound" in the midst of such a fiery furnace, were seen walking unscathed together with one like unto the Son of God, and, as Nebuchadnezzar admitted, "they have no hurt". What is meant by having "no hurt" is made clear in Dan. iii. 27:

> "These men, upon whose bodies the fire had no power, nor was an hair of their head singed, neither were their coats changed, nor the smell of fire had passed on them."

That is what we meant when we used the word asbestos for the perfect immunity of the believer "in Christ". They are an anticipation of those who shall not be "hurt" of the second death. Isaiah assured the "redeemed" of this immunity when he wrote:

> "When thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee" (Isa. xliii. 2).

Just as we find Daniel pondering over the writings of Jeremiah (Dan. ix. 2) so we can readily believe that the three friends found all the encouragement they needed in the precious words of Isa. xliii., when facing the ordeal of fire set by Nebuchadnezzar.

Again, as space is limited, we have no need to "prove" to the Spirit taught believer this blessed position of complete immunity demonstrated by Dan. iii. and prominent in Isa. xliii. as being equally true of all believers. We therefore turn our attention to the second division of this aspect of truth.

Fire, and the Redeemed (The test of faith and of works).

> "The trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and honour and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 7).

Here, it is not salvation that is under the test, it is the "trial of faith". The Greek word dokimion "trial" and dokimazo "tried" have reference to the testing of metals; indeed the LXX of Prov. xxvii. 21 uses dokimion to translate the word "a fining pot" or "crucible" and Job said "When He has tried me, I shall come forth as gold" (Job xxiii. 10). Peter again speaks of "the fiery trial" that was about to try some of his readers (I Pet. iv. 12). Paul writing to the Corinthians makes it very clear, that those who are building upon the One Foundation, namely Christ, while never in danger of "being lost", might "suffer loss" as over against "receiving a reward", and uses the trial by fire to illustrate his teaching:

> "Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss; BUT HE HIMSELF shall be saved; yet so as by fire" (I Cor. iii. 12-15).

Here "works" are in view, and "works" only. When examining the character of the Millennium we drew attention to the words of the Saviour to the seven churches, "I know thy works", and how they were linked with Rev. xx., "The dead were judged . . . . . according to their works". First, to every one of the seven churches, the Saviour said "I know thy works", and so dominant is this reference to "works" in these two chapters (Rev. ii. and iii.), that we find the Greek word ergon occurring fourteen times. It is to one of these churches made up of the redeemed, that the overcomer is promised "He . . . . . shall not be hurt of the second death" (Rev. ii. 11), a promise fulfilled in Rev. xx. 6, for there those who "reign" with Christ for the thousand years are said to be blessed and holy; they are said to be priests of God and of Christ, and "ON SUCH the second death hath no power". Every one of these seven churches is linked with the Millennial kingdom by either the promise to the overcomer, or the warning to the slacker, or by both. Let us see this for ourselves:

Ephesus.	Promise.	Paradise - Rev. ii. 7 and xxii. 2.
Smyrna.	Promise.	Not hurt of the second death - ii. 11 and xx. 6.
Pergamos.	Promise.	New name . . . . . - ii. 17 and xix. 12.
	Threat.	Fight, sword, mouth - ii. 16 and xix. 15.
Thyatira.	Promise.	Rod of Iron - ii. 27 and xii. 5.
	Threat.	Kill with death - ii. 23 and xx. 15.
Sardis.	Promise.	Not blot out - iii. 5 and xx. 12.
Philadelphia.	Promise.	New Jerusalem - iii. 12 and xxi. 2.
Laodicea.	Promise.	Sit in Throne - iii. 21 and xx. 4.

If "the second death" be the doom that awaits the wicked dead what congruity is there between the POSITION "priests of God and of Christ" and the PROMISE "on such the second death hath no power" (Rev. xx. 6)? Anyone with the slightest knowledge of the gospel of grace, knows that "there is . . . . . no condemnation" possible for the believer in Christ. Now this second death is equated with "the lake of fire" (Rev. xx. 14, 15) and so falls within the bounds of our present inquiry. This lake of fire is mentioned in five passages in the Revelation, and in several other passages by implication.

"The beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worship his image. These both were cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone" (Rev. xix. 20).

"And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are (or were), and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever" (Rev. xx. 10).

"And death and hell was cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death" (Rev. xx. 14).

"And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire" (Rev. xx. 15).

"He that overcometh shall inherit all things . . . . . but the fearful . . . . . shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone: which is the second death" (Rev. xxi. 7, 8).

The first thing we must note is that in Rev. xxi., the doom of those parallel with verse eight is said to be exclusion from the heavenly Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 27). Let us make sure of this:

Rev. xxi. 8.	Rev. xxi. 27.
"But the fearful, and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and idolators, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone: which is the second death."	"And there shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie: but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life."

Someone who was timid, who had flinched under the dreadful persecution of the time of the Beast and False Prophet—this one who fell and against which sin Paul even warned Timothy (II Tim. i. 7), he has his part in the lake of fire, whereas any one that was defiled was excluded from the heavenly Jerusalem. Yet this, while it sounds odd enough, will be seen more strange for in one verse the abominable and "ALL" liars are destined for the lake of fire, while in the corresponding verse ANYTHING . . . . . that worketh abomination, or maketh a lie, is excluded from the Heavenly Jerusalem! Surely, if the Scriptures are inspired, this means that the reference to the lake of fire, the reference to the second death, the reference to the book of life, and the reference to the entry into the heavenly city are to be read together. This lake of fire is said to have been "prepared" for the devil and his angels (Matt. xxv. 41) in contrast with the kingdom that had been "prepared" for those who received the Lord's commendation (Matt. xxv. 34); the "Bride" also is prepared for her husband (Rev. xxi. 2). In each case they are exceptional, and cannot be spread wider than the contexts will allow. This dreadful lake of fire had not been "prepared" for any other than the Devil and his angels, but if anyone yielded to the pressure or the temptation of the last days so as to ally himself with the Devil and his emissaries, he could be "hurt" of the second death, he would find that the fire that destroyed the enemy, could also burn up his fleshly "works", and he could "suffer loss" even the loss of the Heavenly city, yet "he himself could be saved so as by fire".

Closely connected with all this is the question, to what does the Book of Life refer, does it speak of the redeemed or of a special company from among the redeemed? Let us see. For our present study, we shall attempt no distinction between the Greek words biblion a little book, and biblos a book. The first reference is found in Phil. iv. 3 where it relates to service. Had the Book of Life appeared in Ephesians and Colossians, we might have thought that it was tantamount to the choice of the believer before the foundation of the world, but Philippians is the epistle of service, it opens with a reference to bishops and deacons, it urges the believer to "work out" his salvation, it holds out a "Prize" and even tells us that the Apostle, who was sure of his salvation and hope, was not at the time as sure of the Prize as he was at the end of his course (Phil. iii. 11, 14 and II Tim. iv. 7, 8).

Earlier in Philippians, Epaphroditus "was nigh unto death, not regarding his life" in service to the Lord, and Paul himself had taken the view of life "Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether by LIFE or by DEATH". It is therefore fitting that those who thus lost their lives for Christ's sake should find them in this Book of Life, the book of martyred saints who in their several spheres will "reign" with Christ. This passage in Philippians is the only reference in the N.T. to the Book of Life except those found in the book of the Revelation. Now the Revelation traces the career of the overcomer, throughout the great tribulation to the throne, and it is this book that contains all the other references to the Book of Life.

"I will not blot out his name out of the book of life" (Rev. iii. 5).

"And all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him (the Beast), whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world" (Rev. xiii. 8).

"And they that dwell on the earth shall wonder, whose names were not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world" (Rev. xvii. 8).

"And I saw the dead (i.e. 'the rest', Rev. xx. 5), small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened: and another book was opened, which is the book of life" (Rev. xx. 12).

"And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire" (Rev. xx. 15).

"And there shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie: but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life" (Rev. xxi. 27).

"And if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part:

(1) out of the book of life, and
(2) out of the Holy City, and
(3) out from the things written in this book" (Rev. xxii. 19).

Some authorities read "the tree of life" here. While the margin of the R.V. reads at Rev. xiii. 8 "written from the foundation of the world in the book . . . . . slain" it still retains in the text the order "in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world", and this should give us pause, lest in sweeping aside a difficulty, we also remove an index of its meaning. By referring to Luke xi. 50, 51 we shall see that "the blood of Abel" was the first to be "shed from the foundation of the world", and this suggests that the "Lamb's book of life" contains the names of all those who have suffered martyrdom for the faith since the first martyrdom of Abel. Incidentally, this reference disposes of the suggestion that "before the foundation of the world" refers to the future, for if we go back as far as Gen. iv., for the period "from" the foundation of the world, the period indicated in Eph. i. 4 MUST be earlier still. Abel especially sets forth the conditions we find ruling in the Revelation, for it was Cain, who was of "that wicked one" the seed of the serpent (Gen. iii. 15), that shed the first martyr's blood and it is the Dragon "that old Serpent", the Beast, the False Prophet and their follower who shed the blood of the overcomers in the time of the end.

"And they overcame him

(1) by the blood of the Lamb,
(2) and by the word of their testimony;
(3) and they love not their lives unto the death" (Rev. xii. 11), and at the end of the chapter we see the Dragon makes war with the remnant of the woman's seed which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ (Rev. xii. 17).

We have already referred to those who apostatize in the day of Tribulation who draw back unto perdition, who "fall away" and crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, who are likened to the earth which produces thorns and briars, and is (1) "rejected", is (2) "nigh unto" cursing, (3) whose end is to be "burned" (Heb. vi. 6-8). Now "rejected" is the Greek word adokimos, derived from a word which means to test or to try a metal. It is used by Peter for the "trial" of faith, and of the unashamed workman "approved" by Paul. Adokimos is the word translated "castaway" in I Cor. ix. 27, meaning "disqualified" so far as the "crown" is concerned. "Nigh" unto cursing is not the same as being actually cursed, even as Bethany was "nigh" unto Jerusalem, but actually two miles distant. When a field that is full of weeds is "burned" the weeds are destroyed, but the field abides, and is the better for it.

Enough we believe has been brought before the reader to enable him to see that the book of the Revelation deals with a particular class and calling, its terms of judgment although awful, are limited by their contexts, and taken with the alternative of reigning and overcoming, cannot be lifted out of these contexts and applied to the believer of the present dispensation, or to the ungodly and unevangelized world of all ages. To be "nigh" unto cursing, to be "hurt" of the second death, to have one's name "removed" from the book of life, which apparently contains the names of all overcomers since the death of Abel, to be "excluded" from the heavenly city, all pertain to the people of God who find themselves in the dreadful three years and a half of the domination of the beast, and which give us a picture of the Millennial reign, that must be retained. Let us rejoice that there will be some who will endure that time of terror and who will consequently:

> "Live and reign with Christ a thousand years."

No.8. The Converging Lines of Prophetic Truth.
pp. 184 - 191

While it is true that a Prophet in the Scriptural record ministered to the immediate needs of his own time, the outstanding character of his office was the God-given ability to speak of things to come. Horne says of prophecy:

> "It is a miracle of knowledge, a declaration, or description, or representation of something future, beyond the power of human sagacity to foresee, discern or conjecture, and it is the highest evidence that can be given of supernatural communion with the Deity, and of the truth of revelation."

Bishop Hurd has written of Messianic prophecy:

> "That prophecy is of a prodigious extent; that it commenced from the fall of man, and reaches to the consummation of all things; that for many ages it was delivered darkly, to a few persons, and with large intervals from the date of one prophecy to that of another, but at length became more clear, more frequent, and was uniformly carried on in the line of one people, separated from the rest of the world, among other reasons assigned for this principally to be the repository of the divine oracles . . . . . even to the end of time, or, in St. John's expression, to that period when the mystery of God shall be finished" (Rev. x. 7).

When Peter wrote his second epistle, the testimony of prophecy was being discounted by scoffers who said "Where is the promise of His coming?" This he countered by saying "No prophecy of the Scripture is of any private interpretation", or as Moffatt has it "cam by human impulse" (II Pet. i. 20). The Greek words are idias epiluseos, and generally speaking bear the translation given in the A.V. But Peter does not appear to be dealing with how to interpret prophecy, but how prophecy came—for he continues:

> "For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man: but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."

If we retain the rendering "private interpretation", its first meaning must be that the prophecies found in the Scriptures are not the private solutions by the prophets of the enigmas confronting them, and secondly, that those of us who read and use those prophecies, must be on our guard that no one "uses" any prophecy merely as a bolster to support some pre-conceived theory—which alas has become the dreadful fate of many of these sublime utterances. The completely impersonal character of prophecy is moreover suggested by I Pet. i. 10, 11, where we learn that those prophets who spoke beforehand of salvation, afterwards searched their own writings to discover "what, or what manner of time the spirit of Christ which was in them did signify".

One simple yet most valuable office of prophecy is to act as "a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn" (II Pet. i. 19). Another is that the "spirit of prophecy" is "the testimony of Jesus" (Rev. xix. 10). Within bounds, we believe we are not far wrong when we say that the door of prophecy swings on two hinges:

(1) The Return of Christ and (2) The Return of Israel.

Associated with these two great issues is the history and destiny of two cities, Babylon and Jerusalem, and with these two cities, two kingdoms, namely the kingdom of the Beast, and the kingdom of the Lord. Before proceeding with our studies, the present moment seems to be the time to pause and consider this term "kingdom". It has been maintained that our word government comes nearest to expressing the word basileia. First of all let us consider the classical usage of basileia as set out in Liddell and Scott, where we shall discover the way in which the ordinary Greek used the term.

Basileia, a kingdom, dominion, hereditary monarchy opposed to tyrranis and secondly a diadem.

Basileion, a kingly dwelling, palace. The seat of empire, royal city, the royal treasury, a tiara, diadem.

Basileios, kingly, royal.

Basileus, a king, prince, lord. Frequently with collateral sense of Captain or Judge, later, an hereditary king, then the king's son, prince or any one sharing in the government, and at Athens, the second of the nine archons. After the Persian war the king of Persia was called Basileus, so afterward the Roman Emperors.

Basileutos, under monarchial government.

Basileuo, to be king, to rule, to be made king, to rule over a people, to be governed or administered, to be of the king's party.

Basilikos, royal, kingly, like a king, kingly, princely.

It will be seen that the primary meaning of all these allied words is king, kingly and kingdom and this is how a Greek, reading the N.T., would interpret them. The secondary meanings of rule or government, are the rule or government of such as are kings or kingly persons. If the word "government" be a truer rendering than the word "kingdom" it is somewhat strange to find that there are two Hebrew and two Greek words translated "government", eleven Hebrew and five Greek words translated "governor"; one Chaldee word, and three different Hebrew words for "to govern", and yet not one uses the Hebrew word for king or kingdom! When we turn to the Hebrew word melek, we find it translated KING 2,518 times and ROYAL twice, while the corresponding Chaldee word is translated KING 164 times and ROYAL once AND IN NO OTHER WAY.

When we examine the Hebrew melukah, malekuth, mamlakah and mamlakuth, we find that melukah is translated kingdom 18, king 2, royal 4; malekuth empire 1, kingdom 49, realm 4, reign 21, royal 14; malekuth (Chaldee) kingdom 46, realm 3, reign 4, kingly 1; mamlakah kingdom 108, reign 2, kings 1, royal 4; mamlakuth kingdom 8, reign 1, and these words are translated in no other way! Not once is "government" ever used. We have not bothered to count these occurrences. The evidence is overwhelming, and the idea that all this can be set aside by the stroke of the pen, seems too monstrous to need refutation.

The reader, who is not already predisposed to any particular theory, may wonder what the driving motive must be that so desperately needs a new translation. This is not all however. The words king and kingdom do not stand alone. They are most intimately associated with the insignia of royalty. Throne, Crown, Sceptre are continual adjuncts. Britain has a Government. The United States has a Government, but we have yet to hear of the President's Coronation, that he occupies a throne, wields a sceptre, or is royal. We therefore most earnestly ask every reader to pause and re-consider should they have been carried away by this novel idea that is refuted by the entire range of Scripture and consider this, that such a translation actually robs the Saviour of His CROWN RIGHTS.

The church of the One Body is not a kingdom. But the church of the One Body has the honour to be translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son. The corporation of the City of London or of Birmingham is a "body", but that does not place these "bodies" outside of the Kingdom of Great Britain. Let us at least be logical.

When Israel wanted to be like the nations they demanded a king. When God transferred earthly rule to Nebuchadnezzar, he transferred it to a king. When at last the Saviour returns, He returns "to reign", and the words of Psa. ii. are definite. "Yet have I set my King upon my holy hill of Zion." What conspiracy is this then that has seduced the Lord's believing people to trifle with the crown rights of Him Who comes "to reign" and to sit upon a "throne"? However much kingly rule has failed, God's conception of rule is still as it always has been, a KINGDOM. The Saviour died with the title over His Head, and that sacred Head was crowned, even in derision. When He comes, He is seen wearing many crowns. He will be King of kings, and the kingdom of this world will cease, while the kingdom of the Lord shall be established by God Himself.

If we have entertained the idea that there will be a pre-millennial kingdom WITHOUT THE PERSONAL PRESENCE OF THE KING we may be disposed to look with favour on the substituted word "government" but we may be after all but acting in the spirit condemned by the Lord in no uncertain terms in Mark vii. 9. How many of those who have rendered lip-service to the doctrine of inspiration, even to its individual words and echoed that they were "convinced", have taken trouble to verify their references? What must be the attitude of mind when faced with the overwhelming evidence just tabulated, which desires the truth of God uncoloured by theories of the best of men? To quote the words of the writer whose views we have contested, we too say with all our hearts, with just one necessary personal alteration:

> "Real conviction concerning great truths can come only when we have made our own personal studies and come to our own independent conclusion. My own convictions that basileia means kingdom ('government', in our friend's statement) are the result of my own studies in the Word. I believe the reader will come to the same conclusion if he makes his own study of the subject."

There speaks the true Berean—may the truth prevail.

Returning to our introductory notes on Prophecy, we continue to assemble our key passages.

> "When the Lord shall build up Zion, He shall appear in His glory" (Psa. cii. 16).

A great crisis is awaiting the world, but it is a Jewish crisis wherein the Holy One of Israel is to be placed in exaltation with His people.

> "There are three great eras of visitation, wherein God has as many times appointed a term to His controversy with mankind. The first was the deluge . . . . . the second is to be at the coming of the Lord Jesus in the power of His dominion, when the Antichrist and those with him will be destroyed . . . . . the last controversy is at the end of the millennium, when sentence is carried out upon the revel nations of that period" (T. L. Strange).

To observe and record these converging crises, will form a part of our immediate inquiry.

"The converging crises." To attain to some fairly comprehensive understanding of the converging lines of prophecy, will enable us to see with some measure of clarity the place, that less pronounced and problematic portions occupy.

Ecclesiastes says:

> "Better is the END of a thing than the beginning thereof" (Eccles. vii. 8).

Asaph attained to peace and a solution of his problems when he went within the sanctuary of God, for then he "understood their END", and understanding the end of the wicked, he no longer envied them their transient exemption from "trouble". Daniel was intensely interested to discover "the end" of the things revealed to him:

> "O my Lord, what shall be the end of these things?" (Dan. xii. 8), and speaks too of "the time of the end". Let us pause therefore in our pursuit of the great goal of prophecy to consider more carefully the import of this phrase THE TIME OF THE END. Take for example, this terrible statement of Ezekiel:

> "Remove the mitre, and take off the crown: this shall be no more the same: exalt that which is low, and abase that which is high. I will overturn, overturn, overturn it: this also shall be no more, until He come Whose right it is; and I will give it Him" (Ezek. xxi. 26, 27 R.V.).

"Until He come." This can refer to none but Christ Himself and His Second Coming. Until that takes place chaos abides, neither priest (mitre) nor king (crown) remains, and we are in the atmosphere of Hosea iii., Israel's lo-ammi condition. If there is to be a kingdom in the absence of Christ before the millennium, Ezekiel evidently had no knowledge of it. A person can be excused if he fails to see the possibility of about 500 years of enlightenment anywhere in these two verses. There is no ambiguity about the word "until", Hebrew ad. No interval can be permitted in such a sentence "Thou shalt eat bread till thou return unto the dust", neither can one be interpolated here.

We find that Daniel was very concerned to know more about the fourth beast of chapter vii. We learn from the vision in that chapter the sequence of events up to the Coming of the Son of Man with the clouds of heaven. They can be epitomized as follows:

(1) Four diverse beasts are to arise up from the sea.
(2) The description is that the: 1st is like a lion,
2nd is like a bear,
3rd is like a leopard,
4th is indescribable.

Now it is obvious that the beast from the sea in Rev. xiii., is none other than this fourth beast of Dan. vii., and combines in itself the preceding symbols.

"And the beast which I saw was like unto a leopard, and his feet were as the feet of a bear, and his mouth as the mouth of a lion: and the dragon gave him his power, and his seat (throne), and great authority" (xiii. 2).

(3) Thrones were set (cast down as cushions, not overthrown), and the Ancient of Days did sit, a fiery stream issued and came forth from before Him, and

(4) The beast was slain, and his body destroyed and given to the burning flame. In Rev. xix., at the Apocalypse of Christ, John says:

"The beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshipped his image. These both were cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone" (Rev. xix. 20).

By comparing these words with Rev. xiii. 12-15 we are in no doubt but that the Coming of Christ comes immediately after the period allowed by God for the reign of this antichristian beast, namely, at the close of a period of forty-two months, of which more, presently.

(5) This beast developed ten horns, and one in particular had "a mouth that spake great things".

"He shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High . . . . . and they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time" (Dan. vii. 25).

In Rev. xiii. we read:

"And there was given unto him a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies; and power was given unto him to continue forty and two months . . . . . and it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them" (Rev. xiii. 5-7).

We have noted the period denominated forty and two months, and time, times and the dividing of time. In Rev. xi. 2, 3 we have a similar period, here given as forty and two months and 1,260 days. In Rev. xii. 6 this number of days is repeated, and is equated in verse fourteen with the cryptic enumeration "for a time, and times, and half a time". Now this period of time is 3½ years, and the peculiar mode of reckoning links these chapter once more with the book of Daniel, namely in Dan. vii. 25 and in xii. 7. The prophecy of Dan. ix. speaks of a period of time as "the midst of the week" (Dan. ix. 27), and if in this prophecy a week or heptad, is a period of seven years, then here, in Dan. ix. 27, we reach the same period that we have found in Rev. xii. and xiii. and so by the other links with Rev. xix.

The image that formed the basis of Nebuchadnezzar's dream and Daniel's great prophecy of Gentile dominion extends to the time of the end. Whatever difference of opinion there may be as to whether Rome was the fourth in the list, or whether, owing to the rejector of Christ, the fourth kingdom is the one at the end does not for the moment alter the fact that the END of Gentile dominion, and the BEGINNING of the kingdom of God upon earth synchronize, there is no possible room for an interval of 5 MINUTES let alone 500 YEARS between the impact of the Stone cut without hands, and the filling of the whole earth. Here are the inspired words:

> "Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay, and brake them to pieces. THEN was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold, broken to pieces TOGETHER, and become like the chaff of the summer threshing floors; and the wind carried them away, that no place was found for them; and the stone that smote the image became a great mountain and filled the whole earth. This is the dream; and we will tell the interpretation thereof before the king . . . . . And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever" (Dan. ii. 34, 35, 44).

Another feature that demands attention is "the time of Jacob's trouble" or "the great tribulation"; that too must find its place in the Divine scheme, and its Scriptural association must be noted.

> "I will bring again the captivity of My people Israel and Judah, saith the Lord: and I will cause them to return to the land that I gave to their fathers, and they shall possess it . . . . . alas! for that day is great, so that none is like it: it is even the time of Jacob's trouble; but he shall be saved out of it. For it shall come to pass in that day, saith the Lord of hosts, that I will break his yoke from off thy neck, and will burst thy bonds, and strangers shall no more serve themselves of him: But they shall serve the Lord their God, and David their king, whom I will raise up unto them . . . . . And ye shall be My people, and I will be your God" (Jer. xxx. 3, 7-9, 22).

The context of this time of Jacob's trouble is the time when both Israel and Judah shall be saved "from the land of their captivity" and they have the assurance, that "though I make a full end of all nations whither I have scattered thee, yet will I not make a full end of thee: but I will correct thee in measure, and will not leave thee altogether unpunished" (Jer. xxx. 10, 11). Jer. xxx. reads straight on to Jer. xxxi. where the Lord announces the bringing in of the New Covenant and the return and settlement of Israel as a nation for ever. This time of tribulation is spoken of by Daniel:

> "And at that time (note the connexion with the preceding antichristian events, with no interval possible) shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people: and there shall be a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation even to the same time: and at that time (the time note repeated) thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever" (Dan. xii. 1-3).

The closing words of this reference are referred to by our Lord in Matt. xiii. 40-43 in the Parable of the Wheat and the Tares:

> "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father", and link the days in which Heaven's King was rejected and the "Mystery" form of the kingdom took the place of positive prophecy, with the days yet to come when the Mystery of God shall be finished. An examination of these parables may be included in our survey presently.

This unprecedented and unrepeated time of tribulation is referred to by the Saviour in Matt. xxiv., and is related by Him with two epoch making events:

(1) To the abomination of desolation standing in the Holy Place as foretold by Daniel in Dan. ix. 27 (Matt. xxiv. 15).
(2) To the Second Coming of the Lord (Matt. xxiv. 29, 30).
(3) To the day when the tribes of the land (Zech. xii. 12) shall mourn when they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory.
(4) This is the moment when Israel shall look on Him Whom they have pierced, and when a fountain shall be opened to the house of David and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem for sin and uncleanness, and when in all the land two parts shall be cut off and die, but the third shall be left and brought through the refining fire, and will become once more "My people" (Zech. xii. 9, 10; xiii. 1, 8, 9).
(5) This is the sunteleia, the harvest gathering at the end of the age, as foreshadowed in the feast of the ingathering in Exod. xxiii. 16, where the LXX reads sunteleia, the word used in Matt. xxiv. 3.

All these prophecies synchronize at the Time of the End, the time when the Stone strikes the feet of Nebuchadnezzar's image, when Gentile dominion is destroyed and the Kingdom that shall never pass away is set up. This we now set out as a diagram so that the reader may be able to visualize these converging lines.

We have to consider many other aspects of prophetic truth, but as honest Bereans before God, and as desiring to know and believe all that God has spoken, we must bear witness, that so far, we cannot and dare not introduce any other kingdom, than that of "the Beast" before the Millennial Reign of Christ, and if because we see this, we are obliged as before God to speak of this subject many times in this study, we do so because we desire to be "pure from the blood of all men".

Among the many subjects that act as pointers in our search are the following: The Remnant. Captivity. The prophecy of Dan. ix. The parables of Matt. xiii. Israel's re-gathering, Babylon and other related subjects.

No.9. THE THOUSAND GENERATIONS.
pp. 225 - 227

It is only possible to speak of the Millennium if we believe that the term "a thousand years" means what it says, and is to be taken literally. This being so, what are we to understand by the statement in Deut. vii. 9?

> "The Lord thy God, He is the God, the faithful God, which keepeth covenant and mercy with them that love Him and keep His commandments TO A THOUSAND GNERATIONS."

How are we to understand the language of David recorded in I Chron. xvi. 15?

> "Be ye mindful always of His covenant; the word which He commanded TO A THOUSAND GENERATIONS."

And yet once more, what did the Psalmist mean in Psa. cv. 8?

> "He hath remembered His covenant for ever, the word which He commanded TO A THOUSAND GENERATIONS."

The usage of the word "generation" in the Scriptures falls into three groups or shades of meaning:

(1) The primary meaning is that of offspring. This is its meaning in the genealogies that abound in the O.T. In Hebrew "The book of the generations" is sepher toledoth, and in the Greek biblios geneseos (Gen. v. 1; Matt. i. 1).

(2) Arising out of this primary meaning comes a secondary sense, namely a period of time. This would not have been used rigidly, especially when we observe that the natural length of human life has changed since the days of the patriarchs. Herodotus, the Greek historian, says "Three generations of men make an hundred years" and Clement of Alexandria citing Homer says "two generations" cover the period of "above sixty years old".

It will be remembered that our Saviour's earthly life was just about a "generation", He commencing His ministry at about thirty years of age (Luke iii. 23).

(3) The word subsequently came to indicate some specific characteristics such as "an adulterous and sinful generation". When the three O.T. writers quoted above speak of "a thousand generations" they can mean nothing more or less than an exceedingly long period of time, not necessarily 33,000 years, but sufficiently long to overlap the Millennium to such an extent as to show that the thousand-year reign is but the threshold to a period very much longer than the present history of man multiplied several times. If this has even any element of truth in it, then the Day of God, which follows the Day of the Lord (see article Day of the Lord) must be of great importance, and it is highly probable that many a passage of the O.T. that has been indiscriminately labeled "Millennial" belongs to this subsequent period, which will become at length the kingdom which the Son of God will deliver up to the Father, after all rule, authority and power have been put down (I Cor. xv. 24-28).

Most certain it is that the Millennial kingdom, ending as it does (Rev. xx. 8-10), was not ready to be thus delivered up to the Father. The words "For He must reign" (I Cor. xv. 25) extend far beyond the limits of the thousand years; it may be that it is to extend to the end of a thousand generations. One or two other terms should be examined while we have this question before us. What is meant by the words of Eph. iii. 21?

Eis	pasas	tas	geneas	tou	aionos	ton	aionon.
Unto	all	the	generations	of the	age	of the	ages.

To what period of time, and to which part of the Divine purpose does Peter refer in II Pet. iii. 18 eis hemera aionos "Unto (the) day (of the) age". For one thing, we know that this reaches out to the extreme limits of the time periods mentioned in II Pet. iii.:

(1) The Day of the Lord (II Pet. iii. 10), that ends in dissolution.
(2) The Day of God (II Pet. iii. 12), for which the believer is to look.
(3) The Day of the Age (II Pet. iii. 8) which appears to be the goal of all time.

In Isa. xliv. 7 Israel are called "the ancient people" which however is translated by some, including The Companion Bible "the everlasting nation". The Companion Bible note reads "The nation of Israel is everlasting, like the Covenant". The nations which oppressed Israel (Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, Rome) have passed away; and compare the nine everlasting things in Isaiah (1) Covenant (lv. 3; lxi. 8; cp. note on Gen. ix. 16); (2) kindness (liv. 8); (3) salvation (xlv. 17); (4) excellency (lx. 15); (5) joy (li. 11); (6) name (lvi. 5); (7) light (lx. 19, 20); (8) sign (lv. 13); and (9) as the pledge of all "the everlasting God" (xl. 28; lxiii. 12).

Providing that we realize that the Hebrew word olam and the Greek aion, mean literally an age of undefined extent and not necessarily that which is eternal in the fullest sense, the repetition of this term as indicated in the quotation given above, demands something more than a millennium of a thousand years to justify or exhaust. There are evident correspondencies between the earthly and the heavenly Jerusalem, which while necessary to keep distinct throw light upon several features. The promise of Ezek. xxxvii. 26-28 is echoed in Rev. xxi. 3:

> "Moreover I will make a covenant of peace with them; it shall be an everlasting covenant with them: and I will place them, and multiply them, and will set My sanctuary in the midst of them for evermore. My tabernacle also shall be with them: yea, I will be their God, and they shall be My people. And the heathen shall know that I the Lord do sanctify Israel, when My sanctuary shall be in the midst of them for evermore."

The other blessed reference to the wiping away of all tears, is an echo of prophecy of Isaiah:

> "He will swallow up death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces; and the rebuke of His people shall He take away from off all the earth: for the Lord hath spoken it" (Isa. xxv. 8).

Again the description of the city given in Ezek. xlviii. 30-35 with its twelve gates, each bearing the name of one of the twelve tribes of Israel, establishes another link with the restored Jerusalem which shall be on the earth, and the heavenly city which is to descend out of heaven after the Millennium has run its course.

> "The nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it: and the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honour into it" (Rev. xxi. 24).

In strong contrast with the constitution of the Church, "where there is neither Greek nor Jew" (Col. iii. 11), the distinction between Israel and the nations will be maintained throughout the whole period. It is not within our present intention or ability to attempt to fit O.T. prophecies into (1) The Millennium or (2) into the succeeding Day of God; all we know is that many Scriptures hitherto labeled "Millennial" have been so indicated without sufficient justification. Patient and accurate study is demanded of any who will attempt to extend the suggestions offered in this brief article; patient accumulation and tabulation of many prophecies that deal with the hope and destiny of Israel will have to be made before it can be said with any degree of certainty "here Israel's kingdom ends" or "this is Millennial", but we can only express our conviction that Israel's Kingdom will continue until the day of which I Cor. xv. 28 speaks, when it will be swallowed up in "the perfect day" (Prov. iv. 18), "the day of the age" (II Pet. iii. 18) when what we loosely call "eternity" takes the place of time.

Reckoning and Reality

(A sequel to the series entitled "Emmanuel, God with us")

No.8. The Fifth Reckoning, "Raised with Christ".

pp. 10 - 13

These mortal bodies have received a "quickening". We live a life now in the flesh, by the faith of the Son of God. This does not confer upon us here and now the gift of immortality; that awaits the glorious day of resurrection, but it is the first of these "reckonings" that partakes of some measure of reality. We now proceed. Following the words of Eph. ii. 5 which formed the theme of the preceding article, come the words that must occupy our attention during the present, "and hath raised us up together" (Eph. ii. 6). Before we can attempt any exposition or application of this passage, one most serious consequence of the indiscriminate use of the English translation must be exposed and rectified.

Some time ago an article appeared which informed the reader that the Greek word for resurrection was anastasis, a word derived from anistemi, and then went on to expound the wonder of being "raised with Christ", instructing the reader that the preposition translated "with" is sun. It was only logical that the reader would assume that, just as there was the compound exanastasis "out-resurrection", so sun was found in combination with either anastasis or anistemi "proving" by the association of the "out-resurrection" with the doctrine of being "raised together with Christ", that such took place immediately at death, because as the writer put it, "the believer had been ALREADY RAISED with Christ", and so could not but be with Him, even now, in resurrection life.

The answer to his high-sounding yet false doctrine is that it is built upon a foundation of sand. There is not one single occurrence of the words sunanastasis, or sunanistemi in the N.T. Yet the reader may glance back to our quotation from Eph. ii. 6, and read again the words "raised together with Christ", and wonder whether we have introduced a contradiction into our studies. To supply the answer and to provide positive truth, we shall be obliged to defer our examination of Eph. ii. 6, until we are in possession of some essential facts.

Let us first of all quote one or two passages which use the words "raise" or "risen with".

> "Buried with Him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with Him through the faith of the operation of God, Who hath raised Him out from dead ones" (Col. ii. 12).
>
> "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God" (Col. iii. 1).
>
> "And hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 6).

In neither of these passages does the word anistemi or anastasis occur, even though anistemi is translated elsewhere "to raise up" (John vi. 40; Acts ii. 24); and anastasis IS translated elsewhere "resurrection" (John v. 29; Acts ii. 31). The preposition sun

"with" or "together" is never found in combination with either of these Greek words; another word, bearing a slightly different meaning is employed, and it is the imperative duty of all who teach to recognize the Spirit's choice, and refrain from building upon inadequate translations. The word translated "raise together" or "to raise with" is sunegeiro, a compound of sun "with" and egeiro "to rouse". This word occur in eight different forms in the N.T. and an examination of them must be undertaken before we can safely proceed.

Egeiro. There are three occasions where the A.V. translates the word in its primary sense:

> "His disciples . . . . . AWOKE Him" (Matt. viii. 25).
> "It is high time to AWAKE out of sleep" (Rom. xiii. 11).
> "AWAKE thou that sleepest" (Eph. v. 14).

In the passage quoted from Eph. v. 14 we shall discover that the word anistemi is used in correspondence. Let us set the verse out fully:

A	Awake (egeiro)	\	subject "sleep".
B	Thou that SLEEPEST (katheudo)	/
A	Arise (anistemi)	\	subject "death".
B	From the DEAD (nekros)	/

It will be observed that the awakening is from sleep, and that sleep is not the sleep of death, but of drowsiness, insobriety, unwatchfulness (I Thess. v. 6, 7, 10) in contrast with the sleep of death, which is koimaomai (I Thess. iv. 14) and those subsequently referred to as "the dead in Christ" (I Thess. iv. 16).

The distinction between katheudo and koimaiomai may be observed in the two following passages.

> Katheudo "She is NOT dead, but SLEEPETH" (Luke viii. 52).
> Koimaiomai "Our friend Lazarus sleepth . . . plainly, Lazarus IS dead" (John xi. 11, 14).

Even in this passage which speaks of death, under the figure of sleep, the Saviour avoids the use of egeiro and employs instead exhypnizo. In some of the places where egeiro is translated "arise" it could well be render "awake" as in Matt. ii. 13, for it was spoken to Joseph while he slept. In the majority of cases the word is associated with resurrection and is translated rightly "to raise" (Acts iii. 15; Rom. iv. 24), because of the recognized figure of Scripture whereby death was spoken of as sleep and resurrection of necessity spoken of as being awakened.

Egersis.	"And the graves were opened; and many bodies of the saints which slept arose (egeiro), and came out of their graves after His resurrection (egersis) (Matt. xxvii. 52, 53).
Diergeiro.	"Then Joseph being raised from sleep" (Matt. i. 24).
	"They came to Him, and awoke Him" (Luke viii. 24).
	"I stir up your pure minds" (II Pet. iii. 1 also i. 13).
Epegeiro.	"Raised persecution" (Acts xiii. 50).

	"Stirred up" (Acts xiv. 2).
Exegeiro.	"I raised thee up" (Rom. ix. 17),
	"and will also raise up us by His own power" (I Cor. vi. 14).
Gregoreo.	"Watch therefore" (Matt. xxiv. 42).
	"Watch ye, stand fast" (I Cor. xvi. 13).
	"Let us watch and be sober" (I Thess. v. 6);
	"whether we wake or sleep" (I Thess. v. 10);
	"be vigilant" (I Pet. v. 8).

In this word gregoreo, the idea of being "roused" is dominant, there being no occasion in any of its twenty-three occurrences where the idea of "raising" is even implied.

Diagregoreo "when they were awake, they saw His glory" (Luke ix. 32).

The Scriptures teach that in the glorious future the believer will be RAISED, but the Scriptures never use the word anistemi or anastasis with the preposition sun, they always use the word egeiro for the idea of being "raised with Christ".

Just as we are "quickened with" Christ now, but have not yet put on immortality, so we are ROUSED with Him, even though we are still mortal, and with a very limited exception must all pass into the state of death; yet having the earnest, we know that this rousing is a blessed anticipation of the raising, actually and literally, from the dead. While therefore both Greek words are used of the resurrection, it is evident that we must use them with discretion. The primary meaning of the root that provides anastasis and anistemi is "to stand".

"Stand upright on thy feet" (Acts xiv. 10).

We also have the words ex . . . . . anistemi in Acts xx. 30, where Paul says "also of your own selves shall men arise", and anastas . . . . . ex "and there stood up one of them" (Acts xi. 28) which throws light upon the "out-resurrection" of Phil. iii. 11. While therefore both Greek words are used of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ, and while both Greek words are used of the believer's future and literal resurrection from the dead, only one of them is used in the "reckoning" stage, namely egeiro "to rouse"; the believer is reckoned to have been "roused together with Christ" but no such reckoning is used of the glorious literal future.

Sunegeiro occurs but three times in the N.T., namely in Eph. ii. 6; Col. ii. 12 and iii. 1. In Eph. ii., it is used as a step to the unique privilege that attaches to the Church of the Mystery, namely that it is viewed as "seated together" in heavenly places, a theme that must occupy our attention in the next article. In Colossians the fact that the believer is not only "buried" with Christ, but "risen with Him through the faith of the operation of God, Who hath raised Him from the dead" leads the apostle on to elaborate the complete emancipation of the believer who is thus "reckoned" by grace. We can but summarize here, but a wealth of teaching awaits the sanctified searcher in this chapter of Colossians.

As a result, the believer who is thus raised together with Christ is seen to be not only "dead to sins and the uncircumcision of the flesh" but "quickened together with Him", all trespasses being fully and for ever forgiven. Not only so, but all ordinances that were contrary to us have been taken out of the way, nailed to His cross, spiritual foes have been subdued, and the bondage of religious observances, which at best were but "shadows of things to come" gives place to the complete emancipation of the believer. So real is this "reckoning" to be in the believer's experience, that he can be addressed thus:

> "Wherefore if ye died with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances?"

The argument is rounded off by the positive attitude introduced by Col. iii. 1:

> "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above where Christ sitteth . . . . . set your mind on things above . . . . . for your life is hid with Christ in God", which in its turn leads to the seventh and final rung in this ladder of reckoning and reality, the manifestation of the believer "with Him" in glory.

The two steps therefore that await our consideration, are (1) "seated together" and (2) "manifested with Him in glory" which must now receive the attention of our wondering hearts.

No.9. The Sixth Reckoning, "Made to sit together".
pp. 73 - 77

If we look at the opening of the Epistle to the Ephesians, we shall see that it is addressed to the saints which are at Ephesus, and although these saints are blessed with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places, they are nevertheless upon the earth surrounded by sin and darkness, needing the exhortation to walk worthy of their calling, and to avoid complicity with the unfruitful works of darkness. They are still conceived of as being members of a human society, which consists of the sixfold association of husband and wife, parent and child, master and servant, and in connexion with the child there is a special promise which speaks of living "long on the earth". Moreover, armour is provided against a yet future "evil day". All this must be remembered when we read in Eph. ii. 6:

> "And hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus."

We have recently had occasion to combat the idea that the calling of Hebrews is much the same, if not identical with that of Ephesians. If occasion should demand it, we should be quite prepared to meet such a teaching with one passage, and that the one before us. To be seated together there where Christ sits at the right hand of God, is not only absent from the teaching of Hebrews, but, as we shall show, contrary to its central conception.

It may be well to draw attention of all readers to the following facts:

(1) These wondrous "reckonings", "crucified with", "dead with", "buried with", "quickened with", "raised with", and "seated with", are found only in Paul's epistles to the churches, and are entirely absent from the Epistle to the Hebrews.

(2) The preposition sun "with" enters so little into any doctrine that the Apostle taught the Hebrews, that it does not once occur as a separate preposition.

(3) In combination sun occurs in twelve forms in Hebrews, but not one approximates in any way to the blessed teaching we are now considering. In order that every reader may have full liberty of research we give these twelve combinations of sun before passing on.

"To suffer affliction with"	sugkakoucheomai	(Heb. xi. 25).
"To be mixed with"	sugkerannumi	(Heb. iv. 2).
"To be heirs with"*	sugkleronomos	(Heb. xi. 9).
"To be touched with"	sumpatheo	(Heb. iv. 15; x. 34).
"To bring together" (profit)	sumphero	(Heb. xii. 10).
"To meet together"	sunantao	(Heb. vii. 1, 10).
"To perish together"	sunapollumai	(Heb. xi. 31).
"To be bound with"	sundeomai	(Heb. xiii. 3).
"To perceive together" (conscience)	suneidesis	(Heb. ix. 9, 14).
"To bear witness with"	sunepimartureo	(Heb. ii. 4).
"To end together"	sunteleia	(Heb. ix. 26).
"To end together" (complete)	sunteleo	(Heb. viii. 8).

[* - The only word of this list that is found also in Ephesians. It has a perfectly association however, which we will consider in its right place.]

In this list we have positive evidence that the Apostle freely used compounds of sun, yet the absence of the very key words of Ephesians is eloquent testimony to the fact that the Apostle was not dealing with the same calling. For completeness sake, therefore, we must give another list, namely of the compounds of sun, that are peculiar to the calling of Ephesians.

"To sit together"	sunkathizo	(Eph. ii. 6).
"To be heirs with"*	sugkleronomos	(Eph. iii. 6).
"To have in common with"	sugkoinoneo	(Eph. v. 11).
"To quicken together"	suzoopoieo	(Eph. ii. 5).
"To be compacted together"	sumbibazo	(Eph. iv. 16).
"To be partakers together"	summetochos	(Eph. iii. 6).
"To be citizens together"	sumpolites	(Eph. ii. 19).
"To be joined together"	sunarmologeomai	(Eph. ii. 21; iv. 16).
"That which binds together"	sundesmos	(Eph. iv. 3).
"To be roused together"	sunegeiro	(Eph. ii. 6).
"To run together" (knowledge)	sunesis	(Eph. iii. 4).
"That which runs together" (understanding)	suniemi	(Eph. v. 17).
"To built together"	sunoikodomeomai	(Eph. ii. 22).
"A joint body"	sussoma	(Eph. iii. 6).

[* - As indicated above.]

Here are fourteen compounds of sun employed in making known the truth of the Mystery, which the Apostle felt no call to use when expounding the calling of the Hebrews. These are facts, whatever the deduction may be that are drawn from them, and such facts we ignore at our peril. The word in which we are specially interested at the moment is sugkathizo "to sit together". This word occurs but once elsewhere, and in a non-doctrinal context.

> "And when they had kindled a fire in the midst of the hall, and were set down together, Peter sat down among them" (Luke xxii. 55).

Our inquiry must at least embrace the following points:

(1) The ordinary usage of kathizo "to sit".
(2) The special usage of kathizo in the Epistle to the Hebrews.
(3) The effect of the combination sun with kathizo.
(4) The extraordinary nature of the calling thus indicated in Eph. ii. 6

The ordinary usage of kathizo. There are comparatively few occurrences of this word where the meaning is just "to sit' in the sense of taking a rest. In most of the references, the word is associated with the exercise of authority.

(1)	As a Teacher.	"When He was set" (Matt. v. 1)
		"The Pharisees sit in Moses' seat" (Matt. xxiii. 2).
		"He sat down and taught" (Luke v. 3; John viii. 2)
(2)	As a Judge.	"Pilate . . . . . sat down in the judgment seat" (John xix. 13).
		"I sat on the judgment seat" (Acts xxv. 17).
		"Set them to judge" (I Cor. vi. 4).
(3)	On a Throne.	(This includes references to "judging" as well as "kingship")
		"When the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Matt. xix. 28 also see xxv. 31).
		"Grant that these my two sons may sit, the one on Thy right hand, and the other on the left, in Thy kingdom" (Matt. xx. 21, 23).
		See also Rev. iii. 21 and xx. 4.
(4)	At or on the Right Hand of God.
		"He was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God" (Mark xvi. 19).
		"And set (Him) at His own right hand" (Eph. i. 20).

Out of the forty-eight occurrences of kathizo, those listed under the headings 1, 2, 3 and 4 account for thirty, which indicates fairly clearly the special association which this idea of being seated has with the exercise of authority.

The special usage of kathizo in the Epistle to the Hebrews.

There are four occurrences of this word in Hebrews, namely at Heb. i. 3; viii. 1; x. 12 and xii. 2, and they speak of one act, namely the seating of Christ in resurrection at the right hand of God. Both the word sugkathizo and the idea involved in such a compound are absent from this epistle; indeed, the very theme of the epistle forbids its use. Even though the Hebrews were bidden to "draw near" with "boldness of entry" into the holiest of all, the very idea that anyone should "sit together" there in that holy place is foreign to the whole conception of the epistle. It is not that the epistle does not stress the act of being "seated" or the position at the "right hand", it does, for it contains more references to this position, than the whole of Paul's remaining writings. If it had been within the range of revealed truth to have uttered the climax doctrine of Eph. ii. 6 to the Hebrews, Paul would have done so. He was urging them on to "Perfection". He pointed them away to the seated Christ, and it is obvious that the calling of the Hebrews could not have included the high dignity of being "made to sit together" in the heavenlies, for if it had, Paul must have said so. Therefore any who dare to add to the words of inspiration for whatever reason, do so to their loss.

The effect of the combination "sun" with "kathizo".

In ordinary use, the effect of the addition of sun to either kathizo or kathemai is seen in the two occurrences of the words:

> "He sat with the servants" (Mark xiv. 54).
> "And were set down together" (Luke xxii. 55).

The extraordinary nature of the calling thus indicated in Eph. ii. 6

> "Hath quickened us together with Christ . . . . . and made us sit together in heavenly places, in Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 5, 6).

Removed from its context, the expression "made us sit together" would mean no more than what we have already seen in Mark xiv. 54. The context however is a vital part of every word whether in the Bible or in everyday conversation. The three verbs must be read together. "He hath quickened us together with Christ." There is no possible doubt as to the fact that the word "together" here refers to the believer's close union with Christ, it says so. This is implied, though not repeated, in the next sentence, "He hath raised us up together (with Christ)", for there is no meaning in the idea that the believer today has been raised together with all other believers; that can only take place at the coming of the Lord, it still retains the significance of the first verb "raised up together with Christ". By all the laws of language and of common sense the same must be true of the third verb "He hath made us sit together with Christ". Two additional statements follow, both indicating sphere:

"In heavenly places", "In Christ Jesus".

At the close of the first chapter of Ephesians we learn that the Lord Jesus Christ was "raised" and "seated" at the Father's right hand in the heavenly places, which are further defined as being "far above all". Here in the sequel, the church is seen "seated together with Christ, where He sits", namely at the right hand of the Father, far above all. This is such a stupendous revelation, that the reader may be conscious of a momentary hesitation in accepting this as truth, for if it be not truth in excelsis, it approaches blasphemy. Not only is the poor outcast Gentile "saved by grace" and "made nigh". He advances with boldness to take his place, not only far above every name that is named, but to find a seat "with Christ" where He sits in heavenly places.

This high glory is so exceedingly above all that the Scriptures written beforehand either taught or foreshadowed, that the complete distinctiveness of the dispensation of the Mystery can be hung upon this one passage, without fear of challenge or contradiction. There is nothing in the Epistle to the Hebrews like it. The second term "in Christ Jesus" does not belong exclusively to any one of these three verbs, but to the three together.

The quickening together with Christ	\	is all
The raising together with Christ	}	"in Christ Jesus".
The seating together with Christ in heavenly places	/

The title "Christ Jesus" is exclusive to the ministry of Paul, but is never used in the Epistle to the Hebrews. A consultation of the R.V. will show this, and the reader will find the R.V. alterations set out in Volume XXX, page 153, of the Berean Expositor.

Those who have this high privilege are spoken of as being faithful "in Christ Jesus" Eph. i. 1, and the seven occurrences of this phrase should be pondered by every reader. We give the references only (Eph. i. 1; ii. 6, 7, 10, 13; iii. 11 and 21). The two other occurrences where the title "Christ Jesus" appears are Eph. i. 1 and iii. 1 where Paul, either as the Apostle or the Prisoner "of Christ Jesus", rounds off the number of occurrences. It will be seen that every passage in Ephesians that uses this exclusive title of the Lord refers to something distinctive of the dispensation of the Mystery.

There is a title of the church that prepares the mind for the stupendous revelation of Eph. ii. 6, if only we ponder its wording and intention. The Church of the Mystery has more than one title.

It is "the Church which is His Body" (Eph. i. 22, 23); but it is also "the fullness of Him that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 23). If we will but observe the way in which this word "fullness" associates the Saviour with the Invisible God (Col. i. and ii.; John i.), we may be the better prepared for the revelation that such a title brings of the high glory of the church which is His Body.

No.10. The Seventh Step, Reality. "Manifested with Him in glory." pp. 112 - 116

We now arrive at the topmost rung of the sevenfold ladder that, commencing with the Cross, ends with Glory. We have been pursuing in these studies, the upward movement which commences with "crucifixion with Christ". Before we commence our study in the passage that contains our text, namely Col. iii., let us see for ourselves that "life" which is there said to be "hid with Christ in God" and is yet to be enjoyed in reality when the believer is "manifested with Him in glory", "life" is indicated as the goal at every step that we have traversed.

"Crucified with" (Gal. ii. 20). This has life in view.

> "I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I LIVE; yet not I, but Christ LIVETH in me: and the LIFE I now LIVE in the flesh I LIVE by the faith of the Son of God, Who love me, and gave Himself for me."

"Dead with" (II Tim. ii. 11). This has life in view.

> "It is a faithful saying: For if we be dead with Him, we shall also LIVE with Him."

"Buried with" (Rom. vi. 4). This has life in view.

> "Therefore we are buried with Him by baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of LIFE."

"Quickened with" (Eph. ii. 5). As this contains the very word "life" zao, nothing need be added to it.

"Raised with" (Col. ii. 12). This too necessitates the gift of life.

"Seated with" (Eph. ii. 6). This is the last of three verbs used in the context that necessarily imply life, the first being "quickened with", the second "raised with". Every step has dealt with some obstacle to the entering in of abundant life, but here, in Col. iii., that blessed moment is brought before us.

> "For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ, Who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with Him in glory" (Col. iii. 3, 4).

Three divisions of this passage present themselves for review:

A | Your life is HID WITH Christ IN God
B | Christ, Who IS our life
A | Ye shall APPEAR WITH Him IN Glory.

The Colossians could be "warned" or called upon to "beware" that no man beguile them of their "reward", but no warning is uttered about the possibility of losing their "life". That is untouchable, it is hid with Christ in God. The Apostle has said something in the first chapter of Colossians that prepares the way for this great truth:

> "For the hope which is laid up for you in heaven" (Col. i. 5).

This same expression is used in II Tim. iv. 8, where it speaks of the "crown of righteousness" that was "laid up" for the Apostle, and for all who have loved "His appearing". While therefore, we must keep the Hope and the Prize distinct, we observe that they are both "laid up" and both connected with "His appearing", the hope being "the appearing" itself (Col. iii. 1-4), the crown being awarded to those who love that appearing.

It is natural that in connexion with a "mystery" certain essential elements should have been "hid", otherwise the word mystery would be emptied of meaning:

> "And to make all men see what is the fellowship (dispensation R.V.) of the mystery, which from the beginning of the world hath been HID IN GOD" (Eph. iii. 9).
>
> "Even the mystery which hath been HID from ages and from generations, but now is made manifest to His saints" (Col. i. 26).
>
> "To the acknowledgment of the mystery of God—Christ (Revised texts) in Whom are HID all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (Col. ii. 2, 3).
>
> "Your life is HID with Christ IN GOD" (Col. iii. 3).

These four passage which use the word "hid" fall into a simple form of introverted parallelism:

A | Eph. iii. 9. Dispensation. Hid in God.
  B | Col. i. 26. Mystery. Christ in you. Riches.
  B | Col. ii. 3. Mystery. Christ in Whom hid treasures.
A | Col. iii. 3. Life. Hid in God.

It will be seen that the words that relate to the hope of the church of the Mystery are in line with the peculiar nature of the dispensation with which this hope closes. We shall see how this contrasts with the hope that is entertained by other callings presently. Our second consideration however is what is intended by the words "Christ Who is our Life".

Our life is hid "with Christ in God', that is one aspect of truth and a very comforting aspect it is too.

Yet however great the assurance implied in the words "with Christ" or "in God", the next statement is even fuller and deeper. Christ Himself IS our life.

The coming of the dispensation of the Mystery completely broke down the middle wall of partition, making both far off and nigh One new man. In this unity Christ is our peace (Eph. ii. 14). The very fact that the riches of the glory of the Mystery could now be proclaimed among the Gentiles, was another indication that a dispensational change had come, and the outstanding warrant for such is once again Christ, among you, the hope of glory (Col. i. 27). In addition I Tim. i. 1 declares that Christ is our hope. Full partition, full assurance and full comprehension of the will of God for any dispensation may be beyond the attainment of the holiest here below, but most certainly in connexion with the innermost shrine of Revelation, the acknowledgment of Christ as "all in all" brings us near to the heart of the mystery.

> "To the acknowledging of the mystery of God—Christ" (Col. ii. 2).

It is therefore perfectly in harmony with this great revelation, that it should now be revealed that Christ is our life. If He is our life, it necessarily follows that while He awaits the day of manifestation, we cannot expect to be in full possession of life, the realization of our hope must coincide with His appearing.

It is time therefore to turn to the third aspect of this truth indicated earlier, namely "the appearing with Him in glory". The English words "appear" and "make manifest" are used in the Authorized Version as synonymous, and there are doubtless good reasons for the choice of first one and then the other word that we meet in the N.T. It will however simplify our present study if we decide to use one or the other in this article, even though the decision may be exceeding difficult for us to make, and should not be extended beyond our present quest.

First let us note the different words that are translated "appear" and "manifest".

APPEAR phainomai and the derivatives anaphainomai, emphanizo, epiphaino, phaneros and phaneroo. These all partake of the primitive meaning of "shining by means of light", leading us via the word phao, to phos, the ordinary word for "light".

Other words used in the N.T. and translated "appear" are erchomai "to come", and optomai "to be seen".

MANIFEST phaneroo, emphanizo, emphanes and phanerosis. And delos and ekdelos in the sense of being "evident", prodelos in the sense of being evident beforehand.

It will be seen by reference to Col. iii. 4, that the only words that are our immediate concern are phaino and its derivatives, and of these one only demands a more extended examination namely the word phaneroo, which is translated in the A.V. "make manifest" nineteen times, "manifest" nine times, "manifest forth" once, and "be manifest" twice (or thirty-one times taken together) as over against "declare manifestly" once, "shew" three times, and "shew oneself" twice (or six times taken together), and "appear" twelve times. It will be seen that the choice lies between "manifest" and "appear" with the balance in favour of "manifest". This word is placed over against the conception of being "hid" either expressed or implied in Mark iv. 22; John iii. 20, 21; II Cor. iv. 2, 3; Col. i. 26; iii. 3, 4.

Phaneroo occurs in Colossians itself as follows: In connexion with the distinctive ministry of the Apostle Paul, as the steward of the dispensation of the Mystery. Up to the time of his commission as the prisoner of Jesus Christ for us Gentiles this mystery had been hid from ages and from generations, but "now" when the dispensational change took place consequent upon Israel's blindness, this Mystery and its calling were "made manifest to His saints". It was in view of this trust that the Apostle asked for the prayers of the Colossians on his behalf, that God would open a door of utterance, to speak the mystery of Christ, for which, said he, "I am also in bonds, that I may make it manifest, as I ought to speak" (Col. i. 25, 26; iv. 3, 4). These references are limited to the initial revelation of the truth of the Mystery, but a future manifestation must yet be made before those who are blessed under its terms can enter into their inheritance. This time, it is not the Mystery that was "hid" but the life of the believer, and that life will not be manifested until Christ Himself, and His Church with Him, shall be manifested in glory.

Other dispensations and other callings have other phases of the One great hope in harmony with their respective callings. Some shall inherit the earth, and the word parousia "coming" is constantly employed to designate this phase of the hope. Some partake of the heavenly calling, and look for that city which hath foundations, the words parousia and apocalypse are employed to describe their hope. Some will meet the Lord "in the air", some will see Him when He descends upon the Mount of Olives, but the church of the Mystery, in keeping with their high calling, will find their sphere of blessing to be "heavenly places" "far above all" and so will be "manifested with Him IN GLORY".

How far the distinctions of present callings will be perpetuated into what we call "eternity" is not revealed, and it is idle for us to speculate. It cannot be conceived that "life" so abundant, so glorious, provided at such cost, and manifested in such a sphere, is not destined for high and holy service. Let us, as we cast our mind back over the "reckonings" that started with the Cross and now by faith contemplate the consummating "reality" in the glory, realize that all life's experiences may be sanctified and blessed as we press on to that wondrous day when we shall be WITH Him and LIKE Him, and that for ever.

Acts Thirteen or Acts Twenty-eight?

or

When did the present dispensation of the Mystery begin?

pp. 81 - 100

"When does a dispensation begin?" The question is important because of its bearing upon the claims of Acts xxviii., or of Acts xiii., to be the beginning of the dispensation of the Mystery, and of the Church which is the One Body. From one angle we may say that, inasmuch as "known unto God are all His works from the beginning of the world" (Acts xv. 18), every dispensation and every movement in the great outworking of the purpose of the ages must have begun in the mind of God before time. This however scarcely answers the intention of "When does a dispensation begin?" Again, every dispensation of grace and mercy is founded in the cross of Christ, and inasmuch as the middle wall of partition and the enmity contained in ordinances were abolished at Calvary, one could say that the dispensation of the Mystery, even as the dispensation of the kingdom of Israel, began at one and the same time, namely when Christ was crucified. This again does not meet the intention of the question "when does a dispensation begin?"

There are certain features foretold that must synchronize before a dispensation can begin, and these features are of such a unique character that they cannot be missed or ignored. What these features are in connection with the dispensation of the Mystery, most readers know. To lift two out of the many:

(1) Israel will become lo-ammi, not My people, and God will cease (temporarily) to be their God (Hos. i. 3). Did this take place at Acts xiii.?

(2) Paul received the dispensation of the grace of God by revelation when he became the Prisoner of Jesus Christ for us Gentiles (Eph. iii. 1-13). Did this take place at Acts xiii.?

There can be but one answer to these questions. They did not take place until the events recorded in Acts xxviii. became history. A dispensation is a "stewardship" (see "The Key of Knowledge"). A stewardship implies a steward who receives a commission, and a dispensation "begins" when that steward receives the command "Go . . . . . tell this people" (Isa. vi. 9), even as Paul waited until words of the Lord were recorded, "unto whom now I SEND thee" (Acts xxvi. 17).

For the moment it is immaterial whether Paul himself knew wholly or in part, the contents of this new dispensation before the time came for its announcement; what is material is to discover when he and his message were "sent", and this can be discovered by reading Acts xxvi. 16-18 and Acts xxviii. 28. While we must therefore stress the dispensational importance of Acts xxviii., that does not mean that Acts xiii. is of no or of little importance to us, for to ignore Acts xiii. while emphasizing Acts xxviii., would be as foolish as being indifferent to the foundations of a skyscraper in New York, simply because one occupied a suite of offices hundreds of feet above ground! What however is obvious, is that there must be all the difference in the world between the foundations of any building, and the top storey. Without the separate ministry initiated at Acts xiii. Paul would hardly have been prepared for the great ministry associated with his imprisonment. Acts xiii. not only sets the Apostle apart, it provides at least four outstanding features which make its contribution vital:

(1) The foreshadowing of the blindness of Israel and the sending of the salvation of God to the Gentiles is obvious in the ministry recorded in Acts xiii. 6-12.
(2) The foreshadowing of the lo-ammi period of uncounted time that characterizes the present parenthetical dispensation of the Mystery (Acts xiii. 17-22). This must be demonstrated presently.
(3) The introduction into the record of that fundamental doctrine, namely Justification by faith (Acts xiii. 38, 39).
(4) The anticipatory turning from Israel to the Gentile (Acts xiii. 46-48).

Before examining Acts xiii. 6-12, let us observe that in Acts iii. and iv. Peter's ministry was also foreshadowed by a typical miracle. Perhaps it is not quite right to single out the healing of the lame man and call it a "dispensational miracle" for the miracles performed by the Lord and His apostles in almost every case foreshadow spiritual truths. The miracle of the death of Ananias and Sapphira, for instance, was a dispensational anticipation; and also the judgment of blindness that fell upon Elymas. Nevertheless, while all miracles are called "the powers of the age to come" (Heb. vi. 5), this initial miracle of the Acts in a special way follows on the day of Pentecost and illuminates its prophetic character.

Peter's miracle of healing (Acts iii. 1 - iv. 22).
The miracle of restoration.

A | iii. 1-11. The miracle. Its performance.
B | a | iii. 12-16. Explanation. "The Name."
b | iii. 17-24. Prophetic application.
B | a | iii. 25 - iv. 10. Explanation. "The Name."
b | iv. 11, 12. Prophetic application.
A | iv. 13-22. The miracle. Its acknowledgment.

Two corresponding passages in this record indicate the way in which the healing of the lame man foreshadowed Peter's ministry to Israel:

B | b | iii. 17-24.
b | J1 | 17, 18. Fulfillment. Mouth of prophets. Suffering.
K1 | 19-21. Repent; Refreshing; Restitution.
J2 | 21. Fulfillment. Mouth of prophets. Glory.
K2 | 22-24. Hear . . . . . if not . . . . . destroyed.

* * * * * * *

B | b | iv. 11, 12.
b | J1 | 11. Rejected Stone becomes Head.
K1 | 12. Neither is there THE HEALING in any other.
J2 | 12. None other name under heaven.
K2 | 12. Whereby saved (healing of nation).

We must first discover the general disposition of subject-matter so that we may realize what are the salient features of the narrative, and not omit any step that is essential to the carrying forward of the theme.

Peter's words in Acts iii. 19-26 are a direct prophetic exposition of the meaning of this miracle. He urges repentance with a view to the time of refreshing and restoration that will be brought in by the return of the Lord from heaven. This coming of Christ, and the blessings that will flow from it, are in perfect harmony with the testimony of Moses and all the prophets (Acts iii. 22-24), and with the covenant made with Abraham and his seeds (Acts iii. 25, 26). It is impossible to read "the Church", meaning the Church of the Mystery, into this passage, especially when we read the concluding words:

> "YE are the children of the prophets . . . . . Unto YOU first God, having raised up His Son Jesus, sent Him to bless YOU, in turning away every one of YOU from his iniquities."

The point of Peter's explanation lies in the word translated "salvation" (Acts iv. 12). We read that the lame man had been more than forty years a cripple, which makes us think at once of Israel in their unbelief. The words "perfect soundness" (Acts iii. 16) refer back to Israel's condition as described in Isa. i. 6 where the LXX uses the same word with the negative, "no soundness". The word "whole" in Acts iv. 9, "by what means he is made whole", is sesostai, from sozo, "to save". The word "salvation" in Acts iv. 12 is he soteria, literally "the healing". "Neither is there salvation in any other."

This then, is Peter's explanation. The lame man who had been healed, and who was seen walking and leaping and praising God (Acts iii. 8), was a picture of the day when "the lame man shall leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb shall sing" (Isa. xxxv. 6). Bringing the healed man forward, Peter says in effect:

> "Look at this man. He has been healed by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, and stands before you as a prophetic anticipation of Israel's restoration; neither is there THE HEALING (that is, the healing and restoration of Israel) in any other. None but this despised and rejected Messiah can ever avail."

Alas, Israel did not repent. The next outstanding typical miracle is that of a Jew stricken with blindness, while a Gentile believes (Acts xiii.). That type is fulfilled in Acts xxviii., when blindness falls upon the whole nation and "the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles" (Acts xxviii. 28).

The gist of the typical miracle of Acts xiii. 6-12 can be expressed as follows:

I. A Jew withstands the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentile.

This was the climax sin of Israel, and brought about their dispersion and present blindness, as may be gathered from the following passage:

> "Forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles that they might be saved, to fill up their sins alway: for the wrath is come upon them to the uttermost" (I Thess. ii. 16).

This is the charge laid against those in Judæa. It may sound incredible but something of the same antagonism must be perceived in Peter's attitude to Cornelius, for he himself uses the same word "forbid" in Acts x. 47 and in Acts xi. 17 "withstand". True, Peter altered his attitude, but the attitude must have been there for him to alter. This word "forbid" awaits us in the last verse of the Acts. With Israel dismissed and no longer a factor, Paul's preaching to the Gentiles was at last "unforbidden" (Acts xxviii. 31).

II. A Gentile is saved who bears the same name as the Apostle.

Recently a coin was dug up in Cyprus bearing the inscription "In the Pro-consulship of Paullus". The inscriptions spell Paullus with a double "l". The Acts spell it with one "l". There was a freedom in the spelling of names in early days (Shakespeare is spelled about seven or more ways) and the Holy Ghost has adopted the present spelling evidently to make the link with the Apostle complete. It was, and still is, the custom for a Jew to have a Hebrew and a Gentile name. In our own Whitechapel it would be easy to find someone known familiarly in the street as "Bill" or "Tom", who within the family circle would be "Isaac" or "Moses". The custom has indeed provided a joke in an illustrated Yiddish paper. Moreover, the names adopted by the Jew are contemporaneous with his times. In Persian and Babylonian times we have "Nehemiah" and "Belteshazzar": under Greek influence we have such a name as "Philip". In Roman times we have "Justus", "Niger" and "Priscilla". In the Middle Ages we find the Jews bearing the name "Basil" or "Leo". (For a fuller treatment of the subject see Zunz' Namen der Juden). Jerome refers to the Roman custom of adopting the name of a country that had been conquered, as did Scipio, who, having conquered Africa, took the name Africanus. Certainly there is intentional emphasis upon the Gentile convert's name here. There is every likelihood, that, as Paul was a freeman, his family took the name of some Roman family immediately associated with this freedom. So, from this time onward, the Apostle is known as Paul; never again is he called by the old Hebrew name, which, with his old self and past, was dead and buried. There can be no doubt that the introduction of Saul's Gentile name at this particular juncture is intentional. Paul is here definitely linked with (1) The salvation of a Gentile; (2) The blinding of a Jew, a clear foreshadowing of the close of the Acts.

III. The foreshadowing of a lo-ammi period.

In Acts xiii. 16-41 Paul bases his teaching upon selected incidents in Israel's history, and in this he was but adopting the same method that was employed by Stephen. In Acts vii., Stephen's resumé of Israel's history impinges upon two most characteristic events:

(1) The rejection of Joseph by his brethren, and the making of himself known "the second time" (Acts vii. 9-13).
(2) The rejection of Moses, and the acceptance of him after his rejection and forty years absence in Midian (Acts vii. 20-35).

In his application of these historic facts Stephen accused his people saying "ye do always resist the Holy Ghost: as your fathers did, so do ye" (Acts vii. 51).

Paul's employment of Israel's history does not yield its peculiar purpose without some close consideration. This, however, we hope to demonstrate. In Acts xiii. 17-22 Paul starting from the Exodus traverses Israel's history up to the time of David. And the following will be clear to all:

Wilderness wandering about	40 years
Period of Judges until Samuel about	450 "
Reign of Saul	40 "
Reign of David (II Sam. v. 4)	40 "
	---
	570 years
	========

The total length covered by Paul's computation being 570 years. So far all is clear, but if we compare this computation with that of I Kings vi. 1 we come against a difficulty. From the Exodus to the third year of Solomon, according to this computation is 480 years. We must add the 3 years of Solomon's reign to the 570 given above, to bring both totals level, and this reveals a discrepancy of 93 years (480 from 573 = 93). How is this to be accounted for? It is accounted for by the application of a principle, that whenever Israel become Lo-ammi "not My people" the prophetic clock stops and time is unrecorded. In the time of the Judges, Israel, for their sins were "sold" to outside nations, and the number of years thus "lost" is exactly 93—thus:

Judges	iii. 8	- 8 years
	iii. 14	- 18
	iv. 3	- 20
	vi. 1	- 7
	xiii. 1	- 40 years =	93 years lost.

Whether wittingly or unwittingly, Paul introduced into this great typical chapter of Acts xiii. the need to recognize that a tremendous dispensational change involving even the computation of time, hinged upon Israel's lo-ammi state. That state was entered in Acts xxviii. and since that day, from about the years 63-70A.D., prophetic time has ceased to run, we live in a parenthesis, and a period of about 2,000 years, not merely 93, drops out of the Divine calendar.

IV. The basic doctrine of Justification by faith.

It is the testimony of the Prophets, that the redeemed must be covered with a robe of righteousness (Isa. lxi. 10) and that Israel's natural righteousness, or their attempt at justification under the law, was an absolute failure (Isa. lxiv. 6). "The Lord our Righteousness" of Jer. xxiii. 6 and xxxiii. 16 is a clear anticipation of Justification by grace. The work of Christ and the exposition of that work, but revealed what was incipient in the law and the prophets (Rom. iii. 21, 22), and was the only ground for the forgiveness of sins committed before Christ came and for all time subsequently (Rom. iii. 25).

Fundamental to the ministry of Paul, whether during the Acts and while free, or after Acts xxviii., as "the Prisoner of Jesus Christ" for us Gentiles is this glorious doctrine. This he enunciated for the first time in this great anticipatory chapter, Acts xiii.

> "Be it known unto you therefore, men and brethren, that through this man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins: and by Him all that believe are justified from all things from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses" (Acts xiii. 38, 39).

Phil. iii. 9 sums up Paul's teaching on Justification, even as Eph. ii. 8-10 sums up his teaching on Salvation, or Col. ii. 11-17 sums up his teaching concerning ceremonies, rites and observances. In the Prison epistles where the great theme is the "Mystery", Paul had no need to repeat the terms which constituted the foundation upon which all callings, whether Kingdom or Church, whether Earthly, Heavenly or Far above all, must ultimately rest.

V. The anticipatory turning from Israel to the Gentile.

The Jews at Antioch maintained their antagonistic attitude against the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles, and this led to a local turning from the Jew, a foreshadowing of its universal aspect which awaited Acts xxviii.

> "Lo we turn to the Gentiles" (Acts xiii. 46).

Three reasons are provided by the Scripture which should prevent anyone from misinterpreting this action of the Apostle.

(a) It was according to the prophetic utterance of Isa. xlix. 6 and had been quoted by Simeon as recorded in Luke ii. 32. If Acts xiii. 47 proves that the dispensation of the Mystery had then begun, it proves too much, for it also proves that it began when old Simeon blessed the infant Christ in the temple! Does anyone teach that?

(b) We are assured that the dispensation of the Mystery was not a subject of O.T. prophecy, but had been hid in God, only to be revealed when Paul became the Prisoner of Jesus Christ for us Gentiles (Eph. iii. 1-13; Col. i. 24-27), and this being so, the reference in Acts xiii. 46-47 to the prophecy of Isaiah can have no reference to the Mystery. Neither faith nor reason can believe a contradiction of terms.

(c) That this turning to the Gentile was local, the opening verse of Acts xiv. makes sufficiently clear, as also the references to his ministry in the synagogues in Acts xvii. 1, 10-17; xviii. 4, 19, 26 and xix. 8. An illustration at this juncture may prove of service.

In days of old, two armoured knights approached each other along a road that led by a castle, from which hung a large shield. The first knight exclaimed "what a splendid GOLEDN shield!" The second knight countered with "what a splendid SILVER shield!" and these were gentlemen of brawn rather than of brain, they immediately battered one another with sword and mace, until they both sank exhausted on the opposite bank, to draw breath. From this position they saw what they might have seen earlier, that the shield was golden on one side and silver on the other. Acts xiii. is the silver shield of doctrinal preparation, Acts xxviii. the golden shield of dispensational realization. Both passages are necessary, but it is a mistake to transfer the offices of the one passage to the other. Some of the people of God who maintain that Acts xiii. not Acts xxviii. is the dispensational boundary, appear by their "proofs" to confuse similarities with identity. As this is the stone of stumbling here, let us attempt to clear the ground.

Similarities do not constitute Identity.

(An important principle of interpretation considered and commended to all true "Bereans").

On pages 173 to 177 of Volume XXXIII, we attempted to answer an objection that had been made to our teaching, based upon the incidence in Hebrews of words or expressions similar to others found in Ephesians. This objection was expressed in a letter, from which we gave an unedited extract. If this extract does not accord with a booklet since published by the writer of the letter, it will be understood that such variation, while within his rights, cannot reflect upon our own integrity.

The reasoning that underlies this method of examination is fallacious in that it discovers similarities but interprets them as identicals. Whether they are concerned with the problem put forward in the article referred to or not, we believe it would be a "word in season" to all our readers if this fallacious argument was exposed, because principles of interpretation are fundamental to all understanding, and should occupy a prominent place in the Christian worker's equipment.

The principle stated: Similarities, however many, cannot constitute identity in the presence of one proved contrary. This may sound rather involved, but the following illustration may convince of its essential truth.

The principle illustrated: Here is a supposed description, circulated by the police, of a wanted man:

> "A man, past middle age, height 5'7½", dark hair, slightly grey at temples, eyes grey, complexion pale, aquiline features, tendency to stoop, interested in art and music, editor of a religious paper; last known place of residence, London, S.W."

The reader who is personally acquainted with the editor of The Berean Expositor, will recognize the foregoing as a fairly good description of him. Now, let us further suppose that the police, acting upon information, take the editor into custody. He is examined point by point, and found to tally with the description. Surely some would say, "This is the man!" If a list of similarities proves identity, then the prospects before the editor look rather bleak.

As we have seen, the believer may put into a parallel columns words found in Hebrews or passages from I Corinthians and Ephesians, and say, in effect, "These prove identity", "This is the same calling", but, happily, the police do not mistake similarities for identity. One clear statement of fact that introduces a contrary, sets aside columns of similarities in the matter of identity. The editor of The Berean Expositor would have had not the slightest qualm in going up for examination, for he was in possession of one essential fact which disproved his identity with the criminal concerned: the wanted man was born in New York, whereas the editor was born in London. We cannot conceive that any official would interpose and say, "We are not concerned with where this man was born, we are more concerned with the many items of similarity. He must be the man!" Yet that is the attitude of mind of those who claim Acts xiii., as the dispensational frontier.

Alas, the children of this generation are often wiser than the children of light, and would at once admit that one established contrary destroys assumed identity based on many similarities. "Similar" is not the "Same".

In Ephesians we discover a revelation never before made known; a choice from "before the foundation of the world"; a calling "far above all"; a unique position, "seated together in heavenly places". Any one of these is a "contrary" to the revelation, the choice, the calling, or the position revealed in Paul's earlier epistles or indicated in Acts xiii.

We will not occupy valuable space with further illustrations of this principle, for we believe it is obvious. The reader can work out other illustrations, for example, by noting that the "ransom" occurs in Matthew and in I Timothy, and disprove the conclusion that the callings of Matthew and I Timothy must therefore be identical. In this case the emphasis on the Gentile in the epistle, and the emphasis of Israel in the gospel provide the "contraries".

Parallel passages abound in Scripture, but, instead of impinging on the domain of other callings, they, like those of Euclidean geometry, never meet. Let us "try the things that differ"; let us "rightly divide the word of truth". We shall then "approve the things that are more excellent", and be workmen who need not be ashamed.
(Berean Volume34)

This short article, reprinted from Volume XXXIV of The Berean Expositor, was written to meet the argument brought forward by a correspondent, that because certain terms found in Ephesians were also found in Hebrews, that Hebrews presents what he called "Ephesian Truth". We do not believe that those who insist on Acts xiii. as the dispensational boundary, would fall for that specious argument so far as Hebrews is concerned, but they appear to have done so in their attempt to prove their case concerning this chapter.

The terms found in Hebrews, were Heb. vi. 17 "heirs"; Heb. xiii. 3 "body"; Heb. iii. 1 "partakers" and these were supposed to be all sufficient proof that Hebrews taught the same truth as Ephesians.

Those who believe the thirteenth chapter of Acts constitutes the dispensational dividing line instead of Acts xxviii., draw attention to:

(1) A mystery before the world (I Cor. ii. 7).
(2) "One Body" (I Cor. xii. 12, 27).
(3) The seal and earnest (II Cor. i. 22), and these are supposed to establish their claim.

They are similarities, but do not establish identity. Let us "open the book". When we adopt this salutary principle of never conducting an argument with a closed Bible, we observe that while we have "seal" and "earnest" before and after Acts xxviii., II Cor. i. 21 is a four-fold not a two-fold confirmation. "Establishing" and "anointing" are there also. This establishing was, said the Apostle of "us with you", the Greek word establish being bebaio. This same word is found in I Cor. i. 6 "even as the testimony was confirmed in you" and adds "so that you come behind in no gift". With this we should read Heb. ii. 3, 4 "confirmed unto us by them that heard Him, God also bearing them witness, both with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost". This word "anointing" (chrio) is to be read in the light of I John ii. 27:

> "But the anointing (chrisma) which ye have received of Him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you: but as the same anointing (chrisma) teacheth you of all things . . . . ."

Here we have confirmation or establishing together with anointing, which things are absent from Ephesians, even as all such "spiritual gifts" are absent from the dispensation of the Mystery.

We turn next to I Cor. xii. This chapter is concerned with "spiritual gifts" as verse one informs us, their variety yet their unity, and these gifts include miracles and supernatural knowledge, gifts not in the possession of the Church of the Mystery. I Cor. xii. first of all distinguishes between spiritual gifts that emanate from evil sources and those spiritual gifts which come from the Lord. Looking at the second part we observe that it is subdivided into three groups:

(1) There are diversities of gifts, but the same SPIRIT.
(2) There are differences of administrations, but the same LORD.
(3) There are diversities of operations, but the same GOD (xii. 4-6).

Here we notice that while there are differences, there is also an all-pervading unity. In verses 7-11 the diversity of gifts (No.1 above) is considered at length. First the manifestation of the Spirit is given to profit withal. Secondly, this manifestation is a "diversity in unity":

"To one . . .	is given . . .	the word of wisdom . . . by the Spirit.
To another . . .	is given . . .	the word of knowledge . . . by the same Spirit.
To another . . .	is given . . .	faith . . . by the same Spirit.
To another . . .	is given . . .	the gifts of healing . . . by the one Spirit. (Vaticanus)
To another . . .	is given . . .	the working of miracles.
To another . . .	is given . . .	prophecy.
To another . . .	is given . . .	the discerning of spirits.

To another . . . is given . . . divers kind of tongues.
To another . . . is given . . . the interpretation of tongues.

but ALL these worketh that ONE and the SELF SAME SPIRIT, dividing to every man severally as He will" (xii. 8-11).

This expansion of the subject is followed by the reference to the body, being introduced by the words kathaper gar ("for just as"); the references to the body, therefore, are logically connected with the teaching of the chapter "concerning spiritual gifts". This is taught by the word "for". The references to the body are given and must be taken as an illustration of the diversity in unity of these spiritual gifts. This is taught by the words "just as". "For just as the body is ONE, and hath MANY members yet all the members of that body, being many, are one body, so also is the Christ" (Ho Christos). This is the title of the Lord pre-eminently, yet not exclusively. Any who were anointed by God come under that title.

Here we have the "diversities" of I Cor. xii. The confirmation and the anointing by means of these supernatural gifts have been withdrawn, but the seal and the earnest remain and belong to the present dispensation. "The anointed" therefore of I Cor. xii. or of II Cor. i. 21 is NOT THE CHURCH OF THE ONE BODY (which is characterized by the absence of all signs and evidential miracles), but that church which was composed of supernaturally-gifted believers. The argument of the Apostle is therefore, that the gifts are to be looked upon as so many different members of one body, and that each gift is necessary to the perfect functioning of the whole, the more ostentatious gifts, such as speaking with tongues, being no more important than the less obtrusive ones. Whatever gift had been given to any individual was to be held and used for the edifying of the whole company.

This unity is brought about by the baptism of the one Spirit, Who baptized all these believers into one body (I Cor. xii. 13), and the remaining verses take up the thought of the diversity of gifts and the unity of their origin by a more detailed reference to a human body. Following on therefore from the teaching of verse twelve the Apostle says:

"For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Greeks, whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit. For the body is not one member, but many" (I Cor. xii. 13, 14).

Many seize upon these words as though they were a revelation of the Mystery of the One Body, which had been hidden since the ages. Such have only to read chapter x. 1-4 which precedes this section of the epistle to see the reference back to Exodus:

"All our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea; And were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea; And did all eat the same spiritual meat; and did all drink the same spiritual drink."

This being so, the only logical thing to do, by any who claim I Cor. xii. for "The Mystery" is to abandon the whole matter, for if Exodus and Isaiah teach us our calling, the exclusive character of the Mystery is nullified.

Returning to I Cor. xii., let us notice the "one body" as the Apostle details it. "If the foot shall say, because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body?" Here is clearly a resumption of the argument of verses 7-12, "if the ear shall say, because I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it not therefore of the body?" Here, members of the head are introduced which cannot possibly be true of the Church of the One Body, for the Head of that Body is Christ Himself. The next verse is directed against the spiritual pride of those who possessed some more apparent gift than others, "if the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing?" "but now God hath set the members every one of them in the body as it hath pleased him." With this verse read verses 27, 28:

> "Now ye are a body of Christ, and members in part, and God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers (these are the members like the eye or the ear), after that miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversity of tongues."

Coming back to verse nineteen we observe the continuation of the argument, "and if they were all one member, where were the body? But now are they many members, yet one body". The argument is pursued even to speaking of "uncomely parts", which certainly can find no place in "the Church which is His Body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all". Chapter xiii. is the more excellent way, and chapter xiv. resumes the theme of the gifts. Here the Apostle dwells upon the useful gifts, and "edifying" is a key word, "forasmuch as ye are zealous of spiritual gifts, seek that ye may excel to the edifying of the church" (verse twelve).

The endeavour to read into I Cor. xii. that which is declared to be a mystery unrevealed until the imprisonment of Paul robs both sets of teaching of their point and purpose. In Corinthians the Church in connection with the supernatural gifts is likened to a body, the Church of the Mystery is spoken of as being dispensationally THE body. Let us try the things that differ.

Finally, with reference to the presence of a mystery in I Cor. ii. 7 we find that both Paul and his fellow labourers were to be accounted "stewards of the mysteries (plural) of God" (I Cor. iv. 1) yet one has only to read Eph. iii. 1-13 or Col. i. 24-26 to realize that here we have a mystery and a dispensation that differs essentially from all that has gone before. Why these good folk do not go back to Matt. xiii. and make the dispensation of the Mystery start there as some do, we do not know, for "mystery" is the key word to that chapter of parables.

We find therefore, that:

(1) The dispensation of the Mystery (Eph. iii. 9 R.V.) was entrusted to one, and to one only, namely the Apostle Paul.
(2) That this dispensation is intimately associated with Paul as "the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles" a condition that Acts xiii. cannot fulfil.
(3) That this dispensation was a matter of revelation, and unsearchable, and had been "hid in God" since the ages.
(4) That this dispensation was made known at a point of time, which when Ephesians was written could be called "now".

These features make this dispensation of the Mystery unique. No one has any warrant to say that other mysteries were not in the mind of God "since the ages" or if they were that this must all refer to the same event, even as Acts xv. 18 suggests.

One other most important item must be referred to in connection with the claim that Acts xiii. is the commencement of the dispensation of the Mystery, and that is the position of the people of Israel at the time. When the ministry of this chapter was initiated, Israel was still a people recognized by God. Both in the record of the Acts, and in the epistles of the period the hope of Israel runs through the record from end to end (cf. Acts xxvi. 6,7; xxviii. 20; Rom. xv. 12, 13), and while the hope of Israel remained, the Mystery could not obtain. We must find some place in the history of the times where Israel become lo-ammi "not My people" (Hos. i. 9; iii. 3, 4) and that cannot be found anywhere in the N.T. except at Acts xxviii. 28, 29.

For a fuller analysis of this feature, see the booklet Acts xxviii: the Dispensational Frontier.

While much can be learned by comparing the circumstances that produced the thirteenth or twenty-eighth chapter of the Acts, we shall miss the most important lessons unless we consider Acts xiii. positively, and see for ourselves what it is designed to teach.

The Acts of the Apostles is mainly the record of two ministries:

(1) THE MINISTRY OF PETER (i. 15 - xii. 23).
(2) THE MINISTRY OF PAUL (xii. 24 - xxviii. 31).

When we compare what happened at Antioch (Acts xiii.) and at Rome (Acts xxviii.) we perceive that the one was a forecast of the other thus:

At Antioch.	A Jew withstands the gospel. Stricken with blindness.
At Rome.	The Jews believe not and blindness falls on the nation.
At Antioch.	A Gentile (Paulus) believes.
At Rome.	The Gentiles the chief care of the Apostle.
At Antioch.	A warning. "Beware lest that come upon you."
At Rome.	A fulfillment. "Lest they should see with their eyes, etc."
At Antioch.	The door of faith opened to the Gentiles.
At Rome.	The salvation of God sent unto the Gentiles.

At Antioch occurs the separation of Barnabas and Paul, and several features of this opening ministry foreshadow the close of the Acts. For example: Paul's first miracle contrasts with Peter's first miracle. Peter heals a Jew; Paul blinds a Jew. This Jew withstands the truth, and a Gentile, who bears the same name as the Apostle, believes. Resulting from the opposition of the Jews at Antioch, there is a local turning from the Jew to the Gentile and Paul utters that word of warning which anticipates the dreadful quotation of Isa. vi., with which the Jew was set aside in the last chapter of the Acts. At the close of chapter xiii. we read:

> "And the word of the Lord was published throughout all the region" (Acts xiii. 49).

And at the close of chapter xiv. we read:

> "And when they were come, and had gathered the church together, they rehearsed all that God had done with them, and how He had opened the door of faith unto the Gentiles" (Acts xiv. 27).

There is a very remarkable contrast found in Acts xiii. and Acts xxviii.

> "But the Jews stirred up the devout and honourable women, and the chief men of the city, and raised persecution against Paul and Barnabas and expelled them out of their coasts" (Acts xiii. 50).

In contrast with this action of the devout, the honourable, and the chief men, we have:

> "And the barbarous people shewed us no little kindness: for they kindled a fire, and received us every one, because of the present rain, and because of the cold . . . . . In the same quarters were possessions of the chief man of the island, whose name was Publius; who received us, and lodged us three days courteously" (Acts xxviii. 2 and 7).

It is encouraging to observe the record of the Holy Spirit in these matters; the names of the "devout", the "honourable" and the "chief", who expelled Paul, have gone down into oblivion, but wherever the Scriptures are read, the name of Publius is recorded with gratitude.

The thirteenth chapter of the Acts, while most important, is necessarily a part only of a larger context, and this is clearly indicated by the structure of the whole section which we now set before the reader.

Acts xii. 24 - xvi. 5.

A | xii. 24. "But the word of God grew and multiplied."
B | xii. 25. | a | Barnabas and Saul.
b | John Mark taken with them.
C | xiii. 1-3. Barnabas and Saul "separated" by the Holy Ghost.
D | xiii. 4 - xiv. 28. |
c1 | Departure from Antioch.
d1 | Justification by faith apart from law of Moses.
c1 | Return to Antioch.
D | xv. 1-35. |
c2 | Men from Judæa raise the question.
d2 | Except ye be circumcised after the manner Moses, ye cannot be saved.
c2 | Men that had hazarded their lives for the Lord Jesus bring the answer.
B | xv. 36-39. | a | Barnabas and Paul.
b | John Mark taken to Cyprus.
C | xv. 40 - xvi. 4. Saul and Timothy approved by the brethren (xv. 26, 27 and xvi. 2).
A | xvi. 5. "And so were the churches established in the faith, and increased in number daily."

At its opening Paul's ministry circled round a statement of truth and a conflict for that truth. The statement was the glorious doctrine of justification by faith (xiii. 39): the conflict was the fight against the Judaism which imposed law and circumcision as necessary to salvation. We are therefore to become witnesses of one of the most important controversies that the world has known; a controversy ever fresh in its applications; a fight for the faith in which we are called upon to engage to this day.

Two acts of separation in Acts mark two steps toward a goal. First, the separation of Barnabas and Saul, Acts xiii. 1-3. Secondly, the separation of the disciples and the end of Paul's synagogue witness (Acts xix. 9), which leads on to the close of one ministry (Acts xx. 17-21) and the prospect of another, and a future ministry associated with "bonds" (Acts xx. 22-25). This "prison ministry" was entered when Israel were dismissed and occupied the "two whole years" of Acts xxviii. 30, balancing as it does "the space of two years" which followed the separation of Acts xix. 9, 10. The significance of these "two years" may be seen by reading Hos. vi. 1, 2 "Come, and let us return unto the Lord". This is the fulfillment of Hos. iii. 5 "Afterward shall the children of Israel return, and seek the Lord their God" and which brings an end to the lo-ammi period, during which Israel were not be called "My people" (Hos. ii. 23; iii. 3, 4). "He hath torn and He will heal us"; Acts xxviii. 27 the words occur "lest . . . . . I should heal them".

If the words of Hos. vi. 2 "after two days will He revive us" refer to two literal days of twenty-four hours, a Monday or a Tuesday for example, one wonders why such a detail should be recorded, but if they are used prophetically, they, together with the two years of Acts xxviii., may foreshadow the length of time during which Israel's blindness will last, and the length of time during which the dispensation of the Mystery will fill the gap. Israel's blindness has lasted nineteen hundred years, and there is every reason from Scripture and from history to believe that the two days of Hos. vi. indicate two days of 1,000 years each, harmonizing with the Day that must come, the Millennium which Rev. xx. affirms will last 1,000 years.

It is a healthy sign when men of God submit all teaching and all theories to the touchstone of all Scripture, but with human nature as it is, we must be prepared to submit their objections to the same test.

We have considered the question "Acts thirteen or Acts twenty-eight", and now briefly consider two other propositions that infringed upon the teaching of the epistles to the Ephesians.

Was Paul a prisoner, in Acts xxviii. 30, 31?

A serious and reverent examination of the teaching that Acts xxviii. 28 is the Dispensational Boundary, has included in its objections, two terms used in Acts xxviii. 30 and 31, which it is incumbent upon us to examine. This objection has been expressed as follows:

> "The direct evidence of Scripture indicates that Paul was neither in prison nor in bonds during the time covered by Acts xxviii. 30, 31."

The first objection is based upon the words "his own hired house", the second on the words "no man forbidding him". There is "direct evidence" that Paul was a prisoner when he reached Rome. Scripture says so: "I was delivered prisoner from Jerusalem into the hands of the Romans . . . . . I appeal(ed) unto Caesar . . . . . for the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain" (Acts xxviii. 17-20). While Paul was in this condition, he received a deputation of Jews to his "lodging". It has been put forward that there is a difference intended between a "lodging" and a "hired house" which should lead us to deny that Paul was a prisoner.

What essential difference we may well ask is there between a "lodging" and "an hired house"? Is it outside the realm of possibility that Acts xxviii. 23 and 30 are two ways of speaking of the same place? How is it possible to argue that Paul could be a prisoner and bound with a chain in his "lodging", but that he must, of necessity be conceived of as being free, if he receives visitors in his own "hired house"? The lodging xenia, means a place for the accommodation of strangers, and xenizo is used in Acts xxviii. 7 where we read that Paul was "lodged" for three days courteously. It seems that if an "hired house" makes prison impossible then most certainly Paul was never a prisoner in Rome at all. But if a Roman prisoner could have a "lodging" then he could also have a "hired house", the two passages stand or fall together. It will be observed in Acts xxviii. 16 that:

> "Paul was suffered to dwell by himself with a soldier that kept him",

"which" Lewin comments "indicates a private residence; and accordingly after this mention is made of the xenia (verse 23), and again of idion misthoma, which express only what had before been less precisely expressed". Further there is no "house" mentioned, but merely a suite of apartments; see Wetstein on Acts xxviii. 30.

It will be seen that the attempt to "prove" from the words "in his own hired house" that Paul was no longer a prisoner is invalid, dwelling by himself (Acts xxviii. 16, 23) as well.

The second ground of objection is the word translated "no man forbidding him", the Greek akolutos. It is amazing that a writer, who in the examination of the Greek terms used, shows such acumen and industry, should have passed over in silence, the way in which this term "unhindered" is used. We do not imply by this remark that this silence was willful. Alas we are only too conscious that we all have our "blind spots".

The following extract from The Alphabetical Analysis page 35/36 will show that "unhindered" has no bearing upon whether Paul was or was not a prisoner at the time, but that it indicates that with the dismissal of Israel, the hindrance offered by the people to the preaching to the Gentiles had ceased.

> "Acts xxviii. ends with the Apostle dwelling for two years in his own hired house preaching and teaching, no man forbidding him."

During Paul's early ministry, the Jew had consistently opposed the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles, and this, said the Apostle, was their climax sin.

They "killed the Lord Jesus" but forgiveness was given and a new opportunity to believe and repent was granted. They had earlier "killed their own prophets" and had more recently "persecuted" the Apostle and his helpers "forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles that they might be saved", reaching however a climax "TO FILL UP their sins alway; for the wrath is come upon them to the uttermost" (I Thess. ii. 15, 16).

"To the bitter end", reads Moffatt. "In its severest form", reads Weymouth. The same word "forbidding" found in I Thess. ii. 16 is the word used of Paul, "no man forbidding him"—Israel the opposer had gone. They had filled up their measure of sin to the brim, and the very Gentiles that they had "forbidden" now entered into blessings hitherto unrevealed (See THREE SPHERES OF BLESSING).

Peter's ministry in the Acts concluded with the words "forbidding" and "withstand", both translations of the Greek word koluo. Paul's ministry concludes with the words "no man forbidding" (Acts xxviii. 31) where the Greek word is akolutos. Peter maintained this attitude up to the tenth chapter of the Acts, he would have "forbidden" both Cornelius and God, for the word "withstand" in Acts xi. 17 is koluo.

The upshot of this work at Caesarea was that even Peter was called upon to give an account of himself.

> "The apostles and brethren that were in Judea heard that the Gentiles had also received the word of God. And when Peter was come up to Jerusalem, they that were of the circumcision contended with him, saying, Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised, and didst eat with them" (Acts xi. 1-3).

We find no remonstrance from Peter to the effect that seeing that the Church began at Pentecost, the conversion of Cornelius should have been anticipated and be a matter for rejoicing. No, Peter patiently, and humbly, and apologizingly, rehearsed the matter, even to the pathetic conclusion: "what was I, that I could withstand God?" or literally "forbid God?" Why should Peter ever think of withstanding God or "forbidding" God if he knew that the Church began at Pentecost? It is abundantly evident that neither Peter, the other Apostles, nor the brethren at Jerusalem had the remotest idea of any such thing.

> "When they heard these things, they held their peace, and glorified God, saying, THEN HATH GOD ALSO to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life" (Acts xi. 18).

As the testimony stands, much clearer and complete evidence must be brought before we can feel justified in believing that there is any ground whatever to indicate that "Paul was neither in prison nor in bonds during the time covered by Acts xxviii. 30, 31".

How de we understand the word "GENTILE"?

It has been suggested that the word ethnos, translated Gentile, refers in many instances to the dispersed of Israel, who had so long lived among the heathen as to have become in the eyes of their more orthodox fellows "uncircumcision" and "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel", terms that we have generally accepted as a description of the Gentiles before their conversion. As this new interpretation impinges upon the teaching of Ephesians and does not allow the normal meaning of the word Gentile to appear until Eph. iii., no one can object if this interpretation be suspect; or that it should be subjected to criticism, so long as the enquiry be conducted in the interests of Truth and with Christian courtesy.

The treatise we have in mind provides a concordance of all the references to ethnos in the N.T. from which we extract the following from the Acts of the Apostles: Acts ii. 5; iv. 25; vii. 7, 45; xi. 1, 18; xiii. 19, 46, 47. Acts ii. 5 speaks of the nations among which the "Jews" who came to Pentecost lived. Some of them, namely Parthians, Medes and Elamites (Acts ii. 9-11) are undoubtedly Gentiles in the accepted sense. Acts iv. 25 quotes from Psa. ii., "why did the heathen rage?" and in verse 27 these "heathen" or "Gentiles" are differentiated from Israel, and linked with Herod and Pontius Pilate. Acts vii. 7 uses the word ethnos to indicate the Egyptians and vii. 45 like xiii. 19 refer to the "Canaanites" as indicated in Gen. xv. 19-21. Acts x. 1 and 18 refers to Cornelius who was a centurion of the Italian band, and called by Peter "one of another nation" (Acts x. 28).

The word Peter employed is allophulos, and is found in the Septuagint of Isa. ii. 6; and lxi. 5 as well as six times in Judges as the equivalent of Philistine. It is impossible, therefore, to believe that the acknowledgment of Acts xi. 18 "then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life" can refer to Gentiles as such, but that similar testimony in Acts xiv. 27 may not. Acts xiii. 42, 46 and 47 are associated with Isa. xlix. 6 which can only mean Gentiles as such.

While we must encourage every believer to exercise the Berean spirit (Acts xvii. 11) we must not close our eyes to the disposition equally mentioned in Acts xvii., namely of the Athenian spirit of ever telling or hearing "something newer" (kainoteron) (Acts xvii. 21). Let us ever observe the Berean attitude, let us ever be on our guard against the Athenian attitude. The one is a key, the other a snare.

If we survey the Acts of the Apostles, with Acts xiii. as a possible dispensational boundary in mind, we should find that if the Church of the Mystery really came into existence when Acts xiii. is reached, a change would be introduced into the record which would include a change of the Lord's dealing with Israel. Quite naturally, Peter immediately after Pentecost could say to his hearers:

> "The God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob, the God of our fathers, hath glorified His Son Jesus" (Acts iii. 13).

It is most obvious that Israel had not become lo-ammi at Pentecost, God had not ceased to be called their God at that point of time, and Peter gives Him His full title. No change can have taken place at Acts v. 30, 31 for God is still the God of "our fathers", and "repentance to Israel" is still believed to be within the realm of possibility.

Passing from Peter, we find Stephen adopting the same attitude:

> "Men, brethren and fathers"; "Our fathers had the tabernacle of witness in the wilderness"; "As your fathers did so do ye" (Acts vii. 2, 44, 51).

Paul, in Acts xiii., said:

> "Men of Israel, and ye that fear God, give audience. The God of this people of Israel chose our fathers" (Acts xiii. 16, 17), words which do not conform to the condition foreseen by Hosea. Even after his apprehension by the Romans, Paul still spoke of Israel as existing as a nation before God, saying:

> "And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers, unto which promise our twelve tribes instantly serving God day and night hope to come" (Acts xxvi. 7).

Here the persistence of Israel is insisted on by the Apostle, otherwise he would not have used the word translated "instantly", for such a term cannot be used to describe the service and expectations of a non-existent people. Right to the last chapter of the Acts, the people of Israel, or their hope, are in evidence. Had Israel become lo-ammi earlier than Acts xxviii., Paul would not have said "For the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain" (Acts xxviii. 20). That "chain" is still in evidence in the "Prison Epistles" (Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, Philemon and II Timothy), but would anyone have the temerity to teach that in those epistles, where the Mystery is revealed, Paul was still bound "for the hope of Israel"? Can we import the hope of Israel into Eph. i. 18 and iv. 4? Is the hope of Israel entertained by the "twelve tribes", the hope of the Church of the Mystery?

Again, Pentecostal conditions as defined in Mark xvi. 17, 18, including both healing and the taking up of serpents, find a place in Acts xxviii. 1-8, and the issue cannot be evaded, that if Acts xiii. saw the beginning of the Church of the Mystery, these Pentecostal evidences that one is "saved" should apply today. Which one of those who advocate Acts xiii. as the inception of the Church of the Mystery, has ever put into practice either Mark xvi. 17, 18 or emulated Paul in Acts xxviii. 1-8?

When we come to Paul's epistles written Acts xiii., Israel still occupy their appointed place. The Apostle must have had an Israelitish audience for him to have written:

> "All our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea; and were all baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea" (I Cor. x. 1, 2).

If we find the reference to "spiritual drink" in I Cor. x. 3 introduced into the subsequent chapter on spiritual gifts, as we do in I Cor. xii. 13, how is it possible to deal honestly with the Apostle's letter if we admit that Israel is present in the one passage but excluded from the other? When we see such items as healing, miracles, prophecy, tongues, etc., as the normal experience and possession of the Church of the Mystery, or even of those who believe they are that company, it will be time to consider with any seriousness the claim of Acts xiii. We could, however, leave all these evidences and concentrate upon one epistle written by Paul, namely, Romans, to show that long after his separation at Acts xiii., the people of Israel held an important place in the outworking of the purposes of God.

First, it is accepted by all recognized commentators, that the epistle to the Romans, was the last epistle written by Paul before his imprisonment, which started in Jerusalem and ended at Rome. Consequently, as this is the last word, and the farthest point from the supposed boundary of Acts xiii., we shall expect to find that Israel have indeed passed into their lo-ammi condition, and that God has ceased, temporarily, to be called their God. If the dispensation of the Mystery had really commenced, could Paul have written concerning the gospel:

> "It is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth: to THE JEW FIRST, and also to the Greek" (Rom. i. 16).

If the Church of the Mystery already existed, could Paul have said:

> "Is He the God of the JEWS only, is He not also of the Gentiles?" (Rom. iii. 29).

If the Church of the Mystery began at Acts xiii., what sense or point could there be in such a question? The Jew must have had a very dominating influence in the church for such a question to be reasonable. In Rom. ix. 15 Israel's prerogatives are expressed and admitted, but Israel today enjoy none of those things which are there credited to them.

> "My kinsmen according to the flesh: who are Israelites; to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises, whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came, Who is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen" (Rom. ix. 3-5).

The Apostle could still pray that Israel might be saved, and spoke of the attitude of the Lord towards them throughout the period covered by the Acts of the Apostles, as:

> "To Israel, He saith, All day long I have stretched forth My hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people" (Rom. x. 21).

The time for their rejection was drawing near, "blindness in part" had already happened unto Israel (Rom. xi. 25), and into the place forfeited by the unbelieving of Israel, the Gentile believer was engrafted, like a wild olive contrary to nature, with the intention that Israel may be provoked to jealousy, if that were possible. For the moment our only comment on this passage is, how could the Apostle use such an illustration, if at the self-same time, the Gentiles were:

> "Fellow heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of His promise in Christ by the gospel" (Eph. iii. 6).

One cannot be, at the same time, a wild olive graft contrary to nature into an olive tree, and also a fellow member of One Body on absolutely equal terms with every other fellow member. Not only must Rom. xi. be circumvented if Acts xiii. is to be held as the beginning of the Mystery, the hope of the church as defined by the Apostle in Rom. xv. 12, 13 must also be ignored. Let it be observed that the word "trust" in Rom. xv. 12 is the Greek elpizo, and the word "hope" of verse 13 is the word elpis. Is this the "one hope of our calling"?

> "There shall be a root of Jesse, and He that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles; in Him shall the Gentiles HOPE. Now the God of THAT HOPE (tes elpidos) fill you with all joy and peace in believing."

This Millennial hope is indeed blessed, but is it the hope of the Church of the Mystery? If Acts xiii. be the inception of that Church, then Paul's last word here in Romans must comprise the hope of that Church, but this is not believed even by those who advocate the position of Acts xiii. which we reject. The Apostle makes it clear that the dispensation of the Mystery was revealed and entrusted to him when he became the prisoner of the Lord. This, coinciding with the dismissal of Israel at Acts xxviii., and followed in a few years by the destruction of Jerusalem, shows that nowhere else in the N.T. can be found a moment that so fully fulfils all the Scriptural conditions as Acts xxviii. as the dispensational boundary.

THE DOCTRINAL FOUNDATION AND THE DISPENSATIONAL SUPER-STRUCTURE.

In conclusion, we draw attention to the need to distinguish between Doctrine, which is the Foundation and does not change with the advent of Dispensational alterations. The words “For all have sinned” are as true after Acts xxviii. as before, but the calling and sphere of blessing has changed.

This difference is clearly observed in Rom. iii. and a consideration of this will be a fit conclusion to this study.

ROMANS iii. 1 - 9.

(1) DISPENSATIONAL ADVANTAGE

“What advantage then hath the Jew?”
“What profit is there of circumcision?”

MUCH EVERY WAY.

Remember this question and answer was written by Paul a long time after Acts xiii.

(2) DOCTRINAL EQUALITY

“What then, are we better than they?”

NO, IN NO WISE.

To oppose the distinctive dispensational teaching of Ephesians by calling attention to the similarity of basic doctrine is just muddled thinking. We have repeatedly declared that the doctrine of the epistle to the Romans underlies the calling of Ephesians. It is the superstructure erected since the defection of Israel that contains the revelation of things entirely new. We need BOTH Acts xiii., the silver side of the shield to give us our initial standing as sinners saved by grace, and the golden side of the shield, Acts xxviii., to show us the unique calling made known by the Lord’s prisoner under the terms of the dispensation of the Mystery.

EGYPT
pp. 41 - 60

At the time of writing these lines the word SUEZ is on everyone's lips, and the peace of the world seems to be balanced upon the attitude of Egypt, the Arab world of the Middle East, and the nations whose welfare is very intimately linked with the free use of the Suez Canal.

Egypt is mentioned some 480 times in the Scriptures, the references being distributed thus:

The Law = about 70 times; the Prophets = 270 times; the Psalms = 16 times; the Gospels 4; the Acts 14; the Epistles 4; and the Revelation one reference.

In an analysis devoted to prophecy, it is obvious that the many references made to Egypt by Moses must be omitted. The common name for Egypt in the Scriptures is "Mitzraim" or "the land of Mitzraim". The dual form of this name indicates the natural division of the country with an upper and a lower region. At times the singular Matsor is used, and this appears to refer to lower Egypt only. In the genealogy of the nations, given in Gen. x., we read:

> "And the sons of Ham, Cush and Mizraim, and Phut and Canaan" (Gen. x. 6).

Gen. xiii. 10 gives some idea of the fertility of Egypt, saying that Lot beheld all the plain of Jordan "that it was well watered everywhere, before the Lord destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, even as the garden of the Lord, like the land of Egypt, as thou comest to Zoar".

Two great rivers form the boundaries of the land of promise, the Euphrates and the Nile (Gen. xv.18). The attitude of Pharaoh, and the plagues that fell on Egypt, together with the song of Moses after the crossing of the Red Sea, and the two witnesses Moses and Aaron, have a prophetic interest, foreshadowing much that is recorded in the book of the Revelation. One outstanding title of Egypt is "the house of bondage" which occurs seven times in the law, once in Joshua and once in Judges.

Leaving these aspects of the subject, let us note what is said prophetically of Egypt and first let us consider Psa. lxviii. 31:

> "Princes shall come out of Egypt."

Rotherham translates this "ambassadors" and the Hebrew word chashmannim occurs nowhere else. The LXX renders this word presbeis, and in the absence of anything more definite, "ambassadors" seems to be the intention here. While we may not subscribe to some of the opinions of Moffatt, we must recognize his mastery of the languages of the Bible, and submit to the reader his translation of Psa. lxviii. 29-31:

"From Thy temple high above Jerusalem, display Thy strength, O God.
Who hast so mightily prevailed for us.
There kings must offer Thee tribute.
Check that Brute of a Nile-power,
the bullocks and steers of pagans;
Trample down crafty policy, rout all races that rejoice in war,
till Egypt sends ambassadors, and Ethiopia hurries to submit to God."

The sending of ambassadors suggests that Egypt will sue for peace (Isa. xxx. 4; xxxiii. 7), and when we consider Isa. xix., "the burden of Egypt", and the remarkable words of its closing verses, the translation will become even more suggestive. The prophet Isaiah rebukes Israel for trusting in the shadow of Egypt, and one passage, which is a warning, is often quoted with favour and as a message of comfort, but this is a mistake. The words are "their strength is to sit still" (Isa. xxx. 7), but the R.V. reads "therefore have I called her Rahab that sitteth still". The Companion Bible comments:

> "Heb. Egypt—sitting still (and thus not giving the help that was sought).
> Rehab = pride or strength, is put by Fig. Metonymy (of Adjunct) for Egypt, the proud strong one. Note the wrong but common use of this verse, through not heeding the context."

Moffatt's vigorous translation here is "hence My name for it 'Dragon-do-Nothing'." After a desolation that lasts forty years, the Lord reveals that He will gather the Egyptians and bring again the captivity of Egypt and will cause them to return "and they shall be a base kingdom. It shall be the basest of the kingdoms; neither shall it exalt itself any more above the nations" (Ezek. xxix. 13-15).

Because the Hebrew word translated "base" is sometimes translated "humble", some commentators have thought that this word "base" does not refer to Egypt's degradation, but to a lowly submission, and where the A.V. of Ezek. xvii. 14 reads "that the kingdom might be base", Moffatt reads "that the realm might be submissive and not ambitious". At first, the words of Dan. iv. 17 addressed to Nebuchadnezzar "and setteth up over it the basest of men" would appear to nullify this view, but it must not be forgotten that at the end of Dan. iv. Nebuchadnezzar was extremely humbled and acknowledged the sovereignty of the Most High. While therefore this possibility must be admitted, our knowledge is too limited for more than an expression of the opinion that it may be so. On the other hand the added words "neither shall it exalt itself any more" seems to look back to the reduction of Egypt to "a base kingdom".

Another passage of prophetic interest is Isa. xix., denominated "the burden of Egypt". After a series of prophetic utterances concerning the judgments that shall fall upon Egypt, comes a most wonderful and unexpected denouement (Isa. xix. 23-25), but before we ponder this most marvelous manifestation of grace, let us note a few items that are of prophetic importance. The chapter opens with terms that appear to speak of the second advent of Someone riding "upon a swift cloud"; One Who "shall come", and "His presence" be manifest. The effect upon Egypt is that "the heart of Egypt shall melt". In the Burden of Babylon (Isa. xiii.) we have a similar consequence: "every man's heart shall melt" (Isa. xiii. 7). These words are followed by a reminiscence of Matt. xxiv.:

> "Pangs and sorrows shall take hold of them; they shall be in pain as a woman that travaileth . . . . . Behold the day of the Lord cometh" (Isa. xiii. 7-10).

Psa. lxviii., which we have already considered so far as the reference to Egypt in verse thirty-one is concerned, speaks of the Lord riding upon the heavens of heavens which were of old (33) and at His arising depicts the enemies of the Lord melting as wax before the fire, and perishing at the presence of God. This link of Isa. xiii. with Matt. xxiv. is emphasized by a similar link in Isa. xix. 2, for the fighting of every one against his brother, "city against city, and kingdom against kingdom" is very nearly quoted by the Saviour in Matt. xxiv. 7 and 8 where the use of nation against nation and kingdom against kingdom is said to be "the beginning of sorrows, or birth pangs" and where the same Greek word odin is used of birth pangs both in Isa. xiii. 8 in the LXX, and in the Greek of Matt. xxiv. 8.

The reference to idols, charmers, familiar spirits and wizards in Isa. xix. 3 finds a counterpart in the Book of the Revelation where these evils reach their zenith. In verse sixteen fear will come upon Egypt "because of the shaking of the hand of the Lord of hosts which He shaketh over it"; and a variety of words are employed to speak of the day when God will shake the heavens and the earth and will shake all nations (Hag. ii. 6, 7, 21). Matt. xxiv. 7 speaks also of "famines and earthquakes", and Isa. xix. 5-10 shows the effect upon the whole economy of Egypt at the drying up of their river "and everything sown by the brooks shall wither, be driven away (as stubble because dried up, Isa. xli. 2) and be no more". At verse sixteen, a series of references commencing with prophetic term "In that day" opens a new vista.

Isa. xix. 16	In that day	the shaking of the land of Egypt.
Isa. xix. 18	In that day	five cities speak the language of Canaan.
Isa. xix. 19	In that day	there shall be an altar to the Lord.
Isa. xix. 21	In that day	Egyptians shall do sacrifice.
Isa. xix. 23	In that day	there shall be a highway.
Isa. xix. 24	In that day	Israel shall be a third with Egypt and Assyria.

Here are six prophetic items. The central reference declaring that "there shall be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt, and a pillar at the border thereof to the Lord". The word translated "altar" is the Hebrew mizbeach "a place of sacrifice". It is the same word that is used of the altar built by Noah, by Abraham and by Moses (Gen. viii. 20; xxii. 9 and Exod. xvii. 15). It is the same word used of the altar of the tabernacle (Exod. xxvii. 1) and the altar of the temple (I Kings viii. 22). The word occurs eight times in Isaiah, every reference being to an altar in the Scriptural sense of the word. We have rather laboured this point, because of the fantastic and misleading suggestion made by some, that the altar of Isa. xix. 19 refers to the Great Pyramid at Gizeh. There is also to be a "pillar" at the frontier. We read in Exod. xxiv. 4 that Moses built an "altar" and erected "twelve pillars" according to the number of the children of Israel. The same word is used of the pillar set up by Jacob at Bethel (Gen. xxviii. 18 and xxxi. 45).

This last reference was called mizpah by Jacob, a beacon and watch-tower, for he said "The Lord watch between me and thee . . . . . I will not pass over . . . . . thou shalt not pass over this heap and this pillar unto me, for harm" (Gen. xxxi. 44-52). Something of the same intent seems to be implied by the pillar set up at Egypt's frontier "in that day", a respect for the sovereignty of both Israel and of Egypt in their own allotted lands. The reader should note the paranomasia of the two Hebrew words translated "altar" and "pillar". The former is made up of M,Z,B,CH, the latter of M,TS,B,H, as though the link between them was intentional and important.

It appears from Isa. xix. 18 that there will be a number of cities in Egypt that will have become converts to the teaching of the Bible,

> "Five cities in the land of Egypt shall speak the language of Canaan."

The following passages will indicate the attitude of Israel and their conception of truth with a "language".

> "When Israel went out of Egypt, the house of Jacob from a people of strange language" (Psa. cxiv. 1).
>
> "He went out through the land of Egypt: where I heard a language that I understood not" (Psa. lxxxi.5).
>
> "The Jews . . . . . had married wives of Ashdod, of Ammon and of Moab, and their children spake half in the speech of Ashdod, and could not speak in the Jews' language" (Neh. xiii. 23, 24).
>
> "For then will I turn to the people a pure language, that they may all call upon the name of the Lord, to serve Him with one consent" (Zeph. iii. 9).

One of these cities that speak the language of Canaan and who are loyal to the Lord will be "The City of the Sun" (Isa. xix. 18). The Hebrew words for "sun" is cheres, and for destruction is heres, hence the different renderings (see margin of R.V. and note in Companion Bible). Heliopolis, "the city of the sun", is the Greek name for the Egyptian city named "On" at the apex of the delta of the Nile. It will be remembered that Joseph married a daughter of a priest of On (Gen. xli. 45). Helios is Greek for the sun, polis for city. In the Hebrew this would be represented by beth, a house, and shemesh, the sun, hence the city called Bethshemesh in Jer. xliii. 13 is this same city of Isa. xix. 18, even as the "images" which are to be broken there are the same as the "pillar" of Isa. xix. 19. In the former reference, the sanctity of frontiers found no respect from Nebuchadnezzar.

Returning to Isa. xix., we find that associated with this altar and pillar is the sending of a "Saviour, a great one" who shall deliver such as cry unto the Lord, and as a consequence "the Egyptians shall know the Lord in that day" (verse 21). If these events take place at the time of the end "The Saviour, a great One" could refer to the Lord Himself, particularly as the word translated "Saviour", which occurs nine times in Isaiah, in every reference apart from Isa. xix. 20, refers to God beside Whom, he declares, "is no Saviour". Egypt is to be smitten, but is to be healed, they shall return unto the Lord and He shall heal them. Every one of these words is said in like manner of Israel. Once the Lord smote the Egyptians in the day of Israel's exodus, and no healing followed (Exod. xii. 23, 27), but at long last healing is now near, not only for Israel but for her hereditary foe and seducer, Egypt!

> "In that day there shall be a highway out of Egypt to Assyria, and the Assyrians shall come into Egypt, and the Egyptian into Assyria, and the Egyptians shall serve with the Assyrians" (Isa. xix. 23).

Here intercommunication will be established, fear of invasion and harm shall be removed, and both nations, once Israel's oppressors, shall serve the Lord together. If this were all, it would be a state of affairs that would be wonderful to behold. But this is not all by any means.

> "In that day shall Israel be the third with Egypt and with Assyria, even a blessing in the midst of the land (or earth)" (Isa. xix. 24).

This unheard of exhibition of grace and mercy is followed by the words that close this chapter as a great "Amen".

> "Whom the Lord of hosts shall bless, saying > Blessed be EGYPT MY PEOPLE, and > ASSYRIA the WORK OF MY HANDS, and > ISRAEL MINE INHERITANCE."

No word that we can add to such superlative grace can do anything but spoil this gracious witness. Let us leave it to shine in all its unsullied glory, while we remember that when we, too, were enemies Christ died for us (Rom. v. 6-10).

Another prophecy concerning Egypt is found in Dan. xi. Before examining this chapter we quote from Daniel's Great Prophecy by Nathaniel West, D.D., and let it be noted the following words were written in 1897, and not in December, 1956, when the problem of Suez and the Middle East is in everyone's mind:

> "It is the 'Eastern Question' that is here, a question not limited or local, but ubiquitous, affecting today the deepest interests of Russia, England, France, Austria, Germany, Egypt, Greece, Turkey and Palestine, in their relations to each other, to India, China and Japan, and to Africa, affecting the whole world; an age-long contention between conflicting civilizations, with creeds and forms of government, and prejudices of race and traditions diverse and opposed as the poles; that 'mache athanatos' of Plato, the 'immortal conflict' between truth and error, right and wrong, which endures until a 'new cycle' of time shall bring its close. What statesman in any cabinet or chamber of modern legislation has ever lifted his voice to tell the world that as in Moses, Isaiah, Ezekiel, Zephaniah and Zechariah, so here Daniel has exhibited, in chapters viii. and xi. the 'Eastern Question' in terms impossible to be misunderstood, or that the waters of the Hellespont, the Ægean and Mediterranean seas, with the isles of Greece and Asia Minor, and the mainlands washed by them—the storm-centre of the Eastern question in every age—form for the prophet the geographical theatre of his vision of the 'Warfare Great'? or that here the fleets of the nations must meet to sink and sail no more, in that final crisis when 'heaven, earth, sea, dry land, and all nations' are 'shaken'? It is the light of prophecy that enables us to see and understand the immense significance of the recent acts of the 'Powers' in reference to Crete, Greece, Turkey, Armenia, and what the parallel Jewish movements forebode. In the words of a great and deep writer in our day, internal politics, the world over, are resolvable into some form of the Eastern Question. It haunts the history of civilized mankind."

We now approach what is perhaps the most difficult and intricate chapter in prophecy, viz., Dan. xi. One of the chief elements of difficulty is due to the blending together of type and antitype and of history and prophecy. The problem is to determine the point at which the division occurs, to find the verse at which we may say, Here history ceases and prophecy begins. Chapter xi. contains a number of sections which we set out below for the clearer understanding of our problem:--

(1) 2-4. Persian and Greek kings, ending in the "mighty king" Alexander the Great.
(2) 5-9. The division of Alexander's empire among his generals. The introduction of two kings named the "king of the north" and the "king of the south".
(3) 10-20. The alternating histories and policies of these kings of the north and south.
(4) 21-45. The vile person and the willful king.
The antichrist and the beast.
The little horn of Dan. viii. 9.

The first section of this prophecy (verses 2-4) establishes a link with the earlier visions, and particularly with that of chapter viii. So that, although we have already considered this chapter, we must go back to it here, in order to establish the close association that is intended between the history of Persia and Greece and the future antichristian king:--

> The RAM of Dan. viii. 3 is interpreted as being Media and Persia (viii. 20).
> The HE-GOAT of Dan. viii. 5 is interpreted as being the king of Greece (viii. 21).
> The GREAT HORN between the eyes of the he-goat represents the first king of Greece, and the FOUR NOTABLE ONES that arose toward the four winds of heaven, are interpreted as four kingdoms that shall stand up in his stead (viii. 21, 22).

The angelic interpreter of Dan. xi. makes a fuller reference to these two great powers. We now learn that there were to stand up three kings in Persia, and that the fourth, richer than they all, would by his strength through his riches stir up all against the realm of Greece. Alexander is spoken of as a mighty king who shall rule with great dominion, and do according to His will, whose kingdom shall be divided toward the four winds of heaven. So far, the chapters are parallel. Returning, however, to Dan. viii. we find that here we immediately leave the fourfold sub-division of Alexander's kingdom for a consideration of the yet future dominion of the beast of the Apocalypse:--

> "And out of them came forth a little horn, which waxed exceeding great toward the south, and toward the east, and toward the pleasant land" (viii. 9).

This passage is interpreted in viii. 23-25 as follows:--

> "And in the latter time of their kingdom, when the transgressors are come to the full, a king of fierce countenance and understanding dark sentences, shall stand up. And his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power: and he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper and practice, and shall destroy the mighty and the holy people. And through his policy also he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand; and he shall magnify himself in his heart; and by peace shall destroy many: he shall stand up against the Prince of princes; but he shall be broken without hand."

It will be seen that in Dan. viii. no record is given of the history that intervenes between the break-up of the kingdom of Alexander and the advent of the antichristian king. This has an important bearing upon the interpretation of Dan. xi., for the prophecies concerning the kings of the south and north in xi. 10-20 are usually interpreted as being fulfilled in the doings of Ptolemy I, II, III, IV, V and VI, of Seleucus I, II, III and IV, and of Antiochus II, III and IV. Instead of commencing future prophecy at xi. 21, however, we follow the lead of Dan. viii. 23 and the explicit statement of Dan. x. 14 (viz., that the revelation of Dan. xi. and xii. concerns Israel "in the latter days"), and commence the prophetic and future section of Dan. xi. at verse 5, seeing in the activities of Ptolemy and Antiochus foreshadowings only and not fulfillments of the earlier verses.

Before proceeding further, it will be helpful to see the whole prophecy set out before us. The subject-matter is, of course, too vast and too involved for us to attempt to include every member, or to account for every detail. All we can do is to point out the most obvious features, leaving the reader the difficult but joyous task of seeking fuller details for himself.

Daniel xi. 3 - xii. 3.

A1 | xi. 3. A king. He shall do according to his will.
B1 | xi. 6. The king's daughter.
C1 | xi. 7-10. In his estate.
D1 | xi. 14. They shall fall.
A2 | xi. 16. A king. He shall do according to his will.
B2 | xi. 17. The daughter of women.
C2 | xi. 20. In his estate.
D2 | xi. 35. Some shall fall.
E | xi. 21-34. The vile Person.—In his estate.
a | 21. Flattery.
b | 22-32. | c1 | Heart against holy covenant.
d1 | He shall do (exploits).
c2 | Indignation against holy covenant.
d2 | So shall he do.
c3 | Forsake the holy covenant.
d3 | Place the abomination.
c4 | Against the holy covenant.
d4 | They shall do (exploits).
a | 33, 34. Flatteries.
A3 | xi. 36. A king. He shall do according to his will.
B3 | xi. 37. The desire of women.
C3 | xi. 38. In his estate.
D3 | xii. 1-3. Many shall awake.

We have only to look at this outline to perceive the unity of the prophecy, despite its involved character. At the time of the end there shall be a king who shall do according to his will. And not only is this king foreshadowed by Alexander the Great (xi. 3), but the doings of Alexander's successors also foreshadow yet future history leading up to the manifestation of the man of sin. Moreover, the strange break in the structure, occasioned by the introduction of the vile person and the setting up of the "abomination that maketh desolate", warns us to keep distinct the two important figures of prophecy, the beast and the false prophet.

We must go back to ancient history to discover the kingdoms associated with the rise of the man of sin. At Alexander's death, his kingdom was divided among his four generals as follows:--

(1) PTOLEMY took EGYPT and PLESTINE.
(2) SELEUCUS took NORTHERN SYRIA.
(3) CASSANDER took MACEDONIA and THRACE.
(4) LYSIMACHUS took ASIA MINOR.

It will be noticed that Dan. xi. 5 assumes that we shall recognize the identity of the king of the south, and verse 6 speaks familiarly of the king of the north. We have been prepared for some such terms as these by Dan. viii. 8, where the fourfold division of Alexander's kingdom is said to be towards the four winds of heaven. In agreement with this, we find in Dan. vii. 2, 3:--

> "Four winds of the heaven strove upon the great sea. And four great beasts came up from the sea, diverse from one another."

It is impossible for us at the present time to say which of the four successors of Dan. vii. 4-8 is the lion with eagle's wings, or which is the bear or the leopard or the monster. But that they speak of the future resuscitation of these four kingdoms is a matter beyond doubt. Taking everything into account we learn from scriptural prophecy to watch closely the "north" and the "south" kingdoms, the north, Syria, the south, Egypt. The wars and the policies that have been connected with these two powers in the past but foreshadow the "Eastern Question" of the time of the end. The endeavour to promote alliances by marriages such as that of Berenice, daughter of Ptolemy II to Antiochus II; or of Cleopatra to Ptolemy V, will again be attempted but prove futile. In this connection the structure proves of great value, for it reveals the fact that the final antichristian king will be proof against such allurements. This may, at first, seem strange, but it is in keeping with the doctrines of demons exposed in I Tim. iv., which will include "forbidding to marry".

It will be seen from the structure that the words, "in his estate" occurs four times. The Hebrew word ken means a base (as in I Kings vii. 31), and in the first three references of Dan. xi. in the LXX is translated by the word etoimasia, "a preparation". The latter is used in the N.T. of the work of a forerunner. Does this not seem to indicate that Satan, ignorant of the "times and seasons" which the Father has kept in His own power, is perpetually "prepared" with his man. Here, in Dan. xi., we have several kings in readiness, should the end have come. To this principle may be ascribed the close likeness which some outstanding characters in history have had to the prophetic picture. Quite a number of prophetic students believed that Napoleon was the man of sin. More recently Mussolini has been named. There may be many more, but at the end, Satan will be prepared with his man, "in his estate"; the man and the moment will adhere.

It would appear from Dan. xi. that towards the time of the end, and arising out of either Syria or Egypt, there will be several very marked anticipations of the man of sin. The description of the first abortive attempt is given in Dan. xi. 7-19, where we read of war between the kings of the north and south, and of an unsuccessful attempt to make Judaea independent, and so to "establish the vision". The words, "the robbers of thy people" (Dan. xi. 14) may mean "the violent ones among thy people". These would be revolutionists who would league themselves with an apostate power to gain their own ends. They shall fail, however, for God alone is able to restore Israel to their land.

While Babylon and Nineveh have passed away, Egypt, Greece and Persia remain to this day, and it is from among these kingdoms that the last great oppressor shall arise.

Time would fail us in the attempt to deal with the details of this chapter, but perhaps the following analysis may be of help.

Main features of the future.

Daniel xi. 5.

A prince originating in Egypt possesses a great dominion. When this development in the near east takes shape—"Know that summer is nigh."

Daniel xi. 6.

A marriage alliance between Egypt and Syria for the purpose of making "an agreement" proves a failure.

Daniel xi. 7-19.

Conflicts between these two kingdoms will result in dire trouble in the "glorious land, which by his hand shall be consumed" (xi. 16) and end in a "staggering" defeat (xi. 19).

Daniel xi. 20.

Satan's attempt proving abortive, "in his estate" a raiser of taxes arises, who shall exact heavy tribute from Israel and the land of Palestine. His end shall be sudden and mysterious: "within a few days he shall be destroyed, neither in anger, nor in battle."

Daniel xi. 21-35.

Still undismayed, Satan causes to stand up "in his estate" one who is described as a "vile person". This one, instead of devastating the land, "comes in peaceably", and "obtains the kingdom by flatteries". "After the league made with him he shall work deceitfully with a small people; he shall enter peaceably even upon the fattest places." After stirring up strife against the king of the south, and apparently involving more than one king (xi. 27), he returns to his land with great riches, and at length manifests his true intent: "His heart shall be against the holy covenant" (xi. 28). This covenant is referred to in Dan. ix. 27: "He shall confirm the covenant with many for one week."* In the midst of the seven years he breaks the covenant, causing sacrifice and offering to cease, and in its stead (see note of The Companion Bible on Dan. ix. 27) brings in the abomination that maketh desolate.

> [NOTE: * - The time that elapses from the making of the covenant to verse 31 is 3½ years of the last seven of Dan. ix.]

(Daniel22, p.103-up)

Such is the analysis of the place that Egypt occupies in the Prophetic Scriptures. At the moment of writing, the dispensation of the Mystery still runs its course, and Israel are still Lo-ammi, "not My People". The re-shuffle of the nations in Middle East is a preparation for the day fast approaching when the prophetic clock will begin once more to tick and the Day of the Lord will dawn. While, therefore, our own blessed hope must be realized before these things come to pass, their proximity but reminds us that "now is our salvation nearer than when we believed".

THE GATHERED PEOPLE

A survey of the scattering and the gathering of Israel, and their association with the land and the city of their fathers, their repentance and the coming of the Lord.

When we endeavour to compute the time of the end, without of course attempting "the day and the hour" which is forbidden, there are certain features which are key events which, if seen in their right relationship with other prophetic features, will lead us to an approximation of the character of the time of the end, even though many details can only be understood in the light of their fulfillment. Prominent among such subjects, is the future gathering of Israel by the Lord to the land of promise. It will be observed that we have said "the future gathering" and "by the Lord", the present occupation of the land by Israel being rather in line with Abraham's mistake which led to the birth of Ishmael. A future "gathering" of Israel presupposes a past "scattering", and we believe an examination of the Scripture closely dealing with these related events will be profitable in more ways than one.

In the N.T., the Greek word diaspora "the scattered" has become, practically, a title of Israel. Diaspora occurs three times:

> "Then said the Jews among themselves, whither will He go, that we shall not find Him? Will He go unto the dispersed among the Gentiles (Greeks) and teach the Gentiles (Greeks)?" (John vii. 35).
>
> "James (literally Jacob), a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ, to the twelve tribes, which are scattered abroad, greeting" (James i. 1).
>
> "Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ, to the strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia" (I Pet. i. 1).

There are six references to the diaspora in the LXX, namely, in Deut. xxviii. 25; xxx. 4; Neh. i. 9; Psa. cxlvi. 2 (cxlvii. 2 A.V.); Isa. xlix. 6; Jer. xli. 17. The first reference is a consequence of the curse pronounced from Mount Ebal upon disobedience to the commandments of the Lord.

> "The Lord shall cause thee to be smitten before thine enemies: thou shalt go out one way against them, and flee seven ways before them: and shalt be removed (thou shalt be a dispersion, LXX) into all the kingdoms of the earth."

Here, in this first occurrence, we have the root cause of all the dispersions of Israel that follow, and in the next reference we find the germ of all the promises of their final restoration; we quote direct from the LXX of Deut. xxx. 4:

> "If thy dispersion (diaspora) be from one end of heaven to the other, thence will the Lord thy God gather thee, and thence will the Lord thy God take thee" (Deut. xxx. 4).

This passage from Deut. xxx. 4 is remembered by Nehemiah in his prayer, as recorded in Neh. i. 9:

> "But if ye turn unto Me, and keep My commandments, and do them; though there were of you cast out unto the uttermost part of heaven, yet will I gather them from thence, and will bring them unto the place that I have chosen to set My name there" (Neh. i. 9).

Here the words "cast out" are diaspora in the LXX. Psa. cxlvi. 2 (LXX) cxlvii. 2 (A.V.) reads:

> "The Lord doth built up Jerusalem: He gathereth together the outcasts (the diaspora) of Israel."

Where the A.V. of Isa. xlix. 6 reads:

> "It is a light thing that thou shouldest be My servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and restore the preserved (margin or desolations) of Israel."
> "It is a great thing for thee to be called My servant, to establish the tribes of Jacob, and recover the dispersion (diaspora) of Israel." (Isa. xlix. 6 LXX).

Jer. xli. 17 in the LXX is Jer. xxxiv. 17 in the A.V. It would take too long to explain the reason for this, and it has not bearing upon the present study. So we proceed with our quotations:

> "Therefore thus saith the Lord; Ye have not hearkened unto Me, in proclaiming liberty, every one to his brother, and every man to his neighbour: behold, I will proclaim a liberty for you, saith the Lord, to the sword, to the pestilence, and to the famine, and I will make you to be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth" (Jer. xxxiv. 17 A.V.). Here once again the LXX reads "I will give you up to dispersion".

We must return to these references to discover their testimony concerning Israel's defection, but before we do so, we must consider the use of the verb "to scatter", namely the Greek word diaspeiro. The word occurs three times in the N.T., namely in Acts viii. 1, 4 and xi. 19, where we read of the "scattering" that followed the persecution of the church which reached as far as Phenice, Cyprus and Antioch. The note that is of interest is that the "scattering" resulted in a preaching of the Word in these parts. The word diaspeiro comes some sixty times in the O.T., and while we do not propose to exhibit that number of references here, we will give a fairly typical exhibition of the teaching associated with its usage.

In the first occurrences of this word "scatter", blessing, not judgment, is in view:

> "These are the three sons of Noah; and of them was the whole earth overspread." (LXX, scattered) (Gen. ix. 19; x. 18, 32).

In line with this must be read Deut. xxxii. 8:

> "When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when He separated (LXX, scattered) the sons of Adam, he sets the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel."

This beneficent purpose was resisted by the sons of Noah, and they said:

> "Go to, let us build us a city and a tower, whose top may reach unto heaven; and let us make us a name, lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth" (Gen. xi. 4).

This resistance turned a blessing into a curse, for we read:

> "So the Lord scattered them abroad from thence" (Gen. xi. 8, 9), and instead of being united by a common language, their speech was confounded, their city called Babel, and the seed sown for all the confusion and conflict among nations that has since arisen, and which will only be remedied when Jerusalem is the acknowledged centre, when the nations accept their appointed relationship with Israel and their land, and when the prophecy of Zephaniah shall be fulfilled.

> "For then will I turn to the people a pure language, that they may all call upon the name of the Lord, to serve Him with one consent" (Zeph. iii. 9).

This is the reversal of the state of affairs described in Gen. xi. An important lesson is here, which if observed will illuminate much that is said concerning the "scattering" and the "gathering" of Israel. The prophet Hosea reveals that Israel were to go into a condition named "Lo-ammi", not My people (Hos. i. 9), but this was preceded by two causes: (1) They should be "scattered", for such is one of the meanings of the word Jezreel (Hos. i. 4); (2) they should have mercy withholden from them, the meaning of Lo-ruhamah being "not compassionated" (Hos. i. 6). In Hosea ii. 23, all this is blessedly reversed:

> "I will sow her unto Me in the earth" (Jezreel).
> "I will have mercy" (Ruhamah).
> "Thou art My people" (Ammi).

The Hebrew word Jezreel is a homonym, i.e. a word having two related meanings: (1) SCATTER (Jer. xxxi. 10); (2) SOW (Jer. xxxi. 27; Zech. x. 9). Had the nations obeyed the Divine mandate, and "spread abroad" with Israel's land as their centre, and with one common language to unite them both in worship and in service, a great step forward would have been accomplished. This would have fulfilled one meaning of the word Jezreel, i.e. "sowing", with a harvest of peace in view. This, however, was antagonized by Satan the "Resister" (Zech. iii. 1, 2), and the "sowing" was transformed into a "scattering" and a confusion, and will not be remedied until He Who scattered both the nation and the nations, gathers them once again, with Jerusalem in their midst, but when that blessed event will take place we do not here stay to consider; it will emerge as we examine the usage of the word "gather" which is to follow.

To be scattered, consequently became a sign of a curse (Gen. xlix. 7). Lev. xxvi. is a series of alternating references to disobedience and its punishment.

Lev. xxvi. 14, 15.	Commandments, statutes, judgments, despised, covenant broken.
Lev. xxvi. 16, 17.	The consequent punishment.

This alternation occurs five times, and in the last pair, namely in Lev. xxvi. 27-39 we read:

> "And I will scatter you among the heathen (or nations) and will draw out a sword after you: and your land shall be desolate, and your cities waste" (Lev. xxvi. 33).

"The dispersed of Judah" are said to be "in the four corners of the earth" (Isa. xi. 12), and the prophetic import of this scattering is crystallized in the opprobrious epithets "the Ubiquitous Jew" and "the Wandering Jew". Passages could be multiplied to show that God Himself scattered Israel as a punishment for their sins, as it is written "He that scattered Israel, will gather him" (Jer. xxxi. 10). Nevertheless, just as in the preaching of the gospel the Lord stoops to use human instruments (Rom. x. 14), so the animosity of the nations against Israel often furthered, unwittingly, the Divine purpose.

> "For behold, in those days, and in that time, when I shall bring again the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem, I will also gather all nations, and will bring them down into the valley of Jehoshaphat, and will plead with them there for My people and for My heritage Israel, whom they have scattered among the nations, and parted My land" (Joel iii. 1, 2).

From N.T. and from O.T. alike we find sufficient evidence to refer to Israel as "the Scattered People", but whether Isa. xviii. 7 refers to Israel is a moot point.

Let us now turn to the other side of the picture, and see whether we are justified in calling Israel "the Gathered People" as we look to the end of prophecy and the day of restoration spoken of by all the holy prophets since the world began (Acts iii. 19-21). Whether Israel will be gathered by the consent and help of the nations of the earth, whether they will be gathered by miraculous intervention, or a combination of both, it stands written: "He that scattered Israel, will gather him", and justifies our closest attention to the terms used in the associations revealed. The Hebrew word that must occupy our attention is the word qabats, and Brown, Driver, and Brigg's Lexicon tells us that in the Sabean the word means a "harvest", and in many if not in all references, the harvest of either the wheat or the tares, a gathering either for blessing or for judgment is implied.

Again, it will be necessary to make a selection from the great amount of references that are found in the O.T. to the gathering of Israel. One of the fullest promises, and supplying us with some of the necessary conditions associated with this gathering is found in Deut. xxx. 1-6. If in their captivity Israel "call to mind" the threat of cursing and the promise of blessing, if they "return unto the Lord" and obey His voice, then said God, I will turn their captivity and have compassion upon them "and will return and gather thee from all the nations, whither the Lord thy God hath scattered thee", even though they were driven to the outmost parts of heaven. These the Lord promises He will bring into the land which their father possessed, and they shall possess it.

From this initial prophecy, several important features emerge:

(1) The gathering of scattered Israel will be contingent upon their repentance. If Israel and Judah return to the land in unbelief that will not be the gathering of the Lord, but a human attempt to bring about the restoration by evil means, which will end in disaster, and such an abortive movement has taken place, with disastrous consequences in our own time.

(2) All Israel is in view in Deut. xxx. The subdivision of the Ten Tribes and the Two Tribes is not envisaged. It matters not where the dispersion of Israel may have taken them, even though it be to the utmost parts of heaven.

(3) This gathering will take scattered Israel back to the land which their fathers possessed, and they shall possess it. That land is Palestine, and cannot possibly be Great Britain or any other country on earth. This prophecy is explicit, it is basic, it is definite; it cannot be made to mean anything other than what it actually says.

The reference to the "outmost parts of heaven" seems to have been in mind when that typical anticipatory "gathering" took place on the day of Pentecost, for we read:

> "And there were dwelling at Jerusalem Jews, devout men, out of every nation under heaven" (Acts ii. 5).

Leaving this testimony of Moses, let us acquaint ourselves with the witness of the Prophets. Isa. xi. is one of the passages which seems to be rightly called Millennial. It is linked with the presence of the Lord (Isa. xi. 1, 4 and 10).

> "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall set His hand again the second time to recover the remnant of His people, which shall be left, from Assyria, and from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush, and from Elam, and from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the islands of the sea. And He shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth" (Isa. xi. 11, 12).

Let us once again pause to consider this prophecy:

(1) This gathering of Israel takes place at the Second Coming of Christ for He shall not only fulfil Psa. lxxii., and judge the poor, but shall "smite the earth (eretz, or with some codices ariz 'the oppressor', verse 4) with the rod of His mouth, and with the breath of His lips shall He slay the wicked or the lawless one" (Isa. xi. 4). (See II Thess. ii. 1-8).

(2) The countries of the dispersed remnant are named, but the full quota of Israel and Judah will come from the four quarters of the earth.
(3) When this gathering takes place, the whole house of Israel, including the ten tribes, and Judah will become one nation again, as Ezek. xxxvii. 16-22 declares.
(4) This gathering will be "the second time" of Acts vii. 13 and Heb. ix. 28.

Isa. xliii. contains a glowing prophecy of Israel's re-gathering:

> "For I am the Lord thy God, the Holy One of Israel, thy Saviour: I gave Egypt for thy ransom, Ethiopia and Seba for thee. Since thou wast precious in My sight, thou hast been honourable, and I have loved thee: therefore will I give men for thee, and people for thy life. Fear not: for I am with thee: I will bring thy seed from the east, and gather thee from the west; I will say to the north, Give up; and to the south, Keep not back: bring my sons from far, and my daughters from the ends of the earth; even every one that is called by My Name: for I have created him for My glory, I have formed him; yea I have made him" (Isa. xliii. 3-7).

Like the Apostle, who esteemed his life of suffering "light" while he kept in mind the "eternal weight" of glory that would be his at the end, the Lord said to Israel:

> "For a small moment (one period at least has lasted nineteen hundred years!) have I forsaken thee; but with great mercies will I gather thee" (Isa. liv. 7).

The contexts leads us to the glory of restored Jerusalem, a faint adumbration on earth of the splendour of the heavenly city (Isa. liv. 11, 12). The testimony of Jeremiah and of Ezekiel is in entire harmony with what we have already seen. The reader may appreciate the references for his own meditation: Jer. xxix. 14; xxxi. 8, 10 and xxxii. 37; Ezek. xx. 34, 41; xxviii. 25; xxxiv. 13; xxxvi. 24 and xxxix. 27. Hosea, who uses the symbolic words of Jezreel or Lo-ammi, says:

> "Then (see verse 10) shall the children of Judah and the children of Israel be gathered together, and appoint themselves one head, and they shall come up out of the land: for great shall be the day of Jezreel" (Hosea i. 10, 11).

Micah has a word to say concerning the gathering of Israel:

> "I will surely assemble, O Jacob, all of thee; I will surely gather the remnant of Israel . . . . . and their king shall pass before them, and the Lord on the head of them."
> "In that day, saith the Lord, will I assemble her that halteth, and I will gather her that is driven out, and her that I have afflicted; and I will make her that halted a remnant, and her that was cast off a strong nation: and the Lord shall reign over them in mount Zion from henceforth, even for ever" (Micah ii. 12, 13; iv. 6, 7).

It is possible that the gathering of ii. 12 will be for Israel's cleansing and purging, the figure "the sheep of Bosrah" rather suggesting this than immediate blessing, but one thing is certain, the Lord is their "king" and He is not an absent King reigning from heaven. He "reigns" over them "in Mount Zion" and so fixes this gathering as taking place at the Lord's coming and reign.

This refining and purifying is referred to in Mal. iii. 1-3 and iv. 5, 6, where the words "I will send My messenger" and "I will send Elijah" reveal that just as

John the Baptist came in the spirit and power of Elijah, and whose ministry overlapped the advent of the King the first time, so Mal. iii. and iv. show a similar ministry at the time of the Lord's Second Coming. When the Redeemer shall come to Zion, when He establishes with them His covenant, then and then only will it be possible to say:

> "Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee" (Isa. lix. 20, 21; lx. 1).

Any attempt to isolate Isa. lx. 1 from its context must be resisted, the glory of the Lord will not rise upon Israel until the Lord of glory returns (see Isa. lix. 20, 21). Only when the Lord's way has been prepared, shall "the glory of the Lord be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together" (Isa. xl. 3-5).

When the Lord brings again the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem, Joel declares that the Lord will also gather all nations, and bring them down into the valley of Jehoshaphat, and will plead with them there for "My people and for My heritage Israel, whom they have scattered among the nations and parted My land" (Joel iii. 2). It should be noted how explicit the time note is of this prophecy, "For behold in those days and in that time" refer back to chapter ii. where the words quoted by Peter on the day of Pentecost are found. In response to the words "I will also gather all nations" we read in verse 11:

> "Assemble yourselves, and come, all ye heathen (nations), and gather yourselves together round about" (Joel iii. 11).

The harvest is come (verse 13), and the same phenomena that is associated with the coming of the great and terrible day of the Lord, is repeated here.

> "The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood" (Joel ii. 31).
> "For in mount Zion and in Jerusalem shall be deliverance" (Joel ii. 32).
> "The sun and the moon shall be darkened . . . . . the Lord also shall roar out of Zion . . . . . the Lord your God dwelling in Zion" (Joel iii. 15-17).

This gathering of the nations is comparable with the revelation of Matt. xxv. 32 and this takes place:

> "When the Son of man shall come in His glory, and all the holy angels with Him, then shall He sit upon the throne of His glory: and before Him shall be gathered all nations" (Matt. xxv. 31, 32), and just as that is an inquisition into the way in which the nations have treated Israel (Joel iii. 2-8), so there will be an inquisition as to the way the nations have treated the Lord's brethren (Matt. xxv. 35-44). For as Joel iii. 12 declares "there will I sit to judge all the heathen round about". The "mighty ones" of Joel iii. 11 referring to the "holy angels" who come with Him (Matt. xxv. 31 and II Thess. i. 7).

So far we have limited our investigation to those passages which employ either the word "scatter" or "gather". We must, however take the subject a stage further and consider the bearing that certain other features have on this great issue. We commence this second aspect of our study with Isa. xxvii. 12:

> "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall beat off from the channel of the river unto the stream of Egypt, and ye shall be gathered one by one, O ye children of Israel" (Isa. xxvii. 12).

"Beat off" translates the Hebrew word chabat, the first occurrence of which reads "when thou beatest thine olive tree" (Deut. xxiv. 20), and the second "and beat out that she had gleaned" (Ruth ii. 17). In Judges vi. 11 it refers to "threshing wheat" and in Isa. xxviii. 27 to beating out fitches with a staff. The statement "Ye shall be gathered one by one" (Isa. xxvii. 12) seems to indicate that the reference here is to the harvesting of the olive berry. Twice, Isaiah speaks of the "shaking of an olive" (Isa. xvii. 6; xxiv. 13), and the figure used in Isa. xxvii. 12 is that Israel shall be gathered "one by one" as olives are beaten off the boughs, not gathered indiscriminately mixing wheat and tares together in one sheaf.

Two rivers are indicated in Isa. xxvii. 12. "The river", Hebrew nahar, refers to the river Euphrates (see Gen. ii. 14; xv. 18; Deut. i. 7; Jer. xlvi. 2). The "stream" of Egypt refers to a brook, Hebrew nachal, usually translated "brook" as in the references to "the brook of Eshcol", "the brook of Arnon", "the brook Kidron" (Numb. xiii. 23; xxi. 14; II Sam. xv. 23). Dr. Lightfoot says "this is not the Nile in Egypt, but Sihor in the way of Egypt, Josh. xiii. 3; Jer. ii. 18. In the LXX it is rhinocorura". Dr. Young, in the map contained in his Analytical Concordance, places "the stream of Egypt" south of Gaza, a strip of territory much in the news as these words are written. The word Mesopotamia "between the rivers" is aram naharaim, retaining this word nahor "the river", i.e. the Euphrates. The "channel" of the river is the translation of the well-known word shibboleth, used as a test by the men of Gilead to discover the Ephraimites, who at the passages or fords (Judg. xii. 6) of Jordan asked permission to go over, the test word "shibboleth" being one of the names in Hebrew given to a ford, a channel or a wady. The gathering "one by one" not only alludes to the method of gathering olives, but suggests that there will be no possibility of anyone "gate crashing" as in Matt. xxii. 12. This "one by one" discriminate gathering is compared with the way in which the tithe of the herd was counted, as in Lev. xxvii. 32, "whatsoever passeth under the rod". In Ezek. xx., the prophet says of Israel, that they will say: "We will be as the heathen, as the families of the countries, to serve wood and stone." To this the Lord replies:

> "As I live, saith the Lord God . . . . . I will bring you out from the people, and will gather you out of the countries wherein ye are scattered . . . . . and I will cause you to pass under the rod, and I will bring you into the bond (or the "binding obligation", only occurrence of this world) of the covenant: and I will purge out from among you the rebels" (Ezek. xx. 33-38).

In Jer. xxxiii., where Israel's desolations are to be restored, the same figure is used:

> "In the cities of Judah, shall flocks pass again under the hands of him that telleth them" (Jer. xxxiii. 13).

It is not without purpose that the Psalmist associates "the gathering of the outcast of Israel" with the fact that the Lord:

> "Telleth the number of the stars; He calleth them all by their names" (Psa. cxlvii. 4).

This insistence by the Prophets on the "one by one" gathering, the passing under the rod, the telling of the names, is all against a mass movement crashing into Palestine at the impulse of fear, or for the satisfaction of political purposes. When Israel enter their land, the tares will be discriminated from the wheat. The names Cain, Lot, Ammon, Moab and Ishmael come to the mind at once. When Israel left Egypt on the night of the first Passover, we read "a mixed multitude went up also with them" (Exod. xii. 38), and Nehemiah uses the same word and refers to this same event in Neh. xiii. 3, where he also recorded his indignation and sorrow at a similar "mixture" which threatened to undo all that he had been led to do for the returned captives.

> "In those days also saw I Jews that had married wives of Ashdod, of Ammon, and of Moab: And their children spake half in the speech of Ashdod, and could not speak in the Jews' language, but according to the language of each people. And I contended with them, and cursed them, and smote certain of them, and plucked off their hair, and made them swear by God, saying, Ye shall not give your daughters unto their sons, nor take their daughters unto your sons, or for yourselves. Did not Solomon king of Israel sin by these things? yet among many nations was there no king like him, who was beloved of his God, and God made him king over all Israel: nevertheless even him did outlandish women cause to sin. Shall we then hearken unto you to do all this great evil, to transgress against our God in marrying strange wives? And one of the sons of Joida, the son of Eliashib the high priest, was son in law to Sanballat the Horonite: therefore I chased him from me" (Neh. xiii. 23-28).

We read that Esau married two women who were Hittites (Gen. xxvi. 34). Seeing that these wives pleased not Isaac and Rebekah and that Jacob was charged not to take a wife of the daughter of Canaan, he married a daughter of Ishmael, thus adding still further to the mixture of his descendants. One may interpose here, and say, even so, but as Esau was not in the line either of the Covenant nor of the Messiah it does not matter so much. But here we are mistaken, for in the days of David, Edom became a subject people (II Sam. viii. 14), and in I Kings xi. 1 we read that Solomon loved many strange women . . . . . of the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Zidonians and Hittites. During the time of Elisha, Edom revolted from under the hand of Judah, and made a king over themselves (II Kings viii. 20). But later, under the Maccabees "the children of Esau finally lost their independent existence, and became substantially merged in the house of Israel" (Imperial Bible Dictionary).

Josephus informs us that about B.C.125 Edom was finally subdued by John Hyrcanus, who compelled them to submit to circumcision and other Jewish rites "that they were hereafter NO OTHER THAN JEWS" (Jos. Ant. xiii. 9. 1).

Here then is a "mixture". Those called "Jews" even by so aristocratic a Pharisee as Josephus could include Edomites, whose mothers were Hittites and Ishmaelites! We do not know that at the time of the end there will be those who "say they are Jews, and are not" (Rev. iii. 9), and it is certain that when the Jews were dispersed during and at the close of the Acts, they were "a mixed multitude", tares mingled with wheat, not to be segregated until the harvest. Israel is to be sifted among the nations as corn is sifted in a sieve (Amos ix. 9). The word translated sieve is the Hebrew kebarah, a network, but the word "sift" is not the verbal form of this word, but the Hebrew nua a word meaning "to wander up and down", "fugitive", "vagabond", "scatter", and other terms which graphically picture the "wandering Jew", and suggests one way in which this "sifting" will be accomplished. This element of mingling and mixture, necessitates the purging and the refining that must take place before Israel can be given their land at the opening of the day of the Lord.

> "For he is like the fire of smelters and the acid used by fullers; He will sit down to smelt and purge, purging the sons of Levi, refining them like silver and gold" (Mal. iii. 2 Moffatt).
>
> "Because ye are all become dross, behold, therefore I will gather you into the midst of Jerusalem. As they gather silver, and brass, and iron, and lead, and tin, into the midst of the furnace, to blow the fire upon it, to melt it; so will I gather you in Mine anger and in My fury, and I will leave you there, and melt you . . . . . as silver is melted in the midst of the furnace" (Ezek. xxii. 19-22).

To go outside the pages of Scripture for our information is fraught with danger, we are neither historians nor ethnologists, we simply refer to a further evidence of this great intermingling that has taken place since 70A.D. There is evidence in hand to show that another nation was incorporated into the Jewish faith, a people called the Khazars who occupied the south-eastern corner of Europe in the eighth century A.D. About the end of the seventh century, the Khazars became converted to Judaism, and Rabbis were brought over from Spain to minister in their synagogues. Later on this Khazar kingdom became incorporated in Southern Russia, and this accounts for the great Jewish population of Poland, Rumania, and adjacent countries. All this, however, we take "on trust", knowing little more from history than that such a kingdom existed.

If to the Edomite intermixture we add the Khazar, and other additions we can well understand that the "all Israel" that God is pledged to "save" (Rom. xi. 26) cannot include many who are "of Israel" or who can call Abraham their "father" (Rom. ix. 6-8), such are not the children of the promise who are counted for the seed. If we have represented the character of the "Jew" aright, it makes it simply impossible, that to such a mixture, the blessed words should be addressed, "Arise, shine; for thy light is come"; such an unholy mixture could never be used by God as a Pre-Millennial kingdom, for their melting and refining, the ridding of their dross, takes place on the eve of the Lord's return at His Second Coming. Jerusalem will be trodden down by the Gentiles until the end of Gentile time. Gentile time will end when the Stone cut without hands smites the image of Dan. ii. The people that become a blessing to all nations will be those who at long last will look upon Him Whom they have pierced, and who will say:

> "Unto Him that loved us, and washed (or loosed) us from our sins in His own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and His Father; to Him be glory and dominion for ever and ever, Amen" (Rev. i. 5, 6).

In line with all that we have seen, is Peter's appeal immediately following Pentecost:

> "Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord" (Acts iii. 19).

The word presence, prosopon, is generally translated "face" and CANNOT possibly mean "absence". In verse 13 we read of the "presence of Pilate", and in v. 41 identical language is used for departing "from the presence" of the council, and in the reference to the Second Coming in II Thess. i. 9. The promised "refreshing" and the threatened "destruction" flow alike from the immediate personal presence of the same Lord. This "Scattered People" will at last become the Lord's "Gathered People", and that gathering will take place on the eve of the Second Coming. At that gathering a great sifting and refining will take place, which shows that before that time Israel will be in no position to become a blessing in the earth; they stand in need evidently of a personal blessing themselves.

Let us rejoice that:

"He that scattered Israel will gather him."

THE PROPHETIC EARTH

As an appendix to this study, we draw the reader's attention to a series of articles in Volumes XXXVI and XXXVII of the Berean Expositor under the title "The prophetic earth", which suggests that the prophetic earth does not extend further than that ruled over by Nebuchadnezzar and his successors; in other words from the Indus to the straits of Gibraltar. We quote:

"It seems a sound argument to affirm that by reason of Israel's lo-ammi condition at Acts xxviii., the time element in the history of the successive rulers from Nebuchadnezzar should cease to have a place, and it seems reasonable to believe that, when the prophetic clock again begins to tick, the parenthesis will be closed and the powers indicated by the two feet and the ten toes (which toes are symbols of the ten kings yet to reign with the Beast, at the time of the end) will reign, in the first place, over the same territory as was governed by their predecessors."

"The reference to 'the kings of the East' in Rev. xvi. 12, does not refer to the Far East as we speak of it to-day. The Greek word anatole is used of the home country of the wise men (Matt. ii. 1). The corresponding terms in the Hebrew are mizrach which means 'from the rising (of the sun)' (Josh. iv. 19) or qedem, a land, comprehending Arabian Desert, Ammon, Armenia, Assyria and Mesopotamia. This is the anatole of the Hebrews. To this region belong the kings of the East, for the Hebrew words melchi qedem are found in Isa. xix. 11 and are there translated "ancient kings", but Pharaoh may be boasting here that he is descended from the kings of the East."

Psa. lxxxiii. 4 refers to "crafty counsel" taken by those who are "confederate against" Israel, and have said:

> "Come and let us cut them off from being a nation; that the name of Israel be no more in remembrance.":

words that have been unconsciously repeated by Arab leaders and reported in our newspapers in our time. Then, we ask, is it accidental that TEN NATIONS of the Middle East are immediately enumerated?

> Edom, Ishmaelites, Moab, Hagarenes, Gebal, Ammon, Amalek, Philistines with Tyre, Assur and Lot (Psa. lxxxiii. 6-8).

"The great powers outside the limits of the prophetic earth naturally play their part and exert a great influence, but just as the reference to the new heavens and new earth in Isaiah is localized, and our attention is focused upon 'Jerusalem' (Isa. lxv. 17, 18), or Millennial blessings are peculiarly associated in the first place as with 'all My holy mountain', before the earth is full of the knowledge of the Lord (Isa. xi. 9), so the doings of the nations in the limited zone of the prophetic earth preceded and anticipate the wider activities and judgments that follow."

We make no pretence to being "prophets" and can only be guided by what is written, realizing that much is still "sealed"; nevertheless in 1952/3 we wrote:

"Two items of peculiar interest are OIL and THE SUEZ CANAL, the oil fields of Iran and Iraq (Persia and Mesopotamia, so including Babylon) and the canal which passes through Egypt. It may well be that a 'corner' in oil and a command of the Suez Canal will make the rest of the world say of the last dictator:

> 'Who is able to make war with him?' (Rev. xiii. 4)."

England

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS,

This is Volume XL, and it completes fifty-one years of witness. We think of two words, as we record this fact, they are “Ebenezer” and “henceforth”.

Ebenezer, as we all know, refers in the first place to a stone memorial erected to commemorate some signal deliverance, and is actually engraved on the famous Moabite Stone. In Scripture we read:

> “Then Samuel took a stone, and . . . . . called the name of it Eben-ezer, saying, Hitherto hath the Lord helped us.”

We not only look back over the years with grateful recognition of past deliverances, but > “His love in times past

> Forbids us to think,
> He’ll leave us at last
> In trouble to sink.
> Each fresh Ebenezer, He brings to review > Confirms His good pleasure to help us right through.”

In the confidence that past grace begets, we go forward with the witness entrusted to us, and pray that all our readers will more abundantly share the hazards and the triumphs that are inseparable from such a work as is represented by The Berean Expositor.

Yours by All-sufficient grace,

CHARLES H. WELCH,
STUART ALLEN

Hitherto-----Henceforth
pp. 39, 40

The Editor of this magazine was given the honour of conducting the funeral service on Saturday, January 10th, of a dear and loyal sister in Christ, Mrs. Edith Coulson, who fell asleep on Wednesday the 7th at her home in Draycott, Derby. She, together with her husband, opened her house and unreservedly devoted time and possessions, that a meeting place should be provided where the Word of Truth rightly divided should find a hearing and a home. This took place some thirty years ago; since when some who were children have become adults, and have not only stood for the Truth, but have carried it far and wide for many years.

If ever a place of assembly can be said to have been 'consecrated', the room of meeting in Plum Tree House was indeed 'sacred ground'. This room on the Saturday gathering was filled to overflowing, and sadness gave place to gladness as the true comfort of the Scriptures took possession of every heart.

Quoting of Churchill at a critical moment in the last war we said:

> "This is the end of the beginning, and the beginning of the end."

Most certainly an end had come, but it was the end of a pilgrimage, not the end of all things. The earthly house of the pilgrimage which is likened to a frail tent, had fulfilled its purpose and was dissolved; the tired body was now being laid aside to rest in hope. At the same time let us remember that our sister's life is "Hid with Christ in God". What words are here! Time no longer counts for her; her next moment of consciousness is to "Awake with His likeness, and be SATISFIED".

The words at the head of this brief notice are borrowed from the experience of Samuel and of Paul, and should be true of us all.

> "Then Samuel took a stone and set it between Mizpeh and Shen (Mizpeh meaning a 'watch tower', and Shen a 'tooth', symbols of Divine and watchful providence on the one hand, and the gnawing tooth of opposing circumstances on the other), and called the name of it EBEN-EZER, saying, Hitherto hath the Lord helped us" (I Sam. vii. 12).

This was a monument erected to commemorate deliverance, the 'hitherto' suggesting continued grace in time of need.

Portions of two hymns come into mind here.

"His love in time past Forbids me to think He'll leave me at last In trouble to sink. Each fresh Eben-ezer He brings in review, Confirms His good pleasure To help me right through."	"Here I'll raise my Eben-ezer Hither by Thy grace I'm come, And I trust in Thy good pleasure Safely to arrive home. Christ did seek me, when a stranger Without hope, or peace or God; And to rescue me from danger Interposed His precious blood."

This day of mingled grief and joy was the end of a pilgrimage. The hitherto of the past and of GRACE, anticipates the henceforth of future and of GLORY.

We stand in an interval, a few beats of slow and quiet music, before the Hallelujah chorus becomes inevitable and bursts forth in praise. This waiting time is of unapproachable and almost unbelievable security, HID with CHRIST in GOD. The day approaches when this body of humiliation shall be transfigured like unto His body of glory (Phil. iii. 21) the henceforth.

Paul knew this 'henceforth' saying:

> "I have fought a good fight,
> I have finished my course,
> I have kept the faith, HENCEFORTH . . . . ." (II Tim. iv. 7, 8).

The crown laid up for him would not be received until 'that day', but the waiting time would be to him as nothing.

We who are left and allowed a little further time and opportunity to serve, gather courage from what we have learned at this solemn meeting. May we too keep the faith unsullied, undiluted, rightly divided, and Christ honouring, and may we too:

> "Live . . . . . looking for that blessed hope" (Titus ii. 12, 13).

Letter and Spirit
No.1 pp. 47, 48

"So they read in the book in the law of God distinctly, and gave the sense and caused them to understand the reading" (Neh. viii. 8).

We read that Daniel, after he had received a vision "sought for the meaning" (Dan. viii. 15), and Zechariah is found continually asking "What be these?" The Scriptures are valueless if they are meaningless. Their message is mediated through human language, and the first step to ascertaining "What is the mind of the Spirit" is to make sure of the meaning of the words that the Spirit has used. We hope to take up a number of expressions and key words, and give what light we possess or can discover upon their meaning. In the first place, we must have some idea of 'the meaning of meaning' before we can proceed (see the series "Go ye and learn what that meaneth"). Meaning cannot be settled by the etymology of a word only, although that is the first thing we investigate. The quest for meaning must also take into account the usage of any word under consideration so that dictionary and concordance will represent the irreducible minimum of apparatus necessary. In addition to this we must give a place to the context in which any particular word is found, and this will often be the first thing to take into account. We will make our meaning plain by an illustration. Suppose the word before us is the word "light". Now it is useless to commence our investigation into the etymology of the Greek word phos, which means 'light' in the sense of radiance, for the word might be the Greek word elaphros 'not heavy', and both of these words occur in II Cor. iv. In verse 6 we have phos, and in verse 17 we have elaphros. Even if the context decides that the word 'light' refers to the natural agent of vision, even then the word may not be phos, light itself, it may be luchnos a lamp (John v. 35), or lampas a torch (Acts xx. 8) or phengos a shining (Matt. xxiv. 29); or phoster a light giver (Phil. ii. 15) or photismos illumination (II Cor. iv. 4) or hapto to kindle (Luke viii. 16), or kaio to burn (Matt. v. 15) or epiphaino to shine upon (Luke i. 79); or apokalupsin an unveiling (Luke ii. 32). We need, therefore:

(1) Context.
(2) Etymology found by intelligent use of the dictionary, with the consciousness that it is only too easy in this subject to jump to conclusions.
(3) Usage, found by a survey of the concordance and an examination of the context.
(4) Illustration—as we have tried to illustrate the problems by the examples given above. We hope to apply this fourfold method in the elucidation of a number of words the meaning of which is essential to the true understanding and ministry of the Word of God.

p. 80

A CORRECTION. There is need for a correction in the Berean Expositor of January on page 7, where we stated that Lamech was 'childless'. What we should have said was that Cain's line ended in Lamech and his three sons, but our mind was influenced by the words of Jer. xxii. 30 where Coniah, who also had sons, was nevertheless 'childless' so far as the throne of David was concerned.

Faith
"With Sword and Trowel"
p. 186

In an earlier article we considered the foundation upon which faith rests. We may, however, consider faith as a foundation upon which one may build. When 'faith' is used in this sense it means the whole of the doctrine embraced by the believer and called "The Faith".

> "But ye, beloved, building up yourselves on your most holy faith" (Jude 20).

That 'the faith' here is looked upon as a 'foundation', the usage elsewhere testifies. The verb 'to build upon' occurs in I Cor. iii. 10, 12, 14; and in Eph. ii. 20 where there can be no doubt as to the meaning of the Apostle.

Someone has said that the believer must act like the Jews did in the days of Nehemiah, who worked at the building of the wall:

> "With one of his hands wrought in the work, and with the other hand held a weapon. For the builders, every one had his sword girded by his side, and so builded. And he that sounded the trumpet was by me" (Neh. iv. 17, 18).

Jude does not only say 'build', but says:

> "Ye should earnestly contend for the faith" (Jude 3).

The activities of faith are carried on in the presence of adversaries; when the adversary ceases to trouble, faith will be exchanged for perfect knowledge.

AN ADVISORY MAKEWEIGHT

pp. 187, 188

The articles for this issue of the magazine have overrun their allotted span and so your distribution secretary has been promoted to use these two pages! My position in the centre of the production and distribution of literature supplies me by correspondence received, with an overall picture of the spiritual needs of people and, to some extent, the fruit discovered by those who seek to pass on the precious truths they have made their own.

In conversing with friends and chance acquaintances, common experience finds the Bible accepted only in parts or misused or misunderstood. To demonstrate that all the Bible is inspired, and to show the virtues of Right Division and the implications of Dispensational Truth, require many hours with the person in question and the Open Book. Many of us, and I speak for myself, find difficulty in speaking convincingly and clearly. Proof texts are not always at our finger tips. Whilst these are drawbacks which we should ever endeavour to remove, yet out witness should not wait for the eloquence of Apollos. It is here at this point that the literature provided by the Trust can come to our aid.

Apart from the wonderful expository volumes on specific books such as Just and the Justifier, there are booklets to meet error and difficulties; among these are:

> THE RECONCILIATION OF ALL THINGS.—Some teach that God is love and will eventually reconcile all men to Himself. God has said: "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways My ways" (Isa. lv. 8). We need to look closely at what God has said on the subject. While it is not our province to judge the unbeliever, we need to hold fast to and proclaim the clear positive statements God has recorded regarding the means of grace and our salvation. This booklet has been written to meet many objections that have been raised.
>
> HELL: OR PURE FROM THE BLOOD OF ALL MEN.—The doctrine of eternal torment as the end of sinners is a belief which is widely held and for many today is a spur to the conversion of souls. The booklet follows the usual method of Mr. Welch in collecting all the terms used for Hell and other terms related to the judgment and the destination of sinners, and demonstrating their true usage and implications from other passages of Scripture and the use of the Greek equivalent in the Septuagint.
>
> ACCEPTED IN THE BELOVED.—Here is a book, not so much for the unbeliever as for the one who has not realized the amazing provision God has planned for us in His Son. What we could never hope for from our own efforts,

God has declared He will extend to us through our faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. God goes to the length of applying to us, who can understand and accept this offer, the word charitoo translated 'made us accepted'. The word charitoo occurs in only one other N.T. passage, namely Luke i. 28 when the angel greets the Virgin Mary with the words:

> "Hail, thou that art highly favoured among women."

Here is a booklet that sets forth some of these inestimable blessings.

WISDOM HUMAN AND DIVINE.—Universities and scholastic attainments produce the attitude of mind in many a young man and woman, that, having investigated the conclusions of ancient and not so ancient philosophers, they feel they would support those who can do without God, because 'after all you can't prove God exists'. In this booklet however, the conclusions of ancient thinkers such as Plato and Aristotle are reviewed, with the quest that they all had in common. The treatment is challenging and most interesting, and throws much light on the background of John's Gospel. Again you find a booklet designed to evoke a response from a certain grade of character or learning.

TRUE FROM THE BEGINNING.—A booklet that reviews the Bible, not as a production of man, reliable in parts, but as one harmonious whole and fully inspired by God. The Lord, mark you the risen Lord, in Luke xxiv. 25-27, beginning at Moses and all the prophets expounded unto His disciples in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself and set His seal upon that inspiration and truth. Consideration of testimony such as this, structures, numerics, and archaeological evidence, etc., are carefully weighed and clearly presented. Here is food for the sceptic and the man with a problem.

THE TEMPLE OF TRUTH.—Beside the apocryphal books of the O.T. it is known that there were many spurious writings about our Lord's life and early childhood. We say spurious, but how in those early years was our present N.T. collection finally fixed? We believe God intervened to ensure only the writings that He had inspired and thought necessary for our learning and guidance were included. The Canon of Scripture then, that is the agreed collection, one might expect to show the same perfect construction as the text of the Bible itself. This little leaflet demonstrates just this, and provides an added proof of our Father's hand in the Word of Truth.

Trusteeship
p. 208

While it is necessary, when property and finance are involved, that legally appointed Trustees should be responsible for the management and for the faithful fulfillment of spiritual as well as general obligations, no work can hope to thrive or to remain stedfast unless a sense of Trusteeship is living and active among all who form a part of any society, even though, as in the case of The Berean Forward Movement, no 'membership' is desired or allowed.

Every reader of the Berean Expositor, every member of the Church which is the Body of Christ is addressed as being 'faithful' (Eph. i. 1; Col. i. 2), and faithfulness is the outstanding quality in a steward (I Cor. iv. 1, 2) and faithfulness is the outstanding quality in a steward (I Cor. iv. 1, 2). This stewardship will not allow us to say to our Lord's creditors 'Write down fifty' (Luke xvi. 6), or as Paul puts it in II Cor. ii. 17:

> "We are not a many that 'water down' the word of truth."

We have been entrusted with a wondrous message which clings closely to the 'sound words' received from Paul and passed on down the age "To the faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also" (II Tim. i. 12-14; ii. 2). On the other hand, while we must be 'stedfast' and 'unmoveable', that does not mean obdurateness. Only the stedfast can at the same time successfully 'abound' in the work of the Lord (I Cor. xv. 58).

Anointed with the Holy Ghost

An examination of the place that the Holy Spirit occupies in the life and ministry of the Son of God.

pp. 244 - 248

"He . . . . .made Himself of no reputation" (Phil. ii. 7). This translation is unfortunate in that it does not express the intention of the inspired Apostle, and tends to establish a false connection with the passage concerning Epaphroditus in the same chapter where we read that 'such' should be held in reputation (Phil. ii. 29). The R.V. avoids the twofold mistake, rendering the former passage 'but emptied Himself' and the latter 'hold such in honour'. While the R.V. makes the teaching of the Apostle clearer, it creates a new problem for the modern mind. How, we ask, can a person speak of 'emptying' himself? We may empty a room of its furniture or we may speak of empty vessels and to avoid what appears to be too strange a figure, the tendency has been to attempt a paraphrase and say 'He divested Himself of the glory He had before the world was, He laid aside the insignia of Deity'. One of the reasons for our diffidence to accept the literal rendering "He emptied Himself" resides in the fact that we are facing that which Scripture itself says is 'confessedly great' namely 'the mystery of godliness', and sometimes the contemplation of a lower example of the truth helps our understanding of the higher. In Phil. ii. 17 the Apostle's turns from the great example of Christ, to the lesser example of himself, saying:

> "Yea, and if I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy, and rejoice with you all."

The Greek word spendomai, here translated 'offered', has a well defined meaning. It means 'to pour out as a drink offering' as in Exod. xxv. 29 (margin). The recognition of the true rendering of spendomai, while it puts us in possession of one great fact, opens the door to further problems and there are people, alas, who have concluded that the self-emptying of the Saviour when He became Man must mean that He knew no more than the average Nazarene peasant, and that consequently, His pronouncements for example concerning the integrity of the O.T Scriptures, are but an echo of the accepted tradition of His times. That this dreadful inference is not necessarily the one that such self-emptying implies is most blessedly true, as the following extract from the notes of Bishop Mowle testifies:

> "The Greek positively involves the conclusion that the 'emptying' whatever it was, was coincident in time with taking the form of a servant. According to well recognized laws of Greek idiom the aorist verb ('He emptied') and aorist participle ('taking') in verse seven give us one fact from two sides 'He made Himself void' not anyhow, but thus taking Bondservant's form. God has spoken His final message to us through a Son Who became also Bondservant. So the kenosis itself (as Paul meant it) is nothing less than a guarantee of infallibility."

Whether the Redeemer in the days of His voluntary assumption of the 'form of a servant' was still at the same time omniscient, who can say? But that He can and must be trusted absolutely in any assertion He may make is certain, for "He Whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God". We believe that there is a full and adequate guarantee both for the Saviour's sinlessness and for His utter and complete infallibility to be found in the recurring references at certain junctures of His life and ministry to the purposeful interposition of the Holy Spirit. These references we must now consider together, rejoicing already in the knowledge that God 'gave not the Spirit by measure unto Him'.

While the Scriptures maintain that Christ was indeed 'man', that He partook of 'flesh and blood', that He was indeed 'The Son of Man', that there is one Mediator, Himself man (R.V.) Christ Jesus, and that 'since by man came death, by Man came also the resurrection of the dead', it also maintains at every turn that He was ever and always 'holy, harmless, undefiled', that He knew no sin, that He did no sin, He was 'Jesus Christ the righteous'. No explanation is offered that accounts for this but two statements of fact are given which in the eyes of God are all-sufficient. The Saviour was born of a virgin. This while contrary to nature is no more to be rejected than that the first man had neither father nor mother, but came into the world at the creative decree of God. The Virgin Birth cuts through the entail that descends to all men from Adam, for in the Scriptures genealogy is always computed through the male line. This fact is actually recognized in the Hebrew language by the employment of one word zakar for 'man' that means 'to remember' and one word for woman nashim which means 'to forget'. The Virgin Birth therefore cuts through the line to Adam. This is not all however. When the angel Gabriel announced the news to Mary that she had been chosen of all women to be the mother of the Messiah, she, as a right minded, intelligent and sensible woman, exclaimed "How shall this be, seeing I know not a man?" (Luke i. 34). The angel's answer is explicit, even if it be not fully explanatory:

> "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: therefore also that Holy Thing that shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God" (Luke i. 35).

To the mind of Gabriel, the power and overshadowing of the Holy Ghost was a sufficient answer, 'therefore' is a logical connection.

> "In the annunciation to Mary, as well as in the vision of Joseph, not only is the supernatural conception declared, but the part of the Spirit in that mystery, about which it is almost impossible to speak, is defined and emphasized. Before the first stage of organic development had dawned, He so wrought and ruled, that the life fostered in the unique mother was protected against all the frailties of an earthly lineage, and made fit to blend with that divine consciousness now and hereafter to be infused into it." (T. G. Selby).

The record of Matthew's gospel is brief and to the point:

> "Now the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise: When as his mother Mary was espoused to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child of the Holy Ghost" (Matt. i. 18).

The reactions of Joseph are perfectly natural, and he had to be assured by Divine intervention that all was well.

> "The angel appeared unto him in a dream, saying, Joseph, thou son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife: for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost" (Matt. i. 20).

A parallel on a lower plane is found in Luke's Gospel in the record of the birth and life of John the Baptist. He was not born of a virgin, he was not sinless, he was not 'from above', but certain features are discoverable between the accounts of the birth of these two, the Lord and His forerunner, that demand attention. Elizabeth the mother of John had no miraculous conception, but when she heard Mary's salutation we are told 'the babe leaped in her womb: and Elizabeth was filled with the Holy Ghost' (Luke i. 41). In absolute contrast, we have seen that before the conception of the Saviour, the Holy Ghost is said to have come upon his mother. The Saviour, said Gabriel, shall be called "The Son of the Highest" (Luke i. 32), whereas of John it was said that he should be called "The prophet of the Highest" (i. 76). While John and the Saviour differ essentially as to their birth, identical language is used by Luke of their subsequent growth. Of John he wrote:

> "And the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit" (Luke i. 80), and of the Saviour he wrote:

> "And the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit" (Luke ii. 40), a most evident and intentional parallel. Such a sober statement sets aside all the apocryphal miracles and precocious sayings of the infant and growing Son of God. The Spirit that ensured His sinless birth, presided over His growing years, so that at the age of twelve He astonished the doctors at Jerusalem with His understanding and answers. Yet even so, it is written:

> "He went down with them, and came to Nazareth, and was subject unto them . . . . . and Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and man" (Luke ii. 51, 52).

Nothing more is recorded of the life of Christ until He attained His thirtieth year, when once again the Holy Ghost intervenes. The particular reason why it is written "Jesus Himself began to be about thirty years of age" (Luke iii. 23), is discoverable in the law that pertained to the priesthood. "From thirty years old and upward" (Numb. iv. 3), is the requirement repeated seven times in this chapter, and this rule was observed in the days of Solomon for in I Chron. xxiii. 3, we read:

> "Now the Levites were numbered from the age of thirty years and upward."

Here at the next critical period in that spotless Life we find prominence given to the power and presence of the Holy Spirit. At the age of thirty years He stepped out of the obscurity of Nazareth into the fierce light of religious criticism and antipathy.

At the river Jordan, the Spirit of God descended upon the Saviour, and at the same time a Voice was heard from heaven saying:

> "This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased" (Matt. iii. 16, 17).

This baptism of the Spirit is recorded in each of the four Gospels. Following this baptism and confirmation we read:

> "And immediately the Spirit driveth Him into the wilderness" (Mark i. 12), there to be tempted of the devil, there to overcome not by the employment of His innate Deity, but as the humblest of His followers may do, to overcome by the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God. His threefold 'It is written' was all sufficient to defeat the attacks of the devil. This 'test' moreover set the course of all the Saviour's subsequent ministry. He reiterates that the doctrine He taught was not His own, but that He spake the words that had been given to Him. Of all the preachers and teachers that have ever spoken in the name of the Lord, this Beloved One surely could have spoken out of His own heart. What He could have done we may not know, but what He did, and did willingly we do know, and rejoice one more in this great condescension. When He took the 'form of a servant' it was no piece of theatricals. From first to last it could be written of Him 'He pleased not Himself', He came to do the will of Him that sent Him. Luke's Gospel says:

> "And Jesus being full of the Holy Ghost returned from Jordan, and was led by the Spirit into the wilderness" (Luke iv. 1).
>
> "And Jesus returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee: and there went out a fame of Him through all the region round about. And He taught in their synagogues, being glorified of all" (Luke iv. 14, 15).

Immediately following this statement, comes the Lord's public acknowledgment that He was anointed by the Spirit of the Lord, thus to preach.

> "The Spirit of the Lord is upon Me, because He hath anointed Me to preach the gospel to the poor" (Luke iv. 18).

Following this opening proclamation in the synagogue of Nazareth, comes a long series of miracles and mighty works. These too are attributed to the power and presence of the Holy Spirit.

> "If I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you" (Matt. xii. 28), and so important is the fact that these miracles were the work of the Holy Ghost, the Saviour proceeds to make one of the most solemn pronouncements of His ministry.

> "Whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of Man, it shall be forgiven him; but whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come" (Matt. xii. 32).

Peter summed up this aspect of the Saviour's ministry, saying:

> "God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power: Who went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil, for God was with Him" (Acts x. 38).

To the believer, the gifts of grace are given in measure, for our capacity is very limited, but it could be written of the Son of God,

> "For He Whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God: for God giveth not the spirit by measure unto Him" (John iii. 34).

When the last great act was accomplished at Calvary, here once again the power and presence of the Spirit must be recognized, for the Apostle wrote:

> "Who through the eternal Spirit offered Himself without spot to God" (Heb. ix. 14).

Both the final 'offering' and the lifelong freedom from all 'spot' are guaranteed by the Spirit that was given without measure unto Him. Let it be remembered, that if His redeemed people have been slow to recognize the complete voluntary self-emptying of the Son of God, the devil was fully aware of its significance and importance, for His first temptation was that of accomplishing something in the strength of His own inherent Godhead, an attack upon the very purpose of the Incarnation. However much we may wish to know the inner secrets of this 'mystery of Godliness' they are Divinely hid from our eyes. When He emptied Himself, the wisdom, knowledge and power that were His by right were held at His disposal by the Holy Ghost, and given to Him at those crises in His ministry that demanded them. Even after He had been raised from the dead, 'until the day in which He was taken up', He had through the Holy Ghost given commandments unto the apostles whom He had chosen (Acts i. 2). His miraculous birth, with its accompanying freedom from all taint of Adam's transgression, is attributed to the power and overshadowing of the Holy Ghost. His opening ministry, commission and proclamation, were directly associated with the coming of the Holy Ghost upon Him. His subsequent miracles were definitely attributed to the power of the Holy Ghost, even as His final act of complete self-surrender on the cross of Calvary, was offered 'through the eternal Spirit'. "No man knoweth the Son, but the Father" (Matt. xi. 27), and all speculation is unwarranted and approaches blasphemy.

What we are assured of is that from Birth to Death, in Resurrection and Ascension, every step of the way of the Saviour along the path of His voluntary self-emptying was safeguarded by the Spirit that was not given by measure unto Him. Most of us have been given 'posers' by objectors, who in their ignorance or their arrogance demand to know whether the babe at His mother's breast, was at the same time conscious that 'by Him all things were created'. They ask how can it be possible that He Who had made all things could nevertheless sit weary on a well and ask a woman for a drink. We gladly admit that we have no need to probe into these sacred things. The persistence with which the Scriptures introduce the ministry of the Holy Ghost at every turn and crisis has been written to satisfy the believer once and for ever on all such matters and we rejoice in such a Saviour, Who acted throughout the whole course of His ministry as One Who 'though He was rich, YET FOR OUR SAKES He became poor' and instead of using this most blessed ‘poverty’ as a weapon against His essential Deity or His most wondrous Love, we realize that ‘through His poverty’ we can alone become rich.

EPHESIANS.

"To make all men see what is the dispensation of the mystery"
(Eph. iii. 9, R.V.)

No.47. The Audience Chamber (ii. 11 - 19-).

Gentiles, "far off", "made nigh".

pp. 1 - 4

We saw when examining Eph. ii. 1-4 that the interposition of the words "But God" changes the whole doctrinal position of the unsaved Gentile. On the one side of this gracious interposition was sin, with an energizing spirit of evil, on the other side salvation by grace, and His workmanship. So we now see that the interposition of the words "But now" in Eph. ii. 13 changes the whole dispensational disability of the Gentile from distance to nearness, giving him access in 'one spirit' and exchanging citizenship for alienation, and the creation of a new man in the place of the hopeless condition of the Gentile in the flesh and in the world. These Gentiles were "far off". In the O.T. this term 'far off' was used of the people of Israel in the lands of their captivity, and the same Greek work makran that is used here, is used in the Septuagint:

> "If they sin against Thee (for there is no man that sinneth not), and Thou be angry with them, and deliver them over before their enemies, and they carry them away captives unto a land far off or near" (II Chron. vi. 36).
>
> "And Mordecai wrote these things, and sent letters unto all the Jews that were in all the provinces of the king Ahasuerus, both nigh and far" (Est. ix. 20).

'Far off and near' refer in both cases to the one people, Israel. So Daniel prayed for all Israel "that are near and that are far off, through all the countries whither Thou hast driven them". Likewise Peter intended his words to be understood on the day of Pentecost, when he said:

> "The promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off" (Acts ii. 39).

Up to this point the words "far off" applied solely to the dispersed of Israel and to these both James and Peter addressed their epistles.

> "James, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ, to the twelve tribes which are scattered abroad, greeting" (James i. 1).

When the Jew wanted to use an expression that indicated remoteness from their own centre of activity, they thought of the Gentile world lying about them; so when the Saviour told them that He was going away, and that where He would be they cannot come, they replied:

> "Will He go unto the dispersed among the Gentiles, and teach the Gentiles?" (John vii. 35).

Even Galilee, which was a part of the holy land, was called "Galilee of the Gentiles" and the people there are said to have "sat in darkness" (Matt. iv. 15).

Now, when Ephesians was being written, the people of Israel had become Lo-ammi "not My people" and during their blindness a new revelation had been made known, calling the far off Gentiles into an unprecedented state of nearness. In the sequel, after the nature of this nearness is explained, the Apostle invests the words of Isa. lvii. 19 with a fuller meaning: "Peace, peace to him that is far off, and to him that is near" (see Eph. ii. 17). This passage however cannot be understood or correctly interpreted unless it be read in relation to the whole context. It is time therefore that we considered the structure of the passage in order to comprehend its scope.

Ephesians ii. 14 - 18

a1	|	He is our Peace.	a2 |	Reconciled to God.
b1	|	"The Both" One.	b2 |	"The Both" one body.
b1	|	"The Twain" One.	b2 |	"The Both" one spirit.
a1	|	So making Peace.	a2 |	Access to the Father.

What we have omitted in this synopsis are the references to enmity and the middle wall, which enmity was destroyed at the cross. Before these features are examined, the glorious basis and sphere of this great change must be considered:

> "But now in Christ Jesus ye who sometimes were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ" (Eph. ii. 13).

The state of the Gentiles by nature was "without Christ", their state by grace is expressed by the opposite "in Christ Jesus". Expositors do not agree as to the interpretation of the words translated "by the blood of Christ"—Alford says:

> "I prefer 'in' to 'by' . . . . . the difference between en here and dia in ch. 1:7 is, that there the blood of Christ is spoken of specifically as the medium of our apolutrosis (redemption)—here inclusively as representing the apolutrosis."

Elliott on the other hand reckons that en here has its instrumental force. However we translate the words, we should be aware of the repetition of this preposition en in the context, and to see it in the outworking of the Apostle's argument will compel us to use care in its rendering. Let us tabulate the use of en in this section (Eph. ii. 11-19), and for the sake of clarity, we will render en by the word "in", in each passage. In the flesh; in the world; in Christ Jesus; in the blood of Christ; in His flesh; in ordinances; in Himself; in one body; in it, or in Himself (thereby verse 16); in one spirit. With all this insistence upon 'sphere', in the flesh, in the world, in the spirit, etc., it seems wrong to lift the words "in the blood of Christ" out of this category, by translating the phrase "by the blood of Christ". It would appear therefore that the Apostle would expand the words 'now in Christ Jesus' by the added words 'nigh in the blood of Christ' in order that there shall be no chance of misunderstanding the sacrificial basis of this mighty change. When he came to write on this subject of alienation and reconciliation in Colossians, he puts the matter thus:

> "And having made peace through the blood of His cross, by Him to reconcile all things unto Himself . . . . . you, that were sometime alienated and enemies . . . . . in the body of His flesh through death . . . . ." (Col. i. 20-22).

If we allow the Apostle to be his own interpreter we shall read together the two passages:

> "But now in Christ Jesus ye who sometimes were far off."
> "You that were sometime alienated."

The 'aliens' from the Commonwealth of Israel, were those who had become 'alienated from the life of God'. They could not merely refer to the 'lost tribes of the house of Israel', for Paul's reference to 'things in earth, or things in heaven', or 'every creature which is under heaven' is too wide for such a limitation.

When addressing the people of Israel, the prophets and Peter spoke of some indeed who were far off, but of others who were nigh. These Gentiles however were all far off, and all needed to be 'made nigh'. The word engus "nigh" is used in the LXX for the next of kin "his kin, that is near unto him" (Lev. xxi. 2), and so of the Kinsman-Redeemer. "If his father have no brethren, then ye shall give his inheritance unto his kinsman that is next of kin to him of his family" (Numb. xxvii. 11). Job uses the word in the chapter where he declares "I know that my Redeemer (Kinsman-Redeemer) liveth", for in Job xix. 14 he complained 'my kinsfolk have failed'. It is with some feeling that we see in the immediate context of these words of Job such expressions as hope removed, counted as enemy, brethren far from me, estranged, STRANGER and ALIEN, showing how the absence of the Kinsman-Redeemer was associated, as in Eph. ii., with alienation and enmity. Just as Job, however, found his complete satisfaction in the Kinsman-Redeemer, so the Gentile addressed by Paul was made nigh only 'in the blood of Christ'.

While the chief emphasis in Scripture when 'blood' is mentioned is on the sacrificial aspect, we must not forget such passages as Heb. ii. 14 and Acts xvii. 26, without which the Kinsman-Redeemer aspect would not be possible. In Eph. i. 7 the blood of Christ is the instrument of deliverance and forgiveness, which sets the bondman free, in Eph. i. 14, redemption is of the purchased possession, the work of the Kinsman-Redeemer retrieving the inheritance forfeited by death, and in Eph. ii. 13 this Kinsman-Redeemer makes us one with Himself. So we shall read presently of this redeemed company being reconciled to God 'in one body' and when we are weighing this matter over, we shall discover that it is exceedingly difficult to feel sure as to whether the 'one body' refers to the body of His flesh, as in Col. i., or to the one body, namely the newly-formed church of the Mystery. Happily, consciousness of the Kinsman-Redeemer enables us to see that there is no great disparity here, but a most marvelous oneness, 'all of one' in Heb. ii. 11 being made possible by the partaking of flesh and blood of verse fourteen.

The Gentiles who were 'far off' are said to be 'made nigh'. The epistle to the Hebrews speaks of 'things that are made' (Heb. xii. 27) as being vulnerable, the Greek work translated ‘made’ being poieo. This cannot be taken universally, for Eph. ii. 10 says ‘we are His workmanship’ (poem poiema); He ‘made’ peace and He ‘made’ both one (Eph. ii. 14, 15). Yet the Apostle does not use poieo when he says ‘made nigh’ and we shall be wise to observe the difference implied. The word used in the phrase ‘made nigh’ is the Greek verb ginomai a word related to birth, generation, etc., and so in line with the living union with the Kinsman-Redeemer that seems to be the dominant feature of this verse of Ephesians. The nature of this nearness is further indicated by the terms employed in the verses that follow. ‘Made nigh’ is followed by peace, made one, middle wall of partition, enmity, reconcile, access, and these terms when examined make it very clear that the distance that is here cancelled was one that lay at the root of Gentile disability. To this we must devote our attention in succeeding articles.

No.48. The Audience Chamber (ii. 11 - 19-).

Gentiles, Aliens and Strangers (ii. 11, 12).

pp. 21 - 26

Just as Eph. ii. 1-10 is related to time past (Eph. ii. 2, 3), so the present section is related to time past (Eph. ii. 11), the two sections being related thus:

A | DOCTRINE |
a | 1-3. TIME PAST. Walk. World and flesh.
b | 4. But God. Mercy. Love.
c | 5-10. Made Alive together.
Raised together.
Made to sit together.
A | DISPENSATION |
a | 11, 12. TIME PAST. Gentiles. flesh. world.
b | 13-18. But now. Nigh. One.
c | 19-22. Citizens together.
Fitly framed together.
Builded together.

In the doctrinal section of Eph. ii. we have such terms as ‘dead’, ‘trespass’, ‘sin’, ‘disobedience’, ‘wrath’, ‘make alive’, ‘save’, ‘faith’ and ‘walk’. These are consistently employed because the subject is the original state of the believer in relation to sin and death. None of these terms is used in the dispensational section now before us, for the viewpoint here is not that of sin and death, but of distance and nearness, of being Gentiles and aliens, of being far off and made nigh, of a middle wall, of ordinances, in fact of the dispensational disability of being a Gentile, irrespective of individual character. In the doctrinal survey, the flesh and the world are used as they are related to the walk and the lusts of the unregenerate. In the dispensational section the flesh and the world are used as they are related to the enmity that was aroused between the circumcision and uncircumcision. Salvation issues in a new creation; the revelation of the Mystery leads to the creation of a ‘new man’. If these differences are realized, then the reader from

Eph. ii. 16 will be proof against any attempt to teach universal reconciliation irrespective of the limitations of the Mystery, or from the related theme in Col. i. 16-22.

'In the flesh' finds its echo in Eph. iii. 5 'in Spirit', which, when we reach that passage, we hope to show stands at the head of the threefold fellowship of verse six. While the flesh in all men is the same, yet it did not disqualify the Jew as we have seen in Rom. ix. 3-5, from dispensational privilege, but it did the Gentile. What depths of degradation and misery are found in the words 'in the flesh' and 'in the world', and between them lies the whole case of Gentile disability, contained in the terms uncircumcision, without Christ, aliens, strangers, no hope, and without God.

'Without Christ' choris Christou. As the A.V. stands we are likely to look at the two expressions 'without Christ' and 'without God' as being very similar. The word translated 'without God' is atheoi, to which we will return presently. What does 'without Christ' mean? Out of its context it would spell simply damnation, and utter and irrevocable loss; but in the confines of the subject before us it rather emphasizes the fact that, whereas 'according to the flesh' "Christ came" from Israel, the Gentile had no such hope or privilege. The Scriptures had plainly revealed that the promised Seed of the woman, should come through the line of David, of the tribe of Judah; consequently Gentiles as such were 'without a Messiah', Dr. J. Armitage Robinson reads verse twelve:

> "That at that time without Christ ye were aliens from the commonwealth of Israel" and says "A contrast is here drawn between their old position 'at that time without Christ' and their new position 'now in Christ Jesus'. This contrast is somewhat obscured if we render, as in the A.V. . . . . they are called upon to remember not simply that they were without Christ, but what they are without Christ."

The structure of Eph. ii. 11-19 is as follows:

D | O1 | 11, 12. IN TIME PAST.
P1 | n | 11. Gentiles IN THE FLESH.
o | 12. Without Christ.
Distance p | 12. Aliens from the commonwealth of Israel.
p | 12. Strangers from the covenants of the promise.
o | 12. Without hope.
n | 12. Godless IN THE WORLD.
O2 | 13, 14. BUT NOW.
P2 | q1 | 14. He is our PEACE.
r1 | "The BOTH" made one.
s1 | 14. Middle wall broken.
Peace t1 | 15. Enmity in flesh.
s1 | 15. Decrees abolished.
r1 | 15. "The TWAIN" created one new man.
q1 | 16. So making PEACE.
q2 | 16. Reconciled to GOD.
r2 | 16. "The BOTH" in one body.
s2 | 16. Through the cross.
Reconciliation t2 | 16, 17. Enmity slain. Peace.
s2 | 18. Through Him.
r2 | 18. "The BOTH" in one spirit.
Qq2 | 18. Access to the FATHER.
O3 | 19. NO LONGER.
P3 | 19. Strangers and foreigners.

Something of the position of the Gentile 'without Christ' is seen in the dealings of the Lord with the Syropheonecian woman (Matt. xv. 21-28); the attitude of the Lord being influenced not by the question of whether the woman was a sinner of not, but that she was a Gentile; that the people of Israel were 'lords' (masters Greek); that she was in comparison a dog; and that all she could expect at that time were 'crumbs'. What a change has been wrought since she learned the disability of being a Gentile!—riches beyond expression, in place of crumbs. Wealth that Israel never knew is now lavished upon them who were classed among the dogs or the unclean. If only those detractors of misunderstood terms would ponder the glory of Ephesians over against the condition of the Gentile according to Matt. xv., we should hear less of the false charge that those who teach dispensational truth 'rob' the believer who follows their teaching. Whoever was 'robbed' by the substitute of wealth undreamed for 'crumbs'! The Gentile had none of the privileges enumerated in Rom. ix., for they were Israel's 'in the flesh', and in that sphere 'all spiritual blessings' could not exist. In the flesh, the Gentile has no place, his only hope of life and blessing is 'in the spirit', and that demanded a miracle for its accomplishment. The condition of the Gentile 'without Christ' is revealed by the words that follow 'being aliens . . . . . and strangers'. The word translated 'alien' is one of many compounds of the Greek root all, which means 'other', and which necessitates, as we shall see, 'reconciliation', another word from the same root to accomplish the cancellation of distance and enmity implied. There is so much teaching associated with this family of words, that even though it holds up the exposition of the passage before us for a while, the light which we shall receive will more than compensate. Let us take a survey of this root and some of its developments.

Alla. "But." The 'disjunctive conjunction' prevents the mind from coming to a certain conclusion by the introduction of some 'other' factor. For example, Eph. ii. 3 ends with the words 'children of wrath even as others'. Instead of going on to the conclusion 'therefore these children of wrath are of necessity condemned', the interjection of the words 'But God' introduces 'another' and qualifying factor.

Allos. "Another" or "other" as 'other foundation can no man lay'.

Allaso (some lexicons allatto) "change". There are six occurrences as follows: Acts vi. 14; Rom. i. 23; I Cor. xv. 51, 52; Gal. iv. 20 and Heb. i. 12.

Allos (long "o") Adverb "otherwise" I Tim. v. 25.

Allogenes "stranger" Luke xvii. 18.

Allotrios translated "stranger", "other", "another" and "alien".

The several words which are rendered 'reconcile' and 'reconciliation' are derivatives and compounds of this same root, namely katallasso, katallage and apokatallasso. The word translated 'being aliens' in Eph. ii. 12 and 'being alienated' in Eph. iv. 18, is the Greek apallotrioo. The Gentiles as such, were aliens from the commonwealth of Israel. This 'commonwealth' translates politeia, citizenship, with especial reference to the 'freedom' or enfranchisement that went with it, as in Acts xxii. 28, the only other occurrence of politeia in the N.T. Politeuma, found in Phil. iii. 20 'conversation', has a similar meaning, and Paul tells these 'Gentiles' that even though they could have no place in the polity of Israel, they had lost nothing, but had gained infinitely, for their polity was 'in heaven'. Consequently, when this passage in Eph. ii. runs its course, we find in verse nineteen that those thus denied the citizenship of Israel were nevertheless 'fellow citizens of the saints'. In similar vein we have the corresponding member of the structure of Eph. ii. 12 namely 'strangers from the covenants of promise'.

If the reader consults the A.V. or the R.V. of Eph. ii. 12, he will read 'strangers from the covenants of promise'. The only alteration that J.N.D. makes in his translation is to read 'strangers to the covenants of promise' instead of 'strangers from'. Rotherham reads exactly as the A.V. Weymouth translates the passage:

> "With no share by birth in the covenants which are based on Promises."

These five versions of the N.T. differ from one another in several particulars, but apparently, none of the Editors seem to have felt it necessary to translate xenos by 'guest' in Eph.ii. 12. The fact that there is this unanimity however, is not proof of accuracy, and the Berean Expositor would be the last to refuse an examination of any rendering put forward in good faith. The matter is important for at least two reasons.

First. Quite apart from its possible bearing upon our own hope or calling, we should be zealous for the truth, and jealous of the truth, earnestly desiring as near as is humanly possible a translation in our own tongue that shall express the meaning of the original.

Secondly. Coming as the word does in a context that deals with the status of the Gentile before the revelation of the Mystery, the whole passage must be coloured by the translation adopted, and must influence our minds and our teaching concerning the constitution of the church of the One Body.

The first thing we must do is to note the occurrences of the word in the N.T. The Greek word under consideration is xenos, and occurs fourteen times:

Matt. xxv. 35, 43.	"I was a stranger."
Matt. xxv. 38, 44.	"When saw we Thee a stranger?"
Matt. xxvii. 7.	"The potter's field to bury strangers in."
Acts xvii. 18.	"A setter forth of stranger gods."
Acts xvii. 21.	"All the Athenians and strangers which were there."
Rom. xvi. 23.	"Gaius mine host."
Eph. ii. 12.	The passage under consideration.
Eph. ii. 19.	This passage also goes with Eph. ii. 12.
Heb. xi. 13.	"Strangers and pilgrims."
Heb. xiii. 9.	"Divers and strange doctrines."
I Pet. iv. 12.	"As though some strange thing happened."
III John 5.	"To the brethren, and to strangers."

It is evident that the five references found in Matthew can have no other meaning than 'stranger', a 'stranger' can only become a 'guest' if he is 'taken in'; such a meaning is not resident in the word itself. The 'strange' gods of Acts xvii. 18, and the 'strange thing' of I Pet. iv. 12 allow of no alteration. The believers mentioned in Heb. xi.13, were most certainly 'strangers' and not 'guests'. The 'resident strangers' at Athens are very like the 'strangers of Rome' (Acts ii. 10) and cannot be translated 'guests'. In Rom. xvi. 23, we have the word xenos translated 'host'. This can only be justified if the word is used figuratively, for no one would suggest using the translation 'host' in any of the thirteen references given above.

Eustathius says, concerning the usage of xenos:

> "Both he who entertained and he who was entertained were called xenos, in respect of each other."

Parkhurst says of this word:

> "Properly a person who, belonging to one country, dwells or sojourns in another, a stranger, foreigner." "In a more general sense, a stranger, a person of another nation or religion." "As an adjective, strange, foreign, wonderful."

The transition from the idea of 'stranger' to 'hospitality' is natural, and this has taken place; but because this is so, that does not justify the substitution of 'guest' for the translation 'stranger' unless the evidence of the context be overwhelmingly in its favour.

Cremer, in his Biblico-Theological Lexicon does not treat of xenos except to place it as a synonym with paroikos. Paroikeo, in Biblical Greek means, according to Cremer:

> "Strangers who dwell anywhere, without citizen rights or home title." Paroikia only in Biblical and patristic Greek.
>
> "(a) Dwelling as a sojourner in a foreign land without home or citizen rights; (b) a foreign country as the dwelling place of him who has no home rights here."

Paroikos expresses a conception capable of many applications. Guest of God (Lev. xxv. 35), earthly homelessness (Psa. cxix. 19), etc.

The LXX uses xenos to translate the following Hebrew words:

(1) Traveller, helek (II Sam. xii. 4). This word means primarily to go, or to walk, and so by an easy transition it becomes a tax, custom or duty, laid on ports of ways. Should the reading arach be preferred here, there is no essential difference, arach meaning 'to go in a track' and as a noun, 'a common road, highway, a traveller'.

(2) Stranger gur (Job xxxi. 32). To sojourn, to dwell anywhere for a time, to live as not at home. Translated 'alien' in Exod. xviii. 3, associated with the name Gershom.

(3) Stranger nokri (Ruth ii. 10). A foreigner, outlandish. As a verb the word means 'to alienate'.

Nekar is used of 'the stranger' and 'the alien' as contrasted with Israel in Exod. xii. 43; Isa. lx. and lxi. In Lamentations the word is used in a sense very suggestive of Eph. ii. 12.

"Behold our reproach, our inheritance is turned to strangers, our houses to alien" (Lam. v. 1, 2).

(4) Those bidden qara (I Sam. ix. 13).

This passage indicates that xenos is once used in the LXX in the sense of 'guest'.

The reader can see for himself that 'stranger', 'alien', 'foreigner', is the primary significance of the word xenos and that 'guest' and 'host' is a derived or secondary meaning.

We now come to Eph. ii. 12 to see what the context demands. The scale is already dipped by the weight of Scripture usage in favour of the translation 'stranger', and there will have to be very strong reason to justify any alteration. The phrase under consideration is in correspondence with another of like import.

"Being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel" (Eph. ii. 12). This alienation finds its dreadful echo in the practical section of the same epistle where we read:

> "That ye henceforth walk not as other Gentiles walk, in the vanity of their mind, having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God" (Eph. iv. 17, 18).

The reader may have seen in his newspaper some sort of 'Quiz' in which general knowledge and intelligence tests are a feature. One such test is that which is known as 'spot the intruder' or some such name, and is generally a collection of words containing one that is outside the category. For example, in such a list of names as Shakespeare, Tennyson, Shelley, Beethoven, Byron and Browning, it is obvious that 'Beethoven' is the intruder, a musician among poets. Eph. ii. 11-13 contains a list of words and it will be seen that 'guest' would be an intruder among such words and phrases as Gentiles in the flesh, uncircumcision, made by hands, without Christ, aliens, guests, no hope, without God in the world, and far off.

Is it conceivable that one who was a 'guest' of the covenant of promise could be at the same time Godless, Christless and hopeless? The church that the Apostle has in mind in Eph. ii. is a new thing, created so by God, for the passage in the fifteenth verse that reads "To make in Himself of the twain" should be translated "To create in Himself of the twain" as the R.V. indicates.

The Church of the Mystery is no mere evolution; it is a new creation, and as with all other 'new creations' of God, 'former things' pass away, and with that passing of 'former things' the dispensational place of the Gentiles, whatever it may have been, is swept aside, the new thing completely taking its place.

We have already placed Rom. ix. 3-5 over against Eph. ii. 11, 12, where the dispensational advantage of an Israelite 'in the flesh' is placed in strong contrast with the dispensational disability of a Gentile 'in the flesh'. Only as he is translated and found 'in the spirit' can Christ profit him or blessing be enjoyed.

We must now devote our attention to the wondrous change that grace has wrought, but this must await another study together.

No.49. The Audience Chamber (ii. 11 - 19-).

The Middle Wall of Partition.

pp. 41 - 47

The far off Gentiles, under the gracious provision of the dispensation of the Mystery are 'made nigh'. To appreciate the nature of the distance that hitherto marked the position of the Gentile, we must pay attention to the explanatory matter that follows in Eph. ii. 14-18.

Before taking up the separate terms 'peace', 'enmity', 'access', etc., it will be profitable to consider what is implied in the figurative use of the 'middle wall of partition'. Josephus, speaking of the temple as it stood in his day, tells us that it consisted of an outer square six hundred feet wide, and a second inner area, which he describes as follows:

> "On advancing to the second temple a stone balustrade was thrown around it four feet and a half high, and withal beautifully wrought, and in it stood pillars at equal distances proclaiming the law of purity, some in Greek and some in Roman letters, that no alien might pass within the sanctuary."
>
> "Such was the first enclosure, and far from it in the middle was the second, ascended by a few steps and encompassed by a stone balustrade for a partition, which prohibited by inscription any alien from entering under penalty of death."

In 1871 one of these inscribed stones was discovered by Mr. Clermont Ganneau built into a wall of the Via Dolorosa at Jerusalem. The original is the possession of the Palestine Exploration Fund and a cast is in the British Museum. The inscription being as follows:

> "No one, being foreigner, may enter into the enclosure around the holy place. Whosoever is apprehended will himself be to blame for his death which will certainly follow."

The word foreigner allogene is a word derived from the same root that gives us 'alien' namely allos. The veil of the temple which was rent in twain from top to bottom indicated that at the death of Christ the way into the holiest of all was opened (Heb. ix. 8; x. 20), and this removed the barrier between the believer and the Lord. Here in Ephesians, the barrier not only kept the Gentile at a distance from the Lord, but it separated the believing Jew from the believing Gentile. During the period covered by the Acts of the Apostles this barrier stood, and the problem to which the differences between Jew and Gentile gave rise caused the calling of the council at Jerusalem, as is recorded in Acts xv.

This chapter has not only suffered at the hand of those who deny the inspiration of the Scriptures, but at the hands of those whose basis is the integrity of Holy Scripture. We will not advertise the publication from which we shall quote, but the reader can be assured that these things have been said by some who profess not only to believe the Word, but to abide by the principle of 'right division'. Acts xv. deals with two related subjects (1) The imposition of circumcision upon the believing Gentile and (2) the problem of the different attitude of Jew and Gentile to such things as 'things strangled' which is solved for the time being by the decrees issued. The seriousness of this point of view will be evident to any who ponder the following 'explanation' given on this passage. With reference to James—who is described as the 'fleshly James'—it is stated that "when he makes his decision, saying, 'Wherefore I decide', he does not consult Peter or the rest of the apostles". The reader will probably realize at once the inaccuracy of this view, for in Acts xv. 22 we read: "It pleased the apostles and elders, with the whole church, to send chosen men of their own company." If this so called interpretation were true what could we make of the express statement: "It seemed good to the Holy Ghost"?

Continuing our quotation from this questionable source, we read:

> "It is to be noted that this epistle claims that this 'burden' was placed upon the nations because 'it seems good to the Holy Ghost and to us'. It would have been more honourable for this flesh-controlled council to assume responsibility for their fleshly decision, instead of trying to place the responsibility upon the Holy Spirit Whom they wholly ignored."

How many other false views of the Acts have been linked up with so-called ‘apostolic mistakes’! Some, with wrong ideas as to the constitution of the Church, teach that the apostles made a mistake in Acts i. 6. Others find apostolic mistakes in the appointment of Matthias, and other passages. And here, in Acts xv., not only are the apostles and elders found guilty, but Barnabas and Paul, Silas and Judas surnamed Barsabas, men who were ‘prophets’ and had hazarded their lives for the Lord, are all accused of moral cowardice and spiritual dishonesty. If these decrees were ‘fleshly’ and not of God, how is it that we read in Acts xvi. 5 “And so were the churches established in the faith, and increased in number daily”? Is this another ‘mistake’?

Upon examination we find that the passage falls into three pairs of corresponding sections as follows:

A | xv. 1, 2. Antioch. The question. Paul, Barnabas, Men of Judæa.
B | 3-5. Phenice, Samaria, Jerusalem. The Pharisees’ demand.
C | 6-12. Apostles and Elders. Peter. Why put a yoke?
C | 13-21. Men and brethren. James. Trouble not the Gentiles
B | 22-29. Antioch, Syria, Cilicia. No such commandment.
A | xv. 30-35. Antioch. The answer. Paul, Barnabas, Judas and Silas.

The complete analysis of this passage would occupy considerably more than a full page of this magazine, and we shall therefore only give the above skeleton outline and then fill in each section as it comes before us. Those who are keen students of the Word will be more than compensated for their pains if they will take the trouble to reproduce the structure as a whole after the details have been set out.

The first member of the structure in this epoch-making fight of faith is comprised in the first two verses:

> “And certain men which came down from Judæa taught the brethren, and said, Except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses, ye cannot be saved. When therefore Paul and Barnabas had no small dissension and disputation with them, they determined that Paul and Barnabas, and certain other of them, should go up to Jerusalem unto the apostles and elders about this question” (Acts xv. 1, 2).

A | xv. 1, 2. Antioch. The question. Paul, Barnabas and the men of Judæa. |
a | Certain men came down from Judæa.
b | Their teaching.
b | The dissension.
a | Paul and Barnabas go up to Jerusalem.

The glorious doctrine of justification by faith, apart from legal works of any kind, had been the central feature of Paul’s gospel on this wonderful journey through the cities of Galatia.

"Be it known unto you therefore, men and brethren, that through this Man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins: and by Him all that believe are JUSTIFIED from all things, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses" (Acts xiii. 38, 39).

After such a gospel had been preached, it was obviously nothing less than diametric opposition for anyone to say: "Except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses, ye cannot be saved." On such an issue compromise was utterly impossible, for essentials were at stake. When it was a matter of conscience with regard to the keeping of certain days, or of eating certain meats, Paul was most willing to meet the troubled believer more than half-way, but to suggest that the glorious doctrine of justification by faith should be dethroned from its place and replaced by a legal ceremonial, was a call to arms that no follower of the Lord could fail to answer without shame.

We must now pass on to the testimony of James, and before examining his words in detail, we give the structure of the passages.

C | xv. 13-21. Men and brethren. JAMES.
My sentence is that we trouble not the Gentiles. |
f | James . . . me.
g | Gentiles visited.
h | The agreement of prophecy.
i | The knowledge of the Lord.
f | James . . . my.
g | Gentiles turn to God.
h | Write that they abstain.
i | Moses is preached.

James takes up the claim made by Peter—calling him by his Hebrew name Simeon—and, directing his argument to those who revered the O.T. writings, draws attention to a passage from one of the prophets:

"As it is written, After this I will return . . . . . and I will build again the ruins thereof, and I will set it up: That the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles, upon whom My name is called, saith the Lord, Who doeth all these things . . . . . which were known from the age" (Acts xv. 15-18).

It should be noted that James does not say 'This fulfils what is written by the prophet'; he simply says "To this agree the words of the prophets". The word translated 'agree' is sumphoneo, which gives us the word 'symphony', and as a noun is translated 'music' in Luke xv. 25.

We could therefore paraphrase James' meaning as follows:

"The inclusion of the Gentile upon the same terms as the Jew is in harmony with such a passage as Amos ix. 11, 12 (which in the Septuagint version reads as above) and it is therefore clear that the spirit in which Peter enjoins us to act now, is that in which the Lord has revealed He will act in future. He has known these things which He has commenced to do since the age, and to object or to impose restrictions, is but to tempt God as our fathers did in the wilderness, with dreadful consequences as we all know."

The fact that James could give such hearty support to the position taken by Paul and subsequently by Peter, was a shattering blow to the Judaizing party in the Jerusalem church. A little man might have been content with this victory and have ignored the susceptibilities of the Jewish believers. Not so, however, the apostle James. He realizes the feelings of shock and abhorrence which would almost inevitably result from the Jewish Christians coming into contact with the revolting customs of the Gentiles, and he therefore gives a double sentence:

(1) With regard to the immediate question, as to whether believing Gentiles must submit to circumcision and the law of Moses before they can be sure of salvation, my answer is "No". 'My sentence is, that we trouble not them which from among the Gentiles are turned to God.'

In the body of the letter sent to the Gentiles it is categorically stated that such teaching was a 'subverting of souls' and that no such commandment had been given by the leaders at Jerusalem (Acts xv. 24).

(2) My sentence is not, however, harsh or mechanical. I am by nature and upbringing a Jew, and I know the horror that seizes the mind at the bare possibility of contact with those who have partaken of meat offered to idols, or with those who have not been particular about the question of blood. While we yield no ground with regard to justification by faith, we must not forget that we are called upon to walk in love, to remember the weaker brethren, and to be willing to yield our rights if need be. My sentence therefore is that we write to the Gentiles that believe "that they abstain from pollutions of idols and from fornication, and from things strangled, and from blood" (Acts xv. 20).

Three of these items we can readily understand as being offensive to a Jewish believer, though inoffensive to a Gentile. One, however, is a grossly immoral act and cannot be classed as in the same category. The reason for its inclusion here is not that James meant for a moment to suggest that sexual immorality was a matter of indifference, but rather that, knowing how the Gentile throughout his unregenerate days looked upon this sin as of no consequence, James realized that he was likely even after conversion to offend by taking too lenient a view. This is brought out most vividly in I Corinthians, an epistle that deals with the application of the decrees sent from Jerusalem, and which we must examine before this study is complete.

James follows his counsel of abstinence by a reference to Moses:

> "For Moses of old time hath in every city them that preach him, being read in the synagogues every sabbath day" (Acts xv. 21).

This meaning appears to be that there was no need to fear that, by reducing the appeal to only four points, the scruples of the more rigid Jewish believer would be invaded. Moses was preached every sabbath day in the synagogue, and the synagogue was the nursery of the Church. If we will but put ourselves in the position of the early Church we shall see the wisdom of this decision. The coming into the synagogue of the men whose practices filled the body of the people with horror, would be a serious hindrance to the advance of the gospel. It might even mean the destroying, for the sake of 'meat', of one for whom Christ died. We shall see presently that Paul's spiritual application of the decrees of Jerusalem went much further than James' four items. He would not eat meat, or drink wine, or do anything that would cause his brother to stumble.

Such then, was the two-fold decision of the Church at Jerusalem, a decision which, taking the state of affairs at that time into account, must commend itself to all who have any sympathy with the teaching of the Apostle Paul. Such a state of affairs was not ideal and could not last. It was, as the decrees put it, a question of imposing 'no greater burden than these necessary things'—much in the same way as the Apostle Paul in I Cor. vii. enjoined abstinence 'because of the present distress' (I Cor. vii. 26).

The assembled church, together with the apostles and elders, agree with one accord to the appeals of Peter and James, and their decision is recorded in a letter sent by the hands of Barnabas, Paul, Silas and Judas. This letter is of intense interest, not only on account of its teaching, but also because it is the earliest church letter in existence. Let us take it out of its setting for the moment and look at it as a letter, complete in itself.

> "The apostles and the elders and the brethren, to the brethren which are of the Gentiles in Antioch and Syria and Cilicia, Greeting.
>
> Forasmuch as we have heard, that certain which went out from us have troubled you with words, subverting your souls, saying, Ye must be circumcised, and keep the law: to whom we gave no such commandment:
>
> It seemed good unto us, being assembled with one accord, to send chosen men unto you with our beloved Barnabas and Paul, men that have hazarded their lives for the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. We have sent therefore Judas and Silas, who shall also tell you the same things by mouth.
>
> For it seemed good to the Holy Spirit, and to us, to lay upon you no greater burden than these necessary things; That ye abstain from meats offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication: from which if ye keep yourselves, ye shall do well. Fare ye well" (Acts xv. 23-29).

Such is the letter itself. Its inter-relation with the context is best seen by expanding the structure of this section as follows:

Acts xv. 22 - 29

B | xv. 22-29. Antioch, Syria and Cilicia.
"We gave no such commandment." |
n1 | IT SEEMED GOOD.
o1 | To apostles, elders and whole church.
p1 | Send chosen men.
q1 | Chief men among the brethren.
r1 | Greeting. No such commandment.
n2 | IT SEEMED GOOD.
o2 | Assembled with one accord.
p2 | Send chosen men.
q2 | Men who hazarded their lives.
r2 | Tell you the same things.
n3 | IT SEEMED GOOD.
o3 | To the Holy Spirit and to us.
p3 | Lay no other burden.
q3 | That ye abstain.
r3 | Fare ye well.

Three times the word "It seemed good" occur. First, 'it seemed good to the apostles and elders and the whole church'. Secondly, 'it seem good unto us, being assembled with one accord'. And thirdly, 'it seemed good to the Holy Spirit, and to us'. To break this threefold cord, the whole church, with the apostles and elders, together with Barnabas and Paul, and Silas and Judas, as well as the Holy Spirit Himself, would have to be regarded as in the wrong. Any system of interpretation necessitating such an assumption is self-condemned.

If man failed under the law of Sinai, it is not surprising to find that he fails some times under grace. The moderate request that the Gentiles should abstain from the 'four necessary things', while the Jewish believers had 'Moses preached in the synagogue every Sabbath day' would lead, in time, wherever the flesh became prominent, to a line of demarcation between the churches of Judaea and those of the Gentiles that had not been the intention of those who drew up these decrees. This gradually grew to become 'a middle wall of partition', a division that could not be permitted in the Church of the One Body. The One Body however was not in view in Acts xv. Only those things known of the Lord 'since the age', only those things that harmonized with the O.T. prophecies were in operation in Acts xv., and nowhere throughout the Acts is there a hint that a Jew ceased from being a Jew when he became a Christian. On the contrary, he became the better Jew, for he was believing the testimony of the law and the prophets. Even justification by faith, as preached by Paul, was to be found in the law and the prophets and was, therefore, not a part of a mystery or secret purpose.

We have, therefore, in Acts xv. two vastly different themes. One is eternally true, and independent of dispensational changes. The other is relatively true, but to be set aside when that which is perfect has come. The former is doctrinal truth, the latter the practical manifestation of graciousness and forbearance.

Returning to Acts xv. we come to the conclusion of the matter.

Acts xv. 30 - 35

A | xv. 30-35. ANTIOCH. The answer.
Paul and Barnabas, Judas and Silas. |
a | Apoluo dismissed.
b | The epistle delivered.
c | Paraklesis consolation.
c | Parakaleo exhorted.
a | Apoluo dismissed.
b | Teaching and preaching.

We learn from these verses that, upon reading the letter from Jerusalem, the Gentiles "rejoiced for the consolation". The word here not only means 'consolation' but also 'exhortation', as can be seen in the next verse. We read further that Judas and Silas, 'being prophets also themselves, exhorted the brethren . . . . . and confirmed them'. Verse thirty-four is probably an interpolation (see Revised Text), being evidently added by some scribe because of the presence of Silas At Antioch in verse forty.

Such is the middle wall of partition; such were the 'ordinances'; such was the 'enmity' of Eph. ii. 14-19.

No.50. The Audience Chamber (ii. 11 - 19-).

The Creation of the New Man.

pp. 61 - 64

We have seen that, during the Acts, a veritable 'middle wall' divided the Jewish believer from the Gentile believer, and while the Jewish believer stood to the Gentile believer as the true olive tree is to the wild olive graft contrary to nature, the blessed condition of perfect equality that characterizes the church of the ONE BODY was impossible of fulfillment, and was not the subject of revelation. Only with the setting aside of Israel at Acts xxviii., and the revelation of the new dispensation of the Mystery, could such a condition obtain.

We must now consider the way in which this reference to the middle wall is approached. "For He is our peace." 'He' autos gathers up the references to 'Christ' and 'Christ Jesus' that have gone before, making the meaning 'He and no other' a true rendering of the Apostle's meaning. It does not say He made peace here, that follows at the end of verse fifteen, but He IS our peace and MADE both one. He Himself is our peace; we are still dealing with the Kinsman-Redeemer. The Jewish believer who becomes a member of this newly called church, becomes at the same time a member of the body of Christ; the Gentile believer who becomes a member of this newly called church, he too becomes at the same time a member of the Body of Christ, and in that new unity Christ Himself is the bond of peace.

"Both one." Who are the 'both'? A superficial reading of this passage sees no more in it than another presentation of the glorious truth of the believer's acceptance with God, but the middle wall of partition separated one believer from another, and the words 'both' and 'twain' here are preceded by the article 'the'. "The both" are made one; "the twain" are created one new man; "the both" are reconciled in one body, and "the both" have access in one Spirit. We might have thought that the Apostle should have used the words "the both" four times, thus:

> "The both" made one. The middle wall gone.
> "The both" made one new man, so making peace.
> "The both" reconciled in one Body by the cross.
> "The both" have access in one Spirit.

But this is not so. "The both" are made one, are reconciled and have access, but "the twain" are created in Himself into one new man. We shall discover there is a reason for this that is of dispensational importance. The middle wall is said to have been 'broken down'; the enmity which this middle wall symbolized is said to have been abolished. The word translated 'broken down' is the Greek luo 'to loose'. When used of a temple it is translated 'destroy' (John ii. 19). When used of a congregation it is translated 'to be broken up' (Acts xiii. 43), where the context emphasizes the difference that existed between the Jewish and the Gentile hearers of the Apostle (Acts xiii. 42-48). While the idea of 'breaking down' a wall or a building is a common one in the O.T., there does not seem to be a passage where the LXX have adopted this particular word luo to translate the Hebrew terms used.

Apart from John ii. 19, there does not appear to be any other instance in the Scriptures where luo is so translated. This being the case, some reason must have prompted the choice of this word. Luo is the root from which such terms as lutroo 'redeem', lutron 'ransom', lutrosis and apolutrosis 'redemption' are derived, and the Apostle seems to have blended the physical idea of the breaking down of a wall with the liberation that followed the setting aside of the condition that this middle wall typified. The 'chain' of Eph. vi. 20 is halusis, and it is not beyond possibility that the Apostle already envisaged the 'bond' of peace, a most blessed exchange for the fetters which were dissolved with the breaking down of the middle wall. The parallel expression is the word 'abolished' of ii. 15, a rendering of the Greek katargeo. This word is used of making anything 'void' or of 'none effect' (Rom. iii. 3, 31) and is used of the veil in II Cor. iii. 14. The word katargeo is a compound of kata 'down' and erg 'work', and literally means to put anything out of working order, to render inoperative, to abrogate. What was abrogated or rendered powerless, was 'the enmity which was contained in ordinances'. These ordinances, we have already seen, were the decrees issued by the council of Jerusalem as recorded in Acts xv. which, while solving an immediate problem, only intensified another. This, together with the whole system of ceremonials

'meat, drink, holy day, new moon or sabbath day' were after all but shadows of things to come and have been nailed to the cross (Col. ii. 14-17), or as Eph. ii. 15 put its:

> "Having abolished in His flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments contained in ordinances."

While we read of the veil 'that is to say His flesh' which was rent, so making a way into the presence of God, we must set aside the suggestion that the enmity was 'in His flesh' in Eph. ii. 15. The order of the words ten exthran en te sarki autou 'The enmity in His flesh' if lifted out of the passage, might lead to such a translation, although, as Alford and others point out, it would certainly require the specifying article ten to be repeated. Just as 'in Himself' is preceded and linked with the verb ktizo 'to create in Himself' so in the same verse the words 'in His flesh' are preceded and linked with the verb lusas 'Having abolished in His flesh' and that flesh is but a prelude to the fuller statement 'by the cross' of verse sixteen where this enmity was slain.

Peace and reconciliation are placed over against enmity and explain its nature. It was not the enmity of the unregenerate heart; it was rather the incipient enmity contained in the separating decrees, decrees which made 'fish of one and fowl of the other' as the proverb has it, in entire opposition to the extraordinary equality of the members of the One Body presently to be explained (Eph. iii. 6). The goal before this wondrous creation was peace. We have already indicated that the R.V. is to be followed here. Ktizo means to create, as distinct from making, moulding or fashioning. It nearly always carries with it the idea of something new. In one passage creation is ascribed to man, namely in I Pet. ii. 13 where the A.V. reads 'submit yourselves to every ordinance (ktisis) of man', and then goes on to speak of kings and governors and magistrates. So, in Eph. ii. 15, we have created of the twain 'one new man' even as the Romans said creare consulum 'to create a consul', the material man remaining the same, but the new office being created. The four occurrences of ktizo in Ephesians are as follows:

A	|	Eph. ii. 10. Created in Christ Jesus unto good works.
B	|	ii. 15. To create in Himself of the twain one new man.
A	|	iii. 9. The mystery . . . hid in God Who created all things.
B	|	iv. 24. The new man . . . created in righteousness.

Where the 'new man' of the doctrinal position is echoed by the new man of the practical. The former is created, the latter is put on.

We must now turn our attention to the words 'the twain' and ask the question, why did the Apostle not use the word 'the both' as in the three other instances? The both were made one, the both were reconciled, the both have access. These three statements give the positive position of this new company. The change over to the 'twain' was in preparation for the references to Gen. ii. 24 which is quoted in Eph. v. 31 "They two (duo) shall be one flesh". The 'new man' is the goal towards which the purpose of the ages moves. It is in process now, as may be seen from Eph. iv. 24. The immediate concern of the dispensation of the Mystery is the production of the 'perfect man'

(Eph. iv. 13) where the word translated ‘man’ is not anthropos as in the passages already examined but aner ‘an adult male’, ‘a man not a woman’, ‘a husband’.

The word occurs two hundred and thirteen times in the N.T., fifty of which occurrences are translated ‘husband’, and of these seven are found in Ephesians and Colossians. The perfect man is the ‘husband’ seen alone and to the exclusion of the wife. A husband however is a contradiction in terms if there be not also either in fact or in prospect a wife. Gen. ii. 24 foreshadows the state of affairs when paradise is restored; there will then be two redeemed companies, not one. The church of the One Body then complete will be the perfect husband; the Bride of the Lamb will be the perfect wife, and Christ will be the Head of both. There was a period in Adam’s experience when he was alone. We are living in a period during which there is no ‘Bride’—the advent and presentation of the Bride is future. Some have objected to the idea that the husband, i.e. the church of the Mystery, should be blessed in one sphere, while the wife, i.e. the bride of Rev. xix. should be blessed in another. Yet with all their protestations, the most loving and loyal of husbands necessarily have some spheres of activity into which their wives do not and should not enter. Husbands may be ministers of State, they may be financiers, merchants, scientists or soldiers; they may be the many who earn their bread by manual labour, but there has never been an outcry of disloyalty or lack of affection because a minister of State does not insist that his wife be co-elected with him to Parliament, or that a miner is disloyal and without natural affection because he does not insist that his wife shall work with him at the coal face! These objections confuse distinctive calling with basic salvation and are valueless, and those who make them do not attempt to put their objections into operation so far as they themselves and their own domestic economy are concerned. Gen. ii. 24 is to be attained, but it is not in operation yet; the new man created of the twain is the husband, the formation of the bride awaits the Day of the Lord.

In Volume XXIX we opened our pages to a contributor who taught that the creation of the new man ‘refers to a future creation, when two bodies or assemblies, one mainly Jewish and the other mainly Gentile, are made one in Christ’. In Volume XXX we wrote:

> “The statements we have quoted from Genesis are all associated with Paradise, before the entry of the Serpent and before the Fall.”
> “The perfect man (or husband) and the perfect bride will, while retaining the distinctive peculiarities of their respective callings, become in the future ‘one new man’ even as Adam was in the beginning the covering name of both male and female.”

There is no need to obtrude into the constitution of the Mystery now, that which is only to be realized in the future; but it illuminates many features of the present dispensation when we not only recognize that they are peculiar and distinct, but that they are destined to fall into their respective place when the goal of the ages is attained. The church which is the Body of Christ is now being fashioned into the perfect ‘husband’ and when the dispensation of the Mystery ends, the dispensation which follows will complete another company who will constitute ‘The bride’, the union of which will form an integral part of that blessed purpose when God shall be all in all.

A very pertinent remark made by a reader is worth recording. It was to this effect. "How can the making of twain one new man, refer to marriage, when the revealed object of this union was to make 'peace'? Whoever heard of an engaged couple being at such 'enmity' that it had to be 'slain', whose marriage ended in 'peace'? To obtrude the idea of marriage into this passage with its middle wall separating 'the both' with its enmity contained in 'ordinances', seems too ridiculous for serious attention", yet as some believers have nevertheless entertained the idea, duty and love of truth demanded that pertinent remark should be recorded.

No.51. The Audience Chamber (ii. 11 - 19-).

Reconciliation, or Alienation reversed.

pp. 81 - 84

The two companies represented by 'the both' have been reconciled, the reconciliation being expressed 'in one Body'. This passage finds its correspondence in verse 18 thus:

A | Eph. ii. 16. The both reconciled to God in one Body.
A | Eph. ii. 18. The both access to the Father in one Spirit.

The two come together in Eph. iv. 4 "There is one Body, and one Spirit". The only time when the actual physical body of the Saviour is mentioned in the Prison Epistles is in Col. i. 22 "in the body of His flesh through death"; all other references speak either of 'Church which is His Body' or the actual bodies of the believer. The fact that 'the one Body' in Eph. ii. 16 is linked with 'the cross' has made some lean to the idea that here, in this passage, the actual body of the Saviour is intended. But there is no point in referring to the physical body of Christ as 'one body' whereas, the 'one Body' is a very true title of the church of this dispensation.

The both were made 'one', the outcome 'one' new man; the reconciliation was expressed by 'one' Body, and experienced in 'one' Spirit. It is 'the both' who were reconciled to God in this one Body; there, as the apostle triumphantly affirms, "there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free: but Christ is all and in all" (Col. iii. 11). The doctrine of reconciliation does not appear in the O.T. The LXX uses katallage once, namely in Isa. ix. 5, and katallasso once namely in Jer. xxxi. 39 (xlviii. 39 in the A.V.), but neither of these passages has anything to do with reconciliation as it is found in the N.T. Katallasso occurs in Rom. v. 10; I Cor. vii. 11 and II Cor. v. 18, 19, 20; katallage occurs in Rom. v. 11; xi. 15 and II Cor. v. 18, 19. These two forms of the word do not occur in the Prison Epistles. Instead the fuller form apokatallasso takes its place, occurring in Eph. ii. 16 and Col. i. 20, 21.

First we must acquaint ourselves with the root meaning of the term, then with the import of the added prefix apo. Katallasso, is one of the many words derived from allos which has already come before us in the word apallotrioo 'to be alienated' (Eph. ii. 12; iv. 18 and Col. i. 21). Alienation is the state which is exchanged for reconciliation, the change being the removal of the enmity that existed. If, therefore, we can discover the nature of the enmity in any particular case, we shall at the same time discover the nature both of the alienation and the subsequent reconciliation. We shall be prevented from starting with a moral alienation and ending with a dispensational reconciliation, we shall also be prevented from starting with a dispensational alienation and ending with a moral reconciliation. The enmity echthra which caused the alienation of Eph. ii. 12 was, as we have seen, not the enmity of sin as such, but the enmity arising out of the different dispensational positions occupied by Jewish and Gentile believer. The enmity echthra which caused the alienation of Rom. viii. 7 was the nature of the carnal mind and this was rectified by the reconciliation already noted in Romans and I & II Corinthians.

Alienation in the prison epistles arises either out of the dispensational disability of being born a Gentile, without specific reference to sin, to the alienation that arises out of a darkened understanding (Eph. iv. 18), or through the enmity consequent upon wicked works (Col. i. 21). In the latter case, the reconciliation effected presents such alienated ones 'holy and unblameable and unreproveable in His sight' (Col. i. 22); in the former case the reconciliation cancels the original alienation that belonged to the Gentile, and reconciles the two conflicting parties in one Body to God by the cross. The reconciliation of Eph. ii. therefore is dispensational in character.

We next inquire what is the import of the added prefix apo in the word 'reconcile' found in Ephesians and Colossians. One attempt suggests that the lesser word used in Romans and Corinthians should be rendered 'conciliation' leaving the fuller word for 'reconciliation'. Unfortunately this creates a bias in the mind, for accepting this, we naturally assume that the further reconciliation of the later epistles is but the perfecting of the lesser reconciliation of the earlier ones. Strictly speaking there is not this difference in the two English words that their adoption as above indicated would justify. Conciliation is the term generally used of men in public stations of live, while reconciliation is indifferently employed for those in public or private.

Apo means away from, and the condition from which the Gentile is brought in Eph. ii. is from the alienation of being a Gentile to the reconciled position of being a fellow member, on equal terms with every other fellow member of a newly created New Man, or of a newly formed 'one Body'. The prefix apo belongs to both words, as can be seen: APallotrioo aliens, APOkatallasso reconciled; the alienation was 'from' the commonwealth of Israel, the reconciliation was 'from' the state of enmity thus induced. Here in the church of the One Body we have no mere evolution from an existing but lower order; rather we have an entirely newly created thing. When God says that there is a 'new creation', old things pass away, new things come into being, and it is a disaster for any one to attempt to bring over the hope, the promises, the constitution, the gifts and the ordinances of the earlier calling which were all related to a specific covenant and people, into this new creation where there are no promises that were made to the Fathers, no covenants, no supernatural and miraculous gifts, and a hope that is lifted from that of I Thess. iv. to the manifestation of Col. iii.

One of the evidences of difference that we find in the period of the Acts is that of 'access'. Peter and Cornelius may be saved by the same Saviour, redeemed by the same precious blood, and look up to God as the same Father in Christ; nevertheless Peter can pass the middle wall of partition, but if Cornelius attempted to do so he would imperil his life. Peter and Cornelius may be saved by the same grace, may believe with the same faith, yet Peter will withdraw himself from the table of the Gentile, Peter will even say 'not so Lord' to the vision of Acts x.; he will even tell Cornelius to his face that he would not have hesitated to class him with the 'common and unclean'! The church at Jerusalem was so surprised to hear that a Gentile had been saved, that they actually called the Apostle to account saying in shocked tones:

> "Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised, and didst eat with them" (Acts xi. 3), and while the door at length swings open to the Gentile (Acts xiv. 27), the epistle to the Romans makes it clear in the eleventh chapter that dispensationally the Gentile believer was a wild olive grafted contrary to nature into the true olive tree. Such conditions, though palliated by the decrees of Acts xv., are inimical to true unity, and they were 'abolished' at the introduction of the Mystery. Those who were reconciled in one Body to God, have access in one Spirit to the Father; the former position 'to God' being that of the church of the one Body, the latter 'to the Father' that of the family (Eph. iii. 15). Chapter ii. 18 commenced with the particle hoti "seeing that through Him, etc." as though the experimental fact that could not be denied, proved the dispensational fact that was being explained. What they had was 'access' ten prosagogen. This word in the LXX answers in the majority of cases to the Hebrew corban, a word we have already considered when dealing with salvation as 'the gift' of God. There, in Eph. ii. 8, it is God Who in infinite grace comes forward and brings His unspeakable gift to us; here, in virtue of that gift, we are entitled to draw near to Him. There are thirty-six occurrences of prosagoge in the LXX of Leviticus, of which the following are examples:

> "And Moses brought Aaron and his sons, and washed them with water."
> "And Moses brought Aaron's sons, and put coats on them."
> "And he brought Aaron's sons, and Moses put of the blood upon the tip of their right ear" (Lev. viii. 6, 13, 24).

We learn from Eph. i. 4 that this church of the one Body was chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world that it should be 'holy and without blame before him'. We find in Eph. v. 25-27 that Christ loved the church and gave Himself for it; that He washes it by the water of the word that it may be presented 'holy and without blemish', and here in Eph. ii. 16-18 we see the work in process. What this church was in electing choice 'holy and without blemish', so will they be when presented at the last, and in the reconciliation with its accompanying 'access' we see that they are in Christ what Aaron and his sons were only in type. Aaron had access but once a year into the holiest of all, of a tabernacle made with hands. We have access at all times into the holiest of all (see the meaning of the word 'saints' in article No.34) of the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched and not man, namely into heaven itself. Aaron never 'sat down' as a priest, for his work was never completed. Christ, after He had offered one Sacrifice for sins for ever, 'sat down', His work done. No one of Israel would have entertained the thought that anyone of that favoured race, however holy, could ever 'sit down' in that august Presence, yet we have already read the overwhelming statement of Eph. ii. 6 that we, who once were aliens and strangers, have been raised up together with Christ and 'seated together in heavenly places'. This is reconciliation indeed.

What God planned before the world was overthrown He has in His own good time effected through the cross and the shed blood of His Beloved, and now those who were once 'far off' are indeed 'made nigh' and have access, yea access with boldness and confidence by the faith of Him (Eph. iii. 12). To other callings may be appended the titles 'A Kingdom of Priests' and 'The Bride of the Lamb', but none can be so near as those who are the very members of His Body. Such is the high calling of the dispensation of the Mystery.

'Once' or 'in time past' children of wrath.
But God. The intervention of love.
'Once' or 'in time past'. Aliens and strangers.
But now. The intervention of peace.
'No more', 'no longer'. Strangers and foreigners.
The Middle Wall broken down. The enmity abolished.
One new man created, so making peace.

No.52. The Living Room (ii. -19 - 22).

Tabernacle, Temple, Dwelling Place.

pp. 101 - 104

The figure that is now before us is a holy temple, and at first sight the denomination 'The Living Room' may savour of irreverence-but the title has been chosen with care.

What is our conception of a temple? The English word is derived from the Greek temno 'to cut', meaning a part cut off or separated for religious purposes. Associated with a temple, are priests, altars, sacrifices, veils, incense and elaborate ritual, yet these are 'accidental', being rendered necessary because of the unclean and sinful nature of man. The 'essential' purpose of a temple is to provide a 'dwelling-place' for the Most High among men, and only the necessity to preserve the holiness of the Divine Occupier called for all the elaborate ritual associated with the place. First of all let us remember that both Stephen and Paul declare 'The Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands'. Stephen, in Acts vii. 48, 49 quoting from the O.T. because he was speaking to Jews, and Paul in Acts xvii. 24 appealing not to O.T. Scriptures but to common sense:

> "God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that He is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands", because he was speaking to Gentiles. This is an example of method and approach that should not be lightly set aside. The fact that these words are a deduction drawn from the confession of Solomon as recorded in II Chron. ii. 6, shows how great an impression the witness of Stephen had upon that young man whose name was Saul (Acts vii. 58). The language of Stephen and Paul, if isolated from the rest of Scripture, could be used to flatly deny that God ever did or ever will 'dwell' in any temple made with hands, but this is not according to truth. The words of Stephen are based upon the prayer of Solomon, which he goes on to quote. In II Chron. vi. 18 Solomon says:

> "But will God in very deed dwell with men on earth? behold, heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain Thee; how much less this house which I have built!"

The argument that would make it impossible for God to dwell in a temple on earth, because it could not 'contain' God, would also make it impossible for God to dwell in the highest heaven, for they too cannot contain God. In both cases He must condescend, and if He can do so in the one, He may do so in the other. Let us hear therefore the language of the Most High.

> "For thus saith the HIGH and LOFTY ONE that inhabiteth eternity, Whose name is HOLY; I dwell in the HIGH and HOLY PLACE", and we might be pardoned if stopping here, we drew the conclusion that 'God can never dwell with man' but this is reckoning without grace, the Prophet continues:

> "with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit" (Isa. lvii. 15).

So God will dwell with men.

Upon arriving at Mount Sinai, Moses was instructed to build a tabernacle, and several chapters are devoted to a description of this wonderful structure. Its purpose however was simple:

> "Let them make Me a sanctuary, that I may dwell among them" (Exod. xxv. 8), and we are told that Moses was given a pattern, and according to that pattern the Tabernacle was made. This insistence upon a 'pattern' is repeated when Solomon was commissioned to build the temple (I Chron. xxviii. 11, 12). If this were all that had been said, we might infer from the emphasis upon the 'pattern' that both Moses and Solomon were not left to their own devices, but the N.T. use of this emphasis upon 'pattern' reveals something fuller and deeper. Summing up what he had already said, the Apostle in Heb. viii. 1, 2 concentrates the whole teaching in 'A seated Priest in a heavenly sanctuary'. Now the priests he says serve unto the example or shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God, when he was about to make the tabernacle for,

> "See, saith He, that thou make all things according to the pattern shewed thee in the mount" (Heb. viii. 5).

These 'patterns' are set over against 'the heavenly things themselves' in Heb. ix. 23, the holy places 'made with hands' being 'figures of the true'. These heavenly things were purified with the better sacrifices of the New Covenant, even as the typical things of the Tabernacle were purified by the blood of bulls and goats. It appears therefore that whether in the heavens, or in the earth, the dwelling of God, either among angels or men, must be looked upon as 'a condescension great'. The house of the Lord was not only a dwelling place for God among His people, it was looked upon as a dwelling place for the believer also 'And I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever' is the closing note of the Shepherd Psalm. The aspiration of David is further expressed when he said:

> "One thing have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after; that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to enquire in His temple. For in the time of trouble He shall hide me in His pavilion: in the secret of His tabernacle shall He hide me" (Psa. xxvii. 4, 5).

The sons of Korah did not hesitate to liken the humble nesting place of the sparrow and the swallow, with dwelling in the house of the Lord (Psa. lxxxiv. 3, 4). So, even though the section before us is mainly that of a holy temple, it ends with the words 'for an habitation of God through the Spirit' (Eph. ii. 22). These words will need some revision, but before we deal with any particular word or phrase, let us see the structure of this new section:

A | a | 19. Fellow-citizens (sun).
b | 19. Of the saints (hagios).
a | 19. Household (oikeios).
b | 19. Of God.
B | c | 20. Built On (epi).
d | 20. The Foundation.
e | 20. Apostles and Prophets.
e | 20. Christ Jesus Himself.
d | 20. Chief Corner-stone.
c | 21. The Building In (en).
A | a | 21. Fitly framed together (sun).
b | 21. Holy Temple in the Lord (hagios).
a | 22. Builded together (oikodomeo, sun).
b | 22. Habitation of God in Spirit.

The sequence of events in Gen. i. and ii. is creation . . . . . man . . . . . paradise where, at the close of Gen. iii. the word 'placed' being in the Hebrew shaken 'to dwell as in a tabernacle', leads Rotherham to put a footnote: "Probably as a habitation for himself; I Sam. iv. 4; Psa. lxxx. 1; xcix. 1, esp. chap. iv. 14." No intelligible meaning can be attached to the note 'esp. chap. iv. 14', we believe it to be a misprint, and should read iv. 4 referring to the reference already given I Sam. iv. 4. From the garden of Eden onward God is said to have dwelt 'between the cherubim' and both Tabernacle and Temple are built to enshrine the holiest of all where the cherubim rest on the mercy seat. This first reference to 'dwelling as a tabernacle', finds its corresponding fulfillment after the conflict of the ages has passed, in the closing reference to the Tabernacle in the Scriptures, namely in Rev. xxi. 3, 4:

> "And I heard a great voice out of heaven saying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them . . . . . and God shall wipe away all tears . . . . . no more death . . . . . sorrow, nor crying."

It is evident, however great the wonder of it, that God has sought a home, a dwelling place among His people, since the creation of man, and though the calling of Ephesians is entirely distinct from that of any other revealed in the Scriptures, this insistence upon a dwelling place is there, as much as anywhere else. The following words, all compounds or derivatives from the root oik, which gives us the word oikos 'house' and 'dwelling' katoiketerion, are all found in the section before us.

FOREIGNER (ii. 19),	paroikos—Alongside the house.
HOUSEHOLD (ii. 19),	oikeios—The family side of the house.
BUILT (ii. 20),	epoikodomeo—To build upon as on a foundation.
BUILDING (ii. 21),	oikodome—To build as a house.
BUILT TOGETHER (ii. 22),	sunoikodomeomai—To build together as a house.
HABITATION (ii. 21),	katoiketerion—A certain or durable dwelling.

As we have before observed, the sequence of events in Gen. i. & ii. is creation . . . . . man . . . . . paradise, with God finding a dwelling mid the cherubim. The sequence in Eph. ii. is creation . . . . . new man . . . . . habitation, and this habitation, a Temple. This can be seen more clearly if set out thus:

A	Once.—Strangers and aliens	\
B	Now.—Made nigh.	\	BODY.
C	Unity.—The two made one.	/
D	Access.—In one Spirit.	/
A	No longer.—Strangers and aliens	\
B	But.—Fellow citizens.	\	TEMPLE.
C	Unity.—Fitly framed together.	/
D	Habitation.—In Spirit.	/

A number of terms used in this short section demand attention. They cannot be dealt with adequately at the close of an article, but require as full a space as can be allotted. We therefore reserve their consideration for a future study.

No.53. The Living Room (ii. -19 - 22).

The Living Room (ii. 21).

pp. 121 - 125

Our last article was devoted largely to the concept that a tabernacle or a temple, in spite of the ritual associated with them, were 'dwelling places' of the Most High among men. We must now turn our attention to Eph. ii. 19-22 where both 'temple' and 'dwelling place' are the theme. We have already set out the six compounds of oikos 'house' that are found in these four verses, and must now consider the section in further detail.

The first thing that demands attention is the obvious correspondence of this section with Eph. iv. 7-19, for the word translated 'fitly framed together' of Eph. ii. 21, "all the building fitly framed together groweth", is repeated in chapter iv.:

> "From whom the whole body fitly joined together . . . . . maketh increase" (Eph. iv. 16).

It is no new doctrine that 'the Body' is 'a Temple', this truth being enunciated by the Lord concerning Himself (John ii. 21), and of the believer of I Cor. vi. 19, but the references in Ephesians speak not only of the individual believer, but of the complete church of the Mystery. There are three Greek words translated 'temple' in the N.T. that need to be discriminated, the one oikos 'house' is found once, namely in Luke xi. 51 'between the altar and the temple'.

Hieron. This word indicates the temple as a whole, the sacred precincts, the courts and colonnade, but naos, the other word used, denotes the innermost shrine, the Holy of Holies. Hieron is used in Matt. iv. 5 'a pinnacle of the temple', and it was in the sacred precincts, not in the Holy of Holies that the money changers sat (Matt. xxi. 12). Naos is used in Matt. xxiii. 16, and in verse 35, where in Luke xi. 51 the Evangelist uses house oikos, Matthew uses 'temple' naos of the same event, namely the shedding of the blood of Zacharias in the temple. It is the naos that is referred to in Matt. xxvii. 51 'The veil of the temple (the innermost shrine) was rent in twain'. While John ii. 14, 15 speaks of the hieron, John ii. 19 uses the word naos. It was here that the ark was placed, and seen when the temple of God naos was opened in heaven (Rev. xi. 19).

The Church, which is the Body of Christ, is not looked upon as the whole temple, with its courts and colonnades, but as the innermost sanctuary, the Holy of Holies. We have, in No.33 of this series, shown that the word translated 'saint' is not necessarily restricted to a believer; it is used of a holy place as well as of a holy person. The inheritance of the saints (Eph. i. 18) is the inheritance of the 'heavenly holiest of all' where Christ sits at the right hand of God or in other words 'in heavenly places'. So here in Eph. ii. 19 we read of 'fellow citizens with the saints', and as the A.V. stands, no difficulty is presented. When, however, we are made aware that the literal rendering of this passage is 'fellow citizens OF the saints' we are conscious of a difficulty. How can one saint inherit another? How can one member of the Body inherit another member? The difficulty is created by the conception we have already formed, that 'saints' must mean 'people'. Ton hagion, the plural genitive, can be masculine, feminine or neuter as the case may be. The epistle to the Hebrews speaks much of the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched and not man, 'heaven itself', and uses the word hagion in:

Heb.	viii. 2	A minister of the sanctuary. 'ton hagion.'
	ix. 3	Which is called the Holiest of all. 'hagia hagion.'
	ix. 8	The way into the Holiest of all. 'ton hagion.'
	x. 19	To enter into the holiest by the blood. 'ton hagion.'

It is there that Christ entered, there he sat down at the right hand of God. The epistle to the Ephesians introduces a new and stupendous teaching. Where Hebrews represents the Lord ALONE in Heaven's holiest of all, Ephesians reveals that the member of the One Body is potentially seated together THERE, that he has an inheritance THERE, that he is a fellow citizen THERE. This constitutes the believer a part of the 'household of God', for as we have already seen, the temple is designed to be a dwelling place. All this, of course, in direct contrast to the earlier condition of strangers, foreigners and aliens. The next problem awaiting solution is double foundation that is spoken of here:

> "And are built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets; Jesus Christ Himself being the chief corner stone" (Eph. ii. 20).

The fact that Apostles come before Prophets, is proof that N.T. Prophets are envisaged. Perhaps if this passage stood alone we could not be so definite in our assertion. If I Cor. xii. 28, 29 and II Pet. iii. 2 and especially Eph. iii. 5 and iv. 11 be consulted, the fact will be sufficiently established for us to proceed. What does the passage mean when it speaks of 'the foundation OF the Apostles and Prophets'? The most serious objection to the idea that these Apostles and Prophets were themselves a 'foundation' is taken from I Cor. iii. 11 where Paul declares 'Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ'. But in that passage Paul is speaking not of those who are built into a building, but of those who are builders.

In I Cor. iii., Paul does not look upon himself as a 'living stone' in the building under review, but as 'a wise master-builder' and those to whom he speaks are looked upon as builders also who can use either gold, silver and precious stones, or wood, hay and stubble. In this context Christ alone can be the foundation. However, in Eph. ii. the metaphor is applied differently. Let us turn to Eph. iv. 11-13. Here we have a ministry given by the ascended Christ which has in view both 'the perfecting (or re-adjusting) of the saints' and 'the edifying (building up) of the Body of Christ'. Now the first pair of gifts "Apostles and Prophets" were a 'foundation' ministry and were not continuous. The second pair, Evangelist, Pastor and Teacher, were continuous. In II Timothy when the initial foundation had already been laid, and the gift of Apostles and Prophets was not repeated, we find the Evangelist (II Tim. iv. 5) and the Teacher (II Tim. ii. 2). The Apostles and Prophets were a foundation ministry, but they in turn rested squarely and completely upon the Chief Corner Stone, Christ. Now Christ as "Chief Corner Stone" does not belong exclusively to the Mystery, for Peter also speaks of Christ with the same title (I Pet. ii. 6, 7).

As we have already observed, the temple covered a greater area than did the Holiest of all, consequently, while the innermost shrine, the naos, that which belongs exclusively in this figure to the Mystery, was built upon that portion of the one foundation which was overlaid with the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Peter also could build other portions of the holy structure according to the plan of the ages, without confusing their separate positions and character.

> "In Whom all the building fitly framed together groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord" (Eph. ii. 21).

The words translated "all the building" are the Greek pasa oikodome and so should be translated strictly "every building". Tyndale reads 'every bildynge', Cranmer 'what buyldyng soever', the R.V. 'each several building'. To interpret this as though the Apostle conceived of a number of different buildings, growing into a holy temple is contrary to the teaching of the whole context, yet, unless we are going to assume that we need not be too particular over shades of grammatical accuracy, some recognition of the peculiar wording is called for.

> "In English the word 'building' has various shades of meaning, each of which is found equally in its counterpart in the Greek. It may mean 'the process of building', it may mean 'the building itself when complete' or it may have a sense intermediate between these two, and mean 'the building regarded as in process'." (J. Armitage Robinson, D.D.).

'Every building' then will not mean a number of separate buildings but as though the Apostle had said 'However many may take part in this building, whatever their share or particular constitution, whether of executive, of transport, of direction, of actual labour or attending to the needs of those thus engaged, every act of building is directed to one end, the erection of a naos a most holy place, 'a dwelling place of God in the Spirit'. A glance at Eph. iv. 16 will show that this co-operative idea is there presented in the figure of a Body, Christ being the Head, instead of the Chief Corner Stone; the believers the several joints of supply, instead of being builders, the 'building up' and the 'growing' (increase) being repeated.

The reader may feel that a fair amount of time and space has been devoted to a very small and not very important item, but mature reflection will show that the meaning at which we have arrived has a far reaching effect. If every act of building which is rendered by every member of the church of the Mystery has in view the building of a naos or heavenly holiest of all, then a very definite understanding will have been reached concerning the nature and scope of ministry as it pertains to the dispensation of the Mystery. The parallel passage, Eph. iv. 16, is equally emphatic that the main purpose of the mutual ministry of 'every joint' is the increase and edifying of the body of Christ. A little earlier the Apostle had spoken of the ministry as follows:

> "For the perfecting (re-adjusting) of the saints, > for the work of the ministry,
> for the edifying of the Body of Christ:
> Till we all come in the unity of the faith" (Eph. iv. 12, 13).

Others may be called by the same Lord to be 'fishers of men'; others may be called to organize evangelistic campaigns, to spend themselves in promoting youth movements and other most important and necessary services. With all such we are in sympathy and would help to the full extent of our powers, so long as our loyalty to the Truth remained untouched. The trouble is that so many of these dear fellow believers are not content to leave us to the work which the same Lord has entrusted to us. We have been taken to task because we have not organized great evangelistic campaigns, although we have been told that we often 'teach' a fuller and more effective gospel message than many widely advertised Evangelists.

So with all other activities that occupy the energies of the child of God 'to every man his work' is a sound motto. Let him that 'teacheth' wait upon his 'teaching' (Rom. xii. 7), and let us all remember that to our own Master we stand or fall. To make known 'what is the dispensation of His calling', to endeavour to make all men see 'what is the dispensation of the Mystery', to hold fast the form of sound words, to keep the helm of the Berean Expositor steadily on its course, to resist blandishments and to accept without resentment misrepresentation—these have required the fullest measure of grace available, and in this temper we proceed and with this goal before us we run.

We trust the reader will have seen how profitable it is to ponder the Word, to recognize that every grammatical form is there by 'inspiration of God' and that much loss of teaching must follow any disregard of apparently unimportant details. We have already stressed the idea that all is directed to a 'habitation' or 'dwelling place' of God, we must give attention to the closing clause 'a habitation of God through the Spirit'. The words 'through the Spirit' translate the Greek en pneumati 'in spirit'. In four places in the book of the Revelation, John tells us that he was 'in spirit', the results being that he was transferred as it were to the future day of the Lord (Rev. i. 10; iv. 2; xvii. 3; xxi. 10). Another use of the phrase is found in Paul's epistles, where 'in spirit' represents the new sphere of Christian activity. For example:

> "He is a Jew, which is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, IN SPIRIT, and not in letter" (Rom. ii. 29).
>
> "We should serve IN newness of SPIRIT, and not in oldness of letter" (Rom. vii. 6).
>
> "But ye are not IN FLESH, but IN SPIRIT, if so be the Spirit of God dwell (oikei) in you" (Rom. viii. 9).

In Eph. iii. 5, as the passage reads in the A.V. the words 'by the Spirit' refer to the revelation made to the holy apostles and prophets. When we are examining that passage we hope to show that the words 'in spirit' stand as a preface to the threshold unity of verse six, but that exposition must wait until the whole section is before us. There are many other examples of en pneumati in the epistles, but those given are a fair sample of this particular usage. "In spirit" as we have seen in Romans, is placed over against 'in flesh' or 'in letter', and in Eph. ii. it is placed over against the former sphere en sarki 'in flesh' (Eph. ii. 11) and parallel with such blessed changes of sphere as 'in Christ Jesus', 'in one body', 'in one spirit', and 'in Lord' of Eph. ii. 13, 16, 18, 21. A reader once complained about the mixed metaphor used by the Apostle here, for he not only speaks of the temple being 'built' but of its 'growing'. The words auxano and auxesis occur again in Eph. iv. 15, 16, and in Eph. iii. 17 we have the two figures again 'rooted and grounded in love' as also in Col. ii. 7 'rooted and built up in Him'. God is using 'living stones' and consequently the Apostle can use both the words 'built UPON' and 'IN Whom all the building . . . . . groweth' without any incongruity. Alas in many buildings or societies erected by men, the interchange of the terms 'build' and 'grow' would not only be incongruous but untrue.

So another blessed section of this epistle ends. In this temple, no middle wall exists, here 'the both' have access in one spirit, here 'in spirit' is prepared a dwelling place for God. There is a sequel to this, but it awaits the prayer of Eph. iii. 14-21 for its elucidation, and a most important section of the epistle dealing specifically with the dispensation of the Mystery intervenes.

No.54. The Secret Chamber (iii. 1 - 13).

A Parenthesis of Extreme Importance (iii. 2 - 13).

pp. 141 - 144

The reader who has the teaching of Ephesians in heart and mind will already have realized that some explanation is necessary to account for the extraordinary revelation of grace that is made known in the two chapters now reviewed.

The blessings promised are unique	"Every blessing that is spiritual."
The sphere of their enjoyment is unique	"In heavenly places."
The period of choice is unique	"Before the overthrow of the world."
The position is unique	"Made to sit together in heavenly places."
The unity is unique	"The twain created one new man."

Here are five items, each of which, if taken alone, is enough to establish a change of dispensation, and if taken together present so overwhelming an evidence that such a dispensational change must have taken place as to make further argument superfluous. 'He that hath ears to hear, let him hear' may be repeated in this connection as it was pronounced at the blindness of Israel and the introduction of the 'mysteries' of the kingdom. The section now before us Eph. iii. 1-13 is devoted to the revelation and the explanation of the dispensation of the Mystery. The opening words 'For this cause' show that the Apostle was about to make a deduction and an application of what he had just been saying about the 'habitation of God in spirit', but it is evident that at the close of verse one, some necessity compelled him to postpone the teaching that he had in mind because of the need to give a fuller explanation. The words 'for this cause' are repeated in verse fourteen, and the subject resumed.

Eph. iii. 2-13 therefore is a great parenthesis. The word parenthesis, para beside, en in, thesis place, is the covering title of any form of speech which could reasonably be placed within brackets (. . . . .). However, if we would be perfectly accurate, we must call the inserted verses (Eph. iii. 2-13) a parembole, for words in parenthesis are not complete in themselves, but words of a parembole are. The place occupied in the outworking of the theme can be seen if the whole passage be set out thus:

A | Eph. ii. 19-22. The church a temple, a habitation or dwelling of God in Spirit.
B | iii. 1. For this cause.
C | iii. 2-13. A parenthesis made necessary by Paul's claim that his imprisonment was connected with the blessing of the Gentiles, which he explains as linked with a dispensation given to himself. He returns to the matter of his tribulations which are for their glory, and repeats the words:
B | iii. 14. For this cause.
A | iii. 14-21. The individual believer should pray that he may experimentally enjoy this privilege of ii. 19-22, which for the present is expressed in the words: "That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith".

We will, therefore, follow the Apostle in his argument, and postpone the examination of the connection suggested by the words 'for this cause' until we reach verse fourteen. The reason why the Apostle paused to explain is because of the claim inherent in the words:

> "I Paul, the prisoner of Christ Jesus for you Gentiles" (Eph. iii. 1).

This is the fist occurrence of the personal pronoun ego in the epistle. Here, the message is placed first, the messenger second. On the other occasions, as for example the fight for the faith in the epistle to the Galatians, the commission and the independence of the messenger takes precedence. The occasions upon which the Apostle was led to use the personal 'I Paul' are six in number, as follows: II Cor. x. 1, Gal. v. 2; Eph. iii. 1; Col. i. 23; I Thess. ii. 18 and Philemon 19. The only two which are used to make a claim to special revelation and stewardship are those in Ephesians and Colossians:

> "I Paul, the prisoner of Christ Jesus for you Gentiles."
> "Whereof I Paul am made a minister."

It is evident that so much is involved and implied in the claims of Eph. iii. 1 that it justifies the long digression of the next twelve verses. What was this claim? Let us notice the last claim first. "For you Gentiles." It was no new thing for Paul's name to be intimately associated with the Gentiles. At his conversion he was described as a chosen vessel to bear the name of the Lord "before the Gentiles" (Acts ix. 15) and in Rom. xi. 13 he declares himself to be 'the Apostle of the Gentiles', a claim already recognized by Peter, James and John (Gal. ii. 8, 9). It was the connection of Paul's imprisonment with the Gentile that introduced the claim that demanded explanation. He was the Prisoner of Christ Jesus (R.V.) for the Gentiles, and it is the 'Prison ministry' that must claim our attention.

We must commence our survey with Paul's own introduction of the subject as described in Acts xx. It is evident that Paul has come to the end of one ministry, and is now facing another. Verses 18-21 are his own survey of the ministry that was closing, and verses 22-24 an anticipation of the ministry that awaited him. Already, before a visible shackle was on his wrist, he was 'bound in the spirit' and knew that 'bonds' as well as affliction awaited him. His attitude to these things, tempered by his one absorbing desire, however, is made known:

> "But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry, which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God" (Acts xx. 24).

The Apostle then told these Ephesian elders that they would see his face 'no more', and with a word of exhortation and a display of mutual affection the chapter closes. The fears expressed in Acts xx. were soon realized, and Paul found himself a prisoner. It is during his defence before King Agrippa that the next statement concerning his prison ministry is made. He recounts his experience on the way to Damascus, where he was met by the Lord, converted and commissioned. Up till this time we only know what the Lord said to Ananias about Saul of Tarsus, and what Ananias said to him, but now that all need of secrecy is past, Paul makes known what the Lord had said to him on the way to Damascus, and before Ananias visited him after the three days blindness.

> "I am Jesus Whom thou persecutest" (Acts xxvi. 15 and ix. 5).
> "But rise, and stand upon thy feet: for I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness both of these things which thou hast seen, and of those things in the which I will appear unto thee; Delivering thee from the people, and from the Gentiles, unto whom now I send thee" (Acts xxvi. 16, 17).
> "I HAVE appeared . . . . . I WILL appear." Here are two appearings.
> "BOTH of these things . . . . . of those things." Here are two ministries.
> "Which thou HAST seen . . . . . WILL appear." Here are two subjects.

In Acts ix. there were no 'Gentiles' from whom Paul needed to be delivered, the words 'Delivering thee . . . . . unto whom now I send thee' being quoted by Paul from the commission given to him at the second appearing, early promised and at length fulfilled. In Acts ix. he only knew that he had a twofold ministry; subsequently he realized that the second ministry was associated with prison and particularly directed towards the Gentiles. So, in Eph. iii. 1 he calls himself 'The prisoner of Christ Jesus for you Gentiles' which is proof that the second ministry had then been entered. Paul is called a 'prisoner' for the first time in Acts xvi. 25 when he, together with Silas, had been thrown into prison at Philippi. Writing to the Corinthians he told them that already he had been in 'prison more frequently' (II Cor. xi. 23), but these imprisonments could not have lasted long at a time, as they do not even figure in the record of his journeys in the Acts. In Acts xxiii. Paul is a prisoner on a serious charge, and was held prisoner at Caesarea for two years (Acts xxiv. 27). His bonds are mentioned fourteen times and twice his examiner pronounced that he had done nothing worthy of death or bonds. Paul calls himself a prisoner in three places:

> "I Paul, the prisoner of Christ Jesus for you Gentiles" (Eph. iii. 1).
> "I therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you" (Eph. iv.1).
> "Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me His prisoner" (II Tim. i. 8).

Ephesians and II Timothy therefore are "Prison Epistles". Philippians speaks very definitely of his 'bonds' (Phil. i. 7, 13, 14, 16), and so does Colossians (Col. iv. 18) and Philemon (verses 10, 13). These epistles form the basis of the teaching of the Apostle concerning the Mystery, and constitute the standard of truth for the dispensation of the Mystery. This does not mean that nothing outside these five epistles has a message for the member of the One Body. Redemption, justification and the great truths of the Gospel of grace, are assumed rather than taught in these epistles. Here, as everywhere else, the Scriptures are accepted as inspired truth. Here in a pre-eminent manner, Christ is exalted, ordinances once valid retire and a new sphere of blessing is revealed. The hope of Israel being suspended while Israel is blinded, a new aspect of hope is revealed. Some of these distinctive blessings have been before us in the two chapters of Ephesians now studied, and more awaits the diligent student as he has unfolded before his wondering gaze the exceeding riches of grace that these prison epistles reveal.

No.55. The Secret Chamber (iii. 1 - 13).

The New Dispensation (iii. 2).

pp. 161 - 165

It seems evident that when the Apostle made the statement contained in Eph. iii. 1, he was conscious of having made a very great claim, a claim that needed some measure of substantiation. It is easy to make a claim to some extraordinary vision, revelation or commission, and history provides abundant evidence of the duplicity of many so called seers, and the dupability of the untaught hearer. When Paul was apprehended, the Roman Captain had imagined that he had laid hold on the 'Egyptian' who led away four thousand men in 55A.D. (Acts xxi. 38). Some years previous a person named 'Theudas, boasting himself to be somebody', led away a number and was afterwards slain (Acts v. 36), and had Paul made the most fantastic claims to the most preposterous revelations and uttered the most improbable prophecies he would have found a following.

However, many and wonderful the revelations made to him he nevertheless spoke 'the words of truth and soberness' even though one of his hearers had said of him 'Paul thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad' (Acts xxvi. 24). When Moses received his commission to return to Egypt and demand of Pharaoh the liberation of Israel, his contention was that Israel would disbelieve his claim and would say 'The Lord hath not appeared unto thee', his objection was accepted as valid and two great signs were given, the one touching a serpent, the other leprosy, symbols of Satan and Sin (Exod. iv. 1-7). It is not without significance that the words 'hath appeared unto thee' are almost the same as those used in Acts xxvi., of the appearing of Christ to the Apostle Paul. Coming nearer to the Apostle's time we have a greater example of this concession, namely that provided by the Saviour Himself. In the ninth chapter of Matthew a man sick of palsy is brought before the Lord, but instead of first healing him of his disease, the Saviour forgave the man his sins. This cause great feeling among His hearers, who considered any such a claim to be blasphemy. The Saviour admitted their contention so far as to say:

> "Whether is easier, to say, Thy sins are forgiven thee, or to say, Arise, and walk?" (Matt. ix. 5).

Well, obviously, it was easy to 'say' thy sins be forgiven thee, for no physical change would be evident, therefore, in order that the greater claim should be substantiated, the healing of the sick man followed 'That ye may know' (Matt. ix. 5-7). In like manner the Apostle paused, after claiming to be the prisoner of the Lord for the Gentiles, and broke the thread of his discourse, to explain and prove his claim:

> "If ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to you-ward" (Eph. iii. 2).

As in Eph. iv. 21 'If so be that ye have heard Him', these words are conditional 'For surely you have heard' is the translation of Eph. iii. 2 by Moffatt. Eige 'If indeed'. The word only occurs five times in the N.T.:

> "If so be that being clothed we shall not be found naked" (II Cor. v. 3).*
> "Have ye suffered so many things in vain? if it be yet in vain" (Gal. iii. 4).*
> "If ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God" (Eph. iii. 2).
> "If so be that ye have heard Him" (Eph. iv. 21).
> "If ye continue in the faith" (Col. i. 23).
>
> [NOTE: * - The reader who uses Dr. Bullinger's Greek English Lexicon, should correct these references, as the first reads II Cor. v. 5 and the second Gal. iii. 14.]

In each of these passages the subject is taken for granted. The word 'if' must not be treated casually as of little importance. That master of language, Shakespeare, knew better; "much virtue", he said, "in your 'if'." The following Greek particles are translated 'if' in the N.T. and their distinctive meanings should be realized:

Ean "If haply." This implies a condition, which only experience can determine.
"If he come unto you, receive him" (Col. iv. 10).

Ei "If" putting the condition simply,
(a) With the indicative it assumes the hypothesis as a fact.
"If ye be dead with Christ" (Col. ii. 20).
(b) With the optative (the wishing) mood, it expresses mere assumption.
"If the will of God be so" (I Pet. iii. 17).

Eige "If at least"—what is spoken taken for granted (as above).

Dr. Bullinger in his Lexicon illustrates the meaning of these words thus:

> "If this counsel or this work be of men (ean followed by the subjunctive a point which the result will decide)" "But if it be of God (ei with the indicative, a case which I put)" Acts v. 38, 39.
>
> "If ye know these things (ei with indicative, assuming the case as a fact)", "happy are ye if ye do them (ean followed by the subjunctive a result which remains to be seen)" John xiii. 17.

No uncertainty therefore must be read into Eph. iii. 2; iv. 21 or Col. i. 23. "Assuming that ye have heard" would translate the Apostle's meaning. Here in this opening epistle of the new dispensation Paul assumes that those to whom he now writes 'had heard'. How and when did they hear? The elders of Ephesus had heard, at least in part, as Acts xx. 17-25 makes clear, and after the setting aside of Israel in Acts xxviii., we read "Paul dwelt TWO YEARS in his own hired house, and received all that came in unto him" (Acts xxviii. 30). Among those who visited him during these two years were Timothy, many of the brethren, Epaphroditus, Onesimus, Aristarchus, Marcus, Jesus named Justus, Epaphras, Luke and Demas, and through the ministry of these brethren traveling back and forth between the assemblies and the Roman prison, all the churches would have become apprized of the new dispensation that had been given unto the Apostle for the Gentiles.

Even when the Apostle suffered a severer imprisonment with much more irksome restrictions, even as a malefactor, he could rejoice that the preaching had been fully known and that all the Gentiles had heard (II Tim. iv. 17). Doubtless we should like to 'have heard' but in the wisdom of God, we learn by study, by prayer, by meditation, so that they who have ears to hear shall hear, but those not so blessed will pass this high and holy calling by and protest that 'they see nothing in it'. For us, it is as certain as the day that for two years the believer had the opportunity to hear and that many did so with blessed results. In Eph. iii. the Apostle is but reminding them of what was acknowledged among them, to pass on to a more detailed exposition of some of the distinctive features of this new dispensation.

"The dispensation of the grace of God." The word 'dispensation' in the sense of a stewardship comes into our language from the Latin which uses dispensatio as a translation of the Greek oikonomia. The Oxford Dictionary says:

> "Theol. A religious order or system, conceived as a stage in a progressive revelation, expressly adapted to a particular nation or age, as the Patriarchal, Mosaic, Christian dispensation."

A dispensation was used of a steward, but is rarely so used now. Dispensative means administrative. The objection made by some to the use of the word 'dispensation' in Eph. iii. 2 and in similar passages is a quibble, and prompted by a desire to avoid the consequences of accepting the teaching that makes Paul, the Prisoner, the Steward of an entirely new dispensation. Oikonomia is translated in Luke xvi. 2, 3 and 4 by 'stewardship' even as oikonomos is translated in Luke xvi. 1, 3 and 8 by 'steward'. Paul claimed to be a steward of the mysteries of God (I Cor. iv. 1, 2), and the fact that the word is used of a 'chamberlain' of a city (Rom. xvi. 23), or of 'governors' who were responsible for an heir during his minority (Gal. iv. 2) further illustrates the meaning of the term. The LXX uses the word oikonomos of one "that was over the household" (Isa. xxxvii. 2), which if read in connection with Eph. ii. 19 will show the nature and extent of the Apostle's claim. Eph. iii. 9 reads in the A.V. 'fellowship of the mystery' which is corrected in the R.V. to 'dispensation of the mystery'. It is a slip of the pen that any scribe might make, and write koi instead of oik, koinoia being 'fellowship' and oikonomia 'dispensation'.

Let us examine this structure before attempting the analysis of details, for if we comprehend the structure we shall perceive the scope of the Apostle's argument, and if we perceive the scope we shall avoid that ever present danger of failing 'to see the wood for the trees'. It will be observed that he returns in the thirteenth verse to his imprisonment, saying this time 'My afflictions for you' and in Acts xx. 23 when he first visualized this new ministry 'bonds and afflictions' were linked together.

The next pair of correspondencies relate to the Dispensations. In the first passage it is called 'The dispensation of the grace of God' with which we can compare Acts xx. 24, where Paul speaks of this future ministry as testifying the gospel of the grace of God.

The corresponding member in Eph. iii., speaks of 'the dispensation (R.V.) of the mystery'. In the former passage this Mystery is said to have been made known to Paul by revelation, and in the latter passage we read of his desire 'to enlighten all' (tisai pantas) as to what is the dispensation of the Mystery. The central member verses 4-8 is occupied with TWO MYSTERIES, not one. There is the Mystery of Christ, shared by the Apostles and prophets of the N.T. times, with those who were taught of God in earliest days, and there is the Mystery itself, which Paul shared with no man.

The Mystery of Christ has been unfolded in the Scriptures since the primal promise of Gen. iii. 15 was made to our first parents, the Mystery of the present dispensation is called, in the balancing member 'unsearchable', no trace of these riches being found in earliest writings because 'hid in God'. Let us repeat, while we have to learn of both the fact and of the character of this new dispensation, those to whom Paul wrote had 'heard' of it throughout the two whole years in which he was permitted to receive visitors from all the churches under his care, and they took back the glad message. He had explained and expounded it for at least a year before the epistle we are now studying was written. While this may call for exceeding patience and prayerful vigilance while we follow out all the clues that are here imbedded in this epistle, let us remember that no such ambiguity existed at the beginning, the hope of these glad tidings had been proclaimed to every creature under heaven, according to Col. i. 23. This fact is a support to us and an encouragement to continue in our search, being assured that what was so openly proclaimed at the beginning, will not be withheld from any true member even at the end of the days.

No.56. The Secret Chamber (iii. 1 - 13).

The Mystery made known "According to a revelation".

pp. 189 - 192

The expansion and explanation of the meaning of the words "The dispensation of the grace of God which is given to me to you-ward" is found in the next verse, and introduced, as it is, by the connective 'how'.

> "How that by revelation He made known unto me the mystery."

The word translated 'how' is the Greek hoti used epexegetically, an epexegesis being a full or detailed account or explanation of something which has gone before, and makes the sentence dependent upon the precious verse 'If ye have heard' and explains the peculiar character of the dispensation' given. The peculiarity of the dispensation is further established by the mode of its endowment "How that BY REVELATION He made known". A superficial criticism may object that this 'explanation' does not say a dispensation was entrusted, but that something was 'revealed', and to this we must make an answer. The word translated 'revelation' is apokalupsis and generally supposes something hitherto hidden or veiled, as in Eph. iii. 5. The word generally opposes the thought that the subject thus 'revealed' could have been discovered by human wit or sagacity (I Cor. ii. 10).

A new and wonderful body of truth, such as is found in the epistles of the Mystery, was not revealed to Paul for his own private enjoyment, but given to him because he was Divinely chosen to be an earthen vessel. In the first place, even though the gospel had been preached unto Abraham (Gal. iii. 8), yet the gospel preached by Paul was given him 'by revelation' (Gal. i. 12), and the apostles of the circumcision ultimately admitted that it had something special and peculiar about it (Gal. ii. 7), even as the declared purpose "I went up by revelation, and communicated unto them that gospel which I preach among the Gentiles" (Gal. ii. 2) makes clear. Here the original reads kata apokalupsin 'according to revelation' not 'through' dia as in Gal. i. 12. The words used in Eph. iii. 3 are kata apokalupsin 'according to a revelation' and the difference should be noted. Kata followed by the accusative is translated 'by' in the A.V. twenty-five times. A few instances must suffice, which we will translated each time literally 'according to':

> "According to our law"; "That it might be according to grace"; "According to permission"; "According to commandment"; "I went up according to a revelation"; "How that according to a revelation He made known unto me the Mystery"; "According to the effectual working of His power" (John xix. 7; Rom. iv. 16; I Cor. vii. 6; II Cor. viii. 8; Gal. ii. 2; Eph. iii. 3, 7).

While we do not suggest that the word 'by' should be exchanged for 'according to' in these passages, the English idiom hardly allowing it, it should be remembered that the word 'by' has a very great variety of meanings which should be kept in mind when reading, its distinction being under the following headings:

(1) Of place 'by land'. (2) Of time 'by day'. (3) Of agency 'by grace'.
(4) Of the effect of causation 'by this I know'. (5) Of relation 'by the ounce'.
(6) Of specification 'Greet the friends by name'.

Had the Mystery been made known to Paul 'by' revelation simply, the language of Gal. i. 12 di apokalupseos would have been sufficient; instead the Apostle employs the language of Gal. ii. 2 "I went up kata apokalupsin in harmony with a revelation", for no one believes that the revelation was the mode of transport 'by' which Paul went up to Jerusalem. He went up because a revelation had been made to him, and in harmony with that revelation it was incumbent upon him to go up to Jerusalem, lay before those in charge 'that gospel' which he preached among the Gentiles, and to 'yield' not for an hour to any pressure put upon him. In like manner Paul had received a revelation, first at his original commission (Gal. i. 16) and at the subsequent appearing to him of the Saviour (Acts xxvi. 16-18). This revelation included such terms as:

> "To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God", and no one acquainted with the Prison epistles will need chapter and verse to be quoted here to show that these are an integral part of their testimony. So, says Paul 'in harmony with this all covering revelation given to me, there was made known unto me the mystery'. The bulk of the occurrences of gnorizo 'to make known' is found in Paul's epistles (18 refs: out of 24 in the whole N.T.). Gnorizo is used six times in Ephesians, two references (Eph. iii. 10 and vi. 21) deal with making known by the church the manifold wisdom of God, and the making known by Tychicus the affairs of the Apostle. The remaining four references are used exclusively of some phase of the Mystery:

> "In all wisdom and prudence having made known unto us the mystery of His will."
> "How that by revelation He made known unto me the Mystery."
> "The Mystery of Christ, which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, as it is now revealed unto His holy apostles and prophets."
> "And for me . . . . . that I may . . . . . make known the Mystery of the gospel" (Eph. i. 9; iii. 3-5; vi. 19).

Three of these passages refer to related mysteries; one only to THE Mystery of the present dispensation. The mystery of His will is found in the section of Eph. i. that deals with sin and its redemption. Sin did not come in the will of the Father (Eph. i. 3-6), but although unrevealed, we know that God was not taken by surprise. Although no reference was made to the provision of a sacrifice for sin to Adam when he was warned of the consequences of disobedience, that sacrifice had been foreordained as I Pet. i. 19, 20 establishes. This is the mystery of His will. The mystery of Christ awaits our attention in the section before us; the third reference is to the mystery of the gospel, but whether this means that the gospel itself is a mystery, or weather it means that associated with the gospel of grace there was attached a mystery, must be considered in its place.

The presence of 'all my affairs and how I do' in this list of occurrences of gnorizo may at first seem of little consequence, but a moment's consideration will suggest that if "Mystery" and Paul's 'affairs' come together by things that can be 'made known', then a mystery as used in the Scriptures, while it may defy the wisdom of man to uncover, is intelligible and communicable as soon as it has been revealed. Here in Eph. iii. 3 we have the Mystery par excellence.

Because the British postage stamp was the first to be issued, it does not bear the name of this country—all other stamps, issued subsequently do. Because the British founded the first Alpine Club, that is its title; all other Alpine clubs add the name of the country responsible.

London is a great town, and for good or ill it contains thousands of monuments both in public buildings and in the open air, yet a visitor boarding a taxi at any of the London termini and asking simply for 'The Monument' would be taken without demur to the monument at the foot of London Bridge. All other monuments need some distinguishing and differentiating title. THE Monument is that erected by Christopher Wren to commemorate the great fire of London.

All other mysteries found in the N.T. are given a title 'The mystery of the kingdom of heaven', 'the mystery of Israel's blindness' for example—this mystery of Eph. iii. 3 stands out above them all in importance, and must be treated accordingly. Just as the New Covenant lies at the heart of the epistle to the Hebrews, and the great doctrine of Justification is the life blood of the epistle to the Romans, so the Mystery is the great essential centre from which every doctrinal, dispensational and practical message radiates All spiritual blessings are the peculiar blessings of the Mystery. In heavenly places is the peculiar sphere of the Mystery. Before the overthrow of the world is a time period that belongs only to Christ Himself and to the Mystery. The Church which is His Body, the Fullness of Him that filleth all in all, is the title of the church of the Mystery. The present dispensation is the dispensation of the Mystery, and Paul as the Prisoner of Jesus Christ for us Gentiles is the one initial steward of this Mystery. If these things are so, then no apology is needed for a careful study of this term, for if we are right here we may reasonably hope to be right in our interpretation of the whole epistle, but if we are wrong here, then all our efforts will be in vain. Accordingly we must devote the succeeding article to an examination of the word 'mystery' and its peculiar position in the purpose.

No.57. The Secret Chamber (iii. 1 - 13).

The Mystery, the term examined.

pp. 209 - 213

In the preceding article we have seen that according to a revelation Paul received the Mystery, and we became aware of the intrinsic importance of this term. To appreciate the meaning of the word 'mystery', and the place it occupies in dispensational truth is to possess the key to unlock the treasures of both Ephesians and Colossians. Accordingly we devote all the space at our disposal in this article to an acquaintance with the meaning and message of the Mystery.

The Greek word musterion occurs twenty-seven times in the N.T. and is translated 'mystery' throughout. The word is distributed as follows:

Gospels.	3 references. No occurrence in John's Gospel.
Epistles.	8 occurrences in Paul's pre-prison epistles (Rom., I Cor., II Thess.).
	10 occurrences in Paul's prison epistles (Eph., Col.).
	2 occurrences in interim epistles (I Tim.).
Revelation.	4 occurrences.

The word does not occur in Hebrews, nor in any of the circumcision epistles. The LXX contains 9 references, all of them in the book of Daniel. In addition there are twelve occurrences in the Apocrypha which indicate, by the way the word is employed, something of the meaning it must have attached to it when it is found in the N.T. As this word occupies such an important place in dispensational truth we must waive our rule and set out a complete concordance of its occurrences in both the O.T. and the N.T.

So far we have been concerned with the material that we are to use. We must now inquire into the essential meaning of the term and this we shall gather (1) from its etymology and (2) from its usage. Etymology used alone is an unsafe guide, for language is living and the folk who use it are not all students; it is therefore wise to balance etymology with usage. This we will do.

Muo, does not occur in the N.T. but is the basic word from which musterion is derived. It means ‘to close’, especially the lips or the eyes.

Muzo, which likewise does not occur in the N.T. means ‘to murmur with closed lips, to mutter’. It will be observed that in the English words MUrmur, MUtter, MUmble and MUte this meaning persists.

Mueo. To initiate into the mysteries, this is not only found in classical Greek, but is used by the Apostle in Phil. iv. 12 ‘I am instructed’ better ‘I am initiated’. Moffatt translates the passage ‘I have been initiated into the secret’, Rotherham renders the word ‘I have been let into the secret’.

Muopazo (myopia in English), II Pet. i. 9 'cannot see afar off'.

Kammuo (derived from katamuo) to shut, especially the eyes (Matt. xiii. 15; Acts xxviii. 27). The etymology therefore of the word musterion is something 'hidden', a secret, something that requires initiation, something not discoverable by ordinary methods. It is an unsafe analogy to argue from the use of the word 'mystery' as employed in the articles of indenture and referring to the mysteries of a trade, for this word should really be spelled 'mistery' coming as it does from the French mistier, or métier which in its turn is derived from the Latin ministerium. It will not do therefore to teach that there is no more 'mystery' about the mysteries of the Bible than there is about trade secrets, for this approach to the subject omits the presence and influence of the pagan mysteries that will eventually come to a head in 'the mystery of iniquity', even as the mysteries of the Scriptures come to a head in 'the Mystery of godliness'. Is there anyone who knows all that there is to know concerning either the mystery of iniquity or the Mystery of godliness? Are there not 'depths of Satan' and 'the deep things of God'? Are there not unspeakable words which "it is not lawful or possible for a man to utter" (II Cor. xii. 4)? And is there not in the same epistle the offering of thanks to God for his 'unspeakable gift' (II Cor. ix. 15)? From very early times, there were in the pagan world vast and widespread institutions known as Mysteries, celebrated for their profound secrecy, admission to which was only by initiation. The Greek, Egyptian and Persian mysteries can be traced back to a common source, namely Chaldea, and constitute one of the travesties of truth that is so characteristic of Babylonianism. Babylon is represented as bearing a golden cup, and to drink of mysterious beverages, says Salverte, was indispensable on the part of all who sought initiation in these mysteries.

To musterion. This is not the only term borrowed from the ancient mysteries which Paul employs to describe the teaching of the Gospel. The word teleion (Col. i. 28 'perfect') seems to be an extension4 of the same metaphor. In Phil. iv. 12 again we have the verb memuemai ('I am instructed—literally I am initiated'), and in Eph. i. 13 sphragizesthai ('sealed') is perhaps an image derived from the same source. So too the Ephesians are addressed as Paulou summustai 'fellow initiates of Paul' in Ignatius' Epistle, and the Christian teacher is thus regarded as a heirophantes (see Epict.3:21 13sq) 'who initiates his disciples into the rites' (Bishop Lightfoot). It becomes very clear that no knowledge of the mysteries was obtainable apart from initiation, and this fact must be borne in mind when we approach the mysteries of the Scripture. No mere instruction, or quoting of verses of Scripture, nor even the most lucid presentation of Dispensational Truth will ever 'convince' any one apart from the gracious enlightening that God alone can give.

> "It is given unto you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given . . . . . many prophets and righteous men have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seen them; and to hear those things which ye hear, and have not heard them" (Matt. xiii. 11, 17).
>
> "Who hath ears to hear, let him hear" (Matt. xiii. 9).

The recognition of this great fact of initiation would save the believer many hours of fruitless anxiety. The truth of the Mystery is not to be made known by the organizing of campaigns, it will never be a subject of popular appeal; our attitude must be a readiness at all times to help and guide wherever we see a desire to know and follow on, being assured that none will come to see the Mystery apart from the Lord's own illuminating. We ourselves can at best be but the earthen vessels that He stoops to use in this most wondrous work.

When we come to usage, there are several avenues of approach. (1) The pagan mysteries. (2) The references in the Apocrypha. These two give an idea what the word mystery stood for in the great outside world. (3) The usage of the word in the LXX book of Daniel. (4) Its usage in the N.T. These show how it was used by Holy Scripture. We can say little that would be profitable of the pagan mysteries. The Greek mysteries which were prevalent in the days of the Apostles were derived from Egypt, which in its turn received them from Chaldea, and so in them we have the mystery of iniquity in germ. A search into the annals of the past would bring to light some of the horrible doctrines and corresponding practices associated with these mysteries, but the attitude of the Apostle must be ours:

> "It is a shame even to speak of those things which are done of them in secret" (Eph. v. 12), and pass on to the positive teaching.

In the Apocrypha the word 'musterion' rarely rises above the idea of a secret, either of king or friend. Twice it refers to secret rites and ceremonies but nothing more. The fact that the LXX did not use musterion until translating the book of Daniel may be accounted for by many natural explanations, but when all is said, there must still be room left for the exercise of Divine Providence. Some Lexicographers say that the Greek musterion is derived from the Hebrew mistar, which is translated 'secret' a number of times, yet the Greek translators never use musterion for that or its cognate sether. The only word translated musterion in the Greek O.T. is the Chaldee raz, which is used consistently throughout Dan. ii., and as this word does not occur anywhere else in the O.T., we have no means of comparison. While the Chaldee word raz stands alone, we are not left entirely without help, for on one occasion, Daniel uses the Chaldee from the Hebrew word sether, a word translated 'secret' and 'secret place' in many passages. This provides us with the link that we felt we needed, teaching us that in the Chaldee raz we have the equivalent word. The passage in Dan. ii. 22 'He revealeth the deep and secret things' which the LXX renders 'Bathea kai apokrupha' reserving apparently, the use of the musterion for the Gentile term. Its usage is confined to the dream of Nebuchadnezzar in two ways. Nebuchadnezzar had either actually forgotten the substance of his dream, or as a matter of policy withheld it in order to make sure that the interpretation should be something more than a clever human invention (Dan. ii. 8, 9, 10,11). When Daniel went into the presence of the king, he did not concentrate his attention on the substance of the dream, but its interpretation (Dan. ii. 16), but of course, as the substance of the dream had to be known before the interpretation could be given, both dream and interpretation were included in the 'secret' concerning which Daniel and his fellows prayed (Dan. ii. 18, 19). Nebuchadnezzar asked him "Art thou able to make known unto me the dream which I have seen, and the interpretation thereof?" (Dan. ii. 26). One cannot avoid the feeling that there is a Divine overruling in the choice of this word musterion here, and for this reason. Daniel, in measure, was the O.T. equivalent of Paul; he too was the prisoner of the Lord for the Gentiles, and when Israel failed, mystery comes into the record. So, following Israel's rejection of their Messiah (Matt. xi. and xii.), the 'mysteries' of the kingdom of heaven follow.

No.58. The Secret Chamber (iii. 1 - 13).

Muth-labben, or The Secret of the Son (iii. 4; Psa. viii.).

pp. 229 - 232

Paul was conscious as he penned the words "He made known unto me the Mystery" that he was making a tremendous claim. He claimed to be in a special manner the prisoner of Christ Jesus for the Gentiles; he claimed that a dispensation had been entrusted to him and that to him had been made known 'the Mystery'. The history of the Christian church provides abundant evidence both of the overweening ambition of Christian leaders and of the gullibility of their followers. The reader can doubtless call to mind claims that have been put forward by individuals at different times to the reception of revelations, of prophetic gift of a special revelation of truth. Scattered about the country are monuments such as "The Tower of Jezreel", and companies of Gentile believers, whose great hope is to be numbered among the 144,000 regardless of the revealed limitation 'of all the tribes of the children of Israel'.

Consequently, before the Apostle is free to communicate the special terms of this new dispensation of the Mystery, he feels under an obligation to justify his claim. The very personal and peculiar nature of his commission made it utterly impossible for any 'letter of commendation' to be provided by any existing authority. He stood alone. He was not one of the twelve; he would never sit on one of the twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. Unlike the twelve, he had been appointed by the Ascended Christ (Eph. iv. 7-11), and was the first of his order. If, as he claimed, the Mystery had not been a subject of revelation before his time, if it had never figured in either type, shadow or prophecy, it was in vain to appeal to earlier revelations of truth. The Mystery had been 'hid in God' and 'hidden from the ages and generations'. There was but one way open to him. To show that where he shared with other teachers, the revelation given to him was superior, in the hope that the reader would conclude that where he could put the matter to the test and the Apostle's claim was justified, then it was reasonable to believe his further and related claim was also true. Consequently, Paul turns from 'The Mystery' to the 'Mystery of Christ'.

> "As I wrote afore in few words, whereby, when ye read, ye may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ, which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, as it is now revealed unto His holy apostles and prophets . . ." (Eph. iii. 3-5).

"As I wrote before." These words have sent some students off on a search for a 'lost epistle', but as this reference is so vital, we cannot believe that the Holy Spirit refers us to a piece of evidence which in spite of its extreme importance has not survived, for next only to the inspiration of All Scripture is the miracle of its preservation. The reference to 'the epistle from Laodicea' mentioned in Col. iv. 16 belongs to a different category, the Colossians were simply advised to interchange epistles but no argument rests upon this advice as it does in Eph. iii. Added to this could be the many references in the O.T. to books not incorporated in the Canon such as "The book of the acts of Solomon" (I Kings xi. 41), and "the book of Nathan" (II Chron. ix. 29). The reference by Paul to what he had written afore however is crucial. If we cannot find it and do not possess it, we can proceed no further with him in his argument. Whatever it was that Paul had written afore in a few words, the Ephesians were able to read for he continued 'whereby when ye read'. Now Paul had already written seven epistles, namely, Galatians, I & II Thessalonians, I & II Corinthians, Hebrews and Romans. It is not very likely that the Ephesians would at that time have seen the epistle to the Hebrews; they may or may not have seen one or more of the others. But there is no necessity to look further than Ephesians itself. Occasionally an author will refer his reader back to some earlier paragraph; he may say 'see above' or 'c.f. page so and so'. Paul says 'as I wrote afore in a few words'. His subject is "The mystery of Christ", a mystery shared with other ministers of the truth in other ages but which had been revealed in a superlative degree to the Apostles and Prophets. What is this "Mystery of Christ"? As an initial contribution to the subject, we use the remainder of our space to present the reader with an interpretation of Psa. viii., and the heading of Psa. ix. ("Upon Muth-labben") and with the knowledge thus gained, we will pursue the matter further in a subsequent article.

THE SECRET OF THE SON

These words, so full of suggestion and meaning for the believer, we hope to show belong to the eighth Psalm, and associate the Mystery of Christ (Eph. iii. 4) with Adam, the figure of Him that was to come (Rom. v. 14). Our enquiry relates particularly to the words that, in the A.V., stand at the head of Psalm ix. and read "Upon Muth-labben", words which have received a variety of interpretations. We will subdivide our material under a series of sub-headings, thus:

(1) The place that the words Muth-labben occupy.

The ordinary reader may express some surprise at this heading, for his Bible, whether he read the A.V. or the R.V. places it at the head of Psalm ix. We believe, however, that many of our readers (who evidently are not "ordinary readers"!) are already in possession of the findings of Dr. J. W. Thirtle, of which the following is a summary: He observed that in the third chapter of Habakkuk and Isa. xxxviii. 10-20, we have two complete Psalms. The Psalm falls under three heads: (1) The Superscription; (2) The Psalm itself; (3) The subscription thus:

> A Prayer of Habakkuk the prophet upon Shigionoth (iii. 1).
> The Psalm proper (iii. 2-19).
> To the chief singer on my stringed instrument (Neginoth) (iii. 19).

Applying this principle to the book of Psalms, we find that Psalm iii. has a superscription, but that the words of Hab. iii. 19, instead of being used as a subscription to the Psalm are transferred as a title of Psalm iv. These titles and subtitles are all restored to their true place in the "Companion Bible", Psalm viii, reading:

A Psalm of David.
The Psalm itself (verses 1-9).
To the Chief Musician upon Muth-labben.

The words Upon Muth-labben being the subscription of Psalm viii., not superscription of Psalm ix.

(2) The meaning of the words of the subscription Upon Muth-labben.

The reader may not be conscious as he reads the words "upon Muth-labben" that it is already assumed without proof that the word "upon" is of necessity a true translation of the Hebrew word employed. Al standing alone is often translated "upon", but until we are sure that these two letters do stand alone, we are prejudicing the reader from the start. It seems that the Septuagint translators knew that AlMuth-labben came at the end of Psalm viii., for the word eis to telos "unto the end" are inserted. If the reader consults Young's "Analytical Concordance", he will find that the words Muth-labben are not translated "death of the champion" but "death of Ben, or of the Son". Again, if he looks for the word labben in the Englishman's Hebrew and Chaldee Lexicon, he will not find it, but he will find the term under the heading Ben "Son". We cannot therefore endorse the statement that there is nothing about a "son" in either Psalm viii. or ix., for most readers will know that the word Ben "son" occurs in Psalm viii. Neither is it true that all are agreed that muth can only mean "death" for the LXX does not so translate the word, and these translators were nearer to the times of David than we are by over two thousand years. What the LXX saw in the words AlMuth-labben is made evident by their rendering huper ton kruphion ton huion "concerning the secrets of the Son". There is another Psalm where the LXX uses these words huper ton kruphion "concerning the secrets" and that is at the foot of Psalm xlv., where the A.V. reads "Upon Alamoth". Do these words strike any chord in the reader's mind? Remembering that originally there was no division made between words, as now, let us put in English letters, the two subscriptions to these two Psalms.

The subscription to Psalm viii. reads AlMuth-labben.
The subscription to Psalm xlv. reads Alalamoth.

In both the Septuagint sees the word "secret". How is this? Alalamoth is considered to mean "relating to the maidens", the word almah being the Hebrew for a maiden.

At the close of Psalm xlviii., we have the words "unto death" which in the Hebrew reads Almuth, but which this translation divides into two, al "unto" muth "death". The LXX however considered it to be one word almuth, eis ton aionas "for ever", or "unto the ages". The structure of Psalm xlviii., (see "Companion Bible") places this passage in correspondence with verse 8. Here is another instance where the word almuth "secrets" has been wrongly divided to read al muth, "unto death".

How does it comes about that the word almuth can mean either “maiden” or “secret” or “for ever”? The Hebrew root Alm means to hide or conceal, and gives us “secret” (Psa. xc. 8), “hide” (Psa. x. 1) and in the East in old time, a virgin (maiden, damsel or youth) was called almah because of the concealed or retired state of the unmarried of both sexes. “The virgins shut up in chambers” is an expression found in the Apocrypha. From this same root comes the word translated “age” and “ever”, being a period of time, whose end or duration is hidden from view. It will be seen therefore that the rendering “concerning the secrets of the Son” given by the LXX two centuries before Christ, has much in its favour.

(3) The internal evidence of Psalms viii. and xlv.

At first there does not appear to be any distinctive feature common to both Psalms, until we realize the way in which they are quoted in the epistle to the Hebrews.

Hebrews i. & ii.

A | i. 1, 2. God spoke once by the prophets. Now by His Son.
B | i. 2-14. The Son. His glories. Better than angels.

Quotation from Psalm xlv.

“Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever.”

A | ii. 1-4. God spoke once by angels. Now by the Lord.
B | ii. 5-18. The Son. His sufferings. Lower than angels.

Quotation from Psalm viii.

“What is man . . . . . or the Son of Man?”

With these evidences before us, we feel that the translations given “death to the champion” and “concerning maidens” must give place to the ancient interpretation “the secrets of the Son” and “concerning secrets”, and we can read with richer and fuller understanding both the Psalms themselves and the quotations from them in Heb. i. and ii.

This subject is discussed at greater length in a series entitled “In Adam”, but as this cannot be printed for several years, it was felt that the reader would value this rather condensed presentation of the subject, owing to its extreme importance in the matter of dispensational truth.

No.16. The corruption of man and the preservation of the Seed.

pp. 6 - 9

One of the illuminating discoveries that the student of Scripture makes, is the fact that at the call of Abraham we have traversed but eleven chapters of the book but that in time we have move half way from Adam to Christ. There is at first sight an element of disproportion. If we take a chapter as a standard unit, we have the following. There are 939 chapters in the O.T. and consequently eleven chapters form only one eighty-fifth part of the whole. Yet the time covered by the one eighty-fifth portion of the O.T. from the creation of Adam to the birth of Abraham is 2,008 years (reckoning Adam as B.C.4004 and the birth of Abraham to be B.C.1996, which for the present purpose is near enough to be accepted without dispute). This leaves 1,996 years from Abraham to Christ, and as the year 2002 is exactly half way between Adam and Christ, it will be seen that it is correct to say that when one reads the twelfth chapter of Genesis, the record is chronologically half way through the O.T. This apparent disproportion is explained by the purpose that lies behind the Inspired Record.

If it had been the Divine intention to have satisfied the human mind with a scientific explanation of Creation, can we believe that even the 939 chapters, or the whole of the O.T., would have been sufficient? Had it been the Divine intention to have put on record a history of the world, then inasmuch as there are seventy nations listed in Gen. x., at least seventy separate Bibles would have been necessary. Nor is this all, even though we have so great a literature of Israel, we are obliged to admit that the half has not been told. In some cases we have a fairly detailed account of some episode in a family's history; in other cases the reign of a king is compressed into a few verses. When we become aware that the Bible is concerned with Redemption, and Redemption is concerned with sin and death, then its apparent disproportion suddenly takes new shape, its omissions are readily understood and the call of Abraham and the history of the chosen people are seen in something of their true light. Now closely allied with Redemption is the purpose of God vested in "The Seed" and it is because the channel through which the Seed should come is narrowed down from Gen. iii. 15 to the line of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, that the history of Israel becomes the history of the conflict between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent.

The link between Adam and Abraham is established by references to the seed. The attack by Cain upon his brother Abel manifested the enmity that existed between the two seeds, and the birth of Seth was acclaimed with the joyful words "God . . . . . hath appointed me another seed instead of Abel, whom Cain slew" (Gen. iv. 25). The line of Cain is given in Gen. iv. 16-24, a line containing names identical in some cases, and similar in others to names that are found in the true line through Seth, and indication and a warning that deception and misdirection are the methods adopted by the Enemy to divert the testimony of the Scriptures away from the true Seed, to the false.

Cain's first child is called Enoch, and so, when Jude would refer to Enoch "who walked with God", he is careful to speak of him as 'the seventh from Adam' (Jude 14). The succeeding names in the line of Cain, namely, Irad, Methusael and Lamech, which last-named boasted of his prowess and used the phrase 'sevenfold' and 'seventy and sevenfold', are not unlike the names that occur in Gen. v., namely Jared, which differs from Irad by one letter, and Methuselah which could easily be confused with Methusael, while Lamech who made no boast like his evil name sake, nevertheless has this in common, namely a reference to the seventy and seven, in that he live seven hundred and seventy and seven years. This Lamech had a son, Noah, but the other Lamech, even though he was the first to have two wives, was childless, the evil line of Cain ending in this boastful descendant.

When the genealogy was written as a preface to the books of Chronicles the succession reads 'Adam, Sheth; Enosh' (I Chron. i. 1) and the name of Cain is blotted out of the record, never occurring after Gen. iv., in the remainder of the O.T. A son was born to Seth, whom he called Enos, and the Scripture adds as a comment "Then began men to call upon the name of the Lord" (Gen. iv. 26). As the passage stands in the A.V. it would give cause for rejoicing to think that consequent upon the extinction of the line of Cain, and the continuance of the line through Seth, godliness was now established in the earth. It is however evident from the early pages of Genesis, that men called upon the name of the Lord before the days of Enos, and that extreme ungodliness had so developed by the time that Enoch lived, as to call for the pronouncement of judgment by the Lord (Jude 15) and a prophecy of the coming flood, for Enoch's son Methuselah means 'at his death it shall be'.

That there was something hidden beneath the surface in Gen. iv. 26 the following notes will make evident. The LXX insert the verb elpizo 'to hope' and reads as follows ". . . . . Enos: he hoped to call on the name of the Lord". The translators of the A.V. also were not quite satisfied, for they insert in the margin the words "Or to call themselves by the name of the LORD". Now one may call himself by the name of the Lord for good, or for evil reasons, and there is a persistent tradition from early days, to show that the Rabbinical interpretation of these words indicated that they were evil in intent.

The Targum of Onkelos reads: "Then in his days the sons of men desisted from praying in the name of the Lord." The Targum of Jonathan says: "That was the generation in whose days they began to err, and to make themselves idols, and surnamed their idols by the name of the Word of the Lord." Rashi reads "Then was there profanation in calling on the name of the Lord", and Maimonedes in a treatise on idolatry, traces the probable origin to the days of Enos. With this interpretation the "Companion Bible" is in entire agreement. To the English reader there does not appear in the words 'began to call' anything that suggests profanity, yet, if masters of the language have consistently represented the passage as so doing, the English reader will naturally desire to become more closely acquainted with the original.

The word translated ‘began’ is the Hebrew verb chalal but the idea of ‘beginning’ is entirely secondary. Chalal primarily means ‘to perforate or pierce through’ (Gesenius), thus ‘to wound’ Psa. cix. 22; Isa. liii. 5. From this primitive meaning comes the derived sense of ‘laying open, giving access to’ and so ‘to profane’ as we might a sanctuary (Lev. xix. 8), and is actually used of ‘profaning seed’ (Lev. xxi. 15). Moreover chalal is translated in the A.V. ‘be defiled, polluted, profaned, and prostitute’, seventy times, so that its true significance is beyond dispute.

The word chalal occurs in Genesis just eight times, and we give the references in order to provide every help possible in arriving at a true understanding of the passage before us:

> “Then began men to call upon the name of the LORD.” (Gen. iv. 26).
> “When men began to multiply.” (vi. 1).
> “Noah began to be an husbandman.” (ix. 20).
> “Nimrod . . . . . began to be a mighty one.” (x. 8).
> “This they begin to do.” (xi. 6).
> “The seven years of dearth began to come.” (xli. 54).
> “He searched, and began at the eldest.” (xliv. 12).
> “Reuben . . . . . then defilest thou it.” (xlix. 3, 4).

It is not without significance that the one occasion in Genesis where the verb chalal is translated ‘defile’, the reference is to Reuben who committed such a vile sin against his father and his mother that he lost excellency of the firstborn’s position. Here was a most definite attempt to pollute the seed, and is but one of many similar attempts that are recorded in the book of Genesis which we must see later. The second reference, Gen. vi. 1, is recorded as a preface to the violation of God’s will by ‘the sons of God’, another attack upon the seed. Even the innocent record ‘Noah began to be an husbandman’ is but a preface to his drunkenness and the illegitimate begetting of Canaan (Gen. ix. 20-27), and Nimrod stands as the head of the abomination that is associated with Babylon throughout the entire Word of God. Gen. iv. 26 also is connected with Babylonian rebellion ‘this they begin to do’ being balanced by ‘which they have imagined to do’.

> “Eminent and learned men are of opinion that the word rendered ‘began’ should be translated ‘began profanely’; and that the spirit of inspiration has recorded the fact in this place, as being the first public step in that course of audacious impiety which was rapidly manifesting itself, and by which the ambitious and infidel leaders arrogated to themselves the name, prerogatives, and attributes of Divinity” (Robert Jamieson, D.D.).

In effect, the spirit of Anti-christ was already abroad, and led on to the deluge. The line of Cain might be extinct, but the Enemy of truth was still alive, and was preparing the minds of men for the next invasion of humanity by the attack upon the purity of the seed as revealed in Gen. vi.

The next occurrence of the word ‘seed’ in Genesis is found in chapter vii., where the purpose of the Ark is indicated ‘to keep seed alive upon the face of all the earth’ (Gen. vii. 1-3). Something most terrible must have taken place since the days of Enos for so marvelous a provision for the preservation of seed to be called for. That, we shall discover, was the corruption of man's way upon the earth, and the consequent deluge.

Gen. vi. deals with a phenomenon so unnatural, that the mind at first turns from it and searches for a more 'reasonable' interpretation than that which lies upon the surface. This chapter is to the world of Noah and to his three sons, what Gen. iii., is to Adam and to the entire race. We must therefore spare no pains in our endeavour to understand its teaching.

Who, and what are 'the sons of God'? In what way could such beings take to themselves wives, and how could such wives bare them children? How are we to understand the word 'giants'? And what is the meaning of the words 'And after that' in Gen. vi. 4? What is the significance of the word 'perfect' when applied to Noah (Gen. vi. 9) and what the intention of the words 'all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth"? (Gen. vi. 12).

It is evident that the consideration of such a theme, demands as much time and space as possible; we therefore hope to devote the next article to the elucidation of this most critical passage.

Meanwhile let us ponder with wonder the words of Isaiah concerning the Saviour:

> "He shall see His seed" . . . . . "He shall . . . satisfied" (Isa. liii. 10, 11).

No.17. The Fall, and sin of the angels (Gen. vi.).
pp. 33 - 37

We have seen that the progress of the true seed as recorded in the early chapters of Genesis, most surely justifies the primeval prophecy concerning the enmity that should exist between the seed of the serpent and the Seed of the woman. As promised at the close of the last article, we now turn our attention to the teaching and meaning of Gen. vi.:

> "And it came to pass, when men began to multiply on the face of the earth, and daughters were born unto them, that the sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair; and they took them wives of all which they chose" (Gen. vi. 1, 2).

The fifth chapter of Genesis is "The book of the generations of Adam" and the names of his sons, together with their ages, are given down to Noah and his three sons, "and Noah was five hundred years old: and Noah begat Shem, Ham, and Japheth" (v. 32). At verse nine of chapter vi.. a new section opens with the generations of Noah which extends to Gen. ix. 29 where it ends with the words "And all the days of Noah were nine hundred and fifty years: and he died". The first eight verses of Gen. vi. belong to the previous section "The book of the generations of Adam", and the following structure given in The Companion Bible makes this clear:

A | v. 1, 2. Unfallen: Adam a "son of God" (Luke iii. 38).
B | v. 3-5. Fallen Adam, and his years. The total 930, and the first 130.
C | v. 6-27. The progeny of Adam, and their deaths.
D | v. 28-32. Noah, and his promise of "comfort".
A | vi. 1, 2. The fallen angels: "sons of God".
B | vi. 3. Fallen Adam, and his years. The total 930, and the last 120.
C | vi. 4-7. The progeny of fallen angels, and their threatened destruction. The Nephilim.
D | vi. 8. Noah and his possession of "grace".

It will be seen that this book of the generation of Adam falls into two parts. Gen. v. 1-32 recording the genealogy of the normal and natural descendants of Adam, while Gen. vi. 1-8 introduces the abnormal and the unnatural. In the structure given above it is already assumed that 'the sons of God' are 'fallen angels', and that the progeny of their illicit marriage were the Nephilim—a word left unexplained in the structure. These subjects we must now consider, and the following sequence seems to be suggested as the most helpful.

(1) Has there been a 'fall' among the angels?
(2) If so, could these angels be called 'the sons of God'?
(3) In view of Luke xx. 35, 36 how can we speak of 'the progeny' of the fallen angels?
(4) Who and what are 'the giants' and 'the Nephilim'?
(5) What is the significance of the words "and also after that" (Gen. vi. 4)?

Our first question is "Has there been a fall among the angels?" While the word 'angel' is often used without qualification, there are a number of occasions where the writer says 'The holy angels', 'The angels of God', 'The angel of the Lord', 'His angels', etc., that at least makes it possible that there are two kinds of angels.

We read in Matt. xxv. 41 of a place of punishment 'prepared for the Devil and his angels' and in Rev. xii. 7 we read of war in heaven, Michael and his angels, fighting with the Devil and his angels, and by reason of defeat, Satan and his angels being cast out of heaven unto the earth (Rev. xii. 7-13). Unless therefore we are to believe the monstrous doctrine that God actually created the Devil and his angels in their present state, there must have been a 'fall' among angelic beings. Further, when the Devil and his angels were expelled from heaven, it does not say in Rev. xii. that they dispersed themselves throughout the limitless spaces of the universe; it tells us that Satan at least 'came down' to the inhabitants of the earth, 'having great wrath'. It is not only a fact that angels fell, but it seems fairly certain that fallen angels found, and will yet find, an abode in the earth among the sons of men.

The book of the Revelation deals with the Day of the Lord and the time of the end, and, like the passage in Eph. ii. 1-3, it shows that Satan, though fallen, is not yet bound. With this knowledge we approach two other passages of Scripture that speak of a fall among the angels, which, by reason of the context, compels us to fix upon Gen. vi. as the date and occasion of their fall.

The two passages are here set out side by side that they may be better compared:

II Peter ii. 4 - 6.	Jude 6, 7.
"For if God spare not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment; and spared not the old world, but saved Noah the eighth person, a preacher of righteousness, bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly; and turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrha into ashes condemned them with an overthrow, making them an ensample unto those that after should live ungodly."	"And the angels which kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation, He hath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day. Even as Sodom and Gomorrha, and the cities about them in like manner, giving themselves over to fornication, and going after strange flesh, are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal life.

Let us note in some measure of detail the extraordinary features of these two passages. These angels 'sinned', they 'kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation'. The reader is aware that the basic meaning of 'sin' is 'to miss the mark' (Judges xx. 16), and it is evident by the expansion of their sin given by Jude, that some of the angels appear to have 'kept not' and 'left' the position allotted to them by God and to have transgressed bounds which He, the Creator, had set.

The word translated 'to keep' in Jude 6 is tereo. It is employed by Paul when he speaks of keeping one's 'virginity' (I Cor. vii. 37); keeping one's self 'pure' (I Tim. v. 22); being preserved 'blameless' (I Thess. v. 23); Jude uses the word 5 times as follows:

> "Preserved in Jesus Christ"; "The angels which kept not"; "He hath reserved in everlasting chains"; "To whom is reserved the blackness of darkness"; and "keep yourselves in the love of God".

The angels therefore failed to keep themselves pure, they failed to preserve their integrity, they failed to keep the trust committed to them. Jude specifies the particular failure that was their sin, thus:

> "They kept not their first estate."

Alford translates this "Those which kept not their own dignity". Weymouth reads: "Those who did not keep the position originally assigned to them"; and Moffatt renders the passage "the angels who abandoned their own domain". The word translated in these various ways is the Greek arche 'beginning' (John i. 1); which in the plural is translated 'principalities' (Eph. i. 21).

These angels 'left their own habitation'. There are two words that are translated 'to leave' in the N.T. One aphiemi, which means to send away or dismiss; the other, various compounds of leipo, which are rendered lack, forsake, abandon, leave behind. The word used by Jude is apoleipo to leave away from one's self, to leave behind. Paul uses the word of 'the cloak' that he had left at Troas (II Tim. iv. 13), and of Trophimus, who had been left at Miletum sick (II Tim. iv. 20).

The word translated 'habitation' is oiketerion, a derivative of oikos 'a house' or a 'home', and occurs in II Cor. v. 2 where it refers to the resurrection body.

> "For in this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house (oiketerion) which is from heaven."

The Apostle contrasts 'the earthly house of this tabernacle' with 'the house which is in heaven', and earnestly desired the exchange. The angels that sinned left their 'own body' and Paul, speaking of the resurrection, says 'to every seed its own body' (I Cor. xv. 38). Before the seed is sown it is likened to 'bare' grain, gymnos 'naked' (I Cor. xv. 37); before the oiketerion is entered, the believer is looked upon as unclothed or 'naked' (II Cor. v. 3) and these are the only occurrences of gymnos in Paul's epistles. The angels, therefore, when they left their 'own' (idios) body, the one that was 'proper' (I Cor. vii. 7), and 'private' (II Pet. i. 20), descended to an unclothed condition, and so could be classed as 'naked'. The reader will now appreciate something of what is intended in Gen. iii. 1 where we read 'Now the serpent was more subtil', remembering that the word translated 'subtil' is the Hebrew arum, and the word translated 'naked', of our own unclothed parents, is the Hebrew word arom, both words being derived from the same root.

It would appear from the use made of such words as 'naked grain' 'not being found naked' and the conception of the resurrection as a condition that can be described as 'clothed upon', that man at his creation must be thought of likewise as 'naked grain', and that he would have continued as such without shame until the transformation took place, equivalent to resurrection, when being glorified and given his destined place above the angels, he would then have been 'clothed upon'. The coming in of sin and death however exposed man to the attack of the enemy, and so the Lord 'clothed' our first parents with coats of skin, symbols of the redemptive covering made by Christ until resurrection is attained. All mankind from Adam to the end of the race are conceived of as being 'naked', all need the covering provided by redeeming Love, and all who attain unto the resurrection of life and righteousness will at last find themselves fully clothed. These elements of truth that illuminate Gen. iii. must be kept in reserve until we are in a position to return to that chapter and read its story more closely in the light we are receiving.

The fact that oiketerion is used to speak of the resurrection body of the believer, and of that which the angels sinfully left, raises a question. In what way can we speak of the 'body' of an angel?

We must remember that the Apostle declares that 'flesh and blood' cannot inherit the kingdom of God, and that consequently at the resurrection we shall all be changed. We shall not however, put off a body to become pure spirit, we shall exchanged the body of our humiliation, for a body like unto the Lord's body of glory. "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body" (I Cor. xv. 44). At this, the Apostle paused, realizing apparently the need for explanation, so he adds 'there is a natural body and there is a spiritual body'.

> "A creature without any bodily form is wholly inconceivable, since that which is created can only work and subsist within the limits of time and space, and since corporeality alone confines the creature to time and space. God alone is infinite, an absolute Spirit. He alone exists above and beyond time and space." (Kurtz).
>
> "Only combining itself with matter can mind bring itself into alliance with the various properties of the external world; only thus can it find and be found, be known or employed, be detained or set at large . . . . . an unembodied spirit, or sheer mind of NOWHERE." (Fleming).
>
> "We might as well say of a pure spirit, that it is hard, heavy, or red, or that it is a cubic foot in dimensions, as say, that it is here and there, and that it has come and it is gone." (Taylor).

Among the 'Fathers' who ascribed corporeality to angels, are Origen, Caesarius, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian.

Now if it is possible for those whose bodies are at present flesh and blood to be translated to a place 'like unto the angels', as they will be at resurrection, then it is equally possible for angels to descend into the lower plane and possess bodies like unto men. When we read of the visit of the angels in Gen. xviii., they are described as 'men' whose 'feet' could be washed, and who could partake of a meal composed of 'butter, milk, cakes made on the hearth, and a young calf' (Gen. xviii. 1-8). Two of these 'men' turned their faces towards Sodom, and are then called 'two angels' in Gen. xix. Abraham, according to Heb. xiii., entertained angels unaware.

There is no indication of unreality about this record, and this and other appearances of angels in both the Old and the New Testament confirm the fact that they have bodies, but bodies which in their native sphere are invisible to the eye of man, but which can become visible when occasion so demands. We have therefore arrived at the following conclusion.

Angels have sinned. The sin of the angels associated with Noah and with the cities of Sodom and Gomorrha is partly to do with the forsaking of their own proper sphere, and of leaving the body natural to their state, and of descending to the human plane with bodies to all appearance at least like those of mankind. The fact that Peter connects the sin of these angels with the Flood, that God 'spared not' the angels, and 'spared not' the old world, establishes one link with Gen. vi. The sons of God who saw the daughters of men could have been angels.

Demon possession reveals the fact that fallen spirits can possess and use human bodies. We are not called upon to explain that which is outside of our province, but refer to this acknowledged fact as one possible answer to the difficulty that the angelic possession of human bodies creates.

No.18. Why Adam? Why a little lower than the angels?
pp. 54 - 57

In the fifty-third chapter of the prophet of Isaiah we read:

> "He shall see His seed, He shall prolong His days, and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in His hand. He shall see of the travail of His soul, and shall be satisfied" (Isa. liii. 10, 11).

He shall SEE two things. "His seed" and "the travail of His soul". The consequences being that He shall PROLONG His days, the PLEASURE of the Lord shall PROSPER, and He Himself shall be SATISFIED. Here we have related together 'seed', and 'satisfaction', and a purpose achieved in resurrection. Let us see what justification there is for such expressions, and let us work backwards through this passage, taking the last term first, 'satisfied'. It is the testimony of Scripture that true satisfaction cannot be experienced in this life (Eccles. i. 8; iv. 8) but that this more blessed state will be attained at the resurrection.

> "I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with Thy likeness" (Psa. xvii. 15).

The association of the words 'prosper' and 'seed' may not be very obvious to us at this remote period, but let it be remembered that Jeremiah had written concerning the wicked king:

> "Write ye this man childless, a man that shall not prosper in his days: for no man of his seed shall prosper, sitting upon the throne of David, and ruling any more in Judah" (Jer. xxii. 30).

In contrast with Coniah, the Saviour shall see His seed, and shall prosper. Again, 'pleasure' is associated with 'prospering', and so in Jer. xxii. 28 we read of Coniah:

> "Is he a vessel wherein is no pleasure? Wherefore are they cast out, he and his seed."

Resurrection, however, is at the end rather than at the beginning of the purpose of the ages, and we must retrace our steps so that we can understand something of the reason that make such a goal necessary. Let us go back to the period called 'before the foundation of the world' which we believe to refer to Gen. i. 1, but which all will accept as being before the advent of man on the earth. Before man, the Lord chose those who are to constitute the Church of the One Body in Christ, and He chose them that they should be blessed with every blessing that is spiritual, and enjoy them in heavenly places. If we had no knowledge of the purpose of the ages and its outworking, we might have thought that having thus chosen this company when the time came, that God would have called them into being 'holy and without blemish', placed them in heavenly places, endowed them with all spiritual blessings and secured them in Christ. What He did, however, was vastly different. After geological ages had passed since Gen. i. 1 He brought into being a man Adam, who being flesh and blood and of the earth earthy, could not inherit heavenly places nor enjoy spiritual blessings, for we are told specifically that he was not created 'spiritual' but 'natural' or soul-ical and earthy. There must have been an all sufficient reason for this extraordinary action of the Most High, and to the wisdom of this we bow, whether we understand it or not. There are, however, one or two considerations that may illuminate this reason and purpose which we will now state. Man differs from the angels, in more ways than one.

(1) He is 'lower'. This we learn from Psa. viii. and Heb. ii.
(2) He is 'flesh' and not spirit, and is of the earth earthy.

In these two particulars, man is seen at a disadvantage. But there are other things to be said of him.

(3) The angels are apparently independent creations. No angels stands in relation to another as parent or child.
(4) The specific purpose for the creation of man 'male and female' is that parenthood, childbirth and family relationships should be instituted.
(5) It is clearly indicated that angels do not marry, and that difference of sex among them is unknown.

It seems therefore that God would do a new thing. He created a man through whom "the seed" should come, and by the process of generation, all the seed should be 'one' in a sense that no group or company of spirits could ever be. This new movement had its dangers, which we might tabulate thus:

(1) If the choice of the seed was in any way occasioned by the fall of Satan and his angels, there was the possibility that man would be the object attack.
(2) If the production and preservation of a 'seed' be the supreme reason for the creation of man, then an attack must be expected upon that seed by Satan.
(3) Moreover, if all the seed are "In Adam", it becomes a possibility that with Adam's fall and disobedience all the seed would be involved.
(4) This we know to be the case; the attack took place in the garden of Eden and the immediate consequence was the consciousness of nakedness which implies the consciousness of sex. The first pronouncement of the Lord to Eve was to do with 'seed' and 'child bearing'.
(5) The first child born is named Cain, he turned out to be a murderer like his 'father', and is said in the N.T. to have been 'of that wicked one', even as some who were 'of Israel' were said to be of their father the devil.

These things must be given more detailed attention—we are but approaching this mighty theme here. It seems evident that at the creation of Adam, he became the repository of the true seed, even as it is taken for granted that Levi was in the loins of Abraham long before Levi was born (Heb. vii. 9, 10). It has been the custom of teachers and writers to speak of "The seed of the woman" as though there were a verse in Gen. iii. that used the term. What is actually said is:

> "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel" (Gen. iii. 15).

It must be admitted that this verse is never appealed to in the N.T. when speaking of the Virgin birth, but we would safeguard our testimony at once by saying that we most surely believe that Christ was born of a virgin. The one outstanding reference to Gen. iii. 15 found in the N.T. however, makes it inclusive of all the seed:

> "The God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly" (Rom. xvi. 20).

While therefore, the primal prophecy of Gen. iii. 15 specifically speaks of Christ, 'It shall bruise thy head', 'Thou shalt bruise His heel', Paul writing by equal inspiration speaks of all the seed that were in Him. It may be that by coming into the world of flesh and blood, the true seed would learn the lessons of good and evil as they could never learn them in any other way. A ready made experience can never be given to any one, and this experience plays a part in our spiritual make up. Our first father having involved the chosen seed in sin and death, the plan of the ages includes the great plan of redemption, in the course of which those who had thus fallen are translated out of the authority of darkness. They pass out of death unto life, from Adam to Christ. By 'reckoning' He became one with them in their sin and shame, so by 'reckoning' they became one with Him in Righteousness and Glory.

The story of the seed, its inception, its progress, its battles, and its ultimate victory is the story of the Bible. The epic story of Job is God's Preface to His Word. All else is subsidiary. Many there be that are physical descendants of Adam, who were never 'in Adam' in the true sense. In like manner, "They are not all Israel, which are of Israel" (Rom. ix. 6). Such live their lives, but having no 'Kinsman-Redeemer' do not come within the scope of the Divine purpose.

None of these things are here proven, they are touched upon only to introduce the subject. A more detailed examination must follow. If, however, the redemptive work of Christ is concentrated upon that seed of promise, we shall discover a consistent line of teaching running from Genesis to Revelation which will completely endorse the words of Isa. liii. "He shall see His seed . . . . . and be satisfied". If you, dear reader, feel dissatisfied with this goal of God, how do you account for the divergence. Universal reconciliation is blessedly true of 'all the seed', it is an enormity when extended to the seed of the wicked one, but this raises questions that must be considered as this series proceeds. Meanwhile, let no teaching of man rob you of the blessedness of this expected 'satisfaction'.

No.19. Enoch the seventh from Adam. Noah the eighth person.

pp. 75 - 80

The testimony of II Pet. ii. 4-6 and Jude 6, 7 leaves no room to doubt that there had been a fall among the angels and this fall was associated with leaving an appointed sphere. This sphere, oiketerion in the light of II Cor. v. 1, 2, reveals the fact that angels are not incorporeal spirits but, like the resurrection body of the believer, angels have 'spiritual bodies'.

We now proceed. Peter associates the sin of the angels with the deluge in the days of Noah, and both Peter and Jude link the fall of the angels with the sin and destruction of the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah. Peter speaks of Noah as 'the eighth person', Jude speaks of Enoch as 'the seventh from Adam'. There is an evident connection between these two patriarchs that calls for attention.

"Noah the eighth person." This according to classic usage means 'Noah, with seven others', and this is all that most commentators see in the reference. Noah is certainly not 'the eighth' in succession from Enoch who was 'the seventh from Adam', it therefore appears that some fuller meaning is to be attached to the enumeration by Peter, especially when we remember that in his first epistle when speaking of Noah and the ark he says 'wherein few, that is, eight souls were saved by water' (I Pet. iii. 20).

The subject of Bible Numerics is a dangerous one for any who are likely to let their imagination run riot, but this is no reason why the subject should be avoided; there are too many incontrovertible evidences of its designed presence in the Scriptures for that. Eight is the number of Resurrection, a new beginning. It is the octave in music, colour, and days of the week. The number eight enters into the Gematria of the name Jesus, the numerical value of its letters adding up to 888. In contrast with this, it will be observed that Noah was 600 years old when the flood came upon the earth, and at the first stroke of the 600th year 'in the 601st year in the 1st month, the 1st day of the month' (Gen. viii. 13) the waters of the Flood were dried. The numerical values of the names of Noah, Shem, Ham and Japheth add up to 936, and if the name of Ham be removed (he was associated with Canaan and the curse, Gen. ix. 22-26), the following is the result:

Noah	the letters of this name	equal	58
Shem		equal	340
Japheth		equal	490

We have therefore Noah the eighth person (II Pet. ii. 5); eight souls (I Pet. iii. 20) and the numerical value of Noah, Shem and Japheth 888, all of which stress the idea of a new beginning, a first day of a week, the octave.

Enoch was not only ‘the seventh from Adam’ according to birth, but he also marks a crisis in the development of affairs. Enoch, though living so many years before the Flood is nevertheless most intimately connected with it. First by the naming of his son, secondly by his prophetic denunciation of the ungodliness of his day, and thirdly by reason of his own personal and typical experience. When Enoch was 65 years of age a son was born to him, whom he named Methuselah, the meaning of which is ‘At his death it shall be’. Something therefore of extreme importance was to take place at the death of Methuselah. Noah, as we have already seen, was 600 years old when the Flood came. Lamech, his father, was 182 years of age when Noah was born, and Methuselah was 187 at the birth of Lamech (Gen. v. 25-32). We have therefore the following:

187 Age of Methuselah at birth of Lamech.
182 Age of Lamech at birth of Noah.
600 Age of Noah at the time of the Flood.
---
969 years

Now Gen. v. 27 tells us that ‘all the days of Methuselah were 969 years: and he died’, consequently the prophecy of Enoch was fulfilled to the letter. At his death (i.e. Methuselah’s) it shall be (i.e. the Flood). Incidentally, let us remember with gratitude that although Methuselah’s name must be for ever associated with judgment, yet seeing he lived longer than any other man has ever lived; it reveals the longsuffering of the Lord, as though God waited until He could wait no longer.

The second prophecy of Enoch is recorded in Jude 14, 15:

> “And Enoch also, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of these, saying, Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousands of His saints, to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against Him.”

Before we can understand the import of this prophecy, we must observe the general trend of the epistle in order to see the appositeness of Enoch’s witness. If we glance at the earlier verses of Jude we shall see not only a reference to human sin of a deep dye in the mention of Sodom and Gomorrah, but a reference also to angels who kept not their first estate, and are therefore reserved for judgment.

Looking to the end of the epistle, such outstanding apostates as Cain, Balaam and Korah are brought forward as examples of the mockers who shall come in the last times. It is time, therefore, that we consider the structure of the epistle to see just where Enoch’s prophecy comes.

It will be seen that Jude's testimony is directed to one point, viz., the judgment of the Lord upon ungodliness. Yet he ranges the whole of Scripture, and, by bringing forward the angels that sinned and Michael's rebuke of Satan, penetrates into depths beyond our experience. It is also evident that to lift Jude 14 and 15 out of its context and generalize thereupon, will not help us to understand truth.

Enoch's prophecy is connected with a sin in which not only men but Satan and fallen angels are involved. There is no reticence on Jude's part to indicate something of its evil character. The sin of the angels is likened to that of Sodom and Gomorrah, and those who follow in their evil train are likened to brute beasts that corrupt themselves, being called 'spots in the feasts of love'. Of both angels and men it is written that they have been 'reserved' in darkness for judgment (verses 6 and 13).

Ungodliness. We have long seen that the word 'ungodliness' and 'godliness' by reason of their antithesis in the epistles, and in the expression 'the mystery of godliness', must have a far deeper meaning than 'piety' or the lack of this virtue. This depth of meaning is evident in Jude's epistle where the three words asebeia, asebeo and asebes are found six times.

> "Ungodly men, who turned the grace of God into lasciviousness" (verse 4).
> "To convince all that are ungodly among them of their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, by ungodly sinners" (15).
> "Mockers . . . . . who . . . . . should walk after their ungodly lusts" (18).

The sin of angels, Sodom and Satan, together with the sin that shall be judged at the coming of the Lord, is denominated ungodliness. Peter confirms this, for in his second epistle he speaks of the angels that sinned in the time of Noah, and of Sodom, Gomorrah, and Balaam, and speaks of the Flood coming upon the world of the ungodly. Sodom and Gomorrah are examples of those that live ungodly; Lot is an example of the deliverance of the godly, and of the fire reserved by the Lord for the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men (II Pet. ii. and iii.).

A literal rendering of the words of Enoch must read: "Behold, the Lord came." While the true rendering of the aorist of the Greek verb is still somewhat of a moot point, the rightness of the above rendering is confirmed by the general usage and rendering of the A.V. The R.V. translates the word 'came' and puts no alternative in the margin. The interested student may test this translation by noting the occurrences of elthe (part of the verb erchomai, 'to come'), which is usually translated 'came'. If Enoch said 'Behold the Lord came' he must have been referring back to some judgment that was past when he spoke. To what could he refer? The judgment of the Flood had not then taken place, neither had judgment fallen upon Babel. The description given of the judgment could not refer to Gen. iii. or iv. To what then could it refer?

The reader will probably have traveled back in mind to Gen. i. 2 to the katabole kosmou 'the overthrow of the world'. This connection is more than countenanced by Peter in his second epistle which we have already found to be parallel with that of Jude.

The Second Coming and the overthrow (Gen. i. 2).

II Peter iii. 1 - 6.	Jude 17, 18.
"I stir up your pure mind by way of remembrance: That ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken by . . . the apostles of the Lord and Saviour . . . there shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts, and saying, Where is the promise of His coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue right through as they were from the beginning of the creation. For this they willingly are ignorant of, that by the Word of God the heavens of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water; whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished."	"Remember ye the words which were spoken before of the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ; how that they told you there should be mockers in the last time, who should walk after their own ungodly lusts."

Enoch took up this line of teaching. He too, uttered the solemn word: "Behold, the Lord came", and his reference to angels and Satan, as well as to man, removes any sense of disproportion. Enoch named his son Methuselah, which means, as we have seen, 'at his death it (namely, the Flood) shall be', and in the year that Methuselah died this judgment came. Jude now takes up Enoch's witness, coupled with Peter's words (II Pet. ii., iii.), and links together the overthrow of the world that then was, the flood of the days of Noah, and the Second Coming of the Lord, which shall be accompanied by fire. This is indeed a solemn aspect of the Coming of the Lord.

The first words of the Lord's answer to the disciples' question concerning the sign of His coming were:

> "Take heed that no man deceive you, for many shall come in My name, saying, I am the Christ; and shall deceive many" (Matt. xxiv. 4, 5).

Peter gives this warning in II Pet. ii.; so also does Jude whose citation of Enoch's prophecy we are studying. He says:

> "There are certain men crept in unawares, who were before of old ordained to this condemnation, ungodly men . . . . . woe unto them! they have gone in the way of Cain . . . . . Enoch . . . . . prophesied of these . . . . ." (Jude 4, 11, 14).

Scripture has given us warning that the teaching concerning the Coming of the Lord will not escape corruption.

"Ten thousands of His saints"—These words are used by Moses in the blessing of Israel:

> "The Lord came from Sinai, and rose up from Seir unto them; He shined forth from Mount Paran, and He came with ten thousands of saints: from His right hand went a fiery law for them" (Deut. xxxiii. 2).

There can be no doubt as to the meaning of the word 'saints' here. The law of Sinai we know from various Scriptures was mediated by 'angels' (Acts vii. 53; Gal. iii. 19; Heb. ii. 2).

> "The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels: the Lord is among them as in Sinai" (Psa. lxviii. 17).
>
> "A fiery stream issued and came forth from before Him; thousand thousands ministered unto Him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before Him" (Dan. vii. 10).
>
> "For the Son of man shall come in the glory of His Father with His angels" (Matt. xvi. 27; xxv. 31).
>
> "The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with His mighty angels" (II Thess. i. 7).

These quotations are sufficient to prove that the 'saints' or 'holy ones' of Enoch's prophecy are 'angels' and not the redeemed. This also is the meaning of Zech xiv. 5, "And the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with Thee", and of Joel iii. 11, "thither cause thy mighty ones to come down, O Lord", also of I Thess. iii. 13, "The coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all His saints".

COMING "FOR" AND "WITH" HIS SAINTS

There is a school of prophetic thought that stresses the coming of the Lord 'for' and the coming of the Lord 'with' His saints. Supposing for the purpose of argument we accept this view, how does it stand examination? The Thessalonians were waiting for God's Son from heaven (I Thess. i. 10), and exercising the patience of hope (i. 3). They were told that their loved ones who had died would not meet the Lord earlier or later than those living at the time, but that both living and dead would be caught up together to meet the Lord in the air (I Thess. iv. 15, 16). Well, then, what are we to make of I Thess. iii. 13:

> "To the end He may establish your hearts unblameable in holiness before God, even our Father, at the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ with all His saints."

If these ‘saints’ are His redeemed people, and if the Thessalonians were to wait for the Lord to come with all His redeemed people, then what place do the Thessalonians occupy? They were redeemed, they certainly were not the unwatchful who might have been left behind, for they were to be established ‘unblameable in holiness’, and if such can be left behind, who then shall go? The distinction between ‘coming for’ and ‘coming with’ excludes those to whom the Apostle wrote and contradicts the express statements of I Thess. iv. 15, 16 and v. 10. If we take I Thess. iii. 13 to speak of the ‘holy ones’, the ‘saints’ of Deut. xxxiii. and of Enoch’s prophecy, we have the coming of the Lord WITH His angels and FOR His people set before us with clearness and without contradictory statements.

It is interesting to note that the Sinaitic MS reads: “ten thousand of His holy angels.” The angels that shall come at the end of the age are doubtless the same that were instrumental in bringing about the overthrow of the first of Genesis and all the divine interpositions through the ages.

> “And the armies which were in heaven followed Him upon white horses, clothed in fine linen, white and clean . . . . . and the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet . . . . . These both were cast alive into a lake of fire burning with fire and brimstone” (Rev. xix. 14-20).

When once we are clear as to the fact that ‘the saints’ of Enoch’s prophecy are the holy angels, we begin to realize their relation in the context with the fallen angels. Moreover, the structure shows that Michael the archangel is placed in correspondence with the Lord and His angels, and both in conflict with Satan. Enoch’s prophecy, with its reference to Gen. i. 2, taken in conjunction with II Pet. iii., where it is stated that ‘the world that then was’ was destroyed by water, and the heavens and earth which are now shall be destroyed by fire, lifts the doctrine of the Second Coming into its true place in the purpose of the ages. There has been a tendency to look upon the Second Coming as a kind of afterthought, the next best thing that could be done in the circumstances. What we call ‘the Second Coming’ is demanded by the purpose of the ages, whether Israel received their Messiah and His prior presentation or not. Let the scoffers say what they will.

> “Behold the Lord CAME” (Jude 14), and
> “He that SHALL COME will come, and will not tarry” (Heb. x. 37).

Enoch’s rapture, or ‘translation’ and the complete cycle of time indicated by the 365 years (Gen. v. 23) is another prophetic element in the teaching associated with Enoch and Noah which has a bearing on this great theme.

No.20. "There were giants in the earth in those days" (Gen. vi. 4).

pp. 84 - 88

It is evident that Jude intends us to see a connection between the sin of the angels who left their first estate and who were reserved in everlasting chains, and the sin of the people of Sodom and Gomorrah who are set forth for an example suffering the vengeance of eternal fire. The connection is manifestly implied in the words 'Even as Sodom . . . . . in like manner', and the sin of the angels is reflected in the words 'going after strange flesh'. The word translated 'strange' is heteros 'other of another kind'. As we observe these things the impression deepens that Gen. vi. speaks of an unnatural connection between angels and the daughters of Adam, whose progeny were 'giants' and 'mighty men of old'. Let us now go back to Gen. vi. to examine its wording carefully.

Moses speaks of these 'sons of God' as though his readers were informed concerning their identity, and in this he was right. The book of Job was written before Moses was inspired to write Genesis, and in another series of studies we show what an influence this book of Job must have had upon Moses when he fled from Egypt to Midian.

Beni-ha-Elohim occurs in Job i. 6; ii. 1 and xxxviii. 7, where the context makes it clear that angels are intended. Indeed, the LXX translates these words angeloi 'angels' in each passage, and this was the accepted interpretation throughout the centuries. In Dan. iii. we have an instance where the words 'the son of God' is explained by the speaker himself to mean an 'angel':

> "Did we not cast three men bound into the midst of the first? . . . . . Lo, I see four men loose . . . . . and the form of the fourth is like the Son of God . . . . . God . . . . . hath sent His angel" (Dan. iii. 24-28).

Here we have a form like to 'a son of God', yet described on the one hand as one of 'four men' and on the other as an 'angel'. The Chaldee words bar 'son' and Elohim "God" are the equivalents of the Hebrew beni-ha-Elohim. While Nebuchadnezzar likens the son of God which he saw both to men and to angels, Gen. vi. places 'the daughters of men' over against 'the sons of God'. If the sons of God simply mean men who have descended from Seth, as some claim, the antithesis is strained and its implications untrue. Moreover, there is no logical connection between the intermarriage of the sons of Seth with the daughters of Adam, and the resulting progeny 'giants'; but if the sons of God were superhuman the remarkable and monstrous nature of their offspring is something to be expected.

We must, therefore, consider what the Scripture says of these 'giants'. We find that two distinct words are used, nephilim and rephaim.

The word nephilim is used only in Gen. vi. 4 and in Numb. xiii. 33 where it is translated 'giants'. This word is derived from naphal 'to fall' and its meaning, as applied to these sons of God, can be seen by referring to Isa. xiv. 12 "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning!" The Nephilim are mentioned twice in Numb. xiii. in the report of the spies, and their statements are too circumstantial to allow of spiritualizing:

> "We came unto the land . . . . . and this is the fruit of it. Nevertheless the people be strong that dwell in the land . . . . . we saw the children of Anak there . . . . . there we saw the giants, the sons of Anak, which come of the giants: and we were in our sight as grasshoppers, and so we were in their sight" (Numb. xiii. 27-33).

Thirty-eight years after, when Israel were about to enter the land or promise, Moses spoke of the opposition that awaited them, but reminded them that the Moabites and the Ammonites had dispossessed a people 'tall as the Anakim' which also were accounted giants (Deut. ii. 10, 11). The bedstead of Og, king of Bashan, which measured nine cubits long, was in Rabbath at the time of Moses' writing (Deut. iii. 11). Dr. Porter, says of these giants Cities of Bashan:

> "The rude architecture and simple structure of the houses, the immense blocks of roughly hewn basaltic stone of which they are built, seemingly hard and durable as iron, the prodigious thickness of the walls, the colossal stone doors, which turn not by hinges, but on stone pivots, and some of which are eighteen inches in thickness . . . . . all indicate their being reared by the hands and for the habitation of a race of great strength than ours—a mighty nation of giants" (Giant cities of Bashan).

In the days of David, men of giant stature were found among the Philistines, of whom Goliath of Gath is a well known example. The passages where 'giants' are mentioned in the O.T. other than Gen. vi. and Numb. xii. employ the words gibbor (Job xvi. 14), and rephaim (Deut. ii. 11, 20; iii. 11; I Chron. xx. 8, etc.). The word is used sometimes as the name of a people, as in Gen. xiv. 5 'smote the Rephaims', but even so the association in that same passage with the 'Zuzims' and the 'Emims' reveal that the 'giants' of Deut. ii. 11 are before us. In eight occurrences of the word rephaim, the identity of this people is hidden under the translation 'the dead' or 'deceased'. One of the proofs that this people are not the legitimate sons or seed of Adam, that they were never weakened as being 'In Adam', is that they are to have no resurrection.

In the day of Israel's restoration, the song that will be sung in the land of Judah looks back to the evil domination of the Rephaim:

> "Others lords beside Thee have had dominion over us . . . . . they are the Rephaim, they shall not rise; therefore hast Thou visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish" (Isa. xxvi. 13, 14).

In contrast with these Rephaims that have no resurrection, the song continues "Thy dead shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust: for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the Rephaim" (Isa. xxvi. 19).

One great objection to the idea that the sons of God were angels, is that it does not seem possible to think of marriage and children in their connection. First we have the statement of the Saviour: "In the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven" (Matt. xxii. 30). Here it is clear that angels who do keep their first estate and do not forsake their own habitation cannot be conceived of as entering into the marriage relationship. The teaching of II Pet. iii. and Jude however is that certain angels left this position, and consequently the changed condition and environment opens the way for any number of unsuspected possibilities. We have already referred to the evidence that would lead us to believe that the angels were not entirely disembodied, but like the resurrection bodies of the saints, their bodies would be 'spiritual'.

There is, however, no need to load the passage with unnecessary difficulties, for just as Satan possessed himself of the body of a serpent in Gen. iii., and just as demons can and did possess themselves of the bodies of men, so, the angels that left their own habitation, could have taken possession of the bodies of those men who had so far profaned the Name of the Lord as to have been abandoned or 'given up' (Rom. i. 24, 28) with dreadful consequences.

It appears from Gen. vi. 3 that Adam himself had become involved in the general degeneration, and God said:

> "My Spirit shall not always strive with man" that is in testifying against him, but judgment must ensue (Davidson).

The note in the Companion Bible at this point needs revision.

> "For that he also is flesh."

As it stands it looks as though the words 'is flesh' could be taken as part of the verb to err, Hebrew shagag, but every student knows that the word 'flesh' is basar. What is intended by the note in the Companion Bible is that the words 'for that also' could be a part of the verb shagag 'to err' and would indicate that by complicity with the erring of mankind Adam had become like the rest. Adam, however, was not cut off without opportunity for repentance. The longsuffering of the Lord gave him another 120 years of life.

The presence in the earth after the flood of Nephilim, Rephaim, Giants, Canaanites, Anakims and the like is not to be interpreted as though the Deluge failed in its purpose, but is to be read in the light of the words of Gen. vi. 4 "In those days; and also after that". Another irruption of the sons of God took place, concentrated more particularly on the land of promise, with the intention of occupying it with the false seed of their evil progeny, so that by the time Abraham reached the land of promise it could be written 'the Canaanite was then in the land' (Gen. xii. 6), with an intended emphasis on the word 'then'.

It is not our custom to seek confirmation of our teaching from pagan sources, but Gen. vi. 4 speaks of the offspring of the unholy union as 'mighty men which were of old, men of renown', and as we have so few names given in Gen. iv. and v., this reference by Moses must be to contemporary 'men of renown' in tradition and history. Bryant in his Analysis of Ancient Mythology traces all idolatry back to apostate perversions of the truth of the Deluge. "My purpose is", he said "to divest mythology of every foreign and unmeaning ornament, and to display the truth in its native simplicity; to show that all the rites and mysteries of the Gentiles were only so many memorials of their principal ancestors, and of the great occurrences to which they had been witness". "The history of Noah has been recorded by the ancients through their whole theology, but has been obscured by the many names and characters given him. He is Thoth, Hermes, Menes, Osiris, Atlas and Prometheus."

Greek mythology gives an important place to certain beings described as of a mingled heavenly and earthly origin, and called giants, titans, demigods, heroes. The reader will call to mind many heroes of Greek mythology who were said to be the offspring of the union of gods and men, for example, Achilles, was the only son of a goddess, and was invulnerable except in the heel. Another well-known figure in Greek mythology is Leda, the wife of a king of Sparta, with whom it is said Zeus fell in love, and visited her in the form of a swan. The result was the birth of the twins Castor and Pollux, and the famous or infamous "Helen of Troy".

In Greek mythology Uranos (the heavens) was the first king of the gods. The Titans, a family of giants, were the progeny of the union between Uranos and Ge (the earth), a very palpable reference back to the union of the sons of God with the daughters of men, and a possible corruption of 'the generations of the heavens and the earth' (Gen. ii. 4). These Titans rose in rebellion and were consigned to Tartarus. This last word takes us forward to II Pet. ii. 4, where we read "For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell" where the word translated 'cast down to hell' is the word tartaroo.

Tartarus is nowhere spoken in the Scriptures, except in this passage, but it evidently referred to a place that was known to the reader. If we refuse to admit the testimony of antiquity, we can assign no meaning to this term. According to the ancients, Tartarus was one of the regions of Hell, surrounded by a brazen wall, a place of intense cold and darkness. Æneas is said to have heard the dragging of the chains of those imprisoned therein. Tartarus was said to be so cold, that Plutarch explained it was so called because 'to shiver' was in the Greek 'to tartarize'. In the lowest pit of the dread abode were 'the subtartaris'd Titans', Titenes hupotarrarioi (Hesiod).

While we do not purpose pursuing this evident of acquaintance of the ancients with the facts of Gen. vi., the many parallels that can be discovered, together with the link formed by Peter's use of the pagan Tartarus, prevent us from dismissing the whole subject as irrelevant or meaningless. Dreadful things happened in the early days of this earth, desperate attempts to corrupt the seed, to prevent its continuance and to divert the early prophecy of Gen. iii. 15 away from the true Seed to the false, with all its corrupting effects, and these events in the infancy of the race left indelible marks on the minds of men.

No.21. The Preservation of the Seed of Noah.
pp. 111 - 113

In direct contrast with the prevailing corruption, the patriarch Noah stands out in the record of Gen. vi. as a notable exception.

> "But Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord" (Gen. vi. 8).

The wickedness of man was so great in the earth and every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually, that we read the extraordinary statement "and it repented the Lord that He had made man on the earth, and it grieved Him at His heart" (Gen. vi. 6). This word 'repented' challenges us. In what way can God be said to repent? This is not the only occasion when repentance is predicated of the Lord. At the intercession of Moses, the Lord repented of the evil which He had thought to do unto His people (Exod. xxxii. 14) and this repentance is repeated in the days of David (II Sam. xxiv. 16) and is commemorated in Psa. cvi. 45. It was the complaint of Jonah that he knew full well that God being merciful would repent if only Nineveh would turn to Him (Jonah iii. 9, 10; iv. 2). These gracious repentings we can perhaps understand, but it is strange to read that the Lord repented that he had made man.

In the first place we may say that 'repenting' and 'being grieved at the heart' are instances of the figure of speech known as Anthropopatheia a figure which ascribes human attributes to God. The Hebrews called this mode of speech Derek Benai Adam, the way of the sons of man, or Paul says, who was himself a Hebrew, 'I speak after the manner of men', and without such condescension on the part of God man could never apprehend His revelation. But conceding all this, admitting that the use of such parts of the body as face, nostrils, eyes, ears and hands are accommodations to our limitations, we nevertheless believe that they stand for realities, even though we can affix to such spiritual realities no human name. In like manner, while we may not take the words grief, anger, jealousy and other similar affections and feelings at their surface value, we nevertheless know that they stand for something equivalent on this high plane of Divine experience.

Consequently we are to gather from Gen. vi. 6, that something of extreme antipathy to the purpose of God at creation had come in and spoiled the work of God's hands, grieved His heart, and made Him repent that He had made man. In the language of the parable the reason is found in the fact 'that an enemy hath done this'. Throughout the Bible we have the consequences of a conflict, a conflict between good and evil, darkness and light, God and Satan, and that the Bible is intensely real, making demands upon the wisdom and power of the Almighty and culminating in the sparing not of His Beloved Son. If such inroads had been made into the nature of mankind by the evil one that it could be said 'that all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth', then God must act and act drastically if the situation were to be saved.

The word translated 'corrupt' in Gen. vi. 11 and 12, and the word translated 'destroy' in Gen. vi. 17 is the Hebrew shachath. "The only remedy was to destroy it (de facto) as it had become destroyed (de jure)" (Companion Bible). At the time of the sounding of the seventh angel, the wheel has come full circle, "As it was in the days of Noah" and we read that the time had come to "destroy them which destroy (or corrupt) the earth" (Rev. xi. 18).

Standing separate and almost alone in the midst of well nigh universal corruption was the man Noah. It is not without significance that the name Noah is derived from the self same Hebrew word translated 'repent'. The Hebrew word is nacham and is found for the first time in Scripture in the words of Lamech "this same shall comfort us" (Gen. v. 29) and refers to the Ark and the Flood. The next occurrence of nacham is in Gen. vi. 6 where it is written 'it repented the Lord'. The reason why this one Hebrew word can have such opposite meanings is that primarily nacham means 'a change of mind or affection' and obviously the mind may change sometimes in one way, sometimes in another. God changed His mind regarding mankind as a whole and destroyed them; He changed His mind about Noah in particular and saved him.

What constituted the essential difference between Noah and the rest of mankind? We shall find upon examining the testimony of Israel that they are denounced as wicked, corrupt and evil, yet even though enemies because of the gospel, they are beloved because of the fathers 'for the gifts and calling of God are without repentance" (Rom. xi. 29). Israel, for all their sins were the chosen seed, and so will be saved. Even after the Flood, the words are written "I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake; although (Heb. ki) the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth" (Gen. viii. 21). What was it, therefore, that the Lord saw in the generation before the flood that demanded total destruction? It was the corrupting of the seed, and it is the separation of Noah from this corruption that marks him out in Gen. vi., not simply that he was not so sinful:

> "These are the generations of Noah; Noah was a just man and perfect in his generations, and Noah walked with God" (Gen. vi. 9).

Noah, like Enoch 'walked with God', but this was not all, Noah found 'grace', the first to so find in all Scripture, but moreover Noah was 'perfect in his generations'. As the word 'generations' occurs twice in this passage let us note that the first word is a translation of toledoth 'family history' and can read either forward or backward, can speak of either one's ancestors or of one's descendants, but the second word is a translation of the Hebrew dor which refers to Noah's contemporaries, the men living at the same time as himself. With regard to his contemporaries Noah was 'perfect'. This word, which translates the Hebrew tamim means 'without blemish' and primarily refers to physical, not moral perfection. It is in constant use to describe the blemishless character of a sacrificial animal (Exod. xii. 5; Lev. i. 3).

Job was described as 'perfect' as well as upright (Job i. 1, 8; ii. 3), and Jacob is described as a 'plain' man (Gen. xxv. 27), using the same word as is employed in Job and 'undefiled' is the translation of the word in Song of Solomon v. 2. The testimony of

Gen. vi. 9 is that Noah was uncontaminated so far as his pedigree was concerned, and the channel through which the Seed of the Woman could come, though narrowed down by the well nigh universal corruption that had set in, was still preserved.

As we proceed with the history of the Seed of the Woman, we can assemble a series of Divine interpositions, each one marked by its own peculiar character, and together building up a system of teaching that points irrevocably to Christ.

(1) While no supernatural intervention is to be supposed in Gen. iii. 15, the fact that the seed Who should bruise the serpent's head is called "Her Seed" is suggestive.

(2) The Seed is in the second place bound up with vicarious suffering; His "Heel" shall be wounded in the conflict with the Serpent.

(3) Ultimate victory is prophesied for the Seed of the Woman, for although in the conflict He shall be wounded in the "Heel", it is the "head" of the serpent that is bruised.

(4) The next principle that emerges is the principle of substitution. The attack upon Abel is countered by the "appointment" of "Seth" or as the Hebrew reads God hath "sethed" me another seed. Seth was appointed "instead of Abel whom Cain slew" (Gen. iv. 25).

(5) The sending of the Flood, and the destruction of every living person except "the eight souls" preserved in the Ark, or as Peter puts it, God "spared not the old world, but saved Noah", reveals the solemn fact that the question of numbers does not enter into the plan. If the seed can be preserved, though it cost the destruction of millions, the Lord will do it. If such a conclusion should appear harsh let us remember that the selfsame word "spare" is used of Christ. "He that spared not His own Son".

(6) The provision of the Ark introduces into the record another aspect of the Redemptive side of the story of the seed. It is common knowledge with students that the noun and verb "pitch it within and without with pitch" (Gen. vi. 14) employs the word kaphar and kopher which are used by Moses and the rest of the O.T. Scriptures for the propitiation made by the sacrificial offerings, indicating in fuller measure the nature of the "bruising" that should be received in the conflict with the serpent. "It pleased the Lord to bruise Him" said Isaiah, showing that even though "wicked hands" took and crucified the Son of God, that bruising of His heel was at the same time the sacrificial offering made for sin.

(7) Finally, or at least so far as we have gone, the preservation of the seed is associated with newness of life, resurrection ground, the beginning of a new world, and a new day. This is forced upon the attention of the reader throughout the record of the Deluge, as we have already seen, by the fact that the date when the Ark rested on one of the mountains of Ararat, namely the seventeenth day of the seventh month, became after the revision of the calendar at the Passover (Exod. xii. 2), the "third" day after the offering of the Passover on the fourteenth day of the month, and so the very day of the Saviour's resurrection. The emphasis upon the "first year", the "first month" and the "first day" in Gen. viii. 13 carries the idea forward, while the numerical features associated with Noah and his family, each emphasizing the number "eight" and the commencing of a new period, rounded off this testimony to resurrection and newness.

Although the purpose of God concerning the Seed was so far safeguarded, the words already noted in Gen. vi. 4 "also after that" prepare us for further conflict. This will appear as we continue our study.

No.22. "Abraham, The Hebrew."
pp. 125 - 129

When Noah and his family stepped out from the Ark, they stepped out into a world that was empty and devoid of life, a miniature of the condition 'without form and void' that prevailed after the flood of Gen. i. 2, and to them the words uttered at the creation of Adam were repeated:

> "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth" (Gen. ix. 1).

The dominion given to Adam was passed on to Noah in modified terms, and instead of the sun, moon and stars being indicated as 'signs' (Heb. oth) the rainbow was appointed for a 'token' (Heb. oth). This is another feature that we must remember, namely the changed 'tokens' that accompany the dispensational changes that mark the onward story of the Seed. If the Seed is to continue, it must of necessity come through Noah and one of his sons. The blessing pronounced in Gen. ix. 26, 27 indicates that the choice fell upon Shem.

> "Blessed be the Lord God of Shem . . . . . He shall dwell in the tents of Shem."

Japheth was the eldest brother (Gen. x. 21; I Chron. i. 5) but grace seldom recognizes any precedence in the flesh. Consequently we find the generations of Shem lead on to Terah and so to Abraham (Gen. xi. 10-32).

> "Unto Shem also, the father of all the children of Eber, the brother of Japheth the elder, even to him were children born" (Gen. x. 21).

The additional note "the father of all the children of Eber" calls for attention. No such clause follows the reference either to Japheth or to Ham. Moreover, we observe that Eber himself is not mentioned again until verse twenty-four. Shem had five sons, and Eber is the descendant of Arphaxad, the third of those that are named in Gen. x. 22. Now Eber had two sons, Peleg, so named because in his day the earth was divided, and Joktan. Joktan's descendants are here named, but Peleg's descendants are reserved until the generations of Shem are given in Gen. xi. 10, where Joktan finds no place. The line of the Seed therefore from Noah, runs as follows: Noah, Shem, Arphaxad, Eber, Peleg and so on to Terah, the father of Abram.

The record of Gen. x. is the record of the Nations, and the words "By these were the nations divided in the earth" show that the settlement of the nations and the lands inhabited by them is the important theme. It is the descendants of Joktan and their lands that is recorded in Gen. x., whereas, in Gen. xi., Joktan is omitted and the generations of Peleg are given in detail. This proves to be of the utmost importance, for this is the line of the true seed. Our attention therefore is called to the fact that the line of Joktan does not exhaust the descendants of Shem. The two names Eber and Peleg demand our attention. The Hebrew name Eber means 'beyond', and occurs in such phrases as 'beyond Jordan', 'on this side Jordan' or 'on the other side Jordan' (Gen. l. 10; Numb. xxii. 1; Josh. ii. 10). The verb abar means 'to pass' or 'to pass over' and is often used in connection with the passing over of the Israelites into the land of Canaan (Deut. xii. 10; Josh. iii. 16). In Gen. xiv. 13 Abraham is called 'The Hebrew'. This is partly explained in Josh. xxiv. 2 and 3:

> "Your fathers dwelt on the other side of the flood . . . . . I took your father Abraham from the other side of the flood."

This 'flood' is the River Euphrates, the word translated 'flood' being the same as that which is rendered 'river' meaning the River Euphrates (Josh. i. 4). The LXX translates Abraham 'the Hebrew', by the words ho perates "The one who crossed over", the word peran being employed in Gen. l. 10 and Josh. ii. 10 cited above. While therefore Eber had many descendants, Abraham stands out pre-eminently not only as one descendant out of many, but as the one who fulfilled the meaning of the name.

Peleg, too, is associated with rivers, and is so translated nine times, and once 'stream' in the O.T. (e.g. Psa. i. 3). Job uses the word palag when he speaks of God "Who hath divided a watercourse" (Job xxxviii. 25). The same form of the word, pelaggah is twice translated 'divisions' (Judg. v. 15, 16) and once 'rivers' (Job xx. 17). Rivers formed natural boundaries in ancient days, so much so that in English the word 'rival' comes from the idea that men living on opposite banks of a river would be 'divided' in their loyalties.

It is not true to say that the words of Gen. xi. 25 'the earth was divided' cannot refer to the division of the earth as an inheritance, but only to some geological division as that which has formed the continents, for the feminine form of both the Hebrew and the Chaldee is employed to speak of the division of both 'families' and of 'the priests' (II Chron. xxxv. 5; Ezra vi. 18).

In Peleg's day the earth was divided among the Nations, 'according to the number of the children of Israel' (Deut. xxxii. 8). The reader will discover that there are seventy nations mentioned by name in Gen. x., and the words "When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when He separated the sons of Adam, He set the bounds of the peoples according to the number of the children of Israel" have regard to that number seventy:

> "Seventy souls went down with Jacob into Egypt, that they might restore the seventy families dispersed by the confusion of tongues. For these seventy souls were equal to all the families of the whole world" (Zohar).
>
> "How good is thy love toward Me, O thou congregation of Israel! It is more than that of the seventy nations" (Targum on the Song of Solomon).

So conscious was Israel of this high place, and so equally conscious that the Gentile nations would be provoked should they realize it, that we find the LXX reads 'according to the number of the angels of God', for the Gentile world would not know that to each nation had been appointed an angel, as is indicated in Dan. x. 'the prince of Grecia', 'the prince of the kingdom of Persia' and 'Michael your prince'.

So precious in the sight of God is "The Seed", He counts the seventy souls that went down into Egypt who formed the nucleus of the nation of Israel of more importance than the whole seventy nations that inhabited the rest of the world, and in order to appreciate this concentration of the Lord's care, we must continue the story of the generations until we arrive at Abraham, the father of the great nation, whose seed is promised in Gen. xii. 7. While both Joktan and Peleg are mentioned in Gen. x. 25, Peleg only appears in the genealogy of Gen. xi. 10-26, for the seed only is there in view. The line is then pursued from Eber through Peleg to Terah, the father of Abraham.

Man's attempt 'to make a name', and the consequent scattering (Gen. xi. 1-9) was but another attempt to frustrate the purpose of God. The word 'name' is actually in the Hebrew 'Shem'. "The chapter begins with man's attempt to unify mankind, and ends with God's new provision to unify all in blessing with Abraham's seed" (The Companion Bible). When we reach the generations of Terah, we are at the central generation of the eleven which are found in the book of Genesis. In both the conclusion of Shem's genealogy (Gen. xi. 26) and the opening of Terah's, Abraham's name stand first, although as subsequent study will reveal, Abraham' was not the eldest of Terah's sons. Like Shem, Abram, is put first because he was the chosen channel of the Seed.

For the first time there now appears the statement that any woman was 'barren', and this is said of Sarai, Abram's wife.

"But Sarai was barren; she had no child" (Gen. xi. 30). So into the story of the coming Seed is now interposed human inability in order that there may be demonstrated that the true seed is indeed of God. The word translated 'barren' aqar signifies a mere stock or stem without branches, a dry tree. Bateman says of Eccles. iii. 2 where the A.V. reads 'a time to pluck up'; 'to lop, as trees, cut them close to the stock or stem'. This supernatural element is emphasized later in the story of Ishmael and Isaac, and a definite reference is made to it in Rom. ix. where we read "In Isaac shall thy seed be called, that is, They which are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God: but the children of the promise are counted for the seed" (Rom. ix. 7, 8).

Immediately following the statement concerning Sarai's barrenness comes the record of Terah's trek toward Canaan and his tarrying and death at Haran. We learn from Stephen in Acts vii. 2, that "The God of glory appeared unto our father Abraham, when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran". Terah, it would appear, was moved by the revelation given to his sons, and 'took' Abram, Lot and Sarai, but by so doing contravened the distinct commandment "Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred". Moreover, although 'they went forth' from Ur of the Chaldees "to go into the land of Canaan", they did not accomplish this purpose for we read "they came into Haran, and dwelt there". This partial obedience to the separating command of God will be met again. For example in Exod. viii. 25 where Pharaoh substituted for the three days journey "Go ye, sacrifice to your God in the land". "Sacrifice to the Lord your God in the wilderness: only ye shall not go very far away" (Exod. viii. 28).

According to Heb. xi., Abraham when he obeyed God did not know the land that God had promised him, and so the language of Gen. xi. 31 written after the event must be considered as supplemental. Terah, whose name among other meanings seems to be 'wanderer', was evidently moved by the call that had come to his son, but the thing to be noticed is that although he made that trek from Ur of the Chaldees as far north as Haran, he never 'passed over' the Euphrates. After six hundred miles separation from Ur, he still dwelt in the same country and had in reality made no essential change. Terah's movement is like many religious movements, they fail in essentials. They change from one denomination to another, but remain a denomination all the same. Abraham was called 'The Hebrew' for he passed over the dividing river. Terah was never a 'Hebrew'. He came out of Ur, but he died in Haran, a city of the same country. He had but changed one denomination for another. Terah died in Haran, and until he died he was a hindrance to faithful obedience.

Terah represents the 'old man' who can be religious and do almost everything except 'pass over'. Only when the old man dies can the believer rise and walk in newness of life. We are, however, tracing the history of the Seed and must not allow ourselves too many doctrinal excursions, but the reader will doubtless perceive that the spiritual history of the individual believer finds an echo many times in the record of the Seed and its conflict.

No.23. Cain and Canaan were both "of that wicked one".
pp. 144 - 148

As the different attacks are made by the enemy upon the life and purity of the true seed, certain terms are introduced which mark the spiritual side of the conflict and reveal the character of the provision and protection afforded by the Lord. These we shall have to consider together as a whole when we have pursued this theme further, but the reader may be helped by an anticipation of this particular study. Certain words and phases emerge as the story of the seed progresses, and the following will indicate the nature of this particular aspect of truth.

(1) The first prophecy of the Seed. Gen. iii. 15.
The bruising of head and Heel.

(2) The second reference, Seth. Gen. iv. 25.
"Instead." The principle of substitution.

(3) The third reference, Noah. Gen. v. 29.
"Comfort" because of "curse".

(4) The fourth reference, The Ark. Gen. vi. 14.
Propitiation (Pitch).

(5) The fifth reference, barrenness. Gen. xi. 30.
The flesh set aside.

These items will give the reader some idea of what we intend, but the above list is temporary, and must be revised when the subject is considered as a whole. At the moment we are concerned with the onward progress of the true seed, and have reached the moment when, at the death of Terah, Abram was free to 'pass over' and become 'Abraham the Hebrew'.

At Gen. xii., the nations of the earth go into the background and only come into the record as they touch the land and people of Israel. The channel through which the Seed should come is now narrowed down to one man, a descendant of Shem, and to that man a promise was given of a land as well as of a seed, for they were to become a nation.

> "Unto thy seed will I give this land" (Gen. xii. 7).

The delay occasioned by the action of Terah was seized upon the enemy and this will be made clear if we put two passages together:

> "And Terah took Abram . . . . . to go into the land of Canaan; and they came unto Haran, and dwelt there" (Gen. xi. 31).
>
> "And Abram . . . . . went forth to go into the land of Canaan; and into the land of Canaan they came . . . . . and the Canaanite was then in the land" (Gen. xii. 5, 6).

Before we can rightly proceed, some understanding of the Scriptural meaning and intent of 'the Canaanite' is called for, for it is evident that this people were Satan's countercheck to the Divine plan. Canaan, was one of the sons of Ham, his brothers being Cush, Mizraim and Phut (Gen. x. 6). From Cush came Nimrod, the beginning of whose kingdom was Babel, and from Canaan sprang Sidon, Heth and the Jebusite, the Amorite and others who became known as 'Canaanites'. The circumstances of the birth of Canaan are unrevealed, but the record of Gen. ix. 20-29 is highly significant and calls for examination.

> "And Noah began to be an husbandman, and he planted a vineyard" (Gen. ix. 20).

Now this may be an innocent straightforward statement, containing no hidden or ulterior meaning; and yet, we ask, why does the Scripture use this form of speech, and say "He began to be"? The reader will remember that we found it necessary to retranslate Gen. iv. 26 "Then began men to call upon the name of the Lord", by "Then men profanedly called upon the name of the Lord". We find this word 'began' in the opening of that ominous passage Gen. vi., when the sons of God saw the daughters of men, and when there were giants in the earth. We observe that this same word 'began' is used of Nimrod, the rebel. "He began to be a mighty one" (Gen. x. 8). At the building of the tower of Babel, the Lord said "this they begin to do" (Gen. xi. 6), so that we find that in the space of Gen. i.-xi., which covers the history of the ancient world, from creation to Abraham, chalal occurs five times, each occurrence being associated with an attack upon the purpose of God, either by the profaning of the name of the Lord, the irruption of the sons of God, the founding of Babel, or by this reference to Noah.

There is evidence that at the Flood such disturbance took place as to alter materially meteorological conditions, and what before had provided 'wine that maketh glad the heart of God and man' now, for the first time fermented, with the result that 'Noah was drunken' (Gen. ix. 21), and not only so 'naked' or 'uncovered'. Noah, in many ways takes the place of Adam in the earth. A comparison of Gen. ix. with what had previously been said of Adam will reveal several similarities. Among them let us notice, Adam and Noah are both associated with a garden 'planted', indeed the Hebrew word nata 'to plant' occurs in Gen. i.-xi. but twice, namely at Gen. ii. 8 "The Lord God planted a garden" and here in Gen. ix. 20. Noah's downfall is connected with an act 'he drank of the wine', even as the fall of Adam is connected with eating the fruit of the forbidden tree. In both cases, there is a strange sequel. Adam and Noah are found 'naked', the only references to nakedness in this early section of Genesis. Adam covered his nakedness with fig-leaves, Shem and Japheth covered the nakedness of their father with a garment. God subsequently clothed Adam with a coat of skin. The enmity between the two seeds is revealed to Adam, and the earth is cursed for his sake. When Noah awoke, he strangely cursed, not Ham, but the son of Ham, Canaan, who was doomed to be a servant of servants.

At the door of the garden of Eden the Lord caused the cherubim to 'tabernacle' ('placed' Gen. iii. 24), and Noah continuing his prophecy, said "He (the Lord) shall dwell ('tabernacle') in the tents of Shem" (Gen. ix. 27). These again being the only occurrences of shaken 'to dwell' or 'tabernacle' in Gen. i.-xi. These parallels are on the surface, but there are more, not so plainly stated but nevertheless implied.

Is it not illuminating that immediately consequent upon the fall of man, the Lord should speak of child-birth (Gen. iii. 16), and is it not equally illuminating that Noah should speak of Canaan the child of Ham himself? In the case of Adam and Eve, there is the positive statement that "Cain, who was of that wicked one" (I John iii. 12), but nothing positive is said of Canaan, yet by the time one has read all that is written of the Canaanites, there is no room left for doubting that of Canaan it could have been written 'Canaan was of that wicked one' also.

In the record of Gen. iii., Adam is accompanied by his wife who is named and addressed. In Gen. ix., the wife of Noah is not specifically mentioned, but, when we remember that the expression "thy father's nakedness" (Lev. xviii. 8) is definitely said to be that of "thy father's wife", and when we further know that the words spoken of Noah 'to be uncovered' (Gen. ix. 21) are the same as those used in Lev. xviii., the sin of Ham begins to assume a more serious aspect, a 'sin that brought with it a curse' as we can see by reading Deut. xxvii. 20. It appears from the combined testimony of these several passages, that Ham was guilty of the same sin as that of Reuben (Gen. xlix. 3, 4) where the word 'defiled' translates the Hebrew chalal already examined.

If Ham, like Reuben, taking advantage of his father's drunkenness was guilty of incest, the door was flung open once more for the Evil One to sow his seed, and the Canaanite was the dreadful result. The Canaanite would therefore take the place occupied by the 'giants' before the Flood, and because the Seed was now known to be destined to come through Abraham, the Canaanite was concentrated in advance in the land of promise.

The meaning of the word Canaan is something 'low' and in a secondary sense a merchant, trafficker or trader. The name 'Canaan' carries with it the debasement pronounced by Noah as the following passages which use the verb kana will show. 'To bring low' (Job xl. 12); 'To subdue' (I Chron. xvii. 10); 'To bring into subjection' (Psa. cvi. 42). Their name reveals their end, the Canaanites, whether physical or spiritual, must one day be subjected beneath the feet of the Victorious Seed of the woman.

When the time came for Isaac, the true seed, to be provided with a wife, Abraham made his servant sware by the God of heaven and by the God of earth, that he would not take a wife for Isaac of the daughters of the Canaanites (Gen. xxiv. 3, 37). The Canaanites were to be driven out of the land of promise by Israel (Exod. xxiii. 28-30); and by the Lord (Deut. vii. 1); and were to be utterly destroyed (Deut. xx. 17). Something of the horror with which this evil seed was held can be gathered by reading the whole of Ezra ix. and x. This we cannot reproduce here; the extract given does not produce upon the mind the reading of the whole passage:

> "The people . . . . . have not separated themselves from the people of the lands, doing according to their abominations, even of the Canaanites . . . . . the holy seed have mingled themselves with the people of those lands" (Ezra ix. 1, 2).

The land is said to have spued out the nations that inhabited Canaan, and that the very land was defiled by their abominable customs (Lev. xviii. 24-30). Such are the Canaanites, and one can feel the relief in the prophet's mind when he said:

> "In that day there shall be no more the Canaanite in the house of the Lord of Hosts" (Zech. xiv. 21).

An illuminating chapter in reference to the Canaanites and the possession of the land, is Deut. ii. There, not only Israel but the Moabites, the children of Esau and the Ammonites, all blood relations of Israel, find their possession already occupied by Emim and Anakim 'a people great, and many, and tall'; 'giants dwelt therein in old time'. These the Lord destroyed before them and they succeeded them, and this is put forward as being parallel with the case of Israel.

> "As Israel did unto the land of his possession, which the Lord gave unto them" (Deut. ii. 12).

Later in the experience of Abraham, he was to learn that there must be a waiting period during which his seed should suffer affliction in a strange land, and this because 'the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full' (Gen. xv. 16). If we admit the sovereign right of the Lord to destroy the corrupted people of the earth by a flood, and if we admit His justice in destroying the wicked cities of Sodom and Gomorrha, if we admit His patience and long suffering while He waited for the Amorite to fill up the measure of his iniquity, we can accept the revealed fact that Israel was chosen as the destroying agent of this foul progeny of wickedness, who in their turn typify the 'spiritual wickednesses' that oppose those whose blessings are to be enjoyed, not in the land of Canaan, but in 'heavenly places'.

No.24. Flesh v. Spirit, as set forth in Gen. xii. - xxii.
pp. 165 - 169

The story of the seed, as it is connected with the life of Abraham brings into prominence several new principles, and the passage that covers the active life of Abraham, namely Gen. xii.-xxii. must therefore be studied. Gen. xii. contains the promises "In thee shall all families of the earth be blessed"; "unto thy seed will I give this land" (Gen. xii. 3, 7); and again in Gen. xxii. we read:

> "In thy seed shall all nations of the earth be blessed" (Gen. xxii. 18).

In Gen. xii. 1 Abraham was commanded to 'get out' of his land, and in Gen. xxii. 2 he was commanded to 'get into' the land of Moriah. So Abraham 'departed' (Gen. xii. 4) and 'went' (Gen. xxii. 3) where the same Hebrew words are used. In Gen. xii. we see that Abraham, with some trepidation, went down to Egypt to sojourn there. In Gen. xxii., with triumphant faith, Abraham went to Beersheba and dwelt there.

On two separate occasions, two Gentile monarchs took Sarah the wife of Abraham, and were prevented from interfering with the advent of the true seed by Divine interposition. First, being fearful of famine, Abraham took Sarah to Egypt where she was taken from him into the house of Pharaoh (Gen. xii. 15). In the second instance, again going on toward the south (Gen. xii. 9; xx. 1), Sarah is taken by Abimelech, king of Gerar, and once again any interference is checked by Divine interposition (Gen. xx. 3-7). In both cases Abraham resorts to half the truth by describing his wife as his 'sister'. The house of Pharaoh is plagued because of Sarai and Abimelech is spoken to by God in a dream, Who said to him:

> "Behold, thou art but a dead man, for the woman which thou hast taken; for she is a man's wife" (Gen. xx. 3).

"What is this thou hast done unto me?" asked Pharaoh (Gen. xii. 18). "What hast thou done unto us?" demanded Abimelech (Gen. xx. 9).

Here are parallel incidents in which Sarah is taken into the harem of the king, and but for Divine intervention the seed would have been corrupted. It is of supreme importance moreover to observe the fact that the first occurrence in Genesis of the verb 'to sin' is Gen. xx. 6 and that the specific 'sin' is not given in detail until we reach Gen. xxxix. 9 where Joseph is importuned by Potiphar's wife! It is impossible to ponder these passages and to avoid the conclusion that two direct attacks were made upon Sarah and through her upon the seed. Time went on, and after the victory gained by Abraham over the kings that took his nephew Lot captive, the fact that Abraham still remained childless is brought into prominence (Gen. xv. 2). The inspired commentary upon the birth of Isaac is given by Paul in Rom. iv., where we read:

> "(As it is written, I have made thee a father of many nations), before Him Whom he believed, even God, Who quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be not as though they were. Who against hope believed in hope, that he might become the father of many nations, according to that which was spoken, So shall thy seed be. And being not weak in faith, he considered not his own body now dead, when he was about an hundred years old, neither yet the deadness of Sarah's womb; he staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief; but was strong in faith, giving glory to God" (Rom. iv. 17-20).

This passage passes over in silence the intrusion of the flesh that brought Ishmael into the world, but that was another attempt by the enemy, for Hagar was an 'Egyptian', a descendant of Ham, even as were Pharaoh (Gen. xii.) and Abimelech the Philistine (Gen. xx.).

A further comment by Paul is found in Rom. ix., where he says, "In Isaac shall thy seed be called. That is, they which are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God: but the children of the promise are counted for the seed" (Rom. ix. 7, 8), and in Gal. iv. 21-31 the Apostle points to the allegory of the two sons, the son of the freewoman, Isaac, the son of the bondwoman, Ishmael. Here are lifted out into prominence, several important features:

(1) The 'deadness' of both Abraham and Sarah, and the utter inability of the flesh.
(2) That the seed can be brought forth only in resurrection power; and that
(3) Natural descendants are not to be considered 'the seed' but only the children of promise; and that
(4) Such are 'counted for' the seed.

The subject is of such importance that we must tarry to examine Gen. xii.-xxii. with special reference to these four aspects of the subject.

At the creation of man in the beginning, and again at the recommencement after the flood, God said "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth" (Gen. i. 28; ix. 1). The words "Be fruitful, and multiply" were repeated to Jacob upon the changing of his name to Israel (Gen. xxxv. 11), but it will be noticed that this blessing was given to Jacob after all but one of his many children had been born, and so would apply to his posterity. Ishmael too for Abraham's sake has the same blessing granted to him (Gen. xvi. 10; xvii. 20). Isaac was told that his seed should multiply as the stars of heaven (Gen. xxvi. 4, 24). To Ishmael and to Abraham the word is duplicated in the original 'multiplying I will multiply' (Gen. xvi. 10; xxii. 17).

The reader will be able to supplement these instances by many more from the Law and the Prophets, but it is a law of arithmetic that is true for all time that nothing multiplied by any number still remains nothing. Now Abraham was past age, Sarah was barren, yet there sprang 'even of one, and him as good as dead, so many as the stars of the sky in multitude, and as the sand which is by the seashore innumerable' (Heb. xi. 12). Abraham not only believed in God 'Who quickeneth the dead' but in God 'Who calleth those things which be not as though they were' (Rom. iv. 17). While, therefore, within the limitations of the creature it must ever remain true that 0 multiplied by any number however great, remains 0 still, yet when we transfer our reckoning to the realm of Promise and Resurrection, setting the flesh aside and allowing the Spirit full scope, the miraculous happens, 0 multiplied by the power that raised Christ from the dead is abundantly fruitful.

Adam may 'multiply' (rabab) but such multiplication ended in destruction (Gen. vi. 1) and the wickedness that resulted was 'great' (rab) (Gen. vi. 5). Abraham was to be multiplied (rabah) and his name and nation were to be made 'great' but the word used is not rab but gadol. The former word signifies mere increase in numbers, but the second word implies growth, a nourishing, and greatness of quality as well as of mere quantity is indicated.

The word zera 'seed' is used of Abraham and of the promise made to him 21 times in the chapters xii.-xxii. It is used another 21 times in the remainder of the book of Genesis in connection with Isaac, Jacob and Joseph. The word is associated with the promise of the land (Gen. xii. 7), but Abraham is not 'shown' the land until the separation from Lot takes place. Only then he is bidden to walk through the length of it and the breadth of it, so making it his own (Gen. xiii. 14-18). Abraham's seed is likened to the dust of the earth, and to the stars of heaven for number (Gen. xiii. 16; xv. 5). Some believe that these passages indicate 'a heavenly seed' and 'an earthly seed' but the only idea which the Scriptures attaches to the 'dust' and to the 'stars' is that of great number, and if these passages indicate the earthly and heavenly seed of Abraham, we shall be obliged to find a yet third company who are indicated by the 'sand that is upon the seashore' (Gen. xxii. 17; xxxii. 12). It is clear however that sheer greatness of number is intended, for Joseph is said to have gathered corn 'as the sand of the sea' so that he left off numbering (Gen. xli. 49). That 'dust' also has this association with greatness of number, let Balaam testify "Who can count the dust of Jacob, and the number of the fourth part of Israel?" (Numb. xxiii. 10). Of the eleven references to the 'stars' in the Pentateuch seven use them to express greatness of number. Abraham certainly has an heavenly seed as well as an earthly one, but this distinction is founded upon other statements and promises.

In Gen. xv., when the Lord said to Abraham "Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them . . . . . So shall thy seed be", we read with joy that Abraham 'believed in the Lord, and He counted it to him for righteousness' (Gen. xv. 5, 6). Justification by faith therefore is vitally associated with the true seed, and although not one of the true seed is exempt from sin, righteousness is provided for each one of them. Later in this chapter, a strange interlude is revealed:

> "Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years . . . . . in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full" (Gen. xv. 13-16).

The Amorite is one of the Canaanite nations that held the land against the true seed, and although Divine justice in longsuffering permits the true heirs to suffer until the iniquity of the Amorite is full, yet the narrative goes on to show that Abraham even then was assured that his seed should possess the land:

> "In the same day the Lord made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates . . . . . the Amorites, and the Canaanites . . . . ." (Gen. xv. 18-21).

Chapter xviii. records the coming of the Lord with two angels, and the promise:

> "I will certainly return unto thee according to the time of life; and, lo, Sarah thy wife shall have a son" (Gen. xviii. 10).

The promise is repeated after Sarah's incredulity was manifested with the prefatory words:

> "Is any thing too hard for the Lord?" (Gen. xviii. 14).

Chapter xxi. opens with the fulfillment of this promise:

> "And the Lord visited Sarah as He had said, and the Lord did unto Sarah as He had spoken" (Gen. xxi. 1).

Before examining these words more closely, let us note the following disposition of the chapters before us. We have quoted from chapters xv., xviii. and xxi. but must now take particular note as to what the intervening chapters relate. Chapter xvi. relates the birth of Ishmael.

"Now Sarai Abram's wife bare him no children", and as ten years had passed since the promise made in Gen. xii., the strain upon the flesh was great. The result was an attempt to help God accomplish His purpose and an Egyptian, Hagar, gives birth to Ishmael, son of the bondwoman, but not the true seed of promise. This is followed by that extraordinary rite, circumcision. Abram's name is changed to Abraham 'father of nations' in the very chapter that repudiates the flesh, and that follows the tragic descent into the flesh and the taking of Hagar, and it was only consequent upon the institution of the covenant of circumcision, that the promise concerning the true seed became specific, and 'Isaac' is named (Gen. xvii. 21).

Following the promise of the seed in Gen. xviii. 1-16, comes the references to Sodom and Gomorrah, cities whose names are for ever associated with gross sins of the flesh, to which must be added the taking of Sarah by Abimelech. In order that the reader may perceive this continued alternation of covenant purpose regarding the seed, and the different interferences of the enemy, we set out this large section as a simple repeated alternation, without attempting any subdivision of the subject matter.

No.25. Promises, true and false. The two seeds.
pp. 192 - 195

If every descendant of Adam or of Abraham was one of the seed of God, Paul could never have written Rom. ix. 8:

> "The children of promise are counted for a seed."

This line is but a part of a longer argument, and is introduced by the word 'but' which contrasts it with the preceding statements that declare that 'all Israel' does not include all who are 'of Israel', but that a selection is always in mind "In Isaac shall thy seed be called", a statement that rules out Ishmael who was as surely the son of Abraham as was Isaac. "Children of the flesh" continues the Apostle 'are not the children of God, but the children of the promise are counted for a seed'. The two terms 'promise' and 'counted for' must be examined for the light they will give on the character of the seed of God. All the promises of God, whatever they are, and wherever they operate, are implemented and enjoyed in Christ.

> "For all the promises of God in Him are yea, and in Him Amen, unto the glory of God by us" (II Cor. i. 20).

We do not need to have a very long acquaintance with the Scriptures to become aware that Satan is the Arch-Imitator; he deceives by imposing upon the world the spiritual equivalent of the Babylonian 'brick for stone' (Gen. xi. 3), and we can be sure that if the true seed is associated with 'promise', the false seed will have their promises too. This is brought out very pointedly by Peter in his epistles:

TRUE PROMISES	FALSE PROMISES
II Peter i. 4 "Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises: that by these ye might be partakers of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust."	II Peter ii. 19, 20 "While they promise them liberty, they themselves are the servants of corruption . . . . . for if after they have escaped the pollutions . . . . . they are again entangled . . . . . the latter end is worse with them than the beginning."
I Peter ii. 25 "For ye were as sheep going astray; but are now returned unto the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls."	II Peter ii. 22 "But it is happened unto them according to the true proverb, The dog is turned to his own vomit again; and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire."

A sow that is washed is a sow still. A sheep that is astray is a sheep still. Nowhere throughout the Scriptures is there the slightest hint that by washing a sow, it will at some time, however distant, be turned into a sheep. We have here in these passages from I & II Peter the two seeds associated with their two sets of promises.

(1) "Partakers of the divine nature." (2) "Wallowing in the mire" what extremes are here! The reference to the 'divine nature' follows that which tells of 'divine power' (II Pet. i. 3, 4), and indicates one of the essential differences in the true and false promises. There is no power for holiness or truth, life or peace, in the Devil's substitute. Of the true seed it is written 'having escaped', but for the false seed the 'escape' is illusory, for they become ensnared and their latter end is worse than at the beginning.

A word that will repay attention is that translated 'pollutions' in II Pet. ii. 20; it is the Greek word miasma. It occurs in the form miasmon in verse ten of the same chapter, and neither word occurs again in the N.T. The word miasma is found in the LXX version of Lev. vii. 8 "it is an abomination" and in Ezek. xxxiii. 31, where the A.V. reads 'covetousness' the LXX reads 'pollutions'. The context of the earlier use of the word in II Pet. ii. is exceeding grave. The chapter opens with 'false prophets' and 'false teachers' who privily brings in damnable heresies. With 'feigned words' they make merchandise of the people as of the truth, and are associated both in their sin and in their condemnation with:

(1) The angels that sinned.
(2) The cities of Sodom and Gomorrah.

This false seed are likened to natural brute beasts made to be taken and destroyed, who speak evil of things they understand not, and who shall 'utterly perish in their own corruption'. These are said to walk after the flesh in the lust of uncleanness (miasmon). This is an unsavoury topic, but so is sin, and the more horrible the travesty of truth, the more need to see the truth clearly. We have read many articles which sought to establish that all, whether true or false seed, angels or demons, will ultimately be fully and completely reconciled, but we have never read an article advocating that doctrine which referred to II Pet. ii., for it is entirely against such a teaching.

We turn from the evil and the false to consider the good and the true, and assemble the references to the Divine promises which are the background of the chosen seed, as we have seen in Rom. ix.

> "Now to Abraham and his SEED were the promises made, He saith not, And to SEEDS, as to many; but as of one, And to thy SEED, which is Christ" (Gal. iii. 16).

The Apostle does not make a general reference to the O.T.; the fact that he goes out of his way to commence his quotation with 'and' compels us to look for a similar reference in the book of Genesis. One such is found in Gen. xiii. 15. There, the context enlarges upon the number of the seed, likening them to the dust of the earth, so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then the seed promised to Abraham should also be numbered. At first this appears to contradict the emphasis placed on 'seed' as over against 'seeds, as of many' but a moment's reflection will establish the truth, brought forward in this self same chapter, that all the seed, of whatever calling, are looked upon as in Christ. They are only the seed because they are viewed in Him, the True Seed. So in Gal. iii. 29, the Apostle confirms the view saying "And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise".

Again in this same chapter, the law is said to have been given 'till the seed should come to whom the promise was made', or as it is said a few verses later "Wherefore the law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ" (Gal. iii. 19, 24). It is the exclusive privilege of the true seed to be able to look up to God and cry "Abba, Father". In the fourth chapter Paul develops a lengthy argument, the pith of which is the essential distinction between the two seeds; the one, the son of the bondwoman, cannot be heir with the son of the freewoman, and must be 'cast out' (Gal. iv. 22-31). To the contrasted liberty all the true seed are called upon to stand fast (Gal. v. 1). In the epistle to the Romans, attention is focused upon the birth of Isaac as the true seed and child of promise. Sarah, destined to be the mother of this child, is by nature barren, making a definite interposition by God essential and so emphasizing that the seed is not the mere natural progeny but, being promised, are 'reckoned for a seed'. In Rom. iv., the 'deadness' of both Abraham and Sarah is stressed in order that we might learn the lesson that:

> "It is of faith, that it might be by grace; to the end the promise might be SURE TO ALL THE SEED" (Rom. iv. 16).

The miraculous element in the birth of Isaac is again stressed in the epistle to the Hebrews. First we read:

> "Through faith also Sarah herself received strength to conceive seed, and was delivered of a child when she was past age, because she judged Him faithful Who had promised. Therefore sprang there even of one, and him as good as dead, so many as the stars of the sky in multitude, and as the sand which is by the seashore innumerable" (Heb. xi. 11, 12).

Not only the birth of Isaac, but the deliverance of Isaac on the Mount of Moriah is brought forward to teach the same lesson:

> "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac: and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten son, of whom it was said, That in Isaac shall thy seed be called; accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead; from whence also he received him in a figure" (Heb. xi. 17-19).

Before the age times God promised eternal life (Titus i. 2); before these same age-times there was a purpose and grace given us in Christ Jesus (II Tim. i. 9). From all this evidence, we gather that God chose in Christ a seed, not according to anything that they had done or would do, either good or evil. This seed was not by natural descent, but by reckoning, by election, by choice. This seed may have often become like sheep that have gone astray, but sheep they remained. The false seed have often become like sows washed, but sows they have remained. The names of the true seed are in the book of life; they shall never perish. For their redemption, forgiveness and re-instatement the Saviour died, and in His resurrection all the seed, of whatever calling, are blessed in whatever sphere it may have pleased God to decide and all the seed are looked upon as 'one'. The whole Bible is devoted to the story of this seed from the overthrow of the world to the end of the ages when God shall be all in all. The conflict of the ages has been the conflict of the two seeds; the initial victory of Calvary being ultimately entered by all the seed, as a comparison of Gen. iii. 15 and Rom. xvi. 20 will confirm. In this choice of the seed, grace alone operates; the true seed do not find in themselves or in their actions the slightest ground for boasting except in Him.

No.26. "Not of God." "Of that wicked One." The Enemy and the tares which he sowed in God's field.

pp. 213 - 215

We have sought to demonstrate the presence on the earth of two seeds, the one, the seed of God and of promise, the other, the seed of the wicked one. Before closing this study, it may be useful to look at the revealed character of the wicked one himself, for that will be reflected in his seed as surely as the character of God will be reflected in the true seed. We should not forget that the word 'image' that is used by God at the creation of Adam (Gen. i. 26, 27), is the self-same word that is used to speak of 'molten images' (Numb xxxiii. 52) and idolatrous images throughout the O.T. Scriptures. In the same way, the glorious title of the Saviour "The Image of the invisible God" (Col. i. 15), is used in Rom. i. 23, and in nine passages in the book of the Revelation. The wicked one has a number of titles that indicate his character. When Matthew recorded the parable of the Sower, he said 'Then cometh the wicked one, and catcheth away that which is sown in his heart'; Mark says 'Satan cometh immediately, and taketh away the word that was sown in their hearts'. While Luke says 'Then cometh the devil' (Matt. xiii. 19; Mark iv. 15; Luke viii. 11, 12). Here are three titles of one person and they give a fairly comprehensive account of his character and activities.

THE WICKED ONE ho poneros. This word is derived from ponos 'labour, sorrow' and so one causing pain and sorrow to others. The word takes us back to the Garden of Eden, where sorrow and sweat of face are super-added to labour, labour both in child-bearing and in food production, but a labour that is marked with vanity and vexation of spirit, for it leads to the grave where dust unto dust returns.

It is not without deep suggestiveness that the English word 'wicked' is derived from an Anglo-Saxon word wicca meaning a wizard or wicce, a witch. Here wickedness is related to the devil as surely as it is in the Scriptures. Satan is pre-eminently "The wicked one", and Cain is said to be 'of that wicked one' in the same epistle (I John iii. 12). It is highly probable that the clause in the Lord's Prayer 'deliver us from evil' should be rendered 'deliver us from the wicked one'.

SATAN. The word Satan is a Hebrew word meaning 'adversary' and with the definite article it is the title of THE great adversary of God and of the true seed. "Satan standing at his right hand to resist him' (Zech. iii. 1) shows the great adversary acting in character, for the verb 'to resist' is the Hebrew word satan. He is called 'the accuser' of the brethren (Rev. xii. 10). The Septuagint (The Greek O.T.) translates this title 'Satan' by Ho diabolos, "The Devil', which clearly establishes the identity of the Satan of the O.T. with the Devil of the New. Diabolos is one of the great number of Greek word derived from the word ballo 'to cast or throw'. Thus we have katabole 'overthrow', ekballo 'cast out', parabole 'throw or cast beside', hence a parable by reason of its construction. Diaballo means literally 'to cast through' but in practice it means to slander, to cast aspersions. In Luke xvi. 1 the unjust steward was not slandered but rightly 'accused' and so the Devil is called 'the accuser' in Rev. xii. 10 and in I Tim. iii. 11 we find the word diabolos used of some believers where it is translated 'slander'. In Rev. xii. 9 and xx. 2 The Devil and Satan are titles that belong to 'That old and ancient serpent' where the link with Gen. iii. is firmly established. Again in II Cor. xi. we read of the Serpent who beguiled Eve, and of Satan who transforms himself into an angel of light (II Cor. xi. 3, 14). We discover from the actual spoken testimony of the Saviour Himself a most vital truth concerning this evil antagonist of God. "He was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth" (John viii. 44). To this, we must add the testimony of the first epistle of John, "The devil sinneth from the beginning" (I John iii. 8). Some have endeavoured to show that Satan was created and appointed as such by God and have actually maintained that he did the will of God as surely as did the Saviour! If it is revealed truth that the Devil was a murderer from the beginning, then he cannot have been the executor of the Divine will. God needs no murderer to carry out His behests, and when He appoints a man unto death, that cannot possibly be described as murder! John who records the words 'He was a murderer from the beginning' also tells us that 'whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer' (I John iii. 15) leaving us in no doubt concerning the term. It is clear that Satan is a fallen being, for it is written "He abode not in the truth". Further he was a liar from the beginning, and our God is a God of truth and without iniquity, just and right is He. We read in Job xxxviii. 7 that at the creation, when the Lord laid the foundations of the earth, the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy. It would appear that at that time Satan was among them as yet unfallen and he it is who is addressed in the person of the Antichrist "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning" (Isa. xiv. 12-15) to which stupendous event the Saviour referred when He said:

> "I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven" (Luke x. 18).

Weighing all these terrible words in the balance, we find it impossible to believe that the Saviour would actually say of the true seed "Ye are of your father (ek tou patros) the devil" (John viii. 44). The words ek tou patros 'out of the father' find an echo in verse 47 'He that is OF GOD (ek tou Theou) heareth the word of God; ye therefore hear them not, because ye are not OF GOD (ek tou Theon)'. Note carefully the words here. The passage does not teach that if a person persistently refuses to hear the Word of God, he thereby exposes himself to the possibility of being numbered with the evil seed who are 'not of God'; the truth is the other way round, those addressed heard not the words of God, because they were the evil seed. HEARING the word of God is a mark of the true seed. "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear", suggests the same teaching. So we get such passages as the following "He that heareth My Word and believeth on Him that sent Me", which is a spiritual anticipation of the day when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live. To some the testimony of the Saviour was a hard saying "Who can hear it?" "Why do ye not understand My speech?" said the Lord, and His answer is 'even because ye cannot hear My word' (John viii. 43). "He that is of God heareth God's words: YE THEREFORE HEAR THEM NOT, because ye are not of God" (John viii. 47). "Ye believe not, BECAUSE YE ARE NOT OF My sheep" (John x. 26). Again we draw attention to this deep saying. It does not say "Because ye believe not ye cannot become My sheep". Those addressed were not His sheep and as only the sheep hear, they not being sheep, could not hear. All this may be in the realm of high doctrine and scarcely comes within the province of the Evangelist. It is nevertheless just as true as John iii. 16, and is a warning to all who preach not to load the English word 'whosoever' beyond the legitimate burden of its Greek equivalent.

The English word 'whosoever' is exceedingly wide in scope, apparently precluding none, but in many passages it translates the Greek pas ho, which literally rendered, makes the blessing limited to a certain class, instead of being offered universally. Thus we read in the original:

> Pas ho pisteuon "Every believing one" (John iii. 16).
> Pas hos epikalesetai "Every calling one" (Rom. x. 13).
> Ho thelon "The willing one" (Rev. xxii. 17).

We now continue our examination of the teaching of the Scriptures concerning 'the seed' and shall be able to do so without the liability to ascribe to the evil seed that which pertains only to the family of faith. Let us never forget that in themselves as far as merit or demerit is concerned, there is no difference between the true seed and the false. Ephesians, which ministers to the high calling of the Mystery, nevertheless reminds the recipients of the grace there outpoured that they were:

> "By nature the children of wrath, even as others" (Eph. ii. 3).

We should observe moreover that the words translated ‘others’ here are the Greek words hoi loipoi ‘the left’, ‘the residue’. We should indeed walk with all lowliness and meekness as we consider the unmerited grace that has been bestowed upon us.

No.27. “Their blot is that they are not His children” (Amended translation, Deut. xxxii. 5).

pp. 233 - 235

There are certain folk who have what are called ‘green fingers’, fruit, flower and vegetable responding to their care where with others no such success follows. Some of these folk have an intuitive faculty in discriminating between seeds and bulbs, forecasting fairly accurately what others have to wait and see at time of harvest. While both good and bad seed must grow together until the harvest, there are one or two traits that, to the discerning eye, indicate what stock they are of. Such attitudes to Divine things as are indicated by the words ‘despise’, ‘mock’, ‘reject’ are among the number of terms that act as an index to essential character. The Scriptures make abundantly clear that the seed were not chosen for any qualities they possessed, but by the sheer choice of God, yet to leave the matter there is to express but half a truth; there is another side of the story that needs to be given attention. Esau and Jacob chosen, and this before either had done any good or evil that the purpose of God according to election should stand (Rom. ix. 11). Nevertheless, Esau and Jacob manifest very different attitudes to the things of God. It is written that ‘Esau despised his birthright’ (Gen. xxv. 34) and is called a ‘profane person’ (Heb. xii. 16). It is true that Jacob cheated both his blind father and his brother, and no words can be too severe in condemning so despicable an act, and yet, if we probe to discover the reason for Rebekah’s plan and of Jacob’s complicity, it is that they were both most obviously desirous that Jacob should be in line with the blessing of Abraham, a blessing which was ultimately bestowed freely and without persuasion upon Jacob’s departure to Padan-aram (Gen. xxviii. 3-6). So though one might call Jacob many unsavoury names, one thing could never be said of him that he did despise his birthright. In conjunction with this, we might observe that where the A.V. reads that “Jacob was a PLAIN man” (Gen. xxv. 27), it should be kept steadily in mind that the Hebrew word translated ‘plain’ is translated ‘perfect’ of Job (Job i. 1) and of Noah (Gen. vi. 9), a quality related to one’s generations as of Noah, and a quality additional to that of being upright, as of Job. The word is used in the Song of Solomon twice of the beloved as ‘undefiled’. What was it that drew down such severe judgment upon Israel in the wilderness? In the book of Numbers, the murmuring against the dealing of the Lord with them is said to have given them such an answer to their demand for a flesh diet, that the Lord said:

> “Ye shall not eat one day, nor two days, nor five days, neither ten days, nor twenty days; but even a whole month, until it come out at your nostrils, and it be loathsome unto you: because that ye have DESPISED the LORD which is among you, and have wept before him, saying, Why came we forth out of Egypt?” (Numb. xi. 19, 20).

The sentence of wandering for forty years in the wilderness pronounced upon Israel until all that generation that had come out of Egypt with the exception of Caleb and Joshua had died, provides another illustration:

> "Doubtless ye shall not come into the land, concerning which I sware to make you dwell therein, save Caleb the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua the son of Nun. But your little ones, which ye said should be a prey, them will I bring in, and they shall know the land which YE HAVE DESPISED" (Numb. xiv. 30, 31).

Ten of the twelve who went in to spy out the land brought up a SLANDER upon the land (Numb. xiv. 36). While there is no real connection between the words 'espied' and 'despised' they look and sound enough alike to suggest a paronomasia. God espied the land (Ezek. xx. 6) but many of the generation that came out of Egypt despised it. Coming a little nearer to our times, we find this same word that is translated 'despise" used in the book of Samuel:

> "They have not REJECTED thee, but they have REJECTED Me, that I should not reign over them" (I Sam. viii. 7).

Saul, the people's choice, and the symbol of their rejection of the Lord, is himself charged with rejecting the word of the Lord (I Sam. xv. 23-26), is reminded that rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft, and is himself 'rejected' as King (I Sam. xvi. 1); 'refused' in verse seven being the same in the original. The depth of this rejection can be estimated when we read Lam. iii. 45:

> "Thou hast made us as the offscouring and refuse in the midst of the people", and remember that this is often the estimate of the false seed of the true, as the Apostle indicates, when he said:

> "We are made as the filth of the world, and are the offscouring of all things unto this day" (I Cor. iv. 13).

When the raven was sent out of the Ark, seeing that it could feed on the carcasses that floated everywhere after the Flood had done its work, as an unclean bird it found what suited it. The dove however returned, finding no place for the sole of its foot and nothing congenial to its nature. So the two seeds give occasional indication of their basic character by the things that they 'despise'. The culmination of this attitude is seen in the despising and the rejecting of the Saviour Himself (Isa. liii. 3), and it is on those who are 'despisers' that the doom of Acts xiii. 41 is pronounced. When Moses in his great prophetic song saw that some of Israel would not bear the mark of being the children of God (Deut. xxxii. 5) but were a perverse and crooked generation, he put his finger on the root of the evil saying that they 'lightly esteemed' the Rock of their salvation. They who crucify unto themselves afresh the Son of God and put Him to an open shame, like Esau, the profane person, find no room for repentance, the two passages, Heb. vi. and xii., being in true structural correspondence. In direct contrast with this act of despising the Divine plan and provision is the delight taken in it by the true seed. If Numb. xiv. tells us that the ten spies together with those who agreed with them 'despised' the land of promise, Numb. xiv. tells us that the argument of Caleb and Joshua was based on ‘delighting’ not ‘despising’.

> “If the LORD delight in us, then He will bring us into this land, and give it us” (Numb. xiv. 8).

The true seed may for a time become envious at the prosperity of the wicked, but will ultimately exclaim with Asaph:

> “There is none upon earth that I desire beside Thee” (Psa. lxxiii. 25), the word ‘desire’ being the same in the original as the word ‘delight’ even as at last, when Israel are restored and blessed, her name shall be Hephzi-bah ‘My delight is in her’ (Isa. lxii. 4), and the land itself will be ‘a delightsome (chephets) land’ (Mal. iii. 12). The true seed ‘glory’ in the Lord, they are full of praise and thanksgiving where the false seed murmur and despise the evidences of divine pleasure and purpose. It is usually a bad thing for a preacher even to seek to know how far his ministry is acceptable to his hearers, it being wisest to seek a conscience void of offence, do all to the glory of God, seek honestly the blessing of the hearer and leave all the rest in the hand of God. But, on one occasion, after having conducted a series of studies on the epistle to the Ephesians, the leader of the meeting said to the present writer, ‘You do glory in your calling, don’t you?’ and for this unsolicited testimony we gave thanks, for it is just exactly in line with what we have seen, that the true seed delights in the things of God, whereas, in many instances, the false seed but despise them. We could pursue this theme further. Perhaps one outstanding passage in the N.T. should at least be mentioned and that is in II Pet. iii. ‘There shall come in the last days SCOFFERS’ and it will be remembered that Psa. i., which most clearly divides the true from the false, puts in contrast ‘The seat of the SCORNFUL’ with the man whose ‘DELIGHT is in the law of the Lord’ (Psa. i. 1, 2). The day of harvest manifests the one by its fruit in its season, saying, ‘the ungodly are not so, but are like the chaff which the wind driveth away’. Despising, scorning, lightly esteeming, the evil seed but anticipate the day when by their fruits they will make manifest that they are but the tares whose end is to be destroyed. Let those who have any evidence in their hearts and lives that such a destiny does not await them, remember afresh that none are numbered among the true seed because of anything that they have done, but that the favour manifested in their election to such an honour is all of unconditioned mercy and of sovereign grace.

Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth. (Second Series).

No.72. (30) GALATIANS. "Jerusalem which is above" (iv. 26). Its dispensational place.

pp. 27, 28

In the covenants and promises to Abraham, a 'land', the land of Canaan, the Holy land, the land known as Palestine, occupies a large place. In the covenants and promises made to David a 'city' is very prominent, "the city of David": a city which the Lord did 'choose' of which 'glorious things' are spoken, Jerusalem, the holy city, a city to be called in the future by many wondrous names, such as 'a city of truth', 'the city of the great king'. It was to Jerusalem that David took the first evidence of his great triumph (I Sam. xvii. 54); it was in Jerusalem that David reigned over all Israel and Judah (II Sam. v. 5). It is this city both in its desolations and in its glorious restoration that fills such prophets as Isaiah with wondrous imagery. The date line of the great prophecy of Dan. ix. is drawn at the time when the command was given to build Jerusalem and all the sorrow that filled the Saviour's breast, as all the rejection that He endured, was focused at Jerusalem. He must needs go unto Jerusalem, it could not be but that He must die at Jerusalem.

> "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not" (Matt. xxiii. 37).

It was the same literal and earthly city that was marked out for the Pentecostal manifestation and further extension of opportunity to Israel; the disciples were bidden to 'tarry' in the city of Jerusalem to await enduement from on high, and Jerusalem was the centre from which was preached the gospel by the twelve until the call and commission of Paul recorded in Acts xiii.

While the earthly city Jerusalem dominates these Scriptures, we have the hope of Israel, the hope that the kingdom should be restored again unto Israel, the goal unto which the twelve tribes hoped to come, and its sphere of blessing is the earth. The fitting prayer is "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven", and the hope is focused upon that day when the Lord shall stand upon the Mount of Olives.

As the sad fact of Israel's non-repentance became evident to the illuminated mind, another sphere of blessing comes into prominence. For the first time in Scripture a 'heavenly country', a 'heavenly city', a 'city which hath foundations', a 'heavenly Jerusalem', comes into the narrative of Scripture. For the first time we learn that Abraham who received the unconditional promise of the land and of the seed, was encouraged to sojourn in the land of promise as in a strange country, dwelling in tents, and looking for a city that was to be prepared for him, a city associated with a heavenly country, and seen 'afar off' (Heb. xi. 8-10, 13).

When we turn to Heb. xii., and read of the two mountains, Sinai with its blackness and darkness, its death and its terror, and Mount Sion, the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, the parallel between this allegory and that of Gal. iv. is most obvious. It is one of the many incidental evidences that the epistle to the Galatians was the 'covering letter' to that addressed to the Hebrews; such a covering letter would fully explain the absence of Paul's name in the introduction of the epistle to the Hebrews as it also explains the extraordinary omission of any reference to circumcision in that same epistle. Moreover, the fact that both Galatians (Gal. vi. 11), and Hebrews (Heb. xiii. 22) at their close refer to the Apostle's writing with 'large letters' and yet sending them an exhortation in a letter of 'few words' is readily understood if the two letters, the one to the Galatians and the other to the Hebrews, accompanied each other.

It is beside the purpose of our present study to attempt a systematic examination of the parallels that exist between these two epistles, or of the way in which the one epistle supplements the other. This we may do at the close of the present exposition. What does come before us with great force is that the emphasis in Heb. xi. and xii. concerning Abraham's association by overcoming faith with the heavenly Jerusalem, unites this epistle with that to the Galatians as entertaining a similar calling, for there not only are all believers reckoned as Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise, but Jerusalem which is above and free, is their mother (Gal. iv. 26).

Gentile believers have no place in Israel's earthly inheritance except as proselytes or subservient nations, but Gentile believers whose faith follows that of Abraham, who was himself one of the Gentile nations and received the promises, being justified by faith before receiving the sign of circumcision (Rom. iv. 9-14), such believing Gentiles have a place in the second sphere of blessing, the heavenly calling of Heb. iii. 1, the heavenly Jerusalem of Heb. xi. and xii., for Jerusalem which is above is their 'mother', the goal of their faith.

In Gal. iii. 8 and 22 the Scriptures are personified, being made to 'foresee' and to 'conclude'. In Gal. iv. 22-31 the Apostle takes this personification a stage further, lifting out the history of Sarah and Isaac, and of Hagar and Ishmael, allegorizing the details, to enforce the essential differences between the two covenants.

The A.V. reads, 'which things are an allegory', but Paul uses the verb allegoreo, saying in effect 'I am going to allegorize this piece of O.T. history, but would have you to remember that the record in Genesis is no mere allegory, but a record of sober fact'.

> "The modern and common usage of the word allegoria is thus quite different from this Scriptural definition. According to the modern sense it is taken to mean a fictitious narrative which has another and deeper meaning than that which is expressed . . . . . Allegory is always stated in the past tense, and never in the future. Allegory is thus distinguished from Prophecy. The Allegory brings other teaching out of past events, while prophecy tells us events that are yet to come." (Figure of Speech Used in the Bible.—Dr. E. W. Bullinger).

No.73. (31) GALATIANS.
Gal. iv. 21 - v. 10 --- The call to Freedom.
"To the liberty stand fast" (v. 1).
pp. 51 - 54

In the last two articles we were considering the allegory of the two sons of Abraham which occupies Gal. iv. 27 - v. 1, but did not get so far as to include Gal. v. 1 in our study. This verse concludes the allegory by a call to stand fast to the freedom which Christ has given, the concluding member of this section being Gal. v. 2-10 which is Paul's testimony to those placing themselves under law.

The call to stand fast cannot be passed over without careful examination, for it crystallizes much of the desire of the Apostle and the standing of the believer. It is a call to us as well as to them, and upon our response to this call our peace and experimental growth in grace depends.

A considerable variety of readings are presented by the manuscripts, which, in the language of Lightfoot 'are the more perplexing, in that they seriously effect the punctuation, and thereby the whole texture of the passage'. The reader who could follow any indication of the way in which these various readings occur and are distributed, would be already independent of any help we could give in these pages, and to those unacquainted with the subject, mere citations of manuscripts Aleph, A, B, C, F, G, P, etc., would prove of little value. The various readings found, may be summarized under three headings:

(1) The position of oun 'therefore'.
(a) Before "stand" (b) After "liberty" (c) omitted altogether.

(2) The position of hemas 'us'.
(a) Before "Christ", (b) After "Christ", (c) After "made free".

(3) A third and more complicated variation is the presence or absence of he 'which' after the word 'liberty'.

With this analysis of the different readings of the Manuscripts, we place together for comparison the A.V. and the R.V. of this verse and pass on to its exposition.

"Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage" (Gal. v. 1 A.V.).

"With freedom did Christ set us free: stand fast therefore, and be not entangled again in a yoke of bondage" (Gal. v. 1 R.V.).

As in most cases of various readings, it is rather a matter of emphasis than of any change in doctrine.

"To the liberty stand." The words tek eleutheria are 'a dative of reference'. Ellicott looks back for the reference, and says that it refers to the exact sphere in which, and to which the action is limited. It appears however upon closer consideration that the Apostle is not referring so much to the sphere in which our freedom is found, but rather to the object to which we are to stand. Following immediately upon the conclusion of the allegory "We are not children of the bondwoman, but of the free" comes the exhortation "To the freedom stand".

The A.V. reads "Christ hath made us free", but the verb must be taken historically and translated "Christ set you free". The use of eleutheroo 'to make free' in Galatians, looks back to the doctrine to be revealed in John viii. 32 and its reference to Abraham's seed, and looks forward to the fuller presentation of the theme in the epistle to the Romans. This most important doctrinal word occurs just seven times in the N.T. It would be a useful thing to have the complete set of references before us.

> "And ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free" (John viii. 32).
> "If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed" (John viii. 36).
> "Being then made free from sin, ye became the servants of righteousness" (Rom. vi. 18).
> "But now being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life" (Rom. vi. 22).
> "For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death" (Rom. viii. 2).
> "Because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God" (Rom. viii. 21).
> "To the liberty wherewith Christ set us free, stand fast" (Gal. v. 1).

The freedom of John viii. is the freedom that comes from knowing the Truth, a freedom that comes from Christ as "The Son". The implications of course were that many of His hearers were not free, and this was resented by them.

> "They answered Him, we be Abraham's seed, were never in bondage to any man."

Christ does not allegorize the record of Hagar and Sarah as Paul does; He differentiates between the true seed of Abraham by another test. "Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin", and instead of saying that "Abraham had two sons", the Saviour pursues another thought and speaks of 'two fathers'!

> "Abraham is our father . . . . . If ye were children of Abraham, ye would do the works of Abraham . . . . . ye are of your father the devil" (John viii. 39-44).

In Gal. iv. 21 - v. 1 Paul keeps the issue to one feature "You are either bond or free", but in Romans he can introduce a second form of service, showing that those who are really 'free' nevertheless become 'servants to righteousness' and 'servants to God'. Again in John it is the 'Truth' that makes free. The doctrine of Justification by faith is not in view. In Galatians freedom from the yoke of the law is in view, but in Romans the deeper doctrines of freedom from 'sin' and freedom from 'the bondage of corruption' and 'freedom from the law of sin and death' are made known. The whole of Paul's ministry is characterized by this trumpet call to liberty, the word in one or more of its forms occurring in Paul's epistles some 28 times.

Had the Apostle intended to speak of entanglement, he had the choice of two words; he could have used a word that meant to be ensnared, as is used in Matt. xxii. 15 "entangle Him in His talk"; or he could have used empleko as he did in II Tim. ii. 4 "no man that warreth entangleth himself". He uses neither however, but selects enecho, a word that means 'to hold in' as with a 'yoke' which Weymouth renders 'Be not hampered'.

The intention of the Apostle is best perceived by passing from the verb 'to hold in' to the noun, the thing that does the holding—he calls it 'the yoke of bondage'.

Yokes were of two kinds. There was the yoke that was used for cattle (Numb. xix. 2); but we read that Jeremiah made bonds and yokes to fit the human neck as tokens of servitude.

To Israel the Lord said:

> "I am the LORD your God, which brought you forth out of the land of Egypt, that ye should not be their bondmen; and I have broken the bands of your yoke, and made you go upright" (Lev. xxvi. 13).

When Isaiah looked forward to the 'acceptable year of the Lord' he uses this figure of freedom from the yoke:

> "For thou hast broken the yoke of his burden, and the staff of his shoulder, the rod of his oppressor, as in the day of Midian" (Isa. ix. 4).
>
> "And it shall come to pass in that day, that his burden shall be taken away from off thy shoulder and his yoke from off thy neck, and the yoke shall be destroyed because of the anointing" (Isa. x. 27).
>
> "I will break the Assyrian in My land, and upon My mountains tread him under foot: then shall his yoke depart from off them, and his burden depart from off their shoulders" (Isa. xiv. 25).

Acts xv. is devoted to the twofold question:

(1) Is it needful that Gentile believers should be circumcised and keep the law?
(2) Should they be asked to abstain from certain practices because of the sensitiveness of Jewish believers?

Paul refers to either this council at Jerusalem or to a similar one in Gal. ii. and his reference to the yoke of bondage would come with force to those who may have been leaning somewhat to Peter's authority.

The Apostle of the Gentiles was not only "Hebrew of the Hebrews", he was a citizen of Tarsus, and a Roman citizen also. He had a wide knowledge of the ways and customs of the nations, and he knew that the Galatian Christians would be personally acquainted both with literal slavery and with the process adopted in setting a slave free. To these there are allusions in Gal. v. 1 which must not be missed.

The following is a translation of an inscription found at Delphi, dating B.C.200-199:

> "Date. Apollo the Pythian bought from Sosibius of Amphissa, for freedom, a female slave, whose name in Nicaea, by race a Roman, with a price of three minae of silver and a half-mina. Former seller according to the law: Eumnastus of Amphissa. The price he hath received. The purchase however, Nicaea hath committed unto Apollo, for freedom."

The very words 'bought with a price' and 'for freedom' show how closely Paul followed the wording of these records.

In numerous records the emancipated slave is expressly allowed henceforth to 'do the things that he will', to which Paul makes an allusion in Gal. v. 17; and it is expressly forbidden under heavy penalties that such an enfranchised slave should ever 'be made a slave' again. These and other allusions with photographs and original wording of inscriptions can be seen in Deissmann's Light from the Ancient East.

To us today the clarion call of Paul resounds. It is as imperative as ever it was that those whom Christ has set free should 'stand' to that freedom, and refuse any attempt, however plausible, to put upon their necks the yoke of bondage from which by grace they have been so gloriously set free.

With this call the Apostle concludes his 'allegory' and Gal. v. 2-9 completes the closing member of the section which commences at chapter iv. 21, with the words 'Tell me' (legete) and closes appropriately with the words 'I Paul say' (lego).

No.74. (32) GALATIANS.
Gal. iv. 21 - v. 10 --- The call to Freedom.
Fallen from grace (v. 2 - 9).
pp. 70 - 74

This section opens with a rhetorical question "Tell me?" (Gal. iv. 21) and closes with Paul 'telling' in very strong terms the results that must come from the Galatians deflection.

Paul 'tells' these wavering believers, three very serious facts:

(1) That if they should be circumcised, Christ will profit them nothing.
(2) That every one so circumcised is under an obligation to perform the whole law.
(3) That whoever attempts self justification by means of the law, is (a) separated from Christ, and (b) fallen from grace.

The three items are prefaced by the emphatic pronoun "ego":

"Behold, I Paul, I say to you."

The remainder of the argument is prefaced by the emphatic pronoun Hemeis "we".

"We", however, "we are waiting, in Spirit, for the hope of righteousness by faith".

This statement is followed by three observations:

(1) That in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything nor uncircumcision, but faith that worketh by love.
(2) That they had run well, but someone has hindered them, and this persuasion did not come from him that called them.
(3) This hindering influence is likened to a little leaven, which leavens the whole lump.

The structure of this passage is as follows:

A | v. 2. I (emphatic pronoun) Paul say unto you.
B | 2, 3. Circumcision and the "whole" law. |
a | If circumcised. \ Negative.
b | Christ profits nothing. /
a | Every man who is circumcised. \ Positive.
b | Debtor . . . whole law. /
C | 4-5. Grace and Faith. |
c | Christ—none effect. \ Negative.
d | Justified by law. /
c | Spirit . . . hope . . . \ Positive.
d | Righteousness by faith. /
B | 6-9. Circumcision and the "whole" lump leavened. |
a1 | In Christ Jesus.
b1 | Neither circumcision nor uncircumcision.
b1 | But faith.
a1 | In-working by love.
a2 | Ye did run well.
b2 | Who hindered?
a2 | This persuasion.
b2 | The little leaven.
A | 10. I (emphatic pronoun) have confidence in you.

When the Apostle would impress his hearers with the solemnity or importance of his message, he occasionally used the expression "I Paul" or "of me Paul". With such a writer and dealing as he was with such truth, none of these features should be lightly regarded. Accordingly we observe that the phrase 'I Paul' is used by him as follows:

"Now I Paul myself beseech you by the meekness and gentleness of Christ" (II Cor. x. 1).

These words introduce a passage which deals with the Apostle's individual position, his official character and authority and the subject is continued to the end of the epistle. It is therefore fittingly introduced in this very personal way.

Passing Gal. v. 2 which is the passage under review, we come to Eph. iii. 1, where the distinctive ministry and dispensation of the Mystery is introduced. Again, we have the personal formula:

> "For this cause I Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles" (Eph. iii. 1).

This passage finds an echo in Col. i. 23 where, dealing with the same claim he said "Whereof I Paul am made a minister". So to assure the Thessalonians of the intensity of his desire to see them and of the equal intensity of Satanic opposition, he wrote:

> "Wherefore we would have come unto you, even I Paul, once and again; but Satan hindered us" (I Thess. ii. 18).

In the epistle to Philemon which is so full of the practical outworking of grace, we find the Apostle undertaking to be surety for Onesimus, saying:

> "I Paul have written it with mine own hand, I will repay it" (Philemon 19).

So, we are prepared by this introduction to Gal. v. 2 to discover that some solemn words are about to be uttered. Solemn indeed must be that defection of the Galatians from truth that makes Christ to profit them nothing.

"If ye be circumcised." The verb is a present subjunctive. It does not refer to anything done in the past. It does not say "If ye are or have been circumcised" for that would have excluded Paul himself. It is the contemplated act that is in mind, imposed upon them with great authority (Acts xv. 1), and having the added inducement of greater security ("Ye cannot be saved"), accompanied by immunity from persecution (Gal. vi. 12). The rite itself is not in question, it is the reason why the Gentile Christian was submitting to it that was the Apostle's concern, for it more than suggested that Christ's redemptive work was not alone sufficient for justification and life.

To all such Paul gave the solemn warning "Christ shall profit you nothing", the R.V. alters this to "Christ will profit you nothing". There is perhaps a glimpse at 'the hope of the righteousness by faith' (verse 5) when all who are thus addressed will find that they have no deliverer, no justifier, no Saviour. Closely associated in the Apostle's mind was this rite of circumcision and 'profit'. As a consequence of the teaching of Rom. ii. he puts into the mouth of the imaginary objector the words:

> "What advantage then hath the Jew? or what profit is there of circumcision?" (Rom. iii. 1).

In this case, speaking of a Jew who was rightly under the law, the Apostle's answer is 'much every way'.

He had however in Rom. ii. 25 said:

> "For circumcision verily profiteth, if thou keep the law", and this gives point to his argument in Gal. v. 3:

> "I testify again to every man that is circumcised, that he is a debtor to do the whole law."

Paul, by the use of the word 'again', seems to suggest that he had told the Galatians this important fact before. What he had said to them during his visits we do not know, except that one address is recorded in Acts xiii.; we are sure however that there would be harmony between his several discourses, and he who so pointedly said:

> "By Him all that believe are justified from all things, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses" (Acts xiii. 39), would not leave his hearers without definitely instructing them regarding this law and its terms. We need not go outside the epistle, however, to discover that Paul had already testified concerning circumcision and the obligation to do the whole law. Gal. ii. should be re-read with this in view. Again, in Gal. iii. 10-12, while circumcision is not actually mentioned, it is implied in the title "As many as are of the works of the law", for such come under the obligation to 'continue in all things' with the dreadful alternative of the 'curse' before them. So when Paul 'testified again' in Gal. v. 3 he was but saying the same thing. The Apostle emphasizes the 'whole law', even as he had said 'all things which are written in the book of the law to do them'.

While it is convenient for students to subdivide the law into several parts, and speak of the moral law, the ceremonial law, etc., we must remember that for the purposes of justification, the law is one. We are either saved by reason of our perfect law-keeping, or we are saved by grace alone. James equally with Paul saw the oneness of the law, saying "Whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all" (James ii. 10). "The linsey-woolsey garment" of the Puritan hymn is intolerable; a mixture of the righteousness of God through faith, with the attempts of fallen man to present a righteousness is impossible.

> "Christ is become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law; ye are fallen from grace" (Gal. v. 4).

Translators have been considerably exercised over the best way of rendering into English the original word translated in the A.V. 'to become of none effect', especially as it is in what is known as a 'pregnant structure' the verb being followed by apo 'away from' and implying the mental addition of some such verb as eschoristhete 'separated'. The R.V. reads: "severed from Christ" with a marginal alternative, "Gk. brought to nought". Young's Literal Translation is "Ye were freed from Christ". Rotherham reads "Ye have been set aside from Christ". Weymouth has: "Christ has become nothing to any of you"; while J.N.D. very freely renders the passage "ye are deprived of all profit from Christ as separated (from Him)", and to this he appends a lengthy footnote, saying katergethete is "a very hard word to translate. The active means to render anything useless and unprofitable, or miss an opportunity. Here it is passive and with apo".

It is evident from these different attempts to give, in English, the meaning of this passage, that it is one of great difficulty. We cannot hope to succeed where so many eminently fitted for the task have scored only partial success, but we can examine the words in question and so provide the reader with a background to whatever translation the limitation of language shall ultimately compel us to accept.

Katergethete apo Christou. The root of the word katargeo is erg 'work', a word that the science of physics has made familiar to the English ear. The verb used in Gal. v. 4 is the aorist passive, and is made up of kata and argos. Kata often loses its distinctive force of 'down', in combination; it usually intensifies the action of the verb.

Argos, meaning idle, is composed of a 'not', and ergon 'work'. Katargeo does not occur in the Septuagint version of the O.T. so there is no appeal to Hebrew usage or equivalents. It occurs in the N.T. 27 times, of which number 1 is used by Luke and the remaining 26 by Paul. We will not survey the whole of these 26 occurrences, although for a full understanding not one can be passed over, but for our present purpose we must be content with the occurrences found in the parallel epistle to the Romans. They are 6 in number, and are as follows:

> Shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect? (Rom. iii. 3).
> Do we then make void the law through faith? (iii. 31).
> Faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect. (iv. 14).
> That the body of sin might be destroyed. (vi. 6).
> If the husband be dead, she is loosed from the law of her husband. (vii. 2).
> But now we are delivered from the law, that being dead wherein we were held. (vii. 6).

In the first two occurrences in Romans, the verb katargeo is active, in the remaining four it is passive. The references in Rom. vii. show how the word can be used in the sense of complete nullification, abrogation or evacuation of law—the law being completely abrogated and devoid of power by death. It is in this sense that the Apostle uses it in Gal. v. 4. The believer who puts himself under grace, dies to the law. In the one case the law has nothing to do with him, in the other Christ can do nothing for him.

The A.V. says "Christ is become of no effect unto you" whereas the original says rather 'You are beyond the operation of Christ'. Just as Paul could use the word 'free' in an evil sense on Rom. vi. 20 "when ye were the servants of sin, ye were free from righteousness" so he used katargeo here.

In the estimate of Paul, and in all who know the truth, conversion and justification is not a mere change of opinion, it is a matter of death followed by newness of life.

> "I by law to law died, that I might live unto God" (Gal. ii. 19).
> If after that I "build again the things which I destroyed, I make myself a transgressor" (Gal. ii. 18).

If after being delivered from the bondage of idolatry, I turn again to weak and beggarly elements, what place can Christ have in my life or future?

As we have earlier indicated the addition of apo in this phrase complicates the translation. We must suppose the mental addition of some such word as echoristhete, so that the statement reads 'ye are as nothing as regards Christ, ye are entirely separated from him' as in Rom. vii. 2, 5. (Lightfoot in loco).

To conclude the dreadful list of consequences, the Apostle says:

> "Whosoever of you are (seeking to be) justified by the law; ye are fallen from grace" (Gal. v. 4).

This is but the doctrinal restatement of the allegory, where the child of the bondwoman was 'cast out'. If, says Paul, you voluntarily take up your stand with Hagar and Ishmael who were 'cast out', you surely will not be surprised if you 'fall out' of grace.

The Apostle has more to teach us before the subject is cleared and his further arguments must be considered in future articles. Meanwhile let none trifle with Grace. It is easier for a believer to fall out of grace by attempting self justification, than for a sinner who falls into sin. For the latter there is abundant provision; for the former, the way is beset with peril.

No.75. (33) GALATIANS.
Gal. iv. 21 - v. 10 --- The call to Freedom.
"Faith which worketh by love" (v. 5 - 10).
pp. 88 - 93

We have seen how the Apostle viewed the legalizing tendency of the Galatians, and have considered the solemnity of his warning that any one who seeks justification by any other way than that of faith must find:

(1) That to such, Christ profits nothing.
(2) That all who thus seek make themselves debtors to do the whole law.
(3) That Christ becomes of none effect to such.
(4) That they have fallen from grace.

It is not the Apostle's custom to rely only upon warning; he often turns from such methods to that of personal appeal and personal experience, presenting the positive side of the truth in its warmest and most attractive form. This we have seen him do in Gal. ii. 15-21. He discontinues the use of 'you' and 'ye' and now uses 'we'.

> "For we through the Spirit wait for the hope of righteousness by faith" (Gal. v. 5).

Gar, which is translated ‘for’ is a logical conjunction, being a contraction of ge ‘verily’ and ara ‘therefore’, and expresses reason, cause, motive, etc., of what has been previously said. Sometimes it introduces a reason that is unexpressed, but which is evidently in the writer’s mind, as in Rom. iv. 2. Occasionally it is used in the adversative sense of ‘but’ as in Rom. xv. 4 and Phil. iii. 20 as Macknight has declared, and if this be the case in Gal. v. 5, we must read the passage, with Bloomfield:

> “(But such is not, I trust, the case with us), FOR we, etc.”

Paul, therefore, is about to institute a most pointed contrast with those who by their defection and legalism were falling from grace.

> “For we through the spirit wait.”

Pneumati is without the article, it is moreover preceded by en ‘in’, and is put into the dative case. The dative case is that case which is used when we say ‘give me the book’ where of course, the fuller statement must be ‘give to me the book’.

The Dative implies juxtaposition, and in four ways:

> (1) Association. (2) Transmission. (3) Reference. (4) Accessory.

Under the heading ‘accessory’ is placed ‘sphere’ in which some quality inheres. So Matt. v. 3 and 8, ‘poor in spirit’ and ‘pure in heart’, and Eph. ii. 3 ‘by nature’ are examples of this usage.

This is the meaning of ‘through the spirit’ pneumati in Gal. v. 5, it cannot refer to the Holy Spirit, or to His gifts, neither can it be construed to mean ‘spiritually’; it is the sphere in which justification by faith is attained, and ‘spirit’ pneumati is contrasted with ‘flesh’, ‘works’ and ‘law’, in this epistle (Gal. iii. 3; v. 16, etc.) and aligned with ‘grace’ and ‘faith’. In this sphere the Apostle said ‘we wait’.

Apekdexomai occurs 7 times in the N.T., every occurrence being in Paul’s epistles. No other writer of the N.T. uses the word. The passages are Rom. viii. 19, 23 and 25; I Cor. i. 7; Gal. v. 5; Phil. iii. 20 and Heb. ix. 28. In every case apart from Gal. v., the expectation is of something future, and is associated in the context either with the word ‘hope’ or its substance. It does not follow that Gal. v. must therefore be put into future; it is sufficient that there is a ‘hope’ to be ‘eagerly expected’. In Gal. v. it is not the future manifestation of the sons of God, or the Coming of our Lord Jesus Christ; it is ‘the hope of righteousness’ that is expected. It is entirely foreign to the purpose of the Apostle in Galatians to distract attention from the main issue, namely ‘justification is by faith alone’, to some future manifestation or conferring of righteousness. He cannot mean ‘the hope, namely eternal life, which the righteous have’. The argument surely is not:

> “The one rebuked by Paul thinks he has righteousness, which he attains to under law, but we just wait for it to be revealed in some future day.”

The argument surely is rather:

> "You indeed expect to attain unto righteousness by the works of law, we on the other hand expect righteousness only in the sphere of spirit and by faith."

Any exposition that diverts attention for a moment from the point at issue namely "How is righteousness attained?" must be wrong. Moreover, justification is a present 'standing'. The genitive 'hope of righteousness' is not necessarily the genitive of possession, it is not necessary to translate the phrase either "The hope whose object is righteousness" or "The hope which the righteous entertain". There is another use of the Genitive which conforms to all the requirement of the context, the genitive of apposition.

> "Sometimes the genitive is put by way of apposition, in which case some such words as these have to be supplied; 'that is to say' 'which is', etc."
> (Figures of Speech, Dr. E. W. Bullinger).

So when we read "The temple of His body" we understand it to mean "The temple, that is to say, His body" (John ii. 21).

> "The sign of circumcision" was circumcision itself (Rom. iv. 11).
> "The earnest of the Spirit" means the earnest, which is the Spirit (II Cor. v. 5).

So Gal. v. 5 can be translated "The hope which is righteousness" or as we should say in modern speech "We hope to be justified in the sphere of spirit through faith".

Following this personal summary of the position of the believer in Christ whose hope is not the flesh, law or works, but in spirit, grace and faith, Paul gives the following conclusion:

> "For in Jesus Christ neither circumcision availeth anything nor uncircumcision; but faith which worketh by love" (Gal. v. 6).

A logical writer like the Apostle would never introduce these words with 'for' unless some logical connection were intended; an inspired writer as he was, must have a perfect reason for this sequel. Yet at first sight the connection is not obvious. Had he said, "For in Jesus Christ, circumcision avails nothing, faith only is of any avail" it would seem to round off his argument. He has, however, most disconcertingly introduced 'uncircumcision' alongside 'circumcision', and has added 'work' and 'love' to faith, thereby, on the surface, robbing his previous argument of the idea of 'faith only'.

There is, therefore, something hidden in this new presentation that challenges our interest and will yield precious truth if investigated in prayerful dependence upon the Lord.

First, we observe that this passage is one of three where something similar is found:

> "For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature" (Gal. vi. 15).

> "Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but the keeping of the commandments of God" (I Cor. vii. 19).

If the statement 'circumcision availeth nothing' sets aside any hope in the flesh, the addition of 'uncircumcision' really sets aside anything the flesh can either do, or be. Treat the flesh ceremonially, or leave it naturally, the result is the same—nothing avails. Paul refuses to go half way, and change from the circumcision party, to the uncircumcision party. "A plague on both your houses" he might say. "Uncircumcision can become as much a ground of boasting as circumcision—away with both."

The passage I Cor. vii. 19 is parallel with one in I Cor. iii. 7:

> "So then neither is he that planteth anything, neither he that watereth; but God that giveth the increase (is EVERYTHING)", for so the mind must finish the sentence. So in I Cor. vii. 19 "Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but the keeping of the commandments of God is THE ONLY THING THAT MATTERS". The words 'but faith that worketh by love' round off the passage much the same as the mentally supplied additions do in these citations from I Corinthians. The only thing that avails is 'Faith that worketh by love'.

The next question we must ask is why does the Apostle not simply say 'but faith' and leave it there? No one who has followed his argument so far can be left in any doubt that 'faith' apart from legal or carnal ordinances is the only instrument in justification. The time, therefore, has come when he should make it quite plain that 'Faith only' does not mean an empty, lifeless faith. We are reminded by James that the devils believe that there is one God, but although their faith is true, that faith will not save them. We may appreciate the turn taken by Paul here, by turning aside for a moment to consider a parallel argument used by him in connection with the place of the law. In both the epistle to the Romans and to the Galatians the law is said to 'work wrath', and to have entered that 'sin might abound'. The law is shown to have been 'weak because of the flesh' (Rom. iv. 15; v. 20; viii. 3).

In Galatians neither life nor righteousness can come by the law, and all who are under the law are under the curse; yet Rom. vii. 12 declares, nevertheless, that the 'law is holy', and the commandment 'holy, and just, and good', and in Rom. xiii. the full glory of the law is established in the saying:

> "Owe no man any thing, but to love one another: for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law" (Rom. xiii. 8-10).

Now this self same teaching awaits us in Galatians:

> "For brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another. For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this; Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (Gal. v. 13, 14).

Here then is the reason for the addition to the argument in verse 6. Circumcision is useless as a means to justification. It is also just as evil to believe that by abstaining from the rite, that any merit will accrue. Faith alone in the finished work of Christ can avail, but, the insistence on 'faith only' must not be misconstrued. Just as liberty does not mean licence, just as freedom from the law as a means of justification does not mean freedom from the law as a moral code, so faith alone must not be understood as being a dead faith, devoid of grace, but rather is it faith that works by love. Those who would set up James against Paul, and teach that one contradicts the other, make a fatal blunder. James, in his contention that 'faith without works is dead' is but teaching the same truth that Paul is urging here. The only difference between them is, that James does not deal with the initial stages of the doctrine of justification by faith alone, but is concerned rather with the 'perfecting' of the faith. Paul goes to Gen. xv., where Abraham believed in the Lord, and his faith was counted for righteousness, James goes to Gen. xxii., where Abraham's faith is put to the test, where his works perfected the faith he already possessed. Paul, as we have seen, speaks first of the law in its ineffectiveness and weakness and then speaks of its value, but James speaks of the law only as 'the royal law' and 'the perfect law of liberty'.

The following extract from the writing of Professor Jowett, may be appreciated at this point:

> "There is no trace in the writings of St. Paul of the opposition of faith and love, which is found in Luther. Such an opposition did not exist in the language of Christ and His apostles. It came from the schools; Luther was driven to adopt it by the exigencies of controversy. At some point or other was necessary to draw a line between the catholic and reformed doctrine of Justification. Was it to include works as well as faith? but if not, was love to be a co-efficient in the work of Justification? Luther felt this difficulty and tried to preserve the doctrine from the alloy of self-righteousness and external acts by the formula of 'faith only'.
>
> Whether we say that we are justified by faith or love (Luke vii. 47, 50), or by faith working by love, or by grace, or by the indwelling of Christ, or of the Spirit of God, the difference is one of words and not of things. For although these distinctions admit of being defined by logic, and have been made the basis of opposing systems of theology, the point of view in which the writers of Scripture regard them is not that of difference but of sameness."

The concluding verses of this section are conciliatory; words of encouragement are used after the somewhat severe tone adopted in verses 2-4.

First he commends them for their past, 'Ye did run well', and then asks, not so much because he wants an answer, but because he is astonished, 'who did hinder you?' The figure of a race, with its possibilities of defeat as well as glorious possibility of a prize is a favourite one with the Apostle. The word used for 'hinder' in the A.V. is anekopsen which means 'to beat back', the word endorsed by the majority of textual critics today is enekopsen, which means among other things to hinder by breaking up a road, as in a military operation.

To the English ear there is no real affinity between 'obey' and 'believe', indeed there may be a sense of opposition, obedience suggesting law and faith suggesting gospel, and seeing that Paul has made such insistence upon faith without works of law, the reader may wonder why he should now introduce the words 'obey the truth'. Why not 'believe the truth'? There is no such difference in the original words. The verb peitho which gives us 'obey' in verse 7, gives us also 'confidence' in verse 10, and in another form, peismone 'persuasion', in verse 8. Peitho occurs 55 times in the N.T. There are seven occurrences where it is translated 'obey', the remaining passages being rendered agree, assure, believe, have or be confident, persuade, trust, yield and make friend. Moreover, pistis 'faith', is actually derived from peitho showing that the obedience which Paul had in mind was the persuasion which begins with faith and ends in conviction.

Whether the Galatians had protested that after all the number who were thus influenced was small, or that the number who were teaching this error was negligible, we do not know, but the quotation of the proverb, 'a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump' suggests something of the sort.

In concluding this section, Paul adopts a conciliatory tone saying:

> "I (for my part) (emphatic pronoun) have confidence in you through the Lord, that ye will be none otherwise minded."

With the concluding words of verse 10 a new section opens, and this must be dealt with in our next study.

No.76. (34) GALATIANS.
Gal. v. 10 - vi. 10 --- The Troubler and The Restorer.
Love, the fulfilling of all the law (v. 14).
pp. 106 - 110

It may be as well, before we begin the examination of a new section of this epistle, to revive the reader's acquaintance with the structure of the epistle as a whole. Reduced to simple headings it is as follows:

A1 | i. - ii. 14. Faith v. Works.
  B1 | ii. 15 - iv. 12. Cross v. Law.
A2 | iv. 13 - vi. 10. Spirit v. Flesh.
  B2 | vi. 11-16. Cross v. World.
A3 | vi. 17, 18. Grace and Spirit.

The section which is occupying our attention is A2 | iv. 13 - vi. 10, which is subdivided as follows:

A2 | iv. 13 - vi. 10. Spirit v. Flesh. |
  a | Jerusalem. Free.
    b | Circumcision availeth nothing.
      c | Persecution of the Cross.

It is the third of these items, namely c | Persecution of the Cross, that is now before us, occupying Gal. v. 10 - vi. 10. The structure of this section is as follows:

A | v. 10-12. The Troubler, he shall bear his judgment.
B | v. 13-14. The law of love "fulfilled".
C | v. 15-26. Flesh v. Spirit. Works and Fruit. |
a | Biting and devouring one another.
b | Walk in the Spirit.
c | Not under law.
d | Works of flesh.
d | Fruit of Spirit.
c | Against such no law.
b | Walk in the Spirit.
a | Provoking and envying one another.
A | vi. 1, 2. The Restorer bear one another's burden
B | vi. 2, 3. The law of Christ "fulfil".
C | vi. 4-10. Flesh v. Spirit. Sowing and Reaping. |
a | bear own burden.
b | communicate.
b | sow.
a | reap if faint not.

Two very different types of person come before us here. "The troubler" who is the cause of the Galatian defection, and "The restorer" whose tactful and benevolent dealing would help to restore those who had been overtaken by a fault. Two laws are brought into prominence, the law which is fulfilled by love, and the fulfilling of the law of Christ by bearing one another's burdens. Thirdly, two greater sections are concerned with the conflict of flesh and spirit, stressing in one case the exemption from law that belongs to those who walk in the spirit, and in the other case stressing the reaping that all must expect who sow either to the flesh or to the spirit. Paul has already referred to 'some that trouble you' who were perverting the gospel of Christ, here he refers to an individual of that company.

As many be supposed, by the very nature of the term, 'trouble' represents some 35 or more words in the original Scriptures. Of these, 14 different words occur in the Greek of the N.T. The word used in Gal. v. 10 is tarasso and means literally 'to agitate' as for example water (John v. 4, 7; Ezek. xxxiv. 18 LXX). This latter example is much to the point, as the prophet addresses the people of Israel under the figure sheep and rams saying:

> "Is it not enough for you that ye fed on the good pasture, that ye trampled with your feet the remnant of your pasture? and that ye drank the standing water, that ye disturbed the residue with your feet?"

Bishop Chandler speaking of the various and contrary feelings excited in Herod at the arrival of the Magi, said that there was not any one Greek word more proper and expressive than tarassomai. It was this word that the Apostle used in his opening charge in chapter i. when he said 'there be some that trouble you, and would pervert the gospel of Christ' (Gal. i. 7).

Here at the opening of the epistle (immediately following the salutation of verses 1-5) we have reference to the rapid moving from the grace of Christ unto another gospel. This is none other than the work of a 'troubler' and his teaching 'perverts' the gospel. From this point, every statement in Gal. i.-iv. has been an attack or an exposure of this 'perversion', and it would be time well spent by any who value the truth of the gospel, if these passages with their consecutive arguments were re-read in the light of this term.

A | Gal. i. 6, 7. The charge. The troubler.
B | i. 8 - v. 10. The trouble.
A | v. 10. The judgment. The troubler.

This troubler, said the Apostle, shall 'bear his judgment whoever he be'. Here are two solemn utterances concerning one who most probably was a believer in Christ. As a teacher he had a tremendous responsibility, and would be 'judged', and 'whoever he be', that judgment would be 'without respects of persons'. James uses this same word 'judgment' (krima) when he says:

> "My brethren be not many teachers (didaskalos) knowing that we shall receive the greater judgment (krima)" (James iii. 1).

If the immediate context of James ii. 14-26 be read in connection with this reference to 'teachers' and their 'judgment', the connection with Galatians will be more apparent, for both epistles speak of Justification by faith, one stressing the impossibility of combining legal works with faith, and the other stressing the necessity of combining fruitful works with faith, the two presenting the whole truth—namely that the faith that is reckoned for righteousness is a 'faith that worketh by love'. The judgment of all teachers and servants of the Lord will take place at the judgment seat of Christ, with whatever sphere of blessing such a believer be associated (the highest sphere of all being no exception), for Colossians, an epistle of the Mystery says plainly concerning those who serve the Lord Christ:

> "But he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons" (Col. iii. 25).

Commentators find a great difficulty in establishing the connection between Gal. v. 10 and 11. Paul passes from the 'troubler' to himself saying "And I, brethren, if I yet preach circumcision, why do I suffer persecution? then is the offence of the cross ceased" (Gal. v. 11). Some have taught that he had once 'preached circumcision' but had now discounted it, but this is mixing his unconverted zealotry with his apostolic ministry. The little word 'yet' causes most of the difficulty, and an examination of its uses is called for. First we observe that in Galatians itself it is used just seven times, as follows:

Eti "Yet"

A | i. 10. "For if I yet pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ."
B | ii. 20. "Yet not I (lit. live no more I), but Christ liveth in me."
C | iii. 18. "If . . . of the law, it is no more of promise."
D | iii. 25. "After faith . . . no longer under a schoolmaster."
C | iv. 7. "Thou art no more a servant, but a son."
A | v. 11. "And I, brethren, if I yet preach circumcision."
B | v. 11. "Why do I yet suffer persecution?"

Thayer groups the usage of eti in Gal. v. 11 with Rom. iii. 7; vi. 2 and ix. 19 under the explanatory heading 'further, longer (where it is thought strange that, when one thing has established itself, another has not been altered or abolished, but is still adhered to or continued).

Dr. Bullinger gives as the meaning of eti "Yet, still, implying duration, hitherto; also as implying accession or addition, etc.; yet, further, besides". We are, therefore, under no necessity to say that Paul had once preached circumcision, but is doing it no more, what he means is that never has he added to his preaching the rite of circumcision as these troublers have done. The same difficulty is met in the use of 'yet' in his opening defence of Gal. i. 10. "If I pleased men" can mean "if I, further to the endeavour to please God, seek to please men".

The first and last references to eti have to do with the 'troubler' and any who might preach any other gospel. "Let him be accursed" (Gal. i. 8). "He shall bear his judgment" (Gal. v. 10).

> "I would they were even cut off which trouble you" (Gal. v. 12).

These words have given rise to no little discussion among commentators. The 'cutting off' being taken as a reference to the rite of circumcision, and as Lightfoot puts it:

> "Why do they stop at circumcision?" he asks indignantly.
> "Why do they not mutilate themselves, like your priests of Cybele?"

Yet there is something indelicate about such a remark, something so unlike the general attitude of Paul, that it cannot be accepted, even though it was held by almost all the ancient interpreters. Instead of "a sarcastic paranomasia between peritemnesthai (circumcision) and apokopsasthai (cut off)" there is a more natural contrast discoverable. In verse 7 the Apostle said 'who did hinder you' where the word used is enekopse; he now contrasts this by using the word apokopsontai 'I would that, instead cutting in to your path and so hindering you, they would cut themselves out of the way, and so set you free'.

> "For, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another" (Gal. v. 13).

In what way is this verse connected with the words of verse 12? How can Paul say that he wished the troublers cut themselves off 'For ye have been called unto liberty'? However we strain the meaning of 'for', the connection remains artificial. If, however, we will take a wider survey, and not let the peculiarity of the wish of verse 12 blur our vision, we shall see that the Apostle has closed a parenthesis and picked up the earlier reference to 'liberty'. It may be visualized as follows:

A | To the liberty wherewith Christ has made you free, stand fast.
B | Paul testifies to the extreme danger into which the Galatians being lured by the 'troubler' and wishes he were completely removed from their path.
A | Resuming the subject of liberty, then, he now goes on to warn concerning its abuse.

The word translated 'occasion' is aphorme and is found in Rom. vii. 8, 11 and is a compound of apo 'from' and horme 'an impetus' ("assault" Acts xiv. 5), and means "the solid ground from which an impetus is derived; such as the place from which a spring is taken, hence generally a basis of operation. Make not your liberty a position to be taken advantage of by the flesh" (Glynne).

Instead of thus abusing your liberty, rather by love serve one another, and the reason that Paul gives is the remarkable one, in the circumstance, namely that it fulfils the law! The superficial believer would take exception to this; he would object that if Paul had occupied four whole chapters in repudiating the law, he would scarcely stultify his argument by speaking now of 'fulfilling' that very law. Such an objection however makes it manifest how little the Apostle's teaching has been appreciated. True, the law has been entirely set aside as a means of justification, but it does not mean that the ensuing liberty of the believer is to be a state of lawless licence. Far from it. We have been partly prepared for this by the statement that "Faith worketh by love".

No epistle compares with Galatians in its repudiation of the law, like the epistle to the Romans, and a combined set of quotations concerning the inadequacy of the law as a means of justification provides an overwhelming and unanswerable evidence, both to the Apostle's doctrine, and to this parallel, yet in no other epistles does Paul place the law, as a code of morals, on a higher plane than in these two letters.

The parallel between Rom. xiii. 8-10 and Gal. v. 14 is evident and enables the reader to comprehend the meaning. One well intentioned expositor felt that the Apostle does not refer to the Mosaic law in Gal. v. 14, but rather refers to 'the law of Christ' referred to in Gal. vi. 2. It is here that the remote context of Rom. xiii. is valuable, for the citation of the commandments dealing with adultery, killing, stealing, false witness and coveting provide positive evidence that when Paul said "He that loveth another hath fulfilled the law . . . . . therefore love is the fulfilling of the law", he was referring to the law of Moses. Beside we have the testimony of Christ Himself, Who said concerning love to God and neighbour that 'on these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets' (Matt. xxii. 36-40).

The Apostle not only introduced this correction to misunderstanding and excessive zeal in Romans and Galatians, he introduced the law without provocation and without the pressure of debate into such an epistle as Ephesians, saying not simply 'Children obey your parents in the Lord; for this is RIGHT' and leaving it there, but extends the exhortation by a full length quotation from the commandment, saying:

> "Honour thy father and mother"; (which is the first commandment with promise);
> "That it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long on the earth" (Eph. vi. 2, 3).

Further, Paul accommodates the citation to the Ephesian reader by omitting the words 'which the Lord thy God giveth thee' which were strictly applicable to Israel only, and indicates the reason why he quoted the commandment in extension, by the parenthetical remark concerning the fact that this was the first commandment 'with promise'.

It is perfectly obvious that the Apostle who so vigorously rejected the law as a means of salvation, gave it a high place as a guide to those who were most truly saved. It is as though he would say to these Galatians who had become so zealous for the law "Instead of submitting to circumcision and making obedience to 'the whole law' an obligation, cutting you off from Christ, here is a most gracious opportunity to fulfil 'all the law' by walking in love. The one is a fatal intrusion, the other a living expression. The one seeks to earn salvation and must fail, the other manifests a salvation already possessed and gloriously succeeds".

In the sequel, as the structure reveals, the fulfilling of the law of Christ is put in correspondence with the fulfilling of the law of love. This must be considered in its proper place, but there now awaits us the larger member Gal. v. 16-26 with its conflict between flesh and spirit, its exhortation to walk in the spirit, and its double statement that those who do so walk are not under the law, neither is there any law against those who produce the fruits of the Spirit. To this important theme we must therefore address ourselves.

No.77. (35) GALATIANS.
Gal. v. 10 - vi. 10 --- The Troubler and The Restorer.
Flesh v. Spirit (v. 16 - 26).
pp. 135 - 139

The Apostle's application of the truth that 'faith worketh by love', and 'love is the fulfilling of the law' is intensely practical and pointed. He does not speak in general terms or of some far off contingencies; he applies the moral to the actual state of affairs which marred the Christian witness of the Galatians. He opens this section with such pointed references as:

> "But if ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another", and closes on the same note:

> "Let us not be desirous of vain glory, provoking one another, envying one another" (Gal. v. 15, 26).

Has Paul put his finger on the root cause of most of the strife that has marred Christian fellowship? He does not speak of zeal for the truth that over-ran the claims of charity; he does not speak of the strain of double loyalties, he speaks of 'vain glory' and 'envy' as being close to the root.

The figures of 'biting' and 'devouring' are borrowed from the habits of wild beasts; the Apostle using such terms to awaken the consciences of his hearers, and by the climax 'consume one another' indicates that such internal strife can end in but one way—the destruction of the whole witness. In the closing words he does not actually accuse the Galatians of desiring vain glory, or of provoking one another or of envying one another; he rather warns them of the danger they were in. These unlovely traits can soon manifest themselves if 'liberty gives an occasion to the flesh'. Just as love indicates by its presence the existence of true faith (Gal. v. 6), and just as love fulfils the whole law (v. 14), so will love prevent the appearance of these evils which spring from the flesh in the believer and not from the spirit.

The exhortation therefore to 'walk in the spirit' is tantamount to saying 'walk in love'. We have indicated in the structure that this section begins and ends with the words 'walk in the spirit', we must now record that two different words are here translated 'walk'.

Peripateo. This word translated 'walk' in Gal. v. 16, often means a mode of life, so the Apostle could speak of 'good works which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them' (Eph. ii. 10). The believer's emancipation from the dominion of sin and death is said to set him free 'to walk in newness of life' (Rom. vi. 4).

Stoicheo translated 'walk' in Gal. v. 25, looks rather to the rules whereby the walk is regulated. Stoicheis are the 'first principles' (Heb. v. 12). This particular walk is in contrast with the usage of stoicheia in Gal. iv. 3 and 9, where Paul refers to the bondage that they had been under the elements of the world, and calls their retrograde movement a return to 'weak and beggarly elements'. In Gal. vi. 16 this walk in the spirit is associated with the rule of the new creation, and shows what the Apostle intended by the words 'walk in the spirit'. While the Holy Spirit Himself can never be completely absent from anything or any sphere that is 'spiritual', the thought here in Gal. v. 16 and 25 is rather the new sphere of life and activity, 'spirit' as contrasted with 'flesh'. The argument of verse 26 is 'If we live spiritually, or in this new sphere, let us walk also spiritually, or in the selfsame sphere'. Walk is therefore to be understood as life manifested. The reader is doubtless well acquainted with this fact, but even so, a reference to 'walk' in Romans, Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians would be helpful.

Immediately following the reference to walking in the spirit, in Gal. v. 16, 17 is a double reference to the lusts of the flesh, and immediately preceding the exhortation to walk in the spirit in Gal. v. 24, 25 is a further reference to these same lusts.

These passages contain all the occurrences of epithumeo/ia in Galatians:

> "This I say then, Walk in the spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh. For the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh: and these are contrary the one to the other: so that ye cannot do the things that ye would" (Gal. v. 16, 17).
>
> "And they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts. If we live in the spirit, let us also walk in the spirit" (Gal. v. 24, 25).

The first item to notice is that in verse 16 'lust' is singular, whereas in verse 24 it is plural. That is, in the first case we are looking at a principle, in the second we are looking at particularized lusts. The principle is set before us as in verse 17, in the essential antagonism of flesh and spirit as such; while the particular lusts are enumerated in verses 19-21 under the heading "The works of the flesh". Most, if not all, are able to discern some one particular sin or short-coming, this passage takes us deeper and reveals the root cause.

Before examining verse 17 more closely a word is necessary regarding the intention of the Apostle in the word translated 'lust'. Today, the word has lost most of its primary meaning and is limited to 'libidinous desire, degrading animal passion', but in earlier days it had the meaning of 'desire' without necessarily meaning an evil desire. For example Foxe writes "Little leysure and lesse lust to hear sermons or to read bookes". We still use the word in the sense of strong overmastering desire in such phrases as "The lust for power". So in the N.T. epithumeo not only refers to the lower lusts of the flesh, but is the word translated 'desire' in a good sense (Matt. xiii. 17; Luke xxii. 15; I Pet. i. 12), and "desire" in a bad sense, namely 'to covet' (Rom. vii. 7). Epithumia also is used in the same way. Paul's "desire" to depart (Phil. i. 23) had nothing evil or base about it, yet the self same word is found in Col. iii. 5 where it is translated 'concupiscence'. Strong desire, however, if it arises from the flesh in which 'dwelleth no good thing' cannot but be evil. Consequently the 'desires of the flesh' and the 'desires of the spirit' are "contrary" the one to the other.

Antikeimai ‘contrary’ occurs in the N.T. 8 times, once ‘oppose’, twice ‘contrary’ and five times ‘adversary’. In Galatians the opposition may not always be active, but is always latent. The result of this innate opposition is expressed by the Apostle ‘so that ye cannot do the things that ye would’. It is a poor interpretation that does not see a ground of hope here as well as a reason for sorrow. Uppermost in the mind of the reader and sometimes the only aspect presented by the commentator is that the flesh prevents the believer from accomplishing the good that he sees to be required, and this truth has the full support of such a passage as Rom. vii. 15, 19. There is however another side to the picture, a bright side. The spirit also lusteth against the flesh, so that the believer is prevented from doing some of those evil things to which the flesh unchecked would lead him.

Here in Gal. v. 17, we have a statement of principle and of fact, but no hint is given of the believer’s source of power except that it is derived from the Spirit. In the corresponding verse, where separate and individual ‘desires’ are in view, there the true source of all such spiritual antagonism and overcoming is revealed. “They that are Christ’s”—these will be the ones that live in the spirit. These ‘have crucified the flesh with the affections and desires’. As in chapter ii. and chapter iii. the Galatian believer in this battle of flesh and spirit, of law and grace, of faith and works, is taught to see the great dividing line made by the Cross, and to learn that from the Cross of Christ comes alone the strength to overcome.

“Affection” like ‘lust’ is a word that needs handling with care. Nowhere in the Scriptures is there the slightest thought that human affections are to be denied or deprecated. Such passages that come to mind point all in the other direction. “Set your affection on things above”; “kindly affectioned one to another”; “Being affectionately desirous of you”. Paul not only deplored in Rom. i. that the heathen world had been given up to ‘vile affections’, he also deplored that these same heathen were ‘without natural affection’. Pathema, the word translated ‘affections’ in Gal. v. 24 is translated ‘sufferings’ in Rom. viii. 18, and Phil. iii. 10, and out of the 16 occurrences, 14 are used in the highest and best sense, leaving but 2, namely Rom. vii. 5 ‘the motions of sins’ and the passage before us, in a bad sense.

Those who are in the spirit actuated by the spirit, walking and living in the spirit, or as verse 18 sums it up “If ye be led of the spirit”, such are not under law. “For as many as are led by the spirit of God, they are the sons of God” and have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but have received the spirit of adoption, even as those of the Galatians, whereby they cry Abba, Father (Rom. viii. 14, 15; Gal. iv. 5, 6). “Under law” and “under grace” are terms indicating a complete change of dispensation, the death of Christ intervening and making a boundary never to be re-crossed (Rom. vi. 14).

The Apostle now looks at the ‘flesh’ and the ‘spirit’ not so much as they are in themselves, but with regard to their products. These he calls ‘works’ when speaking of the flesh, and ‘fruit’ when speaking of the spirit, and the contrast is not only the contrast of work and fruit, but of ‘works’ in the plural and of ‘fruit’ in the singular.

Paul makes no exhaustive list of the works of the flesh—he does not say 'The works of the flesh are manifest, which are—" but atina 'such as are'. In Rom. ix. 4 he uses the word in the sense who are of such a kind that whatever else they may or may not be, they are Israelites. These works of the flesh will be representative, and were the Apostle alive today he would probably omit some and add others. We must therefore not dwell so much upon each individual work of the flesh, as to observe what sort of act it is, consequently we discover upon examination that the works of the flesh to fall into groups:

(1) Sensual passions. (2) Superstitions. (3) Disruptive movements. (4) Excesses.

The inclusion of sensual passions and idolatry may sound strange to our ears, but the pagan world had too long looked upon such practices with condonement for the Galatians to have the same moral outlook as a believer who has never had contact with the awful degradation of idolatry. The works of the flesh that come under the third heading however, are, alas, never long absent from Christian testimony.

"Hatred, variance, emulation, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envyings."

"Hatred", in this, we have the negation of love, and from this lack of true charity, all the rest spring.

"Variance and emulations." "Here we have strife and rivalry, leading to exhibition of wrath and 'factious cabals' a stronger development of 'emulations'; and at 'sedition and heresy' we reach the point where the contending parties separate; such separation is either temporary dichostasia (seditions or divisions), or permanent aireseis (sects, heresies)" (Lightfoot). After adding murder, drunkenness and revellings to the dreadful list the Apostle said: "Of the which I tell you before, as I have also told you in time past, that they which do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God" (Gal. v. 21). Salvation is not at stake, but all that goes to make up the conception of 'inheriting the kingdom of God' is. This most solemn warning is as applicable to the church of the Mystery as it was to the church of the Galatians.

> "Walk in love . . . . . but fornication, and all uncleanness, or covetousness, let it not be once named among you, as becometh saints; neither filthiness, nor foolish talking, nor jesting, which are not convenient: but rather giving of thanks. For this ye know, that no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolator, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God" (Eph. v. 2-5).

As in Eph. v., Paul passes from these works of the flesh, to speak of the 'fruit of the spirit' (Eph. v. 9) so he does here in Gal. v.: he says, "Be not deceived, God is not mocked".

The fruit of the spirit is a lovely cluster, a refreshing subject after the uncleanness of the previous list. If the works of the flesh commenced with 'hatred' the fruit of the spirit commences with 'love'. Those who produce this fruit are in an enviable position "Against such there is no law". After urging the believer to walk in the same sphere as he now lives, namely in the spirit, the Apostle makes one more reference to the evils arising out of the flesh, this time putting 'vain-glory' at or near the root. The remainder of this section, which occupies verses 1-10 of chapter vi. must be studied in our next article.

No.78. (36) GALATIANS.
Gal. v. 10 - vi. 10 --- The Troubler and The Restorer.
Sowing and reaping (vi. 3 - 10).
pp. 148 - 152

In blessed contrast with the 'troubler', the Apostle places the 'restorer'. The word so translated means to 'mend' as a net (Matt. iv. 21), and is found in medical works of N.T. times for the resetting of a fractured limb. Again, in contrast with the overbearing spirit of the troubler, Paul speaks of the spirit of meekness in which the truly spiritual seek to restore one overtaken either 'in' or 'by' a fault, considering at the same time themselves lest they also be tempted.

In chapter vi. 2 we read "Bear ye one another's burdens" yet in verse 5 "every man shall bear his own burden". There is no contradiction here. Two distinct words are translated 'burden' and two distinct aspects of truth are presented to us. In verse 2 the Greek word baros (familiar in the word barometer) refers to pressure or weight, and the believer is enjoined to help his brother when thus overloaded. In verse 5, however, it is the Greek word phortion, the lading of a ship, the freight that is a legitimate load, the knapsack and equipment of a soldier. This can be shared with none. The Apostle puts no stress upon doctrine when he speaks of the restoration of a brother who has been overtaken by a fault; no word is uttered as to 'right division', no warning about 'things that differ', his chief concern is the spirit in which the restoration is attempted. "The spirit of meekness"; "considering thyself"; "bear one another's burdens". These are the things that are stressed.

That an argument persists from verse 3 to verse 10 is apparent, for we have the links "For", "But", "Therefore", in these verses, and the words of verse 3 are a continuation of the Apostle's insistence upon the 'spirit of meekness':

> "For if a man think himself to be something, when he is nothing, he deceiveth himself" (Gal. vi. 3).

Dokeo 'to think' does not mean so much the process of thought that involves perception and reason, it means rather to esteem, to form an opinion, which as Dr. Bullinger in his Lexicon points out may be right (John v. 39; Acts xv. 28); but which may be wrong (Matt. vi. 7; John xvi. 2). Here, the person who thought himself 'to be something' was wrong, for, said the Apostle 'he is nothing' and so 'deceiveth himself'. There is something familiar about the words Ei gar dokei tis einai ti "For if anyone thinketh himself to be something", for we have met similar wording before and in connection with this same contention for the truth of the gospel:

> "But of these who seemed to be somewhat" (Gal. ii. 6).

Apo de ton dokounton einai ti, where the reference is to Peter, James and John 'who seemed to be pillars'. If, said Paul, such reputable and evident persons of high position in the church, are of no account the moment they antagonize the truth, the troubler in your midst, who has intimidated you by his own estimate of himself, can surely be seen in his true colors. No 'respect of persons' can ever be permitted in the fight of faith.

"When he is nothing." The Greek language has two words with which to express the idea of 'nothing'. Oudeis the objective, and medeis the conditional negative. Here the Apostle uses medeis. It is beside the point to say that "He is nothing, to wit, in himself, but by the grace of God he is what he is" (Whitby), for that is a gracious truth and a blessed acknowledgment, rather does Paul express the opinion that one must entertain of all similar boasters, "He deceiveth himself" but not his neighbour. This self deception meets us again in the warning of verse 7 'be not deceived', and helps us to see the continuation of the argument. Instead of forming such vain estimations of one's importance, the Apostle suggests that a more salutary procedure would be to keep in mind the judgment seat of Christ.

> "But let every man prove his own work, and then shall he have rejoicing in himself alone, and not in another. For every man shall bear his own burden" (Gal. vi. 4, 5).

We have already observed that the word 'think' in verse 3 is dokeo, and it is important that we should remember this for the thought appears again in verse 4 "Let every man prove his own work", where 'prove' is dokimazeto. The word means to 'try' as one does a metal (see I Pet. i. 7). It is used in II Tim. ii. 15 for the idea of being 'approved'. The insistence of 'proving his own work', and having rejoicing 'in himself alone' refers to that fallacious standard which often set up 'comparing ourselves with ourselves' which is 'not wise' (II Cor. x. 12). Paul pauses a similar line of argument to that of Gal. vi. 3-5 in I Cor. iv.:

> "Let a man so account of us, as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God.
>
> Moreover it is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful.
>
> But with me it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you, or of man's judgment: yea, I judge not mine own self.
>
> For I know nothing by myself; yet am I not hereby justified: but he that judgeth me is the Lord.
>
> Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, Who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts: and then shall every man have praise of God.
>
> And these things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myself and to Apollos for your sakes: that ye might learn in us not to think of men above that which is written, that no one of you be puffed up for one against another" (I Cor. iv. 1-6).
>
> "Every man's work shall be made manifest . . . . . the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is" (I Cor. iii. 13).

In that day every man shall bare his own burden both of responsibility and of reward, it would be wise to make all our estimates in the light of that day.

> "Let him that is taught in the word communicate unto him that teacheth in all good things" (Gal. vi. 6).

Is this the opening sentence of a new subject? Or is there a logical connection with what has gone before? The adversative conjunction de is used by the Apostle; this is left untranslated in the A.V., but is included in the R.V. "De arrests a former topic before it passes out of sight" (Lightfoot).

Do not think, Paul seems to say, that because every man must bear his own burden, this exempts any one of you from sharing in the general welfare of the church as a whole or with those who by virtue of their calling may be more dependent upon your liberality. More so, in that in the foregoing sentences, certain warnings and strictures have been made particularly applicable to those who rule and teach in the assembly. Each man must bear his own burden: but this does not exempt any one of you from the responsibility of sharing with those who are teachers of the Word. The figure of 'sowing and reaping' with which the Apostle endorses this lesson here, is found elsewhere in the epistles. "If we have sown unto you spiritual things, is it a great thing if we shall reap your carnal things?" (I Cor. ix. 11).

In the closing verses of the epistle to the Hebrews there is a reference to this need for practical 'communication', set over against 'the fruits of the lips'—thus:

> "But to do good and to communicate forget not; for with such sacrifices God is well pleased" (Heb. xiii. 16); and it is recorded by a thankful Apostle to the continual praise of the Philippians that when he departed from Macedonia "No church communicated" with him "as concerning giving and receiving" but the Philippian church only (Phil. iv. 15).

Katecheo 'to teach' which is used here, is not of very frequent occurrence, the word commonly used being didasko which gives us the word 'doctrine' which is either didaskalia (the substance) or didache (the act). The word used in Gal. vi. 6 will be more familiar to some in its English garb 'catechize', 'catechism' and the like. Teaching in this form was usually oral, and in the form of question and answer, a method in the hands of those 'apt to teach' that is truly excellent. Moreover this form of teaching 'brings both teacher and taught very close together, and the 'communication' consequently could not be one sided.

"God is not mocked." An undiscerning use of 'texts' for preaching purposes has placed undue emphasis upon this text from the point of view of the 'sinner', what we need to do is to reinstate the warning as one primarily addressed to the 'saint'. Moreover, Paul has chosen a peculiar word here. The most usual word for 'to mock' is empaizo, to treat as a child, but the word used by Paul in Gal. vi. 7 is mukterizomai, a word not very familiar to the reader, but which nevertheless appears in the English dictionary as "mycterism, a gibe, a scoff". The word derived from mukter 'The nose' and alludes to the habit of putting the finger to the nose, to indicate derision. In writers of rhetoric mykterismos is ordinarily treated as a species of irony. Dr. Bullinger gives it separately under Chleuasmos or mocking, and Luke uses an intensive form of this same word in chapter xvi. 14 where he describes the scoffing attitude of the Pharisees. Just as men 'mocked' God by saying 'corban' (Mark vii. 11) so the believer may fall into the same evil by a hypocritical parsimony. The Apostle uses the figure of sowing and reaping in II Cor. ix. 6, where the particular reference is to the collection for the poor believers of Judaea. The churches of Galatia also were invited to take part in this gift (I Cor. xvi. 1).

Under this figure of sowing and reaping is included the whole of life's activities, and without using one word of philosophical jargon nevertheless brings before us the whole philosophy of cause and effect. Every action may be likened to 'sowing'. Reward and punishment alike may be compared with 'reaping', and just as men do not gather figs from thorns, nor grapes from a bramble bush (Luke vi. 44), so any action that has 'the flesh' as its goal must assuredly reap corruption, every action that has 'the spirit' as its goal must as assuredly reap life everlasting. The brother who undertakes to restore another who has been overtaken in a fault can do it in a spirit of meekness, or a spirit of spiritual pride; one believer may fulfil the law of Christ by bearing the burden of a fellow believer, the other may think himself 'something' and refuse to stoop so low, one who is taught in the Word may communicate with him that teaches, or he may withhold such fellowship. It matters not, all such sowing must have a corresponding reaping.

> "And let us not be weary in well doing: for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not" (Gal. vi. 9).

The Apostle passes from the beneficence that belongs to 'him that is taught in the word' (verse 6) to the general underlying principle of all such action (verses 7, 8), and now in verse 9 he rounds the matter off with an exhortation to continuance and patience, acknowledging the intrusion of weariness at time, but exhorting all to keep the end in sight, bring the practical call to liberal and generous fellowship to a conclusion by saying:

> "As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith" (Gal. vi. 10).

It appears that at this point Paul takes the pen from the hand of the writer, and with evident labour, writes the closing verses. This we must consider in our next article thus bringing the study of this most important epistle to a fit conclusion.

No.79. (37) GALATIANS.
The Large Letter (vi. 11).
pp. 169 - 173

The closing section of this epistle opens with the words: "Ye see how large a letter I have written unto you with mine own hand" (Gal. vi. 11); the R.V. translates this: "See with how large letters I have written unto you (margin 'or write') with mine own hand."

It is remarkable what differences of opinion have been expressed by commentators concerning the meaning of these words, but they may be summarized under the following headings:

(1) That Paul wrote the whole epistle to the Galatians with his own hand, and calls this epistle "a large letter".
(2) That the words "how large a letter" refer to the length of the epistle, being equivalent to "how long an epistle".
(3) That Paul wrote the whole epistle to the Galatians with his own hand, and calls the attention of the Galatians to "the large letters" he used, referring to the size of the characters and not to the length of the epistle.
(4) That Paul dictated, as was his custom, the bulk of the epistle, but at verse 11 he took the pen from the hand of the amanuensis and wrote the postscript himself.
(5) That the postscript alone was written "with large letters".
(6) That the large letters were a sign of the Apostle's earnestness, the largeness of the letter used being equivalent to the use of CAPITALS or Italics on the printed page.
(7) That the large letters were not adopted by the Apostle for the sake of emphasis, but that owing to his defective eye-sight (already alluded to arouse the latent affection of the Galatians) he could not write otherwise than with "large letters".
(8) Finally, Deissmann's opinion that to soften the angry tone of the epistle, Paul concluded with a little joke, so that 'his dear silly children' should understand that with the "large letters" "the seriousness of the punishing schoolmaster had vanished from his features" (Bibelstudein p.263).

We need spend no time on Deissmann's fancy, but we must give attention to the alternatives set out under the first seven headings. This we will do, not by taking them seriatum, but by keeping them in mind while examining the actual wording of the passage.

First, the structure of the sentence and the words used.

Idete pelikois humin grammasin egrapsa te eme cheiri.

Idete. "Ye see." The word is emphatic, and not to be translated 'ye see' but rather 'look ye', drawing attention to a feature of unusual interest. In Gal. v. 2 the Apostle uses ide 'behold', as though he said 'mark well'.

Pelikois. Ellicott says that the word strictly denotes geometrical magnitude 'how large', in contradistinction to arithmetical magnitude expressed by posos 'how many'.

Pelokois is so used in the LXX of Zech. ii. 2. In Heb. vii. 4 the idea of magnitude in an ethical sense is expressed by this same word. We must, therefore, avoid confusing the ideas of 'how large' with 'how many' or with 'how lengthy'.

Grammata. Once only does grammata signify an epistle, namely in Acts xxviii. 21, where the Jews at Rome declared 'we neither received letters out of Judea concerning thee'. This, however, is an isolated usage and not used by Paul but by the Jews. Where Paul desires to speak of an epistle he uses the regular epistole and that seventeen times.

Grammasin is in the dative plural, and we are compelled to translate these words as they are in Luke xxiii. 38 "and a superscription also was written over Him in letters of Greek, and Latin, and Hebrew". The fact that the word here in Galatians is in the plural prevents us from translating it by the word epistle in this place.

Egrapsa. This word is in the aorist tense, but whether this is what is known as 'the epistolary aorist' where the reference would be to the time when the epistle is received, or whether it should be translated 'I wrote' or in idiomatic English 'I have written' referring to the writing of the epistle itself is something we must attempt to answer presently.

It was the custom of writers in Paul's time to employ the service of a trained scribe, and one, evidently a believer, has inserted his name in the epistle to the Romans:

> "I, Tertius, who wrote this epistle, salute you" (Rom. xvi. 22).

It is common knowledge that Rom. xvi. 25-27 was added as a 'postscript' to the epistle, and Alford has suggested that 'we may conceive him (Paul) to have taken his pen off from one of the pastoral epistles and to have written it under the same impulse'. He gives a list of words and expressions found in the postscript and in the pastoral epistles that point to this conclusion. For example, 'my gospel' is found in II Tim. ii. 8; kerugma 'preaching' is found in II Tim. iv. 17 and Titus i. 3; chronois aioniosis 'age-times' in II Tim. i. 9 and Titus i. 2; etc.

The Apostle makes a pointed reference to his 'sign-manual' when writing to the Thessalonians, for they had been deceived by a letter purporting to come from himself (II Thess. ii. 2), consequently he draws their attention to a feature in his salutation:

> "The salutation of Paul with mine own hand, which is the token in every epistle: so I write. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all" (II Thess. iii. 17, 18).

Here the Apostle draws attention to two features:

(1) The handwriting 'so I write';
(2) The form of the salutation 'Grace . . . . . with you'.

The Apostle did not always call attention to the fact that he concluded his epistles with a note in his own hand. He does in I Cor. xvi. 21, "The salutation of me Paul with mine own hand", and again in Col. iv. 18. The form of the salutation varies in small particulars in the several epistles, but ALWAYS includes the words "Grace . . . . . be with . . . . ." As this is a matter of first importance let us not begrudge the time spent in noting this evidential feature, especially as Paul himself has been at pains to call our attention to it.

"THE SALUTATION OF ME PAUL WITH MINE OWN HAND"

ROMANS.	"The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen." Repeated in verse 24 (xvi. 20, 24).
I CORINTHIANS.	"The salutation of me Paul with mine own hand . . . . . the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you." (xvi. 21-23).
II CORINTHIANS.	"The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy ghost, be with you all. Amen." (xiii. 14).
GALATIANS.	"Brethren, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit. Amen." (vi. 18).
EPHESIANS.	"Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. Amen." (vi. 24).
PHILIPPIANS.	"The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen." (iv. 23).
COLOSSIANS.	"The salutation by the hand of me Paul. Remember my bonds. Grace be with you. Amen" (iv. 18).
I THESSALONIANS.	"The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen." (v. 28).
II THESSALONIANS.	"I Paul add the greeting with my own hand, which is the credential in every letter of mine. This is my hand writing. May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all." (iii. 17, 18, Weymouth).
I TIMOTHY.	"Grace be with thee. Amen" (vi. 21).
II TIMOTHY.	"The Lord Jesus Christ be with thy spirit. Grace be with you. Amen." (iv 22).
TITUS.	"Grace be with you all. Amen." (iii. 15).
PHILEMON.	"The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit. Amen." (25).
HEBREWS.	"Grace be with you all. Amen." (xiii. 25).

Here is a consistent witness, made even more definite by observing the concluding words of the epistles of Peter, James, John and Jude. In this list the epistle to the Hebrews finds a place, and while we do not limit the evidence to the Pauline authorship to this one feature, an unbiased reader cannot but feel that unless some evidence to the contrary is forthcoming, the epistle to the Hebrews is as clearly by the Apostle Paul, as any one of his accepted epistles. If the word egrapsa be taken as the epistolary aorist, then the actual words written with large letters will be the postscript, Gal. vi. 11-18. If, however, egrapsa refers to what has already been written, then the Apostle must be supposed to have departed from his usual custom and to have written the whole epistle with his own hand. The aorist usually refers either (1) to a former letter (I Cor. v. 9) or (2) to an epistle now concluded (Rom. xv. 15), or (3) to a foregoing portion of the epistle (I Cor. ix. 15).

> "With this partially conflicting evidence it seems impossible to decide positively whether St. Paul wrote the whole or only the concluding portion" (Ellicott).

Our own conclusion, which coincides with that of Lightfoot, Conybeare and Howson, and The Companion Bible, is that the 'large letters' written with Paul's own hand refer to the postscript only. Conybeare and Howson print as a note the following illustrative incident:

> "The writer of this note received a letter from the venerable Neander a few months before his death . . . . . His letter is written in the fair flowing hand of an amanuensis, but it ends with a few irregular lines in large rugged characters, written by himself, explaining the cause of his needing the service of an amanuensis, namely, the weakness of his eyes (probably the very malady of St. Paul). It is impossible to read this autograph without thinking of the present passage, observing that he might have expressed himself in the very words of St. Paul—Ide pelikois soi grammain egrapsa te eme cheiri. "Humin 'to you'. Standing after pelokois 'large', this word can scarcely be taken with 'I write' or 'I wrote' to you, it is connected with pelokois, as though the Apostle said 'How large, mark you'."."

Whether the large letters were for emphasis, a thought already incipient in the figure of the 'placard' ("evidently set forth") of Gal. iii. 1, or whether Paul's handwriting was, unlike that of the trained slave, rather irregular, to which may be added the affliction of his eyes which he mentions in Gal. iv. 15, may not be easy to decide, but emphasis there is from single or combined causes. Whether Paul wrote the whole epistle in large letters, or whether the postscript only was written by his hand, and the postscript only in large letters, the fact remains that we have an emphatic personal summary given by the Apostle at the close of this most personal epistle.

In Hebrews we have a 'summary' given in chapter viii., where we learn that 'a seated priest in a heavenly sanctuary' sums up what Paul had been teaching in the first seven chapters. Here in Gal. vi. 12-16, we have the Apostle's own underlining, and we should be foolish in the extreme if we neglected a guide so capable to the understanding of the main theme of this most important epistle.

No.80. (38) GALATIANS.
The Emphasized Summary and Salutation (vi. 12 - 18).
pp. 195 - 198

The subjects underlined by the Apostle in this personally hand written summary are:

(1) Circumcision. (2) The Cross of Christ. (3) Crucifixion of self.
(4) Creation (new) and (5) Canon (rule).

Of the Circumcision he says:--

> "As many as desire to make a fair show in the flesh, they constrained you to be circumcised; only lest they should suffer persecution for the cross of Christ. For neither they themselves who are circumcised keep the law; but desire to have you circumcised, that they may glory in your flesh" (Gal. vi. 12, 13).

After an expansion of the place of 'the cross of Christ' in verse 14 the Apostle returns to the place of circumcision, saying:

> "For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature" (Gal. vi. 15).

He then speaks of 'this rule' or 'canon' namely the rule of the new creation, saying:

> "As many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God" (Gal. vi. 16).

Paul's summing up of the circumcision party and their alms is reducible to the following heads:

(1) A desire for a fair show 'in the flesh' and for glorying or boasting 'in your flesh'.

(2) This desire to stand well in the flesh 'constrains' these teachers to have the Galatians circumcised, but with an added reason, not that they can ever hope to keep the law, but in order that they may avoid persecution for the cross of Christ.

(3) Instead of 'glorying' (or boasting) in the flesh and of attempting to avoid persecution for the sake of the Cross, the Apostle's attitude was to 'glory' (or boast) in nothing save the very Cross that was an offence to the Judaizers, and by this cross he realized that the world and all it stood for was crucified to him, even as he recognized that by the Cross he too had been crucified to the world.

(4) Yet he would be the last to give colour to the thought that he was forming an opposition party called "The Uncircumcision".

In Christ Jesus neither circumcision nor uncircumcision avails or 'is' (so the texts) anything. He had but one answer to all such alternations: the position of the believer 'in Christ Jesus', the state of the believer 'dead' to sin, law and the world.

(5) This was however no mere negative attitude and doctrine; it was definitely and positively 'a new creature', or better 'a new creation' in which 'old things have passed away and new things have come into being'. This new creation pulses with life; it is the only 'rule' or 'canon' by which 'new creatures in Christ' can hope to 'walk in newness of life'.

(6) The Galatians had been reproved for submitting to the bondage of 'rudiments' (stoicheia) and of returning to weak and beggarly 'elements' (stoicheia), but now they are reminded of a new, living 'walk' (stoicheo), a walk that is 'in the spirit' and according to the rule of the new creation.

(7) Upon all such the Apostle writes 'peace and mercy' and he adds 'upon the Israel of God'—looking to the true believers from among the Jews, who were in vivid contrast with "Israel according to the flesh".

Even an apostle, strengthened and equipped as he was by the Spirit of God, by grace and by truth, must at some time cry 'Hold, enough'. To say more would be but the multiplication of words, and so he concludes by saying:

> "From henceforth let no man trouble me: for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus" (Gal. vi. 17).

The "I" is emphatic. "He bore in his body the proofs that by no subterfuge, such as they attributed to him, had he evaded the consequences of a faithful delivery of the doctrine of the cross" (Gwynne). These 'marks' are stigmata, the scars left by the scourging, the imprisonment, the stoning, the ship wrecks that had accompanied his ministry, and had, as it were, recompensed his faithfulness by affliction. In the days of Paul, stigmata indicated either that the persons bearing them were domestic slaves, or slaves attached to a temple. In accord with this significance is the reading of the Revised Text, which, instead of reading as the A.V. "The marks of the Lord Jesus", omits the word 'Lord', for the personal name of the owner of the slave is all that was wanted. Moffatt's translation of Gal. vi. 17, is "Let no one interfere with me after this, for I bear branded on my body the owner's stamp of Jesus".

The Apostle, from the commencement of his commission, knew that 'suffering' for the name of Christ formed an integral part of it. Not only was Ananias informed by the Lord that Paul was a chosen vessel to bear His name before the Gentiles and Kings and the children of Israel, but the peculiar nature of this commission was emphasized by the added words "I will show him how great things he must suffer for My name's sake" (Acts ix. 15, 16).

When he summed up his early ministry in Acts xx. and looked forward to the next phase of his commission he said, "And now, behold, I go bound in the spirit unto Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there: save that the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, saying that bonds and afflictions abide me" (Acts xx. 22, 23).

After his imprisonment, when he became "the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles" (Eph. iii. 1), he assured the Ephesians that his tribulations on their behalf were their 'glory' (Eph. iii. 13), and realized that there were reserved some sufferings which he now 'filled up' (Col. i. 24). In Philippians, Paul's Lord and Master stooped to the form of a 'slave' (Phil. ii. 7) and a slave could be punished with crucifixion, but a Roman citizen (as Paul was) could not. Nevertheless it was the Apostle's prayer that he might know the Lord and the power of His resurrection and the fellowship of His sufferings, 'being made conformable unto His death'. The stigmata or brand marks which Paul bore in his body were definitely associated with fellowship with the sufferings of Christ, and for ever separated him from those who, to avoid the offence of the cross, adulterated the gospel of grace with the dregs of Jewish ceremonial.

Paul was constrained to write two epistles on the great theme of Justification by faith without works of law, namely Galatians and Romans. In Galatians, at the beginning of the conflict, he threw the whole weight of his apostolic authority and independence into the scale (see structure of Gal. i.), and not until the last word is uttered can he take the attitude which love dictated, namely to subscribe himself, 'a bond slave' of Jesus Christ. At the opening of the epistle he stresses his credentials; at the close, he draws attention to the marks his body bears of his faithful adherence to the truth. By the time he came to write Romans, the conflict with Judaism had died down and he was then free to open that great epistle not with his apostolic authority, but with the words "Paul a bond-slave of Jesus Christ, called to be an apostle" (Rom. i. 1).

Farrar remarks that in verses 12 and 13 Paul resumed the polemical, and in verses 14 and 16 the dogmatic theses of the epistle; and that the personal (17) as well as the doctrinal truth (18) on which he had been dwelling recur in the last two verses.

The salutation with which the epistle ends contains one unusual word. In every salutation made by Paul there are to be found the core as it were of all his greetings "Grace . . . . . be with . . . . ." Once this is expanded in II Cor. xiii. 14 to include the Trinity, and the salutation of Ephesians make special reference to those that love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, while II Timothy and Philemon, together with Galatians, add the words 'with my (or your) spirit'; but in the salutation of the epistle to the Galatians alone the word 'brethren' occurs. The word is placed at the very end of the sentence (not as in the A.V. at the beginning). Apart from 'Amen' it is the Apostle's last word. It seems as though he would remind them that in spite of all his censure, and in spite of all the trouble they had caused him, they were and always would be 'brethren'. A blessed word with which to end an epistle in which so much felling has been manifested, and so much error exposed and condemned.

Thus we bring to an end a study that embraces doctrine that lies at the very centre of the gospel of grace. Its importance cannot be overrated; no one can fully appreciate the glories of the dispensation of the Mystery who does not whole-heartedly follow Paul in this great conflict for the truth.

Luther's translation of Galatians was one of the main instruments in promoting the Reformation, and all who have the responsibility of teaching and preaching are urged to give this epistle a place in their witness. We feel we cannot do better than end these studies with the clarion call of Gal. v. 1:

> "Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage."

"Go ye and learn what that meaneth"
(Matt. ix. 13)

No.13. Words---the material of the unashamed workman. Every word has a meaning.
pp. 14 - 17

> Rule #2. A word is the medium whereby the thoughts and ideas of one person may be made intelligible to another. Words are therefore the current coin, the material of the unashamed workman.

The principle of 'right division' which we considered in the preceding article, cannot of course be put into use apart from 'the Word of truth'. Timothy was not exhorted to 'rightly divide', merely, for that does not make sense; he was exhorted to 'rightly divide the Word of truth'. A well set saw, a well grounded chisel are valuable tools but, without timber to work upon they are as useless as the dullest implement. The exposition deals with 'words', words of truth, inspired words, living words, words that are spirit and life, but nevertheless words.

> "The examination of the Scriptures", says Dr. Chalmers, "is a pure work of grammatical analysis; it is an unmixed question of language. We must admit of no other instrument than the vocabulary and the lexicon" (which includes as we shall see the concordance in order to discover the usage as well as the original meaning of a word).
> "The mind or meaning of an author who is translated is purely a question of language, and should be decided on no other principle than that of grammar and philosophy" (By philosophy here is meant the axioms and bases of all legitimate thought).
>
> "But this principle has been most glaringly departed from in the case of the Bible. The meaning of the Author instead of being made simply and entirely a question of grammar has been made a question of metaphysics or of sentiment. It has been 'such must be the rendering by the analogy of faith, the reason of the thing, the character of the Divine mind, etc.'."

When the Most High condescended to speak to man, He chose the Hebrew and the Greek languages as His instruments. When He chose those languages, He of necessity chose to use their grammar, their modes of expression, their syntax and their vocabulary. From the Divine standpoint and from the human standpoint the language remains unchanged. In His Sovereignty and in His Providence, however, the Lord exercised wondrous wisdom in selecting or rejecting items of these languages so that His Will should be clearly made known. This is taught in Psa. xii.:

> "The words of the LORD are pure words: as silver tried in a furnace of earth, purified seven times" (Psa. xii. 6).

The Companion Bible gives reasons, grammatical and otherwise for rendering this verse as follows:

The words of Jehovah are pure words.
As silver tried in a furnace:
(Words) pertaining to the earth
Purified seven times.

The word ‘of’ in the phrase ‘words of earth’ is the Hebrew lamed which is the sign of the dative ‘to’ not the genitive ‘of’.

The meaning of this verse appears to be, that though the words used by the Lord in making known His will to man must necessarily be words that ‘pertain to the earth’, yet such is His grace and power, these words have been used with such discretion and with such precision that they are like silver purified to perfection. While therefore, in our dealing with the Scriptures we are dealing with the Hebrew and the Greek language, and are not permitted to take any liberties with its grammar, its vocabulary or its syntax (syntax refers to the disposition of the words in a sentence; grammar deals with the actual words themselves as to whether they be nouns, verbs, etc., and the various changes that must be made in order to express number, gender, case, etc.), yet we are encouraged in our search and emboldened in our trust by the consciousness that these words of earth have been purified seven times, so that without reserve we may believe all that they legitimately mean.

There are one or two other references that speak of the fact that the word of God has been ‘tried’ or ‘refined’:

“The word of the LORD is tried (margin refined)” (II Sam. xxii. 31; Psa. xviii. 30).
“Thy word is very pure (margin tried or refined)” (Psa. cxix. 140).
“Every word of God is pure (margin purified)” (Prov. xxx. 5).

It is objected by some that it is not the sign of great spirituality to be concerned about ‘mere words’. True, ‘mere words’ may be a barren field, but the pure, trued, refined words used by God demand the highest spiritual powers for their appreciation. There are few who would question the sincerity of Melancthon, friend and helper of Luther. He said:

“Scripture cannot be understood theologically unless it has already been understood grammatically.”
(Scriptura non poset intelligi theologice, nise antea sit intellecti grammatice).

Sawyer says:

“We cannot believe any further than we understand the true meaning of the divine communications.”

If a sentence were to be printed here from the original Hebrew or Greek of the Scriptures, and the reader be unacquainted with those languages, although these words would be the words used by inspiration and full of life and peace, they would be ‘mere words’ apart from understanding, and valueless to faith.

It has been a matter of great interest to many to seek the origin of language. The most important theories are:

(1) The Automatic Theory. Different sounds correspond with different feelings, and so originated language, just as iron when struck has a note peculiar to itself. This has been satirized as 'The Ding Dong' theory.

(2) The Onomatopoetic Theory. This theory is based upon the evident imitation in such words as 'splash' and has been satirized as 'The Bow-wow' theory.

(3) The Interjectional Theory. Certain ejaculations are natural to man in his expression of horror, joy or surprise. This has been satirized as 'The Pooh-pooh' theory.

Neither theory is sufficient to account for the wonder of language.

We cannot avoid concluding, both from the use of language in Eden, by Adam's evident ability to name the animals that were brought before him, and by the names given to the first children born, that language is a gift of God to man.

The reader, as did the present writer, acquired his first knowledge of language not from a book, not at a school, but in his home. What ordinarily takes several years in the home training of a child, could be accomplished immediately by the Lord in His first contact with Adam. The 'miracle' is not in the fact that language is imparted, but in the brevity of the period of instruction.

> "We count it no gentleness and fair dealing in a man of power, to require strict and punctual obedience, and yet give out his commands ambiguously. We should think he had a plot upon us . . . . . The very essence of truth is plainness and brightness, the darkness and the ignorance are our own." (Milton).

The words used by God have been chosen by Divine wisdom as the fittest to convey His meaning without ambiguity to the mind of man. It is incumbent upon all who have the privilege and responsibility of interpreting those inspired words into common speech, to see to it that so far as it is humanly possible, the same clarity be observed by them in their work.

Rule #3.

Every word has a meaning.

> It is the work of the interpreter to convey the meaning intended by the speaker to the understanding of the hearer. Simplicity and directness must be aimed at.

The business of the interpreter is primarily to do with words, and the interpreter of the Holy Scriptures, with words purified, tried and approved of God. We must remember however that words are signs, and their distinctive meanings are only binding upon the minds of men because of common consent.

Schleiermacher puts as a rule of the first importance:

> "A system resting upon principles which are immediately evident from the nature of thought and language."

Accepting the language under consideration, our own, the Hebrew or the Greek, there still remains some fundamental basis upon which all who are concerned must of necessity build. This resolves itself into the necessity to hold in the mind certain fundamental laws of thought that are axiomatic, to apply them with uniform consistency, and to realize that, wherever a difference occurs, the error lies in some misapplication of, or fault in the principles entertained.

What do we mean by an axiom? An axiom is some self evident proposition, not requiring demonstration, as for example, the whole is greater than its part. It would be useless to argue with anyone who did not immediately assent to this axiom; it lies outside the realm of debate and its discernment is associated with the very nature of the mind itself.

> "As man could not reason with man except upon the ground of a common experience and consciousness, and a community of ideas and language, so God could not communicate with man, and man could not receive instruction or revelation from God, except upon a basis of common feeling and thought." (Bosanquet).

We shall have to recur to this aspect of things when we deal with anthropomorphism (i.e. a figure of speech which speaks of God as though possessed of the members, passions and ways of man, such as 'nostrils', 'hate', etc.).

> "The wisdom of God created understanding fit and proportionable to truth, the object and end of it, as the eye is to the thing visible." (Milton).

It will be seen therefore that there must be something that is held in common by Him Whose word is interpreted by the one who interprets it, and by the one who receives the interpretation.

> "Nearly all the treatises on hermeneutics", says Moses Stuart, "since the days of Ernesti, have laid it down as an axiom which cannot be controverted, that the Bible is to be interpreted in the same manner, that is by the same principles, as all other books . . . . . these principles are coeval with nature . . . . . the person addressed has always been an interpreter in every instance where he has heard and understood what was addressed to him."

Should the reader feel some objection to thus treating the Word of God 'as all other books', let us remind him that we are for the moment, not dealing with its exposition, its preaching, its application, but its simple interpretation. We cannot treat a noun as a verb simply because we deal with Holy Writ, nay rather, we shall feel the importance of treating nouns as nouns, verbs as verbs, and observing every phase and detail with scrupulous care, just because it is Holy Writ.

Every author, whether sacred or profane must be supposed to employ such words for the conveyance of his thought as he believes will excite the same thoughts in his readers. Grimm has said "The English tongue possesses a veritable power of expression, such as, perhaps, never stood at the command of any other language of man".

Let us summarize thus: Language is the medium whereby one person conveys his thoughts and ideas to another. The following features should be kept in mind:

(1) Oral. That is, his ideas are expressed by articulate sounds which are recognized by speaker and hearer as referring to the same thing.
(2) The connection between words and ideas is arbitrary. The idea expressed by the Greek word Logos, the Hebrew word Dabar and the English word Word are the same, but the sounds are totally different.
(3) The Written word is expressed by letters grouped into words which are symbolical representations of the oral sounds and of the thoughts and ideas expressed by them.
(4) Every language is its own interpreter to those who are acquainted with its elements.
(5) Where there are no fixed principles of language, there can be no certain rules or results of interpretation.

Rule #4. The meaning of a word is to be sought in its usage.

pp. 29 - 33

It is a proverb that should be kept in mind when dealing with words and their meaning, that 'fire is a good servant but a bad master'. Etymology is a good servant, but if it controls the mind of the interpreter instead of being a useful adjunct it can very seriously mislead.

In the early books of the O.T. we might expect the words that are used to retain much of their primitive force, but as time goes on, words change in their meaning; new shades of meaning are taken on, old meanings fade and are forgotten and consequently the interpreter is faced at every step with a problem. Who, today thinks of a 'diploma' as 'a thing folded double'? Who associates 'influenza' with astrology and the 'influence' of the planets? Who thinks of the god 'Mercury' when he speaks of 'merchandise'? To translate such words literally, so that the etymology of the word could be reproduced, would in cases like the above, and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, not be translating at all. We are not concerned with the 'word' that our author has used so much as we are concerned with his 'meaning', and his meaning is not settled by the etymology of the word, but its accepted usage at the time when it was spoken or written. How easy it is to arrange a word for word literal translation of any book but how misleading its results! One writer of foreign nationality wrote 'his provisions were disappointed'. While the etymology of 'foresight' and provision' are the same both meaning 'to see beforehand' in usage they are far apart.

> Language has its value and currency only by the agreement of speakers and hearers"—Whitney.

This leads us to the next great principle that underlies all true interpretation: usus loquendi or 'common usage'. The following hints may help the reader in seeking to apply the rule of 'common usage'.

(1) The writer may have defined the word himself. Take the word 'prize' as found in Phil. iii. 14. In I Cor. ix. 24 - x. 12 the Apostle has used the word 'prize' in such a way as to preclude the idea of gift in grace. The context speaks of a race to be run, and the historic example of the failure of many of Israel renders his meaning certain. If Paul has so used the word 'prize', and if Phil. iii. reproduces the imagery of the race with its eager contestants; if like I Cor. x., he introduces those whose example must be shunned, then the interpreter is bound by all the laws of thought, honesty and impartiality, to use words that will give the same atmosphere and colouring as is found in the Apostle's own contexts.

It has been well said by one writer, whose name we have forgotten:

> "We may, with the help of a Lexicon, put together a set of words in one language corresponding to a set of words in another. But the correspondence will not necessarily be such that the meaning expressed by the translator shall be the meaning intended by the author. The meaning of words is purely conventional. Their connection with notions is to be discovered only by usage."

In prosecuting this search for the usage, we should ask:

> "What notion was affixed by persons in general who spoke the language in question at the time? If there should be several senses attached to the word, we should be at pains to discover what notion attached to the word in a particular connection."

Then we should remember:

> "That a particular application may depend upon a particular situation of the person to whom the word is immediately addressed. We should seek to discover what meaning would be affixed to any particular word by those for whom the author immediately wrote." For example what would 'Pentecost' mean to the "Jews out of every nation under heaven" (Acts ii.)?

> "Every author writes immediately for his contemporaries." "That interpretation should be preferred which accords best with the genius and language of the writer's contemporaries"—Seiler (and another).

(2) The immediate context must be taken into account. Think of the translations of such a word as pneuma. It is rendered in the A.V. "Ghost" (both small and capital "g"), "life", "breath" (margin), "spirit" (both small and capital "s"), "spiritual gift", "spiritually" and "wind".

Stoicheion means, in Peter's usage 'the elements out of which the visible fabric of creation is built' (II Pet. iii. 10, 12), whereas when used by Paul, the word means:

> "those rudimentary first steps that belong to the dispensation of the law, or in the world, as contrasted with the fullness found under grace."

(3) Antithesis and contrast are often deciding factors. We remember one friend who had accepted the doctrine that God was the author of sin, maintaining in proof that there was a passage that read:

> "I make good and create evil."

He had unconsciously accommodated the Scripture to his own terrible doctrine. The actual passage says:

> "I make peace, and create evil" (Isa. xlv. 7) not "I make good and create evil."

The Hebrew word translated 'evil' is ra, and is rendered adversity, affliction, bad, calamity, displeasure, distress, evil, grief, grievous, harm, heavy, hurt, hurtful, ill, mischief, ill favoured, mischievous, misery, naught, naughty, noisome, sad, sorrow, trouble, sore, wicked, wickedness, wickedly, worse, wretchedness and wrong.

Now while it may be true that the A.V. translators exercised a considerable latitude in rendering the Hebrew and the Greek of the originals, such an array of renderings cannot be dismissed without examination. We discover that evil may refer to moral evil or it may refer to calamity and grief that follows judgment for sin. This being the case, the matter is settled by contrast. If the word 'good' is used in contrast, then evil will most likely be moral, if 'peace' be used in contrast, then evil will refer to some affliction. Isa. xlv. 7 does not countenance the idea that God is the author of moral evil, it teaches that God is the One Who both awards peace and Who sends affliction according to His righteous judgment of man.

We now consider in the next place the importance of investigating parallel passages.

(4) Parallel passages must be considered before deciding the meaning of any word used in Scripture, and this comparison must cover the following seven subdivisions:

(a) Parallel passages in the writings of the same author.
(b) Parallel passages in the writings of other authors.
(c) Obscure passages compared with simple and clear parallels.

(d) Seek some addition in a parallel passage such as a qualifying adjective.
(e) Look for a verbal form to explain a noun and vice versa.
(f) Look for parallel passages which use a synonym.
(g) Look for parallel passages that give any added information.

There will be no need to illustrate (a) since it is self evident, and we have alluded to it earlier when speaking of Paul's usage of the word 'prize' in I Cor. ix., deciding the meaning intended by the same writer in Phil. iii. When putting into practice (b), one should be careful to use 'real' and not 'superficial' parallels. Paul's readers numbered among them Gentiles who had had no previous knowledge of God, or His law, and consequently care would have to be exercised in comparing passages from his epistles with either the O.T. or in the writings addressed to the circumcision. For example the word 'Gospel' as found in the phrase 'the gospel of the Kingdom' or 'the everlasting gospel' would have very different connotations from the same word found in the phrase used by Paul 'my gospel'.

It is obvious that obscure passages (c) should always be read in the light of parallels that are clear and simple, and never in the inverse order. The plain statements of the Scripture concerning the state of the dead must be used as guides in interpreting the Rich Man and Lazarus, but many seem to work in the opposite direction and use an allegorical form of teaching to override the plain utterances of other Scriptures.

The value of rule (e) can be illustrated by the use of the words translated 'perfection', 'make perfect', and 'perfect', in the epistle to the Hebrews.

We read that Christ was 'made perfect' (Heb. v. 9), but other Scriptures that speak of His holiness forbid the idea that He was thereby 'improved'. We observe that the verb thus translated is teleioo, and find that the noun form teleios occurs in Heb. v. 14, where it is translated 'full age' and is contrasted with 'babes' (Rule 4 section (c) above), and used elsewhere by the same writer (Rule 4 section (a) above) in similar connections, as for example Eph. iv. 13 and 14. By pursuing this method and observing the usage of both noun and verbal forms a fairly clear conception of the meaning intended by the Apostle when he speaks of 'being made perfect' will be obtained.

In like manner, the use of synonymous words in parallel passages (f) is of great help. For example Paul explains what he means by 'the dying' of the Lord Jesus, in II Cor. iv. 10 by being "delivered unto death for Jesus' sake" in II Cor. iv. 11. In like manner the obscure reference to baptism being for the dead if the dead rise not in I Cor. xv. 29, is explained by the Apostle in verses 31 and 32:

> "I die daily", "I have fought with beasts", "What advantageth it me if the dead rise not".

The value of (g) parallel passages that give further information is obvious. Those who deny that Gen. i. 2 refers to a chaos resulting from judgment, ignore or belittle this parallel use of words in Jer. iv. 23-26, and in Isa. xxxiv. 11.

Passing to another rule:

(5) Ancient versions of the Scriptures should be consulted in the endeavour to establish the meaning of a word by its usage.

Foremost among the versions, easiest of access and of translation by the student, and earlier than any existing copy of the Hebrew Scriptures is the Septuagint version (usually represented by the letters LXX and given some explanation in The Berean Expositor, Volume XXII, page 33). Many words of doctrinal importance that occur in the N.T. are to be found in the LXX. Dikaiosune righteousness, lutron and lutroo redemption or redeem, hamartia sin, soteria salvation, zoe life, psuche soul, etc., were in daily use for a couple of centuries before the N.T. was written, and if the writers intended their hearers to put a new meaning into any of these or similar words, it would have been incumbent upon them to have said so. Moreover, the LXX, being a translation of the Hebrew O.T., forms a bridge by which the student of the Greek N.T. can discover legitimate parallels in the more ancient Hebrew. The LXX translates the word 'atonement' by the Greek word hilasterion. This word is translated in the N.T. 'propitiation', and therefore it is a most serious thing for anyone to say that 'the Atonement' is not used in the N.T. to speak of the Sacrifice of Christ. It is a quibble not an argument; it is confusing the mere occurrence of an English word with the meaning of the original. Let us illustrate the value of getting some common denominator that shall include all the shades of meaning of a word and yet give an intelligent meaning to each reference. Let us take the Greek word ethnos. This word is found 164 times in the N.T. It is translated in the A.V. Gentiles, heathen, nation and people. The word Gentile means one of any of the non-Jewish nations. The word heathen, in modern usage, means those races whose religious belief is neither Christian, Jewish nor Mohammedan; in other words a pagan, and usually an idolator.

The word nation means a distinct race or people, characterized by a common descent, language or history, usually organized as a separate political state and occupying a definite territory. The word people means a nation looked upon as a community or family, often with a stress on the commonality, and a suggestion that such are ruled over by a king or chief. The Apostle Paul uses the word ethnos 10 times in Galatians, and the A.V. translates the word 'heathen' three times in i. 16; ii. 9 and iii. 8; 'Gentiles' six times ii. 2, 8, 12, 14, 15; iii. 14 and 'nations' once in iii. 8.

Whichever of these words we care to use in the rendering of these ten occurrences, leaves the sense pretty much the same. Paul was appointed to be the Apostle of the Gentiles. These Gentiles were at the time pagans or heathens, and they were 'the nations' of the earth as distinct from one 'nation'—Israel.

Yet the modern reader is apt to think of the black or yellow races when he reads of the heathen, forgetting that, in the teaching of Scripture, the English nation is heathen.

When however we read in Luke vii. 5, "He loveth our nation" or in Acts xxiv. 17 "I came to bring alms to my nation" it is obvious that neither the word 'heathen' nor the word ‘Gentile’ could be used with propriety or truth, for here Israel is intended. When moreover we discover that the rest of the world outside of Israel is looked upon as ‘the nations’ we realize that this is the one all covering word that will suit every reference and distort none. We can speak of Israel as a ‘nation’ and we can speak of the Gentiles as ‘nations’, and this method when applied to any of the words of Scripture always help to clarity and avoids ambiguity. It is therefore a useful procedure, and should be in constant use by the unashamed workman.

No.16. Figures of speech.
pp. 48 - 50

Rule #5. Value at its true worth the fact that God has condescended to use figures speech in revealing Himself to man.

> “It is not too much to say that the whole dictionary of ancient religion is made up of metaphors. With us these metaphors are all forgotten. We speak of spirit without thinking of breath, of heaven without thinking of the sky, of revelation without thinking of a veil.”—Max Müller.

Some of us, because we have become acquainted with the Scriptures, do think of a veil or of breath when we use the above terms, but Max Müller is speaking generally, and is right.

> “What if earth
> Be but the shadow of heaven and things therein
> Each to other like, more than on earth is thought?” (Milton).

Our ability to understand by human language anything to do with the nature and being of God, is, at the base, closely associated with the fundamental fact that man was created in the Image of God. If this had not been so, terms used by God could have meant nothing. There is but one thing we can apprehend immediately and apart from any figure of speech. We can know what God means when He says “He is”, because we find within ourselves the ability to say ‘I am’. We may have no theory as to ‘personality’, but we understand sufficient without learning or study to believe the fundamental fact of faith ‘He that cometh to God must believe that He is’.

All further knowledge of God that reaches us through the instrumentality of words, must come by the use of words that are necessarily associated with human experiences and with created objects. We cannot understand the meaning of a word whose origin and reference lie outside our own orbit. All words therefore that are used in the Scriptures concerning God are founded upon resemblance. No title of God comprehends Him. He is more than Mighty, He is more than Love. We read “God is spirit”, but what do we know of ‘spirit’? We dare not conceive of form, shape or visibility, without destroying its essential meaning. If we read “God is light”, we may have stated a profound truth that is independent of all externals, but is only intelligible to us upon a lower plane and we instinctively think of light in the way in which we perceive it by our senses.

All words used to express the nature and attributes of God are used analogically.

> "When a country which has sent out colonists is termed the mother country, the expression is analogical"—Mill.

It will be perceived that care must be taken so that analogical expressions be not pushed beyond their legitimate boundaries. For example it would be easy to reduce the idea of a 'mother country' to ridiculous nonsense if pushed to extremes.

The figure of speech known as Anthropopatheia from anthropos 'man' and pathos 'feeling', is used in the ascription of human passions, actions or attributes to God. We have touched upon it when dealing with the subject of Figures of Speech in the series entitled With all thy getting get understanding (Volumes XXII-XXVII). Type, and teaching by type is the character of Scriptural revelation by sheer necessity.

Bosanquet says "Paley's analogical argument (of the watch necessitating a watchmaker, so creation necessitating a Creator) is unanswerable, and entirely convincing to the unsophisticated mind. It is only the refinement and subtlety and conceit of philosophy that finds and approves distinctions that can weigh against it".

What a different book the Bible would be if it had been framed by a theological professor! It would have been beautifully subdivided, all the attributes of God would have been brought together in a long list, doctrines would have been dealt with systematically, but it would never have spread over the earth with its life-giving message. It would have been placed upon the shelf of a museum or library to be consulted by the learned. Instead, we realize the greatness of the Creator by the description given of Creation. We realize the character of sin by the story of Eden. Justification by faith lives and breathes in the biography of Abraham, and John iii. 16 takes a deeper meaning when we read of Abraham's son, his only son Isaac whom he loved (Gen. xxii.).

Even in those epistles which touch the highest spiritual note, namely the prison epistles of the Apostle Paul, we find figure after figure. The church is called 'the body' of which Christ is 'the Head' and believers 'members'. It is called a 'Temple' of which believers are 'living stones' and Christ 'the chief corner stone'. The figure of adoption is used of this company as of Israel. Citizenship is theirs, and the middle wall of partition that stood in the courts of Herod's temple is employed to teach the profound truth of the newly created new man. In Philippians and II Timothy, the Apostle uses imagery borrowed from the Greek games, in order to enforce the teaching he gives concerning prize and crown, saying of himself:

> "I have contested a good contest (race) (Heb. xii. 1), I have finished my course (the figure of the runner), I have kept the faith" (II Tim. iv. 7).

When one perceives this character of revelation, while grateful for the condescension that stoops so low, one will be humbled by the recognition of human weakness. Truly, even with the inspired book we must still say 'we see through a glass darkly' and it ill behooves any of us to speak as though we were at present 'face to face'. What we see and what we know we must hold fast. If we believe we must also speak and speak plainly; but with it all let our readers and hearers ever remember that, like the Queen of Sheba, we shall all have to confess the half had not been told us.

Let us at the same time glory in the figures of faith. Let us be thankful for the fact that sin is explained as 'missing the mark', that forgiveness means 'a loosing from' bondage or from penalty, that sanctification is expressed in the terms of separation both from the world and to God and that "Hope" is an "Anchor". Let us realize moreover, that every figure of speech that speaks of God in the terms of man, cries out in the Scriptures for the Son of God, Emmanuel, God with us, Who in the days of His flesh said:

> "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father."

He is THE Word pre-eminent.

> "The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us . . . . . no man hath seen God at any time . . . . . He hath declared Him" (John i. 14, 18).

In the written Scriptures we learn of God analogically, and we see the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.

No.17. Scope and Structure.
pp. 65 - 67

> Rule #6. The scope of a passage often determines the exact meaning of a word that has several shades of meaning. The scope is determined by the structure. Put the structure therefore in the forefront of your investigations.

A word has a meaning by reason of its etymology and origin. It has a meaning by common usage which modifies the original meaning, and it has a special meaning which is decided by its context and by the scope of the passage which contains it. The scope of a passage is determined by its structure, and the structure is found by noting outstanding items that balance, and that carry the theme on in definite logical steps. In searching for the evidences of structure do not think that of necessity only important looking words will be used. Sometimes it is the reverse. The scope of Gal. i. is determined by its structure, and the structure hinges upon three simple words, 'not', 'neither', 'but'. Yet the sense of independence these three words bring to the one who has made their message his own must be experienced to be appreciated. Divested of all subsidiary matter, Gal. i.

tells us that the Apostle had before him three related subjects that are at the basis of his ministry to the Gentiles.

> Paul's independent Apostleship. "Not, neither, but" (Gal. i. 1).
> Paul's independent Gospel. "Not, neither, but" (Gal. i. 11, 12).
> Paul's independent Commission. "Not, neither, but" (Gal. i. 16, 17).

He who sees this is independent of human expositions, and he who believes it is independent of all human criticism or authority so far as the things of God are concerned.

The knowledge of the scope of a book, discovered by its structure, enforces true translation. This can be illustrated from the A.V. rendering of Eph. vi. 13 "Having done all". Had the translators realized that Ephesians has a perfect balance of parts, and that Eph. i. 19 - ii. 7 is in structural correspondence with Eph. vi. 10-13, they would have been compelled to balance the words 'work in' of Eph. i. 19 by 'work out' in Eph. vi. 13, even as they have so translated the two words in Phil. ii. 12, 13. Supplementing this we quote from Dr. Bullinger's Figures of Speech:

> "The subject, which may not be mentioned in one member may be named in the other. We are thus helped to a correct interpretation. For example, in the structure of I Pet. iii. 18-22, it is not clear who or what may be 'the-in-prison-spirits' of verse 19. But in the corresponding member (verse 22) they are mentioned by name as 'angels'. We thus learn that the subject of the former member (verse 19) is the disobedience of angels in the days of Noah (Gen. vi.), while the subject of the latter (verse 22) is the subjection of angels and authorities and powers. Having thus got the scope of the passage, we get the meaning of 'spirits' and remember how it is written 'He maketh His angels spirits' (Psa. civ. 4; Heb. i. 7). We at once connect their sin in the days of Noah and their prison with Gen. vi. 1, 2 and Jude 6. We have thus the clue to the true interpretation of this passage, which if followed out will lead to a correct exegesis."

The Editor of the magazine, if given half an hour in which to prepare to speak on any given passage of Scripture, would devote twenty minutes of that precious time in ascertaining the scope of the passage by means of the structure, and would not begrudge the time, knowing that no knowledge of words, or of doctrine, could make up for essential truth provided by the structure and the scope. We do not give this as the only method of study, we but state a personal fact and speak of what is characteristic of our own mode of study and presentation. We an only say to fellow students and fellow teachers 'it works'.

A few examples may be of service, illustrating the way in which the structure points to the teaching of any given passage.

PSALM xix.

A | 1-4. The Heavens.
  B | 4-6. The sun in them. (Bahem in them)
A | 7-10. The Scriptures.
  B | 11-14. The servant in them. (Bahem in them)

The structure is of extreme service in preventing one from losing the thread of any passage. For example, if one knew the structure of Heb. i.-ii., one would not be confused by the introduction in two different places of 'angels', but would realize the development of the theme.

Hebrews i., ii.

A | i. 1, 2. God once spoke by prophets. Now by His Son.
B | i. 2-14. The Son. His Glories.
God and Lord, better than angels.
A | ii. 1-4. God once spoke by angels. Now by the Lord.
B | ii. 5-18. The Son. His humiliation.
Man and Abraham's seed. Lower than angels.

The structural background of Scripture falls into four groups:

(1) Cognate or Gradational, where the same thought is expressed in different or progressive terms:
"Seek ye Jehovah while He may be found,
Call ye upon Him while He is near" (Isa. lv. 6).

(2) Antithetic or Opposite.
"Faithful are the wounds of a friend;
But deceitful are the kisses of an enemy" (Prov. xxvii. 6).

(3) Synthetic or Constructive.
"O the happiness of that man
Who hath not walked in the counsel of the ungodly;
And hath not stood in the way of sinners
And hath not sat in the seat of the scornful" (Psa. i. 1).

(4) Introverted.
"Make the heart of this people fat,
And make their ears heavy,
And shut their eyes;
Lest they see with their eyes,
And hear with their ears,
And understand with their heart" (Isa. vi. 10).

Fuller analysis and many more examples can be seen by consulting the works of Dr. Louth, or Dr. Roe on the correspondencies of Scriptures, and the great work of Dr. Bullinger on Figures of Speech used in the Scriptures.

Examples could be multiplied, but these can never take the place of personal investigation. The unashamed workman will never rest satisfied with his own interpretation or that of any other, until he has tested it by scope and structure.

A word of caution regarding structure may not be amiss. We early discovered that by inventing our own head-lines in arriving at the structure, we could save a lot of time, cut out a lot of work, make a very presentable show, BUT FAIL TO ARRIVE AT TRUTH! We therefore discarded 'headings' and pinned ourselves down to using actual words from the passage before us. This meant that much that had been put forward both by ourselves and others had to be scrapped, and the work commenced afresh. This is the reason why the reader does not find in the structural outlines submitted in the Berean Expositor mere copies of those in any other work. Where they coincide with the findings of others, it is a confirmation for which we are thankful. Where they differ, it will be discovered generally that the structure of the Berean Expositor adheres to the actual wording of the passage (using of course the original in every case), whereas the structure that is discarded has employed merely conceived headings.

As the Berean Expositor has been published for fifty years, the Editor feels that the method recommended has stood the test of time, and knows that in most cases the results are self evident and useful.

How is a structure of any given passage discovered? We have often been asked the question, but our answers have not given much satisfaction. Few structures of any importance can be discovered apart from protracted study and concentrated effort. There is no short cut. If the subject be a whole book, then the whole book must be read and re-read until the mind is able to hold in suspense the varying items, and until the eye of the mind perceives the disposition of parts. Occasionally the whole matters is settled by the presence of key words, as the whole central member of Galatians is determined by the words 'by nature' (Gal. ii. 15 and iv. 8).

How does one feel sure that a jig-saw puzzle is accurately fitted together? It is self evident, and so should the structure be. Any sense of forcing or distortion should be suspected. After all we do not want 'structures' for their own sake, but truth, and so nothing but the truth in the structure can be tolerated.

Further, just as we say "Columbus discovered America", and not "Columbus invented America", so the student should remember that in seeking the structure of any passage he is simply looking for what is there, clues given by God, the underlinings of the Holy Spirit, and is not inventing an outline, however attractive such inventions may be.

No.18. A few guiding principles in closing.
pp. 104, 105

In concluding this series we give a few guiding principles.

(1) Never build a doctrine upon a text which is debateable either for its authenticity or because of its obscurity.

We do not expect our readers to pose as Textual Critics, but it is common knowledge with all intelligent readers of the Scriptures that some readings are doubtful. For example, whether one be a Trinitatiran or a Unitarian, one must agree with the R.V. in omitting from the Scriptures I John v. 7. Consequently, it would be very improper, and expose the one who so used it to well merited suspicion, to attempt to build the doctrine of the Trinity upon this verse. The doctrine of the Trinity must be based upon passages of Scripture that the Unitarian himself must admit to be authentic.

Again, some passages of Scripture are taken by enthusiasts as proofs of their particular doctrine, that only very slightly lend themselves to its establishment. This is extremely unwise. No doctrine that is fundamental to the faith lacks clear unambiguous testimony from the Word, and any attempt to drag in obscure texts weakens rather than strengthens our case.

(2) Words have one signification in one and the same connection:

> "The sense of Scripture is ONE, CERTAIN and SIMPLE and is everywhere to be ascertained in accordance with the principles of grammar and human discourse." Melancthon.
>
> "We must not make God's Word mean what we wish, we must not bend it, but allow it to bend us, and give it the honour of being better than we could make it, so that we must let it stand." Luther.
>
> "Every word has some meaning. A word that has no meaning can do no good. Words cannot have a plurality of significations at the same time and in the same position." Sawyer.

(3) We must interpret any given passage where there is any element of uncertainty, so that it accords with the plain teaching of passages that are clear. In other words we must regard the analogy of the faith in all our work.

> "As grammatical analogy is the law and form of language established by usage, to which is opposed anomaly, that is departure from the established usage and forms of speech: so the analogy of doctrine and faith rests upon the main points of Christian doctrine evidently declared in Scripture, and thence denominated by Latin Doctors, the Regula Fidei. To these everything is to be referred, so that no interpretation is to be received which is not consistent with them." Ernesti.
>
> "This does not mean that we first somehow learn the scheme of truth revealed in the Scripture, and that with this previously arranged scheme in our heads, we then go to the Scripture, not in order to learn the truths it contains, but in order to find something that may be made to satisfy our opinions.
>
> In its fair and legitimate application the principle has respect only to the more doubtful or abrupt parts of the Word of God, and simply requires, that these should be brought into comparison with the other and clearer statements contained in it." Fairbairn.

(4) We must be careful to distinguish the occasions when we must emphasize differences and when we must emphasize agreement, in dealing with O.T. doctrine.

> "In those passages which distinctly and formally exhibit differences between the Old and New Testament things, it is the difference which ought to be rendered prominent in our explanation", while on the other hand "In those passages which simply present Christian things under the form and aspect of those that belong to the Old Covenant, it is the correspondence or agreement that should be mainly dwelt upon." Fairbairn.

Some reader may have wondered why the more spiritual qualifications that are so truly necessary to a right understanding of Scripture have not been brought forward. These do not come under the heading of ‘rules’ that guide the workman in the use of his ‘tools’. They are too serious, too vital, too far removed from the purpose of this series to introduce them here. They have not been forgotten, and may form a separate series by themselves at some future date. Meanwhile we commend this present series to the prayerful consideration of all true workmen, who would be unashamed of their work ‘in that day’.

HEBREWS

Perfection or Perdition

No.9. The Right Hand of the Majesty on High.
pp. 10 - 13

The writer now passes at one step from the death of the Cross to the seating of the Saviour at the right hand of the Majesty on high. He knew, and has clearly taught, that Christ not only died, but "was buried, and that He rose again the third day according to the Scriptures" (I Cor. xv. 4). A little acquaintance with the Scriptures will reveal an economy in the choice of subject at all times. Paul does not mention either the Cross, the shedding of blood or the sufferings of Christ in I Cor. xv., because his chief object was to answer those who said that there was no resurrection of the dead (I Cor. xv. 12). The apostle gives a most wonderful exposition of what is involved in the Gospel as the power of God unto salvation in Rom. i.-v., yet never does he mention the Cross, the reason being that his theme was "justification by faith" which is linked with the "death" of Christ, and not the ignominy associated with the Cross. When dealing with the same theme in Galatians, the Cross is introduced, largely because of the "persecution" that is associated with it. The fact that the apostle overleaps so much of the redemptive work of Christ, and links the purifying of sins with the sitting at the right hand of God, is, among other reasons, because he has the High Priestly office of Christ so much in view.

It is seldom we find one type that is sufficient to set forth the great work of Christ. Often it needs a pair. For example the passover lamb most blessedly sets forth redemption, but it takes the goat on the Day of Atonement to complete the story, for He Who delivered His people out from Egypt, gave them access into the Divine Presence, and it is this second aspect of the work of Christ that is uppermost in Hebrews. Abel needs Seth to complete the typical foreshadowing of Christ, David needs Solomon to foreshadow Christ as King, for David was a man of war, while Solomon was a prince of peace. The story of Joseph, which so miraculously sets forth the story of the Redeemer's life and work, seems at first sight complete, needing no other to finish the story. Yet his mother gave him the name "Joseph" saying "The Lord shall add (Heb. yasaph) to me another son" (Gen. xxx. 24), and that son was named by the mother Ben-oni, "son of my sorrow", but the father called him Benjamin, "son of my right hand". In history Joseph goes through the suffering and eventually ascends the throne, but in the type Benjamin has a place, and the type is incomplete without "The Son of the right hand". In the redemptive records of other epistles, we have the Joseph aspect worked out in blessed reality, but in Hebrews, Christ is seen pre-eminently as the Benjamin of the Father. Psa. cx. is quoted in the New Testament more than any other of the Psalms; it is the Psalm of the "Right Hand", and awaits us in Heb. i. 13. When the Saviour at His illegal trial was challenged by the high priest, He claimed to be the Messiah, the Son of God, by quoting the language of Dan. vii. as of Himself.

"Hereafter shall ye see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven" (Matt. xxvi. 64).

The glorious doctrine of the epistle to the Romans leads us steadily on from chapter to chapter until we are able exultantly to answer the challenge "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?" by replying:

"Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, Who is EVEN AT THE RIGHT HAND of God, Who also maketh intercession for us" (Rom. viii. 34).

Neither Ephesians nor Colossians could have even commenced the revelation of the Mystery, if Christ had not been revealed as seated at the right hand of God far above all. There are five references in Hebrews itself to the seating of the Saviour at His right hand, and they are used to enforce certain aspects of truth that are of first importance to the teaching of this epistle.

(1) The first occurrence is in Heb. i. 3, where it is placed as the climax of the work of the Mediator, and by its association with what follows in verse 4 it is used in the nature of a reward for the redemptive work now done.

(2) The second occurrence is in Heb. i. 13, where it is used to set forth the essential contrast that exists between "The Son" and "the angels".

"But to which of the angels said He at any time, Sit on My right hand, until I make Thine enemies Thy footstool?"

(3) The third and central reference occurs in Heb. viii. 1, 2. Paul "sums up" the teaching of the previous chapters.

"Now of the things which we have spoken this is the SUM: We have such an High Priest, Who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens; a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man".

In this summing up the apostle adds the "heavenly sanctuary" which we must never omit.

(4) The fourth occurrence is in Heb. x. 12, where it is placed in vivid contrast with the Levitical priests who "stood" offering oftentimes the same sacrifices which can never take away sins, whereas, the apostle continued, "This Man, after He had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down on the right hand of God".

(5) The last occurrence is in Heb. xii. 2 where the race is run, the shame endured for the joy that was set before, and the Lord is once again expressed as being "set down at the right hand of the throne of "God".

We therefore have the references to the Right Hand of God distributed thus:

A | i. 3. As a reward, the Glory given, the work done.
B | i. 13. As a contrast with angels who are ministering spirits.
C | viii. 1, 2. THE SUM.
B | x. 12. As a contrast with the priests who ministered daily.
A | xii. 2. As a reward, the joy set before Him, the race run.

This is the glory that was given Him, and which the Saviour said "I have given them" (John xvii. 22). It is NOT the glory which was His by right "before the world was"; in that the redeemed can never share. To sit at the right hand of Majesty is not the same as absolute Monarchy. Even some of the redeemed are told that:

> "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me in My throne, EVEN AS I ALSO overcame, and am set down with My Father in His throne" (Rev. iii. 21).

There can be no possible thought of sharing Deity! The elements of the reward or recognition of faithfulness are still uppermost. Even that majestic passage, Phil. ii. 5-12, is introduced with the words:

> "Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus", and concludes with the words:

> "Wherefore, my beloved . . . . . work out your own salvation".

Again, some, through not recognizing that the seat at the Right Hand is not a claim to essential Deity, have strongly objected to the words of Eph. ii. 6 as though it invaded the Divine prerogative. To return to the type in Genesis, as Pharaoh said to Joseph, or as Joseph himself acknowledged:

> "Only in the throne will I be greater than thou."
> "He made him ruler over all."
> "Thou art even as Pharaoh."
> "He hath made me a father to Pharaoh, and lord of all his house, and a ruler throughout all the land of Egypt."
> "God hath made me lord of all Egypt."
> "Tell my father all my glory in Egypt" (Gen. xli.-xlv.).

When the Mediatorial kingdom is finished and the last enemy is destroyed, then the Son vacates the seat at the Right Hand to enter the glory that was His before the world was (see I Tim. vi. 16). The association in Hebrews with this session at the right hand of God is related particularly with the office of High Priest, and the office of High Priest will not be retained for ever. The blessed fact is that just as His sacrifice for sins will never be repeated, just as the glory of the New Jerusalem will not consist in a more magnificent temple than ever, but that rather there will be no need for a temple any more, so the perfection of Christ's priesthood is that it will not need to be perpetuated beyond the confines of the ages.

> "In the Sanhedrin, the highest court of judicature among the Jews, he who presided in it was called Ab din or Ab beth din, the father of judgment, or the father of the House of judgment, and sat at the right hand of the prince of the Sanhedrin . . . . . Of this Ab din mention is made in the Targum, Cant. 7:4, The Father of the house of judgment, who judgeth the judgments agreeably to that. The Father judgeth no man but hath committed all judgment unto the Son" (Dr. John Owen).

The fullest description in Hebrews of the place where the ascended Lord is now seated is in chapter viii. 1, where it is said to be not only at the right hand of God, or at the right hand of His throne, but:

> "On the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens."

The only other reference in Hebrews that uses the word majesty is Heb. i. 3. This word megalosune is used by David in the LXX of I Chron. xxii. 5. "The house that is to be builded for the Lord must be exceeding magnifical", and Heb. iii. 3-6 shows that Christ is building a house "whose house are we", and Solomon recognized that, however "magnifical" the house he had built might be, God could not be contained even in the "heaven of heavens". Yet within a few lines, he prayed that the Lord would "hear from thy dwelling place, even heaven" (II Chron. vi. 18, 21), and it is there "in heaven itself", in the true Tabernacle which the Lord pitched and not man, that Christ has entered "now to appear in the presence of God for us" (Heb. viii. 1, 2; ix. 24).

Megalosune "majesty" is ascribed to God by Moses in "The Song of Jehovah's Name" (Deut. xxxii. 3), and in the prophecy of Nathan to David concerning the building of God's house by Solomon (II Sam. vii. 21, 23). The only other king who has the term "majesty" applied to him in Scripture is Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. iv. 22; v. 18, 19), and this is doubly significant when we learn that the last and only other reference in Daniel is to the glorious kingdom of the Messiah, with which it was so great a contrast:

> "And the kingdom and the authority and the majesty of the kings that are under the whole heaven were given to the saints of the Most High; and His kingdom is an aeonion kingdom, and all principalities shall serve and obey Him" (Dan. vii. 27 LXX).

The reader will observe in this last reference "the principalities and powers" (arches kai exousias) of Eph. i. 21. Here we have Moses, David, Solomon, Nebuchadnezzar and finally and completely, the Coming of the Son of Man.

The Ascension and session of the Saviour at the right hand of the throne of the Majesty on high is a sign that these prophecies of His glory shall be as surely fulfilled as were all those of His humiliation.

> "God hath in these last days, spoken unto us IN SON, > Whom He hath appointed heir of all things.
> By Whom also He made (or appointed) the ages.
> Who being the brightness of His glory, and
> The express image of His substance, and > Upholding all thins by the word of His power,
> When He had by Himself purged our sins,
> Sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high."

No.10. "He came where he was."
pp. 93 - 100

The revelation given in Heb. i. 2, 3 is comparable with Col. i. 15-19, Phil. ii. 5-11 and John i. 1-18 in the majesty of its theme—the Person of "The Son", Who in the beginning was "The Word", "The Form" and the "Image" of the Invisible God. It comes somewhat as an anticlimax after reading that this Son of God was the Express Image of the substance of God, and upholding all things by the word of His power, to read:

> "Being made so much better than the angels" (Heb. i. 4).

What angel is ever spoken of as "The Form or the Image of the Invisible God"? What angel could be "The Express Image of His substance"? We have purposely omitted the closing words, the words that form the link and contain the explanation of this strange conclusion. After the attributes of Deity already quoted, we come to terms that refer not to Deity, but to the mediatorial work and reward of the Son of God Who had taken upon Himself the form or status of a slave. These links and explanatory claims are:

(1) He purged our sins; (2) As a consequence He sat down on the right hand of the majesty on high.

We have already examined the exaltation of the Lord and what is implied by this session at the Right Hand, and can readily see that inasmuch as for our redemption the Son of God was made a little LOWER than the angels (as we shall discover by reading chapter ii.), so as the triumphant Conqueror of sin and death, and still in the capacity of the One Mediator, He can be spoken of as "being made" better than angels, and "obtaining by inheritance" a more excellent name than they.

The reader is aware of the important difference that is intended by the two words "being" and "becoming". "Being made" is the translation of the Greek ginomai, "to become", and the distinction is well observed in John i. 1-3:

> "Being." The verb eimi. "In the beginning WAS the Word . . . . . WAS with . . . . . WAS God".
> "Becoming." The verb ginomai. "All things WERE MADE by Him."
> He "was". They "became".

Or again in John viiii. 58, "Before Abraham CAME INTO BEING, I AM". The same sequences that are found in Heb. i. 2-4 are found in Phil. ii. 5-11. First we have "original being", huparchon, "Who being, existing all along, in the form of God", then the sevenfold descent in flesh and blood to the death of the cross. This is followed by the sevenfold exaltation, and, "The Name" that is above every name, a "more excellent name" indeed than angels ever bore. Heb. i. 4 is entirely concerned with the Mediatorial work of Christ, and not with His essential Deity. The exaltation of the Saviour followed the purging of our sins and so speaks of the resurrection. Acts xiii. 32, 33 gives the identical Old Testament reference that is used in Hebrews,

> "Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee", and declares that this promise was fulfilled when He raised up Jesus again. Alford very pointedly says of Christ, that:

> "The Son of God, before His incarnation was Head OVER creation, but after His work in the flesh He had become the Head OF Creation."

Colossians reveals that He Who was the Firstborn of every creature became the Firstborn from the dead, because "in the body of His flesh through death" He had stooped to conquer. This we shall see more clearly as our study opens up the Scriptures that are related to Heb. i. 4. To us Gentiles, the insistence upon angels which is so marked in Heb. i. and ii. may seem a trifle strange, but to a Hebrew it would be both understandable and necessary.

The use of "angel" in Hebrews

In chapter i. Christ in His exaltation to the right hand of the Majesty on high is said to be made "so much better than the angels" (Heb. i. 4).

> "Unto which of the angels said He at any time, Thou art My Son . . . . . ?" (i. 5).
