> "Let all the angels of God worship Him" (i. 6).
> "Who maketh His angels spirits" (i. 7).
> "To which of the angels said He at any time, Sit on My right hand?" (i. 13).

In chapter ii., angels are associated with the giving of the law and we are told that the age to come has not been put in subjection to angels. By the testimony of the prophetic eighth Psalm, Adam and Christ are seen "for a little while" lower than the angels, and, at the incarnation, Christ "took not on Him the nature of angels" (Heb. ii. 2, 5, 7, 9, 16). In chapter xii. 22 the heavenly Jerusalem is associated with "an innumerable company of angels" and in xiii. 2 the believer is reminded that, in Old Testament times, the ministry of angels was no uncommon experience. When writing to the Romans, Paul mentioned angels, together with "principalities" (Rom. viii. 38) and asked the Corinthians, "Know ye not that we shall judge angels?" (I Cor. vi. 3), but neither angelic ministry among men, nor the presence of angels at the exaltation of Christ, is mentioned in Ephesians. There, we read that when Christ was raised from the dead, He was set at the right hand of God "in the heavenly places, far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come" (Eph. i. 20, 21). These "principalities" are mentioned again in Eph. iii. 10 and vi. 12, each time in connection with "heavenly places", but the epistle to the Hebrews knows nothing of them.

In Scripture, angels have special reference to the people of Israel, and they do not figure definitely in the O.T until after the call of Abraham and the birth of Ishmael (Gen. xvi. 7). Angelic ministry is associated with the destruction of Sodom, the deliverance of Lot, the birth of Isaac, the quest for a wife for Isaac, and the blessing of Jacob in the book of Genesis. In the book of Exodus the angel of the Lord is intimately associated with the deliverance of Israel from Egypt and with their guidance through the wilderness, and so, throughout the Law, the Prophets and the Psalms, the whole course of Israel's history is accompanied by angelic ministry. Nor does it cease with Malachi (which means "My messenger" or "My angel"); it is prominent in the Gospels, being associated with the Birth, the Sufferings, the Resurrection and the prophecies of the Second Coming of Christ. It is prominent in the Acts from Acts i.-xii., but, after the ministry of Paul, which commences with Acts xiii., there are but two references in the Acts to angelic ministry, namely at Acts xxiii. 9 and xxvii. 23. This must be considered in contrast with the seventeen references that are found in Acts i.-xii. In the prison ministry of Paul, that is in the five "prison" epistles, angels are only mentioned to be set aside, i.e., "the worshipping of angels" (Col. ii. 18). In I Tim. iii. 16 angels are mentioned in connection with the Mystery of godliness, namely "God manifest in the flesh", and also in the charge of I Tim. v. 21, where "elect angels" are mentioned.

"Being made so much better than the angels." This passage contains the first of several comparisons that are made as the theme of the epistle is unfolded:

(1) "SO MUCH better than the angels . . . . . obtained a more excellent name" (Heb. i. 4).
(2) "This Man was counted worthy of more glory than Moses, INASMUCH as He Who hath builded the house hath more honour than the house" (Heb. iii. 3).
(3) "AND INASMUCH as not without an oath . . . . . by so MUCH was Jesus made a surety of a better testament (covenant)" (Heb. vii. 20, 22).
(4) "For SUCH an high priest became us" (Heb. vii. 26).
(5) "We have SUCH an high priest . . . . . in the heavens" (Heb. viii. 1).
(6) "But NOW hath He obtained a more excellent ministry, by HOW MUCH also He is the Mediator of a better covenant" (Heb. viii. 6).
(7) "He that despised Moses' law died without mercy . . . . . of HOW MUCH sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God" (Heb. x. 28, 29).
(8) "They that say SUCH things declare plainly that they seek a country" (Heb. xi. 14).

These comparisons of angel and mediator, of better covenants and better country are integral links in the chain of Divine unfolding. They are buried deep, perhaps, but nevertheless there, and visible to the eye of the humble seeker after truth. The following analysis may be of service.

A | i. 4. The more excellent name (diaphoros).
(Angels, mediators of the old covenant).
B | iii. 3. Counted worthy (axioo). Above Moses.
C | viii. 1. We have such an High Priest in the heavens.
vii. 20, 22. Better covenant.
The Tabernacle pitched by the Lord and not man.
vii. 26. Higher than the heavens.
A | viii. 6. A more excellent ministry (diaphoros)
(Mediator of the New Covenant).
B | x. 29. Thought worthy (axioo). Beneath feet.
C | xi. 10-16. Such things.
The better and heavenly country.
The city whose builder and maker is God.

For our immediate purpose we need all the light we can get on Heb. i. 4, and the parallel of Heb. viii. 6 therefore is welcome. For the time being we make no further comment on this set of comparisons except perhaps to note how the pilgrim attitude of faith (Heb. xi. 10-16) is apparently the echo of "such an high priest" (Heb. viii. 1), as it ever should be. In both passages there is a "more excellent" name, or ministry. In the second reference, this ministry is the mediation of the New Covenant. In what way does this fact illuminate the insistence of the apostle in Heb. i. and ii. upon the superiority of Christ to angels? The answer is that angels were themselves mediators of the Old Covenant. This is a matter of importance and must now be set forth.

While it is a Scriptural truth that "The law was given by Moses" (John i. 17), it is also a Scriptural truth that Israel "received the law by the disposition of angels" (Acts vii. 53). To this testimony of Stephen, Paul adds his in Galatians:

> "The law . . . . . was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator" (Gal. iii. 19).

To this twofold testimony may be added that of the Psalmist:

> "The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels: the Lord is among them, as in SINAI, in the holy place" (Psa. lxviii. 17), which is an echo of the words of Moses when he said:

> "He came with ten thousands of saints (His holy ones): from His right hand went a fiery law for them" (Deut. xxxiii. 2).

Yet further, Stephen had earlier spoken of Moses at Sinai saying:

> "This is he, that was in the church in the wilderness with the angel which spake to him in the mount Sina" (Acts vii. 38).

In Hebrews, chapter ii., the ministry of angels and their relation with the law is further developed.

> "For if the word spoken by angels was stedfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompence of reward; how shall we escape?" (ii. 2, 3).

With this passage, Heb. xii. 25 should be read:

> "See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh. For if they escaped not who refused Him that spake on earth . . . . ."

Chapter ii. deals with "the Lord" speaking, in contrast with angels, and chapter xii. follows by contrasting Sinai with heaven. Let us finish the record of these verses then. Here is both question and answer:

> "How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation; which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord?" (Heb. ii. 3).
> "Much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from Him that speaketh from heaven" (Heb. xii. 25).

Resuming the references to angels in chapter ii. the apostle says:

> "For unto the angels hath He not put in subjection the world to come, whereof we speak" (Heb. ii. 5).

This assumes that "the world" was at some time under angelic surveillance. The word "world" here is not aion or kosmos, but oikoumene, "the habitable world", particularly the world as known and visualized in Old Testament times, the prophetic earth. The first occurrence of oikoumene in the LXX is in Exod. xvi. 35: "Until they came to a land inhabited", i.e., the land of Canaan. In Psa. lxxii. which speaks prophetically of the dominion ruled over by David's greater Son, we read:

> "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the oikoumene" (Psa. lxxii. 8).

The kingdoms of the world (oikoumene) were shown in the temptation in the wilderness (Luke iv. 5). In contrast with the wide extent of "heaven and earth", Psa. lxxxix. 11 says, "Thou hast founded them" (heaven and the oikoumene), and it is in this Psalm that we have another prophetic anticipation:

> "I will make Him My Firstborn, higher than the kings of the earth" (Psa. lxxxix. 27).

When the day comes when man shall "sing a new song" the psalmist says:

> "Say among the heathen that the LORD reigneth: the oikoumene also shall be established that it shall not be moved" (Psa. xcvi. 10).

This verse gives us a positive link with the theme of Hebrews, for there, in chapter xii., following the shaking of the earth at Sinai, we read:

> "Wherefore we receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved" (Heb. xii. 28), where the Greek word, saleuo (move or shake) is employed. It is a very wonderful comment on the meaning attached to the oikoumene of the future, that where the Hebrew reads: "Thou shalt be called Hephzi-bah (i.e. My delight is in her), and thy land Beulah (i.e. married)", the LXX of Isa. lxii. 4 reads, "Thou shalt be called My Pleasure (thelema), and thy land oikoumene". This is the "world to come" whereof Paul was speaking in Heb. ii. This "world to come" will include more than the kingdom of Israel in the days of their restoration, for the Tempter showed the Lord "all the kingdoms of the oikoumene" (Luke iv. 5), and so revealed that more kingdoms than one occupied the territory specified, and this word was used by Roman and Greek historians as well as the LXX to refer to the lands ruled over by Nebuchadnezzar and his successors. Had the Devil known the Scriptures a little better he might have hesitated to tempt the Lord to make stones into bread, for Psa. l. 12 says: "If I were hungry, I would not tell thee: for the oikoumene is Mine, and the fullness thereof." Satan offered the kingdoms of the oikoumene to One Who was their rightful owner.

The Scriptures give abundant evidence of the fact that angels were given some form of control over the world in Old Testament times. The first chapter of the book of Job shows the "sons of God" in conference with the Lord and Satan joining them, the Lord deigning to discuss His servant Job even with Satan, the "sons of God" necessarily being aware of this. Angels, or "the sons of God", rejoiced at the creation (Job xxxviii. 7). Two angels accompanied Jehovah when Abraham was visited, and angels intervene throughout the Old Testament Scriptures. This council recorded in Job, the joyous fellowship of the sons of God at the Creation, the visit of the "three men" to Abraham, the words of Gen. xviii. 17, "Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do?" and the fact that God spoke to Moses as a man speaks with his friend, make it highly probable that the Lord did stoop at the creation of man to explain to the wondering angels something of the plan of the ages and their part in it. Gen. i. 2 indicates that there had been an overthrow, and the creation of the six days that followed with Adam as its climax was the first of a series of movements that had I Cor. xv. 24-28 as its goal. "Let us make man in our image", said the Lord, and "a little lower than the angels". Pre-Adamite men were made 'a little higher than brute beasts'. Adam was the first of a new race.

While we learn from Psa. viii. of this relation made with angels, we should note that no angel is mentioned in Genesis until the call of Abraham. Then an angel intervenes on the behalf of Hagar, of Ishmael, of Lot in Sodom, of Isaac on Mount Moriah. The guidance of an angel was promised the servant of Abraham in his quest for a wife for Isaac; angels met Jacob on his journey to Padan-aram; an angel gave Jacob advice as to how to circumvent the dishonesty of Laban over his hire and met him at the place he afterward called Mahanaim, saying, "This is God's host", and finally, so far as Genesis is concerned, Jacob in blessing the sons of Joseph said, "The Angel which redeemed me from all evil, bless the lads". The naming by Jacob of Mahanaim in Gen. xxxii. 2 is the last of several places named after the intervention of an angel. Beer-lahai-roi was named by Hagar, Jehovah-Jireh was the name given to the mount at the offering of Isaac, and Bethel received its name after Jacob's vision of the ladder that reached to heaven. The ministry of angels in the second half of Genesis is as marked as its absence is from the first half. When God placed Adam on the earth, he was left without angelic guidance, but Satan did not observe this rule. He not only in the guise of the serpent brought about man's fall, but by the inroad of the "sons of God" (LXX Alex. angeloi) brought about well-nigh universal corruption and destruction (Gen. vi.).

The first lesson of the ages had been given. There are therefore two periods in the ages during which angelic rule was withheld. The first, the period from Adam to Abraham; the second, the present dispensation of the Mystery. It is an inference on our part that "angels" were learning something of the purpose of God from Adam to Abraham and this may be questioned, but it is clearly stated that during the dispensation of the Mystery, "principalities and powers" are learning through the church "the manifold wisdom of God" (Eph. iii. 10). With the call of Abraham, unassisted endeavour was replaced by angelic mediation. Not only in Genesis, as we have seen, but at the call of Moses, the traveling through the wilderness, the giving of the law at Sinai, attest this new economy. Yet Stephen had to tell Israel that in spite of the disposition of angels, Israel miserably failed. The transfer of kingship from Israel to the Gentile under Nebuchadnezzar carried with it the ministry of angels, for "the son of God" seen by Nebuchadnezzar in the fire with the faithful three is interpreted for us as "God . . . . . hath sent His angel". The "Watcher and holy One" of Dan. iv., and the "fingers of a man's hand" of Dan. v., in the light of Exod. xxxi. 18, show angelic ministry. The angel Gabriel is mentioned in Dan. ix., and Michael, "your prince", together with Satanic angels of Persia and Greece are mentioned in Dan. x. Man could not stand when left alone. Man could not stand even when hedged about by angel ministry whether the people be Israel, or Nebuchadnezzar or the Gentile dynasty. Angels looked down from heaven, in pity, but Christ came down Himself. Angels, if they do weep, may have shed tears at the fatal folly of man, but Christ not only wept, He shed his blood. Angels visited man in the guise of men, but Christ became man, was actually born of a woman. Herein lies the key to open the revelation given in the early chapters of Hebrews. Like the Good Samaritan, Christ "came where he was" saying, "Lo, I come in the volume of the book it is written of Me".

Angels may still be ministering spirits sent forth to minister to those who are heirs of salvation, but "angels and authorities and powers" are subject unto the ascended Lord. When we come to the dispensation of the Mystery, angelic ministry is entirely absent; instead of saying, "angels to beckon me", we sing in the language of one of the hymns used at the Chapel of the Opened Book, London:

> "Angels will stand aside,
> No one, but Christ beside
> Can be our heavenly Guide,
> Father, to Thee."

No.11. "This day have I begotten Thee."
pp. 114 - 117

While angels are called "sons of God", a title endorsed by the translation of Psa. xcvii. 7 "Worship Him, all ye gods", by "let all the angels of God worship Him" (Heb. i. 6) and other places, no angel has or ever could be called "The Only Begotten Son of God".

> "For unto which of the angels said He at any time, Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee?" (Heb. i. 5).

A number of commentators see in this passage a reference to "the eternal generation of the Son", a term that defies explanation, and such are also obliged to interpret "this day" as of eternity. Such an interpretation savours too much of an attempt to bolster up a creed rather than to give an honest exposition of the terms, and arises mainly out of the disastrous error of taking the title "Son" back into eternity instead of using the title "Word" as John does in John i. 1, and reserving the title "Son" for the incarnation when "the Word was made flesh". In Heb. xi. 17 Isaac too is called "the only begotten son" of Abraham, and it would be strange if this title could be used in so essentially different ways. The verb gennao is used in Matthew in such passages as "Abraham begat Isaac", "Of whom was born Jesus", "That which is conceived in her", "When Jesus was born in Bethlehem". In the epistle to the Hebrews itself it occurs four times, thus:

> "This day have I begotten Thee."
> "To day have I begotten Thee."
> "Therefore sprang there even of one."
> "By faith Moses, when he was born" (Heb. i. 5; v. 5; xi. 12, 23).

John, in his first epistle, has no hesitation in intertwining references to those who have been "born" or "begotten" of God, and the Saviour Who was "born" or "begotten" of God (1 John ii. 29; iii. 9; iv. 7; v. 1, 4, 18). While therefore we can discover no warrant from Scripture usage to project this "begetting" back before time began, we are warned by the selfsame usage of Scripture not to limit this term to the Incarnation. "This day" have I begotten Thee, cannot refer to the birth at Bethlehem for this is a quotation from Psalm ii.:

> "Yet have I set My King upon My holy hill of Zion. I will declare the decree: the LORD hath said unto Me, Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee" (Psa. ii. 6, 7).

On either side of this quotation from Psa. ii., Paul, in Acts xiii. 33-37, stresses the resurrection of Christ:

> "He hath raised up Jesus again" (Quotation follows from Psa. ii. 7).
> "And as concerning that He raised Him up from the dead" (Quotation follows from Isa. lv. 3).

This begetting at the Resurrection differed from that at the Incarnation, the one being the entrance into a life of flesh and blood through the overshadowing of the Virgin by the Spirit of God; the other being the quickening power of the selfsame Spirit of that body which was laid in the sepulchre, yet which saw no corruption. This second "birth" was by "decree". The reader should have no difficulty in believing this twofold "begetting", for that is also true, in its limited way, of every believer. All men are "born" by natural processes gennao, and the believer is "born again", gennao and anothen (John iii. 3) and anagennao (I Pet. i. 23). If the believer therefore can be said to have been begotten at his natural birth, and to have been begotten again at conversion, there should be no difficulty in believing the double references to the Saviour. In Colossians the title given the Lord in this connection is prototokos "Firstborn of all creation", "Firstborn from the dead" (Col. i. 15, 18). Again a double use of the same title. This word prototokos is found in Heb. i. 6:

> "And again, when He bringeth in the firstborn into the world, He saith, And let all the angels of God worship Him."

"And again." Readers will remember the repetition of this phrase in Rom. xv. 9-12, but in this passage the words "He saith" are either actually written or implied. The R.V. reads, however, "And when He again bringeth", attaching the word "again" to the act of "bringing" and not with the words "He saith". Weymouth reads "But speaking of the time when He once more brings His Firstborn into the world, He says". There is by no means unanimity among translators, but the grammar of the passage seems to demand the translation given in the R.V. Alford says "The word can only refer to the great entering of the Messiah into His kingdom". The "world" here is oikoumene, as it is in Heb. ii. 5, and about which we have before written at some length.

The word translated "to bring" here is eisago, and in classical Greek its first usage seems to be that of leading a person into his home. It is used in Acts vii. 45, where we read concerning the Tabernacle that was made "according to the fashion" that Moses had seen, that the "fathers" "brought (it) in with Jesus" into the land which God had given them for a possession. This leader, however, was Joshua, a shadow only of the true Captain of salvation even as the Tabernacle was a shadow also. But when the Father Himself bringeth in the true Joshua into the land of His possession, the true oikoumene (a word first used in the LXX of the land of Canaan in Exod. xvi. 35), He will minister in the Tabernacle which God pitched and not man, and fulfil in Himself all that Joshua the captain, Aaron the priest and David the king foreshadow. When He is brought into the world at the Second Advent, one thing will be said that is said of no other:

> "And let all the angels of God worship Him."

Angels rightly repudiate worship and affirm that worship is due to God alone (Rev. xxii. 8, 9). Here, at the command of the Father, not merely men but angels are called upon to worship the Only Begotten. The margin of the A.V. tells us that the words "And let all the angels of God worship Him" are quoted from Deut. xxxii. 43, but if we turn to that reference in the A.V., no such words are to be found. It also refers us to Psa. xcvii. 7 which reads "Worship Him, all ye gods". The LXX translates this "Worship Him, all ye His angels" and so brings the passage nearer to the words of Heb. i. 6. If we, in quoting a passage of Scripture, varied that quotation by even one word, our manuscripts would be marked and sent back to us for rectification. In the case of an inspired apostle we can well admit that should he feel the subject demanded it, a variation would be justified. Yet, we cannot feel quite happy over this. We note that Paul goes so far as to quote even the word "And", which looks as though he had a definite passage before him. The words of the LXX version of Deut. xxxii. 43 are quoted word for word in Heb. i. 6. Here is the reading of Heb. i. 6: and the reading of the LXX version of Deut. xxxii. 43:

> Kai proskunesatosan auto pantes aggeloi theou.

> Kai proskunesatosan auto pantes aggeloi theou.

The reader will see that these two lines are identical. Turpie says of this:

> "A passage corresponding to this quotation is found in the LXX at Deut. xxxii. 43. But, that that reading is spurious, there is cause to believe from the following reasons. First, there is nothing corresponding to it in the Hebrew text, at the same place. Second, none of the other ancient versions exhibits that clause. Third, nor is it found in all copies of the Septuagint, the Codex Alex., reading huioi theou "sons of God" for aggeloi theou "angels of God"; and one MSS. at least, viz. the Oxford, wholly omitting the clause.

> Fourthly and conclusively, the Messiah is not spoken of nor alluded to in that song. We must look, then, for its original in no other place than Psalm 97:7."

To this comment we reply: The Septuagint version is quoted by Paul as authoritative Scripture, and forms part of an argument that would be destroyed, could the Scriptural authority for it be challenged. Notice the way in which the undoubted texts of Old Testament Scriptures are introduced in this chapter. "He saith", and with these words the quotation from Deut. xxxii. is introduced. The fact which stares us in the face is this, that the Hebrew of Deut. xxxii. 43 has been tampered with, and we owe it to the despised and neglected Greek version that this most important text has been preserved to us.

A | Heb. i. 5-7. Unto which of the angels . . . My Son . . .
Angels are "spirits" and "ministers".
B | i. 8, 9. Christ is addressed as God. "Throne." "Sceptre."
B | i. 10-12. Christ is addressed as Lord. "Earth." "Heavens."
A | i. 13, 14. To which of the angels . . . . . Sit on My right hand . . .
Angels are "ministering spirits".

Before proceeding we must make sure that every reader will be able to follow the references we must make to the presence of "conjunctions of antithesis". Conjunctions are particles which denote:

(1) Annexation, like kai "and";
(2) Comparison, like hos "as";
(3) Disjunction, like etoi . . . e "either" . . . "or";
(4) Antithesis, like alla "but";
(5) Condition, like ei "if";
(6) Cause, like gar "for";
(7) Inference, like oun "therefore" and
(8) Result, like hina "in order that".

For the moment we are concerned with the conjunctions of antithesis—the Greek men . . . de. These words often occur in distribution, men occurring in one sentence, de in the sentence that follows, and may be rendered "on the one hand" and "on the other hand". In Heb. i. 7 we read "And regarding (men) on the one hand, the angels He saith" and in Heb. i. 8 we read "Regarding (de) on the other hand the Son He saith". A similar antithesis and with the same object is found in Heb. iii. 5, 6, where Moses on the one hand was faithful as a servant, but Christ on the other hand was Son over His own house. There are about twenty instances of this antithetical conjunction in Hebrews, which we may note as we reach them. An intended contrast therefore with the angels is found in verse 8:

> "But unto (pros regarding) the Son (He saith), Thy throne, O God, is unto the age of the age (eis ton aiona tou aionos)" (Heb. i. 8).

This text has been put on the rack, like Rom. ix. 5, by those who cannot tolerate the Deity of Christ. It has been put as a parenthetical exclamation "O God"; it has been rendered "Thy God-like throne" and "Thy throne of God", but all such are obviously forced and without justification. A "throne", Greek thronos, is described as "a free open seat with a footstool", and the footstool is seen to be an integral part of this throne "Until I make Thine enemies Thy footstool" (Heb. i. 13; x. 13). "Heaven is My throne, and the earth is My footstool" (Isa. lxvi. 1). It must be remembered that of the nine occurrences of the word "footstool" in the New Testament six (seven?) speak of enemies, and that not one speaks of worship. It is also an interesting fact that Psa. cx. 1 is quoted in the New Testament more than any other Psalm.

> "Sit Thou at My right hand, until I make Thine enemies Thy footstool."

While the verse before us in Hebrews stresses a throne, a sceptre and a kingdom, we are aware that "the principal thing" according to Paul's own summing up is that Christ is an High Priest. In Psa. cx. 4 we read "Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec", and we learn from Hebrews that Melchisedec was also a king. Several items need careful examination in order to enable us to perceive the Divine intention in these related passages. For clearness sake let us tabulate them here:

(1) The "sceptre" of Psa. xlv. 6 is in the Hebrew shebet.
(2) The "rod" in Psa. cx. 2 is in the Hebrew matteh.
(3) But both words are translated rhabdos in the Septuagint.
(4) The "rod" of iron of Psa. ii. 9 is the Hebrew shebet.
(5) The "rod" of iron of Rev. ii. 27; xii. 5; xix. 15 is the Greek rhabdos.
(6) The priesthood of Melchisedec is "for the age".
(7) The throne of the Son is "for the age of the age".
(8) Psa. cx. 1 is quoted in six places in the New Testament.
(9) Three of these quotations are in the Gospels, and record the Saviour's challenge "Whose Son is He?"
(10) One is in the Acts, to prove that Christ ascended.
(11) One is in Heb. i. 13 and
(12) One in I Cor. xv. 25 which takes us beyond the "age" of Psa. cx., or the "age of the age" of Heb. i. 13 to the "End" when God shall be all in all.

No.12. "This oil of gladness."
pp. 129 - 135

In order that the reader may be aware of the nature of the study on which we now embark, we repeat the list of items demanding attention with which the preceding article closed:

(1) The "sceptre" of Psa. xlv. 6 is in the Hebrew shebet.
(2) The "rod" in Psa. cx. 2 is in the Hebrew matteh.
(3) But both words are translated rhabdos in the Septuagint.
(4) The "rod" of iron of Psa. ii. 9 is the Hebrew shebet.
(5) The "rod" of iron of Rev. ii. 27; xii. 5; xix. 15 is the Greek rhabdos.
(6) The priesthood of Melchisedec is "for the age".
(7) The throne of the Son is "for the age of the age".
(8) Psa. cx. 1 is quoted in six places in the New Testament.
(9) Three of these quotations are in the Gospels, and record the Saviour's challenge "Whose Son is He?"
(10) One is in the Acts, to prove that Christ ascended.
(11) One is in Heb. i. 13 and
(12) One in I Cor. xv. 25 which takes us beyond the "age" of Psa. cx., or the "age of the age" of Heb. i. 13 to the "End" when God shall be all in all.

The sceptre of Psa. xlv. 6 is shebet in the Hebrew. It is this verse that is quoted in Heb. i. 8 and the apostle declares that these words were addressed to "The Son". Kingship is indicated by the sceptre, as in the prophecy:

> "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah" (Gen. xlix. 10).
> "Of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood" (Heb. vii. 14).

To those readers who can appreciate suggestions without having them worked out for them here, we draw attention to the fact that the first occurrence of the word "sceptre" says that it shall not depart from Judah, and that the last occurrence says that it shall depart from Egypt (Zech. x. 11). We have enough however before us, not to stop at every interesting aside. We have noted in our list printed above, that the word "rod" is the translation of the Hebrew matteh. Now Ezekiel speaking in a parable likens Israel to a vine that had strong "rods" or "sceptres", but that this vine was cast to the ground, her rods broken, "so that she hath no strong rod to be a sceptre to rule", referring presumably to Zedekiah (Ezek. xix. 14). The point of interest to us at the moment is that a "rod" matteh can become a "sceptre" shebet.

Now Aaron's "rod" was a symbol, not of kingship but of priesthood (Numb. xvii. 9, 10). The rod of strength that is to be sent out of Zion (Psa. cx. 2) is the rod of a priest. We are therefore prepared to discover that "king" (Psa. xlv. 1) and "priest" (Psa. cx. 4) unite in Him Who is a Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec. Nowhere else in the New Testament than in the epistle to the Hebrews do we read of Melchisedec, but there he is spoken of nine times, where he is set forth both as King of Righteousness, and King of Peace, Priest of the Most High God, and made like unto the Son of God. The Melchisedec priesthood is shown to be infinitely superior to the priesthood of Aaron, and Melchisedec himself is shown to have been greater even than Abraham.

> "Now consider how great this man was, unto whom even the patriarch Abraham gave the tenth of the spoils" (Heb. vii. 4), and the point of this discrimination is reached when we learn that "perfection", the goal of this epistle, can never be attained under the Levitical priesthood (Heb. vii. 11).

Christ, therefore, must not be thought of simply as a king, neither must He be thought of simply as a priest, He is a King-Priest, and so differs essentially from every king and every priest of Israel. The prophet saw Him from afar under the title "The BRANCH" saying "He shall sit and rule upon His throne; and He shall be a priest upon His throne; and the counsel of peace shall be between them both" (Zech. vi. 13). The "both" referring to the combined office of King and Priest that Messiah alone can bear. Psa. xlv. 6 tells us that "the King" with His "sword", His "arrows", His "terrible things" has a "right sceptre". Heb. i. 8 says that it is a sceptre of "righteousness". Neither the word "right" nor the word "righteousness" is the one usually employed. In Psa. xlv. 6 the word is mishor, from yashar, and in Heb. i. 8 the word used is euthutes. There is evidently something distinctive about this "sceptre" and the rule it denotes that we should seek to understand.

First let us observe that this was the original state of man at his creation, not "righteous" for that involves positive deeds, but "upright" (Eccles. vii. 29). It is the character given to Job at the opening of that book; he is described as being "perfect and upright", although later he was convinced that he had no valid "righteousness". A number of the kings are said to have done that which was right in the sight of the Lord (I Kings xv. 5, 11 etc.). The verb is used of paths and ways being "made straight", or the users of these paths being "directed" (Isa. xlv. 2; Prov. iii. 6). The Greek word used in Heb. i. 8, euthutes, is one of a group, all of which emphasize either physical straightness or moral equity; "fit" (Luke ix. 62); "meet" (Heb. vi. 7); "make straight" (John i. 23); the street called "Straight" (Acts ix. 11). Some, reading Esther iv. 11, see in the holding out of the golden sceptre a suggestion that mercy is blended with righteousness in the sceptre of the King of kings.

The throne of the Son of God is to be "for the age of the age"; the priesthood of Melchisedec is "for the age". In the Hebrew of Psa. xlv. 7, 8 the time period is expressed by the words olam va ed "unto the age of undefined limits and yet further"; the priesthood of Melchisedec is "unto the age of undefined limits" l'olam (Psa. cx. 4). The office of king is to be in operation longer than that of priest. By the time the New Jerusalem is seen, one of the glories of that heavenly city is that there is no temple there. But right up to the "end", enemies are dealt with, and not until such are subdued under Him will the Son relinquish the Throne, bringing both kingship and priesthood to an end, that "God" may be all in all.

Psa. cx. is quoted in Matthew, Mark and Luke in connection with the Saviour's unique Sonship. It occurs once in the Acts, once in Hebrews and once in I Corinthians. The references in the Gospels are Matt. xxii. 44; Mark xii. 36 and Luke xx. 42. These three references differ only in their fullness. Mark's account concludes with the comment "The common people heard Him gladly". Luke's account makes no such comment, but leads straight on to the Lord's warning concerning the hypocrisy and greed of the scribes. Matthew's account is the fullest record, and for our present purpose covers the three quotations of Psa. cx. The Pharisees had previously taken counsel together how they might entangle Him in His talk, and perceiving their hypocrisy, He put the question concerning the image and superscription of Caesar. The Sadducees followed by posing a problem concerning the resurrection, and lastly a lawyer asked the question as to the great commandment of the law. Before these disgruntled and defeated antagonists could withdraw, the Saviour using their own methods completely silenced them, saying:

> "What think ye of Christ? Whose Son is He?" (Matt. xxii. 42).

The Lord did not here specifically refer to Himself. Leaving Himself for the moment out of the question, He asked them what they thought the Scriptures taught concerning the Messiah and His Sonship. They replied immediately, "The son of David". With that answer they were apparently satisfied, but the Saviour's next question revealed the gulf that yawned between their conception of the Person of the Messiah and the teaching of the Scriptures. "How then doth David in spirit call Him Lord", and then the Lord Jesus proceeds to quote Psa. cx. 1, continuing "If David then calls Him Lord, how is He his son?" "And no man was able to answer Him a word". Christ is not only man, Christ is not only God, He is the God-Man gloriously and blessedly unique in time and eternity. The quotation in Acts ii. 34 still refers to the relationship of the Messiah with David, but this time not so much with His Sonship, but His Resurrection and Ascension.

> "Let me freely speak unto you of the patriarch David, that he is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us unto this day . . . . . For David is not ascended into the heavens . . . . ." (Acts ii. 29-34).

But even though David must await the resurrection of the redeemed, his Son and Lord was raised from the dead, ascended into heaven, sat down on the right hand of God, and is made "both Lord and Christ". The passage which takes us beyond the limits set in Heb. i. 13 is I Cor. xv. 24-28:

> "Then cometh the end . . . . . that God may be all in all."

This end is reached by a series of steps and stages:

(1) "When He shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father."
(2) "When He shall have put down all rule and all authority and power."
(3) "When all things shall be subdued unto Him, then shall the Son also Himself be subject unto Him that put all things under Him, that God may be all in all."

The sequence of events is broken at the end of verse 24 and again in verse 27. After telling us that all authority and power shall be put down, the apostle breaks in to give an expansion of the subject, saying:

> "For He must reign, till He hath put all enemies under His feet."

The Companion Bible at Psa. cx. 1 has this note:

> "Make Thine enemies Thy footstool—set Thine enemies (as) a footstool for Thy feet. In New Testament Gr.—tithemi (2 aor. subj.)—'shall have placed'. I Cor. xv. 25 is the exception, where it is not 'set as a footstool', but put 'under', because Christ's session on His own throne (Matt. xxv. 31; Rev. iii. 21) is there referred to, instead of His session on His Father's throne, as in all the other quotations."

These considerations are by no means exhaustive, they are rather but indications of what lines of study are necessary to begin to appreciate the apostle's line of argument in Heb. i. We can only leave it with the reader, and pray that each may be so desirous of attaining to the "knowledge of the Son of God" (Eph. iv. 13), that no weariness of the flesh shall be permitted to prevent the exercise of the Berean spirit that it is the purpose of this study to encourage.

We pass now to the conclusion of this section of Heb. i., namely verse 9:

> "Thou hast loved righteousness, and hated iniquity; therefore God, even Thy God, hath anointed Thee with the oil of gladness above Thy fellows."

Knowing the nature of our hearts when bereft of grace, we are somewhat timid in the use of "hate", leaning rather and exclusively to the emphasis on "love". We should remember that unholy love may be as harmful as unholy hate, and that true hate and true love go together:

> "He that loveth his life shall lose it; and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal" (John xii. 25).
> "Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated" (Rom. ix. 13).

Some things are stated to be the objects of true hatred without the alternative that is loved being stated, "Hating even the garment spotted by the flesh" (Jude 23); "Thou hatest the deeds of the Nicolaitanes, which I also hate"; "which thing I hate" (Rev. ii. 6, 15). In the Old Testament we read of "men of truth, hating covetousness", and the Psalmist says "Ye that love the Lord, hate evil", so others "hate every false way"; "hate and abhor lying", the climax being reached in Psa. cxxxix., "Do not I hate them, O Lord, that hate Thee? . . . . . I hate them with perfect hatred" (Psa. . cxxxix. 21, 22). Perfect hate can only be achieved where there is also perfect love. In the Son of God there is perfect harmony, and because He had loved righteousness and hated iniquity, the good pleasure of the Lord was manifestly expressed. The anointing here is not the anointing of the Saviour at the commencement of His ministry (Luke iv. 18), for that anointing but led along the path of sorrows to the shame of the Cross. This is an anointing with the "oil of gladness", it is the "exceeding joy," of the presentation of the believer faultless before the throne (Jude 24). This "exceeding joy" is reserved for the believer until the moment "When His glory shall be revealed" (I Pet. iv. 13).

> "That the elaion agalliaseos here does not mean the oil of consecration to office, is plain from the consideration that the administration of the kingly office is described in the preceding context as having already existed" (Moses Stuart).
> "We must distinguish this anointing from that of Acts x. 38 and Isa. lxi. 1. For it is consequent upon the righteous course of the Son of God in His humanity, and therefore belongs to His triumph" (Alford).

Two further terms used here show that Christ as the Mediator, and not as He was before the world began, is intended. These terms are "Thy God" and "Thy fellows". As the Lord, He is God, and God can have no fellows, but one of His most important yet most misunderstood relationships is expressed in the words "The God of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Eph. i. 17). Who is at the selfsame time "The Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Eph. iii. 14); indeed "The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Eph. i. 3). This relation to His office as "The Son" also relates to His Mediation and His Headship. Throughout the Old Testament from the call of Abraham and on unto the speech of Stephen in Acts vii., the Lord has borne the name of "The God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob", the covenant-keeping God of Israel. Those who are addressed in the epistle of the Mystery, Ephesians, had no such God. They were aliens, strangers, Christless, hopeless and Godless. By the very nature of their natural condition, and by the very nature of the new revelation made known in Ephesians, the believing Gentile could no more approach the Lord as the God of Abraham than the Syro-phoenician woman could approach Him as the Son of David (Matt. xv.). But instead of this being a loss or a disadvantage, we discover it to be but another opportunity for grace to triumph. Who would cling to the God of Abraham, when the Son of God became the Head of his calling? It is for this reason that in the ministry of Paul both before Acts xxviii., and in the ministry also of Peter, Jesus Christ is set forth as "The One Mediator between God and men" and we gladly relinquish all hope of using the title "the God of Abraham" because we can instead call upon "The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ".

We come back therefore to Heb. i. 9 and rejoice that here also we read "Therefore God, even Thy God", realizing that this special anointing is entirely related to His Mediatorial office, and can have no relation to His own intrinsic Deity. The same epistle that says "Thy God" can without contradiction or confusion equally say "Thy throne, O God", for Christ is both God and Man.

Again, who can be God's "fellow"? Yet here, the Son of God is anointed with the oil of gladness "above His fellows". This phrase contains the first of five occurrences of the Greek word metochos "partakers" in Hebrews:

> "Anointed . . . . . above thy fellows" (Heb. i. 9).
> "Partakers of the heavenly calling" (iii. 1).
> "We are made partakers if . . . . ." (iii. 14).
> "The heavenly gift . . . . . partakers of the Holy Ghost, if . . . . ." (vi. 4, 6).
> "Chastisement, whereof all are partakers" (xii. 8).

Who are these "fellows", these "partakers"? Some say angels, some say kings, some say believers. In Heb. ii. 14 Christ "took part" or "became a partaker" metecho of flesh and blood, and because He came down and united Himself with our low estate, it becomes gloriously possible for sinful men, redeemed by His precious blood, to contemplate the possibility of sharing the glory that has been given Him. Should one object and say "surely the believer cannot be ranged along with the Lord like that", we read "He is not ashamed to call them brethren" (Heb. ii. 11), and elsewhere the believer is spoken of as being a "joint-heir with Christ", so united with Him as to make it possible for him to sit on His throne, even as He has sat down with His Father on His Throne; and to crown all, we remember His words, "The glory which Thou gavest Me I have given them; that they may be one, EVEN AS WE ARE ONE (John xvii. 22). In some of His offices, the Saviour was and must be "alone". None can intrude into the suffering and death that constitute the "one Offering". The glory that was His by right and enjoyed "before the world was", is His alone and can be shared by none; but as the One Mediator, He is not alone, He is exalted, but exalted among His redeemed people. Let us end this study in meditating on the wonder and the grace that can link the Saviour's Name and glory to such as we were and are:

"Anointed with the oil of gladness above His fellows."

No.13. Jesus Christ the Same (i. 12)
pp. 173 - 178

When we read the words "Thy throne, O God" and then go on to read "Therefore God, even Thy God", we feel that we are facing a mystery, and indeed we are, "the mystery of godliness", which is nothing less than God manifest in the flesh. If Christ be God and Man, we must be sure at every step whether His Divine or Human nature is in view. The same Person could use the extraordinary words in prayer, "Father, I WILL", yet ever acknowledge that He came not to do His own will, but the will of the Father that sent Him. So, with nothing to mark the transition, Heb. i. 9, 10 passes from One Who can have "fellows", to One Who shares an aspect of glory with none, the glory of the Creator.

> ". . . . . I am the LORD, and there is none else. I form the light, and create darkness: I make peace, and create evil: I the LORD do all these things . . . . . Thus saith the LORD that created the heavens; God Himself that formed the earth and made it . . . . . I am the LORD; and there is none else" (Isa. xlv. 6, 7, 18).

Here there can be no "fellows". Here we listen to the unchallengeable claim of God, "There is none else". In the presence of Isa. xlv., we must believe that "the Lord" Who is addressed in Heb. i. 10 as having laid the foundation of the earth "in the beginning" must be God, even as in the presence of Isa. xlv. 23, we must believe that "the Lord" of Phil. ii. 6-11 must be God, to Whom every knee shall bow.

> "And, Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the works of Thine hands" (Heb. i. 10).

The Scripture quoted is Psa. cii., a Psalm concerning "The King, in His humiliation" (The Companion Bible). Much in this is reminiscent of Psa. xxii., which opens with the words of the cross "My God, My God, Why hast Thou forsaken Me?" The point of the Psalm is the cry of the afflicted and suffering Messiah, Who says:

> "My days are consumed like smoke" (Psa. cii. 3).
> "My days are like a shadow that declineth" (Psa. cii. 11).

In contrast with which He says:

> "But Thou, O LORD, shalt endure for ever" (Psa. cii. 12).

Later, the Sufferer returns to the theme of shortened days:

> "He shortened My days" (cii. 23).
> "I said, O my God, take me not away in the midst of my days" (cii. 24).

In contrast He says:

> "Thy years are throughout all generations" (cii. 24).

Then follows the passage quoted in Heb. i. 10, which concludes with the words:

> "But Thou art the same, and Thy years shall have no end" (cii. 27).

The words "In the beginning", kat'archas, are the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew le-phanim "previously", and take us back to Gen. i. 1.

He, Who is yet to "appear in His glory" and build up Zion (Psa. cii. 16), He, Who as the Mediator and suffering Redeemer mingled His drink with weeping, nevertheless before His humiliation was the great Creator. This is embedded in Psa. cii. and in Heb. i.

The structure of the Psalm, reduced to a minimum, seems to be as follows:

Psalm cii.

A | Complaint poured out before the Lord.
B | Days consumed like smoke.
Days like a shadow that declineth.
C | Contrast: BUT THOU shalt endure (Heb. sit).
Thy remembrance unto all generations.
D | When the Lord shall build up Zion.
D | He shall appear in His glory.
B | Days shortened.
Days Take me not away in the midst of.
C | Contrast: Thy years are throughout all generations.
BUT THOU shalt endure (Heb. stand).
Thou art the same.
Thy years shall have no end.
A | Seed established before Thee.

Another Psalm belonging to the same group, namely Psa. civ., is quoted in Heb. i. 7 "Who maketh His angels spirits, and His ministers a flame of fire" (Psa. civ. 4). It immediately continues:

> "Who laid the foundations of the earth, that it should not be removed for ever (to the age and yet further, Hebrew to the age of the age, Gk.). Thou coveredst it with the deep as with a garment . . . . . at Thy rebuke they fled . . . . . Thou hast set a bound that they may not pass over" (Psa. civ. 5-9).

Earlier we read, "Who coverest thyself with light as with a garment: Who stretchest out the heavens like a curtain" (Psa. civ. 2). These, the heavens and the earth, are to wax old as a garment, be folded up, and put away.

We remember the majestic interposition of the Lord in the book of Job, when He broke through all the arguments of the three comforters, and even of Elihu, and answered Job out of the whirlwind.

> "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth?
> Who shut up the sea with doors, when it brake forth?
> When I made the cloud the garment thereof . . . . .
> Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further: and here shall thy proud waves be stayed" (Job xxxviii. 4-11).

He Who challenged Job, and Who is seen as the Creator in Psa. civ. and Psa. cii., is He Who, when the fullness of time had come, humbled Himself and took upon Him the form of a servant. He Who created man is the One Who redeemed him. "They shall perish; but Thou remainest". We know from II Pet. iii. 10, from Rev. xx. 11 and from Isa. xxxiv. 4 that "The host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll", but the purpose for the introduction of this catastrophic event in Hebrews was not for its own sake, but to further the real object of the epistle. Paul knew, for he had been a Pharisee and a zealous upholder of the traditions of the fathers, that what he was about to say concerning the law, the priesthood, the sacrifices, and the covenants, would come as a great shock to his readers. Here he prepares them by looking further than the confines of Israel. Even creation itself is to "wax old", yet the believer need have no fear while it is true concerning the Son of God that "He remaineth". This is the "end" of the conversation of those whose faith they were enjoined to follow:

> "Jesus Christ the SAME yesterday, and to day, and for ever" (Heb. xiii. 8).

Angels are set aside, Moses is superseded, Joshua only gave a typical rest, Aaron needed an atonement for his own sins, priests died and had to have successors, the covenant made at Sinai had been broken, and a New Covenant had been brought in:

> "In that He saith, A new covenant, He hath made the first old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away" (Heb. viii. 13).

The words "wax old", "made . . . . . old" and "decayeth" are all translations of the same Greek word palaioo. To this relationship between the law of Moses, the old Covenant and the New, Paul devotes chapter iii. of II Corinthians. There, the old Covenant "had no glory in this respect, by reason of the glory that excelleth. For if that which is done away was glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious" (II Cor. iii. 10, 11). Diameno, the word translated "remainest" in Heb. i. 11, means "to remain right through" as in II Pet. iii. 4 "all things continue as they were". The believing Hebrew, with the unchanging Christ before him, could read Psa. xlvi. afresh with growing appreciation. Psa. xlv. 6 is already quoted in Heb. i., Psa. xlvi. might well continue:

> "God is our refuge and strength . . . . . therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea."

"We", they can say, "receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved, let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear" (Heb. xii. 28). After this reference to creation and its dissolution, the apostle returns to his comparison between the angels and the Son of God.

> "But to which of the angels said He at any time, Sit on My right hand, until I make Thine enemies Thy footstool?" (Heb. i. 13).

Christ made the worlds and upholds all things by the word of His power, yet He was crucified in weakness. He Who was the Express Image of the substance of God, was made a little lower than the angels. He Who thus came so low on our account was raised from the dead, declared to be the Son of God with power, and so made much higher than the angels. He is the Son, and angels are called upon to worship Him. He is addressed as God and as Lord; all things may pass away, whether the physical world, or the old covenant, but while it is written "Thou remainest" we may boldly say:

> "The Lord is my Helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me" (Heb. xiii. 6).

He, the Beloved Son of God, cried out from the cross for our sakes "My God, My God, Why hast Thou forsaken Me?", but He has promised:

> "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee" (Heb. xiii. 5).

Heb. i. 14 speaks of an "inherited salvation". What is meant by this term? In the same chapter Christ is said to have obtained by inheritance a more excellent name than the angels, and this has a bearing on the subsequent use of the term.

All who are saved receive salvation by faith, but some of the saved will, in addition, receive salvation by inheritance. Christ suffered and learned obedience by His sufferings, was perfected, and became the Author of aionian salvation to all them that obey Him. Christ is set before the Hebrews as the Author and Perfecter of faith, "Who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God" (xii. 2).

Those who "inherit" salvation suffer, endure, run the race set before them, and like Moses and Abraham, have respect unto the recompence of the reward. To be an heir pre-supposes sonship: "If children, then heirs" (Rom. viii. 17); but before salvation no man is a child of God.

Does the word "salvation" in Hebrews point to something other than salvation from sin? Let us see. We shall not be at all surprised to find that such a word occurs seven times, viz.:

Soteria* (salvation)

Inherited salvation (i. 14).
Neglecting so great salvation (ii. 3).
The Captain of salvation (ii. 10).
The Author of aionian salvation (v. 9).
Things that accompany salvation (vi. 9).
Without sin unto salvation (ix. 28).
Unto the salvation of his house (xi. 7).

Passing by for a moment the first reference, let us briefly notice the others. Heb. ii. 3.—This salvation is called the "so great" salvation, which title indeed, we gladly agree, justly describes the redemption of the sinner. Those who were in danger of neglecting this so great salvation, however, are those who have had its testimony confirmed to them, which hardly applies to unbelievers. Much also depends upon the meaning of the word "neglect", which must be considered in its place. We hope to show that this salvation does not refer to salvation from sin.

Heb. ii. 10. The underlying idea in this reference is contained in the words "bringing many sons to glory". This is accomplished by One called "The Captain", Who, like Joshua, leads on to the promised possession, unlike Moses, who led out of the land of bondage.

Heb. v. 9. This passage is almost parallel with ii. 10, but gives fuller detail. It is concerned with obedience and the perfecting effect of suffering.

We believe we shall be able to demonstrate that the aionian salvation of this passage, the so great salvation of ii. 3, the inherited salvation of i. 14, and the glory of ii. 10, all point to the one thing.

Heb. vi. 9. "Things that accompany salvation" certainly link us with our first deliverance from sin; yet remembering the purifying and stimulating character of hope, we cannot exclude future salvation and inherited glory from this passage. One has only to read on in the near context to hear of showing "full assurance of hope unto the end", of "inheriting the promises", through "faith and patience", and of "the hope set before us". These all have a bearing upon the salvation of verse 9 and influence its interpretation.

Heb. ix. 28. This passage not only puts salvation into the future and speaks of believers waiting for it, but it also definitely rules out the idea of salvation from sin, that having taken place once for all. This salvation is connected, not with the first but with the Second Appearing of Christ, and is expressly spoken of as "apart from sin" altogether.

Heb. xi. 7. The salvation of Noah's house in the Ark is the nearest approach to the salvation of the sinner that these seven references provide. Yet the deliverance from the future day of wrath is clearly foreshadowed, Noah himself being already a saved and justified believer, and the record is part of a series illustrating faith as the substance of things hoped for, rather than faith that saves from sin, the "saving of the soul" of Heb. x. 39 notwithstanding.

Whatever the exact meaning of the word "salvation" may be, as used in this epistle, it is evident that no reference gives a clear evangelical statement of the way of salvation. On the other hand, the type of the wilderness journey, its Tabernacle, its Camp, and the rest that remaineth, its temptations and its perils, is so fully applied in this epistle, that we cannot dismiss them without losing great light upon this subject.

The title "Saviour" never occurs in Hebrews. In Acts v. 31 Christ is called both a "Prince and a Saviour". In Hebrews the title of Prince is retained (ii. 10; xii. 2 Gk.), but the title Saviour is omitted. The contexts of both occurrences speak of suffering in view of glory, rather than suffering to expiate sin. Other epistles speak of Christ as Saviour, this one speaks of Him as Captain and Leader. Other epistles tell of salvation from sin, this one speaks of the salvation that is to be inherited at the Second Appearing of the Lord.

The literal rendering of Heb. i. 14 is those who are "about to be heirs", and this is an expression frequently used in Scripture. In Hebrews it is found ten times, and often connected with the future kingdom, "The habitable world about to be", "The city about to be" (Heb. ii. 5; ix. 11; x. 1; xiii. 14). This inherited salvation is something future, related to the world which will be subjected to the Lord Jesus Christ and closely associated with that city Whose builder and maker is God.

No.14. Confirmed Covenants and their Responsibilities (ii. 1-4)
pp. 205 - 208

If we look at Heb. i. and ii. as a whole, we shall see that chapter ii. goes back beyond the intervening revelation and argument to the one outstanding fact—

> "God . . . . . hath in these last days spoken unto us IN SON . . . . . therefore we ought to give the more earnest heed . . . . ."

and immediately we are involved in an argument that revolves around the superiority of the Saviour to angels.

Hebrews i., ii.

A | i. 1, 2. God once spoke by prophets. Now by His Son.
B | i. 2-14. The Son. His Glories.
God and Lord, better than angels.
A | ii. 1-4. God once spoke by angels. Now by the Lord.
B | ii. 5-18. The Son. His humiliation.
Man and Abraham's seed. Lower than angels.

The "therefore" of ii. 1 is dia touto, "on this account", or "for this reason". We must not look for the prime reason in the preceding verse which speaks of the ministry of angels, but to the preceding clause which speaks of the superior testimony of the Son (i. 1, 2). "On this account it behooves us to give more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we should let slip." We differ from the A.V. in the rendering of this verse, agreeing more with the R.V. which reads, "drift away from them". Rotherham renders the word, "drift away"; J. N. Darby renders it "we should slip away". A great deal of controversy has arisen over this word, one set of interpreters taking the passage to mean "lest we should fall or stumble", the other taking it to mean "lest we forget". The one makes the passage teach that we should give earnest heed lest WE slip away; the other that we should give earnest heed so that we do not let the WORDS slip away. Both sides refer to Prov. iii. 21 to prove their point. J. N. Darby says:

> "Proverbs is a free translation, for the Hebrew is plural "let them not slip away from thine eyes", that is, what is spoken of in the end of the verse; but it shows the sense of the word."

Moses Stuart says:

> "This is the very proverb to which Chrysostom and Theophylact appeal as an illustration of the word in question: but the true sense of this word in Proverbs 3:21 > they do not seem to have apprehended. Pararrheo here plainly does not mean to perish, to fall, but is in the antithesis to tereson, keep, attend to, practice, and consequently means, to pass by, to neglect, to transgress."

Dr. E. W. Bullinger in his Lexicon and Concordance says:

> "Pararrheo, to flow near, flow by, glide away; here the 2nd Aorist passive carried away, beside, or with, referring, not like the active, to the act of floating away, but to being carried beside, or floating away past anything with the stream (the marginal reading is quite wrong and follows the Vulgate pereffluamus)."

The reader may wonder how it can be possible to arrive at a settled understanding where so many learned writers have so differently expressed themselves; yet it is possible to perceive truth in both sets of interpretations. It is certain that if earnest heed be not given we are apt to let the words slip; it is equally Scripturally true that, if we do not give earnest heed, we ourselves shall slip. It appears, therefore, that the true meaning of the passage is a combination of both thoughts; we cannot let slip the words of truth without sliding away ourselves. An extension of the argument comes in chapters iii. and iv.:

> "And to whom sware He that they should not enter into His rest, but to them that believed not? . . . . . Let us therefore fear, lest, a promise being left us of entering into His rest, any of you should seem to come short of it" (Heb. iii. 18; iv. 1).

The two sides of the question appear in chapters v. and vi. In both the "dull" of hearing or the "slothful" are mentioned (same word in each case). Heb. v. 11, 12: "Ye are dull of hearing . . . . . ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one teach you again"; here is the parallel with the A.V. "let them slip". Heb. vi. 12-19: "That ye be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises". These are "anchored", and this passage parallels the R.V. rendering, "drift away from them".

On the whole the grammatical form and the general teaching of the epistle inclines to the second meaning, that the lack of diligence was fraught with the danger of slipping away. The argument of the verses which follow is to the effect that, if Israel had to give earnest heed to the message sent by prophets or angels lest they should fail of entering into the rest that remained for them, those who have had the word spoken to them, not merely by prophets or even angels, but by the Son Himself, must even more diligently heed the words spoken. For it is impossible, we shall learn, to renew such unto repentance if they should "fall away", or, in the words of the verse before us, "how shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation".

The Apostle leads to this question by reverting to an argument parallel with that of the opening of the first chapter. God spoke in the past by many agencies, now He has spoken in the Son. Here the form of the argument is repeated, the details being altered:

> "For if the word spoken by angels was stedfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompence of reward; how shall we escape, if we neglect > so great salvation; which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard Him?" (ii. 2, 3).

The Apostle does not say "the law", but "the word", a term which is wider and embraces the whole of the old Covenant. It will be found that the two Covenants came with new laws. There can be no difficulty in connection with the law being given by the mediation of angels, even though the Scripture definitely declares that "God spake all these words". The problem would meet us in Heb. i. 1 where God speaks, yet uses the mouth of a prophet. Stephen, speaking of Israel, said, "ye received the law by the disposition of angels" (Acts vii. 53). The apostle teaches that the law was "ordained by angels in the hand of a Mediator" (Gal. iii. 19). The awful accompaniments of the giving of the law at Sinai are presently to be compared with the wonderful miracles that were wrought to confirm the testimony of the Lord and the apostles. The word spoken by angels was "stedfast" (bebaios). It is the word used for establishing a promise (Rom. iv. 16); for the hope of the believer which rests upon "an oath for confirmation" (Heb. vi. 16-19); for the establishing of a covenant over the dead body of the appointed victim (Heb. ix. 17); and for the confirmation of the prophetic promise (II Pet. i. 19).

In the verbal form bebaioo, the word occurs again in Heb. ii. 3, "was confirmed". This fact helps us to see the force of the word "stedfast" better. Both the old and the new Covenants have been miraculously confirmed, and this confirmation added to the guilt of those who broke the former covenant's terms. This is brought out in Heb. vi., and again, from another standpoint, in Heb. x. 28-29. "Every transgression and disobedience": the words are nearly synonymous, they indicate a transgression accompanied by stubbornness and rebellion. Let us remember the many examples of those under the old Covenant who transgressed or rebelled against the terms of the Covenant confirmed by God. Let Moses himself bear witness that his act of transgression caused him to forfeit the land of promise; let all Israel who wandered forty years in the wilderness enforce the same principle, and let Caleb and Joshua also declare that the recompence of reward" took into account good as well as evil. It is the transgression, however, that is in view for the time being.

"The recompence of reward" (misthapodosia), and "the rewarder" (misthapodotes) are both peculiar to Hebrews. They indicate the central idea of the epistle upon which we have again and again insisted, namely, that Hebrews is parallel with Philippians, which speaks of the prize, and of working out our own salvation. "The recompence of the reward" comes as follows: ii. 2; x. 35; xi. 26, where the two sides, the good and the evil, are illustrated. The parenthetical way in which verse 6 comes in chapter xi. indicates that all those witnesses whose overcoming faith is instanced in that remarkable chapter believed that God is the Rewarder of them that diligently seek Him.

Without suggesting that the following is verbally accurate, it will nevertheless set out the argument of the Apostle sufficiently for the general reader:

Hebrews ii. 1 - 4

A | a | Warning, lest let slip.
b | Things spoken by angels.
c | Confirmed (bebaios).
B | No escape from just recompence.
B | How escape from similar recompence?
A | a | Warning, if neglect so great salvation.
b | Spoken by the Lord.
c | Confirmed (bebaioo) in special manner by God.

The argument is resumed in Heb. xii. 25-26, after a vast ground has been covered:

> "See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh. For if they ESCAPED not who refused Him that spake on earth, much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from Him that speaketh from heaven: Whose voice then shook the earth" (i.e. at Sinai, when the law was given by the disposition of angels)."

That there was a tendency on the part of the Jews to think they would escape is indicated by the question in Rom. ii. 3:

> "And thinkest thou this, O man, that judgest them which do such things, and doest the same, that thou shalt escape the judgment of God?"

Covenant relationship and privilege notwithstanding, the Jew was in error. There are believers today who so emphasize free grace that it may do good to draw attention to the balance of privilege and responsibility which characterizes the teaching of all Scripture. There are some who, ignoring Col. iii. 22-25, maintain that the judgment seat of Christ has no place in the epistles of the Mystery. This can only lead to imbalance.

No.15. The So Great Salvation (ii. 1-4)
pp. 205 - 208

"How shall we escape, if we neglect so GREAT SALVATION?" What is this salvation which is so great? None would be found to demur at the designation if it thereby indicated the salvation of the sinner by the blood of Christ. How great that is none can tell; salvation, as used in Hebrews, however, does not carry with it the evangelical meaning (see previous articles). Shall we allow the Hebrew usage to help us? Granting that the word often means individual salvation as in Rom. i. 16, there are other usages which show that the word has a wider meaning.

> Psa. xiv. 7. "Oh that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion! when the LORD bringeth back the captivity of His people, Jacob shall rejoice, and Israel shall be glad."

The national restoration of Israel is here called their salvation.

Psa. xcviii. 2, 3. "The LORD hath made known His salvation: His righteousness hath He openly shewed in the sight of the heathen."

What is this salvation which has been "made known"?

"He hath remembered His mercy and His truth toward the house of Israel: all the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our God."

Isa. xi. 11; xii. 1, 2. "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the LORD shall set His hand again the second time to recover the remnant of His people . . . . . and in that day thou shalt say, O LORD, I will praise Thee: though Thou wast angry with me, Thine anger is turned away, and Thou comfortedst me. Behold, God is my salvation."

Isa. lii. 9, 10. "The LORD hath comforted His people, He hath redeemed Jerusalem. The LORD hath made bare His holy arm in the eyes of all the nations; and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God."

The close connection between "salvation" and the restoration of Israel makes comment unnecessary.

Rev. xix. 1, 2. "Alleluia; Salvation, and glory, and honour, and power, unto the Lord our God: for true and righteous are His judgments."

Here the overthrow of Babylon ushers in the full redemption of Israel.

Just as we saw in the articles dealing with The Hope and the Prize (Volumes VII-XI) that there was something beyond the initial salvation from sin, so those who are under the New Covenant have to learn that there is an aspect of salvation which is beyond the testimony of the Scriptures just quoted. The "so great salvation" is something that could be "neglected"; the salvation of the Psalms and Isaiah referred to above is unrelated to human faith or faithfulness.

Now we know that Abraham, while dwelling in tents in the land of promise, looked for the city which hath foundations, but we do not learn that from the Old Testament. There is no hint there of anything of the kind. This special aspect of salvation had its commencement in being spoken by the Lord. Literally the passage reads, "which having received a commencement to be spoken by the Lord". The idea is that the Lord Jesus was the first One to give shape and expression to this new aspect of salvation. It may be asked, why? In the first case, He was born King and came preaching the Kingdom, and until it became manifest that He would be rejected by His people the "so great salvation" was not stressed. When, however, signs began to multiply showing that His ministry would end in rejection, then He spoke more openly of the added glory that should be shared by those who in His day of humiliation shared His reproach.

A hint is given in the parables of these two aspects in the distinction made between the Treasure which, having been found in the field, was hidden again, and the One Pearl (Matt. xiii.). For an exposition of these parables, see Parable, Miracle and Sign. When the Lord "began" to speak of His own death, He also began to speak of the qualifications of those who should attain the "so great salvation". He speaks of self-denial, of losing one's soul, and of finding it when the Lord comes with His angels (Matt. xvi. 21-28). To the young man the Lord said:

> "If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven, and come and follow Me . . . . . he went away sorrowful: for he had great possessions . . . . . Peter . . . . . said unto Him, Behold, we have forsaken all, and followed Thee; what shall we have THEREFORE? And Jesus said unto them, Verily I say unto you, That ye which have followed Me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Matt. xix. 21-28).

The parable which comes later in the Gospel, that of the marriage of the King's Son, is a warning to those who "neglect so great salvation", the very word translated "neglect" in Hebrews being here rendered "to make light of". The unwise and the unready virgins of Matt. xxv. speak again of the folly of neglect; they neglect the word spoken by the Lord, "Watch therefore". The Hebrews on the contrary were commended in that they had taken joyfully the spoiling of their goods, and were urged not to cast away their confidence which had great recompense of reward. Parallel with the "so great salvation" of Hebrews is the "saving of the soul" of Peter, a term misapplied in some Evangelical circles. The link is found in Heb. x. 39, where the true rendering is, "believe unto the acquiring of the soul". Acquiring is the rendering of peripoiesis which, occurring but five times in the New Testament, will not take long to consult:

Eph. i. 14.	"Until the redemption of the PURCHASED POSSESSION."
I Thess. v. 9.	"To OBTAIN salvation."
II Thess. ii. 14.	"To the OBTAINING of the glory."
Heb. x. 39.	"Unto the OBTAINING OR THE PURCHASING of the soul."
I Pet. ii. 9.	"A PURCHASED people" (margin).

The passage in Heb. x. is parallel with Matt. xvi. 24-27. Peter's expression, "the saving of the soul", contains a very different idea from that which is intended in present day gospel teaching. Paul never taught the saving of the soul when writing to the churches. He uses the expression only when addressing the Hebrews. Peter uses it when writing to the dispersion. Those to whom Peter addresses his epistle were redeemed (I Pet. i. 18), yet the salvation of their souls was something they could receive as "the end of their faith" (9). This salvation is ready to be revealed in the last time. Concerning this salvation the prophets spoke and searched what the Spirit testified beforehand, "the sufferings FOR Christ (see R.V.) and the glories that should follow . . . the grace to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 11-13). "Rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that, when His glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy" (iv. 13). "The God of all grace, Who hath called us unto His aionian glory by Christ Jesus, after that ye have suffered a while, make you perfect, stablish, strengthen, settle you" (v. 10).

This aionian glory, this share of the glory of the regeneration, this entry into the Marriage Feast, is all related to suffering, vigilance, not neglecting, or as it is in the Revelation, overcoming. The aionian glory is similar to the aionian salvation of Heb. v. 8, 9, which is closely connected with obedience and suffering. Those who attain this salvation are the church of the firstborn (Heb. xii. 23). To this salvation the apostle addresses himself here. He brings the wilderness wandering in to illustrate the failure to attain the promise; he exhorts to endurance; he gives a list of overcomers and cites the Lord Jesus Himself in chapters v. and xii. as an example to the overcomer. It is in view of this that the miraculous testimony of Heb. vi. is written, and to this end the solemn conclusion of Heb. xii. is addressed.

The difficulty that many have with regard to Heb. vi. will be solved as we realize the nature of the subject and the character of the confirmation. The miracles which were wrought by the apostles are called the "powers of the age to come", and to refuse their testimony was fraught with special danger. In this same context comes the nearest hint of the so great salvation in Abraham's history. Let it be observed what portion of Abraham's history is brought forward. Romans bases its teaching upon the testimony of Gen. xv. "Abram believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness". The whole argument excludes works. James bases his argument upon the twofold testimony of Gen. xv. and xxii. Hebrews goes at once to Gen. xxii. The epistle to the Hebrews does not speak of imputing righteousness without works. Its special theme demands such statements as "they wrought righteousness", and "the righteous shall LIVE by faith", "he obtained witness that he WAS righteous", "he became the heir of the righteousness which is by faith".

The passage in Gen. xxii. referred to in Heb. vi. goes beyond justification by faith; as James ii. 22 declares, "seest thou how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith perfected?" After Abraham had passed the supreme trial of faith come the words:

> "Surely blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee. And so, after he had patiently endured, he obtained the promise" (Heb. vi. 14, 15).

It was here when Abraham had reached this stage of "perfecting", the master key of "Hebrews", that it would seem God revealed to him the "so great salvation", the City which hath foundations.

No.16. Gifts for Confirmation (ii. 3, 4)
pp. 236 - 239

The great salvation which began to be spoken by the Lord was as surely confirmed as was the first covenant. It will be remembered that the word "stedfast" in verse 2 is but another grammatical form of the word "confirm". The first Covenant was confirmed in many ways, both Moses and those who followed after receiving abundant testimony from God that their ministry was from Him. The second confirmation spoken of is "unto us by them that heard Him". The nature of this confirmation must now be considered.

First we observe that in giving the special blessing to Abraham, as related in Heb. vi., God "interposed with an oath". This is spoken of as "an oath of confirmation" (bebaiosis).

The confirmation of the Lord's words by the apostle is explained in ii. 4: "God also co-attesting, both with signs and wonders and with divers miracles and distributions of holy spirit, according to His will." "God hath spoken" (i. 1) and whoever the mouthpiece may have been, responsibility to hear follows. Yet an increased responsibility comes with the fact that God hath at last spoken unto us in the person of the Son. God "co-attesting" must make each miracle something more than a mere "wonder". As a translation of sunepimartureo, Dr. E.W. Bullinger's concordance gives: "To bear conjoint additional decided witness, to bear further or emphatic witness with."

It may be remembered how repeatedly the apostles are called witnesses" during the Acts: "ye shall be witnesses unto Me" (Acts i. 8), but notice well what goes before, "but ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Spirit is come upon you; and ye shall be witnesses unto Me". "Ye shall receive" must come before "Ye shall be". Acts i. 22; ii. 32; iii. 15; v. 32; xiii. 31; and xxvi. 16 should be consulted. Notice v. 32, "and we are His witnesses of these things; and so is also the Holy Ghost, Whom God hath given to them that obey Him".

This is a Scriptural exposition of the word "co-attesting". So also Acts xiv. 3, "Long time therefore abode they speaking boldly in the Lord, Who testified unto the word of His grace, and granted signs and wonders to be done by their hands." So again Acts xv. 8: "And God . . . . . bare them witness, giving them the Holy Ghost".

Looking at the epistle to the Hebrews we see that God testified to Christ (1) that He liveth (2) that He is a Priest for the age after the order of Melchisedec (Heb. vii. 8, 17). The elders were attested; Abel obtained witness that he was righteous, God testifying over his gifts. Enoch received this testimony that he pleased God; and so it was with Noah, Abraham and the rest, "these all, having been attested by means of faith" (Heb. xi. 2, 4, 5, 39). In a special manner God co-attested the word of the Lord through the apostles. The closing verses of Mark's Gospel seem to refer to Heb. ii. 3, 4:

> "And these signs shall follow them that believe; In MY name shall they cast out devils (demons); they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover. So then after the Lord had spoken unto them, He was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God. And they went forth, and preached every where, the Lord working with them (co-operating), and CONFIRMING the word with SIGNS following" (Mark xvi. 17-20).

The parallel with Heb. ii. is too obvious to justify any detailed comparison, but a word with regard to the character of these confirmatory miracles may be of service.

(1) They were "signs following", not mere prodigies, or marvels, but signs, mighty acts that signified something.
(2) They were "the powers of the coming age" (Heb. vi.). Into this present evil age of demonic control comes the power of that age when such influences will be cast out.

Into this veritable Babel comes the power of that age with its new tongues; in that age the serpent will no longer tempt and destroy; in that age deadly things shall do no hurt; in that age sickness shall flee away.

As an illustration of the miracle being a "sign", see the healing of the lame man by Peter, and his own application of it to the salvation of the nation (Acts iii. and iv.). To the Corinthians, among whom miraculous gifts abounded, the apostle wrote:

> "In every thing ye are enriched by Him, in all utterance, and in all knowledge; even as the testimony (marturion) of Christ was confirmed (bebaioo) in you: so that ye come behind in no gift; waiting for the coming (revelation) of our Lord Jesus Christ: Who shall also confirm (bebaioo) you unto the end" (I Cor. i. 5-8).

Here again Heb. ii. 3, 4 is seen, the testimony, the confirmation, the miraculous gifts, all coming together. In II Cor. i. 21 Paul writes:

> "Now He that conforms us with you with a view to Christ, and hath anointed us, is God" (not AV JP).

Once more confirmation and anointing come together, the anointing referring to the baptism of the Holy Spirit. The three words, "signs, wonders, and miracles" of Heb. ii. 4 are found written of the Lord's own personal work.

> "Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved (publicly attested) of God among you by miracles and wonders and signs, which God did by Him in the midst of you" (Acts ii. 22).

It will be remembered that His ministry was a confirmatory one, "to confirm the promises made unto the fathers" (Rom. xv. 8). So the subsequent signs, wonders, and miracles were confirmatory also. Many wonders and signs were done by the apostles (Acts ii. 43); "a notable sign" is what the rulers called the healing of the lame man (Acts iv. 16).

Other passages are Acts iv. 30; v. 12; vi. 8; viii. 6, 13; and xv. 12. It will be observed that "signs and wonders" usually go together. The "wonder" was indeed a "sign", not some prodigy to cause men open-mouthed astonishment. Even the terrible things which usher in the Day of the Lord will be of similar character, "I will show WONDERS in heaven above, and SIGNS in the earth beneath" (ii. 19). The word rendered "miracle" in Heb. ii. is as often translated simply "power", e.g., "ye shall receive power" (Acts i. 8), "as though by our own power" (Acts iii. 12; iv. 7, 33; vi. 8; x. 38), the last reference ("how God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power: Who went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil; for God was with Him. And we are witnesses of these things") being a commentary upon the meaning of the anointing already noticed in II Corinthians, the enduement of the apostles in Acts i. 8, and the close connection between this "power" and the "miracle" which was its outflowing.

The scientific mind defines a miracle as the suspension of the laws of nature at the introduction of a higher law. The Scriptural definition seems rather to be that a miracle was the power of the coming age, brought forward as a pledge and a sign of good things to come. What will be normal in that age of glory appears abnormal and supernatural in this. Added to the signs, wonders and miracles for this special confirmation are "the distributions of holy spirit".

This is described as a taste of the good word of God and the powers of the age to come, and those who tasted are described as having become partakers of the Holy Spirit (Heb. vi. 4, 5). Not until the Lord was about to leave His disciples did He say, "Receive ye the Holy Spirit" (John xx. 22). With this read John vii. 39, "this spake He of the Spirit, which they that believe on Him should receive: for the Holy Spirit was not yet given, because that Jesus was not yet glorified". I Cor. xii. 8-11 gives a full comment upon the "distributions of holy spirit". These gifts, however diverse, are the working of that one and selfsame Spirit, dividing to every man severally as He will. These distributions of holy spirit covered the ministry of apostles, prophets, teachers, as well as miracles, gifts of healing, helps, governments, diversities of tongues (I Cor. xii. 28).

Let us notice the explanation of the Scripture as to how the gift of tongues was a sign. In the law it is written:

> "With men of other tongues and other lips will I speak unto this people; and yet for all that they will not hear Me, saith the Lord. Wherefore tongues are for a sign" (I Cor. xiv. 21, 22).

What the law prophesied is foreshadowed in the possession and exercise of the distributions of holy spirit. When the people to whom the signs applied were removed from the scene, the signs went too. It is often stated, but with no Scriptural proof, that the miraculous gifts possessed by the early Church have been lost because of the worldliness and carnality of the Church. The most carnal Church in Scripture is that of the Corinthians, yet they are described as the most richly endowed with supernatural gifts. I Cor. xiii. 9-12 indicates that a dispensational change would be associated with the passing of the gifts, and this is the testimony of the whole of the New Testament.

One word in closing seems necessary. The same words that are used of the mighty works of Christ and His apostles are used of the wicked one, "whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders" (II Thess. ii. 9), the only added word being "lying". This reveals the awful deception which shall be thrust upon the earth in the last days. These miracles constitute the "strong delusion" which will lead men to believe the lie. The fact that the false prophet will work actual miracles, and the three frog-like spirits of demons seen in the Revelation will work miracles, should cause us most carefully to pause before we conclude that the possession of a supernatural power today is necessarily an evidence of Divine origin or approval.

"The House of Jacob shall Possess their Possessions"

No.1. The significance of the word "possess".

It seems strange to some believers that there are still those who, while affirming that they believe the Scriptures, nevertheless deny the possibility of a literal restoration of Israel. Some take this attitude because they have already accepted as a principle of interpretation, that the promises made to Israel in the O.T. must be spiritualized and apply now only to the Church. Others reject the idea on moral grounds, "How could God", say they, "invest such a disobedient and rebellious people with such a title as Kings and Priests?" in apparent ignorance that this very objection is met in such a passage as Rom. xi. 28 where it is plainly stated that the very people who are at present 'enemies' concerning the Gospel 'for our sakes', are nevertheless "beloved for the father's sakes" adding as the one grand reason 'For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance'. It is good to know that the house of Jacob shall possess their possessions. The text of our meditation is found in the prophet Obadiah, and it is utterly beyond the range of legitimate exposition to read Edom, Esau, Teman and Jacob in such a prophecy and then to read into it references to a church unknown and unborn. However, we are not turning to this utterance of Obadiah in order to deal with Israel and their failure, but to use these prophetic words as a text covering a series of studies relative to ourselves.

The believer in Christ already possesses all things if he has Christ (I Cor. iii. 23), yet how poor is our experimental acquaintance with this treasure. The church of the Mystery is blessed with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places, yet who among us can claim to any present approximation of such an inheritance? It is plainly revealed in the epistle to the Corinthians and in that to the Hebrews, that the history of Israel, especially from the Exodus to the crossing of Jordan, sets forth in type the general principles which will be found in the church. While we must avoid reading into this history teaching that is foreign to it, members of the One Body will gather much help and guidance as they ponder Israel's pathway through those 'forty years'.

The hindrances that prevented Israel from taking immediate possession of their inheritance are many and by no means simple. We shall have to examine the record of Israel's attempts to enter their inheritance, but before doing so, it will be as well for us to examine the word translated 'possess'.

The English word 'possess' is derived from the Latin possidre, which in turn is composed of pot, the word giving us 'potent', and sedere 'to sit', the original sense being 'to remain master'. By other avenues this word is allied to the Greek 'despot' which in its turn goes back to the Sanscrit and means 'the master of the house'.

Possessions can be of two kinds according to the Hebrew Scriptures. There are those that are such by inheritance, Hebrew nachal (Numb. xxxiv. 13) inherited by lot, in which no idea of merit or effort enters. There are, however, possessions which must be taken and possessed. These are indicated by the Hebrew morash and the verb yarash.

> "And it came to pass, when Ahab heard that Naboth was dead, that Ahab rose up to go down to the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite, to take possession of it . . . . . hast thou killed, and also taken possession?" (I Kings xxi. 16, 19).

Gesenius gives as the primary meaning of yarash:

> "To take, to take possession of, to occupy, especially by force", and adds: "This, and not to inherit is shewn to be the primary signification, by the derivatives reshbeth a net, so called from taking or catching: and tirosh must, new wine, from its affecting (taking possession of) the head."

This element of seizure, or the putting forth of vigorous effort, can be seen in the meaning attaching to certain modes of the verb:

> "Drive out" (Deut. iv. 38); "dispossess" (Deut. vii. 17); "destroy (margin repossess)" (Exod. xv. 9); "cast out" (Exod. xxxiv. 24);

all with the sequel, the possession of such possessions for oneself. We believe the testimony of all Scripture indicates that over the entrance to no inheritance will the believer find the words written "WITH VACANT POSSESSION", every inheritance will be found occupied by a usurper, like unto the Canaanites.

Moses enunciates a principle that is closely allied with the idea already expressed, when he said:

> "If . . . . . then will the Lord drive out all these nations from before you, and ye shall possess greater nations and mightier than yourselves. Every place whereon the soles of your feet shall tread shall be yours" (Deut. xi. 22-24).

Here we observe that there are two sides to this question of inheriting. In the first place the action is the Lord's. He it is Who drives out the nations and grants to Israel the land from which these nations have been dispossessed; but in the second place, Israel had to arise and cross the Jordan and definitely put in an active claim before this possession became a realization. The promise was made four hundred years before to Abraham, but that of itself would not have given Israel possession. Even today as we pen these words, Israel are still without actual possession, even though the title deeds to the land are as good as ever. There are conditions attached which must be fulfilled. Even though Abraham did not actually 'possess' the land, but was a pilgrim and a stranger in the land of promise, nevertheless, he too was bid:

> "Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward: For all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever . . . . . Arise, walk through the land in the length of it and in the breadth of it; for I will give it unto thee" (Gen. xiii. 14-17).

It was not sufficient even for Abraham merely to lift up his eyes and look, he must lift up the sole of his foot and walk in order that his title may be established.

The use of the word 'tread' has a bearing also on this matter of conquest and possession. Caleb, said Moses, shall be given the land that he hath trodden upon (Deut. i. 36), and in fact there are five references wherein the word specially signifies the 'overcomer'. Two passages speaking of Israel, and three of the Lord. These references associate 'high places' with the verb 'to tread'.

> "Happy art thou, O Israel: who is like unto thee, O people saved by the Lord, the shield of thy help, and Who is the sword of thy exellency! and thine enemies shall be found liars unto thee; and thou shalt tread upon their high places" (Deut. xxxiii. 29).
> "God . . . . . which alone spreadeth out the heavens, and treadeth upon the waves (heights marg.) of the sea" (Job ix. 8).
>
> "For, lo, He that formeth the mountains, and createth the wind, and declareth unto man what is his thought, that maketh the morning darkness, and treadeth upon the high places of the earth, The Lord, The God of Hosts, is His name" (Amos iv. 13).
>
> "For behold, the Lord cometh forth out of His place, and will come down, and tread upon the high places of the earth" (Micah i. 3).
> "Although the fig tree shall not blossom . . . . . Yet will I rejoice in the Lord . . . . . The Lord God is my strength, and he will make my feet like hind's feet, and he will make me to walk upon mine high places" (Hab. iii. 17-19).

We hope, by the grace of God, to be enabled to bring to light lessons from the history of Israel that will not fail to be a blessing, a warning and an encouragement to those of us whose blessings are not to be enjoyed on earth, but in heavenly places, where Christ now sits at the right hand of God.

Do we, as believers, 'possess our possessions'? Do we enter into the blessings that are ours in Christ? This series is intended to be a challenge to us all, so that we may be exercised in this matter and under the benign influence of the Word of Truth 'be filled unto all the fullness of God'.

Let us consider the matter of our calling. By this we might mean our peculiar calling as members of the Body of Christ, and that is a phase of the truth which we hope to deal with later. At the moment we ignore the dispensational distinctions that exist between one 'calling' and another, and look at the subject in its primary significance, namely the fact of the choice, election or calling of God without which dispensational distinctions can have no value, for they could never be enjoyed. Like 'predestination', 'election' has gathered to itself, though erroneously, the ideas of fatalism and pre-determinedism. 'Election' ekloge; 'elect' eklektos; 'to elect' eklegomai simply refer to the fact that a choice has been made, a selection made. The word lego primarily means 'to lay' and its first use is to describe someone asleep in bed. It then, like the Latin lego takes on the meaning 'to lay in order' and so by a natural transition 'to gather for oneself, to pick out, to choose'. However, we are not at the moment so concerned with the actual etymology of the term 'election' as we are with the question 'how far have we realized this fact in our lives and experience?' Writing to the Church of the Thessalonians, the Apostle said:

> "Knowing, brethren beloved, your election of God" (I Thess. i. 4).

"Knowing." In what way did Paul 'know' so profound a matter? He used a word that means "something that has come within the circle of one's sphere of vision". In this same epistle we read 'to see' your face (ii. 17); 'to see' us (iii. 6); which is in the original the same word that is translated 'to know'. In the same epistle the Apostle refers to current events, using this same word, 'As ye know' (ii. 2, 5, 11). What therefore had he 'seen' to make him so sure of the 'election' of these Thessalonians? Had he seen their 'work of faith', their 'labour of love', and 'the patience' of their hope? Yes, for he follows his claim to the knowledge of their election with an explanation:

> "For our gospel came not unto you in word only . . . . . ye became followers of us, and of the Lord, having received the word in much affliction, with joy of the Holy Ghost" (I Thess. i. 5, 6).

To take another illustration, Peter, writing to the believers among the 'dispersion', said of them:

> "Elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 2).

Here once again we see the perfect combination of things high and things lowly; things of eternity and things of time.

We have	The Father	- - -	Foreknowledge.
	The Spirit	- - -	Sanctification.
	The Son	- - -	Blood sprinkled.

However, we have omitted one word in our summary, the word 'obedience'. This is the believer's response to this gracious choice of God.

> "As obedient children, not fashioning yourselves according to the former lusts in your ignorance; but as He which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation" (I Pet. i. 14, 15).
> "Seeing ye have purified your souls in obeying the truth through the Spirit" (I Pet. i. 22).

Paul knew the Thessalonian election by their response to the Word; the same was true of Peter's perception. This he enlarges upon in the second epistle where he speaks of making their 'calling and election sure'. How could this be accomplished? After speaking of the 'precious faith' and the divine power that had given all things pertain to life and godliness, the apostle Peter goes on to urge that to faith should be added virtue, to virtue knowledge, and concludes:

> "For if these things be in you, and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ . . . . . Wherefore the rather, brethren, give diligence to make your calling and election sure" (II Pet. i. 8-10).

The calling and election from the Godward standpoint had been settled in the counsels of eternity; but for the believer to enter experimentally into these exceeding great and precious promises, in other words, for the believer to 'possess his possessions', the knowledge that he had of Christ must be neither barren nor unfruitful; he must prove the reality of the calling of God by the activity of the life within. In the phrase 'Make your calling and election sure' the Apostle does not mean what Pilate meant when he said of the sepulcher of the Saviour 'Make it as sure as ye can' (Matt. xxvii. 65), where the word used is asphalizo, and which primarily means 'not falling, unmoveable, safe', neither did he mean what Paul meant when he said 'nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure' (II Tim. ii. 19), where the word used is stereos, something solid or stable. He uses the word bebaios which indicates not so much that the thing itself is solid or firm, but that it has been confirmed, as may be seen from the examples of its translation in the N.T.

The verb bebaioo which gives us bebaios, is used in the following passages:

> "Confirming the word with signs following" (Mark xvi. 20).
> "The testimony of Christ was confirmed in you" (I Cor. i. 6).
> "Which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us . . . . . with signs" (Heb. ii. 3, 4).

Here it will be seen that the confirmation was not so much the thing itself, the Word or the testimony, but the confirming of that Word or testimony to the heart and conscience of the hearer, and that by external signs and wonders. Thus, no believer can add to the trustworthiness of the Word of God. He cannot make his calling or election more sure than it is in that sense, but by the added evidence of the new life, the added evidence of fruitful and abounding knowledge of Christ, he will confirm to his own heart the calling he has received. He will, in other words 'possess his possessions'.

The Judgment Seat of Christ

No.3. "Saved, yet so as by fire."
pp. 18 - 20

Expanding the teaching of I Cor. iii. 7, 8, Paul continued:

> "For we are labourers together with God: ye are God's husbandry, ye are God's building" (I Cor. iii. 9).

The translation offered by the A.V. is somewhat misleading, the words 'of God' occur three times, and stand at the beginning of the sentence in the original. Thus:

> "OF GOD (theou) are we fellow workers;
> OF GOD (theou) are we husbandry;
> OF GOD (theou) are we building."

"Members are co-workers with one another, not with God as though He were one of them. Were it so 'God' would be in the dative case (theo)" (Companion Bible). The last reference, namely to the 'building' is now amplified. A building supposes a foundation, an architect, builders and materials. The foundation of God's building can be no other than Christ. The architect is Paul. The builders are the Apostle's fellow servants. The materials are likened to gold, silver and costly stones on the one hand, and wood, hay and stubble on the other. The reason for this choice of material is because of the trial by fire which is the feature of the illustration.

> "According to the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise master builder (architekton), I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon" (iii. 10).

Paul's ministry differed from that of the average believer, as an architect's work differs from that of the ordinary builder. As an Apostle, he could not build on another man's foundation as he himself declare:

> "To preach the gospel in the regions beyond you, and not to boast in another man's line of things made ready to our hand" (II Cor. x. 16).
> "Yea, so have I strived to preach the gospel, not where Christ was named, lest I should build upon another's foundation" (Rom. xv. 20).

Paul's responsibilities as an Apostle were tremendous, and no subsequent builder will be judged as to the foundation upon which he builds—that is not the responsibility of any servant of God subsequent to Paul the Apostle. He laid the foundation. Our responsibility is to build on no other foundation than that already laid for us. This same emphasis is found in Eph. ii. 20. The exhortation which the Apostle gives is "Let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon". It is assumed throughout this figure that whatever is built, whether good or bad, accepted or rejected, is "upon this foundation" (I Cor. iii. 12). We are occupied with "God's building" (I Cor. iii. 9) and "God's temple"

(I Cor. iii. 17). Owing to modern usage the words 'precious stones' are a trifle misleading, as we generally use them for jewels today; the better rendering would be 'costly stones' such as marble, porphyry, jasper, such as would be employed in the building of a temple. Wood and thatch, whether of hay or reeds, while good enough for the homes of men, are nevertheless transitory and especially so when the test is that of fire. It is quite beside the intention of the Apostle to attempt to invest the building materials with any particular doctrinal significance with the exception of Truth. One writer says:

> "Some build with the gold of faith, with the silver of hope, with the imperishable costly stones of love" (Schrader), but this receives no support from the passage, and any amount of ingenuity can be wasted in this direction. The question to which all this supplies an answer is "Will your service stand the test of the day of Christ?"

When the Roman consul Muminius captured the city of Corinth in B.C.146, he burnt the place to the ground. The various metals including gold, silver and copper fused in the conflagration, became united into a compound or alloy, and was called from the circumstances "Corinthian brass". The figure employed by the Apostle therefore would not sound strange to the Corinthians. The believer is not represented as on trial for his life, condemnation is nowhere mentioned, neither do such words as guilt, sin or forgiveness appear. It is the believer's work that is assessed.

> "Every man's work shall be made manifest . . . . . every man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work abide . . . . . If any man's work shall be burned . . . . ."

The testing of this work is severally stated as being 'made manifest', 'declared', 'revealed', 'tried', 'what sort it is'. The words 'made manifest' translate the Greek phaneros which in the form of a verb is found in the passage 'we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ' (II Cor. v. 10). As early as the Sermon on the Mount this feature was made known ". . . . . thine alms may be in secret: and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly (phaneroo)" (Matt. vi. 4, 6, 18). When the Apostle applies these principles to himself as a 'steward of the mysteries' he says:

> "Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, Who will both bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest (phaneroo) the counsels of the hearts: and then shall every man have praise of God" (I Cor. iv. 5).

Not only is it impossible for one believer to estimate the true worth of the service of another; the believer cannot truly estimate the worth of his own work, for we are hindered by the flesh and we are the subject of such conflicting motives that we are obliged at last to say with the Apostle:

> "I know nothing against myself; yet am I not hereby justified: but He that judgeth me is the Lord" (I Cor. iv. 4 R.V.).

"The day shall declare it." The day in view is in direct contrast with the present, and once again we turn to I Cor. iv. for light. The Apostle is speaking of his stewardship, and says:

> "It is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful" (I Cor. iv. 2).

Both the words 'required' and 'found' carry us on to the bema, the day when the Lord shall judge our service 'what sort it is'.

> "But with me it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you, or of man's judgment: yea, I judge not mine own self" (I Cor. iv. 3).

Here, the English translation veils the reference to 'the day'. "Man's judgment" is literally "man's day" using exactly the same Greek word hemeras as is found in I Cor. i. 8; iii. 13 and v. 5. The day that shall declare the character of our service is not "man's day" but the day of Christ. The word translated 'declare' deloo has already been used in I Cor. i. 11; there the divisions among the Corinthians had been 'declared' by the house of Chloe—here the whole of one's service will be declared in the day of Christ. "It shall be revealed by fire, and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is."

Peter has a word to say about the revealing and trying by fire:

> "That the trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and honour and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 7).

Fire is not used either by Peter or by Paul in these passages as an instrument of punishment, rather is it for testing and proving the genuine nature of the thing tried. Dokimos has particular reference to the testing of metals, and is found in II Tim. ii. 15 where it is translated 'approved'. The verb dokimazo is found in I Cor. iii. 13 'try' and in I Cor. xi. 28 'examine'. Writing to the Galatians, the Apostle uses dokimazo when he says:

> "Let every man prove his own work, and then shall he have rejoicing in himself alone, and not in another" (Gal. vi. 4).

Two consequences follow this assessment of service in that day:

(1) "If a man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, HE SHALL RECEIVE A REWARD.'
(2) "If any man's work shall be burned, HE SHALL SUFFER LOSS."

Work will either 'abide' or 'be burned'.

Speaking of service under the figure of fruit, the Saviour had said:

> "I have chosen you . . . . . that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain (abide meno)" (John xv. 16).

That field which bears thorns and briars is rejected (adokimos), and is nigh unto cursing: whose end is to be burned (Heb. vi. 8). Observe that the field is not actually cursed, but is 'nigh unto' it. So, in I Cor. iii. 14 the word 'reward' is left unexplained and unqualified, but in the next verse, 'he shall suffer loss' is expanded. The Apostle is concerned that we should not misunderstand him. "He shall SUFFER loss" does not mean that 'he shall be LOST'. Consequently he proceeds: "But he himself shall be saved, YET SO AS BY FIRE." The builder will escape, but his building will be consumed, his whole work wasted. He will appear before His Lord with nothing.

This line of teaching is found elsewhere, namely for example in II Tim. ii. 11-13 where the distinction is observed. It is a solemn thought, and as stewards and ministers of the Word it becomes us to walk humbly and faithfully.

No.4. The Judgment of intention.
pp. 57 - 60

We have seen that at the judgment seat of Christ, the believer's service will either be rewarded or he will suffer loss, and now before examining other Scriptures which speak somewhat particularly about the distribution of reward or loss, let us turn aside and note the way in which the service rendered by others long past has been assessed in the Word of God. In doing so let us remember that the sentence pronounced by the Lord as Judge in that day will be in entire harmony with the Word:

> "I judge him not . . . . . he . . . . . hath one that judgeth him. The word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day" (John xii. 47, 48).

This word is likened to a two edged sword, indeed it is said to be even 'sharper', and it divides asunder 'soul and spirit'; in other words, it is a 'discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart' (Heb. iv. 12). The word translated 'discerner' is kritikos, from krites 'a judge'. While it is gloriously true that 'there is no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus', this does not remove the necessity to stand before the Lord as Judge, for Paul, in view of his approaching martyrdom, conscious that he had finished his course and kept the faith said:

> "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous JUDGE, shall give me at that day: and not to me only, but unto all them also that love His appearing" (II Tim. iv. 8).

The word krites 'judge' was in common use for the Umpire at the Greek contests, and is so used here by the Apostle.

If Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ, and all who love His appearing shall stand before the Judge, it is unscriptural to assume that no member of the One Body, no believer during the dispensation of the Mystery, has any association with the judgment seat of Christ.

Returning to our earlier quest, we ask what judgment does the Scripture pronounce upon service already rendered by saints of old? Heb. xi. gives a list of those who walked and witnessed by faith; let us see whether that chapter provides us with an illustration. Take the reference to Abraham in Heb. xi. 8:

> "By faith Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went."

If this were the only record we have of this act of Abraham, we should imagine that upon receiving the call, Abraham immediately responded 'when he was called . . . . . he obeyed'. That is the pronouncement of 'the Word', and that anticipates the assessment of Abraham's action when he stands before his Judge. Yet any one who knows the teaching of the book of Genesis, knows full well that Abraham's response was by no means so prompt or straightforward. According to Acts vii. 2 the call came while Abraham dwelt in Mesopotamia, and Gen. xi. 31 shows that Terah, his father, took charge of the great trek, and contrary to the conditions of God's call and promise, took many of his family and kindred with him, only to arrive at Haran and stay there. Even after Terah died Abraham's response was not completely in harmony with his call, for he still retained LOT (one of his kindred) and his company. Then Gen. xii. records a great lapse on the part of Abraham. He left the land of promise and went down to Egypt, got entangled in 'white lies' and had to be delivered by Divine interposition, but this is passed over in silence in Heb. xi. Only because of the strife that made life unbearable did Abraham break with Lot, and receive the vision of the land as originally promised (Gen. xiii. 14, 15). Are we to say that 'the righteous Judge' is partial in His judgment of Abraham? God forbid, for if that thought be allowed the whole fabric of redemption totters. Heb. iv. 12 may supply the answer. The Lord discerned the 'intents' of Abraham's heart, even though he was prevailed upon both by his father, his own frailty and by Lot, from fully following this out. Abraham's "sins" are forgiven, the intents of his heart alone come into the picture. Let us look at another example of this same principle. There can be few places that are associated with such shocking iniquity as the cities of Sodom, yet the Saviour, the One Who will be the Judge in that day, made this solemn pronouncement:

> "And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell: for if the mighty works, which have been done in thee, had been done in Sodom, it would have remained until this day. But I say unto you, That it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment, than for thee" (Matt. xi. 23, 24).

Here are the words of the Judge Himself. Tyre and Sidon would have repented; Sodom will be more leniently judged than "Capernaum", the basis of this discrimination being 'opportunity'. The Lord can judge what a person WOULD HAVE DONE, IF . . . . . He therefore ignores mere external acts, and discerns 'the thought and intents of the heart'. Tyre and Sidon did not repent. This is an historic fact. Tyre and Sidon would have repented if . . . . .! That is the judgment of the One Who will judge 'the secrets of men', One who can adjust the inner desire with the outer performance, Who may see spiritual triumph where we see disaster.

The Apostle in Rom. ii., speaks of a day when God will judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ according to what he calls "My gospel" (Rom. ii. 16). This is the only passage in Scripture so far as we know, where judgment is to proceed according to a Gospel—usually these two concepts are kept apart. A judgment that is according to a gospel, must differ essentially from a judgment according to law. To appreciate this passage in Rom. ii., the whole chapter and the complete structure needs examination, together with the purpose of its introduction into the epistle at all. We quote a few passages from the book Just and the Justifier and trust that where any obscurity may still exist that a fuller examination, both of that book and of the epistle itself will be the result.

"Paul has before him the object of removing every false foundation for justification before God, and one of the most difficult features of opposition that he had to break down was the pride and prejudice of the Jew. In chapter ix. Paul volunteers a statement testifying to Israel's position in the purpose of God, and the passage in Eph. ii. 11, 12 reveals the contrast between the standing of Israel 'after the flesh', and of the Gentiles 'after the flesh'. Justification before God, however, finds no ground to rest on before God 'according to the flesh' (Rom. iv. 1, 2), and when the advantage and profit of being a Jew and of the circumcision is pressed out of the sphere of the flesh into the sphere of the spirit, the Apostle reveals that such distinction ceases to exist, and to rest upon it is to remain under judgment. We will now present the whole structure, including the parts omitted, that we may have the benefit of the whole argument before us.

> The central sections C and C are to claim our attention. The development of theme and argument is graphically placed before the eye in the recurring Greek words that are noted. Let us trace it, using the guides provided.
> Logizomai—This is an important word in Romans, being translated later on by 'counted', 'reckoned' and 'imputed'. In Rom. ii. we do not read of faith of being imputed for righteousness, but we have the principle established. The word occurs twice, and in the first case it is false reckoning (ii. 3). The Jew 'reckoned' upon his descent from Abraham, his circumcision, his covenant privileges, to enable him to escape the judgment of God. This is immediately disproved. On the other hand a 'reckoning' that would be most distasteful to the Jew was that established by the Apostle in verse 26: 'Therefore if the uncircumcision keep the righteousness of the law, shall not his uncircumcision be counted for circumcision?' This was an argument that seriously disturbed the fancied security of the Jew."

The two references to 'nature' phusis, and two references to 'secret' or 'hidden' kruptos should be examined:

> "The Gentiles, which have not the law . . . . . by nature" (Rom. ii. 14).
> "The Uncircumcision by nature" (Rom. ii. 27), and "He is not a Jew, who is one outwardly . . . . . but he is a Jew who is one inwardly (kruptos) . . . . . of the heart, in the spirit" (Rom. ii. 28, 29). The conscience of the unevangelized heathen will bear witness at that judgment and will either accuse or excuse them, as their secret motives for either good or ill will come to light.

Rom. ii. is not dealing with the bema or the judgment of a believer's "works" but like the references to Tyre, Sidon and Sodom it reveals a searching of the hearts that goes so deep, and that reverses so much that is human in outlook and conclusion, as to render our own judgment of little value.

The instances brought forward, namely that of Abraham, Sodom and the heathen, while by no means exhaustive have given us some idea of the character of that judgment which deals with 'intent' rather than with execution, and so presents the bema judgment of the believer's "works" in a new light. The judgment of the nations as recorded in Matt. xxv. 31-46 provides another example of the working of this great principle. No human judge could sentence or reward a man for what he would have done; that is the prerogative of the Lord alone.

No.5. Chastening now, instead of condemnation then.
pp. 68 - 70

The first reaction to the conclusion arrived at after considering the fact that the Lord's judgment is based upon what we 'would have done—if', or upon the intention of the heart rather than the external achievement, is to decline all attempts at forecasting the conclusion of that tribunal. This of itself is justified by the express statement of Paul, as we shall see, but left unguarded by other equally expressed statements. Such an attitude may indicate mere 'drift' and be neither the outcome of faith nor reason. First, the character of the assize is such as to render unfruitful all attempts at anticipating the result of that day.

> "It is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful" (I Cor. iv. 2).

The word 'found' is often used in a judicial sense. "I find no fault in Him" (John xix. 6). "Finding nothing how they might punish them" (Acts iv. 21). "And be found in Him" (Phil. iii. 9). "That he may find mercy" (II Tim. i. 18). "Be found of Him in peace" (II Pet. iii. 14). The Apostle passes from the prospect of the 'finding' of that day, to the finding both of "man's day" (I Cor. iv. 3 margin), or of his own self, saying:

> "I know nothing against myself; yet am I not hereby justified: but He that judgeth (margin examineth) me is the Lord. Wherefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, Who will both bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and make manifest the counsels of the hearts: and then shall each man have his praise from God" (I Cor. iv. 4, 5 R.V.).

It would be an unscriptural conclusion to regard all judgment, either of self or of others, as set aside by the Apostle's words in I Cor. iv., for in the same epistle he wrote:

> "If we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged. But when we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world" (I Cor. xi. 31, 32).

Here the Apostle urges the believer 'to judge' himself, and uses the word diakrino 'discern', a word already found in the context (I Cor. xi. 29). The alternatives are being chastened now, or condemned then. The Corinthians were actually at the time suffering the consequences of their attitude to the Lord's supper.

> "Not discerning the Lord's body. For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep" (I Cor. xi. 29, 30).

This was the chastening the believer was receiving in this life, in contrast with the condemnation which the world would receive in the future day. Chastening as Heb. xii. teaches is the action of a Father, and presupposes that the one chastened is a son.

In I Cor. v., another aspect of this same principle is revealed. Owing to the fact that the Corinthian believers had been brought up amidst the most awful immorality, they had continued in the practice of such deeds that were 'not so much as named among the Gentiles'. The Apostle, with the day of Christ in view says:

> "In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, when ye are gathered together, and my spirit, with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ, to deliver such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus" (I Cor. v. 4, 5).

Here is chastening indeed, involving even the destruction of the flesh now so that the spirit may be saved 'so as by fire'. Such a chastening demands the personal presence of an Apostle and does not apply to the present dispensation. Paul himself knew something of this drastic chastening, for he wrote to the same church:

> "Lest I should be exalted above measure through the abundance of the revelations, there was given to me a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet me, lest I should be exalted above measure" (II Cor. xii. 7).

Externally there is a vast difference between the gross immorality of the Corinthians, and the possibility of spiritual pride in the heart of Paul, and in the one case deliverance to Satan results in the destruction of the flesh, whereas an angel of Satan produces a stake in the flesh and 'buffets' the Apostle. Yet in the solemn light of the Bema, and the presence of that word 'if' in connection with the judgment of Tyre, Sidon and Sodom, who is to decide whether spiritual pride in a deeper and fuller knowledge of dispensational truth, may not be a grosser evil than an immoral act practiced by those who like the Corinthians had been brought up in an atmosphere of defilement? Writing to the Corinthians in connection with the crown and prize, he said "I keep under by body . . . . . lest . . . . . I should be a castaway" (adokimos disqualified from entering into the race or from receiving an award – I Cor. ix. 27). Here, in II Cor. xii., the angel of Satan buffets him with a like end in view.

While these experiences belong more particularly to the Church of the Acts period, and find no parallel in the epistles of the Mystery, we must beware of setting them aside entirely, for the Prison epistles speak of a judgment comparable with the Bema and consequently many of these principles will apply now as then. We have seen that from one point of view 'we judge nothing before the time' yet from another, and easily understandable point of view, we should judge ourselves now. There is another principle enunciated in the Scriptures that should be added to our list, and that is the standard of judgment whereby we ourselves shall be judged, is the standard whereby we ourselves already judge others. This was enunciated at the first in the Sermon on the Mount:

> "With what judgment ye judge ye shall be judged" (Matt. vii. 2).

"Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee" was the statement of the Lord to the servant who complained that his master was 'an austere man'. Writing to the Romans, and particularly to the Jew, Paul said:

> "Wherein thou judgest another, thou condemnest thyself" (Rom. ii. 1).

Here again, contingency, "if", motive, intention, heart and not appearance, desire and not deed, come in and influence the judgment of that day. The believer who by reason of his upbringing has imbibed many prevalent errors both of doctrine and practice may be severely condemned by more enlightened brethren now. A man may be a believer, yet have a very poor conception of the integrity or inspiration of the Scriptures. He may be completely muddled about the question of hope, immorality, the Second Coming, right division, the Mystery, etc., and yet the believer who has been enlightened enough to see that all Scripture is given by inspiration of God, who is clear regarding that blessed Hope, who is entirely free from the traditional teaching concerning the immorality of the soul, who appreciates and practices right division (and as the Apostle says to this very church, he may understand all mysteries), he should remember that while all this light brings joy and blessing beyond computation, there is also at the same time added responsibility. He should, while judging the error in the other man, 'consider himself', for he is putting up a standard whereby he himself will be judged.

We must carry with us the principle which is embedded in I Cor. xi. 32 when we turn to one or two passages which on the surface seem to speak of an adverse judgment being given against the believer at the bema in the future, but the subject is sufficiently solemn and important to merit a consideration by itself.

No.5 (Con't). Chastening now, instead of condemnation then.
pp. 156 - 160

It will be remembered that in our opening survey of this great subject, we quoted among other passages I Cor. xi. 31, 32:

> "For if we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged. But when we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world."

We must give a fuller consideration of this idea of 'chastening' as being something which a believer may receive here, rather than 'condemnation' in the future, and the passage that provides much food for thought in this matter is Heb. xii. The passage with which we are concerned is comprised with verses 5-14:

Hebrews xii. 5 - 14

A | 5-10. Mark of sonship. Discipline received.
B | 10. The end. Partakers of His holiness.
A | 11-13. Fruit of righteousness. Discipline exercised.
B | 14. The pursuit. Peace and holiness.

Going back to Heb. xi. we observe that the first verse speaks of faith under two aspects. (1) The substance of things hoped for. (2) The evidence of things not seen. The word translated 'evidence' is the Greek word elengchos, and as it is the bearing of this word on the passage of Heb. xii. that is before us, let us attempt a true apprisement of its meaning.

Elengchos occurs but twice in the N.T., Heb. xi. 1 and II Tim. iii. 16. The A.V. translates it once 'evidence' and once 'reproof'. When we turn to the verb elengcho we have a wider field for investigation. The following are the renderings in the A.V., convict, convince, rebuke, reprove, tell one's fault. In no one place is it ever translated 'prove' or 'demonstrate' or by any such word that is parallel to 'evidence'. We find the word in Heb. xii. 5 where it is translated 'to be rebuked'. Now structurally this passage balances Heb. xi. 1 thus:

A | Heb. xi. 1. Faith. Substance and elengchos.
B | xi. 2-40. The cloud of witnesses.
B | xii. 1, 2. The cloud of witnesses.
A | xii. 3, 5. Faith. The elengchos.

Now if the last passage is rightly rendered 'rebuke', how can the only other occurrence of the word in Hebrews, bound as it is by all the ties of structure and consistent argument, be rightly translated 'evidence'? The reader may by this time be ready to consult the LXX, and the first passage we note will be Hab. ii.1, "I will stand upon my watch . . . . . what I shall answer upon my reproof", which is in the immediate context of the quotation, "the just shall live by faith". Instead of 'proof' we find 'reproof'. Let us search this matter further. Now elengchos occurs some 21 times, and elengcho some 53 times in the LXX. It is manifestly impossible with our limited space to provide a concordance of the occurrences here. We will give a few, but would here assure the reader that every one of these 74 occurrences has been investigated, and that all point in one direction, namely, that elengchos does not mean 'evidence', but 'rebuke'. Let us see a few examples:

"And Abraham REPROVED Abimelech because of a well of water" (Gen. xxi. 25).
"Thou shalt in any wise RBUKE thy neighbour" (Lev. xix. 17).
"The Lord had REBUKED him" (II Chron. xxvi. 20).
"Behold, happy is the man whom God CORRECTETH" (Job v. 17).
"My son, despise not the chastening of the Lord; neither be weary of His CORRECTION; for whom the Lord loveth He CORRECTETH" (Prov. iii. 11, 12).

The Apostle has quoted this passage of Prov. iii. 11, 12 in Heb. xii. 5, 6 and there, instead of giving the word 'correction' twice as does the LXX, he uses the word 'chasteneth'. For confirmation of this synonym we may turn to Rev. iii. 19, "As many as I love, I rebuke and chasten". Those desirous of searching out this matter more fully will doubtless find opportunity. Sufficient has been here noted to show that the primary idea of Heb. xi. 1 is "Faith is a substance of things hoped for, a reproof of things not seen". This, however, does not convey sense to English ears, so we must consider the matter further. As the verse stands in the A.V. we have a repetition. Faith is a substance and an evidence. When we look at the actual thing in progress, and in fact we find that faith has a twofold association: (1) It looks forward to future glory; (2) It endures present suffering.

Elengchos is balanced by elengcho in Heb. xii. 5 where it is translated 'rebuked'. Now the quotation, "the just shall live by faith", in Heb. x. 38, takes us back to the same word, for, as we have seen in Hab. ii. 1, we find it in the word 'reproved'. In Heb. xii. the Apostle quotes Prov. iii. 11, 12, already set out above. This 'rebuke', 'correction', or 'discipline' is an essential accompaniment of sonship and growth.

Let us now look at one or two passages that illuminate the purpose and instruments of chastening:

> "Thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldst keep His commandments, or no. And he humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know; that He might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live. Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell, these forty years. Thou shalt also consider in thine heart, that, as a man chasteneth his son, so the Lord thy God chasteneth thee" (Deut. viii. 2-5).

We are apt to fix our minds upon the painful side of chastening, and, by reason of our folly, there is often a need for that phase, but it is good also to notice that a part of this discipline or chastening was the provision of the daily manna, the marvelous preservation of clothing, and the care of the wanderers' feet!

> "The Lord knoweth the thoughts of man, that they are vanity. Blessed is the man whom Thou chasteneth, O Lord, and teacheth him out of the law" (Psa. xciv. 11, 12).
> "We are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world" (I Cor. xi. 32).

Here is another comfort; chastening is not condemnation. Chastening is for sons, condemnation for the world. Man's thoughts are vain, he needs a twofold treatment; chastening to remove folly, teaching to supply the needed instruction. Chastening is not only the work of the Father, for Christ Himself says to the church: "As many as I love, I rebuke and chasten: be zealous therefore, and repent" (Rev. iii. 19).

The Apostle puts the matter of this chastening before the reader in a variety of ways. First, the attitude of mind towards it. Do not despise it. Do not faint when rebuked. Perhaps 'despise' is too strong a word. Rather what is meant is to hold lightly, to have very little concern about a thing. That is one attitude to be avoided. There is the opposite extreme however, that is, of magnifying the chastening endured, and so 'fainting' at the rebuke. This also is wrong. We have to remember that the chastening has to do with us 'as sons' (Heb. xii. 5-7). It comes to us from One Who loves us (Heb. xii. 6). To be without chastening is to be without proof of sonship. The little gutter child, unkempt, uncorrected, uncared for, is free from the discipline, restraint, training, care and correction that loving fatherhood imposes, but who, knowing the truth, would exchange the 'discipline' of the one for the 'liberty' of the other?

The Apostle proceeds to reason from the lesser to the greater. We have had fathers in this life whose discipline was brief, and as far as they knew right, but which was sometimes in error, yet we held them in respect. God is the Father of our spirits, His discipline is never at fault, and it tends to life. Shall we not then much rather render submission to Him?

The object that the Lord has in view all this time is revealed in Heb. xii. 10: "That we may be made partakers of His holiness." Holiness is the atmosphere of Hebrews, as righteousness is of Romans. The sanctification of the believer lies entirely outside his own deeds or endeavours. He is sanctified by the blood of Him who suffered 'without the gate' (Heb. xiii. 12). If he is called upon to go unto Him without the camp, bearing His reproach (Heb. xiii. 13), it is but manifesting in act and character what has been already accomplished. The going without the camp will never sanctify, but it can manifest sanctification.

> "By the which will we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all" (Heb. x. 10).
> "For by one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified" (Heb. x. 14).

This 'perfecting for ever' is in no wise altered or minimized because the epistle proceeds to urge each to 'go on unto perfection', or because it associates perfecting with suffering and obedience. When, therefore, we read that this discipline has in view the partaking of His holiness, we do not understand that any amount of scourging can sanctify, but that the believer, being already perfectly sanctified in Christ, is now trained and encouraged to walk in harmony with such a blessed position.

While the Apostle urged the believer to treat with all due reverence the chastening of the Lord, he assumed no stoic indifference. There is something intensely human in the admission: "Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous: nevertheless afterwards it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby" (Heb. xii. 11).

Three items in this verse demand attention. First, the words 'Nevertheless afterward'. While mother-love is immediate and protective, father-love is concerned with the future. The one sees the babe that is now. The other visualizes the man that is to be. The underlying thought is very close to that of II Cor. iv. 16-18, which hinges upon the words, 'while we look not at the things which are seen'.

Then comes the Greek expression translated 'The peaceable fruits of righteousness'. We understand this to mean in English, 'the peaceable fruits, namely righteousness'. Holiness in Christ is manifested, and imputed righteousness has produced its peaceable fruit. The chastening and the discipline has had the effect of pruning; it has produced fruitfulness. Here is a parallel with Phil. i. 11 which speaks of bringing forth the fruits of righteousness.

All, however, turns upon the third expression: "To them which are exercised thereby", just as prayer in Philippians urges the need for discernment and trying the things that differ. Watch the effect of discipline upon two of the Lord's children. One becomes mellow, the other hard and sour. The one is going on unto perfection, the other drawing back to perdition. Look at Israel in the wilderness. After their first experience at Marah one would have thought that the next problem concerning water would at once have thrown them back on the memory of the Lord's earlier intervention on their behalf, and that they would have trusted in quiet confidence. But no, so far as they were concerned, the discipline of Marah was wasted upon them; they were 'exercised' thereby. O let us not pass through trials and reap no reward! Let us ever seek to be 'exercised' by the discipline of our pathway, and then it will turn to our profit and the Lord's glory. This 'exercise' is the mark of the 'perfect': "But strong meat belongeth to them that are perfect, even those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil" (Heb. v. 14). A baby has senses, a man has senses exercised. A true son of God is exercised by the chastening of the Lord: he is unworthy of the name if he is indifferent or hardened.

It is not without bearing upon the theme of Heb. xii. that the word 'exercise' is gumnazo, which of course gives us the word gymnasium. The word actually means 'to be naked', because in the Greek sports the competitors were stripped. So we have gumnos translated 'naked' in Matt. xxv. 36; II Cor. v. 3; Heb. iv. 13 and other places. Coming, as it does, after the exhortation to "lay aside every weight and the easily-entangling sin, and run with patience the race set before us", the word gumnazo is very apt.

Seeing then that chastening, though unpleasant, is fruitful, we are exhorted to: "Lift up the hands which hang down, and the feeble knees; and make straight paths for your feet, lest that which is lame be dislocated; but let it rather be healed. Follow peace with all men" (Heb. xii. 12-14). In other words, we are not to seek martyrdom, we are not to pose as sufferers, we are not to pick the roughest tracks and run the thorniest way. Rather are we to gird up the loins and hope to the end; make the place for our feet as level as we can, not aggravate the lame ankle, but rather get it well, that we may finish our course with joy. Our discipline will sometimes come through the permitted oppression of man, and when it does we must bow before the Father's good pleasure. On the other hand we should not go out of our way to irritate our fellows or ask for trouble, but as far as in us lies, we are to make for peace.

Another line of exhortation is discovered here by observing a parallel with Phil. iii. 19, where the believer is urged to mark those who so walk that their end is perdition. So here, those who were running the race are told to make a firm track so that others not so strong or fleet of foot would be encouraged to continue.

> "And holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord" (Heb. xii. 14).

This will cause us to run up against the elements of the world and the tradition of men, and will probably provide all the chastisement that we can endure, but without it we are warned that 'no man shall see the Lord'.

The two words that should be emphasized in the whole passage under consideration are 'endure', and 'exercise':

"If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons" (Heb. xii. 7).
"Nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them that are exercised thereby" (Heb. xii. 11).

Whatever our relationships may be down here, however diverse our paths or opinions, whatever our estimate of one another may be, whether we seek to help or to hinder, let us never forget that:

"We shall all appear before the judgment seat of Christ", and let us remember that His approval THEN will outweigh all that man has ever said or done either in our favour or in opposition to us.

No.6. What shall the believer "receive"?
pp. 118 - 120

We have seen sufficient from the Word to make it certain that the service of a believer will be assessed at the Bema; that there will be a reward for faithful service, and that this judgment of service must not be confounded with the question of the forgiveness of sins or with the possibility of condemnation. The feature that demands much prayerful study is related to the question not of 'reward' but where the believers service has failed of the that standard. From I Cor. iii., we know that where the work does not pass the test the believer will 'suffer loss', and if these were the only passages we could say that there will be either an award, or where an award could not be made, there would be some deprivation but of a negative character. When, however, we read II Cor. v. 10, a problem meets us:

"We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad."

Not only so, but Gal. vi. 8 says:

"He that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption"; which not only raises the question of future 'reaping' but adds the most disturbing word 'corruption'. In what way, and when will 'things done in the body . . . . . whether good or bad' be received? How can 'corruption' be reaped in a state where corruption has given place to incorruption, and mortality has been swallowed up of life? Further, how does this possibility agree with the testimony of Scripture concerning the full and irrevocable forgiveness of all sins? It is certain that the reaping of 'life everlasting' (Gal. vi. 8) must refer to the future, even as receiving 'the reward of the inheritance' (Col. iii. 24) must refer to the future also. Before attempting an explanation, or examining these and similar passages in detail, let us seek in other spheres and by other examples some principle that will apply to the problem before us.

If there is one child of God in the days of old who fell into most grievous sin, it was David, self confessed of blood guiltiness and adultery. Yet is there a clearer case of the full and free forgiveness of sin? We have only to read Psalms xxxii. and li. to be convinced of this. Are we therefore to believe and teach that any one, like David can 'get away with it' as the common expression has it, be guilty of such outrages, and yet be freely forgiven? Putting it like that, it does seem as though the forgiveness of sin puts a premium upon immorality, and shocks the moral conscience. Let us leave our surmising and turn to Holy Writ. In II Samuel xii. the story is told. Nathan's parable of the poor man's one ewe lamb kindles the anger of David who pronounced judgment on the offender and thereby pronounced judgment upon himself. Upon which Nathan turned to David and said "Thou art the man" (II Sam. xii. 7):

> "Thou hast killed Uriah the Hittite with the sword, and hast taken his wife."

Two results follow on upon David's acknowledgment. Upon saying 'I have sinned against the Lord' Nathan responded with the words of pardon "The Lord also hath put away thy sin". But there was something else, the Lord also said:

> "The sword shall never depart from thine house."
> "I will take thy wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbour."
> "Thou didst it secretly; but I will do this thing before all Israel, and before the sun" (II Sam. xii. 10-12).

So far as the child born of this unholy alliance was concerned, the judgment was "Howbeit, because of this deed thou hast given great occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, the child also that is born unto thee shall surely die" (II Sam. xii. 14). The subsequent history of David is of a man, rejoicing in the Lord, blessed and engaged in acceptable service, yet living a life of anxiety because of the defection of his sons and servants. We have but to think of Absalom and Ahithophel, and read how David wept as he ascended Mount Olivet barefoot and with covered head, to realize how far a 'forgiven' man, who sows to his flesh, shall in this life reap corruption. David most surely did.

Let us take an example of the working of this principle in another direction. Gen. xi.-xiii. records the call of Abraham and the haltings and failings that marked his response before the ultimate obedience of Gen. xiii. 14-18. Acts vii. 2 declares that while Abraham was still in Mesopotamia and before he dwelt in Haran, God had called him to leave country and kindred, but Gen. xi. 29-31 shows that even though Abraham left Ur of the Chaldees, he most certainly did not leave either country or kindred. Haran was still the same side of Euphrates as was Ur and a whole company of Abraham's kindred went unto him. After the death of his father, Abraham moved on to Canaan but 'Lot went with him', so the obedience was still but partial. This is followed by the act of unbelief which drove Abraham and Sarah down to Egypt, and which led Abraham to seek the cover of a 'white lie' in the subterfuge. "Say, I pray thee, thou art my sister." For this, Abraham the man of faith was rebuked by Pharaoh the unbeliever! In addition to this there was the birth of Ishmael, which understandable as it may be when we remember the great test of faith through which the aged couple were passing was nevertheless but another intrusion of the flesh into the realm of faith. Yet when we come to that list of worthies whose example is recorded in Heb. xi., this is what we read of Abraham:

> "By faith Abraham, when he was called to go out unto a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went" (Heb. xi. 8).

From these two examples a principle emerges that can be used in the interpretation of the terms associated with the Judgment Seat of Christ. David received 'the things done in the body' during the present life; he had sown to the flesh, and of the flesh he reaped corruption. Abraham's example, recorded in the N.T. gives us an idea of what will be pronounced upon such a life at the Bema. The delay at Haran, the lapse in Egypt, the failure at the first to separate from Lot, these find no mention in Heb. xi. There it reads "By faith Abraham was called . . . . . obeyed"—all else was forgiven and will never come up again. The intention of his heart, and the fact that he did at length go out in obedience are all that is remembered.

Turning now to II Cor. v. 10, 11 where we read 'every one may receive the things done in his body' we observe that there are seventeen words translated 'receive' in the N.T.

Lambano, together with five combinations, dechomai with seven combinations, these, together with apecho and choreo are passed by, the word chosen by the Apostle being komizo. Komizo, primarily means to bring or to fetch, but when used in the Middle voice it means 'to receive to oneself' as a recompense or what is due. So we read in Matt. xxv. 27 "I should receive mine own with interest". The word means also to receive back what was previously one's own, to recover, as in Heb. xi. 19. A parallel with the use of komizo in II Cor. v. 10, 11, are the two references in the Prison epistles:

> "With good will doing service, as to the Lord, and not to men: knowing that whatsoever good thing any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free" (Eph. vi. 7, 8).
> "And whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord, and not unto men; knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance: for ye serve the Lord Christ. But he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons" (Col. iii. 23-25).

Here it will be observed that the Apostle employs komizo for receiving 'whatsoever good thing a man doeth' in Ephesians, and 'for the wrong which he hath done' in Colossians. The word translated 'receive' in the passage 'shall receive the reward' in Col. iii. 24 is the Greek apolambanomai. This word, mainly by reason of the prefixed apo has the meaning of receiving some reward or recompense as Rom. i. 17 & II John 8 reveal. From I Cor. iii. we have learned that 'for the wrong which he hath done' there will be some measure of loss or forfeiture. In II Sam. xxiii., this principle seems to be seen in operation. There we find 'the first three' (II Sam. xxiii. 8-12). Then come another list of overcomers, but of one it is written "Howbeit he attained not unto the first three", of another "He was more honourable than the thirty, but he attained not to the first three" (II Sam. xxiii. 19, 23). Again, Uriah the Hittite, against whom David had so signally offended, finds a place among this honourable company (II Sam. xxiii. 39) but it is a humbling thought to realize that Joab, the Captain of David's army find no place at all among these honoured names. There is indeed 'no respect of persons' at the Bema.

There is, therefore no condemnation; there is no canceling of forgiveness already granted; but a greater or lesser 'reward' that is contemplated at the Judgment Seat of Christ. There is more to be said than this, but we must devote another article to its examination.

Meditations on Psalm LI

No.4. The "blotting out" of transgression (verse 1).
pp. 38, 39

David's first great thought is the removal of his guilt and cleansing from its stain. He said "My sin is ever before me" (Psa. li. 3). "Hide Thy face from my sins" (Psa. li. 9), he cried, and to this end, his first request is:

> "Blot out my transgressions. Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin" (Psa. li. 1, 2).

There is a twofold view of sin here. David sees a record, written against him in the book of God; he prays that this record may be blotted out. David saw moreover that sin is a defilement and that he stood in need of cleansing.

> "Blot out . . . . . wash me . . . . . cleanse me."

Let us give our attention to the way which these words "Blot out" are used.

To blot out from a book.

> "Yet now, if Thou wilt forgive their sin—; and if not, blot me, I pray Thee, out of Thy book which Thou has written" (Exod. xxxii. 32).

It is this form of the verb machah, that David, who knew and loved the law of Moses, used in Psa. li. 1:

> "Whosoever hath sinned against Me, him will I blot out of My book" (Exod. xxxii. 33).

David knew this dread statement. Yet such was his trust in the mercy and loving kindness of his God, that, even though he was about to confess:

> "I have sinned against Thee", and knew that if he received his deserts he would be 'blotted out' of the book which God had written, yet with magnificent faith he prays rather 'Blot out my transgressions, wash me' and not as Moses, who, for different reasons, said 'Blot me out of Thy book'.

David moreover knew what the Lord had spoken concerning Amalek, and Agag, who is associated with the downfall of Saul, was probably a descendant of Amalek. He would therefore be cognizant of the threat recorded in Deuteronomy:

> "Thou shalt blot out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven" (Deut. xxv. 19).

Here we have two figures. (1) The blotting out of a book. (2) The blotting out of remembrance. Deuteronomy moreover, contains the curse written against the idolater in Israel "The Lord shall blot out his name from under heaven" (Deut. xxix. 20), and David in his own Psalms had used the word to speak of this terrible judgment upon the wicked:

> "Let them be blotted out of the book of the living, and not be written with the righteous" (Psa. lxix. 28).
> "Let his posterity be cut off; and in the generation following let their name be blotted out" (Psa. cix. 13).

He knew that where sin was not 'blotted out' it was 'remembered'.

> "Let the iniquity of his fathers be remembered with the Lord; and let not the sin of his mother be blotted out" (Psa. cix. 14).

From another point of view, Nehemiah reverses the prayer made by Moses and says:

> "Remember me, O my God, concerning this, and wipe not out my good deeds that I have done for the house of my God" (Neh. xiii. 14).

Perhaps the most terrible passage wherein this word 'blot out' is found is in the record of the Flood:

> "I will destroy man" (Gen. vi. 7);
>
> "Every living substance . . . . . will I destroy (margin blot out)" (Gen. vii. 4);
> "Every living substance was destroyed . . . . . they were destroyed from the earth" (Gen. vii. 23).

As one ponders the usage of this expression, the completeness of the forgiveness of David's sin becomes apparent. If such a 'blotting out' from the Divine record as this term implies be accomplished, David could anticipate the language of another, who though once calling himself a 'wretched man' and 'the chief of sinners', yet could say:

> "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?"

We will take up the reference to washing and cleansing in our next article. We leave the reader to ponder the grace that can so effectively 'blot out' transgression as to justify the use of so strong a word as that employed by David in Psa. li. What was true of David will be true of Israel, and true of all saints.

> "I, even I, am He that blotteth out thy transgressions for Mine Own sake, and will not remember thy sins" (Isa. xliii. 25).
> "I have blotted out, as a thick cloud, thy transgressions, and, as a cloud, thy sins; return unto Me; for I have redeemed thee" (Isa. xliv. 22).
>
> "The Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces" (Isa. xxv. 8).

No.5. Some characteristic marks of sin.

David was king of Israel, the Lord's anointed, the shepherd of the flock of God, the sweet singer of Israel. He had established a secure place in the hearts of his people since the day when he had overthrown Goliath. He is called "the Patriarch"; the Holy Ghost is said to have spoken through his mouth. Yet he sinned, and sinned grievously, and there is no minimizing of his iniquity by reason of his greatness or of his high office, but rather, is there the thought that such high office but intensified his failure. We have seen that David, by his allusion to the Levitical law in the choice of the words 'wash', 'cleanse' and 'hyssop', practically acknowledged that he was a moral leper in need of a greater cleansing than that of any poor leper provided for under the law. He needed a cleansing that would render him 'whither than snow'.

In his acknowledgment of his sin David does not spare himself. He calls his sin 'my transgressions', 'mine iniquities', 'my sin', 'evil' and 'bloodguiltiness', and confesses not only that he himself had committed sin, but that he had been shapen in iniquity and conceived in sin. We cannot pass such a presentation of guilt, such a confession of human failure with a cursory glance; our whole meditation revolves around the fact and the nature of sin and we understand the references to mercy aright when we know that such mercy as is here revealed is shown to a sinner. We understand the cleansing and the restoring only in the light of the moral defilement and the moral lapse that we call sin. We understand the broken spirit and contrite heart only as we seen them associated with acknowledged transgression.

Let us then acquaint ourselves with the language of David in this solemn matter.

> "Blot out my transgression", "I acknowledge my transgressions" (Psa. li. 1, 3).

The word translated 'transgressions is pesha.

> "Wash me throughly from mine iniquity." "I was shapen in iniquity." "Blot out all mine iniquities" (Psa. li. 2, 5).

The word here is avon.

> "Cleanse me from my sin"; "my sin is ever before me"; "In sin did my mother conceive me"; "Hide Thy face from my sins" (Psa. li. 2, 3, 4, 5, 9).

The word 'sin' is chattah.

> "This evil in Thy sight" (Psa. li. 4).

The Hebrew word is ra.

> "Bloodguiltiness" (Psa. li. 14).

The Hebrew word is dam.

In the word ‘transgression’ there is an element of revolt.

> “I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled (pasha) against Me” (Isa. i. 2).

It is moreover a ‘trespass’ (Gen. l. 17). David realized that his sin was a rebellion against the commandment of the Lord, and a trespass against the rights of his fellow men. ‘Iniquity’ is the translation of avon, which comes from the root word avah and indicates the ‘perversity’ of sin. Avah means crookedness (Lam. iii. 9) and David realized the perversity of his crime when he used this word twice of his own act, and once of the nature of man represented by the fact that man is ‘born in sin and shapen in iniquity’.

“Sin” is either chet, chataah or chattah (we give the various forms for the sake of the reader who uses the English concordance). In all its forms, the underlying meaning of this word is ‘failure’. The word is found in Judges xx. 16 where we read of:

> “Seven hundred chosen men left handed; every one of whom could sling stones at an hair’s breadth, and not miss.”

The Apostle had this Hebrew word in mind when he wrote:

> “All have sinned, and come short of the glory of God” (Rom. iii. 23).

David acknowledged that he had utterly failed to come up to the Divine standard. He had indeed ‘come short’. When he surveyed the havoc wrought by his sin, he used the word ‘evil’ ra. The primary meaning of this word is ‘to destroy’. Adversity, calamity, distress, harm, hurt, misery, trouble, wretchedness, are some of the words used in the English Version to give some idea of the underlying meaning of ra. The primitive idea of ‘ruin’ is never absent. David had rebelled, transgressed and trespassed. His act had been one of perversity and added to that he came from a stock that had already become distorted. He, like all mankind, had ‘missed the mark’, and with bloodguiltiness staining his royal hands and besmirching his throne and crown, he stood an abject ruin. If he used these words with intent and with purpose, what else could he plead but the words put into the mouth of the publican in after days:

> “God be merciful to me a sinner!”

David’s plea for mercy (verse 1).

pp. 227, 228

The opening plea of the royal penitent is for mercy:

"Have mercy upon me, O God, according to Thy lovingkindness: according to the multitude of Thy tender mercies blot out my transgressions" (Psa. li. 1).

After this we have the prayer for cleansing, the acknowledgment of the deep sin into which David had fallen, and the prayer for restoration; but not until we reach verse 14 do we find the second great plea. This time however it is not the mercy and lovingkindness of the Lord that is invoked; David can now say:

"Deliver me from bloodguiltiness, O God, Thou God of my salvation: and my tongue shall sing aloud of Thy Righteousness" (14).

Here, where David can call the Lord God of his salvation, he advances from lovingkindness and tender mercy to that which lies close to the heart of the Gospel of Grace, the fact that God is just at the time that He is the justifier, as the student of Romans well knows. We must not lightly pass over this initial plea, for even though it be true that the Lord is 'Faithful and just to forgive us our sins', nevertheless the fact that He planned and provided such a way of escape for poor guilty man cries aloud of His mercy and His love. David was right in putting mercy foremost. Let us examine his words a little more closely.

Three different Hebrew words are before us: Mercy chanan, lovingkindness chesed, and tender mercy rachamim. Very near the prime meaning of the word chanan 'mercy' is the idea of 'bestowal', and closely associated is the idea of mere kindness, gratis, and causeless, as may be seen in the word chinnam, a word closely related to chanan if not derived from the same root. This can be seen in the following reference:

"Wherefore . . . . . slay David without a cause?" (I Sam. xix. 5).

We are therefore prepared to discover that chanan is translated many times in terms of 'grace' as well as in terms of 'mercy' or 'pity':

"God hath dealt graciously with me" (Gen. xxxiii. 11).
"He will be very gracious unto thee" (Isa. xxx. 19).

In the 'reflexive' this word is translated generally 'to beseech' or 'to make supplication'.

"I cried unto the Lord with my voice; with my voice unto the Lord did I make my supplication" (Psa. cxlii. 1).

'Have mercy' therefore fitly opens this Psalm of penitence and plenary grace.

'Lovingkindness' chesed. The basic idea of the word that gives us chesed 'lovingkindness' is something 'swelling, abounding, exuberant, bounty or bountiful fulness'.

"All flesh is grass, and all the goodliness thereof is as the flower of the field" (Isa. xl. 6).

The word is translated ‘goodness’ in Exod. xxxiv. 6 and ‘mercy’ in Exod. xxxiv. 7. While ‘mercy’ is the word used in translating this word more frequently than any other, the particular shade of mercy is indicated by the many passages where ‘kindness’, ‘merciful kindness’ and ‘lovingkindness’ have been chosen because of their fulness. This idea of exuberance and overflowing abundance, gives one translation which if judged by English standards seems at first impossible. The word translated ‘goodness’ in Exod. xxxiv. 6 occurs but once in Leviticus, where it is actually translated ‘wicked’ (Lev. xx. 17). If, however, we keep in mind the basic idea of exuberance or abundance, we shall perceive that the word is much like the Greek word epithumeo, which means:

(1) Desire in a good sense (I Tim. iii. 1 and Phil. i. 23).
(2) Lust in an evil sense (I Tim. vi. 9 and Eph. ii. 3).

David might have stayed here, for here indeed is enough and to spare. His sin was great, but the grace that awaited him was greater. Knowing the nature of the God to Whom he prayed, he adds one more Divine attribute to his plea, namely ‘tender mercy’ rachamim. The figurative use of the ‘heart’ as the seat and centre of affection is of such frequent and common use in ordinary everyday speech as to pass without much notice. If and when other organs of the body are similarly employed, it immediately raises the question of good taste, and in this we have departed very far from the intensely human language of the original Scriptures. “The reins” which are associated in the Hebrew Scriptures with intense feeling (Job xix. 27, etc.) refer to the ‘kidneys’. When the Psalmist said “Awake up, my glory” (Psa. lvii. 8), he referred probably to ‘the liver’. The healthful effect of the ‘marrow’ of the bones is referred to in Job xxi. 24 and applied figuratively in such passages as Prov. iii. 8, etc. We are therefore prepared to find that the literal meaning of rachamim ‘tender mercies’ is the ‘bowels’. In Gen. xliii. 30 we read:

> “And Joseph made haste; for his bowels did yearn upon his brother”;

while in the fourteenth verse of the same chapter we read:

> “And God Almighty give you mercy before the man.”

Millennial Studies

For a fuller treatment of the Millennium and allied subjects see "An Alphabetical Analysis" Parts III, 8 and 9.

No.10. This is the Sum.
pp. 4 - 6

When the Apostle reached about half way through the epistle to the Hebrews, he stopped at the end of chapter vii. to say:

> "Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum" (Heb. viii. 1).

He had admitted earlier that there were some things to say concerning Melchisedec that were 'hard to be understood' (Heb. v. 11). In his case the difficulty was caused by the fact that his hearers were 'dull of hearing'. In our case, the position must be reversed. We do not write as he did by inspiration of God, and we do not for a moment believe that our readers are in any way dull of hearing. We have endeavoured as grace is given, to be careful to avoid ambiguity, to give chapter and verse, to demonstrate by fairly full quotations the interpretation suggested, and to avoid mere text quotations that ignore the context. Even so, we have no right to believe that everyone has followed in every detail so closely that a resumé would not be useful, and as the same Apostle said in another context "To write the same things to you, to me indeed is not grievous, but for you it is safe" (Phil. iii. 1). We follow his helpful example.

Here then is a summary:

(1) There is no sacredness about the word "Millennium". It simply means 'a thousand' and is used of that portion of the future reign of Christ that lasts 1,000 years.

(2) There is one portion of the Scriptures only that speaks positively concerning the Millennial reign, and that a portion consisting of ten verses only, namely Rev. xx. 1-10.

(3) While making this statement we by no means deny that such passages as Isa. xi. 6-9 do not belong to this Millennial day, but if they do, they are seen to be such only by inference.

(4) We do not deny that there will be a pre-millennial kingdom, but we see that this will be the kingdom of the Beast of Rev. xiii.-xviii., and is foreshadowed by the reign of Saul before that of David.

(5) The outstanding features of the Millennium as revealed in Rev. xx. 1-10 are as follows:

(a) The devil will be shut up in the bottomless pit (abyss), and this, together with Dan. ix. 24, 'finish' 'to make an end', indicates that evil will be 'restrained' throughout the period.

(b) The bottomless pit, is in Greek abussos 'the abyss' and the LXX links this with 'the deep' of Gen. i. 2.

(c) The 'overcomer' who is addressed in Rev. ii. and iii., is the slender thread upon which the visions of the Apocalypse are threaded, and the ONLY ONES specifically mentioned in Rev. xx. 1-10 are the martyrs under the Antichrist's persecution, who 'live and reign with Christ a thousand years' (verse 4).

(d) The phrases 'the rest of the dead' and 'the first (or former) resurrection' compels us to see that the great white throne judgment that follows is the second half of one theme, and that this great white throne judgment is not the judgment of all the ungodly of all time. That subject does not enter into the book of the Revelation.

(e) At the close of the Millennium when Satan is let loose for a little season, his deceiving words find ready response in 'Gog and Magog' who invest the camp of the saints in the beloved city, and are immediately destroyed with fire from heaven.

(6) As an echo, and perhaps a connection with Gog and Magog, we find that there will be 'feigned obedience' among some of the nations of the earth at that time.

(7) The Lord will rule with a 'rod of iron' and the emphasis on the word 'iron' cannot be ignored.

(8) When the Lord enters into His kingdom, He will rule in the midst of enemies.

(9) While full Millennial blessings will be enjoyed in Jerusalem the nations that surround that favoured city will gradually learn the way of peace.

(10) If the converging lines of prophecy are considered, no gap can be found in which Israel as a nation will be a blessing in the earth. This can only take place after their conversion at the Second Coming of the Lord.

(11) The day of the Lord is to be succeeded by the day of God, and care must be taken not to cram all future prophecy into the 1,000 years, leaving little or nothing for the day (or period) that follows.

(12) Other incidental features and arguments are to be found in the articles of which this is but a synopsis. Until these can be Scripturally disposed of, we shall not feel under any obligation to occupy more space in the Berean Expositor, but will gladly return to the main purpose of our ministry, namely, the making known as far as grace will enable, the dispensation of the Mystery with all its blessings, privileges and responsibilities.

One Lord

"Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God is one LORD" (Deut. vi. 4).

No.1. Why is Elohim, the plural form, employed?

pp. 152 - 156

The Hebrew word ed means 'witness' and is the word used in Isa. xliii. 10 where the Lord says of Israel 'Ye are My witnesses'. Israel have for centuries seen themselves as witnesses to the fact that there is ONE God, and this is demonstrated by a curious feature of calligraphy. If we open any Hebrew Bible at Deut. vi. 4 we shall observe that two Hebrew letters are larger than the rest, and so stand out on the page. These two letters are E and D. The sentence which is thus marked, reads in the A.V.:

> "Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God is one LORD."

The order of the Hebrew words is a trifle different, reading literally:

> "Hear, O Israel, Jehovah our God, Jehovah one."

The word translated 'hear' is shamE, the word translated 'one' is acheD, and it is these two final letters E and D which spell out the word 'witness' which shows how keenly the Hebrew people felt concerning the nature and substance of their peculiar testimony. This witness finds a justification in the words of Isaiah which read:

> "Ye are My witnesses, saith the LORD, and My servant whom I have chosen: that ye may know and believe Me, and understand that I am He: before Me there was no God formed, neither shall there be after Me. I, even I, am the LORD; and beside Me there is no Saviour" (Isa. xliii. 10, 11).
> "Ye are even My witnesses. Is there a God beside Me? yea, there is no God; I know not any" (Isa. xliv. 8).

These words are pregnant with meaning, and their consequences are far reaching. We shall have to weigh them in the balances of the Sanctuary, and pray that we may make no false step and draw no false conclusion. Before we are in the position to do this, we must make some attempt to define our terms.

It is affirmed by some students of the Scriptures that Christ is 'the Word of Jehovah'. This does not go far enough. We believe that the Scripture teaches that Christ is Jehovah. It is affirmed by many, that Christ was begotten of the Father before time began. The passage from Isaiah just cited makes Jehovah declare 'Before Me there was no God formed'. A number of believers accept the translation of John i. 1 as being 'The Word as A God'. We hope to show that this is an impossible translation, but at the moment we place the words 'The Word was A God' over against "Before Me there was no God formed, neither shall there be after Me" and leave the comparison to do its own work. Peter declares that there is no other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved. The title 'Saviour' belongs pre-eminently to the Lord Jesus Christ—yet if we are to take the words of Isaiah as true, Jehovah has already declared that beside Himself 'there is no Saviour' (Isa. xliii. 11; xlv. 21). These Scriptural statements demand our careful attention. Before we can proceed therefore in the investigation of this most wonderful theme, we propose to seek an answer to the following questions:

(1) The teaching of the Bible is entirely in favour of the UNITY of God. God is One, all other gods are false. This being so, there must have been an imperative necessity for the employment of the plural ELOHIM in Gen. i. 1. Humanly speaking it would appear to have been an error of the first magnitude for Moses, in his endeavour to teach a people just out of idolatrous Egypt that there is but ONE God, to use the plural form in the very opening sentence of revealed truth. Yet this is what he was constrained to do.

(2) Upon examination, we shall discover that many of the proof-texts for the doctrine of Divine Unity, do not teach that GOD is one, but that JEHOVAH is one. It will therefore be incumbent upon us to discover the meaning and the relationship of this title to the doctrine of the one God.

(3) Arising out of this investigation will be the fact that the Jehovah of the O.T. is found to be the "Lord" of the N.T. and we are left in no doubt as to the fact that "The one Lord" of the N.T. is the Saviour, the Son of God Himself, "The Man Christ Jesus".

(4) Again and again we read that God is incomparable. That no likeness of Him is possible or permitted. Yet the same Bible declares that man was made in the image and after the likeness of Elohim, that Moses beheld the 'similitude' of the Lord, and that Christ is 'the Image of the invisible God'.

(5) In spite of the declaration that God is invisible, that 'no man hath seen nor can see' Him, that 'no man hath seen God at any time' the same Scriptures record that the elders of Israel "saw the God of Israel . . . . . they saw God" (Exod. xxiv. 10, 11).

As these matters are investigated, other items of extreme interest will come to light, but it would only be an encumbrance to attempt to make a list of them here. The first item that demands attention therefore, is the reason for the employment of the plural form Elohim for 'God', and to this we must address ourselves. There is no possible doubt that Elohim is a plural noun, the A.V. so translates it in Gen. iii. 5 'gods' and in over 200 other places. When we remember the idolatry which had surrounded Israel during their sojourn in Egypt, the law against all other 'gods' given at Sinai, and the extreme need to safeguard this basic doctrine, it is evident that some most imperative necessity compelled Moses to employ such a term, especially when a singular form Eloah was in use, and employed very freely in the book of Job. The translation 'gods' meets us not only in Gen. iii. but in Gen. xxxi. 30, 32; xxxv. 2, 4, and in over fifty other places in the Pentateuch. Side by side with the strange use of the title Elohim however, is another feature which materially altered the proposition, for the plural noun which ordinarily employs a plural verb, is here found associated with the verb in the singular.

Rules of grammar arise out of the nature of things. Because mankind is made up of male and female, we must have the pronouns 'he' and 'she'. Because we sometimes speak of man in the singular and sometimes in the plural, we have the singular 'he' and the plural 'they'. It is also natural that the verb should be construed with the noun, and change when the singular changes to the plural. So we say, in English "God SEES" but "Gods SEE". This is all so natural and straightforward that the above comments may seem a trifling waste of time. We find, however, that not only is the word "God" in Gen. i. 1 the plural Elohim, but it is followed by the verb in the singular, and that this is the general rule. Had there been no overwhelming necessity, Moses would never have introduced so disturbing a word into the opening verse of revealed truth as the plural form Elohim. The word El was known to him (Gen. xiv. 18; Deut. vii. 9, etc.). He knew also the word Eloah (Deut. xxxii. 15) a title used by Job over forty times.

To every believer in the inspired Scriptures, it must be evident that the plural form was a necessity, and its choice Divinely dictated. The strange fact that the plural Elohim is construed with a singular verb must be a necessity also, for no one would perpetrate 'by inspiration of God' a grammatical error. We are immediately confronted with a revelation which indicates that the subject matter lies outside of the ordinary experiences of mankind. The mystery is not solved in Gen. i. 1 but it is recognized, and if we will but notice its presence, we shall have made the first step towards its solution, at least, in part. The employment of the plural Elohim in Gen. i. 1 is not an isolated instance of this peculiar fact, for the use of the plural "God" with the singular verb is the rule throughout the O.T. Isaiah who so insists upon the unique Person of the Creator, says:

> "Thus saith God the LORD, He that created the heavens, and stretched them out" (Isa. xlii. 5).

Dr. John Lightfoot draws attention to the need for care in translating this verse, and reads "He that created . . . . . and they that stretched them out" which is confirmed by the note in the Companion Bible on this verse. Who are intended by 'they'? Again in Ecclesiastes where we read "Remember now thy Creator" (Eccles. xii. 1), the word Creator is plural "Creators". At the confusion of tongues the Lord said "Let US go down" (Gen. xi. 7) where the grammatical construction is the same as that used in Gen. xi. 3 "Let US make brick". What was grammatically true of many when speaking of man, is grammatically true of ONE when speaking of God. At the creation of man, this use of the plural is marked "Let US make man in OUR image, after OUR likeness". Yet this is followed by the words, "so God created man in HIS own image" (Gen. i. 26, 27). With whom did God take counsel? The Scriptures make it clear that He does not stoop to take counsel with any creature (Isa. xl. 14).

It is easy to submit the holiest and most solemn of mysteries of Scripture to ridicule, and those who object to the teaching of Scripture here brought forward, dismiss the idea as absurd that God, Who is One, should hold a consultation with Himself. It may transcend anything that comes within our own experience, but is that to us the final word? However, there still awaits us one passage that cannot be thus set aside.

We are told in Gen. xviii. 1 that "The LORD appeared unto Abraham in the plains of Mamre", and the title used here is "Jehovah". Abraham saw three men, two of them, "the two" literally, being subsequently called 'angels' in Gen. xix. 1. At the confusion of tongues, the plural is used "Let US go down" but now the singular is used "I will go down now", "To Me", "I will know" (Gen. xviii. 21). "The men" turned their faces towards Sodom, as we find in the next chapter, "but Abraham stood yet before the LORD (Jehovah)" (Gen. xviii. 22). It is to Jehovah that Abraham prayed, and it is Jehovah Who said "If I find in Sodom fifty righteous within the city, then I will spare it for their sakes". At the conclusion of this prayer "The LORD (Jehovah) went His way" (Gen. xviii. 33). In Gen. xix. 1-23 we have the intervention of the two angels, and the escape of Lot. Then we read these strange words:

> "Then the LORD (Jehovah) rained upon Sodom and Gomorrah brimstone and fire from the LORD (Jehovah) out of heaven" (Gen. xix. 24).

This is revealed for our faith, but does not attempt an explanation. Many who oppose the testimony of passages we have brought forward, subscribe to the inspiration of all Scripture. To such this appeal is made:

> "Do you believe that Gen. xviii. and xix. is a part of inspired Scripture, revealing to man knowledge that otherwise he could never attain?"

If the answer be "yes" then we must acknowledge that in this twenty-fourth verse we have a revelation that reflects upon the nature of the LORD, and brings to light a constitution and an order of Being entirely foreign to our experience. But it is nevertheless TRUE. Jehovah, in all appearances, a man, is here represented as standing on the earth raining down fire and brimstone from Jehovah out of heaven, "and HE (not they) overthrew those cities".

In the presence of these passages, would it not be wise humbly to acknowledge that we do not know and cannot comprehend the essential nature of God, and that any attempt to construct a system of Divinity that ignores this limitation is necessarily doomed to failure? "It is not God Himself, but the knowledge He has revealed to us concerning Himself which constitutes the material for theological investigation" (Dr. A. Kuyher, Encyclopaedia of Sacred Theology).

No.2. Jesus Christ is Jehovah.
pp. 179 - 185

We turn now to the great text already introduced in the first article of this series that speaks of the unity of God, namely Deut. vi. 4:

"The LORD our God is one LORD"
Jehovah our Elohim is one Jehovah

In the first place let us notice that it is not 'God' Who is said to be one, but the Lord, and before we go further with this great verse, let us remember that over and over again the God of Israel is called "The Lord our God" (Deut. i. 6) or "The Lord your God" (Deut. i. 10) or "The Lord God of your fathers" (Deut. i. 11). This title comes so many times that it is impossible to ignore it. Now in chapter iv., it is twice asserted that 'there is none else' (Deut. iv. 35, 39), so that the idea that God could tolerate "A God" beside Himself, as some ignorantly and blasphemously imagine John i. 1 teaches, is proved to be unscriptural and untenable. Jehovah is God, and there is none beside Him. We are not yet ready to consider the proofs that Scripture contains, that the 'Jehovah' of the O.T. is the 'Jesus' of the N.T.; we have here to examine Deut. vi. 4. Here we have the title already referred to "The Lord our God" Jehovah our Elohim "is one LORD (Jehovah)". The word echad which is translated 'one' here means a 'compound unity'. Thus it is used in Ezek. xxxvii. 16, 17, where two sticks are taken by the prophet, the one bearing the name of Judah, the other the name of Joseph, and he was told to "Join them one to another into one stick; and they shall become one in thine hand". So, in Gen. ii. 24, the word is used of the oneness of man and woman in marriage 'they shall be one flesh'. Instances can be multiplied.

In Numb. xiii. 23, the spies cut down a branch which carried one cluster of grapes. We are therefore compelled by the weight of evidence and the choice of words, to believe in the 'unity' of God, but that assent of the heart in the presence of Revelation does not by any means indicate that the human mind can comprehend what is thus clearly revealed to faith. What the consequence of such a revelation should be, is that with true humility and wonder we should put our hand to our mouth, and worship rather than speculate, refraining from the presumption that argues "If God . . . . . then He cannot be . . . . ." for we have nothing in our experience to supply the necessary facts upon which to base an argument or to draw conclusions.

The next subject that awaits our reverent investigation is the one already suggested, namely, that the Jehovah of the O.T. is the Jesus of the N.T. Let us start with Deut. vi. 4. The God of Israel is the 'one Lord'. The Septuagint version translates the name Jehovah by the Greek word kurios, and this title is used over and over again of the Saviour in the N.T. It is not the Father Who is called "one Lord" in the N.T. it is CHIRST (Eph. iv. 5; I Cor. viii. 6). It may not be clear to every reader that the N.T. consistently uses the title kurios to translate the title Jehovah, so we pause to establish this fact. Rom. iv. 8 is a quotation from Psa. xxxii. 2; Heb. vii. 21 quotes Psa. cx. 4, and in both cases Paul follows the rendering of the Septuagint. Matt. iii. 3 quotes Isa. xl. 3 "Prepare ye the way of the Lord" (Jehovah in the Hebrew of Isaiah kurios in the Greek of Matthew). In addition to this evidence three passages, when taken together are sufficient to prove that Jesus Christ is LORD, in this higher sense, they are Isa. xxxv., Rom. xiv. and Phil. ii. Isa. xlv. reiterates the truth that there 'is none else'. The idea of 'A God' or another who holds the title is intolerable.

> "I am the LORD, and there is none else, there is no God beside Me."
> "I am the LORD, and there is none else."
> "Surely God is in thee; and there is none else, there is no God."
> "I am the LORD; and there is none else."
> "There is no God else beside Me; a just God and a Saviour: there is none beside Me. Look unto ME, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God, and there is none else" (Isa. xlv. 5, 6, 14, 18, 21, 22).

At the close of this tremendous chapter we read these words:

> "I have sworn by Myself, the word is gone out of My mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, That UNTO ME every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear" (Isa. xlv. 23).

Yet Paul knowing this chapter, and believing the reiterated emphasis that 'there is none else' ascribes this claim to universal homage to Christ, saying:

> "Wherefore God also hath highly exalted Him, and given Him the name which is above every name; That in the name of Jesus EVERY KNEE should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that EVERY TONGUE should confess that Jesus Christ is LORD, to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. ii. 9-11).

Yet further, in Rom. xiv., he quotes this passage as follows:

> "For we shall all stand before the judgment seat of CHRIST. For it is written, As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to Me, and every tongue shall confess to GOD" (Rom. xiv. 10, 11).

What are we to say to this? Is Paul a muddled thinker? Did Paul write by inspiration of God? Did he forget the emphatic 'none else' of Isa. xlv.? or did he purposely use the quotation, once of GOD and once of Christ, because he knew that Jesus Christ, before His incarnation, was the LORD GOD of Israel?

> "Jesus—Jehovah is the only Saviour" (Adolph Saphir).

Recently we had the painful duty of reading a pamphlet which did its utmost to belittle the claims of the Lord Jesus to supreme Deity. At the close, was a list of similar publications, one line read:

"JESUS CHRIST IN THE OLD TESTAMENT—Reduced to 25 cents."! which aptly summarizes this dreadful teaching. There seems to be no neutral ground in this matter. Either Jesus Christ is 'LORD' or He must be reduced to '25 cents', and His claims not only discounted but rejected as blasphemy. We either side with those who took up stones to stone Him, or with those who fell at His feet and worshipped Him. If Jesus Christ is 'LORD' as the N.T makes abundantly clear, then He must be the 'God' of Israel, as Deut. vi. 4 declares.

"The LORD our God is one LORD." For Israel had, and could have, 'no other'.

Let us return to the witness of Isa. xliii. 10-12. It will be remembered that Israel are there spoken of as the Lord's witnesses "that ye may know and believe . . . . . that I am He". The LXX reads here ego eimi "I am", and these words are uttered in some solemn context in the N.T.

> "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Before Abraham was (genesthai 'came into being'), I AM (ego eimi)" (John viii. 58).

That this was a claim to be the great I AM of the O.T. is made clear by the immediate reaction of the Jews "Then took they up stones to cast at Him". One of the sins that was punished by stoning was that of blasphemy, and this was the interpretation which the Jews put upon the words, and which was not corrected either by the Lord or by the Evangelist.

We have already drawn attention to the fact that the normal rules of grammar were broken by Moses when he construed a singular verb with a plural noun in writing Gen. i. 1. Here again, in John viii., the subject is beyond the experience, the logic, or the language of man to express. Had the Saviour merely meant His hearers to understand that He was born before Abraham, a claim that of itself would be impossible to any ordinary man, he would have been obliged to use the past tense of the verb, saying "Before Abraham was, I WAS", but to say, "Before Abraham was, I AM" does not make sense if uttered by an ordinary man. Here, the choice of words, ego eimi points to the Deity of the Speaker. Can we imagine John the Baptist using any other language than that recorded in John i. 30 "He was before me".

Referring once again to Isa. xliii. 10 we continue the subject of the witness of Jehovah:

"Before Me there was no God formed, neither shall there be after Me." The immediate context of these words places 'no strange god' over against 'no God formed', and in Isa. xliv. 10 speaks of one 'who hath formed a god, or molten a graven image'. Calvin says of the words "Before Me there was no God formed"—'This contains a kind of irony, as if it had been said that there was no other god that had not been made and formed by mortals'. Had the passage stayed there, no difficulty would have presented itself but it continues 'neither shall there be after Me'. If this is taken to mean, that after the revelation given by and through Isaiah, no one would ever make an idol any more, it is manifestly untrue. Again, it does not say "After" a revelation, etc., but "After Me". The full sentence therefore is:

> "Before Me there was no God formed, neither shall (there) be (a god formed) after Me."

The Hebrew word yatsar 'to form' is found 4 times in Isa. xliii.:

> "He that formed thee, O Israel." "Every one that is called by My name . . . . . I have formed him", "This people have I formed for Myself; they shall shew forth My praise" (Isa. xliii. 1, 7, 21).

From Isa. xliv. 2 and 24 we discover that this word 'form' can refer to child birth, and before any of these lines were written Isaiah had uttered the great Messianic prophecy:

> "For unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given: and the government shall be upon His shoulder: and His name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father (lit. The Father of the Ages), the Prince of Peace" (Isa. ix. 6).

"A child BORN . . . . . The MIGHTY GOD (El Gibbor Hebrew). Were such momentous words written before or since? There can be no possible doubt as to the intention of Isaiah here, or possibility of watering down this extraordinary revelation, for in the next chapter the same prophet who had revealed the glorious mystery of the First Advent, takes us to the Second Advent, and uses the same title:

"And it shall come to pass in that day, that the remnant of Israel, and such as are escaped of the house of Jacob, shall no more stay upon him that smote them; but shall stay upon the LORD, the Holy One of Israel, in truth. The remnant shall return, even the remnant of Jacob, unto THE MIGHTY GOD (El Gibbor Hebrew)" (Isa. x. 20, 21).

The first occurrences of the Hebrew word yatsar 'form' are in Gen. ii. 7, 8:

"And the LORD God formed man of the dust of the ground . . . . . the man whom He had formed."

This man was made in the image and after the likeness of his Creator, and in Gen. v. 1-3 that 'image' was passed on to Seth, who was begotten in his father, Adam's likeness. We must consider this revelation further, but before we do let us consider a related theme. The three outstanding passages in the N.T. where creation is ascribed to Christ, are the three passages where we have the title "Word", "Image" and "Express Image", namely in John i., Col. i., and Heb. i. The one passage where Christ is seen as originally existing in the 'Form' of God, the application to Him of the words of Isa. xlv. 23, 24 have already been considered.

Before we attempt any further explanation, let us frankly face the fact that it must of necessity be beyond the ability of man to comprehend the essential nature of God. We speak of the "Being" of God, as "Absolute" and "Unconditioned", but if we are honest, we shall agree that we might as well use the symbol X—the unknown quantity. God has condescended to limit Himself to the capacity of our understanding, to employ terms that are within our cognizance, and above all to tell us that all we can hope to know of Himself, during the present life, will be learned as we see His glory in the face of Jesus Christ. In all our acquisition of knowledge the mind is comparing, contrasting, labeling and drawing conclusions. Into what category must we place God? He is Spirit. What do we KNOW of the conditions and modes of a life that pertain to pure Spirit? Just nothing. An infant on its mother's knee could more readily be expected to grasp the meaning of the fourth dimension than a man can be expected to understand the nature of Infinite Being. God has no COMPEER, therefore there is nothing with which we may COMPARE Him. We are halted at the start. He has no equal.

"To whom then will ye liken God? or what likeness will ye compare unto Him?"
"To whom then will ye like Me, or shall I be equal? saith the Holy One" (Isa. xl. 18, 15).
"To whom will ye liken Me, and make Me equal, and compare Me, that we may be like?" (Isa. xlvi. 5).
"For who in heaven can be compared unto the Lord? Who among the sons of the mighty can be likened unto the Lord?" (Psa. lxxxix. 6).

Whenever a comparison is instituted between things, there must follow:

(1) Either absolute equality in every particular will be established. But this is a contradiction in terms, for wherever there is absolute equality in every particular, there is identity.
(2) Or there will be manifested differences. Now one may differ from another because one is inferior or because one is superior.

Consequently, when the prophet places together as synonymous statements:

"To whom will ye liken Me?" and "Make Me equal?", it is evident that he does not admit the possibility of either comparison or equality. We may take it therefore as a settled truth, God can have no equal. The Hebrew word sharah 'to be equal' means to be even, to level, and so 'to countervail' or be equivalent (Esther vii. 4), and while it is used as a synonym by Isaiah for the word 'compare' which is the Hebrew mashal, yet comparison is not to be excluded altogether from the concept of equality as the translation given in Prov. iii. 15 and viii. 11 will show. It is evident that the only answer to the question of Isa. xlvi. 5 'To whom will ye . . . . . make Me equal?' is "With NONE". God is and must be incomparable.

There is, however, the testimony of the N.T. to be considered before this great question can be considered as closed. The Greek word translated 'equal' is the word isos or its derivatives (apart from the word used in Gal. i. 14 which means an equal in age). The basic meaning of isos seems to be equivalence 'the same as', as for example the statement concerning the heavenly Jerusalem that 'the length and the breadth and the height of it are equal' (Rev. xxi. 16). In mathematics, we use the word 'isosceles' of a triangle, two of whose sides are equal, and this equality must be absolute, the slightest addition or subtraction being intolerable. When the day labourers complained 'thou hast made them equal to us', it was because every one received just exactly one penny, neither more nor less. When Peter confessed that God had given the Gentiles "like gift as (He did) unto us" (Acts xi. 17) he used the word isos. On two occasions the Saviour is said to be 'equal' with God. Once by His enemies, who denied the rightfulness of His claim, and took up stones, signifying their conviction that His claim was blasphemous (John v. 18), and once by the Apostle who in an inspired passage testified of the same Saviour that He 'thought it not robbery to be equal with God' (Phil. ii. 6).

We are consequently presented with a problem. The prophet Isaiah makes it clear that there is no one who can ever be 'equal' with God, the Apostle Paul as emphatically declares that equality with God was the Saviour's normal condition. As there can be no discrepancy permitted where both utterances are inspired, there is but one conclusion possible. Isaiah and Paul speak of the same glorious Person, as we have already seen that Christ of the N.T. is the Jehovah of the O.T. Israel were reminded that at the giving of the law at Sinai, they heard a voice 'but saw no similitude' (Deut. iv. 12) and were enjoined to make no graven image or 'the similitude of any figure' (Deut. iv. 15, 16, 23, 25). Yet the same Moses is said to have beheld the similitude of the Lord:

> "With him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches; and the similitude of the Lord shall he behold" (Numb. xii. 28).

And again, the Psalmist looked forward in resurrection to beholding the face of the Lord, and awaking in His likeness (Psa. xvii. 15). The word 'apparently' (Numb xii. 8) indicates visibility. The Hebrews word mareh being a derivation of raah 'to see'. It is, nevertheless, stated soberly and categorically, that "No man hath seen God at any time"

(John i. 18; I John iv. 12). In addition to this John records the Saviour's own declaration:

> "Ye have neither heard His voice at any time, nor seen His shape" (John v. 37).*
> [* - These words can bear a different interpretation to which we may refer later.]

Yet every reader knows that passages can be found in the O.T. which declare that man has both 'seen' and 'heard' His voice. In Genesis, Jacob in some apprehension says of Esau his brother, "Afterward I will see his face" (Gen. xxxii. 20), and before the chapter is finished Jacob says "I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved" (Gen. xxxii. 30). When Moses and the elders of Israel went up into the mountain 'they saw the God of Israel' (Exod. xxiv. 40). So with respect to hearing. Moses ask:

> "Did ever people hear the voice of God speaking out of the midst of the fire, AS THOU HAST HEARD, and live?" (Deut. iv. 33).

No man has seen God at any time; no man has heard His voice at any time, yet Israel both saw the God of Israel and heard His voice. Once again Christ is the glorious solution of the mystery. He is the IMAGE of the invisible God, He is the WORD, the God of Israel seen by Moses and the Elders, the God Who gave the law at Sinai, and the "Man" who would not reveal his name Who wrestled with Jacob at Peniel (the face of God). He is none other than the self same One Who in the fullness of time emptied Himself, took upon Him the form of a servant and stooped to the death of the cross. He is Emmanuel "God with us". He is God "manifest in the flesh", and we today, even as Israel of old in their degree, see the glory of God "in the face of Jesus Christ". If Christ be not God, then we must admit that there are contradictions of a most serious nature in the Scriptures concerning God. No one has seen Him at any time, yet Israel saw the God of Israel. No one has heard His voice, yet Israel heard the voice of the Lord. If, however, the God of Israel be He Who was the Image of the invisible God and the same as the One Who in the fullness of time became man and lived on earth, Who could say "He that hath seen Me, hath seen the Father" then, although still confessedly great is the Mystery of godliness (I Tim. iii. 16), this most glorious fact does reconcile all the statements of Scripture that otherwise must remain contradictions to the honest enquirer after truth.

> "God was not always Lord until the work of creation was completed. In like manner he contended that the titles of Judge and Father imply the existence of sin and of a Son. As, therefore, there was a time when neither sin nor the Son existed, the titles Judge and Father were not applicable to God." (The Bishop of Bristol on Tertullian in The Ecclesiastical History of the 2nd and 3rd centuries).

These admissions of Tertullian, if taken to their logical conclusion, would have led to the construction of a very different creed from that attributed to Athanasius.

One of the most conclusive pieces of evidence that 'Jesus' is 'Jehovah' is provided by the last chapter of the book of the Revelation. When John records the actual words of the Lord Himself he says "I JESUS have sent Mine angel" (Rev. xxii. 16) but when he records the statement of the angel he writes:

"THE LORD GOD OF THE HOLY PROPHETS sent His angel" (Rev. xxii. 6).

This is conclusive. Argument must cease and adoring worship takes its place. We bow in this august Presence and unreservedly take the words of the angel, of Thomas and of Paul on our lips and their attitude in our hearts and in our testimony, and in full consciousness of what we are saying and doing we say:

"MY LORD AND MY GOD."

No.3. Jehovah and Kurios in O.T. and N.T.
pp. 198 - 204

Jehovah is the Lord God of the fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob (Exod. iii. 15). Here the word "LORD" is the translation of the Hebrew Jehovah and of the Greek kurios. This passage in Exod. iii. goes on to declare that His Name is 'unto the age' (l'olam, Heb. aionion Gk.) and that this Name is His memorial unto all generations. Both 'age' and 'generation' refer to time, not to eternity. While the title 'god' elohim, can be used of other than the Supreme, "Jehovah" is never so used; it is a proper name denoting the personal God and Him only. The A.V. translates the same word (Elohim) "God" and "gods" in Gen. iii. 5. So in Gen. xxxi. 32 and xxxv. 2 & 4, the word is translated 'gods' when referring to the 'images' or 'teraphim' stolen by Rachel (Gen. xxxi. 19). The title Elohim is given to 'Judges' as can be seen in Exod. xxi. 6 and Psa. lxxxii. 1, 6, even to those who shall 'die like men'. This is not the case with the name Jehovah; that is exclusively used of the Most High and never used of heathen 'gods', or of Hebrew 'Judges'. The name Elohim 'God' speaks of power, Jehovah 'Lord' of personality. Elohim is a common noun and can be prefaced by such words as "The Living" or "The Most High". The Scriptures of the O.T. use the word 'My God', 'Your God', 'The God of Israel', 'The God of heaven', but never does it use one of these qualifying words with Jehovah. The Hebrew says again and again 'My God' but never 'My Jehovah'* for when a Hebrew says my God he means Jehovah. Over and over again the Hebrew speaks of the God of the fathers, but never does it speak of the Jehovah of Israel, or of the fathers, for He is their God and there is none else.

[* - This is true of the Received Text. Some alterations made by the Sopherim, if restored, would modify some of these comments.]

While Elohim is the God of CREATION, Jehovah is the God of REDEMPTION. Elohim is the God of PROVIDENCE, Jehovah is the God of PROMISE. Prophecy is introduced with the words 'Thus saith the LORD', never with 'Thus saith GOD'. (See for fuller analysis the words of Dr. Duncan H. Weir.) The LXX translates the title Jehovah by the Greek word Kurios. It will be profitable to examine this term and its usage before we attempt to build any doctrine upon it. With the exception of Rabboni (Mark x. 51) and Megistanes (Mark vi. 21), the word 'Lord' is the N.T. translation of two words, despotes and kurios. In this connection Cremer says:

> "Kurios differs from despotes, as honourable superiority and authority does from mere force."

Trench in his Synonyms of the New Testament writes:

> "The distinction which the later Greek grammarians sought to trace between these words was this; a man would be despotes as respects his slaves (Plato), and therefore oikodespotes, but kurios in respect to his wife and children, who in speaking either to him or of him, would give him this title of honour 'As Sara obeyed Abraham, calling him Lord' (I Pet. iii. 6) . . . . . The free Greeks refused this title of despotes to any but the gods (Euripides); and the sense of this distinction of theirs we have retained in our use of 'despot', 'despotic', 'despotism', as set over against our use of 'Lord', 'Lordship' and the like; the despot is one who exercises not dominion only, but domination."

We must not import into the title Despotes where it occurs in the N.T. any of the harshness that was felt by the Greeks, but the distinction between the two words is a useful thing to keep in mind. Kurios, "Lord" is derived from kuros, 'supreme power, authority, influence' and then in a secondary sense, 'validity, security, certainty'. The word kuros does not occur in the N.T. but the verb kuroo occurs twice—I Cor. ii. 8 and Gal. iii. 15, where it is translated 'confirmed'. Kuroo means 'to make valid, sure, firm'; then 'to settle, finish, accomplish and perform'. From this word, and retaining much, if not all, of these senses, the word for "Lord" is derived. Jehovah "Lord", Kurios speak of God as 'The Ratifier', the God of the covenant, the God of the promises. Kurios was used by the Greeks of men in the capacity of rulers, and of any one or any thing which had another in its power—e.g. 'the power of life and death' (Plato). They used it also of things which were decisive, or upon which all depended and then of times which were fixed or appointed or foreordained. Thus the ninth month was called 'The month of the Lord' because it was the appointed limit in conception and child-birth. Similarly the regular day fixed for the Athenian assembly was called hemera kuria—which reminds us of Rev. i. 10 "The day of the Lord". All these things the Saviour gathers up in His title of "Lord".

The Septuagint uses the title Kurios as a translation of several O.T. titles of God. We give below a specimen of some of the more outstanding Hebrew words:

Adon, referring to man:
"My lord being old." Sarah refers to Abraham (Gen. xviii. 12).
"My lords, turn in, I pray you." Lot, to the Angels (Gen. xix. 2).
"Thus shall you speak unto my lord Esau" (Gen. xxxii. 4).
"God hath made me lord of all Egypt" referring to Joseph (Gen. xlv. 9), etc., etc.
Adonai, referring to God:
"Lord, how long?" (Isa. vi. 11).
Jehovah Adonai. "The spirit of the Lord God is upon Me" (Isa. lxi. 1).
Eloah. "Let not God regard it from above" (Job iii. 4).
Elohim. "And God spake all these words" (Exod. xx. 1).
Jah. "Who is a strong Lord like unto Thee?" (Psa. lxxxix. 8).

Jehovah. "The Lord came down to see the city" (Gen. xi. 5).
(And many other references).

There are twelve occasions in the N.T. where kurios is translated 'sir', six of them occurring in contexts referring to Christ. The same word is used by the Philippian gaoler:

> "Sirs, what must I do to be saved?" (Acts xvi. 30).

Kurios is translated 'master' twice and 'owner' once. It is translated 'Lord' 719 times in the N.T. of which 56 occurrences refer to men or beings lower than God, and 663 refer either to God or to the Lord Jesus Christ.

Let us now inquire into the way in which the writers of the N.T. use the title Kurios, the Greek equivalent of Jehovah, and how it is applied. Matthew uses the word six times in his two opening chapters, in accordance with O.T. usage 'The angel of the Lord', 'spoken of the Lord', but with the seventh reference, he makes a most vital change in his application of this exclusive and most revered title.

> "Prepare ye the way of the LORD" (Matt. iii. 3).

This is a quotation from Isa. xl. 3 where the word 'LORD' is Jehovah, and where, in chapter xlv. of the same prophet, it is explicitly declared 'I am the LORD, and there is none else, there is no God beside Me'. Quite apart from the question of inspiration, both Matthew and his readers were fully acquainted with the prophecy of Isaiah; consequently when Matthew prefaced his quotation with the words "For this is He that was spoken by the prophet Isaiah, saying . . . . . Prepare ye the way of the LORD" (Matt. iii. 3) he knew, and his readers knew, the tremendous claim that this quotation makes, that the One who was known as Jesus Christ in the N.T. was indeed He, Who before His Incarnation and birth was Jehovah, the God of Israel. If we supplement this testimony with that of the angel who appeared unto Zacharias the father of John the Baptist, the evidence is overwhelming.

> "Many of the children of Israel shall he turn to the LORD THEIR GOD. And he shall go before HIM (i.e. 'The Lord their God' Who is none other than Jesus Christ) in the spirit and power of Elijah" (Luke i. 16, 17).

John the Baptist, at his birth, was called "The prophet of the HIGHEST" who should go before the face of the LORD to prepare His ways (Luke i. 76). In the eyes of Stephen "The Most High" (same word in original as 'The Highest') is the Creator and God of Israel (Acts vii. 48) and Heb. vii. 1 says it was this God that Melchisedec served in the capacity of Priest. Leaving the Gospels for a time, we come to the Acts of the Apostles, and once again we are left in no doubt but that the title "Lord" is used in its O.T. meaning, the sacred name of the God of Israel. "That great and notable day of the Lord" (Acts ii. 20) is a direct quotation from the prophecy of Joel. "A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up" (Acts vii. 37) being a quotation from Deut. xviii. 15. When Peter answered the voice from heaven which said "Rise, Peter; kill and eat" by replying "Not so, Lord" (Acts x. 13, 14) he refers this command to 'God' saying "God hath shewed me".

When Saul of Tarsus stricken down to the earth by the brightness of the vision on the road to Damascus, said 'Who art thou, Lord?' it must be remembered that he was at that moment a bigoted persecuting Pharisee and the last thing that he would tolerate would have been the ascription of the divine title to Jesus of Nazareth. He believed that Jesus was an impostor, and that it was for the glory of God that his disciples be stamped out as a menace. When a Jew like Saul of Tarsus looked up to heaven and said 'Lord', only the Most High God, the God of Israel and the God of the whole earth could have been intended by him in the use of the term. To his amazement he heard from heaven that 'The Lord' was "Jesus", and his conversion was immediate and complete. Without a word of debate and without a moment's hesitation he continued 'trembling and astonished' by saying "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" (Acts ix. 3-6). In his epistles, the Apostle uses the same word 'Lord' for the God of the O.T. and for the Christ of the New. He quotes Psa. xxxii. 1, 2 in Rom. iv. 8; Isa. xxviii. 22 in Rom. ix. 28; Isa. i. 9 in Rom. ix. 29; Joel ii. 32 in Rom. x. 13; Isa. liii. 1 in Rom. x. 16; Isa. xl. 13 in Rom. xi. 34; Deut. xxxii. 35 in Rom. xii. 19; Isa. xlv. 23 in Rom. xiv. 11 and Psa. cxvii. 1 in Rom. xv. 11. Here, the references in this one epistle provide overwhelming evidence that the 'Lord' in the writings of Paul refers to Jehovah, the God of Israel. Not only so, the context of several of these passages actually use the title 'God' as an extension or alternative, thus removing the smallest doubt as to Paul's meaning.

> "God imputeth righteousness . . . . . the Lord will not impute sin" (Rom. iv. 6-8).
> "Lord, who hath believed . . . . . faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God" (Rom. x. 16, 17).
> "O the depth . . . . . knowledge of God . . . . . Who hath known the mind of the Lord?" (Rom. xi. 33, 34).

In Rom. xiv. we have a complete association of the names Christ, God and Lord:

> "We shall all stand before the judgment seat of CHRIST, for it is written . . . . . saith the LORD, every knee shall bow to ME, and every tongue shall confess to GOD" (Rom. xiv. 10-12).

This combination of titles is all the more remarkable, for the passage cited comes at the conclusion of a chapter in Isaiah which reiterates the solemn fact that the One who swears that every knee shall bow to Him, is the LORD, and GOD, and none else, there being 'none beside' Him. Yet, not only does Rom. xiv. 10-12 appear to use the titles 'Christ', 'Lord' and 'God' as synonymous, Phil. ii. is just as explicit:

> "That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow . . . . . every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is LORD to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. ii. 10, 11).

"Jesus Christ is Lord." Unto Him every knee shall bow, and this will be to the glory of God the Father, yet the one who wrote these words knew full well that beside 'The Lord' there was 'none else' (Isa. xlv. 6). How impossible all this reads when looked at through the spectacles of orthodoxy; how simple it becomes if we perceive that 'Jehovah' the God of Israel and the 'Jesus' of the N.T. are one and the same. In the O.T. Jehovah is 'God manifest', in the N.T. Jesus is "God manifest in the flesh". The problem which these facts present is great, and in subsequent studies we hope to show that a true understanding of the term 'Person' and a Scriptural use of the title 'The Father' enable the believer to accept all that is written, without denying the fact that God is one, and without lowering in the slightest degree the glorious fact that in Jesus Christ, we see the God of Israel manifest in the flesh.

In the book of the Revelation we read the glorious title of our Saviour, King of Kings, and Lord of Lords (Rev. xix. 16). In I Timothy this title is associated with His 'appearing' or 'manifestation' in the future. So we can now add to what has been said above, the following:

(1) In the O.T. economy Jehovah is God manifest.
(2) In the N.T. economy Jesus is God manifest in the flesh.
(3) At the Second Coming He will be manifested as Lord of Lords, and King of Kings.

In I Tim. vi. 16 we meet with a group of extraordinary attributes which we must now consider.

> "Who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto, Whom no man hath seen, nor can see" (I Tim. vi. 16).

The same epistle that declares that as "God manifest in the flesh" He was 'seen of angels' declares that in reality He dwells in light unapproachable. The word translated 'immortality' in I Tim. vi. 16 is the Greek word athanasia, a state into which death cannot enter. In I Tim. i. 17 "The King eternal, invisible, immortal" the word translated immortal is aphthartos which indicates a state into which corruption cannot enter. Both of these words are linked with resurrection. This we will prove in a moment, but before so doing we ask a question. In what way, and under what necessity does the Scripture need to tell us that GOD is either immortal or incorruptible? Surely the very essence of Godhead is that He ever lives, that the idea of death or corruption ever invading the realm of the Infinite God is unthinkable. Further, if both these words athanasia and aphthartos imply death and resurrection, in what way can resurrection be used of the Living God? Before attempting to answer these questions let us satisfy ourselves that death and resurrection are always in view where these terms appear.

Athanasia. "This mortal must put on immortality."
"Shall have put on immortality" (I Cor. xv. 53, 54).
"Who only hath immortality" (I Tim. vi. 16).

Here are the only references to this term on the N.T. Can anyone explain why we should be assured that the Infinite God hath 'immortality' when the usage of the word plainly points to (1) a body, (2) a death and (3) a resurrection? Are we not reading in I Tim. i. 17, just as surely as we are reading in I Tim. vi. 16, a revelation concerning Him Who in the days of His flesh bore the name "Jesus"? He is "The King eternal, immortal, invisible, God only wise (or with the critical texts, 'The Only God' as in the RV.)". These three references exhaust the occurrences of athanasia. When we turn to the next word, we find it in two forms aphtharsia and aphthartos. Aphtharsia is the 'immortality' that men may seek (Rom. ii. 7), the 'incorruption' associated with the resurrection body (I Cor. xv. 42, 50, 53, 54) and the 'immortality' brought to light by the Gospel (II Tim. i. 10).

Aphthartos is used of God, the incorruptible crown, the resurrection body, the inheritance and the Word of God (Rom. i. 23; I Cor. ix.25; xv. 52; I Pet. i. 4, 23) and of the King eternal, immortal of I Tim. i. 17. The remaining references use the word in a figurative sense, 'sincerity' and 'corruptible' (Eph. vi. 24; Titus ii. 7 and I Pet. iii. 4). If the Lord Jesus Christ definitely became a man of flesh and blood in order that He might die, the necessary conclusion from this revealed fact must be that before the Incarnation, the idea of death and of resurrection is meaningless and never used. We are, therefore, forced to see in I Tim. i. and vi. two references to Him, Who in chapter iii. is revealed as 'God manifest in the flesh'. As spoken of in I Tim. i. 17 He is named as 'the only God' (R.V.), in I Tim. vi. 15 as 'the only potentate' and in I Tim. vi. 16 as the one who 'only hath immortality'. In His own times, and related to the future 'appearing', the Saviour will reveal Who it is that bears the title 'only Potentate' and 'the only God', but before 'that day' and during this life we are purposely permitted to see such things only as 'through a glass darkly'. In like manner, we read that God is 'invisible'. But again this is relative to man. Before man was created, before the Heavens and the Earth had a beginning God was; but as there did not exist any beings who depended upon light and sight to perceive, the idea of God's invisibility did not arise. "No man (oudeis no one, wider in scope than, no man) hath seen God at any time", and so He is spoken of as being 'invisible'. This, like immortality, is a relative term. The God Who is immortal, is the One who for our sakes became man, suffered death and then rose again to die no more. The God Who is invisible is likewise the same glorious Person. If Christ is the One who is to 'appear' (I Tim. vi. 14) and He surely will: if Christ is the One Who is King of Kings and Lord of Lords (I Tim. vi. 15) and He surely is; then it is Christ Who dwells in light which no man can approach unto, these words referring to that sphere which pertains to the Godhead exclusively, Whom no man hath seen, nor can see. Only as 'God manifest in the flesh' could He be 'seen' (I Tim. iii. 16) or 'handled' (I John i. 1, 2). It is gloriously possible for the redeemed to behold or see the glory of the Saviour which has been given Him in connection with His Mediatorial work (John xvii. 24) but it is another matter when we think of the glory that He had before the Incarnation and before the work of Redemption (John xvii. 5), in which there is no Scriptural warrant to suggest that any can share. The glory which He had given to Him, He has given to us in order that we all may be one (John xvii. 22) but the glory that was His before the world was is given to no-one. The baffling statements put forward in creed and argument mostly arise out of taking for granted that the Trinity, Father, Son and Holy Ghost is essential, whereas the Scripture teaches that the Trinity of Persons is economical or dispensational*. We mention these features here without comment. They will come up for examination in later studies.

[* - The Greek word oikonomos occurs frequently in the debates on the Trinity in the days of Athanasius.]

pp. 219 - 222

As we read the Scriptures we discover that: (1) Elohim is God. (2) El is God. (3) Jehovah is God. (4) Adon is God. (5) Adonai is God. (6) Jah is God. (7) El Shaddai is God. (8) The Father is God. (9) The Son is God.

Either these separate names and titles indicate separate Gods, which the Scriptures categorically forbid, or they are separate names and titles of the one God, which Scripture categorically affirms to be the truth. We have, in this series, demonstrated that the N.T. reveals that the Lord Jesus Christ is Jehovah, the "One Lord" of the O.T. We must now pursue our study a stage further to a stage that is represented in Scripture as the ultimate and the final revelation of the nature of the Godhead. These are brave sounding words and they are written with some trepidation. We stand on holy ground; we cannot yet behold the glory of the Lord apart from the medium of a glass in which, confessedly, we can only hope to see 'darkly'; but at the same time, we are sure that what has been written has been written for our learning, and so with expectant yet humbled hearts, we once again 'open the Book'.

> "And this is life eternal, that (hina 'in order that') they might know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, Whom Thou hast sent" (John xvii. 3).

We rejoice to know that God is 'true', for it is revealed that 'He cannot lie'. God is true, in contrast with all the false gods of the heathen, but that lesson we are learning or have already learned in this life. The language of John xvii. 3 implies something more than this, and something of the import of the word 'true' emerges from a consideration of the way John himself uses that term. Christ is set forth as 'true' light (John i. 9), not that the light of the sun, or the Scriptures, or of John the Baptist was 'false', but rather that all other lights are but 'figures of the True' the real, the Anti-typical. 'True worshippers' in John iv. 23 are not placed in contrast with idolators, but with that worship which had Jerusalem as its centre; it was 'in spirit and in truth' in contrast with the letter and with type and shadow. Christ Himself recognized the reality of the manna which fed the people during their wilderness wanderings, but nevertheless He declared 'I am the true bread' (John vi. 32) of which the manna was a very precious type. The epistle to the Hebrews contains similar usage; there we read of 'the true tabernacle' and some things which were 'the figures of the true' (Heb. viii. 2; ix. 24).

> "The law (with its types and shadows) was given by Moses, but grace and truth (i.e. true antitypical grace) came by Jesus Christ" (John i. 17).

This revealing statement is immediately followed by the words already quoted "No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him" (John i. 18).

> It is not God Himself, but the knowledge He has revealed to us concerning Himself which constitutes the material for theological investigation" (Dr. A. Kuyher).

How true these words are and what a waste of argument and of time would have been saved if students but realized the import of such a quotation. We speak of the names and titles of God, but do we really mean that the infinite God actually bears the name Elohim, Jehovah, El Shaddai and the like? Are they not concessions to our finite minds and modes of thought, 'not God Himself, but the knowledge He has revealed to us'? Before the creation of the world was, did He then and for all eternity bear the Hebrew names and titles? Are they not all 'figures of the true' just as surely as the Ark, the Mercy Seat, the Cherubim were types and shadows of invisible realities? These titles of God are full of meaning; they direct the mind into certain channels, but the name Elohim, when taken to its final analysis and seen with all its connotations is still 'a figure of the true' as surely as 'the eyes', 'the nostrils' and 'the hands' of God are figures of unseen realities.

One of the glorious opportunities presented by eternal life will be the privilege of getting to know 'the only true God', God divested of type, shadow and figure, a knowledge accompanied with an expanding appreciation of 'Jesus Christ Whom He had sent', for the knowledge of 'The Son' is even more mysterious and more complex than the knowledge of the Father (Matt. xi. 27). We do not yet know Christ 'as He is'; that awaits the future day when we 'shall see Him as He is' and be like Him (I John iii. 2), and not till we attain unto eternal life shall we either see Him or be like Him. Until that day dawns, types and shadows must perforce form a great part of the stuff of knowledge. At His appearing, He will show Who is that blessed and only Potentate, King of kings and Lord of lords. If John xvii. 3 points a way to the Father as "the only true God", I John v. 20 written by the same apostle points to the Son. "We know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding, that we may know Him that is true, and we are in Him that is true, even in His Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God, and eternal life." Houstos, the demonstrative pronoun 'this', may refer to the noun which is nearest, but on the other hand, it may refer to one that is more remote, and commentators are divided concerning the question does 'This is the true God' refer to "God" or to "His Son Jesus Christ"? Both the A.V. and the R.V. add the word 'even', indicating that they lean to the thought that when John here speaks of 'Him that is true' He refers to the Son of God. Athanasius is reported to have called I John v. 20 'a written demonstration', saying that as Christ said of the Father, John xvii. 3 'This is life eternal, that they might know Thee, the only true God', so John said of the Son 'This is the true God and eternal life', and that Arius with whom he was disputing acquiesced, and confessed the Son of God to be the true God. To support this, Glassius appeals to Athanasius (Oper. tom. 3, p.705). John in this epistle does not simply say "This is the true God" but adds "and eternal life". We know of no Scripture that teaches that 'the Father' is eternal life or the personification of eternal life, but this same epistle leaves us in no doubt that John believed this was true of the Son of God.

> "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the Word of life; (for the life was manifested, and we have seen it and bear witness, and show unto you that eternal life, which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us)" (I John i. 1, 2).

There can be but one only True God; of this the Scripture is emphatic. At the same time the Father, and the One Whom He sent, are both spoken of as being "The True God". "This" in I John v. 20 is the same word that is translated 'The same' in John i. 2 and should be so translated here. Both the Father and Son therefore are 'The True God', yet as the explicit teaching of Scripture is that there is One God, Who is Himself the One Lord, we perceive that when the present period of our service has passed, when we 'know even as we are known', when type and shadow give place to reality, when we begin to learn the lesson indicated in John xvii. 3 then, if not now, we may appreciate the depth and wealth of teaching that resides in the much maligned and misunderstood statement of one of the early teachers of Christian doctrine, namely that the titles of God are economical (dispensational), assumed for the purposes of Creation, Revelation and Redemption, that they are 'figures of the true' The Goal of the Ages is not expressed in the words "That Christ may be all in all", that is the blessed anticipatory truth of the present dispensation of the Mystery (Col. iii. 11) or that 'the Father' may be all in all, that is the climax clause of the Unity of the Spirit (Eph. iv. 6); but that GOD may be all in all, that is the last word on the subject in Scripture.

In these articles we have been but pointing onward, anticipating by the 'understanding' that the Son of God gives, just a little of the full orbed truth that awaits us 'in that day'. Meanwhile we still see by means of a mirror enigmatically; types, figures, symbols, shadows are uppermost in our language and in our thinking. Let us at least recognize these figures, accept them as such, but remember so to frame our arguments and construct our theology that we do not mistake shadow for substance.

No.5. The Doctrine of the Trinity, and the use of the word "Person".

pp. 239 - 243

The orthodoxy of Dr. Chalmers is not a matter of dispute, and therefore his statements concerning the doctrine of the Trinity in his lectures on Divinity may be a helpful introduction to the subject. He declared that it was his intention to depart from the usual order that is, that most theological courses 'begin at the beginning' and tackle the most abstruse and difficult of all subjects, the essential nature of God. He drew attention to the two methods employed in any research, the analytical processes and the synthetic. By the synthetic you begin, as in geometry, with the elementary principles, and out of these you compound the ultimate doctrines or conclusions. By the analytic, you begin with the objects or the phenomena which first solicit your regard, and these by comparison and abstraction you are enabled to resolve into principles. "This latter mode", Dr. Chalmers continues, "is surely the fitter for a science beset on either side with mysteries unfathomable . . . . . Now we cannot but think it a violation of this principle, that so early a place should be given to the doctrine of the Trinity in the common expositions of theology . . . . . after having by a transcendental flight assumed our station at the top of the ladder, to move through the series of its descending steps instead of climbing upward from the bottom of it . . . . . We should feel our way upward . . . . . we greatly fear that a wrong commencement and a wrong direction may have infected with a certain presumptuous and a priori spirit the whole of our theology."

> "The most zealous Trinitarian affirms of the triune God that He is not the Father, He is the one God, consisting of Father, Son and Holy Ghost; neither is He the Son, He is the one God, consisting of Father, Son and Holy Ghost; Neither is He the Holy Ghost, He is the one God, consisting of Father, Son and Holy Ghost. This is a very general statement, we allow, nor do we think that Scripture warrants a more special description of the Trinity; and most surely if the Scriptures do not, reason ought not . . . . . To distinguish, then, between what is Scripturally plain and what is scholastically or scientifically obscure in this question, let it first be considered, that there is nothing in the individual propositions of the Father being God, of Christ being God, of the Holy Spirit being God which is not abundantly plain . . . . . viewed as separate propositions, there is nothing incompatible in the sayings of Scripture."
> "But there is another proposition equally distinct, and in itself intelligible—it is, that God is one. Viewed apart from all other sayings, there is nought obscure surely in this particular saying . . . . . What, then, is that which is commonly termed mysterious in the doctrine of the Trinity? . . . . . the whole mystery is raised by our bringing them together, and attempting their reconciliation. But the Scripture does not itself offer, neither does it ask us to reconcile them. It delivers certain separate propositions, and thus it leaves them, to each of which, it must be observed, is in and of itself, perfectly level to our understanding . . . . . We could have tolerated that Socinians and Arians had quarreled with the phraseology of Athanasius, had it but thrown them back on the simplicities of the Scripture."
>
> "I should feel inclined to describe (the multiplicity of opinions) by negatives rather than by affirmatives, denying Sabellianism on the one hand on the Scriptural evidence of the distinction between Father, Son and Holy Ghost; denying Tritheism on the other, on the Scriptural evidence of there being only one God, professing the utmost value for the separate propositions, and on their being formed into a compendious proposition, confessing my utter ignorance of the ligament which binds them together into one consistent and harmonious whole."
> "We can make out no more of the Trinity than the separate and Scriptural propositions will let us" (Dr. Chalmers, Institute of Theology).

A word of vital importance, but one much misunderstood in relation to the nature of God is the word "Person". It will be found that even when the Athanasian Creed is honestly accepted, and the warning most solemnly repeated that "there are not three Gods: but one God", a great number who subscribe to the doctrine of the Trinity, subconsciously conceive of three separate 'Gods' or as the term is they are at heart Tritheists. The XXXIX Articles of the book of Common Prayer opens thus:

> "There is but one living and true God, everlasting, without body, parts or passions: of infinite power, wisdom and goodness, the Maker and Preserver of all things visible and invisible. And in the unity of the Godhead there be three Persons, of one substance, power and eternity: the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost."

The Athanasian Creed goes to great lengths to insist that there are not three eternals, not three incomprehensibles, not three uncreated, not three almighties, not three Gods, not three Lords. Yet with the statement before the mind that at the same time there are three Persons in the Godhead, this reiteration in the creed sounds much like a consciousness that, left to itself, the creed does and will in fact breed the concept that there are three Gods, however the idea be denied. An examination of the defence of the creed through the centuries only deepens the problem, and the earnest inquirer generally finds that he is taken away from the realm of Revealed Truth to the intricacies of metaphysics, leading him either to throw aside his intelligence and 'believe' upon the authority of the Church and tradition, or to take the opposite step, deny the Deity of Christ, become a Unitarian as a protest, and ultimately a deist or an agnostic.

We believe a true understanding of the word 'person' would prevent the idea of 'three gods' forcing itself upon the mind in spite of all the protests of the creed itself, and would recognize the gracious condescension of the 'one Lord' on behalf of us men and for our salvation. To the consideration of this most important term let us address ourselves.

Modern usage equates 'person' with 'individual' but how such a 'person' can at the same time be 'without body, parts or passions' passes our comprehension. Turning first of all to the usage of the word 'person' in the A.V. we discover that it translates the Hebrew word adam (Jonah iv. 11); ish man, a male (II Kings x. 7); enosh mortal (Judges ix. 4); methim men (Psa. xxvi. 4); nephesh soul (Gen. xiv. 21); nephesh adam soul of man (Numb. xxxi. 35). In no conceivable way can any of these terms be used of God. The word baal lord (Prov. xxiv. 8) is the only term that approaches the subject. The only other word employed in the Hebrew, that is translated person, is panim 'face', and this, we shall discover, approaches nearer to the intention of the word 'Person' in the Creed than any other word used in the O.T. Eighteen of the 20 occurrences of panim which are translated 'person' employ it in the phrase 'regard' or 'accept persons', and it is evident that the term here does not think so much of an individual, but as of estate, whether such be 'high' or 'low', rich' or 'poor'.

In the N.T the Greek prosopon 'face' is translated 'person' six times, four of which read "regard" or "accept" a man's person; one speaks of forgiving 'in the persons of Christ' (II Cor. ii. 10). Other places where 'respect of persons' are found, the Greek words are prosopoleteo tes lepsia, all being derived from prosopon 'face'. We discover from Liddle and Scott that prosopeion means 'a mask' and hence 'a dramatic part, character, and so the Latin persona'. A mask is not an individual, neither is a character or dramatic part in a play a 'person' in the present acceptation of the term. The shorter Oxford Dictionary is not a theological work and has no axe to grind, but gives this definition of the word "person":

> "PERSON. Latin persona, a mask used by a player, a character acted; in later use, a human being, connected by some with the Latin personare 'to sound through'. A part played in a drama, or in life; hence a function, office, capacity; guise, semblance; character in a play or story."

If we therefore speak the Queen's English, we shall mean by 'Three Persons in the Godhead' offices, functions, guises and characters assumed in grace and love by the One True, Infinite and Invisible God for the purpose of Creation, Redemption and the ultimate consummation of the ages, 'that God may be all in all'. Lloyd's Encyclopaedic Dictionary puts the definition 'an individual' seventh in the list, the earlier definitions agreeing with those of the Oxford Dictionary. Here is the first definition:

(1) That part in life which one plays.

> "No man can put on a person and act a part; but his evil manners will peep through the corners of his white robe" (Jeremy Taylor).

Archbishop Trench points out that when this old sense of the word is remembered, greatly increased force is given to the statement that God is no respecter of 'persons'. The signification is that God cares not what part in life a person plays, in other words what office he fills, but how he plays it. At the time this paper was being written, a friend was preparing to undergo an operation. The malady from which he suffered had influenced his temper and outlook, and we found ourselves saying, without any need of explanation 'When the operation is over, he may be a new person'. Archbishop Whately in his book The Elements of Logic has an appendix illustrating certain terms which are peculiarly liable to be used ambiguously. One of these terms is the word 'person'.

> "PERSON, in its ordinary use at present, invariably implies a numerically distinct substance. Each man is one person, and can be but one. It has, also, a peculiar theological sense in which we speak of 'three Persons' of the blessed Trinity. It was used thus probably by our Divines as a literal, or perhaps etymological rendering of the Latin word 'persona'."

The Archbishop quotes from Dr. Wallis, a mathematician and logician, saying 'That which makes these expressions (viz. respecting the Trinity) seem harsh to some of these men, is because they have used themselves to fancy that notion only of the word person, according to which three men are accounted three persons, and these three persons to three men . . . . ." "The word person (persona) is originally a Latin word, and does not properly signify a man: (so that another person must needs imply another man); for them the word homo would have served." "Thus the same man may at once sustain the person of a king and a father, if he be invested with regal and paternal authority. Now because the King and the Father are for the most part not only different persons and different men also, hence it comes to pass that another person is sometimes supposed to imply another man; but not always, nor is that the proper sense of the word. It is Englished in our dictionary by the state, quality or condition whereby one man differs from another; and so, as the condition alters, the person alters, though the man be the same." Nearly all who contend for the doctrine of the Trinity maintain that God is essentially and from all eternity Three Persons, but if we use the word person in its original meaning, it will indicate character, office, function, temporarily assumed in time and can be spoken of as beginning, or being limited by time or space, of being subject, of suffering, dying, without intruding such conceptions into the realm of the Eternal, the Absolute or the Unconditional. Our problems begin when we transfer the idea of 'persons' from the realm of the manifest and the ages, to the realm of the timeless, the essential and the eternal. Reverting to the definitions given in Lloyds dictionary, we read:

(2) A human being represented in fiction or on the stage, a character.
(3) External appearance, bodily form or appearance, as in Hamlet—"If it assume my noble father's person".
(4) Human frame, body; as 'cleanly in person'.
(5) A human being; a being possessed of personality; a man, a human creature.
(6) A human being, as distinguished from an animal, or inanimate object.
(7) An individual; one, a man.
(8) A term applied to each of the beings in the Godhead.
(9) The parson or rector of a parish.

We have so lost the early meaning of the word 'person' that some of the arguments of the opening centuries of Christian discussion sound strange in our ears. We quote from The Incarnation of the Eternal Word by Rev. Marcus Dods without necessarily endorsing the writer's own attitude or argument:

> "I may give an illustration of the nicety with which expressions were then sifted, out of Facundus Hermianensis . . . . . In Book 1 chapter iii of the work which he addressed to the Emperor Justinian, he proves that a PERSON of the Trinity suffered for us. There were two ways of expressing this—unas de Trinitate passus est, one of the Trinity suffered, and una de Trinitate persona passa est, one PERSON of the Trinity suffered. At present a man would not readily discover any difference between these two modes of expression, nor would easily detect a nearer approach to heresy in the one than in the other. Yet the difference was clearly understood by Justinian; for while nobody felt any scruples about the latter expression (i.e. 'one of the PERSONS of the Trinity suffered') some Catholics hesitated to make use of the former (i.e. 'one of the Trinity suffered') lest they should be supposed to ascribe suffering, not to a DIVINE PERSON, but to the DIVINITY . . . . . A Nestorian would not say that one of the Trinity suffered, but would say readily enough, that a person of the Trinity suffered, meaning that the Man Jesus Christ Who suffered, bore the person of the Word, much in the same way as Paul bore it when he said 'If I forgave anything, to whom I forgave for your sakes, I forgave it in the person of Christ'."

We have quoted this extract simply to show that the word 'person' had the sense which we have endeavoured to restore in this article. We believe the application of this sense in the above extract is radically wrong.

Returning to the list of definitions given by Lloyd, we see that the emphasis is upon the assumed character and not essential being, except when the dictionary gives the usual theological usage and speaks of 'three beings' in the Godhead which must inevitably lead at last to the conception of 'three gods' however the fatal step is circumscribed. We must continue our examination of these vital themes in the next article of this series.

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS,

"I Tertius, who wrote this epistle, salute you in the Lord" (Rom. xvi. 22).

In this sixteenth chapter of Romans, the Apostle expresses his indebtedness to thirty-five fellow-helpers. In Phil. iv. we have the comforting assurance that the names of Paul's fellow-helpers are "in the book of life".

We feel that we may have been somewhat remiss in this matter, and take this belated opportunity of associating ourselves with all whose fellowship make The Berean Expositor possible and available.

> "I did the planting, Apollos did the watering, but it was God Who made the seed grow . . . . . We work together in God's service" (I Cor. iii. 6, 9 Moffatt).

The initial responsibility for the articles that have appeared during these fifty years is, of course, the responsibility of the Editor alone. But the MSS must be legible, and so is typewritten. The Scriptures references, punctuation, spelling must all be checked. The printer's proofs must be read and corrected, addresses of subscribers kept up to date, envelopes addressed, and parcels packed and posted. Bills must be paid, and accounts kept, while advertising must be planned and supervised. We are happy to say that all those who thus take part do so willingly and as fellow-members, looking to Christ from Whom as Head:

> "The entire Body is welded together and compacted by every joint with which it is supplied, the due activity of each part enables the Body to grow and build itself up in love."

May all our witness be conducted in this spirit.

Other Sheep
pp. 76, 77

> "So-and-so loaned us a copy of . . . . .'s magazine that contained a study of this problem, namely that the use of allos and heteros as defined by the Lexicon, made it impossible to believe that Gentiles could be referred to in John x. 16 as the 'other sheep', which you have so Scripturally showed to be hung on a flimsy thread, and were it not for your lesson, many sincere believers could be fooled."
> "Probably 99% of believers are not equipped, without your help, to come to the right answer. It seems to me that the great importance of your findings would make it a very profitable study in the Berean Expositor. Probably many people who read your magazine do not hear your tapes and may be on . . . . .'s mailing list."

It has been remarked more than once, that we do not fill the pages of the Berean Expositor with arguments for self-justification, and we are not stooping to that here. We have however a responsibility to our readers, and as we are unable to reply to correspondence that involves much time, we are perforce obliged either to let the matter go by default, or to use this means of dealing with the problem raised.

Recently a fellow-searcher after truth, with whom we have the friendliest relations, after exhibiting some occurrences of two Greek words which are translated 'other' namely allos and heteros, and after quoting from the lexicons that allos means 'other of the same kind', and heteros 'other of a different kind' made the following observation.

> "In the light of this positive evidence and sure knowledge of the inspiration of the Scriptures, it is inconceivable that the words 'the other sheep' (allos probata) in John x. 16 can be applied to the Gentiles. Had this been the case heteros would have undoubtedly been used."

With such confident and emphatic statements before them it is not surprising that some readers have been concerned as to the truth of this matter.''

In many articles in the past we have urged USAGE in line with the principle of I Cor. ii. 13, as over against man-made definitions; for the Lexicons are modern; the writers of Scripture had no need for their help.

Here are some quotations from the inspired Scriptures.

Matt. xiii. 5, 7, 8 compared with	Luke viii. 6, 7, 8:
Some (allos) fell . . . . . stony	Some (heteros) . . . . . rock
Some (allos) fell . . . . . thorns	Some (heteros) . . . . . thorns
Some (allos) fell . . . . . good	Some (heteros) . . . . . good

Do you say "This is inconceivable"?

In I Cor. xv. Paul actually speaks of the things that DIFFER and uses heteros twice in verse 40, but where he states that one star differs from another star he uses allos! Here the lexicon rule is reversed. Which is right? According to Matt. ii. 12 the wise men went 'another' way where allos is used, but Rahab is said to have sent the spies by 'another' way and here heteros is used (James ii. 25). Which way did they go? The wise men, however, did not consult a lexicon, so all was well. Matt. xix. 9 used allos, where Rom. vii. 3 uses heteros; is Matthew in error?

Among the proof texts that were submitted was one from John v. 32, where the reference is to the 'other' Comforter, namely the Holy Ghost, yet the same writer in the same chapter uses the same Greek word for another Who foreshadows the Antichrist! Does John contradict John?

Matt. xxv. 32, 33 definitely uses the word 'sheep' of the 'nations' and in the final regathering; Isa. xix. 23-25 demands that in that One Flock, there shall be Gentiles too.

Let us be thankful for the labours of learned men who have provided us with so many useful tools, but do not let us make lexicons our masters, nor try to put the living language of the Word of God into the strait-jacket of modern lexicography, but rather carefully note the usage of the "words which the Holy Ghost teacheth".

With His Stripes We Are Healed (Isa. liii. 5).
pp. 199, 200

With the New Testament in our hands, we do not need to attend faith-healing campaigns to believe that countless thousands were miraculously healed during the earthly ministry of the Saviour, at Pentecost and through the years covered by the Acts of the Apostles, alike by Peter and by Paul and in such churches as those that were of the same type as set forth in the first epistle to the Corinthians. Those sent forth to preach the near approach of the kingdom were commissioned to:

> "Heal the sick, cleanse the lepers raise the dead, cast out devils" (Matt. x. 8).

The Ascended Christ is seen, in Mark xvi. 15-20 "confirming the word with signs following"; "they shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover".

We often read accounts of healing ministry, and we do not doubt that in some cases the restoration to health has been genuine, but what we are asking is:

> "Do these cures, even if they are indeed genuine, do they fulfil the words of Isa. liii. 5 and I Pet. ii. 24?
>
> 'He was wounded for our transgressions,
> He was bruised for our iniquities;
> The chastisement of our peace was upon Him;
> And with His stripes we are healed' (Isa. liii. 5).
> 'Who His Own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree, that we being dead to sins, should live unto righteousness: by Whose stripes ye were healed' (I Pet. ii. 24)."

It will be observed that both Isaiah and Peter place "healing" in the same relationship to the Cross as our sins. Peter says "Ye were healed", and this raises a question of the first magnitude. Before ventilating this question, let us notice Peter's own explanation of a healing miracle. When the Apostle was questioned by the religious leaders of his day concerning the healing of the man who had been lame from birth, he said:

> "If we this day be examined of the good deed done to the impotent man, by what means he is made whole, Be it known unto you all, and to all the people of Israel, that by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, Whom ye crucified, Whom God raised from the dead doth this man stand here before you healed . . . . . neither is there THE SALVATION in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among man, whereby we must be saved" (Acts iv. 9-12).

The word "whole" in verse 9 is a translation of the Greek verb sozo, the word "salvation" in verse 12 is the Greek noun soteria, and the words "be saved" in this verse is once again the Greek verb sozo. In addition, the article "the" must be employed, "the Salvation" for Peter is comparing the immediate physical healing of the lame man, with "the Healing" or "the Salvation" of which the miraculous cure was but a type.

The critical questions which we now ask are: Where is the lame man now? Where is the man born blind, who was cured, as recorded in John ix.? Where is Lazarus, who was raised from the dead? Can we not re-word the question of Eccles. ii. 16, where he says "How dieth the wise man?" and the answer is "as the fool" for "one event" awaited both. Those who use Isa. liii. 5 as a proof text for the healing of the sick, can they ever point to one solitary example of anyone thus healed and say "This corruptible has put on incorruption", "This mortal has put on immortality", "Mortality has been swallowed up of life"? This is "the healing" of Isa. liii. 5 which is full, complete and undying, as is the deliverance from our transgressions and our iniquities. The "healings" of Pentecost were "signs", not the real and final "healing" of Calvary. The Hebrew Christians had "tasted of the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come", and this is what the healing miracles really were. Instead of avoiding or escaping the "groan" of creation, we read:

> "For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now, And not only they, but ourselves also which have the FIRST FRUITS of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves WAITING for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body" (Rom. viii. 22, 23).

The hope of resurrection is weakened not only by the doctrine of natural immortality and of the disembodied intermediate state, but by this transfer of the temporary sign gift of healing, the properties that belong to the standard set by the "no more" of Rev. xxi. 4.

EPHESIANS.

"To make all men see what is the dispensation of the Mystery"
(Eph. iii. 9, R.V.)

No.59. The Secret Chamber (iii. 1 - 13).

Proof provided in what Paul had "written afore".

pp. 1 - 5

We have considered the testimony of the Psalm titles and subscriptions as they bear upon the Mystery of Christ, and realize that if Psa. viii. be a pre-eminent portion of O.T. Scripture which contains a revelation of the mystery of Christ, as the LXX has it "The Secrets of the Son", then the use which Paul alone makes of the words 'all things under His feet' most certainly substantiates his claim to a fuller comprehension of this mystery than had been given to any who went before. The verse of Psa. viii. reads:

> "Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of Thy hands; Thou hast put all things under his feet" (Psa. viii. 6).

What is meant by 'all things' here is immediately explained:

> "All sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field; The fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas" (7, 8).

Here, the dominion is co-extensive with that given to Adam as recorded in Gen. i. 26. When however, we read what is written in the epistles of Paul on these words 'all things under His feet', his superior knowledge of the Mystery of Christ is fully substantiated. The Apostle refers to these words of Psa. viii. in three epistles, I Corinthians, Hebrews and Ephesians. Let us examine these passages and see how far he substantiates his claim to have attained to a fuller and richer understanding of the Mystery of Christ than those who went before him. The first reference is I Cor. xv. 24-28, which we will set out in structure form straight away.

I Cor. xv. 24 - 28

A | xv. 24-. The end.
  B | a | -24-. WHEN He delivers up the kingdom.
    b | -24. WHEN He abolishes all rule.
      c | 25-. FOR He must reign.
        d | -25. Till all enemies under His feet.
        d | 26. The last enemy; death abolished.
      c | 27-. FOR He hath put all things under His feet.
    b | -27. WHEN The one exception.
  a | 28-. WHEN The Son Himself subjected.
A | -28. That God may be all in all.

There is no word for 'cometh' in the original of verse 24; it simply reads "Then the end". Some understand the words to mean "Then the end rank", but we can find no justification for such a rendering. Cremer, in his note on to telos, says that this word does not primarily denote the end, termination, with reference to time, but the goal reached, the completion or conclusion at which anything arrives, either as issue or ending; or a result, acme, consummation, e.g., polemon telos, "victory" (literally 'the end of war', end, not measuring time but object); telos andros, 'the full age of man' (not the end of man—death), also of the 'ripening of seed'. In Luke i. 33 and Mark iii. 26 the idea of termination seems uppermost. The idea of issue, end, conclusion, is seen in Matt. xxvi. 58, "To see the end"; James v. 11, "Ye . . . . . have seen the end of the Lord"; I Pet. iv. 17, "What shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel?"

The idea of a goal reached is seen in Rom. vi. 21, "The end of those things is death"; Phil. iii. 19, "Whose end is destruction". So also II Cor. xi. 15; Heb. vi. 8. When the Apostle wrote the words of I Cor. xv. 24, "Then the end", what goal had he in view? What is the object of resurrection? Does it not take man back into the place intended for him in the Divine purpose, for which sin and death had for a while rendered him unfit? The goal, this end in view, is contained in the words of I Cor. xv. 28, "That God may be all in all". Although 'the end' is mentioned immediately after the resurrection of those that are Christ's at His parousia, it is not attained without a reign of righteousness and a rule of iron. The uninterrupted statement of the end is as follows:--

> "Then the end, when He shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father . . . . . with the object that God may be all in all."

The reader is aware, however, that the end is not attained in this unbroken sequence. The first 'when' is conditional upon the second. "When He shall have abolished all rule and all authority and power." This will not be effected by one grand miraculous stroke, but by the reign of Christ as King of kings. "For He must reign till He hath put all enemies under His feet." He reigns 'till', His reign has one supreme 'end', and that end cannot be reached while one unsubdued enemy exists.

In this category comes death, the last enemy of mortal man. "Even death, the last enemy, shall be abolished." This is included in the Divine purpose, "For He hath put all things under His feet". The resurrection is therefore absolutely essential to the fulfillment of the great purpose of God.

But it may be asked, Can such an expression as 'destroyed' or 'abolished' speak of resurrection? Take the statement of II Tim. ii. 10:

> "But is now made manifest by the manifestation of our Saviour Jesus Christ, Who hath abolished (katargeo) death, and illuminated life and incorruptibility through the gospel."

This refers to the Lord Himself in the first instance. He abolished death when He arose from the dead. Not only did He abolish death, but He commenced that destruction of all rule and power which He will carry through when He sits upon the throne of His glory:--

> "That through death He might destroy (katargeo) him that had the power of death, that is, the devil" (Heb. ii. 14).

Other passages illustrating the meaning of katargeo ('put down', 'destroyed' I Cor. xv. 24-26) are Rom. vi. 6; I Cor. ii. 6; II Cor. iii. 7; Eph. ii. 15; II Thess. ii. 8.

When we read 'all rule and all authority and power', we may be inclined to make too wide a sweep, but the corrective of I Cor. xv. 26 enables us to see that we are dealing with enemies. There are two distinct actions, and two distinct classes in view in these verses. The enemies are 'abolished', but others are 'subdued'. This word 'subdued' (hupotasso) is a cognate of tagma, 'order', 'rank' of verse 23, and looks to the perfect order and alignment that will characterize the kingdom of Christ. It is used even of Christ Himself in the words, "Then shall the Son also Himself be subject unto Him . . . . . that God may be all in all".

The first occurrence of the word is beautiful in its suggestiveness. That One of Whom it was prophesied that 'all things should be subjected beneath His feet' did not presume to act out of harmony with the Father's will for Him during His boyhood, for:

> "He came to Nazareth (with His parents), and was subject unto them" (Luke ii. 51).

In Rom. viii. 7 the two words 'enmity' and 'subjection' are seen to be irreconcilable:--

> "The carnal mind is enmity against God, for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be."

The word 'subject' involves the idea of a 'willing surrender'. All must come down in that day. Some by being 'abolished' or 'destroyed', others by a willing surrender like unto that of the Son of God Himself. In Rom. viii. 20 it is revealed that the creation become involuntarily subjected to vanity, and this cries aloud for that willing submission of all things to the true goal of all creation—Christ, the willingly submissive Son. The word is used in Phil. iii. 21, where the transforming of the body of humiliation is said to be according to the selfsame energy whereby He is able to subject all things to Himself. Surely this cannot include the power that destroys; it is foreign to the thought. Destruction or subjection is the idea of I Cor. xv.

While I Cor. xv. is mainly concerned with the human phase of the great purpose of God, as expressed in the words 'in Adam', nevertheless the reference to 'all rule and all authority and power' goes beyond the sphere of Adam. Before the Son delivers up the kingdom, all rule, authority and power will be abolished (arche, exousia, dunamis). These are the principalities and powers of Col. i. 16 and Eph. i. 21. They are linked with death in the closing verses of Rom. viii., over which the believer even now is more than conqueror. Eph. vi. reveals that the church of the One Body has principalities and powers among its spiritual enemies, and yet Col. i. 16-20 shows that some principalities and powers will be reconciled. Once again we are forced to see that the reign of Christ before 'the end' is reached will be a process of discrimination. Some will be 'destroyed', others will be 'reconciled', and when all enemies will have been abolished and all the redeemed and unfallen brought into perfect line (subjection carries with it the idea of perfect order and harmony) with the great Archtype of all, then 'the end' is reached and God will be all in all.

While much more should be written if an exposition of I Cor. xv. were our subject, sufficient has been placed before the reader, we trust, to justify the claim of the Apostle that he had received a fuller revelation of 'the mystery of Christ' than had been given to the sons of men in earlier days. We now turn to the second chapter of the epistle to the Hebrews, where Psa. viii. once more has a prominent place, and first of all we will set out the structure:

Hebrews ii. 5 - 18

A1 | 5-8-. Not Angels. | a | A little lower than angels.
b | Crowned with glory and honour.
B1 | -8. But now we see not.
B1 | 9-. But we see Jesus.
A1 | -9-. Jesus. | a | A little lower than angels.
b | Crowned with glory and honour.
C | -9, 10. The Captain Archegon. |
c | It became Him.
d | Perfect . . . sufferings.

A2 | 11-13. All of one, sanctified, brethren.
B2 | 14. Flesh and blood, took part, destroy, death.
B2 | 15, 16. Seed of Abraham, took not angels, deliver . . . death.
A2 | 17-. Made like to brethren.
C | -17, 18. High Priest Archierus. |
c | It behoved Him.
d | Suffer . . . tempted.

"The world to come" here is oikoumene 'the habitable world" found already in Heb. i. 6, and used of the Roman Empire (Luke ii. 1; Acts xxiv. 5), and in the LXX of the Babylonian Empire (Isa. xiv. 17), and in secular writings of Alexander's Empire (Ælitan V.H. iii. 29).

Oikoumene occurs 3 times in the book of Revelation, namely chapters iii. 10; xii. 9 and xvi. 14. It is evident from these passages that the Apostle is here exhibiting another advance in the knowledge of the mystery of Christ, showing that 'all things under His feet' envisage the glorious fulfillment of O.T. prophecy and the entrance into full privilege of the ancient people of Israel. The association of the 'world to come' with the setting aside of angels suggests that there is a glance to the earlier administration of this world before its overthrow and the creation of Adam. It will be observed that in Heb. ii. 8 we find a parallel mode of interpretation to that already seen in I Cor. xv. 27 and this of itself is a strong witness to the Pauline authorship of the epistle to the Hebrews. In I Cor. xv. 'all' includes enemies which are to be 'destroyed'. In Heb. ii., it is the Devil, the holder of the power of death that is destroyed. From the dispensational point of view, the hope and calling of Hebrews necessitated the statement 'we see not yet all things under His feet' but from the dispensational view point of Ephesians this limitation is excluded. At the very same time that the Apostle could say 'we see not yet' he could say:

> "And hath put all things under His feet, and gave Him to be the head over all things to the Church, which is His body" (Eph. i. 22, 23).

Universal headship has not yet been taken by the Saviour, but He IS NOW Head over 'all things' TO THE CHURCH. The very parenthetical nature of the dispensation of the Mystery, makes it possible to see all things under His feet here and now, yet to say in Heb. ii. 'we see not yet all things under His feet'. I Cor. xv. and Heb. ii. refer to Adam, either in type or by name. Ephesians does not quote Psa. viii. so fully, and Adam is not named. The earlier epistles (I Cor. and Heb.) do not go back further than Adam, who was created in the image of God, whereas Ephesians goes back before the overthrow of the world to Him in Whose 'Image' Adam himself was created. The claim of Paul to have received a fuller and richer revelation of the Mystery of Christ is most clearly made good by the way in which he was inspired to expand the dominion enumerated in Psa. viii. as 'all sheep and oxen' to include all principality and power, throne and dominion. To the unbiased reader Paul will have substantiated his claim, but even inspired truth can be rendered void by tradition, bias and prejudice.

No.60. The Secret Chamber (iii. 1 - 13).

What is a "Joint-Body"? (iii. 6).

pp. 21 - 24

Much controversy and confusion has arisen out of the failure to discern between "The Mystery", and the "Mystery of Christ" in Eph. iii. 4-8. We extract this member from the structure in order that this distinction shall be recognized.

C | Two Mysteries and Two Ministries. |
d | 4. Mystery of CHRIST.
e | 5-. Apostles and Prophets (plural).
f | -5, 6. The Mystery. |
g | In Spirit (sphere).
h1 | Joint-heirs.
h2 | Joint-body.
h3 | Joint-partakers.
g | In Christ (sphere).
e | 7, 8-. Paul alone (singular).
d | -8. Unsearchable riches of Christ.

The subject matter of the Mystery of Christ is capable of comparison "Which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men as it is now revealed unto His holy apostles and prophets" (Eph. iii. 5). The subject matter of the Mystery is not capable of similar comparison "The mystery which hath been hid from ages and from generations, but is now made manifest to His saints" (Col. i. 25-27). If the two statements of the Apostle speak of the same thing, then we must admit a contradiction into the Scriptures. The A.V. has veiled the truth by translating the Greek word genea 'ages' in Eph. iii. 5, and 'generations' in Col. i. 26. The moment these translations are made to agree, the distinction between the two mysteries becomes apparent. The mystery of Christ WAS made known in other GENERATIONS; the Mystery was NOT, for it was HID from ages and from GENERATIONS. It is this Mystery which Paul claims to have been revealed exclusively to him:

> "Whereof I was made a minister, according to the dispensation of God which is given me to youward . . . . . even the mystery" (Col. i. 25, 26).

The fact that the Apostle uses the title 'the sons of men' to indicate those to whom a partial unveiling of the mystery of Christ was made known, seems intentional in order that the higher type of ministry 'His holy apostles and prophets' should be thereby seen to advantage. The A.V. makes the words 'by the Spirit' follow the reference to the Apostles and prophets, as though to teach us how the revelation was made known to them. The universal witness of the Scriptures is so definite that 'Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost' that one may pardon a moment's indecision and ask why it seemed necessary for believers like the Ephesians to put this note in here at all? Immediately we refer to the original and read en pneumati, our minds travel back to the same two words with which chapter ii. closes, there translated 'through the Spirit'. When examining these words in article No.52 of this series, we noted the four occurrences of the phrase en pneumati in Rev. i. 10; iv. 2; xvii. 3; xxi. 10, and also saw an intended contrast between the sphere 'in spirit' of Eph. ii. 22, with the realm indicated in the same chapter as 'in the flesh' and 'in the world'. So, when we come to the end of Eph. iii. 5, we must allow the words en pneumati to stand as a heading of the newly-revealed constitution of the church "Joint-heirs", etc., which is balanced at the close by the words en Christo Jesou. This correspondence we have noted in the structure.

An illustration of the use of a word to introduce a new section of a book is provided by Dan. ii. 4:

> "Then spake the Chaldeans to the King in Syriack."

If this simply meant that the Chaldeans spoke their native tongue there seems little reason for the information, for generally Hebrews speak Hebrew, Chaldeans speak Syriack, Greeks speak Greek. When, however, we discover that the remainder of the chapter, together with every chapter up to the end of chapter vii., is written not in Hebrew but in Syriack, we realize that it was not to tell us that the Chaldeans spoke their native tongue, but that a new section of the prophecy here commenced which Daniel wrote in Syriack. So in Eph. iii. 5 "in Spirit" governs the statement that follows. That statement we must now consider:

> "That (in spirit) the Gentiles should be fellow heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of His promise in Christ by the gospel" (Eph. iii. 6).

We are here immediately faced with the problem of interpretation. The one pre-fix sun 'together with' is used three times, sunkleronoma, sussoma, sunmetocha, yet the A.V. translates these three words FELLOW heirs, OF THE SAME body, and PARTakers. In one word sun is translated 'fellow', in the next word it is rendered 'of the same' and in the third case it is not translated at all except it be by the word 'part'. Moffatt translates co-heirs and co-partners, but falls down over sussoma rendering it 'companions', which is very wide off the mark. We must preserve the threefold use of sun. The R.V. gets over the difficulty by rendering the three words "fellow heirs, and fellow members of the body, and fellow partakers" which while it has the merit of preserving the three occurrences of the preposition sun, adds to the Apostle's words the word 'member' which is questionable. Rotherham, in his Emphasized New Testament reads "Joint heirs, and a joint body and joint partakers" which is found also in J. N. Darby's translation. Possibly this is as near to the original as our English language will permit, but even so, the translation sets us a problem, for what is a joint body? The essential characteristic of a 'body' is that it has many members, each differing from the other in function and importance. Such a body can provide an analogy for a spiritual company, and this analogy is employed by the Apostle in I Cor. xii. where the different members are indicated. The Ancients who were not limited to the English language, have revealed their difficulty to express the Greek word sussoma adequately. Jerome renders the word in the Latin Vulgate by concorporates and says:

> "I know that in Latin it makes an ugly sentence. But because it stands in the Greek, and because every word and syllable and stroke and point in the Divine Scriptures is full of meaning, I prefer the risks of verbal malformation to the risk of missing the sense."

We believe all true Bereans will endorse these sentiments. One expositor has used this word 'concorporate' but it is not in common use.

> "In relation to the Body the members are 'incorporate': in relation to one another they are 'concorporate' that is sharers in the one Body" (J. Armitage Robinson, D.D.).

Here then, with the advent of the dispensation of the Mystery, a church came into existence so different from any that had gone before, as to call for the coining of a word, and the figure which that word conjures up in the mind is that of a body never seen or known on earth. No one has ever seen a body in which every member was on absolutely equal terms as any other, but we have already been reminded that this body is only possible 'in Spirit'. Nothing like this can be discovered before the Middle Wall went down, and that wall was not removed until Acts xxviii. In the flesh, Israel can brook no peer (c.f. The olive tree in Rom. xi.); only 'in Spirit' can such an equality be possible.

Another correction is called for when using the A.V. Eph. iii. 7 reads "Whereof I was made a minister", and the commencing of a fresh verse with these words may prevent the reader from realizing that they are an integral part of the preceding passage. It is not the full truth to say that in this new company the Gentiles are joint partakers of His promise in Christ by the Gospel, the complete statement is that the Gentiles were joint partakers of His promise in Christ by the Gospel WHEREOF PAUL HAD BEEN MADE A MINISTER. When writing late to Timothy, the Apostle adds a similar rider, he does not simply say to Timothy:

> "Remember that Jesus Christ of the seed of David was raised from the dead" (II Tim. ii. 8), that would be a salutary word indeed, for without the resurrection all are without hope. Paul was more incisive and exclusive; what he did say was:

> "Remember that Jesus Christ of the seed of David was raised from the dead ACCORDING TO MY GOSPEL: WHEREIN I SUFFER . . . . . unto bonds" (II Tim. ii. 8, 9).

The same Saviour and the same Resurrection provides Peter's Gospel with blessed assurance of the fulfillment of the promises made to David concerning his THRONE (Acts ii. 24-30). The same Saviour and the same Resurrection has taken us "far above all . . . . . thrones" as we have seen in Eph. i. 19-23. The Gentiles members of this "Body" do not inherit and share 'promises', they share on equal terms "His promise", and that found in the gospel entrusted to Paul alone. These believers do not share the promise of the Father (Luke xxiv. 49; Acts i. 4; ii. 33). These joint partakers do not take to themselves the promise of Acts ii. 39. These fellow heirs do not inherit the promises made unto 'the fathers', and which were confirmed during the earthly ministry of Christ (Rom. xv. 8). They are concerned with 'the promise of life' which antedates the beginning of the ages (II Tim. i. 1, 9; Titus i. 2, 3). The seal which they have received is "the Holy Spirit of promise" not 'of the promises' (Eph. i. 13) for they were, while in the flesh, "strangers from the covenants of promise" (Eph. ii. 12). The teaching of Eph. iii. 6 is not that the unequal partnership that existed between the Jewish believer and the Gentile believer has been exchanged so that the Gentile now enters into the promises, originally held so exclusively by the Jew, on equal terms. No, the teaching is that a new promise is brought to light, a promise that Abraham never knew, a new man has been created, and into that new company and concerning that one new promise no one has precedence over another, the membership of this Body is 'concorporate' and the partaking of the promise found in the Gospel preached by Paul the Prisoner, is a 'joint partaking'. The new company as Paul wrote to the Colossians is 'a new Man' and it is 'created' not 'evolved' from the period covered by the Acts.

> "Where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free; but Christ is all, and in all" (Col. iii. 11).

The claim of the Apostle to have received a new dispensation, together with a special gospel, we must consider further, but this must occupy our attention in subsequent articles.

The following extract from an article contributed to The Palestine Exploration Quarterly for Jan.-April 1953 by Sir J. L. Myres, writing on the relationship of Persia, Greece and Israel and particularly dealing with the concept of the POLIS or City, has a note that may prove suggestive to the reader after studying the threefold fellowship of Eph. iii. 6:

> "Fundamental principles of such an association of hereditary groups, not originally or necessarily related by blood, were
>
> ISONOMAI, equality of assignment in material and social amenities,
> ISEGORIA, equality of utterance,
> ISOTELEIA, equality of function and responsibility.
>
> The results was literally ELEUTHERIA, 'grown-up-ness' (to translate the Greek word for freedom); every member was his own master, so long as he was master of himself, of his own behaviour (that is) toward the others."

Unsearchable Riches.

pp. 41 - 43

With the opening words of Eph. iii., the Apostle has used extraordinary language, and made exceedingly high claims. His prison is not described in terms of bondage or affliction, but as of a place of signal honour. He claims to have received the highest stewardship revealed in the Scriptures, namely the Mystery, and supports that claim by an appeal to his superior knowledge of the associated mystery of Christ, which the sons of men in earlier days saw but dimly in comparison. The threefold fellowship of this Mystery which was revealed through him is unlike anything before made known, and he declared that he had been made a minister of this special set of good news, according to a gift of grace, and inworking of Divine power.

Knowing the Apostle as we do by acquaintance with his other epistles, we are not surprised at the sudden change introduced by verse 8. He still says 'unto me' as he did in verses 2, 4 and 7, but now he continues "Unto me . . . . . less than the least of all saints". Whenever great feeling influences human language, we generally find the speaker or writer resorting to figures of speech. Two such figures can be seen in the writing of the Apostle here. First, the figure known as Meiosis or a Belittling, "By this figure one thing is diminished in order to increase another thing" (Dr. E. W. Bullinger, Figures of Speech). Examples of this figure are found in both the Old and New Testaments, 'dust and ashes' (Gen. xviii. 27), 'as grasshoppers' (Numb. xiii. 33), 'unprofitable' (Phile. 11). The other figure discernible here is called Oxymoron or wise-folly. "This is a figure in which what is said at first sight appears to be foolish, yet when we come to consider it, we find it exceedingly wise" (Figures of Speech). "Stripping" the naked of their "clothing" (Job. xxii. 6); "When I am weak, then am I strong" (II Cor. xii. 10) are examples from each Testament.

> "Eph. iii. 8 'Less than the least of all saints'. This pleasing oxymoron emphasizes the Apostle's growth in grace (i.e. in his knowledge of what grace was to him, and what it had done for him). Before this (in 60A.D.), he said: I was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles (II Cor. xi. 5). In 62A.D., he could say he was 'less than the least of all saints', while later than this (67A.D.), his knowledge of God's grace made him see himself as 'the chief of sinners'. (I Tim. i. 15, 16)" (Figures of Speech).

It must not be thought that, by employing a figure of speech, the speaker is superficial; it is we who note the figure, but at the time, the speaker is too deeply moved to be conscious of the particular mould into which his language falls. Here, in Eph. iii. 8, the Apostle means every word he said even though, by mathematics and logic one could prove that it is impossible to be "less" than the 'least'. Shakespeare knew this for a basic truth of human nature when he employed the same figure in the words 'The most unkindest cut of all'. When Paul came to write subsequently to Timothy, the same sensitiveness is evident:

> "According to the glorious gospel of the blessed God, which was committed to my trust. And I thank Christ Jesus our Lord, Who hath enabled me, for that he counted me faithful, putting me into the ministry; who was before a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious: but I obtained mercy, because I did it ignorantly in unbelief" (I Tim. i. 11-13).

It is this deepening sense of personal unworthiness in the presence of increasing trust, that made the Apostle, in his closing epistles, add the word 'mercy' in his salutation (I Tim. i. 2; II Tim. i. 2; Titus i. 4), epistles written not to the church, but to fellow servants. When the Apostle once more says 'that I should preach', the emphasis is not on "I", but on the wondrous grace that could stoop to use so earthen a vessel. There is, too, another side to this. However humble a man may be, however, sincerely he may protest his unworthiness, no personal opinions either of himself or others can alter or minimize in the slightest degree a trust that has been given, a call made, a stewardship granted. The Paul who could not, and would not magnify himself, did most rightly "magnify" his 'office' (Rom. xi. 13). Even though he was not meet to be called an apostle (I Cor. xv. 9) he could also say:

> "I suppose I was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles" (II Cor. xi. 5).

On either side of the opening words of Eph. iii. 7, 8 are the words 'gift' and 'grace'.

> "According to the gift of the grace of God > (Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints) > is this grace given", and it is in virtue of this gift that Paul can stress with all emphasis, yet with all humility, the extraordinary nature of his apostleship and ministry. He returns, after this momentary pause, to the thing that mattered most, the substance of the message entrusted to him.

> "That I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ" (Eph. iii. 8).

In addition to the emphatic "I" and the repeated reference to 'the Gentiles', the Mystery and its peculiar theme is given a new title 'the unsearchable riches of Christ'.

That they are riches, yea exceeding riches both of grace and of glory, the two chapters already studied bear testimony. There we have read of 'riches of grace', 'riches of glory' and of 'exceeding riches of grace' (Eph. i. 7, 18; ii. 7). These riches are concerned with redemption, with hope and inheritance and with the glory of the future ages. The Apostle once more uses the word riches, but this time prefaced by an unusual word, 'unsearchable'. Moffatt translates the passage 'the fathomless wealth of Christ', which has the merit of bringing to the reader's mind something that is 'past finding out', something extending beyond the usual. Anexichniastos is a compound of a negative, ex out and ichnos a footstep, not to be traced out, untraceable, leaving not a footmark behind.

> "Thy way is in the sea, and Thy path in the great waters, and Thy footsteps (ichne) are not known" (Psa. lxxvii. 19).

This reference, if it does nothing else, shows that it is not only futile, but unbelieving to search the O.T Scriptures for the teaching of the Mystery, seeing that God has purposely avoided leaving a 'trace'.

> "God . . . . . which doeth great things and unsearchable" (Job v. 9).
> "Which doeth great things past finding out" (Job ix. 10).

The Hebrew word used in these passages of Job is cheqer. This word comes from root meaning 'to dig'. The word is found in Job xi. 7 where Zophar asks the question "Canst thou by searching find out God?" A similar word ragal is used for 'spying out' a land in Judges xviii. 2. What a blessing it is that no spies can return with an evil report concerning our inheritance for our blessings are 'unsearchable riches'. The mystery of Christ, which was made known in other generations to the sons of men, were 'searchable' and this 'searching' was among the qualities that so commended the Bereans (Acts xvii. 11), and which exercised the hearts of the prophets themselves (I Pet. i. 10) and was either commanded (search), or commended (ye search), by the Saviour Himself (John v. 39). These riches therefore belong to another category; they are unsearchable riches. They come from the same treasury of truth, they belong to the same great purpose of the ages as we shall see, but they have been kept in reserve until the defection of Israel made the gap which these unsearchable riches were foreordained to fill. In other words they are 'the Mystery'. The phase 'that I should preach' is balanced in the next verse by the words 'And to make all men see', "among the Gentiles" being echoed by "all men"; and the 'unsearchable riches' being put in correspondence with the Mystery which had been 'hid in God'. These added items are too important merely to form an appendix to the present article. They demand the fullest consideration, and accordingly we hope to devote all the space available in our next issue to Eph. iii. 9-13.

No.62. The Secret Chamber (iii. 1 - 13).

A ministry of, and by, grace (iii. 2 and 7).

pp. 61 - 64

The three most wonderful characteristics of the church of the Mystery as set forth in verse 3 with its emphasis upon equality in inheritance, in membership of the One Body, and of partaking in the promise, are referred to both in the words 'In Spirit', 'In Christ Jesus' and 'by the gospel'. Here we have the sphere in which these blessings are enjoyed, and the instrument by which they were introduced and presented. This leads us to the fact, not always appreciated as it should be, that the word 'gospel' covers a wider range of truth, than is covered by the conception of our initial deliverance from sin or the passing from death unto life. To enumerate but a few. We have "The gospel of the Kingdom" (Matt. iv. 23), but Peter's attitude to the Lord's own prophecy of His approaching death, as made manifest in Matt. xvi., shows that salvation as we understand the term was not then in sight. Those to whom the Apostle addresses his epistle to the Romans were saved people 'called saints' and 'beloved of God'. He spoke of the mutual faith both of you and me, yet to this same company he said:

> "So, as much as in me is, I am ready to preach the gospel to you that are at Rome also" (Rom. i. 15), which suggests a fuller content than the initial gospel of forgiveness. Again, he told this church that when he did at length come to them, he hoped to come "in the fullness . . . . . of the gospel of Christ" (Rom. xv. 29).

We have in Ephesians both 'the gospel of your salvation' and the 'gospel of peace' which is associated with the whole armour of God. Again, the title 'The glorious gospel of Christ' of II Cor. iv. 4 can read 'The gospel of the glory of Christ', a message that goes beyond the initial deliverance from sin. And again in I Tim. i. 11 we could translate the passage 'The gospel of the glory of the happy (makarios, not eulogetos) God'. So, when Paul links the most peculiar constitution of the church of the Mystery with the gospel which had been entrusted to him, he intends the special 'good news' or 'glad tidings' which the new revelation brought to the erstwhile far off Gentiles. So is it also with the word 'preach' in Eph. ii. 17, the preaching of 'peace' was a preaching to believers, it was to 'far off and nigh' dispensationally. In like manner Paul claimed the distinctive honour of preaching 'the unsearchable riches of Christ' (Eph. iii. 8). Of this gospel, the Apostle says he became a 'minister'.

There are three words that are translated 'minister' in the N.T. diakonos, leitourgos and huperetes, and some eight or nine words for the verb 'to minister'. Huperetes, means an 'under rower', one who had a most dangerous and degrading position, often chained to the oar and to the bench of a Greek galley. It came into more general use as descriptive of a subordinate, either of a law court officer, of a rich man's servant, or an official of the Sanhedrin or of the synagogue. The word is used of Paul in Acts xxvi. 16 and

I Cor. iv. 1, and both in connection with some phase of special service. Leitourgos is employed in the O.T. only of the priests and the Levites, but in the N.T. the terms is used of magistrates, of angels, and of Christ Himself, as well as of Paul in Rom. xv. 16. Diakonos, the word used in Eph. iii. 7 becomes in English the word 'deacon' and the verb is found in Acts vi. 2 where we read of serving tables, and of Paul when he took the contributions made by the Gentile churches 'to minister' unto the saints at Jerusalem (Rom. xv. 25), and most graciously by the Saviour of Himself in Matt. xx. 28, where His ministry involved giving His life a ransom of many. The noun diakonia is used of Martha (Luke x. 40), and when Paul in Rom. xi. 13 said 'I magnify mine office', this is the word used. What a range of service is covered by this word! Martha's service at the one end and the Saviour's at the other. Diakonos is found seven times in the Prison Epistles, once translated 'deacon' (Eph. iii. 7; vi. 21; Phil. i. 1; Col. i. 7, 23, 25; iv. 7). Three of these occurrences refer to Paul's exclusive ministry of the Mystery:

> "Whereof I was made a minister" (Eph. iii. 7).
> "I Paul was made a minister" (Col. i. 23).
> "Whereof I am made a minister" (Col. i. 25).

When we were considering Eph. iii. 3 we found that the Apostle used the word kata 'according to revelation', and now he declares that he was made a minister of this special truth "according to the gift of the grace of God given me by (literally according to) the effectual working of His power" (Eph. iii. 7). How are we to understand "The gift of grace"? Some, with Ellicott, see in this the apostolic office, others with Alford see that it is grace that was the gift of God, as the next verse declares 'is this grace given'. Something of the steps of the Apostle's argument and the correspondence of the two references to the gift of grace can be seen if set out thus:

A | The gospel (evangelion) whereof I was made a minister.
  B | According to the gift of the grace of God.
    C | Given unto me by the effectual working of His power.
    C | Unto me, who am less than the least.
  B | Is this grace given.
A | That I should preach (evangelizo) the unsearchable riches.

There can be no doubt but that the preaching of the unsearchable riches of Christ has to do with the Mystery, and the correspondence of the passage helps to confirm the feeling that the earlier reference to the gospel also is closely related to making it known. The Greek reader would be conscious of a connection between the words 'promise' and 'gospel', which is not obvious to the English reader. Promise, in the Greek is epangelia, gospel is evangelion, both compounds of the same root word meaning a 'message'. Whatever gospel Paul preached, we know that it was only by the grace of God that he originally learned its glorious message, and that he received continuing grace to make it known. Here he actually says so in no uncertain terms:

> "Whereof I was made a minister, according to the gift of the grace of God given unto me by the effectual working of His power" (Eph. iii. 7).

Both the words ‘gift’ and ‘grace’ preclude human merit or mere attainment. Dorea is used in Acts ii. 38; viii. 20; x. 45 and xi. 17 for the special enduement with Holy Spirit that was characteristic of Pentecostal times. In Paul’s witness this is only used once of such gifts, namely in Heb. vi. 4, the other references (Rom. v. 15, 17; II Cor. ix. 15; Eph. iv. 7), speaking of the grace of God in salvation and without special reference to gifts as such. The form dorean which occurs nine times, and translated ‘freely’, ‘without a cause’, ‘in vain’ and ‘for nought’ the more emphasizes the freeness of the grace thus bestowed.

Charis ‘grace’ is a term that is very characteristic of the ministry of Paul. James uses the word twice, Peter twelve times, the epistles of John, Jude, the Revelation four times between them, the gospels twelve times and the Acts sixteen times, whereas Paul uses the word one hundred and ten times in his epistles! The distribution of the word ‘grace’ in Ephesians is as follows:

Charis* (grace).

A | i. 2. Grace to you.—Salutation.
B | i. 6. Grace exhibited in salvation.
a | i. 7. Riches. Redemption.
b | ii. 5. Saved.
a | ii. 7. Riches in ages to come.
b | ii. 8. Saved.
C | iii. 2. Dispensation of the grace of God.
B | Grace manifest in service.
a | iii. 7. According to gift of grace.
b | iii. 8. Grace given to preach.
a | iv. 7. According to . . . . . gift of Christ.
b | iv. 29. Grace ministered to hearers.
A | vi. 24. Grace with all.—Benediction.

How truly does the divine arrangement of this word emphasize its place and importance. No salvation is complete without it, and the very benediction is enriched by it. It runs through the whole fabric of redemption, covering the ages past and to come with its unction. It gives its name to the special dispensation committed to the Apostle Paul, marking it off as pre-eminently one of grace. It vitalizes the outcome of redemption, namely service, being as much a necessity for the inspired and gifted Apostle while preaching the Word, as for the individual believer in his everyday conversation.

While grace and works belong to two very different categories, as Rom. xi. 6 will make very clear, grace can and should lead to works, even as Eph. ii. 8-10 has already demonstrated. So the gift of grace given to the Apostle had not been bestowed in vain, as he declared:

> “But by the grace of God I am what I am and His grace which was bestowed upon me was not in vain: but I laboured more abundantly than they all: yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me” (I Cor. xv. 10).

"By the effectual working of His power" Moffatt translates "By the energy of His power", which recognizes the presence of the Greek word energeia. This word is found only in Paul's epistles, and as follows. The faith of the inworking of God, associating the believer with the mighty power of resurrection now (Eph. i. 19; Col. ii. 12), and lastly, the Satanic travesty, with its corresponding retributive justice in connection with the apostasy of the last days (II Thess. ii. 9, 11). The word energeo 'to inwork and energize' occurs four times in Ephesians thus:

PURPOSE. "According to the purpose of Him Who worketh all things after the counsel of His own will" (i. 11).
FAITH. "His power to usward who believe . . . . . which He wrought in Christ when He raised Him from the dead" (i. 20).
DISOBEDIENCE. "The spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience" (ii. 2).
FULNESS. "Now unto Him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us" (iii. 20).

What a full parenthesis this chapter of Ephesians is, started as it was by the claim made by the Apostle to having received a peculiar ministry associated with his imprisonment. Yet there is more to be considered before this great claim concerning the Mystery and the Gentiles is fully vindicated. This, which is contained in the six verses that follow, will occupy our wondering attention as we study its wording and its implications next time.

No.63. The Secret Chamber (iii. 1 - 13).

The Mystery and the principalities and powers (iii. 10).

pp. 81 - 84

We have seen that the unsearchable riches of Christ, which Paul was commissioned to preach among the Gentiles, were associated with the Mystery hid in God and revealed for the first time to him as the prisoner of Christ Jesus. We pick up the thread of the argument in Eph. iii. 9, where we read "And to make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery". In article No.54 we discussed the revised reading 'dispensation' instead of 'fellowship' here, and now take the revised reading for granted. Ellicott's note is "The reading koinonia 'fellowship' has only the support of cursive MSS and is a mere explanatory gloss". 'To make all men see' kai photisai pantas. The literal translation of these words must evidently be 'and to enlighten all', photisai being a part of the verb photizo.

There are four references to 'light' in Ephesians, and one of them tells us that 'whatsoever doth make manifest is light' (Eph. v. 13). In Colossians where the same theme as that of Eph. iii. 1-13 is being unfolded, we read concerning the Mystery which had been hid 'but now is made manifest to His saints' (Col. i. 26). Here we have the same word 'make manifest' phaneroo, that is used in Eph. v. 13, and the same word

'hid' apokrupto that is found in Eph. iii. 9 and in Col. i. 26, together with the same words 'dispensation', 'minister' and 'mystery'. This close comparison will enable us to perceive the extent of the Apostle's range when he said 'to make all men see'. First of all, there is no word for 'men' here and 'all' must be defined, it cannot be intended to be universal. In Colossians 'the riches of the glory of this mystery', so evidently parallel with 'the unsearchable riches' of Eph. iii. 8, are made known 'among the Gentiles' (Col. i. 27). In Colossians these words 'among the Gentiles' are but another way of saying 'to His saints' (Col. i. 26), consequently, the 'all' of Eph. iii. 9 must refer to 'saints' from among the 'Gentiles' and not all men indiscriminately. The only other occurrence of photizo in Ephesians is in chapter i. 18, where the verb appears as a perfect, passive, and should read:

apparently something that must be taken for granted in those for whom the Apostle made this prayer for increased knowledge. The light may shine in darkness, but the darkness may not comprehend it and the understanding of the Gentile we learn was 'darkened' (Eph. iv. 18). Only by redeeming grace were these Gentiles delivered from the authority of darkness (Col. i. 13), and so, while we make no reservations, and while we use great plainness of speech, we shall only be asking for disappointment if we believe that men will immediately respond, or that great numbers will receive the revelation made known through the Apostle Paul. The enlightenment in view here is as to 'what is the dispensation of the mystery'. It may be objected upon reading this, that in the preceding verses, the Apostle has already 'made known' both the fact and the peculiar character of this new dispensation, but this confuses the making of a thing known, and the illuminated understanding that can perceive what is made known. Paul may plant and Apollos may water, Paul may preach and the Berean Expositor may supplement with articles on Ephesians, but God alone can give the increase, and the necessary illumination. Strictly speaking a mystery can only be known by initiation.

This dispensation of the Mystery is said to have been hid in God from the beginning of the world. The words 'from the beginning of the world' are in the Greek apo ton aionon 'from or since the ages'. Now this particular calling goes back to 'before the foundation or overthrow of the world' and to 'before the world began' (II Tim. i. 9) which in the Greek reads pro chronon aionion 'before times of ages'. In each of these passages, including Titus i. 2 where the reference is to 'from' and 'before' the ages, we find the Apostle using either the words or their equivalent 'but now is made manifest' and that through his own peculiar ministry. The truth was not only hid but 'hid in God'. Even if we look upon the preposition en as a preposition of agency and translate 'hid by God', the effectual hiding of this mystery is unimpaired.

> "Who created all things by Jesus Christ" (Eph. iii. 9).

The Revised Text omits the words 'by Jesus Christ' which Alford says are 'apparently a doctrinal addition'.

> "The exact reason for this particular designation being here appended to Theo has been somewhat differently estimated" (Ellicott).

First we can understand that anyone who could conceive the Mystery, and keep it in perfect silence since the ages began, must have complete control of time, space and individuals, both angelic and human. Who could this be but One, even the Creator?

> "The stress is on ta panta 'the all things'." (Alford).

Why is the stress placed upon these words, and what do they mean? In John i. 2 we read 'all things were made by Him', where the Greek word 'all' is panta and means the whole creation. In Col. i. 16 we read 'by Him were all things created . . . . . all things were created by Him' and in verse 20 'to reconcile all things unto Himself', here the Greek is ta panta 'the all things'. Do these expressions mean just one and the same thing, or is there an intended and essential difference? Pursuing our reading in Colossians we come to chapter iii. 11 where we read that 'the all things' (ta panta) and 'in all things' (en pasi) is Christ. So in Eph. i. 10 it is not 'all things' universally but 'the all things' that are gathered together under one Head (anakephalaiomai); it is 'the all things' that work together after the counsel of His will (i. 11); it is panta, all things universally both good and evil, that are put under His feet (i. 22, 23), and it is over panta, all things universally, that He has been made Head for the sake of His church, that church which is His Body, the fullness of Him that filleth 'all' (ta panta) in all. All things without reserve are made to work together for good, but it is 'the all things' (not the evil as well as the good) that are 'freely given us' with the gift of Christ (Rom. viii. 28, 32). Where Christ is set forth as 'God blessed unto the ages' (Rom. ix. 5) no limitation is intended—here evil as well as good 'all things' in their widest significance are intended. In Rom. xi. 33-36 dispensational limitations must be observed—here 'all things' are limited and once again it is ta panta that is found here. The scribe who slipped in the words 'by Jesus Christ' at the end of Eph. iii. 9 may have been giving expression to the fact that a special section of creation was here in view, and if so, it appears that he had recognized the meaning of the words ta panta. This is not all however. Verse 10 flows out of verse 9, the phrase 'to the intent that' links in a logical sequence the creation specified in verse 9 with the choice of the church as a vehicle of knowledge to principalities and powers in heavenly places. Let us set the passages out to show this connection.

> "The dispensation of the mystery . . . . . hidden . . . . . God Who created all things IN ORDER THAT NOW might be made known to principalities and powers in the heavenly places the manifold wisdom of God, according to the purpose of the ages . . . . ."

Here we are taken right back to the beginning, where creation and purpose are seen together, where the Mystery and its peculiar sphere was planned, and where light is thrown upon the relationship which God intended should exist between the mighty inhabitants of heavenly places, and these lowly, far off, uncovenanted Gentiles, who, with Christ are to be seated together 'far above all principality and power'. Perhaps we have wondered why? Here at least is one reason, that through this church thus chosen thus blessed, should be manifest the manifold wisdom of God. Notice it is the 'wisdom' of God that is the peculiar theme, not His love nor His power, but His wisdom. It is in definite association with the Mystery that had been hushed during the ages, that God is called "The only wise God" in Rom. xvi. 27. If the fallen Prince of Tyre, spoken of in Ezek. xxviii., be a symbolic picture of Satan, we read that originally he is said to have been 'full of wisdom', but later that he had corrupted that wisdom (Ezek. xxviii. 12, 17), and it is in the exercise of His Wisdom, that God concealed from the eyes of His enemy the climax purpose of the ages, namely "The Mystery", intending by the Church therein called to make known to the unfallen principalities and powers in the heavenly places, vacated of some of these spiritual dignities that had fallen away in the earlier Satanic rebellion, the manifold wisdom of God. We do know at least one occupation for which we have been saved, and are yet to be inducted, namely that of being the channel of instruction on this theme to these spiritual powers. This wisdom is said to be 'manifold'. When Peter uses the word 'manifold' as he does in I Pet. i. 6 and iv. 10 the Greek word is poikilos, a word meaning variegated, and found in the Septuagint of Gen. xxxvii. 3 where we read of 'the coat of many colours'. The word occurs in eight different forms, and the majority of references is to embroidered work. The word used in Eph. iii. 10 is the intensive form polupoikilos 'very varied', and is unknown in the Septuagint. It is found in classical Greek, where it refers to a cloth or painting bearing a complicated pattern.

As in everything else, the word used in Ephesians is the superlative of its kind. The revelation of the Divine purpose as it pertains either to Israel or to the Church of the Acts period, did not need the use of the word meaning VERY manifold, but the revelation of the Mystery did. Even with our limited understanding, we can see that the fall of angels, the overthrow of the world and the determined attack of the enemy of truth, call for superlative wisdom to encompass the ultimate goal of the ages. This not only called for the exercise of wisdom in what was made known in the Scriptures, but what was kept secret. It also called for wisdom as to when this secret should be made known, by whom and to whom. So far as the Gentiles on earth, here and now are concerned, during this great parenthesis in the outworking of the purpose of the ages, Paul, as the Prisoner of Jesus Christ, was the chosen vehicle, but when once these believing Gentiles were formed into a church, that church became the chosen and predestined vehicle of instruction—not to men, not even to angels, but unto principalities and powers. Angels, we learn 'desire to look into' the things that pertain to the sufferings of Christ and the glories that follow (I Pet. i. 12). Angels appear throughout the N.T. record manifesting a keen interest in all that happens as the Divine purpose unfolds from Bethlehem to Calvary, from the tomb in the Garden to the Ascension, and with the yet future Coming again. Principalities and powers are only mentioned once outside Paul's epistles namely in I Pet. iii. 22, and it is only in Ephesians that we learn of their most evident interest in the outworking of the purpose of grace as it pertains to the Mystery. We must remember too, that Christ is revealed in Col. ii. 10 as 'the Head of all principality and power', even as He had already been revealed as the Head of the Church which is His Body. Col. i. 16-20 suggests moreover that the mutual reconciliation which is predicated of the Church will also be enjoyed by these principalities and powers. We are being prepared for high society, but even so we can give thanks unto the Father which HATH MADE US MEET for the inheritance of the saints in light.

No.64. The Secret Chamber (iii. 1 - 13).

God's Age-Poem (iii. 11 - 13).

pp. 101 - 103

The 'intent' to make known through the church the manifold wisdom of God to principalities and powers in heavenly places (Eph. iii. 10), is preceded by a reference to creation, and followed by a reference to purpose:

> "According to the eternal purpose which He purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Eph. iii. 11).

The literal rendering of this passage reads 'according to the purpose of the ages'. Eternity as such is not a subject of Scripture. The word 'eternity' in Isa. lvii. 15 is the Hebrew ad, and when this word is used of man, it is translated 'of old' (Job xx. 4). The word translated 'eternal' in Deut. xxxiii. 27 is qedem 'before in time or place', and the one other word in the O.T. thus translated is the Hebrew olam (Isa. lx. 15), and olam means something secret (Psa. xc. 8). Eternity as such does not enter into the O.T. Scriptures. Kata prothesin ton aionon "According to a purpose of the ages". This is the literal translation of the words of Eph. iii. 11. Three things are thereby presupposed:

(1) That the dispensation of the Mystery, the appointment of Paul, the peculiar condition of the church, their relation of this Mystery with creation and the principalities and powers in heavenly places, are all 'according to', or in harmony with a purpose.
(2) This purpose or plan has been already variously spoken of in Ephesians as God's choice, before the foundation of the world, His predestination, the good pleasure of His will, the mystery of His will, and the purpose of Him Who worketh all things after the counsel of His own will.
(3) This purpose is called 'The purpose of the ages'.

The word aion is translated 'age' in Eph. ii. 7 and iii. 21, but is translated 'course', 'world' and 'eternal' in other references. There seems to be need for revision when one word in one epistle can be translated by so widely different terms as 'this world' which is admittedly transitory, and 'eternal' which endures for ever.

The ages, according to Ephesians, are subdivided into this age (Eph. i. 21; vi. 12), the ages past (iii. 9) and the ages to come (ii. 7). The second epistle to Timothy, and the epistle to Titus combine the words pro aionios with chronos, translated in the A.V. 'before the world began' but literally 'before aionion or age-during or age-past times', and 'the present age' ton nun aiona 'the now age'. These references bring before us the sweep of the ages, revealing that there was a time which could be spoken of as 'before' that which is spoken of as 'now', 'this age', and a period spoken of as the ages that are to come. Considering what is written in Eph. i. 4, we perceive that 'before the ages' and 'before the overthrow of the world' synchronize, and that the ages therefore must begin at a line drawn through Gen. i. 2. Most of the teaching is veiled or distorted if we adopt the translation of aion in terms of eternity. The A.V. reads 'The eternal purpose which He purposed in Christ Jesus' (Eph. iii. 11) as though the word 'purpose' was repeated. The second word translated 'purposes' is the verb poieo 'to make'. At first sight, the idea of 'making' does not seem so fitting, and the A.V. seems more reasonable. However, we believe that the choice of the word poieo must be considered as under the superintendence of the Holy Spirit, and therefore to attain the truth intended we must consider the usage of this word. In Heb. i. 2 we read 'by Whom also He made the worlds' where the word 'worlds' should read 'ages'. Here again 'making' is employed in connection with the ages. In the same epistle poieo is used, where the A.V. reads 'appointed' and 'kept' (Heb. iii. 2; xi. 28). In Eph. ii. 3 poieo is translated 'fulfilling'. In Eph. ii. 10, where we read 'we are His workmanship', the word so translated is poiema. Solomon, writing in the third chapter of Ecclesiastes, says that there is a season and a time to every purpose under heaven, and after itemizing fourteen pairs of experiences, states in verse 11:

> "He hath made everything beautiful in his time; also He hath set the world in their heart, so that no man can find out the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end."

Everything is not beautiful at present, but 'in its proper season' it will be. The word 'world' is literally the 'age', and this so pre-occupies the heart of man, that he cannot comprehend the work of God that goes back before the ages, and which will go on when the ages have ceased. The LXX uses an expressive term ta sumpanta for 'everything', all things together, a complete and completed whole. Here also we find the Greek word poiema 'the work that God maketh'. It occurs again in verse 17 allied with 'purpose', "every purpose and every work". 'The work of God' (Eccles. i. 13) include apparently things that at present are 'crooked', yet which will be beautiful 'in their season'. Again poiema is used in Eccles viii. 17 "Then I beheld all (sumpanta) the work (ta poiemata) of God, that a man cannot find out the work (poiema) that is done under the sun . . . . . he shall not find it". The concealed nature of these poiemata is indicated in xi. 5, where once again the comprehensive sumpanta is found. Both terms sumpanta and poiemata are used of man as well as of God, for the last verse of chapter xii. says:

> "God will bring every work (sumpan to poiema) into judgment."

The choice of the word poieo therefore, in Eph. iii. 11 is in line with the use of the word in that quest concerning the purpose of the ages which is found in the book of Ecclesiastes. To make, or to do, while satisfying many occurrences, by no means present a full account of the verb poieo as the following extracts from Grimm-Thayer's Lexicon, will show:

> "With the names of things, to produce, construct, form, fashion . . . . . joined to nouns denoting state or condition, it signifies to be the author, to cause . . . . ."

The fact that poiema becomes in English a 'poem' shows that something beyond mere doing or making is in mind. What a lovely thought it is, that at last, out of the agony of the ages, like a butterfly emerging from a chrysalis, there will emerge a poem unto His praise: A verse from Francis Ridley Havergal comes to mind, which we can only quote from memory.

> "So onward, and yet onward
> For the dim revealing show,
> That system unto system
> In grand succession grow.
> That we deemed a volume
> But one golden verse may be
> One rhythmic cadence in the flow
> Of God's great poetry."

In this most glorious purpose of the ages, the church of the Mystery has its place and its privileges, among them the Apostle brings into prominence 'access'. In Eph. ii. 18 'access' is placed at the climax of the blessed privileges that belong to this newly created company. Here again access is brought forward as crystallizing in itself all that can be said of this Christian privilege, and not only so, access is supplemented by boldness and confidence in iii. 12, and is made to rest, not upon our faith in the Lord, but 'through the faith of Him or His faithfulness'. Having reached this happy vantage ground, the Apostle turns back to the theme with which the chapter opens, saying:

> "Wherefore I desire that ye faint not at my tribulations for you, which is your glory" (Eph. iii. 13).

Why should Paul think that the Ephesians would be likely 'to faint' when they heard of his tribulations? The word means rather to become dispirited, to lose heart rather than to faint. Paul says in effect 'my tribulations' constitute me "The Prisoner of Christ Jesus", they are 'for you', just as my Prison ministry is 'for you Gentiles'. This Prison ministry with its dispensation of the grace of God, deals with the unsearchable riches of Christ, and these tribulations which are for you, are 'your glory'. So with these words this most blessed parenthesis comes back to its starting point:

A | iii. 1. FOR THIS CAUSE.
  B | 1. The Prisoner of Christ Jesus FOR YOU.
    C | 2-12. The wonder of this dispensation thus entrusted.
  B | 13. My tribulations are FOR YOU.
A | 14. FOR THIS CAUSE.

We are therefore ready to follow the prayer with which chapter iii. ends, and realize its relationship with the closing verse of chapter ii., rejoicing meanwhile that the Apostle was compelled to make so illuminating a detour as that which has occupied our worshiping attention for these eleven articles on Eph. iii. 1-13.

No.65. The Seven-fold Doctrinal Section seen as a whole.

The reader who has followed this series of studies so far will need no explanation of the many allusions to a great building. We have followed our guide through the seven chambers of doctrinal truth, and now stand at the foot of the central tower which represents the prayer of Eph. iii. 14-21 and occupies a central position between the seven sections of doctrine and the seven sections of practice. Before ascending this tower, our guide pauses to draw our attention to a stained glass window, and we observe that it is in reality a symbolical representation of the sevenfold correspondence which is observable upon the study of the doctrinal section as a whole. The reader will see that we have attempted to display this correspondence below, and believe that if each item is compared, fuller light will be forthcoming. This detailed examination we have ourselves made, but we can here only give the actual references, trusting that the reader may be sufficiently interested to take them and the several correspondencies, and pursue the study of their bearing upon one another more fully than we hope to do here.

We have already seen that there is a close correspondence between the seven sections of doctrine which occupy Eph. i. 3 - iii. 13 and the seven sections of practice that occupy chapters iv.-vi., but this is not the only set of correspondencies clearly indicated in this great epistles. If we take the seven doctrinal sections and consider them as a whole, and unrelated to the practical portion, we shall still find that this law of correspondence holds good. In the drawing of the window of the chart which follows, we have not attempted any detail; this we now supply.

Eph. ii. 8 - 10
BY GRACE ARE YE SAVED

As an example of the value of this comparison of passages, we observe that there are three references to the word 'dispensation', one in the first panel and two in the second. This enables us to see that the dispensation of the fullness of the seasons need not be a title of the yet future day of glory; it can well be another title of the present dispensation of the Mystery. We must however be prepared to follow our guide, and he appears to be about to ascend the first flight of stairs in the ascent of the central tower. This window will be there at the foot whenever we may wish to ponder its pattern and arrangement; and so, in our next article we commence the study of the central prayer, Eph. iii. 14-21.

No.66. The Central Tower (iii. 14 - 21).

"What is the breadth, length, depth and height."

pp. 141 - 144

The habitation of Eph. ii. 19-22 supplies the figure already considered, the dwelling of Christ in the heart by faith. It will be remembered that the Apostle had no hesitation in blending the figure of building and growing in the earlier section "In Whom all the building fitly framed together groweth" (Eph. ii. 21), which growth is seen in the parallel to be the growth of the 'Body'. "May grow up unto Him . . . . . the whole body fitly joined together . . . . . unto the edifying (upbuilding) of itself in love" (Eph. iv. 15, 16). So, in the prayer before us, the Apostle blends together the two figures 'That ye being rooted and grounded in love'. The same double figure meets us in Col. ii. 7 "Rooted and built up in Him". Rhiza 'root' is well known as an English equivalent of 'root', there being at least forty-five words, mostly scientific, which use the word rhiza. Gardeners are familiar with roots called rhizome, such as those of the 'flag' or iris. In the N.T. the 'root' is closely related to growth and fruit, 'Because they had no root they withered away' (Matt. xiii. 6), and of cause or origin "The love of money is (a) root of all evil" (I Tim. vi. 10). Before speaking of the soil in which the believer is considered to be 'rooted', the Apostle adds the word 'grounded', the Greek themelioo. Just as the figure of growth is borrowed from Eph. ii. 19-22, so is the word 'grounded' for the word 'foundation' in Eph. ii. 20 is the Greek themelion. There are but six occurrences of themelioo 'to be grounded' or 'founded' namely (Matt. vii. 25; Luke vi. 48; Eph. iii. 17; Col. i. 23; Heb. i. 10 and I Pet. v. 10). The usage ranges from laying the foundation of the earth to the settling and stablishing of the believer. In passing we observe that the word 'foundation' does not occur in Eph. i. 4. The parallel to Eph. iii. 17 in Col. ii. 7 should be compared with Col. i. 23. According to these passages, to be grounded is to continue in the faith, and not to be moved away from the hope of the gospel.

The reader will probably have recognized 'these three' so often brought together in the witness of Paul. 'Faith' and 'love' are found in Eph. iii. 17, 'faith' and 'hope' in Col. i. 23. In the prayer before us, Paul does not speak of being rooted or grounded in either faith or hope; these form a subject of the prayer of the first chapter. Here love is uppermost, 'rooted and grounded in love', and this leads on to the comprehension of the love of Christ, which in reality passeth knowledge. Before reference is made to the love of Christ, the Apostle introduces 'breadth, length, depth and height'. Many and varied have been the explanations offered by writers of all periods of these words. Some saw in them the outspread arms of the cross, combined with the humiliation and exaltation connected with it. Others see a reference to the temple of Diana at Ephesus, which was one of the seven wonders of the world, and combined with this a reference back to the temple already mentioned in Eph. ii. 21. Yet again we may see in these four dimensions the peculiar character of the dispensation of the Mystery, stretching back as it does to before the foundation of the world, ascending up far above all, embracing the far off Gentile, and looking forward to the ages to come. Yet when all these explanations have been given, we come back to this prayer and ask what is the purpose of this petition? How does it fit in with the intention of the epistle as a whole? Can we relate it to the expressed desires of the Apostle in connection with his peculiar ministry, and what is the testimony of the Scriptures themselves to breadth, length, depth and height? Let us begin with this inquiry, and consider the way in which these terms are employed elsewhere.

Platos the Greek word translated 'breadth' occurs elsewhere only in Rev. xx. 9 and xxi. 16. "The breadth of the earth", 'the breadth of the Holy City'.

Mekos the Greek word translated 'length' occurs elsewhere only in Rev. xxi. 16, where it is also used of the Holy City. This fact must surely be taken into consideration when we seek an explanation of the Apostle's purpose.

Bathos 'depth', occurs nine times in the N.T. It is used of the deepness of the soil for seed sowing (Matt. xiii. 5; Mark iv. 5); for the sea (Luke v. 4); for the deep things of God and of Satan (Rom. xi. 33; I Cor. ii. 10; Rev. ii. 24); for the depth of the poverty of the Corinthians (II Cor. viii. 2) and for the reference Rom. viii. 39 "Nor height nor depth" which were among the many things that, though formidable, could never separate from the love of God.

Hupsos 'height'. This word is used of the heavenly Jerusalem in Rev. xxi. 16 and the supreme glory of the Ascended Saviour in Eph. iv. 8. Elsewhere it is translated 'on high' (Luke i. 78; xxiv. 49) and 'exalted' (James i. 9). What emerges from this comparison is the fact that the Revelation uses three of these words to describe the Holy City, the heavenly Jerusalem, omitting 'the depth'. When we turn to the O.T., we find the word breadth used:

(1) For the breadth of the Ark (Gen. vi. 15).
(2) For the breadth of the land of promise (Gen. xiii. 17).
(3) For the breadth of the furniture and building of the Tabernacle and Temple.

Length is also used for the Ark, for the land of promise, and for the furniture and buildings of the Tabernacle and the Temple. Depth does not appear to have been used in the O.T. either of the land or of the Tabernacle and Temple. Height is used of the Ark, of the land, and again of the Tabernacle and Temple. In addition, depth and height are used of God and His ways as contrasted with those of man. These we must consider separately. What does emerge from this comparison of terms is the following fact:

(1) The earthly inheritance promised to Abraham is defined by two measurements only "The breadth and the length".
(2) The heavenly city, the new Jerusalem, the heavenly side of Abraham's inheritance, is defined by 'breadth, length and height', three measurements.
(3) The inheritance of the Mystery appears to have been in the Apostle's mind when he spoke of 'breadth, length, depth and height', four dimensions, and so something 'spiritual' and not associated or confined by the limitations of our present three dimensional existence. Philosophers speak of 'the fourth dimensions', but for all practical purposes we live in a world of three dimensions: breadth, length, height.

These items, supplied by the Scriptures themselves, wonderfully confirm the teaching given elsewhere of "Three spheres of blessing", namely (1) The Land, (2) The heavenly City, (3) The position far above all. This leaves the two 'depth and height' to be considered, for their usage is wider than 'breadth and length' and so must embrace something more. The Apostle forces us to give attention to them in Eph. iv. 9, 10, breaking into the narrative by saying:

> "Now that He ascended, what is it but that He also descended first into the lower parts of the earth? He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens, that He might fill all things."

A similar employment of the figure of ascending into heaven and descending into the deep is found in Rom. x. 6, 7. According to Prov. xxv. 3 "The heaven (is) for height, and the earth (is) for depth", with a context that indicates the unsearchable nature of these spheres. Is it too much to believe that, in this reference to 'what is the depth and height', the Apostle also had in view those riches which were unsearchable? Height and depth moreover speak of possible spiritual foes (Rom. viii. 38, 39) with whom are associated 'principalities and powers', but which can never separate the believer from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus. Before considering this mighty theme we must pause to observe that the breadth, and length, and depth and height, can only be comprehended 'with all saints'. What does this mean? Why should the comprehending of these demand the fellowship of the saints? In the first prayer of Eph. i. 15-19 Paul makes his basis the love that the Ephesians had 'unto all the saints', here he suggests that knowledge and comprehension of the holy mysteries implied in breadth, length, depth and height would be veiled to all but those who were not only 'one Body', but who had access 'in one Spirit' and who endeavour to keep the unity in the bond of peace.

In earlier writings particularly those epistles to the Corinthians and to the Hebrews, he had shown the evil effect of divisions, and of their connection with immature growth and dullness of hearing. It would appear that it is useless to profess to be a member of the One Body, and yet fail to act as part of a unity. Had the Apostle not been assured of the Ephesians, 'love unto all the saints', he would not have been able to pray that they might know what is the hope of His calling, or the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints. So here, we cannot truly comprehend the wonders of the high calling of this third sphere, and be indifferent to the unity which is its one and only earthly manifestation. The concluding words of this section 'and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge', seem to envisage in concrete form the vaguer statement covering depth and height.

"Which passeth knowledge." In this expression we find the Greek word hyperballo which occurs in Ephesians three times.

> "What is the exceeding greatness of His power to usward" (Eph. i. 19).
> "That He might show the exceeding riches of His grace . . . . . toward us" (ii. 7).
> "The love of Christ which passeth knowledge" (iii. 19).

We go from the power of His resurrection to the riches of His grace, and on to the love of Christ which passeth knowledge. "To know . . . . . that which passeth knowledge" sounds like a contradiction. That is because the subject transcends all human thought. We are here in the realm of the superlative. It is the same in Philippians. There a peace is spoken of, a peace that can be experienced, and yet when all is said it remains a peace 'that passeth understanding' (Phil. iv. 7) or as Weymouth renders it 'which transcends our powers of thought'. Christ Himself is God's "Unspeakable Gift", yet who can refrain from speaking of Him? Christ's love is beyond our comprehension, yet throughout life's present pilgrimage, and on through the ages to come, that love, which passeth knowledge, must surely be the goal of all attainment. Let us then seek the apparently impossible, 'to know the love of Christ that passeth knowledge', for we are heirs of glory beyond the dreams of man.

No.67. The Central Tower (iii. 14 - 21).

The Great Doxology.
The Triumphant "Amen".
pp. 161 - 166

The third and final stage of the central prayer of Eph. iii. is now before us; it is the climax petition 'that ye may be filled with all the fullness of God'. There is no intention on the part of the Apostle to suggest that any one believer or all put together could contain 'all the fullness' of God, what the Apostle said was hina plerothete eis pan to pleroma tou theou, "In order that ye may be filled unto all the fullness of God". 'Unto' indicates a goal or a standard. The members of the One Body differ in capacity; some are grace enabled to contain more than another. The point however is not the size of the vessel, but that no vessel should remain only partly filled whatever the capacity; it should be filled to the brim. From the doctrinal and basic point of view this is looked upon as an accomplished fact, for this church is actually called 'The fullness of Him that filleth all in all'. Using similar words as those found in Eph. iii. 17, the Apostle wrote to the Colossians:

> "Rooted and built up in Him . . . . . In Him dwelleth (katoikeo as in Eph. iii. 17) all the fullness (pan to pleroma as in Eph. iii. 19) . . . . . and ye are those having been filled to the full (pepleromenoi) in Him" (Col. ii. 7-10).

Here every member is conceived of as being 'filled unto all the fullness of God'. In Eph. iii., this same full measure is the object of prayer. The Apostle is working along similar lines to those which led to this prayer in the first place. It will be remembered that, at the close of chapter ii. of Ephesians, there is a reference made to the 'habitation' of God (or of Christ—Revised texts), and as a consequence Paul prayed that what the believer is in grace, in Christ and in position, he may be in experience, in realization and in enjoyment 'in order that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith'. So even now this church of the One Body has already been given its ultimate title "The fullness of Him that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 23). Is it any marvel then that in such a prayer the Apostle should intercede and pray that members of such a company and calling, with such a title and destiny, might be 'filled UP TO all the fullness of God'? Whether looked at in Christ Himself for in the church itself this fullness resides 'bodily'—it is the Divinely appointed vehicle of manifestation, and if the believer fails to respond, so far, on the experimental plane, will not the manifestation of the Divine fullness be hindered? This matter of the fullness is so vast that no attempt will be made to deal with it here. Some attention has been paid to the theme both in a series of articles now commencing in The Berean Expositor and already published in the Alphabetical Analysis under the heading The Pleroma. There we realize that the term covers the purpose of the ages, and that no other company of the redeemed occupy so exalted a position in this purpose as 'the church which is His Body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all'. With this third petition, the prayer of Eph. iii. reaches its summit, Paul like David could say, the prayers of Paul the apostle 'are ended'. Only the doxology remains, and in that doxology we shall find gathered expressions that will indicate some further associations in the glory of this highly favoured church. These doxologies that appear in the epistles of Paul, were no mere ejaculations that, while being genuine expressions of praise and worship, submit to no analysis and need not be given too serious a consideration. They form a part of all Scripture and have their place just as much as any purely doctrinal, dispensational or practical affirmation. The order of Paul's epistles may never be satisfactorily settled so far as the exact place of each individual epistle is concerned, but there is practical unanimity regarding the chronological order of those epistles which contain doxologies, and se set them out as follows:

> "Blessed be God . . . . . Who comforteth us." (II Cor. i. 3, 4).
> "God . . . . . blessed for evermore, knoweth that I lie not." (II Cor. xi. 31).
> "The Creator, Who is blessed for ever." (Rom. i. 25).
> "Christ, Who is over all, God blessed for ever." (Rom. ix. 5).
> "For of Him, and through Him, and to Him, are all things: To Whom be glory for ever. Amen." (Rom. xi. 33-36).
> "To God only wise, be glory through Jesus Christ for ever. Amen." (Rom. xvi. 27).
> "Blessed be God . . . . . Who hath blessed us." (Eph. i. 3).
> "Unto Him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus throughout all generations, world without end. Amen." (Eph. iii. 21).
> "Now unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honour and glory for ever and ever. Amen." (I Tim. i. 17).
> "King of Kings, and Lord of Lords, Who only hath immortality . . . . . Whom no man . . . . . can see, to Whom be honour and power everlasting. Amen." (I Tim. vi. 15, 16).

We have not listed the occasions when the Apostle breaks his narrative to say "I thank God" or some such expression, but the following passages should be noted (Rom. i. 8; vii. 25; I Cor. i. 4, 14; xiv. 18; Phil. i. 3; Col. i. 3, 12; iii. 17; I Thess. i. 2; ii. 13; II Thess. i. 3; Philemon 4). It will be discovered that a careful examination of these ten doxologies gather up into themselves much of the doctrine that precedes or follows them, and one example here must suffice. The central feature of I Timothy is the "Mystery of Godliness". God manifest in the flesh . . . . . seen of angels. The doxologies of chapters i. and vi. emphasize among other things (1) God's "invisibility", (2) that what is attributed in chapter i. to "God" is attributed in chapter vi. to Christ, for He is "King of kings and Lord of lords". The following abbreviated structure may exhibit the relationship of these two doxologies to the teaching of the epistle as a whole.

I Timothy.

A | i. 1, 2. Salutation.
B | i. 3-20. Hetero didaskaleo, "Teach no other doctrine" (i. 3).
Committed to trust (i. 11).
The Doxology.
The King, incorruptible, invisible (i. 17).
Shipwreck (i. 19).
C | ii. 1-7. The salvation of all men (ii. 4).
D | ii. 8 - iii. 15-. I hope to come (iii. 14).
E | iii. -15, 16. MYSTERY God Manifest.
E | iv. 1-8. APOSTACY Demons.
C | iv. 9-12. The Saviour of all men (iv. 10).
D | iv. 13 - vi. 2. Till I come (iv. 13).
B | vi. 3-20. Hetero didaskaleo, "Teach otherwise" (vi. 3).
Committed to trust (vi. 20).
The Doxology.
King, immortal, unseen (vi. 15, 16).
Drown (vi. 9).
A | vi. 21. Salutation.

We return therefore to the closing doxology of Eph. iii. with the assurance that the phraseology used, however exultant, was under the superintendence of the Spirit Who inspired all Scripture. Let us attempt a more literal rendering than is found in the A.V. which while not readable enough to be a substitute, will throw into prominence essential features.

> "Now to Him Who is of power (dunameno) above all things to do above what we ask or think, according to the power (dunamin) that inworketh (energoumenen) in us, to Him be the glory in the church in Christ Jesus, unto all the generations of the ages of the ages. Amen."

It will be perceived that 'power' is brought over from the body of the prayer, once translated in the A.V. 'to be able' which is correct, and once translated 'power'. This we have enforced by translating dunameno 'to be of power'. The word translated in the A.V. 'worketh' is the Greek energeo our word 'energize', which comes in the earlier prayer of Eph. i. 19, 20. This 'power that worketh in us' is moreover very pointedly contrasted with Eph. ii. 2, where another force is seen at work "The Prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience". This reference in Eph. ii. takes on a deeper significance when we realize that it is aligned with the 'answering' of our prayers, for that surely is travestied by the blinding and undoing of the children of disobedience, in the 'fulfilling' of the desires of such.

The special note of time with which the doxology ends is unique. No other doxology envisages 'the generations' of the ages to come. The Prison Epistles speak of:

(1) Generations past.

> "Ages" or literally 'generations' past, to which the truth of the mystery of Christ was not so clearly revealed as it is now (Eph. iii. 5). The Mystery itself (as distinct from the ever unfolding mystery of Christ) had been 'hid' (not gradually revealed) both from the 'ages' and from the 'generations' (Col. i. 26).

(2) The present generation.

> In the midst of a crooked and perverse 'generation' among whom the church shines as a light in the world (Phil. ii. 15).

(3) The future generation.

> "To Him be glory in the church, in Christ Jesus, unto all the generations of the age of the ages" (Eph. iii. 21).

The epistles contain but one other occurrence of genea and that refers back to Israel in the wilderness (Heb. iii. 10) and so is distinct from those spoken of in the epistles of the Mystery, as we should expect. It is evident that these future generations are placed in contrast with the past and the present. In contrast with the past, they will be to the glory of God in two capacities, (1) in the church, (2) in Christ Jesus, and these two echo the two mysteries, "the Mystery of Christ" only partly revealed in generations past, and "the Mystery" itself which had been hidden from ages and generations. This points to the fact that 'glory' is associated both with 'knowledge' and with 'fullness' as may be seen in prophecies of other spheres, for example:

> "The earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea" (Hab. ii. 14).
> "His glory is the fullness of the whole earth" (Isa. vi. 3 margin).

The generation that shall glorify the Lord is the generation that knows Him, a generation in contrast with all those from whom the truth of the Mystery had been hidden. It will be also a generation in blessed contrast with the wicked and perverse generation that alas is the description of the world in which the revelation of the Mystery was given. The subject for which the Apostle prayed both in Eph. i. and iii. demand something more than ordinary grace and power for their realization. Paul associates them with the mighty power that raised Christ from the dead and set Him at the right hand on high; he contrasts it with the spiritual energy that works its will in the wicked and perverse generation that knows not God.

The reader has already been informed that the word 'exceeding' of Eph. i. 9; ii. 7 and 'which passeth' of Eph. iii. 19 is the Greek hyperballo, and it would be natural to believe that in verse 20 the word 'exceeding' will be one more occurrence of hyperballo. This however is not so. Hyper comes twice, translated in the A.V. 'above' and together with other words 'exceeding abundantly' but the word hyperballo is not used. Instead we have the phrase huper ek perissou. The word perissos is a form of the preposition peri 'concerning', 'about' and in combination expresses 'beyond', possibly because that which surrounds a thing lies beyond the thing itself. We have perisseuo 'to exceed' (Rom. v. 15), perisseia 'abundance' (Rom. v. 17), perissos 'exceeding' (Rom. iii. 1 'advantage'), perissoteros 'more abundantly' (Gal. i. 14). The fact that the A.V. translates perisseia 'superfluity' (James i. 21) shows that it ranks with the words hyperbole and hyperballo as a word indicating excess, even to the extravagance were not God Himself and all His resources the pledge of fulfillment. As one looks back over the revelation that has been given in these three chapters of Ephesians, the heart may well quail at the prospect of rising to any level of appreciation or approximation, but this the Apostle answers by pointing a way to God Himself as One Who is able to do 'exceeding abundantly'.

Eph. i. 3 opened our study with the words "Blessed be God". Eph. iii. 21 concludes our study with this marvelous doxology, and here the doctrinal portion of this mighty epistle reaches its utmost limit. The fullness of God as expressed in the love of Christ fills all breadth, length, depth and height. All that lies beyond is not a matter of present revelation, and therefore cannot form part of present Christian doctrine. We can end on one note only, a note of thanksgiving and of praise. It is fitting that a section which opens with a benediction "Blessed be God Who hath blessed us" should close with a doxology "Now unto Him . . . . . be glory". We shall appreciate this sublime doxology the better if we observe that it falls into three parts:

(1) Him to Whom the praise is given.
(2) The medium through which this praise will be offered.
(3) The duration of this adoration.

"Now unto Him Who is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think." This is the character of the One to Whom such a prayer as that of Eph. iii. can alone be made. Here we learn that even when we breathe these inspired petitions, we shall not apprehend one half of the magnitude of our request. God however does not limit our praying or His answers to our apprehension. He is able to exceed all our asking and all our thinking, and one of the reasons may be suggested in the next clause, "According to the power that worketh in use".

In the opening of the prayer the limitless source of supply is revealed—"According to the riches of His glory". In the doxology the equally limitless power that answers these requests is made known.

What is this mighty power that works both in us and that moves the very arm of God? It is presupposed that the teaching of Eph. i. will have been grasped before the teaching of Eph. iii. is reached, In that early chapter the Apostle prayed that we may know:

> "What is the exceeding greatness of His power to usward who believe, according to the inworking of His mighty power, which He wrought in Christ when He raised Him from the dead . . . . . far above all . . . . . Head over all things to the church . . . . . the fullness of Him that filleth all in all."

The power that answers the prayer of Eph. iii., is the power that raised Christ from the dead, that placed Him at the right hand of God, that put all things under His feet.

It is understandable that one may say 'I do not feel this mighty power'; 'Should I not be conscious of it if such a power was associated with my Christian life?' In chapter ii. we read that the unsaved are energized by a mighty spiritual power, yet at the same time such walk according to the age of this world, that is, they are just ordinary people. They fulfil their own desires, and are certainly not conscious they are being inwrought by the spirit of the Prince of the power of the air. In the same way, we who now seek to walk worthy of our high calling, who seek to fulfil the will of God, who are guided by His written Word, we are not always conscious of the power that alone makes such an effort possible or acceptable.

The doxology that has been interrupted by this testimony to the mighty power that is related to its prayer is resumed by the repetition of the words 'Unto Him'.

"Unto Him be glory by the church and by Christ Jesus."

A little previously the Apostle had written that through the church heavenly beings were learning the manifold wisdom of God (Eph. iii. 10), and in chapter ii. 7 he reveals that this church when raised and seated in the heavenlies will show in the ages to come God's exceeding riches of grace in His kindness toward them in Christ Jesus.

What we may do now in our small measure 'whether we eat or drink or whatsoever we do', we shall do then in a fuller degree. This is indeed 'fullness'. It will be so for the very earth itself. The marginal reading of Isa. vi. 3 being:

"His glory is the fullness of the whole earth."

When heaven and earth are united and the great dwelling of God is at last complete, Psa. xxix. 9 will be fulfilled 'Every whit of it uttereth glory'.

"For all the generations of the age of the ages."

What this statement indicates is perhaps beyond our present abilities to grasp. When we read "A Hebrew of the Hebrews" or a "Pharisee of the Pharisees" we know that we are reading of something superlative. So here this represents the climax and crown of time.

In Gen. ii. 4 we read of the 'generation of the heaven and earth', a history which takes Gen. ii. 5 to iv. 26 to unfold. Within this short compass Sin, Death, Curse. The Two seeds and finally Seth are introduced. Here in Ephesians is the glorious opposite. Sin and death will be unknown: no curse will ever fall. The false seed will have been gathered and removed as the tares are, and God will be all in all.

No.68. The Practical Section (iv. - vi.).

"Worthy" (iv. 1).

pp. 181 - 183

There is scarcely anything more important and in need of more emphasis and repetition than that doctrine must ever be accompanied by practice, that walk must correspond with calling, that visible fruit must manifest the hidden root. This correspondence of doctrine and practice is most happily displayed in the Epistle to the Ephesians. It naturally divides into its two main sections—the first three chapters containing the great revelation, the second three chapters the resulting exhortation. Take a few instances by way of illustration. To see the whole would necessitate a most detailed structure of the epistle.

DOCTRINE (i. - iii.)	PRACTRICE (iv. - vi.)
The power of His might and the principalities and powers (i. 19-23).	The power of His might and the evil principalities and powers (vi. 10-17).
This shows our doctrinal position and sphere of spiritual blessings.	This shows the corresponding conflict and spiritual foes.
The old walk—"the world" (ii. 2).	The old walk—"vanity of mind"; "uncleanness"; "darkness"; "as fools".
The new walk—"new creation" (ii. 10).	The new walk—"lowliness of mind"; "in love"; "as light"; "circumspectly".
The new creation—The new man (ii. 10-15).	The old man—put off.
	The new man—put on (iv. 22-32).
The Temple—"fitly framed together" (ii. 19-22).	The Body—"fitly joined together" (iv. 7-16).
	Its present manifestation.

These examples will suffice for the moment. What a stimulus we receive to unity when we see that the exhortation to be 'fitly joined together' as members of the one Body is but a temporal and corporal expression of the higher and fuller unity of the Temple so marvelously 'fitly framed together'.

Or again, it is not enough that we should learn the doctrine of the new creation and the new man; it must have some result. The old man with his 'former conversation' (iv. 22) and 'with his deeds' (Col. iii. 9) must be put off, otherwise the glorious doctrine remains without life. The exalted position of the believer in the ascended Lord—"far above all"—brings him into conflict with 'principalities and powers' that are associated with evil. The mighty power that raised Christ from the dead is the power in which alone each member of the Body can hope to overcome these spiritual foes. All this and more is expressed in the one word of Eph. iv. 1, "Walk worthy". The word 'worthy' (axios):

> "refers to a pair of scales in which, when the weights on each side are equal, they bring or draw down (axiousi) the beam to a level or horizontal position" (Parkhurst).

What a wonderful thought this is. Let us think of the balances. On the one scale all the blessings, the riches, the glories of our calling as revealed in Eph. i.-iii.; on the other scale the walk that should balance these blessings, these riches, these glories, the walk that brings the beam of the balance to the horizontal, the walk that is 'worthy of the calling'. There is a sense of comparison in the word. In Rom. viii. 18 the Apostle says that:

> "the sufferings of the present time are unworthy of comparison (ouk axia) with the glory about to be revealed in us."

The first occurrence of the word axios in the LXX is suggestive of the idea of something 'equivalent'. Abraham, when negotiating the purchase of the cave of Machpelah, said:

> "for as much money as it is worth he shall give it me" (Gen. xxiii. 9).

The Hebrew is given in the margin 'full money', the Greek version being argurion axion. This was 'weighed in the balances' to the last shekel of the 400 as we see in verse 16. This same sense is felt in Job xi. 6:

> "God exacteth of thee less than thine iniquity deserveth."

Here again the LXX uses axios. The idea of comparison is seen in Prov. iii. 15 'not to be compared with her'. Such is the word that Paul uses at the opening of his exhortation, "Walk worthy". Walk so that there may be a comparison between doctrine and practice.

The word axios is an adverb, and standing alone would be translated 'worthily', but the word does not stand alone in any of its occurrences in the N.T.; it is always followed by such an expression as 'of the Lord', 'of the calling', 'of the gospel'. "Worthy of the Lord" must be taken as an adverbial phrase. "As becometh saints" (Rom. xvi. 2) is literally 'worthy of saints'. "After a godly sort" (III John 6) is literally 'worthy of God'. The word axios comes three times in the Prison epistles, and in each case it is associated either with the calling, the gospel, or the Lord. We are not allowed to think merely of the walk, not merely of walking worthily, not simply to be studying our walk as such, but ever to think of the walk as it is related to something higher and nobler than ourselves.

In Eph. iv. 1	we have	"walk worthy of the calling".
In Phil. i. 27		"manner of life worthy of the gospel".
In Col. i. 10		"walk worthy of the Lord".

How it must influence us if we but remember that in the one scale of the balance is our calling, the gospel, yea, even the Lord Himself. What a walk that must be therefore that shall be 'worthy'.

The word ‘walk’ occurs in the epistle seven times, and therefore bears the hall-mark of Divine emphasis:

A | ii. 2. Walk according to (kata) world.
B | ii. 10. Good works,
iv. 1. Worthy of calling.
A | iv. 17. Walk as (kathos) Gentiles.
B | v. 2. In love.
v. 8. As light.
v. 15. Circumspectly.

The negative is grouped under “A”, the positive under “B”. We need both. We need to be warned of that walk which is according to the age of this world, of that walk which partakes of the characteristics of those conditions we have left behind. We are exhorted to remember that we were once Gentiles in the flesh, and in the world (ii. 11, 12), and to see to it that our walk shall not be in accord with either of these.

Let us once again be permitted to bring before the mind’s eye the balances, as we repeat the exhortation “Walk worthy”.

No.69. The Practical Section (iv. - vi.).

The Walk and the calling (iv. 1).

pp. 201 - 203

It will be noticed that, when referring to himself as the ‘prisoner’ in iii. 1, the Apostle calls himself “The prisoner of Christ Jesus” (R.V.), but that in chapter iv. he styles himself “the prisoner of the Lord”. These titles are not used at random. “Christ Jesus” speaks of the ascended and risen Saviour in Whom we find our acceptance, our ground of blessing, our hope of glory. “Lord” speaks of our relationship with Him in the practical sphere.

> “Ye call Me Master and Lord: and ye say well; for so I am. If I then, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet; ye also ought to wash one another’s feet . . . . . the servant is not greater than his Lord” (John xiii. 13-16).

In the A.V. of this epistle the title “Lord”, standing alone, occurs 16 times. Of this number only one occurrence is found in the three doctrinal chapters (ii. 21, “An holy temple in the Lord”). The remaining 15 occurrences are all found in the three practical chapters.

> The prisoner of the Lord, beseeches the saints to walk worthy (iv. 1).
> The unity of the Spirit gathers around the one Lord as its centre (iv. 5).
> Paul testifies in the Lord that the saints do not henceforth walk as the Gentiles (iv. 17).
> As light in the Lord, the believer should walk as child of light (v. 8).

> Proving what is acceptable unto the Lord (v. 10), and so through the whole series.

> "In Christ" expresses our doctrinal position, our standing.
> "In the Lord" indicates our practical relationship, our state.

I may address a fellow believer as a dear brother "in Christ" far more freely than I call him a brother "in the Lord". This distinction must be remembered when applying the teaching of I Cor. vii. 39:

> "She is at liberty to be married to whom she will; only IN THE LORD."

This limitation means much more than that marriage should not be contemplated as between a saved and an unsaved person. Many an unhappy and profitless marriage has been contracted by two children of God. The trouble has arisen from the fact that though they have been one 'in Christ', they have not been one 'in the Lord'. They did not seek the same thing, they did not believe or practice the same thing. Their callings may have differed, and division and bitterness have often been the result. The Apostle was a prisoner not only of Christ Jesus, but of the Lord. As such he could exhort those who recognized the same Lord to walk worthy of their calling, and later, exhort them to consider his own walk as a pattern.

The theme of chapter iv. may be discovered by noticing the way in which he returns to his subject. First he speaks of the walk positively, as worthy of the calling, with all humility of mind. Then, after a long digression concerning the unity of the Spirit, he returns to the walk, this time speaking negatively—not as Gentiles, in the vanity of their mind. This again is followed by teaching concerning the new man. It will be more apparent if set out thus:

Ephesians iv. 1 - 32.

A | 1, 2. The walk, positively. Humility of mind.
B | 3-16. The One Body.
A | 17-19. The walk, negatively. Vanity of mind.
B | 20-32. The New Man.

This division of the subject brings to light an important truth. By omitting the parenthesis of iii. 2-13 we realize that the great prayer of iii. 14-21 arises directly out of the fact that the Church of the One Body is the Temple of the Lord. The Apostle's "I therefore" of iv. 1 links the One Body on to the Temple, indicating that the Body aspect is the outward (and perhaps only temporal) manifestation of the real and lasting Temple character.

Now, we see further by the analysis of chapter iv., that the One Body is also a reflection of the New Man. This is confirmed by a reference back to chapter ii. 15, "For to create in Himself of twain one new man". No doctrine of Scripture is isolated. All is part of the great purpose of the ages. While we must ever seek rightly to divide the Word of truth, we must remember that, within the dispensational section to which we belong, our faith is one, our hope is one, our Lord is one.

The walk of the believer appears to be presented as having a threefold relationship in the opening exhortation:

	Worthy of calling.
TO WALK	With all lowliness, etc.
	Endeavouring to keep the unity, etc.

Let us consider this order. Is it possible to reverse it without involving ourselves in trouble and disappointment? Let us see. Suppose we attempt to keep the unity of the Spirit without the necessary humility, forbearance and long suffering! The result will be sectarian harshness, the puffing up of some few stronger minds and the crushing of the weak. How shall the graces of humility, meekness, forbearance and long-suffering be encouraged? We are driven to the inspired order; these qualities will thrive and grow as we seek to walk worthy of our calling. As we realize the marvelous grace that has been manifested to ourselves, so we shall in our turn be the better able to manifest that grace to others. We assume that all our readers know that the word 'vocation' of Eph. iv. 1 is simply the word 'calling'. The calling of believers during the Acts differed in many essentials from that of the prison ministry of Paul. In one sense, at least, it would be the same, and we may take to ourselves the words of I Cor. i. 26-29:

> "For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called; but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things that are mighty; and base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to nought things that are; THAT NO FLESH SHOULD GLORY IN HIS PRESENCE."

These words may well throw us back to Eph. ii. 11, 12 where we are urged to remember:

> "That ye were Gentiles, without Christ, aliens . . . . . strangers . . . . . having no hope, and without God in the world."

To remember this will certainly make humility of mind, long-suffering, and forbearance, far more possible than if it is forgotten. While a wholesome 'remembrance' has a gracious effect upon our walk, there is, from another aspect, an equally important 'forgetfulness':

> "Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended: but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, according to a mark, I press toward the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus . . . . . let us walk by the same rule, let us mind the same thing" (Phil. iii. 13-16).

So whether we look back to the pit from which we have been delivered, or look onward to the glories that stretch out ahead, whether we 'remember' in the one sense or 'forget' in the other, our walk must be the meeker, and the lowlier for it. Then think of the humbling effect of such a passage as this:

> "Wherefore also we pray always for you, that our God would count you worthy of this calling, and fulfil all the good pleasure of His goodness, and the work of faith with power: that the name of our Lord Jesus Christ may be glorified in you" (II Thess. i. 11, 12).

Finally, what an effect upon our walk and our attitude to others such a passage as II Tim. i. 19 should have:

> "Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus, before the age times."

Let us remember our calling, and seeing its grace and its glory, seek to walk worthy of it "that the name of the Lord Jesus Christ may be glorified".

No.70. The Practical Section (iv. - vi.).

The Walk and its Characteristics (iv. 2).

pp. 221 - 223

A frame of mind, a spiritual graciousness, is necessary before it is possible to attempt to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of the peace.

> "With all lowliness, and meekness, with longsuffering, forbearing one another in love" (Eph. iv. 2).

The word 'lowliness' is better rendered 'humility of mind', which brings out more clearly the contrast of verse 17, "vanity of mind". This word is so translated in Acts xx. 19, where the Apostle says:

> "Serving the Lord with all humility of mind."

We can imagine that some, nay many, if they had received the calling and commission of the Apostle Paul, would have displayed arrogance of mind, haughtiness, a temper that would not brook denial or misrepresentation. If we would understand the causes that combined together to make the change from Saul the Pharisee, 'breathing out threatenings and slaughter', to the humble, despised, faithful bond-servant of Christ, we must follow his steps as recorded in the Acts and the Epistles, and realize that only a close fellowship with the Son of God makes such a change either possible or permanent. Unity without humility is hopelessly impossible.

> "From whence come wars and fightings among you? Come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members? . . . . . Wherefore He saith, God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble" (James iv. 1-6).

So it is that the Apostle, in Phil. ii., links together 'lowliness of mind' and 'one mind':

> "Fulfil ye my joy, that ye be likeminded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind. Let nothing be done through strife or vainglory; but in lowliness of mind let each esteem other better than themselves" (Phil. ii. 2, 3).

What an example of this spirit follows, nothing less than the humility of mind, meekness, longsuffering and forbearance should ever be the characteristics of God's elect:

> "Put on therefore, as the elect of God . . . . . bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, longsuffering, forbearing one another" (Col. iii. 12, 13).

Just in passing we call the reader's attention to the parallel with Eph. iv. expressed in the two passages of Col. iii. 10 and 12:

"Put on the new man" "Put on . . . . . humility"

(See the previous article for fuller detail)

We must not leave this theme without a word of warning. There is a true humility, but there is also a false. The one flows from Christ, the other draws away from Christ. The passage that gives the warning is Col. ii. 18-23, and we give Farrar's rendering in order to stimulate thought and provoke attention:

> "Let no one then snatch your prize from you by delighting in abjectness, and service of angels, treading the emptiness of his own visions in all the futile inflation of his mere carnal understanding, and not keeping hold of Him who is 'the Head' from Whom, supplied and compacted by its junctures and ligaments, the whole body grows the growth of God. If ye died with Christ from mundane rudiments, why, as though living in the world, are ye ordinance-ridden with such rules as 'Do not handle', 'Do not taste', 'Do not even touch', referring to things all of which are perishable in the mere consumption, according to the commandment and teachings of men? All these kinds of rules have a credit for wisdom in volunteered supererogation and abasement—hard usage of the body—but have no sort of value as a remedy as regards the indulgence of the flesh."

Humility of mind is in the original tapeinophrosune; tapeinos 'lowly', is wonderfully illustrated in Matt. xi. 29, especially if we realize the point of the word 'At that time' of verse 25. Other references worth noticing are Rom. xii. 16 and Phil. ii. 8. Humility of mind is closely associated with meekness. Because of the 'meekness and gentleness of Christ', Paul, the one in authority, can find it in his heart to condescend to 'beseech' (II Cor. x. 1). See also I Cor. iv. 21. Meekness is no product of the flesh. When the flesh attempts to bring forth humility and meekness it produces such creatures as Uriah Heep who was 'very humble', who writhed and twisted in his excessive humility, but who was nevertheless a monster of hypocrisy.

> "But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance" (Gal. v. 22, 23).

Against such, continues the Scripture, there is no law. The 'touch not, taste, not, handle not' of Col. ii. is a sure sign of the false humility. This spirit of meekness ever looks back to our state by nature and our liability to fall.

> "Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted" (Gal. vi. 1).

Meekness must go hand in hand with authority and teaching.

> "In meekness instructing those that oppose themselves; if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth" (II Tim. ii. 25).

Moses, whose position raised him infinitely above his fellows, with whom God spoke face to face, is recorded as being 'very meek above the all the men which were on the face of the earth' (Numb. xii. 3). If Moses was meek, if Paul was meek, yea, if the Lord of Life and Glory was 'meek and lowly of heart', who are we to dare to walk abroad with high look, or to act towards our fellows in a vain show? Without opening the Book, could our readers name the first thing said of love in I Cor. xiii.?

> "Love suffereth long, and is kind" (verse 4).

Humility of mind and meekness are accompanied by this first expression of love, viz., longsuffering. Like meekness it is the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. v. 22). It is placed as the goal of the believer's walk in the parallel passage of Col. i. 10, 11:

> "Unto all patience and longsuffering with joyfulness."

When Paul would set his own doctrine and practice before Timothy as an antidote to the selfishness that will characterize the perilous times of the last days, he says to him:

> "But thou hast fully known my doctrine, manner of life, purpose, faith, longsuffering, charity, patience" (II Tim. iii. 10).

We gather from various allusions in the epistles that Timothy was of a retiring, shrinking nature. The rudiments of this world would teach such to develop self-assertion, to see to it that others were kept well informed of their authority. What says the wisdom of God?

> "Preach the word; be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all LONGSUFFERING and DOCTRINE" (II Tim. iv. 2).

Is this the reason why so many are repelled? Is this the reason why some do not come to a knowledge of the truth? We must make no mistake, the Word is to be fearlessly preached; doctrine must be maintained, but the truth needs to be spoken in love, the doctrine with longsuffering, the instruction and the restoration with meekness.

Lastly comes, ‘Forbearing one another’. Not until our walk is manifested by these gracious qualities may we proceed to that noble endeavour of keeping the unity of the Spirit.

Let us, brethren, seek to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things (Titus ii. 10).

The First Principles of the Oracles of God

(A series especially addressed to new readers)

No.28. "In Isaac shall thy seed be called."

pp. 5 - 10

The history of the true seed has now been before us from Adam to Abraham. We have seen the line descending from Adam through Seth to Noah, and through Noah to Shem, and from Shem through Eber, Peleg, and Terah to Abraham. Abraham's son Ishmael is repudiated, and Isaac the child of promise, the child of resurrection power, carries forward the great purpose. This process of selection and repudiation still goes on. Isaac has two sons Esau and Jacob, but Esau is set aside. Jacob has twelve sons, but Judah, the son of Leah, the first wife of Jacob, is chosen as the channel through whom the seed should come. Judah is the ancestor of David the King, and it is sufficient for Matthew's purpose that he shows that "Jesus" was the 'Son of David and the Son of Abraham' to prove that the promise concerning the true seed had at length been fulfilled.

With the opening of the N.T. we leave promise and begin fulfillment, and as our salvation and hope are bound up with the realization of the promises of God concerning the seed, we must give our attention to the unfolding of this great theme.

We observe that throughout the Gospels, Christ is referred to as 'the Son of David', but when we consider the testimony of Paul, he avoids the title 'Son of David' and uses the deeper and more significant title "The Seed of David". At first sight this distinction may savour of 'hair-splitting', for He Who is the Seed of David must also be his Son. Yet on the other hand it is also true that He Who is the Son of David may not necessarily be his 'seed' in the full significance of that term as we shall see.

We all know that Solomon was a son of David, and most of us would remember Nathan and Absalom, but how many of us know that in the genealogy given in I Chron. iii. 1-9 there are nineteen sons of David named? Six were born in Hebron, four were born in Jerusalem, and nine are listed without specifying either the name of their mother or the place of their birth. Even this list of nineteen sons is not complete, for the chronicler adds 'besides the sons of the concubines' (I Chron. iii. 9).

In the course of time David's strength began to fail, and claimant voices began to be heard regarding succession to the throne.

> "Adonijah the son of Haggith exalted himself, saying, I will be king" (I Kings i. 5).

Nathan the prophet visited Bathsheba and warned her of the danger and advised her to go to the king and say:

> "Didst not thou, my lord, O king, swear unto thine handmaid, saying, assuredly Solomon thy son shall reign after me, and he shall sit upon my throne? Why then doth Adonijah reign?" (I Kings i. 13).

The result was that Solomon was proclaimed king, and the rest of David's sons were set aside so far as succession to the throne was concerned. Throughout the Gospel of the kingdom, Matthew, the title "The Son of David" is reiterated, for Christ as the Son of David was born to sit upon the throne of David (Luke i. 32).

When we turn from the Gospel of the Kingdom to the epistles of the church we do not find Paul speaking of Christ as the 'Son' of David; he goes deeper and calls him "The Seed of David". As the 'Son', Christ was the rightful king of Israel, but this title and rule did not comprehend all that was conceived by God at the beginning. Paul does not obtrude into the epistles to the church a title that would confuse these two departments of the redemptive purpose: he omits the kingdom title and uses the deeper and more significant title "The Seed of David". Not only so, he uses this title when writing the epistle to the Romans (Rom. i. 3) and he uses it again after the dispensation of the Mystery had come in (II Tim. ii. 8), and Timothy is called upon to 'remember' this relationship, and that it formed an integral part of that which Paul called especially 'my gospel'. In both passages the resurrection is prominent. While therefore David's son Solomon and his successors are the heirs to the throne, Christ as David's SEED carries the great primeval promise of God to its glorious consummation.

The Syro-Phoenician woman was made to realize that in Christ as "The Son of David" she had no place (Matt. xv.22), but the Seed of David was declared to be the Son of God with power by the resurrection (Rom. i. 3, 4) and the good news associated with Him in that capacity was addressed to both Jew and Gentile. While the succession to the throne came through Solomon, Mary's line descends through Nathan, Solomon's brother, and so in Matthew we have 'The son of David' with special reference to the king and kingdom, whereas in Luke iii. we have "The Seed of the Woman" descending from David, through Nathan and Mary. Luke was the evangelist who laboured so faithfully with the Apostle Paul. It is Luke's account rather than Matthew's that stresses "The Seed", and there are some commentators who believe that what Paul speaks of as 'my gospel' is actually this gospel according to Luke. In like manner Christ is called "The Son of Abraham" (Matt. i. 1) but it is never so called by Paul, for just as we found that Paul speaks of Christ as the Seed of David, so also does he speak of Christ as the Seed of Abraham.

> "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ" (Gal. iii. 16).

Many of the reference books that have been consulted make Paul here quote from different passages in Genesis. The Companion Bible refers the reader to Gen. xxi. 12 "In Isaac shall thy seed be called". This passage is most certainly quoted in Rom. ix. 7, and it has one item that attracts it to Gal. iii. 16, and that is, that the word 'seed' here must be understood as being singular, because of the singular verb that follows it "it shall be called". Turpie's book on quotations refers Gal. iii. 16 to Gen. xxii. 18. We feel however that Paul would remind us that he actually cited the word "And" 'And to thy seed', and consequently we must refer to Gal. iii. 16 to such texts as Gen. xvii. 7, 8 or to Gen. xxiv. 7 which in the LXX agrees with the words quoted in Galatians. This is the opinion of Gough in his book on N.T. quotations. To these passages can be added Gen. xiii. 15.

It must be remembered that the Hebrew word zeraim, 'seeds' in the plural means 'various kinds of grain' even as the plural spermata does in I Cor. xv. 38, and Ellicott says on this passage "we hold therefore, that there is certainly a mystical meaning in the use of zera in Gen. xiii. 15; xvii. 8 as there is an argument for resurrection in Exod. iii. 6, though in neither case was the writer necessarily aware of it".

If we read the context of Gen. xiii. 15, we are met with the stated fact that the word 'seed' is used in the plural, for verse 16 goes on "And I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth . . . . . so . . . . . shall thy seed be numbered". The same is true of the context of Gen. xvii. 8, for the words 'in their generations' which comes in verse 7, and 'in their generations' which is repeated in verse 9 show that the word 'seed' is used in the plural. If we continue in our reading of Gal. iii., until we get to verse 29 we shall read:

> "And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. iii. 29).

So therefore, all the seed are 'in Christ', even as 'In Isaac' the seed were called and can be reckoned as one.

In Rom. ix., the Apostle has more to say about this seed. The high privileges that belong to Israel are set in contrast with their rejection which was imminent; and the day when Paul wrote the epistle to the Romans drew from him the arguments of Rom. ix. 6-13.

First of all he puts forward this thesis: "Not all who are out of Israel, are Israel." The second mention of Israel here does not refer to the man Jacob, but to the nation, the thought being that fleshly descent does not constitute the seed or the election, for both are by promise and by grace.

Abraham had eight sons—Ishmael by Hagar; Zimran, Jokshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak and Shuah by Keturah; and Isaac by Sarah. Ishmael was 'cast out' for he could not be the heir together with Isaac (Gen. xxi. 10). Of the sons of Keturah it is written: "Abraham gave gifts and sent them away from Isaac his son" (Gen. xxv. 6). But of Isaac we read: "And Abraham gave all that he had unto Isaac" (Gen. xxv. 5). If mere physical descent from Abraham had constituted a claim, then seven other nations descended from these seven other sons might have disputed Israel's rights, or have anticipated some arguments in favour of universalism; the deciding factor was God's sovereign election.

Again, coming closer to the problem, the Apostle carries the argument a stage further. The other nations referred to above were descended from different mothers, but Paul goes on to show that even sons born to Isaac by the same mother do not share equal privileges. Esau was the elder, Jacob was the younger, both children of the same mother, yet Esau was rejected and Jacob chosen:

> "For the children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of Him that calleth, it was said unto her, The elder shall serve the younger" (Rom. ix. 11, 12).

This is not the only place where a distinction is made between the true seed and the merely natural seed. For example, when the Lord looked upon Nathaniel, he said: "Behold an Israelite indeed" (John i. 47). And again, in John viii., we read:

> "They answered and said unto Him, Abraham is our father. Jesus said unto them, If ye were Abraham's children, ye would do the works of Abraham . . . . . Ye do the deeds of your father . . . . . Ye are of your father the devil" (John viii. 39-44).

In the epistle to the Romans itself, we have already had the distinction between the natural and the spiritual seed brought forward:

> "For he is not a Jew, which is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision, which is outward in the flesh: But he is a Jew, which is one inwardly: and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God" (Rom. ii. 28, 29).

These words are immediately followed by the question:

> "What advantage then hath the Jew? or what profit is there of circumcision?" (Rom. iii. 1).

In Gal. iv. Ishmael is likened to the unbelieving Jews 'born after the flesh', while the true believing Jews are likened to Isaac, and his mother, the freewoman, to Jerusalem that is above and free. These constitute the "Israel of God" (Gal. iv. 21-31; vi. 16). As we study the argument put forward by the Apostle in Rom. ix. an important principle emerges that extends beyond the limits of the people of Israel.

> "In Isaac shall thy seed be called (Rom. ix. 7).
> "The children of the promise are counted for the seed" (Rom. ix. 8).

The following extract from Nedarim f. 31.1 is suggestive:

> "Is not Ishmael an alien, and yet of the seed of Abraham? It is written, In Isaac shall thy seed be called. But is not Esau an alien, and yet of the seed of Isaac? No. In Isaac, but not all Isaac."

This brief quotation which we leave without comment is sufficient to show that Paul's method of argument was familiar to the Jews and would be easily followed.

When dealing with Rom. iv. we find that the words 'counted for' or 'imputed for' indicate that one thing, namely "faith", was reckoned for another, namely "righteousness", and both on account of the finished Work of Christ. In that chapter the fact is stressed that Isaac was not begotten merely by the flesh, but that his birth was a foreshadowing of the resurrection of Christ. The fact that Isaac is again brought into prominence in Rom. ix., and that mere physical descent is set aside, only the children of promise being 'counted for the seed', provides conclusive proof that the fulfillment of the purposes of God does not necessitate that every individual Jew and every physical descendant of Abraham must be saved. Known unto God from the beginning are those who constitute 'the seed of promise'.

The fact that the bulk of the nation was in a state of unbelief at the time that Paul wrote, did not in any way throw doubt upon the accuracy of prophecy and the promises. Rather the reverse, for there are a number of references in the O.T. to Israel's apostasy and the preservation of a remnant. Isaiah, in a day of departure, speaks of this remnant in i. 9; x. 20-22, and is quoted in Rom. ix. 27:

> "Though the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea, a remnant shall be saved."

On the day of Pentecost, Peter omitted the close of Joel ii. 32, because the appeal was to the nation. Subsequent events, however, proved that what Joel had prophesied was fulfilled. The omitted words—"and in the remnant whom the Lord shall call"—were applicable then, and will again be true in the future days of Israel's restoration. When, therefore, we read in Rom. xi. 26 "And so all Israel shall be saved", we must read the words 'all Israel' in the light of Rom. ix. 6-9. The 'all Israel' that shall be saved is not co-extensive with a total number of Abraham's descendants, but indicates a definite company—'children of promise', a 'reckoned seed'.

The same principle holds good with respect to 'all in Adam' and 'all in Christ'. These terms do not extend to every individual descendant of Adam, for some, like the Canaanites, ought never to have been born. At the creation of Adam, God had already in view a chosen seed. Although this purpose has been attacked by Satan and imperilled in many ways, by Cain and others, by the offspring of the sons of God and the daughters of men at the time of the Flood, and by the 'tares' in our Lord's own day (John viii. 39-44), the children of promise are preserved, and will finally reach their true goal. Universal reconciliation is true if applied to the true seed. It is a serious error when extended to spiritual Canaanites, to Tares and to those who could be called 'Children of the wicked one'.

Had the Apostle, when writing Rom. ix., intended to discuss the doctrines of free-will, eternal election and reprobation, he would have been obliged to have introduced many other arguments. His purpose in this chapter is much simpler. He is pointing out that the whole history of the people of Israel is the outworking of an elective purpose, and that if this elective purpose is satisfied for the moment by the salvation of a remnant, then there can be no truth in the suggestion that the Word of God has failed. When seen in their true context, the words 'hated' and 'loved' in verse 13 create no insuperable difficulty, but if Paul's object in Rom. ix. is misunderstood, then we must expect confusion and the inevitable evils that flow from a false representation of the sovereignty of God. Just as the advocates of eternal punishment can only find a basis for their dreadful creed by ignoring the qualifying statements of Scripture, and applying what is peculiar and limited (Matt. xxv.) to what is universal, so in Rom. ix. we can only build up the Calvinistic doctrine of eternal reprobation, with the allied error which regards sin as part of the Divine decree, if we fail to see that Paul is here dealing with the dispensational question of Israel's rejection and failure.

We conclude by giving the structure of the passage just considered.

No.29. "Ye are a chosen generation" (I Pet. ii. 9).

pp. 24 - 30

Ecclesiastes, after making its initial pronouncement 'Vanity of vanities . . . . . all is vanity', places first on the list the fact that "one generation passeth away, and another generation cometh" (Eccles. i. 2, 4). This succession of generations is so universally recognized as a part of the present scheme of things, that it may never have occurred to us, that it is of itself an evidence that some 'breach of promise' some alteration of the Divine plan may have taken place. Had the passing away of one generation in death been normal, could it at the same time have been listed with "Vanity of Vanities"? When Adam by his disobedience let sin into the world and death by sin, man made in the image of God became 'subject to vanity' (Rom. viii. 20), not willingly certainly, and in hope most blessedly, but subject to vanity nevertheless. The doom pronounced in Gen. iii. 19 "Dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return" is seen by Ecclesiastes as something that reduced man to the level of the beast of the field. He comments 'as the one dieth, so dieth the other' (iii. 19). If the coming of death has necessitated the successive passing and coming of the generations of men, then the question arises, what would have been the state of things had Adam remained unfallen?

Now we readily admit that from one point of view, this argument based upon what might have happened but which did not, is often futile, and we are well advised to face things as they are. If, however, we approach such a question with a chastened spirit, admitting all the time that what we say may nevertheless be very wide of the mark, some light upon the vexed state of affairs that now obtain may repay our modest inquiry.

It is categorically stated that God made man upright, but that men have sought out many inventions (Eccles. vii. 29), so that we can go behind the record of the fall in Eden with this fact in mind. The unfallen Adam was commanded by His Creator to 'be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth' (Gen. i. 28), yet it is very evident that, if time went on and the population of the earth continued to increase, nations and rulers would soon be facing a most serious problem of feeding and supporting these teeming millions. Only by the sad fact now that 'one generation' passes, can the earth continue to support 'the generations' that come. It appears therefore that had man not fallen and death not intervened, the succeeding generations that would have made up the number of the elect seed would have appeared without break, and that the earth would have provided abundant accommodation for them all. There would then have not been necessary the thousands of years which the ages span, and none of the 'tares' would have challenged the true seed and occupied so much of their territory.

It is safe to say, however, that no inheritance set aside for those predestinated by Divine grace, ever has written across it "With VACANT possession". In every case a usurper has to be dispossessed before the true heirs can take possession; see Deut. ii. for this in type. The multiplication of man after the fall, was not made up entirely by the true seed; Satan sowed his tares, and those tares outnumbered the true seed so disproportionately that by the time that Noah was grown to manhood 'all flesh' with the exception of one family of eight souls (I Pet. iii. 20) had so corrupted his way upon the earth, that they were completely destroyed from the earth (Gen. vi. 13), 'everything that is in the earth shall die' was the verdict (Gen. vi. 17), and "Noah only remained alive, and they that were with him in the Ark" (Gen. vii. 23).

Again, upon emerging on to dry land, Noah is commanded, as was Adam before him, "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth" (Gen. ix. 1). This increase in number however was not limited to the true seed, for we read the Midianites and the Amalekites came 'as grasshoppers for multitude' (Judges vi. 5; vii. 12) whereas Israel were greatly impoverished. The 'multitude' of the Canaanites (Judges iv. 7); of the Syrians (I Kings xx. 13); of the Ethiopians (II Chron. xiv. 11); of the children of Moab and of Ammon (II Chron. xx. 2); of the Assyrians (II Chron. xxxii. 7); of Babylon (Isa. xiii. 4); of the nations (Isa. xxix. 7); of Egypt, of Elam, of Meshech and Tubal and of Gog; and finally the multitudes in the valley of decision (Joel iii. 14), indicate something of the menace to the true seed in the earth that the multiplying of these nations must have been. The picture before the mind is a field of wheat, smothered by the growth of charlock and poppy. The passages which speak of Israel being a multitude are well known, two passages, namely Gen. xxviii. 3 and xlviii. 4 need to be corrected in the A.V. for the word there translated 'multitude' is the Hebrew word gahal meaning 'a called out assembly', or as Stephen says 'the church in the wilderness' (Acts vii. 38), and has no connection with the question of number.

While the promise was made to Abraham that his seed should be like the stars, the dust and the sand that cannot be numbered, we know that the Lord had said of them "Ye were the fewest of all people" (Deut. vii. 7) although from being 'three score and ten persons' they had become by the time of Moses wrote 'as the stars of heaven for multitude' (Deut. x. 22). At the time of the end of the Millennium the evil seed are so numerous that they are likened in number to 'the sand of the sea', and went up on 'the breadth of the earth' (Rev. xx. 8, 9). At last, however, the nations of the earth will become so decimated by war, famine and self destruction that Zechariah speaks of 'every one THAT IS LEFT of all the nations which come against Jerusalem' (Zech. xiv. 16)! It is thus that Israel, as the vehicle of the true seed on earth, come into their own, for then "Israel shall blossom, and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit" (Isa. xxvii. 6); it is then that they 'enlarge the place of their tent' and their seed 'shall inherit the Gentiles' (Isa. liv. 3) even as their fathers in small yet typical measure 'inherited' the land held by the Amorite (Deut. ii. 31).

Coming back from this survey to the time of Adam, and supposing, for the sake of argument, that Adam did not fall, that neither sin nor death were factors in the purpose, and that consequently redemption by the shedding of blood would be unknown and unnecessary, let us think further along this line. Heb. ii. 14 makes it clear that the Saviour took part in flesh and blood in order that He might be the Kinsman-Redeemer of all the seed, but John i. 14 reveals that He was made flesh so that of His fullness we all might receive, and that as the Word made flesh revealed to man the Father (John i. 18). It is something that is impossible of belief that, had there been no sin, even then God would still have been manifest in the flesh? Was the Virgin Birth that took place about 4,000 years after the creation of man, but the postponement of a most glorious and miraculous event, that had it not been for sin, would have taken place in the garden of Eden before any other children were born? Was it this that lies behind the mystery of the Temptation and the Fall, with its close connection with the two seeds, the immediate reference to childbirth, and the birth of Cain who turned out to be 'of the wicked one'? We ask these questions, we may entertain our theories, but questions and theories they must remain.

Had the coming in of death not made the successive generations follow the death of those that preceded them, the full tale of those chosen either before or since the overthrow of the world would have been early reached, and the translation from Adam to Christ effected and the different spheres of predestined glory entered. As it is, the evil seed jostle the true heirs for room and many times overrun them and keep them down both in number and in possessions. The very character of this age turns the true heirs into pilgrims and strangers, yet it still stands written "The meek shall inherit the earth" and that not only in the Sermon on the Mount, but in Psa. xxxvii. where the believer is told to fret not because of evil doers . . . . . for yet a little while and the wicked shall not be (Psa. xxxvii. 9, 10). As a consequence of what actually occurred in Gen. iii., Christ, the true Seed, is revealed as the Kinsman-Redeemer, and resurrection now becomes the gate to glory. Doubtless all has been overruled by Divine love. The rugged pathway that we have been called upon to walk, the attacks and the snares of the evil one, all contribute to that essential experience which arising out of patience, ultimately leads to a hope that maketh not ashamed (Rom. v. 4, 5).

The Scripture speaks more than once of a 'Book of Life', Paul speaks of it, saying, "My fellow labourers, whose names are in the book of life" (Phil. iv. 3), showing that those called during his prison ministry have their names therein. In Rev. iii. 5 the Divine promise strengthens the overcomer in his fight by assuring him that "I will not blot out his name out of the book of life" and the reader may find his mind turning to Rev. xxii. 19 where we read in the A.V. "God shall take away his part out of the book of life" whereas the R.V. reads "from the tree of life" with the critical texts. Those "whose names are not written in the book of life" will worship the Beast (Rev. xiii. 8), even as Rev. xvii. 8 reveals. At the Great White Throne the Book of Life is brought forward, and to keep close to the wording of the inspired original we read "And if any one was not found written in the book of life, he was cast into the lake of fire" (Rev. x. 15). The prominence given to the Book of Life in the Revelation may be because the emergence of the true seed is imminent. It refers particularly to the overcomer. See Millennial Studies in Volume XXXIX. The true seed whose names are in that book will never apostatize; the false seed whose names were never in that book will follow their own course. Some of the true seed will miss the glory of the Millennial kingdom and other spheres of blessing, and will not emerge until the Great White Throne is set up, but even there, it is revealed that some will be found written, and pass on into life that is life indeed.

A prayerful reading of Psa. cxxxix. would be extremely helpful at this point, of which the following is a quotation:

> "My substance was not hid from thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth.
> Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being unperfect; and in thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them" (Psa. cxxxix. 15, 16).

The conflict between the two seeds arose out of the disobedience of Man in relation to the knowledge of good and evil (Gen. iii.). When writing to the believers at Rome, the Apostle Paul said concerning some that "By good words and fair speeches they deceived the hearts of the simple" (Rom. xvi. 18). He then went on to speak of their 'obedience' saying that he would have them wise unto that which is good, and simple concerning evil. Now this word 'simple' akeraios occurs in the proverb "Wise as serpents, and harmless as doves" (Matt. x. 16), where it is evident that the simplicity inculcated by the Apostle is in marked contrast to the subtlety of the serpent. These words occur just before the concluding section which deals with the revelation of the mystery which had been kept in silence (Rom. xvi. 25-27). This mystery we have shown elsewhere refers to the relationship that exists between Adam, his fall and his seed. It is therefore no surprise to us to find in Rom. xvi. 20 immediately following these words that remind us of the Fall, a most definite reference to Gen. iii.

> "And the God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly."

Strictly speaking these are the last words of positive doctrine in Romans. All leads up to this.

In Rom. i., Christ is seen as coming of the Seed of David according to the flesh, and at the last, together with His redeemed, fulfilling the primal promise that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head. The doctrines of Justification and Reconciliation, together with the two key characters, Adam and Abraham, links these two references to the 'Seed'. This climax is comparable with 'the end' which shall be attained according to I Cor. xv. 24-28, the last enemy there being, not Satan, but that power which Satan wields through sin, namely death. The passage has in common with Rom. xvi. 20 the words "under . . . . . feet". These words, quoted in I Cor. xv., in Eph. i. and in Heb. ii. in the phrase "Thou hast put all things under His feet" are cited from the eighth Psalm, which has as its subscription "Upon Muth-labben".

Psa. viii. looks in two directions, back to Adam and the limited dominion given to him, and forward to Christ and the universal dominion which shall be His. In Heb. ii. the reference to the eighth Psalm is associated with His suffering and death, and to the 'world to come' oikoumene; in I Cor. xv., the reference to the eighth Psalm looks beyond the limitations of the habitable world, to the goal when God shall be all in all; while Eph. i. alludes to Psa. viii., when speaking of the principalities and powers that are subjected beneath the feet of Christ, in His capacity as Head over all things to the church. In the Berean Expositor of May 1951, Psa. viii. and its subscription is shown to speak of the "secrets of the Son", and the reader's attention is drawn to this article because of the extreme importance of the subject.

The bruising of the serpent's head was not accomplished however without suffering on the part of the Great Deliverer. "He shall bruise His heel".

It is not surprising that this primeval prophecy should have been known to the ancient world. The ancients confounded the name Zero-ashta "The seed of the woman", interpreting the word ashta to mean fire, and so giving the name Zoroaster. Throughout the mythology of the ancient world, the struggle between the Serpent and a Deliverer is well known:

> "And while sublime his awful hands are spread,
> Beneath him rolls the dragon's horrid head,
> And his right foot unmoved appears to rest,
> Fixed on the writhing monster's burnished crest" (Landseer, Researches).

In Greek mythology the constellation that sets forth the crushing of the serpent's head is called Engonasis 'the Kneeler' but this is owing to the confusion of tongues. In Chaldee E represents 'the', nko 'to crush, nahash a serpent; and so enkonahash became in Greek engonasis. The story of Achilles 'vulnerable only in his heel', is also a most evident echo of Gen. iii. 15.

The word 'bruise' used in Gen. iii. 15 is the translation of the Hebrew shuph which is by no means so simple a word. Authorities differ as to the primary meaning of the word. Gesenius derives the word from a root which means first to gape upon, then to lie in wait, to fall upon. Davidson gives the meaning 'to cover with darkness', which is very similar to Parkhurst's 'to cover, overwhelm, as with a tempest'. This word is found in Job ix. 17 "He breaketh me with a tempest", and again in Psa. cxxxix. 11 "Surely the darkness shall cover me". That some of the ancients understood this to be the meaning of the word shuph is clear, Symmachus uses episkepasei 'will hide', and a Hexaplar version kalupsei 'cover' or 'veil'. Shuph in a reduplicated form is used of a species of serpent so called from its concealing itself in the sand or in holes, and occurs in Gen. xlix. 17 "Dan shall be a serpent by the way, an adder that biteth the horses heels'. Here it will be observed, two words occur that are also found in Gen. iii. 15, shuph 'bruise', shephiphon 'adder' and aqeb 'heel', and this fact must be kept in mind when translating Gen. iii. 15.

Paul in Rom. xvi. 20 employs the word suntribo to translate shuph 'bruise'. In Rom. iii. 16 he uses the word in slightly different form, suntrimma, "Destruction and misery are in their ways". Suntribo is translated elsewhere in the N.T. "bruise" (Matt. xii. 20); break or break in pieces (Mark v. 4; xiv. 3; Luke iv. 18; John xix. 36; and Rev. ii. 27). The English word triturate 'to reduce to fine powder by rubbing', trite 'worn out by constant use or repetition', tribulation from the wearing down effect of a threshing instrument, and diatribe 'a discourse which wears away time' will no doubt occur to the reader.

Taking all things therefore into consideration, the 'bruising' of Gen. iii. 15 and of Rom. xvi. 20 indicate an agonizing and protracted process, wearing in its effect, and associated with concealment, darkness and attack. That it is a protracted struggle, the record of the ages bear witness. That it was agonizing the cry both of Gethsemane and of Calvary reveal.

> "All Thy waves and Thy billows have gone over Me" (Psa. xlii. 7).
> "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me" (Psa. xxii. 1).
> "This is your hour, and the power of darkness" (Luke xxii. 53).
> "From the sixth hour there was darkness over all the land unto the ninth hour" (Matt. xxvii. 45).

The glorious outcome of this dreadful conflict is given in Isa. liii.:

> "He shall see His seed . . . . . He shall see of the travail of His soul, and shall be satisfied" (Isa. liii. 10, 11).

The redemptive work of Christ permits of no collaboration. He alone could be the sin bearer, He alone could be the ransom. Yet the primeval prophecy of Gen. iii. 15 speaks not only of enmity between Satan and Christ, but between the woman's seed and the serpent's seed.

Inasmuch as all the seed are found in Christ (Gal. iii. 16, 29), they, like the Apostle himself 'fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ' (Col. i. 24). Like the seed of Abraham they suffer affliction and are kept waiting for their inheritance, while the iniquity of their spiritual 'Amorite' reaches its fullness (Gen. xv. 13-16).

All the seed shall at length come out with 'great substance', they shall enter into their possessions, and when that day comes 'there shall be no more the Canaanite' (Zech. xiv. 21), even as there shall be 'no more' death, curse, sorrow or sin. Satan and his angels shall no more corrupt the true seed, nor hinder and frustrate the purposes of God:

> "He shall see His seed,
> He shall see of the travail of His soul
> And shall be satisfied."

We sincerely hope that this series addressed particularly to the new reader, will have illuminated a number of expressions employed by us in the exposition of the Word, and will enable all readers to share with us and with one another, some of the wonders of our own high calling.

No.30. Noah, a type of the last Adam.
pp. 44 - 49

We have devoted considerable space to the teaching of Scripture, and to Genesis in particular, concerning the two seeds that is the substance of the primeval promise of Gen. iii. 15. We have seen that Adam is a figure of Him that was to come, and passing over much that yields rich treasure to the patient seeker after truth, we come to the great outstanding figure of Noah, who stands in connection to Adam as the second Man and the last Adam, a figure of Christ in His relation to the new earth that is yet to be, and to the sphere of resurrection in which the blessings of a new creation are to be enjoyed. Noah, like Adam, was after all a frail, erring man; his every act must not be included in the type any more than every act of Adam on the one hand, or of Joseph on the other.

Let us again attempt to envisage the pattern of this book of Genesis. We find that the book divides into two main sections. The first, Gen. i. to xi. dealing with the RACE. The second, Gen. xii. to l. dealing with the NATION.

The RACE	Adam stands at the head of the first section.
The NATION	Abraham stands at the head of the second section.
The RACE	Noah concludes the first section with the Ark.
The NATION	Joseph concludes the second section, with a coffin.
The RACE	Noah steps out into a new world. Eight souls saved.
The NATION	Joseph, anticipating be faith, inheritance and resurrection, gave a commandment concerning his bones (Heb. xi. 22).

Let us note the way that Scripture leads us to conclude that Noah was a type of Christ as "The second Man and the last Adam".

Jehovah, being the God of the age, His covenant is called the age covenant (A.V. everlasting covenant Gen. ix. 16):

> "While the earth remaineth (or while all the days of the earth continue), seed time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease" (Gen. viii. 22).

Day after day since this promise was made, the Lord has looked down upon man whose heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked, and has never again interfered with the universal ordinances here specified. Famine and other judgments there may have been in places, but never universally, like the Flood. The Lord, while on earth, drew attention to the fact that the Father "maketh His sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust" (Matt. v. 45). The Apostle Paul declared that God, while suffering all nations in time past to walk in their own ways, yet "left not Himself without witness, in that He did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness" (Acts xiv. 16, 17).

The Lord appeals to the unchanging continuance of the ordinance of day and night to indicate the like character of His covenant with Israel:

> "Thus saith the Lord, which giveth the sun for a light by day and the ordinances of the moon and of the stars for a light by night . . . . . If those ordinances depart from before Me . . . . . then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before Me all the days" (Jer. xxxi. 35, 36).

It is useless for those who claim to be 'spiritual' Israel, and so make the promises of God of none effect, to expect us to believe them when they confess that 'they really believe that all Scripture is given by inspiration of God'.

The A.V. and the R.V., by using here the words 'for ever', instead of 'all the days', commit the Lord to perpetuate Israel as a nation throughout eternity, and also an eternal perpetuation of the ordinances of the sun and moon. Neither of these propositions can be established by Scripture, and there are some passages which speak of the cessation of the ordinances of the sun, moon and stars; therefore the earnest student will be careful not to go beyond what is written. Paul, as we have seen (Acts xiv. 15-17), speaks of these things as 'a witness'. Rom. i. 19, 20 teaches us that Gentiles, by the 'things that are made', might have known the 'eternal power and deity' of God, and thereby have been deterred from idolatry. In the same manner these covenanted ordinances are God's witnesses. The recurring seed-time and harvest are a standing witness to the whole race, apart from the written revelation. How often the present life with its opportunities is likened to a seed-time, and how many are the warnings and the encouragements in view of the harvest at the end of the age! The day, too, when man may work, the night that cometh when man's work is done; the daily miracle of sleeping and awaking is a foreshadowing of that sleep of death and that morning of resurrection which is so prominent in the N.T. Scriptures. All these themes the reader can pursue with profit; we can but draw attention to the great age-time covenant, that throughout all dispensations has continued in unaltered order.

The first great dispensational fact that is made known in the new world that opened out to Noah and his descendants was that judgment is deferred. God will not again visit in the same way the sins of man as He did at the Flood; the wicked now may prosper as a green bay tree, the righteous now may be plagued all the day long; 'the end', as seen in 'the sanctuary of God', reveals the fact of a future day of individual judgment. So it is that, even though man continues in his sin, seed time and harvest, and day and night, do not cease.

In Gen. ix., the Lord lays the foundation of human government. We must go back further into history than the days of Nebuchadnezzar, for the divine institution of 'the powers that be'. We must retrace our steps to Noah. "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed; for in the image of God made He man" (Gen. ix. 6). When Cain shed his brother's blood, God made a special protection for him against the hand of his fellow-man. Here, however, in the covenant with Noah, man is appointed judge and executioner. A change also in the food of man is made. To Adam God gave every herb bearing seed, and every tree in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; now, "every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you, even as the green herb have I given you every thing". To this divine change in human diet the Apostle Paul alludes in I Tim. iv. 4, 5 "For every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, being received with thanksgiving: for it is sanctified by the Word of God and prayer". The false teaching of the apostasy, the doctrine of demons, included the forbidding of marriage and the abstinence from foods which God created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth.

To progress in what is called Spiritism, abstinence from flesh foods and from marriage is essential; the seducing spirits with their doctrines of demons seem to be characteristic of the 'latter times'. The days of Noah are to be repeated, and the spirit activities that brought about the corruption of the earth ending in the Flood are to be expected again. If the abstinence from flesh food and from marriage makes intercourse with the spirit world easier, we can perceive the wise provision in the change of human food as given to Noah, and the reason why such an institution should be discontinued as a prelude to demon activities in the latter times.

After blessing Noah, and saying, 'Be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth', God speaks of man's new relationship to the animal world; this is exactly in the same order in Gen. i. 28. There are one or two modifications, however, that indicate a change from Gen. i. 28; man is told not only to replenish the earth, but to subdue it, a type of Him who will yet subdue all things beneath His feet; further, he was to 'have dominion', another type of the Lord from heaven. This appears to be directly connected with the fact that man was created in the image of God. That the image remained after the Fall and after the Flood is abundantly testified by Gen. ix. 6 and James iii. 9. Instead of the word 'dominion', we have, in the re-institutions of Noah, 'the fear of you and the dread of you' shall be upon every beast, fowl and fish. This is something lower than dominion, and harmonizes with the general character of the age.

When Nebuchadnezzar was made 'the head of gold', he became more than king of the Babylonian Empire, or the first of a new dynasty, a dispensational change took place, almost as great as is indicated in Gen. ix. When Daniel interpreted to Nebuchadnezzar the meaning of the great image he said:

> "Thou, O king, art a king of kings: for the God of heaven hath given thee a kingdom, power, and strength, and glory. And wheresoever the children of MEN dwell, the BEASTS of the field and the FOWLS of the heaven hath He given into thine hand, and hath made thee ruler over them all" (Dan. ii. 37, 38).

The words 'hath He given into thine hand', are an echo of Gen. ix. 2, 'into your hand are they delivered'; there is also more than a coincidence in the fact that in Gen. i. 9 and Dan. ii. these things are associated with an 'image', in the one case 'the image of God', in the other a "great image whose brightness was excellent, and its form terrible" (Dan. ii. 31).

We feel that the evident relation between the dispensation connected with Adam, and that connected with Noah is important enough to receive the following tabulated list of parallels and contrasts, and we trust the interested reader will pursue the them more fully than we are able to do in these pages; we write always for BEREANS (Acts xvii. 10, 11):

Man made in the image of God to have "dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth . . . . . and God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth and subdue it" (Gen. i. 26-28).	"And God blessed Noah and his sons, and said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and the fear of you and the dread of you shall be upon every beast of the earth, and upon every fowl of the air, upon all that moveth upon the earth, and upon all the fishes of the sea, into your hand are they delivered." "In the image of God made He man" (Gen. ix. 1, 2, 6).
The seventh day rest (Gen. ii. 1-3).	Every flood date (except Gen. vii. 5) is a sabbath. Companion Bible note: The Ark rested in the seventeenth day of the month which was a Sabbath (viii. 4).
Adam has three sons, Cain, Abel and Seth (Gen. iv. 1, 2, 25). One Son, Cain, is cursed more than the earth, and becomes a fugitive and a vagabond (iv. 12).	Noah has three sons, Shem, Ham and Japheth (Gen. v. 32). One Son, Ham, the father of Canaan, is cursed, even though God had promised not to curse the ground any more, and Canaan becomes a servant of servants (ix. 25; viii. 21).
God curses Cain for shedding his brother's blood but does not sanction vengeance by human hands (Gen. iv. 10-15).	God will require the life blood from every beast and man, but now delegates the execution of judgment to man himself. "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed" (Gen. ix. 5, 6).
The Lord sets a 'mark' (oth) to protect Cain (Gen. iv. 15).	The Lord sets a bow in the cloud for a 'token' (oth) to assure all flesh (Gen. ix. 13).
God planted a garden (Gen. ii. 8).	Noah planted a garden (Gen. ix. 20).
Nakedness and shame are linked together in connection with Adam (Gen. iii. 10, 11).	Nakedness and shame are linked together in connection with Noah (Gen. ix. 21-24).
The fruit of the tree, and the fig (Gen. ii. 8; iii. 6, 7, 10).	The wine, and the vineyard (Gen. ix. 20-23).
The redemption of both man and his lost dominion is symbolized by the cherubim (Gen. iii. 24).	The redemption of both man and his lost dominion is symbolized by the animals preserved alive in the ark (Gen. vi. 13-16; viii. 1, 17-19).
The serpent beguiled the woman and brought about the curse (Gen. iii. 24; II Cor. xi. 3).	The sons of God by their actions towards the daughters of men, bring about the Flood (Gen. vi. 1-4).
All the days of Adam were 930 years (Gen. v. 5).	All the days of Noah were 950 years (Gen. ix. 29).

Many other details could doubtless be collected, and many instructive lessons be learned from the changes introduced into the new dispensation. We trust that sufficient has been given above to stimulate the reader to individual effort.

No.31. Babel (Gen. x. 8 - 12; xi. 1 - 9).
pp. 64 - 69

In the midst of the list of names given in Gen. x. we are arrested by one or two digressions. One son of Cush became so great that his name and prowess became a proverb, "Wherefore it is said, Even as Nimrod the mighty hunter before the Lord" (verse nine). The other digressions in this chapter are the references to the Canaanites (18, 19); the statement that Shem was the father of all the children of Eber (21); the division of the earth in the days of Peleg (25); and the dwelling of the sons of Joktan (29, 30). We propose in this article to consider the place that Nimrod occupies in the outworking of the purpose of God.

The name Nimrod is from the Hebrew marad, to rebel. The Merodach of the Bible (Jer. l. 2) is allied with the name Nimrod. The Accadian Merodach was called Amaruduk or Amarudu, and became in Assyro-Babylonian, Marduk. The suffix uk is dropped in the Hebrew, and the prefix ni, assimilating the name 'to a certain extent to the initial forms of the Hebrew verbs', was added giving us the Hebrew name Ni-marad or Nimrod. We would not say that all error is counterfeit truth, simply because our limited knowledge would not justify the assertion, but we do say that much error, vital error, is counterfeit truth, and this is seen in the lies of Satan spoken in Eden and incarnate in Nimrod.

Merodach (i.e. Nimrod deified) is the creator and saviour in this unholy parody. He it is who undertakes to do battle with Tiamat, and to him it was spoken, 'Fear not, and make merry, for thou bruise the head of Tiamat'. Tiamat may be 'the deep' (Heb. tehom) personified. Here is one of the primal declarations concerning the Seed diverted from its true object. Merodach, as a result of his decision to become the avenger and the redeemer, is exalted above all gods. 'Among the high gods thou art highest; thy command is the command of Anu, O Merodach, our avenger, we give thee sovereignty over the entire universe. Thy weapon will ever be irresistible. May Merodach, the mighty overseer of the heavenly spirits, exalt thy head'.

What is true concerning the usurpation of the glory and offices of Christ in this satanic scheme, is true also of all that is associated with his 'gospel'. A complete religion dealing with life, death, and judgment, salvation by works, penances and rites, a Christless creed, and the very mystery of iniquity. With Nimrod, Babylon and all that Babylon stands for are associated together. "Babylon is taken, Bel is confounded, Merodach is broken in pieces" (Jer. l. 2).

Nimrod, the rebel, is the first one that Scripture records as founding a kingdom. "The beginning of his kingdom was Babel." Up to this time an earthly king had been unknown; how suggestive of the character and hidden purpose of human kingdoms it is that the first king was a rebel and the first kingdom began at Babylon! That the line of Divine purpose was to flow and develop through Shem is evident by a comparison of the generations given in Gen. x. and xi. Nimrod was therefore the next great satanic attack upon that purpose, and from its first mention in Genesis, until its final mention in Revelation, Babel or Babylon has been the seat of all the rebellion and opposition to the Divine purpose throughout the world. Babylon is called "The Mother of . . . . . all abominations" (Rev. xvii. 5).

Before we proceed to the more detailed account of the origin of the name Babel, as given in Gen. xi., we will endeavour to show how the great rebel has been foisted upon mankind in the endeavour of Satan to usurp the glory and the kingdom of the Son of God. Bunsen states that the religious system of Egypt was derived from 'the primitive empire of Babel'. Birch, dealing with the Babylonian cylinders, is quoted by Layard as saying, "The Zodiacal signs . . . . . show unequivocally that the Greeks derived their notions and arrangements of the zodiac (and consequently their mythology, that was intertwined with it), from the Chaldees". Ouvaroff in his work on the Eleusinian mysteries states that these mysteries were transplanted from Egypt, which in turn received them from the East, 'the centre of science and civilization'. Not only did Egypt and Greece derive their religion from Babylon, but so also did the Phoenicians, so Macrobius says in his Saturnalia; and wherever man is found and religion is professed, beneath the superficial differences of names and ritual lies the one great primitive lie originated at Babylon and linked with Nimrod.

Egypt, under the titles Isis and Osiris; India under the title Isi and Iswara; Asia as Cybele and Deoius; Pagan Rome as Fortuna and Jupiter-puer (the boy Jupiter); Greece as Ceres, the great Mother with the babe at her breast; China as Shing Moo with her child in her arms; the Papal Rome as the Madonna and child, all these and many more are the result of the original idolatry set up at Babylon to turn the minds of men away from the first promise of the true Seed of the woman to Satan's counterfeit. The Babylonians worshiped Semiramis under the name of the great Goddess Mother, and it was from her son that she derived all her glory and claim to deity. By a strange process the husband of Semiramis came to be worshipped as the seed (her son), and that son and husband was NIMROD himself. Babylon, both in Old and New Testaments, stands forward as the great symbol of Anti-God, even as Nimrod usurps all the titles and prerogatives of Christ. (For fuller details as to these titles, the reader is referred to that master-work, The Two Babylons by Hislop).

Let us now trace the story of Babylon to see its place in the order of things. Babylon does not come into the page of Scripture (after the two references of Gen. x. and xi.), until the time of Israel's deposition draws near. God's king, David, and God's city, Jerusalem, had been chosen, but until David's greater Son should reign the purpose of God must flow in other channels. Universal sovereignty goes by Divine appointment to Babylon, to be retained in Gentile succession until Babylon and Babylonianism should be destroyed. Read Daniel for this. Isa. xiii. contains 'the burden of Babylon', "And Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah". In chapter xiv. 4, the king of Babylon is addressed, and what is said is prophetic of the future antichrist who said, "I will be like the Most High". Again, in 'the burden of the desert of the sea', comes the words, "Babylon is fallen, is fallen" (xxi. 9). In Isa. xlvii. 1-15 we have another prophecy of Babylon's doom. Babylon is addressed as a woman that had been called 'the lady of kingdoms', and which had usurped the Divine prerogative by saying, "I AM, and none else beside Me" (verse 8).

Jeremiah speaks the word of the Lord against Babylon, and occupies chapters l. & li. with threatenings of wrath to come. The vengeance that falls upon Babylon is 'the vengeance of His temple'. "Babylon hath been a golden cup in the Lord's hand that made all the earth drunken: the nations have drunk her wine; therefore the nations are mad" (Jer. li. 7). Babylon is addressed as a 'destroying mountain' in li. 25, and is threatened with judgment. "I will make thee a burnt mountain" (li. 25). "As Babylon hath caused the slain of Israel to fall, so at Babylon shall fall the slain of all the earth" (li. 49). Many similar passages of great importance come in these two chapters of Jeremiah which we cannot stay to quote. Jeremiah concludes with a solemn charge to Seraiah, who was going to Babylon to take the book wherein all these judgments were written, to read them there, to bind a stone to it, and to cast it into the Euphrates, and say, "Thus shall Babylon sink, and shall not rise from the evil that I will bring upon her: and they shall be weary" (li. 64).

Just as in Isaiah we have history intertwined with prophecy, a literal Sennacherib foreshadowing the future Antichrist in his blasphemy and his doom, so Jeremiah's prophecy concerning Babylon had reference partly to the overthrow of Babylon of the Medes (Jer. li. 11), and partly to the future overthrow of the Babylon yet to be revived again in these last days. The book of the Revelation devotes considerable space to the fall of Babylon. Six times Babylon is mentioned and five times out of the six she is spoken of as being "great" together with six other references to her as 'the great city' or 'great whore'. Let us notice what is said in this last prophecy of the Word. "And there followed another angel, saying, Babylon is fallen, is fallen, that great city, because she made all nations drink the wine of the wrath of her fornication" (Rev. xiv. 8). This utterance has on the one side the aionian gospel, with its call to "worship Him that made heaven and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters" (verse 7). On the other there is the threat of awful judgment upon any one who worships the beast and his image, and who receives his mark in his forehead, or in his hand.

The next reference is in chapter xvi. 19 "And great Babylon came in remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of His wrath". A most mighty earthquake shakes the earth at the pouring out of the seventh vial, the great city is divided into three parts, the cities of the nations fall, every island flees away, and mountains are not found. The judgment of Babylon is in a setting of world-wide judgment. Then follows in chapter xvii. a description of this great city, and its judgment. It is likened to a woman sitting upon a scarlet coloured beast having seven heads and full of the names of blasphemy. The woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet colour, and decked with gold, precious stones and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication: and upon her forehead was a name written, a mystery or secret, "Babylon the great, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth" (xvii. 5). The woman was drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus. Her destruction is brought about by the ten horns which the beast carried, who are ten kings that reign for the brief hour of the Beast's dominion.

Chapter xviii. follows with a further description of the character and fall of Babylon. Again an angel cries, "Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen, and become the habitation of demons, and the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird" (xviii. 2). As chapter xvii. tells of the kings of the earth, so xviii. links all nations and kings in the participation in Babylon's impure vintage. Jeremiah's command to Seraiah is taken up and amplified:

> "A mighty angel took up a stone like a great millstone, and cast it into the sea, saying, Thus with violence shall the great city Babylon be thrown down, and shall be found no more at all. And the voice of harpers, and musicians, and of pipers, and trumpeters, shall be heard no more at all in thee; and no craftsman, of whatever craft he be, shall be found any more in thee; and the sound of a millstone shall be heard no more at all in thee; and the light of a candle shall shine no more at all in thee; and the voice of the bridegroom and of the bride shall be heard no more at all in thee; for thy merchants were the great men of the earth; for by thy sorceries were all nations deceived. And in her was found the blood of prophets, and of saints, and of all that were slain upon the earth" (Rev. xviii. 21-24).

Let us note these closing words: they may be a figure of speech. They may, however, be very awfully true. All the blood! not only of prophets, saints and martyrs, but every murder and every execution, every war and every assassination, all traceable back to this system of iniquity and to the father of lies (a murderer from the beginning), who, to thwart the purpose of the Most High, made his throne at Babylon. Not only is the influence and the judgment of Babylon world-wide in its effect (the very heavens resound with Hallelujahs at her downfall), heaven itself can hold the glorious Son of God no longer. He rides forth to conquer and to rule, and the reign of righteousness follows swiftly on the destruction of that city which symbolized the dread authority of the prince of darkness.

We must now return to the book of Genesis, to learn somewhat more of the beginnings of Babel. Although the division of the earth among the sons of Noah comes before the record of the building of the tower of Babel, the scattering that took place at the confusion of tongues was the cause of the division recorded in chapter x. There in chapter x. 5, 20 and 31, the descendants of Japheth, Ham and Shem are divided according to their tongues. This therefore must have come after the record of chapter xi., for there we read "The whole earth was of one language, and of one speech" ('one lip, and one in words'). The idea that the tower of Babel was built 'to reach unto heaven' is not Scriptural. The words are more correctly rendered "whose top with the heaven", and far more likely denote a tower like the ancient temples of Denderah and Esneh which have the signs of the zodiac represented on them.

Nimrod went back, it would appear to that deserted city, finished it, and sought to overthrow the purpose of God by becoming the first earthly king. From this, apparently, small beginning has spread all the harlot abominations of the earth, and as we saw by reading the Revelation, no millennium is possible until that city and its system is judged before earth and heaven.

No.32. The Foundation Covenant (Gen. xii. 1 - 4).
pp. 84 - 88

TERAH is the watershed of the O.T., even as his generation is the central one of the eleven in Genesis. His most famous son, Abraham, not only left his city and his home but we nowhere read, 'these are the generations of Abraham', the whole of his wonderful life being ranged under the 'generations of Terah'. Abraham beyond all things else sets forth the principle of faith. He is the first one of whom the O.T. records that he believed in the Lord. The twelfth chapter of Genesis opens with the words:

> "Now the Lord had said to Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will show thee."

Stephen in his speech before the Council said:

> "The God of glory appeared unto our father Abraham, when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran, and said unto him, Get thee out of thy country" (Acts vii. 2, 3).

The Lord not only called Abraham out from Ur of the Chaldees, but from his kindred, yet the first movement after the words were spoken to Abraham is that of Terah:

> "And Terah took Abram his son, and Lot the son of Haran his son's son, and Sarai his daughter-in-law, his son Abram's wife; and they went forth with them from Ur of the Chaldees, to go into the land of Canaan; and they came unto Haran, and dwelt there . . . . . and Terah died in Haran" (Gen. xi. 31, 32).

The call of God to Abraham involved separation of a very drastic character, and we shall see that the Lord did not lay upon him the whole burden at once; he was to leave country and kindred, but not at first his father's house; he obeyed the call so far as leaving his country was concerned, and Heb. xi. records the step of faith with Divine approval. Scripture does not say, 'and Abraham took Terah'; it is put the other way, "and Terah took Abram his son". Terah's name means a 'traveler', or a 'wanderer', and as a type he may well represent that class who 'go out', not by faith, but by reason of temperament; the call that quickened Abram with a living faith acted upon the fleshly mind of Terah, and he too felt attracted by the journey.

A glance at the map shows that Terah and his family journeyed about 600 miles with Abram to get to Haran, but the map also reveals another thing, the route never took them across the river Euphrates. Even though 600 miles separated them from Ur of the Chaldees they were not separated from all that Chaldea meant to God. Haran was famous not only as a frontier town of the Babylonian Empire, but for the worship of the self-same god that made Ur of the Chaldees famous too. Terah was not a Hebrew, he never passed over. It will be remembered that Pharaoh was willing to let Israel go and worship the Lord "in the land", but neither Terah nor Pharaoh had the "Hebrew" spirit. Before the record is given of Abram's departure from Haran, there is recorded the great promise made by the God of glory, introducing into the page of Scripture the purpose of election, so far as nations are concerned. The Scriptures are very exact, and we are never likely to believe them too implicitly: if we compare Gen. xii. 1 with Acts vii. 2-4 we shall find that Stephen makes an omission of one term. He tells us that the God of glory called Abraham from his country and kindred, but he does not say, "and from thy father's house". Abraham's action, therefore, in allowing his father and relatives to accompany him as far as Haran was quite within the command he had received. Upon the death of his father the added words, "and from thy father's house", make up the full statement, and "so Abram departed, as the Lord had spoken unto him". Nature's ties were no longer to hold him; a second separation must now be made. How kindly the Lord leads on! Still further and deeper trials of faith await Abram, but he is not tried above that which he is able to bear.

The Lord in Gen. xii. 1-3 makes the first of a series of eight covenants with Abraham. In this first covenant we have a promise, every item of it, as we shall see, being personal to Abraham:

> "Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will shew thee.
> And I will make of thee a great nation,
> And I will bless thee,
> And make thy name great,
> And thou shall be a blessing,
> And I will bless them that bless thee,
> And curse him that curseth thee,
> And in thee shall all the nations of the earth be blessed."

This great covenant is divided into related groups of promise, as follows:

A | Get thee OUT, the Lord had said.
B | COUNTRY, KINDRED, and HOUSE. A land shown to Abraham.
C | a | The promise of the GREAT nation.
b | The promise to BLESS Abraham.
a | The promise of the GREAT name.
b | The promise that Abraham shall be a BLESSING.
(Conditional clause added).
B | ALL FAMILIES of the earth blessed in Abraham.
A | So Abram DEPARTED, as the Lord had spoken.

Here we have the germ of the whole of God's covenants with Abraham, viz., Israel and the Nations. Like Nebuchadnezzar's dream, which stands on the threshold of the times of the Gentiles, this covenant spans and embraces the whole period and scope of the Abrahamic covenant, all other covenants and promises, including even Paul's witness to justification by faith in Romans and Galatians, being but expansions and details of this one grand covenant.

Abraham must ever stand out in the Scriptures as a giant of faith, and it behooves such pigmies as ourselves to be careful of our criticism, yet we realize that the faithful Word presents to us in Abraham a man of like infirmities with ourselves, and if we learn salutary lessons from the recorded failure of this man of faith, it need not minister to our pride, nor lessen the testimony to faith which Abraham gave:

> "By faith, when he was called . . . . . obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went."
>
> "So Abraham departed, as the Lord had spoken to him."

The question that is in our mind concerns Lot. The Lord had called Abram and he obeyed. He had told him to leave country, kindred and father's house. Did Abram fully obey this part of the command? The verse in Gen. xii. says, "So Abram departed, as the Lord had spoken unto him, and Lot went with him". Lot was the son of Haran, therefore Abram's nephew (Gen. xi. 27, 31; xii. 5; xiv. 12), and so he was Abram's kindred, and Abram had been commanded to get out from his kindred. Lot seems to be mentioned several times in a somewhat detached way, "and Lot with him" (xiii. 1). "And Lot also, which went with Abram" (xiii. 5). A relieved feeling seems to come when we read, "And the Lord said unto Abram, after that Lot was separated from him, Lift up now thine eyes" (xiii. 14). The ties of the flesh are strong, "and Lot went with him". Whether we are right in this, we cannot say; true it is that Lot's presence brought neither peace nor blessing to Abram, and the entry of Lot into the land of Canaan ultimately lost him his wife, his home, and finally his character. If we will but examine ourselves we shall find the most of our fullest acts of obedience, and sincerest endeavours to walk a separate path, have been somewhat spoiled by the Terahs and the Lots who will not leave us to wholly follow the Lord. The silence of Scripture as to this in the record of faith in Heb. xi., is a consolation; the Lord is not swift to mark iniquity, if He were, who would stand?

When Abram reached Sichem and the plain of Moreh, the Lord appeared unto him. Abram had crossed the Jordan, and penetrated nearly half-way through the country known as Samaria; Gilgal, where the reproach of Israel was rolled away some years afterwards, is near this place. It looks as though Abram had to venture upon the word of the Lord, walking by faith. Without further vision or revelation, surrounded by the Canaanites (ever the foes of faith), he was put to a severe test. The silence is at length broken by the appearance of the Lord, and by the utterance of a single promise, 'unto thy seed will I give this land'. Following this promise comes Abram's response, "and there he builded . . . . ." (xii. 7). What did he build? Surely, if the land was his freehold, and his seed's for ever, he will at once begin to build a nice comfortable house, he will be justified in adding all the latest improvements that the Canaanites may have invented, and so show that his faith was real and matter of fact, that he really believed that the land belonged to him. So reasons the flesh. Abram never built anything other than altars throughout his pilgrimage. Cain and Nimrod built cities, the whole family of mankind attempt to build a city and a tower and make a great name; Noah and Abram built altars.

There is in this a principle, true now as then, and expressed for all time in the words of Him Who spake with authority and not as the Scribes:

> "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you" (Matt. vi. 33).

The fitting accompaniment to the altar is the tent. Verse 8 tells us that Abram pitched his tent, having Bethel on the west, and Hai on the east, and there he builded an altar unto the Lord, and called upon the name of the Lord. Verse 9 says, "and Abram journeyed"; the word indicates the pulling up of tent pegs. There was a definite purpose and choice in all this:

> "By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tents with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise."
> (Why?) "For he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God" (Heb. xi. 9, 10).

The spiritual pilgrim in effect judges that no city of man's building has foundations. In spite of the testimony of our senses, faith knows that "that which is seen is temporal, but that which is not seen is eternal".

> "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth" (Heb. xi. 13).

Do we 'declare plainly' that such is our faith and hope? Our life and hope and inheritance are found at the right hand of God. Do we, by setting our mind on things above, and by exhibiting small concern for the fashion of this world that passeth away, do we 'declare plainly' that here we have no continuing city? Our citizenship is in heaven, and as such we cannot but be strangers and pilgrims on the earth; the altar and the tent are the two great characteristics of the pilgrim walk. The altar recognizes the claims of a holy God, the tent the necessity of separation for a holy pilgrim people.

Heb. xi. tells us that the fact that Abraham was willing to dwell in a tent in the land of promise, was due to the vision of faith—'he looked for a city that had foundations'. Abraham was not a nomad by temperament, he did not choose the tent out of preference, he longed for city life, he looked for a city. Like others who found here no continuing city, he sought one to come. Abraham, however, realized that to have fellowship with God meant that he must share the rejection of the Lord. The altar and the city come together in Heb. xiii. 10-14, "We have an altar . . . . . here we have no continuing city". That means practically for us, "the tent". In other words, like Abraham, we must "go forth unto Him without the camp, bearing His reproach".

No.33. Joseph---The Dominion Promised and Postponed (Gen. xxxvii. - xxxix.).

pp. 109 - 114

We have seen in earlier studies that the first section of Genesis which deals with the RACE is bounded by two typical figures, Adam and Noah. We see also that the second section which deals with the NATION is bounded by two typical figures, Abraham and Joseph.

Passing over the chapter that is devoted to the generations of Esau we open at Gen. xxxvii. and read:--

> "And Jacob dwelt in the land wherein his father was a stranger, in the land of Canaan. These are the generations of Jacob. Joseph . . . . ."

Jacob's generations are not written as from Padan-aram and the house of Laban, but from Canaan, the land of pilgrimage. Jacob uses this word 'stranger' in xlvii. 9 when he speaks of the years of his 'pilgrimage'. The pilgrim character of the family of faith is a very fundamental of dispensational truth. All the exhortations to leave the world and its ways, which so characterize the writings of the N.T., emphasize this truth.

The second item of importance in this statement of the generations of Jacob is the fact that it is practically the life story of Joseph. We do not read, "These are the generations of Jacob. Reuben . . . . ." but "Joseph". The other sons are referred to as 'his brethren'. Joseph is pre-eminently the great type of Christ in Genesis, and this again leads us to another great fundamental of all truth; whether doctrinal or dispensational, "Christ is all". The first great type of Christ in Genesis is Adam, 'who was a figure of Him that was to come' (Rom. v. 14). The last is Joseph, to whom is 'added' his brother Benjamin, the son of the right hand equally a figure of the same blessed One. Adam's story is of terrible failure involving all his seed in ruin. Joseph's story is one of suffering as a path to glory with the object that he may 'preserve life'.

It may be interesting to note the complete little picture that Genesis presents in the seven great types of Christ that it contains:--

A | ADAM—Sin forfeit life.
  B | ABEL—The accepted offering.
    C | SETH—Substitution.
      D | NOAH—Atonement ("pitch").
    C | ISAAC—Substitution.
  B | JUDAH—Suretyship.
A | JOSEPH—Sufferings lead to preservation of life.

The record in Gen. xxxvii. does not say, 'Now Jacob loved Joseph', but "Israel loved Joseph". Israel, the prince with God, loved Joseph more than all his children. Joseph's position in the family is indicated by the "coat of many colours" which his father made for him. The marginal alternative of the A.V. 'pieces' is to be rejected. The embroidered garments of Aaron—the blue, the purple, and the scarlet, were symbols of the priestly office. Joseph was the heir and the priest of the family. When Rebekah prepared Jacob to deceive Isaac and to seek the birthright, she took 'raiment of desires'. Throughout Scripture clothing has a symbolic value. The result of Joseph's pre-eminence is prophetic of Christ. "His brethren . . . . . hated him."

Joseph's career cannot be dissociated from dreams, and they run in pairs:

1st pair	Joseph's dreams of pre-eminence. Lead to prison and suffering.
2nd pair	The prisoner's dreams being interpreted. Lead to deliverance from prison.
3rd pair	Pharaoh's dreams being interpreted. Lead to glory and honour.

The words of his brethren at the recital of his first dream anticipate the words of the enemies of Christ:

> "Shalt thou indeed reign over us? or shalt thou indeed have dominion over us? And they hated him yet the more for his dreams and for his words" (Gen. xxxvii. 8).

The statement made concerning Jacob—"his father observed the saying" (Gen. xxxvii. 11)—upon the narration of the second dream reminds one of the words concerning Mary that she "kept all these things and pondered them in her heart" (Luke ii. 19).

It is very strongly emphasized in the sequel that the envy and hatred that sought to prevent Joseph's dreams from becoming accomplished facts were over-ruled by God to bring about their fulfillment:

> "So now it was not you that sent me hither, but God: and He hath made me a father to Pharaoh, and a lord of all his house, and a ruler throughout all the land of Egypt" (Gen. xlv. 8).

So Peter could say:

> "Him, being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain" (Acts ii. 23).

Joseph's dreams spoke of rulership over his brethren. The rejection of Joseph by his brethren temporarily suspended this prophecy from fulfillment, and during the interval he became ruler and saviour among the Gentiles, reaching the destined rulership at a subsequent period. The 'postponement theory' cannot be proved from a type, but the fitness is nevertheless confirmatory. Christ was heralded as a King. His rejection as such was foreknown; and when at length He is acknowledged King, it will be found that He is Saviour as well.

It is also surely not an accident that it is one named Judah (Judas in Greek) who suggested selling Joseph for twenty pieces of silver, while Judas sold Christ for thirty pieces of silver. It was the father who sent his beloved son Joseph to his brethren, the latter saying "Come now, therefore, and let us slay him". It was the Father Who sent His well beloved Son to His brethren in the flesh: these received Him not, but rather said, "This is the heir; come, let us kill Him".

We learn from the last verse of Gen. xxxvii. that Joseph was sold to Potiphar; and then, before we are told anything further, a part of the life of Judah is interjected, the theme of Joseph at Potiphar's house being resumed in chapter xxxix. Judah falls into temptation, and the signet, bracelets and staff which he left behind are a witness against him. Joseph stands firm under a similar temptation; and the garment which he left behind, though used against him falsely, was a witness really of his integrity. Joseph stands where Judah falls; how this is repeated in the temptation of Christ is recorded in Matt. iv. Those three temptations in the wilderness have their parallels in the wilderness wanderings of Israel, the three quotations used by Christ being from the book of Deuteronomy.

The pathway to glory for Joseph was via prison and shame. It was so with his blessed Antitype too, Who declared that He must needs have suffered these things and to have entered into His glory. When Joseph was in the house of Potiphar, we read, "The Lord was with Joseph" (Gen. xxxix. 2). This is repeated when Joseph was cast into prison (verse 21). This must have been the great sustaining fact upon which Joseph leaned during his severe trial (Psa. cv. 19). It was the consciousness too, of the Father's nearness that was the great joy of Christ during His earthly ministry.

We conclude this section with the quaint rendering of an early English version:

> "The Lord was with Joseph, and he was a luckie fellow" (Gen. xxxix. 2).

Joseph sets before us in his remarkable career a clear type of that feature which is so prophetic of Christ—:the sufferings and the glory that should follow".

The first half of the story leaves Joseph in the lowest depths; but we shall not leave the study of his typical career until we see him seated at the right hand of Majesty. The dreams of Joseph led to his exile; the dreams of Pharaoh led to Joseph's exaltation.

> "And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, Forasmuch as God hath shewed thee all this, there is none so discreet and wise as thou art: Thou shalt be over my house, and according unto thy word shall all my people be ruled: only in the throne will I be greater than thou" (Gen. xli. 39, 40).

Pharaoh called Joseph's name Zaphnath-paaneah. The A.V. gives a possible meaning in the margin by considering it a Coptic word, but more recent discovery in Ancient Egyptian brings to light the true meaning of the name and its prophetic import. Zaph-en-to was a title of the last of the Shepherd Kings of Egypt and means 'The nourisher of the world', Zap means 'abundance'.

> "Its well ascertained meaning is 'food', especially 'corn' or 'grain' in general" (Canon Cook).

Nt (nath) is the preposition 'of', common on the early monuments. Pa is the definite article 'the'. Anch signifies 'life'. Thus one name of Memphis is ta-anch, the land of life, or, the land of the living. The name therefore means "Food of the life", and is a far-off anticipating of that wondrous claim which the Greater than Joseph was to make when He said "I am the Bread of Life".

Is there not also an echo of Pharaoh's words in the lips of Mary? Pharaoh said, when the people had no bread, "Go unto Joseph; what he saith to you, do" (Gen. xli. 55). Mary said to the servants, when they had no wine, "Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it" (John ii. 5).

Chapter xlii. resumes the broken thread of the story of Jacob and his sons. One event, however, has happened that it is important to remember. Joseph blesses the Gentiles during his rejection by his brethren. He is united to a Gentile by marriage while exiled from his father's house. The names of his two children speak of forgetting his toil, and his father's house, and being fruitful in the land of his affliction. The famine at length appears and among those who are forced to sue at Joseph's feet are his ten brethren. The story is a long one and we will not spoil it by attempting to summarize, we know how it all ends. The outstanding typical features number among them the following:

(1) THE REPENTANCE OF ISRAEL.—When Joseph's brethren came before him and are charged with being spies, they aver that they are twelve brethren, the sons of one man in the land of Canaan; and they say:

> "The youngest (brother) is this day with our father, and one is not" (Gen. xlii. 13).

The mention of the fate of Joseph and the harshness of their treatment at the hands of the ruler of Egypt causes their conscience to awaken and they said:--

> "We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul, when he besought us, and we would not hear; therefore is this distress come upon us" (Gen. xlii. 21).

Reuben uses even more forceful words: "Behold, also his blood is required" (Gen. xlii. 22). The type is clear. Israel must repent before they can be blessed.

(2) THE REVELATION TO ISRAEL.—"Then Joseph could not refrain himself . . . . . I am Joseph" (Gen. xlv. 1-4). When Israel's blindness is removed and for the first time they recognize the Lord Jesus as their Messiah, "They shall look upon Me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for Him" (Zech. xii. 10). These are the words of prophecy.

First there is the revelation of the person, "I am Joseph". Then follows the revelation of the purpose, "God did send me before you to preserve life . . . . . to save your lives by a great deliverance" (Gen. xlv.4-7).

(3) THE RESTORATION OF ISRAEL.—Joseph could not be content until 'all Israel' were safely beneath his care. Benjamin had been brought before him by the strategy of love, and now nothing must hinder the journey of his father Jacob.

One more feature of fundamental importance is marked for us in Heb. xi. If we were to select the one act in Joseph's life which should eclipse all others as an act of faith, we hardly feel that the one selected by the inspired writer of Heb. xi. would be our choice. There in Heb. xi. 22 we read:

> "By faith Joseph, when he died, made mention of the departing of the children of Israel; and gave commandment concerning his bones."

"Concerning his bones!" What is there in these words to deserve such prominence? Joseph linked the deliverance of Israel with resurrection.

(4) THE RESURRECTION OF ISRAEL.—Joseph stresses the fact that the land of promise was that which God sware to Abraham, to Isaac and to Jacob (Gen. l. 24), and Christ shows that the title "The God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob" proves the doctrine of Resurrection (Matt. xxii. 23-33). Ezek. xxxvii. connects resurrection with restoration.

We are conscious that much more precious truth lies near the surface of this remarkable history. We have indicated a few fundamentals of dispensational importance. One more feature must bring this article to a close. The dreams of Joseph, though their realization was postponed, were eventually fulfilled, but the postponement shut the door upon Israel for a time and opened it to the Gentiles. So the rejection of Christ by His brethren, their refusal to 'have this man reign over them' deferred the time of their restoration. When Israel is at length restored, the Gentiles will have been blessed for a period of two thousand years, or as the type has it, "For these TWO years hath the famine been in the land" (Gen. xlv. 6).

The Lord who was despised and rejected shall yet be honoured and exalted, and in this glorious fact is all our hope and desire.

The name Joseph means adding, given by Rachel at his birth, for said she "The Lord shall add to me another son" (Gen. xxx. 24). Eve also, it will be remembered, had another son added, namely Seth who completes the type partly set forth by Abel whom Cain slew. In due time the other son was born, but his birth cost Rachel her life.

> "And it came to pass, as her soul was departing (for she died), that she called is name Ben-oni (son of my sorrow): but his father called him Benjamin (son of the right hand)" (xxxv. 18).

However important was the place that Joseph was destined to fulfil, his name was a continual reminder of the inadequacy even of his full life to set forth the finished work of the coming Saviour. Benjamin stresses the resurrection and the session of the Saviour at 'the right hand', without which salvation would not have been possible nor the work of redemption complete.

No.34. Moses---The Principle of Separation (Exod. v. 1).
pp. 114 - 116

"Let My people go" (Exod. v. 1).
The Principle of Separation.

The demand of Moses made when he entered into the presence of Pharaoh, and Pharaoh's refusal and attempts at compromise, form a type of the age-lasting feud between the "Church and the World":

> "Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Let My people go, that they may hold a feast unto Me in the wilderness" (Exod. v. 1).

No feast to the Lord could be held in Egypt, the type of the world. The wilderness was the place chosen by the Lord for worship. Pilgrims and strangers may worship acceptably; slaves to the world and the flesh cannot worship in spirit. In Exod. v. 3 the two terms are added that are typically suggestive. God is called "The God of the Hebrews", suggesting the separate character of His people. The journey that the Israelites must take in order to worship God was to be a "three days' journey". From the Creation week onwards the third day sets forth resurrection. True worship is not of the world (Egypt), it is offered by a free people (Let My people go), and a separate people (Hebrews), and is upon resurrection ground (three days). One sacrifice only was offered in Egypt, the Passover; all else was reserved for the Tabernacle in the wilderness.

Pharaoh's answers, "Who is the Lord?"; "I know not the Lord, neither will I let Israel go"; "Get you to your burdens", are, in their turn, typical of the world's attitude towards spiritual service. The 'burdens of Egypt' are far more important than the service of the Lord, and even among the Lord's people Martha finds more imitators than Mary, so much of Egypt do we all carry with us.

The judgments of God begin after Pharaoh's refusal, and in chapter viii. Pharaoh calls for Moses and Aaron and suggests the first compromise, "Go ye, sacrifice to your God IN THE LAND" (25). God had said 'in the wilderness' and a "three days' journey". Pharaoh says, in effect, 'You can worship your God, I do not ask you to bow down to any of mine; you can offer your sacrifice, but there is no necessity for making yourselves so peculiar, sacrifice to your God in the land'.

The first great snare set by the god of this age is that of mixing the world with the church. Moses repudiated the compromise, the first reason being that the very centre and basis of their worship was an abomination to the Egyptians. The world is quite willing to speak of "Jesus", and especially so if they can refer to him as the 'Galilean' or the 'Carpenter', but the centre of the faith, the cross, "Christ crucified", is an 'offense'. The cross reveals the hopeless and helpless condition of the flesh, and this is an 'abomination to the Egyptians'.

The second reason for repudiating the suggestion is just as strong as the first, but one that we are apt to forget. The suggestion ran counter to God's express statement, and that is enough to condemn it. When He says 'wilderness' and "three days' journey", to debate the question of 'in the land' is sin. Upon this resolute stand being taken by Moses, Pharaoh appears willing to lengthen the chain, but it is still a chain:--

> "I will let you go, that ye may sacrifice to the Lord your God in the wilderness" (Exod. viii. 28).

So far, that is good. Pharaoh, moreover, does not speak irreverently of God; he uses the full title of the Lord. The snare, however, is still set. "Only"—ah yes! the world will give a good length of chain. "Only ye shall not go VERY FAR AWAY." The contested point is the clear-cut division between the Church and the World. While many would hesitate to offer the abominations of the Egyptians IN THE LAND, they are ensnared at the HALF-WAY HOUSE. Let the Church have its separate gathering, its ecclesiastical laws, its ordained priests, its ritual, its 'form of godliness', but let it deny 'the power thereof' by leaving out the "three days' journey". Once more the demand is made, and once again the chain is lengthened:

> "Go, serve the Lord your God: but who are they that shall go? And Moses said, We will go with our young and with our old, with our sons and with our daughters, with our flocks and with our herds will we go; for we must hold a feast unto the Lord" (Exod. x. 8, 9).

True Scriptural unity has ever been the target of Satan. If the attractions of the world from without do not avail, distractions from within may prove more effectual.

> "And he said unto them, Let the Lord be so with you, as I will let you go, AND YOUR LITTLE ONES; look to it; for evil is before you. Not so, go now YE THAT ARE MEN, and serve the Lord" (Exod. x. 10, 11).

The distraction of a divided heart, the serving of two masters, the miserable failure of the attempt to make the best of both worlds, are suggested here. After further judgments, a yet further concession is made:

> "Go ye, serve the Lord: only . . . . ." (Exod. x. 24).

The presence of that 'only' is deadly. Shakespeare puts it—"but me no but's", and it were well that we met all attempts to evade the full truth as peremptorily.

> "Only let your flocks and your herds be stayed, let your little ones also go with you" (Exod. x. 24).

That is, bind the saint of God down to earth by the shackles of worldly possessions. The love of riches, the cares and riches of this age, the things that so easily entangle us. Moses replied:

> "Thou must give us also sacrifices and burnt offerings that we may sacrifice unto the Lord our God. Our cattle also shall go with us; there shall not an hoof be left behind; for thereof must we take to serve the Lord our God; and we know not with what we must serve the Lord, until we come thither" (Exod. x. 25, 26).

Demas was caught in this snare, so also were Ananias and Sapphira. In the parable of the Sower, the thorns represented the cares, riches and pleasure of this life. The evil is two-fold. While our possessions remain in Egypt, our hearts are likely to turn back there too. On the other hand we must be prepared to offer whatever the Lord shall demand. We may be prepared to offer money, but hold back time. We may be pleased to pray, but not to labour. That is a spirited expression it would do us good to repeat occasionally—not an hoof! Separateness must ever be offensive to the world, and will never be understood or tolerated.

Moses demanded that Israel should serve God:

> In the wilderness.
> A three days' journey.
> All should go.
> Not an hoof left behind.

Pharaoh suggested that they could serve their God just as well and with far less inconvenience if they either remained:

> In the land.
> Not very far off.
> Only men went.
> Flocks and herds left behind.

These four items teach us that true worship is connected with a pilgrim walk, is on resurrection ground, that it comprehends all saints, and embraces all we have and are. These four items fill out the word 'saint', anything less "comes short of the glory of God".

No.35. The Lamb without blemish (Exod. xii.).
pp. 136 - 140

Nine plagues had descended upon Egypt, afflicting man and beast, and exposing the grossness of Egypt's idolatry and the utter failure of their gods. At the end of the ninth plague Pharaoh had brazenly told Moses that if he saw his face again he should die. Moses went out from the royal presence saying, "Thou hast spoken well, I will see thy face again no more" (x. 20). Nine separate solemn warnings had fallen upon deaf ears and hard heart. Before Moses entered into the presence of Pharaoh, the Lord had said:

> "I am sure that the King of Egypt will not let you go, no, not by a mighty hand" (iii. 19).

When Moses was ready to leave Midian and return to Egypt, the Lord said:

> "See that thou do all these wonders before Pharaoh, which I have put in thine hand: but I will harden his heart, that he shall not let the people go" (iv. 21).

Light upon the vexed question of the hardening of Pharaoh's heart is found in the record:

> "But when Pharaoh saw that there was respite, he hardened his heart."

Again in ix. 34:

> "When Pharaoh saw that the rain and the hail and the thunders were ceased, he sinned yet more, and hardened his heart."

It is not our intention to presume to defend the righteousness of God; Rom. ix. silences all replies against God. Some can only accept the teaching of Rom. ix. concerning Pharaoh if it could be allowed that God foresaw the salvation of Pharaoh at or before the reconciliation of all things. Rom. ix., however, cuts all arguments short, and leaves us and all men as clay in the hands of the Potter. Nevertheless be it noted that Pharaoh sinned when he hardened his heart "as the Lord had said". To return however to Exod. iv. 21-23 Moses was commanded to say to Pharaoh:

> "Thus saith the Lord, Israel is My son, even my firstborn; and I say unto thee, let My son go that he may serve Me: and if thou refuse to let him go, behold, I will slay thy son, even thy firstborn."

And so, as we have seen, plague after plague fell, revealing the longsuffering and the goodness of God which should have led to repentance. The destruction of the firstborn, though threatened first, falls only after nine plagues had revealed the obdurate character of Pharaoh's heart:

> "Thus saith the Lord, About midnight will I go into the midst of Egypt, and all the firstborn in the land of Egypt shall die" (xi. 4, 5).

Before the stroke falls, Israel is instructed concerning the Passover, the first great typical ordinance of redemption given to this people. It is a matter of great importance to realize that indissolubly connected with the Passover is the unleavened bread. The connection is maintained in the reference by Paul to this great chapter of Israel's history in the epistle to the Corinthians. How does he introduce this glorious type of redemption? Does he speak of it in chapter i., where he speaks of the gospel as the preaching of Christ crucified? No, neither does he refer to it in chapter ii. It is in chapter v., where he is dealing with moral evil in the assembly, that the Passover is brought to bear, and it is introduced by a reference to the unleavened bread:

> "Purge out therefore the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump, as ye are unleavened. For even Christ our Passover hath been sacrificed for us, THEREFORE let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness; but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth" (I Cor. v. 7, 8).

Possibly, in our view, the Passover appears so great, so essential, that it overshadows the associated feast, but not so in the eyes of God. The sprinkled blood outside, and the unleavened bread inside, present a complete picture. This relation between the Passover and the unleavened bread is shewn by the structure:

Exodus xii. 1 - 20.

A | 1, 2. The beginning of months.
B | 3-11. The Passover.
C | 12, 13. For I will pass through . . . . . I will pass over.
B | 14-17-. The Unleavened Bread.
C | -17. For this day I brought you out.
A | 18-20. The first month.

It will be noticed that the section is bounded by the reference to the month:

> "This month shall be unto you the beginning of months: it shall be the first month of the year to you" (xii. 2).

Note the significance of the words 'to you'. Dispensational changes among the redeemed have no application to the outside world. The dispensation of the Mystery and the lo-ammi condition of Israel make no difference either to the computation of time, or the attitude of God. It is a false inference that assumes that, because God is now acting in sheer grace to the believer, He is acting in sheer grace to the outside world.

It was not the first month in the calendar, the first month of the year was originally Tisri, corresponding to our October. The Jews still keep their New Year at this date, in spite of the definite change instituted at the time of their redemption, a sad evidence of their unregenerate condition. From the Autumn of falling leaf and fading flower we are called to Springtime with its parable of resurrection. In this change of time, made when the nation of Israel was born and redeemed, we have the great truth of regeneration. The two 'musts' of John iii. come to mind here:

> "Ye must be born again" (7).
> "Even so must the Son of Man be lifted up" (14).

Newness of life is the blessed fruit of redemption by blood. We may more carefully consider the further teaching of Exod. xii. in another paper; but the truth of the "beginning of months to you" should be no strange doctrine to any of our readers.

"A lamb", "The lamb", "Your lamb", such is the suggestive progression in verses 3, 4 and 5, as they speak of the shadow and type of the Lamb of God. Surely in every heart there is the prayer that Christ shall become increasingly the great central and personal factor. Though from A Saviour, we may have passed to The Saviour, we cannot have rest until we can also say My Saviour.

"The whole congregation of Israel shall kill IT" (Exod. xii. 6). So merges the type, the many lambs, into one "it", the one great Passover of God.

> "Your lamb shall be without blemish" (Exod. xii. 5).

The Law in Leviticus is most particular, descending to minute details, that the holiness and perfection of the great Antitype should ever before the mind of the faithful:

> "Blind, or broken, or maimed, or having a wen, or scurvy, or scabbed . . . . . that which is bruised, or crushed, or broken, or cut" (Lev. xxii. 22-24).

All such must be set aside.

> "Whatsoever hath a blemish, that shall ye not offer for it shall not be acceptable for you . . . . . IT SHALL BE PERFECT TO BE ACCEPTED" (Lev. xxii. 19-21).

The Lamb was to be taken on the tenth day of the month, and sacrificed on the fourteenth. This would give time and opportunity for careful inspection. Luke xxiii. contains the findings of those who examined the true Lamb of God, a seven-fold witness to His perfect character:

(1) Pilate	"I find no fault in this man." "I have found no fault in this man."
(2) Herod	"No, nor yet Herod: for I sent you to him, and lo, nothing worthy of death is done unto Him."
(3) Pilate	"What evil hath He done? I have found no cause of death in Him."
(4) The Malefactor	"We receive the due rewards of our deeds, but this man hath done nothing amiss."
(5) The Centurion	"Glorified God saying, Certainly this was a righteous man."

Matt. xxvii. adds further evidence:

(6) Judas	"I have betrayed innocent blood."
(7) Pilate's Wife	"Have thou nothing to do with that just man."

Scripture everywhere teaches and assumes the holiness and spotless sinlessness of Christ, the Lamb of God. If doctrine necessitates the tremendous statement that Christ was ‘made sin for us’, it immediately adds “Who knew no sin” (II Cor. v. 21). If it is emphasized that Christ as Kinsman-Redeemer actually took our human nature it is careful to say that while He actually was made flesh, it was in the likeness of sinful flesh that He came (Rom. viii. 3). Before Peter says, “Who His Own self bare our sins”, he writes of Him “Who did no sin” (I Pet. ii. 22-24) and in the same epistle Peter speaks of redemption as being by “the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot” (i. 18, 19).

If Heb. iv. declares that Christ was touched with the feeling of our infirmities and in all points had been tempted like as we are, it does not omit to add “sin excepted” (Gk. choris Heb. iv. 15).

There is need that every believer should not hold with no shadow of uncertainty that Christ was “holy, harmless, undefiled and separate from sinners”. “It shall be PERFECT to be accepted.” Such is the Lamb of God, such is our Saviour.

> “And the blood shall be to you for a token upon the houses where ye are: and when I see the blood, I will pass over you” (Exod. xii. 13).

The word ‘token’ will repay a little study. It first occurs in Gen. i. 14 “Let them be for signs”. Gen. iv. 15 A.V. reads “The Lord set a mark upon Cain”; it should read “The Lord set a token for Cain, lest any finding him should kill him”. It was a token for Cain’s safety. The bow in the cloud is called ‘the token of the covenant’ (Gen. ix. 12) as also is circumcision (Gen. xvii. 11).

Many times the word translated ‘sign’ in Exodus is this word, and indeed this is its most frequent translation. “The blood shall be to you for a sign.” The blood signified something. It signified life laid down:

> “The soul (life) of the flesh is in the blood, and I have given it to you upon the altar to make an atonement for your souls: for it is the blood that maketh an atonement by reason of the life” (Lev. xvii. 11 R.V.).

The blood atoned for ‘YOUR SOUL’ (LIFE), “BY REASON OF THE LIFE” in it. The blood posted upon the doorpost was a “sign” that redemption had been made. Nothing else was a ‘sign’, nothing else did the Lord ‘see’. No genealogy showing direct descent from Abraham could be a ‘sign’, no promises, vows, prayers, nothing but the sprinkled blood.

The words “I will pass over you” must also be considered. As they stand, they give the mind the impression that the Lord ‘passed over’ the houses of Israel without smiting them, and went on to the houses of the Egyptians. In verse 23 however this idea does not seem fully to fit the statement there made:

> “The Lord will pass over the door, and will not suffer the destroyer to come in unto your houses to smite you.”

The ‘passing over’ here is synonymous with protecting. In I Kings xviii. 21 we meet the word in the question of the prophet “How long halt ye between two opinions”. The idea of ‘hovering’ or ‘suspense’ suits the thought better than ‘passing over’ and leaving. Isa. xxxi. 5 says:

> “As birds flying, so will the Lord of Hosts defend Jerusalem: defending also He will deliver it; and passing over He will preserve it.”

The allusion to Deut. xxxii. 11 here seems clear:

> “As an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings.”

Instead of repeating the word ‘fluttereth over’, Isaiah goes to Exod. xii. for a synonym, and says “passing over”. This gives us the blessed meaning of “passover”. The Lord, like the eagle, spread abroad His wings, hovered over the house, and protected it from the destroyer that went through the land. Psa. xci. 4 expresses the feeling of pasach ‘To pass over’ without using the word.

We would not suggest any alteration in the A.V., the words are too precious and have too sacred associations, but we can keep in mind the meaning as we read as being “When I see the blood I will PAUSE over you (not PASS over you)”. “The two side posts and the upper door post” were sprinkled with the blood, but not the threshold, not the floor. The apostasy is characterized by “Trampling under foot the Son of God, and counting the blood . . . . . common” (Heb. x. 29).

The Jews reckoned a double evening, the first from noon to three, the second from three until sunset. In Exod. xii. 6 the margin shews that the Passover Lamb was killed ‘between the two evenings’, which would be at three o’clock. Matt. xxvii. 46 shews that the Lord Jesus died at the ninth hour, and after that “when even was come” Joseph of Arimathea begged of Pilate the body. The sixth hour was noon, the ninth was three o’clock.

Even such a detail as the exact time was fulfilled. John xix. 36 draws attention to yet another feature which links type and Antitype together.

> “These things were done that the Scripture should be fulfilled, A bone of Him shall not be broken.”

Roman practice must give place to the sure word of prophecy. The Roman soldiers must bear their testimony together with the Centurion that ‘this was a righteous man’, for Psa. xxxiv. 20 speaking of the righteous says:

> “He keepeth all his bones; not one of them is broken.”

When David was led to see his sinfulness before God, instead of saying, “I am righteous” he said:

> "Make me to hear joy and gladness, that the bones which thou hast broken may rejoice" (Psa. li. 8).

Unblemished in life, unbroken in death, God's true Passover Lamb was perfect and in Him alone can we find redemption and acceptance. For a further and fuller examination of this expression "between the two evenings", see Life through His Name, pp. 414-430. Also The Passover Week in the Alphabetical Analysis.

No.36. The Feast of the Unleavened Bread.
pp. 144 - 151

We must now give attention to the associated feast of Unleavened Bread. Throughout Scripture the truth set forth by the Passover and the Unleavened Bread is constantly associated. Take for instance Eph. ii. 8-10 "For by grace are ye saved through faith . . . . . not out of works", this is the N.T. doctrinal presentation of the truth set forth in the sign of the sprinkled blood. "Created in Christ Jesus unto good works": this is the equivalent to the Unleavened Bread. The blood, outside, of the unblemished lamb, calls for the unleavened bread within.

> "And they shall eat the flesh in that night, roast with fire, and unleavened bread; and with bitter herbs they shall eat it" (Exod. xii. 8).

In the law given subsequently in Exodus occurs this command:

> "Thou shalt not offer the blood of My sacrifice with leavened bread" (Exod. xxiii. 18).

In Lev. ii. 11 we read:

> "No meal offering . . . . . shall be made with leaven."

In the N.T., leaven consistently typifies evil. Matt. xvi. 6-12:

> "Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees . . . . . Then understood they how that He bade them . . . . . beware of the doctrine of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees."

Luke xii. 1 adds the words:

> "Beware ye of the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy."

I Cor. v. 8 speaks of "the leaven of malice and wickedness", contrasting it with the "unleavened bread of sincerity and truth". Summing up the evil that had corrupted the simple faith of the Galatians, the Apostle says, "A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump" (v. 9). Leaven therefore represents evil in doctrine and practice. It is the purpose of God that His children should be 'without blemish'. As a result of the great Offering of Christ they shall one day be presented "holy and unblameable and unreproveable in His sight" (Col. i. 22).

Notice the basis of the exhortation of I Cor. v. 7:

> "Purge out therefore the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump, as ye are unleavened."

In Christ the Corinthians were 'unleavened'. They are addressed as 'saints', but their walk was far from being 'as becometh saints'. They could not make themselves holy, but being sanctified in Christ they can be urged to walk worthy.

Another associated meaning which Scripture attaches to the feast of Unleavened Bread is connected with the pilgrim character of those who first partook of it:

> "Thus shall ye eat it (the lamb, the bread and the herbs), with your loins girded, your shoes on your feet, and your staff in your hand; and ye shall eat it in haste" (Exod. xii. 11).
>
> "And the people took their dough before it was leavened, their kneading troughs being bound up in their clothes upon their shoulders" (xii. 34).
> "And they baked unleavened cakes of the dough which they brought forth out of Egypt, for it was not leavened; because they were thrust out of Egypt and could not tarry" (xii. 39).

The feast of Unleavened Bread speaks of separation from Egypt, of a people who are not at home, whose hopes are beyond and above. It is evident that the observance of the feast of the Passover lamb alone was not sufficient memorial:

> "Ye shall observe the feast of unleavened bread; FOR in this self-same day have I brought your armies out of the land of Egypt: THEREFORE shall ye observe this day in your generations by an ordinance for ever" (xii. 17).

Redemption saves from and saves to. The Passover not only saved Israel from the destroyer, but from further contamination with or service to Egypt. The Passover naturally led to the Red Sea and the wilderness. The lives of the people had been made 'bitter with hard bondage'; this can be easily forgotten, as is seen in the case of Israel in the wilderness. There, when the experiences of the Passover and the Red Sea were things of the past, they remembered 'the flesh pots' and 'bread to the full' (xvi. 3).

> "We remember (said they) the fish, which we did eat in Egypt freely; the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlick" (Numb. xi. 5).

That is what they 'remembered', six items! They soon forgot the wonders of their deliverance and the bitterness of their bondage. Therefore added to the unleavened bread was 'bitter herbs', 'bitterness' as the Hebrew really is. It is God Who appoints the bitterness of the pilgrim's path. Israel met it at the beginning of their wilderness experience, and the first stage of their journey is named Marah, or Bitter. Let us accept these indications without murmuring, for they are sent in love to wean us from the flesh pots of Egypt, and to remind us of the bitterness of our former bondage. May we all rejoice in the redemption which is in Christ Jesus, and experimentally realize the place and importance of the feast of the Unleavened Bread.

We have seen the emphasis which the close association of the Unleavened Bread with the Passover gives to the fact that redemption must always be manifested by separation from evil; that those who are 'called saints' should act as 'becometh saints'; that those who are 'unleavened' should put away the 'leaven of malice and wickedness'. This is the ideal, and nothing lower than this can have the sanction of the Word. The Scriptures, however, reveal the fact which everywhere presses upon us today, that the meaning and truth of the unleavened bread is often not practically realized.

> "And the children of Israel journeyed from Rameses to Succoth, about six hundred thousand on foot that were men, beside children. And a mixed multitude went up also with them; and flocks, and herds, even very much cattle" (xii. 37, 38).

When Moses stood before Pharaoh he demanded that not only should the men go, but said he:

> "We will go with our young and with our old, with our sons and with our daughters, with our flocks and with our herds will we go" (x. 9).

When the Exodus actually took place, it is found that in between the 'men and the children', their 'flocks and herds', is 'a mixed multitude also', or as the margin reads "a great mixture". The effect of this mixture is seen in Numb. xi. 4, "And the mixt multitude that was among them fell a-lusting"; that is what we might expect. There is however a sad echo of the 'also' of Exod. xii. 38, for Numb. xi. 4 continues:

> "And the children of Israel also wept again, and said, Who shall give us flesh to eat? . . . . . there is nothing at all, beside this manna before our eyes."

"This manna" is elsewhere called "angels' food", "bread from heaven", and is a type of Him Who is the Bread of life that came down from heaven. The influence of the mixed multitude is clearly seen. The heart is turned back to Egypt, and the things of God are lightly esteemed. Some of this mixed multitude were allied to Israel by marriage. This is no fancy, for we have at least one such alliance and its disastrous effect recorded in Lev. xxiv. 10:

> "And the son of an Israelitish woman, whose father was an Egyptian, went out among the children of Israel."

The words 'went out among' seem to imply some definite purpose. We are told in Exod. ii. 11 that when Moses was grown:

> "He went out unto his brethren . . . . . and he spied an Egyptian smiting an Hebrew."

Here, however, we find, "This son of the Israelitish woman and a man of Israel strove together in the camp". To the fleshly lusts of Numb. xi., therefore, must be added the 'strife' of Lev. xxiv. Not only so, but the dreadful sin of blasphemy must be included:

> "And the Israelitish woman's son blasphemed the name of the Lord, and cursed."

Instead of loving that Name, and revering it, this son of an Israelitish woman blasphemed, and blasphemy is the mark of Antichrist.

Neh. xiii. 1-13 shows how Israel, when returned from captivity, mingled with the Ammonite and the Moabite, and these are called 'the mixed multitude'. In Neh. xiii. 23, 24, Ashdod, Moab and Ammon are cited as nations which had intermarried with Israel, and Nehemiah draws a sad lesson from Solomon:

> "Did not Solomon king of Israel sin by these things? Yet among many nations was there no king like him, who was beloved of his God, and God made him king over all Israel, nevertheless even him did outlandish women cause to sin" (Neh. xiii. 26).

Ezra ix. 1, 2 likewise mourns over the fact that Israel had not:

> "separated themselves from the people of the lands . . . . . the holy seed have mingled themselves with the people of those lands."

Jehoshaphat was another king who had a good record, for he 'walked in the first ways of his father David, and sought not unto Baalim, but sought the Lord God of his father'. In the third year of his reign he sent princes and Levites with the book of the law of the Lord to teach in Judah. Yet like Solomon and like Israel of the Exodus he failed, for II Chron xviii. 1 says:

> "Now Jehoshaphat had riches and honour in abundance, and joined affinity with Ahab", and that 'affinity' was his ruin. It is interesting to note that chathan, 'to join in affinity', is translated "to be a son-in-law", "to make marriages", "father-in-law", and "mother-in-law", showing the closeness of the union between Jehoshaphat and Ahab.

Returning to Israel and the mixed multitude, we see the failure to put into practice the truth contained in the type of the unleavened bread. The Corinthians, we have seen, were 'called saints', and Christ had been made to them 'sanctification' as well as 'redemption'. They were 'unleavened' in Christ, but they had failed to realize their position. II Cor. vii. 1, summing up the argument of II Cor. vi. 14-18 where the unequal yoke and unholy fellowship is seen in all its ugliness, says:

> "Let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, PERFECTING holiness in the fear of God."

We can neither make nor merit holiness, but when the grace of God separates us by the blood of Christ (as of a lamb without blemish and without spot) from sin and death with its bondage and its bitterness that are worse than those of Egypt, then 'our reasonable service' must include this heart and life separation, the absence of which worked such disaster in the spiritual experience of Israel, of Solomon, of Jehoshaphat and of the Corinthians. This is 'perfecting holiness', or taking it to its logical conclusion.

> "Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be My sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty" (II Cor. vi. 17).

"THE SELF-SAME DAY" (Exod. xii. 40 - 42)

As one reads the book of Exodus, especially that part which deals with Pharaoh's opposition, the interplay of human fear and cupidity, of Divine forbearance and judgment, the long period of Israel's bondage, or the policy of the new king that knew not Joseph, all seem to move so naturally, cause and effect are so obvious, that the sovereign will and purpose of God is not apparent on the surface. Yet through all the years of Israel's changing fortunes, whether the inhuman hatred of Joseph's brethren, the famine that forced Jacob into Egypt, the dreams of Pharaoh, or the change of dynasty, God's great purpose was unfolding, and neither the premature advent of Moses, nor the obstinacy of Pharaoh altered the prearranged plan by so much as one day:

> "Now the sojourning the children of Israel, who dwelt in Egypt, was four hundred and thirty years. And it came to pass at the end of the four hundred and thirty years, EVEN THE SELFSAME DAY it came to pass, that all the hosts of the Lord went out from the land of Egypt. It is a night to be much observed unto the Lord" (Exod. xii. 40-42).

The sojourning of the children of Israel dates back beyond the birth of Jacob's twelve sons, and includes the pilgrimage of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. From the call of Abraham out of Ur of the Chaldees, he became a 'sojourner', and all his children were sojourners too. Incidentally Exod. xii. says that they "dwelt in Egypt", but this did not alter the fact that they were sojourners and away from the land of promise. Gal. iii. 17 gives the same period of time, namely 430 years, as covering the time that elapsed from the promise given to Abraham in Gen. xv. until the giving of the law from Mount Sinai, which took place soon after the Exodus from Egypt.

There is another period connected with the same event (the Exodus) that starts from another point, and covers a period of 400 years. This prophetic utterance is given in Gen. xv. 13-16, and it will be seen that not only did God speak of a definite period of time, but of the chief features that led up to the Exodus. Let us enumerate them:

(1) "Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs (and shall serve them and they shall afflict them) 400 years.
(2) And also that nation, whom they shall serve, will I judge;
(3) And afterward shall they come out with great substance.
(4) In the fourth generation they shall come hither again.
(5) For the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full."

How are we to account for the fact that Gen. xv. speaks of a period of 400 years, whereas Gal. iii. 17 speaks of the same event as occupying 430 years? At the time of writing this article, the writer endorsed the explanation of The Companion Bible which makes the 400 years commence with the recognition of Isaac as the seed when Isaac was five years old. Since writing, however, a beloved fellow-helper has suggested a much simpler explanation which we gladly give in his own words:

> This explanation (referring to that of The Companion Bible and also our own), I have always personally regarded as unsatisfactory. Surely Isaac was 'recognized as the seed' before his birth—"In Isaac shall thy seed be called". Surely the point is that Gen. xii. 4 tells us that Abraham was seventy-five when he left Haran (not Ur), where he had remained till the death of Terah. But Stephen (Acts vii. 1) says that the glorious God appeared to Abraham while he was still in Ur, before he went to live in Haran. If we reckon that the sojourning began (as Stephen implies) when Abraham left Ur, the five years are accounted for by the sojourn in Haran. Thus:

Departure from Ur	Abram = 70	0
Death of Terah and departure from Haran	Abram = 75	5
Birth of Isaac	Abraham = 100	25

		30
Sojourning of Seed		400

Total Sojourning until Exodus		430

We are grateful for this explanation and commend it to our readers.

The Scripture tells us that at the end of the 430 years, even the self same day, the children of Israel went out of Egypt. Such is the way that God keeps His Word, and carries out His purpose. We believe it to be a fundamental of dispensational truth that prophecy shall be fulfilled literally. The prophetic statements of Scripture concerning the Messiah which have found their fulfillment in the Lord Jesus Christ at His first coming have been fulfilled literally. His place of birth, His manner of life, His ministry, His death, burial and resurrection, have all been literal fulfillments of prophecy. Those Scriptures which concern Him that await their fulfillment at His second coming, these too, we most surely believe shall be likewise fulfilled to the very letter. How comforting it is to realize that "all are in the hand of God"! Habakkuk was assured that in spite of apparent delay:

> "The vision is yet for an appointed time, but at the end it shall speak, and not lie: though it tarry, wait for it because it will surely come, it will not tarry" (Hab. ii. 2).

Job seemed to perceive this grand fundamental, when he said:

> "If a man die, shall he live again? All the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come. Thou shalt call, and I will answer Thee: Thou wilt have a desire to the work of Thine hands" (Job xiv. 14, 15).

To the one who looks upon the Bible as a collection of 'texts', this article may not mean much, but to everyone who has learned to look upon the Scriptures as the unfolding of the purpose of the ages, every confirmation of the faithfulness of God in the fulfillment of His Word is a source of joy and peace:

> "Seek ye out of the book of the Lord, and read; no one of these shall fail, none shall want her mate" (Isa. xxxiv. 16).

How many readers could say, without referring to the chapter, with what subject the book of Exodus closes? Some may say the Tabernacle, and be partly right, but the actual closing reference is to the pillar of cloud and fire, "throughout all their journeys".

In the book of Psalms the Exodus of Israel is several times epitomized, and among the features of that memorable time that are remembered is the fact that He who redeemed the people, led them out and on through sea and wilderness until they reached the land of promise. Notice the following:

> "In the daytime also He led them with a cloud and all night with a light of fire" (Psa. lxxviii. 14). "And He led them on safety, so that they feared not; but the sea overwhelmed their enemies" (Psa. lxxviii. 53). He "guided (same word as led) them by skillfulness of His hands" (Psa. lxxviii. 72). "He spread a cloud for a covering; and a fire to give light in the night" (Psa. cv. 39).

So in Exod. xiii. 21, 22 we read:

> "And the Lord went before them by day in a pillar of cloud, to lead them the way: and by night in a pillar of fire, to give them light: to go by day and night: He took not away the pillar of the cloud by day, nor the pillar of fire by night from before the people."

Let us notice the following features:

(1) The leading was personal. "The Lord went before them." When Moses rehearsed, before his death, the ways of the Lord with Israel, speaking of His leading he said, "So the Lord alone did lead him" (Deut. xxxii. 12). It is the Lord's prerogative to lead His people, and the solemn statement of Moses here seems to suggest that all other 'leading' is nothing less than idolatry. This should give pause to any who rather freely use the expression 'I felt led'. This personal presence of the Lord was clearly realized by Moses as being essential to the accomplishment of the Lord's purpose:

> "My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest. And he said unto Him, if Thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence" (Exod. xxxiii. 14, 15).

This presence of the Lord was manifested by an angel. "Behold Mine Angel shall go before thee" (Exod. xxxii. 34). So in Exod. xiv. 19, 20 we find:

> "The angel of God, which went before the camp of Israel, removed and went behind them; and the pillar of the cloud went from before their face, and stood behind them; and it came between the camp of the Egyptians and the camp of Israel; and it was a cloud and darkness to them, but it gave light by night to these."

The presence of the Lord, the leading of the Lord, is a great dividing line between the saint and the world. "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God" (Rom. viii. 14). The leading may be by lowlier means that of an angel. Psa. lxxvii. 20 says, "Thou leddest Thy people like a flock by the hand of Moses and Aaron", yet though the means be more fallible, the Lord alone is the leader, whatever medium He may choose from time to time. The children of God today may not see visible signs of the Lord's presence, nevertheless the Lord still leads His people, and largely uses the inspired Word. "Send out Thy light and Thy truth, let them lead me" (Psa. xliii. 3). We may be more certain that we 'feel led' when we are led by God's own Word.

(2) The leading was adapted to the need. By day a pillar of cloud, but this would not have been visible by night, and so the Lord manifested His presence at night by means of a pillar of fire. The experience of one time is not necessarily the experience of another. In the daytime and sunshine of life the Lord's presence will be manifested in one way. In the dark night of life's experience His presence, just as real, will be manifested in another way. Whatever the mode of manifestation, the Lord's personal presence is the blessed fact.

(3) Leading is a part of redemption. "HE TOOK NOT AWAY the pillar of cloud by day, nor the pillar of fire by night, from before the people" (Exod. xiii. 22). Israel many, many times failed, so grievously indeed that they forfeited the land of promise and perished in the wilderness; nevertheless, the pillar of cloud went before them. This is the closing testimony of the book of Exodus. Coming where it does in the book (xl. 34-38) it reveals the reason why the presence of the Lord manifested in the pillar of cloud could remain. Exod. xl. speaks of the setting up of the Tabernacle, and Lev. xvi. 2 says:

> "I will appear (or, I am wont to appear) in the cloud upon the mercy seat."

Numb. ix. 15-23 speaking of the same event says:

> "And on the day that the tabernacle was reared up the cloud covered the tabernacle, namely, the tent of testimony; and at even there was upon the tabernacle as it were the appearance of fire until the morning, SO IT WAS ALWAY."

Notice the way in which this closing statement of Exodus is introduced:

> "So Moses FINISHED the work. THEN a cloud covered the tent" (Exod. xl. 33, 34).

The Lord's leading is one of the results of the Lord's redemption, one of the fruits of a finished Work. The Good Shepherd who gave His life for the sheep, as the risen One, leads them in green pastures for His name's sake.

(4) The pillar of cloud regulated all Israel's journeyings. "When the cloud was taken up from the Tabernacle, THEN AFTER THAT the children of Israel journeyed; and IN THE PLACE where the cloud abode, THERE the children of Israel pitched their tents" (Numb. ix. 17).

The time when and the place where is decided alone by the Lord. Further, we read, "whether it was by day or by night that the cloud was taken up they journeyed". The Lord's leading did not always conform to custom, nor to convenience, but day or night Israel had to be prepared to follow. "Or whether it were two days, or a month, or a year" that the cloud tarried, there in unquestioning obedience Israel had to remain (Numb. ix. 15-23). What a blessed condition to be in, to be led by the Lord! By day or by night, to Elim with its palm trees, or on into the desert, all is well if we are led by the Lord.

> "And thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what is in thine heart" (Deut. viii. 2).
>
> "Lead me in a plain path, because of my enemies" (Psa. xxvii. 11).

No.37. Israel's passage through the Red Sea (Exod. xiv.).

"Sing ye to the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously: the horse and his rider He hath thrown into the sea" (Exod. xv. 1).

pp. 196 - 199

The various references to Israel's passage through the Red Sea show that it was not only an experience which was necessary for Israel; a parallel may be found in the experience of the believer, and also in the future restoration of Israel. An appreciation of its place and meaning will give encouragement to the downcast, stimulus to the one who is seeking the crown or the prize, and an explanation of some of the baffling providences which make up the purpose of the ages.

As we learn in the Revelation, that the Beast, the False Prophet and Satan must be removed before the millennial kingdom can be set up, so Israel must see Pharaoh and his host dead on the sea shore before the kingdom can be inherited. This is emphasized in the prophecy of Israel's restoration recorded in Isa. li. 9, 10:

> "Awake, awake, put on Thy strength, O arm of the Lord, awake as in the ancient days, in the generations of old. Art Thou not it that hath cut Rahab and wounded the dragon? Art Thou not it which hath dried up the sea, the waters of the great deep; that hath made the depths of the sea a way for the ransomed to pass over?"

There is another interesting reference to Isa. xi. Here again the theme is that of Israel's restoration:

> "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall set His hand a second time to recover the remnant of His people, which shall be left, from Assyria, and from Egypt . . . . . and the Lord shall utterly destroy the gulf of the Egyptian sea; and shall shake His hand against the river (Euphrates) in the full force of His spirit, and shall smite it in the seven streams thereof, and make men go over dryshod. So shall there be an highway for a remnant of His people, who shall be left, out of Assyria: LIKE AS IT WAS TO ISRAEL IN THE DAY THAT HE CAME OUT OF THE LAND OF EGYPT" (Isa. xi. 11-16).

When the ransomed Israelites stood upon the sea shore and realized the deliverance that had been accomplished, together with the overthrow of their enemies they took up a song of triumphant thanksgiving. After speaking of the way the Lord had 'triumphed gloriously' they continued:

> "The Lord is my strength and song, and He is become my salvation" (Exod. xv. 2).

This is exactly what follows the parallel of Exod. xiv. already quoted above. After speaking of the turning away of the Lord's anger Israel will continue:

> "The Lord Jehovah is my strength and song: He also is become my salvation" (Isa. xii. 2).

These parallels are plain and need no comment. There shall not only be a New Covenant made with Israel which shall be infinitely greater than the covenant which the Lord made with them in the day that He:

> "took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt" (Jer. xxxi. 32), but there shall be a repetition of the Red Sea experience also. In the book of the Revelation the place of Pharaoh is taken by the Beast. The magicians that withstood Moses find their antitype in the False Prophet. The plagues of Egypt are repeated on a grander scale in the vials of wrath, and the song of Moses blends with the song of the Lamb.

> "I saw as it were a sea of glass mingled with fire; and them that had gotten the victory over the Beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name, stand on the sea of glass, having the harps of God. And they sing THE SONG OF MOSES AND THE LAMB" (Rev. xv. 2, 3).

These extracts will show the place that the crossing of the Red Sea holds in prophecy. When reading Psa. lxxvii. we find that the Psalmist, being cast down and troubled, found strength and comfort in remembering that even such an obstacle as the Red Sea must give place before the word of God:

> "I have considered the days of old, the years of ancient times . . . . . Will the Lord cast off for ever? . . . . . Hath God forgotten to be gracious? . . . . . Then I said, This is my infirmity, but I will remember the years of the right hand of the Most High" (Psa. lxxvii. 5-10).

What is it that the Psalmist recalls for his encouragement? He remembers that moment that Israel, hemmed in by the wilderness and threatened by the pursuing Egyptians, saw the Red Sea open before them:

> "The waters saw Thee, O God, the waters saw Thee: they were afraid . . . . . Thy way is in the sea . . . . . Thou leddest Thy people like a flock . . . . ." (Psa. lxxvii. 16-20).

We understand from Heb. xi. 29 that not only did the Lord open the Red Sea, but that Israel passed through "by faith". The two phrases of the one act are expressed in the words of Exod. xiv. 13, 15:

> "Fear ye not, STAND STILL, and see the salvation of the Lord."

This is the Godward aspect.

> "Wherefore criest thou unto Me? speak unto the children of Israel, that they GO FORWARD."

This is the other side of the truth. We find many parallels to this same duality, Eph. ii. 9 declares that we are not saved 'out of works', and Eph. ii. 10 as strongly declares that we have been saved "unto good works". Phil. ii. 12 says, "Work out your own salvation", while Phil. ii. 13 follows by saying, "it is God that worketh in you".

The reference already made to Rev. xv. will confirm the thought that the passage of the Red Sea was the first great act of overcoming faith on the part of Israel. Heb. xi. says, "By faith He (Moses) kept the passover" (Heb. xi. 28). "By faith they (Israel) passed through the Red Sea as by dry land" (Heb. xi. 29). There is a significant addition in the verse concerning the Egyptians. Israel were not the only ones who ventured to cross the bed of the sea. The Egyptians did so also. The outward act was the same, but there the semblance ceased, for Israel's act was by faith, the record of Heb. xi. 29 being:

> "Which the Egyptians assaying to do were drowned."

In some way, not fully understood by us, this passage through the Red Sea united the people together with Moses as one:

> "All our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea; and were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea" (I Cor. x. 1, 2).

When the question of water baptism is under discussion, appeal is often made to various 'baptisms' ordain by Moses for the service of the Tabernacle. These 'washings' (baptismos) are said to have been 'carnal ordinances' and were 'imposed until the time of reformation' (Heb. ix. 10). Those believers who do not see the necessity for 'immersion' and consider that 'sprinkling' is all sufficient, will find in this same ninth chapter of Hebrews that the sprinkling of the people under the law, whether by blood or water is likewise considered obsolete (compare Heb. ix. 13 with Numb. xix. 17, 18). Before these 'carnal' ordinances were 'introduced' there had taken place a baptism which more clearly foreshadowed the baptism 'into Christ' than any ordinance afterward 'imposed' on them, namely the baptism 'unto Moses' that took place at the Red Sea, and the thing to be observed is that in every reference to this crossing of the Red Sea, water is excluded! All went over dry-shod. If we must refer to O.T. types when speaking of baptism and its place in this dispensation, the baptism of all Israel into Moses at the Red Sea but without water is surely the one to which we should turn.

Coming back to Exod. xiv. we observe that the salvation of the Lord, which Israel were to see that day, included not only their own deliverance, but the destruction of their enemy. Salvation in one sense is an accomplished fact; we are redeemed by the blood of Christ. Salvation in another sense is future; we are sealed unto the day of redemption. This future aspect of salvation involves the destruction of the power of death, and him who held the power, i.e. the Devil. The Beast, the False Prophet and the Dragon must be overcome before the saved possess the kingdom.

An equivalent to the Red Sea experience lies ahead of every dispensation division of God's purpose, whether of Church or earthly kingdom.

> "Thanks be to God that giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Cor. xv. 57).

No.38. Marah, Elim and Manna.
pp. 212 - 217

Stamped upon the whole course of the purpose of the ages is the lesson taught in our title Marah before Elim. It is found in the expressions "No cross, no crown", and "Suffering before glory". Man was created a living soul, and was of the earth earthy. In the resurrection, man shall possess a spiritual body, and bear the Image of the heavenly. The earthly period of man's life is set in the school of experience and of the knowledge of good and evil. Israel, as we have seen, went down into the bondage of Egypt before they entered into possession of the promised land. In all cases, whether of creation, Israel, church or individual, the remedy for all ill is found in Christ.

As we read the song of Moses and the response of Miriam in Exod. xv., we feel the glow of triumph and the sense of victory. It is something in the nature of an anticlimax however that meets us in verse 21:

> "And Miriam answered them, Sing ye to the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath He thrown into the sea . . . . . and they went three days into the wilderness, and found no water."

We are conscious that this would be a severe test. Three days' journey in the vicinity of the Red Sea without water would be well-nigh intolerable, and by the end of the third day the sense of triumph that had burst forth into song became dimmed with the feelings of mistrust:

> "And when they came to Marah, they could not drink of the waters of Marah, for they were bitter: therefore the name of it was called Marah. And the people murmured against Moses, saying, What shall we drink?" (verses 23 and 24).

Here is the first murmuring of the people after leaving Egypt, a murmuring that was to grow and produce the fearful fruits of unbelief:

> "The waters covered their enemies: there was not one of them left. Then believed they His words: they sang his praise. They soon forgat His works: they waited not for His counsel" (Psa. cvi. 11-13).

Here in this Psalm the transition is as sudden as it is in Exod. xv. The scene of Israel's failure at Marah is said to be the result of forgetfulness. As remembrance of the bondage of Egypt and their deliverance from their enemies receded, so the sensual remembrance of the land of bondage revived. This people, who so quickly 'forgat' the Lord, could say:

> "We remember the fish, which we did eat in Egypt freely; the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlick" (Numb. xi. 5).

This remembrance is fatal to the overcomer. Those whose remembrance is thus expressed perished in the wilderness. Lot's wife could not leave the doomed city without looking back. Her treasures were there. Paul, when pressing on with the prize in view, said:

> "Forgetting the things which are behind . . . . . I pursue" (Phil. iii. 13, 14).

Egypt with its fish and its onions and its garlick stands for the world and its seductions. Let us, who have been redeemed from the present evil age, seek to cultivate a sanctified forgetfulness, lest the things that have been left behind become a snare.

Forgetfulness led to impatience:

> "They waited not for His counsel" (Psa. cvi. 13).

Surely if we keep in mind the way in which the Lord has saved us, doubt cannot rise. Unbelief grows only when we forget God. Remembering the Passover, the Red Sea, and the destruction of the enemy, Israel would have 'waited' instead of 'murmuring'. The argument is expressed for us in the words of Rom. viii. 32:

> "He that spared not his Own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things?"

We shall most assuredly come to the waters of Marah before we cross the waters of Jordan and stand triumphant in the land of promise, and when we do, what shall we say? Shall we murmur? Yes, we shall if we forget the works of the Lord. If, however, we remember His mercy, we shall, in the midst of the sore trial (for bitter water at the end of a three days' wilderness journey is a sore trial) realize that He is still faithful, and that a lesson for our higher good is to be learned. The Lord would have His children to understand that there is but one sweetener for the bitterness of the wilderness journey, and that is the cross of Christ:

> "And the Lord shewed Him a tree, which when he had cast into the waters, the waters were made sweet . . . . . There He made for them a statute and an ordinance, and there He proved them" (Exod. xv. 25).

"There He proved them."—Deut. viii. 2, 3 reveals the fact that the whole of the forty years in the wilderness with its many trials and calls for patience and trust, its privations and its sufferings, were all a part of the Lord's leading "Thy God led thee", and were 'to prove' the people in order to make them know that man does not live by bread alone. The lesson is the same for all who tread the pilgrim way. It is there in Hebrews for every partaker of the heavenly calling. It is there in Philippians for all who would, with the Apostle, count all things loss, and press on for the prize. Before Abraham received the promise with an oath he was 'proved', as we see in Gen. xxii. and Heb. vi.

The sweetening of the bitter waters by the tree is found to be a symbol of the healing of the nation.

> "If thou wilt diligently hearken to the voice of the Lord thy God, and will do that which is right in His sight, and will give ear to His commandments, and keep all His > statutes, I will put none of these diseases upon thee which I have brought upon the Egyptians; for I am the Lord that healeth thee" (Exod. xv. 26).

Here is revealed the second of the Jehovah titles:

> The first is JEHOVAH-HIREH (Gen. xxii. 14).
> The second is JEHOVAH-ROPHEKA (Exod. xv. 26).

The great dispensational miracle of Acts iii. looks to the same end:

> "Neither is there the healing (salvation) in any other" (Acts iv. 12).

None of the Lord's dealings are arbitrary, all is for His glorious purpose. As soon as the lesson of Marah had been given, and the people 'proved', as soon as they realized that the waters of the wilderness must ever be bitter apart from the Lord their Healer, then the burning sand is exchanged for the delightful shade of Elim's palm trees and the wells of Elim take the place of the bitterness of Marah. Here is completeness, twelve wells, one for each tribe. They can now anticipate the day when they shall:

> "draw water out of the wells of salvation" (Isa. xii. 3).

So then, fellow pilgrims, remember that He who leads to Marah can also lead to Elim, and if it be that Marah shall be our experience, its bitterness shall become sweet if it but reveals, in Christ, the "Lord that healeth". The Lord who knows the bitterness of Marah knows that:

> "no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but rather grievous, NEVERTHELESS AFTERWARD" (Heb. xii. 11).

If we could but remember those words 'nevertheless afterward' our Marahs would speedily give place to Elims, and the initial lesson of the wilderness would be ours. May we have grace at every Marah to look for the tree, which when cast in the waters makes them sweet.

The necessities of this life are frequently summed up under the phrase 'bread and water', to which we must add 'raiment' (I Tim. vi. 8). It will be found that in the pilgrimage of Israel, type of the earthly walk of all the Lord's redeemed people, these three items come before us with some degree of prominence.

Water figures at Marah in Exod. xv., and again at Rephidim in chapter xvii. The question of the provision of bread for the pilgrimage occupies the whole of the intervening chapter xvi. The murmurers remember the flesh pots of Egypt and that they then did eat 'bread to the full' (xvi. 3), but the bread of Egypt must give place to the 'bread of heaven' for all those who walk the pilgrim's way. It will be remembered that the hasty departure of Israel out of Egypt led to the institution of a new kind of bread:

> "And the people took their dough before it was leavened" (Exod. xii. 34), and this apparent accident was overruled to emphasize the lesson that the heavenly pilgrimage cannot be sustained with the bread of Egypt, and so the new food provided by God is called 'bread from heaven' (Exod. xvi. 4). Psa. lxxviii. 25 calls this bread "angel's food". Manna, the name given to this bread from heaven, first meets us in Exod. xvi. 15:

> "And when the children of Israel saw it, they said one to another, 'It is manna', for they wist not what it was."

It is usual to explain the word 'manna' by saying that it is the Hebrew word uttered by Israel as a question, 'What is this?' The Hebrew reads:

> "When the children of Israel saw it, they said one to another man-hu for they did not know man-hu."

The A.V. gives an alternative meaning in the margin, reading:

> "Or what is this? or it is a portion."

The Hebrew word man signifies a portion or a gift. Helen Spurrell's translation reads, "It is the gift, for they knew not its name". Aaron Pick in his Bible Students' Concordance reads MANNA, MON, a gift. The marginal note in Newberry's Bible is man-hu, i.e. in Chaldee 'what is it?' in Hebrew 'it is an appointed portion'. Parkhurst quotes from Bates in Crit. Heb. to the effect that:

> "The children of Israel said man-hu this (is) a particular species, a peculiar thing, for they knew not what it was."

This comes under manah, "to distribute", and so includes the word "kind" of Gen. i. 11, 12, the idea referred to above of 'species' and also a distributed portion or gift. Urquhart's comment is:

> "It is the name which has enshrined the surprise and joy of deliverance from death . . . . . when it was picked up and tasted, the words of Moses flashed upon them and the heart of Israel was swayed as the heart of one man . . . . . 'It is a gift'. It was a happy title, and the Scripture thankfully records it."

We believe the meaning of the word manna in Exod. xvi. is "It is a gift", but seeing that the commonly accepted rendering is fairly strongly held, we felt it necessary to show the authority we have for departing from the traditional meaning. We notice that this bread from heaven was a special provision for the wilderness:

> "Until they came unto the borders of the land of Canaan" (Exod. xvi. 35).
> "And the manna ceased on the morrow after they had eaten the old corn of the land; neither had the children of Israel manna any more" (Josh. v. 12).

During the days of our pilgrimage here the Lord provides for our spiritual needs to suit the circumstances, but we are ever to remember that when this life ceases, and we enter into the life to come, the blessings and mercies of the days of our pilgrimage will appear small when compared with the exceeding riches of grace and glory that shall then be enjoyed. There is a sad addition to the story of Exod. xvi. in Numb. xvi. 6:

> "But now our soul is dried away; there is nothing at all, beside this manna, before our eyes."

"This manna", the gift of God, the bread from heaven, angel's food! To complete the sad evidence against these people we read in Numb. xxi. 5:

> "Our soul loatheth this light bread."

The word 'light' means 'exceeding light' and the word 'loathe' means 'to be weary' as Rebekah said:

> "I am weary of my life because of the children of Heth" (Gen. xxvii. 46).

It is a sad thing when the heart grows weary of the Lord's heavenly provision for His people, yet the same liability to turn in heart away from Christ to the things that have been left behind is not the malady only of a past generation. It is with us still. The man who could say he counted all things loss did so because of 'the excellency of the knowledge of Christ' and he could add:

> "This one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto the things which are before, I press . . . . ." (Phil. iii. 8-14).

Those, on the contrary, who said 'there is nothing at all besides this manna' and who eventually sank so low as to 'loathe' and call 'contemptible' the bread from heaven, had prepared the way for this rebellious spirit by an unholy remembrance. Unlike Paul, who forgot those things that were behind, these said:

> "We remember the fish . . . . . the cucumbers, and the melons and the leeks and the onions and the garlick" (Numb. xi. 5).

They remembered the savouries, the tasty morsels, and were not satisfied with the simple fare of the heavenly pilgrimage: Is there no lesson here for ourselves? They forgot the bitterness of hard bondage which had caused the cry to reach heaven (Exod. ii. 23). This people said on another occasion:

> "Let us make a captain, and let us return into Egypt" (Numb. xiv. 4), but the inspired comment, given by Nehemiah, is:

> "In their rebellion they appointed them a captain to return to THEIR BONDAGE" (Neh. ix. 17).

If at any time the old nature seeks to turn the face of the pilgrim back to the world he has left behind, it will call to remembrance the pleasures (the leek, the onion, the garlick), but will not remind of the awful bondage and bitterness. We are not left to the evident analogy of the type to show that the manna set forth the Lord Jesus, for with unmistakable directness He Himself has taught the lesson:

"Our fathers did eat manna in the desert, as it is written, He gave them bread from heaven to eat."

"Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness and are dead. This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof and not die."

"I am that bread of life."

"This is that bread which came down from heaven; not as your fathers did eat manna, and are dead; he that eateth of this bread shall live for the age" (John vi. 31, 48-50, 58).

Step by step we shall find Israel's history unfolding the all-sufficiency of the Son of God for all things. His one Sacrifice as the great Passover was all sufficient for our deliverance. Identification with Him breaks the threefold dominion of sin, death and law. His cross makes every Marah sweet, and He, the great Gift of God, supplies all our needs unto the very border of the promised land. The experiences of the Exodus are to be repeated in the near future. The sore judgments of the Revelation echo the plagues of Egypt. In an earlier article we saw that the crossing of the Red Sea was in its turn a type of the future, and now we shall find that the miraculous supply of bread from heaven will be repeated:

"And to the woman was given two wings of a great eagle, that she might fly into the wilderness, into her place, where she is nourished" (Rev. xii. 14).

We draw attention to a clause in the prayer taught in the Sermon on the Mount, viz., "Give us this day our daily bread". 'Daily' in Greek is epiousios, from epi = upon, and ousios = coming. The true rendering of the prayer therefore is, "Give us this day the bread which cometh down upon us", i.e. the manna. We read of 'the hidden manna' in Rev. ii. 17. Some of the manna which fell in the wilderness was placed in the ark:

"That they may see the bread wherewith I have fed you in the wilderness, when I brought you forth from the land of Egypt" (Exod. xvi. 32).

The overcomer in Pergamos was strengthened by the fact that the God Who could sustain His children for forty years in the wilderness could once again give all needed supplies both spiritual and physical, and even though the edict should go forth that none should be allowed to buy or sell who had not the mark of the beast, even then the Lord would provide while witness was necessary.

Stored up in the Ark of the Covenant were three precious witnesses of the fullness of Christ: (1) the unbroken tables of the law, speaking of His perfect obedience, (2) the rod that budded, speaking of His undying priesthood, and (3) the golden pot that had the manna, speaking of His faithful provision throughout the whole of life's pilgrimage:

"Jesus said, 'I am the bread of life: he that cometh to Me shall never hunger; and he that believeth on Me shall never thirst'."

"Lord, evermore give us this bread" (John vi. 34, 35).

No.39. Amalek, type of the flesh.
Aaron and Hur, types of fellowship (Exod. xvii. & xviii.)
pp. 232 - 237

"THEN CAME AMALEK." In the generation of Esau (Gen. xxxvi.) we find that Esau and his descendants are the Edomites; "Esau is Edom" (verses 1 and 8). In verse 12 we learn that Amalek was the grandson of Esau. Both Israel and Amalek therefore could trace their descent from Abraham, and herein lies the significance of the type. Amalek stands for the flesh. This typical feature is repeated. Going back no further than Abraham we find two sons—Ishmael who stands for the flesh, and Isaac for the spirit. The epistle to the Galatians provides a commentary upon the typical character of these two sons and their relation to the flesh and spirit.

Coming to Isaac we find that he also had two sons—Esau and Jacob, and once again the type is clear. The epistle to the Hebrews provides explanation of the meaning of the typical character of these two sons. Two others must be included, viz., Moab and Ammon, both the children of Lot, and pre-eminently the children of the flesh. When we speak of these types of the flesh, Ishmael, Edom, Moab, Ammon and Amalek, we enumerate those foes of Israel who sought to bar the way and prevent their entry into the land of promise.

This is exactly what 'the flesh' in a believer does. Israel, when bondmen in Egypt, when confronted by the Red Sea, and when in need of bread and water, were called upon neither to fight nor to fend for themselves. In all these experiences they typified the passive position of the believer under grace. The believer, however, has a warfare that is legitimate, a conflict that lasts until this life finishes, the conflict between flesh and spirit.

The word 'fight', apart from the instance in Exod. i. 10 which voiced the fears of Pharaoh, is used in two settings only:

(1)	OF THE LORD	"The Lord shall fight for you" (Exod. xiv. 14).
		"The Lord fighteth for them" (Exod. xiv. 25).
(2)	OF ISRAEL	"Then came Amalek, and fought with Israel" (Exod. xvii. 8).
		"Go out, and fight with Amalek" (Exod. xvii. 9).
		"So Joshua . . . . . fought with Amalek" (Exod. xvii. 10).

The initial conflict of the believer after redemption is with the flesh. What was the occasion of the fight? We believe it was two-fold. The word 'then' in the sentence, "then came Amalek", appears to be connected with:

(1) The provision of water.

In a country like Arabia water is precious, and its possession eagerly sought. Parallel cases may be found in Gen. xxi. 25, where we find Abimelech's servants violently taking away the wells of water from Abraham. Deborah's song includes a reference to this perennial cause of conflict:

> "Instead of the shouting of the archers among the wells, There they laud the righteous acts of Jehovah" (Judges v. 11 Companion Bible).

(2) The tempting of the Lord by Israel.

"Then" reads immediately after the question, "Is the Lord among us or not?" The flesh takes immediate advantage of the beginnings of unbelief, of murmuring and complaining.

Amalek was overcome by two means:

(1) The intercession of Moses, plus the fellowship of Aaron and Hur.
(2) The warfare under Joshua.

Bishop Hall's comment here is:

> "I do not hear Moses say to this Joshua, Amalek is come up against us, it matters not whether thou go up against him or not; or if thou go, whether alone or with company, or if accompanied, whether with many or few, strong or weak; or if strong, whether they fight or no: I will pray on the hill; but choose us out men, and go fight."

In the conflict with the flesh the weapons must be those of God's appointment, and neither prayer alone, nor conflict alone can prevail. As Moses' hands were raised, so Israel's fight succeeded. As Moses' hands sank, so Israel's fight failed.

Three noteworthy features close the narrative:

(1) The command to write the record in a book.
(2) The revelation of the name Jehovah-nissi.
(3) The reason given for Amalek's extermination.

> "And the Lord said unto Moses, Write this for a memorial in a book, and rehearse it in the ears of Joshua, for I will utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven" (Exod. xvii. 14).

Joshua was the instrument in the hand of the Lord to divide the land of promise for an inheritance to Israel. His greatest activities were spent in the subjugation of the Canaanites, and all those who opposed the possession of the land. This possession was not to be considered complete until Amalek had been destroyed, for Moses reminds Israel:

> "Remember what Amalek did unto thee by the way, when ye were come forth out of Egypt: How he met thee by the way, and smote the hindmost of thee . . . . . when thou was faint and weary, and he feared not God. Therefore it shall be, when the Lord thy God hath given thee rest from all thine enemies round about, in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance to possess it, that thou shalt blot out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven: thou shalt not forget it" (Deut. xxv. 17-19).

The name Jehovah-nissi is the third Jehovah title to be revealed in Scripture. The first is concerned with the offering of Isaac (the great type of Christ and His redemption), Jehovah-jireh, "the Lord will provide". A friend, whose judgment we hold in high esteem, says that Jehovah-jireh means "Jehovah appeared" (Gen. xxii. 14) but we can do no more at the moment than make the suggestion. The second is connected with the overthrow of the Egyptians (type of the world), Jehovah-ropheka, "the Lord that healeth thee" (Exod. xv. 26). The third title is connected with the destruction of Amalek (type of the flesh), Jehovah-nissi, "the Lord my banner" (Exod. xvii. 15). This title is the first of three that suggests the believer's active appropriation:

> "The Lord my banner" (Exod. xvii. 15).
> "The Lord my shepherd" (Psa. xxiii. 1).
> "The Lord our righteousness" (Jer. xxiii. 6).

The word 'banner' (Hebrew nes) is the word used for the 'pole' upon which the brazen serpent was lifted (Numb. xxi. 8, 9). If we turn to the occasion we shall find that it is a repetition of Rephidim. The people speak against God and against Moses because of the lack of water. Jehovah-nissi is this time set forth in symbol, and this symbol speaks of Christ.

> "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up" (John iii. 14).

The banner under which we must fight our Amalek is the cross of Christ, the serpent on the pole, suggesting in type the deep doctrine of Rom. vi. 6 and Gal. v. 24 which link the conflict with the old man or the flesh with the cross. It is the cross of Christ, seen not as the means of our redemption, but of our victory over the flesh. This is the burden of Rom. vi. to viii. and Gal. v. In the margin of the A.V. of Exod. xvii. 16 we read:

> "Heb. the hand upon the throne of the Lord."

The translation both of the A.V. and the R.V. shows that those responsible believed 'the hand' to be the Lord's hand, and therefore translated the passage 'the Lord hath sworn'.

The Companion Bible note reads:

> "Surely the hand (lifted up) upon the banner of Jah (is to swear)", etc.

The substitution of 'banner' for 'throne' is explained by Rotherham in his Emphasized Version as:

> "Ginsburg thinks it should be as follows: These are readings suggested by context and verse, but not supported by the Ancient Versions" (G. Intro., pp. 162, 170).

Rotherham does not endorse this suggestion, but translates:

> "Because of a hand against the throne of Yah."

The hand that was laid upon the throne of the Lord was the hand of Amalek. With all their failures Israel were the Lord's anointed. When Balaam was brought to curse Israel, he had to say:

> "He hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob . . . . . the shout of a king is among them."
> "His king shall be higher than Agag, and his kingdom shall be exalted."
> "Edom shall be a possession."
> "And when he looked upon Amalek, he took up his parable and said, Amalek was the first of the nations, but his latter end is even to perish" (Numb. xxiii. and xxiv.).

Here Agag is mentioned in connection with Israel's king and kingdom. This was a title similar to that of Pharaoh or Abimelech, and used by all the kings of Amalek.

We have seen that because Amalek's hand was laid upon the throne of the Lord, war was declared from generation to generation. Let us pursue this vital subject further. It will be remembered that After Saul had been king for some time, we read:

> "So Saul took possession of the kingdom over Israel, and fought against all his enemies on every side, against Moab, and against the sons of Ammon, and against Edom . . . . . and smote the Amalekties" (I Sam. xiv. 47, 48).

Following this general deliverance of Israel from their hereditary foes comes the more explicit command to:

> "Smite Amalek, and utterly destroy all that they have, and spare them not" (I Sam. xv. 3).

The story is well-known to us. Saul smote the Amalekites, but he took Agag the king of the Amalekites alive. Saul and the people also refused to destroy the best of the sheep and the oxen, and 'all that was good'.

The flesh, the old man, typified by Amalek, is too often spared today. In the sight of God there is 'no good thing' in the flesh, but it is rare to find that believer who is so taught of God that he has reached the height of Phil. iii. and, making no comparison between the flesh cultured and the flesh manifestly depraved, repudiates it entirely and rejoices to stand beneath the Banner of the cross. Many who condemn Saul would be found sharing this so called 'good' thing of the flesh. To often we add to our sin by hypocrisy. Saul said:

> "The people took of the spoil, sheep and oxen, the chief of the things which should have been utterly destroyed, TO SACRIFICE UNTO THE LORD thy God in Gilgal" (I Sam. xv. 21).

"In Gilgal"! The place where the reproach of Egypt was rolled away (Josh. v. 9), where the rite of circumcision which sets forth the repudiation of the flesh (Col. ii. 11) was solemnly carried out by all Israel before they set foot in the land of promise, there above all places would Saul offer the sacrifice of the flesh and dishonour the Lord. This was to go in the way of Cain. The very next thing that Samuel is instructed to do after this is to anoint David king (I Sam. xvi.). That the throne of the kings of Israel could be spoken of as 'the throne of the Lord' I Chron. xxix. 23 makes clear:

"Then Solomon sat on the throne of the Lord as king instead of David his father."

The purpose of God foreshadowed in the earthly kingdom of Israel will be brought to a glorious conclusion by the Lord Jesus Christ. When He takes to Himself His great power and reigns, He will not rest until all enemies are abolished; there will be no sparing of Amalek then. Those readers who have grasped the significance of the two seeds (see Volume XIII, page 52, and the pamphlet The Reconciliation of All things) will perceive it in operation here, as Amalek, though descended from Abraham, was not counted as the seed, for that line came through Isaac and Jacob, whereas Amalek descended from Esau.

Mordecai and Haman.

One other occasion is given in Scripture to show the character of Amalek and to foreshadow the end. The book of Esther records that Haman was advanced by the king above all the princes that were with him, and that all the king's servants bowed down before him. It further says that "Mordecai bowed not, nor did him reverence" (Est. iii. 2). Why was this?

"Haman was the son of Hammedatha the AGAGITE" (Esther iii. 1).

Haman was the descendant of one of the Amalekite kings, and Josephus (Ant. 11:6,5) calls him an Amalekite. What was this man's attitude towards Israel?

"Haman sought to destroy all the Jews that were throughout the whole kingdom of Ahasuerus" (Esther iii. 6).

As a result of Esther's noble intervention Haman the Agagite is first compelled to do honour to Mordecai, and then to suffer the fate upon his own gallows that he had planned for the Jew. We cannot say that Haman was a descendant of that Agag who was spared by Saul, but typically we can see that in the sparing of one Amalekite in the early days of Israel's kingdom, Saul jeopardized the whole nation under the reign of Ahasuerus. So must it be with the flesh.

"He that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption" (Gal. vi. 8).
"Because the minding of the flesh is enmity against God" (Rom. viii. 7).

It certainly is extremely suggestive to read the genealogy of Mordecai in Esther ii. 5:

"Now in Shushan the palace there was a certain Jew, whose name was Mordecai, the son of Jair, the son of Shimei, the son of Kish, A Benjamite."

Saul, who so signally failed concerning Agag, is of the same line as Mordecai, who so signally succeeded. Both were of the line of Kish, the Benjamite. Saul loses his kingdom, and David is sought out and anointed immediately after the failure of Saul concerning Agag. Mordecai, however, dispossesses the Amalekite, and succeeds to his office:

> "For Mordecai the Jew was next unto king Ahasuerus, and great among the Jews, and accepted of the multitude of his brethren, seeking the wealth of his people, and speaking peace to all his seed" (Esther x. 3).

This foreshadows the purpose of the Lord and the happy results that will follow the casting down of all opposition and the introduction of that perfect day when God will be all in all. The throne of God and the purposes connected therewith have been assailed. Satan is the arch rebel, and the principalities and powers directly under him are the spiritual Amalekites of the dispensation of the Mystery. Just as Amalek barred the way towards the land of promise, so there are the opposing principalities and powers that bar the way to heavenly places. There our conflict lies. "We wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities" (Eph. vi. 12).

This conflict of the age is set forth throughout Scripture under various titles. The Canaanites were to be utterly destroyed by the conquering Israelite. Each one may see in these ancient foes the sketch of his own. Each dispensation, too, has somewhat parallel marks. Blessed be God, Satan is to be overcome, and the words of Zech. xiv. 21 are to be understood in their fullest and highest sense:

> "In that day there shall be no more Canaanite in the house of the Lord of hosts."

Greater Riches than the Treasures in Egypt

No.1. All things ours, in Christ (I Cor. i. 30; iii. 21 - 23).
pp. 123 - 126

In another series of articles, the typical history of Israel from the Exodus to the Jordan came before us as we considered the application to ourselves of the text:

> "The house of Jacob shall possess their possessions" (Obad. 17).

In the present series we carry these typical lessons with us in heart and mind and survey those blessings which are ours in Christ, and ask ourselves as we do so, how far can we truthfully say that we "possess our possessions"? We are sure that God will abide faithfully by all His promises, but there is such a thing as apprehending that for which we have been apprehended of Christ Jesus (Phil. iii. 12).

The blessings that are ours through Christ can be considered under three headings:

(1) Blessings of Salvation. Such would include: Justification, Sanctification, Forgiveness, Life and Peace.
(2) Blessings of our Calling. Such blessings would be "dispensational" in character, and look to the sphere of blessing, the character of our calling, "Heavenly places" and "One Body" for example.
(3) Blessings in Service. True service is rendered in newness of life, and accomplished by the power of the Risen Christ.

Two related passages in I Corinthians will open this series of studies by their very comprehensiveness, sweeping aside all human merit, and revealing unlimited blessing to be the believer's portion in Christ Jesus.

The reader knows that the Corinthian Church was split up into coteries, one claiming Paul, another Apollos, another Cephas, and yet another Christ Himself as a party leader. The Corinthians moreover, being Greeks, placed a high value on human wisdom, and this the Apostle brings to the touchstone of the Cross. Although Paul uses strong language as he denounces the folly of these believers, he concludes his double attack upon "man's wisdom", not with invective or censure, but by revealing that all the time, if any man is in Christ, he already possesses all things including "wisdom" at its highest. Here are the two passages.

> "Ye see your calling . . . . . that no flesh should glory in His presence. But of Him are ye in Christ Jesus, Who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption; that, according as it is written, He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord" (I Cor. i. 26-31).
> "Therefore let no man glory in men. For all things are yours; whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours; and ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's" (I Cor. iii. 21-23).

Here are "possessions" indeed, which as from a Pisgah of faith, spread themselves out before our wondering gaze. It will be observed that both passages open with a warning "That no flesh should glory in His presence". "Let no man glory in men", and this warning we must obey if we are to possess our possessions.

The English word "glory" is used in the N.T. to represent two very different concepts. It translates doxa "do all to the glory of God" (I Cor. x. 31), but it also translates kauchaomai "God forbid that I should glory" (Gal. vi. 14). It is the word kauchaomai that occurs in I Cor. i. 29, 31 and iii. 21. This word is allied with aucheo "to boast, please oneself", which some lexicographers believe is connected with, if not derived from, the Greek word auchen "the neck". The Psalmist says "speak not with a stiff neck" (Psa. lxxv. 5) and Isaiah speaks of those who were haughty, and "walk with stretched forth necks" (Isa. iii. 16). Kauchaomai is used by the LXX for the "triumph" of the wicked (Psa. xciv. 3) and for the "joyful" praise of the saints (Psa. cxlix. 5). So also in the N.T. the word can speak of "glorying" in men and in appearance or of "glorying" in the Lord. Salvation is by grace "lest any one should boast", that is, boast in themselves. Yet the true circumcision "rejoices (or boasts) in Christ Jesus, and has no confidence in the flesh" (Phil. iii. 3). The Apostle was so sure that the whole testimony of the Word was against this boasting in self, that he combines the teaching of more than one O.T. passage under the saying:

> "According as it is written, He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord", a summary that not only appears in I Cor. i. 31, but which is repeated in II Cor. x. 17.

Putting aside therefore all foolish boasting, let us come close to the enumeration of blessings which the Apostle has said are all ours in Christ.

Before we can do justice to I Cor. i. 30, we are obliged to make a digression, because one small but important particle has not been translated in the A.V. of this passage. Kai is correctly rendered "and", but the combination te kai demands something more.

In a number of passages, the translation "both . . . . . and" is called for, and if these references are quoted, the reader may be the more willing to agree that something is missing in the A.V. translation of I Cor. i. 30.

> "These servants . . . . . gathered together . . . . . both bad and good" (Matt. xxii. 10).
> "All that Jesus began both to do and teach" (Acts i. 1).
> "Both Herod and Pontius Pilate" (Acts iv. 27).
> "Both gifts and sacrifices" (Heb. ix. 9).

The omission of the word "both" from any of these passages would be detrimental. There is a logical and internal relation between those things which are annexed by te kai 'both . . . . . and', not only in the passages cited above, but in I Cor. i. 30. Translators may have found it difficult to use the word 'both' when translating I Cor. i. 30 but that does not justify ignoring the presence of te kai. There are other equivalents. "David also and Samuel" (Heb. xi. 32). "Whether they were men or women" (Acts ix. 2).

The word ‘besides’ can be employed in the passage before us and the truth maintained.

> “But of Him, are ye in Christ Jesus, Who of God is made unto us, wisdom, besides righteousness, sanctification and redemption” (I Cor. i. 30).

It appears that the Corinthians were already possessed of the fact that righteousness, sanctification and redemption were theirs, what the Apostle would have them recognize was that in the self same way ‘wisdom’ too was theirs in Christ. This was a truth that would be somewhat humbling to a Greek, for the Greeks sought after wisdom, even as the Jews sought after righteousness, and alas, both sought it in the power of the flesh.

Paul has been at great pains to show that “Jesus Christ and Him crucified” is the Wisdom of God, despite even as the preaching of the cross is the Wisdom of God, despite the fact that in the eyes of the “wise” such a message is “foolishness”. This question of wisdom and the natural man is pursued in the second chapter of I Corinthians, and in chapter iii. the carnality of those who said “I am of Paul”, “I am of Apollos”, is exposed. This leads at length to the close of the chapter which reintroduces the fact that all the spiritual possessions of the believer are found in Christ.

> “For all things are yours; whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours; and ye are Christ’s; and Christ is God’s” (I Cor. iii. 21-23).

Here are some of our ‘possessions’. They are all ours. It is evident upon reading the two epistles, that the Corinthians were far from entering experimentally into this treasure, and it will be salutary to go over the ground now surveyed so that we too may learn what to avoid, and how these things may become our own, not only as they are ours already “in Christ Jesus”, but in apprehension and life.

We shall have to give fuller heed to the repeated warning against ‘boasting’ or ‘glorying’ in men or the flesh. We shall have to ponder what is implied in the words ‘Who of God is made unto us’. We shall have to deal separately with the great gifts, wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption. We shall need to consider what is implied in the words “All things are yours”, and to examine carefully the list given in I Cor. iii. 22; a list that includes life and death, things present and things to come, and finally we shall have to give the most earnest consideration to the climax and the seal of all this teaching.

> “And ye are Christ’s: and Christ is God’s.”

To devote most precious and important aspects of truth, therefore, we must devote ourselves in subsequent studies.

No.2. The setting of our key texts (I Cor. i. 30; iii. 21 - 23).
pp. 191 - 193

In our approach to the N.T. and to the apprehension of all for which we have been apprehended of Christ Jesus, our attention was directed to the words of Paul in his letter to the Corinthians (I Cor. i. 30 and iii. 21-23). There is so much in these two passages, that we shall be compelled to halt and weigh them over in the balances of the Sanctuary before passing on to other and similar passages. Indeed we may well discover, that by the time we have considered these two passages, together with their parallels in other epistles, that there will be very little left to say. In order to appreciate the Apostle's conclusions as set forth in these two extracts from I Corinthians, we must acquaint ourselves with the context, then examine the A.V. translations and make any adjustments that fuller light and accurate scholarship indicates, and finally to consider each term or phrase as so many steps leading to the Divine goal. In the present study, let us endeavour to place Paul's conclusions in their true relation with the context.

The first Epistle to the Corinthians owes its origin, humanly speaking, to five allied causes:

(1) The report of the household of Chloe.
(2) A common report concerning their morals.
(3) A letter from the Corinthians.
(4) A special error in doctrine—the resurrection.
(5) The collection for the poor saints at Jerusalem.

The epistle follows the order of these five features, chapters:

i. - iv.	deal with divisions in the church.
v., vi.	deal with immorality in the church.
vii. - xiv.	deal with the letter from the church.
xv.	deal with the subject of resurrection.
xvi.	deal with the collection for the saints.

The structure of the epistle follows this fivefold subdivision of theme, but puts the emphasis on certain features that might otherwise be overlooked.

I Corinthians as a whole

A | i. 1-9. Waiting for the coming of the Lord.
B | i. 10 - iv. 21. "IT HATH BEEN DECLARED UNTO ME."
C | v. 1 - xiv. 30. The body, physically, spiritually, ecclesiastically.
B | xv. "I DECLARE UNTO YOU."
A | xvi. Maranatha. The Lord cometh.

It will be seen that after a salutation or introduction of the epistle to the church as a whole, with a stress upon the place that the hope of the Lord's return should have in their lives (I Cor. i. 7-9), the Apostle immediately plunges into the problems that threatened the spiritual life of the Corinthians by the words "it hath been declared unto me of you, my brethren, by them which are of the house of Chloe, that there are contentions among you". We must not for a moment think of these members of the household of Chloe as tale-bearers, but rather that by dint of personal probing and questioning, Paul had unearthed the confused state in which the church of the Corinthians had been thrown by their divisions, their laxity of morals and their doctrinal errors.

The great Rabbi Hillel said "Many fathers, much strife", and Paul's own expression "Though ye have ten thousand instructors in Christ, yet have ye not many fathers", seems to point to the cause of divisions among them. He feared that when he did come among them that there might still be "debates, envyings, wraths, strifes, backbitings, whisperings, swellings and tumults" (II Cor. xii. 20). It had become evident that the coming of Apollos to them, instead of proving an unmixed blessing, had been used by the evil one to sow discord. Paul had designedly used simple language when among them, owing to their predilection to "excellency of speech and of wisdom" (I Cor. ii. 11), in order that their faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God. As a result, some of the Corinthians, disappointed and possibly rebuffed by the Apostle's attitude, spoke of his personal appearance as 'mean' and of his speech as 'contemptible' (II Cor. x. 10). Apollos was mighty in the Scriptures, and fervent in spirit, and had been much blessed by the ministry of Aquila and Priscilla, so that he "helped them much which had believed through grace" (Acts xviii. 27). Apollos moreover was 'eloquent' logios and this gift may have been seized upon by some of the Corinthians as a weapon with which to beat Paul.

> "Apollos, who had followed him, though an able man, was an inexperienced Christian, and not only by the natural charm of his impassioned oratory, but also by the way in which he entered into subtle refinements so familiar to the Alexandrian intellect, had unintentionally led them first of all to despise the unsophisticated simplicity of St. Paul's teaching, and next to give the rein to all the skeptical fancies with which their faith was overlaid . . . . . St. Paul could not but see the most extravagant exaggerations of his own doctrines—the half-truths, which are ever the most dangerous of errors" (Farrar, Life and Work of Paul).

While naturally there was a Greek element in the church of Corinth, a company who could be reminded that they were "Gentiles, carried away by these dumb idols, even as ye were led" (I Cor. xii. 1), there was a strong Jewish section who also could be reminded by Paul "how that all our fathers were under the cloud and in the sea" (I Cor. x. 1, 2).

The Judaic Christians who came armed with 'letters of commendation' (II Cor. iii. 1) from the twelve at Jerusalem, would naturally be most acceptable to the Jewish section of the church, with the consequence that the emergence of a party that favoured Apollos, drove the Jewish section to range themselves under the name of Peter, or apparently as they preferred to call him, Cephas, avoiding even the Gentile name which the Lord had given to him. Already at Corinth there had been invidious comparisons made between the apostleship of Peter and of Paul, to which allusions can be found in both epistles addressed to the Corinthians. Reluctantly, the Apostle wrote: "I suppose I was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles. But though I be rude in speech, yet not in knowledge . . . . . are they Hebrews?" (II Cor. xi. 5, 6, 22), and so, added to those who raised the party cry "I am of Apollos", was sounded the equally mischievous cry "I am of Cephas".

Later, when he does refer to Apollos, he most nobly places Apollos upon an equal footing with himself saying:

> "Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed . . . . . I have planted, Apollos watered: but God gave the increase, so then neither is he that planteth anything, neither he that watereth; but God that giveth the increase" (I Cor. iii. 5-7).
>
> "These things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myself and to Apollos for your sakes: that ye might learn in us not to think of men above that which is written, that no one of you be puffed up FOR ONE AGAINST ANOTHER" (I Cor. iv. 6).

To such, Paul wrote the words already cited:

> "Therefore let no man glory in men. For ALL THINGS ARE YOURS, whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come: ALL ARE YOURS: and ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's" (I Cor. iii. 23).

No.3 XLII.58

No.3. The only ground of boasting (I Cor. i. 31; iii. 21 - 23).

Volume XLII, pp. 58 - 60

In the preceding article we were concerned largely with the faction and division that raised the party cries 'I am of Paul, I am of Apollos' etc., and realized that this party spirit is in mind right through the section, Paul, Apollos and Cephas being mentioned by name in the closing verses of chapter iii.

'Glorying' or 'boasting' falls into two main groups, namely, those things in which the believer can boast, and those things in which he cannot or must not boast. Those references which do not fall under one or other of these categories will need to be considered separately.

(1) Legitimate grounds of boasting for the believer.

This list can be headed with the words of I Cor. i. 31:

> "He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord."

The only true ground of boasting or glorying for a sinner saved by grace is expressed in the words of Gal. vi. 14:

"But God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ."

It is the characteristic of the true believer that he is one that:

"Worships God in spirit, boasts or glories in Christ Jesus, and has no confidence in the flesh" (Phil. iii. 13).

This boasting, while it may be expressed in faltering tones here and now, will be fully expressed in the day of redemption,

"that I may rejoice, boast or glory, in the day of Christ, that I have not run in vain, neither laboured in vain" (Phil. ii. 16).

This relation of the apostle's "boasting" in that day, with the faithfulness of those believers who came under his care, is more fully announced when he said:

"For what is our hope, or joy, or crown or rejoicing (or glorying)? Are not ever ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at His coming?" (I Thess. ii. 19).

When the Apostle would bring the first great section of Romans to a conclusion, which he does in Rom. v. 1-11, he writes his exultant praise around three occurrences of kauchaomai thus:

A1 | 1, 2. BOASTING in hope.
B | 3-. Not only so.
A2 | -3-10. BOASTING in tribulation also.
B | 11-. Not only so.
A3 | -11. BOASTING in God.

The interposition of the 'glorying in tribulations also' brings us to another aspect of truth. It must not be assumed from the rigorous denial of all grounds of boasting in self and the flesh, that Paul was austere or unsympathetic in his dealings with fellow believers—the opposite is the truth. He finds some grounds for thanksgiving in the opening salutation of the epistle to the Corinthians, even though the bulk of the epistle exposes such aberration and folly as to cause the Apostle to weep. After all that he has said to the contrary he said he would 'boast' in himself, but not in his prowess his wisdom, his success, but in his infirmities!

"He said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee; for My strength is made perfect in weakness. Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me . . . . . for when I am weak, then I am strong" (II Cor. xii. 9, 10).

He who could glory in tribulations and infirmities as did the Apostle, was no defeatist or cynic; he was an exultant believer delivered once and for ever from the vanity of self-justification, and could, from that standpoint, see that even his own acknowledged frailty but emphasized the power of Christ upon him. In much the same way, the same Apostle who resolutely set aside all boasting in self and in men, could punctuate II Cor. vii.-ix. with this boasting in the generosity of the Corinthian church.

Other references to the same theme are II Cor. vii. 14; viii. 24 and ix. 3, 4. But in all this the discerning reader will see that there is no boasting in the flesh. To this end, the concluding verse of II Cor. ix. should be pondered. When he had said all that could be said about the liberality of the Corinthians and their magnificent response, he gives the whole passage a significant turn at the end by saying:

> "Thanks be unto God for His unspeakable Gift" (II Cor. ix. 15).

Similarly when Paul said that he had whereof he could boast through Jesus Christ, it was 'in those things which pertain to God', which the context reveals to be the grace given to him as the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles (Rom. xv. 15-20). In like manner, in the self-same chapter of Galatians where he writes 'God forbid that I should boast' he says "But let every man prove his own work and then shall he have rejoicing (or a ground of boasting) in himself alone, and not in another. For every man shall bear his own burden (or allotted task, pack or load)" (Gal. vi. 4, 5).

(2) The Apostle has brought together a series of reasons to show that boasting in human merit, when the subject is related to sin and salvation, is entirely excluded.

Again we can head this list with quotations from the passages in Corinthians that are before us:

> "That no flesh should glory in His presence" (I Cor. i. 29).
> "Therefore let no man glory in men" (I Cor. iii. 21).

In his two fundamental epistles, namely Romans and Ephesians, while the dispensations differ and the sphere of blessing differs, they are in accord regarding the question of boasting in self. Having brought the great question of justification by faith without the deeds of the law to its triumphant conclusion in Rom. iii. 19-26, he puts the question and supplies the answer.

> "Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? of works? Nay: but by the law of faith" (Rom. iii. 27).

In like manner, in Ephesians, he speaks of salvation and boasting:

> "By grace are ye saved through faith: and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God. Not of works, lest any man should boast" (Eph. ii. 8, 9).

The classic example of Abraham occupies a large portion of the opening section of Rom. i. 1 - v.11, and there we read:

> "What shall we say then that Abraham our father, as pertaining to the flesh, hath found?" (Rom. iv. 1).

All that Paul has said is summed up in the words of I Cor. i. 29 "That no flesh should glory in His presence".

It might be well if we remember that enopion "In His Presence" is translated "in His sight" in Rom. iii. 20:

> "There shall be no flesh justified in His sight" (Rom. iii. 20).

The intensive form katenopion and its usage makes any boasting in the presence of God, excepting boasting in the Lord, impossible. The word occurs but five times. Two references deal with witness (II Cor. ii. 17; xii. 19), the remaining three with complete and unconditional acceptance.

> "According as He hath chosen us in Him, before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame BEFORE Him" (Eph. i. 4).
> "In the body of His flesh through death, to present you holy and unblameable and unreproveable in His SIGHT" (Col. i. 22).

What more fitting conclusion to an article like this can there be than the doxology of the epistle of Jude:

> "Now unto Him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless BEFORE THE PRESENCE of His glory, with exceeding joy, TO the only wise God our Saviour, be glory, and majesty, dominion and power both now and ever. Amen." (Jude 24, 25).

No.4. "What Christ has been 'made' unto us" (I Cor. i. 30; iii. 21 - 23).

pp. 218 - 220

The passage, I Cor. i. 29-31 that is before us in these studies, is bounded by the negative and positive aspects of 'boasting'.

A | i. 29. "That no flesh should glory in His presence." Negative.
B | i. 30. "But of Him." What Christ is made unto us.
A | i. 31. "He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord." Positive.

We have surveyed the usage and teaching of the words kauchaomai, kauchesis and kauchema 'glorying' and now must turn our attention to the core of the matter. "What Christ has been made unto us." The blessings that are about to be enumerated, cover the ground of human need and Divine requirement—Righteousness and Sanctification, Wisdom and Redemption; and not only so, but all men, all things, and all states 'whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come'. But the opening, and the closing of these two passages, taken together sound the next important note.

> "Of Him" The origin "In Christ Jesus" The Mediator (I Cor. i. 30).
> "Ye are Christ's" The Mediator "Christ is God's" The origin (I Cor. iii. 23).

First we must realize that the words "But of Him" are the blessed contrast with the failure of man that has been stressed in chapter i. and which is taken up again in chapter ii.

> "For after that in the wisdom of God the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of the preaching to save them that believe" (I Cor. i. 21).
> "But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him, neither can he know them for they are spiritually discerned" (I Cor. ii. 14).
> "The Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain" (I Cor. iii. 20).

Here are three passages from these three chapters, three out of many.

The word sophia "wisdom" is found sixteen times in chapter i. to iii. of Corinthians, while the word sophos 'wise' is found 10 times in chapters i. and iii. It is not surprising therefore that the Apostle reminds the Corinthians that Christ had been made unto them 'wisdom'. The idea of Christ being "made' something for the benefit of His people, is expressed in the N.T. in two ways. The Greek word ginomai which means 'to become' and the Greek word poieo 'to make'.

> "For He hath made (poieo) Him to be sin for us, Who knew no sin; that we might be made (ginomai) the righteousness of God in Him" (II Cor. v. 21).

This passage is of interest, not only and chiefly for the glorious doctrine it teaches, but because the two words poieo and ginomai are translated 'made'.

"He was MADE sin"; "That we might be MADE the righteousness of God in Him". The primary meaning of poieo is 'to make', and meet us in the LXX on the very threshold of truth, for it is employed to translate the Hebrew bara 'create'. The one Hebrew word however that is translated more times in the LXX by poieo than any other is asah which is rendered in the A.V. 'make' 631 times, as for example Gen. i. 31, or Gen. ii. 2 where it is employed as an extension of the word bara 'create'. When poieo is joined to nouns which indicate a state of condition, it signifies the author or cause.

> "Mark them which cause divisions and offences" (Rom. xv. 17).
> "So making peace" (Eph. ii. 15).
> "Neither raising up the people" i.e. Neither making insurrection (Acts xiv. 12).

Poieo then comes to mean "to constitute or appoint". "And He ordained twelve" (mark iii. 14). "God hath made that same Jesus Whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ" (Acts ii. 36). "And hast made us unto our God kings and priests" (Rev. v. 10). "Wherefore . . . . . consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession Christ Jesus; who was faithful to him that appointed Him" (Heb. iii. 1, 2). From this comes the sense "to declare one anything", as "Making Himself equal with God" (John v. 18); "Whom makest Thou Thyself?" (John viii. 53); "Because He made Himself the Son of God" (John xix. 7). When John said of some that "they made God a liar" (I John i. 6), it is evident that no change in the Divine character is intended; it simply means that the effect of the action or attitude condemned had that tendency.

Christ therefore was 'made' sin in this sense. He was appointed, reckoned, and treated as though He were sin, while all the time it was absolutely essential that He should Himself "know no sin" otherwise He could never be the sin Bearer for others. In Deut. xxv. 1 the words "They shall condemn the wicked" reads, literally "They shall MAKE him wicked" which employs a figure of speech, meaning 'to declare' that he is so. The other term "that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him" employs the word ginomai 'to become'. That there is much in common between these two words, a reference to Gal. iii. 13 will reveal. There 'being made a curse for us' is very close to 'being made sin for us', but II Cor. v. 21 uses poieo whereas Gal iii. 13 uses ginomai. So we might compare Eph. ii. 13 with ii. 15. We "are made nigh" (ginomai), He "made peace" (poieo). Let us use the one English word 'become' in a few selected passages where ginomai is employed—it may help us.

"Who became of the seed of David, according to the flesh" (Rom. i. 4). "The circumcision becomes uncircumcision" (Rom. ii. 25). "I have become all things to all men" (I Cor. ix. 22). We might note that in II Cor. v., a little earlier than the verse we have examined, we read "behold, all things are become new" where ginomai is used. While poieo 'made' indicates that Christ was appointed to be sin for us in His great office of Sin-bearer, the word ginomai reveals that the believer 'becomes', "comes into existence" in the condition of being "the righteousness of God" in Him. Ginomai is used of creation (John i. 3; Heb. xi. 3) and of birth (Gal. iv. 4). It is used in the phrase "the body that shall be" (I Cor. xv. 37).

Let us carefully note the steps or links in the Apostle's argument as indicated by the prepositions employed in I Cor. i. 30. "But OF Him", ek out of, denoting origin, as in Rom. xi. 36, and I Cor. viii. 6 "But to us there is one God, the Father, OF Whom are all things". The first thing to recognize is that the blessings of the gospel originate or take their rise in God. The gospel preached by Paul is "The Gospel OF GOD". While it is true that the gospel is "of God" it would be no gospel or message of good news to sinful man, apart from Christ. "The Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world"; "God so loved that He gave His only begotten Son". God, in heaven, could not redeemed "for as by man came death, by Man came also the resurrection of the dead". The whole doctrine of the Kinsman-Redeemer that permeates the O.T., cries aloud for "The Word made flesh", Emmanuel, God with us. Moreover, Paul does not say that these blessings are "in Christ" or "in Jesus" or "in the Lord" or even "in Jesus Christ". He uses the title "in Christ Jesus".

When all the revised readings are recognized it will be found that the title "Christ Jesus" does not occur in the epistle to the Hebrews, is never found in the epistles of Peter, James, John or Jude! One occurrence of this title is found in Acts, namely in the record of Paul's preaching (Acts xxiv. 24 R.V.), the remainder of the occurrences are exclusive to the epistles of Paul. The title is peculiar in that the order of the names is reversed. The emphasis is upon Christ, the One Who on earth bore the name "Jesus".

Some of the blessings that are found "in Christ Jesus" are:

(1) Justification comes freely by grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus (Rom. iii. 24).
(2) The law of the spirit of life makes free from the law of sin and death, and this law is "in Christ Jesus" (Rom. viii. 2).
(3) Nothing can separate the redeemed from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus (Rom. viii. 39).
(4) We have liberty in Christ Jesus (Gal. ii. 4).
(5) We are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus (Gal. iii. 26).

In the Prison Epistles this title appears many times, and the reader would be wise to make a note of the R.V. text of these epistles. In addition to the occurrences found in the A.V. the following additional references to "Christ Jesus" should be noted.

Eph. i. 1, 20; iii. 1, 6; Phil. i. 1, 8, 26; Col. i. 1; iv. 12; II Tim. i. 1, 10; ii. 3; iv. 1.

Col. i. 28 should read "Christ" and not "Christ Jesus". This means that there are nine occurrences of "Christ Jesus" in Ephesians, ten in Philippians, four in Colossians, twelve in II Timothy and two in Philemon—in all 37 references. It would manifestly be impossible to review these passages and note their special doctrinal teaching here. But to all who would 'possess their possessions' that examination appears to be essential.

No.5. "The Just for the unjust."
pp. 238 - 240

Ye have heard that it has been said, "An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth, But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil" (Matt. v. 38, 39). Commenting upon this passage we might also say "Ye have heard that it has been said, see how severe is the law of Moses, but see how merciful is the gospel of Christ". But would such a comment be true? In the first place the Gospel of Christ is nowhere the subject of the Sermon on the Mount. At the time of utterance He had neither died nor risen again, neither had He at the time revealed that He must do so (Matt. xvi. 21). In the second place, the quotation we have given from the Sermon on the Mount, is one of seven that opens with some such words as "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old . . . . . But I say unto you" (Matt. v. 21, 22, 27, 28, 31-34, 38-42). Do these passages announce a severe law and follow it by a gentler gospel?

The law said, that whosoever kills shall be in danger of the judgment, but what saith the Saviour? He said that if any one was even angry with his brother without cause he would be in danger of judgment! Here then the law of the Sermon on the Mount is more severe than the law of Moses! The same applies to the law of adultery. We must therefore adjust our view of the last passage where it speaks of 'an eye for an eye', and see that it was easier for a man to exact even-handed justice, an eye for an eye, than to submit to the severer demand of the Sermon on the Mount and resist not evil. In addition to all this, these seven utterances are preceded by the saying of Christ that He had not come to destroy the law or the prophets, but to fulfil, and also that heaven and earth should pass away, but not one jot or one tittle of the law should pass unfulfilled. No interpretation therefore of the subsequent verses is valid that sets aside the law.

Let us now turn to the book of Leviticus and see the passage quoted by the Lord in Matt. v. 38:

> "He that killeth a man shall surely be put to death, and he that killeth a beast shall make it good; beast for beast. And if a man cause a blemish in his neighbour; as he hath done, so shall it be done to him. Breach for breach; eye for ye, tooth for tooth; as he hath caused a blemish in a man, so shall it be done to him again. And he that killeth a beast shall restore it; and he that killeth a man, he shall be put to death" (Lev. xxiv. 17-21).

This is 'even handed justice' which the Poet so clearly perceives 'commends the ingredients of our poisoned chalice to our own lips'. Nothing but a mawkish sentimentalism could ask of justice less, even as clear impartial justice could not exact more. There is no occasion to raise an outcry against the severity of the sentence "an eye for an eye". What may we ask of the loser of the eye, shall he not have protection; should the spoiler not suffer an equivalent loss? No such sentimental outbursts are heard at the grocers and the bakers, when the customer is expected to pay the recognized price of the commodity, and what is sixteen ounces to the pound but the principle of "an eye of an eye"? And conversely, do we charge with meanness and lack of charity, when he demands that sixteen ounces to the pound? and what is this but the application of the principle "a tooth for a tooth"?

When we come to the N.T. and consider what the Saviour did when He "died the just for the unjust" we shall see that sixteen ounces to the pound have been rendered. The balance registers exact weight, whether the actual debtor placed the amount due in the scale, or whether a Surety provides the amount. The question of the provision of a substitute lies in the realm of Grace, the only place that it has in the realm of Justice is to see that the claim is met. We are inclined to put far too much emphasis upon the justification of the sinner who believes the Gospel, than the justification of the God Who forgives and accepts him in the Beloved. The epistle to the Romans stresses that the power of the Gospel consists in the fact that "Therein is revealed the righteousness of God" (Rom. i. 17), and that in the redemption and justification of the believer, God has been careful that from first to last the Gospel plan shall "Declare His righteousness, that He might be JUST and the JUSTIFIER of him which believeth in Jesus" (Rom. iii. 23-26).

The symbol of righteousness in the O.T. is either a balance or a plumb-line (Isa. xxviii. 17; Amos vii. 7-8). The same force, that of gravity, acts on both. The plumb-line hangs true, whatever the surroundings may be. The balance swings true, and is undisturbed by any claims of mercy or pity. Salvation must never be conceived as a scheme whereby Justice is circumvented. The full weight has been rendered, by whom is not the question. The wondrous plan of salvation, whereby a Substitute should willingly take the sinner's place, where the claim of impartial justice should be fully met, where the basis of salvation should be righteousness, and that a "righteousness of God", this plan of salvation is entirely outside the province of mere Justice. Righteousness must be unheld, but Lord provides the way, and if that way be one of Sacrifice, then that Sacrifice will be offered without reserve.

Scripture does not enter into the question of how the Saviour satisfied the claim of justice, it simply affirms that salvation justifies both the sinner and the God of his salvation.

All that we have attempted in this survey is to establish the fact that the principle "an eye for an eye" has been honoured in our salvation, but honoured by a gracious Substitute. How this righteousness becomes ours, what it is to be justified by faith and all the associated doctrines of this blessed theme must be the subject of future meditations. Meanwhile let us return to our text:

> "But of Him are ye in Christ Jesus, Who of God is made unto us . . . . . righteousness" (I Cor. i. 30).

HEBREWS

Perfection or Perdition

No.17. What is meant by "tasting" death?

pp. 11 - 14

When we published this series on Hebrews in the early volumes of the Berean Expositor, we had several communications with the Rev. George Parker, of Honan, China, who wrote:

> "You have not attempted sub-grouping of the seven-fold ascription of praise (Rev. v. 12), nor did Roe in 1834. I suggest:
>
> Power.
> Riches — Solomon—King.
> Wisdom > Strength.
> Honour — Aaron—Priest.
> Glory > Blessing.
> The second pair, honour and glory, gives the clue."

When these kingly and priestly functions are united we have no longer Solomon and Aaron, but the King-Priest of the Apocalypse, the Priest after the order of Melchisedec. The crowning with glory and honour (Heb. ii. 9) is the consecration of Christ as the Priest after the order of Melchisedec. "And no man taketh this HONOUR unto himself . . . . . so also Christ GLORIFIED not Himself" (v. 4, 5). We shall find an allusion to this position in iii. 3: "for this Man was counted worthy of more GLORY than Moses, inasmuch as He Who hath builded the house hath more HONOUR than the house." Thus we find Christ superior in honour and glory to both Moses and Aaron, and when we see Him crowned with honour and glory we are indeed considering Him Who is the Apostle (Moses) and High Priest (Aaron) of our profession.

It will be remembered that immediately following the revelation of the Lord's approaching sufferings (Matt. xvi.), comes the Transfiguration (Matt. xvii.). In order to have "an entrance ministered richly into the aionian kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ", the apostle Peter bids the believers of the dispersion remember the Transfiguration:--

> "For we have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eyewitnesses of His majesty. For He received from God the Father HONOUR and GLORY" (II Pet. i. 16, 17).

We pointed out previously that the "so great salvation" of which the Lord began to speak commences with His rejection, and is related more closely to the testimony of the second half of Matthew's gospel than to the first. Those disciples who saw the rejection of the King (Matt. xii., xiii.), could say after the Transfiguration, "We see not yet all things put under Him, but we see Jesus . . . . . crowned with glory and honour".

We now turn our attention to the close of Heb. ii. 9, "that He by the grace of God should taste death for every man". How are we to understand the expression "taste death"? Is it merely a synonym for death itself? Some say so, but we distrust this interpretation of so many expressions as synonyms. We feel that there must be a clear reason why this word is used here, and therefore we turn to the Scriptures for light upon its meaning.

The word is translated in the A.V. "eat" three times, and "taste" twelve times. We shall never plumb the profoundest depths of the Scriptures "unto perfection", but we shall never find them lapsing into the slightest approach to error or slovenly usage of language. That Homer may nod is proverbial; that the Scriptures are infallible is one of the first articles of faith. It is also the impression consistently gained by continual searching. We are not at all surprised therefore in the case of such divinely-arranged words to find that the first occurrence of the expression "taste of death" takes us back to the close of Matt. xvi., immediately before the record of the Transfiguration. There is one feature common to all passages referring to the Transfiguration in the Gospels: immediately before the reference is the statement concerning losing the soul for Christ's sake. Now Peter's epistles have as their theme present suffering followed by future glory. This is the lesson also of Matthew, chapters xvi. and xvii.

To John viii. 52 we need not refer, for the Lord said "see death" (verse 51) and we are not certain enough of those children of the devil (verse 44) to follow them here. That to "taste" does not mean to "drink" (Matt. xxvii. 34) show and thus in the figurative sense also, to taste of death need not necessarily mean to die. When the ruler of the feast "tasted" the water that was made wine, he certainly did not drink the entire amount which the Saviour had miraculously provided, and when the Lord said "none of those men which were bidden shall taste of my supper", it is equivalent to the more modern colloquial phrase, "they shall not have a bit of it". When Peter became hungry and would have 'tasted' he wanted a very little, not a full meal (Acts x. 10). Again, the phrase in Acts xx. 11 does not indicate what we call a meal. The curse under which the enemies of Paul bound themselves was not that they would not eat, but that they would not even taste food, so great was their enmity. Those who during this present evil age experienced in any measure the powers of the age to come are said to have "tasted" of the heavenly gift, and to have "tasted" the good word of God (Heb. vi. 4, 5). They sampled these things, but it will be true of them, as of the Queen of Sheba, that "the half has not yet been told".

I Peter ii. 2, 3 is quite in line with the rest. The new-born babes, though feeding on the milk of the Word, have but "tasted" that the Lord is gracious. As they grow thereby and feed upon the stronger food, they will realize that blessed truth more. Every passage we have referred to leads us to draw distinctions between tasting and fully eating. Coming back to Matt. xvi. 28 let us notice how this helps us:

> "Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here, which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in His Kingdom."

It is a difficulty with many that these men died before the Lord's return. Now apart from all other factors in the true explanation, this difficulty is a fallacy. The Lord did not say "shall not die", but shall not taste of death, and He refers to what He had just been teaching them:

> "If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow Me. For whosoever will save his life (soul) shall lose it: and whosoever will lose his life (soul) for My sake shall find it" (24, 25).

This is surely "tasting" death. To take up the cross and to lose one's soul—this, though not actual death, is tasting death. The disciples however were not permitted to suffer anything for their Lord until they had first of all seen the vision of His glory so closely connected with His decease which He was about to accomplish at Jerusalem (Luke ix. 31). This word "decease" impressed Peter, for he uses the very same word immediately before he speaks of the Transfiguration in his second epistle. This time it was his own decease, but the link is there and visible. That bitter sorrow of soul "even unto death" experienced by the Lord in the garden of Gethsemane reveals the awful character of the taste of death to which Heb. ii. 9 refers, while the words "nevertheless, not as I will, but as Thou wilt" link it with Heb. v. 4-10. Who were they that were chosen to be near the Lord in this dread hour? The very three who witnessed the foreshadowing of His glory on the mount of Transfiguration. When the Lord tasted that bitter cup, He prayed:

> "O my Father, if this cup may not pass away from Me, except I drink it, Thy will be done" (Matt. xxvi. 42).

As we stand upon this holy ground and witness that agony and bloody sweat, we see the Lord Jesus tasting death. How pointed therefore the words are to those who are exhorted to follow Him in this path of suffering when they are told, "He Himself hath suffered being tempted, He is able to succour them that are tempted". Temptation hung over that garden of Gethsemane, as is seen by the Lord's words to His disciples. "Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation." The garden of Gethsemane is no sentimental idea foisted upon Heb. ii. 9. This is seen by Heb. v. 7-9:

> "Who in the days of His flesh, when He had offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto Him that was able to save Him from death, and was heard in that He feared; though He were a Son, yet learned He obedience by the things which He suffered; and being made perfect, He became the Author of aionian salvation unto all them that obey Him."

How fully this agrees with Heb. ii. 9, 10. We have only to read on to verse 10 to complete the parallel:

> "For it became Him, for Whom are all things, and by Whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings."

His sufferings therefore in this context are viewed as having an effect upon Himself, which is a thought distinct from that of Christ dying for the ungodly.

One more point we must notice; the words "for every man" are literally "on behalf of all". There are some who take the word "all" in a universal sense, but we must remember that the word is always limited by the context. Salvation from sin is not in view, suffering in view of glory is the theme, and the word "all" refers here to the "many sons" who are being led along the pathway of the fellowship of His sufferings to the glory that shall be revealed.

Attention has been drawn to the parallels between Hebrews and Philippians, the epistle of "The Prize". While we must not confuse the two sets of teaching, much light will be received if we remember that, although on differing planes, the ways of God with His people are actuated by similar principles, and all find their cause and goal in the same blessed Son of God.

No.18. "We see not yet . . . . . But we see . . . . ." (ii. 6 - 9).
pp. 35 - 40

We now commence section B | ii. 5-18 of the structure of the epistle, "The Son, Man, Seed of Abraham, lower than angels". Here suffering and death are prominent, and the position of the Lord is "for a little lower than angels".

We refer the reader to the structure of Heb. ii. 5-18, which is set out in the article dealing with Eph. iii., on p.4 of Volume XLI. It so happens, that these two sets of studies, written a year or more apart, draw together in these adjacent issues.

At first we were inclined to cancel this article on Heb. ii., but by so doing we should have ruined the exposition of Hebrews as a whole. On the other hand the fact that the Apostle did not hesitate to go over the same grounds in three different epistles, reminded us of his own words:

> "To write the same things to you, to me is not grievous (slothful or idle), but for you it is safe (or makes for certainty)" (Phil. iii. 1).

It may be, that where the argument set forth in one article appears inconclusive, the second approach may make the matter clear. And we are sure that the intensely sacred and important nature of the subject justifies any effort on the part of both writer and reader.

We therefore ask the indulgence of the reader as we try to preserve intact, both sets of expositions, in view of possible reproduction in book form in the future.

We have already drawn the reader's attention to the fact that the miracles of the early church were called 'the powers of the coming age', and it will be seen that the statement quoted above, following immediately upon the reference to the signs and wonders, emphasizes this the more.

A more remote connection which it is important not to miss, is that the "so great salvation" is in fact all that is implied in the words "the world to come", concerning which, said the apostle, he was speaking. "The world to come", as we have seen, is literally "the habitable (world) about to be". In the original the word "habitable world" is oikoumene. This word has occurred already in Hebrews, being used in i. 6. It is used of the Roman Empire (Luke ii. 1; Acts xxiv. 5). This is in line with secular usage, Polybius and Plutarch using it in this way. The LXX in a similar manner uses the expression he oikoumene hole ('the whole habitable') for the Babylonian Empire (Isa. xiv. 17). Alexander's Empire is called he oikoumene (Ælitan, V.H. 3,29). This combined testimony makes it appear very probable that the term must not be applied to the whole "world" as we know it, but to that portion which will become the final sphere of Nebuchadnezzar's sovereignty as pictured in the great image of Dan. ii. The word is still further limited in its usage in such a passage as Acts xi. 28, for Josephus speaks of a famine in Judea at that time, and not to one of world-wide extent. It is used three times in the Revelation:

> "I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which is about to come on the whole habitable world, to try those who dwell on the earth" (iii. 10 not AV JP).
>
> "Satan, the one who is deceiving the whole habitable world" (xii. 9 not AV JP).
> "Which go forth to the kings of the whole habitable world to gather them together unto the war of that great day of God Almighty" (xvi. 14 not AV JP).

These kings appear to be those which are connected with the Beast, and are kings of the "civilized" part of the earth. Now what do we learn by thus restricting the meaning of the word oikoumene? Surely this, that the great salvation, which is connected with overcoming and being made perfect, has to do with the initial phase of the future kingdom, when it will be necessary to rule the nations with a rod of iron (see Rev. ii. 26, 27). Parallel also is the blessing of Rev. xx. 4, "they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years". The wonderful change indicated in Isa. xi. is at first limited to Israel's land:

> "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all My holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea" (verse 9).

Isa. lxv., which repeats part of Isa. xi., links the creation of the new heavens and the new earth with a newly-created Jerusalem. Isa. lx. 1-3 makes a distinction too:

> "Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the LORD is risen upon thee. For, behold, the darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people: but the LORD shall arise upon THEE, and His glory shall be seen upon THEE. And the Gentiles shall come to THY light, and kings to the brightness of THY rising."

What redeemed Israel will be in relation to the other nations, those who partake of the "great salvation" will be to the remnant of Israel. Further teaching concerning this word oikoumene will be brought forward when we consider chapter iii.

There is, possibly, a glance backward in Heb. ii. 5. If we put a little stress on the "world to come", the question will at once arise whether angels ruled over the world in any period of the past? Satan is called in Scripture "the prince of this world", "the prince of the power of the air", and "the god of this age". There are also others who are called "the world rulers of this darkness" (Eph. vi. 12). Michael the Archangel stands for Israel, and angels carry out Divine commissions from the time of Abraham right through the Scriptures, except during the dispensation of the Mystery. There is evidence of an inductive character which makes one feel that angels had much to do with this world before Adam and the creation associated with him. Be this as it may, angels are not the appointed rulers of the world to come:

> "But one in a certain place testified, saying, What is man, that thou art mindful of him? or the son of man, that thou visitest him?" (Heb. ii. 6).

There is a strangeness in the manner of the Apostle's reference. Why did he not say "DAVID, in the eighth Psalm", or "as it is written in the eighth Psalm", or "as it is written in the book of the Psalms", or even "as the Scripture testifieth"? If we turn back to chapter i. we shall find similar vagueness; verse 5 simply says "for unto which of the angels", etc.; verses 6 and 7 simply have "He saith". Right through these verses, which are composed mainly of quotations, there is not a single reference to chapter, verse or book. In chapter ii. 12 the only word used is "saying", and in verse 13 "and again". At last in chapter iii. 7 we have a reference to Scripture, and the speaker is mentioned by name. Quoting from Psa. xcv. the writer says "Wherefore AS THE HOLY GHOST saith". When this Psalm is quoted again (in iv. 7) then the apostle says "saying by David". The reason is that by then his special object has been attained. "GOD hath spoken" (i. 1), "the LORD hath spoken" (ii. 3); all other names, such as David and Moses, or Psalms and Law, are but the agents in "sundry times and divers manners". The important thing is that these quotations are from the Word of God.

In the second place, of course, the apostle was writing to those who were very familiar with the Scriptures, and who would not need continual reference to chapter and verse for their guidance. Had he been writing to Gentiles only recently brought to the knowledge of the Word, he would doubtless have followed the mode of reference found in Romans. But here he says:

> "Thou madest Him a little lower than the angels; Thou crownedst Him with glory and honour, and didst set Him over the works of Thy hands: Thou hast put all things in subjection under His feet" (Heb. ii. 7, 8).

The writer does not refer to every particular in his quotation, but centres his exposition upon one or two essential features. His first item is the subjection of all things under the feet of the Son of man, namely:

(a) As to its universality.
(b) As to its fulfillment.

(a) Its universality:

> "For in that He put all in subjection under Him, He left nothing that is not put under Him" (ii. 8).

How similar this mode of reasoning is to that in I Cor. xv. 27:

> "But when He saith all things are put under Him, it is manifest that He is excepted, which did put all things under Him."

Its universality in the one case is proved by the word "all", which leaves "nothing" that is not put under Him; its universality in the other case is proved by one obvious exception—God Himself. All, whether principality, or power, heavenly, earthly or subterranean, must be subjected unto Him.

In I Cor. xv. the "all" includes enemies, which are to be "destroyed". This fact will prevent us from reasoning that since all are to be subject beneath His feet, all must necessarily be saved. In I Cor. xv. death as the last enemy is to be destroyed; in Heb. ii., the devil, the holder of the power of death, is to be destroyed, so the parallel is completed. Before passing to the second feature of this Psalm, the apostle makes another observation upon the subjection of all things:

> "But now we see not yet all things put under Him" (ii. 8).

This constituted a real difficulty at the time. The Messiah had come, but the long promised kingdom had not yet been set up. Peter confesses that the subject was accompanied by difficulties, but he certainly did not endorse the words of the scoffers who said, "Where is the promise of His coming?" The Lord was not slack concerning His promise, but the writings of Paul, in which were things hard to be understood, contained the explanation of this apparent delay, while, so far as the dispensational position of the Hebrews is concerned, it was true that "now we see not yet all things put under Him". The dispensational viewpoint of the Mystery put things in a different light. At the very same time that Paul could confess that prophecy had become temporarily held up (Heb. ii. 8), he could personally be rejoicing in a peculiar fulfillment of this same promise (Eph. i. 22, 23):

> "And hath put all things under His feet, and gave Him to be the Head over all things to the Church, which is His Body."

By this statement we do not intend to teach that Hebrews and Ephesians were written at the same time or about the same subject! Universal headship has not yet been taken by the Lord, but headship over all things to the Church is His position now. What He will be universally, He is now in mystery. What He will be in heaven and in earth is anticipated now in the super-heavenlies. We however are dealing with Hebrews, not Ephesians, and the point of view there is "we see not". Not until the seventh angel sounds shall the mystery of God be consummated in the universal sovereignty of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The second feature of Psa. viii. is the reference to man being made a little lower than the angels. The reader's attention is drawn to the series "IN ADAM", article No.4 in Volume XXXVII. Rom. v. 14 supplies the link:

> "Adam . . . . . who is the figure of Him that was to come", and I Cor. xv. 45-47 supplements:

> "The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam a life-giving Spirit . . . . . The first man is of the earth, earthy: the second Man is the Lord from heaven."

Psa. viii. looks back to the first and forward to the second Man. Viewing Adam in his frailty and fall the Psalmist says, "What is man that Thou art mindful of him?" Viewing man in the person of the Lord from heaven, he sees the crown of glory and honour placed upon One Who will never fail or forfeit. The apostle's eye is not fixed upon frailty and forfeiture, but upon honour and glory—"but we see Jesus", "consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession" he writes; rather than think of Moses and Aaron, "look off unto Jesus"; rather than to the cloud of witnesses enumerated in chapter xi., consider the end of the conversation of those who have spoken unto you the word of God—"Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and today, and unto the age" (xiii. 8).

(1) We see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels.
(2) We see Jesus, crowned with glory and honour.

Both the A.V. and the R.V. read, "a little lower than the angels", and place in the margin, "a little while inferior to", "for a little while lower". The element of time does not enter into Heb. i. 4 where is shown the superior dignity of the Son in virtue of His inherited name. This influences the interpretation of Heb. ii. He Who now is infinitely above angels achieved that glory by humbling Himself, suffering and dying. It is as important to the right understanding of the crown of glory and honour that we see the depth of the Lord's humiliation, as it is to the right understanding of His excellent glory that we realize His position at the right hand of God. In both cases angels are taken as the standard of comparison, for their position remains unchanged, whereas man fallen in Adam will be exalted in Christ, and so cannot be so easily compared.

The Psalmist does not glory in the exalted position of man. He does not bid us look at his excellency, only just a little lower than angels; he rather considers man's low estate, saying, as he looks abroad upon the creation, "What is man, that Thou art mindful of him?" The humiliation of the Lord was for a purpose:--

> "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise took part of the same; that through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil . . . . . for verily He took not on Him the nature of angels" (Heb. ii. 14-16).

The argument is parallel, and is Paul's own explanation. This we can readily follow by referring to the structure. In both cases it leads to Christ, either as the archegon or the archiereus, and in both capacities He is set forth as One Who has suffered. Phil. ii. 6-13 is a passage to which all readers should prayerfully refer.

With what does the writer link the words "for the suffering of death"? Does he intend us to understand that the Lord was made a little lower than the angels that He might suffer death? or does He mean that Christ was crowned with glory and honour because of the suffering of death? If we read it that Christ was crowned with glory as a result of His death, we shall have a difficulty in the conclusion of verse 9, "that He by the grace of God should taste death for every man"; He was not exalted to taste death, but was humbled. The grammar of the apostle's phrase considered alone and without the context, favours the following as the meaning:

> "But we see Jesus crowned with glory and honour, Who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, so that He by the grace of God might taste death for every man" (ii. 9).

With this agrees Heb. x. 5:

> "Wherefore when He cometh into the world, He saith, Sacrifice and offering Thou wouldest not, but a body hast Thou prepared Me."

But while this translation appears to conform to the requirement of grammar, we cannot help feeling how fully the alternative rendering fits the theme of the epistle.

Phil. ii. 8, 9 links the death of the cross with the glorious exaltation, and with the Name above every name, which immediately attracts attention to Heb. i. 4. Heb. xii. 2 also links the suffering and cross very definitely with the exaltation at the right hand of the throne of God. The whole driving thought of the epistle is that endurance now is necessary to obtain that aionian glory and that so great salvation. By transposing the order of the words and placing the reference to the glory immediately after the reference to Jesus, we may be more grammatical, but we have nevertheless taken a liberty with the way in which the apostle by Divine guidance arranged his sentence, and have robbed ourselves of the very ambiguity he intended.

The Lord did not take hold of angels, He took hold on the seed of Abraham. He was made flesh and received a body that thereby He might suffer the death of the cross. By that very act of humiliation, however, He inherited a more excellent Name than the angels, beneath whose dignity and nature He had voluntarily stooped; and therefore by reason of the suffering of death, we see Jesus crowned with glory and honour.

No.19. "All of one."
pp. 49 - 54

> "For it became Him, for Whom are all things, and by Whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings" (Heb. ii. 10).

Instead of simply saying "God" or "The Father", the apostle uses the title "Him for Whom are all things, and by Whom are all things". There is a reason for this which it is important to observe, and it comes out again in chapter xi. There the statement is simpler, and will enable us to perceive the underlying principle here in verse 10:

> "For it is necessary for him who comes near to God (a special term) to believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of them who diligently seek Him" (xi. 6).

Three statements are here, which placed beside ii. 10 will illuminate that passage:

"It was becoming."	"It is necessary."
"Him, for Whom and by Whom are all things."	"He is."
"Perfecter."	"Rewarder."

The doctrine of reward is as primal and absolute as the very existence of God. "He is", "He is a rewarder". The words of chapter ii. 10 are an expansion of this. He Who IS, is the Creator Whose creation has been arranged with a view to His own glory. He Who is a rewarder of the diligent seeker, plans also the pathway to glory, "Perfect through suffering". Instead of counting the idea of reward as strange, and proudly saying, "Virtue is its own reward, we ought to do right for right's sake" (which is perfectly true), we should be more Scriptural, and fundamentally more true, if we saw in the framing and enforcing of all law whatever, that reward is essential, and that suffering is of purpose. So the words are introduced by eprepe, "It is becoming".

Prepei is used again in vii. 26, when the essential suitability of Christ as High Priest is spoken of; also in Matt. iii. 15, where it was fitting and proper that the Son of God should fulfil all righteousness. It was therefore in the way of the nature of things that God, Who had made all things for Himself, in leading many sons to glory, should perfect their Captain through sufferings. The idea of a suffering Messiah was repugnant to the Jew by reason of the traditions of the elders, but the apostle shows that the "taste of death for every man" was most fitting and proper. The path of suffering to glory must not be counted as though some strange thing had happened; it is according to plan. By this acknowledgment we do not pretend to know the solution of life's mystery, we only know that there is one.

The last words of verse 9 are sometimes quoted to prove that Christ died for every man and therefore is the Saviour of every man. The passage does not teach this. We saw previously that the "tasting" of death did not mean death itself, but the sufferings which preceded it, and that this tasting of death did not have redemption in view, but glory. There is no word for "man" in the original, and the word "all" has reference to the "many sons" who were being led on to glory through suffering.

Christ is their Captain and Joshua is the type. That this is so, the words in iv. 8 will shew. "For if Jesus had given them rest", where the margin says, "i.e. Joshua". Hebrews is NOT dealing with Moses and the passover redemption from the land of Egypt, but with Joshua and the survival through the rigours of the wilderness to the triumphal entry into the land of promise. The wilderness is the setting of the book, not Egypt. A saved people are addressed, and they are not urged to believe and be saved, but to go on unto perfection.

Christ is called the Captain again in Heb. xii. 2, and that once more in connection with perfecting and suffering; the "Author (captain) and Finisher (Perfecter) of faith" (not of "our" faith). There He is seen leading the van of the great company who overcame through faith and obtained promises. The "so great salvation" is for those who have been perfected, just as is the Prize in Phil. iii. It is written again:

> "And having been perfected (by the things which He suffered, verse 8), He became the author of aionian salvation unto all them that obey Him" (v. 9).

In connection with sufferings, Christ as Captain sets us an example, for He:

> "Hath also suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow His steps" (I Pet. ii. 21).
> "Forasmuch then as Christ hath suffered for us in the flesh, arm yourselves likewise with the same mind" (I Pet. iv. 1).

It is well to consider Him, lest we grow weary and faint in our minds. It is in this sense that we see Him as "the Forerunner for us", Who has entered beyond the veil. The Hebrew believers had endured a great contest (athlesis) of sufferings (Heb. x. 32, same word for suffering pathematon as in ii. 10); which, said the apostle, had great recompence of reward.

The perfecting of faith (I Thess. iii. 10; Heb. xii. 2), the perfecting of love (I John ii. 5), and the perfecting of holiness (II Cor. vii. 1) cannot be accomplished apart from suffering. Faith will be tried (Gen. xxii.), love will be called upon to suffer long and endure all things (I Cor. xiii.), holiness will cause separation from much that is attractive.

We are heirs of God, if sons; but we are joint-heirs with Christ if so be we suffer with Him (Rom. viii. 17). Present affliction is temporal in duration and light in comparison with the aionian weight of glory which it works out for those who are exercised by it, and whose eyes see beyond the temporal and the visible. "The fellowship of His sufferings" is a necessary prelude to the fellowship of His glory.

> "Weeping may endure for a night, But joy cometh in the morning" (Psa. xxx. 5).

To catch the meaning of the concluding portion of Heb. ii. (verses 11 to 18), we must first of all see it as a whole, apart from details:

"ALL OF ONE."

A | 11. Oneness in Sanctification.
B | 14. Oneness in nature. He partook.
C | 14-16. Oneness in death and deliverance.
B | 17. Oneness in nature. He was made like.
A | 18. Oneness in temptation.

This simple balance sweeps aside the idea entertained by some that "all of one" refers to Adam, or to God. Verse 10 speaks of two parties, "many sons" and the "Captain". The perfecting of the Captain can only bear upon the many sons if they are united in some way. Verse 11 says they are, both Sanctifier and sanctified, "all of one".

What therefore happens to the Captain is communicated to the host. We must remember the limitations imposed upon the scope of "all" by the word "sanctified". "All of one" does not here speak of the human race although Luke traces the genealogy of Christ back to Adam, and Paul uses the same expression (ex henos) in Acts xvii. 26 when he speaks of "every nation of men". Neither does the passage speak of redemption from sin and its penalty. The Exodus, so far as Hebrews is concerned, is already accomplished. The union here is with "the things which accompany salvation". The Israelites were baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea after redemption. This oneness is limited to sanctification. We must therefore seek a true meaning for this term before we can appreciate the teaching of this passage.

Hagiazo "to sanctify"—occurs seven times in Hebrews. It is therefore a keyword and carries an important message:

Sanctify

A | a | ii. 11. He that sanctifieth. The one perfected through suffering.
b | ii. 11. They that are sanctified.
B | ix. 12-14. Blood of bulls . . . flesh.
Blood of Christ . . . conscience.
C | x. 9, 10. The will of God The offering of The body once.
B | x. 14. Perfected for ever (cf x. 1) by One Offering.
A | b | x. 29. The blood wherewith He was sanctified.
a | xiii. 12. The people sanctified by His blood, without the gate.

Sanctification is uppermost in Heb. i. 3 where purification for sins, and not redemption is the aspect of truth presented. This aspect is sustained in ix. 12-14 where the blood of goats and bulls is linked with the ashes of an heifer, which were not used as a "ransom" or for "redemption", but for sprinkling the unclean, and results in a sanctification, or the purifying of the flesh which had come into contact with some form of death. Christ's sanctification cleanses the conscience from dead works, the spiritual counterpart. Heb. x. 10 and 14 cannot be understood apart from the earlier verses.

The word translated "continually" in x. 1 is the same as is rendered "for ever" in verse 14, and should in both cases be translated "unto perpetuity". Chapter x. 1, 2 should be rendered:

> "For the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices which they offered year by year make the comers thereunto PERFECT UNTO PERPETUITY. For then would they not have ceased to be offered? Because the worshippers, once having been cleansed, should have had no more conscience of sins."

Verses 10 and 14 are the answer to this, just as verse 14 is the answer to verse 13 in chapter ix. Chapter x. 29 speaks of the awful possibility of counting the blood wherewith He was sanctified unholy, and of doing despite to the Spirit of grace, which is opened up in an intensely practical way in the verses that follow, where the drawing back from suffering and trial is a parallel. The last reference shows the Captain of our salvation suffering outside the gate. The oneness between Sanctifier and sanctified is expressed in the words:

> "Let us go forth therefore unto Him without the camp, bearing His reproach. For here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come" (Heb. xiii. 13, 14).

These last words are full of light for us as to the underlying idea of this sanctification. The pilgrim character, the wilderness pathway, the whole theme of race and crown is involved in the word. Its association with "perfection" or maturity would teach students of Philippians that much. See also another link between sanctification and pilgrim character. Those who are sanctified suffer the spoiling of their goods knowing that in heaven they have a better and an enduring substance. They have here no continuing city, but seek one to come. Like Abraham:

> "They desire a better country, that is, an heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God: for He hath prepared for them a City" (xi. 16).
> "Both He that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified are all of one: for which cause He is not ashamed to call them brethren" (ii. 11).

Hagiotes and hagiasmos in Heb. xii. 10 and 14 speak of holiness as the outcome of the Father's discipline, without which no man shall see God.

Hagios, apart from its occurrences in the expression "the Holy Ghost", comes in iii. 1, "holy brethren", who are immediately named "partakers of the heavenly calling", a statement which illuminates the meaning of "holy brethren" here. In vi. 10 and xiii. 24 it is used for "the saints" without qualification.

Hagion in its ten occurrences is used to denote the Sanctuary or the Holiest of all, either in the Tabernacle in the wilderness or the true Tabernacle, "heaven itself". The sanctification of the epistle to the Hebrews is linked with the wilderness and the Tabernacle, not the kingdom and the Temple, and with the heavenly Jerusalem, not the earthly (see xii. 22). It is associated with purification from death; it leads outside the camp, it shares the reproach of Christ, and counts it greater riches than the treasures of Egypt. The Offering that accomplishes our sanctification was made "through the eternal Spirit", but sanctification of the Spirit is never once mentioned in Hebrews. It is always connected with the sufferings of the Captain of our salvation and His once-offered Sacrifice for the purification from sins and uncleanness. It is utterly valueless as an aid to exegesis simply to string together the occurrences of the word "sanctify" regardless of their origin or context. The word here, as we have seen, has a special shade of meaning which is closely related to the theme of the epistle. It does not mean every saved one by virtue of salvation, as it probably does in Rom. i. 7. It is the title of the many sons who, through suffering, are going on to glory. It is closely associated with the Captain and Perfecter of faith, Who for the joy set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of God. It is a necessity in view of the aionian salvation and inheritance.

The element of overcoming is often passed over in Heb. x., but it is there, and there with a purpose. It immediately precedes the reference to the perfecting of the sanctified, "from henceforth expecting till His enemies be made His footstool" (verse 13). Such sanctified ones the great Captain is not ashamed to call brethren. The three quotations that follow in Heb. ii. are designed to show the close association of Christ and His people.

This is particularly so in the second one where Christ uses the words, "I will put my trust in Him" (ii. 13). There we see Him trusting, in the days of His flesh, and it is there we find the oneness with Him in this sanctification by suffering.

No.20. Him who had the strength of death (ii. 14, 15).
pp. 69 - 72

> "For as much then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also, in like manner, partook of the same; in order that by means of death He might render powerless him having the strength of death, that is the devil, and might set free those who by fear of death were all their life held in bondage" (Heb. ii. 14, 15 not AV JP).

The words of verse 11, "all of one", here receive fuller explanation. Those who were sanctified and called His brethren were partakers of flesh and blood, and were also held in bondage by the fear of death. The Lord too, their Redeemer, became partaker of the same nature, submitted Himself to death, and rendered the devil powerless. Had the passage meant merely to indicate the Lord's sympathy with our frailty, flesh alone would have been used. "Flesh and blood" stand for human nature without reference to its deeds. In other words, the Captain of our salvation became a real man "in like manner", "not in show, nor in appearance, but in truth" (Chrysostom).

"The children" are first described as to their natural state, "common sharers of flesh and blood"; then, as to their moral and dispensational condition, "held in bondage by fear of death". The Saviour is first described as to His natural state, "He partook of the same", and then as to the moral effects, "He rendered powerless the devil" and delivered His brethren.

Three passages should be read in conjunction with these verses. Rom. viii. 3; Phil. ii. 7, 8; Heb. x. 5-7, and their contexts noted.

> "God sending His own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh" (Rom. viii. 3).
>
> "Was made in the likeness of men: and being found in fashion as a man . . . . ." (Phil. ii. 7, 8).
> "When He cometh into the world, He saith, Sacrifice and offering Thou wouldst not, but a body hast Thou prepared Me . . . . ." (Heb. x. 5-7).

The section of Romans which contains viii. 3 commences with v. 12, and reveals the entry of death. Here it is spoken of as exercising dominion, "Death reigned by one". The dominion of sin and death is the theme of Rom. vi. 9-14. The law of sin and death is uppermost in Rom. vii. 21-25. Rom. viii. 2 introduces the other law which indicates deliverance, "For the law of the spirit of LIFE in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death". This was accomplished by Christ assuming our nature, the result being "that the righteous requirement of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit". The context speaks of life (verses 6, 10-13), our deliverance from the bondage of corruption (15-23), a bondage which is ever related to "fear" (15).

The statement that Christ was made in the likeness of sinful flesh is here chiefly connected with the practical out-working of truth, of triumph over death, of "life because of righteousness", of "life and peace" as a result of being "spiritually minded". The passage speaks moreover not only of being heirs of God by virtue of being sons of God, but of being JOINT HEIRS WITH CHRIST by virtue of suffering together with Him (17, 18). The goal is that Christ should be "the firstborn among many brethren" (29). Here we read of having "the spirit of Christ". In Phil. ii. we read of having "the mind of Christ", of working out our own salvation with fear and trembling, of being finally fashioned like unto the body of His glory (iii. 21). We have also a close connection with Hebrews:

> "Who, being in the FORM OF GOD" (Phil. ii. 6).
>
> "Who being the brightness of His glory, and the EXPRESS IMAGE of His Person (Heb. i. 3).
>
> "He . . . . . was made in the likeness of men" (Phil. ii. 7).
>
> "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise took part of the same" (Heb. ii. 14).
>
> "And being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself, and became obedient unto death" (Phil. ii. 8).
>
> "That through death He might destroy him who has the power of death, that is, the devil" (Heb. ii. 14).

"Wherefore God also hath highly exalted Him, and given Him a (the) name which is above every name" (Phil. ii. 9).

"Who for the joy set before Him endured the (a) cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God" (Heb. xii. 2).

"Being made so much better than the angels, as He hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they" (Heb. i. 4).

"Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling. For it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do (work on account) of His good pleasure" (Phil. ii. 12, 13).

"Make you perfect in every good work, in order to do His will, doing in you that which is well pleasing in His sight" (Heb. xiii. 21 not AV JP).

The third reference (Heb. x. 5-7) we have already had occasion to examine when dealing with the word "sanctified". There we read of the Lord laying aside His glory, the moment of His kenosis or self-emptying (Phil. ii. 7); and just as He left the glory that was His before the world was, to enter by human birth that path of suffering, we hear Him say:

"Sacrifice and offering Thou wouldest not, but a BODY HAST THOU PREPARED ME . . . . . LO, I come to do Thy will, O God" (Heb. x. 5-7).

We are allowed by wondrous grace to hear the words with which the Lord of life and glory voluntarily partook of the same flesh and blood as the children of men, that in the body thus prepared for Him He might learn obedience by the things He should suffer, and, being made perfect through suffering, lead many sons to glory.

Before we attempt to explain our verse, we must examine another item. The Lord submitted to death, not only that Adam's sons might live again (I Cor. xv. 22), but that "He might render ineffective the one having the strength of death, that is the Devil". What is this strength of death? Here we are not viewing atonement, for Christ offered Himself in all aspects of His sacrifice "unto God". This is directed to the Devil. The Devil possessed this strength, and we must seek from the Word the meaning of the expression. Kratos is used in Eph. i. 19 of resurrection, "according to the energy of the strength of His might", and in vi. 10 of its practical application to the believer, "Finally, my brethren, be empowered in the Lord and in the strength of His might", this empowering being in view of the conflict with spiritual wickedness in heavenly places.

It will be remembered that (evidently) at the time when Moses was to appear with Elijah on the mount of Transfiguration, "Michael the archangel, when contending with the Devil he disputed about the body of Moses" (Jude 9). It will be remembered that the Transfiguration came into prominence in our investigation into the meaning of the expression "taste of death" of Heb. ii. 9, and Peter in his epistle of suffering in view of glory introduces it in the first chapter. It is the vision of the overcomer. Death is spoken of ten times in Hebrews. In v. 7 we are taken to the garden of Gethsemane and there the Lord:

"in the days of His flesh, when He had offered up both prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto Him Who was able to save Him out of death, and was heard for His piety" (not AV JP).

This passage, the reference following the cluster in Heb. ii. (9, 14 and 15), carries with it the same sense that is more dimly seen there, namely, death, as viewed in connection with suffering and glory, obedience and perfection, aionian salvation, and the so great salvation. Here also, as in Heb. ii. 17, the High Priesthood of Christ is introduced (v. 6). The next reference to death (vii. 23) speaks of the priesthood of the sons of Aaron in contrast. The last reference is of great help to us in our endeavour to understand the peculiar meaning of death in Heb. ii. 14, 15. In Heb. xi. 5, the chapter of overcomers, sons who are led on to glory and perfected through sufferings, but not yet perfected in resurrection, we read of Enoch, who by faith "was translated that he should not see death". When we turn to iii. 17, 18, we read of the tragedy of the wilderness:

> "But with whom was He grieved forty years? was it not with them that had sinned (those who sinned), whose carcasses fell in the wilderness? And to whom sware He that they should not enter into His rest, but to them that believed not?".

Those in Heb. ii. were all their lifetime held by the "fear" of death. In chapter iv. 1 we read immediately after hearing of those whose carcasses fell in the wilderness:

> "Let us therefore FEAR, lest, a promise being left us of entering into His rest, any of you should seem to come short of it."

In writing of the wilderness to the Corinthians, the apostle says:

> "Neither murmur ye, as some of them also murmured, and were DESTROYED OF THE DESTROYER" (I Cor. x. 10).

When a believer was handed over to Satan by Paul it was for the destruction of the flesh that the spirit might be saved. Parallel with this is I Cor. iii. 15, "He shall suffer loss, but he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire". This too is the one great theme of Hebrews.

> "But we are not of them who draw back unto perdition (destruction, the destruction of the flesh, the two Greek words used come together in I Cor. x. 10), but of them who believe to the saving of the soul" (Heb. x. 39).

The death of Christ was effective in rendering ineffective him who had the strength of death. By His one Offering the "sanctified" (Heb. ii. 11; x. 14) are "perfected" for ever.

The deliverance is like that from a legal opponent (Luke xii. 58), or from the grip of a disease (Acts xix. 12), or from the authority of darkness (Col. i. 13). It is not the word that indicates deliverance from sin in the gospel sense of the word. It is from the power of some one into whose hands, or under whose authority we have come. The connection between the believer's "perfecting", expressed in Colossians and Philippians as circumcision, with antagonistic principalities and powers, is indicated in Col. ii. 10-15, and their association with "reward" is seen in ii. 18. The death and the deliverance of Heb. ii. must be related to the overcoming, the crown, the prize, and it is against this "strength of death" the believer is ranged as he presses along the path, and to which he is delivered should he so sadly fail as did those who tempted God in the wilderness.

The Captain of our salvation is the TRUE JOSHUA under Whom we shall enter into the rest that remaineth.

No.21. Propitiation and the Pilgrim (ii. 16 - 18).
pp. 88 - 93

The passage before us is confessedly difficult, and there are a number of ways in which the language of the apostle can be construed. The A.V. renders Heb. ii. 16 thus:

> "For verily He took not on Him the nature of angels; but He took on Him the seed of Abraham."

The words printed in italics reveal the point of the problem, and the A.V. margin translates the verse as follows, omitting the italicized words, and telling us that the Greek reads:

> "He taketh not hold of angels, but of the seed of Abraham he taketh hold."

What the A.V. puts into its margin, the R.V. places in its text. The student will discover that there is a great variety of opinion among the commentators and the following is a fair presentation of their differing views.

Parkhurst in his Lexicon says:

> "The text therefore means that Christ, when He came to redeem us, did not assume a glorious, awful and angelic appearance, but, etc., etc.".

This is promptly denied by his Editor who follows with a note:

> "There appears little ground for assigning this sense to epilambanomai. Ernesti says that the ancient Greek church always interpreted the verb in this place to assist."

Moses Stuart disposes of the A.V. idea of the nature of angels by saying that both usus loquendi and context is against this meaning:

> "For the apostle had just asserted above that Jesus took on Him a human nature, and it would be a mere repetition."

Moses Stuart thinks it means "to aid". Dr. Owen proceeds by lengthy argument and characteristic subdivision to prove the meaning to be "assumo, accipio, to take unto, or to take upon", and that:

> "The apostle teacheth us by it, that the Lord Christ took to Him, and took on Him, our human nature of the seed of Abraham."

The idea of "relieving" or "helping" it fitly expressed by antilambanomai (Luke i. 54; Acts xx. 35; I Tim. vi. 2), but the writer of Hebrews passes by this word. The reader is probably no wiser by all this than before, and we have endeavoured to indicate the exceedingly ambiguous results of past scholarship in elucidating this passage. We shall therefore be justified in saying, that as there is no agreement among the learned themselves, we must turn once more to the Fountain-head. One writer complains that the other usages of the word "to take hold" do not help him; the reason seems that they do not help his idea of what it means. Let us examine the word afresh, epilambanomai.

Matt. xiv. 31	"Stretched forth His hand, and caught him."
Mark viii. 23	"He took the blind man by the hand."
Luke ix. 47	"And Jesus . . . . . took a child."
Luke xiv. 4	"He took him, and healed him."
Luke xx. 20, 26	"Take hold of His words."
Luke xxiii. 26	"They laid hold upon one Simon."
Acts ix. 27	"But Barnabas took him."
Acts xvi. 19	"They caught Paul and Silas."
Acts xvii. 19	"They took him."
Acts xviii. 17	"The Greeks took Sosthenes."
Acts xxi. 30, 33	"They took Paul."
Acts xxiii. 19	"Took him by the hand."
I Tim. vi. 12, 19	"Lay hold on eternal life."
Heb. ii. 16	The passage under consideration.
Heb. viii. 9	"I took them by the hand."

An impartial examination shews that the word is colourless. There is no moral meaning inherent to it.

We have already observed that the A.V. italics make Heb. ii. 16 a somewhat needless repetition. May there not be some meaning which has been on the surface all the while? We believe there is. There is a footnote in the Emphatic Diaglott which reads, "For truly it", i.e. the fear of death, or death itself, "does not lay hold of, or seize on angels, but of the seed of Abraham it does lay hold" (Theolog Ref. and Kneeland). Those of our readers who are not conversant with the original must know that "he" or "it" is contained within the verb epilambanomai, and epilambanetai means equally it, as well as He, takes hold. Let us look at the structure again, verses 14-16 are included together there under one member:

C | 14-16. Oneness in death and deliverance.

This member is made up of parts, and we can test the congruity of this new suggestion here.

C | 14-16. |
A | The death of Christ.
The destruction of the Devil who had the strength of death.
A | The deliverance of those subject to bondage of fear of death.
The seed of Abraham laid hold of by fear of death.

With the exception of the fourth line, the emphatic word is death. If the A.V. reading be retained it introduces a discordant note. If the idea of "assisting" be adopted it harmonizes with "deliverance", but has no relation with the emphatic word "death".

What has Scripture to say about angels and death? Luke xx. 35, 36 says:

> "But they which are accounted worthy to obtain that age (the very pith and marrow of Hebrews) and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given in marriage: NEITHER CAN THEY DIE ANY MORE, FOR THEY ARE EQUAL TO THE ANGELS" (not AV JP).

If the seed of Abraham, and flesh and blood, were laid hold of by the fear of death and thereby brought into bondage, Christ's becoming flesh and delivering them from that bondage is a fitting sequel.

> "Wherefore in all things it behooved Him to be made like unto His brethren, that He might be a merciful and faithful High Priest" (Heb. ii. 17).

We have already seen that the Lord Jesus "tasted death", and in the garden of Gethsemane His soul was exceeding sorrowful even unto death. Three times He prayed with reference to that awful cup. Heb. v. 7 tells us that He was heard for His piety. There is a direct connection between Gethsemane and the Melchisedec priesthood of Christ in Heb. v. It is an expansion of Heb. ii. 16-18. Since Christ has come and died and risen again, such words as II Tim. i. 10 can be written:

> "Our Saviour Jesus Christ, Who hath on the one hand rendered death powerless (same word Heb. ii. 14) and on the other hand illuminated life and incorruptibility through the gospel."

Those who once were subject to bondage can now look death in the face and say, "O death, where is thy sting?"

> "For which reason it behooved Him to be made like to His brethren in all things (kata panta), in order that He might be a merciful and a faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, with a view to making a propitiation for the sins of the people. For in that He Himself hath suffered being tempted, He is able to succour them that are tempted" (Heb. ii. 17, 18 not AV JP).

"All things" here is panta, a word liable to much abuse. For although it may seem a very forceful argument to say emphatically, "God says all things, and that does not admit of exception", we find that this very epistle interprets its own language for us, and definitely teaches that "all" does not necessarily mean "all" in our sense of the word.

Heb. iv. 15 returns to the theme of Heb. ii. 17, 18:

> "For we have not an High Priest Which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but One having been tempted in all points (kata panta) like (see ii. 17) as we are, SIN EXCEPTED" (not AV JP).

This is important. The temptations referred to in the epistle to the Hebrews in which Christ so fully shared, like the temptations of Abraham (Gen. xxii.) and the children of Israel in the wilderness, were trials of faith, not temptations to sin; thus the "all points" are by no means universal.

The word homoioo "to be made like", gives us homoiotes. This comes in the parallel verse (iv. 15), where we read that Christ as the high Priest was "in all points tempted like as we are". The actual wording is pepeirasmenon de KATA panta KATH' homoioteta, "having been tempted according to all things according to a likeness". Heb. vii. 15 contains the only other occurrence of the word in the New Testament. The fact that the Saviour stooped not only to our humanity, but to endure its trials and its sorrows, is emphasized as one of the chief of His high qualifications as the true, merciful and faithful high Priest. His work here is twofold. In the things pertaining to God, expiation for sins of the people; in the things pertaining to His people, succour for those who are tempted. The hilaskomai ("reconciliation" in A.V.) gives us the hilasterion of Heb. ix. 5, "the mercy seat" of which Paul said he could not then speak particularly. If we remember that he makes a similar statement regarding the Melchisedec priesthood of Christ (v. 11), we shall perceive that the subject before us is fuller and deeper than we at first might suppose.

In the doctrine of Romans, the mercy seat figures in iii. 25, "Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation", but the subject is not exhausted by justification. The mercy seat bore the cherubim of GLORY, and was the very visible throne of God in the Tabernacle.

There, the Lord said, He would meet with Moses and commune with him. The epistle to the Romans, with its emphasis upon justification, sees the blood-sprinkled mercy seat resting upon the ark which contained the unbroken tables of the law. The epistle to the Hebrews sees the same blood-sprinkled mercy seat, but while it recognizes the teaching of the preservation of the tables of the law, it finds the necessity of "finding fault" with the old Covenant in a way which is parallel with, though different from the setting aside of the law in Romans. Moreover, Hebrews takes account of the other articles which were covered by that mercy seat, and indeed speaks of them before mentioning the tables of the Covenant, viz., "the golden pot that had manna, and Aaron's rod that budded" (ix. 4).

The manna speaks of wilderness provision. In Christ as High Priest the believer finds all that the golden pot of manna means. The epistle to the Hebrews is essentially the book of the wilderness and the pilgrim, and in pressing on to perfection, the wilderness experience is repeated. The believer learns that man does not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. Faith, not sight, is his characteristic. The rod that budded speaks of a living Priesthood. This too is emphasized in Hebrews:

> "And they truly were many priests, because they were not suffered to continue by reason of DEATH: but this Man, because He continueth ever, hath an unchangeable (intransmissible) priesthood. Wherefore He is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever LIVETH to make intercession for them" (vii. 23-25).

Manna from heaven for all our needs, an ever-living High Priest to save to the uttermost, this is vitally connected with the thought of the propitiatory and the propitiation of Heb. ii. 17. The LXX commonly renders the Hebrew word kopher propitiation. This word gives us "atonement" in the A.V. The great Day of atonement is the type which is in view in Heb. ix.

It will be noticed that the idea of cleansing or purifying is prominent in that chapter. First we have the cleansing of the conscience by the blood of Christ as the antitype of the ashes of the heifer. Then we have the cleansing by the blood, the patterns of heavenly things and the heavenly things themselves being thus cleansed. The opening section of chapter ix. speaks of the high priest who went into the holiest alone once every year, not without blood. This is an evident reference to Lev. xvi., and the Day of Atonement. The closing section speaks of the Lord Jesus as the true high Priest:

> "For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us . . . . . Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for Him shall He appear the (a) second time WITHOUT SIN unto salvation" (Heb. ix. 24-28).

While the "second time" indicates the Second Coming of the Lord, the meaning which is to be attached to the expression here is the fulfillment of the type in Lev. xvi. Not until the high priest had gone in beyond the veil with the blood of atonement and had appeared the second time did the people, typically, enter into the "so great salvation" of Hebrews.

When we look at the context of Heb. ii. 17 we observe that it is covered by the thought of "sanctification" (ii. 11). The only aspect of Christ's sacrificial Work which is given in that grand summary of Heb. i. 3 is that of "purification" or "cleansing" (as in Heb. ix.).

The sufferings of Heb. ii. 9 are connected with perfecting and glory, delivering from the fear of death, and making propitiation for sins. Here, in Heb. ii. 11 we have the Offering of Christ "sanctifying". In Heb. x. 14 we get to the farthest extreme, where we read that "by one offering He hath perfected for ever them that ARE SANCTIFIED".

This is what is intended in Heb. ii. 17, 18. First He sanctifies (ii. 11), then He perfects (ii. 17, 18). Here the perfecting work is seen beginning; we shall trace it through its various processes until we read the Hebrews equivalent to the prize of Phil. iii., viz., "the spirits of perfected righteous ones" (Heb. xii. 23). This perfecting of the sanctified is the theme of the book, and merely to lift out a verse, as so many do (x. 14), is practically to misquote it, for it is not usual for an evangelical or protestant speaker, when using Heb. x. 14, to teach the "perfecting" of those already sanctified, but to buttress up some anti-Romish doctrines, truth in its way, but not the truth of that verse.

It will be noticed that ii. 18 leaves us with the thought of "succour in temptation", and not "salvation from sin". Babes are "unskillful", i.e., "untested" or "untempted", but perfect ones have their senses "exercised". The pilgrim journey is one beset with temptations, but all for the good of the tempted. The Lord will never fail them; perfect sympathy exists between the great High Priest and the tried saint. He Himself has suffered being tempted; He can succour those who are tempted. Failure therefore is simply lack of faith, not lack of provision. This we shall see more clearly when we enter upon the examination of chapters iii. and iv.

To summarize. The four steps towards perfection are:

First: Sanctification.
Second: Realization of the oneness existing between the risen Lord and His people.
Third: Consciousness that the one who had the strength of death can no longer hold us in bondage.
Fourth: That complete provision, both for sins on the one hand (Lev. xvi. deals with the sins of a people already redeemed and separated), and for wilderness temptations on the other hand, has been made in Christ.

While some of the figures used may not fit the church of the One Body, the blessed realities of the figures used are for all saints in all times.

"If we walk in the light . . . . . the blood . . . . . cleanseth us from all sin . . . . . We have an Advocate . . . . . He is the propitiation" (I John i. 7 to ii. 1, 2).

No.22. "In all points tempted like as we are" (iv. 15).
pp. 104 - 109

We have seen already that the outstanding characteristic of those addressed in Hebrews is that of the pilgrim. He has here no continuing city. He confesses by his attitude to life that he is a "pilgrim and a stranger". Like Abraham, he is willing to dwell in a tent, while waiting for the city which hath foundations. In chapter iii., the teaching draws its local colour from the wilderness journey of Israel, and we have already expressed our conviction that the temptations of Heb. ii. 18 are those which beset the believer as he presses on to maturity with the possibility of the prize before him. In Heb. iv., this question of temptation is revived, and we feel it will be helpful to anticipate that passage and deal somewhat exhaustively with the words of Heb. iv. 15:

"In all points tempted like as we are", before entering into the third chapter with its "temptation in the wilderness" (Heb. iii. 8). The subject is of universal interest. No dispensational differences of calling or sphere exempt the believer from the pressure and allurements of the surrounding world, and this must be our excuse, if one be needed, for this diversion.

"For we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin" (Heb. iv. 15).

How are we to interpret the words "in all points"? How are we to understand the sequel "yet without sin"? How does this passage influence our understanding concerning the sinlessness of the Man Christ Jesus?

There have been those who have argued that the presence of the words "in all points", implies the inclusion of every temptation which besets mankind, and, in consequence, have been driven by the irresistible force of logic to affirm that He must therefore have had a "fallen nature" even though He actually "did no sin". The seriousness of the subject should be felt by all. To most of our readers, the teaching that the Saviour had a "fallen" nature would come as a shock. Moreover, the believer himself is involved for he cannot be unmoved by the consequences of the examination of the words "tempted in all points like as we are". In order therefore to disclose the scope of the argument that contains these pregnant words, we must repeat the outline of the epistle to the Hebrews and, following that, an examination of other passages where the words "tempt" and "temptation" are used, so that, if possible, we may arrive at a Scriptural understanding both of the range of temptation indicated in Heb. iv. 15, and the meaning, origin and different forms of temptation as indicated by the usage of the word in Hebrews and in other parts of the New Testament.

The scope of any passage of Scripture is indicated by its literary structure and we must anticipate our studies a little here, and lift out from the structure of the epistle as a whole two corresponding members, because in them are found every occurrence of the words "tempt" and "temptation" found in the epistle.

B	Heb. iii. - vi.	ON TO PERFECTION. "The Profession." (Homologia) (iii. 1; iv. 14).	Let us come boldly Examples of unbelief Perfect v. babes. No renewal unto repentance Senses exercised Crucify afresh the Son

There can be no question but that these two sections very closely correspond with one another, and if they contain all the occurrences of "tempt" and "temptation" that are found in the epistle to the Hebrews, then those temptations must be intimately related to the ideas of "perfection" and "perdition"; with "going on", or with "drawing back". When we come to consider the smaller portion of Hebrews that contains the passage under review, we discover that its historic background is the story of Israel's failure in the wilderness; a failure to "go on unto perfection", with which the words "tempt" and "temptation" are closely interwoven.

Hebrews ii. 17 - iv. 16

A | ii. 17 - iii. 1. TEMPTED, Succour, Profession.
B | iii. 2 - iv. 11. "IF" -- The TEMPTATION.
"IF" -- They TEMPTED ME.
A | iv. 12-16. TEMPTED, Help, Profession.

It will be seen that Heb. iv. 15 is an integral part of this larger context, and no interpretation is therefore valid that ignores or contravenes the general direction of the teaching of the larger context. A "profession" is in view, something to "hold fast", something involving trial and self-denial, something that may be lost. Further, with the structure before us, it is impossible to isolate Heb. iv. 15; we must keep in mind the temptation mentioned in chapter ii.

"Your fathers tempted ME" (Heb. iii. 9), said God. Now whatever questionable views we may entertain concerning the temptation to which our Lord was subjected in the days of His flesh, no such thoughts are possible when we consider the words "Your fathers tempted ME". It is not only repugnant to common sense, but contrary to positive Scripture, that God can, by any possibility, be "tempted" to, or by, evil. "God cannot be tempted with evil" is the categorical statement of Holy Writ (James i. 13); consequently we are immediately faced with a fact concerning "temptation" that must influence our views of Heb. ii. 18 and iv. 15.

If we had continued the quotation of Heb. iii. 9 we should have read, "When your fathers tempted Me, proved Me, and saw My works forty years". "Proved" is dokimazo, "to test, try as a metal". This meaning is borne out by the passages in Heb. xi., "By faith Abraham, when he was TRIED (peirazo 'tempted'), offered up Isaac" (verse 17). Shall we say that God tempted Abraham to sin when He made the great demand concerning Isaac? God forbid: Scripture positively declares that God never tempts man to sin (James i. 13), and a reading of Gen. xxii. reveals that this "temptation" was a "testing" of Abraham's faith, "Now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son from Me" (Gen. xxii. 12).

The context of the references to temptation in Heb. ii. and iv. introduce such words as "succour", "sympathy" ("cannot be touched with") "infirmities", but we can scarcely speak of "sympathy" and "infirmities" when we speak of "sin" as it appears in Scripture.

The word translated "succour" (Heb. ii. 18) and "help" (Heb. iv. 16) occurs once more in Heb. xiii. 6, "So that we may boldly say, The Lord is my Helper". This is associated, not with "sin" or "forgiveness", but with the promise that the believer would never be forsaken and in connection with "what man shall do" unto us, not what we might inadvertently do ourselves.

Another word which occurs in Hebrews must be included in our examination and that is the word peira. This occurs twice in Hebrews:

> "By faith they passed through the Red Sea as by dry land: which the Egyptians assaying (making the attempt) to do were drowned" (Heb. xi. 29).
> "Others had trial of cruel mockings and scourgings" (Heb. xi. 36).

In neither passage can the idea of "tempting" be discovered. In the first passage "attempt" gives good English and incidentally reveals that in our own mother tongue the word "tempt" means a "trial" or an "attempt". The second reference (Heb. xi. 36) is but a variant of the word translated "tempted" and needs no comment.

To complete the tale of occurrences of peirazo in Hebrews, one more reference must be included. In Heb. v. 13 we find the negative, apeiros, where it is translated "unskillful", which accords with the classical rendering "untried" and "inexperienced" and with the LXX usage.

> "Surely they shall not see the land, which I sware to their fathers; but their children which are with Me here, as many as know not good or evil, every inexperienced (apeiros) youth, to them will I give the land" (Numb. xiv. 23 LXX).

The reader will recognize the influence of this LXX rendering in Heb. v. 13, 14, where the unskillful "babe" is contrasted with the "perfect" or mature, who discerns "good and evil".

As they stand, the words "yet without sin" in Heb. iv. 15 suggest to the English reader "yet without sinning", as if our Lord was actually tempted to steal, to murder, to commit adultery, but resisted. We only allow ourselves to write this in order to bring this doctrine and its consequences into the light, for there is no necessity so to translate or interpret the words choris hamartias. In his Lexicon, choris is rendered by Dr. Bullinger "apart; asunder". It comes from chorizo "to put asunder", "to separate", as in Matt. xix. 6 and Rom. viii. 39. In Hebrews itself we read concerning the Saviour, that He was "holy, harmless, undefiled, separate (chorizo) from sinners" (Heb. vii. 26).

Dr. John Owen quotes the Syriac Version of Heb. iv. 15 as reading "sin being excepted"; J. N. Darby and Rotherham read "sin apart", "apart from sin".

The positive witness of the epistle to the Hebrews as a whole, and of this expression in particular, is that the temptation referred to in the words "tempted in all points" relates to the testings and trials of the pilgrim on his journey through the wilderness of this world, as he presses on to perfection; it does not refer to, or include, those temptations to sin which are only possible to those who have within them the effects of the Fall.

Our examination of the usage of the words "tempt" and "temptation" in the epistle to the Hebrews leaves us without any doubt but that the apostle had in mind the temptations that beset "pilgrims and strangers" in maintaining their "confession" or "profession", and that the words "Tempted in all points like as we are" are limited to that aspect of truth. It would be neither fair nor sound exegesis to suppose that there is no other aspect of this subject in the Scriptures. In order, therefore, to present the teaching of the Word as completely as possible, let us consider further aspects of this theme.

As we have commenced with an epistle addressed to the Hebrews, let us continue with the epistles of The Dispersion, namely, that of James and those of Peter, and see whether these introduce a different line of teaching from that of the epistle to the Hebrews.

> "MY brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations" (James i. 2).

It would be strange indeed if the believer who fell into all manner of temptations to do evil, should count it "all joy", but it is clear that temptation of this kind is far from the mind of James, for he immediately goes on to say, "knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience" (James i. 3), and, like the epistle to the Hebrews, associates this tempting, or trying, with "perfection"—"Let patience have her perfect work" (James i. 4). Those who are perfect (mature) will, > "Receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love Him" (James i. 12).

The introduction of the words "approved" and "crown" brings the passage into line with the epistle to the Hebrews.

James now turns to the aspect of temptation that arises from, and leads to sin.

> "Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God: for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth He any man" (James i. 13).

If these words be taken literally, we are immediately faced with a problem, for we get the two contrary statements: "Neither tempteth He any man" (James i. 13), and "God did tempt Abraham" (Gen. xxii. 1). But this is the case only if the words be taken literally, for the reader of the Scriptures will probably be aware that throughout the Old and New Testaments there appears a figure of speech called Ellipsis, or Omission, and that in many passages the sense is found by supplying by repetition a word that has already gone before. If in James i. 13 we repeat the governing clause, "with evil", all will be clear. "Let no man say when he is tempted (to do evil things), I am tempted of God: for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth He any man (with evil)." This, however, is negative; the positive follows, "But every man is tempted (to do evil things) when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed" (James i. 14).

Returning to the positive teaching of James i. 14, let us note its bearing upon the text, "He was tempted in all points like as we are". It is one thing for a congregation to stand and say, "We are all miserable offenders", and quite another for one member to stand and publicly confess that he is a "thief". In the same way it is one thing to quote the passage from Heb. iv., which says that Christ was tempted in all points like as we are, and quite another to be specific and say that Christ was actually tempted to steal. What is it that causes the presence of an unprotected pound note to be a temptation to a man? Is it an outside temptation or is it something within? It is difficult, without a feeling of irreverence, for us to bring our Lord into this controversy; let us therefore take a step down and cite two fellow-beings as examples.

First, the "chief of sinners", Paul, the apostle. Is it conceivable that, had Paul entered a synagogue and found the place unattended, the presence of a piece of money lying uncollected would be the slightest temptation to him? Our answer must be "no". The second example, dear reader, is yourself. Were you to come into a place of worship and discover that the offering had not been taken charge of by the treasurer, would that be a temptation to you to steal? You rightly repudiate the thought. Why? Because the grace of God and the gift of the new nature make temptation of that kind virtually impossible.

So we return to the Lord Himself. As He had no corrupt and depraved nature, He could never be "led away" by lust and enticed and, that being the case, no amount of emphasis upon the words "in all points" can ever teach the evil and destructive doctrine we have been considering. The very presence of temptation to sin pre-supposes evil already within. He, the Saviour, could mingle with publicans and sinners and remain undefiled. Contrary to all law, He could touch a leper and remain immune. We might as well consider that a sunbeam gathers contamination by shining on a rubbish heap as that, even in the presence of the most gilded opportunity, Christ could be tempted to sin.

Turning to the other Circumcision epistles we find that Peter alone uses the word peirasmos, translated "temptation", and that three times.

> "Wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations" (I Pet. i. 6).

If it were needed, the fullest confirmation of this interpretation is contained in I Pet. iv. 12.

> "Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you: but rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that, when His glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy. If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye . . . . . let none of you suffer as a murderer, or as a thief . . . . ." (I Pet. iv. 12-15).

The remaining occurrences of the words "tempt" and "temptation" are Matt. iv. 1-4; Matt. vi. 13; which should be read in the light of Rev. iii. 10 and Matt. xxvi. 41. None of these passages speak specifically of sin, but rather the attach upon simple trust.

No.23. The Profession of the heavenly calling.
pp. 126 - 128

The first word of Heb. iii. is hothen, which properly means "from whence". The idea intended by its use here may be expressed by saying, "Seeing that things are thus" (as indicated in Heb. i. and ii.), "then I ask you to consider the One Who is both Apostle and High Priest of our profession". The title High Priest is one which most believers will associate with Christ, but how few realize His equal glory as THE Apostle!

One of the special aspects of the Gospel according to John is to set before us Christ as the Apostle and High Priest. John's Gospel is divided into two sections, the first being the outer and public ministry (i.-xii., Apostle), the second the inner or private ministry (xiii.-xxi., High Priest). Both sections begin with a reference to His "own". He came to His own, and His own received Him not". "Having loved His own which were in the world, He loved them unto the end". Here in this thirteenth chapter we see the Apostle and High Priest.

> "Jesus knowing . . . . . that He was COME FROM GOD"—The Apostle.
> "And WENT TO GOD"—The High Priest (xiii. 3).

This is repeated in the wonderful seventeenth chapter:

> "Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast SENT"—The Apostle.
> "I am no more in the world . . . . . I COME TO THEE"—The High Priest (xvii. 3, 11).

The fact that Christ was the Sent One is the burden of the Gospel. It is aionian life to recognize Him as the Sent One (xvii. 3). The disciples are marked by the knowledge that Christ was the Sent One (8). The oneness of the Father, the Son, and the saint, so marvelously indicated in verse 21, is with the object that the world might believe that the Father sent Christ. This is repeated with added words, all reminding us of Heb. ii., "That they may be perfected into one, and that the world may know that Thou hast sent Me" (23).

It was no new thought to the Hebrews that Messiah should be the Apostle, or the Sent One. In Isa. xlviii. 16 and lxi. 1 the Hebrew equivalent is used. According to Isa. xix. 20, the exodus from Egypt is to be repeated: "He shall send them a Saviour, and a great One, and He shall deliver them. And the LORD shall be known to Egypt". Moses was evidently a "sent one" or an "apostle".

> "Come now therefore, and I will send thee unto Pharaoh."
> "This shall be a token unto thee, that I have sent thee."
> "I AM hath sent me unto you."
> "The LORD God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, hath sent me unto you" (Exod. iii. 10, 12, 14, 15).

It is possible that Moses had the promised Messiah in view when he said to the Lord, "Send, I pray Thee, by the hand of Him Whom Thou wilt send" (Exod. iv. 13). The immediate result of this continued hesitancy on the part of Moses is the mention of Aaron, destined to be the High Priest. Moses apparently forfeited this office, and instead of holding the office both of apostle and High Priest, this was now to be shared with his brother. Great as Moses was, and great as every Jew held him to be, all must confess who know the truth that He who combined the two offices in His one Person was greater. Thus it is that Moses is introduced in chapter iii. Christ has already been seen as greater than angels.

He is now seen as greater than Moses: then greater than Joshua, greater than Aaron, and greater than all the offerings of the law.

Christ is here called the Apostle and High Priest of our "profession". What is the idea contained in the word "profession" (homologia)? Hebrews uses the word three times:

> "The Apostle and High Priest of our profession" (iii. 1).
> "Let us hold fast our profession" (iv. 14).
> "Let us hold fast the profession of our faith" (x. 23).

Seeing that it is the profession of faith, the word indicates something which is subsequent to faith, parallel with "the things which accompany salvation". We view Christ here not as Redeemer, but as Apostle and High Priest of our profession. This profession is further illustrated by use of the cognate homologeo.

> "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and CONFESSED that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth" (Heb. xi. 13).
>
> "Let us go forth therefore unto Him without the camp, bearing His reproach. For here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come. By Him therefore let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips giving praise (CONFESSING) to His name" (Heb. xiii. 13-15).

Here the two references emphasize the stranger and pilgrim character of this profession of which Christ was Apostle and High Priest. For this other-worldly character see I Tim. vi. 12, 13:

> "Fight the good fight of faith (fight is the same word 'race' as in Heb. xii. 1) . . . . . and hast professed a good profession before many witnesses (witnesses, same word as Heb. xii. 1) . . . . . Christ Jesus, Who before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good confession."

It is evident by the balance of the words that the "good fight" is parallel with the "good confession"; and seeing that the "fight" is the same as the "race" of Heb. xii., the titles "Apostle and High Priest of our profession", and "The Captain and Perfecter of faith", have much in common. As the Captain, He was the Apostle, the Sent One. As the Perfecter, He was the High Priest, Who went back to God. The "profession" being the profession of "faith", is another view of the particular aspect of faith exhibited in Heb. xi.; in other words the whole theme revolves around the idea of pilgrim walk and perfecting. The holy brethren are exhorted to "consider" Christ as the Apostle and High Priest of their profession. In close association with the final reference (x. 23) recurs the word "consider". This time, however, the exhortation is to "consider one another" in view of the approaching day.

These holy brethren are addressed as "partakers of the heavenly calling". It is essentially in harmony with the perfecting of the pilgrim character, that those addressed should be called "partakers of the heavenly calling", and that heavenly calling needs no further exposition than is given in Hebrews itself to make its scope and position clear to us.

Heavenly

A | Partakers Now. |
a | iii. 1. Partakers of heavenly calling.
Now Christ not ashamed.
b | vi. 4. The heavenly gift.
B | Place: The Tabernacle.
c | viii. 5. The shadow of heavenly things.
c | ix. 23. The heavenly things themselves.
A | Partakers Then. |
a | xi. 16. The better country, a heavenly,
Then God not ashamed.
b | xii. 22. The heavenly Jerusalem (Holy City).

If we trace the teaching associated with this word, we are led on through participation of the "gifts", which were anticipations of the age to come (ch. vi.), and from the shadow to the real Tabernacle "heaven itself", to the heavenly country, and heavenly Jerusalem. Heb. xii. 18-21 speaks of Moses, verses 22, 24 of "Jesus the Mediator of the New Covenant". Connected with the latter is the perfecting of those who were sanctified. There we see them, "the church of the firstborn, which are written in heaven". These are associated with "the spirits of perfected righteous ones" and the "innumerable company of angels". How any can confuse such a description with the right hand of God above all principality and power is beyond our understanding. So far as we are concerned we see a decided difference from the words used, and keep it so.

It was the consciousness of this heavenly calling that supported Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, enabling them to "confess that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth". As we have pointed out before, there is a close parallel of principle between Hebrews and Philippians, and the consciousness of the high calling in Phil. iii. enables the believer there to count all things loss, making the same confession of faith and to hold loosely "earthly things".

Let us remember what is connected with "confessing to His name" (Heb. xiii. 13-16) and the many passages which link suffering with future glory.

No.24. "Whose House are we IF . . . . ." (iii. 2 - 6).
pp. 152 - 156

When the apostle wished to lead the Hebrew believers to appreciate the excellency of Christ, he first drew attention to the difference that must be realized between God speaking "by the prophets" and God speaking "in Son". He then proceeds to speak of the excellent name of Christ as compared with angels, and again the emphasis is, "Thou art My Son". In chapter iii. the apostle approaches the tenderest spot in the Hebrew mind, the place and honour of Moses. In the Jewish hymns for the Sabbath come the words:

> "Thou calledst him Thy faithful servant, and didst put a glorious crown on his head when he stood before Thee in Mount Sinai, etc.".

The Scriptures themselves emphasize the isolated dignity of Moses:

> "I will raise them up a Prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put My words in His mouth . . . . . whosoever will not hearken unto My words which He shall speak in My name, I will require it of him" (Deut. xviii. 18, 19).

Deuteronomy xxxiv. 10 adds:

> "There arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses, whom the LORD knew face to face."

When the apostle spoke of the angels he did not hesitate to show their inferiority to Christ, but when he speaks of Moses, he is careful to bring forward the highest commendation which Scripture affords. Christ was faithful, as also Moses was faithful in all his house. The reference is to Numb. xii. 6-8 where the Lord severely reproves the attitude of Aaron and Miriam, saying:

> "lf there be a prophet among you, I the LORD will make Myself known unto him in a vision, and will speak unto him in a dream. My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all Mine house. With him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches; and the similitude of the LORD shall he behold."

There can be no question that in all the range of Old Testament history no name could mean so much to a Hebrew as that of Moses. The apostle had to overcome this reasonable prejudice, and show them One Who was greater than Moses, inasmuch as the New Covenant of spirit and life was greater than the Old Covenant with its ministration of death. In the first case he would bid them consider the essential difference between Moses and Christ. Moses was a part of the house over which he ruled, but Christ was the actual Builder of the house Himself. This of necessity spoke of the greater honour of Christ, but in verse 4 the arguments are brought forward which form the climax of his testimony in Heb. i. 1, 2.

> "For every house is builded by some man; but He that built all things is God" (Heb. iii. 4).

There can be no purpose served by this statement unless the writer intends the Hebrews to understand that Christ was God. Verse 3 demands this meaning, and the fitness of verse 4 is only preserved if we believe it to refer to the Person of Christ. In Heb. i., after having spoken of the high dignity of the Son, he leads on to the same point:

> "Unto the Son He saith, Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever . . . . . Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth" (i. 8-10).

Whether the "all things" of iii. 4 be taken to refer to the creation at large, or in a more restricted sense to all the dispensations, including the Mosaic and the Gospel, Christ is the Builder.

The Apostle now proceeds to another feature. Moses was faithful as a SERVANT in all his house, but Christ as a SON over His own house. Not only is there the contrast between Servant and Son, but between Moses IN, and Christ OVER, the house. Further, the added words "Over His own house" confirm the interpretation of verse 4 of Christ.

The reason for this carefully debated point is revealed in verse 6. This house over which Christ as the Son presides has infinitely more glory than Moses in the house of which he formed a part, and it represents a special people who are now to be named and described. "Whose house are WE", the "we" being the holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling of iii. 1, and the many sons who are being brought to glory (cf. ii. 10). Their peculiar characteristic is now added, and enforced by historical example.

> "Whose house are we, IF we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end" (iii. 6).

This finds its echo in verse 14:

> "For we are made partakers of Christ, IF we hold the beginning of our confidence stedfast unto the end."

These two passages are followed by almost identical words, which is a more forcible reason why we should compare them together. Following verse 6 we read:

> "Wherefore, (as the Holy Ghost saith, Today if ye will hear His voice, harden not your hearts, AS IN THE PROVOCATION . . . . . forty years . . . . . I was grieved . . . . . I sware . . . . . They shall not enter into My rest). Take heed, brethren, LEST . . . . ." (iii. 7-12).

Following verse 14, we read:

> "While it is said, Today if ye will hear His voice, harden not your hearts, AS IN THE PROVOCATION . . . . . with whom was He grieved forty years? . . . . . to whom sware He that they should not enter into His rest? . . . . . Let us therefore fear, LEST . . . . ." (iii. 15 - iv. 1).

The whole context of chapters iii. and iv. makes it impossible that that "house" of iii. 6 can mean "the church" as we know it. In the case of the church, there can be no "if", and the figure of Israel in the wilderness can by no system of interpretation set forth that church whose standing is in pure grace. So also the parallel expression "partakers of Christ"; this too refers to something which is in addition to redemption. The word "partakers" is the same as that which is rendered "fellows" in Heb. i. 9. The idea in these passages is that of association with Christ in "the joy that was set before Him", the "oil of gladness" being that of exultation or extreme joy. Heb. iii. 1 places no "if" against the statement that those addressed were "associates of the heavenly calling". The association with Christ, however, is different. Rom. viii. 17 contains a parallel with these two conceptions.

> "And if children, then heirs; heirs of God" (parallel with Heb. iii. 1).
> "And joint-heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with Him, that we may be also glorified together" (parallel with Heb. iii. 14).

We shall find that the teaching of this epistle focuses upon the few verses with which chapter xii. opens. The exhortation is "so run that ye may obtain".

Chapters iii. and iv. are bounded by the word "confession":

> "Consider the Apostle and High Priest of our confession" (iii. 1 R.V.).
> "Let us hold fast our confession" (iv. 14 R.V.).

It is evident that the Hebrew believers were exhorted to consider Christ as an Example in the matter of this "confession". A somewhat parallel double occurrence is I Tim. vi. 12-14 where Timothy's "good confession" is associated with that of Christ before Pontius Pilate. The word contains an element of danger and opposition, and the exhortation is to hold it fast unto the end. The one great feature which is singled out by the apostle in the case of Christ Himself is that He "was FAITHFUL" (Heb. ii. 17; iii. 2). Therefore within the bounds set by iii. 1 and iv. 14 will come some further teaching, example, exhortation, encouragement and warning, such as will, by the grace of God, help the tried believer to hold on his way.

The one characteristic of Christ which the Hebrew believers were called upon to consider was His faithfulness; the one great warning which follows is that against unbelief:

> "Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of UNBELIEF, in departing from the living God" (iii. 12).
> "So we see that they could not enter in because of UNBELIEF" (iii. 19).
> "The word preached did not profit them, because they were not united by FAITH to them that heard" (iv. 2 margin).

The great example is "the provocation". This word comes from pikraino—'to be bitter', and illuminates Heb. xii. 15, 16, where another type for the believer's warning (Esau) is closely linked with a 'root of bitterness'. The great 'text' of the writer in these two chapters is taken from Psa. xcv., which he introduces with the solemn words, "As the Holy Ghost saith".

It is evident that we must know something of this 'provocation' on the part of Israel if we would profit by the Scripture before us. In Numb. xiv. we have the record. Caleb and Joshua had urged upon the people a confident faith in the Lord with respect to the entry into possession of the land of promise.

> "But all the congregation bade stone them with stones . . . . . And the Lord said unto Moses, How long will this people PROVOKE ME?" (Numb. xiv. 10, 11).

Their provoking was largely due to their unbelief, for the passage continues, "How long will it be ere they believe Me?" The Lord threatened to disinherit and smite the people, but upon the prayer of Moses He said, "I have pardoned according to thy word". The people therefore were a pardoned people. But does this mean that they did go up and possess the land? No, for after pronouncing the gracious pardon the Lord added:

> "But as truly as I live . . . . . surely they shall not see the land . . . . . neither shall any of them that provoked Me see it" (Numb. xiv. 21-23; see also II Sam. xii. 10-12; Psa. xcix. 8).

Here we see the difference between "Hope" and "Prize".

In Numb. xiv. 22 the Lord declares that already this people had tempted Him ten times. The Companion Bible gives the 'ten times' as follows:

(1) At Red Sea (Exod. xiv. 11, 12).
(2) At Marah (Exod. xv. 23, 24).
(3) Wilderness of Sin (Exod. xvi. 2).
(4) About manna (Exod. xvi. 20).
(5) About manna (Exod. xvi. 27).
(6) At Rephidim (Exod. xvii. 1-3).
(7) At Horeb (golden calf) (Exod. xxxii.).
(8) At Taberah (Numb. xi. 1).
(9) At Kibroth Hataavah (Numb. xi. 4).
(10) At Kadesh (Numb. xiv. 2).

Each occurrence should be carefully studied, as each brings to light some ground of provocation and forfeiture. One of the most frequent expressions in this series is that the children of Israel "murmured". It will be remembered that in Philippians, the Epistle of the PRIZE, the exhortation is:

> "Do all things without murmurings and disputings: that ye may be . . . . . the sons of God, without rebuke" (ii. 14, 15).

In I Cor. x. also, this feature is brought forward:

> "Neither murmur ye, as some of them also murmured, and were destroyed of the destroyer" (verse 10).

Murmuring may seem a small thing, but it is the seed of unbelief that departs from the living God. On one of the occasions, that of Numb. xi. 4, it was the mixed multitude that led Israel astray—the type of those "whose God is their belly, who glory in their shame, who mind earthly things" (Phil. iii. 19). Israel murmured at the heavenly provision of manna, saying "Our soul loatheth this light bread" (Num. xxi. 5).

Psa. lxxviii. reveals that unbelief was at the bottom of this rejection of heavenly food—"Because they believed not in God"; "Their heart was not right with Him" (verses 17, 18, 22, 25, 37). In the dealings of God with His people after salvation, the principle remains true that "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap . . . . . flesh . . . . . spirit"; for in Numb. xiv. 28, 29 we read:

> "As ye have spoken in Mine ears, so will I do to you: your carcasses shall fall in this wilderness . . . . . which have murmured against Me."

The very sending of the spies into the land of promise was an act of provocation to the Lord. "We will send men before us" (Deut. i. 22). He allowed them their own way in the matter, but the result was that "they brought up an evil report". Ezek. xx. 6 definitely tells us that the Lord Himself had "espied" the land for them, but Israel did not believe Him.

It is comforting to know that while "Some, when they had heard, did provoke; howbeit not all that came out of Egypt by Moses" (Heb. iii. 16), for Caleb and Joshua wholly followed the Lord and are blessed examples of those who by patience and continuance inherit the promises. We should give earnest heed to these things, so that we may in our turn "press according to a mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" (Phil. iii. 14).

No.25. The Apostle and High Priest of our profession (iii. 1).
pp. 172 - 178

When we quote a passage of Scripture we are not at liberty to alter its wording, lest we appear to hold its teaching lightly or have unworthy views of its inspiration. We therefore have quoted Heb. iii. 1 as it is written. But is the Lord Jesus Christ the High Priest of OUR profession? Yes, surely if we are Hebrews, but does this apply to Gentiles, and particularly Gentiles saved under the dispensation of the Mystery? We can only answer such a question if the Scriptures, either by some positive statement, or as a result of comparing one epistle with another, provide sufficient material.

In the calling and sphere of Hebrews, the outstanding office associated with Christ as He sits on the right hand of God, is that of High Priest. In the calling and sphere of Ephesians, His outstanding office as He sits on the right hand of God, is that of Head. Are these but two names for the same thing, or do they differ? No epistle, apart from Hebrews, uses the title "High Priest" or "Priest" as a title of Christ, yet without the doctrine that revolves around these words, how could the teaching of Hebrews proceed? It will be remembered that the exhortation "to draw near" that occupied our attention in the previous article was based upon the fact that those thus exhorted have "an High Priest over the house of God" (Heb. x. 21).

References to the necessity of a sacrifice for sin are not limited to any one epistle. Paul's epistles, both before Acts xxviii. and after, contain many such references, yet never throughout the course of his ministry as God's appointed Preacher, Teacher and apostle of the Gentiles, does he ever use the word "Priest" or "High Priest", either of the believer or of his Lord! But, when he comes to write the epistle to the Hebrews, he breaks entirely new ground, using the word "Priest" fourteen times, a number that we have already noticed earlier in this series, "Great Priest" (megan), once (Heb. x. 21); and "High Priest" seventeen times, and so interwoven with the theme of Hebrews is this thought of "Priesthood" that the teaching of chapters v. and vii. to x. demand continual reference to "priests", while chapters ii. to ix. and xiii. necessitate continual reference to the "High Priest".

Words are counters, they are index fingers; their inclusion or exclusion from any reasonable piece of writing indicates its general trend. Any treatise, letter or book dealing with such matters as war, finance, religion or logic would of necessity include certain specific terms and exclude others, and if the treatise, letter or book were of the length of either Hebrews or Ephesians, the subject matter of the title could be deduced from a collation of the distinctive words employed. If the theme of Hebrews necessitated the constant use of the words "Priest" and "High Priest", that fact would go a long way to indicate the character of its teaching. If to this it is added that Ephesians contains neither of these words, that additional fact would go a long way to indicate that the essential theme of Ephesians differed from Hebrews. Further, if it is observed that in the whole of Paul's other writings (thirteen epistles) there is not one occurrence of the word "Priest" or "High Priest", the evidence for the difference between his apostolic ministry as covered by the thirteen epistles and this letter to the Hebrews is still further increased, and when we remember that the same writer, Paul, is responsible for the use, or non-use, of these words, and that the use, or non-use, is controlled not only by Paul's reasonableness, and faithfulness, but by inspiration of God (II Tim. iii. 16; II Pet. i. 21), then the evidence for the difference in calling and sphere of Hebrews and Ephesians becomes overwhelming.

Before we can appreciate the use or non-use of the word "Priest" in these epistles, it will be necessary to consider the testimony of Scripture concerning the office of the Priest and its relation to Israel and the nations. The epistle to the Hebrews itself provides evidence that long before Israel's time, the idea of priesthood was entertained by the nations, for Melchisedec was a "King-Priest" at the time of Abraham (Gen. xiv. 18-20). There is much to be said concerning the Melchisedec priesthood (Heb. v. 11), but the present is not the time for it. There were priests in Egypt in the days of Joseph (Gen. xlvi. 20) and in Midian in the days of Moses (Exod. ii. 16), yet, out of the 725 occurrences where the word kohen is translated "priest", at least 700 refer to the priesthood of Israel. If under the law of Moses the offering of sacrifice and the building of an altar are the work of a priest, this was by no means the case before the introduction of the "law of commandments and carnal ordinances" introduced after the breaking of the tables of stone of the Covenant at Sinai.

Abel offered an acceptable sacrifice, yet he was no priest. Noah offered a burnt offering upon an altar, and distinguished between clean and unclean animals (Gen. viii. 20). Job, too, as the head of his family "sent and sanctified his children" and "offered burnt offerings" on their behalf (Job i. 5). Upon his entry into the land of promise Abraham also "built an altar, and called upon the name of the Lord" (Gen. xii. 7, 8), and is seen arranging the sacrifices at the time of the great promise (Gen. xv. 9-21). Isaac built an altar (Gen. xxvi. 25), and Jacob built an altar at Shechem (Gen. xxxiii. 20), and another at Bethel, by the command of God (Gen. xxxv. 1-7), and last, but by no means least, the great sacrifice of the Passover was offered by the head of each family, no priest being mentioned or necessary. In the Scriptures priesthood is not introduced by Divine command until the consecration of Aaron and his sons, recorded in Exod. xxix. Before that consecration, priests are mentioned in Exod. xxix. 22 and 24, but these seem to have occupied the same sort of position that was given to David's sons as recorded in II Sam. viii. 18, where the words "chief rulers" is the Hebrew word kohen, or to Zabud in I Kings iv. 5, where the words "principal officer" is the Hebrew word kohen. This unusual use of the word kohen, ordinarily translated "priest", appears to hark back to the primitive idea contained in the root-meaning of the word, which signifies either "to represent oneself, or to present something or someone else" (J.M.A. in the Com. Bib. Dict.). It is a matter of Scriptural testimony and not of inference or deduction, that the only priesthood recognized in Israel under the law of Moses was the Levitical priesthood, of which the high priest's office was given to the family of Aaron, and the priesthood to the tribe of Levi (Heb. v. 4; vii. 5, 14).

When we turn to the epistle to the Ephesians, however, those belonging to the sphere and calling there administered are seen to have been "redeemed" and to have been "made nigh" by blood (Eph. i. 7; ii. 13). They themselves constitute a "holy temple in the Lord" and a "habitation of God in spirit" (Eph. ii. 21,22). This company are called "saints" (Eph. i. 1), and find their inheritance "in the saints" and "of the saints" (Eph. i. 18; ii. 19), yet without the intervention of a priest. This company has access, yea, boldness of access, with confidence, but no human priest is found necessary to open the way. In the practical section, Christ is said to have "given Himself for us an Offering and a Sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling savour" (Eph. v. 2), and in the same practical section He is said to have sanctified and cleansed the church, and will present it unto Himself . . . . . holy and without blemish (Eph. v. 26, 27). Yet in chapter i. Christ is set forth not as "High Priest" but as "Head" and the church is set forth as His "Body". This two-fold title occurs again in chapter v., and the "One Body" is prominent in chapter ii. The calling of the church of the Mystery is not typified in the types and shadows of the law. The extraordinary insistence upon priesthood found everywhere in the law of Moses finds its echo in but one epistle, namely the epistle to the Hebrews. The earlier position, that of head of a family, set forth by Noah, Job, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob before the law, is more in line with the relationship that Christ holds to the church today. Instead of indicating an enrichment, the addition of the Levitical priesthood was a sure indication of failure. No perfection was possible or intended under the Levitical priesthood, which was made after the law of a carnal commandment (Heb. vii. 11, 16). In the case of Israel, Christ, by being a Priest after the order of Melchisedec, fulfils the office foreshadowed with such frailty by Aaron's priesthood. No such order is needed by the Gentiles who come under the dispensation of the Mystery; they find all, and more, in their ascended Head than Israel can find in their King-Priest.

Having seen that the office of the high priest is limited to the calling and profession set forth in this epistle to the Hebrews, and having seen that in Christ our Head, the One Mediator, we have all and more than all the priests of Israel or the Melchisedec priesthood can provide, we turn to the epistle to the Hebrews to learn the precious lesson, realizing that, while all Scripture may not be ABOUT US or written TO us, all Scripture is profitable and written for our learning. Those who were holy brethren and partakers of the heavenly calling are here called upon "to consider Him".

First the "heavenly calling" must be considered, epouranios "heavenly". This word is found but twice in the LXX, once in Psa. lxviii. 14, where it stands as a title for the "Almighty", and once in some MSS of the LXX in Dan. iv. 23, where we read "The heavens do rule" (26 A.V.). In the Apocrypha the word occurs but once, in 2Macc. 3:39, where it speaks of "Him Who has His dwelling in the heavens". When we turn to the New Testament we find the word in the Gospels and the epistles some twenty times, of which number of occurrences Hebrews uses six. There we find:

> "Partakers of the heavenly calling."
> "Tasted of the heavenly gift."
> "The example and shadow of heavenly things."
> "The heavenly things themselves."
> "A better country, that is, an heavenly."
> "The heavenly Jerusalem" (Heb. iii. 1; vi. 4; viii. 5; ix. 23; xi. 16; xii. 22).

This word epouranios provides an opportunity which we must not miss. Those who use a concordance use a most helpful instrument, but at the same time we should be warned, that an indiscriminate or mechanical use of a concordance can mislead. Here is a case which bears very closely upon our calling. We have from time to time affirmed that the phrase en tois epouraniois occurs five times in Ephesians and that it occurs nowhere else. The reader who consults his concordance, turns up the word epouranios, sees the five occurrences in Ephesians listed side by side with those in I Corinthians & Hebrews and decides that we are untrustworthy teachers, and without more ado sets aside the claim of Ephesians to be that of a unique calling, and yields to those who assure him that such are the claims of ultra-dispensationalism (an intentionally frightening term calculated to deter the timid or untaught), and so another believer is turned aside in his quest for truth. We have never said that the adjective epouranios "heavenly" occurs only in Ephesians; rather the phrase translated "in heavenly places" occurs only in that epistle, a very different statement. In spite of what has been said elsewhere, en tois epouraniois does not occur in the LXX. If we would understand the heavenly calling of Heb. iii. 1, the remaining occurrences of the word "heavenly" must be examined. "The heavenly gift" is associated with "holy spirit" (the gifts) and "the powers of the age about to be" (Heb. vi. 4, 5). The Levitical priests "serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished by God when he was about to make the tabernacle: for, see, saith He, that thou make all things according to the pattern shewed thee in the mount" (Heb. viii. 5). This argument continues throughout chapters viii. & ix. and reaches its conclusion in chapter ix. 23, 24:

> "It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these. For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us" (Heb. ix. 23, 24).

These two references to the Tabernacle are followed by two to the Heavenly City or Country.

> "Now they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly."
> "But ye are come unto Mount Sion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem" (Heb. xi. 16; xii. 22).

The heavenly calling of Heb. iii. 1 is therefore that which all of like faith with Abraham and the other witnesses to faith in Heb. xi. share, the New Jerusalem, the heavenly country and city being its sphere. The church of the One Body finds its sphere of blessing "where Christ sits at the right hand of God", a sphere distinct from the Heavenly City which will eventually come down from God out of heaven. In connection with the participation in this heavenly calling, the Hebrews are called upon to "consider the Apostle and High Priest of their profession, Christ Jesus". Katanoeo "consider" occurs fourteen times in the New Testament and about twenty times in the LXX of the Old Testament where it translates the Hebrew bin, nabat, sakal, shamem, tsaphah and raah. These Hebrew words respectively mean understand, regard, understand as the result of wisdom, to be astonished, watch and behold. In all these terms, patient, careful regard is implied. Our English word "consider" comes from "watching the stars", sideris being the Latin for "star".

> "There is most caution in considering; most attention in regarding. Consideration is employed for practical purposes; reflection for matters of speculation" (Crabb).

The scope of the consideration enjoined in Heb. iii. 1 may be estimated by the other occurrence of the same word:

> "Let us consider one another to provoke unto love and to good works" (Heb. x. 24).

This consideration embraces the apostle, the High Priest, and one another in its embrace, the Redeemer and the redeemed, the Captain and His followers, and is far removed from mere curiosity and academic interest. In Heb. vii. 4 the apostle directs our attention to Melchisedec saying:

> "Now consider how great this man was, unto whom even the patriarch Abraham gave the tenth of the spoils."

Here the attention is turned from the true High Priest Himself to His most exalted type, Melchisedec. Again our attention is drawn to Christ, this time as the Author, the Captain, as the word is translated in chapter ii., and the Finisher and Perfecter, the Beginning and the Ending, and related to the race set before Him, the endurance of the cross, the Overcomer.

"Consider Him that endured such contradiction of sinners against Himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds" (Heb. xii. 3).

And lastly we read "The end".

"Considering the end of their conversation. Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to day, and for ever" (Heb. xiii. 7, 8).

The object of consideration in Heb. iii. 1 is Christ in His two great offices (1) The Apostle, (2) The High Priest of their profession. It comes as something of a surprise to many to discover that Christ is THE Apostle, and while we have referred to this before, it will be well for us to get a clear idea of the import of the term.

APOSTLE. The word has come straight from the Greek into the English language, but it is not, except for this adoption, an English word. Its meaning must be sought in the original language of the New Testament, where it is found under the form apostolos. This word is used both in the Greek version of the Old Testament, the Septuagint (a translation generally indicated by the sign LXX, and so designated in our pages), and in classical or common Greek used outside the Scriptures.

In classical Greek apostolos meant "a messenger, ambassador or envoy" and, in later usage, "the commander of a naval force". This rather limited meaning of the word is further seen in the use of stolos, "a fleet ready for sea, a naval squadron or expedition". In the LXX apostolos occurs in I Kings xiv. 6 in the phrase, "I am sent to thee with heavy tidings", where "sent" translates the Hebrew shalach, which immediately connects with such missions as that of Joseph (Gen. xxxvii. 13), Moses (Exod. iii. 14), and Isaiah (Isa. vi. 8); and generally with the bearing of "tidings", whether of deliverance or judgment. The composition of the word is simple. Apo is a preposition, and, like nearly all prepositions, carries with it a sense of motion, direction or rest. In this case the translation "from" indicates origin, motion and direction. Stello is the verb "to send", and so an apostle is one "sent from another".

Apostello the verb is used of the "sending forth" of the twelve (Matt. x. 5); of John the Baptist (Mark i. 2; John i. 6); of preachers generally (Rom. x. 15); of angels (Heb. i. 14); and of Paul (Acts xxvi. 17). There is, however, one other occasion where apostello and apostolos are used, that gives all subsequent apostles and messengers their true and only authority. Both words are used of the Lord Jesus Christ. He is pre-eminently "The Sent One" (I John iv. 9, 10, 14); He is pre-eminently "The Apostle".

"Consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus" (Heb. iii. 1).

Here therefore is revealed the character of the solemn office denoted by the title "apostle". Here Paul's insistence on the use of the word "me" in II Tim. ii. 2 is carried back to another and higher use of the pronoun, "He that receiveth you receiveth ME" (Matt. x. 40) and, through Him, to the ultimate source of all authority, God Himself.

In the very opening of His public ministry, the Saviour spoke of the apostolic character of His mission:

> "The Lord hath anointed Me to preach good tidings unto the meek; He hath sent Me to bind up the broken hearted" (Isa. lxi. 1; cf. Luke iv. 18).

He spoke of Himself as One Whom the Father had "sanctified and sent" into the world (John x. 36), and in the great prayer of John xvii. He said:

> "Sanctify them through Thy truth . . . . . As thou hast sent Me into the world, even so have I also sent them" (John xvii. 17, 18).

Over and over again in John's Gospel we meet this word "sent".

> "God sent not His Son into the world to condemn the world" (iii. 17).
> "He Whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God" (iii. 34).
> "The same works that I do, bear witness of Me, that the Father hath sent Me" (v. 36).

The reference here in Heb. iii. 1 to the office of apostle arises out of the superiority of Christ to the angels, with which both chapters i. and ii. are occupied, but the actual verbal link between these two passages may not be perceived by the English reader.

Of the angels, the apostle said:

> "Are they not all ministering spirits, SENT FORTH (Gk. apostello) to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation?" (Heb. i. 14).

Angels were "apostles", but we are not called upon to "consider" them; our eyes are turned away to consider Him. In Heb. iii. 2-6, Christ the Apostle is also compared with Moses, even as in succeeding chapters, Christ the High Priest is compared with Aaron and with Melchisedec.

No.26. Moses, a servant; Christ, a Son (iii. 2 - 6).
pp. 187 - 190

It is evident that the apostle is pursuing his theme, namely, the superiority of Christ, the Son, above angels and all other intermediaries, but the reader may not realize that, in the mind of any familiar with the LXX, the word apostello, as used in Exodus, links angels and Moses together:

> "The LORD God of your fathers . . . . . hath sent me unto you" (Exod. iii. 15).

This verb is used in verses 10 and 14 also. After the Exodus from Egypt and while Israel were in the wilderness, God said:

> "Behold, I send (apostello) an Angel before thee . . . . . if thou shalt indeed obey his voice" (Exod. xxiii. 20-22).

Of all the names that were revered by Israel, none were more held in honour than Moses and Abraham. Paul, who had intimate acquaintance with the traditional beliefs of his fathers, knew that any attempt by any teacher to dethrone Moses from the place given to him would be resisted, and any doctrine thus introduced would be doomed to failure. We need not turn to the writings of the Rabbis for this, for we read:

> "Thou art his disciple; but we are Moses' disciples."
> "We know that God spake unto Moses: as for this fellow, we know not from whence he is" (John ix. 28, 29).
> "We have heard him speak blasphemous words against Moses, and against God . . . . . we have heard him say, that this Jesus of Nazareth shall destroy this place, and shall change the customs which Moses delivered us" (Acts vi. 11, 14).

To which we add, from Hebrews itself:

> "He that despised Moses' law died without mercy" (Heb. x. 28).

"Moses was faithful in all his house" (Heb. iii. 2). This is the testimony of Numb. xii. 7 "My servant Moses . . . . . is faithful in all Mine house". The apostle now introduces a comparison that places Christ far above Moses:

> "For this man was counted worthy of MORE GLORY than Moses" (Heb. iii. 3).

We have but to turn to II Cor. iii. 6-11 to have the apostle's own comment on this comparison.

OLD COVENANT -- MOSES.	NEW COVENANT -- CHRIST.
Letter killeth	Spirit giveth life
Glory done away	Rather glorious
Condemnation—glory	Righteousness—exceed in glory
No glory in this respect	By reason of the glory that excelleth
That done away is glorious	Much more that which remaineth is glorious
We are changed from glory	To glory
The face of Moses iii. 13	The face of Jesus Christ iv. 6
Veiled iii. 13, 14.	Unveiled iii. 18.

We know more or less how the apostle will proceed. He will go "from glory to glory". He will honour the law, the types, the names of Moses and Aaron, but he will faithfully point out where the Old Covenant failed and where the New succeeds. Christ therefore according to II Cor. iii., as well as Heb. iii., has "more glory" than Moses. In II Corinthians, this was because of the infinite superiority of the New Covenant, here, in Hebrews, Paul has another purpose in view, although related, as we shall find later, with this same New Covenant. Here he says that the greater glory of Christ over Moses, is "inasmuch as he who hath builded the house hath more honour than the house. For every house is builded by some one; but He that built all things is God" (Heb. iii. 3, 4).

"This Man" (Heb. iii. 3). The apostle draws attention by the use of "this", "this man" or "these", to prophets, priests and offerings in this epistle, setting the old over against the new, and thereby magnifying the Son of God in all His mediatorial offices.

"God Who . . . . . spake in time past . . . . . by the prophets, hath in THESE last days spoken unto us by His Son" (Heb. i. 1, 2).	PROPHET
"For THIS MAN was counted worthy of more glory than Moses" (Heb. iii. 3).	APOSTLE
"For THOSE Priests were made without an oath; but this with an oath by Him that said unto Him, The Lord sware . . . . . order of Melchisedec" (Heb. vii. 21).	KING
"But THIS MAN, because He continueth ever, hath an unchangeable priesthood" (Heb. vii. 24).	PRIEST
"For every high priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices: wherefore it is of necessity that THIS MAN have somewhat also to offer" (Heb. viii. 3).	PRIEST OFFERING &
"But THIS MAN, after He had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down on the right hand of God" (Heb. x. 12).	SEATED

While the word "house" in Heb. iii. 2-6 is the Greek oikos, the apostle avoids the use of oikodomeo "to build" in Hebrews. There must be some reason for this, for oikodomeo and its compounds are of frequent employment by Paul in his other epistles. If the reader should call to mind the passage in Heb. xi., where it says of the Heavenly City "Whose builder and maker is God", he will find that the word translated "builder" is the Greek word technites "artificer"; or if the words of Heb. ix. come into mind "not of this building", there the word translated building is the Greek ktisis "creation". The word translated "build" in Heb. iii. 3, 4 is kataskeuazo, skeue is the "tackling" of a ship (Acts xxvii. 19). Skeuos is a "vessel" and in Hebrews "the vessels of the ministry" used in the Tabernacle erected by Moses (Heb. ix. 21). So in Heb. ix. 2 the word "made" kataskeuazo is used of the Tabernacle, and after speaking of the candlestick, the table and the shewbread, the golden censer, the ark and the mercy seat, the apostle says:

> "Now when these things were thus ordained" kataskeuazo (Heb. ix. 6).

In Exod. xxvii. 19 and xxxvi. 7 kataskeue is used in the LXX for the "vessels" and the "stuff" of the Tabernacle. We have no need to range the universe to discover what "house" it is that is thus built in Heb. iii. 2, 3 and 4; the house that Moses built, which is incomparably less in glory than the house that Christ built, refers particularly to the Tabernacle made after the pattern in the mount, which is what Moses erected, as contrasted with the "true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man" (Heb. viii. 2). The avoidance by the apostle of any use of the word oikodomeo "to build" is significant. Those to whom Hebrews is written are visualized as pilgrims. Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are spoken of as "tent dwellers"; here they have "no continuing city"; they look for one to come.

> "He that built all things is God" (Heb. iii. 4).
> "This verse has been a kind of offendiculum criticorum in past ages, and has never yet, in any commentary which I have seen, been satisfactorily illustrated . . . . . if the verse be entirely omitted, and the third verse be immediately connected with the fifth, there seems to be nothing wanting, nothing omitted that is at all requisite to finish the comparison which the writer is making . . . . . The amount then of the reasoning seems to be: 'Consider that Christ, as Theos and the former of all things, must be the Author too of the Jewish and Christian dispensations, which glory belongs to Him, not only in His mediatorial office, and as being the Head of a new dispensation, but also as the Founder both of this and the Jewish dispensation in His divine character; while Moses is to be honoured only as the head of the Jewish dispensation, in the quality of a commissioned superintendent, but not as author and founder" (Moses Stuart).

Kataskeuazo is not used in the New Testament Scriptures of creation, and it is beside the mark to bring heaven and earth as the "all things" of Heb. iii. 4 into the argument. The divine command to Moses was "See . . . . . that thou make all things according to the pattern shewed to thee in the mount" (Heb. viii. 5) where the words "all things" must be limited to the Tabernacle which Moses was about to erect. In two passages in Hebrews the A.V. leads the reader to think of the creation of "the world", where the original speaks of "the ages" Heb. i. 2 and xi. 3. The reader should be aware of this tendency on the part of the A.V., and for the sake of clearness we indicate the several words that are thus translated "world", and hope that the survey of the examples will fully justify the diversion.

World—kosmos	"From the foundation of the world" (Heb. iv. 3; cf. ix.26). "He condemned the world" (Heb. xi. 7). "Of Whom the world was not worthy" (Heb. xi. 38).
World—aion (age)	"By Whom also He made the worlds" (Heb. i. 2). "The powers of the world to come" (Heb. vi. 5).

	"Once in the end of the world" (Heb. ix. 26).
	"The worlds were framed" (Heb. xi. 3).
World—oikoumene (habitable word, prophetic earth).	"When He bringeth in the First begotten into the world" (Heb. i. 6).
	"For unto the angels hath He not put into subjection the world to come, whereof we speak" (Heb. ii. 5).

In Heb. ix. 26 it will be observed that both kosmos and aion are translated "world", which is misleading, coming as they do in the same verse. Heb. i. 10 has made it abundantly clear WHO it was that created heaven and earth, there is no need to bring that subject into the argument of Heb. iii. 1-6. The contrast is between Moses, as a servant, and Christ as a Son, for the Son has already been addressed as Lord and God. Again there seems to be an intended selection of the word used for servant here. It is therapon. This word is taken from Numb. xii. 7, 8 where the Lord's dealing with Moses is contrasted with His dealings with lesser prophets.

> "My servant (LXX therapon) Moses is not so, who is faithful in all Mine house. With him will I speak mouth to mouth."

While therapeuo is generally rendered serve or minister in the LXX, one passage reveals its inclination to medical and healing service.

> "Mephibosheth (who was lame on his feet, ix. 3) . . . . . had neither dressed (therapeuo) his feet" (II Sam. xix. 24).

In the New Testament therapeia is rendered "household" twice (Matt. xxiv. 45; Luke xii. 42) and "healing" (Luke ix. 11; Rev. xxii. 2). Therapeuo occurs forty-four times in the New Testament and is translated "cure" five times, "heal" thirty-eight times and "worship" once. The word is never translated "serve", the one occurrence "worship" being the nearest approach to this meaning (Acts xvii. 25). It does not seem possible, with this insistence upon a healing ministry, to eliminate entirely that thought when speaking of Moses as a therapon. Moses did not "serve" as a slave, his work was neither that of a manual labourer, nor of an artisan. He was engaged in holy things, and with the spiritual health of Israel. Israel's ultimate restoration is likened to "healing" (Isa. vi. 10), and "the Salvation" (soteria) of Acts iv. 12, looks to verse 9 where the words "made whole" are the translation of sozo. Physicians would form a part of the entourage of a great house, and Herodotus says when speaking of Egypt, "Every great family as well as every city must needs swarm with the faculty". It will be remembered that the priest had to deal with leprosy and pronounce a man clean or unclean. This service of Moses, gracious as it was, is placed over against the position of Christ, Who as the Son was over His own house. This ministry of Moses was:

> "For a testimony of those things which were to be spoken after" (Heb. iii. 5).

Thus, also, after describing the Tabernacle, its service and its furniture, the apostle says:

> "The Holy Ghost this signifying . . . . . a figure for the time then present . . . . . until the time of reformation" (Heb. ix. 8-10), which is immediately followed by a reference to the greater and more perfect Tabernacle over which Christ presided as the High Priest of good things to come (Heb. ix. 11). At verse 6 of Heb. iii., the apostle turns from the house built by Moses to the house ruled over by the Son and says "Whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end". This new facet of truth we must now consider in our next article.

No.27. The Provocation.
pp. 206 - 212

Chapters iii. and iv. are bounded by the word "confession":

> "Consider the Apostle and High Priest of our confession" (iii. 1 R.V.).
> "Let us hold fast our confession" (iv. 14 R.V.).

It is evident that the Hebrew believers were exhorted to consider Christ as an Example in the matter of this "confession". A somewhat parallel double occurrence is I Tim. vi. 12-14 where Timothy's "good confession" is associated with that of Christ before Pontius Pilate. The word contains an element of danger and opposition, and the exhortation is to hold it fast unto the end. The one great feature which is singled out by the apostle in the case of Christ Himself is that He "was FAITHFUL" (Heb. ii. 17; iii. 2). Therefore within the bounds set by iii. 1 and iv. 14 will come some further teaching, example, exhortation, encouragement and warning, such as will, by the grace of God, help the tried believer to hold on his way.

The one characteristic of Christ which the Hebrew believers were called upon to consider was His faithfulness; the one great warning which follows is that against unbelief:

> "Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of UNBELIEF, in departing from the living God" (iii. 12).
> "So we see that they could not enter in because of UNBELIEF" (iii. 19).
> "The word preached did not profit them, because they were not united by FAITH to them that heard" (iv. 2 margin).

The great example is "the provocation". This word comes from pikraino—'to be bitter', and illuminates Heb. xii. 15, 16, where another type for the believer's warning (Esau) is closely linked with a 'root of bitterness'. The great 'text' of the writer in these two chapters is taken from Psa. xcv., which he introduces with the solemn words, "As the Holy Ghost saith".

It is evident that we must know something of this 'provocation' on the part of Israel if we would profit by the Scripture before us. In Numb. xiv. we have the record. Caleb and Joshua had urged upon the people a confident faith in the Lord with respect to the entry into possession of the land of promise.

> "But all the congregation bade stone them with stones . . . . . And the Lord said unto Moses, How long will this people PROVOKE ME?" (Numb. xiv. 10, 11).

Their provoking was largely due to their unbelief, for the passage continues, "How long will it be ere they believe Me?" The Lord threatened to disinherit and smite the people, but upon the prayer of Moses He said, "I have pardoned according to thy word". The people therefore were a pardoned people. But does this mean that they did go up and possess the land? No, for after pronouncing the gracious pardon the Lord added:

> "But as truly as I live . . . . . surely they shall not see the land . . . . . neither shall any of them that provoked Me see it" (Numb. xiv. 21-23; see also II Sam. xii. 10-12; Psa. xcix. 8).

Here we see the difference between "Hope" and "Prize".

In Numb. xiv. 22 the Lord declares that already this people had tempted Him ten times. The Companion Bible gives the 'ten times' as follows:

(1) At Red Sea (Exod. xiv. 11, 12).
(2) At Marah (Exod. xv. 23, 24).
(3) Wilderness of Sin (Exod. xvi. 2).
(4) About manna (Exod. xvi. 20).
(5) About manna (Exod. xvi. 27).
(6) At Rephidim (Exod. xvii. 1-3).
(7) At Horeb (golden calf) (Exod. xxxii.).
(8) At Taberah (Numb. xi. 1).
(9) At Kibroth Hataavah (Numb. xi. 4).
(10) At Kadesh (Numb. xiv. 2).

While we must honour those who have taken God at His Word, and have collected "ten" occasions in the history of Israel's wanderings where they "tempted" the Lord, we must remember that there were other occasions both before and after Numb. xiv. 22 when Israel provoked the Lord by their unbelief, and which form an essential part of those Scriptures which have been written for our learning. Meribah (Exod. xvii. 7) was repeated (Num. xx. 7-13) with disastrous results to Moses himself (see verse 12). I Cor. x. enumerates some of the "provocations" of the wilderness, and introduces that most extraordinary testimony to the fact that Christ was before His incarnation "The Lord God" of Israel:

> "Neither let us tempt CHRIST, as some of them also tempted, and were destroyed of serpents" (I Cor. x. 9).

Dr. John Lightfoot says "The nation of the Jews delighted mightily in the number TEN, both in sacred and civil matters. A synagogue consisted not but of ten men at least, and the number of those who comforted the mourners after the burial of the dead, consisted of ten at the least. "Peradventure ten shall be found there" (Gen. xviii. 32), said Abraham and apparently reached the minimum. Jacob complained of his treatment at the hand of Laban saying "Your father hath deceived me, and changed my wages ten times" (Gen. xxxi. 7). Are we to take the number "ten" literally in such a statement as:

> "And when I have broken the staff of your bread, ten women shall bake your bread in one oven" (Lev. xxvi. 26)?

When Elkanah in his endeavour to comfort his wife said: "Am not I better to thee than ten sons?" (I Sam. i. 8), does anyone believe that his intention would be expressed the more or the less had he said "eleven" sons, or "nine"? Why "ten loaves" or "ten cheeses"? (I Sam. xvii. 17, 18). Are we expected to count the occasions when the "comforters" of Job had reproached him "ten times"? (Job xix. 3). To these examples we may add the "ten days" and the "ten times better" of Dan. i., the "ten men" of Amos vi. 9 and Zech. viii. 23.

The provoking of the Lord by Israel is introduced in Heb. iii. as an extension or illustration of the exhortation given in verse 6,

> "Whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end", the reference to the "provocation" being introduced by the word "wherefore" and concluded by the warning:

> "Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God" (Heb. iii. 12), and the conclusion in verse 14 balances the introduction of verse 6 thus:

A | 6. Whose house are we, IF we hold fast the confidence and rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end.
B | 7-11. Psalm xcv. quoted "They shall not enter into My rest".
C | 12, 13. Take heed. Heart of unbelief.
A | 14. We are made partakers of Christ, IF we hold fast the beginning of our confidence stedfast to the end.
B | 15-18. Psalm xcv. quoted "They should not enter into His rest".
C | 19. So we see. Unbelief.

Psalm xcv. is made much of in this passage, and calls for examination. The fourth book of the Psalms (see The Companion Bible), commences with the Psalm of Moses, and corresponds with the fourth book of the law, Numbers, the book of Israel's wandering in the wilderness. Psa. xc. refers to those of responsible years who had rebelled against the Lord, declaring that their children had been led out of Egypt only to die in the wilderness. Psa. xci. speaks of those very children who were preserved throughout the wilderness dangers and entered into the land of promise under Joshua, when all those of the latter generation were dead.

> "Thou turnest man to destruction; and sayest, Return, ye children of men" (Psa. xc. 3).

While there may be a spiritual application of these words, they refer in the first place to Numb. xiv. 28-30:

> "As truly as I live, saith the LORD, as ye have spoken in Mine ears, so will I do to you: your carcasses shall fall in this wilderness; and all that were numbered of you, according to your whole number, from twenty years old and upward, which have murmured against Me, doubtless ye shall not come into the land, concerning which I sware to make you dwell therein, save Caleb the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua the son of Nun."

Psa. xci., however, is the fulfillment of the succeeding promise of verses 31-34:

> "But your little ones, which ye said should be a prey, them will I bring in, and they shall know the land which ye have despised . . . . . Your children shall wander in the wilderness forty years . . . . . after the number of the days in which ye searched the land . . . . . and ye shall know My breach of promise."

So in Psa. xc. 9 we read:

> "For all our days are passed away in Thy wrath: we spend our years as a tale that is told."

But in Psa. xci. 7-16 we read:

> "A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand: but it shall not come nigh thee . . . . . with long life will I satisfy him, and shew him My salvation."

And so Psa. xcv. takes up the story, and calls upon Israel to hear the voice of the Lord and not to harden their hearts as in the provocation, and as in the day of temptation in the wilderness. Let us remember that in Numb. xiv., where this great provoking is recorded, those who were thus doomed to wander and to die in the wilderness were A PARDONED PEOPLE (Numb. xiv. 20). Those who were warned about the evil heart of unbelief were "holy brethren". Hebrews is not dealing with the gospel of initial salvation; it deals with believers who, though delivered from their spiritual Egypt, united with Christ as were Israel when they were "baptized into Moses", partaking of the blessings of the wilderness provision "bread from heaven" yet, like those who were intimidated by the report of the ten spies, lost their place in the land of promise. We observe in I Cor. x. :1-5:

> "That ALL were under the cloud, and ALL passed through the sea; and were ALL baptized unto Moses . . . . . did ALL eat the same spiritual meat; and did ALL drink of the same spiritual drink . . . . . but with MANY of them God was not well pleased."

In the immediately preceding context of these words, the apostle had said:

> "They which run in a race run ALL, but ONE receiveth the prize. So run, that ye may obtain" (I Cor. ix. 24), and Heb. xii. picks up the thread and continues:

> "Let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus the Author and the Finisher of faith; Who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God" (Heb. xii. 1, 2).

The exhortation of Hebrews is "Let us go on unto perfection" (Heb. vi. 1), and this is implied in the words of Heb. iii. 14 (cf. Heb. iii. 6):

> "If we hold the BEGINNING of our confidence stedfast unto the END."

Going on unto perfection implies reaching a goal, going on to the end, finishing the course, touching the tape. Perfection and its associate words are all derivations of the root tel which gives us telos "the end". This will be made more evident when the exhortation to go on unto perfection is before us, but it should ever be kept in mind. Unless we clearly distinguish between Hope which is ours by gift in grace, and which can neither be won nor lost, and Prize and Crown which is associated with running a race, pressing on, enduring to the end, a prize that even Paul himself when writing to the Philippians was not sure of attaining, we shall make sad havoc of the teaching of Hebrews. Throughout the epistle, those addressed are already looked upon as "holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling". The wilderness experiences of Israel were the experiences of the REDEEMED. Those who forfeited entrance into the land included Moses himself, and surely Moses was a saved man!

We conclude this article with an extract from No.14 of this series entitled The Hope and the Prize found in Volume VIII, pp.87-89, which bears upon the epistle to the Hebrews. We have referred the reader many times to the epistle to the Hebrews as illustrating the principle, though not dealing with the same prize that obtains in Phil. iii., and once again we draw attention to that epistle in order that we may see a parallel and an illustration.

In Heb. v. 8-12, and vi. 1 the apostle writes:--

> "Though He was a Son, yet learned He obedience by the things which He suffered; and having perfected, He became unto all that obey Him the author of aionian salvation; named of God a high priest after the order of Melchisedec, of whom we have many things to say and hard of interpretation, seeing ye are becomes dull of hearing; for when by reason of the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need again that some one teach you what are the elements of the beginning of the oracles of God . . . . . Wherefore leaving the word of the beginning of Christ, let us go on unto perfection."

There we have a parallel with the "forgetting" and the "stretching out to" of Phil. iii.

The historical illustration supplied by Hebrews is found in chapters iii. and iv. The failure of Israel in the wilderness is largely connected with their fickleness of memory. While it could have been written of them after the mighty redemption from Egypt, "they soon forgat His works", we find that they "remembered the fish which they did eat in Egypt freely; the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlick" (Num. xi. 5), and accordingly after the spies had made their report, and after they had seen the bunch of grapes from Eshcol (note the contrast to fruits [viands] of Egypt) "they said one to another, Let us make a Captain, and let us return into Egypt". It is significant that the word "Captain" in the LXX is the same as that name of Christ in Hebrews, and the contrast is vitally connected with the two attitudes of mind expressed in "leaving" and "going on unto", "forgetting" and "stretching out to". The Israelites' failure to "leave" and "go on" was used by the apostle to impress his teaching in the epistle to the Hebrews, and it will have the same effect in the epistle to the Philippians.

(Hope8 and Prize, 87-89)

We quote again, a further extract, this time from No.21, found in Volume IX, pp. 118, 119.

Many have a difficulty regarding this subject by reason for failure to distinguish clearly Prize from the Hope. In an early article of this series we endeavoured to draw the distinction between "the Hope", and "the Prize", and said, "There can be no greater contrast than that of Ephesians and Philippians in their point of view. Ephesians teaches boldness with confidence, because there the question has entirely to do with being accepted in the Beloved; Philippians speaks of fear and trembling, because it has reference to the service, the running, and the contest of the believer subsequent to his perfect acceptance in Christ". The "Hope" does not figure in the epistle to the Philippians; the very word is used only by the apostle there with reference to himself. Phil. i. 20, his hope of deliverance and faithful testimony; ii. 19, 23, his hope of sending Timothy to the Philippians. To have misgivings therefore about the "hope", when reading Phil. iii. about the "Prize" is an evidence of failure to discern the things that differ. The hope of the believer is that of being with the Lord in glory and of sharing in the resurrection. This is a part of redemption; unto this every member of the One Body is sealed and pledged by the Holy Spirit "until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of His glory". No conditions are attached to the hope, no fears are expressed regarding its attainment, and no efforts are called for to qualify for it.

The prize forms no integral part of the unity of the Spirit, but the "one hope" does (Eph. iv. 4). A crown that may be won, may be lost, and the glory of reigning with Christ is directly connected with "enduring", whereas living with Him is simply the outcome of "having died with Him", a participation which is the joyous reckoning of every believer (II Tim. ii. 11-13). When the hope of the one body is spoken of in Col. iii. we do not read, 'when Christ the righteous judge shall appear', but "when Christ who is our life shall appear, then shall we appear with Him in glory", and here, in Colossians, is exactly the same argument that we found in II Tim. ii. 11, "ye died, and your life is hid with Christ in God". The apostle who wrote these inspired words, who so fully taught the perfect acceptance of the believer in the Lord, did not entertain any doubt regarding the hope when he penned the, "if by any means" of the prize. To be exercised in mind as to any question of worthiness regarding the Hope, and to assume certainty with regard to the Prize and the Crown, are alike to be shunned.

No.28. The Sabbath, the Sword and the Sympathy (iv. 9 - 16).
pp. 227 - 232

In chapters iii. & iv. the words katapausis and katapauo ("rest") occur eleven times, and the one reference in iv. 9 where the word sabbatismos is used, makes twelve in all. It is evident therefore that this "rest" is an essential subject. In the first case the entry into the land of promise was typical of the rest that remaineth to the people of God, for it is used directly in connection with Israel in the wilderness. That it was not the actual "rest", but a type only, may be seen from Heb. iv. 8:

> "For if Joshua (Jesus A.V.) had given them rest, then would He not afterward have spoken of another day", which the Lord did in David's time, as is seen in Psa. xcv. Not only is the rest here spoken of likened to the entry of the faithful overcomer into Canaan, it is also likened to the Sabbath day rest of the week in creation:

> "For He spake in a certain place of the seventh day on this wise, And God did rest the seventh day from all His works" (Heb. iv. 4).

The structure of Heb. iv. 1-13 will help us to see the chief features of the passage and guide us in our study.

Hebrews iv. 1 - 13

A | 1, 2. | a | Let us therefore fear, lest
b | Any come short.
c | Not united by faith.
d | The Word of hearing.
B | 3, 4. Nature of this rest. After works, e.g., Creation.
C | 5, 6. It remaineth (apoleipo)—a rest.
D | 7. David.
D | 8. Joshua.
C | 9. There remaineth (apoleipo)—a rest.
B | 10. Nature of this rest. After works, e.g., Creation.
A | 11-13. | a | Let us therefore labour, lest
b | Any fall.
c | Example of unbelief.
d | The Word of God.

The A.V. of iv. 2 reads "not being mixed with faith" and gives in the margin "Because they were not united by faith to". The R.V. reads "But the word of hearing did not profit them, because they were not united by faith with them that heard". This reading turns our attention to the great division that came about after the return of the spies. Israel did not join with Caleb and Joshua in their triumphant faith, but with the unbelievers and the complainers.

With regard to the nature of this "rest" both verses 3, 4 and 10 look back to Gen. i. and ii., where we are told that God rested upon the seventh day after the completion of the six days' creation. The believer is said to rest "from his works as God did from His" when he enters into this "rest that remaineth". Verse 9 departs from the usual word for rest to give us its full and perfect meaning:

> "There remaineth therefore a Sabbatismos (a Sabbath rest) to the people of God."

There is one further feature that demands attention, and that is the statement made in iv. 3:

> "Although the works were finished from the foundation of the world."

"The foundation (katabole) of the world" is an expression that has been carefully examined in The Berean Expositor, and the translation "The overthrow of the world" has been adopted instead of the A.V.

This "overthrow" we find indicated in Gen. i. 2:

> "And the earth became without form, and void", the six days' work which follow being the preparation of the earth as a platform for the outworking of the plan of the ages. When the writer of Hebrews wished to speak of laying a foundation, he uses the verb themelioo, Heb. i. 10, and not kataballo. The question that comes to us as a result of this is:

> "In what way does this reflect upon the believers to whom the apostle addressed his words, for their rest is likened to the seventh day rest of God" (see Heb. iv. 3, 4, 10)?

A little wider study, we think, will help us to appreciate the apostle's meaning. In iv. 1 he writes:

> "Let us therefore fear, lest, a promise being left us of entering into His rest, any of you should seem to come short of it", and in iv. 11 he adds:

> "Let us labour therefore to enter into that rest, lest any man fall after the same example of unbelief."

Now we are already acquainted with the fact that the grand exhortation of Hebrews is to "go on unto perfection", perfection being the doctrinal equivalent of the rest that remaineth. So therefore in Heb. vi. 1 we read:

> "Therefore leaving the principles of the doctrine (word of the beginning) of Christ, let us go on unto perfection."

This "perfection" we see to be the parallel with the "rest" of chapter iv. by observing the second half of chapter vi.:

"Things that accompany salvation" (9).
"The full assurance of hope unto the end" (11).
"Followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises" (12).
"And so, after he had patiently endured, he obtained the promise" (15).

In iv. 3 we read of works that were done since the overthrow of the world, and in ix. 25, 26 we read that Christ did not offer Himself often as the High Priest who entered the most Holy Place yearly with the blood of another, for in that case He must have suffered often since the overthrow of the world.

The work of the six days' creation is brought into line with the work of redemption, as indeed it was a part. The rest that remaineth unto the people of God is a rest which follows completed work. The epistle will go on to develop the twofold character of this rest. It will first of all show it to be the result of the great finished Work of Christ Whose one Offering caused the oft-repeated sacrifice of the law to "rest" (pauo = cease) from being offered (Heb. x. 2). And secondly it will show it to be the result by grace of that faith which obtained promises and was the substance of things hoped for. Sabbath succeeding work is not gospel, it is reward. "Let us labour therefore" while we at the same time rest in the finished Work of Christ.

It is tolerably certain that in the book of the Revelation the Lord Jesus Christ enters into His office as the great King-Priest, "after the order of Melchisedec" (see Psa. cx.). This brings the Apocalypse and the epistle to the Hebrews into line. The fact too that both books treat of the overcomer and the New Jerusalem will add to this sense of similarity. We have been considering the "rest that remaineth unto the people of God" and in Revelation that rest is materialized. There too we have the words:

> "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours; and their works do follow them" (Rev. xiv. 13).

The concluding verses of Heb. iv. contain a two-fold presentation of Christ: (1) as He appears to the seven churches (Rev. ii. and iii.); and (2) as the merciful High Priest, Who can sympathize with His people's weaknesses.

> "For the word of God is quick, and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart. Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in His sight: but all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of Him to Whom we must give an account" (Heb. iv. 12, 13 not AV JP).

In Rev. ii. 12-16 Christ says:

> "These things saith He which hath the sharp sword with two edges . . . . . Repent; or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will fight against them with the sword of My mouth."

The words spoken to each of the seven churches are searching indeed. Their works are known; the One Who speaks is a Judge of the thoughts and intents of the heart. His purpose too is to lead them on to perfection or as the Revelation words it, to "overcome". So in Heb. iv., the searching statement of verses 12 and 13 is addressed to those who are being urged to endure to the end.

Some commentators say that the reference in Heb. iv. 12 is exclusively to the written Word, while others maintain that it can only refer to the living Word. It is evident that somewhere before verse 13 the personal element is introduced. The simplest view seems to be that which is expressed in the figure of Rev. i. 16, "And out of His mouth went a sharp two-edged sword" and Rev. xix. 13 "His name is called The Word of God". The apostle, in Heb. iv. 12,13, speaks of Christ together with the Word, using it for His people's good. There is possibly a reference also to that specific passage of the Word which underlines the apostle's argument, viz. Psa. xcv., which he referred to as the words of the Holy Ghost. That Psalm is still "living and energetic". The Lord can still use it to reveal the vital difference between "soul and spirit". This is a distinction that is not kept clear in the minds of many of the Lord's people.

Much that enters into Church life, witness and worship, if viewed in the pure light of the Word, would prove to be of the soul rather than the spirit. While body, soul and spirit compose the complete man, the highest service and the only acceptable worship is that of the spirit or the new nature. Philippians, the epistle of the Prize, shews that discernment is necessary:

> "And this I pray, that your love may abound yet more and more in knowledge and in all judgment (discernment); that ye may try the things that differ (margin); that ye may be sincere and without offence till the day of Christ" (i. 9, 10).

II Timothy, the epistle of the Crown, also urges discernment:

> "Study to shew thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the Word of truth" (ii. 15).

Hebrews, the epistle of the Perfecting, also reveals the need for discernment. Soul and spirit must be kept distinct.

The last words of verse 13 read in the A.V. "with Whom we have to do". In Heb. xiii. 17 the word rendered "do" (logos) in iv. 13 is translated "account", and this is its meaning in Heb. iv. 13 "to Whom we must give an account". The atmosphere is that of the Judgment Seat of Christ, and verses 12 and 13 leave the mind impressed with the "terror of the Lord". This is but one side of truth however. There is another, which equally impresses us with infinite sympathy, tender care, wondrous grace, and bids us to come boldly. That other phase is expressed in Heb. iv. 14-16:

> "Seeing then that we have a great High Priest, Who has passed through the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession" (not AV JP).

With this "profession" chapter iii. opened:

> "Wherefore, holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling, consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus, Who was faithful . . . . ."

We have turned aside to consider the unfaithful of Israel and their forfeiture. We turn again and see in Him the great Captain and Perfecter of faith, Who, for the joy set before Him, endured the cross, despising the shame and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God. An added reason for continuance is given in iv. 15, 16:

> "For we have not an high priest which cannot be touched (sympathize) with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, APART FROM SIN."

God never tempts a man to sin. Temptation is an essential feature in the record of the race and the crown, but it is a temptation which is of the nature of trial and test. Temptation which springs from our own sinful selves is another matter. James clearly distinguishes between the two sorts of temptations in the first chapter of his epistle:

> "My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations . . . . . blessed is the man that endureth temptation: for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life" (verses 2 and 12).

That is the temptation of Hebrews and of Revelation. The other kind of temptation to which Heb. iv. takes exception is next reviewed by James:

> "Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God: for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth He any man: but every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed" (i. 13, 14).

Just as Heb. iv. 14 looked back to iii. 1, 2, we find iv. 15 looking back to ii. 18:

> "For in that He Himself hath suffered being tempted, He is able to succour them that are tempted."

An example of the temptation that is intended here is found in Heb. xi. 17:

> "By faith Abraham, when he was tempted, offered up Isaac."

Whatever the temptation may be through which we may be called to pass, it is a comfort to know that He Who sits at the right hand above was made partaker of flesh and blood, was tempted like as we are, apart from sin, and is "able to sympathize with our weaknesses".

> "Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need" (iv. 16).

This question of temptation, and in particular the meaning of the words "tempted like as we are yet without sin" were given a careful examination in chapter iii., and the reader is earnestly exhorted to acquaint himself with this exposition if for any reason its study has been overlooked, as it is vital both to the understanding of the epistle, and for the safe guidance of the pilgrim through the wilderness of this world.

"The House of Jacob shall Possess their Possessions"

No.3. "Dullness" in hearing. "Sloth" in following.
pp. 19, 20

Our possessions in Christ, as we have learned and believed are riches beyond the power of the mind to compute, and consequently any light that the Scriptures may throw upon sources of danger or anything that threatens the full possession of these priceless possessions should be a matter of immediate concern to every believer.

The early church by putting sloth among the seven deadly sins, exercised clearer discrimination than we have credited, for it is against sloth that the Apostle warned his readers, whom he exhorted to go on unto perfection. Sloth is a derivative of the word that gives us the English word 'slow', and those who were 'slow of heart' to believe, were rebuked by the Lord (Luke xxiv. 25). The epistle to the Hebrews has as its historical background:

(1) In chapters iii. and iv. the failure of Israel to enter into their 'rest'.
(2) The failure of the Levitical system of priest and offering to touch the conscience and put away sin (Heb. v.-x.).
(3) The examples of faith, set structurally over against the examples of unbelief of Heb. ii.-iv., and which commence with Abel and traverse O.T. history (Heb. xi.).

Each of these typical and historical backgrounds have key words that indicate some special danger, and which point to the remedy provided. The change of priesthood from that of Aaron to that of Melchisedec, the stress on the fact that faith sees the 'invisible', the inability of any typical offering to touch the conscience, will occur to the reader.

The section of Hebrews which demands our present attention is Heb. v. & vi. and the structure forces into prominence the two occurrences of the Greek word nothros which are found in the N.T. The one occurrence translating the word 'dull' the other rendering it 'slothful'.

Hebrews v. and vi.

A | v. 1-6. Melchisedec. Priest.
  B | v. 6-10. Perfected.
    C | v. 11 - vi. 1. The SLOTHFUL (dull) versus the perfect.
  B | vi. 1-10. Perfection.
    C | vi. 11-19. The SLOTHFUL versus the overcomer.
A | vi. 20. Melchisedec. Priest.

One of the values of the structure of a passage of Scripture is that one can as it were see the parts that have been underlined by God. The structure compels us to notice the two occurrences of nothros which might otherwise slip our attention.

Lexicographers differ as to the derivation of this word. All of course are agreed that the letter 'n' is an abbreviation of ne which stands for the negative. Parkhurst derives the word from a Greek word meaning 'to run'. Thayer derives it from either a word meaning 'to push' or 'to care about', while another derives it from a word meaning 'to leap'. Whatever the actual ancestry of this word may be, it is clear that unreadiness and consequent unwillingness to exert oneself, the lack of 'push' and the lack of 'care' are implied.

The Apostle, quite apart from the question of Inspiration, was familiar with the language and figures of the O.T. Scriptures, and doubtless some of the passages to which we now refer would be present to his mind.

> "We have seen the land, and, behold, it is very good: and are ye still? be not SLOTHFUL to go, and to enter to POSSESS the land" (Judges xviii. 9).

A reference to I Kings xxii. 3 will show that 'still' is a synonym for 'sloth' in some contexts:

> "Know ye that Ramoth in Gilead is ours, and we be still, and take it not out of the hand of the King of Syria."

When the question of "possessing" one's "possessions" is the matter before us, we should emulate the spirit of Isa. lxii. 1:

> "For Zion's sake I will not hold my peace (same word as 'still'), and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth."

Salvation and righteousness must 'go forth' before the prophet can rest satisfied. Not only would the prophet not hold his peace but he exhorts the watchman to 'keep not silence' and to give the Lord Himself 'no rest' until Jerusalem is made a praise in the earth.

After Israel had entered the land of promise, Joshua had to say to them:

> "How long are ye SLACK to go to POSSESS the land, which the Lord God of your fathers hath given you?" (Josh. xviii. 3).

"I will not fail thee" the Lord had said (Josh. i. 5) using the very same word which is translated "slack", for as Peter said "The Lord is not slack concerning His promise" (II Pet. iii. 9). The two hindrances that are emphasized in Heb. v. and vi. are, as we have seen, "dullness of hearing" and "slothfulness in following".

No.4. Three hindrances. Terah, Lot and the Canaanites.

pp. 59, 60; 77 - 80 =

pp. 117 - 120

Possession in the O.T. is closely related to "the land" of promise, and there are more occurrences of the word yarash 'to possess' in Deuteronomy than in any other book of the Bible. Keeping merely to the English of the A.V. and taking no account of such renderings as 'inherit', 'succeed', 'drive out' or 'dispossess', we find 46 references to possessing the land in that great book of the law.

The first occurrence of yarash in the O.T. are found in Gen. xv., and are related (1) To the true heir, and (2) To the inheriting of the land.

"I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward" (xv. 1). In reply to this assurance of God, after the victory over the confederate kings and the blessing by Melchisedec, Abraham appears to have reviewed the fact that he was now an old man, and it looked very likely that his heir would have to be the steward of his house, seeing, as he said "I go childless" (xv. 2).

While Abraham's attitude is by no means a fulfillment of law 191 of the code of Khammurabi, it is sufficiently near in spirit to reveal Abraham's intention and obligation. However, God had other plans. To Abraham's plaint "Behold, Thou hast given to me no seed, and, lo, one born in my house is mine heir (yarash)", the Lord replies, "This shall not be thine heir (yarash); but he that shall come forth out of thine own bowels shall be thine heir (yarash)" (xv. 4).

Then follows the Divine promise and the great act of faith (Gen. xv. 5, 6) and God said:

> "I am the Lord that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees, to give thee this land to inherit it (yarash)" to which Abraham replies, > "Lord God, whereby shall I know that I shall inherit it? (yarash)" (Gen. xv. 7, 8).

In Gen. xv. we are turned back to the initial call of Abraham, and the certainty of the promise, that "the house of Jacob SHALL possess his possessions" (Gen. xv. 1-7), but from verse 8 to the end we are directed forward to the strange pathway which the chosen seed must tread before the possession is entered. This sheds light on the greater purpose of the ages, and is seen to involve a principle that obtains in every calling. Before we consider this great problematic passage, let us follow the Divine direction and turn back to the earlier chapters of Genesis where the initial call of Abraham, together with the hindrances that prevent him from taking possession of this inheritance, are recorded.

Gen. xv. turns us back to Ur of the Chaldees, where the call first came. The first movement of Abraham's family out of Ur of the Chaldees is by the record of Gen. xi. 31.

> "And Terah took Abram his son and Lot the son of Haran his son's son, and Sarai his daughter in law, his son Abram's wife; and they went forth with them from Ur of the Chaldees, TO GO into the land of Canaan; and they came to Haran, and DWELT THERE."

We have inspired warrant for the fact that God appeared unto Abraham "when he was in Mesopotamia" and "before he dwelt in Charran" and the call of the Lord was specific:

> "Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and come into the land which I will show thee" (Acts vii. 2, 3).

Haran, although some 600 miles away from Ur, was nevertheless situated in the same country and on the wrong side of the Euphrates. The 600 miles that separated the two cities did not alter the fact that both Ur and Haran were dedicated to the same Babylonian moon-god. Terah had made a great move, but had not made any radical change. Paul as good as told the Galatians that to turn from Christ to weak and beggarly elements after having been redeemed from worshipping idols, was in spirit, much like returning to their early idolatry. The flesh can take part in campaigns, and go to great lengths of self denial and discomfort in the form of religion, only to exchange an Ur for an Haran and miss the great reality.

Gesenius says that the name Terah is from a Chaldee root meaning 'to delay'. It will be seen how aptly this name fits his typical character. "Who did hinder you?" said Paul to the Galatians (v. 7), and the answer "Religion after the flesh" is but the name Terah expanded in the light of the Gospel revelation. Terah's action symbolizes the first of a series of hindrances that postponed the 'possessing' of this "possession", and is a lesson for us all. While Stephen declared that the call came to Abraham before he dwelt in Haran, Gen. xi. says that it was Terah who responded. When one senses the authority of the parent in O.T. times this apparent contradiction is seen at its true value. Terah is a picture of religious flesh. It makes an attempt to follow the Divine call, but it breaks down in essentials.

God called Abraham to leave his country and his kindred, but Terah includes both himself and Lot. Terah started out with the intention of going to the land of Canaan, but he never crossed the river Euphrates. Even though he trekked 600 miles, and had left Ur of the Chaldees behind, he had merely exchanged one pagan city for another. Abraham's inheritance was on the other side of the river. He becomes "Abraham the Hebrew" (Gen. xiv. 13) because he 'crossed over' (Hebrew abar as in Gen. xxxii. 10; Josh. i. 2).

Here is the first typical action that indicates one of the reasons why many fail to 'possess' their "possessions".

Terah, in spite of all his response and removal, never left the land of Mesopotamia, he merely changed one form of paganism for another. Religion is no friend to faith. It is the great hinderer. The second lesson that Gen. xi. teaches is that Abraham's inheritance was entered only after his father died, even as his true heir was given to him after he was 'as good as dead'. God's promised inheritance looks to resurrection for its full realization, and in prospect can only be enjoyed on resurrection ground.

After Terah's death, the Lord in His grace calls Abraham again; note the word 'had' in the AV. "Now the Lord had said unto Abraham" (Gen. xii. 1), and is referred to by Stephen in Acts vii. 2.

Upon the death of his father God said to Abraham:

> "Get thee out of thy country (for Haran was in the same 'country' as Ur, even though a great trek divided the two cities), and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house (this reference to his father's house is not mentioned by Stephen), unto a land that I will show thee" (Gen. xii. 1).

On the surface there appears to be a discrepancy when we compare these two calls together. Terah evidently "knew" that "Canaan" was the objective, yet according to Heb. xi. 8 Abraham went out 'not knowing' whither he went. The word used by the Apostle in Heb. xi. 9 for "knowing" is epistamai:

> "To obtain, and thus have a knowledge of anything by proximity to it, or as a result of prolonged attention: in contrast with the process of getting to know it, and with a mere casual dilettante acquaintance with it" (Appendix 132.1 V. Companion Bible).

To Agrippa, who was 'an expert' in Jewish customs and questions (Acts xxvi. 3), Paul could say "The king knoweth of these things" (Acts xxvi. 26) using epistamai, for Agrippa alone of his judges was versed and expert in such matters. Now both Terah and Abraham knew of the land of Canaan, and knew that in that land the inheritance was to be found, but he had no expert knowledge, nothing to equip or warn him of the requirements of such a journey, he went out not well equipped humanly speaking for such a response. The same could be said in a greater degree, when Abraham responded to another call to go to a mountain which God would show him, and there offer up his all, there too, he went humanly speaking ill equipped and unversed in the requirements that would be made of him. In each case Abraham 'believed' and went forward where the ordinary man of 'sense' would have drawn back.

This feature therefore is not without its bearing upon the great lesson we are out to learn. When thinking of our inheritance and the pathway that leads to its enjoyment we need to remind ourselves that:

> "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him. But God hath revealed them unto us by His spirit" (I Cor. ii. 9, 10).

Abraham was no worldly wise 'expert', he was an unworldly and simple believer.

God promised to 'show' Abraham the land that was to be the inheritance both of himself and of his seed, yet we read the whole of chapter xii., and on nearly to the end of chapter xiii. before that promise was fulfilled. If we ask why? the answer is not that God was 'slack concerning His promise', but that Abraham had failed to fulfil the conditions that were attached.

Gen. xii. 4, 5 significantly reads 'and Lot went with him'. "And Lot his brother's son, and all their substance that they had gathered, and the souls that they had gotten in Haran." Abraham can hardly be said with this passage before us that he had left his 'kindred'.

There is an intended parallel between Gen. xi. 31 and xii. 5. "They went forth . . . . . to go into the land of Canaan; and they came to Haran and dwelt there." Note the word THERE. The second reference reads: "They went forth to go into the land of Canaan; and into the land of Canaan they came." So far we may say, this is good. Canaan has now been entered, but there is a significant comment in verse 6 "And the Canaanite was then in the land". Note the word THEN. It appears that Terah's delay gave Satan an opportunity of forestalling the purpose of God and consequently, Israel could not really possess their possessions until the Canaanites were expelled and destroyed.

This also is a solemn lesson for all believers, and links the failure to possess with the conflict of the two seeds, a theme too vast to develop here.

After Abraham's return from Egypt, where nothing but a Divine interposition saved Sarah and the true seed from contamination, we read "and Lot with him". Still the condition remained unfulfilled, and it was not until strife arising because of the greatness of their substance that Abraham, driven apparently by exasperation, gave Lot the choice of the land if only he could be persuaded to separate from Abraham.

> "Is not the whole land before thee? separate thyself, I pray thee, from me: if thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or if thou depart to the right hand, then I will go to the left" (Gen. xiii. 9).

Then come the significant words:

> "And the Lord said unto Abram, AFTER that Lot was separated from him. Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art . . . . . all the land which thou seest . . . . . arise, walk through the land in the length of it, and in the breadth of it; for I will give it unto thee" (Gen. xiii. 14-17).

God kept His word. He had said "I will show thee" (Gen. xii. 1) and He kept His promise immediately after Abraham kept the terms laid down.

The several hindrances that are revealed in these passages have a bearing upon the believer today, when translated into spiritual realities.

Terah, assayed to do in the flesh, what could only be done in the spirit. He intended to go into the land of Canaan but dwelt in Haran. He made a move, and probably impressed his contemporaries with his sincerity, but it was after all just a 'religious movement'. He never "passed over". The Euphrates flowed between him and the land of promise after he reached Haran as surely as it had when he lived in Ur.

Abraham was held by 'the old man'. He could not respond until Terah died.

The next hindrance was twofold. Satan had profited by the delay and had peopled the land of promise in advance with his own usurping seed. Lot, by reason of his kinship with Abraham, kept back the realization of the promised possession until by sheer force of circumstances he was compelled to 'separate'. This too has a full lesson which is expounded in more than one passage of the N.T.

Only when Terah and Lot are either dead or separated, can Abraham enjoy the firstfruits of his inheritance. He then saw it and walked through it, although still possessing not a foot of it except by faith. This however is as far as we can attain in this life, and the lesson which Genesis teaches is of perennial value. There are other aspects of this same truth which must be considered in subsequent articles, sufficient is before us surely, to call for the exercise of heart and mind.

No.5. The sending of the spies.
pp. 132 - 136

The opening words of Numb. xiii. seem to teach that the sending of the spies by Moses was in harmony with the will of the Lord.

> "And the Lord spake unto Moses saying, Send thou men, that they may search the land of Canaan, which I give unto the children of Israel."

So also, the words of Christ to Thomas could be interpreted when He said "Thomas, reach hither thy finger"; nevertheless we know that it would have been more blessed had Thomas believed without such evidence.

In chapter x. of the book of Numbers we read these words:

> "And they departed from the mount of the Lord three days journey: and the ark of the covenant of the Lord went before them in the three days journey, TO SEARCH OUT a resting place for them" (Numb. x. 33).

Here we find the identical word used that is afterwards used of the spies. "That they may search the land", "To spy out the land". Altogether the Hebrew word tur occurs thirteen times in Numb. x. to xiv., an ominous number, associated in the Scriptures with rebellion.

Notice what the spies were to include in their report, whether the land was 'good or bad', 'fat or lean'. Surely if God Himself had chosen this land for their possession, and had described it as a land flowing with milk and honey, it hardly seems to be the exercise of faith or trust to send spies to see whether it be 'fat or lean'!

The 'three days journey' already mentioned seems to suggest that the Risen Christ has gone ahead, and is sufficient pledge concerning the nature of the inheritance that awaits

His redeemed people. Moreover, when Moses rehearsed this matter before all Israel after the days of wandering had come to an end, the sending of the spies is put in a somewhat different light.

> "And I said unto you, ye are come unto the mountain of the Amorites, which the Lord our God doth give unto us. Behold, the Lord thy God hath set the land before thee: GO UP AND POSSESS IT, as the Lord God of thy fathers hath said unto thee; fear not, neither be discouraged" (Deut. i. 20, 21).

Notice that the land had been GIVEN to Israel. Moses said to his father-in-law, "We are journeying unto the place of which the Lord said, I will GIVE it you" (Numb. x. 29).

This was the basis of the argument of Caleb and Joshua,

> "The land which we passed through to search it, is an exceeding good land. If the Lord delight in us, then He will bring us into this land, and GIVE it us; a land which floweth with milk and honey" (xiv. 7, 8).

The word 'set' used by Moses in Deut. i. 20, 21 is actually a repetition of the word 'give' as the margin indicates. God's Gift, God's Word, God's Covenant promise, all were put to the question by the sending of the spies.

> "Ye came near unto Me every one of you" (Deut. i. 22).

The same words are used in Deut. v. 23 where once again the people were moved by fear. This kind of 'coming near' has something unhealthy about it. It seems on a par with the attitude of those who would catch the Lord in His speech, and approach Him with honeyed words "Master, we know that Thou art true" etc.

"We will send." These words must be remembered when we read Numb. xiii. 2 "Send thou men". Ezekiel makes it clear that when the Exodus took place, the Lord had Himself ESPIED the land for them, a land flowing with milk and honey, which is the glory of all lands (Ezek. xx. 5, 6). The spies were to bring word again 'by what way we must go up' but God had already told them. Even when the report had been made, Israel 'rebelled against the commandment of the Lord' (Deut. i. 26) and they charged God with 'hating' them, and in spite of all the faithful testimony of Caleb and Joshua and the added reminder of Moses, they 'did not believe the Lord their God' (Deut. i. 32).

Quite a number of those who believe the teaching of the epistles of the Mystery have expressed themselves as unsatisfied by the scantiness of the revelation there contained as to (1) just what constitutes the glory of our inheritance, and (2) just exactly by what way the Church shall enter into its hope. There is a looking back to the hope of an earlier dispensation, a sort of envy at the lavish description of the millennial kingdom, or of the wonders of the Heavenly City, and one senses something petulant in the request, "Where is our hope described in the epistles of the Mystery? Why are there no details given to us as to others?" There is also a querulous complaint* that whereas I Thess. iv. or I Cor. xv. are most explicit, one cannot be sure from the prison epistles whether the Church of the One Body will be caught up by rapture, will die off and pass through death and resurrection, whether all will go together, whether there will be angelic accompaniments, etc., etc. All this, which superficially sounds like earnest inquiry, is but the old unbelief of Israel re-expressed. They wanted to know more than God had revealed about 'the land' which was their inheritance, and they wanted to know more than God had revealed as to 'what way we must go up'. Both these questions were already answered to faith. God had 'espied' the land and had called it 'good'. God went before them with fire and with cloud 'to shew them by what way they should go'. Faith needs nothing more.

[* - We were once asked by an American correspondent writing along these lines to 'come down flat-footed' as to the accompaniments and happenings associated with our hope.]

If our inheritance is at the right hand of God, 'far above all', it is transcendentally above all human thought and experience, and what words of human language could describe the riches of the glory of that inheritance of the saints? If in the resurrection and translation we need adjusting to the new sphere of blessing 'in the heavenly places', how should we be the better if God described the process? It is enough for us that, as we receive a spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of 'Him', the ascended Lord, and the Mystery, we shall receive as full an answer to our quest for knowledge as God sees fit to give. If we are assured that 'when Christ Who is our life shall be manifested, we also shall be manifested with Him in glory' (Col. iii. 3), what does it matter if 'the way we must go up' is left unexplained? We shall arrive—praise God. We do not know how; all that is His responsibility, not ours.

Our refusal to be turned back to I Thess. iv. as the hope of the Church is to be understood in the light of Numb. xiii. and xiv. We seek the spirit that enabled Caleb and Joshua to believe God, and leave the consequences. As we pointed out when dealing with Col. i. 23 (see Volume XXI), the great evidence of progress in the truth, or of the beginning of decline, is closely associated with holding stedfast to 'the hope'. Caleb and Joshua were threatened with stoning for the stand they took. We shall probably get its equivalent again and again; but as in their case, so in ours, His truth shall be our shield and buckler.

One of the reasons why the Lord was not too explicit about the land of Canaan and the way up, was because it was inhabited by a monstrous seed of the wicked one, the giants, the sons of Anak, and viewing such antagonists with the eyes of the flesh, the spies said: "We were in our own sight as grasshoppers, and so we were in their sight" (Numb. xiii. 33). The cities were walled and very great, and grace was not given in the wilderness to deal with these remote difficulties. When at last Israel did stand before the walls of Jericho, they fell down flat at the shout of faith.

The pathway to our inheritance is blocked by principalities and powers, spiritual wickedness and world-holders of darkness. If we should see them with the eyes of the flesh, we would crumple up as did Daniel (Dan. x. 9, 10). God mercifully spares us this vision. We believe His Word; that is enough. If we knew the formidable strongholds of Satan that must be overcome in 'the evil day', we would recoil in fear and unbelief. We shall not face them until we are all assembled beneath the banner of our true Captain, the greater Joshua, with Jordan behind us, and the land of promise immediately before us. Why not take a leaf out of this book of experience? Why not believe what God has revealed, and lovingly accept as best the fact that He withholds certain things?

Before closing this article, let us record the encouraging words of faith given by Caleb:

> "And Caleb stilled the people before Moses, and said, Let us go up at once and possess it; for we are well able to overcome it" (Numb. xiii. 30).

The word translated 'stilled' does not indicate that the people were calmed or comforted, the seven other occurrences of hasah suggest some element of authority, 'Let all the earth keep silence before him' (Hab. ii. 20). Men recognize the majesty of faith, even though they refuse to follow it. Caleb did not merely say 'Let us go up' or 'Let us go up and possess it', but "Let us go up AT ONCE and possess it". While there is no adverb in the original to correspond with the words 'at once', there is an insistence that is very marked, for the Hebrew reads 'going up, let us go up', suggesting a prompt unhesitating obedience without delay and without dallying.

"We are well able to overcome it." These words in another context may indicate unholy and unwarranted self-confidence, but God is faithful to His promise, Who has gone before and Who calls upon us to follow. His commands are then His enablings.

Again, after the dreadful desire to make a captain and return into Egypt, both Joshua and Caleb repeated their testimony and their exhortation saying "If the Lord delight in us, then He will bring us into this land and give it us: a land which floweth with milk and honey. Only rebel not ye against the Lord, neither fear ye the people of the land; for they are bread for us: their defence is departed from them, and the Lord is with us: fear them not" (Numb. xiv. 8, 9).

Later the Psalmist said:

> "He brought me forth also into a large place: He delivered me, because He delighted in me" (Psa. xviii. 19).

Caleb and Joshua stood firm upon the ground of grace.

There are a number of key words that are used by Moses, Caleb, Joshua, Israel and the Prophets, the Psalmist and the Apostles afterwards that provide a solemn lesson as we think of helps and hindrances that we meet when we would 'possess our possessions'. These we must consider together in another study. There is also the great revelation concerning the Amorites, the Canaanites and their spiritual equivalents to be pondered, and the contrast between the original plan to possess the land, and that which was subsequently followed. To these themes we must return and pray that increasing light may be given as we meditate upon these things that have been written for our learning.

No.6. "The iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full"

(Gen. xv. 16).
pp. 156 - 159

The reader will remember that we are to consider in this article the meaning or spiritual implications of the words spoken to Abraham concerning the period of affliction that his seed should endure 'For the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full' (Gen. xv. 16).

The word translated 'iniquity' is the Hebrew avon and without actual reference, we might easily assume that such a word would be employed in Gen. iii. and vi. or xi., or in many places in Genesis where the sons of men are recorded following their evil ways. The fact however is, that avon occurs but four times in Genesis. Once it is used in self condemnation by the brethren of Joseph for their unnatural hatred (Gen. xliv. 16), the remaining three have peculiar associations with the evil seed. Cain uses it, 'my iniquity' (margin Gen. iv. 13) and he hated his brother; the angel uses it when he spoke of the wickedness of Sodom (Gen. xix. 15). Now just as Israel were debarred their inheritance until the iniquity of the Amorite was completed, so Sodom could not be visited with judgment until Lot had escaped and entered the city of Zoar (Gen. xix. 22).

The four references to 'iniquity' avon are therefore closely related, as will be more clearly seen by the following arrangement of the references:

A | Gen. iv. 13. Cain. The murderer and hater of Abel.
Cain was "of that wicked one".
The first of the seed of the serpent and manifested the 'enmity' between them.
B | Gen. xv. 16. Amorite. One of the Canaanite tribes.
The usurping nations, who were spoken of 'after that' in Gen. vi. 4.
B | Gen. xix. 15. Sodom.
Linked by Jude 7 with Gen. vi. 4 and destroyed by fire from heaven.
A | Gen. xliv. 16. Israelites. The word used as a result of the conscience, but which was followed by repentance and restoration.

The Hebrew word translated 'iniquity' avon is derived from avah 'to bend, curve, twist, distort' and 'to be perverse', very much as the English word 'wrong' is derived from the idea of being 'wrung' or 'twisted'. So in Lam. iii. 9 it is used of 'crooked' paths, and in Isa. xxiv. 1 it is translated 'turn upside down'.

Seeing that the word is used but four times in the book of Genesis, as compared with 38 occurrences in the remaining books of the law, some specific perversion seems to be implied. We can get confirmation for this particular emphasis by observing the way in which another Hebrew word is used in Genesis namely the verb chata "to sin". The first occurrence, Gen. iv. 7 is generally understood to refer to a sin-offering, and if this reference be excluded, then we must read on in Genesis until we come to the twentieth chapter before we come to the word chata 'to sin'. The next occurrence of the word, Gen. xxxi. 39 "I bare the loss" has no bearing upon our search, and so we come to Gen. xxxix. 9 before we read the next reference to 'sin'. The two passages that stand out therefore in Genesis as recording specific 'sin', are those that speak of Abimelech's attempt to interfere with the coming of the true seed through Sarah, and the solicitations of Potiphar's wife.

The iniquity of the Amorite, the bending or twisting of something from its true course is also connected with the attack upon, and the corruption of the true seed. The Amorites being Canaanites were a people upon whom a curse had been pronounced.

> To the serpent God said . . . . . "Thou art cursed above all cattle" (Gen. iii. 14).
> To Cain the Lord said . . . . . "Thou art cursed more than the earth" (Gen. iv. 11).
> To Canaan Noah said . . . . . "Cursed be Canaan" (Gen. ix. 25).

Contrary to common belief no curse was pronounced upon either Adam or Eve; the ground was cursed for their sakes. The first man to be cursed was Cain, and the N.T. declares that 'he was of that wicked one', and the second was Canaan.

From these references it becomes apparent that there is a cursed line running parallel with that of the true seed, and the subject is of such importance that we must extend our survey, and in order to impress this terrible pedigree of the false seed upon the mind, let us set out the testimony of the Scriptures in tabular form:

(1) Enmity declared between the two seeds (Gen. iii. 15).
(2) Enmity is the meaning of the name "Job", and the book of Job sets forth the conflict of the ages and the attack of Satan upon one who was "perfect" i.e. one of the true seed (Job i. and ii.).
(3) Cain was "of that wicked one" (I John iii. 12) and his line is not included in subsequent genealogies (Gen. v. 1; I Chron. i. 1).
(4) Noah was "perfect in his generations" (Gen. vi. 9) and is placed in contrast with "all flesh" that had corrupted its way on the earth.
(5) The sons of God (Gen. vi.; Job i. 6) are fallen angels. These are said to have kept not their first estate, but to have left their own habitation and are likened to Sodom, having gone after strange flesh (Jude 6, 7).
(6) The result of the irruption of the fallen angels was a race of abnormal men, called "giants" or nephilim "fallen ones" (Gen. vi. 4).
(7) There was a subsequent corruption of the race "after that", that is after the Flood (Gen. vi. 4), and as the purpose of God was now focused upon the line of Shem, so the attack of the evil one was concentrated upon the land promised to Abraham, "The Canaanite was then in the land" (Gen. xii. 6).
(8) The descendants of Canaan are named in Gen. x. 6-19, with whom are allied Nimrod the rebel and founder of Babylon (Gen. x. 8-10). These descendants are Sidon, Heth, The Jebusite, the Amorite, the Girgasite, the Hivite, the Arkite, the Sinite, the Arvadite, the Zemarite and the Hamathite. Some of the descendants of Canaan are not mentioned anywhere else in the Scriptures, except once more in the genealogical table of I Chron. i., and it may be that all were not contaminated. All were not 'giants' as were the Amorites.
(9) It will be observed that there is no son of Canaan named Jebus, or Amor, or Girga. There is a strange departure from the normal in the genealogy of Gen. x. All we know is that Canaan begat Sidon his firstborn, and Heth, but whether the father of the Jebusites, was a son named Jebus, or whether the father of the Amorites was a son named Amor, Scripture is silent, but this strange departure in the writing of a genealogy lifts out into prominence these Canaanite tribes.

(10) Og, king of Bashan, an Amorite (Deut. xxxi. 4) is called "Of the remnant of the giants" (Deut. iii. 11). Giants had dwelt in this vicinity "in old time" (Deut. ii. 20), and Bashan was called "the land of the giants" (Deut. iii. 13). In connection with which the reader should consult The Giant Cities of Bashan by Porter.

(11) A special tribe of the Canaanites was descended from Arba. He is said to have been a great man among the Anakim, and gave his name to the city of Kirjath-arba, afterwards called Hebron (Josh. xiv. 15).

(12) The Anakim were described as "tall" and the name means "long necked". These struck terror in the heart of the ten spies who brought back an evil report. In their sight, Israel felt as "grasshoppers" (Numb. xiii. 28) and the saying was repeated "who can stand before the children of Anak?" (Deut. ix. 2).

(13) Some of the "giants" remained unto the days of David, notably Goliath (I Sam. xvii. 4) and Ishbi-benob, Saph, a brother of Goliath and an unnamed man of great stature who had "on every hand six fingers, and on every foot six toes" (II Sam. xxi. 16-22).

(14) The parable of "the wheat and the tares" declares that the "good seed are the children of the kingdom; but the tares are the children of the wicked one, and the enemy that sowed them is the devil" (Matt. xiii. 38, 39). No other end but to be gathered out and burned is said of the tares. They are evidently a counterfeit of the true seed, for not until the harvest is it possible to discriminate without endangering the true seed.

(15) The Saviour discriminates between "My Father" and "your father" saying "If God were your Father, ye would love Me", "ye are of your father the devil . . . He was a murderer from the beginning" so linking up with the "iniquity" of Cain (John viii. 38-44).

(16) Some were called by the Lord "serpents" and "generations of vipers" (Matt. xxiii. 33), and He asked "How can ye escape the damnation of hell (gehenna)?" This denunciation is preceded by words that are reminiscent of Gen. xv. "The iniquity of the Amorite was not yet full" for He said "Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers" (Matt. xxiii. 32).

(17) The Apostle Paul was withstood by a sorcerer named Bar-Jesus, significant name! who was also called Elymas, which by interpretation means a "sorcerer". The Apostle called him "a child of the devil" (Acts xiii. 10), and his evil attitude is described as "perverting" the right ways of the Lord.

(18) Just as the Amorites barred the way and prevented Israel from entering into their inheritance, so the Apostle says "we wrestle not against flesh and blood (even as Israel were told 'meddle not' with Esau or with Ammon in Deut. ii. 5, 19), but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high (or heavenly) places" (Eph. vi. 12). These principalities were "spoiled" and "made a show of openly" at the cross (Col. ii. 15) and were led captive at the Ascension (Eph. iv. 8) even as in type Joshua took the thirty-one kings (Josh. xii. 9-24).

(19) John in his first epistle differentiates between "the children of God" and "the children of the devil", and instances "Cain who was of that wicked one" (I John iii. 10-12).

(20) In the book of the Revelation, we learn that at the time of the end, there will be those who say they are Jews, and are not, but who are "the synagogue of Satan" (Rev. ii. 9; iii. 9) and they who hold "the doctrine of Balaam" (Rev. ii. 14); a false prophetess named Jezebel (Rev. ii. 20), together with some who have "known the depths of Satan" (Rev. ii. 24), while the Laodiceans were about to be "spued out" of the Lord's mouth (Rev. iii. 16), a figure that reminds us of the Canaanites who were "spued out" of the land (Lev. xviii. 28). They are summed up as "earth dwellers" whose names are not written in the book of life (Rev. xiii. 8). They are the false seed. When Babylon falls, the true seed enter into their inheritance, even as at the filling up of the iniquity of the Amorite, Israel entered into theirs, and in the seven last plagues is "filled up the wrath of God" (Rev. xv. 1).

Here in these twenty items we have given little more than a catalogue; if each passage cited is considered in the light of the context, it seems impossible to avoid the doctrine of the two seeds, a doctrine which not only illuminates the purpose of the ages, but is the theme of that most ancient book, the book of Job, which sheds light on Gen. iii., vi., the extermination of the Canaanites, and a many doctrinal and dispensational subject. It is this that makes the passages in Gen. xv. of such importance, and which by application illuminates the conflict that the Church of the One Body must expect while "principalities and powers" are "the rulers of the darkness of this world".

No.7. "Ye have compassed this mountain long enough."
pp. 178 - 180

It is a fact that should be reiterated until its significance is realized, that the FIRST BOOKS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT were the epistles of Paul. The Church has elected to travel by way of the Gospels and the Acts, even as Israel wandered their forty years, but that fact remains that the initial revelation of Divine grace was not accepted except by the minority.

The story of Israel's failure under Moses and eventual triumph under Joshua is recorded in the books of Deuteronomy and Joshua. Deuteronomy is so called because the law was given a second time, and is taken from Deut. xvii. 18, where "copy of the law" is spoken in Rabbinic writings as the Mishneh or "doubling" and which the LXX translates deuteronomion "repetition of the law". It is the time of restatement, after the period of wandering is over. The first four chapters of Deuteronomy were spoken by Moses "on this side Jordan in the wilderness, in the plain over against the Red Sea". The "plain" is the Arabah, the name of the valley that extends southward from the Jordan. There is a world of feeling in the retrospect which is spoken in parenthesis:

> "(There are eleven days journey from Horeb by the way of Mount Seir unto Kadesh-barnea)", even as the poet has expressed it:

> "The saddest words of tongue or pen
> It might have been . . . . ."

Moses, however, apart from the expression of regret, passes to the immediate present:

> "And it came to pass in the fortieth year, in the eleventh month, on the first day of the month", and only reviews the past, in order to prepare the children of Israel for the tests of faith and endurance that now awaited them.

> "The LORD our God spake unto us in Horeb, saying 'Ye have dwelt long enough in this mount'." (Deut. i. 6).

This command came on the twentieth day of the second month of the second year after Israel's exodus from Egypt, as Numb. x. 11 records and with standards held aloft and with the camp in marching order, the move was made that might have ended in a speedy entry into the land of promise. Weakness, failure, rebellion, murmuring however are soon revealed to their undoing. These signs of weakness are as follows:

(1) Moses. "I am not able to bear you alone" (Deut. i. 9).
(2) Israel. "Ye came near unto me, every one of you, and said 'We will send men before us'." (Deut. i. 22).
(3) Israel. "Ye murmured in your tents."
"Ye did not believe the Lord your God" (Deut. i. 27, 32).
(4) Moses. "Thou shalt no go in thither" (Deut. i. 37).
(5) Israel. "Went presumptuously up into the hill" (Deut. i. 43).

It will be seen that there is a blend of human frailty and human perversity in this record. Moses refers to his own inability to cope with the duties that belonged to his office, and this must be read together with the record given in Exod. xviii. There we discover that it was at the suggestion of Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, that arrangements were made to spread some of the ardous work of administration.

> "And when Moses' father in law saw all that he did to the people, he said, ... Thou wilt surely wear away" (Exod. xviii. 14-18).

Whether the advice of Jethro was prompted by Divine or worldly wisdom we cannot tell; the main fact stands out clearly, that, strong and wise and endowed as Moses must have been, he was after all human and consequently frail. Moses moreover represented "the law" and not till Moses was dead could Joshua, the type of Christ, rise up and go over Jordan. Great and glorious as was Moses, type and foreshadowing as he was of the Prophet that should be raised up "like unto" himself, the fact that he places this acknowledgment "I am not able to bear you myself alone" and records that he spoke these words "at that time" is suggestive.

The sending of the spies, and the murmuring of the people were symptoms of a deadly unbelief which brought about their fall:

> "Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God . . . . . Let us therefore fear, lest a promise being left us of entering into His rest, any of you should seem to come short of it. For unto us was the gospel preached, as well as unto them, but the word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it" (Heb. iii. 12; iv. 1, 2).

The R.V. reads in verse 2 "because they were not united by faith with them that heard". "Them that heard" the word and believed, were men like Caleb and Joshua, those who sided with the ten spies and their evil report were those who were not united by faith to the faithful two. The only other occurrence of sunkerannumi is in I Cor. xii. 24 "God hath tempered the body together". All Israel were "baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea, and did all eat the same spiritual meat" (I Cor. x. 1-4); they were all, at least typically "saved" people, but the record continues "But with many of them God was not well pleased: for they were overthrown in the wilderness" (I Cor. x. 5). Among the items picked out by the Apostle for our warning is the fact that "murmuring" ended in their destruction, even as in Philippians, the same Apostle, writing to believers of the high calling, warned against "murmuring" and those whose end is "waste" (destruction A.V.), and whose god was their belly (Phil. ii. 14; iii. 19).

The weakness and the perverseness of the human heart it will be seen early manifested itself in both leader and people, pointing on, in the first instance to Joshua who led the people in, and ultimately to the Lord, for it is written "If Jesus (i.e. Joshua) had given them rest" David would not have still spoken of that rest as future (Heb. iv. 8).

The remainder of the first chapter of Deuteronomy is occupied with the rebellion and the forty years' wandering. Chapter ii. sums up that dreadful experience in the words of verse 1:

> "Then we turned, and took our journey into the wilderness by the way of the Red Sea, as the Lord spake unto me: and we compassed Mount Seir many days" (Deut. ii. 1).

At the end of this period the Lord again spoke:

> "Ye have compassed this mountain long enough: turn you northward" (Deut. ii. 3).

There is a world of frustration in that word "compass". The same Hebrew word gives us "whirl about" (Eccles. i. 6); "wind about" (Ezek. xli. 7); "driven back" (Psa. cxiv. 3, 5).

We are not of them that "draw back unto perdition (or waste)" said the Apostle with an eye on this tragedy of wasted effort and breach of promise. Abraham knew something of this blank, unprofitable period (Gen. xii. 7 and xiii. 18), the intervening descent into Egypt and the dwelling with Lot being so much waste of precious time, mercifully blotted out, but waste nevertheless.

New directions however are given to Israel. No longer are they told to go up by way of the mountain of the Amorites, their route is altered and led by way of the lands of Esau, Moab and Ammon. We too must take it to heart, that while the basic truth of Ephesians and Philippians remains to us, practical and experimental modifications are observable in II Timothy, the last epistle of Paul. We cannot now "go up by way of the mountain". Fellowship which is rich and full in Ephesians and Philippians is absent from II Timothy, where the insistence there is on "thyself". We look with longing at the record of the Philippian assembly, but know that no such fellowship will again be manifested on earth. Rather the sphere and atmosphere of our service is indicated in the fourth chapter of II Timothy, where loneliness rather than the encouragement of "striving together" may be our lot.

Meditations on Psalm LI

No.8. The inner character of sin indicated (verses 4 - 6).

p. 80

When David said "Against Thee, Thee only, have I sinned", no one doubts but that he included the treachery of his act against his fellow man Uriah the Hittite; the recognition that he had sinned against God in sinning against his fellow man, instead of belittling his crime, only made it the greater. Had David left the matter there, no problem would have arisen. He made, however, a fuller and more complicated statement than that, one that touches very high doctrine, and has caused many controversies, and which provided the Apostle Paul with an argument in the development of the teaching of the epistle to the Romans.

> "Against Thee, Thee only, have I sinned, and done this evil in Thy sight: that Thou mightest be justified when Thou speakest, and be clear when Thou judgest" (Psa. li. 4).

Following this theological comment, David makes another reference to his sin; and as before, he goes outside of his own immediate action.

> "Behold I was shapen in iniquity; and in sin did my mother conceive me" (Psa. li. 5).

On the Threshold

pp. 237, 238

Under this heading as opportunity occurs, we are printing a series of short meditations, originally designed to accompany a daily reading. We have, as a matter of interest, retained the original date heading, and the reader will understand why we have entitled this series "On the Threshold", for in 1909, we commenced the series entitled "Dispensational Expositions" in Things to Come and at the same time No.1, Volume I of The Berean Expositor was published. There is nothing very striking about this simple little series, it sought then to minister to the heart's need and that need is as great today if not greater.

January 5th, 1908

"What things soever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them" (Mark xi. 24).

There is such a thing as making one's self believe, and this can produce but "make believe" prayer. There is such a thing as a desire, which as James iv. 2 says receive not. "Ye desire, and have not, ye ask and receive not." True prayer is the outcome of true faith inwrought by the Holy Spirit, Rom. viii. 26 "We know not what we should pray for as we ought, ... but the Spirit Himself maketh intercession for us". "Strength for much has the prayer of a righteous man when it is inworked (by God)." "If I regard iniquity in my heart the Lord will not hear me." "No good thing will He withhold, from those who walk uprightly." "He will fulfil the desires of them that fear Him." True prayer is accompanied by a consistent life, and it is vain to imagine that our desires will be granted if we are not seeking to please the Lord.

Compare and ponder well the parallel verse in I John iii. 21, 22 "Beloved, if our hearts know nothing against us, then have we boldness toward God. And whatsoever we ask we receive of Him because we keep His commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in His sight".

"Fear not, for I have redeemed thee,
I have called thee by thy name" (Isa. xliii. 1).

What gracious assurance is here given to the child of God! Let us notice its basis "I have redeemed thee". Let us pause over this statement. First, our assurance is secure because it depends not upon ourselves but the Lord, "I have". We are not to look for our security, at our goodness, our frames of mind, but look away to Him Who quickeneth the dead, Who chose us in Christ before the foundation of the world. Praise God! He has not left us to the doubtful issues of human strength, but says "Fear not for I have". Secondly, assurance rests upon the finished Work of Christ. Until sin has been dealt with, until the awful debt has been paid and justice satisfied, we have every reason to fear, but when once in infinite mercy the Lord reveals to us the Saviour, the spotless Sin offering, bearing our sins and providing us with righteousness, from that moment we hear the words "Fear not for I have redeemed thee". Thirdly, "I have called thee by thy name". The child of God has here another ground of assurance. He is known individually; he is redeemed as a known sinner; he is called by name. He has no fear of being lost in the mass, for the Lord knows all His sheep. The final note of cheer is "thou art Mine". Redemption has paid the price, Grace has quickened us to life and led us to Christ and now that we belong to Him, surely we have every reason to rejoice and to "Fear not".

(At the end of this year 1908, we had an interview with Dr. Bullinger which brought us into association with The Companion Bible and Things to Come, and led to the witness now known as The Berean Forward Movement. We trust, however, far we have traveled since January 1908, we have traveled "with Him").

One Lord

"Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God is one LORD" (Deut. vi. 4).

No.6. The term "Economy" as applied to the doctrine of the Trinity.

pp. 14 - 19

The Creeds, and the Athanaisan Creed in particular, are the products of controversy, of attempts so to define and safeguard the truth, as to refute error, and preserve the truth intact for all time. In such an atmosphere, there is always the danger of overstatement, of pushing a truth to extremes in the attempt to emphasize its worth, or to safeguard it from corruption. To appreciate the reason for the language employed in the Athanasian Creed, one would need to be acquainted with the heresies of Arians, Macedonians, Apollinarians, Nestorians, Eutychians, Socinians, Sabellians and many others. When we perceive that this was the atmosphere in which the creeds were formed, we can well expect that on many occasions men with the best intentions will be found 'putting out the hand, to stay the ark of God'. In this controversy concerning the Trinity, we shall find that 'The Father' is given the supreme place in the Godhead, that the 'Son' is at one time spoken of as co-eternal with the Father, as other times "derived" from the Father, and this again because of its necessary implications corrected and preserved from its logical consequences by the invention of the phrase 'The eternal generations of the Son'. No wonder Dr. South said, when dealing with this vexed question:

> "The Trinity is a fundamental article of the Christian religion, and he that denieth it may lose his soul, so he who strives to understand it may lose his wits!"

If this is the considered opinion of a theologian, it is evident that something is seriously amiss. We will introduce the inquiry that must next occupy our most earnest and prayerful attention by quoting from 'The orations of Athanasius against the Arians'. And first, a word of explanation may be called for that the term 'Arian' may be understood. Arius, a presbyter of the church of Alexandria in the fourth century, believed that the Son was the first of all created beings, not one with the Father, nor equal to Him, and it was to the confutation of the errors of Arius that the Athanasian creed owes its inception. Dr. Newman says 'I am sure at least that S. Athanasius frequently adduces passages in proof of points of controversy, which no one would see to be proofs, unless apostolic tradition were taken into account, first as suggesting, then as authoritatively ruling this meaning'. This admission by Newman should be borne in mind as we place before the reader some of the arguments used by Athanasius. Further, in order that the reader may not miss the purpose of these quotations, we suggest that the arguments adduced by Athanasius would have been true had John i. 1 been written as follows:

> "In the beginning was the SON, and the Son was with the FATHER and the SON was the FATHER."

This is monstrous, but is the only conclusion that the creed reaches, however it be ringed around with verbal safeguards. Throughout the battle of the creeds, it is assumed by contestants of both sides that 'The Father' is the title of God in His essence and from all Eternity, that before creation, before time, God was 'The Father'. In later times, this has been most dogmatically stressed by such writers as Dr. Cudworth, who died in 1688. He said:

> "The three persons of the Trinity are three distinct spiritual substances, but the Father alone is truly and properly God, that He alone in the proper sense is supreme, and that absolute honour is due to Him only, and that He absolutely speaking, is the only God of the universe, the Son and the Spirit being God, but only by the Father's concurrence with them and their subordination or subjection to Him" (R. Nelson).

Here is the logical consequence of projecting the title 'Father' back to the beginning, making it a title of Essence, instead of one of the assumptions of Ineffable Deity, yet we believe that 999 out of every 1,000 that have recited the Creed, have, and do conjure up in their minds some such Trinity as Dr. Cudworth has so frankly yet so dreadfully admitted. Here are some of the arguments of Athanasius, all marred by the same fatal mistake:

> "Tell us then, you blasphemers, what was it which had a being before the Son had any?"
>
> "He has always been what He is now, the Father of the Son."
>
> "And to the same purpose and effect is that other proposition of yours, 'the Son was not before He was begotten'."
>
> "The Scriptures declare our Saviour to have existed from all eternity in union with the Father."
>
> "The generation of the Son is not like that of a man, which requires an existence after that of the Father, but the Son of God must, as such, have been begotten from all eternity."
>
> "If the Word did not exist from all eternity with the Father, then there was not a trinity from all eternity."
>
> "We detest and abominate the wild blasphemies of the Arians, and we know and confess that the Son existed from everlasting."
> "There is nothing in which the Son is more expressly and evidently the character and image of the Father, than in that absolute and unvariable state of being which He derives from the Father."

Is the writer, or the reader, a blasphemer, when he answers Athanasius' question "What was it which had a beginning before the Son had any?" by quoting the Scripture "In the beginning was the Word" for "The Word was made flesh". He was "The Word" before He became "The Son". Can we not perceive that where the Scriptures speak of the Word, the Form and the Image, Athanasius persists in speaking of the Son? He maintains that the Scriptures declare the Son to have existed from all eternity in union with the Father, but quotes no Scripture in proof. Where he does quote proof texts they speak not of the 'Saviour' nor 'The Son' nor of 'The Father', and inasmuch as the Scripture emphasizes that God is one, his regret that 'then there was not a Trinity from all eternity' may have been actually expressing a sublime and solemn truth!

Bishop Pearson, a recognized authority on the Creed says:

> "That God is the proper and eternal Father of His eternal Son—that in the very name Father there is something of eminence which is not in the Son: and some kind of priority we must ascribe to Him we call the First, in respect of Him we call the Second Person." This priority he says
>
> "Consisteth of this, that the Father hath the essence in Himself, the Son by communication from the Father, from whence He acknowledgeth that He is from Him, that He liveth by Him, that the Father gave Him to have life in Himself."
> "He must be understood to have Godhead communicated to Him by the Father, Who is not only eternally, but originally God."

Had Bishop Pearson confined these comments to the relation that existed between the Father and the Son during that Son's life in the flesh, after He had made Himself of no reputation and had been found in the form of a servant and found in fashion as a man, all would be well, but because the Bishop and the orthodox persist in teaching that the Trinity is eternal, that the essence of the Godhead from all eternity is a Trinity, logical and Scriptural writers descend to such awful statements that "He must be understood to have the GODHEAD communicated to Him by the Father, Who is not only eternally but ORIGINALLY GOD"! How men who endorse the Athanasian Creed can tolerate such terms is beyond understanding. The fatal concept, that the Father is:

> "The fountain of the Godhead, owned > And foremost of the Three",

is categorically denied by the Creed they seek to uphold, which says "In this Trinity none is afore or after other, none is greater, or less than another".

See how men of God, when once they make one fatal mistake, are compelled to make others. Bishop Pearson speaks of 'priority' and 'first' of the Father, but any who know the epistle to the Colossians could quote passages which give these titles to the Son. If we can but see that the Trinity is a mode of the Godhead assumed in time for the purpose of Creation and for Redemption, but that before the world was, before Creation came into being God was essentially ONE, we shall have taken a step nearer to the truth of the great and holy subject. Moses Stuart has this to say on the subject, which is very much to the point:

> "There can be no doubt in the mind of any man who carefully examines, that the Nicene fathers and the Greek commentators, one and all, held that Christ, as to His divine nature was DERIVED from the Father . . . . . Yet we may well ask the question—WE CANNOT HELP ASKING IT, Is then the Son, Who is God over all blessed for ever—is he, in His DIVINE nature, derived and dependent? Has He, as very God an aitia (a cause) and an arche (a beginning)? And is it possible for us to make the idea of true and proper divinity harmonize with that of derivation and consequent dependence? No; it is not . . . . . Their views of the divine nature were built on the metaphysical philosophy of their day; but we are not bound to admit this philosophy as correct; nor is it indeed possible, now, for our minds to admit it."

One writer on the subject has said:

> "The consummation of creation is to consist of the return of the logos from the humanity of Christ to the Father, so that the original Trinity of the Divine nature is after > all held to have been temporarily compromised, and only in the end will it be restored that God may be all in all."

Here the titles "Father" and "Son' are kept in their place as relative terms. Tertullian is said to have introduced the term oikonomia into the answer to the problem, meaning by its use to teach this, that the Trinity is not to be affirmed of God in the Absolute sense, but was assumed by God for the economies and dispensations of Creation and Redemption. Appendix 4 of The Companion Bible has this note "Elohim is God the Son, the living 'WORD' in a Divine form to create" (John i. 1; Col. i. 15-17; Rev. iii. 14); and later, with human form to redeem (John i. 14). Dr. John Kaye, Bishop of Lincoln, said of the attitude of Clement of Alexandria:

> "The whole tenor of the passage proves that Clement ascribed all the attributes of the Godhead to Christ: but when He is spoken of as the Son, with reference to the Father, or as sent forth by the Father to conduct the economy, the relation itself implies a certain subordination or inferiority."
> "Clement then dilates on the impossibility of describing God, or giving him a proper name, 'for whatever has a name must have been generated or begotten' . . . . . Before creation was, He was God, He was good; and on this account He chose to be Creator and Father . . . . . Inasmuch as the cause or beginning of anything is always most difficult to be discovered, God, Who is the Beginning and Cause of existence to all things, can never be described by words. You cannot apply to Him the terms, genus, difference, species, atom, number, accident, subject of accident, whole, part, figure; nor can any name be properly or essentially given Him. When we call Him One, or the Good, or Mind, or the Existent, or Father, or God, or Creator, or Lord, we do not profess to give His name; but through inability to discover more appropriate terms, apply these honourable appellations in order that the thought may have whereon to rest. These appellations do not simply express the Deity, but are collectively indicative of the power of the Almighty. Names are given with reference either to some quality of the thing named, or to the relation to some other thing; but neither of these circumstances is applied to God."

Clement of Alexandria seems to have seen the truth far more clearly than Athanasius whose creed so dominates the mind of many. "Economy, relations, subordination, inferiority". Here in a truer sense he distinguishes "substance" from "person".

Dr. Burton of Oxford wrote: "It will be observed that the sense which the church has attached to the Son of God is strictly literal; by which I mean that she takes the term Son in the same sense which it bears in ordinary language . . . . . Whereas every other hypothesis, not excepting the Arian . . . . . uses the Son in a figurative or metaphorical sense . . . . . What would be said of a philosophical writer who used the relative terms Father and Son, who spoke of the two Beings acting toward each other, loving each other, as human fathers and human sons, and yet expect his readers not to understand these two Beings to be distinct and separate Persons?"

Bishop Burton wrote: "The Father is not the true God without the Son or the Holy Spirit, and therefore to call the Father the true God (John xvii. 3) does not exclude the Son." The reader is reminded that No.5 of this series is devoted to the consideration of the term "The only true God".

In the O.T. we read 'like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him' but the title here is "The Lord" Who is likened to 'a father'. Rotherham's version is nearer to the original and reads:

> "Like the compassion of a father for his children."

If any will quote Psa. lxxxix. 26 "Thou art my father, my God" he should remember that the language is prophetic and actually applies to the future exaltation of Christ "I will make Him My Firstborn, higher than the kings of the earth" (Psa. lxxxix. 27). Nowhere in the O.T. is God revealed as "Father"; there the great Name of God is "Jehovah".

It can be said without risk of denial, that God is not revealed as "Father" until the Word was made flesh and was seen as "The only begotten of the Father" (John i. 14). The two titles Father and Son are relative terms, neither can be true apart from the apart from the other. To speak of 'the eternal generations of the Son' is to misuse language, and rob us of the One Mediator "Himself Man Christ Jesus" (I Tim. ii. 5 R.V. margin). Those who invented the term meant well; they were defending the Deity of Christ, but by their anxiety, they make Him for ever dependent, for ever derived, for ever owing His existence to another, which immediately destroys His essential Deity, and if we use their language, we shall be compelled to adopt the language of Cudworth already quoted and by giving supreme honour to the Father, and by refraining from giving equal honour to the Son, we shall eventually find ourselves condemned by the words of John v. 23:

> "That all men should honour the Son, EVEN AS they honour the Father, He that honoureth not the Son honoureth not the Father which hath sent Him."

If we misuse the word 'person' if we insist that the Trinity is 'essence' and do not perceive that it is 'economical' or 'dispensational', we shall reap the consequences that come from attempting the impossible.

> "Canst thou by searching find out God? canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?" (Job xi. 7).

To us, the mystery of God is resolved in the face of Jesus Christ, and the mystery of godliness is that God was manifest in the flesh, and Ezekiel in the overwhelming and complicated imagery of his opening vision sees at length the resolution of the mystery, saying:

> "Upon the likeness of the throne was the likeness as the appearance of A MAN above upon it" (Ezek. i. 26).

Not only does dispensational truth discover the callings of the redeemed their several spheres of inheritance, the differings ages and their goals, it illuminates the very assumptions of the Invisible God, Who for the purposes of Creation is revealed as Elohim, for the carrying out of the purpose of the ages, is revealed as Jehovah; for the purpose of Redemption is revealed as the Son. Sabellius, Arius and other 'heretics' were desperately wrong in their ultimate conclusions, but how far those other 'heretics' who are now accepted as champions of orthodoxy were responsible, in their wordy battles for pushing others to such extremes, only the Judgment Seat will reveal. Zeal is good, zeal without knowledge is deadly, zeal that becomes a persecuting flame is self destructive.

No.7. To Whom is Creation ascribed in the N.T.?
pp. 31 - 35

> "I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth"
> -- (The Apostles' Creed, Common Prayer).
>
> "There is but one living and true God, everlasting, without body, parts or passions, of infinite power, wisdom and goodness, the Maker and Preserver of all things both visible and invisible. And in unity of this Godhead there be three Persons, of one substance, power and eternity; the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost"
> -- (Article I of the XXXIX articles. Common Prayer).

Those who framed the Book of Common Prayer appear to have entertained consciously or unconsciously the conception of the Godhead which we have already examined in No.6 of this series. Let us proceed with our study and note what the Scriptures say concerning the Creator. The word 'Creator' occurs but three times in the O.T. (Eccles. xii. 1; Isa. xl. 28; xliii. 15) and but twice in the N.T. (Rom. i. 25; I Pet. iv. 19). Isaiah names the Creator as "The everlasting God, the LORD", which Dr. Young translates, literally "The God of the Age, Jehovah". If our contention set out in No.3 of this series be accepted, namely that Jesus Christ, God manifest in the flesh, is the Jehovah of the O.T. Isa. xl. 28 points not to God the Father, but to the Son as the Creator. Isa. xliii. 15 is part of a statement. The speaker is "the LORD your Redeemer". Now the word 'Redeemer' is the "Kinsman Redeemer" (Heb. gaal), so fully set out in the book of Ruth. The self-same word that is used in Isa. xliii. 14 is translated 'near kinsman' in Ruth iii. 9, and is the one Job believed should stand upon the earth in the latter day. Isaiah, who not only wrote by inspiration of God, but was jealous of the glory of the God he served, had no compunction in linking together the name Jehovah, next of kin, Creator and King, every one of which titles belong to the Son of God, and one of them, next of kin, belonging to Him alone. It can never be said that 'God the Father' is our near kinsman, but it is the glory of the gospel that this is the peculiar glory of the Saviour. Rom. i. 25 speaks of the coming in of idolatry, saying that those who so grievously sinned:

> "Changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, Who is blessed for ever. Amen."

Did this passage stand alone, we could not use it to indicate whether the Father or the Son was in the writer's mind, but if we read on we come to Rom. ix., where the Apostle, speaking of the privileges of being an Israelite, says:

> "Of Whom as concerning the flesh Christ came, Who is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen" (Rom. ix. 5).

The Creator is "blessed for ever. Amen". The Son of God is "over all, God blessed for ever. Amen".

Again the reader is turned, not to the Father, but to the Son. The reference in I Pet. iv. 19 links "the faithful Creator" with "God" and so leaves the question of the Father and the Son untouched. Turning to the N.T. for specific teaching concerning the Person of the Creator, we note that the A.V. of Eph. iii. 9 speaks of the mystery 'which had been hid in God Who created all things by Jesus Christ', but the R.V. omits the words 'by Jesus Christ' and this is the unanimous opinion of all textual critics. Whatever we have discovered therefore through the testimony of the O.T. will apply here, namely, the God Who created all things is Jehovah, the Kinsman Redeemer of His people. It is axiomatic, that He Who built ALL THINGS is God (Heb. iii. 4), and we will keep this fact before us as we continue our search. The ascription of praise to Him Who created all things is given by the living ones (wrongly called 'beasts') in Rev. iv. to the One Who sat upon the rainbow circled Throne. To Him the four living ones that had six wings about him, cried "Holy, Holy, Holy, LORD GOD Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come" (Rev. iv. 8). Isaiah saw a vision in the Temple and in it the seraphim, each having six wings, cried "Holy, Holy, Holy, is the LORD of hosts: the whole earth is full of His glory" (Isa. vi. 2, 3) and John says that in this vision, Isaiah said these things "when he saw His glory and spake of Him" (John xii. 41). The other titles in Rev. iv. "Lord God Almighty" and He "which was, and is, and is to come" we must leave for a future consideration, but the reader can find these passages for himself.

Again in Rev. xiv., the terms of 'the everlasting gospel' include the worship of Him that made heaven and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters. Here, no other title is given to the Creator than "God" (Rev. xiv. 7). In Acts xvii. the God that made the world and all things therein, in Whom all live and move and have their being, is the Lord that men should seek "if haply they might feel after Him and find Him" (Acts xvii. 24-28). We must defer an examination of these words until we have compelled our survey of the references to the Creator in the N.T. Up till now the references use the titles "Lord, God and Almighty", without any specific indication as to whether the Father or the Son is directly intended.

We now come to passages where the reference to Christ is specific.

> "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. ALL THINGS were made by Him; and without Him was NOT ANY THING made that was made . . . . . He was in the world, and the WORLD was made by Him, and the world knew Him not" (John i. 1-10).

Here we have explicit, unambiguous, exclusive testimony. The creation of 'all things', the Maker of 'the world' is He Who in the fullness of time was made flesh, and tabernacled among us, Whose glory was:

> "The glory as of the only begotten of the Father" (John i. 14).

> "UNOT THE SON He saith, Thy throne O GOD . . . . . and Thou, LORD, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the works of thine hands . . . . . Thou art the same . . . . . Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and today, and for ever" (Heb. i. 8, 10, 12; xiii. 8).

We know now Who it was that answered Job out of the whirlwind and asked him "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth?" (Job xxxviii. 4); it was Him Who is called "The Word". Now we know that the Psalmist addressed Him Who is 'The Word' when he said:

> "Of old hast thou laid the foundations of the earth: and the heavens are the works of Thy hands. They shall perish, but Thou shalt endure . . . . ." (Psa. cii. 25, 26).

He is addressed by the Psalmist as LORD (Jehovah) verse 1, and "My God" in verse 24, anticipating by centuries the confession of Thomas "My Lord, and My God".

"His dear Son", the One in Whom we have redemption, Who is the Image of the invisible God, the Firstborn of every creature, is the One to whom universal creation is ascribed by Paul in Col. i.:

> "For by Him were ALL THINGS created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers; ALL THINGS were created by Him, and for Him" (Col. i. 16).

At the close of Rev. iv., the six winged worshippers say:

> "Thou hast created ALL THINGS, and for Thy pleasure they are, and were created" (Rev. iv. 11).

We know from these Scriptures that this ascription of glory, honour and power, is directed to Him Who is the Image of the Invisible God, the Word, the One Who is addressed in Heb. i. as "God" and "Lord", Who laid the foundations of the earth, and Whose hands made the heavens. Nothing can be more explicit than the testimony of John i., Heb. i. and Col. i. To believe what these passages teach, makes it impossible for any one at the same time to confess:

> "I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth", for creation is never ascribed to the Father, but always to Him Who in fullness of time became flesh and dwelt among us, the Only begotten Son of God.

We return to Rev. iv., and to Acts xvii. to pick up the threads that were for the time left ungathered. The Creator in Rev. iv. 8 is called "Lord God Almighty". In Rev. xix. 6 we read "Alleluia: for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth" and in Rev. xi. 17 "We give Thee thanks, O Lord God Almighty, Which art, and wast and art to come; because Thou hast taken to Thee Thy great power, and hast reigned". In each passage, identical language is found in the original:

Who is the Lord, God Omnipotent? It is He Who is "King of kings and Lord of lords" (Rev. xix. 16). What is His name, is it known? Yes, and no.

> "He had a name written, that no man knew, but He Himself" yet "His name is called The WORD OF GOD" (Rev. xix. 12, 13).

He Who takes to Himself His great power and reigns is Christ which Rev. xi. follows by saying "Thy wrath is come" (Rev. xi. 18). At that time of judgment, this is declared to be "the wrath of the LAMB" (Rev. vi. 16).

Returning once again to Rev. iv., we noted that the title 'which was, and is, and is to come' is given (Rev. iv. 8). In chapter i. this title is assumed by Christ (Rev. i. 8) and is used again in chapter xi. Here however a somewhat remarkable feature demands attention. All the critical texts, and the Revised Version read "Which art and which wast" omitting the words 'and which art to come' for the glorious reason, He is here seen as having come. The name Jehovah was assumed by the Invisible God as the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, saying, "This is My name unto the age, and this is My memorial unto all generations" (Exod. iii. 15). This is not correctly translated by the title "Eternal" for 'the age' and 'generations' are within the limits of time. The glory of the name Jehovah is that it will be fulfilled, and pass away, even as it is the glory of the office Priest, and at long last, even "The Son also Himself" shall be subject unto Him that did put all things under Him "That GOD", not Elohim, nor Jehovah, nor El Shaddai, nor the Father, nor the Son, nor the Holy Spirit, but GOD in a sense hitherto unrevealed and uncomprehended by man, shall then be all in all! The Son takes back the glory that was His before the world was, the Son ascends the throne of Deity, the Mediatorial kingdom being finished and the purpose of the ages achieved, all the self-limitations and voluntary humiliation which Creation and Redemption imposed being no longer necessary, the day of Redemption being reached, reconciliation being complete, God will then reveal why creation was called into being; why it was necessary for The Image, The Form, The Word to be assumed; why the relation of Father and Son came in with the Gospel; how it is that no name or collection of names can ever set forth the Infinite; how the 'Persons' of the Godhead were assumptions of Deity until seeing through a 'glass darkly' gives place to sight.

In Acts xvii. 27 the Apostle Paul, speaking of the Creator, said "That haply they might feel after Him and find Him". "Feel after Him." This expression uses the Greek word pselaphao "HANDLE Me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see Me have" (Luke xxiv. 39). "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which w have seen with our eyes; which we have looked upon, and our hands have HANDLED, of the Word of Life, for the life was manifested" (I John i. 1, 2). Christ in resurrection, the One Who "In the beginning" created all things, Who "from the beginning" in resurrection was "manifested unto us", was preached by Paul to the philosophers at Athens. They, in the dim light of their philosophy, 'groped' (as the word is translated in the O.T. Isa. lix. 10), but the disciples of the Saviour had actually 'touched' or 'felt' Him (as the first occurrence of the word is translated in Gen. xxvii. 12).

While the Articles of Religion rightly speak of the 'One living and true God, without body, parts or passions', we must not allow this man-made article to rob us of the testimony of the Scriptures, that He Who created heavens and earth, could be 'handled' by those who beheld Him in the flesh. Why should God say "before Me there was no God FORMED, neither shall there be after Me" (Isa. xliii. 10)? This cannot refer exclusively to the making of idols, for millions of 'gods' have been 'formed' since Isaiah uttered these words. Israel were chosen to be "Jehovah's witnesses", were called upon to know and to believe and to understand "that I am He". "I, even I, am the LORD; and beside Me there is no Saviour" (Isa. xliii. 10, 11). These words refer to the Son of God, Who in fullness of time was literally and actually 'formed'. The word translated 'to form', the Hebrews word yatsar is used by Jeremiah of the forming of a child in the womb (Jer. i. 5), even as in Isa. xliv. 24. In the same chapter that contains the word "no God formed", Israel is said to be "formed" (Isa. xliii. 1, 7, 21). These are the Words with which the Holy Ghost teacheth (I Cor. ii. 13). Idolatry is the usurpation of the prerogative of Christ, Who is the Image of the Invisible God (Isa. xliv. 10). Calvin looks upon the words "Before Me there was no God formed" as a kind of irony, but in the self-same chapters that reveal that "The Word" and "The Image of the Invisible God", is the Creator of heaven and earth. We read that "in the BODY OF HIS FLESH" He wrought out our redemption (Col. i. 22), and in the next chapter we are assured that "In Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead BODILY" (ii. 9).

It will, we trust, be evident that Creation is nowhere ascribed to "The Father", but is everywhere to Him, Who being God, became Man; Who is declared to be the Only begotten Son; Who was God manifest in the flesh, Jehovah, He that was, and is, and is to come, the Almighty, the same yesterday, and today, and forever. When the moment comes, which is depicted in Rev. xi., "The mystery of God" shall be finished. What that involves we must consider in a future article.

No.8. The Son of God, The Son of Man.
pp. 54 - 58

We discover from the closing verses of John xx., that the whole of this Gospel, and the purpose which regulated the selection of its material, was directed to one end:

> "That ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and believing ye might have life through His name" (John xx. 31).

Matthew opens his Gospel with the book of the generations of Jesus Christ "The Son of David" (Matt. i. 1), and in Matt. xxii. the Saviour puts the question to the Pharisees:

> "What think ye of Christ? Whose Son is He? They say unto Him, The Son of David.
> He saith unto them, How then doth David in spirit call Him Lord . . . . . If David then call Him Lord, how is He his son?" (Matt. xxii. 42-45).

Here, it is evident that there is more in this title "The Son of God" than may at first appear. Earlier in the Gospel of Matthew a deeper depth is sounded, for the Saviour made it very evident that there was a profounder mystery attached to the Person of the Son, than was attached to the Person of the Father!

> "And no man knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal Him" (Matt. xi. 27).

Again, not only is equal honour to be given to the Father and to the Son, but the solemn words are added:

> "He that honoureth not the Son honoureth not the Father which hath sent Him" (John v. 23), showing that it is impossible to by-pass in any way, either by worship, doctrine or preaching, the peculiar office of the Son of God. This title "Son" is found in a variety of associations.

(1) "The Son" as in Matt. xxviii. 19.
(2) "The Son of God" as in Matt. iv. 3.
(3) "The Son of David" as in Matt. ix. 27.
(4) "The Son of Man" as in Matt. viii. 20.
(5) "The Son of the Highest" as in Luke i. 32.
(6) "My Beloved Son" as in Matt. iii. 1.
(7) "His Only begotten Son" as in John iii. 16.

Here are the seven distributions of the title "Son", the number seven being suggestive.

We must now acquaint ourselves with the way in which the title "The Son of God" occurs, notice the occasions where it is balanced by the title "Son of Man" and also examine carefully the references to the "Begotten" Son. All this is not to be conducted out of mere curiosity; truth, vital truth is at stake, and the Person of the Son is central in the inquiry. The earliest reference to the Son of God is in Luke i. 35. In answer to Mary's problem, the angel Gabriel said:

> "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God."

After this we learn that Mary stayed with Elizabeth for about three months, until the time for the birth of John the Baptist to take place, when she returned to her own house (Luke i. 56). John the Baptist was called "The prophet of the Highest" (Luke i. 76), in contrast with Mary's Son Who should be called "The Son of the Highest". When the days were accomplished (or filled up) that she should be delivered, Mary brought forth her first born Son (Luke ii. 6, 7). While therefore there is a marked difference between John the Baptist and the Saviour, there is no difference in the time and process of their birth. John had a human father, Jesus had no human father, but both had a human mother, and the Child of Mary is called "The Son of God". In all, there are twenty-seven occurrences of the title in the four Gospels, one in the Acts, fifteen in the epistles and one in the book of the Revelation. The way in which "The Son of God" is employed in these references is as follows: acknowledged by Satan and those possessed of Devils; taunted with the title at the crucifixion; acknowledged by the disciples and by the centurion; adjured by the High Priest to answer whether he were the Son of God. In John's Gospel He was acknowledged by the Father at His baptism, by Nathanael, by the man born blind, by Martha, and charged with blasphemy for claiming to be the Son of God. He affirmed that the dead will hear His voice and live, and that He would be glorified in the case of Lazarus and He is the object of faith unto everlasting life. Romans has but one reference to the Son of God and six to The Son:

> "Concerning His Son Jesus Christ our Lord, which was made of the seed of David according to the flesh, and declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead" (i. 3, 4).

Ephesians has but one reference, where the 'knowledge' or the 'acknowledgment' of the Son of God lies at the heart of the Unity of the Faith (Eph. iv. 13). The first epistle of John has a number of references to the Son of God, which reach their climax in I John v. 20:

> "We know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding, that we may know Him that is true, and we are in him that is true, even in His Son Jesus Christ. This ('The same' as in John i. 2) is the true God, and eternal life" (see also I John i. 1, 2).

To Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, the promise was made:

> "Thy wife Elizabeth shall bear thee a son, and thou shalt call his name John" (Luke i. 13).

To Mary, the mother of the Saviour, the promise was made:

> "And, behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and shall bring forth a Son, and shalt call His name Jesus" (Luke i. 31).

Concerning John, the angel said:

> "He shall be great in the sight of the Lord", and Zacharias prophesied and said:

> "And thou, child, shalt be called the prophet of the Highest" (Luke i. 15, 76).

Concerning the Saviour, the angel said:

> "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest: and the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David" (Luke i. 32).

Apart from the miraculous conception of the virgin mother, and the high glory of the Son to whom she gave birth, there is no warrant for taking the 'begetting' of the Son of God back into eternity. His sonship belongs to time, and is related to His coming in the flesh. The title "The Only Begotten" is the translation of the Greek word monogenes, which occurs nine times in the N.T. Four of these occurrences refer to the children of ordinary human parents:

> "Behold, there was a dead man carried out, the only (monogenes) son of his mother" (Luke vii. 12).
>
> "Jairus . . . . . had one only (monogenes) daughter, about twelve years of age, and she lay a dying" (Luke viii. 42).
>
> "Master, I beseech thee, look upon my son: for he is mine only child (monogenes)" (Luke ix. 38).
> "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac: and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten son (monogenes)" (Heb. xi. 17).

In each of these instances, a parent's heart is wrung by the death, sickness, affliction or the commanded sacrifice of an 'only begotten' as though it would prepare us to discover in the title, a term of intense endearment, a term that points forward to a sacrificial death, but which in each case ended triumphantly in an anticipation of the resurrection. The five remaining passages all refer to Christ. The R.V. margin at John i. 18 tells us that many ancient authorities read God only begotten instead of 'only begotten Son', and there is a great deal of authority for this extraordinary reading. For the moment therefore we will omit John i. 18 from our list of occurrences, and observe that of the remaining four, three are found in the Gospel according to John, and one in his first epistle. No other writer in the N.T. speaks of Christ as the only begotten Son. If therefore we can see what these passages say of the Only begotten Son of God, we shall know all that God has revealed on the subject.

> "And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us (and we beheld His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father), full of grace and truth" (John i. 14).
> "For God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him, should not perish, but have everlasting life" (John iii. 16).
>
> "He that believeth on Him is not condemned: but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believe in the name of the only begotten Son of God" (John iii. 18).
> "In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent His only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through Him" (I John iv. 9).

It will be seen that of these passages, only one, namely the first, makes any statement as to the nature of the only begotten Son of God; the others tell of the love that gave Him and the life that is given to those that believe in Him.

The Word, Who was God, and yet could be with God, in fullness of time "was made flesh", and this is so vital a doctrine that John says:

> "Every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God: and every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God" (I John iv. 2, 3).

The emphasis which the Scriptures place upon the fact that the Word became flesh, that He was of the seed of David according to the flesh, that as concerning the flesh, Christ came of Israel, that it was in the body of His flesh through death that He accomplished reconciliation is of itself a testimony concerning the meaning and intention of the title "The only Begotten Son" yet this is by no means all. Over against the title "The Son of God" we must place the ever recurring title "The Son of Man", and the simple reference to the Saviour as a "Man", and until we do, we shall not have before us the Scriptural picture of the Son of God. The title "The Son of Man" occurs in the N.T. 88 times. The first occurrence is in Matt. viii. 20 where the Saviour uses the title of Himself and of His great humility, not having where to lay His head. The last occurrence in Matthew is where the Saviour claims the prophecy of Daniel to be of Himself and of His Second Coming:

> "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven" (Matt. xxvi. 64).

The last reference in the N.T. is in Rev. xiv. 14, where He Who once had no place to lay His head, is now seen 'having on His head a golden crown'. The vision of the Son of Man, given in Rev. i. 13-18, was of One Who was dead, but Who is alive for evermore, and has the keys of hell and of death. Every reference to Christ as the Son of Man in the N.T. goes back to the great prophetic use of the title in Psa. viii. There by comparison with I Cor. xv. 23-28, Heb. ii. 5-9 and Eph. i. 22, 23, we see the Lord as the second Man and the last Adam, with 'all things under His feet', the Head of the universe. The two titles "The Son of God" and "The Son of Man" are complementary. Neither can be held apart from the other. Both belong to the One Person "The Only Begotten of the Father". Though He called Himself the Son of Man (Matt. viii. 20), the devils addressed Him as the Son of God in the same chapter (Matt. viii. 29). When He challenged His disciples, saying,

> "Whom do men say that I the Son of Man am?"

Peter declared, by the revelation of the Father:

> "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God" (Matt. xvi. 13, 16).

When Nathanael confessed "Rabbi, Thou art the Son of God", the Saviour told him that he would see greater things than this, and said "Hereafter ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man" (John i. 49, 51). Throughout the record, He Who is the Son of Man is the Son of God. There are one or two passages in the N.T. which speak of the relationship of the Son with the Father 'before the world was' which obviously must refer to pre-incarnation times, and these are important enough to demand a study to themselves. For the moment we stay to acknowledge that the Son of God is the Son of Man, one blessed and glorious Person.

No.9. A review of some problematic passages.
pp. 72 - 76

> "What and if ye shall see the Son of Man ascend up where He was before" (John vi. 62).
> "And now, O Father, glorify Thou Me with Thine own self with the glory which I had with Thee, before the world was" (John xvii. 5).
> "For Thou lovedst Me before the foundation of the world" (John xvii. 24).

From these wondrous words, we learn that both the Father and the Son, were together and shared a glory before the world was, and before the foundation of the world. In I Pet. i. and in Eph. i. we can read that Christ was foreordained, before the foundation of the world, to be the Lamb, and that the believer to whom Ephesians was addressed was chosen in Him, i.e. Christ, before the foundation of the world.

Let us look at John vi. 62. The title the Son of Man is definitely related to 'the flesh'; not only is this generally true, but is specifically indicated in John vi. 53. At the Ascension, the Saviour ascended up far above all heavens, and sat down at the right hand of God. Does John vi. 62 teach that the Son of Man, as the Son of Man, i.e. as the One Who took part of flesh and blood like unto the children for whom He died, occupied that place in glory before the world was? No Scripture can be found to support such an idea, and no system of teaching, however crazy, has ever maintained the contradictory doctrine, that before the Incarnation, before the Son of God was born and became "The Man Christ Jesus" that He, as the Man of flesh and blood, was there in the glory before time began. It was the Son of Man Who was speaking, and He was speaking of Himself, but John tells us that in the beginning, when He was with God, He was the Logos, the Word, not the Son. When He made all things, Ha had life in Himself, and before the Word became flesh, He had this place of glory, and to this He was yet to ascend.

There is an inscription in a public building in Glasgow which informs the reader that King Edward VII laid the foundation stone in a certain year. If the reader took the trouble he would discover that in the year named, Queen Victoria still lived and reigned, and Edward VII was, at that date, when he laid that foundation stone the 'Prince of Wales', but seeing that the building was not completed until after Victoria had died, and the Prince of Wales had become King, no one who knew the facts would have any difficulty. He who was at the time Prince of Wales, had become at the time of the announcement, King, so He Who at the time was "The Word", "The Image", "The Form of God" was, at the time when He uttered the words of John vi. 53 "The Son of Man". The title "Christ" means "The Anointed" or "The Messiah".

> "God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power" (Acts x. 38).
> "The Spirit of the Lord is upon Me, because He hath anointed Me to preach the gospel" (Luke iv. 18).
> "Thy holy child Jesus, whom Thou hast anointed" (Acts iv. 27).

John's gospel focuses the faith of the believer on the fact that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and Mathew tells us that Jesus Christ is the Son of David and the Son of Abraham, Who was born of Mary, named Jesus, and is called Christ (Matt. i. 1, 16). John who so stressed the need for faith in the fact that "Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God" is the one who records the explanation that "The Messiah", being interpreted is "The Christ" (John i. 41). Herod ask "where Christ should be born" (Matt. ii. 4); the Saviour Himself, while forcing the Pharisees to acknowledge that He was "The Lord", readily granted that He was "The son of David" (Matt. xxii. 41-46). "Ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's" said the Apostle (I Cor. iii. 23). Christ died for our sins, Christ was raised from the dead, Christ is coming again. When, therefore, the Apostle reveals that some were chosen in Him, that is in Christ, before the foundation of the world, it means that He Who at that time was "The Word" and "The Image of the Invisible God", was the blessed One who was yet to lay aside His glory and be made in the likeness of men, just as we have already seen that while He was the Son of Man when He uttered the words of John vi. 53, He had not become a partaker of flesh and blood at the time spoken of as before the world was, and the place where He was before.

Notice the change of terms in John i. 1-18. As the WORD He was with GOD; as the only begotten SON, He is in the bosom of the FATHER. In the Divine counsels, God was to be manifested in the flesh (I Tim. iii. 16), to come into this world a Man, and be the Only begotten Son of God. As a consequence of the Mediatorial work for which this mighty miracle of Divine condescension was planned, many who were sinners and undone, would find themselves by redemption sons of God. God therefore was potentially the Father before the foundation of the world, even as Christ was verily foreordained from before the foundation of the world.

Another passage of Scripture calls for attention. The Apostle writing to the Corinthians concerning the vexed question about eating things offered to idols says:

> "As concerning therefore the eating of those things that are offered in sacrifice unto idols, we know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is none other God but one. For though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth (as there be gods many, and lords many) But to us there is but one God, the Father . . . . . and one Lord Jesus Christ . . . . ." (I Cor. viii. 4, 5).

To Paul, the title "The one Lord" would mean none but Jehovah, and this has been made plain in the second article of this series. He is opposing the 'gods many' by the One God the Father, and the 'lords many' by the One Lord Jesus Christ. If we attempt, as some have done to teach that the Father alone is God, to the exclusion from that title of the one Lord, we shall in the very act destroy the very God we seek to serve. Of the Father, Paul says "Of (ek) Whom are all things, and we for (eis) Him", and of the Lord "Through (dia) Whom are all things, and we through (dia) Him". If these statements are kept apart, then God has originated the great purpose of the ages, but has never implemented it, and on the other hand the Lord has mediated this purpose but never planned it. Yet this division is contradicted by such passages as Rom. xi. 36, which does not speak of God as the Father, or of the Lord, as Jesus Christ but indiscriminately says:

> "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of GOD . . . . . For who hath known the mind of the LORD . . . . . For of (ek) HIM (Whom? God or the Lord?)

> and through (dia) HIM, and to or for (eis) HIM, are all things, to WHOM (Who, God or Lord?) be glory unto the ages. Amen" (Rom. xi. 33-36).

This doxology, being written after I Cor. viii., sufficiently disposes of any attempt to see in the language of the Apostle an intended distinction in essence between the one God Who is the Father, and the one Lord Who is Jesus Christ, but rather the distribution of function which is in perfect harmony with the economical and dispensational limitation of the Trinity, and the mediatorial office of the Son.

In an earlier study we alluded to the reading of John i. 18 "The only begotten God". The change from "Son" to "God" in the original form of writing is but the change of one letter. This reading is elaborately set forth by Tregelles, and he thinks it such that Arius, though 'opposed to the dogma taught', upholds the reading monogenes theos 'Only begotten God'. With this reading of John i. 18 we must align that of Isa. xliii. 10:

> "Before Me there was no God formed, neither shall there be after Me."

Before the Incarnation was "The Word", "The Image of the invisible God", "The Form of God"; at the Incarnation when the Word was made flesh, He became "The only begotten God" or "God manifest in the flesh". There is practical unanimity among textual critics that the words of I John v. 7, 8 "In heaven, the Father, the Word and the Holy Ghost and these three are one, and there are three that bear witness on earth", should be omitted though Bishop Middleton and Gaussen in his Theopneustia were in favour of the retention. We will let their reasons be heard even though we may not agree with their conclusions. Bishop Middleton's main contention is that if we omit the words of verse 7, then the presence of the article at the close of verse 8 is inexplicable. The original reads eis to hen.

> "If the seventh verse had not been spurious, nothing could have been plainer than to hen of verse 8, referred to hen (one) of verse 7: as the case now stands I do not perceive the force or meaning of the article."

Bishop Middleton then devotes several pages in establishing his contention that the closing words of verse 8 are ungrammatical and without precedent IF verse 7 be removed. Gaussen draws attention to another grammatical difficulty. The word 'three' in the Greek is masculine, while the words spirit, water and blood to which it relates, are all neuter. If the seventh verse remains, this could be explained by what is called 'attraction' but it becomes inexplicable when we deprive it of the contested words.

Middleton concludes by saying:

> "I am not ignorant, that in the rejection of the controverted passage, learned and good men are now, for the most part, agreed . . . . . the objection, however, which has given rise to this discussion, I could not consistently with my plan suppress."

The rejected passage reads:

> "In heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one. And there are three that bear witness in earth."

The most convincing argument seems to be the strange silence on the part of those who took part in the early controversies of the church. It seems unaccountable that those who defended the doctrine of the Trinity should quote so many passages of Scripture, and yet omit this one. Truth needs no bolster.

No.10. Not a "Creed" but "This is the sum" (Heb. viii. 11).
pp. 93 - 100

While we dare not attempt to formulate a creed, we do exercise the private right of attempting to sum up what we have discovered. Regarding a creed or the Athanaisan Creed in particular, the following analytical summary of the contents of a book entitled The Creed and the Church by H.H.A.S. seems worth reprinting here.

OBJECT STATED:

Not to challenge the main doctrines of the creed.

(1) In the present crisis of the church it is important to remove whatever unnecessarily:
  (a) Gives offence to friends.
  (b) Gives a handle to foes.
(2) But no real bulwark of the faith should be touched.
(3) The Athanasian Creed does:
  (a) Gives offence to friends.
  (b) Gives a handle to foes.
(4) Therefore if it is not an essential bulwark of the faith it should be removed.

That it is not even a legitimate, therefore cannot be a necessary bulwark of the faith, proved by the two following propositions:

PROPOSITION I:

It is not a right which pertains either to any man or to any body of men acting collectively, to construct a religious creed out of materials asserted to be (or really) Scriptural, and then to hold out a threat of eternal perdition to those of their fellowmen who cannot conscientiously accept that creed.

(1) Man has no right to impose a creed which he has constructed on his fellow men, because he has:
  (a) No Divine sanction.
  (b) No Scriptural precedent.
    (i) In the O.T.
    (ii) In the N.T.
      The Apostles' creed, not a Scriptural precedent; because:
        (1) Not composed by the apostles.

(2) Not a creed imposed, but a creed professed.
(3) Not in the canon of Scripture.

(2) Man has no power to make such a creed, as he cannot distinguish between abstract truths and vital truths.
   (a) All truth is Divine, because all truth is of God: but
   (b) There are may things that are true, the belief of which is not necessary to salvation, instances
   (c) In Nature.
   (d) In Revelation. Of truths not vital.
   (e) In Mathematics.

(3) It is God's sole prerogative to curse. Therefore a fortiori man has no right to hold out a threat of eternal perdition to those who will not accept that which he had neither the right, nor the power to construct.

PROPOSITION II:

Supposing such a right to exist in certain cases, the Athanasian Creed from the circumstances of its origin and from its intrinsic character does not possess such a right.

(1) Circumstances of its origin.
   (a) Not composed until five centuries after the closing of the canon of Scripture.
   (b) The outcome of bitter religious feud.
   (c) Appearing at the commencement of the dark ages.
   (d) In an age when mysticism had almost supplanted the true faith.

Hence from the circumstances of its origin it deserves no special exception in its favour.

(2) Its intrinsic value.
   (a) Bears marks of its origin in the bitterness of its spirit.
   (b) Demands implicit faith in its own explanation of the doctrine it treats of.
   (c) The abstract idea of a Trinity in Unity involves no absurdity or paradox.
   (d) Illustrations of a Trinity in Unity.
      (i) In Nature—man, with body, soul, spirit.
      (ii) In Art—a triangle.
      (iii) In human affairs—a firm with three partners.

It is not suggested by these illustrations that the Trinity in the Godhead can be illustrated by an appeal to nature; what the compiler of this summary intends is, that in the realm of human experience, such trinities are everywhere accepted. Man is body, soul and spirit. Time is past, present and future. Place is length, breadth and height. One human being can be son, father and husband, with correspondingly different responsibilities. He who most stoutly criticizes the doctrine of the Trinity, continually says "I" when he refers to his body, or to his mind. When he says that something 'hurts me' what or who does 'me' involve?

Summarizing some of our findings we first of all quote from two scholars:

(1) "It is not GOD Himself, but the knowledge He has revealed to us concerning Himself which constitutes the material for theological investigation" (Dr. Kuyher).

(2) "The whole mystery (of the Trinity) is raised by our bringing them together, and attempting to reconcile . . . . . The Scripture delivers certain separate propositions, and thus it leaves them" (Dr. Chalmers).

(3) Many 'heresies' may be traced to the misuse or misunderstanding of the word 'person'.

(4) The titles 'Father' and 'Son' are relative. The title "The Only begotten Son" must be taken to mean just exactly what the words imply.

(5) Those who transfer the title 'The Father' from time and make it the title of the Infinite and Unconditional, are forced by their very error, to perpetuate even greater errors, by maintaining that the Father is 'the proper God'; 'Eternally and originally God', destroying by so saying the very quality of the Son that they seek to establish.

(6) The Trinity is economical i.e. not essential. It describes the assumed relations of God for the purpose of Creation and Redemption (The Son, The Man), (The Word, The Image).

(7) All the revealed titles of God are facets of the Godhead assumed like the name Jehovah "for the age" and "unto all generations", but like the name Jehovah itself, to be so blessedly fulfilled as to be actually so partly quoted as we have seen in Rev. xi. 17, the third part of the title 'art to come' being swallowed up in the actual Coming. In like manner will all other titles be 'fulfilled'.

(8) Instead of the expression 'The eternal generations of the Son' fortifying His Deity, it robs Him. If this teaching be true, for then the Father must for ever have precedence over the Son, and the actual begetting, and consequently the glorious reality of His Manhood in the fullness of time is imperilled. Such a statement substitutes mysticism and metaphysics for the sober words of Revelation.

(9) God Who in times past spake to the fathers by the prophets at the Incarnation of the Saviour, spoke to us "In Son". Not "by His Son", not "In His Son" but en huioi "in Son", even as in days of old we read:

"I appeared unto Abraham" . . . B'el Shaddai "in God Almighty" (Exod. vi. 3).

(10) We are compelled to believe, by the usage of the title in both Old and New Testaments, that the "one Lord" of the N.T. is the Jehovah of the O.T. We can and confess with Thomas, that the Saviour we have believed is "God" and "Lord".

(11) We await the consummation of the ages, when not only shall the name Jehovah be fulfilled, but at long last the "Son" Himself shall be subject unto the "Father", that GOD (not the Father, not the Son, nor the Holy Ghost) but "that GOD", as never before, "may be all in all" (I Cor. xv. 28). We gladly acknowledge the "Mystery of God in Christ" (Col. ii. 2).

On several occasions, in this series, we have placed the word heresy within quotation marks, "heresy", for what is heresy to the orthodox at one time, may not be heresy at another. A disinterested reader can see a number of incipient heresies in the language employed by Athanaias in his Apologies and Controversies, and we remember that the Apostle Paul said:

"The way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my father" (Acts xxiv. 14).

Many of the heretical opinions which eventually led to the formulation of the Creeds, arose from the fact that many of the early Christians brought a great deal of ancient philosophy with them into the church and into its teaching.

Tertullian said:

> "The heathen poets and philosophers stole many of their notions from the Holy Scriptures" and then, because these men were unregenerate, the spiritual meaning of much which they took escaped them, and the consequent distortion of teaching followed.
>
> "If they found anything in our divine digests which hit their fancies, or might serve their hypothesis, they took it and turned it and bent it to a compliance with their own curiosity."
>
> "Having dipped into the Holy Scripture, and found there is no God but one, they presently divided into various speculations about the Divine nature."

Some thirty or more heretics are known by name, who arose during the first five centuries of Christianity and put forward a mixture of Scripture phraseology and metaphysical speculation concerning the Trinity which persists to this day, by reason of the incorporation of the Creeds into Church Service. When these heresies are examined, it will be found that many of them are concerned with the problem of the persons of the Father and the Son, and the argument is further be-clouded by the continual assumption that when we intend God in Absolute and Unconditional Infinity, we must refer to Him as "The Father".

Arius, who gives his name to the 'heresy' called Arianism, endeavoured to substitute rational ideas about the Trinity in place of the mysticism that surrounded the subject. When he raised the question of the 'external existence of the Son' if only someone could have done for him as Priscilla and Aquila did for Apollos, and have made him to see the Word of God more perfectly; if only someone had pointed out that where Arius and his opponents used the title 'Son' the Scriptures used the title 'Word', Arianism may never have seen the light of day, and the mysticism against which Arius raised his voice may not have dominated the thought of centuries.

Another sect were called the Monarchians. The name is derived from monos 'alone' and archo 'to govern'. The Monarchians exhibited a praiseworthy zeal in endeavouring to preserve the unity of the consciousness of God, but as they denied any other divine Being than "The Father", they eventually rejected and misunderstood the Scriptural teaching concerning the Logos, and so would give a hesitating approval of the teaching of such a passage as Phil. ii. 10, 11. In their view every knee could only bow to the Father, Who in their estimate, was God alone.

Again Sabellius taught that the Father, Son and Holy Ghost are only manifestations of the same Person. Had he maintained that the Trinity was the manifestation of one God, he might have led the church into fuller light. As it was he so confused the Father and the Son, and further confused the One God with the word "Person" that he ultimately taught that it was the Father that suffered for sin! How many heresies developed because one side sought to defeat the other in controversy, instead of sympathetically seeking to sift the chaff from the wheat in both sets of argument, only the Judgment Seat of Christ will reveal.

Let us note two benedictions from Scripture, both of which are cast in the triple form.

The triple Benediction of the O.T.

> "The Lord bless thee, and keep thee;
> The Lord make His face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee;
> The Lord lift up His countenance upon thee, and give thee peace" (Numb. vi. 24-26).

The triple Benediction of the N.T.

> "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and
> The love of God, and
> The communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all, Amen" (II Cor. xiii. 14).

To which may be added the triple baptismal formula:

> "In the name of the Father,
> And of the Son,
> And of the Holy Ghost" (Matt. xviii. 19).

And the triple ascription of praise given by the Seraphim as they cover their faces and feet:

> "Holy, Holy, Holy, is the Lord of Hosts" (Isa. vi. 3).

If the 'Jesus' of the N.T. be the 'Jehovah' of the O.T., then of necessity the other attributes and offices which particularly inhere in the Person of the Son of God cannot be removed, and should not be divorced from the Lord of the O.T., the God of Israel. While it is most certainly true that in the fullness of time He was born of a woman, and it is most certainly true that the Jehovah of the O.T. is the Creator as well as the Redeemer of Israel, these apparently contradictory attributes are reconciled in the "Mystery of Godliness" where God was manifest in the flesh.

> "Out of extreme (but mistaken) reverence for the ineffable Name 'Jehovah' the ancient custodians of the Sacred Text substituted in many places 'Adonai'. These in the A.V. and R.V are all printed 'Lord'. In all these places we have printed it 'LORD' marking the word with an asterisk in addition to the note in the margin, to inform the reader of the fact" (The Companion Bible, Appendix 32).

The Massorah contains 134 references where the name 'Jehovah' is altered to 'Adonai'. In some of these places the reason for this alteration is not obvious, but in the majority one can perceive a sensitiveness for the name of God, a desire to protect Him from anything that would approach familiarity or use terms that are far too human to be safely allowed in the sacred Scriptures of the Hebrews. "Extreme but mistaken reverence" may put out its hand 'to stay the ark of God' with disastrous consequences.

The first of the emendations occurs in Gen. xviii. 3 where Abraham actually said 'My Lord', using the name 'Jehovah'. In ten or eleven passages, the Sopherim have altered 'My Jehovah' to 'My Adonai' evidently fearing to allow this approach to the Most High God to become current. In Gen. xviii. 32 we have another illustration of their sensitiveness for the honour of His name, which led them not to scruple at altering the inspired words of Holy Writ. The A.V. reads 'but Abraham stood yet before the LORD', whereas the primitive text contains the astounding statement 'JEHOVAH stood yet before Abraham"! But what continents of condescending truth they sacrifice in their mistaken zeal. The attitude both of Israel and the Christian to the name Jehovah is so to magnify the "Eternal" (the translation adopted by the French), the Ineffable and the Unspeakable (the attitude of Israel), as to make any link with humanity sound like sacrilege, yet if Jesus Christ be at the same time the "One LORD" of the O.T., and if He be at the same time the Son of Man and the Seed of the woman, we adopt the emendations of the Sopherim to our hurt.

We must remember that He Who was, and is, and is to come, and Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and today, and for ever, is one and the same Person. In the Form of Sound Words we quoted Dr. Duncan H. Weir on the usage of the name Jehovah where he says "He (i.e. the Hebrew) says again and again my GOD, but never my JEHOVAH, for when he says my God he means Jehovah". This comment while it is true of the Hebrews attitude, is not true as a statement of fact, for the Scriptures do, as we have seen, use the expression "My LORD" from Abraham, throughout the N.T. until we reach the climax confession of Thomas "My Lord and my God" in a context where the "Lord" Who stood before him, could speak of the nail prints in His hands and the spear wound in His side, a Jehovah that eyes could see, and hands handle, a very different Person from that of tradition, a veiled inscrutable Being, Whose name was even almost sacrilege to utter. The conflict at the Exodus of Israel was not only between man and man, with a slave-owning king, and the king of Israel. It was between a 'god' and GOD, for the Pharaoh who sat on the throne of Egypt and said 'I know not the LORD' was himself styled the Son of Isis, Horus sun-god of Egypt, and it was 'against all the gods of Egypt' that the Lord said He would execute judgment (Exod. xii. 12). The plagues that fell on that devoted land may seem strange to us, living at this distance in place and time, but they touched Egypt's gods at every turn. The River Nile was an object of worship 'under various names and symbols as Hapi i.e. Apis the sacred bull, and living representative of Osiris' (Canon Cooke). A hymn addressed to the Nile as a god, contains the lines:

> "Great Lord of provisions: Creator of all things > Lord of terrors and of choicest joys."

In the Tel-el Armarna tablets, a governor writes to the Pharaoh of the time saying 'At the feet of my lord, my sun-god, I prostrate myself seven times and seven times'. The usurpation of the titles and prerogatives of the Lord, concentrates particularly upon the primeval promise of Gen. iii. 15 for we shall see in a moment, that a goddess with her son challenges the claims of Jehovah Himself. It is possible that the reader of Gen. iii. 15 and its promise to the woman of a Seed that should bruise the serpent's head, would not necessarily think immediately of "Jehovah", but it is evident from Gen. iv. 1 that Eve did. At the birth of Cain, Even said:

> "I have gotten a man, EVEN JEHOVAH" Ish eth Jehovah.

It is gratuitous to assume that Eve was utterly mistaken or that she had no warrant for her assumptions, we know nothing of what she believed or had revealed to her apart from what is recorded. If Eve spoke entirely without revelation or warrant, how does it come about that she used the name Jehovah? And even though we conclude that Moses, writing later and after the revelation of the Divine Name in Exod. iii., inserted the name Jehovah in the place of the term actually employed by Eve, it amounts to much the same thing—the Person who bears the name of Jehovah, and the Seed of the woman are not so distinct as the orthodox conception would lead us to suppose. Cain was not the promised seed, but that is because from the beginning of the ages Satan has counterfeited every move, and often gets in first. "The second time" is the time note attached to the promises of God, evil being permitted to do its worst first of all.

We have seen that Pharaoh was Horus, the sun-god, born of Isis. Let us consider this a little more closely. Isis is a goddess, a female among the gods, and one who is said to be the mother of Horus, the sun-god, who claims prerogatives that challenge the essential meaning of the name Jehovah, and whose motherhood usurps the promise made to Eve, and, as it was at the birth of Cain, diverts it to the evil line instead. This usurpation likewise is enshrined in one of the myths of Isis. To Apuleius a philosopher, Isis is supposed to have revealed herself saying:

> "I am nature, the parent of all things, mistress of all elements, the beginning of the ages, Sovereign of the Gods, Queen of the manes (shades of the departed), the first of heavenly beings."

The instructed reader will have no difficulty in seeing in this series of claims, so many challenges to the prerogatives of the Son of God.

"The parent of all things"	"One Lord Jesus Christ by Whom are all things."
"Mistress of all elements"	"Even the winds and the sea obey Him."
"The beginning of the Ages"	"The everlasting Father"—literally "The Father of the Ages." "The Beginning of the creation of God."
"Sovereign of the Gods"	"Lord of lords, and Kings of kings."
"Queen of the manes"	"Lord both of the dead and of living."
"The first of heavenly beings"	"That in all things He might have the pre-eminence."

Not only is this usurpation most evident, but the Egyptian myths contain a lengthy plot, in which Isis schemes how she can become "The EQUAL of Ra, in the heavens, and the earth, and become mistress of the world". The specific claim of Isis that places her over against Jehovah is the following:

> "I am all that HAS BEEN or that IS, or that SHALL BE."

This being the claim of Isis in Egypt, makes the revelation of the Divine Name to Moses in Egypt all the more pointed. Further, Isis declared "No mortal has removed my veil" and the child which she brought forth, Horus, the sun-god, was born on DECEMBER 25th! and so has imposed upon Christian credulity ever since. It is therefore clear that Jehovah and the Seed of the woman are linked together both in the Divine Plan and in the Satanic attack. When a Christian sees the letters I.H.S. today, he is led to believe that they are either the first Greek letters of the names "Jesus" or that they stand for the Latin Iesus Hominum Salvator "Jesus the Saviour of Men". An Egyptian however, or a worshipper of Isis in Rome or elsewhere would have understood these letters to represent the Egyptian Trinity Isis, Horus, Seb. The title "I AM THAT I AM, JEHOVAH God of your fathers" given to Moses in Exod. iii., and the title "He Who was, He Who is, and He Who is to come" given to John in the Apocalypse are the image of the true, of which the claims of Isis are Satanic counterfeits.

We write this as an appendix to our study of the "ONE LORD". We need to be aware of the evil seed and the line of attack adopted by the enemy, but we need also to beware of being side-tracked from the pursuit of positive truth. Consequently we leave to every reader the responsibility of choosing how far he should prosecute his investigations into the myths and legends of ancient Egypt; we, in the prosecution of the stewardship entrusted to us, while 'warning every man' where necessary, must pursue the positive teaching of all Scripture that focuses our wondering attention on the One Lord, God manifest in the flesh, the Lord Jesus Christ, or our faith, our love and our hope.

The One Mediator

No.1. The spirit of Mediation (I Tim. ii. 1 - 6).

pp. 128 - 132

In the series of articles entitled The Sign of the Times which have appeared in Volume XXXV of the Berean Expositor, we gave reasons for believing that the essence of the apostasy that is spoken of in I Tim. iv. 1, 2, was the departure from the great central doctrine of the Mediation of Christ. That doctrine is implicit in the early use of the word "demon" ('devils' in A.V.), and in the juxtaposition of the mystery of godliness of iii. 16 with the beginnings of the mystery of iniquity discoverable in the apostasy of I Tim. iv. 1, 2. The subject is so vital, so central, so basic, and the way in which it is being ignored or denied on all hands more than justifies any attempt on the part of those who know and believe the truth to witness to this glorious and essential doctrine of the Christian faith.

We propose therefore taking I Tim. ii. 5, 6 as the "text" for the present series.

> "For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; Who gave Himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time" (I Tim. ii. 5, 6).

It is clear that this great passage stands in logical sequence to what has gone before, namely verses 1-4; but verse one is connected with the preceding chapter by the conjunction "therefore". We are driven back to chapter i. 18 "This charge I commit unto thee", for the commencement of the Apostle's argument. Verse 18, however, picks up the exhortation with which the epistle opens in ch. i. 13, for the words "Thou mightest charge" translate parangello, and "This charge" translates parangelia, which word is also found in verse 5 where it is rendered 'commandment'. If we credit the Apostle with but ordinary reasoning faculties, w shall be obliged to attend to this sequence of thought; and if we moreover believe that this epistle forms a part of inspired Scripture, it will be our delight thus to recognize the links in the Divine chain. His opening theme is, according to the Revised Text, 'a dispensation of God', which is put over against 'fables and endless genealogies'. The end of this 'charge' is love, and is a sacred trust (verse 11). Timothy is especially exhorted to see to it that the conduct of those who gather to worship in the church shall be in harmony with their calling (I Tim. ii. 1-15), as also he was to see to it that those who sought and exercised the office of either bishop or deacon should be worthy, and Paul concludes this part of the epistle with the words:

> "These things write I unto thee, hoping to come unto thee shortly: but if I tarry long, that thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God" (I Tim. iii. 14, 15).

Coming closer to the passage which forms the basis of this series, we commence a more careful examination at verse one of the second chapter:

> "I exhort therefore, that first of all supplications, prayer, intercessions, and giving of thanks be made for all men. For kings . . . . ."

The translation of parakaleo by 'exhort' is supported by no less than 22 references in the A.V., but over against this we find 'beseech' 43 times, 'comfort' 23 times, beside 'desire', 'entreat' and 'pray', and to the English ear, the word 'exhort' sometimes conveys a harsher sense than the original intends.

Crabb says:

> "Exhortation has more of impelling in it: persuasion more of drawing; a superior exhorts . . . . . a friend and an equal persuades."

Parakaleo the word in question is found four times in I Timothy, "I besought thee"; "I exhort therefore"; "intreat him as a father"; "teach and exhort" (I Tim. i. 3; ii. 1; v. 1; vi. 2). While therefore it is not suggested that 'beseech' or 'intreat' be substituted for 'exhort' in I Tim. ii. 1, the gracious element in the world should not be forgotten. Most readers will recognize that the word Paraklete "The Comforter" is derived from this same word. The Holy Ghost is more than an "Exhorter".

Many of the epistles were written to counteract some error of doctrine or practice that was threatening the peace and endangering the witness at the time. Romans, Galatians and Hebrews, have this in common that they both put the "law" in its true place, for there were those in the Church who did not understand the implications of the doctrine "The just shall live by faith", which text is quoted in each of these three epistles. The Thessalonian epistles were written to counter false views concerning the Second Coming of Christ and of the day of the Lord. The reader will not need further proofs but will be able to supply the necessary information concerning I & II Corinthians, Colossians and Philippians.

When we commence reading I Timothy, we soon discover that the Church was disturbed by those who were 'desiring to be teachers of the law', and because of their misunderstanding of the difference between law and grace, they were concerned with 'endless genealogies'. Returning to the subject matter of this exhortation, namely prayer for all men, we remember that Josephus records that Caius Caesar sent Petronius with an army to Jerusalem, to place his statue in the Temple.

The Jews most strenuously resisted the attempt, saying that they would be willing to allow the whole Jewish nation to be sacrificed rather than allow such desecration, but they added:

> "We offer sacrifices twice every day for Caesar, and for the Roman people" (Jos. B.J. ii. 10:4).

As an estimate of our true attitude toward constituted authority is necessary if we would not misunderstand I Tim. iii. 1-7, the following references should be pondered:

"Let as many servants as are under the yoke count their own masters (even heathens) worthy of all honour, that the name of God and His doctrine be not blasphemed."

"There are many unruly and vain talkers, especially they of the circumcision: whose mouths must be stopped."

"Exhort servants (slaves) to be obedient unto their own masters . . . . . that they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things."

"Therefore put them in mind to be subject to principalities and powers, to obey magistrates" (I Tim. iv. 1; Titus i. 10, 11; ii. 9; iii. 1).

It will be obvious that these allusions to insubordination that are found in the Pastoral Epistles, point to a real and present evil, and in perfect harmony with the Apostle's attitude elsewhere is his exhortation given here in I Tim. ii. 1-7.

The word "therefore" with which the exhortation opens must consequently not be neglected. It links the exhortation to pray for all men with the reference to those who "blaspheme" (I Tim. i. 20; vi. 1) and those who desired to be "teachers of the law" (I Tim. i. 7).

The Apostle uses four words to express the character and nature of the prayer that he calls for "for all men".

"Supplications, prayers, intercessions, giving of thanks." St. Augustine is reported to have interpreted these four items thus:

"Deeseis, deprecations that evil may be averted from rulers;
proseuchas, petitions that good may be obtained from them;
enteuxeis, intercessions that needful graces may be conferred upon them, eucharistias, thanksgivings, when they have fulfilled the high functions of their stations"
(Dr. Parr, Sermons).

These four phases of prayer provide a background against which the Apostle places the great Intercessor Himself, the Man Christ Jesus. It will enable us to appreciate His mediation the better if we understand something of the nature of that limited mediation which it is the privilege of every praying believer to exercise.

(1) Supplications. Something of the intensity of this aspect of prayer can be gathered from Rom. x. 1 where the Apostle's "prayer to God" is so selfless and moving. Its association with resurrection power may be gathered from the phrase "Ye also helping together" in II Cor. i. 10, 11, and James v. 16 assures us that such prayer is 'effectual'.

(2) Prayers. These are included in "all prayer" (Eph. vi. 18), accompanied as they are in that context as in I Tim. ii. 1 with "supplications".

(3) Intercessions. This is the word translated "prayer" in I Tim. iv. 5, and is attributed to the Spirit Himself (Rom. viii. 26) and Christ the Son, Who make intercession for us (Rom. viii. 34).

It may be of interest to remember that the Greek word which gives us the idea of intercession, enters into the names Tychicus, Synteche and Eutychus.

(4) Giving of thanks. This is the Eucharistic word of I Cor. xi. 24 and is found in I Tim. iv. 3 and 4.

This fourfold intercession is on behalf of "all men". How are we to understand the Apostle's reference to "all men"?

Lifted out of its context, severed from the chain of reasoning, of which it forms a link, or handled by those who decry the place of "logic" in the understanding of any proposition human or divine, the passage could be made to support almost any phase of doctrine, but the only honest method of interpretation is that which keeps the explanation of any separate detail within the scope of the whole.

The Apostle returns to the subject of "all men" of iv. 8:

> "Bodily exercise profiteth for a little time (margin); but godliness is profitable unto all things, having the promise of life that now is, and of that which is to come."

"All things" here refer both to life now, and the life to come. He continues:

> "We trust in the living God, Who is the Saviour of all men, specially of those that believe" (I Tim. iv. 8-10).

While God is the Saviour of all men without distinction, He is the Saviour in a special way only of those that believe. The passage contrasts those whose only enjoyment is reserved to "the life that now is" and "for a little time", and those whose salvation is "special" and looks to the life to come. In like manner the term "all men" in I Tim. ii. is not left undefined; the expansion immediately follows "For kings, and for all that are in authority". Now numerically, "kings and all that are in authority" make up a small minority. In a nation of millions today, there is but one sovereign, and "all that are in authority" make up a small percentage of the whole population. It is therefore most certain that the Apostle is not in this passage discussing universal salvation, he is using the words "all men" to mean "all men without distinction" not "all men without exception". The hesitation to pray for kings and rulers that was evidently felt by many, can be understood when we remember what sort of men they were that sat in the seat of authority, nevertheless, even for Nero and those like him, prayer was to be offered and not withheld. In the light of this we must read the words "who will have all men to be saved" as also the words "Who gave Himself a ransom for all" (I Tim. ii. 4, 6).

The unity of purpose that links verses 1 to 7 in this chapter must not be broken for the sake of any private interpretation. "Thanks for all men" not only introduces the Apostle's theme, but governs all subsequent references. "All men" indicates "kings" or "all that are in authority". Prayers must not be limited to likely persons, for God will have "all men" even kings and all in authority to be saved. "For all" the Son of God gave Himself a ransom, and for this testimony Paul was appointed, preacher, apostle and teacher of the Gentiles.

That he has by no means forgotten or left the matter of prayer for all men, with which the passage opens is evident by the resumption of the theme in verse 8,

> "I will therefore that men pray everywhere."

The theme, however, of this present series is not so much the matter of "prayer", but the glorious doctrine of the "One Mediator" which is introduced by the Apostle into his argument; it is most blessedly true, however, and must be remembered continually, that there would be and could be neither prayer nor ransom whether for ourselves or for all men, apart from the Mediatorial office of the Son of God.

To this most wondrous theme we devote the succeeding articles of this series.

No.2. "There is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the Man Christ Jesus" (I Tim. ii. 5).

pp. 193 - 196

The unity of the Godhead is a fundamental doctrine of all Scripture, and is in nowise disturbed or invalidated by the revelation that the selfsame Scriptures teach that both the Father and Son in their own right have full title to the name "God". The doctrine "there is one God" is never discussed or enlarged upon in the N.T. Where the theme is introduced, it is brought in to confirm some argument that is in process of development, but the doctrine itself is never made a subject of revelation. There are seven such passages in the epistles, two in the Gospel of Mark, and one all-covering reference in John. It will clear the way for fuller understanding if these ten references are considered.

Mark xii. 29-32 "Thou hast said the truth; for there is one God; and there is none other than He". If we turn to the record of this same incident in Matt. xxii. 34-46 we discover the following facts that have a bearing upon the subject of the Lord's teaching. Both Mark and Matthew give the question put by the lawyer who was "one of the scribes", > "Master which is the great commandment in the law?" (Matt. xxii. 36).

> "Which is the first commandment of all?" (Mark xii. 28).

Mark's account includes the words "Hear, O Israel; The Lord our God is one Lord" (Mark xii. 29), but this is omitted by Matthew. Both give the command to 'love the Lord with all thy heart', and both add 'the second which is like unto it'.

It is evident that the reader envisaged by Matthew has no need to have the great text of Deut. vi. 4 repeated, but Mark who wrote for the Roman world, was constrained to put this great protest against idolatry in the forefront. Even so, no comment is made on the doctrine of "one God" by Mark. In the sequel of Matt. xxii. however we read that the Saviour did not let His tempters depart without a challenge:

> "What think ye of Christ, Whose Son is He? They say unto Him the Son of David":

and the challenge that these Pharisees did not dare to meet was:

"How then doth David in spirit call Him Lord . . . . . how is He his Son?"

In these two records we have:

(1) The main body of the argument that is concerned with the love to God and to neighbour.
(2) The emphasis in Matthew upon the Deity of Christ, and the omission of the text concerning "one God".
The emphasis in Mark of the "one God" and the omission of the Saviour's reference to David and to His lordship.

It is manifest that neither doctrine is denied by the omission, nor unduly stressed by its inclusion.

Passing to the reference in the Epistles, we come to James. Again James nowhere discusses the Being of God, the subject "There is one God" is introduced, nor for its own sake, but to illustrate and enforce the fact that "faith without works is dead":

"Thou believest that there is one God: thou doest well: the devils also believe, and tremble" (James ii. 19).

It is evident that there is no salvation in the belief that there is "one God", salvation comes through faith in Christ. We shall have to speak more at large concerning the growing evil of stressing "God" to the exclusion of "Christ" later, but cannot refrain from making this protest, however brief. We must confine ourselves however at the moment to the passages that speak of "one God".

"Now a mediator is not a mediator of one, but God is one" (Gal. iii. 20).

It has been computed that between 250 and 300 interpretations of this verse have found their way into commentaries and essays, but most are unsatisfactory because they ignore the demands of the context. The last thing that Paul meditated when he wrote these words or for that matter when he wrote the epistle, was a dissertation upon the nature and being of God. The innate idea of mediator demands two parties: a mediator cannot be a mediator of one party. But in the promise made to Abraham 430 years before the giving of the law, "God was one", for Abraham, the only other who could have been a contracting party, was caused to fall into a "deep sleep" (Gen. xv. 12) in which state he could promise nothing.

"As concerning therefore the eating of things that are offered in sacrifice unto idols, we know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is none other God but one. For though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth (as there be gods many, and lords many), but to us there is but one God, the Father, of Whom are all things and we in Him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by Whom are all things, and we by Him" (I Cor. viii. 4-6).

Mediation is implied in this passage although not stated, for that is the office of 'the lords many'. No doctrine of the Unity of the Godhead can be extracted from these verses, for by so attempting, we discover that we either prove too much or involve the teaching in self-destruction.

If we maintain that the Father alone is God, then we shall have to exclude from His promise the words "through Whom are all things and we through Him" for these belong only to the Lord. This would cut across the teaching of Rom. xi. 36, where we find that of the Lord it is said, not only are all things "by Him", as is found in I Cor. viii. 6, but "of Him" and "for Him" which is exclusively ascribed to the "one God" in that same passage. The Mediatorial office of the Saviour is the key to these apparent enigmas.

> "There is one Body, and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling: One Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, Who is above all, and through all, and in you all" (Eph. iv. 4-6).

In this sevenfold unity of the Spirit, the one Lord holds the central place as Mediator, and the references here to the one Lord and the one God fall under the same category as these same terms do in I Cor. viii. 6.

> "Seeing it is one God, which shall justify the circumcision by faith, and the uncircumcision through faith" (Rom. iii. 30).

Here we approach a parallel argument to that which is found in I Tim. ii. 1-5. There is no question of the Being of God in Rom. iii; the chapter deals with the justification of the believing sinner, whether he be Jew or Gentile.

"There is no difference", Jew and Gentile alike stand guilty before God, and are justified freely by the same grace, through the exercise of the same faith. Because of this, the Apostle says "Is He the God of the Jews only? Is He not also of the Gentiles? Yes of the Gentiles also", and proceeds to demonstrate this by saying "Seeing it is one God which shall justify the circumcision by (ek) faith, and the uncircumcision through (dia) faith". Exactly what distinctions the Apostle intended by ek and dia may be difficult to decide. Not a few commentators bluntly say that there is no difference, but this hardly accords with the scrupulous choice of language that we have found marks the Scriptures of truth. Calvin suggests a shade of irony: "This is the grand difference: the Jew is saved ex fide, the Gentile per fidem!"

At the moment we are not concerned about this question. What is to the point is that the Apostle introduces the expression "one God" as a proof and a protest against any exclusion of "all men", whether Jew or Gentile, and if the reader were to be asked, what does the writer of this article mean here when he says 'all men', can he by any possibility be advocating "Universalism", the reply would have to be—NO, the context decides most emphatically that he uses the term 'all men' to mean all without distinction not all without exception, and this is the meaning of the Apostle in I Tim. ii. 1-6.

When he says that prayers should be offered for "all men" he immediately follows by explaining his intention, saying "For kings, and for all that are in authority". It is understandable that the early Christians, living as they were in an atmosphere of persecution and oppression, might hesitate to include kings and rulers in their prayers.

The Apostle counters this. Again when he says that God will have "all men to be saved", this governing limitation must still be kept in mind. Christ is the one Mediator between God and men, He is not a Mediator of the New Covenant only, He is the one and only Mediator for Jew and Gentile, bond or free, male or female, high or low, rich or poor, king or peasant; He is the one and only Mediator for all.

One further use of the word "all" is found in verse 6 "Who gave Himself a ransom for all", but this is a subject of such importance that it must be reserved for a separate study. The one all covering reference in John's Gospel is that of John x. 30 "I and My Father are one", where the same word is used that is found in the passages already quoted. If we maintain that the Father and the Son must be thought of as being "two" even though the Saviour makes this stupendous claim, what is to prevent us from tampering with the selfsame word "one" in the other passages that affirm the Oneness of God? Let us admit that the doctrine "God is one" is never introduced into the N.T. except as part of an argument that deals with the question of Mediation in some aspect or other, and we shall be well on the way to understanding the different passages wherein these references occur.

(BE-XLI.167).

The problem of the ages is the problem of the presence of evil, of the apparent necessity for suffering, accompanied with a baffled feeling of frustration. Men like Job, and Asaph, and books like Ecclesiastes ventilate these feelings, but the consciousness of redeeming Love, enabled these men of God to trust where they could not trace. The present study is set forth with an intense desire, to borrow the words of Milton, "To justify the ways of God with men" (see also Rom. iii. 4), to show that there is a most gracious purpose in process, and that there are indications of that purpose in sufficient clearness, to enable the tried believer to say with Job "When He hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold".

In the opening study, we commence with the primary creation of Gen. i. 1 which is followed by the 'rent' of Gen. i. 2. This we denominate "The Beginning" and conclude with "The End" of I Cor. xv. 24-28. The New Heavens and Earth, with its Paradise restored, relates, not to "The Beginning", but to the subsequent creation of Adam and the Heavens and Earth of the six days. By observing the parallel between the words of Eph. i. 4 and II Tim i. 9 we are able to show that the ages commence with the reconstruction of the earth in Gen. i. 3. What follows is a series of "fillings" in the person of men like Adam, Noah, Abraham or Nebuchadnezzar with the economies associated with them, but all such are provisional, they are failing and typical only, and for this reason we call them but "fillings". They but carry the unfolding purpose on to "the fullness of time" when "The Seed should come to Whom the promises were made", in Whom alone all the "Fullness" dwells. Adam was but a "filling", he was not "the fullness", that title belongs only to the Lord Jesus Christ Himself.

The only company of the redeemed who are themselves called "the Fullness" is the Church of the Mystery, the church of "heavenly places", the church which is now closely associated with the seated Christ.

Two words, found in Matt. ix. 16 must ever be kept together in the course of this study, they are the words "fullness" and the "fuller". We shall see presently that God is preparing during the ages, as it were, a piece of "fulled" cloth, so that at last there may be a perfected universe, the "rent" of Gen. i. 2 healed, and "God all in all". Fulling involves several processes, most of them drastic and rigorous.

> "Clooth that cometh fro the wevying is noght comely to were til it be fulled under foot" (Piers Plowman).

Nitre, soap, and the teasle, scouring and bleaching at length make the shrunken cloth "as white as snow" (Mark ix. 3). We can say therefore concerning the fulfillment of the purpose of the ages "No FULNESS without FULLING".

We do most earnestly desire that consummation when the Son of God shall deliver up to the Father a perfected kingdom, with every vestige of the "rent" of Gen. i. 2 gone. We do most ardently desire to be found, in that day, as part of that blessed pleroma or fullness, but we remind ourselves that every thread that goes to make that "filling" will have passed through the Fuller's hands; "fulled under foot" must precede being "far above all".

Accompanying this introduction the reader will find a chart which endeavours to set forth in diagram the way in which the Divine purpose in the Fullness is accomplished. At either end of the chart stand between the "Beginning" and the "End" the two creations, the black division that immediately follows the one representing the condition of Gen. i. 2 "Without form and void", and the black division that immediately precedes the consummation, represents the corresponding state of dissolution foreshadowed in Isa. xxxiv. 4 and II Pet. iii. but associated with "the last enemy". Running along the bottom of the chart is "the deep"; that was the vehicle of judgment in Gen. i. 2 and which is to pass away at the end, for John says "and there was no more sea" (Rev. xxi. 1). By comparing Eph. i. 4 "Before the foundation of the world" with II Tim. i. 8, 9 "before the world began (literally, before age times)", we have the start and the finish of the ages indicated. What follows is a series of "fillings", "stop-gap" types and shadows pointing on. The fullness of time (Gal. iv. 4) did not come until 4,000 years after Adam, and the fullness of the times (seasons) will not arrive until the day which is about to dawn ushers in the glory that will be, when all things in heaven and on earth are gathered together under the Headship of Christ.

As we have seen, it is not until we reach the dispensation of the Mystery, that we come to a company of the redeemed which constitute a "fullness", and there we read of the Church which is His Body, "the FULNESS of Him, that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 23). The Fullness of the Godhead dwells bodily in Christ, and the heavenly places, far above all, with which both the seated Christ and His church are associated, constitute a sphere untouched by the catastrophe of Gen. i. 2. This does not pass away. The heavenly places where Christ sits, are far above all heavens (Eph. iv. 10) that is, far above the temporary heaven called "the firmament" which is likened to a spread out curtain and which can be folded up and put aside. This "tabernacle" character of the Adamic earth is of extreme importance; it places the whole purpose of the ages under a redeeming aegis, and the reader is advised to give the article which deals with this aspect careful attention. The chart which accompanies this article should be at hand throughout the series.

To the reader of The Berean Expositor, the principle of Right Division needs neither introduction nor commendation. Its recognition underlies every article that has been printed in its pages and determines both the Gospel we preach, the Church to which we belong, and the hope that is before us. Dispensational Truth is not confined to one aspect or phase of the Divine purpose, for every dealing of God with man, whether under law or grace, whether with saint or sinner has its own dispensational colouring which is inherent in its teaching and is in nowise accidental. Much has yet to be written and presented along these suggestive and attractive lines of study, but the particular application of this principle now before us, focuses the reader's attention upon one fact, namely, that while in the mind of God the whole purpose of the ages is seen as one and its end assured, in the outworking of that purpose, the fact that moral creatures are involved, creatures that can, and alas do, exercise their liberty to disobey as well as to obey the revealed will of God; this fact has had an effect upon the manifest unfolding of the purpose of the ages. This is seen as a series of "gaps" and "postponements" which are filled by new phases and aspects of the purpose until at length He Who was once "All" in a universe that mechanically and unconsciously obeyed, will at length be "All in all" in a universe of willing and intelligent creatures, whose standing will not be that of Creation and Nature, but in Redemption and Grace.

Here we can do little else than indicate the presence of these "gaps", and consider the terms that are employed in the Hebrew of the O.T. and the Greek of the N.T. and of the LXX. The well-known example of the Saviour's recognition of a "gap" in the prophecy of Isa. lxi. must be repeated for the sake of completeness and for the value of its endorsement. We learn from the fourth chapter of Luke's Gospel, that the Lord attended the service in the synagogue at Nazareth, and, apparently, after the reading of the law by the official, He stood up "for to read" the Haphthorah, or the recognized portion from the Prophets that was appointed for the day. He found the place, and commenced to read Isa. lxi. Now it is laid down by Maimonides that "He that reads in the prophets, was to read at least one and twenty verses" but he allowed that if "the sense" was finished in less, then the reader was under no necessity to read so many. Even so, it must have caused a deal of surprise to the congregation that gathered for Christ to read what is one verse in our Bible, an one sentence of the second verse, shut the book and sit down. He did so because "the sense" was indeed finished in "less than twenty-one verses". He was about to focus attention upon one aspect of His Work, and said:

> "This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears" (Luke iv. 21).

The sentence with which the Saviour closed His reading of Isa. lxi. was "to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord". The next sentence, separated in the A.V. by but a comma read "And the day of vengeance of our God", yet that comma represents a gap of at least nineteen hundred years, for the day of vengeance are not referred to until Luke xxi. 22 where the Second Coming and the end of the age is in view.

The word translated "fullness" is the Greek pleroma, and its first occurrence in the N.T. places it in contrast with a "rent" or a "gap". The three references in the Gospels are:

> "No man putteth a piece of new cloth unto an old garment, for that which is put in to fill it up taketh from the garment, and the rent is made worse" (Matt. ix. 16).

> "No man also seweth a piece of new cloth on an old garment: else the new piece that filled it up taketh away from the old, and the rent is made worse" (Mark ii. 21).
> "No man putteth a piece of new garment upon an old; if otherwise, then both the new maketh a rent, and the piece that was taken out of the new agreeth not with the old" (Luke v. 36).

"That which is put in to fill up", is the translation of the Greek pleroma a word of extreme importance in the epistles, and there translated "fullness". In contrast with this "fullness" is the word "rent" which in the Greek is schisma. Two words translated "new" are used. In Matt. ix. 16, and in Mark ii. 21 agnaphos not yet "fulled", or dressed from gnapheus, a "fuller", and kainos which is used in Luke v. 36, meaning "newly made". In place of "put unto" or "put upon" used in Matt. ix. 16 and Luke v. 36 we find the word "to sew on" epirrhapto employed in Mark ii. 21. One other word is suggestive, the word translated "agree" in Luke v. 36. It is the Greek sumphoneo. Now as these terms will be referred to in the course of the following exposition, we will take the present opportunity of enlarging a little on their meaning and relationship here and so prepare the way.

Pleroma. This word which is derived from pleroo "to fill", occurs seventeen times in the N.T. Two of these occurrences occur in Matthew and Mark as we have seen, the remaining fifteen occurrences are found in John's Gospel and in Paul's epistles. It is noteworthy that the word pleroma, "fullness" is never used in the epistles of the circumcision. When Peter referred to the problem of the gap suggested by the words "Where is the promise of His coming?" he referred his readers to the epistles of Paul who, said he, deals with this matter of longsuffering and apparent postponement and speaks of these things (II Pet. iii. 15, 16). The word pleroma is used in the Septuagint some fifteen times. These we will record for the benefit of the reader who may not have access to that ancient translation. I Chron. xvi. 32 "Let the sea roar and the fullness thereof", so, Psa. xcvi. 11; xcviii. 7. "The earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof" Psa. xxiv. 1, and with slight variations Psa. l. 12; lxxxix. 11. In several passages, the fullness or "all that is therein" is set over against flood or famine, as in Jer. viii. 16; xlvii. 2; Ezek. xii. 19; xix. 7 and xxx. 12. Some of the words used in the context of these Septuagint references are too suggestive to be passed over without comment. Instead of "time of healing" we find "anxiety", the land "quaking", "deadly serpents" and a "distressed heart" (Jer. viii. 15-18). Again, in Jer. xlvii. 2 (xxix. 2 in the LXX) we have such words of prophetic and age time importance as "an overflowing flood", Greek katakluzomai, kataklusmos and variants, a word used with dispensational significance in II Pet. ii. 5 & iii. 6, and preserved in the English cataclysm, a word of similar import to that which we have translated "the overthrow" of the world. The bearing of II Pet. iii. on this gap in the outworking of the purpose of the ages, will be given an examination in this series. In the context of the word "fullness" found in Ezek. xii. 19, we have such words as "scatter" diaspero, a word used in James i. 1 and I Pet. i. 1 of the "dispersed" or "scattered" tribes of Israel, also the word "waste", which calls up such passages of prophetic import as Isa. xxxiv. 10, 11 and Jer. iv. 23-27, where the Hebrew words employed in Gen. i. 2 are repeated. The pleroma or "fullness" is placed in direct contrast with desolation, waste, flood, fire and a condition that is "without form and void".

Schisma, the word translated "rent" in Matt. ix. 16 is from schizo which is used of the veil of the Temple and of the rocks that were "rent" at the time of the Saviour's death and resurrection.

Two words translated "new" have been mentioned. One agnaphos refers to the work of a "fuller", who smoothes a cloth by carding. The work of a fuller also includes the washing and scouring process in which fuller's earth or fuller's sope (Mal. iii. 2; Mark ix. 3) is employed. A piece of cloth thus treated loses its original harshness. The whole process of the ages is set forth under the symbol of the work of a fuller, who by beating and by bleaching at length produces a material which is the acme of human attainment, for when the Scriptures would describe the excellent glory of the Lord, His garments are said to have been "exceeding white as snow, so as no fuller on earth could white them" (Mark ix. 3). So too the effect upon Israel of the Second Coming is likened to "a refiner's fire and like fuller's sope". The other word translated "new" is kainos and has the meaning of "fresh as opposed to old", "new, different from the former", and as a compound, the meaning "to renew". It is this word that is used when speaking of the New Covenant, the new creation, the new man, and the new heaven and earth. We shall have to take this into account when we are developing the meaning and purpose of the Fullness. Job xiv. 12 reds "Till the heavens be no more" which in the Septuagint reads "Till the heavens are unsewn". The bearing of this upon the argument of II Pet. iii., the present firmament and the fullness will appear more clearly as we proceed.

No.2. Creation and its place in the Purpose.
pp. 183 - 186

In the vision of Ezekiel, recorded in the opening chapters of his prophecy, the prophet saw the living creature which he afterward identified with the cherubim (Ezek. x. 20). Those not only had the four faces, namely that of a man, a lion, an ox and an eagle (Ezek. i. 10) but were associated with dreadful rings and wheels, and among other things it was noted "as it were a wheel in the middle of a wheel" (Ezek. i. 16). This element of complication, one wheel within another, seems to be a reflection of the way in which one dispensation encloses another, so that between the annunciation of the opening phase of the purpose and the attainment of its purpose and goal, a great gap intervenes which is filled by another and yet another succeeding dispensation until in the "fullness" of time Christ came (Gal. iv. 4) born of a woman, with a view to the fullness of the seasons (Eph. i. 10), when He in Whom all the fullness dwells (Col. i. 19) shall bring the purpose of the ages to its blessed consummation. In harmony with the fact that this purpose is redemptive in character, various companies of the redeemed during the ages have been associated with the word "fullness", even the earth itself and its fullness, being linked with the glory of the Lord (Isa. vi. 3 margin). The outrunning of the purpose of the ages therefore can be represented (very crudely it is true) thus:

(((((((----------)))))))

The purpose of the ages opens with Gen. i. 1 in the creation of the heaven and the earth, but between the attainment of the purpose for which heaven and earth were created "in the beginning", and the day when God shall be "all in all" lies a great gulf, a gulf caused by a moral catastrophe and not merely by a physical land-slide, a gap that is "filled" by a series of wheels within wheels, Adam and his world, Noah and his world, Israel and their inheritance, and at last that church which is itself "the fullness of Him that filleth all in all". The two extremes therefore of the purpose are found in the following passages which are themselves separated in the sacred volume by the rest of the Scriptures. The first occurring in Genesis, the first book of the Bible, the last in Revelation, the last book of the Bible.

> "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth" (Gen. i. 1).
>
> "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth" (Rev. xxi. 1).

The gap in the outworking of the purpose is expressed in Gen. i. 2 "The earth was without form and void and darkness was upon the face of the deep" and in Rev. xxi. 1 by the added words:

> "For the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea" (Rev. xxi. 1).

This feature may be visualized as follows:

CREATION
In the purpose of the ages.

The first all-comprehensive gap.

|_____|

Gen. i. 1 The deep — No more sea Rev. xxi. 1

Let us consider in fuller detail some of the terms that are here employed to set before us this opening and closing feature of the purpose of the ages.

> "In the beginning", B're-shith; Septuagint Greek, En arche.

While the fact must not be unduly stressed, it should be observed that neither in the Hebrew nor in the Greek is the article "the" actually used. Moreover, it is certain that b're-shith denotes the commencement of a point in time as Jer. xxvi. 1; xxi. 1; xxviii. 1 will show. But it is also very certain that the self same word denotes something more than a point of departure in time, for it is used by Jeremiah in ii. 3 for "the first fruits" even as it is used in Lev. ii. 12 and xxiii. 10, which are "beginnings" in that they anticipate the harvest at the end, the "fullness of seasons" (Eph. i. 10). The same can be said of the Greek arche. While it most certainly means "beginning", it is noteworthy that in Gen. i. 16, where the next occurrences are found it means "rule", even as in Eph. i. 21; iii. 10 and vi. 12 arche in the plural is translated "principalities", while in Phil. iv. 15 it is used once again in its ordinary time sense. While God knows the end from the beginning, and nothing which He has caused to be written for our learning can ever be anything but truth, we must nevertheless be prepared to find that much is veiled in the O.T. until, in the wisdom of God, the time is ripe for fuller teaching.

If we leave Gen. i. 1 and go straight over to the last book of Scripture, namely the book of the Revelation, we shall see that the words "In the beginning" acquire a fuller sense than was possible at the time when they were first written by Moses. Arche occurs in Revelation four times, as follows:

> "I am the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty." (Rev. i. 8).
>
> "These things saith the Amen, the faithful and true Witness, the beginning of the creation of God." (iii. 14).
>
> "And He said unto me, It is done. I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end. I will give unto him that is athirst of the fountain of the water of life freely." (xxi. 6).
>
> "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last." (xxii. 13).

Here, in the last book of the Bible, arche ceases to bear merely a time significance, it is the title of a Person, a Person in Whom creation and the purpose of the ages find their meaning and their goal. Paul uses arche eighteen times, the word having the time sense "beginning" in five occurrences (Phil. iv. 15, the only occurrence with this meaning in the Prison epistles), once in the earlier epistles (II Thess. ii. 13) and three times in Hebrews (i. 10; ii. 3; vii. 3). The remaining references save one use arche to indicate "principalities", "rule" or "principles" (Rom. viii. 38; I Cor; xv. 24; Eph. i. 21; iii. 10; vi. 12; Col. i. 16, 18; ii. 10, 15; Titus iii. 1; Heb. vi. 1). The Hebrew word rosh which gives us the word for "beginning" is translated "head" in Gen. iii. 15 and both "beginning" and "head" in Exod. xii. 2 & 9 respectively. In Col. i. 18 Paul uses arche of Christ in a somewhat similar sense to the usage of the word in the Revelation:

> "Who is the Image of the invisible God, the firstborn of every creature, for by Him were all things created . . . . . and He is the head of the Body the church: who IS THE BEGINNING, the Firstborn from the dead . . . . . in Him should ALL FULNESS DWELL" (Col. i. 15-19).

The two phrases "by Him" all things were created, and "in Him" all fullness dwells, are obviously complementary. It is a fact that the preposition en is translated many times "by", but it is difficult to understand how it is that in Col. i. 16 en auto should be translated "BY Whom" while in Col. i. 19 en auto should be translated "IN Him". Moreover the preposition en occurs in the phrases "in heaven", "in all things". Again, the A.V. reads in verse 17 "By Him all things consist" where the preposition is dia, which only makes the need more felt that en should not be translated "by" in the same context. There does not appear any grammatical necessity to depart from the primary meaning of en "in" in Col. i. 16, and this is the considered opinion of such exegetes as Bishop Lightfoot and Dean Alford, and the translators of the R.V.

"In Him" therefore, all things were created (Col. i. 16). He Himself is "the Beginning" in the Creation of God (Rev. iii. 14). We therefore return to Gen. i. 1 and read with fuller insight and meaning "In the BEGINNING God created the heaven and the earth". When dealing with the word pleroma, this passage in Colossians will naturally come up for a more detailed examination. Christ is "the Beginning" of Gen. i. 1, although at the time of Moses such a truth was not perceived, just as the purpose of the name Jehovah was not known to the world before the revelation given in the days of Moses. What was known as the Creation of the Almighty, is subsequently revealed to have been the work of Jehovah, the God of Redemption. In Gen. i. 1 we learn that Elohim "God" created the heaven and the earth, and subsequently we learn that all was the work of Him Who is "The Word", "The Image", "The One Mediator". From the beginning creation had in view the redemptive purpose of the ages, but just as it would have been impolitic to have answered the question of the Apostles in Acts i. 6 before the time, so the true purpose of Creation was not revealed until Man had sinned and Christ had died for his redemption.

Bara, the word translated create, must now be given a consideration. Metaphysics "the science of things transcending what is physical or natural" attempts to deal with the question of "being", and in that department of thought the question of "creating something out of nothing" naturally arises. Scripture however never discusses this metaphysical problem. Even in Gen. i. 1, it does NOT say "In the beginning God created the basic matter of the universe", it commences with a highly organized and differentiated universe "heaven and earth". The Hebrew word bara in its primary meaning of "create" is reserved for God as Creator, not being used of man, except in a secondary sense (and that in five passages only), out of fifty-four occurrences namely Josh. xvii. 15, 18; I Sam. ii. 29; Ezek. xxi. 19; xxiii. 47. Adam is said to be created, although the "dust of the ground" from which he was made was in existence long before. God is said to be the Creator of Israel (Isa. xliii. 1, 7, 15), yet Israel was a nation descended from Abraham. Bara gives us the Chaldaic word bar "son", which but perpetuates the idea already recognized in bara. The Septuagint translates Josh. xvii. 15 and 18 "thou shalt clear it", which the A.V. renders "cut down", thereby revealing, as the lexicographers point out, that bara primarily means "to cut, to carve out, to form by cutting". When we remember that "the world" kosmos is derived from the word kosmeo "to adorn" as with "goodly stones", with "gold" and "to garnish" with all manner of precious stones (Luke xxi. 5; I Tim. ii. 9; Rev. xxi. 2, 19) we perceive the reason for the choice of bara and the words with which revelation opens "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth" begin to bear deeper significance. It will also show that "the world" necessarily includes the earth as its sphere. Creation was dual, from the start. Not heaven only, but the heaven and the earth. Man was created male and female, and before we read of the generations of Adam, namely of his descendants, we read of the "generations of the heavens and of the earth" (Gen. ii. 4). Heaven is intimately concerned with the earth; in the heavens God is "ALL" ("the Heavens do rule", "as it is in heaven") and when at last the will of God is done on earth as it is in heaven, the goal of the ages will be attained, and God will not only be "All" but "ALL in ALL". Such are faint shadows of His ways. By searching we shall never find out God into perfection, but to stand as we have in a cleft of the rock while His glory passes before us, and be permitted to behold but the "back part" of His ways is joy unspeakable.

"Lo these are but the outlines of His ways; A whisper only, that we hear of Him;
His wondrous pow'r, who then, can comprehend?" (Job xxvi. 14 Dr. Bullinger's Metrical Version).

No.3. The First "Gap". "Without form and void."
pp. 203 - 206

Whatever the ultimate purpose of creation may prove to be, it is certain that it will not be attained without much sorrow and great sacrifice. "The Fuller" will be at work, and between the opening announcement of creation in Gen. i. 1 and the bringing in of the New Heavens and New Earth (Rev. xxi. 1; II Pet. iii. 13) and the "End" (I Cor. xv. 24) roll the eons or the ages with their burden of sin and of redeeming love. When the new heaven and earth was seen by John in the Apocalypse, he adds the words "and there was no more sea". That is a most evident reference back to Gen. i. 2, where darkness and the deep take the place of order or kosmos.

> "And the earth was without form and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep" (Gen. i. 2).

It is of importance that we remember that in the LXX, "the deep" is the same Greek word that is translated "the bottomless pit" in the Apocalypse.

When we read in Genesis that man "became" a living soul we immediately gather that he was not a living soul before he breathed the breath of life. When we read that Lot's wife "became" a pillar of salt (Gen. xix. 26) we understand that this was consequent upon her looking back. When Cain said "And it shall come to pass" (Gen. iv. 14) we understand his fears concerning what would happen after others had heard of his deed. So, when we read "the earth was without form and void" and realize that the same verb that is here translated "was", is translated "became" or "come to pass" in these other passages in Genesis, we realized that here in Gen. i. 2 we are looking at the record of the first great gap in the outworking of the Divine purpose, and must read:

> "And the earth BECAME without form and void."

The translation "was" in Gen. i. 2 however is perfectly good, for in our own usage we often mean "became" when "was" is written. If writing on two occasions concerning a friend we should say (1) "He was a man" and (2) "He was very ill", everyone would understand that in the second case, this friend had "become" ill, and so "was" ill at the time spoken of, but it would be impossible to think that anyone would understand by the words "he was ill" that he had been created, or born in that state!

Darkness both in the O.T. and in N.T. is associated with death, judgment and evil, and Paul's use of Gen. i. 2, 3 in the words "God, Who commanded the light to shine out of darkness" (II Cor. iv. 6) most surely indicates that in his estimation, the darkness of Gen. i. 2 is a fit symbol of the spiritual darkness of the unregenerate mind. Two words however are found in Gen. i. 2 which are so used in subsequent Scriptures as to compel everyone that realizes what a great place "usage" has in interpretation, to acknowledge that nothing but catastrophic judgment can be intended by this verse. The two words that describe the condition of the earth in verse 2 are the Hebrew words tohu and bohu "without form and void". Tohu occurs twenty times in the O.T. and bohu twice in addition to Gen. i. 2. The only other occurrence of tohu in the writings of Moses is in Deut. xxxii. 10 where it refers to "the waste howling wilderness". The use which Isaiah makes of this word is highly suggestive and full of instruction.

Isa. xxiv. This chapter opens with a judgment that is reminiscent of Gen. i. 2 "Behold the Lord maketh the earth empty, and maketh it waste, and turneth it upside down, and scattereth the inhabitants thereof . . . . . the land shall be utterly emptied, and utterly spoiled" (Isa. xxiv. 1, 3). When Isaiah would once again refer to this state of affairs, he sums it up in the epithet "The city of confusion (tohu)" (Isa. xxiv. 10), and there can be no doubt but that the desolation here spoken of is the result of judgment. Another example of its usage is found in Isa. xlv. 18 "For thus saith the Lord that created the heavens, God Himself that formed the earth and made it; He hath established it, He created it not in vain, He formed it to be inhabited". Here the A.V. treats the word tohu as an adverb, "in vain" which the R.V. corrects, reading "a waste". Whatever rendering we may adopt, one thing is certain, Isa. xlv. 18 declares in the name of Him Who created the heavens, Who formed the earth and made it, that He did not create it TOHU, it therefore must have become so. Even more convincing are two passages other than Gen. i. 2, where bohu is employed, for in both instances the word is combined with tohu. The first passage is Isa. xxxiv. 11. The context is one of catastrophic judgment and upheaval. The presence of such terms as "indignation", "fury", "utterly destroyed", "sword" and "vengeance" in the first eight verses are sufficient to prove this, and one verse is so definitely prophetic of the upheaval at the time of the end, as to leave no option in the mind:

> "And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll: and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth off from the vine, and as a falling fig from the fig tree" (Isa. xxxiv. 4).

This passage is almost identical with the language employed by Peter when he speaks of the signs that shall precede the coming of the day of God at the setting up of the new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness (II Pet. iii. 12). The words tohu and bohu occur in Isa. xxxiv. 11, to which all these symbols of judgment point:

> "He will stretch out upon it the line of confusion (tohu) and the stones of emptiness (bohu)", nor it is without significance that unclean birds like the cormorant and the bittern possess the devoted land, that nettles and brambles appear in the fortress, and that dragons, wild beasts, screech owls and satyrs gather there. The whole is a picture in miniature of what the earth "became" in Gen. i. 2. Isaiah's usage of tohu and bohu is convincing, but "in the mouth of two or three witness every word shall be established", and accordingly we find the prophet Jeremiah using tohu and bohu in a similar context.

In the structure of Jer. iv. 5-7 are in correspondence with verses 19-31.

> "The lion is come up from his thicket, and the destroyer of the Gentiles is on his way; he is gone forth from his place to make thy land desolate; and thy cities shall be laid waste, without an inhabitant" (Jer. iv. 7).

"Destruction upon destruction is cried." "I beheld the earth, and lo it was without form and void; and the heavens, and they had no light . . . . . broken down by His fierce anger" (Jer. iv. 20-26). Here then are the three inspired occurrences of the two words tohu and bohu, Gen. i. 2; Isa. xxxiv. 11 and Jer. iv. 23. If Gen. i. 2 does not refer to a day of "vengeance" or "fierce anger" should we not have to acknowledge that both Isaiah and Jeremiah by the use of these peculiar words, have misled us? And if once that be our conclusion, inspiration is invalidated, and it does not matter much what Gen. i. 2 means, for our trust is shaken, and Moses too may be wrong! This however cannot be. We have in faith put into practice I Cor. ii. 13, and have founded it blessedly illuminating. All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and Moses, Isaiah and Jeremiah speak with one voice, because inspired by one Spirit. Nothing is said in Gen. i. 2 concerning the cause of this primeval judgment, any more than any explanation is offered to explain the presence of the serpent in the Garden of Eden, but there are evidences that can be gathered from various parts of Scripture to make it clear that there was fall among the angels, that Satan is a fallen being, and that the catastrophe of Gen. i. 2 is associated with that fall. Into the gap thus formed, the present six day creation is placed as a "fullness" carrying the Redemptive purpose to the threshold of Eternity, and it is here also the "age-times" begin.

No.4. The Temporary Nature of the Present Heaven and Earth.
pp. 223 - 226

> "The things which are seen are temporal" (II Cor. iv. 18).
>
> "For by Him were all things created that are in heaven and that are in earth, visible and invisible" (Col. i. 16).
>
> "And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters, and God said, Let there be light; and there was light" (Gen. i. 2 3).

With the words of Genesis the first movement toward the goal of the ages is recorded. That it indicates a regenerative, redemptive movement is made clear by the allegorical use that Paul makes of it when writing to the Corinthians.

> "For God, Who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (II Cor. iv. 6).

When we come to consider the place that Israel occupies in the outworking of the purpose of the ages, we shall find that there will be repeated in their case these allegorical fulfillments of Gen. i. 2, 3.

> "And He will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations" (Isa. xxv. 7).

The "veil" plays a big part in the imagery of II Cor. iii. and iv. Like the rising light in Gen. i. 3, Israel's light shall dispel the gross darkness that has engulfed the nations (Isa. lx. 1, 2), and both in this passage, in II Cor. iv. 6, and Isa. xi. 9 "The earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea", it is evident that that "light" symbolizes knowledge, and prepares us to find in the midst of the garden not only the tree of life, but the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. These matters, however, are anticipatory of future studies, and the parallel of Israel with the six days' creation will be better seen when we reach the Scriptures that speak of their call and destiny. In the present study we must confine ourselves to the consideration of the fact that here, in calling into existence the creation of the six days, we meet the first of a series of "fullnesses" that carry the purpose of the age on to their glorious goal. When we traverse the gap formed by the entry of sin and death, and reach in the book of the Revelation, the other extreme of this present creation, we find that, instead of natural light as in Gen. i. 3, "The Lamb is the light thereof", "The Lord God giveth them light", and we read further that the heavenly city "had no need of the sun, neither of the moon". Instead of the stars which are spoken of in Gen. i. 16, we have the Lord holding "the seven stars in His right hand", and He himself set forth as "the bright and morning Star". These are indications that "the former things" are about to pass away. Perhaps the most suggestive item in the six days' creation, apart from man who was made in the image of God, is the provision of the "firmament".

> "And God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters . . . . . and God called the firmament Heaven" (Gen. i. 6-8).

The first fact that emerges from this passage, whatever for the moment the word "firmament" may prove to mean, is that this firmament that was "called" heaven must be distinguished from that one which was created "in the beginning". Here is something peculiar to the present temporary creation, and destined to pass away at the time of the end. The margin of the A.V. draws attention to the fact that the Hebrew word raqia translated "firmament" means literally an "expansion". Raqa, the verb is used by Jeremiah to speak of "silver spread into plates" (Jer. x. 9). Job speaks of Him "which alone spreadeth out the heavens" (Job ix. 8), and who "stretcheth out the north over the empty place" (tohu, 'without form' of Gen. i. 2) (Job xxvi. 7). The stretched out heavens are likened to a tent or tabernacle.

> "That stretcheth out the heavens as a curtain, and spreadeth them out as a tent to dwell in" (Isa. xl. 22).
> "He that created the heavens, and stretched them out" (Isa. xlii. 5).
> "That stretched forth the heavens alone" (Isa. xliv. 24; li. 13; Zech. xii. 1).

Not only is the firmament spoken of in language that reminds of the Tabernacle, there is a reference in Job that suggests that the earth too is looked upon as the ground upon which this tabernacle in the sky rests.

> "Whereupon are the foundations thereof fastened?" (Job xxxviii. 6).

At first sight there may not appear anything in this passage to link it with the Tabernacle, but when it known that the same word which is translated "foundations" is rendered “socket” fifty-three times, and that fifty-two of the occurrences refer to the sockets on which the Tabernacle rested in the wilderness, then the references in Job xxxviii. takes on a richer and deeper meaning. The firmament of Gen. i. 6 is a lesser and temporary heaven, destined to pass away when the ages come to an end. This firmament is not only the distant heaven of the sun, the moon or stars, it is also the place where birds can fly (Gen. i. 17). Consequently we can understand that when Christ ascended, He is said to have “passed through” the heavens dierchomai not “passed into” (Heb. iv. 14). In Heb. vii. 26 Christ is said to have been “made higher” than the heavens, while Ephesians declares that He ascended up “far above all heavens”, with the object that He might “fill all things” (Eph. iv. 10). Christ is said to have passed through the heavens, to have been made higher than the heavens and to have ascended up far above all heavens. Thus it is impossible for Him to be far above all heavens, and yet be at the same time seated in those very heavens if one and the same heaven is intended, for even though knowledge of heaven and heavenly things may be very limited, we can understand the simple import of the language used. Consequently when we discover that two words are employed for “heaven”, one is ouranos which includes the highest sphere of all, but nevertheless can be used of that heaven which is to pass away (Matt. v. 18), of the air where birds fly (Matt. vi. 26), the heaven of the stars (Matt. xxiv. 29) and of the angels (Mark xiii. 32).

The other word is epouranios. We perceive that in many passages ouranos refers to the firmament of Gen. i. 6, while epouranios refers to the heaven of Gen. i. 1 which was unaffected by the overthrow of verse two, and will not be dissolved and pass away. This is where Christ now sits at the right hand of God “Far above all of the heavens”. Heb. ix. 24 speaks of this sphere as “heaven itself”. In two passages the heavens are said to be rolled together or to depart “as a scroll” (Isa. xxxiv. 4; Rev. vi. 14). The present heaven and earth is a temporary “tabernacle” (Psa. xix. 4) in which the God of creation can dwell as the God of Redemption. This creation is to be folded up as a garment (Heb. i. 11, 12), the firmament is likened to the curtains of a tabernacle, which will be “unstitched” at the time of the end (Job xiv. 12 LXX), and pass away as a scroll. The figure is one that appeals to the imagination. A scroll of parchment stretched out and suddenly released, is a figure employed to indicate the sudden departure of the “firmament”, “the stretched out heavens”. The word used in Rev. vi. 14 is apochorizomai, which occurs but once elsewhere, and speaks of a departure that followed a violent “paroxysm” or “contention” (Acts xv. 39). Chorizo which forms part of this word means “to put asunder” (Matt. xix. 6) and “separate” (Rom. viii. 35). Isa. xxxiv. 4 which speaks of the heavens being rolled together as a scroll, and so speaks of the “firmament” of Gen. i. 6, leads on to the repetition of the condition of Gen. i. 2, for in Isa. xxxiv. 11, as we have seen, “confusion” is tohu and “emptiness” is bohu, the two words translated “without form and void”.

The position at which the record of the ages has now reached is as follows:

«----------"Heaven itself" which does not pass away----------»
"Above the heavens"

Gen. i. 1	Gen. i. 2	The Firmament stretched out	Isa. xxxiv.	Rev. xxi.
Heaven and Earth	Gap	The Ages	Gap	New Heaven and New Earth
The Beginning	tohu bohu	The Pleroma	tohu bohu	and on to The End

Into the gap caused by the overthrow of Gen. i. 2 is placed the present creation which together with its temporary heaven is to pass away. This present creation, headed by man, constitutes the first of a series of "fullnesses" that follow a series of "gaps" until we at length arrive at Him, in Whom "all fullness dwells".

We read in Gen. i. 28 "Be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth" where the word "replenish" is the verb male, a word which as a noun is translated "fullness" in such passages as "The earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof" (Psa. xxiv. 1). The Septuagint uses the verb pleroo to translate male in Gen. i. 28.

Before we pass on to the next "gap" we must examine the Scriptures and endeavour to discover where the ages begin. In the above diagram it is suggested that the ages begin with the overthrow of Gen. i. 2 and end with the New Creation. This inquiry therefore, must be the subject of our next article.

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS,

While the Witness of The Berean Expositor could be described as the testimony of one man over a period of fifty-five years, it would only be partly true.

The Church of the One Body is a unity with Christ as the Head.

> "From Whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body, unto the edifying of itself in love" (Eph. iv. 16).

The continuance of this witness depends upon two things: (1) That we all hold Christ as Head; (2) Realizing that He alone can use the separate members of this Body if it is to,

"INCREASE WITH THE INCREASE OF GOD" (Col. ii. 19).

Yet another two years of witness have passed, and once again my fellow-trustees join me in giving thanks for all the loving and faithful support we have received during this period.

We go forward in full assurance of faith, looking away to Him Who alone is our sufficiency for all things.

The Chapel of the Opened Book
Anniversary, 28th September, 1963

We are glad to record once more that the meetings held on 28th September were inspiring and encouraging. As usual the chapel was well filled, and some were obliged to hear the services downstairs relayed to them by loudspeaker. Friends came from long distances, including Scotland and the north of England, while many isolated ones found the fellowship precious and strengthening. One could not help feeling that the over-ruling of the Lord was apparent over every detail, and for this we give Him our heart-felt praise.

In the afternoon service, our Secretary, Mr. G. T. Foster, gave his annual report on the work as a whole. He dwelt largely on the growth of the tape-recorded ministry in America and we were thrilled to hear how this has grown and been blessed by the Lord. The Assistant Principal, Mr. Stuart Allen, then gave an exposition of the Titles of Christ in the prison letters of the Apostle Paul, showing that in all things He has the first place (pre-eminence), and this should be His position in our lives.

The highlight of the evening service was the message given by our Principal, Mr. Charles H. Welch. We rejoice that he has been physically strengthened, so that he was able to be with us and minister the Word. Few will forget the two-fold theme from Job—"I know that my Redeemer liveth", and "He knoweth the way that I take". Bodily weakness has not lessened our brother's great capability in handling the Word of Truth, and we constantly commend him to the Lord for every need both spiritual and physical.

We would like to thank those who attended to the catering arrangements behind the scenes. This is as much service for the Lord as the ministry of the Scriptures. We commit every detail now to Him Who alone is able to give the "increase" which will be to His glory.

“The same commit thou to faithful men”
(II Tim. ii. 2).

Moses and Joshua, Aaron and Eliezer, Paul and Timothy, each in their own sphere make it manifest that a deep concern that the continuance of the ministry entrusted to them should not suffer because of the physical failure of those originally concerned.

The sudden necessity to drop all work and enter hospital made me realize that it was high time for me to follow the examples quoted above.

As surely as Joshua succeeded Moses, or Timothy, Paul, so Stuart Allen was indicated as the one to continue this printed witness. At first in order to avoid even a hint of pressure, I suggested that a new title be thought of, but the Trustees were so insistent that the title The Berean Expositor should be continued, that we have agreed, with joy, that the only change will be a new presentation of precious truth already committed to us. Stuart Allen will take up his new responsibilities in connection with The Berean Expositor from 1965 onwards.

I hope, most sincerely, that every present supporter of The Berean Expositor will continue to uphold and encourage him and his colleagues in this formidable task that they are undertaking in the Name of the Lord.

For some time the series of articles already started in the magazine and unfinished by 1964 will be threaded into the new issue, and the Trustees have a number of smaller booklets still in manuscript form that can help out in the formative days of this venture of faith.

I sincerely hope that every one will renew their subscriptions, so that the human instruments involved, whether retiring or commencing, shall be encouraged to “make full proof” of their ministry, until all witness ceases and all stand before the Judgment Seat of Christ. If only His “Well done” is heard in that day, what a joy it will be!

Will you help us to attain that wondrous goal?

Faith.

"Salvation-by-grace-through-faith" (Eph. ii. 8, 9).

pp. 159, 160

In a good many minds, it is the acknowledged doctrine that faith is the gift of God. This, of itself, if used and understood Scripturally is a blessed and wholesome teaching. Similarly we could say "thought is the gift of God", yet no one would advance as the corollary "therefore no one can think apart from some specially wrought miracle". The passage of Scripture of course which is in mind is that magnificent verse of Eph. ii., where the Apostle says:

> "By grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God: not of works, lest any man should boast" (Eph. ii. 8, 9).

The word translated 'that' is in the neuter gender. The word translated 'faith' is in the feminine gender, consequently the word 'that' cannot refer in the Greek to 'faith'. Moreover, salvation can conceivably be 'of works' but faith cannot be. We must be careful not to confuse Eph. ii. 8, 9 with I Cor. xii. 9:

> "But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal. For to one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom . . . . . to another faith by the same Spirit."

Here faith is grouped with such Pentecostal gifts as tongues, interpretation of tongues, the discerning of spirits, the gift of prophecy and the working of miracles. These gifts were to believers and were given in connection with the practical outworking of the truth as it pertained to the Acts period. Faith, in the context, cannot be lifted out apart from the rest of these evidential gifts. It is important to realize that all of them were for saved people and have no reference to initial salvation by grace or faith in Christ.

Coming back to the passage in Eph. ii., we should understand this to teach that the whole plan and scheme of salvation is one 'by grace—through faith', and that all of it, not faith by itself, is the gift of God. It is quite erroneous to tell an unsaved person that God must first give him the faith before he can believe in Christ. Nor will any man ever be able to say truthfully "I could not believe because faith was not given to me by God". A conception such as this is a perversion of truth.

(Eph. iii. 9, R.V.)

No.71. The Practical Section (iv. - vi.).

The Unity and the Bond (iv. 3).

pp. 1 - 3

In No.66 of this series we showed by a simple outline that the walk alternates with the One Body and with the New Man. Let us now give closer attention to the section devoted to the One Body, placing on either side the references to the walk.

EPHESIANS iv. 1 - 17.

A | 1-. The prisoner of the Lord. Beseeches.
B | a | -1. Walk worthy. Positive.
b | 2. Humility of mind.
C1 | c1 | 3-6. Unity of Spirit. Keep. Sevenfold.
d1 | 7. Measure. Gift of Christ.
e1 | 8-12. Gifts of Ministry: for perfecting.
C2 | c2 | 13-. Unity of Faith. Arrive. Sevenfold.
d2 | -13, 14. Measure. Fullness of Christ.
e2 | 15. Truth in love: for growth.
C3 | c3 | 16-. Unity of Body. Fitly joined. Sevenfold.
d3 | -16-. Measure. Every part.
e3 | -16. Edify self in love.
A | 17-. I testify in the Lord.
B | a | -17-. Walk not. Negative.
b | -17. Vanity of mind.

It will be seen by the structure that the unity which the Apostle now approaches is threefold. There is first the unity of the Spirit with its bond of peace. Then there is the unity of the Faith, and finally the unity of the One Body. The parallel passage to Eph. iv. 16 in Colossians, is Col. ii. 19, and there the "bond" of Eph. iv. 3 appear as the "bands" and the "ligaments" of the Body.

The Apostle exhorts us to "endeavour to keep". In Gal. ii. 10, referring to the suggestion of the leaders at Jerusalem that Paul should "remember the poor", the Apostle says, "the same which I also was forward to do". We find several allusions to the gatherings for the poor saints at Jerusalem, and when these offerings were ready, Paul undertook the journey in person to bring this evidence of fellowship and reconciliation to Jerusalem. "Forward" is the word endeavour. Writing his last letter to Timothy, he gives him among other things this charge:

> "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the Word of truth" (II Tim. ii. 15).

"Study" is the word endeavour. In the same epistle Paul urges Timothy to come to him in his captivity:

> "Do thy diligence to come shortly unto me: for Demas hath forsaken me . . . . . Trophimus have I left at Miletum sick. Do thy diligence to come before winter" (II Tim. iv. 9-21).

"Do diligence" is the word endeavour.

> "Let us labour therefore to enter into that rest, lest any man fall after the same example of unbelief" (Heb. iv. 11).

"Let us labour" is the word endeavour.

It will be seen that the word used by the Apostle indicates active, watchful diligence. This sacred trust is our concern. We jealously watch for any intrusion, any root of bitterness, any faction or element of strife. We cannot put the responsibility off on to another. Each one must share in the watch, each must honestly and truly endeavour to keep this treasure.

There are many words translated "keep" in the Scripture.

Bosko	=	To keep as a shepherd.
Phulasso	=	To guard as a soldier.
Echo	=	To hold as the servant did the pound.
Poieo	=	To keep as the passover.

Not one of these words is used by Paul in Eph. iv. 3. The word used here is tereo, which means to keep as one would a treasure; diatereo (Luke ii. 51) is used of Mary who treasured up in her heart things spoken of her infant Son. It is used once more in the prison epistles of Paul himself:

> "I have kept the faith" (II Tim. iv. 7).

Here then is the sacred trust. We are to keep the unity of the Spirit as Paul kept the faith. Through good report or evil report, through honour or dishonour, nothing must turn away our attention; we must be ever diligent in our duty, ever studying to keep our treasure intact, ever labouring to preserve this truth complete. Nevertheless, with all this personal sense of responsibility must be the equally important sense of the Lord's greater care. The same Apostle who so nobly kept the faith was persuaded that the Lord was able to keep that which had been entrusted until that day. The unity of the Spirit may be viewed as part of that good deposit which is so wonderfully spoken of in I Tim. vi. 20 and II Tim. i. 12 & 14.

What therefore are we to keep? The answer is "The unity of the Spirit". This however is an incomplete statement. We are to keep this unity with the bond of the peace, that is the full statement. Those who joined to the Lord are said to be one spirit with Him (I Cor. vi. 17). Some commentators speak of this unity as being the work of the Holy Spirit; others look upon it as indicating the unanimity of spirit that should actuate all the members of One Body. There is no conflict between these two views. Unanimity of spirit is only possible in that unity made by the Spirit of God. Outside must ever be strife and self-seeking. This unity of spirit is well illustrated and expressed in such passages as Rom. xv. 5, 6 and Phil. i. 17; ii. 1, 2.

This unity can only be kept by the bond of peace. What is this bond? What is this peace? It is that peace made by Christ Who made the two conflicting parties "one", Who destroyed the enmity between them, Who broke down the middle wall of partition, Who, by creating of the twain in Himself one new man "so making peace", made the bond of peace which effectually binds together the unity of the Spirit.

The things that were set aside were the things belonging to believers as "Jews" or as "Gentiles". None of these things are carried over. There is no reformation attempted. The unity of the Spirit is part of a new creation. In exercising our diligence over this, we shall see at once the attempt of this one to import some doctrine, or of that one to bring in some practice that belongs to the time before the middle wall was broken down. Nip all such attempts in the bud. Let them not get a foothold. Be willing to be called narrow, proud, anything, however untrue and unmerited, but endeavour to keep that sacred unity as you would defend your life.

We write because of the laxity of many, because of the confusion which exists in the mind of many as to the difference between humility of mind and resolution, of meekness and strength. We cannot be charitable with the goods of another. Stewardship, though exercised with all lowliness, meekness, longsuffering and forbearance, must nevertheless be above all things exercised faithfully. The Lord keep us faithful as the apostasy sets in.

The Sevenfold Unity of the Spirit (iv. 4 - 6).

pp. 21 - 26

In Eph. iv. 4-6 we have brought before us the sevenfold unity of the spirit, which we are urged to keep.

One LORD.
One HOPE. | One FAITH.
One SPIRIT. | One BAPTISM.
One BODY. | One GOD and FATHER.

Some of the elements of this unity are found in chapter ii.:--

> "For through Him (the one Lord) we the both (the one Body) have access by one Spirit unto the Father (the one God and Father)" (verse 18).

The Gentiles, being originally "without hope", can hold but the one hope of their calling. They have no other. They had also been saved by grace through faith, and that not of themselves, it was the gift of God. This accounts for every item except the one baptism. That is found, as we shall see more clearly presently, in the threefold union with the risen Lord expressed in the word "quickened together, raised together, seated together".

It is important to see that the central feature of this unity is the One Lord. Without the risen and ascended Christ there is no church which can be called the One Body. Not until Christ is seen as Head can the church be seen as body. This is clearly stated in Eph. i. 21-23. Apart from the ascended Son of God the one God would never be known as the one God and Father. Apart from the risen and ascended Lord the one baptism of the one spirit is impossible. The unity of the faith embraces the Son of God, and the one hope is nothing less than Christ Himself. Like the central shaft of the seven branched lampstand of the Tabernacle, all are united together in Him, all receive their fullness from Him. Severed from Him they are worthless. What hope have we outside of Christ? In whom can we have faith apart from Christ?

Let us now, having seen the essential position of Christ in this unity, look at the seven items in detail.

ONE BODY.—It is true that the figure of the body is used in I Cor. xii., but the context reveals that it is used in illustration of the distribution, diversity yet unity of spiritual gifts. The church of the One Body is a new creation, connected with the ascended Christ as its Head, in a sphere of glory that transcends all others, "far above all", and is directly related to the revelation of the mystery where it is given its peculiarly distinctive character, "a joint-Body" (Eph. iii. 6), a standing unknown before the Mystery was made known. Such in brief is the first item in this sevenfold unity. This we have to guard.

Some will deny that the one Body is peculiar to the dispensation of the Mystery. Some will teach that the body of I Cor. xii. is "all one and the same". Some even go so far as to teach that the One Body comprises every saved one from Adam onwards. All such attempts to destroy the testimony of the Lord's prisoner must be resisted. We must not, however, miss the emphasis on the one Body. We can have no connection with "bodies"; such cannot be recognized for one minute. All other unities, bodies, leagues, societies, are outside this sacred circle.

ONE SPIRIT.—The body, without the spirit, is dead, being alone, says James. What is the animating spirit of the One Body? Referring to the mortal body, the apostle says:--

> "But if the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies because of His Spirit that dwelleth in you" (Rom. viii. 11).

The analogy holds good. The Spirit of the risen Christ likewise is the one Spirit of the One Body. In Eph. i. and ii., two mighty energies are opposed. One is that of the spirit that now energizes the children of disobedience, the other, though not called by the name "spirit", is the Spirit of Him Who wrought in Christ when He raised Him from the dead. Another facet of this truth is revealed in Eph. ii. 18. It is the Spirit of sonship:--

> "For through Him we both have access by One Spirit unto the Father."

This is the Spirit in Whom we "the both" cry, according once more to Rom. viii., "Abba" (Hebrew), "Father" (Greek). The one Body and the one Spirit anticipate the one God and Father of all. It has been suggested that the apostle's meaning here is that the Gentiles share in the work and witness of "one and the self-same Spirit" of I Cor. xii. When the apostle desired to express that truth he uses the phrase to hen kai auto pneuma, whereas in Eph. iv. to auto, "the self-same", is omitted. Had the apostle intended to emphasize "the self-same", what a weight the sevenfold expression would have! The fact that we have the sevenfold "one" instead is sufficient to decide the apostle's intention.

ONE HOPE.—This item is extended:--

> "Even as ye are called in one hope of your calling."

This is the one hope of the mystery. If the theme of the mystery pervades Eph. i., then it is possible that the word rendered "his" in i. 18 should be rendered "its", referring to the mystery:--

> "The eyes of your heart having been enlightened: that ye may know what is the hope of its calling", i.e. the hope of the calling of the Mystery.

"That blessed hope" is the "appearing of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ", expressed in other words in Col. iii. 4:--

"When Christ Who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with Him in glory."

The one hope of our calling is that we shall be manifested with Him in glory. The hope of the One Body antedates the second advent. By the time the Lord descends from heaven with a shout, and the saints of the Thessalonian company rise to meet Him in the air, the one hope of our calling will have been realized. We have a prior hope (Eph. i. 12). The signs of the times thicken around us. The movements of the nations and of the nation of Israel are trumpet-tongued. The night is far spent, the day is at hand. If the hope of the parousia is near, so much nearer must be the one hope of our calling.

There have been some who have foolishly asserted that we deny the coming of the Lord. We trust that no reader will give credence to such a statement. What we believe is that the coming of the Lord to the air or to the Mount of Olives is not the hope of the one body, which is a very different matter.

ONE LORD.—As we have seen, the Person and Office of Christ as the one Lord is vital to the unity of the Spirit. The title Lord supposes resurrection.

> "For to this end Christ both died, and lived again, that He might be Lord of the dead and of the living" (Rom. xiv. 9).

The great confession of things in heaven, things on earth, and things under the earth is that "Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father". Here again the dominion over both dead and living is manifest.

We do not embark here upon the fact that whoever bears the title "Lord" is the Jehovah of the O.T., as too many and weighty matters arise out of this to be discussed here. We have dealt with this subject in a series entitled "One Lord". We must not, however, omit one passage, namely, I Cor. viii. 5, 6:--

> "For though there be that are called gods, either celestial or terrestrial (as there be gods many, and lords many), yet to us there is but one God, the Father, of Whom are all things, and we for Him; and one Lord, Jesus Christ, by Whom are all things, and we by Him."

To understand this passage we must make a digression. When Paul went to Athens and preached the gospel, some said:--

> "He seemeth to be a setter forth of strange (or foreign) DEMONS" (Acts xvii. 18).

Now what was there in the gospel as preached by Paul that could have led to such an idea? The Scripture says that the Athenians thought this:--

> "Because he preached unto them Jesus, AND THE RESURRECTION" (Acts xvii. 18).

What connection can there be between "Jesus and the resurrection" and "foreign demons"? We must understand that among the Gentiles demons were supposed to be the spirits of men who had died. These demons acted as mediators between men and the far-off celestial gods. They were the "gods terrestrial" and the "lords many" of

I Cor. viii. In the O.T. these terrestrial gods, demons, or mediators are called "Baalim"; which Paul literally translates "lords". When Paul spoke of "Jesus" Who had died and yet Who lived again, when he spoke of Him as the Lord, and as the Mediator, he was using expressions that implied, to the heathen mind, a foreign demon. "To us", said the apostle, "there is but one Lord, one Mediator". The words are used with precision:--

> "One God, the Father, OUT OF WHOM (as the originating cause) are the all things (ta panta, not 'all things' in general, but that particular universe directly brought into being for the purpose of the ages), and we for Him; and one Lord (the Mediator), THROUGH WHOM (the mediating cause) are the all things, and we through Him."

There is no question raised here of the Deity of Christ, the whole question is one of mediation. This is the great feature in the unity of the Spirit. At either extreme is the One Body and the one God and Father. Access is through the one Lord. As the Lord, too, He rules and has supreme dominion, and all profession of the unity of the Spirit that does not recognize the necessity to obey the one Lord is likely to be an empty profession.

ONE FAITH.—As this item is lifted out for separate treatment in the next section of chapter iv., and space is limited, we pass on to:--

ONE BAPTISM.—The structure of the unity places the one baptism over against the one Spirit. The entire absence of types and shadows from the epistles of the Mystery lends weight to the thought that this is not the baptism in water, but that of the Spirit. The fact that there is "one baptism" is both conclusive and exclusive. John the Baptist baptized in water. This could be called one baptism. During the Acts baptism in water was accompanied by baptism of the Spirit. This cannot be called one baptism, for there were two. If we can speak of two baptisms as one, then how shall we treat the other members of this unity. Are there then two Lords, two Gods, two Bodies?

We occasionally come into touch with companies of believers who, by the prominence which they give to baptism by water, refer to themselves as "baptized believer". Moreover, it is very usual to find those who are members of the One Body and blessed with all spiritual blessings under the dispensation of the Mystery, conceding this point, and allowing others to say of them, they do not believe in baptism.

Nothing could be further from the truth. Every member of the One Body is a "baptized believer", and in no sense should we allow any to say of us that we do not believe in baptism. See the strange argument which is used; while it is conceded by those who practice water baptism that it is a typical rite, nevertheless, we allow those who emphasize the shadow to monopolize the claim to baptism, while we who rejoice in the substance (the "one baptism") often appear to undervalue it. It must be one of the objects of our endeavour, for without it the unity of the Spirit is incomplete. "Divers baptisms" are classified as "carnal ordinances" in Heb. ix. 10, which together with the Tabernacle and its offerings, was a representative figure (parabole) for the season then present.

If we take the opening verses of Rom. vi. to teach the lesson conveyed by the immersion of the believer in water, we shall be the better able to understand the reality of the one baptism in Eph. iv.:

> "Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Christ Jesus, were baptized into His death? Therefore we were buried with Him by baptism into His death, that, like as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, so also we should walk in newness of life. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of His death, we shall be also in the likeness of His resurrection."

When we turn to the epistle to the Ephesians, we find that we have been:

> "Made alive together with Christ, ... and raised together, and made to sit together in the heavenlies in Christ Jesus" (ii. 5, 6).

By consulting Eph. iv. 5 we read that there is ONE baptism. It is nothing less than a piece of self-deception to make ONE read TWO, for if one baptism can mean two, then one Body may well mean two, one Spirit two, etc. During the Acts of the Apostles, there were TWO baptisms, viz. water and Spirit, the type and the reality. The reality has always been the baptism of the Spirit, and when the type has no dispensational place the reality still remains untouched and unchanged.

True baptism united the believer with his Lord in His death and resurrection—a unity typically set forth in the ceremony of water baptism. What therefore can have possessed the mind of believers when we find them reasoning that while the reality is the baptism of the Spirit, and the type that of water, the removal of the TYPE removes the REALITY! Is there no true Tabernacle which the Lord pitched and not man, because the earthly type has crumbled to dust? Is there no one sufficient Sacrifice because the typical offerings have ceased? What distorted logic is it that dares to say that those believers who, by the Divine sentence, are united by one Spirit to the death, burial, resurrection and present glory of the ascended Lord, are un-baptized? Col. ii. 11, 12 speaks emphatically on this point:

> "In whom ye were circumcised with the circumcision made without hands, in the putting off the body of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ, having been buried with Him by baptism, wherein also ye were raised with Him through the faith of the inworking of God Who raised Him out from the dead."

Doubtless in the days of the apostles, and after, there were those who would strenuously deny that the Gentiles were the true circumcision (Phil. iii. 3), simply because they had not submitted to an external rite; nevertheless the circumcision without hands was the real thing, while many who boasted of the carnal rite were foreigners to the reality. In the same way, that baptism which unites the believer with his Lord is independent of the carnal ordinance. When the nature of the dispensation required typical ordinances, God commanded water baptism in association with the real invisible baptism. When the dispensation changed and believers were "no longer children" and "put away childish things", the external ceremony was not imposed upon them, but the reality remained. The one baptism of the one Spirit is the only baptism that figures in the unity of the Spirit.

If other believers are found biting and devouring one another over the shadow, let us see to it that we do not, for a little peace, yield the true place of the substance. Our stand must be that every member of the church of the One Body is ipso facto a "baptized believer", and that no amount of emphasis on the type can lift it into the place of the reality.

> "The things which are seen are temporal, the things that are not seen are age-abiding" (II Cor. iv. 18).

The underlying meaning of the type of baptism is that of union. This union may be set forth by the immersion of a believer in water, it may be set forth by the baptism of the Spirit, bringing with its supernatural gifts, as in I Cor. xii., or it may not be set forth manifestly and typically at all. The last statement suits the case of the present dispensation. The members of the one Body observe neither days, fasts, feasts, ordinances, nor Sabbath days. These are shadows. The Body is of Christ (Col. ii.). The one baptism unites us to the risen Christ, and we have no command to set forth this union in symbol or type; neither have we any warrant to look for "signs" in connection with our baptism by the Spirit. (The interested reader is referred to the article entitled "Baptized Believers" on page 158 of Volume XI.)

Was the baptism of Matt. xx. 21-22 in water? Was the baptism of I Cor. x. 12 in water? See Exod. xiv. 22 "upon dry ground".

ONE GOD AND FATHER.—The purpose of the ages is to bring many sons to glory. Sin has necessitated redemption, and it has been necessary for all the children of God to have been "born again". The cycle is suggested by the unity of the Spirit. The goal is one God and Father. This member is expanded, like the one dealing with hope:--

> "One God and Father of all, Who is over all, and through all, and in all" (Eph. iv. 6).

Are we to gather from this that the last item of the unity of the Spirit teaches the universal fatherhood of God? The "all" is governed by the context. If the word "you" is retained in the clause "in you all", the idea of the passage is made apparent. It can be translated, the Father is over all, through all, "and in all TO YOU". Just as Christ is head over all things TO THE CHURCH, though not yet Head over all things manifestly and universally, so the Father is to us.

What a calling is ours! Christ raised and ascended far above all, as Head over all things now to us, and the one God and Father, over all, through all, in all to us, as well. What peace this brings; what triumph, what confidence! Well may we be exhorted to give diligence to keep such a treasure. Let us guard this perfect sevenfold unity of the Spirit in the bond of that peace made by the blood of Christ, until that day comes when stewardship ceases, and the joy of the Lord remains.

No.73. The Practical Section (iv. - vi.).

The Measure of the Gift of Christ (iv. 7 - 11).

pp. 41 - 44

The unity of the Spirit is followed by the diversity of its members. In the unity the emphasis is upon the fact that there is One Body, one Spirit, and one Lord of all; but in the next section, which comes under the heading "The measure", the theme is the variety of the gifts of the Lord, and the individual responsibility of each member to use the gift as unto the Lord.

We feel a necessity here to correct a wrong impression which our remarks may give. The gift of Christ which is the "measure" must not be confounded with the "gifts" possessed by the early church. If we omit the parenthesis of verses 8-10, we shall find that the gifts are specially qualified men, and not "gifts" to individuals:--

> "But unto every one of us is given grace, according to the measure of the gift of Christ . . . . . and He gave some, apostles (not apostolic gifts); and some, prophets (not the gift of prophecy); and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers" (Eph. iv. 7, 11).

This fourfold ministry must be looked upon as the gift of the ascended Christ to the church of the One Body, and viewed in a different light from the gifts distributed by the Holy Spirit among the saints during the period of the Acts. Gifts of persons rather than gifts to persons seems to express the difference. There is, however, one thing common to all the gifts, whether of the earlier or later dispensations. In Eph. iv. 7 it is indicated by the word "measure"; in Rom. xii. 6 the same principle is found in the word "differing"; in I Cor. xii. 11 it is indicated by the word "severally"; in Matt. xxv. 15 it is seen in the expression "several ability". Let us see these verses together:--

> "But unto every one of us is given grace, according to the measure of the gift of Christ" (Eph. iv. 7).
>
> "Having then gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us, whether prophecy, let us prophecy according to the proportion of faith" (Rom. xii. 6).
>
> "But all these worketh that one and self-same Spirit, dividing to every man severally as He will" (I Cor. xii. 11).
> "And unto one He gave five talents, to another two, and to another one; to everyone according to his several ability" (Matt. xxv. 15).

There is great comfort here in the midst of this atmosphere of responsibility. While the Lord expected the man who had five talents to produce another five talents, He was just as pleased with the man who had produced two talents with his two. And had the servant who had but one talent produced another one, he too would have received the "well done", and have entered into the joy of his Lord. It is evident that the principle of "percentage" is recognized by the Lord. The apostle is under the great responsibility of rightly using the apostolic gift, but we, who have no such gift, need not feel concerned because our experiences and the results of our labours do not appear comparable with those of the apostle. If we are as faithful as the great apostle in any small degree, the "well done" is equally assured. Therefore let us not merely think of the gift, but also of the "measure of the gift", and according to that measure seek to fulfil the purpose and good pleasure of the Lord.

How often we find those without the necessary qualification occupied in evangelistic work when their "measure" is that of teaching, organizing, interceding or what not. Again, let us give a deaf ear to that bane of the Christian worker, the busybody who is always telling us what we "ought to do". The Lord knows whether He wants us to be preaching to the unsaved, teaching the saints, ministering to the sick, serving with our hands, using the pen, or praying for others. Let us each one be "fully persuaded in his own mind", and then seeing our ministry "fulfil it" (Col. iv. 7; II Tim. iv. 5).

Before detailing the ministry which was given by Christ to the church of the One Body, the apostle makes a reference to Psa. lxviii. 18. We have not here in Eph. iv. 8 a strictly literal quotation either of the Hebrew or the Greek of the LXX. The sense of the passage is preserved, and this manner of reference makes us feel that the apostle wished to take a thought from the Psalm rather than intend us to understand that he taught that this Psalm was strictly prophetic of the ascension of Christ and the gift of apostles, prophets, etc. The "ascension on high" of Psa. lxviii. 18 has reference to the "the hill of God . . . . . an high hill as the hill of Bashan" (verse 15); the ascension of Eph. iv., as we shall see, is beyond computation in vastness. The apostle decides for us just what part of this quotation he intended to be prominent, for in verse 9 he lifts it out for further consideration:--

> "Now that word 'HE WENT UP' what saith it, but that He first came down to the earth below?" (Conybeare and Howson).

What does it imply? If the Scripture declares that Christ ascended, He must have previously descended first to the lower parts of the earth. Many old expositors interpret this descent of the Lord as a descent into hell. Others understand it to refer to the grave. Bloomfield, Conybeare & Howson and many others see in the expression, "the lower parts of the earth", "the lower parts, namely, the earth". Dr. Bullinger, in Figures of Speech, places the expression under the "Genitive of Apposition", "the lower parts, that is to say, the earth":--

> "He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens, that He might fill all things" (Eph. iv. 10).

Have we appreciated as we should the fact of the ascension and its bearing upon the church of the dispensation of the mystery? "Christ risen" is not sufficient. Israel's King must be Christ risen, for Psa. ii. 7 declares the decree:--

> "The Lord hath said unto Me, Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee."

In Heb. iv. 14 the apostle tells us that Christ "passed through the heavens"; in vii. 26 he says of Him, "made higher than the heavens". These passages, together with that of Eph. iv. 10, give us some idea of the magnitude of that ascension.

Paul has a purpose in this statement as we may well believe. What is it? Christ ascended up far above all heavens "that He might fill (pleroo, cf. pleroma) all things" (ta panta, the all things). We cannot avoid the reference back to Eph. i. 20-23:--

> "Seated at His own right hand far above all . . . . . and gave Him (as) Head over all things to the church, which is His body, the fullness (pleroma) of Him that filleth (pleroo) the all things (ta panta) with all."

This reference does something else for us. It explains the meaning of Eph. iv. 7 "the gift of Christ". We did not discuss the question earlier as to whether this phrase means "a gift that Christ gives", or that Christ Himself was to be considered as the gift. Eph. i. 22 decides this for us:--

> "The gift of Christ" (Tes doreas tou Christou).
> "And gave Him to be Head" (Kai auton edoke kephalen).

We may now read Eph. iv. 7-10 again:--

> "But unto every one of us is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ, i.e., God's gift of Christ as Head of His Church, and that church the fullness of Him that filleth all in all. Seeing that the members are the fullness of Christ, as Christ is the fullness of the all things, we are again reminded that in His ascension, and in the capacity of the One who fills all things, the gifts of ministry to the One Body were given."

What a different aspect this gives to ministry, to that one of "taking up the profession"! What an unspeakable privilege to receive the very lowest call in this glorious order! Even the humble pastor and teacher of this church is seen to be vitally connected with the great purpose of the ages. His ministry is a part of the great pleroma, the all things, that which Christ is making to accomplish the glorious goal of the ages, and to undo the works of the Devil. We can understand the apostle's allusion in iii. 7-11 the better by seeing this:--

> "Whereof I was made a minister, according to the gift of the grace of God given unto me by the effectual working of His power. Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, ... according to the purpose of the ages . . . . ."

If every servant of God realized his stewardship like this, what a difference there would be!

The gifts of the ascended Christ to His church may now be noted.

Who are these apostles? We may first of all reply negatively: they cannot be "the twelve", for the twelve were appointed by the Lord whilst he was on earth. Their names are given in Matt. x., and the one who fell, Judas, is replaced by Matthias who was "numbered with the eleven", who received the self-same enduement of the Holy Spirit as they did (Acts ii. 3).

It goes without saying that Paul was one of this new order of apostles, and the chief. We need not labour this point. Who are the others, for it says "apostles"? We shall find that even during the Acts period and before the revelation of the mystery there are others besides the twelve and Paul who bear the title "apostle".

> "When the apostles, Barnabas and Paul, heard it" (Acts xiv. 14).

If Barnabas was not an apostle of the One Body, he was an apostle to the Gentiles in a way the "twelve" were not.

> "These things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myself and Apollos . . . . . For I think that God hath set forth US the apostles last" (I Cor. iv. 6-9).

Here we find Apollos included in the list of apostles.

> "Salute Andronicus and Junia, my kinsmen, and my fellow-prisoners, who are of note among the apostles" (Rom. xvi. 7).

We admit that the meaning of this passage may merely be that other apostles knew these fellow-prisoners of Paul very well. Andronicus and Junia may have been apostles; there we leave the matter and pass on.

> "We might have been burdensome, as the apostles of Christ" (I Thess. ii. 6).

The "We" must refer to the names at the head of the epistle, viz., "Paul, and Silas, and Timothy". The references in II Cor. viii. 23, and Phil. ii. 25, "apostles of the churches" and "your apostle" we do not press, feeling that in these cases the idea is simply that such were legates of the several churches and not apostles in the sense we are considering. We can however set down the following names of apostles other than "the twelve": Paul, Silas, Timothy, Barnabas, Apollos; if we include Andronicus and Junia, we have at least seven apostles of a new order than the twelve. If this be so during the dispensation of the Acts of the apostles, it is even more probable that for such a new sphere of service as the dispensation of the Mystery, other apostles, called in harmony with the glorious revelation of the pleroma, sent directly from the ascended Head for the benefit of the members, will be given.

No.74. The Practical Section (iv. - vi.).

Readjustment (iv. 12)

pp. 61 - 67

The fourfold gift to the church, which we have already considered, was given with a very special object:--

For (pros) the perfecting of the saints:--
1. Unto (eis) a work of ministry.
2. Unto (eis) a building up of the body of Christ.

Before the work of ministry could be entered upon, or the body built up, something had to be done to meet the dispensational crisis of Acts xxviii. The state of affairs at that time is expressed in the word "perfecting". Had the church of the One Body been the "perfect" state of which the church of I Cor. xiii. was the immature, this development of doctrine and status could have been expressed by the word so often translated "to perfect" (teleioo). This however is not the case. The word used here for the "perfecting" of the saints indicates a rupture, a break, a dislocation, such as we might expect when such a drastic setting aside of the channel of blessing took place, as it did, in Acts xxviii.

Katartismos.—This word according to Cremer is used in classical Greek in medical works only. Katartizo occurs in Matt. iv. 21, "mending their nets", where the primary idea restore is seen. In I Cor. i. 10 it comes in a context of division:--

> "I beseech you . . . . . that there be no divisions among you, but that ye be perfectly joined together."

So also in Gal. vi. 1:--

> "Ye which are spiritual restore such an one."

To mend as one would a broken net, to be perfectly joined together as contrasted with division, to restore as one would a dislocated limb (the medical use of the word), this sense seems uppermost in Eph. iv.

The apostles and prophets of the earlier order were not necessarily fitted to mend the rupture that had been caused by Israel's rejection. A special set of apostles and prophets was given by the Lord, whose primary business it was to bridge the gulf, and to reset the saints into their new position. These laid the foundation (Eph. ii. 20). Their work was accompanied and also followed by the evangelist and the teacher, and all united together in the one great work of readjustment, for the very gospel took on new aspects, such as the "gospel of peace" and the "gospel of glory". At such times some old things pass away, some old things are brought over into the new setting, and some new things are revealed. It is only through the writings of the later ministry of Paul that we can learn these differences.

Take an example, well-known to most students of Scripture. In I Cor. ix. are two important items of church practice:--

1. The position of women in relation to men in the ministry.
2. The Lord's supper.

Apart from the teaching given by the specially equipped ministers whose work it was to readjust the saints, we should not know whether both the above were carried over into the new dispensation, whether both were left behind, whether the Lord's supper only was retained, or whether the relationship of the man and woman only was carried over. Who could possibly decide this but the Lord Himself? In Paul's first epistle to Timothy (ii. 8-15) the relation of the sexes in ministry is repeated and readjusted. Here we stand upon positive teaching. The second item, the Lord's supper, is not repeated, either in this chapter, this epistle, or in any epistle written by Paul for the instruction of the church and its ministry after Acts xxviii.

Let those who feel that they must continue this remembrance of the Lord's death do so as unto the Lord, we have no right to judge them, but let them also acknowledge that we too, who no longer partake of a typical feast which is vitally connected with the new covenant and so with the Israel's restoration and kingdom, and closely linked with the parousia phase of the Lord's coming, let them acknowledge that we too when we eat not, to the Lord we "eat not" and are "fully persuaded in our own mind" (Rom. xiv. 3-6).

We have already seen, in the sevenfold unity of the Spirit, that the apostle has likewise decided for us whether we observe the baptism of John, or Peter and Paul during the Acts, of the Spirit in His manifest gifts, or of that silent, unseen, yet vital union with the risen Christ, which after all is the meaning underlying all the varied baptisms of other dispensations, and which alone gives the typical ordinance its value and power.

This ministry moreover was directed to "the saints' and was a work of "edifying the Body of Christ" rather than world-wide evangelization. The gospel for the unsaved is still the gospel as revealed in Romans. The epistle to the Ephesians assumes that the reader has reached the inner teaching of Rom. v.-viii., "dead to sins". The readjusting of the saints had a twofold goal:--

1. Unto a work of ministry.
2. Unto a building up of the body of Christ.

Work is valueless apart from dispensational truth. Labour expended upon the Body of Christ with undispensational Scriptures does not build up but destroys. The scattered and divided state of the church to-day is largely the result of the attempt to combine dispensations that differ. The reader may be engaged in "a work of ministry", but it is worth while to stop and consider its relation to the various phases of God's purpose. Some of God's children are engaged in phases of kingdom truth. They sometimes condemn us because we see something different. We do not condemn them however, but readily admit that there are other circles of ministry still open to-day than that of the One Body. The failure is most manifest when one, who professedly belongs to the One Body and seeks to minister in that sphere, for reasons of "usefulness" and through the claims of others descends to an unwholesome blend of Body, Bride, and Kingdom, which cannot but produce a hybrid following. What is true of the particular case of ministry is true in a wider sense, as the parallel of Col. i. 10 shows:--

> "That ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful unto every good work."

Instead of looking upon dispensational truth as a phase of things that can be taken up as a kind of hobby or left as the case may be, we should look upon it as laying at the base and root of all our actions, doctrine and ministry.

The goal of this readjustment and ministry is the building up of the Body of Christ. Do we appreciate the emphatic place that Scripture gives to that ministry which "builds up"? In Eph. iv. 16 we find it as the great goal of joint service:--

> "Unto the building up of itself in love."

And again in verse 29:--

> "Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth, but that which is good to the use of edifying (or building up)."

Look at I Cor. viii. 1:--

> "Knowledge puffeth up, but love edifieth."

This truth is expanded after the chapter of love (xiii.), and in its two forms comes seven times in chapter xiv. (verses 3-5, 12, 17 and 26):--

> "He that prophesieth speaketh unto man to edification . . . . . He that speaketh in an unknown tongue edifieth himself; but he that prophesieth edifieth the church . . . . . that the church may receive edifying."
>
> "Forasmuch as ye are zealous of spiritual gifts, seek that ye may excel to the edifying of the church . . . . . but the other is not edified . . . . . Let all things be done unto edifying."

By comparing Eph. iv. with Eph. ii. we may learn something of the sacred fellowship such ministry has with the Spirit of God:--

> "In whom all the building fitly framed together groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord: In whom ye also are builded together for an habitation of God in Spirit" (ii. 21, 22).

In the doctrinal section the temple "grows", and the sphere of that growth is "in Him" and "in Spirit". In the practical section the body is "built up" by the human instrument given and equipped by the ascended Lord. All ministry is therefore but fellowship in the great work of God Himself. It is His pleasure that upon the defection of His people Israel, an elect company should be called and gathered together as a holy Temple, a habitation of God. That indicates and limits the sphere and activity of the ministry appointed under those terms. We do not write these words in criticism of the ministry of others, called under other economies, but we do recognize in them our own all-sufficient authority for the work we seek to do and the ministry we seek to fulfil.

To any reader who may be conscious of any indirectness of aim, or who is easily turned aside by the criticism of others, or who is easily plunged into despair because of opposition or non-success, we would suggest a quiet prayerful weighing over of the dispensational grounds of his ministry and stewardship, feeling sure that conviction as to that will carry strength for all that follows. Paul knew Whom he had believed, he was certain of the nature of his call, and the fact that all forsook him, and many misjudged him, then became a light matter. Let us give a résumé of these important features:--

1. PERFECTING.—The first thing to decide as before the Lord is the dispensation in which one is called to serve.
2. MINISTRY.—Then, and only then, can ministry be worthy of the name; all other labour is in vain.
3. EDIFYING.—Never lose sight of this great feature. While others may feel called upon to pull down, and to expose error, let us see to it that we steadily and surely, as in the troublous times of Nehemiah, "build up the Body of Christ", thereby having blessed fellowship with the great Worker Who is silently building up a habitation of God in Spirit.

(Mystery15, pp.17-21).

The Threefold Goal (iv. 13)

(Mystery15, pp.21-25).

The first great unity in this chapter is that of the Spirit; the second is that of the faith. The first measure is that of the gift of Christ; the second is the stature of the fullness of Christ. We found that upon mentioning the unity of the Spirit, the apostle immediately proceeded to detail its sevenfold structure (Eph. iv. 3-6). May we expect to find the same help in connection with the unity of the faith? We believe we may:--

> "Until we all should arrive unto the unity of the faith, and the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ" (Eph. iv. 13).

The word kai, translated "and", is explained by Dr. Bullinger in his Analytical Texicon thus:--

> "Kai (the conjunction of annexation, uniting things strictly co-ordinate), and; sometimes not merely annexing, but implying increase, addition, something more, also, or only emphasis, even."

If we take the meaning of kai to be "even" in this passage, it emphasizes the great centre of the faith toward which the new ministry directed the saints:--

> "EVEN the knowledge of the Son of God" (Eph. iv. 13).

No creed was ever so simple. None ever so exhaustive and complete. We might have expected that the Apostle often spoke of Christ as the Son of God, but this is not the case. The passage before us is the only occurrence of the title in the four prison epistles, nay, in any epistle of Paul written after Acts xxviii. It stands therefore the one unique utterance in the dispensation of the Mystery. In his earlier epistles Paul uses the title three times, namely in Gal. ii. 20, which speaks of his identification with the death and the life of the Son of God; in II Cor. i. 19, where he declares that all the promises of God find their yea and their amen in Him; and in Rom. i. 1-4 He is seen as the sum and substance of the gospel of God, marked off as "the Son of God with power according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection of the dead".

There are however other references besides these, for the passages wherein occur the words "His Son" must be included. If the unity of the faith is comprehended in the knowledge of the Son of God, then all that is revealed concerning that Son must go to constitute the oneness of the faith. It is not possible to enter into a careful study of each occurrence, but we can set the passages before the reader who will not fail to appreciate the contribution to a fuller knowledge.

*Gal. i. 16.	The Son revealed in Paul, that He might be preached among the Gentiles.
Gal. ii. 20.	The Son of God. His faith, His life, the life lived by Paul
Gal. iv. 4.	The Son sent in the fullness of time.
Gal. iv. 6.	The Spirit of the Son in the hearts of all God's sons.
I Thess. i. 10.	The believers wait for His Son from heaven.
I Cor. i. 9.	The fellowship of His Son.
I Co. xv. 28.	The final act of His Son.
II Cor. i. 19, 20.	All the promises of God. Yea and Amen in the Son.
Rom. i. 3.	The gospel of God concerning His Son.
Rom. i. 4.	Declared the Son of God with power, by resurrection.
Rom. i. 9.	The gospel of His Son.
Rom. v. 10.	Reconciliation by the death of His Son.
Rom. viii. 3.	Sent in the likeness of sinful flesh.
Rom. viii. 29.	Conformed to the image of His Son.
Rom. viii. 32.	God spared not His own Son.

The reasons for placing Galatians first are given in our Book,*
"THE APOSTLE OF THE RECONCILIATION".

Evangelical truth, church fellowship, individual experience, dispensational truth, age purpose and promises, all find their goal, their assurance, their centre in the Son of God. These are the facets of truth illuminated by the apostle Paul. There is however a vast field in the Gospels and the Acts, where messianic prophecies, the kingship of Israel, aionian life, the raising of the dead, and other themes are found associated with the same title. It will be seen that the unity of the faith is a mighty comprehension. The four passages of Paul's writing which definitely use the title Son of God speak of:--

Life now being by faith of \ Promises being Yea and Amen in \ THE SON OF GOD.
Resurrection declaring with power /
Unity of the faith being the knowledge of / and these may well be taken as heads, dividing the revelation concerning Him into their various departments.

The knowledge of the Son of God is really "full knowledge" (epignosis). Delitzsch says (Hebraerbr. 493, Cremer), "We may speak of a false gnosis, but not of a false epignosis, for epignosis seems to suggest that the knowledge gained acts powerfully upon the person". In Col. iii. 10 it appears that this epignosis is not so much the gradual and mental attainment; it is associated with "renewal", and is according to the "image" of he Creator. In Col. ii. 2 the epignosis of the Mystery of God is approached by close fellowship in love and in all the riches of the full assurance of understanding, and here the Mystery of God is Christ, the Vatican MS reading being "the secret of God, Christ, in Whom are hid". The full knowledge of the will of God is necessary if we would walk worthy of the Lord, pleasing Him in all things (Col. i. 9, 10). Epignosis and epiginosko include the idea of "acknowledging" as in Eph. i. 17, and in the practical outworking of our calling (Eph. iv.-vi.) the "acknowledgment of the Son of God" must be included in all comprehensive knowledge of Him, otherwise we shall have a "body" of truth without the "spirit" which alone makes it live.

Finally, this full knowledge must be sought by prayer. Eph. i. 17 shows that it is the outcome of the gift of the spirit of wisdom and revelation. It is this full knowledge of the Son of God that constitutes the unity of the faith. While the faith rests upon historic fact, it will be realized that in this word we have something deeper than acquaintance with prophecy of fulfillment. The chief priests and scribes, who so readily referred Herod to the prophet's utterance that the Messiah should be born in Bethlehem of Judaea, had gnosis, but they had not epignosis, for if they had they would have anticipated the wise men with their gifts and their homage. Old Simeon and Anna show the heart-knowledge which seems to be contained in epignosis. Looking at the passage once more we observe that it suggests a threefold goal:--

"Until we all should arrive—
Unto (eis) the unity of the faith, even the full knowledge of the Son of God.
Unto (eis) a perfect (mature) man.
Unto (eis) the measure of the stature of the fullness of the Christ" (Eph. iv. 13).

Consequent upon that epignosis of the Son of God is the perfect man. Man, here, is not the usual anthropos, but aner. Five times in chapter v. this word is translated "husband". This is a man, full grown, in his prime, fit and complete. The apostle knew that every believer will be presented "holy, and unblameable, and unreproveable" in the sight of God through the death of Christ, yet he longs for another "presentation", he longs to be able to "present" every man "perfect" in Christ (Col. i. 22, 28). What can be more perfect than the position of Col. i. 22? Nothing. The highest conception of the idea "perfect" is not that of the Greek telieios. This word, derived from telos, the end or goal, suggests the idea of having gone on to the end, having laid hold of that for which one has been laid hold upon, as Phil. iii. 12 puts it.

The teleios is often contrasted with the child, as in Heb. v. 12-14 & I Cor. xiii. 10, 11, where the knowledge is elementary, the sight weak, the discernment small, the food milk. The church of the One Body is the pleroma, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all, and that, and nothing short of that, is its measure:--

> "Unto the measure of the stature of the pleroma of Christ."

The great purpose of the ages, expressed in the word "fullness" and the part that the One Body has in that great restoring work, is the measure of its growth. It is the answer to the prayer of Eph. iii. 19:--

> "To know that which surpasses knowledge—the love of Christ, so that you may be filled up to (that is the 'measure') all the fullness of God."

Such is the threefold object of the ministry of the apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers. The readjustment of the saints had "the fullness" in view. The work of ministry had the "perfect man" in mind. The building up of the Body of Christ had the fullness before it, for the Church is the fullness of Christ. This may be better grasped if set out thus:--

Apostles, etc., given:--
(1). For the readjustment.
(2). For ministry.
(3). For building up the Body of Christ. (i. 23).

Till we all arrive:--
(1). Unto the unity of the faith.
(2). Unto a perfect man.
(3). Unto the stature of the pleroma. (i. 23).

How definite such a ministry is. Here is no beating the air, no uncertain sound; it is the realization in practice of the revelation given in Eph. i. 23.

(Mystery15, pp.21-25).

No.75. The Practical Section (iv. - vi.).

The Head, Ta panta (iv. 15)

pp. 81 - 86

The admonition to "speak the truth in love" taken from the A.V. of Eph. iv. 15 is one that should ever be before the mind of the believer. It is not, however, the meaning of this particular verse. There is no word here for "speaking", it is rather "being the truth", i.e., so living that every act and motion and motive shall be in line with "truth". It is possible that the words "in love" complete the statement, "being the truth in love", but we believe the true rendering of the passage links the words "in love" with what follows, namely, growth.

We have been warned of the dangers that beset the believer who remains a "babe". To attain the unity of the faith necessitates the "perfect man" and the "stature or full age" of the fullness of Christ. This therefore demands growth. Over against the sleight of men, the cunning craftiness and the systematic deception of wickedness, the apostle places one simple word, aletheuontes. One wishes that our language permitted such a word as "truthing", it does not, but even "being true" seems weak in comparison with the fullness of the original. Over against the perfect man and the stature, the apostle places "growth". It can be easily seen if set out thus:--

A | Faith, knowledge, perfect man, stature of Christ.
B | Systematic deception.
B | Being true.
A | Growth in love into Christ.

The words "in love" we believe should be read with the words "we should be growing". It will be observed that the section of verses 15 and 16 is bounded by the words "in love":--

"IN LOVE we should be growing unto Him, the all things, Who is the Head–Christ
. . . . unto the building up of itself IN LOVE."

We have pointed out in other articles of this series that the "Body" of Eph. iv. is the reflection in the practical section of the "Temple" in the doctrinal (Eph. ii.).

The Temple is built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets.
The Body is built up as a result of the ministry of the apostles and prophets.
The Temple is fitly framed together.
The Body is fitly joined together.
The Temple has Christ as its Chief Corner stone.
The Body has Christ as its Head.
The Temple grows unto an holy temple in the Lord.
The Body grows unto Christ.
The Temple – "In whom ye are builded."
The Body – "Out of whom . . . . . makes for growth."

Growing and building, figures of Body and Temple, are to be found together in such passages as "rooted and founded" (Eph. iii. 17), and "rooted and built up" (Col. ii. 7). It is important that we remember the fact that the Scripture speaks of the "growth" of the Body. No amount of energy, of meetings, of advertising, can make for growth. Growth is the result of life, health, suitable environment and sound food. Growth can be retarded by the absence of light, air or water. The student of Scripture does not need an exposition of these three types, they are so obvious. Nevertheless, growth is stayed in many a child of God simply because he is not walking in the light.

The passage in the A.V. reads, "May grow up into Him in all things which is the Head, even Christ" (Eph. iv. 15). We find it difficult to accept the translation "in all things". First.—There is no word for "in". Secondly.—The words ta panta are either the nominative or the accusative plural. In other passages "in all" is en pasi (Eph. i. 23; Col. iii. 11), and even though the en should be omitted, the dative case pasi, would still remain unchanged. Further, we believe that the words ta panta express from another point of view that which constitutes the pleroma, and indicate that creation which was the work of God, not as revealed in Gen. i. 1, but as revealed in Eph. iii. 9:--

> "The dispensation of the mystery, which hath been hidden from the ages that God, Who (en Theo to) the all things (ta panta) created."

Panta is universal, we know that "all things" good and bad, can work together for good to them that love God, but it is not all things, bad as well as good that are "freely given to us", because of the great gift of Christ. This is ta panta, the specific "all things" of the context, "all things" that are the result of redeeming love. Col. iii. 8 rightly translates ta panta "all these", the Colossians were not expected to put off the universe (see also Just and the Justifier, pages 230 and 231).

Another phrase needs considering. What do we understand by "growing into Him"? Are we considered as separated from Him, and by slow degrees growing nearer and nearer to Him? This may be possible if we are speaking of the believer's experimental fellowship with the Lord, but how can a "body" grow into the "head", for that is the figure before us? Moreover, the very next verse says, "out of whom all the body . . . . . makes growth", so that growth is viewed as only possible while Head and members are united.

A somewhat parallel expression occurs in iii. 19, "That ye may be filled (eis) unto all the fullness of God", which means that the believer shall be filled for, or with a view to, that fullness. That he may be able to take his place in that fullness, that as a member of that Body which is itself a "fullness" he may be filled up to the measure of Him that filleth (ta panta) with all. So in Eph. iv. the growth is "for" or "with a view to" Him in His capacity as the Head, which is but another way of indicating our "measure", "the stature of the fullness of Christ". The fullness is the measure of our stature. "The Head" and "the all things", is but another way of saying the same thing. Conybeare and Howson in a footnote say, "Auxanein eis auton is grow to the standard of His growth". Christ, the Head, is placed together with "the all things" that are "through Him" (I Cor. viii. 6); the Lord and His great age purpose are placed before us as our standard and our goal. Should it appear strange thus to link together Christ and ta panta, we should remember Col. iii. 11 which says, "ta panta kai en pasin Christos", "the all things and in all things (is) Christ". When the scriptural term is understood the sense of strangeness will vanish as we realize how truly the Lord Jesus Christ takes the all things of this mighty purpose into Himself.

To complete the thought of this verse we need to remember one further truth. Running together down the ages are two mysteries. The mystery of godliness, culminating in the exaltation of Jesus Christ as Lord, and the mystery of iniquity, culminating in the man of sin setting himself up as God. In Eph. iv. 4 is the mystery of iniquity, "the systematized deception". In Eph. iv. 15 is the mystery of godliness, with Christ as Head over all things to His church, as He will yet be in heaven and earth to the glory of God the Father.

What an incentive to "grow in grace", may it not be lost upon us.

(Mystery15, pp.49-52).

Things that make for Growth (iv. 16).
(Mystery15, pp.52-56)

We now come to the central reference to the "body" in Ephesians. In Volume VIII we gave the structure of the seven references. We repeat it here for the sake of new readers:--

A | a | i. 23. The Body. Christ the Head.
b | iv. 4. The Unity. Christ the one Lord.
B | iv. 12. Gifts for the building.
C | iv. 16. Unity. "Fitly joined together."
B | iv. 16. Each member for the increase.
A | a | v. 23. The Body. Christ the Head and Saviour.
b | v. 30. The Unity. The church the members.

Central place is given to the unity of the body "fitly joined together". The subject is evidently of great importance, judging from its place in the epistle.

We have drawn attention before to the fact that the "Body" in the practical section echoes the "Temple" in the doctrinal section. A glance at the structure above will show that there is only one reference in the doctrinal portion to the Body, the remaining six being found in chapters iv. and v. The Body aspect of the church is essentially practical, and unity is its very life.

> "Out of Whom all the Body being fitly framed and knit together through that which every joint supplieth, according to the working in measure of each several part, the growth of the body is making unto the building up of itself in love" (Eph. iv. 16).

When the purpose of God in His church is viewed from the Godward standpoint the "Temple" is said to grow "in the Lord". Further, it does not say that the Temple builds up itself in love, but that it is built up together in spirit. In chapter iv. the theme is practical. The unity of the Spirit is there for us "to keep". The work of the Spirit is through human channels, apostles, prophets, etc. The building up of the Body of Christ, first wrought by these gifts of the ascended Lord, is followed, after the unity of the faith is reached, by the harmonious working of every member of the Body building itself up in love. A parallel passage is Col. ii. 19:--

> "Out of Whom all the Body, being supplied and knit together through the joints and ligaments, groweth with the growth of God."

The first point to notice is that all grows "out of" Christ, the Head. The next thing is that "growth" depends upon "supply", and "supply" upon "unity among the members". We might place the reference to the compactness of the Body and its several members into parenthesis and read:--

> "Out of Whom, origin, (all the body being fitly framed and knit together) through that which every joint supplieth, channel, (according to the working in measure of every part) the growth of the Body, is making unto the building up of itself in love, goal."

The two parenthetical clauses, as it were, are assumed as facts:--

> "Taking it for granted that there is no dislocation either of limb, nerve, organ or circulation", and "taking it for granted that each one part is working proportionately", then "the growth of the body will take place".

What a deal is "taken for granted"! Let us note these features carefully.

"ALL THE BODY . . . . . MAKES FOR GROWTH."—This is equivalent to saying, "According to the measure of each one part makes for growth." All the body is concerned with the growth. It is impossible for one member to merely feed itself and further its own growth without wrecking the health if not risking the reason and the life of the Body.

"FITLY FRAMED AND KNIT TOGETHER."—The word translated "fitly framed together" in ii. 21 and "fitly joined together" in iv. 16 is sunarmologeo. This word is composed of "together", "adapt", and "collect" and Dr. Bullinger in his Lexicon well expresses this by saying that it "joins together parts fitted to each other".

A very slight acquaintance with anatomy or physiology will impress the mind with the perfect adaptation of the various parts of the body. There are no "square pegs in round holes" when the unity is the unity of the Spirit; there are, alas, too many such when the unity is of the flesh. Unity is fullest when it is unobtrusive. We are not conscious of the many perfectly-fitted and lubricated joints of our bodies until rheumatism spoils their perfect fitness and brings the fact of joints to mind. The healthy man is not conscious of the organs of his body. This is the unity that we desire, but the man-made thing is a source of irritation and trouble all the time. "Leagues", "unions", "societies" are well in their place, but they do not and must not be looked upon in the same light as the unity of the Spirit.

Not only is the Body "fitly framed", but it is "knit together". Col. ii. 19 speaks not only of "joints" but "ligaments". What is the "bond" that shall unite the whole body together as one? Let Col. ii. 2 answer, "being knit together in love". This is the "bond of perfectness". The unity of the Spirit is held together by "the bond of peace", the unity of the body by the "bond of perfectness—love". "In love" commences and closes this section of Eph. iv. (see verses 15, 16). A loveless unity is not of God. If we are members one of another we shall care for one another. When we think of what love is, we can understand what a bond it can be:--

> "Love--its longsuffering, its kindliness; its freedom from envy, vaunted self-assertion, inflated arrogance, vulgar indecorum; its superiority to self-seeking; its calm control of temper; its oblivion of wrong; its absence of joy at the wrongs of others; its sympathy with the truth; its gracious tolerance; its trustfulness; its hope; its endurance" (I Cor. xiii. Farrar).

Here is the character of the "perfect man" as I Cor. xiii. 10, 11 indicates. Is it my character and yours, fellow-member? Wherever we fail in this, we fail to maintain unity and check growth. Think how much harm is done among members of the One Body through lack of "longsuffering". Meditate upon the other attributes of this greatest of gifts. Love forms the ligaments of the Body, without which all is out of joint.

"EVERY JOINT SUPPLIETH."—Strictly speaking, the words read "through every joint of the supply". The joints supply nothing of themselves. The supply comes from the Lord, and through the members as a channel. This figure is well illustrated in Phil. i. 19 where the word occurs:--

> "And I know that this will result in my deliverance
> 1. through your prayer
> 2. and the supply of the spirit of Jesus Christ,
> 3. according to my earnest expectation and hope."

Here are fellow-members joined together in love, the one praying, the other expecting, and the Lord supplying. What a beautiful picture of "the joint of supply". Oh to be honoured as a means and a channel of blessing from our living Head to His beloved members.

"ACCORDING TO THE WORKING."—Joints and ligaments perfectly adapted, perfectly united, need something else than fitness, they need life. "The body without the spirit is dead, being alone." What constitutes the life-giving energy of this Body? It is the power of God not as manifested in creation, but in resurrection. It is "to usward who believe" (Eph. i. 19, 20). More than that, it is the power of ascension, "And set Him . . . . . far above all" (Eph. i. 21). Still further, it is the power of victory, "And hath put all things under His feet" (Eph. i. 22). It is the power that will finally accomplish the purpose of the ages, "The fullness of Him that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 23; i. 11). It is this power that equips for service:--

"Whereof I was made a minister, according to the gift of the grace of God given unto me according to the energy of His power" (Eph. iii. 7).

"Now unto Him Who is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask of think, according to that power energizing us" (Eph. iii. 20).

This mighty power, "the power of His resurrection", is the life of the One Body:--

"According to the energy in measure of each one part" (Eph. iv. 16).

The distribution of energeia and energeo in Ephesians is suggestive:--

A | i. 11. The purpose. Energizing all things with a view to.
B | i. 19. Exceeding power. "To usward."
C | i. 20. Christ the Head. The energy.
D | ii. 2. The energizing of the children of disobedience.
A | iii. 7-11. The purpose. Energizing the minister with a view to.
B | i. 19. Exceeding power. "In us."
C | i. 20. The members. The energy.

It will be seen that the energy that actuates every member of the One Body is that same energy that pulsates through ta panta, "the all things", and which raised Christ, the Head, the Fullness, and with Him "the all things" also far above all. The reader may remember that in between the reference to the ascension of Christ and the gifts for men in Eph. iv. 8, and the details of their bestowal and ministry, comes that reference to the fact that the Lord ascended up far above all heavens that He might fill "the all things". The reader may now better realize the close relation that there is between the church of the One Body, and that great purpose of the ages. Every time we are actuated by the flesh, or the world, we by so much militate against the purpose of God.

This constant association with the purpose of God and its resurrection power is but another way of saying verse 15, "Truthing, in love we all should grow". There is another energy at work, the lie, with Satan at its head. He rules in the lower regions of "the air", and not "far above all heavens". His associates are the "rulers of the darkness of this world", and the "children of disobedience" (Eph. ii. 2; vi. 12).

"THE MEASURE OF EVERY PART."—It is not sufficient to remember the gifts of apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers. Every member of the Body has a part to play, and it is according to the measure of each one part that this Church builds up itself in love.

Here then is a place and a power for each. Let us heartily and gratefully respond.

No.76. The Practical Section (iv. - vi.).

The Satanic Travesty (iv. 14, 15) and contrast to the Unity of Faith.

pp. 101 - 103

What a measure is set before us in attaining unto the unity of the faith! Nothing less than the fullness, the pleroma of Christ. Nothing but the "perfect man" can reach this standard. In strong contrast to the "perfect" or the full grown adult is the "babe", as we have observed in Heb. v. and I Cor. xiii. So we find the apostle immediately turning to the negative:--

> "That we henceforth be no more children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive" (Eph. iv. 14).

Perhaps we should be more accurate if we translated nepios by "infant", for the Greek word is derived from ne = "not" and epo = "to speak", which thought is retained in the word "infant", which is from the Latin infans, in = "not" and fans = "speaking". This meaning gives point to the Lord's words in Matt. xxi. 16 "out of the mouth of infants (nepios) and sucklings Thou hast perfected praise". So in I Cor. xiii. 11 the apostle says "When I was a child (nepios), I spake as a child".

The Corinthians were called infants (babes) by reason of their carnality and divisions. They had not grown in grace. As a result the apostle was obliged to withhold from them the deeper things of God, "the wisdom of God in a mystery", which however he said he did speak to those who were "perfect" or full grown adults. The fitness of the word "infant" then will be seen in Eph. iv. There the great feature is the "Unity of the Spirit", those like the Corinthians were more associated with the "divisions of the flesh". Eph. iv. contemplates the believer as having reached "the perfect man", the extreme opposite of the "infant". Ephesians throughout is the revelation of a "mystery" or secret, and such must be withheld from "infants".

"Tossed and whirled about with every wind of doctrine", the word "tossed" (kludonizomai) is used in the LXX of Isa. lvii. 20: "The wicked are like the troubled sea." Kludon is used by James, "He that wavereth is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed" (James i. 6). Katakluzo is to overwhelm with water (II Pet. iii. 6), and kataklusmos is a flood (Matt. xxiv. 38), our English word cataclysm. "Carried about" is periphero. We find the word in Heb. xiii. 9, "Be not carried about with divers and strange doctrines" (though here some MSS read paraphero); and again in Jude 12, "Clouds are they without water, carried about of winds" (though here again the truer reading is paraphero). Both instances however serve to illustrate the meaning of the word. These two words convey the acme of instability and perplexity. Such a condition is far removed from the serene atmosphere of the unity of the faith, and the perfect man. "Examine yourselves", said the apostle. Are we carried about by every wind of doctrine?

Do we not know many who seem to have a new doctrine every time we meet them? Such are infants, for such the Mystery remains a "mystery".

This "wind of doctrine" blows not by chance. Just as surely as the purpose of God moves towards the goal, the pleroma, so Satan is ever seeking his own travesty of truth in opposition. The winds of doctrine that bring such confusion are part of a tremendous system of wickedness. Men may throw the loaded dice, but the wiles are the wiles of the Devil. "The sleight of men" is kubeia, "to play at dice", and so "to cheat". "Cunning craftiness" is en panourgia:--

> "He perceived their craftiness, and said unto them, Why tempt ye Me?" (Luke xx. 23).

Here is the first occurrence of the word, and the context should be studied as a warning and a lesson. Notice how the craftiness is veiled:--

> "And they sent forth spies, which should feign themselves just men, that they might take hold of His words, that so they might deliver Him unto the power and authority of the Governor . . . . . Master, we know that Thou sayest and teachest rightly, neither acceptest Thou the person of any man, but teachest the way of God truly. Is it lawful for us to give tribute unto Caesar, or no?" (Luke xx. 20-22).

It was a deeply-laid plot. The way in which they had been caught on the horns of a dilemma in the matter of John the Baptist rankled, and at last the Chief Priests and Scribes thought to use His own weapon against the Lord Himself. They would make Him impale Himself upon the horns of a dilemma, for see, if He said "Yes", His reputation as a leader and deliverer, to say nothing of His claim to be the Messiah, would be shattered, for how could the Deliverer of Israel teach them to pay tribute to the Pagan? If He should say "No", they would immediately charge Him before the Roman Governor as a stirrer up of sedition. They evidently expected "No" for an answer, for they sent the spies "that so they might deliver Him unto the power and authority of the governor". They reckoned however, without the Lord. He takes the wise in their own craftiness. What was His reply?

> "Shew Me a penny. Whose image and superscription hath it? Render therefore to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's. And they could not take hold of His words before the people, and they marveled at His answer, and held their peace" (Luke xx. 24-26).

We must be on our guard against those who feign themselves "just men", who profess to agree with the Word of truth, who flatter us that we are not partial or hold men's persons in respect. The parallels and the contrast to "craftiness" are given in II Cor. iv. 2:--

> "We have renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, not walking in craftiness, nor handling the Word of God deceitfully; but by manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God."

A | Hidden things renounced.
B | Walk in craftiness,
C | Handle Word of God deceitfully.
C | Truth manifested.
B | Commended to conscience.
A | In the sight of God.

The contrasts are sufficiently obvious, and we commend them to our readers as a commentary upon our subject. II Cor. xi. 3 gives the basic example, origin and energizer of this craftiness:--

"The serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty." (xi. 3).

Behind the "sleight of men" is the "cunning craftiness" of the devil:--

"Whereby they lie in wait to deceive" (Eph. iv. 14).

Aquila translates Exod. xxi. 13 by methodeuse, but the word seems to mean more generally a systematic artifice. Methodeia comes again in Eph. vi. 11, "the wiles of the Devil". "Systematic deception", "snares of the cunning", "deliberate system of error", "the systematizing of the deception", "a subtle method of deceit" are some of the many translations offered. They impressed us with the thought that there is deliberate systematic method pursued in this craftiness. Speaking of Satan, II Cor. ii. 11 says, "We are not ignorant of his devices". He ever continues the same corruption of the Word of truth, the flattery, the temptation, as in the Garden of Eden, and the instance recorded in Luke xx., till cast into the lake of fire. Shakespeare well puts it:--

"The equivocation of the fiend, that lies like truth."

So then we have the unity of the Spirit set over against the systems of deception, in other words, the mystery of godliness and the mystery of iniquity, the truth and the lie.

The apostle has been saying what we are not to be; he now concludes by stating the positive. One word suffices to give complete contrast to all the craft and deceit of the wicked one. Aletheuontes.—The word means more than "speaking the truth", it means "being true". This has a fuller and deeper meaning than we may at first suppose, but as this is dealt with by the apostle in the same chapter we will follow his own order and wait until we reach the passage. We can see, however, the supreme place of truth in the witness for God. It may not be amiss to exhibit the usage of "truth" in Ephesians:--

Truth.

A | i. 13. Word of truth. Salvation.
B | a | iv. 21, 22. Put off.
b | iv. 24. Righteousness and holiness.
B | a | iv. 25. Put away.
b | v. 9. Righteousness and goodness.
A | vi. 14. Girdle of truth. Warfare.

The whole world is ranged under two heads, the Truth, and the Lie. Christ stands at the head of one, Satan at the other. Truth makes the weakest invincible. Truth will prevent the ship from being carried by the winds and waves. Truth will deliver from the sleight of men and reveal the systematic deceit of the wicked one.

We shall see presently the close connection between the "old man" and "the lie", and the "new man" and "the truth"; let us here, while the passage is before us, remember the close association that must ever be between "the perfect man" and "the truth" also.

(Mystery15, pp.26-30).

No.77. The Practical Section (iv. - vi.).

Alienation, the mind and the new man (iv. 17 - 20)

pp. 121 - 126

In our previous studies we have seen that the opening of the practical section of this epistle (chapter iv.) sums up all true practice in the exhortation, "walk worthy of your calling". Practice is the fruit of doctrine and cannot be disassociated from it. It would be useless, for example, to exhort wives and husbands to comply with the practical exhortations of chapter v. if they did not heartily accept the doctrinal basis upon which those exhortations rest. Consequently while it is true that we are now studying the practical section of this epistle, there is no arbitrary exclusion of doctrine, and we shall find much doctrine interwoven with the practical teaching of this section.

The disposition of subject matter must be observed. The positive exhortation of Eph. iv. 1 is followed by a negative testimony as to how not to walk. Between these two phases of truth there is a glorious parenthesis dealing with the one Body (verses 3-16), and following the negative testimony (and placed in correspondence) is the teaching concerning the new man.

Eph. iv. 1-32.

A | 1, 2. The walk. Positive. Humility of mind.
B | 3-16. The one Body.
A | 17-19. The walk. Negative. Vanity of mind.
B | 20-32. The new Man.

Aliens -- from Israel, and from the life of God.

The epistle to the Ephesians reveals a twofold Gentile alienation:--

"Aliens from the commonwealth of Israel" (Eph. ii. 12).
"Aliens from the life of God" (Eph. iv. 18).

The Gentiles were aliens by birth, quite irrespective of anything they did or thought. To illustrate this: when I stood on the quay at Southampton in April 1955 I was British, but when I stepped on the quay at New York in the same month, without having done anything, I was an alien. In like manner, citizen of New York who boarded the liner with me, automatically became an alien as he stepped ashore at Southampton. An attempt has been made to prove that the alienated Gentiles of Eph. ii. 12 are the far-off dispersion of Israel. But what happens then to the references to "Gentiles" that follow?

The alienation of chapter ii. is expressed in the terms of distance; the alienation of chapter iv. is expressed in the terms of death. The blood of Christ cancels the former alienation by "making nigh"; the gift and operation of resurrection life reverses the other. In both cases however this twofold truth merges into one expression, the new man.

Before we consider the teaching of the new man we must give attention to the negative aspect of the believer's walk. In verse 17 we read, "That ye henceforth walk not as other Gentiles walk". The word "other" should be omitted. We are exhorted to walk not as the Gentiles walk. A very definite change is suggested by the words "not henceforth". The same negative comes in Eph. iv. 28, "Let him that stole steal no more". While the chief feature of the epistle to the Ephesians is the revelation of the mystery and its dispensational peculiarities, we must not forget that it finds its doctrinal basis in Romans. When dealing with Eph. ii. 1 and the words "dead to trespasses and sins", we were compelled to refer back to Rom. vi. So also we find the true import even of the words "not henceforth" in Rom. vi. 6:--

> "Knowing this, that our old man was crucified with Him that the body of sin might be rendered inoperative, that HENCEFORTH we should NOT serve sin as slaves."

The service of Rom. vi. 6 and the walk of Eph. iv. 17 are both associated with the old man. In one case it is seen as "crucified", in the other it has to be "put off", but both meet in a new "life unto God". Rom. vi. lays great stress upon "the body of sin", "the mortal body" and the "members"; Eph. iv. emphasizes "the mind", and that both positively and negatively:--

"Walk worthy . . . . . with all humility of mind" (iv. 1, 2).
"Walk no longer . . . . . in the vanity of mind" (iv. 17).

There are two words here for "mind". In iv. 2 the word is a compound of phreen, and has particular reference to the heart and understanding. In iv. 17 mind is nous. The word nous has passed into the English language, and is placed in Roget's Thesaurus together with intelligence, comprehension, understanding and sagacity. The word is used by Paul more than any other writer of the New Testament, for it occurs 21 times in his epistles out of a total of 24. It is manifest therefore that an intelligent appreciation of the truth revealed through Paul demands an acquaintance with the usage of this word in his epistles. We find the nous connected with both the old and the new man.

The nous of the old man.—Rom. i. 28; vii. 23, 25; Eph. iv. 17; Col. ii. 18; I Tim. vi. 5; II Tim. iii. 8; Titus i. 15.
The nous of the new man.—Rom. xii. 2; I Cor. ii. 16; Eph. iv. 23; Phil. iv. 7.

The mind and alienation.

Rom. i. 18-32 speaks of the setting aside of the Gentiles consequent upon their idolatrous abandonment of the truth which had been made known to them. Three times in this momentous passage do we read that these Gentiles were "given up" by God (Rom. i. 24, 26 28). In verse 28, by a play upon the sound of the words used (figure of speech called paranomasia), the judicial nature of this "giving up" is made prominent. Conybeare expresses the figure by translating the verse thus:--

> "As they thought fit to cast out the acknowledgment of God, God gave them over to a cast out mind."

Alford renders the passage:--

> "Because they reprobated the knowledge of God, God gave them over to a reprobate mind."

The resulting state of morals, given in the verses that follow, is terrible to the last degree. It is summed up in Eph. iv. 19 by the words, "All uncleanness with greediness". Such was the condition of the Gentile world; such the outcome of a mind alienated from God and His truth.

In our appreciation of the vital distinction that exists between law and grace, we are apt to slur the equally decided difference that there is between the light of the law of God given to Israel and the darkness of reprobation that settled down upon the Gentiles. While the law could give neither life nor righteousness, we do read:--

> "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul . . . . . The commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes" (Psa. xix. 7, 8).

If we keep this fact before us we shall be able to understand the setting of the next reference to the nous:--

> "I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind . . . . . so then with the mind I myself serve the law of God" (Rom. vii. 23-25).

This illumination of the law, however, only intensified the bondage of sin and death, for while to will was present, to perform was impossible. So far as justification is concerned, the enlightened Jew stood upon the same platform as the darkened Gentile, but so far as the doctrine of the mind is concerned we perceive that it can be influenced by outside factors, even though the bondage of sin and death may remain. Passing to Col. ii. 18 we learn that there is a 'fleshly' mind which "puffs up" and leads away from Christ. The three passages that remain speak of:-- > "Men, whose mind is corrupted and destitute of the truth" (I Tim. vi. 5).

> "Men who resist the truth, being corrupt in mind and reprobate (cf. Rom. i. 28) as concerning the faith" (II Tim. iii. 8).

> "All things indeed are pure to those who are pure, but to those who are defiled and unbelieving is nothing pure; but both their mind and conscience are defiled . . . . . and unto every good work reprobate" (Titus i. 15, 16).

Such is the testimony of the Apostle to the nous of the old man. His teaching concerning the mind of the new man is contained in four passages:-- > "Present your bodies a living sacrifice . . . . . be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that you may approve (dokimazein, cf. Rom. i. 28) what is the will of God" (Rom. xii. 1, 2).

Here is the great contrast with Rom. i. 18-32; in that passage both mind and body are "given over" to evil, here they are "yielded" to God. This distinction between the natural and the spiritual is brought out markedly in I Cor. ii. 14-16. The natural man cannot understand the things of the Spirit of God, they appear to him foolishness. God reveals His truth "by His Spirit". The Spirit of God and His relation to God is likened to the intimate relation of "the spirit of man which is in him" (verses 10, 11). In other words, they who are taught by the Spirit can say, "We have the mind of Christ" (verse 16).

This connection of spirit and mind is found in Eph. iv. 23, "And be renewed in the spirit of your mind", which may be rendered, "The spirit, that is to say, your mind". The last reference speaks of peace. The mind of the flesh is enmity against God, but Phil. iv. 7 speaks of both heart and mind kept in perfect peace by Christ. If we ponder these passages we shall the better understand "the truth" which is taught in Eph. iv. 17 onwards.

Accessories and issues of alienation.

Vanity of mind (Eph. iv. 17).—The first item of alienation given is vanity of mind. The mind of the old man is like the old creation "subject to vanity" (Rom. viii. 20), and like Babel (Rom. i. 21). The essential connection between this vanity and the idolatrous perversion of Babel is seen not only in Rom. i. 21-23, but in Acts xix. 15, 16, where "vanities" and "the living God" are placed in opposition, and moreover these vanities are connected with the period of Gentile alienation when they were "suffered to walk in their own ways".

A darkened understanding (Eph. iv. 18).—The sequence "vanity . . . . . darkness" is observed in Rom. i. 21. "They became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened". We are reminded of the past, the change and the consequent walk, in Eph. v. 8:--

> "For ye were sometimes darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord, walk as children of light."

The complete reversal of alienation and its darkness is found in Eph. i. 18:--

> "The eyes of your heart (A.V. understanding) having been enlightened."

A comparison of Rom. i. 21 with Eph. iv. 17, 18 will show that "heart" and "understanding" are practically synonymous.

The ignorance that is in them because of the hardness of their hearts (Eph. iv. 18).—We may gather something concerning this ignorance by reading Paul's speech at Athens (Acts xvii. 30). There, dealing with the wise of the earth, he speaks of their ignorant worship, and of the unknown god. To turn from One in Whom we move, live and have our being, from One Who gave fruitful seasons and every reason for gratitude, to turn away from Him and to worship the works of their own hands was the practical expression of their "alienation from the life of God".

In verse 30 we meet the word "ignorance" and find that it characterizes the whole Gentile period, "And at the times of this ignorance God winked at". This ignorance and alienation are beyond human remedy. No philosopher or orator who ever stood upon Mar's Hill could dispel its gloom or illuminate its darkness. The darkness, alienation and ignorance of Eph. iv. 18 are the expansion of the words "vanity of mind" of the previous verse (iv. 17). The walk as the Gentiles which was forbidden is expanded in iv. 19:--

> "Who being past feeling have given themselves over unto lasciviousness, to work all uncleanness with greediness."

In this record of the Gentile walk we find the word paredoken:--

> "God gave them up to uncleanness" (Rom. i. 24).
> "They gave themselves up to uncleanness" (Eph. iv. 19).

The Scripture adds "with greediness". Here we have the two sides of the solemn truth. The act of God was not without cause:--

> "For this cause God gave them up" (Rom. i. 26).
> "Even as they did not approve to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them up to a reprobate mind" (Rom. i. 28).

"The fool hath said in his heart, 'There is no God'." (Psa. xiv. 1); the immediate comment is, "They are corrupt; they have done abominable works".

Life and Truth.

The passages of Scripture brought together here impress us with the important position of the mind in connection with the activities of life. The word "life" (zoe) occurs but once in this epistle, namely, in Eph. iv. 18, "the life of God". It does not appear to be used in any form in any other part of the epistle, except in Eph. ii. 5 where it is a compound and translated "quickened together". In case any reader should think that we have overlooked Eph. vi. 3 we would point out that the word there is not zoe.

How are we to understand this alienation from the life of God? The parallel passage in Col. i. 21 connects this alienation with "wicked works". We cannot "live unto God" without the "life of God", and that life can only be ours as we are "made alive together with Christ". The sphere of resurrection life is "the truth", even as sin and death are part of the province of "the lie". The Gentiles, we are told in Rom. i. 25, "changed the truth of God for the lie", and this led to their alienation. Here in Eph. iv. we are to read of putting away the lie and of putting on the truth:--

> "Ye however have not thus learned the Christ—if at least it is Him ye have heard, and by Him ye have been taught, even as truth is in Jesus" (Eph. iv. 20, 21).

The presence here of the name "Jesus" instead of the more usual "The Lord Jesus Christ" demands an explanation. While the personal name of the Lord is constantly used in the Gospels, its use without some added title in the Epistles is the exception rather than the rule. Writing to the Hebrews the apostle uses the name "Jesus" eight times (this includes Heb. iv. 8 which does not refer to our Lord but to Joshua). The references are Heb. ii. 9; iv. 14; vi. 20; vii. 22; x. 19; xii. 2, 24; xiii. 12.

In the church epistles the apostle uses the name eleven times in all, three of these references however deal either with unbelievers or the testing of spirits, leaving another series of eight with direct teaching for the church. The references are Rom. iii. 26; viii. 11; II Cor. iv. 5, 10, 11, 14; Eph. iv. 21; and Phil. ii. 10. If these facts stood alone we might feel that there was no spiritual significance in the number of the occurrences, but when we know that the numerical value (gematria) of the Greek letters of the word "Jesus" is 888 (a pointed contrast to the number of the name of the beast which is 666), and that the number 8 has the significance of resurrection (a fresh start, as for example Noah and those with him in the ark—see II Pet. ii. 5 and I Pet. iii. 20; "the eighth person" and "eight souls"), then the introduction of the name "Jesus" here in Eph. iv. assumes definite meaning.

Most if not all of the references given above are found in contexts of resurrection, and it is because the truth which the apostle is about to teach is vitally related to the Lord as the Head of the new creation, the last man and the second Adam, that he uses this name.

All is now ready for the expansion of "the truth in Jesus". The old man in its total alienation from God necessitates the new man and the new creation. This therefore is the subject that must occupy our attention in our next study.

The New Man and the Truth (iv. 20 - 24)

pp. 150 - 155

In our last paper we were led, both by the contemplation of the utter alienation of the Gentiles from the life of God, and the significance of the name "Jesus", to expect the introduction of a new creation. Such is indeed the fact, and without it we should be left without the least hope of ever throwing off the dreadful dominion of the old man. Let us observe the disposition of the subject matter before we go into details.

The new man (Eph. iv. 20 - 24).

A | 20, 21. Truth in Jesus. Head of new creation.
B | 22. Put off the old man. Corrupt.
B | 23, 24-. Put on the new man. Renewed.
A | -24. Truth (righteousness and holiness of). Sphere of new creation.

"The truth in Jesus" is the truth of the new creation. The old man belongs to "the lie", the new man to "the truth". The old man is corrupt, the new man is renewed and holy. The words "put off" are to be referred to the word "taught", and the passage reads:--

> "And by Him ye have been taught (. . . . .) to put off . . . . . the old man."

We are in the practical section of the epistle, and so are not instructed as to how the old man was put off by Christ, but our attention is directed rather to the outworkings of that doctrine. We are to put off "as regards the former conversation" the old man, or as Colossians put it:--

> "Lie not one to another, seeing that ye have put off the old man with his deeds" (Col. iii. 9).

"With his deeds" is equivalent to "the former conversation", remembering that the A.V. word "conversation" is much more than merely speaking with another, but means the whole manner of life.

The foundation of this teaching is Rom. vi. 6:--

> "Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with Him, that the body of sin might be rendered inoperative, that henceforth we should not serve sin."

The lusts or desires that dominate the unregenerate mind have one characteristic, they are "deceitful". This is not to be limited to the coarser lusts of the flesh; the higher and finer activities of the mind are marked with the same Satanic brand, for Col. ii. 8 speaks of "philosophy" as being "vain and deceitful", and essentially so inasmuch as it is "not after Christ". The new man therefore arises out of the "truth in Jesus", and repudiates the lie, that is, whatever is not "after Christ". Christ must be foundation and top stone of this erection, even as He is the Alpha, Omega and Amen of the purpose of the ages.

The new creation.

The glorious truth given to the Apostle to make known with such fervour is no mere negation. It does not find its full expression in "putting off" merely, but is only fully expressed when "put off" is succeeded by "put on". But, just as the old man which has become corrupt implies the creation of Adam at the beginning, so the new man which is to be put on necessitates a new creation. There are two ways whereby this new creation could be attained. Either by an instantaneous act without previous preparation, or by a process beginning here and now in this present life and reaching its consummation in that instantaneous change "in the twinkling of an eye" when this mortal shall put on immortality.

This latter method appears to be the one that describes the work of God. Having said so much, it is necessary to draw attention to just exactly what phase of the new creative work belongs to this present life, and what belongs to the life to come. It will be found upon examination that the Lord begins the work here in connection with the mind, reserving until the day of redemption and resurrection His work in connection with the body. The body of the saintliest believer is just as mortal as it was before his conversion. Paul had to acknowledge that while the inward man was renewed day by day, the outward man was perishing. This perishing and mortal body is indeed allowed to feel the earnest of the risen life, and many times the earthen vessel is "cast down but not destroyed", thereby bearing about in the body the "dying of the Lord Jesus" that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in "our mortal flesh". That is a precious truth, but the flesh is "mortal flesh" just the same. Therefore, seeing these two phases of the new creation and their appointed times, we observe the order in Eph. iv. where the first step is indicated by the words, "And to be renewed in the spirit of your mind" (Eph. iv. 23). The new creation begins within. Its present sphere is the mind. The body is not changed until the resurrection. The due observance of this sequence is an important factor in the interpretation of the epistle to the Philippians.

"The mind of Christ" (Phil. ii.).
"The body of His glory" (Phil. iii.).

Ananeoo ("to be renewed") does not occur elsewhere in the N.T. Two words are employed to express the idea of newness—kainos and neos. Kainos looks backward, it excludes the old and the past. Neos looks forward, and suggests youth. The two words come together in Col. iii. 10:--

> "And having put on the new man (neos) being renewed (anakainoo)."

In other words, we have put on the new, young, rejuvenate man, fresh, vigorous, prime, with all the glorious future stretching out in its limitless possibilities by the grace of God, and have been renewed with a life that standing beside the empty tomb looks back at a past, dead, buried, excluded, finished. Neos turns our faces toward Christ, the last Adam, kainos looks back to the first Adam. The one says "life has begun", the other "that life has finished". Thus we have the reverse and the obverse of this blessed truth.

The spirit of your mind, the subject of this renewal, looks to the doctrine of Rom. vi. There we learn that the seat of sin is in the members of our mortal body (Rom. vi. 6, 12, 13, 19). The mind being held in subjection to the flesh (Rom. vii. 14, 15, 18, 22), even though illuminated by the law of the Lord, finds itself utterly enthralled and under the dominion of sin which is in the members. Hence the battle of the unsaved yet enlightened Jew (Rom. vii. 23).

As we have already said, we have no warrant to believe that the bodies of believers undergo any process of renewal, but rather that these bodies of ours shall returned to dust, to be raised incorruptible, or changed in the case of the living at the time, when the Lord comes.

When the sinner passes from death unto life, from Adam to Christ, from the power of Satan to God, the dominion of sin is broken, the mind is set free, and it becomes possible for the first time to "yield ourselves servants to obey" either sin or God (Rom. vi. 16). Before this we had no option.

The new creation manifested.

The renewal of the mind is an inward operation. It is completed and rounded off by a corresponding outward response:--

> "And to put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and holiness of the truth" (Eph. iv. 24).

With this passage we should read the parallel in Col. iii. 10:--

> "And have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created Him."

These passages taken together are mutually helpful. Let us notice a few special features.

(1). Creation.

Both emphasize the fact of creation:--

> "Created in righteousness and holiness" (Eph. iv. 24).
> "Created after the image of Him" (Col. iii. 10).

With these passages we should compare those of Eph. ii.:--

> "We are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus" (ii. 10).
> "For to create in Himself of the twain one new man" (ii. 15).

It is impossible to believe the gospel as preached by Paul and to tolerate any kind of mere reformation. The basic fact and the most decisive in Paul's witness is that all men, all doctrine, all works, are ranged under one of two heads, Adam or Christ. Quite one half of our problems, whether doctrinal or practical, are to be solved by the recognition of this one great fact. Redemption therefore must eventuate in (2). The new man.

The goal of the six days' creation was man. The great sun in the heavens is man's servant. To his physical necessities the day of twenty-four hours is exactly adjusted. The earth is proportioned with marvelous accuracy to man's strength. The list could be continued into detailed tabulation of all the sciences. Man created in the image of God, placed upon the earth to have dominion, explains every known phenomenon of nature.

As it is with the old creation, so it is with the new. Its centre is the new man created anew in the image of God. The ecclesiastical unity that results from the reversal of the dispensational alienation of Eph. ii. is called "the new man", and is created so (Eph. ii. 12-15). The practical unity with Christ, as the reverse of alienation from the life of God, is also called "the new man" (iv. 18-24).

A needed corrective.

The dispensation of the Mystery is called "the dispensation of the grace of God". The gospel of that same period is called "the gospel of the grace of God". Salvation is by grace, and that salvation is at the other extreme to salvation by works. The transcendent character of grace is so overwhelming that we are apt to forget that if this salvation by grace is not out of works, it is nevertheless unto works. Another feature that is likely to lead to one-sidedness is to emphasize the dispensational standpoint of the new man (Eph. ii. 15) to the exclusion of the practical teaching concerning the same (Eph. iv. 24). Let us not forget that the church which was chosen in Christ before the overthrow of the world, and blessed in the super-heavenlies, was chosen that it might be holy (Eph. i. 1-4).

Let us compare Eph. iv. 24 with Col. iii. 10. It is quite manifest that the "new man" of Col. iii. 10 is the same as that of Eph. iv. It is the "practical" view rather than the "dispensational" of Eph. ii. Yet so inseparable are these two concepts of the one truth, that Col. iii. 11 immediately continues, using terms that are comparable to the teaching of Eph. ii., rather than that of Eph. iv.:--

> "Where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond and free; but Christ is all and in all."

The ecclesiastical unity is not absent from Eph. iv., however, for verse 25 says:--

> "Wherefore putting away the lie, speak every man truth with his neighbour, for we are MEMBERS one of another" (Eph. iv. 25).

The truth is that the church of the One Body should be reflected in each individual member that makes up that unity. If Christ be the Head of the church, He must be the Head of each individual also. If that church be a new creation, so also must each individual member be. It that church be a new man, each member should put on the new man. If Christ dwells in the temple built by the Spirit (Eph. ii. 20-22), then "Because of this" (Eph. iii. 1 and 14) each individual member should desire to manifest that truth in miniature, and is taught to pray "that Christ may dwell in the heart by faith". Thus doctrine, dispensation and practice meet together in "the truth in Jesus".

(3). The Image.

Eph. iv. 24 says that the new man is "according to God". Col. ii. 10 says it is "according to His image". It is evident that Gen. i. 26, 27 is in view. The introduction of the lie into the garden of Eden rendered the purpose of the image in Adam abortive, but only temporarily, for in Christ, the last Adam, the goal is reached. It is the purpose of God that every one of the true seed shall be conformed to the image of His Son (Rom. viii. 29). The church of the One Body, a new creation in that image, is a firstfruits, the greatest and richest earnest of the glorious future.

The goal of Col. iii. 11 that "Christ is all and in all", foreshadows the goal of the ages "that God may be all in all". Christ has been given as Head over all things now to the church, another anticipation of the day when all things shall be placed under His feet.

(4). Knowledge.

Eph. iv. 24 speaks of righteousness and holiness of truth. Col. iii. 10 speaks of renewal unto a full knowledge of God, the Creator. Is there a difference here? What connection is there between righteousness, holiness and knowledge of the Creator? Have we so soon forgotten the context of Eph. iv. 24? Have we not seen the utter UNrighteousness and UNcleanness of ignorance? Have we not seen the degradation that comes from vanity of mind, darkened understanding and ignorance? If there is to be a change, ignorance must give place to knowledge, darkness to light, uncleanness to holiness, wicked works to righteousness. In other words, the complete truth is expressed by the two passage; either Eph. iv. or Col. iii. taken separately implies and necessitates the other. Having touched upon this teaching concerning knowledge we shall realize the condition of things expressed in Rom. i. the more vividly:--

> "Because that when they KNEW God . . . . . they became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was DARKENED . . . . . they did not like to retain God in their KNOWLEDGE, they were given over to a reprobate mind" (Rom. i. 21-23).

We shall also understand the meaning of II Cor. iv. 3-6 the better:--

> "But if our gospel be veiled (see iii. 14, 15) by those things which are destroyed (see iii. 7, 11, 13, 14) it is veiled by which the god of this age hath blinded the minds of them that believe not, lest the light of the glory of the gospel of Christ, Who is the Image of God (see Col. iii. 10), should shine upon them . . . . . the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (II Cor. iv. 3-6).

Here we see the gospel and knowledge used practically as synonymous. The outcome of this teaching is expressed in Eph. iv. 25:--

> "Wherefore putting away the lie, speak you truth, each one with his neighbour, because we are members one of another" (Eph. iv. 25).

The reference here to Zech. viii. 16 shows that mere speaking will not satisfy the demands of love to our neighbour, for the passage continues thus: "execute the judgment of truth and peace in your gates". "The lie" has brought in its train misery, oppression, death. "The truth" reverses all this and manifests itself in deed as well as in word.

The verses that follow expand and apply this exhortation to the whole range of earth's relationships. As this occupies the whole of chapter v. and part of chapter vi., we must perforce conclude this present study.

Let us seek a tender conscience regarding these things, keeping steadily before us the intimate and vital association that has been revealed to exist between the high calling of the One Body and the walk that is worthy.

(Mystery15, pp.136-142).

No.79. The Practical Section (iv. - vi.).

Put on . . . Put off . . . Walk accurately (iv. 25 - v. 21)

pp. 161 - 169

The conflict of the ages is reflected in the epistle to the Ephesians. It is summed up in the antagonism that is seen between the truth and the lie, and expressed by the new and the old man.

The church of the Mystery has been delivered from the authority of darkness and translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son. That is the repudiation of the lie. The church has been lifted up from earth and earthly things, quickened, raised and seated in the heavenlies. That is the repudiation of the lie. The members of that church, once energized by the prince of the power of the air, is now energized by the self-same power that raised Christ from the dead. That is the repudiation of the lie.

But what of ourselves? Do we remain passive after grace, as perforce we were compelled to be before? Have we no walk that is to be worthy? Have we no old man to put off? No new man to put on? We have, and doctrinal truth standing alone can no more save, sanctify and bless, than that kind of faith exercised by demons.

The putting away of the lie.

"Wherefore putting away lying" should read "Wherefore putting away the lie". "To put away" (apotithemi) is used of putting aside clothing (Acts vii. 58), weight (Heb. xii. 1), and occurs in Rom. xiii. 12; Eph. iv. 22, 25; Col. iii. 8; James i. 21; and I Pet. ii. 1. Eph. iv. 25 is the only place where we read of putting away the lie. All other passages deal with some of the smaller sub-divisions into which the lie falls, such as "the works of darkness", "the old man and his manner of life" and such individual manifestations as "anger", "malice", "blasphemy", &c.

In Eph. iv. 25-32 this putting away of the lie is dealt with, and the Spirit of God condescends to details in order that we may be made sensible that in the words of our mouth, the works of our hands, the very tone of our voices, we may manifest the truth and repudiate the lie. Two expressions seems to stand out in this passage as index figures on a dial:--

THE LIE.—"Gives place to the devil" and "Grieves the Holy Spirit of God."
THE TRUTH.—"Even as God for Christ's sake hath acted graciously to you."

Let us see the passage as a whole.

Eph. iv. 25 - 32.

A | 25. | a | Putting away the lie.
b | Speak truth.
c | Reason.—"Members."
B | 26. Question concerning anger.
C | 27. Give not place to the devil.
D | 28. | d | Steal not.
e | Labour for that which is good.
WORKS. f | Working with hands.
g | To supply need.
D | 29. | d | No corrupt speech.
e | But that which is good.
WORDS. f | Out of your mouth.
g | To build up the need.
C | 30. Grieve not the Holy Spirit.
B | 31-. Answer as to anger.
A | -31, 32. | a | Put away all bitterness, &c.
b | Be kind.
c | Reason.—"God for Christ's sake."

The practical side of the truth.

If we have put away the lie, we shall speak truth with fellow-members. To speak truth may at first sight appear to mean only the bearing of a true witness, but a man who would scorn to tell a lie may fail to speak truth if "corrupt communications" proceed out of his mouth. His remedy is found in the "seasoning" which only the "grace" of God can give (Col. iv. 6).

Or again, the man who eschews corrupt speech may tarnish the fair name of truth by "bitterness". Even husbands who love their wives in some faint resemblance of the love of Christ are warned to beware of this evil thing (Col. iii. 19). Anger too must be carefully watched. We know that it is possible for anger to exist without sin, for such is the testimony of Mark iii. 5, and all the passages where orge is translated "wrath" when used of God. Nevertheless it is true wisdom to shun anger, to class it with bitterness and wrath and clamour and blasphemy and malice (Eph. iv. 31), for it requires a perfect and sinless being to be angry and sin not. If anger is ever entertained let us hasten to finish with it; let not the sun go down before the difference is settled. Plutarch tells us it was a maxim among the Pythagoreans, that whenever one had given way to anger, the difference was made up before sunset. Would that this same spirit were more common among the Lord's people.

Not only may truth be expressed in words, it must come out in deeds. Stealing is the lie in practice. This in all its shapes and forms must be put away. In its place let there be labour, working with the hands that which is good. This labour is with the object:--

> "That he may HAVE, TO GIVE" (Eph. iv. 28).

Labour merely that one may have may be selfishness, and industry of itself may not express "the truth", but labour that one may have something to give is an entire reversal of the lie, that steals from another, and is a manifestation of the truth.

The devil, and the Spirit of God.

Closely associated with the lie is the devil, and with the truth the Holy Spirit of God. It must be kept well in memory that to fail to put off the lie and to put on the new man may "give place to the devil", and when this takes place we may be sure that there is also another equally sad result, viz., the grieving of the Holy Spirit of God whereby we are sealed unto the day of redemption.

Among the many ways whereby truth may be hindered and a place given to the devil is revealed in such a strange word as "clamour". That man who, when he gives a command must "shout"; who, when he argues a point of truth must "raise his voice" does not give an outward expression of that lowliness and meekness which commends the truth.

"Evil speaking" is in the original "blasphemy", and is probably derived from blaptein ten phemen = "Blasting the reputation or credit" of any one. We may sincerely believe that to take a "text" from Shakespeare or the Poets is to belittle the Scriptures, but we sometimes wonder whether Tennyson's Knights of King Arthur, who vowed "to speak no slander, nor listen to it" do not put many a believer to shame. "Love thinketh no evil."

Be ye imitators of God.

The remedy for this and all kindred manifestations of the flesh is found in the next three verses:--

> "Be ye kind . . . . . Be ye imitators of God" (Eph. iv. 32, v. 1).

This after all is but a homely way of expressing the more doctrinal passage:--

> "Put on the new man which AFTER GOD is created" (Eph. iv. 24).

"The lie" finds its pattern in the devil:--

> "I speak that which I have seen with My Father: and ye do that which ye have seen with your father . . . . . Ye do the deeds of your father . . . . . If God were your Father, ye would love Me, ... Ye are of your father the devil . . . . . he is a liar and the father of it" (i.e. "the lie") (John viii. 38-44).

It will be seen therefore that to fail to "put away the lie" gives "place to the devil", while "putting on the new man" is doctrinally expressed by the words "after God" and is practically shown by becoming "imitators of God".

The word "follower" in v. 1 is mimetes. This word occurs seven times in the N.T. and is therefore marked with the seal of spiritual perfection. The word will be recognized as the source of our English word "mimic". This element of imitation is expressed in verse 32, where we are exhorted to kindness and forgiveness, "Even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you", and is carried forward into v. 2 in the words, "As Christ also hath loved us".

The love of Christ, the object of our imitation, is not an abstraction. The reader will call to mind many passages speaking of both the Father and the Son, where the words "loved and gave" come together. So here. Christ loved, and that love we are to imitate, Christ loved and gave, and that kind of love we are to imitate. Christ loved and gave Himself. This is the essence both of loving and of giving:-- > "Praying us with much entreaty that we would receive the gift . . . . . not as we expected, but first gave their own selves to the Lord, and to us . . . . ." (II Cor. viii. 4, 5).

The love we are to imitate, moreover, has further qualities. He gave Himself for us . . . . . to God. All our loving and giving must be of this character. It is not merely philanthropy or what is now called "charity", that might (though we doubt it) fulfil the first clause "for us". It is, on the other hand, not that cold and lofty disdain of all things human and kindly that may in self-deception be called an exclusive offering "to God". We are sure God has no pleasure in monasteries or nunneries, neither in the hypocrite's claim "It is Corban" (Mark vii. 11); the twofold offering "for us . . . . . to God" alone satisfies the case.

Lastly, this love manifests itself in the giving of an offering and a sacrifice. It will be seen that there is no contradiction of the Psalmist who said, "None of us can by any means redeemed his brother", for redemption is by blood (Eph. i. 7). Into that part of the Saviour's work no man enters, but Paul knew what it was to fill up what was behind of the afflictions of Christ in his flesh for the sake of the church, he knew what it was to be offered upon the sacrifice and service of faith (Col. i. 24 and Phil. ii. 17). Moreover, he uses the same words, “a sweet smelling savour”, to describe the kindly gifts of the Philippians:--

> “The things that were sent from you, an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice, well pleasing to God” (Phil. iv. 18).

Christian giving should always have the atmosphere of the altar and the sanctuary. The children of God contribute to this and that, their gifts may be liberal, they may be helpful, they may encourage, but, do not let them miss the highest and the best. Let them be “even as God for Christ’s sake”, let them partake of the character of the offering of the sweet savour, then such offerings will be “well pleasing unto God”.

The three-fold walk.

The apostle now brings the exhortation to walk worthy of the calling and to repudiate the old man, to bear upon things of every-day life. He exhorts us to:--

(1). “Walk in love as children of love” (Eph. v. 1, 2).
(2). “Walk as children of light” (Eph. v. 8).
(3). “Walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise” (Eph. v. 15).

Each walk is expressed both positively and negatively.

Walk in love.—The positive is expressed in the one great example, “as Christ also hath loved us”. Negatively, the apostle has to run over the six-fold work of the flesh to ensure that the child of God shall not be left without warning.

Three-fold uncleanness in act.—Fornication, all uncleanness, unbridled lust.

Three-fold uncleanness in word.—Filthiness, foolish talking, jesting (suggestive talking).

Concerning the first three, the apostle says:--

> “Let it not be once named among you, as becometh saints” (Eph. v. 3).

Concerning the second three, he says:--

> “Things not consistent (the modern usage of ‘convenient’ is a little misleading), but rather giving of thanks” (Eph. v. 4).

A further three-fold description bringing together those already named follows, and this time with a warning of great import:--

> “For this you know, for you have learned that no fornicator, or impure or lustful man, who is nothing better than an idolator, has any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God” (Eph. v. 5).

We do not feel called upon here to rake over this awful heap of corruption and bring to light that which we fain would hide, or which should “not once be named among us”

(Eph. v. 3), "for it is a shame even to speak of these things" (Eph. v. 12), nevertheless this epistle is written to us and a very slight knowledge of modern life will teach us that these warnings are absolutely up to date. We have translated pleonexia, unbridled lust, rather than covetousness, and in this we are but following such as Conybeare and Howson, Jowett, and Trench. The latter shows the meaning of the word in the following passage:--

> "Take the sublime commentary on the word which Plato supplies, where he likens the desire of man to the sieve or pierced vessel of the Danaids, which they were ever filling, but might never fill: and it is not too much to say, that the whole longing of the creature, as it has itself abandoned God and by a just retribution is abandoned by Him, to stay its hunger with the swine's husks, instead of the children's bread, is contained in this word."

It is evident that the same comparison had occurred to Shakespeare:--

> "The cloyed will. That satiate, yet unsatisfied desire. That tub both filled and running" (Cymbeline 1:7).

To these words we would but add that the whole truth is expressed in the first and the tenth commandments:--

> "Thou shalt have no other gods before Me."
> "Thou shalt not covet, or desire."

To imitate God and to walk in love makes such things as detailed by the apostle impossible.

"Jesting" = eutrapeleia, refers to that loose talk which by skilful turning of words brings up to the mind far more than the actual wording may appear to intend and is to be shunned by all who put off "the lie".

The Inheritance.

The words of the apostle that should cause every child of God to stop and consider are that those that do such things:--

> "Have no inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God" (Eph. v. 5).

There is no question but that one phase at least of the inheritance is in the nature of a reward, and consequently may be forfeited. This is clearly expressed in Col. iii. 24 in a passage that exactly corresponds with Eph. v. 5:--

> "Knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance: for ye serve the Lord Christ."

Rom. viii. 17 seems to observe the distinction between "heirs of God" because children of God, and "joint heirs with Christ" if so be that these children walk as Christ walked, which must of necessity involve suffering and rejection.

The inheritance which is a matter of predestination and redemption (Eph. i. 11, 14) is one thing, the inheritance that is in the kingdom of Christ and of God is another, and it may be forfeited. Men may emphasize "grace", they may call such teaching "legal", they may seek to throw out the idea of reward from the epistles of the Mystery, but the Apostle concludes his words of warning by saying:--

> "Let no man deceive you with vain words" (Eph. v. 6).

The parallel in Colossians but endorses or enforces this:--

> "Beware lest any man spoil you through . . . . . vain deceit . . . . . Let no man beguile you of your reward" (Col. ii. 8-18).

Because of these things the wrath of God is coming on the children of disobedience, and the members of the church are not to be partakers with such. There must be an outward expression of the inward change. Once they too were darkness and walked in darkness, producing the unfruitful works of darkness. Now, however, they are light in the Lord and so the exhortation comes, "Walk as children of light". Love leads to sacrifice, and repudiates lust which is but the expression of selfishness. Light leads to fruitfulness and reproves the unfruitful works of darkness. Where the A.V. reads:-- the revised text read, "the fruit of the light".

> "For the fruit of the Spirit is in all goodness and righteousness and truth" (Eph. v. 9).

This reading contains a truth which is everywhere confirmed in the works of God around us. The student of Horticulture is early impressed with the essential place that light has in plant growth. The bulk of the food upon our tables daily are carbo-hydrates or starchy foods, such as bread and all cereals, potatoes, sugar, &c. Now this carbon is obtained by plants, not from the soil but from the air. Carbon assimilation, called also Photo-synthesis ("placing together by light"), is the work of the green chlorophyll in the leaves, and is entirely dependent upon the action of sunlight. If a patch of black be put upon a leaf in the morning and the leaf be examined under a microscope at night, it will be found that the exposed cells of the leaf are full of starch grains, whereas the cells beneath the black patch are empty.

It is scientific to the last degree to teach that on the first day of creation God should say, "Light be, and light was". It is the fuller truth to see in this statement of Genesis a type of the gospel:--

> "For God, Who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light . . . . . the light of the glorious gospel" (II Cor. iv. 4, 6).

Not only does light produce fruit, but darkness has its unfruitful works. We all have seen the varied coloured toadstool that, like the mushroom, do not depend upon the light. No one, however, has seen a green toadstool or mushroom. Such have no power of using sunlight, they are vegetable parasites living upon others, or saprophytes living upon the decaying tissue of dead plants. Such are nature's pictures of the unfruitful works of darkness. Darkness and death and unfruitfulness are all in the passage before us:--

> "Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light" (Eph. v. 14).

The third walk is called "circumspect". Akribos is possibly derived from eis akron benai = "going up to the summit" of a hill, and generally carries with it the thought of accuracy and exactness, e.g.:-- > Akribeia = "Taught according to the perfect manner" (Acts xxii. 3).

> Akribestatos = "The straitest sect" (Acts xxvi. 5).
> Akribesteros = "The way of God more accurately" (Acts xviii. 26).

Josephus speaks of the Pharisees as:--

> "The sect . . . . . who are thought to excel others in their exactness about their national institutions" (Life 38).

There can be no doubt from the above usage of the word what Paul intends to teach in Eph. v. 15. Grace does not mean laxity or lack of diligence. The same word that describes the zeal for accuracy of the formalist under the law, describes that consecrated zeal which moved Aquila and Priscilla in their endeavours to lead Apollos into the fuller light, and should characterize those of us who have received such a calling as is revealed in Ephesians. The pathway for the saint leads through dark and slippery places. Uncleanness and defilement lie all around, and while there is the blessed provision in Christ for uncleanness contracted in the pilgrim way, we are solemnly warned of the danger of voluntarily entering into any of these things from which redemption has set us free. We have been delivered from the authority of darkness and have been translated into the kingdom of His dear Son. We are therefore enjoined to walk accurately, remembering the pit from which we have been delivered.

This is the last of the seven occurrences of the word "walk" in Ephesians. The first in the practical section says "walk worthy"; the last says "walk accurately". The first says "with all lowliness"; the last "with wisdom". Once again the parallel epistle to the Colossians will provide confirmation. Ephesians says:--

> "Walk worthy . . . . . walk accurately as wise . . . . . be not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is . . . . . be filled with the Spirit."

Colossians says:--

> "That ye might be filled with the knowledge of His will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding: that ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful" (Col. i. 9, 10).

"Redeeming the time."—Exagorazo means "to buy out of the market" with the meaning of our English "forestall" implied. Forestall means to buy a thing before it is placed upon the stall in the market and so to exhibit a keen business sense. As stewards and as redeemed ones this keen business sense should be ours in the exercise of our calling and stewardship. "Time" here is not chronos—mere duration, but kairos, a fitting time, hence an opportunity. It has been said:--

> 'Opportunities are for eternity, but not to eternity.'

Alas that many only recognize opportunity by its back. Think of the opportunities for service, for study, for communion, for helping, that have been allowed to slip this day, or this week. Have you always been prepared to speak that word in season? to give that helping hand? The past is beyond us, and we can but seek the forgiveness that is ours in Christ. The present is here, let us then:--

> "Forestall the opportunity, because the days are evil" (Eph. v. 16).

To do this we need wisdom, we need to:-- > "Understand what the will of the Lord is" (Eph. v. 17).

How can this understanding be attained? The answer comes in the next verse:--

> "And be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess, but be filled with the Spirit (when) speaking to one another" (Eph. v. 18, 19).

What is it to be filled with the Spirit?

This passage is important enough to warrant a pause and a careful examination. First we can see an intended contrast, a contrast introduced in verse 3 of this same chapter. The Gentiles who knew not God found their enjoyment and inspiration in the intoxication of wine, their speech was corrupt, filthy and unfit for saints. Their drinking songs, accompanied by instruments, resounded with the praise of Bacchus, Venus and the like. The saint is to be a contrast. Instead of wine he is to be filled with the Spirit, instead of unclean mirth and idolatrous songs he is to sing spiritual songs and make melody in his heart. Instead of praising the gods of darkness his melody and praise should be directed to the Lord. What are we to understand by the injunction, "Be filled with the Spirit".

To understand this statement it is necessary to understand the use of the Greek verb to fill. Pleroo, "to fill" takes three cases after it. As an active verb, followed by the Accusative, of the vessel or whatever is filled. As an active verb, followed by the Genitive, of what it is filled with. As a passive verb, followed by the Dative, of the filler, and as a passive verb, followed by the Genitive, of what the vessel is filled with.

In the passage before us the verb is passive, and "with Spirit", en pneumati, is dative. This means that the "Spirit" is the One that "fills", and not that the believer is filled with the Spirit. To make sure that the meaning is clear, let us put it this way. A cup may be filled with water, it may be filled with a pump. Now, the incongruity of the statement would prevent anyone from imagining that the pump was found afterwards in the cup, but as there are passages which speak of the filling or baptism of the Spirit, the unguarded reader does not discern the meaning so clearly. Now if the Spirit fills us with something that takes the place of "wine wherein is excess", we should seek to know what it is. Once again the parallel epistle Colossians supplies the needed information:--

> "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly. Teach and admonish one another in all wisdom, singing in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs with grace in your hearts to the Lord" (Col. iii. 16).

This parallel is so complete that we cannot avoid the inference that "to be filled with the Spirit" will be to be filled by the Spirit with the word of Christ. The Spirit everywhere takes of the things of Christ and applies them to the heart of the believer. That constitutes the inspiration of his renewed conversation, "speaking to yourselves", and will prevent any corrupt communication from proceeding out of his mouth, for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh, and a heart filled by the Spirit with the word of Christ will speak accordingly. The melody of hearts finds its Amen in:-- > "Giving thanks always for all things unto God and the Father in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Eph. v. 20).

The lowliness and meekness that adorns this doctrine is expressed by:-- > "Submitting yourselves one to another in the fear of God" (Eph. v. 21).

"Fear", phobos, and "reverence", phobeomai (see Eph. v. 33) explain one another. Our reverence for Christ places us all in our true relationship one with another. This relationship is threefold and practically covers the whole of human society.

Our next study must be devoted to the application of truth to the domestic and social side of life, a side as important if not more so than that of the ecclesiastical and public. Truth like charity begins at home. The bishop must be able to manage his own house before he can think of ruling the house of God. The Spirit of God has sealed us. The Spirit of God may fill us. Let us walk accurately, for His Word is still a lamp unto our feet and a light unto our path, as well as serving to illuminate our mind.

No.80. The Practical Section (iv. - vi.).

Christ and the church in home and business (v. 22 - vi. 9).

pp. 181 - 187

The last words of Eph. v. 21 are:--

> "Submitting yourselves one to another in the fear of God."

The opening words of the new section are:--

> "Wives submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as unto the Lord."

We are evidently embarking upon an application of teaching of verse 21, and therefore must remember that while the wives are here told specifically to submit to their own husbands, it is only a working out of that spirit that reverences Christ and submits to whatever He shall lay upon us. Further, the submission of the wife to the husband is "as unto the Lord", and this spirit runs throughout the sixfold command. Before tracing this through the section before us, let us seek an understanding of the word "submit", for unless we understand a command our obedience will not be of a very high order.

The meaning of submission.

The word translated "submit" is hupotasso, and is used in Ephesians as follows:--

> "And hath put all things under His feet" (i. 22).
> "Submitting yourselves one to another" (v. 21).
> "Wives submit yourselves" (v. 22).
> "As the church is subject unto Christ" (v. 24).

Tasso properly means to set in order, as in Luke vii. 8. In the passive it carries the idea of "being disposed" as opposed to "judging oneself not worthy", as in Acts xiii. 48.

Taxis indicates order, arrangement (I Cor. xiv. 40; Col. ii. 5). Without multiplying examples, it will be seen that the idea of "submission" in Eph. v. is not of a humiliating or servile description, but of so recognizing the Lordship of Christ as to be willing for the lowest or the highest place as He shall will. It will be seen that the husband who acts in his position as "head of the wife" is as submissive to the will of the Lord as is the wife who sets forth the relative position of the church. Both attitudes are honourable and necessary.

When we remember that the first occurrence of the word is Luke ii. 51, which refers to the Lord in His childhood, "and came to Nazareth and was subject unto them", surely the last shred of rebellion must vanish as we realize what that submission involved.

Submission "as unto Christ".

A1 | Eph. v. 22-24. Wives submit, as the church to Christ.
B1 | Eph. v. 25-33. Husbands love, as Chris the church.
A2 | Eph. vi. 1-3. Children obey in the Lord.
B2 | Eph. vi. 4. Fathers train in nurture of the Lord.
A3 | Eph. vi. 5-8. Slaves obey, as unto the Christ.
B3 | Eph. vi. 9. Masters do the same, for you have a Master in heaven.

A great deal of harmful discussion has revolved around the question, "Should the bride say obey at the marriage service?" Paul does not say 'wives obey' when he treats of the social fabric and its inter-relation, he reserves the word "obey" to children and slaves, with their correlatives "bring up" and "forbear threatening", using the higher word "submit" of the wife. This word "submit" is wrongly translated "obedient to their own husbands" in Titus ii. 5. The only passage where wives are said to obey is I Pet. iii. 5, 6, which grows out of the submission of verses 1-5. A wife who has submitted to the Divine arrangement will of necessity "obey" when obedience is demanded, but it is the result of a willing compliance with the Lord's will, a grateful seizing of the opportunity to typify the church's relation to the Lord, a very different thing from that obedience of the child, which is "right", and according to commandment.

The relation of wives and husbands.

"Wives submit . . . . . as the church unto Christ."
"Husbands love . . . . . as Christ the church."

It will be seen that we are upon higher ground than that of I Cor. xi. & xiv. and I Tim. ii. There the apostle goes back to Nature and Creation.

> "For the man is not of the woman, but woman of the man, neither was man created for the woman; but the woman for the man . . . . . Doth not even nature itself teach you" (I Cor. xi. 1-16).

Law.

> "Let your women keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be submissive, as also saith the law" (I Cor. xiv. 34).

Creation and Sin.

> "For Adam was first formed, then Eve, and Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived has come to be in transgression" (I Tim. ii. 9-15).

The Apostle had all these courses open before him to enforce his point, but he passes them all by for the greater and higher motive used in Eph. v. To the wife the Apostle says, "The husband is the head of the wife", but to the husband he says, "Love your wives". He feels under no necessity to say, "Husbands rule your wives". To each is the word given tempered with much graciousness. Because the husband is head that does not mean ruthless rule and rough-shod methods. The husband in Christ is "submitted" to an obligation that cannot be computed. He is to love his wife, "even as Christ also loved the church and gave Himself for it".

Perhaps when wives are loved with that kind of love, all argument as to submission and obedience will become unnecessary. The love of the husband moreover is to be all in the direction of blessing, not for selfish ends:--

> "That he might sanctify, cleanse, present a church in glory, not having spot, or wrinkle or any such thing: but that it may be holy and without blemish" (Eph. v. 26, 27).

Take one item, perhaps the lowliest, "not having wrinkle". The word "wrinkle" in the original means exactly the same as the English word, viz., "a corrugation of the skin", and is allied with rhusa (old age, the time of wrinkles). Care and anxiety, worry of any description are the chief causes of wrinkles; how this reveals the character of the husband's love, that shields the wife from as many anxieties as is possible.

The physical and the spiritual.

Throughout this passage the physical interchanges with the spiritual as type with antitype.

A1 | Physical. Wives submit.
B1 | Spiritual. As the church.
A2 | Physical. Husbands. So ought men.
B2 | Spiritual. Even as the Lord the church.
A3 | Physical. Wives and husbands. One flesh.
B3 | Spiritual. The mystery. Christ and His church.

The union of husband and wife is looked upon in Scripture as something deeper than a civil or religious joining together of two persons in marriage. Every true marriage harks back to Eden:--

> "For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall be joined unto his wife, and they two shall be one flesh" (Eph. v. 31).

The same apostle says in I Cor. vi. 17, "he that is joined to the Lord is one spirit", which shows the antitype to be mentally supplied in Eph. v. 31, 32. Moreover the argument concerning a man nourishing and cherishing his own body finds its alternative in that sin which is against his own body (I Cor. vi. 18). If I Cor. vi. 15-20 be carefully weighed with Eph. v. 28-32, a great deal of irrelevant matter need never have been written.

It is an established truth that the church of Ephesians is "the Body" and "the New Man". Now the Scriptures uses figures with discretion. The bridal relationship to Christ belongs to another calling; in Ephesians we are dealing with the bridegroom if such a figure is allowable at all. The passage before us is not discussing the title of the church of the dispensation of the Mystery, it is dealing with the relationship of husbands and wives who belong to this dispensation. If Eph. v. teaches that the church is "the bride", Eph. vi. teaches that the church is "a child" and "a slave", neither of which titles are true. The last two may be true of course of individuals.

The great Mystery.

When the Apostle draws to the conclusion of his exhortation to wives and husbands he says, "This is the great mystery, but I speak with a view to Christ and His church" (Eph. v. 32). That there is a mystery in marriage let anyone decide after reading Matt. xix. 5, 6, "And they twain shall be one flesh". Such is the quotation from Gen. ii.

"Wherefore they are no more twain, but one flesh", is the comment of the Lord Himself. But, says the Apostle, granting the sanctity and the mystery of marriage under the thought of "one flesh", the great mystery I have in mind is that union with the Lord which makes "one spirit". Nevertheless, turning back to the typical union of man and wife he continues:--

> "Nevertheless let each one of you individually so love his wife as himself: and the wife see that she reverence her husband" (Eph. v. 33).

We have not felt called upon to enter into a detailed examination of the idea that the church of the Body is also the Bride, not wishing to spend time disproving an obvious failure to discern things that differ. If, however, we have misjudged our readers and there are those who have misgivings on this point, we draw attention to the booklet The Bride and the Body.

Children and their parents.

> "Children, obey your parents in the Lord" (Eph. vi. 1).

How are we to understand the clause "in the Lord"? Does it imply disobedience to parents if they are not "in the Lord"? Does it mean only obey your parents in those things that you recognize are "in the Lord"? The first suggestion seems to be quite apart from the spirit of the Scriptures, the second presupposes too advanced a stage of spiritual perception. Col. iii. 20 supplies an answer:--

> "Children, obey your parents with respect to all things: for this is well pleasing in the Lord."

While the children here addressed would probably be connected with the church (for otherwise they would not hear this passage read at all), they are not placed upon so high a platform as that of husband and wife. The first reason given in Eph. vi. 1 is the primitive one, "for it is right".

In the training of our children, while grace and love and even an appeal to their profession of faith are all legitimate, there is a sense in which it differs from that of the more adult believer. Not only is such obedience "right", but the Apostle even goes back to the fifth commandment adding as a note of encouragement that it is the first commandment with promise.

We are not to reason from this that an obedient child of parents who are members of the Body is assured a long life on the earth, but to gather from the quotation the marked approval of the Lord upon the obedience of children to parents, even though "the promise" now may be expressed in some other way than "long life upon the earth". On the other hand it is morally certain that seeds sown in childhood by disobedience materially influence their well-being in after years. As we have already indicated, children and slaves are addressed differently from wives, and this may be the better seen by noticing the recurring features:--

A | vi. 1-3. a | Ye children.
b | Be obedient.
c | To parents.
d | "Right." "Promise."
B | vi. 4. e | And ye fathers.
f | Provoke not.
g | Your children.
h | Bring them up.
A | vi. 5-8. a | Ye slaves.
b | Be obedient.
c | To masters.
d | "As unto Christ." "Reward."
B | vi. 9. e | And ye masters.
f | Threaten not.
g | Them.
h | Your Master is in heaven.

Promise and reward figure more prominently here. While "parents" are spoken of in Eph. vi. 1, and "father and mother" separately mentioned in verse 2, "fathers" are specially addressed in verse 4.

One of the results of modern civilization has been the transference of this responsibility from the father to the mother. To thousands of young children the father is someone who appears on the scene at week-ends, whose name is held up as a kind of bogey as a last recourse, but who does not come into every-day living contact with the growing child. The mother's duties connected with the material and physical well-being of the child often prevent the exercise of those other elements of training that are so necessary.

Mother-love is protective. Father-love is corrective as well. Mother-love often shields the child from the due results of its own wrong-doing, whereas father-love looks ahead and sees the dire results in the future. As neither parent can be a substitute for the other, the child needs both, but in "discipline and instruction" (en paideia kai nouthesia) the father is the true agent. Heb. xii. 5-11 should be read in this connection. The Apostle explains fairly clearly what he conceives to be the functions of the mother and the father in I Thess. ii. 7-11:--

"We were gentle in the midst of you, as a nursing mother cherisheth her own children."

This motherliness is further expanded in such words as "being affectionately desirous", "willing to impart our very lives", "ye were endeared to us", "labouring night and day so as not be burdensome". Who that knows mother-love cannot sense it here? The Apostle, however, was a father to these saints as well as a mother. So the language changes. He speaks of his deportment as "pious", "righteous", "blameless", and that he "exhorted and comforted and charged every one of you as a father doth his own children, that ye should walk worthy". Such is the necessary combination for true child welfare. Before the Apostle says one word as to how the children were to be disciplined, he gives a caution to the fathers, "and ye fathers, provoke not your children to wrath". Col. iii. 21 says, "Father, provoke not your children, lest they be discouraged". Rom. x. 19 uses the expression "provoke to wrath" in the words, "by a foolish nation I will anger you". The lesser word in Col. iii. means "to exasperate".

Have we never entered a home and felt the baneful effects of this "exasperation" and "discouragement"? Children have a keen sense of justice and will take punishment for offences without resentment when they know that they are being dealt with rightly. They have no words oftentimes to explain the motives for their actions, and often that which seems a peculiarly flagrant case of disobedience or malice may prove to be the result of some childish misconstruction or misunderstanding. We appeal to all fathers who may read these words to weigh these passages over before the Lord, seeking to avoid the discouraging attitude and gladly assuming the responsibility of disciplining and instructing those who are dependent upon them.

These things have a serious meaning moreover when considered in the light of ministry, for although none would now speak of themselves as bishops or deacons, yet the principle of I Tim. iii. 1-12 still holds good:--

"One that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all dignity. For if a man knows not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?"

Slaves and masters.

The question of "Christianity and slavery" is never raised in the N.T. These things were left for the working of the truth to accomplish in time. The slave of the Apostle's day and the servant of to-day may differ in many things, even to great extremes, but the principle of their service remains unaltered. The child of God then or the child of God now is compelled to serve an earthly master is provided with no lower a standard than:-- "In singleness of your heart, as unto Christ. Not with eye service, as men-pleasers; but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart. With good will doing service as to the Lord and not to men" (Eph. vi. 5-7).

These words were once read by a reader of The Berean Expositor to an extremist in social matters who explained passionately, "The man who wrote that was a devil". The brother said, "Well, what do you say of the man who wrote this?" and read verse 9, "and, ye masters, do the same things unto them". We do not know his reply, but it is obvious that the Apostle was no champion of class warfare. That there are crying evils among servants and masters no one can deny, but the child of God is not left here to reform or to patch up, but to witness for the truth, to endure what may come as a result and to leave his case with the Lord:--

> "Knowing that whatsoever good things any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free" (Eph. vi. 8).

We have had a very unscriptural idea based upon this verse presented to us. It is this. Only the good we do will be dealt with by the Lord in that day, for this verse says nothing about any bad thing we may have done. The good will be recognized, the evil will have been forgiven. That is a very "comfortable" doctrine no doubt, but as Col. iii. 24, 25 writes upon the same theme and to the same people dispensationally, it cannot hold:--

> "Knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance: for ye serve the Lord Christ. But he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons."

Masters are exhorted in Ephesians to "do the same things" which in Colossians becomes "give that which is just and equal", which is not incipient communism, but refers to the relation of wages to service, that it must be equitable. Further, the master is exhorted to "forbear threatening", a matter of even greater difficulty than to-day. At that time slaves were the personal property of their masters and without redress.

Behold, the dreamer!

Those of us who have received the truth of the Mystery and who have sought to carry out as far as possible its teaching have to submit to the misunderstandings of our fellows, and among the charges made against us is that we have exchanged realities for dreams, that we are no longer a practical force, etc. We wonder how many husbands and wives when faced with Eph. v. would dare to speak of our teaching as unpractical and only stuff for dreamers? We wonder how many fathers, surveying their children's progress, would deny the practical teaching of Eph. vi., to say nothing of the servants and the masters that are forming into hostile camps even though professing the same faith?

The world has a proverb, "Charity begins at home", and if home life and business life were permeated with the spirit of Eph. v. and vi. the church life and gospel testimony would look after itself. God is not served by multiplying meetings and neglecting the claims of home. God is not served at the expense of faithful daily service or at the expense of faithful recognition. In many things we offend all. Let us for the remainder of our time seek grace to live in harmony with the practical outcome of being members of that church of which Christ is the Head, and the church His Body.

The power of His might (vi. 10).

pp. 201 - 208

"Finally."—At length this wondrous epistle nears its close. In height, depth, length and breadth it stands without a peer in the whole range of inspired Scripture. Readers of The Berean Expositor must have sense that our conception of truth makes this epistle to us something akin to what the epistle to the Galatians was to Luther. It has given us a liberty beyond the dreams of man. It reveals a Christ raised far above all, Who fills all in all, Who ascended and descended that He might fill all things, Whose love surpasses knowledge, Whose riches are unsearchable. It has given us a sacred trust: a "good deposit" to guard, a unity to keep. It has brought its blessedness into every department of life. It takes us back before the overthrow of the world, and on to the ages yet to come. Its grace abounds. What then shall be the "Finally" of the Apostle?

He reminds us that we are not yet actually seated in the heavenlies, but beset by foes who at present hold to these very spheres. Though fellow-citizens with the saints, we are yet walking in the wilderness. Though sealed unto the day of redemption, we have to remember that we actually live in an evil day. Hence the Apostle concludes his letter with an exhortation to be strong, to put on the armour of God, to stand, to watch and to pray. The language of faith says, as we look at our inheritance in the heavenlies, "Let us go up at once and possess it; for we are well able to overcome it" (Num. xiii. 30). Caleb, who said these words, tasted something of the strength that Paul refers to here, and knew something of the need for the armour and the sword:--

> "And now, behold, the Lord hath kept me alive, as He said, these forty and five years . . . . . as yet I am as strong this day as I was in the day that Moses sent me . . . . . for war . . . . ." (Joshua xiv. 10, 11).

Before the armour, however, comes the strength, for without the necessary strength armour would be but a death-trap: "Be strong in the Lord and in the power of His might" (Eph. vi. 10). Philosophers have said to men "Be strong". Psychologists tell us to say to ourselves "Be strong", but the only strength that will avail us in this conflict is the strength that is ours in the Lord.

The power of His resurrection.

No other writer in the N.T. uses the word which is here translated "be strong" except Luke, who in Acts ix. 22 uses it of Paul himself. The exception but proves the rule. The word is peculiar to the teaching of Paul and his own experience of the risen Lord. The eight occurrences of the word endunamao speak of resurrection, and the seven occurrences in the epistles are worth a moment's attention.

Endunamao in Paul's epistles.

A | Rom. iv. 19, 20. Strong, not weak, in faith.--O.T.
B | a | Eph. vi. 10. Strong in the Lord.--WAR. \
b | Phil. iv. 13. Strong in Christ.--ENDURANCE. \ After
C | I Tim. i. 12. Christ Jesus.--MINISTRY. } Acts
B | a | II Tim. ii. 1. Strong in grace.--WAR. / xxviii.
b | II Tim. iv. 17. Strong in the Lord.--ENDURANCE. /
A | Heb. xi. 34. Strong in faith, out of weakness.--O.T.

The first example, that of Abraham, is a strong witness for "the power of His resurrection", for it is said that "he believed God Who quickeneth the dead". The words of Eph. vi. 10 look back to Eph. i. 19. In vi. 10 we have endunamao, "be strong"; kratos, "power"; ischus, "might". In i. 19 we have dunamis, "power"; ischus, "mighty"; kratos, "power".

The believer is turned back to the risen and ascended Christ as the source of the power whereby he may stand the shock of battle. There is no other power at present either available or sufficient. All believers, whether conscious of it as an experimental fact or not, "have the sentence of death in themselves that they should not trust in themselves, but in God which raiseth the dead" (II Cor. i. 9).

The essential basis.

Before principalities and powers come into view as opponents in Eph. vi., a necessary fact is pre-supposed, and that is the teaching of Rom. v.-viii. This basic portion of Scripture is devoted to the exposition of two laws, viz.,:--

1. The law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus. \ (Rom. viii. 2).
2. The law of sin and death. /

It is not for us to deal with Romans in this article; we simply trace the stream of this law of the spirit of life until it reaches the glorious climax of Rom. viii. 37-39:--

> "In all these things we are MORE THAN CONQUERORS through Him that loved us. For I Am persuaded that neither death nor life, nor angels, nor PRINCIPALITIES, nor POWERS . . . . . shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

Here is the essential basis of Eph. vi. 10. In Christ and by virtue of His resurrection we are already "more than conquerors" over "principalities and powers". We go forth to this unequal conflict in "the power of His resurrection". We go forth to achieve experimentally that victory already accomplished in Christ. So far as He is concerned, He has been raised far above all principality and power (Eph. i. 21, 23). So far as the Lord Himself is concerned, He "stripped off principalities and powers, and made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in it" (Col. ii. 15). To attempt the conflict of Eph. vi. in any other power than that of the risen Christ is to seek defeat. To attempt it in that power is to make experimental proof of the fact that in Him we are "more than conquerors".

Are all the saved soldiers?

If we allow the typical history of Israel to influence us, we may conclude that only those who have reached spiritual maturity are called upon to take up the armour:--

> "From twenty years old and upward, all that are able to go forth to war in Israel" (Num. i. 3).

It was no light matter to be "chosen as a soldier" as both II Tim. ii. and Num. xiv. will show:--

> "Your carcasses shall fall in this wilderness; and all that were numbered of you, according to your whole number, from twenty years old and upward, which murmured against Me" (Num. xiv. 29).

The two exceptions to this statement are Caleb and Joshua. Of Caleb the Lord said:--

> "He had another spirit with him, and hath followed Me fully, him will I bring into the land" (Num. xiv. 24).

Now the words "hath followed Me fully" are literally "hath filled after Me", and Col. i. 24 comes to mind as a close parallel:--

> "And fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ."

To Joshua the Lord had said:--

> "Moses . . . . . is dead . . . . . arise . . . . . be strong" (Joshua i. 2-6).

Just as the inheritance of Israel was in possession of the "giants" who had to be overcome in the strength of the Lord, so the inheritance of the church in the heavenlies is held by spiritual foes of high rank and power. The soldier has something to win or to lose:--

> "Thou therefore, my son, be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus . . . . . endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ" (II Tim. ii. 1-3).

A crown is in view and reigning with Christ (ii. 4-12). This recurs in chapter iv., where Paul speaking of himself says:--

> "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown" (II Tim. iv. 7, 8).

Yet, further, it is in the parallel epistle of the "Prize", namely Philippians, that Paul calls Epaphroditus a "fellow-soldier". We feel therefore with these passages before us that every believer is not necessarily numbered among the ranks of those able to go forth to war.

There are three things, which either separately or together, make for defeat:

(1) No armour, or armour that is untrustworthy.
(2) A consciousness that the fight is unrighteous.
(3) An ignorance of the object of the fight.

Blessed be God, the first two things are assured by the Word. The third is more directly connected with the believer. Let us ask ourselves as before God, What should we be fighting for? How many of us can give a consistent, Scriptural answer? Is our inheritance in jeopardy? Can we lose our membership in the One Body? Neither of these possessions can be lost. What then can we gain or lose? The answer is, a crown and a prize.

Immediately following II Tim. ii. which speaks of the soldier, are the words:

> "If a man also strive for masteries, yet is he not crowned, except he strive lawfully" (II Tim. ii. 5).

Immediately following Paul's personal declaration, "I have fought a good fight", are the words, "Henceforth a crown".

> "Let no man beguile you of your reward" (Col. ii. 18).

Satan cannot rob you of your calling, but he may rob you of your crown. This fact enables us to appreciate better the reference in Numb. xiv., for those who perished in the wilderness were not types of the unsaved, but of those who, being saved, did not go on unto perfection (Heb. iii. and iv.).

The words of Eph. vi. 13 "having done all", are a translation of katergazomai, elsewhere translated "to work out" (Phil. ii. 12, 13 and II Cor. iv. 17). The structure of the epistle as a whole compels us to translate the word accurately. It is the "working out" of the mighty power that was "wrought in" Christ; the only possible power that can counter the "inworking" of the prince of the power of the air (Eph. ii. 2).

Another important fact is that no military terms are used in Eph. vi., so far as the conflict is concerned. We are exhorted to "stand", to "withstand" and to "wrestle". Even apart from inspiration, no one of Paul's calibre would speak of "wrestling" in "armour" without previously explaining the "armour" in such a way as to avoid incongruity. It is common knowledge that the Greeks wrestled naked; our very gymnasium is derived from the Greek gymnos, "naked". Before we can go any further it is incumbent upon us to ascertain what "armour" symbolizes in the teaching of Paul.

> "The night is far spent, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armour of light" (Rom. xiii. 12).

It will be observed here that "casting off" is parallel with "putting on"; and "works of darkness" with "armour of light", "works" on the one hand and "armour" on the other.

Let us read on, watching for any military terms and any further parallel with the armour, endeavouring to discover the battle ground and the opponents.

> "Let us walk honestly (decently), as in the day: not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying. But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof" (Rom. xiii. 13, 14).

Instead of exhorting to fight, the Apostle drops all reference to armour as such, and speaks of "walk". The opponents are not soldiers or external foes, but "the lusts of the flesh" such as drunkenness and wantonness. To leave the matter beyond dispute, he returns to the theme, and in place of the exhortation, "Let us put on the armour of light", we have, "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ".

If this is what 'armour' means to Paul, then it is perfectly fitting for him to speak of 'wrestling'. In I Thess. v. 7, 8 he speaks of armour once more in a very similar context:

> "For they that sleep, sleep in the night; and they that be drunken are drunken in the night; but let us, who are of the day, be sober, putting on the breastplate of faith and love; and for an helmet, the hope of salvation."

The context of this passage will be examined in vain for any allusion to fighting. The only foes are those of Rom. xiii., the foes within, the lusts of the flesh and the works of darkness.

In our next reference the word 'armour' is translated 'weapons'; and here at last we find the word 'warfare'. Perhaps, at last, we shall now see the field of battle and the nature of the conflict:

> "For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God, to the pulling down of strongholds" (II Cor. x. 4).

Here the military terms: weapons, warfare, pulling down strongholds. The next verse reads:

> "Casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ" (II Cor. x. 5).

The fortress that is besieged is that of the 'imaginations' or 'reasonings', prompted by the spiritual power called 'height' in Rom. viii. 39. The captives taken are the 'thoughts' brought into obedience to Christ. There is nothing here approaching 'warfare' in the military sense. The words of Prov. xvi. 32 are still true and can be applied to our present theme:

> "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city."

When we examine the one remaining reference to hopla, translated 'armour' or 'weapons', we shall have further grounds for avoiding the military figure.

> "Let not sin, therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof. Neither yield ye your members as instruments (weapons, armour) of unrighteousness unto sin: but yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments (weapons, armour) of righteousness unto God" (Rom. vi. 12, 13).

These references provide conclusive evidence as to what the Apostle intended by the word 'armour'. Eph. vi. is the last occurrence of the word, which is therefore adequately explained by its earlier usage.

Another important fact, parallel to that concerning the 'armour', is the way in which the figure of the soldier and the fight merges into that of the athlete and the race, strengthening our conclusion that the fight is concerned with the prize, and is not so much a question of a campaign or conquest of enemies.

In II Tim. ii. 4, 5 the transition is most clear. "Strive for masteries" (A.V.) becomes, 'contend in the games' in the R.V.; the verb athleo giving us the word athlete and athletics. The soldier is mentioned in connection with 'endurance'; the figure is then set aside for that of the athlete and the crown. Again, in II Tim. iv. 7, 8 we have the fight and the crown, as we have already seen; the word 'fight' is agon, which is translated 'race' in Heb. xii. 1. It is impossible to translate II Tim. iv. 7, 'I have fought a good race'. Perhaps the best rendering is: "I have contested a good contest." This keeps the figure within the bounds of athletics, its true setting.

We can now come to some definite conclusions:

(1) The Apostle's use of the word 'armour' must be our guide as to its meaning, and not our own ideas drawn from military figures.

(2) His use of the word 'armour' is consistent . . . . . it concerns the putting on of the Lord Jesus Christ, and so makes Eph. vi. echo Eph. iv. where we 'put on the new man'.

(3) The figure of the athlete striving for the crown involves the keeping under of the flesh. The flesh, as Eph. ii. 2, 3 has already made plain, is acted upon by the prince of the power of the air, and so brings the believer into conflict with 'spiritual wickednesses' who are the 'rulers of the darkness of this world'.

(4) The attack of these spiritual foes is not directed against our salvation, our membership of the church or our standing, for these are outside all possible attack. The attack is against the believer's chance of winning a prize, a crown, or a reward.

With these things made clear from the Word itself, we can now return to Eph. vi. to obtain further light upon its teaching. The 'high places' of Eph. vi. 12, as the margin tells us, are, more correctly, 'heavenly places'. Now the earlier references to 'heavenly places' leave no doubt about the fact that they are at the right hand of God. Are these 'spiritual wickednesses in heavenly places', then, at the right hand of God? It is imperative that we seek a Scriptural answer to this question, for we must remember that Satan's authority is limited to the air and that Christ and His church are 'far above all principality' and therefore far above the realm of Satan himself. In a footnote to an article written years ago by the present writer in Things to Come, Dr. Bullinger drew attention to the true disposition of the verse.

"For we wrestle not	BUT WITH PRINCIPALITIES	in heavenly with flesh and blood	. . . . . OF THIS WORLD	places."

We do not wrestle with flesh and blood; neither do we wrestle in heavenly places. We do wrestle with spiritual wickednesses who are the rulers of the darkness of this world, not of that world at the right hand of God. The reader may appreciate a confirmatory passage where a similar division of subject is necessary. As II Pet. i. 19 stands in the A.V. it lends colour to the erroneous teaching that the Second Coming of Christ is not to be understood as a literal future event, but as the 'day star' arising 'in our hearts'. We get the truth by dividing the verse as we divided Eph. vi. 12:

"Whereunto ye do well	as unto a light . . . . . and	in your that ye take heed	the day star arises	hearts."

What is 'the evil day' of Eph. vi. 13? We know that there is yet to be war in heaven between Michael and his angels, and the dragon and his angels (Rev. xii. 7). We know that when Israel crossed the Jordan and entered their inheritance, Jericho was encircled and its walls fell. So, too, there may be a day for which we are now preparing. For the present, however, it is certain that no campaign or conquest is in view in Eph. vi. Our orders are to 'stand', to 'stand against' and to 'withstand'. To exceed our orders is as much disobedience as to refuse to obey.

Stand and Withstand.

It is noteworthy that the actual word "fight" does not occur in Eph. vi. We are instructed that our "wrestling" is not towards (pros) flesh and blood, but spiritual foes. The word that is most prominent in the description of the conflict is the word "stand":--

> "That ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil-- . . . . . that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all, to stand. STAND THEREFORE" (Eph. vi. 11-14).

There appears to be three phases of conflict suggested here:--

1. Standing against the wiles of the devil.
2. Withstanding in the evil day.
3. Having worked out all, to stand.

The wiles of the devil are in active operation at the present time; open warfare is not yet the order of the day. Wiles, strategems, craft, cunning, snares, wolves in sheep's clothing, ministers of satan like ministers of righteousness, these are some of the devil's devices. Eph. iv. 14 uses the word methodeia, translated "lie in wait to deceive", which has been rendered a "systematic deception". We find the system at work in II Cor. iv. There Paul repudiates the "craftiness" and the "deceitful handling of the word of God" by his opponent, and appears clad in the armour of righteousness as he battles for the truth (II Cor. iv. 2-4; vi. 7). The days in which we live are evil (Eph. v. 16), evil is to increase (II Tim. iii. 13). We are at present training for the mighty battle that lies ahead. Some interpret the words "having done all" by "having overcome all the spiritual foes". While it certainly involves that thought, we shall come nearer to the truth by observing the actual word employed and its usage in other passages. Katergazomai means to thoroughly work, or to achieve. Two occurrences of the word in the epistles seem to give light upon its meaning in Eph. vi. The first is:--

> "WORK OUT your own salvation with fear and trembling" (Phil. ii. 12).

Salvation was the blessed possession of the Philippians, but the object of that epistle is to urge these believers into practical realization of their position in Christ. It speaks of "striving", of running for a "prize", of "suffering", and of the "power of His resurrection". The other passage is II Cor. iv. 17:--

> "For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, WORKETH for us a far more exceeding eternal weight of glory."

Once again we have suffering connected with glory. So in Eph. vi. 13, "Having worked out all, to stand".

We cannot help seeing in this a reference back to Rom. viii. 37-39. We have been saved, let us work out this salvation. We have been made more than conquerors in Christ, let us work out this victory in our own experience. This appears to be the essence of the passage. More than conquerors in the risen Christ, putting the whole armour of God, withstanding every assault in the "power of His might", and standing when all is finished, this is our portion. We must consider in subsequent papers:--

1. The whole armour of God, and
2. The three-fold nature of the conflict.

Meanwhile there is no more important word for the soldier of Christ to-day than "STAND THEREFORE".

(Mystery16, pp.81-86).

No.82. The Practical Section (iv. - vi.).

The whole armour of God (vi. 11 - 18).

pp. 221 - 236

The familiar word "panoply" is made up of pan, "all", and hoplon, "arms". Here in Eph. vi. 11 it is called the whole armour of God. The word occurs in but one other place in the N.T., viz., Luke xi. 22, where it is used of the whole armour of Satan (verse 18). In Luke xi. 18-22 we have the following words of Eph. vi., viz., "strong", "panoply" and "stand". How is it possible to stand against the wiles of Satan, clad as he is in his whole armour in which he trusts, unless we put on the whole armour of God? Nothing less than this can avail in that conflict. There is reason therefore for the Apostle's full title. "The whole armour of God."

This armour of God has two other descriptions given to it by the Apostle in his epistles, and just as the armour of God is seen set over against the armour of the devil, so in these other titles the devil's armoury is suggested by antithesis.

"The armour of righteousness" (II Cor. vi. 7) suggests the unrighteousness that characterises Satan's warfare. This armour moreover is described as being "on the right hand and on the left" (II Cor. vi. 7). Schleusner sees in this a reference to the amphidexios, "right-handed on both sides", a Greek name for the soldier fully and completely armed, as we say, head to foot, cap-à-pie, or as Paul said to the good soldier Timothy, "thoroughly furnished" (II Tim. iii. 17).

"The armour of light" of Rom. xiii. 12 suggests the powers of darkness against whom the fight is directed. The negative is strongly stated in II Cor. x. 4, "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God". What a panoply! The armour of light, of right and of might, the whole armour of God.

The sixfold armour.

The whole armour of God comprises six pieces. Why six? One would have thought that such perfection would have been given a sevenfold presentation. The reason seems to be that warfare belongs to the "evil day", and it is not carried over into "the rest that remaineth to the people of God". There are six, not seven, references to the "Mystery" in Ephesians. The Mystery deals with the present interval of Israel's rejection. Both the armour and the present dispensation are perfect in themselves, but they imply an imperfect period. It has been said that the proximity of the Roman soldiers during the writing of Ephesians suggested the description of the armour to Paul the prisoner, but most if not all of what Paul has said is found in the prophecy of Isaiah and in the Psalms:

> "Faithfulness shall be the girdle of His reins" (Isa. xi. 5).

The LXX translates faithfulness by aletheia, "truth", and reins by pleuras, "the sides" or loins. Here is the girdle of truth.

> "He put on righteousness as a breastplate, and an helmet of salvation upon His head" (Isa. lix. 17).

Here is the breastplate of righteousness and the helmet of salvation.

> "How beautiful . . . . . are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace" (Isa. lii. 7).

Here are the feet shod with preparation of the good tidings of peace.

> "He that made my mouth like a sharp sword" (Isa. xlix. 2).

Here is the sword of the Spirit, the Word of God.

> "His truth shall be my shield and buckler" (Psa. xci. 4).

"Truth" in the O.T. often stands for God's faithfulness. Here is the shield of faith.

Satan did not commence operations in Eph. vi., neither did God wait until Eph. vi. before providing His people with the panoply of God. Eve must have laid aside the armour when attacked by the Devil. She tampered with truth; she entertained doubts of God's faithfulness; she failed to quench the fiery darts of the wicked, and she handled the sword of the Spirit deceitfully.

The sixfold armour.

A | The GIRDLE. Truth or faithfulness.
B | The BREASTPLATE. Righteousness.
C | The SHOES. Gospel of peace.
A | The SHIELD. Faith or faithfulness.
B | The HELMET. Salvation.
C | The SWORD. The Word of God.

Let us notice some features that come into prominence by this twofold arrangement.

The breastplate and the helmet (heart and head).—There is no more vital connection in either law or gospel than that of righteousness and salvation. A salvation that had not righteousness as its basis would be useless in the conflict with the evil one. This is why in II Cor. vi. 7 Paul calls the whole armour "the armour of righteousness". The breastplate and the helmet are brought together in I Thess. v. 8, where the breastplate is "faith and love", and the helmet "the hope of salvation".

The shoes and the sword (feet and hands).—Both speak of a message. Once the gospel of peace, the other a word of war. The idea conveyed by the word "preparation" seems to be that of a firm footing, the word being sometimes used for a "base" in the LXX. We must fully understand peace if we would succeed in war. The peace here appears to refer back to Eph. ii. 15 and iv. 3. Anything that breaks the unity of the Spirit, or that introduces the first element of faction, will trip us up in the conflict, and well the evil one well knows it.

The girdle and the shield (under and over all).—To an Eastern whose garments were loose and flowing, the girding of the loins was the initial act of preparation for service. We preserve the figure in our saying "buckle to" when we would urge anyone to diligence. The wiles of the devil can be met only by absolute sincerity. A secret doubt, a double heart, anything outside the single eye entertains a traitor within the camp who will betray us to the enemy. This feature has been brought forward in Eph. iv. 14, 15. The "wiles (methodeia) of the devil", "whereby they lie in wait to deceive", are met by "speaking the truth", or as the margin reads, "being sincere". The reference in Isa. xi. 5 speaks of righteousness and faithfulness in connection with the girdle, and we have observed before that practically every word translated faith and faithful in the O.T. is derived from the Hebrew amen, which also means truth. We have already alluded to the LXX translation, and there is no doubt that truth, sincerity and faithfulness are absolutely essential to the soldier of Christ.

The shield of faith.—Is this our faith or the Lord's faithfulness? The reference to Psa. xci. not only indicates that our shield and buckler is the Lord's faithfulness, but describes some of the "fiery darts":--

"Thou shalt not be afraid of the terror by night; nor of the arrow that flieth by day."

Proved armour.

We are exhorted to "put on" the armour of God, to "take" the armour, the shield, the helmet and the sword. Like the foolish virgins, it will be too late to start looking for armour in the evil day. How ridiculous young David must have looked with the armour of Saul upon his youthful limbs. David "assayed to go" for he had not proved them, and wisely put them aside. Smooth stones taken from the brook he had proved, and with the help of God they were more than sufficient. David's example should urge us to realize that if we are going to "withstand in the evil day" we must "stand" now. How shall we quit ourselves in the day of battle if we are strangers to the sword of the Spirit? How can we hope to quench the fiery darts of that fight if we have never proved the efficacy of the shield of faith? Our Lord, when tempted by the Devil in the wilderness, proved for us the power of that sword and the reliability of that shield. We can only be more than conquerors "through Him that loved us".

The present contest, though not the final battle, is not by any means a mere spectacle. The word "wrestle" comes from pallo, "to shake", and the word wrestle itself means "dust of meal", "ashes", "fine powder", etc. It is a wearing, grinding endurance, rather than the brilliant charge. Patience and unquestioned sincerity are demanded and that continually.

Not flesh and blood, but . . . . . spiritual wickedness.

Where our feet touch earth we are shod with peace, and while flesh and blood will often be bitterly opposed to us, we do not take up the armour of God against such. The only use of the armour against the flesh is found in Rom. xiii. 12-14:--

> "Put on the armour of light . . . . . put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make no provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof."

The foes against whom we wrestle are spiritual. The title "world-holder" is significant. Kosmokrator should be considered with the title of the Lord, pantokrator, "omnipotent" and "almighty". We may obtain a glimpse at the extent of the power and authority of these "world-holders of this darkness" by reading Dan. x. There we read of a messenger sent from heaven (5, 6), whose appearance was so glorious that at the sight Daniel's comeliness turned to corruption (8), yet this mighty messenger was successfully withstood for twenty-one days by "the prince of Persia", whose opposition was only overcome by the advent of Michael the archangel (13). Reference is made in verse 20 to another prince, "the prince of Grecia", and yet again in verse 21 to "Michael your prince". Now Dan. xii. 1 tells us that Michael is "the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people (Israel)". It appears therefore that with the exception of Israel, the nations of the earth were under the authority of one of the "world-holders of this darkness", and these facts cast light upon the present conflict. It is to be observes that the cause of the opposition in Dan. x. was that the heavenly messenger was sent to show Daniel what was noted in "the Scripture of truth". These principalities, powers and world-holders are summed up as "spiritual things (or forces) of wickedness in the heavenlies".

Were it not that we can say with the Apostle that we are persuaded "that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers . . . . . shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. viii. 38, 39), we should doubtless quail before these mighty opponents and sink lower than Daniel did, but Christ is risen and we are "more than conquerors through Him that loved us", and strong in the Lord and in the power of His might, we shall both stand and withstand, knowing that "the God of peace shall bruise Satan under our feet shortly" (Rom. xvi. 20).

The threefold conflict (vi. 12).

(Mystery16, pp.138-143)

1. How far are we warranted in speaking of "war" against principalities and powers in the heavenlies, now?
2. Are these several phases of this conflict?
3. Can we learn anything from O.T. typical history?

We believe the answer is that the conflict is threefold:

1. We look back to the cross, and there see that Christ triumphed over principalities and powers, thereby rendering us "more than conquerors" in His victory (Col. ii. 15).
2. Our present conflict is with the "world-holders of this darkness", it is described as a wrestling.
3. A conflict upon a more vast scale will take place when the church prepares to enter its inheritance in resurrection.

These tree phases of conflict are found in the typical history of Israel.

The victory of the Cross.

The first, which typifies the triumph over principalities and powers by the cross, and which lies at the basis of all victory (Rom. viii. 37-39), is set forth by the victory over Pharaoh, a victory in which Israel did nothing but "stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord, for . . . . . the Lord shall fight for you and ye shall hold your peace" (Exod. xiv. 14). This initial victory had far-reaching effects:--

> "The people shall hear, and be afraid: sorrow shall take hold on the inhabitants of Palestina . . . . . all the inhabitants of Canaan shall melt away . . . . . they shall be as still as a stone, till Thy people pass over, which Thou hast purchased" (Exod. xv. 14-16).

Rahab, of Jericho, said to the spies:--

> "I know that the Lord hath given you the land, and that your terror is fallen upon us, and that all the inhabitants of the land have melted because of you. For we have heard how the Lord dried up the water of the Red Sea for you, when ye came out of Egypt" (Josh. ii. 9, 10).

Here it will be seen that the initial victory at Israel's redemption went before them, melting the opposition of their foes. By reading Joshua ii. 10, 11, and v. 1, we see that the second victory, namely, that of Israel over Amalek, Sihon and Og, all of which be it noted are on "this side of Jordan", likewise carried consternation into the ranks of the Canaanites.

The present conflict.

The present conflict with the "world-holders of this darkness" is typified in Israel's battles with Amalek, Sihon and Og. We must remember that the reason why Israel were led through the wilderness, instead of taking the shorter road through the land of the Philistines, was to prevent the people from being discouraged, "lest peradventure the people repent when they see war" (Exod. xiii. 17). Consequently, the battles of the wilderness are not to be reckoned as "war" in the full sense. Our present conflict is spoken of as "wrestling", the shock of battle may be yet future.

It will help us considerably to note a few features of this typical wilderness struggle. The first great victory was immediately subsequent to redemption. After Amalek's attack Israel do not meet Canaanite foes until they have met with God, have been cleansed, sanctified, and made a covenant people. Readers are already acquainted with the difference that exists between redemption and atonement. Before Israel could meet either King Og of Bashan or King Sihon of Heshbon, even on this side of Jordan, they needed the instruction and the types of acceptance foreshadowed in the tabernacle. This order is observed in Ephesians.

1. Redemption (Eph. i. 7).
2. Atonement; "made nigh"; "access" (Eph. ii.).
3. The conflict (Eph. vi.).

To invert this order, or to omit one section, is to court dismal failure. Moreover, Joshua, who led the people on to victory, was a man of the Word (Josh. i. 8). He knew the value of the "sword of the Spirit", and of that weapon that was mighty through God to the pulling down of the strongholds of Satan, as at Jericho. Let us now notice the foes of Israel's wilderness period.

Amalek.—Some think that it is an error to suppose that the Amalekites are descendants of Esau who had a grandson of that name (Gen. xxxvi. 10-16), for the country of the Amalekites is mentioned together with Canaanite nations, as that of the Rephaims and Amorites in Gen. xiv. 7, long before the birth of Esau, the grandfather of Amalek. Be this as it may, Amalek's attack is separated from the rest. So far as Israel were concerned Amalek's attack was a treacherous act:--

> "He met thee by the way, and smote the hindmost of thee, even all that were feeble behind thee, when thou wast faint and weary" (Deut. xxv. 18).

His opportunity seems to have been provided by the murmuring and rebellious spirit of the people. Conquest no longer lay in "standing still and seeing the salvation of the Lord", but by active and prayerful co-operation. "Go fight" were the words of Joshua; "Go pray" the words to Moses. The opportunity afforded by murmuring and the power of prayer will not be lightly passed over by those to whom Eph. vi. comes as personal truth.

The essential character of Amalek's opposition, however, is found in the margin of Exod. xvii. 16, "Because the hand of Amalek is against the throne of the Lord". The "world-holders of this darkness" oppose the purpose of the ages, and that purpose involves the very throne of the Lord. The enthroned Christ and all His people are the great centre of Satanic attack. This is developed in full in the Book of the Revelation.

Saul, type of Antichrist as he was, the people's choice, the persecutor of the Lord's anointed (David) forfeits his throne through failure to blot out Amalek (I Sam. xxviii. 18). Haman the Agagite almost accomplished the destruction of Israel (Esther iii.). Balaam, however, foretold that Amalek, the first of the nations, should nevertheless end in destruction (Numb. xxiv. 20).

Sihon.—Israel sought no quarrel with Sihon. A request was sent asking Sihon to allow Israel "to pass through", their objective being the territory of Canaan but not of Sihon. Sihon, however, "would not suffer Israel to pass through his border". Our inheritance lies beyond the borders of this earth, even in the heavenlies, but the conflict started by Amalek is perpetuated by Sihon even here and now. Israel consequently smote Sihon and possessed his land "this side of Jordan" (Deut. iv. 47). In Numb. xxi. 1-3 we have one more encounter recorded:--

> "And when King Arad the Canaanite, which dwelt in the south, heard tell that Israel came by way of the spies, then he fought against Israel, and took some of them prisoners."

By way of the spies.—We know that Moses sent the spies (Numb. xiii. 17) at the command of the Lord (xiii. 1, 2), but we must not forget the words of Ezek. xx. 6:--

> "In the day that I lifted up mine hand unto them, to bring them forth of the land of Egypt into a land that I HAD ESPIED for them, flowing with milk and honey, which is the glory of all lands."

Was there any element of unbelief in this spying out of the land? Was it a concession to the weakness of the flesh, much like the law of Moses concerning divorce (Matt. xix. 3-8)? It appears to have made one more opponent, and led to the captivity of some of Israel. There is a lesson for us here. Let us so fully trust the goodness and the word of the Lord that we shall "walk by faith and not by sight", needing neither the evidence of the grapes of Eshcol to encourage us, nor the description of our giant foes to dishearten us, resting in the blessed victory already ours in Christ (Rom. viii. 37, 38), and recognizing that "as our day so shall our strength be". We are more than conquerors through Him that loved us.

King Og of Bashan.—This king was the only one left of the giants, thereby connecting him with the seed of the serpent, and fit type of the principalities and powers that war against the purpose of the Lord. The reader may know the book entitled The Giant Cities of Bashan, where the literal character of the word "giant" is demonstrated. The destruction of King Og of Bashan is recounted in Psa. cxxxvi. 20 and followed by the refrain, "for His mercy endureth for ever". The satanic character of the Canaanites justifies this somewhat strange use of the word mercy.

These opponents, Amalek, Sihon and Og set before us the character of the attack we may expect "this side of Jordan". The full triumph follows the crossing of the Jordan.

The third conquest.

Joshua reaches the banks of the Jordan and lodges there "three days" before passing over (Josh. iii. 1, 2). They were to go on a new journey, "For ye have not passed this way heretofore" (iii. 4). The passage of the ark and of the people through the Jordan was to be taken as a pledge that the Lord was among them, "and that He will not fail to drive out from before you the Canaanite" (iii. 10). Twelve men were chosen, one for each tribe, who took twelve stones from the firm bed of the river as a memorial. All Israel were involved in this crossing, the ark of the covenant also pledging God's word and power in the victory (iii., iv.). It is most suggestive to read that at the crossing of the Jordan the waters,

> "stood—rose up in one mound a great way off, by the city ADAM, which is beside Zarethan, and they which were going down to the sea of the waste plain, the salt sea, failed—were cut off, and the people passed over right against Jericho" (Josh. iii. 16 Rotherham).

Stanley translates the passage, "High up, far away in Adam, the city which is beside Zarethan". It seems too clear a type to be put down to mere coincidence that the waters that flowed down from Adam to the salt sea (called to-day The Dead Sea) should be so completely cut off. The stream of sin and death which started its course in Eden by one man must be arrested before the people of the Lord can pass over Jordan into their inheritance. Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39 is seen in type and shadow here.

Thus the Red Sea passage sets forth our union with Christ in His triumph over sin and death, and the Jordan passage our actual triumphant passage into literal resurrection glory. The reader may fill in many other parallels, for example, the Lord's baptism in Jordan followed by His genealogy back to Adam, and the calling of the twelve "from the baptism of John", as witnesses, but these details are somewhat apart from our theme.

It is noticeable that Israel pass the Jordan "right against Jericho". Just as the passage through the Red Sea spread consternation among the natives of Canaan, so also did the passage of the Jordan (Josh. v. 1). It is here that Joshua meets "The Captain of the Lord's host" (v. 13-15). This is the beginning of the conquest of Canaan. The first to fall is Jericho and its king, and in the Lord's mercy the initial victory of this third phase is seen to be all of faith. Now follows a series of battles, interspersed with events that have been touched upon in Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth, until at the close of chapter xii. a halt is made and a list drawn up comprised of thirty-one kings that had been smitten.

The record of Caleb and Joshua given in Numbers and Joshua may throw light upon the position of those who, like these men of faith, press on to the goal and overcome. Sufficient, however, has been said to point the direction for the child of God that he may realize the past, the present and the future phases of this mighty conflict with principalities, and powers, who, like the Canaanites, are doomed to destruction, who shall be turned out of their possessions in the heavenlies, and who already, like Sihon and Og, seek to prevent us "passing through". Let us not forget the solemn lesson of "then came Amalek", nor the fact that Christ's triumph has traveled on ahead through all spheres, and is the basis of our ultimate victory. The power of His might in Eph. i. 19 and vi. 10 is both His triumph and ours. Both Rom. v.-viii. and I Cor. xv. link the doctrine of Adam, death, and resurrection victory together, a truth so blessedly set forth in the heaped up waters of Jordan near the city of Adam.

(Mystery16, pp.138-143).

The mystery of the gospel and its ambassador (vi. 18 - 24),

(Mystery16, pp.145-153)

and concluding study of this Epistle.

Immediately following the exhortation to put on the whole armour of God comes prayer. The statement with which this idea of prayer is introduced is somewhat involved:--

> "With all prayer and supplication praying in every season in spirit (Gk. en pneumatic), and thereunto watching with all perseverance and supplication, for all the saints" (Eph. vi. 18).

The two words "prayer and supplication" have been rendered "supplication and deprecation". That is asking for what is good and deprecating what is evil. At the root of the former word lies the idea of a wish, at the root of the latter a fear. The one is the pouring out of the heart's desire, the other the expression of a need.

"Praying in every season": like the preaching of the Word (II Tim. iv. 2), prayer is not to be limited to any one season or occasion. Paul when writing to the Romans could call God to witness that "without ceasing" he made mention of them in his prayers. The solemn appeal to God as a witness prevents any idea of exaggerated language here. Paul "never left off" praying. At the same time he was traversing sea and land preaching the gospel. He was earning his own living, sometimes labouring night and day with his own hands. His sufferings and trials were beyond measure, and upon him came the cares of all the churches. Yet he never left off praying!

The conventions of the faith are safeguards. It is good to kneel or to stand when we pray. It is good to close the eyes and fold the hands—the outside attitude should express the hidden spirit. It is good to turn aside from the things of daily life, withdraw to the quiet room alone in secret. But all these things may be dispensed with without touching the essence of prayer. Paul could pray as he walked, as he talked, as he worked. He could pray without closing the watchful eye, or folding the labouring hand. He could pray without ceasing, serve without ceasing, labour without ceasing. Let us not confound true prayer with mysticism. To kneel for a long time in silence may be the highest form of worship, it may but numb the sensibilities and lay the unguarded spirit open to invasion. In some cases it is a form of self deception and pride:--

> "When Moses was gone into the tabernacle of the congregation to speak with Him, then he heard THE VOICE OF ONE speaking to him" (Num. vii. 89).

It is never safe to omit the Word of God when we think of prayer. It is the connection seen here in Eph. vi. 17, 18, "the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, praying always".

What is prayer? Why do we pray? Can we by prayer cause God to alter one line of His purpose? Can we add or subtract one name from the book of life? Can we alter by one second the "appointed time"? Would the Lord come one moment sooner if all His people prayed that He would? God's purpose will go on to its glorious end whether we pray or whether we remain silent. He is not like the unjust judge who can be worried into action by sheer importunity. That which sometimes passes for great piety may prove to be sheer unbelief. We remember sometime ago that our little one had prayed in her childish fashion that on some particular day, weeks ahead, the weather might prove fine. Nothing more being mentioned, the mother reminded her saying, "You have not asked God any more about the fine day you want". "Oh no, mother", was the response, "I told Him once, and He won't forget".

Prayer does not mean arguing with God, or trying to get our own way. Prayer gives us access to God, fellowship with Himself. Gives us insight into His purposes, sends us out again into the turmoil of life with less anxiety, with greater patience, with more sympathy.

> "With a heart at leisure from itself,
> To soothe and sympathise."

Prayers are answered because God wishes His children to share His secrets, trust Himself, but prayers never alter God's plans. Prayer comes to God with his own Word and says, "Do as Thou hast said". Prayer is never answered that is not in accordance with the will of God. There are some things that God Himself has placed at our disposal upon the condition that we "ask", "seek", and "knock", but there is no more mystery about this than when the child asks its parent for bread, or knocks at the door for entrance.

Watching with all perseverance.

The Lord did not simply say, "Pray . . . . . lead us not into temptation". He also said, "Watch and pray that ye enter into temptation". Is it right to pray the one prayer, and forget to watch? Will prayer alone avail us, if the Lord has said watch and pray? "What I say unto you I say unto all, Watch" (Mark xiii. 37). The word "watch" in Eph. vi. 18 means "sleeplessness". In II Cor. vi. 5 and xi. 27 we have the word in a setting of tumult, prison, weariness, cold and nakedness. It is of the Spirit of the Lord Himself. "Behold, He that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep" (Psa. cxxi. 4). Luke xxi. 34-36 urges watchfulness by such words as "unawares", "snares", "escape".

What should we pray for? In one sense we must all confess with Rom. viii. 26, "we know not what we should pray for as we ought", but that is not exactly our meaning in the question. There are some children of God whose integrity is beyond question, who feel that prayer must be confined to spiritual things only, and that such things as problems of daily business, home, etc. are not proper subjects for prayer. What then should we pray for? Surely the apostle has answered in Phil. iv. 6:--

> "Be over-anxious for NOTHING, but in EVERYTHING by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your REQUESTS BE MADE KNOWN unto God."

Anxiety for nothing, prayer in everything seem to allow no neutral ground. When once we are saved, may we not believe that all our affairs are a part of the Lord's concern, that somehow or other where we live, where we work, the friends we have or lose, all the complex happenings of everyday are part and parcel of His purpose. If the everyday affairs of everyone are outside the scope of prayer, what is there left of human affairs as part of God's purpose? For our own part we want to be more simple, more like child and parent when we pray.

This watchful and prayerful spirit which the Apostle enjoins was not to be spent upon self. It was "for all saints". If one member suffer, all suffer. It is true unselfishness to pray for the rest of the Body the church, for our own individual peace and blessing is largely connected with the blessing of the whole. Is there in all the epistles of the N.T. a more beautiful exhibition of unconscious modesty and humility than the words that follow, "and for me". It is Paul that speaks. Paul, to whom the dispensation of the Mystery had been granted. Paul, who had been caught away to the third heaven. It is such a one that says "and for me". There is a precious mingling of the homely and the sublime in this concluding passage.

What is Ministry?

There is an intimate connection between the ministry for which Paul asks prayer, and his "affairs" which he makes known through Tychicus. We are apt to limit our conception of ministry too closely to the actual work of speaking or writing. Were not Paul's private affairs a part of his ministry? Had not his "prospects" been ruined for the truth's sake? When he sometimes laboured with his hands to provide the necessary things of life could he not render that humble service "as unto the Lord"? When the Philippians sent once and again unto his necessities did they feel any need to distinguish between the sacred and the secular? Was it not at the same time "fellowship in the gospel"? (Phil. i. 5; iv. 15, 16). Ministry is simply service, and this includes the whole manner of life, for often the demands of the ministry rendered seriously, deflect the whole current of daily affairs. So it is that Paul could link together the high ministry of the mystery and "how I do" without any feeling of incongruity.

Prayer expresses a sense of need.

His prayer is for "utterance", "boldness", the ability and the courage to speak freely as he "ought'. Here is a man of like infirmity as ourselves. He knew what it was to feel a shrinking, and could sympathise with the timid spirit of Timothy (II Tim. i. 4, 7). He knew what it was to despised (I Tim. iv. 12; II Cor. x. 10), and to have indifferent health (Gal. iv. 14). He knew that whenever there is an "open door" there will be "many adversaries" (I Cor. xvi. 9), and prayer was needed that the opposition may not be allowed to turn him back from the appointed path. Did he never have moments of doubt when with aching limbs and tired brain he laboured and travailed at some lowly occupation for the bare necessities of life? Did no one whisper that he might have served the Lord better by staying in honour and influence at Tarsus? Did he never need the vision at night of the Lord saying:--

> "Be not afraid, but speak, and hold not thy peace: For I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee, for I have much people in this city" (Acts xviii. 9, 10).

Unless we have made a most critical mistake in our understanding of Paul's temperament and circumstances, we believe he had the scholar's shrinking from the physical blow, the super-sensitiveness to criticism, the knowledge within of his own utter unworthiness, the consciousness that in following his calling he must ever appear in the eyes of many as a presumptuous boaster. Yet he turned not back. This man who shrank from the tumult of Corinth was ready to face the mob at Ephesus (Acts xix. 30), and the enraged Jews at Jerusalem (Acts xxi. 40). He could write to the Philippians:--

> "That with all boldness, as always, so now also Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether by life or by death" (Phil. i. 20).

He could speak of himself as a drink-offering poured out upon the sacrifice and service of faith (Phil. ii. 17). There is some compensation to the sensitive spirit, if he or she "suffer as a Christian", but Paul had to face the shame of "suffering as a malefactor" (II Tim. ii. 9; Luke xxiii. 32). He understood in measure what the Lord felt when He faced not only death and suffering, but the intense shame of being "numbered with the transgressors" (Mark xv. 28). Compulsory association with the brutal company may be more torture than the stake. And so Paul said "and for me".

The mystery of the gospel.

The utterance and the boldness that Paul desired was that he might make known the mystery of the gospel. There are two sources of help available in seeking the meaning of this expression. We may observe its connection with the use of the word "mystery" in this epistle. We may read it in the light of the parallel passage in Colossians. Now the mystery is mentioned six times in Ephesians:--

A | i. 9, 10. The dispensation.
B | iii. 3. THE MYSTERY.
C | iii. 4. The mystery of Christ.
A | iii. 9. The dispensation (R.V.).
B | v. 32. THE GREAT MYSTERY.
C | vi. 19. The mystery of the gospel.

We have already learned to distinguish between the Mystery itself which was revealed only to Paul, and the Mystery of Christ which had been made known in measure down the age, but in its final and highest sphere, to Paul. It would appear therefore that the Mystery of the gospel was connected specially with the Mystery of Christ. Let us now turn to Col. iv. The context is identical with that of Eph. vi.:--

> "Withal praying for us, that God would open unto us a door of utterance, to speak the mystery of Christ, for which I am also in bonds, that I may make it manifest, as I ought to speak" (Col. iv. 3, 4).

This passage confirms our finding. Why should the Apostle lay such stress upon this feature. The reason seems to be this. Every message sent by God in grace to man has been inseparably connected with Christ, and until His person and position were made clear no "good message" could be intelligible. If one would preach the gospel of the kingdom one must preach the advent of the King. If one would preach the gospel of grace, one must preach Christ crucified, dead, risen. If one would preach the good tidings of the Mystery which places the redeemed "far above all", it is essential that before that statement can be received, or even be intelligible, Christ must be preached "far above all" too. Where Paul surpassed all in the revelation he received, was that over and above the accumulated knowledge of the Mystery of Christ, that had grown ever since the first revelation given in the garden of Eden, he had received the climax of truth, viz., that the risen but rejected Messiah was now at the right hand of God, Head of both principalities and the church, and that the Mystery of the union of the church with the ascended Lord constituted the fullness of Him, Who in His turn was designated to fill all in all. It was in order that he might make this message clear, without compromise and without fear, that he asked the prayers of the saints.

We have "boldness" before God (Eph. iii. 12), shall we be fearful before man whose breath is in his nostrils! Yes, we may be; hence the value of intercessory prayer for one another.

An Ambassador.

> "In behalf of which I am conducting an embassy in a chain" (Eph. vi. 20).

Speaking as a man, Paul had a passion for liberty. One has only to read Gal. ii. to catch something of his burning spirit. Yet he could rejoice in the honour of his bonds, his prison, his chains, for after all they were the badges of highest honour. The figure of an ambassador provides a very apt illustration of the distinctive spheres of administration given to the apostles Peter and Paul. At the moment of writing the King of England has Ambassadors in France and Germany. Now the ambassador in France, when dealing officially with Franco-British affairs, speaks with all the authority of the Queen he represents. If however, the ambassador to France should go to Germany, he would of course have the individual's right of personal opinion, but he could no longer act in things of state nor speak with delegated authority. Peter, the Ambassador of the Lord to the circumcision, received power and authority which he exercised, but Peter when dealing with the present interval of the Mystery confesses to things that are hard to be understood, and realizes that they belong to the embassy of Paul, and that he has no jurisdiction in that province (II Pet. iii. 15, 16). Paul was the apostle to the Gentiles. To him had been granted the dispensation of the grace of God to the Gentiles. He was an Ambassador in a chain, and when he spoke as the Ambassador he spoke with full authority.

My affairs and how I do.

It is one thing, however, to pray with a purely doctrinal interest; it is another to pray because of acquaintance with actual needs. When the reader takes up a printed page, his mental image of the writer may be far removed from reality. How can intelligent prayer therefore be offered? The Apostle felt this need, and adds to his request for prayer the means for information. Yet once again, let us observe the delicacy of his method. Here is no harrowing list of details of prison life, no list of privations and hardships, no pose, for we know from his own words that he felt a fool when compelled in sheer defence to appear boastful. What he does do is to give an intimation to those who were desirous of this intelligent fellowship that the necessary information could be obtained from Tychicus. That this was no casual mission to fulfil we may gather from the character of the man who received it:--

> "Tychicus, the beloved brother and faithful minister in the Lord" (Eph. vi. 21).
> "Tychicus, who is a beloved brother, and faithful minister fellow-servant in the Lord" (Col. iv. 7).
> "Tychicus have I sent to Ephesus" (II Tim. iv. 12).

The last reference is comforting. Demas had forsaken Paul. All in Asia had left him, but Tychicus remained faithful. Tychicus and Trophimus are mentioned in Acts xx. 4, and Trophimus was an "Ephesian" (Acts xxi. 29). Both Tychicus and Trophimus therefore are connected with Ephesus, and this is a strong argument in favour of the retention of the word "Ephesus" in verse 1 of this epistle. If the epistle had been written to "the saints that are", as some have suggested, to whom would Tychicus convey the message concerning the personal affairs of Paul? Paul's last thought, however, is for the saints. Not only did he send Tychicus with the necessary information concerning his own affairs, but he concludes, "and that he might comfort your hearts" (Eph. vi. 22). The same is true of Col. iv. 8. A glimpse is given of the intimate relationship between Paul's "affairs", "the Mystery", and the "heart's comfort" of the believer in Col. ii. 1-3:--

> "For I would that ye knew what great conflict I have for you . . . . . that their hearts might be comforted . . . . . the full knowledge of the mystery of God—Christ, in Whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge."

The Benediction.

The contemplation of this noble spirit falls like a benediction itself in a world of sordid self-interests and covetousness, but the "peace" and the "love with faith" so markedly present come not merely from the heart of man but "from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ" (Eph. vi. 23), and so the benediction falls from Him Who was the strength and the sweetener of Saul of Tarsus,

> "Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity."

The word translated "sincerity" is aptharsia = incorruptibility. Are we to understand that our love to the Lord is "incorruptible", and that this benediction rests upon those only whose love will never change, but is incorruptible? This is the opinion of many. Dr. Bloomfield, however, cites the interpretation of Beza to show that the words en aphtharsia are to be read with the word "grace" and not with "love". It is the grace of the Lord that is imperishable, incorruptible, immortal. It is a point that perhaps we cannot settle. True love is as strong as death. The grace of the Lord is beyond the touch of corruption. Let us seek to love with all sincerity, and rest upon a grace that reaches out beyond the grave. Here is the last word of the epistle—"incorruptibility". Resurrection is stamped on the whole unfolding of the epistle. In chapter i. it is "the power to usward that believe", in chapter ii. it is the sphere of our blessings, in chapter iv. it is seen in the new man, in chapter v. it forms the exhortation to awake from sleep, and in chapter vi. it constitutes the strength of the good soldier.

What shall we say unto these things? Who is sufficient for these things? What shall we render for these things? As we ask these questions in the presence of the Lord there can be but one answer:--

> "I follow after, if that I may laid hold of that for which also I was laid hold of by Christ Jesus . . . . . but one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, according to a mark I press toward the goal, for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" (Phil. iii. 12-14).

So concludes a long but happy, and we trust profitable, study. Though we pass from the definite study of this epistle to other parts of Scripture, this one epistle more clearly indicates our peculiar testimony than does any other single book of Scripture. To all who have this precious truth at heart, who value the "good deposits", and realize both its privilege and responsibility and for all who may be called to bear witness to the glorious truth enshrined in the Epistle to the Ephesians, we would humbly but most sincerely repeat the apostle's prayer:--

"And for me, that utterance may be given."

The First Principles of the Oracles of God

(A series especially addressed to new readers)

No.40. The Covenant of Sinai (Part 1)

pp. 16 - 20

We have traced the Lord's dealings with Israel from their call in Abraham, and their deliverance from Egypt to their arrival at the wilderness of Sinai (Exod. xix. 1). Sinai marks a crisis in the history of this people, and is of fundamental importance in their typical story. Israel are to show once and for all the utter inability of the flesh to enter into blessing by a covenant of works. This necessitates the New Covenant with its better promises and its better sacrifices, which is the theme of the epistle to the Hebrews. "The law made nothing perfect."

In Exod. xix. 3, 8 and 20 we have recorded three ascents of Sinai by Moses, culminating in the giving of the law. Three more ascents are recorded in Exod. xxiv. 9-xxxii. 14; xxxii. 31-33 and xxxiv. 4-28, culminating in the building of the Tabernacle, the Ark and not the people receiving the tables of stone written the second time, and so bearing witness to Israel's failure and their need of Christ. There is therefore a distinct connection between the old and the new covenants as Jer. xxxi. 31-34 reveals.

The Old and the New Covenants.

> "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah" (Jer. xxxi. 31).

Let us observe how definite the Scripture is with regard to the covenanting parties. "The Lord" on the one hand, and "The house of Israel and the house of Judah" on the other. It is a covenant properly drawn up, and no one who is not of the house of Israel or Judah, or who cannot show full Scriptural warrant for being reckoned with such or 'grafted in', can have part or lot in it. Rom. xi. reveals the method whereby some believing Gentiles came within the bounds of the new covenant. They are spoken of as wild olive branches grafted into the true olive, and, with the branches that remained unbroken, 'partaking of the root and fatness of the olive tree' (Rom. xi. 17). Such is the widest extension of the bounds of this covenant. The moment Israel as a nation passed off the scene, that moment the new covenant and all pertaining to it was withdrawn, to be reserved until the day when:

> "All Israel shall be saved . . . . . For this is MY COVENANT UNTO THEM" (Rom. xi. 26, 27).

We now proceed with the statement of Jer. xxxi.:

> "Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day that I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt" (verse 32).

Here we see the connection between the old covenant made at Sinai, and the new covenant to be made in the future. The reference to the Exodus from Egypt is important. Every year this deliverance was remembered by the observance of the feast of the Passover. Israel remembered that old covenant in the very year that our Lord was crucified. It was at the Passover that Christ instituted the memorial of another and greater exodus, by another and greater passover Lamb, and established another and better covenant:

> "They made ready the passover . . . . . and He took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying . . . . . DRINK YE ALL of it; for this is My blood of the NEW COVENANT, which is shed for many for the remission of sins" (Matt. xxvi. 19-30).

The Lord's supper is a memorial feast exactly similar to the Passover, but differing in that the Passover was a typical memorial connected with the old covenant, whereas the Lord's supper is connected with the New Covenant. For Gentile believers to partake of this covenant memorial while unassociated with Israel appears to be an unwarranted intrusion. Jer. xxxi. continues regarding the first covenant:

> "Which My covenant they brake, although I was an husband unto them, saith the Lord" (verse 32).

The LXX reads 'I regarded them not' instead of 'I was an husband unto them'. This reading is followed by the N.T. quotation in Heb. viii. 9 which proves that this is the true interpretation. The Hebrew ba'al has two meanings (1) to be lord, master, or husband; (2) to disdain, reject, or disregard. The A.V. of Jer. xxxi. chose the wrong meaning. The inspired writer of Hebrews gives the true one. Israel broke the old covenant, and they were disdained, disregarded, all hope being henceforth centred in the Messiah:

> "But this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel; After those days, saith the Lord, I will put My law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts and will be their God, and they shall be My people" (Jer. xxxi. 33).

It is impossible to read these words without remembering Paul's argument in II Cor. iii.:

> "Written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not in tables of stone, but in fleshy tables of the heart . . . . . God . . . . . hath made us able ministers of the NEW COVENANT" (II Cor. iii. 3-6).

The Corinthians were already instructed regarding their connection with the New Covenant as I Cor. xi. 25 will show. Here in the second epistle the Apostle feels under the necessity to warn his children concerning those aspects of Judaism that would lead them back to bondage. Therefore he institutes a comparison which it will be helpful to observe.

II Corinthians iii. and iv.
THE OLD COVENANT	THE NEW COVENANT
The letter that killeth (iii. 6).	The spirit that quickeneth (iii. 6).
The ministration of death (iii. 7, 8).	The ministration of the spirit (iii. 7, 8).
The ministration of condemnation (iii. 9).	The ministration of righteousness (iii. 9).
That which is done away (iii. 11).	That which remaineth (iii. 11).
Moses and Israel turn vail removed (iii. 16-18).	The vail done away in Christ (iii. 13-15).
The glory of God in the face of Moses 'done away' (iii. 7).	The light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ (iv. 6).

II Cor. iv. 3 needs a fuller explanation than we can give in this tabular form:

> "But if indeed our gospel be vailed, by those things which are perishing they have been vailed."

The 'perishing' things are the things of the old covenant which are said to be 'done away' and 'abolished'. The god of this age uses the old covenant and ministration of death to vail the light of the glory of the gospel that shone in the face of Christ. One further word from Jer. xxxi. and then we must return to Exod. xix.

> "If those ordinances (see verse 35) depart from before Me, saith the Lord, then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a NATION before Me all the days" (Jer. xxxi. 36).

It is not possible to hold to the inspiration of Scripture and deny the national character of the new covenant. We do not wish to be aggressive or controversial, but in an article purporting to deal with fundamentals of dispensational truth we must perforce 'use great plainness of speech', and we must state that we have no hesitation or diffidence with regard to our abstention from the observance of the Lord's supper as a member of that elect company, called into favour during the time of Israel's rejection. Let us now turn to Exod. xix. and read the terms of the first covenant.

The terms of the first Covenant.

> "Thus shalt thou say to the house of Jacob, and tell the children of Israel; Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto Myself. Now therefore, IF ye will obey My voice indeed, and keep My covenant, THEN ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto Me above all people: for all the earth is Mine: And ye shall be unto Me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation. These are the words that thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel" (Exod. xix. 3-6).

Moses descended from the mount, called for the elders of the people and laid before them the words commanded him. There was a unanimous acceptance of the conditions. "And all the people answered together, and said, All that the Lord hath spoken we will do" (Exod. xix. 8). From this point on to chapter xxiii. 33 we have the preparation of the people, the descent of the Lord to Sinai, the giving of the ten commandments and the judgments. Then Moses came once more to the people and told them all the words of the Lord and all the judgments, and once more all the people answered with one voice 'All the words which the Lord hath said we will do' (Exod. xxiv. 3).

The people having re-asserted their agreement, Moses next put the words of the Lord into writing (Exod. xxiv. 4). He then built an altar on twelve pillars, one for each tribe, and caused sacrifices to be made. Half of the blood shed Moses reserved in basons. He then took the book of the covenant, and read it over in the audience of the people: and thy replied, "All that the Lord hath said will we do, and be obedient" (Exod. xxiv. 7). Moses then took the blood and sprinkled it on the people, saying:

> "Behold the blood of the covenant, which the Lord hath made with you concerning all these words" (Exod. xxiv. 8).

A covenant instituted with such solemnity, framed with words of such weight and far reaching effect, demands a respectful study. We cannot hope to do more than point the way in articles such as these, but we earnestly trust the reader will be stirred up to see something of the heights and depths of this revelation of the righteousness of God.

The Ten Words (Exod. iii. 28 margin).

The ten commandments are pre-eminently the basis of the covenant:

> "And the Lord said unto Moses, Write thou these words: for after the tenor of these words I have made a covenant with thee and with Israel . . . . . And he wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant, the ten commandments" (Exod. xxxiv. 27, 28).
>
> "He declared unto you His covenant, which He commanded you to perform, even ten commandments; and He wrote them upon two tables of stone" (Deut. iv. 13).

Let us summarize these ten commandments. There are quite a variety of ways in which commandments have been divided and numbered, for it must be remembered that there is no numeration in the original. Some think that numbers 1-4 belong to the first table and relate to God, and numbers 5-10 belong to the second table and relate to man. This would place number 5 as 'the first commandment with promise' at the head of the list, and removes the difficulty created by the apparent promise found in Exod. xx. 6. On the other hand 'that thy days may be long upon the land' (verse 12) is the first definite promise in the covenant.

The Companion Bible draws attention to the fact that the first five commandments contain the title "The Lord thy God", but that no title or name of God appears in the second set. This seems to fall under the natural division of two sets of five, the one dealing with the love to God, the other with love to neighbour. If this be accepted, the honouring of parents is placed upon the table devoted to the honouring of God, and demands serious thought.

The Covenant and the Commandments.

Each of the commandments are vital parts of the covenant, and in many cases passages may be found where this connection is definitely stated. In others it is clearly implied. We will not occupy space in printing the commandments, but the reader with Exod. xx. opens before him may find some help in noting the following facts and particulars.

(1) No other God. It is implied in the expressions, "Thy God", "I will be their God", "The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob", that there is a covenant relationship between the two parties named. This is established by such a passage as:

> "Behold, I make a covenant . . . . . thou shalt worship no other god . . . . . lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land" (Exod. iv. 10, 14, 15).

(2) No graven image. Had this command been observed by Israel, it alone would have made them a separate people on the earth, for idolatry and image worship was practically universal:

> "Take heed unto yourselves, lest ye forget the covenant of the Lord your God, which he made with you, and made you a graven image, or the likeness of anything . . . . ." (Deut. iv. 32).
>
> "Wherefore hath the Lord done thus unto this land? . . . . . because they have forsaken the covenant of the Lord God of their fathers . . . . . FOR THEY WENT and served OTHER GODS" (Deut. xxix. 24-26).

(3) The covenant Name. When the Lord bade Moses hew two tables of stone in order that the words of the covenant might be written thereon, we read:

> "And the Lord descended in the cloud, and stood with him there, and proclaimed the NAME of the Lord . . . . . and He said, Behold, I make a covenant" (Exod. xxxiv. 5, 10).

The name here proclaimed is "The Lord God" and the title "The Lord thy God" occurs in each of the commandments on the first table. It is the covenant name, and therefore sacred and central.

(4) The Sabbath. The sabbath was a sign of the covenant:

> "Wherefore the children of Israel shall keep the sabbath . . . . . for a perpetual covenant. It is a sign between Me and the children of Israel" (Exod. xxxi. 16, 17).

(5) The honouring of parents. The honour due to father and mother is a marked feature of the O.T., and it gains in importance when we see that this command finishes the first table that deals with Israel's relation to God. We may the better understand the Lord's words in Matt. xv. 4-6 when we see the place of this fifth commandment. The Pharisees transgressed this commandment by their tradition. They taught that if a man declared that all his possessions were given to God, saying, "It is Corban, that is to say, a gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me; he shall be free" (Mark vii. 11).

This the Lord condemned as transgressing the commandment of God. It is not possible to honour God by the dishonouring of parents.

We must reserve comment on the second table until the next number.

No.41. The Covenant of Sinai (Part 2)
pp. 34 - 37

We continue our examination of the Covenant of Sinai with the consideration of the laws given on the second table of stone.

(6) Thou shalt not kill. Although the name of God is not mentioned in the second table, it becomes abundantly clear upon examination that a right conduct towards our neighbour is governed by, and is a reflection of, our conduct towards the Lord. "Thou shalt not kill" takes our mind back to Gen. ix. 6, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed, for in the image of God made He man". Murder aims at the heart of the purpose of creation, the destruction of the image of God on earth. Murder links man with Satan, who was a murderer from the beginning (John viii. 44), and with Cain, who was of that wicked one (I John iii. 12).

(7) Thou shalt not commit adultery. If murder aims at destroying the image of God, adultery is calculated to corrupt the seed:

> "Judah hath profaned the holiness of the Lord which He loved, and hath married the daughter of a strange god. The Lord will cut off the man that doeth this . . . . . The Lord hath been witness between thee and the wife of thy youth, against whom thou hast dealt treacherously, yet she is thy consort, and the wife of thy covenant. Truly did He not make (the twain) one (flesh)? Yet he had the residue of the Spirit (and so could have made more than one wife for Adam). And wherefore one (emphatic)? Because He desired a SEED OF GOD" (Mal. ii. 2-15).

The discerning reader will perceive the teaching of Gen. iii. and iv. in a clearer light by remembering this comment of Malachi. The universal association between immorality and idolatry throughout the Scriptures from Genesis to Revelation, the story of Gen. vi., the two attacks upon Sarah before Isaac's birth, the downfall of Solomon, the vehement protests of Nehemiah, these and similar examples reveal the place that adultery takes in the attack upon the purpose of the ages.

So vital is the marriage relationship that the Lord uses it as the most fitting figure of His covenant relationship with Israel. Their very land is to be called Beulah or 'married', and the climax of revelation, apart from the Mystery, is 'the marriage of the Lamb', with its Satanic counterpart, 'the whore' of Rev. xvii. and xviii. Even the members of the church of the One Body may manifest the love of Christ for the church in their own married relationship (Eph. v.). Idolatry and adultery are convertible terms in the Scriptures.

If holiness is involved in the sin of adultery, righteousness is involved in the sin of stealing.

(8) Thou shalt not steal. Satan was a murderer from the beginning and has sought down the ages to corrupt the seed. He entered into Judas, who betrayed his Lord, and Scripture says Judas 'was a thief' (John xii. 6). Malachi whose words we have quoted above says, "Will a man rob God?" (Mal. iii. 8).

The weights and measures of Israel were not beneath Divine legislation, for in them were set forth the equity and righteousness of the Lord. "Just balances, just weights, a just ephah and a just hin, shall ye have" (Lev. xix. 36), and this command is immediately followed by a reference to the Lord Who brought them "out of the land of Egypt". Deut. xxv. 15 puts the same truth in connection with the land of promise:

> "Thou shalt have a perfect and just weight, a perfect and just measure shalt thou have, that thy days may be lengthened in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee."

Righteousness is the foundation of the throne of God, the basis of the covenant with Israel, the bed-rock of the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, the lasting character of the new heavens and earth 'wherein dwelleth righteousness' when 'the tabernacle of God will be with men and He will dwell with them'. Any system of interpretation that juggles with good and evil, until at last their distinct difference is bedimmed, must stand condemned before the simple example of 'the just weight and balance'.

(9) Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour. Satan, the breaker of the commandments already cited, is also the arch-false witness. 'He is a liar, and abode not in the truth.' Eph. iv. 25 and 28 bring together two of the commands of this table:

> "Wherefore putting away the lie, speak every man truth with his neighbour . . . . . Let him that stole steal no more."

Stealing transgresses righteousness, false witness transgresses truth. The new man of Eph. iv. is credited in righteousness and holiness of truth. If Satan entered into Judas the thief, he inspired Ananias, "Why hath Satan filled thy heart to lie?" (Acts v. 3). It appears from Zech. v. 3 that among the last phases of the curse of Babylon to the earth is the condoning of stealing and false swearing. The Hebrew word nakad should be translated 'declared innocent' or 'let off':

> "For every one that stealeth hath been let off (is written) on the one side according to it (the curse or the scroll), and everyone that sweareth (falsely) hath been let off (is written) on the side according to it."

(10) Thou shalt not covet. It has been said the covetousness breaks all the commandments. It certainly breaks the first, for Mammon is its god. It breaks the second, for Col. iii. 5 calls a covetous man an idolator. We can well see how many if not all of the others can be sacrificed upon the altar of this idol. "The love of money is a root of all evil" (I Tim. vi. 10).

This brief survey enables us to perceive something of the depth of the terms of the covenant made by God, and entered into by Israel. Israel broke that covenant even before Moses could reach them with the two tables of stone. It is a feature of the utmost importance to remember that those broken tables of stone were re-written, and placed in the Ark. This Ark is called the Ark of the covenant (Deut. x. 8), and the Ark of the testimony (Exod. xxx. 6). Exod. xxxi. 18 tells us that the two tables of stone were the tables of testimony. Exod. xxxiv. 28 and 29 calls them both the 'tables of the covenant', the 'two tables of the testimony' and the 'ten words'.

The Ark and the Mercy Seat together represent the perfect redemption of Christ. The New Covenant does not set aside the ten commandments, but fulfils them. As we look through the epistles we find practically every one of the commandments re-stated with one exception, namely, the sabbath.

(1) No other God. "To us there is but one God" (I Cor. viii. 6).
(2) Idolatry. "Ye turned to God from idols" (I Thess. i. 9).
(3) The Name. "That the name of the Lord be not blasphemed" (I Tim. vi. 1).
(5) Honour parents. "The first commandment with promise" (Eph. vi. 2).
(6) Not kill. "Love . . . not as Cain who . . . slew his brother" (I John iii. 11, 12).
(7) No adultery. "Adulterers God will judge" (Heb. xiii. 4).
(8) Not steal. "Let him that stole steal no more" (Eph. iv. 25).
(9) Not false witness. "Speak every man truth" (Eph. iv. 25).
(10) Not covet. "No covetous man hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God" (Eph. v. 5).

The fourth commandment is the exception. During the Acts period Paul wrote to the Galatians, "Ye observe days . . . . . I am afraid of you" (Gal. iv. 10, 11). To the Romans he wrote, 'One man esteemeth one day above another; another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind' (Rom. xiv. 5). After the Acts period Paul wrote to the Colossians, "Let no man judge you . . . . . in respect of the sabbath days, which are a shadow . . . . ." (Col. ii. 16, 17). These words could not have been written had the sabbath observance been obligatory.

Exod. xxxi. 13 tells us that the sabbath is a sign between Israel and the Lord. Like the other sign, namely, circumcision (Rom. iv. 11) and the signs, namely, the miracles wrought during the earthly life of the Lord, and the Acts of the Apostles (I Cor. i. 22; xiv. 22), these together with the sabbath belonged to Israel, and cease with the setting aside of that nation. Let us conclude this survey of the ten commandments with the Apostle's comment in Rom. xiii.:

> "Owe no man anything, but to love one another; for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law. For this, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Thou shalt not covet, and if there be any other commandments, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, viz., Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (Rom. xiii. 8, 9), and with the Lord's words in Matt. xxii.:

> "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets" (Matt. xxii. 37, 40).

We have seen in the 'ten words' the great basis of the covenant made with Israel, and we are yet to see how the whole Tabernacle and its service revolved around the Ark, in which rested the tables of testimony, and the Mercy Seat which covered it. Before we turn our attention to the Tabernacle it seems fitting that we should acquaint ourselves with the judgments that were added to the 'ten words'. It will be found upon examination that they unfold and apply the law given in the tables of stone. It will be remembered that the ten commandments divide the duties of Israel into two sets, five dealing with God and five dealing with man. The N.T. sums up the law and the prophets as love to God and love to neighbour.

The ten-fold exposition.

In Exod. xx. the covenant is given, and in Exod. xxiv. the covenant is ratified, and it will be seen that this covenant is concerned with:

(1) All the words of the Lord, i.e. the 'ten words' of xx. 1-17.
(2) All the judgments, i.e. those of xxi.-xxiii.:

> "And Moses came and told the people all the words of the Lord, and all the judgments: and all the people answered with one voice, and said, All the words which the Lord hath said will we do" (Exod. xxiv. 3).

No.42. The Tabernacle. A general survey (Exod. xxv. 1 - 9)
pp. 54 - 57

In tracing the history of Israel as a nation we start with redemption, the Passover deliverance from Egypt, where a fresh start was made. The Passover month became 'a beginning of months' unto them (Exod. xii. 1). The Tabernacle was completed on the first day of the first month in the second year (Exod. xl. 17). Further, the first part of Exodus is occupied with building with bricks by slave labour. In the second part, the Tabernacle using gold, silver, and precious materials was built by free men who gave 'willingly' (Exod. xxv. 1-8). We have followed them through the waters of the Red Sea, which the Egyptians assaying to do were drowned. None but the redeemed of the Lord can reach the other side alive. We have seen their trials and temptations, their first great battle with Amalek, and its spiritual teaching. We have seen them enter into covenant relationship with God, both book and people being sprinkled with blood; we have heard the words of the covenant given in solemn grandeur from Sinai, and we have reached that point in the development of their typical history that demands the Tabernacle and its ritual.

While it is gloriously true that our Saviour 'offered one sacrifice for sins for ever' (Heb. x. 12) and 'Died unto sin once' (Rom. vi. 10), yet such is the wonder of that one sacrifice, that it embraces all that the Passover deliverance from Egypt typified, all that the day of Atonement set forth, and all that the varied offerings for cleansing and acceptance indicated. The book of Exodus divides into two great sections, each section being especially associated with one distinctive aspect of the finished work of Calvary. In Luke ix. 31 where the A.V. reads 'decease' the original has the Greek word exodus; in Heb. x. 19 where the A.V. reads 'boldness to enter' the Greek has eisodus. The first leads out, the second leads in. Eph. i. 7 gives the exodus aspect, the word translated forgiveness being aphesis 'set at liberty' (Luke iv. 18). Eph. ii. 13 gives the eisodus aspect, 'made nigh'. The Tabernacle and its service is mainly occupied with this second aspect of redeeming love, access into the presence of the Lord, and acceptance by reason of the offering made upon the altar.

The present creation is described in Gen. i. and ii., and the record of that mighty work comprises 34 verses. The Tabernacle is described in Exodus chapters xxv.-xxxi. and xxxv.-xl., and the record comprises 457 verses. This disproportion can be explained only in the light of their relative importance, the understanding of the way into the presence of God being far more important than the understanding of the way in which He created heaven and earth. The new creation is so much greater than the present one, as is the finished temple compared with the scaffolding erected for its building.

The shadow of heavenly things.

In Exod. xxv. 8, 9; xxvi. 30; xxvii. 8 and Numb. viii. 4 Moses is commanded to see that all things in the Tabernacle are made after the pattern that was shown him in the mount, and this is repeated in Heb. viii. 5. In the latter passage the reason for this exactness is given:

> "The example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle, for, See, saith He, that thou make all things according to the pattern shewed to thee in the mount."

Again, in Heb. ix. 23 the Tabernacle is spoken of as 'the pattern of things in the heavens'. The holiest of all in the Tabernacle was evidently a symbol of heaven, for we read:

> "We have an High Priest . . . . . in the heavens, a Minister of . . . . . the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man" (Heb. viii. 1, 2).

It is called 'a greater and more perfect tabernacle' in ix. 11, and the holy places made with hands are called 'figures of the true' and the true is further defined as 'heaven itself' in ix. 24. It is therefore a matter beyond controversy that the Tabernacle and its offerings, its priests and its furniture, are intensely typical, and speak of heaven itself where Christ as the great High Priest has for us entered.

"Of Thine own have we given Thee."

The whole of the material necessary for the construction of the Tabernacle and its furniture was given willingly by the people of Israel.

> "Every man that giveth it willingly with his heart" (Exod. xxv. 2).
> "And they came, every one whose heart stirred him up, and every one whom his spirit made willing" (Exod. xxxv. 21, 29).

The same element of wholehearted willingness entered into the preparation for the Temple in David's day:

> "Who then is willing to consecrate his service?"
> "Then the people rejoiced, for that they offered willingly, because with perfect heart they offered willingly to the Lord" (I Chron. xxix. 5, 9).

The chapter also reveals the secret of this willing offering:

> "All things come of Thee, and of Thine own have we given Thee."
> "All this store that we have prepared to build Thee an house for Thine holy name cometh of Thine hand, and is all Thine own" (I Chron. xxix. 14, 16).

The outer court was 100 cubits long and 50 cubits wide, covering an area of 5,000 square cubits. The 60 pillars of this court multiply the Tabernacle number (5) by the number of tribes (12). The pillars that held the curtains were 5 cubits apart and 5 cubits high; the whole of the outer curtain was divided into squares of 25 cubits. We will not pursue this further, but as we come to individual details we shall find 5 dominating the whole structure. We are distinctly told in Psa. cv. that the offerings made by Israel for the Tabernacle were brought from Egypt at the Exodus:

> "He brought them forth also with silver and gold" (Psa. cv. 37).
> "They asked of the Egyptians jewels of silver and jewels of gold, and raiment" (Exod. xii. 35).

This was provided for in the covenant made with Abraham:

> "And also that nation, whom they serve, will I judge, and afterward they shall come out with great substance" (Gen. xv. 14).

It practically amounted to deferred pay, the taskmaster being compelled at the end to disgorge the wage withheld. The same principle is seen in Isa. lx. 5, 11, 16; lxi. 6. That service and honour due to God, which sin has diverted to itself, shall by virtue of redemption be taken from the usurper and willingly offered to the rightful Lord. The same may be said of the various ascriptions of praise found in the book of the Revelation; they are all so much of the Lord's due held back for a time by sin. When the day of glory arrives:

> "The kings of the earth do bring their glory and honour into it" (Rev. xxi. 24).
> "Thy people offer themselves willingly in the day of Thy power" (Psa. cx. 3 R.V.).

The first article of the Tabernacle to be specified is the ark. This we will examine later, but first we had better obtains a general survey. The Tabernacle itself was an oblong, 30 cubits in length, and 10 in height and breadth. This was divided by a veil into two parts; the holy place being 20 cubits long, and the most holy, the holy of holies, being a perfect cube of 10 cubits length, breadth and depth. These are referred to in Heb. ix. 2, 6, 7 as the first and second tabernacle, respectively. In the first Tabernacle stood the lampstand, the table of shewbread, and the altar of incense. In the holiest of all stood the ark and the mercy seat. None but the high priest was allowed to enter into the holiest of all.

The Tabernacle itself was constructed of planks of shittim wood overlaid with gold, which planks were placed upon silver sockets and fastened together by long rods. Inside were woven tapestries containing embroidered cherubim, and outside were successive layers of curtain of goats' hair, rams' skins dyed red, and badgers' skins. Before the door of the Tabernacle stood the brazen altar and the laver, and the whole was surrounded by the white curtained court. Disposed around this Tabernacle were the priests, the tents, and the tribes. Rabbinical tradition has it that each tribe carried as a sign one of the twelve constellations of the Zodiac. These twelve signs, beginning with the sign of the virgin (Genesis) and ending with the sign of the lion (Revelation), depict the whole story of redemption.

The twelve tribes were distributed according to the four points of the compass, the whole forming a wondrous picture—all Israel grouped around the ark, the mercy seat, and the pillar of cloud or fire, setting forth the day when God shall be all in all. The order here referred to is given in full details in Numb. ii. and The Companion Bible, Dispensation Truth (page 106), and Newberry's supplement to The Englishman's Bible set the whole before the eye in a diagram. It is of interest to note that the tribes that occupied east, west, south, and north had as their signs the lion, ox, man, and eagle, so that both at the centre (the mercy seat) and at the circumference (the standards) the cherubic pledge of restoration was remembered.

The primary purpose of the Tabernacle.

In Exod. xxv. 8 immediately following the enumeration of the materials necessary for its building, God gives the primary purpose of the construction, "Let them make Me a sanctuary that I may dwell among them". "The tents of Shem" were from the days of Noah destined to be the dwelling place of God (Gen. xi. 27), and it is the purpose of redemption and atonement to make the sons of men fit for God to dwell among them. The climax of the book of Revelation is expressed in the words:

> "Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them, and they shall be His people, and God Himself shall be with them, and be their God" (Rev. xxi. 3), and when this takes place tears, death, sorrow, crying, and pain, the close attendants upon sin ever since paradise was lost, shall for ever pass away. This blessed time of restoration is expressed in the typical Tabernacle of Israel.

Why a Tabernacle?

A tabernacle is a tent, a dwelling place that belongs to pilgrims. It speaks of the wilderness and its wanderings rather than the kingdom and its peace. Consequently it has an application all down the age to all companies of the redeemed who are pressing on to the hope laid up for them:

> "By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac, and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise" (Heb. xi. 9).

Not only so, it represents the willingness of God, in His grace to have no settled place upon this earth until sin is removed, and His pilgrim people are at home in peace. Since Gen. iii. the sabbath rest of creation has been broken by the activities of redemption. The date upon which the Tabernacle was set up is also a typical nature (Exod. xl. 17).

Greater Riches than the Treasures in Egypt

No.3. The only ground of boasting (I Cor. i. 31; iii. 21 - 23).
pp. 58 - 60

In the preceding article we were concerned largely with the faction and division that raised the party cries "I am of Paul, I am of Apollos" etc., and realized that this party spirit is in mind right through the section, Paul, Apollos and Cephas being mentioned by name in the closing verses of chapter iii.

'Glorying' or 'boasting' falls into two main groups, namely, those things in which the believer can boast, and those things in which he cannot or must not boast. Those references which do not fall under one or other of these categories will need to be considered separately.

(1) Legitimate grounds of boasting for the believer.

This list can be headed with the words of I Cor. i. 31:

> "He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord."

The only true ground of boasting or glorying for a sinner saved by grace is expressed in the words of Gal. vi. 14:

> "But God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ."

It is the characteristic of the true believer that he is one that:

> "Worships God in spirit, boasts or glories in Christ Jesus, and has no confidence in the flesh" (Phil. iii. 13).

This boasting, while it may be expressed in faltering tones here and now, will be fully expressed in the day of redemption,

> "that I may rejoice, boast or glory, in the day of Christ, that I have not run in vain, neither laboured in vain" (Phil. ii. 16).

This relation of the apostle's "boasting" in that day, with the faithfulness of those believers who came under his care, is more fully announced when he said:

"For what is our hope, or joy, or crown or rejoicing (or glorying)? Are not ever ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at His coming?" (I Thess. ii. 19).

When the Apostle would bring the first great section of Romans to a conclusion, which he does in Rom. v. 1-11, he writes his exultant praise around three occurrences of kauchaomai thus:

A1 | 1, 2. BOASTING in hope.
B | 3-. Not only so.
A2 | -3-10. BOASTING in tribulation also.
B | 11-. Not only so.
A3 | -11. BOASTING in God.

The interposition of the 'glorying in tribulations also' brings us to another aspect of truth. It must not be assumed from the rigorous denial of all grounds of boasting in self and the flesh, that Paul was austere or unsympathetic in his dealings with fellow believers—the opposite is the truth. He finds some grounds for thanksgiving in the opening salutation of the epistle to the Corinthians, even though the bulk of the epistle exposes such aberration and folly as to cause the Apostle to weep. After all that he has said to the contrary he said he would 'boast' in himself, but not in his prowess his wisdom, his success, but in his infirmities!

> "He said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee; for My strength is made perfect in weakness. Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me . . . . . for when I am weak, then I am strong" (II Cor. xii. 9, 10).

He who could glory in tribulations and infirmities as did the Apostle, was no defeatist or cynic; he was an exultant believer delivered once and for ever from the vanity of self-justification, and could, from that standpoint, see that even his own acknowledged frailty but emphasized the power of Christ upon him. In much the same way, the same Apostle who resolutely set aside all boasting in self and in men, could punctuate II Cor. vii.-ix. with this boasting in the generosity of the Corinthian church.

> "Great is my boldness of speech toward you, great is my glorying of you: I am filled with comfort, I am exceeding joyful in all our tribulation" (II Cor. vii. 4).

Other references to the same theme are II Cor. vii. 14; viii. 24 and ix. 3, 4. But in all this the discerning reader will see that there is no boasting in the flesh. To this end, the concluding verse of II Cor. ix. should be pondered. When he had said all that could be said about the liberality of the Corinthians and their magnificent response, he gives the whole passage a significant turn at the end by saying:

> "Thanks be unto God for His unspeakable Gift" (II Cor. ix. 15).

Similarly when Paul said that he had whereof he could boast through Jesus Christ, it was 'in those things which pertain to God', which the context reveals to be the grace given to him as the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles (Rom. xv. 15-20). In like manner, in the self-same chapter of Galatians where he writes 'God forbid that I should boast' he says "But let every man prove his own work and then shall he have rejoicing (or a ground of boasting) in himself alone, and not in another. For every man shall bear his own burden (or allotted task, pack or load)" (Gal. vi. 4, 5).

(2) The Apostle has brought together a series of reasons to show that boasting in human merit, when the subject is related to sin and salvation, is entirely excluded.

Again we can head this list with quotations from the passages in Corinthians that are before us:

> "That no flesh should glory in His presence" (I Cor. i. 29).
> "Therefore let no man glory in men" (I Cor. iii. 21).

In his two fundamental epistles, namely Romans and Ephesians, while the dispensations differ and the sphere of blessing differs, they are in accord regarding the question of boasting in self. Having brought the great question of justification by faith without the deeds of the law to its triumphant conclusion in Rom. iii. 19-26, he puts the question and supplies the answer.

> "Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? of works? Nay: but by the law of faith" (Rom. iii. 27).

In like manner, in Ephesians, he speaks of salvation and boasting:

> "By grace are ye saved through faith: and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God. Not of works, lest any man should boast" (Eph. ii. 8, 9).

The classic example of Abraham occupies a large portion of the opening section of Rom. i. 1 - v.11, and there we read:

> "What shall we say then that Abraham our father, as pertaining to the flesh, hath found?" (Rom. iv. 1).

All that Paul has said is summed up in the words of I Cor. i. 29 "That no flesh should glory in His presence".

It might be well if we remember that enopion "In His Presence" is translated "in His sight" in Rom. iii. 20:

> "There shall be no flesh justified in His sight" (Rom. iii. 20).

The intensive form katenopion and its usage makes any boasting in the presence of God, excepting boasting in the Lord, impossible. The word occurs but five times. Two references deal with witness (II Cor. ii. 17; xii. 19), the remaining three with complete and unconditional acceptance.

> "According as He hath chosen us in Him, before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame BEFORE Him" (Eph. i. 4).
> "In the body of His flesh through death, to present you holy and unblameable and unreproveable in His SIGHT" (Col. i. 22).

What more fitting conclusion to an article like this can there be than the doxology of the epistle of Jude:

> "Now unto Him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless BEFORE THE PRESENCE of His glory, with exceeding joy, TO the only wise God our Saviour, be glory, and majesty, dominion and power both now and ever. Amen." (Jude 24, 25).

No.6. Righteousness and the Mosaic Law.
pp. 76 - 78

It is impossible to pursue the teaching of the Scriptures on the matter of righteousness without coming up against the relation of righteousness with the law of Moses. One epistle of Paul, namely, that to the Galatians, is almost entirely devoted to that subject. So emphatic is the Apostle on the incompatibility of the two systems, law and grace, that he has written:

> "Christ is become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law, ye are fallen from grace" (Gal. v. 4).

Again and again this sentiment is expressed in Paul's epistles, so that a true understanding of the function of the law is of vital importance. The giving of the law at Mount Sinai took place about 2,400 years after the creation of Adam, but there are many evidences that 'law' was known among men during the long period between these two events. Moses himself speaks of making known laws and statutes before Sinai (Exod. xviii. 16); Abraham obeyed God's "voice" and kept His 'charge', 'commandments', 'statutes' and 'laws' (Gen. xxvi. 5). In Genesis alone thirty-four such 'laws' have been noted in operation. Moreover Rom. ii. 14, 15, 26, 27 bears evidence to the fact that the nations of the earth had something similar to the law of Sinai 'written in their hearts'. Finally, the Saviour made it clear that all the law and the prophets hung upon the primal law of love to God and to neighbour.

We are therefore right in asking the question, Why was the law specially given at Sinai? What purpose did it serve? Has obedience to this law, either in person or by a substitute, any place in the justification which pertains to the gospel?

Exod. xix. 1-7 and xxiv. 3-8 make it clear that at Sinai, Israel entered into a covenant with God. They would be His peculiar treasure and become a kingdom of priests if they kept this law, but the remainder of the O.T. is tragic witness to the utter failure of Israel to keep its terms. The Old Covenant is likened to Hagar and gendereth to bondage, and all under it are likened to those 'born after the flesh' (Gal. iv. 21-31).

The epistle to the Hebrews speaks of the 'weakness and unprofitableness' of this covenant; it shows that 'the law' made nothing perfect; that its ordinances were 'carnal'; its priests 'infirm'; its sacrifices utterly without avail either to touch the conscience or to put away sins. It declares that God found fault with this first covenant, but that in Christ He has established a New Covenant with a better Sacrifice, a better Priesthood, a better hope and better promises.

> "In that He saith, A new covenant, He hath made the first old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away" (Heb. viii. 13; x. 1-4).
>
> "By the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in His sight" (Rom. iii. 20).

As if this were not enough, note the answers of the Scriptures to the question, "Wherefore then serveth the law?" (Gal. iii. 19).

(1) "It was added because of transgressions, till the Seed should come to Whom the promise was made" (Gal. iii. 19).
(2) "If there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law" (Gal. iii. 21; ii. 21).
(3) The return of a believer to the law is described as going back to "weak and beggarly elements" (Gal. iv. 9).
(4) "As many as are of the works of the law are under the curse" (Gal. iii. 10).
(5) "The law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ" (Gal. iii. 24).
(6) "The law which was 430 years after (the promise to Abraham), cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect" (Gal. iii. 17).
(7) The Old Covenant is described as "the letter that killeth", "the ministration of death" and "the ministration of condemnation". It was destined to be "abolished" (II Cor. iii.).
(8) The law "worketh wrath" (Rom. iv. 15); and entered that sin "might abound" (Rom. v. 20).
(9) The Apostle, writing as a faithful Christian man, declared that before his conversion as "touching the righteousness of the law" he was "blameless". This condition he called "mine own righteousness which is of the law", yet so poor and futile was it (albeit no reader of these lines has ever reached it) that, when compared with the righteousness which is through the faith of Christ, he was constrained to fling aside his own righteousness as so much "refuse" (Phil. iii. 6-9).
(10) To this law—it claims, its righteousness, its rewards, its works, its promises and its penalties—Paul "died", that in and with Christ he might "live" unto God (Gal. ii. 19).
(11) Though the law itself was "holy", "just", "good" and "spiritual", man was carnal and the law was "weak through the flesh" (Rom. vii. 12-14; viii. 3).

Unconditionally and of set purpose, the Apostle sets the law aside as having no place in the plan of the gospel of grace. When this fact is established beyond the possibility of doubt, he returns to the primeval law of love:

> "For all the law is fulfilled in one word; Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (Gal. v. 14).
>
> "Love worketh no ill to his neighbour, therefore love is the fulfilling of the law" (Rom. xiii. 10).

The law of Moses therefore was a covenant destined to fail because of the inability of Israel to fulfil the terms, and so it becomes a demonstration for all time that 'by the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified in the sight of God'.

The Apostle's earliest recorded Gospel address contains these words:

> "Through this Man is preached unto you, the forgiveness of sins, and by Him all that believe are justified from all things, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses" (Acts xiii. 38, 39).

In view of the consistent testimony of Scripture to the character of that righteousness which is of the law, but to which Paul, as a Pharisee had attained (Phil. iii. 6), any system of teaching that maintains that the obedience of Christ to the law of Moses constitutes the righteousness in which the believer stands accepted, must be repudiated. We stand in 'a righteousness of God', a righteousness so far above that attainable under the law, that we must confess that ‘all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags’ in comparison, and like the Apostle, we gladly relinquish all such claim, that we may be found in Christ, not having our own righteousness which is of the law, but that which is by faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith.

If the reader should still feel that the righteousness that is imputed to the believer is the righteousness attained by the obedience of Christ to the law of Moses, let him consider the following:

(1) Is it not abundantly clear, that the whole doctrine of imputed righteousness is given its fullest and clearest exposition in Rom. iv.?
(2) Is it not also as abundantly clear that the great outstanding example and illustration of this doctrine of imputed righteousness is that of Abraham, of whom it is written “And he believed in the Lord; and he counted it to him for righteousness” (Gen. xv. 6)?
(3) Inasmuch as Abraham lived before Moses was born and so before the Mosaic law was instituted, it is utterly impossible that the justification of Abraham can have anything to do with obedience to that law, imputed or otherwise.
(4) Does an examination of either Gen. xv. or of Rom. iv. permit the slightest intrusion of obedience to law either by Abraham himself or the Lord for him? If the answer must be “No” then the teaching that splits the great work of Christ into His active obedience under the law of Moses, and His passive obedience in death, must be repudiated
(5) It is written that we are justified “by His blood” (Rom. v. 9).

Let us not by any system of theology veil that simple yet all-embracive fact.

No.7. The basic meaning of righteousness.
pp. 117 - 120

We have seen that although salvation is by grace through faith and is not of works, that nevertheless the most exacting claim of even-handed justice has been met. We now continue our study in this fundamental of our faith to discover how this righteousness in which we stand, this righteousness which Christ has been made unto us, becomes our own.

The word which will form the focus of our investigation must be the word ‘justify’. Our first concern must be to discover the primitive meaning of the term as expressed in the Hebrew and Greek equivalents. While we can say ‘glory’ and ‘glorify’ we cannot say ‘righteous’ and ‘righteously’. Nor can we accept the word ‘rectify’ for that today has shades of meaning that do not fit the case. The English borrows from the Anglo-Saxon riht for one word, and from the Latin jus for the other, and their common origin is demonstrated by an appeal to the Greek original.

Joseph is said to be a ‘just’ man, and the adjective employed is dikaios (Matt. i. 19). The same Greek word appears in Matt. ix. 13 where it is translated ‘righteous’. So in John v. 30 we read “My judgment is just” and in John vii. 24 “Judge righteous judgment". So the adverb dikaios is translated 'justly' in I Thess. ii. 10 and 'righteously' in Titus ii. 12. Dikaioo is generally translated "be righteous" as in Rev. xxii. 11. Dikaioma is rendered 'justification' in Rom. v. 16 and 'righteousness' in Rom. v. 18. The same interchangeability is true of the renderings of the Hebrew equivalent tsedaqah, tsedeq, tsadaq and tsaddiq.

The Hebrew word tsadaq 'righteous' is derived from a root that means 'straight', 'balanced', 'equivalent', which meaning is expanded but not exceeded in the law 'an eye for an eye', and is set forth in the figure of the weights and balances, or the plumb-line, both of which figures are employed by the inspired writers of holy Scripture. The usage of the word tsadaq can be illustrated by the following passage:

> "If there be a controversy between men, and they came unto judgment, that the judges may judge them: then they shall justify the righteous, and condemn the wicked" (Deut. xxv. 1).

But "they shall condemn the wicked" is literally "they shall make him wicked", which, by a recognized figure, means, 'to declare' him to be so. The truth of this statement can be tested by turning to Gen. xli. 12, 13. The Egyptian butler who had been cast into prison together with the baker, had had his dream interpreted by Joseph. The baker's dream also foretold his execution, but the butler's dream foretold his restoration. Upon learning that Pharaoh had been troubled by a dream, the meaning of which none could declare, the butler remembered his faults, and told Pharaoh of Joseph, saying "So it was; me he restored unto mine office, and him he hanged" (Gen. xli. 13). If we take this literally then Joseph the prisoner, was also Joseph the hangman, which we know is not only absurd but untrue.

Under the heading Metonymy, Dr. E. W. Bullinger, in his book Figures of Speech used in the Bible, devotes 69 pages to examples and this figure is used in Gen. xli. 13.

> "The Subject (i.e. the thing or action) for that which is connected with it (i.e. the Adjunct), we have the 'Verb'."
>
> "Where the 'action' is put for the 'declaration' concerning it; or where what is said to be done is put for what is declared, or permitted, or foretold as to be done."
>
> "Me he restored (i.e. declared that I should be restored) unto mine office, and him he hanged (i.e. declared that he should be hanged)."

Justification does not impart righteousness, any more than condemnation imparts wickedness, justification is a declaration, it simply declares a person righteous, without in any case telling us how or where the righteousness in which he stands is obtained. Justification looks on the balances. It sees 1 pound on one scale and 16 ounces on the other. It is not concerned who provided the 16 ounces. That is the concern of Grace, Mercy and Love.

There can be no possibility of introducing the idea of transfusing righteousness in the following non-doctrinal occurrences of 'justify'.

> "For by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned" (Matt. xii. 37).

"But he willing to justify himself, said unto Jesus, And who is my neighbour?" (Luke x. 29).

"Ye are they which justify yourselves before men" (Luke xvi. 15).

Righteousness and justification have been called 'forensic' terms, a word derived from the Roman Forum, where the law-courts were held. This law-court atmosphere pervades the teaching on the subject of both of O.T and N.T.

(1) God is looked upon as a Judge (Rom. viii. 33).
(2) The person to be justified is 'guilty', exposed to 'judgment' and without 'plea' (Rom. i. 32; iii. 19).
(3) There are three accusers (a) The Law (John v. 45); (b) Conscience (Rom. ii. 15); (c) Satan (Zech. iii. 2; Rev. xii. 10).
(4) The charge has been drawn up in legal handwriting (Col. ii. 14).

It is, however, important to remember that while this atmosphere of the law-court is a fact, the procedure and circumstances of our justification are alike unknown to the law of Moses or to any human court.

"When a man is tried before an earthly tribunal he must either be condemned or acquitted; if he be condemned, he may be pardoned, but he cannot be justified, if he be acquitted, he may be justified, but he cannot stand in the need of pardon" (Scott, Essays).

In the gospel, our justification is always connected with forgiveness, and implies that we are guilty. God is said to 'justify the ungodly', which, in any other court, is both impossible and illegal.

Continuing therefore our list of 'forensic' terms, we note that:

(5) The gospel provides the guilty man with an all-sufficient plea (Rom. iii. 23-25).
(6) The Lord Himself is the Advocate (I John ii. 1, 2), and occupies the place of the accuser at 'the right hand' (Rom. viii. 34; Zech. iii. 1).
(7) The sentence passed upon all believers is one of complete remission, justification and acceptance, together with a title to life and inheritance (Rom. viii. 1, 33, 34; II Cor. v. 21).

Justification includes the following:

(1) The remission of sins, viewed as a debt.
(2) The pardon by a sovereign of a condemned criminal, whose offence is blotted out from his book.
(3) The "covering by cancellation" which is the essence of the meaning of O.T. word Atonement (see articles in various issues of The Berean Expositor and in the doctrinal Alphabetical Analysis).
(4) The imputation of a righteousness of God through the faith of, and through faith in Jesus Christ.

Dewar, in his Elements, says:

"Our justification is not by a righteousness performed, but a righteousness received."
"Justification changes our state; sanctification changes our nature."

The grounds of our justification in the gospel are:

(1) We are justified by His (Christ's) blood, through redemption (Rom. v. 9; iii. 24).
(2) We are justified freely, by grace (Rom. iii. 24; Titus iii. 7).
(3) We are justified by faith (Acts xiii. 39; Rom. iii. 28).
(4) Negatively: no flesh can be justified by the deeds of the law or by works of any kind (Rom. iii. 20; iii. 28; iv. 2; Gal. ii. 16; iii. 11; v. 4).

If we inquire what is the source of this act of justification, the answer is grace, free unmerited grace.

If we inquire s to what is the meritorious cause of such an act; the answer is the Redemptive and Atoning sacrifice of Christ.

If we inquire as to how this righteousness become ours, the answer is twofold (1) by faith and (2) by imputation.

This subdivision of the subject is for the inquirer's benefit, but we must beware of intruding these subdivisions too far into the realm of doctrine. As Scott, in his Essays says:

> "Justification may therefore be ascribed, either to the source, to the meritorious cause, or to the recipient thereof, even as (to use a familiar illustration) a drowning person may be said to be saved either by a man on the bank of the river, or by the rope thrown out to him, or by the hand laying hold on the rope."

In our next article we must consider more closely the receiving end of justification, 'faith' and 'imputation', but let us not befog our clear conception of salvation by arguing concerning the distinctive merits of 'the man', 'the rope', or 'the hand', for we shall assuredly drown if either of the three is missing.

The following attempt to visualize the meaning of the word "justified" is primarily for young people, but the writer believes that many who are advanced in the faith will appreciate the suggestion here offered. It is not original, and has been in use for some time.

Take a strip of paper, say two or three inches in width and about eighteen inches long. On this paper write the words:

JUST AS IF I HAD NEVER DONE IT

Now fold the paper back at the word "just" and before the word "if", so as to bring together the syllables "JUSTIF". Repeat the process until only the word "JUSTIFIED" is visible. After explaining the meaning of the word, and how the sinner is justified by grace, extend the slip of paper, until the whole sentence is revealed. God treats the sinner, for Christ's sake, as though he were righteous, but he made Him, the Righteous One, to be sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him.

No.8. Righteousness, or Faith made Perfect.
pp. 135 - 140

We have considered the meaning of righteousness, and have seen the way in which it is related to law, faith and grace in the Scriptures. We now turn our attention to the testimony of two apostles to the doctrine of Justification. First we will examine the teaching of James, who wrote:

> "Ye see then how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only" (James ii. 24).

Is the testimony of James a contradiction of the teaching of Paul? Some say that it is and sweep it aside. "No", says others, "James was not ministering the gospel of Grace: his readers were the Circumcision; they were justified by works"! This is equally disastrous, for the Scriptures have declared that 'by the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified in His sight'. The key to the problem is found in two facts:

(1) Justification by faith, as taught in Romans, finds its basic Scripture in Gen. xv. Justification by works, as taught in James, finds its basic Scripture in Gen. xxii. Between these two passages Abraham has been exhorted to 'walk before God and be perfect', and in Gen. xxii., in the offering of Isaac, his faith was tried and found true.

(2) The second fact is found in James ii. 22:

> "Seest thou how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect?"
> ("Perfect" is a key word of James.)

JUSTIFICATION AS TAUGHT BY PAUL:

Genesis xv. 6 and Romans iv. 4 - 25.

(1) The Negative—How Abraham WAS NOT justified.
  (a) Not by works (Rom. iv. 4-8).
  (b) Not by circumcision (Rom. iv. 9-12).
  (c) Not by law (Rom. iv. 13-16).

(2) The Positive—How Abraham WAS justified.
  (a) Faith, related to resurrection power (Rom. iv. 17).
  (b) Faith, facing human inability (Rom. iv. 19).
  (c) Faith, related to promise and the Word (Rom. iv. 17, 18, 20).

(3) The Personal—How may I be justified?
  (a) Not "for his sake alone". The analogy of Scripture (Rom. iv. 23).
  (b) If we believe (Rom. iv. 24).
  (c) Raised again because of our justification (Rom. iv. 25).

JUSTIFICATION AS TAUGHT BY JAMES:

(1) His basis is Gen. xxii. Abraham's existing faith was tried and proved to be genuine by the "work of faith". "Now I know" (Gen. xxii. 12).

(2) "Perfect" is in the Greek teleioo. This word is cognate with telos, which means 'end', in the sense of 'goal' (Rom. vi. 21; I Cor. xv. 24; I Tim. i. 5; James v. 11).

To go on unto perfection was to reach one's goal or aim, and is explained by the language of Phil. iii. 12: "That I may apprehend that for which I also am apprehended of Christ Jesus."

In Gal. iii. 3 'perfected' is placed in antithesis with 'begin'. Faith is 'perfected' by the works that accompany it; they bring faith to its legitimate 'end'. So the love of God can be perfected' (I John ii. 5; iv. 12, 17, 18). His strength can be "perfected" (II Cor. xii. 9), and even holiness can be 'perfected' or brought to its logical and practical conclusion (II Cor. vii. 1, see II Cor. vi. 14-18). So Paul desired that he might 'finish' (same word) his course (Acts xx. 24). In chapter i. James speaks more of this 'perfecting'.

> "Let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing" (James i. 4).

In chapter ii. 14 of his epistle, James asks, "Can that faith save him?" and follows by the illustration of verses 15 and 16. Three times James says 'faith without works is dead', and with this Paul would agree. The initial act of justification is 'by faith, without works'. God justifies the 'ungodly' (Rom. iv. 5) whose 'works' would but the more condemn him. But after the ungodly has been 'declared righteous', continuance in sin, unfruitful living, mere lip service, is no more tolerated by Paul than by James. If we distinguish between 'the ground' of our justification as taught by Paul, and the 'perfecting' of faith by our subsequent works as taught by James, we have a balanced presentation of a blessed truth.

Three great epistles of Paul, namely, Romans, Galatians and Hebrews, make reference to Hab. ii. 4, "The just shall live by his faith". A text that appealed so powerfully to the Apostle must be given careful attention by all who would attain to any understanding of that apostle's teaching.

First, we must observe the slight variation from the original that we find in the Septuagint Version and in the epistles.

> "Behold, his soul which is lifted up is not upright in him; but the just by his faith shall live" (Hebrew).
>
> "If any man draw back, my soul hath no pleasure in him; but the just by My faith shall live" (LXX).
>
> "As it is written, The just by faith shall live" (Rom. i. 17).
>
> "For the just by faith shall live" (Gal. iii. 11).
>
> "Now the just by faith shall live; but if any man draw back, My soul shall have no pleasure in him" (Heb. x. 38).
>
> (NOTE—The order of the original wording is followed in all these references.)

It is evident that the translators of the Septuagint Version understood the words "His faith", which in the Hebrew they found to refer to God, as meaning "His faithfulness". This meaning of pistis has been dealt with in the previous article.

It is of interest to observe that the three divisions into which the text of Hab. ii. 4 naturally falls, coincides with the main purpose of the quotation in the three epistles:

"The Just." This most certainly fits the teaching of Romans which stresses the righteousness of God which is by faith, the justification both of the sinner and of God Who justifies him.

"By Faith." A reading of Gal. iii. will show the prominent place that faith occupies in the exposition of the distinctive teaching of that epistle.

"Shall live." In Heb. x. and xi. we have the subsequent life of faith that should characterize those who are justified. The emphasis upon the word 'perfect' in Hebrews, together with the insistence upon the practical outworking of grace, places the teaching of this epistle on justification on the same platform as that of James.

The verse in Romans that gives the quotation from Habakkuk contains a clause that has given rise to many different ideas. That clause is 'from faith to faith'. One opinion is that voiced by Theophylact who said:

> "Our first faith is not sufficient, but we must ascend from inceptive faith to a more perfect degree of it."

Clemens Alex. says,

> "A common faith is, as it were, a foundation . . . . . a teleia faith is one that can remove mountains."

This, however, is confusing the teaching of Paul with that of James, and is certainly not the sense intended in Rom. i. 17.

First of all, we can rid ourselves of any false ideas arising out of the expression 'from faith' (ek pisteos), for it is identical with the words 'by faith' that are found in the same verse. Let us consider some parallels in the same epistle:

> "A righteousness of God through faith (dia pisteos)" (Rom. iii. 22).
> "Justify . . . . . by faith (ek pisteos) . . . . . through faith (dia pisteos)" (Rom. iii. 30).
> "The righteousness of faith (dia pisteos)" (Rom. iv. 13).
> "Therefore being justified by faith (ek pisteos)" (Rom. v. 1).

In every case (there are many more in Galatians), it is 'righteousness' that is 'by faith'. All that is necessary correctly to translate Rom. i. 17 is to supply the ellipsis of the words 'righteousness' and 'revealed'. The expression 'revealed from faith' does not make sense.

> "For therein is the righteousness of God revealed (a righteousness) out of faith, revealed unto faith, as it is written, The just by faith shall live" (Rom. i. 17).

"FAITH COUNTED FOR RIGHTEOUSNESS."

Justification is 'by faith', 'freely by grace', 'by His blood', 'in the name of Christ', 'by the faith (or faithfulness) of Christ'. Yet the question remains, "How does it become mine?" The answer is provided in Rom. iv. 3 which quotes the words of Gen. xv. 6, "Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness". Let us discover more fully the meaning of this word 'counted'.

Logizomai occurs eleven times in Rom. iv.; it is translated in that chapter by three different English equivalents, 'count', 'reckon' and 'impute'. Moreover, it is found in two forms in that chapter. Logizomai, "to count, reckon or impute", and logizomai eis, "to count, reckon or impute for". In the one case the thing itself is 'counted', i.e. sin (Rom. iv. 8) which actually existed, and in the other, one thing is counted, or 'reckoned for' another, as in Rom. iv. 5, where faith which did exist, was 'counted for' a righteousness that did not exist, except as in the gift-by-grace of God.

Logizomai occurs some 40 times in the N.T. Of these all but six occur in Paul's epistles, and of this remainder, nineteen occur in the one epistle to the Romans. Paul's use of the term in Rom. ii. 26 makes his meaning clear. Confessedly the Gentiles had not the law in the sense that Israel had, nor were they given the covenant of circumcision; yet the Apostle says:

> "If the uncircumcision keep the righteousness of the law, shall not his uncircumcision be counted for circumcision" (Rom. ii. 26).

Now, keeping 'the work of the law written in their heart' (Rom. ii. 15) could by no manner of means be looked upon, or called 'circumcision', yet if, in His mercy, God so chose, it could be 'counted for' it. In the same way, no man, whether he be Jew or Gentile, has produced or ever can produce righteousness in the sense demanded by God; yet, as an act of free favour, He has been pleased, through the redemption accomplished by His beloved Son, to 'count' faith 'for' righteousness.

> "To impute, in theology, means, To attribute or ascribe (righteousness, guilt, etc.) to a person by vicarious substitution" (Shorter Oxford Dictionary).

Let us now set out in two groups the passages in Rom. iv. that us logizomai, and logizomai eis:

Logizomai.

"Reward is not reckoned of grace, but of debt" (4).
"God imputeth righteousness without works" (6).
"To whom the Lord will not impute sin" (8).
"How was it then reckoned?" (10).
"Righteousness might be imputed unto them" (11).
"It was imputed to him" (23).
"To whom it hall be imputed" (24).

Logizomai eis.

"It was counted unto him for righteousness" (3).

"His faith is counted for righteousness" (5).
"Faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness" (9).
"Faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness" (22).

Where anything is 'reckoned', be it a debt, righteousness or sin, it is conceived as actually existing. Where faith is 'reckoned for' righteousness, it is manifest that personal righteousness is absent, and that by a gracious dispensation, righteousness is 'attributed by vicarious substitution'.

The O.T. usage of the word is the same as that set out above.

"Let not my lord impute iniquity unto me, neither do thou remember that which thy servant did perversely . . . . . I have sinned" (II Sam. xix. 19, 20).

Here sin was an admitted fact.

"Thou dost count me for an enemy" (Job xiii. 24).
"He counts me as an enemy" (Job xix. 11).

Here Job does not admit that he is rightly charged as being an enemy of God, but expresses his perplexity at the treatment he has received.

When the golden sovereign was supplanted by the paper £1 note, so far as purchasing power goes both were of equal value. But should either or both be thrown on the fire, the essential difference becomes apparent. The sovereign, though melted, retains its worth, but the £1 note vanishes in smoke and ashes and becomes intrinsically valueless. The paper £1 was 'counted for' twenty shillings; it purchased twenty shillings-worth, but most certainly it was not twenty shillings. So faith is 'counted for' righteousness: it is, and will be accepted at heaven's bar as if it were 'twenty shillings-worth' though, in itself, it merits nothing. So it will be seen that while faith is 'counted for' righteousness, God does actually impute righteousness to the believer, "even the righteousness of God which is by the faithfulness of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe" (Rom. iii. 22).

The Scriptures speak of justification by faith (Rom. v. 1) and justification by grace (Rom. iii. 24; Titus iii. 7). It is important to keep these two statements in mind, as otherwise it is easy for the mind to conceive of 'faith' as some sort of work that merits recognition or approval. Let us consider the meaning of the two terms 'grace' and 'faith' and observe the part they play in the blessed process of justification.

Grace charis. The classic usage of the word is found in the N.T. words "favour" (Luke i. 30); "grace" (Luke ii. 40); "pleasure" (Acts xxiv. 27), but it is in the epistles of Paul that the word realizes its full import, namely 'grace, or favour to the unworthy'. This highest of all meanings was impossible of attainment or expression until the love of God was made manifest in the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. The peculiar character of 'grace' can be seen in the following passages:

"Reward is not reckoned of grace but of debt" (Rom. iv. 4).
"If by grace, then it is no more of works; otherwise grace is no more grace" (Rom. xi. 6).

Not only is grace placed over against ‘works’ and ‘merit’ or ‘debt’, but it is in juxtaposition with the law:

> “Ye are not under law, but under grace” (Rom. vi. 14).
> “Whosoever of you are justified by law; ye are fallen from grace” (Gal. v. 4).

Grace characterizes the gospel which Paul preached (Acts xx. 24); it reigns, through righteousness, unto eternal life (Rom. v. 21); by grace we are justified freely (Rom. iii. 24), and are saved (Eph. ii. 5). The relation of grace to faith is indicated in such a passage as:

> “Therefore it is of faith, that it might be by grace; to the end the promise might be sure to all the seed” (Rom. iv. 16).

Charizomai, which, outside the Scriptures means to do a favour, becomes, when sanctified by association with the Offering of Christ, the blessed word ‘forgiveness’ (Luke vii. 42; Eph. iv. 32; Col. ii. 13). Charisma is translated ‘gift’, whether supernatural gifts as in I Cor. ii. 9, or the ‘free gift’ of Rom. v. 15.

Charitoo is translated in Eph. i. 6 ‘made accepted’, which in the A.V. margin, reads ‘graced us’.

Faith pistis. Faith means credit given to a report or testimony.

> “If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater” (I John v. 9).
> “Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God” (Rom. x. 17).

The Apostle says in the same chapter, “How shall they believe in Him of Whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher?” (Rom. x. 14). We must be careful to distinguish between faith, the medium, and the Object of faith, the Lord Jesus, the only ground of salvation.

No.9. "Behold . . . . . the goodness and the severity of God." pp. 178 - 180

Let us turn aside for a while, from the direct examination of the terms 'righteousness' and 'justification' to the consideration of the Lord's attitude to sin as set forth by the use of one word 'spare' Greek pheidomai. 'Both therefore the goodness and severity of God' said the Apostle as he reviewed the repudiation of Israel by the Lord, and the continued expression of goodness to the Gentile (Rom. xi. 22).

A false sentimentalism has obscured some of the characteristics of God, and has magnified His love at the expense of His holiness and holiness can be 'a consuming fire'. In the course of His dealings with His creatures, God is said to have 'spared not' three classes, and the fourth is warned 'take heed lest He also spares not thee' (Rom. xi. 21).

(1) He spared not the angels that sinned.

The sum total of what is revealed in the whole of the Scriptures concerning the fall of the angels would probably be less in extent that occupied by the briefest of the minor prophets Obadiah, or the epistle of Jude, and it is to the epistle of Jude and to the parallel passage in II Peter that we instinctively turn to learn something of the nature of their sin and its punishment.

> "For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment" (II Pet. ii. 4).

Peter is evidently in the midst of an argument, and he reverts back to the past to warn the present false prophets and their dupes of 'damnation that slumbereth not'.

Jude omits the reference to 'hell' or, as the reference here is, to "Tartarus", the place named in Greek mythology for the incarceration of the Titans, the giants who attempted to storm heaven. He repeats however the reference to being "reserved", to "chains", to "darkness" and to future judgment.

(2) He spared not the world in the time of Noah.

Again specific knowledge concerning the actual corruption that brought about the deluge is limited to a few difficult passages of Scripture. Gen. vi. speaks of the corruption that followed the union of the 'sons of God' and the 'daughters of men' with the result that in the pregnant words of II Pet. ii. 5 'bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly' He spared not the old world.

Here we have the fall and judgment of angels and the destruction of the world with the exception of eight souls. While the actual words 'spared not' are not employed in the continued argument of II Pet. ii., the overthrow of the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah as an example unto those that after should live ungodly (II Pet. ii. 6), or as Jude puts it—they were 'set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire'.

(3) He spared not the natural branches of Israel's olive tree.

Israel however were an elect nation, a covenant people, heirs of the promise made to Abraham, beloved because of the fathers, a people with a peculiar destiny and great glory, yet because of unbelief, which led them to deny the very Messiah sent to them, because of unbelief subsequent to their pardon and the invitation given at Pentecost, Israel, excepting a remnant, were blinded, they were given a spirit of slumber, eyes that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear. Their table was made a snare, a trap, a stumbling block and a recompense, and their back bowed down. They fell, and were castaway, and became as dead (Rom. xi. 8-15). Some of the branches of Israel's olive tree were broken off, and now comes the warning to the Gentile believer of that dispensation.

> "Take heed lest He also spare not thee" (Rom. xi. 21).

Angels, the old world, Sodom and Gomorrah, Israel, and the Gentile believer, all in their turn were compelled to realize 'the severity of God'. If we stayed here we should have but one side of the picture, rigorous, untempered justice.

There is however another, without which the character of God would be misinterpreted, and His glorious purpose of grace be unknown.

(4) "He spared not His Own Son" (Rom. viii. 32).

How often has the Scriptural insistence on the necessity for a sacrifice as a basis for redeeming, forgiving, justifying grace, been the object of attack, not only from the outside unbeliever, but alas, from those who are untaught and misled.

Have we not heard at some time the public orator working himself up into indignant fury as he denounced the Gospel basis of redeeming blood in some such language as the following?

> "My friends, I stand here today, to denounce with every fibre of my outraged being, with all the sense of abhorrence that one feels at the exhibition of tyranny in high places, I stand here to denounce I say, the so called Gospel that outrages every sense of decency left to us, by representing the Father refusing to forgive His erring children, apart from the horrors of a bleeding sacrifice. Which one of you would ever dream of such a brutal and inhuman demand"? etc., etc.

One question and one question only needs to be put to all such misrepresentations, and that question is, "Who supplied, Who gave that bleeding sacrifice?" The answer is "the God Who demanded the sacrifice is the One alone who made it". He did not demand atonement or offering at the hand of the transgressor, "He spared not His Own Son". It was the God Who had been offended, the Judge Whose righteousness demanded the sentence of death, the Creator Who had been so outrageously treated by His creatures, it was the Lord God Omnipotent in Whose hand our very breath is, that stooped to be made flesh and to the death of the cross on the behalf of those who had sinned against Him.

A part of the foregoing implies the essential deity of the Lord Jesus Christ, that He was "God manifest in the flesh", "The Word (Who) became flesh", the One Whose hands made the heavens and by Whom all things consist, that emptied Himself, taking upon Him the form of a servant, and being made in the likeness of men, Who still further humbled Himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. This we believe to be true, but cannot stay here to attempt to prove this essential doctrine*.

> [* - The Deity of Christ or The Form of Sound Words should be consulted by any reader uncertain of this wondrous subject.]

While God in His essential nature is 'one', we creatures whose very constitution limits us to the conditioned and the relative, know Him as Father, Son and Holy Spirit, and it was "The Father" Who "sent the Son to be the Saviour of the World".

John iii. 16 is the direct outcome of the reference made in verse 14 to the lifting up of the brazen serpent. God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son. When God 'spared not' His Own Son, but freely gave Him up for us all, He gave Him up to death. He Who spared not sinners, is here represented as "sparing not" the sinners' substitutes.

One aspect of this great subject is apt to be missed unless the reader is acquainted both with the original of the N.T. and of the language of the Septuagint version.

The words of Gen. xxii. 12 are:

> Ouk epeiso tou huiou sou tou agapetou
> Not hast thou spared the son of thine the beloved.

The Greek of Rom. viii. 32 reads:

> Tou idiou huiou ouk epheisato
> Of the own Son not He spared.

Isaac is called 'the beloved son'. Christ is called "His Own Son"; both indicate exceeding nearness and dearness. The Apostle who knew his Greek O.T. has purposely thrown us back to the story of Abraham and Isaac so that we may see in the torn heart of Abraham as he took the knife, the fire and the beloved on that strange and awful journey, something of what it cost "The Father" not to spare such a "Son".

Something exists in righteousness, something pertains to God's administration of the Universe that cannot allow sin to go unpunished. Yet God is love, and love found a way whereby He might be JUST as well as the JUSTIFIER of the ungodly that believe, and that way was in the giving up of His beloved Son.

So we come back to I Cor. i. 30 and learn that He was ‘made’ unto us righteousness. In II Cor. v. 21 we read:

> “He hath made Him to be sin for us, Who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him.”

May this excursus, this pause and departure from the straight pursuit of our theme warm our hearts as we realize something of the grace that provided the righteousness wherein we stand.

HEBREWS

Perfection or Perdition

No.29. Melchisedek, The Priest of the Perfected (v. 8 - 10).

The Triumph of Gethsemane (v. 8)

pp. 9 - 15

Before seeking the relation of this order of Melchisedec priesthood with the theme of the epistle, we must be clear as to its place in the context, and therefore call the reader's attention to the structure of Heb. v.-vi.:

Hebrews v. - vi.

A | v. 1-6. Melchisedec. Priest.
B | v. 7-10. The Priest perfected.
C | v. 11 - vi. 1. The slothful (dull) versus the perfect.
B | vi. 1-10. The saints. Let us go on unto perfection.
C | vi. 11-19. The slothful versus the overcomers.
A | vi. 20. Melchisedec. Priest.

It will be seen that the subject enclosed within these references to Melchisedec is that of the two classes under notice through this epistle, namely:

(1) Those who attain unto perfection.
(2) Those who fail of it—the slothful.

There must be something peculiarly fitting therefore in this great title of Christ, and we propose to seek its meaning and connection.

The opening reference is in a sphere of suffering:

> "Prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears . . . . . learned He obedience by the things which He suffered; and being made perfect, (by these sufferings, ii. 10) He became the author of a salvation which is age-lasting unto all them that obey Him, called of God an high priest after the order of Melchisedec" (v. 7-10 not AV JP).

The closing reference in this section gives to Christ the further title of "The Forerunner". The Greek word prodromos does not occur elsewhere in the New Testament, but in the LXX it occurs twice. In Isa. xxviii. 4 the Hebrew is unfortunately rendered "hasty fruit". The Hebrew equivalent bikkur is translated elsewhere by the word "first-fruits" seventeen times. Cognates are translated "firstborn", "firstling" and "birthright". This reflects upon the teaching of the epistle to the Hebrews, for the saints who go on unto perfection are firstfruits, the Church of the Firstborn, who do not, like Esau, sell their birthright for a little ease in this life. The other occurrence of prodromos is found in Numb. xiii. 20 and is very similar; there the word is a translation of the Hebrew from which we have the English "first-ripe". It will be seen therefore that if we keep to Scriptural usage we shall not think of our Lord as having gone to heaven as a kind of Forerunner going on before us to clear the way, but as the first-ripened fruit, a pledge to the Father of the harvest that was to follow, a harvest of the many sons that He was leading through suffering to glory. The passage in Heb. xii. 1-3 which speaks of Christ as the Captain and Perfecter of faith, the race to be run, the endurance ending in exaltation and glory, will come before the mind as we think of Christ as the Forerunner; and the Apostle uses the word dromos "course", in the parallel passage of II Tim. iv. 7.

In Heb. vii. we find a further explanation given of the Melchisedec priesthood. We are taken back to Gen. xiv. where Abraham is met by this priest after his victory over the armies of the kings. It was here that Abraham renounced all rights and dues as a result of his triumph, taking neither thread nor shoe latchet, lest the king of Sodom should say "I have made Abram rich". There he also learned something more of the all-sufficiency of the Most High God, the possessor of heaven and earth. The Melchisedec priesthood blesses the overcomer. That is an important truth to be remembered here.

The greatness of this priesthood is further emphasized by an elaboration of a number of details that occur in the passage in Genesis. The name has a meaning. Melchisedec means King of Righteousness, and King of Salem means King of Peace. The fact that no genealogy is given in Scripture is taken to typify the risen and unending priesthood of the Son of God. The greatness of this priesthood is still further shown by the fact that even Abraham the patriarch gave a tenth of the spoil to Melchisedec, and the blessing of Abraham by Melchisedec shewed that "without all contradiction the less is blessed of the better". The perfection of which the epistle speaks is not connected with the Levitical priesthood (vii. 11), and the essential difference between the Aaronic order and that of Melchisedec is found in the fact that this priesthood is not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life (vii. 16). The introduction of the Levitical order of priesthood moreover was not accompanied by an oath, but in the case of Christ:

> "The Lord SWARE and will not repent . . . . . by so much was Jesus made a surety of a better testament (covenant)" (vii. 21, 22).

The subject is summed up in viii. 1, 2 in these words:

> "Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: We have such an High Priest, Who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens; a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man."

The verse, so often repeated in this section, "Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec", is taken from Psa. cx., which speaks of Christ sitting at the right hand of the Lord until His foes be made a footstool, and also of His people presenting themselves as free-will offerings in the day of His power, which day seems closely linked with the day of His wrath (Psa. cx. 5) when He shall strike through kings. The first mention of Melchisedec is connected with the slaughter of the kings near Sodom, the last

(in the Old Testament) speaks prophetically of "striking through kings in the day of His wrath". In the book of the Revelation we have Christ presented to us as both Priest and King. Hebrews dwells mainly on the priestly side, Revelation unites the two offices and shews how this royal Priesthood of Christ in the heavens and the fashioning of that royal priesthood on earth ("kings and priests unto God", Rev. i. 6; I Pet. ii. 5, 9) are the goal of the "perfecting" of Hebrews and the "overcoming" of the Apocalypse.

The ministry associated with Christ as a Priest after the order of Melchisedec takes us neither to the Tabernacle nor Temple, but to Gethsemane; the offerings here are not sin offerings or trespass offerings, but prayer and supplications, the end "perfecting", not forgiveness or acceptance.

> "Though He were a Son, yet learned He obedience by the things which He suffered; and being made perfect, He became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey Him" (Heb. v. 8, 9).

How are we to understand the awful agony of the garden of Gethsemane? Albert Barnes voices a common interpretation of the agony of Gethsemane thus:

> "The posture of the mind of the Redeemer, perhaps, was something like this. He knew that He was about to be put to death in a most cruel manner. His tender and sensitive nature, as a man shrank from such a death. As a man, He went under the pressure of His great sorrows and pleaded that the cup might be removed and that man might be redeemed by a less fearful scene of suffering. That arrangement, however, could not be made . . . . . even though the prayer of the pious sufferer is not directly answered, yet that prayer is acceptable to God, and the result of such a trial is worth all that it costs."

We believe these words present very fairly what is in the mind of many who read the story of Gethsemane. The repeated words "as a man" are put in to soften the apparent shrinking that is implied. We cannot, however, accept this apology for the Son of God in whatever terms of grace and love it may be presented.

First let us consider the place that this experience occupies in the epistle to the Hebrews. Paul is approaching his great exhortation "Let us go on unto perfection" which finds its dread alternative in "drawing back unto perdition". Now, however we endeavour to soften the charge, the view expressed by Albert Barnes means in plain terms that the Saviour did, if only temporarily, "draw back". Yet Gethsemane issues in His "perfecting". If the common view of Gethsemane be the true one, should we not feel that Paul very unwisely introduced such a subject here?

(1) Christ your Saviour, your Captain, momentarily drew back.
(2) You, His followers are expected not to draw back.

Something seems amiss with this argument. If Heb. x. teaches anything, it teaches that Christ fully knew what was involved when He accepted the office of the One Mediator. Setting aside all the typical offerings of the law, He said "A body hast Thou prepared Me", and that body was destined to be "offered" (Heb. x. 5, 10). These Hebrews were exhorted to look unto Jesus, the Author and the Perfecter of faith, "Who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame" (Heb. xii. 2). If Heb. v. 7 be interpreted to mean that the Saviour prayed to be delivered from the awful death that awaited Him on the cross, it will certainly read discordantly with John xii. 27, 28:

> "Now is My soul troubled; and what shall I say? (shall I say?) Father, save Me from this hour: but for this cause came I unto this hour, (No, I will say) Father, glorify Thy name."

How does the apparent drawing back of Gethsemane harmonize with the words of John x. 17, 18?

> "Therefore doth My Father love Me, because I lay down My life, that I might take it again. No man taketh it from Me, but I lay it down of Myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment have I received of My Father."

John xvii. precedes the garden of Gethsemane. In that sublime chapter the Saviour reviewed His life's work, and said:

> "The hour is come . . . . . I have finished the work which Thou gavest Me to do."
> "When Jesus had spoken these words, He went forth with His disciples over the brook Cedron, where was a garden" (John xvii. 1, 4; xviii. 1).

Are we to believe that the strong confidence of chapter xvii. was followed by a temporary drawing back in chapter xviii.? The Saviour knew intimately what awaited Him at the end of His journey:

> "He must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and be raised again the third day" (Matt. xvi. 21).

He knew all that the prophets had written concerning His crucifixion and death:

> "Behold, we go up to Jerusalem, and all things that are written by the prophets concerning the Son of Man shall be accomplished. For He shall be delivered unto the Gentiles, and shall be mocked, and spitefully entreated, and spitted on: and they shall scourge Him, and put Him to death: and the third day He shall rise again" (Luke xviii. 31-33).

To suggest that in the garden of Gethsemane the awfulness of Calvary just began to dawn upon the Saviour, is a contradiction of all that is written of Him. He knew, even to the fact that He should be "spitted on". We certainly read of the disciples, when they were on their way to that last visit to Jerusalem, that they were amazed and afraid, but the Saviour assured them by telling them that He knew already all that could and should be done unto Him (Mark x. 32-34).

Let us return to Heb. v. and read the passage afresh. Let us go to the end of verse 7, and note, whatever it was that formed the burden of the Saviour's prayer, He was heard. To "hear" prayer is equivalent in many cases to "answer".

> "Now we know that God heareth not sinners" (John ix. 31).

This does not and cannot mean that God is unable to hear what a sinner says, it means He does not hear with approval or acceptance. "I knew that Thou hearest Me always" (John xi. 42) said the Saviour. Whatever therefore was the subject of Christ's supplication in the garden of Gethsemane was acceptable, was heard, and was answered. We learn moreover that Christ was heard "in that He feared", which the A.V. renders in the margin "for His piety". This is a most necessary correction. On the surface the A.V. gives the impression that the Saviour's prayer was the result of "fear", of His being "afraid", but "piety" points entirely to the opposite direction. Eulabeia is found in Heb. xii. 28:

> "Let us . . . . . serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear."

Not only is such service "acceptable", the godly fear is echoed by the word "reverence". Whatever the Saviour asked for, therefore was heard, and that for His godly fear or piety. The burden of His petition is realized in the character given to the Hearer and Answerer of His prayer. He prayed "unto Him that was able to save Him from death, and was heard because of His piety". Here, however, we must anticipate an objection. It may be objected, Christ was not saved from death, He did die on the cross, He was not spared. In this objection lies the root of all the misunderstanding and misrepresentation of the blessed Lord. What He dreaded, and what was threatened was physical collapse in the garden of Gethsemane. The bloody sweat is a physical accompaniment and sign of intense agony and exhaustion, and had the Saviour collapsed in a fatal seizure in the garden, the Devil would have triumphed! Let us remember the emphasis that is laid upon the "weakness" of that hour. It is written "He was crucified through weakness" (II Cor. xiii. 4) and Paul said "We also are weak with Him" and could say also "My strength is made perfect in weakness" (II Cor. xii. 9) using the same word teleioo that is used of His Lord (Heb. ii. 10; v. 9). The suffering Saviour turned to His disciples and said "What, could ye not watch with Me one hour? Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation: the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak" (Matt. xxvi. 40, 41). Whose spirit was willing? whose flesh weak? Most think He addressed these words to the disciples. No, He spoke of Himself and His bodily weakness in the hour of His agony. The evidence of physical weakness is seen in that the rough soldiery who manifested no traits of human kindness, were obliged nevertheless to transfer the cross from the Saviour's shoulders, to that of a man of Cyrene, Simon by name (Matt. xxvii. 32). Again, death by crucifixion was a lingering death, lasting four, five, or six days, and consequently Pilate "marveled" and could not readily believe that Christ had died so quickly, and called the centurion to get confirmation (Mark xv. 44). The Saviour indeed was crucified through weakness. His spirit was always unalterably willing, it was the flesh that was weak, and the flesh in its physical sense, not in any moral way.

It has been assumed that the "cup", which the Saviour asked might pass from Him, was the death of the cross. This is monstrous and contradicts the whole tenor of the life of Christ. The "cup" was the possibility that it would be the Father's will that He should die in the garden and the cross never be reached. "Nevertheless" if His life's work were to end in such apparent failure the Saviour still as the perfect Servant and obedient Son bowed before the Father's will. He had done this earlier. When rejection instead of acceptance by Israel was made manifest He said "Even so Father: for so it seemed good in Thy sight", and called upon all who labour and are heavy laden to take His yoke upon them and learn of Him, for said He "I am meek and lowly of heart". We can get some confirmation of this by observing the balancing members of the structure of Matthew's Gospel:

Matthew

A | i. 1 - iii. 17. Birth to Baptism.
Ministry of John the Baptist.
"Born King of the Jews."
B | iv. 1-16. Threefold Temptation of the King. Triumph.
B | xxvi. 36-44. Threefold agony of the King-Priest. Triumph.
A | xxvii, xxviii. Baptism of suffering to Birth in Resurrection.
Ministry of those who are to baptize all nations.
"This is Jesus the King of the Jews."

This structure is not complete, but the temptation in the wilderness and the agony in the garden perfectly correspond. Will any one dare to suggest that the word "triumph" be altered to temporary hesitation, drawing back or any other derogatory expression? Christ as surely triumphed over the attack of the Devil in the garden, as He had overcome the same Tempter in the wilderness. The word "agony" agonia, which is so closely associated with this awful experience in the garden, provides us with the word "race" of Heb. xii. 1 where the Greek word is agon. After an unprecedented list of suffering and endurance (Heb. xi. 33-38) in which there is no hint that any drew back, the reader is exhorted to "look away unto Jesus, the Author and Finisher of faith". There is no hint that He drew back for an instant, but rather "for the joy that was set before Him, endured the cross, despising the shame" and this is followed by an exhortation to:

> "Consider Him that endured such contradiction of sinners against Himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds" (Heb. xii. 3), adding the pregnant words,

> "Ye have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin" (Heb. xii. 4).

Three passages of Hebrews are linked together:

> "It became Him . . . . . to make the Captain (archegos) of their salvation—PERFECT (teleioo) THROUGH SUFFERINGS" (Heb. ii. 10).
>
> "Though He were a Son, yet learned He obedience by the things which He suffered; and being made PERFECT (teleioo), He became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey Him" (Heb. v. 8, 9).
>
> "Looking unto Jesus the Captain (archegos) and PERFECTER (teleiotes) of faith" (Heb. xii. 2 not AV JP).

It is of the very essence of the words translated "perfect" that one goes right on to the end (telos), "forgetting the things that are behind". Can we believe that Paul could say,

"None of these things move me", but his Lord would momentarily have found it difficult to utter these words in the garden? How then could He be both Captain and Perfecter? How could He be said to have learned obedience? How could His followers be rebuked for "drawing back"? (Heb. x. 38, 39). Peter drew back, the other disciples forsook their Lord, but the Prophet looking down the age says:

> "The Lord GOD hath opened Mine ear, and I was NOT rebellious, NEITHER turned away back . . . . . therefore have I set My face LIKE A FLINT, and I know that I shall not be ashamed" (Isa. l. 5-7).
>
> "The cup which My Father hath given Me, shall I not drink it?" (John xviii. 11).

In Matt. xvi., when Peter out of misguided love for the Saviour said "Be it far from Thee, Lord; this shall not be unto Thee", he was rebuked as an instrument of Satan (Matt. xvi. 22, 23). In Matt. xxvi. Peter said "Though I should die with Thee, yet will I not deny Thee" (Matt. xxvi. 35) although we know only too well that he would deny the Lord thrice before that day was over. Are we to believe that Peter, who had thus manifested the frailty of his faith, would be the spectator in the self same night of His Lord"s temporary drawing back? We trust that no reader will ever attempt to apologize for His Lord, but will maintain in face of all, that in the hour of His mortal weakness, with sweat pouring from Him like drops of blood, He nevertheless prayed to be preserved so that He might finish the work for which He had been born; that He was "saved from" that death that threatened Him in the garden, and was "heard for His piety", being strengthened by the ministering angel, ultimately offering Himself through the eternal spirit to God; remaining all the time, and through all the bitter experience of His earthly ministry—"Holy, harmless, undefiled" and ever well pleasing in the sight of Him Who sent Him.

No.30. Melchisedek, The Priest of the Perfected (v. 8 - 10).

Babes versus Full-grown (v. 8 - 10)

pp. 30 - 34

The reference to the priesthood of Melchisedec which was introduced in Heb. v. 6, is resumed at verse 10:

> "Of Whom we have many things to say, and hard to be uttered, seeing ye are dull of hearing" (Heb. v. 11).

The LXX uses the word translated "dull" in Prov. xxii. 29 to translate "mean" in the expression "mean men", and the verse speaks of one diligent in his business. In Prov. xii. 8 it is used for "perverse". It would appear from the usage of the word that the A.V. "dull" is hardly strong enough. The Hebrew word in Prov. xxii. 29 is chashok "obscure" or "darkened", and the cognate chosek is translated scores of times "darkness".

The spiritual ear and eye are of the first importance. Peter in his second epistle uses the word myopia ("cannot see afar off") of those who had become forgetful of the purification of old sins (i. 9). We trust our readers will immediately remember the strong emphasis upon "purification for sins" found in Hebrews, especially the fact that in the opening summary this alone is written of the Lord's work on earth. "When He had made purification for sins" (Heb. i. 3) (see also Volume IX., p. 150). II Pet. i. speaks of "adding to your faith", a parallel expression to the words of Heb. vi., "things that accompany salvation". These added things have in view the rich furnishing of the entry into the aionian kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ (II Pet. i. 11). So in Hebrews the perfecting is connected with the aionian salvation.

This reference to the dullness of hearing is additionally a gathering up of the words of the great historic type of chapters iii. and iv. "Today if ye will HEAR His voice." "Some, when they had HEARD, did provoke." "The word preached did not profit them, because they were not united by faith with them that HEARD." Dullness of hearing, moreover, is another mode of expressing the truth of Heb. ii. 1:

> "Therefore we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we drift away."

"Hearing" together with "seeing" may be reckoned as the chiefest of the senses. How sad to allow any precious sense, even in the physical realm, to be atrophied through lack of use! How doubly sad to have the precious gift of hearing spiritually and then through not having "the senses EXERCISED" (Heb. v. 14) to fail, to come short, to drift! Over against this drifting and dullness the apostle places endurance, obedience, suffering, steadfastness unto the end. Surely we, too, need the exhortation of the Lord, "Take heed how you hear".

Not only were there many things to say about Melchisedec, but the apostle said that they were "hard to be interpreted (not uttered)". The word translated "uttered" is dusermeneutos which is cognate with hermeneuo and occurs in Heb. vii. 2 again in connection with this same Melchisedec:

> "First being by interpretation King of righteousness."

Paul had no difficulty concerning "utterance", his difficulty was "to make intelligible to you" (Moffatt). This difficulty of interpretation could reside in the apostle himself, or could arise from some quality or lack in his hearers. This is what he actually said. Their dullness of hearing, made for dullness of teaching. It is good to remember that there could be no "buyers" if there were no "sellers", no "borrowers" if no "lenders", and the teacher is dependent upon the hearer. If the hearer be "dull" the "interpretation" will be thereby rendered difficult. That this is an integral part of the Apostle's lesson here, the structure makes manifest, the words "dull" and "slothful" (Heb. v. 11; vi. 12) being the only occurrences of the Greek word nothros in the New Testament. Schrevelius says this word means "to run, race, scud along" and being so, we can see how well it suited the purpose of the Apostle who was urging his readers 'to go on unto perfection', to 'run . . . . . the race set before them'. These dull and slothful ones were not laying aside every weight, but were evidently cumbered with useless impediments, "the other things" that choke the word. Not only does this dullness of hearing seriously hinder the growth of the believer, it prevents him from exercising that most blessed office, the ability to teach others. Teaching demands of the teacher many precious gifts, but the most important of all is that he too shall have the "hearing ear". The "tongue of the learned" is most closely related to the "ear of the learned" (Isa. l. 4) "As I hear I speak" said the greatest Teacher of all. This dullness of hearing the apostle associates with stunted growth and in Heb. v. 12-14 he expands his meaning under six heads:

(1) It indicates lack of progress.
"For when for the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one teach you."
(2) It indicates spiritual infancy.
"Ye have need of milk, and not of solid food."
(3) It indicates lack of experience.
"For every one that useth milk is without experience of the word of righteousness."
(4) It indicates the opposite of being perfect.
"But solid food belongeth to them that are perfect."
(5) It indicates a culpable neglect.
"Perfect, even those who by reason of use have their senses exercised."
(6) It indicates lack of discernment.
"Senses exercised to discern both good and evil."

Let us take these six points and gather their lessons. Teachers are placed together with those who can take solid food, have senses exercised and are perfect or mature. This passage comes to us very solemnly and says that the qualification for teaching is something more than head knowledge and ready speech. In the Sermon on the Mount, breaking the commandments and doing them are associated with teaching men so, and also with losing or gaining a position in the kingdom of heaven. James utters the warning, "My brethren, be not many teachers, knowing that we shall receive a greater judgment" (iii. 1). Instead of progress there was retrogression.

> "For even when for the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one teach you again certain rudiments of the beginning of the oracles of God" (Heb. v. 12 not AV JP).

Ta stoicheia tes arches, "The rudiments of the beginning". Stoicheia are the initial steps in knowledge, and also the "elements" of the natural world. (See Gal. iv. 3, 9; Col. ii. 8, 20; II Pet. iii. 10, 12). The verb stoicheo comes in Acts xxi. 24, "Walkest orderly"; Rom. iv. 12, "Walk in the steps of the faith"; Gal. v. 25, "Walk by the Spirit"; Gal. vi. 16; Phil. iii. 16, "Walk by rule".

These Hebrew believers had progressed no further than the initial steps of the faith, and indeed needed teaching in these things all over again. An intellectual grasp of the teaching of men on any subject may be sufficient, but a mere intellectual grasp of God's truth is not sufficient. The doctrine and faith of the early church was rightly called "The Way", for it involved walk as well as word, life as well as lip.

> "Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord" (Hosea vi. 3).

What these "first principles" were that they needed to be retaught we shall see better when we come to Heb. vi. The spiritual infancy of these saints is indicated by the figurative use of foods for doctrine, "Ye have need of milk and not of solid food". The Apostle had occasion to use this same figure when writing to the Corinthian Church, and for similar reasons:

> "And I, brethren, could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal, even as unto babes in Christ; I have fed you with milk, and not with meat: for hitherto ye were not able to bear it, neither yet now are ye able" (I Cor. iii. 1, 2).

The milk, the rudiments of the beginning of the oracles of God, to them had been "Jesus Christ and Him crucified" (ii. 2). "Howbeit," said the Apostle, "we speak wisdom among them that are PERFECT" (ii. 6). The thought is resumed and developed in chapter xiii. 8-13. Milk diet is natural and right for infants, but it has a purpose and a limit. "As new-born babies desire the sincere milk of the word that ye may GROW thereby." Peter adds a word to this that links it with Heb. vi. "If so be ye have TASTED that the Lord is gracious" (I Pet. ii. 2, 3).

Some believe that there is a definite reference to the epistle to the Hebrews in II Pet. iii. 15, 16, where Peter speaks of 'our beloved brother Paul' who had written unto the readers of Peter's epistles. In verse 16 there is a word very like the word 'difficult to interpret', dusermeneutos, of Heb. v. 11, where 'some things hard to be understood' translates dusnoetos, which those that are unlearned and unstable wrest to their own destruction are spoken of. In contrast Peter urges them to 'Grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ' (II Pet. iii. 18). There is much in Peter's two epistles that bears upon the teaching of the epistle to the Hebrews. Such subjects as the saving of the soul, the 'fiery trial', 'suffering and glory', come to mind at once as obvious parallels.

The outstanding feature of the babe that the Apostle mentions in Heb. v. is that such is 'without experience'. We have drawn attention in previous articles to the place that 'temptation' occupies in the epistle of the race and the crown (see Heb. ii. 18; xi. 17, 37; James i. 2, 12; I Pet. i. 6; Rev. iii. 10, etc.). The Greek word for 'tempt' is peirazo. The Greek word for unskillful is apeiros, and carries with it the thought 'untested'. Solid food belongs to the perfect or mature. These are placed in opposition to the untested. It is one of the marks of those pressing on to perfection that they endure 'temptation'. The wilderness journey, we have seen, is the great historical type of the early part of Hebrews, and that wilderness journey was a 'day of temptation' in more than one sense.

An important note is struck in the expression 'senses exercised'. In Phil. i. 9, where Paul prays for the saints who, like the Hebrews, were reaching forward unto perfection (see chapter iii.), he writes:

> "And this I pray, that your love may yet abound more and more in knowledge and in all discernment, or perception."

The word is aesthesis. Luke ix. 45 uses the verb aisthanomai, 'to perceive'. The word 'senses' in Heb. v. is aistheterion. It will be seen that the senses in their capacity of discernment, of discrimination, of right division, of trying the things that differ, are intended. These senses are 'exercised' in the perfect. The word 'exercise' comes from gumnazo, which gives us our word gymnasium, etc., In Heb. xii. 11, where the discipline and correction of the son by the father is the subject, the word 'exercise' occurs again:

> "But all discipline, indeed as to the time being, does not seem to be joyous, but grievous, nevertheless afterward it gives back the peaceable fruit of righteousness to those who have been EXERCISED thereby."

This exercise of the perceptions enables the perfect to discriminate between good and evil. It does not necessarily mean moral good and moral evil. Agathos is the usual word for 'good', but here it is kalos. Those concerning whom the Apostle entertained doubts had 'tasted the good (kalos) word of God', but had failed to realize the difference between that which belonged to perfection and that which was 'the word of the beginning'. The two words kalos and kakos differ only in one letter. The doctrines for which they stand are often confused and said to be 'all one and the same'. We need 'senses exercised' if we are to discriminate, and 'go on unto perfection' or full growth.

No.31. "Leaving . . . Let us go on . . . not laying again" (vi. 1). pp. 51 - 53

Whatever view we may entertain as to what constitutes "the principles of the doctrine of Christ", one thing is beyond controversy, Heb. vi. 1 bids the reader to LEAVE them:

> "Therefore leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on unto perfection."

"Leaving" is answered by "go on", "principles" answered by "perfection". First we observe that this exhortation arises out of and is logically connected with what had already been said about those who were dull of hearing. The Apostle commences his exhortation with the word "therefore". Seeing that there are many Greek words translated "therefore" in the A.V. of the New Testament, it might be wise to note which of this number is selected here. Dio the conjunction used in Heb. vi. 1 is a relative of dia "through" and suggests that what follows is a consequence or an inference from what has been already advanced (see its use in Heb. iii. 7, 10; x. 5; xi. 12, 16; xii. 12, 28 and xiii. 12). These believers "for the time" ought to have been teachers, but owing to their sluggishness they needed that one should teach them AGAIN which are the FIRST PRINCIPLES of the oracles of God. The Apostle's inference in Heb. vi. is that the believer should leave these first principles not in the sense of giving them up, but should go on, should not lay them again and again. It is natural and right that new born "babes" should feed on "milk" (I Pet. ii. 2) but only in order that they may "grow thereby". These believers to whom Paul writes were stunted . . . . . "for the time" they should have reached adulthood (full age or perfect Heb. v. 14) and been teaching others. But faculties, whether physical or spiritual, will suffer atrophy if they are not exercised. The "first principles of the oracles of God", likened to milk, must be left and built upon if growth is to be maintained. The "principles of the doctrine of Christ" must be left if maturity is to be attained. If Heb. vi. 1 is read in the light of chapter v. 12 no harm will be done by retaining the A.V. translation, but without its context the idea of "leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ" is monstrous. What is apostasy but leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ? Moffatt translates this passage "Let us pass on then to what is mature, leaving elementary Christian doctrine behind". The margin of the A.V. gives the literal translation:

> "The word of the beginning of Christ."

Looking at these words by themselves, we may entertain a number of possible meanings, but they form part of an argument that has been developing ever since the opening chapter. In Heb. ii. 3 we read:

> "How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation; which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord", and in this passage lies the key to Heb. vi. 1. First we remember that the Hebrew believers were accused of being "dull"; here in chapter ii. they are warned of the dangers that accompany "negligence". The reciprocal character of this neglect is actually stated later in Hebrews. The Greek word ameleo "neglect" being translated "regard not" in Heb. viii. 9. Israel neglected the Lord. He regarded them not.

> "Because they continued not in My covenant, and I regarded them not, saith the Lord."

When writing to the Corinthians, Paul said that he had delivered unto them "among the first things what I also received" (I Cor. xv. 3) where the word "received" is paralambano. In Heb. ii. 3 we have the simpler word lambano "receive", but which is not translated by the A.V., it being considered an idiomatic usage. Where Paul says in I Cor. xv. 3 en protois "among first things", he says in Heb. ii. 3 "which a beginning (arche) having received (lambano) to be spoken by the Lord". This, while being an awkward rendering, does set before the reader a parallel with I Cor. xv. 3, and is moreover intensified by the warning in verse 2 "If ye keep in memory (or hold fast)". The messages referred to were "first principles" of the Gospel, "Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures". J.N.D. reads "having had its commencement in being spoken of by the Lord", again somewhat awkward, but nearer the truth than the A.V. While fundamental truth is and must be of fundamental importance, it is of no more value than is a solid concrete foundation upon which no building is ever erected. A granite rock may become a first-class foundation, but it remains a granite rock only, unless a building rests upon it. (A foundation after all is a relative term. It presupposes the erection of a building). In all the three hundred and more occurrences of logos, it is only translated "doctrine" in this passage, and as didache is correctly rendered "doctrine" in verse 2, we must retain the simpler idea of "word", "saying" or "discourse" in verse 1. Logos is translated "account" in Heb. xiii. 17 and again in Phil. iv. 17. To translate arche "principles" is a double violation of its meaning. It is singular in number, whereas the A.V. and the R.V. render it by the plural, and in every other occurrence of the word in Hebrews it is rendered either by "first" or "beginning". If we use the word "account" here in Heb. vi. 1 we read:

it may turn us to the opening of the Acts of the Apostles. Green translates the passage "The former account I composed, O Theophilus, of all that Jesus began both to do and to teach", and this leads us to the Gospel by Luke. Here we arrive at something tangible. The Gospel narratives are a beginning, their sequel, "perfection" or completion must be sought elsewhere. Where we are speaking of Israel, the Hebrews, perfection will be found in the New Covenant. The exhortation of Heb. vi. 1 does not speak of the present calling of the church of the Mystery, although, any believing Hebrew, who went all the way with the Apostle in this epistle, would find no barrier that prevented him from taking the step of faith to pass through the broken middle wall and to find himself a member of the One Body. That however is not visualized here.

To all believers whose pasture is mainly the Gospels, we would say "go on". The Lord Himself told His disciples that He had many things to say which could not be imparted unto them until the Holy Spirit was given, and promised that then He would guide them into "All Truth" (John xvi. 13), and that moreover, this complete body of truth would have as its outstanding characteristic the glorifying of the Saviour, and anything new that might be thus revealed would still be, He said, taking of Mine and showing it to you. What is true of a foundation is true also of a house. A foundation that is never built upon, or is continually being re-laid, taken up and put down is not a foundation at all. "Whose house are we, IF" which implies continuance and endurance until the end be attained. If we receive the elementary doctrines of Christ, but never build upon them, these doctrines will never be, so far as we are concerned, a foundation. Most of our readers are aware that we translate the Greek of Eph. i. 4 pro kataboles kosmon "before the overthrow of the world", and some who endorse this translation would read Heb. vi. 1 similarly "Not overthrowing again a foundation". The two passages are however not quite comparable. There is no word for foundation in Eph. i. 4, but in addition to kataballo, Heb. vi. 1 uses the word themelion, which does mean a foundation (Eph. ii. 20). Bloomfield, commenting on Erhard's rendering "not demolishing", says "Not demolishing is forbidden by the usus loquendi, for I cannot find a single example of the middle form in the sense "to demolish", but only in the sense of jacere "to lay down" whether in a literal or figurative sense". While therefore we leave the new translation of Eph. i. 4 unimpaired, for the actual word "foundation" is not used there, we can and must endorse the translation of the A.V. of Heb. vi. 1 "not laying again". Paul was not the founder of this company. Peter, not Paul, is the apostle of the circumcision, and the foundation had been laid by him and his associates. Paul had however exercised his privilege as a private believer, and a Hebrew by race, to write to the dispersion, as Peter himself acknowledged in II Pet. iii. 15, 16, and as no other such epistle than Hebrews is known to us, we cannot help but believe that it is to this epistle that Peter refers. Peter uses the figure of blindness as a consequence upon forgetfulness (II Pet. i. 9), and urges his reader to make his calling and election sure. He directs his reader to the "honour and glory" that Christ as "The Beloved Son" received on the Mount. The dissolution of heaven and earth of II Pet. iii., finds an echo in the shaking of heaven and earth in Heb. xii. The preservation through it all, indicated in II Pet. iii. 13, finds its parallel in the kingdom that cannot be shaken of Heb. xii. 28. The doctrines that the Hebrew believers were not to lay over again, but leave in order to go on unto perfection are six in number, and these we must now consider in subsequent studies.

No.32. The six-fold Foundation (vi. 1, 2).
pp. 70 - 75

We have seen that in order to go on unto perfection or full growth certain fundamentals, called "the word of the beginning of Christ" must be left, that it is not reasonable to keep on laying again a foundation, but to proceed to the related building. The sixfold foundation we set out in the preceding number we repeat here, as an introduction to their examination:

/ Repentance	Internal and Doctrinal
\ Faith
/ Baptisms	External and Confirmatory
\ Laying on of hands
/ Resurrection	Future.
\ Judgment aionian

Repentance from Dead Works

I Thess. i. 9 shows how fundamental this must be. "Ye turned to God from idols". It is manifest that it is not contemplated by the Apostle that this "repentance" should be repeated. This is also true for the Hebrews. Turning from idols and repentance from dead works marked a vital fundamental change. That Galatians was a covering letter to this epistle to the Hebrews, and the Apostle's words both to Peter and to the Galatians are more than suggestive here.

> "For if I build again the things which I destroyed, I make my self a transgressor" (Gal. ii. 18).
> "Howbeit then, when ye knew not God, ye did service unto them which by nature are no gods. But now, after that ye have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements (stoicheia, same word as "principles" in Heb. v. 12), whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage" (Gal. iv. 8, 9).

Does this mean that we are to have no sorrow for sin, no departing from iniquity? No! "Repent" is the keyword of the gospel of the earthly Kingdom. John the Baptist, the Lord Jesus, and Peter alike commenced their ministries with this word. Let the reader turn to Ephesians; let him read through the six chapters, seeking every occurrence of the word "repent" and "repentance"; he will not find one. Let him continue through Philippians and Colossians; the result will be the same. Why is it that this word, so frequent in the Gospels and the Acts, is so rigorously excluded from these epistles which give the foundation teaching of the present dispensation? Is it not that the Lord, by omitting this key-word of the earthly Kingdom, would lead us to observe that we are in an entirely different dispensation?

We shall find by turning to Heb. ix. 14 that the Apostle, who told them to leave "repentance from dead works", has a very satisfactory reason, and one which glorified the Lord Jesus Christ. "How much more shall the blood of Christ . . . . . purge your conscience from dead works"! Reader, which is better, the oft-repeated repentance, or the once completed purgation? Let Heb. x. 1-14 answer the question. This is in harmony with Col. ii. 13, "Having forgiven you all trespasses". The Apostle's standard is an infallible test for doctrine so far as we are concerned, and "He shall glorify Me" is surely heard here.

Faith Towards God

If it seemed strange to speak of leaving the doctrine of repentance, it must sound doubly strange to speak of not laying again the foundation of "faith toward God". We may be perfectly sure that the one who so emphasized justification by faith is not advocating its abandonment here. Let us again apply the touchstone. How does the apostle Paul speak of faith in the epistles?

"The faith of Jesus Christ" (Gal. ii. 16).
"The faith of the Son of God" (Gal. ii. 20).
"By faith of Jesus Christ" (Gal. iii. 22).
"By faith in Christ Jesus" (Gal. iii. 26).
"Your faith in the Lord Jesus" (Eph. i. 15).
"Through the faith of Christ" (Phil. iii. 9).
"Your faith in Christ" (Col. ii. 5).
"The faith which is in Christ Jesus" (I Tim. iii. 13).
"Through faith which is in Christ Jesus" (II Tim. iii. 15).

By reading the contexts of the above passages it will be seen that all the blessings of the gospel are not only vitally connected with "faith", but faith which rests in Christ! Justification, resurrection, life, the sonship and salvation, are all spoken of as resulting from faith which has Christ for its object.

By birth, by nationality, by their very law, customs, and distinctions, the Jews were continually reminded that Jehovah was the God of the Jews. Every Jew prided himself upon that fact, so much so that Paul had to write, "Is He not also (the God) of the Gentiles?" (Rom. iii. 29). But this national faith toward God, though it ministered to their pride, could not save them. In the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican we have a vivid example of this. The Pharisee had "faith toward God", otherwise he would never have troubled to go to the Temple and say what he did. The Publican, however, realized that this vague, general recognition of God, was not sufficient for his need. Notice the words of his prayer. "God be propitious (merciful upon the ground of sacrifice) to me, the sinner". Here was faith not only in God, but in the divine provision for sin. The fact that from earliest childhood these Hebrews had heard of God and read His law, was in some measure a stumbling-block to them. They did not realize that they needed a Saviour as much as the Gentiles. The Gentile, on the other hand, had no national faith to rest upon; he cast himself upon the unconditional mercy of God in Christ.

The Lord Jesus when on earth had said, "Ye believe in God, believe also in Me" (John xiv. 1). To trust in the God of one's fathers is a poor substitute for that faith which owns Him as the "God of my salvation". The epistle to the Hebrews emphasizes the necessity of the sacrificial and high priestly work of Christ. All who come unto God for salvation come unto God "by Him" (Heb. vii. 25).

The Doctrine of Baptisms

The order of the words in the original is "baptisms of doctrine" (or instruction). The word "of" may be the genitive of relation, and mean that these baptisms were related to instruction and doctrine, for the ordinances of every dispensation have always had a deeper value than the mere ritual observance. The most important word for our consideration is "baptisms". We notice that it is in the plural, contrasting with the one baptism of Eph. iv. The Apostle here says "Leave . . . . . not laying again . . . . . the doctrine of baptisms". In Ephesians he says "Endeavour to keep . . . . . one baptism".

We would first direct attention to the two other passages of Scripture where the word "baptisms" occurs. (1) in Heb. ix. 10 it is translated "washings":

> "The first tabernacle . . . . . was a figure . . . . . in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience; which stood only in meats and drinks, and divers washings (baptisms), and carnal ordinances, imposed on them until the time of reformation" (Heb. ix. 6-10).

God has used the same word here as in Heb. vi. 2, and has placed it in such a context that nothing but blindness or wilfulness can bring it into the present dispensation of heavenly and spiritual blessings. It is related to carnal ordinances which touched the flesh but not the conscience, and is placed in full contrast with that which is perfect.

(2) The only other occurrence of this word is in Mark vii. 4-8:

> "And when they come from the market, except they wash (baptize), they eat not. And many other things there be, which they have received to hold, as the washing (baptisms) of cups, and pots, brazen vessels, and of tables . . . . . Howbeit in vain do they worship Me, teaching for doctrines (similar word as in Heb. vi. 2), the commandments of men. For laying aside (same word as leaving in Heb. vi. 1) the commandment of God, ye hold the tradition of men."

It is striking to see that the inspired author of Hebrews takes up the very words of the Lord in the Gospel. The Lord had said that among the doctrines of men which they held was the "doctrine of baptisms", and that they had "left" the commandment of God to "hold the traditions of men". The Apostle says, in effect, "Reverse all this; leave the doctrine of baptisms for the revealed Word of God". What have we found hitherto? The "baptisms" used in Heb. vi. 1, 2, and ix. 10 have one meaning. They formed part of "carnal ordinances" imposed by God, which made none "perfect". Again, the word occurs in Mark vii. 4, and designates the "ceremonial cleansings" imposed by the traditions of the elders. Thus, whether imposed by God or men, these baptisms were carnal ordinances, and had no place in "that which is perfect".

A careful comparison of Heb. ix. 10 with Heb. x. 1-4 will show by the repetition of such words as "conscience" and "perfect" that these ordinances were contemporary with the Levitical sacrifices, and both passed away together. The epistle to the Hebrews is the first Scripture which reveals that the sacrifices appointed by God were to cease; so also with the ordinances which formed a part of the same appointed service.

The Laying On of Hands

Acts viii. 12-18 makes the connection between water baptism, and the laying on of hands very apparent. "They were baptized", then "they laid hands upon them, and they received pneuma hagion" (holy spirit, the gifts). "Simon saw that through the laying on of the apostles' hands pneuma hagion was given". Again, in Acts xix. 6 we read, "When Paul had laid his hands upon them, pneuma hagion came on them, and they spake with tongues, and prophesied". In Acts xxviii. 8, "Paul prayed and laid hands upon him and healed him". These things have ceased and passed away. After Acts xxviii., although we have the record of several who were sick, we have no instance of anyone healing them by the laying on of hands. After Acts xxviii. we read of believers receiving the seal of the Holy Spirit of promise, but never that such was given by the laying on of hands. "Not with hands" might be an appropriate inscription written over the present dispensation. As we have seen, the gifts today are directly given by the ascended and glorified Lord (Eph. iv. 8-11), without the interposition of man at all.

Paul reminded Timothy of a past act in I Tim. iv. 14 and in II Tim. i. 6, but when he tells Timothy to "do the work of an evangelist" there is no need or warrant for the "laying on of hands". The instruction, "lay hands suddenly on no man" (I Tim. v. 22) has reference to the custom which signified approval (as in Acts xiii. 3); no gifts were conferred thereby, and none are specified as necessary in the qualifications given in I Tim. iii. Thus again we see that even in the setting aside of this ceremony, a ceremony which was once accompanied by such mighty power, a confirmation in the true sense of the word (Mark xvi. 20 and Heb. ii. 3), the believer is led to see the fullness that is his in Christ alone.

One has but to read I Cor. xii. to xiv. to understand that the possession of miraculous gifts was not a sign of "perfection" but rather of "childhood" (see I Cor. xiii. 8-11).

The Resurrection of the Dead

Nothing can be more certain than that the apostle Paul would never tamper with the "foundation of God", the "hope" of the believer, which is resurrection. Yet there must be something hidden beneath the surface to account for so remarkable a statement as that given in Heb. vi. in both the A.V. and R.V. We make a great mistake when we assume that the resurrection as taught by the Pharisees, or believed by the generality of the Jews and the disciples, and that proclaimed by the apostles, were all one and the same. We must carefully follow the actual "words which the Holy Ghost teacheth", if we would understand Heb. vi. 2.

The words translated "the resurrection of the dead" in Heb. vi. 2 are in the original anastaseos nekron. Let us trace the use of these words in other passages. We are aware that one of the great differences between the Sadducees and the Pharisees was that the former denied the resurrection, whereas the latter believed it (Matt. xxii. 23). In Acts xxiii. 6 we read, "Men and brethren, I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee, of the hope and resurrection of the dead (anastasis nekron) I am called in question". Again in Acts xxiv. 21 he says, "touching the resurrection of (the) dead (anastaseos nekron) I am called in question". In reference to this he had said, "believing all things which are written in the Law and in the Prophets, and have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust". These passages give us the belief of the orthodox Jew, founded upon the Law and the Prophets.

John xi. 24 shows us that the sister of Lazarus entertained the same belief. "Martha saith unto Him, I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day". The same Gospel gives Christ's own words on this subject in John v. 28, 29, "The hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear His voice, and shall come forth, they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of judgment". Hitherto, all the passages quoted are in keeping with Heb. vi. 2. Turning now to Mark ix. 9, 10 we shall discover something which will throw light upon Heb. vi.:

> "And as they came down from the mountain, He charged them that they should tell no man what things they had seen, till the Son of man were risen from among the dead (ek nekron). And they kept that saying with themselves, questioning one with another what the rising from the dead should mean."

If the Pharisees, Martha and the Jews generally, believed the resurrection of the dead, we may be certain that these disciples believed it too. What then was their difficulty? Wherein was the need for questioning? "That saying" certainly contained a problem for them, and it is found in the little word ek translated "from".

They, in common with the majority, believed in a resurrection of the dead at the last day, but this statement as to a resurrection "out from among the dead" was something new. In Luke xvi. 31 it is said, "If they hear not Moses and the Prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose out from among the dead" (ek nekron). The sign of the prophet Jonah was the only sign which God would vouchsafe to that sinful generation. After the Lord Jesus had been crucified, buried, and raised from the dead, the words of Luke xvi. 31 proved only too true.

The apostles, during their ministry in the Acts, emphasized the resurrection of the Lord, but it was rejected. We have such words from Peter concerning Christ, "Whom God raised up"; "this Jesus hath God raised up". In connection with the healing of the lame man (Acts iii. 13-15) Peter says, "God . . . . . hath glorified His Son Jesus . . . . . God hath raised Him out from among the dead" (ek nekron). The Sadducees were grieved that "they taught the people, and preached through Jesus the resurrection out from among the dead" (Acts iv. 1, 2, 10).

We find the expression again in Rom. i. 4 "By the resurrection out from among the dead". The epistles of the Mystery reveal, as one of the blessings peculiar to themselves, that the believer in Christ will be raised out from the dead, even as was the Lord Himself. Phil. iii. teaches this plainly. Starting at verse 4 the apostle summarizes his position as a Pharisee. Then following his wondrous conversion he declares, "What things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ". Among the "gains" he enumerates is this one of resurrection. As a Pharisee he held the orthodox belief in a resurrection of the dead. The time came, however, when he gave up that belief, not to become a Sadducee, but to be a participator in the resurrection out from among the dead.

Heb. xi. 35 and 40 speak of a "better resurrection", and of being "made perfect". When these Hebrews left the primitive doctrine of the resurrection, it was but to see more clearly what was set before the believer, as contrasted with the Pharasaic doctrine of a general resurrection at the last day. Paul speaks of this subject in the same way as he does concerning "baptisms". There were the divine ordinances, and there were the human traditions connected therewith. The first had to be left because the dispensation had changed, the second, because they made void the Word of God.

Eternal Judgment

Just in the same way does the apostle deal with eternal judgment. In the first place, God is the Judge, not man, and in the second place, much has been read into the Word on that dread subject which is untrue. Note the passages in Hebrews where the word "eternal" is used, every one of which, except Heb. vi. 2, having reference to redemption, and not to judgment.

"Eternal salvation" (Heb. v. 9).
"Eternal judgment" (Heb. vi. 2).
"Eternal redemption" (Heb. ix. 12).
"Eternal Spirit" (Heb. ix. 14).
"Eternal inheritance" (Heb. ix. 15).
"Eternal covenant" (Heb. xiii. 20).

Din olamim is the eleventh fundamental of the Jewish creed. It involves both reward and punishment. The Apostle would urge them to leave their reasonings concerning judgment for the more blessed, and to them, personal realities concerning redemption. "Vengeance is Mine, I will repay". The Hebrew believers like many Christians today, were perhaps too fond of apportioning out the future judgment upon those who did not believe with them, or belong to their race and creed. This the writer would alter. He says, in effect, leave this with God; see to the "eternal kingdom", the "eternal life", the "eternal glory" which you may be missing by your over-zeal concerning "eternal judgment".

No.33. "If God permit" (vi. 3 - 6).
pp. 92 - 97

"If God permit." It is most essential that every believer who contemplates running the race, pressing for the prize, gaining the crown, and being numbered among those who are called "the perfect" or "mature", should realize the meaning hidden behind the Apostle's words, "If God permit". The verses that follow are an explanation, speaking as they do of the impossibility of renewing again unto repentance those who, having tasted the heavenly gift, fall away. The type given later, of Esau, is very explicit.

> "Esau, who for one morsel of meat sold his birthright. For ye know how that afterward, when he would have inherited the blessing, he was rejected: for he found no place of REPENTANCE, though he sought it carefully with tears" (xii. 16, 17).

The only occurrences of the word "repentance" in Hebrews are in vi. 1, 6 & xii. 17. It is evident that the case of Esau is an amplification or an illustration of the case of those spoken of in Heb. vi.

The words "If God permit" glance back to that period of Israel's history that has already provided the great basis of exhortation in chapters iii. and iv., "the day of temptation in the wilderness". It will be remembered that, upon hearing the evil report of the ten spies, Israel murmured and said, "Let us make a captain, and let us return into Egypt". The Lord then bade Moses say: "As truly as I live . . . . . your carcasses shall fall in this wilderness . . . . . and the people mourned greatly". It would appear also that their mourning was in some measure a repentance, for "they rose up early in the morning, and gat them up into the top of the mountain, saying, Lo, we be here, and will go up unto the place which the Lord hath promised: for we have sinned. And Moses said, Wherefore now do ye transgress the commandment of the Lord? but it shall not prosper. Go not up, for the Lord is not among you: that ye be not smitten before your enemies . . . . . BUT THEY PRESUMED TO GO UP UNTO THE HILL TOP . . . . . then the . . . . . Canaanites . . . . smote them . . . . ." (Numb. xiv. 28-45).

In the words "but they presumed", we have a parallel with the expression in Heb. xi. 29, "the Egyptians assaying to do". This passage together with those of Heb. vi. and xii. causes one to pause and think of the seriousness of the lesson here being taught. Of a similar import is the saying of the Lord:

> "No one, having put his hand to the plough, and looking unto the things that are behind, is well placed with a view to the kingdom of God" (Luke ix. 62 not AV JP).

The exact repetition of the words "The things that are behind" in Phil. iii. 13 is too pointed to be a coincidence, the context being so closely connected with those we have been considering. Having turned to Phil. iii. it may be as well to observe another parallel before proceeding. In Heb. vi. 6 there occurs that strong expression "having crucified again the Son of God and are exposing Him to shame", and again in x. 29, "having trampled on the Son of God, and having esteemed the blood of the covenant a common thing". So in Phil. iii. we have many walking as the enemies of the cross of Christ.

Returning for a moment to Numb. xiv., we must remember that although that great multitude perished in the wilderness, they were a pardoned people. Moses had prayed:

> "Pardon, I beseech Thee, the iniquity of this people . . . . . and the LORD said, I have pardoned" (verses 19, 20).

Yet it was not possible to renew again unto repentance that people, pardoned though they were. If this had been remembered when dealing with Heb. vi. many would have been spared the awful error that some have taught from this chapter, namely, the possibility of a child of God losing his salvation. This epistle, as we have said again and again, and this chapter particularly, deals with things that accompany salvation, things that belong to the perfect or full-grown and the overcomer. These things may be lost or forfeited, but salvation is by grace, and works or reward have no place in it.

"If God permit" therefore reveals that sometimes God may not permit. To attempt to ascend the mountain and enter the land of Canaan without the assurance of His presence was madness and destined to fail. Our first and greatest concern must be to walk with Him. If for any failure on our part the permission to go on unto perfection should be withdrawn, let us humbly bow to the will of God, and in lowliness of mind seek the presence of the Lord. While we feel the crown and the prize will but add to His glory, and therefore we should run with patience the race set before us, the prize is valueless, the crown a bauble if it does not glorify Him.

It is impossible to be too keenly sensitive to the serious nature of the failure dealt with in this chapter. To be "dull of hearing", to remain "a babe", to be satisfied with the "milk" of the word, and to make no advance may seem bad but not serious. The inspired Apostle takes another view. To remain a babe is really to go back, and this may be the beginning of apostasy. Let us see how the Scriptures speak of those who failed to go on unto perfection.

> "It is impossible to renew them again unto repentance if they should fall away, having crucified again to themselves the Son of God, and put Him to an open shame" (Heb. vi. 6).
> "If we should voluntarily sin after having received the full knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more a sacrifice for sins . . . . . having trampled under foot the Son of God" (Heb. x. 26-29 not AV JP).

We must distinguish between the fact that many, if not all saints after conversion, lapse into sin of one sort or another, and the falling away intended here. It is the teaching of the Scriptures that if a man be overtaken in a fault, the spiritual ones of the church must restore him in a spirit of meekness, considering themselves lest they also should be tempted (Gal. vi. 1). The exhortations to the seven churches of Rev. ii. and iii. are further illustrations of the same truth. It is evident that here in the epistle to the Hebrews something more serious is involved.

> "For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost (holy spirit), and have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come (coming age), if they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance; seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put Him to an open shame" (Heb. vi. 4-6).

We must first of all seek to understand the nature of these blessings so that we may the better understand the nature of the falling away from them.

(1) They were once enlightened (photizo). In chapter x. this word occurs again and the context is so helpful that we must draw attention to it. To save space we will not quote fully:

> "Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together . . . . . for if we sin wilfully after receiving the full knowledge of the truth . . . . . no more sacrifice . . . . . fearful expectation of judgment . . . . . consume the adversaries . . . . . trampled on the Son of God . . . . . but remember the former days in which having been enlightened ye endured a great contest of sufferings . . . . . cast not away your confidence, which has great recompense of reward . . . . . if any man draw back . . . . . we are not of them who draw back unto perdition; but of them that believe to the acquiring of the soul" (Heb. x. 25-39 not AV JP).

This is a valuable commentary, setting Heb. vi. in its true light and preventing us from making erroneous applications of its solemn teaching. Some who do not realize the setting of Heb. vi. have sought to minimize the force of the word "enlighten", so that it only means an external, but not a real and inward illumination. If this is proved, then of course we are dealing merely with professors and the problem is ended. But Heb. x. 32, wherein is the only other occurrence of the word photizo, does not allow of such an interpretation. These enlightened ones were believers, not empty professors.

(2) They had tasted of the heavenly gift. They were made partakers of holy spirit. These two statements explain one another. They moreover look back to the laying on of hands which usually was instrumental in the bestowal of this gift. It will be remembered that when "Simon saw that through the laying on of the apostles' hands holy spirit was given he offered them money", and that Peter said, "Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought that THE GIFT OF GOD may be purchased with money".

(3) They had tasted the good Word of God, and the powers of the coming age. The promise of restoration from Babylon is thus called in Jer. xxix. 10.

> "After seventy years be accomplished at Babylon I will visit you, and perform My good word toward you, in causing you to return to this place."

The miraculous gifts of the Acts were foretastes of the age to come. It will be seen that a great place is occupied in this list by the Holy Spirit and His gifts. This we find is likewise true of Hebrews. There, as we find in Heb. x., the punishment that followed the violation of the law of Moses is small when compared with that which shall follow the despising of the Holy Spirit's witness of Christ:

> "How shall we escape, if we neglect . . . . . which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard Him; God also bearing them witness, both with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles, and distributions of holy spirit, according to His own will? For unto the angels hath He not subjected the world to come, whereof we speak" (Heb. ii. 3-5 not AV JP).

One quotation from Heb. x. we now include, as bearing out the strong emphasis placed upon the Holy Spirit here—"and done despite unto the Spirit of grace" (Heb. x. 29).

This falling away which occupies so large a place in Hebrews is variously referred to as "letting slip", "neglecting", "hardening hearts as in the provocation", "lest any fall under the same example of unbelief", "forsaking the assembling of selves together", "sinning wilfully after full knowledge", "drawing back unto perdition".

The falling away was after enlightenment and partaking of the Holy Spirit, and herein lies the extreme danger. This aspect of teaching in Hebrews is but the application to the Hebrews of the teaching of the Lord given in Matt. xii. 31, 32:

> "All manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven to men, but blasphemy against the Spirit shall NOT BE FORGIVEN unto men. And whoever may speak a word against the Son of man it shall be forgiven: but whoever may speak against the Holy Spirit, it will in no wise be forgiven him, neither in this age, nor in the coming one" (not AV JP).

Here is the sore punishment awaiting those who, after having all the confirmation of the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven, and after having embraced the witness and having become partakers of the Spirit's gifts, fall away. They echo the fatal words of Numb. xiv., appointing themselves a captain to return to Egypt. The more one penetrates into the structure and atmosphere of Hebrews, the more marked the gracious distinctions of the dispensation of the Mystery become. Let us try the things that differ and approve those things that are more excellent, at the same time learning from these other records the essential need for growth in grace.

"Things that Accompany salvation" (Heb. vi. 7 - 9)

The character of the falling away of Heb. vi. 4-6 may be understood by a consideration of the illustration which immediately follows in verses 7 and 8. The figure is that of a field. The Greek word translated "earth", ge, stands for "land, as distinct from water; or earth as distinct from heaven; or region or territory, used of one special land, or country, as distinct from other countries, in which peoples dwell, each on its own soil" (The Companion Bible, Appendix 129/4).

> "For land which hath drunk in the rain which often comes upon it, and which bringeth forth vegetation useful to those for whom also it is cultivated, receives blessing from God; but that yielding thorns and thistles is disapproved and near to a curse; the end of which is for burning" (Heb. vi. 7, 8 not AV JP).

Two words are of special importance as indicating the line of teaching that we are to observe here, the word "disapproved", which in the A.V. is rendered "rejected", and the word “near” or “nigh” unto cursing. Adokimos = “disapproved” is best understood by observing the context of the word in I Cor. ix. 27. The scene is the Corinthian racecourse.

> “Know ye not that they which run in a race course run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain. But every one that striveth in the games, in all things useth self-control; They indeed then that a corruptible crown they may receive; but we an incorruptible. I therefore so run, not as uncertainly. I am boxing, as not beating air, but I am beating my body under, and leading it captive, lest by any means having proclaimed the contest to others, I myself should become disapproved” (I Cor. ix. 24-27 not AV JP).

The verses that follow, viz. I Cor. x., are very strongly reminiscent of Heb. iii. and iv. The argument hinges upon the “all” and the “many”. All may have passed out from Egypt as the redeemed of the Lord, but all did not enter the promised land. We now see that the whole of Heb. vi. is dealing with the question of “going on unto perfection”, or of being disqualified or disapproved in the race. The entry into the land of promise is placed in the same place as the crown at the end of the race. The showers of God’s love and grace had fallen for many years upon Israel, but comparatively few brought forth fruit.

We must observe that it does not say that the alternatives are blessing or cursing, but blessing or disapproval, which places such nigh unto a curse. Take for example the two servants of Matt. xxiv. 44-51. The one is rewarded by being made ruler over all his Lord’s goods, the other servant is cut asunder, and finds his position with the hypocrites, where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth. The same fate awaits the unprofitable servant of Matt. xxv. who hid his talent in the earth.

Both suffer loss and are certainly perilously “near unto a curse”. In neither case is salvation in view, but service. “The end of which is for burning.” When a field produces thorns and thistles “the end” is burning. The field itself is not destroyed, but that which it has produced. This is quite in harmony with I Cor. iii. The foundation remains unchanged whether the building be destroyed by fire or whether it stands the test:

> “He shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; YET SO AS BY FIRE” (I Cor. iii. 15).

In Heb. xii. 16, 17, Esau is brought before us as one who forfeited his birthright. There is an evident parallel with Heb. vi., the words “he found no place of repentance” echoing “it is impossible to renew unto repentance”. So also the word adokimos (disapproved or rejected) is echoed by Heb. xii. 17, apodokimazo (“rejected”).

The “blessing” also is one received “by inheritance”. The chapter ends with the words “For our God is a consuming fire”, which are parallel with the words “whose end is burning”. The whole situation is summed up in Heb. vi. 9 where the Apostle says:

> “But, beloved, we are persuaded of you THE BETTER THINGS” (not AV JP).

Readers will remember that the word “better” is a key word of Hebrews, closely associated with “perfect” throughout the epistle. “The better resurrection” is expressed by the words, “The spirits of perfected righteous ones”. Here in chapter vi., those who go on unto perfection produce "the better things, even those things which accompany salvation although we thus speak" (verse 9). The word "accompany" is a rendering of the middle voice of echo, "to have, to hold". So in Mark i. 38, "next towns", and Luke xiii. 33, "the day following". The epistle to the Hebrews does not deal with salvation, but the things that accompany it; not the "resurrection of the dead" (vi. 2) but the "better resurrection"; not the exodus from Egypt, but the entrance of the land of promise; not justification by faith, but the emphasis upon the fact that the just shall live by faith. We find the distinction observed in vi. 9 and throughout the chapter. May we, called though we are with a different calling, produce the better things, even those things that "follow" or "go with salvation".

No.34. The work that perfects faith (vi. 10).
pp. 108 - 117

The Apostle, though uttering the terrible warnings against apostasy, hastens to tell his readers that though he thus speaks, he is persuaded that they possess those things that accompany salvation. He now proceeds to unfold these "better things that accompany salvation" and to consider them from various points of view. It is evident from the very next verse (10) what these "better things" include.

> "For God is not unrighteous to forget your work and labour of love, which ye have shewed toward His name, in that ye have ministered to the saints, and do minister" (Heb. vi. 10).

In x. 22-24 we have a somewhat similar passage. There we have "full assurance of faith"; in vi. 9-11 we have "full assurance of hope". In the former the exhortation is based upon the fact that "He is faithful that promised", whilst in the latter we are told that "God is not unrighteous to forget your work", etc., and moreover that "He sware by himself" (verse 13) to make the assurance of hope doubly sure. In the former the believers are exhorted to "provoke unto love and good works", whilst in the latter "your work and love unto His name" is remembered. The things that accompany salvation are those things that indicate the perfecting of faith. We have only to remember Jas. ii. 17, where we learn that "faith, if it hath not works is dead, being alone". The great illustration of James ii. is the faith of Abraham, but not the faith of Gen. xv. when Abraham believed God and it was reckoned unto him for righteousness, but the faith of Gen. xxii. when Abraham was willing to offer up his beloved son. Of this James says:

> "Seest thou how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect? And the Scripture was fulfilled which saith, Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness" (James ii. 22, 23).

We are here upon exactly the same ground as in Heb. vi. The things that accompany salvation are those things that "perfect faith". The perfected faith "fulfilled" the promise of its inception. Gen. xv. 6 was filled out when Abraham's faith manifested itself in acceptable works. If we glance to the end of Heb. vi., we shall find that the same illustration is used by Paul. There once again Abraham's faith as manifested in Gen. xxii. is brought forward. It is therefore important to remember that a man is justified without works, but is perfected by works (Rom. v.; James ii.). A man is saved by faith "not of works", but he has been saved to walk in "good works" (Eph. ii.). While Titus iii. declares that we are saved by faith and "not by works of righteousness which we have done", Titus ii. reveals that we were redeemed in order that we might be a peculiar people "zealous of good works".

It is surprising the antipathy that some of God's children show to any mention of works. We yield to none, we trust, in a steadfast belief that grace and works, so far as salvation is concerned, cannot blend. If we are saved by grace, then that initial salvation cannot be "of works", for grace excludes works as works exclude grace (Rom. xi. 6). We do, however, feel that much vital truth is dimmed to the eyes of many by carrying their opposition to works beyond the limits of truth. It is but another case of failure rightly to divide the Word of truth. What is true in the case of the origin of salvation may not necessarily be true in the case of the fruits of that same salvation. The law is excluded as a factor in justification, but the law is nevertheless holy, just, good and spiritual, and it is the will of God that it shall operate in the kingdom yet to come.

> "But the God of peace . . . . . Adjust you by every good work unto the doing of His will, doing in you that which is well pleasing in His presence, through Jesus Christ" (Heb. xiii. 20, 21 not AV JP).

We cannot "do His will" without at the same time "doing good works", but these good works will not take their rise from the flesh, but will be the Lord's own "doing" within us, through Jesus Christ. Heb. x. 24 says, "provoke unto love and good works"; Heb. vi. 10 links works and love together. This reveals the essential character of the good works that are well pleasing to God. It is a good work to bestow all one's goods to feed the poor; it is a good work to suffer one's body to be burned rather than to give up the faith, but only so if love is the spring of such actions; if love be absent "it profiteth nothing".

> "For in Jesus Christ neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision; but faith through love inworking . . . . . for all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (Gal. v. 6, 14 not AV JP).

The same emphasis upon "serving one another" is found in Rom. xiii. 8:

> "Owe no man anything, but to love one another: for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law."

Then follow the commandments that relate to man's relationship with man, adultery, murder, stealing, false witness, coveting. It is surprising to note that both in Gal. v. and Rom. xiii. love which fulfils the law is manifested not to God but to man.

> "And if there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (Rom. xiii. 9).

Are we to understand then that mere philanthropy satisfies the requirements of the case? Not at all. The strong emphasis upon the man-ward side is because of a weakness in human nature. It does not say in I John ii. 9, 10 that he that loveth God is in the light, but:

> "He that saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in darkness even until now. He that loveth his brother abideth in the light."

Again, I John iii. 14 does not say that the possession of new life is manifested by our love to God, but:

> "We know that we have passed from death into life, because we love the brethren."

The same test is applied to the profession of the love of God in verse 17:

> "Whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in Him?"

The same Apostle brings the argument to a climax in iv. 20, 21, when he says:

> "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar; for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God Whom he hath not seen? And this commandment have we from Him, That he who loveth God love his brother also."

There is no thought in any of these passages of teaching that the love to our neighbour or brother comes before love to God. This is made clear in I John v. 2:

> "By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God, and keep His commandments."

We may trace the same spirit in Mark vii. 10-13. The law said that a man was to honour his father and mother, but the tradition of the Pharisees allowed a man to assume a hypocritical piety, and say, "it is Corban". He could say to his parents, I have given all to God, and therefore that which I might have allowed you in your old age has been devoted to higher and holier uses. The Lord has only one word for such—hypocrites! There is a danger of similar hypocrisy among believers today. We speak about "the Lord's work". What is the Lord's work? When we contribute to the expenses of our meeting do we more than the man of the world who pays for his ticket for a lecture or concert? When we subscribe for a copy of a magazine have we done more than the man who pays for his morning paper? Let us not be deceived with meaningless words. To withdraw from the claims of those connected with us by ties of flesh and blood because we are devoting our means to the Lord may come under the severe censure of Mark vii. and I John. When we have these things clearly before us we may learn without distraction the true order as given in Heb. vi. 10:

> "The love, which ye have shewn forth unto His Name, in that ye have ministered unto the saints."

The love shown for the name of God was manifested towards His people.

Unto His name. Why does the Scripture use the "name" and not the "Lord"? What is a name? Is it not the sum of many qualities, and used by us as a convenient means of expression? When we say the word house it is the sum of such items as bricks, mortar, wood, glass, etc. Thought would for ever remain unexpressed if it were not for this ability to "sum up" in one name. The names of God express all that He is to us. The varied names of God express His many-sided relations with His creatures. What attributes are expressed in the names Father, Saviour, Lord and God! Love shown to His name is love that goes out to One Who possesses those wondrous qualities that have been revealed to us in Christ.

We pray in the name of Christ. We are forgiven for His name's sake. His name is called upon us. We are enjoined to do all in the name of the Lord Jesus.

Love unto the name of the Lord is shown by ministry unto the saints. This does not bring the love of God down, but lifts the ministry to the saints up to a higher level. We minister to the saints and we love our brethren because we love the Lord.

> "Every one that loveth Him that begat loveth him also that is begotten of Him" (I John v. 1).

We cannot love the Father if we do not love the Son, and we cannot love the Father if we do not love His sons also. Here then is the practical manifestation of the Apostle's desire. "Let us go on to perfection". Faith is perfected in such works of love. These are the things that accompany salvation; these are the things that:

> ". . . . .adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things. For the grace of God that saves . . . . . teaches us . . . . . that we should live . . . . . looking . . . . . zealous of good works" (Titus ii. 10-14 not AV JP).

It is one thing to minister to the saints, it is another to continue. This is the feature that is prominent in the passage before us.

> "In that ye have ministered unto the saints, and are ministering" (Heb. vi. 10).

Ministry to the saints can involve much more than mere gifts or a pleasant round of visiting; it comes under the heading of enduring a great fight of afflictions:

> "But call to remembrance the former days, in which, after ye were illuminated, ye endured a great fight of afflictions; partly, whilst ye were made a gazing-stock both by reproaches and afflictions; and partly, whilst ye became companions of them that were so used" (Heb. x. 32, 33).

Here we see that this ministry unto the saints involves suffering and calls for endurance. The passage continues to show that such ministry leads to confidence which hath great recompense of reward:

> "For ye have need of patience, that, after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise" (Heb. x. 36).

This is parallel with Heb. vi. 11, 12. They had ministered to the saints, and they were continuing so to do. They had shown (endeiknumi) love unto the name of the Lord. Now the Apostle says:

> "But we earnestly desire for each one of you to show (endeiknumi) the same diligence to the full assurance of hope unto the end" (Heb. vi. 11 not AV JP).

They had shown, may they continue to show, for this was closely associated with the great recompense of reward. We catch an echo of chapter iii. 6 and 14 here:

> "Whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end" (Heb. iii. 6).
>
> "We are made partakers of Christ, if we hold the beginning of our confidence stedfast unto the end" (Heb. iii. 14).

These are called "partakers of the heavenly calling" in verse 1 of chapter iii., and the failure to enter into the land of promise, which occupies the remainder of chapters iii. and iv., is again before us in Heb. vi. 11, 12:

> "That ye be not slothful, but imitators of those who through faith and patience inherit the promises" (not AV JP).

The mention of the word "slothful" bids us compare this passage with Heb. v. 11 where the same word is translated "dull". This has already appeared in the structure given in Volume XXX, page 30. The context is concerning Christ and His people "being made perfect". The figures used are those of "babes" and "full grown or perfect". The "dull" had made no progress, they had remained babes. The further lessons connected with their perfecting and with Christ as the Priest after the order of Melchisedec could not be told them in their condition. These things are carried over to Heb. vi. 12. The dull or slothful would fail "after the same example of unbelief" (Heb. iv. 11), for the "inheriting" of promises must not be confounded with those gifts in grace that are ours through Christ alone.

Heb. xi. 33 speaks of those whose faith "wrought righteousness" (which cannot refer to justification without works); who "obtained promises". Heb. vi. 15 tells us that this "obtaining" is the result of "patient endurance":

> "And so, after he had patiently endured, he obtained the promise."

The Hebrews, though saved, were in danger of giving up and going back. The Apostle seeing this, and knowing the history of his people as he did, was allowed the privilege of writing to his kinsmen this word of exhortation (xiii. 22). Throughout the epistle the thought of slipping away, turning back, failing to enter, losing confidence, denying the Lord, bartering the birthright as did Esau, is uppermost. The going on to perfection is enforced and illustrated by the examples of Caleb and Joshua, the elders who obtained a good report, and by the example of the Lord Himself. Work, love, hope, faith, patience; if the word "labour" be retained in verse 10, we have a similar series to that set out in I Thess. i. 3, and expounded in that epistle.

"Faith" and "patience" are the two words used in direct connection with inheriting the promises. In Heb. x. 38, 39 we have "living by faith" placed in contrast with "drawing back", and the faith that inherits the promises is the faith that believes unto the "acquiring" of the soul (Heb. x. 39). This rendering we must justify when dealing with chapter x. The faith that inherits the promises is further expressed in Heb. xi. 1 as:

> "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen."

This enabled Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham and the rest to overcome and to obtain promises. The whole teaching concerning faith is summed up for us in chapter xii. 2:

> "Looking away to Jesus the Author and Perfecter of faith, Who for the joy that was set before Him endured . . . . . and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God."

The sequel expresses the need for continuance:

> "lest ye be wearied and faint . . . . . ye have not yet resisted unto blood" (Heb. xii. 3, 4).

The Apostle urged his readers to become "imitators" of those who by faith and patience inherit the promises. He says in xiii. 7, 8:

> "Remember them which have the rule over you, who have spoken unto you the word of God: whose faith follow (be imitating), considering the end of their conversation. Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to day, and for ever (unto the ages)."

Amidst all the change and decay, the fall and the failure of things seen, the Lord remains the same. Our faith and hope are within the veil. Our anchorage is there. While that remains we must endure.

We usually translate hupomone by patience, but this is not the word in Heb. vi. 12, which is makrothumia. Patience is distinguished from makrothumia in II Tim. iii. 10, te pistei, te makrothumia, te hupomone: "faith, longsuffering, patience". Again in Col. i. 11, "unto all patience and longsuffering". Longsuffering is ascribed both to God (Rom. ii. 4; ix. 22; I Pet. iii. 20; II Pet. iii. 15) and to Christ (I Tim. i. 16).

The believer reflects the longsuffering that God shows to a world of wickedness by quietly waiting with uncomplaining spirit for God's good time. The spirit that chafes, murmurs, and complains, is in danger of forfeiting the reward. One of the marks of the perfect is that he bridles his tongue (James iii. 2). Murmuring lost the land of promise to those who were redeemed out of Egypt. The epistle of the prize of the high calling urges all those who would be perfect to "Do all things without murmurings and disputings" (Phil. ii. 14).

Two related themes occupy the closing verses of Heb. vi., viz., the Oath and the Hope.

> "When (for example) God made promise to Abraham, because He could swear by no greater, He sware by Himself" (Heb. vi. 13).
>
> "For men verily swear by the greater: and an oath for confirmation is to them an end of all strife. Wherein God, willing more abundantly to shew unto the heirs of promise the immutability of His counsel, confirmed it by (interposed with) an oath: that by two > immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation" (Heb. vi. 16-18).

On several occasions God made covenant and promise to Abraham, but upon one occasion only did He interpose with an oath. The occasion was not that first initial act of justifying faith recorded in Gen. xv., but the crowning act of faith given in Gen. xxii.

The Apostle had said "God is not unrighteous to forget", and the way in which the Lord responded to Abraham's implicit trust is surely one element in that strong consolation which our hope in God gives us. The angel of the Lord did not merely say to Abraham, "Now I know that thou fearest God, seeing that thou hast not withheld thy son from Me", but "seeing that thou hast not withheld thy son, THINE ONLY SON from Me". God did not "forget". He gives prominence to the sacrifice that Abraham made and in His delight at this great act of faith goes beyond strict necessity and "swears by Himself, saying, Blessing I will bless thee".

God was willing "more abundantly". It was, as we have said, beyond strict necessity. It is sufficient for God to speak. A simple promise made by God should be enough to command our fullest faith. Yet so does He condescend, that in this recognition of Abraham's trust, the Lord goes beyond this, and "swears by Himself". The intention was to manifest the unchangeability of His counsel. In the expression, "two immutable things", the word "things" is:

> "Pragma, an "act or deed" such as we make and deliver, when we convey anything from one to another" (Owen).

Are we to understand by these two immutable things:

(1) The promise of God originally given,
(2) The oath superadded afterwards?

We do not think such an answer fully meets the case. If we read on to the end of the chapter we find that the Melchisedec priesthood of Christ is resumed. This priesthood is connected with "hope" (Heb. vi. 18-20). In chapter vii. Abraham is seen together with Melchisedec where the greatness of Melchisedec is established, and then by an easy transition the superiority of the Melchisedec priesthood to that of Levi is shown. This is followed by a reference to a "better hope" and the fact that unlike the Levitical priesthood, Christ was made a Priest with an oath.

> "For those priests were made without an oath; but this with an oath by Him that said unto Him, The Lord SWARE and will not repent (cf. the immutable counsel and the oath, vi. 17), Thou art a priest for ever (the age) after the order of Melchisedec" (Heb. vii. 21).

This close connection of the two oaths, the one with Abraham, the other with Christ, together with the double reference to hope and to Melchisedec, is too plainly the part of a design to be ignored. There is yet further testimony. The words of vi. 17, "confirmed it by an oath", are given in the margin as "interposed Himself by an oath". (The word in the original is mesiteuo, "to mediate"). Mesites occurs in Heb. viii. 6; ix. 15; xii. 24, and is consistently rendered "mediator". I Tim. ii. 5 tells us that there is but "one Mediator between God and men, the Man Christ Jesus". We understand therefore the passage to convey this thought. When God first gave Abraham the promise that he should be the father of many nations, there was not made known to him at the time the fact that the promise was secured in Christ. Nevertheless, even at the beginning, Abraham's faith went out to God Who quickeneth the dead, and the deadness both of Abraham and Sarah is set forth as a picture of resurrection. So then in Rom. iv. 16 the promise is of faith:

> "that it might be by grace; to the end the promise might be sure to all the seed."

Heb. xi. shows that not only the birth of Isaac, but the offering of Isaac are both closely connected with resurrection:

> "Accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead; from whence he did also in a parable receive him back" (Heb. xi. 19 not AV JP).

It was, we believe, on Mount Moriah that Abraham, in this fellowship with the great gift of God, rejoiced to see the day of Christ, calling the name of the place Jehovah-Jireh. Then it was that the oath was uttered; then it was that the purpose of God was seen secured in Christ as the Priest after the order of Melchisedec. The association of Melchisedec with Abraham we leave until we consider chapter vii., but it is important to remember that Abraham had met Melchisedec and had received a profound impression sometime before the great call of Gen. xxii. came. After the Lord had "mediated with an oath" Abraham returned "and dwelt at Beer-sheba" (Gen. xxii. 19), Beersheba meaning, "the well of the OATH" (Gen. xxi. 31, margin).

One more reference to an oath in Hebrews completes the testimony:

> "So I sware in My wrath, If they shall enter into my rest" (Heb. iii. 18; iv. 3).

Here the two references deal with failure to enter into the promised land, or promised rest. Again the subject is not salvation, but the things that accompany salvation. The three "oaths" of Hebrews therefore are linked together:

(1) Those who did not overcome, like Israel in the wilderness (Heb. iii. 11; iv. 3).
(2) Those who do overcome, like Abraham (Heb. vi. 17, 18).
(3) The Priest of the overcomer (Heb. vii. 21).

These two oaths are the two immutable things of Heb. vi. and refer to the oaths made to Abraham and the Saviour as the High Priest. Abraham's hope rested upon a covenant that was made sure by the shedding of blood. The oath leads on to the hope:

> "That . . . . . we might have strong consolation who have fled along to grasp the hope set before us, which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and stedfast, and which entereth into that within the veil" (Heb. vi. 18, 19 not AV JP).

The reader will miss the familiar "fled for refuge" of the A.V. Katapheugo, translated "flee for refuge" here, is used by the LXX in several places for fleeing to the city of refuge, and this probably influenced the translators of both the A.V. and R.V. The word, however, is used in other ways, and does not necessarily indicate fleeing for refuge, unless the context so demands. For instance, the LXX version of Lev. xxvi. 25 renders "gather together", katapheugo, and the Hebrew word so translated is asaph, its normal meaning. Jer. l. 5 and Zech. ii. 11 use the word to translate the Hebrew lavah, "to join". Isa. liv. 15 uses katapheugo to translate naphal, "to fall". In Isa. lv. 5 the word translates the Hebrew rutz "to run". This Hebrew word is found in Psa. xix. 5 (6) where it is used of "running a race" and in Esther iii. 13, 15; viii. 10, 14 for the "posts" that ran with letters, and Job speaks of his days being "swifter than a post" (ix. 25). This meaning of the word katapheugo, viz., "to run", is in entire harmony with both the context of Heb. vi. and the more remote context of Heb. xii.

The reason why we see a connection in Heb. xii. is found in the recurrence of another word which we must consider. The hope is said to be "set before" us. This word is prokeimai and occurs in Heb. xii. 1, 2:

> "Let us run with patience the race that is set before us" (prokeimai).
> "Who for the joy that was set before Him" (prokeimai).

Here the subject is unmistakable. It is a race with a reward at the end. It sums up the whole series of overcomers detailed in Heb. xi. It speaks of those who do not draw back but who go on unto perfection, who believe unto the acquiring of the soul. The Apostle, further, urges the believer "to lay hold upon" this hope that is set before him. This word krateo appears in Heb. iv. 14, "let us hold fast our confession".

So far then we have seen that those who, like Abraham, were pressing on toward the goal set before them in going on unto spiritual adulthood were comforted and supported by the fact that they had a High Priest Who knew their temptations, Who had passed that way before them, and Who was ever ready to succour them that are tested, even as Abraham was sustained.

Other figures are used and fuller details are given which we must reserve for another article. Let us, however, not forget that in our own case also we have strong consolation and encouragement drawn from Christ, not perhaps as Priest after the order of Melchisedec, but from the sublime statement of Phil. ii. 6-11 where many parallels may be found with the teaching of Hebrews.

> "Being confident of this very thing, that He Which hath begun a good work in you will perform (perfect) it until the day of Jesus Christ" (Phil. i. 6).

No.35. The Anchor and the Forerunner (vi. 19, 20).
pp. 130 - 135

Having seen that the hope was not to be looked upon as a "refuge", but rather as something to run for and obtain, this hope is now likened to an anchor:

> "Which we have as an anchor of the soul" (Heb. vi. 19).

The use of the figure is most suggestive. It is part of the equipment of a ship that is not ordinarily used until the voyage is ended. If the anchor is called into use before the journey's end, the suggestion is that ordinary seamanship is of no avail. If we read the context of the only other occurrences of the word anchor in the New Testament we shall appreciate its place in Heb. vi. the better:

> "But when the fourteenth night was come, as we were driven to and fro in the Sea of Adria, about midnight the sailors surmised that they were drawing near to some country, and they sounded, and found twenty fathoms: and after a little space, they sounded again, and found fifteen fathoms. And fearing lest haply we should be cast ashore on the rocky ground, they let go four anchors from the stern, and wished for the day" (Acts xxvii. 27-29).

The Hebrews were in the throes of a great "fight of afflictions". The storm of opposition was rising, and they were in danger of "making shipwreck concerning the faith". This latter expression is found in I Tim. i. 19. There we find the alternative is "holding faith and a good conscience", which is parallel with the thought of Heb. vi. This was the anchor that held the worthies of Heb. xi. These are set forth as examples of those who "believe unto the gaining of the soul", a translation which we shall explain later.

Why is the hope called an anchor of the soul? Why not spirit? Scripture distinguishes between soul and spirit (Heb. iv. 12; I Thess. v. 23; I Cor. xv. 44, 45). The meaning that attaches to the soul in Hebrews we may find by reading Matt. xvi. 24-27 (R.V.):

> "If any man will to come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow Me . . . . . For whosoever is willing to lose his soul (psuche) for My sake shall find it . . . . . For the Son of Man shall come . . . . . then shall He render unto every man according to his deeds."

Here it will be observed that the Lord bids His disciples to "lose their soul", not to "save it"! What is involved in the losing of one's soul? Self-denial, the taking up of one's cross, and the following of the Lord. When we have a Scriptural conception of the word "soul", we shall realize that to lose one's soul means to forfeit many of the pleasures and good things of this life for the truth's sake. Abraham lost his soul. He left Ur of the Chaldees, and kith and kin, to become a dweller in tents, looking forward to the future when in resurrection he should "find" or "gain" his soul, and under happier and holier conditions enjoy to the full those things which he had foregone in this present evil age. Moses lost his soul, that he might gain it. Before him lay a dazzling prospect. He was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. He evidently had the offer of adoption into the royal family; yet he chose to suffer affliction with the people of God, esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt: for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward.

The epistle of Peter makes use of the "salvation of the soul" in a similar manner. In I Peter i. 3-11 this expression is approached in the following manner:

(1) An inheritance is in view (verse 4), which is further spoken of as
(2) Salvation ready to be revealed in the last time (5).
(3) In view of this the believer was rejoicing even though for a little while being put to grief through manifold temptations (6);
(4) These trials were in the nature of a test, faith being submitted to a fiery trial, that it may be found unto praise, glory and honour at the revelation of Jesus Christ (7).
(5) This is spoken of as "receiving the end of your faith, even the SALVATION OF YOUR SOULS" (9).
(6) The whole passage being summed up in verse 11, 'the sufferings for Christ, and the glories that follow'.

To such, "hope" was an anchor of the soul, called in verse 3, a "living hope".

Taking Matt. xvi. and I Peter together we learn that the believer must "lose his soul" during this life, and look forward to the "saving of his soul" in the life to come. The context of both passages is reward for faithful service at the Second Coming of the Lord. As we have said so many times, Hebrews does not deal with salvation in its primary evangelical sense, but with things that accompany it. To take joyfully the spoiling of their goods, as the Hebrew believers had, necessitated some such anchor for the soul. In Heb. x. 34 we read:

> "For ye . . . . . took joyfully the spoiling of your goods, knowing in yourselves that ye (that you yourselves) have in heaven a better and an enduring substance", the words in italics being equivalent to the hope as an anchor of the soul. The anchor for the soul is that better and enduring substance that far outweighs the "light affliction which is but for a moment". Unlike the vain promises of the world, this hope, this anchor, is "sure and stedfast". "Sure" is asphales. In Acts it is used of the Roman officials in connection with Paul:

> "He could not know the certainty for the tumult" (xxi. 34).
> "He would have known the certainty whereof he was accused" (xxii. 30).
> "Of whom I have no certain thing to write" (xxv. 26).

Asphaleia occurs in the phrase "peace and safety" of I Thess. v. 3. Asphalizo occurs in Matt. xxvii. 64-66 "to make sure". The word "safe" in Phil. iii. 1 is asphales, a compound of a, a negative, and sphalo "to supplant, to trip up the heels". The LXX employs sphaleros "slippery" in Prov. v. 6. The Apostle used an apt term therefore when he wrote to the Philippians. He was about to speak of a race and a prize. Moffatt's translation will be appreciated by the reader, for he gives "the safe course" in Phil. iii. 1. This usage not only adds weight to the idea already put before the reader that the Race and the Crown rather than initial salvation is in view in Hebrews, but also provides one more linguistic link between Philippians and Hebrews. "Stedfast" (of Heb. vi. 19) is translated "firm" in Heb. iii. 6, "If we hold fast the confidence and . . . . . hope firm unto the end". The two words appear to be used to express the properties of the anchor in itself and in its usage. In itself it is "sure"; in its usage it is "reliable"; "hope maketh not ashamed".

If the inspired statement ended here, the hope of the tired and afflicted believer would be of little avail. For of what use is the strongest anchor if it can find no solid anchorage? Therefore the Apostle continues:

> "and which entereth into that within the veil" (Heb. vi. 19).

At a meeting for children once we were speaking of "hope" and had this verse before us. The children were asked to express their opinion as to what word of four letters was the most important in the verse. Some said "hope", some "soul"; others "sure"; yet others, "veil". Our own choice was the somewhat strange word "that"—

> "Which entereth into THAT within the veil."

When we read chapter ix. we shall have occasion to consider the typical teaching of the Tabernacle at some length; here we only need to remember the Ark and the Mercy Seat which were hidden from view by the Veil. There in the Ark were the unbroken tables of the law, the rod of Aaron that budded, and the golden pot of manna. These spoke of:

> RIGHTEOUSNESS—The unbroken tables of stone.
> UNCHANGING PRIESTHOOD—The rod that budded.
> WILDERNESS PROVISION—The manna.

Resting upon the Ark was the Mercy Seat which spoke of sins forgiven, of atonement, of reconciliation. "There I will meet with thee and commune with thee" the Lord had said to Moses, and says to us, "Here is the sure anchor ground of the tempest-tossed believer". If hope enters into THAT, nothing can ever happen in this life that will prove too severe a test. The anchor and the anchorage are sure and stedfast. The "strong consolation" which is ministered to those who run for the hope set before them gathers strength as the fullness of God's supply is opened up. The hope they have is an anchor for the soul. This hope is both sure in itself and stedfast in its use. Moreover it enters into that within the veil, the bedrock of redeeming love.

Yet one more item is added to make the consolation complete. We have already seen that the "oath" sworn to Abraham is echoed by the "oath" sworn to Christ as Priest after the order of Melchisedec. The Apostle therefore appropriately concludes by saying:

> "Whither the Forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus, made an High Priest for ever (the age) after the order of Melchisedec" (Heb. vi. 20).

As a forerunner, Christ is seen in John xiv. 2, "I go to prepare a place for you". Dr. Macknight says:

> "Here the allusion is to one sent from a ship to fix its anchor in the place to which it is to be drawn as had to be done on such a coast as that of southern Greece."

The references to Christ as High Priest in this epistle have much to do with the encouragement of the overcomer:

> "Seeing then that we have a great High Priest, that is passed into (through) the heavens (where the Forerunner is for us entered), Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession" (iv. 14).

It must also be remembered that the mention of the Melchisedec priesthood of Christ at the close of chapter vi. is really a resumption of the theme started in chapter v. If we keep in mind the way it is introduced in chapter v. and the nature of the parenthesis of chapter vi., we may get further light upon the connection of this Priesthood with the believer's hope. In chapter v., after speaking of Christ as Priest after the order of Melchisedec, the Apostle immediately proceeds to speak of the sufferings of Christ, whereby He was "perfected". The Apostle, however, realized that those to whom he wrote were not sufficiently mature to appreciate the subject:

> "Of whom we have many things to say, and hard to be uttered, seeing ye are dull of hearing" (v. 11).

The dullness of hearing is evidently carried over into vi. 12 where it reappears as "slothful":

> "That ye be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises."

The exhortation of the parenthesis is "go on unto perfection". We shall find that Melchisedec is essentially connected with the overcomer, and therefore is appropriately mentioned at the close of chapter vi.

There is one meaning of the word "forerunner" that is not mentioned by commentators, but which we feel must be included in our survey. Prodromos occurs twice in the LXX but in neither case does it refer to a "forerunner" in the sense usually attaching to the word. The two passages are:

> "Now the time was the time of the FIRSTRIPE grapes" (Numb. xiii. 20).
> "As the HASTY fruit before the summer" (Isa. xxviii. 4).

In both cases the meaning is the first ripe fruit. The reference in Numb. xiii. 20 is to that occasion when the spies entered into the promised land, the results of which form the background of Heb. iii. and iv., where Caleb and Joshua stand forward as overcomers. Christ as the "Forerunner" is Christ the "First-fruits". Here He is seen as the pledge and earnest of the overcomer. As the "Forerunner" or "First-fruits" He is seen in Heb. xii. 2:

> "Who for the joy that was set before Him (cf. the hope set before us) endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God."

If then we consider the hope itself, we find it a sure and stedfast anchor; or the anchor ground, we find it to be grounded in "that within the veil"; or the encouragement of example, we find it in Christ the Forerunner and "first ripe Fruit" of the harvest of many sons He is leading "to glory".

We have now reached that stage in the unfolding of truth that necessitated the fuller mention of the Melchisedec priesthood of Christ. To this the writer now proceeds, and by a series of statements sets forth the superiority of the Priesthood of Christ to that of Aaron, bringing this established fact to bear once more upon the great theme of the epistle, "perfection" (vii. 11, 19). If we keep this before us, we shall be less likely to be overwhelmed with the mass of detail that meets us in this section. Omitting the parenthetical details, the proposition of Heb. vii. 1-3 reads:

> "For this Melchisedec . . . . . abideth a priest continually."

The intervening details supply the necessary information to establish this proposition.

Melchisedec was first of all KING OF SALEM. Jerome maintains, in his epistle to Evagrius, that this Salem is a city near Shechem, mentioned in Gen. xxxiii. 18 and John iii. 23. Salem, however, is used to indicate Jerusalem in Psa. lxxvi. 2:

> "In Salem also is His (God's) tabernacle, and His dwelling place in Zion."

There are some who think that after the Jebusites took possession of the place it was called Jebus-Salem, which became transformed to Jerusalem. We find in Josh. x. 1-4 that the king of Jerusalem was called Adonizedec, which has much the same significance as that of Melchisedec.

Not only was Melchisedec king, but he was "PRIEST OF THE MOST HIGH GOD". This title El Elyon, "The Most High God" is used for the first time in Scripture in connection with this incident (Gen. xiv. 18). The various titles of God are used with precision and with special regard to the relationship intended in each particular passage. For instance, Genesis i. 1 to ii. 3 treats of creation, and the title used through the record is Elohim, "God".

Immediately we commence "the generations", in verse 4, the title changes to "the Lord God". Coming to Abraham's time we have not only the title "The Most High God" but in Gen. xvii. 1:

> "I am El Shaddai; walk before Me, and be thou perfect", and again in Exod. vi. 3 we read:

> "I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, by the name of El Shaddai, but by My name Jehovah was I not known to them."

The Priest upon His throne.

Melchisedec was both king and priest. These two offices were kept distinct under the economy of the law. We may remember the awful judgment that fell upon Uzziah when as king he sought the priesthood also. In Christ alone can these two wondrous offices meet. Zech. vi. 12, 13 says:

> "Behold the Man Whose name is The BRANCH . . . . . He shall be a Priest upon His Throne."

The epistle of "suffering and the glory that follows" names those who thus overcome "a royal priesthood" (I Pet. ii. 9), and Revelation, that book of the overcomer, speaks of Christ as:

(1) Prince of the kings of the earth—KING.
(2) One Who looses from sin by His blood—PRIEST, and as a result constitutes those thus blessed:

> "Kings and priests unto God and His Father" (Rev. i. 6).

Melchisedec is the priest of the victor, and the Lord is seen in that capacity in Rev. i. This is shown by noticing what particular incident of Melchisedec's history the Apostle next mentions, the consideration of which we must defer until the next article in this series.

No.36. The Priest of the Overcomer. "Who met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings" (vii. 1).

pp. 141 - 150

Gen. xiv. gives the names of these kings, and describes the battle which they fought. Lot, type of the worldly believer, type of the one who would not "lose his soul" as Abraham did, became involved in the fate of Sodom, becoming a prisoner.

It is suggestive that the one who escaped and came with tidings tells "Abraham the Hebrew", "Abraham the pilgrim", a title that suggests the very opposite of Lot's condition. He it was who overcame these kings, brought back the spoils and rescued Lot. It is here, at this moment of victory, that Melchisedec appears. The effect of this meeting is seen in Abraham's reply to the king of Sodom:

> "I have lift up mine hand unto the LORD, the Most High God, the possessor of heaven and earth, that I will not take from a thread even to a shoelatchet, and that I will not take any thing that is thine, lest thou shouldest say, I have made Abram rich" (Gen. xiv. 22, 23).

Heb. vii. 1 and 2 does not mention this effect upon Abraham, but says:

> "And blessed him; to whom also Abraham gave a tenth part of all."

Both these items are expanded by the Apostle in verses 4-10. We leave them for the moment to learn a little more concerning this great priesthood. The Apostle now proceeds to interpret the meaning of the word Melchisedec:

> "First being by interpretation King of righteousness, and after that also King of Salem, which is, King of peace" (verse 2).

Many of the names of Old Testament characters seem to be prophetic of their place in the Divine scheme. Adam, Noah and Peleg are examples. Abraham is an example of a man's name being changed to fit changed circumstances. The inspired writer finds design in the order of the titles here:

> First, King of righteousness
> Then, King of peace.

This he repeats in another form in Heb. xii. 11, where he speaks of the peaceable fruit of righteousness, the righteousness evidently coming first:

> "Without father, without mother, without descent" (verse 3).

These words cannot be taken absolutely of Melchisedec, otherwise he could have had no existence at all, but relatively, in connection with his office as priest. Those who could not prove their genealogies in the time of the return from captivity were refused admittance into the priesthood (Ezra ii. 61-63). The words "without descent" strictly rendered should read "without genealogy". The words of the Apostle by no means teach that Melchisedec absolutely had no "descent", but that such descent was not recorded, which recording is the essence of the word genealogy. Of Melchisedec it is further written that he had:

> "Neither beginning of days, nor end of life" (verse 3).

The priests of the Levitical order had both the beginning and the end of their term of office fixed by law. A priest's term of ministration was called his "days" (Luke i. 23), and the priests, the sons of Kohath, began their service at thirty years of age and ended it at fifty. Summing up these points of resemblance, the Apostle says "but being like unto the Son of God, abides a priest perpetually". The construction of the whole sentence seems to be as follows:

> "This Melchisedec, king of Salem, priest of the Most High God . . . . . abides a priest perpetually."

The remaining words are a parenthetic explanation given in order to show a series of comparisons with the Son of God. The greatness of Melchisedec himself, however, is the immediate concern, in order that the infinite greatness of Christ may be the better understood. So the context continues by enlarging on the testimony of the tithe:

"Now consider how great this man was, unto whom even the patriarch Abraham gave the tenth of the spoils" (verse 4).

The word used for spoils (akrothinion) is composed of thin, "a heap of corn" and akros, "the top". The top of a heap of corn indicates the best, and the suggestion is that Abraham gave a tithe of the best. Not that Abraham tithed the best of the spoil only, for Heb. vii. 2 says, "he gave him tithes of all", but that which he did give as a tithe was taken from the very best. Here therefore is one item which contributes to the impression of greatness which Scripture gives to Melchisedec. But this is not all. Not only is our attention directed to the tithe, and the fact that it was made up of the best of the spoils, but we are called upon to observe who it is that gave these tithes:

"Unto whom even the patriarch Abraham gave the tenth of the spoils."

Dr. Owen says that the conjunction "even" is emphatic and, though joined with "the tenth", yet in construction it must be understood with Abraham; not "unto whom Abraham gave even a tenth", but "unto whom even Abraham gave a tenth".

Abraham is here called "the patriarch". The Hebrews held that there were three sorts of patriarchs. The heads of the twelve tribes (that is the twelve sons of Jacob) and David also were called patriarchs (Acts vii. 8, 9; ii. 29). Of greater dignity than these were held Isaac and Jacob, but chiefest of all was Abraham, the first father of the race. If therefore one was greater than Abraham, how great he must be! This is the argument of the Apostle.

The sons of Levi in their capacity as priests received tithes from the people according to the law; yet these men, says verse 8, were mortal, but Melchisedec, in type, "liveth". Levi was in the loins of his father Abraham when the tithe was given, and so, in practice, the whole priesthood of Israel acknowledged the superiority of the order of Melchisedec. Not only is Melchisedec's greatness manifested in what Abraham gave to him, but also in what he, Melchisedec, gave to Abraham:

"But he whose genealogy is not reckoned from them
(1) received tithes from Abraham, and
(2) blessed him that had the promises" (verse 6).

The greater Abraham is made to appear, the greater must Melchisedec be, for "without all contradiction the less is blessed of the better" (verse 7). Abraham is specially marked out as "the patriarch" and "he who received the promises". That this receiving of the promises was no small thing Heb. vi. 13-16 bears witness. Nevertheless it was Melchisedec who blessed Abraham.

We have now passed in review the fourth of a series of comparisons instituted with the object of showing the greatness of Christ. We have in:

(1) Chapter i. His superiority to ANGELS. He the Son. They the ministers.
(2) Chapter iii. His superiority to MOSES. He the Son. Moses the servant.

(3) Chapter iv. His superiority to JOSHUA. Jesus, the Son of God (verse 14). Joshua, the son of Nun (verse 8).

(4) Chapters v. to vii. His superiority to AARON. The Levitical priesthood is filled by men who die. The oath consecrates the Son as priest in the power of endless life.

The way is now clear for the Apostle's teaching concerning perfection, which has never been lost sight of, although to our lesser minds, the amount of detail and involved argument may seem to indicate a departure from the original purpose. "If therefore perfection . . . . ." is the writer's argument from all that has been under review, and this we must now ponder.

The changed order (vii. 11 - 18)

Having considered together verses 1-10 of chapter vii., and having seen the greatness of the Melchisedec priesthood, we are prepared for the transference of that greatness to Christ, and for its connection with the great theme of perfection. Before attempting any further detail it will be a safeguard for us to have the broad outline of that great section which is devoted to the Priesthood and Sacrifice of Christ.

Hebrews vii. 1 to x. 18.

A | vii. 1-10. This Man (4). A priest—eis to dienekes.
  B | vii. 11 - x. 4. PERFECTION. |
    c1 | vii. 11. No perfection by Levitical priesthood and carnal commandment.
      d1 | vii. 12-18. But by Melchisedec priesthood.
    c2 | vii. 19. No perfection by law.
      d2 | vii. 20 - ix. 8. But by the oath to the Son.
    c3 | ix. 9, 10. No perfection by carnal ordinances.
      d3 | ix. 11-28. But by perfect Tabernacle and better sacrifice.
    c4 | x. 1-4. No perfection by sacrifices of the law.
A | x. 5-18. "But this Man" (12). As Priest sat down—eis to dienekes.

To some minds Scriptural structures make no appeal. The subject before us is so solemn and so vital that we feel much blessed truth will lose its force if not seen as a whole. Therefore we tarry to draw attention to the lesson of the above structure. It will be noticed that the opening and closing members are to do with the Melchisedec priesthood of Christ in several important particulars.

(1) "THIS MAN" Chapter vii. 4, by using the expression, draws attention to the greatness of Melchisedec above both Abraham and Levi.

(2) "BUT THIS MAN" of chapter x. 12 takes up the theme with reference to the superiority of the Sacrifice and Priesthood of Christ.

(3) Both passages focus upon one peculiar expression, viz. eis to dienekes. This phrase occurs in Heb. vii. 3; x. 1, 12 and 14 and nowhere else in the New Testament. It is translated twice "continually" and twice "for ever". "For a continuance" is a good rendering. In the case of the type, Melchisedec, the silence of Scripture as to his "beginning" of days or "end" of life sets him forth typically as a priest after the power of an endless life. In the case of Christ, the antitype, the contrast is between the priest who “standeth daily ministering and offering oftentimes the same sacrifices which can never take away sins”, and Christ, “Who, after He had offered one sacrifice (in contrast with the "offering oftentimes") for sins (in contrast with those sacrifices which could never take away sins)” “sat down for a continuance” (instead of repeatedly going over the same ritual, “standing daily”).

Things that make for perfection.

If we take note of these opening and closing sections therefore, it becomes evident that “perfection” cannot possibly be attained under the ministry of priests who themselves needed an offering for their own sins, who were made after the law of a commandment which respected their mortal condition, and whose service stood in meats and drinks and baptisms, “carnal ordinances”, that really indicated that the way into the Holiest of all had not as then been opened. Such ordinances and sacrifices failing to touch the conscience, failed altogether, and were only “shadows” and “not the very image” of the good things to come.

To believers who were never brought up under the law, who never boasted in “the glory and the covenant, and the giving of the law, and the service of God”, the turning from the shadow of Aaron, his tabernacle, his priesthood and his sacrifices, to the reality Christ, heaven itself, the one great Sacrifice and the abiding Priesthood, seems a simple act of reasonable faith. To the Hebrew, cradled in the thought that of all nations the nation of Israel alone had the oracles of God, such a turning would be a wrench, a rupture, a counting “gain” as “loss” and as so much “refuse” (Phil. iii. 8). Therefore God in His kindness and His condescension reasons with them step by step, until the last ground of boasting in the law is destroyed and Christ is seen as all in all.

We commence therefore the new section with an argument:

> “If therefore perfection were by the Levitical priesthood, (for under it the people received the law,) what further need was there that another Priest should rise after the order of Melchisedec, and not be called after the order of Aaron?” (Heb. vii. 11).

In David’s time the service of God’s house was raised to its greatest height. If David himself did not actually build the Temple, the complete revelation was made to him of that house, exceeding magnifical with its golden vessels, its courses of priests, its wonderful psalms. Yet it is David and no other who gives us Psa. cx. saying:

> “The Lord said unto my LORD, Sit thou at My right hand, until I make Thine enemies Thy footstool . . . . . The LORD hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec” (verses 1 and 4).

The Apostle, therefore, asks a pointed question, what further need for another Priest, of another order, if perfection were attainable under the Levitical priesthood? Of all the reasons that are most trenchant that which is given in parenthesis is the one, viz., “For under it the people received the law” (verse 11).

Perfection and Legalism

It has been objected that the giving of the law from Mount Sinai preceded and did not follow the setting up of the Levitical priesthood. We do not think the expression "received the law" refers to the giving of the law at Sinai, and that it is hardly a good translation. In chapter iv. 2 we find that the people were "evangelized", here, in vii. 11, we see that with the institution of the Levitical priesthood the people were "legalized". They were shut up to carnal ordinances, mortal priests, and the blood of bulls and of goats, until Christ should come Who by His offering should "take away the first, that He may establish the second" (Heb. x. 9).

> "For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law" (Heb. vii. 12).

This was a sore point with the Jew. Stephen was stoned to death because they said that he taught that:

> "Jesus of Nazareth shall . . . . . change the customs which Moses delivered us" (Acts vi. 14).

The same charge was brought against Paul:

> "Men of Israel, help: This is the man, that teacheth all men every where against the people, and the law, and this place (the Temple)" (Acts xxi. 28).

Those who had become believers from among Israel still retained their regard for the law:

> "Thou seest, brother, how many thousands of Jews there are which believe; and they are all zealous of the law: and they are informed of thee, that thou teachest all the Jews which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, saying that they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs" (Acts xxi. 20, 21).

It is evident that in dealing with the change of law and priesthood, the Apostle had a delicate task before him, and whereas the Gentile could easily grant the whole situation without scruple, the whole constitution of the Jew rebelled against the very idea. So it is that we have so much detail, and the consideration of the subject from so many different points of view. In the section vii. 11-18, the argument revolves round the fact that the Old Testament recognizes a change in the order of priesthood. In the law, priesthood is exclusively connected with one tribe, LEVI. Christ however sprang out of JUDAH, but of this "Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood" (verse 14). "It is evident", said the Apostle, "that our Lord sprang out of Judah". It is more abundantly "downright evident" (as the words may be rendered), that the priesthood and the law with it must be set aside, for the Scripture testifies:

> "Thou art a Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec" (Heb. vii. 17).

The new Priesthood differs from that of the Levitical order in one grand particular. The Levitical priest was made:

"After the law of a carnal commandment" (verse 16), but the Melchisedec order was made:

"After the power of an endless life" (verse 16).

One more item is added before this section concludes, and that is, not only does the change of priesthood necessitate the setting aside of the law, but the necessity to have such a change indicates the failure of that law so far as "perfection" is concerned:

"There is, moreover, a setting aside of the preceding law, because it was inefficient and unprofitable" (verse 18).

In verse 16 the law was spoken of as "carnal". While viewed in itself the law is "holy, just and good", that same law is "weak through the flesh" and "though ordained to life" will be found "unto death" (Rom. vii.). The sentiment of Heb. vii. 11 is repeated in viii. 7:

vii. 11-18. a | Question—"If perfection were by the Levitical order?"
b | What need for another priesthood?
c | The law abrogated, as weak and profitless.
viii. 7, 8. a | Question—"If the first covenant were faultless?"
b | What need for seeking a second covenant?
c | Finding fault, He said, "I make a new covenant".

The theme of the first passage (vii. 11-18) is the better Priesthood, the theme of the second (viii. 7, 8) is the better Covenant.

All this was necessary to clear the way for a faith that would behold with single eye the Lord Jesus Christ as Prophet, Priest, King and Sacrifice, and the "perfecter of faith".

Salvation unto the uttermost, or what the law could not do (vii. 19-25).

No perfection or maturity is possible under the Levitical priesthood, therefore the greater reason for thankfully believing Him Who is a Priest after the order of Melchisedec. Such is the argument and conclusion of vii. 11-18. In verse 11 there is a parenthesis, viz., "for under it the people received the law"; this parenthesis is now brought forward and dealt with in the same way as was the Levitical priesthood:

"For the law perfected nothing (or no one), but the superinduction of a better hope (did), through which we draw nigh to God" (verse 19 not AV JP).

The three items of this verse characterize the whole section of vii. 19 - ix. 8:

(1) The failure of the law.
(2) The better hope, wherewith are connected better promises and a better covenant.
(3) Access to God. Positively stated to be through Christ (vii. 25). Denied throughout the typical dispensation (ix. 8).

We would draw the attention of the reader to the fact that the analysis of Heb. vii. 1 - x. 18 set out on page 143 of this study is not a copy of any other existing writing on the subject. We have sought to follow the theme of the epistle, and the results are set out here for the benefit of all fellow 'Bereans' who value the truth.

Hebrews vii. 19 - ix. 8

A | vii. 19-21. | a | The law perfected no one.
b | The oath and the priesthood.
B | vii. 22. "By so much." Jesus the surety of a better covenant.
C | vii. 23-27. | c | Salvation to the uttermost.
d | He needeth not to offer for His own sins.
A | vii. 28. | a | The law ordains infirm men.
b | The oath ordains the Son ("consecrated"—Gk. "perfected").

Note: viii. 1-5 is parenthetical reference to true Tabernacle and ministry.

B | viii. 6-13. "By how much." Mediator of the better covenant.

Note: ix. 1-6 is parenthetical reference to typical Tabernacle and ministry.

C | ix. 7, 8. | d | The high priest offered for himself as well as the people.
c | The way into the holiest not made manifest.

The three items indicated in verse 19 are seen under the three letters "A", "B" and "C".

Access to God is a privilege beyond human computation, and this was not possible under the Levitical priesthood or the law, by reason of the weakness of a system that made such demands on the flesh. Throughout the dispensation of the law is the "fear of death" which Heb. ii. 15 declared held the Old Testament saints in bondage, and the crying need for a Priest Who stood in the power of an endless life, in other words the risen Son of God.

The superinduction of the better hope.

Let us now give attention to verse 19. If it says the law perfected nothing, it leads on to say that something else did. The second part of the verse is elliptical. Something is omitted which we must supply in order to get the sense. A closely parallel passage is that of Rom. viii. 3:

> "For what the law could not do . . . . . God (did by) sending His Own Son", is the sequel, but the word "did" has to be supplied.

There are some who understand Heb. vii. 19 to mean this:

> "The law perfected nothing, but it was the bringing in of a better hope through which we draw nigh unto God."

This is true. The law contained type and shadow that ever pointed to Christ. It did not reach the end itself, but it did bring in the better hope that attained unto it. This however, while being true, is not the teaching of the verse before us so far as we understand it. The better hope is said to have been "superinducted", epeisagoge which this Greek word means. In Gal. iii. 19 the law which was "superadded" was "for the sake of transgressions" and was to operate "till the Seed should come", when it would be abrogated as being "weak and unprofitable", failing as it did to touch the conscience.

When the fullness of time came and the Son of God entered into His office, there was the "superinduction" of a better hope which set aside the types and shadows, and actually did give access to God. It is called "a better hope". This better hope does not look for an entrance into the land of promise, but looks for "a better country, an heavenly". It is connected with a "better Covenant", in contrast with the old Covenant that was made after the exodus and before the land of promise was reached. "Better promises" lie behind this hope, a "better resurrection" lies ahead, and "better sacrifices", or an infinitely better sacrifice, lie beneath.

This better hope brings us nigh unto God. This is what the law could not do, and therefore this access to God must be intimately connected with "perfection". That this is literally so will be found in the case of Christ:

> "We* have such an High Priest, Who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens" (viii. 1).

[* - While we avoid continual reminders that "we" were never under the old covenant, and that our blessings do not flow from the New Covenant, we nevertheless stress the value to us of the teaching of Hebrews, as parallel but not identical with the place occupied by Philippians in the dispensation of the Mystery. This parallel will be exhibited at the close of the present series.]

As the Perfecter of faith He is:

> "set down at the right hand of the throne of God" (xii. 2).

In the Spirit, we, through Him, draw nigh now, but this only pledges actual access when the day arrives for the redemption of the purchased possession. The superiority of this better hope lies in the superiority of its Mediator. That superiority has been shown in various ways. The particular thought before us in verses 20-22 lies in the fact that the Lord Jesus was made a Priest by oath.

The oath that perfects.

The argument is found in the words:

> "Inasmuch . . . . . by so much . . . . ." (Heb. vii. 20-22).

The intervening passages give the fact of the oath, and the result, the better Covenant. The hope and the Covenant were "better" in the same proportion that the pre-eminence of the Melchisedec priesthood was above that of Aaron. That preeminence is discovered in the "oath".

The force of the oath and its bearing upon the subject is found in the added words "and will not repent". The Priesthood of Christ was immutably secure. Not only was there this attribute of immutability connected with this Priesthood arising out of the nature of the oath sworn by God, but further, it arises out of the fact that He ever liveth:

> "And they truly were many priests, because they were not suffered to continue by reason of death: but this Man, because He continues (as a priest) for ever (the age), hath an unchangeable (intransferable) Priesthood" (verses 23 and 24).

Note the argument in the word "continue" or "abide" in verse 3 which speaks of the character of the Priesthood and not of life itself. Aparabatos (verse 24) means something more than "unchangeable"; it means incapable of transmission or of transference. Christ as the Melchisedec Priest has no need to secure a successor. His Priesthood is never terminated by death.

> "By so much was Jesus made a surety of a better testament (covenant)" (verse 22).

The word "surety" is egguos, and is allied to eggizo, "to draw nigh" of verse 19. As we have before noted, the Old Covenant failed to "bring us to God", the New Covenant gloriously succeeds. The "us" and the "we" referring to those Hebrews and not to Gentiles as described in Eph. ii. 11, 12. The surety of that New Covenant is not the blood of bulls or goats, but the blood of Christ. Of such a Priest and such a Surety the Apostle says:

> "Wherefore He is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them" (verse 25).

We need to ponder these words, or else we may miss the sense.

> "He is able to save" . That is a blessed fact.
> "He is able also to save" suggests something in addition.
> "He is able also to save to the UTTERMOST" reveals what that addition is.

Salvation unto all perfection.

Once more we are not concerned with initial salvation but with the "so great salvation" which the Hebrews were in danger of letting slip (Heb. ii.). This is the "aionian salvation" connected with obedience and suffering that makes perfect (Heb. v.). To the uttermost is eis to panteles. Panteles is from pan, all, and telos, end, from which we obtain teleiosis, perfection. He is able not only to save so that condemnation is avoided, but He is able ALSO to save unto all perfection those that come unto God by Him. He accomplishes this "uttermost" salvation by "intercession". This word "intercession" is not limited to the sense of supplication, but to the extension of aid of any sort.

If this "salvation" be taken to indicate salvation in the evangelical sense, shall we not find a difficulty in making that salvation depend upon the Lord's present intercession? He is attending to this "uttermost" salvation in His office as High Priest:

> "Wherefore in all things it behooved Him to be made like unto His brethren, that He might be a merciful and faithful High Priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people. For in that He Himself hath suffered being tempted, He is able to succour them that are tempted" (Heb. ii. 17, 18).

This is salvation eis to panteles; the Lord not only saves all that trust in Him, but He is able also to save right through to the end, or goal, through temptation and trial. It is this that makes the "better hope" an anchor for the soul. He Who is its sure anchorage has "suffered being tempted":

> "For we have not an High Priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin (sin excepted)" (Heb. iv. 15).

No.37. The principal thing. A seated Priest in a heavenly sanctuary (viii. 1, 2).

pp. 174 - 178

The ruling theme of this epistle is that of 'perfection' and chapters v.-x. are occupied with the office of Christ as Priest after the order of Melchisedec, and with His one great Offering. Both the priesthood the sacrifice and the heavenly tabernacle are verbally connected with 'perfection'.

The Priest of the perfect.

The reservation of the Apostle manifested in v. 11 indicates that the doctrine associated with this Priesthood is by no means elementary, but can only be appreciated by those of "full age", or as the word is, "the perfect" (v. 14).

This Priesthood is also closely associated with another aspect of "perfection" namely, that of the "overcomer". This is indicated by the first appearance of Melchisedec in Scripture when he met Abraham, the overcomer, returning from the slaughter of the kings.

A comparison and a contrast.

Heb. v. opens with a description of the service of the high priest. He offered both gifts and sacrifices, and also had compassion on the ignorant. His limitations are indicated by the fact that:

> "He himself also is compassed with infirmity. And by reason hereof he ought, as for the people, so also for himself, to offer for sins" (v. 2, 3).

The Apostle proceeds to develop in some detail a comparison and a contrast.

The comparison. Chapter v. 7-9 with its reference to Gethsemane reveals in Christ a High Priest Who can have compassion, because He Himself had suffered being tempted. The glorious superiority of Christ's Melchisedec Priesthood occupies chapters vi. & vii. reaching its zenith in the record of that perfected Priest Who is able to save unto all perfection all that come unto God by Him.

The contrast. The Apostle returns after this climax has been reached to point a contrast, taking up the statement made in v. 3 saying:

> "For such an high Priest became us, Who is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens; WHO NEEDETH NOT daily, as those high priests, to offer up sacrifice, first for His own sins, and then for the people's: for this He did once, when He offered up Himself" (vii. 26, 27).

This truth has already found expression in Heb. iv. 14, 15; there we find reference to Christ as Priest Who has "passed through the heavens", Who is touched "by the feeling of infirmities", Who was nevertheless separate from sinners, "yet without sin" or "sin excepted", i.e. the temptations of the wilderness pilgrimage are uppermost; choris, "without", is used as in Heb. ix. 28.

Sin and its relation to Christ.

Scripture is never ambiguous where the personal sinlessness of the Lord is involved. If Heb. iv. 14, 15 shows the Lord identifying Himself with His people in their trials, it immediately adds "sin excepted". If II Cor. v. 21 shows the Lord in His sacrifice was identified with sin, it immediately adds, "Who knew no sin". If Rom. viii. 3 shows the Lord identified with flesh and blood, the sinlessness of Christ is expressed in the words "the likeness of sinful flesh". As this subject is one of the first importance, let us pause to examine the words of Heb. vii. 26 concerning the sinlessness of the Lord Jesus.

A fourfold testimony.

HOLY. There are three Greek words which are translated in the A.V. by the word "holy", they are hagios, hosios and hieros. Hosios is the word used here. Its first occurrence in Acts ii. 27:

> "Neither wilt Thou suffer Thine Holy One to see corruption."

Hosios is used in the LXX to translate the Hebrew word chasid, which is rendered not only by the word "holy", but also by "merciful". Hagios implies the thought of separation, but hosios suggests holiness that can stoop to have mercy upon those who are in themselves defiled, without contracting defilement thereby.

The Syriac version uses a word here that means "pure". This blessed character was our Saviour's from birth. It is not an acquired holiness, but inherent. We can appreciate the choice of this particular word in the message of the angel to Mary in Luke i. 35:

"The power of the Highest shall overshadow thee; therefore also that HOLY THING which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God."

Such was His nature. His acts were in perfect harmony with His inherent holiness.

HARMLESS (akakos). This word occurs in but one other passage, viz., Rom. xvi. 18 where it is translated "simple". In the LXX version of Psa. xxvi., akakos occurs in verses 1 and 11, where the A.V. reads "integrity". The intervening verses 2-10 are a practical expansion of the meaning of akakos. Reins and heart examined and tried (verse 2). No fellowship with vain persons and dissemblers, but rather hatred of all wicked works (4, 5), and so throughout the Psalm. All this and more is true of the Lord Jesus.

As concerning hosios ("holy"), Scripture declares "He knew no sin"; as concerning akakos ("harmless"), Scripture declares "He did no sin, neither was there guile found in His mouth". The blessed man of Psa. i. and the Holy One of Psalms xv. and xvi. is Christ.

UNDEFILED (amiantos). This word occurs in Heb. xiii. 4; James i. 27; I Pet. i. 4. The difference between akakos and amiantos is that in the former the truth conveyed is that the Lord did no evil, while in the latter the truth is that He could not be contaminated by evil in any one sense. He touched a leper, but He needed no cleansing. A woman with an issue of blood touched Him, and while virtue went out of Him to her, no contamination passed from her to Him. In the midst of publicans and harlots, called by the Pharisees, "a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber, and friend of publicans and sinners", He ever remained "the Lamb without blemish and without spot". Without natural blemish (the thought in akakos), without contracted spot (amiantos).

In all this the Lord Jesus transcended the type. The Tabernacle needed an atonement by reason of the uncleanness of Israel (Lev. xvi. 16), but such cleansing was unnecessary to the Lord. The Levitical priesthood sinned and needed a sacrifice. The Lord knew no sin, did no sin, and needed no sacrifice. Earthly priesthood terminates at death. The Lord ever liveth and His Priesthood is intransmissible. In all these respects the Lord was, SEPARATE FROM SINNERS. This we may see from two points of view.

(1) As to His manhood. Born of a woman, yet from birth "that holy thing", and while being made partaker of flesh and blood, nevertheless coming in the "likeness" only of sinful flesh.

The verb chorizo "separate", enforces the translation "sin excepted" or "apart from sin" in Heb. iv. 15.

(2) As to His manner of life. He was truly man. He ate, He drank, He slept, worked, suffered, died. To the woman of Samaria He was "a Jew" (John iv. 9). To His fellow-townsmen He was "Joseph's son" (John vi. 42), yet throughout His Life He was ever "separate from sinners". Even though a disciple leaned upon the bosom of the Lord at supper, never once do we find a follower of the Saviour addressing Him as "Jesus". Shall His condescension, His sympathy, His fellowship warrant unholy familiarity? Believers, let us remember that He is our Lord, and let us render the honour due unto His name.

Thus we have four statements, arranged in two pairs, indicating for our comfort the High Priest that "became us".

HOLY \ HARMLESS / As to nature
UNDEFILED \
SEPARATE FROM SINNERS / As to practice.

Heaven itself.

It is evident that this Priest could not be a minister of the earthly and typical Tabernacle. His peculiar separateness proclaims Him to be the minister of the true Tabernacle "heaven itself". Therefore the Apostle continues, "and made higher than the heavens".

There is as much stress placed upon the heavenly character of the Lord's Priesthood as upon His sinlessness. It will be of service to note some of the statements of Scripture under this head:

> "Seeing then that we have a great High Priest, that is passed into (through) the heavens, Jesus the Son of God" (Heb. iv. 14).
> "We have such an High Priest, Who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens" (Heb. viii. 1).

The heavenly Priesthood of Christ receives its fullest exposition in chaps. viii. and ix., and reaches its climax in ix. 24:

> "For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into HEAVEN ITSELF, now to appear in the presence of God for us."

The one Offering once for all.

Before the Apostle can proceed to the expansion of the subject of the heavenly ministry of the Lord, it is necessary that one matter shall be dealt with, which if left ambiguous might lead to deadly error. The earthly high priest not only offered up sacrifice for the sins of the people, but he was obliged also to offer a sacrifice:

> "First for his own sins" (Heb. vii. 27 cf. Heb. v. 3).

Here we perceive a strong contrast, for the heavenly Priest was "holy, harmless, undefiled", and therefore needed no sacrifice for Himself. When He died, He died "the JUST for the unjust", consequently He:

"He needeth not daily, as those high priests, to offer up sacrifice, first for His own sins, and then for the people's: for this He did once, when He offered up Himself" (Heb. vii. 27).

In seeking out the argument of this epistle the reader is called upon to exercise continual watchfulness. We found that the consideration of the heavenly ministry of the Lord was postponed in order that the question of His one Offering might be dealt with, and now we shall find that the consideration of two features of that Offering mentioned in vii. 27 is deferred until the heavenly ministry has been more fully opened up.

No.38. Boldness to enter (viii. - x.).
pp. 191 - 196

We have had before us some wonderful statements concerning the office of Christ as the heavenly High Priest, and of His personal character, holy, harmless, undefiled and separate from sinners. We must now continue the pursuit of this most important theme, and note that the two features that await exposition are:

(1) The fact that the Lord offered one Sacrifice once for all.
(2) The fact that He offered, not bulls and goats, but that He offered up Himself.

One further item is necessary to complete the list of the distinctive features of the Lord's High Priesthood, and that is:

The law and the oath.

"For the law maketh men high priests which have infirmity; but the word of the oath, which was since the law, maketh the Son, Who is consecrated for evermore (PERFECTED unto the age)" (Heb. vii. 28).

There are two items here that demonstrate the superiority of the Priesthood of the Son. They are:

(1) The oath compared with the law as to immutability. The oath is more solemn, and its immutability is indicated in Heb. vi. 17.
(2) The oath and the law as to sequence. The oath was made "since the law", and what this implies is explained in Heb. vii. 11:

"If therefore PERFECTION were by the Levitical priesthood . . . . . what further need was there that another Priest should rise after the order of Melchisedec, and not be called after the order of Aaron?" (vii. 11).

That question has now received its answer. Perfection could only come through the Priest after the order of Melchisedec whose Priesthood is not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life. All truth, whether dispensational, foundational or experimental, focuses upon the Person of the risen Christ. The whole fabric of Mosaic ritual vanishes into the shadows before the face of Him Who could say, "I am the resurrection and the life".

With the "perfecting of the Son" by the oath, we reach the conclusion of the lengthy comparison commenced in chapter v. Before entering into a detailed examination of the Tabernacle and its sacrifices and seeing them as shadows of the true, a short chapter is devoted to bringing the teaching of chapters v.-vii. to a point: "Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum" (viii. 1).

The principal thing.

The teaching of this passage is something more than a summary. The word kephalaion (sum) may mean the summing up of a number as in Numb. iv. 2, "Take the sum of the sons of Kohath", or it may be the principal part as in Numb. v. 7, "He shall recompense his trespass with the principal thereof". The following translation seems to convey the sense of the passage.

> "The principal thing, however, amongst those things of which we are speaking is that we have such a high Priest Who is seated on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens, a Minister of the sanctuary, and of the true Tabernacle which the Lord pitched and not man" (Heb. viii. 1, 2).

A seated Priest in a heavenly Sanctuary.

It will be well to prepare the reader for the necessity of a certain amount of close attention. The arguments of this central part of Hebrews are involved, and there are, as the Apostle has said, some things "hard to be understood" concerning this heavenly Priesthood. There is a wealth of detail and a formidable series of sub-divisions to exercise our patience, but at the beginning the Apostle would have us look away from these and let our hearts dwell upon "the principal thing". We have a seated Priest; that tells of a finished work. This seated Priest is the Minister of no earthly Tabernacle; He has entered "heaven itself". The consideration of this finished work and this heavenly Tabernacle occupies the bulk of chapters ix. and x.

Just as all the Tabernacle and its service revolve around the ark and mercy seat, so all that the writer has said concerning the excellence of Christ is concentrated upon His once offered Sacrifice. This is the theme that is immediately introduced in viii. 3:

> "For every high priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices: wherefore it is of necessity that this Man have somewhat also to offer."

The "somewhat" suggests something different from the offerings of the law, and verse 4 puts forward the argument that the Lord could have no priesthood on earth, as the prescribed offerings were already ministered by an earthly and an exclusive priesthood. Their service, however, was typical of a higher and a greater.

> "Who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things" (viii. 5).

The Levitical economy was one of type and shadow:

> "As Moses was admonished (or "warned") of God when he was about to make the tabernacle: for, See, saith He, that thou make all things according to the pattern shewed to thee in the mount" (viii. 5).

The fact that Moses was "warned" (see same word in Matt. ii. 22 and Heb. xi. 7), suggests the importance of this typical representation, whilst the parallel in I Chron. xxviii. 11-19 concerning the pattern of the Temple confirms it. The typical teaching of the Tabernacle is enlarged upon in Heb. ix. For the moment we are occupied with the "principal thing", a seated Priest in a heavenly Sanctuary.

The Mediator of a better Covenant.

The excellency of the ministry of this seated Priest is further enforced by the superiority of the Covenant which forms the sphere of His activities. The degree of this superiority is gauged "by how much" the New Covenant is superior to the old. This forms a fruitful line of teaching in II Cor. iii. We have, with the re-introduction of the subject of the Covenant, returned to the argument of Heb. vii. 18, but we have returned with fuller knowledge. There, in vii. 18, we learned that the commandment which appointed the Levitical priesthood was "disannulled" because of its "weakness" and "unprofitableness". Here, in viii. 6-13, we learn that the Covenant with which the Levitical priesthood was associated was likewise set aside as being "not blameless", the Lord "finding fault" with it and introducing the New Covenant as the better hope founded upon better promises, ministered by a better Priest, and ratified by a better Sacrifice.

A lengthy quotation from Jer. xxxi. occupies Heb. viii. 8-12 which testifies in no uncertain way to the nature and scope of the New Covenant.

The New Covenant.

There are still quite a number of God's children who have hazy ideas concerning this New Covenant (or testament as it is translated in Matt. xxvi. 28), therefore it will be helpful if we set out its chief features from the passage before us, before passing on to chapter ix.

(1) The New Covenant is made with Israel and Judah and with no other people.
(2) It was not engraven upon stone as at Sinai, but written upon the heart.
(3) The Old Covenant was connected with the exodus from Egypt, and its commemorative feast was the Passover, whilst the New Covenant is connected with a greater and a spiritual deliverance, and its commemorative feast was instituted at the Passover by the Lord (Matt. xxvi. 28).
(4) It is essentially connected with the national restoration of Israel (Jer. xxxi. 35-40).
(5) The only reference to this New Covenant memorial feast, outside the three synoptic gospels (for John omits it) is in that section of I Corinthians, that is addressed to those whose "Fathers" went through the Red Sea. This section covers chapters x. and xi. With chapter xii. the Apostle addresses those who were "Gentiles" and who had been idolators (I Cor. xii. 1-2).

The Apostle sums up the matter for us in Heb. viii. 13:

> "In that He saith, A new covenant, He hath made the first old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away."

But Thou remainest.

In chapter i. the present creation is said to wax old and pass away, and in contrast with this is placed the Lord of Whom it says, "but Thou remainest". At the end of the epistle the same truth emerges, viz., "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and today, and for the age". This is the blessed truth of chapters viii. and ix. Here in viii. 13 we have the waxing old and the passing away of the Old Covenant in contrast with the unchanging Priesthood and heavenly sanctuary of the New Covenant.

A greater and more perfect Tabernacle.

In the structure of Heb. vii. 1 - x. 18, it will be observed that the member governed by the title, "The oath to the Son", extends from vii. 20 - ix. 8, where we reach another member entitled, "No perfection by carnal ordinances". Chapter ix. 1-8 therefore concludes the section commenced in vii. 20.

Hebrews ix. 1 - 8

A | 1. The first Covenant.
B | 2-. The Tabernacle prepared (kataskeuazo).
C | -2-5. The contents. In the first; in the second.
B | 6-. These things prepared (kataskeuazo).
C | -6, 7. The priests. In the first; in the second.
A | 8. The first Tabernacle.

Two features of the first Covenant are considered:

(1) Ordinances of divine service.
(2) A worldly sanctuary.

A great controversy has arisen over the meaning of "the worldly sanctuary". The word "worldly" is a translation of kosmikon, which occurs in one other place in the N.T. viz., Titus ii. 12. It does not occur in the LXX. One of the causes of diversity in translation is that the "world" and "worldliness" are contrary to anything to do with a "sanctuary". Kosmikon is cognate with kosmion, which is translated "modest" in I Tim. ii. 9, and with kosmeo, which is translated "adorn" in the same verse. The underlying idea of both words is that of something orderly. Rotherham accordingly translates the passage in Heb. ix. 1:

> "Even the holy ritual well arranged."

Some, because of certain remarks made by Josephus and Philo, consider that the intention of the apostle was to show that the Tabernacle typified the world. Those who desire a detailed examination of the various renderings should consult the note in Bloomfield's Greek Testament, ninth edition, and for an extended reference to the present creation as a tabernacle, the series entitle The Pleroma which commenced in Vol. XLI should be considered

Not made with hands.

The simple explanation of the word kosmikon ("worldly") is discovered in the purpose of the Apostle, who sets the earthly type over against the heavenly reality, the true, the heavenly Tabernacle, "which the Lord pitched and not man", and which was "not made with hands, that is to say not of this creation". The holy places made with hands are called "figures of the true", the true Tabernacle being called "heaven itself" (Heb. ix. 24).

As the Priest and the Offering constitute "the principal thing", the Apostle passes over without comment for the time being the various articles of furniture used in the Tabernacle, their typical teaching not being contributory to the theme of the epistle. We must stay to observe here that the articles of furniture fall into two groups, viz., (1) those in the holy place, and (2) those in the most holy place.

(I) IN THE HOLY PLACE
- (1) The candlestick
- (2) The table
- (3) The shewbread

(II) IN THE MOST HOLY PLACE
- (1) The censer
- (2) The ark
- (3) The golden pot of manna
- (4) Aaron's rod that budded
- (5) The tables of the covenant
- (6) The cherubim of glory
- (7) The mercy seat

"Of which we cannot now speak particularly."

A lesson enforced.

It will be noticed that the golden altar of incense is omitted from the first list, and that a golden censer is added to the second list. If we interpret the golden censer as the golden altar, as some do, then we make the Apostle to teach that the golden altar was in "the holiest of all", which it certainly was not. The LXX uses the word thumiaterion ("censer") in II Chron. xxvi. 19 and Ezek. viii. 11, where both passages read "censer" and can mean nothing else.

It seems to be the intention of the writer to enforce the lesson of the epistle by this somewhat unexpected alteration. Both the golden altar and the censer speak of intercession, and our hearts are directed upward to the right hand of God, where the great High Priest ever liveth to make intercession, having passed into the heavenly holiest of all. We read in Lev. xvi. 12, 13 that the high priest took a censer full of burning coals of fire from off the altar and made a cloud of incense to cover the mercy seat, and this type of the interceding priest penetrating beyond the veil is the feature seized upon by the Apostle and emphasized in this way.

The Holy Ghost this signifying.

At Heb. ix. 6 the subject is resumed, saying, "Now when these things were thus ordained". We have drawn attention in the structure to the fact that the words "ordained" in verse 6 and "made" in verse 2 are the same in the original, and should read in both cases "prepared". Immediately the great question of priestly service is brought forward, and contrasts the typical with the true. Into the first Tabernacle the priests had continual access, entering daily in the course of their office, but:

> "Into the second went the high priest alone once every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself, and for the errors of the people" (Heb. ix. 7).

The particular period to which this passage refers is that section of Lev. xvi. which speaks of the Day of Atonement. There we read of the censer and its use (verse 13). There we read of the blood:

> "Then shall he kill the goat of the sin offering, that is for the people, and bring his blood within the vail" (verse 15).

There too we read:

> "There shall be no man in the tabernacle of the congregation when he goeth in to make an atonement" (verse 17).

From these and similar passages the Apostle draws a negative argument, then pursuing the theme through into Heb. x., he rounds off the examination with a positive argument. It will make the line of argument clearer for us if we place the two passages together.

The Negative.

> "The Holy Ghost this signifying, that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing" (ix. 8).

The Positive.

> "Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way" (x. 19, 20).

In these two passages lies practically the whole of the argument, and if we can keep this well in mind, the details, instead of bewildering us, will lend point and force to the glorious conclusion.

No.39. A Figure for the time (vii. 26 - ix. 20).
pp. 212 - 219

Returning to chapter ix., we learn that the way into the holiest was not made manifest because of the character of the sacrifice and the service connected with that period. It is stimulating to observe the sturdy faith of the Apostle in Holy Scripture—"The Holy Ghost this signifying". How impossible it is for one who denies the inspiration of all Scripture really to benefit by its study! However varied and strange "the sundry times and divers manners" may have been, the teaching of Heb. i. 1 is that "God spake". So in Heb. iii. 7, where Psa. xcv. is quoted, the Apostle says, "As the Holy Ghost saith".

To come now to the peculiar character of the earlier dispensation. Before the coming of Christ all were "shut up unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed" (Gal. iii. 23). The service of the priests is called "the example and shadow of heavenly things" (Heb. viii. 5). The law is said to have "a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image" (x. 1). So here, the Tabernacle and its services are said to be "a figure" (ix. 9). The word is literally a "parable". A reference to Ezek. xx. 49; Psa. xlix. 4; lxxviii. 2; Matt. xiii. 10:13 and John xvi. 28, 29 will show that an element of obscurity is connected with a parable. Heb. ix. 9 tells us that this particular parable remained "unto the present time" (which we believe to be the true rendering of this passage). Now that Christ has come, the shadows vanish. All the offerings, sacrifices and services of the Tabernacle, while most wonderfully adapted to their purpose, could never lead to the goal of Hebrews:

> "That could not make him that did the service PERFECT, as pertaining to the conscience" (Heb. ix. 9).

The purpose of the parable.

The dispensational truth related to the use of the parable is too important to pass over without a fuller note. A type sets forth with more or less clearness the reality which it foreshadows and demands an antitype elsewhere. A parable veils truth. It will be remembered that the parables of Matt. xiii. are closely associated with the Lord's rejection (Matt. xi. and xii.) and with the mysteries of the kingdom of the heavens. We have shown elsewhere that the word "mystery" is introduced as a result of the failure of some of the agents and must be kept distinct from the original plan and will of God. When Israel came out of Egypt, they were led by Moses to Sinai. There they were assembled to enter into solemn covenant with the Lord. Here are the terms of that covenant:

> "Now therefore, if ye will obey My voice indeed, and keep My covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto Me above all people: for all the earth is Mine: And ye shall be unto Me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation" (Exod. xix. 5, 6).

When Moses descended from the smoking mountain he spake no word concerning Tabernacle, Ark or Mercy Seat, but solemnly sprinkled the people with the blood of the covenant saying:

> "Behold the blood of the covenant, which the LORD hath made with you concerning all these words" (Exod. xxiv. 8).

After this, Moses re-ascended the mountain in order to receive the tables of stone. During his absence the people, headed by Aaron, broke the solemn Covenant into which they had entered by worshipping the golden calf, for among the "words" which constituted the Covenant were "Thou shalt have no other gods before Me". This Covenant was broken, and Moses manifested it by breaking the tables of stone (Exod. xxxii. 15-19). When the duplicates were given, they were placed in the Ark of the covenant, which Ark was the nucleus and centre of the whole Tabernacle ritual. Strictly speaking therefore, the ten commandments were never given to Israel. Israel's destiny is to be a kingdom of priests. The attaining of that destined end is enshrined in the use of and the meaning of "perfect" (teleios, which is allied with telos, "end"). Israel can never be a kingdom of priests under the Old Covenant that was broken, neither can they reach their goal by the typical ritual of the Tabernacle. "The law made nothing perfect." Israel's "perfection", the attaining unto that for which they had been laid hold of by the Lord (see for parallel thought Phil. iii. 12), can only be accomplished under the New Covenant of which Christ, not Moses, is the Mediator. This New Covenant, it will be observed, is immediately introduced after the comparison between the priesthood of Christ and that of Levi has been made, and we are told that the Levitical priesthood and sacrifices:

> "Could not make him that did the service PERFECT , as pertaining to the conscience" (Heb. ix. 9).

Carnal ordinances.

The Apostle reduces the ceremonial and typical ordinances to two heads, viz.: (1) Meats and drinks; (2) Divers baptisms. A reading of Lev. xi.-xv. will give some idea of his meaning. Writing to Gentile believers in another connection, he says:

> "Touch not; taste not; handle not; which all are to perish with the using" (Col. ii. 21, 22), showing this man-made prohibition is vain. He turns the believer's attention away from the "shadows", for, says he, "the body is of Christ", and directs their hearts and minds to where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. It will be observed that we do not follow the A.V. and translate "divers washings", but use the word "baptisms". This brings the Apostle's argument into line with that of Heb. v. and vi., where, in urging the reader to "go on unto perfection", he says "leave . . . . . not laying again . . . . . the doctrine of baptisms". The one great reason for leaving these gifts and sacrifices, this Tabernacle service, these distinctions between meats and drinks, these washings, dippings and sprinklings, is that they were all "carnal ordinances", and these ordinances can no more lead on unto perfection than could the "carnal commandment" of Heb. vii. 16 "perfect the Son" (vii. 28) in His office as High Priest after the order of Melchisedec.

Until the time of reformation.

Not only were these ordinances "carnal", they were temporary, they were "imposed until the time of reformation" (Heb. ix. 10). The word "imposed" suggests a burden. In Luke v. 1 it is "to press upon" as a crowd, or "to lay on" as a stone on a grave (John xi. 38).

Peter expresses this conception when he speaks of the law as "a yoke which neither our forefathers nor we have been able to bear" (Acts xv. 10). This burden was but for a time "until the time of reformation":

> "The law made nothing perfect, but the bringing in of a better hope did" (Heb. vii. 19).
> "The law was our schoolmaster (pedagogue) unto Christ" (Gal. iii. 24).

REFORMATION. This word bears two meanings:

(1) The idea of getting back to some primitive simplicity that had become obscured, or
(2) The idea of a radical change that reforms the subject.

The Greek word diorthosis (reformation) does not occur elsewhere in the Scriptures, but diorthoo comes in Jer. vii. 3 in the command, "amend your ways". The time of reformation dawned when "grace and truth" came by Jesus Christ, in contrast with the "law that was given by Moses" (John i. 17). This reformation introduced better promises, a better hope, and had as its basis a better Covenant, ministered by Christ the Mediator of the better Covenant. The argument is designed to lead the Hebrew believer to see the temporary character of these laws, which according to the teaching of their Rabbis were eternal and unchanging (see Acts vi. 13, 14). The abiding Priest, the once offered Sacrifice, the unchanging Covenant, the sure and steadfast hope, these touched the conscience, led on to perfection and were found only in Christ.

Hebrews ix. 7 - 12.

A | 7, 8. ONCE every year "not without blood".
B | 9-. The present season.
C | -9. | a | Gifts and sacrifices.
b | No perfection, not touch conscience.
C | 10-. | a | Meats, drinks, baptisms.
b | Carnal ordinances.
B | -10. The season of reformation.
A | 11, 12. ONCE into the holy place, "by His own blood."

Rom. viii. 3 supplies the true comment "weak because of the flesh". But what the law could not do, God has done by sending His Son. This is equally the teaching of Hebrews as it is of Romans. The law concerning the priesthood was weak because of the flesh, and no perfection can come that way. God's answer is Christ, and Christ as the Priest in the power of an endless life. The sacrifices, both in their nature and by their repetition, failed to touch the conscience. He said, "Lo, I come", and coming, set aside all types and shadows by the offering of Himself.

A blessed change.

A new section is introduced with verse 11 and opens with the words "But Christ". Dispensational and doctrinal changes are introduced by some such expression in other places. For example, in Acts xvii. 30:

> "And the times of this ignorance God winked at; BUT NOW commandeth all men every where to repent."

So, in Rom. iii. 21, when the Apostle had brought the whole world in guilty before God, with no hope of righteousness in themselves, he then introduces the wondrous provision of grace with the words:

> "BUT NOW the righteousness of God without the law is manifested."

Both the doctrinal and dispensational portions of Eph. ii. are marked in the same way:

> "BUT GOD Who is rich in mercy . . . . . hath quickened us (made us alive)" (4, 5).
> "BUT NOW in Christ Jesus . . . . . made nigh" (13).

When the Apostle had clearly shown both the weakness and unprofitableness of the dispensation of type and shadow, he swings the door of the new dispensation upon the same hinges, "BUT CHRIST:

> "But Christ being come an High Priest of good things to come" (Heb. ix. 11).

The good things to come must not be interpreted only of the new life and the glory yet to be; they include, and perhaps principally refer to, the dispensational change which set aside the types and shadows, and provide the antitype, Christ. This may be seen by consulting Heb. x. 1:

> "For the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things."

We remember the opening words of chapter viii., and that the "principal thing" is a seated Priest in a heavenly sanctuary. This important fact is again prominent. We have such an High Priest of good things to come, in contrast with those priests whose ministry was confined to shadows. At ix. 11 we have the subject of ix. 1-5 resumed in the words, "By a greater and more perfect Tabernacle". Not only is this Tabernacle "greater and more perfect", it is "not of this creation", for so the word rendered "building" should be translated. The use of this word "creation" is noteworthy, for in II Cor. iii.-v. the New Covenant is linked with the new creation, and both with the reconciliation. Israel were a people of types, and in this they foreshadow the purpose of the ages.

The blood of Christ.

We noted in Heb. ix. 6 and 7, that the high priest entered into the holiest of all once every year, "not without blood". This therefore is the next item to be developed in the argument. Verse 12 continues:

> "Neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by His own blood He entered in once into the holy place, having obtained aeonian redemption for us."

Negatively, Christ entered "NOT with blood of goats and calves". Positively, Christ entered "by His own blood". As to time Christ entered "once", in contrast with the type of verse 7, "once every year". The "aeonian redemption" finds expansion in the succeeding verses.

The importance of the Ascension.

While many are aware of the essential character of the death and resurrection of Christ, all are not so impressed with the importance of His Ascension. Eph. i. 19-23 stresses the ascension of Christ in connection with His present headship of the church which is His Body, and Eph. iv. 8-10 sets forth the triumphant character of His ascension when He led captivity captive. The present dispensation with its fourfold ministry is also essentially related with the ascended Lord (Eph. iv. 11, 12). The high privilege of the believer who has been "made to sit together in the heavenlies in Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 6), and also the power to walk in newness of life, are related to the fact that Christ now "sitteth at the right hand of God" (Col. iii. 1).

Not only do the epistles of the Mystery stress the fact of the Lord's ascension, but the epistle to the Hebrews does also. Let us notice some of the references:

> "When He had by Himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high" (Heb. i. 3).
>
> "We have a great High Priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God" (Heb. iv. 14).
>
> "We have such an High Priest, Who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens" (Heb. viii. 1).
>
> "Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us" (Heb. ix. 24).
>
> "But this man, after He had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down on the right hand of God" (Heb. x. 12).
>
> "Looking unto Jesus . . . . . Who . . . . . is set down at the right hand of the throne of God" (Heb. xii. 2).

These, and all passages which speak of the Lord's heavenly ministry and intercession necessitate the Ascension. We shall understand our calling the better if we keep this fact before us.

Israel, the aeonian people.

It is necessary to remember that the Apostle makes pointed allusion to the great day of atonement in Heb. ix. To this solemn day refer the statements concerning the blood of bulls and goats, as also the entry into the holiest of the high priest alone once every year. The mediation of the high priest on the day of atonement accomplished a reconciliation for the year. In vivid contrast, the effect of Christ's one Offering is called an aeonian redemption, and as it touched the conscience needs no repetition.

> Israel are the aeonian people (Isa. xliv. 7).
> Christ is the author of aeonian salvation (Heb. v. 9).
> By His blood He obtained aeonian redemption (Heb. ix. 12).
> This blood of the New Covenant ensures the aeonian inheritance (Heb. ix. 15).
> The New Covenant itself is called the aeonian covenant (Heb. xiii. 20).

Israel are a typical people, and foreshadow in their calling and history the wider dealings of God with man during the course of the ages.

It now becomes necessary to the argument of the Apostle that he should establish the superiority of the offering of Christ, and this he does by a series of comparisons. The first comparison is drawn between the offerings that were provided by the law to sanctify those who had become unclean, and the cleansing power of the blood of Christ.

Hebrews ix. 13, 14.

A | 13-. For if. The fact assumed.
B | -13-. The blood, and ashes of heifer.
C | -13. Sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh.
A | 14-. How much more. Superiority assumed.
B | -14-. The blood of Christ.
C | -14. Purge conscience from dead works.

The argument cannot be appreciated fully without a knowledge of Numb. xix. There the Lord commands Israel to bring:

(1) A red heifer without spot, wherein is no blemish and upon which never yoke came.
(2) The heifer was slain, and the blood sprinkled before the Tabernacle.
(3) The remaining carcass, together with cedar wood, hyssop and scarlet, was burned, and the ashes gathered and laid up without the camp, with which the water of separation was made.
(4) The defilement which necessitated the application of this water of separation is particularly connected with death.
(5) A person was rendered unclean by touching a dead body, being in a tent wherein a man died, touching a bone or a grave.

It will be seen that some defilement was socially unavoidable. God would not have been pleased with that man who for the avoidance of ceremonial defilement withdrew himself from the dead or the dying. Yet this presses upon us the absolute necessity for the provision for uncleanness, for at times our very duties carry with them defilement, and though "not of the world" we are nevertheless still "in the world", and though we are cleansed completely in one sense, we shall, till our pilgrimage is over, be under the necessity to "wash the feet" continually (John xiii. 10). The emphasis upon death and the dead in Numb. xix. provides the argument of Heb. ix. 14.

Covenant or Testament.

While it is a truth worthy of the fullest emphasis that the cleansing power of the blood of Christ excelled the types and shadows as conscience is greater than ceremony and dead works more defiling than dead bodies, yet this truth is placed here to lead on to another which is vital to the argument of the epistle:

> "And because of this, He is the mediator of a new covenant, so that death having taken place for a redemption of the transgressions against the first covenant, those having been called might receive the promise of aeonian inheritance. For where a covenant exists, it is necessary to bring in the death of the covenant victim, because a covenant is confirmed over dead victims, since it is never valid when the covenant victim is living" (Heb. ix. 15-17).

This, it will be observed, is not a quotation, but a more literal rendering now to be considered.

To introduce the word "testament" here, with its associated ideas of a "will" and the death of the "testator", is foreign both to Hebrew thought and the design of this epistle.

Diatheke occurs in Hebrews seventeen times, and in every occurrence other than those of ix. 15-18 it is used of either the Old or the New Covenant. Heb. ix. 20 reads "the blood of the testament". The passage is a quotation from Exod. xxiv. 8, where the same version reads "the blood of the covenant". The A.V. is obliged to introduce the word "men" into Heb. ix. 17; we translate instead "dead victims", referring to the sacrifices that accompanied the making of the covenant. In Heb. vii. 22 we read:

> "By so much was Jesus made a surety of a better testament (covenant)."

In viii. 6:

> "By how much also He is the mediator of a better covenant."

In xii. 24, in contrast with Mount Sinai and the Old Covenant, is placed Mount Sion and the New Covenant:

> "And to Jesus the mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel."

It is clear from these passages that Heb. ix. 15 speaks not of a testament, but of a covenant in the Hebrew sense of the word. In Heb. viii. 8-12 we have a long quotation from Jer. xxxi. concerning the Old and New Covenants.

In Heb. x. 15-17 this selfsame chapter is quoted again. Heb. ix., which comes in between these two quotations, is written expressly to show that Christ is the Mediator of that very covenant of prophecy, and the word "testament" therefore, instead of helping forward the Apostle's argument, tends to hinder it. After speaking of the sprinkling of the Tabernacle and all the vessels of the ministry, he adds:

> "And almost all things are by the law cleansed by blood; and apart from the shedding of blood is no forgiveness" (Heb. ix. 22 not AV JP).

Having come so far we shall now be able to appreciate the general structure of the chapter, which will be found to be chiefly concerned with:

The Old and the New Covenants.
Hebrews ix. 1 - 20.

A | 1. The First Covenant.
B | 1-10. |
a | 1-7. The Tabernacle. Worldly.
b | 8-10. Its significance. No way in. Conscience untouched.
B | 11-14. |
a | 11. Greater and more perfect Tabernacle.
Not of this creation.
b | 12-14. Its significance. He entered in. Conscience purged.
A | 15-20. The New Covenant.

We shall have to extend this structure to include ix. 21 to x. 18, but this is a member too large and too important to be introduced here. May the Lord Who is magnified in this epistle to the Hebrews be magnified also in the daily life and spiritual conception of those who are blessed under other terms than those of this New Covenant, which forms so important a feature of the epistle to the Hebrews.

Meditations on Psalm LI

No.9. A Just God and a Saviour (verses 14, 15).
pp. 199, 200

A peculiar feature of Hebrew poetry is the rhyming of thought rather than that of sound. There is no example in the poetry of the Scriptures where 'face' rhymes with 'grace', so far as the actual sound is concerned, but the balancing of thought which is much deeper is a characteristic of Hebrew poetry. For example as we have picked upon 'face' and 'grace' the following will illustrate the point.

> "The Lord make His face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee;
> The Lord lift up His countenance upon thee, and give thee peace."

Examples of this repetition of thought can be found at every turn in Hebrew poetry. It is before us in Psa. li.:

> "Restore unto me the joy of Thy salvation;
> And uphold me with Thy free spirit.
> Then will I teach transgressors Thy ways;
> And sinners shall be converted unto Thee.
> Deliver me from bloodguiltiness, O God, ...
> And my tongue shall sing aloud of Thy righteousness.
> O Lord, open Thou my lips;
> And my mouth shall shew forth thy praise."

The alternation, correspondence and expansion of thought is evident to all who read, and too beautiful to spoil by any attempt at dissection. The doctrine contained and enforced by this means claims our attention and to its consideration we now turn. As a consequence of being restored and upheld, David could become a teacher of others, who like himself had fallen by the way. As a consequence of being delivered, his tongue he said would sing aloud of the Lord's righteousness, or as a consequence of opened lips, his mouth would declare the praise of the Lord.

> "Thy ways . . . . . Thy righteousness . . . . . Thy praise."

"Thy ways", taught to transgressors that they may repent, return and walk therein; "Thy righteousness", proclaimed that the plan of salvation may be seen in all its glory; "Thy praise", rendering to such a Saviour and such a God, the glory due to His name. David who knew the law of Moses, as few men have done since, knew that for murder, no provision had been made.

> "Ye shall take no satisfaction for the life of a murderer, which is guilty of death: but he shall be surely put to death" (Numb. xxxv. 31).

His own impetuous judgment and Nathan's denunciation would be in his ears:

> "As the Lord liveth, the man that hath done this thing shall surely die"; "And Nathan said to David, Thou art the man" (II Sam. xii. 5-7).

David could have no hope under the law of Moses. He stood doubly condemned. Condemned by the law and condemned by his own judgment. Yet he was to hear the gracious response to his confession given in verse 13:

> "And David said unto Nathan, I have sinned against the Lord. And Nathan said unto David, The Lord also hath put away thy sin; thou shalt not die" (II Sam. xii. 13).

It was this that enabled David to throw himself upon the tender mercy and loving kindness of the Lord (Psa. li. 1) and to pray.

> "Deliver me from bloodguiltiness, O God, Thou God of my salvation; and my tongue shall sing aloud of Thy righteousness" (Psa. li. 14).

Here is a deliverance that was not provided by the law. Here is a righteousness associated with the salvation that is beyond the law. Here David anticipated the doctrine of the epistle to the Romans, as we learn from Paul himself, for Psa. xxxii. is connected with the same event,

> "Even as David also describeth the blessedness of the man, unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works, Saying, Blessed are they to whom the Lord will not impute sin" (Rom. iv. 6-8).

David knew the God of Whom Isaiah wrote and Paul testified:

> "A Just God and a Saviour."

The One Mediator

No.3. The basic meaning of the words "Mediator".
pp. 38 - 40

The meaning of the English word "mediator" is self evident. It is one of a group of words derived from the Latin medio 'to be in the middle'. Hence medieval is the Latinized form for "The Middle Ages"; while medial, median, mediant, mediocre and even Mediterranean, will occur to most readers. The position occupied by the Mediator is uppermost in the English word "One who comes between" one who occupies a middle place, an 'intermediary'. This English word is a very fair translation of the Greek mesites, which is a compound made of mesos 'middle' and heimi 'to go', 'a go-between'.

The Greek word mesites occurs six times in the N.T. namely in Gal. iii. 19, 20; I Tim. ii. 5; Heb. viii. 6; ix. 15 and xii. 24. To this must be added the word 'confirm' of Heb. vi. 17 mesiteuo, which the A.V. margin reads 'interposed', where we read:

> "Wherein God, willing more abundantly to show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of His counsel confirmed it (or interposed Himself) by an oath."

Josephus uses this word mesiteuo in the passage which deals with the enticement of Israel by the Midianites "This they said with an oath, and called God for an arbitrator of what they had promised".

The association of the word translated 'mediator' in Galatians, I Timothy and Hebrews supply the sacrificial or covenant making conditions that are always mentally attached to the word by Bible students, but the word itself tells us nothing of the office or service rendered, only that it is a position occupied 'between' and 'in the midst'. We must go back to the Hebrew equivalent for a fuller understanding of what is implied in the office of a mediator. This we do by a very slender bridge, for the word mesites occurs but once in the Septuagint version, and that in Job ix. 33 "Neither is there any daysman betwixt us, that might lay his hand upon us both". The margin of both A.V. and R.V. reads 'or Umpire' for "Daysman". The choice of this term by the translators is not very clear, some authorities say that a 'Daysman' refers to a legal adviser or pleader who appeared daily at the law courts in earlier days, and who could be engaged to arbitrate in any dispute. The Septuagint in their translation of the Hebrew of Job ix. 33 appear to have given a paraphrase "ho mesites . . . . . kai elengchon", recognizing that in the Hebrew there is something more suggested than who mediates, as an examination of the original reveals.

A following literal rendering of the Hebrew of Job ix. 33 has been offered 'There is not between us a reprover', which is endorsed by the translation of the LXX version that reads 'Would that there were (one to be) our mediator and reprover'. The word mesites here is evidently the rendering of the Hebrew 'between us', while the 'reprover' is a recognition of the primary meaning of the word translated 'daysman' in our version. It is evident, we trust, that an examination of the Hebrew word translated 'mediator' or 'daysman' is incumbent upon all who would endeavour to understand all that is implied by the N.T. terms.

Yakach. The primary meaning of this word is 'to make manifest, to show plainly'. Gesenius suggests that the word is allied with nekach 'over against' (Exod. xxvi. 35), where something of the thought of balance is resident, and which is also implicit in the office of mediator or umpire. Something of the meaning of the 'daysman' of Job ix. 33 will be seen when we observe that yakach is translated 'come now, and let us reason together' (Isa. i. 18). "That they may judge betwixt us both" (Gen. xxxi. 37). The word occurs 17 times in the book of Job itself, and it will be helpful to have some of the passages with their different translations before us.

"What doth your arguing reprove" (infinitive of the verb) (Job vi. 25).
"What doth your arguing reprove" (future of the verb) (Job vi. 25).
"Do ye imagine to reprove words" (Job vi. 26).
"I would desire to reason with God" (xiii. 3).
"He will surely reprove you" (xiii. 10).
"I will maintain mine own ways" (xv. 15).
"O that one might plead for a man with God" (xvi. 21).
"There was none of you that convinced Job" (xxxii. 12).

When at length Elihu broke silence, he said to Job:

> "Behold, I am according to thy wish in God's stead: I also am formed out of the clay. Behold, my terror shall not make thee afraid, neither shall my hand be heavy upon thee" (Job xxxiii. 6, 7).

Elihu evidently refers to Job's plaint:

> "For He is not a man, as I am, that I should answer Him, and we should come together in judgment. Neither is there any daysman betwixt us, that he might lay his hand upon us both, let Him take His rod away from me, and let not His fear terrify me" (Job ix. 32-34).

Here a number of terms that the N.T. doctrine have filled out with blessing, anticipate the office of the 'One Mediator between God and man'. Let us consider them.

"I am in God's stead." This, said Elihu, was the fulfillment of Job's wish, 'I am toward God' is the R.V. rendering of this passage. Young's literal translates it simply 'For God'.

"In stead" when it means substitution uses the Hebrew tachath as in Gen. iv. 25 'another seed instead of Abel'. But while the Saviour could become a substitute for the sinner, no one can become a substitute for God. The preposition 'l' which is here rendered 'in stead' means rather 'on behalf of God'. This expression must be compared with the words of Paul in II Cor. v. 20:

> "Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you IN CHRIST'S STEAD, be ye reconciled to God."

Neither Paul nor his fellow ministers were ‘substitutes’, they spoke ‘on the behalf of’ (huper) Christ. As a Mediator Christ is ‘on behalf’ both of God and man, not a substitute for God and man, although He is a substitute for sinful man as the sacrifice for sin “He was made sin for us Who knew no sin”.

“I also am formed out of the clay.” Here the frailty of human nature is intended. Eliphaz contrasts ‘angels’ with them that dwell ‘in house of clay, whose foundation is in the dust, which are crushed before the moth’ (Job iv. 19).

Job also refers to the frailty of this mortal body saying:

> “Thine hands have made me and fashioned me together round about . . . . . Thou hast made me of clay; and wilt thou bring me into dust again?” (Job ix. 8, 9).

In all there are seven occurrences of the word chomer in the book of Job translated either ‘clay’ or ‘mire’, four of which refer to the lowly origin of man.

Elihu in the type of the mediator assured job of his essential manhood, even as Paul at a later date, and with fuller light, spoke of “The One Mediator . . . the Man, Christ Jesus”. Elihu places his natural human frailty over against the ‘terror’ induced by the Presence of God apart from mediation. In the passage where Job complained that there was no ‘daysman’ or ‘mediator’ he added:

> “Let Him take His rod away from me, and let not His fear terrify me: then would I speak, and not fear Him; but it is not so with me” (Job ix. 33-35).

Here the word that is translated ‘terror’ in Job xxxiii. 7 is rendered ‘fear’. In Job xiii. 21 it is translated ‘dread’ and in a similar context:

> “Who is he that will plead with me? . . . . . Withdraw Thine hand far from me; and let not Thy dread make me afraid; then call Thou, and I will answer; or let me speak, and answer Thou me” (Job xiii. 19-22).

The R.V. reads “Neither shall my pressure be heavy upon thee” instead of ‘my hand’ as in the A.V.

Ekeph is ‘a burden’, ‘to put a load on a beast (of burden), so to bend, to make a bow down’ and has an Arabic equivalent that means to tie, to bind on a pack saddle. It is allied with the Hebrew kaph which means ‘the palm of the hand’, rarely the whole hand, hence the idea again of pressure. It is this word that is found in Job xiii. 21.

Elihu says much to illuminate the necessary qualifications of a Mediator between God and men, but only fulfilled these qualifications in the measure of a type or shadow. None but Emmanuel “God with us” could lay His hands upon ‘both’, nevertheless as surely as Job knew that His Kinsman-Redeemer lived, so surely does Elihu exemplify in His ministry and teach in his doctrine the need that all men have of Christ in His central capacity as “The One Mediator”.

We must examine a term employed throughout the book of Job in ways that impinge closely upon the office of Mediator in our next study.

No.4. A testimony in its own peculiar season.
pp. 78 - 80

The Apostle Paul follows the statement that Christ is 'the One Mediator' by the words, "To be testified in due time" (I Tim. ii. 6).

The proposition is this. Every dispensational change, or every vital link in the purpose of the ages, is the subject of a separate witness in the N.T.

> The first witness is John the Baptist (John i. 7, 8, 15, 32, 34).
> "Ye sent unto John, and he bare witness unto the truth" (John v. 33).
> John the Apostle is a witness to the finished work (John xix. 35).

The witness of the early Acts is to the Resurrection.

> "Ye shall be witness unto Me" (Acts i. 8).
> "Beginning from the baptism of John, unto the same day that He was taken up from us, must one be ordained to be a witness with us of His resurrection" (Acts i. 22).

Here then is an unbroken chain of evidence, from the baptism of John unto the Ascension. To this of course could be added the supplementary witness recorded in Acts v. 29-32 "And we are His witnesses of these things; and so is also the Holy Ghost Whom God hath given to them that obey Him", or again as it is written in Acts x. 39, 41. At the conversion of the Apostle Paul another phase of witness appears, which was destined to carry the torch of truth to its furthermost bounds. The night following his apprehension by the Roman guard, the Lord appeared to Paul and said "Be of good cheer, Paul; for as thou hast testified of Me in Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at Rome" (Acts xxiii. 11). Here then is a further extension of evidence, linking the apostolic witness at Jerusalem with far off Rome.

At his conversion, Ananias who had been sent by the Lord, said to Paul "The God of our fathers hath chosen thee, that thou shouldst know His will, and see that Just One, and shouldest hear the voice of His mouth, for thou shalt be His witness unto all men of what thou hast seen and heard" (Acts xxii. 14, 15).

The witness of Paul is twofold. The first part of his testimony ended at Ephesus (Acts xx. 21) "Testifying both to the Jews, and also to the Greeks repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ". This testimony, however, came to an end.

> "And now, behold, I know that ye all, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God, shall see my face no more" (Acts xx. 25).

The reason for this is given in verses 22-24:

> "And now, behold, I go bound in the spirit unto Jerusalem . . . . . bonds and afflictions abide me, but none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God."

The twofold witness of the Apostle is categorically stated by the Lord Jesus in Acts xxvi. 16:

> "I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness BOTH of these things which thou hast seen (Acts xxii. 14, 15) and of those things in the which I will appear unto thee."

The testimony here is unmistakable. "Both" must refer to two things. It cannot be used of one only. "These things" are set over against another group called 'those things'. "I have appeared" is placed in contrast with 'I will appear', and the whole commission is concluded with a reference to the Gentiles in the present "Unto whom NOW I am sending thee" (as an apostle apostello).

This 'prison ministry to the Gentiles constitutes the final witness of Paul, and leads us to I Tim. ii. 6, 7:

> "To be testified in due time, whereunto I am ordained a preacher, and an apostle (I speak the truth in Christ, and lie not); a teacher of the GENTILES in faith and verity."

Here is a witness which is upon oath—so solemn, so important, so opposed is the testimony here given.

The translation 'to be testified in due time' is too tame a rendering to represent the Apostle's intention. The A.V. margin draws attention to the fact that the original does not use the verb 'to testify' but the noun 'a testimony', and the words translated 'in due time' are in the original kairois idiois 'seasons peculiar' or 'its own season'. We meet the same terms in Titus i. 3, where we read:

> "Paul a servant of God, and an apostle of Jesus Christ (according to the faith of God's elect; and the acknowledging of the truth which is after godliness; In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began, but hath in due times (kairois idios) manifested His word through preaching, which is committed unto me according to the commandment of God our Saviour)."

Again in II Tim. i., Paul writes:

> "Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony (the witness still going on) of our Lord, nor of me His prisoner . . . . . according to His own purpose and grace which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began, But is now made manifest . . . . . whereunto I am appointed a preacher and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles" (II Tim. i. 8-11).

Both the passage in Titus and the one here go back to a promise and a purpose made 'before the world began', literally 'before age times', and which finds the time of its testimony NOW, and the instrument of its revelation Paul in his threefold office:

Preacher \
Apostle } of the Gentiles.
Teacher /

The time had come when ‘all men’ not Jews and proselytes only were to be manifestly the objects of Divine love. The ministry was entrusted to the Apostle Paul, the only one designated ‘the Apostle of the Gentiles’. This testimony had its ‘own peculiar season’ for making its blessed theme known.

The translation ‘in due times’ entirely hides the peculiar character of these times from the reader.

Idios means anything peculiarly one’s own. Thus an idiograph means a trade mark, which must of necessity be ‘peculiarly one’s own’. An idiom is a note of expression peculiar to a language. An idiosyncrasy, is a peculiarity of temperament or constitution, something peculiar to and distinguishing an individual. Even the words idiot and peculiar when taken to mean one who is of weak intellect, are so used because such persons are ‘on their own’, and different from the normal.

The word ‘peculiar’ in like manner is derived from the Latin peculium ‘private property’.

We have it therefore on the highest of all authority, that (1) Dispensational changes are not left to the process of deduction, they are the subjects of witness and testimony. (2) The present dispensation is differentiated from all that goes before it, by the fact that it has its own peculiar apostle, Paul, who ministered in his own peculiar condition ‘the prisoner of Jesus Christ’, to his own peculiar company ‘the Gentiles’, relative to a peculiar period ‘before age times’ regarding a calling that had its own peculiar seasons, which season is drawing near to its close, as a comparison of the signs of the times with II Tim. iii. and iv. will make clear.

No.5. The Special Announcer for the special testimony.
pp. 97 - 100

The testimony to the "one Mediator" and the "Ransom for all" is, as we have seen, a testimony that has 'its own peculiar season'. This, while demanding a dispensation to itself, demands something more. God uses agents, and stoops to use earthen vessels. 'How shall they hear?' says Paul 'without a preacher?' Consequently it is not sufficient to realize that there is a special dispensation indicated by the language employed in I Tim. ii., but that of necessity, it implies a special minister. This we believe we could establish by a process of logic from the material supplied in other parts of the Scripture, but happily we have no need to read further than the succeeding verse of the above context, to find that the Apostle himself has anticipated us.

> "Whereunto I am ordained a preacher, and an apostle (I speak the truth in Christ, and lie not), a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and verity" (I Tim. ii. 17).

"Whereunto" eis ho "unto which" establishes the link, the threefold ministry indicated reveals the human agent, the interposition of the oath, shows how important the matter must be. The peculiar character of this ministry is revealed by the sphere 'of the Gentiles' and the contents of this ministry 'faith and verity'. To this threefold ministry, the Apostle was 'ordained'. The word chosen for this act is the Greek tithemi which is used in John xv. 16. By the use of this word, Paul places himself on the same level as those who were 'ordained' by the Lord while on earth.

Tithemi primarily means 'to place', 'to put', and in its usage takes to itself something of the conception or ordaining or appointing in many passages. For example, Abraham was 'made' a father of many nations, and Paul said 'I have laid the foundation'. The word of reconciliation he claimed was 'committed' unto him, and that he was 'put' into the ministry (Rom. iv. 17; I Cor. iii. 10; II Cor. v. 19; I Tim. i. 12).

In the early days of Paul's witness, he was obliged to emphasize his apostleship, as a reference to Galatians, I & II Corinthians and Romans will reveal, but as his ministry drew to its close, the apostleship gives place to the ministry of preaching, the fact of being an ambassador yielding place to the importance of his message. The word translated 'preacher' is not derived from the same root that provides us with 'preach', 'evangelist' or 'gospel', the word is kerux and means 'a herald', even as the verb kerusso which is also used by Paul for preaching means 'to make a proclamation'. A kerux was 'a herald, pursuivant, marshal and generally a public messenger, particularly of the character of an ambassador'. It is found in the LXX of Gen. xli. 43 "And a herald (kerux) made proclamation (ekeruxen) before him". The only other occurrence in the LXX is Dan. iii. 4:

> "And an herald cried aloud, to you it is commanded, O people, nations and languages."

It will be observed that in the two places where kerux is employed in the LXX the 'herald' is the servant of a Gentile ruler. Moreover, in neither instance can we look upon the 'heralds' as preaching. They were not bearers of 'good things of great joy' but bearers of the commands of a king. So, the only occurrence of kerusso 'preaching' in Daniel is in v. 29:

> "Then commanded Belshazzar, and they clothed Daniel with scarlet, and put a chain of gold about his neck, and made a proclamation concerning him, that he should be the third ruler in the kingdom."

The first occurrence of kerusso is, as we have seen in the proclamation of Gen. xli. 43. In subsequent Scripture kerusso is used of Aaron and Moses in connection with the service of the Tabernacle, and by kings of Israel and Judah and of Persia. It is used of 'the preaching of Jonah', who, as we remember, was sent to the Gentiles. Wisdom is personified as 'crying out' and this 'preaching' or 'heralding' is sometimes accompanied by the blowing of trumpets. The only passage which associates this word with the gospel is in Isa. lxi. 1 "The Lord hath anointed Me to preach good tidings", and this aspect of 'heralding' is carried over into the N.T. So we find it is used of John the Baptist (Matt. iii. 1), and Christ (Matt. iv. 17). It is used very many times in connection with the announcement concerning the kingdom of heaven.

Kerusso is used in Acts eight times, two references being used of Paul himself. The word is found in the earlier epistles of Paul fifteen times, and the later epistles four times. To complete the record, we add that it is used once of Peter (I Pet. iii. 19) and once in the Revelation (Rev. v. 2). Kerugma 'the preaching' is used of Jonah (Matt. xii. 41; Luke xi. 32), the preaching of Jesus Christ (Rom. xvi. 25) and the preaching of the Apostle Paul (I Cor. i. 21; ii. 4; xv. 14; II Tim. iv. 17; Titus i. 3). This analysis leaves but one other form to be noted, namely kerux which occurs three times.

> "I am ordained a preacher." (I Tim. ii. 7).
> "I am appointed a preacher." (II Tim. i. 11).
> "A preacher of righteousness" (II Pet. ii. 5).

This collection of occurrences will not be of much use to us unless we take the study further and perceive the intention behind the choice of these terms. Apart from Paul, only one other is called 'a preacher' kerux and that one is Noah. It is evident that Noah opens an entirely new dispensation, and there is no suggestion that he ever 'preached' to the antediluvians in the sense of inviting them to enter the Ark. Noah's preaching, like Jonah's, was in the nature of a proclamation. There is something similar in the announcement of Gen. vii. 4 and Jonah iii. 4.

> "For yet seven days, and I will cause it to rain upon the earth forty days and forty nights."
> "Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown."

There is, blessed be God, a gospel (euaggelion) which must be preached (euaggelizo) with all those elements of pity and entreaty with which the preaching of the gospel is associated. This 'gospel' is the subject of I Tim. i. 11 and of II Tim. i. 8, 10 and ii. 8, to say nothing of the many references that irradiate the epistles of Paul with their grace and peace.

Timothy himself was enjoined by the Apostle both to do the work of an evangelist (euaggelistes) and to preach kerusso the Word (II Tim. iv. 2 and 5). It should be remembered that the English word 'preach' is derived from the Latin proedico 'to make known in public', and that 'preach' and 'predicate' are doublets, the word 'preach' taking on the evangelizing attributes, leaving 'predicate' to perpetuate the affirmatory characteristic of the original Latin term. As things stand, we have no distinct words in the A.V. to indicate the difference between evangelizing and proclaiming, and therefore the reader should mentally, at least, translate the passages where kerux, kerugma and kerusso occur, into terms that suggest the proclamation of a herald, rather than the invitation or the pleading of an evangelist.

Paul was the herald to whom had been entrusted the proclamation making known 'the testimony in its own peculiar seasons', a subject not for 'preaching', inviting or pleading, but of announcing. As these days come to their close, he exhorts that the Word should be 'proclaimed', fully knowing that in many cases the proclamation will be denied or ignored. Paul could 'beseech' and 'pray' as in Christ's stead that men be 'reconciled to God', but one does not usually 'beseech' or entreat anyone to believe and accept the fact that the day is Saturday or Sunday.

John the Baptist was a 'witness', he was also a 'herald' (John i. 7; Matt. iii. 1). Paul the Apostle was a 'witness', he was also a 'herald' (Acts xxvi. 16; II Tim. i. 11), the one ushering in the dispensation of the kingdom of Heaven, the other ushering in the dispensation of the grace of God for the Gentile. The one baptizing in water only, the other teaching 'one baptism' that of the Spirit, and both separated from their birth to the special ministry they were called to perform.

It is moreover a feature that must not be lightly passed over, that the Apostle paused in the recounting of his threefold office of Preacher, Apostle and Teacher of Gentiles, to interpose the asseveration 'I speak the truth in Christ, and lie not'. On one other momentous occasion he interposed similar strong words 'I say the truth in Christ, I lie not, My conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost' (Rom. ix. 1).

Here Paul's theme had been the failure of Israel, and the coming into favour of the Gentiles 'to provoke' had it been possible, the flagging olive tree of Israel 'to emulation'. In I Tim. ii. 7 Israel is no longer in view but throughout the ministry of Paul, there had been continual opposition to his claims, and a resistance to the unfettered preaching of the Gospel to the Gentile. Earlier, he spoke of his own apostleship and 'as a fool', boasting that not only was he a Hebrew, but a minister of Christ. He had more abundant evidence than the rest of the apostles, and said 'as the truth of Christ is in me', while not so strong a term as those employed in Rom. ix. 1 and I Tim. ii. 7, approaches them in seriousness. For matters of less importance the Apostle called upon God as his witness (Rom. i. 9; II Cor. i. 2, 3; Phil. i. 8; I Thess. ii. 5, 10).

When summing up his 'boasting' regarding his apostleship, the Apostle said:

"The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Which is blessed for evermore, knoweth that I lie not" (II Cor. xi. 31).

When summing up his distinctive apostleship and commission in the epistle to the Galatians, he says:

"Now the things which I write unto you, behold, before God, I lie not" (Gal. i. 20).

These together with the passages from Rom. ix. and I Tim. ii. space out the great movements in the Apostle's distinctive ministry.

May the joy of knowing that we have a 'Daysman betwixt us Who can lay His hand upon us both', be ever increasing, and may we never cease to testify to the essential and central feature of the Gospel of Grace that:

"There is one Mediator, between God and men, Himself man, Christ Jesus."

No.6. The One Appointed Meeting Place.
pp. 196 - 199

We have seen in the provision of the One Mediator, that God has answered the deepest need of the human soul, the cry for a "Daysman betwixt us that he might lay his hand upon us both" (Job ix. 33). It is not enough, however, to be conscious of the need, or to be grateful for the provision of this Mediator, we should be concerned to know and to enter into the wondrous results of His Mediation. In this closing study we take up a question put by one of the Minor Prophets, and in its examination and sequel we hope to show further fruits of Mediation. (See also the booklet Accepted in the Beloved).

"Can two walk together, except they be agreed?" (Amos iii. 3). In both the Old and New Testament, 'walk' indicates manner of life, and the figure has been adopted in our own tongue, when we speak of someone's "walk" meaning thereby his profession. The text from Amos opens the question of fellowship and its relation to division, and one of the passages that come to mind will be that of Eph. iv. "Walk worthy of the calling . . . keep the Unity of the Spirit".

Amos, however, is not stressing the 'walk' of the people of God here, so much as their 'walk together' where 'unity' is shown as the word indicates in such a passage as that of Psa. cxxxiii. 1:

"Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity."

Amos stresses that such 'walk together' as he contemplates is impossible without agreement, the adverb of negation translated 'except' being the word translated 'nothing' in verse four. It is evident that the full meaning of the passage depends largely upon the word 'agreed', and as agreement may arise from a variety of causes, we must consult once again the original before we can attempt an explanation. The Hebrew yaad which is translated 'agree' means primarily 'to appoint' and is translated by such terms as agree, set time, assemble, gather, meet and betroth. The fact that this agreement is one that arises from an appointment, lends an element of solemnity about it especially when we remember that the appointment is made by God Himself.

The connection between this verse in Amos and the sacrificial work of the One Mediator becomes apparent when we realize that the word translated 'agreed' is found in Exodus and Numbers where it is used of the 'meeting of God and man in the Tabernacle and at the Mercy Seat.

AT THE MERCY SEAT
"Thou shalt make a mercy seat . . . . . and there I will MEET with thee" (Exod. xxv. 17-22).

AT THE DOOR
"There shall be a continual burnt offering throughout your generations at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the Lord: where I will MEET with you, to speak there with you. And there I will MEET with the children of Israel" (Exod. xxix. 42, 43).

COVERED BY THE INCENSE
"Take unto thee spices . . . . . beat some of it very small, and put it before the testimony . . . . . where I will MEET with thee" (Exod. xxx. 34-36).

THE LIVING PRIEST
"Take of every one of them a rod . . . . . lay them up . . . . . where I will MEET with you" (Numb. xvii. 2-4).

We can, therefore, retranslated the question of Amos:

"Can two walk together except they have MET?", and the meeting place is of Divine Appointment. The Mercy Seat is mentioned once in the N.T. namely in Heb. ix. 5, where the Greek equivalent is the word hilasterion. This word occurs but once elsewhere, namely in Rom. iii., where it is translated 'propitiation'.

"Christ Jesus, Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in His blood" (Rom. iii. 25).

There can be no possible fellowship between man and God apart from this great appointed way. To ignore this is fatal. Notice the insistence upon the appointed place, by the recurrence of the words 'there' and 'where' in the passages quoted above. They all concur in the testimony of Peter that there is none other Name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved. The first passage, Exod. xxv. 17-22, takes us within the veil. The second, Exod. xxix. 42, 43, takes us without to the door of the Tabernacle. The first is related to an offering made once a year on the day of atonement, the second is related to offerings that were made daily, continually, throughout the generation, morning and evening. In both access is in view, in both access is alone possible through the sacrifice offered and accepted. The third passage does not speak of sacrifice, but of holy fragrance. There is a connection between the sacrifice and the incense, even as there is a connection between the Ark and the Mercy Seat within the veil, and the door of the Tabernacle and the other extreme. The first article of furniture for the Tabernacle that is specified is the Ark, the last is the Altar of incense. The Ark, together with the Mercy Seat, speaks of righteousness and atonement; the Altar of incense speaks of intercession and acceptance. Prayer is likened to incense in Psa. cxli. 2: "Let my prayer be set forth before Thee as incense." This incense is called 'perpetual', which like the shewbread and the breastplate was 'always' or 'continually' before the Lord, for of Christ it is written "He EVER liveth to make intercession for us" (Heb. vii. 25). This incense is called 'sweet' which refers to the spices of which it was compounded. The relation of the incense with the meeting of the Lord and His people at the Mercy Seat suggests that fellowship with God commences with the death of Christ, but continues through His ever present intercession at the right hand of God. No strange incense was permitted, the holy oil associated with it was never put upon a 'stranger' (Exod. xxx. 33). All of which testifies to the preciousness of that sweet smelling savour that ascends through the work of Christ to God on our behalf, and through Him alone.

We may appreciate therefore the better, the literal rendering of I Pet. ii. 7.

> "Unto you therefore which believe IS THE PRECIOUSNESS."

The fourth passage quoted above emphasizes, not so much the death of the sacrifice, but the ever living Priesthood of Christ. This command, to lay up the rods of the tribes before the Lord arose out of the rebellion of Korah, which occupies Numb. xvi. There is but ONE sacrifice for sin, and there can be but ONE Mediator between God and Man, even as there is but ONE Lord in the Unity of the Spirit. Christ stands alone, unchallenged and unchallengeable, His own testimony was "No man cometh unto the Father, BUT BY ME".

The fact that of the twelve patriarchal rods, that of Aaron alone 'budded', emphasized the great truth of the ever living Head of the redeemed, and the fact that the Ark contained but three things (1) The tables of stone, (2) The pot of manna, (3) The rod that budded shows what an important place this truth occupies. He Who died now lives, even as Paul wrote to the Romans:

> "Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, Who is even at the right hand of God, Who also maketh intercession for us" (Rom. viii. 34).

Keeping still before us the question of Amos "How shall two walk together except they have met?" Let us in conclusion turn to Isa. liii., for there we shall not find a promise or an invitation to meet the Lord, but the twofold ground upon which that meeting rests. The two verses in Isa. liii., to which we refer are verses 6 and 12. In the A.V. they read thus:

> "All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord had laid on Him the iniquity of us all."
>
> "He was numbered with the transgressors; and He bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors."

At first sight these passages do not appear to speak specifically of 'meeting' which is the theme we are pursuing, but a reference to the original reveals that one Hebrew word paga occurs in both verses 6 and 12, and the verse could be revised to read:

"The Lord hath made to MEET on Him the iniquity of us all."
"And made a MEETING PLACE for transgressors."

Here therefore is a twofold meeting place, the one a place where our sins and God's judgment, but met not on our heads, but upon Him Who died 'the just for the unjust that He might bring us to God'; the other a meeting place where the transgressor now reconciled may find access and acceptance, might be 'numbered' or 'reckoned' with the righteous, because He, His Lord and Saviour, stooped to be 'numbered' or 'reckoned' with transgressors.

Blessed be God. Who spared not His Son; blessed be the Lord Who gave Himself; blessed be the Spirit Who takes of these things of Christ and reveals them unto us; blessed be God for "The One Mediator between God and man".

On the Threshold

pp. 219, 220

"Ye also ought to wash one another's feet" (John xiii. 14).

John xiii. commences a fresh section. John xii. has concluded with the solemn words of Isa. vi. and the rejection of Israel. The Lord now turns to His disciples. In chapter i. He came to His own and His own received Him not. Chapter xiii. 1 shows us another 'own'. Almost the first recorded incident in this new section is the washing of the disciples' feet. Verse 10 is full of blessed teaching. "He who hath been bathed, (needeth not save to wash his feet) but is clean every whit."

The Lord now tells His disciples that what He did to them, they are to do for one another. It is evident that He did not mean literally washing the feet by the question of verse 12 and the statement of verse, for they knew the literal fact; it was the symbolic meaning they may not then have grasped. Forgiveness of sins is a thing once and for ever accomplished. Clean every whit, but the walk through life brings us into contact with defilement when we leave the way of the Lord Psa. cxix. 1. There are some who seek to point out and to remove the sins of the child of God who forget that the Lord "took a towel and girded Himself" that is humbled Himself as servant, not to dictate but to serve, see Gal. vi. 1. May we do as He did and in the same spirit of meekness.

"Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord" (Matt. xxi. 9).

Psa. cxviii. 20-26 should be read in connection with this verse, and it will appear that its fulfillment is yet future. It speaks of the Stone rejected becoming Head of the corner, which was the rejection of Christ by the Jews (cf. Acts and I Pet. ii.). Hence we find that after the solemn words of Matt. xxiii. 37, 38, the Lord repeats these words in verse 39, Israel are yet to say unfeignedly, those words which were then but empty sayings. Verses 17-20 give the miracle of the fig tree. The fig tree is a type of Israel, and how fittingly it comes in here, "He came to it and found nothing thereon . . . . . presently it withered away". Israel's Hossanah's were leaves merely, for within a few days they cried "Away with Him, crucify Him". The Stone was rejected, and will be so until, having smitten the feet of the Great Gentile Image (cf. Dan. ii.), the Stone, i.e. the Lord Jesus, accepted by the saved remnant of Israel, will fill the earth and rule from sea to sea. May we in the interval, our time of grace, seek to please Him Who is at the right hand of God, waiting for 'that Day' of Matt. xxiii. 39.

On the Threshold

p. 240

"My soul wait thou only upon God" (Psa. lxii. 5).

The word translated 'wait' is exceedingly expressive, it means 'silence' and 'to be silent'. Psa. xxxvii. 7 "Rest in the Lord" (margin 'be silent'). True prayer has more of this expressive silence than we are apt to think. Prayer asks, but not with worrying repetition. We know that if we do those things that please Him, and ask according to His will, He heareth us, then let us wait, rest, be silent. Already in verse one the Psalmist has said that his soul waited or was silent to the Lord, and in verse 5 he again, as it were, exhorts himself to this attitude of faith. Notice the emphasis on the word only. When we realize that He only is our rock and salvation, we shall do so (verses 2, 6). Verse 2 says "I shall not be greatly moved"; verse 6 says "I shall not be moved". This continuance of patient, restful trust in God, to be silent to Him (verse 1) and to further be silent only to Him, not only gives the assurance of not being greatly moved, but of not being moved at all. Note verse 7 "in God", just so far as we can appropriate the 'onlys' and "in God's" of the Psalm, so far shall we truly pray and receive the blessed answer.

"We have not an High Priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities" (Heb. iv. 15).

The inference from this wondrous verse is (16) "Therefore let us come boldly unto the throne of grace". It is well to have learned to sorrow for sin, to confess sin, to forsake sin, but there is a lesson which few can learn fully, and which many learn wrongly to their own undoing, that is, sin must not keep us away from the throne of grace but should rather lead us there. There is at the right hand of God, One Who, sinless Himself, passed through this world, suffered its trials and temptations, and is now able to succour them that are tempted. He is touched with a feeling of our weakness; what a statement! He Who is God over all, Who overcame death and the devil, Who has all power in heaven and earth, that One Who was and is perfect righteousness and holiness, yet He can be touched with the feeling of our weakness. Gracious Lord, lead me more frequently to that throne of grace, where as the Great High Priest Thou dost sit, Thy work finished, and thy wondrous office now to present and meet Thy erring peoples' need. "Therefore let us come."

The Pleroma

No.5. The Age-Times, when do they begin?
pp. 3 - 9

In the great majority of cases the translations “everlasting”, “eternal” and “forever”, in the A.V., are renderings of the Greek aionios, aion and the Hebrew olam. The A.V., however, renders aion by “world”, “course”, “age”, “eternal” as well as “ever”, and in conjunction with various prepositions it gives as translations “since the world began”, “from the beginning of the world” and “while the world standeth”.

Such translations of a word that can range from a “world” which had a “beginning” and will have an end, to “eternity” which confessedly has neither, are too wide to be of service, especially when the choice depends largely upon the theological views of the translator.

Olam, the Hebrew word, comes from a root meaning something hidden or secret (Psa. xix. 12) and suggests a period of time of undefined limits. Aion is used in the Septuagint to translate the Hebrew olam, and this we must take as our guide.

In the book of Ecclesiastes the word olam occurs seven times, and is translated in the A.V. as follows:

“The earth abideth for ever” (i. 4).
“It hath been already of old time” (i. 10).
“No remembrance . . . . . for ever” (ii. 16).
“Set the world in their heart” (iii. 11).
“It shall be for ever” (iii. 14).
“A portion for ever” (ix. 6).
“Man goeth to his long home” (xii. 5).

Such variety provides no connected thought, but a consistent translation of olam reveals a definite line of teaching.

Olam in Ecclesiastes.

A | i. 4. The earth abideth to the age.—The passing generation.
B | i. 10. It hath been already in or to the ages.—
Nothing new under the sun.
C | ii. 16. No remembrance of the wise more than of the fool to the age.—
Forgotten in the days to come.
D | iii. 11. He hath set the age in their heart.—
Beginning to end of God’s work past finding out.
C | iii. 14. Whatsoever God doeth, it shall be to the age.—
God’s work remains.
B | ix. 6. Neither have they any more a portion to the age.—
No portion under the sun.
A | xii. 5. Man goeth to his age home.—The passing generation.

Leaving these passages until we are more prepared to consider their teaching in detail, we pass to another group, this time in the N.T., namely, in the epistle to the Ephesians. There the word aion is translated as inconsistently as we found its parallel olam in Ecclesiastes.

"This world" (i. 21).
"The course of this world" (ii. 2).
"The ages to come" (ii. 7).
"From the beginning of the world" (iii. 9).
"Eternal purpose' (iii. 11).
"Throughout all ages, world without end" (iii. 21).
"Rulers of the darkness of this world" (vi. 12).

Here we have a strange assortment. This world, which had a beginning, but which has no end, and the course of this world, and the eternal purpose which terms are hardly comparable. Translate the word aion consistently, and order, light and instruction take the place of human tradition and confusion.

Aiõn in Ephesians.

A | i. 21. Rulers of this and the coming age.—
Subject to Christ in resurrection.

A | vi. 12. Rulers of the darkness of this age.—
Withstood by believers in resurrection power.

All lovers of the Word must see how great is the loss which we have sustained through the traditional translation. "The eternal purpose" sounds very grand, it gives a certain sound of reality and indefectibility to the purpose of God, yet it is a double violation. The noun aion is translated as though is were the adjective aionion, apart from the mistake of putting eternity where age should have been. What we have to learn is that the Bible does not speak of "eternity". It was not written to tell us of eternity. Such a consideration is entirely outside the scope of revelation. Many, many undreamed wonders will doubtless be unfolded when the ages are no more. What they will be and what they will involve is idle and profitless speculation. The Word of God as it has been given is a complete system of teaching for us; it does not treat fully of the creation around us, much less of the time before or after the present six days' creation. While we acknowledge that there is much which our curiosity would tempt us to ask, we do most readily acknowledge the divine boundaries of our studies, realizing that by the repeated emphasis upon the teaching of the ages, and the absence of teaching concerning eternity, the Lord is still showing us (as is expressed in Ecclesiastes) that the time has not yet arrived when we may "find out the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end".

Our Immediate Enquiry.

Accepting the fact of the ages and of the age-times, we now enquire from the Scripture an answer to the question "when did they commence?"

As a fuller contribution to the subject, we place before the reader some of the most important expressions that are found in the N.T. dealing with the time factor of the ages. Such expressions as "the end of the world"; "since the world began"; "this world"; "the world to come" are known to all; we now propose to submit them to a more careful scrutiny, so that the Scriptural association of time with the ages shall be better seen. The reader already knows that aion is often translated "world" in the A.V.; and while it is a good rendering, meaning etymologically "the age of man" (vir-eld), it simplifies the enquiry if we agree to translate kosmos by "world" and aion by "age", thereby preserving the distinction that must be maintained between words of place and words of time.

"The end of the world." There are more words than one that can be translated "end"; the word used in this phrase is sunteleia. In Matt. xiii. 39, 40, 49; xxiv. 2 & xxviii. 20 aion is in the singular, but in the one remaining occurrence, namely in Heb. ix. 26, aion is used in the plural. What the significance of this change may be we do not pause at the moment to consider, but just make a note of the fact that nowhere else except in Matthew or Hebrews do we meet the expression sunteleia tou aionos. If there is a period that can be called "the end of the world", there is also a period which speaks of a time "since the world began" or "from the beginning of the world". We should remember when reading this expression that the word arche "beginning" does not occur in the phrase, all that is found in the original being the words ap aionos "from (an) age", when used in Luke i. 70; Acts iii. 21 and xv. 18; and apo ton aionon the plural with the article, in Eph. iii. 9 and Col. i. 26. We observe that in the last reference the ages are coupled with the generations a term which we must consider separately.

"The world to come" translates two forms, one in which aion is spoken of as erchomenon "coming", Luke xviii. 30; and aion spoken of as mello "about to be" Matt. xii. 32; Eph i. 21 and Heb. vi. 5.

"This world" and "that world" are contrasted, the former expression using toutou with aion, the latter using ekeinos. "That world" occurs but once, namely in Luke xx. 35, but "this world" occurs some fourteen times, and these will be given fuller consideration when the occurrences are being examined in detail. Variations of this expression are found in Gal. i. 4 which adds the words "present" and "evil", and I Tim. vi. 17, II Tim. iv. 10 and Titus ii. 12, where the word nun "now" is added.

One passage contains the phrase "before the ages" (plural) pro ton aionon, I Cor. ii. 7, the other passages which speak of "before the world" employ the word kosmos not aion.

The word "generation" is used in association with the ages. Genea has three meanings in the N.T. It means the simple succession from father to son (Matt. i. 17); it means a company of men living at the same time and sharing similar characteristics; and thirdly it means a mark of time, "the successive lives of offspring being taken to indicate so many stages in the world's history".

Aion "age" belongs to no one particular dispensation or line of teaching. It occurs in all but five of the twenty seven books of the N.T., the epistles that contain no reference are I & II Thessalonians, James, Philemon and III John. Aionios the adjective translated "eternal" and "everlasting" occurs in nineteen books of the N.T., being omitted in I Corinthians, I Thessalonians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, James and II & III John. The books therefore which contain both aion and aionios are the four Gospels, Acts, Galatians, I & II Timothy, Titus, Hebrews, I & II Peter, I John, Jude and the Revelation. We must examine some of these occurrences in detail, and we shall have to consider the bearing of apo "from", pro "before", and eis "unto" or "for", before we can even begin to come to any conclusion as to when the age-times began.

What does the Scripture mean by "age-times"? Is such a term a correct translation of the original? What light do parallel constructions throw upon the phrase? Where does the expression occur? What light do we get from the context? Are there parallel, though different expressions, that should be considered? Let us address ourselves to these and any related questions that may occur during the investigation.

The rendering "age-times" is not found in either the A.V. or the R.V. In the A.V. the translation reads "before or since the world began" and in the R.V. the rendering is "through" or "before times eternal". "Before the world began" is at least understandable, but "before times eternal" cannot be understood without a very drastic revision of the meaning ascribed to "eternal". If eternal thing have neither beginning nor end, then it is impossible to speak of a period before times eternal—the translation is figurative, and does not contribute to our understanding or add to our knowledge.

The occurrences of the expression are three in number, and we give them first of all as they occur in the A.V.

> "Now to Him that is of power to stablish you according to my gospel, and the preaching of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery, which was kept secret since the world began, but now is made manifest, and by the scriptures of the prophets, according to the commandment of the everlasting God, made known to all nations for the obedience of faith: to God only wise, be glory through Jesus Christ for ever. Amen." (Rom. xvi. 25-27).
>
> "Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me his prisoner: but be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel according to the power of God; Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began, but is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ" (II Tim. i. 8-10).
>
> "In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began; but hath in due times manifested His word through preaching, which is committed unto me according to the commandment of God our Saviour" (Titus i. 2, 3).

The Greek words translated "before" or "since" the world began, are chronois aioniois in Rom. xvi. 25, and pro chronon aionion in II Tim. i. 9 and Titus i. 2. We observe that the expression in either form is exclusive to Paul, and that such an exclusive character is emphasized in the context by such added terms as “my gospel”; “through the gospel whereunto I am appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles”; “through preaching which is committed unto me”.

Our first note therefore is that the term “before the world began” or “since the world began”, however we are obliged ultimately to translate the original, belongs exclusively to the ministry of Paul.

Secondly we note that there is a difference between the phrase found in Rom. xvi., and those found in II Timothy and Titus. The former speaks of a period “since”, the latter of a period “before” the beginning of the world. We must be careful therefore to keep these two periods distinct, together with the revelations associated with them.

Ignoring for the time being the preposition pro “before” or the dative case, translated by the A.V. ‘since’, let us examine the words chronon aionion. It is not a matter of debate that aionios is an adjective derived from aion the noun, or that chronos is a noun. If we read in Matt. xxv. 19 meta de chronon polun we naturally translate “but after a long time”. If we find the order of the words reversed as in John v. 6 polun . . . . . chronon, while the emphasis may be shifted, the translation must remain the same, polun still remains an adjective, chronon still remains a noun. The word chronos ‘time’ is not of frequent use in the epistles, occurring only twelve times in the fourteen written by Paul, and when we turn to Romans, II Timothy and Titus in the hope of observing the usage of chronos in those three epistles which use the phrase ‘since’ or ‘before’ the world began, we find but one passage, namely Rom. vii. 1 “the law hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth”, literally ‘for a long time’ eph hoson chronon.

Aionios the adjective, is derived from aion, and must retain whatever essential meaning pertains to the noun. It is impossible that the noun should be translated ‘age’, which most certainly had a beginning, and will certainly have an end, and to translate the adjective ‘everlasting’ or ‘eternal’. Keeping to Paul’s epistles we find aionion translated ‘eternal’, ‘everlasting’, and ‘for ever’, except in the three passages before us, Rom. xvi. 25; II Tim. i. 9; and Titus i. 2, where we read ‘since, or before, the world began’. If chronos is translated ‘world’, then aionios must have been translated ‘began’, or if chronos has been translated ‘began’ because of its association with time, then aionios has been translated ‘world’. In any case the translation is exceedingly wide. The Revisers were evidently unsatisfied with this rendering for in the three passages they substitute ‘times eternal’, which though it adheres more to the actual words so translated, is still too poetic to be of use, for ‘times’ belong to one category and ‘eternal’ to another. We can speak of ‘a living death’ but only in a figure; we can speak of ‘times eternal’ but only in a figure. For the purpose of discovering at what point in the outworking of the purpose of the ages these ‘times eternal’ commence, such a translation is valueless. There is nothing for it but to adopt either the foreign-sounding phrase ‘eonian times’, or the cumbersome expression ‘age-times’. This latter has the advantage of presenting to the eye the fact that we are still within the bounds of the ages, and not dealing with either ‘the world’ as in the A.V. or ‘eternity’ as in the R.V.

We must now return to those passages that are under review, to observe any particular features that will help us in our attempt to place them in the outworking of the Divine purpose.

First, we will give Weymouth's rendering of Rom. xvi. 25-27, with our own emphasis of each occurrence of aion and aionios.

> "To Him Who has it in His power to make you strong, as declared in the Good News which I am spreading, and the proclamation concerning Jesus Christ, in harmony with the unveiling of the Truth which IN THE PERIOD OF PAST AGES remained unuttered, but has now been brought fully to light, and by the command of THE GOD OF THE AGES has been made known by the writings of the Prophets among all the Gentiles to win them to obedience to the faith—to God, the only wise, through Jesus Christ, even to Him be the glory THROUGH ALL THE AGES" (Rom. xvi. 25-27. Weymouth).

The words chronois aioniois in Rom. xvi. 25 are in the dative case. This case is used to denote 'a space of time', 'for', as in Acts xiii. 20; John ii. 20. (The A.V. use of the word 'since' is without precedent; this demands the preposition apo, or its equivalent.) In the space of time known as the 'age times', a truth had been 'kept secret'. As the word musterion and its derivations express the idea of something 'secret', and as the word translated 'kept secret' in the original of Rom. xvi. 25 is sigao 'to keep silence' (see I Cor. xiv. 28, 34), the translation of the A.V. is misleading. The word does not indicate that the truth in view was never made known at all, or at any time, but that during the space of time known as the age-times it was 'hushed', that period ending with the revelation found in the epistle to the Romans, and referring, not to the Mystery of Ephesians, but to the inner portion of Romans, namely Rom. v. 12 - viii. 39, where instead of the law of Moses and personal transgression being the dominant theme, Moses retires into the background and Sinai is exchanged for 'the law of sin and death'. Adam now takes the place of Moses, and the ruin of the creature is stressed rather than personal transgressions, 'sin' rather than 'sins'. Since the call of Abraham, and during the period of Israel's discipline this inner teaching of Romans remained unemphasized, but with the commission of the Apostle, the hour struck for its proclamation. A comparison of Rom. i. 1-7 with Rom. xvi. 25-27, will reveal some thins in common, and some that differ.

The structure of the epistle to the Romans is exceedingly complex, as we can well believe of so mighty an epistle. Simplified to the extreme it appears somewhat like this:

A | i. - v. 11. Sins, rather than sin.
(Outer) Law of Sinai.
Abraham, Israel, Jew and Gentile.
B | v. 12 - viii. 39. Sin, rather than sins.
Adam, not Abraham.
Law of sin and death.
A | ix. - xvi. 24. Dispensational and Practical problems.
Abraham, Israel, Jew and Gentile.
B | xvi. 25-27. The mystery that had been "hushed".
No doctrine of Adam outside of the epistles of Paul.

No.6. Paradise Lost and Restored.
pp. 27 - 30

If ‘before the overthrow of the world’ and ‘before the age times’ refers to the same datum line, and if the ‘overthrow’ be Gen. i. 2, then Gen i. 2 must have taken place before the ages began, and consequently we have an indication that the ages are coincident with the present temporary creation which, together with its ‘firmament’, will pass away when the purpose of the ages shall be accomplished. The opening and closing members of the purpose of the ages may be set out as follows:

A | The Beginning. Before Age times. |
a | Christ. Firstborn of all creation. Image of invisible God.
b | Satan. Cherub (Ezek. xxviii. 12-19).
c | The overthrow (Gen. i. 2).

* * * * * * *

A | The End. Age finish. |
a | Christ. Head. Every knee shall bow.
b | Church. In the heavenlies. Satan destroyed.
c | Reconciliation achieved.

The space indicated by the (* * * * *) is spanned by the ages. The first of the series of fullnesses that fill this gap is, as we have seen, the six-day creation of Gen. i. 3 - ii. 14. The opening generation is NOT that of Adam, as recorded in Gen. v. 1, but of “the heavens and the earth” which occupies Gen. ii. 4 - iv. 6. This is followed by twelve generations, which open with “The book of the generations of Adam” (Gen. v. 1), and closes with “the book of the generation of Jesus Christ”. The relationship of these generations may be set out as follows:

A | “The generations of the heavens and of the earth” (Gen. ii. 4 - iv. 26).
A | a | The BOOK of the generations (plural) of Adam. (Gen. v. 1 - vi. 8).
b | The generations of Noah. (Gen. vi. 9 - ix. 29).
c | The generations of the sons of Noah. (Gen. x. 1 - xi. 9).
d | The generations of Shem. The line of the seed (Gen. xi. 10-26).
e | The generations of Terah (in Mesopotamia and Canaan). (Gen. xi. 27 - xxv. 11).
f | The generations of Ishmael, son of bond-woman. (Gen. xxv. 12-18).
f | The generations of Isaac, son of free woman. (Gen. xxv. 19 - xxxv. 29).
e | The generations of Esau (in Canaan and Mount Seir). (Gen. xxxvi. 1-43).
d | The generations of Jacob the line of the seed (Gen. xxxvii. 1 - l. 26).
c | The generations of Aaron and Moses. (Numb. iii. 1-4).
b | The generations of Pharez. (Ruth iv. 18-22).
a | The BOOK of the generations (singular) of Jesus Christ. (Matt. i. 1-17).

It will be observed that the word "generation" is used in the plural of each except the last. The generations refer to the descendants, as may be seen by an isolated generation like that of Ruth iv. 18-22; the generation of Jesus Christ however refers to his human ancestry not to His descendants, for He had none. In the generations of the heavens and the earth, are recorded the following features:

(1) The forming of man from the dust, and his becoming a living soul.
(2) The planting of the garden eastward in Eden.
(3) The prohibition concerning the tree of the knowledge of good and evil.
(4) The naming of the animals and Adam's conscious loneliness.
(5) The formation of the woman as a help meet for him.
(6) The temptation and the fall, the curse and sorrow.
(7) The promise of the seed of the woman and ultimate victory.
(8) The return of man to the dust from whence he had been taken.
(9) The expulsion from Eden and the placing of the sword and cherubim.
(10) The two seeds as manifested in Abel and Cain.
(11) The appointment of Seth instead of Abel.

Fuller details could of course be included, and the reader must remember that there is no significance in the number that we have indicated. In view of the balancing feature in the book of the Revelation, we can write over this period the words "Paradise Lost", without borrowing any ideas from Milton, even as we can write over the closing chapter of the Revelation "Paradise Restored". The book of the Revelation does not reach as far as "The end" of I Cor. xv. 24.

Two main themes commences in Gen. iii. that continue to the end of time, and which constitute the conflict of the ages. These are (1) The promise of the woman's Seed, (2) The continuous enmity between the two seeds until ultimate victory is achieved. For long after the New heavens and earth, death will still be an enemy (I Cor. xv. 24-28). The loss sustained as a consequence of the Fall is symbolized in the expulsion from the garden with the consequent denial of access to the tree of life, but restoration is pledged by the placing of the cherubim together with a flaming sword to keep the way of the tree of life. In the sequel, when the intervening gap is filled by the fruits of redemption, we are taken by a series of steps back to Eden and its blessedness, as is made manifest by the following extract from the close of Revelation.

> "And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things are passed away . . . . . and he shewed me a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb. In the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river, was there the tree of life . . . . . and there shall be no more curse . . . . . that they may have the right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city" (Rev. xxi. 4; xxii. 1-3, 14).

Here is the complete reversal of the consequences of the fall of man in Eden, and we have surveyed yet another "fullness", the fullness of Redemption that spans the ages and their burden of sin and death. One feature demands a somewhat fuller treatment here, and that is the cherubim and their purport. The several occasions when the cherubim are introduced into the Scriptures are as follows. Beginning with the passage in Ezekiel which antedates Eden we have the following:

Ezek. viii.	Eden. Profaned. Cast out. The anointed.
Gen. iii.	Eden. Pledge of life and restoration.
Exod. xxv.	The Tabernacle an the Mercy Seat.
I Kings. vi.-viii.	The glory and the Temple.
Ezek. i.-xi. & xli.	The glory departing and returning.
Rev.	"The four beasts." The pledge fulfilled.

If we set out these passages in the form of a correspondence, we immediately become aware of some member that is missing. It will be worth the space if this necessity can be demonstrated and felt.

A | Ezek. viii. The anointed cherub, his pride, his fall.
B | Gen. iii. Paradise lost. The pledge of restoration.
C | Exod. xxv. Tabernacle. \
I Kings. vi.-viii. Temple. } Israel.
Ezek. i.-xi. & xli. Glory. /
A | ? Nothing recorded.
B | Rev. Paradise restored.

Something is missing that will counterbalance the pride and the fall of the anointed cherub at the beginning. The very fact that the word "anointed" might be included, points us to Christ, the true anointed, for that is the meaning of the Hebrew "Messiah" and the Greek "Christos". We remember that when the cherubim in the O.T. or the living creatures in the Revelation are described, we have mention of four faces, that of a lion, an ox, a man, and an eagle, and these symbols have from earliest times been associated with the four Gospels.

Matthew	The LION	The King
Mark	The OX	The Servant
Luke	The MAN	Genealogy of Adam
John	The EAGLE	The Word

Where the anointed cherub aspired with blasphemous attempt to be like the Most High, the Son of God voluntary left the glory that was His by right and stooped down to death, even to the death of the cross. In this He 'undid' (luo) the works of the devil (I John iii. 8). Into the space marked A therefore we can put the missing line.

A | The Anointed, His humiliation, His Triumph, and the record is complete. Thus the outstretched firmament coincides with the outstretched wing of the cherubim, the whole span of the ages being "under the Redeeming Ægis". "The term 'ægis', really a Latin word, means a 'goat skin' and later a shield . . . . . this redeeming conception took a primeval form in the cherubim set up, together with the sword of flame, at the gate of the lost Eden . . . . . the idea of atonement, therefore is as old as the Bible, nay, as redemption itself . . . . . this 'Day of Atonement' itself was called 'Yom Kippur' i.e. the 'Day of Covering' . . . . . ours is at bottom an evangelical universe, no other form was ever conceived for it in the mind of God" (Under the Redeeming Ægis by H. C. Mabie, D.D., LL.D.). The next pair of corresponding passages will be as follows:

B	Gen. iii.	The ages begin. Paradise Lost.
	Earth.	Remade and blessed (Gen. i. 2 - ii. 4)
		Subjected to curse, Thorns and thistles (Gen. iii.).
	Man.	For a little lower than angels (Psa. viii.).
		The first Adam, living soul, the image of God.
		Dominion over the earth.
	Usurper.	The serpent. The shining one Nachash (Gen. iii.).
		Ye shall not surely die. Ye shall be as God.
	Hope.	The seed of the woman.
B	Rev.	The consummation of the ages. Paradise Restored.
	Earth.	Restored and blessed (Hosea ii. 18-23)
		Curse removed (Rev. xxii. 3; Isa. lv. 13).
	Man.	Christ, made much better than angels (Heb. i. 4).
		Last Adam, Quickening Spirit, Image.
	Heir.	Lamb is the light, brightness of glory.
		Immortality conferred (I Cor. xv.). Every knee shall bow.
	Hope.	Creation's groan hushed (Rom. viii. 21; xvi. 20).

No.7. The Nature of Angels.
pp. 44 - 50

Man, we learn from the Scriptures, was made a little lower than the angels, but is destined by grace eventually to be made higher than these celestial spirits. In Heb. ii., this twofold relationship is spoken of Christ Himself. The section of the epistle that deals with this phase of the redemptive purpose is introduced by the words.

> "For unto the angels hath He not put in subjection the world to come, whereof we speak" (Heb. ii. 5).

If "the sons of God" and "the morning stars" sang together and shouted for joy at creation were angels (Job xxxviii. 7), then it would appear that they had some administrative power in the world that has passed away. If, as we learn, some of the angels fell, that again would suggest a gap which the creation and redemption of man was designed to fill.

In order to follow the implications of Heb. ii. 5, and of the several references to angels that are found in Heb. i. and ii., a careful examination of the Scriptures on the nature, sphere and relationship of angels with the purpose of the ages seem called for.

Four Hebrew words and one Greek word are translated “angel” in the A.V. which we will first of all consider:

(1) Abbir “mighty”. “Man did eat angel’s food” (margin the bread of the mighty) (Psa. lxxviii. 25). The translation ‘angels’ here is by reason of the employment of that word by the Septuagint, but there is nothing in the context or in the general usage of the word to warrant this rendering. The expression seems rather to draw attention to the miraculous sustenance provided by the manna that fell from heaven throughout Israel’s wilderness journeys.

(2) Elohim “God, or gods”. “For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels.” This translation is confirmed by the rendering in Heb. ii. 7. While elohim in the bulk of occurrences is rightly translated “God”, it is rendered ‘gods’ 240 times, ‘judges’ 5 times, ‘great’, ‘mighty’ and ‘very great’ once each.

Upon consulting the Septuagint we find that elohim is rendered in that version ‘angel’ on four occasions, namely Gen. xxxi. 24; Psa. viii. 5; xcvii. 7; and cxxxviii. 1. Of these translations, Heb. i. 6 “And let all the angels of God worship Him” endorses the LXX rendering of Psa. xcvii. 7. Thus in two passages quoted in Hebrews, namely in Heb. i. 6 and 7 the word ‘angel’ is in the original Hebrew elohim.

(3) Shinan “repetition”. “The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels” (Psa. lxviii. 17). The employment of the word ‘angels’ here is gratuitous. Shinan is a term indicating ‘repetition’ and refers to the preceding enumeration. It must be remembered that neither the Hebrews nor the Greeks had the use of the numerals employed by us today in our arithmetic. They used the letters of the alphabet, and the Greeks were able to represent any sum up to 9,999 but after that they were obliged to resort to the expedient of prefixing the letter “M” which turned the number into a “myriad”. By this method the ancient Greek could represent any number up to 99,999,999 but he could get no further. Ten thousand times ten thousand is a multitude ‘which no man can number’. Similarly, different expedients were employed by the Hebrews, and Psa. lxviii. 17 is an example.

A literal translation is “The chariots of God are myriads twice told thousands of repetition”. While angels may be intended in this passage, it cannot be legitimately quoted as a proof text.

Before w take up the examination of the two main words malak and angelos that are translated ‘angel’ in the O.T. and in the N.T., there are buried in the Septuagint version a number of references that must be included in our survey in order that the fullest light upon this subject shall be obtained.

We wish to avoid overloading this article with transliterations of either Hebrew or Greek words, and will dispense with their citations wherever it can be done without endangering the argument, believing that any reader who desires, can verify every reference with ease.

We have seen that elohim is rendered ‘angel’ in the LXX and to this, one or two other references must be added.

El (Job xx. 15). No reason is offered for translating this by the word angel, we merely record the fact. The title ‘sons of God’ found in Job i. 6 and xxxviii. 7 is translated 'angels'; in Deut. xxxii. 8 where the original reads 'according to the number of the sons of Israel', the LXX reads 'according to the number of the angels of God'.

Speaking of Leviathan, the Lord says to Job, according to the LXX:

> "This is the chief of the creation of the Lord; made to be played with by His angels" (Job xl. 14).

Again it is beyond our present knowledge to explain the great divergence manifested here between the Hebrew original and the LXX. In Job xl. 6 where the A.V. reads (in verse 11, the enumeration is not similar throughout) "Cast abroad the rage of thy wrath', the LXX reads 'Sent forth angels with wrath'. Lastly, so far as Job xxxvi. 14 is concerned, it reads in the LXX:

> "Therefore let their soul die in youth, and their life be wounded by angels (of death)."

The underlying link between these various and strange renderings is the substitution of the "angel" as the instrument or agent for the personal activity of God Himself. Where the modern man speaks of 'forces of nature', the Hebrew speaks of 'angels'. In both cases instruments or agents are intended.

In II Sam. xv. 13 the word nagad is translated 'angel' in the LXX, which word in slightly different forms appear in this same chapter as 'certify', 'told' and 'tell' (verses 28, 31 and 35). This rendering bears out the ordinary meaning that attaches to both the Hebrew and the Greek words which are generally translated 'angel', namely 'a messenger'.

There remains just the translation by the word 'angel' of the word 'servant' (Isa. xxxvii. 24); of the word for 'ambassador' (Jer. xxix. 14); and 'by the hand' (Prov. xxvi. 6).

These somewhat curious examples of translation may not, it is true, contribute much to our understanding, but the very fact that in them is exhibited every existing reference in the LXX to the word angelos (except of course those which now await our examination), means that no light or truth that might have been revealed has been neglected. We can now turn our attention to the most important words that are translated 'angel' namely malak in the Hebrew and angelos in the Greek. Malak occurs 213 times, of which 111 occurrences are translated 'angel'; 98 'messenger', and 4 'ambassador'. Angelos occurs 188 times, of which 181 occurrences are translated 'angel' and 'messenger' 7 times.

The first fact to be recorded and to remember throughout this study is that angels belong to the spiritual world. "He maketh His angels spirits" (Psa. civ. 4) and are numbered among 'things in heaven' as contrasted with 'things on earth' (Matt. xviii. 10; xxiv. 36; xxviii. 2). Those that attain to the resurrection are said to be 'as the angels which are in heaven' so far as the matter of marriage is concerned (Mark xii. 25). Scripture moreover insists upon the vastness of the number of these 'holy myriads', speaking of 'the heavenly host' (Luke ii. 13); and as the Saviour Himself said that he had but to ask and the Father would send Him 'more than twelve legions of angels' (Matt. xxvi. 53). When Jacob was met by the angels while on his way to meet Esau, he said "This is God's host" (Gen. xxxii. 2) and although a different word is used, much the same meaning is intended when the Scriptures speak of God as "The Lord of Hosts", and it will be observed that angels are placed in correspondence with hosts in Psa. cxlviii. 2:

> "Praise ye Him, all His angels > Praise ye Him, all His hosts."

Angels are said to be 'mighty', to 'excel in strength', and 'holy', even to so great a saint as Daniel (II Thess. i. 7; Psa. ciii. 20; Acts x. 22 and Dan. x. 5-8), and are of superhuman intelligence (Mark xiii. 32). Some angels are called 'the elect', and some angels 'fell' (I Tim. v. 21; Jude 6). There are indications in Scripture that there is some kind of order among the ranks of angels, Michael is called 'The archangel' and Gabriel is deputed on several specific and important occasions to bear a message (Dan. xii. 1; Jude 9; Rev. xii. 7; and Dan. viii. 16; ix. 21; Luke i. 19, 26).

Not only are there differences of rank among the angels, but the angels appear to be one section of a vast spiritual world consisting of 'angels, principalities and powers' (I Pet. iii. 22). Neither the Hebrew ruach nor the Greek pneuma go so far as the modern use of the word 'spirit', which is immaterial, as one philosopher wrote:

> "If we seclude space there will remain in the world but matter and mind, or body and spirit."

The Hebrews when they called angels 'spirits', did not deny that they were endued with 'bodies', even as the Apostle, speaking of the resurrection, when believers will be like unto the angels of heaven, says 'there is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body', and we may, with sufficient safety, assume that angels are spiritual bodies, rather than pure spirits in the modern acceptation of the word' (Kitto).

The oldest book in the Canon, together with the last book in the N.T. uses the figure of the stars to represent angels.

> "The morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God (LXX 'angels') shouted for joy" (Job xxxviii. 7).
> "The seven stars are the angels of the seven churches" (Rev. i. 20).

A star is used prophetically to symbolize the coming Saviour and Ruler, Christ:

> "There shall come a Star out of Jacob, and a Sceptre shall arise out of Israel" (Numb. xxiv. 17).

This too finds its echo in the Revelation:

> "I am the Root and the Offspring of David, and the bright and morning Star" (Rev. xxii. 16).

In Rev. ix. 1 a star is seen to fall from heaven, to whom was given the keys of the abyss. It is obvious that an angel is here intended. So also in Rev. viii. 10, 11 "A great star from heaven, burning as it were a lamp" is named 'Wormwood'. Once again a star in the astronomical sense cannot be intended. Yet again in Rev. xii. 4 we read that the tail of the dragon 'drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth'. It is a physical impossibility for 'a third part of the stars of heaven' to fall upon the earth, and the whole passage is symbolical of the fall of the angels through the influence of Satan. A somewhat similar passage is that of Dan. viii. 10 where we read:

> "And it waxed great, even to the host of heaven; and it cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them."

It was evidently an accepted teaching in the days of Job, that 'the stars' were not pure in the sight of God (Job xxv. 5), a belief expressed in other words by Eliphaz (Job xv. 15), where 'His saints' are placed in parallel correspondence with 'the heavens' which he declared 'are not clean in His sight', and this is more definitely stated in Job iv. 18 where Eliphaz says 'Behold, He put no trust in His servants; and His angels He charged with folly'.

The same epistle that reveals that the angels kept not their first estate but left their own habitation, who are reserved in everlasting chains under darkness, likens those who came under that baleful influence to 'wandering stars to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever' (Jude 6, 11).

The Chaldeans and early races of mankind appear to have had a knowledge of the association of the stars with both the angels and with rule which became distorted and perverted, leading them to extravagances of Astrology and the association of the planets with their gods Astarte and Baal, which later appear as Jupiter and Venus.

What are we to understand by 'the star' which led the Magi to the cradle of the infant Christ? The Companion Bible comments "all questions are settled if we regard this as miraculous. (Cp. Numb. xxiv. 15-19)". This is true, and recognizes the peculiar nature of the phenomenon. We are all doubtless aware of the many attempts that have been made by astronomers and divines alike to solve the mystery of this peculiar star. Kepler, by observing the conjunction of Jupiter, Saturn and Mars, which took place in the year 1604, made calculations that led him back to a conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in the constellation of the Fishes (a fish is the astronomical symbol of Judaea), and so to the first year of the Christian era. While all this is very interesting, we must in all fairness reject it as an explanation of the words of the Holy Writ.

This star which the wise men saw in the East 'went before them till it came and stood over where the young child was' (Matt. ii. 9). Such a statement cannot by any explanation be made to refer either to a star in the heavens or to any conjunction of the planets. But if angels are so often called 'stars', if one star at least was described as falling from heaven to the earth 'burning as it were a lamp' for the purposes of judgment; if moreover it is no new thing for an angel to lead the people of God, accompanied by a pillar of cloud by day, and by a burning fire by night (Exod. xiv. 19; xxiii. 23); if an angel can ascend in a flame (Judg. xiii. 20), and finally if it is within the power of a man, to kindle a lamp to guide a friend, or to devise an artificial 'moon' to encircle the earth, is it not within the power of an angel of God to guide the Magi to the house in which the Infant Christ could be found? The angel Gabriel was especially sent to Mary to announce the miracle of the Incarnation, and a multitude of the heavenly host heralded His birth. Is it not reasonable to believe that an angel led the Magi by means of the star which they had seen in the East, and so deliver the whole subject from the astronomical problems that beset the ordinary interpretation?

We have done little more than survey the material contained in Scripture. Our next study must be directed to the place which angels occupied in the ages that are past and what part they will play in the world to come. Anticipating our findings, we believe that w shall discover that the 'gap' occasioned by angelic fall was 'filled' by the creation and subsequent redemption of man made 'for a little lower than the angels'.

One further note upon these references to angels and this article must close. We refer to Heb. ii. 16 which reads as follows in the A.V. and the R.V.

> "For verily He took not on Him the nature of angels, but He took on Him the seed of Abraham."
>
> A.V. margin Gr. reads: "He taketh not hold of angels, but of the seed of Abraham he taketh hold." The R.V. follows the A.V. margin.

A great mass of conflicting opinions will be found in commentaries upon this verse, some seeking to prove that Christ did not assume angelic form, but human, some seeking to prove that the passage means that He did not succour or assist angels, but men. As there is no agreement, either among commentators or the A.V. and the R.V., we must turn once more to the Fountain Head. One writer complains that the usage of the word 'to take hold' does not help him; the reason seems that the references do not help his idea of what it means. Let us examine the word afresh, epilambanomai.

Matt. xiv. 31	"Stretched forth His hand, and caught him."
Mark viii. 23	"He took the blind man by the hand."
Luke ix. 47	"And Jesus . . . . . took a child."
Luke xiv. 4	"He took him, and healed him."
Luke xx. 20, 26	"Take hold of His words."
Luke xxiii. 26	"They laid hold upon one Simon."
Acts ix. 27	"But Barnabas took him."
Acts xvi. 19	"They caught Paul and Silas."
Acts xvii. 19	"They took him."
Acts xviii. 17	"The Greeks took Sosthenes."
Acts xxi. 30, 33	"They took Paul."
Acts xxiii. 19	"Took him by the hand."
I Tim. vi. 12, 19	"Lay hold on eternal life."
Heb. ii. 16	The passage under consideration.
Heb. viii. 9	"I took them by the hand."

An impartial examination shews that the word is colourless. There is no moral meaning inherent to it. The same word can be used when Christ takes a man by the hand to heal him, as when the Roman soldiers take hold on Simon to compel him to bear the cross. The same word can be used for Barnabas' kindly act in taking hold of Paul to bring him to the apostles, as for the mob who took Paul with intent to kill him. The characteristic use of the word precludes the idea of 'assisting, helping, succouring'. It also seems to preclude the idea of assuming, as in the rendering 'assuming the nature of angels'. It simply means to take hold upon, whether good or evil motives and objects.

We have already observed that the A.V. italics make Heb. ii. 16 a somewhat needless repetition. May there not be some meaning which has been on the surface all the while? We believe there is. There is a footnote in The Emphatic Diaglott which reads, "For truly it", i.e., the fear of death, or death itself, 'does not lay hold of, or seize on angels, but of the seed of Abraham it does lay hold'. (Theolog Ref. and Kneeland). Those of our readers who are not conversant with the original must know that the 'he' or the 'it' is contained within the verb epilambanomai, and epilambanetai means equally it, as well as he, takes hold. Let us look at the structure again, verses 14-16 are included together there under one member:

C | 14-16. Oneness in death and deliverance. |
a | The death of Christ.
The destruction of the Devil who had the strength of death.
a | The deliverance of those subject to bondage of fear of death.
The seed of Abraham laid hold of by fear of death.

With the exception of the fourth line, the emphatic word is death. If the A.V. reading be retained it introduces a discordant note. If the idea of 'assisting' is adopted it harmonizes with 'deliverance', but has no relation with the emphatic word 'death'. What has Scripture to say about angels and death? Luke xx. 35, 36 says:

> "But they which are accounted worthy to obtain that age (the very pith and marrow of Hebrews) and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage NEITHER CAN THEY DIE ANY MORE FOR THEY ARE EQUAL TO THE ANGELS."

If the seed of Abraham, and flesh and blood, were laid hold of by the fear of death and thereby brought into bondage, Christ's becoming flesh and delivering them from that bondage is a fitting sequel.

> "Wherefore in all things it behooved Him to be made like unto His brethren that He might be a merciful and faithful High Priest" (verse 17).

No.8. Angels, their relation with the Divine Purpose as indicated in Heb. i. and ii.

pp. 67 - 69

In our last study together we did little more than to sort out the usage of the word ‘angel’, observing the different words that are so translated both in the A.V. and the LXX. With the information thus gathered, we can now devote our time to those passages which treat of the place that the angels have had in the past and may yet have in the working out of the Divine purpose in the future, and how far man is intended under grace to take the place, or ‘fill the gap’ that the default of the angels occasioned in the beginning. No book of the N.T. treats with this matter so thoroughly as does the epistle to the Hebrews, and therefore to that epistle we now turn.

It is impossible to read Heb. i. and ii. with any attention, and fail to be impressed by the fact that the argument of these chapters is most intimately linked together by the references to angels which abound in this part of the epistle. A brief analysis of this section is as follows:

Hebrews i. and ii.

A | i. 1, 2. God once spoke by prophets. Now by His Son.
B | i. 2-14. The Son. His Glories. Better than angels.
A | ii. 1-4. God once spoke by angels. Now by the Lord.
B | ii. 5-18. The Son. His Sufferings. Lower than angels.

The epistle in these two chapters compares and contrasts the ministry of the prophets and of angels with the ministry of the Son, and uses the word ‘angel’ ten times in this brief compass. Not only so, the argument of chapter i. is enforced by the quotation of seven Psalms, which quotation is distributed in such a way as to compel the reader to admit the presence of a plan and design.

The Seven Psalms of Heb. i.

A	ii. 7. The King on Zion. The decree.	Heb. i.6
B	lxxxix. 26, 27. The King.	i. 5
C	xcvii. 7. Worship Him all ye gods.	i. 6
D	civ. 4. His angels spirits, His ministers a flaming fire.	i. 7
C	xlv. 6, 7. Thy throne, O God is for ever and ever.	i. 8
B	cii. 25. The Creator.	i. 10, 11
A	cx. 1. The Priest on Zion. The oath.	i. 13

The argument of this chapter is further enforced by two questions:

“For unto which of the angels said He at any time, Thou art My Son?” (5).
“But to which of the angels said He at any time, Sit on My right hand?” (13), and to remember of the passage quoted and the whole purpose of the chapter is to provide the answer. We must now return to the beginning of this epistle and see how and with what terms these comparisons with angels are introduced. Over against the revelation given in times past through the instrumentality of the prophets, the Apostle places the immeasureable superiority of the ministry of the Son. In chapter iii. Christ as the Son is set over against Moses the servant (iii. 6) and Jesus the Son of God is set forth as the great High Priest Who has 'passed through the heavens' (iv. 14), and as the Son, He is consecrated for evermore (vii. 28).

We have already learned that angels are called 'sons of God', and consequently it may appear at first reading that the language of the Apostle is a little forced, but we are dealing with the inspired Scriptures and know before we go any further that no such conclusion is possible. The contrast between angels and the Saviour is not so much between One who is a Son and those who are not, but a contrast between those who are sons by creation, and the One Who is called "The only-begotten Son", for Heb. i. 5 not only says "Unto which of the angles said He at any time, 'Thou art My Son', but 'Thou art My Son; this day have I BEGOTTEN Thee'."

We must therefore pursue this subject further. Christ is called 'The only-begotten Son' four times in John's Gospel (John i. 14, 18; iii. 16, 18), and once in the first epistle (I John iv. 9). When reading these passages we are not conscious of any problem as we read of the Saviour as the only begotten Son—but the moment we add the final reference to this term, a problem presents itself.

"By faith Abraham when he was tried offered up Isaac; and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten son" (Heb. xi. 17). Now it is a matter of common knowledge that Abraham was the father, not only of Isaac, but of Ishmael (Gen. xvi. 15) and of other children by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 1). Unless therefore some factor is implied though unexpressed, Heb. xi. 17 presents a difficulty. As we discovered, so we find words employed in the context of Heb. xi. 17 that enable us to perceive something yet more wonderful in the title of the Lord. Abraham is spoken of as 'he that had received the promise', and of the son whom he offered it had been said 'That in Isaac shall thy seed be called' (Heb. xi. 17, 18). Ishmael was as truly begotten by Abraham as was Isaac, but Ishmael is called 'the son of a bondwoman' but Sarah herself as well as Abraham was given a promise by the Lord:

> "Through faith also Sara herself received strength to conceive seed, and was delivered of a child when she was past age because she judged Him faithful Who had promised" (Heb. xi. 11).

Sarah too was peculiarly distinguished by the changing of her name, even as was Abraham (Gen. xvii. 5, 14, 16). It is moreover written that the Lord 'visited Sarah as He had said, and the Lord did unto Sarah as He had spoke' (Gen. xxi. 1). Sarah was in the blessed line of the true seed, and so carried the promise of Eden forward towards its goal.

Gennao the verb translated ‘to beget’ is used of the mother also, and is then translated ‘to conceive’, ‘be delivered of’, ‘bear’, ‘be born’, ‘be made’ and ‘to bring forth’. For example:

> “Jacob begat Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus Who is called Christ” (Matt. i. 16).

The word translated ‘only-begotten’ is monogenes, and refers to the birth of the Saviour in the fullness of time ‘made of a woman’ (Gal. iv. 4). Another comfortable title is found in Heb. i. 6 ‘First-begotten’ which in the original is prototokos.

> “And again, when He bringeth in the First-begotten into the world He saith, And let all the angels of God worship Him.”

Translators are divided regarding the intention of the Apostle here. The A.V. ‘and again’ makes verse 6 another link in the chain of references quoted by the Apostle. The R.V. “And when He again” makes the word ‘again’ refer to the future.

We observe that the word translated ‘world’ in this verse is the Greek oikoumene ‘the habitable world’, and that this word occurs once more in Hebrews, namely in chapter ii., where we read:

> “For unto the angels hath he not put in subjection the world to come whereof we speak” (Heb. ii. 5).

By reading these two references together, it appears that the world to come will be subjected to Christ as the Firstborn, and not to the angels, and that moreover, the angels will at that great investiture ‘worship Him’. He is ‘the Firstborn of all creation’, ‘the Firstborn from the dead’, ‘the Firstborn among many brethren’. Pre-eminence as the ‘first’ is uppermost in the word prototokos.

Further comparisons are made in Heb. i. between Christ as the Son and angels. Angels are spirits who minister, but the Son is addressed by the title “God”, and has a ‘throne’ and ‘sceptre’. Not only so He occupies a unique position at the right hand of God, a position never occupied by an angel ‘at any time’. In our next article we shall pursue this theme further.

No.9. The more excellent name (Heb. i. 4).
pp. 86 - 91

It is a part of the argument of the epistle to the Hebrews, that the Apostle shall establish a series of 'better' things, for he is exhorting his readers 'to go on unto perfection', and having been a Pharisee by conviction and a Hebrew by birth, he knew how strong was the hold upon the Jewish believer of the things that belonged to the past.

"Better" in the epistle to the Hebrews.

A | i. 4. Christ at the right hand (verse 3).
Better than angels. More excellent name.
B | vi. 9. Things that accompany salvation.
C | vii. 7, 19, 22. Better priesthood, hope and covenant.
A | viii. 6. Christ at the right hand (verse 1).
ix. 23. Better covenant, better promises, more excellent ministry, better sacrifice.
B | x. 34; xi. 16, 35, 40. Things that accompany salvation.
C | xii. 24. Better things than the blood of Abel.

In the above outline, the thirteen occurrences of the word 'better' are grouped together, and their study is of course a theme in itself. We are concerned at the moment with the opening 'better' thing, but it will be impossible for us to forget that such a word is a key thought of the epistle, and that this must have a bearing upon its interpretation.

The first 'better' thing of the epistle is the exaltation of Christ ("having become by so much better than angels, by how much having inherited a more excellent name than they"). This sentence has an un-English sound, and yet it brings out the comparison that is intended. The becoming better than the angels is not by virtue of the Lord's deity. Looked at from the divine standpoint, He Who is addressed as God (verse 8), must of necessity be better than angels; but looked at from the human standpoint, He was made for a little while lower than the angels, and in that capacity as Son He could be and has been highly exalted. The measure of His excellence above angels is His inherited name: by how much He has inherited, by so much He is greater.

The question then has to do with the inherited name. But first, we might pause to ask: Why should such an argument be necessary, and in what way does it contribute to the theme of the epistle?

Writing as he was to Hebrews, the Apostle had in mind their veneration of angels. Stephen alludes to the place that angels hold in Israel, in Acts vii. 53, "who have received the law by the disposition of angels, and have not kept it". The epistle to the Galatians says of the law, "it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator" (Gal. iii. 19). Some of the Jews went so far as to contend that Malachi, the last of the prophets was an angel, his name meaning 'My messenger' or 'My angel'. It is part of the purpose of this epistle to place the Lord Jesus Christ, as the Son, far above every other name and dignity. To have commenced with Moses as the law-giver would not have gone back far enough; Moses the mediator received the law by the disposition of angels. It must therefore be shown that Christ is much better than they, to establish His complete superiority. The exaltation of the Lord to the right hand of the Majesty on high marks the time when the Son was given the name that is above every name. It was at the resurrection that He was declared 'Son of God with power'; it was as the risen One that He claimed 'all power' in heaven and in earth; the superiority of the Son above angels is one of degree, 'by so much', and is to be understood in the light of His inherited name. The Lord Jesus by His birth at Bethlehem became 'the Son of God', for said the angel to Mary, "the Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the highest shall overshadow thee: therefore also that holy thing that shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God" (Luke i. 35). When the Word became flesh, then was seen the glory of the only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. All through the spotless years of His life up to that dread crisis of the cross, the Father's testimony remained true and unchanged, 'This is My beloved Son'. He vindicated His claim to the name He bore, and the name becomes His by inheritance.

In order to appreciate the emphasis that should be placed upon the 'inherited' name, we take this study a little further in the epistle, and not that in Heb. i. 14 the believer is spoken of as an 'heir of salvation'. All who believe are saved, saved by grace through faith, but some (and this is one of the great themes of Hebrews), will receive salvation as an inheritance also. Christ died for the ungodly, He also learned obedience by the things which He suffered, and though from His birth, 'Holy, harmless and undefiled', He nevertheless was perfected through these sufferings, and became the Author of aionian salvation, not simply to those who believe, but to those who 'obey' Him (Heb. v. 7-9). Not only did He become the 'Author' but He became the 'Finisher' or 'Perfecter' of faith. "Who for the joy set before Him endured a cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of God" (Heb. xii. 2). There is a 'race' to be run, not only a gospel to be believed.

Those who thus inherit salvation, not only believe, but suffer, endure, run the race set before them, and 'have respect unto the recompense of the reward'. It is useless to speak of glory where there is not life. It is equally useless to speak of an inheritance unless one is already a child "If children, then heirs" is the order of Scripture, and the epistle to the Hebrews does not teach the way of salvation for the ungodly sinner, but deals rather with the pilgrim journey of the saint, with the evil heart of unbelief that can possess a believer at times, of things that accompany salvation, of a salvation that may be inherited.

Soteria "salvation" occurs in Hebrews seven times, and the occurrences are as follows:

Heirs salvation (i. 14).
Neglecting so great salvation (ii. 3).
The Captain of salvation (ii. 10).
The Author of aionian salvation (v. 9).
Things that accompany salvation (vi. 9).
Without sin unto salvation (ix. 28).
Unto the salvation of his house (xi. 7).

Salvation in its primary aspect is so removed from anything that the sinner can do, and is so infinitely beyond the touch of any failure on his part, that to speak of 'neglecting' is to misapply the word. Timothy could be urged not to neglect a gift which he already possessed (I Tim. iv. 14), and these Hebrews could be warned by the example of their fathers in the wilderness of the possibility of failing to reach salvation in its fullest meaning, and that is in view in Heb. ii. 3.

No sinner is saved from the guilt of sin by Christ as a 'Captain'. The figure that sets forth initial salvation is the Passover. Joshua is the type of the Captain of salvation, but he leads a redeemed people on to the promised possession, so the Captain of salvation in Heb. ii. 10 is seen 'bringing many sons (not to life), but to glory'. So with the rest of the occurrences of 'salvation' in Hebrews. This is true even with the last which deals with Noah and the Flood. The ungodly were not saved in the Ark. Noah was a saved and justified believer, only eight souls were saved, and the rest of the world destroyed. One can no more use the Ark as a type of initial salvation than one can use the type of the 'Captain' of the salvation that will be manifested at His Second Coming (Heb. ix. 28).

While salvation is found 7 times in Hebrews, the title "Saviour" does not occur. Acts v. 31 speaks of Him as 'A Prince and a Saviour'. Hebrews retains the word 'Prince' (ii. 10; xii. 2, same Greek word) but omits the title 'Saviour'. In the epistle He is Captain, Leader, High Priest and Perfecter, titles that deal with the land of promise rather than with the exodus from Egypt.

Let us now turn our attention to Heb. i. 4:

> "Being made so much better than the angels, as He hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they."

Let us first of all note the terms of comparison 'by so much', 'by how much', represented in the A.V. of Heb. i. 4 by the words 'so much' and 'as'.

The Apostle employs 'by so much' again in Heb. vii. 22 where we read in connection with the Melchisedec priesthood 'By so much was Jesus made a surety of a better testament'. The two words tosoutos and hosos came together in Heb. x. 25 "Exhorting one another and so much the more as ye see the day approaching". We do not need an inspired revelation to assure us that He Who is set forth as 'Son' and 'Brightness of His glory', 'Express image of His person', 'Upholder of all things', heir of all things and maker of the worlds, must of necessity be 'better than angels', and the epistle does not say any such unnecessary thing. What Hebrews is concerned to enforce is that he Who was so high, stooped so low, and as Man He became 'lower than the angels', but by virtue of His triumph over sin and death, that is by 'inheritance' and not by absolute inherent right, this same Redeemer has now been raised so much above angels as the inherited Name excels every name that is named in this world and that which is to come. For at the Name of Jesus every knee shall one day bow, and every tongue confess that He is Lord.

The Saviour as the Heir of all things, the One Who by reason of His finished work has obtained by inheritance the Name which is above every name, will not enjoy this inheritance alone. He was made one with those who shall share His glory that they may be made one with Him. They too become heirs of salvation, they too, by the exercise of faith and patience 'inherit the promises' (Heb. vi. 12) and find in both Noah and Abraham (Heb. xi. 7, 8) examples of that faith which is the substance of things hoped for.

While the bulk of the references to angels occur in Heb. i. and ii., there are two other occurrences that must be included to complete the tale, namely Heb. xii. 22 and xiii. 2. Heb. xii. 5-24 is occupied with a twofold theme: "sons" 5-14, "firstborn sons" 15-24. The first section speaks of that in which all partake if they be true children; the second speaks of that which relates only to the firstborn.

The structure of this second section is as follows:

Hebrews xii. 15 - 25.

A | 15. | a | Looking diligently.
b | Lest any man fall from or fail.
B | 16, 17. The birthright bartered (Prototokia).
C | 18-21. Ye are not come. Six "ands". SINAI.
C | 22, 23. But ye are come. Seven "ands". SION.
B | 23, 24. The birthright enjoyed (Prototokos).
A | 25. | a | See.
b | Lest ye refuse.

The section opens with a warning: "Looking diligently lest any man fail of the grace of God". It does not say 'fall from the grace of God', but 'fail of the grace of God'. Hustereo 'to come short' occurs in Heb. iv. 1, and that passage partially explains what we are considering here: "Let us therefore fear, lest a promise being left us of entering into His rest, any of you should seem to come short of it." The context speaks of Israel's forty years' wandering in the wilderness, and their failure, though redeemed, to 'go on unto perfection'. We are not dealing with sonship, but with birthright; not salvation, but possession, not deliverance from Egypt, but entry into Canaan. The warning is for the Hebrews who, like their fathers and like Esau, were in danger of drawing back, turning aside, losing the heavenly for the sake of the earthly. Heb. viii. 7 continues, 'Then should no place have been sought for the second', showing that the two covenants are here in view. The Apostle now brings before the mind the two mountains, Sinai and Sion, which are explained in Gal. iv. as representing the two covenants, Sinai standing for 'Jerusalem that now is, and is in bond age with her children', and Sion for 'Jerusalem that is above is free, which is our mother' (Gal. iv. 21-23 R.V.).

We have in Heb. xii. 18-21 Moses, the mediator of the old covenant, and in Heb. xii. 22-24 Jesus, the Mediator of the new covenant, and it is under the new covenant, and not under the old, that the birthright can be enjoyed.

The figure called Polysyndeton (or 'many ands'), is employed in the description of both covenants. Let us notice it:

> "For ye are not come unto the mount that might be touched, AND that burned with fire, AND unto blackness, AND darkness, AND tempest, AND the sound of a trumpet, AND the voice of words."
>
> "But ye are come unto Mount Sion, AND unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, AND to myriads of angels, a full assembly, AND to a church of firstborn ones having been enrolled in heaven, AND to God the Judge of all, AND to the spirits of righteous ones having been perfected, AND to the Mediator of the new covenant—Jesus, AND to the blood of sprinkling that speaketh better things than that of Abel."

It will be seen that a due observation of these 'ands' will help us to keep each feature in its place.

The A.V. leads one to read "To the general assembly and church of the firstborn", as tough it were one company. Paneguris, the word translated 'general assembly', means an assembly met together for some festal or joyful occasion, and the construction of the passage necessitates the translation: "And to myriads, a festal assembly of angels."

We learn that myriads of angels were associated with Sinai and the giving of the law: "The chariots of the Lord are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels: the Lord is among them, as in Sinai, in the holy place" (Psa. lxviii. 17; see also Deut. xxxiii. 2). If these angels were at mount Sinai, they will also be at mount Sion, and there they will be a 'festal assembly', for 'the marriage of the Lamb' will have come.

This church is the church of the firstborn, a special company, those who did not despise their birthright, nor barter it away for a morsel of meat. This same company is referred to as 'The spirits of just men made perfect', each expression having been used in the context of chapters xi. or xii. In xii. 9 we read of "The Father of spirits"; in x. and xi. 'the righteous' are in view (x. 38; xi. 4, 7, 8), and in xi. 40 it is their perfecting: "God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be perfected."

The close association of the 'better thing', the 'better country', and the 'better resurrection', with this perfecting shows that here in Heb. xii. we are taken to that time when the church of the firstborn shall be completed and enter into its inheritance. Here Abraham will set foot in that city for which he looked; Moses will receive that reward unto which he had respect; all who believed, yet died, not having received the promise, will enter into their birthright. The Mediator is not Moses, neither is the blood the blood of bulls and goats; Jesus is the Mediator of the new covenant, and this blood of sprinkling speaks better things than that of Abel.

The heavenly Sion is before the Apostle right through the epistle. The 'so great salvation' of ii. 3 is connected with the 'world to come' of which the Apostle spoke in ii. 5, and the 'glory' unto which the Captain of salvation was leading (ii. 10). The words: "He is not ashamed to call them brethren" (ii. 11), the thought of the Captain being 'perfected' through sufferings (ii. 10), find their echo in the words: "God is not ashamed to be called their God, for He hath prepared for them a city", and the 'perfecting' of the spirits of just men in xi. 16; xii. 23.

It was toward this goal that the Apostle urged the Hebrew believers to 'go on unto perfection'. The 'weight' which they were counseled to 'lay aside' would include those things mentioned in vi. 2, a passage we have already seen in close connection with Esau and his vain seeking for repentance (vi. 4-6; xii.16, 17).

By assembling the different passages together in the epistle to the Hebrews where an inheritance is in view, we realize something of the purport of chapter i. 4. He, the Lord, is the great Inheritor, and all who follow in His steps, who run with patience the race set before them, will not only be saved by grace, but 'inherit' salvation, 'inherit' promises, and 'reign' as well as live with Him in glory.

What the glory of the world was over which the angels had authority we can only guess; we know however, that as surely as Christ has by His finished Work obtained a more excellent name than they, so surely will the inheritance that is His excel in glory. This is once again the outworking of that principle which we have seen all along, the principle of the Pleroma.

No.10. Behold the fig tree, and all the trees.
pp. 104 - 108

The reader may at times have wondered why the whole issue of life and death should have 'hung upon a tree' in the garden of Eden, and as the choice of this emblem manifests something of the wisdom and knowledge of the Lord, it may not be amiss if we turn our attention to the place that 'trees' occupy in the working out of the purpose of the ages.

It is only within our own times that the extensive importance of trees to the well being of the world has been recognized as the following extracts will show:

> "Every moment that he draws breath here below man is dependent on the grass of the field for his very being. Sir Thomas Browne knew this and pointed it out in Religio Medici. 'All flesh is grass, is not only metaphorically, but literally true; for all those creatures that we behold are but the herbs of the field digested into flesh in them, or more remotely in ourselves'. In the fourth chapter of this present book, Mr. Baker puts the same thought into a few words 'Thus the tree, with the help of plant life, controls the food supply and life of man and of the animal kingdom'.
> A great deal of Mr. Baker's writing in all his books has been concerned with the disasters that follow when man forgets that he is not the world's master, but one of many tenants. The tenants are animate and inanimate—or so we chose to call them, though the animation of a tree is an inescapable thing, and some trees take on the proportions of majestic personality. But, call them what we may, the further we go into the matter the more deeply we apprehend that men and trees, grass and birds, the beasts of the field and all living things are held in a balance that may not lightly be disturbed . . . . . We find in > this book some truly terrifying pictures of man flying in the face of Nature, ruthlessly uprooting and burning the very stuff that holds the world together: and no less terrible pictures of Nature making her implacable reply. Man strips the forests of China: Nature swirls away in the Yellow River every year 2,500,000 tons of the soil on which man might live. Man strips the western prairies to the bone; Nature hands him a dust bowl . . . . . When improvidence goes so far that one edition of an American newspaper consumes twenty-four acres of forest, it is not difficult to imagine a too-near time when the plight of those Negroes (a tragedy on the Gold Coast) shall be the plight of millions of mankind. Only knowledge, implementing a rational co-operation with Nature, can avert such a disaster; and I am not aware of any writer today who spreads that knowledge more fruitfully than Mr. St. Barbe Baker" (Howard Spring).

A distinguished engineer some twelve years ago, warned America that unless something drastic and immediate was done to prevent the squandering of the soil, that America had not another 100 years before it of virile national existence. Another authority as late as 1946 pointed out that one-eighth of the crop land of the U.S.A. had been ruined by erosion, another eighth almost ruined, on a further quarter erosion is at work, and that in 100 years from now the United States will not be able to sustain a living man.

Mr. St. Barbe Baker says:

> "The red lights are against us in our reckless career. To continue to rape the earth and fight for dwindling supplies of food and timber, spells destruction . . . . . Let us remember that the empires of Babylon, Syria, Persia and Carthage were destroyed by the advance of floods and deserts caused by the increasing clearing of forests for farmland."

Much more to the same effect could be quoted, but what has been given is sufficient, not only to emphasize the extreme importance that must be attached to trees in their influence upon climate, soil and fertility, but to reveal once more to our wondering eyes, how completely abreast of the times is the Word of the living God. He knew what man is but now learning through centuries of folly for food or ill man's destiny was intimately associated with trees.

When the great day of the Lord shall come and judgment is about to fall on the earth we read:

> "Hurt not the earth, neither the sea, nor the trees, till we have sealed the servants of our God in their foreheads" (Rev. vii. 3).

When the storm breaks, we read:

> "The first angel sounded . . . . . and the third part of trees was burnt up, and all green grass was burnt up" (Rev. viii. 7).

Again when the bottomless pit is opened and the scourge of supernatural locusts is let loose on the earth, we read:

> "And it was commanded them that they should not hurt the grass of the earth, neither any green thing, neither any tree; but only those men which have not the seal of God in their foreheads" (Rev. ix. 4).

From whence came this knowledge of the superlative value of trees but from the Lord Himself?

The wisdom of Solomon is proverbial, and it is written that his wisdom excelled that of all the children of the east country and of Egypt, and of what did Solomon speak?

> "And he spake three thousand proverbs, and his sons were a thousand and five, and he spake of trees, from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall" (I Kings iv. 29-34).

The book of Psalms opens with the blessedness of the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, and says "He shall be like a tree planted by rivers of water" (Psa. i. 3). Jeremiah uses the same figure to describe the man whose hope is in the Lord (Jer. xvii. 8).

Much has been said by adverse critics of the Bible concerning the barbarity of the wars that are described in its pages, but moderns could learn with profit the humanitarian law of Deut. xx. 19:

> "When thou shalt besiege a city a long time, in making war against it to take it, thou shalt not destroy the trees thereof . . . . . thou shalt not cut them down to employ them in the siege (for the tree of the field is man's life)" (Deut. xx. 19).

Here again the recognition of the extreme value of trees in the law of Moses anticipates modern science by centuries. The purpose of the ages may be said to hang upon three trees:

> The Tree of the knowledge of good and evil.
> The Tree upon which Christ was crucified.
> The Tree of Life.

The curse came in with reference to the first, and it is written 'no more curse' when the last is made accessible. The middle one, the cross, is where Saviour was made a curse for us, as it is written "Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree" (Gal. iii. 13).

The book of Proverbs uses the figure of the "Tree of life" four times, and indeed speaks of a tree in no other way. There are two other occurrences of the Hebrews ets but these are translated 'wood' in relation to a fire.

Wisdom. "Happy is the man that findeth wisdom . . . . . she is a tree of life to them that lay hold upon her" (Prov. iii. 13-18).

Righteousness. "The righteous shall flourish as a branch (for 'leaf'). The fruit of the righteous is a tree of life" (Prov. xi. 28-30).

Desire. "When the desire cometh, it is a tree of life" (Prov. xiii. 12).

Heading. "A wholesome tongue is a tree of life" (margin: The healing of the tongue) (Prov. xv. 4). "The tongue, as a healing thing" (Miller's translation).

These, together with Gen. ii. 9 and iii. 22, are all the passages of the O.T. that speak of the Tree of Life. To these we may add the three references that are found in the Revelation.

> "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God" (Rev. ii. 7).
>
> "In the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river was there the tree of life . . . . . the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations" (Rev. xxii. 2).
>
> "Blessed are they that do His commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life" (Rev. xxii. 14). The texts read 'Wash their robes' instead of 'do His commandments' stole 'robe' instead of entole.

It will be seen that the tree of life does not stand for life in the abstract but in its outgoings. Wisdom that is held fast, righteousness that bears fruit, a healing tongue, and a fulfilled desire.

Let us now turn to the record of Gen. ii. and iii.:

> "The tree of life also in the midst of the garden, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil" (Gen. ii. 9).
>
> "Of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil thou shalt not eat of it" (Gen. ii. 17).

It will be observed that the tree of life is said to have been 'in the midst of the garden'. Now when the woman refers to the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, she says "Of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden" which means either that the two trees stood together, side by side, or that the two trees must be considered as representing one thing from two aspects.

How was it that neither Adam nor his wife partook of the tree of life? There was no prohibition, but two things seem clear from Gen. iii. 22:

(1) Man had partaken of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil.
(2) He might then have gone further and have taken of the tree of life, but was prevented. A flaming sword was placed at the east of the garden to keep the way of the tree of life.

Let us summarize what we have elsewhere discovered regarding the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. An undue emphasis upon evil is untrue, there should be as much stress laid upon the word 'good', and if every 'good' is balanced by an 'evil' and this is known, no thought of temptation, a bait or a snare is tolerable. Angels evidently know 'good and evil' and a comparison of II Sam. xiv. 17 and 20, will show 'good and evil' is synonymous with 'all things', and it is obvious that if one knew all that is good and all that is evil, he would have all knowledge.

That there were two trees in the midst of the garden, Gen. ii. 9, iii. 3 and iii. 22 make clear, but if we confine ourselves simply to 'trees' and pay no regard to meaning or typical teaching, of what interest can two trees planted centuries ago, be to us? It is what those two trees stand for, and the consequences of Adam's attitude to the Divine prohibition that bears upon us all. How can we explain why it was that man in his innocency, did not put forth his hand and eat of the tree of life, and live for ever? What was to stop him?

In our endeavour to find a reasonable explanation of this somewhat strange fact, our mind returns to the group of references to the tree of life in Proverbs. We observe that the coming of 'desire' is likened to a tree of life (Prov. xiii. 12) and that this word 'desire' is a translation of the same Hebrew word that comes in Gen. iii. 6 "pleasant (margin 'a desire') to the eyes". We also note that 'the desire accomplished is sweet to the soul' (Prov. xiii. 19). We learn that 'the desire of the righteous shall be granted' (Prov. x. 24) and that 'the desire of the righteous is only good' (Prov. xi. 23).

All desires, however, are not good, nor can their attainment be likened unto a tree of life. Some desires are but 'coveting', as Prov. xxi. 26 (margin) will show. Wisdom also is associated with the tree of life in Proverbs (iii. 13-18), and it will be remembered that when the woman saw that the tree was to be desired to make one wise, she succumbed to the temptation. The word translated 'wisdom' in Prov. iii. 13 is defined by Wilson as among other things, 'the discrimination of good and evil'. In following the 'desire' and seeking to be 'wise' our first parents did not fulfil one other condition indicated in Proverbs. They were not 'righteous' (Prov. xi. 30) for in taking of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil they transgressed. It would appear that so far as the typical teaching is concerned, what needed two separate trees to set forth the truth, can be represented in the spirit by two aspects of the same action.

Had our first parents obeyed God, desire would have been righteous and the tree of life would have been taken; but inasmuch as they disobeyed, desire was unrighteous and death came in its train. There is much more that lies behind the references to these two trees; but we shall be unable to include one or two equally important references if we stay longer.

A tree is associated with the bearing of a curse (Deut. xxi. 23) and so points on to the 'tree' upon which the Saviour died the just for the unjust (Gal. iii. 13). In three passages in the Acts the cross of Christ is spoken of as a 'tree' (Acts v. 30; x. 39; xiii. 29), and is so called by Peter in his epistle (I Pet. ii. 24), who never mentions the word 'cross' once. Paul in Galatians speaks both of the 'tree', as it touched the Jew under the law, and the 'cross' as it touched Gentiles by nature.

The 'healing' that is associated with the tree of life (Rev. xxii. 2) and the 'healing' brought about by the 'tree' shown to Moses (Exod. xv. 25) alike point to that salvation which was accomplished by the cross, for the word 'salvation' soteria is derived from sozo which is often used to speak of "healing" or making "whole" (Matt. ix. 21; Acts iv. 9, 12).

When the prophet would describe the blessed change that will take place when the day of glory dawns, he finds the imagery of the trees at his hand.

"For ye shall go out with joy, and be led forth with peace . . . . . all the trees of the field shall clap their hands. Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree" (Isa. lv. 12, 13).

"The glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee, the fir tree, the pine tree and the box together . . . . . and I will make the place of My feet glorious" (Isa. lx. 13).

"The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose" (Isa. xxxv. 1).

"Until the spirit be poured upon us from on high and the wilderness be a fruitful field, and the fruitful field be counted for a forest" (Isa. xxxii. 15).

"He shall cause them that come of Jacob to take root: Israel shall blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit" (Isa. xxvii. 6).

Here then is another pleroma, a story of grace and glory caused by the trees of Scripture. Like the Apostle in another context, we are obliged to write 'time would fail me' to speak of the symbolism of "The Fig, the Vine and the Olive", of the 'uncorruptible' or aseptic (LXX) trees from which the Ark was made (Exod. xxv. 10), or what is implied by the promise "as the days of a tree are the days of My people" (Isa. lxv. 22), or the 'two olive trees' of Zech. iv., or the parable of Jotham of Judg. ix. Neither can we ponder the question of resurrection with Job (xiv. 7), the pictures of antichristian pride assembled by Ezekiel (xxxi.), nor the vision of the great tree granted to Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. iv.), but if the reader will but explore these sylvan stretches of inspired imagery, a wealth of refreshing truths will be gathered as from a veritable "tree of life".

No.11. Two attitudes to the curse---Civilization or Redemption.

pp. 126 - 130

While it is the responsibility of the teacher to deal with positive truth rather than pursue all the possible and impossible side lines of controversy, we must not forget that occasionally the purpose of grace is served by pausing in the pursuit of truth, in order that a necessary warning may be given. So the Apostle, in Col. i. 28, combines 'warning with 'teaching' and in II Tim. iii. 16 'instruction' is associated with 'correction'. It is sometimes as important, when giving directions, to warn not to turn to the left, as it is to instruct to turn to the right.

If the pleroma is God's consequent reaction to the failure brought about by the enemy, and if the attack of the enemy is characterized by deceit and counterfeit more than by open warfare, it should not surprise us to discover early in the record of truth, that an attempt was made to substitute a false pleroma for the true.

When Jude wrote in his epistle of the prophecy uttered by Enoch, he is careful to designate him as 'the seventh from Adam', the reason being that there was another of the same name in the line of Cain. This was a part of the deceiver's attempt to foist a substitute for truth upon the earth.

The A.V. margin of Gen. iv. 17 draws the reader's attention to the fact that the Hebrew is chanock and as there is no such note at Gen. v. 18 he may suspect that the names are not identical. The same spelling is employed in Gen. iv. 17 as in Gen. v. 18, and when the genealogy is repeated in I Chron. i. 3, it is spelt henoch.

To Enoch in the line of Cain was born Irad which is similar, though not identical with Jared, the son of Mahalaleel (Gen. v. 15). The difference between these two names is that of one letter, Irad employing one letter more than Jared in the original. Another pair of names that suggest substitution is Methusael (Gen. iv. 18) & Methuselah (Gen. v. 21), which differs only in the conclusion of the word. At the close of Cain's line is Lamech, whose boast introduces the words 'sevenfold' and 'seventy and seven fold' (Gen. iv. 24), while Lamech the father of Noah, lived "seven hundred, seventy and seven years". There is sufficient superficial likeness in these names to suggest intention, and that intention coming through the line of Cain would be evil.

The record of Cain's descendants opens with a reference to the curse that had fallen upon the earth (Gen. iv. 11) and Cain's attempt to palliate the effects of the curse is CIVILIZATION, "He builded a city" (Gen. iv. 17). Lamech, the descendant of Seth also speaks of the curse which rested upon the ground, but instead of attempting to minimize the curse by human expedients, he looked for 'rest' through the ministry of his son Noah, whom he so named, because the word means 'comfort' or 'rest'. Lamech looked to REDEMPTION where Cain looked to civilization.

The first cities of the Bible are associated with evil and rebellion.

(1) Enoch, the city built by Cain after the curse (Gen. iv. 17).
(2) Nineveh, the city built by Nimrod, the mighty Rebel (Gen. x. 11).
(3) Babel, the city and tower built in rebellion (Gen. xi. 4).
(4) Sodom, the city which was destroyed by fire (Gen. xix. 24).

Meanwhile Abraham had left Ur of the Chaldees, and had become a pilgrim and a stranger, dwelling in tents, having here 'no continuing city' but seeking 'one to come' (Heb. xi. 10, 16; xiii. 14).

Let us ponder the record of Lamech, his reference to Noah and his typical work of deliverance. The primary significance of the Hebrew preposition min, translated 'because' in Gen. v. 29, is that of 'a part or portion', hence something arising out of, or caused by, anything, as for example Israel who sighed 'by reason of' the bondage they endured (Exod. ii. 23). Lamech had no doubt but that the 'work and toil' which life imposed, was 'because' of the curse that had fallen upon the ground.

The story of Gen. i.-ix., from Adam to Noah, is bounded by references to the "ground", Hebrew adamah.

A | i. 26. "Every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth (ground)."
B | ii. 5. "There was not a man to till the ground."

* * * * * * *

A | ix. 2. "All that moveth (creepeth) upon the earth (ground)."
B | ix. 20. "Noah began to be an husbandman (lit. a man of the ground)."

In between these two sets of references is the curse, the flood, and the new start under Noah. The impression which this survey leaves in the mind is that Lamech was right. Not the building of a city, but the building of an Ark was God's pleroma to fill the gap or rent occasioned by the curse. The way of Cain is still markedly different from the way of Abel.

The parallels between Adam and Noah are so many and so clear, that the reader who once perceives them cannot avoid the conclusion that with Noah, God was making a new start.

Before setting out the parallel passages, we note one or two more features of interest concerning Lamech.

> "In naming his son Noah, Lamech emphasized his felt need of rest. Noah is derived from nuach which means 'to be at rest', and occurs in Gen. viii. 4, 'and the ark rested in the seventh month'. Again in Exod. xx. 11, 'for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that is in them, and rested the seventh day'. When we read in Gen. viii. 9, 'the dove found no rest', the word is manoach, or in viii. 21, 'the Lord smelled a sweet savour', the word 'sweet' is nichoach, and literally the passage reads, 'a savour of rest'.
>
> Thus it will be seen that for God as well as man there is a place of rest, and that rest is Christ, of whom Noah and the ark are prophetic.
>
> Lamech in naming his son said, 'this same shall comfort us (nacham, or give us rest) concerning our work and toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed'. The word rendered 'toil' is twice rendered 'sorrow' in Gen. iii. where the curse is first pronounced, 'I will greatly multiply thy sorrow', and 'in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life' (verses 16, 17). The words 'work and toil' may be a figure, meaning very grievous work; the work and the toil are clearly specified as being the work and toil of the hands, and in connection with the ground, that under the curse yielded but thorns and thistles of itself, and bread only by 'sweat of face'.
> Lamech, 'the seventh from Adam', in the line of Cain, has three sons, one (Jabal) kept cattle, and so continued in the work of the ground, but Jubal was the father of all such as handle the harp and organ, and Tubal-cain an instructor of every artificer in brass and iron. It would appear that the veneer which has spread over the curse, and which is variously named culture, civilization, etc., to-day, was originated by the sons of Lamech in Cain's line; the Lamech who begat Noah, however, is in direct contrast, he does not appear to have attempted to evade the weary toil that must be experienced by those who, by sweat of face, eat the bread that is produced by the ground that is cursed. Lamech longed for rest, but he did not accept the vain travesties of Cain's descendants. There are many to-day who, surrounded by the comforts and inventions of man could scarcely believe that there is truth in the record of the curse on the ground. The products of the earth and sea are brought to their door; no thought passes through their mind as to the sorrow and the toil that someone, somewhere, must endure to provide them with the necessities of life. Lamech knew no such deadening influence; the toil of his hands was hard and wearying because of the ground that the Lord had cursed. A friend writing recently gave an unconscious echo of Lamech's words, saying, "When one, from the back of the land, sees the toil of man and beast, there come to the lips no more fitting words than, 'Even so, Come, Lord Jesus'. "

Harps and organs, however, melodious and charming, brass and iron, modeled and designed into the most wonderful of machines and inventions, though they may 'prove' to the natural man the upward development of man's attainments, afford no rest for those in whose hearts the truth of God abides. Rest for them is found in the true Noah, whose witness and whose experiences testify of the resurrection, and a new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." (From Volume VIII of The Berean Expositor, pages 101-103).

Let us now set out the evident parallelism that the record of Genesis provides between the lift story of Adam and that of Noah.

Adam has three sons, Cain, Abel and Seth (Gen. iv. 1, 2, 25). One Son, Cain, is cursed more than the earth, and becomes a fugitive and a vagabond (iv. 12).	Noah has three sons, Shem, Ham and Japheth (Gen. v. 32). One Son, Ham, the father of Canaan, is cursed, even though God had promised not to curse the ground any more, and Canaan becomes a servant of servants (ix. 25; viii. 21).
God curses Cain for shedding his brother's blood but does not sanction vengeance by human hands (Gen. iv. 10-15).	God will require the life blood from every beast and man, but now delegates the execution of judgment to man himself. "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed" (Gen. ix. 5, 6).
The Lord sets a 'mark' (oth) to protect Cain (Gen. iv. 15).	The Lord sets a bow in the cloud for a 'token' (oth) to assure all flesh (Gen. ix. 13).
God planted a garden (Gen. ii. 8).	Noah planted a garden (Gen. ix. 20).
Nakedness and shame are linked together in connection with Adam (Gen. iii. 10, 11).	Nakedness and shame are linked together in connection with Noah (Gen. ix. 21-24).
The fruit of the tree, and the fig (Gen. ii. 8; iii. 6, 7, 10).	The wine, and the vineyard (Gen. ix. 20-23).
The redemption of both man and his lost dominion is symbolized by the cherubim (Gen. iii. 24).	The redemption of both man and his lost dominion is symbolized by the animals preserved alive in the ark (Gen. vi. 13-16; viii. 1, 17-19).
The serpent beguiled the woman and brought about the curse (Gen. iii. 24; II Cor. xi. 3).	The sons of God by their actions towards the daughters of men, bring about the Flood (Gen. vi. 1-4).
All the days of Adam were 930 years (Gen. v. 5).	All the days of Noah were 950 years (Gen. ix. 29).

No.12. "The earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof."
pp. 155 - 159

The principle, that a movement toward the goal of the ages is followed by a rupture and a gap, which in its turn is followed by another movement in the nature of 'fullness' or pleroma, has now been established. The cataclysm of Gen. i. 2 is succeeded by the six-day creation which in its turn ends with the expulsion of man from the garden and his ultimate return to the dust from which he was taken. This lesser creation, with its stretched out heaven, the firmament, is the first of a series of fullnesses that pave the way for the advent of Him in Whom "All the fullness" dwells.

The reader will be familiar with the words: "The earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof", but may not be aware that in addition to these, there are several passages which read "and all that is therein", these two must be included in the references to the great 'fullness'. In most cases, the A.V. gives a marginal note to guide the student, but no theory that involves the number of references should be built without personal investigation of the original.

This conception of 'fullness' is not limited to the earth, for the sea, the world and the land are also included. In some instances the 'earth' is limited to the land of Israel, as for example the reference in Deut. xxxiii. 16 where we read of the precious things of the 'earth' and by the fact that the Hebrew eretz is used, we might assume that this passage refers to the wide 'earth'. A glance at the context however will show that eretz is here used in its more restricted sense for it occurs in verse 13 "Blessed of the Lord be His land" and the whole chapter is devoted to 'the blessing, wherewith Moses the man of God blessed the children of Israel'. In nearly ever case, however, what is said of the 'land' of Israel is but a type and shadow of what shall one day be true of the earth.

No such limitation however is attached to Psa. xxiv. 1, 2 for we read not only that the earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof, but 'the world, and all they that dwell therein. For He hath founded it upon the seas, and established it upon the floods'.

Expositors and commentators have given scant attention to these words, and many appear to have looked at them and 'passed by on the other side'. There is more here however than at first appears. In Psa. cxxxvi. we read:

> "To Him that by wisdom, made the heavens:
> For His mercy endureth for ever.
> To Him that stretched out the earth above the waters;
> For His mercy endureth for ever" (Psa. cxxxvi. 5, 6).

That the creation of the six days is in view, the subsequent references to 'great lights', 'the sun to rule by day and the moon and stars to rule by night', make clear.

In article No.4 of this series we observed that the 'firmament' or that which for the time is 'called heaven' (Gen. i. 6) is the translation of the Hebrew raqia "thinness" or "expansion". It is the verb raqa 'to stretch out' that is employed of the earth in Psa. cxxxvi. 6. Not only so, but Isaiah on two occasions uses the same verb in the same context:

> "He that created the heavens, and stretched them out; He that spread forth (raqa) the earth" (Isa. xlii. 5).
>
> "That stretcheth forth the heavens alone; that spreadeth abroad (raqa) the earth by Himself" (Isa. xliv. 24).

Whatever meaning therefore we attach to the stretching out of the firmament over the earth we must also attach to the stretching out of the earth over the waters.

This is not the only passage that speaks in this wise.

> "The heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water" (II Pet. iii. 5).

The Lord said to Job:

> "Whereupon are the foundations fastened?" (Job xxxviii. 6).

Here, as we have remarked earlier, the word 'foundations' is the same as the word 'socket' used of the Tabernacle, and we now observe that the word translated 'fastened' is the Hebrew taba which means 'to sink' as in mire (Psa. lxix. 2, 14) or as when one is 'drowned' (Exod. xv. 4), and so most clearly visualizes the earth as stretched out over the waters and anchored by some means to the earth beneath. This necessitates further explanation. One might object to such a statement and say "How can the earth be anchored to the earth?" but such an objection is not valid for it ignores an essential principle of all interpretation, namely, to use terms according to any explanation that may have been attached by authority or custom. Now just as the 'firmament' was 'called' heaven, so the 'dry land' that appeared above the waters on the third day is 'called' by a similar concession 'earth' (Gen. i. 10), but this is by no means commensurate with the original 'earth' of Gen. i. 1. Just as the firmament is stretched out under the true heaven, so the dry land is the earth that is stretched out over the waters. If the reader is at all abreast of scientific discovery, he will know that these references to the stretching out of the earth's crust upon the waters are a most wonderful evidence of their inspiration.

> "For He hath formed it upon the seas, and established it upon the floods" (Psa. xxiv. 2).

Punch, which is a very sure index of contemporary thought, makes it very evident that the possibility of the movement of the continents has so far become a matter of common knowledge that it can form the basis of the following pleasantry.

W.K.H.

From Punch, July 7, 1948.

"A geologist thinks that Britain is slowly tilting towards the south. Holiday makers are asked not to crowd together on the end of Brighton pier."

To return seriously to the matter in hand, the following extracts are taken from the work entitled The Origin of Continents and Oceans by Alfred Wegener, Professor of Geophysics and Meteorology at the University of Graz, Austria.

In the introduction to the English translation, John W. Evans, C.B.E., F.R.S., President of the Geological Society, makes the following observation:

> One of the most interesting questions raised by Professor Wegener is the possibility of actually detecting the relative movement of land masses at the present time by instrumental means . . . . . In 1922, Lt.-Col. Jensen made a careful determination of the longitude by means of wireless signals from Naven . . . . . he considered that this was a confirmation of the westward movement of Greenland."

The reader will note the words 'the relative movement of land masses' and 'the westward movement of Greenland'. These are words of a scientist who apparently had no intention of relating his findings to the teaching of the Word. Professor Wegener calls his views 'The Displacement Theory' and draws attention to the similarity of the contours of the coast line of Brazil and Africa.

> "Not only does the great right-angled bend formed by the Brazilian coast at Cape San Roque find its exact counterpart in the re-entrant angle of the African coast line near the Cameroons, but also, south of these two corresponding points, every projection of the Brazilian side corresponds to a similarly shaped bay in the African, and conversely each indentation on the Brazilian coast has a complementary protuberance on the African. Experiment with a compass on a globe shows that their dimensions agree accurately. This new idea is called the theory of the displacement of continents, or more shortly, the displacement theory, since its prominent component is the assumption of great horizontal drifting movements which the continental blocks underwent in the course of geological time and which presumably continue even today. According to this idea, to take a particular case, millions of years ago, the South American continental plateau lay directly adjoining the African plateau, even forming one large continental mass. This first split in cretaceous* (* - Cretaceous = chalk like. A geological term for certain rock formations.) time into two parts, which then like floating icebergs drifted farther and farther apart."

The reader will not fail to mark the figure employed here. How different from the conception of a solid earth, and how near an approximation to the Scriptural teaching of the earth spread out on sea and flood, is the figure 'like floating icebergs', yet this figure occurs in a scientific and non-Biblical treatise.

> "It is assumed that the continental blocks with a thickness of about 100km. swim in a magma out of which they only project about 5km."

Note the words 'swim in a magma'. A magma is a crude mixture of mineral or organic matter in a thin paste, a confection. How did Job, Isaiah and the Psalmist know that the dry land 'swam in a magma' apart from revelation? And how the so-called 'man in the street' would scoff at such an idea today as unscientific!

> "The floors of the ocean, form the surface of the next layer of the body of the earth which is also assumed to exist under the continental blocks."
>
> "The rotation of the entire crust of the earth—but whose parts however did not alter their relative positions—has already been assumed by many authors, as Sir John Evans, Loffelholz von Colberg, Kreichgauer and others."

After several pages of complicated mathematics, Wegener continues:

> "From this it must be concluded that there are already undisturbed levels, and from this the step seems inevitable, that in the continents and the floors of the ocean we have two different layers of the body of the earth, which expressed in a somewhat exaggerated form, act as water does between great sheets of ice."

Gen. i. 9, 10 draws attention to the fact that 'God called the dry land earth' and that it 'appeared' when the waters were gathered together which He called 'seas', which fact is often expanded by the references already given from Psa. cxxxvi. 6; Isa. xlii. 5 and Psa. xxiv. 2.

Speaking of the phenomenon, the movement of the magnetic poles, Wegener says, "In the matter of the displacement of the pole relative to the intercover of the earth we need a viscous earth. Laplace has shown that the axes in a rigid earth cannot be displaced". Viscous means, in physics, imperfectly fluid; adhesively soft.

A Further testimony is reported by Reuter 22/6/48. Dr. F. W. Whitehouse, Queensland University lecturer in geology told a meeting in Brisbane that from calculations made in the U.S. it had been estimated that the sea level was rising about four inches a century on a world-wide average. Four inches per century, means that at the time of Christ, nineteen hundred years ago, the level of the land was 6 ft. 4 ins. higher than it was today, and that if the sinkage continues, it will not be long before some lands will be endangered and disappear. Everything points to a not far distant future when this exhausted earth will have reached its foreknown limits, and be ready for the great purging and the still greater renewal. Such is the testimony of modern science to the veracity and to the inspiration of the Scriptures, and to statements of Scripture which some years ago would have been held up to ridicule by the 'science of the day'. This earth, the habitable world (Psa. xxiv. 1, Heb. tebel, Greek oikoumene), this earth over which the heaven stretches like the curtains of the Tabernacle and whose sockets, like the silver sockets of the Tabernacle speak of redemptive purpose, this, 'the dry land' of Gen. i. 10 is associated with 'fullness' as we have already seen, and with the glory of God as we must now consider.

"The whole earth is full of His glory" (Isa. vi. 3).

This cry of the Seraphim when they beheld His glory (i.e. the glory of Christ, John xii. 41) is variously translated. The A.V. margin reads 'His glory is the fullness of the whole earth' whereas the R.V. margin reads 'The fullness of the whole earth is His glory' and this follows most clearly the order of the Hebrew original.

It is beyond the power of man to decide whether the words 'the whole earth' embrace the whole world, or whether in the first instance they mean the whole land, for the same word which is translated 'earth' is also translated 'land' (Isa. i. 19; ii. 7, 8; v. 30; vi. 12, etc.) but even so, the lesser 'land' of Israel is a type or symbol of the whole earth, and so whatever is said of the ultimate blessing of 'the land' but foreshadows the greater blessing of 'the earth' in the Lord's good time.

So, when Israel were crossing the Jordan in order to 'divide for an inheritance the LAND' (Heb. eretz Josh i. 6, 11, 13, 14, 15), the Lord is called "The Lord of all the EARTH" (Heb. eretz Josh. iii. 11, 13), and when at the other end of their history, under another "Joshua" (Zech. iii. 1) Israel return from their captivity to the same land (Zech. iii. 9; vii. 14), once again the Lord is called 'the Lord of all the earth' (Zech. vi. 5) even though in the very next verse, eretz is translated 'country'.

The twenty-fourth Psalm that speaks of the earth being the Lord's and the fullness thereof, uses the word 'glory' more than any other of the Psalms. Five times it speaks of "The King of glory", Who is to be "King over all the earth" (Zech. xiv. 9). A further link between Psa. xxiv., Isa. vi. and Zech. xiv., is found in the reference to the earthquake which took place in the days of Uzziah king of Judah (Zech. xiv. 5), which appears by the context to have been one of the many foreshadowings of the Second Coming of the Lord. The fullness of the earth and the glory of the Lord are bound up together; he that furthers the one, enhances the other, and that which 'comes short of the glory of God' militates against the blessing of man.

Since the first great gap (Gen. i. 2) other lesser gaps have come, as Adam, Noah, Abraham and the successive stories of their stand or fall are unfolded. Equally so, a succession of 'fullnesses' follow, until all is headed up in Him, in Whom 'all fullness' dwells. Let us pursue this theme, for in its understanding is enshrined the heart of God's age-long purpose.

No.13. The Testimony of Peter to the days of Noah.
pp. 169 - 174

After the great gap formed by the loss of Paradise, the record divides into two according as the false and the true seed are spoken of, until we come to the next great crisis, the Deluge. Here history seems to repeat itself. The deep (Heb. tehom) of Gen. i. 2, is not referred to again until we reach the record of the Flood (Gen. vii. 11; viii. 2). The 'dry land' (Heb. yabbashah Gen. i. 9, 10) which appeared on the third day from beneath the waters, finds an echo in the 'drying up' of the earth after the Flood (Heb. yabesh Gen. viii. 7, 14). There are a number of interesting parallel features between Adam and Noah, which establish that the relationship is intended. For example both Adam and Noah are commanded to replenish the earth, both have three sons, one of whom becomes involved in a curse and is either 'of that wicked one' or the father of Canaan, who in his turn is seen to be of the evil seed. These parallels are so close that we have accepted without question that Peter, in his second epistle, chapter iii. refers to Gen. i. 1 and 2, whereas a careful study of his epistles will show that he had, primarily, the days of Noah before his mind. This testimony is important, and the examination of it will necessitate a fairly intensive study, but the subject matter is of the deepest solemnity and fully justifies all the time and space which we have devoted to its elucidation. Just as the primal creation is balanced after the gap of the ages by the "End" that succeeds the New Heaven and the New Earth, and just as Paradise lost is balanced by Paradise restored, so the structure persists and another pair of corresponding members can be added to the outline already presented in articles that have previously appeared.

Let us now attend to the teaching of Scripture with regard to this great epoch.

Much light can be obtained on matters that are beyond our ken or experience but the use of analogy, and much of Israel's history and hope foreshadows the wider purpose of the ages.

Most teachers have found Peter's words in II Pet. iii. of great service in visualizing the great unfolding of this purpose, and to this we first of all address ourselves. In the volume entitled Dispensational Truth the reader will find set out in structural form, the Purpose of the Ages, beginning with Gen. i., ending with I Cor. xv. 28 and revealing the dispensation of the Mystery as central. We will not reproduce the whole outline, the following abridged extract is all that will be needed.

The Purpose of the Ages.

b | The Church.
c | Reconciliation of all things.

"GOD ALL IN ALL" (I Cor. xv. 28).

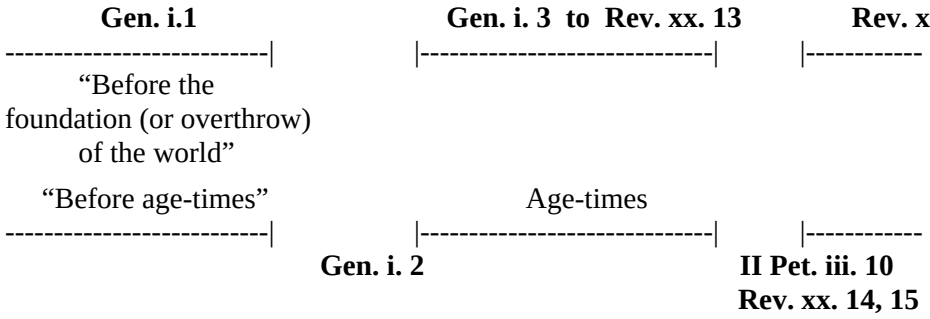
It is clear from this extract that we believe that the ages began with the present creation. The question of what we believe however is of minor importance, the supreme question is What saith the Scriptures? As pioneers in the sphere of Dispensational Truth, the Mystery and related subjects, we must be the first to admit to repeated necessity of revision, and the present seems an opportune moment to give this and related matters a somewhat fuller examination than has hitherto been possible.

The moment we attempt to place the age-times, the question of the three creations of Scripture presses for fuller consideration, for unless we entertain Scriptural views concerning these three great acts of creation, all contention as to 'before' and 'since' any one of them will necessarily be futile.

A very superficial reading of Scripture will convince the student that there are revealed three great creative movements—one past, one present and one future.

(1) "In the beginning" (Gen. i. 1) Primal Creation.
(2) "In six days" (Gen. i. 3 - ii. 3) Present Creation.
(3) "In the day of God" (II Pet. iii. 12, 13). New Heavens and new earth.

The primal creation of Gen. i. 1 is separated by the chaos of Gen. i. 2 from the present creation; this statement has yet to be proved, while the present creation is again separated from the New Heavens and Earth by the dissolution of II Pet. iii. 10, and the following diagram visualizes this feature in the great purpose of the ages.



Peter, as a minister of the Circumcision, is particularly concerned with that portion of the purpose of the ages that impinges upon the hope of Israel. There is however in the history of Israel much that is typical of vaster things, and we are not surprised therefore to discover features that foreshadow the larger issues dealt with by Paul alone. This vast sweep of the ages which we have suggested in the diagram given above, finds an echo in the words of Peter when he speaks of past, present and future heavens and earth, as they appear in the prophetic view of Israel and its hope.

We may use Peter's language as a guide to the wider purposes of the age thus:

For Gen. i. 1
we may use the words, "The world that then was".
For Gen. i. 3 to Rev. xx. 13
we may use the words "the heavens and the earth which are now".
For Rev. xxi. 1 onwards
the words "the new heavens and the new earth", providing we remember all the time that vaster issues than those visualized in II Peter are in view. Peter wrote his epistles to:

> "The strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia" (I Pet. i. 1).

As II Pet. iii. opens with the words "This second epistle, I now write unto you" it is evident that the chapter before us was addressed to the 'circumcision'. The term diaspora 'scattered' became a name to designate 'the twelve tribes scattered abroad' (James i. 1), or the 'dispersed among the Gentiles' (John vii. 35 R.V. margin). This term had become fixed during the two hundred years before Christ that the Septuagint had been in use, for in such passages as Deut. xxx. 4, Neh. i. 9, Psa. cxlvii. 2 diaspora is used of the 'outcasts of Israel'.

As we shall have occasion to compare some of the language of Peter with the Gospel according to Mark, it will be well to make sure that the reader is aware of the close association of these two servants of the Lord.

From Acts xii. 12 we learn that Peter was friendly with Mark's mother and in I Pet. v. 13 he speaks of "Marcus my son". Jerome speaks of both Paul and Peter with their assistants thus:

> "Therefore he (Paul) had Titus for a Secretary, as the blessed Peter, had Mark, whose Gospel was composed by him after the dictation of Peter."

To this may be added the testimony of Eusebius:

> "After the departure of Peter and Paul, Mark the disciple and secretary (hermeneutes or 'interpreter') of Peter, transmitted to us in writing what Peter had preached."

The four Gospels therefore stand related to one another as follows:

A	Matthew.	Independent.
B	Mark.	Interpreter of Peter.
B	Luke.	Fellow-worker with Paul.
A	John.	Independent.

We are now free to examine II Pet. iii., and we shall remember as we do it, that Peter, the minister of the circumcision, admits in the same chapter that the Apostle Paul has many things to say which were hard to be understood both by himself (Peter) and his hearers, and we shall not expect to find the sweep backward beyond Gen. i. 2 in Peter's most far flung statement, that we find in Paul's great epistles of the Mystery. We must make a preliminary enquiry into the testimony of II Pet. iii. 1-14 and discover the scope of Peter's Ministry and Epistle. We note that chapters i. and ii. must be considered as introductory, for it is chapter iii. that opens with the words "This second Epistle, beloved, I now write unto you", and the burden of the chapter is the denial by scoffers of the possibility of the Lord's return by an appeal to the supposed "Uniformity of Natural Law", and the exposure of the weakness of this objection by the Apostle. An examination of the first chapter will show that this was prominently in his mind all the time. II Pet. i. 16-21 is an anticipation of II Pet. iii. 2, 3 and II Pet. ii. 1-22 is an anticipation of II Pet. iii. 3-13 and corresponds in the structure which will be given later. These selfsame scoffers, or their predecessors, have evidently charged the believer who expected the personal return of the Lord with following 'cunningly devised fables' (II Pet. i. 16), and from this he proceeds to the nature and trustworthiness of prophecy, recalling in passing the conviction he himself had received of its truth when upon the Mount of Transfiguration.

The structure of the passage is as follows:

II Peter i. 16 - 21.

A | 16-. What the Apostle's witness was NOT. "Cunningly devised fables."
B | -16, 17-. What it WAS. "Honour and glory."
C | -17, 18. HOW it CAME. "The voice from heaven."
B | 19. What the Prophetic Word IS. "A light, till the day dawn."
A | 20. What it is NOT. "Not of its own unfolding."
C | 21. HOW it CAME. "Moved by the Holy Ghost."

In this opening argument we have similar features that are re-stated or amplified in chapter iii.

The Second Coming of Christ.
The charge made 'cunningly devised fables'.
The testimony of apostle and prophet.
The introductory phrase 'knowing this first'.

In II Pet. iii. we have:

The Second Coming of Christ.
The scoffers' charge 'where is the promise of His coming?'.
The testimony of prophets and apostles.
The introductory phrase 'knowing this first'.

To piece together the complete structure in all its details would take us too long and is not necessary for our present purpose. The following abridged outline will be all that is required to demonstrate the scope of the epistle and particularly the correspondence that exists between II Pet. i. 16-21 & iii. 2, 3 and II Pet. ii. 1-22 with iii. 3-13. If this is realized, we shall have reached the first step in our enquiry. We draw special attention to the two words 'overthrow' katastrophe and 'overflow' katakluzo, and the correspondence established between the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, with the dissolution of the elements.

The Second Epistle of Peter.

A | i. 1-4. Opening Benediction. Grace, peace, through the knowledge of God.
Called to His own glory.
B | i. 5-11. Give all diligence, never fall (ptaio).
Give diligence, make sure.
C | a | i. 12-15. "Stir up." "remembrance."
b | i. 16-21. The Apostles and Prophets (details given above).
"Knowing this first."
c | ii. 1-22. False prophets and false teachers.
Reference to fall of angels, the Flood and the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah.
An overthrow (katastrophe).
Lusts of flesh and uncleanness.
C | a | iii. 1. "This second epistle, beloved, I now write unto you:
In both which I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance.
b | iii. 2, 3-. The Prophets and Apostles.
"Knowing this first."
c | iii. -3-13. Scoffers.
Reference to Creation and Flood.
Dissolution of elements.
Overflow (katakluzo).
Walking after their own lusts.
B | iii. 14-17. Be diligent, fall (ekpipto).
Stedfastness.
A | iii. 18. Closing Benediction. Grow in grace and knowledge of Lord and Saviour.
To Him be glory.

In the second chapter which corresponds with the section dealing with the scoffers and their condemnation, Peter speaks of the following recorded interventions of the Lord, showing how untrue the intervention of the Lord's return by saying "since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were". Four instances are given by the Apostle of judgments that could not be the mere working of natural law.

The casting down of the angels that sinned (II Pet. ii. 4).
The bringing in a flood in the days of Noah (II Pet. ii. 5).
The turning of the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes, condemning them by an 'overthrow' katastrophe (II Pet. ii. 6).
The rebuking of Balaam by the speaking of a dumb ass (II Pet. ii. 15, 16).

From these examples the Apostle draws the conclusion:

> "The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished" (II Pet. ii. 9).

We have now advanced a step in our pursuit of the truth. In the first part of the study the fact was established that there were three creative movements recorded in Scripture, and that Peter, whose reference to creation is occupying our attention, was a minister of the circumcision. To this we have now added some idea of the general scope of this epistle, and of II Pet. iii. 3-14 in particular. We are, therefore, now ready, to give II Pet. iii. 3-14 a fuller and more detailed examination.

No.14. A preliminary enquiry into the testimony of II Pet. iii. 1-14. Proofs that Peter makes no direct reference beyond Gen. i. 3.

pp. 187 - 191

Before we can come to any definite conclusion about the intention of the Apostle in II Pet. iii. 3-14, we must arrive at some certain understanding of the terms he uses. There are few students of Scripture but who, when they read the words of II Pet. iii. 4 "the BEGINNING of creation" will go back in mind immediately to Gen. i. 1 and John i. 1, where the same word arche 'beginning' is found either in the Septuagint or in the original Greek N.T. Yet upon examination, such a reference back is proved to be untrue. We have already spoken of Mark the 'interpreter' of Peter, and the present is an opportunity to test his words. Mark uses the word arche 'beginning' four times thus:

A | The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ the Son of God (i. 1).
B | From the beginning of the creation (x. 6).
A | The beginning of sorrows (xiii. 8).
B | The beginning of the creation which God created (xii. 19).

The two references to creation challenge our attention, and we are sure that the established meaning of these two passages in Mark's Gospel must influence most profoundly our interpretation of the same words in II Pet. iii. Here therefore is the first passage in full.

> "But from the beginning of the creation God made them male and female" (Mark x. 6).

It is not a matter of debate therefore that Mark uses the expression 'the beginning of the creation' to refer exclusively to the creation of Gen. i. 3, and so by logical necessity cannot include Gen. i. 1.

Let us read the second reference:

> "For in those days shall be affliction, such as was not from the beginning of the creation which God created unto this time, neither shall be" (Mark xiii. 19).

All we need to do to show that the same limitation must be observed is to place beside this reference, two parallel passages.

> "For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be" (Matt. xxiv. 21).
>
> "There shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time" (Dan. xii. 1).

We cannot conceive that any reader with these passages before him, would wish to read into Mark xiii. 19 a reference back to Gen. i. 1, the words 'Since there was a nation' being the earliest statement, out of which the others have grown.

We are therefore certain that the words quoted by Peter 'from the beginning of the creation' are limited to the Adamic Earth. The context moreover of any expression has a part to play in deciding its meaning, so we must now observe the way in which it is introduced and with what other terms it is associated.

> "Since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation."

It is strange enough to think of linking up the death of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (the fathers) with the six days creation; it is unthinkable when we attempt to link such events with the remote period of Gen. i. 1.

The argument of these opposers appears to be that just as the 'fathers' died one after the other, and no interference with 'nature' has yet broken the hold of death, so, from the beginning of the world all things have continued without break, and ever will, so rendering either the hope of resurrection, the Second Coming or the Day of Judgment, unreasonable.

Peter, however, has already met this argument. Did all things continue as they were in the days of Noah? Was there no Divine intervention in the days of Sodom? Is there no import in the use of the two distinctive words katastrophe and katakluzo?

Further, we must not forget that the words in question were spoken by the 'scoffers'. What did they know of the 'overthrow of the world'? Not one of them so far as there is any record had ever seen the skeleton of a brontosaurus or a fossilized ichthyosaurus. The science of their day made creation originate from chaos (see Hislop's Two Babylons), and these scoffers most certainly did not know more of ancient history than the inspired Apostle.

In his opening rejoinder Peter says "For this they willingly are ignorant of" a sentence that does not do justice to either the English language or the inspired original. The R.V. read "For this they willfully forget" and Dr. Weymouth renders the passage "For they are willfully blind to the fact". No person can be charged with 'willful forgetfulness' if the matter lies beyond his ken. The heathen world was without excuse in their idolatry because of the witness of creation around them, but not even the scoffers could 'wilfully neglect' the evidences of the primal creation because they were unrevealed and unattainable by human search at that time. These scoffers, however, could be charged with willful neglect of the Divine record of Genesis which shows how the selfsame water that played so prominent a part in the six days creation was actually used to bring about the Flood in the days of Noah. This they could have known, and with its neglect they could be charged. Lanthano, the word translated 'ignorant' in II Pet. iii. 5 A.V. occurs again in verse 8 "Be not ignorant of this one thing". This fact must not be ignored by ourselves, as it is evident that such a recurrence indicates a structural feature, and is of consequence to true interpretation. The word lanthano seems to demand an English equivalent that lies somewhere between the 'ignorance' of the A.V. and the 'forgetting' of the R.V., and Moffatt seems to have chosen wisely here, for he renders the word in both passages 'ignore'. Ignorance of any fact modifies the culpability of a person; forgetfulness, while serious, nevertheless modifies the guilt of an act, but to 'wilfully ignore' leaves no such margin of excuse, and that is the thought here. Without making too great a diversion by dealing with the structure of II Pet. iii. 1-13 as a whole, it will be sufficient for our present purpose to confine ourselves to verses 4-9.

A | 9. The Promise. The apparent "slowness" of the Lord

The day of the Lord will come.

God does not hold men accountable where knowledge is unattainable. Knowledge concerning things that happened during the primal creation of Gen. i. 1 could not be 'ignored' by anyone, because no details are given in the revealed Word. These men, however, could, and evidently did, willfully ignore the testimony of Gen. i. 3-8, and so were without excuse.

The reference to 'the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished' must either refer to the chaos of Gen. i. 2 and must exclude the Flood in the days of Noah, or it must refer to the Flood and exclude Gen. i. 2; it cannot refer to both. We have positive evidence that Peter makes reference to the Deluge of Noah's day as part of his teaching and while this does nor prove anything so far as II Pet. iii. 6 is concerned, it is a weight in the scale. We must continue our study of the terms used by Peter.

"The heavens were of old." Do these words refer to the primal creation of Gen. i. 1? Or do they refer to the creation of the world Adam and his race? Ekpalai occurs in but one other passage in the N.T. namely in II Pet. ii. 3:

"Whose judgment now a long time lingereth not."

There is no need for argument here. These false prophets must belong to the Adamic creation, and consequently there is added reason to believe that Peter's second use of the term will be but an expansion of the first, and that II Pet. iii. 6 refers back as far as Gen. i. 3 but no farther.

Palai simply means 'old', palaios, palaiotes and palaioo also occur and should be examined. We give just two examples:

> "But he that lacketh these things is blind, and cannot see afar off, and hath forgotten that he was purged from his old sins" (II Pet. i. 9).
> "God Who at sundry times and in diverse manners, spake in time past" (Heb. i. 1).

The expression "the heavens were of old" therefore refers quite legitimately to Gen. i. 6. This 'firmament' was temporary and is to pass away, as many passages of Scripture testify. There is no passage, however, that teaches that heaven itself, the dwelling place of the Most High, will ever pass away, and this is an added reason for limiting Peter's words to the present creation.

The earth 'standing' out of the water, appears to refer to the way in which the present system was brought into being. Sunistemi is translated 'consist' in Col. i. 17, and while it would take a scientist to explain the meaning of II Pet. iii. 5, the reference is so evidently back to Gen. i. 3 onwards that scientific proof is not necessary to our argument.

The association of the 'water' and creation, with the 'water' that caused the 'overflow' of II Pet. iii. 6, is emphasized when one observes that after the many references to water in Gen. i., no further mention is made until the ominous words of Gen. vi. 17 are reached "I do bring a flood of waters upon the earth". These things the scoffers 'wilfully ignored'.

The future dissolution will involve the heavens as well as the earth (II Pet. iii. 10), whereas it was 'the world' not the heaven and the earth that 'perished' in the days of Noah. The heavens and the earth remained, and so could be called by Peter 'The heavens and the earth which are now'.

In the second chapter of the epistle Peter refers to the Flood and speaks of 'the old world' and 'the world of the ungodly' (II Pet. ii. 5), similarly in both II Pet. ii. 4 & iii. 7 he uses the word 'reserved' in reference to judgment.

Again in II Pet. iii. 6 the Greek word katakluzomai is used where the translation reads "being overflowed with water". In II Pet. ii. 5 he uses the word kataklusmos (which becomes in English 'cataclysm') "bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly" which makes the parallel between these two chapters even more obvious.

No.15. "The filling up of the nations" (Gen. xlviii. 19 Rotherham).

pp. 208 - 212

The family of Noah after the Flood were told to 'replenish' the earth, which had this replenishing been accompanied by grace and righteousness, would have constituted a fullness. Alas, by the time we read to the eleventh chapter of Genesis, the evil character of the world was made manifest at Babel, and the scattering of the people brought another movement in the purpose of the ages to a close. Babel in Gen. xi. will yet find its corresponding member when great Babylon comes up for judgment, but the gap formed by the rebellion of Nimrod and the introduction of idolatry which is so closely associated with this mighty hunter before the Lord, was filled by the calling of Abraham and the promises made to him concerning the great nation Israel. In Gen. xlviii. 19 we read 'his seed shall become a multitude of nations'. It so happens that the word 'multitude' occurs earlier in this same chapter namely in verse 4, where we read:

> "Behold, I will make thee fruitful, and multiply thee, and I will make of thee a multitude of people" (Gen. xlviii. 4).

Two words are found in the Hebrew original which are here translated 'multitude' and these must be distinguished. The word translated 'multitude' in verse 4 is the Hebrew word qahal 'to call' or 'to assemble', but the word translated 'multitude' in verse 19 is entirely different, it is the Hebrew word melo 'fullness'*.

> [* - Readers who use The Companion Bible in early editions should observe that the note against "multitude" in verse 19 should be transferred to the margin of verse 4 in the same chapter.]

Let us bring together the four passages which make the promise that Israel shall be a multitude or company of people or nations.

> "And GOD ALMIGHTY bless thee, and make thee fruitful, and multiply thee, that thou mayest be a multitude of people" (Gen. xxviii. 3).
>
> "And God said unto him, I am GOD ALMIGHTY: be fruitful and multiply: a nation and a company of nations shall be of thee" (Gen. xxxv. 11).
>
> "Behold, I will make thee fruitful, and multiply thee, and I will make of thee a multitude of people" (Gen. xlviii. 4).

In these passages 'multitude' translates the Hebrew word qahal. When Jacob blessed Joseph's younger son Ephraim, putting his right hand upon his head instead of upon the head of Manasseh his elder brother, when Joseph said "Not so, my father" (Gen. xlviii. 18), Jacob replied:

> "I know it, my son, I know it: he also shall become a people, and he also shall be great; but truly his younger brother shall be greater than he, and his seed shall become a multitude of nations" (Gen. xlviii. 19).

Here, we have already observed, the Hebrew word translated ‘multitude’ is melo, ‘fullness’. We must therefore become acquainted with the usage and meaning of these two words which are translated ‘multitude’ before we can proceed with our study.

Qahal means ‘to call together’, ‘to assemble’, and the noun form is translated ‘congregation’, ‘assembly’ and ‘company’. In seventy passages the Septuagint renders the Hebrew qahal by ekklesia, and Stephen speaks of “the church in the wilderness” (Acts vii. 38). In the three passages quoted from Genesis, “multitude” and ‘company’ are represented by ‘synagogue’ in the Septuagint. In Gen. xlviii. 19 melo which is translated ‘multitude’ is rendered in the Septuagint plethos, which in the N.T. is rendered by the A.V. ‘multitude’ 30 times, ‘company’ once and ‘bundle’ once. Unfortunately the English word ‘multitude’ has to stand for two very different conceptions. Plethos is from the same root as pleroma and retains the idea of fullness or filling, but there is another Greek word translated multitude, namely ochlos which means rather ‘a crowd’ or ‘a mob’, the unruly nature of which is reflected in the verbal forms which mean ‘to vex’ or ‘to trouble’ (Acts v. 16; xv. 12; xvii. 5; Heb. xii. 15). While, therefore we are compelled to use the English word ‘multitude’ in these passages of Genesis, we must dismiss the thought of a ‘mob’ or of an unruly ‘crowd’, and retain the idea of a properly assembled gathering and a filling. Returning to the usage ‘the whole assembly’, the word is used of Israel as a nation, but in Genesis, before Israel as a nation existed, it is usually prophetically, looking down the ages to the day when the seed of Abraham shall indeed become ‘a filling up of the nations’ (Rotherham). The four occurrences of qahal fall into their place in the structure which can be seen set out in full in The Companion Bible. The following extract will be sufficient to demonstrate this fitness here.

Gen. xxvii. 42 - xxviii. 5. Departure. Jacob to Padan-aram.
“That thou mayest be a multitude of people.”

* * * * * * *

Gen. xxxv. 1-15. Return. Jacob from Padan-aram.
“A nation and a company of nations.”

* * * * * * *

Gen. xlviii. 1-20. Blessings of Joseph and his sons
“I will make thee a multitude of people.”

* * * * * * *

Gen. xlix. 1-28. Blessings of all his sons.
“Unto their assembly, mine honour, be not thou united.”

It will be remembered that in the endeavour to obtain the birthright and the Abrahamic blessing, Jacob, at the instigation of his mother who knew that ‘the elder shall serve the younger’ (Gen. xxv. 23), attempted by fraud to make the prophecy sure, but failed. When Jacob, as a consequence, was obliged to leave home, the coveted blessing for which both he and his mother had schemed, was given to him freely:

> “And GOD ALMIGHTY bless thee, and make thee fruitful, and multiply thee, that thou mayest be a multitude of people; and give thee the blessing of Abraham, to thee and to thy seed with thee; that thou mayest inherit the land wherein thou art a stranger, which God gave unto Abraham" (Gen. xxviii. 3, 4).

Not only is 'the land' a definite feature of this promise, but a peculiar character attaches to it, it is called 'the land wherein thou art a stranger'. This is repeated in Gen. xxxvii. 1, and in xlvii. 9 Jacob uses the same word which is there translated 'pilgrimage'. The margin of Gen. xxviii. 4, reads 'the land of thy sojournings'. This term is used seven times in the law, and is repeated in Heb. xi. 9, 13. After the formation of Israel and the giving of the law, the nation is not again reminded that they were strangers and sojourners except in one passage, namely in Lev. xxv. 23, where the laws governing the sale of land showed that the Lord Himself was the true Owner, Israel only holding the land as it were on lease. One further note is necessary before we attempt a conclusion, and that concerns that a certain popular theory might be supported, to show that Ephraim was to become "Gentilized". The Hebrew word translated 'nations' is goyim, the plural of goi. This word is translated in the A.V. as follows: "Gentile" thirty times, 'heathen' one hundred and forty two times, 'nation' 373 times, 'people' 11 times. It is easy, when we are reading the passages where 'Gentile' and 'heathen' occur, to jump to the conclusion that the word means 'all nations of the world, excepting the Jews', but this is an error. The first six occurrences of goyim occurs in Gen. x. and as Israel was not in existence at the time, it is evident that the word can only means 'nations', the inclusion of the word 'Gentiles' in Gen. x. 5 being an anticipation and having no immediate meaning until placed over against the word "Jew". The R.V. has recognized this, and inserted 'nations' instead.

In Gen. xii. 2 we read the words of the great prophetic promise to Abraham concerning his seed, Israel, 'I will make of thee a great nation', while in Gen. xvii. 4, 5, 6 this promise is expanded to include 'many nations' returning in verse 20 once more to the 'great nation'. So in Gen. xxxv. 11 we read 'a nation and a company of nations', the only distinction between Jew and Gentile being, not in the use of a different word, but in the use of the singular for the Jew, and the plural for the Gentile. Again in Deut. iv., we have interchangeably 'this great nation', 'what nation is so great', 'the heathen', 'a nation from the midst of another nation' and 'the nations' that were to be driven out of Canaan, all being translations of the one Hebrew word. Even in the Greek N.T. when the distinction between Jew and Gentile is acute, we still find ethnos used both of the Gentiles and of Israel (Acts xxii. 21; xxvi. 4, 17; xxviii. 19, 28). While therefore goyim means at times Gentile or heathen, it always means 'nation' whether the nations outside the covenant, or the great nation of promise. The promise that Israel should be 'great' must not be misunderstood. With us, 'greatness' is associated with nobility of mind, but originally the word gadol translated 'great' means 'growth' or 'augmentation'. So we read of 'great lights', 'great whales', a 'great city' in Genesis. The word moreover is used to indicate 'the elder' son (Gen. x. 21; xxvii. 1; xxix. 16) who may not necessarily have been 'greater'. Israel are indeed at the present day 'minished and brought low through oppression' (Psa. cvii. 39), but it is an integral part of the promise to Abraham, that Israel should not only be great in spiritual qualities, but great in numbers. The promise reads, 'I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth; so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered' (Gen. xiii. 16). The figure is changed in Gen. xv. 5 to the innumerable stars of heaven, with the added words ‘so shall thy seed be’. Yet once again the figure is changed to ‘the sand upon the sea shore’ (Gen. xxii. 17).

> “Sir Arthur Eddington is of the opinion that one hundred thousand million stars make one galaxy, and one hundred thousand million galaxies, make one universe. The number of stars in a universe therefore would be ten thousand trillion, or expressed in figures 10,000,000,000,000,000,000,000, that is equal to the number of drops of water in all the oceans of the world, or grains of fine sand sufficient to cover the whole of England and Wales to a depth of a foot, and each one of them comparable in size to our sun” (The Endless Quest, Westaway).

While it is not intended that Israel are ever to reach such astronomical figures, the contemplation of the possible number of stars, compels us to admit that an extraordinary increase in number constitutes an essential feature of the Divine purpose for this ‘great nation’. According to Deut. i. 10 these promises were on the way to fulfillment even when Israel stood upon the borders of the promised land, and the present drop in their numbers is coincident with their being in disfavour ‘If ye walk contrary to Me, I will make you few in number’ (Lev. xxvi. 21, 22). When the Lord at length causes the captivity of both Judah and of Israel to return ‘as at the first’, when He performs that good thing which He has promised unto the house of Israel and of Judah, then ‘as the host of heaven cannot be numbered, neither the sand of the sea measured: so will I multiply the seed of David My servant, and the Levites that minister unto Me” (Jer. xxxiii. 7, 14, 21).

At the time of the end this world will be so ravaged and desolated by the destructive method of atomic or other super-scientific weapons that the prophet Zechariah speaks of ‘everyone that is left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem’ (Zech. xiv. 16) which suggests a terrible depletion in the number of the inhabitants of the earth at that day. In Zech. xiii. 8 the prophet’s meaning is made very clear, when he says, “And it shall come to pass, that in all the land, saith the Lord, two parts therein shall be cut off and die; but the third shall be left therein”. Something of what may be expected when atomic warfare breaks out over this devoted earth can be sensed by the words of the Apocalypse:

> “A third part of the trees were burnt up.”
> “A third part of the sea became blood.”
> “A third part of the ships were destroyed.”
> “The third part of men, slain.” (Rev. viii. 7, 8, 9; ix. 15).

The day is passed when these catastrophic times could be brushed aside as mere figures of speech, we have lived through days when ‘a third part of the ships’ were well nigh literally destroyed. We have seen that following the desolation of Gen. i. 2 came the creation of man and the command ‘replenish the earth’. We have seen that the same command was given to Noah after the cataclysm of the Flood. This same command will be fulfilled in Israel, when they too, shall ‘blossom and bud, and fill the world with fruit’ (Isa. xxvii. 6). Ephraim, as the ‘firstborn’ will indeed be great, and his seed ‘shall become a FILLING UP of the nations’ (Gen. xlviii. 19). Once again we see the principle of the Pleroma at work, with its promise of a better day, when sorrow and sighing shall have fled away, when the true seed shall flourish, and the seed of the serpent be no more.

No.16. "The fullness of the Gentiles" (Rom. xi. 25).
pp. 236 - 239

We have seen that the promise to Abraham concerning his seed has followed the same pattern that has characterized the earlier moves in the outworking of the purpose. Their failure came to a head just before the Babylonian captivity, and with Nebuchadnezzar, 'the times of the Gentiles' began.

The testimony of Daniel
The times of the Gentiles begin (Dan. i. 1, 2).

> "In the third year of the reign of Jehoiakim king of Judah came Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon unto Jerusalem and besieged it. And the Lord gave Jehoiakim king of Judah into his hand, with part of the vessels of the house of God: which he carried into the land of Shinar to the house of his god" (Dan. i. 1, 2).

With these words the book of Daniel opens, and it may not be too much to say that they are only paralleled by the words of Acts xxviii. in their burden of crisis and dispensational change. With such vast issues hanging upon these momentous words, vast because they cover the whole sweep of Gentile dominion and vaster still because they lead steadily on to the kingdom of Christ which is to last for ever, with such issues and such a burden, no pains should be spared in acquainting ourselves with all that God has written for our learning in relation to this crisis in the history of man. Space will not permit of the full quotation of Jer. xxv. 1-26. We can but point out one or two features that connect this passage with the opening words of Daniel.

The reader will be struck by the fact that whereas Dan. i. 1 speaks of the 'third' year of Jehoiakim, Jer. xxv. 1 speaks of the 'fourth' year of that same king in connection with the coming of Nebuchadnezzar against Jerusalem. This apparent discrepancy has not passed unnoticed by the critic, and is one of his many 'proofs' of the untrustworthiness of the book of Daniel.

The Hebrew word translated 'came' in Dan. i. 1 is bo, and it frequently has the sense of 'went' or 'marched'. This, however, has been denied. Dr. Samuel Davidson says: "The verb bo does not mean to set out . . . . . but to arrive at" (Introduction to the O.T. Vol. III, page 181), and when men of such standing and authority speak thus, who are we to oppose them? Humility is indeed a grace to seek and preserve, but while Gal. ii. remains for our encouragement, we may still dare to bring all statements to the touchstone of the Word. Dr. Davidson's statement but illustrates the uncritical character of so-called 'higher criticism', for it has been computed that the Hebrew word bo is used in the sense of 'to set out' in each of the five books of Moses, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and six out of the twelve minor prophets.

Let us look at Jonah i. 3 and translate it as Dr. Davidson would have it: "And Jonah . . . . . went down to Joppa, and he found a ship arriving at Tarshish." If this could be sense, then in some miraculous way Jonah would have no sooner set foot on board at Joppa than he would have 'arrived' at Tarshish. Doubtless this would have made the journey far more pleasant than it actually was, but the simple fact is that the Hebrew word bo does mean that the ship was 'going' or 'setting out' for Tarshish. The plain fact of Dan. i. and Jer. xxv. is that the former writer tells us the year in which Nebuchadnezzar 'set out' from Babylon, while the latter tells us when he arrived. Moreover, Jeremiah tells us what occupied Nebuchadnezzar on his journey from one capital to the other:

> "Against Egypt, against the army of Pharaoh-necho king of Egypt, which was by the river Euphrates in Carchemish, which Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon smote in the fourth year of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah" (Jer. xlvi. 2).

Instead therefore of discovering a discrepancy in the narrative of Scripture, we have the obvious fact that Nebuchadnezzar took time to accomplish his march from Babylon to Jerusalem, and was obliged to meet and overcome Pharaoh at Carchemish by the Euphrates before he could arrive.

In Jer. xxv. 3 the prophet reminded Israel that since the thirteenth year of Josiah (see Jer. i. 1, 2) the word of the Lord had come urging them to turn from their evil, and because they had not turned He said:

> "Behold, I will send and take all the families of the north, saith the Lord, and Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylon, my servant, and will bring them against this land . . . . . and this whole land shall be a desolation, and an astonishment; and these nations shall serve the king of Babylon seventy years" (Jer. xxv. 9-11).

What God therefore had threatened, He brought to pass in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, and the historic record of the captivity of Jehoiakim is found in II Chron. xxxvi., the last chapter of the Hebrew Bible.

Yet with all this apparent on the surface of Scripture, and needing no more scholarship than ability to read in one's mother tongue, Kuenen in his Historic Critique de l'Ancien Testament has the audacity to say:

> "We know by the book of Jeremiah that no such event (as the siege of Jerusalem, Dan. i. 1) took place in the reign of Jehoiakim."

"We know." We also know that it is written: "Professing themselves to be wise they became fools", and by such statements they demonstrate that they are but 'blind leaders of the blind'.

Jehoiakim was appointed king of Judah by Pharaoh-necho in the place of Jehoahaz (II Kings xxiii. 34). He did evil in the sight of the Lord, and filled Jerusalem with innocent blood. He was succeeded by Jehoiachin. In the reign of the latter, Nebuchadnezzar carried out thence all the treasures of the house of the Lord, whereas Dan. i. 1, 2 tells us that at the first he only carried away a part.

Jehoiachin or Jeconiah is deprived of the Jehovah element in his name, and as Coniah is utterly rejected by the Lord:

> "Thus saith the Lord, Write ye this man childless, a man that shall not prosper in his days; for no man of his seed shall prosper, sitting upon the throne of David, and ruling any more in Judah" (Jer. xxii. 30).

It is evident that Israel is passing; dominion is leaving them and is being transferred for the time being to the Gentiles. This is emphasized by such statements as Dan. i. 2, "And the Lord gave . . . . . into his hand" or Jer. xxv. 1, "The fourth year of Jehoiakim . . . . . that was the first year of Nebuchadnezzar". The times of the Gentiles had therefore begun. And so with Zedekiah the glory departs, and Ezek. xxi. reveals the condition of things that will obtain 'until He come':

> "And thou, profane wicked prince of Israel, whose day is come, when iniquity shall have an end, thus saith the Lord God; Remove the diadem, and take off the crown: this shall not be the same: exalt him that is low, and abase him that is high. I will overturn, overturn, overturn it: and it shall be no more, until He come Whose right it is, and I will give it Him" (Ezek. xxi. 25-27).

Daniel's prophecies are occupied with this period of overturning, of the exalting of the base and abasing of the high. "This shall not be the same", saith the Lord—"This shall not be His" as the Hebrew reads, i.e. Nebuchadnezzar's dominion and dynasty would not be a real continuance of the throne of David. It would be in character rather a rule and dominion of wild beasts. The words 'It shall be no more, until He come' leave us in no doubt that the throne thus vacated shall be occupied by none other than the Lord Jesus Christ Himself.

The times of the Gentiles are characterized by one great feature, marked by the Lord in Luke xxi. 24: "And Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." The kingdoms that succeeded Babylon may have been larger or smaller, more powerful or weaker, more autocratic or less so, but the one essential characteristic of Babylon, Persia, Greece, Rome, Turkey, and the present mandatory power, is the Gentile domination of Jerusalem. That is the great distinguishable feature, and will only be removed when "He comes Whose right it is".

We have therefore a period of time which fills the 'gap' caused by Israel's failure, which gap is filled by the dynasty started with Nebuchadnezzar and which will persist until, in the Day of the Lord, 'the stone cut out without hand' strikes this colossus, and 'the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ'. One of the characteristics of the times of the Gentiles is the 'treading down of Jerusalem'. Those times will not end until Jerusalem is free from the yoke of Gentile dominion, surveillance or protection. Each succeeding ruler of the Gentiles has dominated Jerusalem. Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, Rome, Turkey, the League of Nations, the British Mandate, the United Nations, and so on to the last Dictator and his ten subservient kings at the time of the end. When Jerusalem is at length free, the times of the Gentiles will be ‘fulfilled’ (pleroo), and ‘the fullness’ (pleroma) of the Gentiles will have come (Luke xxi. 24; Rom. xi. 25). Immediately following this statement concerning the times of the Gentiles, the epistle to the Romans goes on to say ‘and so’ or ‘thus’ “All Israel shall be saved” (Rom. xi. 26). The ‘gap’ in the outworking of the Divine purpose in Israel is stressed in Rom. ix.-xi., because of their failure, but a ‘remnant’ shall be saved at the beginning, and had the Lord not left them a ‘seed’ they would have been like Sodom and Gomorrha. Throughout the period covered by the Acts, ‘all day long’ the Lord stretched out His hands ‘to a disobedient and gainsaying people’ (Rom. x. 21). However low Israel may have fallen during this period, the answer of God to Elijah was a parallel ‘I have reserved unto Myself seven thousand men, who have not bowed the knee to the image of Baal’ (Rom. xi. 4). Yet such is the grace of God, the very ‘diminishing of them’ led to the enriching of the Gentiles, and leads the Apostle to ask ‘How much more their fullness’? The figure of the olive tree, with its broken branches but emphasizes the ‘gap’ that is in view, and the fullness of the Gentiles occupies the interval occasioned by Israel’s blindness (Rom. xi. 25). Israel’s failure in the days of Nebuchadnezzar led to the times of the Gentiles speaking nationally, but Israel’s spiritual failure registered in Acts xxviii. led to the present dispensation of Gentile blessing, the church which is called by the wondrous title “The fullness of Him that filleth all in all”. This, however, is so great a theme that it must be considered in a separate study.

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS,

By the grace of God we are enabled to issue another volume of The Berean Expositor and for this we are thankful. We have no spiritual "gimmicks" to offer, only the faithful exposition of the Word of God in all its fullness, keeping in mind the sacred deposit of Truth first given through the Apostle Paul and preserved to us today.

We give our heartfelt thanks to all who have made this possible not only in this country, but also abroad. We have the privilege of being "fellow workers together", not only to make known the gospel of God's grace, but also "to make all see what is the dispensation of the Mystery (Secret) which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God" (Eph. iii. 9). May the Lord keep us loyal and fruitful in this witness for Him. We go forward with the assurance that His grace and strength are all-sufficient and that He can and will give the "increase" which will be to His glory.

THINGS THAT BE OF GOD--

Things that be of God.
The Gospel of God (Rom. i. 1).
pp. 179, 180

Recognizing as we must, that the Epistle to the Romans is not milk for babes, but indeed strong meat for the man of God, it is most important to note that, in the very first verse of this fundamental epistle, the Apostle places "The Gospel of God", and not only so, but when in chapter xvi. he closes this epistle with a reference to "The mystery, kept in silence in age times", he nevertheless relates this advanced doctrine with what he there calls 'my Gospel' (Rom. xvi. 25-27). These two sections have a correspondence which it is wise to observe:

The Outer Section Introduction Rom. i. 1-7	The Inner Section Conclusion Rom. xvi. 25-27
The Gospel of God.	My Gospel.
Concerning His Son Jesus Christ.	The preaching of Jesus Christ.
Promised afore by Prophets.	Through prophetic writings.
Grace from God our Father.	Praise to everlasting God.

The great theme of this Epistle is summed up in the words "Justification by faith, without works of law". The fact that there is an overruling theme in this epistle must be kept in mind. However deep or high, however intricate, whether doctrinal, dispensational or practical in character, it is the Gospel of God. In these brief articles we are confining ourselves to the "Things that be of God" and it is "The Gospel of God" that awaits us on the very threshold.

Sing we now the happy tidings,
God’s good news about His Son.
Promised in the Holy Writings,
He the mighty task has done.
Woman’s Seed so long predicted,
Who should bruise the serpent’s head.
He the fatal blow inflicted,
Rose in triumph from the dead.

He Who took the seed of David,
Was as God’s own Son proclaimed.
Power of God to sinners saved.
Though by sinners still defamed.
Now in risen power and glory,
Yet on earth to be adored.
Israel shall bow down before Thee—
David’s Son and David’s Lord.

Blessed gospel of salvation,
Who of such would be ashamed?
Power of God in every nation,
Where the gospel is proclaimed.
Righteousness of God revealed,
Faith its source and faith its goal.
He is faithful, and has sealed
All whose faith has made them whole.

Zech. xiii. 7 and Gen. iii. 21 - 24.

pp. 219, 220

It will be remembered that in Gen. iii. 24 there is an allusion to what was afterwards typified in the Tabernacle, with the one difference that in Genesis we have the flaming sword, while in the Tabernacle it is the presence of God, and the atoning blood. A moment's reflection will show that there is an obvious connection between the blood and the sword.

When the sword has fallen upon the victim it has done its appointed work, if that victim be of God's appointing. Zech. xiii. 7 provides some wonderful teaching in this context.

In the preceding verses, the prophet refers to the last days when Israel will be back in their own land, and to the work of cutting off sinners at the commencement of the Millennium. False prophets are also referred to, and the succeeding verses speak of two-thirds of Israel being cut off. What is the reason for the sparing of the third part to be saved? They certainly are not better than the others, for this would set aside the whole of revealed truth as to man's corruption. The answer to the question is provided by the principle of vicarious suffering. A righteous One is cut off in the place of the unrighteous ones, so that they may be righteously brought into the presence of a holy God.

In verse 7 the sword of God's anger is called upon to awake. The guilty may well tremble in view of the day when the Lord lifts up His glittering sword (Rom. xiii. 4). Anger if prompted by passion may be averted by entreaties, but anger set in motion by justice, as the arm of vengeance for a broken law, is unmoved by sentiment and can only be stayed by the law itself being fully vindicated.

And so we come, with the knowledge that we are treading on holy ground, to the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all. The One against Whom this sword awakes is called "My Shepherd", in striking contrast with the idol shepherd of xi. 16, 17, for he is Antichrist. The Shepherd of xiii. 7 is Christ.

The phrase 'the man that is My fellow', in verse 7, implies the closest possible fellowship and nearness. Since the fall of Adam and the expulsion from the garden, all men by nature have been alienated from God. In Gen. iii. the promised Seed is to conquer; but here it is the Lord Who is smitten. The apparent contradiction is resolved when we remember, that by dying He 'destroyed him that had the power of death, that is, the devil'. The One Who was to bruise the serpent's head was Himself to be bruised in the heel in the process. The stroke of vengeance, we see here, is administered by God Himself, and John provides a wonderful commentary on this verse. The Shepherd Who said ‘I and My Father are one’ in John x. 30, is the One Who gives His life for the sheep.

Dear fellow-believer, you who have already some experience of approaching the Mercy Seat, through faith in the blood of Atonement, keep well before the heart and mind “The goodness and severity of God”; that love was never to be exercised at the expense of righteousness, and that OUR access caused HIM to cry:

“My God My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?”

The Goal of God.

(I Cor. xv. 28).

No.1. God is, and always has been, "all in all" in creation.

pp. 9 - 11

A plan of action, presupposes a goal toward which everything contributes either by way of direct purpose, incidental assistance, or the overruling and directing of evil antagonism. That such a purpose is an integral part of the Scriptures is evident to all who have studied its teaching with any approach to understanding. To most of our readers, it is the goal of the ages, the purpose, which gives a life pulse to the most formal and ceremonial parts of Scripture, even as it crowns the most glorious of the triumphs of redeeming love. The goal of the ages is expressed in one statement made by the apostle Paul:

> "That God may be all in all" (I Cor. xv. 28).

It would be only too easy at this point to allow ourselves to be turned aside from the main purpose of our inquiry, to the unfruitful debate which gathers around the Divine intention expressed in the second word "All". To the question of the disciples:

> "Lord are there few that be saved?" (Luke xiii. 23).

His answer was in effect, 'see to it that you are'.

In the series of articles entitled "The Reconciliation of all Things" which ran through Volume VI The Berean Expositor we have given the answer that we find in Scripture as to the number comprehended by the 'all' who are reconciled and redeemed. That is not our chief quest now. For our present purpose it makes no difference to our approach or our conclusion whether 'all' is limited to Adam's seed, to believers, to the elect—or whether it is as universal as creation itself—our concern is rather with the intention behind the first word 'all' of I Cor. xv. 28. What does it mean when it says "That God may be ALL in all"?

If we turn our thought to the witness of the heavens and observe the silent obedience of sun, moon and star, or if we consider the testimony of the creation around us, and observe the unbroken obedience—that is ever and always going on in the world of chemistry or biology, we can say that here, in this irrational unmoral creation, God is and always has been "All in all". Never in the experience of human observation has the sun refused to rise and set, never has the ocean grown weary of its tidal regularity, never has the power of gravitation, or the law of chemical combination been transgressed. This fact is fully recognized in the Scriptures.

> "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honour and power; for Thou hast created all things, and for Thy pleasure they are and were created" (Rev. iv. 11).
>
> "And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever" (Rev. v. 13).

If the words 'every creature' are construed as inclusive of mankind, then the rest of the book of Revelation, with its revolt, blasphemy, wickedness and wrath is inexplicable, but if they refer to creation apart from men and angels, all is harmony.

Throughout the Scriptures we find references to the perfect submission of all creation to the will and power of the Creator.

> "Fire and hail; snow and vapors; stormy wind, fulfilling His word" (Psa. cxlviii. 8).
> "He sendeth forth His commandment upon earth; His word runneth very swiftly. He giveth snow like wool; He scattereth the hoarfrost like ashes. He casteth forth His ice like morsels: Who can stand before His cold? He sendeth out His word and melteth them: He causeth His wind to blow, and the waters flow" (Psa. cxlvii. 15-18).

There is, however, no need to multiply these evidences. The reader will call to mind many a passage where sun and star, or the humbler creatures of earth are revealed as entirely subservient to the Divine Will. God has always been 'all in all' as Creator. without this perfect alignment creation would vanish and the whole fabric turn to chaos. He upholds all things and by Him all thing consist. That, therefore, cannot be a future goal which has always been in existence from the beginning. When we look again at I Cor. xv. 28, we find that it is in a context that speaks of rule, authority, power, enmity, resurrection, immortality, sin, law, death and victory. These terms do not belong to science, they are out of place when dealing with creation as such, they are entirely related to man, his nature, his fall, his redemption and his final oneness with God. The goal of the ages expressed in the words "That God may be all in all" therefore looks to the one great exception in the earth—to man, the moral, reasonable creature, who can and did, by the very fact that he was moral and not mechanical, come under the category of 'ought' and in connection with whom even God uses the contingent "IF". God Who is already 'all' in creation, will one day be 'all' within the moral realm; but whereas in the realm of irresponsible creation "He spake, and it was done", the question never arose as to whether fire and hail, snow and vapours, or stormy wind, would or world not fulfil His Word; the creation, constitution and the probation of the first man, a responsible creature, as recorded in Gen. i.-iii. reveals an entirely different proposition. Here, the Lord does not 'speak' and find it done. In the material world, He had but to say "Light be", and "Light was", but in the moral and the spiritual world, no such instantaneous command or response was or is possible. In the very nature of the moral world, compulsory obedience, compelled love, coerced sanctity or commanded affection are impossible. Where probation has no place in the obedience of creation to the laws of its being, time and experience are essential factors in the work of grace in the moral sphere. It may have been necessary that the fitting of the earth for man should occupy six days, followed by one day's rest, in order that it foreshadow the course of the ages, but the reader of the Scripture is made abundantly alive to the fact, that God was under no more physical necessity to occupy six days in the work, than He Who fainteth not nor is weary, was under any necessity to have the seventh day set apart for rest. With regard to man, however, and the purpose of his creation, time, probation, testing, experience, suffering, faith, hope, reward, punishment, all have their place, and it is therefore of the very nature of the subject that it should involve patient waiting, great giving, unbounded love, and grace beyond dreams, before the "all" which characterized God's pre-eminence in nature should find its echo in the moral world.

When therefore the Apostle wrote "That God may be ALL in all" that 'all' must contain within its scope all that goes to make up the moral nature of man, and all that is reflected of the nature of God, both in the law of Sinai, in the gospel of grace, and in the person of Christ. We are now we trust, prepared to give this most important theme our closes attention, and we pray that light and truth may be our guide and goal as we seek to open up the Scriptures.

No.2. An examination of the term "All in all".

pp. 51 - 54

We have seen that when the goal of the ages is expressed in the words "that God may be all in all", something essentially different from the blind unintelligent unconscious obedience of all creation is involved, for man is a rational being, he is a moral agent, he is actuated by desire, he is influenced by example, he can turn away from the truth, he can say 'no' to his Maker. He can be rewarded for service or punished for iniquity, and if God is yet to be "All in all", with regard to man, then such a goal presupposes a working of laws, and movements of grace that are unknown to the present world of created things. In this article we devote ourselves to the examination of those passages, other than I Cor. xv. 28, where the expression 'all in all' is used.

While an exact verbal parallel with I Cor. xv. 28 does not exist, there are four other passages in which the variation is so slight that it would be sacrificing genuine illumination for mere pedantic scruples if we denied ourselves the benefit of their comparison.

The passages are as follows:

A | I Cor. xii. 6. Members of the Corinthian church.
B | I Cor. xv. 28. The goal of the ages realized.
C | Eph. i. 23. The goal set forth in the Mystery.
A | Eph. iv. 6. Members of the Body.
B | Col. iii. 11. The goal anticipated.

Let us examine these passages. The first one has to do with "spiritual gifts" (I Cor. xii. 1). These spiritual gifts were very diverse in character. One believer had the spirit of wisdom, another the gift of healing, yet another the gift of prophecy, another the speaking in an unknown tongue; nevertheless, however diverse these gifts may have been,

> "All these worketh that one and self same Spirit, dividing to every man severally as He will" (I Cor. xii. 11).

As an illustration of this "diversity in unity" the Apostle takes the human body, with its head, its hands, its feet, its organs of sight, of smell, of hearing, and even those members which have less honour, or are uncomely; and he declares, that:

> "God hath set the members every one of them in the body as it hath pleased Him" (I Cor. xii. 18).

Paul then reverts to the original theme, namely that of 'spiritual gifts' saying:

> "God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues" (I Cor. xii. 28).

Now all this is but an expansion of the statement of verse 6:

> "There are diversities of operations, but it is the same God Which worketh all in all" (I Cor. xii. 6).

In order to perceive the strong emphasis that is in this verse on the idea of "in-working", let us give the verse a literal translation "diversities of energema (inworkings) but it is the same God which energeo (inworketh) ta panta en pasin the all things in all".

Keeping this feature in mind, but reserving it until we have taken our examination further, let us look at the remaining passages. For obvious reasons, we defer I Cor. xv. 28, until we can approach it armed with the knowledge gained from other sources. Our next passage therefore must be Eph. i. 23. Here we meet with a quotation from Psa. viii., which figures also in the context of I Cor. xv. 28, namely the expression "all things under His feet", but as this demands separate treatment, we concentrate for the time being on the actual passage which uses the expression "all in all".

> "And hath put all things under His feet, and gave Him to be Head over all things to the church which is His Body, the fullness of Him that filleth ta panta en pasi 'all in all'." (Eph. i. 22, 23).

If we ponder this passage we shall see that the words 'the fullness of Him that filleth all in all' are an expansion of the meaning of the earlier part of the verse, thus:

A	a		Head over all things.
		b	To the church which is His Body.
A	a		The fullness of Him.
		b	That filth all in all.

Just as in Col. iii. 11 Christ and the church anticipates the goal of the ages, so Eph. i. 23 anticipates the goal as expressed in Eph. iii. 19:

> "That ye may be filled with (or unto) all the fullness of God."

Christ fills all things. He that descended to the lower parts of the earth, ascended also far above all heavens, with this object:

> "That He might fill all things" (Eph. iv. 10).

Not only must He fill all things, we find in Col. i. an intermingling of creative power and supremacy and redemptive pre-eminence associated with the idea of fullness.

He is the "Firstborn of all creation", because "in Him were all things created" and "He is before all things and in Him all things consists". He is the "Firstborn from the dead" and as such is the "Head of the Body the Church" so that "in all things" He might have pre-eminence, "for" continues the word of explanation "It was the good pleasure (of the Father) that in Him should all the fullness dwell" (Col. i. 15-20).

God comes down in the Person of Christ so that in Him, man may be brought back to God. So we read that "in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily, and ye are filled to the full in Him, which is the Head of all principality and power".

Returning to Eph. i. 22, 23, Christ is Head now, He is Head over all things to the Church now, even though still rejected by the world; and consequently when we read I Cor. xv. 28 in the light of His present filling of all in all as set forth in this relationship with the Church which is His Body we may catch a glimpse of the glory of that day.

The next passage indicated is Eph. iv. 6, where the emphasis is upon the unity of the Spirit, and the completely satisfying fullness of our God and Father.

"Who is over all, and through all, and in you all" (or as it may read "in all things to you") (Eph. i. 6) a passage that clearly anticipates the day when "God shall be all in all".

The last reference is Col. iii. 11. Its context takes us back to the original creation of man and the evident purpose there expressed (Col. iii. 10), but this demands a study itself. Here, moreover, the new man is stressed, another anticipation of that day when He shall make "all things new". This aspect too we must consider separately. The immediate context stresses the passing away of all those differences of race, creed and caste, of Greek and Jew, who in their new relationship find their wisdom and their righteousness alone in Him (I Cor. i. 30); of circumcision and uncircumcision who find their full acceptance in Him (Gal. vi. 15, 16); of Scythian, bondman and free who alike find their complete emancipation in Him.

> "All things are yours: whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours: and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's" (I Cor. iii. 22, 23).

Nothing short of this spirit will fulfil "the End" (I Cor. xv. 24) towards which the purpose of the ages slowly but surely moves. This, and nothing short of this, will fulfil the words of I Cor. xv. 28.

> "That God may be all in all."

No.3. An examination of the term "all things under His feet".
pp. 149 - 152

We have already quoted Eph. i. 22, 23 but deferred the examination of the words 'all things under His feet', so that they may be given separate consideration.

As is known, the words occur for the first time in Scripture in Psa. viii., and they are quoted not only in Eph. i. but in Heb. ii., as well as in I Cor. xv. Connected with this passage we must consider another phrase, namely, "Till I make Thine enemies Thy footstool", which occurs originally in Psa. cx. and is quoted in Matthew, Mark, Luke, Acts and Hebrews. If we attend to the way in which these two passages from the Psalms are originally employed, and then to the way in which the several writers of the N.T. have quoted them, we shall gain further illumination upon the goal of God as expressed in I Cor. xv. 28.

First let us consider Psa. viii. The first book of the Psalms, Psa. i.-xli. (note the double amen at the end of Psa. xli.) is divided according to The Companion Bible, into three large sections:

(1) Psa. i.-viii.: Man and the Son of Man (viii. 4).
(2) Psa. ix.-xv.: The Man of the earth (Antichrist x. 18).
(3) Psa. xvi.-xli.: The Man Christ Jesus.

Of this subdivision we are particularly interested in the first, for that includes the Psalm which contains the words 'all things under his feet' (Psa. viii. 6).

When we think of I Cor. xv. 28 and Psa. viii. together, we discover that there is in both an enemy; that they both make pointed allusion to sun and star and speak of the glory that pertains to the earth and the glory that pertains to the heavens. Even the flesh of man, fish and birds are compared and contrasted. The frailty of man even at his creation is indicted by the contrast between Adam, the first man, who was made 'a living soul', and Christ, the last Adam, the second Man, as a 'life giving Spirit'. The further frailty of the sons of Adam is revealed in the references to the human body during this life and to the resurrection body of the life to come. "It is sown in weakness, it is raised in power."

We pass now to the reference to Psa. viii. in the epistle to the Hebrews.

Hebrews ii. 5 - 10.

A | 5-8-. Not Angels. | a | A little lower than angels.
b | Crowned with glory and honour.
B | -8. But now we see not yet.
B | 9-. But we see Jesus.
A | -9-10. Jesus. | a | A little lower than angels.
b | Crowned with glory and honour.

The structure clearly indicates the theme, and places in strong contrast 'angels' and "Jesus', and not as we might have supposed from our reading of Psa. viii., Adam and Jesus.

> "For unto the angels hath He not put in subjection the world to come whereof we speak" (Heb. ii. 5).

Let us note well the Apostle's own explanatory clause "whereof we speak". Of what does he speak? (1) The world to come. (2) The fact that this world to come has not been put in subjection to angels. The quotation from Psa. viii., the glance at Adam who could not and did not hold this high office, turns us to the man as seen in Jesus Christ, Who by virtue of His death and resurrection will take that great and glorious position. The word 'we see not yet' cover the dispensational aspect of the doctrine. The rightful Ruler of that world to come, did not ascend the throne at His first advent, but stooped to death even the death of the cross. The purpose of this death is manifold, and every reference in the Scriptures opens up new avenues of thought and aspects of truth.

Confining ourselves for the moment to the actual implications of Heb. ii. we find that this death, which precedes the day of His glory, was endured for the following wondrous reasons:

(1) He tasted death for every man.
(2) It was becoming that the Captain of salvation should be made perfect through suffering.
(3) He that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified are all of One.
(4) Being made one with His people, He destroyed the Devil, and delivered them from the fear of death.
(5) Angels were passed by, and the seed of Abraham chosen for this great dignity.
(6) Namely, rule in "The world to come whereof we speak".

As a separate and contributing study we have dealt with the meaning of such passages as 'perfect through suffering', and 'all of one' but these we must leave, as our survey of the references to the words 'all things under His feet' is not yet complete. Psa. viii. speaks of the excellency of the Lord's name in the earth, and that which is put under the feet of man is said to be:

> "All sheep and oxen, yea, and the beast of the field; the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas" (Psa. viii. 7, 8).

This dominion is limited to the earth, and to the period which comes before the day of which John spoke when he said, "And there was no more sea", for fish of the sea are included in the imperfect foreshadowing under Adam. Heb. ii. speaks of the earth, for "the world to come' whereof the Apostle speaks is the oikoumene, used of the Roman empire (Luke ii. 1; Acts xxiv. 5), of Babylonian empire (Isa. xiv. 17), and of Alexander's empire (Aelitan V.H. 3:29). Here, the usage of this particular word, links together the Gentile dominion given to Nebuchadnezzar and passed on in turn to Medo-Persia, to Alexander, to Rome and to all succeeding Gentile powers that 'tread down Jerusalem until finally,

> "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of His Christ" (Rev. xi. 15).

Psa. viii. however recognizes that the glory of the Lord is associated with 'the heavens' as well as with the earth. The Psalmist does not people heaven with the redeemed; he sees no other occupants than the sun, the moon and the stars. Nevertheless, those who know the teaching of the N.T. know that there is a higher sphere, higher than all spheres of glory and blessing, now opened to faith by grace, and accordingly, it is fitting that this expression 'all things under His feet' should be found once more in the epistle to the Mystery—Ephesians.

In Eph. i. 21-23 where the words occur, we read that Christ has been given to be Head over all things to the Church which is His Body, but not that the Church is under His feet. Principalities, powers, might and dominion are under His feet, and in that position, Christ with all such powers beneath His feet is "Head OVER ALL THINGS to the church" for this church is potentially 'seated together' in those high heavens where He now sits, henceforth expecting His foes to be made His footstool. This passage in Ephesians, quite apart from any problems raised, is most certainly the heavenly aspect of the Saviour's dominion over "all things", and indicates 'things in heaven and things on earth' are being prepared for the final application of redeeming and restoring grace.

We have already realized the great need to distinguish loving submission as exemplified by the Saviour Himself both at the beginning of His Mediatorial condescension, when we read that He was 'subject' to His parents (Luke ii. 51) and as its consummation when the Son Himself shall be 'subject' (I Cor. xv. 28), from that subjection of enemies who are to be made His footstool (Heb. i. 10, 12, 13), and who are especially visualized in the term 'under his feet', but it is important enough to justify a repetition now.

Satan is to be bruised under the saints' feet shortly (Rom. xvi. 20). All enemies are put 'under His feet' (I Cor. xv. 25), consequently, we must distinguish those who are made subject under Him (as He was Luke ii. 51 and will be I Cor. xv. 28), from those who are 'put under His feet' as all enemies must be, before the consummation is reached.

There can be no clearer indication of the intention of the words 'under His feet' than can be found in the subjugation of the Kings of Canaan as recorded in Josh. x.:

> "Come near, put your feet upon the necks of these kings" (Josh. x. 24), and we are not left to our own surmisings as to the intention of this symbolic act:

> "Thus shall the Lord do to all your enemies against whom ye fight" (Josh. x. 25).

Before therefore the goal of the ages can be reached, there must and shall be:

(1) The willing submission of all the redeemed.
(2) The putting down of all authority and power.
(3) The willing submission of the Son.
(4) The delivering up of the Kingdom to the Father “That God may be all in all”.

HEBREWS

Perfection or Perdition

No.40. One sacrifice for sins for ever (ix. 23 - x. 18).

pp. 1 - 6

The section of this epistle that lies before us is the last of the series that, step by step, sets aside the Old Covenant with its types and shadows, and leads on unto perfection, and opens with the words:

> "Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus . . . and having an High Priest over the house of God; let us draw near" (Heb. x. 19-22).

This reverses the order in which the subject has been dealt with.

(1) The perfect Priest (v.-viii.).
(2) The Heavenly Sanctuary (ix. 1-24).
(3) The once offered Sacrifice (ix. 25 - x. 18).

We are now to review the teaching of the Apostle on the last and perhaps most critical element of both Old and New Covenants, viz., the sacrifice. The section ix. 23 - x. 18 bases its teaching upon the contrast that exists between the repeated sacrifices of the law and the once offered sacrifice of the New Covenant, the one a shadow, the other the very image.

Hebrews ix. 23 - x. 18.

A | ix. 23, 24. Patterns and figures of heaven itself.
B | ix. 25. The offering "often", "annually".
C | ix. 26-28. The offering ONCE.
A | x. 1-. A shadow.
B | x. -1. The offering "annually".
C | x. 2-18. The offering ONCE.

The cleansing of heavenly things.

In what sense are we to understand that "it was necessary" that the "heavenly things themselves" should be purified? The difficulty arises from the fact that we are not Hebrews and have had no personal contact with the Mosaic economy. In verse 22 we read that "almost all things are by the law purified by blood", and it will be observed in verses 19-21 that inanimate and consequently unsinning things as "the book", "the Tabernacle" and the "vessels of the ministry" were purified by the sprinkling of blood. The dedication to God likewise of the heavenly realities can only be by blood, but this time by the precious blood of Christ. The Tabernacle needed purifying on account of the people (Lev. xvi. 16). So "heaven itself" needed to be cleansed, not only because of those who have heavenly destiny (Eph. i. 10; Col. i. 20), but also because of those who by sin forfeited their heavenly abode (II Pet. ii. 4).

Better sacrifices.

Seeing that the Apostle's argument in this section finds its strength in the fact that Christ offered one Sacrifice for sin, as contrasted with the repeated sacrifices of the law, why does he speak of Christ's Offering in the plural, "better sacrifices"? There is a recognized figure of speech in the Hebrew Old Testament called Heterosis or "Exchange". It has a wide range into which we will not enter here, the section which includes our difficulty being the Heterosis of number. A few examples will suffice:

Gen. iv. 10.	"Bloods" = life's blood.
Gen. xix. 11.	"Blindnesses" = intense blindness.
Psa. li. 17.	"Sacrifices" = the great sacrifice.

This last reference is practically identical with Heb. ix. 23. The Apostle, using a recognized figure of speech, must be understood to mean "the infinitely better sacrifice". While we are dealing with this figure we might observe that in verse 24 "holy places" means "the most holy place", as it is translated in ix. 8.

The end of the world.

In contrasting the offerings made under the law with the Offering of Christ, the writer makes much of the fact that the law offered sacrifices continually, but that Christ offered but one Sacrifice, and one only. Otherwise it would be necessary that Christ should suffer often since the foundation of the world. We know from Heb. ix. 15 that the Sacrifice of Christ was retrospective, and was "for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first covenant", and also from Rom. iii. 25 we learn that the Offering of Christ declared God's righteousness in remitting the sins of the past. The apostle makes a statement in Heb. ix. 26, "But now once in the end of the world hath He appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself" (epi sunteleia ton aionon), "upon an ending together of the ages". This needs some careful study. The LXX uses the word sunteleia in Exod. xxiii. 1-16 in a way which may help us. "Three times thou shalt keep a feast unto Me in the year":

(1) The feast of unleavened bread.
(2) The feast of the harvest.
(3) The feast of the ingathering (sunteleia) which is in the end of the year.

Once again may we be permitted to say that those to whom the apostle wrote knew the law and much of its significance? The instructed Hebrew saw in the feasts of Israel, as set out in Lev. xxiii., the plan of the ages. He saw that Christ was the true Passover and the true Firstfruits. The feast of the seventh month, the sunteleia, would vividly bring to mind the sunteleia of the ages. It has been objected that the "consummation of the ages" has not arrived, and therefore this passage as it stands in the A.V. is not true. The same objection can be lodged again in Heb. i. 1, for the period called "these last days" was over 1,900 years ago.

When Christ was born, Gal. iv. 4 declares that it was the fullness of time. We must avoid the error of introducing truth that belongs to another dispensation to confuse the teaching of earlier revelations. Paul's prison ministry is, so far as time is concerned, a parenthesis. During the Acts period the coming of the Lord was expected to take place during the lifetime of the believer then living. Peter had no difficulty when he joined together the "blood and fire and pillars of smoke" that have not yet come with the Pentecostal gifts that are long past. Moreover, the objection to the application of the sunteleia of the ages to the time of the Offering of Christ robs the passage of another vital connection, viz., the Day of Atonement.

The Day of Atonement, like the feast of sunteleia, took place in the seventh month, after the interval that provides a typical anticipation of the parenthesis that has actually come. Yet at the time of writing the apostle finds no difficulty in speaking of Christ's Sacrifice in the terms of the Day of Atonement. The condition of things during the Acts is likened to the time when the high priest had entered into the holiest of all, during which time the people waited for his second appearing, when they were assured of forgiveness and acceptance. The fact that this second appearing did not take place, that Israel's forgiveness and acceptance is deferred, that it was all anticipated, deferment as well, in the plan of the feasts of Lev. xxiii., does not alter the teaching of Heb. ix. A somewhat similar expression occurs in I Cor. x. 11, "They are written for our admonition, unto whom the ends of the ages have reached" (ta tele ton aionon).

The typical happenings to Israel in the wilderness foreshadowed the state of things that would be true at the end, and the Corinthians were living at the time of the end, for so the Scripture of their calling and dispensation declares. The Jews divided all time into three great ages: (1) Before the law; (2) Under the law; (3) After the law. The age after the law they naturally thought of as the Millennium, not knowing that the elective period, when Gentiles were being called, must also be reckoned with.

To put away sin.

What are we to understand by this expression? It is usually taken to mean just what the A.V. says. The word "to put away" in the original is athetesis from atheteo. Let us examine the usage of these words; we shall then have positive evidence, and moreover the reader will be made independent of the opinions of others.

Atheteo.

Mark vi. 26.	"Reject her."
Mark vii. 9.	"Full well ye reject the commandment", margin "frustrate".
Luke vii. 30.	"Rejected the counsel of God", margin "frustrated".
Luke x. 16.	"He that despiseth" (four times).
John x. 48.	"He that rejecteth Me."
I Cor. i. 19.	"I will bring to nothing the understanding."
Gal. ii. 21.	"I do not frustrate the grace of God."

Gal. iii. 15.	"No man disannulleth."
I Thess. iv. 8.	"He therefore that despiseth" (twice), margin "rejecteth".
I Tim. v. 12.	"Have cast off their first faith."
Heb. x. 28.	"He that despised Moses' law."
Jude 8.	"These . . . . . despise dominion."

We believe that no one after pondering this list of occurrences can avoid the conclusion that atheteo means "to set aside" or "to annul" as a covenant or a commandment. The word occurs 57 times in the LXX, and in order that no phase of the meaning should be left unconsidered we have consulted every reference. We cannot spare the space to give them here, and it is not necessary. Every occurrence deals either with rebellion, treachery or the setting aside of covenant obligations. Indeed, in one of the cases the word stands alone, the word covenant being implied. The same remarks are true also of athetema (LXX) and athetesis.

Athetesis, this word actually occurring in Heb. ix. 26, occurs nowhere else but in Heb. vii. 18. There the passage is rendered:

> "For there is verily a DISANNULLING of the commandment going before for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof. For the law made nothing perfect, but the bringing in of a better hope did; by the which we draw nigh unto God."

Chapter vii. is dealing with the failure of Israel's priesthood; the law concerning priesthood "perfected nothing". Only in the virtue of a "better hope" can any draw nigh unto God. Chapter ix. 19-28 is dealing with the failure of Israel's sacrifices; the law concerning sacrifices was a shadow and could not "perfect" those who drew nigh. Only in the virtue of a "better sacrifice" can any draw nigh to God. The parallel is complete. Moreover both sections deal with the removal and failure of the Old Covenant:

A | vii. 18. The setting aside (athetesis) of the commandment concerning the priests.
B | viii. 8. Finding fault with the first Covenant.
A | ix. 26. The setting aside (athetesis) of the sin offering.
B | x. 9. Taking away the first Covenant.

It may be objected that where we have inserted "sin-offering" the A.V. says "sin", but it is recognized by students of Scripture that the word "sin" often stands for the "offering for sin", and consequently may be so understood here. Heb. ix. 26 is not dealing with the forgiveness or the putting away of sin, it deals with the abrogation of the sin-offering, a fact absolutely necessary if Israel were to believe on the Son of God, and to leave the shadows of the Old Covenant. "He appeared to set aside the sin-offering by the sacrifice of Himself." The reader has only to read Heb. x. 4-9 to find abundant confirmation of this interpretation.

The idea that has been read into this verse by the advocates of Universal Reconciliation that the offering of Christ was "for the repudiation of sin at the conclusion of the aeons" does violence to the order of the words in the original and fails to give the true meaning of athetesis. There is not one single instance in either the New Testament or the LXX where the word is used in connection with "putting away sin", whereas the consistent usage compels us to see that here, in Heb. ix. as in Heb. vii., the disannulling of a weak and profitless symbol is entirely in harmony with the context and aim of the epistle. Verses 27 and 28 must be read together, as they are two members of one simile indicated by the words "as" and "so". Some intended likeness must be discovered, for if a contrast were intended we should get the expression used in Rom. v. 15.

Now what is the intention of the writer when he says, "and as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment"? The majority of commentators take it to refer to mankind in general, and that the offering of Christ "once" is set over against the dying "once" of verse 27. While this contains truth, we are not persuaded that it is the true meaning of the passage. For one thing there is hardly a deviation from the one great theme discernible in the whole of chapters vii., viii. and ix. Every effort and argument is brought to bear upon the one absorbing theme, the superiority of the Priesthood and Offering of Christ, and the typical teaching of the types and shadows of the law.

Who are "the men"?

"It is appointed to 'the men' once to die". The priests of the order of Aaron are definitely called "dying men" (Heb. vii. 8), and "men having weakness" (Heb. vii. 28). So that, to say the least, we may admit the probability that in the context that speaks of the typical Tabernacle priesthood and offerings, "the men" may refer to these same dying priests. It occurred to us at this point to consult the LXX for the usage of "judgment", knowing that in many cases the word judgment is synonymous with salvation in the O.T. Turning up the word krisis we found the list too formidable for the time at our disposal but believing that the key to Heb. ix. 27, 28 lies in the law concerning the cities of refuge, and knowing that Numb. xxv. contains a full statement concerning these cities, we looked to see whether krisis occurs in that chapter. It does:

> "And they shall be unto you cities for refuge from the avenger; that the manslayer die not, until he stand before the congregation in judgment (krisis)" (Numb. xxxv. 12).

This statement is followed by a law making a distinction between a willful murder and a manslayer, and when these distinctions have been made the Scripture continues:

> "Then the congregation shall judge between the slayer and the revenger of blood according to these judgments (krimata): and the congregation shall deliver the slayer out of the hand of the revenger of blood, and the congregation shall restore him to the city of his refuge, whither he was fled (katapheugo): and he shall abide in it unto the DEATH of the high priest, which was anointed with the holy oil . . . . . after the death of the high priest the slayer shall return into the land of his possession" (Numb. xxxv. 24-28).

This is the "judgment" equivalent to salvation that was to be pronounced by the congregation, and hinged upon the death of the anointed high priest. It will be seen that such an interpretation harmonizes with the simile here intended:

A | 27-. And as.
B | -27-. The men die once.
C | -27. Judgment.
A | 28-. So also.
B | -28-. Christ was offered once.
C | -28. Salvation.

Judgment and Salvation.

In Judges ii. 16-19 we have the close connection established between the judge and deliverance:

> "And when the LORD raised them up judges, then the LORD was with the judge, and delivered (saved) them out of the hand of their enemies all the days of the judge . . . . . when the judge was dead, they returned (turned back) . . . . ." (Judges ii. 18, 19).

The judges of Israel were first of all saviours. This is seen in the judgeship of Othniel and Ehud "The Lord raised up a saviour to the children of Israel" (Judg. iii. 9-15). The reader will doubtless call to mind the many passages where the poor, the needy and the righteous call upon God to "judge" them, and such passages as Psa. i. 5 where the ungodly are excluded from "judgment". It is this Old Testament conception of judgment and the particular exercise of it seen in Numb. xxxv. that must be kept to the fore as we read Heb. ix. 27.

No.41. One Sacrifice for sins for ever (ix. 23 - x. 18).
pp. 21 - 27

We continue our study of the nature of the "one sacrifice" which the Saviour offered once for all, by considering,

The Day of Atonement.

The type of the city of refuge is now dropped and the great Day of Atonement is in view. The return of the Lord "the second time" is to be understood in the light of the action of the high priest on the Day of Atonement. There in the holiest of all the high priest appeared in the presence of God for the people (Lev. xvi. 23, 24); then putting on his gorgeous robes he came out to bless the waiting congregation. The apostle could hardly find a grander and more impressive moment in the whole Levitical ritual with which to impress a Jew than this. He, however, refers to it but to draw attention even here to the surpassing excellence of Christ. When the high priest came out from the presence of God, he made a fresh atonement for himself and for the people (Lev. xvi. 24). This shows once more the failure of the type, for when Christ, the true High Priest, appears the second time it will be "apart from a sin offering"—"Christ . . . . . dieth no more".

The second appearing of the Lord, in fulfillment of the type of Lev. xvi., will also be His Second Coming, and as we have already indicated, at the time of the writing of Hebrews that Second Coming was imminent. The Lord had ascended, had entered into the presence of God, and had Israel repented and "looked for Him", He would have returned in His robes of glory and beauty without sin unto salvation. Israel, however, failed. The Second Coming was deferred. A parenthetical dispensation must now run its course before that typical seventh month is fulfilled, and before every eye shall see Him, and they also which pierced Him.

Perfected for ever.

We have already had brought before us the solemn fact that 'the law made nothing perfect', and this statement was not allowed to remain merely as a general remark, it was particularized. The priesthood made nothing perfect, the Tabernacle services made nothing perfect, and now we are to have the final argument to show that the sacrifices of the law made nothing perfect, but the teaching of this epistle is not a threefold negative, but is a glorious positive that the one offering of Christ did make perfect in its fullest sense. Chapter x. 1-18 is devoted to this theme.

> "For the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things" (x. 1).

The Syriac version interprets this clause, "For the law, a shadow was in it, not the substance itself". Just as in Col. ii. 17 "the shadow" is in antithesis to the "body of Christ", so here the "shadow" is in contrast with the "very image", the reality itself. That which cast its shadow in the law is the real thing. Every sacrifice offered upon Israel's altar was a foreshadowing of the one and only acceptable Offering of Christ.

> "Can never with those sacrifices which they offered year by year" (x. 1).

The inability of the sacrifices of the law is associated with their repetition, a feature which is enlarged upon in the next verse. The feature that is most important in this verse and which shows up prominently in the structure, viz. A | b, is hidden in the A.V. word "continually". The English reader sees in it but an extension of the words "year by year". The Greek reads eis to dienekes, "unto the unbroken continuance". The phrase does not occur outside the epistle to the Hebrews, and in that epistle it occurs four times:

> "Abideth a priest continually" (vii. 3).
> "They offered year by year continually" (x. 1).
> "One sacrifice for sins for ever" (x. 12).
> "For by one offering He hath perfected for ever" (x. 14).

It will be seen that the phrase is used in connection with the vital theme of the epistle. The Melchisedec Priesthood is "for unbroken continuance", unbroken by death, as was in the case with every other priest. In connection with x. 1 a complete balance is discovered in verse 14, "perfected unto unbroken continuance". Verse 1, therefore, reads thus:

> "For the law having a shadow of the good things about to be, not the very image of the things, can never with those annual sacrifices which they offer, perfect unto unbroken continuance those who draw near."

The English word "continually" bears two distinct meanings. (1) Frequently, repeatedly; (2) permanently. The translation given in the A.V. of x. 1 uses the word "continually" in the sense of "repeatedly" year by year. This rendering has only to be used in the other passages to demonstrate its unsuitability. "Christ abideth a Priest repeatedly" is opposed to both sense and truth. "One sacrifice for sins repeatedly" has no meaning.

We have been misled here in x. 1 by the twofold meaning of an English word, and this is not by any means an isolated case. Let us translate eis to dienekes, "unto perpetuity", which phrase is less cumbersome than the more literal rendering given above.

The next verse exposes the fatal failure of every sacrifice offered under the law. They never touched the conscience.

This feature has been enlarged upon in ix. 12-14, where the "blood of bulls and goats and the ashes of an heifer" are seen in their typical "purifying of the flesh", and the blood of Christ Who offered Himself without spot to God is seen as the great antitype purging the conscience from dead works, that those thus cleansed may serve the living God. Likewise in the same chapter the apostle, speaking of the gifts, sacrifices, meats, drinks and divers baptisms, says they were imposed until the time of reformation and could never make those who did the service "perfect as pertaining to the conscience". Further in x. 22 when the controversy is over, the apostle exhorts his readers to:

> "Draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience."

Had the sacrifice once perfected the offerer as pertaining to the conscience, no further offering would have been necessary or tolerated. The law was a shadow, it purified the flesh, and its repeated offerings testify to its insufficiency. Further, the very repetition is a continual remembrance of sin, whereas when the New Covenant is in force God says, "Their sins and iniquities will I remember no more".

The final setting aside of the sacrifices of the law is made in verse 4:

> "For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins."

The argument now rests upon the very nature of things. Nothing more can be said. Can a shadow save us? Will a ceremonial, an external cleansing satisfy us? Can the blood of an animal make reconciliation for a man? The answer is No, and that answer Scripture has already anticipated in the fortieth Psalm.

The prepared body.

In brushing aside the last remaining hope of Israel under the law, and in shutting down any future argument by the word "impossible", the apostle was but reaching forward to the glorious fact that "what the law could not do, God did by sending His Son in the likeness of sinful flesh" (Rom. viii. 3). The quotation from Psa. xl. is prefaced by the words, "Wherefore when He cometh into the world". This can only refer to His first coming in the flesh. He is yet to be brought into the world again, when all the angels of God shall worship Him (Heb. i. 6). We are permitted (let us remember what holy ground is here) to learn the words that the Son of God breathed when the moment came for His birth at Bethlehem. His name was to be called Jesus, for He was coming into the flesh to save His people from their sins by the sacrifice of Himself:

> "Sacrifice and offering Thou wouldst not, but a body hast Thou prepared Me" (Heb. x. 5).

When we turn to the Psalm quoted we read:

> "Sacrifice and offering Thou didst not desire; mine ears hast Thou opened" (Psa. xl. 6).

It is a fact unquestioned that Psa. xl. gives a translation of the Hebrew, yet the LXX which purports to translate the Hebrew reads as the Greek New Testament it is too wide a subject to discuss here as to how the LXX came by its present rendering; what we may do is to realize that the twofold statement of Psa. xl. and Heb. x. present two versions of one truth. Just as Matthew and Luke, both recording one utterance of the Lord, use slightly different words to express their phase of the utterance, yet without fully exhausting it, so we must take both Old Testament and New Testament records as supplying a full quotation of the utterance of the Word immediately before He became flesh and tabernacled among us. The Hebrew word "opened" is karah and is usually translated "dig", as a grave, a pit, or a well. The feminine form of the noun, however, mekurah, is translated "birth" in Ezek. xvi. 3, and "nativity" in Ezek. xxi. 30. Compare the two references following:

> "Thy birth (margin cutting out or habitation) and thy nativity is of the land of Canaan; thy father was an Amorite, and thy mother an Hittite" (Ezek. xvi. 3).
> "The place where thou wast created, in the land of thy nativity" (Ezek. xxi. 30).

This use of the word to dig for birth or nativity is parallel with the words of Isa. li. 1, 2:

> "Look unto the rock whence ye are hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence ye are digged. Look unto Abraham your father, and unto Sarah that bare you."

This strange (to us) use of the word makes the meaning of Psa. xl. clearer. "The ear" being "digged" is by an easy transition "the body" that was "prepared". The ear standing as it does for obedience, as in Isa. l. 5, 6:

> "The Lord GOD hath opened mine ear, and I was not rebellious, neither turned away back. I gave my back to the smiters, and my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair; I hid not my face from shame and spiting."

Some expositors see in this expression "mine ears hast thou opened" a reference to Exod. xxi. 6, where the willing servant is taken and his ear bored with an awl as a sign of obedience "for ever", an act largely the result of love for wife and children who would otherwise be left behind had the man gone free. The word "bore" is entirely different from the word "dig" or "open", nevertheless the type is too beautiful to ignore, and aptly sets forth that One Who voluntarily laid aside His glory, "and took upon Him the form of a slave . . . . . and became obedient unto death" (Phil. ii. 7, 8). This body prepared for the Lord set aside all sacrifice and offering, gathering into one Offering the varied phases and aspects of sacrifice and obedience, as it is written in the volume of the book:

> "Lo, I come to do Thy Will, O God."

The four kinds of sacrifices that were ordained by the law, and which were shadows of the one Offering of Christ, are divided into two groups—burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin. The former are a sweet savour to God, the latter for the sins of His people. Both aspects are combined in the one sacrifice of Christ.

By the which will.

It is important when seeking the Scriptural meaning of sacrifice that we bear in mind the teaching of this passage. "Lo, I come to do Thy will, O God" is equivalent to "Lo, I come to do all that burnt offering and sacrifice for sins typified". By so doing the first Covenant was taken away and the second established (x. 9):

> "For if that first covenant had been faultless, then should no place have been sought for the second" (viii. 7).

The first Covenant was faulty because it was a shadow, it was weak because of the flesh. It was impossible because its sacrifices were of bulls and goats; it was a failure because it did not touch the conscience. All this has found rectification in Christ. His blood has ratified the New Covenant, His Offering touches the conscience and makes a way into the true holiest of all:

> "By the which will we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all" (Heb. x. 10).

It will help us if we carefully analyse the statements of this verse:

(1) What is the will of God intended by—"The which will?"
(2) What is the meaning of the consequence?—"We are sanctified".
(3) What means were used to accomplish this will?—"The offering of the body".
(4) What constitutes its eternal efficacy?—"Once for all".

The strange expression "by the which will" must mean the "done will" accomplished by Christ. This will done by Christ cannot be confined to the earthly life and perfect obedience of those sinless years, for the very accomplishment of that will is found in "the offering of the body of Jesus Christ" and that as a sacrifice which involved:

(1) Suffering (Heb. ix. 26; xiii. 12).
(2) Crucifixion (Heb. vi. 6; xii. 2).
(3) Shedding of blood (Heb. ix. 14; x. 19).
(4) Death (Heb. ii. 9; ix. 15).
(5) An Altar (Heb. xiii. 10).
(6) A Priest (Heb. xiii. 1; ix. 11).
(7) A Sanctuary (Heb. ix. 24; x. 19).

It is utterly impossible to avoid the sacrificial character of the work of Christ when thinking of His accomplishment of the Divine will. That was the will of God in its essence. The purpose of this will is "sanctification". Sanctification involves a complete heart dedication to God and His service, set forth typically by the sprinkling of the blood of the Covenant, the people, and the vessels of ministry (Heb. ix. 18-22). Sanctification involves cleansing from both external and internal defilement, set forth typically in the "divers washings" "the ashes of the heifer sprinkling the unclean" (Heb. ix. 10, 13). Sanctification involves access, and sonship (Heb. x. 22; ii. 11-13). Sanctification is the will of God for all His children irrespective of the differences of dispensations under which they have been called.

"Will of God."

This is seen in Eph. i. 4:

"According as He hath chosen us . . . . . that we should be holy and without blame."

And it is accomplished, as in Heb. x., by the offering of the body of Jesus Christ, for in Eph. v. 26, 27 and Col. i. 22 we read:

"That He might sanctify . . . . . that it should be holy and without blemish."
"In the body of His flesh (nothing could be more definite) through death, to present you holy and unblameable and unreproveable (irreproachable) in His sight."

The eternal efficacy of the Offering of Christ is expressed in the fact that it was offered "once for all". Over and over again, first from this angle, then from that, the apostle brings to view the repeated offerings of the law and contrasts them with the once offered Sacrifice of Christ. Where there is remission of sin no more offering is necessary. It may be of service to remark that the words "once for all" mean "once for all time" and have no reference to the number for whom the sacrifice was made.

We now come to the close of the long argument that has gathered round the Lord as High Priest and Sacrifice supreme. By way of recapitulation the apostle reminds us that the typical priest "standeth daily offering oftentimes the same sacrifices", whereas Christ "sat down on the right hand of God". The sacrifices repeatedly offered were such that they:

"Can never take away sins" (x. 11).
"But this Man, after He had offered one Sacrifice for sins for ever (unto perpetuity)" (x. 12).

His sacrifice is finished, He now awaits the end, "Expecting till His enemies be made His footstool". Then emerges the last word of the argument, embodying in itself the essence of chapters vii.-ix.:

"For by one offering He hath perfected for ever (unto perpetuity) them that are sanctified" (x. 14).

This "will" being in absolute contrast with the Old Covenant (see x. 1-3 and structure), is in entire conformity with the New Covenant as set forth in verses 15-18.

The effect of sanctification is seen in the laws written in the heart and the mind. The fullness of the sanctification is seen in the fact that "their sins and iniquities will I remember no more". The completeness, the "perfecting unto perpetuity" of the sanctified is expressed in the words, "there is no more offering for sins".

"The comers" have been made perfect.
The conscience has been purged.
There is no more remembrance.
There is no need for annual or daily repetition (x. 1, 2).

We now stand at the opening of a new, a practical, section which urges the believer to draw near, to endure, to live by faith, to run with patience. This we must reserve for a future article. The condensed nature of The Berean Expositor prevents us from writing articles that apply the doctrines of Scripture, touch the affection or stir the spirit. Such is not our mission, but we do earnestly pray that none will contemplate either the great Offering or its marvelous results without heartfelt thanksgiving and desire for fuller practical consecration.

No.42. Perdition, or the saving of the soul (x. 19 - 39).
pp. 41 - 48

Doctrine has held sway over the reader of this epistle for a long period, but however involved the argument may be, and however multiplied the proofs, it must certainly somewhere before the close, give place to practical teaching and exhortation. To that we have arrived, and it is introduced by the words of verses 19-22, "Having therefore . . . . . Let us". The exhortation "let us" is valueless without the "having therefore", but so also is the "having" without the practical issue. What does the apostle say these believers have?

Boldness to enter into the holiest. Under the law this was restricted to the high priest, and to the day of atonement. "The high priest alone once" (ix. 7). "With the blood of others" (ix. 25). The case is now different. Boldness to enter is the privilege of all believers by the blood of Jesus.

By a new and living way, which He hath consecrated for us. The legal way was old. "Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away" (viii. 13). This way is new. Prosphatos means primarily "newly slain"; the legal way was dead. "Priests . . . . . were not suffered to continue by reason of death" (vii. 23). The entrance is "by the blood of Jesus" (x. 19) and "His flesh" (x. 20). The New Covenant demands a new way.

The Lord's flesh is likened to the veil. Of all the many and wonderful suggestions that have been made by commentators as to the meaning here of the veil, none seem worth a second thought that have no place for that historic fact that "the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom" (Matt. xxvii. 51) when the Lord Jesus died. The second veil barred the entrance to the holiest of all, "the Holy Ghost thus signifying that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest". The newly-slain and living way means a rent veil.

And having an High Priest over the house of God. As chapter viii. puts it, New Covenant believers have a seated Priest in a heavenly sanctuary. So far the summary of the doctrine, what they "have". Now follows the summary of the practice "let us".

Let us draw near with a true heart. To draw near expresses the full privilege of those who are sanctified. It is a word used nowhere else in the epistles of Paul except I Tim. vi. 3 where "consent" translates the word and shows an entirely different usage.

So special a word we would expect to be stamped with the hallmark "seven", for that is the number of its occurrences in Hebrews.

The true heart means the heart of the New Covenant realities in contrast with the old Covenant shadows (viii. 10). So we read of the "true" Tabernacle (viii. 2), and of the antitypes of the "true" (ix. 24).

In full assurance of faith. Heb. vi. 11 speaks of a full assurance of hope, and both hope and faith find anchor "within the veil" (Heb. vi. 19; x.20).

To draw near (proserchomai).

A | iv. 14-16. Having a great High Priest, let us hold fast our profession and draw near boldly.
B | vii. 25. Saved unto all perfection those who draw near.
x. 1. Could not perfect unto perpetuity those who draw near.
A | x. 19-23. Having an High Priest, let us draw near with boldness, and let us hold fast our profession.
B | xi. 6. Those who draw near to God must believe that He is.
xii. 18. Sinai. Blackness, Darkness.
xii. 22. Zion. Spirit of perfected righteous ones.

Having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with pure water. The sprinkling here refers to the "ashes of the heifer sprinkling the unclean", which set forth in type that cleansing of the conscience from dead works, which was only possible through the blood of Christ (ix. 13,14). The washing of the bodies with pure water refers to the spiritual reality set forth in the typical "divers washings" of the law (ix. 10).

Let us . . . . . let us . . . . . let us. Three times over comes the beseeching command, let us draw near, let us hold fast, let us consider one another. The first is God-ward, the second is personal, the third is for others.

Let us hold fast the profession of our hope without wavering. The word here (elpis) is hope, not faith, and refers to "that better hope whereby we draw near to God" (vii. 19). This must be held at all costs "without wavering". This firm hold of the hope and its profession is in view in Heb. iii. 6 & 14, and to this all the exhortations to endure are directed. Without wavering (aklines) may be translated "without bending". It is the exact opposite of klino "turned to flight" (Heb. xi. 34).

For He is faithful that promised. Much is made of the promises in this epistle, indeed epaggelia occurs therein fourteen times. Much is made too of the faithfulness of the Promiser, especially in Heb. vi. 13-19.

Let us consider one another. There is a false piety that believes that God is well pleased with a monastic isolation, that God only wrote four commandments and not ten, and that has no room for the love of neighbour, as a corollary to the love of God. This is a travesty of truth. "He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God Whom he hath not seen?" (I John iv. 20). The special "provoking" here is to "love and to good works". The word "good" here is not agathos, but kalos as in Heb. v. 14; vi. 5.

Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is. The usual interpretation of this passage associates it with attendance at a Christian place of worship. The word "assembling" (episunagoge), and its cognate (episunago), are never used of an "assembling" in the sense of attending service at church. Episunago is used in Matt. xxiii. 37 and its parallel passage for the Lord's desire to gather the children of Jerusalem to Himself as a hen does her chickens. It is used in Matt. xxiv. 31 and its parallel passage of the gathering together of the elect by the angels. It is used in Mark i. 33 and Luke xii. 1, for the crowd who gathered for healing or interest. The only other place where episunagoge occurs is II Thess. ii. 1, "The coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and our gathering together unto Him". The apostle by the use of the word "forsaking" evidently glances back to such passages as II Chron. xxiv. 18, where the "forsaking" of the house of the Lord meant apostasy, and was visited with wrath, and also to Neh. x. 39 and xiii. 11, where adherence to the house of God indicated loyalty. The "gathering together of ourselves" has value only as it foreshadows the hope of "our gathering together unto Him". At the present time faithfulness to truth and to the blessed hope sometimes cuts us off from Christian assemblies, and this passage must never be used to justify compromise. The present dispensation knows no "place of worship" except where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God, for God dwelleth not in temples made with hands. Churches and chapels are conveniences, not essentials.

Hope, the anchor of the soul.

The added words, "so much the more, as ye see the day approaching", confirms the thought that the hope and its gathering together is all the while in view. As we see the day approaching we must confess that it has often cut us off from assembling with the Lord's people, simply because corporate testimony has gone the way of all the earth.

A further confirmation of this higher and fuller meaning is found in the argument that immediately follows. The forsaking of the assembly is called a "willful sin after the reception of the truth", and for such "there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins". Under the law sins were placed under two heads:

(1) Sins of omission, ignorance, and inadvertence (Lev. iv. 2, etc.).
(2) Sins of presumption, high hand, malice aforethought (Numb. xv. 30, 31).

Apostasy from the profession of the hope had the character of presumptuous sin, for which the law made no provision. That David (as in Psa. li.), for example, could be forgiven, shows that a fuller Sacrifice is found under the gospel than under the law, but the apostle does not bring this forward, neither does he mitigate the severity of the judgment that is pronounced against such. "Fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries", "died without mercy", "of how much sorer punishment", "vengeance is Mine", "it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God", all stress the extreme severity of the penalty. "Trodden under foot the Son of God", "counting the blood of the Covenant unholy", "doing despite to the Spirit of grace", these terms reveal the enormity of the sin of turning back to Judaism. In this light, Heb. vi. 1-8 is to be read, to which the word "illuminated" of x. 32 evidently refers. These are the only occurrences of photizo in Hebrews.

Things that accompany salvation.

Just as the apostle in Heb. vi., after speaking in severe terms of apostates, turns to the Hebrew believers saying, "But, beloved, we are persuaded better things of you, and things that accompany salvation, though we thus speak" (vi. 9), so here in Heb. x. 32 he continues:

> "But call to remembrance the former days, in which, after ye were illuminated, ye endured a great fight of afflictions."

There is also blessed condescension to the frail and the weaker faith. Not only does he call to remembrance the conspicuous hero of the fight, but the more reticent and less observed partner in the fight. Some were made a "gazing stock". Not so much is said of violence, or of actual suffering, but this reference shows that the Lord enters into that shrinking which most of us have of being pilloried for our faith. Blessed truth, He knows, and weighs these things in the balance of the Sanctuary. They might have gone free from observation. They might have remained quietly shielded, but they are remembered in that they became "companions" of them that were so used. Instead of the reading, "Ye had compassion of me in my bonds" the texts read, "of those in bonds". This epistle to the Hebrews does not teach that the writer (Paul as we believe) was a prisoner at the time of writing. They also took with joy the spoiling of their possessions, probably by "extortion" as the words are rendered in Matt. xxiii. 25.

> "Knowing that you have for yourselves a better and enduring possession" (Heb. x. 34).

The text omits the words "in" and "in heaven". Upon this series of admonitions the apostle rests his exhortation:

> "Cast not away therefore your confidence (boldness, x. 19), which hath great recompence of reward" (x. 35).

What they did need was patience. Patience is essential for perfecting. The epistle of James is written around that thought. The first chapter opens with it (verses 3, 4 and 12), and the fifth chapter closes with it, "Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord" (James v. 11). "The day" was approaching. That day was the coming of the Lord, "for yet a little, and He that shall come will come, and will not tarry" (Heb. x. 37). This coming was a possibility at this time, conditional on Israel's repentance (Acts iii. 19-26).

The quotation from Habakkuk.

This introduces the quotation from Habakkuk which figures so prominently in the epistles to the Romans and Galatians. The words "The just shall live by faith" are divisible under three heads and the apostle has taken this course with the verse.

"The just by faith shall live" (Rom. i. 17). The argument of Rom. i. is concerning the provision of righteousness. "The just by faith shall live" (Gal. iii. 11). The argument of Gal. iii. revolves around works of law, and faith. "The just by faith shall live" (Heb. x. 38). The argument of Heb x. and xi. is entirely devoted to "living by faith". Here we have a splendid example of exhortation, where doctrine and practice are both given their place. Referring once again to Heb. vi. 12 we read of "faith and patience" inheriting the promises. Out of the thirty-two occurrences of pistis ("faith") in Hebrews, 29 are found in this practical section x. 19 - xiii. 25.

The essence of the test of Habakkuk (ii. 3, 4) seems to be found in the words "though it tarry, wait!" The delay, the silence of God (Hab. i. 1-4) is solved by the assurance that "the vision is yet for an appointed time". The waiting does not mean that God is indifferent. All the details of His purpose have an appointed time. This fact of itself should enable us to wait. Further, "at the end it shall speak and not lie". When the time does come, nothing can prevent God from speaking, acting, delivering, or doing whatever is particularly required. Yet further, the feeling of delay is merely human. "Though it tarry . . . . . it will surely come, it will not tarry". It is here that the prophet writes the words which are repeated and interpreted with such fullness by the apostle Paul, "the just shall live by his faith".

The Hebrew believers had suffered the spoiling of their goods, and a reference to Hab. iii. 17, with its sixfold failure of fig, vine, olive, field, fold and stall, places them in the goodly fellowship of the prophets. The better and enduring possessions that they had are found in Hab. iii. 19, "The Lord God is my strength, and He will make my feet like hinds' feet, and He will make me to walk upon mine high places". Living by faith is placed in contrast with "drawing back unto perdition", and this drawing back is in its turn contrasted with "believing unto the acquiring (not "saving") of the soul".

Perfection or Perdition.

We are here confronted with a group of problems which will repay all the time devoted to their solution. The two words that provide the key to the difficulty are perdition and saving. What is perdition? Does this passage teach that a believer who does not hold fast the profession of his hope can draw back and finally be cast into hell? However we may object to the phrasing, that, bluntly, is the difficulty before us. In searching for an answer which would satisfy the demands of all Scripture, we discovered that there are three sets of passages in which perdition is used as the alternative to perfection, and this relationship of the words is of itself illuminating. The first Scripture is this epistle to the Hebrews. It hardly needs demonstrating that the epistle is summed up in the words of chapter vi. 1, "Let us go on unto perfection", and that x. 39 provides the alternative, "draw back to perdition". It may be objected that as this emphasizes the very verse we seek to understand, our use of it is biased and unfair. We therefore turn to the second passage (Phil. iii.), where "Let us go on unto perfection" is expressed by the words, "Not as though I were already perfect, but I follow after" (Phil. iii. 12).

"As many as would be perfect" (Phil. iii. 15) are exhorted positively to follow the example of Paul; and negatively to avoid the example of those whose end is perdition. Now it does not seem possible that a church that had reached such a height of spiritual experience as that attained by the Philippians should need to be solemnly warned not to follow the example of the ungodly. Those who were more likely to cause a slip and possibly a forfeiture were those believers who were following the policy expressed in the words, "making the best of both worlds". These caused the apostle to weep as he spoke of their walk, and summarized it as the walk of those who were:

> "The enemies of the cross of Christ: whose end is perdition (A.V. destruction), whose God is their belly, and whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things" (Phil. iii. 18, 19).

The last statement proves that those enemies are not the unsaved, for how can an unsaved man mind anything else but earthly things? To believers Paul can write, "Set your mind on things above, not on things on the earth" (Col. iii. 2). Such believers as those Philippians referred to in iii. 18, 19 constitute themselves the enemies of the cross of Christ, for that cross speaks of separation from the things of the flesh and the world.

Keeping this passage in mind we look at the third, viz. The Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v.-vii.). The exhortation to endure, to suffer with the reward of the earthly kingdom in view, has only to be mentioned to be accepted as the main theme of this sermon. Its goal is expressed in Matt. v. 48, "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect". The word perdition comes later, in Matt. vii. 13, "Broad is the way, that leadeth to perdition (A.V. destruction)". The passage immediately goes on to say, "by their fruits ye shall know them" (verse 20).

Here we have three occasions where these words occurs as the two poles of their respective contexts. Still the question remains, What is intended by the word perdition? Perdition, as some of its contexts indicate, can mean utter destruction, as of the Man of Sin, but if we could only find a passage where the word is used without any doctrinal or theological meaning we could then understand how such a word could be used of so vastly different subjects. In the providence of God such a passage exists, and moreover is used by Matthew who has provided one of the sets already:

> "There came unto him a woman having an alabaster box of very precious ointment . . . . . To what purpose is this WASTE (perdition)?" (Matt. xxvi. 7, 8).

Before proceeding, let us be sure we understand the meaning of the alternative, "perfection". Teleios is cognate with telos, and telos means the end, the goal. To go on unto perfection is to reach one's goal. That this is innate in the word, two passages will show. In Phil. iii. 12 Paul explains what he means by being perfect, by adding, "That I may apprehend that for which I am also apprehended of Christ Jesus", and in Gal. iii. 3 he places "perfected" in antithesis to "begin": "Having begun in the spirit, are ye now made perfect (ended, as it were, finished) by the flesh?" Perdition set over against perfectness then means to end in waste instead of in triumph. Therein lies the tragedy of drawing back. The foundation is laid, the builder will be saved, but he may be saved yet "so as by fire". He may not himself be lost, but he may "suffer loss", and see his life's work turn to smoke (I Cor. iii.). This was the dreadful possibility before the Hebrews.

Saving (purchasing) the soul.

Peripoiesis translated "saving" occurs but five times in the New Testament, viz.:

> "The redemption of the purchased possession" (Eph. i. 14).
> "To obtain salvation" (I Thess. v. 9).
> "To the obtaining of the glory" (II Thess. ii. 14).
> "The saving of the soul" (Heb. x. 39).
> "A peculiar people" (I Pet. ii. 9).

Peripoieomai is translated "purchased" in Acts xx. 28, and "purchase" in I Tim. iii. 13.

Not only must we have the true conception of this word "saving", but we must also be sure that we have no traditional warp regarding the expression saving the "soul". It is used in evangelical preaching and literature as though it means the salvation of the sinner, but the striking thing is that Paul has no use for the expression. Peter uses the words "the salvation (soterian, not peripoiesis) of your souls", but not in the sense usually employed, for he speaks of it as the end of their faith and of "salvation ready to be revealed in the last time . . . . . at the revelation of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 5-9). So far as the present is concerned, believers are exhorted rather to lose their souls than to save them; which, however, is not a popular expression today. The moment we see this we are on the track of the truth of Heb. x., and Matt. xvi. supplies the key:

> "If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow Me. For whosoever will save his life (soul) shall lose it: and whosoever will lose his soul for My sake shall find it. For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul? For the Son of man shall come in the glory of His Father with His angels; and then He shall reward every man according to his works" (Matt. xvi. 24-27). (Soul and life translate the one Greek word psuche).

The man who denies himself, and takes up his cross, loses his soul in this life. If he turns back to the good things that he has relinquished, making his belly his god, and finding his glory in his shame, he saves his soul in this life, but becomes the enemy of the cross, for he has refused to bear it. The one who is willing to lose his soul for Christ's sake will find it when the Lord gives reward at His Coming. All this is intended by the words of Heb. x. 39. Here, as in Heb. vi., hope is the anchor of the soul, is connected with the obtaining of the promises, enters within the veil, and belongs to those once "enlightened". Heb. xi. which immediately follows contains a list of Old Testament saints who lost their souls for Christ's sake, to find them in the better resurrection.

As this chapter is so important, and we have one special feature to make clear, we conclude this study at this point. We trust that the close parallel that is observable between Matthew, Philippians and Hebrews will not be without salutary effect upon us all. Let us go on unto perfection; let us remember the awful waste of precious opportunities that will be ours if we "neglect so great salvation", if we neglect to "work out our own salvation". The body of our humiliation is soon to be fashioned like unto the body of His glory. A little while and the time will come, "the appointed time" for which we wait. Let us then take heart. We have need of patience. Let patience have her perfect work, that we may be perfect and entire, lacking nothing.

No.43. Let us draw near . . . . . not draw back (x. 19 - 39).
pp. 61 - 64

We have seen that the whole teaching and exhortation of the epistle to the Hebrews may be summed up under two phrases:

(1) Let us go on unto perfection, or
(2) Draw back unto perdition.

The examples of those that draw back to perdition are those whose carcasses fell in the wilderness (Heb. iii.), those who are "dull of hearing" and never advance from being "babes" (Heb. v.), or who like Esau despise their birthright (Heb. xii.), or prefer Sinai to Sion (Heb. xii.). Here we find such alternatives as:

SHADOW and VERY IMAGE
WORLDLY SANCTUARY and HEAVENLY HOLLIEST OF ALL OLD COVENANT and NEW COVENANT
FLESH CLEANSED and CONSCIENCE CLEANSED
MOUNT SINAI and MOUNT SION
VANISHING and REMAINING,

all set forth, with earnest instruction and entreaty, to urge along the upward path to perfection, and to shun apostasy and perdition. Heb. x. 19-39, the passage before us, takes up this double exhortation. Doctrine has reached its zenith at verse 18, and from verse 19 to the end of the epistle it is largely a matter of exhortation. The double theme sets the bounds of the section before us.

A | 22. Let us draw near.
In full assurance of faith.
A | 38, 39. We are not of them who draw back but,
Believe to the saving of the soul.

Having . . . . . let us.

No exhortation in Scripture stands alone. Beneath the feet of practice stands privilege. The fruit of good works derives its nourishment from the root of grace. If the apostle says, "Let us", he will also say, "Having therefore".

"Having therefore boldness . . . High Priest"	Let us draw near Let us hold fast Let us consider one another (x. 19-24).
"Seeing we are encompassed"	Let us lay aside Let us run with patience (xii. 1, 2).
"Wherefore we receiving a kingdom"	Let us have grace Let brotherly love continue (xii. 28 - xiii. 1).
"Wherefore Jesus suffered without the gate"	Let us go forth therefore Unto Him without the camp (xiii. 12, 13).

Here are four groups of teaching which space out the remainder of the epistle, and each group manifests the same feature. The strongest preventative against "drawing back" is evidently to "draw near", and we have every reason to draw near seeing that we "have therefore" boldness of access, and a great High Priest.

The new and living way.

The old typical way into the holiest is not the way that one must pass who desires to go on unto perfection.

> "The way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing: which was a figure for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him that did the service PERFECT, as pertaining to the conscience" (Heb. ix. 8, 9).

In place of the old and typical way stands the new and living way, "newly slain", as the word prosphatos means etymologically, although we cannot discover any example of its usage that will warrant the doctrine that appears to lie in this suggestive word. The second element evidently became superfluous in New Testament times. This new and living way has been consecrated, or dedicated, for us. Heb. ix. 18, using the word, reads, "Neither was the first covenant dedicated without blood". Consecration or dedication here includes the idea of something "new" or as we might say "initiation". Consecration in Heb. vii. 28 has the entirely opposite thought of attaining an "end".

Teleioo	Heb. vii. 28	To perfect, bring to full end.
Egkainizo	Heb. x. 20	To initiate, bring in new.

Here is the introduction of something new in its consecration, new in its constitution, a new way, newly dedicated.

Reconciliation by Incarnation?

The way into the holiest of all is "through the veil, that is to say His flesh". The connection between the Incarnation and reconciliation is a theme that attracts many believers and teachers. The fact that Christ became man, and, as they express it, brought His Godhead down to our humanity that He might lift our humanity up to God, is not the Scriptural basis for reconciliation. Heb. ii. 14 most surely reveals the absolute necessity for the Lord to partake of flesh and blood, but it as surely declares the purpose to be:

> "That THROUGH DEATH He might destroy . . . . . and deliver" (Heb. ii. 14, 15).

Or again, in Heb. x., if we read in verse 5 of a "body prepared", we read in verse 10 of that body "offered". Not by Incarnation but by His one Sacrifice are we saved and sanctified. Calvary and not Bethlehem is the place of redemption, and though the crib at Bethlehem was necessarily the first step, it is the cross of Calvary that is the consummation. There could be no access into the holiest of all until "the veil, that is to say His flesh" was rent in twain from top to bottom (Matt. xxvii. 50, 51).

The three-fold exhortation.

Let us draw near. Let us hold fast. Let us consider. The true heart with which we are exhorted to draw near is consonant with the fact that Christ is the minister of the true Tabernacle (Heb. viii. 2; ix. 24). Instead of external washings, this heart is sprinkled from an evil conscience. The bodies washed with pure water seems to be a reference to the washing of the high priest and the Levites (Lev. xvi. 4; Numb. viii. 7), which type is fulfilled in the heart sprinkled from an evil conscience.

Side by side with this three-fold exhortation is seen the abiding three "Faith, hope and love" (Heb. x. 22-24). As we see these graces in their context we realize that to the Hebrews, as to the Corinthians (I Cor. xiii.), and to the Thessalonians (I Thess. i. 3), "these three" are the true antidote to apostasy.

Drawing back into perdition.

There is an evident parallel between Heb. ii.-iv. and Heb. x. 19 - xii. 3. In both passages we see the evil heart of unbelief that departs from the living God. In both the true antidote is "Let us draw near". In both there is the holding fast of the "confession". In chapter iii. we have stressed those who failed to enter in because of unbelief. In chapter xi. we have those who "through faith" obtained promises and triumphed. The two-fold title of Christ, "The Apostle and High Priest of our profession" (Heb. iii. 1) is parallel with the two-fold title of Heb. xii. 2, "The Captain and Perfecter of faith". The key to the character of the apostasy that is in view is found in Heb. x. 30:

> "Vengeance belongeth unto Me, I will recompense, saith the Lord. And again, The Lord shall judge His people."

These words are a quotation from Deut. xxxii., the great prophetic forecast of Israel's history given by Moses just before his end. This song of forty-three verses traverses the whole of prophetic times. It reveals the failure of Israel and their setting aside, the period while they are Lo-ammi, "not My people", and provoked to jealousy, and the mercy of the Lord that gathers them back again with rejoicing. Dr. Ginsburg reads Deut. xxxii. 34, 35 as follows:

> "Is not this laid up in store with Me, Sealed up in My treasuries? For the day of vengeance and recompense, For the time when their foot shall slip", and this is evidently "the day approaching" of Heb. x. 25. The apostasy foretold by Moses is manifestly at hand in Heb. x., and explains Heb. vi. as well.

Ye have need of patience.

While Israel as a nation were fast slipping away, the apostle turns with renewed earnestness to the tried and tested remnant with words of encouragement and exhortation. He bids them to call to remembrance the former days, in which, after they were illuminated, they endured a great fight of afflictions. Among the elements of endurance that he enumerates are:

> Being made a gazing stock.
> Being a fellow-partaker of those so used.

There is something very gracious in this recognition. To be a "gazing stock", a "spectacle", may not seem half so heroic as some other forms of martyrdom, yet the Lord knows the intensity of mental suffering that some natures may endure. Then, further, the Lord takes note of those who simply stand by and share the sufferings of others. The suffering of "reproaches" associated them with Christ Himself (Heb. xiii. 13), and the "enduring possession" with the "enduring city" (xiii. 14). Early Christians were called by their enemies, atheists, their places of assembly were misrepresented as being convened for most immoral purposes, all of which misrepresentations would constitute a very real suffering of reproach for Christ.

The words "goods" and "substance" should be rendered by the same word, and perhaps "possession" is the most suitable. The words in the original being huparchonta and huparxin.

> "And submitted to the seizure of your possessions with joy knowing in yourselves that you have in heaven, a better and an enduring possession" (Heb. x. 34 not AV JP).

The case of Moses in Heb. xi. 24-26 supplies a very full example of the meaning of the apostle here. He esteemed this "reproach" as greater than all the treasures of Egypt. He too looked unto the recompense of the reward. So he urges these Hebrew saints:

> "Cast not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward. For ye have need of patience, that, after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise" (Heb. x. 35, 36).

A chapter could well be devoted to the words, "Ye have need of patience". It is the "patience of hope", the patience that James speaks of when he says:

> "My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations; knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience. But let patience have her PERFECT work" (James i. 2-4).

It is evident that the words, "ye might receive the promise", indicate a long wait and a patient endurance, by the conclusion of the matter in Heb. xi. 39:

> "And these all, having obtained (received ? JP) a good report through faith, received NOT the promise."

What does the apostle bring forward to encourage these tried and tested believers?

The Coming of the Lord.

The relation of the Coming of the Lord to the church of the Mystery has been dealt with elsewhere, but it is here brought forward as the crowning argument in the writer's testimony:

> "For yet a little while, and He that shall come will come, and will not tarry. Now the just shall live by faith: but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him. But we are not of them who draw back unto perdition, but of them that believe to the saving of the soul" (Heb. x. 37-39).

No.44. "The substance of things hoped for" (xi. 1).
pp. 89 - 95

Chapter x., as we have seen, ends on the exhortation to live by faith. The words "we are not of them who draw back unto perdition" imply the alternative, "we are of them who go on unto perfection". In our last study we drew attention to the meaning of perdition when set over against perfection. To live by faith is evidently very closely allied with perfection, and in chapter xii. comes the exhortation to run with patience, 'looking unto Jesus, the Author and Perfecter (teleiotes) of faith."

For those who have a desire to "go on unto perfection", here in Christ is the supreme Example. Even as we say the words, however, we are conscious of a great gulf between the Lord and ourselves. It is just here that Heb. xi. so wonderfully fits in and comes to our aid. In this chapter, living by faith is subdivided for us, and we see one phase in one example, and another phase in another, and are gently led on to contemplate the Perfecter Himself in Whom all faith was resident in its fullness.

Light from the works of God.

It will be profitable for us to turn aside for a moment from the written Word that we may obtain help from an analogy in the works of God. The light of the sun untinted by the atmosphere through which it comes is pure white. If falling rain or water-mist intercepts the rays of sunlight, we have the phenomenon called the rainbow. We have all seen with pleasure in our childhood the colours of the rainbow caused by a decanter of water standing on a white table-cloth, or by the prism-shaped pendant ornaments that our grandparents had upon the mantle-shelf. These are but demonstrations of the fact that pure white light is made up of the three primary colours, red, yellow, and blue, and these mingling form the secondaries, orange, green, and violet. For reasons the explanation of which lies outside the scope of this book, the actual spectrum or rainbow is found to contain bands of seven colours, always in the following order: red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo and violet.

All colour in nature is dependent upon the fact that sunlight contains in itself the whole range of colour that exists. The red rose is called red because the petals have the power of absorbing the blue and the yellow rays of light, and throwing back to our eye the red. A leaf is green because it lays hold upon the red rays and throws back the blue and the yellow. A white chalk cliff throws back all the rays, while a black felt hat retains all the rays. Hence, a white dress is cooler than a black one as the light and heat rays are in measure treated alike. Now it is not our intention to attempt to give a discourse upon the spectrum, wonderful though that may be, but to use the spectrum as an illustration of the place of Heb. xi.

The pure white light of the sun, as representing perfect light, composed of the perfect number of colours, will represent Christ, as set forth in Heb. xii. 2. Heb. xi. will then represent the prism of glass which has the power of splitting up the perfect light of the sun, and so will split up the perfect faith of Christ, and focus a ray of each colour, as it were, upon one or more examples, enabling us to see the better the sevenfold splendour of the perfection of faith in Christ, after having seen the seven aspects of it separately in the lives of others.

Before we go further we must make certain that there are these sets of "sevens", and so taking nothing for granted we begin to count, (1) Abel, (2) Enoch, (3) Noah, (4) Abraham, (5) Isaac, (6) Jacob, and (7) Sarah. Here the record comes to an end for a time, while verses 12-16 speak of the pilgrim character of faith. It will be observed that a woman ends the series. We commence counting again in verse 17, (1) Abraham, (2) Isaac, (3) Jacob, (4) Joseph, (5) Moses, (6) Israel, and (7) Rahab. We have another set of seven, again ending with a woman. In verse 32 the apostle says that time would fail to tell of all that could be brought forward, but nevertheless the apparently haphazard list that is assembled in this verse still presents the spectrum, (1) Gideon, (2) Barak, (3) Samson, (4) Jephthae, (5) David, (6) Samuel, and (7) the prophets.

The seven-fold division of Heb. xi. being an established fact, we can now proceed to a further examination. How are these lists related to each other? It seems to be a Scriptural principle that truth is confirmed by two or more witnesses. Believing this to be the case, we approached the double list of names that are mentioned in detail, and found that they were arranged in pairs. For example, Abel and Enoch are both connected with death:

> "He being dead yet speaketh" (verse 4).
> "Enoch was translated that he should not see death" (verse 5).

The next pair, Noah and Abraham, are related to an inheritance:

Noah "became heir of the righteousness which is by faith" (verse 7).
Abraham "was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance" (verse 8).

Isaac and Jacob are mentioned as dwelling in tents, heirs with Abraham of the same promise, and looking for a city which hath foundations, so emphasizing their pilgrim character. Sarah and Abraham are by this arrangement brought together in the centre. Here resurrection is the theme.

Sarah "received strength to conceive seed . . . . . of . . . . . him as good as dead" (verses 11,12).
Abraham "offered up his only begotten son . . . . . accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead; from whence also he received him in a figure" (verses 17-19).

Isaac and Jacob are both mentioned together in connection with blessing that overruled the flesh.

Isaac "blessed Jacob and Esau concerning things to come" (verse 20).
Jacob "blessed both the sons of Joseph" (verse 21).

Joseph and Moses are both closely associated with Egypt. Joseph spoke of the exodus of the children of Israel (verse 22). Moses turned his back upon the treasures of Egypt (verse 26). Israel and Rahab conclude the series. Both are associated with the fall of Jericho and with being spared during judgment. Israel were saved, while Egypt's firstborn perished and the Egyptians were drowned in the Red Sea (verse 29). Rahab "perished not with them that believed not" (verse 31). Thus we have the perfect white light of faith split up into its seven parts:

A | Faith in connection with DEATH—Abel and Enoch.
B | Faith in connection with INHERITANCE—Noah and Abraham.
C | Faith in connection with PILGRIMAGE—Isaac and Jacob.
D | Faith in connection with RESURRECTION—Sarah and Abraham.
C | Faith in connection with BLESSING—Isaac and Jacob.
B | Faith in connection with EGYPT—Joseph and Moses.
A | Faith in connection with DELIVERANCE—Israel and Rahab.

The three chief features, viz., beginning, middle, and end, emphasize death, resurrection, and deliverance.

A principle of interpretation.

The way in which we are to interpret this series is suggested in Heb. xii. 24. Concerning Abel's faith Heb. xi. 4 says, "he being dead yet speaketh" and in Heb. xii. 24 we read of the blood of sprinkling that "speaketh better things than Abel". Here is a principle of interpretation. Heb. xi. are types; "the better things" are found in Christ. We can say that Christ's well-pleasing walk speaketh "better things" than that of Enoch, and so of all the rest. It is helpful to see the rays of light separated and set forth in this example, but their chief good is that they enable us the better to appreciate the fullness that there is in Christ.

The seven-fold analysis of perfected faith that occupies the bulk of Heb. xi. is introduced by a statement that reveals the underlying and essential character of this faith in all and every one of its manifestations; "Now faith is the SUBSTANCE of things hoped for, the EVIDENCE of things not seen." This passage may be taken apart from its context as a general definition of faith, but its real force can only be appreciated as it is seen at the head of this seven-fold exposition of perfected faith.

Moreover, viewing the statement in its context, it cannot be separated from the closing words of chapter x. There the believer is seen "losing" in this life, but sustained by the consciousness of that "possession of a better and more lasting nature" (x. 34), which was held in faith and prospect. The words immediately preceding the definition of faith in Heb. xi. 1 speak of a future day when those who have "lost their soul" for Christ's sake shall "gain" or "acquire it". Now it is evident that if these believers were really to take joyfully the spoiling of their goods, they must have had very vividly before them "the better and more lasting possessions" that awaited them in glory.

Substance and evidence.

As we examine the testimony of this chapter to the faith of Abel, Abraham, Moses and others, we shall see how much and how readily they gave up life, home, and wealth for the Lord's sake, and of them all it could be said that they were sustained by that faith which is the substance of things hoped for. Moses "endured, as seeing Him Who is invisible". What therefore are we to understand by the words "substance" and "evidence"?

In preparation for this, we covered a fairly wide circle in the examination of this word "substance" and its usage, but nothing revealed the intention of the apostle so well as the way in which it is used in the LXX or Greek version of the Old Testament. Hupostasis, the word translated "substance", is found in a number of passages in the Old Testament, a few of them being given hereafter as illuminating Heb. xi. 1, "And now, Lord, what wait I for? my (ground of) hope is in Thee" (Psa. xxxvii. 7). Where the Hebrew had the simple word "hope", the LXX had "My hupostasis (or ground of hope) is in Thee". "I sink in deep mire where there is no standing" (Psa. lxix. 2). In the next reference it is difficult to avoid a lengthy explanation if a literal rendering, together with the LXX parallels, is demanded. It so happens that in the A.V. the two adjoining verses contain the word "substance" as a rendering of other words. We think, however, that sufficient for our purpose will be provided by ignoring the surrounding difficulties, and lifting out the word translated by hupostasis. Spurrell's translation avoids some of the pitfalls.

> "My own person was not concealed from Thee, when I was formed in a secret manner; curiously wrought in the lower bowels of the earth. Thine eyes beheld me in embryo; and my members, each one of them was recorded in the book" (Psa. cxxxix. 15, 16—Spurrell's Version).
>
> "My bones which Thou hast made in secret were not hidden from Thee, nor my SUBSTANCE, in the lowest parts of the earth. Thine eyes saw my unwrought (substance)" (LXX translation).

There is much in the passage for meditation. Faith is to the things hoped for as the unborn embryo is to the fully formed and living child. There is much that is secret, dark and mysterious, but the whole presses forward to fullness of life. Such is the underlying thought of Heb. xi. 1. The things hoped for were at the moment "not seen", they were as yet "unborn" yet very real to faith. As we watch the expectant mother lovingly and quietly preparing the little garments for the life that is not yet manifest, we have God's own illustration of that faith which is the substance of things hoped for. Let us now examine the second statement:

> "Faith is . . . . . the evidence of things not seen."

Elengchos occurs but twice in the New Testament, Heb. xi. 1 and II Tim. iii. 16. The A.V. translates it once "evidence" and once "reproof". When we turn to the verb elengcho we have a wider field for investigation. The following are the renderings in the A.V., convict, convince, rebuke, reprove, tell one's fault. In no one place is it ever translated "prove" or "demonstrate", or by any such word that is parallel to "evidence". We find the word in Heb. xii. 5 where it is translated "to be rebuked". Now structurally this passage balances Heb. xi. 1 thus:

Elengchos

A | xi. 1. Faith. Substance and elengchos. A.V. "evidence".
B | xi. 2-40. The cloud of witnesses.
B | xii. 1, 2. The cloud of witnesses.
A | xii. 3-5. Faith. The elengchos. A.V. "rebuked".

Now if the last passage is rightly rendered "rebuke", how can the only other occurrence of the word in Hebrews, bound as it is by all the ties of structure and consistent argument, be rightly translated "evidence"? The reader may by this time be ready to consult the LXX again, and the first passage we note will be Habk. ii. 1, "I will stand upon my watch . . . . . what I shall answer upon my reproof", which is in the immediate context of the quotation, "the just shall live by his faith". Instead of "proof" we find "reproof". Let us search this matter further. Now elengchos occurs some twenty one times, and elengcho some 53 times. It is manifestly impossible to provide a concordance of the occurrences here. We will give a few, but would here assure the reader that every one of these 74 occurrences has been investigated, and that all point in one direction, namely, that elengchos does not mean "evidence" but "rebuke". Let us see a few examples:

> "And Abraham REPROVED Abimelech because of a well of water" (Gen. xxi. 25).
> "Thou shalt in any wise REBUKE thy neighbour" (Lev. xix. 17).
> "The Lord had REBUKED him" (II Chron. xxvi. 20).
> "Behold, happy is the man whom God CORRECTETH" (Job. v. 17).
> "My son, despise not the chastening of the LORD; neither be weary of HIS CORRECTION: for whom the "LORD loveth He CORRECTETH" (Prov. iii. 11, 12).

The apostle has quoted this passage of Prov. iii. 11, 12 in Heb. xii. 5, 6 and there, instead of giving the word "correction" twice as does the LXX, he uses the word "chasteneth". For confirmation of this synonym we may turn to Rev. iii. 19, "As many as I love, I rebuke and chasten". Those desirous of searching out this matter more fully will doubtless find opportunity. Sufficient has been here noted to show that the primary idea of Heb. xi. 1 is "Faith is a substance of things hoped for, a reproof of things not seen". This, however, does not convey sense to English ears, so we must consider the matter further. As the verse stands in the A.V. we have a repetition. Faith is a substance and an evidence. When we look at the actual thing in progress and in fact, we find that faith has a two-fold association: (1) It looks forward to a future glory; (2) It endures present suffering. The two are linked "For the joy . . . . . He endured the Cross".

The Hebrew believers would readily believe that faith was the substance of things hoped for. They would rejoice in Enoch's translation; but would they so readily rejoice in Abel's death? They would rejoice in Noah's preservation and inheritance, but would they so readily rejoice in Abraham's surrender? Were they ready for the fact to be applied to themselves that these examples of faith all died "NOT HAVING RECEIVED the promise"? Were they ready to follow Moses not only for the future reward, but in the reproach and suffering of the present? What is this "reproof" then? It is the Lord's discipline meted out in love to every son, to every one of the "many sons" who by this very selfsame Author, Captain, and Perfecter of faith are being led as He Himself was led through suffering to glory (Heb. ii. 10). It is the Gethsemane experience of Heb. v. 7-9, for there in the garden, the Lord sweat as it were great drops of blood, and in Heb. xii. 4 is the application to "every son": "Ye have not yet resisted unto blood". Here then is the twofold character of perfected faith. A hand that reaches out on either side to join together suffering and glory. No one can fail to see the tremendous value of such a word to those who were passing through the experiences of these Hebrews at the time of writing the epistle. Here then, in this present time, faith is hope in embryo, with its accompanying sorrows; it is both substance and reproof, both crown and cross.

In attempting the translation of Heb. xi. 1 and retaining the rendering "reproof", care must be exercised in ascertaining the meaning of the genitive case expressed by "of". It may be the genitive of character, like "the bond of perfectness"; or of origin, "the gift of God"; or of possession, "the sword of the Spirit", i.e., "the Spirit's sword"; or of apposition, "the firstfruits of the spirit", i.e., "the firstfruits (of our inheritance), that is to say, the spirit"; or of relation, "the reproach of Christ", i.e., reproach in connection with Christ. Of all these the last appears nearest to the meaning of Heb. xi. 1, "The reproof in connection with faith" being very parallel with "The reproach in connection with Christ", and in this way we should translate the passage. Faith assumes the invisible. Every believer should be able to say, though with purer intent than she who first uttered the words,

> "Thy letters have transported me beyond
> This ignorant present, and I feel now
> The future in the instant."

This faith characterized the elders who received a good report. Report is martureo, and this constitutes them the great cloud of witnesses (martur of Heb. xii. 1). These elders come before us again at the end of the chapter, "These all, having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise" (Heb. xi. 39), but although they received it not, “These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them” (Heb. xi. 13). They had both the substance and the discipline, and these alone will enable the believer to go on unto perfection.

Dispensational truth and faith.

According to the A.V., verse 3 turns aside to speak of the creation of “the worlds”. It is reserved for the speculative mind of man to conceive of “worlds”. Scripture speaks of the “world”. Material creation, however, is not in view here. An “age” was drawing to an end. A dispensation that was secret was about to be introduced. The Hebrew believer could see nothing tangible; things were being shaken, and the apostle draws attention to the fact that:

> “By faith we understand that the ages were readjusted by the word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of things that do appear” (Heb. xi. 3 not AV JP).

The word translated “framed” in the A.V., and which we render “readjust” is katartizo, and occurs in Heb. x. 5, where it is translated “prepared”; also in xiii. 21, where it is translated “perfect”. In both passages “adapt” seems the best translation. That there is a sense of repairing or readjustment in the word can be seen in Matt. iv. 21, the first occurrence, where it is translated “mending”, and in Gal. vi. 1 where it reads “restore”. The peculiar work of the gifts of the ascended Lord at the inauguration of the new dispensation seems to combine both words. The apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers of Eph. iv. were to “readjust and adapt the saints” owing to the cleavage that had come at Acts xxviii.

The Hebrew believers were being shown that a change was imminent. The setting aside of Israel involved a change in the economy of the ages. Not only had these Hebrew believers to have a faith that could grasp the realities while the types and shadows passed away, but they must be prepared to exercise a faith that would appear to have nothing substantial beneath it, except the bare Word of God, and the blessed hope of resurrection. This faith saw no immediate “land” or accessible “city”, saw no evident prosperity, no “milk and honey” as a reward for faithfulness and obedience. All its possessions were afar off, and those who were exhorted to “live by faith” were also told of those who “died in faith” without having received the promises, but who saw them “afar off”.

These words, weighty in themselves, introduce the seven-fold series of those who each in their turn set forth some one aspect of that faith which in its perfection was exhibited in Christ.

No.45. The Perfecting of Faith---Abel and Enoch.
pp. 101 - 108

The first of the series of examples of perfected faith that is given in Heb. xi. is the two-fold witness of Abel and Enoch, who, though unlike in some respects, are alike in this that they both have to do specifically with death in connection with their faith. Let us give attention in the first instance to the witness of Abel.

The first feature of perfected faith emphasizes the Atonement. Elsewhere we have drawn attention to the two words that mark the difference between Redemption (exodus = a leading out), and Atonement (eisodos = a leading in). Abel does not speak so much of redemption from sin, as access and acceptance. There are many things that belong to the life of faith, but all service, witness, suffering or warfare are secondary when compared with Abel's initial witness, which gives first place to the recognition of the claims and provision of the holiness of God. Enoch's faith corresponds with this in the fact that it emphasizes both the walk that is pleasing to God, and further that "he that cometh to God must believe that He is".

The faith of Abel.

> "By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that he was righteous God testifying of his gifts; and by it he being dead yet speaketh" (Heb. xi. 4).

Here the good report becomes both "witness" and "testifying", and the correction should be made in our translation of the passage. We must turn to Genesis in order to see for ourselves the record that is referred to here:

> "And in process of time it came to pass, that Cain brought of the fruit of the ground an offering unto the LORD. And Abel, he also brought of the firstlings of his flock and of the fat thereof. And the LORD had respect unto Abel and to his offering: but unto Cain and to his offering He had not respect . . . . . If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou doest not well, sin lieth at the door. And unto thee shall be his desire, and thou shalt rule over him" (Gen. iv. 3-7).

"In process of time." Literally, "At or after the end of some days", "some" being often expressed by the plural form alone. Nothing is certain as to what days are intended.

Some think the sabbath is meant, some the end of the year, or at some set time like harvest. The important fact to observe is that there was some recognition of appointed time, and hence the implication is that Abel's faith was connected with "a word of God", as all faith has ever been.

"An offering" (minchah). This word is often used as a contrast to zebah, a sacrifice with blood, but standing alone it is often used for sacrifice in general. As the passage stands in the A.V. the word "also" in verse 4 ("And Abel, he also") simply adds the action of Abel to that of Cain. If, however, the word "also" be read after the verb, as it actually stands in both the Hebrew and in the LXX, there is a possibility that a deeper lesson is intended. There is something suggestive in the Greek of Heb. xi. 4 too. There is no word for "excellent" there, which is supplied. Translating the words just as they come we read, "By faith more sacrifice Abel than Cain offered". Is it possible that in this simple and literal statement we have fuller light on Gen. iv. than the A.V. gives us there? In what way did Abel offer "more sacrifice"?

Coming back to this chapter and reading the "also" after the verb we have, "And Abel he brought also of the firstlings of his flock", and this at least opens the way for the implied thought that Abel brought a bloodless gift even as Cain did, but that he "brought also" the lamb which alone made any other offering acceptable. This at least is exactly the teaching of the epistle to the Hebrews. All the typical offerings, even though they were of bulls and goats and ordained by God, were in measure but the offering of Cain in this sense, that they sought to render the offerer accepted without the precious blood of Christ which alone cleanses and gives access. On the other hand a bloodless sacrifice was acceptable (see Heb. xiii. 15), but only when sanctified by the blood of Christ.

The LXX rendering of Gen. iv. 7 is somewhat strange, and the relation of the existing Hebrew text with the Greek is too complicated to be dealt with here. We give it, however, for what it may be worth, for it seems to suggest that the mistake of Cain was not so much in the offering that he did bring, as in the offering that he refused:

> "If thou hast brought rightly, but not rightly divided it, hast thou not sinned?"

However difficult it may be for us at this date to reconcile such a rendering with the Hebrew of Gen. iv. 7, we must give the credit of common sense to the translators of the LXX that they felt that such a translation expressed the teaching of the passage. Cain sinned through a failure to discern the difference between the offering of fruit, which had in it no confession of human unworthiness, and the offering which involved the shedding of blood, which pointed to the one Sacrifice for sin and acceptance which was to be offered by the Lord Himself.

If we understand the word "sin" in verse 7 to mean Cain's own transgression, the sense is not very clear. "If thou doest not well" indicates sin, and the statement resolves itself into, "If thou art a sinner—thou art a sinner". But "sin" (i.e. the same Hebrew word) is spoken of in Exod. xxix. 14 as having flesh, and skin, and capable of being "burnt with fire"; it has "blood" according to Exod. xxx. 10; the worshipper could "lay his hand" upon its head according to Lev. iv. 29, and it could be "eaten" according to Lev. x. 17. This is sufficient to prove that "a sin offering" in the shape of a bullock, a goat, or a lamb could be the true meaning of the word "sin" in Gen. iv. 7. The statement "sin lieth at the door" is today a proverb, but a proverb that has arisen from this very translation, and therefore not a proof that such would be the interpretation which Cain would give to the term. The idea that sin was typified as in the act of springing upon Cain is hardly justified by the usage of the word "lieth".

When we read in Psa. xxiii. 2, "He maketh me to lie down in green pastures", we certainly have no thought of a beast of prey in the act of taking a spring. We are not to suppose that when Jacob saw the flocks of sheep "lying" by the well that they were preparing to spring at him, or at one another (Gen. xxix. 2). The word is indeed spoken of a leopard, but not in the act of springing on its prey, but the very reverse: "the leopard shall lie down with the kid" (Isa. xi. 6). The word is spoken of the couching of sheep, and wild beasts, lions, leopards and asses, of the needy that shall "lie down" in safety (Isa. xiv. 30); of flocks that "rest" (Song of Sol. i. 7), but not one passage can bear the meaning often read into Gen. iv. 7. The door belongs neither to Cain or to Abel. So far as the Scriptures actually state it can just as well be the door of the primal tabernacle mentioned in Gen. iii. 24. Over 40 times in the Pentateuch is this word used of the "door" of the tabernacle. The sense therefore of Gen. iv. 7 seems clearly to be:

> "If thou doest not well, a sin offering coucheth at the door of the tabernacle."

Cain was without excuse, inasmuch as faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God, Abel must have "heard". Cain also would have heard likewise, and even if he had misunderstood, the Lord graciously pointed out his error, and gave him full opportunity for repentance and acceptance. Cain, Korah, and Balaam make up a terrible trio that fitly prefigure the state of things at the time of the end (Jude 11). The hymnology of Cain's successors harps upon the string:

> "Something in my hand I bring", while the language of faith is expressed by:

> "Nothing in my hand I bring, > Simply to Thy cross I cling."

We must not lose sight of the theme of the epistle to the Hebrews, nor the fact that Abel is mentioned as one of a series that sets forth the need that the just shall live by faith. Abel's example is given here as an encouragement to the Hebrews who were losing heart, were in danger of drawing back, and to whom it is written in the sequel of Heb. xi.:

> "For consider Him that endured such contradiction of sinners against Himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds. Ye have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin" (Heb. xii. 3, 4).

The rock upon which faith rests is the Offering of Christ and that is the rock upon which unbelief is broken to pieces. A principle of interpretation is supplied by Heb. xii. 24. Whatever is good in Abel is better in Christ. Whatever will be found good in Enoch, or Noah, or Abraham, or the rest, will likewise be found better in the Saviour. He is the perfecter of faith. In Him the whole spectrum meets; all others are so many broken facets reflecting something only of His ineffable perfection:

> "By faith Abel offered unto God more sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that he was righteous, God bearing witness of his gifts: and by it he being dead yet speaketh" (Heb. i. 4 not AV JP).
>
> "The blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than Abel" (Heb. xii. 24).

Enoch, or the faith that transfers (Heb. xi. 5, 6).

While it is misleading as a rule to speak in generalities, it seems clear from Scripture that, so far as the human side of the purpose of the ages is concerned, all doctrine may be reduced under two heads, (1) Adam, (2) Christ. As practice flows from doctrine, practical teaching will also have reference to these two heads of mankind. With this thought in mind it will not be difficult to see that each successive witness to faith in Heb. xi. in some way reverses the action and attitude of Adam.

For example, Adam's refuge in the covering of fig leaves is reversed in Abel's refuge in the atonement by blood. That fellowship which Adam enjoyed was spoiled by sin when it could be written, "I heard Thy voice . . . . . and I was afraid". This is reversed in Enoch's walk with God. Adam's sin involved his house in death, and his heritage in a curse, whereas Noah's faith prepared an ark to the saving of his house, and he became the heir of the righteousness of faith. The reader may continue the parallel. Enoch was the seventh from Adam; he lived 365 years, which evidently suggests a complete typical cycle of time. In Enoch we have full restoration typified.

We see moreover that Enoch and Abel make one dual witness, showing that man's restoration can come only along the lines of the great Sacrifice for sin.

ADAM walked with God.
ADAM covered himself with leaves.
ABEL covered by the atonement.
ENOCH walked with God.

Not only do the numbers "the seventh" from Adam, and the 365 years point out Enoch as the end of a cycle, but his name means "Initiated", and his translation appears to have left its mark upon the old world, for it is highly probable that the Phoenix, is simply Pa-phenoch, "The house of Enoch".

Enoch, the perfected.

We are apt to forget in our studies that all Scripture, though universal in its application and true for all time, nevertheless had a primary and restricted origin. Heb. xi. is so full, each character so great, that we forget that the writer was addressing "Hebrews", and urging them to "go on unto perfection", and that every item of this chapter has been divinely selected with that fact in mind. Abel showed the absolute necessity for the "one Sacrifice" of Christ, and the danger of going in the way of Cain should that one Offering be despised or rejected. Enoch's case sets forth the goal, summed up in the "walk", and the "translation". Towards the close of Heb. xi. the apostle speaks of:

> "Others (who) were tortured, not accepting deliverance; that they might obtain a BETTER RESURRECTION" (Heb. xi. 35).

It must be observed here that the obtaining of a better resurrection is directly connected with not accepting deliverance, and the question arises, How can Enoch's example have any bearing upon this, or upon the Hebrews, seeing that Enoch apparently did not die? It is time therefore to search and see. The sources of direct information are the following. The passage in Gen. v., the LXX translation, and the passage in Heb. xi. These we must give first.

> "And Enoch walked with God: and he was not; for God took him" (Hebrew of Gen. v. 24).
>
> "And Enoch pleased God: and he was not found, for God translated him" (LXX version of Gen. v. 24).
>
> "By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death; and was not found, because God had translated him: for before his translation he had this testimony, that he pleased God" (Heb. xi. 5).

It will be noticed that the record grows as we proceed. The Hebrew is the shortest statement. Paul does not quote the Hebrew original, but quotes the LXX version as more suitable to his purpose, and more familiar to his readers, who used that version daily.

Did Enoch die?

Let us examine the actual statements used before we come to any conclusion. "He was not". Identical words are used in Jer. xxxi. 15, "Rachel weeping for her children refused to be comforted for her children, because they were not". There is no ambiguity in Reuben's meaning when he cried, "The child is not" (Gen. xxxvii. 30), or of Jacob's lament "Joseph is not, and Simeon is not" (Gen. xlii. 36), indeed Jacob said, "Me have ye bereaved".

"For God took him." The Hebrew word laqach is used both of death and of translation:

> "Behold, I take away from thee the desire of thine eyes with a stroke" (Ezek. xxiv. 16).
>
> "Knowest thou that the LORD will take away thy master from thy head to day?" (II Kings ii. 3).

The case of Elijah is somewhat parallel with that of Enoch. Elijah is taken up to heaven by a whirlwind, and Elisha "saw him no more" (verse 12). When the sons of the prophets urged Elisha to send the fifty men to look for Elijah, the result is recorded, "They sought three days, but found him not" (verse 17). It is the LXX that adds the word "found" in Gen. v. 24. While this reference to Elijah strengthens the conception that Enoch did not die, Psa. xxxvii. 35, 36 shows that the avoidance of death is not necessarily implied by the word, "I have seen the wicked . . . . . yet he passed away, and, lo, he was not; yea, I sought him, but he could not be found".

By faith Enoch was translated. It is usual to suppose that the use of the word "translation" is the end of all controversy, and that such a word could not apply to any who had died. Yet, notice the first occurrence of the word in the New Testament:

> "So Jacob went down into Egypt, and DIED, he, and our fathers, and were carried over (TRANSLATED) into Sychem, and laid in the sepulchre . . . . ." (Acts vii. 15, 16).

It is evident that the word "translation" of itself does not necessitate escape from death. Heb. vii. 12 has already used the word to speak of the change of the priesthood and the law.

That he should not see death. The fifth chapter of Genesis is punctuated by the words, "and he died", eight times. Enoch's translation breaks the sad sequence of mortality and provides the exception. Heb. xi. 5 does not say simply, "Enoch was translated that he should not die", but "that he should not see death". We found that in the words of Heb. ii. 9 and Matt. xvi. 28 "tasting death" was not exactly synonymous with dying. May there not be a reason for the choice of the expression "see death" here? In John viii. 51 we have a parallel expression, though a different word is used for "to see". Verse 52 in most MSS paraphrases the expression by the words "taste death", although the Vatican MS here retains the word "see". The idiom is explained for us in Acts ii. 26, 27:

> "My flesh shall rest in hope: because Thou wilt not leave My soul in hell (Hades), neither wilt Thou suffer Thine holy One to SEE corruption."

It will be observed that death is contemplated here, but not corruption. In verse 29 Peter expands the idea: "The patriarch David . . . . . is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us unto this day". To this add Acts xiii. 36, 37:

> "David . . . . . fell on sleep, and was laid unto his fathers, and SAW corruption."

Peter's further remark, "David is not ascended into the heavens" (Acts ii. 34), shows that the idea involved in "not seeing corruption" was not so much that of dying, or of even being buried, but of being left in the tomb, of not ascending into the heavens. We venture nothing in speculations upon the holy nature of the Son of God. We know not what would have taken place had He remained in the tomb for a long period. What we do know is that He was raised on the third day, "was not left in Hades, neither suffered to see corruption" which says as much as we can bear.

Leaving . . . . . the resurrection of dead ones.

The ambiguity that surrounds the translation of Enoch serves a good purpose. While we cannot say with certainty that Enoch did die, or that he was taken away by God without dying, this very uncertainty enabled the apostle to use the example of Enoch to encourage the Hebrews "to go on unto perfection". We may be better prepared to follow the teaching of Heb. vi., having come so far. Among the items that were to be "left" as they pressed on to "perfection" is included, strangely, "the resurrection of dead ones". This does not mean a denial of the resurrection, but the giving up of the hope of a general resurrection of dead ones, for a special and prior hope of "a better resurrection" of those who, though dying, should not "see" death, who in other words should attain unto an "out-resurrection". The parallel with Philippians is apparent and instructive. This "better resurrection" which could be illustrated by Enoch's translation is seen in Heb. xi. 40 compared with xii. 22, 23:

"God having provided (foreseen) some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect (perfected)."

"But ye are come . . . . . to the spirits of just men made perfect (perfected)."

Just as the blood of Jesus, the Mediator of the New Covenant, speaks better things than that of Abel, so the resurrection that awaited those who pressed toward the mark, and who laid aside every weight and ran with patience, surpassed the translation of Enoch. The parallel with Philippians is found even in the word "better". Hebrews speaks of a resurrection that was "better", while Paul in Phil. i. 23 says, "To depart, and to be with Christ; which is far better".

Metathesis occurs three times in Hebrews, so also does metatithemi. It will be wise to allow these references a place before concluding. Heb. vii. 12 speaks of a "change" of both priesthood and law. Heb. xi. 5 speaks of the translation of Enoch, and Heb. xii. 27 says:

"Yet once more, signifieth the removing (translation) of those things that are shaken, as of things that are made, that those things which cannot be shaken may remain."

Apart from inspiration altogether we should expect that so important a word would be used with judgment, and that the reference to Enoch's translation was not made in forgetfulness of the presence of the word in chapter vii., nor of its appearance in chapter xii. It is evident that "translation" does not express the meaning in xii. 27 or vii. 12, but "transfer" does. The important point in the interpretation of this epistle is that a change had come, bringing with it the possibility of a transfer. Heb. xi. opens with the fact that the ages were framed or adjusted by God, and seeing that some things had become shaken, and were set aside upon the failure of Israel, a transfer was held out to faith, whereby the "word of the beginning" could be left for "better things". Abel will stand for the "better sacrifice", and Enoch for the "better resurrection", and while these Hebrews may indeed die in faith, not having received the promise, they may nevertheless be able to entertain a better hope, founded upon better promises, embracing a better country, that is a heavenly.

The closing down, for the time being, of the earthly section of the purpose of the ages, opened for the believing Hebrew the prospect of a transfer to a heavenly country or city more fully detailed in Heb. xii. 22-29, and being in some degree a secret. This, while being by no means the same either in sphere, calling, or character as the dispensation of the Mystery, did hold out to those who believed the added revelation, a prize connected with this heavenly calling, which could be attained only by "going on unto perfection". The subject will not be dropped until we reach the end of chapter xii. It may be helpful as a sidelight upon this theme to note what the wisest King of Israel is alleged to have said:

"For honourable age is not that which standeth in length of time, nor is it measured by number of years. But wisdom is the gray hair unto men, and an unspotted life is old age. He pleased God, and was beloved of Him: so that living among sinners he was translated. Yea speedily was he caught away, lest the wickedness should alter his understanding, or deceit beguile his soul . . . . . He, being made perfect in a short time, fulfilled a long time" (Wisdom of Solomon 4:8-13).

The reader may have missed the familiar comment which sees in Enoch's translation the rapture of the church, but we trust he will have gained by having attention drawn both to the difficulties of the case, and of its fitness with the theme of the Hebrews:

> "Let us go unto perfection . . . . . leaving . . . . . a resurrection of dead ones . . . . . for a better resurrection . . . . . and the spirits of just men made perfect."

That the prize of Phil. iii. may be considered parallel, the reference to "reward" in Heb. xi. 6 will show, and that "to walk and please God" is the high goal of faith, Heb. xi. and the bulk of the epistles testify.

No.46. Noah and Abraham, Inheritors (xi. 7, 8).
pp. 121 - 124

However personally we may feel the application of this or any other Scripture, we deprive ourselves of much that is helpful in its interpretation when we lose sight of the original purpose of its writing, and the conditions under which it was written. Heb. xi. is so full of teaching that we are apt to isolate it from its context in the appreciation of its present application. The aspect of faith that we are to consider under the names of Noah and Abraham, while containing much that has a direct personal application to ourselves, was nevertheless written in the first place to the Hebrews, and written to them in circumstances that make the examples cited of supreme importance in the process of the apostle's instruction to them.

The faith that inherits.

Among the items of prominence in the message to the Hebrews is that which deals with the relation of faith to inheritance. Chapters iii. and iv. are devoted to the idea of the necessity of faith in connection with inheriting. "So we see that they could not enter in because of unbelief" (iii. 19). It is time, however, that we saw for ourselves that inheritance is the connecting theme of this second pair of examples:

> "By faith Noah . . . . . became HEIR of the righteousness which is by faith" (xi. 7).
> "By faith Abraham . . . . . went out . . . . . to the place he should afterwards receive for an INHERITANCE" (xi. 8 not AV JP).

Without the Scripture before us, we should doubtless assign the position of "heir of the righteousness by faith" to Abraham, rather than to Noah, as so much is said of him in that connection in Romans and Galatians as well as in Gen. xv. The fact that Noah is also associated with righteousness by faith, shows that from earliest days this principle has been in operation, and but the more emphasizes that unpalatable fact, that "the law made nothing perfect"; that Sinai is a transition, not a goal (Heb. xii. 18-24), and that the gospel committed to Paul, which reaches back as far as Adam, and as wide as the ends of the earth, is the gospel that carries with it age-lasting issues. It operated in Eden, and was believed by Abel.

The epistle to the Hebrews looks at righteousness by faith from a different angle from that of Romans. In Hebrews we see faith at work. "By faith Noah . . . . . prepared an ark". Such is the simple statement. We must, however, not omit the moving causes that assisted Noah's faith to prepare, against all reason, an ark on dry land. Noah's act is the result of (1) a divine warning, and (2) a pious fear.

A divine warning.

We are not allowed to forget the important truth that "faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God". Noah was doubtless wise in consequence of his 600 years of experience, his fellowship with God, and his purity of life, which would all be in favour of enabling him to foresee the goal toward which the ungodliness of his day was fast heading, but this wisdom would never have evolved "an ark". Chrematizo, to warn, is used in the N.T. to indicate a warning given by means of a dream (Matt. ii. 12, 22); by the Holy Spirit (Luke ii. 26); or by an angel (Acts x. 22). Its direct connection with the body of the epistle to the Hebrews will be seen by looking at Heb. viii. 5 and xii. 25. Moses was "warned" by God in connection with the Tabernacle which he "prepared" (see Heb. ix. 2). Heb. xii. 25 applies this "warning":

> "See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh. For if they escaped not who refused Him who WARNED them on earth, much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from Him that WARNS us from heaven" (not AV JP).

The verse following reveals that the two warnings, the one so much greater than the other, were the voices of Sinai and Calvary. Heb. ii. 1-4 is here repeated with solemn emphasis and with the same sequence. The warning of Heb. ii. 1-4 is followed by a reference to the "world to come" and its dominion. The warning of Heb. xii. 25 is followed by a reference to a kingdom that abides the terrific "shaking" of the last days. So, to come back to Noah, we have the warning, the Flood (parallel with the shaking), and the world to come, the dominion restored after the Flood, called in Heb. xi. 7 "the inheritance of the righteousness which is by faith". Though we may have passed these close parallels lightly by, the originally exercised readers of this epistle would have found them very pointed.

Both Noah and Abraham received a message from God that put a great test upon faith, for Noah was warned of things "not seen as yet", and Abraham went out "not knowing" whither he went. What they did know was the faithfulness of Him Who spake. So these Hebrews, taught from infancy to believe the law of Sinai to be eternal and unalterable, to believe their ritual to be not only of divine appointing, but to be as lasting as God's throne, found an almost insuperable difficulty in the teaching of the apostle that such things were waxing old and vanishing away, that God Himself found fault with the first Covenant and had set it aside for the aionian Covenant sealed by the blood of Christ Himself.

A pious fear.

The second motive that is revealed is that Noah was "moved with fear". The English word "fear" has to stand for (1) phobos, a "fear that flees", from phebomai to flee; for (2) deilos, a "fear that shrinks"; and for (3) eulabeia, a "fear that worships". This last is the word used of Noah in Heb. xi. 7. He certainly did not have the fear that flees, nor the fear that "draws back unto perdition", but the fear that reverently acquiesces in the will of God. We find the word, or its cognates, translated "devout" in Luke ii. 25; Acts ii. 5 and viii. 2. The true translation of Heb. v. 7 is "He was heard for His piety" (or godly fear), and so it is translated in Heb. xii. 28, adding one more link to the record of Noah that we have already seen exists. Phobos and eulabeia are definitely contrasted in Heb. xi., so that we need make no mistake. Moses was NOT moved with phobos (Heb. xi. 23-27); Noah WAS moved with eulabeia (Heb. xi. 7), and both acted "by faith".

The apostle makes no reference to "the sons of God", "the daughters of men" or "the giants" of Gen. vi., not because the subject was unimportant, but because, out of a wealth of material (like John xx. 30, 31), he selected his examples with a specific object: to help these Hebrews "to leave . . . . . and go on".

> "Noah . . . . . prepared an ark to the saving of his house" (Heb. xi. 7).

We have already seen that the chapter of UNBELIEF (Heb. iii.), is in structural correspondence with the chapter of FAITH (Heb. xi.), but it may not be fully realized how many items in these two chapters link them together. For instance where Heb. xi. says "Faith is the SUBSTANCE of things hoped for" (Heb. xi. 1), Heb. iii. says "For we are made partakers of Christ, if we hold the beginning of our CONFIDENCE stedfast unto the end" (Heb. iii. 14); in each case "substance" and "confidence" translate the one Greek word hupostasis. In Heb. iii. 6 this truth is expressed by using a synonymous word:

> "Whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end."

This brings into prominence the figure of a house. Noah is said to have saved his "house", and Gen. vii. opens with the words "Come thou and all thy house". The nation of Israel is repeatedly spoken of as "the house of Israel", in a sense that is unique, for no such term is applied to any company of redeemed Gentiles. It is with the "house of Israel" that the Lord will make the New Covenant (Heb. viii. 10), and Paul has a particular reason to stress the saving of the "house" in Heb. xi., because he has used a special word in both Heb. iii. and xi. to enforce his teaching. That word is the Greek kataskeuazo, prepare.

> "For this man was counted worthy of more glory than Moses, inasmuch as he who hath builded (kataskeuazo) the house hath more honour than the house. For every house is builded (kataskeuazo) by some man; but He that built (kataskeuazo) all things is God" (iii. 3, 4).

Now the point of the example in Heb. xi. 7 seems to be that Moses after all was a servant, it is Christ Who is the Son. Moses "prepared" the house, but could do no more. Noah PREPARED AN ARK, and saved "the house". So, said the apostle, will you not be prepared to "leave" the work of Moses the servant, who can do nothing more than condemn you, and enter into the provision made by Christ, whose one Offering is typified by the use of the Hebrew word kopher "pitch" which later in the law is translated "atonement":

> "Christ as a Son (is) over His own house; Whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end" (iii. 6).

Saved . . . . . condemned.

Noah's faith moved him to prepare an ark "to the saving of his house, by the which he condemned the world". While from one point of view Christian charity knows no bounds, from another point of view Christianity is very drastic and provoking. This is not limited to the Christian faith. It belongs to all propositions and to all issues. The man who is convinced that the teetotaller is right cannot avoid the alternative that the drinker is wrong. The man who sees in Socialism the panacea for all evil cannot avoid condemning Conservatism and Capitalism by his very conviction. The church by its very constitution condemns the world. There is no justification for bitterness, for wrangling, for strife, but even among professing Christians it is not possible to hold certain vital doctrines without condemning those who deny them. Christian charity is a lovely thing, but it does not enable us to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds.

The inheritance.

All that we have seen concerning Noah has been leading to this last clause, "He became the HEIR of the righteousness which is by faith". The warning, the preparing, the saving of his house had one thing in view—the inheritance. Noah was not moved to construct an ark either to demonstrate his own prowess, or even his faith, but as a means to an end. Redemption is for a purpose, it is not an end in itself. So marvelous is that redemption, that we often speak of it as though it were the end itself of the purpose of God. Eph. i. 1-14 shows as clearly as any passage the intermediate position of redemption, with the will of God stated first, the inheritance reached at the last, and the "mystery of His will" which involves redemption coming in between.

The blessing of God upon Noah, when he stood upon the restored earth with his saved house, was practically a repetition of the dominion given to Adam, modified by the changed circumstances (Gen. ix. 1-7).

> "In the six hundredth and FIRST year, in the FIRST month, the FIRST day of the month, the waters were dried up from off the earth" (Gen. viii. 13).

Thus Noah and his inheritance anticipates that day when He that sits upon the throne shall say, "Behold, I make all things new", faintly suggested also by the "no more curse" of Gen. xiii. 21. We have further light upon the faith that inherits in the case of Abraham, who pairs with Noah; this we must reserve for another study. Meanwhile, let us rejoice in the fact revealed in Rom. viii. 17, "if children, then heirs, heirs of God".

No.47. Abraham. The obedience that inherits (xi. 8).

pp. 141 - 145

The association of faith and inheritance is set forth by the two great examples of Noah and Abraham. In our last example the great contributing motives were a divine warning, a godly fear, and a preparation. Abraham's example supplies other facets of this jewel of truth.

The obedience of faith.

"By faith Abraham . . . . . obeyed." This simple statement is supplemented by illuminating clauses which we must earnestly consider.

A1 | He was called to GO OUT.
B1 | Unto a place . . . an inheritance.
A2 | And he WENT OUT.
B2 | Not knowing whither he went.

First let us observe, "He was called to go out . . . . . and he went out". Such is the record on the tables of faith. Abraham's actual record is not so simple. His obedience was partial and in stages; this we can read in Genesis. A comparison with Heb. xi. 8 indicates how many seasons of our lives may be blanks in the roll of faith. The story of Abraham's obedience is written for our learning. Let us seek grace to be humble disciples in this school of grace. The first movement is indicated by Stephen:

> "The God of glory appeared unto our father Abraham, when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran, and said unto him, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and come into the land which I shall shew thee" (Acts vii. 2, 3).

The second movement is revealed in Gen. xii. 1:

> "Now the LORD had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will shew thee."

The third movement is given in Gen. xiii. 14, 15:

> "And the LORD said unto Abram, after that Lot was separated from him, Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward: for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever."

The fourth and crowning movement is given in Gen. xxii. 12-18:

> "Now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son from Me . . . in blessing I will bless thee . . . because thou hast obeyed My voice."

The old man.

It is very evident when we compare Acts vii. 2, 3 with Gen. xii. 1 that the Lord spoke to Abram twice. Gen. xii. adds to Acts vii. by saying not only "country" and "kindred", but "thy father's house". In the first movement, instead of leaving his father's house we find Terah, his father, accompanying Abram.

> "And Terah took Abram his son, and Lot the son of Haran his son's son, and Sarai his daughter in law, his son Abram's wife; and they went forth with them from Ur of the Chaldees, to go into the land of Canaan; and they came unto Haran, and dwelt there" (Gen. xi. 31).

Here Abram is seen leaving his native land, and Stephen declares that "he came out of the land of the Chaldeans", but we feel a little uneasy about the presence of Terah and Lot in the face of the command "from thy kindred". Notice the failure also in the abortive effort suggested in the words:

> "And they went forth with them . . . . . to go into the land of Canaan; and they came unto Haran, and dwelt there."

If the map is consulted it will be seen that Abram and Terah made a journey of some 600 miles, but when they stayed at Haran they were still on the same side of the Euphrates. The lesson is repeated at the time of the Exodus. Nothing but a "three days journey" could satisfy the command of God, and Pharaoh, it will be remembered, tried to play the part of Terah by suggesting first that Israel should worship God "in the land", and then, this being rejected, that Israel should go "not very far off", anything except that which set forth resurrection ground. In spite of the 600 miles journey, Abram was no nearer entering the inheritance. He must cross the river. He must become "Abram the Hebrew", the one who "crossed over". This, however, could not take place while Terah lived. Stephen's words echo the doctrine of Rom. vi. when he said, "When his father was dead, he removed him into this land". Terah stands for the old man, and the old man is a hinderer. Not until we can realize that our old man has been crucified, and that we are alive unto God, can we proceed.

The flesh.

The second movement sees Abram leaving Haran and his father's house, and actually entering the land of Canaan. Then to him is made the great seven-fold covenant. Famine, however, soon puts Abram to the test. A question which perhaps cannot be answered presents itself. Had Lot not been with Abram, would Abram have stood true? The analogy of Israel in the wilderness gives light. Just as Abram took Lot with him across the Euphrates, so we read in Exod. xii. 38, "A mixed multitude went up also with them". And just as trouble with Lot and the latter's inability to resist the well-watered plain of Sodom was directly connected with flocks and herds, so with this mixed multitude is enumerated "flocks, and herds, even very much cattle". Numb. xi. 4, 5 reveals the evil effect of this company:

> "And the mixed multitude that was among them fell a lusting: and the children of Israel ALSO . . . . . we remember the fish, which we did eat in EGYPT."

Famine tested Abram while Lot was with him, "and Abram went down into Egypt" (Gen. xii. 10). All this period in Egypt was so much waste of time. Abram returned with Lot (Gen. xiii. 1) unto the place of the altar which he had made there at the first, and there Abram called on the name of the Lord. Lot stands for the flesh which clogs and trips the true child of God. So far as Terah was concerned, Abram did not move from Haran until Terah was dead. With Lot, however, it was different. Abram began to realize the need of separation, and the moment the trouble arose about the flocks and the herds, Abram seemed to seize the opportunity: "Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me" (Gen. xiii. 9). Lot "lifted up his eyes" and chose the plain of Jordan. The Lord spoke to Abram after that Lot was separated from him, "Lift up now thine eyes". Lot had lifted up his and seen Sodom. Abram, when separated from Lot, saw his inheritance. Lot pitched his tent toward Sodom—odious name! Abram removed his tent, and came and dwelt in the plain of Mamre, which is in Hebron, and built there an altar unto the Lord. Hebron means fellowship. Abram's fellowship with God was impossible while Lot remained with him. How would the Hebrews, to whom this epistle was written, understand all this? Would not some of them begin to see the need for the separation from the "Lots" of their profession? Would they not perceive the true Abrahamic spirit in the call to go outside the camp?

Faith perfected.

It was after Abram's victory (where Lot met with such humiliating defeat) that he met the high priest whose name so fills the epistle to the Hebrews (Melchisedec), and it is immediately after the meeting with Melchisedec that we arrive at the inheritance and righteousness of faith. This close association of righteousness and inheritance is a feature lost sight of by too many for us to pass it by. Gen. xv. 6, the great passage concerning justification by faith, is introduced by Abram's question concerning his heir, and the Lord's answer concerning this is the groundwork of Abram's faith. Rom. i.-iii. lay the foundation of justification by faith, and are followed by chapter iv., which is nothing more nor less than an exposition of Gen. xv. 6. In the midst of this chapter we read:

> "The promise, that he should be the HEIR of the world, was not to Abraham, or to his seed, through the law, but through the righteousness of faith. For if they which are of the law be HEIRS, faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect" (Rom. iv. 13, 14).

In like manner Gal. iii. 29 concludes with the words:

> "If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise . . . . . if a son, then an heir of God through Christ . . . . . the son of the bondwoman shall not be heir with the son of the freewoman" (Gal. iii. 29; iv. 7, 30).

Titus iii. 7 also testifies to the same truth:

> "That being justified by His grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of aionian life."

The perfecting of Abraham's faith, however, is seen in Gen. xxii. There he not only stood before God, having left his native land, his kindred, his father's house, but he had also foregone his rights in the matter of Lot, and now he goes to the full limits and voluntarily gives his best, his beloved son in whom all the promises of God were vested. The Hebrews were exhorted to:

> "Be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience INHERIT the promises. For when God made promise to Abraham, because He could swear by no greater, He sware by Himself" (Heb. vi. 12, 13).

Abraham "patiently endured" and "obtained the promise". So, continues the epistle to these tried Hebrews:

> "Ye have need of patience, that, after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise" (Heb. x. 36).

James ii. 22 declares that in the offering of Isaac Abraham's faith was "perfected", brought to its true end, the keyword of Hebrews. Translated into terms of doctrine, the several steps in Abraham's faith are seen to be so many approximations of the cross of Christ:

(1) The step that followed the death of Terah stands for the crucifixion of the old man (Rom. vi. 6).
(2) The separation from Lot, and the vision that followed with the dwelling at Hebron, the place of fellowship, stands for the crucifixion of the flesh (Gal. v. 24).
(3) The repudiation of all reward from the king of Sodom "lest he should say, I have made Abraham rich", stands for the crucifixion of the world (Gal. vi. 14).
(4) The offering up of Isaac, the beloved son, is the fellowship of His sufferings, the conformity to His death, which is on the one hand intimately connected with the perfecting, the prize, and the heavenly citizenship, and on the other is strongly contrasted with those who mind earthly things, and constitute themselves "enemies of the cross of Christ" (Phil. iii. 10-21; Heb. vi. 6).

So far we have traced the meaning of the statement "By faith Abraham . . . . . obeyed". Looking to the opening paragraph of this section we see that there is another pair of statements to consider. The obedience of faith is found in the words, "Go out", "he went out". As we read Heb. xi. 8 it might appear that the fact that Abraham knew all about the inheritance, enabled him to step out in faith. "By faith Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed". This, however, is not the meaning. When he obeyed he did not have the inheritance so definitely revealed, for the verse continues, "and he went out, not knowing whither he went". This brings Abraham into line with the other examples of faith. "Faith is the substance . . . . . of things not seen". Noah was warned of the things not seen as yet. Abraham knew that he was to go into a land of the Lord's providing, and he knew that it was to be his inheritance, but the revelation of that inheritance grew with his obedience.

Is there no parallel experience suggested in Eph. i. 18? "That ye may know what is . . . . . the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints." Is there no parallel in

I Cor. ii. 9, 10? We shall learn presently that Abraham received a higher call and a fuller revelation that eclipsed the original inheritance of the land, but this we must deal with in its true place. For the time being we must stop. The thread is taken up in the record of the next pair, Isaac and Jacob.

Let us not set aside this word "obey". True, we are of faith; true, we are not under law, but under grace; true we are sons, not servants. Does this mean that obedience, the obedience of faith, is not for us? "Though He were a Son, yet learned He obedience . . . . .all them that obey Him" (Heb. v. 8, 9). The words obedience and obey mean "to hear with submission". It is translated simply "hearken" in Acts xii. 13. It is incipient in Heb. iii. and iv. in the words, "Today if ye will hear His voice". Faith comes out of hearing (Rom. x. 17), and the obedience of faith is simply that hearing and practical response continued throughout the walk of life.

No.48. Faith, Pilgrimage and Earnest (xi. 9 - 19).
pp. 161 - 168

Abraham's faith is too great, his example too full, to be circumscribed within the space of one verse, or one phrase. His example blends with that of Isaac and Jacob, and reappears in verses 11 and 12 in connection with Sarah. Not only is Abraham the greatest example of faith's obedience, but, together with Isaac and Jacob, he is the example of the faith that waits, that leads outside the camp, that makes the child of God a pilgrim and a stranger. It will be seen that after Sarah's faith is recorded, the pilgrim character of faith is resumed and amplified in verses 14-16:

> "By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise: for he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God" (Heb. xi. 9, 10).
>
> "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. For they that say such things declare plainly that they seek a country. And truly, if they had been mindful of that country from whence they came out, they might have had opportunity to have returned. But now they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God: for He hath prepared for them a city" (Heb. xi. 13-16).

Strangers and pilgrims.

A glance at these two sets will reveal the fact that in verses 13-16 the theme of verses 9 and 10 is developed and filled out. This is made clear in the following structure:

A | 9-. By faith Sojourn in land of promise.
B | -9. Dwelling in tents.
C | 10. For he looked for a city. (Sarah and resurrection).
A | 13-. According to faith died, not having received the promises.
B | -13. Confessed they were strangers and pilgrims.
C | 14-16. For they seek a country and a city.

It is a common mistake to speak of the early fathers of Israel as nomads, wandering sheiks of the desert, little better than Gypsies. Such they became by faith, not by birth. Recent excavations have confirmed the opinion that Ur of the Chaldees was no mean city. The trend of archaeological investigation goes to prove that the culture of Egypt came from Chaldea, so that Abraham, the man of the city, voluntarily becomes the man of the tent by reason of his faith.

"To sojourn" means to dwell as a stranger, as paroikia is translated in Acts xiii. 17. In Heb. xi. 13 the structure reveals that the thought corresponding to sojourning is dying. By faith he sojourned in the land of promise as in a strange country (9). According to faith these all died, not having received the promises (13). There is something about faith, and the God in Whom that faith rests, that has this separating effect. It made a martyr of Abel, and potentially one of Enoch; it separated Noah from his fellows, and Abraham from his country. Faith has to do with things "hoped for", and the reproach and reproof connected with faith is for things "not seen". We need to be more fully alive to the fact that faith operates only in the sphere of resurrection. But, one may interpose, are we not to exercise faith in matters of daily life here? Do we not believe that the very daily bread that perishes is a gift of God? Most assuredly, but how much richer to believe that these are not ours in the course of ordinary providence, or on the same plane as the feeding of sparrows, but that all such blessings are wilderness provisions coming to us by reason of the risen Christ, and to enable us to cover the distance, shall we say, between our Red Sea and the Jordan. Paul's testimony in Galatians should be the normal experience:

> "I have been crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live: yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, Who loved me, and gave Himself for me" (Gal. ii. 20).

That it appears so very unusual is to our shame. It is impossible to read of Abraham in the epistles without being made conscious of the resurrection. Rom. iv. 17 tells us that when he believed God, Who made the promise to him that he should be the father of many nations, he believed God Who quickeneth the dead. Heb. xi. 19 tells us that when Abraham offered up Isaac on the mountain, he did so accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead. When the child of God can receive the daily supply, the opportunity to earn a living, the gift of health and strength, as directly flowing from the risen Lord, then he is experiencing something of the true nature of faith.

Those who died, not having received the promises, "saw them afar off". This principle runs throughout the Word. Heavy trials may be called "light afflictions that are but for a moment", if it can be added, "while we look not at the things which are seen"

(II Cor. iv. 17, 18). While Abraham is not mentioned in II Cor. iv., we have but to read on into chapter v. 1, 2 to find the "tent" contrasted with the "building of God in the heavens", exactly as we have the "tent" and "the city" of God in Heb. xi. Without resurrection, Heb. xi. 13 would surely read, "These all died in despair, not having received the promises". When one hears children of God "claiming" here and now all sorts of blessings because of the victory of Calvary, one wonders what the effect of this passage suddenly brought home by the Spirit of God would be. Do we not see that faith can contentedly go without rather than "claim" all now, simply because faith has to do with resurrection and new life? How many children of God press the question of bodily healing on these lines! They teach and believe that, had we all sufficient faith, sickness among saints would be unknown. Why they do not pursue this to its logical conclusion and say that, were there Sufficient faith among saints, death would be unknown, we cannot tell, except it be that facts are too stubborn. Christ has not purchased for the saint either immunity from sickness or from death; He does give "the power of His resurrection" now, and He will give incorruptible life after this present life has been laid down.

These saints of God, who according to faith died not having received the promises were not thereby rendered miserable; they "embraced" or "saluted" these far-off promises, and patiently waited that good time when their inheritance could be enjoyed unspoiled by sin and death.

Tent and city.

The outward symbol of the pilgrim is the tent. Before this epistle closes the apostle presses this fact upon the Hebrews in very solemn terms:

> "Wherefore Jesus also . . . . . suffered without the gate. Let us go forth therefore unto Him without the camp, bearing His reproach. For here have we NO CONTINUING CITY, but we SEEK one to come" (Heb. xiii. 12-14).

Christ Himself is a stranger in this world. The only dwelling place of God that Hebrews mentions is a "tent" or "tabernacle". Not until the new heavens and new earth, wherein dwells righteousness, shall come, will it be right for "tent" and "city" to come together (Rev. xxi. 2, 3). Heb. xii. 27, 28 stresses this same truth. The unshaken kingdom "abides", and is closely connected with the "heavenly Jerusalem" (xii. 22). This "prepared" city that "abides" is seen in John xiv. 2, 3 "In My Father's house are many abiding places . . . . . I go to prepare a place for you". And just as the Lord reveals Himself in John xiv. 6 as "the true and living Way", so in Heb. x. 20 He is revealed as "the new and living way", while John i. 14 tells us that "the Word was made flesh and tabernacled among us".

Are the saints of God alone to exercise patience? Is not God Himself called "the God of patience" and "the God of hope" in Rom. xv. 5 and 13? Is not Christ spoken of as "henceforth expecting" (Heb. x. 13)? and shall we therefore murmur that our inheritance is not yet here? Members of the Body of Christ would do well to remember that, though "blessed with all spiritual blessings", those blessings are "in the heavenlies in Christ", and the selfsame chapter of Ephesians tells us that what we have here and now is "the earnest of the inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession". Is it not truer faith to bear the reproach of Christ, and be a mere tent-dweller with this "earnest", than to look upon the city and the plain of Jordan, making oneself believe that it is like the "garden of the Lord" (Gen. xiii. 10)? Since the events of Gen. iii., should we not view any appearance of Eden with suspicion? A paradise this side of resurrection is but the devil's millennium that has captivated preacher and politician throughout the ages. The dwelling in tents was a "confession":

> They "confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth" (verse 13).
> "They that say such things declare plainly that they seek a country" (verse 14).

Here we have two sides of the story. Merely to become strangers and pilgrims may indicate that we are but moral Ishmaels, and prefer the desert to human society, but to be strangers and pilgrims because we seek that city and country of God is the true thing. For the member of the Body of Christ, all this teaching of Heb. xi. is found in doctrinal language in Philippians. The Hebrews were exhorted concerning the things that accompany salvation (Heb. vi. 9), as the Philippians were to "work out their own salvation" (Phil. ii. 12). The Philippians were assured that it was God Who "worked in them both to will and to do of His good pleasure" (Phil. ii. 13), even as the Hebrews were told to rest in the God of peace, Who "worked in them that which was well-pleasing in His sight" (Heb. xiii. 21). Paul was confident that God would "perfect" the good thing He had begun in the Philippians (i. 6), as in the Hebrews (xiii. 21). Phil. iii. speaks of Paul, the Hebrew, and his loss for Christ's sake, and the Hebrews are given both example (xi. 26) and precept (x. 34-36) to the same end. The Philippians were exhorted to press toward the mark (iii. 14), and the Hebrews were exhorted to run the race (xii. 1-3), and both with the personal example of Christ before them. Both Philippians and Hebrews were warned concerning those who were enemies of the cross of Christ (Phil. iii. 18; Heb. x. 29), the great incentive in Philippians being the "citizenship which is in heaven" (iii. 20), with a like incentive of the heavenly Jerusalem before the Hebrews (xi. 10). The cities are not identical, the prizes are not the same, but the principles are exactly parallel in their outworking. The tent-dwelling, the sojourning, the pilgrimage, are re-interpreted for us in Phil. ii. and iii.

The heavenly country and city.

We now come to the incentive that was operative in Abraham: "He looked for a city" built by God. He had no faith to build a city for himself. It is the Cains, the Nimrods and the Hiels that found cities rather than the Abrahams of Faith. Abraham was concerned about the city's "foundations". He looked for the city having "the foundations". The order of words in the original is suggestive: "He looked for the foundations-having city". "To look for" is strictly "to expect", as the only other reference in Hebrews is translated (x. 13). Abraham shared the same spirit of patient waiting as his Lord manifested. "The foundations" are described in Rev. xxi. 14, 19, 20; they bear the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb, and like the whole purpose of the ages, rest upon the unimpeachable righteousness of God.

These tent-dwellers had no need to make loud professions; their actions spoke for them: "for they that say such things declare plainly that they seek a country". This was their "confession"; they confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims in the land. As "partakers of the heavenly calling" they had this "confession" of which the Lord was both apostle and High Priest (iii. 1; iv. 14, where homologia is translated "profession"). The whole of the intervening passages of chapters iii. and iv. are taken up with Israel in the wilderness, and the rest that "remaineth". Israel in the wilderness not only remembered the fish and the cucumbers, etc., of Egypt (Numb. xi. 5), but went so far as to say: "Let us make a captain, and let us return into Egypt" (Numb. xiv. 4). This word "captain" is archegos in the LXX, and occurs in Heb. ii. 10 ("Captain") and xii. 2 ("Author"). The lesson is plain. These Hebrew believers would be readers of the LXX, and the connection between the passages would be obvious. This temptation is recognized in Heb. xi. 15:

> "And truly, if they had been mindful of that country from whence they came out, they might have had opportunity to have returned."

The word "mindful" means "to remember", and is the same verb as is used in the LXX of Numb. xi. 5, "We remember". Can there be any possible doubt but that the words of Phil. iii. 13, "forgetting those things which are behind", are used in true contrast? We need a holy forgetfulness of some things. Why had these saints no opportunity afforded them of returning to Chaldea? They were not "mindful". Have you never had your interest in a particular subject quickened, and then, the next day perhaps, have seen a newspaper article or heard a conversation upon the very subject? You say, how strange! But is it? You would have seen the article or heard the conversation even though the subject had never come before your notice, yet it would have left no impression because you were not interested. Jonah will always find a ship ready for Tarshish (Jonah i. 3), but such a circumstance will be no evidence of the will of the Lord. The only way to live, if we would walk worthy of our calling is to remember the exhortation, "Seek those things which are above . . . . . set your mind on things above . . . . . for ye died" (Col. iii. 1-3).

The positive is resumed in Heb. xi. 16: "But now they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly". The word country is strictly "the fatherland". It is one of the "better" things of Hebrews, and is balanced in this chapter by the better resurrection and provision of xi. 35 and 40. Now, just as the true followers of the Captain of salvation—are all one, "for which cause He is not ashamed to call them brethren" (ii. 11), so here, these have followed the true Captain, and have not appointed a captain to lead them back to Egypt, "wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God, for He hath prepared for them a city". These pilgrims of faith will find their inheritance in that day, when the voice out of heaven shall say: "Behold, the Tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them, and they shall be His people, and God Himself shall be with them, and be their God" (Rev. xxi. 3). Among those who will have no part in that city are "the fearful". Throughout the epistle to the Hebrews the apostle's eye seems to be upon that word. These saints were in danger of "drawing back unto perdition", of failing to hold fast the confidence of their hope to the end. Such could not be renewed again unto repentance. Such drawing back could only end in loss.

Heb. xi. does not minimize the pilgrim journey or its accompanying reproach, but it does point to a way to the better things, the city which has the foundations, for which Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were content to be labeled strangers and pilgrims in the land of promise. If you do not presume, as some would have you do, and "claim" blessings now that belong to the "far off" city, remember that it is a part of faith now to "not receive" the promises, and that the earnest of the inheritance is all that the tent-dweller may legitimately hope to enjoy.

The faith of Sarah and Abraham in relation to Israel comes centrally in the set of seven pairs that occupy the bulk of Heb. xi. Its great theme is resurrection. This is true not only by reason of its pre-eminent place in their faith, but resurrection, in some phase or other, appears closely connected with all the examples of this chapter; so much so, that it brings forward the challenging inquiry, Is there any faith recognized in Scripture that is not actively or passively associated with resurrection? Both Sarah and Abraham exhibited a faith in "God Who quickeneth the dead" (Rom. iv. 17), in relation to Isaac; Sarah at his birth, and Abraham at his great trial. The faith of Abraham concerning the birth of Isaac is omitted in chapter xi. of Hebrews.

Whether it be Abraham and Sarah respecting the birth of Isaac, or Abraham alone at the offering of Isaac, standing out as a beacon of light through all the darkness of human doubt and incredulity, one feature is emphasized: the promise and the Promiser. Taking the testimony of Rom. iv. to Abraham's faith we read:

> "Therefore it is of faith, that it might be by grace; to the end the promise might be sure to all the seed."
>
> "He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief . . . . . being fully persuaded that, what He had promised, He was able also to perform."
>
> "Now it was not written for his sake alone . . . . . but for us also . . . . . if we believe on Him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead" (Rom. iv. 16-25).

Here we have Abraham's faith concerning the birth of Isaac most intimately connected with the promise and the resurrection. Now let us consider the testimony concerning Sarah:

> "Through faith also Sarah herself received strength to conceive seed, and was delivered of a child when she was past age, because she judged Him faithful Who had promised" (Heb. xi. 11).

The words "as good as dead" of Rom. iv. 19 are parallel with "past age" of this passage, and stress the figure of resurrection. Abraham's trial of faith recorded in Heb. xi. 17-19 revolves around these same features of faith and promise and resurrection:

> "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac: and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten son, of whom it was said, That in Isaac shall thy seed be called: accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead; from whence also he received him in a figure" (Heb. xi. 17-19).

As at the beginning, so here in a greater degree, Abraham:

> "against (natural) hope believed in hope, that he might become the father of many nations, according to that which was spoken, So shall thy seed be" (Rom. iv. 18).

It is very evident that the faith of Abraham and Sarah in the Promiser was such that they believed He was the One Who quickeneth the dead. Therefore Abraham could believe this when all human hope had long passed. Sarah could receive strength when she was as good as dead, and Abraham, without knowing exactly how it would be accomplished, was confident that He Who had vested the promises in Isaac would, if needs be, raise him from the dead in order that His promise might be fulfilled. This appears to be an essential element of faith. It is surely significant that we do not read the word "promise" (epangelia) in the Gospels, until after the resurrection of the Lord (Luke xxiv. 49). This has reference to the Holy Spirit which came upon the apostles on the day of Pentecost. The shedding forth of the Holy Spirit and His miraculous gifts was directly connected with the resurrection of Christ, as Acts ii. 29-33 will show:

> "He . . . . . spake of the resurrection of Christ . . . . . therefore being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, He hath shed forth this, which ye now see and hear."

The noun "promise" is an important word in Hebrews, occurring as it does 14 times, as follows:

> "Let us therefore fear, lest, a promise being left us of entering into His rest, any of you should seem to come short of it" (iv. 1).
> "Be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises" (vi. 12).
> "After he had patiently endured, he obtained the promise" (vi. 15).
> "To shew unto the heirs of promise the immutability of His counsel" (vi. 17).
> "He (Melchisedec) . . . . . blessed him that had the promises" (vii. 6).
> "A better covenant . . . . . established upon better promises" (viii. 6).
> "The new testament (covenant) . . . . . receive the promise of eternal inheritance" (ix. 15).
> "Ye have need of patience, that . . . . . ye might receive the promise" (x. 36).
> "By faith he sojourned in the land of promise" (xi. 9).
> "Heirs with him of the same promise" (xi. 9).
> "These all died in faith, not having received the promises" (xi. 13).
> "He that had received the promises offered up his only begotten son" (xi. 17).
> "Through faith . . . . . obtained promises" (xi. 33).
> "Received not the promise: God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect" (xi. 39, 40).

It will be seen that the example of Abraham would clinch, as it were, the exhortations dealing with the promise that had been given earlier in the epistle. Some of these Hebrew believers were shrinking back under a great trial of faith. Abraham's trial and triumph would encourage them to persevere. Perhaps the fact that these blessings were reserved for resurrection had not been fully grasped by them. Abraham's confidence would tend to reassure them.

The miracle and the marvel of resurrection.

Sarah's unbelief was rebuked by the word: "Is anything too hard for the Lord"? (Gen. xviii. 14), and these words have a fuller message than the English translation supplies.

The word “hard” is pala, and is rendered “wonderful”, “marvel”, and the like. It is used of the plagues of Egypt and the future day of restoration (Psa. lxxviii. 12; Zech. viii. 6); it is associated with the wonder of child-birth (Psa. cxxxix. 14, 15); it enters into the name of the Angel who appeared to Samson’s mother (Judg. xiii. 18), and above all in the name of that “Child born and Son given” of whom Isaac was but a type—“His name shall be called Wonderful” (Isa. ix. 6). Is anything too wonderful for the Lord of resurrection?

Have we not allowed ourselves to be robbed of a full apprehension of God’s grace and power by reason of the limits imposed by translation? The word usually rendered “miracle” is dunamis. This word occurs twice in Heb. xi., viz., “Sarah received strength, (11), and “quenched the violence of fire” (34). The only reference therefore to God’s power in this chapter has to do with resurrection. When Paul said: “That I may know Him, and the power of His resurrection” he actually said, “the miracle of His resurrection”. Sarah knew this miracle, Abraham knew it, Jonah experienced it, and Israel anticipated it (Hos. vi. 2). This miraculous power of resurrection lies behind every promise of God, and however dark and apparently contrary to all reasonable expectation the present path may be, faith (as in the trial of Abraham) goes on beyond even the power of death, and believes in God Who quickeneth the dead.

When Abraham heard the call the first time, he obeyed and went out not knowing. When he responded the second time, he obeyed, still not knowing, but assured that God was faithful that promised. He obtained promises, he patiently endured, and could like Paul say, “I know Whom I have believed, and am persuaded”. Sarah “judged Him faithful Who had promised”. Abraham “accounted Him able to raise up Isaac, even from the dead”. These are but variants of the same act of faith.

Members of the One Body too, have a promise to keep in mind, a promise made before age times (Titus i. 2), a promise sealed, for which an earnest has been given (Eph. i. 13), a promise which forms a precious feature of their peculiar calling (Eph. iii. 6), a promise which likewise looks forward to the day of resurrection, the day of redemption, for its fulfillment, and which they may anticipate as they walk in the power that is to usward who believe, a power which is nothing short of the power of His resurrection.

> “For all the promises of God in Him are yea, and in Him Amen, unto the glory of God by us” (II Cor. i. 20).

No.49. Crossed Hands or Restoration (xi. 20 - 22).
pp. 181 - 188

The insistence of Heb. xi. upon the peculiar characteristics of faith, brings into prominence some incidents in the lives of the patriarchs that might otherwise have remained in the background. This is specially the case with Joseph, for who, unguided by God, would have picked out of that wonderful life the commandment concerning his bones? In the verse before us we have a pair of witnesses that have to do with "blessing", but blessing given with some rather unusual accompaniment or in some rather unusual circumstance:

> "By faith Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau concerning things to come. By faith Jacob, when he was a dying, blessed both the sons of Joseph; and worshipped, leaning upon the top of his staff" (Heb. xi. 20, 21).

It is very evident to the most casual reader that these two acts form a pair. In both cases the old man, the father, is partially blind. "His eyes were dim, so that he could not see" (Gen. xxvii. 1). "Now the eyes of Israel were dim for age, so that he could not see" (Gen. xlviii. 10). In both cases, two sons are connected with the blessing; in the first Jacob and Esau, in the second Ephraim and Manasseh. In both, the younger is blessed above the elder, and in both there is an attempt to interfere with the Divine purpose by the fondness of the parent for the firstborn. We have already demonstrated that Heb. xi. is occupied with a series of seven pairs, and this close parallel is but added confirmation.

Grace not law.

We take it that the reader is sufficiently acquainted with the narrative of the two passages of Genesis, to enable us to proceed at once to the lesson intended by the apostle when writing to the Hebrews. One of the stumbling-blocks in the path of the early church was the necessity to set aside generations of racial pride and the privileges of circumcision. The Hebrew section could not readily relinquish their connection with the law and their position as the firstborn, and around this difficulty a great deal of the argument of Galatians and Romans is written:

> "And this I say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect. For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise" (Gal. iii. 17, 18).
>
> "Therefore it is of faith, that it might be by grace; to the end the promise might be sure to all the seed; not to that only which is of the law, but to that also which is of the faith of Abraham; who is the father of us all" (Rom. iv. 16).

These two passages make it very clear that the promises of God do not move along the line of works, law or race, but that the promises originally made to Abraham and his seed included both the Jew and Gentile in their embrace. Rom. ix. 7-12 throws further light upon the question, revealing that deeper motives and purposes are involved:

> "In Isaac shall thy seed be called . . . . . And not only this; but when Rebecca also had conceived by one, even by our father Isaac; (for the children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of Him that calleth); it was said unto her, The elder shall serve the younger."

Ishmael the firstborn is set aside, and Isaac is seen as the child of promise. Esau the firstborn is set aside, and the younger, Jacob, is the true seed, a "supplanter", by Divine intention. Manasseh the firstborn is passed over, that Ephraim the younger may receive the blessing, and so on down the ages.

We believe that we are not alone in experiencing considerable difficulty when asked to believe that when Isaac was deceived into blessing Jacob in the place of Esau, that Isaac acted "by faith". If that is faith what is credulity, or unbelief or disobedience? For observe, in Gen. xxvii. we have the following statements, and are not left to our own deductions:

(1) Isaac most pointedly intended to bless Esau.
(2) Rebekah as definitely intended Jacob to be blessed.

Rebekah's methods are to be condemned, but at least she sought, even by questionable means, that the revealed purpose of God at the birth of Esau and Jacob should be carried out. We cannot suppose that Isaac had lived in ignorance of this prophecy given at the birth of the children, and therefore his direct choice of Esau can scarcely be called "the obedience of faith".

(3) When Esau returned we read, "And Isaac trembled very exceedingly, and said, Who? where is he?" etc. This trembling and questioning are no evidence of faith. Yet it still stands written, "By faith Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau concerning things to come".

The turning point of the narrative where faith begins to operate appears to be at the moment when Isaac realized the deception that had been practised upon him. The words "And Isaac trembled with a great trembling greatly" (Gen. xxvii. 33 margin) appear too strong if they simply indicate Isaac's fear of Esau's anger. May they not rather indicate that with the revelation of Jacob's deception came also the consciousness of his own failure to seek first the will of the Lord? And so at the end of the very same verse that sees him "trembling greatly", we find him suddenly resolute: "Yea, and he shall be blessed". So we find the vacillating Pilate suddenly adamant, when the purpose of God shall so require: "What I have written, I have written."

The blessing intended in unbelief for Esau is confirmed to Jacob "by faith". Strange overruling, yet can we not see some parallels in our own wayward wanderings? Esau was blessed concerning things to come, and the blessing is recorded in verses 39 and 40. Jacob's full blessing, freely and by faith, however, is not given until the 28th chapter: "And Isaac called Jacob, and blessed him" (Gen. xxviii. 1). There is no deception now, no compulsion; faith sees clearly the path to tread. The blessing evidently has intimate relation to the great promise of God to Abraham concerning a Seed and a land, for Isaac immediately adds: "Thou shalt not take a wife of the daughters of Canaan." Here Jacob follows in line with Isaac, as Isaac with Abraham (see Gen. xxiv. 37). Then follows that blessing which Rebekah had schemed in vain to hear, and Jacob had deceived in vain to receive:

> "And God Almighty (El Shaddai, as in xvii. 1) bless thee, and make thee fruitful, and multiply thee, that thou mayest be a multitude of people" (Gen. xxviii. 3).

The margin renders "multitude" by "assembly". The LXX translates the word kahal by sunagoge, "synagogue". This also is a peculiar item in the great promise to Abraham, for it reappears as the change of Jacob's name to Israel:

> "I am God Almighty: be fruitful and multiply; a nation and a company (kahal, LXX sunagoge) of nations shall be of thee" (Gen. xxxv. 11).

It occurs yet again in the passage where Jacob blesses Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. xlviii. 4). We do not know whether the note to the word "multitude" (Gen. xlviii. 19) in The Companion Bible has been or will be corrected in later editions, but the student should remember that in this verse the word is quite different from the above, being the Hebrew melo, and involves a different idea. This is but an expansion of the original promise: "In thee shall all families of the earth be blessed" (Gen. xii. 3).

Gen. xxviii. 4 continues:

> "And give thee the blessing of Abraham, to thee, and to thy seed with thee; that thou mayest inherit the land wherein thou art a stranger, which God gave unto Abraham."

Here, without the shadow of doubt, is the promise of Abraham, and given by faith to Jacob by Isaac. If we contrast the blessing of Gen. xxviii. 1-4 with that of xxvii. 28, 29 we shall find that the former blessing, received by deception, was the firstborn's blessing, while the latter, given freely and by faith, was the one for which Jacob had seized the chance of birthright, and Rebekah had plotted in vain; for this promise was by grace, and did not necessarily descend to the natural firstborn. This lesson is repeated in the second instance given in Heb. xi. When the moment came for the two sons of Joseph to be blessed, Joseph placed the firstborn at the right hand of Jacob:

> "And Israel stretched out his right hand, and laid it upon Ephraim's head, who was the younger, and his left hand upon Manasseh's head, guiding his hands wittingly; for Manasseh was the firstborn . . . . . and he set Ephraim before Manasseh" (Gen. xlviii. 14-20).

It is not our object to attempt an exposition here of these two blessings, which include within their terms practically all that belongs to the purpose of God for the earth until the end of the Millennium. Our purpose is rather to gather the lesson that may be learned for ourselves, and to see how it is related to the need of the Hebrew believer and the theme of the epistle.

The blessing of the crossed hands.

This would be but one more blow at the passing system of law and Jewish privilege. Already the Aaronic and Levitical priesthood had given place to that after the order of Melchisedec. Already the sacrifices of bulls and goats had passed away in view of the one great Sacrifice for sin. Already the old Covenant had been set aside for the new. We have read of a better Covenant, better sacrifices, a better hope, and now we are to realize that there are "better promises" than those of the law. When the twelfth chapter is concluded we shall find a better "Firstborn" connected with Mount Sion, than was connected with Mount Sinai (Heb. xii. 18-23), and we shall perhaps believe that it is not accident but design that places Heb. xii. 16, 17 immediately before these verses, and introduces Esau, as a profane person, who for one morsel of meat sold his birthright. With all Jacob's manifold faults, and we are not called upon to gloss them over, Jacob schemed and plotted for the blessing. He did not, like his profane brother, hold it cheap and barter it away. Jacob, though the younger, was the recipient of blessing; who, when he was most blessed, halted upon his thigh. His blessing at the end was deliberately contrary to law and expectation, and this, together with Jacob's crosshand blessing and Isaac's previous blessing, bring forward one more important feature in the constitution of faith, namely, that it sets aside the flesh. This is but another way of saying that faith is ever associated with resurrection, as we have already seen. May we rejoice that "all spiritual blessings" are not given as deserts, but in pure grace, and that the highest of all inheritances has been bestowed upon those who by nature and practice seemed the least likely. A blessing of crossed hands indeed!

> "Therefore it is of faith, that it might be by grace; to the end the promise might be sure to all the seed" (Rom. iv. 16).

Among the characters of the Old Testament that are outstanding types of Christ, Joseph takes a prominent place. His separate position in the family of Jacob, his betrayal, his imprisonment, his exaltation to the throne, all provide food for holy wonder as we see the Messiah, Who was to come after many years, so clearly anticipated by God and recorded in His Word. Heb. xi. 22, however, is not so much concerned with Joseph as a type, as with Joseph as the man of faith. Moreover we must never lose sight of the fact that the apostle, when writing this chapter, had the Hebrews in mind, and was guided in the selection of his examples so as to afford to these saints all the help possible in their difficult path.

> "By faith Joseph, when he died, made mention of the departing of the children of Israel; and gave commandment concerning his bones" (Heb. xi. 22).

The expression "when he died" is the rendering of the Greek verb teleutao, which suggests the end or close of life. Earlier on we have found that one of the key words of Hebrews is the word "perfect" and its variants. We have:

teleios in ix. 11, the "more perfect tabernacle";
teleiotes (vi. 1), "let us go on unto perfection";
teleioo (x. 14), "perfected for ever";
teleiosis (vii. 11), "if . . . . . perfection were by the Levitical priesthood";

teleiotes (xii. 2), "the Author and Finisher (Perfecter) of faith";
teleutao (xi. 22), "Joseph when he died";
telos (vi. 11), "hope unto the end".

It would not be true to say that teleutao necessarily carries with it the idea of perfecting, for it is used of the death of Herod (Matt. ii. 19), and the punishment of the law-breaker (Matt. xv. 4), as well as of the death of David (Acts ii. 29), Jacob (Acts vii. 15) and Joseph (Heb. xi. 22). Yet, seeing how closely the theme of Hebrews is interwoven with this word, it is possible that it was used with intent, because of what was to be written immediately afterward.

The exodus.

What Joseph particularly remembered when near the close of his life, was the "departing of the children of Israel", or, as the original has it, "the exodus". "Made mention" is perhaps better rendered "remembered" as the margin suggests. In what way could Joseph have "remembered" the exodus of Israel? The actual deliverance at the Passover did not take place for nearly two centuries after his death. He is said to have remembered this exodus "by faith", and therefore must have known and believed some "word of God" (Rom. x. 17). It is very evident that the promise of Gen. xv. was believed by Joseph, and he realized that his own imprisonment and elevation to the throne, the coming of his brethren and their settlement in Egypt were all parts of one great whole. The basis of Joseph's faith reads as follows:

> "And he said unto Abram, Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years; and also that nation, whom they shall serve, will I judge; and afterward shall they come out with great substance. And thou shalt go to thy fathers in peace; thou shalt be buried in a good old age. But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full" (Gen. xv. 13-16).

Joseph, surely, was one of those witnesses who "died in faith, not having received the promise", but who nevertheless saw it afar off and was persuaded of it. There is no murmuring when his time comes to die, but just a confident assurance that God will keep His word:

> "And Joseph said unto his brethren, I die: and God will surely visit you, and bring you out of this land unto the land which He sware to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob. And Joseph took an oath of the children of Israel, saying, God will surely visit you, and ye shall carry up my bones from hence" (Gen. l. 24, 25).

Twice in this small compass we have the expression "visiting He will visit", the Hebrew figure denoting emphasis and certainty. Joseph knew that bondage and affliction awaited Israel, yet who more fitted to speak confidently than himself? Had not Joseph endured sorrow and reproach? Is it not written of him: "Whose feet they hurt with fetters; he was laid in iron"? (Psa. cv. 18). Nevertheless, the Lord had kept His word of promise to Joseph, and so He would keep His covenant with His servant Abraham also. In the exodus Joseph would have no conscious part, for he knew that his hour had come.

Resurrection.

Joseph, however, did not only remember the exodus of Israel; he gave commandment concerning his bones. Why was this? He certainly did not intend Israel to hold them in reverence as the church of Rome does the bones of martyrs. There is something distinctly personal in Joseph's desire. If we compare the statements of Scripture concerning Jacob and Joseph we shall realize that there is some important lesson involved in their concern about their bones and their burial. We will continue first the record of Joseph:

> "And the bones of Joseph, which the children of Israel brought up out of Egypt, buried they in Shechem, in a parcel of ground which Jacob bought of the sons of Hamor the father of Shechem for an hundred pieces of silver: and it became the inheritance of the children of Joseph" (Josh. xxiv. 32).

This parcel of ground was bought by Jacob, as recorded in Gen. xxxiii. 19, and there he had erected an altar and called it El-elohe-Israel, God--the God of Israel. When Jacob came to die, after blessing the twelve tribes, he too makes special arrangements for his burial in the land of Canaan:

> "I am to be gathered unto my people: bury me with my fathers in the cave that is in the field of Ephron the Hittite, in the cave that is in the field of Machpelah, which is before Mamre, in the land of Canaan, which Abraham bought with the field of Ephron the Hittite for a possession of a burying-place. There they buried Abraham and Sarah his wife; there they buried Isaac and Rebekah his wife; and there I buried Leah" (Gen. xlix. 29-31).

It is suggestive that it is in the passages where we read that Joseph and Jacob "died" (teleutao) that we read of this special burial. Stephen in his speech before the Sanhedrin spoke to men who were not only his opponents, and so not likely to allow any mistake to pass unnoticed, but who were also well versed in the history of the fathers. Consequently we must accept Acts vii. 15, 16 as added light and not attempt to explain it away:

> "So Jacob went down into Egypt, and died (teleutao), he, and our fathers, and were carried over into Sychem, and laid in the sepulchre that Abraham bought for a sum of money of the sons of Emmor the father of Sychem."

Here we learn that not only were Jacob and Joseph buried in purchased burial places in the land of promise, but that the parcel of land that Jacob had bought (Josh. xxiv. 32) had originally belonged to Abraham, and had been secured by Jacob, after his long absence, by the payment of the added one hundred pieces of silver. Further, it will be seen that the fathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, were buried together in the one place, the cave of Machpelah, while Joseph and his brethren, the heads of the tribes of Israel, were all buried together in the other place, purchased both by Abraham and by Jacob for this very purpose. Who can doubt the meaning? There, in that land of pilgrimage, a land that was promised but not enjoyed, faith saw afar off the promise fulfilled in resurrection. The burying places secured from the inhabitants were just so many pledges of undying faith, and the holy dead, lying together in solemn stillness, spoke of the quiet confidence of faith awaiting the day when in resurrection glory all should come into their own.

There is one more passage that must be noted, viz., Gen. xlviii. 21, 22:

> "And Israel said unto Joseph, Behold, I die: but God shall be with you, and bring you again unto the land of your fathers. Moreover I have given to thee one portion above thy brethren, which I took out of the hand of the Amorite with my sword and with my bow."

Here we have a portion of the promised land not bought with money, but taken by the sword. This was "a double portion", a portion above his brethren, the portion of the victor, the overcomer. It is surely something more than coincidence that the word "portion" in this passage should be the very word "shechem", which occurs as a place name in the record of Josh. xxiv. 32. It would appear that the complete story is somewhat as follows:

(1) Abraham purchased the field of Machpelah, and there Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, Jacob, Rebekah and Leah were buried (Gen. xxiii. 4-20; xlix. 29-31).
(2) Abraham also purchased a portion of land in Shechem of the sons of Emmor, as a burying place for the twelve patriarchs (Acts vii. 16).
(3) This piece of land was apparently seized by the Amorites, and delivered from them by Jacob's sword and bow, and doubly secured by the further payment of a sum of money to the sons of Emmor (Gen. xlviii. 21, 22 and Josh. xxiv. 32).

The glorious truth of Ephesians was a mystery, or secret, unknown when Abraham, Jacob and Joseph lived. Certain underlying principles, however, receive a little light from the Old Testament records. We can surely see how strong the hope of resurrection was, how intimately it was associated with the inheritance and restoration. Here, in these typical transactions, we can see the "redemption of the purchased possession", and in the very possession of these sacred spots of earth, an "earnest of the inheritance", and in Jacob's fight with the Amorite for this precious pledge the conflict with principalities and powers in Eph. vi.

Jacob undertook no campaign against the Canaanites. In fact he was strongly opposed to such a spirit (Gen. xxxiv. 25-30). But when it was necessary to fight for the sacred pledge of the inheritance for which he was willing to wait, then he did not hesitate to enter into battle. This is the true overcoming for the present time. Many dear servants of God are being persuaded to adopt an attitude that is alike dangerous and undispensational. We must not forget that dominion over the Canaanite was not granted to Israel until, under Joshua, they crossed over Jordan. No walls of Jericho fell down flat before either Abraham, Isaac or Jacob. Such is not the condition of pilgrimage but of conquest, and the day of redemption, the day of entry into our inheritance, though near, is not actually present.

This precious lesson of faith would come with quickening force to the Hebrew who read it, and, under God, it was calculated to strengthen the afflicted and persecuted believer by the simple grandeur of its example:

> "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off" (Heb. xi. 13).

The purchased possession.

There is more in this purchase of land than is at first sight evident, owing to the law of inheritance and its relation to redemption. When Boaz, the kinsman-redeemer, bought the land that belonged to Elimelech and Chilion and Mahlon, he also bought Ruth, the wife of Mahlon, to be his wife, "to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance, that the name of the dead be not cut off from among his brethren, and from the gate of his place" (Ruth iv. 9, 10). Jeremiah also bought a piece of land in Anathoth at the command of the Lord, and as an evidence of his faith in the restoration of his people:

> "Buy thee my field that is in Anathoth: for the right of redemption is thine to buy it . . . . . Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Take these evidences, this evidence of the purchase, both which is sealed, and this evidence which is open; and put them in an earthen vessel, that they may continue many days. For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Houses and fields and vineyards shall be possessed again in this land" (Jer. xxxii. 7-15).

To the Hebrew who knew the law, those sacred burial grounds would be so many pledges of future resurrection and restoration. "The purchased possession" would be redeemed, the inheritance would be enjoyed, and during the intervening time of waiting and discipline, "faith is the substance of things hoped for".

No.50. Moses, Faith that triumphs (xi. 23 - 28).
pp. 201 - 207

In the structure of Heb. xi., the witness of Joseph and Moses are coupled. Let us notice a lesson that arises out of the comparison of these two witnesses to overcoming faith. Both have to do with Egypt; both have to do personally with Pharaoh, but here the similarity ceases, and contrast begins.

In the case of Joseph, he was led steadily, step by step, through suffering and shame, until at last he sat upon the throne of Egypt and became the saviour of his people. In the case of Moses, he was led just as steadily to turn his back upon Egypt and its throne, and from greatness and wealth he descended to reproach and affliction that he, too, might be, equally and as surely, a saviour of his people. Now both these contrary actions were "by faith". How easy it would have been for Moses to have reasoned that in Joseph he had a precedent for accepting the honour of adoption, and of remaining attached to the throne of Egypt! How easily he could have deceived himself by reasoning that this closeness to the throne was a God-given responsibility that he must use for the amelioration of Israel's sorrows! Yet how false it would have been! Moses, as surely as Joseph, knew the promise of Gen. xv. God had declared that "in the fourth generation" Israel should come out of the land of their affliction, and Moses knew that in his own person, that fourth generation stood represented. This can be easily seen by reading Exod. vi. 16-20.

"These are the names of the sons of LEVI (generation No. 1)
Gershon, and KOHATH and Merari (generation No. 2)
The sons of Kohath, AMRAM, etc. (generation No. 3)
And . . . . . took him Jochebed . . . . . to wife; and she bare him Aaron and MOSES" (generation No. 4).

Moses' faith, like Joseph's, came by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God. Joseph said, "God shall surely visit you"—that Moses had heard, as recorded in Exod. iii. Moses knew that Israel were to leave Egypt; they were to be saved by no laws, however good, that emanated from that land of bondage. Joseph's faith as surely saw that Israel must remain in Egypt for some two hundred years, as Moses saw that they could not remain another generation. They both believed the Word, and though their actions, viewed externally, were so directly opposite, really they were entirely both in line and harmony.

Here is the right division of the Word of truth in actual practice. We have to see where we are in the outworking of the divine purpose, and to emulate the faith, but not copy the external expression of it, manifested in different periods, lest by so doing we err as surely as Moses would have done had he emulated Joseph and ruled in Egypt. By faith Moses forsook Egypt, and refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter. Abraham "went out". Moses "refused", and "forsook".

Moses stands with Abraham in the list of witnesses, inasmuch as more space is devoted to these two than to all others. There are points of resemblance that should not be passed unnoticed. Abraham left a highly civilized community to become a dweller in tents. Moses turned his back upon the treasures of Egypt to become associated with God's people in their affliction. Both Abraham and Moses had the faith that "sees the invisible", a quality shared by Noah, and all who were moved with like precious faith, as the opening words of this chapter indicate.

The witness of Moses to that faith which is both the substance of things hoped for, and the proof and reproof associated with things not seen, is given in a series of statements that cover his life from the day of his birth until the great day of Israel's deliverance by the passover. His history, as given, is bounded on either side by protection from one who would destroy in the first place all the male children, and in the second the firstborn. At the beginning faith provided an ark of bulrushes, and at the end the blood of the passover lamb. Lying between these two extremes are four related acts that carry the story on to its blessed conclusion.

"By faith Moses . . . . . REFUSED to be called the son . . . . . CHOOSING rather to suffer affliction with the people of God . . . . . ESTEEMING the reproach of Christ greater riches . . . . . By faith he FORSOOK Egypt" (24-27).

The first item in this exhibition of faith is connected with his birth and, while included in the faith of Moses, is yet, strictly speaking, the faith of his parents. The last item, however, balances this, for while it reads "by faith he kept the passover", this faith was shared by all Israel, so that we perceive that faith can sometimes be collective, while at others, as in the case of Moses refusing, choosing, esteeming and forsaking, it may be very personal and individual.

When Moses was born, two parts of God's promise drew near together. Amram his father knew full well that Moses was the fourth generation from the entry into Egypt. He also knew that there was another prophecy which must be fulfilled namely, that 400 years were to elapse (see Gen. xv. 13 and 16). It might have been difficult to have understood clearly, before the event, how 400 years and a fourth generation could coincide, but by the time Moses was born the possibility of this coincidence became manifest.

We learn that the parents of Moses hid the child for three months "because they saw that he was a proper child". Stephen speaking of this same event, says Moses was "exceeding fair", margin, "fair to God", a Hebraism indicating something exceptional. The word asteios, "fair", "proper", is an unusual word, occurring only in Acts vii. 20 and Heb. xi. 23. Etymologically it means "belonging to the city", like "polite" (from polis, a city), "urbane" (from verbs, a city). One edition of the LXX introduces the name of God into the description of David in I Sam. xvi. 12, where it reads: "Now he was ruddy . . . . . and fair in aspect through the Lord". It may be therefore that Moses at his birth had something about him that first of all caused his parents to stop and think, and then to perceive that here was the promised deliverer of the Lord's people.

> "And they were not afraid of the king's commandment" (Heb. xi. 23)

The hiding of Moses was by faith, not fear, for faith is not presumption. It would not have been an act of faith to have exposed Moses, and it is salutary to remember the Saviour's repudiation of the devil's suggestion to "tempt the Lord". When we read the record in Exod. ii. the mother alone is mentioned: "When she saw, she hid, she took him", etc. Heb. xi., however, assures us of the fact that both parents were associated in this venture of faith, even as Exod. ii. goes on to reveal the part played by the elder sister Miriam.

Faith and the powers that be.

It will also be observed that faith set aside the commandment of the king. Normally, the child of God is called upon to be law-abiding. Taxes were paid both by the Lord (Matt. xvii. 27), by the command of the Lord (Matt. xxii. 21), and by the command of his servant Paul (Rom. xiii. 7). Human government was to be viewed as under the ordering of God (Rom. xiii. 1; Titus iii. 1; I Pet. ii. 17). The order of human society is not invaded because believers are "all one in Christ". Though it be true that "in Christ" there are no longer "male and female", yet these distinctions are observed in the order of the home life (Eph. v. 22-33), and in the church (I Tim. ii. 8-15). Though there be no longer "bond and free", nevertheless the relationship of master and servant remains untouched (Eph. vi. 5-9).

While this is the general attitude, it will be seen that there are times when faith takes the position of Peter and John:

"Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye" (Acts iv. 19).

There are times when the commandment of the king must be ignored or flatly contradicted:

"Now when Daniel knew that the writing was signed . . . . . he prayed, and gave thanks before his God, as he did aforetime" (Dan. vi. 10).

"Be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up" (Dan. iii. 18).

What it all amounts to is this, that whether we obey the command from the king, or whether we reject it, in both actions we must see to it that we are simply obeying the Word of God. This is what the parents of Moses did. Seeing by faith that this child was the one marked out by God for a special purpose, they had but one course of action, which they took, and so their names are found enrolled upon the scroll of witnesses for that faith which is the substance of things hoped for.

The positive acts of faith that pertain to Moses now follow. The faith that marked the infant days of Moses was prominent in his after life. One or two notable manifestations of that faith which is the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen, are given in the record of Heb. xi.:

Substance. "Refused . . . . . choosing . . . . . esteeming ... for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward" (Heb. xi. 24-26).

Not seen. "Forsook . . . . . not fearing . . . . . for he endured, as seeing Him Who is invisible" (Heb. xi. 27, 28).

No act of faith is recorded of Moses until "he was come to years". The original has it: "having become great", which is a quotation from the LXX of Exod. ii. 11, and refers to his growth in years as much as, if not more than, to his greatness in wealth and position, although this too, belongs to the expression (see Gen. xxiv. 35).

The example of Moses very aptly illustrates the exhortation of Heb. v. 14; vi. 1: "Them that are of full age . . . . . Leaving . . . . . let us go on". When faith is tested there is no make-believe about it. Moses was great, learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and mighty in words and deeds (Acts vii. 22). He apparently had a definite offer made by Pharaoh's daughter of formal adoption into the royal house. It was a very real test. Abraham's trial of faith, too, was intensely real. Nothing on earth could have been so dear in his eyes as his beloved son Isaac. Paul's test of faith was real. The renunciation of the position and privilege of being a Hebrew and a Pharisee cannot be easily estimated by such as ourselves.

The activities of faith.

Moses refused, chose, esteemed; had respect, forsook, endured, and kept by faith.

He refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter.

He chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season.

He esteemed the reproach for Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt.
He had respect unto the recompense of the reward.
He forsook Egypt, not fearing the wrath of the king.
He endured, as seeing Him Who is invisible.
He kept the passover, and the sprinkling of blood.

To the Hebrews had been written:

> "Ye . . . . . took joyfully the spoiling of your goods, knowing in yourselves that ye have in heaven a better and an enduring substance. Cast not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward" (Heb. x. 34, 35), and in Moses they would see a very glorious example. These Hebrews were exhorted to consider the "enduring" nature of their heavenly possessions; they were urged to remember that they were associated with a kingdom that "remains" (xii. 28), that here they had no continuing city, but sought one to come (xiii. 14). So then the sinfulness of Egypt's pleasures is not stressed so much as their transience. Moses had a birthright and an adoption that he could not barter for Egypt's pottage (Heb. xii. 16; Rom. ix. 4), and there was a danger that the Hebrews would succumb under the pressure of their trials, and for a brief period of so-called "peace", forfeit their heavenly calling. The essential element in the faith necessary to endure and overcome is that which is manifested in Moses" action, and definitely expressed in Heb. xi. 6: "He that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder (a recompenser) of them that diligently seek Him".

Hebrews is the epistle of the "right hand of God". There the great High Priest has sat down, and because the Psalmist said "At Thy right hand are pleasures for evermore", those whose faith enables them to "see Him Who is invisible", are enabled to esteem, at their true worth, those "pleasures of sin" that are "for a season".

Joseph and Moses.

Joseph's faith led him step by step to the throne of Egypt. Moses' faith led him step by step away from Egypt and its throne to the wilderness and to hardship. The apostle had said earlier, concerning the Patriarchs, that "if they had been mindful of that country from whence they came out, they might have had opportunity to have returned" (Heb. xi. 15). We shall never lack the counsel of Mr. Worldly Wiseman, and our own hearts will often turn us astray. Think how one might have argued the case with Moses:

(1) Joseph's example. See how he used his exalted position for the glory of God and the well-being of his people.
(2) Are you not therefore disobedient to the example of such a man?
(3) Why not see in your preservation and adoption just the same all-powerful Hand, leading you on to this crisis in your life?
(4) Use your influence at court; get measures put into operation that shall ameliorate the sufferings of your people and be a deliverer indeed.

Doubtless we can supplement this from our own experience. But all this would be vain, for God had spoken. The promise made to Abraham and remembered by Joseph (Heb. xi. 22), was nearly due to be performed. God had said that Israel would be afflicted, but at the set time He would bring them out, and Moses" faith, like our own, rested upon "the Word of God" (Rom. x. 17).

By the time Moses was born, a new dispensation had dawned; "a new king that knew not Joseph" occupied the throne. So the apostle would press upon the consciences of the Hebrews the necessity to weigh the change of dispensation ushered in by the rejection of their Messiah. They had to "forsake", "go forth unto Him without the camp", rather than continue in those things that had ceased to be the will of God.

By faith he forsook Egypt.

We must now consider a difficult passage.

> "By faith he forsook Egypt, not fearing the wrath of the king: for he endured, as seeing Him Who is invisible" (Heb. xi. 27).

It is generally reckoned that this cannot refer to the time when Moses fled unto Midian, but to the second time that he left Egypt, victoriously at the time of the exodus. There is no need to comment upon the obvious "faith" that enabled Moses to lead Israel out of Egypt, so we ask a moment's attention while we look once again at that earlier flight from Egypt.

"Not fearing the wrath of the king." When we have read through the chapters of Exodus detailing the attitude of Moses towards Pharaoh, the mighty miracles that were wrought, the power that moved heaven and earth and even the angel of death, it seems rather tame to say of that triumphant departure from Egypt, the Israelites loaded with the "spoil" thrust upon them, that Moses "forsook" Egypt, and did not "fear" the wrath of the king. He had forsaken Egypt forty years before, and his return was with the express purpose of leading Israel out, not with any intention of settling down himself. Time after time he stood before Pharaoh, calm, unflinching, master of the situation. There was no wrath of the king to fear when, at the last, Israel moved out of the land, and the attempt of Pharaoh to overtake them at the Red Sea hardly fits the passage in the chapter we are considering.

There are several points of contact between Heb. xi. & Stephen's speech in Acts vii. Stephen gives a very full account of the occasion that led to Moses" flight from Egypt:

> "And when he was full forty years old, it came into his heart to visit his brethren the children of Israel. And seeing one of them suffer wrong, he defended him, and avenged him that was oppressed, and smote the Egyptian: for he supposed his brethren would have understood how that God by his hand would deliver them: but they understood not. And the next day he shewed himself unto them as they strove, and would have set them at one again, saying, Sirs, ye are brethren, why do ye wrong one to another? But he that did his neighbour wrong thrust him away, saying, Who made thee a ruler and a judge over us? Wilt thou kill me, as thou didst the Egyptian yesterday? Then fled Moses" (Acts vii. 23-29).

Stephen supplies us with the motive that prompted Moses' action. He supposed that Israel would have risen as one man and acknowledged him as their deliverer. This was not to be. They rejected him. He left Egypt and remained away for 40 years. Then, Stephen continues:

> "This Moses whom they refused, saying, Who made thee a ruler and a judge? The same did God send to be a ruler and a deliverer by the hand of the angel which appeared to him in the bush. He brought them out" (Acts vii. 35, 36).

It is very evident that Moses' two manifestations to Israel are typical of the First and Second Coming of Christ. His flight into Midian is parallel with the Lord's rejection, ascension to heaven and present period of waiting. Stephen, too, does not say that Moses forsook or left Egypt the second time, but that "he brought them out". Let us look at Exod. ii. 11-14 again. Verse 11 opens with the words "When Moses was grown" which is translated in the LXX by words identical with Heb. xi. 24. Exod. ii. 12 gives a statement not repeated by Stephen:

> "He looked this way and that way, and when he saw that there was no man, he slew the Egyptian, and hid him in the sand."

It is easy to say, Moses evidently looked "this way and that", to make sure that no man should witness the deed, but is that truth? Stephen tells us that he assumed that Israel would understand his motive, and Isaiah seems to use the expression in such a way as to compel us to believe that Moses was conscious of the Messianic foreshadowing of his acts:

> "He saw that there was no man, and wondered that there was no intercessor: therefore his arm brought salvation unto him" (Isa. lix. 16).
> "And I looked, and there was none to help; and I wondered that there was none to uphold: therefore mine own arm brought salvation unto me" (Isa. lxiii. 5).

While Exod. ii. 14 says "and Moses feared" it does not say he "feared the wrath of the king"; but it appears that he feared something less personal and more vital. Spurrell translates the passage: "Then Moses was afraid, for he said, Surely this transaction is known", which endeavours to draw attention to what was passing in Moses' mind. We know from Stephen that Moses expected Israel to see in this act his credentials as a God-sent deliverer, and that when he was sent later, he said: "They will not believe me . . . . . they will say, The Lord hath not appeared unto thee" (Exod. iv. 1), and that the signs of the serpent and the leprosy were given to him.

Let no one judge Moses for the slaying of the Egyptian. Under God he was the instrument of slaying thousands of Egypt's firstborn, and of overcoming the flower of their army at the Red Sea. We understand that at the reply of the quarrelling Israelites, Moses was seized with some apprehension that his mission would miscarry, saying: "Surely the intention of my act is evident to them", much in the same way the Lord said to His disciples after He had washed their feet: "What I do, thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter", which refers to something more than the external act of washing the feet. The only possibility therefore was, that Moses should forsake Egypt.

Pharaoh sought to slay him, and his flight out of Egypt was no more an act of unbelief than was the flight for much the same reason of Joseph and Mary, as recorded in Matt. ii.

These points we submit to the reader for careful consideration, believing that many an action may be really "by faith" which, casually judged, may seem the product of some baser motive. We will reserve Moses' last act of faith, 'the passover', together with Israel's faith in passing through the Red Sea, with which it is so clearly connected, to a further article.

No.51. Faith and the better thing (xi. 28 - 40).
pp. 221 - 229

We now reach the concluding pair of characters in the sevenfold series of Heb. xi., viz., Israel and Rahab. The key thought is "deliverance from destruction".

Moses is linked with Israel in the keeping of the passover, "lest He that destroyed the firstborn should touch them". Israel pass unscathed through the Red Sea, "which the Egyptians assaying to do were drowned". "Rahab perished not with them that believed not".

The faith of Moses is very comprehensive, and at either end of the record in Heb. xi. it overlaps and includes the faith of others. In both it was a preserving faith, and connected with birth:

> "By faith Moses, when he was born . . . . ." (verse 23).
> "By faith he kept the passover, and the sprinkling of blood, lest He that destroyed the firstborn should touch them" (verse 28).

There is no warrant for the change of expression from "by faith" to "through faith" in verses 27 and 28. It was the same faith acting in the same way that actuated Moses throughout. There is a real distinction intended between "by faith" and "through faith" in Rom. iii. 30. Here, however, it is a variation in the English version only, and no doctrinal difference is intended.

The passover.

Several items of interest are given concerning Moses and the passover. "By faith he kept the passover." The word "kept" here is poieo, and in its true translation has a wider significance than "kept". It is used of the sprinkling of blood just as much as the passover, and it would be hardly true to say, "he kept the sprinkling of blood". Paul follows the LXX version here, which in its turn faithfully translates the Hebrew. "To do the passover" (Exod. xii. 47, 48) does not seem good English, and it is not suggested as an alternative, but it points out the meaning, which is expressed in Exod. xii. 50:

"Thus did all the children of Israel; as the LORD commanded Moses and Aaron, so did they."

The faith that kept the passover found its warrant in the Word of God. We cannot too insistently bring this forward. All sorts of things are said to be done by the Lord's people "by faith", but it is difficult sometimes to find any warrant for their actions in the Word. Heb. xi. 1 declares faith to be the substance of things hoped for; Rom. x. 17 declares the Word of God to be the substance of that faith. The passover in Exod. xii. is of divine institution. Moses simply "did" what he was told. "And the Lord spake unto Moses . . . saying . . . . . Speak ye unto all the congregation of Israel" (Exod. xii. 1-3). The whole passage (Exod. xii. 1-20) is the actual spoken Word of the Lord. Without break or introduction verses 12 and 13 say:

"For I will pass through the land."
"When I see the blood."

The sprinkling of blood.

It is perhaps pardonable for the English reader to link these passages with the others in Hebrews that speak of "sprinkling". We have:

(1) The sprinkling of the water of purification (Heb. ix. 13).
(2) The sprinkling of both the book and the people (Heb. ix. 19).
(3) The sprinkling of the Tabernacle and its vessels (Heb. ix. 21).

These find their fulfillment in:

(1) "The blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel" (Heb. xii. 24).
(2) "Our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience" (Heb. x. 22).
(3) "Sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ" (I Pet. i. 2).

All these references use the word rhantizo or rhantismos. The word used in Heb. xi. 28, however, is proschusis, a word occurring nowhere else in the N.T. Believing that the choice of words to express the truth is a part of that inspiration of God which characterizes the Scriptures, we feel that it is fatal to profitable exegesis to confound what God distinguishes. We have, however, the key to the problem. Elsewhere we have sought to show the distinction that must be made between redemption and atonement. Now all the passages cited above have reference to a people already redeemed, whereas the passover speaks of the great act of redemption itself. There is no reference to cleansing, dedicating or service in the passover. It speaks of deliverance; consequently the record uses a distinct word. Instead, therefore, of linking Heb. xi. 28 with Heb. xii. 24, we have to make the following comparisons:

The passover and its sprinkled blood (Heb. xi. 28) must be compared with such a passage as I Pet. i. 18, 19: "Ye were, ... redeemed ... with the precious blood of Christ, as of a Lamb without blemish and without spot". The redeeming Sacrifice, and its sprinkled blood, must be placed in contrast with "the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel" (Heb. xii. 24), which refers rather to worship.

Faith versus assaying to do.

The active faith of Israel begins with the crossing of the Red sea:

> "By faith they passed through the Red sea as by dry land: which the Egyptians assaying to do were drowned" (Heb. xi. 29).

There is a lesson here regarding faith that may well detain us for a moment. By comparing the faith of Joseph with that of Moses, as given in Heb. xi. 22 and 24, we learned that the selfsame faith in different circumstances may produce very contrary actions. Faith led Joseph to occupy the throne of Egypt. Faith as certainly led Moses to turn his back on it. Now in the case before us we have two peoples performing the same act. Israel ventured to cross the Red Sea, and the Egyptians ventured to do the same. Externally the acts were similar; internally they were wide apart. Israel's faith rested upon the Word of God: "Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward" (Exod. xiv. 15). Egypt's following of Israel, though the same act, was not by faith but through hardness of heart: "I will harden the hearts of the Egyptians, and they shall follow them" (Exod. xiv. 17). Is there no "assaying to do" on the part of the Lord's people, that ends in disaster?

An outstanding example of faith in modern times is that of George Muller. Doubtless many have thanked God for that noble witness, but does it follow that because George Muller passed through that Red Sea of difficulties triumphantly, all should or could? The Lord's will has as much to do with faith as with obedience. He wills that one should suffer weakness, while He wills that another should be divinely healed. He wills to one pecuniary straitness, while to another He wills a full and plentiful supply. Faith will never seek to override these divine appointments. If it is His will that one should be poor, it will not be "faith" but an Egyptian "assaying to do", if that one seeks to alter this, however plausibly he may speak of the triumph of faith that can move mountains. Let us see to it that our Red Seas are crossed at the Word of God; that will be by faith. Let us have an holy shrinking from any act that looks like faith, but is a counterfeit.

Between Heb. xi. 29 and 30 lies a tragedy of unbelief. Marah, Manna, Meribah, Kadesh Barnea are passed over in silence. In the reckoning of faith they do not exist. There is no recorded gap between the triumph of the Red Sea, and the overthrow of Jericho forty years afterwards. Alas, we all know too well what these driftings and doubtings mean on the pilgrim path and they are recorded in chapters iii. and iv.

The faith that accomplished the overthrow of Jericho rested upon the Word of God:

> "The LORD said unto Joshua, See, I have given into thine hand Jericho . . . . . ye shall compass the city . . . . . six days . . . . . and the seventh day ye shall compass the city seven times, and the priests shall blow with the trumpets. And it shall come to pass, that when they make a long blast with the ram's horn, and when ye hear the sound of the trumpet, all the people shall shout with a great shout; and the wall of the city shall fall down flat, and the people shall ascend up every man straight before him" (Josh. vi. 2-5).

Here is the basis of the faith of Heb. xi. 30. We do not attempt a fuller exposition of Josh. vi. in this series, as that comes in its proper course in the studies entitled Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth.

We saw in an earlier analysis that the seventh in the double list of witnesses in each instance is a woman. Sarah's faith is positive. Rahab's faith is negative: "Rahab perished not with them that believed not" (Heb. xi. 31).

A great deal of unprofitable discussion has taken place over Rahab. Some contend that the Hebrew word zanah (harlot) may mean just an innkeeper. Schleusner, with many commentators, would derive zanah from zun, "be fed", but the laws of language will not permit this derivation. There is no necessity to soften down the language of Scripture. The grace that can save Saul the Pharisee, Matthew the publican, and the like, can save Rahab the harlot.

> "His mercy is free,
> 'Twas given to Mary, Manasseh and me."

Another difficulty that some have is the fact that Rahab told lies in defending the spies. Of this the New Testament record takes no notice. It neither minimizes her condition as a harlot, nor enters into any justification of her words and deeds. What it does fix upon is that, sinful, erring, ignorant and immoral as she was, she believed in God and His Word.

> "I know that the LORD hath given you the land, and that your terror is fallen upon us . . . . . we have heard how the LORD dried up the water of the Red sea for you . . . . . the Lord your God, He is God in heaven above, and in earth beneath" (Josh. ii. 9-11).

We can well leave Rahab's morals to grow and expand under the illumination of the law of God. Harlot though she was, and untruthful as she was, she believed God, which is the beginning of all morals and all truth. There is one thing to be said of Rahab's false statements concerning the spies. She did not bear false witness against them. She did not save herself from the charge of lying at the expense of the life of the spies who had put themselves into her hands.

Josh. ii. and Heb. xi. 31 are not written to justify Rahab's morals, but to bear witness to Rahab's faith. She is included to emphasize the many-sidedness of faith, the way in which it is exhibited by those who differ widely in other ways. Sarah and Rahab are in many points at extremes. Moses and Jacob have few points in common, yet each is bound to each by the common bond of faith.

We have now passed in review the fourteen great witnesses to faith that is the substance of things hoped for. We have seen faith in many aspects leading men and women in many ways, but ever resting upon the Word of God. Each example named has been associated with some particular aspect of faith. Before the apostle concludes, he enumerates yet another series of seven, but this time attaches no particular example of faith to any one of them:

"And what shall I more say? for the time would fail me to tell of Gideon, and of Barak, and of Samson, and of Jephthae; of David also, and Samuel, and of the prophets" (Heb. xi. 32).

It seems that we should honour this abbreviation, and not spend time in examining the life and doings of Gideon, Samson, and the rest. We shall only be side-tracked from our theme if we stay to discuss the problem of Jeptha's daughter, and it would take a volume adequately to deal with the faith of David and the prophets. Nevertheless the very mention of these names impresses upon the mind the length of the list of witnesses to faith found in the Word; but we pass on, with the apostle, to consider his own summary. He gives an impressive list of witnesses, the first set being the positive acts of faith, and the second, faith's endurance. The very tabulation of these acts of faith is solemnizing.

Eleven positive acts of faith.

A | Subdued kingdoms.
B | Wrought righteousness.
C | Obtained promises.
D | Stopped the mouths of lions.
E | Quenched the violence of fire.
F | Escaped the edge of the sword.
G | Were made strong out of weakness.
H | Waxed valiant in fight.
I | Turned to flight the armies of the aliens.
J | Women received their dead raised to life again.
K | Others were tortured, not accepting deliverance.
That they might obtain a BETTER resurrection.

Eleven negative acts of faith.

A | Others had trial of cruel mockings and scourgings.
B | Of bonds and imprisonment.
C | They were stoned.
D | They were sawn asunder.
E | They were tempted.
F | They were slain with the sword.
G | They wandered about in sheepskins and goatskins.
H | Being destitute.
I | Afflicted.
J | Tormented.
K | They wandered in deserts, in mountains,
in dens and in caves of the earth.
God having provided some BETTER thing for us.

Without attempting that which the epistle sets aside as beyond the scope of the eleventh chapter, we can point out some obvious connections in these lists with the seven names given in verse 32. David subdued kingdoms, as Moab, Ammon, and Edom. The note of triumphant faith is sounded by him in Psa. lx.: "God hath spoken in His holiness; I will rejoice . . . . . Moab is my washpot; over Edom will I cast out my shoe

. . . . Through God we shall do valiantly". God had spoken; that was the basis of David's triumphant faith.

Gideon supplies us with a wonderful example of weakness being made strong, and of turning to flight the armies of the aliens. When we read of the stopping of the mouths of lions and the quenching of the violence of fire, it is difficult to deny a reference to Daniel and his three companions. The women who received their dead raised to life must include the widow of Zarephath (I Kings xvii. 22-24), and the Shunammite (II Kings iv. 36).

The better resurrection.

We now come to the crux of the passage. By consulting the arrangement of the subject-matter set out above, it will be seen that "the better resurrection" and "some better thing" are focal points.

What is the better resurrection, and how does it harmonize with the balancing clause, "some better thing", the teaching of Heb. xi. in particular, and of the epistle in general? It is sometimes said of the articles in The Berean Expositor, that they are somewhat condensed in character, but lest any should fail to realize what has been suggested as our line of study, we will repeat ourselves in more formal fashion.

This "better" resurrection evidently has something to do with the "better" thing provided by God. We must endeavour first to see what this connection may be, then what the relation of this passage is to the teaching of the eleventh chapter as a whole and finally how far the teaching concerning "the better resurrection" is supported by the general drift of the whole epistle.

The first thing we propose is to visualize the whole context with these "better" things in view.

Hebrews x. 19 - xii. 25.

A | x. 19-24. Exhortation. "Let us." Priest.
B | x. 25, 26. Warning "No more sacrifice".
C | x. 27-31. He that despised Moses' law died without mercy, how much more . . . . .
D | x. 32 - xi. 40. Faith, and the better thing.
A | xii. 1-4. Exhortation. "Let us." Perfected.
B | xii. 5-24. Warning "He found no place of repentance".
C | xii. 25. They escaped not who refused Him that spake on earth, much more . . . . .

Such is the broad outline, making x. 19 - xii. 25 one large section. This will be useful as we proceed, but for the time being we are more concerned about the relation of the subject-matter with Heb. xi., viz., "faith" and the "better thing".

We accordingly amplify the member D | x. 32 - xi. 40, setting it out as follows:

Faith and the better things (x. 32 - xi. 40).

A1 | x. 32-39. The better substance in heaven.
B1 | xi. 1-12. Faith. Abel's offering and others.
A2 | xi. 13-16. The better and heavenly country.
B2 | xi. 17-35. Faith. Abraham's offering and others.
A3 | xi. 35. The better resurrection.
B3 | xi. 36-38. Faith. Unnamed believers and their sufferings.
A4 | xi. 39, 40. The better thing foreseen.

The section (x. 19 - xii. 25) begins with exhortations in view of what Christ has done, "Let us draw near", "Let us hold fast". It ends with fuller exhortations in view of what Christ has done, "Let us lay aside", "Let us run". Christ's sufferings and death have, in the first case, consecrated for us a way into the holiest, and in the second set us an example for the race and the crown. In the first He is seen as Expiator, in the second as Exemplar. He is first Priest, then Perfecter.

The remainder of the structure is an alternation between faith and the better thing. There are four descriptions of this better thing which we must consider:

(1) The better and enduring SUBSTANCE in heaven.
(2) The better and heavenly COUNTRY.
(3) The better RESURRECTION.
(4) The better THING provided.

It is evident from the context of the first passage that the better substance is something in the nature of a reward. This is implied in the list of sufferings given in Heb. x. 32-34, and expressly stated in the sequel: "Cast not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward" (x. 35), a feature that is repeated in xi. 26, and in a similar context.

The second passage sets before us something which the patriarchs had in view that enabled them to be content to become strangers and pilgrims on the earth: "Now they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God; for He hath prepared for them a city" (xi. 16). This city is the "city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem", of Heb. xi. 22, closely associated with the spirits of just men made perfect, and the portion, not of sons merely, but of the firstborn, which we shall see as we read this chapter.

There is nothing said in the Old Testament about this heavenly country and city so far as Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are concerned, yet they had it in view, and when Scripture says: "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off . . . . . and embraced them" (xi. 13); it is but saying what in other language is expressed in the two remaining occurrences, namely, resurrection and future entry.

"These all died in faith", implies resurrection. "Having seen them afar off" implies "having foreseen some better thing".

The better resurrection is something distinct. Because of it and its excellence some endured torture and refused deliverance. Now it was the hope of the whole twelve tribes that there should be a resurrection (Acts xxvi. 7, 8) quite apart from torture or endurance, quite apart from "giving up" and acting like Abraham or Moses. We are here facing a parallel with the "out-resurrection" of Phil. iii., which is not the hope but the prize of our high calling, and closely involved with "perfecting", "perdition" and the heavenly citizenship of Phil. iii. 12, 19 and 20; "destruction" being the same word as "perdition" in Heb. x. 39, and "conversation" being literally "citizenship". The long waiting, the far-off promises, the dying without receiving, are all explained by the fact that God had planned that all these overcomers should enter their reward together. Abel and Noah, Abraham and Moses, the suffering saints of the apostle's day, and the last one to endure under the economy of grace pertaining to the Hebrews, shall not "prevent" one another, but "together with them" shall enter into this better thing, this better country, by way of this better resurrection.

We have seen the relation between the better resurrection and the better thing, we have seen their relation with Heb. xi.; there remains only the general theme of the epistle to be considered. In this epistle we have Christ as a Captain, leading faithful Joshuas and Calebs unto their promised possessions. In this epistle He is seen as Melchisedec the Priest Who blessed the overcoming Abraham. The historic background is the failure of Israel to go on by faith, and the warning is the possibility of drawing back to perdition. The Hebrew believers are exhorted to run with patience, and reminded of Esau. Their position is to be one of rejection now, "without the camp", for theirs is soon to be the added glory of the overcomer, because though they have no continuing city, they seek one to come.

Ponder the double line of endurance (verses 32-38) and set your mind on things above where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God.

The seven-fold witness.

We believe it will be of service to repeat the structure already given.

A | Faith in connection with DEATH—Abel and Enoch.
B | Faith in connection with INHERITANCE—Noah and Abraham.
C | Faith in connection with PILGRIMAGE—Isaac and Jacob.
D | Faith in connection with RESURRECTION—Sarah and Abraham.
C | Faith in connection with BLESSING—Isaac and Jacob.
B | Faith in connection with EGYPT—Joseph and Moses.
A | Faith in connection with DELIVERANCE—Israel and Rahab.

Faith in its perfectness is seen in but one Person, the Lord Jesus Christ, but we may appreciate that perfect faith better if we can see it analysed for us in the eleventh chapter of this epistle.

The Interpretation of the Scriptures.

No.1. Governing Principles for Correct Interpretation.

pp. 188 - 192

One of the most important subjects within the orbit of Christianity is the science and art of Biblical interpretation or hermeneutics. The word "hermeneutics" is ultimately derived from Hermes, the Greek god who was supposed to bring the messages of the gods to mortals, and was the god of science, speech, writing and art. It has a connection with the Greek word hermeneia, interpretation, and its verbal forms: diermeneuo to interpret, or explain; methermeneuomai to interpret, to translate; dusermeneutos difficult to interpret; diermeneutes interpreter.

God has spoken to men through the Holy Scriptures, but what has He said? What is the meaning of His Words? If we cannot be sure of His meaning, of what practical use are the Scriptures to us? How can we receive Divine understanding unless the meaning of the Word of God is clear to us? It is the aim of hermeneutics to ascertain what God has said in His Word and to determine its meaning. This is a high and holy task and needs to be approached in deep humility. Upon the correct interpretation of the Bible rests our doctrine of salvation, sanctification, Christian living and future hope, and it is our solemn responsibility to get to know what God has said with reference to each of these, and in fact all His Truth as far as we are able to receive it. Not only this, but if we do not know the correct method of Biblical interpretation, we shall confuse the voice of God with the voice of man. In every place where our interpretation is at fault, we have substituted the voice of man for the voice of God, and are getting error instead of truth. Most of the doctrinal variations and disagreements in Christendom are due to differences in interpretation. Thus it is practically impossible to over-estimate the importance of correct hermeneutics, for from this flows correct understanding.

After His resurrection, the Lord Jesus appeared to the two disciples on the road to Emmaus and in Luke xxiv. 27 we read:

> ". . . . . beginning at Moses and all the prophets, He expounded (interpreted, diermeneuo) unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself."

And later on, to the eleven He said:

> ". . . . . all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning Me. Then opened He their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures" (Luke xxiv. 44, 45).

It is helpful to see the important place that understanding has in the parables of the kingdom of heaven. Israel's unbelief and failure inevitably led to a non-understanding heart (Matt. xiii. 15), and in such a condition the human mind is especially open to the devil's activity (verse 19). He that received seed into the good ground is he that heard the word and understood it (verse 23).

At the end of His discourse, the Lord asks: "Have ye understood all these things?" and the favoured disciples were able to answer: "Yea Lord" (verse 51). In the Acts of the Apostles we find Philip asking the Ethiopian eunuch:

> "Understandest thou what thou readest?"

and his reply was: "How can I, except some man should guide me?" (Acts viii. 30, 31). There is no doubt that Divine understanding is the need of us all, but we are not in a position to receive this if our method of Biblical interpretation is at fault. We are prompted to ask the question, "Is there some way of interpreting the Word of God so that human opinion is ruled out and Divine understanding given?" We believe there is, hence the supreme importance of this study.

Someone may object and say that anything can be proved from the Bible. We have to face the fact that the most extraordinary ideas and fantastic notions are backed up by quotations from the Scriptures. Edward White writes:

> "There is no folly, no iniquity, no God-dishonouring theology for which chapter and verse may not be cited by an enslaved intelligence. Under these circumstance, it is impossible to express in adequate terms the importance of a correct estimate and exposition of the Bible" (Inspiration, p. 153).

There is no need to list the many vagaries that the Bible has been used to bolster up, but in each case these have been due to a distorted exposition and understanding of the passages concerned. No apology then need be given for a consideration of the science of correct interpretation of the Scriptures. To begin with we shall need to give attention to the following points:

(1) There is a need to bridge the gap between our minds today and the minds of the Biblical writers of over 1900 years ago. People of the same culture, age and location, understand one another easily, but we are separated culturally, historically and geographically from Bible times. Language is different; Hebrew, Chaldee and Greek are far removed from modern language. Habits and manner of living are entirely different. Abraham' s treatment of Hagar may seem rather shabby unless we know the customs and laws of his time. The background of the Scriptures is therefore important. Every part of Scripture had a reason for its being written. Some human need called it into being through the power of God. It is for us to try to ascertain what this was, and it will greatly assist us in the correct understanding of the portion under consideration.

(2) No one is in a position to interpret the Word of God (no matter how educated or scholarly they may be) until they are saved and regenerate. The Lord Jesus said, "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God (John iii. 3). In other words he is spiritually blind and is not in a position to understand or interpret the holy Scriptures whose context is spiritual. One reason why Christ continually gave physical sight to the blind was because this condition is illustrative of man spiritually, and what the Lord can do for men in the natural sphere, He can surely do in the spiritual.

The apostle Paul wrote:

> "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned" (I Cor. ii. 14).

A regenerate mind then is an absolute essential to understand the Bible.

(3) There must be a passion to know God's Word. A lukewarm heart will never discover Scriptural truth. The searcher must be in dead earnest; the search for Truth must be priority number one.

(4) There must be a reverence for God and His Word and an unquestioned faith in both. The Scriptures are called holy, and must be treated as such (II Tim. iii. 15).

(5) There must also be absolute dependence upon the Holy Spirit to enlighten. He is the Author of the Word and the only One Who can give opened eyes and an understanding mind. We should be careful not to confuse inspiration and illumination or enlightenment. We talk about works of art and beauty being inspired, but this is not the way the Bible uses the term. In the Biblical sense, inspiration finished when the canon of Scripture closed and the New Testament was complete. No other writings since this time are "God-breathed" or inspired in this way. What we need now is not inspiration but illumination, and this is what the Holy Spirit is prepared to give to those of the redeemed who honestly and painstakingly search the Word. This is something that education and cleverness, by themselves, cannot command. The profound scholar has no monopoly of enlightenment. In fact his scholarship and education may be a bar to the discovery of truth if he is not a humble believer in Christ, and willing to give his education second place to the revealing power of the Spirit of God. There is one further thing that must be stressed here and that is that Divine illumination goes as far as Scripture reveals, not beyond it. Angus and Green write:

> "The Spirit of God does not communicate to the human mind any doctrine or meaning of Scripture which is not contained already in Scripture itself. He makes men wise up to what is written, not beyond it."

(6) To be a sound interpreter of the Scriptures a knowledge of the original languages God used is invaluable. Basic doctrine cannot be settled from translations, however good they are, if only for the reason that no translation can fully represent all that the original contains. We should be surprised if one who claimed to be a specialist in the interpretation of Greek tragedy could not read Greek. This may stimulate some who read these words to commence the study of Greek and Hebrew, which would be a good thing. Such however should bear in mind that it takes more than a few months study to be in a position to lay down the law in the translation and interpretation of the Greek or Hebrew Scriptures. No one can be proficient in a language until they can write it as well as read it, and that is why composition plays such an important part in learning a language. A little knowledge can be a dangerous thing, and we have seen bad slips in doctrine made by amateur Greek students.

(7) If there is one statement that is fundamental to the understanding of the Bible it is this: God means what He says and has a meaning for everything He says in His Word. If this is not so, then all search is useless and we can never be sure of what He wishes to convey to us. To put it another way, we must approach the Bible from the literal stand-point. This word "literal" can be ambiguous. What do we mean by it? We can define it in this way: the customary, socially-acknowledged designation of a word is the literal meaning of that word. If we were to put our own special meaning on words, no one could understand us. This is surely obvious. But it does not mean that figures of speech, symbols, allegory and type are to be ignored or taken literally. These are a study in themselves and will be considered later on. But let it be said here that behind all figures of speech is literality, otherwise they could convey no certain meaning to us at all. The literal meaning of a word is the basic, customary meaning of that word, and therefore to interpret literally is nothing more or less than interpreting words in their normal customary and proper designation, and only in this way can divergences of opinion be eliminated, and the authority of Scripture honoured.

When we read a book, we presume the sense is literal, for this is the only conceivable method of communication. If we had to weigh over every word of a book to find some other meaning than the literal, we should soon be forced to give it up in despair. If God wishes to communicate with man, He will do it in words whose meaning men can understand and accept, otherwise His message would never reach the human mind. Therefore we must ever keep before us this great guiding principle: that we approach the Scriptures literally, using that Word in the sense already explained. This cannot be overstressed and failure to do this is largely the cause of so much division that we see all around us in Christendom.

A large part of the Bible makes significant sense when literally interpreted. All the great basic doctrines of God's Word rest clearly on literal exposition. The historical books make sense only when so interpreted, and geographical terms likewise. The opposite of this is spiritualizing or the allegorical treatment of Scripture. This is not the same as making a spiritual application of a passage of Scripture or recognizing real allegories therein. This is legitimate. Rather is it treating the majority or the whole of the Bible in this way which is quite another matter. We shall have more to say about this later on. Meanwhile, let us thank the Lord that He has been pleased to stoop down to reveal His Truth to us in human words that we can receive and understand under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, and in consequence rejoice in the eternal riches contained therein.

No.2. The History of Interpretation.
pp. 211 - 215

Having seen that the only safe approach to Scripture is that of the literal, with due consideration being given to symbols, figures of speech and types, it may be helpful to give an outline of interpretation in the past, because this will show up wrong conceptions which have led to the misunderstanding of God's Word, and so will help to guard us against similar errors. To trace past interpretation in detail from Ezra's day right down to the present time would be an enormous task and not possible within the limits of The Berean Expositor. To those who wish to do so, we recommend Dean Farrar's History of Interpretation, which, in spite of his liberalism, is an outstanding work on this subject. Other volumes which may be consulted with profit are the Bible in the Church by R. M. Grant; Prophecy and Authority by K. Fullerton; The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages by B. Smalley.

The Greek School of Allegorism.

Inasmuch as the Greek allegorical method was adopted both by Jew and Christian at the beginning, it is necessary to commence here. The Greeks had a religious heritage in Homer and Hesiod. To question or doubt them was considered an irreligious or atheistic act. Yet the stories of the gods were often fanciful, absurd, or immoral, which was an offence to the philosophical mind. How was this tension to be resolved? The answer is, by allegorizing. The stories were not to be taken literally, but a secret underlying meaning was to be sought. The important thing to notice is that this Greek allegorical method spread to Alexandria, where there was a large Jewish population and eventually a Christian population of considerable size. The Alexandrian Jew was bound to face up to Greek philosophical tradition which held sway there, especially that of Plato, and for him the problem was to reconcile this with his own national Scriptures (the Old Testament). His solution was identical with the Greek. Dean Farrar writes:

> "The Alexandrian Jews were not, however, driven to invent the allegorical method for themselves. They found it ready to their hands" (History of Interpretation, p. 134).

He continues on page 135:

> "By a singular concurrence of circumstances, the Homeric studies of pagan philosophers suggested first to the Jews and then through them to the Christians, a method of interpretation before unheard of, which remained unshaken for more than fifteen hundred years."

Apparently the first writer in this Jewish allegorical way was Aristobulus (B.C.160). He asserted that Greek philosophy borrowed from the Old Testament and that, by using the allegorical method, the teachings of Greek philosophy could be found in Moses and the prophets. The outstanding Jewish allegorist was Philo (about B.C.20-54A.D.). He had strong leanings toward the philosophy of Plato and Pythagoras. By an elaborate system of allegorizing, he reconciled his loyalty to his Hebrew faith and his regard for Greek philosophy. Philo did not regard the literal meaning of Scripture to be useless, but rather an immature level of understanding. He likened the literal sense of Scripture to its "body", and the allegorical to its "soul", the literal being for the immature and the allegorical for the mature. He had around twenty rules which indicated that a passage of Scripture was to be treated allegorically. A few of these were sound, but most of them led to interpretation that was fantastic and erroneous. Philo's conceptions are a good example of what happens when the grammatico-historical method of interpretation is abandoned. Spiritualizing becomes a slippery slope down which it is well nigh impossible to stop.

The Allegorism of the Fathers.

This system, which sprang from the pagan Greeks and was copied by the Alexandrian Jews, was then adopted by the professing church and largely dominated the interpretation of the Scriptures until the Reformation, with the exception of the school at Antioch and the Victorines of the Middle Ages. The apostolic Fathers had as their Bible the Septuagint, i.e. the Greek translation of the Old Testament. They saw that the Old Testament prefigured Christ in type and symbol, and that the New Testament was full of direct and indirect references to the Old Testament. In other words, they perceived that the Old Testament could never be fully understood apart from the New Testament. This they sought to emphasize by allegory and spiritualization. The motive was right, but the method wrong. What they apparently did not realize was that the New Testament is the commentary par excellence on the Old Testament and does not need any propping up by such methods, which only throw the door wide open to personal fancies and excesses.

There was a lack of historical sense in their method of exposition; they usually ignored the setting and background of a passage of Scripture. They considered the Scriptures to be full of enigmas and riddles which could only be satisfactorily explained by allegorisation. They confused the allegorical with the typical and thus blurred the correct interpretation of the Old Testament. They professed to see Greek philosophy in the Old Testament, and claimed that it was the allegorical method that discovered it. The pity of all this was that it obscured the true meaning of the Word of God. K. Fullerton writes:

> "When the historical sense of a passage is once abandoned there is wanting any sound regulative principle to govern exegesis . . . . . The mystical (allegorical) method of exegesis is an unscientific and arbitrary method, reduces the Bible to obscure enigmas, undermines the authority of all interpretation, and therefore, when taken by itself, fails to meet the apologetic necessities of the time" (Prophecy and Authority).

No wonder the Gnostics of the second century found this method so handy to propagate their false doctrine!

Roman Catholic Allegorism.

It is true to say that, for the most part, Scriptural interpretation of the Middle Ages was allegorical. The Roman Catholic Church has maintained the validity of the allegorical method, though there is evidence that later on, some of their scholars saw the excesses that resulted from this in Patristic theology, and were prepared to admit the importance of the literal meaning of Scripture. Roman Catholics accept the Latin Vulgate translation of Jerome as the authentic version for public lectures, disputations, sermons and expositions.

This church thus puts itself into the awkward position of basing its doctrines on a translation instead of the original languages of Hebrew, Chaldee and Greek. This is a great weakness, for no one translation, however good, can adequately set forth the truth of the original. Moreover the Roman Catholic expositor is forced to accept obediently whatever the church specifically decrees on the authorship of the books of the Bible, and some twenty verses have been officially interpreted and may not be deviated from. Actually the number is more than this, because many of the official documents require definite interpretations of certain verses. Roman Catholic exegesis became summed up during the Middle Ages in three rules:

(1) A passage may have an allegorical or mystical meaning.
(2) It may have an anagogical or eschatological meaning, that is, it may prefigure or anticipate the church in glory.
(3) It may have a tropological meaning, that is, teach a way of life, or in other words, convey the moral significance of the passage.

With its often excessive usage of types, the Roman Catholic diverges from the Protestant. Thus the manna in the wilderness, the passover, the bread and wine of Melchizedek are made types of the Eucharist, thus ignoring the controlling guide of New Testament usage. Such exposition can never be accepted by the honest searcher for truth. It is reading into Scripture what is not there, and is the fruit of the allegorical method of interpretation, which is used to bolster up this sacramental and sacerdotal approach to the Bible. Further, the Roman Catholic believes that to his church alone has been entrusted the Deposit of Truth in a two-fold form, (1) the oral form (tradition) and (2) the written form (the Scriptures), and this written form, the Bible, is obscure and needs an official interpreter, which must be the Church of Rome, to whom alone, he believes, it has been given by God. To him the oral tradition is of equal authority with the Word of God because he believes that both have come from God, and are complementary. Furthermore, no passage of Scripture can be interpreted to conflict with Roman Catholic doctrine. It is therefore obvious that the Protestant expositor is always at a disadvantage when disputing on doctrinal matters with a Roman Catholic. Whereas the former will take his stand solely on God's Word, the latter can always retreat and bring in his oral tradition, which he believes to be as much God's truth as the Bible. The more one studies the Roman Catholic position, the more one is thankful for the great liberating effect of the Reformation. Believers today have largely forgotten what they owe to God for this great movement: freedom of conscience, and approach to Him through the Lord Jesus Christ alone, and not through any human sacerdotal system with its inevitable bondage.

The Jewish Schools.

When Jerusalem was destroyed and the Jews taken into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar, they were separated from the Temple and its regulations, and could no longer practice their religion as outlined in the books of Moses. This state of things finally led to Judaism with its synagogues, rabbis and traditions. The vast system of Jewish interpretation that resulted is a separate study in itself, and it is practically impossible to sum it up adequately. Various schools emerged with opposing ideas. The Karaites were the literalists and the Kabbalists the allegorists. The Palestinian Jews of post-captivity days started off well with a literal approach to the Scriptures, but they often failed to put into practice the rules they laid down. In Kabbalism excessive literalism was allied to allegorism with grotesque results. They used gematria to endow words with numerical values which became the basis for interpretation that was absurd or pernicious.

While we believe that certain numbers are used in Scripture with intent, such as 6, 7, 12, 13, 40 and so on, we need to take warning and keep this under control. We have seen some extraordinary interpretations of Scripture result from those with a mathematical inclination who have let their minds run riot along these lines.

The Syrian School of Antioch.

It has been asserted that the first Protestant school of interpretation commenced at Antioch of Syria, and had it not been crushed by orthodoxy for its supposed heretical connection with the Nestorians, the course of church history might have been very different. It produced such prominent names as Lucian, Dorotheus, Diodorus, Theodore of Mopsuestia and Chrysostom. This school fought the allegorists and maintained the importance of the literal and historical interpretation of the Word of God. They insisted on the reality of Old Testament events, and accused the allegorists of doing away with the historicity of much of the Old Testament, and leaving behind a shadowy world of symbols. Their approach to the Bible was Christological, and they rightly blended together the historic and Messianic elements of the Scriptures. The result was that they produced some of the finest expository literature of ancient times. R. W. Grant points out that this school had a great influence in the Middle Ages and became the pillar of the Reformation and their method the principal exegetical method of the Christian Church.

Another interesting school was that of the Victorines which came into being at the Abbey of St. Victor in Paris in the medieval period. They likewise stressed the historical and literal approach to the Scriptures. They insisted that the spiritual sense could not be properly known until the Scriptures had been literally interpreted.

We have considered some of the essential rules to be observed if we are to get a correct interpretation of the Word of God. One of the most important is that we should approach the Scriptures from the literal standpoint, making allowances for figures of speech, symbols, and types, and avoiding the allegorical system of spiritualizing, which is destructive of true understanding, we should note that this does not mean spiritual application cannot be made. This can be done safely only when the primary, basic and literal interpretation of the Bible has been settled. There is only one interpretation of a passage of Scripture, but there may be a number of applications of that passage; these are secondary to the interpretation and must be kept so. Roman Catholics find their sacramentalism by allegorical interpretation of the Old Testament and its ritual. Christian Science, Swedenborgianism, Theosophy and other cults can find their basis in the Bible only by excessive spiritualizing and all this leads to hopeless contradiction. Why? Because first account has not been given to the literal exposition of Scripture. To rest one's theology on a secondary meaning of the Bible is not interpretation, but imagination, and human opinion, and in such a procedure the real meaning of God's Word is bound to be lost. The only certain way of obtaining a correct understanding is to anchor interpretation to literal exposition in the sense that we have explained the word "literal". Another reason for the importance of this method is that it acts as a check upon the imagination of men; in other words, it is a principle of control, which enables human opinion and error to be avoided. The failure of the spiritualizing or allegorical method of exposition was made evident in the first centuries, when the early Christians sought to take a stand against antichristian Gnosticism. The Gnostics claimed to have special knowledge and revelation, and when they touched the N.T. Scriptures they excessively spiritualized them. Unfortunately, the early Fathers, men of piety, and sincere as they were, did the same with the Old Testament, and therefore had little effective answer to such heresy, for the Gnostics had as much right to spiritualize the New Testament as the Fathers did the Old. What was right for one part of Scripture was surely valid for another. The fact is that with both, the method of approach was wrong.

Cultural Background.

We mean by this the total ways, manners, tools and institutions by which a people carry on their existence. What a word or expression literally means can only be understood by knowing the background of the people who used it. We are not concerned with what a word means today in the twentieth century, but what it meant in century one, when it was used. Language is always in a state of flux, losing meanings and gaining others, and so we should be prepared to take the trouble to go into past history and explore the background of Bible times.

Geography.

The seeker after truth should study Bible geography. Most Bibles have maps at the end, but how often are they used? Geography is, as it were, the spatial background of Scripture as history is its temporal one. In order to understand properly the journey of the Israelites from Egypt to Canaan or, let us say, Paul's missionary journeys, we obviously cannot ignore geography if we are to appreciate fully their importance. We read in the Bible of Tyre, Sidon, Chittim, Hamath, Anathoth and a host of other places. If we know nothing of Bible geography, how can we correctly understand the passages where these are used? And moreover, these places must be taken literally. If the Egypt of Bible times is not the literal land, what is it? Who can be sure of what it represents? Once one has left the normal literal meaning of a word, the door is thrown wide open to any idea, however far-fetched, and uncertainty and error can only result. God's revelation is set in an historical and geographical context, and involves historic personages and events.

H. H. Rowley writes:

> "A religion which is rooted and grounded in history, cannot ignore history. A historical understanding of the Bible is not a superfluity which can be dispensed with in Biblical interpretation, leaving a body of ideas and principles divorced from the process out of which they were born" (Relevance of Biblical Interpretation).

Moreover, not only the understanding of the Scriptures, but their truth, is bound up with history. If it could be proved that Pontius Pilate was not a historic personage, the truth of the Bible falls to the ground. Another thing must be stressed in the matter of interpretation and that is, the priority of the original languages of Hebrew, Chaldee and Greek. Inspiration in the Biblical sense applies only to these, and does not extend to the hundreds of translations that have been made, however good they may be. Consequently it is useless to base any argument on a translation without verifying the original.

The Accommodation of Revelation.

It must be constantly borne in mind that the Scriptures are the truth of God accommodated to the human mind for its instruction and assimilation. This must be so, because God, infinite and limitless, is seeking to reveal Himself to man, circumscribed and finite. Humanity cannot reach up to Him, but He can, in His goodness and love stoop down to us, and this is what He has done in His Word. To have any meaning to us, God's revelation had to come in human language and human thought forms, referring to objects of human experience. Revelation for us must of necessity have an anthropomorphic character. Anthropomorphism simply means ascribing human characteristics to God. The understanding of God and the spiritual world is by this means and by analogy. So we have God's almightiness spoken of in terms of a right arm, because among men, the right arm is the symbol of strength and power. Similarly the glory of heavenly things is described in the Bible in terms of human experience, such as gold, silver and jewels. Such is the description of the heavenly New Jerusalem in the book of the Revelation. Seisenberger, in his Practical Handbook for the study of the Bible, puts it this way:

> "It is with a well-considered design that the Holy Scriptures speak of God as a being resembling man, and ascribe to Him a face, eyes, ears, mouth, hands and feet, and the sense of smell and hearing. This is done out of consideration for man's limited power of comprehension and the same is the case when the Bible represents God as loving or hating, as being jealous, angry, glad, or filled with regret. This shows that God is not indifferent to man, and his behaviour, but notices them well. Moreover the Bible teaches that man was made in the image and likeness of God, and therefore in the Divine Being there must be something analogous to the qualities of man, though in highest perfection and sin excepted."

When we study the Scriptures we must always bear these facts in mind and remember that, in them, God has graciously stooped down to our limited intelligence, using things that we do know, to explain in a measure those that we do not, because they are infinite and beyond us.

This accommodation is very different from the way that the liberal theologian uses the term. The modernistic critic not only believes in accommodation of form, but of matter and content. Thus he asserts that the atonement of Christ, as a sacrifice, was only the manner in which the first century Christians thought of the death of Christ, but this idea is not binding upon Christianity today. In other words the sacrificial element in Christ's death was only the opinion of the early Christians. This sort of accommodation we utterly reject. We might as well shut the Bible up for good if this sort of thing is true, for we could never be sure just what is, or what is not divine revelation.

Interpretation and Application.

Although Scripture basically has one meaning, there are moral applications that can be made. The apostle Paul wrote:

> ". . . . . whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope" (Rom. xv. 4).

That is, the Old Testament Scriptures, though primarily referring to Israel, can have a message for us. The strict interpretation of them is to the Jew, but there are principles in them that can apply to us today. In another passage (I Cor. x. 6, 11), Paul states that the things which happened to the Israelites during their wilderness journey were for our examples, and in II Tim. iii. 16 we are instructed that all Scripture (and this has primary reference to the Old Testament) is for our profit with regard to doctrine, reproof, correction and education in righteousness. However, we must always bear in mind that such applications are not interpretations, and must not receive that status; nor must we ever misinterpret a passage in order to derive an application from it that appears attractive to us. Furthermore a true application can be made only if it fits in with revealed truth for this present age of grace; if it does not, it becomes error, however appealing it may appear.

In the Anglican morning service, the congregation quote Psa. li. 11, as a prayer: "Take not Thy Holy Spirit from me." That is wrong application, John xiv. 16 makes clear:

> "And I will pray the Father, and He shall give you another Comforter, that He may abide with you for ever."

The Holy Spirit can be grieved by the believer (Eph. iv. 30), but there is no statement in the church epistles that He is ever taken away from the children of God. Such praying, Sunday by Sunday, is needless and quite ineffective. The first thing to do with any passage of Scripture is to settle the interpretation, or its basic meaning, and not until then are we in a position to make any application.

Todd, in his Principles of Interpretation writes :

> "Only after the meaning or interpretation of a passage has been learned is one in a position to apply it to the life of an individual or of a company. The application is quite a distinct thing from the interpretation. Much has been lost in the study of the Bible by using it almost entirely by way of application, without enquiring into its literal meaning. Specially is this true of devotional study. Sometimes lessons are drawn from Scripture which are, to say the least, very far fetched, and not really warranted by the passage."

We can therefore state as a guiding principle that there is one interpretation of God's Word, but there may be several applications. It is most important to keep these two things distinct and in this order, and in so doing it becomes another check on human ideas and peculiarities. The correct interpretation of the Bible takes note of the people to whom it is addressed, and the background or need that called for its writing. It is like the address on the envelope of a letter. The contents of the letter belong solely to the one to whom it is addressed (this is interpretation), but it may contain statements that are not only true of the owner, but of people in general (this is application). The failure to distinguish between these two things has been the cause of wrong doctrine and confusion, and everyone who wishes to handle the Word of God aright and to receive its riches will take care to avoid doing this.

Meditations on Psalm LI

No.10(?). The Historical Setting of the Psalm.
pp. 139, 140

While the Psalms have their primary interpretation and dispensational setting which must ever be the first and fundamental approach to their study, there is something so personal, so true to the experience of believers in all ages, that it is not surprising to find in the record of the N.T. itself continual reference, quotation and application of the Psalms, from Matthew's Gospel to the Book of the Revelation. Even where the actual quotation of any specific Psalm already written in the O.T. is not applicable, the spirit or Psalmody will be found. Consequently, though Paul when writing to the Ephesians or the Colossians does not say 'as David said', or 'as it is written in the book of Psalms', he nevertheless includes the singing of the Psalms as a real part of that melody of grateful worship which flows from the heart of those who being 'filled by the Spirit' (Eph. v. 18) and in whom 'the word of Christ' dwells richly (Col. iii. 16), sing with grace in their hearts to the Lord.

In the course of our exposition of the Scriptures under the heading 'Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth' we had hoped to deal with the Psalms as a whole. In this article we have a lowlier aim, yet we trust none the less blessed and helpful. We desire to ponder the experiences that are recorded by David in Psa. li. in order that we may gather comfort and encouragement as we too, walk through the wilderness of this world.

The way in which this Psalm is printed in our A.V., has in effect blotted out the first verse of the original and relegated it to a note, which is practically never read or understood as an integral part of the Psalm. When I open my Hebrew Bible, I discover that the verse numbers do not agree with those in the English Version, and that the words:

> "When Nathan the prophet came unto him, after he had gone in to Bath-sheba", constitute the opening verse of the Psalm.

Hengstenberg says, "We swim in mid-air so long as we do not perceive the reference to the discourse of Nathan". We must therefore acquaint ourselves with that passage of II Samuel which records the occasion when Nathan the prophet became instrumental in bringing about the repentance of David the king. The passage is II Samuel xii., which follows close upon the record of the death of Uriah at the instigation of David, and upon David's taking of Bathsheba, Uriah's wife. II Sam. xii. 1-14 tells us how Nathan, by means of the parable of the two men, the one rich, the other poor, led David to condemn himself by saying, "As the Lord liveth, the man that hath done this thing shall surely die" (II Sam. xii. 5), and reveals the dramatic moment of David's conviction as Nathan replied to David's outburst of righteous anger, "Thou art the man . . . . . Thou hast killed Uriah the Hittite with the sword, and hast taken his wife" (II Sam. xii. 7-9).

David's reply is one for which we must all be glad, for what added tragedy might not have accrued had David not repented:

> "And David said unto Nathan, I have sinned against the Lord."

In response to this confession came the words of forgiveness:

> "The Lord also hath put away thy sin; thou shalt not die."

David, however, held too high a position in Israel for his sin to have no consequences. His sin was put away, he was assured that he would not die as a penalty, yet Nathan added:

> "Howbeit, because of this deed thou hast given great occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, the child also that is born unto thee shall surely die" (II Sam. xii. 13, 14).

Such is the background of Psa. li. David, the man after God's own heart, the Shepherd of Israel, the sweet singer of Israel, the glowing type of the Saviour, the one who gives his name as a title of the Christ 'The Son of David', this royal man, this great king, this intrepid warrior, is revealed as guilty of the sins of adultery and murder! The bearing of these great facts upon the doctrine and practice of all ages is contained in Psa. li. and we trust that meditation upon so profound a theme will minister true spiritual grace to not a few.

On the Threshold

p. 20

"Wherefore we labour, that . . . . . we may be accepted of Him" (II Cor. v. 9).

The first nine verses of this chapter are very much misunderstood, briefly, the Apostle does not desire death, but resurrection, not to be unclothed but clothed upon, that mortality may be swallowed up of life. Paul, however, is no dreamer; much as "that day" attracts him, he has the present pressing upon him, just as in a similarly difficult and perverted passage Phil. i. 22-26, where although he desires the "return" translated "depart", yet if that cannot be, he will gladly labour and suffer here. In our verse the word "labour" literally means, "we love the honour", or are "ambitious". The Apostle uses it again elsewhere "ambitious to preach the gospel in the regions beyond", and to the saints he wrote, "be ambitious to be quiet and mind your own business" (Rom. xv. 20; I Thess. iv. 11). Surely it should be the ambition of every saved one, that, when in resurrection glory they stand before the Lord Jesus, they should be accepted, not with regard to salvation, but service. The word "accept" occurs in Rom. xii. 1, 2; "acceptable" xiv. 18; Eph. v. 10; Col. iii. 20: "well pleasing" Titus ii. 9; Heb. xi. 5, 6; xii. 28; xiii. 16, 21. If these passages are prayerfully considered, they may be of help in really understanding our verse.

On the Threshold

pp. 99, 100

"If any man will come after Me, let him . . . . . take up his cross and follow Me" (Matt. xvi. 24).

There is an important omission in the verse as quoted above. Before the statement to taking up the cross, comes the injunction to "deny self". As in all things, we must begin at home. Little things indicate the direction of the current. Both the actions are voluntary. Let him deny himself, and take up his cross. There is much talk of following the Lord amongst us, but where is either the denying of self or the taking up of the cross? It is noticeable that this statement comes in the section which speaks of Christ's sufferings, (Matt. xvi. 21), and glory (verse 27 and xvii. 1-3). The denial and the cross are but for a time; glory is ahead, and as Christ has suffered in our stead, no wrath can be ours. Our cross is not the curse of a broken law. Phil. iii. 1-12 seems to give a similar thought, the denial of self, counting all things as loss and the fellowship of His sufferings, with resurrection in view. May we not "follow afar off" as Peter did who denied his Lord, but follow closely by denying self.

"That ye may be sincere and without offence till the day of Christ; being filled with the fruits of righteousness" (Phil. i. 10, 11).

In verse 9, abounding love leading to knowledge and judgment and discernment, leads right on to the day of Christ, when we shall stand before Him. We know that so far as our eternal salvation is concerned, we shall be without blemish (Eph. v. 27 & Phil. i. 6). Phil. i. 6 says what the Lord will do until the day of Christ comes but i. 10, 11, what we are to seek to be till that day. The word translated 'sincere' means 'tested by sunlight'; our every action and thought will be laid bare. Oh to remember this! The word is suggestive; it teaches us to avoid any appearance of sham, all must be genuine to please the Lord. "Without offence." This includes two things: (1) that we shall be able to stand before the Lord, and receive His "well done", and (2) that we have not caused our brethren to stumble. How difficult is the path, and how can we even commence this life of consistency? Verse 11 gives an answer—filled with the fruits of righteousness. We, as Christians, have reckoned to us the righteousness of God through Christ, and this secures our entrance into the joys of eternity, but to be rewarded, not to be ashamed, to avoid suffering loss with regard to the Judgment Seat, sincerity and fruitfulness are required. Note it is the "fruits" of righteousness. Blessed be God, He has planted the tree. May we not hinder the bringing forth of much fruit (Eph. ii. 10; Hosea xiv. 8 "From Me is thy fruit found").

We wish to write about the greatest Book in the world. We wonder what your estimate would be; what do you think is the greatest book in the world? The answer is surely the Bible. We realize, of course, that people regard the Bible in all sorts of ways. Some think it is dry and boring and uninteresting so they never read it. Others say it is quite incomprehensible if you do read it, that nobody can really understand it, so they do not read it either. And yet there are people who find this book intensely fascinating, the most interesting and vital of all books. And not only that, but in past history some have even been willing to die for it and have given their lives gladly! There must be something about this Book then, that makes it absolutely outstanding. We want to give this a further consideration.

The Bible took something like 2,000 years to write, and since its completion nearly another 2,000 years have gone by, yet it is not only still here but is the world's best seller. That is an extraordinary fact, but it is true. The next thing to note is this, that it is the Textbook of the Christian profession. Now every profession has its textbook, one or more, and of course, if anyone wants to be proficient in their particular profession then they must have the textbook or books at their fingertips; they cannot afford to ignore them. Without doubt, the Bible is the textbook for all who profess the Name of Christ. If we are at all interested in Christianity, or if we are searching for truth (and we believe many are), then we just cannot ignore the Bible, if only for the reason that Christianity means Christ. If we could sanction the pronunciation of it as "Christ-ianity" and the word "Christian as "Christ-ian", it would be a very good thing, because it would remind us that a Christian obviously is related to Christ, and yet how often is that word used without Christ personally being thought about. There is something radically wrong with this. Christianity must relate to Christ. Now the only book that makes Christ known is the Bible. If we have a closed Bible we shall never know anything about the Lord Jesus Christ: and that is why all the various denominations, the churches and the chapels, must finally come to terms with this Book. This does not mean to say, of course, that they all interpret it in the same way or put the same value upon it, but they certainly cannot afford to ignore the Bible. It makes stupendous claims, and one of the most stupendous is this, that it is the Word of God although it was written by the pens of men. In the O.T., those who gave it spoke with Divine authority and they could say "Thus saith the Lord". If only we had a revelation like that today, if only people could speak in this way! Should we not have something secure to rest our faith on? This is the greatest need of our age; we need authority, we need something secure upon which we can place our faith and that is exactly what the Bible was to the early Christians.

The Apostle Paul, when he reached the end of his life, penned his last letter, the second Epistle to Timothy, and in the third chapter he wrote, "And from a child thou hast known the holy Writings (the holy Scriptures), which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus. All scripture is given by inspiration of God", literally, all scripture, all that which is written, is "God-breathed". Human beings were using the pen and yet Paul made the astounding assertion that the breath of God was on all their writings. And so Scripture is not just the writings or opinions of men, but the very Word of God and is "profitable for doctrine (for teaching), for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly, or thoroughly furnished unto all good works". At the end of his life another great Apostle wrote in similar vein. That was the Apostle Peter, and in his second letter, chapter i. 19 and 20, he writes: "We have also a more sure word of prophecy; unto which you do well to take heed as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day star arise in your hearts. Knowing this first, that no prophecy of the scripture is of any private interpretation", literally—it does not unfold itself. "For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost". You will notice that the Apostle Paul has mentioned God's Word "written", "all scripture is given by inspiration". The Apostle Peter deals with speech, "holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost". So both these faithful servants of God stress these two great truths at the end of their lives, and men of character do not trifle at such a time. So this Book then is a unique Book; and it makes unique claims. These claims are so startling they either must be true or else they are just fabrications and not worthy of our consideration. There cannot be any middle position here; it must be one or the other.

We want you to consider some more facts concerning this book we call the Bible. Think of its unity; it took something like 2,000 years to write, and what a diversity of people were used to write it! They were not educated people only. One writer was a cattle-keeper, a herds-man—Amos. Others were simple fishermen, like Peter and John. There were, of course scholars, such as the Apostle Paul. He sat at the feet of a noted teacher, Gamaliel, and his home town was Tarsus whose University which was a very well-known centre of learning in his day. Two kings were used, Solomon and David. Now will you think of a book that took 2,000 years to write, all sorts of people from the highest to the lowest making a contribution to it. What sort of book do you think it would be when completed? Would it not be a 'hotch-potch'? Could you expect it to have a complete unity, with a complete theme running through it? But that is what you will find with the Bible. It is an astounding fact, but it is true!

Another point we do well to consider: the Apostle Peter has already told us that we have "a more sure word of prophecy", and some parts of the Bible are prophetic, that is to say, they are looking ahead to the future. Peter describes them as "a light that shines in a dark place". This is like a searchlight piercing the darkness and picking out, infallibly, things ahead, perhaps a long distance away. Some may say such prophecies are just guesswork, but this is very foolish because, mathematically, it can be proved that these things, described with such exactitude, could not have happened by chance. Let us think of this for a moment. We know as a historical fact that the Lord Jesus Christ was born at Bethlehem, yet that had been written centuries before by one of the minor prophets, Micah, and Bethlehem, he tells us, was so small it was least of the thousands of Judah; in its district it was smallest, the least-known. When Joshua made a survey of the land centuries before, it was not even mentioned. And yet out of that obscure place, that tiny village, came the Lord Jesus Christ, the One who would be "the Governor of My people Israel", whose goings forth have been from everlasting". How did Micah know this, centuries before, infallibly pin-pointing the place? When you read Psa. xxii. you have there a graphic description of death by crucifixion, but death by crucifixion was not practiced by the Jews in David's day.

Not only that, but do you realize that in the twenty-four hours leading up to the crucifixion, there were at least thirteen prophecies, written in the O.T. centuries before, and fulfill to the last letter on that day? The O.T. definitely stated that His disciples were to forsake Him, and the N.T. tells us that this was a fact "His disciples forsook Him and fled". Then the O.T. had foretold us that He was to be dumb before His accusers—so He was! It was stated there that He was to be wounded and bruised—and this was so from the terrible lashings and scourgings that He underwent. The O.T. foretold that His hands and His feet were to be pierced (Psa. xxii.), and they were so literally, and yet no bone of Him was to be broken. When the soldiers came to break the legs of the thieves crucified with the Lord, you may remember how they hesitated and stopped when they came to the Lord Jesus Christ. What made them stop do you think? Did these Roman soldiers know anything about what had been written in the O.T. centuries before? Certainly not! but God had written it and God saw to it that His Word was fulfilled to the letter "not a bone of Him shall be broken".

Then it was stated that He was to be crucified with thieves; so He was, one on either side of Him. He was to pray for His persecutors, and so He did: "Father, forgive them for they know not what they do." The people were to come to mock and ridicule Him, so they did, the leaders especially! "Let Him now come down from the cross, He can save others let Him save Himself", that is what He had thrown in His teeth by them. And then the O.T. foretold that they were to cast lots for His coat. It was evidently a coat of great value; all in one piece, we are told. The soldiers said, "Don't let us tear it; let us cast lots so that one has it in one whole piece". Did they realize that they were fulfilling Scripture that had been written centuries before? No, but they were! "They cast lots for my vesture", the O.T. had predicted. The very words which He cried on the cross had been written in Psa. xxii., "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me". He was to have gall and vinegar offered Him to drink and they did offer it to Him, literally. His side was to be pierced: instead of breaking His legs the soldiers pierced His side. And the O.T. had stated that He was to be buried in a rich man's tomb. Now we want to remind the reader that all these things were fulfilled literally in twenty-four hours, and they were all written hundreds of years before the event! One of those predictions thus fulfilled, would have been remarkable, but when one realizes that there were at least thirteen of them fulfilled to the letter it surely becomes overwhelming to any reasonable mind that here we have not just clever human guesswork, but the sure Word of God. Only God knows the future infallibly and only He could communicate these things to the O.T. writers, and that is exactly what we find happened.

Then consider the Bible's indestructibility, and of the opposition this Book has had. It has been well said that if any human book had had only a fraction of the opposition the Bible has received it would have been swept to oblivion. But this Book still flourishes in spite of atheists and opponents; it is the world's best seller! Note, also, how it marvelously endures translation. There are over one thousand translations of the Bible existing today, and when you translate from one language to another you are bound to lose something, yet in spite of this it still speaks with power and authority; it still has something supernatural in it that changes people's lives. What is it that this Book has that other books have not? Nothing less than God's infallible Truth, and the power of God to quicken into life.

Then think of the testimony of archaeology and the things that men have dug up from the earth. Has there been anything found to disprove the Bible? Never! Everything that has been dug up from the soil confirms its claims. Just one point we would like to bring to the reader. It used to be said that Moses could not have written the Pentateuch because writing was unknown in his time, but if you go to the British Museum you can see there the Tel-el-Amarna tablets which were unearthed by archaeologists and prove most definitely that writing was known a hundred years before Moses lived! Everything that is dug up from the earth confirms this fact—that the Bible is true.

The last thing we would mention, and this is really the most important, what was the witness of the Lord Jesus Christ? What was His attitude to the O.T. scriptures that existed in His day? There are many who profess and call themselves Christians—Christ-ians—followers of the Lord Jesus Christ. If we faithfully follow the Lord Jesus Christ, His attitude must be our attitude, otherwise we are not true Christ-ians. He said, as it is recorded in the fifth chapter of John, "Had ye believed Moses ye would have believed Me, for he wrote of Me". Mark you, this is the Lord Jesus Christ speaking and asserting that Moses, centuries before, wrote of Him. But how did Moses know about Christ in the O.T. days? But Christ said he did—"he wrote of Me". Furthermore, He added, "If you believe not his writings how shall ye believe My words?" If you cannot believe the first five books of the Bible written by Moses, He said, you certainly cannot believe Me. So you see the importance Christ puts on the Pentateuch. He also said this: "Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law till all be fulfilled (Matt. v. 18); not the smallest Hebrew letter, not the smallest crest on a letter, would pass unfulfilled, He said. On another occasion He sated, "the scripture cannot be broken". Still further, in John xvii., in the prayer to His Father in heaven, He declared, "Thy Word is truth". There are people who say that when the Lord Jesus walked the earth He accepted the current Jewish notions of His time; some of them were mistaken, they tell us. But in resurrection with no such limitations, He declared (Luke xxiv. 44), "All things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, in the Prophets and in the Psalms concerning Me". This was the three-fold division of the O.T., and the Lord underlines its truth. You will not find one incident or one saying of Christ which belittles the O.T. scriptures or suggests they were wrong in any way whatever; rather His approach was always with reverence and giving them their proper place as the Word of God. If we profess, and call ourselves Christians, if we want truth, then our attitude must be His attitude. He said "I am the truth", so how could He mislead us over this? If He misled us in this matter He cannot be the truth—but this is impossible. He has set His seal upon the O.T. as being the Word of God, and what is true of the O.T. is surely true of the N.T. because they are interwoven. All evidence, then, shows that this book is what it claims to be—the very Word of God.

Now we are going to suggest to the reader that we search it together. This is surely the greatest of all quests—the search for truth. It may take trouble, it may take time, but surely it is worth it! Meanwhile may God give us His aid so that we may make great discoveries for ourselves as we read the Book which He calls His Word, and have the abiding assurance and peace that will surely follow.

No.2. pp. 34 - 37

In our last study together we were speaking about the Bible and were considering what a marvelous and unique Book this is. It has all sorts of features that lift it right out of the ordinary, and when we ponder them carefully and without any bias, we surely must come to the conclusion that it is what it claims to be—the very Word of God. And if it is the Word of God, then surely it is a sure basis for our trust, for our faith, for our hope. We have in it a sure foundation that we can rely on, and instead of looking around us for any sort of human source to place our faith upon, how much better to rest it on a Divine Foundation!

Now the next point we must consider is this: what did Christ come for? What need was there for the Lord Jesus Christ to ever come to this earth? Again, we are not going to pass on our opinions, or the opinions of anybody else; we bring before you what He Himself said was the purpose of His coming: "The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost" (Luke xix. 10). "I am come, a light into the world, that whosoever believeth on Me should not abide in darkness". "I came, not to judge the world, but to save the world" (John xii. 16, 17). Now if we think on these words, surely we can understand what the Lord meant! Christ came to dispel darkness and doubt and to give light; He came, not to condemn but to save. In another statement He said: "They that are whole", that means healthy, "need not a physician"; they do not need a doctor. You never go to the doctor when you are healthy or well, do you? But the Lord goes on to say "they that are sick". "I came", here is the expressed purpose, "not to call the righteous but sinners to repentance". So there is a sickness that men and women are suffering from; it is a terrible disease which is universal, that of sin and death. Some may not agree but at least they will have to acknowledge that death is universal. There is no one that is born into this world but that will have to face death and it makes no difference as regards rich or poor, high or low, this one event happens to all. Why did death come? Death is not a friend; it is an enemy, and the Bible says it is "the last enemy", and therefore it cannot spring from anything good; it can only come from something that is evil. God said to the first human beings, Adam and Eve: "In the day that you eat you shall surely die". The universality of death proves the universality of sin, if we will only face up to it. We must be absolutely honest here, otherwise, in our great quest for truth, we shall never get anywhere. It is silly to indulge in wishful thinking or try to gloss over and not face up to facts.

When the Saviour said "I come not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance" He is really describing me and He is describing you, and we hope the reader will not be offended by this statement. You may reply, "I am a good-living person; I am trying to do the very best I can and God cannot expect more than my best". We have to tell you that He does expect more than your best. God demands a hundred percent, and even if we do not like to admit that we are sinners, we shall all have to confess that not a single living person is absolutely perfect a hundred percent; perhaps some may get somewhere near it, but all fall short of such an exacting standard.

Why do we say that God demands a hundred percent? It is because in the great plan that is revealed in the Bible, He is working back to a restored and perfected creation, just in the way it started. When God created the universe, and we are told in Gen. i. 1, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth", the whole of it came from His hand as a work of absolute perfection, and then it was spoiled by sin and failure. Now God could do one of two things; He could either patch it up and make it better or, He could make a fresh start and make a new creation, a new heaven and a new earth spotless and perfect as the first, and that is what the Bible says He is going to do. And in that new heaven and new earth there will be a "hundred percent" beings—ninety-nine percent will not do. For that reason God cannot lower His standards, He can not have one sinner in it, or any blot whatsoever, otherwise His end will never be attained. It is not a question of doing our best; we cannot make ourselves utterly and absolutely spotless and sinless; we cannot make ourselves a hundred percent perfect. And because of that, the Lord Jesus Christ came to put away sin and death righteously, so that we can be a "hundred percent", if we will only accept Him, God's unspeakable gift, Who alone can give us the perfection we lack.

"I have come to call sinners to repentance", Christ said, the great need of every sinner is a Saviour. Can anyone save himself; can he be his own saviour, can other human beings be his saviour? No, the Bible says, "No man can redeem his brother or give to God a ransom for him". We cannot save or redeem anybody, not even our closest friend, however much we would like to be able to do so. If God had not come to our aid in the person of Christ, the future of all of us would be absolutely hopeless. We should be outside His perfect Kingdom for evermore. But let us note, the same Saviour said this: "I am the door; by Me, if any man enter in he shall be saved". He said, in effect, I am the entrance to this hundred percent state. If you have stepped through Me, like a door, you will have all you need—I will actually put you in the position of being perfect, spotless and complete.

Of course, one may try to by-pass God's way but, again, hear Christ's Word: "He that entereth not by the door", that is, through Himself and trusting what He has done for us on Calvary's cross, "but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber", and we have just seen that no imperfect being can ever get into God's new creation and spoil it: God can not and will not have sinners, thieves or robbers there. Again the Lord said: "I am the way, the truth and the life, no man cometh unto the Father except by Me." There is one way into God's perfect Kingdom and one way only, and it is through the Lord Jesus Christ. That is why He came to this earth to make this possible. He came to make the way open for sinners to step through by faith so that God could at last deal with their sins righteously and blot them out, the things that are separating them from Him and spoiling them from having any position whatsoever in this glorious creation at the end.

"God hath made Him", that is Christ, "to be sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him". He takes our sins, and in exchange we receive His righteousness or perfection. Now that is the very thing we want, and we must have if we are to be a "hundred percent". This righteousness is the complete thing; this is the "one hundred percent state" that must be ours if we are to have a place in the restored and spotless new heaven and earth to which God has done everything necessary for us—and this becomes our own possession as we simply take Him by faith or trust. Not only that, but we have the gift of eternal life and immortality: "The wages of sin" says the Epistle to the Romans "is death but, the free gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord"; so the moment we receive Christ, the moment we commit everything to this ever-living Saviour, we receive the certainty of eternal life. This is a fresh start; we become a new creation, old things have passed away, and we are now in a position, when we have received Him, to understand His truth. It is here where we have all got to "toe the line". It is useless to talk about the Bible and all the wonders therein if we have not made this necessary start with this new life and outlook. The unsaved cannot have spiritual understanding; such are not in a position to understand the Bible. This can only come through Christ as Saviour and the enlightenment of the Holy Spirit.

Christmas-time we know is the time for receiving gifts, but let us not forget that Christmas is really 'Christ-mas', the birth of Christ. We do this because of God's great Gift. His beloved Son. "Thanks be unto God for His unspeakable Gift." You do not try to earn gifts, do you? If you are given a present you take it thankfully; you surely do not spurn it and send it back, do you? What are you going to do with God's greatest Gift, the Lord Jesus Christ? are you going to ignore Him, refuse the Gift or will you take Him by faith? Do not forget that eternal life or eternal death hangs upon this. We trust that every reader will have the wisdom to stretch out the hand of faith, simply, like a child, and take Him as Saviour and sin-bearer. Just say: "Lord Jesus, I take you to be my own personal Saviour, to be the bearer of my sins, past, present, and future, and I look to you for all hope of immortality, eternal life, and all strength needed now at the present time to live as you would have me live." This is the experience we must all have if we are to go exploring together the wonders of revelation of God's Word and receive the Truth. Ahead of us there lie untold riches for us to discover and to explore together in the Bible. "He that hath the Son hath life, he that has not the Son of God hath not life." Which will you have—eternal life or death? Everlasting joys and riches beyond dreams—or perishing eternally? He is yours for the taking, for the trusting. "He that spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things?" (Rom. viii. 32).

No.3. pp. 54 - 57

In our last article we were writing about the necessary steps that must be taken if we are to go on with the great quest of getting to know God and His truth.

We must accept Christ as our personal Saviour and then the next thing to realize is that we are on a journey; we are going home to Christ in glory. This is the Christian pathway the Bible puts before us, and our great quest now is, how can we keep to this pathway—not deviating to the right or to the left, because if we do, if we get off the track, it will result in disillusionment and sorrow. How can we keep on this track with our faces turned toward heaven, towards Christ and towards glory? And how can we retain the wonderful joy and peace that we surely shall know when we have committed everything to Him, and call Him our own Saviour? The Bible again guides us here as in all things.

One thing we must first see is this, that when we accept the Lord as our Saviour He gives us a new nature, and this is what the Apostle Peter speaks of in his second Epistle and the first chapter; "According as His divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness, through the knowledge of Him that hath called us to glory and virtue: whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises that by these ye might be partakers of the divine nature". We have something that we never had before; God has given us part of His own holy and most wonderful nature. We have still the old sinful nature, alas! But, thank God, there is another nature now, His nature, and if we will only heed its dictates then indeed we shall find our feet keeping to this Christian pathway. We shall find too that peace and that joy which is the gift of Christ and it will be ours day by day until, at last, the journey is finished and we are at home with Him who has loved us and given Himself for us.

So the Bible talks about 'spirit' which is this new nature. It also speaks about the flesh—not just the human body, but the old nature we inherit from fallen Adam. Calvary, as we shall see, has dealt with the old nature, and God's precious gift to us is this new nature, to control, to guide, to help, to lead, to strengthen, to do everything that we shall need to live lives that God would have us lead, in joy, happiness and fruitfulness and witness for Him to others. So you see, we now start off with new birth, new life; and just as we start the natural life with babyhood, so we start this new spiritual life in this way. And just as the goal for the natural life is to grow up from infancy to adulthood and become mature mentally and physically, so it is the same goal spiritual for the child of God—God wants us to grow up and leave babyhood behind and become full-grown spiritually.

How can we do this? Roughly speaking, the laws that pertain to growth naturally are the same spiritually. What do we need for natural growth in ordinary life? We want the right food and nourishment to begin with; and then we must have light—there is no growth apart from light. And then we must have the right environment and training. If a child has those three things, it will grow naturally and come to normal adulthood. It is just the same spiritually; we must have the right spiritual food. This new nature that God has given can only assimilate one type of food and one only, and that is the Word of God. we shall be wise if we do not try to feed the new spiritual nature with anything else, such as the things of the world, and the temporal things around us for it cannot assimilate these things, and if we do not feed this nature with its proper food, the Word of God, it will weaken, instead of growing strong. We need, then, constantly to come before God's Word, and as it were, feed on it, Jeremiah said: "Thy words were found and I did eat them"—he likened them to food! In ordinary language we talk about digesting a fact; that is we are receiving it into our minds, and God wants us to receive the truth of His Word in this way like food and make it our own. Thus, as we feed upon God's Word day by day, we grow spiritually, and realize this as we keep in close touch with Him. He can supply all our needs through His Word. We go along then, day by day, in complete trust in Him, handing over everything to Him to control; for we have become His property; the price has been paid, and this was nothing less than the life and the death of His Beloved Son. What a tremendous cost! "You are not your own" wrote the Apostle Paul, "You have been brought with a price". If we do not do this we are really cheating our Saviour of His possession and we cannot expect peace and happiness or progress in the knowledge of God's Truth.

The next thing is this. As we explore this book together we shall need some principle to guide us. We also want, as far as possible, to be rid of human opinion, because, directly we introduce the human element we have the possibility of fallibility and error. But how can we keep out human opinion, with its failure and mistakes?

In order to do this there are certain principles that we must keep well in view. These are really nothing more than common sense; but it is very easy when we take up a book like the Bible to even let our common sense desert us, and that is a pity. In order to avoid human opinions and ideas we want to know exactly what God says; and we must therefore be accurate in our reading of the Bible. It is extraordinary, how sometimes we find ourselves putting in words that are not there, or leaving out words that are there! We shall never get the fullness of truth unless we read accurately what God has written. If, of course, we have any means of getting to know the original languages in which the Bible was written—Hebrew, Aramaic, Greek—so much the better. But possibly many are not in a position to do that, in which case the best thing to do is to get hold of more than one good translation. You have the Authorized Version. There is the Revised Version and others like Weymouth, an up-to-date English Version, and Rotherham; get these and compare them side by side.

The second point: make sure about the Bible's background and its setting. God's Word had a meaning, originally, to the people that He sent it. Note to whom He sends His Word, what was the circumstance surrounding it; that is very important. Do not think first of all "What does it mean to me?" that will come later, but "What did it mean to those to whom God sent it?" Get that settled clearly in your mind.

Third point: For the most part the Bible is to be read literally and in its simple meaning. Do not treat it as though there is always another meaning to the plain natural sense: if you do that you will never hear God saying to you "Thus saith the Lord", and there will always be the person who will come along and say, "Ah, but it doesn't mean that, it means this", and so the flood of human opinion comes in and all divine revelation goes! However, someone may point out that it cannot always be taken literally. No, perfectly true. We will amplify the previous statement, then. Take it literally and in its simple meaning unless it contradicts other Scriptures or definitely known facts; in which case you can know that a figure of speech is being used. But even a figure of speech is only a vivid way of giving literal facts. Never think that if you have a figurative passage there is not a literal meaning underlying it; literality is there all right. You must not, of course, read the symbols or the figure literally, but find out the literal fact these symbols or figures represent. In other words, do not spiritualize God's Word; people who do that will never let the Word mean what it says, they are always trying to find some other meaning and this is not the way to get Truth, but opens the door to error. There is of course a legitimate spiritual application of the Bible. Once you understand the literal meaning and its proper setting, then you may be in a position to make an application of it: that is to say, if it is in accordance with the truth for today and the gospel of God's grace. We shall find that God's Word is like a letter; it has an address on the envelope, and your name and my name, so to speak, is not always there. We are Gentiles who have been saved by God's grace, and quite a lot of the Bible was not primarily written for or to Gentiles. Most of it was written primarily to God's earthly people, the people of Israel. Their name is on the envelope, but as we read it we can often find things that are true of us as well. That is making an application of Scripture to ourselves; but we can only do this safely if it corresponds with what God's Word teaches us concerning the position of saved Gentiles now. Remember this always; that God means what He says and has a meaning for everything that He says, otherwise the Bible can be made to mean anything and is emptied of all its divine authority. All the varying sects with their differing doctrines go to the Bible as their basis, but many do not allow it to speak its own message. Contexts are ignored and the Word gets twisted till it is unrecognizable.

Fourth point: compare Scripture with Scripture, search God's Word, and in doing this you will need help and this will be the help of a good concordance. We ought to thank God for the work of men like Robert Young who laboured all their lifetime to give us an implement, as it were, to dig into God's Word. This is like a spade or a fork, and just as you cannot do gardening without such tools so you cannot dig into God's Word properly without a concordance; it saves you many hours of wasted time. Get a good concordance—and I strongly recommend Young's Analytical Concordance. Cruden's is good; but it only deals with the English; Young's deals with the original, and you do not need to be a Hebrew or a Greek scholar in order to use it.

If we keep these things well in our minds, we can honestly say that it is a reverent and sane way to treat God's Word so that God may speak to us and teach us without human interference or human opinion, that is the all important point. We cannot get Truth by merely listening to what this or that sect believes or teaches. We need a "Thus saith the Lord" and then we have something eternally secure upon which to rest our faith.

The Bible is a book of a tremendous and most wonderful plan that God is working out. It is not just a haphazard collection of books; it has something linking it all together, making it one great continuous unfolding of a marvelous purpose. So, shall we go on, shall we search together? May the Lord help us to be teachable; this is essential. We also must be emptied of all preconceived opinions and just be willing to sit at His feet, as it were, and learn of Him. May He help us with this in view.

No.4. pp. 72 - 77

In our previous study together we have seen that it is necessary for us all to come to a saving knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ if we are ever going to get any understanding of, or have any part in the great revealed plan in God's Word, the Word of Truth that we can pin our faith to and rely on absolutely. God, in His love, has seen our need, and sent His Beloved Son. Through Him, this Word tells us, "we have redemption through His Blood", through the offering of Himself on Calvary's Cross, and His bearing our sins in His own Body on the tree, so that we shall never have to bear them. The word 'redemption' means that we have been 'purchased', we have been bought by God; He has paid the price, and we are His property.

This is the start of a new life, a spiritual life; we start it just like we do our natural lives, as new-born lives, as new-born babes. Peter brings this forward in his first Epistle where he says: "As new-born babes desire the sincere milk of the Word that ye may grow thereby." Babies commence with milk, then as they grow, they can take something more solid. The goal, of course, is that they shall grow up to adulthood and become mature in body and mind; and that is the great goal now for every true believer in Christ, spiritual maturity, to grow up and leave spiritual babyhood behind. Again, in our last study, we saw that the only way we can grow spiritually is by feeding on the only food that our new spiritual nature can receive, that is, God's precious Word.

What we want to point out to you before proceeding further is that salvation not only touches the sin problem, and that of death that would separate us from God for ever, but it also touches the mind. One of the most tragic things that happened when Adam fell and passed on sin and death to the rest of mankind, was the effect that it had on his mind. Man can be very clever and brainy in things within the human sphere, yet when he goes outside this sphere into the things of God he is right out of his depth; he can know nothing of God merely by cleverness or his human intellectual attainments. No wonder the Apostle Paul wrote: "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God for they are foolishness unto him, neither can he know them because they are spiritually discerned."

So God, in salvation, first touches the mind and understanding and then, at last, we can begin to see things in a measure as He sees them, we can begin to see our utter need met by the Lord Jesus Christ, which we could not do before. We can see something of the beauty and the wonders contained in God's Word, the Word of Truth, and we can begin to understand them. This is the commencement of the understanding of the Bible and there is no other way to obtain it. To approach it as an interesting book can never give real spiritual understanding. You can only get it when you have a saving knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ and He has given you this new mind. You must then rely on the Holy Spirit to open the eyes of your understanding as you read it, and we trust that this may be the experience of us all as we study this wonderful Book together.

Now the Bible is a unity. It is not just sixty-six books put together in a haphazard sort of way, of which one can read bits here and there, picking out those that are most interesting and leaving the rest. This, alas is the way that many Christians seem to regard it. Rather the Bible is the revelation of a great plan concerning God's creation. The very first words of it start like this: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth". There was a reason for God doing that. He did not do it just as a whim, or because He wanted something to do! There was a great and wonderful purpose lying behind that creation. Let us read together a verse from the Epistle to the Ephesians which stresses this question of God's plan revealed in the Bible. In chapter iii. 2 the Apostle is talking about God's manifold wisdom teaching principalities and powers by the church, and then he writes this: "According to the eternal purpose which He purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord." The word 'purpose' is the word 'plan', "according to the plan of the ages", literally, "which He planned in Christ Jesus our Lord". The ages are the great span of time, sub-divided into epochs and upon this great platform of time God is working out a great redemptive purpose which is centred in the Lord Jesus. To regard it apart from Christ will never give us understanding; in fact, there would not be a plan at all, the whole thing would collapse if it was not resting solidly upon the Person and work of the Saviour. But it is planned in Him. It embraces, then, all creation, heaven and earth, and its being worked out in time, the ages, and it is centre in redemption because the creation has been spoiled by sin and death and therefore it must be redeemed. It has to be dealt with in this way, otherwise it can never come to a glorious fulfillment.

The same epistle tells us in chapter i. that "God works all things after the counsel of His own will". There is an irresistible force, God's omnipotence, behind this plan. Are we not thankful that this is a fact? Otherwise the plan would most surely founder. It will never founder because of lack of power or wisdom; the Lord has unlimited power and wisdom and what He determines finally must be accomplished. It may be lengthened out, because He is not just dealing with inanimate objects like the sun, moon and stars which immediately obey His behest automatically. He is dealing with men and women who are moral creatures having a measure of responsibility which enables them to say "yes" or "no" to Him. When men say "no" to Him, God, in His mercy, very often waits, but He will not wait for ever. He is indeed a God who is long-suffering and patient and that may explain to us why this plan is taking so long to work out. The wonder of it is, that in this gigantic purpose taking in all creation, heaven and earth, the individual is not lost in it!

Let us read another verse in Paul's second Epistle to Timothy, chapter i. 9: "God who hath saved us and called us with (or to) a holy calling. Not according to our works (not because of any merit on our part) but according to His own purpose (according to His own plan)". Your salvation and mine is part of this wondrous plan of God! Rom. viii. put it in this way: "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are called according to His purpose"—called according to His plan. II Tim. i. says we are saved according to the plan; Rom. viii. says we are called according to this great plan.

The best thing for us to do now is to look at this plan in the large and then to come to our part as individuals in it. Going back to the beginning, to the first verse of Gen. i., we find God creating heaven and earth, and please note that heaven comes first! Heaven not only a place but heavenly beings, angels, principalities and powers. We may not understand fully why He created these heavenly beings. Then He created the earth with the intention of it being inhabited. In Isa. xlv. 18, we read: "For thus saith the Lord that created the heavens; God Himself that formed the earth and made it. He hath established it; He created it not in vain, He formed it to be inhabited." So here is the first light brought before us on the purpose behind creation. God made the earth to be inhabited by a race of beings, who were fashioned in His image.

Alas that plan was soon to be spoiled because Satan fell from his perfect state and Adam and Eve had not been very long on the earth before this fallen being came and did his deadly work in the garden of Eden, and so in fallen Adam and Eve, and all the human race, you find God's image marred. Sin and death follow, and these are the great enemies which spoil what God had in mind. The fact that every human being dies, and there is no exception to this, proves that every one is a sinner. Death is not the result of something good, but of something evil. "The wages of sin is death." It is useless for men and women to seek to evade the fact that they are sinners when death stares them in the face every day of their lives. Heaven has become ruined, and now earth has become ruined. What a tragedy! How is God going to deal with this? Is He going to let His plan be frustrated? No—He "works all things after the counsel of His own will", as we have seen. God's purpose is one of redemption and this is going to be sufficient to put things right and undo the work of sin and the devil. But how will God bring it to bear upon the world in its darkness and death? Will He speak to each individual separately? He could do that; for He is almighty. The very fact that He could speak to an idolater proves this, a man named Abram, in Ur of the Chaldees. There was no Bible there, no missionary, no human intermediary at all, but God spoke to him, and Abram heard and responded. If God has done it once He could do it a thousand or a million times. Is He going to work that way, or, will He work through a channel and reach the whole world through this channel?

It is the second way which is the way God chooses. And so, when later we come to chapter xi. in the book of Genesis, we read of the whole of the nations in disorganization and conflict at Babel; and then in chapter xii., God brings this man Abram into the land of promise, the land we now call Palestine, and He makes certain promises to him. This is what it says in Gen. xii. 2: "I will make of thee (Abram) a great nation and will bless thee and make thy name great and thou shalt be a blessing. And I will bless them that bless thee and curse him that curseth thee; and in thee, shall all families of the earth be blessed." Let us try and understand these words because we are coming back to them again and again in our studies. Later on in the N.T. we shall find that this promise is also taken up by the N.T. writers.

Now who was this "seed of Abraham"? We know that Abraham had a son, Isaac, and Isaac had a son, Jacob: Jacob had twelve sons and from these came the twelve tribes of the children of Israel, the Jewish race as we now know it. They are the literal seed of Abraham; but more than that, someone else was in mind Who also was a Son of Abraham, and he was the Lord Jesus Christ (Matt. i. 1). Was He in mind when God said "and in thy Seed shall all families of the earth be blessed"? Most certainly, because Gal. iii. 6 says: 'Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made." "And He saith not, and to seeds (plural) as of many, but as of one. And to thy Seed which is Christ." We are therefore right in saying that the Son of Abraham is the Lord Jesus Christ, but should we be right in saying that He exhausts the prophesy concerning the seed of Abraham? No, because at the end of the chapter we find others who are also called Abraham's seed (verse 29) "And if ye (the Galatian believers) be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed". So then Christ is Abraham's Seed and these Galatian believers were Abraham's seed as well and 'heirs according to the promise'. Here is no contradiction because they are "all of one" as the epistle to the Hebrews expresses it. Christ and the literal seed of Abraham whom He had redeemed by His precious Blood are looked on as one, a unity, in the plan. We are only getting half the truth if we say that it refers only to Christ personally, or if we say that it refers to the people of Israel only.

Now not only do we read in the Scriptures about Abraham's seed, but also that they are given by God an earthly home. So back again to the book of Genesis, this time to chapter xiii. 14-17. Verse 14 says: "The Lord said to Abraham, after that Lot was separated from him, lift up now thine eyes and look from the place where thou art, northward, and southward, and eastward and westward, for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it and to thy seed." Verse 17 says: "Arise, walk through the land in the length of it and in the breadth of it for I will give it unto thee", and it is described later on, geographically, in chapter xv., "from the river of Egypt (the River Nile) unto the great river, the River Euphrates". One cannot spiritualize a literal piece of land like this (Gen. xv. 18). And we find God not only made this promise to Abraham, but to Isaac. In Gen. xxvi. 3 and 4: "Sojourn in this land and I will be with thee and I will bless thee; for unto thee and unto thy seed will I give all these countries." Verse 4: "I will make thy seed to multiply as the stars of heaven and will give unto thy seed all these countries", now note: "and in thy seed shall all nations of the earth be blessed". So here is the same promise repeated to Isaac, and then to Jacob in chapter xxviii. Jacob greatly valued this and planned to get it by any means possible, whether fair means or foul, but God does not need help like that, and in the end he got it not by deception but by sheer grace. This is what it says in Gen. xxviii. 13, 14: "Behold the Lord stood above it" (where this man was laid down to sleep), and he saw Him (the Lord in a vision)—"I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac: the land whereon thou liest to thee will I give it and to thy seed. And thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth and thou shalt be spread abroad to the west and to the east and to the north and to the south".

Will you continue with me in searching out this great plan from the Word of God? May He make us teachable and then we are going to make some thrilling discoveries!

No.5. pp. 81 - 85

We have seen that the Word of God is a Book of purpose. It is the revelation of a plan that is dealing with God's great creation in two parts. The Divine plan for the earth occupies much of the Bible, but we are going to see that there is a revelation of His plan for the heavens as well, and one that can touch us very intimately indeed. Now, of course, God can reveal Himself to anybody at any time without any aid whatsoever, in the same way as He spoke to Abraham. This He could do again and again, but it would seem, from the Scriptures, that He has not chosen to work this way. Rather He uses redeemed human beings as means to make His truth known. This fair creation of God, heaven and earth, has been spoiled by sin and by death; and so God is telling us in His Word what He has done to take away this blot, and then what He is going to do so that there may yet be a creation of beauty and perfection. The present creation needs a Redeemer, someone who can take away sin and death. Possibly some may think that they can eradicate sin, but is anybody so foolish as to imagine they can abolish death? We are apt to forget death, are we not? God's plan, the wonderful scheme that He had in mind at the very beginning can never come to pass where there is death, for this spoils it entirely. The Bible calls it "the last enemy", "the last enemy that shall be destroyed is death" (I Cor. xv. 26). So, in the very beginning of the Bible we are told how God is going to reach and save sinful humanity, not by speaking to each one separately, but by using a human channel. Thus He lays hold of Abraham, a pagan idolater, and takes him over from Ur of the Chaldees to the place we now call Palestine, then reveals Himself to him and makes wonderful promises concerning his descendants; and through his descendants, his seed, God says He will bless all families of the earth.

Now in our last study we saw that there was a literal piece of land that God gave to Abraham; not only a promise of a seed, but a home for them to live in, and that cannot be spiritualized! It is not possible to spiritualize the statement 'from the great river, the river of Egypt to the river Euphrates' because these are geographical points. The land in between, God said to Abraham, I will give to your seed. So, if the land is literal, and it must be, the seed must be literal too. This is fulfilled in a twofold way, the Lord Jesus Christ as the great Seed of Abraham, because Paul, when he wrote Galatians, definitely asserted that Christ was the Seed; but He Himself does not exhaust that prophecy, for the descendants of Abraham are his seed too (Acts iii. 25) and they are linked with Him in this great plan. God looks at them and the Lord Jesus as one in this great purpose. So we find He makes the same promise to Abraham's son, Isaac, concerning a seed, his descendants, and the land, and the promise the assurance that 'in thy seed shall families of the earth be blessed!' The same is repeated to Jacob, as we saw, in Gen. xxviii. 13, 14: and from Jacob's twelve sons come to the people of Israel.

Now we must keep this well in mind; it is very important to understand as we trace out the Divine purpose in the Bible. God reveals that He is going to use them, the Jewish race, so that He might reach world wide with salvation and blessing. The light of the knowledge of the gospel and the truth is going to spread to all families of the earth through this seed. But we stress this, there is one thing that God cannot do, He can not use unredeemed, unclean channel. So this nation, this seed, needs redemption; they cannot be used as a channel of blessing to all the earth until their Redeemer has come and died for them. They must be saved and cleansed and then they will be in a position to be used by God in this way. Note, geographically the land of Palestine, and Jerusalem its capital are right in the centre of the earth, and Jerusalem is yet to be the world's most important city, both commercially and spiritually.

We expect you have uttered the so-called Lord's prayer many times. You have said: "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." This is asking God to bring in this kingdom on the earth and one day it will be fulfilled through the redeemed Jewish nation. We must not confuse this with the heavenly part of God's great purpose. There is a literal kingdom that is coming on this earth, otherwise why pray this prayer? It is most surprising how so many people utter this prayer yet deny there is a possibility of God's kingdom ever coming on the earth in this way! It is surely coming to pass, otherwise the whole thing is a mockery.

But it will only come by reason of the fact that the Lord Jesus Christ has died to make it possible, died to save this channel, the people of Israel, so that they can take the knowledge of truth to the ends of the earth; then the kingdom will come. That is the way it is going to work out. In the fullness of time, Scripture tells us "God sent His Son". The Lord Jesus comes to His earthly people, this seed of Abraham, as their great Priest-King; in this twofold capacity we have Christ's relationship with the people of Israel. He was their Priest, He was their King, and in that order. Sometimes it is reversed and we say, King-Priest but this is the wrong way round. One of the O.T. prophecies, the prophecy of Zechariah, looking forward to His coming said this: "He shall be a Priest upon his Throne." Note the priestly side is put first: He cannot be king—until His work as Priest and Offering as well. Only in this way can the sin of Israel and that of all His people be dealt with so that a holy God can use them. In other words, His great redemptive work on the Cross has to be accomplished first, before that kingdom can be set up. Israel must be redeemed; Christ must die for them, as He must die for you and me if we are ever going to have any part in this glorious and wonderful purpose. John i. 11 reads in this way: "He came unto His own but His own (Israel) received Him not. But as many as received Him to them He gave the power (right) to become children of God". As many as received Him, we wonder if you are one of these? Have you received the Lord Jesus Christ? Have you committed everything to Him, have you believed Him, in that sense? To such He gave the privilege of becoming children of God, of being members of His family. You are not a child of God therefore unless you have received Christ as Saviour. It is not true to say that every single human being by natural birth is a child of God. They may have a relationship to God as Creator but not as Father. The tragedy was that the earthly channel that God was preparing to reach the whole world, the people of Israel, rejected Him, and He came to them, primarily, at His first coming, He said: "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel." Note He calls them "lost sheep". That shows they needed a Redeemer, before God could use them and the divine plan for the earth cannot be realized until this is accomplished.

When He called the twelve apostles, we are told in Matthew's Gospel that He limited their ministry to the same people. In x. 5, 6 we read: "Go not into the way of the Gentiles and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not. But go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel": in other words, their ministry was exclusively Jewish, and unless we understand the plan we shall be puzzled here. Someone may say, "I thought God wanted to bring in a world-wide kingdom; I thought He wanted to reach all families of the earth, and now when Christ comes, He ministers only to one nation and forbids the Apostles to go any wider than this. How is the gospel every going to spread over the earth if the message is limited in this way?

But you see, the human channel must be got ready first! God has not abandoned this way to bring in the kingdom; this earthly people must be laid hold of, redeemed and prepared by His grace. Thus the attention is focused on them to begin with, and when they respond, and are saved, then they shall be the means used to take the knowledge of the Lord to the ends of the earth. The Bible asserts that "The knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea". When God concentrates upon Israel, He has not forgotten this, but is preparing them so that one day this prophecy may be gloriously true. So Christ must die for them; He must become their Priest, their Offering, their Saviour, before He can be their King and before they can be the channel through which this great kingdom can be brought into being.

There is something else that we must add. While the death of Christ was a necessity, foreknown by God in this great plan, we must not for one moment think that God forced the people of Israel to crucify Christ. That would be a terrible thing. If God forced them to do this, they have no responsibility for it. Peter could never have proclaimed publicly as he did, after the day of Pentecost and accused his own people, saying to them: "You with wicked hands, have taken and crucified Him." Their hands would not have been wicked at all, for they would only have been doing what God intended they should do. Here appears to be a dilemma: Christ must die to be the Offering for sin, because "the wages of sin is death". He must die for us or all of us whether Jew or Gentile, must die eternally, one or the other. We may resolve the difficulty if we read a verse in John's Gospel. He said: "I lay down my life that I might take it again: no man taketh it from me." Will you note that? So Israel did not really take it from Him unless He had been willing; they did not force Him to go to the Cross—"No man taketh it from Me, I lay it down of myself". I decide when I am going to die, He said, "I have power to lay it down, I have power to take it again". No ordinary man could talk like that! You know quite well that you have no power to decide the moment you are going to die, unless you commit suicide, of course, and if you did that you certainly have no power to take it up again; you could not raise yourself from the dead. But Christ asserted that He had the power to do this very thing. So even if Israel had been ready to receive Him, He still would have died; He would have voluntarily laid down His life and become the great Sin-bearer: He would have taken it up again, as He said, after three days. And then, instead of waiting centuries, the kingdom could have come in to being straight away because Israel would have been redeemed and the whole plan for worldwide blessing could have gone forward.

But it did not happen like that. Is it not tragic the way sin and failure has postponed and hindered God's plan? At the same time we must realize that it cannot finally frustrate it, otherwise we have no hope, no assurance at all. We should have no message of joy to proclaim if that were true. But God is not dealing with puppets; He is dealing with responsible people who can refuse and reject, so that God's purposes for the time being can be delayed. That is why it has not come to pass yet; that is why, nearly two thousand years after Calvary that the kingdom on the earth is not yet in being. And as we look on world conditions we seem to see it receding farther and farther away; but when we have got the Divine Plan in our minds we can realize that God has got everything under control; He is still 'working all things after the counsel of His own will'.

Now the next point is this: the great Sacrifice for sin having been made, God thus over-ruling as He did the people of Israel murdering their Messiah, the Gospel can now be preached to the people who first needed it, the murderers, the Jewish nation. And unless God has changed the plan and discarded Israel, and is going to use some other channel to reach all families of the earth, that is the very thing that must happen. The book of history that follows the Gospel records makes the continuation of the purpose clear. That book, of course, is "The Acts of the Apostles". It shows that God's longsuffering, even after the climax and sin of crucifying Christ did not run out for the Jew. The plan was still in the forefront and so, during the thirty-five years, roughly speaking, which that book covers, God waits in His longsuffering for Israel to repent and turn back to Him. The gospel is preached to them by Peter and the twelve, and he waits to see whether they will respond in this way. Later on, when Paul wrote the Epistle to the Romans; he wrote concerning his own people, the Jew, "my kinsmen according to the flesh". This can only be the literal Jew. He said: "God hath not cast away His people which he foreknew." Now there are some systems of theology that tell us that He did cast them away at the Cross: but Paul said He had not done so. In effect he said, "Look at me—I am an Israelite and He has not cast me away". That is the argument of Rom. xi., and the Scripture goes on to say this: 'The gifts and the calling of God are without repentance." God does not change his mind; if this is the plan He is not going to alter it because of man's failure and sin. So beware of any interpretation of the Scriptures that says there is no future for the Jew as a nation, the gifts and the calling and the plan of God are without repentance on His part. Paul goes on to say, "As touching the gospel they are enemies for your sakes, but as concerning the election they are beloved for the fathers' sakes". So you see, after Calvary, God takes up His dealings with this same people, and He prepares the twelve for this great ministry to them.

In His character He is the same God today. He is still the unchangeable God Who keeps His Word. Upon this all our assurance is based. If He breaks His promises to the fathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, how do we know that He will not do so to us? Let us be thankful that "this God is our God", utterly dependable, upon Whom we can venture for time and for eternity.

No.6. pp. 111 - 115

We have seen that, in order to fulfil God's plan for world blessing through Israel, the Lord Jesus had to be manifested as the Priest-King. The priestly aspect of His work deals with sin and its removal righteously, while the Kingly side relates to rule and government.

Lt us consider the latter in more detail: In the O.T. days, God had made it clear to David that one of his descendants should be this great King.

Let us turn to Psa. lxxxix. This is the great psalm of God's faithfulness; the word occurs seven times. Here is the God who never breaks His promises, so this gives us a great ground of assurance, does it not? If God plans to do a certain thing, you may be sure it is going to be accomplished. Human scheme often fail because men have not the wisdom or the power to carry out what they plan. You may have had that experience, but this cannot happen with God Who is both omnipotent and all-wise.

Now He says (verse 3) "I have made a covenant with my chosen, I have sworn unto David my servant". God is going to make a promise concerning the seed, saying very much the same thing as He did to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob: "Thy seed will I establish for ever"; He is going to guarantee them an existence in perpetuity, and then God adds "and build up thy throne unto all generations". Read the whole psalm; we cannot quote the whole of it here. We will note a few verses in the middle. God comes back to the seed, David's son, in verse 29: "His seed also will I make to endure for ever and his throne", the two things again, the seed and the throne, the leader, the ruler, "as the days of heaven". Now God says, if they forsake My ways, I will judge them, I will discipline them. "I will visit their transgressions" (verse 30) "with the rod and their iniquities with stripes". Nevertheless, because the Lord has made a promise He cannot break it. So we read, "Nevertheless my loving kindness will I not utterly take from him nor suffer my faithfulness (my unchangeability) to fail. My covenant will I not break nor alter the thing that has gone out of my lips". Will you note that? God says, I will not break My Word, nor will I change it.

There are some interpreters of the Bible who say that He has changed it, that there is no future for the Jew; rather God has now given all the promises to the Church which they call spiritual Israel. In that case God has done what He said He would not do, He has altered His Word. But that cannot be, "I will not alter the thing that has gone out of my lips". "Once have I sworn by My holiness that I will not lie unto David." Again we have the seed and the throne, "His seed shall endure for ever, and his throne as the sun before Me: it shall be established for ever as the moon and as the faithful witness in heaven". Surely, words cannot be clearer! This promise to David was fulfilled, of course, in the Lord Jesus Christ. He was the literal descendant of David, as His genealogy given in Matthew's Gospel shows.

Shall we now turn to the prophecy of Isa. ix.? Some of us know verse 6 because it is so often quoted at Christmas time: "For unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given and the government shall be upon His shoulder." Here is the Seed of David, the King of Israel, "and the government shall be upon His shoulder. And his name shall be called, Wonderful, Counselor, The Mighty God". Yes, the helpless Babe, born in Bethlehem, the Son given, is "The Mighty God"!

"Great is the mystery of godliness", wrote the Apostle Paul centuries later, "God was manifest in the flesh", in human form. "The Mighty God, the Everlasting Father", better, "the Father of the ages", the One who has created the span of time, the One Who is the origin of the ages. The Epistle to the Hebrews tells us this in chapter i.: "By Whom He made the ages", "the worlds" in our A.V. but "ages" in the original. He is also "The Prince of Peace. Of the increase of His government and peace there shall be no end"; "there shall be no end upon the throne of David". This is the throne that Psa. lxxxix. speaks about, "and upon his kingdom to order it and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth", for how long?, "for ever"! Who is going to bring it to pass and how is it going to happen? Listen! "The zeal of the Lord of Hosts will perform this". God's zeal, God's intense passion to finish His plan will bring it to pass, will accomplish this mighty purpose. The government, the rule of the world and all creation, will be on His shoulder; it is not yet, otherwise we should not have the terrible confusion and trouble that we see all around us. The Epistle to the Hebrews says: "We see not yet all things put under Him." He is still rejected of men; perhaps He is still rejected by someone who is reading these lines. But there is a day coming when the government, all rule, shall be on His shoulder, when, at last, as Phil. ii. tells us, "Every knee shall bow, of things in heaven and things in earth and things under the earth", every knee, no exception, and at last He will be acknowledged by all to be the Lord, the great Jehovah of the O.T. Here is then the promise concerning the Leader, the King of Israel, and the throne of David.

How is the theme picked up when we actually come to the birth of Christ? Let us turn to the Gospel of Luke, chapter i. Here is the angel talking to His mother, Mary and this is what he says: "Behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a Son, and shalt call his name JESUS. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest: and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David", just as Psa. lxxxix. foretold and Isa. ix. spoke about. Here is the fulfillment of the promise. "And he shall reign over the house of Jacob", the people of Israel, "for ever". This is just Isaiah asserted, "of his kingdom there shall be no end". Later on in this chapter, we come to Zacharias, who was "filled with the Holy Ghost" (verse 67), and being filled with the Holy Ghost he was not giving us his own opinions. This is what he says in his song (verse 68): "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, for He hath visited and redeemed His people", the people of Israel, "and hath raised up for us an horn of salvation in the house of His servant David". This "horn of salvation" is David's Seed, the King. Then in verse 72, "To perform the mercy promised to our fathers and to remember His holy covenant". What is this covenant? It is 'the oath which he sware to our father Abraham'. So we are thrown back again to the unconditional promises that God made to Abraham. God said to him, "I will . . . . . I will . . . . . I will" without any conditions! So centuries later, we find Zacharias under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, gathering all these things up, and they still revolve around the Seed of David, and David's throne, Someone who is going to be King over His people Israel and then later King of the world.

We are not surprised, therefore, in Matt. ii. to find the question asked, "Where is He that shall be born King of the Jews"? It does not say King of the Church, or King of any Gentile nation. The time has not come for this.

Then note, the chief priests and scribes, we are told, were gathered together by Herod; He demanded of them (verse 4) where Christ should be born, and they said to him, "In Bethlehem of Judaea". How did they know it? Because God's prophetic word in the O.T. had pin-pointed the little place of Bethlehem, so small that it was hardly noticed. When God comes to the earth He does not come to Rome, the mistress of the earth, as one might think; He comes to one of the least-known places in the land of Palestine, so lowly and so humble. We read (verse 5) "In Bethlehem of Judaea, for thus it is written by the prophet. And thou, Bethlehem in the land of Juda, art not the least among the princes of Juda; for out of thee shall come a Governor that shall rule My people Israel". They are still in the centre of God's great plan!

But what about after Calvary and the rejection of the Lord by Israel? What do we find? In the book that carries on the message, the Acts of the Apostles, we discover this nation is still prominent. If they were cast off by God at the Cross, they could not occupy the place they do in this book.

What we find in the Book of the Acts is this: that God starts to prepare the eleven for further ministry to this nation. In His mercy He is going to hold back judgment on this sinful people and command them once more to repent and turn to Him. He is not yet going to lay them aside in unbelief.

It will be helpful if we see the overlap that Luke makes between his Gospel and the Acts, so we will turn back to Luke xxiv. Here is recorded one of the appearances of our Lord to the eleven, and He eats in their presence. They give Him a piece of boiled fish and some honey (verse 42) and then in verse 44, He says to them, "These are the words which I spake unto you while I was yet with you that all things must be fulfilled which are written in the law of Moses and in the prophets and in the psalms concerning Me" (the whole of the O.T. points forward to Christ). Now, He says, they all must be fulfilled. Will you specially note what verse 45 says: "Then opened He their understanding that they might understand the scriptures." Now it may be true to say that up to this point they did not understand the Scriptures. The Lord had said on more than one occasion that

He was going to die by being crucified and the third day He would be raised again. He did not say it once, but several times to them. They did not understand; and understanding is of fundamental importance. We must be given understanding, otherwise we shall never comprehend the Bible and its purpose. If we desire this very much and go in humility to the Lord, He will give it us. The One who has made the plan, the One who has written the Book can explain it to us and, praise God, He has promised to do it. It is not primarily a question of braininess or education. It is a question of enlightenment, and the only One who can give us light on the Word is the Holy Spirit. He alone can open the eyes of our understanding. Do not let us be deceived on this point. No man or church can give it us. It is God's prerogative alone.

In this passage in the Gospel of Luke we are assured that the disciples have divine understanding given them so they are not likely to make mistakes.
